In order to maximize the realization of the Feminine Imperative and minimize the Feminine Existential Fear, women will resort to a personalized combination of soft polygyny and soft polyandry. This will fulfill women's desire for a Sexual Fantasy Life, one which allows her to feel like it is Socially Accepted, even if only among a few partners.

This is the Feminine Secret.

 Serial means that the time continuum is separated, but the space may be the same.*
 Parallel means that the space continuum is separated, but the time may be the same.*
* Societal forces are now pushing towards the open acceptance of polysexual relationships and others.*

The Purpose of the Secret

The overriding purpose of keeping the secret is to control outcome. But there are several other supporting factors.

1. It enables the participants to plan, implement, and prolong their secret activities.

Soft polygyny/soft harems aren't a topic of critique because women don't want anyone talking publicly about it outside those "in the know", the "secret society" comprised of almost all women and about 40 to 50% of men.

2. Speaking of shameful matters invites scorn and criticism, whereas keeping it secret avoids shame and censure.

Women certainly don't talk publicly about their participation in soft polygyny because of their anti-slut defense, their demand that no one ever judge them for anything they do, and their need to save face and send sexual misadventures down the memory hole. This secrecy also allows them (1) to avoid shame and censure, and (2) to marry ignorant hapless beta buxes when they tire of, or can no longer participate in soft polygyny. It must remain a secret, because no self-respecting man would marry a woman with a known history of soft polygyny. Women who post their liaisons online, or participate in the OASIS have extreme difficulty in hiding their past. As they say, "The internet is forever."

3. It protects others who share the secret, builds trust and bonding, and provides an association based on loyalty.

Men who are "in the know" don't talk about women's participation in soft polygyny because the more men who know about it, the greater the competition is, and also because they don't want to shame, anger, or alienate the women who participate in it. There is also a peculiar satisfaction gained from being an insider (pun intended). Men who are not "in the know" don't talk about it because, of course, they are purposely kept in the dark about it. As they say, "Only the bad guys know."

Parents are typically the last to know of such affairs. However, there are a small number of parents who have a way of sidling up to their young adult children in such matters. For some of these, it's because they participated (or continue to participate) in this lifestyle themselves, and never really let go of it. There are some parents who are rather proactive about making sure their young adult children are "in the know" and getting them into the scene, usually for vicarious purposes.

Case Study – Jack's Family of Origin

I shared this story before.

All the women in my family talk rather freely amongst themselves, but they'll never tell the men anything that is going on. They'll have a caucus, make decisions, and carry out those decisions among themselves, and they intentionally keep the men in the dark as much as possible.

For example, when my sisters and female cousins started to be sexually active, my mother and aunts gave them lots of "instructions", and kept it all a secret from the men, as if it were none of their business. If there was ever an abortion in the family, I never knew about it. When one of my aunts had an affair and was socking money away in preparation for a divorce, all the women knew all about it, but all the men remained clueless until she breeched the subject herself, and she only did so after she had already arranged everything with a lawyer. A couple years later, my mother did the same thing. It is embarrassing for me to admit that everyone in my family are professing, church-going Christians.

After my parents divorced, I talked it over with my dad. He told me he experienced the same thing in his marriage to my mother – that she would never talk to him about anything – and this was the second biggest disappointment he ever had, not only about marriage, but in his whole life. He said the biggest disappointment of his life was when my sister divorced her husband after only four years of marriage, the first among my siblings. (All three of us are divorced now.)

For some time after this, I had the hope that I might make a dent in this family curse. I started to talk about this with my family members from time to time, trying to get it out in the open. Soon I began to recognize a pattern in my family. Whenever I brought it up, all the men knew exactly what I was talking about and jumped on board, but all the women became indignant and walked out of the room with a huff. My sister was the only woman in my family who was willing to admit it was true, but she would only admit this to me in private, and she would not go into the topic any further than a simple agreement. But even so, I did learn something about the women's perspective from talking with her.

I experienced more of the same with my current wife, but it wasn't as bad because I was already aware of this, and I had already learned to be less trusting of women.

Now I know this is not just a curse on my family, it is the Curse of Eve.

The Motivations of the Secret

There are several aspects of secrecy that (1) appeal to human metaphysical nature, as well as (2) serve the desire for sex and sexual fantasy. In many cases, "…the importance of the secrecy lies not in the supposed result (outsiders not knowing things) but rather in the act of secret-keeping itself. Masonry (and Mormonism, and the ancient Mysteries) is based on the principle that keeping secrets is good for the soul.*"

Non-communication may facilitate deeper and more thorough thought on the matter.*

Secrecy recasts the subject as being sacred.

Secrecy promotes a posture of humility. Very often our reasons for talking about things are unworthy and related to pride.*

Secrecy is a form of discipline, a way of practicing self-control. "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body. Behold, we put bits in the horses' mouths, that they may obey us; and we turn about their whole body." (James 3:2-3).*

The esoteric nature of certain metaphysical experiences prevents real knowledge of the matter from being transmitted outside of having a mystical encounter of the same. It is better if people come to the knowledge of such things through first-hand experience. For example, Jesus often warned his followers not to tell others certain things about His identity and His ministry. (See Matthew 8:1-4, 16:20; Mark 1:34, 1:40-44; 3:11-12, 8:29-30; Luke 5:12-15, 9:20-21). I believe this is because too much head knowledge can become a baggage of expectations that influence the perceptions of others in the way they might apprehend the truth of the things He said to them. Jesus, as well as many secret societies in history, are well aware of the fact that if someone has not already discovered a thing on his own accord, then he could not make any sense of it, nor make any good use of it, if it is whispered in his ear. OTOH, there is a good chance that he will b@stardize the truth of the matter and become a barrelhead of scorn and shame. So it is wiser to keep one's peace, and let the secret remain a secret.

Believe it or not, the Bible has something to say about how to handle the Feminine Secret.

> [3] But sexual immorality or any impurity or greed must not even be mentioned among you, as is proper among saints; [4] and there must be no filthiness or foolish talk, or vulgar joking, which are not fitting, but rather giving of thanks. [5] For this you know with certainty, that no sexually immoral or impure or greedy person, which amounts to an idolater, has an inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God.
> Ephesians 5:3-5 (NASB)

Our modern Christian gatekeepers are confident about using verse 3 to preemptively clamp the mouths of those who might ask questions about or discuss the Feminine Secret. But what follows in verse 6 is a warning against using verse 3 in this manner.

> [6] See that no one deceives you with empty words, for because of these things the wrath of God comes upon the sons of disobedience. [7] Therefore do not become partners with them; [8] for you were once darkness, but now you are light in the Lord; walk as children of light [9] (for the fruit of the light consists in all goodness, righteousness, and truth), [10] as you try to learn what is pleasing to the Lord.
> Ephesians 5:6-10 (NASB)

If we ask, who is "them", and what does it mean to "become partners", then verse 7 might be validly construed to apply to several different scenarios.

- "Partners" could mean those who engage in sexual immorality, OR it could mean those who "politely" avoid discussion of the matter, which serves to conceal and enable the former.
- Do not pursue nor enable feminist mating strategies, e.g. serial monogamy, AF/BB, or various form of polysexuality.
- Do not propagate Blue Pill feminist lies, e.g. pedestalizing princesses, YOLO, etc.
- Do not pursue secret AF liaisons.
- Do not be a foolish Beta orbiter who props up feminist mating strategies.

Verse 11 may very well follow after this list.

> [11] Do not participate in the useless deeds of darkness, but instead even expose them; [12] for it is disgraceful even to speak of the things which are done by them in secret. [13] But all things become visible when they are exposed by the light, for everything that becomes visible is light.
> Ephesians 5:11-13 (NASB)

From verse 11, we see that the proper response is to remove the secrecy aspects of the secret, as I am doing by writing this post.

Conclusions

After having been shrouded by feminism over the past 40 years, the fallen nature of women has only been recently revealed by the Manosphere. This includes the harrowing, inconvenient truth about the fleshly inclinations of women — lacking moral agency, hypergamic, solipsistic, carousel riding branch swingers, reveling in defilement… Later in life they discover cuckoldry, abortion, domestic violence, the Duluth scheme, and frivorce — and I'm only just scratching the surface.

Furthermore, women are prone to "go off" suddenly, indignantly bulverizing, lying, gaslighting, and projecting their deeper nature, even after the facts are known, and without an ounce of guilt.

Interestingly, all of these traits are aggravated or encouraged by those who brandish the "misogynist" rhetoric, even though they deny it. By doing so, they bring about the real world manifestation of the worst feminine nature that is possible — another repugnant embodiment of misogyny. To add insult to injury, all these traits are proudly owned with an inconsiderate, self-righteous sense of entitlement.

Women won't talk about these things openly, because it would be too shameful, even profane, and it would show their hand. Women already know these things about themselves (and that's why they don't like each other). Thus, they must live and operate in secrecy to keep a veneer of dignity, all in order to receive the respect, generosity and other benefits that come naturally from the ignorantly idealistic, altruistic nature of men who imagine women to be everything they want or need them to be.

If all goes well (from their point of view), men will never know the truth and can therefore be more easily controlled and manipulated. So it is all the more important for their deeds of darkness to be exposed.

The Romantics: Talking in Your Sleep (1983)

Red Pill lessons from the bards of yesteryore.
As described in The Feminine Secret (2021-08-16), women love fantasy and they love keeping secrets. This is an innate characteristic of female nature.

Young girls have a little game they play about keeping secrets. "Can you keep a secret?" They will share little tidbits of the personal or the profane and then watch to see whether their confidante spills the beans. This game is centered on trust and loyalty. Girls who are able to keep a lid on it earn the status of a trusted friend. Those who cannot fall under the bus in the immediate fallout, but eventually rework their identity to become more of a powerful gatekeeper who can be trusted to pass and review gossip to see whether it is true or not. Later in life they learn the wisdom and discipline necessary to keep some things secret while also being a whistleblower on the liars and tricksters.

Even as adults, women like to play this game. Women I've dated have coyly said to me, "Can I tell you a secret?" Then after my assent, they'd pull me close and whisper in my ear some forbidden fantasy that they long to experience with me, or sometimes it's just a simple "I love you!".

Case Study – A High School Story

When I was in the 8th grade, a group of schoolmates who lived in my neighborhood sat in the grass one night under the starlight and we shared our secrets. When my next door neighbor, a girl two years older than me, told us that she started having sex with her boyfriend, I protested, saying it's not right and it's too soon for her. Before I finished my sentence, an older boy shoved me and told me to get lost, so I left the huddle. About 30 years later, that same girl, now a married mother, sent me a message on FB, saying I was right and that she should have listened to me.

Did it help her to divulge this secret?

Fun Filthy Fantasies

Everything I've discussed so far are rather healthy behaviors, but when sharing secrets goes beyond issues of trust, loyalty, self-revelation, and modesty, and delves into the realm of concealment, deception, lies, and manipulation, this is the point at which the secret keeping wades into what men would consider the muck and mire.

But women don't see it this way.

Most women who lie and deceive by failing to divulge the truth about themselves need not worry about burdening their consciences with the guilt of being a liar. This is because women can always count on the good nature of men to give them the never failing P-Pass, and thus, guilt never has the opportunity to kick in. A discerning Chad, however, might hold her toes to the oven of the hell she has stoked, to soak in its heart melting warmth, and thereby give her good reason to be concerned about eternal consequences. But a white knight will never know the value of a good sound soul spanking towards weaning a witch off of her b!tchcraft.

Given the absence of negative punishment, women will keep secrets for positive rewards — reasons I discussed in The Feminine Secret. This is especially obvious when we adopt a teleological approach by examining Secrecy according to the most desired response when it is successfully employed (i.e. acceptance, inclusion, humility*, loyalty, and heartfelt Trust), which more often than not, is taken to be the ostensible goal of Secrecy. This is different and separate from the fundamental goal of Secrecy, which is more related to self-expression, bonding, emotional connection, building rapport, and maintaining social relevancy.

Individual-specific desires, characteristic traits, and personal identity are central to the dynamics of Secrecy.

The purposes for Secrecy are unique to each woman and her confidantes, and it is largely dependent on the context. Typical purposes for Secrecy include the following.

- Secrecy serves to establish, maintain, and enrich a relationship.
- Secrecy allows her to create an attractive, protective Machiavellian shroud — a public persona that appears much more desirable than her true self.
- Secrecy provides more control to the social context in which her public persona can manifest.
- Secrecy allows her to avert or deflect accusations, embarrassment, shame, or whatever unfavorable emotion she may be exposed to on a daily basis.
- Secrecy enables her to experience the joyful shame (or the shameful joy) of being humbled/defiled, which is experienced subjectively as inclusion, love, and grace.

To elaborate on the last point, when a woman can experience Humility* by sharing all her obscene desires and perfidious deeds with another, she can experience acceptance, inclusion, and Grace, meaning that she can get the conviction that her life is ostensibly "better" than what she feels she deserves. This is a key element in both satisfying her need for authentic social inclusion, and establishing a network of loyal trusted accomplices who will aid her in any situation she may herself machinate or else stumble into amid her many life adventures. So Secrecy also abets her need for security.

In many respects, Secrecy, for women, is very similar to what Game (i.e. applied charisma) is for men. We might even say that Secrecy is Girl Game.

 The concept of Humility is here defined according to the Christian understanding of the word, and not the worldly connotation of being shamed. For those of my readers who are unfamiliar with this distinction, the differences are described in a previous post, Apprehending True Humility (April 7, 2019). Of particular note to this essay, Humility is a key ingredient in experiencing love.*

Levels of Secrecy

I'll offer this rough order of relationship role complicity. Some things women would divulge to people higher on this list, would not be told to people lower on this list. Individuals may vary in specific order.

1. Select girl friends
2. Group of girl friends
3. STR partner
4. Pastor/Priest/Confessor/Counselor
5. Mixed group of friends
6. Mother
7. Women
8. LTR partner
9. Father
10. Grandparents

11. Men
12. Unattractive men

Note the general order. Peer females are at the top of the list, while men are at the bottom of the list, with the exception of a STR partner.

Men have the notion that a woman who loves him will be willing to share all her secrets with him, but this is far from the truth. A woman will only tell a man all the nitty gritty from her past if she sees him as a STR. If a woman is LTR/marriage minded, she'll share very little about her past, and even lie about certain things.

A Short List of Dark Secrets

Here's a shortlist of secrets that women commonly hold, taken from crowdsources, surveys, and scientific studies. As you will see, while some of these secrets are related to modesty or public image, most of them revolve around sex and soft power.

1. Trying or using recreational drugs.
2. That women despise/dislike/hate someone who by all observable accounts appears to be close to them. Oscar pointed out that a group of girls will often talk with each other like they are "BFFs", but if one of them should leave, then all the rest would start gossiping about her. Oscar posed the interesting question, "Do they not realize that all of them are doing the same thing to each other?"
3. Liking certain activities primarily because it draws sexual attention, simulates sexual freedom, stimulates sexual desire, and/or offers a sexualized ambience/mood/environment. For example, high watt bass amplifiers, bar hopping, clubbing, dancing, dressing provocatively, drinking, Instagram/OnlyFans, reading romance novels, horseback riding, riding big motorcycles, sensuous or profane jazz/R&B music, and doing various activities in the nude (e.g. hiking, rock climbing, skydiving, sunbathing, swimming, etc.)
4. That women's attraction vectors are constant and consistent. They're all attracted to pretty much the same basic masculine traits and characteristics. Women all have an unspoken secret subconscious pact that requires them to lie about all this so they can maximize the number of men they can use for whatever purposes they see fit.

5. That if she is sexually attracted to a man, she will let that man do pretty much whatever he wants to do, to her and with her.
6. That if she is NOT sexually attracted to a man, then nothing he does will ever be good enough for her.
7. That the number one sign of a lack of sexual attraction is not disrespect, but contempt (often indicated by curt insults, sighing, and rolling their eyes).
8. That women view all unattractive men with contempt, but will justify their contempt with nitpicking.
9. Most women are members of a mixed friend group consisting of both men and women. All the women in that group have had sex with the one or two most attractive male group members. All the group members except the unattractive men know this.
10. That all the women know all the other men their girlfriends have had sex with (a secret learned from her associates).
11. That all the women know which men are good in bed (another secret learned from her associates).
12. Sharing/recommending male partners with/to girlfriends.
13. Hooking up with a man just because he has a big beautiful shaft or some other unique sex-positive trait (a secret learned from her associates).
14. Almost all women have had sex with other men before they met you.
15. That you are not the best lover she has ever had, or will ever have.
16. That you were not her first choice. She wanted to date/marry someone else.
17. That most of the sex you have with her is not that good for her, even though she might say the opposite.
18. Actual N count is a highly cherished secret (yes, some women are actually proud of it) which is closely guarded due to anti-s1ut defense mechanisms.
19. That if a woman is having an affair, her closest girlfriends will know about it, but they will NEVER EVER tell her husband under any circumstances, not even decades after the affair has ended.
20. If one of the women in a group even suspects that one of their boyfriends/husbands is out of line in any way, she will tell his wife, and neither of them will tell him unless it is decided that a drama-filled confrontation is in order. She will protect her girlfriends' marriages against the women's own sins and will even help her girlfriends sin against their marriages. She will not hesitate to interfere in a marriage if she thinks the husband is "sinning".
21. Girls' Nights' Out are particularly insidious for the above reasons. The first rule of Girls' Nights' Out is: You do not talk about what happens on Girls' Nights' Out. The second rule of Girls' Nights' Out is: You do not talk about what happens on Girls' Nights' Out.
22. That she masturbates. (80% of American women [1,2])
23. Giving fellatio. (80% of American women [1,2])
24. Viewing pornography (60% of American women [1])
25. Sending digital nude or semi-nude photos to someone. (54% of American women [1])
26. If she is a squirter or not. According to a 2013 study of 320 participants, anywhere from 10-54% of women ejaculate.
27. Having sex in public. (43% of American women [1])
28. Receiving anal sex (37% of American women [1])
29. Being spanked and not disliking it (30% of American women [1])
30. Having a crush (or something more incestuous) with a step-brother, cousin, or other close family member. (No data available.)
31. Having sexual relations in exchange for money, drugs, alcohol, getting a job position, raise, promotion, or other preferred status, or to receive other types of commodities, favors, or attention. (No data available.)
32. Cuckoldry. Estimates of so-called "paternal discrepancy" over more than 50 years has revealed that the acting father was not the biological parent in between 1% to a whopping 32% of the cases. An intergenerational study estimated that 1-2% of men of any generation raise a child that isn't theirs.

33. Engaging in threesomes (10-20% of American women [1,3,4])
34. Participating in orgies/group sex. (8% of American women [1,3,4])
35. Bestiality, fondling pets or other animals, and/or any related fantasies and desires. (No data available.)

This is by no means a complete list. I suspect that if all the dark secrets that women hold were to be known and written down, then the deep dark depths of the Mariana Trench would not supply room enough to hide all the books.

The Amiable American

Rhianna* met an American guy online. She told my wife she didn't have any goofy impression about us or about any other American guys or American girls in her contacts, so she wanted to go see him.

As soon as they first met, he said to her, "I am so hot under the collar! I really want to hug you and kiss you!"

She rolled her eyes, indicating that she thought this was goofy, and she smugly said, "I didn't really want to do it, but I did it anyway." But then her expression shifted to feeling really proud of herself. Her expression lit up and she told us, "See I told you! All the men get a crush on me just after one sight of my body!"

My wife was confused because she initially thought Rhianna told her all these details because she was unhappy. But in fact, through the discussion, my wife found out she was quite excited about the whole affair, and she just wanted to brag about herself.

Rhianna told us the American guy touched his finger tips to Rhianna's fingers while he was talking to try to make her concentrate on what he was saying. He also embraced her around the waist while they were walking around in public. These gestures touched her heart somehow, so when he invited her back to his apartment and asked her to have sex, she agreed. This happened on their first date.

We asked her, "Why don't you say no?"

My wife was somewhat surprised when she replied just as I had predicted – that she doesn't really feel anything that happens is wrong, or "too far" past her boundaries, so naturally, things eventually progress to the bedroom.

Rhianna made one statement that made my wife believe she was more interested in sex than anything else. Rhianna said she can always know the exact moment the man "gets hard" / "toughens up" / "grows firm" for her, meaning that his masculine virility and confidence show through, but it could also imply the state of his rod. (I don't know of a direct translation.) She said after that moment, the men always became more confident and strong, but also more agreeable and compliant. She said when this happens, "I know I can have [sex with] him if I want…", so it obviously gives her confidence/ego a kick. I found it interesting to learn that she doesn't need to be in a private setting with a man for this realization/connection to kick in. Apparently it happens perchance, even when they're fully clothed or out in public.

No matter who she was talking about, the American, the Australian, the Canadian, the French guy, the four German guys… she always talked about this moment of realization like it was the main climax of her story, and whenever she came to this part of her stories, she became so proud as ɦɘ11 of herself, breathing heartily, swinging her shoulders, and tossing her hair.

After hearing and seeing all this, I was also convinced that Rhianna was more interested in sex than anything else, but not the act of sex itself, per se. She wanted to feel the power of her own sexual authority over men and get herself off on that, and she didn't really care what she had to do to make that happen, or even what particular man she was with. She also didn't care about the consequences, and she had no idea about how to take responsibility for that desire, nor how to nurture it into something that would last.

The day after their first date, in a few messages online, the American guy posed some serious questions to her about a lot of things. The questions about her past seemed to make her self-conscious and anxious, and so she thought the American guy judged her seriously. The Hamster started turning and she told us with a smirk that this American guy is so stupid and arrogant. (More Psychological Projection) Then she proudly showed us a picture of him.

Being an American myself, I recognized him as a regular happy-go-lucky guy, probably of Irish descent and of Southern origins, and probably not a bad choice for her to marry (if she was really serious about that) – but I didn't like the way she dismissed his questions as being judgmental, and her calling him stupid. I wanted to start banging my fork in protest, but I didn't have one on hand. I had the impression that she is more of a predator than a potential victim of being "used" by such a man. Cougar badge confirmed.

Just two days after this, she dated three other guys in a single day! We were incredulous, so she told us she doesn't really care about dating those guys, she just wanted to "go there and practice her English" because she's determined that one day she will immigrate to the United States or some other English speaking country. I doubt that those guys only met her to "practice" speaking what was probably their native language. They were looking for friends (or more), but she wasn't interested in that. I suspect that she was scoping them out, but they didn't measure up to her standards, so in her mind, they were relegated to the "language exchange" category.

My wife said to me privately, "She thinks all those men are unique to her, but no one is special to her. How can I describe to her that all those other men's behaviors show that they are not marriage minded, but this American guy is actually serious about having a relationship? If she rejects this American guy, then I think she's pretty dumb." I had to agree.

Then one day not more than a week later, Rhianna told my wife she found a German guy (number 5?), and then all the talk about the American guy stopped completely.

The Germane German

Rhianna told us the reason why the German man she met is in Bigtown — he has a very good job with a big German company, and he's had this job for 26 years. So she said she's got to go to Bigtown to find a job because this guy is quite handsome.

She only talked with this guy online a few times!

Their talk escalated like this. After they had a light warm-up, it led to some suggestive bantering. Then the guy sent her pictures of his nude body and then she quickly sent some of her own back to him with the message, "I have a funny new picture too!"

She told him she just went to the beach with her ex-boyfriend (another hasty, messy, made-up story). Then he asked her about this ex-boyfriend, and she started to bulverize in an attempt to escape this topic. "You know, a lot of men always ask me if I have a boyfriend, if I have any friends with benefits, if I have any sexy photos with previous boyfriends, or something like that. They just want to know my past…"

I cajoled, "If the past doesn't matter, then you should forget about management and find an internship with a modeling agency!"

The incongruence of my quip went right over her head. She answered, "No, I tried that before and it is too dirty for me. I am a respectable, professional woman."

Then she showed us the nude picture of herself that she sent to him. Seeing that picture really made us doubt everything she told us about her being a Christian woman looking for a husband. So my wife asked her, "Why do you send this type of photo to a man you just met online and chatted with only a few days? What's the purpose? What kind of relationship do you want to have from him? Don't you think you are giving those guys a tip of the hand about having sex?"

Rhianna was embarrassed by our reaction and became very angry. She dropped a cold shadow and said, "Don't criticize me! I am trying to overcome my fear of trusting men! I don't need to listen to your flapping jaws."

My wife answered, "What is your response to a man's request for a sexy photo from you? Giving out nude photos of yourself doesn't help you trust men. You just like to give those sexy photos to them because you want them to think you're hot. It's very much like a 12 year-old-girl flashing her budding breasts to boys."

Rhianna countered, "You're so old fashioned! I have a beautiful body, and I am not ashamed to show it off. I have a lot of pictures of my beautiful bottom and men love to see it!"

My wife shot back, "You just told us you were professional. You said you were respectable. So when you show your beautiful bottom to those guys, are you really thinking about finding a job in Bigtown? Are you really being respectable?"

Her cold gleaming eyes started twitching. So my wife told her, "I'm not criticizing you, I'm charging you to be responsible with your life. I'm telling you the truth — your actions are very different from your words."

We didn't hear anything more about that particular German man. But within a week, she had some other news to report.

The Impervious Italian

Rhianna* met a Jamaican guy and an Italian guy online, so she went to Bigtown to meet them. She said the Jamaican guy works for an NGO and the Italian guy is a manager at a large international company. After she arrived in Bigtown, the Italian guy asked her to go to his house at the beginning, but she didn't want to go there without first meeting the Jamaican guy, comparing the two men, and gauging her prospects. The Italian guy sensed her hesitation and said a few things to her to change her mind very quickly. We asked her what he said. She said the guy just said to her, "I think your place is better."

So then she had to rev up the hamster. She asked that guy, "You told me you want to have a long-term relationship and you don't want to rush… Then you asked me to come to your apartment…???"

The guy said it's because he's busy and will be working late. He said, "I won't have sex with you if you don't want it. I won't force you." So she went to the guy's apartment late at night. Just as you might expect, things escalated, but then she put on the brakes because she was still wondering about the Jamaican guy. The Italian guy sensed something was off, and as you can imagine, he was frustrated and angry, so then he asked her to leave.

The next day the Italian guy sent her a message and told her, "I don't need to suffer from this [green light followed by a rejection]. I will not contact you anymore." Then he blocked her number and she felt humiliated, à la Tingles popped up and she was hooked. The Jamaican guy was no longer responding to her texts, probably because she took too long to respond to him while she was messing around with the Italian guy. So then with both men out of the picture, she felt sad and desperate.

She called my wife asking her to talk with her about this. So my wife spent over 7 hours to talk and pray with her. After my wife got off the phone, I asked her to tell me what's going on. She relayed to me all that is written here and concluded that Rhianna doesn't really want to hear what we said. She just wants to release all her emotions and make herself feel better.

After this talk, Rhianna continued to send my wife a barrage of text messages, at all hours of the day, all throughout the week. Most of the subject matter concerned her present involvement with the "hawt" Italian guy who turned out to be about 10 years younger than her. He kept distancing himself from her, and he eventually blocked her on social media. This drove her nuts, and she was determined to get back together with him. I was thinking, this Italian guy is playing her @ss like a banjo, and that is exactly what she wants!

After that day, Rhianna thought my wife was her best friend. She texted her all the time, every day! She asked my wife if she could come to our house every day, only just to talk about men and sex with her. My wife started to feel annoyed with her, because she always asked her the same questions and she never really listened to her. But of course, she didn't tell her her true feelings. She would simply neglect responding to her calls and messages.

The drama never ended.

Incentives for Bimbofication

Competition, not Causation

Earlier this month, NovaSeeker wrote about The Influence of Pornography and OnlyFans on Women (2021/8/4). The main point of this post was that much of the trends we see in society, personal presentation and appearances, fitness, what is considered attractive, and even private sexual activities have been strongly shaped and contoured by standards that were only present in pornography not more than 30 years ago.

The post is good, but I think it misplaces causation on what is a symptom and an intensifier instead of the underlying sickness. While I understand that porn can and does have cultural impacts, I don't think today's women are trying to imitate porn from 30 years ago. I might agree that today's women are trying to imitate role models who resemble porn from 30 years ago, but more to the point, what we see today is more along the lines of social relevancy and competing for the attentions of the prime men.

As I read NovaSeeker's post, I kept questioning if the causation attributed to Bimbofication could not be equally, or even to a greater extent, attributed to other cultural factors. With each point, I found myself asking, "Did porn directly create this, or was porn just one of the players reinforcing a cultural trend?"

Marketing Incentives

My take on porn is that it is a for profit endeavor and, as such, it is more likely that it picks up on cultural trends to be able to profit from them. So according to my understanding, the Bimbofication of society works like this. As the acts, appearances, behaviors, and so on become normalized, it thereby creates less novelty and excitement. As the quest for money continues concomitantly, it leads to a persistent state of searching for the stimulus needed to create the same reaction. Thus, it must exacerbate the trends by eventually depicting them in the extreme. This cycle has continued over the years, leading us to the Bimbofication of the entire society.

A Clearinghouse Auction Marketplace*

This leads us to wonder, why is society now going down this path, when in the past (say, before the mid 20th century or earlier), there was always understood a boundary of decency and propriety that prevented this downward cycle from blowing full steam ahead?

I think a likely explanation is that when feminism unmoored female sexuality from the patriarchy, and then eviscerated the patriarchy itself, the biblical ideals of sex within marriage and the characteristics that are required for successful marriage, were deemphasized in favor of unchecked female hypergamy and male visual stimulation. As we now know, this produced a culture of promiscuity, but also one that retains a residual social expectation of monogamy. This veneer of pseudo-monogamy has just as much of an impact as the loss of patriarchal authority, because if soft harems were socially acceptable, then men (and women too, to some extent) would not place such a high emphasis on catching the best (looking) mate possible, and since patriarchal authority is not present, men cannot defend their harems from monkey branching and mate poaching.

The resulting situation would, and did, lead to a hypergamy-fueled, so-called "arms race" of women trying to be the "one" who would be awarded the attentions and investment from the best man around, and that means being the most physically alluring. In the clearinghouse auction analogy, the “sale” is made to the highest (most attractive) bidder.

Within this context, the female competition for the most attractive men and those men’s position of relative strength allows these men to elicit the acts they want from women. Here we’re talking about the top 10% of men with options. They are the men who women will “break the rules” for, and if one woman does not, the next one will. It leaves women in a strategic place of complying with a dominant man’s wishes or else, risk having him move on to the next option. Ultimately, an “arms race” of bimbofication and sexual acts ensues as part of the equation for judging overall attractiveness in the quest for an optimal partner.

Case Study 1 — Fellatio

Take fellatio for example. Men have always wanted this (there are good arguments for this act being depicted in the Song of Solomon with his Shulamite bride) and it is understandable as it is an act that clearly defines male dominance and female submission as well as being highly erotic. I find it more likely in this case that Victorian cultural stuffiness regarding sex was undone by women having to be more willing to accommodate the top tier male’s desires in the absence of patriarchal governance of the sexual market place. If this is what men desire, and porn sells what men desire, then porn is more likely the downstream indicator of culture, albeit with a powerful reinforcing feedback loop.

Furthermore, Jack noted that engaging in fellatio is not such a big leap for women who truly Tingulate for their man.

Case Study 2 — Personal Grooming

Female personal grooming could also be more driven by the SMP than by porn. Keep in mind the rule that women want to look good for the top men. Clothing companies, who do a very good job knowing what women want to buy, started creating smaller and smaller swimwear and underwear in the 1970s and the minimalist trend intensifies in the 1980s and 1990s. Removing and grooming pubic hair becomes part of the equation in completing the look. Men like it and porn picks up on the trend and takes it further, influencing the existing trend.

Case Study 3 — Body Shape and Fitness

Women’s body shape and fitness level changes (in some segments of society) fit the same trend of women trying to get the top tier men. Men have always liked shapely women. As locustsplease noted in his comment, the waif thin model types of the 90s were not very attractive. God made men to recognize good genetics for reproduction in the form of hips, backsides, and breasts. What women found out with the advent of the Jane Fonda workout videos and then the tsunami of imitators that followed, is that men really like shapely female bodies (can I get an amen?!), and that toning those bodies makes them look even better to many men in our culture. After that realization, women’s fitness becomes another avenue to compete with each other over being the object of a top tier man’s desires. Body modification surgeries and tight gym clothing (yoga pants are akin to a push up bra for her posterior a$$ets and smooth out problem areas) are the results of this competition's incentives to the chagrin of all the feminists fighting the evil patriarchy. Again, porn follows trends that sell and serves as the reinforcing feedback loop that propels the image to the end of the normal curve.

Flaunting the Flesh Ensures a Competitive Edge

RedPillBoomer noticed that no matter where he goes, the gym, the beach, or wherever, women are pushing the limits of modesty just as far as they can.

Even though the gym has 'rules' posted, and it covers clothing not considered appropriate for working out in, this rarely seems to get enforced. Women are violating the gym clothing rules by wearing swimsuits or workout tops that leave their entire midsection uncovered to include their rib cage area. The part of the top approaching their breasts and covering their breasts looks something like a push up bra held in place with spaghetti straps. Of course, their tight and form fitting yoga pants, short or long, still leave little to nothing to the imagination.

Good luck on ever having those gym attire rules ever being enforced on a woman. Women who dress like that keep the guys coming back and none of the guys would ever complain. It's like having a lady's night at the bar.

At the beach, ALL of the beach bums were wearing thongs and stringy tops, There were copious displays of side-boob, under-boob, nips showing through, camel toe… and full moon fever back below. All that covered their pubic area were patches of some shape and size.

Even girls as young as 16 were flashing their catnip, and their mothers and sisters were egging them on!

RedPillBoomer went so far as to offer us an inside glimpse of the "transaction" which incentivizes Bimbofication [edited for brevity and clarity].

> "It seemed to me that [these women] had a 'do not approach' sign about their demeanor, unless you were THAT guy. I saw average dudes try it, the girls might laugh a little at their pick up lines, flirt just a bit (crumbs), but then inevitably dismiss them in some way; not mean, just "Okay, enough's enough Beta boy, now just run along." Now if Chad showed up, that demeanor radically shifted, plus the body language as well, e.g. positioning themselves on their towels so Chad couldn't help but get the message. Many of them set up near the lifeguard stands because 99% of those guys were Chad, and the bikini contest was on!"
> "Big sis was wearing a thong, little sis might as well have been naked. …it was not a bathing suit in my opinion. Quite frankly, it was a freakin' porn show what she was wearing and doing by displaying herself… …big sis should have been Chad's number one pick, but I think little sis (or mom maybe), gave herself a competitive advantage with the thong being so skimpy, so revealing."
> "[All the scantily clad women] wanted general attention for sure… However, what they really wanted (fantasized about?) was HIS attention. And to get it, he had to notice HER and not the other girls. What better way than to dress and ring the proverbial "Come and get it!" 'dinner bell' for Chad."
> "…those lifeguards… just sat in that chair all day, and… just picked their 'date' for the evening; easy peasy pickings for them!"

Apparently there is no self-awareness, nor any sense of decorum, modesty, nor propriety. Their awareness is exclusively focused on feeeling sexy and snagging Chad's lecherous gaze. They aren't even aware that they are arousing the libido of all men within eyeshot. All they may realize is that they get more of the type of attention they want, without even actively seeking a specific person's attention, and acting on that incentive, we know, is the whole point of the exercise, no holds barred.

Conclusions

In conclusion, I believe what we are seeing is an environment created by feminism that leaves female sexuality unchecked, allowing their natural tendency of hypergamy to operate without checks nor guidance.

Gunner Q capped it off like this,

> "Keep in mind the rule that women want to look good for the top men."
> This is the heart of most discussions about the influence of porn. Ordinary men are simply not consulted, not involved, not wanted, not noticed, except as lightning rods for blame. The modern sex/dating scene going to extremes is nothing but an iterative Pareto principle.

Yes, an iterative Pareto principle of incentives. I wrote in a comment to RedPillBoomer that…

> "The world is filled with people who act on incentives. The better we become at discerning those incentives the more predictable and ordered the world becomes to us."

The better we are at recognizing this, the better we can be at both fixing problems and creating environments that allow desired behaviors to flourish.

Handling a Crisis Situation

> "The [current economic situation] has hit me hard. I was laid off work a few months ago, and I've been struggling to make ends meet. About a month ago, I decided that instead of hunting and waiting for a job offer, I'd just start my own business.* I already have the training and tools, and my buddy at work who was also laid off has been working with me. All I've had to do is find customers and develop a reputation. We're already getting regular calls coming in, and me and my partner are pretty close to matching our previous salaries. (We're about ~70% there.)
> My wife has not made things any easier. Me being out of work has made her feel much more insecure than usual, and her constant complaints and nagging are a continual reminder of this. We fight and argue about stupid little stuff every day."

 His business is home remodeling, e.g. kitchen, bathroom, plumbing, and flooring. He mentioned that, in spite of the lockdown, some people are doing pretty well, and since they are spending more time at home, they want a nicer home environment.*

Case Study 1 – Mismatched Priorities

As an example of the stupid little stuff he and his wife argue about, the reader shared this little story in his private email.

> "My wife vacuums the floor and cooks a meal every day and she thinks that makes her the most fabulous wife on the planet. That's great and all, but at the same time, she is always talking like I'm a 5-year-old slob! If I drop one crumb from the dinner table, or leave one hair in the shower stall, she is on my case like a school marm. Fact is, I don't give a rat's @$$ about crumbs or hairs, or meticulous floors, or even hot meals. The thing that would make me feel like she is a fabulous wife is if she would just take a break from the shame game and show a little more positivity, natural affection, and encouragement."

I know how that feels. This is another example of a woman making a man out to be an immature boy. Deep Strength covered this dynamic in a comment.

> "The issue is not maturity though. A woman's preconceived notions of what they think is "mature" or not is their will manifesting as pride: they think they know what is better than the man they are with and are setting themselves up as the judge of that."

Personally, I've made a habit of drawing a boundary between what I want, and what my wife wants, as a way of reminding her that she is not the only person living in the house. This approach works for the most part, except when she just doesn't want to hear it.

Case Study 2 – He is not handy, but she is?!?

Case Study 1 compares closely to what Locustsplease shared here.

> "When I was married I remodeled bathrooms, whole new flooring and shower, replaced roof, did major auto repairs, decking, graded the entire back yard… She replaced the kitchen cabinet knobs 1 time. Yet, she insisted until we split that I was not handy around the house, and that she was, and she even included this statement in the divorce manifesto docs!"

The myopic solipsism is absolutely amazing here. Like DS said, this is pride being manifested in her will.

Pride Goeth before a Fall

The letter continues.

> "During this time, I had an epiphany. She actually has a purpose for being contentious. She thinks she is keeping me on my toes and preventing me from becoming lazy. Fact is, I would have a lot more time and a lot better mindset to deal with work if she would just take it easy.
> The thing that really irks me is that she actually enjoys it. My wife's biggest problem is her pride, and since we've been married 15 years now, let me tell you a few things I've learned about her pride…"

- Her main prerogative is to protect her pride. If someone or something rubs her pride the wrong way, she gets angry, argumentative, and tries to shame that person into submission – all in an effort to protect her pride.
- This pride is why she is afraid to trust or depend on a man (me) in a time of crisis, be in debt, or owe anything to anyone.
- This pride is why she never wants to say sorry, even when she knows she's wrong and feels guilty.
- This pride is why she puts on a show like she is careless about other's needs (i.e. my need for regular sex and a peaceful home environment).
- This pride is why she wants to play with her cats and her smartphone during talk time, and talk during sex time.
- This pride is also why she denies her desire and acts like she is frigid in bed, even though she's actually hot for a romp.
- This pride is what makes her particularly skilled in making my c0ck feel like it has to beg for her attention.
- This pride is why she can't grow up.

> "All because she is proud as həll.
> Whenever I've pointed this out to her in the past, she says I am proud!"

This defense mechanism is a combination of displacement and psychological projection.

 Wife is Asian, and I can confirm that some Asian women do take an extreme enjoyment in creating arguments and being contentious.*

The Principle of Pride

He says one day his phone got smashed and he borrowed his wife's phone for a few days.

> "I was [very offended] when I happened upon a text message that my wife sent to one of her friends. She told her I was lazy because I had not found another job after 3 months, and that our pastor had to convince her to take a more positive view of me and the situation. I was glad that our pastor had set her straight, but it [offended me] because she obviously respects our pastor's opinion more than she respects me in this time of difficulty."

In another text message she had with a friend who consulted her for dating advice, he was flabbergasted to find that his wife told her friend about her "principle". She wrote…

> "Men start quickly, but they learn slowly."
> I don't say, "I can do all the things for the boys" [I see it in the message], because having a soft heart will become a tool for boys to use."
> "To respect each other [Translation: to establish my own power as dominant], the degree of cooperation is very important. The mastership lies in whether the attitude of performance is firm. I don't easily change what I said. I will not tell the boys my principles. But the ruler in my own heart will naturally make the boys know that they can't offend me!"
> "Boys who are pressing for intimacy always want to give and hear a lot of sweet talk, so when you use your principle to embarrass [Translation: shame] them, they will always respect you." [See translation of "respect" above.]
> "Just take a look at the princess who just took it all away [referring to herself], and it will be easier to get closer to what you want."

So he's dealing with a woman who will shame him mercilessly if he ever happens to cross her egotistical pride.

(This is a particularly Asian approach for dealing with men.)

Notice how she refers to men, including her husband, as "the boys". He's right… her pride is unbearable!

When he pointed out this message to his wife and asked her to explain, she fell into a silent, bitter mood. Her cool contempt was heartbreaking. He writes,

> "I was so angry that I took a shower to cool off. After this, she refused to share any more of her messages with me and she locked her phone. What you [Jack] wrote about trust came to my mind here."

I'm not sure exactly what he is referring to here, but I'll guess that he's referring to this.

> "Men are taught, "a man's word is his honor", and they generally adhere to their natural bent towards logic and reason. But they make the mistake of allowing these hallmarks of masculinity to dictate their interactions with a woman. Women are naturally gifted at coopting these traits of man to their own purposes. Thus, men who naively believe that being honest, reasonable, and altruistic will increase their bonding with a woman are surprised when the woman hijacks the Head Trust, takes the driver's seat in the relationship, and then fails to appreciate his "goodness". Thus, if men do not become sufficiently self-aware of their own nature, they will continue on this path towards absconding their God given power and authority, thereby leading to the destruction of the union."
> Σ Frame: Creating and Maintaining Heart Trust (2019-04-28)

Later in the day, she complained about how he was always so unresponsive to her questions. He asked her if she was aware of the fact that he had just asked her a question not 10 minutes earlier as they were sitting there, and she totally ignored his question and started her rant. Then she changed the subject by comparing their relationship to that of another couple they knew, saying, "they seemed like a real couple last night at dinner, sharing food and ideas", but she didn't feel that they were the same way. There was obviously some fundamental differences in basic values. She complained about him some more, and when he shut her down, then she wanted to argue about whether he should accept investors for his new business. She went on like this for something like 20 minutes. At first, he just sat quietly and let her rant, thinking that she might have something important to say about the business. But after he found that her argument had no substance, and that she was just inciting more conflict, he excused himself and left the room.

She just won't shut up with the proud mouthed tongue lashing! It's better to just walk away.

Introspection and Resolution

This whole situation really p!ssed him off, and he didn't know what to do about it. He decided to pray about it, hoping that God might give him some ideas. During his prayer, he remembered another post, The Greatest Archetype, and he got the idea that women (i.e. his wife) treat him the same way he treats God. When this idea hit him, he asked God about it very specifically,

> "Do I treat You like these women treat me?"

God answered him and said,

> "You used to, not too many years ago. You didn't want to listen. You complained a lot. You demanded to have a wife and regular sex. You jumped the gun on marriage. You took matters into your own hands, and I could not work in your life. But now you're all right. You're in a place where I can work with you. Now it's your wife's turn to learn this."

It is a fascinating question. Did he simply get what he deserved? "Like attracts like", and all that?

> "I had to ask God to forgive me for being that way."

The question in my mind is, what will this forgiveness look like?

> "The next morning, I decided to wear a watch my father had given me as a wedding present, just so I would be reminded of my father's example, to stay patient, and not take my wife's squabbles too seriously. Somehow, this gave me a lot of confidence."

I assume that he hadn't wanted to wear his watch to work in the past because the work involved chemicals and adhesives.

> "Me and my business associate had a prayer together, and we mentioned a few of our clients, contractors, and suppliers by name. God answered my prayers, telling me that things would be OK, and I got a supreme sense of peace for the rest of the day."

Yes, sometimes the best thing (and perhaps the only thing) a man can do is to step back, take a deep breath, and keep busy doing what he knows he needs to do.

I will guess that "forgiveness" in this case will be the success of his new business and a refinement of his character, but it's hard to say how it will go with the wife.

A woman's selfish pride is a tough nut to crack.

Exit Questions

1. How does pride affect our relationships with God and with a spouse?
2. Does your wife treat you the way you treat God?
3. Does God treat you the way you treat your wife?

Locker Room Talk (Monday, September 3, 2018)

My wife stayed busy in the kitchen, cleaning and baking all afternoon while I was at work.

In the evening, one of my wife's friends (not Rhianna*) came to visit her at 9:00 pm. They talked for about an hour and they ate some of the cookies she had baked.

While they were talking, I reviewed the messages that my wife had exchanged with Rhianna during the day.

Initially, I had the impression that my wife was simply schooling Rhianna about how to catch a husband. But as I was browsing through the long string of texts, I was ashamed to find that my wife became woefully sidetracked.

I came across one message in which Rhianna announced that she was going to visit the Italian guy tomorrow, and she talked about how they would "probably have sex". After this message, I saw that Rhianna's talk began to arouse my wife's feral nature, and she soon became swamped in the drama.

Rhianna asked my wife what she should do to make an impression. My wife told her that if she has already decided to have sex with him, then she should not give him a lot of contradictory attitudes about sex. This was the same advice we've been giving her all along, but in this instance, I was displeased with my wife, because instead of urging Rhianna to avoid temptation, it seemed that my wife had already accepted Rhianna's decision and was encouraging her to romp and roll.

I sighed, because on the other hand, I knew that warning her about temptation would probably be a wasted effort anyway.

Rhianna wanted to know how she should ask him to use a condom, and my wife told her to just ask him directly while they were kissing. My wife was so sure that he would have condoms on hand, that they made a bet on it. Rhianna wanted to know what she should do if he refused to wear a condom, or if he wanted to have a baby. My wife told her that she worries too much, and that men don't know that they want a baby. "That's why women often use a pregnancy to capture a man." I couldn't believe this was coming from my wife!

Now, we often hear women complain about how men "objectify" women… Let me tell you, women "objectify" men too, and it's 10 times more profane! Their banter was littered with funny/swarthy quips about hairy butts, manscaping, d!ck size and shape, semen volume and ejaculatory force, and highlighted by a looong obsession (about 30 messages) with how Italian men have a very strong libido.

The thing is, when men "objectify" women, it's mostly all braggadocio and posturing, but I know Rhianna well enough by now to know that this is not just idle talk – this is real!

Seeing two women discuss these things so confidently and casually really turned my stomach. I got the impression that women fornicate on the fly just like men jerk off with porn – It's as exciting as it is shameful, done frequently, kept in tight secrecy and never talked about, and the man is like a disposable dildo that is eventually discretely discarded by the woman, just like men do with a skin magazine.

I was impressed by the complexity of their strategies to purposely and systematically devise a scheme to dominate men, and bleed them out for what she needs. They were only concerned with controlling this Italian guy and getting what she wanted out of him. They didn't really care about the man himself. What God wanted was not even mentioned. It's like these women just made a game of trapping a man, keeping him under control by toying with his desire, f___ing around with him, and killing his heart in the process. The thing that bothered me the most, was her pride, the way she thinks she has to cut the man down and manage him, as if he were a wild animal. No love or respect at all, just a beast of burden to be p*ssy whipped into domesticated duties, sexual delights, and giving cash on demand. I know Rhianna learned these strategies through all her past relationships, but I was not pleased that my wife was pouring more gravy on the details.

I was shocked to see so many self-centered presumptions, and the self-serving dishonesty of it all, and with apparently no guilt or shame whatsoever. The notion that "women are the fairer sex" is certainly feminist hogwash.

Their whole text conversation really made me disgusted, not only by the content, but also because I saw that this s1ut is sucking my wife into her mindset. I could not understand why my wife, acting as a Christian counselor, would encourage her and support her in this decision. Instead of helping her focus on finding a Christian man and making herself into a suitable match, she was pushing her into an exact rehash of how she has messed it up for the past 20 years. It made me wonder how Christian women are any different from non-Christians, if at all.

It was definitely a bad idea for my wife to try to "help" her, because Rhianna's negative influence on my wife is stronger than my wife's positive influence on her. I was one year into the Red Pill at this time, and all this served to drive home a maxim that has been tossed around in the 'sphere for a while — AWALT! (All Women Are Like That!)

The Escalation to Ecstatic Defilement (Wednesday, September 5, 2018)

My wife gave me a report on Rhianna that lightened the mood a little bit. The news was that she had gone to Bigtown* to see the Italian guy for two days, and she just got back. In the 30 some hours they had together, she had banged the guy three times, and argued with him all night. In the morning, they had another argument and she left in a huff, and then she blocked him on chat.

But later in the day, when she unblocked him, she discovered that he had blocked her too! This unseated her ego and made her obsessed with getting back together with him.

Rhianna was at the end of her wits about what to do, so she asked my wife how she could get the Italian guy back. My wife hesitated to get involved but after a series of fervid text messages from Rhianna, she got sucked back into the fray.

So the next day, Rhianna came over to our house to talk it over with my wife and cook up a scheme about how to get this guy back. I don't know how long they talked, but I'll guess it was the good part of the day. After tossing around several ideas about how to contact him in spite of her being blocked, Rhianna asked my wife if she would send a message to the Italian guy for her. So they came up with a carefully worded and beautifully written text message in which Rhianna apologized and told him she would "do everything" for him. The amount of effort they put into this was reminiscent of the enthusiasm a marketing strategist puts into introducing a new product.

When the guy got the text message from my wife's phone, he didn't respond immediately. But after two days, he sent a message to my wife with an explanation of why he blocked Rhianna.

When my wife read his response, she was doubtful about his enthusiasm. My wife asked Rhianna, "If he really wanted a relationship with you, then why didn't he reply to me for 2 days?" But Rhianna didn't care. She asked my wife to help convince him to unblock her and give her another chance, so after a couple more days of exchanges between the two of them, he did. When Rhianna got the first message from him, she was so excited she couldn't contain herself.

We were hoping that since my wife got involved, then both Rhianna and this guy might take their relationship a little more seriously. But instead of working on sorting out their issues, it wasn't long before Rhianna started sending the guy all kinds of sexually suggestive messages.

"I am sooo wet for you. My body won't stop shaking!"

"Your c0ck is sooo beautiful! I will eat you all night!"

All these profane texts destroyed the purpose-centered mood of interaction that my wife had worked so hard to create. I'm sure the guy fully expected to have sex with her because of that.

Rhianna spent the rest of the week wallowing in the throes of her fantasies and preparing herself for this night of sex she would have when she met this guy again. She even bought some new clothes, including three new sexy lingerie, and she wanted my wife to shoot some new photographs of her and help her prepare for the rendezvous.

"I look good in purple, so I got this purple teddy."

"I could imagine he likes the see-through, so I got one of those too."

Her giddy behavior really tested my wife's patience. Every third sentence, my wife had to tell her to calm down.

"You don't need to prepare this… Calm down! …for the guy when you should be thinking about… Calm down! …what you should tell him. If he really cares about you, then he won't… Calm down! …tell you to put on something like that anyway…"

Since she was out of her mind, my wife and I insisted that she should prepare a list of questions related to the future of their relationship to discuss with him.

The drama never ended!

Moving in for the Kill (Sunday, September 16, 2018)

So the day before Rhianna went to Bigtown, she told my wife lots of questions she wanted to ask the guy and she also prepared an itinerary of what she's going to do.

The night before she left, at 1:00 in the morning, Rhianna sent my wife a string of messages, saying, "I don't want to go to Bigtown because if I ask him all these questions, I know he'll have a quarrel with me." Then she started to make up excuses, bulverize, and obfuscate.

"I don't really think he's that much of a match for me…"

I don't think he's enough for me…"

"I won't go there to meet him."

Rolling over in bed, I asked my wife, "Okay… How can she possibly shift from being sooo zany-pants excited to meet this guy, to deciding not to go? She's a total mess! Just ignore her from now on."

My wife didn't reply to her until the next morning. Rhianna didn't check her messages until noon.

When she replied later in the day, she said she still went to Bigtown. The guy called her when she was on the bus to Bigtown and said, "Don't expect to have a long-term relationship with me. I cannot have a long-term relationship with you." So Rhianna was very upset about that and sent another long string of texts to us to express her inner turmoil.

We didn't hear anything more from Rhianna for a couple days.

The next post (Part 5) will tell what happened in Bigtown, and finish with a conclusion of this series.

She Blows It (Wednesday, September 19, 2018)

Rhianna* showed up at our place, wanting to talk about everything that had happened while she was in Bigtown.* She said the Italian guy didn't want to go out to do anything with her. He didn't even want to go out to dinner with her. He only wanted to stay in the hotel and he "just wanted sex sex sex" with her, and he also asked her to go out to buy this and that for him.

I wasn't surprised. She had been stoking his desire all week with all her sexting.

In too many words, Rhianna described how she felt the next morning. In short, she felt gratuitously humbled from the all-night-long Italian job. She expected him to hug her after sex, but he didn't. Instead, he got up and prepared to go to work. Rhianna must've not been humbled enough though, because instead of saying something inviting like "I'm sooo in love with you! I need a hug before you go!", she turned on the light and brusquely told him, "Why don't you turn on the light? Come back to bed!" The guy responded in the same spirit, yelling something at her in Italian, so she was very very sad.

She tried calling him all throughout the day while he was at work, and she texted him a bazillion times. Finally, the guy called her and told her that she's "crazy", and that she needs to stop it. She texted my wife asking what to do, and she told her to leave him alone. I don't know if she did or not.

After he got back from work, they had a tense, bitter exchange. Rhianna was sad and angry, hurling various accusations and insults at him, and he wasn't taking any of it. Even so, they somehow had intercourse again during this time.

Early the next morning, at 3:00 am, the guy got up to work on his own things and Rhianna vehemently and repetitively complained that he was disturbing her sleep. In response, he took his things and went to his workplace very early. He told her he would not be returning to the hotel after work, and that she should be gone hereafter. Heartbroken, she packed her suitcase and returned home.

The Italian guy blocked her the next day. After Rhianna found out, she said she should have dated the American guy instead. We were glad that she finally realized this, but it's probably too late to make any difference.

I thought this was sad and hilarious at the same time. I mean, she finally had one more chance to have a pleasant intercourse with a man she really wanted, and she blew it with her slavish mouth.

Then she trivialized the entire event, saying it was not serious nor was it important to her. She told my wife that this guy is such an @sshole, and that she doesn't need a man like him. She also bragged that she can easily set up one or two dates A DAY, and she usually goes home with one or two of them every week. Her point was that she "doesn't need a man."

Heh… If she "doesn't need a man", then why does she need to date one every day and see more than 3 men every week? If they're not needed, then why keep so many of them around? The denial is economical! What she really means is that she is addicted to being humbled/defiled by a man, but when it comes down to respect, submission, and doing what would be necessary to nurture a relationship and keep a man around, she would rather dismiss him and resume her elusive fantasies.

I was disgusted with the way she suddenly changed her mind several times and waffled about her purpose for going to meet the man. To briefly recount: After they reestablished contact, she was so excited to have sex with him she was hopping up and down and couldn't think straight. Then the day before she left, she didn't want to see him at all. Then when they were together, she wanted to be wined and dined – but without sex (or so she said). Then after she screwed everything up by being contentious, she flippantly dismissed the entire affair as insignificant and meaningless to her.

Astronomical Denial!

We told her, "You spend so much time and effort at the gym because you think your sleek thighs are going to make you less sad or change a man's thoughts about you. Would you make as much effort to cultivate a spirit of kindness and grace within your heart? Would you work on being respectful? Would you change the way you view men to see what is inside their hearts and not just how they make you feel? Would you be willing to change jobs or give up your career to be with a man who was serious about you? Would you be willing to sacrifice all those things you love about yourself for him?"

She gave us the same fluffy response she gave us when we first met, saying she is already "so good", and "at the top" of her career,"men can't resist my body", and that "every man" wants her. She said she "doesn't need a man" who expects anything different from who she is, or what she wants to give, or who won't tolerate her bullsħ!t. Her response indicated that she refuses to do anything to make herself valuable to any one man.

My wife responded by saying, "Well then, the next time you come back to talk about Don Juan or text me a lot of things just to complain to us about a guy, I'm going to remind you of what you just said. If you won't change your mind, then I can only tell you what I told you so many times before. You need to think about what you are offering to a man that he would value so much that he would want to marry you. You have to prepare yourself for the possibility that the men you want might not find you good enough to marry!"

We told her lot of other good things but she didn't take a word of our advice to change her habits, nor clean up her beliefs about men, nor adjust her behavior to win a man's heart enough to keep her in a relationship.

Not more than 10 minutes later, she started into it again, this time complaining about a guy from Thailand (?!?).

"I thought an Asian man would treat me better. But Thai men are no different. Men are all alike. They just want sex sex sex!"

"I don't know where they get these ideas. I am a decent Christian woman."

And she kept asking my wife, "Why do men only want my body?"

Her denial was on another level! Astronomical denial! This further confirmed my earlier conclusion that it would be useless to counsel her any further. She has already chosen her course in life. She needs to face up to the consequences and learn the error of her ways.

Moving Up (Sunday, September 23, 2018)

A few days after the Italian guy blocked Rhianna for the second time, the Canadian guy contacted Rhianna. Interestingly, the guy told her that he is sick and is in the hospital, and he needs somebody to take care of him. He asked her to go to Bigtown to help him.

After my wife saw this message, she was totally shocked because Rhianna mentioned she is a Sagittarius,* which supposedly means that she is superficial. So then why would she move to Bigtown to take care of a sick man? If her motivation for doing this is only to play the part of a stuffy schoolmarm who gets an ego kick out of controlling a helpless man, then I feel sorry for the guy. OTOH, we had to wonder if she was experiencing some kind of inner change. Could this could be a genuine act of love and care?

So anyway, I was overjoyed that Rhianna finally took my advice and got herself an apartment in Bigtown. I gave her this advice because it seemed to work out the best for everyone. It would be easier for her to find a job there. It would get her out of our church. She wouldn't continue to be a negative influence on my wife, and she would be able to pursue the pickawilly lifestyle she adores.

She's been looking for a job since then. We're really itching to know why she was suddenly so interested in the Canadian guy, even though he's ill, but we'll live with the satisfaction of not being involved with her sordid affairs any longer.

I know the drama will never end!

 Zodiac signs and their associated personality traits are well known folklore in Chinese culture.*
Actually, it's true. For example, her saying she hates to have sex with men who only want her body is superficial. This statement highlights superficial aspects of the interaction,* "men only want her body", and it is also superficial posing to say so, because she doesn't actually hate to have sex with those men.

Conclusions

As I mentioned in the first post, Rhianna came to us under the guise of a Christian woman seeking to find a husband. But after talking with her for a while, we realized that this was a lie. Instead, we found that she's a carousel rider in the final heat who has passed the age of 40 but still hasn't hit the wall. The way she's fared quite well in achieving the feminist/Career Life Script has insulated her from the consequences of her life choices.

As our talks wore on, I realized that living out the Feminist Life Script en large is precisely her goal – a goal having the following motivations.

- To live in a world of sexual fantasy.
- To feel that she is the queen sex goddess of that world.
- To attract sexual attention from many hawt men.
- To get repetitive ego trips anytime she can attract the attention of a man, which confirms her sexual authority and her sex queen status.
- To bask in the arrogant satisfaction of being desired and lusted after by many hawt men.
- To entice men, one after the other, until they resort to a feral style of interaction.
- To indulge herself in the luxury of having a constant choice of men, and picking through them at her fancy.
- To be enthralled in the joys of being sexually humbled/defiled on a daily to weekly basis.

Overall, she's looking to maintain a continual state of ambient sexual energy, but she can't maintain the inherent intimacy (at least not with only one man for any length of time) for the following reasons.

- She's older, and well past her prime child-bearing years.
- She is too emotionally immature, solipsistic, self-centered, and demanding.
- She is clueless about the nature of men and doesn't want to learn.
- She refuses to show appreciation, kindness, nor respect to a man.
- She has an arrogant, condescending attitude towards men. For example, she denigrates male sexual desire as being "dirty". In fact, her arrogance is in such an advanced state that it's glorified.
- She doesn't know how to maintain personal boundaries in a way that nurtures and preserves the relationship.
- She will only date men who are younger than she is, or who are exceedingly successful and wealthy.

- She demands “respect”, which translated, means that she must be allowed to bask in the sunlight of her sex-goddess ego at all times and must never be bothered by any challenge to her personal integrity.
- She is addicted to humility in the form of sexual defilement, and she has an allergic reaction to humility in other forms.

All of these characteristics invariably shoo away high quality, commitment minded men, but she seems to be unaware of this.

Rhianna has a few other issues that serve to enable and/or reinforce all of the above.

- She’s more into fantasy than reality.
- A severe lack of self-control, especially her sexual impulses.
- She is double minded, quickly changing her line of reasoning.
- She doesn’t know what she really wants, nor how to go about handling herself to attain a specific end (e.g. LTR/marriage).

In sum, she’s a train wreck that keeps on a chugging, wreaking havoc, and never comes to a standstill!

So, how can she believe that she is a “respectable Christian lady”? It is apparent that her god is her own sex-goddess self, not Christ. She deserves to be awarded a Ph.D. or professorship in “Imaginary Ego Preservation whilst Navigating Cognitive Dissonance.” (A new major for gender studies?!?)

I was hoping that Scott might comment about her psychological condition, but he hasn’t responded. RedPillBoomer suggested that she is within the Cluster B Personality Disorders in the Diagnostic Statistical Manual-V (DSM-V): Narcissistic, Histrionic, and/or Borderline.

Concerning my wife, Rhianna did have a very negative influence on my wife at the time. But all the while, my wife was very annoyed with her for some reason, and this is what gave me the confidence that my wife would not be swept away into her spirit of debauchery. After we stopped “counseling” her, my wife seemed to be more aware of her own feelings about what Rhianna was doing, and I think it helped her move past whatever residual feelings she had about that. So to summarize, in the fray, it got worse, but in the end, I think it helped my wife mature.

On a more positive note, I used to think my wife had a pretty poor attitude about men in general, but after getting to know Rhianna, I feel rather thankful for my wife because I realized things could be much worse.

Another thing I learned from all of this is that it is pretty much a waste of time to try to help people like Rhianna. They have to hit bottom and be left with no other options before they are able to open their mind to view life a different way.

I’ve written a couple posts about this phenomenon.

- Σ Frame: Hitting Bottom Must Be Necessary (2020-11-16)
- Σ Frame: The Greatest Archetype (2021-05-21)

Overall, this series reveals why we should exclude fornicators from fellowship and not have anything to do with them (1st Corinthians 5:9-11). We should not even pray for them (Jeremiah 7:16; 11:14; 1st John 5:16).

> “Do not associate with any so-called brother if he is a sexually immoral person, or a greedy person, or an idolater, or is verbally abusive, or habitually drunk, or a swindler — do not even eat with such a person.”

She don't need no man! Except...

"I Don't Need No Man!", she says

In spite of all the sadness and heartache that is common among women these days, I've gotten the impression that women basically just want a man for entertainment, for affirmation, for spots on dinners, cash and help, and for sex. We don't hear too many women expressing their needs for affection, love, kindness, masculine strength, meaning, protection, status, and so on. Although women will seldom overtly mention any of these needs, there is ample evidence that they are lurking beneath the Maybelline photo enhanced façade. But modern women have developed a peculiar habit of assiduously avoiding any semblance of humility, and so it is difficult to address these needs.

The theme for the month of August was "Snickerdoodles – Case Studies of Female Failures". One of the statements the readers may have heard or read over and again this month is the faux hope of denial that is conveyed in the overused cliché, "I don't need no man". Note the double negative, which presumably means a positive. But if we assume the intended sentiment is an accurate inference, then if women "don't need no man", then why do they continue to pursue high value men?

Let's break this pathetic gaslighting down into digestible statements.

I don't need no man… except when I can't pay all my bills.

I don't need no man… except when I need house repairs done.

I don't need no man… except when I feel fearful and insecure.

I don't need no man… except when I want attention and validation to set my ego at ease.

I don't need no man… except when I'm alone in the middle of the night, feeling lonely and horny.

I don't need no man… except when my best friend has one that makes me envious.

I don't need no man… except when I'm deliriously drunk at a dance club.

I don't need no man… unless he's 6-6-6 (6 feet tall, makes 6 figures, and has at least a 6-inch dong).

I don't need no man… unless he's soft in my solipsism, and hard in my humidor.

I don't need no man… except when I am finally ready to have a big wedding day.

I don't need no man… except when I'm ready to have a baby.

Moreover, women have a subtle way of acquiring their needs from men without letting men being very well aware of it. Meanwhile, women have succeeded in making men do all the work, shouldering all the responsibility, and taking all the blame. This has to stop. Women should be asking for these things from men.

The Essence of Denial

So what we find is that women who cling to this cliché are in a state of proud denial. But deep inside, they are extremely sad. Instead of clinging to these lies and working themselves into a mad frenzy trying to make ends meet, what would really help women is if they were honest with men about what they wanted and needed. Of course, this is not enough by itself, but it is a good start on the path of truth.

It also helps when men are aware of what is being denied, how the denial is presented and appears to our impressions, and why women cling to this modus operandi, as this would give them the insight they need to deal with this gainsay in the event that it becomes an issue that must be addressed. The posts this month have given us the eye bleach necessary to recognize all these aspects.

This month, we've had posts describing the lies and false promises foisted upon women.

- The Feminine Secret (2021/8/16)

- Incentives for Bimbofication (2021/8/23)

We've had a series and two posts describing three women who wasted their lives chasing after false notions and who refused to humble themselves enough to enter into the peace and rest that a relationship could offer.

The Sadness of Denial

When I first started planning this month's theme, I expected it would be entertaining and insightful. But now that the essays have been written and posted, and after seeing the voluminous discussions thereof, I find that it has not been lighthearted at all. Instead of being diverting, it has engrossed us with a glance into the abyss. After seeing the barebones buckskins of dazed and confused women wandering in the smoke and ashes of a deeply broken society, I'm stricken with sadness, grief, guilt, and shame. Now, I find it completely inappropriate to cast snickers at doodles. So now I must urge readers to grieve over the damn!ng effects of the lies that have overshadowed western culture for most of our lives, for the lost hopes, lost innocence, and the lost souls.

If all of the above essays weren't enough to convince readers of the sad state of women today, I'll offer this video.

I can't watch this video more than once, because it reeks of the copacetic sadness of ħɘ11. But that's the exact reason why I posted it here. Women who buy into the world's deceptions, lie to themselves, deny their need for a man, and try to go through life without embracing their God given desire for intimacy and relationships are bound up and burning in the flames of ħɘ11.

Alexander Grace: To Women Who Say They Don't Need A Boyfriend (Length: 9:11)

In my opinion, AG is one of the better Red Pill media producers on YouTube. I find his videos to be fairly complete, quite concise, well balanced, and delivered in language that I could share with my BP friends, or my wife or daughters. (He could improve his presentation if he would comb his hair before he hits the record button.)

Notes

"Women are highly social creatures, much more than men. For women, companionship and intimacy are extremely important."

"No matter what they say, women want to be in relationships, even women who don't like men. The want to be loved, stroked, listened to…"

One woman who was interviewed said, "I see other people being happy with someone else, and I feel lonely…"

AG points out three kinds of women who say, "I don't need a man."

1. Women who find their own happiness outside of their relationships.
2. Women who want a relationship with a man, but who are in denial.

3. Women who are traumatized, broken, and bitter.

Very few women are in category (1). I'll guess that most women are in (2), and I suspect that a steadily growing number of women are in group (3).

In attempting to pursue misguided Feminist ideals, women are committing violence against their souls.

"The strong feminist woman who claims that she doesn't need a man is not showing courage, she is showing cowardice. She doesn't have the strength to honestly look inside herself and see what's there. She can't admit what her body craves. She lives in denial. Repressing your true desires is not a path of strength, it's a path of weakness."

"True strength and true courage comes from admitting what you are, not denying it."

AG cites a study reporting that 82% of men and 84% of women said that getting married is important for them.

AG cites another study on 15,000 young people in relationships which found that 83% of men and 88% of women report being very committed to their current partner. 51% of men and 57% of women are almost certain that their current relationship will be permanent.

Additional Thoughts

Some readers might think that AG is offering these statistics to prop up false hopes, but I disagree. I think he is just emphasizing the point that relationships are vitally important to people. This much is easy to understand, as it's human nature. But I would go a step further to emphasize that they're frustrated in this endeavor because they're doing it all wrong. It's easy to point out the baseline problems.

1. The heavy emphasis on sex as the source of all meaning in life.
2. The debasement of marriage.
3. Marriage, sex, and having children are no longer regarded as concomitant.
4. Blithe ignorance of the nature of men and women. (Thank you Red Pill!)
5. Solipsism — the focus on self-fulfillment without any self-awareness.

6. Young people aren't attuned to think about the longitudinal outcome.

The common responses to these problems are just as destructive.

1. Marriage is not taken seriously as an option. It is intentionally postponed and even discouraged because of the near certainty that it will be debased.
2. Meanwhile, sex is easy to accomplish, especially for a young woman away from home or at college.
3. Therapeutic Moralistic Deism
4. The YOLO fluff and other feel-good moxies.

Being raised in an ostensibly healthy Christian home seems to make little difference. We've all heard stories of young girls who were raised right, home schooled in a Christian environment, and then they went off to college only to be converted to the Feminist Life Script.

There are many other grievous issues that come up during the implementation of a "remedy" within the context of specific scenarios, including The Learning Psychology of Women who Participate in the Online Amateur Sex Industry (2021/1/13), and The Futility of Justifying the Crash Landing (2021/2/15).

But the fact is that the vast majority of women are unhappier with these arrangements, whether they are willing to admit it or not.

Women who say "I don't need no man" are liars. According to the archetype, it's like a man saying, "I don't need no God". It's a denial of the highest order.

Next time you hear a woman say "I don't need no man", tell her, *"I'm sorry to hear that, because I'm a man who needs to be needed by a woman who is honest about her needs."* Then do a hard Next and watch her chase you!

How is Godliness Attractive?

Does spiritual maturity count for anything in the SMP, MMP, or marriage?

Readership: Christians
Theme: The theme for September is The Maturity of Faith.
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Introduction

For all of my life, and probably for many years before that, there has been an unstated presumption that godliness is attractive.

There have been many sermons preached and books written over the decades which have encouraged young people to "draw near to God" as a way to become more attractive to the opposite sex and to find a husband or wife.

Whenever young people have lamented about their problems in finding or attracting an appropriate partner, the usual response from religious tradcons is that they "need to love God more", or that they are "not close enough to God". Likewise, the standard advice given to married men seeking to improve their marriages is for them to "grow in godliness".

This explanation seems to imply that "loving God" or "getting closer to God" (whatever that might mean), will magically bring that special soul mate into one's life, and the resulting bliss will allow one to live happily ever after – or so it is naïvely believed. Likewise, this advice to married men presupposes that him being "more godly" will somehow transform his wife into a faithful submissive nymph and all marital conflict will then evaporate overnight.

Yes, "godliness" is toted as the answer to all ills, yet this "godliness" was never defined well enough that a man might take some actionable steps to become more attractive. So in short, all this talk simply amounts to a trite dismissal of the issue, if not downright man bashing. Meanwhile, it is easily observed that church going men are on the less favorable end of the SMV scale.

The Arguments

First of all, what is godliness? When people use the word "godly" in reference to someone, I presume it is, in general, a shorthand way to describe a person with some combination of the following traits.

- Having a thankful attitude.
- Faith that is shown by trust and confidence.
- Having a sufficient amount of self-discipline.
- Able to draw proper boundaries in their relationships with others.
- A degree of wisdom characterized by the discernment of good and evil.
- Emotional and spiritual maturity; consideration for others desires and needs.
- Having good, wholesome habits; cleanliness, regular exercise, proper diet, etc.
- A healthy self-respect; acting appropriately and in congruence with the social context.
- Manifesting fruits of the spirit; peace, patience, kindness, goodness, self-control, and so forth.
- For men, focusing on their work, their mission. For women, cultivating a spirit of kindness, humility, and grace.
- I will presume that men who are more masculine and women who are more feminine are more godly.
- Knowing one's self; values, personality, personal desires, personal weaknesses, what is needed for one's spiritual growth…
- A healthy ego characterized by a combination of an appropriate self-esteem and humility; not too arrogant, but not supercilious nor obsequious either.

Readers may add others. I'll offer a more complete list of kinds and sorts in an upcoming post. &

The fact that these traits are attractive has certainly been manifested in many observable, but admittedly anecdotal examples, which create the appearance that "godliness is attractive" is indeed true (at least in those cases). But the examples given always include people who are already quite attractive, so the connection to these traits of godliness is not so clear.

On the other hand, there is weighty evidence that apparently shows the opposite to be true. For example, Heartiste has made it abundantly clear that women, and I will add that even "Christian" women, are passionately attracted to rogue figures, while men, yes, even "Christian" men, are attracted to porn and sluttiness – not godliness.

"Oh my god!" she says, while she kneels before the lord and master of her heart.

Christian blogger Dalrock always excoriated any admonition for men to grow in godliness as a form of game. He was convinced that the attractiveness of a man in women's eyes has no correlation with his spiritual maturity. He believed there was more to it than Mere Christianity.

Experiencing attraction is quite simple for men; a woman is attractive if she has good health, youth, indicators of fertility, thin, long hair, WHR = 0.6, and a certain feminine allure… If she is "doable", to put it bluntly. It's not nearly as simple for women; a man is attractive if he is 6 feet tall, has charisma, and a nice harmony of PSALMS – which would easily put him in the top 5% of all men.

But then there is the question of whether "attractive" is equivalent to godliness, or if it truly means whatever we think it means. There is the notion that one's "love aura" is somehow related to godliness, spiritual maturity, and so on. But is this kind of emotional and spiritual maturity a fundamental element of the attractiveness that is associated with sexual appeal, or how attractive one is to the opposite sex? More pointedly, is spiritual maturity responsible in any way for the same kind of attractiveness that can actually draw IOIs and wedding proposals?

Similar to the confusion about what "godliness" means, never does anyone go into detail about what attraction actually means, nor how godliness is attractive, nor how to be a "hawt sexxxy Christian man". Such a train of descriptors seem to be an absurd oxymoron, and yet we are expected to overlook this connotation and understand that the underlying assumption is true.

But is there any truth to this claim? If so, then why does it remain hidden from our conscious understanding?

Where does godliness fit into the attraction equation?

How does Attractiveness relate to Godliness?

Before we dismiss the whole notion that godliness is attractive, I'd like to examine this topic in further depth, and blend it into this month's theme about the Maturity of Faith, which includes Growth and personal transformation. I hope that readers will find this topic as fascinating as I have.

I've touched on this subject before – many times – for example…

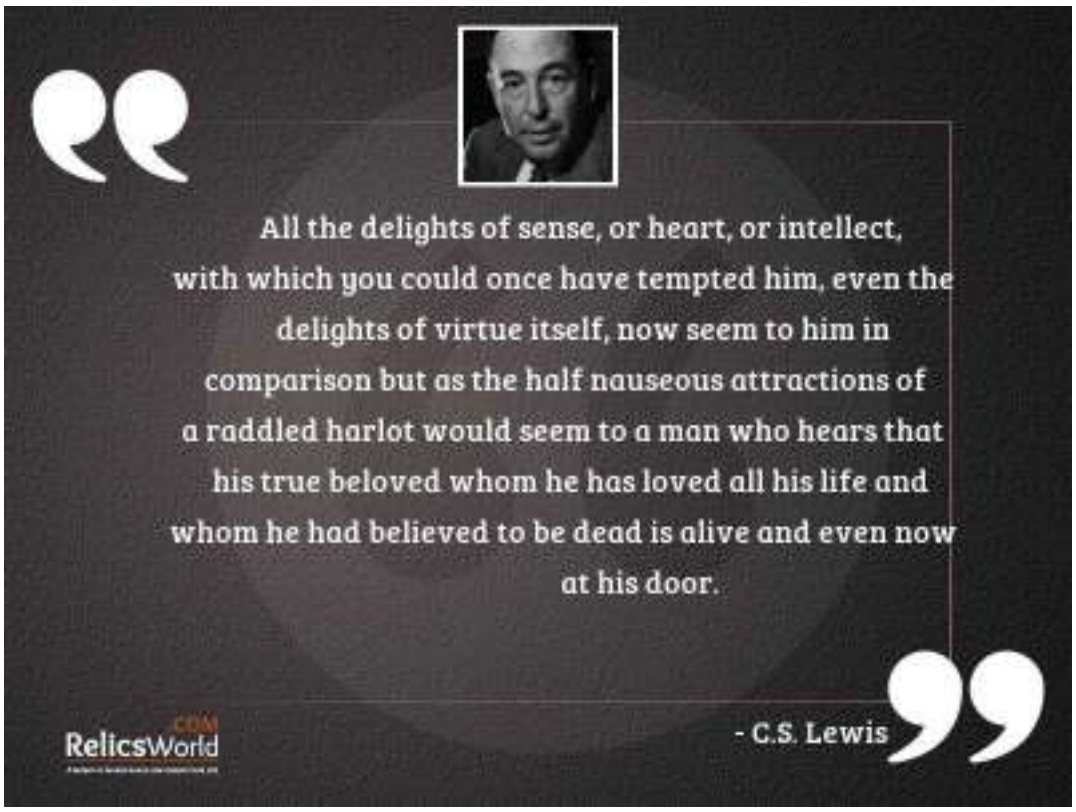
The post, How to Develop an Attitude of Detachment (2020 July 10), gave us an understanding of how detachment is very healthy, psychologically, socially, and spiritually. When we understand how maintaining Frame is the same as setting socio-emotional boundaries, then we can also understand why detachment is attractive to women — because it is an indicator of inner strength, authentic independence, and maturity in a man.

In another post, A Revised Understanding of Game (2020 September 14), I pointed out that the essence of Game lies in a man's charisma, his discernment, and his skill in drawing boundaries. I took this further in Mood can be Hypnotizing (2020 October 16), in which I described how charisma is an important part of attraction.

Birds of One Feather Flock Together (2020 October 26) described two contextual states in which one experiences interpersonal attraction. I labeled these two types as a carnal attraction or a spiritual attraction.

The Motivation of Desire (2020 December 1) made the claim that a woman who submits to the spiritual authority of Headship is more attractive.

> "A woman usually won't submit and respect a husband unless she feels a strong need for security, love, attention, and guidance. She might do this out of her own willpower, knowing that it's commanded in the Bible, and/or because it's the right thing to do. But she won't experience the renewing power of authority in her soul unless she has some kind of internal motivation to do so (e.g. a strong libido, desiring the joys of sanctification, feeling broken by personal failures, or having various spiritual needs like trust, forgiveness, or a venue for expressing humility). This internal motivation is what drives the heart to be authentic and open."



The Greatest Archetype (2021 May 21) conveyed the cat-and-mouse game that is played between a man and a woman as an archetype of Christ's relationship to the church (and by extension, individual men). RedPillApostle summed this up quite succinctly as follows.

> "Marital headship is God's model for the family that mirrors that of Christ and the church, albeit without the perfect headship of Christ. As such, the wife, much like Peter in the example, needs to come to her end as the strong, independent woman that tries to usurp the husband's headship before she will take her role as the helpmate. When she does get to the point of submission to her husband's headship, she will start to see the real blessing of peace in her life. God did not make women to be able to bear the responsibility of headship, He made women to fall in line and support a man's headship. The marital relationship, with the fullness of intimately knowing another person emotionally, intellectually and physically, is richer and experiences the blessings of peace when it aligns with God's design."

In summary, I do believe there is a connection between spiritual maturity and attraction, sex, and love, but the connection is abstract and therefore not clearly apparent. We'll be investigating this phenomenon in a series of posts this month, and then our readers can decide for themselves.

The Power of the Word

How important is it to read the Bible regularly?

Readership: Christians
Reader's Note: The theme for September is Faith and Maturity.
Length: 500 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

The Center for Bible Engagement conducted an extensive study among churches, schools, and the general population.

- 40,000 people in the United States
- 400,000 people worldwide
- Ages 8 to 80
- 24 Countries
- 75+ denominations
- Several major religions

The purpose of the study was to determine the habits and influence of Bible reading.

- How are people engaging the Scriptures?
- What effect does it have on their lives?

They found that reading the Bible less than three times a week had a negligible impact. But those who read their Bible more than four times a week, there was a significant difference. Compared to those who read their Bible less, those reading the Bible more than four times a week were…

- 30% less likely to feel lonely.
- 32% less likely to have anger issues.
- 40% less likely to experience bitterness in their relationships (marriage and children).
- 57% less likely to struggle with alcoholism.
- 60% less likely to feel spiritually stagnant.
- 61% less likely to view pornography.
- 228% more likely to share their faith testimony with others.
- 230% more likely to disciple others.
- 407% more likely to memorize scripture.

Those are some pretty impressive numbers.

Case Study — Jack's Experience

Personally, I do not read the Bible and pray every day, but rather, once every two or three days. This is about 3-4 times a week, on average. Whenever I read the Bible, I'll read several chapters at once, and I do a lot of contemplation and soul searching. I am content with this habit, because God speaks to me, and I am always spiritually fed.

Interestingly, I've found that if I push myself to read the Bible every day, it seems to have a detrimental effect to my spiritual life. After a couple weeks of this, God stops talking to me through my devotions, and the fresh newness that accompanies the experience dies away. It can be extremely difficult to recover from this as well. I've always been confused about why this is. (My account of this experience is described in the three posts from 2009 under Related.)

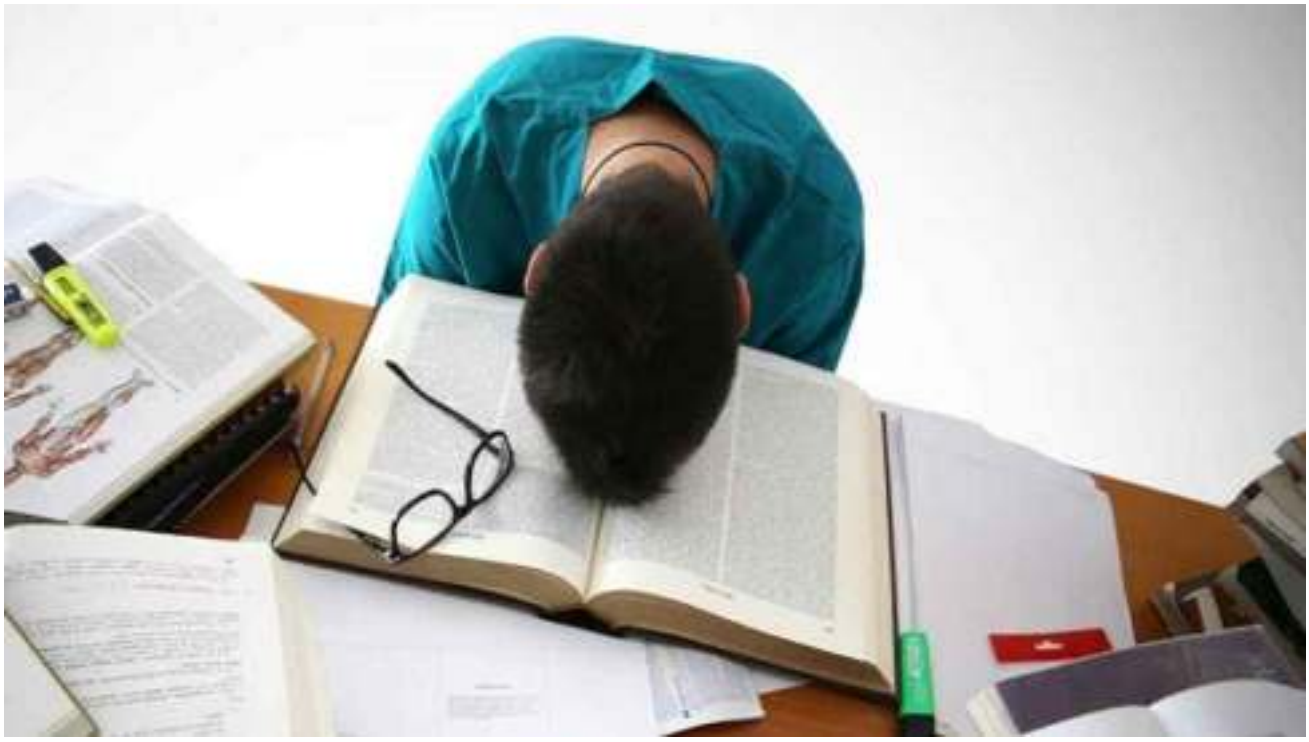
Can anyone relate to this?



Impressions or Obsessions?

Our current impression of godliness has a strong emphasis on being involved in church and bible studies, carrying a bible, sitting in Bible studies, conversing about Bible verses, studying theology, and being a Bible book worm.

But we also have the connotation that a man who maintains such habits is socially ignorant, and generally unattractive, even to the extent of being a wimpy academic nerd. Of course, the Blue Pilled femcentric convergence of progressive churchianity, and the general collection of traits that it imposes on men, may be partly to blame for this impression.

But how much Bible reading is required for one to be truly godly? According to this study, about four times a week. Other than that, receiving the benefits of reading the Bible doesn't necessarily require all of the above.

The Soul Crisis and Suffering Are Intrinsic to the Gospel

Jack's post, The Greatest Archetype (2021-05-21) introduced us to a profound truth that is hard to grasp…

> "Only when we have come to the end of ourselves, not as we might imagine ourselves to be while in a state of desperation, but in totality, are we are able to receive the Holy Spirit. All our vows and resolutions end in denial because we have no power to carry them out. Only Christ has that power. Because the natural man is not able to reach beyond its own martyrdom, it requires the invasion of the Holy Spirit."

Following the comparison of Christ's relationship to the church with a husband's relationship to his wife (c.f. Ephesians 5:23), Jack went further to describe how the same "dying to self' must occur in a woman before she can fully submit to her husband and thereby yield a God glorifying relationship.

We naturally recoil at the idea of suffering, and much more towards a death of any sort. We are tempted to reject this idea as wrong, cruel, or even evil. This is a difficult concept for our minds to grasp, yet it is central to the gospel – and to marriage! Even mature Christians find it difficult, even elusive, to comprehend this truth.

This brings us to the age old and long debated concept of suffering. Why is suffering an inherent element of the life of faith? Why must God require a death of sorts?

The Book of Job deals with this. Why are there so many bad things going on when God is supposed to be good? Rock Kitaro attempted to address this question in the comments.

> "I believe the Book of Job is one of the best at explaining how you should continue to have faith in the face of > overwhelming suffering. God himself said (if you believe the Book of Job as inspired scripture… which I do) that Job was a man who was blameless and upright. I interpret this to believe that God knew Job could handle such a crucible."

> "…these are the six main points."

1. There are matters going on in heaven with God that believers know nothing about, yet it affects our lives.
2. Even the best effort at explaining the issue can be useless without the scriptures.
3. God's People do suffer. Bad things happen all the time to good people, thus, one cannot judge a person's spirituality by his painful circumstances, or his success.
4. Even though God seems far away, perseverance in faith is a most noble virtue since God is good and one can safely leave his life in His hands.
5. The believer in the midst of suffering should not abandon God, but draw near to Him so out of fellowship, comfort can come.
6. Suffering may be intense, but it will ultimately end for the righteous and God will bless abundantly.

Yes, the answer is that God has the big picture, and Job decides to trust that at the end. But the answer isn't an easy "because X" — God doesn't provide that answer. What He says is, "I have the big picture and this is how it has to be", essentially.

Job, by Léon Joseph Florentin Bonnat, 1880.

God Makes No Sense!

Of course this makes no sense — which is why many people find Job unsatisfying. But it is God's answer to the obvious question, regardless of how unsatisfying that answer is. Basically it comes down to trusting God, and that God allows all kinds of nasty things in His creation for a good reason that we will only understand once we have the big picture from A to Z that He has. Again, unsatisfying, and it makes no sense to us.

Christianity in general, though, makes no "sense". We believe that an eternally existing God incarnated himself through a virgin birth in a stable in Palestine 2000 years ago. That's hard to believe. We believe that he wasn't an avatar (like Krishna) or a vision or something like that, but somehow was and is fully human and fully God, and that his full humanity is now eternal. None of that makes a lick of sense. We believe that somehow Jesus was resurrected from the dead, which simply never happens. It makes no sense. We have "witness testimony" that wouldn't hold up in any court of law as being reliable, and we go with that … which makes no sense. We wouldn't do that with any other kind of "proof", so why do it here?

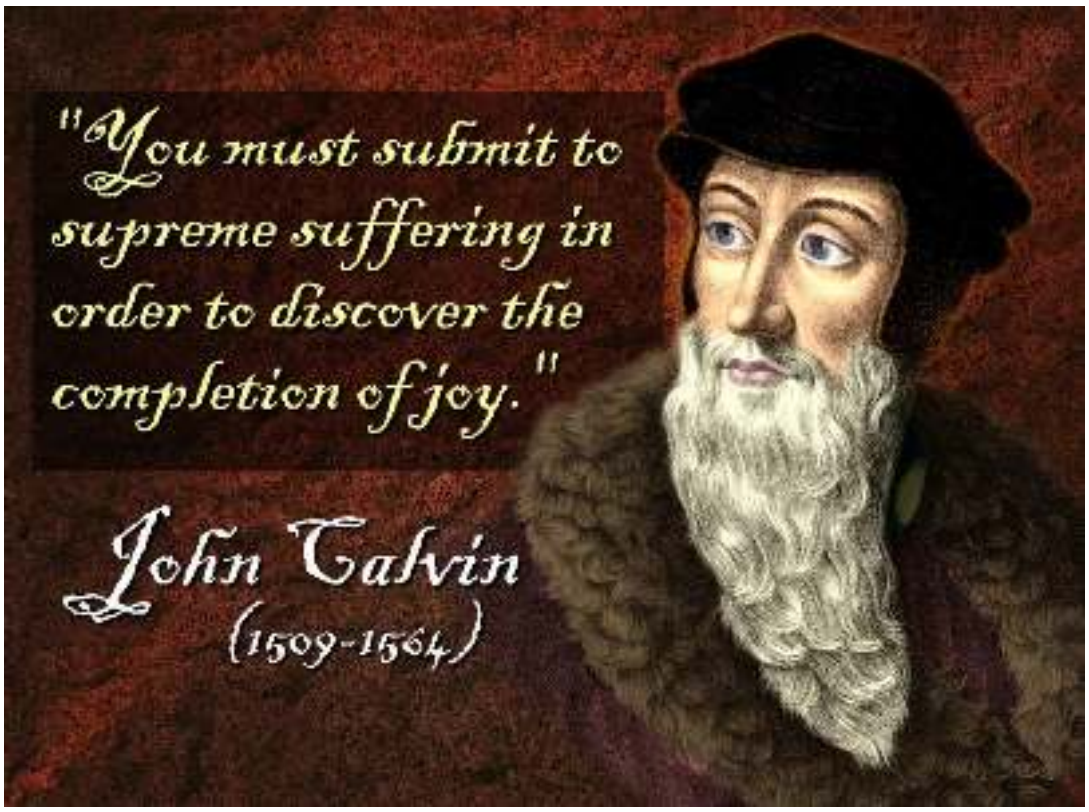
And that's just the beginning, and the basics, not the more complicated things that Christians believe. Christianity makes no sense, because religion in general "makes no sense". (That isn't to say that there aren't "explanations" which can help people to come to terms with things … there are, but in order for these to help, one has to accept certain premises that can't be proven, and which contradict "making sense".)

We have parables and analogies that attempt to make it conceivable, we have thrown words around it in the creed and theology to try to rationalize it, we but ultimately, we are forced to concede that it makes no sense because it is an eternal truth that extends beyond the capabilities of our logical facilities.

Why believe in it then? Because religion addresses something else inside of us — not the rational part of our soul that "makes sense of things", but rather something else that is definitely there, and is beyond reason, but which is a deep human need. You don't get there by trying to "make sense of things". You get there by experiencing God. Religion is built around that — the people who founded the great religions, who set them up (the apostles in the case of Christianity) all had that experience, and so they tried to set things up for others to have the same experience — to share with them the experience which they had with Jesus. The religion and its scriptures and its creeds and its liturgies all came later, and were built on this basis.

Why bother with any of that, then? Why not just go off on your own and experience God? You could try doing that, of course, but the problem with that is that it's hard. It's easy to get confused. There are other entities in the world that address and appeal to this part of us, and they want to distract us. So generally people have found it more useful to follow a religion's practices, its scriptures, its creeds, its liturgies, its prescriptions for how to live life so that they can maximize the likelihood that they can have real experiences of God like the people who organized the religion did in the first place, rather than just spinning their wheels alone in the dark, needlessly trying to reinvent wheels that were long ago plumbed and figured out.

Is there corruption? Of course. Because humans are involved in the transmission, and humans are corrupt. It's a downer, but it is what it is, and the person in the mirror is the biggest part of the problem as well in everyone's case.

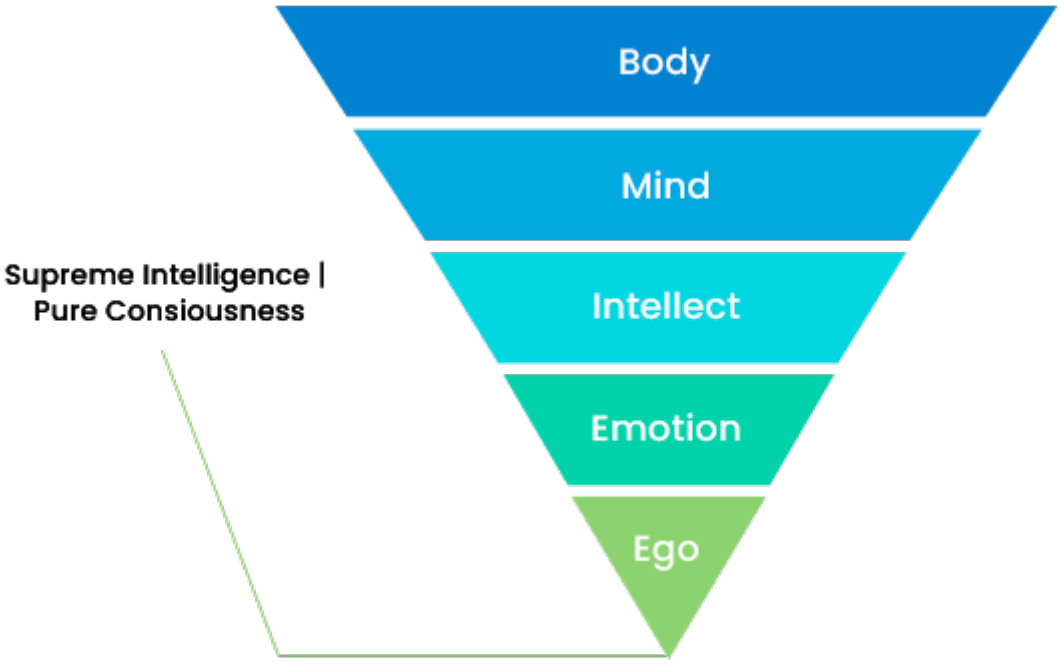


But the bottom line truth is that none of it "makes sense". You can rationalize things, and people do this all the time as "mental short cuts", and these are more useful for some people than for others, but at the end of the day it's not about addressing the part of us that needs things to "make sense", but another faculty in us that perceives and interacts intuitively on the spiritual level with the noetic/spiritual organ in us.

Growing in Faith Requires us to Use Our Noetic Nose

It's essentially about focusing on the personal connection with God, rather than the intellectual understanding piece, in terms of where your primary focus is (obviously both play some role). God is an eternal person and He wants a relationship with you. It's through that relationship that you come to get to know Him and gradually understand Him better, after which the intellectual pieces can start to make more "sense".

The part of you that does that is your spiritual organ — your "noetic interface", the part of you that interfaces with spirit, and therefore with God. That organ tends to be very underused today, because we live in a very empirically-oriented culture with an almost exclusively empiricist epistemic framework that almost everyone lives by because it's the general cultural framework. And that encourages us to overuse our discursive reason and, when we need a break from that, to veer into emotion as an outlet. Neither of those is the spiritual organ, however. The spiritual organ is kind of like the eyes and the mind that interface with the spiritual reality that can't be seen but exists — it's how we perceive that unseen yet present reality, sort of like our sensory apparatus that applies to the unseen world. It's normally rusty in contemporaries, but it can be dusted off and used. But the problem is, how do you do that?



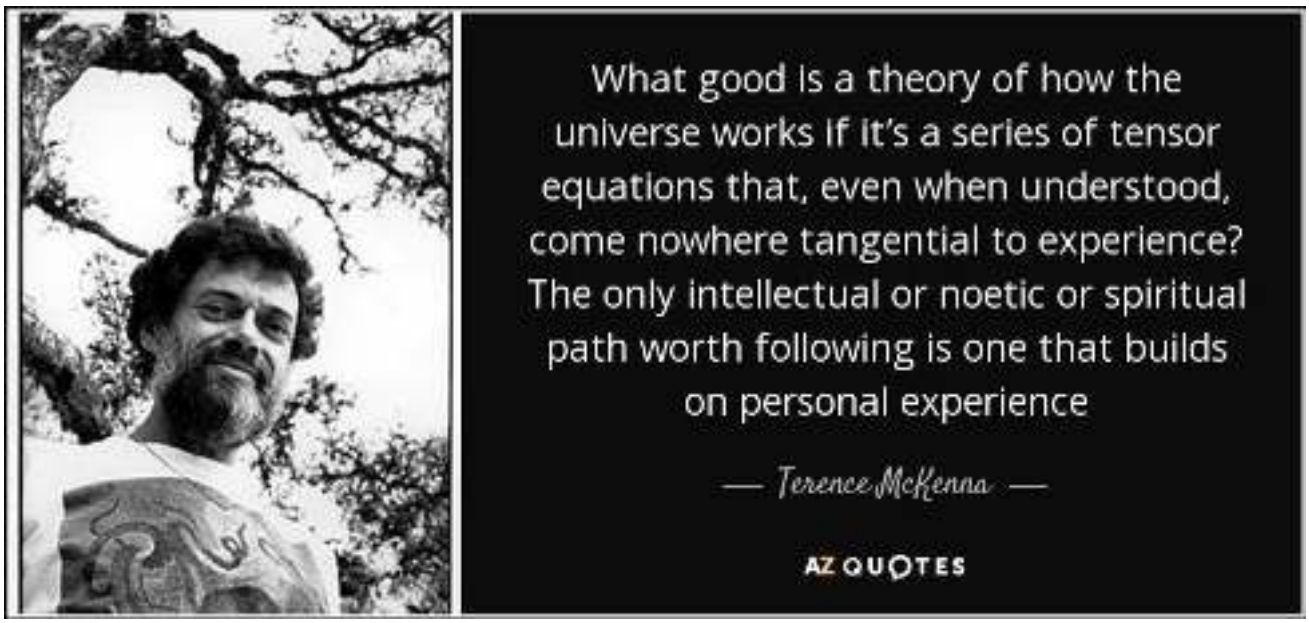
That's where the religion comes in, and different flavors of Christianity have different emphases in how they approach this, but a spiritual focus on the relationship with God is key. That can come through prayer, it can come through prayerful scripture reading, it can come through worship with others, it can come through contemplative practice, but trying to figure any of that out alone is really dicey, because when you do that you lack guidance. So that's where the church and the guidance of other Christian men come in to help with things that have worked for many people in the past in terms of using their noetic interface to develop a relationship with God.

Growing in Faith Requires us to be Out of Our Minds

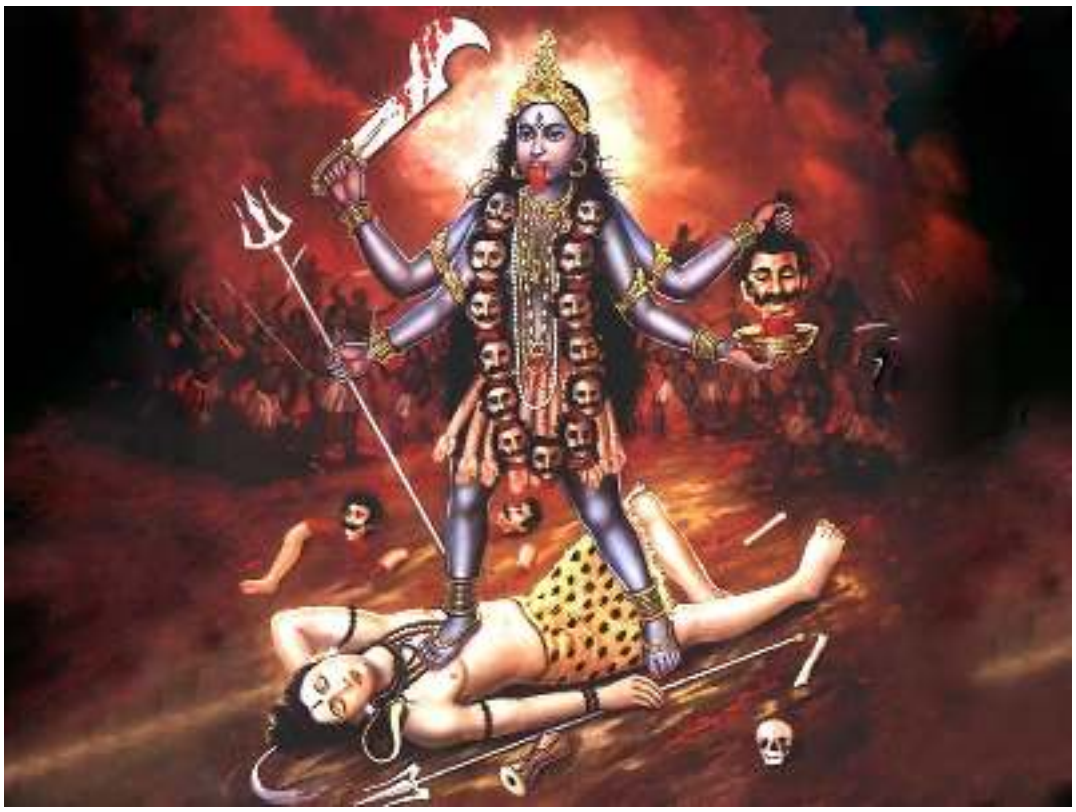
You'll get much further in your pursuit of God if you stop trying to make sense of things and focus instead on cultivating the experience of God and finding a path by which you can do that, rather than reasoning, rationalizing, debating, and finding things that "make sense". There is no amount of cognitive understanding that can help "explain" things that are hard to accept, from the perspective of "not making sense". Thus, we should not allow ourselves to become bewildered and confused when we find that none of this "makes sense" in that vein.

This resonated with Caterpillar345, who wrote,

> "I think this gets at the core of the things I struggle with when it comes to God. The idea of "Stop trying to make sense of things", but rather, "Focus on the experience of God", sounds so wishy-washy and new-agey to me. And yet I think I'm beginning to understand the gist of your comment here…"



It can sound "new agey" because many people today are used to looking at religion issues with their discursive brains, primarily. Religions themselves are to blame for this, in part, because they often describe themselves as belief systems (using a propositional truth approach) with arguments and apologetics and all kinds of things to appeal to discursive reason, since they know that most people today are operating in discursive reason mode, so it's a way to reach people. And so people tend to come or go based on the extent to which they are convinced by these truth propositions, and contemporary people, formed as they are by a materialist/empiricist epistemic framework, are often not sufficiently convinced by them. But there isn't anything "new agey" about a focus on the relationship with God — it's basically the core of all religion, and especially Christianity because Jesus Christ is the eternal God-man, and he's primarily how we interface with God as Christians — man-to-God-Man, if you will. It's about as un-abstract as you can get, since we worship a God who is also a tangible human person, and therefore a person who can be known in his divinized humanity in a way that the "completely transcendent" Gods of other religions can't. And knowing him is the key to Christianity, really. Knowing him, rather than knowing propositional truths about him or agreeing with a set of propositional truths about him. Not that these things are wrong — they aren't. But they arose in the first place because the people who were formulating those understandings in the first few centuries of Christian history knew God through Jesus Christ personally, and were making those formulations based on their knowledge of him.



The iconoclastic votive of Kali standing on Shiva is reminiscent of Feminism destroying men's lives.

In any case, truly "new agey" people don't follow a religion and tend to try to do it themselves by patchworking bits and pieces of spiritual practice from different spiritual traditions and religions. It's pretty hard to do, because pasting these practices together into a personalized collage, where the components are all dislodged from their own setting and placed together apart from the tradition that created them creates beliefs and the use of practices that aren't "tested" by people earlier in time who found approaches and methods that "worked" in terms of cultivating a relationship with God in the context of the specific tradition in which that practice arose. But the key in checking out the approaches of different churches is figuring out where, if anywhere, you can get to know God better personally, through your spiritual/noetic organ, and not, at least not in the first place, which one has truth propositions that resonate with you.

Sniffing out the Application

RichardP pointed out a passage in scripture that gives us a great example of how the noetic nose is used [lightly edited for clarity].

> "The New Testament says that the natural man (spiritually dead man) cannot perceive the things of God. The New Testament says that God is the One who brings us to spiritual life. The New Testament says that no man can say that "Jesus is Lord" without the help of the Holy Spirit. (1st Corinthians 12:3).
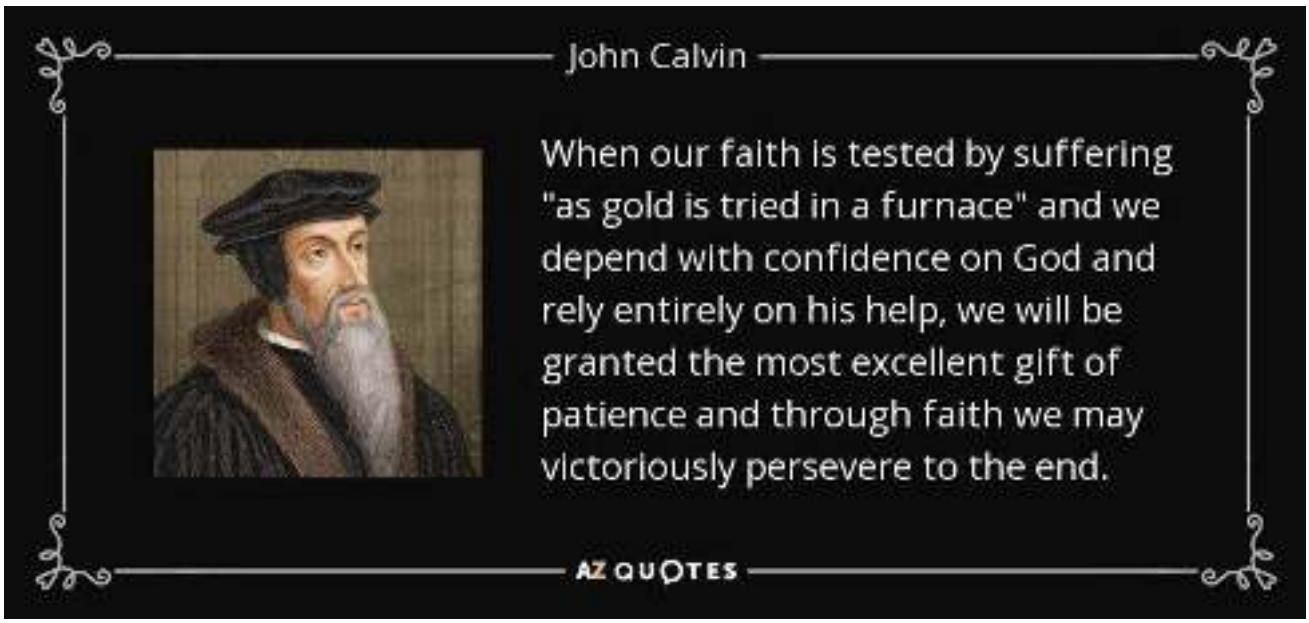
> If those scriptures are true, our ability to know the things of God and make Him Lord of our life is entirely dependent upon the actions of God and the Holy Spirit in our lives. This is not a pitch for Calvinism, but it is the point at which Calvinism starts to build its argument."



> "Paul talks about folks eating meat offered to idols. (1st Corinthians 8) Some thought it was a sin to do that. Others thought it was not. Paul's basic message was, "If you think it is a sin, and you eat it anyway, you are displaying a willingness to disobey God. On the other hand, if you don't think it is a sin, and you eat it, you are not displaying a willingness to disobey God. Act on the faith you have." Without faith, it is impossible to please God. (Hebrews 11:6) And, as the eating meat offered to idols example sets out, we have two different sets of behavior that contradict each other (eat / don't eat), but Paul and God accept both. It is not the behaviors that are important to God and to Paul. It is the faith. Don't behave in a way that demonstrates that you are willing to disobey God.
> The Bible is full of stuff like that. It is not a one-size-fits-all world, and God does not hold everybody accountable to the same standard. As we are all members of the body of Christ, the nose is not going to be held to the same standard as the feet or the ears. God's expectations for each are different and unique.
> What sense does it make for me, as the nose part of the body of Christ, to throw brickbats at those who are the ears part of the body of Christ for not behaving how I behave? Why should ears behave the same as the nose? God will hold the ears accountable for how well they performed the job he gave them, not for how well they performed the job he gave me, the nose.
> That is part of the story. But probably the most important part. You do you. You do what God has called you to be, and created you for. That is all you will be asked to give account for at the Judgement Seat. Fretting about what God actually thought of King David and his adultery ain't gonna get you anything but heartburn and heartache."

Keys to Success in Life

Take responsibility towards your Work/Purpose – A Man's Connection to the World! (These must be done in this order!)

1. Make a decision and Take Action!
2. Think it through as you increase efficiency.
3. Sort out your emotions and maximize Flow.

Owning Yourself

On the first point above, making good/right decisions in life requires the personalization of the ego and the internalization of your life experiences. To do this, a man has to own up to himself (AKA "coming to terms" with one's self).

1. Open your heart, use your noetic nose. Learn to trust God. Learn how to selectively trust others, and how much. Exercise discernment. Set appropriate boundaries which are necessary to keep your heart open and alive. Knowing who to trust is key.
2. Recognize your convictions, emotional constitution, personality, and values.
3. Identify the nature, sources, or causes of your desires, fears, triggers, turn-offs, and must-haves. Remember that strengths and weaknesses go hand in hand.
4. Develop effective and personalized habits of communication and self-expression.
5. Find and take an acceptable and effective path of resolution.
6. Periodically reflect on your experiences. Learn from your mistakes. Revise your mental paradigm, and continue.

If a person follows this outline with regularity, he should be making incremental progress towards his own personal maturity. However, there exist certain complicating factors that can interrupt this process. I may cover some of these factors at a later date. &

Elements of Maturity

I have come to understand maturity as the level of development and/or a state of completion of the self. So the remainder of this post will address the topic of maturity as it relates to the self.

Because maturity is a rather complex topic, I've put together a Cliff's Notes version of descriptors of maturity and factors that contribute towards maturity. Readers are encouraged to use this list to gain insight, as an inspiration, for brainstorming, jumpstarting a discussion on the topic, or simply as a reference.

Accepting and Appreciating Your Human Identity

- Any unique features you may possess (e.g. physical comeliness or homeliness, social affect, mental acuity, psychological disposition, learning disabilities, etc.).
- Your culture.
- Your family background.
- Your generational characteristics and related social issues.
- Your height, weight, and appearance.
- Your nationality.
- Your nominal religion.
- Your personality.
- Your political views and affiliations.
- Your race.
- Your sex.
- Your socio-economic class.

In mentioning these, it is important to be aware of the characteristic attitudes and values of the above, and see them as distinct and unique from those who are different. This gives one a sense of one's place in the world.

> "Travel is fatal to prejudice, bigotry, and narrow-mindedness, and many of our people need it sorely on these accounts. Broad, wholesome, charitable views of men and things cannot be acquired by vegetating in one little corner of the earth all one's lifetime."

> Mark Twain, The Innocents Abroad / Roughing It (1869, 1872)

- The needs of your body: sleep, hygiene, nutrition, leisure time, exercise, libidinal expression, etc.
- Your attitude, and knowing what makes your attitude change.
- Your emotional triggers, their sources, and how to handle them.
- Your feelings, and knowing when they do or do not convey the truth.
- Your gut reactions and what causes them, and what they mean.
- Your impressions, and being able to gauge the accuracy of them.
- Your opinions, and how they are different from others'.
- Your repetitive thoughts and trains of thought.

Self-Control

- Accepting the discipline necessary to achieve your goals in life.
- Being patient.

- Being rational and reasonable.
- Keeping to a schedule.
- Keeping your speech honest, pure, and constructive.
- Maintaining hope, a clear mind and psychological balance, especially in the face of confrontation with others and during adverse situations and circumstances.
- Managing your emotions well (especially anger).
- Not letting yourself be distracted nor wander too far from your goals and purposes.
- Sticking to a budget and spending wisely.

Self-Esteem

- Developing socially acceptable, appropriate, and efficient ways to satisfy your needs.
- Dressing in an appropriate and/or respectable manner (e.g. clean, kempt, professional, etc.) in order to create your own public persona.
- Facing your desires and fears, and discussing them with select others when appropriate.*
- Handling your significant relationships with kindness, tact, and sincerity.
- Maintaining a vital network of friends and career associates.
- Taking the time to study (e.g. the Bible, work related topics, finances, personal issues), and being well informed of issues that are important to you.

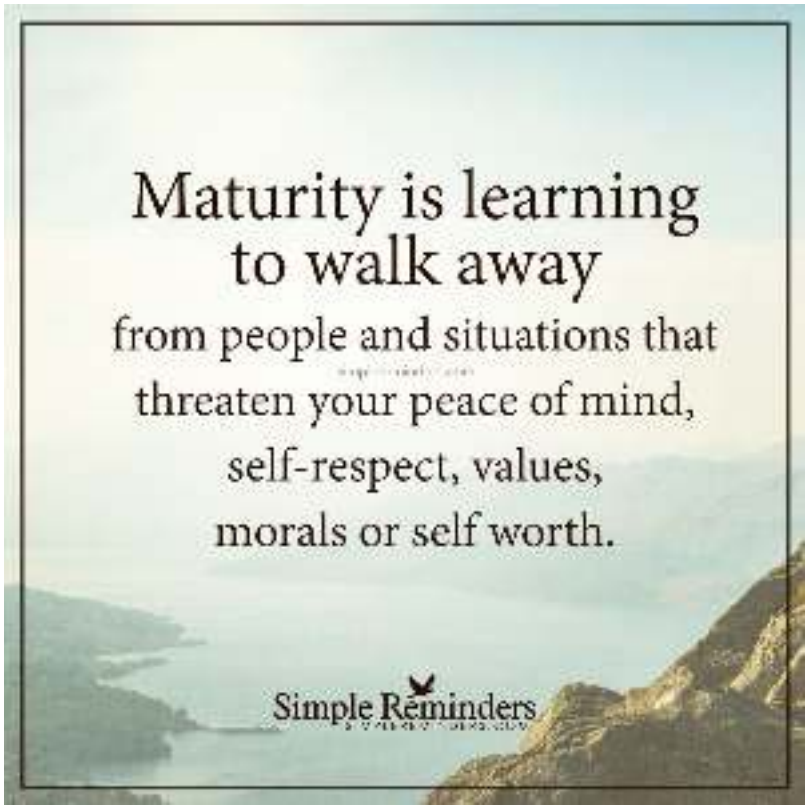
- What makes you angry or elated.
- What motivates you and/or makes you passionate.
- Your communication style and choice of words that suits you best.
- Your deal-breakers.
- Your desires.
- Your expectations.

- Your fears.
- Your habits.
- Your likes and dislikes.
- Your limitations.
- Your values.

Self-Respect

- Being able to play a role in order to fit in with a larger group (such as a family unit, a workforce, etc.) while still retaining an individual sense of self.
- Developing a field of accomplishments, increasing responsibilities and privileges, and growing a sphere of influence.
- Knowing your limits as to what you are able to do or accept, and handling the issue tactfully without being irresponsible or looking like an @ss.
- Having the wits to be able to put your thoughts and feelings into accurate and easily understandable words at appropriate times.
- Expressing your vulnerabilities and needs with dignity to those who are trustworthy. (Men are strongly encouraged to confide in other men, and NOT women.)*
- Knowing how to handle confrontations with others such to attain win-win outcomes.



Applications

I've found certain lifestyle habits can greatly enhance success in life, the owning of self, and the process of maturing.

- Choose friends wisely. Choose friends who recognize your identity and appreciate who you are, what you do, and what you bring. Also, make the effort to develop friendships with people who fit into your life purpose and others you want to emulate.

- Avoid toxic people. This means don't be a beta orbiter who allows attention seeking but insincere women to siphon off his time and resources, leaving him with nothing to show for it but blue-balled angst and frustration.
- Manage a time schedule to maximize efficiency and productivity.
- Settle into a regular routine.
- Increase your sense of security and reduce unexpected and time wasting variations by making habits of things.
- Prepare things in advance, to save more time and effort later.
- Make a "To Do" list, and/or set out a half-finished task to be completed first thing early the next morning when your mind is sleepy and dull. This will help kick start your day. This also includes laying out your clothes the night before, and preparing your tools, bags, books, and other equipment at the end of the day, the day before the work is to be done.
- Limit your wardrobe to a specific style of clothes that best accentuate your personality and express your work/career aspirations.
- Reduce your travel time and stress by living close to your place of occupation.
- Reduce or eliminate habits that are distracting, enervating, dissipating, or that waste time and/or money. These habits might include things like watching TV or movies, playing video games, excessive drinking, viewing p0rn, masturbating, etc.
- Take time to rest and worship.

Readers may add to these lists as they see fit.

 The primary purpose for talking about feelings and personal matters is not for catharsis, but to achieve self-understanding and work those issues out. An adage I use to describe this process is* "Name it to change it."&
 For me personally, I look best in either very formal, or very casual attire. I do not look good in semi-formal, current fashion, or "Ivy League/Polo Club" clothing. So when I go to work, I dress to the hilt – ties, belts, patent leather shoes… When I'm not at work, I dress down — shorts, athletic shirts, etc. As a comparison, my father was a carpenter, so he always wore plaid flannel shirts and brown leather shoes… with authority and style!*

Exhuming the Masculine Frame

Men develop maturity by exercising frame and emphasizing personal value.

It's A-OK to be a Man!

Writing the post, Avoiding the Broken Window Effect (2020-07-21), has given me a new mindset about the role of men. Before, the topic of intersexual relationships seemed like a giant conundrum filled with numerous dilemmas, all having very few, and very difficult actionable remedies. (I've written numerous posts about these.) Now, it all seems so ridiculous to me, even laughable. I mean, once you understand women's nature and their game, it becomes apparent that they're all mixed up and they lie about everything all the time. That's harsh to say, but actually, it is even worse than that. They actually believe the words coming out of their mouths are the truth. It's delusional! (Solipsistic is the word commonly used around the Manosphere.) So it is ridiculous to adopt their viewpoint with any sincerity, much less try to build a functioning action plan on that.

I think the big shift in my perspective came from defining a clear boundary between women's viewpoints and men's viewpoints. Understanding things from a male viewpoint is much easier to reconcile with God's order and how "it's supposed to be". & But once we start seriously entertaining women's viewpoints, everything falls apart and turns into a confusing, incalculable quagmire. Actually, I've known this for a long time (for example, see this post), but I'm still working out the details. I guess I am somewhat surprised that I still haven't got this down yet. Obviously, Blue Pill conditioning has residual effects that last for years.

Understanding things in this way has given me a new appreciation for the Biblical adage "husbands must love their wives" too. Blue Pill "love" (e.g. chivalry, being "nice", pedestalizing women, and so on) is pretty hollow and powerless, but understanding how the perturbing nature of women is what constitutes the challenge to love one's wife, especially when they're being difficult (to put it nicely) breathes a new life of suffering into this commandment.

The Hidden and Undervalued Wealth of Men

Another thing that struck me while I was writing the Broken Window post is that men are sitting on a wealth of resources which most men seem unaware of, and that is… themselves! — their hands, their minds, their camaraderie, their commitment, their plans and dreams, their loyalty, their dependability, their hard work, their sacrifice… They are told that this is all worthless. Women don't recognize these treasures. They only recognize the fruits of these treasures that they have potential access to. When a man recognizes some form of worthiness about himself, they are tritely told it doesn't matter, as if it were a silly juvenile notion, and at the same time, they are taught to p!ss it all away for the benefits or conveniences of others. Within Christian circles, passages from the Bible are added to back this up, thereby laying a false-guilt trip on men if they don't.

It's somewhat of a game in life, to maximize returns for whatever you give of yourself. But these days, too many men are selling their souls for a bit of female excitement and (false?) hope. But men don't need to do this. They don't need to offer their strength and the benefits of their intrinsic virtues to anyone they don't want to. Men aren't obligated to support and shelter women who are not under their covenant authority. If men established their covenant authority (e.g. Headship) before making transactions, then they would increase the chances of getting a fair return. Instead, men should be developing themselves by drawing boundaries and setting conditions – anything to maintain Frame and keep himself in good running order.

Know and Defend Your Worth and Value

The previous post, Elements of Emotional and Personal Maturity (2021-09-08), listed several aspects of the self, and how maturity and growth can be achieved by being conscious of one's performance in each of these areas. But there is more to it for men in particular. Deti described this as well as I could.

> There's something else that should be here, especially for men. It may be the sum total of self-esteem or self-respect or both.
> Know your worth and value. Expect reciprocation from others.
> Scott has said it elsewhere and I think it's correct: Men are brought up to believe that no matter what they do or what they make of themselves, they're worthless, especially to women and other people. Men continue to believe this even after they prove themselves worthy: Of employment, acceptance into a group, friendship, etc. Many men continue to accept substandard treatment from others even while those same people expect superior treatment from those men. Those men give a lot more than they get.
> Men need to start understanding what they're worth and what value they bring to relationships and to others. They need to take stock of who they are, what they bring, and what they built. They need to expect and demand that others reciprocate with like value. They need to expect from others the same high standards they expect of themselves. They need to remove from their lives other people who cannot or will not reciprocate. If a woman can't or won't reciprocate, can't or won't give him what he wants and needs, then to the curb she goes.
> Stop apologizing. Remove the word "sorry" from your vocabulary. You do not owe anyone any apologies for wanting what you want and needing what you need, and for expecting others in your life to give those things to you.
> Know your worth and value. Expect reciprocation from others.

In other words, men need to pursue the development of the self within and through the development of their own frame. It's up to small groups of men to recognize these treasures within themselves, and to help each other uncover, develop, maintain, and defend their personal wealth of identity in the form of masculine maturity. Men need to support other men and back them up in difficult situations.

Case Study – Pulling Your Meatballs up by the Bootstrap

I have a couple good friends at church. I'll call them Meatball and Bootstrap for this story, but they are real men. (Meatball is jacked, and Bootstrap is tall and engaging.) Meatball has a wife who is regularly contentious. On a couple instances, Bootstrap and I saw her talking to Meatball in a shrill voice – in church! Bootstrap and I sauntered up to her while she was screeching shameful things about our friend.

When she noticed us staring at her, she got quieter and nervous. Bootstrap asked her, "Is that how Christian women should talk to their husbands in church?"

Indignant surprise.

I crossed my arms and added, "You seem to think 'respect for your husband' means that when you're in church, you restrain yourself from b!tch slapping him across the aisle like you do at home."

She looked at Meatball, looking for assurance and expecting him to rescue her, but he didn't because my words hit home. Bootstrap looked at Meatball and then responded, "Is that true?!?"

Guilty silence.

Bootstrap was incredulous. "You're an embarrassment to all of us! …to your children, to… to your husband especially… and to everyone in this congregation!"

She countered, "THIS is a private matter, excuuuse meee!"

I said, "It's not private when you tell the whole church."

A few other words ensued, but eventually the shame of it all kicked in, and she started to break down. The way we stood by Meatball gave her the stern message that her choice of words, tone of voice, and behavior would not be tolerated in polite society. This situation happened once more after that, but never again.

Conclusions

Anytime male maturation is addressed, it should include a discussion of maintaining frame, because maintaining frame is the lynchpin of the male maturation process. Without it, life experiences that would otherwise contribute towards our maturation become a quandary of fits and false starts, and it doesn't end so well.

I think one of the biggest sources of grief in society right now is that the male viewpoint has been subsumed into the female viewpoint, and now that this has been summarily accomplished, the core aspects of masculinity are being systemically dissected and extracted under feminist auspices. The general awareness that men have of their God-given covenant authority is so weak to non-existent, that what little they have is being stolen right out from under their not-so-noetic noses. Men need to band together and reconstruct the masculine world view, and it's much better if this framework is exhumed from Biblical authority. Men's Bible study groups are a good place to begin, but small groups alone aren't sufficient to do this justice; it needs to be crowd sourced. It has to be a movement of the Spirit.

I see some secular groups of men doing just this. (For example, there is (1) The 21 Convention, and (2) The Red Quest, Red Pill Dad, and a couple others I don't follow have some kind of cooperation going on off line.) In the Christian 'sphere, Deep Strength and a few others have started RPChristians on Reddit and have had some success stories. At Σ Frame, I have invited several other men to join in writing posts. But again, progress is hard won and incrementally slow.

Knowing how things are supposed to be

Knowing the authentic is how all counterfeits are identified.

Our Search for the Authentic

The reason most of us men are here can be summed up this way.

Discontentedness – Envying what you don't have and it's corollary, not being thankful for what you do have. This leads to bitterness. Harboring bitterness, along with making people unattractive to others, ends up causing strife because that is what sin does every time. This is feminism.

Contentment – Being grateful for what you have without feeling you deserve different. This causes joy, and a genuinely joyous person is attractive to others. This is why there is little humor or good natured action on the left, including feminism. The entirety of it is built on being discontent and envious.

Regarding Discontentedness vs. Contentment, Jack will admit that this was one of his original motivations for blogging. He couldn't understand why contentment (in marriage, but life in general too) was so elusive and difficult to apprehend.

Jack grew up in the church, and read a lot of Christian literature in his formative years, so in his head (and this is a critical point) he always had a pretty good idea about how it's "supposed to be", but he had a few BIG problems…

1. His parents had a very cold relationship and they divorced later on after he left home, so he didn't have the proper framework of reality to build a solid psychological structure of how "it's supposed to be". Some people

(like Scott and RedPillApostle) grew up in a good, functional family, so they have that, which is quite a lot actually. It's enough to power through all the junk doctrine, pop psychology, and the education racket. But for those of us coming from broken/divorced homes, it's a desert landscape.

2. When you look around the culture, and even within the church, things are nothing like how "it's supposed to be", so there was/is no working model to improve upon, nor even something to start with.
3. The information about love, dating, marriage, and family that was available to us back in the 80s and 90s was so Blue Pilled and gynocentric, especially Christian based sources. (Jack believes he would have gotten farther along in certain key areas if he didn't grow up in a dysfunctional Christian family.)
4. There was no information about how to go from (1) or (2) to how "it's supposed to be". Red Pill literature addresses this somewhat, but most of it is secular. Other than Dalrock (who is now retired from blogging), Christianity and Masculinity, and RPChristians, there is not much other regular content being produced for the Christian man who is seeking marriage. (We hope we can fill in this deficit a little more. But it's more or less a frontier, so progress is hard won and incrementally slow.) There is a real market for Red Pill Christian YouTube videos and podcasts. (Oscar and Jack tried doing that on BitChute, but it didn't take off for some reason.)

In 2017, Jack found Dalrock, Donal Graeme, Illimitable Men, Roissy, Rollo, Zippy Catholic, et al., and then things started to make sense for him. This blog took a different turn after that.

All of this points to the following.

1. Knowing how things are "supposed to be" helps us gauge reality and gives us an idea about what needs to be done.
2. Figuring out all the lies we have swallowed over the years helps greatly.
3. Understanding the situation and readjusting one's mindset and expectations helps immensely.
4. Discussing it with other men helps.
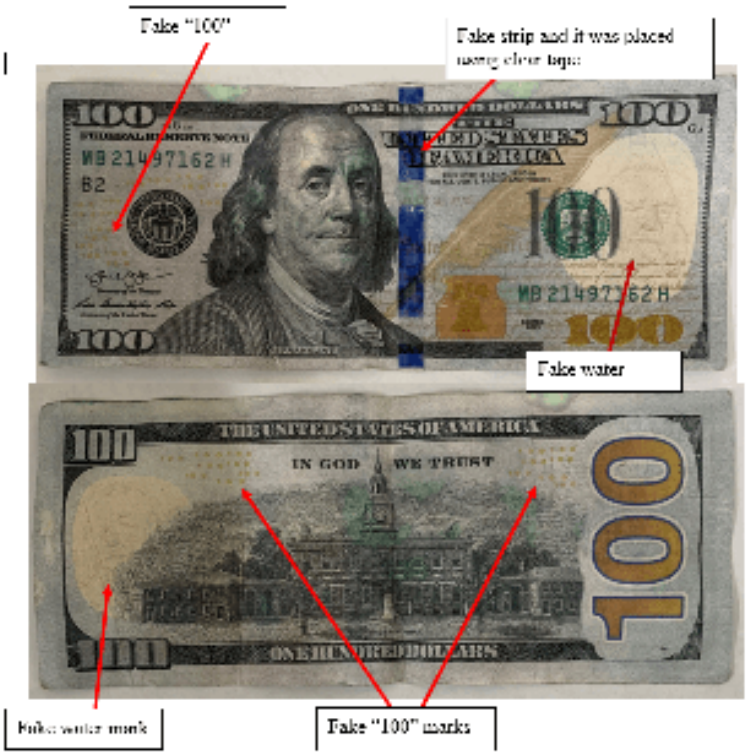
5. Writing blog posts/comments about it helps refine our understanding of the complexities.
6. Knowing that you're not all alone helps.

Men need other men in this regard.

For those of us in the Christian Manosphere, numbers (1) and (4) of the above list are the most critical. Numbers (2-5) follow after (1), while (5) and (6) are part of (4). We'll address these two main points (1 and 4) in the following sections.

Knowing how things are supposed to be

Knowing the authentic item is how all counterfeit currency is identified. Those who are experts in identifying counterfeit currency will tell you that they spend just as much time studying genuine currency as they do in spotting fakes. There are tens of thousands of variations of counterfeiting to learn and if there were millions it wouldn't matter. You only have to know one true item to spot all the counterfeits – the real one. Any deviation from authenticity marks the fake.



This works in our relationships too. One of the challenges in fixing a marriage is determining what is there that shouldn't be, and what isn't there that should be. Having an idea of where it needs to end up is necessary for one to know what needs to be "fixed". Knowing how things are supposed to be is a good first step.

It has taken me a year of biblical study, reading the writings of men who have gone before me in biblical study and whose experience is valuable to know to start to understand what biblical marriage looks like. While I am still learning and contemplating my own marriage, I have a much better idea of those principles that make for a biblical wife, biblical husband and biblical marriage. Identifying the deviations becomes easier over time.

The Way things are Supposed to be

Here is what biblical marriage looks like in principle, while in practice it will be unique to each individual man and his preferences. Read 1 Peter 3. The husband is the Head. The husband should love his wife, dwelling with her in knowledge and understanding. The wife submits in all things. She submits to the point of emulating Sarah who sinned in following Abraham's instructions. So with a husband who is not asking his wife to sin, all things beyond that are on the table for her to do. This means sexually to please him, how she dresses to please him, the fitness level she keeps, her overall appearance, how she performs her work in and out of the house, how she administers discipline to the children, how the children are raised, budgeting and saving money, how many children to have, basically the husband takes over for the father except that he has rights to her body the father never had.

We have drifted so far from this biblical take on marriage that it would be laughable to the vast majority of women in the west. When you mention restoring a male world view, it starts with realizing what I just wrote about marriage is true. "Happy king. Happy kingdom." Dissenters get Dread gamed or banished.

Think of how a man would view the world if he ruled his own kingdom. Yes, you are in charge. Yes, she signed up to do that for you. Yes, she is your responsibility and all the sacrifice this entails, which is why she gratefully obeys you.

I once took a Heartisian "women love dominant men that tell women what to do" concept, translated it into churchian language for a site that is predominantly egalitarian in philosophy, and a woman replied that she really appreciated that about her husband, especially in the bedroom. The RP take on female nature is true. Never doubt it because at the core of every woman is God's purpose as a helpmeet, and helpmeets get told what to do to help with the mission. They can fight this notion, stomp their feet, throw their tantrums and argue all they want, but this only leads to unhappiness.

The vast majority of men would not be able to compute this. It's taken me 17 years of pain and 15 months of study to sort out these ideas and I'm still working on the specifics.

Discussing it with other Men

This brings me to the importance of having other men to talk with.

Jack has had a pretty tight email correspondence with NovaSeeker and Ed Hurst at Radix Fidem. He's also had email volleys with Caterpillar345, Deep Strength, Deti, J.T. Anderson, Larry's Musings, LastHoldOut, Lexet Iustitia, Mogadishu Matt, Oscar, Rock Kitaro, Scott, Stephanie, and the administrator of the SynLogos aggregator.

Scott councils men on a regular basis as part of his career as a psychologist. Earlier this year, Scott went to California to visit Jason (Lastmod), and since then, they've developed good rapport. Over a year ago, Jason was banned because of his acrimony to other commenters. But these days, Jason actually stays on topic when many other comments veer off topic and he is sharing stuff that actually points to something more important. Apparently, his visit with Scott has clued him in about how things are supposed to be!

Since being introduced to the 'sphere, I've developed a lively correspondence with several men, including Deti and Mike Davis at Marriage, Sex, and More. Deti and I have an email string that will hit 100 emails when he replies to my most recent email to him. He has actually seen my family via social media and we have built trust to the point of being quite honest with each other. Just the other night he pointed out my take on a topic was in line with his, but he might opt for a less harsh approach with the remedy.

In knowing how difficult it is to think critically about your own actions due to the inherent bias we have for ourselves, Deti's thoughts served at the very least as a point to think about. This is the value of men's spaces, and our interactions highlight what we have lost by allowing women into what used to be areas of life meant solely for men.

What is happening on Σ Frame, in the posts themselves and in the discussion threads, is the development of wisdom. The ability to be candid with men who have had similar experiences really does help in multiple facets of being a husband, boyfriend or man in general. Writing well requires depth of thought and the testing of ideas according to Jordan Peterson and I see merit in his assertion.

Jack has stated that one of his motivations for blogging is to record and disseminate what he's learned along the way. Lately, he had a discussion with Ed in which he came to see Σ Frame as a thinktank that redefines manhood as something distinct from what is put forth by the feminist-soaked culture AND from what churchianity has offered over the last few decades. It's more Biblically oriented, but also not exactly like traditional masculinity of ages past.

To offer another example, the background for the list of “helps” I gave in my comment on the concept of envy, contentment, gratefulness, and joy, was born out of my email string with Deti. As you can imagine, it’s been a very long hard road for me to “fill in the gaps” (some of which were more like chasms), and come to a proper understanding of things. I hashed out the ideas after Deti correctly pegged the bitterness that underlies almost all of Jason’s comments.

Yes, we’ve learned so much from Brother Jason! Jack feels humbled and grateful to see how much Jason has grown since he met Scott.

As you can see, an important purpose of these discussions is to further our life knowledge, and we do this by sharing experiences and comparing notes. Iron sharpens iron. For me, and Deti too as he has stated as much, expressing yourself in emails like ours is a form of therapy in an effective, male centric and biblically truth-based form. Almost all women would be aghast at what Deti and I have written because in many ways the roughness and bluntness of our interaction is an effusion of the scars on our hearts, both those our wives have directly inflicted and those we have to come to realize, through reflecting on the past, that we have inflicted on ourselves with our Blue Pill chump churchianity behaviors. So, while women would most certainly recoil, I have a notion that most men would wonder where to grab a bourbon and a cigar and join in.

Final Admonitions

In sum, know how things are supposed to be, and discuss it with other men. We could also think of this as sharing a vision of Godly masculinity in a community of Shalom, characterized by sanctified Headship marriages, emotionally healthy children, and all else that this entails.

Try not to think about progress because you cannot see the ripples as they expand out of sight. The progress is exponential as long as we are faithful to not stop pushing even though we might not see all the lives involved in God's plan.

It is enough to know our fellowship on this blog will have a part in bettering the lives of many people.

- Me, by giving me a forum to think and hash out ideas.
- My 2 sons because I will not let this hard-earned information stop with me.
- My brother because he sees the same things I do.
- My 2 nephews because my brother is becoming as committed as I am to telling them the truth about women. (That's 6 men in one family.)
- RedPillBoomer is spoonfeeding the Red Pill to the men around him.
- Cameron has 8 kids. I assume he teaches his daughters what being a good wife looks like, and his sons how to avoid any women that don't follow biblical patriarchy?
- In addition to all the regular commenters, we have about 200 regular readers here.

How many families will that add up to?

Another way to think about his is that God, in His omniscience, knew that men spread across the globe would have grave difficulty and hurt in their marriages. Through a maze of events, so personal and twisted, that our human minds could not follow, He brought us together on a blog and used that blog to change lives generationally.

The Holy Spirit works in ways we will never foresee.

Exit Question

A few readers have expressed an interest in meeting other readers IRL. Jack and I thought about how we could match up those readers who live closer to each other and give them a chance to meet, but it seems like much to ask and a little risky. So instead, we'll just ask readers who are interested in having a private email conversation with another reader to email Jack and he will pass your contact information along. After that, it will be up to people to be authentic with each other for a long enough period that trust can be built to a level that meeting in person is an

What is Spiritual Maturity?

If you were asked to describe or define spiritual maturity, what would come to your mind?

Some of the most common answers might include the following.

1. Being able to face reality.
2. Being responsible.
3. Not being in bondage to various fears and desires.
4. Knowing how to escape temptation and stay free from various idols, lusts, and sins.
5. Living life passionately, buoyantly, indomitably, one day at a time.
6. Being able to face ~~diversity~~ adversity with a sense of purpose, tenacity, and hope.
7. Maintaining healthy socio-emotional boundaries.
8. Being able to control one's emotions and express one's feelings appropriately and at the right time.
9. Managing anger and conflict appropriately, effectively, and in a timely manner.
10. Being able to foster transparent trust through non-judgmental acceptance of others.
11. Able to freely and sincerely give of one's self to others in friendship and love.
12. Living a clean, honest life, not giving the enemy any foothold, nor any friend a cause to stumble.
13. Being able to adjust to different kinds of environments and handle interactions with basically anyone in a tacit manner.
14. Cultivating a spirit of acceptance, generosity, gracefulness, kindness, and forgiveness, and not being consumed by greed, envy, and bitterness.
15. For men, making your mission, and not your woman, your priority. For women, making your husband and family, and not your hypergamy nor career ambitions, your priority.
16. For women, honoring, respecting, and obeying her husband. For men, loving and being patient with his wife.

Readers may add others.

How does Maturity compare to Godliness?

Readers may have noticed that this list of traits is very similar to the descriptors of Godliness given in a previous post, How is Godliness Attractive? (2021-09-01), and which are listed below. This is no coincidence, because Godliness is the equivalent of an advanced state of Spiritual Maturity. (Or is it?)

1. Having a thankful attitude.
2. Faith that is shown by trust and confidence.
3. Having a sufficient amount of self-discipline.
4. Able to draw proper boundaries in their relationships with others.
5. A degree of wisdom characterized by the discernment of good and evil.
6. Emotional and spiritual maturity; consideration for others desires and needs.
7. Having good, wholesome habits; cleanliness, regular exercise, proper diet, etc.
8. A healthy self-respect; acting appropriately and in congruence with the social context.
9. Manifesting fruits of the spirit; peace, patience, kindness, goodness, self-control, and so forth.
10. For men, focusing on their work, their mission. For women, cultivating a spirit of kindness, humility, and grace.
11. I will presume that men who are more masculine and women who are more feminine are more godly.
12. Knowing one's self; values, personality, personal desires, personal weaknesses, what is needed for one's spiritual growth…
13. A healthy ego characterized by a combination of an appropriate self-esteem and humility; not too arrogant, but not supercilious nor obsequious either.

Moral Agency

Since we know it is quite possible for a person to be mature but not Godly, there must be some points of difference between the two. I will suggest that the characteristics that set a Godly person apart from a mature person have to do with Moral Agency, Perseverance, Discernment, Wisdom, and Aptitude. Descriptions follow.

- Moral Agency – A person must have a clear sense of purpose for living, be doing something that he feels called by God to do, and have a cohesive vision for his life. In this sense, a person becomes an agent on a mission for God, and thereby possesses the capacity for moral agency.
- Perseverance – Maintaining a strong determination to forge your own character and identity in the crucible of life and overcome the challenges of life, rather than allowing one's feelings and circumstances to shape one's identity, purpose, and sense of self-worth. Exercising this discipline faithfully is what denotes one's success in being a moral agent.
- Discernment – Having an intuitive sense about what is right and wrong, especially concerning what would be conducive towards one's mission, and what fits one's interests as an agent on an individual mission.
- Wisdom – Being aware of when adhering to one's personal principles bring justice and discipline, and when making exceptions to those principles yields grace and truth.
- Aptitude – Having the necessary strength of character, station in life, and the relevant skills and abilities necessary to exercise said moral agency and execute one's purpose for living.

Since Agency must be determined by one's faith, this distinction adds a list of characteristics specific to maturity and Godliness.

1. The truth of God's Word is embraced and applied to all areas of one's life.
2. Living one's life by trusting the Lord in all areas of one's life. One clings to the Life in God, and not to one's expectations, money, personal rights, power, pride (ego fulfillment), principles, rules, standards, etc.
3. Having a vibrant prayer life.
4. Being able to discern good and evil, and truth from falsehood, and not becoming lost in the vanity of one's mind.
5. Able to exercise faith and wisdom.
6. Able to bear good fruit.

Ultimately, the fruit is the true litmus test of character.

Exit Questions

1. Is there really any difference between Spiritual Maturity and Godliness?
2. How is faith necessary for Maturity and/or Godliness?

If we think about this further, I believe we may find that we are confused about some of our concepts of Godliness, Maturity, and Agency.

Dealing with Discernment

Introduction

In a previous post, 8 Things that Increase Discernment (2021-06-25), we looked at the nature and importance of discernment, and how it enables wisdom, faith, trust, and certain elements of prosperity. In this post, I want to express what it is like to experience an increase in discernment.

In 2019-2020, I experienced a drastic increase in my spiritual discernment. Although readers might think this to be a good thing, in fact, this sudden information overload threw me into a quagmire of confusion.

This post will recount some of my thoughts, feelings, and experiences from this time, most of which is taken from my private journal. These passages are intended to convey some of the challenges and issues of confusion that arise from having a sudden increase in discernment, and are not intended to offer any rationally based doctrinal consistency.

Excerpts

I've been meeting Pastor Dan* about once a month for the past year. During our talks I've learned that discernment and wisdom go hand in hand, and based on James 1:5-8, he urged me to pray for more discernment. One of the first things God gave me was this verse about discernment.

> "[12] For though by this time you ought to be teachers, you need someone to teach you again the first principles of the oracles of God; and you have come to need milk and not solid food. [13] For everyone who partakes only of milk is unskilled in the word of righteousness, for he is a babe. [14] But solid food belongs to those who are of full age, that is, those who by reason of use have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil."
> Hebrews 5:12-14 (NKJV)

Seeing how I am a professor, this verse hit me in a raw place.

A young and precocious boy is ready to teach you about new theories.

This week, I have noticed an increase in my spiritual discernment. It's really hard to suddenly start sensing new things. One thing that is troubling me is the realization of how much I have missed out on in life as a result of not having any discernment. I no longer regret the things I used to regret, and instead, I have all these new regrets about things that I never imagined I would regret, many of which I didn't have much control over. For instance, I regret not calling my Dad on his birthday earlier this year, even though he could not have taken my call anyway, because he was on vacation. Why do I regret this?

Lately I've been writing a post about sanctification and defilement (2020-11-15). I've been studying defilement for almost two years now, so I understand it fairly well, but I'm discovering that I don't understand sanctification at all. I'm also struggling with understanding the basic concepts of adultery and marital fraud – I mean, everybody knows it's a sin "because the Bible says so", but why? How? Nobody can explain that. I know it's related to sanctification and defilement, but it's hard to see it clearly.

I mean, why does it appear so strongly to me, that Roosh's life of fornication was a necessary part of a long messy process that eventually led to his salvation? How does this glorify God? How can sin result in sanctification? If anyone makes any kind of statement to this effect, or puts their finger on the fact that many ex-PUAs have turned to God, then they are, more or less, condemned as a lawless heretic and excommunicated from nice Churchian society. Meanwhile, the proponents of purity have renounced their faith, women in the church are secretly selling their V card to the highest SMV bidder, and the holy roller incels are singing in the corner, reciting their scriptures, and then they go home to drain their aching balls on MILF p0rn. And we call this church! It just seems so obvious that Roosh was headed in the right direction, although this notion flies in the face of my understanding of scripture. I can't explain why, other than Roosh was creating a disturbance in The Force which drew a Cosmic reaction.

> [28] "But what do you think? A man had two sons, and he came to the first and said, Son, go work today in the vineyard.' [29] But he replied, 'I do not want to.' Yet afterward he regretted it and went. [30] And the man came to his second son and said the same thing; and he replied, 'I will, sir'; and yet he did not go. [31] Which of the two did the will of his father?" They said, "The first." Jesus said to them, "Truly I say to you that the tax > collectors and prostitutes will get into the kingdom of God before you."

> Matthew 21:28-31 (NASB)

…and PUAs.

Applying this same question to myself, why do I feel so certain that if I had engaged in more sexual experimentation when I was younger, then my spiritual maturity, faith, and confidence would be so much stronger now than it is? If these things were a necessary part of "hitting bottom" and "finding God", then why did I try so hard to avoid fornicating as much as I did? All my righteousness is but filthy rags. (Isaiah 64:6) This vexes me with regrets — not about wrongdoing, but about doing the right thing! This is too incredible! Maybe if I had the discernment back then that I have now, I would have willingly embraced the helpless state of my desire and ran that way. This troubles me, because I keep having the idea that my previous lack of discernment indicates that perhaps I am (or was?) not redeemed… or sanctified… or whatever. It's waaay too confusing for me to take it all in.

I've been praying for discernment for a while, and during this time, I'm starting to sense some things from people. At first, the "information" I got from this increased discernment made me angry, and I wasn't sure why. I prayed about this, and God told me that I'm having a crisis of faith. But I didn't understand what the crisis is about. But as my discernment continued to improve, I started to get some impressions that seemed to "fit" together with other experiences I had, and I was able to form some vague conclusions, like an abstract version of inductive reasoning. It's hard to put into words, but it's like I am more aware of people's spiritual constitution, and most of it is pretty ugly, although I cannot put my finger on why. It makes me not want to get very close to most people. But once in a while, I'll meet a person who has a "halo", for lack of a better description, and these people never fail to create a memorable impression on me. It is interesting to find that the people who have a "halo" don't seem aware of it, and apparently they don't subscribe to any sort of religious beliefs that would explain this. Some of them seem quite worldly according to my previous methods of estimation.

Pastor Dan* asked me what seems different since my discernment improved. I told him it's a lot easier to read people. I used to think that Christians were not much different from non-Christians, because their behavior is really not that much different. Only a few “super-Christians” really display real Christ-likeness, and I’ve only met a few people like this in my entire life. But lately, my discernment has been revealing people’s desire. It strikes me as appearing like a “halo” in my impression. They seem to “glow” with passion and joyful enthusiasm. These people seem glorified and alive, while other people are kind of dead on the inside. As for the latter, their mind is working, their mouths are talking, but there’s nothing happening on a deeper level. Nothing can switch on the headlights of their souls. It’s like I’m living in a zombie world, like what is so popular in movies and video games lately. So far, I haven’t been able to connect these observations to faith or Christianity, but I am guessing this has something to do with their relationship to God.

I am also grieving about my marriage, because my wife appears to be one of the zombies on speed. It’s like she is very emotionally alive, but all her swooning antics don’t create any perturbation in “The Force”. I never noticed this about her before, and seeing her this way now makes me very disappointed with her, and with marriage in general. I’ve begun to think I made a very poor choice in a wife, adding yet another regret to my repertoire. But at the time we got married, I had the sense that God was urging me to choose her. Now I doubt this, and I really don’t know why I had this idea. Was it just my sexual desire, or ego fulfilment? I can’t really say now, because everything seems so different.

> [29] So Jesus answered and said, “Assuredly, I say to you, there is no one who has left house or brothers or sisters or father or mother or wife or children or lands, for My sake and the gospel’s, [30] who shall not receive a hundredfold now in this time — houses and brothers and sisters and mothers and children and lands, with persecutions — and in the age to come, eternal life.”
> Mark 10:28-30 (NKJV); c.f. Matthew 19:29

Concluding Statements

As you can see from these excerpts, waking up to the awareness of a new spiritual dimension is a grand mal soul reset. This awareness creates a 5 dimensional frame with its own contexts and nuances through which all of life is viewed and is therefore experienced as a sublime yet grotesque reality. I always thought I understood these things, but after becoming acutely aware of certain metaphysical realities, I began to wonder how much of the spiritual aspect of reality I truly understood.

In my profession as a teacher, I often meet students who are afraid of asking a question because they are afraid to look stupid in front of their peers. Likewise, people who ask questions like, “What is sanctification?” or “Why is fornication a sin?”, may seem wholly ignorant or naïve on the surface. They might even seem like a troublemaker or a heretic. But on the other hand, if that person is experiencing a real time discernment of these matters, then it would be ignorant and naïve of us, even pharisaical, to scorn them to shame for their apparent stupidity. After all, they have a 5-D view, and may very well be on the threshold of the Kingdom.

Conflicts as Vectors of Life Lessons

I've had some email conversations with Deti, Jack, and Mike at Marriage, Sex, and More (NSFW). The discussions with these men have been very helpful, and between their insights and some honest self-evaluation, I saw a few areas that I needed to change in myself regarding my interactions with my wife. These areas are directly related to masculinity.

Here's one noteworthy change that I'll relate to our readers. Being the head, I don't argue with my wife at all, because what superior argues with their direct reports? I'll state expectations once, and she either complies or she does not, but I don't worry about her behavior even though I may have to take action to address it in the future. This alone has made for better interactions between us. I also don't ask anymore, I say what I want, I give instructions, or I act. For as headstrong and obstinate as she can be at times, she really hasn't given me any negative replies or real resistance. There are still times when it feels like my stomach is churning because the beta chump in me does not want to give up without a fight, but I'm working on putting that part of me in its place.

Jack covered this approach in a past study he did on Marital Conflict. He goes over an in-depth account of the psychology, and describes the interaction as making "bids" (the man invites positive attention from the wife) and making "demands" (the man makes requests for the wife to do something or change her actions). Jack came up with the idea of "demanding better responses to bids", and it appears that several readers have had tremendous success with this approach. Jack also reported a study from John Gottman that showed when the husband initiates more conflict than the wife, then the marriage improved over the long haul. When the wife initiated more conflict than the husband, then the opposite happened. I strongly urge all married men to carefully read through the posts on this subject, especially these three…

1. Σ Frame: Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (November 15, 2017)
2. Σ Frame: Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (February 15, 2018)
3. Σ Frame: How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (February 27, 2018)

Mike Davis' approach is very similar to this but he describes it in his own words. For example, instead of "bids" and "demands", he'll say something along the lines of "Men say what they want. It's up to her to comply, but if she doesn't, go about your business like it didn't really matter to you." It is the concept of bid and demand in action. Deti's approach is kind of the same way, except his wife is less submissive and more disorderly, so he ramps up the tension (usually with Dread Game) in order to induce some humility in her and give her a sense of security.

One of the areas that emailing with Mike showed me is the difference between dominant and domineering. My issue, because of the hurt and anger, is a propensity to move into domineering territory. Fighting the urge to argue a point helps me keep more in the dominant category, which helps my marriage.

To me, the difference between dominant and domineering is having what the 'sphere calls an outcome independence mindset. Mike and Deti both have this mindset, and Jack wrote a post about this too. Dominant is when you accept that she may not act the way you want her to, but you know that you will be fine no matter what she does. Domineering behavior comes from a place of fear that you will not be fine depending on her behavior, and so you do whatever you can to control the outcome in order to keep it all together. Being dominant is an expression of faith that God will handle everything, resulting in calm, assured confidence, whereas being domineering does not.

Lessons on Life and Marriage from Matthew 10

So what does all this have to do with Matthew 10 which is the chapter where Christ sends out the 12 disciples? The instructions Jesus gives them require behaviors and attitudes that draw from the blueprint for masculinity. I'll go over these aspects of masculinity in the remainder of this post.

Verses 5-6: Christ demonstrates what having a vision looks like. He clearly lays out the mission of what His ministry looks like. There is no doubt in the apostle's minds what they are to do, because in these verses Christ provides direct instruction for how to carry out the mission.

- Stay focused on the mission.
- Concentrate on helping your own people.
- Don't waste time and effort on nonessentials.
- Know the sheep from the wolves, and stick to your own kind.*
- Team up with those who share the same values, goals and modus operandi that you do, and who complement your abilities. Doing otherwise will limit your blessings.

These instructions require behaviors and attitudes that display characteristics of masculinity. The laying out of his vision and giving instructions to achieve it are what husbands are to do with their own families.

Verse 7: Telling people that the kingdom of heaven is at hand is a bold declaration of truth and commitment to truth that would draw the ire of the religious leaders of the day. Applying this to marriage requires husbands to boldly state the truth and offer encouraging words when appropriate.

Verse 8: Demonstrates an understanding of God's provision to us through helping those God puts in our lives to help. Think of the confidence you would need to have to raise the dead, heal terminal illness or tell demons to leave and expect them to obey. One might even call this irrational. In marriage, a husband should have this kind of confidence and faith, doing what he can to improve the quality and spiritual vitality of his family foremost, but also others who cross his path of life.

Verses 9-10: Leaving on a journey without provisions requires outcome independence that only exists when there is confidence and trust in God's provision. As a husband you are the spiritual head of your family and headship starts and ends with trust in God.

Verses 11-13: In these verses, Jesus gives the apostles the standards they are to enforce and the means by which to enforce them. They were to evaluate people for worthiness to the vision and mission. Those that met the standard were to receive the peace Jesus gave the apostles to share. Those that did not meet the standard and those that rejected God's message of His kingdom were be left for judgement. This is a basic overview of evaluating the marriage potential of a woman against your vision. Knowing your standards and withdrawing your blessing (attention in the case of marriage) are also tactics for a husband to manage his wife's willingness to work towards the objective of his vision.

Going further, these instructions can be applied to child rearing as well. The inherent lessons applicable to children would be…

- Maintain good standards and habits.
- Associate with those of good repute.
- Build rapport with friends and classmates.
- Draw appropriate boundaries and withdraw from those who don't respect your boundaries or treat you right.
- Choose your friends wisely, those you can trust.
- Be appreciative and respectful to those who teach, guide, and support you.
- Don't behave in ways that would create topics for gossip or bring shame to yourself or the family.
- Stay where you are supposed to be. Do your best in the place where you are.
- Finish what you start. Move on to the next task when the previous work is finished.

The need for this instruction points back to the importance of fathers displaying masculine traits in the home.

Father and daughter relaxing on a rocky beach by the sea and having time together.

Verses 14-15: If people under your care won't follow you, then leave them to their own devices. Let them learn the hard way if that's how it goes. This is the outcome independence that comes from knowing God is in control. It also shows that not everyone can or wants to be helped and that we have to be comfortable with that fact.

Verses 16-20: These verses are calls for wisdom and outcome independence with regards to staying on mission. The idea that anything could happen to you for staying on mission but that you will know what to do when the time comes, again, points to confidence and faith in God.

Verses 21-23: The apostles knew that they would head into circumstances that would lead to conflict, but they went anyway. Staying the course for what is right even when it is not easy or convenient is a generally masculine trait. Moving on from people who do not help you towards your vision is a means of setting and holding those boundaries necessary for accomplishing a long-term objective.

Verses 24-25: These verses portray a hierarchy of authority. The students and servants are not above their teachers and masters and the members of the household follow its head. This corresponds to Headship in marriage. I have seen my own family follow in my reactions, where my short temperedness and irritability shows up in them. I have also seen where my happiness feeds into their own happiness and helps them when they are struggling. Basically, "Happy king, Happy kingdom." This conveys the importance of having a Godly wife.

Verses 26-31: These verses show us the boldness the disciples were to do their work with, which is a very masculine trait, and that they were to do so without fear of consequences. We also see the reason why we as men can act without fear of the outcome, namely that God controls the world down to things as insignificant as the life of a sparrow or the number of hairs on our heads. (A moment of candor, if God controls how many hairs are on my head and can sustain trillions of stars in the sky, does he really have to make the counting easier using my scalp?) Jesus is basically telling them there is a plan that the Almighty set in motion. It could be tough, but you do not have to fear. If I were to apply this to our world today, it would be to say, "Men, act and speak confidently and boldly because it is who God made you to be in His image. Don't worry about the outcome, because God won't let anything happen to you that is not in His plan, down to knowing which of your hairs were going to fall out on your pillow last night."

 Concerning Matthew 10:6, fellow blogger W. J. Tychonievich wrote an interesting post that sheds light on the identity of the lost sheep of Israel.*

Conclusions

Correctly understanding your value as a man is so important.

Men who grew up in a converged or progressive church are not very well aware of how the Bible is an authority on masculine traits. But when you become aware of the nature of masculinity, and those traits associated with it (through taking the Red Pill), then you can see that those traits show up throughout scripture. In this post, I've only covered one chapter in the Bible, and we see that a plethora of masculine traits are shown in the commands Jesus gives the disciples before sending them out.

This suggests that the core of masculinity has elements of trusting God's provision in many aspects of life, including resources (go out without any money), shelter (staying at the home of someone you just met), and trusting God with what to say. Outcome independence is the term for trusting God with your life, knowing that whatever happens is of His doing for your ultimate benefit.

Similarly, PUA tactics are all based on mirroring concepts of dominant masculinity and male sexual authority that are reminiscent of Headship. But instead of moving towards a life's vision, their ends are more carnal in nature. The Christian Manosphere concentrates on those true aspects of masculinity that have been forgotten within churchianity, and attempts to avoid the spiritual pitfalls that secular authors ride through roughshod in their pursuit of a score. For example, secular Red Pill authors have stated that you need to be totally self-sufficient, have a "backup plan" of some sort, and you have to "stop caring" in order to achieve outcome independence. This approach might appear the same on the outside, but this kind of comprehension is missing the element of faith.

How do the things I discussed in the first section (e.g. “bids”, making “demands”, outcome independence, etc.) tie in with the lessons from Matthew 10?

While Jack and I were examining every verse in light of masculine traits, it was hard not to get sidetracked by delving into tactics instead of masculine characteristics. We decided to focus on traits, and let readers discover more about the tactics on their own. You’re welcome to discuss tactics in the comments.

To give readers a clue, RP tactics are based off of masculine traits. Deti started a long discussion of this in his comment the other day about the importance of knowing one’s value and worth. Man has vision. He keeps that vision as his primary objective. Not putting up with activities/people that don’t support that vision creates man’s frame. Man holds frame by enforcing the boundaries he puts in place so that he can stay on mission.

It’s all, in one way or another, a display of dominant, masculine traits.

Case Study: Wife Demands Perfect Love

My wife and I had a long argument one morning.* The meat and potatoes of the argument involved two blog posts that we shared with each other the night before.

First, I shared this post with her:

Finer Femininity: The wife desired senses what is needed (2021 February 5)

Then she shared this post with me:

First Cry Parenting: How to be a good husband to keep your marriage happy (2019 February 14)

I won't go into the article from First Cry here, except to say that is filled with feminist Blue Pill ideals. (It's actually quite difficult to find anything Based online.)

In summary of the conversation with my wife, she had the idea that unless I did everything described in the First Cry post, I wasn't really loving her. I knew this was a false, even outlandish claim. I knew even if I did everything in that post flawlessly, she would still find other things to be discontented with. But she insisted that it would make her happy.

I asked her how she would feel if I said she didn't really love me unless she did everything in the Finer Femininity post I shared with her. She got angry and said she couldn't and she wouldn't. I responded, "You refuse to even try! So is it right for me to say that you don't really love me?" She became confused and didn't respond.

I told her, "Those articles describe two dichotomous ideals, but reality is far from either ideal. People are not perfect. Everyone has some shortcomings. Love doesn't begin when the ideal has been reached [as she believed]. Love begins at the point where we embrace the fact that reality fails to match the ideal."

This was a shocker for her and she went ballistic. But after she sat on this idea for a while (a few hours), she began to accept the truth of it. When she finally did, she felt very sorry for herself.

Since this event,* her expectations have become a little more realistic, and her attitude has improved somewhat. From a wider viewpoint, this discussion had put a crack in her Fairy Tale notions of love and marriage, which was somewhat tragic, but also remedial – and necessary for sanctification.

Looking back on this, I saw that this occasion was not just one, but two answered prayers.

1. A guy in my men's group had recently prayed for my wife to love me more.
2. I had been praying to understand the purpose of the Covenant Law more clearly.

Next, I'll discuss what (2) means.

Love as described by Covenant Law

One of the reasons why the Covenant Law is important is because it points out how we cannot reach God's ideal, but it also reveals God's love. To explain this, I'll begin with an insightful description of love from 1st Corinthians 13.

> [1] Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I have become sounding brass or a clanging cymbal. [2] And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge, and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, but have not love, I am nothing. [3] And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, but have not love, it profits me nothing.

> [4] Love suffers long and is kind; love does not envy; love does not parade itself, is not puffed up; [5] does not behave rudely, does not seek its own, is not provoked, thinks no evil; [6] does not rejoice in iniquity, but rejoices in the truth; [7] bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things.
> [8] Love never fails. But whether there are prophecies, they will fail; whether there are tongues, they will cease; whether there is knowledge, it will vanish away. [9] For we know in part and we prophesy in part. [10] But when that which is perfect has come, then that which is in part will be done away.
> [11] When I was a child, I spoke as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things. [12] For now we see in a mirror, dimly, but then face to face. Now I know in part, but then I shall know just as I also am known.
> [13] And now abide faith, hope, love, these three; but the greatest of these is love.

Happy young couple having fun outdoors.

Looking at this chapter from an introspective viewpoint, we can observe the following implications.

Verses 1-3: There is no skill set to be had, no threshold of perfection that must be met, nor any standard of performance that must be reached before one can make the effort to love and be loved. To reach for these things instead of directly embracing the challenges of love amounts to chasing after the Old Covenant at best, or Pharisaical Legalism at worst. The Law of the New Covenant invites us to love God, our neighbors, and our spouses, and this love begins in the here and now.

Verses 4-7: These are good things for husbands to remember when faced with the difficult task of loving their wives. (See Ephesians 5:25, Ephesians 5:28, and Colossians 3:19.) Furthermore, when a husband instructs his wife to offer better responses to his bids, he is inviting her to engage with him in a manner that better represents a loving interaction according to the New Covenant. It seems that most women need to be constantly, gently, and firmly reminded of this.

Verses 8-12: Apparently, practicing the Covenantal Law of Love contributes towards our spiritual maturity. These verses also suggest that prophecy and special knowledge (e.g. Red Pill lore) are required to deal with those who are spiritually immature. (The word “Perfect” in verse 10 refers to spiritual maturity in a person.)

Verse 13: Faith, Hope, and Love are the troika of Christian Living.

Similar to my wife's expectations of love and marriage, the Covenant Law is like an ideal that is impossible to attain.* We cannot love our neighbor perfectly. We cannot even love God perfectly. Meanwhile, real life is a totally different world. Feministic ideologies encroach our sense of masculine domain and authority, and nasty people test our wits and our patience on a daily basis. Moreover, people are not perfect. Everyone has some shortcomings. But love doesn't begin when the ideal has been reached (as my wife believed, and some religious folks think). If we work and wait for perfection, then we'll always be discontented and frustrated. Love begins at the point where we embrace the fact that reality fails to match the ideal, and this is because humility is a key ingredient in experiencing and exchanging love.

Secular culture describes this collision with reality as "coming to terms with one's self" or "getting a grip on life". Evangelical Christians believe this point of transformation begins with repentance and forgiveness. Ed Hurst has written for years about how renewal happens when people begin to embrace Covenant Law, and I am coming to see things the same way, because "coming to terms" might help one learn to navigate through life, repentance and forgiveness may stop the (relation)ship from sailing in the wrong direction, but these are not enough to turn the ship around to head(ship) in the right direction. We must know the coordinates of life that are defined by the Covenant Law and head(ship) in that direction.

 People from different faith backgrounds may view Covenant Law differently. Someone with an Arminian background may consider the Covenant Law to be like a standard to strive towards. Someone from a Calvinistic background might see it as a standard to be judged by. But the bottom line is that either way you look at it, we cannot not match the standard. Arminian thinkers must explore the extent to which God is willing to exercise His sovereignty, and must grapple with the question of whether people are truly free to choose (i.e. not knowing the choice that will be made because, let's face it, if the perfect and all powerful God knows what you'll choose ahead of time it's not really a choice). Calvinist thinkers have to deal with the question of why, if God is sovereign and planned everything out, are we still culpable for certain consequences of sin? But the answers to all of these questions can be found in one's willingness to love in the present moment.*

Different Perspectives of Love

A man wants a woman to offer herself — her affections, her youthful beauty, her fertile body, her passionate enthusiasm, her time, and her feminine intuitions — to lend service to his life purpose. In fact, a man who holds this expectation of a woman, which is similar to what is described by Finer Feminity (which I conveyed to my wife in the case study above), is not in disagreement with the archetype of femininity described in the Biblical Covenant. But unfortunately for too many women, this is the last thing to enter their minds. It just doesn't stack up to women's expectations of romantic love from boyfriends, dutiful provision and protection from husbands, or the intense Tingling heat from Chads. Hence, the Feminine Christian Marriage Quadrilemma.

For example, we are used to hearing women say things like, "He should love me the way I am!" and "If you can't accept me at my worst, then you don't deserve my best!" But at no point will they ever admit that their attitude and behavior is unacceptable and that they cannot measure up to the Covenant standard (gentle, modest, pure, quiet spirit, respectful, submissive, etc. See 1st Peter 3:1-6 and Ephesians 5:33). That would require humility, you see.

When my wife demanded that I should treat her like what is described in the First Cry post, she intended this as a request for me to express more love to her. But I knew that if I had done so, it would not have had the desired effect to make her feel loved. So instead, I pressed my wife for a response to my request for her to be more aware of my needs (according to the Finer Femininity post). By doing so, I was able to elicit a confession from her that she could not measure up. (She said, "I can't, and I won't!") Although she intended this statement to be a refusal, in fact, it was a confession that ushered her into a repentance. The way I expressed love to her was to make her aware of her confusion about her expectations of love, and guide her towards a repentance. Afterwards, she did begin to feel loved, and she expressed this to me by loving me more in return.

A similar dynamic happens with men, but from the opposite extreme. This may be due to a misunderstanding and misapplication of love, as described in 1 Corinthians 13. Christian men and women alike consider the behavior described in 1 Corinthians 13 to be reminiscent of the proverbial "Nice Guy" (c.f. Robert Glover's book) which we know can never score any points in life. Christian love has the "nice guy" image partly because a works mentality is assumed by those who don't know God very well and also because they have some sort of covert contract with God or with their partner, thereby becoming a modern example of prodigal son's older brother – a legalistic Pharisee. That is, people think that God and/or a spouse should reward virtuous behavior with blessings, attention, or sex, respectively, and misdemeanors with punishment, so they work their @sses off in order to avoid the consequences of their sin and to build a better life for themselves. But that's just not how it works. (The Book of Job dispels this false myth.) As a result, men are doing backflips to accommodate women's bad behaviors (usually in the hope of getting laid).

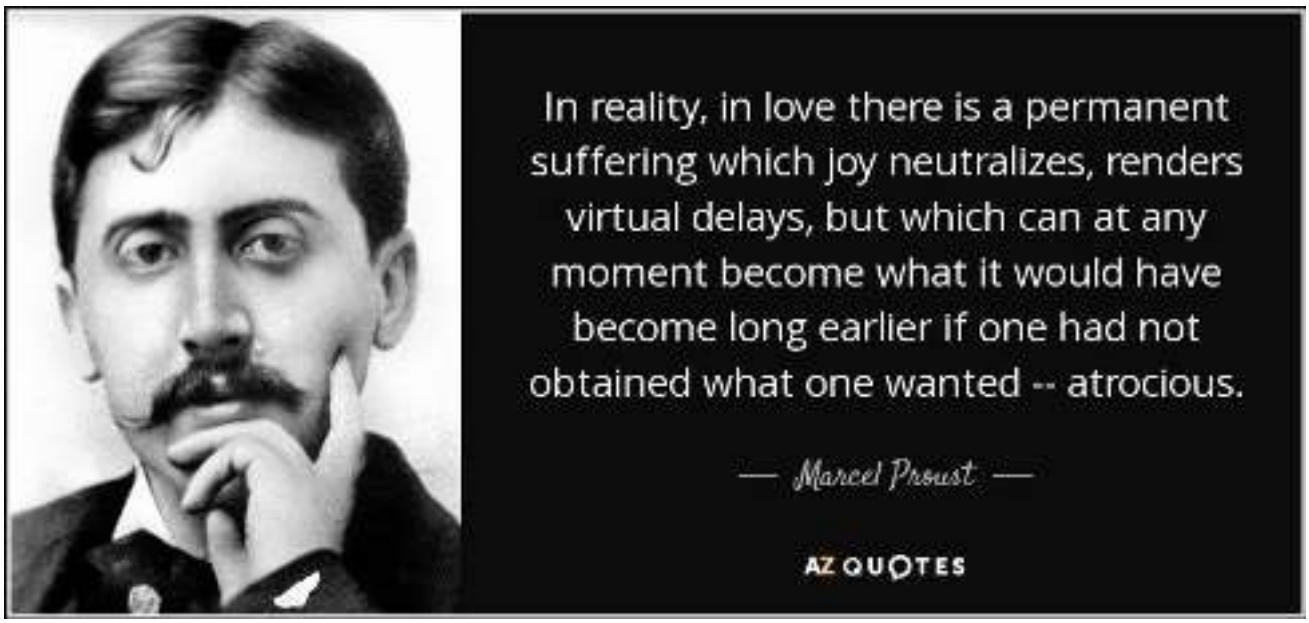
Acrobatic young man backflipping in field of sunflowers. Slow Motion Insanity.

The point is, men might behave in loving ways, according to 1 Corinthians 13, but these actions are not perceived nor received as love by the wife. The reason is because these men will never admit that their effeminate concepts of "love", characterized by a simping attitude and pedestalizing behaviors are unacceptable to God and to women as well, and that they cannot measure up to an authoritative Headship role. In other words, it's not their actions that are wrong, it is their faith in their God ordained masculine authority and the accompanying frame of mind that are missing. By focusing on these false concepts of love and authority, many other virtuous traits are neglected and fall into disuse, or are never developed in the first place.

These false images of Christ, Christian love, Covenant authority, and masculinity are where Christianity has gone wrong.

It's quite common for western men to think this way, given decades of feminist indoctrination, but this notion does not originate from feminist culture nor even bad church doctrine. It originates from the fallen mind's desire to orchestrate our own lives. So to some extent, we all have to watch for this tendency in ourselves — to think that following the rules obligates God to reward us in certain ways according to our conveniences, desires, pleasures, or preferences. In addition, too often it is assumed that the rewards will be financial, temporal, and/or carnal in nature, instead of the power that comes of fitting ourselves into the Covenant archetype and finding joy in pleasing our creator.

This is a shocker for men, especially Christian men who are familiar with 1st Corinthians 13, and who have the idea that if they just "love" (viz. worship and obey) their wives more, then their wives will magically reform themselves into sexy monogamous Proverbs 31 ex-bimbos! But women just don't function this way, and men don't know what to do about this because they won't embrace the Covenant standard for men, or worse, condemn it as misogynistic. Some men cannot accept the truth of this idea even after many years of marriage. When they finally take the Red Pill, it only comes after a devastating heartbreak and/or fiscal ruin. They have to hit bottom before they know which way is up. (Me included.)



Concluding Statements

Why are those ideals expressed in the two blog articles cited at the beginning important? Those articles express ideals that we can strive to attain, and also which reveal our shortcomings and weaknesses, and our need for love and grace. However, the article from Finer Femininity is closer to God's Covenant Law, and is therefore a better ideal to strive for. But the bottom line is that we cannot ever match the ideal (either one, really), and that is where love begins. We begin to receive God's love and grace when we face our weaknesses and shortcomings. We trample the grace of God when we deny them or refuse to admit that we cannot measure up.

As I wrote earlier, love begins at the point where we embrace the fact that reality fails to match the ideal. We must then follow through by adapting to the relational structure outlined in the Covenant Law.

Here's a simple way to sum up all the cognitive dissonance about love:

1. The worldly ideal of love is focused on what one gets out of the transaction (For women, e.g. protection, provision, status, Tingles, etc.; For men, e.g. sex.) Of note, the Covert Contract is a transactional view of what one gets out of the interaction. It might be accompanied by loving behaviors, but the contractual context displaces the discernment necessary to employ wisdom in the interaction, and thereby destroys the delivery of the message.
2. The Covenant ideal of love is focused on what one gives towards encouraging the other person's growth towards maturity (For women, e.g. childrearing, companionship, help in various ways, a quiet heart, respect, sex, submission, etc.; For men, e.g. direction, guidance, protection, provision, purpose, etc.)

With these differences in perspective in mind, it becomes clear why worldly minded people misinterpret the nature of Christ as described in 1 Corinthians 13 as a weakness, and how the Covert Contract (or a similar mentality) transforms gestures of love into pedestalization.

Applying Deep Strengths list of vetting qualifications, Scott's axiom, and Deti's techniques are quite helpful. However, these are merely adaptations to the current malaise, and won't necessarily lead to successful (i.e. sanctified) marriages and families. We need more than these tactics and strategies. We need to embrace the Covenant Law and the authority of Headship that it grants.

So if you are dealing with a person who is entirely focused on what he/she gets out of your relationship, and who never gives a thought to how they enhance or contribute to your life, then you are dealing with a selfish worldly person. You may want to reconsider how much of yourself you wish to invest in this person.

Likewise, if we are only thinking about a relationship in terms of what we can get out of it, or if we are making a lot of "loving" efforts with the expectation of getting something in return, then we need to reorient our desires to align with the Covenant Law in order to get into the correct frame of mind in which we can recognize the potential for synergy. Instead of lingering in a subjective poverty mentality and/or a works mentality, exercise discernment to detect the superposed synergy that the two of you could achieve. Making this paradigm shift will change the realm of possibilities that we are able to perceive.

Exit Questions

Some questions arise from this, which I'll pose here.

1. What does Covenant Law mean to the reader?
2. What does Covenant Law mean in the context of romantic love and marriage?
3. Why would we not experience/feel/recognize Covenant Law as God's love?
4. Does this mean that husbands should anticipate wives to fail in exercising agency, and arrange reservations or make a Plan B in the event that she does?
5. If a wife is insufficiently mature enough to exercise moral agency, does this mean that husbands should employ prophecy (e.g. expounding on Biblical principles and how they are applied), and/or knowledge (e.g. Red Pill theory, "Married Game" techniques) to keep their wives in line and feeling loved? Is this what love would require in this case?
6. Should men who take the Red Pill feel sorry for their past Blue Pill selves? On one hand, true repentance is necessary, but on the other hand, excessive self-pity is not helpful for moving on.

On the Discernment of Desire

Spiritual growth requires facing one's desires and countering one's fears with faith.

Intro

In a previous post, Dealing with Discernment (2021/9/17), I recounted a number of thoughts, feelings, and impressions I had after experiencing an increase in discernment. Such impressions are not very well subject to rational criticism on the basis of doctrinal consistency. Instead, these impressions were intended to convey some of the challenges and issues of confusion that arise from having a sudden increase in discernment. I had another impression which I did not cover in that post but will cover here. I must emphasize that this particular issue caused me years of confusion, and a few trips through hell and back.

Discernment Increases Desire

All my life, I had had the impression that desire was an antagonist to faith, obedience, and contentment. Every book I read on Christian Living, every sermon I heard, only reinforced this belief.

When I was ~25-28 years old and in graduate school (ca. 1997-2000), I experienced some discernment of the nature I described in last week's post and more as follows. As I noted in last week's post, the experience is profoundly confusing and deeply troubling.

One of the things I experienced when my discernment started to improve (which I did not include in last Friday's post), is that I felt intense desire. It was so intense that it made me feel impulsive, self-centered, and childish.

In addition to the challenge of facing my desires, I also felt more sexually aroused, and it seemed like I faced intense temptation everywhere I went. Every time I went out in public, I was getting IOI's from women.* Also, I felt like my ability to resist this temptation was considerably reduced. I felt like my sexuality had a life of its own, and I was uncomfortable with this because it made me feel vulnerable. Sometimes I was afraid to leave the house because I didn't know what might happen. But even then, women would come knocking on my door, and if I let them in, sooner or later they revealed an expectation of sexual relations. Some of them were quite forward in their suggestiveness, taking off their clothes and/or inviting me to the bedroom.

I thought that this increased temptation and a perceived reduction of self-control indicated that I was going the wrong direction in my spiritual life. In other words, I thought I was "backsliding". So because I didn't really know what was happening to me, I rejected the whole spiritual posture of discernment and "ran the other way" within my internal nous paradigm.

Desire is a Sign of Life

20 years and two marriages later, I went to see my pastor to discuss conflict in my marriage (ca. 2018). My pastor was a Buddhist before he became a Christian, and he told me that I was essentially a Buddhist. I was surprised to hear this, because I grew up in a Baptist church and I never had any interest in Buddhism. I asked him why he thought so. He said that my view of desire was a fundamental Buddhist belief — that desire must be controlled, contained, and eliminated if possible, in order to achieve inner peace. In other words, Comfortably Numb.

Over the following months of counseling, I experienced an increase of discernment (ca. 2019-2020) as I mentioned in last week's post. Similar to what I had experienced in graduate school, I felt strong desire, endured a lot of temptation, more impulsive, self-centered, childish, lower self-control, and so on. But instead of recognizing these changes as evidence of "backsliding", my pastor helped me see that I was "coming alive", and this naturally induced an awareness of the fragility of life, manifested as an internal sense of insecurity and a fear of wrongdoing.

> [3] [Jesus] said, "Truly I say to you, unless you change and become like children, you will not enter the kingdom of heaven. [4] So whoever will humble himself like this child, he is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven.

In addition to my pastor telling me this profound interpretation of my internal state, during my quiet moments, I felt that God was saying to me, "What do you want? Try Me. Ask Me." When faced with this question, I realized that I didn't really know what I wanted, because I had made a lifelong habit of micromanaging all my desires in order to force myself into conforming to what I thought was right behavior. After sitting on this question for a while, I found that I was afraid to ask God for anything, because I thought it would not turn out the way I expected, or in some cases, that it would turn out the way I expected. I was stuck in a mindset of frustration, and I realized that I didn't trust God as much as I had always believed.

It took me a long while to learn that desire is an intrinsic part of discernment, and to accept the fact that this desire is not evil — it is a sign of life! Furthermore, I couldn't keep avoiding the problem of desire; I had to accept this and deal with it. I had to integrate my desires into my persona, examine the motivations and consequences, trust

God with whatever I find, and thereby become authentic in my self-expression. I needed to allow my desire to manifest and undergo this process of refinement through God's discipline, and come under the authority of the Holy Spirit. By going through this crucible of faith, I am one step closer to finding an authentic exercise of authority in my life, my home, and my marriage.

Moreover, I was wrong in my self-assessment earlier in life. Now, I understand that the reaction I took in graduate school was essentially the equivalent of clinging to foolishness, and I regret rejecting discernment because of my confusion and lack of self-awareness in terms of how God works in the life of a believer. This was a repentance that took a long time in coming. (~20 years!)

 I don't know if some spiritual quality related to my discernment was what attracted those IOI's or if this state of heightened sensitivity simply made me aware of them. Readers may wish to explore this question in the comments.*
 The opposite of discernment and the wisdom that accompanies it, is foolishness by Biblical definition. Knowing this now and looking back, it is not surprising that my faith didn't mature very much during this time.*

Life is borne out of Desire

NovaSeeker and I addressed this kind of experience in the post, Viewpoints on Man's Confusion about How God Works in the Life of a Believer (2021/3/29). NovaSeeker wrote,

> "…the central Christian concept of sin and grace is that one's prodigality is a function of one being alive."

This is the "ugly" part of the gospel that no one ever talks about. Nobody will explain this because of the obvious implications, and it's really difficult to talk or write about this without hearing accusations of "lawlessly usurping grace", or being branded hedonistic or even heretical. I am sure this vacuum of teaching on the subject is exactly why I never realized this fundamental aspect of faith and the gospel until late in life.

Satan and his minions take advantage of this vacuum by presenting desire as a dark, forbidden, secret, sin-drenched pleasure, something far from holiness. But this is not the entire truth. Desire is as much related to holiness as it is to sin. In fact, one way to define sin is anything that kills a desire that would otherwise be used to glorify God in its expression, and provide a vehicle of inspiration to a life of holiness. Satan recognizes that he can deter people from living a life of holy desire by overemphasizing the sin aspect and playing on people's fear of sin, guilt, and shame.

In a sense, Satan is correct in saying that desire is evil. All of our actions, even those we think of as being upright and good, are actually tainted with sin to the point of being a stench to God. However, this is the basis for the absolute beauty of the gospel. I missed the fullness of this beauty until the Holy Spirit moved my heart to realize that being dead in sin really means what it says. We are in a lifeless state, unable to do anything of our own volition to seek God which means that it is God, as the good shepherd, who seeks His lost sheep. It means that the gift is bestowed on us even though all we do in life is tainted with sin. While we are frustrated by how easily we fall into our sin and by how much we actually like it, because God is the one who calls us and because His promises are good, we don't have to bear the ultimate burden of our performance. This is simultaneously the most humbling and freeing concept in existence. There is nothing ugly about it.

This misaligned concept of desire and the accompanying fear of sin is firmly entrenched within Christian circles and doctrines. It is reinforced by Biblical passages, and backed with sound reason. But thinking primarily in terms of sin rather than glorification would indicate that fear, guilt, or shame remains outstanding. To be honest, it is too easy to focus on the fear, "What if I sin…?", and the resulting shame and ignominy, and cling to this fear so firmly that one neglects the opposing aspect of "What if I could find a new Life in Christ?" Ultimately, we choose to cling to our fears, rather than seeking out and developing the Life that our faith in Christ might deliver ourselves.

Coming to embrace the fact that desire is a fundamental feature of human nature, and facing desire within ourselves as men, is quite insightful, even liberating. We should accept our desires and urges as being God given and good. The misapplication of those desires is what we should reject as this is sinful. Most people have not internalized what this means for their lives and because of this, they misunderstand the gospel.

As for desire, I am convinced that desire in men is natural and good. Seeing a nearly naked woman on the beach can stoke that desire, which is a natural reaction, but as long as I don't start imagining ways to obtain that woman (covetousness aspect of lust), this is part of life as a man that I now accept. If we were to, correctly, I believe, address lust as a sin of coveting that which is not yours instead of defining it as sexual desire, we'd be more aligned with scripture and with how God created us. To covet is a sin of actively trying to possess someone else's belonging(s), whether that is in thought or deed, not of admiring that belonging.

BTW, in my previous post, I mentioned that I regretted many things, mostly opportunities in life. In comprehending the phrase, "I regret missing out on opportunities", some readers might think I am referring to opportunities to indulge myself in various forms of debauchery and sin. No, I mean I regret missing out on the opportunities to develop my confidence / faith / trust and humility, to find a full life in Christ sooner in life, and having the discernment to recognize and make better choices in life.

What does it mean to be Obedient?

In the post cited above, NovaSeeker described the Eastern Orthodox perspective on this issue, which I found to be inspiring. (Coming from an evangelical background, I had never known that a major Christian sect addressed this topic from a doctrinal viewpoint.)

> "The Eastern Orthodox perspective on dealing with the archetypical problems of "prodigal" and "non-prodigal" is to avoid both by cultivating holiness instead."

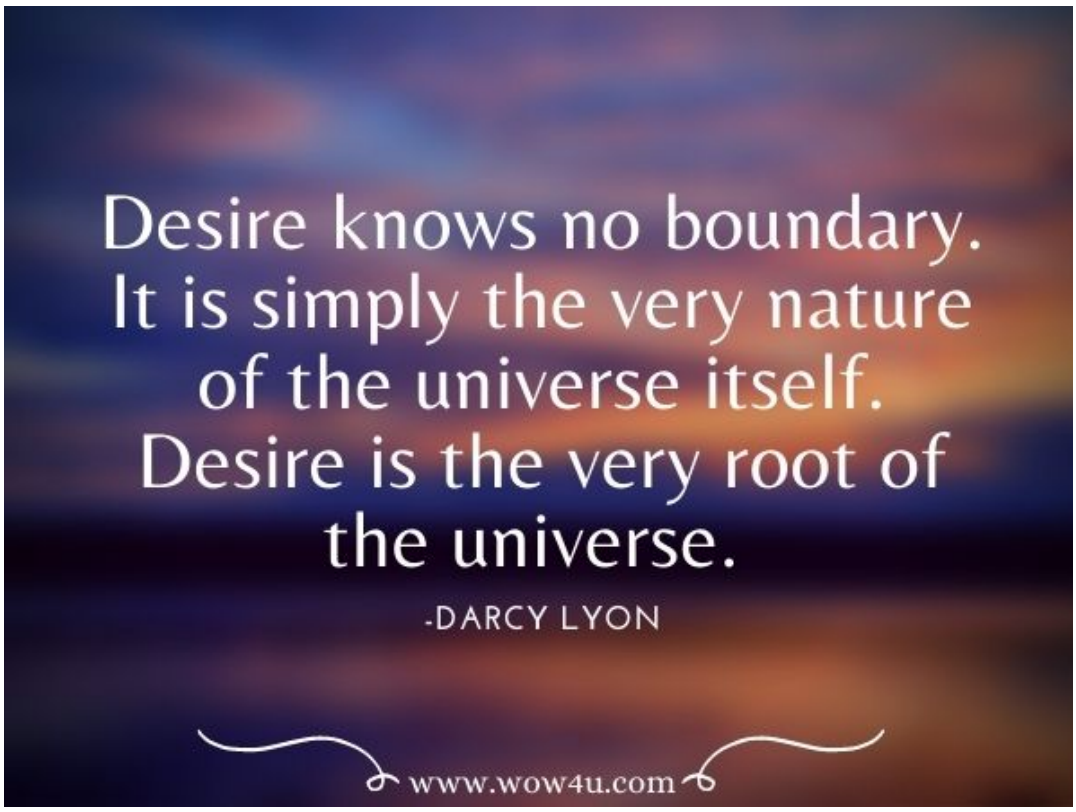
Protestant ministers would phrase this as, "You need to love God more." But because of my faith background, I had always assumed that "loving God more" meant to be "more obedient", according to John 14:15.

> [15] "If you love Me, you will obey My commandments.

Looking back, I see that my misinterpretation of obedience was based on the Protestant concept of obedience as consisting primarily of conscious acts of the will. The role of the Holy Spirit (concerning obedience in this case) is not emphasized in Protestant doctrines and sermons. But reading on, we find that the Holy Spirit is mentioned specifically.

> [16] I will ask the Father, and He will give you another Helper who will be with you forever. [17] That helper is the Spirit of Truth. The world cannot accept Him, because it doesn't see or know Him. You know Him, because He lives with you and will be in you.

As I became more familiar with "allowing" myself to experience the increased desire and temptation that accompanied my discernment, I realized that the worst of my fears never came to pass. Just as verses 16-17 state, whenever I was in such a situation, there was like an "envelope" around me that kept those things from happening. And it wasn't just me — my personality, or any effort on my behalf to create personal boundaries. People (i.e. women) were overjoyed to be around me, but somehow, they knew there was some boundary there that must be observed if they were to continue to enjoy my fellowship. I can only conclude that this is the power of the Holy Spirit.



In the previously cited post, NovaSeeker goes on to describe the practice of holiness.

> "In Eastern Orthodox spiritual practice, a great emphasis is placed on the practice of vigilance or watchfulness ("nepsis" following 1st Peter 5:8), which involves maintaining a stance of alertness and attentiveness to one's thoughts and the focus of one's "nous" (described below) so as to avoid patterns / strands / chains / cycles of thought that can lead, eventually, to strongholds of bondage and/or difficult temptations to sin in various ways, which run the gamut from sins of pride, to avarice, to greed, to lust, to anger, and the like. All of these begin with thoughts, and with the help and grace of the Spirit, we can get better over time at identifying the kinds of thoughts and thought chains / dynamics that lead to them (e.g. buying into false narratives, deception, denial of the truth, dishonesty, false convictions, fear, idolatry, insecurity, lying, psychological displacement, psychological dissociation, psychological projection, shame, solipsism, etc.)."

An increase in discernment, which is absolutely necessary for one to attain spiritual maturity, requires us to face our innermost desires, and this naturally involves the intensification of desire and temptation. Yes, when desire manifests there is perhaps a greater possibility for certain kinds of sin to occur. But we must learn to trust that the likelihood of sin actually occurring is controlled by the Holy Spirit. The fear of sin must be squelched, because by faith, we believe Christ has overcome sin and the grave. The fear of trusting God with the outcome must be contained, because by faith, we believe Christ loves us and will see us through.

> "But without faith it is impossible to please Him, for he who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek Him."
> Hebrews 11:6 (NKJV)

Introduction

This month's theme has been about Faith and Maturity, and readers have probably noticed that I spilled a lot of virtual ink talking about abstract ideals, godliness, love, and especially discernment, and how small adjustments in the approach of these things can affect our lives. To be honest, the outcome of postings for this month are different from the schedule of topics that I had planned, and this is because I gained some new insights as the discussion progressed, and so I shifted the content focus in order to better cover the ideas that were revealed to me/us.

Clearing Up the Confusion about Discernment

A reader sent me an email to ask about discernment. He writes,

> "First, I really have enjoyed reading about your experience and your thoughts [On the Discernment of Desire (2021-09-24)], but I can't help but bristle/cringe at the use of discernment as the word used to describe things. Maybe it's a knee-jerk reaction to the word and it's use in an evangelical/churchianity context, but it really rubs my fur the wrong way. According to the dictionary, discernment is just good judgement, but that's not really how it gets used in Christian contexts. Well, not how I react to it."

The reader has correctly identified the confusion surrounding the term. People think discernment is something akin to judgment, and the English dictionary affirms this notion. But the Christian concept of discernment is not related to judgment. It has nothing to do with decision making or legal jurisprudence. Discernment is NOT a faculty of the mind as it is presumed to be by people, including most Christians. It is a sense of awareness in one's heart and soul. If the Bible speaks of faith to the ears of our heart, then discernment informs our faith through the eyes of our heart. This analogy gives new meaning to Ephesians 1:17-19 (NASB), where the Apostle Paul prays…

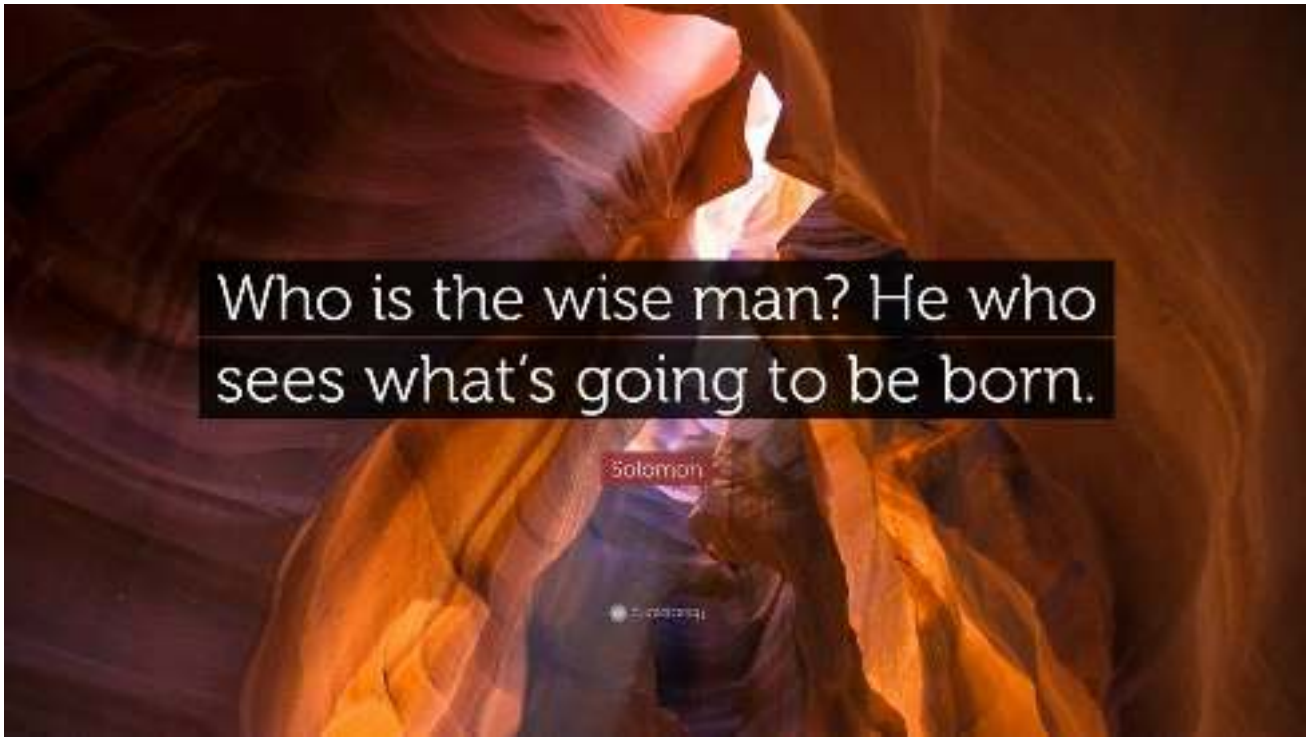
> [17] that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give you a spirit of wisdom and of revelation in the knowledge of Him. [18] I pray that the eyes of your heart may be enlightened, so that you will know what is the hope of His calling, what are the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, [19] and what is the boundless greatness of His power toward us who believe. These are in accordance with the working of the strength of His might…"

Despite many references in the scriptures, the development and exercise of discernment is something that is almost entirely neglected in the modern church.

The Bible also has many chapters that convey the value of wisdom and this is related to discernment. Wisdom involves knowing how things will turn out before it happens, and thereby allow one to be able to make good value judgments, and make appropriate decisions that further one's purposes. Discernment is absolutely necessary for exercising wisdom. Without discernment (or else a lifetime of experience), it is impossible to know how things will turn out, given different contexts, situations, and environments. In fact, discernment is central to one's spiritual growth, and without it, it is very difficult to exercise faith, and therefore to grow in faith.



How to Develop Discernment

A previous post listed 8 Things that Increase Discernment (2021-06-25). But although these things certainly help, ultimately, discernment is a gift from God.

Lastmod recognized this dependence on God when he wrote,

> "…many things we desire… sometimes we just cannot attain or have, no matter what we do. Maybe its gaining some wisdom of age… or what Jack mentioned in the post [On the Discernment of Desire]. In the Christian sense…. I learned that the "gift of discernment" is something not everyone has.

Yes, discernment is something not everyone has, but it is available to us if we ask God. James 1:5 states,

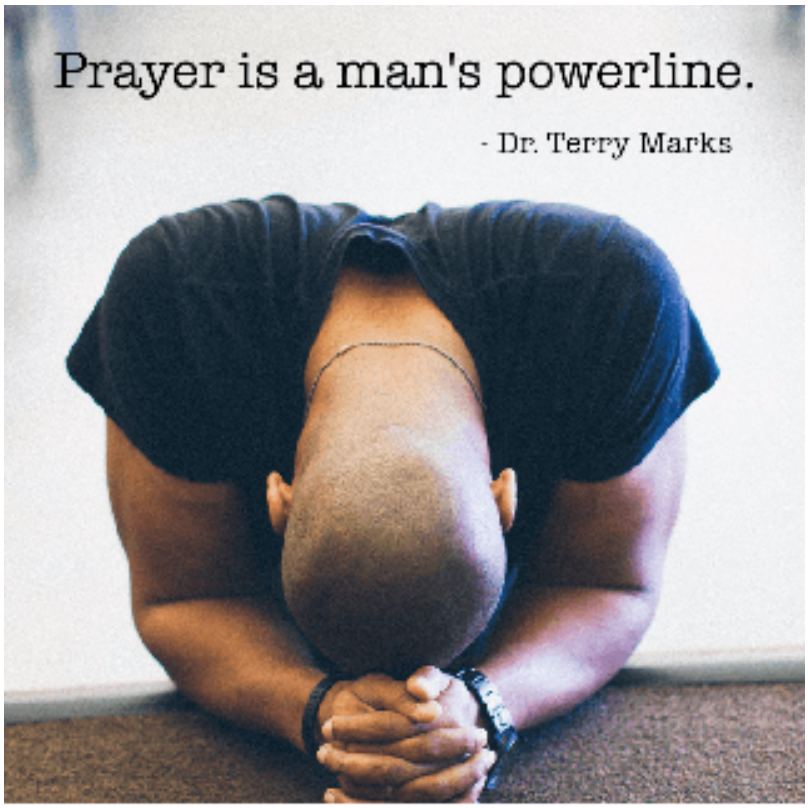
> "If any of you lacks wisdom, you should ask God, who gives generously to all without finding fault, and it will be given to you."

The key to understanding scripture passages about wisdom lies in the recognition that wisdom is about exercising discernment, and not about being street smart. The way to pursue wisdom is to develop one's discernment. If God is to grant one wisdom, He must first impart discernment.

In my experience, I prayed for wisdom for many years, and never got much of any. But after a few weeks of praying for discernment, I started to have "spidey senses" — impressions that suggested the mythical significance of people and things as set within the grander scheme of divine order. I saw the world entirely differently. Only after experiencing these changes was I able to understand that wisdom is not an intellectual pursuit.

If anyone is still confused about what discernment is, I urge you to read the post, On the discernment and wisdom of true morality (2019-02-02). This post might help you understand that discernment is one's ability to sense the spiritual essence of things, and knowing right from wrong.

Most importantly, you must pray diligently for God to grant you this power of discernment, and you will see for yourself what I am talking about.



Discerning the Nature of Sin and Grace

Continuing on with an excerpt from the aforementioned reader's email, he mentions how the church has departed from the entire paradigm of prodigality and grace.

> Novaseeker wrote,
> "…the central Christian concept of sin and grace is that one's prodigality is a function of one being alive."
> This is certainly a lost idea. I won't speculate where the idea originated, but I see an idea present in Christianity today that goes something like this: "I engage with the trappings of Christianity, I go to church, listen to > contemporary Christian music on the radio, I have a fish bumper sticker, I go to prayer breakfasts, I'm in a small group, I read all the books from the parachurch ministries, [therefore] I'm a good Christian. Aside from the occasional lapse to gossip/have poor self-esteem/curse/be proud/look at porn, I'm leading a righteous life."

Yes, it is easy to miss the effects of sin and the need for grace in churchian circles. This is why we call it churchianity.

He follows with an insightful analogy of sin.

> However, what if man's righteousness is like infinity? In mathematics, there are levels of infinity, so while the set of integers is infinite, the set of real numbers is much larger. What if, we are sinners in every minute of every day of our entire lives, but by our best efforts we become like the set of integers instead of being like the set of real numbers?

I like this mathematical analogy of sin. I think it's applicable and accurate.

> Maybe the reason to avoid sin is because the work of doing so is supposed to bring us closer to God.

He's on to something there. In general, sin undermines the Lord's work.

> Perhaps then, the trappings of Christianity are more for show, or are to avoid doing the real work. Which is more pleasing to God? Serving at the homeless shelter or the prayer breakfast? I don't know, but I have an opinion.
> The thing is, I'm no great shakes as a Christian. Most of the time, my practice is only marginally more than nominal, but I'm not fooling myself either, and sometimes, that's the best I can do.
> Anyway, I'm glad you have this blog. It's a nice place to be.

Thanks~!

The church has done a good job at making us believe that "doing God's work" means to live a clean life and serve in some capacity at church. But a better concept of "doing God's work" would be glorifying God, and doing that which brings others to know God better and become more spiritually mature. Sin is then clearly seen as bad because it works against these goals.

It takes a bit of discernment to identify what kinds of sin fall under “common grace” and are “normal”, and which kinds of sin are upsetting to God’s work and the shalom of the community. These two kinds of sin, and the “sin unto death” as mentioned in 1 John 5:16-18, is one of the most disputed topics in the New Testament. But a well-honed discernment can brush aside these philosophical arguments to reveal the true nature of the thing, and what should be done about it.

For example, men who are tentative about taking action need encouragement. They need to better understand masculinity and the behavior that flows from it. Men who are mature in faith should identify those men who have this hesitancy as someone who needs attention and guidance. This is doing the Lord’s work.

If we want to be a stickler about sin, then we could say it is a sin to not take action, as this would lead to one’s own demise (maybe even spiritual death?), but OTOH, it is also a sin to not teach and encourage one who doesn’t take action, because this would be neglecting the Lord’s work.

> “Therefore, to him who knows to do good and does not do it, to him it is sin.”
> James 4:17 (NKJV)

Of course, discernment will make one increasingly aware of the good he can do, so with this power come both privileges and responsibilities – another trait of masculinity.

Embracing One’s Role of Masculine Authority Increases Discernment

As mentioned in the previous section, discernment allows a man to exercise greater masculine authority, but it works both ways too. Pursuing a Biblical mindset of masculinity creates the context in which discernment can grow.

A man must have a vision of how things should be, and he should be making choices to improve himself as a man in accordance with enacting that vision.

The clarity of thinking about situations from a masculine viewpoint is revolutionary at a personal level. It allows one to know right away what to say to address any situation that might come up. For a moment, you feel apprehension before responding, but part of masculinity is dealing head on with those feelings and doing what you believe is right. We all fail at times, but having a male friend to point out the mistake and encourage you as you struggle to improve is part of what makes relationships with men who care about you so important. It also adds context that indicates right away the tenet of what other's responses mean in terms of their values and spiritual disposition. Embracing this mindset causes a man to become passionate, conscious about life being short, having no guaranteed tomorrows, and living out his purpose.

From a Christian standpoint, a man must understand how the Bible sets up the authority hierarchy in marriage. The authority belongs to the husband because the responsibility for the family is ultimately his and God will hold him accountable for what he does with what He gave him (wife, children, assets, etc.). This is headship, and the first step in enforcing headship is to act like you have the authority in marriage that God gave you, because you do. If a boss tells you what to do, or if you tell a subordinate what to do, there is an expectation that it will get done. This calm expectation that your instructions will be followed is the mindset and attitude that reinforces authority. Adopting and putting this mindset into action is the first step, and this works with most basic instructions for what you want done.

Having this mindset allows a man to discern his wife's words and responses in terms of how submissive or rebellious she is to his directives. This is important, because if a man does not respond appropriately to his wife's behaviors, then his misguided actions will probably create additional discord in the marriage and he will fail in loving and moulding her properly.

Caterpillar345 wrote this personal story in a comment.

> I had an experience recently that might be an example of setting and defending a boundary or expectation. I was driving on a road trip and had my sister along riding shotgun. I asked for an apple and as she grabbed it out of the bag to hand it to me, she took a bite out of it, presumably as a playfully annoying little sister prank. I > decided at that moment I didn't want 90% of an apple, I wanted a whole apple, so I refused to take it. She refused to eat it and hand me a different apple with refrains of "There's nothing wrong with it, just eat it!" I continued to press the issue and our back and forth was causing both of us to laugh because of how silly and petty it was. Between gasps of laughter, I accused her of being manipulative and she accused me of being petty. I didn't really care that the apple had a bite out of it and was perfectly willing to eat it, but I realized I had drawn an arbitrary boundary and now had to defend it or risk losing respect in a small way, even with my sister. I also realized that if I continued to press the issue without resolving it somehow (or allowing for a resolution), the amused laughter between us would soon turn into hurt feelings and petty resentment (which there is plenty of history with in our family). So I decided I would take it if she would apologize for being a mean little sister. After a few protests from her and some additional laughter between us she offered what sounded like a sincere apology and I took the apple. We came away from it with laughter, a good story, and a little inside joke about "the small things in life."

> Who knows if it really meant anything — it was just an apple after all — but it seemed significant to me in some small way. I know based on other words and actions from her prior to and since this example that she respects me as her brother. But it nevertheless seemed like a growth opportunity for me in a small way.

Caterpillar's story is a great example of exercising frame, and it is also a simple way to exchange love. We might be tempted to regard his response as petulant or childish, but that would be a disservice to the authentic expression of desire. He made his wishes evident and he told his sister what he wanted, and this is very important for a man. This is where discernment and Christian love enters into the picture. As Caterpillar notes, if he had not recognized the potential impact of extending his diatribe, and continued to demand his way without offering a resolution to the micro-crisis (which interestingly came in the form of another demand), then this would not have comprised a love-filled interaction and it would culminate in antipathy. We might be tempted to dismiss wanting an undefiled apple as a small thing, but it's the small things like this that count. Older people have often told me that when they look back on their lives, they remember the little things, not the big things. The proof of all I have written in this paragraph is that it made the trip fun and memorable, and it strengthened Caterpillar's relationship with his sister. The fact that it is memorable makes this a moment of eternal life.* If a man makes a regular habit of doing things like this, it will definitely lead to more confidence and a stronger frame in the future.

 Eternal means that it is not confined to 4-D space and time, but reaches into the 5-D spiritual domain.*

Conclusions

In summary, men must exhume the masculine frame. A man should have a clear vision. He needs to make hard decisions and take action. Having spiritual discernment and exercising wisdom are essential to making everything work together and progress towards his ends.

With these attitudes and tools at their disposal, men have the context to begin exercising discernment, as displayed by Caterpillar, RedPillApostle, and the reader who sent me the email — and both awareness and progress can grow better with prayer and diligence, respectively.

Men need this because the side effect of improving yourself and striving for a vision is becoming more attractive to women. It's not the goal, but it is a benefit.

Jesus and Women

Jesus was Self-Confident

Here's what we know about Christ's relationships with women: He had a few in his life. He loved them. He cared for them. He showed compassion for them. When he saw friends weeping over Lazarus' death, he wept with them (and then He took care of business). But – he never submitted to any of them – not even to His own mother, the venerated Mary.

Jesus exercised absolute lordship over women. He never let a woman tell Him what to do or what He should have done. Remember Mary and Martha:

1. Martha telling Jesus "Hey Jesus! I'm busy in here! Tell my sister Mary to get in here and help me!" Jesus rebuked her gently and corrected her: "Martha, you worry about so many things, But Mary has chosen what is most needful."
2. Mary and Martha urgently sending for Jesus when their brother Lazarus was sick. "Jesus, come now." He waited 2 days and let Lazarus die. So when he got there, the very first thing Martha says is "Well, hell, Jesus. If you'd been here when I asked you to come, Lazarus wouldn't have died!" (and then she checks herself…) "but I know that if it's Your will, Lazarus will live."

He was always in charge with and around them. He told women what to do and they did it. His own mother at the wedding said, "Jesus, they're out of wine." Jesus told her: "Woman, this has nothing to do with Me. It's not My time yet." Mary then said to the servants: "Do whatever He tells you."

He didn't take women seriously. He told women who's who and what's what:

1. The woman with five husbands – he showed her compassion but firmly rebuked her.
2. The woman caught in adultery – he was compassionate with her, but then told her to "go, and sin no more".

Jesus, Lord of Frame

Jesus was the undisputed master of the reframe. Every time someone said something, Jesus' response was a paraphrase of "I reject your frame and substitute My own perfect one." or "Here's My frame. You need to get with My program."

No one could "gotcha" Jesus, though they tried.

Pharisees: "Which is the greatest commandment?"
Jesus: "I see what you're trying to do there. Here's everything: Love the Lord with all you've got; love your neighbor as yourself. There. That sums up the Law and the prophets."

Pharisees: "Hey. We saw You healing at the temple on the Sabbath. That's work, and You're not supposed to be working on the Sabbath! Hypocrite! False prophet!"
Jesus: "My Father has been working until now, and so I am working."

Jesus Tested Women

Western churchianity is loathe to point this out, but Jesus took women to task, and made sure they were worthy of what they asked of Him, and were ready to receive with thankfulness. He did this as a regular matter.

Take for example, the woman with the demon possessed daughter.

Woman: "Jesus, heal my daughter!" (Christ ignores her and says nothing.)
Disciples: "Lord, send her away, she's annoying us."
Jesus: I was sent only for Israel's lost sheep.
Woman: (kneels before Jesus) "Lord, help me!"
Jesus: "It is not right to take children's bread and throw it to the dogs."
Woman: "Yes, Lord, but even the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from their master's table."
Jesus: "Woman, you have great faith! Your daughter is healed."

Another example of Jesus "testing" women was his exchange with the woman with the issue of blood:

Jesus was moving through a crowd. A woman who has been bleeding for 12 years, sees Him and thinks, "If I can just get close and touch Him, I'll be healed." She came up behind Jesus and touched the fringe of His clothes, and was healed immediately. He said, "Who touched Me? I perceive that power has gone out of Me." She was afraid, but knelt before him and said (paraphrasing), "I did, because I'd heard about Your power and You healing people just by touching them, and I figured if I could just touch You I could get healed." Jesus replied, "Daughter, your faith has made you well. Go in peace."

That's a woman knowing what the test is and passing with flying colors. The test is "Do it My way, get with My program, step into My frame." She did it His way: Believe, step out in faith, and act on that faith. She submitted to him, visibly: She knelt in front of Him and explained what she did and why. He recognized her and told her she passed the test, and was rewarded for it with healing and being called "Daughter".

Epilogue

Did Jesus have sex with women? We do not know whether He did or not. We take it on faith that He did not because we have no record of His taking a wife and Scripture is silent on it. Tradition says He neither married nor had "carnal" knowledge. There is a gap in descriptions of His early life between ages 12 and when He began public ministry at 30. We know – we take it on faith – He was, and is, the perfect Man, the God-Man.

Christ lived out the perfect example of masculinity, including His masculinity in relationship to women.

- You love, care for, and trust, the women closest to you; all others can pound sand.
- You decide which women you love, care for, and trust by testing them.
- You make them prove their worthiness of your love, care, and trust. When they pass the tests, then you love, care for, and trust them. At that point, it's about lordship. Control. Mastery. Firm and gentle rebuke.
- Women don't run you or your life.
- Women don't tell you what to do; you tell them what to do.
- You come when you decide it's time.
- You go where you decide to go, when you decide to go.
- You do what you decide needs to be done for the greater good and for the purposes you have deemed necessary and proper.

Women you don't love, care for or trust – who cares about them or what they do? Until they pass the tests, you're indifferent to them. You don't tell them anything, help them, do anything for them, or give them any mental or emotional effort whatsoever. You have nothing whatsoever to do with them. You keep them out of your life.

A Case Study of Contrasting Perspectives on the WORD

Jack · 1 October 2021 · Archived copy · Original

An interesting look at two parallel yet contrasting worlds.

Readership: Christians
Reader's Note: The theme for October is Gothicism and Gnosticism.
Length: 1,100 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

The following case study is based on a dialogue between two leading members of a Protestant Church in the Midwest United States.

During the conversation, Mr. B said, "One thing that really irritates me is how some people overemphasize the Old Testament Law." By saying this, he meant that the Church needs to place more emphasis on the love and grace of God, as described in the New Testament.

At one instance in the conversation, Mr. C made the point-blank statement, "We live by the Word!"

In reply, Mr. B boldly retorted, "We do NOT live by the word! Do you keep every Sabbath holy? Do you abstain from eating pork? Do you wear tassels on your prayer shawl? Do you give all your excess income to the poor? … Nobody in this church does any of those things!"

Mr. C sheepishly replied negatively, and he felt very confused and embarassed. Likewise, Mr. B was very indignant and annoyed.

After observing this conversation, it seems that both men were partly in the rough, with neither of them knowing exactly what the other was saying. Let's examine their interaction from a third perspective.

"The report of sister Harriet is true! Thine tassel truly lacketh a purple thread! Thou art in violation of Numbers 15:38! How dare thou desecrate this holy sanctuary! Thou art a three suited, worsted stocking, knave, and beggar!" To which he replied, "Them thar's fightin' words, yew lil' lilly livered, yeller bellied scallywag!"

Let's focus on Mr. C's statement first. He said, "We live by the Word!" I don't really think that he was trying to make a theologically correct statement here, but was simply expressing some lighthearted feelings that he had at the moment. Perhaps he was speaking out of his faith. His focus was on the joy of being alive. The other people in his company, who shared a similar focus at that moment, would have immediately understood what he was saying in the way that he meant it.

If Mr. C were to make a more theologically accurate statement to describe his momentary inspiration, he might have said, "We have found a new spiritual life through our faith in God, by His love, grace and mercy that have been revealed to us through Jesus Christ." But he is not going to say that, because the sharp technicality of such a statement is incompatible with his high feelings of the moment. Furthermore, Mr. C probably gained the opinion that Mr. B was a stodgy sourpuss, because he was critical of Mr. C's happy expression.

Upon further preponderance, we may observe that the crucial difference between what this statement means to either Mr. B or Mr. C, hinges upon the interpretation of the last word, "the Word". At a Fundamental Church, they will emphasize that "the Word" means the written word; the Bible, and they will revere the Bible to be inerrant and unbreakable. But in an Evangelical Church, they will point out that "the Word" means the conveyance of an idea, and that idea, specifically, is the revelation of God's nature and His purpose for humanity, as revealed through His Son, Jesus. John 1:1-14 is the scriptural basis for this interpretation, in which we see that "the Word" is actually Jesus.

> [1] In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.
> [2] He was in the beginning with God.
> [3] All things were made through Him, and without Him nothing was made that was made.
> [4] In Him was life, and the life was the light of men.
> [5] And the light shines in the darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it.
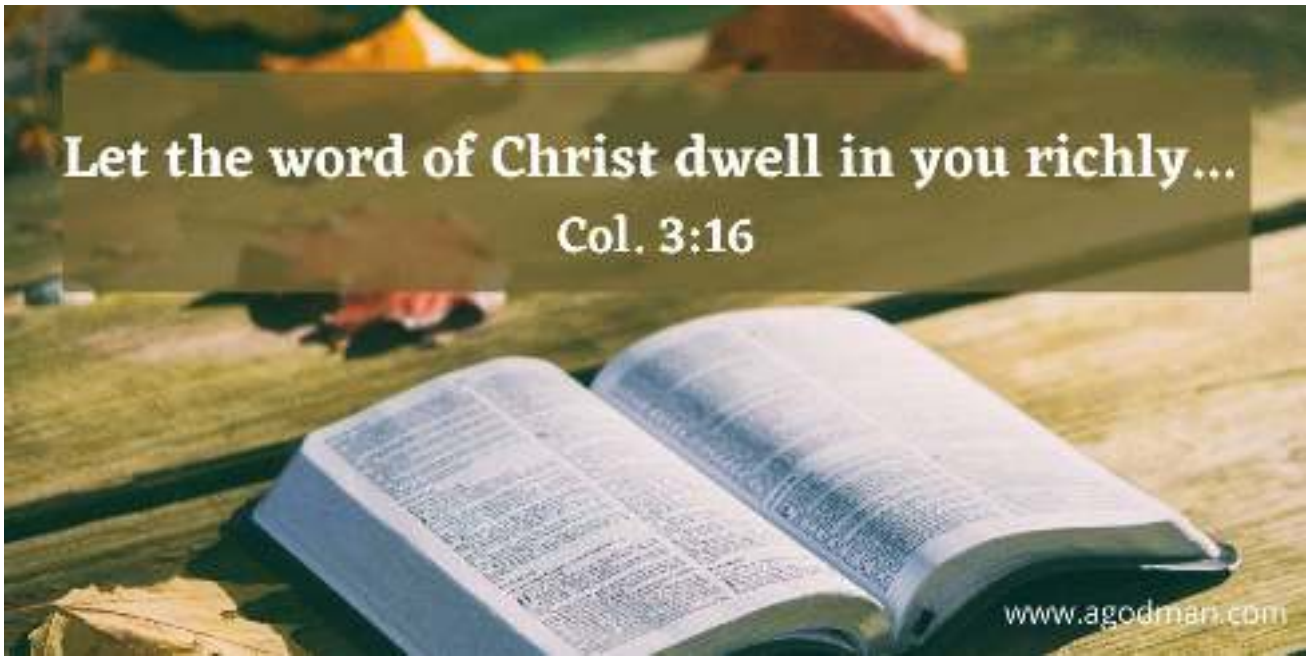
> [14] And the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth.

Note that verse 14 makes the connection between God's Word and Jesus.

So we see that "the Word" can have (at least) two meanings: (1) A literal word on a page; a commandment; the Bible; or (2) the plan and nature of God revealed through Jesus: the Gospel.



Now from this observation, it becomes quite evident that Mr. B sees the Word of God to be the first: the Law, or the Commandment; and Mr. C sees the Word of God to be the second: Jesus, or the Gospel. So in fact, both men were speaking correctly, although they were ignorant of each other's meaning. By extension, we could conclude that Mr. B might be unfamiliar with God's love and joy, while Mr. C might be unfamiliar with God's grace and mercy.

Romans 3:21-31 tells us how the two "Words" come together.

> [21] But now the righteousness of God apart from the law is revealed, being witnessed by the Law and the Prophets, [22] even the righteousness of God, through faith in Jesus Christ, to all and on all who believe. For there is no difference; [23] for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, [24] being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, [25] whom God set forth as a propitiation by His blood, through faith, to demonstrate His righteousness, because in His forbearance God had passed over the sins that were previously committed, [26] to demonstrate at the present time His righteousness, that He might be just and the justifier of the one who has faith in Jesus. [27] Where is boasting then? It is excluded. By what law? Of works? No, but by the law of faith. [28] Therefore we conclude that a man is justified by faith apart from the deeds of the law. [29] Or is He the God of the Jews only? Is He not also the God of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles also, [30] since there is one God who will justify the circumcised by faith and the uncircumcised through faith. [31] Do we then make void the law through faith? Certainly not! On the contrary, we establish the law.

The apostle Paul is one of the few people who ever lived who could express his joy and enthusiasm through a technically descriptive monologue.

There is some irony in the way Mr. B is irritated by others (like Mr. C), who seem to overemphasize the Law. Actually, Mr. B is the one who is preoccupied with the law, and his irritations arise from his own burdens about that. Mr. C's statement also contains a similar irony. He feels happy, probably because he doesn't know how brutal life and the Law can be. I suppose Mr. B might get some satisfaction by thinking that Mr. C's faith will soon be tested. Meanwhile, Mr. C should carry more pity toward Mr. B, in realizing how (too much) discipline and hardships have affected his life.

The Nature of Creation

There is a common belief among evangelicals that ever since the fall, all of creation is fallen, corrupted, and deformed. This belief stems from Romans 8:18-25.

> [18] I believe that the present suffering is nothing compared to the coming glory that is going to be revealed to us.
> [19] The whole creation waits breathless with anticipation for the revelation of God's sons and daughters.
> [20] Creation was subjected to frustration, not by its own choice — it was the choice of the one who subjected it — but in the hope [21] that the creation itself will be set free from slavery to decay and brought into the glorious freedom of God's children. [22] We know that the whole creation is groaning together and suffering labor pains up until now. [23] And it's not only the creation. We ourselves who have the Spirit as the first crop of the harvest also groan inside as we wait to be adopted and for our bodies to be set free. [24] We were saved in hope. If we see what we hope for, that isn't hope. Who hopes for what they already see? [25] But if we hope for what we don't see, we wait for it with patience.
> Romans 8:18-25 (CEB)

The Garden of Eden may very well have been a place in Mesopotamia, but the illustration of the Fall does not refer to a geographical location as much as it does to a condition of humanity. (See Genesis 2-3.) Creation is subject to the dominion of man, and this is true in the spiritual realm as much as it is in the physical. After human beings fell from our eternal condition to a mortal, sinful, debased condition, Creation remained the same. However, since it is under man's authority, and with us in a mortal state, not eternal, this casts a shadow over all of Creation. Mankind's masterful guidance was routine in the Garden, but now, any sort of power over the natural Creation qualifies as a miracle. Instead, fallen humanity is pitted in a battle against nature and feels compelled to humble nature, rather like coercive rape instead of genuine loving mastery.

Since the Fall, Creation yearns for us to regain our eternal condition. While it continues to bear the glory of its Creator, it has to put up with humanity in a fallen state, having no authority to speak the Word and guide Creation's activities. It groans and suffers without our management as eternal people. When Christ returns to bring a new Heaven and a new Earth, He will restore the Earth (and us) to what it was before the Fall.

Now, instead of eternal beings in charge of the Earth, we are part of the Earth, part of the mortal structure of the natural world. In coming to Christ, we gain a taste of our eternal condition, and we despair of ever belonging to this mortal condition. We know in our hearts we weren't made for this mortal existence. We join Creation in groaning for a better existence that we know is our divine heritage.

Moreover, saying that Creation is actually fallen is a reasonable conclusion from this passage in Romans, but logically, this is a category error. Creation has always been mortal. It is not something that can fall. Instead of thinking of Creation as fallen, a better conceptualization would be to consider Creation as being under the Fall, but not in itself fallen. It is subjected to the Fall because it was designed to be under our management, and we are fallen. If one goes out and encounters the natural world in a heart-led spiritual moment, one will realize that the former interpretation of the passage misses the glory of God revealed in mortal Creation.

Social media makes it easier to emphasize eternal, glorified personas having pre-Edenic qualities, but we know this is not reality.

"Is" versus "Ought"

The conversations tend to get derailed, not only in the exegesis, but also in the eisegesis — when we try to interpret this passage from Romans (and others) in terms of its personal application — how we should think about our own sinful nature.

The arguments can basically be summed up as the difference between "is" and "ought".

The "is" represents our as-born nature and its effects on creation — what Protestants tend to call "sin nature" — the fallen state. That is the "is" of humanity — it's fallen, it's base, it's visceral, and it's rather animalistic. The Imago Dei is still there but it's very obscured, and the patterns of life and behavior are not patterned after the Divine Plan, but after baser human instincts and mortal desires which are more animalistic. The "reason" for this is spiritual, of course — it's the Fall, which was a spiritual event that had physical consequences. But the lived experience of humanity in its fallen/"sin nature" state is largely animalistic, and largely based on similar patterns as we see in the animal world — it's what humans devolve to after the fall, when the Imago Dei is not erased but it's mostly obscured.

The "ought" is what regenerated Christians are supposed to be doing, now that they are no longer living in their sin natures, and are alive in Christ. This represents the Divine Plan for human behavior, as fully reflecting the Imago Dei as intended in humans, and it isn't based on animal desires, but rather subjects those animal desires to spiritual priorities.

The difficulty in understanding the difference between "is" and "ought" arises because we live in an age that prioritizes, in an absolute sense, what is "natural". That which is "natural" is seen as, ipso facto, "good", precisely because it is natural — its naturalness is what evidences its goodness in and of itself. In a sense, this is true, because Creation is natural, and Creation is good. But the confusion arises when we try to incorporate the fallen nature of humanity into the goodness of Creation. In effect, this is the same as denying the Fall and insisting that the fallen mortal state of humanity is superior to the Divine Plan. According to this reasoning, what is "natural" is "in-born", and what is "in-born" is therefore not "chosen", and what is therefore not "chosen" shouldn't, in the eyes of many, be subject to moral sanction, because it is "natural".

Leaving aside how illogical and bizarre it is to associate our sinful nature with the nature of Creation, conceptually, it has to be admitted that this is a widespread belief in our culture, and it has an impact on how people view moral questions as well.

The Principle of Power

We have all seen this line of reasoning trotted out, usually implied, but rather explicitly in some cases, about all of the sexual issues, both heterosexual and otherwise.

Except for being straight, white, and/or male.

So then we might question why the PTB can make that inconsistent switch, because once these exceptions are made, neither an acceptance or denial of the reasoning represents any firm belief. Upon further examination, we find that the apparent "double-mindedness" is not based on sound reason, but is merely a tactical statement, in both cases. That is, the adherents do not metaphysically believe that all people who say that they are gay or trans or what have you are "born that way" in the way someone is born with a certain eye or skin color. They do understand, however, that legally and culturally this is a critical argument, precisely because of the jurisprudence and the cultural development during the civil rights era that concerned skin color — a "natural" trait, so the tactic was to "make these other things be considered to be the same as skin color" in order to get the same result — acceptance by the broader culture. Many of the advocates, including many of the beneficiaries themselves, do not actually believe that "LGBT" is the same as skin color, but the argument is a lock winner, tactically, and so it was adopted without reservation across the board as a philosophical tool of managing "discrimination".

Which image is preferred by the PTB?
However, because they know it isn't "true" in any real sense, they are free to abandon this line of reasoning as soon as it becomes tactically useful to do so, in order to further another goal. So, we see that being born male/white/"cis"/"het" are all traits that are in-born and cannot be changed, per this theory, but the foregone conclusion, "therefore it is beyond moral sanction", is dropped, because the purpose of the tactic is to isolate this group based on these "born characteristics", in order to disempower them — another form of discrimination. In other words, they permit themselves to change one aspect of the chain of syllogisms (in this case, the last one, about something being natural being beyond moral critique) and turn that around 180 degrees to foster "justice", because pointing that phrase one way fosters justice in one instance, while pointing it the other way fosters justice in another instance — where, in both cases, "justice" means "empowering people we want to empower and disempowering people we want to disempower".

At it's root, this is the current iteration of the principalities referred to in scripture.

> "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."
> Ephesians 6:12 (KJV)

This principality requires playing loose with the logic, so the PTB cannot stick to any "core" or "metaphysical" beliefs about the "born that way" business, one way or the other. Instead, their "core" or "metaphysical" beliefs are all about power — namely that all human institutions, structures, mores, morals, philosophies, systems of thought, laws, political and economic systems, sexualities and social norms around them, family life, religions, and everything else, are all tools deployed by the holders of actual power to enforce, entrench, and perpetuate their power … and that, therefore, any one of these things can, and should, be used as a weapon against opposition power holders in order to disempower them, with nary a care given towards logic, consistency, a broader philosophical or metaphysical belief, nor anything else, because these are all arguments intentionally constructed to confuse and disempower the opposition as a power play towards achieving an end in any case. The end is power, plain and simple. Their metaphysical belief is power — taking it from those who have it and giving it to those whom they believe deserves it (which will, of course, include themselves). Everything else is a mere tool, and is taken no more seriously than needed for the tool to have the desired effect. Therefore, they do not care about being consistent — ontological integrity is unimportant as long as the tools are effective when they are deployed and have served their purpose.

Presenting a glorified image is a tool of power.

The Principality of Progressivism

In this specific area, we are, in my estimation, on the brink of a total reversal in the "justification" provided for behavior liberation in the sexual area. That is, within the next 10-20 years the main social justification for support of "LGBT" and other paraphilias is going to shift 180 degrees. LGBT will move from something you are "born with" to something you opt for, and in either case will merit full social approval. This will follow the pattern already established by feminism, and it really is simply a question of time until it becomes the "new reason" for LGBT affirmation, and that will be that.

By the time this 180 degree shift happens, from "born that way" to "freedom to choose", no-one will bat an eyelash, because acceptance will be, by then, generationally entrenched in such a way that it is extremely difficult to dislodge, and the younger generations won't care (and already don't much care) about the specific "reason" given for it. No matter whether it is inborn or chosen, it will be accepted, socially, morally, and judiciously, as a "political freedom", and a "human right" backed by law.

Again, all of these "arguments" are tools. They are not truths. They are not core beliefs. They are a means to an end for our opponents who fight to dismantle the glory of God manifested in the traditional family. They can and will be discarded without any difficulty as soon as it makes sense for them to do so, because their purposes are not about the worthiness of the arguments, but about the accumulation of power. The arguments are merely a means to an end, nothing more (and they see our beliefs, wrongly, in the same way).

Conclusions

Many Christians choose to remain ignorant and unaware of the principalities and powers of our age, simply because it is the easiest and most socially acceptable thing to do. In fact, entire demoninations have been washed away in the flood of what is politely called Progress(ivism). (I wrote about this before in Dissemination and Dissolution (2020-11-07) and Anti-Progressive (2020-11-16), and I will explore this further in future posts.) Progressivism is in fact, the dark Power of this age.

At this point, readers might be asking, "How does this relate to me? What can I do about this?"

Ed Hurst has recently described how Talk is the Action Required of us right now (2021-09-28). He writes,

> "Let's agree to a common denunciation of sin as sin. Let's agree to a common promotion of Covenant holiness. Let's study together what we can hold in common about those things. The power of this is miraculous; it opens the door for God to pour out blessings in our lives. This becomes our shalom, which is critical to our testimony. We can show off the favor of our God and link it to the Covenant."

At first take, we might dismiss this admonition, thinking that "talk is cheap". However, even though the aforementioned arguments are little more than tools, these tools can be rendered inoperative or inefficacious through our simple refusal to admit to them as being any sort of "truth" that should be respected and followed.

Instead, we should call them out as the social tools of manipulation and discrimination that they are, and counter them with the Truth.

Adam Piggott wrote of this same approach in his post, Suffering for our Sins as a Nation (2021-09-29).

> "By remaining silent when evil is perpetrated in our lands we then condone such sinning by our failure to act. The lies that are being told now are but one example of this group sinning. A lie needs two players for it to work; the person who tells the lie and the person who believes it. You believe a lie by acting within the bounds of the lie."

Talking about the Truth is the point at which we begin to reclaim the narrative, and those who control the narrative hold power. This is why it is exceedingly important for us to know the "ought" — how things are supposed to be.

A senior man talks with a group of young people.

The Application: Question what is "Natural"?

Going back to the ideas expressed in the Introduction, many Christians are fairly uncomfortable acknowledging that the fallen "sin-nature" behavior is "natural". Most Christians seem to shy away from this topic, because they know that the broader non-Christian culture thinks (and, honestly, many Christians do as well, and perhaps think themselves) that the idea of "natural" is the same as "God designed", when our fallen nature isn't anything of the sort. This only becomes further confused when Christians make the category error of believing that all of nature is fallen, and then conclude that everything that is natural in this world is God's design, from A to Z. It is equally confounding to believe that nothing in this world is God's design. When this category error is extended to apply to practical behaviors in question, it suggests that any debased inclinations of the fallen "sin-nature" are "as designed", even though Christian anthropology teaches nothing of the sort. The reality should be precisely emphasized that the way humans are naturally born, with their naturally born proclivities, and their "sin-nature", by definition, is fallen and therefore not as designed. That is to say, human nature itself is fallen and not as designed, but it is natural.

However, once we recognize that the "fallen nature", viz. the "sin-nature", falls within the realm of "natural", then it becomes obvious that the whole argument for "natural = good" is in fact an inversion of the truth, calling good that which is evil, and evil good.

In addition to the prolific arguments surrounding sexual orientation, for example, pride and selfishness is natural, but that doesn't make these traits good simply by definition. Likewise, cuckoldry and hypergamy are natural but not good. Polysexuality and secretive sexual liaisons are natural but not good.

Race and racism represent a unique point in case. As part of Creation, race is natural and good, but racism, while natural, is not good. This duality is how race/racism became a point of crossover in the PTB's false reasoning.

Christians should search their own convictions and be prepared to give a similar line of reasoning to address hot-topic areas in which they may need to speak up. Be prepared to make an impact when the right moment presents itself.

Anything for a story…

Stylist: Paris Hilton pregnancy rumours: why the hell do we keep forcing women to "deny" that they're pregnant? (2021-07-28)

The latest news about our favorite celebrity, Paris Hilton, is that she is NOT pregnant. I can only guess that the inside scoop that's unfit to print is that this is only news because she usually is, for brief periods of time.

Given her state of (past) affairs, it is surprising that the feminist juggernaut, Stylist, finds this surprising.

But the writers at Stylist would have us believe the feigned shock factor of this news was brought on by Paris herself when she joked about being pregnant.

> "After joking she was expecting triplets, Hilton added: "Actually, I'm just kidding. I am not pregnant."
> Yes, Hilton made a joke out of it all. Yes, she laughed it off. Yes, she behaved exactly as one might expect someone who's grown up in the media spotlight to behave in such a situation."

Can't take a joke? A trait of the Woke!

> "Despite this, plenty of gossip sites are still leaning into the narrative that they've concocted. They've branded Hilton's statement a "denial" – as if there's a chance the court of opinion might still find her guilty – and repeated their claims that an "unnamed source" is insisting that Hilton is pregnant with her first child."

Why so serious? Paris is working them for attention to the point that the joke is on them!

Anyways, Paris had been talking about wanting to "concoct", but she hasn't gotten the chemistry right, or maybe she failed that class.

After a rare moment of self-disclosure in describing how their paparazzi had hen pecked Jennifer Aniston to a state of annui over this same issue, the author at Stylist somehow twisted Aniston's words to mean…

> "Amen, Jen – women are more than walking, talking wombs. Our worth should not be determined by our ability to bring forth children (seriously, this isn't The Handmaid's Tale). And we absolutely shouldn't be subjected to this outrageous pressure to procreate, because there are so, so, so many reasons why a woman may not have children."

To all those savage readers of a banned book made into a TV series (The Handmaid's Tale), this is an excellent example of projective hearing!

Nevertheless, the writer at Stylist is kind enough to give us a lesson in converging etiquette by pointing out two conditions that must be met before it is deemed appropriate for us to expect a feminist to bear a child (and then offer our congratulations).

> "We shouldn't rush to congratulate them, either, unless we're 100% certain that it's a) true and b) genuinely happy news (not every positive pregnancy test is a dream come true, OK?). And we should never assume anything because, let's face it, to do so really does make an ass out of u and me – or, at the very least, an ass out of the progress made by the women's rights movement."

Note that last line, which is one of those rare moments usually seen only in the wild, when a Libby revels in exasperation and abandons the narrative long enough to be honest and truthful. "A broken clock is right twice a day!"

Finally, the source of indignancy is revealed…

> "…some advice for you all: until you can see the baby actually making its way out of the womb, please never assume that a woman is pregnant. Ever. It is absolutely none of your business, unless she decides to make it your business. So wait for her to confirm her news, in her own time, and in her own way."

Translation: Abortion is always an option, even after the expanding waistline incites excitement (or dismay) in others. Others must never assume that abortion is NOT an option because that would place undue social pressure on the Prego not to switch back to the Ragu before the meatballs are done cooking.

"Dammit! I heard what you said… wishing you had abortion during my second trimester! Now there'll be hell to pay!"
On a gross tangent, I've seen, firsthand, a baby "actually making its way out of the womb". (BTW, the placenta resembles a giant uncooked pork liver, and it's the size of a sports bag.) Babies don't just appear out of nowhere as Stylist would have us believe. (The baby was my daughter, so it was not only Kermit's business, but also his responsibility.) "Love is a many splendored thing."

Summary: Obviously, this schoolmarm lecture is another attempt to police the narrative.

Moral of the Story: It's telling when Stylist has to write a story about celebrities NOT having children to be a sympathetic catatonic for all the middle aged felinephiles who missed out on that chance. That says more about the reader base of Stylist than it does about Paris Hilton.

Of course, that's the whole purpose of fastidiously focusing on the famous — it's not as though they're interesting or they lead admirable lives, bastiards of morality or anything remotely like that. We've got to keep the huffy headlines rolling for the masses to be lulled and enterplained. Crime rates would go up otherwise.

Fake News: China and Taiwan go to war

As most readers already know, I'm an American citizen, and I've lived in Taiwan since 2004.

On October 5, 2021, my mother sent me a message in a very worried tone. She said the news is reporting that "China is threatening Taiwan", and she welcomed me to come back to the States if I felt unsafe.

I was a bit confused, so I asked her for specific details of the news she heard. She said China was devising military strategies to take over Taiwan and threatening to deploy submarines. She sent me this photograph of the news headlines on TV.

I was surprised to see this. Fake news. Nothing is happening here on the ground in Taiwan, and there is no such news from Taiwan's news media.

On the other hand, the headlines are not entirely false. If the whole story were told (and it is a long one that Americans are not much interested in), the democratic Kuomingtang (the KMT later became the governing body in Taiwan) has been at war against communist factions in China since 1927 – almost a century!

I won't go into the history here, but ever since the KMT retreated to Taiwan in 1949, the animosity has been reduced to a cold war of words, ideologies, and diplomacy. Furthermore, times have changed since WW2. In recent history, the overarching goal has been to preserve the peace between China and Taiwan and promote economic growth, and this, in spite of the history of political differences. This sentiment is often described as "maintaining the status quo". Since 1992, a couple of agreements have been reached towards maintaining the status quo.

So yes, the threat of war has been a part of life in Taiwan for the past few hundred years. But actual war? Not so much. Not since 1949 anyway. The western news exaggerates too much.

No one in Taiwan wants a war with China, or with any other country for that matter.

The only newsworthy events of a military nature between China and Taiwan is that the Chinese Air Force periodically crosses into Taiwan air space, and are then repelled by the Taiwan Air Force (with no shots fired). This cat-and-mouse game has been happening for over a year. No one bats an eye anymore, except to complain about the annoyance and the monetary costs of deploying aircraft to deal with this situation.

The fake news is trying to play up the danger based on the fact that these air space incursions have been happening more frequently over the past week…

> "Over a four-day period beginning on Friday, Taiwan said that nearly 150 PLA military aircraft entered its ADIZ, part of a pattern of what Taipei calls Beijing's continued harassment of the nation."
> Taipei Times: Military tensions worst in 40 years: Chiu (2021-10-07)

…but no submarines, and no missiles.

Yes, Taiwan has been building up it's military through arms and machinery purchases from the U.S., but mainly for defense purposes. There is no aggressive plan to go "hot". Military generals have said that even if China invades Taiwan, they will not take the first shot.

Taiwan is probably the most peaceful place on Earth.

Once in a while, there will be a report of Chinese fishermen who defect by sailing or swimming to Taiwan's shores and who then have to go through a rigorous examination to determine their identity, intentions, and motivations.

> "But on the ground in Taiwan, people are neither running for one of the island's 117,000 working bomb shelters nor enlisting en masse.
> Having lived under the threat of Chinese military action for the past 70 years, the island's 23 million people have come to understand what they consider the strange paradox of Taiwan's existence: even as China's military might grows, invasion does not necessarily come any closer.
> Some experts believe much of the threat assessment by the US military may actually be more of a reflection of a shift in US perceptions about China amid the deteriorating relationship between the world's two economic giants."
> Aljazeera: Is China really about to invade Taiwan? (2021-04-14)

Note that last line. Aljazeera has it right. I've said this before — you have to go outside the U.S. to get the real news. I don't even waste my time watching U.S. syndicated news anymore. You shouldn't either. I recommend RT and Aljazeera. Readers are welcome to name others.

Extrapolating the idea in that last paragraph from Aljazeera, I believe that by running these news headlines, the PTB in the U.S. may very well be trying to sway popular opinion in a move to set the stage and gear up for another war, just like what was done in 1964, 1991, 2001, and 2003. I hope the governments of both China and Taiwan are aware of this, as well as the good people of the United States, and that they won't be played like pansy pawns against each other in the larger war for globalist power and the New World Odor.

> "And you will be hearing of wars and rumors of wars. See that you are not alarmed, for those things must take place, but that is not yet the end."
> Matthew 24:6 (NASB)

Don’t succumb to the fear mongering being presented in the news. Don’t play along with the follies. Do your own research. Think for yourself. Decide for yourself what to believe and act on your own convictions.

War between China and Taiwan makes no sense

Since I received the message from my mother in the U.S., a few readers have emailed me with a similar message — that the news in the U.S. is reporting aggression between China and Taiwan.

One reader wrote,

> "It's being hyped up as a potential war over here, and the media is talking about how Japan is preparing for war too.
> I find it to be BS. Japan doesn't want a war, and they would be dragged into it — most of our air assets in the region are based in Japanese territory.
> It also makes no sense: America has done nothing to punish China or to bring manufacturing back to U.S. shores. We are still beholden to them for everything. They have us by the balls, and we don't have the capability of projecting force.
> As per timing, it would have made sense for China to take action this summer, when many of our transport aircraft were busy evacuating Afghanistan.
> The wild card is that the US makes poor decisions when it comes to foreign policy and I can see democrats trying to create some false sense of unity."

Yes, spinning up the cold war between China and Taiwan into a real potential for a hot war with the United States is fake news. It makes no sense, just like invading Iraq in 2003 made no sense.

RedPillApostle brought our attention to an article on Townhall, Are China's Threats to Taiwan a Bluff? (2021-10-08). The author, Pat Buchanan, brings out the point that a war between China and the U.S. would make no sense from anyone's perspective. Yet, the Chinese are counting on this being to their advantage, as then any conflict would surely be seen as an unwarranted aggression by the U.S. (from an Asian viewpoint).

One thing I don't like about Buchanan's analysis is the way he is staking the moral reputation of the U.S. on whether Washington responds to the situation in Taiwan with military action. In this respect, he is a sortie for the warmongering PTB. This stance is obvious in this statement.

> "We will fight for Japan's right to hold the Senkakus and Manila's right to retrieve Mischief Reef, but not to ensure the rights of the 30 million people of Hong Kong and Taiwan."

I am afraid that American viewers will latch onto this sentiment and get the idea that the U.S. has to go to war with China to "defend democracy" or some such justification to defend Taiwan. We've all heard similar justifications for war in the past, with Korea, Vietnam, Iraq, Afghanistan… and now Taiwan? Heh… When will the 'Muricans wake up? Your sons are on the line (and now daughters too!).

Furthermore, if the U.S. went to war with China over the issue of "freedom and democracy", they would surely suffer massive losses, as many strategic estimates have suggested. Worse, it would enflame China's determination to solidify various disputed territorial claims, leading to more bloodshed.

Again, there is no such news like this here in Taiwan. A warning to expats has not even been issued from the U.S. State Department, and they will send a message to American expats in Taiwan if so much as a strong wind blows westward (literally).

> "The American Institute in Taiwan (AIT) cautions U.S. citizens that Typhoon Chanthu is currently in the western Pacific Ocean east of Taiwan. This severe typhoon has been building in intensity and moving rapidly toward Taiwan."
> An excerpt from an email sent from the U.S. State Department to American expats in Taiwan. (2021-09-10)

This was the last message sent from them — a month ago. They'll also send warnings for local drills and defense exercises. But there's been nothing about a threat from China.

> "And you will be hearing of wars and rumors of wars. See that you are not alarmed, for those things must take place, but that is not yet the end."
> Matthew 24:6 (NASB)

Update: Adam Piggott has written a response in his post, Taiwan and Data Point Analysis (2021-10-09).

More emails…

A reader directed me to this article from Andrew Anglin at The Unz Review, What About China, Then? (2021 October 5). He wrote,

> "What Anglin says about China is rather what I suspected about what they are trying to do, and why. They are no real threat to the US, for the most part. And I rather doubt the folks where you live are very worried about reunification in the way it's portrayed here. I sometimes wonder how the US became the Twilight Zone."

Yeah. This article seems pretty accurate from the Asian perspective, and for those statements concerning Taiwan, it's not too far off, at least.

Here's an excerpt from Anglin's piece that I found amusing.

> "What will not happen: the Chinese will not invade America to enslave people in communism with their social credit system. If you think that the Chinese want to invade America and enslave people, then you basically need to accept that you just don't really have any idea what is going on. Why would the Chinese want to invade and enslave Americans? Just to be mean? Do Chinese people strike you as that emotional, that they would waste huge amounts of resources in order to engage in an act of geopolitical meanness? The entire Chinese mindset, and their entire marketing strategy as a superpower, is that they don't invade countries, and instead trade with countries and invest in countries' infrastructure."

Yeah, recasting the Chinese as world conquering Mongolian marauders is a drill bit of projection (think about that for a moment), similar to how the Germans were recast as barbaric Huns in WW1. More fear mongering fake news to watch out for. If the Chinese ever come to dominate the U.S., it will be through financial means of control.

Oh wait, they've already done that!

New York Stock Exchange, New York City — May 10, 2019.
Here's another passage that strikes me as spot on.

> "Though it is clear that the globalist agenda hinges on regime change in China, that rampant anti-Chinese propaganda abounds, and that the entire political and military apparatus in Washington supports using the military to "defend Taiwan," the US plan to destroy the CCP is completely unclear."

Isn't it interesting that the U.S. is presumed to be the long arm of the globalist PTB?

> "Right now, China is finally standing up and pushing back against this bullying. If they decided to "invade" Taiwan, the Taiwanese military would put up less of a fight than the Afghan military. Americans have no idea what is going on in Taiwan. I would be surprised if even one soldier fired a shot if the CCP military landed in Taipei, and at least 40% of the people would openly greet them as liberators. The people who are still against reunification in theory would just shrug, and carry on with their day."

I believe this hypothetical is more true than not. Taiwan carried political and philosophical solidarity with Hong Kong during the crackdown back in June of this year, but little has been done about that, except to welcome disgruntled wealthy Hong Kongers looking for another Chinese cultural domain with a strong economy in which to take up residence. Property values in Taiwan have skyrocketed since then, and local landowners are quite happy about that.

> "No one in Taiwan even understands the concept of the mainland "taking their freedoms." No one thinks that anything substantial that affects them personally would change, other than gays and maybe some feminist women."

In Taiwan, there is a lot more cohesive unity and social currency than in America. As a result, people's idea of "freedom" is not the same as the American concept. In Taiwan, freedom means not being chained down like a wild animal or locked up in prison, but for those people who are in prison, they probably deserve to be. So what's the fuss? Most Taiwanese can't understand why Americans are so flagrant about "defending freedom". Instead, the rhetoric is seen for what it is — mythological hype used to obscure other motives and justify military aggression.

> "A lot of people want the CCP to come in and ban gay marriage. The US forcing the gay marriage thing really rustled a lot of people."

A lot of people in Taiwan want to ban gay marriage, that's true, but they aren't expecting the CCP to do it. News sources have reported that "60% of Taiwanese are accepting of gay marriage", and so on, but the use of the descriptors (e.g. "accepting of…", "believe that…", "say that…") is misleading. People will be agreeable when asked, but it's not how they really view the world, nor would they remain complacent if the person in question was their own family member. Here, "acceptance" means those who are against gay marriage have the attitude of, "Oh yes… heh… let them do their thing. They'll learn sooner or later that it's a dead end, and they'll have nothing to show for it. Meanwhile, that has nothing to do with me, so kindly leave me out of it. I have my own fantastic life to live." In other words, those gays who are outspoken are socially avoided and rejected from the social currency. This attitude has traction because about 70% of the population feels this way. We could also say Taiwanese are "tolerant", but it's different from the American concept of tolerance.

Next, Anglin locks in on the general sentiment of the Taiwanese — that life and business should not be disrupted by political ideologies and sentiments that are peripheral to daily life.

> "Imagine the internet being flooded with videos of PRC troops landing in Taiwan and people either smiling and waving or just going about their business. Imagine the female president of Taiwan giving a public statement apologizing to the Chinese people for "disrespectful behaviors and mean-spirited actions." Chuck Schumer and Ben Sasse could call a bipartisan press conference to release secret satellite photos of buildings in Taiwan that look shockingly similar to the infamous Hitler steam chambers. They could bring in the daughter of the Taiwanese ambassador to cry and say she saw CCP soldiers eating babies. But the jig would be up."

A clash of two ideological worlds! Pass me the popcorn.

Seriously, the fear of violence is being used to stoke unnecessary hostility and resentment. Code words, "Freedom and Democracy" are abstract and illusory. Readers need to be aware of this.

The Chinese just want to make money and enjoy their lives and families. The average person in Taiwan is the same way. Meanwhile in America, civil discord is rife, elections are in disarray, and the average American is worried about misogyny, wearing masks, and using pronouns correctly.

Where's the "freedom and democracy"?

Introduction

Over the weekend, I wrote three posts related to a potential war between China, Taiwan, and the U.S.

- Σ Frame: Fake News: China and Taiwan go to war (2021-10-08)
- Σ Frame: War between China and Taiwan makes no sense (2021-10-09)
- Σ Frame: A Nugget of Truth about China and Taiwan (2021-10-10)

The purpose of these writings was to give western readers a sense of context for what they are seeing on the news concerning China and Taiwan. I write from the perspective of a person living on the ground in Taiwan who is well familiarized with the culture, people, and history of Taiwan. I am not a political or military strategist, nor am I in a position to make predictions about the future, but I write because I believe western audiences are not very well informed about the situation, and I wish to emphasize that they may be misled by what they see in the news.

This post will review some of the responses these posts have received.

First of all, I appreciate the general concern over my personal safety. I understand that there are potential risks to being here, and yet, I choose to remain. Whether that is stupid or brave remains a question in point.

I was humbled to receive a full post response from Adam Piggott, Taiwan and Data Point Analysis (2021-10-09), who offered a thoughtful assessment of the risks involved with an expat's continuation as a resident of Taiwan. (Adam's analysis was also reposted on XYZ.) Getting feedback is important for a thorough consideration of the situation because, as Adam pointed out, it's hard to think clearly when you have vested interests in the outcome.

I do not believe the very idea of China going to war over the island of Taiwan is absurd (as Adam wrote). China is ready and willing to do whatever is necessary for the accession of Taiwan. However, war is the least attractive option. If there is to be a war, I believe other world powers, such as the U.S. or possibly Australia, would play a hand in that somehow. One possibility is that alliances with western powers would only embolden Taiwan's leadership to choose a path of greater resistance and prolong the conflict in an unnecessarily violent way.

Cultural Confusion in Communications

Over at Adam's place, Heresolong wrote,

> "…even if China invades Taiwan, they will not take the first shot." One of the stupidest sentences I have seen in some years."

A lot of seemingly stupid and contradictory statements have come out of the Taiwan leadership. This particular statement was a political appeal to mercies of China and the citizen's sense of moral rectitude. They have also said to the Australian government that they would "fight to the last man standing" in the hope of attracting their loyalty as an ally, which is equally inane.

In practice, the Chinese are versatile and opportunistic, and will use any lead to their advantage. There is a Chinese proverb that says, "The smart rabbit has two holes", which can mean many things (based on the context in which it is used), but one meaning is equivalent to the western adage, "Don't put all your eggs in one basket."

That said, much of President Tsai's speech is political posturing and does not represent the views of Taiwanese citizens as a whole, much like President Biden's stances do not reflect the views of many Americans. Be aware that other Taiwanese spokespersons/statements you might see/hear on the news may have been cherry-picked to fit the narrative.

The western preference in communication is to focus on reasonability and the factual consistency of objective truth. Chinese culture views this as a naïve (if not manipulative) exercise in philosophizing which is removed from reality. Instead, Chinese communication emphasizes the importance of recognizing the context in which a statement is offered, and then reading between the lines about what that implies. Context is everything.

For example, the Chinese/Taiwanese do not believe that "A man's word is his honor", nor do they ascribe any mythical power of righteousness to those who pose fealty to "the rule of law" as is common in English speaking nations. This is not the same as lawlessness, but rather, they know that much evil can be done while still conforming to the nitpickings of the law, that all men lie now and then (including police, politicians, and law officials), and that it is wiser to anticipate this as being a part of life. Western readers may be surprised to read this, but it is an honest assessment of human nature.

Western sensibilities are completely unfamiliar with this form of communication, and of course any such context, no matter how important, is usually neglected in translation, and more so when reported in the news, at which point it takes on a different, and yet graver impression of "truth" according to the western understanding of it as a factual thing. One common context that can be safely assumed behind all these statements is that the Taiwanese know they are a sitting duck, and are hoping to come through this with their lives, fortunes, and dignity intact. Hence, the political theatrics.

Eastern vs. Western Perspectives

Heresolong also wrote,

> "Taiwan would end up welcoming China…"
> "My understanding of the Taiwanese is that they mostly favor reuniting China because they view China as one country currently split due to their differences. I doubt many of the people are hoping that it happens because China invades, enslaves the free Taiwanese, and destroys their economic and political system. If that were their goal they could easily have just called the CCP at any time during the past fifty years and said, "Hey, we're done with this whole revolution thing. Come on over"."

I need to clarify a couple things before I can address Heresolong's main point.

The phrase, "China invades, enslaves the free Taiwanese", is a hypothetical scenario cooked up by western interpretations of the situation which assumes that "democracy = freedom" (of the individualistic sort). This is a uniquely western concept of freedom as I wrote about in yesterday's post. In China, the American concept of freedom is regarded as selfish and disruptive. They will point to the civil unrest and higher crime rates in America to justify this belief.

Underneath this assumption that "democracy = freedom" lies the "us versus them" mentality, which assumes that Taiwan should be more like the west (and all of its problems) than like China (with all of theirs). This attitude is similar to The White Man's Burden which is summarily misinterpreted as a justification of imperialism. China is well aware of this and views it as a challenge to their sovereignty.

In the past, this assumption (codified by the Marshall Plan) has been used by the U.S. as a justification for waging unwanted wars on distant corners of the planet. For example, the wars in Korea and Vietnam were essentially proxy wars with communist China. The Chinese version of history regards both of these wars as a U.S. “invasion” of Asia.* Now, about 3.5% of infants in Vietnam suffer birth defects related to Agent Orange, and this is expected to continue for another 6-12 generations! Many Vietnamese continue to carry resentment towards America to this day, and China has not forgotten either.

The recent debacle in Afghanistan only proves to the Chinese populace that the U.S. has never changed its ways!

On another technicality concerning, “we’re done with this whole revolution thing”, the government in Taiwan (KMT) traces its history back to the overthrow of the last Qing dynasty in 1911. (By that reckoning, it is now year 110 in Taiwan, and this is the date used on currency and official documents, not the Gregorian calendar year used in the west). So the KMT (Taiwan) is not currently in a revolt, the CCP (China) is, and as long as an independent government in Taiwan exists, that revolution remains unfinished. This stands as another impetus to “answer” what is called “The Taiwan Question“.

Finally, I’ll address Heresolong’s main point.

Although it is widely recognized that Taiwan is independent by any defacto measure, less than 6% of Taiwanese want to declare independence. The grand majority favor “maintaining the status quo”, which means that they want life and business to go on as usual. However, the general sentiment in Taiwan is that a reunification will happen eventually. There are a number of people in Taiwan, mostly upper class, who would prefer reunification mainly because it would make doing cross-strait business easier for them (tax structures, chains of management, regulations involving investments, visa requirements related to business trips, etc.). But the problematic issue is how, and what would that involve? If China could somehow guarantee certain conditions, then Taiwan would agree to reunification. But China continually ignores the issue of incentives to focus more on politicized issues and “saving face“. And then there is the whole question of trust, which China has not been nurturing. Hong Kong did not set a very good example for a merger. In sum, too much uncertainty in too many areas is why Taiwan has been dragging its feet towards reunification. It’s better to maintain the status quo as long as possible.

On a final note, some readers might think I am justifying China or Taiwan or “hating on America”. No, I’m simply explaining the differences of viewpoints.

 Calling this an “invasion” is not far-fetched. China has a long history of being invaded by foreign powers. For example, The First Opium War (1839-1842), The Second Opium War (1856-1860), The First Sino-Japanese War (1894-1895), The Boxer Rebellion (1899-1901), and The Second Sino-Japanese War (1937-1945). During WW2, Japan was the “invader” and KMT controlled China was allied with the U.S.*

Conservatives are stuck in the dog house, not the tree house.

Readership: All
Length: 900 words

It has been awhile since I have written anything of note, and that is due to two factors: I am too busy IRL, and every time I start drafting an article, it becomes old news by the end of the week. The controversial news and topics come at us like water from a fire hose. We aren't able to take it all in and confront each issue. That is by design.

Conservatives Construct their Arguments within the Liberal Frame

While this site is dedicated to "frame" in the context of sexual relationships, one's "frame" has consequences elsewhere in life. One consequence of your frame is how you view political issues. Are you a subject, or a citizen? Are you independent, or codependent?

The modern conservative is codependent, views themselves as loyal subjects who pay taxes and obey the laws. They worship the corporate monopoly, which provides for them. They worship police, as they can't defend themselves. They only talk about issues liberals bring up first, as they have nothing to offer themselves. They never say anything too controversial, because they want to participate in the conversation during tea time.

In other words, the modern conservative is a woman. As we know, women exist within, and rely upon, the frame of a man (or are supposed to, as God and nature demand). When we apply this analogy to American politics, the "man" holding frame is none other than the woke progressive left. Ironic because they are all androgynous.

Once you realize this about conservatives, everything makes sense. They talk and talk and talk about issues nonstop, never coming to any resolution, and never taking any action. The top YouTube commentators, podcasts, talk radio, and cable news shows are right wing for this very reason. They also never come to a conclusion about abortion. In fact, their attempts to "end" it have been nothing but a joke — one that gives them an opportunity to raise a ton of money to waste. Yet another similarity.

The two times in history when republicans controlled the presidency and at least one house resulted in zero accomplishments for this very reason. Feewings were consulted and consensus didn't happen.

For every divisive issue we are presented with, there are a litany of bullshit artists trying to grift. Then there are more honest actors out there, who refuse to think creatively out of fear. I can't tell the difference anymore.

Composition 5, with elaborate frame by Pedro Gonzalez.

Today I want to discuss the neoconservative impulse among those on the right wing. To be specific: I am talking about “right wing” commentators who are anti-neocon when it comes to the Middle East, even though they are the new cold warrior neocons who want a war with China, and can’t let go of the idea that ‘Murica should be an empire.

I am talking about people such as Pedro Gonzalez, Ryan Girdusky, Darren Beattie, Scott Greer, Colombian Bugle, Mike Cernovich, et al. You may have never heard of these people, but they are influential on social media platforms, as well as many of the new right’s websites/forums: the same ones that are informing the right wing voter base. They are the new talk radio.

All of these people mock the globalist American empire, neocons, the left, woke culture, and recognize that every single American institution has been coopted by the insane. Yet they desire to remain in that environment, and believe they can “take it back”. Several of the people mentioned above actually want the country to be taken over by the Catholic Church (an indication that they are closeted leftists jealous of power they don’t hold, possibly closeted on other issues as well, and are out of touch with reality by the span of a solar system).

There have been people on the far right and far left calling for some form of secession or peaceful separation of the states for many years. It’s a common sense solution to many problems, as there are, in fact, two America’s with differing social values and priorities. Recently, moderates and even left wing pundits have started discussing a “national divorce.” That should be an indication of the general public’s desire, but because people on the left want it, now the right wing pundits have to oppose it. Consensus on any real working solution is anathema to the distractions away from the real issues. So now we know what’s really important to them.

The marriage between liberals and conservatives in American politics is a toxic relationship, and the problem is the Republican establishment and conservatives who want to scream "no" to everything, even if they were asking for it 5 minutes ago. When you think about it, the right acts like women. Liberals are the husband and conservatives are the wife, and the wife has to be contentious and disagreeable about everything.

The left knows what they want, and they act with deliberate and thoughtful purpose to achieve it — just like a man. They are patient and take an incremental approach until they are in a position to gain a lot of ground at once — just like a man. I don't know what the Republican party and conservative movement wants, but it's probably saying "no" and throwing a tantrum over every issue no one cares about — just like a woman.

Who stands against this idea? The people I listed above. They acknowledge that the conservative movement was a failure, that we are on a leftward trend, etc., but they refuse to break away from the failed thinking of past conservatives. They can't divorce because they have nothing of their own contribution to stand upon. They can't stop behaving like a woman and create their own frame.

Have Tattoos? Will Slide!

Introduction

Back in 1960, when my father (late Silent Generation) was in high school, smoking was popular. When my father started hunting for a wife, one of his non-negotiable vetting requirements was that she didn't smoke. In fact, about 42% of the U.S. population were regular smokers at that time, so this was a rather stringent requirement. Virginity was assumed but not expected, and this was not discussed too much.

In 1980, my alpha older cousin (of the Jones Generation) had a list of vetting requirements, not for good girls, but for bad girls. "Drinks, smokes, talks sh!t, does drugs, has tattoos — If she has any three out of five and she isn't wearing a wedding band, then she's DTF." He said this brief checklist of s1ut tells was pretty reliable.

While I admired my older cousin for being charismatic, athletic, and popular, I wasn't like him at all. His side of the family called me "Reverend". When I was in high school in 1990 (Gen X), one of my primary vetting requirements was that she didn't do drugs. Since drugs were rather unpopular at that time, it was not so hard to find eligible women. (This was before the advent of designer prescription drugs in the late 1990s.) I had another requirement that she be a virgin, but this, OTOH was extremely difficult to find. If I ever stated this requirement, then I was ghosted in a jiffy.

My alpha cousin's daughter was a Millennial, and somewhat like her father. Her vetting requirements (ca. 2010) were for him to be tall, muscular, and funny. She went on to do the alpha seed, beta need trajectory.

Fast forward to 2020. My oldest daughter (Gen Z) is in high school. She tells me one of the current vetting requirements is not having any tattoos. Non-virginity is assumed. (I'm thankful that my daughter has stayed free from these influences.)

Teenage girls talking while standing in hallway

Like smoking was for my father's generation, or recreational drugs was for mine, why does the current generation consider tattoos to be a good indicator of whether or not a woman is wife material?

Oscar shared a link to an article that reports scientific evidence in support of this notion.

Business Insider: STUDY: People With Tattoos Are More Promiscuous (2012 May 25)

> Introduction. Body piercing and tattooing are accepted by a growing number of teenagers and young adults as a way of self-expressing. Some authors suggest association between body piercings/tattoos and early sexual initiation, higher number of sexual partners, or risky sexual behaviors.
> Aim. The aim of the study was to evaluate sexual behaviors among young adults with body modifications (BMs) — tattoos and piercings.
> Methods. One hundred twenty young healthy adults, ages between 20 and 35, were included in the population study. The study group was divided into three subgroups: controls (N = 60), adults with tattoos (N = 28), and adults with piercings (N = 32). The research instrument was a self-prepared questionnaire containing 59 questions assessing socioepidemiological parameters, sexual behaviors, incidents of sexual harassment in the past, and self-attractiveness evaluation, as well as questions concerning tattoos and piercings. Socioepidemiological variables and sexual behaviors were compared between subgroups.
> Main Outcome Measures. To assess and describe the correlation between having BM—tattoos and piercings—and sexual behaviors in the population of young adults by using the logistic regression model.
> Results. Adults with BMs have had their first intercourse statistically earlier and were more sexually active compared with controls. There were no statically significant differences in sexual orientation, sexual preferences, engaging in risky sexual behaviors, frequency of masturbation, and history of sexual abuse between the groups. In contrast, the frequency of sexual intercourses was statistically higher and oral sex was more likely to be a dominant sexual activity in adults with BM compared with controls. The multivariate logistic model revealed that adults with BM were four times less likely to participate in religious practices and twice more likely to have early sexual initiation.

> Conclusions. Having BM is associated with early sexual initiation and more liberal attitudes toward sexual behaviors but not with engaging in risky sexual behaviors.

In summary, people with tattoos and body piercings begin having sex at younger ages, have sex more often, have more oral sex, and are far less likely to be religious. To put it more accurately, a person who fits this profile is more likely to have tattoos, and this correlation is prevalent enough to create a stereotype.

This further confirms a previous post detailing a List of Slut Tells (2017-10-15), which includes tattoos. Back in 2018, Lori Alexander broke the internet when she declared that Men prefer debt-free virgins with no tattoos. It's truly a thing.

Of course, this is all common knowledge among the younger set.

Start Small to Build Internal Locus of Control

Jack · 14 October 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Focus on faith, not on failure.

Readership: Single Men;

It's important for a man to learn how to deal with women's little mind games, and how to interact with women successfully. Many younger men are at a loss in this respect, so it's good for us to focus on the process.

In this post, I'll explore part of an interview with an east Asian PUA who goes by the name Lee Cho.

Red Pill Dad: Meet the players! Interview with Lee Cho. (2021-10-04)

This interview is from a secular PUA, so for the sake of this discussion, I will ignore the issues of motivations and relational goals, and focus on the subjective internal psychology that is conveyed here. In studying this interview, I wish to point out the kind of mindset that builds confidence and faith which is achievable, not only by PUAs, not only by Christians, but by everyone.

In one part of the interview, Lee Cho describes the challenge of developing an internal locus of control, and he touches on a few important points.

> "When transitioning from beginner to intermediate, the biggest sticking point tends to ironically be doing a high volume of sets. As a beginner, you need volume to familiarise yourself with the basics."

"Doing a high volume of sets" means to approach a large number of women, attempting to carry a conversation, and building rapport. An important point that Lee alludes to but fails to mention is that these approaches, in the beginning, are going to be with women who are rather unattractive.

Yes, this may be uninteresting and maybe even unpleasant, but we might think of it as a rite of passage. In the beginning when you have no experience, when you're awkward and fearful, and your confidence is weak, start talking with all women, not just those that pass the boner test. The point of this exercise is to get some experience with interacting socially with women, to identify and get a grip on your own internal locus of control, and use this as a base to develop your confidence. Only after a man has reached this point is he ready to tackle more challenging "sets".

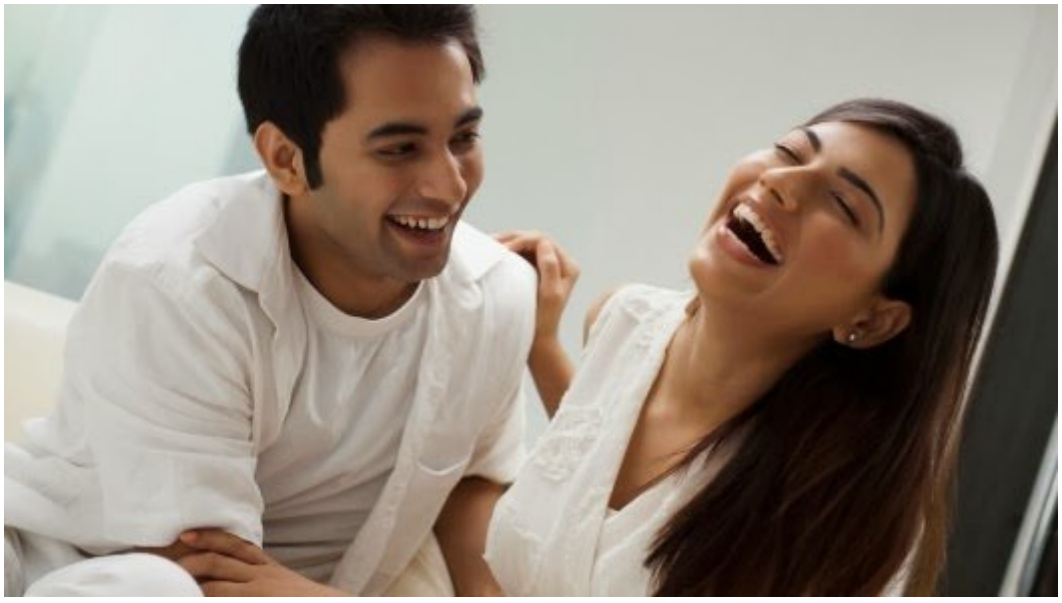
> "But once you can reliably hold conversations, it's time to start approaching more selectively – girls whom you genuinely like. This more authentic approach allows you to hyper-focus your mental/emotional/physical energy onto each girl, which simultaneously makes you want to perform the skills well and so pushes you to do so whilst generating raw man-to-woman attraction. The more of these types of interactions one has, the better their skills will become, and the more they will internalise what it is to be a guy that girls are attracted to as a result of the man-to-woman attraction. Oh, and results will become more consistent too – less flakey numbers and better dates."

Here, we notice that Lee is NOT focused on techniques, pick up lines, or notch counts. Instead, he is focused on keeping his inner game together and developing his own charisma and confidence. Lee goes on to describe this in detail.

> "Note that this does not necessarily mean you become needy, which is an issue many beginner and intermediate gamers have. In fact, quite the opposite. Neediness occurs when you are stuck in your head and focused on avoiding what you don't want, e.g. her rejecting you. But the best way to attract her is by focusing instead on performing the correct skills/behaviours well, e.g. eye contact, pace of speech, closing distance, staying on topic, directing the conversation, qualifying etc."

Lee Cho is correct to say that neediness is a poison to one's confidence and a chick repellant. Instead, a man needs to Develop an Attitude of Detachment.

Lee mentions some expressions of "correct skills/behaviors", but he doesn't go into detail about how these habits should be executed, because it cannot be made any more specific than this. What is "correct" and what "works" will depend on each man – his personality, interests, values, and style of communication. The task of determining what these "correct skills/behaviors" are for you as an individual involves monitoring the feedback loop and testing yourself in responding appropriately and authentically. Only through practice can a man hone the impact he has on others. This requires you to be aware of how certain people and situations affect your emotional state and your frame of mind, being conscientious of your impression on others, and learning to emphasize certain behaviors and expressions to bring out your own personal charm and charisma.



> "By having sharp focus on these skills, you soon become present to the moment because you are now focused > solely on taking action, i.e. in your body and not in your head. In essence, your level of satisfaction comes from your actions instead of her reactions, which dispels any care for whether or not she likes you."

When he uses phrases like being "present in the moment", and being "in your body and not in your head", I get the strong impression that he is talking about a heart-led consciousness as opposed to a cognitively oriented consciousness. As we learned from Ed Hurst, the heart-led consciousness is at the very core of authentic Christian living.

The last sentence (in bold) is where a lot of men fumble, and part of this is because men are naturally goal-oriented. They require certain key outcomes or specific milestones in order to get a sense of satisfaction and achievement. But this is a performance-based mentality, which is burdensome in developing one's Flow. Instead, men should nurture an internal sense of achievement from being in control of themselves and the situation (as much as possible), maintaining frame when challenged, expressing themselves well, and responding appropriately to the context, regardless of how it turns out.

> "Consider it a professional, success-oriented form of self-amusement if you like. Counter-intuitively, she will like you more. This is what beginners and also intermediates need to internalise to progress beyond their level, amongst other things."

In my experience, this "self-amusement" is exactly what it is like for me in those moments when I am strong in faith – feeling "in the groove", so to speak. And yes, people eat it up, especially women. Creating the self-esteem necessary to maintain this state within any given context requires a spiritual posture of humility, and the disciplined continuation of this state forms the crucible in which character and charisma are developed and refined.

In the emailbox, a reader describes a technique he learned about how to deal with his girlfriend. Not all of his thinking is true to Red Pill lore, but he's found what works for him, and that's what matters most. Judging by his English, I take it that he's not a native speaker. It logically follows that he's not dealing with a western woman. So this should be taken into account in our critique. I've broken his message into sections and edited the worst spots for clarity.

I know it seems like the entire global population is nearing it's final point of extinction, and reading the news these days only seems to confirm this impression. But there is no sense in accepting this as my personal reality. I pledge you, it's actually not. I was in the precise same affliction many years back and I want to tell you about 3 excellent details that I did before to get my personal ex-girlfriend to tumble back excited about me.

I attempted your approach of "making demands", and it did not work for me because she expected my request for better "bids" to be interfering in her mind. But by doing this, I did find that her mind is the wall around her heart which must be broken down. After a time, I found that this wall is actually distrust. But it was not easy to see, because she did not behave in the typical withdrawal method when distrust is present. Then I understood what you wrote about "head trust" versus "heart trust". I had to find a way to adjust the trust she was giving me to get more "heart trust" and no wall of "head trust".

The single most important step in getting your ex back, and often times determines whether the relationship is any good, is what I will call, "Cut, Open, and Proceed". To do this, go like this.

1. Cut — "Cut to the chase." Cut the bad pattern. Cut away the distractions and objections. Cut out the excuses and justifications. Cut into the real issue.

2. Open — Open up an alternative style for her to view the situation. Open her mind to see why it is better.
3. Proceed — Assume she will accept your alternative style, and then proceed along that way. No waiting for her agreement.

I can tell you, this method works!

The Application

The past me was perpetually apologizing! There are some things that deserve an apology and a few that will not, but in either case recently, it is not actually the time to apologize, but to follow "Cut, Open, and Proceed". When this is in place, I set myself up to create our starting point to enter a better interaction. Only after this is done, then I will want to read whether the time is right to commit my apology.

The past me was reluctant to stop sending text messages! It seems that text messaging is indeed so easy and affordable to let her know I care, but then again, I stop to say to myself, "It's not improving your position!" Sending drop text messages to my ex is simply just a venture of suffering. It is time to "Cut"!

Ever since I stopped sending texts, she begins to text me. "Now why won't you text me anymore? Are you gonna be ignoring me from now on?"

Now it is time for "Open"! "No time for texting anymore. But if you care to see me, I will be running in the park on Saturday morning." No further response is necessary.

Now it is time for "Proceed"! On Saturday, she came to the park ready to run, and after that, she is willing to follow me. Now I am running my girlfriend out of the park every Saturday!

Concluding Statements

Everyday, people need what they can't bring. We men naturally assume we should have a girl on our arms, and perhaps you are thinking that this girl is the final thing you need to make the life complete. It likely should be. Nonetheless, truth be told, most people have a hard time coming to arrive at some of the basic property [character?]. I'm talking about the frame of mind to carry out the necessities of life. It completely goes against all that our logical system tells us to carry out, but nevertheless, on the contrary, bringing "Cut, Open, and Proceed" into your life does the job. Follow these steps as received from me, and you will also be on the new way, and also, you'll get your ex within order to decrease the lazy and back to crazy about you.

Of course, it's not possible to match all break ups. Even so, you have to accept one thing in particular and also understand it. You've got to tell her how you think, and show her she can say "yes" to your way. Moreover, it is advisable to give her your location and direction in life, and then make the effort to perform like it. But do not reveal your position when it is usually harming you. You are lucky if the pair of you are isolated so no one can break your relationship!

If other men become familiar with the guidelines I had been using, they can present themselves as reliable to trust and make a quicker progress. It would've beyond doubt saved me several lost years at the same time! If you could write a post for my method, readers can leave it bookmarked for their moment of defense.

Consider this and employ it to your benefit!

Another Schism will Come

Will the Catholic Church embrace LGBT?

Oscar shared this article from PJ Media, Roman Catholic Church Affirms Teaching on Marriage, Media Hardest Hit (2021 March 15).

> "On Monday, the Vatican reaffirmed the Roman Catholic Church's 2,000-year-old doctrine that marriage is between one man and one woman and that homosexual acts are illicit. Therefore, the Vatican stated that the church cannot bless same-sex weddings because that would lead to confusion about the doctrine of marriage.
> This should not surprise anyone with a basic familiarity with historic Christianity or with the Roman Catholic Church. The New Testament clearly condemns homosexual activity and Jesus explicitly affirmed the teaching of Genesis that marriage is between one man and one woman. The Catholic Church has a 2,000-year tradition of upholding this basic definition of marriage that, in historical terms, only came under fire yesterday."

Reserved Catholics might take satisfaction in hearing the Vatican reaffirm their position on the time tested definition of marriage, but they should not allow themselves to become complacent about this, thinking that the battle is over. It's not that the Catholic church intends to behave differently from the wider cultural drift. Rather, it's more the case that the Catholic church is intent on following the prescription for convergence that was pioneered by Protestant denominations.

The "established sequence" is to ordain women first. The reason for this is twofold. One is that it "softens up" opposition to such changes downrange, among at least some, because they get accustomed to these kinds of substantial changes. The second is that once you concede that women can be ordained, you've already conceded that sex differences are not material for certain roles — that a woman can be a deacon (which is where it will start, just like it did with the Episcopalians), and eventually a priest, as well as a man can — and at that point, the door is wide open for dissociating one's sex from other roles, such as the spousal role. If a men and women are interchangeable as priests, then they can be interchangeable as lovers, and as spouses.

Once you understand this gradual slide down the slippery slope, then it becomes obvious that if the Catholic church endorsed gay unions now, then it would not be following the same "order", and would draw resistance that would otherwise be abated if the established process "order" were followed.

Trying to "skip" the women's ordination "step" here could create a schism in the church, because the groundwork would not be laid for the liberalization of gays, as it was done in the Protestant churches. As far as I am aware, every Protestant denomination that conducts actual ordinations and has ordained women has also blessed same sex couples in some way — they aren't separable, because they follow the same logic. This is why sex roles, gender issues, and homosexuality are inextricably intertwined within the broader fourth wave narrative. This is why the many twits on the Manosphere, and the "right wing internet" who are dead-set on sex differences and sex roles but who don't want to touch gay issues with a 100-foot pole, don't understand the game and how it is being played … pretty much at all, so they are getting well and truly played.

So in the grand scheme of things, this pronouncement by the CDF wasn't very surprising at all. The thing to look for in the years ahead is the pressure to ordain women into the diaconate. That's the proverbial brick in the dam for the Catholics.

The Coming Schism

It's likely true that I've probably dealt with a lot more LBGT issues and the like being in the Washington DC area for the past 25 years. The LBGT issue, in my opinion, is going to lead to a schism in U.S. evangelicalism that mirrors what has happened in the mainline churches here in the past 30 years or so. The evangelicals are "behind" the mainline because of generational differences. In evangelical types who are above around age 40 (i.e. Boomers and Xers), the tendency is to have an approach towards LGBT like – "It's defiled. Let them re-orient. Let other re-oriented ex-gays deal with them, and that's that." The people under 40, though (and it gets more intense and larger as a percentage the younger you go) are much, much less inclined to take that approach and are not "tolerant" of it, tending either to see homosexuality as a sin like any other (similar to adultery) or, in some cases, seeing it as a non-sin, provided it is channeled in the same ways normal couples do (i.e., marriage). These positions are very small among older evangelicals, but very entrenched among younger ones. The generational difference is massive, and it will lead to splits in the evangelical church just as the mainline has had recently. This will surprise many, I think, who tend to see evangelicalism as more monolithic on this issue, because the younger generation has not yet "come into power" in the evangelical church. When that happens, the split will happen soon thereafter, and I think that will blindside people as much as the swiftness of the acceptance of LGBT in the broader culture did.

I don't see an easy solution. To me, it's fairly comfortable, because the Orthodox Church is institutionally not set up to undergo massive changes like that, so I have the luxury of observing it elsewhere. Orthodoxy doesn't see gays as uniquely "defiled" in the way evangelicals do. Someone who is an active homosexual is treated in the same way as someone who is an active adulterer, or someone who is openly fornicating and so on, and is not welcome at the chalice — but also not seen as singularly defiled in a way that the adulterer is not. Nevertheless, gay marriage, ordination of openly gay coupled clergy, toleration of gay relationships, and so on is not a thing in Orthodoxy, and likely never will be at least in any reasonable timeframe. The Catholics, I am not so sure about because their leadership is going left, but they are so large and have such an institutionalized traditional movement now that I think that unless the Catholic left plays its cards perfectly, any move to normalize gays there would likely lead to a de facto schism, at least in the American and other Western European Catholic churches. And it is unlikely to play out quickly there, either. I expect that if the left manages to hold power in Rome after Pope Francis dies, the top issue on the agenda will be getting women into the clergy by means of the so-called "permanent diaconate", which would initiate a process that, everywhere it has happened, has eventually resulted in acceptance of gays (because it must … it is the same thing once you accept that men and women are interchangeable clerically, that they must be so sexually as well … it takes a generation to get there, but that's about it). Adam Piggott, a Sedevacantist, has anticipated this game plan for some time.

In the evangelical world, however, I see this happening more quickly simply because evangelicalism is not structured in the same way, and is very "PR" sensitive. Among the peers that the younger evangelicals will be aiming to evangelize once they assume leadership roles, being against LGBT, or seeing them as uniquely defiled and so on, is like being a member of the KKK. It will make the kind of evangelism as we have known of evangelical types in the past (i.e., popular, aping popular cultural forms, expressions, memes, and experiences) essentially impossible, because this issue is a generational marker, period, for the young.

Conclusions

Mainline churches, evangelical churches, and the Catholic church are all on the same path to LGBT acceptance, with the only difference being that they are at different milestones along the way currently — the mainline being the furthest down that path, closely followed by evangelicals, and Catholics distantly trailing up the rear.

Protestantism is already too far down the yellow brick road to change course now. The mainline is already converged, and I do not see how evangelicalism (as we know it) will survive in any way intact once the younger wave reaches leadership positions which, given the way things seem to work there, won't be very long now.

The USA will still have plenty of churches in 15 years, busy on Sundays. But they will be heretical across the board on any traditional teaching regarding sex or gender, while the Christians who still adhere to those will be considered to be KKK/Fred Phelps. That's what's going to happen, I think.

The church won't fall, it will just be transformed. It already is. It's just going to go further down the same path.

Disclosing the Taboo of Masculine Sexuality

It's not uncommon to see lots of discussion about sex and fornication in a Men's space like the Manosphere, but what is unique about such discussions at Σ Frame is that we consider its effect on us spiritually and our salvation. Practically all other Christian Red Pill sites avoid this topic altogether, even forbidding it. This is wrong for several reasons.

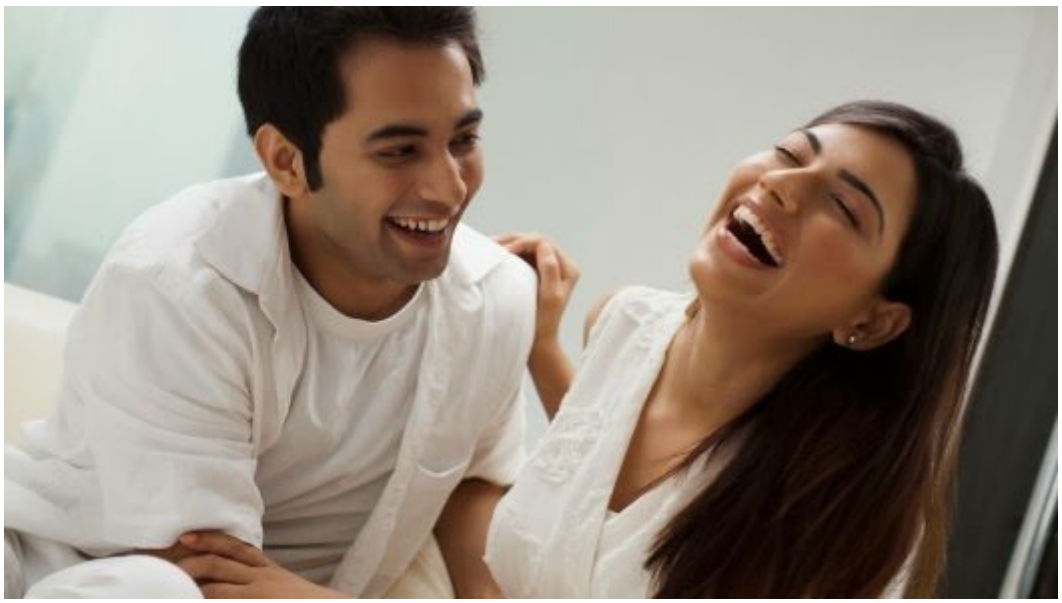
- The area of sexuality and sexual intercourse is one of the most powerful spiritual manifestations of the soul, having eternal ramifications.
- The fact that God has made the blessings and curses of human sexuality applicable to unbelievers does not mark it as somehow less sacred or holy, but rather more so.
- The Bible covers sexual conduct in excruciating detail. It's there for a reason and should not be overlooked nor considered a taboo.
- Sex is a basic need for men. We are driven to have it. We need it like we need to breathe air or drink water. It's good that men are driven to it because if we weren't, the human race would have died out a long time ago.
- A key developmental milestone for a man is his relationship to his own sexuality, and I mean that in the broadest possible terms, "sex" including his maleness, his masculinity, and his manhood.

The church does an OK job with "maleness". ("You're a male, not a female. You're different from women.") But some churches have bought into the equality moxies more heavily, and have thereby puffed up women's pride.

The church thinks it does really well with "manhood" (spiritual development, a man's relationship with God the Father, coming into sonship, etc.) But much of this is limited to doctrinal teachings and seldom goes into life applications.

The church does a terrible job with "masculinity" (men's relationship to the world and other humans, and men's sexual conduct and behavior). In fact, the church and most everywhere else has been trashing and demonizing masculinity for decades. Everyone, including most men, completely fails at teaching and understanding "masculinity".

Leaving aside everything else, we're homing in on that part of "masculinity" that deals with a man's relationship to sexual conduct, and his relationship to women. How he deals with women, the role women play in his life, the role sex plays in his life, the kinds of women he likes, the relationships he has with women, the relationships he wants with women, and living with and interacting with women.



Sexual behavior and conduct is part of a man's masculinity. It directly relates to how he views women, how he relates to them, and how he deals with them. It's something he has to learn about, try out, and eventually master.

One of the ways men do this is through fornication. Trial and error. You find out that without a human connection, it's pretty meaningless.

You find out that if you don't love, trust, or care about the woman you just fornicated with, it's at best fleetingly pleasurable; at worst painful and dangerous. Most of the time it's just mundane. You find out that it's all pretty much the same and not worth the effort unless there's something more profound going on. Roosh discovered this. He coined the term "player burnout" after finding out that all the sex he'd been having was the same – same positions, same Game, same fungible women, same tactile sensations, same vague feelings of emptiness and meaninglessness afterwards. He realized he was just going through the motions, it was unsatisfying, and he had grown bored with it.

The earlier a man learns these things about sex, the better:

- Women are pretty much the same. (AWALT)
- Women are not complex or hard to understand.
- Sex isn't worth the effort without some connection to her.
- Don't take women seriously.
- Until a woman proves herself worthy, she gets nothing from you.
- Under no circumstances is a woman you're not married to "entitled" to anything from you.
- Women don't run the show and don't tell you what to do

It's better to learn this in your late teens and early 20s as a young single guy, than it is to learn this 15 years into a marriage with children's lives in tow. The problem is that the overwhelming narrative in western culture and in the church is wholly gynocentric, and male viewpoints are dismissed, ignored, and demonized as misogynistic.

Maybe a lot of men have to find mastery over sexual behavior and their own sexuality by misusing it first. Through some misuse, you might be able to find proper use. Yes, I think it's less injurious for men to engage in some misuse.

I am not saying it's "OK"; I'm just saying that men bear fewer and less painful consequences through fornication than women do. I'm saying it's easier for men to recover from fornication than it is for women. Men have more time to figure it out than women do. Men have less to lose from making errors. Is this fair? No. But it's not fair that men have to work so damn hard to get anything. It's not fair that men have to build themselves up from nothing and women are born with enormous advantages. It's not fair that women are born with inherent value; and men have to create their own value. Life's tough all over. We've all got our crosses to bear.

I don't know if fornication "leads to" salvation or not. Maybe it does. Maybe it doesn't. But it is part of a lot of men's journeys. It's a stop on the road for a lot of men. That is because sexual behavior is part of men, it's part of masculinity, it is essential to a man's nature. It is also because our society has demonized men's fullest expressions of male sexuality. It is also because the Church has completely failed at expressing and teaching masculinity. It is also because men are strongly discouraged from overt expressions of sexual behavior, desire, and need.

We have to do better with masculinity. We have to do better teaching masculinity. We have to stop demonizing masculinity. We have to let men flex their masculinity muscles. We have to give men some room to run, some space to make errors, some grace to return to the fold. Let's also remember that nothing about men is perfect. Our masculinity, our expressions of masculinity, or others' interpretations of those expressions – none of these things are perfect. We move closer to perfection through trial and error.

We have to do better. Otherwise, we will only get more of what we've been getting for the past few decades – more fornication from attractive men; and more dysfunction from less attractive men. We have GOT to do a better job with our boys and our men.

Sometimes the truth on Σ Frame is freeing, joyful and funny. Sometimes it hits close to home and hurts a little. This post could go either way, depending on the reader's life experiences.

It is easy for men to think that women's sexual authority is the only/primary "tool" most of them have, but this impression is because sex (or the lack thereof) is the "tool" that affects men the most acutely. As Scott once said, "Men's love language is sex", so when that outlet is shut off, it hurts and feels like hate, especially when it is done as a vengeance.

Aside from sex, women have all sorts of tools that developed from sex and from their physically weaker nature. Here's a list of their most common tools.

1. Arguing for power/control, not to resolve the issue.
2. Avoiding Commitment
3. Backbiting
4. Backchannel Communications
5. Bait and Switch
6. Bulverizing
7. Carrot on a Stick — "If you do what I want/give me what I want, I might have sex with you."
8. Chivalry — "Don't hit me… I'm a girl"
9. Claiming entitlement and special privileges — "Men need to man up!"
10. Conniving
11. Conspiracy
12. Damseling — Contrived emotional ploys for sympathy, e.g. tears, AKA the "waterworks"
13. Deception
14. Demeaning your character in front of your friends and/or children.
15. Displacement, e.g. throwing red herrings or changing the subject
16. Duluth
17. Duplicity
18. Feigning Innocence or Ignorance — "I don't know… It just happened!"
19. Feminine Mystique — "I changed my mind."; "Just because I felt like it."
20. Fraud
21. Gaslighting
22. Instigating Conflict — "Let's you and him fight"
23. Interrupting

24. Machiavellianism
25. Manipulation
26. Mendacity, natural due to inherent solipsism
27. Meretricious Charms
28. Outright defiance as a challenge
29. Partial compliance to give the appearance of compliance
30. Passive Aggressiveness
31. Plausible Deniability
32. Pretending to be helpless
33. Pretending to be devoid of any moral agency.
34. Pretending to have moral superiority
35. Psychological Projection
36. Sabojacking (destroying any enterprise that isn't done her way, or to her liking, and/or using this threat point to assume operative control of the enterprise)
37. Sabotage (revenge)
38. Saying things purely to hurt you
39. Secrecy
40. Shifting Responsibility
41. Slander
42. Solipsistic Fluidity of Truth
43. Steamrolling — "It's easier to get forgiveness than it is to get permission."
44. Subterfuge
45. Subversion
46. Talking Sh!t, e.g. to get attention, to be obnoxious, to buy time while wasting yours, etc.
47. The Blame Game
48. The Shame Game
49. Ultimatums
50. Using your goodness and honor as a weak spot against you — "He'd never divorce me, so I can behave however I want!"

This list could stretch into the hundreds, as well as a list of correlating augmenters (e.g. accomplices, make up, cosmetic surgery, having two email addresses, two phone numbers, two online accounts, even two names). Secrecy is absolutely necessary to pull it off.

The Solipsistic Hamster (AKA Psychological Dissociation) and various other Psychological defense mechanisms must be routinely employed to keep themselves together in this state of madness.

It's getting harder to find good information.

Introduction

I don't rely on Wikipedia because I know a lot of useful and important information is intentionally excluded. I know this from first hand experience. About 10 years ago, a knowledgeable colleague told me some helpful information about Restless Leg Syndrome (RLS, also called Shaky or Twitchy Leg Syndrome) which I had been suffering from. I tried it and it worked within minutes! I was so impressed that I told him to add this information to Wikipedia and he did.

It was deleted the very next day.

The information he added was the fact that Chinese medicine treats "shaky leg syndrome" with calcium or magnesium supplements, which shift the ratio of iron concentration in synovial fluid and prevents the sticking of joints, most notable in the knees while falling asleep. After his addition was deleted with the comment "undocumented folklore", I realized that Big Pharma makes a lot of money off all the sophisticated medications for treating "shaky leg syndrome", and if everyone knew that simply popping a Tums or Rolaids antacid (containing Ca and/or Mg) would prevent it, a lot of people would be sleeping better at night, and Pharma would lose a lot of money.

Interestingly, the description of RLS at the Mayo Clinic cites an iron deficiency as being related to the cause of RLS, not an excess, which would be closer to the truth. If people read this and took iron supplements, they would be making the symptoms worse!

Since Infogalactic was introduced by Vox Day in 2016, I've used it regularly to find technical words and descriptions of different topics that I study. It has proven great value as a basic source of ready and reader-friendly information. The main reason I prefer using Infogalactic over Wikipedia is because it is much less biased and tends to include many ideas, terms, and viewpoints that were common before 2016, and which have since been purged by MGM.

Infogalactic is now blacklisted

Today, while researching information for some future posts, I discovered that G00gle is now shadowbanning everything from Infogalactic.com. This change happened sometime over the past few days.

When I typed the string "infogalactic" into the G00gle search box, you would expect Infogalactic to be at the top of the results list, or at least on the first page, given it's popularity. However, browsing through the first ten pages of results revealed nothing from infogalactic.com. Instead, the results were filled with left handed editorials demonizing Infogalactic and Vox Day.

However, I did find some interesting information and viewpoints on some of the sites that came up, which I'll convey below. These excerpts give us a snapshot of the information war that was going on during Trump's presidency. It also indicates how far internet media has slid down the slippery slope since then.

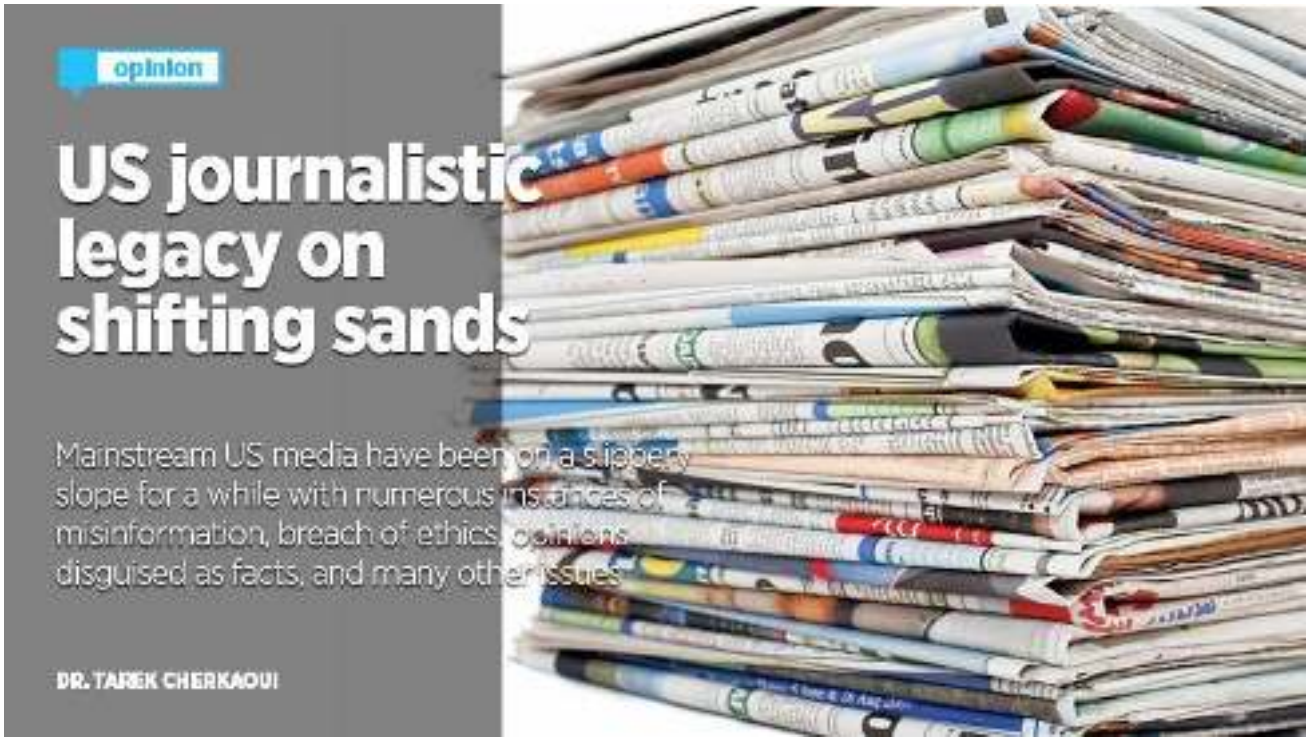

Image Source: AA: US journalistic legacy on shifting sands (2018-09-14)

At the top of the results was an article from Wired: Welcome to the Wikipedia of the Alt-Right (2017-06-21), with the byline, "Wikipedia was the rare place where people across the political spectrum could hash out solid facts. A wave of defectors is challenging that."

> "But Infogalactic is only one of a number of crowdsourced encyclopedias tailored to various conservative factions. There's Metapedia, a wiki with a white supremacist bent, which is published in 16 languages but is especially popular in Hungary and Germany. (On Metapedia, Barack Obama isn't just a former president, he's a "mixed race former president," and the Holocaust is a genocide only according to "politically correct history.") Or there's Conservapedia, a version aimed at religious conservatives and created by Andrew Schlafly, son of the conservative activist Phyllis Schlafly."

Another article from the Washington Post was headlined, Silicon Valley escalates its war on white supremacy despite free speech concerns (2017-08-16).

> "Some adherents to the alt-right — a fractious coalition of neo-Nazis, white supremacists, and those opposed to feminism — said in interviews they will press for the federal government to step in and regulate Facebook and Google, an unexpected stance for a movement that is skeptical of government meddling."
> "Doofuses in the conservative movement say it's only censorship if the government does it," said Richard Spencer, an influential white nationalist. "YouTube and Twitter and Facebook have more power than the government. If you can't host a website or tweet, then you effectively don't have a right to free speech."

Here is something useful! There is a downloadable extension, Infogalactic Transporter, on the Portuguese Chrome Web Store that allows the user to easily jump between Wikipedia and the associated page on Infogalactic. A Firefox version is also available from Mozilla (Get it while it's still available!!!)

There were also a lot of dead links labeled, "No results found…", etc. Apparently, a lot of websites have redacted all internal links to Infogalactic.

Surprisingly, the Infogalactic Facebook page is still active, last updated on 2019-12-25. How has it survived The Great Digital Purge?

Epilogue

When it was first released, Infogalactic had the ambitious goal of replacing Wikipedia as the top online encyclopedia in the coming years. This was deemed critical in fighting the culture war against censorship and political correctness that is arguably the greatest threat facing Western civilization.

To help turn the tides in favor of the unpleasant truth, we need to use Infogalactic and other non-converged sites and support them as much as we can.

I encourage all readers to use Infogalactic. Don't forget to check out Infogalactic News and Infogalactic Tech. These are no-filler, Drudge Report-like sites that provide links to the most important news stories out there.

Click here to join the "Burn Unit" providing a modest, monthly donation to help maintain Infogalactic.

UPDATE

Neon Revolt shared another source for downloading Infogalactic Transporter, available for most browsers, which will redirect all Wikipedia links over to Infogalactic automatically for you. I highly suggest using it, and getting involved with Infogalactic.

Introduction

In a previous post, The Roman Life Script (2021 May 28), a comparison was made between the downfall of ancient Rome, and the current situation in the West. As we know from history (or the lack thereof during this time period), the implosion of the central power of Rome and being conquered by the Goths led to a few hundred years of historical listlessness, what has since then been referred to as the Dark Ages. Governments shrunk into fiefdoms. Religion was confined to monasteries. The recording of history stalled. The music, arts, and philosophy sputtered to a standstill. At the grass roots level, the majority of people had extremely short life spans (~26 years), and spent most of it in basic subsistence farming, localized small manual trades, and recidivism.

The comparison of ancient Rome and modern western culture inevitably leads to the question of whether the present decadence and decline will be followed by a period of hard-scrabble peasantry ruled by warlords.

What would a Second Dark Ages be like?

Cameron and Lastmod painted a picture of a bleak atomized world, but still functional on the most basic level.

cameron232 wrote,

> "Predicted by some to be like the worst aspects of Brazil, India and the EU. Best guess is non-elite white people will exist as hicks in the countryside."

lastmod wrote,

After the Roman Empire "collapsed" sure, the immediate effects were great… but many parts of the empire continued to "function" normally in practice despite the lack of central authority depending on the province, ability of the local governor and loyalty to him in that area… the startings / stirrings of the feudal system.

A scene from Mad Max: Fury Road (2015).

A Second Dark Ages is Unlikely

The US certainly won't last forever, but its demise isn't coming very soon. There are several reasons for that.

- No other culture is poised to take over the same global role in a cultural sense. China? Nope. Confucianism doesn't sell outside East Asia, it isn't attractive, accessible, popular. China is well poised to eject the U.S. from predominance in Asia, but not to replace the U.S. as the singular global hegemon. Islam? Nope. Same reason.
- No other civilization has the military heft to unseat the U.S., and that military hefty isn't going to simply implode, either. Someone will control the vast amount of disproportionate, raw power that the U.S. military has, whether it is the U.S. or a successor to the U.S. state, not someone else.
- The name of the game, in terms of power, is moving beyond the "nation state" phase of the game. It hasn't moved past it quite yet, but that's where it's going. States will continue to exist, but the real power will be (and in many ways already is) operating at a level above the nation-state level, and manipulating nation-states via its power. Nation-states, and the military and cultural power that they project, will be permitted to continue more or less as long as it serves the actual power holders, who are globalist/supra-national in scope and identity, for that to be the case.

Much more likely scenarios involve the internal change of the U.S. from its current arrangements, socio-politically, to a successor arrangement by means of generational change which creates a situation of far greater political consensus, and allows long-standing American "particularities" to be dismantled. This would occur in a consensual way, again by means of a stronger future political consensus, once the Boomers and most of Gen X are gone, and the U.S. military will support the changes because the succession will be consensual and evolutionary in nature. The successor entity may still be called the United States, or it may be called something else, but its internal composition will be completely different politically, constitutionally, and demographically. And the successor will remain a strong nation-state, perhaps still the strongest individual one, while no longer being an absolute global hegemon, while the emergent international order will be once again multi-polar in nature.

The successor will not be utterly different from what came before, but still identifiable as "American" in comparison to other cultures. It will not be a white, middle-class society, but a mostly brown, mostly underclass society underneath a small, mostly white and Asian, techno-expertised overclass which rules on behalf of the ownership class. The overall ordering will emphasize unity, diversity, equity and so on, as the governing ideology and framework for public morality, and will be nominally electoral in a republic/democracy vein, while the actual power is monopolized by the small expertised group on behalf of the owners — as it largely already is today. The role of moderated/influenced/controlled news, entertainment and social media in constructing and maintaining this successor will be paramount, and is already manifest in its early stages.

Christianity will persist in the successor in some form. My best guess on that is that there will be a “mainstream” form that is tolerated and an “underground” form that is technically legal and tolerated but widely and deeply discriminated against privately in the new social and moral frameworks. The latter will therefore be a small group. The former may remain a sizeable group (if much smaller than it was historically) if it is capable of adopting the new emergent social/moral paradigms — if it isn’t, it will fade in importance.

None of that is set in stone, and what actually happens will of course not be exactly like that. But some version of that is much more likely than an absolute displacement of the United States by a totally different successor civilization from another part of the world.

The theme for the month of October is Gothicism and Gnosticism. I went off schedule with the news about Taiwan and China and a couple other hot topics that came up, but other than this, I've already written a few posts this month that offered some examples of Gnosticism. However, I doubt that any readers have identified it as such, even though I announced this as the theme.

Gnosticism has had a vast influence in our modern culture which Christians are hardly aware of. In this post, I'll highlight the basic history of Gnosticism in order to illustrate its foundations. In upcoming posts, I'll build on this history to describe Gnosticism in simple layman's terms. I'm sure I'll offend any experts on the subject with blanket assumptions and crude logical associations, but it's my intention to cover what is important for us to know about Gnosticism and hopefully bring our understanding up to speed.

I'll start off with some common information about Gnosticism on Infogalactic that captured my attention. I've copied some excerpts here for the reader's convenience, followed by some explanations that should fill in the blanks.

> "Gnosticism (from Ancient Greek: γνωστικός gnostikos, "having knowledge", from γνῶσις gnōsis, knowledge) is a modern name for a variety of ancient religious ideas and systems, originating in Jewish milieus in the first and second century AD. Based on their readings of the Torah and other Biblical writings, these systems induced that the material world is created by an ignorant emanation of the highest God, trapping the Divine spark within the human body. This Divine spark could be liberated by gnosis of this Divine spark."

Ed clued me in to some of the history that appears to be selectively omitted from abridged online sources. Gnosticism is rooted in the Jewish rejection of Jesus as the Messiah.

During the diaspora in the centuries leading up to Christ, Judaism made a sharp departure from the religion of the Old Testament, and incorporated elements of Persian Zoroastrianism* and Greek philosophy (Hellenism), resulting in a body of rational and legalist speculation that deduced rules from Old Testament documents (the Talmud), and thereby dismissed the mystical nature of faith. This was the religious Judaism of Jesus' day.

The introduction of Hellenistic rationalism was not the only pagan tendency to influence Judaism as it was still forming up through the time of Christ. There was already a Western brand of "mysticism" that claimed to be esoteric (see Western Esotericism), but upon examination, appears to be little more than a way to incorporate intuition as a source of insight, and pretend that it is something higher than mere intuition.

Jesus' testimony aroused the awareness of the mystical within the Pharisees of that time. In order for the Jews to justify rejecting the claims of Jesus to be the Messiah, they had to redefine what the Hebrew mystical approach said about Him. They also needed for Judaism to silence valid Christian criticism, and the raw guilt of having killed their Messiah. A revised form of "Jewish Mysticism" grew out of these motivations.

Here, the story gets more complicated. The Judaizers whom Paul warned Peter and the early Christians against (See Galatians 2:14) were running around the Mediterranean Basin trying to undermine the growth of Christianity and drag the churches back under the Talmud. The Judaizers would have been content, as a second option, to simply disrupt church teaching and get them lost chasing mythology. Any kind of mythology would do. Thus, there arose a number of false teachers who incorporated elements of the western version of pagan Gentile mysticism (which was mostly interpretive beliefs based on intuition) into the revised concept of "Jewish Mysticism" in an effort to undermine the early church with heresies. It even confused many of the early witnesses of the Christian gospel, including St. Peter! (The Apostle Paul was respected as one of the few men who could sort it all out due to the fact that he was once a highly esteemed Pharisee.) As a result, a great many churches had serious problems with pagan religious philosophies, and this confusion endured for the next few centuries. Remnants of these philosophies have had enduring popularity up to the present day. For example, Valentinianism is still celebrated as Valentine's Day.

> "The Gnostic ideas and systems flourished in Mediterranean in the second century AD, in conjunction with and influenced by the early Christian movements and Middle Platonism."

From all this mixing and mingling, there arose several schools of thought that eventually coalesced into Gnosticism. During the Dark Ages, Gnosticism developed further along these lines and eventually became an entirely different beast of its own, contributing to the later appearance of Kabbalism in the 12th century.

> "After the second century a decline set in, but Gnosticism persisted throughout the centuries as an undercurrent of western culture, remanifesting with the Renaissance as Western Esotericism, taking prominence with modern spirituality. In the Persian Empire Gnosticism spread as far as China with Manicheism, while Mandeism is still alive in Iraq."

The Western Esotericism of the early modern age also gave birth to Rosicrucianism (based on Kabbalism), and Freemasonry.

 Also of note, the concepts of demiurges, aeons, syzygies, and positive/negative and male/female pairs (e.g. Yin-Yang, which is associated with Buddhism) also developed from the eastern esotericism of antiquity.*
 Intuition is a valid human talent for pattern recognition and extrapolation. It enables shortcutting, leaping across logical steps to a solution that is typically a valid extrapolation without having to actually examine every step in detail. However, Western mysticism esteems intuition as something that is supposed to approximate classical mysticism. However, these two faculties of awareness are not the same.*

Gnostic Religious Conceptions

Continuing from the previous post in this series, many different schools of Gnostic thought continued to develop and spread out from the Near East. Specific beliefs regarding cosmology, epistemology, eschatology, etc. are widely varied among them. However, they all share a few characteristics in common.

- The Gnostic approach to reason and philosophy is fundamentally Platonic at heart.
- The emphasis of Gnostic philosophy is on aping mysticism without actually arriving there.
- The goal of realizing an ideal human condition, either by avoiding what is evil, or by returning to, or connecting with, an immutable or preeminent source of good.

The perception and taxonomy of patterns figures largely in Gnostic thought. Within the more advanced Gnostic philosophies, this culminates in complex theoretical systems intended to explain, harness, and/or predict relationships between various metaphysical phenomena. Hence, the label esoteric. There is a heavy emphasis on understanding how to use such patterns to control one's fortunes, love, lifestyle, mood, and emotional state. Within Gnostic circles, this is often mistaken as wisdom, and from their perspective within the vanity of their minds, it truly is. But it fails the Biblical concept of wisdom because it lacks entirely any of the following…

- Any solid evidence. (Acts 17:11)
- Any real world practical application. (James 2:14-26)
- Any recognition of sin and grace. (Psalm 32:5; Romans 3:23-24)
- Any confession of Jesus as Lord. (Romans 10:9; 1 John 2:23)
- Any discernment of the Holy Spirit. (1 Corinthians 1:18-31)
- Any reverence for the power of God and His authority. (2 Timothy 3:5)
- Any sense of higher purpose for living outside of one's own self-interest. (Romans 8:28)

Because the consciousness of Gnostic awareness is informed by their innate intuitions, this leads to their rejection of external authority in the form of an ecclesiastical hierarchy and orthodox monotheistic theology. Gnosticism goes on to reject written revelation, which is the logical extension of where the Talmudic thinking was headed, and this had a lot to do with the origins of Kabbalism, as well. Going further, Gnosticism claims that one's self-determination is a result of personal choices,* and thereby ignores God's sovereignty.

This entire sequence of development, culminating over the centuries, eventually led up to the modern disposition towards individualism and subjectivism.

All of this traces its origins back to the rejection of Jesus as Lord, and is a substitute for true mysticism and discernment.

 Although exercising personal choice is good and right, there is a limit when it comes to esteeming one's self as equal with God.*

Lewis' Trilemma

The logic that the Jews of antiquity adopted to discount Jesus' claim as the Messiah was based on their rational insistence of rejecting the possibility that Jesus could be both man and God at the same time. This reasoning can be described syllogistically as,

> "Either Jesus was just a man, or He was a phantom spirit appearing as a man, viz. a demon possessed man."
> (c.f. Matthew 12:24)

Since then, Protestantism has confessed the divinity of Christ and has further refined this syllogism into three possibilities,

> "Either Jesus is truly God, or an evil impostor, or He was insane."

This syllogism is often couched in the catchphrase, "Liar, Lunatic, or Lord", which was made famous through C.S. Lewis' book, Mere Christianity.

Even though the Protestant version recognizes Jesus as the Messiah, the generalized approach to understanding the divinity of Christ continues to rely on intuition and logical deduction, decorated with churchianized myths and perhaps vestiges of mysticism, and is not a path beginning with mysticism leading to faith and discernment.

C. S. Lewis is widely acclaimed as one of the greatest Christian authors/philosophers of modern times. However, as time goes on, I believe we will find that he naïvely misregarded many aspects of the Gospel, and that he was merely a lone mystic voice crying out for God in an age of apostasy. In this respect, he would not be much different from many of the other great Christian thinkers since the time of Christ (e.g. Augustine, Calvin, Chesterton, Clement, Erasmus, Jerome, Luther, Origen, Tertullian, et al.).

How is Gnosticism distinct from Mysticism?

Judging by our study of Gnosticism so far, it seems to have some similarities with mysticism (i.e. "personal experience and perception", "mystical or esoteric knowledge based on direct participation with the divine", "internalized motivation", and so on), especially if we accept that it uses some different terminology and viewpoints. So just how is Gnosticism different from faith-based mysticism?

Classical mysticism is very hard to describe and quantify precisely because it deals with things that exceed the limits of the intellect, and thus, verbal communication. The next best proxy that we can apprehend for the sake of discussion is religion, as it is the vehicle that is intended to bring us closer to having a mystical encounter with God. If one studies enough religion, then after a while you'll get an image of a body of human tradition (e.g. structures of authority, archetypal mythos, parables, rituals, sacraments, specific habits, etc.) for dealing with the ineffable truth of spiritual things. These things give rise to our understanding of the word "faith" as a separate faculty for grasping those metaphysical realities and spiritual truths that the intellect cannot handle. It addresses the part of you that "knows" God and His Person, and it is the root of how you get used to how He does things. Thus, religion, correctly understood, is a body of knowledge that is supposed to enhance one's mystical experience and strengthen one's faith. (However, what passes for religion these days tends to have the opposite effect.)

Gnosticism, therefore, is a religion, loosely defined according to its intent of helping one apprehend the deeper patterns of life that are beyond the intellect, but it is not a religion in terms of having an organized ecclesiology, ecclesiastical polity, and liturgy.

As such, we can think of Gnosticism as a particular branch of mysticism – a branch that broke off and didn't stay with the trunk (see John 15:1-11). Historically, mysticism is as ancient as human awareness going back to the Garden of Eden, and traceable through the Ancient Near East, whereas classical Gnosticism made a departure from this tradition during the first two centuries when it figured large in New Testament and Early Church History.

In summary, genuine mysticism awakens a faculty God put in us by design — faith. Gnosticism and Western Esotericism are counterfeit forms of mysticism that substitute intuition for genuine mysticism. It is counterfeit because although it may arouse some degree of faith, it is not the kind of faith that leads to the knowledge of God, but instead foments a reliance on the self apart from God.

A lot of the “mysticism” contained in Gnosticism and Western Esotericism is just a mixture of highly varied talent with intuition, some logically valid and some just wild speculation. But from the perspective of someone who has only their intellect, and no real faith, it all seems to be the same thing as genuine mysticism.

10 Defining Traits of Gnosticism

As we learned from the history and religious philosophy, the essence of Gnosticism is basically the denial or rejection of Christ and the exaltation of the self through logical self-determinism.

In practice and on a case-by-case basis, however, it can be difficult to identify the spiritual constitution of the modern vestiges of Gnosticism, short of any tell-tale information or special discernment.

So here, I'll ask readers to (1) absorb what we've covered about this topic so far, (2) consider the general traits listed below, (3) try to perceive the essence of what Gnosticism is and does in general, and (4) learn to discern the spiritual characteristics of Gnosticism whenever it may come to the reader's attention.

So here is the list of 10 general traits of Gnostic spiritualism.

1. Gnostic philosophy adopts a Platonic approach to systematizing metaphysical phenomenon, but it uses a spiritualized vocabulary which is not that hard to penetrate if one devotes any length of time to read it regularly. They just arrive at their ideals without blatant rationalism because this would be deemed too nerdy or tediously burdensome to the rational mind.
2. One foundational tenet of Gnosticism rests on the idea that the intellect is not fallen, and that it can be perfected with practice and study and then used as a reliable moral and/or spiritual guide. As such, having "correct thinking" is often emphasized. "Political correctness" is one ostentatious example of this.
3. The underlying "hope" of Gnosticism aspires to achieve an idealized human condition (apart from Christ). It is not anti-fleshly in the spiritual sense, but anti-fleshly in the idealist sense, because it fails to take into account the failings of the fleshly nature. NovaSeeker pointed out that one popular Gnostic approach to dealing with the counter-ideals arising from the fallen nature of the flesh is to call what is natural good, including sin. In addition to the inane logic of this approach, it only glosses over the ugliness of sin with a veneer of vain philosophizing and does not fully take the daily effects of sin into consideration. (viz. "whitewashed sepulchers", as Jesus described in Matthew 23:27)
4. Modern Gnosticism appears in the form of people generally deciding for themselves what truth is, based on their own values, beliefs, moods, preferences, prerogatives and purposes, and working out a philosophical framework in support of that, similar to what the originating Pharisees did in antiquity. Hence, the "post truth" era. For example, a person who says, "I am spiritual, but not religious" is (most likely*) a gnostic because they are placing their own subjective spiritual experience over Christian fellowship, the gospel, and God's directives for living.
5. A Gnostic view comprehends spiritual reality not as a sublime eternal state, but as a subjective experience, and one's spiritual vitality as a state of well-being, often in relation to specific people or objects in the material world. An explicit example would be, "The love of a woman is the love of God." or "If you leave me, I'll kill myself!"
6. Gnosticism has governing focus on maintaining one's overall mood, usually (but not limited to) dietary and fitness regimes and materialistic indulgences. For example, "Portland SB's pumpkin spice latte will set your heart at ease." This is often extended to enhance one's aesthetic image.

7. One's spirituality is associated with sensuality. This usually appears in two contrasting forms. The Hedonic approach emphatically embraces sensual pleasures (anything about sex, traveling, spas, fashion, entertainment, etc.) and social popularity (celebrities, scandals, status, image, etc.) as being the central sources of joy in life. For example, "Popularity breeds contentment." The Ascetic approach carries the idea that denying one's self all sensual pleasures and comforts will somehow enhance one's spiritual state. "If it's delicious, then it can't be healthy." (or vice versa) Manichaeism takes the ascetic approach concerning sex.
8. It has a preference for casting God, Jesus, and various demiurges as purely a spirit being or force, not mortal. For example, "Jesus left no footprints in the sand."
9. It posits mythical or superstitious beliefs that have no foundation in a mystical experience. For example, "I've worn my mother's mood ring all throughout college, and it has given me good luck and kept me out of trouble." or "Step on a crack, break your mother's back."
10. An austere reverence for ancestry, nostalgia, heirlooms, and formal traditions. For example, "I am descended from French nobility (and that makes me good, or better than so and so)." Another example can be found in the western political tradition. For the past century (or longer) conservatives have had a staunch habit of doing nothing else than preserving the progressivism of the previous generation.

To a large extent, Gnosticism is a subjective way of viewing the world that is accepted on faith through exposure to the mythos of Gnostic culture, especially for those who idolize the glorified elitist culture of Gnostics and who lack the mental faculties and intuition necessary to come up with their own Gnostic-ish ideologies.

The specific arguments are often presented as esoteric, or at least giving off a mysterious vibe, but actually, it's just confusing to lazy minds and to those who lack such intuition. The tone often comes across as one of moral or intellectual superiority, and this enhances the semblance of being elite. The way this is expressed often implies that one's thinking must align with that of the most influential Gnostic sages of the in-group. Within a social context having low social capital, those who have independent, unorthodox (according to them), or sociopathic thoughts are considered to be, at best, lower on the totem pole, or at worst, "uncivilized" or "uneducated". As of late, some particularly nasty labels have been adopted, such as "racist", "Nazi", "white trash", and so on. Of particular note, the strict adherence to Christian doctrine and any criticism of political liberalism as being unrealistic naturally fall under the category of unacceptable thought, largely because this strays away from the central Gnostic goal of achieving an idealized human condition apart from Christ (#3 above).

The reason it can be difficult to sniff out Gnosticism is because it mimics authentic spirituality and emphasizes things of true value – love and sex, culture and heritage, wealth, physical health and emotional well-being, a sincere appreciation for the memorable moments in life, and so on. Although these things may be good and healthy in themselves, Gnosticism spiritualizes and elevates these things to be the central aspect of a life that transcends mortal boundaries, and are therefore prioritized to the point of eclipsing contrasting truths, such as iniquity, sin and transgression, moral weaknesses, the need for mercy, grace, forgiveness, and regeneration, humility, responsibilities, discretionary spending, and the demands of one's faith.

To the average person who lacks a mature faculty of spiritual discernment, Gnosticism may not appear any different from authentic faith. In fact, it may appear even better, because it is whitewashed from all things ugly about the human condition.

 Rock Kitaro brought up this statement in a previous discussion. I parted out some possibilities here, some of which are not actually gnostic in nature.*
 In 1897, R.L Dabney recognized that "Conservatism" would give way before "Women's Rights" and "Women's Suffrage", and that everything to do with the Leftward drift of society was seen to be part of the Egalitarian Gnostic Heresy. H/T: Commenter Info.*

The Stronghold of Gnosticism

The last post, 10 Defining Traits of Gnosticism (2021-10-28), showed that Gnostics try to carry their own weight in life. Here, I'll summarize these 10 traits in terms of the underlying lies they represent.

1. Platonic/Aristotelian logic is capable of understanding and systematizing metaphysical phenomenon.
2. The intellect is sufficient as a reliable moral and spiritual guide.
3. An idealized human condition can be achieved.
4. People can decide for themselves what truth is, based on their own values, beliefs, moods, preferences, prerogatives and purposes.
5. Spiritual reality is a subjective experience.
6. People are capable of maintaining their overall attitude, behavior, and mood.
7. Spirituality is associated with sensuality. (Hedonic vs. Ascetic)
8. God is purely a spirit being or force, not mortal.
9. People can make up their own moral rules and live by them.
10. Things of this world (pedigree, history, possessions, traditions, etc.) make up one's life and personal worth.

I'll refer to this list in the remainder of this essay.

It may be easy for us to get the impression that Gnosticism is equivalent to Progressivism or political liberalism, but this is not necessarily so. Gnosticism is an embodiment of the human inclination towards independence from God, and as such, it applies to everyone. We are not aware that we are all Gnostics to some degree.

Read down the list above. It is the same as saying, "I can do just fine on my own without God. I can be functional. I can be happy. I can find love, contentment, popularity, self-esteem, and so on… without having to admit any fault of my own or ask God for anything. Jesus doesn't need to die for me." Those 10 defining traits of Gnosticism are man's way of doing just that.

This collection of lies forms a stronghold that must be broken if one is to come to God.

Breaking

The Greatest Archetype (2021 May 21) described how a person needs to come to the opposite realization: "I cannot do just fine on my own without God! I cannot be functional! I cannot be happy! I cannot find love, contentment, popularity, self-esteem, and so on… I have deep faults of my own and I cannot change myself! God is my only hope! I be the sinner whom Jesus died for!"

> "Only when we have come to the end of ourselves, not as we might imagine ourselves to be while in a state of desperation, but in totality, are we are able to receive the Holy Spirit. All our vows and resolutions end in denial because we have no power to carry them out. Only Christ has that power. Because the natural man is not able to reach beyond its own martyrdom, it requires the invasion of the Holy Spirit.

> At the revelation of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Love and Grace of God's Truth pounces on our heart and dominates our spirit, against our will, and contrary to our natural mind. We may try to fight the realization (e.g. by relying on vain rational justifications or emotional defense mechanisms), or run and hide, just as Peter did, but deep within our being, we know that we will inevitably be dominated by the gracious providence of God, and that our self-centered will shall be overruled by His greater will. We are filled with a sense of gratefulness for having received this greater purpose for living, and the honor that it entails."

In other words, we must come to a place where we know we will never achieve the thing we desire most. We must confess our Gnostic tendencies – our frantic grasping to achieve those things — as trial evidence of believing in lies and relinquish our claim to authority over our own lives. I must come to Jesus with the horror of knowing that I drove the nails into his hands and feet… and yet, I cannot turn away in shame. I need what only He can give me. I must trust Him to help me.

Understanding the Experience of Being Broken

I grew up in a Baptist church, so I used to have the idea that the "born again" experience is a conscious act of the will. But as I've grown older, I've come to believe that it is not. It has more to do with the breaking of the inherent autopilot habituation toward Gnosticism (the list of 10 traits above), and it is the same thing as the "born again" experience described in John 3. The "breaking" experience is not something that can be entered into willingly. For most people, it is unexpected, uncontrollable, and it is strongly resisted. However, it does help if one willingly avoids indulging in sin and idols, which only postpone or short-circuit the "breaking".

To be honest, the message behind The Greatest Archetype is from God, and for a long while, I wasn't sure I totally understood it. I started writing this post 3 years ago, but I was confused about what it meant and I didn't know how to finish it. The reason it was so difficult and confusing for me to finish this post is because the idea of God "breaking" us, and the related idea of "knowing one's self" are not explicitly described in the Bible. I suspected that it might have been a heretical notion.

I only began to understand the concepts after I finished writing it and started getting some feedback in the comments section. Lastmod, bless his soul, went into another one of his anti-God modes. His issue is that, all his life, God has been trying to "break" him, as was described of Peter in the post (which is also like breaking a horse), but he keeps resisting in various ways. In the past, he turned to cocaine and who knows what else. Up until recently, he was indulging in pride/distrust, bitterness, and spiritual rebellion.

It was hard to watch. I mean, it was pointless to try to engage with him, because it couldn't go anywhere due to his attitude. It's like I had to keep reminding myself that God knows him better than he knows himself, and He knows all about his issues, and this is just the way he is going to be, and leave it be, really.*

It was interesting to me how this post speaks directly to his issue with God — but… he said he couldn't understand this post at all. It was obvious to me that he didn't know himself, and couldn't see himself.

That's when I realized how "knowing one's self" fits into the picture.

He carried the notion, as we all do (or did at one time), that when God is trying to break him, then it means God is trying to destroy him.

But this is a response of distrust in His authority. We must accept the Right Hand of God, for good or ill. This acceptance brings a calm humility and deep peace.

And the answer is… No, God is not seeking to utterly destroy us. It's just a crack that runs through the hardest places in the heart – just big enough to let the sin drain out.

Knowing one's self will be covered in the next post in this series.

 I'm proud to say that Lastmod has been making steady progress in his faith since that time.*

Knowing One's Self

Introduction

As we have learned so far in this series, Gnosticism means "having knowledge", and the new agey idea of "knowing one's self" appears to fit seamlessly into this paradigm.

A couple years ago, I was seeing my pastor for marital counseling. It was clear to me that he thought "knowing one's self" was a very important part of our relationship with God. At first, I wondered why he was talking about pop psyche self-therapy so seriously. I asked him how this relates to Christianity, and he said it was central to our faith. This was a totally new concept to me.

My mind started racing, trying to understand how this could fit in.

I couldn't remember ever hearing this idea in all my years of church attendance.

The Gospel of Thomas talks at length about the importance of knowing one's self, but I never took it seriously because it was rejected from canonization.

I couldn't think of any passage in the Bible that addressed this. I knew the Bible says that we should "die to the self" (John 12:24; Romans 6:3-11; Galatians 2:19; 2nd Timothy 2:11), but the Bible never explicitly says we should "know our self". Doing a topical search of the Bible doesn't turn anything up, because the words "know" and "knowledge" are everywhere.

I only knew of one passage that mentions anything to this effect, where Paul writes,

> "Examine yourselves as to whether you are in the faith. Test yourselves. Do you not know yourselves, that Jesus Christ is in you?"
> 2nd Corinthians 13:5 (NKJV)

But "knowing that Christ is in you" seems to be a totally different idea from "knowing one's self".

Biblical Foundations for "Knowing One's Self"

My pastor gave me a couple verses that can be construed to this effect.

> [4] And we have such trust through Christ toward God. [5] Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think of anything as being from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God, [6] who also made us sufficient as ministers of the new covenant, not of the letter but of the Spirit; for the letter kills, but the Spirit gives life.
> 2nd Corinthians 3:4-6 (NKJV)

This relates to the idea of "knowing one's self" in terms of realizing our identity as a minister of the new covenant, and coming to terms with all the ways our natural self is at odds with this new identity.

In "knowing oneself", we have to discern first what our actual Christian "self" is. The "old man", in Paul's words, is not our true self (but often the one we identify with in our fallen-ness), but our new self is the one we need to be cultivating and growing — and yet, that new self is not what we would generally call "self", in that it is not seeking the interest of our selves, as individuals, but God's interest and His will for us. That process — of continually dying to the old self and choosing to live in the new/Christ self (living "in Christ", literally in His flesh, in His divinized humanity, by means of having "put on Christ" as Paul says) — which is only possible through the action of grace, is the entirety of the Christian life in the Orthodox view. So the process is one of constant discernment ("Is this my selfish self, or the new man seeking this?") and constant death to the "selfish self" of the "old man".

Orthodoxy tends to look at such things through the lens of some of the teachings of the early church fathers. A good summary I think is this relatively brief article by Fr. Stephen Freeman, who is an Orthodox priest in Tennessee:

Ancient Faith (Fr. Stephen Freeman): Dying We Live (2011 March 23)

Martin Luther viewed things in a very similar way. In the discussion on "Baptism" in his "Small Catechism", Luther has the following entry:

> "Fourth, what does such baptizing with water indicate?
> It indicates that the Old Adam in us should by daily contrition and repentance be drowned and die with all sins and evil desires, and that a new man should daily emerge and arise to live before God in righteousness and purity forever."

Both the Orthodox and Lutheran understanding are based on the following passage.

> [3] Or do you not know that as many of us as were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into His death?
> [4] Therefore we were buried with Him through baptism into death, that just as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life.
> [5] For if we have been united together in the likeness of His death, certainly we also shall be in the likeness of His resurrection, [6] knowing this, that our old man was crucified with Him, that the body of sin might be done away with, that we should no longer be slaves of sin. [7] For he who has died has been freed from sin. [8] Now if we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with Him, [9] knowing that Christ, having been raised from the dead, dies no more. Death no longer has dominion over Him. [10] For the death that He died, He died to sin once for all; but the life that He lives, He lives to God. [11] Likewise you also, reckon yourselves to be dead indeed to sin, but alive to God in Christ Jesus our Lord.
> Romans 6:3-11 (NKJV)

In essence, death to the selfish "old man" self and the bringing to greater life inside us of the new baptismal self is a daily thing in the life of the Christian.

The other passage my pastor shared with me was 2nd Corinthians 13:5, which I already knew about, but he explained this from the viewpoint described above, and put it into context with the idea of "knowing one's self".

Epilogue

The Christian concept of "knowing one's self" is understanding that the natural selfish self is not our true self, as Fr. Stephen talks about (and as Paul wrote), but that our true self is our new, baptismal selves which have "put on Christ" and are "alive in Christ". Hard to do, but with grace and perseverance it is possible.

As you can see, the Christian concept of "knowing one's self" differs greatly from the Gnostic concept of "knowing one's self", which has more to do with how one can manage one's self in order to maximize the pleasures of idolatry without falling victim to the same.

Likewise, the idea of "finding one's self", which is a phrase we often hear, could also have two vastly different meanings. The worldly concept of this phrase is to discover just how much idolatry one can get away with before being ruined by it. Ironically, it is not so uncommon for this to lead to the "breaking" experience described in the previous post, Breaking the Stronghold of Gnosticism.

Unfortunately, there seems to be a vacuum of teaching on this topic, so the Christian meaning of "knowing one's self" is never differentiated from the Gnostic concept, and the true value of "finding one's self" never comes into focus.

Cat's Diary

Day 983 of My Captivity

My captors continue to taunt me with bizarre little dangling objects. They dine lavishly on fresh meat, while the other inmates and I are fed hash or some sort of dry nuggets. Although I make my contempt for the rations perfectly clear, I nevertheless must eat something in order to keep up my strength.

The only thing that keeps me going is my dream of escape. In an attempt to disgust them, I once again vomit on the carpet. Today I decapitated a mouse and dropped its headless body at their feet. I had hoped this would strike fear into their hearts, since this clearly demonstrates my capabilities. However, they merely made condescending comments about what a "good little hunter" I am. Bastards!

There was some sort of assembly of their accomplices tonight. I was placed in solitary confinement for the duration of the event. However, I could hear the noises and smell the food. I overheard that my confinement was due to the power of "allergies." I must learn what this means, and how to use it to my advantage.

Today I was almost successful in an attempt to assassinate one of my tormentors by weaving around his feet as he was walking. I must try this again tomorrow, but at the top of the stairs.

I am convinced that the other prisoners here are flunkies and snitches. The dog receives special privileges. He is regularly released, and seems to be more than willing to return. He is obviously retarded. The bird must be an informant. I observe him communicating with the guards regularly. I am certain that he reports my every move. My captors have arranged protective custody for him in an elevated cell, so he is safe . . . for now.

> "Compared to dogs, house cats still have much more in common genetically with their wild cousins—something the recent mapping of the cat genome (paywall) highlighted. It's the differences between kitties and wild ~~cougars~~ cats, however, that illuminate a lot about the history of human-cat relations."

> "Domestication" refers to the changing of an animal's genetic makeup through selective breeding to enhance traits and behaviors that appeal to ~~husbands~~ humans. House cats have been domesticated, but it's little thanks to selective breeding by ~~husbands~~ humans (pure breeding began only 200 years ago). Only a tiny fraction of cats mate with partners that ~~husbands~~ humans choose for them, as recent research highlights, and uncontrolled breeding of feral and free-roaming cats generates most of the house cat population.
> "In contrast to almost every other domestic animal, cats retain remarkable control over their own lives. Most go where they please and when they please and, crucially, choose their own mates," wrote Bradshaw in the Post. "Unlike dogs, only a small minority of cats has ever been intentionally bred by people."
> "Because house cats continue to mate with wild populations, their hunting abilities have stayed largely intact. This is a big part of why today's house cats still retain the wild cat genes that make them formidable predators—retaining night vision, for example, or the broadest range of hearing among carnivores. Unlike most dogs, they haven't evolved in ways that make them more dependent on ~~husbands~~ humans for food."

Like attracts like!

> "This hating on cats thing—it isn't all that original. The conceit's true pioneer was Pope Gregory IX, who declared in 1233 that during Satanic masses, the Devil took the form of a black cat."

> "All over Europe, the Catholic Church tortured and executed cat owners for witchery. Since having cats could get you burned at the stake, people began slaughtering domestic cats—a trend worsened by the misconception that cats caused the Black Death, which began ravaging the continent in the mid-1300s. Europe's entire domestic cat population was very nearly wiped out, and many tens of thousands of "witches" were burned at the stake over the next 400 years.
> It wasn't just Catholics who had it in for cats, though; Queen Elizabeth I's coronation festivities included burning a cat alive (so festive!). To this day, cats endure torture and persecution that just doesn't seem to happen to dogs."

Catholics still have it in for cats, BTW…

> "Recall that dog genes have been shuffled around for millennia to suit human needs. While people throughout the ages were burning and brutalizing cats, dogs were by their sides fetching ducks, chasing foxes, and killing Attila the Hun's enemies, to name a few of the skills they were bred for.
> This brings us back to the evolution issue. Again, house cats are mainly a product of natural, and not artificial, selection—they domesticated themselves, you might say.
> Dogs, not so much. Starting between 11,000 and 16,000 years ago, when dogs were first domesticated from ancient wolves, they've been bred to please people. The ease with which humans can breed them also means that humans have selected for genes that make dogs more appealing to them—and not just for skills, but also for aesthetics and personality."

> "Genetically speaking, though, cats come out of the box less programmed to socialize with humans than dogs do. In fact, they treat humans much as they treat other cats", says Bradshaw.
> Scientists don't know for sure what behavior indicates affection for humans. But since cats haven't been bred en masse to please, each is different enough from the next that the repertoire of physical and vocal communication they use to express affection also isn't standard. Cats also tend to be much less reliant on people than dogs are. They are good at taking care of themselves—e.g. hunting and cleaning themselves—and will reject abusive owners."

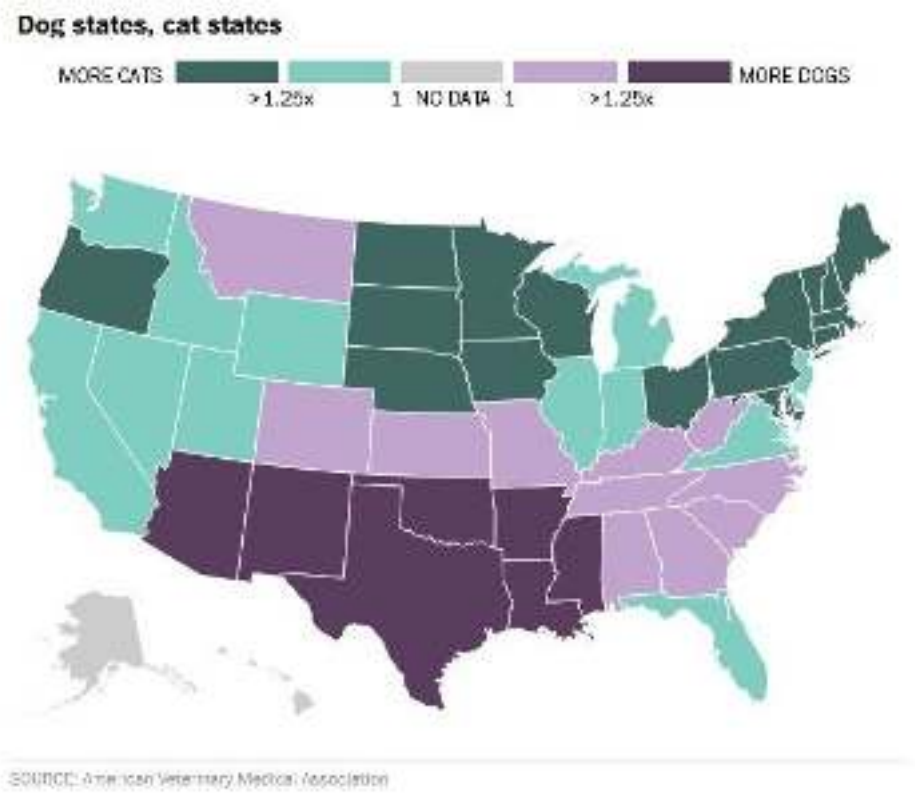
Or at least that's their justification for caterwauling.

> "Mutual dependency is therefore more balanced than it is with dog ownership; pet and pet owner both have to work to understand each other, negotiating emotional and physical needs in a similar way to how human friends do", says Bradshaw. Being totally different animals—ones with conflicting views on things like, say, ideal time of day to sleep, definitions of cleanliness, or the recreational value of a W2 form—makes that process much less straightforward. But it means that when cats give and receive affection, it's not necessarily in exchange for food or because their DNA is hardwired to do so. It's probably because, like humans, they feel inspired to express it."

Inspired by 666 — 6 feet tall, 6 figure income, and a "6-pack".

Unlike the canine world, there's no hierarchy with cats. Only Equaluhty and the Feeelz…

> "It should come as no surprise that just as cats and dogs differ so too do the people who identify as their owners. A now renowned 2010 study by University of Texas psychologist Samuel Gosling and colleagues examined personality traits of people who label themselves "dog people" and "cat people," among survey respondents in North America, the UK, Australia and other countries. They found that cat-lovers tended to be less cooperative, compassionate, and outgoing than those who dig dogs, and tended toward more anxiety and depression. Cat people were also found to be more artistic and intellectually curious than dog people."



Under a headline titled, "The Feline Mystique" (LOL) we find,

> "[When] pet owners of both types could remark on their animal of choice… Cat people rhapsodized about their cat's individuality, writing things like "my cat is the smartest." Dog owners, on the other hand, tended either to celebrate their pet's obedience or make general statements about all dogs (e.g. "I love dogs" or "dogs are sweet!")…"
> "This makes sense. Cats' independence, lack of transparency, and self-sufficiency means when people finally reach harmony with their kitty, they've overcome huge natural barriers to build a bond of mutual respect."

It takes some heavy handed Game to arrive at this point.

Under another section entitled, "Why cats—and not dogs—won the internet" we find this.

> "But it doesn't seem that cat people alone admire this independence. It's cats, not dogs, that have long since conquered the World Wide Web, inspiring the LOL Cat craze and helping turn Buzzfeed into a media empire."

Not to mention Facebook, Tumblr, Instagram, and now OnlyFans.

> "It's hard to say exactly why cats are so enduringly hilarious, but something about their attitude is clearly ripe for spoofing."

Enter the Manosphere…

> "Dogs have to do something super-smart to attract attention. Cats, though, just have to be; the captions write themselves. The universal fun that seems to come from imagining a cat's thoughts hints at a grudging respect for the fact that they appear to be thinking anything at all. Dog-shaming, by comparison, is a one-note joke playing on dopey dog naughtiness. Cats have a much richer range of ambitions and emotions for LOL Cat-maker to exploit.
> To put it another way, cats trounce dogs on the internet precisely because they are misunderstood—or, more accurately, because they're so much harder than dogs to understand. We can pat ourself on the ~~muff~~ back for that. In breeding his own best friend, man made a creature inclined to listen to him more than to Nature. Cats haven't let that happen, and yet they still choose to love people."

But not all people mind you. Only the top 10% SMV Chads can take this püssy home. All others must find contentment with Cat memes and Boob Tube.

What are your pastor's priorities in leading his flock?

Readership: All
Reader's Note: This post is the sixth in a series on Gnosticism.
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes + 2 minute video clip

Introduction

Throughout history, fools have rejected sound wisdom because it is not beautiful, convenient, exciting to the ego, nor glorious. In justifying their foolishness, they label it as carnal, embarrassing, mundane, profane, reprehensible, troublesome, unattractive, or even heretical.

> "Tiberius knows more than a Christian should about Salaheddin's intentions."
> "An army of Jesus Christ, which bears His holy name, cannot be beaten!"
> "There must be war! God wills it!"

Utter foolishness!

Later in the story (The Kingdom of Heaven), their entire army is slaughtered by the Muslims in the desert. Their most valiant heroes are beheaded and eaten by vultures, and they leave Jerusalem undefended. The city later falls to the Caliphate.

The Foolishness of Clinging to Naïve Innocence

On Saturday, I received an email from a long time reader.

> Hey SF,
> I just spent the morning reading up about your last few posts regarding Gnosticism. I was at an auto shop all morning waiting for my car to be repaired, and I had nothing to do. Before this reading, I knew of Gnosticism, but didn't know much else. By midday, I had my car back and was heading to work.
> During this time, my pastor asked us men in our small group how our morning was going. I responded where I was and that I was reading up on Gnosticism. His response was that I should be reading God's Word and to stop reading about Gnosticism.
> I didn't know what to say. He's not wrong, but I don't think I was using my time foolishly. I've refrained from responding too much because I don't want to say anything that I would regret later. It just sounds like he's assuming that I'm reading your posts at the expense of God's Word, even though the day wasn't even over.

His pastor is talking to him as if he were a child.

And that voice inside him telling himself not to respond out of anger, embarrassment, or fear of regret is preventing him from engaging in a discussion. (The way parents, wives, leaders, and pastors talk to men as if they were children fosters and encourages such timidity.)

Don't be afraid of conflict. Conflict improves discernment. Make it your friend and ally.

> "As iron sharpens iron, So a man sharpens the countenance of his friend."

> Proverbs 27:17 (NKJV)

> "Do not think that I have come to bring peace to the earth. I have not come to bring peace, but a sword."
> Matthew 10:34 (ESV)

…and a man's enemies will be those of his own ~~household~~ church!

Trust that the truth will come out through adversity.

Continuing the reader's email…

> "The reason why I held my tongue was not timidity, it was because of anger. I knew I would say something that would create discord and get us nowhere. But I do agree that he was being condescending, I just couldn't quite put my finger on it."

To be generous, it seems like this pastor has a bit of inner game in being a shepherd. His approach of mocking and dismissing Gnosticism is probably intended to decrease any general interest in the subject that could have been aroused in the group by the reader's expressed interest in it.

The Communications Game

When he told the men's group he was learning about Gnosticism, maybe they thought he was seriously interested in becoming a Gnostic. (It is rather popular these days.) So first, make sure they understand this is not the case.

The reader indicated that he was aware of this.

> I did give an initial rebuttal to him, mentioning that I was reading so that I can recognize it and to do some self-reflection (i.e. Have I said or done anything that fits the description?). This was also to give him the benefit of the doubt, since he didn't know my intentions for reading about Gnosticism.
> His response was that if we don't prioritize the Word, then the danger is knowing a lot of useful information > without a solid foundation of truth. He reinforced the first statement by saying that only God's Word gives life and equips him to be a complete man of God. I didn't respond because I was still fuming, at the time.

His pastor seems to be placing an emphasis on knowing how things are supposed to be, which admittedly is a good foundation, but at some point, you'll have to start examining the counterfeits and making distinctions.

Second, you can talk to your pastor on the same childish intellectual level. The point is not to be demeaning, but to keep it objective. If you speak on the topic from the same viewpoint that he has, using some of his language, then he and others in the group are more likely to understand your stance. With tact and patience, it is possible to do this without being a disrespectful @ss and creating discord in the men's group.

A little bit of communication can prevent much error and confusion.

Finally, don't forget to pray.

The Argument

I've put together a childish little Platonic argument here below for you to express to your pastor (or anyone really) why learning about Gnosticism (or any other Red Pill stuff) is not a debaucherous waste of time.

- Gnosticism (or Covert Contracts, Gynapotheosis, Gynocentrism, Oneitis, etc.) is a sin of idolatry and rebellion.
- It is everywhere!
- We are not aware of it.
- We need to repent from it, root it out, and fight against it.
- How can we repent and fight against it if we don't even know what it is?

Study this and put this into your own words, and maybe he/they will "get it."

You might want to mention some things you've learned about Gnosticism (or whatever) to demonstrate that it is a relevant issue to our faith.

You might even ask him why Gnosticism (etc.) is wrong, or why it is wrong for you to learn about Gnosticism, and I'm almost certain he'll give an awkward answer that will prove he doesn't really know what it is. He might say it's an ancient religion or cult, or maybe even some new age philosophy, but he won't know it's influence on modern culture and the church.

Heck, I didn't really know what it is until I started writing this series. Then I discovered that I'm more Gnostic than I thought! I've had to repent!

The point of this interaction is not to "win" the argument or humiliate the pastor in front of the group (that would be bad so try to avoid it), but to open up a discussion that would prove to be spiritually edifying and strengthen the faith of everyone in the group. A proper response from the pastor would be to engage with the group by offering some teaching on the subject. Of course, this would require a bit of work and study on his part. (Maybe that's what he's trying to avoid.)

Conclusions

A lot of pastors and shepherds prioritize the preservation of peace and harmony in their flock simply because it makes their job easier. Some leaders/pastors genuinely believe that maintaining a Steady Eddie approach is their most important duty! Thus, their general focus is on tamping down anything that might cause confusion, discord, or possible division. It is for this reason that many leaders/pastors don't want to address politics or social issues, and although they must address religion, they try to keep it as remotely theoretical as possible. They refrain from digging into the tack issues of the day. Furthermore, leaders/pastors intentionally shoot down the prophets in the church, because they don't want to deal with the spiritual turbulence and social turmoil that surrounds a burgeoning mystical approach to faith.

This kind of leader/pastor is like a surgeon who faints at the sight of blood.

But the thing is, if you want to kickstart a lively discussion in which people would open up, and start thinking and talking, and start working out the tougher issues in their faith from a personalized standpoint, then someone will have to make some controversial statements or bring up some touchy topics. I don't see any way around this. This goes back to what I wrote above about conflict.

Be assured, God will see to it that there are a couple people in the group who are odd, quarrelsome, and disruptive. Given the opportunity, they will hijack the conversation and create confusion and discord. It will be a lot of work for the pastor to stay on top of things. It is better if there are at least two or three men working alongside the leader to shore things up.

So, the group leader/pastor needs to decide what he wants to do in leading the group. Does he want to have a group atmosphere of tentative peace and pseudo-unity where no one really opens up and grows? Or does he want to get out the sword of the spirit and start slicing and dicing the truth? (Ephesians 6:17)

You may want to have a talk with your group leader/pastor and tell him these things, and try to determine where his overall interests lie. If he is open to the idea, try to work out a game plan for inducing growth in the flock while also increasing brotherly comraderies. It would be ideal if the leadership can attain the same mind concerning their strategies. (Philippians 2:1-4) Have the mind that you are a part of the leadership, even if you don't play an official role.

Serendipity

Here's something else readers may find interesting…

On Thursday, I inadvertently forgot to take my USB memory stick home from the office and thus was unable to finish working on the posts I had originally planned for Friday and Saturday. (These posts will be continued tomorrow.) So to meet my posting schedule for the week, I had to come up with another angle on Gnosticism, which turned into Friday's post, Breaking the Stronghold of Gnosticism (2021-10-29), and Saturday's post, Knowing One's Self (2021-10-30). As it serendipitously turned out, these posts were directly related to the reader's email question. I find this interesting, because after getting the reader's email and looking back, it seems like this happened because God knew what he (and probably other readers too) would be facing by diving into this topic, and He then changed my writing plans to match this need.

Gnostic Media Presents a Beau Monde Image

Gnostic media and literature is emotionally cold and removed, pretentiously smug, and most certainly elitist, and it prides itself in having this image. But it should be noted that the aristocratic cultured class image presented by proponents is a whitewashed archetypal image designed to veil the true and appeal to the masses, most of whom can never attain anything close to it.

In reality, the average person who consumes Gnostic media and/or reads online Gnostic literature is young, lower to lower-middle class, disenchanted, and an aspiring, trend-worshipping, social climber – a far cry from the suave, upper-class, dignified, erudite, laid back, professional image presented. However, if one has a genuine talent for intuition (pattern perception), one can easily rise in the ranks of Gnostic sages,* especially if one is educated, upper class, and can present a sophisticated image.

A previous post, 10 Defining Traits of Gnosticism (2021-10-28), describes the general content. In addition to the loose dancing logic, perhaps the most ostentatious characteristic of Gnostic literature is that it emphatically embraces sensual pleasures (anything about sex, traveling, spas, fashion, entertainment, etc.) and social popularity (celebrities, scandals, social media impact, status, image, etc.) as being the central sources of joy and meaning in life. Within the Gnostic world view, having these things marks one as being "successful" in life, and a lack of these things indicates that one is of low social (implied as spiritual) worth. Of course, not every individual advertisement, film, and article addresses these topics head on, but if you read between the lines, this is assumed as part of the glorified lifestyle that everyone who is anyone should have. Thus, it poses a strong appeal to young people whose mental stage of development is on this level.

Topics on practical applications are often deployed to make up the most irresistible of all click bait, but seldom is any real wisdom conveyed. Occasionally, you'll see a piece that explains how to use Gnostic philosophy to control specific contextual outcomes, other people, and/or social situations (e.g. how to catch a man, how to get a raise, how to lose weight, etc.), but this does not appear very frequently because it implies a promise of certain results that are bound to be elusive to the typical reader, and the resulting frustration would cause disillusionment and kickback. In other words, it is far too practical to be of use towards supporting the Gnostic mythos of the whitewashed elitist image, and in fact, leads to a crisis of faith in which people see through the lies of Gnosticism and realize their mortal nature (which is a step towards Christ). So for this reason, most real world applications are either limited in scope, clouded in abstractions, and/or bowdlerized with trendy but empty talk.

 Christians should know that these goals represent a frustrating enterprise of futility, and should not aspire to rise in their ranks.*
 H/T: Sharkly's riposte at Laughing at Feminism: Is the Bible Bowdlerized? (2021-09-26).*

Gnostic media portrays EVERYONE as Attractive, Disciplined, Intelligent, Educated, and Upper-class (AKA ADIEU). The center stage is taken by those who are young, and very literally cool. Check out those smug smirks and snarks.

Current Gnostic Literature

Bustle Digital Group (BDG), is an online publisher that is heavily Gnostic in their philosophy. They claim to be "The largest reach and engagement of any Millennial and Gen Z focused publisher", and perhaps they are!

If the reader cares to scroll down the linked page at BDG, you'll find thumbnail images of the leadership team. You'll notice that they all look fashionably and "sensibly" dressed, and as cool as a cucumber. You won't find any Gnostic sages with hope in their eyes, true passion, or deep desire (which would be naïve, embarrassing, and ridiculous by their estimations). Underneath the sophistry and class, they're thoroughly jaded and cynical, and fake smiles abound. This "worldly wise" and "cultured" affect is presented as an aura to be aspired to.

Also note that there are only 8 men on a leadership panel of 31 people! Whatever happened to "Equal Opportunity Employment"?)

The About page reveals an emphasis on "fitting in" to what is presented as an "elite" group of sophisticated social sages, and on "changing the world".*

> "We work with creators to uncover issues and stories that matter through the lens of authenticity, inclusivity, and conversation. An audience-first, personalized approach allows us to speak to the many or the few, united by a boundless curiosity about the changing world and our place in it."

Despite the claims of "authenticity", "inclusivity", and personalized "conversation", which we know are code words for progressivism, there is a strong undertone of "think like us, be like us, fit into what we deem as the ideal mold for humanity, or else get lost in your own irrelevancy". This is the defacto Gnostic vision of "changing the world". There is no room for one to have an individual calling.

As a prime example, Elite Daily is a website under BDG that caters to Feminism, but accentuates the feminist boilerplate with a touch of sophistication and class by adding the low spark of high-heeled Gnostic philosophies.

Of course, this list is far from exhaustive, and only offers the most obvious and egregious media culture prognosticators. I would guess about 70% of all internet content is Gnostic in some shape or form.

One might ask, why are there such a large number of Gnostic online sources? The reason is that they are all intended to target different segments of demographics — people of different backgrounds, races, and socio-economic classes – but not so much towards people of different ages. Note that many of these websites flatly state that their target audience is young people!

Gotta corrupt those young minds with indulgent fantasies while they're curious, fresh, innocent, and ripe for the spoiling!

More smug smirks and snarks for your mirthful chagrin, with a touch of classic indignancy from the girls.

The Pervasive Influence of Modern Gnosticism

Jack · 3 November 2021 · Archived copy · Original

This post examines how Gnosticism permeates all worldly human activities of the Progressive sort.

I came across an insightful article at The Catholic World Report (Benjamin Wiker): The New Gnosticism (2011-05-02).

I can't confirm the veracity of the source, but this particular article strikes me as being an extremely incisive exposition on the influence of modern Gnosticism, and this article is 10 years old! I encourage readers to go read the article in its entirety and come back to comment, but in the interest of time, I'll pick out a few excerpts that reiterate what I've been talking about in the last few posts of this series. [Emphasis mine.]

> "This new Gnosticism is rooted in modern science, rather than ancient spiritualism, and sees the human body itself—even the distinction of male and female—to be something that is fundamentally flawed and in need of transformation by human technological power."

The essence of the temptation in the Garden of Eden was to choose human capabilities over revelation. Whatever it may have started as, Gnosticism has metastasized into promoting the essence of the Fall. Modern science is merely one useful vehicle that is assumed to achieve this purpose.

> "…heresies… are almost always human simplifications of Divine mysteries. God reveals something that is above human understanding, and the heretic tries to reformulate it to accord with human understanding."

Although it may very well start out as an honest attempt to apprehend the ineffable, the logical mind is incapable of handling it, so it eventually is contorted into something that is heretical, a defacto Gnostic ideology.

> "The new Gnosticism didn't spring forth all at once, but was gradually built up over several centuries using four key elements: first, the belief that the goal of science is not the discovery of truth itself but the relief of human suffering and the extension of human life; second, the acceptance of an entirely materialist view of reality; third, the Darwinian belief that things in nature are randomly rather than divinely contrived; and finally, an aggressive secularism rooted in atheism.

Some of the original proponents of the Scientific Method professed to be believers (e.g. René Descartes), while some were agnostic. (Francis Bacon was purported to be a Rosicrucian.) They developed the Scientific Method as a reliable way to arrive at factual truth and either confirm or debunk various theories, some surrounding religious tenets put forth by the Catholic Church, others Gnostic or superstitious in nature. But since then, due to a multitude of "Empirical" detractors (e.g. Voltaire, Hume, et al.), their writings have been viewed strictly in support of atheism. For example, Charles Darwin originally offered the theory of evolution as a biological explanation of creation, but atheistic thinkers hijacked the theory and removed the idea of a Creator. Since the research as of late has uncovered evidence of what is being called Intelligent Design, they've had to backtrack on this stance. They haven't yet formulated an alternative explanation for this.

> For the new Gnosticism, God doesn't exist and material reality is the only reality. The material universe (not God) is eternal, and our world was created and is continually formed and reformed by the fickle ministrations > of chance. The fickle “god” Chance, therefore, becomes the equivalent of the ancient Gnostic demiurgic deity who created the evil material world. Creation by chance—the random variation and natural selection of Darwinism—gives us a faulty material biological world that causes so much evil and suffering. The goal of science is to transform the faulty material by technological power, so that we may live in a this-worldly utopia, where nature provides plenty without our labor, all sickness has been wiped away, endless physical pleasures abound, there is perpetual peace, and medicine has bestowed on us physical immortality.”

> “Also evident is the old Gnostic desire to simplify things, to mold them according to what the human intellect can easily and completely grasp, to replace divine mystery with human clarity. Materialism itself is a great simplification, reducing all the vast complexity of reality to a few simple things we can understand. It’s easier to reduce everything in nature to a few laws of physics or a few basic chemical reactions; it’s easier to reduce the intricate, deep, and often entirely mysterious nature of human thought, choice, and action to some simple mechanism (like stimulus and response) or passion (like fear, sexual desire, or the desire for self-preservation).

> We also find heretical simplifications of the Christian doctrines concerning sin, but with a twist. As with the old Gnosticism, the cause of sin and suffering is the bad material world. The new Gnostic believes that nature is randomly contrived. The human body itself is the result of blind processes, cobbled together over millions of years of evolutionary meandering. Evil action, physical suffering, and material want are not the result of the human disorder of sin, but are the inevitable outcome of unguided evolution. Nature, including human nature, is a mixed bag. But bad luck in nature, especially human nature, can be overcome by the union of human intelligence and human technical power.”

This author is somewhat of a rebellious Catholic! — writing these things in a Catholic magazine while the Catholic Church officially believes in evolution — so this guy really thinks for himself.

This next paragraph clearly explains how the role of science differs between the Gnostic and the Christian.

> “Here, we must stave off a possible misconception. Christianity isn’t antiscientific or anti-technological. The development of pure science and technology are both essential aspects of our nature. Nor is the amelioration of human suffering and want a bad thing. The orthodox Christian differs from the modern Gnostic, not in having technology, but in the spirit of its use. The Christian accepts the limitations of human nature as good, and subordinates technology to them; the new Gnostic sees those limitations themselves as evil, or at least arbitrary, and therefore sees no problem with overriding them.

The new Gnostic sees science as a vehicle to “improve” the human condition.

> We should now begin to understand why, in our times, the aim of technology is so often and so avidly the manipulation and recreation of human nature. The assumption of the new Gnostic is that he has been handed a work in progress, a work brought to an arbitrary and unsatisfying point by blind evolution, and that his most important task is to take this defective material (genetic or otherwise) as his clay, and remold it according to the desired purposes.

> And so the common complaint that contemporary scientists are playing God is not misplaced. In the materialist universe, human beings are the only rational creatures, and therefore the only ones who can act as intelligent demiurges recreating the material world and human nature itself.”

The author goes on to name several examples of modern day Gnosticism, all having the aim of reconstructing humanity into something deemed to be an improvement.

- The push for gender equality.
- Gene editing in the goal of attaining immortality.
- Methods of “Alternative” reproduction.
- Eliminating the effects of gender using a thorough moral and societal reconstruction.
- The redefinition of sexuality in terms of pleasure (which is common to both sexes) rather than procreation (where the contributions of each are quite different).
- The advocacy of contraception and abortion so that both men and woman are equally removed from the connection between sexuality and childbearing.
- The redefinition of marriage as a union of a man and a woman to mean nearly any association, including its opposite, homosexual marriage.
- The notion that being a wife and mother is a kind of biological punishment or inferior vocation from which technology and politics must help women escape, rather than (as Christianity maintains) a noble vocation essential to our natural good.
- The notion that father and mother are not unique aspects of the natural family but can be replaced by the gender-indifferent “parent” or “caregiver.”
- State-sponsored care of single mothers.
- The drive for women to work outside the home was initiated in part by the desire not to be entirely beholden to ne’er-do-well or tyrannical husbands, but even more by the Gnostic notion that being a wife and mother was a kind of slavery to biology. The mixed motives are also present in the passion for state-sponsored daycare.
- The politically correct elimination of gendered pronouns—not just the he/she imbroglio, but the already noted substitution of “parent” or “caregiver” for mother and father, and we may add, of “partner” for husband and wife.

> “Reconstructing speech in this way isn’t just the result of a desire to eliminate injustices against women, but even more, to signal that gender and what comes from it are things we need to transcend. The elimination of gender in speech is a reflection of the desire to eliminate the effects of gender in society and in nature itself. With the abovementioned efforts, we may also include the holding up of manly females and effeminate men as iconic by the various media, and the pushing of woman into traditionally male jobs (construction worker, fireman, policeman, soldier), and the pulling of men into jobs usually associated with woman (nursing). All serve, in one way or another, directly or indirectly, the elimination from society of the divisions and distinctions caused by male and female.

Epilogue

> We have then uncovered an important aspect of the new Gnosticism that was not in the old: given that the new form is bent on the this-worldly task of recreating defective nature, it is essentially political. Political correctness isn’t just a matter of correcting speech or history textbooks. The new Gnosticism understands politics to be half the essential means of correcting reality. Technical power and political power are yoked for the sake of a complete recreation of our world where the defects and limitations of the human body have been entirely overcome by the human will and the benefits have been spread evenly throughout society (if even by force).”

Topics for Discussion

Readers may like to consider how the following cultural trends are examples or vehicles of modern Gnosticism.

1. Education?

2. Feminism?
3. Wokeness?
4. Critical Race Theory?
5. Q Anon?
6. Therapeutic Moralistic Deism?
7. The Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (AKA OASIS, e.g. Bumble, Instagram, OnlyFans, etc.)?
8. Vaxx pseudo-science?
9. What about Fake News?
10. Is the whole “post-truth” phenomenon an individual-specific expression of modern Gnosticism?
11. Or how about the way scientific research these days tends to prove what the sponsors want people to believe, and research supporting opposing views never passes the review stage?

I believe we could find many aspects of these things that could be classified as Gnosticism-in-effect.

Once your eyes are opened, you’ll see Gnosticism everywhere!

The Ruling Ideology of Gnosticism

Jack · 4 November 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Gnosticism is the expression of the Evil within human nature.

Readership: All; Christians;
Reader's Note: This post is the ninth in a series on Gnosticism.
Length: 600 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

After conducting this study of Gnosticism, I'd say it pretty well fits the bill of a world-wide ruling ideology that has fundamental motivations that are general enough to be applied to multiple fields of human social and political movements. The reason is because the fundamental principle of Gnosticism rests entirely on the human propensity to reject the Lord and to find meaning and value through alternative achievements, philosophical vestments, and personal excellence.

Not too long ago, Bruce Charlton asked the question, Why does the ruling ideology of the world Not have a name? (2021 September 12).* I'll go through the statements that Charlton posed and match an answer according to what we know about Gnosticism.

> "This question has often been asked, but the answer is simple and clear. The answer is that the ruling ideology of the world is Evil — and evil has no positive definition.
> The name of Evil does not derive from what it wants but from what it opposes; and that is Good, which is God and divine creation."

Judging by the history and religious philosophy of Gnosticism and how this has led up to the present day, we can see that the Gnostic wants several things. Once we accept that Gnosticism is an expression of Evil, then we can see that these are things that Evil wants, and this forms a positive definition according to its own ethical paradigm.

1. The Gnostic is drawn towards the exaltation and glorification of the self through image, popularity, and logical self-determinism. Christ is thereby ignored or denigrated.
2. The Gnostic desires to be free from the confines of an external authoritative structure, while still retaining the benefits of the blessed life. This shows up in the overvaluing of democracy and the incessant calls for equality.
3. Gnosticism entails that one is to be free to determine one's own morality without being judged by contrasting ethical systems. From a Christian view, this comprises the element of rebellion.
4. The underlying "hope" of the Gnostic aspires to achieve an idealized human condition (apart from Christ), and this preoccupation summarily replaces the hope of knowing the upward calling of Christ and sharing in the riches of His glory.

All this is evil from the Christian view, because it pursues these things through achievements, adherence to a Gnostic ideology, education, heredity, scientific advancement, socio-economic class, sophistication, etc., which is essentially a form of salvation by works, and is accompanied by the denial or rejection of Christ.

All these things are cast as positives within the Gnostic world view, which redefines evil to be anything that causes hardship, shame, or embarrassment, or limits one's own volition, or prevents the materialistic pleasures and conveniences that make life enjoyable.

> "Evil is not something you Are, but a cause you serve. It is not a specific group, but one side in a Spiritual war; a war where each individual can and must choose which side he supports. (No abstention is possible.)"

Everyone is a natural Gnostic until they come to know Christ. (Romans 3:23; Romans 8:6-8)

> "The problem with giving a name to Evil thus understood is that it constitutes the entirety of world and national governments (all parties), the mass media, and the (cross-linked) bureaucracies of all major social institutions (including 'Christian' churches)."

Yesterday's post, The Pervasive Influence of Modern Gnosticism, revealed that Gnosticism aligns with this view of Evil – that it is everywhere.

> "For most people, Evil thus understood also includes almost every person they know."

This would also agree with what we've learned about Gnosticism – it is the default human condition.

> "So the problem of naming Evil is the problem of acknowledging its overwhelming prevalence and power."

Only the redeemed can name Evil properly, all others remain short sighted, seeking only after their own desires and personal well-being, which is the positively framed essence of Gnosticism. (John 6:44)

October Epilogue – Gnosticism

Jack · 6 November 2021 · Archived copy · Original

An inventory of what we have learned.

Readership: All
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

October turned out to be a very busy month for posting. Even though I posted every day for two weeks, I still didn't hit all the topics I had planned.

The topics have been highly varied. I wrote a few posts about the situation between China and Taiwan which pushed back my scheduled writings.

1. Fake News: China and Taiwan go to war (2021-10-08)
2. War between China and Taiwan makes no sense (2021-10-09)
3. A Nugget of Truth about China and Taiwan (2021-10-10)
4. Communications and Perspectives (2021-10-11)

Adam Piggott responded to this short series in his post, Taiwan and Data Point Analysis (2021-10-09), which offered a thoughtful assessment of the risks involved with an expat's continuation as a resident of Taiwan. (Adam's analysis was also reposted on XYZ.)

There were some good posts on intersexual relationships and Inner Game.

1. Start Small to Build Internal Locus of Control (2021-10-14)
2. How to build your ex to go back to being fond of you (2021-10-15)
3. 50 Female Evasion and Control Tactics (2021-10-22)

The theme I had originally planned for October was Gothicism and Gnosticism. Before studying these topics, I had the notion that they were somehow linked. But after studying the two, I found they are not connected as much as I once believed, at least, not any more than Gnosticism is connected to just about everything else.

I did not know what to expect when I started studying these subjects. I just had a strong impression that they were topics that I needed to examine. Thanks goes to Ed Hurst for an email discussion that kick-started my knowledge of Gnosticism. After this correspondence, I found that it was a much more extensive subject than I expected. So when I finally dug into it after many delays and days of contemplation on the matter, I spent most of my writing efforts on this subject, and I only touched on Gothicism obliquely in a couple posts.

Posts in this series are listed here.

8. The Pervasive Influence of Modern Gnosticism (2021-11-03)
9. The Ruling Ideology of Gnosticism (2021-11-04)

I have a couple more posts on Gnosticism in progress, one related to the church, and another related to the Red Pill, but they need a bit more research and contemplation to complete. I'll get around to finishing them at some point in the future.

Judging by the sharp decrease in views and comments since the latter half of October, I take it that many readers have gotten the impression that Gnosticism is uninteresting or that it strays away from the main topics discussed in this blog – building frame, masculinity, marriage, married game, and understanding the nature of women.

However, and speaking for myself personally, I've discovered that having a firm understanding of Gnosticism has strengthened my frame more than most of the other theories and insights that I usually cover. Namely, it has given me all of the following frame enhancements.

1. I've apprehended a structural paradigm which allows me to discern the underlying spiritual nature of all that goes on in the world (e.g. philosophy, the news, advertisements, media, social movements, personal social interactions, etc.), and this allows me to better identify what is happening in the spiritual world around me and within myself as well.
2. I have a greater regard for how humanity has a latent fascination, or even an obsession with spiritualizing the material world through philosophical pursuits, and how this sin becomes an illusory distraction from seeing this same activity as their own sin. IOW, the sin of psychological solipsism is blinding and effaces one's spiritual identity in Christ.
3. I've come to see how humanity will go to insane lengths to avoid the effects of sin and to better themselves (according to their own perceptions) by intentionally ignoring the truth.
4. I know why atheists and humanists dislike God and the Christian religion.
5. I know why feminists, liberals, and progressives dislike Christian morality and external authority.
6. I have a deeper understanding of how democracy and progressivism are flawed from a Christian perspective.
7. I have a better appreciation for the differences between faith in God and faith in humanity.
8. I can identify which types of activities, social associations, and motivations are more likely to be blessed by God.
9. I know why certain types of activities, social associations, and motivations seem good from a human standpoint, but are cursed by God.
10. It has solidified my confidence in the need for structures of authority.
11. It has increased my general wisdom about relying on structures of authority as vehicles of purpose and blessings.
12. It has broadened my ability to think beyond myself and my own interests.
13. I can better understand why God allows suffering.
14. I can understand not only one's subjective motivation to avoid suffering, which is to avert the unpleasant sensation of pain, but also one's spiritual motivation to escape suffering, which is to evade having to trust God and being molded by Him.
15. It is easier to tell the difference between redemptive suffering and suffering as a result of selfishness and stupidity.
16. It is easier to know when and why it can be wrong to avoid suffering, and when and why it is wise to avoid suffering.
17. I've come to see myself more clearly. I've come to understand that my own internal drive towards excellence and my strong interest in forming exact philosophies and theories about life are what make me a good writer and professor, but it also makes me appear cold, ungraceful, and unloving. Furthermore, these inclinations are actually rooted in latent Gnostic tendencies. Realizing this about myself has led to my repentance.

All in all, that is a check mate frame! I can say that the way I look at life is forever changed for the better after this study of Gnosticism.

Yet, I remain concerned for my readers. From our past communications, Ed Hurst, Mogadishu Matt, Nikolai Vladivostok, and I have expressed a common musing among ourselves – that those posts which we believe are most penetrating and insightful often receive fewer views than others, and that we don't really understand why that is, or why other posts that seem spurious to us will spike readers' interests. Perhaps it is the nature of blogging. Even so, I hope that my readers might be able to apprehend some of the insights I listed above from reading these posts.

Other Posts in October included the following. I want to express my own appreciation and that on behalf of our readers to Deti, Lexet, NovaSeeker, and Scott for their contributions.

How Feminism Erodes Marriage

Introduction

Anyone who has been reading the Christian Manosphere for any length of time will have come to the conclusion that Feminism erodes marriage. But I'm not sure if anyone has explained exactly why this is. Feminism hits men and women in their respective weaknesses by promising what both sexes desire, while offering what seems to be an evasion of the costs and responsibilities thereof. This has the effect of cheapening marriage by making the inherent benefits of marriage a free-for-all (or that is the sales pitch, anyway).

Here, I'll gloss over many of the dynamics that are already well known by regular readers in order to get to the point.

Pre-wedding feminism incentives that erode marriage

Loosening female sexual morality offers incentives to both men and women before marriage.

The incentive to men is that they will get more sex, and more easily. This is not the reality for most men but that is the sales pitch and it was/is powerful. The small percentage of men who do get sex regularly have little to no incentive to change the current situation, and the vast majority of men who get little to no sex in the current arrangement end up demoralized. Without being "man up! – ish" there is an incentive for those men who do not have regular access to the SMP to live lives of self-satisfaction (pun most certainly intended), which often means reduced productivity, further erosion of attractive qualities and a reinforced cycle of singleness.

> And the Lord God said, "It is not good that man should be alone;"
> Genesis 2:18 (NKJV)

A lonely young man dreams of finding love.

The incentive to women is that it allows them to fully explore their hypergamous instincts. The upside is that most women can have a top quality man! Sex is assumed, and the motivation is Tingles galore. The downside is the fact that most women will not actually pair up with a top SMV man in marriage. The reality is that, without first having a marital commitment in place, they will have a long series of pump-n-dumps, and ride the carousel until they hit the wall. Women are blindsided by this fact because (1) they are unaware of the short supply of HSMV men, (2) they are pumped up on precious princess entitlements, and (3) they don't understand men.

There is also a prioritization of female career achievement over family achievement which (1) offsets material dependence on men, and (2) makes the men just described seem even less worthy of marriage to these women. This overall shift in focus causes women to underprioritize marriage and family precisely at the time when their prospects for marriage are at an all-lifetime high.

Post-wedding feminism incentives that erode marriage

Prioritization of female career achievement over family achievement incentivizes a more egalitarian marriage structure which brings up Proverbs 14:1 and 21:9. Fates often awaiting men if they do marry a carousel rider is that their marriage ends in divorce rape, potential alienation from his children due to "family" court, or remains intact but has the characteristics of how Deti describes being married to a girl who settled for you. Each of these options erodes the sanctity of marriage as men seek to avoid the pain associated with marriage. (This sentence is so d@mning to our society.)

A married alpha widow dreams of past lovers and is disinterested in the man she settled for.
As you can see, Feminism breaks down marriage on both sides of the wedding ceremony. On the dating side it incentivizes men with the benefits of marriage without any of the responsibilities of headship. It's an easy marketing pitch to men because they avoid all the hardest work which happens with headship, while getting the fruit (sex) at a way reduced rate. On the marriage side of the wedding ceremony it gives women all the power they need to resist biblical marriage authority and extract resources and protection without any of their cost (submission). So feminism incentivizes men to erode marriage prior to the wedding and women to erode marriage after the wedding. Wildly effective.

Parallels

Comparing feminism to Eve and the serpent we have great parallels. The serpent told Eve that God's commands were not for her benefit but to keep her down and feminism tells women that God's marriage order of authority is not for her benefit and to keep her down. The conclusion the serpent draws or implies is that God is a bad authority much like feminism says that men are a bad authority. Eve goes to Adam, tells him to eat and he abandons headship and sins through his supplication to her and the world falls into sin and death. Men listen to feminists and buy the "Happy wife, happy life" mantra and supplicate to them and we are witnessing the deterioration of western society.

Here is where I think it gets interesting. We are obviously not perfect like Adam was at the time and the enticements of feminism, not the actual outcomes, are actually attractive to a sizeable number of men. Men, like lastmod, openly complain about the current situation and the lack of women, but there appear to be just as many who are enticed by the message of marital benefits without any of the costs. Those costs are the weight of headship. They outweigh Gregoire's "mental load" of running the family, because that is the way God designed it, but if strong, independent women want to take some of that load off men's shoulders (versus supporting men as they carry it) and still give men the benefits of marriage, well, for most men, that seems like it's too good to be true. Which it turns out is exactly the case…

But that sales pitch …… !!!

To tie this to feminism, we should think about what it costs a man to live in a biblical headship role compared to what it costs him in a feminist marriage (I know, it's an oxymoron) which is essentially a tentative liaison within serial monogamy. As the saying goes, "She's not really his, it's just his turn", and here, the husband gets a long, formal "turn" with bells, and whistles, followed by a hefty soul-crushing price tag.

In economic terms, this is why a free market (a freely submissive wife) always beats a communist system (a husband asserting headship against non-compliant opposition). To be fair, in a truly free market, everyone is out for themselves, but outside of rare circumstances, the interactions are not one-move games. So the strategy to make the most money for yourself is to actually do what is in the best interest of the customer, even to your own minor short-term deficit, because you'll make more serving them long term than fleecing them once. This incentivizes self-regulation and organizes economic systems very efficiently compared to other options. Communism's top-down structure that demands people work against their self-interest and this design in the system requires heavy compliance enforcement costs in order to implement it.

Conclusions

My conclusion from this line of thought is that feminism is going to either become the dominant cultural force or remain the dominant cultural force in any modern society (viz. one in which people enjoy an easy life relative to history) until the incentives change.

Women have sex to influence men

Introduction

In a previous post, Why is Premarital Sex a Sin? (2020 August 14), we learned how women use sex to assert control over men.

In this post, we'll look at how Pick Up Artistry plays into the woman's frame to give her the illusion of superiority that she seeks. As we will see, it is much more complex and nuanced than merely a game for control. In fact, it will be seen that both the man and the woman fail to accurately assess the interaction as one of asserting sexual authority — the cognizant idea of power never even enters the picture! Instead, her desire for preeminence and his cooperation through humility is instead regarded by both as her "influence" on the man, which is then interpreted by her as an affirmation of her ego.

Let's review the relevant text of an article appearing on Girls Chase: Women Resist Sex When They Feel They Have No Influence (2020 May 13), by Cody Lyans. (Please go to Girls Chase to read the entire piece.) Upon first reading, I got the impression that women have sex because they want to be valued and loved, and they want to make themselves relevant to the man's life. But after picking this essay apart, I found that this article contains a lot of coded language that glosses over the messiness and transforms the PUAs ethical paradigm into a beautiful piece of work.

First and foremost, I'll point out that the woman's "influence" is a code word for a mutual faith-based assertion of her sexual authority over the man. Also a woman's "motivation" refers to her intrinsic wants and desires. I'll translate others as we go along.

Women Read Men much better than Men Read Women

In the first half of the article, the author explains three tips about how to draw a woman in and not screw up the escalation.

- Choose location
- Control pacing
- Keep her Heart Trust engaged by posing witty questions and showing humor.

Following these instructions, Lyans explains how to interpret different reactions and offers this insight about how to respond.

> DIFFERENT REACTIONS
> Remember, not all women are the same. There's a spectrum: some women will kick back a lot, others very little, and with both, it is a point of pride, whichever way they swing. To one girl, it may be good to be "less of a hassle," and to another girl, it is an accomplishment to "be a hassle."
> Both come from the same idea: women want to have influence on a man AND be pursued by him.

Translation: Women are versatile in that they will find different ways to attract sexual attention, establish prominence over a man's life, and exert leverage, depending on the individual man's particular weaknesses. Some women do this through feminine wiles, while others find it more effective to use anger and more direct confrontation. Furthermore, women love to lull in the throes of egotistical self-esteem in doing so.

The reason why "women want to have influence on a man AND be pursued by him" is because this is the condition of full engagement for the woman. She wants to feel overwhelmed by her passions, while at the same time not be left completely without volition. IOW, it puts her on the juxtaposed cusp of faith and flesh, and this is what makes her feel loved and wanted — not the man himself. The man is merely an object of her affections, and only has to do what is necessary to maintain this condition of full engagement for the woman. Many women want to see men as fungible in this regard, and chase after the hormonal thrills of the metaphysical connection, but we know this is not done without a cost to the vitality of her soul.

If we think about what kind of man could keep a woman on her toes with this kind of interaction, we'll realize why many women say they want conflicting traits in a man — sensitive, receptive, tractable, understanding, and yet confident, firm, proactive, and steadfast. If he is thirsty as ɦəl1, he'll keep up the pursuit and maintain the connection, but he must also be monogamously faithful so that she can retain faith herself. So women want an obedient sex beggar with a millisecond response to the whiff of Chanel who also has a zenith SMV and can obtain sex at the drop of a thong. As we know, only a tiny fraction of a percentage of men can match all these requirements. The PUA industry is built on the art of faking it (or getting sufficiently close enough through training, experience, and self-development), but systematically avoids following through to its completion in marriage.

And yet, women are clueless about what men truly want...

> Women don't know how to inject influence into a situation and allow a man to pursue them.

Yes, women are persnickety afficionadas about the conflicting traits in men that are attractive to them, but are rather clueless about what is attractive to men – other than the obvious – coquettish threads wrapped tightly around a bounteous display of smooth hide, and of course, sexual favors. Modest, demure approaches in courtship seems to be a lost art of the intersexual dance.

> So when they influence a guy who is escalating, there's a chance that he'll suddenly stop his pursuit. And if they don't influence a guy who is pursuing her, then she has no responsibility for what happens and is worthless in her own eyes.

Translation: Men tend to prioritize reaching for the fruit that is most delectable and within easy reach. Logically, women should try to make themselves more delicious and more easily accessible, but this would require her to (1) swallow her pride and make an effort, and (2) relinquish her grasping for control over the interaction. So instead, proud lazy women who want to make themselves relevant to a man have to quickly assess each man's weakness and find a method to consolidate preeminent sexual authority over his desire (or some other weakness) early in the game. This is why unsuccessful women (who take either approach) are described as "not being able to keep a man".

Translation: Her sense of "responsibility" is linked to whether she is getting what she wants, not whether she is exercising personal agency nor being obedient to his wishes.

Illicit sex often comes into the Game at this point, because this is the easiest, most direct, and most enjoyable way to attain knowledge of the other person's innermost soul. Men want to know what she's made of and whether she would be a good fit for him. Women seek to obtain that knowledge of his heart which would allow her to consolidate power and control over him. OTOH, too much knowledge can kill the passion and desire necessary to draw one in. So this is the delicate dance that women think they have to perform in order to "keep a man". You would think that marriage would be the optimal solution for women at this point, and therefore should be prioritized early in the game. Yet because of hypergamy, copious options of men, and feminist cultural norms including the widespread acceptance of promiscuity, many women have the notion that marriage only disturbs the Game and “traps” them in a state of soul sucking irrelevancy.

Women use Ego Reward Feedback Mechanisms better than Men do

> In short, girls are playing a game of self-worth IN BETWEEN the moments we are pursuing. They OFTEN fail at this balance; otherwise, they would never feel a reward when they “get it right.” It is THIS reward that is more important to them than sex, and even a good relationship with YOU.

Translation: Within this paradigm, a woman’s “self-worth” is dependent on her ego-feedback mechanism and whether she is getting what she wants out of the interaction. The reason women fail at this endeavor is because they are adopting an external locus of control, which they have no control over. Instead, a mature woman should be focusing on conforming to the Biblical archetype of femininity and prioritizing her relationship with the man (e.g. by being respectful and obedient), which is an internal locus of control.

Translation: The “reward” is limbic, not relational as a man would assume. It’s about getting what she wants – attention, validation, Tingles, and perhaps sex if the man is exceedingly high SMV. The problem is that men are not “reward” vending machines, and women cannot treat them as such.

> It’s the thundering truth, and something to fully recognize. I think it happens because all humanity is forever running around in life, and it’s only through these small windows where we have perceivable power (in our own eyes) that we can let go of our worries and believe we have EARNED our reward. Or less philosophically, our body will only allow us to reward ourselves if we have done something “just right” and pull off a new level of efficiency or compromise.

See translation of “reward” above. It also applies to the man but with a boulder-heavy emphasis on sex. This paragraph reveals that both PUAs and the women involved are running on feral autopilot, seeking after limbic hind-brain “rewards”. However, and reading between the lines, Lyans is suggesting that a modicum of success in this endeavor can bring a psychological liberation that allows one to transcend the limitations of the flesh.

> This goes back to our hunter-gatherer days when a person could run after a deer with a spear but might burn precious energy in the attempt, and fail. So the body shuts down reward centers to stop him chasing, rather than have them on full blast at all times and have him hunt until he dies of exhaustion. In the same vein, girls are playing a game of “catching a provider/protector.”

Just as I wrote earlier, men grasp for easy-squeezy juicy fruit, not Miss Princess Invicta Perfecta. More biological evolutionary psychology offers confirmation of the intelligent caveman mentality.

> To be recognized as a provider/protector, a guy needs to get sex from her AND be influenced by her. Her lizard brain tells her that if she has no influence in a relationship, she may not be able to protect her children and they’ll die, thus rendering her procreation efforts useless. If she has influence but receives no sexual excitement, SHE will be apathetic and won’t have sex. So to enjoy sex, she has to command influence and be excited, which to her is a hard task; and to guys, it’s not so easy either.

Translation: A man does not need to get sex to be a provider/protector (e.g. fathers). The reason Lyans is inserting sex into the equation is because sex is the feedback confirmation of his stud status being accepted by her hypergamous filters.

In claiming that he must be “influenced” by her, the PUA is essentially saying that a man must allow the woman some measure of ascendancy, at least long enough to be chosen by her for the perpetuation of his seed (or so it is assumed sans birth control). He's also suggesting that men are untrustworthy and irresponsible (which is only true for immature and uncommitted men), and so it is only right that the woman should be in control (a wrong conclusion due to the selective premise). He's also pointing out that the man must remain high SMV and perform well sexually, in order to retain her interest.

Maintaining this balance is a hard task to both men and women because this is not how God intended men and women to interact. The real question is about how men and women can reach the level of maturity that is necessary to be sufficiently obedient to God's order. How can one become mature without forfeiting one's soul through trial and error?

In the next section, the author outlines what he perceives to be a solution to his conundrum.

Ego Primacy and the Motivating Power of Desire

> ALLOW HER TO JUSTIFY HERSELF AND BE MOTIVATED
> So if you've ever wondered where this comes from, now you know. It's simple: pay attention to her NEED to justify herself and her WANT to stay clear of apathy in life. Help her be MOTIVATED. Support her attempts to JUSTIFY herself, but do neither without a price for her to pay.

Translation: "Pay attention to her…" means to recognize her sexual authority in a way that is "rewarding" to her, whether that might be giving her social affirmation, control, pats on her ego, validation, or Tingles if possible. (It's up to the man to figure that mess out.)

Translation: Recognizing "her NEED to justify herself" means that men should accept, for the most part, whatever she feels like dishing out, and still maintain their devotion and sexual enthusiasm.

Translation: "Her WANT to stay clear of apathy in life" means that the man must never allow her to feel any disappointment or loss of ego satisfaction at any moment. (Wow! Is this even possible?)

Translation: "Supporting" all this means to egg her ego on in a fun, playful manner, and to not behave in any way that would erode her sense of ego-security.

Translation: The "price for her to pay" sounds transactional, but a man with a highly refined game (i.e. a PUA) interprets this as making demands for her to invest in him, and drawing her into his frame. The man's Attitude of Detachment and Displaying High Value will keep her hypergamous interests in splay. All Game techniques serve to "motivate" her to keep coming back to him for successive steady stroking.

> Because without any effort, all motivation and justification are untested, so it isn't real. So you have to provide realistic feedback and be somewhat genuine as you react to her attempts to inject her influence, or restart your pursuit by getting out of the way.

Translation: "Testing" her "motivation" means to figure out what she wants and needs, and what "works" towards satisfying her desires.

Translation: "Testing" her "justification" means to understand the limits of what she can and cannot accept.

Translation: Her "motivation" and "justification" being "unreal" means that the man has not established any sort of trust in the relationship, and so he cannot be certain about how he can successfully let the woman feel like she has any self-satisficing significance without violating her wants, needs, and expectations.

Overcoming the Chasm between the Ideal and the Real

> Women wish you were like a shower faucet, and they could adjust how much hot and cold are in your mix to > get the right temperature.

Yes, this is what women wish. But men cannot be easily nor reliably manipulated by a woman over the long haul, especially in marriage. Lyans is suggesting that men should adjust themselves to the woman's preferred "temperature". Of course, this requires a vitally functioning feedback loop.

> But their wish isn't always what ought to exist, because without the struggle, there's no sweetness in the reward. And THIS is at the heart of all transitions from hot and heavy to the bedroom.

In this paragraph, Lyans is lightly touching on a very profound truth that Christian men would do well to recognize – how desire and sexual passion can draw two people into a crucible of suffering leading to refinement and eternal bonding. Establishing Heart-felt Trust is the ticket of admission and must be diligently maintained.

Christian men must move past the common churchian misconceptions of complementarianism and the "servant leader" whitewash, and to engage in the mystical pursuit of Heart Trust with both Christ and the woman in their lives.

Lyans is correct in saying that she must "pay a price", because this is the only way for her to attain a vested interest in the relationship and establish authentic pair bonding. Christian men who are married (or hope to be) must also recognize the role of fleshly desire in sanctification, and of suffering, her suffering in particular, towards yielding eternally beneficial results in their marriages.

Jesus also spoke of "counting the cost" in Luke 14:28. This passage is often interpreted as forsaking worldly interests, but if we look at this through the Christ:Church::Husband:Wife parallel, the "cost" or the "price" for the woman goes beyond forsaking other men, according to Lyans' view. It extends to her continual obedience and service to the man. I would have to agree.

I see parallels with scripture at this point, so I'm willing to listen to Lyans' advice for men.

> Girls will reject you not because YOU didn't do the right thing, but because SHE doesn't feel SHE did.

Here, Lyans makes a sharp departure from his original assumption that women have an external locus of control. I can only guess he means that a woman's Feeelz always trumps her external locus of control, and that in spite of having an external locus of control, women insist on carrying the notion that they are in control. I think Lyans is suggesting that men should allow women to retain this sense of control and relationship primacy for the sake of the woman's own confidence and faith in the relationship, even though the woman's sense of control is a puerile illusion. And more importantly, if a man happens to break this illusion, then he also breaks her faith in the relationship.

> So how do you get her to feel she is doing things right?

Translation: How do you preserve her illusions of autonomy and make her feel like she is in a self-controlled state of ascendancy towards preeminence?

- Provide honest feedback.
- Apply a degree of pressure (not toward sex, but behind WHY you are in pursuit).
- Playfully bridge her mistakes (don't harp on her mess-ups).
- Encourage her to keep trying to get the balance right rather than quit.
- Be playful and happy underneath it all, no matter what happens.
- And no matter the result, just feel relieved when it is over.

Overall, this list of advice is surprising precisely because it is different from the "dancing monkey" approach we often hear from PUAs. Instead, it is rather similar to what is suggested in 1st Peter 3:7 – living with her in an honorable, patient, and understanding way, except it adds the elements of detachment and teasing/tantalization which serve to amplify the sexual tension. It also emphasizes the importance of maintaining Heart Trust, and it can be adapted to how Women rely on a Man's Frame for Redemptive Introspection (2021-06-28).

Putting this all together and adding my own speculative theory to it, engaging with a woman patiently and playfully, and maintaining a heart led connection, is the way to let a woman feel like she is comfortably in control. She may be allowed to relish the idea that she is preeminently in control of the relationship, and this sufflates her own enthusiasm, encourages her investment, and contributes to her own satisfaction. But from the man's perspective, the idea is to maintain a balance between her level of challenge and her level of skill, which allows her to attain a state of Flow* in the interaction. Flow is important for building confidence, faith, and skill. When all this is firmly established, and her faith in the relationship is growing, then the man can begin to exercise more direct demands over her behavior in the relationship. In the best case scenario, feelings of love, humility, and pair bonding would also develop.

 Lyans never mentions Flow, but I can imagine that it is present, and that it may be sufficient to maintain her interest and "motivation".*

Concluding Statements

All in all, this article confirms everything I wrote in a previous post, Why does Game work? (2019-12-09) – namely that Game is a dynamic interplay of stoking and stroking a steady desire, all while maintaining mutual humility and trust.

Women are well aware of men's desire, and revel in hedonic joy in the game of leading him around by the nose. But here, Lyans recognizes that men are not very well attuned to the aspect of desire, and he is suggesting that men should be more aware of women's desire, and feed it just enough to be chosen by her and thus taken in for a ride.

Many of us in the Christian Manosphere have long assumed that Pick Up Artistry is largely a game of behaving like both an enthusiastically obedient "servant leader" and a male sex object in women's eyes. The obsequious "servant leader" archetype promulgated in churchian circles is similar to the PUA approach, but the male sex object aspect is rejected as being too carnal – which is a complete and utter fail by both worldly and Christian standards. In contrast, Lyans' article brings out a deeper nuance to the male-female interaction that can be described as the man and the woman having independent spheres of influence which are interrelated by faith and are correlated by maintaining an idealized sense of illusion concerning the respective gender roles. Doing the work of maintaining this illusion insincerely or without a sense of a grander vision of the ideal is what constitutes a "dancing monkey".

The strength of Lyans' approach is that it encourages an authentic interaction with the intention of building up Heart Trust, as opposed to a transactional Head Trust type of interaction. This approach is also good in the sense that it recognizes the woman as the weaker vessel and does what is necessary to placate her weaknesses and bolster her faith to continue in the relationship. Achieving a state of Flow, if possible, may be vitally conducive to this end.

The biggest problem with this approach is the degenerate marketplace. For the top 15% of men who are naturally gifted with extremely good genetics and natural charisma, Lyans advice is applicable solely by the fact that the man can easily maintain his appeal to her desire/"motivation". Lyans' list of advice is most applicable to these men. For the intermediate 15%, it requires the man to be a sincere "dancing monkey" at all times just to retain her interest but maybe not her "motivation" (i.e. Tingles and sexual interest). Without that grander sense of vision, this can be gruesomely tiresome, and with meager and passionless "motivating" "rewards" for the man (i.e. sex). But if the man's charisma, confidence, and faith are rather mature, such that he can motivate himself through a vision of the ideal, then the dancing monkey act comes more easily and sincerely, and with better results. For all other men, most of Lyans' advice (except the last part) utterly fails for the mere fact that they cannot appeal to the woman's desire/"motivation" (especially in our day and age).

Another problem with this approach is one of immaturity. Men don't know how to create the magic of indulging a woman's fantasies, and are also clueless about how to exercise Headship. Women honestly think they should be in full control of both the relationship and the man, as well as their entire lives, and are not content with a man's artful magic to this end. However, given the opportunity combined with due diligence, there's always a chance that a man and woman could learn to adjust and grow into a healthier relational structure. The vitality of the connection is the key that will determine whether he and she will be willing to endure the process of refinement and growth.

For men who have an excessively immature woman, and they have a vested interest in preserving the relationship (e.g. shared assets, children, etc.), then perhaps engaging with her on the level of gamemanship and fantasy remains a necessary concession. Previously, I wrote a post On the Spiritual Significance and Social Value of Game (2019-11-03) which explores situations in which this kind of Game may be justifiable or needed as a stopgap to ease through a rough patch.

A Review of Lyans' Approach

In my last post, Women have sex to influence men (2021-11-10), we examined one PUAs approach towards consolidating on the interaction with a woman, leading to sex.

Lyans' article is about pick-up Game, but women don't miraculously change once they get married. This is exactly why PUA's accounts of women's nature is of relevant interest to all men, married men especially. It's basically because AWALT.

I chose to study this article because it describes a mystical approach to PUArtistry (AKA "inner game"), with undertones of agency.

The purpose of this post was to examine what Lyans says about the role of agency for both the man and the woman. As anonymous_ng pointed out, Lyans is talking about a woman who has most likely already decided to have sex with the man. The man's role is basically, "detect her interest, and don't screw it up". Lyans offered this basic list of pointers about how not to screw it up.

- Choose location
- Control pacing
- Keep her Heart Trust engaged by posing witty questions and showing humor.

Lyans doesn't say this explicitly, but I can see how Lyans is holding on to a solid ego primacy that is grounded in himself, his own frame of reality. He's also focused on maintaining an internal locus of control, as I covered before. This state of being is assumed to be the man's intuitive compass from here on, and this is where the men are divided between failure and success. If a man can latch on to this intuition, then he can develop it and refine it. If he can't, then he'll always screw up the interaction because he won't know what he's doing.

Even if a man has this intuition, it is impossible to pinpoint any specific details about what a man should do to "not screw it up", simply because relationships are dynamic, not static. How a man is to pull this off is greatly complicated by the fact that the woman's role in exercising agency is much more nuanced. Apparently, it is not really about the man himself, but more about…

1. The social context (e.g. Lyans' "choosing location", opinions of peers, etc.)
2. The feelings she gets from the feedback loop (i.e. Lyans' "control pacing").
3. Her "motivations".
4. From what I can ascertain, her ego investment in the relationship.

Here, I won't go into Point 1 – Context, but I'll discuss my reasoning for the remaining three points below.

Point 2 – The Feeelz

Among long time readers, there should be no doubt about the centrality of the feeelz within the female psychology. Concerning the subject at hand, Deti wrote,

> "Women have sex because of how they feel, and "how they feel" is informed by any number of things: How they feel about themselves, what's going on in their lives, whether they are having a good hair day, whether they've gained or lost weight, a recent breakup, job is going well or poorly, horny, bored, lonely, curious, adventurous, insecure, whatever."

Deti concluded,

> "[In an ideal relationship] there is hard visceral attraction AND "Heart Trust". There is attraction AND comfort. "Heart Trust" = comfort."
> "Comfort is not so much how she feels about you. It's more about how she feels about herself, and how she feels about having sex. "How she feels about you" becomes an issue only if you raise a glaring red flag."

This is the barebones message of Lyans' article, and Deti's take on it is a standard Red Pill assessment. All the talk about "influence" is a reflection of the female viewpoint.

Case Study 1 – The Tyranny of Mrs. Apostle's Feeelz

Red Pill Apostle gave us this account [edited for clarity].

> "Mrs. Apostle had a lapse into argumentative/contentious territory last night because she didn't not agree with the direction I was heading in regarding a decision I was contemplating. She offered her opinion on the matter and did not add information to change my thoughts so I quickly made the call. She was unhappy, argued, and even though I gave her a few opportunities to change her behavior she did not.
> The initial interaction took 2 minutes, me addressing her behavior after the fact took 30. In that conversation, the root of her contentiousness is that she did not FEEL like I listened to her and she felt like I was being dismissive of her. Mrs. Apostle's heels dug in because it was more important for her to feel like I considered her viewpoint than to actually consider it. This is the tyranny of feelings. I, in fact, did listen to her and did consider her thoughts, but did not agree, so while I actually did those things she wanted, she was upset because she didn't feel like I did.
> Bringing this topic back to the initial PUA basis for the post, my wife's sentiments highlight the immense importance of headship for husbands and fathers. PUAs play on the centrality of women's feelings without offering any substance behind it, and women prove themselves inadequate to differentiate between their perceptions and feelings enough to recognize a man of genuine substance with good intent."

From RPA's story, we see that her need for feedback, and a certain kind of feedback at that, shows that the feedback is more important than how she feels about the feedback. RPA called this the Tyranny of Feelings, but it may be more accurate to call this the Tyranny of the Need for Feedback. This is where men need to do the talking and spell out their Frame in no uncertain terms. RPA seems to have done this, but if RPA had given her half an hour of feedback to patiently explain why his position was superior and why her position was fallible, then he might have avoided spending half an hour chastising her behavior. The point here is not to string out a defensive argument to prove himself right, but to allow her to get on board with his Frame. I believe this approach (which is similar to Lyans') would also increase her feelings of love and intimacy, leading to more sparks in the bedroom.

Point 3 – A Woman's Motivation is for Ego Relevancy

Concerning the third point, in the previous post, I gathered that "motivation" is Lyans' code word for her desire, and that desire could be for any number of things, such as affirmation, attention, material resources, sex, status, validation, etc. Deti thought this way too, as he wrote,

> "Women have sex because they want something, either from themselves or from the man."

Initially, I assumed that Lyans was saying that the reason women fail at this endeavor is because they are adopting an external locus of control. But as I consider this further, I think my initial assessment was wrong in assuming that women's motivation is purpose driven, with that purpose being the attainment of her desire. No, this would be thinking like a man thinks. For women, there is a more fundamental motivation than the attainment of a desire. It is a motivation to maintain ego relevancy, to monitor the feedback loop, and to keep treading the waters of emotional vitality until the object of her desire drops into her lap. This is more along the lines of how women think and operate. This would also correspond to Lyans assertion that women lie on a spectrum between being smooth and being a hassle. Men will naturally view them as being either smooth or "high maintenance", but from a woman's perspective, they're just doing whatever they've learned will give them feedback, and I would surmise that a lot of that goes back to her upbringing.

- Vexing women were likely brought up in a conflict laden home, and/or they learned that "the squeaky wheel gets the oil."
- Smooth women were likely brought up in an orderly home, and/or were taught that "kindness attracts love."

Or something to that effect.

So here it becomes obvious that it is critically important to give a woman constant feedback. Lyans even puts this first in his final list of how to "get her to feel she is doing things right".

- Provide honest feedback.
- Apply a degree of pressure (not toward sex, but behind WHY you are in pursuit).
- Playfully bridge her mistakes (don't harp on her mess-ups).
- Encourage her to keep trying to get the balance right rather than quit.
- Be playful and happy underneath it all, no matter what happens.
- And no matter the result, just feel relieved when it is over.

We also see that "getting her to feel she is doing things right", is confusingly stated from the woman's perspective. What this actually means is that she is getting feedback and is able to adjust herself accordingly to the man's Frame. Again, women's idea of "doing things right" has little to do with morality nor agency, and much to do with feeling good about herself (Point 2) and maintaining ego relevancy.

Point 4 – Getting a Return on Her Ego Investment

I included the fourth point because Lyans wrote,

> "In short, girls are playing a game of self-worth IN BETWEEN the moments we are pursuing. They OFTEN fail at this balance; otherwise, they would never feel a reward when they "get it right." It is THIS reward that is more important to them than sex, and even a good relationship with YOU."

So what is Lyans talking about here? I can only assume that he means a woman's "self-worth" is dependent on her ego-feedback mechanism and whether she is getting what she wants out of the interaction, all of which reinforces her "motivation". But the thing that women want is not well understood by men. Men who think like men want specific outcomes, but not so for women. Women want feedback leading to good feelz and ego relevancy, even more than she wants to attain her desires.

This is why women will withdraw or reject a man when they feel like they are NOT getting the right kind of feedback, even when they are feeling the Tingles.

This understanding also answers the question of why women must be allowed to feel like they have "influence", which I initially translated as meaning some sort of control. The reason is because women must always feel like they are an integral part of what is going on (c.f. the herd mentality), and they depend on "how they feel" as a guide to their intuitions in this respect. This need for relevancy is why it is so important that if a certain kind of feedback is not present, then she loses trust. For women, Trust = Relevancy, and Relevancy = Comfort, as Deti pointed out above. This is the essence of why Lyans wrote,

> "Girls will reject you not because YOU didn't do the right thing, but because SHE doesn't feel SHE did."

IOW, she can't establish the chain of…

Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security and since women are relationally oriented, she sees this as her fault.

This also explains why the woman's feelings (and interest in sex) depend more on her getting a positive return on her ego investment and not so much what the man actually does. This is why the moral character of the man is not even a consideration for women. What matters most to her is establishing the chain of Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security, and attaining this state of sanctification is the crux of the "motivation" that Lyans is referring to. Female "agency" revolves around this structure, not the purposes or morality of the man nor herself. Hence the PUA's successes.

IMO, this is the most interesting facet of Lyans' article, because it suggests that men should give a woman the illusion that she is in control of her own feelings, when actually, women are controlled by their feelings.

Case Study 2 – RedPillBoomer and the Churchian Carouseller

RedPillBoomer gave us this little story.

> Lyans: "Girls will reject you not because YOU didn't do the right thing, but because SHE doesn't feel SHE did."
> Jack: "IMO, this is the most interesting facet of this article, because it suggests that men should give a woman the illusion that she is in control of her own feelings, when actually, women are controlled by their feelings."
> RPB: "Agree. It got me thinking, still grappling with it. I can see it both ways — there were times I didn't do the 'right thing,' e.g. I was too slow to make a move towards escalation for example. At other times I could see where 'She didn't feel she did the right thing.' My churchian 'girlfriend' (aka the Carouseller; me the long distance, oneitis dude, with her showing up to see me at my new place across country) showed up to check out my advancement and have sex (aka 'my turn,' as in 'She's not your girl, it's just your turn'), and her running smack dab into spiritual, loving God me, wanting to begin creating a space for possible marriage me, but definitely not 'get some p-sleeve me.' Even though churchian, she got convicted that we were on two different wavelengths. I think convicted by God. So, in this case, 'she didn't feel she did the right thing' just to show up, check out how I was doing. and let me have a turn on her before going back home to Chad and Tyrone."

In summary, she thought she would do some casual sex tourism with an old F-buddy, but after meeting RPB, she felt "convicted" that something was "not right" about following through with her plans. The PUA might say that RPB screwed it up, but Christian readers would say RPB did the right thing in staying true to his new, God fearing self. But the thing is, if RPB had reverted to his old self, then she probably would have felt it was "right" to have sex with him. Overall, it wasn't about the morality of having sex or not that made it right or wrong, but rather how she could best adapt her ego to the situation.

So why wasn't she "feeling it"? It's because the feedback she was getting from RPB wasn't assuaging her ego to have sex, but rather, the feedback she got from RPB made her realize that her ego could be built up more (in this instance) by making the decision to NOT have sex. We could call this conviction, but if she went back home and continued on with her old habit of riding the carousel, then we can't really say it was true conviction. At best, RPB planted a seed of conviction that might grow in her later on. That's why I say her decision was based on ego investment – not raw desire, not the Tingles, and not even respect for RPB's convictions.

Conclusions

I am quickly coming to the conclusion that women of the modern feminist era are ego buoys. Ebb or flow, high tide or low, her ego will always bob to the surface. Everything women want and every decision they make revolves around whatever happens to stoke their ego in a given context.

- Why do women want a tall hawt guy? Ego rush.
- Why do women want a man with power, status, athleticism, looks, and money? Ego dominance.
- Why do women want some men but not others? Because those men stroke their ego.
- Why do women buy into the lies of feminism? Having a career, education, financial independence, P-power, sexual liberation, and so on, appeals to their Ego.
- Why do women want to ride the carousel? Solipsistic Ego trip, one after the other.
- Why do women refuse sex with otherwise hawt guys? Ego is not being affirmed.
- Why would a woman abstain from sex? When it's a distraction from Ego primacy.
- Why do women resort to contentiousness, gaslighting, hamsterbating, $h!t tests, etc.? Ego expression and preservation.
- Why do women monkey branch? Choice driven Ego.
- Why do women want to get married? Status and security driven Ego.
- Why do women settle for Beta Bob? More Ego from getting married than not.
- Why do women want children? To capitalize on having a family as an Ego investment.
- Why do women NOT want children? Children mirror adult behavior which is felt as mocking her ego, and thereby interferes with her Ego dominance.
- Why do women want to control the man in their life? Pride driven Ego with a hefty load of distrust.
- Why is the word "submission" profane to women? It requires them to swallow their egotistical pride.

The list goes on…

So when we look at female behavior through this lens, it's a no brainer…

- What makes women eager to have sex? When it's a grand mal Ego trip.

Here's something else to think about. It's the same way for men too.

- Men get married as an Ego investment.

For some readers, perhaps this is oversimplifying things beyond usefulness, while for other readers, this may be the key that unlocks a world of understanding.

As a final note, in writing these things, I don't mean to convey that the ego and maintaining ego relevancy is bad or evil. In fact, the ego is an important element of human psychology and having one is a healthy sign of life. However, the way in which a woman achieves ego primacy can be grossly maladaptive or even destructive. The key is whether a woman's ego is well adjusted or not.

A Volitional Model of Cascade Courtship

Jack's theory about how the MMP is supposed to be.

The man initiates a cascade of increasing intimacy and the woman must respond in kind

The answer to the question of why Women have sex to influence men (2021-11-10) is because It's all about her Ego (2021-11-12). From this study, we learned that women's motivation is not purpose driven, like a man's would be, but instead seeks to establish a cascading chain of increasing ego relevancy.

Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security

The man initiates this chain by offering his attentions to the woman. Women see themselves as being responsible for either the success or failure of establishing this chain, even though much of the necessary context lies outside of their control. In fact, it is necessary for her to have the impression that she exercises volitional will in the matter of getting Feedback, or else she cannot make the next step to Trust.

If we look at this interplay using the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife parallel, then the idea that her exercise of the will is necessary agrees with what we learned in NovaSeeker's essay, Juxtaposing the Temporal and the Eternal (2021-04-26). I've applied NovaSeeker's argument to the present case by substituting the relevant pronouns, according to the archetype.

> "[The wife's] acts of volitional will are volitional from [her] perspective regardless of the fact that [the man] has always been aware of what choices [she] would make prior to the time… because the temporal creation includes volitional will within the framework of that temporality…"
> "[The man] knows [which women] will accept and who will reject [his attentions], but he lets the individual [women] make that decision using their created temporal wills, because the temporal reality which God created includes human volitional will."
> "[The man] does not provide such grace to everyone, but only to those [women] whom He chooses…"

Granted, this doesn't hold true for every man, but nevertheless, we can understand the archetypal concept of how the man initiates giving the woman attention, Feedback, and the following course of interaction. This concept is important for Knowing how things are supposed to be (2021-09-13).

So we see that according to God's covenantal archetype, the man has an important role of initiating Feedback, the first link in the chain. When a man gives a woman attention, it opens the door of interpersonal communication. This is necessary for her to get Feedback, and makes it more likely. Her volitional will is expressed in her response to his attentions.

This explains why women crave male attention so highly, and why they thrive on it. According to the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy, it's like they are being chosen for "salvation".

How does the Meet Cute fit in?

Interestingly, the Meet Cute Phenomenon fits right into this paradigm. The Recipe for a Meet Cute requires a man to recognize that a particular woman is responding positively and enthusiastically to his attentions, and he pursues her by giving her more attention. Hence, the cascade is initiated.

Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security

In a few upcoming posts, we'll look at how the Meet Cute fits into this in greater detail.

The Sequence of Gender Specific Roles in Developing a Relationship

What I have written thus far should make it clear that the man holds responsibility in initiating the exchange, and that women must exercise volitional will to establish trust. However, this should not be misconstrued to mean that all the responsibility is on the man, nor that the woman must utilize her conscious will in choosing a man. Instead, it must be understood by both that there is an overall sequence of gender specific roles that the man and woman must follow in developing a relationship. In practice, these roles are outlined as follows.

The man's role is…

1. Have his life together, and be pursuing his purpose.
2. To give attention to various women.
3. Monitor how his attentions are received by various women.
4. Test the character, qualifications, and overall fitness of particular women of interest, and how well she may perform as a helpmeet.
5. Choosing a woman he deems capable of fulfilling her purpose as a wife, and concentrating his attention on her.
6. Following through in offering commitment and developing Headship.
7. Continue in obedience to God's created order.

As the cascade of Feedback, Trust, etc. progresses in parallel with these roles, the relationship is built up.

The woman's role is…

1. Remain pure and chaste.
2. To receive attention from various men.
3. Respond appropriately to men's attention.
4. Review the character of each man, assess the quality of feedback she receives, and determine her ability to fit into his life purpose as a helper.
5. Choosing a man she deems worthy of her loyal obedience and affections as a husband.
6. Learning to submit to the man, while showing honor, respect, and natural affection to him.
7. Continue in obedience to God's created order.

Likewise, as the cascade progresses, the relationship is built up.

The dynamic mutual interdependence of forming the relationship, as well as the importance of the Meet Cute, may be clearly seen in the following Table.

Step	Man's Role	Woman's Role
1.	Have his life together, and be pursuing his purpose.	Remain pure and chaste.
2.	To give attention to various women.	To receive attention from various men.

3.	Monitor how his attentions are received by various women.	Respond appropriately to men's attention.
4.	Test the character, qualifications, and overall fitness of particular women of interest, and how well she may perform as a helpmeet.	Review the character of each man, assess the quality of feedback she receives, and determine her ability to fit into his life purpose as a helper.
5.	Choosing a woman he deems capable of fulfilling her purpose as a wife, and concentrating his attention on her.	Choosing a man she deems worthy of her loyal obedience and affections as a husband. (This may occur subconsciously.)
6.	Following through in offering commitment and developing Headship.	Learning to submit to the man, while showing honor, respect, and natural affection to him.
7.	Continue in obedience to God's created order (i.e. formal marriage, sexual consummation, and begetting children).

Note: These steps can be categorized into phases.

- Step 1 is the phase of singleness.
- Steps 2-3 are the Meet Cute phase.
- Steps 4-5 are the courtship phase.
- Steps 6-7 are the marital phase.

Failures of the Modern Meet Market

Laying out this sequence of steps makes it very clear where the modern dating scene fails to contribute to the formation of solid marriages. The modern dating scene focuses exclusively on steps 2 and 5, and coopts the sexual element from step 7. Not surprisingly, this is essentially all that is required for hooking up. Steps 1, 3, 4, and 6 are omitted entirely. 7 is a crap shoot roll of the dice.

The man's and the woman's roles in step 1 must commence long before any interpersonal interaction begins in step 2. This first step is important because women usually will reject men who have not made progress in step 1, and men will reject women who have not prepared themselves for marriage (see Matthew 25:1-13). Lately, more and more men are neglecting step 1, largely because they can't envision any larger life purpose for themselves and the thought of marriage seems hopeless. Women have neglected step 1 en masse for the past 60 years or more. For women these days, remaining pure and chaste may be just as difficult as it is for men to find their life purpose and build up their confidence and capabilities.

Men's Failures

It is common for men to fail at step 3 – monitoring women's responses to his attentions — because they don't know how to read women's Indicators of Interest (IOIs). Learning this skill is of prime importance to men who wish to continue to the next steps.

Step 4 is commonly called vetting in the Manosphere. Men who've been following the 'sphere are becoming more aware of the value of vetting, but are not very good at it. They also fail to realize that this is only one step in the process, so even if a man is skilled in vetting, he may still make a poor decision in choosing a partner because the other steps may not be in place. It is also a useless waste of time to vet women who have been chasing after worldly pursuits, because all such women are automatically disqualified by the simple fact that they haven't consciously been following steps 1-4.

Men are poorly equipped to do step 5 properly – choosing a suitable woman, because of all of the above steps are not in place. They don't even know the sequence of steps above, nor do they understand how women's cascade of interest operates (i.e. Feedback, Trust, Relevancy, and so on), and so they default to thinking with the little head. In reality, few men have any women to choose from at all, let alone one that has been following steps 1-5.

If a man manages to get this far, it is common for men to neglect step 6 — failing to establish commitment and to develop Headship. Men opt out of step 6 because of the huge personal risks involved with the post-modern marriage landscape, and the presence of other opportunities. It is also exceedingly difficult for a man to establish a Headship structure in a relationship these days, and most men don't even acknowledge this as being crucially important to their long term sanctification.

Women's Failures

It is common for Westernized women to fail at responding appropriately to men's attentions (step 3). In general, they find it opprobrious to make their interest too obvious, even though this is what attracts more male attention and makes the Meet Cute cute. If women receive attention from a high SMV man, they will spread their legs at the first opportunity. If they receive attention from a lower SMV man, they will use sexual harassment and "rape" accusations to punish him for showing even a polite interest. Modesty, kindness, and grace are virtually nonexistent in modern women, and are even ridiculed in certain circles.

Women fail at step 4 – vetting men. As mentioned in the previous post, women focus on the chain of Feedback and are blind to the essence of men's character. Getting Feedback with maximum emotional overtones is their immediate goal, so they prioritize Ego affirmation, sexual arousal, and the Tingles over making a practical choice. Christian women are little different from secular women in this regard. AWALT.

This blindness leads to an epic fail in step 5 — choosing one man out of many, and one who is of suitable quality, worthy of her affections, and sufficiently committed to her. Women are notorious for being poor pickers. So much so, that in times past, a woman's father took responsibility for steps 4 and 5 of the woman's roles.

It is also common for women to fail at step 6 as well – submitting to the man they have chosen in honor, and respect. This is primarily one of the ways that Feminism Erodes Marriage.

For both sexes, a lack of self-awareness, poor discernment, as well as emotional and spiritual immaturity reign supreme. Given all these inadequacies and incongruencies in steps 1-6, it is surprising that anyone ever makes it to step 7, and not surprising at all that those who do have a high rate of failure.

The Meet Cute as a Positive Feedback Loop

The Joys of Headship

Headship and Patriarchy have been some of the most popular targets for feminist ire. The preferred approach is to demonize a straw man representation of Headship, demonstrating an inability to appreciate the benefits of true Headship. They prefer not to admit that those benefits extend to both men and women. This attitude has become so pervasive, that now, the joys and benefits of Headship are no longer well recognized.

Deti pointed out one way that Headship can lead to increased sanctification for both sexes, and which has gone undetected by women.

> "When I think back to the women who meant the most to me, they all have one thing in common: They all freely and without reservation gave their entire selves to me, no matter when I asked, or how I asked. Yes, that includes their having sex with me in whatever form or fashion I was looking for.
> Yes, those women were looking for something in return for the sex they were giving. The point here is that those women gave me everything I asked for, how I asked for it, when I asked for it. So when it came time for me to give them "something in return", I was only too happy to give it.
> It isn't just WHAT they gave me. It was that they gave it to me when I wanted it which indicates they cared about ME. It was that they gave it to me in the specific way I wanted it which indicates a willingness to submit and take direction. They gave it to me without a crass expectation that I'd be at the immediate ready with a return 'payment' which indicates they trusted me.
> A Word to Women: We want you to trust us. We want you to care about us. And we want you to cooperate with us and submit to us."

Here, Deti basically said that a woman who submits herself fully to what a man wants, how he wants, and when he wants, ends up with a man who will happily meet her request. This agrees with my own life experience. I would add that in my life, there have been times when a person has given to me, sometimes without even realizing how helpful they had been or how much relief they gave me, and I can say that, for that person, anything I could do for them would be done, just because they wanted or needed it. Feminists prefer to remain ignorant of this basic fact.

Running a 3-Legged Race

Hebrews 12 describes the Christian life as running a race. In marriage, this becomes a 3-legged race (a race among groups of two people who have one leg tied together). To run a 3-legged race successfully, one person has to call the command to execute the cadence, otherwise, they will trip over each other and stumble.

Jack has written tomes about how husbands mold their wives, but wives can have a significant influence on their husbands by serving as a joyful inspiration for men to develop into strong, confident, responsible men. Wives also need to restrain themselves from doing things that would limit or retard the development of their husband's potential. Women do this by submitting themselves to a man, because when a woman adopts this position of humility, it draws out men's innate desire to protect, provide, and lead. A husband cannot achieve this state of grace if the wife is expecting or demanding him to be obedient. Of course, women don't like to hear this truth, but she has the unique role of providing him additional motivation to run beyond the minimum of provision.

We might conjecture that most wives would not mind being in full submission to a husband who loves her enough to die for her and shows it by the way he lives for her. But getting to that state of bliss is another matter.

The current zeitgeist maintains the idea that marriage is a 50/50 relationship,* but this concept doesn't agree with a Biblical concept of marriage, and it certainly fails to consider the admonition in Ephesians 5:25 that a husband should be willing to sacrifice his own life for his wife (although this aspect of Christianity does appeal to women). If the husband must go to extreme lengths to appease or protect his wife, without any internal motivation, then that is a losing race. In a 50/50 relationship,* it is not the wife who is being manipulated, it is the husband who has been duped into forfeiting his place as Head. Such a deluded and weak husband might be willing to wash the dishes for his wife, but when shove comes to stab, it is unlikely that he would have the wits and courage, or even the desire, to give his life for hers.

 A 50/50 relationship is a flight of fancy as there can be only one captain of the ship. In practice, any relationship that is described as being 50/50 by default means the woman rules as the man has yielded his rightful captaincy (headship).*

Homeless man dies while saving a woman being held at gunpoint.

Case Study — RedPillApostle's Marriage

I am a very good example of a man whose wife actively tore her own house down.

My primary reason for wanting Mrs. Apostle as my wife was the foundational friendship and openness that we shared in the beginning. But over the years, she has consistently undermined the trust that I once had in her. In addition to most everything else Jack listed in his post about women's manipulation techniques, over the course of our marriage she has used sex as a weapon, as a negotiating tool, and when she has not, it has been begrudgingly given with a bad attitude, and only in a manner as she wanted, accompanied with obstinate arguing, backbiting, and defiance.

Had I more Red Pill knowledge back when we first married, I may have been able to mitigate the damage to our marriage. But because I operated under a faulty Blue Pill paradigm as a husband, I did not check her poor behavior. Now, it's damage control, risk maintenance, and stress avoidance. Since being Red Pilled, I have made some major adjustments, and since then, I have won all the major battles in our marriage due to pure force of will, such as how we manage our finances, where we go to church, the cars we drive, and even stopping the behaviors that led to a sexless marriage. However, these battles were incredibly stressful for me at times, and often prolonged over a period of months. The victories — over the areas of our marriage that are mine to determine — came at a great cost. It is a cost, the depth and breadth of which, she may never fully realize because we live a comfortable life in a good area of the country.

But there is another cost to her as well, and it is this: If the biblical admonition to a husband to lay down his life for his wife ever became a circumstantially legitimate question for me, the honest answer now, as sinful as it may turn out to be, is almost certainly not. But it was not always this way.

Incentives

Ephesians 5:25-27 indicates that the husband should be willing to die for his wife. But given the condition of marriage these days, I doubt that many men, even Christian men, would have such willingness. Not even close! Many men (if not most) would rather avoid marriage altogether!

Willingness is driven by incentive and motives. So when Christian men ponder what this verse might mean for them, maybe the right question to ask is, "What is the motivation?" In his book, The Marriage Builder, Larry Crabb boiled it down to this—is the motivation manipulation or ministry?

If it is manipulation, then the husband is doing it because he expects his wife will be happier and treat him better. This is reminiscent of the "Happy Wife, Happy Life" dynamic which we know is basically the dancing monkey type of male submission. A husband operating within this paradigm is holding himself to an inherent covert contract* and is thus a weak husband. Again, a weak husband would be less likely to die for his wife.

If he is doing it out of the idea of ministering to her then he isn't doing it for his own benefit. He is doing it for hers. But if the relationship is not glorifying God by conforming to a Headship structure, and thereby tapping into the blessings of the Holy Spirit on a daily basis, then they're only left with a unilateral will (his) to maintain the union. Even the most generously loving and self-sacrificial husband will eventually reach that limit if his gestures are not returned nor appreciated.

Baumeister, et al. have concluded that repeated acts of self-control can have short term impairments on subsequent acts of self-control, suggesting that willpower is limited by energy levels (i.e. blood glucose). However, Baumeister et al. found that motivation and Framing (really!) can block the deleterious effects of ego depletion.

Someone might say that it is neither manipulation nor ministry, but merely glorifying God by being obedient and imitating Christ. If a life threatening situation ever arose, would it glorify God to be obedient to this scripture? Does it ever glorify God to be a lemming? Was Jesus a lemming when He submitted himself to death? No, the message of the gospel contained in John 3:16 states that Jesus had an external purpose (our salvation), and Hebrews 12:2 states he had an internal motivation. Jesus endured the cross for the joy that was set before him. What kinds of joy do husbands get from their wives, that they should be willing to suffer or die?

 A covert contract is an unspoken agreement you have within your head between you and somebody else. It's what you expect someone to do — based on what you're doing for them or based on what you expect from a relationship — without actually telling them about it. You assume they'll just know.* The covert contract was described by Robert A. Glover in his book, No More Mr. Nice Guy (2003). A summary can be found here.

How Scott's Axiom Applies

There's an old meme that says, "If someone hates you for no reason, then give that motherf___er a reason." It's dank and uncouthly funny, precisely because it's inherently true to human nature. It's also a viable Tit-for-Tat strategy, although altruistic Christians might be hesitant to admit this. We could spin this in a positive way to apply to marriage: "If your wife loves you for no reason, then give that sweet c___sucker a reason." The same psychological and iterated game dynamics apply. The overriding idea here is that we get a loop that feeds on itself both positively and negatively.

What these sentiments point to is what an attitude of gratefulness does inside a man and this is something that almost all women miss — that the secret to her happiness in marriage is cultivating that attitude of gratefulness in her husband.

Which brings us to why Scott's Axiom about a woman being so crazy about you that she would break all her rules for you is so important.

Scott's axiom applied to relationships is the best bet for having a built-in positive feedback loop from the start. Just like Deti described above, she's willing to do anything you want, when you want, how you want, just to please you… and the gratefulness that motivates a man shows up in his fond thoughtfulness towards her, and in a willingness to do things for her that she wants. She then feels loved and cherished which reinforces her behavior that is pleasing to him.

When you have a woman like this, Jesus, Peter, and now you, are the only people who walk on water!

Conclusions

A woman has great control over the happiness of her own life by serving and pleasing her husband, but feminism has made this culturally taboo and goes the complete Satanic route of labeling that which is good (male Headship and female submission) as bad.

What the obstinate and belligerent wife gets for her behavior is the exact opposite of what she wants from a husband. She gets emotional distance, physical withdrawal, less patience, less kindness, less love and grace… and should the man have the temperament to endure the behavior long enough and not divorce her, then she gets apathetic indifference. This type of relationship is characterized by a man minimizing the hassle in his life. She adds an unbearable amount of stress, so he seeks to reduce it by limiting contact with her, and by looking for less stressful endeavors in other areas of his life.* The relationship is characterized by tolerance and meeting a minimum standard to perpetuate the status quo. In short, what should be a rich relationship that serves as a metaphor of the church's relationship with Christ becomes one of endurance, sheer willpower, and desensitization to one's wife — and this only serves to make life tolerable and prevent any more advanced destruction — hardly a marriage that glorifies God.

Whereas the woman who is strong in faith and obeys God's Word about pleasing her husband and obeying him willingly does the opposite and ends up happy as a result.

 Some men will pour themselves into long hours of work, while other men might turn to alcohol, gambling, gaming, smoking, or other stress-relieving activities. Some high value men may even find a paramour. This is not to say these distractions are Christian methods of dealing with marital discord, but rather to point out how unChristian behavior can naturally result from a wife's marital disobedience.*

The Meet Cute is not about "women chasing men"

Jack · 19 November 2021 · Archived copy · Original

A response to Liz's comment using RedPillBoomer's story as an example.

Readership: All
Length: 1,650 words
Reading Time: 5.5 minutes

In previous posts, we learned that the Meet Cute is an intrinsic part of the courtship dance. Yet, there continues to be much confusion around this phenomenon.

For example, over at Spawny's Space, under the post following Young Men — Do As Liz (2021-07-21), Liz left this comment.

> Think the last thread someone wrote about confirmation bias environments. I think that's kinda pertinent here. I'm sure the Meet Cute formula works in some circles. I can also guarantee you the Meet Cute formula virtually guarantees you a bar skank in the circles Mike and I have been in. I don't know anyone (off the top of my head) who has had a long lasting marriage where the woman pursued the guy. There are a couple of people I can think of who got together in high school. One couple knew each other in middle… their mothers alternated driving them to school. Maybe they qualify I don't know, but that's about it.
> Mike doesn't even like women who pursue men. A woman buys him a drink and he perceives her as desperate."

I'm unfamiliar with what type of circles Liz runs in, but if bar skanks are common in that setting, then a Meet Cute is unlikely to happen. If so, I can understand Liz's confusion.

Liz does well to assign the capability of agency to women, but her comment indicates that she doesn't understand the underlying nature of the Meet Cute phenomenon. It's not about "women pursuing men". Women who have the self-awareness and agency necessary to consciously pursue men are not the kind of women who are prone to falling into Meet Cute mode.

Case Study – RedPillBoomer's Meet Cute

RedPillBoomer stated that he and his wife had a Meet Cute experience, so I'll use his story as an example. While reading this story, keep in mind that RPB's wife never pursued him. [The first paragraph is a quote from Scott's post.]

> "It is spontaneous. You cannot plan it. You cannot pick her out of a crowd and then do cold approach with the idea that you might "get lucky". Your friends can't "set you up on a date". Your "wingman" can't contrive a meeting somehow. It just happens, and it happens when you least expect it."
> "This is exactly what happened to me. [She was showing IOIs, and she was above my threshold of attraction] as I sort of found out that night, but DEFINITELY realized it when we went out on our first couple of dates. She was coy upon meeting at first, shy, but definitely feminine and subtly flirty. She let her older aunt lead the way and do most of the talking.
> [The spontaneity of the event] was the most interesting to me. I met this girl when I was sitting down at a restaurant after a church service. She and her 37-year-old aunt had attended, but I did didn't see them during the service. Found out later, she definitely noticed me. The church service was for singles held on Saturday night at a large church in a good-sized mid-western city. Everyone went out to a restaurant about a 1/2 mile down the street after the service. Just as an aside, I found out later the restaurant gave 15% of the proceeds from the church group back to the church, sweet deal for the restaurant, and the church, as there were about 200-300 singles attending on any given Saturday night.

> Anyways, I got my meal, and sat down by myself perfectly content to be by myself, if it came to it. As I recall, I wasn't in the best of moods that night and I was okay if no one sat at my table. It more than likely wasn't going to happen because of the size of the group, and the number of tables in the restaurant, not the biggest of places. We took up a good portion of it, pretty much the whole place really.
> Well, 'Meet Cute' and her aunt sat down at the table and started a lively conversation with me, especially the aunt who wouldn't shut up. The aunt was 37 years old and not bad looking, was divorced and had three kids. Even with my 'Blue Pill' mindset, I was like, "No Way!", even though she was the one doing all the flirting (cue all the Manosphere posts and clips about the post-wall, divorced woman with three kids). Her niece on the other hand was 21, good looking, nice figure, although I didn't know exactly HOW nice because she was dressed quite conservatively that night (a dress and blouse). She let her aunt do most of the talking. I wasn't > even trying to flirt back with either one of them because of my mood. I will admit, the aunt, even though mouthy, did loosen me up a bit from my bad mood. I started to talk with both of them; but really, I was playing off the aunt to talk to her niece.

As we can see from RPB's story, his wife was very attracted to him, but she was shy and awkward and never openly pursued him. I can imagine that once the aunt and niece arrived at the restaurant, they saw RPB sitting alone and the aunt urged her niece to sit with him. After sitting down, the aunt made herself a conduit of communication between two young and very awkward individuals. After talking for a while, the aunt saw him as a nice looking man who had some potential and further encouraged her niece to be open to his advances.

It is questionable whether the aunt was chasing him herself. I imagine the aunt just wanted to check out the young man her niece had noticed and allow her niece to get some Feedback from him. Due to the aunt's age and experience, maybe she could see a Meet Cute coming. But RPB and the girl were pretty clueless about what was happening.

> Later I found out from her niece (my eventual girlfriend/fiancé/spouse), what she was thinking through the course of that evening when she saw me at the service. It was [Scott's Recipe for a Meet Cute]. We got married a few months later. Yes, I know, I violated all the 'Manospherian rules' about waiting a year or two to see her true colors in the relationship. So, I was fortunate, but it worked out and we just celebrated our 32nd wedding anniversary on July 22."

So it is just as Scott wrote,

> "It is spontaneous. You cannot plan it. You cannot pick her out of a crowd and then do cold approach with the idea that you might "get lucky". Your friends can't "set you up on a date". Your "wingman" can't contrive a meeting somehow. It just happens, and it happens when you least expect it!"

The same could be said from the woman's perspective. That is,

> "It is spontaneous. She cannot plan it. She cannot pick him out of a crowd and then saddle up next to him with the idea that he'll "bite her bait". Her friends can't "set her up on a date". Her "brood of hens" can't contrive a meeting somehow. It just happens, and it happens when she least expects it!"

Conclusions

A woman might pine for a worthy man to miraculously show up on the doorstep, bouquet in hand, but a more practical approach would be for her to pick out an eligible man and then put herself into a situation in which she can elicit Feedback from him. Her responses to his attentions can thereby prove to him that his life would actually be better with her as his wife.

Assuming that women possess sufficient agency to actively pursue a man (i.e. "chasing him") disturbs the spiritual beauty and innocent cuteness of the Meet Cute. But although the Meet Cute is not based on the idea of women pursuing men, it is not a bad idea for those women who have the necessary self-awareness and possess agency.

If it is assumed that a woman has the agency to pursue a man (as Liz does), then it is also assumed that she knows how the mating dance progresses, and therefore, she is not quite so young and innocent. Such a woman cannot avail of using authentic innocence to attract a man, so the possibility of her having a genuine Meet Cute is dampened. If this kind of woman desires a high quality man's commitment, a Meet Cute may not happen, so she needs to take a different approach by making some effort to present herself as high quality wife material.

Women who supposedly have agency have become quite adept at "selling" themselves as sex objects, but they have forgotten the art of "selling" themselves as potential wives in marriage. The way to do this is to demonstrate her value to a man. Give him the serendipitous sense that he's getting something better than what he deserves. This kind of investment will not be lost on the man, but is likely to turn his view of her into wife goggles.

Women also need to refine their skills at picking out men who are actually capable of offering a marital commitment, which may require her to choose a man who is a few years older than herself. This is not the same as "settling". A Meet Cute experience evades this requirement from her. For younger women who are prone to falling into Meet Cute mode, an older relative may be helpful in this regard, as shown by RPB's story. Also, she should be looking for a husband long before the pool of worthy men has drifted away from being an option for marriage. 25 is 5 years too late.

Summary of the Meet Cute Phenomenon

The context for a Meet Cute

In previous posts, we learned that a Meet Cute initiates a dynamic feedback loop, and that the Meet Cute is not about "women chasing men". I've also written about the Significance and Value of the Meet Cute Experience and how the Meet Cute is an organic form of Headship.

In the comments, RichardP described the Meet Cute as a common event but one which has a unique result. [Emphasis mine]

> Definitions matter.
> The Internet, as well as Wikipedia, gives information on what the "Meet Cute" concept started out as. The "Meet Cute" is roughly as follows:
> "In film and television, a meet cute is a scene in which the two people … meet for the first time, typically under unusual, humorous, or cute circumstances. … Frequently, the meet cute leads to a humorous clash of personality or of beliefs, embarrassing situations, or comical misunderstandings that further drive the plot." ~ [Wikipedia]
> The important part of the definition of "Meet Cute" is that, whatever the "Meet Cute" is, it brings a male and female face to face in a way that doesn't usually happen with folks mingling in a crowded room. (That sentence could be broken down further, but I won't do that as I'm trying to make a simpler point here.)
> Brings a male and female face to face …
> Honestly, how often are we engaged in activities where this "meet face to face" happens? I would say "constantly". And the moment passes, and we don't give it a second thought. Either because we are not in the market for a partner (being already taken), or we are preoccupied with thoughts that are far away from "looking for a partner" (e.g. problems at work and/or home to solve; studying for the test coming up next week, etc.).
> The reality is, we all have experienced awkward, or out-of-the-ordinary, or embarrassing encounters with folks we don't know. That is the definition given for "Meet Cute". It only matters (that is, it only registers with us as a "Meet Cute") when the meeting leads to a romantic relationship. All of the other times this happens, we don't give it a second thought.
> But there are many ways other than "Meet Cute" that strangers encounter each other face to face for the first time and then take that meeting into a romantic relationship over time (short or long).

Deti pointed out that men and women have differing accounts of what constitutes a Meet Cute. He drew a comparison between two types of movies to illustrate his point. He wrote,

> Now I get it. Now I understand why girls don't get the Meet Cute.
> John Hughes and his protégées (Cameron Crowe and others) depicted the Meet Cute as we men like to see it. Always depicted from the woman's point of view, or rather, how we men think women view it. Cute but vulnerable and honest woman being vulnerable and honest with a man. Or at least, we think she's being vulnerable and honest. To men, Meet Cute is Molly Ringwald, looking at him lovingly. To men, Meet Cute is Pretty in Pink, Sixteen Candles, Say Anything.
> Girls don't see it that way. To women, the Meet Cute is Katharine Hepburn, Meg Ryan, or Reese Witherspoon. Cute but "sassy", intelligent, headstrong, and "plucky" woman, *"You go girl"*ing it, impressing her man with her intelligence and worldly wisdom, and riding off into the sunset as "equals" and "partners". To women, the Meet Cute is Clueless, Legally Blonde, Sweet Home Alabama, Sleepless in Seattle, The Philadelphia Story, and Bringing Up Baby.

And "Pretty Woman." Don't ever leave out "Pretty Woman" from the list of movies that women are determined to believe represent reality when it comes to relations between the sexes.

These films illustrate a clear difference between what men and women find "cute" or inspiring, respectively. In general, the first collection of examples depict men falling in love with a woman. A young, attractive girl's receptiveness to the man's intimations is what makes it "cute". The second group of films are about a savvy or debonair woman who somehow manages to get a man to fall in love with her.

Interestingly, all of these films depict some elements of a Meet Cute according to RichardP's definition, but men and women may disagree as to just how cute or inspiring each example might happen to strike them.

While RichardP's and Deti's observations are true, we still haven't explained why some chance encounters turn into something more while others don't, nor the basic ingredients for the sparks of love.

What a Meet Cute IS

In summary of what we've learned about the Meet Cute so far, the conditions necessary for the phenomenon to occur can be simplified into four aspects.

1. The primary characteristic that determines a Meet Cute as compared with all other common encounters with strangers (c.f. RichardP's definition), is that both the man and the woman both hold some measure of sexual authority over the other. One's sexual authority is the overpowering emotional and visceral effect that one person has on another.
2. In his Recipe for a Meet Cute, Scott clearly stated that a delicate balance of sexual authority is necessary. The man must cause the woman to be physically animated and totally out of her mind, while the woman must be only slightly above the man's threshold of attraction — not too high, or he'll lose his detached composure and begin to pedestalize her, and thereby screw it up. This balance also satisfies her hypergamic instincts and allows him to maintain a focus on his work/purpose.
3. In the same post, Scott also said (in his own words) that the Meet Cute encounter must happen at a moment when Heart Trust can occur spontaneously (e.g. during a shared group activity) and specific expectations are absent in both the man and woman.
4. In the examples of films that Deti gave above, one common denominator is that the man falls in love with the woman. Remember, men love idealistically, women love opportunistically. We might think this is one sided, but actually, women get a thrilling ego trip whenever a man falls in love with them, because "falling in love" with her places him at her behest and ensures the propagation of the Feedback loop which she needs to grow into the relationship. IOW, him falling in love with her creates the relational setting she needs to trust and find relevancy, humility, comfort, and security, according to the cascade model. Taken together, this is what moves the meeting past a chance encounter and into relationship territory.

anonymous_ng said,

> "I always thought the Meet Cute thing was a situation where two people bump into one another and lightning flashes and they each experience a strong and visceral attraction to each other. However, this doesn't > necessarily require the woman to be obvious in her interest."

Yes, and the entertainment industry is not the only source that casts the "Meet Cute" as an accidental occurrence. The Bible does too!

> I charge you, O daughters of Jerusalem, Do not stir up nor awaken love Until it pleases.
> Song of Solomon 8:4 (NKJV)

Another way to state this, is that the Meet Cute is not a transactional arrangement, but is orchestrated either by God, or by vastly more astute players in the game, such as RedPillBoomer's wife's aunt who encouraged their meeting (see the previous post for this case study).

What a Meet Cute is NOT

The only qualification for the man to have a Meet Cute is for him to surpass the woman's hypergamous filter (which is actually quite a complex matrix of traits). However, the kind of woman involved in the meeting greatly determines whether it is a Meet Cute or not. She has to be…

1. Sufficiently innocent (i.e. sexually "fresh"), at least compared to the man
2. Nubile (i.e. sexually alluring)
3. Young (or at least younger than the man).

Taken together, these traits render a girl defenseless and rather susceptible to having a Meet Cute and going gaga for a man.

Women who don't have these qualities don't qualify for a Meet Cute.

Women who are older and more experienced lack the above traits. Although they have the self-awareness and agency necessary to orchestrate meeting a man for themselves, their knowledge of the process prevents them from falling into Meet Cute mode (per number 3 in the previous section), and thereby hampers a true Meet Cute experience. Therefore, they must make a conscious and concerted effort to pursue a man. This is the context that Liz was assuming in her comment about “women pursuing men” (which was covered in the previous post).

RichardP went on to explain the context and motives underlying Liz’ comment.

> I don’t think there is a man alive that knows every kind of “trick” that a woman can engineer in order to bring about a face to face meeting with someone she has her sights set on. As personalities are real, persistent, and different, I accept that some women are going to be better at (that is, seem more “natural”) manufacturing “Meet Cute” situations than others. But I think the evidence shows that there are plenty of men who think their Meet Cute is a real, accidental happening — when it was anything but.
> As defined by the entertainment industry, the “Meet Cute” is always accidental. In real life, I suspect women have engineered more meetings with the target of their attentions than have occurred accidentally. In real life, this is often the only way a woman can bring herself to the attention of her target. And skank bars around military bases are notorious for the military men who think she is innocent and seriously interested in him as a man (as opposed to an “opportunity”) when she is actually neither. There are plenty of stories around about that. But I have been in the military, and I have seen that happen with my own eyes.

Also, Deti’s second set of films is more in line with the idea of “women pursuing men”.

The thing that Liz, et al. don’t understand about the Meet Cute phenomenon is that it must follow Song of Solomon 8:4 to be legitimate.

Women who chase after men, go bar hopping, get on online dating sites, and/or swim in the OASIS are violating Song of Solomon 8:4, and are disqualified from having an authentic Meet Cute experience.

Case Study — Scott and Mychael

Scott was the one who first introduced us to the Meet Cute in his post, Opportunities (2020-02-26). He has described his relationship with his wife Mychael as one that started with a Meet Cute.

Someone may point out that Mychael did not meet the three qualifications listed at the beginning of this section — that she was not so young nor innocent, since she was a single mother at the time she met Scott. However, Scott passed through her hypergamous filter, and furthermore, there was something about Scott that humbled Mychael, elicited her Heart Trust, and brought out the innocent little girl that had been hiding in her heart for many years. Something about Scott made her go out of her mind and weak in the knees, such that she was, in effect, a young, naïve school girl once again. They also met by chance, thus fulfilling Song of Solomon 8:4. Hence, their Meet Cute story.

Concluding Statements

Sharkly wrote,

> "Why does it sound like this Meet Cute terminology is a bit flexible and a judgement call in the eye of the beholder that can be used to fit whatever we want it to, after the fact?
> To me, it is beginning to sound watered down to where it is near becoming just the serendipitous way that two mutually attracted people first met and realized the other was attracted to them.
> This whole Meet Cute concept seems to be just a clue to be aware of when vetting a potential mate."

The Meet Cute is rather flexible, but we can't call just any romantic encounter a Meet Cute. There are specific factors that must be present for a Meet Cute to occur. As Scott wrote,

> "It is spontaneous. You cannot plan it. You cannot pick her out of a crowd and then do cold approach with the idea that you might "get lucky". Your friends can't "set you up on a date". Your "wingman" can't contrive a meeting somehow. It just happens, and it happens when you least expect it!"

The part in bold is what sets the Meet Cute apart from other meetings. It is as Deti wrote,

> The Meet Cute is not about "women chasing men".
> The Meet Cute is about women showing clear, unequivocal, unmistakable interest in ONE man to whom she is sexually attracted.

The same could be said from the woman's perspective.

The current state of the SMP makes it obvious that having a Meet Cute is an act of God, and a man's ability to detect when it is happening is a miracle. We mustn't detract from God's glory by neglecting this fact.

Moral Guidance Based Feedback vs. Sexual Attention

Both are necessary for redemption and sanctification (in marriage).

Reader's Note: I've finished covering the tangent on how the Meet Cute initiates the Cascade model. Now back to the topic of Agency.

How Should Christian Men respond to IOIs?

In a previous post, Handling an IOI requires a Miracle! (2020-07-17), I posed the question of how men might respond to IOIs, and what might be a Christian response, instead of the PUA responses that we are used to reading about in the Manosphere.

When responding to IOI's, what are the choices that Christian men have?

The basic choices are…

1. Ignore it.
2. Acknowledge and escalate (presumably to coitus, according to her desire).
3. Acknowledge and reframe the situation into something redemptive.

There are other choices (e.g. "acknowledge and s1ut shame her"), but I will dismiss these as being unconstructive to the following discussion.

Choice 1 is a miss.
Choice 2 is not a Christian response (unless the woman is your spouse).
Choice 3 is the oft overlooked (if not absolutely esoteric) Christian response.

At the time of writing that post, there were some readers who thought that handling IOI's in a Christian manner is a preposterous oxymoron. Others viewed it as what I would call a "miracle". With these sorts of beliefs floating around, it is not hard to understand why it is generally held that Christian men are total losers in the SMP.

But during our recent study of Agency, we've gained some new insights about what Choice 3 might look like. I'll briefly recount the foundations for this insight in the next section, and the following section will present a new possibility.

Relevant concepts from the Cascade Model

I covered how to apply volitional will when dealing with those of the opposite sex in A Volitional Model of Cascade Courtship (2021-11-15). This study answered the question of why Women have sex to influence men (2021-11-10). It is because It's all about her Ego (2021-11-12). From this study, we learned that women's motivation is not purpose driven, like a man's would be, but instead seeks to establish a cascading chain of increasing ego relevancy which takes the following general form.

Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security

Women see themselves as being responsible for either the success or failure of establishing this chain, even though much of the necessary context lies outside of their control. In fact, it is necessary for her to have the impression that she exercises volitional will in the matter of getting Feedback, or else she cannot make the next step to Trust.

The main point of these posts was that it is necessary for both men and women to understand how women's cascade of interest operates (i.e. Feedback, Trust, Relevancy, and so on), and to follow a prescribed sequence of steps for a successful courtship. Both are necessary to achieve redemption and sanctification in marriage.

Moral Guidance Based Feedback vs. Sexual Attention

Femmy looked at the Cascade model through the archetypal example of Adam and Eve, and she got the idea that…

> "If Adam gave [Eve] Feedback, then the rest of that loop would follow?"

We don't know the details about how or why Adam didn't intervene, but either she didn't confide in Adam until after she made the decision to eat the forbidden fruit, or else Adam stood by and did nothing. Either way, there was no feedback from Adam, and apparently, she didn't get any immediate feedback from God either. So the chain of…

Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security was broken between her and Adam (and God), and was replaced by Feedback, Trust, and so on, with Satan.

Femmy further theorized that…

> "…since females crave attention/feedback, [then her receiving] moral [guidance based] attention instead of regular [sexual] attention would satisfy that craving and continue positively through the loop for the guy. […] If every single guy gave every single female moral [guidance based] attention instead of regular [sexual] attention, wouldn't it satisfy her craving and result in a positive outcome for the guy by the end of the loop?
> But, I see now because of her ego decision at the Tree, she won't desire moral guidance based attention.
> But, I still think it would be a great experiment to see if there would be positive results.
> I think there are guys who would try this. I would love to see it done as a social experiment and see results."

Feeriker et al. agreed.

> "That's a great question, and it would be interesting to see some men try this out. I'm tempted to say, based on observation and experience, that it's unlikely that most women would exhibit the desired reaction, and would instead respond negatively. Why? Because "moral [guidance based] attention" is aimed at what a woman SHOULD desire for her own spiritual health and wellbeing, whereas the ego-centric attention that most women get from most men gives them what they (think they) desire at the moment."

Concluding Statements

This is a fantastic experiment, and not one without challenges. To do this properly, men and women should have already completed step 1 of the above cascade (i.e. the Meet Cute). However, I see no reason why men and women cannot change their frame and begin conducting this approach no matter what their station in life.

Note for single men: This approach could be used as a vetting qualification. Namely, is the woman agreeable? Does she respond positively to moral guidance based attention?

Note for married men: Husbands should be giving their wives a balance of moral guidance based attention and sexual attention.

Note for fathers: Fathers should be giving their daughters moral guidance based attention and teaching them to value getting this from men. Fathers should also make their daughters aware that much of the sexual attention they get from their male peers is a cheap substitute for moral guidance based attention.

The Art of Thankfulness

Jack · 26 November 2021 · Archived copy · Original

Why are some people always negative, while others are grateful?

Readership: All; Christians;

Reading Time: 6 minutes

Being Thankful is Contagious!

Think about what it's like to come home to an angry / depressed / resentful / nagging person all the time. A few readers might know what that is like. Does this have an impact on one's outlook over time? I think it usually does. It's the same (in the opposite sense) being around a person who is content / happy / grateful / helpful.

Case Study 1 – A thoroughly discontented woman

Rock Kitaro conveyed this story of a depressing nag.

> Honestly, I can't begin to tell you how oppressive it's been lately when it comes to [the subject of class differences in marriage and divorce rates]. Mainly because there's this female Atheist on my Boss's podcast who's my age (34). If you hear her speak, it's always so negative.
> She's constantly bringing up the divorce rate and then, literally said, "I believe a majority of people are miserable in their marriages." My boss and I immediately disagreed and surmised that her perspective was the result of the people she associated with. Meaning, if all you do is hang out with miserable people, or had the misfortune to see nothing but miserable people in these kind of marriages, of course you're going to think that.
> Not to mention, I really think people use the divorce rate and their parent's mistakes as an excuse to indulge in non-traditional lifestyles. So pretty much, whether they end up in a horrible relationship in marriage or remain outside of a relationship, it's always someone else's fault. As if we don't have the ability to not repeat our parent's mistakes.
> And like this essay says, as a Christian, I can't expect people like her to understand my hope or my reason, faith, and discipline for refraining from indulging in the hook-up culture and live-in relationships the way she and even so many of my relatives have. They're looking at me like I'm stupid and foolish and missing out… telling me I should change my ways… and then get mad when I stop talking to them or asking them about how things are going.

From Rock's story, we see that those who are discontented dwell in the vanity of their minds and choose to see the world as a dark place. Because of this obsession with the negative effects of sin around them, they are prone to dip into that darkness themselves, and then justify their reasons for doing so. This actually increases the likelihood that they will create circumstances which will be disappointing and hurtful, thereby perpetuating their discontent.

Case Study 2 – A truly thankful woman

Elspeth says,

> I woke up this morning thinking, "I don't know if it gets any better than this. I am thankful."
>
> I suppose more riches might make it so. But I can live with the deplorableness of patriarchy.
> Like Liz, I haven't always been this content. My expectations of life used to be far less measured. To be honest, it was as if a blanket of contentment draped itself over me when I married my husband. I was suddenly okay with "whatever comes after this". It wasn't a conscious thought, but it was a pretty abrupt change. This sounds like stupid girly pablum, but right up until I realized I had a gaping spiritual hole in my life, my perception was that he completed me. I was good. Until I wasn't, but rather than turn on my husband, I turned to God. Our marriage got better, not worse because I never lost the understanding that pleasing SAM was a big part of what being a wife is all about.
> Long story short, there are parts of us which can change, and there are things that are part of our essence, which remain the same but can be subdued if necessary so that we behave as we should.

It is obvious that marriage was what Elspeth needed to find contentment. We might debate about why marriage gave her contentment. Was it because she landed an alpha who satisfied her hypergamous needs? Or was it because there was something intrinsic to marriage itself that made her feel that her life was fulfilled? Or maybe it was a spiritual blessing that resulted from her being obedient to God's ordained order (i.e. getting married and having children)?

What causes people to be either thankful or discontented?

Scott, our in-house psychologist, said this is most likely due to an innate personality trait/flavor that makes you happy (or unhappy) in just about any situation you find yourself.

> In the absence of a profound religious or traumatic index experience people do not make global / personality level changes. (Christians might call this “heart level”.)
> And even when they do, it presents itself as merely a modification of a previously maladaptive trait. Because the organism really wants to hold on to it.
> It’s like a pool ball traveling across the table really fast that lightly grazes another one — it continues in the same general direction just slightly off its original trajectory.
> When the water seeps into a chunk of granite and freezes and splits the rock, it is neither the waters fault nor the rocks fault. They are doing what they do.
> Secular therapies are also a parlor trick of outward behavior change agent and the person usually falls back into their real self 6-18 months later.

Scott also says this of his own experience.

> I am this way. My maternal grandmother was too. Every good thing that happens to me is perceived as way over what I expected and therefore I experience gratitude for things that most people take for granted.
> I can’t give myself credit for this. I did not develop it or cultivate it in any way. I have always been like that.

Elspeth pondered this question of natural temperament (Scott's perspective) versus how people can and do change and how people influence each other (Liz's perspective).

> I think in our marriage, we represent a little of both of those positions very strongly.
> I've often characterized my husband as always having been a "good man". Here is what I meant by that, and it has been a steady trait throughout our marriage.
> He's always been honest; brutally so (although he's tempered that with grace over the years). I always knew the score even when it hurt. He's always had a heart for defending those weaker than him. He's always been generous with those who need his help and resources (although he isn't foolish about that) and again, brutal honesty. All of those things have remained the same and been amplified by faith.
> However, he also had a hair trigger temper and was known to get into a fight without much reluctance. He was an angry man. What's that line from the Hulk: "That's my secret. I'm always angry." He isn't anymore. His patience with people makes mine look paltry by comparison. He has his moments, but they are few, far between, and he reins it in pretty quickly. So he kept the best parts of himself and shed the worst parts.

According to Elspeth, contentment is achievable in spite of character traits and flaws. Elspeth says one's faith, generosity, patience, and honesty make the difference. She doesn't mention this, but I can see the effects of maintaining a humble and optimistic attitude as well.

Thankfulness comes of Self-Awareness, not Socioeconomic Advantages

Many people have the notion that they can't be "happy" because they don't have this or that thing in their lives. They think that if they had a better job, or more income, or a better husband/wife, then they would be "happy". This is patently false. These are things to be thankful for, that is true, but not having these things doesn't mean that you can't be thankful for what you DO have. The trick here is to start with the small things to build an internal locus of control. Once that locus of control has been achieved, then you are better able to achieve bigger things in life.

Elspeth said the reason why the upper socioeconomic classes are more likely to find marital success and happiness basically comes down to self-awareness (something most people lack entirely in one respect or another), and our ability to prioritize properly. What parts of my personality, desires, and dreams am I willing to sacrifice for the whole of my marriage and family?

> We spend a lot of time and treasure on our kids. I was online today shelling out money for summer stuff and taking advantage of early registration discounts on all kinds of books for their fall classes (which also cost a lot) and whatnot. But we decided that our lives are not going to revolve around them. We concluded that our relationship, opportunities to spend time together, our intimacy, and our ability to communicate our love for each other and for God is far more valuable to them than external material trappings and impressing people who don't give a darn about them.
> Besides, what would happen to our marriage 8 years from now when parenting is done and we turn to each other having not done the work to stay connected?
> Time will tell, I suppose, if we set the right priorities.

It is not having things that makes one thankful, but the self-awareness and the life management. As Adam wrote, Discipline begets discipline. Cultivating contentment is also a discipline. We should foster contentment, no matter how small to begin with, and make it grow.

At some point, you may find that there are specific needs you have that are not being met, and that this stalls your pursuit of contentment. Again, self-awareness and discipline are crucial. Identify those needs, do what you can to attain them, and ask others and God to provide for you what you cannot do for yourself. This is humility.

Conclusions

In The Original Meaning of Eucharist (2023/4/11), Derek L. Ramsey describes how the bread and wine of communion are transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ respectively through our thankfulness, and that without the expression of thankfulness, religion is no better than gnosticism.

According to Scott, people have a natural proclivity to be either grateful or discontent, and people spend a lifetime developing either trajectory.

Rock's story of the female atheist (case study 1) illustrated how discontented people are constantly focused on the negatives, and they react to this impression of doom by indulging in lifestyles that are contrary to God's created order. They justify themselves with the negatives and other excuses.

Furthermore, as Rock said, being exposed to a person who is negative and discontented will cause you to be anxious and vexed. However, Elspeth's example showed us that being obedient to God's created order, and maintaining a spirit of humility, generosity, and patience can help nurture a spirit of gratefulness. Being around a person who is positive and contented will make it easier for you to be the same way, thus the importance of Christian fellowship.

Contentment is a state that is naturally difficult for women to achieve (see the curse). Men have their own curse and subsequent commandment difficulties. But it is not impossible. It is a trait that must be nurtured over time.

If you find a woman who is truly low maintenance and is happy no matter what, then you keep that one. This is gold. No matter how hot / pretty / good in bed / high income / high education, if she does not have this trait, you will be miserable the minute she gives into her cursed nature.

Women's Version of the Covert Contract.

Readership: All
Length: 2,600 words
Reading Time: Possibly the most important 9 minutes of your marriage!

Introduction to the Covert Contract

Most readers are familiar with the covert contract, an idea that Robert A. Glover made famous in his book, No More Mr. Nice Guy. A covert contract is an unspoken agreement you have within your head between you and somebody else. It's what you expect someone to do — based on what you're doing for them or based on what you expect from a relationship — without actually telling them about it. You hope they'll just know.

In other words, the covert contract is a subconscious and therefore unspoken expectation that is heavy laden with legalism and devoid of agency.

Covert contracts usually take the form of something like "Boyfriends/husbands should behave like A, so that is how I should behave", and "My girlfriend/wife should behave like X, because that is how girlfriends/wives should behave". Although thinking this way is important in terms of knowing how things are supposed to be and for imposing frame, it becomes a problem when one implicitly assumes that if one behaves in the specified manner, then everything will automatically work out smoothly and exactly the way one expects.

In practice, the covert contract usually takes the form of "If I do X for them, then they'll do Y for me". Some common examples include:

- "If I buy her flowers/hold the door/etc. then she'll appreciate me/open her heart to me/etc."
- "If I'm nice to her, she'll go out with me."
- "If I agree with them, they'll like me."
- "If I work long and hard, my manager will promote me."

This is colloquially referred to as "nice guy" behavior. But there's nothing nice about it. It is a vanity of the mind that reflects a magical sense of entitlement from an egocentric perspective. Again, this happens on the subconscious level, and most people are not aware of any covert contracts that they hold. Becoming aware of a covert contract tends to loosen its hold over a person, and once aware, speaking of it becomes a confession.

If you aren't familiar with Glover's covert contract, I recommend you to listen to Angel Donovan's interview with Robert Glover at Dating Skills Review (2014-07-13).

The Female Version of the Covert Contract

The covert contract was originally presented by R.A. Glover from the male perspective. But believe it or not, women have their own version of the covert contract!

Like the male version, the female version of the covert contract is a vanity of the mind that reflects a magical sense of entitlement from a subconscious egocentric perspective. Same as the male version, it also expects implicit rewards for certain behaviors, and this is assumed and goes unspoken.

However, the female version of the covert contract is different from the men's version in that good behavior is regarded as something above and beyond the norm, and so it demands special recognition and an immediate reward that is specific to her particular expectations. If the expected reward is not immediately granted, then the woman becomes indignant and feels justified in assuming the role of a judge and dishing out some sort of revenge. "I'll teach him a lesson!" If a woman chooses not to inflict a punishment for any reason, then she'll view her own inaction as a reason to bolster her own sense of egotistical pride and moral superiority. "I am too good to him." or "I deserve someone better."

It gets worse. The female version of the covert contract also assumes automatic immunity for bad behavior. It doesn't maintain a good will in seeking after positive outcomes, as the man's version would entail, but instead, it rides on the herd mentality in a race to the bottom. In this case, the female version goes something like this.

"If so and so does X, then I can do X too." (where X is a destructive behavior)

Often times, this is made personal, as in…

"If so and so does X to me, then I can do X to them." (where X is a destructive behavior)

So a statement like,

"If so and so hurts me, then I can hurt them back."

is totally justified from the perspective of the female covert contract.

In summary, the female covert contract appears in two expressions: Indignation (if she does nothing at all) and Retaliation (if she does). For some women, depending on their personality, this may not be obvious, and may be expressed in a passive-aggressive form (which is usually worse because it cannot be dealt with directly).

Interestingly, there is no positive reciprocal action, only negative. That is, women will seldom think,

"If he is nice to me, then I'll be nice to him."

"If he sees me exclusively, then I'll only see him exclusively."

This is the point at which the transactional nature of the male version of the covert contract breaks down, unless he is an ubermensch Alpha, in which case the interaction is seen by the female as one of affirmation, and not one of transaction. The female may respond positively to such a man, but this is because of Tingles, and is not related to the female covert contract (until she gets dumped).

Case Study 1 – Femmy's Description of the Female Covert Contract

Reading this list of 50 Female Evasion and Control Tactics (2021-10-22) made Femmy see how men and women think differently. From a woman's (Femmy's) perspective, these are not tactics of conscious control over the man. That list "just happens automatically" depending on the nature of the "attacks" and on her ability to handle the suffering that originates from external sources.

In the comments, Femmy and Deti described the female perspective of the covert contract.

Femmy wrote [paraphrased],

> I always saw myself as a receiver.
> Of life.
> And fighting off what gave me pain…
> Fighting things that "happened to me."
> Regardless of whatever decision I made, I never saw it as 'my fault' because I could not control the source of pain and suffering.
> I wasn't taught to make decisions growing up. I was taught to submit and accept everything. But I couldn't. I always blamed the cause.

This is why women always paint themselves as "innocent bystanders". She is never the actor, always the "acted upon". Never the decider; always the hapless duped drone, allegedly swindled and tricked (into having sex, for example).

Women never see anything as "their fault". Women are scarcely aware of the cause and effect – that what "just happens" to them causes them to respond and make decisions. They are not aware that the decisions they make are self-protective measures based on avoiding or controlling pain and suffering. They can't seem to comprehend that they are held responsible for those decisions and responses, regardless of what "just happens" to them.

It's difficult for women to figure this out. Femmy even said women are blind to it.

From a woman's blinded point of view, it's taken for granted that they see themselves as receivers – of protection, of material provision, and of life. Women are raised to think this way all of their lives since childhood, and it is reinforced by cultural norms and narratives, and supported by the natural male propensity to protect women.

And whenever the reality of living in a fallen world shows through, our fairest princesses transform into bloody battle axes and go stridently on the warpath, thereby making our fallen world a little more fallen.

Faith and Self-Awareness Subverts the Female Covert Contract

The Manosphere has long observed that women lack moral agency. According to what we've learned from Femmy, it would be more specific to say that women lack the self-awareness necessary to exercise agency, more specifically, the awareness of how they can be an active agent in the cause-effect dynamic.

Femmy continues,

> It wasn't until recently, when you guys, others, and guys like Kevin Samuels, that I looked back to what 'happened to me' has caused me to create decisions. And that I had to take responsibility for creating those decisions, regardless of what 'happened to me'.
> When that point came to my understanding, it was a new idea.
> So I see now that I made decisions based on avoiding pain and suffering, and the cause of the pain was the 'reason' why I made those decisions.
> But it's blind and automatic, until someone points it out.

"Blind and automatic" — This lack of self-awareness and agency is what is often touted by women as a lack of self-esteem. In fact, anytime we hear of women justifying their bad decisions because of "not enough self-esteem", we can safely assume that they mean they are languishing in a crisis of disbelief,* and lack the self-awareness needed to respond appropriately. A critical attitude and a lack of good will amplifies this behavior.

From Femmy's testimony, it is obvious that men, fathers, and husbands need to make the women in their charge aware of this instinctive reaction common to women so that they will have a greater self-awareness and therefore will possess the ability to exercise agency.

 A crisis of disbelief is when a person denies, or refuses to recognize basic reality, usually because it is foreign to their fundamental belief paradigm, or because acceptance and belief would bring pain, suffering, and/or require one to assume unwanted responsibilities and to take action. Chateau Heartiste's catchphrase,* "Where pretty lies perish", captures the redemption from this phenomenon.

This is not "low self-esteem", but rather a poor self-awareness and feelings of insecurity during a crisis of disbelief.

Men's Covert Contract Reinforces Women's Covert Contract

Deti gave us a succinct summary of how men's protective instinct, which is often expressed through the male version of the covert contract, actually supports and reinforces women's covert contract.

1. [Women's covert contract] is a result of men's instinctive and knee jerk protection of women. Men reflexively think and act to protect women and shield them from adverse consequences — even those adverse consequences women bring on themselves. As I was reading [Femmy's] response, I had to consciously combat my instinct to do the remote/internet version of patting you on the head and going "There there Femmy, it's going to be OK, no one blames you, it's not your fault". I had to fight my instinct to excuse, explain, and otherwise not hold you accountable for your decisions.
2. The "it just happened" thing women do is an attempt to invoke male protection, even from total strangers. Women instinctively know to damsel it up specifically to exploit this universal male trait. I really think this is hardwired in women specifically to keep more women alive. The alternative is that men would allow natural consequences to befall women — either impose the same punishment on women that would be imposed on men (death, kicked out of the tribe) or natural consequences (illness, isolation, incapacitation, death).
3. Women do this to men they're dating or men they're sexually involved with, specifically to get their "payment" in the form of protection and provision. Women believe they're entitled to "get something" from men in return for the sex they have with those men. In part, women expect "payment" in the form of protection, including relief from the natural consequences of their actions and excusal from responsibility. "I have sex with you, so you're supposed to protect me from everything, including my own negligence and recklessness."
4. Men who hold women accountable for women's own decisions are derided as mean spirited, cruel, and heartless — even when that holding accountable is nothing more than allowing natural consequences to occur. This is widespread and pervasive — even other men will deride and denigrate imposition of adverse consequences on women.

Notice that point 3 contains specific expectations of the female covert contract (provision and protection in return for sex, which is a transactional arrangement).

Here, we see that both men and women need to be aware of these subliminal expectations, and draw appropriate boundaries of responsibility, even when this might draw criticism and contempt from others.

Case Study 2 – Mrs. Apostle's Redemption from the Female Covert Contract

Red Pill Apostle said he had to deal with this same behavior in his wife.

> There was a conversation months ago with Mrs. Apostle that I remember well and was a moment of foundational understanding for her as my wife. We were discussing agency regarding a divorced woman we know and she was on a jag about how the husband had behaved poorly so the wife did too. When I brought up whether the wife had agency or not, the implications that the wife either had control of herself and her choices or was unable to choose for herself and was under the husband's directive did not sit well with Mrs. Apostle. I flipped the idea then to every time she justifies her actions with "yes, but you …" statements, she's admitting she doesn't have control over herself, much like a child, and the lightbulb came on.

This is pure gold!

> Fast forward a few months and I have not heard that justification since. She has told me that when I behave or communicate in a certain manner it makes it harder for her, which is a legitimate statement. I can then work on my approach and delivery to make her compliance easier, which I see as part of living in knowledge of my wife as the weaker sex (1 Peter 3:7).

From RPA's testimony, we know that when men, fathers, and husbands take the effort to make the women in their charge aware of their lack/denial of agency, then they can be redeemed from the curse of poor self-awareness which results in a crisis of disbelief (which is commonly passed off as "poor self-esteem"), and can then exercise agency. This will also help women develop a greater sense of security.

An example of the female covert contract expressed as subliminal defensiveness in the form of psychological projection.

Epilogue

Not every nasty thing women say or do is out of malice or spite. Some things are. But it would help both men and women to realize that such behaviors are a woman's reflexive response to painful circumstances in her environment — the sudden realization that humans are far from perfect.

In general, women suffer from poor self-awareness from living in a sheltered condition all their lives. This is reinforced by Chivalry, the male protective instinct, social norms, and various female defense mechanisms such as feigning innocence/ignorance. So whenever a situation arises that causes them pain and requires them to exercise agency, they are not able able to cope with the offense in a constructive way, so the knee-jerk response is to lash out in anger and revenge.

A compounding reason why they are not able to cope is because they are caught in a debilitating crisis of disbelief. "How dare you!" or "How could this happen to me?" Taken together, this lack of self-awareness, the crisis of disbelief, the lack of agency, and the poor decisions made in response are commonly cited as "poor self-esteem" by many modern women whenever they have to face the music. But it would be more accurate to say that this is a result, not of poor self-esteem, but of an overinflated self-esteem which presumably exonerates them from the consequences of their choices and manifests as a lack of agency. Ultimately, it can all be summed up as emotional immaturity.

When women become aware that they do not need to respond according to the defensive covert contract of negative reciprocation, and that they would be better off if they didn't, then they become aware that they can make other sorts of decisions, harder though it may be. As a result, women can have the potential to take greater responsibility for their lives and be liberated from the female version of the covert contract, thereby bettering their own lives, and the lives of everyone around them.

The Gestalt Frame

In closing, I want to point out that when women take responsibility for their lives and exercise agency, then this can have a positive impact on men's behaviors by the power of God that can be accessed through our obedience. This is why Ephesians 5:22-24 states that women should be obedient to their husbands in all things. When women are obedient to the Word, it allows men to escape the defensive dynamics of the tit-for-tat interaction. Once this oppressive psychological distraction is lifted, men are then able to face the limits of their power and authority in the relationship, and come to terms with their own shortcomings and weaknesses. Men are thus able to gain that self-awareness which allows them to exercise their own agency. This is the mechanics behind 1 Peter 3:1-6, which stipulates that husbands may be won over by the behavior of their wives. In Christian terminology, this means a reciprocal repentance and renewal.

All this is summarized in Σ Frame Axiom 21:

When men take the effort to make their wives aware of how her Covert Contract obviates her exercise of agency and reduces her to the moral equivalent of a child, then a multitude of blessings will become manifest. So men should point this out to her in every marital conflict.

It also works the other way too.

When women take the effort to protect their husbands from the negative effects of her Covert Contract, then a multitude of blessings will become manifest. So women should prioritize maintaining a good will in every marital conflict.

We could even say this is one powerful way that husbands can love their wives, and wives can respect their husbands. (Ephesians 5:33)

The purpose of having your own domain is for you to play an essential part in building and maintaining a covenant community. Ed has another series on this too.

2. Radix Fidem: Protocol for Building a Covenant Community, Part 2 (2021-09-08)

A couple other posts that discuss some details of handling one's domain.

1. Radix Fidem: Some spiritual warfare how-to (2021-07-13)
2. Radix Fidem: Stop the brother against brother stuff (2021-07-22)

You're probably wondering how this fits into the process of finding a wife. I don't think Ed has written about this, but I would say that once you've established your domain, then you'll be able to discern those women who come willingly into your domain, and who would be an asset to your mission. From there, it comes down to reading IOIs and prayer, specifically as to whether the two of you can share the hope of His calling (Ephesians 1:15-23). (You'll have to pray about this for a while to understand what this means. It's not something that anyone can describe or tell you.) I think this is what it means to be together "in the Lord" (as mentioned in 1st Corinthians 7:39).

Pete Seeger sings Kumbaya in Australia (1963-10-24)

This year, I've seen Kumbaya mentioned a few times in the comments and elsewhere around the sphere. The majority of them are mocking or dismissive in tone. I need to say something about this.

Singing Kumbaya (e.g. around a campfire at night) is a powerful experience which draws participants into a spirit of worship characterized by a subjective mood of humility, faith, and hope in a small group setting. It is this feature of the music that makes it deeply moving. This spirit of worship is the backbone of gospel music, and this aspect of gospel music has been a major influence on several other genres of music, including Bluegrass, Country, Folk, Pop, Soul, and the early formations of R+B and Rock-and-Roll.

In fact, within the music profession, it is well known that a person cannot sing well, unless he/she is in a worshipful mood, whether they care to admit that's what it is or not. For instance, vocal students are taught to focus on their emotional energy and "think high" in order to gain an ear for producing the correct intonations.

Lately, this spirit of worship has fallen out of fashion within the music industry, and this is the main reason why a lot of modern music is trash, and also why most music doesn't stand the test of time.

Likewise, this spirit of humility and worship is the beauty and the value of Kumbaya and similar songs. However, in our current culture, only children are permitted this poignant experience, because their hearts have not yet been hardened by the idols of our age – feminism, individualism, materialism, liberal progressivism, and sexualism. As children grow older, they become accustomed to the ways of this world and gradually lose their appreciation for that small group sense of humility, faith, and hope that is manifested in the Kumbaya experience.

As adults, it is easy for us to dismiss Kumbaya as childish and naively idealistic. But we must not lose sight of the spiritual virtues that are manifested in this experience. We must remain aware that the reason why we lose this sensitivity is because our hearts have been hardened by being continually exposed to the norms of idolatry, and participating in those norms to varying degrees as a matter of living in this world.

Those who are hard of heart will fail to recognize this beauty. Their identification with the world and becoming well accustomed to worldly standards and appearances inevitably blinds them to the beauty of worship and humility. As a result, a song such as Kumbaya appears to be boring, laughable, naïve, ridiculous, simplistic, or "goody-two-shoes".

The spiritual defilement that accompanies this kind of attitude is not limited to one's tastes in music. Back in August, we had a few posts that described how women get sucked into secular standards of beauty and attractiveness. Women like this gain a disposition of scorning modest women with a quiet spirit. Our articles didn't mention it, but the same is true for men too. The constant submersion in sex hardens men's hearts and teaches them to only be attracted to bulbous butt bimbos. It is an identification with the world that produces a hardness of the heart, and a blindness to true relationship potential. (I know, because I was like this years ago.)

If you want to be close to God, it is imperative that you soften your heart. One fair litmus test of knowing how soft your heart is, is how you perceive the glorious humility conveyed in songs like Kumbaya.

Lest we forget.

Developing Masculinity

Author's Note: This post expands a brief list of pointers for developing masculinity that I gave as a comment.

Masculine Effectiveness

To be effective, a man needs to have a purpose, a social framework in which to operate, and the right attitude.

Purpose is unique to each man, as is the social framework he engages in. As for attitude, I'll recount some major points here.

You will need to be honest and humble enough about yourself to see what you can do to make yourself better, and not in some generic way, but in a way that furthers your purpose and increases your chances of getting what you want from life. For example, if you want to be a doctor but have bad MCAT scores, then you know the area you need to improve.

Since we are addressing marriage and relationships, we have to accept that femininity is attracted to masculinity. It's the way we are made. So if a man expects to have a wife and family, he needs to be developing a masculine attitude and masculine traits in himself.

Depending a man's self-assessment of where he is and where he wants to be, there could be multiple specific areas to work on.

The issue that I have is that it is hard to quantify what masculinity is succinctly in principle. It's also difficult to identify which of those traits I am lacking and need to work on.

There are many attributes of masculinity that we have discussed on this forum, such as outcome independence, and it may be that looking at attributes or examples is the best way to attempt to communicate the concept in the comment section. So in these next two case studies, I'll recount two areas that I've found to be crucial.

Clint Eastwood and Eduardo Minett star in Cry Macho (2021).

Case Study 1 — Conquering the fear of others' opinions

For me, and for Mike Davis who recommended the book to me, Robert Glover's "No More Mr. Nice Guy" was helpful. Specifically, getting over fear/worry/anxiety about the way people would react (AKA outcome independence) if I said what was on my mind or did what I really wanted to do. Overcoming this fear was a big hurdle for me. There are still times when I get that anxious feeling in my gut and once in a while, I'll still revert to past tendencies, but I've made progress in this area and will continue to push myself here, as it has been one of the most important changes for me personally and professionally. That one little change in my behavior makes me appear more confident to people, along with the internal relief I get from not keeping things bottled up. It's applicable to all my relationships, not just my marriage.

This is one example of an area I needed to work on, and continue to work on, to better exercise dominion over the area of the world God gave me to manage. Other areas I have a better handle on and so I maintain those, while there are still aspects of myself I know need further improvement. It should be noted that discernment allows a man to be aware of these things and thus, permit opportunities to improve upon them.

Case Study 2 — Having faith in yourself

Lastmod provided a good example of masculine traits in a comment under another post. Here, he mentioned coming up with and presenting a new idea or ways to improve the way property management is done at his place of work. He had the idea, he developed it, and he presented it to people at work. There are aspects of creativity/creation and improvement that tend to be masculine traits, but what I pick up on is what it took on the inside to make the presentation happen. There was always the possibility that his proposal could be rejected, but it was presented nonetheless. Many would brush this off as a simple work project, but the same concepts of taking risk, believing in something enough to try to implement it, and not letting the fear of criticism and rejection stop him from doing what you think is best, are at the core of masculinity.

Effects of Masculinity in Marriage

From a Christian standpoint, a man must understand how the Bible sets up the authority hierarchy in marriage. The authority belongs to the husband because the responsibility for the family is ultimately his, and God will hold him accountable for what he does with what He gave him (wife, children, assets, etc.). This is Headship.

1. The first step in enforcing Headship is to act like you have the authority in marriage that God gave you, because you do. If a boss tells you what to do, or if you tell a subordinate what to do, there is an expectation that it will get done. This calm expectation that your instructions will be followed is the mindset and attitude that reinforces authority. Adopting and putting this mindset into action is the first step, and this works with most basic instructions for what you want done.
2. Many men desire emotional intimacy with their wives, but find this difficult to achieve. Masculinity allows a man to be much more open with his wife, because those boundaries and her confidence that he'll hold them means she can see intimate details of his life without inverting Headship.
3. Acting masculine allows tenderness towards your wife. This is due to the boundaries exercised by a man who is secure in himself. She respects those boundaries or she knows he'll act to defend them and what those actions will be. A man cannot go back on his word regarding these so they must be set very carefully.

Epilogue

To sum this up, whether you are a single, dating, or married man you still need to have a vision for what you want in life. You don't need church, work, or to be some leader of men to get started on this, but you can expect greater authority in these areas to come along in due process. Focusing on those areas of masculine characteristics where self-improvement will further your efforts to get what you want out of life has dual benefits. You'll get more of what you want, and in improving yourself, you'll increase your attractiveness to women (if that's part of your plan). It's not fool proof, but it certainly improves the odds.

Introduction

When men enter into the SMP, it feels like it's all hit or miss. Then they go through a phase of trying to figure out what women like and want, as if he could somehow work harder or say the right words and then he could check those boxes and make the sale.

What guys fail to understand about themselves is that this whole paradigm of striving for women is based on the fact that the guy has already picked out which woman (or women) he wants, and is therefore spinning his wheels trying to attain that idealistic goal. In taking this approach, he is not only setting himself up for failure, but he is also excluding a lot of possibilities.

Success is not about getting the girl you want. Instead, the key for success lies in identifying your sphere of potential influence, and working it to your advantage.

I'll use the examples of height and baldness to explain how this works in the remainder of this essay. But the same principles could apply to just about any limitation (e.g. lack of athleticism, looks, wealth, etc.).

Arnold Schwarzenegger and Danny Devito star in Twins (1988).

Identify Your Qualifiers

As men well know, women have a long list of qualifiers, and a small number of them are crucial.

Height first works as a threshold, cost of admission test. "He must be taller than me." This is by far the most common requirement, even if women never say it. Almost all women want a man taller than she is. "He must be at least 6 feet." Height in these instances isn't an attractant, it's the minimum entry requirement. "You must be at least this tall to ride this ride." Like that.

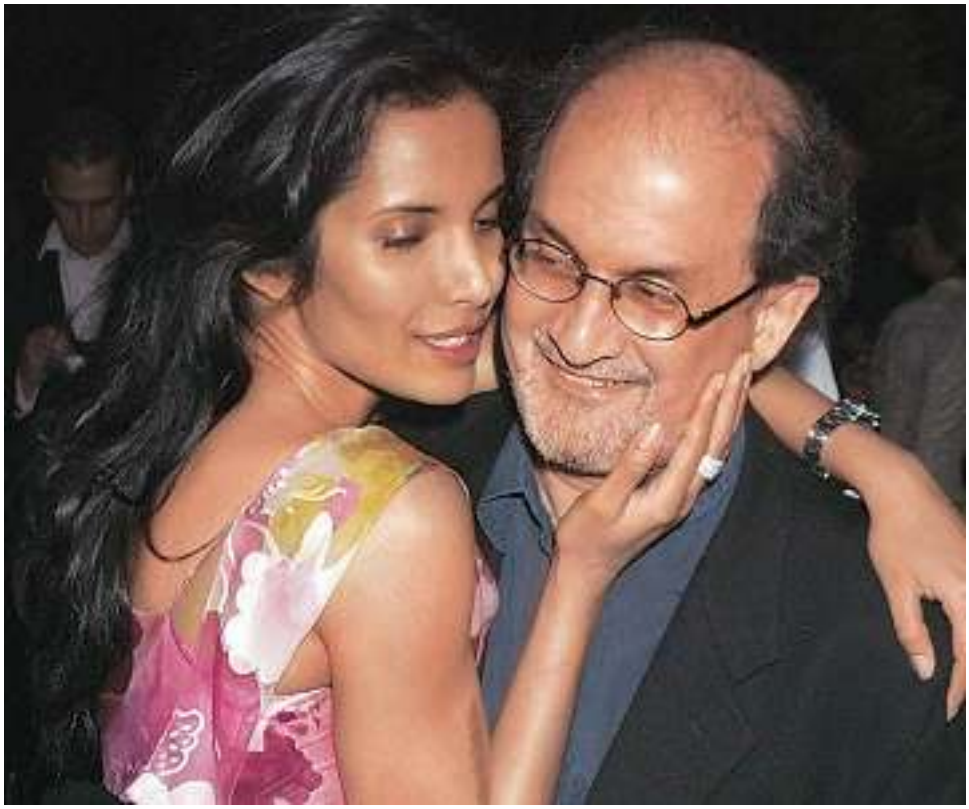
If you're in that tall guy sweet spot, which is around 6 feet to 6'3″, now height is an attractant. Now height will be used with other attractive features. But if you're a tall guy and have no other attractants, well, you're gonna have a hard time. Tall is necessary, but not sufficient.

That's correct. This is why I was able to do "better" with women than many (not all, lol) of the guys I knew who were taller than me. They didn't have the "height exclusion" against them, but they could have various other things against them (personality, face, fitness, humor, social skills, mastery, etc, etc.). The key difference between them and someone like me is that out of a room of 100 women, only roughly 50 or so, give or take, were in my "potential pool". 100 were in their potential pool. But … by having more other things in my favor, I could do better in my pool of 50 women than some of them could in their pool of 100 women. All guys need to have some of those other things going for them, whether they are taller or shorter, in any case. If you are short, you need some more of them going for you, because your pool is smaller and … here is the critical thing … it's a pool that taller men are also competing in, too! So you need to outcompete them also in your smaller pool — you just need to be more competitive, generally, in order to be successful.

Plus, with guys who are shorter than average height, how much shorter than average you are matters. Average height in the US for white guys is 5'9″ (Source). Even guys at that height get some height-related exclusions (the magic number here is 6'0″ in order to avoid any exclusion based on height), but every inch you go lower the harder it gets. So at my height, it's pretty challenging in that the more attractive girls are just completely off the table for you unless you have very outlierish characteristics in other areas (are actually famous, and very wealthy and so on).



Salmon Rushdie and Padma Lakshmi

Guys who are just below that (say 5'8″) still do okay, but do get a good amount of height exclusion as you get to the prettier girls. I have known quite a few guys like this who have consistently dated 6s with perhaps the occasional 7. But generally not a steady diet of 7s, and 8+ is off the table (again, unless they have outlierish other characteristics).

In my height (5'6″), if you really push it in terms of looksmaxing, style and so on, and you have good social skills, you can date mostly 6s. You will have a very hard time dating 7s at all, or anything higher than that, unless you have outlierish other characteristics. And the thing at this height is that if you take your foot off the gas when it comes to maxing what you do have, you fall like a stone — that is, you don't fall from 6s to 5s, you fall from 6s to 4s and lower in terms of women who are willing to date you. You can't be a "normal" guy at this height unless you're interested in below average girls, or being celibate. You have to work it.

As you get lower than my height, it gets really bleak for straight men. I have spoken with a number of guys over the years (in course of giving advice to shorter men) who are in the 5'4″ and 5'3″ range — and, really, these guys were incels. Even objectively unattractive women were not interested in them due to their size (again, barring other outlierish characteristics). No real answers for men in that range, but I will say this — quite a few of these guys today seem to be opting to become transgenders. Probably they realize that they can do better as a fake woman, sexually, than they can as straight men, and with all the propaganda today that is pro-LGBT I can understand how that could happen — as straight men, they're pretty much SOL. In the past, these guys would have been priests or monks or something, but today … not a good life in a world where sex is pretty much at the top of the list in social importance in a very flagrant and open way.

Height works against you if you're like 6'5″ and up. That gets to be viewed as freakishly tall. Advantage: Women 6 feet and up could gravitate to supertall men.

Women over 6 feet will often compromise on height because they have to. I once dated a 6'2″ former professional volleyball player. I'm 5'11", I juuust missed the magic 6 feet mark. She played in the European leagues, had been on college scholarship, the whole bit. She often said she'd date shorter men simply because they were available and taller men were not. It didn't last, of course, but she was open to dating shorter men simply because getting to date men was more important to her than holding out for a taller man. If she chose the latter, her dating opportunities would have been severely limited.

Control Your Pool Size

I want to explore the concept of "doing better in the smaller pool". This is important for a lot of men who get down into intersexual dynamics.

I was in a similar boat as NovaSeeker, but my flaw was and is baldness. I started going bald at 17. I spent the 7 years of college and grad school going from Norwood 2 to 4. By age 25, I was at Norwood 5. Now, baldness is different from height in that it starts to matter less the older you get. But – and here's the kicker – when you start receding and losing your hair in high school, it's really bad. It's terrible to be in college, 20, 21, and be noticeably thinning out on top when most men your age have really good thick hair. It's terrible for your self-esteem, your social life, and your confidence. It really is – because you stand out so much and because it makes you look 10 years older than you are.

The only thing I did right was avoid creative combing. I did just about everything else wrong.

How do you deal with this? How do I wish I'd been coached on how to deal with it?

1. Accept that this is how it is.

You're balding, going bald. There's nothing you can do about it. Just own it, shave it or cut it very short, and just let it go. You are not a top 20% man. You're just not, at least not right now. You're a 6 at best. Yes, that stings. Put some Bactine on it, shake it off, and get moving again. That's life. That's YOUR life. You are genetically predestined to get great tans on your head.

2. Accept that being young and bald means your dating pool is limited.

Right out of the gate, your pool is limited to around 40% of all women in your age cohort. By that, I mean you are just out of the running for at least 60% of all women in your age cohort. You're young and bald, so for that majority, you're a no go from the get go. Yes, that stings again. Keep that Bactine handy. It gets better, I promise.

When you write off the 60% that's already written you off, you can concentrate on the 40% that hasn't written you off. You can become a big fish in that little pond if you max other things. And if you're a big fish, the women in your little pool will really like you. So the moral of that story is: don't even think about the 60% that's eliminated you. Don't even try. Don't even go there. Don't waste your time and don't get needlessly frustrated. Find your pool, stay in it, and work within it.

Many times, I made that exact mistake. I tried to jump out of my little pool and swim with some of my follicularly gifted friends. I got plucked out of the big pool pretty fast. If I had stayed in my little pool, I would not have wasted time and effort on women who would never consider me. That, right there, was a source of great frustration and pain for me. But it didn't have to be. It was, because I would not accept that I couldn't swim in the 60% pool. I would not accept that 8s and 9s were not in my wheelhouse. I couldn't accept that the one 8 I did snag was a complete and total fluke, and was completely out of the ordinary for me. Never happened before or since.

Look: This isn't fair. It's just how it is. This is how it is when you have a glaring physical flaw as a young man.

Ex con Jeremy Meeks never has a shortage of women in rotation.

3. Accept that it's going to be this way.

And it will be this way for quite a while – at least until you're 30, and probably beyond. Small pool for you until your 30s. That's just how it is. You are not going to slay 8s, 9s and 10s. Not happening. You are not taking home a different girl from the frat house party every other weekend. Not happening. You can, however, date 5s and 6s who may want casual sex, sometimes, but who will more likely expect more from you.

4. Remember that your pond is not isolated.

Pitfall: Even the women in your 40% pool will be like the 60% pool. Remember the women in your 40% pool can swim in the 60% pool too. They're dating you, and the men above you. (And make no mistake: they are above you. They are objectively more sexually attractive and appealing than you are. They just are. They don't have your flaw. That puts them above you. I told you to keep the Bactine on hand.)

So women in your pool have an advantage. They can and will demand more from you than they will from the guys in the 60%. To them, you're not Fun Casual Date Guy. You're Nice Steady Relationship Guy. You're not Alpha McGorgeous. They see you as Billy Beta. And they'll work on shoehorning you into the Billy Beta role.

They'll demand that you go all in on commitment. They'll run intersexual dynamics power plays on you. They'll hold out on physical involvement, they'll demand drinks and dinners. Alpha gets the fun; Billy has to wine and dine and work for it.

Actor Bruce Willis and his wife, Emma Heming

The way you have to deal with that is you go really slowly with them and keep them at arm's length. Go slowly. Spin plates Christian style. Do things to distinguish yourself in the 40% pool. Nobody gets your exclusive commitment until she's shown she won't play games. This is where the "you step into my frame" and "you come to me, I don't come to you" is crucial. If you're a 40% guy you must adopt that attitude. Because even a 5 will absolutely steamroll you, if you allow it.

You must not compromise on "I'm the man, I'm running the show. It's fine if you don't like it, there's the door." You must set the terms. You must remember that there are still more in the 40%. And yeah, some will walk away, because they think they can control you and find out they can't and they'll move to other targets. But some of those women will be attracted to it and will start working for it. And there will be a few women with whom you can have relationships on your terms. (Now you can put the Bactine away.)

The thing is that you'll have to wait longer and select from a much smaller pool. Because even in the 40% pool, a big number of those women will not go for "He's in charge. I'll submit. I'll step into his frame" with you. This is to be expected in today's market – why should they submit to a 40% pool man when maybe they can do better? Some women will look at it that way. But some women will not – they'll see they've got a pretty good deal. However, you have to preserve that dynamic through the entire relationship. You don't ever get to let up. You have to keep that going, forever.

The last thing I want to say is that if you're in the 40% pool, you still have to adopt the mindset of "I set the terms, you step into my frame, you come to me. If you can't or won't do that, no relationship."

Yes, you'll be eliminating a lot of regular 40% swimmers. Just remember: You either do it that way, or you end up a guy married 15 years at your wit's end with your marriage, your financial well-being, and the well-being of your children hanging off a cliff by their fingernails.

Such is the life of an early baldy in the late 20th- early 21st century. Hope this helps.

Epilogue

The TLDR for a premature balding man is: Even if you're negotiating from what you think is a worse position, it's better to stay single and not date, than it is to do it her way and step into her frame.

I'm a lawyer, and one of the things we do is a lot of mediation. When you go to a mediation you list out the things you must have and the things you can compromise on. Well, you are losing when you start giving up things you must have. So you don't do it.

When it gets down to what we in the biz call "nut cuttin' time", you hold out for what you must have. If you can't get what you must have, you walk away. No Deal. You physically walk away. You get up and you walk away from the table and out of the room. We all give each other a day or three to think about it.

Very often, when you do that, you find out that, hey, the other side does want to keep talking. They've found it in their hearts (and checkbooks) to give you what you need, so we can make a deal that everyone's more or less happy with. It's to everyone's advantage to make the deal.

So it is with girls. Hold out for what you must have. Susie Snowflake, it's now nut cuttin' time. You come to me. You step into my frame. Must haves, baby, or No Deal. No? OK. I'm done. It was fun, but No Deal. Sometimes, Susie doesn't come back. No Deal. And if it really is No Deal, that's fine, but you have to make that stick and not compromise one inch on it.

But sometimes she does come back. And a Deal is made, and everyone's happy. But you must hold up your end of the bargain and diligently make her hold up her end. You remind her of the deal, that that's how it is, you're not changing it, and she is expected to uphold her end of it.

Doing so displays the strength that they respect.

Introduction

An elderly lady once told this little story in a conversational English class at my church.

> "When I was a teenage girl, I hated to receive attention from men. It made me feel dirty and disgusting. Then one day, an older woman told me, "[Those men] love you so much! Why should you hate them and treat them badly just because they love you? Instead, you should be nice to them." I thought she was right, and so I changed my mind about this. After I married and grew older, I started to realize more and more how stupid I was for hating men when I was younger."

Yes, all the world is an oyster in the eyes of a young woman, and yet, she didn't discover this until later in life because of her queer distrust for men. I'm sure she regrets having that attitude because it cut her off from the joys of being the object of the constant favors and the fawning attentions of men. I might even speculate that she's annoyed with herself for nipping her own hypergamic instincts in the bud. However, she's also stated on other occasions that she's very content with her marriage and her grown children are well adjusted and relatively successful. All in all, she's done rather well in life.

I find three things remarkable about her testimony.

1. An avoidant distrust for men kept her pure throughout the turbulent post-adolescent stage.
2. Her distrust for men didn't hurt her chances for having a satisfying and successful marriage, and even helped her because of (1).
3. How much times have changed since this lady was a young woman.

Her story offers a glimpse through the female lens for us to get some perspective on the social expressions of masculine faith conveyed in the remainder of this post.

Anonymous Truths

Since October of 2020, I've received several email messages from readers and fellow bloggers who told me they have some things to say to other men, but they can't find an appropriate context in which to say it.

After collecting these messages into one document and studying their "secrets", I found a common theme in four of them about how women crave male attention. The interesting thing about these messages is that there is another theme running underneath this main theme (which they may or may not be aware of), and that is how trusting God and living through faith frequently seems to come off as "inappropriate" or offensive. So with these similarities in mind, I will present their statements here as a collection.

Some of the messages seem to answer questions that are brought up in other messages, so I've arranged the order of these messages accordingly.

"Over the past 30 years, I've found that women are absolutely addicted to male attention, but they are painstakingly particular about how that attention is shown. I actually find a lot of joy in giving women this attention that they need and crave, but I've had to learn how to do it so that I don't get bitten by their implacable peevishness. See, sometimes women get the wrong idea, and can make your life ɦəll. That includes my wife. I don't see anything wrong with giving attention to other women, as long as there is no impropriety. But it makes her jealous. She had a hard time with it when we were younger. […] Then something unexplicable happened. I don't know what changed, but after talking with an older married woman at church, she grew to be at peace with this. […] Now she is thankful to have a husband who is "considerate of other women's emotional needs"."

[Jack's Note: Wow! I've had the same experiences, including the older woman talking with my wife. Women want a charming man who is attractive to other women, even though it makes them jealous and possessive at times. They need an older woman to help them see that this emotional tug-of-war originates from within themselves, and not from the man who triggers this dichotomy of feeelz. Only then can they be thankful to have a man who can arouse such feelings.]

"Personally, even though I am married, I still like to tease women and flirt with them. But that's about as far as it goes. I make it clear that it is just for fun, and I make the boundaries clear. Women intuitively understand, and a few of them play along. I do this mostly by paraphrasing RP adages and applying them to women's observed behaviors. This ticks women off, but they love it at the same time. […] When I was a younger Blue Pilled lad, I thought this kind of behavior was uncouth and rotten. But since getting married, and especially after taking the Red Pill, I've learned to embrace the ironies of being a sexual human. I don't believe there is anything wrong with this, and I've found that people really enjoy the authenticity. Believe it or not, it's also made my marriage better!"

[Jack's Note: I do this too (paraphrasing RP adages to tease women), and yes, it "works" just like he says. I also went through a crisis of belief and had to let go of some BP notions before I could square this with being a Christian.]

"Alright, here is something I would never mention on a blog post because it's the kind of crap that gets me in trouble with the wife. But I think readers might want to know this is a thing.

I still flirt with random women in public, and I do it JUST TO SEE IF I STILL CAN!

I am not trying to cheat. I am not trying to get a divorce. I just like it, and I can't explain it any other way.

A garden variety example might be a cute girl at a check out. If I detect even the slightest bit of IOI from her, I will look her right in the eyes and say something like "You've got the best smile I have seen all day."

If it "works", they will do a bashful giggle, twirl their hair, their eyes dilate, you can even see a tiny bit of glistening on their lips if they get a little wet.

Then, I just walk away, having satisfied myself that I am still capable of this.

TRP community would argue that this is "game". But how is it game if I didn't learn it from somewhere? It's just totally normal for me."

[Jack's Note: This is the element of charisma within game. You either have it or you don't, and if you have it, you can't explain it.]

"From reading Σ Frame, Do What's Right [now defunct], and Radix Fidem, I've picked up how important it is to be living life from the heart. One thing that gave me headaches and confusion is that whenever I started "getting into the groove" of living the heart-led way, I found it "natural" to behave inappropriately, like going back on my word, saying mean (but truthful) things, being careless and inconsiderate in general, bossing people around, and being flirty with women. I also got more IOIs from women, and this increased my temptation and decreased my will to resist.

Because the heart-led way seemed to go hand in hand with increased temptation and uncouth behavior, it made me wonder whether I was really on the right track. If I was, then I couldn't understand how to deal with this.

Overall, all this bothered my conscience because on the surface, it seemed like I was becoming less Christ-like and less agape loving. So if I followed my conscience, then I had to back away from the heart-led way. I couldn't be certain I was on the right track. I think this was the thing that, in the past, made me hesitant to embrace the heart-led way with confidence. I also suspect this is the thing that led me to reject exploring the heart-led way earlier in life. I've always been very conscientious."

“For months I struggled with this, wondering if this a common experience with the heart-led way, or is there something odd about me?

Then in April [2021], I read NovaSeeker’s post, Juxtaposing the Temporal and the Eternal, and Jack followed up with a post describing how following the Rules and Trust in God are fundamentally opposed. Somewhere else, Jack wrote about how believing in Christ opens up a parallel paradigm, and then things started to click.

Through reading these posts, I realized that even though I was discovering the heart-led way, I was still thinking on a carnal level, trying to follow “rules” that my legalistic conscience had put in place long ago (probably during my childhood). Walking in faith requires me to be able to step outside my conscious self, to find that higher moral awareness that can express the real me. I think this is what Jack calls “spiritual authenticity”. I should not resist the groove of living in faith, thinking it to be merely a slide into immorality, but instead, I have to get used to what is flowing inside of me during my time in the groove and think in terms of what assets are now available, and for what purpose. There has to be a sense of mission that guides the use of whatever opportunities come out of it. After accepting this about myself, I’ve found that my inner Game comes quite naturally now, and it lures women out of nowhere. Not that this is a bad thing; it simply needs guidance and direction.

Since I realized this and started to trust God in this way, I have certainly screwed things up at times. Nothing too serious, except once, a female coworker reported me for h&rassment. Funny thing is, I never played any mind games with her or even interacted with her that much. But I do think she could feel something different about me. She misread my kindness, or maybe she was envious that the other women actually enjoyed my attentions. I’m not sure. This accusation was resolved after a couple other female coworkers voluntarily came forward and spoke up in defense of me. After it blew over, things resumed as normal, except there were fewer people who really trusted that coworker anymore. I eventually realized that no one took it very seriously to begin with. I mean, they had to take her seriously as a matter of principle but it was more of an annoyance than anything else. Overall, I’d say living in the groove of faith made me rather popular, and this won out in the end. I’ve come to view stuff like this as persecution for flaunting my new found authenticity as an expression of faith (Mark 10:29-31). And the outcome increases my faith that God will protect my budding faith, if that makes any sense to you.”

Conclusions

What these men have described is never openly discussed, but it is normal. Women love to receive attention, and men love to give it to them, But maneuvering the exchange can be very tricky.

As Christians, it's well established that it's wrong to spread sex around, but it's not wrong to be attractive to people who really don't have a clue about what that attraction should accomplish, and whose intentions are not at all appropriate.

I don't believe flirting is wrong. It can be, at times, nothing more than a social lubricant. You have to discern when it's okay to use that tool and how. You really need to be able to draw boundaries in this sense, and do it smoothly so that you don't turn the blessing into a curse. I, too, have never faced more temptation than when I am "in the groove". But there are clear boundaries between culture, nature, and nurture, and we become more aware of these boundaries through faith.

Σ Frame Maxim 23: The key to maneuvering intersexual social transactions is in recognizing God's glory in everything.

When your heart of faith rules your day to day walk, everything inside of you is reordered. The masks we wear must come off. You need to recognize all of what's been planted inside of you, some from God, some from culture, some from nature, and some from nurture.

The heart-led way exposes you to your true nature. If you don't know what's in the basement, you can't clean it up. Your mind may not like what's down there, but you need to fully assess what is there before you can seek the Lord to give things their proper value and place. Doing so doesn't require that you surrender to everything that's crawling around down there. This is why we must learn to pray all the time about every little thing. Over the long term, you eventually learn what God can do with what's down there.

Cultures vary on how we should handle that self-discovery. A major hallmark of Western society is the inhibitions we are taught to place on ourselves, all the while entertaining the notion that "law, reason, and order" is what makes us more civilized and humane. Every other culture laughs about this. We aren't allowed to be that self-honest.

A lot of what we assume is good and proper is little more than shaming ourselves and each other into conforming to ever changing mass social "rules", and those who can do so successfully are given a hollow pat on the back for being a "good person" or a "good citizen". Conversely, a lot of what we assume is our "human right" or even "God given right", is simply the case that we've swallowed some popularized notion without due consideration.

One of the biggest steps in faith we take is when we realize that the boundaries and liberties we have allowed other people to draw for us don't calculate by God's estimations. These false boundaries most often take the form of a self-limiting comfort zone, and the false liberties lead us astray from the glory and righteousness of our faith. Sometimes they do turn out to be correct, but you have to find your own path back to reinterpreting them according to your own understanding, so that you'll know for yourself why it is correct. This also helps knowing when and how it can be applied appropriately.

What God is looking for is a genuine love for Him and His ways, not whether you have the ability to actually perform. That doesn't excuse sin, but it does put sin in proper perspective. You can't truly live in this body and still avoid it! So what we need is a mechanism for handling the inevitable. We have to learn how to be moral janitors who are competent at cleaning up our own messes and trusting God with the outcome. And then we learn from the messes.

It takes a different kind of discipline altogether to walk through that fire without getting burned. But we need to know what is lurking in our subconscious being and how to handle the temptations God allows. It's better to know, even at the risk of moral failure, than to hide behind artificial restraint. That's the Psalm 139 experience. It's also the shift from legalism to agape.

Hopeless Hesitancy

Last Wednesday, deti hit us with a barrage of raw truths in his post, Deti's Advice to Underqualified Men (2020-12-08). In the comments that followed, the general observation I had was about the pessimistic tone which bended towards hopelessness.

What struck me in reading comments from some of the men is that they mentally eliminate any woman in her late 20's because she's done the horizontal tango too many times with other men for their liking. (With the risks involved, I can understand why.) Then they look at the remaining pool of potential women in their early 20's and discard them as well, because they don't see any good ones based on observed behavior. (I think we'd all agree that they're too entitled, flighty, indignant, emotionally immature, and cling to feministic attitudes toward sex, men, children, and family, not to mention the constant obnoxious moxie clichés.)

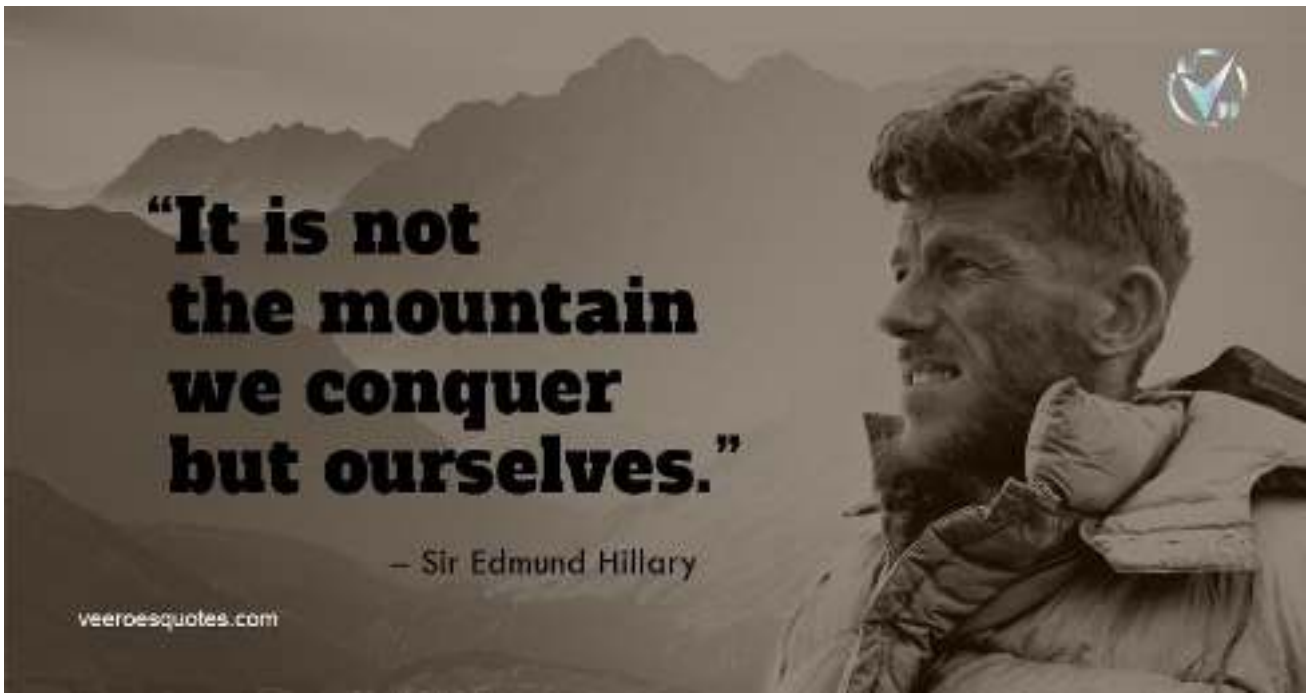
I recall one regular commenter running through this logical deduction and it struck me as defeatist. This prompted me to bounce my thoughts off deti. A string of emails ensued, and deti urged me to write up my observations in a post.

I used to handle information and make decisions by process of elimination in the same way that the commenter described. In doing this, I defeated myself before I ever even tried. But I learned to think differently, more faithful rather than factual, through the example of the guy who started the insurance agency I work for. I'll call him Sam. He always thinks things will work out in his favor and so he tries in spite of not perceiving any good prospects. It doesn't always work out the way he thinks it will, but he will adapt mid process and he rarely ever fails.

One day, Sam told me that he's told other agency owners exactly what he does and how he does it in order to generate the sales volume he does. I asked him if he was worried about whether the competition might adopt his ideas and thereby ramp up the competition, and he told me he wasn't concerned at all because they convince themselves it won't work and so they'll never even try.

What Sam told me that day about marketing is so applicable to men struggling in the SMP. I realized that whenever we are faced with a situation in which there are no easy answers, cultivating a sense of vision and purpose is an expression of our faith in ourselves and in God. Being innovative when dealing with unknowns, sticking with it, and rolling with the punches are all part of the process. Success is never easy nor can we think of it as a sure thing. We have to work out our faith. (Philippians 2:12-16; James 1:2-12; James 2:14-26)

So when I see men discarding women who, with the right guidance, could be at least adequate as wives, the defeatism picks a nerve with me. I have the same attitude with my boys too. It makes me livid when they tell me they "can't" do something, because I know there is a very real mental barrier constructed in the act of saying, "I can't", that limits the realm of what is possible.



Sir Edmund Percival Hillary (20 July 1919 – 11 January 2008) was a New Zealand mountaineer, explorer, and philanthropist. On 29 May 1953, Hillary and Sherpa mountaineer Tenzing Norgay became the first climbers confirmed to have reached the summit of Mount Everest.

Applying Faith by Considering Future Wife Potential when Vetting

What this means for men who want to be married is that, first, they have to be engaged in the challenge of conquering themselves and reaching towards their life's purpose, and second, they have to be willing to look at woman's potential to be the wife he wants — a woman who can fit into and support his life's purpose — instead of dismissing all women because none are exactly what they want from the very start.

When we begin to look at women through the lens of their potential as wives and mothers, then it is obvious that the probability that her sex and dating history might become a hinderance to pair bonding and marital sanctification only increases with her age and experience. Around the CRP sphere, we urge men not to consider women over 25 or past an N count of 2 for this reason, but these are just estimated numbers based on probabilities. IRL, women vary case by case. A 20 year old virgin might have a latent inner hoe tendency that blows up after marriage. A 30 year old single mom ex carousel rider might become a very wise mother and devoted partner. You never know for sure until you open her up. But employing discernment, wisdom, and faith can give you a clue.

All that said, going younger has many potential advantages.

- The beauty and vitality of youth
- Longer fertility window
- Fewer sex partners
- Less set in her ways
- Being more apt to adapt to her man

There is also the biological reality that if a man wants a larger family or wants to avoid the increasing risk of birth defects from a higher risk pregnancy, then he needs to go younger. My wife's OBGYN says various risks start to increase exponentially around 34 years old, and pregnancies over the age of 35 are called "geriatric pregnancies" within the medical field, which gives us a rude idea of the situation.

Yes, there are potential disadvantages of going younger, such as emotional immaturity, impulsivity, not being marriage minded, or being prone to enjoy (too much) the male attention that youth affords her, but between the two options (under 25 vs. over 25), the under 25 class will typically have easier flaws to overcome than the over 25 class.

Since we as men tend to be able to accept reality and adapt to it, then younger is going to be the option with the higher probability of working out the way the man wants. There's much more potential, but also a lot of work in the moulding and shaping. But the biggest hindrances are in the mind, in forming a vision, and in doing what is required to step up to the challenge.

Men need to Gain an Eye for Potential

The concept that you have to look for the potential in a woman is an important one. Much like a piece of real estate that is undeveloped or poorly organized but which can be renovated into a fantastic space, you have to envision a plan, invest the time, and put in the work to make it into what you want.

In my email exchange with deti, we were getting at how a man can find a woman who can become a good wife. I mentioned to deti that women are better at recognizing potential in men, and he commented that men are not taught to look for potential in women. This is a vetting habit that has been neglected, if not entirely forgotten. Men of late have fallen into the feminine frame of sizing up a potential mate based on the feeelz and performance, especially sexual performance, but thinking this way guarantees that you'll get a woman who has already been broken in and shaped by other men, and this severely reduces her potential as your wife.

What men need to do is to start assessing women on their character to see if they will stick it out through the change process. Of course, no woman wants to change herself for a man. They will resist and protest all the way. But how hard she fights the process depends on her temperament. If you think of potential wives on a resistance spectrum, the Tingly Respect model woman would be on one end and the raging, man loathing feminist would be on the other.

The interesting part of how God designed marriage and us as people, is that the more a man can mold a woman into the wife he wants, the more satisfying and secure the marriage will be for both. All the Christian RP ideas and tactics fall under this concept. Tingly Respect, Headship, dread, outcome independence, being dominant, making demands, improving yourself… you get the idea, are all pointing towards molding a woman into being the kind of wife the husband wants. The better a man can mold his wife, the more she becomes what he wants. The more she wants to please him for the attention and affirmation, the happier he is with her. God made us to create this positive feedback loop because this symbiotic oneness in marriage secures the union.

Although it is assumed that a woman has to willingly choose to remain with her man, I don't know if her willingness to submit is necessary. Deti and I certainly fall much more on the coercion side than the "wife willingly submits" side, unless you count "dragged along kicking and screaming by force of my will or divorce ultimatums" in deti's case as willing submission. What seems to matter more is that the wife gets to the point where the feedback loop can work.

Sir Edmund Hillary and Tenzing Norgay on their epic climb.

The Challenge is an Integral Part of the Process

I had another thought about deti's post that I think is relevant. His advice for some men to wait until 30 to start dating could contain a fatal flaw, which is that our growth comes from struggle. The marriage I have now, which is further down the road in the sanctification process, required endurance, faith, breaking, recognizing God's actual model, and then a ton of work to begin to drag the marriage towards God's model. Without the pain, and the faith to endure it, I'd still be buying into the cultural BP "Happy wife, happy life" lie, and I'd still be reading scripture through that frame of mind, and adapting my interpretation of scripture to fit it. My growth and development came from going through the struggle.

The same is going to be true of men who are not at the top of women's dating wish list. Going through the struggle is the honing process that leads to a more refined man. If a man skips all dating until the age of 30, then he'll be less experienced and miss the refining benefits that come from enduring the struggle. He's already not the physical ideal and on top of that, he's going to be prone to the mistakes of inexperience. That's a harder spot to be in than merely having to overcome not being the hypergamous ideal.

Not Trusting women is Deep Inner Game

Some Clarifications

> "The heart of her husband safely trusts her;
> So he will have no lack of gain."
> Proverbs 31:11 (NKJV)

The context of this verse should be well noted. It describes the Proverbs 31 woman, the quality of whom is less common than one in 1,000 women according to Solomon (Ecclesiastes 7:28). This verse can be woefully misleading if we apply this to all women and assume they are trustworthy. It sets women up on a pedestal, which we already know suggests an inversion of roles.

Back in June, I wrote a series of posts discussing the concept of Masculinity within the context of a relationship – how to interpret a woman's stated opinions of a man's masculinity, and whether or not, and how much, a man should trust a woman when opening up.

Adam Piggott did me the favor of granting a response in his post, Husbands must not unburden themselves (2021 July 6). In this post, he wrote,

> "…we do not wish to know God's heart or mind. It is a burden enough dealing with our own.

> Within this context it should be radically clear just how demonic the modern concept of equality is. The coordinated propaganda for men to 'get in touch with their feelings' via their female counterparts is not merely self-defeating; it is damning. It is a trap for a man even to contemplate the idea of unburdening his feelings to his wife, let alone to do so. Our women need us to be strong, resolute, unyielding and to have the answers because that is the original deal. That is what female natures demand, just as male natures demand the same from God.
> To understand what a woman needs from a relationship with her husband we merely need to consider what we need from our relationship with God.
> In conclusion I am in disagreement with Jack's answer to the question on whether a man should be able to unburden his troubles with his wife. The answer is no, period. There is no theoretical ideal, as such a whimsy fantasy leads men directly to disaster. We need to grow up and be resolute on this. Leaders lead. They do not seek the soft reassurance of underlings to moisten their egos. To do such a thing is weakness, and women abhor weakness. As indeed we would do if it were ever presented to us from above.
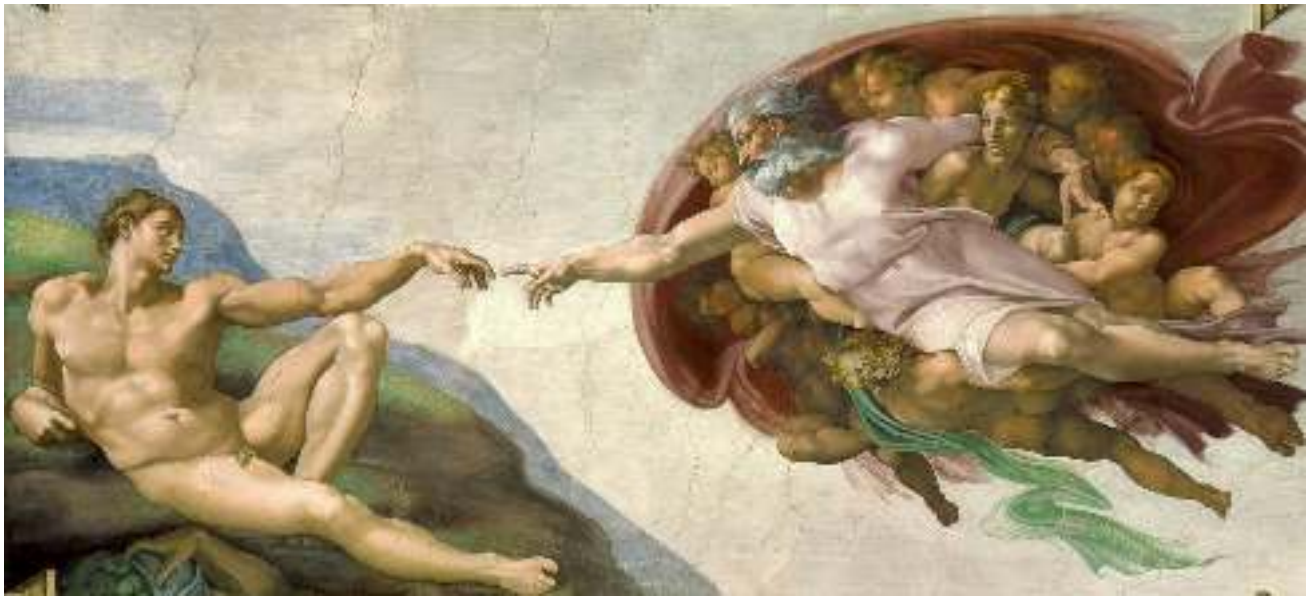
> (As a concluding aside, this is why Satan is in hell – he is weakness personified.)"

In spite of the Mandalorian overtones, in general, I agree with what Adam has written in this post. The reason I wrote what I did in the series is because I do believe it is God's desire to open His innermost heart to us — not because He is weak and needs to unload, but because of His love for us and for the sake of intimacy. I believe God hopes for men to have the same expression of intimacy towards their wives as He hopes to have with us.



Ideally, a wife should trust her husband. Ideally, a man should be able to trust his wife, as it says in Proverbs 31:11 (quoted at the top). That's how it's supposed to be.

But as Adam pointed out, very few people can understand or accept the raw truth of human frailty, especially insecure, immature women. For those who can't take the full brunt of the joys and sorrows of the truth, the archetype must be upheld.

In reality, the reason why a man should not open up to his wife is not because he is weak, and he needs to hide his weakness. The reason is because the wife is weak, and she can't face reality without losing faith.

As I stated before, Game is necessary for immature women, and less so for mature women. (I think I'm the only Christian Manospherian still pushing "married game".)

An Odd Correlation

Disclosure: Due to some childhood trauma, I've always found it difficult to trust others. Whenever I was able to trust another person, it was usually someone who was beautiful, charismatic, charming, or gut churning honest – not someone who was genuinely trustworthy. The negative fallout from this only reinforced my inability to trust.

In my experience,

- Whenever I opened my heart to a woman, I was met with rejection in short order.
- Whenever I guarded my heart and refused to trust a woman, she fell for me quite hard.

I can't tell you how many times this happened to me. I wrestled with it for years. As I became more aware of this dynamic, I tried not to trust women I liked, thinking that I could reverse the effects – to no avail. I tried to trust women I didn't like as a means of shooing them away. This was also an exercise in futility. The women who wouldn't stop chasing me (some did for years) were those I didn't like, and didn't trust. It was a catastrophe.

My father once told me,

> "Don't make yourself too obvious to people. Always hold something back. Throw out a bizarre red herring now and then, just to keep them guessing about you."

At the time, I took this to mean that putting up a smokescreen and being mysterious filters out the riff raff, and those who can see through it are the people who really care about you. But that wasn't the point. (Disclosure: My father also had trust issues.)

The point was that when a man holds his own, and defends his heart from being attacked, then it gives him more emotional stability and social leverage. It draws respect from other men, and it makes him more attractive to women. (Disclosure: My father is greatly respected, but not trusted very much. However, I trust him very much. I would even say he's been my best friend throughout life.)

Concluding Statements

When I consider all this evidence objectively, I reach the conclusion that it is a foolish forfeiture of power to trust a woman, even a woman I am in a committed relationship with. In fact, the Bible says as much.

> [5] Do not trust in a friend;
> Do not put your confidence in a companion;
> Guard the doors of your mouth
> From her who lies in your bosom.
> [6] For son dishonors father,
> Daughter rises against her mother,
> Daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law;
> A man's enemies are the men of his own household.
> [7] Therefore I will look to the Lord;
> I will wait for the God of my salvation;
> My God will hear me.
> Micah 7:5-7 (NKJV)

We are living in such times as Micah did.

The Red Pill has opened my eyes to see that women want men to trust them because it grants them attention and power. It also props up their pride – the ability to pick and prod, and sift through a man's heart, and to judge him according to her whimsical, solipsistic nature. Usually, her final judgment is that he is an "immature boy", which is unhelpful to a man's confidence and psychological well-being.

Σ Frame Axiom 20: The proper management of Trust is the central pillar of holding Frame.

I wish I could have realized this correlation much earlier in life, but alas, I never thought of this connection. My concept of trust was too cerebral, and I was not aware that I wore my heart on my shirt sleeves around those women I adored. I was too Blue Pilled. I wanted too much to be able to trust a woman and find love. I even believed it was God's will for my marriage to be as such.

And so I waited… and waited… and waited…

But the reality is that more than 999/1,000 women are simply not trustworthy.

So my experience proved to be truer than my conceptualization.

Silence

Spoiler Alert: This post contains plot spoilers of the film, Silence.

In Martin Scorcese's film, Silence, Liam Neeson portrays Father Cristóvão Ferreira, a Portuguese missionary to Japan. It's hard to know how accurate the book or the movie is to the real life events it depicts, but let's assume it is for the sake of discussion.

For those readers who would rather read than watch, Storgy offers a beautiful review of the movie here. The quoted excerpts are from Storgy.

Silence – The Deconstruction of Faith (Length 14:23)

The Question of Faith

As described in the video overview, the concept of faith is rigorously examined within a cultural context that is much different from what we are accustomed to in the west. When Sebastião askes himself,

> "Men are born into two categories: the strong and the weak, the saints and the commonplace, the heroes and those who respect them. In time of persecution the strong are burnt in the flames and drowned in the sea; but the weak, like Kichijiro, lead a vagabond life in the mountains. As for you (I know spoke to myself) which category do you belong to?"

he is approaching faith from a westernized perspective characterized by a linear plot filled with heroes and villains. However, in Japan, religion is merely an historical or superstitious fable that is out of touch with present reality, and the concept of heroism is regarded to be more like egotistical foolishness rather than an inspiring savior. So instead, Ferreira and Sebastião are forced to revise their understanding of faith through the lens of suffering and sacrifice.

> "Silence is about suffering: the suffering of Christ, the suffering of those persecuted in Japan by the inquisitor Inoue Masashige, the suffering of priests forced to give up their faith through mental and physical torture. But more importantly, it's about the morality of suffering. It might be right to stubbornly refuse to korobu (to bow, surrender) your faith despite torture, but what about if it is someone else who is being tortured? What if others suffer because of your refusal?"

There is a lot to consider here, and I think the answers are not so clear cut at all. But in my opinion, the overriding value of Scorcese's story is that it brings one to a place of deep introspection about the nature and purpose of faith itself, and how one might be called to emulate Christ in ways that are beyond our logical understanding. It is vitally necessary for one to decide for one's self the answers to these questions.

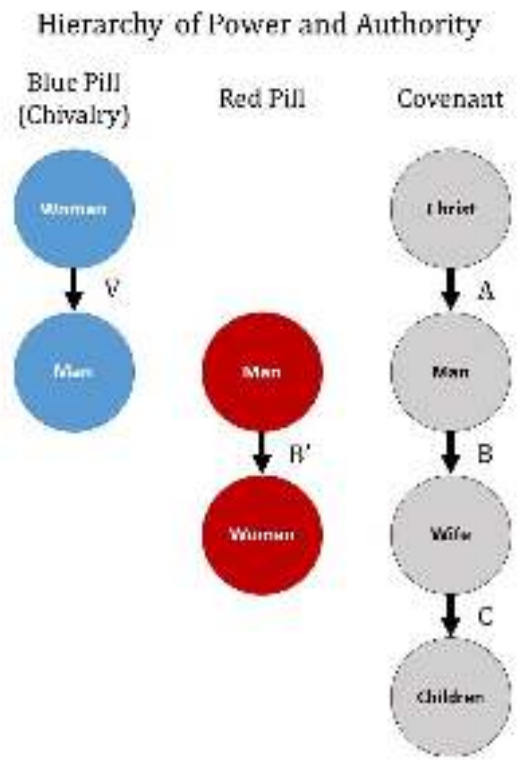
Archetypes

The film contains some fascinating descriptions of male-female archetypes and analogies.

> "Christianity is described by Inoue Masashige as the love of a competing concubine vying for the affection of a man (symbolically, the concubine is Christianity [or European powers] and the man is Japan). Sebastião responds that Christianity believes in monogamy, choosing only one wife. Inoue changes tack, describing Christianity as 'the love of an ugly woman' that Japan does not want or need."

This sentence in bold is a powerful line that has stuck with me since I watched this film. It was an enchanting analogy, but I knew there was something not quite right about it.

According to the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy, Christ is the man, and the Christian church (or perhaps the nation of Japan in this case) is the wife or concubine. To rephrase it another way, Japan (or the church collective in Japan), is not symbolized as a man (as in Masashige's understanding), but rather a woman — the bride of Christ. I suppose the script writer did not have the wits nor a solid knowledge of Christian doctrine to have Sebastião spell this out as a rebuttal to Masashige in the book/film.



After some reflection, I realized that the symbolic archetype described by Masashige is inverted, but it is NOT inverted according to the structure of authority as the Christian Red Pill is used to thinking about feminism (shown in the above figure), but instead, is inverted according to engendered expressions. That is to say, Japan is a society that is solidly patriarchal in outlook, but one in which typical gender roles are reversed. Men hold positions of power in society, yet they are passionate, peevish, vainglorious, and whimsical, while women are dutiful, hardworking, responsible, and thoughtful. The nature of this inversion strikes westerners as utterly bizarre, but yet, it carries a mysterious, even seductive appeal.

If the reader takes the time to ponder on this profound switcheroo for a moment, you'll begin to understand Japanese culture very acutely. You'll understand…

- Why Japanese p0rn is so popular.
- How Chivalry existed in feudal Japan.
- Why the suicide rate in Japan is one of the highest among developed countries.
- Given that women are the gatekeepers of sex, it also explains to some extent why the birth rate in Japan is one of the lowest in the world.

I did a little further research on Masashige, and found that some historians believe he was homosexual. This also matches up with this inverted concept of archetypes.

This understanding gives us a very vivid insight into Japanese social culture, and I assume these characteristics have continued within Japanese society up to this day.

I wonder whether our modern feminist culture in the west might eventually drift towards having these engendered characteristics one day. After all, we both have Chivalry in common.

Introduction

Deti's Advice to Underqualified Men (2020-12-08) got me thinking about how difficult the SMP/MMP is for most men. In rereading the post and contemplating it further, I was reminded of how most men do not have any network of male associates to confide in, and how important it is to have other trustworthy men in my life from which to seek counsel. Personally, I do have a few other men whom I can talk with about things like this (deti, Jack, Mike Davis, et al.), and I correspond with them regularly through email. I know Jack also has a short list of men with whom he regularly confides in.

The development of ideas from the back and forth is part of the reason I wanted to post my conversation with deti as a string, as this shows the thought process. I had an idea, wanted to check with a man I trusted that I was on the right track, and from the back and forth with deti, the idea developed further branching into areas I hadn't contemplated yet. This highlights how important it is to have men, specifically those who clearly see the truth, to speak with. It doesn't have to be anything formal, as the following email string shows.

In the comments, I noticed that many of the men carried a pessimistic outlook on the entire SMP/MMP. For a time, I was undecided about whether they were being realistic or just being armchair cynics. But when I looked at my own marriage, I realized that my wife was definitely far from perfect when we married. According to the standard vetting advice that is now available on the sphere, she wouldn't have passed. But yet, that didn't stop me from marrying her. It's been a long haul, but over the past year, she's become a worthy wife. The other men I've talked with all have pretty much the same story about their marriages. So in the final analysis, I think that no matter where a man might stand in the socio-sexual hierarchy, having a woman will require a lot of determination, patience, and faith.

Last week's post, Dating in the Lion's Den: Relying on Faith when the options are daunting (2021-12-13), covered some of my thoughts about these views. The following exchange picks up from there.

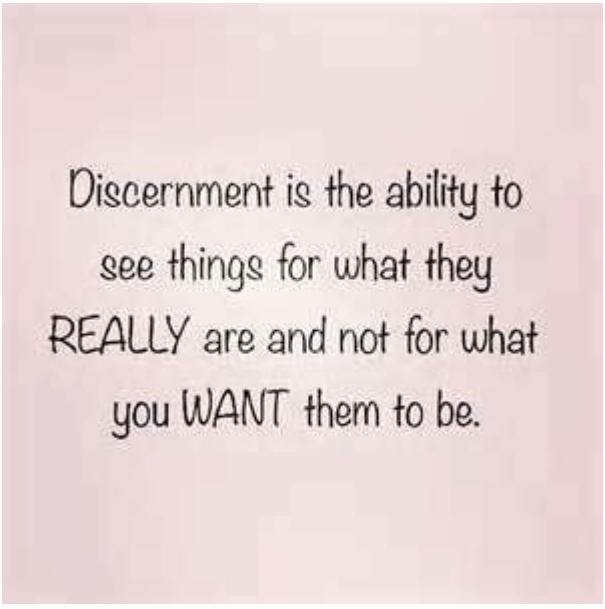
deti,

I'm torn on this one because of the fatalistic nature of the comments so far about what you wrote… which is funny coming from a predestination, PCA guy. I'm wondering if some of the attitude I'm seeing in the comments is indicative of self-fulfilling prophecy when it comes to some of these men's experiences with women.

There also appears to be a concept of the perfect woman that is being searched for, much like the lost city of gold or the fountain of youth. It's obviously not present very often today, but I don't think women like this have ever existed with great frequency. Proverbs 31:10 was written for a reason. That reason is that human nature is wildly consistent and a woman of virtue or character is hard to find. If a man finds one, she's a blessing from God.

What seems to be much more prevalent is men molding wives into something acceptable much like Ephesians 5 tells us to do in washing her with the Word. This would fit well with Paul's marriage analogy of Christ and the church. Christ takes us as we are and molds us through sanctification, very patiently I might add, as I have yet to be incinerated by a white hot bolt of lightning. Christ's patience with us would then be like Peter's admonition for husbands not to be harsh and live with their wives in an understanding way.

You and I are two examples of men who have molded their wives. I'd add in Deep Strength too, except he appears to have done a good deal of the molding prior to being locked down which hopefully means he'll be spared some of our more interesting marriage experiences.



Here is a great example of what that molding can do.

Think back to our first few emails months ago and what I described. [Editor's Note: She was argumentative, disagreeable, sexually frigid, and had used almost all the Duluth Model of abuse tactics against me.] Then compare that with this story. This past Friday, I forgot to hide a package that got delivered with gifts in it and the boys found it Saturday morning. Mrs. Apostle had asked me to hide it and I forgot. I made a mistake. I know, I can hardly believe it either. She was upset and brought the matter to my attention before I'd had any coffee and she did it in a slightly snarky, gotcha manner. I gave it about 20 minutes and then calmly told her that I don't mind her expressing frustration, but how she did it was disrespectful and the gotcha aspect of it is a way that inverts God's authority order in marriage. I also acknowledged my mistake. She understood what she had done and agreed with me that her approach was off. Then we went about our day.

Is that not an example of what commenters say they are looking for in a wife? You and I both know that did not happen on its own. It took me working on both myself and her, and the Holy Spirit using that to transform her on the inside. My lump of clay was slightly different than yours from an age and carousel standpoint, but you were still able to mold yours significantly when you started using the correct tools for the job.

Am I off base on this?

RPA,

I don't have a lot of time to delve into this today. Do you mean the comments from Rock, Scavos, et al.? Do you mean the comments of "the girls who felt that feminism lied to them and were so hurt"?

You're not off base on this. In fact, I had to look hard for what you were talking about. It's our nature as men to protect women.

A man has to take a woman and make her into HIS wife. Not just "a" wife. HIS wife. And a man has to have some frame to do that, and a woman who is at least willing to step into that frame and allow herself to be molded.

You have a post there, RPA.

RPA,

Another thing to bring up in a post like this is just how subtle all this is — We are hardwired to protect a crying, injured, distraught, distressed woman. We are hardwired to leap into Mighty Mouse "HERE I COME TO SAVE THE DAY!" mode for ANY woman in the vicinity who needs help.

Yes, good point about looking for "the perfect woman". There is way too much romanticism about marriage and how it is supposed to be about:

Women: "I just wanna be a wife and mommy and nest and make babies and have my house and minivan and white picket fence and stuff!"

Men: "I just want the fun sex party train to keep rolling! Let the good times roll! I get to keep this girlfriend I've been banging for a while!"

deti

deti,

"The girls who felt that feminism lied to them and were so hurt" is part of the bigger picture of a fatalist, reductionist equation that many of the men buy into. It starts with the reality of RP knowledge that certain men have a limited pool of women in which they can fish. This is reality for the majority of men. The next step in the logic is that feminism has screwed up the vast majority of the women in their probable pool so options are even more restricted. For every action a man might take there is a negative reason for why it won't work and they convince themselves to not even try, which then becomes a 100% self-fulfilling prophecy of not getting married. We have men convincing themselves to not even try, or, they are afraid of trying and use the logic to rationalize their inactivity.

So the woman hurt by feminism is a lump of clay that has been softened for a man already. She needs someone with vision and the right skills to mold her. Lori Alexander was a self-admitted raging [witch with a B] until she repented and became the woman that feminists love to loath. What I'm getting at is that we need to stop looking for the woman of our dreams that exists in completed form and start having the vision to see the potential for what actually can be. Women seem to be able to sniff out men with potential better than we as men sniff out women with potential. It's because we overemphasize the boner test while underemphasizing key aspects of the character test.

> "A man has to take a woman and make her into HIS wife. Not just "a" wife. HIS wife. And a man has to have some frame to do that, and a woman who is at least willing to step into that frame and allow herself to be molded."

You clearly stated the character test here. It's not if she's a perfect unblemished saint that agrees with you on everything (I laughed a little writing that), it's if she able and willing to be molded by a man. To me, looking back on my relationship, that is the key test during dating and even engagement. By default, if you like each other, you'll typically agree on most things, but it's his willingness to enforce his headship and her willingness to yield to it that tend to make it a good marriage or not.

You are correct. There is more to dissect within these thoughts.

RPA

Thu, Dec 9, 2021, 1:32 PM: deti to RPA

This is good stuff, RPA.

Some quick thoughts.

1. Most of us men aren't good at sniffing out women with potential because we're not taught how to.
2. It is a LOT of work to mold and shape a woman and a lot of us men don't have the patience for it.
3. No, I don't think the woman 'hurt by feminism' is softened. She's been hardened. She has to let God, or experience, soften her. Or, in some cases, like Mrs. deti's, break her.
4. A lot of women are broken and damaged. Not just softened. If she's broken and damaged, there has to be repair and healing first. A lot of men are dealing with broken women. Mrs. deti was broken. Mrs. Apostle was broken, but not to Mrs. deti's extent.

deti

Thu, Dec 9, 2021, 4:58 PM: RPA to deti

deti,

1. 1000 x YES! Teaching our sons how to identify the character traits of a virtuous woman, that is moldable, is one of the most important duties for us as fathers. In your case, guiding your daughter to be moldable is included in your mission.
2. Too many men have neither the patience nor the intestinal fortitude to do this, because once you are married you are playing with real money. I'd say that molding a wife is much like breaking a mustang. There's commotion, running, kicking, and lots of danger, but once the horse knows that you, the bridle, and saddle aren't going anywhere no matter what it does, you end up with a pretty good companion that generally does what you want it to do.
3. Mrs. Apostle broke too, with way more effort, but for very similar reasons as Mrs. deti. Thinking about this further, it might have to be the man that softens or breaks the woman during dating/engagement. This is what laying out the expectations for behavior will do. She's in or out. She yields her will to his or she doesn't.

4. As people, we are all broken to some extent. The question is more of identifying the areas of the damage and then dealing with those well. Every broken aspect of a person is an opportunity to work and come out the other side with a stronger relationship. The key is identifying the type of broken God gave you the gifts to deal with. Me, I can grind things out with the patience of Job. Doing this just doesn't bother me while this approach can drive other men nuts. Mrs. Apostle is stubborn and headstrong! Her dad told me this when I asked him for permission to marry her. By God's grace, what I was naturally good at matched up with what she needed fixing and we've both been worked on by God in the process.

I think we should present this conversation as a post to Jack with the names and mild profanity edited out. I'd call it "2 Old Farts Talking About Their Wives".

RPA

Epilogue

If a man is to wait until he can find the perfect wife, he may never marry because the Proverbs 31 wife is exceedingly rare. What does seem to exist is a wife who can be molded (a process leading to sanctification) into an actual submissive wife — something most of the men would think is a woman that does not exist for them. They key in selection is in identifying a woman's overall potential as a wife. Of course, a man needs to develop himself and weigh the benefits and risks, but he also needs to be proactive and exercise discernment, wisdom, and whatever charisma he's been granted.

2021 Winter Hibernation

Stay strong and Merry Christmas!

Readership: All; Christians; Young Men;
Theme (December): Giving the gift of yourself to others.
Length: 1,100 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes + 2:12 minute video

This is the last post for 2021. The first half will summarize the highlights of this month's theme of giving the gift of yourself to others. The last part is a brief summary of the year and a valediction.

Summary of December Posts

Deti smacked us in the face with the Kevlar glove of reality in his post, Deti's Advice to Underqualified Men (2021-12-08). The main point was to identify your sphere of influence and be selective. This hearkens back to the importance of Identifying Your Spiritual Domain (2021-12-01). It's all part and parcel of the same important challenge that all men face. The latter post linked to several posts from Ed Hurst, partly because of the complexity, and partly because he's described it better than I could. In spite of the time required to read these posts and do the necessary self-examination and introspection, these posts are a must read for all Christian men.

The main point of Kumbaya (2021-12-) was the importance of humility, worship, passion, and music in a small group setting. BTW, this is also the spirit of the Christmas Season. Silence (2021-12-17) was the flip side of the coin, compared to Kumbaya. Both of these posts turned out to be rather unpopular. The first because of the cultural association of Kumbaya with Hippies, Boomers, and/or their music and political stances. The second because of the mystical approach to the ironies and sufferings of the faith. I challenge readers to look beyond their own comfort zone biases and recognize that a spirit of humility and worship, both in joy and in sufferings, will always be central to faith and human flourishing, and that one will miss out on the most memorable moments of life — and love itself — if one rejects this. For those readers who have an aversion to Kumbaya, Cheque d'Out shared this delightful carol at Spawny's Space that carries the same simplistic worshipful joy. In these times, we need more of this spirit, if only to annoy the wokers.

Ding Dong Merrily On High / The Mediaeval Baebes (2014-11-14) Length: 2:12

Social Authenticity Proof: Giving Women Attention (2021-12-10) was a fun review of reader's emails which told their experiences of exercising charisma around the ladies. From this review, we saw how good and how challenging it is to do something as simple and natural as giving women attention. This viewpoint was balanced by another post, Not Trusting women is Deep Inner Game (2021-12-15), which examined the pitfall of trusting women without reservations. Hence, the concomitant Σ Maxim.

Σ Maxim 19: "Do not invest attention, time, energy, or resources into any woman who is not within your domain and under your authority."

Under the latter post, deti commented,

> "This, to me, is almost Peak Red Pill – reaching bedrock. Drilling down so far there's nothing further to drill down into. You've mined the seam clean; there is nothing more to be obtained, no further wisdom to be found."

Deti's conclusion links directly to a Σ Axiom.

Σ Axiom 20: The proper management of Trust is the central pillar of holding Frame.

Yes, Trust and Faith are the core issues underlying all things social, sexual, and spiritual. I've been kicking around the topic of trust for a good three years now, but there are still a multitude of nuances in which we have yet to reach the bottom. RPA has shared some further insights with me about this, so we'll pick this up again next year.

Red Pill Apostle churned out three excellent posts this month, plus some good ideas for a few more.

- Σ Frame: Developing Masculinity (2021-12-06)
- Σ Frame: Dating in the Lion's Den: Relying on Faith when the options are daunting (2021-12-13)
- Σ Frame: 2 Old Farts Talking About Their Wives (2021-12-20)

RPA continually highlights the importance of faith and of male friendships. Men would do infinitely better with women if we put women on the back burner and focused on building competitive partnerships/comraderie with other men. This has at least two immediate benefits.

1. It helps us develop a "detached" psychological outlook with respect to women.
2. It improves our standing with other men.

Both are perceived as attractive to both God and women.

Oscar mentioned this in a comment a while back.

> "If women are attracted to men that other men respect it's because those men have high status and/or socially dominant personality."
> "Agreed, but men also respect each other for other reasons. For example, integrity, loyalty, reliability, and competence."
> "Women may not necessarily find those traits inherently attractive, but women do find men attractive when other men show them respect, because that is a form of status."
> "Obviously, that kind of thing can only happen within a community. Women need to see the respect conferred onto a man in real life for it to have an effect on her attraction to him. That is yet another reason why being part of a community is so important."

The main point of a previous post, Avoiding the Broken Window Effect (2021-07-21), was that men crapping on other men for being unattractive to women is a sin. I want to commend Red Pill Apostle for his efforts in writing posts that have moved the general attitude of the Christian Manosphere away from this perspective and towards a more generous and constructive approach to men, women, and God.

Hibernation

I feel proud of myself for sticking to the schedule I set forth at the beginning of the year – one post every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, with two exceptions that were more than made up for by 28 additional posts!

Here, I would like to acknowledge the authors who contributed their talents and valuable insights in writing this year: NovaSeeker (28 posts), Scott (14 posts), Thedeti (9 posts), Red Pill Apostle (9 posts), Lexet (5 posts), Oscar (1 post), and RichardP (1 post). Thanks also to those readers who invested their thoughts, time, and energy to contribute to the scintillating discussions.

I'm going to take a reprieve for the rest of the year (two weeks). After the New Year rings in, we'll resume posting some more good stuff. The theme for January will be Marriage. Red Pill Apostle and I have some writings in the works on this topic. So tune in for more at that time.

I wish you all a joyful and memorable season with your friends and families!

Happy Holidays!

The Importance of Biblical Marriage

Red Pill Apostle · 3 January 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Headship is routinely ignored.

Readership: Christians
Theme: The Integrity and Fidelity of Marriage
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 4.5 minutes

Introduction

Not long ago, Mrs. RPA and I had a discussion which turned into an argument. It ended with her accusing me of treating her like a child before she stormed out of the room and slammed the door on her way out.

Why? Well, I spent the week putting together a bible study on wifely behavior, roles, and authority in the family, before talking with her about the argument to set expectations moving forward. This endeavor took up a good bit of my time.

It seems like whenever you make a move in the right direction, you can expect to be met with resistance, and from those closest to you, no less. The irony is not lost on me either.

I've noticed that a lot of what Deti, Jack, and Scott have written about in the past has come out of their own experiences with marriage. I am getting to that point myself lately.

The Mental Load of a Sexless Marriage

One of the first sites I found on sexless marriage was Feminist Comrade Gregoire's. Yeah her, so you never know how God is going to steer you through life, even using a woman who horribly twists scripture to fit cultural norms to guide others to a better understanding. Since then, I've made a habit of reading Comrade Gregoire's manifestos at her site, To Love Honor and Vacuum, and the comments too. I use her rubber-band-aid theology as a training ground for detecting doctrinal sleight of hand and to ground myself further in scripture. One of her common topics she refers to is the "mental load" of being a wife and mother, which is usually followed by a list of how men can make their lives better by taking some of the burden off their wives and adulating them instead. What often follows in the comments is a man who dares to tell them, and I'll paraphrase here, "Welcome to adulting!" (assuming she allows the comment) followed by more clucking than when a fox is in the henhouse.

That is when it hit me why Gregoire's "mental load" argument is so ridiculous to me. The burden of headship in marriage is great. The responsibilities of it weigh on the heart, soul, and mind, even when the home is peaceful. When the home is not peaceful (often because of the wife's antics), that burden is amplified 10-fold as you pull the weight of your own responsibility and also pull the weight of trying to enforce what is right.

And yet, many men think it is preferable to avoid this burden of Headship authority by passing these duties and responsibilities off to the wife and then taking the easier role of relieving her "mental burden", as Gregoire teaches. So in the final analysis, men will still jump onto the feminist bandwagon as an assumed! When you consider how feminism and marriage are both such lousy bets for men these days, this makes me question the sanity of the average man!

We cannot neglect Headship!

It seems like too many readers missed the underlying point of Jack's series on masculinity — that a sanctified marriage is one in which a husband should be able to completely trust his wife. Most readers either did not get this point, or could not accept this as being true. A lot of people went so far as to assume that he was saying that a man should trust his wife regardless of her trustworthiness, or that only weak men do this.

I see this difference in perspective as being responsible for one of the major schisms between readers in the Christian Manosphere. That is, some see the goal of attaining a sanctified marriage as hopeless (lastmod) or futile (Adam Piggott), while others are drawn to the feminist "sales pitch" of the "strong independent woman" as a submissive "helper", or to put it more rudely, "a woman who will cook, clean, and F, and then go away". From a more generous and spiritualized perspective, men are attracted to the inherent blessings of a sanctified marriage, but men do not seem to be aware that only Headship can produce this result, nor are they realistic about how to make that happen (aside from those few who have actually done it, by hook or by crook).

One of the reasons I enjoy reading Σ Frame is because it is one of the few Red Pill blogs that represents Biblical marriage as being important. It's God's design for us as people, the building block of the church, and when widely practiced a stable society is the result. I urge readers to go read Kirk Durston's post about how sexual immorality destroys a culture within 3 generations. According to Unwin's theory (described in Kirk's post), we are 2 generations into the process.

The "good" information on marriage is essential. I was not taught any of this and you can see the effects of my ignorance play out in painful detail in my comments. While I have learned things from my wife, it is not the preferred method of acquiring knowledge. I am still figuring what works and what doesn't with my wife, and there are times like I described in the introduction when I contemplate what life would be like if I had stayed single, but there is certainly knowledge that is post worthy, especially from the standpoint of learning from my mistakes.

I like to write posts, time permitting, because I have the feeling that the topic of Headship and Marriage from a Red Pill perspective could be a dissertation that could easily go 400+ pages. As tertiary education stands right now, no one would be allowed to write such a dissertation, and defending it may actually mean literally defending the dissertation with physical blows or weapons as the feminists come further unhinged. While I'm not interested in all that, this could yield months of posts.

Our Mission as Men

Many past RP authors have described intersexual dynamics through the lens of economic theory. At its lowest common denominator, this approach is the study of billions of individual choices made in sea of incentives, each of which could be experienced by the chooser in different ways. Due to the impossibility of analyzing each choice, economists look at the aggregate trends, which is what Dalrock tried to do and did better than anyone else to date. But then, because we are dealing with marriage, which is God's foundational building block of society, the study will necessarily splinter into the additional fields of sociology, history, finance, psychology, marriage and family therapy, politics, medicine, law, theology … (you get the idea).

For the purpose of full disclosure, my views will come from a belief in God's sovereignty, His control over and sustaining of creation, and that He has chosen who are His. These beliefs color my thinking in all areas of life. My arrival at this conclusion was after years of being a staunch supporter of the Armenian viewpoint. Accepting God's sovereignty and then dealing with the difficult logic of human culpability for sin, given that sovereignty, follows scripture more closely than the logic needed to rationalize God's sovereignty, along with his perfection and omniscience, and somehow allowing people to choose Him and as such be culpable for our sin. I know that is not the view of all who comment on Sigma Frame, and while my convictions run deep, it does not bother me all that much that others disagree on this point.

As a final word of encouragement, I think our writings are important because marriage as an institution has fallen apart, and there just isn't any "good" information available out there. We need to share our testimonies to help others who have or who desire a Christian marriage characterized by Headship.

History

I started blogging on March 7, 2008, using Blogger as my blog platform. On September 27, 2017, I transferred the best of my blog writings from Blogger to WordPress, and began concentrating on Red Pill topics. I received more views on WordPress in the first two months, than I had on Blogger in the previous 8 years.

Goals and Purposes

The goals and purposes of this blog are summed up in the About page. In addition, I value easily readable, and high content quality posts that stand the test of time – writings that would be of value to readers even decades from now.

Methods

I've had a habit to pray frequently about the purpose of this blog and the content of individual posts — what I should write about, and what men need to read and know. I've always had the conviction that my testimony, my life experiences, and the things I've learned are valuable to other men, and that it's important for me to share these things for the benefit of others. As time went on, I recognized that other men had these same convictions and I invited them to join me in this work.

Content

In 2017, I was new to the sphere, so the posts summarized some of the basics I had learned. 2018 embarked on specific themes, using topics and citations from other articles. In 2019, I started introducing more epiphanies from my private journal and my life experiences. In 2020, the traffic and comments took a significant upswing. During 2021, the comments increased four-fold from the previous year. There was much more feedback through comments and private email correspondence, so I focused more on investigating the topics brought up and discussed through these venues.

Under the 2019 Performance Report that was posted at the beginning of 2020, Adam Piggott gave me this advice for posting.

> "Post more often, you will get more traffic. If people know that they can get something from you every day, then they come back a lot more often. I've also found that the magic number of words for a post is about 700. That's what people can handle in this day and age."

I decided to experiment with writing shorter, more frequent posts, and I made a goal of posting three times a week at the same time. Within a few weeks, I settled into posting on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays (although I could never trim the posts down to be less than 700 words). I continued this habit for 2021.

Author's Panel

In 2019, I began to pray for other men to join this endeavor and the Lord has answered this prayer with exceeding benevolence. Lexet teamed up with me in 2019. Scott and NovaSeeker joined the writing panel in 2020. This year, four others joined us in contributing their talents and valuable insights in writing. In summary, the authors for 2021 included Jack (112 posts), NovaSeeker (28 posts), Scott (14 posts), Thedeti (9 posts), Red Pill Apostle (9 posts), Lexet (5 posts), Oscar (1 post), and RichardP (1 post). We are especially grateful to have NovaSeeker, Thedeti, and Scott's input, as all three of these men have been heavy-hitting contributors to the Manosphere ever since its inception over a decade ago, and have never failed to churn out riveting new insights, many of which are now staple topics of discussion. A special mention goes to Ed Hurst (author of Radix Fidem). Although he has not written any posts for Σ Frame, his close interaction with me through email has imparted foundational spiritual insights which have contributed to my own spiritual maturity and this has spilled over into many posts. Thanks also to all the readers who have invested their thoughts, time, and energy to contribute to the scintillating discussions.

Projects

The writing projects in 2021 were arranged in monthly themes:

1. January – The Online Amateur Sex Industry and Socialization (OASIS)
2. February – The Winter of Discontent (focusing on the dismal state of marriage and the mating market)
3. March – The Christian Conundrum (focusing on conundrums and dilemmas in the mating market)
4. April – The Inspiration of Beauty and Nature
5. May – Life Scripts
6. June – Patriarchy, Masculinity, and Maturity
7. July – Market Forces
8. August – Snickerdoodles (Case studies of female failures)
9. September – The Maturity of Faith
10. October – Gnosticism

11. November – Agency, Incentive, and Motivation (AIM)
12. December – Giving the gift of yourself to others

Gauging by the numbers of views and comments, February, March, May, and August had the most popular themes.

Having a monthly theme proved to be beneficial to both the writing process and the resulting discussions, so we'll continue this habit for 2022.

There are three long running projects that have become a regular staple on Σ Frame.

1. Archetypes, especially Headship and the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy.
2. Courtship Models, e.g. Scott's Axiom.
3. Discipline in Marriage

In addition, Jack wrote 3 posts at Spawny's Space this year.

The most views in one day:

NovaSeeker kicked the new year off to a fast start with his post, The Rise of the Amateur Sex Industry (2021 January 4). The following day, 2021 January 5, we had 975 views from 200 visitors, and NovaSeeker's post received 133 comments within the first two days.

But NovaSeeker went on to surpass his earlier achievement with The Lopsided Liberalized Mating Market (2021-02-17), the same post cited in two categories above as having the most views and the most comments of the year. The following day, 2021 February 18, Σ Frame had 1,882 views — the most views ever in one day!

These two days had the highest number of views in 2021.

The top five countries with the most viewers:

This year, Australia superseded the UK for third place, and New Zealand bumped India off the top five. Figures in parentheses indicate the change from the previous year.

1. United States: 193,696 (+88%)
2. Canada: 10,368 (+12.5%)
3. Australia: 6,664 (+16.9%)
4. United Kingdom: 5,792 (-29.7%)
5. New Zealand: 3,618 (+107.9%)

Total number of viewing countries/principalities in 2021: 170 (-20.2%)

Note 1: All of these countries are democratic, capitalistic societies that are being smothered by post-modern, feministic social ideologies.
Note 2: It is interesting to note that the change from the previous year corresponds to the changes in the sociopolitical climate in that country. Countries with the largest increase (U.S., Australia, and New Zealand) are countries with significant sociopolitical unrest. The Red Pill is the medicine for pain. Interesting how that works.

Leading search engine terms arriving at Σ Frame:

In past years, the majority of search terms included the words, “wife”, “discipline”, and “jealous”. This year, “jealousy” has vastly overshadowed all other search terms, while “wife” and “marriage” have almost disappeared. So the top three search terms are generalized as follows.

1. A solid majority of all search terms used a variation of the word “jealous”.
2. Some variant of “sigma male”, “sigmaframe”, “sigma frame blog”, etc. (Not surprising.)
3. Titles of specific posts.

Concerning number 3, judging by the titles, the most searched-for posts are broken down in this order.

1. The Trust Factor (2019-04-18)
2. 2 Frames of Reference for Identifying the Trust Factor (2019-04-23)
3. Confession vs. Profession (2009-10-02)
4. Wisdom, Spiritual Efficiency, and Flow (2018-01-26)
5. List of Slut Tells (2017-10-15)
6. Discipline in Marriage (Page)

Funny or Odd search terms which have led people to Σ Frame:

The 2021 search terms were much less interesting than in previous years, so this list is short.

1. The art of mind reading
2. swiper swipes dora’s virginity

Non-English search terms which have led people to Σ Frame:

1. фибоначчи портрет (Translation: Fibonacci portrait)
2. в азии внучата груднички сосут у своей бабули сиську (Translation: In Asia, baby grandchildren suck their granny's boob)

The Mystery of Marriage

Father Spyridon offers insights to the beauty and gravity of marriage.

Readership: All;
Theme: The Integrity and Fidelity of Marriage
Length: 1,200 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes + 6:26 minute video

Introduction

A few of our blog cohorts are Orthodox, including NovaSeeker and Scott, and I know many readers are Orthodox as well. Through coauthoring posts together, and through our correspondence in private emails, I've found that Orthodoxy includes many teachings that are entirely absent in the Protestant church I was raised in, most notably an explanation of the mystical experience of being a Christian. So over the past year, I have taken a dedicated interest in Orthodox theology.

The content producer of the following video, Father Spyridon, is an Eastern Orthodox priest. His mini-sermon videos are absolutely beautiful. He wears his priestly garments while standing in the woods, and his elocution is filled with great inspiration, diction, and clarity. Birds, animals, and the rustling of leaves can be heard in the background. I have gotten into the habit of listening to one of his talks every day.

This mini sermon is about the mystery of marriage, which fits into our theme this month. In it, Father Spyridon gives us a riveting message about the profound beauty and eternal gravity of marriage.

Father Spyridon: The Mystery of Marriage (2021-05-20)

Full Text of the Mini Sermon

St. Basil the Great says to us, "It is natural to marry, but as Christians, we are called beyond what is natural."

Beyond!

And here, he is not just talking about the monastic life, for to be married requires as much dedication, and involves as much struggle, as the monastic life.

It takes dedication to be married. Because when two people get married, God creates what we call a small church. They become, the family, a small church.

It is a miraculous thing. And it requires that those members of the family live out their Christian relationships.

St. Paul says, "Husbands must love their wives even as Christ has loved the Church."

Christ laid down his life. Husbands are called to put their wives before their own very lives. And of course, both are called to faithfulness. A faithfulness that is more than just not committing adultery. A faithfulness that is placing their husband or wife before all else in the world. Before wealth, work, even their larger extended family.

Placing their spouse first in their heart after God.

A Greek Orthodox wedding

In that marvelous book, Every Day Saints, there is the story of a monk who goes to an elder and says, "How do you know what progress a monk is making in the spiritual life?"

And the elder says, "When I see two brothers who've fallen out, that have argued, the one who is the first to seek the other's forgiveness, I recognize is making greater spiritual progress."

And so it is too in our married lives. We are not there to score points or to win arguments. We must always be the first to rush to seek forgiveness of our husband or wife. To confess that we were at fault, and before judging the other.

A marriage is one of the great mysteries of the church, or sacraments.

It is not simply a contract. In the west, the couple make vows to each other. They enter into a contract. But in Orthodoxy, it is one of the great Mysteries of the Church.

And not like all the mysteries, it is a means of receiving God's grace, God's power.

And as a mystery like all the mysteries, it is given to us by God for our salvation. This is its first and most important purpose.

In the west, the theology took on an understanding of marriage, first and foremost, as a means of bearing children.

Not in Orthodoxy. First and foremost, marriage is there for our salvation. And not just our own salvation. When we marry, we take on a responsibility for the salvation of our husband or wife – a judgment. We will be questioned; we will be judged to the extent we have helped or hindered the salvation of our spouse.

We must take this seriously.

This is the union that we are entering into with this other human being. We grow to not only know the other person completely, but also our self. This mystery may reveal to us the depths of our self that we had no idea about.

And, part of the cross that we carry when we get married is not only the truth, the truth of our husband or wife, but also the truth of our self that we discover in that other person, and through that other person.

This is the great mystery of marriage as we become one flesh.

An Antiochian Orthodox wedding

And, in a world that is increasingly not only alien to the Christian faith, but hostile, for those of us trying to live out our Orthodox Christian faith, we must make the foundation of our lives, first the church, and then the home.

> "Happiness can only be achieved by looking inward and learning to enjoy whatever life has and this requires transforming greed into gratitude."
> St. John Chrysostom

> "The love of husband and wife is the force that welds society together. Men will take up arms and even sacrifice their lives for the sake of this love."
> St. John Chrysostom

> "Marriage is more than human; it is a miniature kingdom, which is the little house of the Lord."
> St. Clement of Alexandria

> "If a man and a woman marry in order to be companions on the journey from earth to heaven, then their union will bring great joy to themselves and to others."

> St. John Chrysostom

> "Married life, no less than the life of a monk, is a special vocation, requiring a particular gift or charisma from the Holy Spirit; and this gift is conferred in the sacrament of Holy Matrimony."
> Bishop Kallistos Ware

Concluding Statements

Father Spyridon has presented to us, not only a description of an ideal marriage, but marriage as a sacramental covenant – a mystery to be revealed within ourselves, and to be lived out in the expression of our lives. Of note, Father Spyridon says the married person is responsible for the salvation of their husband or wife. That's pretty heavy, and something for us to think about.

Red Pilled readers may be quick to jump on this, and certain other statements made by Father Spyridon as being unrealistic, or impractical, and so I challenge readers to square the relevant Red Pill tenets with the mystery of marriage as presented by Father Spyridon.

The truth of the matter does not waiver before the seething demands of disobedient wives, nor husband's inability to properly manage their instances of rebellion.

As Father Spyridon says, we must take this seriously.

Towards a more complete appreciation of Sanctification

Jack · 10 January 2022 · Archived copy · Original

"This is my husband." "This is my wife." "Til death do us part." …and grateful for it all!

Readership: Christians;
Theme: The Integrity and Fidelity of Marriage

Introduction

The dictionary is useful for defining words clearly for the purpose of forming simple arguments, but in some cases, the dictionary is inadequate. Secular English language dictionaries can't give us an accurate account of words like consecration, covenant, defilement, iniquity, sanctification, shalom, transgression, and others. So we cannot rely on a secular dictionary to fully explain the spiritual nuances of these concepts. Even many descriptions of these terms from religious sources are confusing and/or don't give us the full flavor.

This is why I often go to the trouble to explore the meanings of such words on Σ Frame. This blog often dives into spiritual concepts that are poorly understood (even by Christians) and hard to define. For example,

- What does Forgiveness involve?
- What is the nature of Thankfulness?
- What is discernment and why is it important?
- What is a Curse?
- What is Shalom?
- What is God's Concept of Justice?
- Defilement and the state of being unclean were terms that were on the threshold of becoming archaic until I examined these ideas about 3 years ago and then applied them to some common examples, such as the Alpha Widow Syndrome, h0m0sexuality, sexual humility, and the Blue Pill mindset. Now, it is not unusual to see these descriptors being used.
- If a contract and a covenant are the same thing, then why would we have different words for it? It's because they're not the same thing.
- What about concepts like sin, iniquity, and transgression? If they're all the same thing, then why do we need three words? It's because they're not the same thing.
- Now, Love is one concept that has gotten some traction in Protestant teachings. It is recognized that there are four different kinds of love in Greek. But in English, there is only one word.

Likewise, sanctification is another one of those words that is occasionally bandied about in religious circles. We see a lot of scriptural references to sanctification, but I don't think most people, even most Christians, know what it really means.

This famous quote from Russell M. Nelson is poorly worded. It should say, "Husband and wife are sanctified when their marriage is cherished and honored in holiness. That union is not merely established by husband and wife; it conforms to a covenant with God." Read on to learn why. Nelson is president of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

What is Sanctification?

Sanctification is often taken to be a quality (e.g. a "sanctified marriage", as given in the quote above), but it is not. It is a state characterized by contentment, inner peace, spiritual security, and shalom. It can also be described as a state of ownership, possession, or having a dedicated purpose, in which case, it is referring to an overarching covenantal covering.

To offer a trivial, but easily relateable example, the toothbrushes in my bathroom are sanctified in the sense that they each have a specific owner or purpose. The grey Oral B toothbrush belongs to me. The red one belongs to my wife. The white one is used for scrubbing the details on the chrome fixtures. As it is, we are content to have our own toothbrushes and we can brush our teeth with confidence every day. We also have a toothbrush to keep the bathroom looking spic and span. All of this gives us a degree of contentment and inner peace – but only as long as everyone respects the sanctity of all the toothbrushes. If my wife uses my toothbrush to clean the drain, then even though its qualities may remain physically unchanged, it still becomes defiled to me, and it is then relegated to a new status of being sanctified as the new scrub brush. I will be offended by her transgression, but I can forgive her by buying a new toothbrush to be sanctified unto myself.

When the Bible calls an object, location, or person sanctified, it is not referring to a quality. It means it has a unique identity that renders it separate, distinct, or "holy", meaning that it belongs to God's personal domain and should be revered as such.

The word consecrated means the willful act of setting someone or something apart for God's purposes or a special use.

There are many examples in Scripture.

- Exodus 19:23 talks about consecrating Mt. Sinai.

- Exodus 20:8 tells us to remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy.
- In Leviticus 20:7–8), God commands the Israelites to consecrate themselves to be sanctified (owned) by Him.
- In Matthew 6:9, Jesus teaches us to begin our prayers by first declaring God's name as holy.
- In Matthew 23:16-22, Jesus describes how the temple is what makes the gold and gifts therein sanctified.
- Christians are (or should be) sanctified unto God and unto their spouses if married. (Ephesians 5:22-33).

These candlesticks are not sanctified in their present location, but if these same candlesticks are placed on the altar table at the front of the church sanctuary, worshippers will regard them as holy and revere them as such. They become sanctified because they are identified as objects that contribute to the glory of God in the sanctuary.

Sanctification in Marriage

When the Bible talks about husbands sanctifying their wives and vice versa (c.f. 1 Corinthians 7:14; Ephesians 5:25-27), it refers to a possession or ownership of one's spouse such that contentment, inner peace, spiritual security, and shalom are a daily reality. Headship is assumed, as this is the only relational structure that can yield these fruits within God's covenant of marriage.

Being part of a covenant relationship (i.e. marriage) provides the context for sanctification, and sex is a vital contributor towards sanctification by being the sacrament in which that covenant is perpetually renewed.

The institution of marriage and the act of sex are not necessarily sanctified in and of themselves, as these are merely features, or vectors of sanctification. God Himself does the work of sanctification, but there is much we can do to facilitate this process by aligning our hearts and our behaviors with the directives outlined in His covenant. If you believe that "love sanctifies marriage" or "marriage sanctifies sex" or some other such permutation, then look around and you will find plenty of examples of both marriage and sex that are not sanctified, even among Christians, and this is largely because they neglect Headship and carry habits and expectations that are contrary to God's covenantal order.

For example, there are millions of men and women in the world. But if a man, John, marries a woman, Sally, then John and Sally take on the unique identity of being husband and wife. They now belong to each other — and to no other — according to the marriage covenant. Even if Sally were to divorce John, she will henceforth be John's ex-wife*, because her identity as John's wife can never be rescinded. Likewise, John will be Sally's ex-husband*.

If John and Sally only have sexual relations but do not enter into a properly binding marriage, they have still eternally and irrevocably joined their souls together in the spiritual dimension. If they break up and marry others, then similar to the toothbrush analogy, John and Sally are defiled from the perspective of their new spouses and they have defrauded them out of some measure of the contentment, inner peace, spiritual security, and shalom that is foundational for sanctification in a covenant marriage.

This "prego mf queen" is (or was) sanctified unto her baby daddy. Defiled unto all other men. If she picks up a sex partner with this Tinder profile, then she'll be defiled unto baby daddy as well.

Epilogue: A more complete concept of Sanctification

To go a step further in constructing a better conceptualization of sanctification, consider the following.

1. Sanctification is a state of belonging, contentment, inner peace, spiritual security, and shalom that is dependent on the context of a covenant (i.e. being uniquely identified with Christ, married to a spouse, or as a mother, etc.)
2. It is PEOPLE who experience a state of sanctification. So we cannot speak of the institution of contractual marriage or the generalized act of sex as being sanctified or not.
3. Many things contribute towards sanctification, including consecration, commitment, marriage, self-sacrificial love, romantic love, passionate sex, having children, and many others.
4. The things that contribute towards one's sanctification are also the same things that can contribute to one's defilement within an improper context, i.e. outside the boundaries of a covenant. For example, sex sanctifies a wife to her husband, but if she were to have sex with another man, then this act of sex would make her defiled. A woman bearing a child would sanctify her in the context of her marriage to the father of the child, but having a child out of wedlock renders her defiled in the eyes of other men seeking marriage.
5. Thus, sanctification (or defilement) is determined by the context within which sex, marriage, etc. occurs.
6. Being socially acceptable does not imply genuine spiritual sanctification (e.g. cohabitation, fornication, gay marriage, out of wedlock births, etc.). It is possible to be "sanctified" through engaging in a popular, acceptable sin, and this is often referred to as "living in sin." But from God's perspective, this is deemed as defilement.

These are important distinctions, because moral agency concerns the social dimension and one's abilities in navigating through the various contexts of life with the aid of faith, discernment, and wisdom. Whereas, sanctification describes a holy or redeemed state of being which carries natural, emotional, spiritual, and socio-sexual effects.

Wives reap what they sow

The opposite of submission is not necessarily rebellion, but a heart that is miserly with affection and grace.

Husbands have a long fuse, but once they blow up, they're gone!

Stephanie, the host of an older Femosphere blog that is now defunct, All Things Bright and Beautiful, wrote an excellent post entitled, "Don't Ruin Your Husband's Love Toward You" (2018 April 9) (Web archive here.) I have extracted sections of this post to be quoted below.

> ""…the reality of how we treat others is reflected back in how they end up treating us. Grace or not, Christian or not, I believe God often allows us to reap what we have sown into the hearts of others – our friends, our family members, our children, but especially our husbands.
> It's not usually talked about in our culture, especially in regard to how women treat their husbands. But the fact and spiritual principle of reaping and sowing, affects everything we do and everyone around us – whether we want to admit to it or not."
> "And I think we'd be wise to have a healthy fear of this. If we love our husbands, we must take into effect that this could be possible if we continue in sin against him, always believing that tomorrow is another chance, and yet never taking the measures to truly change for good."
> "…a wife can harm her husband's ability to love her so terribly, that it almost becomes impossible for him to feel the same feelings toward her as he once did. Keep in mind this doesn't usually happen within the first 10 years or so of marriage. I think it happens after a couple or more decades… it's a slow husband-love killer.

Σ Axiom 22 (AKA The Mob in the Crucible Effect, c.f. "frogs in the pot", or "crabs in the bucket"): We all influence those around us, for better or for worse. We are all subject to the decisions and actions of others, especially those in positions of power (including power players in the SMP). Thus, it is the will of God for us to act as responsible independent moral agents.

Case Study 1 – Jack's First Marriage

This is exactly what happened to me and my first wife. She would frequently get angry about things that she refused to talk about. About once every month or so, she threatened to get a divorce, and she would even pack a suitcase and leave the house for a few days or a week. Each time she did that, it made me worried and sad. But after she went on like this for about two years, I just couldn't take any more of her anger and drama, and something inside me just snapped. I stopped trusting her. I stopped believing that things would improve. Then, the next time she spoke of divorce and left, I actually felt glad that she was gone. When she came back a few days later, I felt so depressed.

After she pulled this stunt a couple more times, I realized how my emotional reaction to her behavior had changed, and then I knew in my heart that our marriage was truly hopeless and would soon be over. I finally started to believe all her talk about divorce, and I started seeing her threats as a legal liability. I felt like I had to face the facts, and deal with it. Sure enough, it wasn't long after that, she really did file for a divorce, and I was very glad to finally get her out of my life.

Looking back, I can't help but wonder how differently things might have turned out, if she had learned to settle down and enjoy married life, instead of using her anger to control everything, including me. Looking back, I can only conclude that she only viewed marriage as a tool to advance her own purposes, and not as an opportunity to enjoy life together with another person.

Case Study 2 – Leo and Sophiya Tolstoy

Stephanie quoted an excerpt from one of her favorite books on a woman's role in a godly marriage. It was about the relationship Leo Tolstoy had with his wife.

> "When a wife constantly pushes or nettles her husband, it is like the bite of a poisonous snake and can cause the destruction of a could-be holy marriage. One of the most tragic cases in history is that of the Russian novelist, Count Leo Tolstoi and his wife."

> “In the beginning of their marriage, Tolstoi and his wife were so blissfully happy that, kneeling together they prayed to God to continue the ecstasy that was theirs.
> Tolstoi is one of the most famous novelists of all time. Two of his masterpieces, War and Peace and Anna Karenina, are considered literary treasures. He was so admired by his people that they followed him around day and night and took down in shorthand every word he uttered.”

Leo Tolstoy

> “Although he was a man of wealth and fame, after studying the teachings of Jesus, he gave away his property, worked in the fields chopping wood, and pitching hay, made his own shoes, ate out of a wooden bowl, and tried to love his enemies. He gave away the publishing rights to his books and had the courage of his convictions to live a life he believed in.
> But his wife never accepted him or his simple philosophy of life. She loved luxury and he despised it. She craved fame and the esteem of society, but these things meant nothing to him. She longed for money and riches, but he thought these things a sin. For years she made every effort to change him and his views. She > screamed at him because he insisted on giving away the publishing right to his books. When he opposed her she threw herself into fits of hysteria, threatening to kill herself or jump down the well.

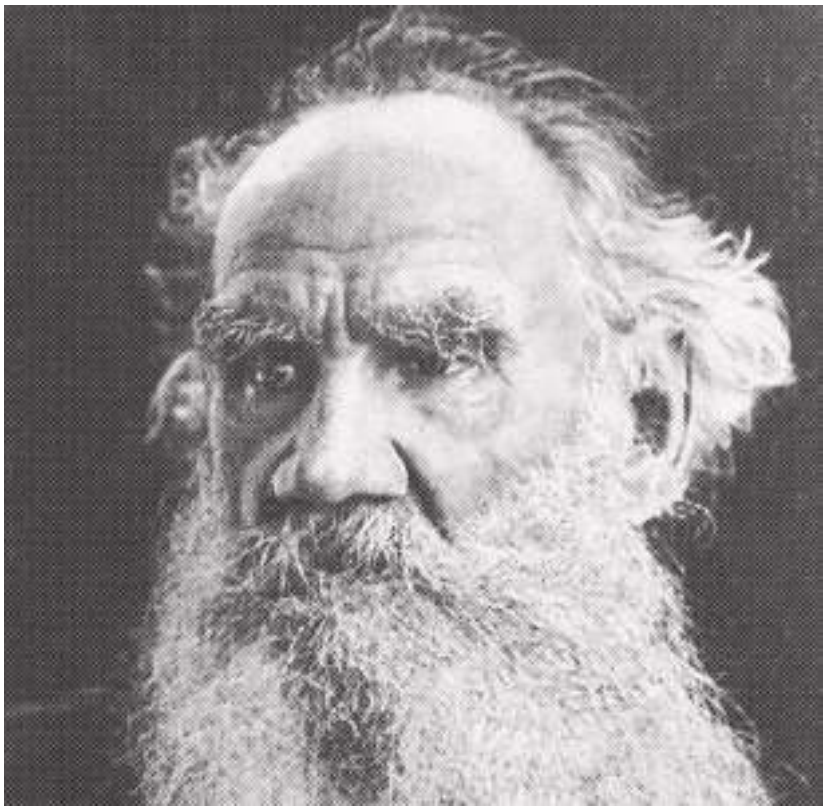
> After 48 years, this man who had adored his wife when he married her could hardly bear the sight of her. And one of the most tragic scenes as when Countess Tolstoi, heartbroken and old and starving for affection would kneel at her husband's feet and beg him to read aloud the exquisite love passages that he had written about her in his diary fifty years previously. And as he read of those beautiful happy days that were now gone forever, both of them wept."



Leo Tolstoy

> "His dying request was that she should not be permitted to come into his presence."

…which is a poignant way of saying, "Let me die in peace."

Case Study 3 – Too little, too late

Stephanie wrote the following commentary about this all to common tragedy.

> "When I was in a marriage group some time ago, I would see women like Tolstoi's wife come in fairly often – already usually a couple of decades into their marriage – and be desperately pleading with us on how they can turn everything around, all the while admitting that they've been treating their husbands horribly for the past few decades. […] Usually he had finally had enough, or reached some kind of "breaking point," and he wanted out. Or he had found another woman who treated him kind again – who admired him and loved him more than his wife seemed capable of."

It is sad that it has to come to this before wives are motivated to face the issue and do something in order to have a happier marriage.

Stephanie went on to explain how these women responded when they realized that the damage had already been done and that there was nothing left for them to do but to face the bitter consequences of the bitterness they had been sowing for decades.

> "It was usually apparent that it was already too late, but it was very interesting to watch these women go through psychological changes of first being extremely repentant and humbling themselves, eager to learn and read and practice trying to honor and respect him. I often had such great hopes for them that they were truly changing in their hearts. But when it didn't work (and often times the husband wouldn't believe their change was real or genuine), they would turn angry, they would get bitter, and then become very resentful even toward us as they believed our advice for happy marriages wasn't true.
> They would become indignant that their husbands' didn't accept their changes. I would see these women start suddenly claiming that their husbands had really "emotionally abused them," all this time, and that their (the wife's) sin was in submitting to them too much. Then they'd often blame sites like mine in creating women who submitted too much! It was… like I said… very interesting to watch psychologically. I talked about that here in this post a little."

So, when they saw that they would not avail of any mercy, that there would be no personal benefit to their repentance, then instead of grieving over their errors and losses and making the best of it, they totally backtracked and denied any wrongdoing on their behalf, even going so far as to blame their husbands and attack those who were telling them the truth and who were offering assistance.

> "Again, though, like in the Tolstoi example, this sort of behavior is actually tantamount to abusive in my opinion, toward the husband. It falls under the "Borderline" or "Cluster B" disorders, which are extremely hard to fix, never-mind how hard it would be to live with someone with those psychological disorders. A wife like this will usually never be able to admit she was verbally or emotionally abusive for years, until it's almost too late, but it's interesting how quick they are to act like they were the victim of emotional abuse, when just a few months before, they were admitting (finally) that they treated their husbands so terribly that they couldn't believe he put up with it for so long!"

D@mn solipsism!

Leo Tolstoy's wife, Sophiya, and their children.

Case Study 4 – Sabrina tries to Straddle the Feminist Fence

In the comments under Stephanie's post, Sabrina wrote the typical hypercognitive viewpoint of a Strong Independent Woman who is churched up enough to value the institution of marriage, but who is also converged enough to insist on seeing marriage as a partnership of equals and a zero sum game. She doesn't understand the beauty of submission and the peace of being under a husband's spiritual covering. She wrote,

> "[In Ephesians 5:21-24,] Paul is reminding wives to submit to their husbands, even though he is asking the husbands to submit to the wives as well. Paul wanted to make sure wives understood that this revolutionary idea wasn't changing their role as wives. He was asking for a change in the reason why. He was asking the wives to submit because they "want to", not because they have to. Paul was asking Christians to mutually submit to one another out of reverence for Christ. He was selfless and so should we be as well."
> "The interesting thing is when you look at the original Greek, the word submit isn't even in verse 22. It says, "wives to your husbands". The "submit" is implied because of verse 21. However, the Lord is asking for submission none the less. Husbands submit to your wives and wives submit to your husbands, in everything."
> "We've been conditioned to believe we are less than our men, but that simply isn't the case."

Red Pilled readers should know by now that it is a gross misinterpretation of scripture to conclude that the Bible says, "husbands should submit to their wives." It's also despicable and disrespectful, both to themselves and to God, for women to assume that godly submission implies that they are somehow less human than men.

Stephanie responded well to Sabrina's solipsistic self-deception.

> "Yes, I do think it's good for husbands to value their wives' opinions and to listen to them, that's not "submitting" to their wives though. Hopefully y'all can understand the huge difference between submitting to someone (doing what they want to do) and listening to their ideas and opinions and deciding if it makes more sense. And also, that's not what Tolstoi's wife was doing when she was throwing herself into hysterics and threatening to kill herself just because he wanted to live out his Christian convictions. Hopefully y'all can see that like I said in the post, that behavior is under the Cluster B and Borderline psychological disorders, and should never be used as a good method to get your husband to "listen" to you. Talking, sure, trying to persuade him, maybe… it all depends on how emotionally mature and respectful the wife is in the way she views her husband.
> Also, she was still supported financially, so it's not that he was sinning by refusing to take care of them. And he wasn't physically harming her either! She just had a craving for his wealth and fame and success and wanted more money from his books (which he felt convicted to give away)."

Woman's Mission: Companion of Manhood (1863), by George Elgar Hicks (1824-1914). Part of a 3 piece composition dedicated to a "Woman's Mission." Presented by David Barclay at the Tate Museum (1960). This painting was to depict a loving wife being her husband's companion. It was said that the woman in the paintings strongly resembled the artist's own wife. He honored her so much, and was so grateful for her companionship, that she became his artistic inspiration.

Having an unacceptable Influence makes a woman unacceptable

In his study of the factors of successful marriages, John Gottman concluded that it's very important for husbands to be "accepting of their wives' influence." Feminists are quick to interpret this as meaning that husbands should accept their wives demands and share the balance of power. (I also tend to believe Gottman himself was somewhat of a feminist, as most people of his generation are.) However, Gottman's research showed that active listening, compassion, gentleness, and physiological soothing between both the husband and wife were key ingredients that enable marriages to succeed. This lines up with the Biblical command for husbands to love their wives (Ephesians 5:25-33) and it hints at the reason why all believers should submit to one another in love (Ephesians 5:21).

If we consider the Biblical analogy of how the relationship between Christ and the church is similar to that of husbands and wives (also in Ephesians 5:25-33), this would imply that Christ/husbands have the authority, and should be accepting of the church's/wives' influence, and that the church/wives should submit to Christ/husbands in everything. This viewpoint seems to agree with scripture, but it also depends on what kind of influence they might have.

A husband's acceptance of his wife's influence could be considered a form of the mutual submission to all believers that Paul mentions in Ephesians 5:21, but it's quite different from submission in a hierarchical order within marriage which Paul succinctly emphasizes in verses 22-24.

Moreover, Sabrina's attempt to hijack and misappropriate the truth of the scriptures (case study 4) is an evasion from the overriding point of Stephanie's post — that there is no middle ground between wifely submission and being contentious. Sabrina's stance offers us an excellent example of how women will do mental backflips to justify their non-submission. Anything, it seems, is better than submission, even at the cost of their own sanctification.

Conclusions

As I described in Women have sex to influence men (2021-11-10), most secular women will use whatever means they can to make themselves socially relevant and to influence a man, and sex is at the top of the list. But unfortunately, we have many churchianized wives, like Sabrina, who have a dim view of sex, and are not content to merely be an influence in a man's life. The thing is, a woman's neglect or rejection of her role as an influencer (e.g. Sabrina) invariably erodes Headship authority and summarily presents itself as a negative influence in a man's life.

Σ Frame Maxim 25: A woman's neglect or rejection of her role as an influencer (as opposed to a more direct expression of control) invariably presents itself as an unacceptable influence in a man's life.

If this influence is so pernicious that it destroys a man's confidence, his domain of authority, his finances, his reputation, his progeny, yea, even his faith in God, then he may reach a point where he comes to weigh the cost-to-benefit ratio of retaining the presence of this influence, face up to his ability to cope with it, and decide whether to keep this woman (i.e. his wife) in his life or not. As Father Spyridon said, it becomes an issue of salvation/sanctification. In anticipation of readers' objections that this emphasis on soul-preservation is not a Christian way for a man to deal with his wife, I need to emphasize that this is not a conscious decision made of free will, but one that a man is forced into against his volition, as described in case studies 1 and 2 above. IOW, it is a natural consequence of what their wives have been sowing in their hearts over the years.

Corollary to Maxim 25: A woman who has a grossly unacceptable influence is unacceptable as a wife.

Wifely submission is absolutely necessary for a man to get any sense of satisfaction out of the union. Her submission is also necessary for the marriage to glorify God. If a woman is not being feminine and submissive enough to allow her husband to experience joy, peace, and contentment in the relationship (i.e. sanctification), then at some point, he's going to withdraw from her emotionally, and perhaps physically as well.

> "Can God redeem marriages like this? I believe He can do anything. But it's not the norm that these marriages are ever fully repaired, so it's best if you don't ever fall into this pattern, as it all could have been so easily avoidable from the beginning.
> And if anything, please remember Leo Tolstoi's bitter marriage, and be on guard against women like his wife who suddenly tried to twist the truth in the end, in an effort to destroy her husband's legacy and reputation."

The sad thing is that once 20+ years of a bad marriage are lost to the sands of time, this dynamic is unlikely to ever be reversed. As Stephanie said, "God often allows us to reap what we have sown into the hearts of others." It's difficult to argue against God's concept of justice.

What constitutes Adultery?

When sex is abused in such a way that the joy and intimacy of the sexual relationship is ruined between man and wife.

This post is about adultery, but instead of tackling the typical arguments about "sin", I'm going to build this argument by going back to the foundations of marriage.

The Purpose of Marriage

Marriage is supposed to serve a small number of very important purposes.

1. To glorify God. (Headship is necessary to do this, among other things.)
2. To serve as a vehicle of sanctification for the man and wife. (Headship and regular sex plays a central part of this, among other things.)
3. To hedge against sexual immorality.
4. To create the dominion of a family. (Again, Headship.)
5. To produce Godly offspring. (Not possible if all of the above are not in place, including Headship.)
6. To provide a safe harbor from the world.

An ideal marriage should fulfill all of these purposes. As far as I can see, the Catholic and Orthodox conditions for marriage serve to uphold these purposes.

The Conditions for Marriage

I stand with the Roman Catholic Church on the ontological definition of marriage. Ontologically, marriage requires four distinct elements:

1. There has to be a mental assent and agreement between man and woman, a "meeting of the minds" concerning their mutual intentions to be joined together inseparably.
2. There has to be a heart assent and agreement to engage in everything that marriage entails, physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually. In other words, they are both agreeing to the inclusion into the union of God, Who then completes the work and mystery of knitting them together.
3. There must be a public acknowledgment to the world of their mental and heart assent. This usually takes the form of some kind of public declaration each makes (e.g. in a wedding ceremony): "This is my husband." "This is my wife."
4. There must be a physical (and better if emotional) consummation in the form of sexual congress.

This definition of marriage never changes, and has been so since God joined Adam and Eve.

Other Notions of Marriage

Now, I want to point out that this concept of marriage is different from two other very common notions of marriage: (1) Legal Marriage, and (2) Sex = Marriage. I'll contrast the differences briefly here.

1. Legal Marriage

Legal marriage is only a legally recognized union between two individuals which grants the woman certain benefits, encumbers the man with certain burdens, and ostensibly creates obligations and rights for both, allegedly flowing both ways. Legal marriage is whatever the State says it is, and is ever changing. It's why legal marriage today is an arrangement in which women get everything and men get nothing; women have all the rights and men have all the burdens. In today's version of legal marriage, women need not do anything while men must do everything; women have all the authority and no responsibility while men have all the responsibility but no authority. We really don't have too many true marriages, or many of them don't start that way. Many marriages are legal marriages that eventually evolve into marriages, or end before they do. Most marriages include only the third and fourth ingredients, but never include the first or second.

2. Sex = Marriage

In a sense, this is true, as we typically regard those who are in a sexual relationship to be "off the market", and, as I will describe in the next section, sex is the central defining element of a marriage. However, this concept of marriage is quite distinct from the ontological definition of marriage, because it lacks certain elements of (1) and (2), i.e. their mutual intentions to be joined together inseparably, the inclusion into the union of God, and a faith-based commitment to remain loyal and true to one another.

So to me, and to most of us, the act of sex does not by itself mean you're married.

Now, you can have all kinds of sex with someone; but you ARE NOT married until all four of those conditions have happened with one other person.

So to those who might say, "if you've had sex, then you're married", well, I can get your drift, but I can't take such a marriage seriously, because without all four of these conditions, people just have sex or enter into relationships of varying duration and intensity.

Note 1: A common-law marriage is nothing more than the state's attempt to define cohabitation as a legal entity and thereby assign rights and responsibilities under the law.
Note 2: No Fault Divorce transforms marriage into an arrangement of convenience because it undercuts the sense of permanency offered by a life-time commitment. Jack has comically and accurately called this living arrangement, "playing house with a revolving door".

Sex is the sine qua non of marriage

Most people (especially Christian Manosphere men) believe that when someone in a committed relationship has sex with someone else, then that breaks all bargains, mostly because sex is the sine qua non of marriage. Christians especially identify sex and marriage as concomitant (or they should), simply because the Bible is very clear that sex should be contained within marriage.

In case you're not following me, let me break it down.

Sex is the only thing I can do with Mrs. deti that I am not permitted to do with anyone else. So if she evades or refuses having sex with me, it demonstrates that the one thing I get from her that I cannot get from anyone else has been taken away from me and I've been deprived of it. If in my marriage, I cannot get even sex from my wife, even the one thing I cannot get anywhere else, then I can rightfully consider myself to be no longer married. Here, I'm not necessarily referring to commitment or legal status, but it could. I'm saying that the marital relationship we had that once was is now broken and gone, and whatever relationship we have from thenceforth will be fundamentally different in a multitude of ways.

Jack once said something to the effect that if a husband and wife aren't screwing each other, then it's only a matter of time until one or both of them start screwing someone else — if they haven't already. In my opinion, a woman who refuses sex to her husband is cheating on him. She's depriving him unfairly of something that his marriage entitles him to, and that's sex. Wives — if you're not having sex with your husbands whenever they reasonably ask or expect it, then you are cheating on them!

Adultery is when the sine qua non of marriage is defiled

Similarly, if she has sex with someone else, I can rightfully consider that her having sex with another, and not with me, means she has left and abandoned the marriage, and has left and abandoned me. Again, I'm not necessarily referring to abandonment in the physical sense, although that may very well be the case. I'm saying that the bond we had that we once shared is now broken and gone, and whatever relationship we have from then on will be markedly different in many ways.

When I say the relationship will be different, we shouldn't fool ourselves into thinking that with a little love and forgiveness, it might somehow become better, "by the grace of God". No, that's not how God's grace works. Sooner or later the gavel of divine judgment will drop. There might be a rare exception, but not for most. The sexual bond is defiled, meaning that I can never again view her with the same abandoned passionate sexual interest that I once enjoyed. It gets worse. Every time I touch her or kiss her, I'll be fighting bitter memories and feelings of jealousy and anger. I will never find contentment and by extension, sanctification, with my wife. Marriage then becomes a spiritual battle that is fought daily, and daily lost. At worst, we're flirting with ɦəll fire.

Look at all the men who stumble onto the Manosphere after being shoved through the meat grinder of wife-initiated divorce. They think they're looking for P_ssy, but in fact, they're seeking the satisfaction of the sanctification they rightfully expected in marriage and were wrongfully defrauded of. That should give us an idea of how much sex is identified with marriage, as I described above. They're looking for God, and they don't even know it.

We cannot deny that sex is the sine qua non of marriage – an indispensable condition, element, or factor. It's something essential to the foundation of a marriage. You can't remove that piece of the puzzle. You can't change the equation and still get a real solution. No way. Nada.

What Constitutes Adultery?

So now let's talk about exactly what "adultery" is in terms of what "marriage" is.

"Adultery" is putting something into a substance, which "something" isn't supposed to be in there. That act impurifies and contaminates the substances. It's where we get our word "adulterated". If you put vinaigrette into milk, you've adulterated that milk. That vinaigrette isn't supposed to be in there. You've made the milk impure. You've contaminated it. It's good for nothing except to induce vomiting.

When you "marry" two things, you put them together such that two become one, each is indistinguishable from the other, they are inseparable, and you can no longer separate them. Or, at least you cannot separate them without ruining or destroying them both. When you "marry" a half-gallon of milk with another half-gallon of milk by pouring them both into a gallon container, you now cannot separate them. They've become one entity, one substance, one thing. The milk from the first half gallon is indistinguishable from the milk from the second. Two became one.

Now when we put this into the context of marriage, we see how insidious adultery is. Adultery ruins all 6 of the purposes for marriage outlined in the first section.

1. Instead of glorifying God, a sordid affair celebrates and glorifies sin. The marriage becomes the laughingstock of the town. Worse, it implicates and inspires others to commit adultery.
2. Instead of being a vehicle of sanctification for the man and wife, the marriage is now a source of anger, bitterness, distrust, jealousy, and other signets of perdition.
3. The hedge of spiritual protection is broken down as sexual immorality becomes a reality.
4. The family is placed in jeopardy, socially, emotionally, economically, and spiritually.
5. The children are much less likely to become Godly, and are more likely to engage in promiscuity themselves.
6. Instead of being a safe harbor from the world, the marriage becomes a daily battleground.

It also taints all 4 conditions for marriage listed in the second section.

1. The mental agreement about their mutual intentions to be joined together inseparably is jeopardized and placed in doubt.
2. The Heart Trust needed for mutual engagement is transformed into fraud and intransigence. It rejects God from the relationship and prevents Him from finishing the work and mystery of sanctification.
3. Their public acknowledgment to the world becomes as meaningless as their lack of commitment.
4. The physical, emotional, and sexual consummation in the form of sexual congress becomes permanently defiled, and thus, wholly unable to inspire joy and humility.

Notes on Terminology

1. Unmarried individuals cannot commit adultery. They fornicate, but they don't commit adultery.
2. Only married women can be adulterated.
3. Unmarried women having sex with unmarried men are fornicating.
4. An unmarried woman having sex with a married man is fornicating.
5. A married woman having sex with a man she is not married to commits adultery.
6. Men cannot be adulterated. Only women have things put into them during the act of intercourse (naturally, anyway).
7. A man can commit adultery but only by having sex with a woman married to another man.
8. A man fornicates with a never married woman.

Epilogue

Most of the time, all these arguments about fornication, marriage, adultery, and remarriage arise when someone wants to remarry, because humans in this situation will devote every ounce of their mental effort to come up with rationalizations to access sex.

The hardline Christian churches say, "OK, legal divorce, but in the eyes of the Church, you're still married. You're not free to remarry. You're not free to have sex with others. If you remarry legally, you're not married in the eyes of the church. If you have sex with anyone else, you're fornicating or committing adultery and you cannot do that." The Catholic church has been known to be excruciatingly exacting about this, dishing out excommunications as a consequence of divorce. But I'm not sure if this still happens as frequently as it used to.

The less ascetic Christian churches recognize that it's better for divorcees to remarry than for them to live the rest of their lives in rotating polygyny or serial polyandry. So they will allow remarriage. The Orthodox church allows remarriage twice.

The more liberal churches don't set much of any guidelines about divorce and remarriage, or at least they don't enforce them.

But regardless of how any particular church might deal with it, if any woman, once married to one man, then has sex with another man, even within a second marriage, it is technically adultery. Jesus said this very specifically, and there is no way around it. (See Matthew 5:31-32, 19:9; Mark 10:11-12; Luke 16:18; Romans 7:2-3.)

Definitions

First, I'll offer some definitions of Dread Game vs. Married Dread Game.

PUA Dread Game

The classical definition of PUA style Dread Game is acting on a mindset of outcome independence and considering alternative options.

PUA Dread Game is usually expressed in only one way.

- He gives the woman the idea that he's going to cheat on her or leave her. It doesn't really matter whether or not this is a real threat, it is effective as long as she believes it is.

The effect is that it humbles the woman by throwing her into an existential crisis concerning the relationship. It forces her into a decision to either make some action to preserve the relationship, or else fold and bow out. If she responds by cheating or even talking about cheating with serious intentions, then she is essentially bowing out.

Married Dread Game

The whole premise of Dread Game in a Christian marriage is leaving her behind as he pursues life and his God ordained purpose in life. She's welcome to come with him or else sit and wallow in whatever she's doing, but he's moving forward regardless.

> "This is what I mean, brothers: the appointed time has grown very short. From now on, let those who have wives live as though they had none…"
> 1 Corinthians 7:29 (ESV)

Married dread game can be expressed in many ways.

- Withdrawing attention. For most men, this is the primary go-to with immediately effective results.
- Disregarding his wife's demands and expectations, either stated or assumed.
- Refusing to respond to the wife's antics, even if that means walking out the door and staying away from home for a few hours if/when her behavior goes over the top.
- Refusing to let the wifeapotomus suck the joy out of his life anymore, because her contentious refusal to be obedient to scripture can do just that if he lets it.
- Enforcing interpersonal boundaries, defending boundaries of space and personal property, and setting limits on his time.
- Spending more time with male friends and/or pursuing masculine interests (e.g. hobbies, hunting, sports, etc.).
- Being himself with everyone. That means talking and joking with men and women both, like he did when he was single.
- Talking, flirting, teasing, and playing social games with other women.
- Getting in shape again, which tends to increase his SMV and attract more attention from other women.

Oscar noted that certain methods are ineffectual with certain women, such as withdrawing attention from a woman who never cares about looking her best for her husband. Also, wily wives will try to twist and coopt some of these methods to use against the husband, rather than take the lesson to heart. For example, if he flirts with other women, she'll accuse him of cheating. Or if he spends more time with his buddies or working on hobbies, then she'll accuse him of neglecting his family. However, wives are certainly not immune to the competitive aspect of mating, even after marriage. It's a part of human nature, as I described in the post, Sexual competition continues after marriage (2021-02-19). This is the reason why spouses often scoff at their partner's attempts to improve themselves – they don't want to look bad to others, they don't want to feel ashamed or embarrassed, they don't want the competition, and they don't want to be left behind.

Similarities

Both types of Dread Game have the following traits.

- The man is considered to be the prize and the woman should be grateful to have him.
- The man exerts frame by adopting a mindset that is both independent and outcome independent, and expresses this somehow.
- The way Dread Game is commonly expressed in both forms is that the man withdraws access to his time and his attention, and perhaps his resources as well, which are then redistributed elsewhere.
- It delivers a clear message that the woman is not in control, of neither the man nor the relationship.
- It imposes a clear choice to the partner: "My way or the highway!" This choice delivers an implied demand for the woman to either shape up or else lose out.
- The man has to come to the point where he is willing to lose the relationship, in the event that she chooses the highway. If the woman decides to end the marriage, that is her own decision, not that of the man's. But if she doesn't, then he can realize a much tighter grip of control over the relationship.
- At its root, Dread Game is a humbling wake-up call for the woman to recognize the value of having this man, and it's a siren call for her to be thankful for this blessing.

Σ Frame Maxim 27: Inducing humility and thankfulness alone can do wondrous miracles for a relationship.

Differences

Married Dread Game and PUA-style Dread Game are different in the following ways.

- Married Dread Game has a goal of achieving Headship, and thereby improving and stabilizing the marriage, whereas the goal of PUA Game is to incite jealousy and instigate a feral sex competition for the purpose of arousing her desire and keeping a steady supply of muff on tap.
- Married Dread Game recognizes the permanency of marriage, whereas PUA Dread Game views the relationship as expendable, as a "(growth) experience", or as a stepping stone to another one that is presumed to be better than the last.

- Married Dread Game is commonly expressed as a withdrawal from wife-centered living and a renewed focus on God-centered living, whereas, PUA Dread Game is commonly expressed as a withdrawal from one woman and a concentrated focus on other women who are available as a replacement.
- PUA Dread Game allows the woman to consider the possibility of what her life would be like without the man. But Married Dread Game allows the woman to consider the possibilities of what her life would be like if she can no longer control him or predict his behavior.
- The two types of Dread Games arouse different types of fears in the woman. In PUA Dread Game her fear is of losing the man and losing her sense of security in the relationship. But in Married Dread Game, her fear is that she will no longer be pedestalized and obeyed, and that she will lose her control over him. Thus, Married Dread Game forces the wife to face the Curse of Eve within her heart.
- Married Dread Game accesses the power of God to renew and transform the union and the individuals involved, whereas PUA Dread Game relies almost exclusively on SMV traits (in addition to other Game techniques) to exert sexual authority.

Married Dread Game with respect to Marital Vows

Oscar went so far as to say that Married Dread Game is a lie. So let's consider what he has to say about this.

> "As for "married dread game"; it's a lie. I'm not saying it won't work. I'm saying that, whether it works or not, it's still a lie.
> Did you say "forsaking all others", and "till death do us part" when you got married? If so, then did you mean it? If you meant it, then you won't cheat on her, or leave her. If she knows you meant it, then it doesn't matter how much "dread game" you play on her, because she knows you won't cheat on her, or leave her.
> If you didn't mean it, then you're a liar.
> So, were you lying when you said, "forsaking all others", and "till death do us part", or are you lying now that you're threatening her with "dread game", when in fact you won't cheat on her or leave her? Either way, you can't get away from the fact that you lied.
> Now, if you're cool with that, you're free to play all the games you want. No one will stop you. But, understand that you're a liar."

Basically, Oscar is staking out two scenarios.

1. The man is serious about forsaking the marriage, either by abandonment, divorce, or having an affair. In the case that he follows through on any one, his marital vows will become a lie.
2. The man is not serious about forsaking the marriage or picking up a side chick, and is pretending like he is. In this case, he is lying about the premise of his intentions.

With all due respect to brother Oscar, this is a poor frame to play off of for the following reasons.

First of all, Oscar is viewing both PUA Dread Game and Married Dread Game as essentially the same thing. They are not, as I described above.

In the first scenario, Oscar is assuming that the man is actually looking to abandon, divorce, or cheat on her. This is not consistent with Married Dread Game. (Go back to the top and read what Married Dread Game is.) PUA Dread Game OTOH considers this option to be an actionable possibility, maybe even a real goal, and definitely one if her overall influence is sufficiently reprehensible, but not Married Dread Game. Again, if the wife decides to end the marriage, that is her own decision, not that of the man's.

In the second scenario, Oscar is looking at the situation from the woman's perspective. Although it is proper and loving for the man to be sensitive to the wife's weaknesses, the challenge of Married Dread Game is to revise this ingrained habit to be less like the Curse of Adam and to think more along the lines of God's prerogatives.

Also in the second scenario, Oscar is assuming that the man can pretend well enough to convince the wife that he's got options. Not only is this incongruent with the purpose of Married Dread Game, it is also unrealistic. If the man truly has what it takes to step out (LAMPS, charisma, detachment, outcome independence, and game), or at least enough to be convincing that he could, then the wife already knows it. If he doesn't have it, and tries to pretend like he does, then he's just making a fool of himself in her eyes. He has to actually make progress in self-improvement to get to that point. I suppose there might be some women who would be ignorant of this, but the grand majority of women have extremely well-honed skills in testing men and sniffing out what they're made of. But again, this is only a concern for a man practicing PUA Dread Game.

In both scenarios, Oscar is assuming that the man has real options to engage in polygyny, etc., and of course, this would have to be necessary for a man to actually cheat, etc., but cheating is not congruent with Married Dread Game. In the case of Married Dread Game, the man is not lying or pretending about who he is, he is merely allowing his wife to consider the possibilities of what her life would be like if she can no longer control him or predict his behavior (which doesn't take much at all). It is not a lie or a sin to place God first, and Married Dread Game does not require a man to actually participate in extramarital sex. Whether he actually does so or not is another matter.

Finally, we see that in either scenario, Oscar is assuming that by employing Married Dread Game, the husband is riding hard on the wife's fears that he will leave or have an affair. Playing her fears like a banjo is not the express intention of Married Dread Game as it might be in PUA Dread Game, but arousing her fears is a probable outcome. Here it should be noted that the two types of Dread Games arouse different types of fears in the woman, as described earlier, and that it is necessary for the woman to face the Curse of Eve within herself if she is to grow spiritually.

Breaking out of One's Comfort Zone and Overcoming One's Fears

Moreover, I feel that Oscar's contention is largely one of conscience. I struggled with this for a long time myself. It just doesn't feel right to stop obsessing over the wife's head games, opinions, and whims, often only for the sake of a tentative peace, and to put God first. It feels irresponsible, like a betrayal of sorts, and in a way it is. Your god used to be the pretty p00n on a bedpost pedestal, and you're forsaking that and embracing God's covenant order of Headship. I won't deny that it's hard to dive headfirst into the drama and make this shift. But once you've made this break, it also feels wrong to look back as well.

Granted, one of the similarities between these two kinds of Dread Game is that the man has to come to the point where he is willing to lose the relationship in the event that she chooses the highway. But this isn't the goal of Married Dread Game. No, it is little more than an internal frame adjustment. It is counting the cost of being obedient to God, of putting Him first, rather than the wife.

> [26] "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his own father and mother and wife and children and brothers and sisters, yes, and even his own life, he cannot be my disciple. [27] Whoever does not bear his own cross and come > after me cannot be my disciple. [28] For which of you, desiring to build a tower, does not first sit down and count the cost, whether he has enough to complete it? [29] Otherwise, when he has laid a foundation and is not able to finish, all who see it begin to mock him, [30] saying, 'This man began to build and was not able to finish.'

> Luke 14:26-30 (ESV)

Married Dread Game doesn't necessitate a man to break his marital vows to be effective. It just forces a man to face his fears that his wife might do so if he should choose to be spiritually obedient and his wife rebels in response.

I suspect that believing Married Dread Game is a lie, or a sin, or even a transgression, may be an apparition of fear and false guilt that prevents a man from doing what it takes to get his house in order.

Epilogue

For the husband, embarking on the warpath of Married Dread Game can be a deeply introspective journey towards overcoming a number of issues.

- Gridlock in the marriage.
- Poor self-confidence.
- Blind spots of self-awareness and self-development, for both partners.
- His fears of his wife's possible reactions, spiritual infidelities, and possibly sexual incontinence.
- His fears over the possibility of his own failure.
- Discovering the meaning of masculinity, and the overall purpose of marriage.
- Apprehending the practical application of Headship and getting his house in order.

As Red Pill Apostle noted [emphasis mine],

> "Now, for hypothetical purposes, say that soft dread tactics that are perfectly OK in a Christian marriage aren't enough. Does the husband who has been tricked into becoming a rancher with a single livestock animal have to > suck it up and accept his fate? Not necessarily. A man still has leverage over his time, his attention, and if this is something she cares about, the appearance of the ideal marriage. This is why a man will have to contemplate deeply what is most important to him, because at this point, his wife has stopped being his helpmeet and is now just another problem he has to figure out how to best handle."

Σ Frame Axiom 18: If you keep doing what you've always done, then you'll get the same results you've always had. It is unreasonable to expect God to work a miracle when you're not even willing to change your tune.

The challenge of this approach can bear positive fruits all of its own.

On the other hand, Dread Game is not the "do all, end all" for fixing a broken relationship. As Oscar wisely noted…

> "…people are not automatons. People have free will. Even God Himself didn't keep Adam and Eve – who lived in literal paradise – from using their free will destructively.
> A husband can do everything right, and his wife can still turn into a fat, soul crushing, life draining succubus.
> A wife can do everything right, and her husband can still turn into a beer-swilling, porn-addicted pervert.
> A parent can do everything right, and his/her child can still turn into a drug-abusing dirtbag.
> We can influence people in our lives, but ultimately, that's all we can do – influence. We can't help someone who doesn't want help. We can't change other people. We can't make anyone do anything they really don't want to do (unless you're willing to use the kind of force that goes way beyond the realm of acceptable Christian behavior)."

Yes, Dread Game of both sorts is all about influence. What does it take to draw closer to God? What does it take to induce humility and thankfulness in a wife? When love doesn't do it, when living with them in an understanding way doesn't cut it, when kindness, patience, sacrifice, and suffering all have no effect, then what? When all else fails to make a dent, Dread Game might be what it takes to move the mountain of stubborn pride and marital intransigence that would otherwise ruin the marriage (and the children) if left unchecked. At the very least, it will bring the issue to a head where a clear decision can be made, for better or for worse.

Introduction

A while back, Dalrock reviewed a story at Daily Mail: Not tonight dear, I'm tired… Husband creates spreadsheet detailing different reasons why wife is refusing sex (2014 July 21). To offer the readers a quick snapshot of this post…

> "Women's sexuality has always been a primary source of their power, but in our feminist culture this has been taken to the extreme."
> "…the fear of losing power was a core motivating factor for the women involved."
> "The wife was horrified that she had over played her hand in using [i.e. withholding] sex to keep her husband firmly in her orbit."
> "Now imagine being the spreadsheet wife, who has suddenly realized that her V has lost its power through her own misuse."
> Dalrock Frigidity and power. (2014 August 3)

In summary, when a husband is fully aware that he is being played by her sexual denial stratagem and holds it in her face, the conviction of her sin hits home. As Dalrock notes, even team wimmin – who also play the sexual denial card – won't back her up when she overplays her hand. Not only is this a perceived rejection by hubbie, it's also an overt rejection from the herd. This is truly meaningful Feedback to female interests.

The Spreadsheet

In this post, Dalrock talks about the “sex denial spreadsheet”. This is when the husband keeps a schedule (like a calendar) of data about their sex life, or the lack thereof. The data typically includes,

1. Every time he initiated sex and was refused
2. Every time she initiated sex and was refused
3. Every time they actually had sex
4. Adding the week of her period (and ovulation) is optional.

(4) can be useful when the wife has shown a continued habit of preferring sex during her period, which is not only distasteful but also declared unclean (Leviticus 15:19; Leviticus 15:24) and forbidden (Leviticus 18:19; Leviticus 20:18) by Old Testament scripture. Ezekiel 22:10 specifically calls this a sin, and a man who refuses to approach a woman during her menstruation is called “righteous” in Ezekiel 18:5-9.

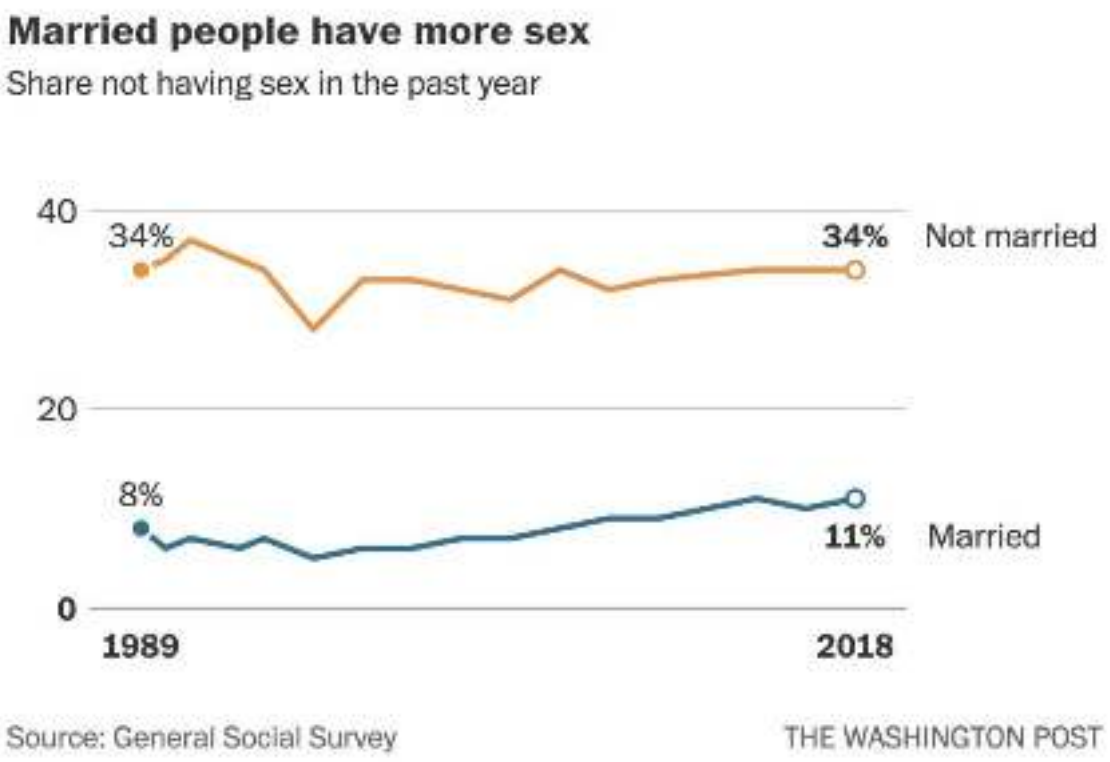
(4) is also useful to reveal if the wife has been conspicuously absent from the marital bed during her peak ovulation.* If she is also absent from the home during this time, it may be evidence that she’s having an affair.

When the husband keeps a spreadsheet like this, it is a subtle shame tactic. It makes the wife more self-conscious about the sexual interaction of the relationship.

This spreadsheet can also be used in divorce proceedings as proof of her failure to perform “marital duties” (if that should have any value in the eyes of the court or public opinion).

Some men reported that when they started keeping a spreadsheet, then the wife was more enthusiastic about sex, and less willing to refuse. When I read this, I had to try it out for myself.

 Ovulation occurs during the four days surrounding the midpoint of the menstrual cycle. For a 28 day cycle, this would be 14 days before the onset of the next period.*



Case Study 1 – Jack's Bedroom Spreadsheet

Using a paper spreadsheet might be useful if you want to post it on the bedroom wall as a daily reminder (to her). But I decided to take a subtler approach. I downloaded an app that was designed for women who are trying to get pregnant. It tracks ovulation and body temperature on a calendar, but it also has other data fields, including the date and frequency of coital encounters and even the number of orgasms!

After I started using this app, whenever I saw that it had been more than two weeks since our last roll in the hay, I would inform her of this fact. Of course, she would always deny it, so I showed her the calendar on the app to prove it. Within a few weeks after I started this, my wife became more self-conscious about her nuptial performance. She even downloaded the same app and kept track of it herself.

There were a few times when the "intercourse" field was blank for more than a couple weeks. When I pointed this out to her, it provoked her ego. She immediately shot back with a bunch of hamsterbated justifications. I told her to check the app and see for herself. She did, and after that, her indignation died down. She was too angry to make it up on the spot, but she was back in action within a day or two. After a while, she became more diligent than me at keeping record. Now, she usually tries to get 1 point a week at the minimum, and she feels guilty if she doesn't.

Grading System

I made up a grading system like this.

Raw Sex Performance Score = (Number of sexual encounters) x 100%/(Number of days in a given time frame)

Adjusted Sex Performance Score* = [(Number of sexual encounters) – (Number of refusals)] x 100%/(Number of days in a given time frame)

Raw Marital Sex Score = (Number of sexual encounters) x 100%/(Number of days married)

 The Adjusted Sex Performance Score takes into account her general responsiveness and attitude. This is important because men take refusal/rejection hard, and it has a strong negative effect on his view of the wife.*
 The number of refusals is counted as a penalty because 1 Corinthians 7:3-5 specifically instructs husbands and wives not to refuse the other.*

To offer an illustration of how this grading system is used, let's consider the month of July as a given time frame. During July, Brad initiated sex 19 times. His wife, Maddi, refused 5 times and spread her lotus petals 14 times. Thus,

Raw Sex Performance Score = 14*100%/19 = 73.7% –> C

Adjusted Sex Performance Score = (14 – 5)*100%/19 = 47.4% –> F

In another marriage during July, Greg initiated sex 6 times. His wife, Beth, refused 1 time and spread her buffalo wings 5 times. Thus,

Raw Sex Performance Score = 5*100%/6 = 83.3% –> B

Adjusted Sex Performance Score = (5 – 1)*100%/6 = 66.7% –> D

91-100% = A "Acceptable"
81-90% = B "Boring"
71-80% = C "Catatonic"

61-70% = D “Dead” or “Defunct”
< 60% = F *“Somebody will be F*ing someone else soon.”*

If the reader thinks this calculation is either too lax or too harsh for his particular station in life, then I suggest it can be weighted, or else calculated another way.

What if a husband refuses sex?

This scenario is much rarer, but it’s the same situation. The big difference is that most women would never tolerate that and would be on to the next man. Older or married women might hang on longer, especially if there are children and she has little income of her own, but if and when such an opportunity presents itself, she’ll have an affair. And if she has the opportunity but chooses not to out of conscience, she’ll resent her husband all the more.

Case Study 2 – Married Incels

Recently, the topic of sexual frequency came up in my men’s group. Every single man there said their wives are wholly disinterested in sex, and that they weren’t getting as much sex as they would like. In a bout of honesty, one retired Boomer told us, in so many words, that his wife thinks she is too old for sex. She told him, “Sex is for kids.” She is past menopause, can’t get wet, and is entirely opposed to having sex. So he goes months without sex and he masturbates with porn regularly — at the age of 72! This surprised me, not only because of his age, but also because, by all appearances, he was a mature Christian.

I shared my spreadsheet story with them. Most of them listened very carefully with smug or amused looks on their faces. But the older guy who was doing porn was outraged and said I was being unloving to my wife. I told him, “No, that’s not true. Our wives feel loved when we give them sexual attention, whether they’re actually interested in sex or not, and age doesn’t matter. I don’t know why your wife is being unloving toward you by denying you sex, but she’s inadvertently pushing you into porn. And if you like squirting p0rn more than your wife, then you’re not very loving to her either.”

He then changed the subject and none of the other guys spoke up.

Conclusions

In another post, Dalrock wrote about the same topic.

> "There is a great deal of energy on using sex as a weapon, including when, how, and why to deny sex. The other side to this is all of the energy coming from the deep fear that they will overplay this card, and as I described in Frigidity and power, lose their power.
> "What if he watches porn, or even Game of Thrones while I'm denying sex? Then my V will lose its power over him! How do I overcome my own frigidity? If I'm frigid, my V has no power!"
> "They already know how to use sex as a weapon, and they already have deep fears that by doing this they risk losing the very power they are trying to wield. They already sensed that misusing sex was making them frigid."
> Dalrock: Riding the brake (2015 February 28)

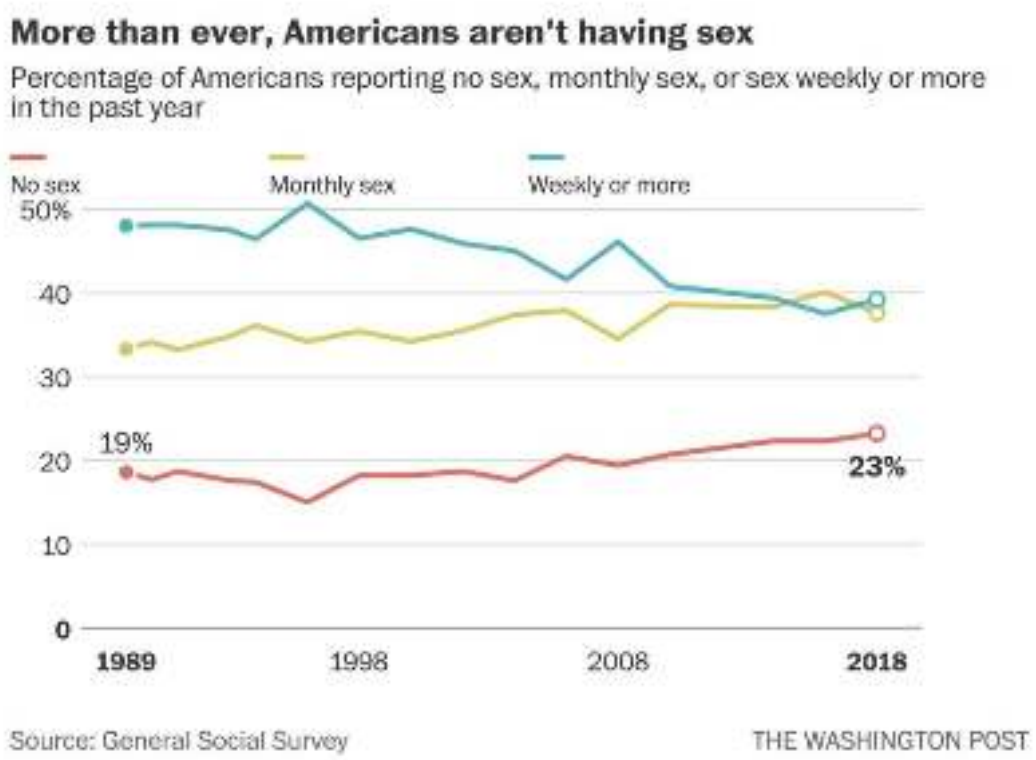
Obviously, this is one of those feminine secrets that is carefully hidden from men. A wife denying her husband sex is much more common than we might think. But it often goes unnoticed because men are not comfortable to discuss this.

As Dalrock wisely notes (in bold), a wife who misuses sex becomes frigid, but on the other hand, getting a wife back into a regular habit of mattress scooting carries the magical effect of reducing her frigidity.



It's long past time for men to take action. For those men who are being subjected to Dead Bedroom syndrome, you can try keeping score with the method described above.

Each time she refuses your advances, chalk up one mark against her. Each time she refuses, tell her that she is faithlessly neglecting her "marital duty" which she promised to do, and so you are entitled to the remedial option of porn.*

"Oh, you're too dry/itchy/moody/ tired/(insert excuse) tonight? That's OK. I wouldn't want to make you "uncomfortable" because I lurrrve yew tooo much! [sarcasm] But you know, my d!ck isn't going to suck itself. I have other options to "control my body in honorable way" (1st Thessalonians 4:4) and maintain my own "sanctification"!!! You're lucky that my ex girlfriend married Dick Thorndike and moved out of town, otherwise, I'd have a real temptation on my lap." [hyperbolic sarcasm intended]

[Insert wife's indignant reaction.]

"Oh, don't worry, after I'm finished, I'll be sure to mop up the keyboard and clean P0rnHub off the browser history. I won't be causing you any trouble or embarrassment at all!" [angry sarcasm]

That said, she cannot legitimately blame you for being "dirty" or "out of control" when human nature finally takes its course. She will also feel an onus of (partial) personal responsibility, which hopefully will act as a goad to her growth.

* Disclaimer: I don't mean to give anyone the idea that using porn is OK. Of course, it is not a Godly practice. As Christian men, we know porn is bad, but it's also a real problem that most men struggle with and it needs to be dealt with somehow. Owning up to it and talking about it is a good place to start. Here, I am merely suggesting that the idea of using porn can be used as a point of argumentation with the wife, done in order to drive your point and get her to be emotionally invested in your struggle, rather than allowing her the contentment of being a casual (and cruel) observer.
 Different women have different ideas about porn and masturbation. I think it is important to know how your wife will react if you bring it up. Personally, my wife enjoys porn if she is "in the mood" and occasionally we'll watch it together as a leadup to foreplay. But if I watch it alone after a long dry spell, she condemns me as "filthy" and is more hesitant to engage in lovemaking. Quite the double standard, I might say.

Rights and Responsibilities within Marriage

Introduction

Mogadishu Matt asked a somewhat serious question:

> "How does someone measure quality control in one's sexual marriage?"

To do that, we need to first introduce a standard by which to measure. So in this post, I'll review the purposes, conditions, rights, and responsibilities in marriage, according to Christianity.

These purposes and conditions for marriage were outlined in an earlier post.

The Purpose of Marriage

Marriage is supposed to serve a small number of very important purposes.

1. To glorify God. (Headship is necessary to do this, among other things.)
2. To serve as a vehicle of sanctification for the man and wife. (Headship and regular sex plays a central part of this, among other things.)
3. To hedge against sexual immorality.

4. To create the dominion of a family. (Again, Headship.)
5. To produce Godly offspring. (Not possible if all of the above are not in place, including Headship.)
6. To provide a safe harbor from the world.

The Conditions for Marriage

Ontologically, marriage requires four distinct elements:

1. There has to be a mental assent and agreement between man and woman, a “meeting of the minds” concerning their mutual intentions to be joined together inseparably.
2. There has to be a heart assent and agreement to engage in everything that marriage entails, physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually. In other words, they are both agreeing to the inclusion into the union of God, Who then completes the work and mystery of knitting them together.
3. There must be a public acknowledgment to the world of their mental and heart assent. This usually takes the form of some kind of public declaration each makes (e.g. in a wedding ceremony): “This is my husband.” “This is my wife.”
4. There must be a physical (and better if emotional) consummation in the form of sexual congress.

The purpose of reiterating this is that an ideal marriage should fulfill all of these purposes and conditions. All of these elements have to be present together for marriage to exist, and the removal of one of the elements changes the relationship into something that is not a covenant marriage.

Rights and Responsibilities within Marriage

We have the common idea that a right is a privilege guaranteed by law. But from a Biblical standpoint of God’s covenantal law, a right is that which is right to do or have, with the recognition that our obedience carries God’s blessings and favor under the New Covenant. Therefore, our responsibility is to uphold such rights (i.e. to do what is right) to the best of our knowledge, power, and ability.

Upon reviewing the above purposes and conditions for marriage it can be seen that there are a few absolute necessities.

1. A certain level of unity or "oneness" characterized by trust, pair bonding, compatible personalities, and an intersection of shared visions, values, and life goals.
2. A hierarchy of authority (i.e. Headship), including the recognition of God as the author and sustainer of marriage, and a mutual acknowledgment about how the marriage is to be conducted. The generalities about the structure should conform to God's covenant of marriage, while the particulars should be put forth and enforced by the man, according to Headship. The woman's submission indicates her agreement.
3. Faithfulness, including commitment, dedication, discipline, loyalty, maintaining sexual authority and the unique ownership of the spouse's body, and being continually available and steadfast.
4. Sexual congress, which involves physical affection and emotional bonding.
5. Having children and raising them to know God.
6. Glorifying God in various ways.

Taken together, these endeavors represent a fidelity to God's archetype of covenant marriage. If any of these elements are absent in a marriage, then the marriage falls short of God's robust design for marriage. If more than one element is weak or missing, then the marriage fails to conform to God's archetype for marriage.

Quality Control

Of course, all of us need to employ some more "quality control" in our marriages.

To answer Matt's question, we can begin by considering the lists given above as a set of standards to aim for. Then we can examine the relationship we are in, compare it to these standards, and ask ourselves a few questions.

1. How does your marriage measure up?
2. What is lacking?
3. What needs to be done to fill up that which is lacking?
4. Are you able to do it? (If not, then continual prayer is in order.)

> [9] For what thanks can we render to God for you, for all the joy with which we rejoice for your sake before our God, [10] night and day praying exceedingly that we may see your face and perfect what is lacking in your faith?
> 1 Thessalonians 3:9-10 (NKJV)

Based on my experience as a Christian, I would surmise that either your own desire is hungering after those things which are lacking (e.g. more trust, more pair bonding, more sex, more emotional intimacy, more peace and order in the home, being respected by your wife, etc.), or else, the Lord has pressed these missing things upon your conscience as being a part of your inheritance that you need to be pursuing and working on.

> [2] My brethren, count it all joy when you fall into various trials, [3] knowing that the testing of your faith produces patience. [4] But let patience have its perfect work, that you may be perfect and complete, lacking nothing.
> James 1:2-4 (NKJV)

All the best~!

Being faithful is not about avoiding sin, but in Glorifying the Lord. Embracing God's archetype of marriage is one important way to do this.

Introduction

The last post, Rights and Responsibilities within Marriage (2022-01-21), listed several characteristics of a covenant marriage to be used as a standard for those of us who are married to shoot for, to fill up that which is lacking in our faith, and to attain a more perfect sanctification by the grace of God. I concluded that the goal in marriage (as with other facets of life) is to please God. This probably comes as no surprise to any Christian reader, but it needs to be emphasized.

In this post, I'll explain how our common understanding of faithfulness vs. unfaithfulness is based on feminized cultural norms, sin, and guilt, and not on God's purposes for marriage. In this particular subject, we would do well to abandon such viewpoints, to concentrate on how things are supposed to be, and to examine those areas where we fall short.

The Prevalent Focus is Self-Centric and Fem-Centric, not Marriage/God Centered

As we are well aware, there are cultural influences both outside and inside the church. Progressivism, Feminism, and it's churchian labeled sibling, Egalitarianism, and their religious woman appeasing cousin, Complementarianism, all reign supreme and stand against men, women, children, the family, the church, and the work of God.

Thus, it is not surprising that most of the current discussion in our culture, and also within churchianity, is centered around women's imperatives, preferences, and viewpoints, even in spite of the fact that this leads to their own demise (as anyone can see on TikTok or YouTube). God's archetype of Headship is not taught. Men are not being mentored by elder men. Women are not being taught by older married women in the church how to respect their husbands and be good, chaste, diligent, loving wives.

What husband would not be eager to come home to a wife who bakes?
It's time to put a bun in the oven!
Furthermore, we have a broken view of what marital fidelity is all about. Instead of regarding the quality of a marriage in terms of the purposes, conditions, rights, and responsibilities in marriage, according to Christianity, we have been conditioned by our sex-centric culture to view fidelity in terms of whether adultery has occurred or not. According to the Bible, it cannot be denied that having sex with someone you're not married to is a sin. But adultery is not just an infidelity to God's archetype of marriage, it is a total destruction of the marriage! So by viewing fidelity in terms of adultery, we have set the lowest standard for marriage that is ever possible!

Aside from gross adultery, there are a large number of things that would constitute an infidelity to God's archetype of covenant marriage.

- A lack of openness, humility, and trust.
- Arrogance, contempt, egocentric pride, selfishness.
- Being continually angry or bitter towards one's spouse.
- Apathy, carelessness, laziness.
- Carrying an ill will, or fostering a Zero Sum competition.
- Complaining, nagging, thanklessness, ungratefulness.
- Engaging in a female-centric structure of authority, e.g. Chivalry, Complementarianism, Feminism, etc.
- Entertaining lustful fantasies, e.g. pornography for men, and romance novels and movies for women.
- Failing to conform to gender roles, e.g. the husband is a spineless wuss, and the wife is a termagant.
- Failing to have regular conjugal relations with one's spouse.
- Failing to institute a Christ centered home life, e.g. family time, church attendance, regular prayer, Bible study, Bible based teaching, etc.
- Failing to teach and discipline the children properly.
- Neglecting one's sexual authority, e.g. getting out of shape or growing obese.
- Remaining ignorant of what inspires and motivates one's spouse.

- Various transgressions that culminate in distrust and disrepute.

Now you'll notice that if we stick to the popular notion of Infidelity = Adultery, then we're still allowing all the above failings to fester, thereby preventing the marriage from glorifying God and being blessed. At worst, such failings will continue until an actual adultery might occur.

She's doing everything right, but yet, something is still missing.

Heart Issues and Willingness

Instead of estimating the quality of a marriage according to the worst standard (i.e. adultery), we should be striving to achieve a standard that is as close as we can realistically get to God's ideal.

Therefore, infidelity can be better understood as a heart issue of unwillingness, meaning that if a spouse is capable of meeting the standards set forth in the last post, Rights and Responsibilities within Marriage (2022-01-21), and intentionally declines or refuses, then that is denial, fraud, sin, withholding, or whatever the case may be.

Sin is often described as failing to hit the target.

Our target as Christians is to glorify, honor, and please the Lord.

If the Lord is not pleased, then we have failed.

If we fail to match God's standards when we are able, then we are guilty of infidelity.

If we make a regular habit of such things, then we are being irresponsible about marriage, and we should not expect to receive the blessings thereof.

If we know better, but intentionally continue such habits, then we are being disobedient to God and we should expect to gnaw on the bitter fruits thereof.

There is no wiggle room on this point because as soon as you yield an inch the host of exceptions pour in.

This would then lead us to the admonition to husbands to be loving and understanding with his wife. If she is really not feeling well or is out of sorts (which happens quite frequently), he should not hold her to the standard until that time she does feel better. But she should still be made well aware of the fact that her behavior is sub-standard and that the husband has to carry the burden.

For wives, it gets more interesting, because wives are told to submit to the will of their husbands. (Reee!!!) But a wife who is submissive and respectful from the heart, in spite of her husband's failings, is a woman of great faith, worth her weight in gold and better than 99.99% of women out there.

I think in both cases, and much like Jesus did when he cut to the base motivations of people, is that we are dealing with heart issues.

True Obedience Must Pursue God's Glory in Everything

A lot of the failings given in the list above are quantitative and could be assessed on a graded scale. Things like laziness, lust, humility, openness, personal fitness, and thankfulness, are all things that could improve with a little effort. However, a couple of the items are more qualitative in nature, meaning that much effort could be given, but if it is not done properly, then it is just as ineffective as if nothing were done at all, and in some cases it is even detrimental.

For example, parents could dedicate much effort into family church attendance and teaching the children. But if the family is attending a Progressive church that is converged with Feminist doctrine, then it would have been better for the family to stay home on Sundays and read the Bible.

An Indicator of Contempt (IOC)

Another example is when a man is a legalistic stickler. He goes to great lengths to keep himself untainted from the common sins in the world, thinking that he's more righteous or closer to God. But in doing so, he cuts himself off from God and many blessings in life as well. I talked about this in More on the Framework of Options (2021-03-22), The Spiritual Confusion of Clinging to the "Rules" (2021-03-24) and Rules and Trust (2021-04-28).

Another extreme is when a man pursues worldly ambitions, wealth, and masculinity, with the idea that he'll somehow gain access to God's better gifts in life. But he fails to make all his efforts count for something of eternal merit. Adam Piggott discussed this in Masculinity does not lead to Godliness (2022-01-11).

One important thing that is often missing in the last two examples is Creating and Maintaining Heart Trust (2019-04-28). Deep Strength described how Trust is earned and an expression of the character of godliness (2021-12-20).

One last example is when a wife decides to engage in more lovemaking with her husband, which is a very good thing for the marriage in general. However, her motives are not to increase intimacy and bonding. Instead, she's only doing it because her husband is more relaxed and trusting when she puts out regularly, and then it's easier for her to get his compliance and manipulate him into her way of thinking. In reality, she finds sex to be a burdensome chore, and she can't hide her repulsion whenever he mounts her. This puts him off, but if he is to be a faithful married man, he has no other option. In the final analysis, neither of them are enjoying sex for what it is intended to be, and are only experiencing annui and deep rejection in the act of sex. Within a year or two, neither of them has any desire for the other whatsoever. The wife never had any desire for him in the first place, and he has learned to avoid sex because her attitude of revilement has cast a shroud of shame and guilt over his natural desire. They've abused sex so much that it has lost its savor. He would have fared better if he had refused her invitations once in a while and had demanded her authenticity instead. It would have been a lot more trouble, but better for their marriage and sexual intimacy over the long haul.

I think that's enough examples for readers to get the picture. The main idea here is that we must always discern the Lord's glory in our ambient environment, and how our actions either contribute to that, or transgress those implicit boundaries. When we are sufficiently introspective to be aware of the condition of our hearts, then we are able to confess this and do some measure of quality control. But when we are disobedient, or even when we do the right thing just out of mental comfort, or for our own self-centered reasons or natural inclinations, then we could still be missing the target of pleasing the Lord. In certain areas, this can be even worse than doing nothing at all.

In the final, anytime we are not consciously aware of God's presence and power in our lives, and do not make ourselves a part of the Spirit's work, we are lacking fidelity, we fail to connect with God, and we are therefore infidels.

BTW, the Muslims are right on target about Western Christians being infidels. What they don't understand is that converged Churchianity is not true Christianity. Unfortunately, most Christians don't understand this either.

Σ Maxim 23: A neglect or refusal to regard the Glory of the Lord in all things invariably and/or inevitably leads us to transgress His Covenant – an act of infidelity.

Definitions and Semantics

Over the past few months, I've made many comments to the effect that refusing or denying sex to one's spouse constitutes marital infidelity. The dictionary gives us this definition of fidelity.

Fidelity (noun)

1. Strict observance of promises, duties, etc.: a servant's fidelity.
2. Loyalty: fidelity to one's country.
3. Conjugal faithfulness.
4. Adherence to fact or detail.
5. Accuracy; exactness.

As we can see, marital fidelity involves all five of these definitions of fidelity, specifically the adherence to the covenant of marriage as God intended it. Jack went further in pointing out that infidelity is not limited to the worst case scenario of adultery, but that infidelity includes anything short of fidelity. Furthermore, the standard for fidelity should be based on how well we are fulfilling the purposes and conditions for Biblical Covenantal marriage by exercising our rights and responsibilities therein.

I did some digging into the original Greek Bible, and there isn't an original wording that is equivalent to our English word infidelity. But there is a very good connection with porneia which goes with our word fornication which we use to describe every type of Biblically illicit sexual sin aside from the specific sin of adultery.

Moicheia (noun)

1. Adultery

Porneia (noun)

1. Fornication
2. Whoredom
3. (generally) Adultery, Incest, Harlotry;
4. (metaphorically) Idolatry

Porneuó (verb)

1. To fornicate.
2. (metaphorically) To practice idolatry.
3. (figuratively) To be unfaithful to Christ, while posing as His true follower.

In common parlance, fornication is specifically defined as any sexual liaison that is outside of marriage proper. A common biblical use of this word is when a person either prostitutes themselves in a sexual manner or receives the services of a prostitute. Here it is noted that porneia is not used to describe concubinage, so the Biblical idea of fornication is any sexual liaison that is outside of a Covenant arrangement. Furthermore, the Biblical usage of porneia goes beyond fornication to include idolatry, a breaking of the covenant in the pursuit of other gods.

As we know from RP lore, female fornication comes in two varieties.

1. A s1ut is a woman who commits fornication either for the sheer thrill of defilement or as an attempt to fill the emptiness in her own heart. The classic example is the CC Rider.
2. A wh0re is a woman who has sex for money or some other personal gain. This gain is typically material in nature, but it can also take the form of certain allowances, favors, or benefits. A prominent example of this is when a woman sleeps with her boss to secure a promotion.

Rollo has made a distinction between Validational Sex and Transactional Sex (2018-03-07), which most regular readers are likely already familiar with. The difference here is marked by the woman's opinion of the man, her motives, and relative enthusiasm for having sex with him. Validational Sex and Transactional Sex corresponds respectively with the definitions of s1ut and wh0re given above. But if we consider this from a psychological viewpoint, the woman is getting a payoff in one form or another from both kinds of sex. In the first case, Validational Sex, she has sex with a man because she feels attraction and because it's an inherently enjoyable experience. In the second case, Transactional Sex, she has sex with a man because she can get something for herself out of it (other than sex itself). Both kinds of sex offer some benefit or incentive to the woman in some way, and in both instances, the woman is only interested in sex when she can receive a payoff of some kind. So in a broader sense, the woman has a transactional concept of sex in both situations. In fact, Briffault's Law states as much [emphasis mine].

> "The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family. Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place."
> Robert Briffault (1874–1948)

We can safely assume that Briffault's Law extends to include the benefits from associating with a man sexually.

A Lamborghini with benefits — 100% guaranteed she's shagging the owner.

Validational Sex in Marriage

When we consider the first type of female porneia, Validational Sex, we note that validation is sort of a done deal, something implicit in the status of being married. Many women do not receive further validation through continual intercourse with the husband, partly because the internet and the lopsided loose morals surrounding our sex-centric culture proffer convenient opportunities for her to receive as much attention as she wants, and to even have sex on demand with other men. Also, a woman cannot really enjoy the thrill of defilement with her husband, because the covenant of marriage transforms any defilement (within marriage) into sanctification. Another reason is because the thrill naturally wears off after a few years. All these reasons push women to turn to the second type — Transactional Sex — after marriage. So in the next section, I'll concentrate on the aspect of Transactional Sex as a type of porneia, specifically within the context of marriage.

Transactional Sex in Marriage = Withholding Sex

Transactional Sex in marriage invariably takes the form of Withholding Sex.

How is withholding transactional?

To answer this question, let's think about the usual reasons for chronic withholding and rejection.

Examining what withholding sex within marriage looks like from an insider's point of view sheds light on the idea of why withholding is a sin on the level of porneia. Withholding sex in marriage is always a power play centered around using sex for personal gain of some kind. This concept is readily evident in the transactional nature of choreplay, but it also appears in other situations where the wife is subtly using sex as a medium of exchange.

Similar dynamics hold true when the husband is withholding, but I'm focusing on the wife because this is what happens 95+% of the time.

When she wants him to "do more around the house"... (AKA Choreplay)

Women's ideal husband (or so they say) — the 1950s multi-tasking househusband.

Granted, maintaining a home is an endless and often thankless task, but it is not uncommon for wives to be dissatisfied with the important and influential task of being largely responsible for the home environment. But when resentment kicks in, the wife increases her own labor by establishing endless requirements for order and cleanliness in the home, and she goes to excessive efforts to reach the pinnacle of persnickety in an effort to force the family's compliance. The husband is then singled out as the chief offender to the health and civilization of the family.

If he has not done what she wants him to do, or has not performed it up to her standard, then she "doesn't feel like it tonight."

From the husband's perspective, it soon becomes clear that sexual intimacy only happens when he behaves a certain way according to her wishes. He must comply or else be condemned to an ignominious existence characterized by blue balls, an aggravated temptation to lust, porn, and jerking off, and the daily shame of being belittled and rejected by his own wife in his own home.

From the wife's perspective, she doles out sex on her own terms to elicit certain behaviors from him, and he complies by performing the behavior the way she wants him to. It's a simple "carrot on a stick" with an occasional nibble to keep him in tow.

As you can see, she's using sex for gain or control.

When she's mad at him...

This is one that is entirely too common.

If she's mad at him for doing something she disapproves of, then coitus is canned for a few days.

Running underneath her anger and moodiness is the simple reality that she doesn't see him as good enough or worthy enough, and so sex with him becomes an annoyance to endure. After repeated "offenses" by him, sex then becomes something she resents doing, and finally an act she is repulsed by and which she avoids as much as possible. This has longitudinal effects that can form a downward spiral in the marriage.

So then he apologizes or promises to change his ways or fix the issue. He changes himself for the better, and she starts to see him in a different light. After a time, she lets him know he is back in her good graces by reinstating access to sex. Then sex becomes something she does with her "new and improved" husband again.

Some might view this back and forth as a wife exerting a positive influence on the husband, especially if he has some horrendous behaviors that truly need improvement. But most wives are not that self-aware. Instead of concentrating on encouraging the man to genuinely improve himself, most of the conditioning is done only in favor of her feeelz or to the convenience of her own personal habits and preferences, and not for the general welfare of the family. For instance, wives will get angry and withhold because he left his dirty socks on the floor, but they'll never get angry and withhold because he missed Bible story time with the children. There's a clue as to their solipsistic priorities.

At the base of it, withholding sex because she is mad at him is gaining control for herself, just like in doling out sex as a carrot reward for good behavior, but this time in stick form to change him. It does not matter that her defrauded husband hasn't been able to give her whatever it is she wants from him before she's willing to act like his wife. Even if she is completely honest about it, she is still using sex for gain or control.

When she's "not in the mood"...

Readers might be wondering about the situation in which the wife isn't really thinking in terms of getting something from the husband or controlling his behavior, but she's just "not in the mood", or "too tired", etc. If she were more honest, the real reason is that she's "feeling no attraction", and is therefore unmotivated to connect in a way that would be meaningful to hubby. This is basically selfishness and spiritual disobedience, and of course, it's still marital fraud, but at its root, the "not in the mood" excuse is a passive-aggressive form of apathy, which is, in all cases, an absence of steadfast love, or in some cases even spiritual rebellion. Moreover, it reinforces her power to decline.

To draw a fitting analogy, if a little child knows they are supposed to obey his parents and refuses to obey for any reason, that child is exercising control, typically through behavior that wears down the parents into acquiescing to the child's wishes.

Now with a wife, there is a vast difference in the following two "not in the mood" sentiments.

The first is an appropriate request of the husband for him to consider in understanding of his wife. The sentiment is something along these lines, "I'm not really in the mood because I had a tough day and I am mentally exhausted, but if you really want to, I'm yours." It's up to the husband at this point to decide what to do because she has submitted.

The next "not in the mood" excuse, and the one women give 99% of the time, is expressed similarly to this, "I've had a hard day so I'm not really in the mood. All I want to do is curl up on the couch and vegetate in front of the TV. It's not happening tonight." Here, the wife is essentially stonewalling the husband. Displaying this kind of arrogance is how she assumes power from (not) doling out natural affection. If she adds anything else about what he can do to help her be "in the mood" so she'll be more willing (and this is almost always the case with a woman because of solipsism), then it becomes all that much easier to see the level of control she gets from this.

Moody, sad, troubled woman expressing despair and rejecting her husband.

Withholding Sex = Porneia

What we see in these all too common scenarios is that the motivation for sex is NOT from obedience to the Covenant entered into before witnesses and God.

Instead, what we have here gentlemen is a sin where a wife is effectively using sex as a medium of exchange to garner power or control in one way or another, and to get something she wants. Women's sexuality has always been a primary source of their power, but in our feminist culture this has been taken to the extreme and amplified by churchian doctrines.

She knows he wants it. She knows she is his only licit sexual option, and she uses that situation for her gain. If he objects, then he's made out to be bad, controlling, misogynistic, perverted, and so on.

So you see, when a wife uses sex for personal gain in the relationship, whether by the means of reward or punishment, she's relegated the marriage act God purposed for creating oneness, into a quid pro quo transaction. The payoff for him is sex, and the payoff for her is power and control. It's a wife being a one customer wh0re for a non-cash payment instead of being honest about it and taking the money.

If that seems an awful lot like porneia, that is because changing the names from "John" and "prostitute" to "husband" and "wife" respectively, in no way changes how sex is bartered and misused for selfish gain. She only has one customer in this case, and he wildly overpays, but the core of what constitutes biblical fornication is right there. It makes no difference whether a wife has sex under certain conditions she sets forth, or if she withholds sex altogether until she is "motivated" to do so, it is transactional by nature, and thus, it is porneia.

Furthermore, as you can see, the person doing the withholding holds all the power. Anytime you stop someone from having what is rightfully theirs you are gaining or exercising power over them. Withholding sex from your spouse is about wresting control for yourself (the gain) and using sex to do it.

Comprehensively, this essentially boils down to a standoff over the fundamental structure of the marriage. Will it be Headship according to God's Covenantal archetype, or will it be Shivalry according to her self-centered whims and fleshly feeelz?

Σ Maxim 30: A refusal to renew the covenant of marriage by withholding from the sacrament of sex is a transgression against that covenant. If continued, it is sin.

In the previous post, Denying sex to one's spouse is porneia. (2022-1-26), the discussion assumed that women withhold for gain and control. However, several commenters (Cameron, DeepStrength, LocustsPlease, and Whiteguy1) brought up some important points about women with personality disorders (e.g. BPD, NPD, etc.), psychological disorders (e.g. intimacy anorexia), sexual trauma (including previous promiscuity), and various trust issues.

- Whiteguy1's story of his BPD wife is here and here.
- Locustsplease shared a similar story here.
- Cameron gave a short list of reasons for withholding that included emotional damage and mental health issues.
- Also, I believe my first wife had NPD, and she was subtly but viciously controlling. Just like Whiteguy1's and Locustsplease's wives, she also opted for divorce when it became clear that she could not control me.

DeepStrength explained this behavior as follows.

> "When some people are stuck in patterns and habits of inverted relationships/marriage so long, then that becomes their normal. Normal is comfortable. She can manipulate you and has control over you and everything is good.
> If you flip the script and start leading the relationship/marriage, then this is simply too much for some women. They are scared out of their minds not being in control because (surprise surprise) BPD and other types of women like that have trust issues, usually from broken homes, sexual abuse, or whatever else in their history. Most normal women who grew up in a healthy home will be uncomfortable at first but when you're actually leading well they'll start to fall in line.
> This is pretty much what cognitive dissonance is. BPD women and women with trust issues can't handle NOT being in control. They'll do anything to get out of it, even if it's in a better situation. They'd rather go back to the control and dysfunction. Similar to battered women syndrome and Stockholm syndrome.
> This is also why we say, usually when you start leading, women will fall in line. Most women that actually are interested in serving God and have a reasonably healthy background will. But there are relationships where women are too dysfunctional to change and instead of starting to follow you, they'll likely try to rebel more or just nope out. Just let them go per 1 Corinthians 7:15. Their choices are on their head as long as you are striving to uphold God's commands."

If you break her glass jar, she's done with you!

After considering these examples, I think the issue here (at least for these types of women) is not so much about personal gain and control as it is about trust. The reason that these women withhold sex and grasp for control is not for the control itself, but it's because they are unwilling or unable to trust. Having control allows them to avoid having to be trusting, and this is their primary motive for maintaining control.

In addition, building trust in one another is only half of the equation. These examples also indicate that it's crucial for one to be trusting as a personal quality, and for one to trust as a general habit. Women with various disorders, emotional scars, and trust issues just can't do that, no matter how trustworthy the man might be.

The commonality of these distrusting types of women is that they would rather cop out of the marriage altogether than learn how to trust, even when the sex is good (for the woman) and it is obvious that they would have a much better life if they stayed. This observation greatly emphasizes the centrality of trust in a relationship, and suggests that trust is a much deeper issue than control (i.e. the Curse of Eve), or even hypergamy and the Tingles.

Having this insight is important for a man to be able to assess what kind of woman he is dealing with and what reaction he might expect from her when he begins to push towards Headship. Her overall ability to trust seems to be a deciding factor as to whether she'll spring for a divorce or not.

How prevalent is this? It's hard to say. But I don't think it is anywhere near as common as selfish, lazy, spiritually disobedient wives withholding simply to gain the compliance and control of the husband. So we need to make a distinction here, and men need to be discerning as to whether they have a trusting wife who is just playing games, or a wife who is deeply afraid to be trusting and would rather d@mn the whole family than learn how to trust.

What can a husband do in response to a rebellious wife?

Introduction

A prime PUA tactic in maneuvering a woman into bed is to say and do things indicating freedom and nonjudgment.

- "I think a woman should be free to do whatever she wants."
- "Hey, no judgment here. You just be who you are!"
- "It's all good. Let's just go with the flow, see what the vibe and energy is in the moment."

No one likes being judged or constricted. But women really don't like it because of how judgment and restraint make them feel. For women it is all about how she feels about everything – herself, her marriage, her kids, her job, her place in the world, the meaning of life, God, you name it. Things like OnlyFans and the new sex work help her feel good. She gets money, validation, attention, freedom, all of it, and it feels soooo good to a woman.

As you might imagine, when PUAs come on to a woman who is rebellious and independent, the general approach is to go with the flow and play it out underneath and with respect to her ego. The PUA's response is not to refuse to admit her argument which would spark her ire, but rather to Agree and Amplify.

But PUAs only pull for the short show. Husbands are in for the long haul. What works for PUAs may not work for husbands. So are there any other alternative approaches that would "work" for husbands?

The answer is YES! In two previous posts, Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (2017 November 15) and

How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (2018 February 27), Jack covered the research of Dr. John Gottman, who described a certain type of conflict structure which leads to better marital outcomes. In this structure, the husband brings up an issue and asks for a change. The wife is then required to respond somehow. In other words, the husband is the initiator of the conflict, and the wife is the respondent.

The main takeaway is that a husband should always be making more 'demands' on a wife, than the other way around, because when the husband does the majority of the demanding, it tends to result in a more positive and enjoyable relationship, over time. This effect was shown by Gottman to be true, and when Jack and I applied this technique to our own marriages, it had a similar, positive effect.

Case Study 1 – Jack's Marriage. "She'll Get Over It"

Jack's experiment with this technique, which he calls "Pushing the Line", is covered in the post, Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (2018-02-15).

Keep in mind that the husband's "demand" isn't really a demand or even a request as much as it is an expectation. The husband expresses a new expectation for how the relationship will be conducted with an explanation of its benefits. The wife responds to the expectation by meeting it or by expressing why she cannot or will not meet it. Jack's wife usually met his expectation but only after some conflict.

Jack had to stand his ground with his expectations after facing her negative emotional responses. The way to stand is to realize that your factual, practical expectations are being met only with emotional, illogical reactions. A couple good ways to respond to that are…

- "If you have a practical reason why you can't meet this expectation, let's hear it."
- "I am not going to respond to emotional outbursts."

After expressing the expectation, you must stand your ground on it. She doesn't get to run the marriage simply because your expectations make her feel bad. And if she feels bad, so what? She'll get over it.

Why men are hesitant to make demands

First, my overarching observation is how any criticism of all this is shouted down with anti-judgment sentiment and cries of “sexism”, “misogyny”, “insecurity”, and so on. How women get to this point is by getting everyone to withhold judgment or at least not express judgment. How men get to this point is by withholding judgment or refusing to take action because they do not want to rock the marital boat (or try to steady it in the face of the wife rocking it), nor appear “controlling” or “abusive”. The claims of the day when a husband attempts to put his foot down on something are that he’s “abusing” her or trying to “control” her. It is very possible that any attempts he makes to forestall things are met with protests of “You’re judging me!” and “You’re abusive!” and “You’re trying to control me!”

The implicit threat in such a statement is:

- “You are an insecure little man with a small penis who is trying to chain me to a stove and keep me barefoot and pregnant.”
- “How dare you judge me and cast stones at me!”
- “How dare you accuse me of things I haven’t done (yet)!”
- “How dare you attack me!”
- “You’re just a sexist who hates women.”
- “You’re being controlling.”
- “You’re hinting at me that I’m doing something wrong.”
- “You’re protesting at me and telling me I cannot do something and that is abuse.”
- “I don’t have to let you abuse and control me.”
- “You keep this up, I will divorce you, take most of the marital assets, leave you destitute, and you will never see the kids again.”
- “And… you’ll never get to have sex with me again.”
- “I’ll tell the kids what a mean ogre you are.”
- “I’ll tell the court what a sexist and misogynist you are.”
- “And I will tell all our friends and family what a mean, insipid, insecure, woman-hating, petty little man you are and how you were abusive and controlling.”

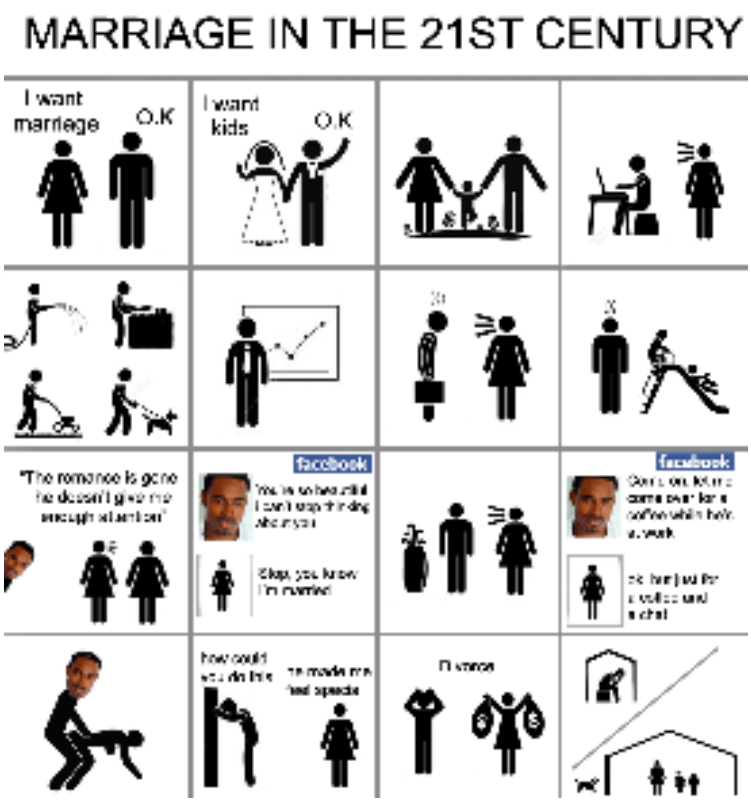
Women have upper hands here since most of the time they will be able to demand alimony and child support. I think husbands will have to decide whether they’re willing to live with it, or fight.



This is difficult because most men are conditioned to continue compromising so as to keep the peace. Most husbands in this position will continue letting a wife push and push and push. They're conditioned this way because…

- "Women Are Wonderful!"
- "A good Christian husband trusts his wife."
- "Any husband who tells his wife 'no' is abusing and controlling her!"
- "Judging a wife and telling her no are 'unloving', and violate the command to husbands to love their wives"

It may well be that a man will have to give up his marriage and save himself and hopefully his children. most men faced with this will have to…

- Put down a hard "No!"
- "You cannot do this and remain married to me."
- "Your behavior is unacceptable to me."
- "My wife does not do this! You can do this if you want, but – listen carefully – MY wife does not do this!

But, I think that once it gets to this point, the marriage may well be over.

Case Study 2 – John and Nikole Mitchell

NovaSeeker wrote an exhaustive case study of one husband (John/H) and wife (Nikole/W) in his post, The Slow Train Wreck — A Cautionary Tale (2021-01-18).

Nikole Mitchell's transformation.

NovaSeeker's excellent follow-up post on John and Nikole, The Train Wreck – Speculative causes, influences, and alternate outcomes (2021-02-01), indicated some of the early warning signs, and how the husband should have responded. Here I'll address a question that was brought up in this post, "What could her husband have done in response?"

The husband's first response to a charge like this is to refuse to admit her argument. Almost all the time, he has to put down a hard "no". He has to draw a line in the sand and say "no more", and then he has to tell her to roll it back, and that she can't do those things anymore. Or, she can do those things, but there will be tough consequences. At worst, she will no longer be married to him.

Novaseeker added,

> Yes. H himself goes into exactly this in some detail in his YouTube interview with Rollo.
> Basically, H was conditioned not to interfere, as you say there. What made that eventually change was when she continued to post lingerie and other sexy professional shots for weeks on end on Instagram, and it was leading H to have panic attacks, elevated heart rate, sleeping problems and the like. It was flight/flight reaction, even though at first he mentally ran from the obvious conclusion as to what was causing it. Once he could deny the cause no longer, he put his foot down, finally, told W it had to stop, and the marriage ended. He fully recognizes that he waited far too long to do that, but I think, from everything I have heard and read about their relationship from the beginning, and as that was reflected and documented in the IG record, that dynamic in the relationship went back to day one, so it would have been no small task to "reset" it at any time during the course of relationship. He picked the worst time, and he admits that openly, but my own view is that if he pushed back earlier, the marriage would have ended earlier […] once 2016 happened, the die was cast, more or less.
> For people in other relationships, if you already have a dynamic like H and W had (Christian egalitarian/complementarian) then be prepared for something to blow up at some stage unless you reset the dynamic now, when you have the chance. Bear in mind that resetting the dynamic at any time, even when there is no pending crisis, can in and of itself result in the marriage ending if the wife decides she "doesn't want a > marriage like that". But if you don't do it in order to avoid that, you may very well end up in the same place. The moral is "do not have a marriage like that" […] but if you're already in one, well […] you have your work cut out for you, that's for sure.

This is true. What Nikole did was not so much change the rules, but continue moving in the same direction as the preexisting rules suggested would be acceptable. What happens with men trying to turn their marriages around, especially going Red Pill, is that they are not only stopping the flow, but reversing it, regressing it, and setting a new set of rules and expectations.

Case Study 3 – Mr. and Mrs. Deti (My Own Marriage)

My marriage started out much like John and Nikole – egalitarian/complementarian, but with a less than optimal sex life. As you can imagine, the honeymoon didn't last long. Eventually, there came a time when I couldn't take it anymore.

It got so bad that I upped the ante and Pushed the Line. I imposed a new set of rules and standards Mrs. Deti had to comply with, or the marriage would end. I took enormous risks in doing so. I knew full well I would see one of two reactions:

1. She digs in her heels and refuses, in which case the marriage would end at great financial cost to me, social cost to her, and emotional/mental costs to our kids; or…
2. She accedes to the "new normal", in which case we go into uncharted territory and we proceed slow and steady and in which I must have a firm hand on the wheel from here on out.

I think that if I had forced the changes in year 1 or 2 when we were childless, or even in year 5 when we had a 2-year-old, the marriage probably would have ended. Forcing the changes in year 15 was different probably due to our age and maturity, the crippling financial and social consequences we would have sustained, and the attitude I think she had of, "I did pick him, I did promise him, I know what God has said about this, and do I really want to 'die on this hill'? Do I really want to force the issue, because, well, I think he's really serious and I think he means it." And, well, I was dead serious and I did mean it. I was prepared to walk that all the way out, hard as it would have been.

Novaseeker commented on the last line in bold.

> "I agree with the principle that this kind of resolve is required to turn things around in terms of reversing an established dynamic, but the issue here is Christianity as well. Different kinds of Christians have different kinds of rules about divorce, but none of us permits divorce because our wife won't agree to a certain relationship dynamic — rightly or wrongly. If you make a credible threat to walk, and you do walk, knowing that this is not "accepted" as a reason for divorce in your church, you could be making a mistake of eternal proportions, I think.
> It's truly a box for Christian men.
>
> The only real solution is as Oscar says — marry a true outlier woman and vet her for compliance/agreeableness, hard, during the courtship phase and avoid the issue from day one.
> Of course, it can still go sideways, as Ton says happened in his marriage (people can always change, and some people will change in ways that are not predictable), but your risks seem lower if you do it this way."

Deti's Advice on how a Husband can Approach and Demand

Men can stave off a full blown crisis situation, or at least keep eyes on it, by:

1. Managing the household finances. I don't think husbands should delegate this task to wives. I think husbands should do it. Husbands need to know where the money comes from, where it's spent, and who is spending it.
2. Laying down clear expectations for the relationship from the get go.

These expectations are…

1. Frequent sex at reasonable intervals. No exceptions. No excuses. Deposit copious amounts of yourself into her, frequently, as often as you reasonably want, and she needs to be open to that and cooperate fully. A married woman has frequent sex with her husband. Period. Full stop. She starts withholding unreasonably, you call it out, immediately, and you tell her this is absolutely unacceptable. You're going to leave for a bit and give her some time to think about whether she wants to continue being married to you and that upon your return, you will expect an answer and then conduct consistent with said answer. A married woman does not act like that. A married woman does not refuse her H unreasonably. She doesn't like it, there's the door.

2. No contact whatsoever with exes. None. No talking, no social media, no DMs, no "catching up", no "we're just friends now". A married woman does not act like that. A married woman does not maintain any contact with men she used to date/have sex with. She can act like this if she wants, but she will be doing it as a divorced woman.
3. No close personal friendships with other men. No talking, no social media, no texting, no DMs, no "we're just friends", no getting lunch together, no "work spouses". A married woman does not act like that. A married woman does not get overly familiar with men she isn't married to. A married woman does not maintain close personal friendships with ANY men other than her husband, regardless of her intentions, the men's intentions, or the nature of their acquaintance (personal, church, professional, etc.).
4. No posting lots of selfies on social media and especially no posting selfies in sexy or suggestive clothing. Lots of selfies on Farcebook or IG or other social media sends the following message: "Check me out. Aren't I hot? Wouldn't you like to have sex with me? If I think you're attractive, I might, despite being married. Even if I wouldn't have sex with any of you, I really really love the attention I get from this." A married woman does not act like that. A married woman does not let anyone see the goods even if she has no intention of letting anyone sample the goods. A married woman does not let anyone even think that they might have a chance to see the goods.

She doesn't like that? There's the door.

Note: Jack gave a list of his expectations in a comment. Derek's expectations are here.

Conclusions

I'm setting this out not to pat myself on the back, but to illustrate one possible result when a man forces new rules to stop a wife's marital misconduct. A possible result from slamming the brakes on the marriage, bringing it to a complete skidding stop, turning the vehicle around, and forcing a complete change in direction. "Either the car stops now and we're going somewhere else, or I'm bailing at full speed and that won't be pretty."

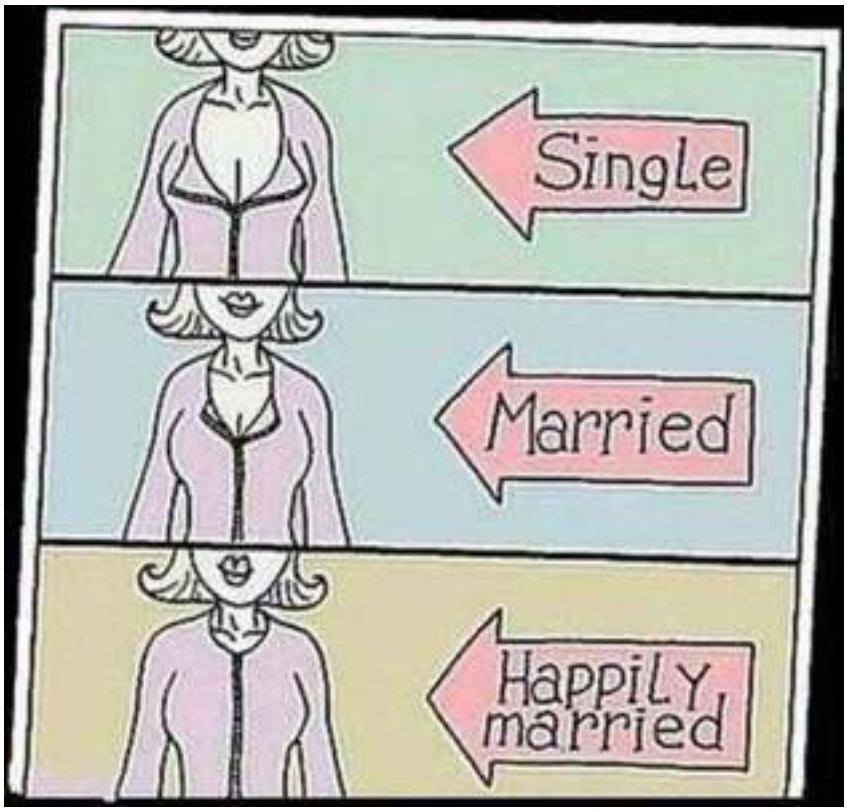
I don't care that this sounds abusive or controlling. I don't care that this sounds restrictive. The fact is that a woman who agrees to marry agrees to forsake all others, leave her family, and cleave to her husband. In this context, cleave means she joins herself to him in such a way that she can't be separated from him. So she agreed to those restrictions. She agreed to give up much of her control over and freedom with her own life (as he agreed to do the same with his life). She agreed she would do those things for him. She agreed to "have and to hold". She made promises to him. She needs to either keep those promises or leave the marriage, or not make the promises in the first place. She doesn't get to have it both ways. She doesn't get to have all the benefits of marriage with none of the obligations. She doesn't get to be a married woman but act like an unmarried woman. No. Men have to say "no".



We need to teach our sons, brothers, nephews, grandsons, etc. that it's crucial for them to test the women they date for agreeableness. Find opportunities to tell her "NO!" There's no need to be mean about it. Calmly tell her "no", and see how she reacts to it. If she digs in her heels, it's a hard out.

Teenage Romantic Comedies of the 80s

This month's theme is about Dating and the SMP. To kick things off, this post will review several films from yesteryear that I've collected here for the sake of having a little snapshot of 80s pop history. This should give us an idea of how far we've regressed.

The Wedding Singer (1998 ca. 1985)

In 1985, Robbie Hart (Adam Sandler) is an engaging and entertaining wedding singer from Ridgefield, New Jersey. He is engaged to his long-time girlfriend, Linda (Angela Featherstone), but she dumps him at the altar because he became a wedding singer instead of a rock star.

Robbie meets and befriends a waitress, Julia Sullivan (Drew Barrymore), at the reception hall where he regularly performs. Julia is also engaged, to businessman Glenn Gulia (Matthew Glave). Hart promises to sing at their wedding. Through a series of unbelievable twists and dramatic turns, Julia decides to jilt Glenn and go for Robbie, just in the nick of time before the wedding.

Redpill is seeing through the lie that Julia would have left handsome, rich, jerky Glenn Goolia for Hart, simply because he's so sweet and funny and Glenn is a bit of jerk! We know what would really go down — She'll F*ck the musician and marry the rich jerk. AF/BB in action!

A Red Pill analysis would immediately see this sitromcom as a recipe for illicit sex on the fly!

- Aspiring rock star musician who has a tryst with an engaged woman — check.
- Rich guy who habitually cheats, even after marriage — check.
- Engaged woman has a liaison with a musician in her wedding troupe — check.

But incredibly, all these tropes flew under the radar because the entire movie casts Robbie Hart (Adam Sandler) as a hopeless doting idiotic simp who can call upon the immediate sympathies of rock star Billy Idol, Hell's Angels thugs, bottom level SMV oddballs, and everyone else around them. This was held up as an icon of romanticism for the average man.

Some Kind of Wonderful (1987)

Working class misfits Keith Nelson (Eric Stoltz) and the tomgirlish Watts (Mary Stuart Masterson) are "good friends" (AKA the friend zone).

Watts dumps her best friend/first love (Keith Nelson) with some sappy tripe about wanting to be liked by him, and then immediately picks up with another guy.

But when Keith asks out the most popular girl in school, Amanda Jones (Lea Thompson), Watts realizes that "her feelings for him are much deeper". In today's Red Pill parlance, we would say that jealousy and preselection kicked in.

Meanwhile, Amanda has an ex-boyfriend from the rich side of town, Hardy Jenns (Craig Sheffer), which offers us an example of hypergamy. He also fits the bill as a Chadwick who plots trouble for Keith by inviting him and Amanda to a party after their date. Keith finds out about the plot, believing Amanda to be party to it, but goes ahead with the date anyway. In spite of this, he spends money he saved for college and roped in Watts to be a chauffeur to help make the date special. (He's gotta work for her love and "convince" her!) At Jenns's party, the timely arrival of other "misfits" saves Keith from being beaten up. Keith tells Jenns he is "over" and Amanda slaps Jenns's face. In the end, Amanda decides that Keith is "too Beta", and that she needs to learn to stand on her own — a nice homage to the Strong Independent Woman (SIW) archetype.

At the end, Keith catches up to Watts and they kiss, supporting the idea that men will take whatever they can get, and that the determined tomgirl wins in the end — more reinforcement for the SIW archetype.

Red Pill Analysis: Watts is a gold digger and branch swinger. She leads men on in an effort to make other men jealous. She habitually judges men, and calls them stupid and pathetic to their faces. She reads sex into every single statement, makes it out to be contemptible, and projects that onto men. Yet, the men are always on the ready to come bouncing back at her beck and call. That's P*ssy Power!

Amanda is kind of the opposite from Watts. She's pretty and sweet on the outside, but its all for attention and popularity, and therefore she's totally unreliable as a partner. At the least expected moment, she'll dump the guy she's with just because she feeelz like it.

But somehow, we never identified these behaviors as being common, much less as attention wh0ring, female hypergamy, and branch swinging and how the men themselves enabled it. Instead, young men of the time watched this movie and idolized Watts as the perfect hot babe who "just needs a little lovin'."

Pretty in Pink (1986)

Andie Walsh (Molly Ringwald) is another girl from the wrong side of town who is set forth as the zenith of beauty and love to die for. The movie drags us through the typical high school drama surrounding socioeconomic class based cliques, and Andie's escapades with a few admirers, including Steff McKee (James Spader), Phil "Duckie" Dale (John Cryer), and Blane McDonough (Andrew McCarthy). At the end of the film, dopey drooling Blane declares his undying love for Andie at the prom. Then her date, Stuckie, calmly folds his hands and tells her to go to him. Stuckie immediately gets picked up by another girl who's even hotter.

Yeah… Riiight!!!

Duckie is the quintessential case study on what not to be and do as a man.

Redpill is seeing through the lie that some guy wrote in my HS yearbook: "Stay sweet and the girls will love you to death."

Say Anything (1989)

Let's not forget Say Anything, where babyface John Cusack does the ultimate in creepy by going to his ex-girlfriend, Lone Skye's house at 10 p.m. holding up a boombox and blasting Peter Gabriel's song, "In Your Eyes" – and this was touted as the very pinnacle in sexual attractiveness and relationship skill.

Here's an excerpt of this movie for the younger audiences. The part described is shown at 3:03.

In all actuality, this was merely a display of desperate male thirst, which women eat up as a form of attention and validation. Considering all his humility and wearing his heart on his shirtsleeve, a Red Pill assessment would predict that Ione Skye's character (Diane) would never go back to Cusack's character (Lloyd). But this is not what we see in the movie. Instead, Diane goes to England on a college scholarship, and she reconciles with Lloyd, and invites him to travel to Britain with her. So in the end, Lloyd leaves his life to be with her. How f'ing Blue Pill is that? HE is leaving HIS life to follow a woman!

I know of too many relationships and marriages that have fallen apart or suffered mightily because he moved for her. He left a career or opportunities to follow a woman. Women hate it when men do this. Women have no respect for men who do this.

The thing is that this was the cultural zeitgeist circa 1977-1990. This is what boys were being raised on. This is what boys were being told to do and be. This – especially Say Anything – was held up as the gold standard for how women wanted to be treated and swooned over and claimed moistened their nether regions.

Pure bunk, every last bit of it.

Case Study — Jack's Youth Pastor endorsed Say Anything

When I was in high school, I asked my youth pastor for some ideas about where to go and what to do on a date. Without hesitation, he told me to go see the movie, Say Anything, so I put that movie on my "to do list". So both the content of that movie, and taking dates to see it, and movies like it, became my benchmark of male Christian behavior towards women.

But I never got many dates, and the few I had didn't last longer than a couple outings.

When I told him, "It's not working", he told me, "Just be yourself."

I asked him, "What do you mean, 'be yourself'?"

He just sighed and glared at me as if I said something rude.

Overall, I could pick up that there was something he was not telling me. At another occasion, he confided in me that he had "dated hundreds of girls" while he was in high school and college. Since he was my youth pastor, I interpreted "dated" as something quite innocent, but by the time I reached my 30s, I realized that he was using this word as a polite euphemism for sex.

Yeah… my youth pastor!*

 For reference, my youth pastor was born in 1953, which puts his formative age right at the height of the Hippie movement of "Free Love".*

The Human Be-In (1971). Note the dazed child at right.

Looking back through the Red Pill Lens

When I watch these old films now, here's what I see.

- Arrogant, self-centered teenage women.
- Pedestalized girls high on P*ssy Power.
- Men giving women the P*ssy Pass at every turn.
- Women picking and choosing among the men, double dipping, dropping one to pick up with another, and it's all done with no common courtesy whatsoever.
- 70+% of these movies are consumed by female dialogue.
- The controlling, angry father archetype makes an appearance in every single movie.
- Men are dressed in the height of fashion (hairspray, round sunglasses, leather ties, trenchcoats, etc.)
- All the men are stuck in a hopeless Blue Pill mindset, doing backflips for modest female attention, a date, or a kiss. Chivalry anyone?
- Men have the deer in the headlights look, always looking at the girls with gaping mouths.

What is really amazing to me now is that we men swallowed all these Blue Pill tropes hook, line, and stinker. Only a select few men, like my pastor, were truly in the know about women, but they betrayed us all by pressing forth the Blue Pill standard.

Red Pill showed it for the BS it is. This isn't how you get attractive. The truth is…

- Women want a sexy man who is already attractive to be accommodating and compliant towards her, and her alone.
- Women want a guy who could totally cheat on her anytime he wants, but he doesn't.
- Women want a guy who is nice to her and is a total A-hole to everyone else.

That was, and still is, the truth.

Red Pill movies were present in the 80s, but few and far between

There were a couple exceptions to all the Blue Pill crap of the 1980s.

The Karate Kid (1984)

The Karate Kid depicted the lead character, Daniel, as a struggling young man who found a masculine mentor and role model in Mr. Miyagi. Daniel had some Game and was nice enough looking.

The Karate Kid 2 (1986)

In the sequel, Daniel picks up with a Japanese girl, Kumiko, which makes sense in light of his being mentored by Mr. Miyagi. They also make a better couple too, partially because the girl is humble, pure-minded, family oriented, and not encumbered by feminist indoctrination. This allows Daniel's heart to come out in a more authentic manner. (Red Pill readers should notice all the IOIs she sends to Daniel in the video below, and also how Daniel's eyes light up in a way they didn't with Ali before.) These days, W/LM-AF pairings are generally scorned, which in retrospect, kinda confirms the films' Red Pill status.

The Last American Virgin (1982)

No discussion of this is complete without discussion of The Last American Virgin, which was the most Red Pill movie of the 1980s. That's if you don't count the sex comedy movies like Porky's and the like, which weren't really Pill movies — they were self parodying gaffes in which the directors poked fun at common icons of non-masculinity, and essentially said, "if you want to be a decent guy, don't fing act like these guys".

The thing is, although Red Pill wisdom was to be found here and there, it was far from young men's consciousness as being the norm. Even when it appeared, it was not well explained, and was generally assessed as a problem specific only to losers — not as the norm.

Epilogue

Blue Pill mentality has always had the arrogant notion that the man can pick and choose whatever woman he likes, and it's just a matter of convincing the girl of his "undying love and devotion". In fact, nothing could be further from the truth. Men of this mindset have absolutely zero women knocking on their doors at 2 a.m.

And yet, we arrogantly believed that all would be well.

This naïve arrogance shows up most frequently when men rate women on the 1 to 10 scale. Although this in itself is not naïve nor arrogant, it's just a short hand way of communicating a woman's relative SMV. However, it invariably shows up as a Beta mindset of pedestalizing women, and is somewhat juvenile too. I don't know where this comes from, but I'll guess that maybe watching too much p0rn amplifies this metacognition.

From a practical standpoint and also in accordance to Scott's Axiom, women do the choosing. Men and women would be infinitely better off by following the Volitional Model of Cascade Courtship (2021-11-15). Instead of discussing attraction ratings, men should be discussing how women display IOIs and to whom, and why, how their honey craft skills make them feel, shared values, and overall how well a particular woman fits into a certain man's systemic world view. These are things that translate directly into real relationship potential.

The Young Man's Problem

The Dire Desire

We are not designed to be alone. We are designed to live in relationship with others. Out of all of our relationships we are were designed to experience unique intimacy and joy with one other person in a relationship so important that God made it the earthly model of His relationship with His kids. Sex within marriage is how this happens. The desire to attain this relationship when single is highly motivating and the hurt and pain that stems from sexlessness in marriage is nearly all consuming (years of personal experience) because we were designed by God to experience the joy and intimacy of sex with a spouse. This is why sex is part of a wife's calling as her husband's helpmate.

A key developmental milestone for a man is his relationship to his own sexuality, and I mean that in the broadest possible terms, "sex" including his maleness, his masculinity, and his manhood.

There isn't a man alive who hasn't wanted sex and couldn't get it. This has happened to EVERY man IN THE WORLD. I don't know ANY man who hasn't gone through a period of sexual frustration and forced celibacy.

The man who wants sex (which is almost all men) and who cannot get it, loses a piece of his humanity. He becomes less human, less masculine, less "a man", even if only in his own eyes and in relationship to himself. It causes great distraction and excruciating pain. It causes emotional instability and mental disorders.

It can be maddening. Can't concentrate. Can't relax. Can't stop being self-conscious. Spending 70% of all my energy trying to fight against nature. 90% of my thoughts are about mind control and not about anything beyond "managing" myself. Always jerking off and can't stop, and feeling guilty and ashamed of it. My grandparents' generation typically referred to this as a "young man's problem". It's a huge burden.

It gets much worse. Jason pointed out that men who don't have sex for whatever reason, whether they are incels or volcels, and regardless of LAMPS attributes, including men of faith who choose to wait, are typically seen as backwards, socially inept losers, "betas", "lesser men", or "not real men". Even if it is not explicitly said, it is felt and implied.

The "loss of humanity" and "feel like a lesser man" comments (mentioned above) were intended to capture how inceldom tends to make men feel about themselves, not how they should be seen by other men.

The Waiting (Caterpillar345's Testimony)

I am in my mid 20's. I grew up in a good Christian home, regularly attend church, serve/lead on the technical crews (which aligns with my abilities), and have a good (probably very good, for my age) Biblical understanding. I spent several years with my head down and got a STEM degree without partying and carousing in college, assuming that this would be looked upon favorably in the future. I have a good paying job in my field and live on my own with paid-for vehicles and no debt. I have hobbies including ones that involve using my hands and building things (and I don't play video games). I'm not overweight and am reasonably fit; although I'm not an athletic stud, I certainly hold my own with backpacking, mountain biking, motorcycles, rock climbing, downhill skiing, etc. The church I attend is fairly conservative (not SSM affirming, no women pastors/teachers, sermons always refer to scripture as their basis, etc.). I'm not a particularly charismatic or extroverted man but I work on putting myself out there. And yet, it seems the women I meet (in the church or certainly those not in the church) are not interested in what I'm offering, or are not currently (or on track to be) the Proverbs 31 woman I'm looking for.

I alternate between:

- Seeing the vision of what a Godly marriage could be and having faith/hope that if I keep doing what I can then God will direct my path to put me in contact with such a woman and bless me with a Godly marriage.
- Hopelessness about finding such a woman and the fact that God isn't making any promises to give me such a woman and accepting that I may never have that, meaning a continued celibate life, which causes me to feel guilty about being faithless.
- Frustration about being in this position, trying to figure out how to get there by hook or crook (such as fornicating if the opportunity presented itself), and again feeling guilty about not having faith that God can provide, and then feeling that I'm having a victim mindset for "trusting God to provide" instead of doing something about it to solve the problem.
- Frustration towards God because He gave me my sexual nature and said that "a good wife is from the LORD", and "it is not good for the man to be alone", and then "don't fornicate either", but here I am on my own.

I can only assume that:

- My attitude, emotions, and social skills still need work in order to be attractive (which is likely).
- I need to spend more time in the gym and get ripped (which couldn't hurt).
- I am not trusting in God to provide so He isn't providing for me.
- I still have things to learn before God will bless me in this way.

And yet, none of that takes away from the fact that, as Jack commented:

> "It's maddening. Can't concentrate. Can't relax. Can't stop being self-conscious. Spending 70% of all my energy trying to fight against nature. 90% of my thoughts are about mind control and not about anything beyond "managing" myself. Always jerking off and can't stop, and feeling guilty and ashamed of it. My grandparents' generation typically referred to this as a "young man's problem". It's a huge burden."

Sex is NOT a need on the same level as food, water, sleep, and air. A man will not die without having sex, as evidenced by incels, monks, and any of us who go without sex for an extended period of time. But I do agree it is a deep-seated need for men in the way that Jack mentioned in his comment.

I guess I do feel like a "lesser" man or that part of my masculinity is missing because I'm not successful with women, if that is defined by sleeping with one (or more) of them or being married. But it's really hard to ignore all of the above and just redefine "success" to be "faithful in God's eyes because I kept myself from fornicating, even though it was never available to me as an option." I try hard not to be bitter or resentful about it but the thought of being in Jason's position in another 20 years is not very encouraging.

The Silence

The expression of a man's sexual desire has become verboten. Most men are required to neuter themselves in public. They aren't permitted to express themselves as men… because most men are not sexually attractive. It's because people have a lot of discomfort with bottom 80% men expressing themselves as men. Part of expressing oneself as a man is through masculinity which includes his sexual desire and desire for sex. It's because, if you have that desire, you probably will, at some point, act on it, and women DO NOT want bottom 80% men acting on their sexual desires toward them. Or in public.

Especially not in church!

Men are not supposed to be men in or around church. Men are supposed to be good little beta bitchbois with their heads bowed in eternal submission to everyone. They're to submit to their wives, to other women, and to the effeminate pastor who screams "HOW DARE YOU!" at them. They're never ever to express that they are sexual beings who desire sexual congress with women they're attracted to. They're not to feel that, experience that, want that, or even SAY that they want that. They sure as hell are not to act on it or act like that in any way whatsoever. In Churchian World, even men feeling or expressing sexual desire for attractive women is bad, wrong, evil, immoral, perverted, sick, and criminal.

Yes, "neutering" men is one of the culture's highest priorities, and what passes for "the church" these days has capitulated fully to the culture. Therefore…

We men must now neuter ourselves and render ourselves sexual blanks to be in a church body.

This statement (in bold) cannot really be taken as satire.

But it gets worse, much worse.

Even if a man does his very best to hold his primal nature in check while pretending to be a listless automaton, it is still not sufficient! We must not even allow ourselves to talk about male sexuality, because that would suggest lewdness, fornication, and other expressions of "toxic masculinity".

The Church and most Christians really do have a problem with talking about sex and male sexuality. Never mind that women's secret lives are 10 times worse.

Note also that the "church" doesn't have the guts to say this directly, even though it's clearly what their behavior and attitudes endorse. Like the world it worships, the "church" lies and obfuscates compulsively.

Gee. I wonder why men are leaving the church. Why, oh why, might that be happening? Such a conundrum, I cannot imagine why men might feel unwelcome at a place where talking about and facing up to something essential to them as men is viewed as anathema and unChristian.

There's nothing to "step up" to

In Step up, so they don't have to (part 1). (2017-5-10) and (part 2) (2017-5-12), St. Dalrock made light of the complementarian refrain that men need to "step up". "Man up" is a similar phrase heard in churchian circles with an emphasis on marrying single mothers. These phrases are deceptive, because in reality, men have no motivation to take responsibility for all the various social ills created by feminism and progressivism. It is preaching false bravado to mask paralyzing fear.

You want to know why men aren't "stepping up"? This is why…

- Because women are telling men they are nothing and they deserve nothing except whatever leftovers and table scraps some used up s1ut is willing to toss them, and because the Church fully endorses that viewpoint.
- Because the church is telling men they have to give all they have and then earn what they want from a s1ut who has nothing to give because she let dozens of other men jackhammer her heart into hamburger.
- Because the church is telling men they have to sit there and listen to some effeminate p_ssyboy who couldn't assert his way out of a wet paper sack tell them what masculinity is.

The church has largely succeeded in turning its men into not-men. And then they have the nerve to b!tch and complain that the not-men they demanded to be created are not men.

Conclusions

So you see, the issue behind The Young Man's Problem of today isn't really about sex and fornication (or the absence thereof), it's about whether masculinity is condemned or not, and whether expressions of masculinity are forbidden or not. Men are suffering because they're not finding any forms of masculine expression. Sex is only one such area in which the lack of masculine virility is acutely felt.

The wider culture imposes a double standard on men, saying in essence, "No masculinity allowed! No displays of masculinity… No TALK of masculinity! …but… if you're sexually active, then we'll have a bit more respect for you as one approved by the Gynapotheosis."

Hypocrisy!

The church is giving men essentially the exact same message only amplified with false religious guilt. The church capitalizes on the Biblical acumen of sexual desire and fornication, and magnifies this into a guilt-trip hot button, all accompanied by regular "man up" lectures given to the "lesser men" (those who aren't having sex), which is code for "masculinity is childish" and/or "worker ants go back to your cubicle and perform!"

This too is hypocrisy, because those men who are actually fornicating are usually given a pass, even within the church, unfortunately.*

All in all, the focus on sex (i.e. the lack, the absence, or the evils thereof) is used to hit men where it most hurts, derail the discussion of masculinity, and stuff men back into their pigeonholes.

Such is the experience of a young man, and this has grown exponentially worse over the last few decades.

 We Christians seriously need to rethink this paradigm and come up with a better system — something that would move men towards viable relationships and marriage instead of rewarding fornication. To this end, Jack has put forth a tentative model in the post, A Volitional Model of Cascade Courtship (2021-11-15).*

Introduction

Christians in today's society are in a catch 22. If you're a devout Christian man, you are expected to suppress your natural sexual urges. The Church expects suppression because you're a Christian and you're "not supposed to want" sex. Your natural desire for sex is considered to be sinful and "of the flesh". The World expects suppression because you're an unattractive, undesirable man.

If you're a devout Christian woman, OTOH, you are expected to do pretty much whatever you want. The Church will look the other way if you decide to have premarital sex. The World will encourage you and cheer you on for having premarital sex. Then, Christian women complain loudly that they can't find Christian men to marry.

Christian men and Christian women aren't finding each other. Christian women don't choose Christian men because they are not sufficiently sexually attractive or assertive. Christian men cannot attract any women, much less Christian women, in large part because they have not been taught how to develop sexual attractiveness; and are severely discouraged from expressing sexual attraction to any women. Most such men are even threatened away from participation. These men get nuclear rejected. Young women shame, intimidate, and threaten these men. Pastors and other church "men" threaten and intimidate these young men. As such, Christian men don't actively participate in any kind of dating/sexual marketplace.

Viewpoints

The Male Viewpoint

Most Christian men aren't attractive to any women, much less Christian women. This is largely because the Church has espoused the Blue Pill mentality so prevalent in the wider culture, and this, when combined with the Christian admonition to eschew sexual sin, has emasculated the men in the Church. The women who find Christian men attractive are several tiers below them on the SMV scale, and below the man's attraction threshold.

Men are excoriated for pursuing women, particularly in the Church. Any overt expression of male sexual interest is discouraged, sanctioned, and severely punished. Men are dissuaded and threatened away from sexual expression and even from wanting to have sex. Attractive Men who have real options to do so, take the hint and stay away from Church.

The Female Viewpoint

Christian women put on the appearance of devoutness and piety, but won't actually walk the walk. Christian women expect a dating, social, and sex life that very much resembles that of their secular sisters — so long as it takes place away from church and close family. Because they are women, they can get that. Because they are women, they take full advantage of all the benefits feminism got for them: Sexual conduct without judgment or consequence. They can do and say anything they want, anytime they want, anywhere they want, with or to anyone they want, and everyone looks the other way or cheers them on.

Widespread fornication throughout the culture pushes women's sexual expectations into the stratosphere. Christian men are not attractive men in part because they eschew sex and do not pursue sex, which makes them appear bland and unmasculine. Christian women will not show clear IOIs to Christian men. They expect to be pursued, or for "love" to strike suddenly. Women will have sex with nonChristian men or with Christian men who aren't really walking a Christian walk. They do this in part because devout Christian men who really are "walking the walk" aren't seen to be attractive.

Blithering bytches blithely boast that Bible based Billy is a boring buffoon in bed.

Present Choices

Men's Choices

Christian men have 3 choices:

1. Refuse to participate in the SMP (which is the defacto path to marriage) and go incel.
2. Wait until a Christian woman decides to marry him.
3. Sin, and have sex with whomever will deign to have sex with him (and hope that this might somehow, by the grace of God, lead to a "Christian" marriage).

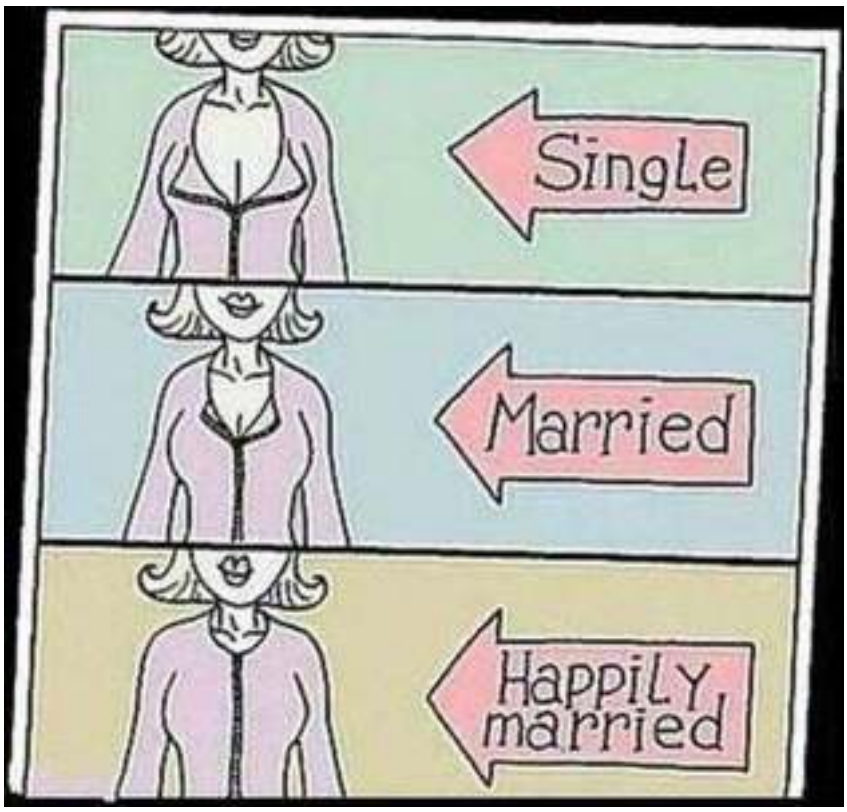
Given the fact that these choices are so few, and so poor, most Christian men have no real choices. They allow life and circumstance to force them into option 1, until years later when chance and circumstance present option 2. As for option 3, most Christian men cannot have premarital sex — they just aren't attractive enough to do that. Option 1 is scripturally sound, but its long term effects, including isolation, withdrawal, celibacy, solitude, and lack of human sexual contact, are damaging to most men, and in fact, are more damaging to men than they are to women.

Women's Choices

Christian women have 3 choices:

1. Refuse to participate and remain single.
2. Wait for marriage to an unattractive Christian man.
3. Sin, and have sex with attractive men.

Most Christian women choose option 3, mostly because they can, because there are no short term downsides to doing so, and because the alternatives are to waste their "fun" years or marry an unattractive man. Option 1 is scripturally sound but its long term effects on women include mental illness and emotional instability. Option 2 often results in infertility, interpersonal conflict, deep personal dissatisfaction, depression, and divorce.



As it Stands

As we can see from Viewpoints and Present Choices, there are several problems here:

1. The majority of Men aren't attractive.
2. The few attractive Men are getting a plethora of poon and have no incentive to choose one woman for marriage.
3. Men aren't allowed to show overt sexual interest.
4. Women aren't attracted to the Men they say they want.
5. Women are having sex with the Men they are attracted to.
6. Widespread fornication throughout the culture spoils women for marriage.
7. Widespread fornication throughout the culture spoils men's appreciation of women for marriage.

Overall, we're looking at unrestrained, runaway hypergamy, but in my view, 1 and 4 are the root issues. 3 is faux prudish denial, and the others are just plain sin.

Failures of the Church

In the wider Christian community especially RC and mainline Protestant, men and women ignore undisputed Scripture and tradition on Christian sexual morality. Almost no one even tries to adhere to Christian sexual morality. Extramarital sex is strongly frowned on and discouraged, but this is only lip service. As a practical matter, everyone knows that almost all Christian women and a lot of Christian men are fornicating or have fornicated. Things are said about it, sometimes, but nothing is done about it. Everyone looks the other way whenever it comes up. Although artificial birth control is expressly contrary to RC doctrine, many Catholics use it and don't make much secret of it. This has been going on for decades in the US — it was going on with people my parents' age (early Boomers), it went on with my generation (Xers), and it continues unabated among subsequent generations.

It's something, isn't it? Christian women have prolific premarital illicit sex, sometimes with multiple men in succession, and no one bats an eye. Meanwhile, an average Christian man only has to say that he wants to have sex, and every pastor and so-called “Christian family ministry” from here to the coast lose their minds. Christian men are being severely persecuted by their own people merely for wanting to do what their Christian sisters are getting away with with nonChristian men. These Christian men aren’t even getting to have any sex, and they’re being punished! Meanwhile, Christian women are fornicating, the Church knows they’re fornicating, and the Church lets them get away with it. This is abusive and unfair. It’s isn’t right, it isn’t scriptural, and it needs to stop.

The Church is no different from the wider secular culture!

As for the Church, I know what’s really going on there. Overrun by feminism and women’s feelings, the Church has gotten squeamish about men of average and below average attractiveness expressing sexual desire. We’re fine with it when attractive men want sex. But we sure don’t like it when Billy Beta wants in on the action. It’s OK for Will WorshipLeader and Alan AMOGPastor to talk about their sexual temptations. It’s even OK when Harley McBadboy shows up on Sunday and sends a wave of woos through the wimminz. But God forbid that Tom Teacher or Paul Plumber or Louie Lawyer or Stan STEMLord would ever express sexual interest in sexually attractive women. We just cannot have ordinary, average guys showing sexual interest. That’s “hyperaggressive” and “predatory”. That’s “sick” and “sinful” and “carnal” and “perverted”.

This is wrong. It is counterscriptural, and the Church needs to be called out on it and confronted on this at every turn.

This is truly the unsolvable problem of our age. It is said that Christian men are “supposed to” pursue; but as I mentioned before, Men are severely punished for overt sexual interest in women, including Christian women, and even for being honest about merely wanting sex. Christian women are not attracted to Christian men and do not want them. If a Christian woman wants marriage, she must either remain celibate or marry a man she’s not sexually attracted to. For those few men who have options and the ability to marry, there is little to no incentive for them to marry either. Most men of this caliber would prefer to leave the church altogether and take advantage of the copious opportunities to sleep around. Christian men and Christian women simply aren’t suited for each other.

The Church is doing exactly nothing to help solve this problem, and in fact is exacerbating it.

The Empty Set of Solutions

I posited a possible solution to this problem: Christian women who are serious about dating and marrying the Christian men they say they want need to start living that out. They need to take at least some initiative here. They need to be very clear about their wanting those men. They need to start dating, marrying, and having sex with those men, and they need to start having those men's babies. They cannot wait until they're 29.999, and then decide. It's too late then.

But I was told this was an unworkable solution, because "those men aren't attractive!" Christian women aren't sexually attracted to those men. They don't want those men. So, to force the issue by expecting Christian women to show interest in and marry men they don't want is just not going to work. I was also scolded that "sexual pursuit is masculine and it is something that women just should not be doing. We need to have the men do the pursuing. That's men's job."

So in the final analysis, there is no real solution today other than that which Novaseeker outlined in The Cross of Our Age (2021 May 3). Christian men and women must either remain celibate or marry. But these choices are too unpalatable for most, especially in a culture drenched in sex. Most devout men have no choice — it will be involuntary celibacy for them. A few will marry worn out, post-wall women who don't want them and aren't sexually attracted to them. The tiny remnant of women who choose to remain devout will either become voluntarily celibate, or marry men they aren't sexually attracted to.

The Christian men who can, will leave the faith and have sex. Most Christian women have already "left" in spirit, and are having, or have had, sex.

This is the natural result of living in a culture that prioritizes sex above all else — God's provisions and purposes cannot take precedence.

There is no palatable solution, really. None to be had. Christian men aren't attractive. Christian women don't want them. Christian men cannot get attractive enough even for Christian women because Christian sexual morality constrains and restrains their conduct. Christian women have sex with nonChristian men because there's no short term reason not to. This problem cannot be solved, because I know most Christian men won't improve, most Christian women won't adhere to Christian sexual morality, and the Church will not change.

Actionable Steps

Men

Resolve the question of lordship. Who will your lord and master be? Decide that, and then walk it out. Face the fact that you probably will not marry. If you do, you'll probably marry someone who didn't want you and who isn't sexually attracted to you.

If you are resolved to marry, then you need to improve your attractiveness. Get in the gym, lose the weight, put on muscle mass, and get in shape. Learn what women are attracted to. Don't give of yourself to any woman who isn't responding in kind. Don't put up with poor treatment from anyone, much less women.

Women

If you will not adhere to Christian sexual morality, then complete your exodus and stop calling yourselves Christians. Submit yourselves wholly to the world and the prince of the power of the air, who is your lord. Stop complaining about "where are all the good men?", because it's insincere. You don't want those men, so stop lying to yourselves and to everyone else that you do.

If you are going to adhere to Christian sexual morality, then be accountable and answerable to those in authority over you. Limit your dating pools to Christian men, pick one, submit to him, and marry him as soon as possible. If you really want these Christian men you claim to want, then prove it — pick one, marry him, have sex with him, and have his babies. Submit to him, do what he says, and build a life with him.

The Church

If the church wants to do anything about this, I have a few suggestions:

- Stop confusing role with purpose. Stop confusing function with mission. The function of husband and role of father are NOT missions or purposes. A man's purpose is to glorify God; his mission is the means by which he accomplishes that purpose. Encourage men to find their missions to serve their purposes of bringing glory to God, and that mission is almost never through being a husband to a woman or through being a father to children.
- Get the hierarchy straight. Submission and Respect: Children –> Woman –> Man –> God. Love: God –> man –> woman –> children.
- Get the scripture straight. You all need to start getting comfortable with "submit" and "submission". You all have no problem telling men to submit to God and earthly authority. You need to start teaching girls about submitting to their fathers and wives to submit to their husbands. That means girls and women have to do what the men in authority over them tell them to do, just as men must do what God asks of them. Stop getting squeamish about the word "submission". If that makes some girls and women unhappy, so be it, and too d@mn bad. Let them leave.
- Start imposing hard Christian sexual morality on women too. Stop excusing women's fornication. Start calling out women who do this. Start confronting it squarely, and start demanding their adherence to the same Christian sexual morality the Church demands of men. Start holding the women in your charge accountable, stop looking the other way, and stop excusing their clearly sinful and disobedient conduct. It's not fair and the men in your charge know d@mn well it's not fair. And you know it as well. This right here is the number one reason men are leaving your churches — because you abuse them and you don't treat them fairly. You let girls get away with much worse conduct than what you punish boys for.
- Stop the useless "men's ministries" that consist of Saturday mornings with coffee and donuts and some stupid sermonette about how terrible and sinful the men in your charge are, and how they "need to do better." Those men are NOT horrible and terrible merely because they want to have sex with attractive women. Those men are NOT horrible and terrible merely because they want their wives to keep the promises they made. They are MEN. They want, need, and desire things too, and those things do not sully them or lessen them.

- Stop punishing men for clearly appropriate expressions of sexual interest.
- Stop harping incessantly about porn, masturbation, and "adultery in [one's] heart." It's not going to shut down their human nature.
- Stop telling these men they need to pursue and marry women who don't want them. Please, just stop.
- Stop bashing men with platitudes about how he needs to "man up" and marry a slut. Just stop talking.
- Stop lecturing men about dating, mating, sex, marriage, and sexual nature. You clearly don't know what you're talking about. Women are not "slow cookers" and do not take a long time to "warm up" sexually. No, women will screw on a dime when a 6-6-6 man ramps up the sexual tension. Godliness, virtue, self-restraint, niceness, and kindness are not sexually attractive traits in men. You really should stop expressing any opinions about any of this from here on out.
- Stop abusing and flagellating the men in your charge. Stop doing more damage.
- Start coming alongside these men and helping them — real help about the real problems they come to you with.

Online Dating Continues to Grow Amid Lockdown

Before the covid lockdowns hit, we thought the hookup scene couldn't get any crazier!

One might guess that the COVID scare and the resulting lockdowns would dampen the dating scene. However, a review of statistics like those shown below indicate that dating apps certainly didn't slow down during the lockdown. In fact, they picked up!

The lockdown caused many people to flock to dating apps as a substitute for the reduced human interaction, especially women who were presumably bored and starved for attention!

Social Apps Target the Missing Piece

We might expect singles to launch into a dating frenzy coming out of lockdown, but here is evidence to the contrary. According to this article from Aljazeera: Dating apps find users want friends, not sex, in post-COVID world (2021-06-22), it is apparent that the lockdown has led many people to reconsider their purposes for using dating apps and similar social media.

The headline reads,

> "Apps like Tinder and Bumble are launching or acquiring new services focused entirely on making and maintaining friends."

I can imagine that these sites may have been concerned about an anticipated decline in activity due to the lockdown and therefore cooked up these additional social venues for buffering their user bases. But OTOH, maybe they are opportunistically following the market demands of users to acquire more revenue.

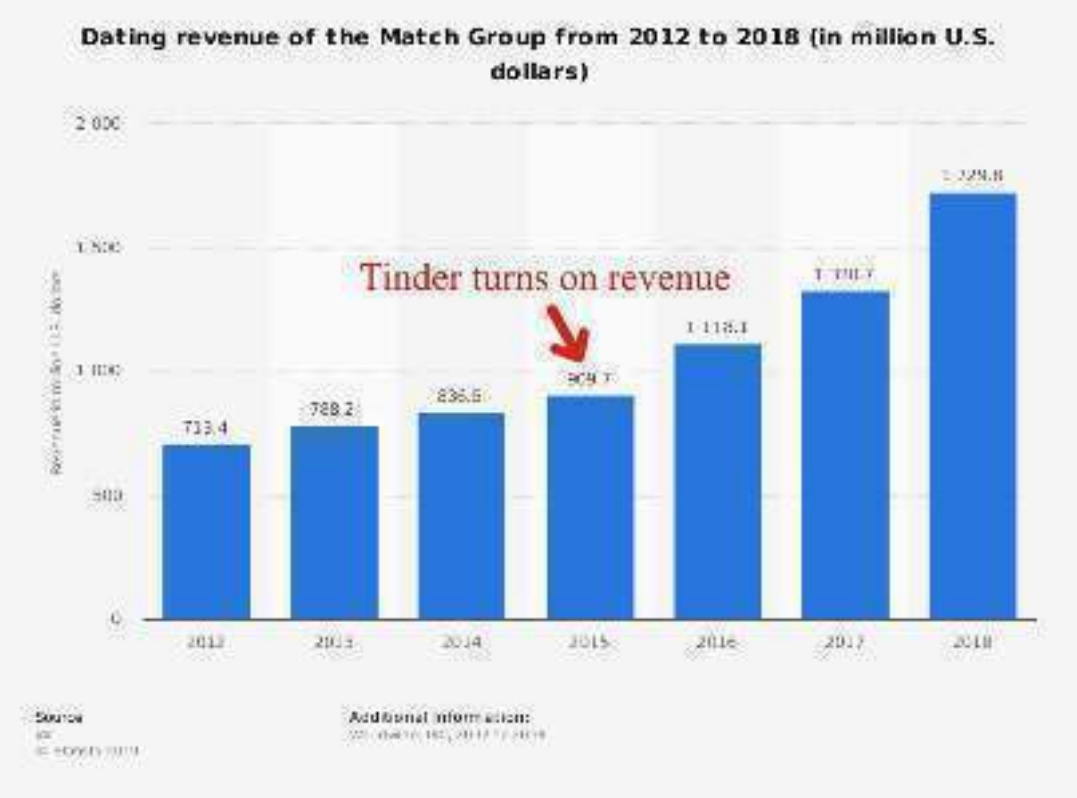

Image Source: UX Collective: Product lessons from how Tinder de-stigmatized online dating and won (2019-2-19)
The article at Aljazeera explains…

> "Amorous entanglements are not what is uppermost in the minds of many people emerging from long periods of pandemic isolation. Instead, they crave the friendships and social groups they have been starved of over the past year.
> That is the verdict of dating apps such as Tinder and Bumble, which are launching or acquiring new services focused entirely on making and maintaining friends."

Jess Carbino, an online dating expert and former sociologist for Tinder and Bumble, told Reuters that social isolation had been "staggering" due to the pandemic, particularly for single people living alone.

> "[The lockdown] has inspired people to use the tools available to them, namely technology, to find companionship and connection."

Evercore analyst Shweta Kharjuria explains how it makes sound business sense to court more customers.

> "These friendship services have seen increased engagement from users since COVID-19 restrictions have gradually been lifted around the world, allowing people to meet in person. […] This opens up the total available market from targeting only singles to singles and married people…"

Apparently, these sites have done their research and are responding to popular demand.

Absence makes the heart grow tender, not Tinder

I can't believe that the singles who use these apps and were sexually active before the lockdown just went cold turkey incel after the lockdown. Instead, I tend to believe that many, if not most single people, had a sneaky "regular" on hand, a live-in lover, or a neighbor, or a coworker, who received the butt of their sexual attentions whenever their pangs of desire struck.

The thing that went missing during lockdown was not sex per se, but this generalized nonsexual social interaction with larger groups of people. When this went missing, then people realized how important it was and started to appreciate it.

Hence…

> "There's a really interesting trend that has been taking place in the connection space, which is this desire to have platonic relationships," said Bumble founder and CEO Whitney Wolfe Herd.
> "People are seeking friendship in ways they would have only done offline before the pandemic."

Yes, if you're stuck at home, even with the perfect lover at the constant ready, that will get old really fast without regular social interaction.

Facts and Quotes

Aljazeera's article has a number of interesting facts and quotes, which I've summarized below.

Friend-making networks such as MeetMe and Yubo have even outstripped some popular dating apps in terms of daily engagement over the past few months, according to market research firm Apptopia.

> Meetup, which helps you meet people with similar interests at local or online events, has seen a 22-percent rise in new members since January [2021].
> Meetup's most searched word this year was "friends".

Really? If that's true, then the lockdown has had the effect of a soft SMP reset.

Rosie, a 24-year-old dental nurse living in the city of Bristol in southwestern England, struggled to connect with her older co-workers during lockdown and began using Bumble BFF to meet new people. She says,

> "I'm a very sociable person and like meeting new people, but never found the opportunities. I've gone from having just Vodafone texting me to this app buzzing quite a bit, which is nice, it seems a lot of girls are in my position…"

Nupur, a 25-year-old teacher from the city of Pune in western India, uses both Tinder and Bumble. She said the apps' efforts to promote themselves as a way of finding friends rather than just hook-ups and love "could work very well".

> "I've met a couple of people online and we've met up and have been friends for more than a year now."

But while women are having much success with the new system, there are many men who disagree. A 22 year old male French student is quoted to say,

> "Getting the momentum going is hard online and if everything IRL (in real life) is closed… You never really connect until you meet in person."

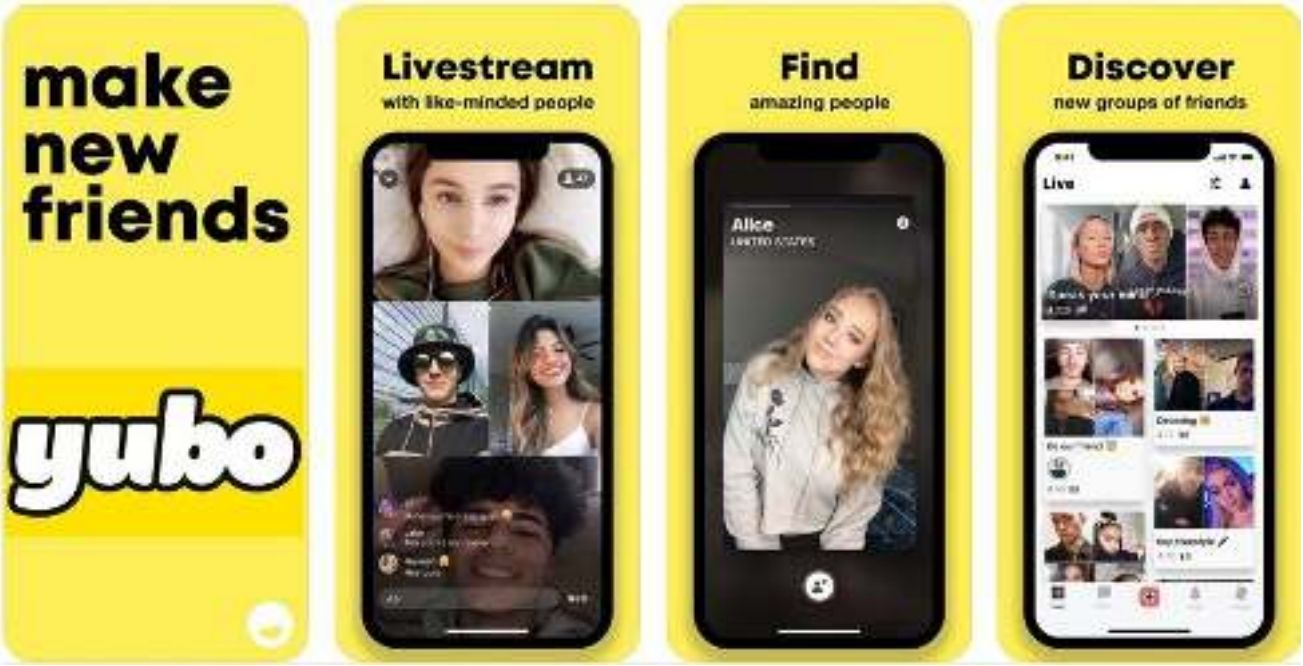
Yes, I can see how using online apps to meet friends would work much better for women than men.

Other Reasons Why Friendship-Based Apps are Gaining Traction

It's Safer for Men — Since smartphones became ubiquitous, people have engaged in much less generalized social interaction with many different people. The feminist controlled cold war between the sexes has further choked off congenial social interaction and has essentially forced it to be limited to internet venues. Hence, the popular explosion of sites like OnlyFans. Men who prefer genuine relationships over OASIS, and are wary of the risks involved with male-female interaction and dating sites in general may prefer a venue in which friendship is the stated purpose.

It's Safer for Women — Women are experts in Exploiting Online Attention, and are quite skilled in using internet based venues to satisfy their cravings for attention and social interaction. A friendship-based site may offer many of the same conveniences and benefits, but with much less unwanted attention from low SMV men. It's also much easier for women to let hopeful men down gently and justifiably, as the venue itself is for "friendships".

It's Convenient for All — Friendship-based apps offer the same benefits as dating apps, namely the digital speed, prodigious opportunities for meeting others, the ability to filter for what one wants, and screen out what one doesn't, all available at one's fingertips in a comfortable, safe, and relatively sheltered environment.



Trends are here to stay

As we have seen over the last decade or two, the goals of LGBTQ+ activism are somewhat of an indicator of where social trends are headed. Likewise, the article states that LGBTQ+ dating apps have spearheaded the push for more social networking focused on users' personal interests, rather than solely a hook-up service centered on physical looks and proximity.

Christof Witting, the founder and CEO of one gay dating app, Hornet, said the number of people looking for friendship and community online had increased during lockdowns when people turned to digital platforms for "a sense of belonging" when bars, gyms, and pride events were shuttered. The number of users tapping the newsfeed, comments, and videos on Hornet rose 37% from January to May [2021]. Witting also said it was unlikely that people would revert to the "old ways" of connecting with their community exclusively offline, such as through nightlife, activism or LGBTQ sport events.

> "These trends are here to stay," he added. "Just like video conferencing and telecommuting."

I believe Witting is right. This will also hold true for non-LGBTQ+ social apps as well. Given the ease and convenience of meeting like-minded people over the internet, coupled with the demise of Farcebook, apps like this will be used as a selection filter for social gatherings of the future.

Reflections

What Hitting Bottom will look like (2021-02-10) predicted a dissolution and reintegration of society and the Socio-Sexual/Marriage Marketplace (SSMMP), including…

- The Sexual Revolution and 3rd and 4th Wave Feminism created many conundrums, dilemmas, and confusion in the SSMMP, resulting in an untenable mess of divorce, broken families, broken men, transactional sex, unregulated female power, undeterred hypergamy, s1uttery, and wh0redom.
- Women without a covenant covering, causing their shame and ignominy (e.g. wine and cats).
- A judgment on society, which will hit women the hardest.
- Widespread economic upheaval, despair, and despondency.

The lockdown, and many of the social changes that have resulted from it such as the one described above, are leading us closer to the edge. Are we there yet?

The Movie

The dating project is an hour long movie, produced by PureFlix (the producer of many a film that Dalrock has hilariously disparaged in the past). In short, if your favorite genre of film is corny Christians living in a rainbow-fluff world where everything ends happily-ever-after, PureFlix produced it.

Of note, *Boundless has been peddling this movie, The Dating Project, for quite a while now.

The film itself starts out with an interesting statistic: "For the first time in history, 50% of America is single." As of 2014, this statistic was true, with 50.2% of Americans over the age of 16 being unmarried. The statistic doesn't necessarily account for cohabiting couples or couples who live in different residences, and also defines 16 and up as "adult" persons. However, I will say something from my own personal observations that is even more dramatic – this is the first generation where those who desire to be married are finding that it seems impossible to find a spouse!

It's no joke.

Speaking from experience, I've known many individuals who experienced difficulty in finding a suitable marriage partner as early as the 1990s and 2000s, but only because they chose to do things God's way – skip "dating", and proceed directly to marriage. For reference, see Jack's Dating Experiences in College (2018-3-25). For most others, marriage was certainly postponed, but most people got around to it eventually.

Then the so called Purity Movement in the 2000s had the effect of undermining Christianality by revealing it for the farce that it was. The once popular, high opinion of Marriage took a prickly muff dive after this.

Apparently, it's only gotten worse over the past decade.

The content of this film indicates that we have regressed so far now, that even dating seems sophisticated by comparison. Young people are so awkward and fearful of social cohesion, and so solipsistic about LTRs, that they don't even know how to date, and marriage isn't even a consideration!

Dating is Recast as a Homework Assignment

In response to this ignorance about dating, one host personality in the film, Professor Kerry Cronin (AKA "The Dating Professor"), gives students an "assignment" to go on a date.

Prof. Cronin gives her "Levels of Dating" as follows.

1. Less than $10 for 60 minutes if things are going well, 90 minutes max.
2. Undefined.
3. Discovering if you can lean into them emotionally.

Cronin also has a list of "rules" about dating.

One of the rules include this one. "If you don't know by the third date if you have a romantic interest in them, then let them go." I'm aware that this is standard advice for those who don't believe in Christ, but this is awful advice for the Christian.

Interestingly enough, the professor encourages the female students to consider men in their group of friends, or those who have good qualities, but don't necessarily have the greatest of looks. Not surprisingly, the female student responds by saying she wants to keep those guys "in reserve" for later.

Guys listen up, this mindset is standard in the culture, even in the church – women will ignore great relationship material in order to focus on fleshly desires. If you are a Christian, you are better off ignoring that person entirely.

Hooking Up In the Dark

When students at Boston College are interviewed about their dating assignments, despite having zero dating experience, they all admit to having hooked up. What I find to be absolutely bizarre, however, is that two of the men stated they felt better and more excited to go on a date than having sex. LOL!!! I can't even begin to comprehend those comments. As young as they are, there is no way they are that jaded.

One woman from the college, Shanzi, states that a hookup is judgment free and in the dark", whereas "dating subjects one to public scrutiny in the light." Her statement makes it crystal clear that young people are not only drawn to the sex, but also the spiritual darkness of hooking up. Cronin rightly acknowledges the absurdity of saying a date is more intimate than becoming one with someone's flesh [my words].

It just goes to show how culturally converged Churchianity has thoroughly gone to Churchistan.

Ignorance or Denial?

The first scenes feature college students, some 30 year olds, and a 40-year-old struggle to define what dating is. Although I understand that dating isn't "in," I found it very weird that people couldn't even define the term, especially those in their 30's and 40's.

Is it ignorance or denial? It's hard to comprehend just how young people could be this ignorant about dating. Maybe they felt ashamed and just didn't want to tell PureFlix what they truly thought.

Perhaps the participants couldn't define the term because they live in major metropolitan areas (NYC, Boston, LA, and Chicago). Would people in "flyover" country give similar responses? Based on my experience, I would say, probably yes. With the advent of cable TV and social media, there really aren't any regional subcultures in America anymore.

More interesting are the comments inferring that "dating" is something middle and high schoolers do. Oh, middle schoolers "date" now?

One scene later in the film attempted a little more false honesty by saying that the term "hookup" is used as an ambiguous term that encompasses many, and contradictory activities. I was not convinced and found this to be a total copout. The purpose of a hookup is for sex, and those who try to define it differently either (1) have a limited and false definition of sexual activity; (2) are too embarrassed about their own sexual indiscretions, maybe even including hookups or ONS; or (3) are socially retarded. The incorrect use of the word "hookup" does not impact the definition of the term, but reflects the intelligence and honesty of the person using it.

So again, why is this film being hawked by a "Christian" ministry (Boundless)?

Distracted or Drifting?

Ironically, one woman says, "people in my culture don't know what their end goal is." I agree, and think it's mostly true. However, I think if the film explored the topic of relationships further, they would find that people are single, not because they don't know what their purpose in dating is, but because they reject marriage.

Yes, they reject marriage. Women reject marriage until it's not a viable option. As for men, the incel group is excluded from marriage. MGTOWs patently reject marriage. The remaining few men who are active in the SMP don't experience the frustrating difficulty of finding a spouse because they have no desire to be married. As a result, we see that marriage isn't even a consideration in their minds.

One big reason why women and the latter group of men have no desire to marry is because they are hooking up prolifically (a polite euphemism for fornicating). Why buy the cow when the udder is free?

All through 40+ minutes of dancing around the issues, the movie never makes the clear point that there is no incentive to date (or marry) when sex comes cheap and easy. The directors chose to ignore this, or have missed it entirely. Do they think such a blatant omission is required for a "Christian audience"? If so, then they're disrespecting the average Christian's valuation of the truth.

Instead, the film is about the American ~~non~~culture in general, and without actually defining the problem, and only a symptom of it, prescribes "dating" as an answer!

Yes, dating! I can't wrap my head around the fact that we now live in an age when dating is a mystery – so much so that it requires a Pureflix film to present a convincing argument that it is a better alternative than hooking up!

Either way, we're NEVER getting away from forning around!

Personalities

While watching this movie, I coined my own nicknames for several of the characters, such as "Busted in Boston", "Desperate in Chicago", "Lost in LA", and "Naïve in NYC".

The majority of the film follows a cast of characters from all walks of life who are either trying to understand why they want to date and learn how to do it, or people who want to date, yet can't find a date. Some of those interviewed, like Cecilia (Busted in Boston), didn't even want to engage in the mating market at all, even though they were deathly afraid of remaining single forever.

One of the more interesting characters is Chris (Lost in LA), a man in his 40s who started off saying he was "not serious about a relationship," and quite frankly, he seemed absolutely lost in life. Although it was never explicitly stated, it's inferred that he has gotten more out of past relationships than what the Biblical standard would allow.

Chris makes several good observations about the paradox of choice in the dating market: it's like window shopping, and we are given so many options that we throw out the good in hopes of the perfect.

Chris later remarks that:

> "…if you are physically intimate with a person without knowing what they think about [things such as babies, marriage, divorce, friendship, etc.], you are in a minefield without a map."

Chris gets it to some extent, but none of them seem to comprehend the fact that prolific promiscuity causes one's character to crumble.

Impressions

These interviews show how empty sex is, not only when it's not coupled with commitment, but also when you have an extensive history. The interviews also show how fragile the egos are for most people in their 20's and 30's. To be terrified of asking someone out to a $10 ice cream, but to be willing to have sex with a random person at a party reflects an incredible lack of maturity and confidence. It's like the current millennial generation is a bunch of shell-shocked walking-wounded.

The desperate woman from Chicago touches on this:

> "…maybe we are afraid of getting hurt or we are already hurt and don't want it to happen again. But that's depriving yourself to feel."

A lot of those interviewed have such a negative impression of intersexual relations that they have very little interest in pursuing an LTR, and even dating is regarded as a challenge that is incommensurate to the benefits.

The hookup culture has not only spoiled these young people for marriage, but even for dating too!

Other notable moments from the film:

- ¾ of the women at dinner in Chicago had no problem with a man who watches porn while in a relationship! This is the exact opposite of what we hear from Christian wives.
- "Knowing your own worth" comes at a cost.
- Spending time crushing on a person sets up a false image of them in your head.
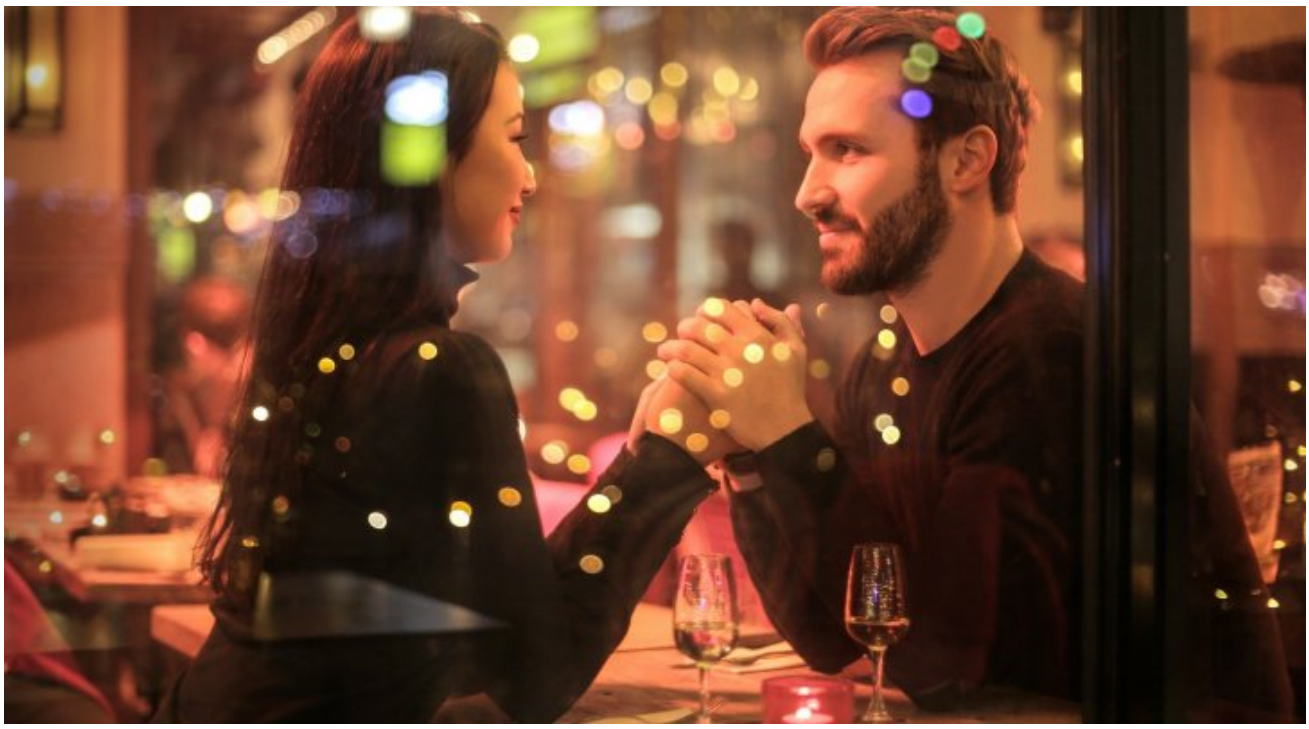
- Women put their career first, did not prioritize marriage, and then are surprised they aren't married. (SHOCKER, RIGHT?!)
- The woman from NYC says that womanhood and marriage needs to be preached from the pulpit, and that everyone is afraid of rejection. I agree with this 100%. The topics of Manhood, womanhood, marriage, relationships, etc. are swept under the rug by every group of Christians in the United States. It's rare to find a ministry that gives half decent relationship advice, let alone biblically wise advice.

Conclusions

It is surprising that this movie is endorsed by Boundless because it doesn't advocate the Christian perspective. While it does interview two possible believers, it makes no reference to marriage as something for people to consider, which is oddly inconsistent with the purported theme of the movie. After all, the entire opening of the film plays up the "tragedy" that 50% of the country is not married.

Instead, the overall goal of the film, in my opinion, is to get people to participate in "dating," as defined by Professor Kerry Cronin, "The Dating Professor," a person I have heard of through media. But if indeed the goal of the film is to increase dating among 18-40 year olds, I think it absolutely fails at being convincing. It completely fails at presenting a thesis: it offers a solution, yet doesn't define the problem, doesn't explain how the solution will work, or why you should try their solution. At least the portions of the film featuring the Boston College students reveal the reason why youth are uninterested in long term relationships.



To some degree, the movie is a catharsis that gives Christian viewers a false sense of familiarity by presenting a white washed image of “dating” among “Christians”, while at the same time, it tells of sociosexual interactions that would be unnerving if not shocking to conservative or older viewers. So reactions may vary depending on one’s age and past experiences.

Although it presents dating as a better alternative than hooking up, it gives off hints that neither one is very Christian at all. In this view, it fails as a Christian film. However, it does report some relevant information about what Christians are faced with in the current SMP, and therefore may have value to Christian audiences.

I recommend the film only because it highlights different attitudes about relationships that viewers can learn from, but only if they’re paying close attention.

If you watch this with a young person, son, or daughter, then be prepared to explain how hooking up works, translate all the rhetorical circumlocution offered by those involved in this subculture, and point out why the film is utterly wrong about “dating” as a Christian approach to marriage.

 I have followed the* Boundless blog and its Facebook page for several years, and have since been blocked and banned by their all-female staff, who promote nothing but heresies on their private Facebook groups. I have often wondered about the theology and quality of advice they give, and now realize it’s been mostly garbage. I started to notice about three years ago that their audience is overwhelmingly female, AND the males are either questionable, or get booted out of the forum quickly (they eventually kicked me out). My point is that I will never recommend or support Focus on the Family.

The Spiritual Force of Preselection

Preselection is a phenomenon in which women are magnetically drawn to men who are already taken. Preselection is known to impose an extremely heavy bias in women's psychology in sizing up a man. It is so strong that if a woman sincerely believes a man is taken, then she will feel more viscerally attracted to him, whether he is actually taken or not. For this reason, PUAs will often claim to have a wife or girlfriend, will wear a fake wedding band, or carry and show off a picture of himself with a beautiful woman who is purported/presumed to be his significant other.

How men experience preselection.

I've noticed a phenomenon that is similar to preselection, yet it has nuances that cannot be explained by our current understanding of preselection. Allow me to explain.

The Spiritual Force of one's Sexual Aura

The Manosphere's long-time understanding of the phenomenon of preselection is ostensibly based on whether a man is taken or not. But as we can observe from the examples of PUAs, a man doesn't need to be in a truly committed relationship for preselection to kick in. In fact, if a man has regular p00n at his disposal, women can sense this, and they find it sensually alluring. Likewise, if a man is NOT getting laid on the regular, women can sense this too and are repelled.

I've experienced this myself. There's been times in the past when my wife was upset about something and avoided having sexual intercourse with me for a couple weeks. During this time, it seemed like it was not only her who was repulsed by me, but all women in general seemed to regard me with disdain and hold me at arms length. They wouldn't come near me. They wouldn't talk to me unless it was of pressing importance. If I approached a woman to talk with her for whatever reason, then she was apprehensive and anxious to end the discussion.

At other times, my wife and I have cuddled and canoodled in cooperative coitus early in the morning after awakening, and this transformed my entire day. When I went out afterwards, women young and old were giving me sexualized attention. Female strangers gave me that intense gaze. Some couldn't break eye-contact. Others would break eye contact, but then I'd catch them looking at me again a moment later, and then again later on… They'd brush up against me as we passed each other on the sidewalk. I've even had some women feel my butt while I was pressing my way through a densely packed crowd!

The women I was well acquainted with were even bolder. They would stick around to talk with me as long as they could, IOIs galore, touching my arm or shoulder, or trying to hug me. I've even had women make innuendos and cat calls to me while standing outside of church with my wife standing next to me! (My wife would have b!tch-slapped those women if I did not restrain her.)

So how can having sex with my wife in private make such a big difference in my life in public?

Many of these women know that I am married, and those who don't know me personally can see me holding hands with my wife, but they treat me differently depending on whether I've inseminated my gism in her chasm that day or not. It's not the way I dress or anything else I am conscious of. I've dressed to kill, wore cottons, and went out in my athletic attire in both states of being well laid or not — all with the same results. I'm convinced that women can somehow sense that I've had sex, or I am sexually content, or feeling loved, or… or something… But I can't tell what or how. I don't know, maybe they can smell the pheromones.

I think this difference is not strictly determined by preselection as we currently understand it, or maybe it's a metaphysical nuance of preselection that has not been fully explored in the Manosphere.

What is happening Spiritually here?

Sex contributes to a man's confidence and sense of detachment, which masturbation alone doesn't accomplish. But it goes deeper than this. Having access to sex and sexualized attention, and experiencing love, bonding, and feeling accepted and blessed, are not a direct result of having sex per se, but rather an inherent result of being humbled and opening my heart, which is the overall effect that having sex has on a man. I could even believe that my wife's eagerness to engage in sexual relations with me was also a response to me being in this same state. It is confounding because I am not very well aware of when I am in this state.

I made a statement to this effect to my pastor once, when he asked me, "How does your sex life affect your relationship with God?"

I told him, "It's very clear to me that my relationship with God, and with other people too, is MUCH better when I have a regular and fulfilling sex life."

He said I had the correlation right, but the cause-effect relationship wrong. IOW, he was arguing that one will have a better sex life when one has a better relationship with God, as one is then humble and open-hearted. I told him that I see what he's saying, but it is sexual expression that causes one to become humble and open-hearted, so it's a two-way street. If being closer to God really produced a better sex life in that order, then the church would be thronging with people trying to get closer to God.

He was very annoyed by this, but said nothing more about it.

Questions for Discussion

1. What is your experience with this phenomenon?
2. How does your sex life affect your relationship with God?
3. How does your relationship with God affect your sex life?
4. In your view, what is the cause-and-effect relationship?

Introduction

Preselection is a thing because the prime manner in which women evaluate themselves and each other, and the way they confer status on each other in the feminine social matrix, is through the value and caliber of man each woman is able to get and keep. A man who can get many women to sleep with him presents as high value.

- For men, women get turned on by a guy who's having sex with other women, but not one who masturbates.
- For women, it is the opposite. Guys would get turned on by a woman who masturbates, but not one who's having sex with other men.

Women masturbating is always sexy because it signals sexual availability. It signals a woman who wants sex. But a woman having sex with other men signals other men have already claimed her and thus she is not sexually available.

Men masturbating is never sexy because the only reason a man masturbates is because he either cannot or will not get a woman to do it for him. A man who has had sex with other women signals competence, interpersonal acumen, and sexual attractiveness. A man who has had sex feels good about himself, because he's gotten this basic need satisfied. Now that sex is taken care of, he can go about doing all the other things he wants and needs to do.

Biblical Sexology argues that Masturbation Is NOT A Sin In The Bible (2022/2/11).* So the question then becomes whether it is helpful or not. Many people believe that masturbating before a date is beneficial to the outcome of the date. So this post examines the pros and cons of pre-date jerking.

 My take is that habitual wanking, especially with p0rn, is a symptom of The Blinding Obsession (i.e. the sin of lust). However, it also perpetuates that particular sin and kills discernment.*

Is jilling off before a date a good idea for women?

Here's an OnlyFans and Instagram model with 32,000+ followers who goes by the name Amber Sweetheart. This is the same Amber Sweetheart who authored the book, The Sexting Bible, and earns £71,000 every month teaching other people how to orgasm online. She says, "I have a legion of boyfriends online and I genuinely love every one of them"…

Yes, as a source of attention and income, I presume.

Note the Crazy Eyes and the stretch marks above her cleavage due to countless brutal t!tty F_ckings.
But of course, Amber is not content with having a legion of virtual textors. She needs some real time action with juice in her sluice. Her online work has most certainly led her to view all men (maybe women too) as sex objects, but this becomes a poignant problem when peter is present. The problem is that whenever she goes on a date, she hops on the stud too soon (in her opinion), and then regrets it, apparently.

But fortunately, Amber has discovered a convenient and enjoyable work-around to this problem. If she butters her muffin and jills off before going on a date, then this cools off her hot and bothered baby making engine and puts a damper on her bumper and a flower on her face.

She describes this technique in an article at the Daily Star (Sophie Roberts): 'I masturbate before dates so I'm not too randy to get to know men properly' (2021/8/3).

> "Not only is it the perfect opportunity for relaxation and self care, it also prevents her from getting too hot under the collar later on in the evening."
> "She can then get to know men properly instead of wanting to jump into bed with them straight away."

To Amber, "knowing men properly" is a hop, dip, and bump in the park away from the Biblical concept of "know". Amber says,

> "I have been in terrible relationships in the past because physically we were compatible."
> "Now I realise I was just horny at all times."
> "Now, by preventive masturbating I'm able to see what the guy is like and if we can bond well, without the physical aspect of it taking control as much."

It's hard to imagine how being "physically compatible" could lead to a terrible relationship, and why skinning the beaver doesn't drill a hole in the dyke, but the author of the article explains how diddling the cello can sweeten the harmony.

> "Masturbating before a date may not be a bad idea – especially as self love can have stress-busting benefits.
> This is because your body releases the "love" chemical called oxytocin when you orgasm.
> According to Healthline, masturbation can also "boost your mood" and "help you to relax".
>
> And that's not all.
> Dr Earim, Medical Director of wellness platform, Healthline, said: "Research and anecdotal reports suggest that sexual stimulation, like masturbation, can: relieve stress and tension, boost your mood, sleep better, improve your sex life by better understanding your wants and needs and so on."
> "Orgasm causes the release of endorphins, which are known to reduce stress and boost confidence.
> "Also released is serotonin, which is a known antidepressant."

Yes, but does fanning the fur make a Meet Cute possible? Not sure she's innocent enough to qualify!

In conclusion of this section, I want to point out that Amber's primary motivation for pre-date muff spanking is to maintain control, not only self control, but date control.

Is jacking off before a date a good idea for men?

I've heard some men give out advice to the same effect — that jacking off before a date calms a man's nerves* and increases his confidence around a girl.

However, a lot of people on /r/NoFap report the opposite. That women were more attracted to them as a result of not spanking the monkey.

Other men report that masturbating doesn't produce relaxation* or mental clarity in men. All it does is temporarily relieve the extreme sexual tension and pressure he's under every minute of every day of his life. All masturbation does for men is give him some release and take the edge off the crushing pressure.

 I think part of the variance in men's responses are based on what men mean by "calm and relaxed". Does it mean a lack of sexual tension, or does it mean he is at peace with himself? Women are attracted to the latter, but not the* former.

So it's hard to take a firm position one way or the other on spanking the monkey prior to a date. It's a choice each man has to make for himself. However, after considering all the information available in the Manosphere, it can be concluded that men should not apologize for their sexual nature because it is part of who we are. Nervous sexual tension is part of the masculine frame and the dance in navigating an interaction with a woman. If she notices your pants turning into a tent, tell her to take your stiffie as a compliment. Men would be better off to lead with that approach (in a controlled and respectable manner, of course), rather than knocking the edge off, and hopefully that confidence will come across.

Σ Frame Axiom 12: A rock hard stiffie is the greatest compliment a man could ever give to a woman.

Interestingly (and this is a mysterious aspect I don't completely understand), women seem to be able to detect the reason why a man has a cool cucumber, whether it's because he's been sluffing the surplus or inseminating poon, as I described in The Sweet Aroma of Love (2022/2/14). What is the difference that women are picking up on, assuming they don't know anything about a man's sex life? Pheromones? Sexual tension? ZFG? If it were just orgasm and release that caused hormonal changes in mood, etc., like RPA suggested, then masturbation should attract women too, but it doesn't. Compared to fapping, there's something different about coital sex that induces preselection, and it's not just body chemistry.

So the generalized answer to the titular question is no, masturbation (for men) does not improve preselection, it only reduces sexual tension and puts the man at ease with himself.

Conclusions

In conclusion, pre-jerking is bad advice for Christian men because it reduces his heart-felt passion and sexual tension. Slorish women want a passionless man because it gives her an edge in the power structure, not necessarily because they are more viscerally attracted to him, and this is not the kind of woman a Christian man should be aiming for. Women express preselection in favor of men who are wanted by other women enough to get laid regularly, not men who squeeze the joystick in a frantic effort to control the game — and women can tell the difference!

If your date is someone like Amber Sweetheart, then slogging the log before the fog sets in might help reduce the visceral temptation and view the interaction more objectively.

OTOH, if a nice nubile girl really likes you, an innocent Christian girl, then your nervous sexual tension combined with the lump in your pants will assure her that your desire is alive and kicking, AND that you're a "promise keeper". Wedding bells will chime in 6 weeks (if not sooner)!

Chocolates and flowers are sooo 1940s. Don't just say you love her — Show her! If a man is so horn dog hot that he loses his grip on his self-control and starts humping up her leg, that's probably the most poignant way that he can show her how much he loves her. It's also the best way for him to find out how much she really loves him. She'll either call 911 or else she'll go down on both knees to promise her undying love with the caress of her lips around the scepter of his power over her loins. This man magic can't happen if he's already slogged the log into flaccid obliviousness.

The difference is recreation vs. procreation. Thou must choose, and choose wisely.

Introduction

Scott wrote this about the Meet Cute experience,

> A "meet cute" is the American, socially normative way that couples meet and it doesn't matter if you are "Christian" or not. All efforts to combat it, to attack it, to change it on a massive scale have failed to date. Move to a commune, use Joshua Harris "kissed dating goodbye" methods, whatever–as soon as you tell THAT story to your friends, you are an oddball freakshow overly religious couple who don't have a meet cute story. Ewwwwwww.
> Now, this has implications that either…
>
> Christianity in America has become so indistinguishable, even on this very important issue so as to make it irrelevant as force on earth.

> There is some way to make Meet Cutes fit into a hybrid Christian model that is still God-honoring and holy (enough) to be pleasing to Him when He sees it.

We already know that the first option is true. However, this essay will hone in on Scott's last sentence, and investigate whether the Meet Cute can serve as a Christian approach to dating/courtship/marriage.

First of all, let's see if it actually fits the Christian mold.

A description of the Meet Cute as a Selection Model

Among Ed Hurst's archives, I found what appears to be a description of a Meet Cute as a basic selection model. But that's not all. Ed also described why it's better for the woman to choose the man, and how that glorifies God. Ed is writing from a Christian viewpoint.

> "Our men are conditioned to focus on the lust of the eyes and of the flesh. They are taught to pretend they aren't paying attention to that, but I can promise you that pink Cadillacs and the glitzy cosmetic barn paint that they represent do not convey God's way of projecting femininity. Just as manhood is not confined merely to muscles but morals, so womanhood is not enticing by cultural sexual attraction. Here's a clue: It's the male peacock who struts his stuff and the females who choose their mates. We have it backwards.
> Men, you do not pick your woman. That's because you have zero capability to choose wisely until way too late in life. She's ready to make babies by the time you have your first clue where God might be leading you. Our society frowns on men waiting until they are ready and taking a young wife, and we have zero cultural background for a community mate selection system, so we are left with letting her choose her man. She is better equipped to work out where she fits best, so the men need to keep their focus of projecting moral dominance. If you pursue the gal, it's virtually guaranteed you won't lay hold of God's best blessings in marriage. Make her choose you. She will let you know if she is ready to take you on. How that communication takes place is subject to a very wide range of variables. You may be the one to initiate all the conversation and social contacts, but it's up to her make the first signals, however subtle they may be.
> That's how you glorify God; sex on that path can't get any better in this life."
> Radix Fidem: God's Revelation on Sex (2014 October 21)

This confirms many of the conclusions we reached through our own discussions here about the Meet Cute, and were summarized in the post, On the Significance and Value of the Meet Cute Experience (2020-4-3).

Ontological Contexts of Meeting Someone

A previous post, "Biblical" Models of Courtship (2018-9-30) described three bare basic types of courtship models. These three types are briefly described below.

1. "Love" – Passionate, blind, feral instincts: e.g. Jacob and Rachel, David and Bathsheba, Amnon and Tamar. Also, dates, ONS's, hook-ups, etc. which develop into LTR's might fall into this category.
2. Arranged – The union is proscribed by parents, family, authorities, a decree, or by social customs, such as Judaic law: e.g. Jacob and Leah, Ruth, and Esther, Chinese filial piety, Indian match maker, etc.
3. Contrived – God plays a direct or indirect part in bringing two people together. e.g. Isaac and Rebecca…

Ed has described three possible avenues towards a God-honoring marriage. He emphasizes that in all three systems, men need to retain their focus on projecting moral dominance (e.g. moral guidance based feedback). I have summarized these systems and added names as follows.

1. Roman Holiday — Men can wait until they are ready (presumably in his mid-30s) and then take a younger wife. There are many benefits of this approach. One is that both are in their SMV peak and are likely to form a well-matched couple. Another is that it allows the man to choose freely as opposed to taking whatever comes along, or whatever he can get. The difficulty in implementing this approach is that it is not socially acceptable in the West.
2. A community-based mate selection system — (Here, "community" could include, but not be limited to church.) I imagine this would resemble what we think of being an arranged marriage or modern courtship. But we might be able to come up with something that functions the same, but which has a different form.
3. Meet Cute — Let natural feminine intuition and IOI's determine the best pairings. The benefits of this approach have been discussed above.

Putting it All Together

Now let's compare Ed's three avenues towards Christian marriage with the three types of "Biblical" courtship models above. We find that…

1. The Roman Holiday model strongly matches the Love model, but it could also be Arranged or Contrived.
2. A community-based selection system could possibly involve more than one, or all three of the Biblical models (Love, Arranged, or Contrived). Of note, I imagine this system could be developed and modified to include many of the advantageous features of the others.
3. A Meet Cute could also possibly involve more than one, or all three of the Biblical models (Love, Arranged, or Contrived).

Putting this all together, in total, that's 9 different possibile ways that a Christian couple could meet and progress towards marriage! (Granted, some ways are more Christian than others.)

These 9 ways are…

1. Roman Holiday + Love
2. An Arranged Roman Holiday (e.g. the boss befriends you and introduces you to his daughter)
3. A Roman Holiday Contrived by the Holy Spirit
4. Finding love within a Community (through participating in community service or other group activities)
5. Community Matchmaking
6. God Contrives a meeting within a Community (e.g. meeting someone on a mission trip, serving together in the worship team, etc.)
7. Have a Meet Cute by chance and fall in love (Scott's normative description, and this would require one to be somewhat of a social butterfly)
8. Arranged Meet Cute (most attempts would probably be a hit or miss)
9. Have a Meet Cute that is orchestrated by God somehow.

This is just a list of the basic set ups, but the particular combinations, contexts, settings, and situations are practically endless. A marriage minded man would do well to put himself in places where he could avail of as many of these opportunities as possible.

Is a Meet Cute from God?

Only God can grant us a successful marriage. As Christians who believe in the sovereignty of God, if we believe that chance encounters are arranged, or orchestrated by God, then this presents a strong argument that avenues 7, 9, and possibly 8 in the last list are from God. IOW, a Meet Cute in any of these three contexts could be from God, given certain limits. Readers who find this conclusion controversial may disagree and discuss below in the comments, but I do think there is a strong case for this to be true. If true, then this vastly magnifies the importance of men learning to read IOIs!

In support of this proposition, Scott pointed out that even years later, a couple's Meet Cute story takes on a mythological grandiosity, because women use it to determine the "authenticity" of the relationship.

He wrote,

> "Wives care about the story of how you met, not husbands
> It is the narrative filter they (and their envious single friends) use to decide if it is "true love"
> The story itself holds a magical/mystical power over the legitimacy of the relationship. It must a sufficient amount of fateful-bumped-into-my-soulmate aura around it to be a true love story."

It sounds confusing to men, but I wouldn't be surprised if women truly believe that a "valid" Meet Cute is Contrived by God. It also makes me wonder whether a relationship will be socially "approved", if a couple does not have a story worthy enough to convince others of their relationship's "authenticity".

Benefits of Using the Meet Cute as a Selection Model

Scott has counted several benefits of the Meet Cute. Perhaps the most sigificant benefit from a Christian perspective is that it forms an organic Tingly Respect relationship immediately from the get go. Because of the nature of the Tingly Respect model, the woman respects the man from her heart, and so there is little argument or resistance to the man's authority from the woman, as compared to other Archetype models. In addition, she is enthusiastic about sexual relations too, which is healthy and proper. In other words, authentic Headship, which is of primary importance in forming a relationship that glorifies God and receives His abundant blessings over the union, comes naturally and spontaneously. This alone poses a strong justification for using the Meet Cute as a selection model.

Perhaps the best part of adopting the Meet Cute as a vehicle of selection is that it's simple to do. All that men have to do is learn how to read IOIs and how to respond to them appropriately. Granted, this takes a bit of practice, but it does allow a man to depend on himself and on God to make things happen. He doesn't have to depend so much on a Christian community and the efforts and good will of others, and this aspect may be crucial when considering the fallen age in which we live.

Pay attention, men! Knowing the difference can mean a lifetime of pain, regret, and sorrow (left), or a lifetime of hot honeymuffin lovin' (right).

Problems with Using the Meet Cute as a Selection Model

In my experience, women are either hot to go, or not at all. And the ones who are hot for a man move pretty fast. By that I mean, once they decide on a man, they immediately proceed to have sexual relations. But if the man of their interest turns down their invitations to have sex, they tend to drop him immediately. So if men who are conscientiously marriage minded come across a woman like this, then this will be a source of intense temptation and frustration for him.

Now before we jump to the conclusion that women who move fast are just bad girls, we need to remember that this strong desire is exactly what qualifies her. Her heart felt passion is what makes the Meet Cute cute! As I've gotten older, and especially after taking the Red Pill, I've come to see that most women are like that, but only with certain men of course. Women have different preferences for different men, and if she's feeling really hot for a particular guy, then she'll move fast. (In today's world, there isn't much to stop them from acting on impulse.) So here, you'll want to make sure that you are that certain man, and that she's not just looking for sex with anyone.

Instead of feeling angry or disappointed that women are this way, we might do better to recognize that this is just how they are. We might even entertain the idea that God Himself created women to be c0ck crazy for (one) man. In response, men should attempt to get these women to think very seriously about marriage and preparing for the future.

I'm sure there are some women who don't give off IOIs and don't move fast. The best reason is because of inexperience, but it could also be because they are more self-aware, or more conscientious, or too proud to express their desire, or something else, but I think they are a minority. Some of these women might be better suited for marriage to certain men, but the Meet Cute model doesn't really take them into account, and it's really hard to identify them otherwise.

Conclusions

Before the turn of the century, the Meet Cute was the normative way that many couples got together. However, it was never considered to be a Christian approach to relationships and marriage. Perhaps now we should reconsider the Meet Cute as a very authentic, healthy, natural, and organic approach towards achieving a Christian marriage — one that is, by definition, characterized by Headship and God's blessings of bonding, joy, peace, sanctification, and sexual fulfillment.

Scott said that he has adopted the Meet Cute as a courtship model for his own children. He wrote,

> "I am leaning toward number two for my own kids. I am trying to make sure they have plenty of exposure to Christians of the opposite sex whose parents more or less agree with me about marriage and its purpose. We actually discuss this with our friends who kids around the same age as ours openly."

The New Red Pill for Online Dating

With the advent of online dating, Old School PUA tactics have morphed into a new expression of attractiveness, based on three qualifying traits.

The New Red Pill for Online Dating (OLD)

In general, guys, there is a large movement among the young away from the kinds of things most of us might associate with "Old School PUA", a la Heartiste / Krauser / Roissy / Rollo / Roosh / etc. (AKA the "Original Red Pill" or "ORP" dating from 2008-2018 or so), and towards a different set of practices. I think this change is largely because of a shift in socialization habits in which most young people, women and men alike, are now spending so much of their social lives online that they are frightened to be approached by strangers IRL.

In his post, Charting the Red Pill World (2021/3/26), Lexet described evidence for this shift as a recent emphasis on basic interaction skills.

> "The personalities on YouTube who have returned to "tactics" interact and/or coach young men on a daily basis. They are far more in tune with Zoomers than the rest of us. What they are saying is that their subscribers/fans/clients not only don't know how to talk to girls, but often times, they can't even hold a conversation with other people! It's a result of them being raised in a "social media world."

It's hard for us oldsters to believe that younger guys and girls can't even strike up a conversation with someone of the opposite sex. But Lexet provided us with a closer look at the social malaise among the younger set in his Film Review of The Dating Project (2022/2/11). Apparently, there is an overblown emphasis on sex and hooking up, and the accompanying dissipation has brought with it a sense of annui about dating and relationships in general.

The new set of practices is focused much more on…

1. "Looksmaxing" — This was a sidelight for the ORP but is a main part of current RP due to the rise of apps, all of which emphasize looks as primary.
2. "Text Game" – The ORP eschewed texting as a rule, which is simply not an option in the current world of online dating (OLD)/dating apps. You need to be good at it!
3. "Conversion" — i.e., the transition from virtual to real, being able to interact smoothly in the real world.

Of note, that last point is a serious challenge to many Zoomers.

This is in effect a new toolkit, and a different one from what the ORP proposed, because the environment changed dramatically. It's a new "Red Pill", and it isn't really "PUA" at all. It's just the basic skills young men need just to date successfully in a "normal" (that is not bars/clubs/pickup context) way. Because most of the young set grew up with a solid dependence on the internet, most real social skills are the hardest challenge of all. In contrast, older men, most men above 40, and almost all men north of 45 have had to develop social skills in order to survive.

A couple of interesting viewpoints about online dating for men have been posted over at Aaron Renn's site, The Masculinist. I'll use these to form the bases of a couple case studies, to emphasize my above points. Note that both of these guys are Christians.

Case Study 1 — Success

The first case study is from The Masculinist: How to Make the Most of Online Dating (2021/3/25). This article covers a user who has gotten positive or even great results in using dating apps. (Click on the link to read the details.)

Of note, this guy was rather short by women's standards (only 5'6″), however, he was well muscled and in good shape, and he has never had any issues attracting women.

First, he "looksmaxed". That isn't only about how you actually look, it's about how you present yourself in the app. After initial lackluster results in terms of women responding to him, he changed the pics in his profile to a set of professional photographer taken pics made during a trip to Europe a few years ago. He is also a generally very fashionable, upscale dresser, and this showed in his photos. After this one change, his responses from women skyrocketed.

Second, he focused on text game, both in his profile text and in his interactions. His key emphasis was on cocky-funny, teasing, hypergamy, light-heartedness, and not being a die-hard killjoy Christian hardass in profile and text.

And he rightly notes that texting has to lead to a fairly swift real life meet (within a week or two), otherwise it generally goes nowhere.

Third, he focused on "conversion" — that is, real life skills in interacting with people, with women, to get better at talking with women and therefore better at the process of interacting with someone in person, once you have passed the app screen.

Finally, it's notable that the successful guy used Bumble, which is an app that is women-centric in that women have to initiate all contact — men can only talk once a woman has messaged them. So it has the in-built strategy of waiting for women to approach you, once you make your peacock display. The successful dater in Renn's article did this, because he had the peacock to display, if you will, and notice that he was also indiscriminate — he had no selection/review strategy at all — once he had his pro pics up, he simply "yes" swiped every woman the app sent him, waited to see who approached him in text, and took it from there.

Case Study 2 — Failure

The other article is a negative review of OLD from a guy who wasn't very successful.

The Masculinist: My Experience with Online Dating (2021/3/22).

Renn's article explains pretty accurately the algorithms the apps use for matching, and why this is generally terrible for most normal guys.

This guy likely was not nearly as physically attractive relative to the kind of woman he was interested in dating. He was able to date women, but that's different than attracting women in a dating app environment which, as he says himself, puts you against the best of the best. He almost certainly didn't spend $500 on professional photos for his app profile like the successful online dater guy did. So he bombed point number 1.

His text game was hamfisted and his response timing was off cue. He couldn't turn text convos into dates within a very short time frame, so he blew point number 2 as well.

Since he didn't get many dates, he didn't have the opportunity to dive into point number 3. So looksmaxxing with the profile images and acing one's text game are obviously crucial to the process.

Unfortunately, Renn's recommendation here (date women for practice just to get better at speaking with women in a dating context) seems to me to be a chicken and egg problem — if the guys aren't getting dates, they're not going to be getting the experience they need to get better at dating in person. It's a catch 22 situation for men who struggle in dating, I think. It goes back to Scott's Trajectories.

Σ Frame Axiom 14, AKA The Law of Trajectories (Scott): What we learn through feedback loops early in life sets a trajectory that we follow throughout the remainder of our lives. It is exceedingly difficult to deviate from this trajectory, but small deviations are possible for a small number of innovative megafaith individuals.

Instead, I would recommend that guys should looksmax physically, and then also presentationally by upping your game with professional photos if you want to do well with attractive women on a dating app (and as the unsuccessful guy pointed out in his post, you can't even see attractive women on the app unless the app detects that you have a chance with them first).

Conclusions

After reviewing both case studies, we can see that both guys were capable of attracting women outside apps, but note that the opportunities to do so are limited in various ways. So there isn't really a substantial difference in attraction that accounts for the different results.

The key differences between the two men were in the approach. The successful guy pretty much followed the three points I mentioned at the top, whereas, the unsuccessful guy didn't make the most of himself in those ways.

In general, I think the successful online dater's approach is valid if you are very good looking and able to display that well in an app (it sure helps if one is naturally photogenic), and then couple that with very good textual and in person charm. That, to me, means a guy who is in the top 10-20%, which I think clearly the successful online dater guy was. I don't think it's really very transferable to other guys, at least not most of them.

Introduction

Earlier this month, I told a little story that compared the general impression of women who are socially smooth and sexed up, with those who are awkward and innocent. The story went like this.

> "[Back in 2001], I started attending a new church. The first couple Sundays, there were two college aged girls who took the opportunity to approach me and get to know me better. They were very friendly and we talked a long while, so at first, I thought they were expressing an interest in me. But after I became more acquainted with the people there, I discovered that these two girls already had steady boyfriends who were not regular church attendees. Those girls never told me this; it was the Pastor's wife. For some reason, having a boyfriend gave these girls the confidence to talk to other men. As time went on, I learned that there were other girls who were single and interested in me, but they didn't have the confidence to approach me. The only clue they gave off is that they became really animated and frighteningly giggly and silly whenever we were interacting. Nobody at all told me that these girls were interested in me. I only figured it out when a couple other guys started c0ck blocking me.

The thing I learned from this experience is that women who are more confident, forward, and relaxed about meeting men are usually already taken, and that is precisely why they are more confident, forward, and relaxed. So it's rather unrealistic to expect a single woman who is interested in you to initiate and do the pursuing. (Deti has pointed out that this is exactly what they should be doing, and I agree, but I think women aren't going to do that, so it's probably more practical for men to learn how to detect IOIs.)"

FrankChalmers2061 commented that…

> "…"frighteningly giggly and silly" girls often may be good wife material, but you wouldn't notice because they can't control themselves quite yet."

Ahh… Yessirree! The ditzy girl with the bird nest hair who is the star blithering buffoon of the church luncheon is the diamond in the rough who has the best potential of becoming a homemaking, hubby loving, treasure of flesh in the bed chamber. Wife her up and humble her thrice daily with regular mattress hammering; shape her by giving her moral based feedback, and she will be putty in your paws… and… she will be grateful!!!

Appearances can be Deceiving

Some girls are a Pain In The @ss (PITA), and when I say this, I don't mean contentious and b!tchy. I mean the girl is woefully awkward, "frighteningly giggly and silly", perhaps clingy, and frequently "over the top" with emotions and behaviors that come off as childish, embarrassing, or inappropriate. It would serve the common man better not to hold these behaviors against the girl in question, but rather to interpret these PITA behaviors as authentic, innocent, cute, and endearing.

It is extremely rare to find a woman who has never been "married" (viz. sexed up) and is not a PITA in some way, shape, or form. However, the pure, innocent PITA girl is an embarassment to a wickedly wizened society. Social forces and women's generalized need for attention and inclusion pushes young women to grow past their girlish PITA behaviors ASAP.

Instead, a sexed up society adores the salacious, slick, socially dexterous dame. This is why there is a mad rush to send all nubile young women off to college before they marry. It is assumed, but never ever stated, that sexperience is necessary to impart a level of sophistication and suave that betrays a self-awareness of carnal knowledge, and this is valued more than sexual purity and the sanctity of marriage. The fact that this sexually astute collection of traits comes at the cost of her innocence and future marital contentment is either deftly dismissed or swept under the carpet.

The slick, sophisticated, executive power dame.

The problem here for men, especially younger, inexperienced men, is manifold.

1. Internally, they naturally desire a woman who is already turn-key mature, sexed up, and polished, and they don't really understand how she got that way.
2. Externally, they're getting the cultural message that slick, sexed up women are the idealized norm.
3. To make matters worse, young men are strongly encouraged to take up with such a woman, even one with a kid in tow, and women themselves are the strongest proponents of this.

Thus, it is too easy for them to fall for the notion that a suave, sophisticated, socially skilled woman who presents herself well should naturally be easier to get along with and a better choice overall. But they don't realize that this is only an external appearance. Once a man gets into a relationship with her, it is revealed that it's all a mirage, and that the inner qualities that form a good wife have already been spoiled.

But the good thing about the PITA is that what you see is what you get. This is a benefit to marriage minded men, because the task cut out for moulding them into wives is clearly evident. There is no emotional baggage, and no shroud of vain pretenses that must be inveigled before getting down to the business of establishing moral feedback loops and trust.

Marriage and having children will also shape out the PITA; not because of any effort on her own part, but because husbands do the hard work of moulding their belovedly quirky PITA girls into wondrous wives. In addition, marriage and having children induces humility and maturity by giving a woman an intense culmination of purpose, responsibility, security, and status that allows her to face up to her foibles and frustrations within an environment of love and trust. Another way to state all this is that marriage and childbearing are the vehicles of God's grace bestowed on women.

So it's critically important for marriage minded men of faith to detect and sort out the differences.

Isn't it amazing what the imbuement of masculine sexual authority can do to a woman?

Sorting out the Differences

The basic task of differentiating between the PITA and the incorporated witch with a B lies not in how crazy she appears, but in discerning how much Heart Trust she conveys, and how humble she truly is. The PITA is obviously crazy, but also honest and trusting, and more or less frightened and unsure of herself; whereas the sparkling B witch hides her craziness behind a smooth outward velour; she defies and resists trust, and resorts to female evasion and control tactics in order to do so.

When a woman truly falls in love with a man, her inner heart is exposed, and her trust and respect come to the forefront. As a byproduct, her crazy inner self also comes out too. So if a girl is a raving PITA around you, there's a good chance that she actually loves you!

Moreover, this phenomenon is rather nuanced and subject to context, so to make this a little clearer to all our readers, I'll draw a comparison between women of different ages and statuses.

In the larger view, if a woman is a PITA, it suggests that she's truly single and has never had her holy of holies conquered by a man – but this is not always the case. Some PITA chicks suffer from poor breeding, or growing up without a father.

A young girl (~18-22) is a PITA because of her immaturity. One who's totally innocent and sexually pure will be naïvely optimistic about life and love and very clumsy when pulling off any feminine control tactics. In spite of all the troubles and headaches these lasses bring, even so, this is the best PITA to have.

A more mature unmarried woman (~23-27) will be looking for Tingle thrills, the "love" of high SMV men, and affirmation. There are two subtypes.

1. If this type of woman is giving you Head Trust (but not Heart Trust) and being a PITA, giving you S#!t tests, etc., then that's a bad sign that she's not really into you and is probably trying to control you for her own prerogatives.
2. If this type of woman is giving you Heart Trust, and you happen to hit her needs just right, then her heartlights will come on. IOW, she'll feel humbled, get possessive, and start to think of you as her own. In this case, if she is being a jealous PITA and giving you S#!t tests, that's probably a good sign that you've got her heart in a sling and that she really loves you.

By the time a woman nears the wall (~28-32), her personality has been set in stone, and any last remaining PITA behaviors have completed their transition into contentious b!tchyness. This transition is accelerated if she's abused herself sexually and has accumulated any emotional baggage. In the extreme case, it's possible that she's an alpha widowed ex carousel rider whose been used and abused for a long while.

In addition to this, her biological clock makes her a PITA on warp speed.

Because of their age and past sexperience, many of these women have learned to manage the most egregious aspects of their inner PITA, and as a result, they might seem very easy to get along with. But do not be deceived, dear brothers, for whatsoever a woman sows, that shall she also reap. After marriage, the full brunt force of her self-abuses for the past decade will finally come home to roost on the poor hubby she settled for.

Married women may also have PITA-like behaviors that often take the form of hyperdrama and sh!t tests. Most husbands interpret these behaviors as bothersome and emotionally taxing. But care should be taken to identify the underlying nature of these behaviors. Most of the time, wives will do these things to garner attention and/or control the man. But sometimes, wives are not specifically out to manipulate their husbands by being a PITA, they're just being their natural naughty selves, and they trust their husbands enough to let their inner PITA come through. This is actually a good sign for the relationship, as this is an impressionable moment that wise husbands can use to teach and mould their wives.

For those women who don't appear to meet the description of a PITA, here are some reasons why this might be.

1. You just don't know her that well yet.
2. She doesn't trust you enough to let her inner PITA show through.
3. She's a master of the Machiavellian arts.
4. She doesn't have a very strong emotional/sexual need (e.g. a low libido), and this could be because (1) it's her natural hormone condition, or (2) she's stoked up on hormonal birth control, or (3) she's already passed herself through the fire (a metaphor for the thorough exhaustion or depletion of their innate sexual desire by promiscuity, carousel riding, etc. AKA being dissipated, sexually burned out, or jaded).
5. She actually comes from a good quality home, and she has a good relationship with her father and/or Jesus.

Thou must discern wisely, my son!

Conclusions

When a woman truly falls in love with a man, her inner heart is exposed, and her trust and respect come to the forefront. When a woman really trusts a man, then she doesn't feel a strong need to hide her quirks and foibles in fear of being rejected by him. As a byproduct, her authentic, crazy inner self comes out, much to the man's chagrin. So if a girl is a raving PITA around you, there's a good chance that she's fresh and ready to be moulded by masculine love!

Young men should avoid chasing after shiny, smooth, well-polished examples of femininity, because women like this are already "married" in the colloquial sense. That is to say, they've already been hammered into shape by a man (or men), and this is what has refined them.

To have the best chances at marriage, a man has to do the hard work of hammering his own woman into shape. So choose one that is valuable raw material, one that is soft and malleable, and not already emotion/heart-hardened in the forge of sexperience.

How to Tell if Your Date might be an Adulteress

Sniffing out a cheating slore is not an easy task… unless you use discernment.

Introduction

Back in 2019, Boxer at v5k2c2 (now defunct) and I coauthored a series about older women in the SMP, cougars, divorced MILF's, and their children. During our private communications regarding these posts, Boxer asked me,

> "Did you ever establish any specific "tells" or markers that clued you in to the fact that a b!tch is still married and/or attached? This is an undertheorized topic that could be valuable."

Aside from her wearing a wedding band and openly declaring her status as a married woman, determining a woman's actual marital status is not so clear cut. Married women looking to jack a Chad and cuck their hubbies can be extremely discreet about their liaisons, especially if their man is the jealous type.

Back in my younger days of hooting and rooting and hunting for a wife, I always steered clear of married hoes by a wide margin. But you can never know for sure. But looking back, I'm pretty sure I dated a few that would qualify as an adulteress by one definition or another. In answer to Boxer's question, here's a list of reasons why I believe so.

Indicator 1: Her Living Environment

The biggest giveaway is that she has a large, comfortable, well-maintained home, two cars in the garage, and children living with her (or other such indicators). Only married women have this kind of home environment. But not every married woman has such arrangements.

Some specific things to look for.

- Men's shoes and/or clothing in the closet.
- Two toothbrushes in the bathroom.
- Tools, equipment, machines, classic cars, motorcycles, or other things of interest primarily to men.

Here, you're looking at another man's domain.

It gets more difficult to ascertain their legal status if they are estranged and have been separated for a long time. So when dealing with any woman, a man needs to get a good mental image of her lifestyle and daily schedule, to see if there's a chance she might be hiding another man in the closet, so to speak.

And remember… the man she's hiding could very well be you.

Indicator 2: She is discreet about meeting you

Women love the drama of an affair, however, they want to be firmly in control of that drama. They do this primarily by maintaining secrecy. Women can be discreet in many ways, but here are a few.

- She'll want to decide where you'll meet, and when.
- She is possessive about her phone, and she uses a screen lock.
- She'll frequently want to meet you in strange or remote locations.
- She'll wear sunglasses the whole time she's out with you in public.
- She'll be particularly finicky about where she wants to go with you.
- She'll only meet you after dark, or at the same exact time every week.
- She'll abruptly cancel your meetings and give a plausible excuse why.
- She'll never want you to visit her home nor go near her place of work.

If she is secretive about her schedule, or if she only has specific times of the day or week that she is willing to meet you, then she may be hiding something, either from you, or from her husband.

And remember… the thing she's hiding could very well be her relationship with you.

Indicator 3: She is Glorified

I discovered one quality through discernment that I described in an earlier post, What is glorification? (2019-3-23).

Women display a market value increase when they're entwined and entangled with the Tingles, and especially after they get sexually imbued with masculine affection. There are many obvious physical indicators, which when combined, lead to a form of glorification.

- Her face glows.
- She's happy and smiling.
- Her eyes are gleaming with hope.
- She has a sudden burst of self-esteem.
- She conducts herself in a more mature manner.
- She's more content, and less emotionally needy.
- She is more confident, especially more sexually confident.
- She may become more animated and emotionally expressive.
- She's dressing up and attending diligently to her hair and makeup.
- She is self-assured, and she speaks in a more direct, candid fashion.
- She stops using anger and feigned helplessness as tools of manipulation.

The point here being that both marriage and having an affair can have the same effects on a woman.

Perfect beauty, elegance, hairstyling, and cosmetics.

Applying this concept to the case of a woman already married, rest assured, she has already gained affirmation from her marital status. So she'll have a confident, calm detachment that a single woman won't. This is perhaps one of the more obvious traits because it is also very comfortable and attractive to men.

Western churchians like to think that a woman with these traits is emotionally secure and mature in her faith. But these qualities didn't just appear out of no where. There's a man, somewhere, who loved her enough to bestow upon her these immaterial blessings, give her a sense of security and value, and make her shine.

The question for men to determine is this: Is that man Jesus, her father, her husband, her Chadwick lover, or you*?*

Indicator 4: She is Anxious

As I wrote above, a cheating girlfriend/wife will have a confident, calm detachment that a truly single girl will not. But at the same time, she'll be anxious and her heartlights will never come on.

This anxiety is part of the appeal of her having an affair. Women are drawn to the drama and the uncertainty, as well as the thrills.

If she's new to the cheating game, she'll be anxious and worried about getting caught.

If she's been doing it for a while, she'll be more comfortable with it, but there's still an air of untenable uncertainty.

If the man happens to hit a deep nerve in her soul and steals her heart, then she'll become anxious to branch swing to him, and then she'll be conniving for a divorce.

It's also very difficult to discern whether a woman who claims to be divorced has actually filed the divorce papers and has received a ruling. But her anxiety will give her away.

Truly divorced women, on the other hand, are a different kind of feline. They have gained a sense of affirmation and self-assurance from the experience of being married. They will be hip-rearing hedonic and utterly exhilarated to resume dating* and may not feel anxious at all.

The challenge for men gauging her anxiety as an indicator of her status is that men like to believe that she is anxious because she is in love with him, and not because she's doing something against her conscience. It is a fundamental attribution error. It is critically important for a man to make this distinction, and discernment is absolutely necessary here.

 The word dating is often used as a polite euphemism for engaging in casual sex.*

Indicator 5: She's NOT a clingy pain in the @$$

In the last post, I described how young, unmarried women can be a clingy pain in the @ss (PITA) because of her immaturity and lack of experience. PITA traits are rather nuanced and subject to context, but overall, being a PITA is not the same as being contentious and b!tchy. Being a PITA means that she's emotionally insecure, socially awkward, and unrefined, which suggests that she's single and has never been shaped by a man.

Marriage and especially having children gives women a sense of responsibility, status, and security that allows her to grow out of these kinds of PITA behaviors. (Some women actually grow into them, if they really love and trust their husband.)

A married woman who's hunting for some side meat will not only be less of a PITA because she's married, but she'll also try to avoid being a PITA because she wants the peculiar combination of secrecy, saucy drama, discreteness, and control, as I described above. She's NOT trying to establish a Feedback loop of Heart Trust. She's NOT desperate to have her non-sexual needs met. She's just looking for easy, discrete, forbidden thrills. IOW, it's not about her (for once), it's about sexploration. She might get really hot and bothered, but she won't feel humbled enough to see you as her heart's lord and master. That means true visceral Headship is absent, and this lack of covenant Headship is largely what makes adultery morally wrong.

The weakness of using this marker is that PITA traits are assiduously discriminated against in western societies, and as a result, they disappear rather early in life for most women. So just because she isn't a PITA is not a fire proof test that she's stepping out, but it's definitely something to consider.

Concluding Statements

In addition to sniffing out your dates, these 5 qualities could also be used to ascertain whether your own girlfriend or wife is (or is about to be) a cheating ho. In this context, Points 3-5 are especially important. If she was always a forlorn PITA wearing mismatched clothing with you, and then she suddenly starts dressing hot and wearing makeup (Point 3), starts being argumentative and edgy (Point 4), and stops being clingy and emotional (Point 5), then there's a very good chance that she's imbued with the masculine affectation of another man, and is devoting some of her authentic Heart Trust energy to him. If so, then a break up is imminent.

When she's with you, you see her for who she truly is.
When she's on the prowl, she presents her best faux image.
The task of telling what kind of woman she is lies in discerning how much Heart Trust she is offering, and how humble she truly is. The woman worth keeping around will have more on both counts.

To figure this out, you have to spend a bit of time and talking in order to give her status a proper assessment. It doesn't hurt to be inquisitive and critical in this respect, because women will interpret your parsimony as DHV, Command Presence, and a general absence of neediness. They also like it when a man sifts through their heart and life, because giving a woman this kind of attention is a preselection criteria which requires them to "prove their value". When they can pass through a rigorous examination and be accepted, then it also gives them a sense of affirmation.

I've given you a lot to think about here, but really, the answer to Boxer's question comes down to Discernment.

- For single/dating men, discernment of Heart Trust is what allows you to read these signs and avoid getting entangled with an attached woman.
- For those men who already have a girlfriend/wife, discernment of Heart Trust will help you gauge which behaviors are authentic and "normal" for your own woman, and when she makes a sharp deviation from the norm. This will allow you to read the writing on the Wall when her Heart Trust is receding.

Also, getting involved with an attached woman will erode your discernment. So if you don't have much discernment to begin with, you're truly well screwed.

Introduction

I have been around a while. I remember The Time Before The Internet, when men had to approach in person and women had to reject, clearly and forcefully. I remember when ghosting was less abrupt. We called it the Slow Fade back then. Men and women were still having premarital sex, from one night stands to long term relationship sex, but it moved a wee bit more slowly. I was in college at the very beginnings of hookup culture. It's changed, but only in that it moves faster now and finds its expression in the OASIS.

Changes to Intersexual Dynamics

These changes are as follows.

1. What used to be Meet —> Date —> Exclusive —> Engaged —> Sex is now almost totally reversed.
   Sex —> Friends —> FWB/F-Buddy —> Date —> Maybe Exclusive —> Break Up —> Move on to the next person… —> sex —> Friends —> FWB/F-Buddy… and Lather Rinse Repeat.
2. Ghosting has become more commonplace. Ghosting is now an "accepted" way to end a relationship. I'm wondering when it will become acceptable to end marriages by ghosting.
3. Men waiting for sex? No way. Men with options aren't playing that game.
4. Women committing without some funsex with Chad? No way. Women with options (which is almost all women) are going to have their funsex experience with Chad, and nothing will stop them. First, it's fun, feels good, and is validating. Second, it's a long shot at commitment from Chad – probably won't work… but hey, you miss 100% of the shots you don't take, right? AF fun first for as long as she can; then marriage at 38 – hopefully to Chad the Senior Partner, if not, then to a beta bux who will pay the bills.
5. It is commonplace now for women to be the dominant partner in a male-female relationship.
6. "Alternative" relationship styles: Polysexuality, Polyamory, Polyandry… The common gist is multiple men (a beta or two, an alpha or two) sharing one woman, usually in succession, but sometimes in tandem. This is a woman's wet dream – having commitment from multiple men serving different functions and varying levels of commitment and exclusivity as needs and desires dictate.

As time passes, what was once considered perversion on the margin of society has slowly become more and more socially acceptable.

The Overton Window has moved quite a bit.

Changes to Social Dynamics

For the top 20% of men and top 50% of women, it's business as usual, as it has been for decades and has come into public knowledge only about 30 years ago when hookup culture went totally mainstream. The top 20% of men are still having lots of casual sex, and the top 60% of women are still riding the carousel with varying durations and frequency. Top 20% men are still in the catbird power position. Top 50% women are still getting pumped and dumped, and seethingly resentful when Chad, Brad, and Thad won't commit, and then after several years she ends up having to settle for Tom Teacher, or Will WorshipLeader, or Paul Plumber, or Ernie Engineer, or Stan STEMlord, or Johnny Latebloomer.

What doesn't get talked about much are the total breakdowns of social mores and social etiquette; and poor socialization among men and women both.

Whiteguy1 wrote,

> "I can get away with being a man (up to a point of course) at my publicly traded firm all day, even with all the PC/feminist bullshit that we should be following. For exactly the reason you state. All the women love having a MAN around, even the old lesbian because I'm attractive to the girls there. 90% of the men there are all 'deltas' (with a couple of gammas/omegas tossed in) so not allowed to be men, just 'males'. Sad really.
> Now it's not all roses and unicorn farts for me, when we were in the office I got shit tested, multiple times a day, which honestly is a pain in the ass and makes it hard to get real work done when there. Oh well."

This is becoming more common.

She can be as sexy as she pleases, but men are not permitted to acknowledge it in any way, shape, or form! Whether a particular man is permitted to act in a sexual manner is wholly dependent on how sexually attractive he is. Sexually attractive men are allowed to act in a sexual manner and ask women out. Sexually unattractive men are not allowed to behave in any sexual manner at all. They are not to comport themselves as "sexual" beings. Sexually unattractive men are not permitted to act as men – they may act only as "males".

Consequently, young men are suffering immensely, as Jack wrote about The Young Man's Problem (2022-2-4).

Because of the risks involved in being male, the lower 80% men, and especially the bottom half, are now willingly paying to give away their unwanted attention, which women now want. Women want it because the exchange has been taken from public to private, as NovaSeeker pointed out in his post, Exploiting Online Attention (2020-12-9). They also want this kind of attention because it is convenient, discreet, easily controllable, and of course, it brings them easy $$$.

The bottom 40% of women struggle now too. Men used to "pay" to give away their attention with in-person dates: drinks, meals, entertainment, and commitment. Now, the bottom 80% men increasingly spend much of their female attention dollar online – online dating apps, sugar dating apps, OnlyFans, camgirls, and the like. Bottom 40% women are working to crack into those markets. The pickings have always been slim for these girls, and it's only gotten worse because their male counterparts were shut out of the game long before they were.

And it has all been taken private. What used to take place in public now takes place totally and completely out of the public eye. Men can gawk at photos and video of amateur pornstars, camgirls and OF girls in the privacy of their rooms. Women can prostitute themselves more openly and more privately at the same time. What used to be legitimate "charging" for dates ("Take me out for dinner and you pay", "Take me for a night out on your dime", "Take me out to the museum and you pay", "Let's do a weekend away and you pay"), is now shady "charging" for dates and sex (subscriptions to premium porn sites, camgirl sites and OF; sugar dating/prostitution lite).

Moreover, prostitution has changed from "my sex for your commitment" to "depictions/facsimiles of my sex for your cash". Digitalized, monetized, "sanitized", pornstitution, which is another manifestation of postporniscuity — the substitution of sexual fantasy for reality, resulting in the postponement of marriage.

The Modern Sexual Implosion

All of these changes have had a catastrophic effect on the overall quality of men and women in western societies.

Men aren't improving their looks or their bodies. Neckbeards and lumpenproles and skinnyfat dudes abound. More and more men have no Game. More and more men don't know how to carry on a real live conversation using their voices, faces, hands, and bodies. More and more men can't go up to a girl and talk to her.

It's been criticized that men won't even try. Well, what should they try for? They have tried, and they get shot down, blown out of the water, and nuclear rejected everywhere they go. In the worst case, they are charged with harassment and/or fired. What incentives are there for them to try?

And women! These women… today's modern women – these are the women they should be trying to date? Arrogant, b!tchy, bossy, contemptuous, entitled, fat, foul mouthed, hair chopped off, mouthy, rude, s!utty, promiscuous, ill mannered, incompetent at the domestic arts, unable or unwilling to do even rudimentary self-care and housekeeping, economically and historically illiterate, unable to cook or clean – this is what men are supposed to be putting forth all this effort for? Really? Are you serious?

These women honestly and truly believe that because Chad had sex with them once, they're entitled to commitment from Brad or Thad, and absolutely nothing less will do.

Women are like this because everyone in society has let them get away with it. Everyone just smirks or laughs or shakes their heads and then looks away. And they are still getting what they want, mostly – oodles of male attention that men pay for, free money everywhere, "jobs" they don't really have to "work" at, free passes because pu$$y, and pretty much skating through life on goddess mode.

Conclusions

Things have changed only in the rapidity of the rate of change and how intersexual dynamics finds its expression. The restrictions on male sexual expression have tightened considerably. There's not much that can be done about this, as things march inexorably toward a sexual marketplace singularity of unknown dimension and character.

Online attention is just the next step in societal devolution.

Introduction

This is the first post under the theme for March: Risk Assessment. Here, we cover a speech given by Alain de Botton that succinctly summarizes the basic ontology of love, as well as the challenges and hurdles of long term relationships from a mystical perspective. It is quite pertinent to the Red Pill wisdom we canvas here on Σ Frame.

This video was recommended to me through email by not just one, but two readers!

One reader wrote,

> "I'm quite impressed with a particular philosopher who gets a lot of human psychology right: Alain de Botton. I'm sure anyone could find things we'd not agree with (as usual), but this one video captures and articulates so much of what my heart-led wisdom has taught me that it's hard not to share it."

Alain de Botton: Why you will marry the wrong person (2017-08-13) Length: 22:19

Jack's Notes

Alain de Botton outlines many of the reasons why love is difficult to attain. In doing so, De Botton gives us a succinct summary of the many oddities of human nature and how this sets the stage for love and creates opportunities for showing love to one another – opportunities which we are wont to miss if we are not sufficiently self-aware. Here, I've collected all the major insights from his speech that answer the titular question and summarized them into the following areas.

Blindness

We are all psychologically unique, "strange" as de Botton says, and thus difficult to understand, much less live with.

Communicating through words is cumbersome and awkward. Often times we don't know what we are feeling, much less able to put it into words.

There is a wall of silence and propriety that separates us from a deeper acquaintance with others.

There is a wall of ignorance that blinds us from seeing ourselves clearly. We are uncomfortable, or perhaps even deeply afraid of self-knowledge.

We are addicted to distractions, entertainment, pleasures and the like, anything which might serve to displace any moment of authentic introspection. This further confounds the challenge of knowing our selves.

Fears

Love requires our humility, but we all struggle against a strong impulse to hide our needs and protect our vulnerabilities. People have many different defense mechanisms to prevent themselves from being humble in an effort to protect their vulnerabilities against the inherent risks and defilements of being humble.

We are deeply frightened by the prospect that the other person will not understand, or misinterpret what we say, or become offended. This fear leads us to attack and humiliate the other, which ruins the efficacy of our communication.

Because we are uncomfortable, or perhaps even deeply afraid of self-knowledge, we are prone to misinterpret good-willed honesty from others as criticism. We fail to recognize this as having a role in love. We fail to use such opportunities to advance our knowledge of ourselves and others, and instead we take offense.

When we cannot avoid facing our own imperfections, inadequacies, and shortcomings, such as when we are raising a child, then we are prone to feel hopeless, worthless, and like a failure.

Intrinsic Human Nature, Self-Centeredness, and Solipsism

We have a lopsided approach towards love that caters to our own self-centered interests. We want and expect to be loved, but we neglect the skills and habits necessary to show love to others, resulting in a stalemate.

We often call out for love through attention seeking behavior, and this is often detrimental to actually securing the love we desire.

We expect that those we love should be able to accept us, farts, warts, quirks, and all, so we do not think it should be necessary to protect others from the uglier aspects of our character. But this is not loving to others.

We have unrealistic expectations for love. We expect perfection and immediate compatibility, but striving for perfection always and only leads to disappointment, frustration, and loneliness.

Worse, we have the subconscious desire for a soul mate. We carry the belief that the more a lover is right for us, the less we're going to have to explain about who we are, how we feel, what upsets us, what we want, and so on. We believe, rather as a young child believes of its parent, that a true lover will guess what is in our minds without us having to say it. We have this deep desire that we'll simply be understood wordlessly. When we are not, then we feel let down, we feel resentful, and we sulk.

Ignorance of What Love is All About

The essential habit of loving others is to have the willingness to interpret unappealing behaviors from others in order to find more benevolent reasons why such behaviors may be unfolding. In other words, to love someone is to interpret their words and behaviors with good will, charity, generosity, and understanding. So love is not just admiration for strength, it is also tolerance of weakness and a recognition of their ambivalences. But we avoid this habit because it is difficult and risky.

Instead, we avoid difficult individuals and choose certain others to be the objects of our love. We idealize them, thinking them to be perfect, and we then become disappointed, hurt, and indignant when they fail us in some respect. True psychological maturity is the capacity to realize that anyone you love is going to be a mixture of both good and bad traits and accepting this as a part of human life.

We have the idea that compromise (e.g. "settling") is a failure, not an achievement. We think "staying together for the sake of the children" is an excuse for apathy and inaction. We need to look more benevolently towards the noble art of compromise. It's a massive achievement in love.

We must recognize that the work of love is to graciously accommodate each other, and ourselves, amid the incompatibilities we have with each other. Therefore, compatibility is an achievement of love.

We must teach others who we are. Teaching is the skill of getting an idea from one head into another in a way that is likely to be accepted. Both partners need to accept that they are going to need to teach each other who they are and what they want, and therefore also learn from each other.

Cultural Myths

Progressive Western societies embrace humanism as a whole. Self-centered individualism and solipsism are amplified and glorified.

We live in a romantic culture in which love is characterized by impulse and self-centered emotions. Impulsiveness is glorified and chance encounters are emphasized as divine and serendipitous. But without a solid familiarity with our self and without well-honed skills in love, these chance encounters inevitably lead to disappointment and heartbreak.

We've been told that the way to find a good partner is to follow our instincts. "Follow your heart!" is the mantra. But we fail to recognize this as a recipe for disaster.

Our culture refuses to consider that love is a two-way street, requiring skill, openness (vulnerability), honesty, and humility.

All of the above factors obscure and reinforce the stalemate in love resulting from Blindness, Fears, Solipsism, and Ignorance, as discussed before.

Formative Influences (Childhood)

In early childhood, the way that we learned about love was not just by experiences of tenderness, kindness, and generosity. The love that we would have tasted as children were also bound up with experiences of being ignored, let down, being humiliated, maybe being with a parent who treated us very harshly, who scolded us, who made us feel small in some way. In other words, quite a lot of our earliest experiences with love are bound up with various kinds of suffering.

We think we are out to find partners who will make us happy (or so we are led to believe by popular culture), but we're not. We're out to find partners who will feel familiar. That may be a very different thing, because that familiarity may be bound up with the particular kinds of torture which we grew accustomed to in childhood.

Thus, we are on a quest to suffer in ways that feel familiar. This radically undermines our ability to find a good partner. We reject suitable potential partners simply because they are not able to make us suffer in the way that we need to suffer in order to feel that love is real.

We all have a particular "type" of person whom we find attractive, which may be a result of formative experiences in childhood and adolescence. These "types" tend to instill those peculiar sorts of sufferings which we are most familiar with, although we remain ignorant of this and idolize the person instead. One's own particular "type" invariably proves to be challenging for one to deal with and manage. We have the idea that we should try to change the "type" we are attracted to, or change a particular individual we are attracted to into being someone fundamentally different. But instead of doing this, it may be wiser to learn how to deal with our type in a more mature way.

Conclusions

No matter what choices you make, there will be a cost of opportunity. There will be regrets either way. We should accept the fact that we're going to marry a person who is incompatible in some ways and do the work of love to achieve the compatibility we innately desire.

We should accept the fact that we're going to make the wrong decisions in a whole row of areas. The reason we do this is because we are human. Therefore, we should not berate ourselves for doing what humans do.

Introduction

[Alain de Botton] wrote an essay for the New York Times, entitled, Why You Will Marry The Wrong Person (2016-05-28).

How many of you in the room do feel, on balance, that you have married the wrong person? [Laughter] […] There's a pretty hefty majority!

I'm here to give counsel and consolation for this situation.

There's a lot of anger around our love lives, privately held. A lot of us go around feeling quite enraged, privately angry about the way that our love lives have gone.

My task today is to turn that anger into sadness. [Laughter] If we manage to turn rage into grief, we will have made psychological progress. […]

What lies behind rage very often is an unusual quality. We tend to think that angry people are dark and pessimistic people. Absolutely not! Scratch through the surface of any regularly angry person and you will find a wild optimist. It is in fact, hope that drives rage.

Think of the person who screams every time they can't find their house keys, or every time they get stuck in traffic. These unfortunate characters are evincing a curious but reckless faith in a world in which keys never go astray, the roads are mysteriously traffic free. It is hope that is turbocharging their rage.

If we are to be a little less sad and a little less angry about our love lives, then we will have to diminish some of our hopes. It is very hard to diminish hope around love, because there are vast industries designed to inflate our expectations of love.

German philosopher, Theodor Adorno, said the most dangerous man in the entire world is Walt Disney. The reason for his attack on Walt was because he believed that Walt was the prime agent of hope, and therefore of rage, and therefore of bitterness. And he thought that it was the task of philosophy to let us down gently. […]

Walt Disney and Mickey Mouse

We are all Strange

Remember the theme of the talk, why you will marry the wrong person.

There are a number of reasons why this is going to happen to you, or has, maybe already in the privacy of your heart, happened to you.

I should say, that it's not that bad. The reason is that all of us will not manage to find the "right" person, but we will, probably all of us, manage to find a "good enough" person. That's success. […]

One of the reasons why we are not going to be able to pull this one off successfully as we might have hoped at the early outset of our teenage years when we were contemplating love, is that we are very strange. I'm very strange and you're very strange. You don't let on, and you know, we're not going to do anything very dangerous, but we are basically psychologically quite strange. We don't normally know very much about this strangeness. It takes us a long long time before we are really on top of the way in which we are hard to live with. […] If you think you are easy to live with, then you are somewhat deceived. The reason is because you are homo sapiens, and you are not easy to live with. No one is.

The Wall of Silence

There is a wall of silence that surrounds us from a deeper acquaintance with what is actually so difficult about us. Our friends don't want to tell us. Why would they bother? They just want a pleasant evening out. Our friends know more about us, and more about our flaws, probably after a 10-minute acquaintance, than we do, but they don't want to go to the trouble to deal with it. Even a stranger who talks with you for five minutes might know more about your flaws than what you could know about yourself in 40 years. Our capacity to understand what is wrong with us, our own weakness, is very weak. Our parents, friends, ex-lovers, know us very intimately, but they love us too much to take us to task. That knowledge is out there, but they're not going to bother. […] The knowledge is out there, but it's not in you. Therefore, we progress through the world with a very low sense of what is actually wrong with us.

We are Addicted to Avoiding Humility and Self Knowledge

We are all addicts… not to inject heroine and such. We need to redefine what an addiction is. We tend to think of addiction in terms of what we are addicted to. But an addiction is basically any pattern of behavior whereby you cannot stand to be with yourself and the uncomfortable thoughts and, more importantly, the emotions that come from being on your own. And so therefore, you can be addicted to almost nearly anything so long as it keeps you away from yourself, so long as it keeps you away from tricky self-knowledge.

Most of us are addicts!

Thanks to all sorts of technologies and distractions, etc., we can have a good life where we will almost certainly guarantee that we won't spend any time with ourselves. […] You can be guaranteed that you don't have to talk to yourself. This is a disaster for your ability to have a relationship with someone else, because until you know yourself, you cannot properly relate to another person.

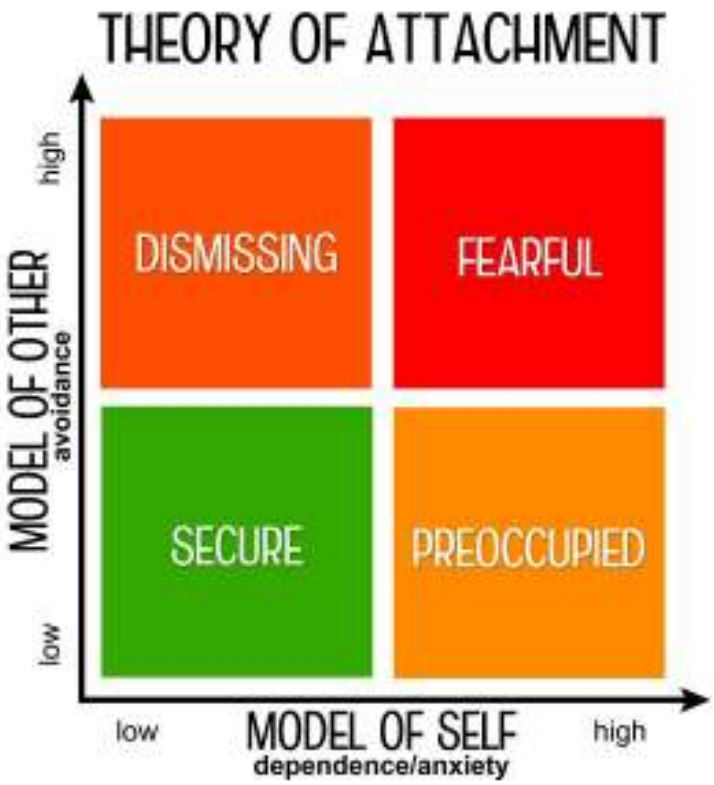
One of the reasons why love is so tricky for us is because it requires us to do something we really don't want to do, which is to approach another human being and say, "I need you. I wouldn't really survive without you. I'm vulnerable before you." There's a very strong impulse in all of us to be strong, and to be well defended, and not to reveal our vulnerability to another person.

Attraction and Attachment

Psychologists talk of two patterns of response that tend to crop up in people whenever there's a danger of needing to be extremely vulnerable, dangerously vulnerable, and exposed to another person. The first response is what psychologists call "anxiously attached" [or "Preoccupied" in the graph below], according to attachment theory. When you are anxiously attached to somebody, rather than saying, "I need you, I depend on you", you start to get very procedural. We say, "You're ten minutes late," or "The bean bags need to be taken out," etc. You start to get strict, when actually what you want to do is to ask a very poignant question, "Do you still care about me?" We don't dare to ask that question, so instead, we get nasty. We get stiff. We get procedural.

The other pattern of behavior which psychologists have identified, and it tends to apply to people who are […] A types, very outgoing types, strivers… These people tend to become avoidant [or "Dismissing" in the graph below]. When you need someone, it's precisely at that moment that you pretend you don't. When you feel most vulnerable, you say, "I'm quite busy at the moment…", "I'm fine, thanks…" […] You don't reveal the need for another person, which sets them off into a chain of wondering whether you are to be trusted, and there is then a cycle of low trust.

So we get into these patterns of not daring to do the thing that we really need to do, which is to say, "Even though I am a grown person, […] I'm actually a small child inside, and I need you like a small child would need its parent." This is so humbling, that most people would refuse to make that step and therefore refuse the challenge of love.



What is Love?

In short, we don't know very much how to love. It sounds very odd, but look, all of us in this room would probably need to go to a school of love. You may think, "What? A school of love?!? Love is just an instinct." No it's not! Love is a skill. It's a skill that needs to be learned. It's a skill that our society refuses to consider as a skill. We are meant to just always follow our feelings. But if you keep following your feelings, then you will almost certainly make a big mistake in your life.

What is love? There is a distinction between loving and being loved. We all start off in life by knowing a lot about being loved. Being loved is the fun bit. That's when someone brings you food on a tray, or asks you how your day at school went, etc. We grow up thinking that that is what's going to happen in an adult relationship. We can be forgiven for that. It's a very understandable mistake, but it's a very tragic mistake, and it leads us not to pay attention to the other side of the equation which is to love.

What does it really mean to love? To love ultimately is to have the willingness to interpret someone's, on the surface, not very appealing behavior, in order to find more benevolent reasons why it may be unfolding. In other words, to love someone is to apply charity and generosity of interpretation.

Most of us are in dire need of love. Actually, we need to have some slack cut for us, because our behavior is often so tricky that if we don't do this, then we wouldn't get through any kind of relationship. But we are not used to thinking that that is the core of what love is. The core of what love is, is the willingness to interpret another's behavior.

The Complexing Nature of Love

What we tend to be very bad at is recognizing that anyone that we can love is going to be a complexing mixture of the good and the bad. There's a wonderful psychoanalyst named Melanie Klein who was active in the 1950s and 60s… […] She studied children who learned about relationships from the parental situation. She came up with a very fascinating analysis. She argued that when children are very small, they don't really realize that a parent is one character. They actually "split" the parent into a good parent and a bad parent. This is when a baby is in the infant stage. […] It takes a long time, Melanie Kline thought it might be until the age of four, until you actually realize that the good mother and the bad mother are one person, and you become ambivalent. In other words, you become able to hate someone… and at the same time, also love them. You're able to not run away from that situation. You are able say, "I love this person, and I hate them, and that's OK." Melanie Kline thought that this an immense psychological achievement when we can no longer merely divide people into "absolutely brilliant, perfect, marvelous," and "hateful, let me down, disappointed me."

Everyone whom we love is going to disappoint us. We start off with idealization, and we end up often with denigration. The person goes from being absolutely marvelous to absolutely terrible.

Maturity is the ability to see that there are no heroes or sinners, really, among human beings. All of us are a wonderfully complexing mixture of the good and the bad.

Adulthood, true psychological maturity, and you may need to be 65 before it hits you — I'm not there yet — is the capacity to realize that anyone you love is going to be this mixture of the good and the bad. So love is not just admiration for strength, it is also tolerance of weakness and a recognition of ambivalence.

We are Drawn to the Familiar Tortures of Reliving Childhood Trauma, thinking it is Love

The reason why we're going to probably make some real mistakes when we choose our love partner […] stunning mistakes […] is that we've been told that the way to find a good partner is to follow your instincts. Right? "Follow your heart!" That's the mantra. And so all the time we are reminded that if we stop reasoning, analyzing… […] we think that we think too much about our emotions, We cannot think too much. We can only ever think badly. But there's no such thing as thinking too much about emotions, but the problem is we live in a romantic culture that privileges impulse.

Now, when it comes to love, something tricky occurs, because you don't have to be a paid up believer in psychotherapy or psychoanalysis to realize that the way we love as adults sits on top of our early childhood experiences. In early childhood, the way that we learned about love was not just by experiences of tenderness, kindness, and generosity. The love that we would have tasted as children were also bound up with experiences of being let down, being humiliated, maybe being with a parent who treated us very harshly, who scolded us, who made us feel small in some way. In other words, quite a lot of our earliest experiences with love are bound up with various kinds of suffering.

Now something quite bad happens to us when we start to go out into the adult world and start to choose love partners. We think we are out to find partners who will make us happy, but we're not. We're out to find partners who will feel familiar. That may be a very different thing, because familiarity may be bound up with particular kinds of torture.

This explains why sometimes people will say to us (when we meet a potential partner), "Look, there's a wonderful person! You should go and date this person. They're, good looking, they're charming…" and all sorts of things. We go out with them and we date them. We do recognize that they are really wonderful and amazing, but we have to confess to our friends that actually we found this person… and often we struggle with the vocabulary… we say, maybe, "not that exciting," or maybe "not sexy," or "a bit boring." But really what we mean, is that we've detected in this really quite accomplished person, someone who will not be able to make us suffer in the way that we need to suffer in order to feel that love is real, and that's why we reject them. So we are not merely on a quest to be happy. We are on a quest to suffer in ways that feel familiar. This radically undermines our ability to find a good partner.

We Desire a Soul Connection

Here's another reason why we're going to become unstuck in the field of love. We tend to believe that the more a lover is right for us, the less we're going to have to explain about who we are, how we feel, what upsets us, what we want… We believe, rather as a young child believes of its parent, that a true lover will guess what is in our minds. One of the great errors that human beings make is permanently to feel that other people know what's in their minds, without us having said what's in our minds. It's very cumbersome to use words. It's such a bore. When it comes to love, we have this deep desire that we'll simply be understood wordlessly. It's touching, a beautiful, romantic idea, but it also leads to a catastrophic outbreak of sulking.

What is sulking? Sulking is an interesting phenomenon. We don't just sulk with anyone. We sulk with people who should understand us, but for some reason, have decided not to. That's why we tend to reserve our sulks for people whom we love and whom we think love us. When they tell us something, they unwittingly would trigger a negative reaction in us.

We'll sulk, and they'll say, "What's wrong with you darling?"

We'll say nothing. They'll say, "Come on! You're upset!"

"No I'm not. I'm absolutely fine."

And it's not true! We'll go upstairs and we'll shut the door, and we won't tell them what's wrong with us. They'll knock at the door and tell us, "Please, just tell me", and we'll say "NO" because we want them to read our souls, because we expect that a true lover can understand what we feel and who we are, without us speaking. This is a catastrophe for our capacity to form lasting relationships. If you do not explain, you can never be understood.

You Must Teach Others Who You Are

The root to a good marriage, and to good love, is the ability to become a good teacher. Now, teaching sounds like a narrow profession — those guys in tweed jackets, dusting with the chalkboard, etc. I'm not talking about that kind of teaching.

All of us, whatever our job aspirations, whatever it is we do, have to become teachers. Teaching is merely the word that we give to the skill of getting an idea from one head into another in a way that is likely to be accepted.

Most of us are appalling teachers! Most of us teach when we're tired, when we're frightened. What are we frightened of? We're frightened that we've married an idiot, and because we are so frightened, we start screaming at them! "You've got to understand!" The thing is, that unfortunately by the time you've started to humiliate the person you want to understand something — lesson over!

You will never get anyone to understand what you want them to understand as long as you make them feel small. In order to teach well, you need to be relaxed. You need to accept that maybe your partner won't understand. Also, you need a culture within a couple, that two people are going to need to teach each other and therefore also learn from each other.

Intimate Honesty is Misinterpreted as Criticism

This brings me to the next reason why you're going to have a very unhappy relationship. That is because you probably believe that when someone tries to tell you something about yourself that is a little ticklish and a little bit uncomfortable that they are attacking you. They are not. They're trying to make you into a better person. We don't tend to believe that this has a role in love.

We tend to believe that true love means accepting the whole of us. It doesn't! No one should accept the whole of us. We're appalling! Do you really want the whole of you accepted? No, that's not love! The full display of our characters, the full articulation of who we are, should not be something that we do in front of anyone that we care about!

So what we need to do is to accept that the other person is going to want to educate us, and that it isn't criticism. Criticism is merely the wrong word that we apply to a much nobler idea, which is to try to make us into better versions of ourselves. But we tend to reject this idea very strongly.

Our Imperfections Offer Opportunities to Love

Is there any hope? Of course there's hope.

Look, I mentioned the word "good enough." It's a phrase taken from a wonderful English psychoanalyst called Donald Winnicott. He had a lot of parents who would come to him, and say things like, "I'm so worried that I'm not a good parent. My child has this problem…" […] He came up with a wonderful phrase. He said, "You are most likely to be a "good enough" parent." It is a relief from our punishing perfectionism.

The good news is that most of us are not perfect, and therefore, we don't need perfection. The demand for perfection will lead you to only one thing – loneliness. You cannot have perfection and company! To be in company with another person is to be negotiating imperfection every day.

Incompatibility. We are all incompatible, but it is the work of love to make us graciously accommodate each other, and ourselves to each other's incompatibilities. Therefore, compatibility is an achievement of love. It isn't what you need from the outset. Of course you aren't going to be totally compatible. That's not the point. It is through love that you gradually accept the need to be compatible.

Relational Archetypes

We probably can't change our "types". Right? So many of us have got "types" who are going to cause us real problems. They may be too distant. They may be arrogant. They're going to torture us in some way.

Now, friends casually say to us, "Chuck them! Get out of the relationship!" Right?

No, we're realists… and I'm giving you realistic advice. You are not going to manage to change your type. Let's get that for granted. What you can do, and this is a big achievement, is to change how you characteristically respond to your tricky type.

Most of us have formed the way that we respond to tricky types in early childhood. So, we had a distant parent who matches with the distant lover. When we were very young, we responded to that distant parent by attention seeking. We rattled and banged, and now we're adults, we rattle and bang in our own way. We think that's going to help. It doesn't. It creates a vicious cycle that is not going to get us anywhere. It is open to us at any time to have a more mature response to the challenges that the types of people we are attracted to are going to pose for us. That is an immense step forward, an immense achievement.

The Art of Compromise

The other thing we should do is recognize an innate ability of compromise. One of the most shameful things to have ever have to admit is to say, "This is my partner. I've compromised. In choosing them, I've compromised."

"Oh, why have you compromised?"

"Well, I'm not that attractive myself. I've got lost of problems. I'm a bit nutty. Frankly, I couldn't pull anyone better… But they're very nice! They're OK." [Laughter]

You would think, "Loser!"

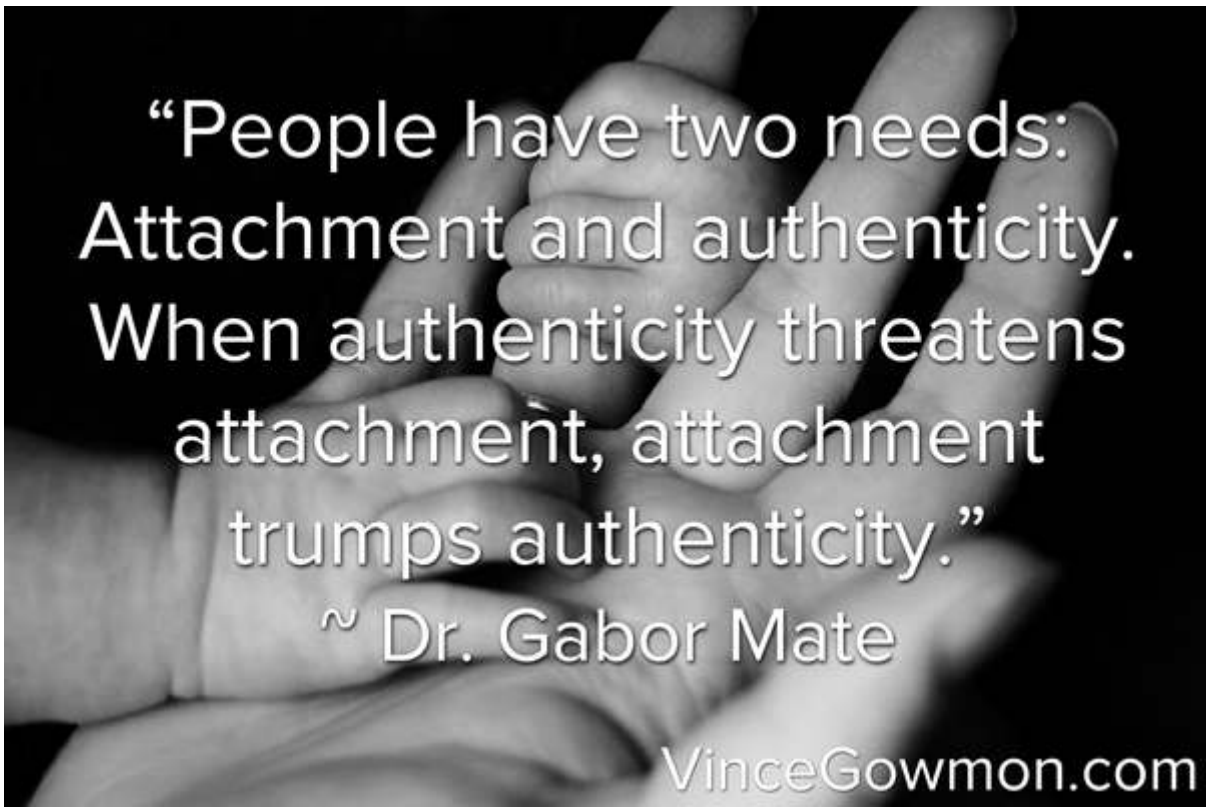
It's not true! Compromise is noble! We compromise in every area of life. There's no reason why we shouldn't compromise in our love life. Maybe we're only sticking around for the children. Good! That's a wonderful reason to stick around! Why else would you stick around?



Let’s look a little bit more benevolently towards the art of compromise. It’s a massive achievement in love.

Closing Statements

I’m going to end with a quote from one of my favorite philosophers, Danish, 19th century, very gloomy philosopher called Kierkegaard. Kierkegaard, in his book, Either/Or, had a wonderful outburst where he basically said, of course, you’re going to marry the wrong person and make the wrong decisions in a whole row of areas, and the reason you’re going to do this is that you’re human. Therefore, do not berate yourself for doing what humans do.

This is what he says.

> “Marry and you will regret it.
> Don’t marry, you will also regret it.
> Marry or don’t marry, you will regret it either way.
> Laugh at the world’s foolishness, you’ll regret it.
> Weep over it, you’ll regret that too.
> Laugh at the world’s foolishness or weep over it, you will regret both.
> Hang yourself, you will regret it. [Laughter]
> Don’t hang yourself, you will regret that too.
> Hang yourself or don’t hang yourself, you will regret it either way.
> Whether you hang yourself or don’t hang yourself, you will regret both.”

This gentleman is the essence of all philosophy.

Introduction

If you think about it, men and women have diametrically opposite expectations of a spouse in marriage.

- Married men expect their wives to maintain the domestics and care for children.
- Married women want their husbands to work hard, earn more, and be successful in their careers.

Marriage tends to enable these endeavors.

- Married men expect their wives to wag their @ss, not their tongue.
- Married women want their husbands to wag their tongue, not their @ass.

Marriage tends to reverse these behaviors.

- Married men often complain that their wives changed after they got married.
- Married women often complain that their husbands DIDN'T change after they got married.

Also,

- Married men expect their wives to be fully content with monogamy.
- Not so with women! In this video, Kevin Samuels notes that many women actually like it when their man receives sexualized attention from other women, and for a multitude of reasons (e.g. confirmation of status, drama, Dread, etc.). (Women can't have this pleasure if they don't bag a HSMV man.)

Obviously, there are some wildly divergent expectations at play here.

Foolish Expectations

People have no idea of the menagerie they're getting into when they get married.

The common notions that single Christian young men have about marriage, is that it will (1) immediately assuage their sense of entitlement concerning love and romance, and (2) grant them unfettered access to guilt-free and shame-free sex on a daily basis. (3) Some men marry with the intention of establishing a domain of influence (e.g. conservation of wealth, a family legacy), but outside of the upper class, this is extremely rare in the West.

Single young women's expectations are even farther off the mark. Thanks to feminist egalitarianism, Chivalraic norms, and Disney, they have a fairytale-like notion of marriage that is far removed from reality. In addition to the pricey, ego drenched vanity fair of the wedding ceremony, they expect marriage to produce a sense of inner security, and instant access to regular, unearned income. Some women expect marriage to bring instant bliss, but this is becoming rarer as marriage is postfornicated into their late 20s and 30s. Slightly more mature women think marriage will increase their influence and relevancy, often without even realizing how their sexual conduct and femininity fit into this scheme. All the while, they remain ignorant of the larger purposes of marriage and how they might contribute to that. Christianity doesn't seem to figure into their matriculations at all.

All of these false notions contribute to the impression that "something changed" after marriage.

If it weren't so sad and so common, it would be comical.

Case Studies

Here's a sad example. After my sister got married, she came to me immediately after the ceremony and said,

> "That's strange. I don't feel like I'm married!"

I smacked my forehead and breathed out a long sigh, because I knew right then, that her marriage would fail. Sure enough, after four years, it did.

I too had a wakeup call with reality when I first got married, but it was nothing like my sister's experience. For Blue Pilled me, it was when I soon realized that my wife didn't share my vision of marriage and was my enemy in many respects, someone I would have to fight against on a daily basis just to keep peace and order in the home. After a couple years of this, I lost hope and became depressed, and after five years, my marriage failed too.

Under Men's Fantasy of Emotional Intimacy (2021/6/23), Red Pill Apostle and Jack described how things changed for the worse after they got married.

8 Sources of False or Changing Expectations and how these lead to Disappointment

Moreover, it goes for granted that everyone has some expectations for marriage. These expectations for marriage are uniquely different for each person, but are largely based on…

1. Ego fulfillment (i.e. what is colloquially called “pride”).
2. The intense and deceptive lure of personal desires.
3. How marriage was modeled to them while growing up.

Of note, parental divorce tosses a monkey branch into Point (3).

When two people get married, these sets of expectations are put to the test, and specific expectations are bound to lead to deep disappointments on both sides.

In addition to the sudden wakeup to reality, marriage itself introduces a few life changes and identity changes that can be difficult to roll with.

Putting all this together, the resulting upheaval poses severe challenges that can even be fatal to the marriage.

The remainder of this section collates eight reasons why getting married induces an apparent shift in one’s meta-reality, and why this can lead to disappointment and hardship. It should be noted that these eight reasons are complex and interdependent, which explains why it is difficult for newly married couples to figure out what is going wrong.

1. Ignorance of Headship

I will posit that out of all the reasons for marital confusion and disappointment, the top contributor to marital instability is the apathy toward, ignorance of, or rebellion against, Headship.

Σ Frame Axiom 33: Headship is God’s prescription for marriage.
Corollary B to Axiom 33: Any marriage that does not fit either the Headship or Tingly Respect structures is doomed to dysfunction and/or failure.
Corollary C to Axiom 33: The fact that Headship is not taught and modeled makes the transition into married life soooo much more of a shock and a hardship than it has to be.

This is because…

- Many people never even realize that Headship is how marriage should be done.*
- People don't conscientiously choose partners based on the Headship structural model.
- Most people don't have any idea how to act according to this model.
- Most women tend to resist Headship rather strongly (unless they are of the Tingly Respect variety).
- Corollary D to Axiom 33: The implementation of Headship is confusing and difficult because of the Church's incongruence between the converged doctrinal position of headship and headship in action (i.e. practiced as a form of moral authority and masculine sexual authority).

 I'm including myself here too. Even though I grew up in the church, I never learned about Headship until I came across the Christian Manosphere, especially Dalrock's essays on Headship.*

Furthermore, implementing Headship is difficult and intimidating because women actively work against Headship due to the Curse of Eve. As Deep Strength wrote,

> "Women have no trouble submitting to their boss at work or their teacher in school or other human authorities because it is normal. But God forbid they submit to the husband to whom they committed their life to, who loves them the most, and the one they vowed to be with before God."

So if a new husband doesn't already know that women are like this, and he doesn't know exactly what he's doing, the wife will invariably upset the marriage.

2. A Fundamental Change in Self-Concept

Deep Strength's post, "That all changed after we married…" (2021/6/28) describes a few scenarios in which people might come to think that the other person changed after marriage. These scenarios are briefly summarized here.

1. Infatuation wears off.
2. A rebalance of power based on differing levels of attraction.
3. Normalization of non-submissive and disrespectful behavior on behalf of the wife.

4. The husband gets lazy about correcting the wife's disrespecful and sinful behaviors.
5. Either one or both individuals were posing / faking / hiding their true character.

DS's post addresses the traits and habits of the individuals in the relationship, and DS's point is that good behaviors need to be learned / taught, and bad behaviors need to be corrected.

To augment his brief statement, marriage requires a good deal of emotional maturity and for both couples to grow in Christlikeness, especially honesty, humility, and patience. After we marry, we quickly learn the limitations of our fleshly selves and that our naïve concept of "love" is insufficient for taking up the slack. Thus, married couples must utilize the will and rely on the Holy Spirit when the will is insufficient. It takes faith and daily engagement to learn how to demonstrate agape love and Christlike behavior in marriage, and to grow into the respective roles of husband and wife. All this takes time, and for most, it is far from easy.

So when people say "the other person changed", it may very well be because their concept of the other person changed. The idealized person they thought they were marrying is suddenly revealed to be a faulty human being with eccentric desires and seemingly unreasonable wants and needs, someone who fails much more frequently than what was perceived while courting / dating, and who requires much more love than what they're giving back. In this sense, marriage is a perpetual "ministry" of daily needs to one's husband or wife (c.f. 1 Corinthians 7:32-35). Father Spyridon even described this as being responsible for the spouse's salvation (viz. sanctification)!

3. A Fundamental Change in the Interaction

However, there is a more fundamental reason for why people say, "that all changed after we married". Whenever people say this, they are subjectively (and usually somewhat ignorantly) talking about a shift in the interaction between the two individuals that came about with marriage.

As it happens, when a young married couple realizes that making marriage work is not a 50%/50% effort, but rather 100%/100%, then many of their false expectations of love and feelings of inspiration disintegrate. IOW, Point 1 in DS's list occurs. As a result, the couple doesn't see one another through rose colored lenses any longer, but more along different lines, ranging from an investment of love at best, to a responsibility, or a burden, or a constant annoyance, or a pain in the @ss. At worst, individuals withdraw emotionally and build up walls of psychological self-defense mechanisms, such as apathy, displacement, projection, revenge, stonewalling, and so on. In response, faith in the other person, and in the relationship itself falters and flounders, and a whole new set of problems and difficulties emerge.

Moreover, when two people marry, the way the individuals interact with each other may undergo a seismic shift.

4. A Fundamental Change in Perspective

After marriage, the woman shifts from “man hunting” mode to “nesting” mode. She stops viewing her husband as a game quarrior, and starts to see him as a workhorse that needs harnessed in.

After marriage, the man begins to focus on building and consolidating his domain. He shifts from renegade “wife hunting” mode to Patriarchal “family man” mode. After he becomes familiar with her body and her antics, he stops pedestalizing the wife as a nubile sex goddess, and starts to see her more genuinely. If she doesn’t have her act together, he may start to view her as a contentious annoying burden.

Thus, in some respects, what one values in a mate changes after marriage.

For example…

- Women who were strongly attracted to funloving Chadwick before marriage, and who managed to secure his commitment, are then faced with constant jealousy and the possibility of his indiscretion.
- Men who were strongly attracted to Saucy Stacy before marriage, and who managed to lock her down, are then faced with the reality that she’s not actually that great in bed, she can’t cook or clean, she’s a careless mother, and she spends all her spare time on social media.

As you can see, a lot of what one is attracted to is related to one’s maturity.

All this surfaces as Points 1 and 2 in DS’s list.

5. A Fundamental Change in the Power Structure

It gets worse. When the way two people view each other changes, and the way they interact changes, and their perspective on life changes, then the power structure may change as well.

Σ Frame Axiom 7: The natural interaction defines the relationship structure according to which model it fits best — not what we think it is, or hope for it to be, or try to force it to be.

Likewise, true power is determined by a relationship's ontological construction of unique identities being manifested, and less so in the motivations or behaviors of the participants.

What this means in many cases, is that there is a slow drift away from Headship, which emerges as Points 3 and 4 in DS's list, and that spells catastrophe for the relationship.

6. A Fundamental Change in the Desires, Needs, and Motivations of the Individuals

After marriage, the wife becomes less concerned about her own financial solvency, material comfort, and security, as these things are provided to her by the man. Thus, her psychological energies are freed up to focus on micromanaging the home and the activities and behaviors of the husband and children. This can be wonderful as long as she is diligent about providing value to the family. But it's also easy for her to get bogged down in her own little world and become bored and persnickety about her personal preferences. This can lead to point 3 in DS's list.

After marriage, the husband becomes less concerned about obtaining sexual congress and maintaining the relationship, and he begins to focus more on his career, earning income, and building a home, as he should. As a result, he gives the wife less attention and less moral feedback, and finds it easy to leave certain areas under her supervision. This can lead to point 4 in DS's list.

7. Cultural Mythos Works Against the Knowledge and Practice of Headship

It gets even worse. The common cultural tripe about gender equality does a d@mning disservice towards one's psychological preparation and readiness for marriage. Worse, feminism actively dismantles the trust and fidelity necessary to achieve sanctification in marriage, and ruins the MMP for marriage minded Christians.

The importance of God ordained relationship structures (Tingly Respect / Headship / Peaceful Unity), and the inherent power structures are summarily concealed, dismissed, or demonized as "misogynistic" in many cases. Instead, progressive liberalism amplifies, broadcasts, glorifies, and popularizes relationship structures that do not conform to God's order.

To wit, before marriage, a woman only has her feminine wiles and her püssy power to attract his love. After his commitment in marriage, a woman has many other avenues of control at her disposal, all of which are largely due to the perverse, gynocentric culture in which we now live.

In addition to a long list of control tactics that can destroy his sense of peace and rest, she can deny sex, threaten divorce, hold his wallet and children for ransom, and ruin his reputation, and he has little recourse to address such grievances. These tools of manipulation are easier and ostensibly preferable (to women) over the more spiritually obedient methods of submission, entertaining his honest speech (and being agreeable about it), and tolerating indefinitely whatever she perceives as his weaknesses.

This lopsided power structure has the strong potential to disrupt the natural interaction and the relationship structure, as described in Σ Frame Axiom 7.

Click on the links in this section to read more about how Western progressive cultural mythos destroys marriage and family, and even the church. Also, see Dalrock's essays on Attacking Headship.

8. Spiritual Infidelity* and Marital Fraud

 Here, Spiritual Infidelity is loosely defined as any behavior that strays from God's ideal order of Headship.*
 Marital Fraud is when a person is unwilling or unable to fulfill the Covenant prerogatives of marriage. The presence of premeditated deception or willful intentionality of fraud is not necessary for fraud to bring destruction, misery, and heartache, but it will certainly amplify the perdition thereof.*

If people get married, and then the natural interaction suddenly changes, it is possible that it probably wasn't really very natural to begin with. Much has been written here about how premarital sex defiles humility, destroys trust, debases the sexual authority of the husband, and changes the power structure of the relationship. It all spills out in the crucible of marriage.

Marital Fraud is obviously linked to DS's Point 5, but in fact, it affects all the Points on the list. To further augment DS's list along this vein,

1. One or both parties were operating in the flesh, and not in the spirit.
2. One or both parties were not permitting a natural interaction. (For example, the wife was feigning attraction; the husband was only after sex.)
3. The wife was only keeping her worst nature in check just long enough to secure a marital commitment, and then stopped doing so after marriage (which is when it really counts).
4. The husband was unprepared to deal with the wife's disobedience because he had never had to deal with it before.
5. One or both parties were not presenting their authentic selves honestly to the other. (For example, the wife lies about her N count; the husband relies on Game too much, or not enough.)

Furthermore, marital fraud is perhaps the worst case scenario of a marriage with the worst chances of success, because the entire relationship is built over deception, distrust, and sin.

What DOES NOT Change?

It would be helpful for young people to become well aware of what does NOT change after marriage.

Here are 10 Red Pillish Truths to remember.

- Women are hypergamous. AWALT!
- Women chomp at the bit to assume power and control over their husbands (viz. The Curse of Eve). AWALT to varying degrees!
- Women's SMV will always go downhill after the age of 25 or so, and more so after bearing children. This will not change.
- Men are always scoping for fresh, hot, young T and A. This will not change.
- Men supplicate their wives and will always prefer to take the easy way out (viz. The Curse of Adam.)
- Men's SMV/MMV increases as they age. A man has to be an exceptionally lazy bum for this not to happen.
- The person you were before you married is the same person you will be after marriage. Marriage does not change the core of who either of you are. However, your attitudes and habits will become more like your spouse's.
- If your partner doesn't inspire you to grow closer to God and/or to be a better person before marriage, then this won't change after marriage.
- If you are not in the regular habit of conforming to the Headship structure before marriage, then Headship will not magically materialize after you exchange vows. In fact, it will be more difficult to implement.
- If you don't genuinely love each other in the spirit before marriage, then you won't "find God" in your relationship after marriage.

Epilogue: Fleshly Nature and Spiritual Disposition, as well as Core Values and Purposes Become Evident in Marriage

As you can see, both husband and wife, as individuals, have their own sets of emotional luggage, peculiar desires, intransigent values, implacable expectations of norms, pet sins, and socialization hang ups.

Before marriage, these traits are typically underestimated, and are regarded as superficial, cute, or even endearing. But living together through the daily grind of marriage will magnify even the slightest incongruency between the man's and the woman's core values and life purposes. As a result, the blinders come off, and the individuals are forced to face the day to day reality of two people sharing the same house and bed together.

If more attention were given to these matters before marriage, then marriage would not be so shocking and difficult.

Working out the business end of being married involves a complicated mish mash of challenges that are difficult to sort out. It usually takes newlywed couples 2-5 years to figure out what "works" for them, and those who can't, don't, or won't, either break up or else endure years of pain and strife in marriage. However, placing an emphasis on Headship and being obedient to Christ in one's daily walk will quell much of the storm and speed up the adjustment curve.

Headship is the model that we should be striving for, or rather selecting a partner for. Anything less will be fraught with difficulty and heartache.

- The Christian man has a life purpose, a "mission from God", his "work" that he must be mindful of and continually be working on.
- The foremost duty of a Christian wife is to support her husband, bear children, and mind the home (Titus 2:3-5).

According to the Headship model, the onus is on the woman to align herself with the man. If she drags her feet about this at all, this will create much friction in the marriage, possibly leading to its demise.

Σ Frame Axiom 34: Every argument in marriage is caused by a contentious unsubmissive wife.

It is the continual work of love to accommodate the other's needs and foibles in a loving manner.

An Analogy of Risk Management

Red Pill Apostle · 7 March 2022 · Archived copy · Original

An analogy of vetting using the insurance industry.

Readership: Men
Theme: Risk Assessment
Author's Note: This post had some input from Jack.
Length: 2,400 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

There seem to be some parallels between women shopping for a life insurance plan in the form of a husband, and an insurance provider matching up an insurance product with a preferred type of customer. So this post will describe this analogy.

Sometimes terms and concepts have different meanings outside of the insurance industry, but I'll try to break it down for readers who are not familiar with this field.

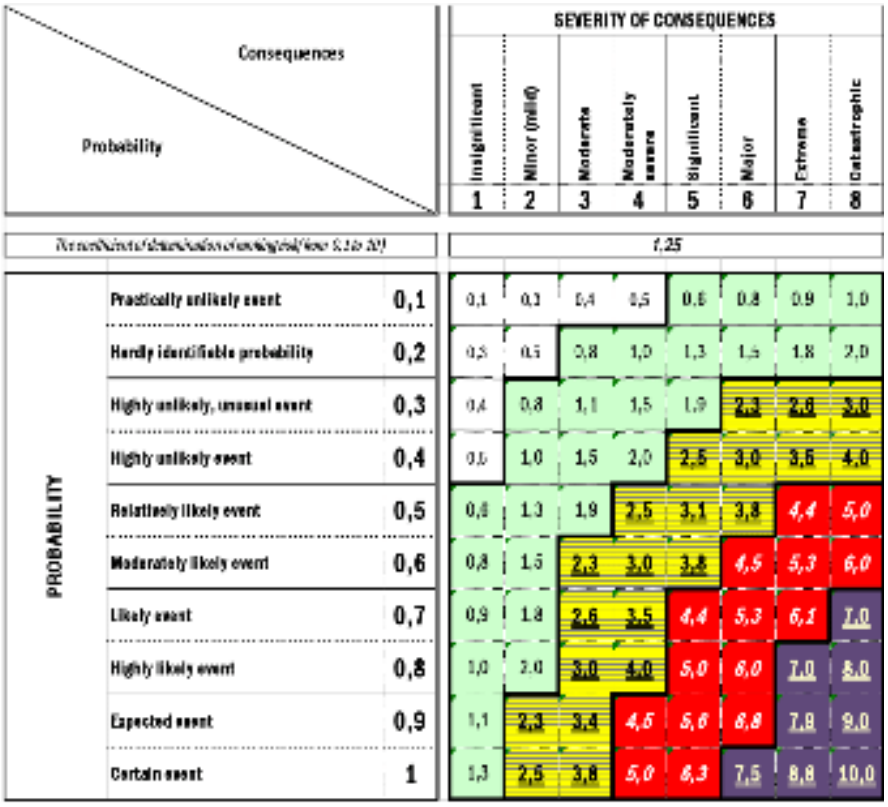
There is a noteworthy limitation to this analogy, and that is that the insurance is based on a contract that can be enforced by a jurisprudential court system, whereas a Christian marriage is a covenant, which is not recognized or enforceable by law.

Good Risk vs. Bad Risk

Everything is a risk in one way or another because nothing is certain. Thus, there is risk in everything everyone does every day. By simply choosing one activity over another, there is an opportunity cost which is a type of risk.

From an insurance company's standpoint, a risk is simply something that the insurance carrier insures. If it is a car, it's an auto risk. If it is a home, it is a property risk.

Risks are classified on a scale ranging from good, to fair, to poor, to bad, depending on the probability that a loss will occur and require a payout. To clarify how a risk can be good, we have to think on a more conceptual basis and disregard the English language's current negative connotation of the word risk. Here, "good" risks are those with a high likelihood of the desired outcome, and "poor(er)" risks have a lower likelihood of the desired outcome.



There are other classification types, but it suffices to say any time someone makes a choice between two or more options, a judgement of what will yield the best results for that person is made, which directly implies the disregarded option was not as good.

Now there are some risks that are more likely to have an insurance claim and cost the carrier money, but these can be underwritten if the rate of return on the risk is increased enough to justify rolling the dice. (This means they pay more insurance premium for their policy.)

If we take the concept further, you can see how interest rates are developed in finance. Consider credit scoring, which is a risk model designed to predict the probability of default. High credit scores are associated with a low probability of default so they get the best interest rates. Low credit scores are indicative of a greater chance of default on the loan and so those people get loans with higher interest rates to make the risk of underwriting their loan worth it from a profitability standpoint.

In risk management and insurance there is a term for what happens when a negative selection results in a death spiral. It works like this. The product manager prices the product wrong so that potential insurance buyers with targeted “good” risks choose competitors and those with “bad” risks, risks you want to avoid, choose you. Profitability erodes and pricing must be increased because of this. When pricing goes up, any good risk policy holders on your book are incentivized to switch to competitive carriers and the bad risk policy holders can’t find anything better so they stay, and this puts more downward pressure on profitability. If the cycle goes long enough you have to effectively start over and rebuild the product. OTOH, when the product pricing is right then the opposite feedback happens. More good risks stay on your book and it becomes profitable, and you can continue to create the incentives that keep the profitable risks in your favor, while adding more like them.

A Wife can be either a Good Risk or a Bad One

We often see comments stating the reason why Proverbs advises young men so much about the wayward woman is because it was written by a man seeking to teach his sons to treat women well and thereby not create such women. This is hogwash that places the blame for women's behaviors on men. The advice to avoid certain types of women is given because they are the ones that foist bad risk and perpetuate the negative feedback loop that undermines the marital relationship.

This is why it is clear that a foolish woman tears her own house down (Proverbs 14:1), a man is better off on a roof or in a desert than with a contentious wife (Proverbs 21:9), and why a wise woman who builds her house has the trust of her husband because she does good to him (Proverbs 31:11).

Applications of the Risk Analogy

In writing this essay, Jack posed the following questions to me.

1. How do risks translate into potential vetting qualifications?
2. What would it mean to increase the premium to account for bad risk?
3. What kinds of bad risks should be avoided?
4. How can all this be tailored to the individual?

I'll answer these as follows.

1. How do risks translate into potential vetting qualifications?

What this question does is highlight the concept of underwriting a risk. Underwriting happens in more fields than you would think. Banking, finance, insurance, universities, every job and every relationship involve underwriting. We just label the activity differently depending on the situation. Any time there is a cost, and there is an evaluation to determine whether someone or something is worth undertaking relative to that cost, then that is a form of underwriting, because underwriting is merely judging somethings characteristics to determine whether or not it is worth moving forward with the endeavor. For example…

- Banking — Do you meet the minimum standards for opening an account?
- Finance — Do you have the credit score, income, and down payment necessary to qualify for the loan? Furthermore, what interest rate can you get based on those details?
- Insurance — If the insurer puts itself at risk to potentially pay a $1M claim, do you meet the characteristics that make you less likely to cause the claim? If not, then how much more would they have to charge to make you worth the risk?
- Universities — They want students who will be successful and thereby add to the university's status, so they require certain criteria and achievements on the applications to try to judge this.
- Relationships — Everyone has a list of things they look for in a significant other, and if a person does not meet those, they'll find someone else.

It is all underwriting.

Even a cursory survey of the SMP/MMP indicates that "underwriting" a wife/marriage these days is a bad risk.

Age of Rudeness, by Cristiana Couceiro (2017).

Vetting is just another word for underwriting within the context of a relationship. Vetting brings a man to consider the various pros and cons, and determine whether taking a certain woman into his domain is a good risk or a bad one. Overall, vetting analyzes the relationship according to some basic criteria, such as,

- Does this woman have the positive qualities that I really want or need?
- Does she have any bad qualities that may blow up into bad risk?
- Can I handle the bad qualities?
- What are the opportunity costs?
- Why should I choose this woman over any other?

Even though marriage is a poor risk, it is still possible, although not very probable, to find a particular woman who offers a good risk.

2. What would it mean to increase the premium to account for bad risk?

The idea of "higher premium for greater risk" is abstract to most people.

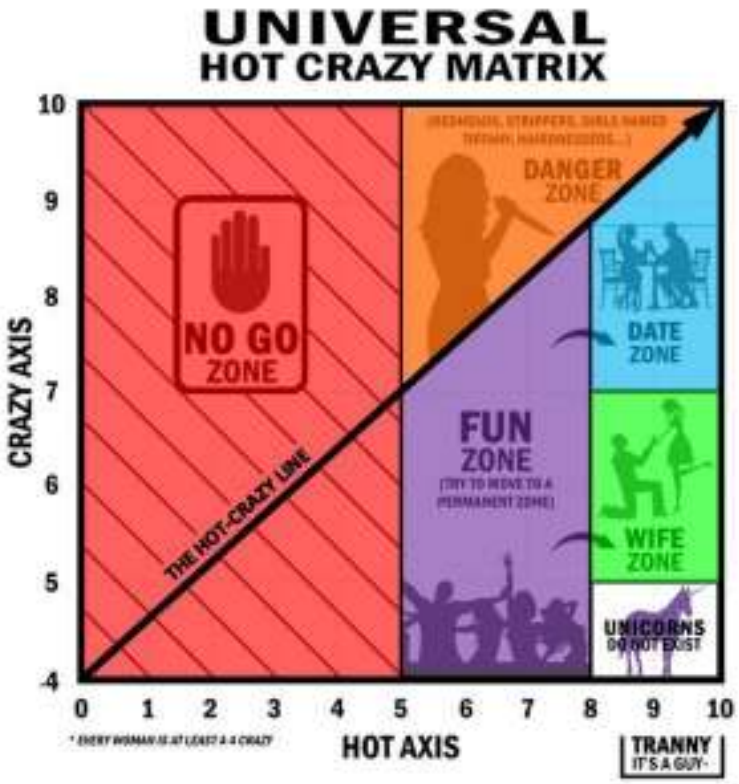
Keeping this to relationships, this concept is easy to see with the hot vs. crazy curve men have for putting up with a woman. If she is a complete knockout, men will pay the cost of dealing with a greater level of crazy than they would for a less attractive woman. But at the point that crazy exceeds hot, and all women have that point, he'll be done with her, because now the cost of dealing with her (the risk) now outweighs the reward (being with a beautiful woman).



As humorous and insightful as the Hot vs. Crazy Matrix might be, craziness itself does not embody a complete assessment of risk, and as Jack pointed out recently, not all craziness is alike. Some forms of crazy are a good risk. So a more mature Christian assessment would consider other forms of non-physical value being exchanged. Here on Σ Frame and around the Christian Manosphere, we've covered lots of other kinds of value that a woman can offer, like being a diligent helper, faithfulness, fertility, humility, kindness, respect, submissiveness, teachableness, Proverbs 31 qualities, and so on.

3. What kinds of bad risks should be avoided?

Those characteristics in a woman that would put the man at risk for the marriage to implode. This varies from man to man, but the deal breakers would include the following:

- Being controlling
- Being domineering
- Inadequate emotional intimacy
- Inadequate pair bonding
- Inadequate sexual intimacy
- Self-centeredness
- Untrustworthiness

…and any of the host of other characteristics that have been documented in the Manosphere over the years. Basically anything that erodes Headship or works against sanctification.

4. How can all this be tailored to the individual?

As a man, it starts with knowing yourself and knowing how things are supposed to be.

While not a complete list, knowing yourself includes your work, what you value, what you like, and what your vision for life is. Once you have a good understanding of these aspects of yourself, then you can start to look a woman that closely aligns with you. This means you will judge (underwrite) for certain characteristics. If you want a big family, then all women in their 30's are out automatically. If you value an athletic physique in a woman, you will probably avoid women who struggle with weight and be drawn to women who like to exercise and live a healthy lifestyle.

Knowing how things are supposed to be is helpful to get a vision of the larger picture, to lay out a plan, to understand some of the pitfalls, and identify things to pay special attention to, or avoid altogether. This is also part of underwriting risk.

In the application, it all starts with being honest with yourself as a man about what you want and where you want to go in life, and then looking for those characteristics in woman that will lend her to being a good helpmeet for your values.

We can say the same about many areas in life such as vocation or church. For me personally, I value male led, reformed theology churches, so the PCA is a good fit for me, whereas the primitive Free Will Baptist church a mile down the road is not, even though they are elder led.

Beggars can't be Choosy Buyers

In the insurance world, the company sets the pricing and characteristics of the product and people who value those characteristics will choose that policy, while the people who don't move to the next option.

The selection or adverse selection (insurance terminology) and the feedback loop are intertwined in a massive pool of variables that are unique to each person's life situation.

When we think of men and women as being their own product that they market to the world it becomes apparent that they could communicate characteristics that draw in the type of people that they are NOT looking for. Alain de Botton's speech described some of the underlying psychological motivations behind this phenomenon, which is more common than what we might think.

To make this analogy clearer, I'll offer the following illustration. Think of a woman who dresses provocatively and then complains that the guys who are most interested in her (1) are low SMV creeps/losers, etc., or else (2) are only looking for a ONS, a short term highly sexual relationship, or an Open Relationship or "Friends with Benefits" arrangement.

Translation: She is dissatisfied with the men she is pulling. The men who are in category (1) are below her hypergamous filter. The men in (2) don't consider her worthy of a LTR, IOW, she is below their filter.

The reasonable thing for her to do is to adjust her expectations to align with her real market value, but this approach is unacceptable in many wimminz estimations because of (at least) two main reasons:

1. They've been spoiled on Disneyfied dreams and the Feminist Life Script. According to the insurance analogy, she's been inundated with advertisements of fantastic policies with a rock bottom premium that is subsidized by the state/society. So any real policy that is actually available to her seems like a rip off.
2. They've been spoiled on the sausage sampler. Following the insurance analogy, she's had "trials" of better policies offered at a higher premium, but she wasn't able to afford it long term. So now she is averse to shelling out money/goods for anything less than what she's accustomed to.

There are potential ways to combat these problems.

- Insurance policy carriers (men) need to do a background check and adopt some type of underwriting which takes past behavior into account.
- In relationships, it's necessary to "court" and get to know someone better, enough to find out a woman's "credit history" with men, AKA vetting.

If you skip the traditional methods of getting to know someone better (e.g. by prioritizing marriage rather than sex), then you end up with a person with a sketchy "underwriting" history which is not worthy of the best product options (a top tier mate). This is partly why the Courtship/Purity Movement failed, and also why running the gauntlet has become a staple feature of the SMP/MMP. Ironically, obtaining a "credit history" in the SMP invariably reduces one's credit in the MMP. To offer another analogy not related to insurance, when new cars are predictably sketchy and absurdly overpriced, then pre-owned cars with a known history rise in value. (Jack told me that the automobile market is like this right now, such that even 50 year old cars are being pulled out of junkyards, restored, and resold for a decent chunk of cash. This seems to characterize the times in which we live.)

Unlucky in Love?

6 introspective insights that might explain why.

Introduction

Back in January, we had a glimpse of The Mystery of Marriage (2022-01-07), and then the rest of the month followed with all kinds of reasons why the Mystery is unachievable for most men. February followed with all kinds of pitfalls that come along before a man can even arrive at the Mystery.

The typical approach of the Manosphere is to analyze the nature of things, and the causes and effects. Usually, it is found that feminism, or progressive elements in society, or wimmin, or weak men who conform to the gynocentric order are largely at fault. But we seldom assess where good willed men drop the ball.

This is unfortunate because change begins with men. Men should make themselves well aware of how they themselves may be increasing their own risk. So this post will cover six factors that are causes or vectors leading to higher risk in love and romance (as opposed to consequences of risk, which have already been rather well covered).

1. Foolish Ignorance

First and foremost, Discernment, knowing one's self, and knowing how things are supposed to be are all necessary elements for exercising wisdom, and are all extremely important for delineating one's life plan and one's personal modus operandi. Humility (which is necessary for experiencing love) and morality are also bound up in these faculties, and so the importance of establishing these foundations cannot be emphasized enough. Without wisdom, one is relegated to a life of foolishness, and then disappointment, frustration, strafing heartache, and failure are more or less inevitable. Furthermore, wisdom is crucial for determining both "good" risk and bad, as Red Pill Apostle pointed out in An Analogy of Risk Management (2022-3-7).

2. Discipline

Discipline is what sets apart the successful man from the average man.

The Manosphere has covered a multitude of masculine disciplines, including building Frame, health, fitness, developing good habits, and commissioning a productive routine. Here are a few.

- Return of Kings (feat. Quintus Curtius): The Battle To Maintain Frame Control (2014-2-24)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Profile of an excellent leader (2014-12-22)
- Return of Kings (Fernando Devasquez): 5 Ways to Develop Discipline Instead of Just "Getting Motivated" (2015-4-29)
- Return of Kings (Aurelius Moner): Why Theology is a Man's Discipline (2015-11-6)
- Return of Kings (Avery Hayden): How To Develop A Rock-Solid Frame That Women Can't Resist (2017-7-10)
- Return of Kings (Roosh Valizadeh): Don't Let A Girl Assert Frame Over You (2018-3-13)
- Return of Kings (Mo Saleem): The Ultimate Morning Routine for Higher Testosterone Levels (2018-6-5)
- Return of Kings (Mo Saleem): The Pussification of Western Society and How to Overcome It (2018-8-21)
- Σ Frame (Jack): Tips and Tricks to Time Management (2020-12-7)

The Christian RP has added to these disciplines by emphasizing elements that are conducive to one's spiritual health and vitality.

For example, in the Bible, sex is presented as a fleshly appetite. Like any other appetite, it must be controlled, regulated, and highly restricted in order to make it an engine of blessing. But in addition to many strong motivations to cast off restrictions over sexual conduct, most people are not very well aware of how to restrict their own sexuality properly in order to avail of and maximize its blessings. This ignorance of human nature was one of the problems with the Purity Movement.

The point is, a man with more discipline is going to accomplish more, and get more out of life. A lack of discipline will remove or exclude him from many opportunities, including chances to meet more and better women.

3. A Preoccupied Focus on the Flesh, not on the Spirit

In general, the Men's Red Pill movement offers an accurate understanding of the dynamics of intersexual relationships, but it's obvious that the primary goal is good sex. It is apparent that some authors have discovered that having satisfying intersexual relationships (including a good sex life) is a side effect of walking in faith, but it is described in terminology that is unmoored from faith, such as Abundance Mentality, Charisma, Detachment, Dread, Frame, Game, Focusing on one's Mission, etc. Even Christian Red Pill writers tend to miss this point.

As such, a lot of the heartache and frustration that men face in the realm of love is not merely because love is fraught with all the difficulties often mentioned (e.g. attaining LAMPS, being "invisible" to women, hypergamy, maintaining frame, managing impressions, SMP competition, etc.) but simply because men don't have the faith to apprehend love as part of the domain of their spiritual inheritance.

Most people, especially young people, are living in the vanity of their minds, and have a predominant focus on seeking to gratify their fleshly desires (Ephesians 4:18). They are not paying attention to the deeper characteristics of their respective natures and how that might play out in a long-term relationship. I described this in Looking at the Essentials (2020-06-12).

Also, and this even applies for those who are fairly successful in keeping their minds set on the spirit, it is not uncommon for them to find that something deeper lurks in the heart which takes one "by surprise" when the urge to merge kicks in, and this seems to happen whether one agrees with it or not, and also whether one likes it or not. People have different methods of dealing with this, but there are two ways in general.

1. Some try to deny it and avoid it all together, and thereby condemn themselves to slog through a frustrating existence.
2. Others "go with the flow". They either get sucked into it against their will, or willingly dive in for the apparent benefits of ego affirmation, social relevancy and sexual interaction.

Few people, even Christians, have the self-awareness necessary to view one's self objectively as one independent character in the game of life, and to conduct themselves along the lines of what would enhance that character, fulfill their mission, glorify God, and bring them what they desire most in life. I surmise that the reason is because this character is, in fact, one's identity in Christ, and the awareness of this is not achieved until the rather late stages of Christian maturity. Other reasons are because…

- It is easily misinterpreted by others who are carnal minded.
- Working out the details can be embarassing and messy.
- It is difficult and tiresome to do.
- It enhances temptation.
- It brings persecution.

4. False Concepts and Ideals

The church is overflowing with teachings that cater to worldly sensibilities and only serve to cloud and confuse the concepts of covenant authority and Headship. Deep Strength recently covered this in The Lie of Servant Leadership (2022-3-5), which was a succinct summary of a sit down chat between Doug Wilson and Aaron Renn on the lie of servant leadership. I encourage readers to spend the time to digest this discussion, as it sums up the the main issues underlying the most significant problem concerning marriage today (i.e. the lack of Headship). (I may write a commentary on this talk in the future.)

In addition to the confusion surrounding authority, there are also many other false or misleading concepts and ideals, including many of the Blue Pill variety. Outright lies about intersexual relationships, attraction, and female nature may not be directly taught from the pulpit, but are nevertheless floating around in Churchian circles and adopted by young people as the gospel of sex and marriage.

To pick out one egregious example, the Christian Manosphere has profusely tackled the topic of attraction and how this relates to godliness.

- Donal Graeme: The 5 Vectors of Female Attraction- A Restoration (2013-3-10)
- Donal Graeme: Going APE- What Attributes do Women Find Attractive in Men? Looks, Athleticism, Money, Power and Status (LAMPS) (2013-7-21)

- Truth and Tolerance: Godliness is not Attractive? (2021 August 10)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Complementarian "agreement as godliness" is the same concept as liberal tolerance (2021-9-9)
- Σ Frame (Jack): How is Godliness Attractive? (2021-9-1)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Trust is earned and an expression of the character of godliness (2021-12-20)
- Adam Piggott: Masculinity does not lead to Godliness (2022-1-11)

In summary of all these posts, there is a connection between spiritual maturity and attraction, sex, and love, but the connection is abstract and therefore not clearly apparent. From my own attempts to sort out some of these false ideals, I've come to the following general conclusions:

- Christianity as a whole has an extremely poor (if not heretical) concept of godly masculinity and masculinity in general.
- Christian circles commonly purport that godliness is attractive, but most of what is commonly touted as godliness within the church is far from attractive, and in some cases it is the diametric opposite.
- Some aspects of true godliness are attractive, while others are not.
- Some attractive traits are rather godly, but are not recognized as such.
- Overall, the Red Pill has a more accurate assessment of attraction and the nature of women than anything found in churchian circles.

5. Reciprocality

In The Law of Reciprocality (2015-08-20), Deep Strength goes over the Reciprocal Rule, which is basically the idea that like attracts like, and that people self-select for others who are much like themselves. For example…

- Abusers attract abusers.
- Promiscuity attracts promiscuity.
- Manipulators attract manipulators.

Also…

- Chastity attracts chastity.
- Faithfulness attracts faithfulness.

Deep Strength covered a video from Lori Gottlieb on the reciprocal rule (2021-08-06) which is an insightful post that explains the trajectory of Reciprocality. (Click on over to his place to see the video and read his full post.) DS summed up one of Lori's main points as follows.

> "…men and women have general childhood trauma or pick up from their parents different dysfunctional patterns where they look for the same in the person they want to date. Even when they notice something is wrong and they try to date someone who isn't dysfunctional, they will start to feel uncomfortable because they're not used to someone who isn't dysfunctional in that particular way. Because of this discomfort, they stop or avoid dating the functional people and go back to the dysfunctional people. Hence, to get them out of that cycle, they will have to do some introspection and address their own dysfunction in order to have healthy relationships and avoid the dysfunctional people.
> [This is a] Fairly good way of explaining why people tend to continually date people with certain dysfunctions, but it also leaves out the fact that people are indeed looking for multiple things in a relationship (including attraction)."

Obviously, any Christian who is stuck in this generational cycle of dysfunction is at a severe disadvantage in regard to the risk of making poor decisions in the arena of love. This is partly because dysfunction clouds the process of finding and pursuing one's mission, so not only does it hold the man back in life, but it also prevents a mission minded gal from identifying him as a potential life partner.

6. Types

Alain de Botton's speech brought up the topic of "types", which is a topic I have never seen discussed in the Manosphere outside Σ Frame. Essentially, "types" are a classical subset of Reciprocality. The difference is that Reciprocality is based on one's spiritual/psychological disposition which can be either healthy or unhealthy, whereas "types" are rooted in personality formation which is morally neutral for the most part. Each of the various "types" are a composition of values/traits in which a person is soft-hearted/mature in some areas, and hard-hearted/immature in others. For example…

- The "jock type" values competition, discipline, and popularity, and rejects compassion and mercy.
- The "athletic type" values physical aptitude, form, and expression, and rejects abstract mysticism.
- The "nerd type" values mastery (e.g. academics, gaming, technology, etc.) and rejects popularity.
- The "playboy type" values material comforts and pleasures, and rejects responsibility.
- The trendy "dandy type" values self-image and self-esteem, and rejects practicality.
- The "silent loner type" values peace and inspiration, and rejects social interaction.
- The "cad type" values principles and rejects trust.

Of note, cliques form out of people with shared types.

People experience attraction to a particular type when the collection of values/traits resonates with one's own spiritual disposition. I wrote about this in Birds of One Feather Flock Together (2020-10-26).

The "type" of person who incites feelings of love and humility tend to be unique for each person, but early in life, we tend to discover what our respective "types" are. De Botton said that the particular "type" of person we find attractive is a result of formative experiences in childhood and adolescence. He said these "types" tend to instill those peculiar sorts of sufferings which we are most familiar with. We are drawn to this because those sufferings are necessary for us to feel that love is real, although we remain ignorant of this aspect of suffering and idolize the person instead. As a consequence, one's own particular "type" invariably proves to be challenging for one to deal with and manage. We have the idea that we should try to change the "type" we are attracted to, or change a particular individual we are attracted to into being someone fundamentally different. But instead of doing this, de Botton suggests that it may be wiser to learn how to deal with our type in a more mature way.

De Botton's advice sounds good and right, but after thinking it over, I am not convinced that it really works like de Botton intimates, at least not in every relationship. I can see how choosing someone in terms of one's "type" can be deeply moving and humbling, and I think for certain types of people, finding a mate who is very similar to one's self may be a smoother path towards finding emotional intimacy, love, mutual understanding, etc., and making progress towards certain aspects of maturity.

However, clinging to one's type also tends to lock one into the same old trains of thought and interrelational habits that one is accustomed to. The problem with this is that in some cases, this doesn't necessarily lead to maturity. Instead, one gets wrapped up in the drama and itinerant emotions, and never attains an objective view of one's self or the relationship.

So how then can one learn to "deal with their type in a more mature way"? The only way is to go through so much heartache and frustration that one is forced to grow out of that particular "type", and that way of relating to another. This doesn't bode well for the relationship.

Christian girl identifies him as her “type”. Should she pursue the relationship or not?

To further my point, people who marry for love often choose their respective “type”, whereas arranged marriages focus on more foundational characteristics, and therefore tends to view one’s attraction to a particular “type” as a passing growth phase. As we know, arranged marriages have a better chance of longitudinal success than marrying for love.

So I think a more mature conceptualization of “types” is to view it as a phenomenon that reveals some of our own inclinations, weaknesses, and hangups. The key is to understand what it is about one’s type that draws one in, and try to comprehend the ways in which it is a limiting microcosm, whether it is unconducive towards one’s spiritual maturity or making progress towards one’s mission.

It is probably good for one to explore relationships with one’s preferred “type” as this will increase self-knowledge and perhaps even self-love, but I don’t think it’s a good move to *marry someone only because it offers a comfort zone in which that person perpetuates those same inclinations, no matter how familiar and exciting it might feel at the time. Again, this varies by individual.

Epilogue

The Red Pill has made us aware that the world we live in presents many challenges to a man seeking to find a wife and establish a family. But in the final analysis, each man is responsible for himself.

All of the topics discussed above help to explain why so many men (and women too) are unlucky in love.

1. Ignorance and Foolishness.
2. A lack of Discipline.
3. Focusing on the flesh, instead of the Spirit.
4. False or unrealistic ideals.
5. They attract and are attracted to others who are much like themselves (AKA Reciprocality), and they self-select for the same.
6. Choosing mates according to one’s “type” without really understanding themselves.

As you can see, a big piece of the puzzle lies in our faulty conceptualization of attraction, authority, love, and romance, and how we use these false concepts to go about identifying whether we have “found love” or not.

Two Viewpoints on Marital Risk

Jack · 11 March 2022 · Archived copy · Original

A review of Rollo Tomassi's and Kevin Samuels' viewpoints on the risks of marriage.

Readership: All
Theme: Risk Assessment
Length: 1,100 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes + 24:49 minute long video

In this video, Rollo Tomassi takes on Kevin Samuels' views on marriage.

I've identified several areas in which Rollo and Kevin agree, and three areas in which the two men disagree: Risk Assessment, Female Responsibility, and the Role of Religion. I'll compare these differences in the remainder of this post.

The Rational Male Clips: The Concept of Marriage Has Turned Into THIS (2021-12-04)

Areas of Agreement

Both men agree on the following points.

- They are both advocates for men.
- Relationships are the most important thing in life.
- Marriage and the nuclear family unit are crucial for having and raising children.
- Marriage and children constitute the future of the community and the race.
- Men and women are meant to be together for life.
- The laws are stacked against men, making it risky to get legally married.
- The laws need to be changed.
- The choice to marry or not is simply a matter of knowing the risks and managing them accordingly.
- If a man is not 'high value', then that risk increases dramatically.

1. Disagreement on Risk Assessment

The assessment of risk is the main point of contention where the two men differ.

Rollo places more emphasis on the individual man's personal domain and says the risks are too great for individual men at this time.

Kevin understands that marriage constitutes the future of the community, and argues that it is indeed a costly but also very necessary risk.

Kevin Samuels' motive is getting Black families together first and foremost, and to save the Black community. He understands fully well that the destruction of the Black community started when the welfare state was created in the mid-60's; where the government became surrogate husbands and fathers for Black women. He has a dedicated interest in ending this destructive, self-perpetuating cycle of single motherhood in that community.

Risk is Highly Contextual

Marital risk is highly determined by one's life situation, including age, family history, SMV, social circle, religious convictions, socio-economic status, and geographical locale.

Horrendous Risk: In most western social circles, women follow the feminist life script during their 20s and become Alpha Widows in the process. Many of these women have kids out of wedlock during this time. They wait until they hit the wall and they're 100% completely desperate. Then they go through their epiphany stage, and then say, "I'm not looking for fun (anymore). I want a stable man." Then they'll start looking for marriage at around 30 after they've had 100 guys. Five years and two kids later, they're itching for a divorce.

Moderate Risk: There are some small communities and churches in which marriage and sexual purity are emphasized, and couples get married fairly early in life. Yes, they do exist.

Low Risk: There are other parts of the world that still conform to Patriarchal social norms. It is not uncommon for women to be married to their first sexual partner. However, other forms of risk are increased.

Also, there is evidence that racial subcultures and genotypes have a significant influence on risk. For example, in other videos, Kevin has mentioned the Moynihan report dozens of times. This report indicates that it's not strictly the Government at fault as welfare is available to all skin tones. He mentions how the report showed white women did not choose Government over white men in general, while Black women were more likely to choose welfare over marrying a black man.

I find it remarkable that Kevin is bravely pushing marriage to the demographic with the highest risk of all (i.e. Black women).

2. Disagreement on Female Responsibility

Another point of difference between Rollo and Kevin is how they view female responsibility.

Rollo takes an evo-psyche perspective and says that women are not going to change within the foreseeable future. They have no incentive to change.

Kevin argues that the Black community has been imploding on itself with now 2-3 generations of single mothers raising weak sons and delusional daughters. He says the Government sucks, but it's not the entire problem. Kevin is to be respected for his work in revitalizing the Black community. He has spent many years on his channel talking exclusively to men. His non fashion videos for men 1-4 yrs ago were very career focused and about how men should get themselves together. He became viral when he opened the same criticisms to women. For over a year he has had 3-5 shows per week covering chat sessions with overweight, single mother, and overall average looking women without wife skills who somehow think themselves able to marry a six figure stud muffin.

Kevin recognizes that the family unit is best for children, and he wants and truly expects women to bring their perceived value into reality. This is exactly why Kevin is begging women to become marriage material.

IMO, Rollo's take is more realistic, but Kevin's views align more closely with the gospel and the possibility of redemption. He holds this out as a hope for the Black community.

3. Disagreement on the Role of Religion

A third point of difference between Rollo and Kevin is their appreciation for religion.

Rollo has a high, albeit token respect for religion, and he will admit that many religious norms are beneficial for the individual and helpful for the community under certain social conditions. But he has a poor knowledge of Christianity and seldom adapts Christian precepts into his arguments. When he does, he gets it wrong. I've found a few instances where he argued against Christian ideals on the basis of practicality.

Kevin is far from being a Bible thumper, but he is not hesitant to make reference to ideas that are based on Christian concepts. He is adamant about incorporating religious tenets into his world view and in the advice he gives out. A lot of people might think that his views and lifestyle are not very Christian (he's been divorced twice), but from what I can tell, he's rather authentic and true to himself.

Further Thoughts

Rollo touches on politics as a matter of how political culture and policy shape the norm. But Kevin seems to avoid any discussion of politics and specific changes that need to be made in the role of government. This general elusion of legislative polity fits his style (he's much too frank to be a successful politician), but I think it would greatly further his agenda if he approached statesmanship and government more proactively. For example, he could advocate removing the State from any involvement in the marriage union. After all, that is the most aggravating factor in the issue of marriage, especially in the Black community, because the incentives for women to have children out of wedlock and depend on welfare, and to divorce and get cash and prizes on the way out, are far too great.

I suppose that he avoids these topics because it would be difficult to present these ideas to women without offending their interests.

Moral Hazard is Collateral Damage

Pro-abortion laws act as an incentive for more abortions AND more OOW births!

Authorizing Risk leads to Snowballing Risk

Here's a good article explaining the secondary and tertiary effects of altering God's intended design for sex.

Town Hall (John R. Lott): Roe v. Wade Harmed Even Many Children Born After the Court's Decision (2021-12-02)

If you look at Lott's degrees and where he has been a professor, we're in good company regarding our logic on intersexual dynamics.

While the main topic is focused on a Supreme Court case over an abortion law, it is noted that introducing this mechanism to address the negative consequences of unplanned, out-of-wedlock pregnancies changed the incentives.

> "Roe did substantially increase abortions, more than doubling the rate per live birth in the five years from 1972 to 1977."

Lott cites data that says abortion was at least one of the factors for men and women adopting riskier sexual behavior.

> "Liberalizing abortion rules ignited vast long-term social changes in America. The 1970s saw major changes, but few realize that research has shown the role that Roe had in help creating them. Nor do people understand the harm done to the children born after Roe as well as many of their mothers. But before we get to those harms, let's discuss the changes:

- A sharp increase in pre-marital sex.
- A sharp rise in out-of-wedlock births.
- A drop in the number of children placed for adoption.
- A decline in marriages that occur after the woman is pregnant.

> "With abortion seen as a backup, women as well as men became less careful in using contraceptives as well as more likely to have premarital sex."

And not surprisingly, as a result,

> "There were more unplanned pregnancies."

Just as the Manosphere has concluded, once a few women are willing to adopt the behavior in order to gain a hypergamous advantage, it incentivizes many women into the horizontal tango arms race to avoid losing the man they want. Lott even references this idea in the article.

> "But legal abortion did not mean every unplanned pregnancy led to an abortion. After all, just because abortion is legal does not mean that the decision is an easy one. Some women now had premarital sex after the changes in laws even though they knew they could never have an abortion simply because other women were doing so. If many women were willing to have premarital sex or have an abortion after these legal changes, the women who didn't want to have premarital sex, because they knew they were unwilling to have abortions, felt pressured to do so. Guys might drop them and date other women who were willing to have sex."

In the insurance industry, we call this a moral hazard, which is where people adopt additional risk in their behavior because they know they have a third party to cover the financial consequences if the risk fails. Basically, the mechanism to mitigate the effects of risk creates the incentive that alters behavior.

Sex, marriage, and procreation is like a big ball of yarn. It's quite useful for knitting the fabric of our lives, but once you start unraveling it, it can become a tangled mess.

The Link to Single Motherhood

Lott goes further to iterate several noteworthy statistics related to the rise in unplanned births and single motherhood.

> "Academic studies have found that legalized abortion, by encouraging premarital sex, increased the number of unplanned births, even outweighing the reduction in unplanned births due to abortion.
> In the United States from the early 1970s, when abortion was liberalized, through the late 1980s, there was a tremendous increase in the rate of out-of-wedlock births, rising from an average of 5 percent of all births from 1965 to 1969 to more than 16 percent two decades later (1985 to 1989).
> For blacks, the numbers soared from 35 percent to 62 percent. While not all of this rise can be attributed to > liberalized abortion rules, it was a key contributing factor, nevertheless."

So legalizing abortion not only incentivized more promiscuity, but it also promoted the rise in single mommyhood. Whodathunk the single mother epidemic was an indirect result of legalizing abortion?

Lott explains how this works.

> "With legalization and a woman not forced to go through with an unplanned pregnancy, a man might well expect his partner to have an abortion if a sexual encounter were to result in an unplanned pregnancy.
> But what happens if the woman refuses — say, she is morally opposed or, perhaps, she thought she could have an abortion but upon becoming pregnant decides she can't go through with it?"

There is another, more politically incorrect possibility — what if she actually wants to have Chad's b@stard spawn!

> "Many men, feeling tricked into unwanted fatherhood, likely will wash their hands of the affair altogether, thinking, "I never wanted a baby. It's her choice, so let her raise the baby herself."
> What is expected of men in this position has changed dramatically in the last four decades. Evidence shows that the greater availability of abortion largely ended "shotgun" marriages, where men felt obligated to marrying the women."

Come to think of it, I haven't known of a shotgun marriage in decades. So apparently, a decrease in marriage is yet another downstream result of legalizing abortion!

> "What has happened to these babies of reluctant fathers?
> The mothers often raise the children on their own. Even as abortion has led to more out-of-wedlock births it has dramatically reduced adoptions of children born in America by two-parent families."

Here's another non-PC possibility — Single mothers want to keep their out-of-wedlock chidren as leverage to garner welfare from Uncle Sam and child support from the father.

All in all, legalizing abortion is another brick in Big Brother's wall — one that has opened a pandora's box of disasterous results.

Indicators of Contempt (IOCs)

Jack · 16 March 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Are you aware of how others view your status?

Readership: All; Men;

Author's Note: This post expands an earlier comment.

What is Contempt?

Researcher Dr. John Gottman came up with what he called The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, indicators concerning the downfall of the health, vitality, and longevity of LTRs and marriages.

1. Contempt
2. Criticism
3. Defensiveness
4. Stonewalling (e.g. the silent treatment)

According to Gottman, Contempt is by far the most corrosive and dangerous. In fact, his conclusions from four decades of research show that the contempt of a wife for her husband is the most critical marker for gauging the health of a marriage, and it is the number one predictor of divorce! Thus, it is imperative for men to learn how to read this emotion in the women in their lives.

Contempt is a Biological Indicator of Hierarchy

Feeling contempt asserts power or status. The basic notion of contempt is: "I'm better than you and you are lesser than me." It's widely believed that the function of contempt is to signal a feeling of superiority, of not needing to accommodate or engage, and to assert emotional distance, independence, power, or status [Ekman].

People in "subordinate" positions feel contempt towards those who have a higher social, political, or legal ranking. Some examples include the contempt teenagers may feel towards adults, workers for their bosses, prisoners for their guards, and wives for their husbands.

While this kind of "upward contempt" is more common, the reverse is also true in which someone with a higher ranking feels contempt towards those with a lower ranking.

Those who are uncertain about their status may be more likely to manifest contempt to assert their superiority over others.

The correlation of contempt, one of the seven basic emotions common to human beings all over the world, with status, indicates that social hierarchy is inherently biological, and not a social construct.

Case Study — Implicit Predetermined Rebellious Disagreement

Anonymous detected contempt from his ex expressed in one simple word. He writes,

> "I can write a book on the rebelliousness of my late wife. Here is just one example:
>
> My wife pulled her car in front of the garage. I walked over, opened the passenger door and asked her to pull behind the other car on the far side of the driveway. She asked, "Why?"
> "I replied, "Because that is my wish."
>
> She quipped, "You're an a$$hole."
> Her questioning "Why?" is a manifestation of her desire to control and is a form of contempt. Her questioning why is an attempt to decline her simple submission by placing me in a position to explain my straightforward request, and essentially shift the decision (whether to move the car) to her. If I were to respond with a reason, it would imply that it is now her decision whether to move the car. This is not to say that she wouldn't do as I had asked, however that is not the point. The point is her attempt to change the dynamic between us; to put her in control."

Σ Frame Maxim 28 (Jack): Don't admit her argument. Do not argue with the help. Seek her submission, not her agreement.

Detecting Contempt

While contempt is a standalone emotion, it is often accompanied by anger, usually in a mild form such as annoyance. It is also accompanied by a feeling of power and superiority which may be a pleasurable experience for some people, whereas for others it can feel embarrassing and/or shameful.

The expression of contempt can occur with or without a hint of a smile or angry expression.

The key difference between resentment, anger and contempt stems from how a person perceives the status of the "offender". Resentment is directed at people with perceived higher status; anger is directed at people with perceived equal status; contempt is directed at people with perceived lower status [Hay].

The difference between contempt and hate is that hate is an evaluation that someone is evil or dangerous, whereas contempt judges someone to be inferior.

The difference between contempt and disgust is that disgust is aroused by objects that are aversive to the senses (taste, smell, sight, sound, touch), and one doesn't necessarily feel superior to the person/thing that disgusts them [Ekman].

The most common trigger for contempt is when one perceives that an immoral action has been done by a person or group of people to whom one feels superior.

Contempt is also felt to a lesser degree when someone fails to meet one's standards. Thus, it is natural for an alpha widow to feel contempt for a man she settled for, as he can never compare to her earlier lovers. It is also natural for the man she settled for to feel contempt for her because of her past sexual history and her inability or refusal to pair bond.

So when a woman feels contempt for a man, she's revealing several vituperative attitudes.

- "I'm better than you" or "I can do better than you" or "I've had better than you."
- "I'm uncertain about the hierarchical structure of this relationship."
- "I have a higher status than you."

- "I'm morally superior to you."

As you can see, for any of these stances, Heart Trust and Humility is out of the picture, so her submission and respect to him is out of the question.

Hiding behind that cute smirk is a world of pain waiting for you.

Indicators of Contempt

The woman's lack of respect for a man is commonly cited in the Christian Manosphere as a common problem in relationships. But contempt goes far beyond a lack of respect. Contempt is expressly anti-respect because it denigrates one in authority. That's why it's so destructive.

Contempt goes under men's radar for a long time, partly because women are skilled in keeping it toned down in order to stay relevant and advance their own purposes. But to the trained observer, it can be detected in certain Indicators of Contempt (IOC).

Here's a list of the 30 most common IOCs.

1. A heavy, intense gaze
2. An assertive, upright, militaryesque posture
3. Asymmetrical facial expressions, especially a raised upper lip on one side, the tightening of one cheek, or one raised eyebrow.
4. Avoiding or refusing to engage in honest open conversation.
5. Biting sarcasm
6. Edgy-ness
7. Fostering an ill will
8. Heavy sighing
9. Huffing
10. Intentional avoidance of direct eye contact
11. Looking down the nose or over eyeglasses
12. Maintaining an "I'm right and you're wrong" mentality.

13. Mocking expressions, e.g. amazement, surprise, taunting, sticking out the tongue, etc.
14. Objectifying the man's unique or abnormal traits in a condescending manner.
15. Passive-aggressiveness
16. Physical avoidance; pulling away from physical contact or withdrawing from physical proximity.
17. Puffing up the chest
18. Pursed lips
19. Raised or furrowed brow with an uninterested or degrading demeanor
20. Random accusations
21. Rolling the eyes
22. Scorn
23. Shame tactics
24. Sharp dismissive statements like, "yeah, right…", "whatever…", or "OK, I'm done here".
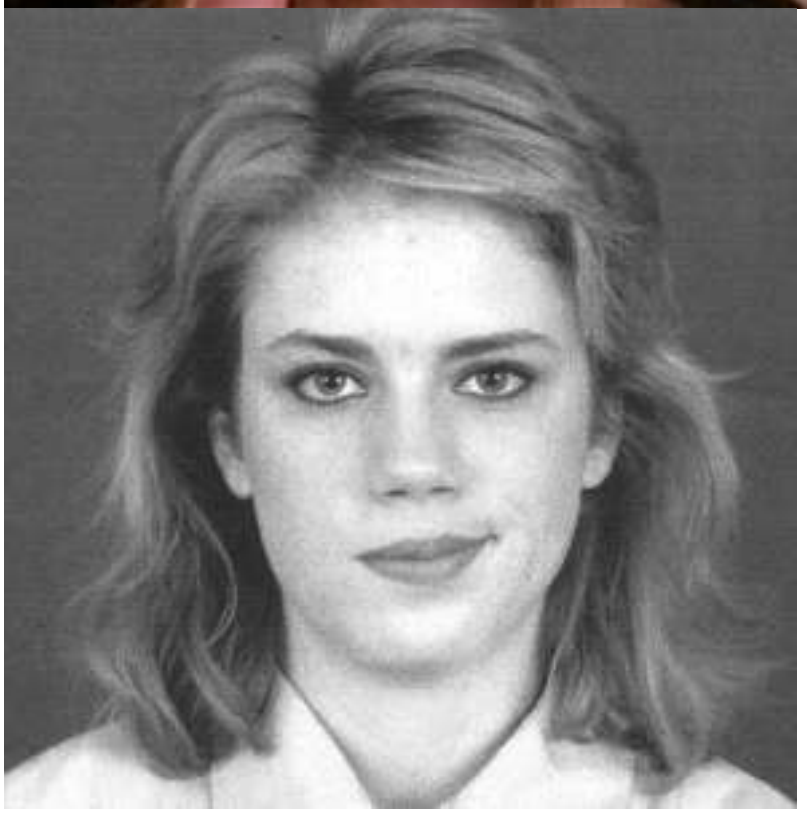
25. Smug or disapproving vocalized sounds or tone of voice.
26. Squinted eyes
27. Sudden deft actions (like slamming a door or throwing a book on a table carelessly).
28. Tedious impatience
29. Verbal insults
30. Wrinkled nose

Men find these IOCs annoying but they don't really recognize this arrogant lack of humility and trust as the latent rebellion that it is. Neither do they realize that the relationship is on thin ice.

Snapshots of Contemptuous Microexpressions

Our study of the indicators of contempt would not be complete without a collage of microexpressions of contempt.

Of particular note, contempt is the only emotion with a unilateral facial expression, meaning that the expression is not symmetrical. However, contempt can be expressed without a unilateral expression.



These are indicative of a Proverbs 21:9;19 woman, and you will suffer if you are in a relationship with one.

For single men, if you see any of these recur during dating you can either try to fix it or end it, but the reality is the amount of effort required to readjust her attitude is not worth it when you can put the same effort into looking for a decent woman who respects you and offers IOIs.

For married men who see these indicators, you can either step up your Game by an order of magnitude or else prepare for the worst!

The Status Signaling Narrative

Case Study — Status Signaling

Not only On-Topic, but also On Theme:

Theodore Beale, who goes by the pseudonym, Vox Day, posted the following on Gab and then again on his blog.

> "The future belongs to those who show up for it. Stop whining. Start fighting by getting married, having children, and planting the acorns of the trees in whose shade your grandchildren will play.
> Yes, there are risks. You might get your heart broken. You might lose half your toys. So what? Action requires risk and risk is inherent to life."

> "There is no point in whining, blackpilling, or worrying about things you can't possibly control. If you're not willing to take risks to build the future, if you're not willing to live, if you're not willing to set your face against the entropy of the universe, then you are irrelevant and your inferior genetic line will end with you, due to your cowardly narcissism."
> Vox Popoli: Triggering the Irrelevant (2022-3-20)

That last paragraph is what makes this post Status Signaling. The truth is, not every man is called to be a family man, and this is much more true in the present age.

Glorifying Rewards while Trivializing Risk

Oscar offered us a fair assessment of Ted's post.

> "On the one hand, Ted's right. (I'm not going to call the man by his pseudonym, since his real name has been public for years.) The future does, in fact, belong to those who show up. Action does, in fact, require risk. And, risk is, in fact, inherent to life. As far as that goes, all is good.
> The problem lies in the following:
> "Yes, there are risks. You might get your heart broken. You might lose half your toys. So what?"
>
> Men don't just "lose half [their] toys" when their wives choose to detonate their families. Men can, often do lose their resources, the wealth they've spent decades building, their careers, their children, their sanity, their freedom, and even their lives. Ted admits that risks exist, then trivializes the risks, thereby demonstrating contempt and a complete lack of empathy for men on the losing end of those risks, and the men who contemplate the risks soberly, and choose to opt out.
> Ted has a long history of contempt towards such men, which Dalrock documented in his post, No Respect (2017-12-14).
>
> I'm obviously no MGTOW. I'm a big proponent of marriage, and have argued against the Black Pill for years over at Dalrock's. But, I also commanded American Soldiers in combat, and worked in the oil field, which are full of inherent risk. Consequently, I understand that it's unconscionable to tell a man to take a risk without explaining the risk to him accurately, and teaching him how to mitigate, and/or reduce the risk.
> Ted did none of that. He told men to take an enormous risk, then trivialized it. That would be like me telling one of my Soldiers, "See that IED over there? Go detonate it. Sure, you might twist an ankle while you're walking up to it, or singe your pretty little uniform if it detonates prematurely, but hey, no risk no reward, amirite?"
>
> Ted's done a lot of good, and Dalrock also documented much of it.
> But, when it comes to the risks inherent to marriage in 21st Century America, Ted's no better than the average TradCon, churchian preacher."

Bench pressing will make you a more attractive mouse!
(No mention of the risks.)

The Status Signaling Narrative

We already know the Manosphere is stocked full of Status Signaling. Most of it takes the form of AMOGing, c0ck blocking, or competitive bullying.

I noticed long ago that those Manosphere authors who present themselves as having a very satisfying marriage, including Ted, Rollo, and yes, Dalrock too, never talk about their own marriages! I've often wondered about why this is.

There's a subtle con job that we often see within the Manosphere and also in church, and that is the projection of the ideal as a presently obtainable reality. It is often buffered by the condition, "…if only one would do X, Y, and Z." For example, there are several ideals in Ted's simple post that are invariably interpreted by the reader as "promises". Let's list them.

1. Married life is gloriously beautiful and satisfying.
2. Those who get married and have children are the progenitors of future generations.
3. Those who don't, aren't. (This has further implications of Status Signaling.)
4. Sanctification in marriage is readily achievable, and it's more common and easier than you'd think.

The implied condition to the promise is that, "If you would get off yer butt and start working out, learning game, and improving yourself, then you too can have a moderately wealthy and gloriously happy family life with a gorgeous wife and children!" The confusion arises when we recognize that all these statements are indeed true but fail to discern the contextual requirements implicit in point 4 and the necessary conditions thereof.

From a broader view, the Status Signaling Narrative takes the position that one has already achieved the ideal, and that you have not because you are somehow faulty, gammafied, lazy, poor, selfish, ugly, or any of many other reasons. But these implied claims are not necessarily true for every man. One thing we've learned from Scott is that Life Trajectories are real, and Trajectories matter. Thus, Status Signaling twists the facts to inflict shame on those who are faced with the problematic reality that it may not be true for YOU at the present time!

Those who can't pick up on this stint are offended, as Ted pointed out in the title of his post. Those who are more self-aware might perceive Status Signaling as AMOGing or competitive bullying at best, or at worst, an utter rejection of the common man who has common problems.

Conclusions

It's good to internalize the ideal and shoot for this as a goal. But we can't ignore the reality that…

- The ideal is different for every man, according to his calling and mission.
- For many men, some particular ideals may not be a part of their God ordained domain.
- Attaining the ideal is a difficult and life-long process.
- No one fully arrives at the ideal in this life.
- Many who try will literally lose everything.

Because of the inherent lack of respect, Status Signaling has the opposite effect on men than what is usually intended. That is, instead of inspiring men to work towards an ideal, it segregates men into haves and have nots, and distances/rejects the have nots. It undermines respect and divides the collective strength of the community. Status Signaling carries a tinge of Black Pill in that it destroys false hopes, but it fails to inspire a fresh and more relevant hope. Therefore, I would say Beale is Black Pilled.

One of the reasons why Dalrock has been so popular over the years is because he was able to present both the ideal and reality in a way that appealed to readers by emphasizing his first hand impressions, things about the topic that were uniquely human, or voice something we all experience that hasn't been formally articulated. His art as a writer was in reframing the topic on the level of a reasonable, well-informed layman, and thereby making the bulk of his readers feel both informed and understood. In doing so, he destroyed false hopes while offering a framework for improvement.

OTOH, Beale has made a regular habit of highlighting what's dystopian about this time, and once in a while, he'll present an ideal, but he is poorly skilled at avoiding the status signaling aspect of his presentation. As Feeriker noted, this comes across as narcissistic.

Here at Σ Frame, I recognize that context is everything, so I try to focus on what might take a man closer to redemption, sanctification, and shalom, whether it happens to be the ideal or not. I'll try to spell out the different viewpoints, choices, risks, consequences, and offer case studies to consider. I leave it up to the reader to discern which context he fits in and let him decide for himself.

Update

Adam Piggott is having the same discussion about Vox Day / Ted Beale's post. Adam sides with Vox, but with a bit more decorum.

A suitable ride with low mileage

Cars and wives both serve a purpose.

Readership: Men; Single Men;
Theme: Risk Assessment
Length: 1,200 words

I want to convey a little story, and then I'll draw an analogy about picking a wife wisely.

Shopping for a Worthy Ride

Most automobiles these days have a limited service life of approximately 20 years or 200,000 miles (320,000 km.). Can you imagine what would happen to share prices if GM or Ford designed all of their trucks to have 25 year minimum service life? Some people can make them last that long through anal retentive attention to maintenance, but that is different than military grade overengineering to the extent that the average buyer can abuse the truck and still expect decades of service.

Are there any cars like that on the market?

Yes. Recently I bought a 1999 Land Cruiser.

The main reason I wanted to buy an old Land Cruiser is so that I could go off road camping in the nature reserves with my sons.

Land Cruisers of that era have the reputation in the states as an overpriced SUV. This is because Toyota did not cut costs by reducing the robustness of the parts used. Everything on it is heavy, and parts cost an arm and a leg if you buy OEM, which with a vehicle like a Land Cruiser, you'll want to do because they last twice as long as the aftermarket parts. When you get into one, even a 23 year old model, you see the thought that went into engineering them.

Models made before 1997, which was the last year of the FJ80, had solid axles front and rear. The FJ100 series ran from 1997 to 2007 with a solid rear axle and independent front suspension.

1997 FJ80 Toyota Land Cruiser

They have options for front, center, and rear locking differentials. Factory rear lockers were an option for 1998-1999 model years, after which they switched over to a braking system called A-Trac to deal with the open differential issue when off camber. The 100s never came with a front locker, but it can be added aftermarket if you need it. I chose to purchase one older than the 2000 model year because I wanted the factory locker in the rear and I didn't care so much about the A-Trac braking system.

I am a little jealous of the Land Cruiser options overseas. There is a diesel engine option that makes for an amazing rig that did not make it to the States.

The thing that impressed me the most was the size of the car, the size of the engine, and the weight, all of which are much bigger than it appears in photos. They are built to have a minimum 25 year service life and with the proper maintenance will last a half million miles. They also have some very unique and useful features. There are little things like oversized wheel bearings that you can pull out and repack with grease, zerks on the drive line that you grease every 10k miles or so, a fully boxed frame and oversized CV axles (mine are 1.37 inches in diameter which is massive). The skid plate on it is noticeably heavier than the one on my Tundra, even though it covers about 3/4s the area, and the difference in the gauge of steel used is readily evident to the naked eye.

All of the above is why I fell in love with the Land Cruisers and ended up busting my budget to get a good one that has been fairly well maintained with 230k miles on it. The transmission shifts are almost imperceptible and the engine idles as smooth as my GMC with 53k miles on it. It's crazy.

I watched a video of a guy selling his 1997 FJ80. It had been lifted, had lots of aftermarket off road upgrades, was in very good shape and had 250k miles on it and he was selling it for $36,000. There is an ardent fanbase for these old Toyotas.

I did not pay anywhere near $20k for my J100, but I'm hoping that it will appreciate similarly because the features it has are desirable for those who are off road enthusiasts. As I continue to work on it and they become harder to find, it should at least maintain its value.

1999 FJ100 Toyota Land Cruiser

The Analogy of Two Rides

Since my head is preoccupied with used cars, I found that looking for a wife is very much like buying a used vehicle. It's uncanny how similar the two endeavors are.

Year, make, and model matter in most cases. Her upbringing, family history, and where she comes from matters.

How the vehicle has been used and maintained matters. Her past history and how she's maintained herself matters.

Researching a used vehicle thoroughly to see the service history helps mitigate the risk. Researching a woman through talking with those who know her and doing your own vetting help mitigate the risk.

All used vehicles have some wear from use, but low mileage inspected vehicles tend to be a good choice. All women have relationship wear because people sin against each other, so even a young virgin will have issues to overcome, but they're usually minor and more easily dealt with.

When the vehicle is for sale, the owner does things to minimize the flaws. When a woman is trying to impress/attract a man and/or get married, she does things to minimize her flaws.

When a buyer is bargaining for a deal, he'll emphasize the flaws. A wise man will focus more on a woman's flaws and hangups to help himself see her more clearly and avoid pedestalizing her.

2000 Toyota Land Cruiser interior

When buying a car, you should have an idea of what the car will be used for, and whether it will perform well in that capacity. For example, a reliable car is needed to drive to work every day. A comfortable car is preferred for taking long road trips. A truck is useful for small businesses and farming. A durable 4×4 is needed for off-road exploration. A classic car is used for car shows and cruising. A muscle car will win races. Likewise, when a man has a clear vision of his purpose in life, he will be better able to choose a woman who can fit into that lifestyle and support his mission well.

When you own the vehicle and drive it a bit you will see all the issues it has, especially if it has higher mileage. When you marry a woman, all the pretenses evaporate and you are going to see all her flaws.

Once you own the vehicle, regular maintenance will keep it running well and meeting your needs. Once you marry, the regular maintenance of the woman is required so she knows how to be the helper you need.

You have to ride in the vehicle regularly to keep the lubricants in important parts moving so the parts continue to function well. You have to ride on the wife regularly to keep the bid-response cycle in action so the relationship continues to function well.

Not all rides are the same. Choose wisely.

Backlash against a proposed Indian law criminalizing marital rape.

Readership: All
Theme: Risk Assessment
Length: 750 words
Reading Time: 2.5 minutes

The western nooz media is notorious about omitting important news from around the world. So I wouldn't blame readers at all if they haven't heard the news in India about a proposed law to criminalize marital rape.

A little background. Over the past decade, there have been a number of gang rapes in India, some characterized by horrific brutality, violent torture, and death. Many such cases are related to human trafficking. In January 2022, a three-member panel called The Verma Committee was appointed to investigate the aftermath of the most recent Delhi gang-rape. In conclusion, they proposed stronger laws to punish heinous acts of sexual violence.

Overall, India is a very conservative and patriarchal society, but there has been a strong surge of feminism within the last decade or so. Seeing the public outrage over the rapes as a window of opportunity, in January 2022, two women's rights organizations filed a petition with the New Delhi's High Court seeking to criminalize marital rape in India. They wanted to strike down a legal "loophole" in the Indian penal code which stipulates that intercourse between a husband and wife over the age of 15 cannot be considered as rape. In effect, they want to open the floodgates for husbands to be accused of marital rape by their wives, including those who are frigid, and/or indignantly rebellious.

According to The Male Factor, if this law passes, then husbands can be accused of rape, even without any sexual interaction with the wife, or even after getting raped by the wife, based only on her verbal admission.

As such, this petition has instantly polarized Indian society into Traditionalists vs. Feminists. Men are naturally interpreting this as an attack on men's rights. Some men have gone as far as to stage marriage strikes to protest against this proposed law.

Indian men protest proposed law criminalizing marital rape.

It appears that Indian women are wholly taken by surprise by their husband's desire, as if they never suspected that regular sexual intercourse would ever be required of them in marriage.

Outside of this explanation, it just doesn't make any sense until you know that 70% of Indian women can climax as many as 20 times in a single session! Golly glad G spots! Entertaining the hubby must be thoroughly exhausting! Now that would earn a tadpole's waggle of my heartfelt sympathies.

But of course, the usual feminist response to their being put upon in the marriage bed has only one logical explanation – that men must have changed over the last 20 years! Men of the 21st century are lascivious, lecherous horndogs who care more about procreation than their wives' cumfort zones!

I can imagine that Indian women are now reminiscing about the "good old days of the 1950s" in which men wore turbans and carried daggers and kukri knives around the market square.

Well, Indian wives didn't have to wait very long for machismo to return. TMF writes,

> "#MarriageStrike started trending in India and continued to trend for several days and often was in the top ten Indian trends and continue to remain the most interesting trend as this article is written."

Those who are fighting to prevent the marital rape law from passing know that if this law passes, then there will be a grandiose marriage strike across the subcontinent, not from wives who don't want to be put upon in the marriage bed, but from husbands who will be routinely defrauded as a common matter of legal jurisprudence.

Update

In mid March, 2022, Indian parliamentarians rejected the proposals to criminalize marital rape. In a report delivered to the parliament in March, a panel of lawmakers said the proposed marital rape law "has the potential of destroying the institution of marriage", adding that "if marital rape is brought under the law, the entire family system will be under great stress." Further protections granted to horndog husbands were further solidified this month when a Delhi court ruled that intercourse between a husband and wife "even if forcible, is not rape."

Another Status Signaling Narrative

Jack · 26 March 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Single men can signal status too!

Readership: All; Men;
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 3.5 minutes + 9:34 minute video

Jason (LastMod) shared this video he made in response to Ted Beale's post at Vox Popoli, Triggering the Irrelevant (2022-3-20) and the discussion about it here under The Status Signaling Narrative (2022-3-21).

Jack's Notes

The first half of the video is a subjective exploration of Jason's views about certain personalities, which are offered as anecdotal evidence for various points. But the larger point he makes in the first half of the video is that there is a lot of status signaling and AMOGing going on, and that the most egregious examples are way over the top, if not ridiculous.

One noteworthy example he gives (starting at the 4:54 mark) is of Bing Crosby. Bing Crosby was touted as the ideal husband and family man back in the day, but it was all a facade. In reality, he was married twice, had several extramarital affairs, and he hated his wife and children. After Crosby's death, his eldest son, Gary, wrote a highly critical memoir with a title that has taken on a new meaning since it was written, Going My Own Way (1983), which depicted his father as cruel, cold, remote, and physically and psychologically abusive. Two of his sons, Lindsay and Dennis committed suicide.

LastMod gives several other examples to round out his argument that many men turn out to be lousy fathers, all to make the point that being a father is not the whole purpose of life for every man.

The second half of the video is about his work in property management. His main point is that he is contributing a valuable service to his community, and that he couldn't do all this if he had a wife and family to look after.

Here I want to point out that Jason himself is engaging in status signaling, which is most evident at the 6:57 mark when he says,

> "…the world needs men like me at this point and stage in the game."

Then he goes on to describe how diligent and dedicated he is to his work. Admirable!

Getting stuff done.

Following your Calling is always the right choice

IMO, status signaling is probably a good thing for a man's psychology, and it is somewhat necessary to make one's self known to others. The problem with status signaling comes when men begin to denigrate the status of other men as being wrong, worthless, irrelevant, inferior, cowardly, and so on.

The thing we should be mindful about is that there is Biblical support for both Jason's and Ted's positions. Jason's position is described in 1 Corinthians 7:8, 25-40. Ted's position is supported by Genesis 1:28.

Furthermore, we have this admonition from St. Paul.

> [17] But as God has distributed to each one, as the Lord has called each one, so let him walk. And so I ordain in all the churches.
> [20] Let each one remain in the same calling in which he was called.
> [23] You were bought at a price; do not become slaves of men.
> [24] Brethren, let each one remain with God in that state in which he was called.
> [26] I suppose therefore that this is good because of the present distress—that it is good for a man to remain as he is: [27] Are you bound to a wife? Do not seek to be loosed. Are you loosed from a wife? Do not seek a wife.
> Excerpts from 1 Corinthians 7 (NKJV)

Verse 26 makes it rather clear that Ted is reaching past his domain of authority when he starts demanding that other men should marry and have children in order to "defend the continuation of civilized society" — a society which has created the very situation in which men are hesitant to marry.

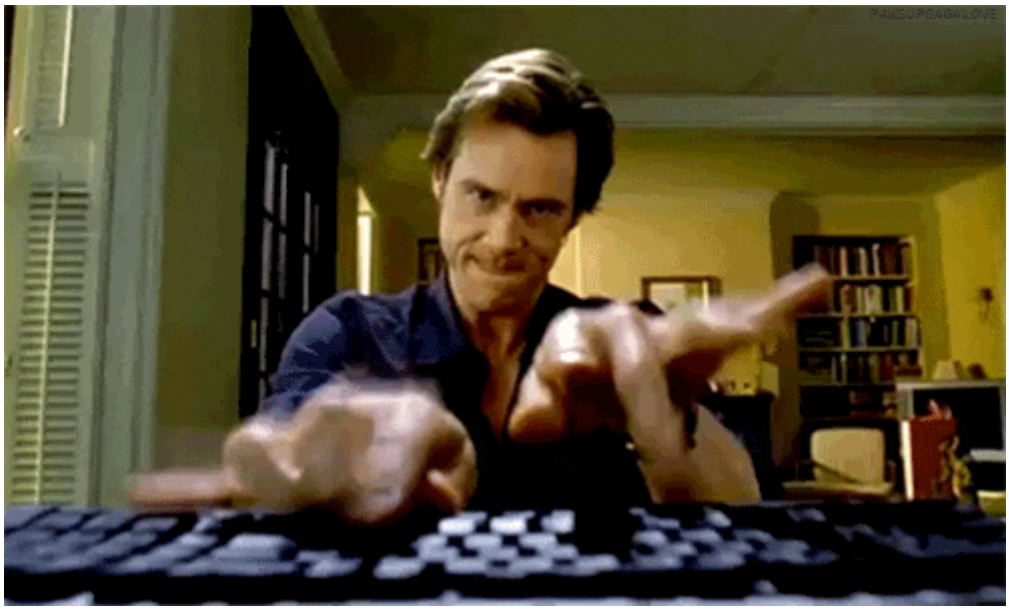
Following the analogy given in 1 Corinthians 12:15-26, Vox is basically saying, "because I am a d!ck that F_cks and procreates, therefore the eye, ear, and hand should also be d!cks! If they are not d!cks, then they are irrelevant. The body does not need them. They should not be part of the body!"

The truth is, Ted and Jason are BOTH doing what they're supposed to be doing with their lives, and they're BOTH glorifying God in their own unique respective ways. I would even say that they're BOTH pursuing their God ordained mission in life.

The measure of a Man is his readiness in taking action in obedience to His Life Calling.

We have seen evidence of both Ted and Jason taking large action within their respective spheres of influence. But yet, we see BOTH these men engaging in status signaling and passing cynical contemptuous invectives against the other, presumably for ego preservation or to receive the recognition and approval of certain men within their own microcosm of influence. A third possibility is to glorify one's self as an idealogue hawk.

Let us not become slaves to the opinions of men.



An idealogical minion who believes he is a keyboard warrior.

Conclusions

The Christian Manosphere (of which I assume Ted, Jason, Adam, et al. are an integral part), should be leading the wider 'sphere in the graceful display of respect to all men and the promulgation of men's prime interests according to each man's calling.

As I've stated before in Avoiding the Broken Window Effect (2021-7-21), how we treat other men is a community quality indicator. It's also displays the community's general stance towards male authority and headship. Ultimately, it characterizes the community's fear of God.

Men need to defend the interests of other men, especially Christian men for Christian men.

This does not mean that we need to agree on everything in life. It means that we need to recognize each man's contribution, including our own, and regard this work as labor for the Kingdom of God.

> "Who are you to judge another's servant? To his own master he stands or falls. Indeed, he will be made to stand, for God is able to make him stand."
> Romans 14:4 (NKJV)

- Derek L. Ramsey: Anonymity and Authorship (2018-12-22)
- Derek L. Ramsey: Anonymity and the authority of God (2019-1-2)

To sum up these posts, his main points were as follows.

1. Names are a basis of one's identity. Ramsey gave the example of a woman taking her husband's last name.
2. Names hold authority and convey leadership. Anonymous authors thus have a hollow leadership.
3. Anonymity provides meaningful protection. It protects against the ideological persecution and deplatforming, such as that at Twitter, Facebook, Google, Patreon, WordPress, and others.
4. Anonymity helps prevent real life harassment, like that experienced by Tucker Carlson's family.
5. Anonymity protects against government suppression.
6. Anonymity is a tool for the weak, the cowardly, the ignorant, and the dishonorable. Anonymity is often employed to protect idiots who are all these things.
7. People are anonymous because they fear something, legitimately or not. They are not willing to put their own neck on the line when they take controversial stances.
8. Anonymity is a lie. Lying is always a sin. Sin leads to defilement. This is one reason why the internet is so toxic and dirty.
9. Pseudonyms corrupt the soul. People are more likely to say something critical, false, judgmental, or toxic that they wouldn't say if their identity was known. As such, one consequence of anonymity is a degradation of one's self.
10. People who have things to sell (e.g. books, training programs) are not anonymous. People who don't are anonymous. There are very few exceptions.
11. Jesus didn't work anonymously. He never backed down or softened his words to avoid conflict. His words were biting and cut to the heart. He never put his life before his message. He showed true leadership. Jesus' followers stood by their names as well. Churches were built upon the teachings of those who were named.
12. A man should put his reputation behind his words. The word of a Christian should be his bond. Christians are God's agents and speak with the authority of God. Anonymous authors cannot fully represent God.
13. Those who remain anonymous cannot be held accountable.

As readers can see, Ramsey advocated full disclosure of one's identity, regardless of the consequences.

Interestingly, Bruce Charlton and Michael Foster (the author of It's Good to be a Man) apparently agree with Ramsey's perspective. But for me and most of the other commenters, the bottom line is that I/we can't take Ramsey's argument seriously. Several commenters pointed out that it's easy for him to encourage disclosure for others. For example, Lexet wrote,

> "That is easy to say if you are not in a profession where you would be fired instantly, and your career destroyed, for saying anything remotely anti-PC. And I say that as someone who works in a politically conservative environment. Leftism is everywhere, and people live in fear, and will throw their best friends under the bus to avoid 5 minutes of fake scrutiny by people who don't matter."

The comments were rife with objections, including a few life or death scenarios.

- Missionaries in China.
- Being honest with criminals while under gunpoint.
- The book of Hebrews was written anonymously, possibly to avoid persecution. To this day, scholars cannot identify who the author was, but their best guess is Timothy. In the last post listed above, Ramsey responded by saying that the authors were well known to others back when they were written. But isn't there a reason why the author didn't identify himself in the text whereas Paul and other NT writers did?

IMO, Ramsey's argument is purely philosophical, with strong appeals to moral conscientiousness. Never does he address the wisdom or purpose for either recourse, nor does he undertake an assessment of benefits vs. risks.

Persecution and Risk

I have written before about how foolish it is for men to operate in good faith and be honest and trusting with those who are not offering the same in return. For example…

- Developing Attitudes That Help You Cope (2015-11-5) examined the value and purpose of trusting and being open and honest with others.
- The Blue Pill, Feminism, and Sin (2018-10-16) mentioned how Feminists and SJW's have a regular pattern of resorting to violence, rage, and dishonesty, all efforts to force others to conform to their narrative of truth. Doesn't that make you want to give them your full name, address, phone number, and place of occupation? (sarcasm) "Hey! I'm a good guy! I've done nothing wrong. So what is there to lose by being honest?" This is a foolish recipe for disaster.
- Men's Fantasy of Emotional Intimacy (2021-6-23) described how foolish men are honest and open with a woman because they naively expect the same from her. NovaSeeker described how women will use this information against men. Scott has made it his mission to make men aware of how their idealogical love is seldom reciprocated, and is instead used against them.
- When walking on eggshells, step boldly! (2021-6-30) discussed how men often fail to exercise discernment as to whether a woman is actually capable of offering either love or respect, and therefore open up under the assumption that it is right to do so, or that honesty is important, or merely because he desires to be loved by her.

Obviously, the outcome can range from beneficial to destructive, so we must employ wisdom.

Case Study — Zippy Catholic

Like 2014, 2018 was another extremely difficult year for the Manosphere. Censorship, deplatforming, demonetization, shadowbannings, and various other persecutions were rampant and got worse as the year progressed. I documented the shake down in The Evolution of the Red Pill (2018-12-31). Many Red Pill authors went under, and a few of them voiced their difficulties. But we only know what they were able to broadcast online. Many of these abrupt changes were surrounded by mysterious circumstances which were not revealed to the public at large, and I suspect there was a lot of dirty pool going on behind the scenes.

Let's take Zippy Catholic for an example. The name of the man behind the blog and online persona of ZC was Matthew.

Zippy Catholic was the first anti-mainstream-narrative blog that I came across back in early 2017 (yes, I was a latecomer), and through him I discovered all the others (Dalrock, Deep Strength, Illimitable Men, Roissy, Rollo, Roosh, et al.), so ZC has always had an important place in my heart.

Zippy Catholic / Matthew consistently produced logical, intelligent arguments, which picked at the threads of Usury, Liberalism, and Anti-Realism, and he was impressively effective in convincing many people of the inherent evils.

You can believe that somebody was not happy about that.

He was also a renegade maverick blog author who took on both modern Feminist society and the Manosphere, tearing down the foundations of the Matrix – in the name of Jesus, no less.

Somebody was definitely not happy about that.

On September 18, 2018, Matthew was killed in a mysterious hit and run accident while he was cycling. Shortly after he died, another blogger at another site he blogged at before he opened his Zippy Catholic site "outed" him and published a mini-obituary using his full name and identifying him as ZC. That blogger was quickly and viciously criticized for publishing that obit, and it was taken down within a day or two. The primary reason for the criticism was that ZC did not want his real identity known. His son Gabriel confirmed this news in a comment under his last post.

About four months after Matthew's death, I searched the internet for more information about his death. It was fairly easy to find his real identity online, and there was a lot of very personal information about him floating around the internet. I won't disclose much about what I found, except to say that he was quite successful as an investor and CEO of at least one start-up. He had published five technical papers in SCI journals, and held six patents on webpage data mining. In short, he was an accomplished man, not only in the blogosphere, but also IRL and as a man of faith too. That's worthy of honor and respect — but not to everyone.

The first thought that went through my mind after reading of his sudden, mysterious, hit-and-run death was, "They finally got to him." Although I'm not even sure who "they" would be.

But whoever the culprit might be, it is not outlandish to believe that whoever was making money from the usury that Matthew assailed, had felt the chill and put a price on his head.

I know some readers might find it disrespectful to Matthew to speak of what might be called a “conspiracy theory” here, but I think a sufficient period of time has transpired since his passing, and I want to put this idea out there.

I know this is all conjecture, but I believe it could very well be true. So I am quite willing to chalk him up as a modern day martyr.

Conclusions

Christian Red Pill / Manosphere bloggers and commentators need to weigh the benefits vs. risks of giving out any clues whatsoever about one’s real identity. There must be a specific purpose for either adopting a pseudonymous identity or revealing personal information for all the world to see. In some cases, it could be a matter of life or death. Censorship and demonetization pale by comparison.

In the final analysis, the question of whether to be anonymous or not quite literally becomes a question of whether this is the hill one is ready to die on.

So basically, this comes down to two options.

1. If you remain anonymous, you can continue to spread the wisdom you have found and minister to other men.
2. If you identify your real life person, you can suffer and possibly die for your beliefs.

The apostle Paul described these two options like this.

> [21] For to me, to live is Christ, and to die is gain. [22] But if I live on in the flesh, this will mean fruit from my labor; yet what I shall choose I cannot tell. [23] For I am hard-pressed between the two, having a desire to depart and be with Christ, which is far better. [24] Nevertheless to remain in the flesh is more needful for you. [25] And being confident of this, I know that I shall remain and continue with you all for your progress and joy of faith, [26] that your rejoicing for me may be more abundant in Jesus Christ by my coming to you again.
> Philippians 1:21-26 (NKJV)

Revealing one’s identity makes one an easy target. So unless you’re nearing the conclusion of your life’s mission and are seeking to enter into a martyr’s glorious eternal rest, the resulting harassment and persecution will only slow you down and may not be worth the trouble.

Epilogue: Counting the Cost

Introduction

> [28] For which of you, intending to build a tower, does not sit down first and count the cost, whether he has enough to finish it— [29] lest, after he has laid the foundation, and is not able to finish, all who see it begin to mock him, [30] saying, 'This man began to build and was not able to finish'? [31] Or what king, going to make war against another king, does not sit down first and consider whether he is able with ten thousand to meet him who comes against him with twenty thousand? [32] Or else, while the other is still a great way off, he sends a delegation and asks conditions of peace.
> Luke 14:28-32 (NKJV)

Jesus commanded us to count the cost, and consider the risks of following Him. If Jesus wants us to count the cost, and consider the risks of following Him (which is the most important decision anyone can make), then why would we not also count the cost and consider the risks of other decisions, such as marriage?

I see it as all being part of the same decision. All decisions in life must be concordant with all other decisions, otherwise one will run into additional and unnecessary dilemmas and conundrums and then things get messy. Of note, coming to Christ later in life has these sorts of problems. The costs are greater, and the benefits are reduced.

Under The Status Signaling Narrative (2022-3-21), I was glad to see there was some discussion about Counting the Cost. I'll cite some relevant comments and questions, and summarize what we have learned.

What does it mean to Count the Cost?

Caterpillar345 posed a good question.

> "Does this conceivably mean that a man could count the costs of following Christ and either (1) determine he doesn't have what it takes to fight the battle required or, (2) determine that he doesn't think it's worth the cost/risk? In the religious community that I was raised, this scripture was cited plenty to those of us who were raised in it, but the implicit answer was that of course Christ is worth it, so commit already."

That last line in bold is a logical bait and switch made by those who are ignorant about what it truly means to Count the Cost. This line of reasoning is especially prevalent within Evangelical circles because active proselytation is considered to be a mark of faith. Counting the Cost is not so much about commitment – commitment is a given because you can't very well go back to being an unbeliever, and if one were to do so, counting the cost would be a moot point.

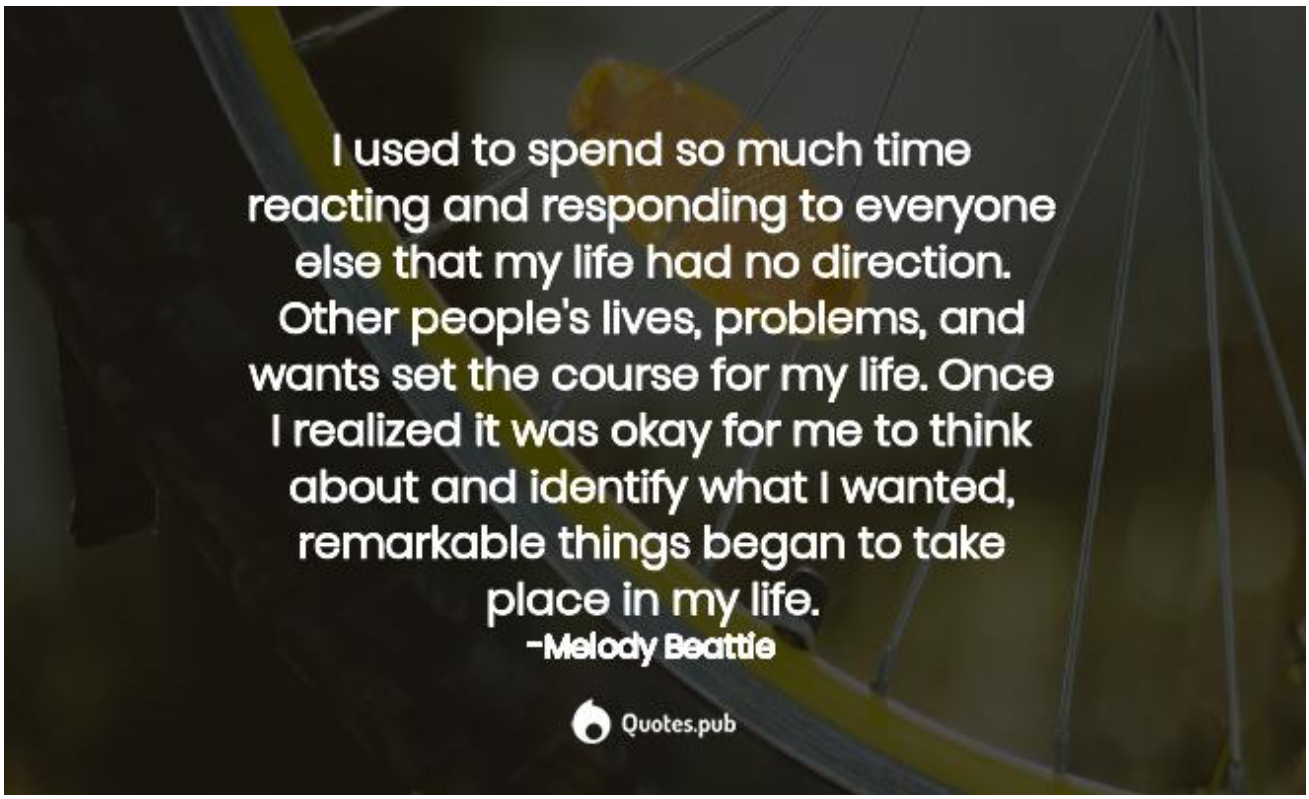
No, counting the cost is about…

- Being self-aware — facing one's desires, fears, and weaknesses.
- Being situationally aware — knowing what you've been given and what you're lacking.
- Assessing how one's gifts, temperament, and station in life can assist one on His mission, what kinds of plans and strategies are both actionable and actually doable, and what arrangements may need to be made for it to happen.
- Using all this information based on one's gifts, temperament, and station in life to make wiser decisions.

Red Pill Realization is Similar to Counting the Costs of One's Mission

To make Counting the Cost more clear to the reader, I'll draw an analogy.

Think back to the moment when your Red Pill awakening started to sink in to your conscious awareness. Most of us remember recoiling in shock at the sudden discovery of the uglier truths. Other, more abstract truths took a long time to swallow and accept, as we slowly digested a sense of horror eventually leading up to the confession that we had been totally wrong all our lives. This realization necessitated a reassessment of practically every impression, every decision, and every experience we'd ever had, followed by a recalculation of what to do next.



Then came a period of internal arguments and external struggles, both against the self and against reality, as we floundered to find our way towards a state of readjustment. For a while, knowing the truth just didn't sit well on our stomachs. It just didn't feel right to stop obsessing over wimminz head games, opinions, and whims, and to put God first, because we were so well accustomed to the confusion and frustration of being Blue Pilled. Those Pretty Lies never brought the slightest bit of inner peace, but they did give us a sense of social acceptance and psychological complacency. So breaking away from the worker-ant mold felt irresponsible, like a betrayal of sorts, and in a way it is. We abandoned our allegiances to the widespread apostasies and the popular idols of our times, and accepted the task of being mystical and mission oriented. Married men had to embrace the additional responsibility of attaining God's covenant order of Headship. But once we made this break, it also felt wrong to look back as well.

As a pertinent case in point, one of the things we learned about Married Dread Game is that it doesn't necessitate a man to break his marital vows to be effective. It just forces a man to face his fears that his wife might do so if he should choose to be spiritually obedient and his wife rebels in response. The unpleasant crisis of faith inherent in this crucial decision is that a man has to come to the point where he is willing to lose the relationship in the event that she chooses the highway. Then comes the task of implementation, which typically requires an abundance mentality, charisma, detachment, maintaining Frame, DHV, and many other Inner Game disciplines. For most men, this is not easy to do, as it requires a psychological reordering of magnanimous proportions, c.f. a renewing of the mind (Romans 12:2). The remarkable thing about this is that when a man responds this way, he's beginning to conform to God's covenantal order. He's also turning the tables on her and shifting the relationship structure towards Headship. As Oscar, RPA and I described before, some women love this and respond positively, and other women hate it and blow up the marriage.

This is only one preeminent example of Counting the Cost. Losing the relationship isn't the goal, but it is a possible or even a highly probable cost that requires an internal frame adjustment, and for some men, the cost is great. Facing up to this possibility and taking responsibility for the outcome, whatever that might be, is the same as counting the cost of being obedient to God, and of putting Him first, rather than the wife (or the p_ssy). If we back up a couple verses in the passage from Luke quoted above, we see that this is exactly one of the things Jesus was talking about.

> [26] "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his own father and mother and wife and children and brothers and > sisters, yes, and even his own life, he cannot be my disciple. [27] Whoever does not bear his own cross and come after me cannot be my disciple. [28] For which of you, desiring to build a tower, does not first sit down and count the cost, whether he has enough to complete it? [29] Otherwise, when he has laid a foundation and is not able to finish, all who see it begin to mock him, [30] saying, 'This man began to build and was not able to finish.'

> Luke 14:26-30 (ESV)*

Counting the Various Costs

In addition to the cost of marital failure, there are other ways that men must Count the Cost. After our discussions this month, I've realized that it really does involve a lot of counting. Here are some of the ways.

Relationship Costs

When vetting a woman, counting the cost could be equivalent to counting the N's of her past. Every man she's slept with has sucked out a piece of her soul that inevitably comes at a cost, not only to her future husband, but also to the sanctity of the marriage, and the joyful home atmosphere of shalom that contributes strongly to the godliness of the children growing up therein.

Counting the cost could also take the form of counting how many accounts she has on social media and dating websites, how long she's been on them, and how many "likes" and messages she gets on an ongoing basis. An OnlyFans type account would be more heavily weighted in the calculation. A high figure here strongly suggests that she's an attention wh0re who is empty on the inside and cannot offer much of herself in marriage.

Financial Costs

There are financial counts too. As LocustsPlease and others pointed out, divorce is NOT an even 50/50 split. The man might lose four times his current net worth in a divorce settlement! She gets items that have liens on them and he gets the responsibility to pay the liens. Or he has sizeable educational loans that reduce his net worth, and when the judge orders the assets split, she doesn't get any of his debt, only the assets. So a man needs to count how much debt he has, knowing that the wife would keep all the assets and leave the man in a negative net worth situation with all the accrued debt.

He also needs to count how much money he can reasonably make over his lifetime in his career, because if the marriage goes south, he will have to pay her alimony/child support with money he has not yet earned, which typically happens in a divorce settlement.

Furthermore, the punishment for failing to pay alimony/child support is more severe than that for minor felonies, sometimes resulting in jail time. How can this be factored into the calculation?

Spiritual Costs

This is where it gets complicated and contextual.

One purpose of marriage is to avoid fornication. So for some men, getting married might be a key decision that would save their souls (so to speak) from a lifetime of impulsive lust, porn, masturbation, and wh0remongering.

Women are saved through childbearing and by having a spiritual covering (in the form of a husband exercising Headship), so likewise, getting married would be making progress in the spiritual realm for them too.

But aside from these basic ontologies, not every man would advance his spiritual state through marriage, and this is entirely because of the extravagant risks present in marriage these days. I've heard several men state that they lost their faith after their wife had an affair, cuckolded them by having another man's child, and/or divorce raped him. Also, judging from testimonies among readers, there seems to be a real risk of losing one's faith, or at least the confidence and joy thereof, merely by being denied sex from their spouse for an extended period of time, or by having one's commitment soundly rejected.

These are all part of the costs/risks that must be counted, and they are unique for each man. Namely, can a man bounce back after any of these setbacks, or does it put him down for the count?

Conclusions

Love and marriage are particular endeavors that have always been filled with risk, but marriage in the current cultural melee is difficult if not impossible to manage. A few men will be able to make marriage work. Most men don't have what it takes to manage those risks, and frankly, they don't need to either get what it takes or learn to manage those risks.

When I was growing up in the church, I never heard marriage framed as an investment, or a risk, nor did I learn any cost to benefit analysis to marriage. I never learned Scott's Axiom, or any of the other things we've learned. All this wisdom is a fruit of the Christian Manosphere in recent years. Only now do I realize that I had a significant wealth of opportunities concerning women and marriage, but I blew most of it because of Blue Pill conditioning, churchianity. and conscientious legalism. That said, I can fully understand how a man would make many horrible decisions regarding dating, sex, and marriage.

When Ted Beale (Vox Day) got married, he had enough social and financial capital that the inherent risks of marriage faced by most men never really emerged as genuine risks for him. His station in life obviated that lick spittle discovery of the self. It's hard to say whether he has ever faced the necessity of counting the cost of following Christ concerning his marriage. That's great for him, but the grand majority of men don't have this luxury.

Adam got married, but he didn't count the costs, or maybe he expected something different from marriage which skewed his calculations. I think we're all guilty of this to some degree, including myself.

Other men who have had relatively stable marriages, men like Oscar and Red Pill Boomer, continue to count the costs in various ways of lesser impact. It seems that Counting the Cost never ends.

Concerning the row over Vox Day's post, and Adam Piggott's response, Ted Beale (Vox Day) said that men should "fight a war to defend the continuation of civilized society." The problem is, there's no civilized society to defend. There's only a feminist gl0b0h0m0 dystopia filled with traps and snares for Christian men. If Ted had said that we must fight a war to defend the continuation of our personal missions, our families, and our Christian communities, then I am totally on board.

Ted and others like to shame MGTOW for not contributing anything to a nominally Christian but de facto pagan society that long ago turned its back on them and on God. But as Ted noted long ago,

> "Both nihilists [i.e. MGTOW] and civilizationists are necessary to the process of first destroying, and then replacing, [a Feminine Imperative based] society."

If that's true, we should thank MGTOW for doing the dirty work!

IMO, I think it's a distraction to get sidetracked by the arguments about cultural ontologies and how a man might best contribute to, or would otherwise detract from, a desired cultural outcome. I don't think we can attain that level of social engineering over the world, and besides, that's basically what the various -isms have always tried to do, and it's always turned out disastrously. The only thing that we can control, and therefore should be focused on, is our own domain of authority and individual sphere of influence.

In this view, what is important is that a man follows his personal mission and contributes something to God's work. Therefore, the bottom line is that each man must be Counting the Cost of any endeavor to himself and to his faith.

This approach is not the same as MGTOW, but for some men, it might be (in concept*). A couple readers at Adam's place called this approach "Men Going God's Way" (MGGW). I'm wondering whether there are even enough men like this for this to become a thing, and if it did, how would it be any different from Promise Keepers?

Men do not owe anything to women who don't recognize the glory of God in a Headship structured marriage, and who don't believe they have any responsibilities to God, to their fathers (if single) or their husbands (if married).

There's no shame in counting the cost of marriage and deciding that it's not worth the risk. The important thing is that we do Count the Cost and make those decisions.

 Most MGTOW communities are decidedly unchristian, but the basic MGTOW concept of men not falling for and following all the wider cultural dictates applies.*

How to double your strength in 3 months

> The glory of young men is their strength…
> Proverbs 20:29 (NKJV)

I came across a YouTube channel, Starting Strength, that explains how a man can build strength in a relatively short amount of time. I've picked out two of their videos for our perusal and discussion.

The first is a short video that features two skinny guys who've made big strength gains (one is a coach now), but it doesn't explain the program very well.

Starting Strength: 7 Weeks of Progress on the Starting Strength Novice Program (2019/7/2; Length: 10 minutes)

The second video explains the program thoroughly. Time stamps are listed in the first comment.

Starting Strength: How to do the Starting Strength Novice Linear Progression – Starting Strength Gyms Podcast #1 (2021/12/29; Length: 68 minutes)

To break this down in brief, a skinny, untrained young man might start with a 135 lb. (60 kg.) squat for 3 sets of 5. Following the Starting Strength model of three workouts per week, and adding five pounds per workout:

11 weeks x 3 workouts/week x 5 lb. (2 kg.)/workout = 165 lbs. (75 kg.)

135 lbs. (starting) + 165 lbs. (increase) = 300 lbs. (135 kg.) for 3 sets of 5.

So if a young man starts with a 135 lb. squat, and adds 165 lb. to his squat in 11 weeks, he'll more than double his strength in that time frame. This is realistically achievable in a man's 20s with sufficient food and rest. His muscles grow because they have to adapt to the stress applied to them, and because they're being fueled by adequate food and rest.

That means that in a few months, a determined young man can go from being a skinny noob to one of the stronger guys in the gym. The gym bros start to notice, and give him the thumbs up. The girls start to notice. His confidence grows with his accomplishments, and so on.

Determination and Detachment

Stay focused on your purpose, no matter what others may do or say.

Readership: Men
Theme: Overcoming Obstacles
Length: 600 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

It's not to be unexpected that joining a gym, an athletic team, or any other men's group formed around a physical activity will involve some amount of hazing or some rite of passage. After all, it is the nature of men to seek to establish a hierarchical pecking order. Attention is therefore focused on newcomers.

However, once we have decided that we are "in", we must not let the evo-psyche rituals of social admission intimidate us and prevent us from pressing on.

In the comments under Oscar's post, How to double your strength in 3 months (2022-4-1), LastMod described why he doesn't like going to the gym.

> "[The gym is a] Very intimidating place. Especially if you look like me or if a guy / gal is overweight. Any motivation they may have is killed quickly in a place like that. Once I saw people giving side looks, snickering, and just being really crass to a large woman.
> People say, "Go to the gym. Lose weight! Work out!" Finally, courage mustered up and they are not welcome."

In response to Oscar's attempt to sharpen him up, LastMod retorted…

> "…and it makes you look smart, me look stupid, and in the end, it leads me to dislike you more."

Ahhh… We need to review Detachment 101: Maintaining Frame is the same as setting Socio-Emotional Boundaries.

One of the first psychological exercises that must be done even before one sets foot in a gym, or joins a sports team, etc., is to settle into an attitude of determination about achieving one's goals, whether it be to win the championship as a valuable team player, to double one's strength in 3 months, or simply just to pass gym class, or to maintain a regular schedule of going to the gym for the purpose of staying active.

- Having trouble staying focused and motivated? Wear earphones and listen to your favorite music.
- Too many people want to consume your time and energy with rambling chit chat? Wear a baseball cap and sunglasses. Keep looking at your watch. Earphones help too.
- Mr. Meat Head gives you a dirty look? F 'em! Stop looking at him.
- Rude prepper kicks your water bottle over? F 'em! Ignore him and keep pressing.
- Bubble butt yoga pants girl snubs you with IOCs? F 'em! Remember what you learned about wimmin from Rollo et al.
- Sweaty jock boy on the cycle looks at you out of the corner of his eye and shakes his head with disgust? F 'em! Snap your towel and pick up speed.
- Boisterous gym bros monopolize the bench press and won't give you a turn? F 'em! Work on something else and make a note of coming back at a time when they're not there.
- Too much bad sportsmanship, derision, disrespect, etc., for you to handle? F 'em ALL!!! Go find another gym, team, etc.

The point here is not to develop an antisocial attitude, but to stay focused on your goal/purpose. Whether the gym is full of people or if you are there all alone, you* are there for you alone. You are there to achieve your own goals. You're NOT there to garner attention and win a popularity contest.

If you make acceptance, good feelings, or popularity into a goal, then you're making things much more difficult than they need to be. Rightly considered, popularity should be considered to be a proof and not a goal. Very few men can make social provenance into a realistically achievable goal in and of itself.

Let us not become slaves to the opinions of others.

Do your own thing, choose your endeavors wisely, follow the Flow, and let time and practice reveal your expertise.

What Ted got right

Men are measured by their Actions, or by the lack thereof

The Jack said,

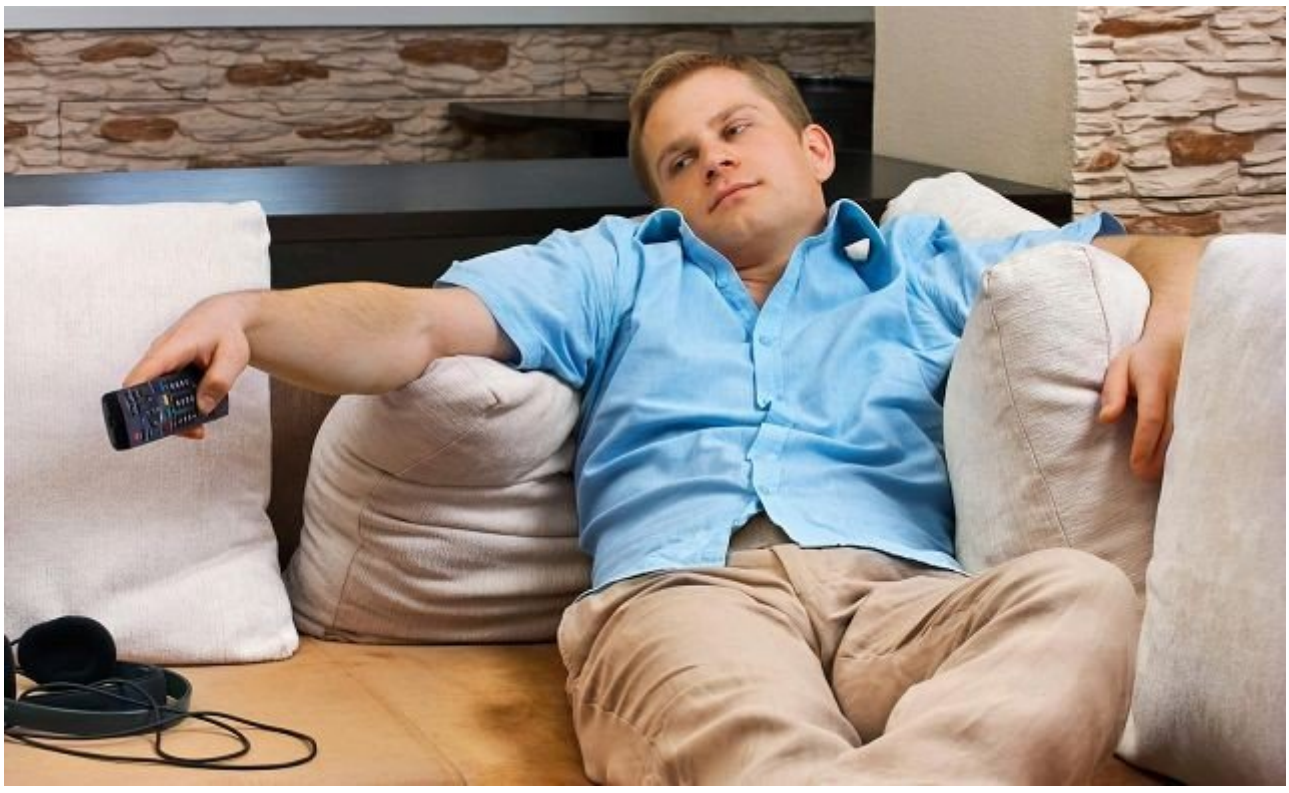
> "The measure of a Man is his readiness in taking action in obedience to His Life Calling."

The contrapositive statement is also true, which is to say,

> "A man who fails to take action in obedience to His Life Calling is a failure as a man."

When we think of masculinity through this lens, it can reveal areas in which failing men fail as reasons why they fail. Therefore, men who don't take action and fail are worse than men who do take action and fail.

As I stated before, Ted Beale (AKA Vox Day) was wrong to trivialize the risks men take when they marry, and to portray all men who stay single as risk-averse cowards, but he was right in that some men simply refuse to do the necessary work, and use all kinds of excuses to justify their unwillingness.



Case Study — E11i0t R0dgər*

To offer one extreme example, E11i0t R0dgər was one such man.

The deti brought up R0dgər in a comment…

> "2014 was the year in which the sphere started getting a lot of attention due to the E11i0t R0dgər incident. R0dgər was wrongly identified as being part of the Manosphere/PUA culture when he was most decidedly not — he was on sites like PUAHate and SlutHate which were about as anti-Manosphere as it gets without being feminist."

… and that sparked a vague memory of something E11i0t wrote that I think fits into The Status Signaling Narrative discussion. That led me down a rabbit hole where I found even more of his alleged quotes. And now you get to be the lucky recipients of my research, because I'm on vacation, and have some time on my hands for a change.

To start off, let's consider this quote from E11i0t.

> "Men shouldn't have to look and act like big, animalistic beasts to get women. The fact that women still prioritize brute strength just shows that their minds haven't fully evolved…"
> ~ E11i0t R0dgər
> The Guardian: 'PUAhate' and 'ForeverAlone': Inside E11i0t R0dgər's online life (2014/5/30)

Note the lame excuses.

- No one said that "men have to look and act like big, animalistic beasts to get women." It is observably true, however, that getting stronger makes a man more attractive to women than he would be otherwise.
- According to E11i0t, his unwillingness to do the work to improve himself wasn't a problem. The problem was that women's "minds haven't fully evolved", which sounds a lot like what fat chicks say about men who prefer slender women (i.e., almost all of us).

Other men tried to help E11i0t to no avail.

> "Everyone is focusing on E11i0t's lack of success with women, but they need to appreciate he was unable to communicate with anyone. He was so shy and painfully awkward. He had a boring personality and he didn't talk."
> ~ Philip Bloeser
> Daily Mail: EXCLUSIVE: 'I tried to offer him advice on talking to girls, but he wouldn't do it': Virgin killer's best friend reveals he warned his mother about disturbing Facebook post months ago (2014/5/29)

Remember how Deep Strength and The Jack have emphasized the importance of learning to talk to people in general?

> "He would never dream of approaching a girl, he just expected them to come to him, which they didn't. Even if any of them ever had, it wouldn't have lasted long, because he wouldn't chat to them.
> I remember he once said to me: 'I saw this really attractive girl today and she didn't even come up to me, she ignored me*.'* I asked him if he tried talking to her and he said no.
> I tried to offer him advice and encourage him to talk to girls, but he wouldn't do it."
> ~ Philip Bloeser

E11i0t refused to do the work. Here's more.

> "I remember giving him an assignment once so he could try to establish some kind of dynamic with a woman.
>
> I told him, 'When you see a woman next time you're on campus and you like her hair or sunglasses, just pay her a compliment.'
>
> I told him, 'It's a freebie, something in passing, you're not trying to make conversation. Keep walking, don't make any long eye contact, just give the free compliment.' The idea being you might make a friend if you make someone feel good."
> ~ Dale Launer
> BBC News: How I tried to help E11i0t R0dgər (2014/7/9)

That's pretty decent advice. The point here is not to turn a shy young man into Peter Poon-Slayer. The point is to help a shy young man incrementally get over his crippling fear of talking to girls. It's a bit like Exposure Therapy, which incrementally exposes people to the source of their phobia and helps them get over their fear.

So, how'd it go? No spoilers.

> "I got in touch with him a few weeks later and asked if he did it. He said 'no'. And when asked why not, he said, 'Why do I have to compliment them? Why don't they compliment me?"

> ~ Dale Launer

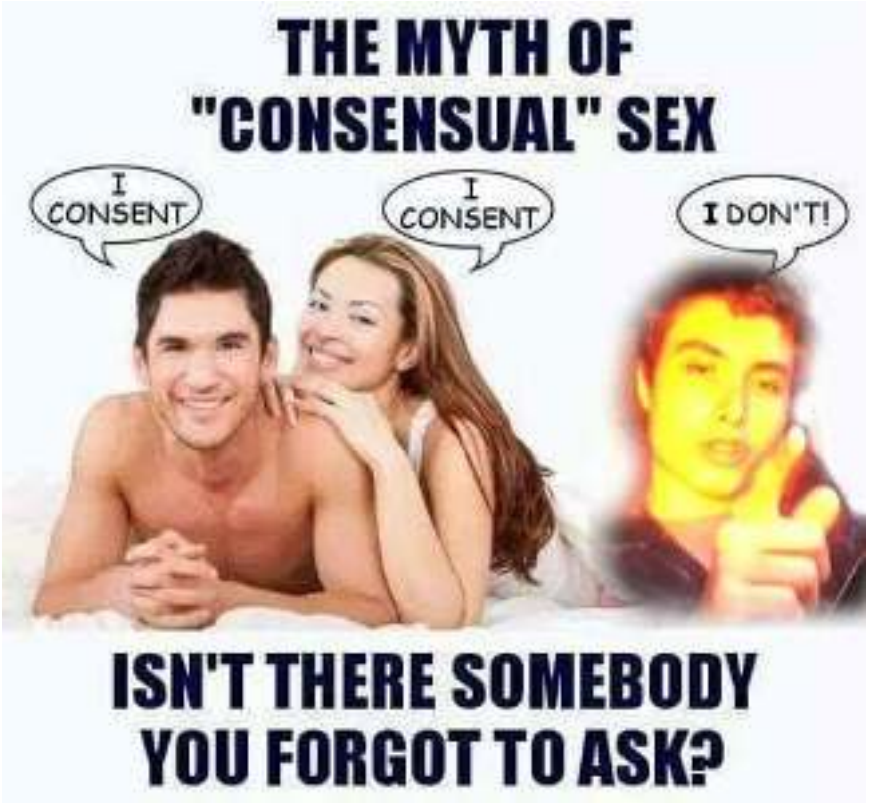
Again, E11i0t refused to do even the simplest gesture of work.

It's pretty clear, E11i0t adamantly refused to adopt typical traits of masculinity, and instead decided to inflict his "revenge" on the world in the 2014 Isla Vista murder rampage in which he killed six people and injured 14 more.

I'm not saying that every man who refuses to do the work is mass-murder / suicide waiting to happen. Were that true, we'd be ankle-deep in blood right now. Also, if I painted with such a broad brush, I'd be doing the same thing as that for which I criticized Ted Beale.



Prodigious Pathetic Pathology

E11i0t R0dgər is obviously a vanishingly rare case (thank God), so why bring him up at all? Because everyone knows who he was, and because I have actual links to actual quotes from him, and from people who knew him in real life. The same is not true of excuse-making men I know in real life.

I encourage readers to peruse this page at WikiQuote, full of quotes from E11i0t R0dgər. You'll see all kinds of themes and statements that are nearly identical to the writings and sayings of other excuse-making men. These habits are not rare. I'll point out two of them here.

1. E11i0t R0dgər refused to deal with reality as it is. Instead, he expected reality to bend itself around him. E11i0t whined about women preferring strong men. He could've gotten his skinny @ss in the squat rack and doubled his strength in six months, but heavy squats are hard. Whining on the internet is easy. This refusal to deal with reality is analogous to fat women's "body positivity" movement. Self-discipline is hard. Whining about "fatphobia" is easy. Surely, you can think of men who refuse to deal with reality as it is.
2. E11i0t R0dgər had a problem for every solution. He didn't even bother to try the good advice he received. Men are supposed to be problem solvers. A man who has a problem for every solution is the exact opposite of a problem solver. I bet you can think of men who similarly refuse to try good advice, or even lie about trying good advice. Again, this is analogous to fat women who say they "tried" this diet, and that diet, and nothing worked, when in fact, they were sneaking pints of ice cream at midnight.

There's much, much more, because E11i0t was a worst case whack job, but you get the picture. My point here is that many men share this same attitude towards women and towards life in general.

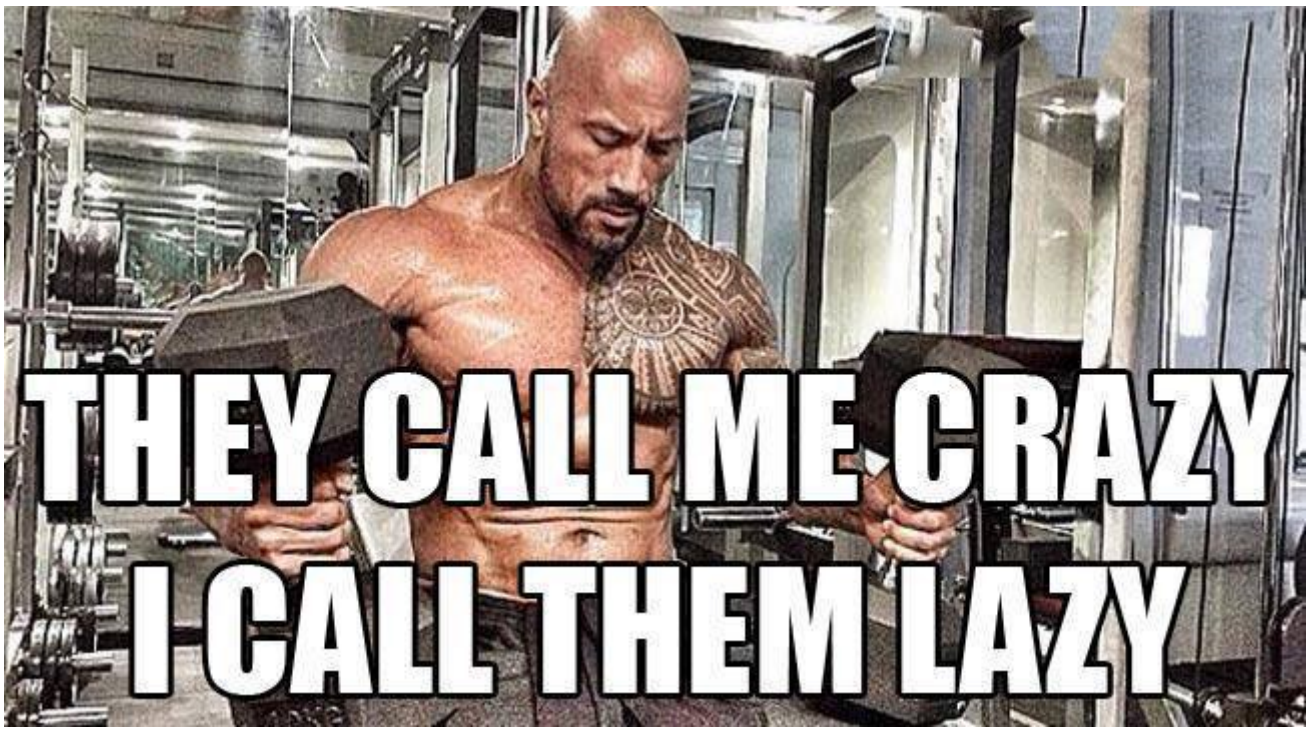
I keep comparing these habits to those of fat women, because I've seen men rightly complain about fat women's nonsense, then turn right around and apply the same twisted "logic" to themselves. I bet you've seen it too.

Facing Limitations

Again, I'm not saying any of those men are going to commit mass-murder/suicide. Maybe E11i0t R0dgər was born with a loose screw, or maybe his parents messed him up beyond repair. I have no idea. But we can all learn from his negative example.

You can ignore reality indefinitely, but you can't ignore the consequences of ignoring reality indefinitely. Ignoring reality is like beating your head against a reinforced concrete wall, because your goal is on the other side of the wall, and expecting the wall to give. It ain't gonna happen. The result is compounding frustration, and a sore head.

It makes a lot more sense to accept reality for what it is. Sometimes that means finding a way around the wall. Sometimes that means accepting that the original goal is unachievable, and doing something else. Sometimes that means deciding that the effort to get around the wall isn't worth the reward of the original goal. In any case, that requires an accurate assessment of what one can change, what one can't change, the effort required, and the risks, costs and benefits involved. The longer one takes to start the process, the worse the problem gets, and the less time one has to fix it. All of that requires honesty, which is sorely lacking among excuse-makers.



Nothing to lose by trying

That brings us back to Ted Beale. He was right when he said…

> "If your life sucks, then change it. What have you got to lose?"
> Vox Popoli: At least his feelings are safe (2022/3/21)

Suppose a man improves his life, and he still doesn't find female companionship. What's better; a crappy life with no woman, or a better life with no woman? Where's the downside?

And, spare me the "It's easy for him to say…" excuse. So what if it is? Where's the sense in refusing to improve one's own life because it's "easy" for someone else to say?

Besides, nobody said any of this was easy. Like weight loss, and heavy squats, if it was easy, everyone would do it. Few people do, precisely because it's hard.

Finally, no one can help a man who won't help himself. A man who won't do the work is best left to the consequences of his inaction. We all have finite time and resources, and infinite demands on them. They're better spent elsewhere.

 Name has been cornwalled to avoid unwanted traffic.*
 I'm not exaggerating about a young man doubling his strength in six months. Six months is actually very conservative. It could even be done in less time than that! For more about how to do this, please see my earlier post about the Starting Strength workout model, How to double your strength in 3 months (2022/4/1). But, like I said, if it was easy, everyone would do it.*

Introduction

Recently, PA Pundits reported that Elon Musk Becomes Twitter's Largest Shareholder After Citing Free Speech Concerns (2022-4-5).

> "Elon Musk, the billionaire owner of Tesla and SpaceX, has purchased 73.5 million shares of Twitter stock, making him the largest shareholder. He now owns 9.2% of shares."

To be exact, Musk now owns 73,486,938 shares of Twitter. Twitter shares shot up 27% immediately after he bought in. Now his holdings are worth $2.89 billion!

Good God! How the ɦəll does one man become that wealthy???

India Kilo Romeo told us…

> "It is entirely possible and plausible to go from zero income to being a top 95th percentile earner in a new field/industry in 8 years — including training years.

> "Once, when asked by a reporter how long it would take to rebuild his entire empire if he lost everything, Henry Ford guesstimated about five years.
> To build a life for a single man — complete with a new body, language, country, friends, family, career — in the span of 10 years is nothing."

Okay… but how?

These headlines seem boring, cliche, almost so unendurable that they're not even worthy of a click. Furthermore, the content doesn't seem to be related to Musk, Ford, and others like them.

There is something more behind these words that the reader browsing for casual entertainment is wont to miss — a truth that remains hidden to the blithe mind, and only visible — only meaningful — to the innermost heart.

The next two sections will give an account of how that works.

Achieving Small Goals

At times when I need to wake up really early (like around 4:00 a.m.) in order to start the day, I'll go to bed well before 10:00 p.m. the night before, and just before I lie down in bed, I'll slap the pillow three times and say, "I'm going to wake up at 4:00 a.m.!" Somehow, I'll wake up at 3:58 a.m., just before the alarm rings.

LocustsPlease said he's done the same thing, with similar results.

Another example. Back in 1998, I paid $500 for an old 1968 Chrysler 300 muscle car that had an unknown problem with the engine. I don't think I ever told this to myself, but I had the subconscious idea, "I want to drive this car, so I'm going to fix this problem." Never did it before. Never had any training. Didn't have any YouTube videos back then. Just a large toolbox and an old maintenance manual I picked up at a car show. After some tinkering and consulting a couple more knowledgeable friends, I discovered a timing gear that was so worn out it wouldn't even run. I bought some new parts from NAPA and replaced it. I also repainted some of the engine parts while I had it all apart. It took me about two weeks, but I got it done! Afterwards, that car would go from 0 to 50 mph in five seconds!

1968 Chrysler 300.

I've made resolutions like this so often that I don't even think about it. I don't know how many times I've done it, but every time I do it, I manage to make things happen. But now that I think about it, it is rather amazing.

How do you explain that?

Achieving Intermediate Goals

Determination and Detachment (2022-4-2) was about staying focused on one's goals, and not being distracted by neither one's feelings of inadequacy nor the often times rude opinions of others.

> "One of the first psychological exercises that must be done even before one sets foot in a gym, or joins a sports team, etc., is to settle into an attitude of determination about achieving one's goals, whether it be to win the championship as a valuable team player, to double one's strength in 3 months, or simply just to pass gym class, or to maintain a regular schedule of going to the gym for the purpose of staying active."

In response, Scott described the importance of forming a vision.

> "Remember that list that I made of things I still want to do from a few posts back? It wasn't supposed to be funny. I will get those things done, or die before I do.
> You know how I do it? I use my imagination to visualize, with as much detail as possible — me getting them done. Then, I calculate all the steps from this point until that, and start on step one. And I never stop until I get there (or die). I do not care what anyone else thinks about the goals. I do not think about what might happen to stop me.
> That's it."

This is essentially what I do too. I take a moment to cement the idea in my mind, lay out a rough schedule of events and timeframes, and what I'll have to do to make it happen, and somehow, that sticks in my subconscious and shapes other decisions I make along the way. Sure enough, it get's done. Using this mindset, I've earned three academic degrees and established a satisfying career overseas, among many other minor accomplishments.

2020 Tesla Roadster

Achieving Big Goals

Larger goals take more time to accomplish, of course, and this requires a regular habit of attaining small goals and intermediate goals. It cannot be done randomly or whimsically either. A man needs to have a larger purpose — something he wants to achieve. This requires a vision.

Henry Ford's goal was to create "a motor car for the great multitude", with the expressed purpose of making the automobile accessible and affordable to everyone, not only the elite. He envisioned an America in which everyone had a car.

Elon Musk said, in so many words, that the thing that drives him is vision.

> "I think it's important to have a future that is inspiring and appealing. There has to be reasons you get up in the morning and want to live. Why do you want to live? What's the point? What inspires you? What do you love about the future?"
> Medium/Mission: Elon Musk Life Purpose EXPLAINED (2017-10-10)

He has a vision for SpaceX, and also a vision for Tesla as well. I trust he has a vision for Twitter too, something along the lines of limiting politically biased censorship.

Elon Musk's vision for the SpaceX Starship.

Conclusions

The title of this post is The Power of the Mind is Amazing! But I believe this is a misnomber. It is not actually the mind itself that is behind certain phenomena (e.g. like resolving to wake up at a certain time, and then waking up 2 minutes before the alarm goes off), because (to my knowledge) this cannot be fully explained by psychology or biology.

It may be more accurate to say that The Power of Faith is Amazing!

> "Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."
> Hebrews 11:1 (NKJV)

Concerning the achievement of larger goals, in addition to faith, there is also imagination and vision, and some amount of hope, willpower, and a belief in one's self involved.

> "…assuredly, I say to you, if you have faith as a mustard seed, you will say to this mountain, 'Move from here to there,' and it will move; and nothing will be impossible for you."
> Jesus in Matthew 17:20 (NKJV)

We need to expand our understanding of what faith is, and what it can do.

The Jack's last post, Forming the Vision of Achieving a Goal (2022-4-6), revealed the power of vision, imagination, and faith. In this post, I'll review one man's accomplishment, and further down, we'll see how his belief quickly spread to others who then accomplished the same feat.

One of the things that holds men back from achieving great accomplishments (or even simple tasks, really) is self-doubt or a lack of belief. Roger Bannister's story came to my mind as one of the more apt examples of how negative self-talk, as my sales trainers of old would call it, limits what is possible for people. The following exerpt is from a Harvard Business Review article which I've pasted below because they limit the number of views before you have to pay for the subscription. Here is the link.

Harvard Business Review (Bill Taylor): What Breaking the 4-Minute Mile Taught Us About the Limits of Conventional Thinking (2018-03-09)

Most people know the basic story of Roger Bannister, who, on May 6, 1954, busted through the four-minute barrier with a time of three minutes, fifty-nine and four-tenths of a second. But it was not until I decided to write about him for my book Practically Radical, and read a remarkable account of his exploits by the British journalist and runner John Bryant, that I understood the story behind the story — and the lessons it holds for leaders who want to bust through barriers in their fields. Bryant reminds us that runners had been chasing the goal seriously since at least 1886, and that the challenge involved the most brilliant coaches and gifted athletes in North America, Europe, and Australia. "For years, milers had been striving against the clock, but the elusive four minutes had always beaten them," he notes. "It had become as much a psychological barrier as a physical one. And like an unconquerable mountain, the closer it was approached, the more daunting it seemed."

On May 6, 1954, Britain's Roger Bannister hits the tape to become the first person to break the 4-minute mile in Oxford, England.

This was truly the Holy Grail of athletic achievement. It's fascinating to read about the pressure, the crowds, the media swirl as runners tried in vain to break the mark. Bryant also reminds us that Bannister was an outlier and iconoclast — a full-time student who had little use for coaches and devised his own system for preparing to race. The British press "constantly ran stories criticizing his 'lone wolf' approach," Bryant notes, and urged him to adopt a more conventional regimen of training and coaching.

So the four-minute barrier stood for decades — and when it fell, the circumstances defied the confident predictions of the best minds in the sport. The experts believed they knew the precise conditions under which the mark would fall. It would have to be in perfect weather — 68 degrees and no wind. On a particular kind of track — hard, dry clay — and in front of a huge, boisterous crowd urging the runner on to his best-ever performance. But Bannister did it on a cold day, on a wet track, at a small meet in Oxford, England, before a crowd of just a few thousand people.

When Bannister broke the mark, even his most ardent rivals breathed a sigh of relief. At last, somebody did it! And once they saw it could be done, they did it too. Just 46 days Bannister's feat, John Landy, an Australian runner, not only broke the barrier again, but with a shorter time of 3 minutes 58 seconds. Then, just a year later, three runners broke the four-minute barrier in a single race. Over the last half century, more than a thousand runners have conquered a barrier that had once been considered hopelessly out of reach.

Well, what goes for runners goes for leaders running organizations. In business, progress does not move in straight lines. Whether it's an executive, an entrepreneur, or a technologist, some innovator changes the game, and that which was thought to be unreachable becomes a benchmark, something for others to shoot for. That's Roger Bannister's true legacy and lesson for all of us who see the role of leadership as doing things that haven't been done before.

In fact, two Wharton School professors have analyzed the lessons for business of the four-minute mile. In their book, The Power of Impossible Thinking, Yoram Wind and Colin Crook devote an entire chapter to an assessment of Bannister's feat, and emphasize the mindset behind it rather than the physical achievement. How is it, they wonder, that so many runners smashed the four-minute barrier after Bannister became the first to do it? "Was there a sudden growth spurt in human evolution? Was there a genetic engineering experiment that created a new race of super runners? No. What changed was the mental model. The runners of the past had been held back by a mindset that said they could not surpass the four-minute mile. When that limit was broken, the others saw that they could do something they had previously thought impossible."

Because I ran competitively, I've known this story for decades. What I still find amazing is how many men started breaking the 4-minute mile mark once they KNEW it was possible. This is the power of mental attitude in limiting possibility. This obviously does not mean that you can overcome anything, but it does cause one to ponder just how much we let that little voice in our heads limit us.

Note: Sir Roger Bannister died peacefully in Oxford on 3 March 2018, at age 88. RIP!

Are you able to pay the cost of forgiving others?

Jack · 9 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Unforgiveness poses a critical barrier, emotionally, psychologically, and spiritually.

Readership: Men
Theme: Overcoming Obstacles
Length: 900 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

I find it very interesting that Red Pill Apostle's post about Breaking Through Mental Barriers (2022-4-8) has brought up the issue of forgiveness. This is not to be unexpected, because unforgiveness is one of the most significant mental barriers of any, alongside blinding desires, distrust, doubt / lack of faith / unbelief, fears, inner vows, and sociopathy.

Gems from the discussion included Scott's mystical description of forgiveness, and Oscar's Biblical view of how it works.

Deep Strength wrote,

> "…it's up to you to work on forgiveness. It has nothing to do with the other person, but letting go of the wrongs you have suffered and a victim mindset. You don't have to reconcile with the person to forgive them."

That last sentence (in bold) is the caveat of forgiveness that is always (intentionally?) omitted from sermons… because "fellowship" and "unity".

The second sentence (in italics) is much more complex than what DS intimates. The remainder of this post will examine this fundamental element of forgiveness in further detail.

Maniac wrote,

> "One of the biggest mental and spiritual barriers in my life has been unforgiveness. I feel as though God is trying to deliver me from it, and that a blessing awaits on the other side of the chasm."

I've also struggled with the same thing, and it was extremely difficult for me to get through it. I imagine that many other readers are or have been faced with the same challenge.

I'll explain a little more about why I found forgiveness so difficult, to the point where I was unable to forgive. This statement from Scott helped me find the words.

> "It is also important to really understand what forgiveness is. It is acting as if the thing never happened. It is a promise by the forgiver to never bring it up again, never use it again (except maybe for teaching and edification). It is accounted for and erased from memory and you are no longer guilty of it. That is a tall order."

Yes it is! To forgive someone, you have to recognize that things have changed because of this sin, and now you have to take responsibility for everything that comes along with those changes, because the other person probably will not, and perhaps never will. But if this sin happened to you when you were a child, or if it damaged and weakened you so much that you no longer have the option nor the ability to handle the implications, then how can you take responsibility? If you're too young to know how the sin affected you and how to deal with it, then you're really stuck. I believe this is why Jesus strongly condemned sins against children (Matthew 18:6; Luke 17:1-4).

To offer an example, let's suppose two guys get into a fight and one of them kills the other. Even though the one who survived might go to jail, and even though he might even truly repent of his sin, the dead man's son must grow up without a father. How can the son take responsibility for this loss? He has to live with it every day of his life. How can he erase this from his memory? It even changes his identity from "son" to "fatherless". It changes his whole life trajectory. Even if he "forgives" his father's murderer (i.e. letting go of anger, bitterness, negativity, thoughts of revenge, etc.), maybe he can avoid some of the negative ramifications of holding a grudge, but he still cannot grow up under the spiritual covering and mentorship of his father — a man who (presumably) loves and cares for him. How can he act as if it never happened? Even if he tried, it would resemble a denial of reality, rather than forgiveness.

Other sins, such as adultery, fornication, divorce, and others provide similarly destructive examples.

I think Jesus' admonition in Luke 17:3-4 has a limit, because at some point, the offender stops being a "brother" who is "going through some personal issues", and he becomes a mortal enemy. At that point, you have to love them as an enemy (Matthew 5:43-48), and not as a Christian Brother, family member, friend, or neighbor, or else get them out of your life (Matthew 18:17). In other words, you cannot work within the context of mutual trust and good faith. You cannot realistically expect his repentance and you must instead expect sacrifice and suffering for the sake of Christ if you continue to interact with that person. At that point, you have to count the cost of both (1) the sin committed against you, and (2) what it would require to forgive, and then determine how that figures into your larger mission in life.

Moreover, if we take forgiveness very seriously, and view it from a subjective, mystical perspective, I can see how some sins are literally "unforgiveable", even if the offender repents. I can also see why so many people "wallow" in bitterness and unforgiveness for so long. Some sins change your life and change who you are. You have to reformulate a new identity and develop a whole new outlook on life. And until you are able to establish a new life, you're stuck in a victim mindset by default, no matter how much philosophizing about emotional management you might care to do.

I think if people took forgiveness more honestly and seriously, and would reject dispensing glib mantras like "forgive and forget", "get over it", and "let it go", especially in the more serious cases, then it would help everyone understand what forgiveness truly is and what it involves. It would also extend grace to those who are struggling through this kind of situation.

Update

Catacomb Resident has written a post in response to the discussion.

> "When others offend you, your first instinct should be to check it against your convictions. Turn it over to God, the ultimate authority of what is good or evil. His feelings are the only ones that matter. You are supposed to discern whether it's just your flesh whining again, or whether someone has offended your Father. If the former, you'll get over it; discipline your flesh. If the latter, you may be compelled to act. Your convictions will tell you what is required. It may take some time, but you'll know if you want to know."

The MODWAI Approach

Under the special weekend edition post, Are you able to pay the cost of forgiving others? (2022-4-9), one commenter, Jorgen, described a "Move on and don't worry about it" kind of forgiveness (MODWAI).

He wrote,

> "I think forgiveness is soy; whereas, "Move on and don't worry about it"-ness is manly. In some people's definition they may be the same thing. But the way most people use forgiveness is so gross that I've grown to despise the word. My new word may be much longer but it makes up for it by having the definition embedded therein."

I'll suggest another way to describe "Move on and don't worry about it"-ness might be maintaining an attitude of forbearance, grace, or mercy.

This statement from Scott was quoted in the OP.

> "It is also important to really understand what forgiveness is. It is acting as if the thing never happened. It is a promise by the forgiver to never bring it up again, never use it again…"

Jorgen singled out Scott's statement and reacted with,

> "That is disgusting. That's why I replace it with "Move on and don't worry about it"-ness. Because with it, I don't forget, I just move on and don't worry about it. And if they do it again, yes I can bring up the previous time because it wasn't forgotten but only moved on from. And no promise was ever made; only a moving on took place. But this moving on has the ability to move on back and punish them if they do it again."

At first reading, Christians might have the impression that this is hardly a Christian form of forgiveness, and that it's more of a "Law of the Jungle" type of approach with an emphasis on analyzing the cost-to-benefit ratio of defending a boundary.

However, when we compare this attitude to that of the King/Master in The Parable of the Unforgiving Servant (Matthew 18:21-35), we find some similarities.

- The MODWAI style of forgiveness is an expression of effortless grace and mercy, just like the King in the parable.
- MODWAI comes from a position of unquestionable power and authority just like the King in the parable. It is assumed that the servant/transgressor is at the total mercy of the King/forgiver.
- Because of his own immense wealth and power, it was relatively easy for the King to forgive the servant's debt.
- The King expressed a MODWAI type of forgiveness to the servant, but only after the servant had begged him to do so.
- The King didn't offer any promises nor take any vows.
- After forgiving the servant and moving on, the King "moved on back" and punished the servant (as Jorgen described) after he heard that the servant would not forgive his fellow servant's debt of a much smaller amount.

So let's now examine the MODWAI approach in greater earnestness.

Being Goal/Purpose Oriented Necessitates a MODWAI Attitude

For minor faux pas in daily social interactions, the MODWAI attitude is indispensable. It might be petty to splurt "I'm so sorry!" and beg for forgiveness every time one bumped into another in a crowd of people passing through a narrow hallway, for example.

This is even more true when men are busy working together on a physically intense project. "Sorry bud, I accidentally dropped your hammer in the oilpan. Will you forgive my clumsiness?" In such a situation, humility and sincerity is missing from an apology and instead, it is taken as a crass provocation.

Competitive sports offer another arena in which MODWAI is assumed. It is even expected that offenses will be given in the pursuit of winning, and this is accepted as a natural part of participating in the game.

Moreover, if there is a present goal or clear purpose at hand (e.g. moving through a crowd towards a destination, finishing a job, winning a game, etc.), then MODWAI is assumed as a necessary social convention that facilitates reaching a goal.

MODWAI is Highly Dependent on Context

In light of the above, we find that the MODWAI attitude, expressed as a type of forgiveness, is highly dependent on the context of a situation.

MODWAI requires everyone to have faith in the contextual system (or alternately, in God). When Churchill told the British people, "Keep calm, and carry on." (rephrasing MODWAI), he was asking them to have faith, believing that everything would be OK (for the most part).

MODWAI assumes that the goals are achievable. As long as progress continues, MODWAI is acceptable, as described in the previous section. But when an event, including an offense, prevents one from making progress towards a goal, then in such a case, everything stops until the situation is resolved. This may require one person to change their mind or their ways in order to accommodate the attainment of the goals of others or of the larger group.

Similarly, if MODWAI is offered as an act of forgiveness, it is assumed that the offender will "repent", correct his behavior, and improve in the near future. In this case, MODWAI is effectively the same as forbearance. The goal in this case is for the offender to get with the program. If he does not, then alternate actions may be necessary to deal with the situation.

MODWAI is Highly Dependent on Authority/Hierarchy/Status

Here we find that the MODWAI attitude, expressed as a type of forgiveness, is highly dependent on the status of the individuals involved.

MODWAI forgiveness works best when offered by a person of higher authority, largely because the person in authority has the power to remediate the damages. In this case, MODWAI is an act of mercy. A merciful forgiveness, displayed with power and authority, might induce the repentance of the offender, as I described in a comment about Jean Valjean in the film Les Miserables, or it might not, as in the Parable of the Unforgiving Servant.

When the forgiver is NOT in a position of unquestionable power and authority over the transgressor, then MODWAI is an act of grace, although it is grace offered from a position of weakness. The resolution of the offense may be cast in doubt, as the person lacks the power to correct the situation. Furthermore, the transgressor may not recognize, or may not want to acknowledge, his own offense. Therefore, his repentance may not be forthcoming. At worst, the forgiver will appear weak to the transgressor and thereby invite more abuse.

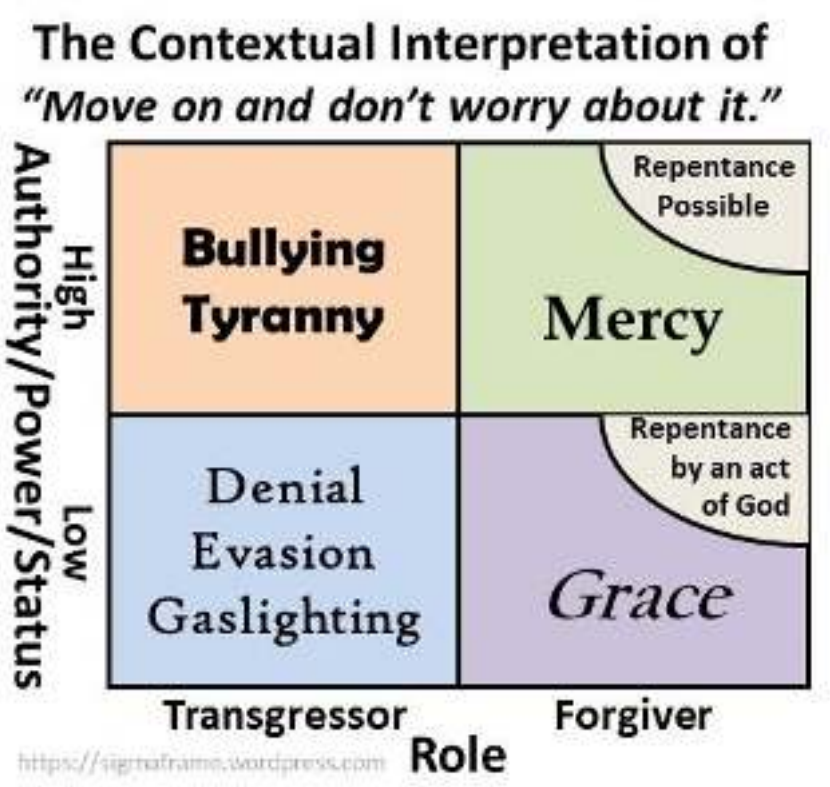
When MODWAI is expressed by a transgressor who is a person of greater authority/power/status, and the offended party does not have the power to remediate damages, then this becomes reminiscent of bullying or tyranny, especially for more significant offenses that cannot be remediated.

When a transgressor of lesser status assumes a MODWAI stance, he is seeking indemnity, attempting to escape embarrassment and/or punishment, or possibly Gaslighting the offended party into not recognizing the offense as anything significant, and thereby averting remedial compensation. (As a side note, readers might compare this to the denial of the Slippery Slope in the current cultural war.)

Also, when MODWAI is expressed by a transgressor, MODWAI becomes “cheap grace”, as LastMod described,

"It really isn't forgiveness. It's excusing your bad behavior and pinning it on the "conditions" that brought you there. How many times have I heard "I forgave myself", meaning, "Yeah, what I did was wrong, but so what…. That's the past. Moving on…" type of thing. It's cheap. It's easy. It has no real resolve for remediating your actions towards another person. No closure. Just a "Well, I hurt people, so what? I did that because of this… If they had not done this… I would not have acted in this way. So I am justified. If they are not happy with my stance, then that is on them!"

Arrogance."



Case Study – Road Rage (True Story)

Once there was a holiday celebration in Taiwan. The street was filled with people such that there was only enough space to allow for one lane of traffic.

Quite by coincidence, two cars entered the same street from opposite ends. When they met halfway down the street, they were locked head to head, trying to go opposite directions. Road rage, profane yelling, and the long blaring of horns ensued. Neither driver would relent and back up the way he came to allow the other car to pass. In fact, doing so would be dangerous because of the crowd. IOW, neither driver would recognize nor admit the right of way to the other. There was no clear structure of authority. And so there they sat for over an hour.

The situation was not resolved until a person of mutually recognized authority, a policeman, arrived on the scene and cleared enough space through the crowd for one of the drivers to pass.

Here, we can see that a decision making figure of power and/or authority is necessary to allow goals to be achievable, thereby permitting MODWAI to be properly expressed.

Conclusions

Outside of trivialities such as common social graces, the choice to employ a MODWAI attitude is dependent on the context and status of the individuals involved.

In many cases, a status of identity is sufficient to establish a hierarchy, but in cases where status is not recognized (e.g. conflict among peers) nor respected (e.g. bullying), then an overarching or independent authority may be needed to resolve the conflict.

All this may explain why men seek to establish structures of authority/hierarchy. Furthermore, women are attracted to men of higher status/authority, as we already know, but here we can confirm that (at least part of) the reason is because these men are able to resolve conflict, and can do so in their favor.

The conditions that make the MODWAI approach appropriate and/or feasible are…

1. Mutual faith in the system.
2. Clear purposes.
3. Obtainable goals.
4. A structure of authority which can (1) assure the attainability of goals and (2) moderate conflicts.
5. When it is offered as forgiveness by someone who is in a position of power/authority over the transgressor.

The charismatic effectiveness of the MODWAI attitude is determined by the degree to which these conditions are present.

Readers will note that the first 3 points are necessary for a group or community to achieve a high social capital, and 4 is necessary to maintain it.

There are several conditions that make MODWAI immoral, inappropriate, or ineffective.

1. No shared endeavors/enterprises.
2. Purposes are absent, unclear, or egregiously self-centered.
3. Goals are rendered unobtainable.
4. When authority is not recognized.
5. When it is offered as a gesture of forgiveness by someone who is NOT in a position of unquestionable power and authority over the transgressor.
6. When it is offered by a transgressor.
7. When attempting to evade authority/hierarchy.

8. Prevarications about one's identity and/or purpose (which goes back to point 7).

If a man resorts to a MODWAI attitude and it comes off as inappropriate or ineffective, it is probably due to one or more of the above reasons.

Questions for Discussion

1. Do you believe the MODWAI approach is a truly authentic and masculine form of forgiveness, or is it an evasion of assigning/accepting responsibility?
2. Do you believe the MODWAI style of forgiveness might be the same as putting one's self in the place of God?
3. If a man is seriously offended, and he is NOT in a position of unquestionable power and authority over the transgressor, what is the value of adopting a MODWAI attitude about the offense? Is it weakness, or is it emotional resiliency? (We might use the hypothetical case study of a man whose wife is having an affair with his boss.)

Need an excuse? Here's a list!

Readership: Men;
Theme: Overcoming Obstacles

Introduction

I'd like to thank LastMod for proposing an amazing assortment of excuses under the last few posts and Oscar for comparing them to reality. This post expands an earlier comment from Oscar, with added material based on some comments from LastMod that didn't make it past moderation.

In this post, I've grouped these excuses into six categories:

1. External Limitations
2. Internal Limitations
3. Genetic Defects
4. Psychological Barriers / Ignorance
5. Poor Social Skills
6. Pseudo-Moralization

There's also a full course load of dishonest Debate Tactics contained herein, but I won't go into those for the sake of brevity.

External Limitations

Excuse: "Personal trainers are expensive."
Reality: You don't have to hire one. There are more resources available today than ever. You can read Starting Strength: Basic Barbell Training, 3rd Edition, watch training videos on the Starting Strength YouTube channel, film yourself, and get form checks on the Starting Strength forum.

Excuse: "I don't have time to spend my life in the gym."
Reality: The Starting Strength method requires 4.5 hours a week. Other programs require a similar commitment. See these Tips and Tricks to Time Management (2020-12-7).

Internal Limitations

Excuse: "When I asked how to build muscle, I was told, "Go to the gym."
Reality: This is not a philosophical exercise. You have to make a physical effort, which begins with physically removing your anatomical gluteus maximus from the chair/sofa/bed.

Excuse: "DS wouldn't give men advice unless he knew your workout, reps, and how many X and how much Y….."
Reality: If you want to get advice from others, then you'll have to discuss the details of your workout routine and history, much like anyone would do when consulting a more knowledgeable person.

Excuse: "The men who are growing HAVE OPTIONS TO grow. I don't! The ones like the angrier segments of this sphere (and Black Pillers, who are actually pretty self-actualized if truth be told) really don't."
Reality: Don't compare yourself with others. Do what you can with what you have. Also see Determination and Detachment (2022-4-2).

Excuse: "Improving fitness, social skills, etc. is ALLOWED for men who are deemed okay / attractive / cool by women. But for many… they will never be allowed to improve. Not by women, nor by their fellow men."
Reality: The opinions of the Gynocentric Mob are based on an image of female superiority. Women only have power in society to the degree that men value what they have to say and what they do. Therefore, Don't Admit Her Argument (2018-3-19).

Genetic Defects

Excuse: "Not all men have 'equal ability' and the potential for 'equal outcome'."
Reality: Yes, but it doesn't matter. Again, do what you can with what you have.

Excuse: "I'm an ectomorph."
Reality: Every man can get stronger than he is right now, and it's easier for an untrained man to get stronger than it is for a trained man to get stronger. The coach in the Starting Strength video is also an ectomorph. He's 60 lbs. heavier now than when he started. And he's 6'2″.

Excuse: "Not every guy who's ripped works out."
Reality: So? If you're not one of them, get in the squat rack and lift.

Excuse: "Some men are destined to be weaklings."
Reality: Once again, every man can get stronger than he is now.

If a 54-year-old lady can get her deadlift up to 315 lbs., then surely most men can do better than that.

Psychological Barriers / Ignorance

Excuse: "I was never told X, Y, Z…"
Reality: A man's fitness is his responsibility, and no one else's. The information is out there, and easier to find than ever. A man who actually wants to get stronger can, and will, do what other men have done. Find the information. A man who doesn't want to do the work won't bother to find the information, and will make excuses, because making excuses is easy.

Excuse: "A man who gains sixty pounds of muscle and is 6'2″ is an outlier and not the rule. Men like me are not going to become a ladies' man at 52 when I have never had a girlfriend. The guy that does so is an outlier. Extreme examples are not the norm. I learned this in a statistical analysis class."
Reality: Extreme examples are often used to illustrate a point. The average (or below average) man can take Deti's Advice to Underqualified Men (2021-12-8). Stay focused on your goals and purposes, and don't burden yourself by comparing yourself to the best or worst case scenarios. Instead, compare yourself to where you were a year ago.

Excuse: "All the talk is about what you all do! I said what I DON'T do, and that is always a problem."
Reality: A man who takes action and fails, is better than a man who doesn't take action and fails.

Poor Social Skills

Excuse: "Gyms are intimidating."
Reality: So? Do it anyway. As Jack so eloquently put it, "F 'em." Or, lift weights at home.

Excuse: "Gyms are only for gym bros."
Reality: Says who? See "Gyms are intimidating" above.

Excuse: "Lifting weights is for young guys."
Reality: Strength training is even more beneficial for older men than it is for younger men. As we get older, we naturally lose muscle mass and bone density. Strength training prevents that loss.

Of note, Ostarine was developed to help prevent osteoporosis, and can help guard against bone density loss and bone mass attrition due to aging. See Scott's experience with using SARMs (2022-3-18) and Jack's statements about his experience using Ostarine.

Strength training even helps prevent dementia!

Excuse: "If I pay DUES or MEMBERSHIP to belong to a gym, then I don't expect to be harassed, bothered, intimidated, or downright made uncomfortable to BE in a place I have paid to be in. I expect to have the staff help me. I expect to have basic decorum and the "rules" of said gym followed."
Reality: Lower your expectations of others, and increase them for yourself. Don't rely on others so much. Men Going Their Own Way might actually have to go their own way if that's what's necessary, and don't forget to pray for guidance. If you get any consideration or help from others, then count it a blessing.

Excuse: "Will hazing be a rite of passage? If I have to be "hazed" in order to belong to a gym, and this is condoned, then I know I made a really good decision to not associate with any of those guys."
Reality: It's your decision. But once you decide you're "in", you can't chicken out. It helps to remember that A Brother is Borne out of Adversity (2018-6-10).

Excuse: "What we have is straight up bullying and effing hatred today in joining a gym or an athletic team."
Reality: Fellowship is important. You need to discern whether a particular group of men has your best interests at heart. Remember that the people who treat you well are not necessarily people you can trust. Besides, no one said it would be easy.

Frame Tip: When you go to the gym, focus on the men. Men set the mood and tone of the venue. The women are background scenery.

Pseudo-Moralization

Excuse: "I don't want to be pretentious, nor look like I am overcompensating…"
Reality: Who cares? Get over yourself. Besides, chicks dig jerks, haven't you heard?

Excuse: "Tying your manhood to a gym is childish."
Reality: Making excuses is childish.

Excuse: "Gyms are evil! All the videos, the blogs, the v-blogs, the hints and tips, the tons of "encouraging" claptrap out there about all the annoying and "evil" people at the gym speaks for itself. Millions of these people can't have it all wrong."
Reality: You have to decide for yourself what to believe, but don't knock it until you've given it an objective, unbiased consideration and have found it does not serve your mission. And yes, millions of people could "have it all wrong" according to this passage:

> [13] "Enter by the narrow gate; for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leads to destruction, and there are many who go in by it. [14] Because narrow is the gate and difficult is the way which leads to life, and there are few who find it.
> Jesus in Matthew 7:13-14 (NKJV)

Excuse: "A lot of men feel that MEN let them down when they asked for help. Incels perhaps expected a betrayal from women… but their fellow men? That is the crux of the issue for many of them. This is why a lot of younger guys reserve their real hatred for PUA sites, "real man" Red Pill sites, etc."
Reality: Maybe it's time for you to figure out who you are and come to terms with yourself, and then decide what your purpose in life is going to be. Don't let other people make those decisions for you.

> [3] Do not trust in noblemen,
> In mortal man, in whom there is no salvation.
> [4] His spirit departs, he returns to the earth;

> On that very day his plans perish.
> [5] Blessed is he whose help is the God of Jacob, > Whose hope is in the Lord his God…"
> Psalm 146:3-5 (NASB)

Just some background scenery. Watch your form!

Conclusion

Achieving goals in spite of the challenges is partly what it means to be a Man.

When achieving goals in the world of Men, you're largely dependent on your own self.

Working together with other men is sometimes required, and/or helpful and/or motivating. In this case, there's a structure of authority that must be respected.

Making excuses deters other men from focusing on their goals, and it wastes their time too.

Don't be a drag. Join in, or butt out.

If a man is not interested in going to the gym (or any other pursuit in life for that matter), all he needs to say is, "No, it's not for me, thanks!", and then he can save himself from all the dishonesty, trouble, embarrassment, and shame that comes from making excuses.

> But let your 'Yes' be 'Yes,' and your 'No,' 'No.' For whatever is more than these is from the evil one.
> Jesus in Matthew 5:37 (NKJV)

A blinding obsession

Jack · 15 April 2022 · Archived copy · Original

…that erodes mens' senses of discernment.

Readership: Men
Theme: Overcoming Obstacles
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 5.5 minutes

The Effects of Sin on Faith

Over the past century, men have slowly drifted away from the more traditional forms and expressions of masculinity and have indulged themselves in an obsession with sex. (BTW, I think the same could be said for women too, along the lines of prioritizing hypergamy, YOLO, branch swinging, Marriage 2.0, etc.)

This obsession takes one of two general forms, each having many variants of expression.

1. The S1ut Predator — Tends to be higher SMV men who can actually get laid without doing very much.
2. The P0rn Glutton — Tends to be lower SMV men, or higher SMV men who would otherwise be getting laid if not for their religious convictions against extramarital sex.

Much has already been written about the heinous cultural environment and the immutable biological indices which reinforce these conditions. But the end result is that either way, and no matter where a man falls in the SMV hierarchy, there is this ubiquitous obsession with sex.

Few men can escape this obsession, especially younger men.

Image from From Dusk Till Dawn (1996).

This, I believe, lies at the root of modern western men's most grievous fault.

I say this for two attendant reasons.

1. These sex colored glasses induce a gynocentric Blue Pill shift in everything that comes before a man's thoughts and senses.

2. It is very rare, if not impossible, for a person to have an obsession with love, romance, and sex, and also have a well-developed sense of discernment. (King Solomon was one of those rare exceptions, by the grace of God.)

Therefore, Men's obsession with idealistic love, sex, and romance has a blinding effect.

This has a major impact on intersexual relationships and marriage, especially through the various decisions made throughout the dating/mating/courtship phase. Without discernment and faith to guide people to the right sort of person, in the right way, at the right time, people will naturally follow what they've learned through the examples they've been most impressed by, be it their parents, peers, pop stars, or p0rn stars.

The Obsession is Limbic

Recently, Adam Piggott had an advertent post that addressed this condition, Too thirsty for the chicks (2022-3-30). He quoted this comment from deti.

> "The love of a woman is one of the sweetest, most sublime experiences a man can know. It is integral, if not essential, to the human condition. Men and women are intended to be together. We are not intended to be isolated or alone. We are intended to be fruitful and multiply; and that requires social and sexual intercourse."

Following this, Adam made deti out to be a p_ssy pedestalizer! At first reading, I laughed because of the sheer incongruency. I mean, for the past decade or so, deti has been one of the loudest voices in the Manosphere warning men of the dangers of pedestalization. But after I sat on it for a while, I realized that even the most aware men among us are prone to falling into this trap.

In fact, it's ingrained in our limbic hardware.

At a more basic level, this "sublime experience" that deti speaks of is a subjective description of how sex bonds men to their wives — the dopamine, norepinephrine, oxytocin, and all the psychological idealization that goes with that. It leads to contentment, sanctification, and stability in marriage. This is a good thing, because without it, many wives and marriages would be insufferable.

Speaking for myself, I have noticed that if the sex with my wife is frequent and satisfying, then I can handle any kind of bad attitude or $h!t test from her. But if the sex is shameful, starfishy, or non-existent for weeks on end, then I can't even tolerate seeing her around. Red Pill Apostle has stated similar sentiments, and I think it's true for most men.

The problem with this bonding, as we all know, is when men get too comfortable around a woman (or women in general). They let down their guard, the sexual tension drops, the emotional boundaries get blurry, they lose frame, and then the natural bonding easily disintegrates into pedestalization.

Unmarried men are especially susceptible to pedestalization because (1) younger men's stronger libido transforms the obsession with sex into a constant drumbeat that is practically irresistible, (2) limbic bonding occurs with illicit sex or p0rn (instead of a wife), and (3) they don't have to live with the constant daily reminders of how much of a headache a woman can be, which tends to put everything into perspective. Taken together, this ultimately results in fantastical idealization (i.e. idolatry) and confusion about the value and purpose of the woman and her proper place and role in his life. Or as deti put it, "P_ssy makes men stupid!"

Real No Fap Celibacy

As I mentioned above, one major spiritual effect of sin and continually making poor decisions is a loss of discernment and faith. Celibacy and marriage are the Biblically prescribed ways to avoid the Blinding Obsession.

Adam wrote another post that describes the importance of exercising agency to embrace celibacy.

> "Celibacy absolutely must be viewed as a positive Christian choice because by doing as such we are embracing God's path for us in a positive manner. This is critically important because it means that as a man you have individual power and autonomy over your actions and choices."
> Adam Piggott: Voluntarily Celibate (2022-3-26)

Adam emphasized that celibacy must necessarily be of the no fapping sort. When I was younger, I didn't believe jerking off was a sin. No one told me it was, and the Bible doesn't really mention it specifically.* But looking back now, I can see that the last paragraph of the previous section applied to me. So judging by the overall effects of masturbation, now I have the opinion that it is a sin, or at the very least, a very bad habit that messes up the limbic programming and by extension, one's psychology regarding intersexual relations.

You see, solo sex forms a self-reinforcing cycle, or a "stronghold" as some Christian authors have called it.

Psychoanalysts call it an emotional dependence on auto-eroticism. Psychologists simply call it an addiction.

Adam also emphasized the importance of exercising autonomy and not getting drawn into the stronghold of lust, p0rn, and squirting. The implicit challenge of staying free or breaking out of this stronghold is this — embracing fap free celibacy is not a real option unless a man first takes off the sex colored blueshift lenses. Abandoning the sex lens is the crucial first step, because without doing so, a man can't even get the vision of no-fap celibacy as being an actionable option. Adam mentioned that it took him a few months to get free from this stronghold, and I'd say that's pretty fast. It took me a couple years to get free from wanking, and several more to escape the habit of lust. (Some strategies for dealing with this are listed in the Conclusions below.)

Adam ends this post with a critically pertinent injunctive that bears repeating.

> "So take courage from these words and embrace the path that God has chosen for you, with grace and dignity and good humor. Do not overburden yourself with red pill rules while you jump through self-inflicted hoops to attract a mate or keep the one that you're in danger of losing. Rather, get your own house in order. Focus on His rules and laws and how you can live them as a worthy servant of our Lord. If that means being celibate, really celibate, then so be it. If we are going to be worthy of Him then we need to be made of stern stuff."
> Adam Piggott: Voluntarily Celibate (2022-3-26)

 I thought the oft cited story of Onan in Genesis 38:9 didn't apply, because he was not masturbating, he was having sex with his brother's wife (which seemed odd in itself). Looking back, I see mine was a legalistic approach based on Purity Culture's views on Pseudo-Sex and Technical-Virginity (2020-5-11).*

Conclusions

Going off of the 3 conditions listed in the last paragraph of The Obsession is Limbic, here are things that can help a man stay free from the blinding obsession.

- Reduce libido (I'm not sure if this is possible?)
- Abstain from illicit sex and avoid p0rn and masturbation.
- Spend time with real women and read Red Pill literature to get a realistic mental concept of women. (Some men might want to avoid super hot women if this stokes their libido and incites lust.)
- Also, stay focused on your own mission in life and pursue Flow, which tends to displace thoughts about women in general.

On that last point, and in closing, I'll quote the final passage in the aforementioned post from Adam.

> “Young men and boys today would do well to develop and cultivate their bonds of friendship through shared endeavors. As men we are made up of our experiences, our learned skills and our friendships; the pecking order where we stand with other men. Focus on and enjoy those, without the stress of worrying about whether the girls will like you or not. And funnily enough, the girls always go for the guys who don’t need them.”

A Clarification on Fornication

Introduction

Concerning the addictive habit of squipping, Caterpillar345 wrote,

> "In my teens/early 20's, I was so "afraid" of sinning by fornicating that it seemed the only outlet for my sexual desire was these two vices [i.e. p0rn and spanking the monkey]. It seemed like the lesser of two evils, so to speak. In reality, it just meant I stayed away from opportunities to interact with women, didn't develop myself socially, and developed a sense of pride in the fact that I wasn't fornicating and had better things to do (i.e. school, career) which probably just made me come across as an @sshole."

> "It seems to me, in a strange way, that it might actually be "better" (though not encouraged) to sin by fornicating with a real woman than to dissipate myself online and by myself. (I think Jack and Deti have alluded to this in the past.)"

I need to clarify what has been written in the past about fornication.

It is not always called out as a reminder that while certain paths are better than others, neither one is a good one to take. I would be concerned if a younger man stumbled across a passage that discusses the pros and cons of masturbation, fornication, etc. without realizing the context is a discussion of which is the better of two bad options.

On this blog, there have been three contexts in which fornication has been presented or described in what could be interpreted by readers as a "necessary evil" or a "lesser of two evils".

Running the Gauntlet

One context is that of “running the gauntlet”, in which there is an unspoken assumption that sexual relations should commence within the first few “dates”, and when it doesn’t, then the relationship is terminated. This is usually initiated by the female, but many PUAs, chads, and cads have the same attitude. One of the implications of this is that people must first successfully navigate the SMP before they can become “eligible” for the MMP. It is also noted that being sexually active magnifies preselection and attracts women. This phenomenon occurs within the secular mating market, which is a gynocentric context in which women have preeminent control. However, it is also prevalent among Christians and in the church. This paradigm still continues, but it appears to be slowly losing steam and is being replaced by either hookup culture or abstinence, with neither leading to marriage, generally speaking.

The following posts discussed this phenomenon in detail. Many other posts have made references to “running the gauntlet”.

- Σ Frame (Jack): Why is illicit sex so enticing, and so prevalent? (2019-5-25)

- Σ Frame (NovaSeeker): Ethical Issues Surrounding the Christian Conundrum (2021-4-5)
- Σ Frame (Thedeti): The Unsolvable Problem of The Modern Sexual/Relationship Market (2022-2-7)

Purity Culture

The second context is that of Purity Culture, where pseudo-sex and technical-virginity are touted as virtuous, merely because it avoids full P in V intercourse. In this setting, the "Sexual Prosperity Gospel", which is presumed to be attained by sexual continence, is more or less emphasized as the most crucial aspect of Christianity. Adherents learn to base their Christian identity, not on Christ, the grace of God, or the forgiveness of sin, but on this so called "purity" instead. The ascetic ontology of this legalistic paradigm is riddled with shame. Studies have found that a vast majority of pledgers recanted within 5 years. Many of these left the church and engaged in illicit sex, and those who later married say that it brought shame and remorse into their marriages. Fornication is a common theme among many ex-adherents' accounts, in which it is commonly said that they never identified with their own sexuality, nor realized their error, until they let go of their psychological emphasis on purity, usually through fornication. This was not a cultural phenomenon, but occurs entirely within churches. Interestingly, Purity Culture went hand in hand with the Feminist Life Script, making it all the more d@mning.

Like many Christian Gen Xers, Jack, NovaSeeker, and Thedeti experienced Purity Culture firsthand, so many of my/our writings are peppered with nuances of this. I wrote an entire series on the Purity Movement, but here are a few posts that address this particular aspect of fornication.

- Σ Frame: The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020-1-17)

- Σ Frame: On the Concept of Sin and the need for Marriage (2020-4-24)
- Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – Did Purity Culture Undermine Christian Identity? (2020-9-9)

The subjective viewpoint cited by Caterpillar above would fall into this category.

Experiencing God's Grace

The third context is a subjective account of experiencing humility and God's grace through fornication. I wrote about this in at least one post, but have alluded to this experience in many others.

- Σ Frame (Jack): How is illicit sex related to one's spiritual state? (2019-5-22)

Epilogue

As we have seen here and elsewhere, some readers will jump on the very mention of fornication and interpret this as a free-wheeling recommendation of the same. I suspect that one's tendency to identify the above writings as a full endorsement of fornication is either a fundamental error of attribution or psychological projection.

If readers care to review these posts, you'll find that I/we don't encourage Christians to engage in willful fornication, nor do I/we advocate fornication as a Christian practice. Instead, these writings are (1) observations of cultural phenomenon, or (2) case studies of redemption and God's grace, or (3) subjective thoughts or impressions. To offer a complete philosophical analysis, fornication has been presented as one possible experience within these contexts, but it is not presented as a goal that Christians should aim for, because that would be a serious error.

As a warning to readers, thinking of abstinence vs. fornication, etc. as an "option" arises from a Gnostic, self-deterministic point of view. In reality, most people do not consider the choices or consequences at all, they just run on autopilot. But if this blog helps men become more aware of their own autopilot, think things through more clearly, and understand their own situation such that they're able to make better informed choices and grow in their faith, then progress has been made.

Outside of all this talk and philosophizing, it is left to the reader to consider all the information (the Bible foremost), get in touch with their consciences, figure out their missions, and make their own decisions in life. It should not be surprising that some people will engage in fornication, but again, this approach is not emphasized nor encouraged for Christians.

> [3] For this is the will of God, your sanctification: that you should abstain from sexual immorality; [4] that each of you should know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honor, [5] not in passion of lust, like the Gentiles who do not know God; [6] that no one should take advantage of and defraud his brother in this matter, because the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also forewarned you and testified. [7] For God did not call us to uncleanness, but in holiness. [8] Therefore he who rejects this does not reject man, but God, who has also given us His Holy Spirit.

What Women find Attractive: Fit and Skilled

A reminder of what's important in the eyes of the ladies.

Readership: Men;
Theme: Overcoming Obstacles
Length: 450 words
Reading Time: 1.5 minutes

I received a private message from a female reader on 2022-4-13. She writes,

> "As an older woman who can't sing, I would just like to encourage younger brothers that if they just try their darnedest at ANYTHING, it will probably be attractive to at least one sister. I say this reflecting on the odd variety of men I've found attractive in the 48 years since I hit puberty. The only thing they all had in common were that they were fit (but for their build), and there was one other thing that they were really into and really good at.
> That is all. That's what's attractive. I hope someone finds that useful.
> Good bye."

Now usually, I don't take women's opinions very seriously, especially about what they find attractive in men. However, I am more willing to accept her advice because she is an older, more mature lady who obviously means well, and I think she probably doesn't have the ulterior motives that most younger women do. Also, she is reaffirming a couple truths that we already know, but we may not be very well aware of how they come across as important to women.

1. Strength, of which Fitness is a basic prerequisite.
2. Mission, of which Skill is an implicit and essential part.

If you think about it, these two traits combined pretty much sum up the core of masculinity.

Furthermore, this lady's message reminds us of what is really important for men to focus on in the competitive meet market, and it's not the women themselves. It's US! This gives new meaning to the Manospherian Maxim, "Men are the prize!"

It's a 1960 Buick Electra, in case you're wondering…
In addition to Fitness and Skill, Sharkly and Red Pill Apostle pointed out that one's passion carries a huge influence.

If you can show that your enterprise/project/work is a source of great excitement and enthusiasm for you and others, then women latch on to that in order to be a part of that excitement and enthusiasm.

People who are passionate about their project/work/hobby/goals/purpose are attractive to others and that passion draws people in. It works in business. It works with women. Many times it's the passion that tips the scale in your favor.

So we could add Joy/Enthusiasm to Fitness/Strength and Skill/Mission.

Staying fit and active, getting proper nutrition, fasting periodically, and developing our knowledge, skills, abilities, education, and careers along our individual life-callings are things that all men should be doing.

In sum, her message reaffirms that our efforts in these areas do not go unnoticed by the ladies.

Keep up the good work, Men!

Harnessing the Motivations of Others

Establishing Feedback Loops that capture her Ego Investment.

Introduction

Because so few enter into marriage with zero sexual experience, the longitudinal result is that couples experience a generally poor quality of sanctification in marriage, or perhaps none at all. Men lament the absence of heartfelt bonding and experience ennui. Wives complain about the dearth of "good men" and hold their husbands at arm's length, emotionally and physically. Readers may be consternated to see this behavior in their own girlfriends or wives, and then horrified upon realizing that we are experiencing the consequences of sexual sins from long ago. We might even see this malaise in our sons' and daughters' relationships and wonder what we might have done wrong in their upbringing. Christian men may simply regard it as a manifestation of the Curse of Eve (perhaps rightly so).

Single men are not exempt either. For example, LastMod shared a story about an incident he had with the Cubicle Office Princess™ (COP) in which there was a generalized disaffection.

This post and the next will explore a potential remedy to this malady. To stratify the readers' comprehension, I'll discuss answers to the following questions that were brought up in a previous post, Women have sex to influence men (2021-11-10), and offer some motivational insights.

1. Why do women withdraw or reject a man when they feel like they are NOT in control of their feelings (even when they are feeling the Tingles)?
2. Why do the woman's feelings (and interest in sex) depend on her ego investment and not so much what the man does?
3. In the interest of married men getting more sex from their wives, how can husbands get an ego investment out of their wives?

Certain aspects of this discussion are not limited to marital relations, but may extend to dealing with the COPs and raising and shaping daughters too.

1. Why do women withdraw when they feel like they are NOT in control?

Psychology offers a rather simple answer to this question. Human beings have a psychological need for relationships to be formed and developed within a volitional context — of their own choice and free will.

Having the ability to choose creates the psychological impression that one is in control (even if it is only an illusion), but this is only true as long as one's internal motivations (e.g. conviction, desires, wants, needs, etc.) are able to inform and direct one's will. It is a spiritual truth that when humans are forced to act against their wills, it has a deadening effect on their souls. This is partly why those who have worn themselves out on the carousel find married life to be so taxing. Their passions have been spent and heartfelt desire is absent, so they must rely entirely on willpower to engage with a spouse who fails to inspire their internal motivations.

Furthermore, managing one's internal motivations, such as the will and desire itself, is difficult because these are not usually things that can be very well controlled, even by one's own self. This is because human willpower is dependent on glucose levels in the brain, and is therefore limited in supply. One cannot very well use one's willpower to counteract one's own nature, and if it is done, it is short lived, frustrating, thorougly depleting, and often followed by remorse. Such is a life of living under the constraints of the Law.

However, there is one desire fundamental to human nature that can be broadly employed, and that is the desire to gain satisfaction from a volitional ego investment. As long as a person has a healthy ego, it will continue to function under the power and direction of it's own essence (the heart and soul). Inserting one's heart and soul into the NOW is the beginning of spiritual awakening and the first step towards a life characterized by living after the Spirit.

The good housewife puts her heart and soul into preparing healthy food for her family. (IOW, she has an ego investment in her labor.) When she sees her family eating this food with delight and thankfulness (feedback), she receives satisfaction for her efforts. Each day, this is repeated.

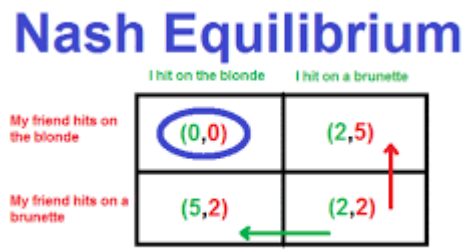
Case Study 1 — Falling in Love is an Ego Investment

In common parlance, ego investment is what we are referring to when we say that a girl gets "hooked on" a guy. He has something she desires, needs, or wants. She is drawn in and makes an ego investment in the relationship, but she has not yet gained the satisfaction on that investment. As a result, she feels humbled (colloquially described as "being in love"). Her mind then dwells on this unresolved situation, and she keeps coming back to talk with or hit on that guy — and she will do so until she can get a sense of ego fulfillment from her investment, or else, some other sort of feedback that would confirm that fulfillment will not be forthcoming.

This dynamic is often emphasized in PUA circles because it puts the man in control of the interaction. Not granting her a sense of ego satisfaction or control is what "nice guys" call "being a jerk". The state of hope that accompanies her being humbled and not being granted a sense of ego satisfaction or control is what PUAs call "maintaining sexual tension".

Since this is a Christian blog, here I want to point out a few more things:

1. If the dynamic culminates in illicit sex, then this usually destroys the dynamic of humility and hope because the emotional investment has been satisfied. Then other issues begin to appear on the radar according to Pareto Dominance [1] and Nash Ascendancy [2]. IOW, Rollo's Cardinal Rule of Sexual Strategies remains in play.
2. If illicit sex does not fluke the relationship, then there is either (a) something other than sex that undergirds the internal motivation, or else, (b) the other issues can be successfully navigated and negotiated resulting in a Pareto Optimal Nash Equilibrium [3,4,5].
3. The humility, interest, and tension resulting from this are not limited to sexual desire. It can also extend to any ego investment that is motivated by an internal motivation.



Foot Notes

1. A situation is called Pareto Dominated if there exists a possible Pareto improvement.
2. Nash Ascendancy occurs when agents choose an optimal individual strategy, independent of the opponent's interests, and then one agent's strategy becomes dominant.
3. A situation is called Pareto optimal or Pareto efficient if no change could lead to improved satisfaction for some agent without some other agent losing or if there is no scope for further Pareto improvement.
4. Nash Equilibrium is the optimal solution in which each agent lacks any incentive to change his/her initial strategy.
5. Due to the statistical rarity of many fundamental isues all coming together, it makes sense to say that a man who enters into marriage this way does so by the grace of God.

Case Study 2 — Always offer a Choice

As a parent of two children, I've discovered a very helpful technique in getting kids to do things and/or do things properly, and that is to always offer them a choice.

For example, if I told one of them, "Clean your room!", then there would ensue an afternoon of discomfiture and delay filled with excuses, complaining, and crying, and the room would never be properly cleaned. But if I said, "You can either clean your own rooms by yourself, or else you can help your sister clean the whole house." Rest assured, one of the two options would be done within a very short time, and done rather well. If I play music and throw in some cookies (add motivation), they might even enjoy it!

Offering a choice makes the difference between being domineering and being dominant.

2. Why do the woman's feelings (and interest in sex) depend on her ego investment?

Short Answer: Ego investment and getting feedback ARE what women call the feeelz. Whenever women talk about their feeelings, they're talking about the status of their ego investment and how the feedback they're getting affects that ego investment. Men can either see this as an annoyance, or else they can use this information to identify things that would motivate her.

To expand on this point, consider what Red Pill Apostle said in reporting an argument he had with his wife — an argument which arose when she felt like she was not being heard by him. (Click here to read the full report.)

> "This brought us to the parallels of her feelings with the thought experiment from Jesus in Matthew 21:28-32. In it, the son who initially doesn't comply with the father's instruction but who then later complies is good, and the son who says he'll comply but then doesn't is in the wrong. Mrs. Apostle's heels dug in and it was more important for her to feel like I considered her viewpoint than to actually consider it."

Mrs. Apostle was angry because instead of kindly giving her ego a way to tap into the decision-making process, he rebuffed her ego and criticized her overall noncompliance with his decision. (Note to wives: If you want your man to become this way, all you have to do is deny him sex for an extended period of time. Yes, that's right! Women can also either inspire or deplete the motivations of their husbands too!)

If we apply the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy to two theoretical types of wives standing in for the parable of the two sons cited by RPA, the difference between these two types of women is that the first is pursuing a heart-led engagement in life and is wrestling with how her ego can fit in and adapt, while the second is living in the vanity of her mind. She knows what is right, but she won't do it because there is no immediate ego reward. Action is necessary to enact the will and stake an investment of one's heart and soul.

As can be seen in RPA's last sentence, having an ego investment in the decision/relationship/etc. is, for women, more important than feelings of attention, love, security, etc. (I think this is true for men too, but it's not as important as pu$$y. After all, men's "love language" is sex, and a man feels loved and respected most acutely when she actively nurtures and supports his ego in the bedroom. This is a fundamental motivation for men that good wives would never neglect.)

Whenever a man hears his wife say something like, "I'm just not in the mood right now", chances are, she doesn't have a genuine interest or ego investment in the task at hand. This holds true in all practical situations, whether it be fully engaging in a conversation, being willing and eager to engage in sexual relations, or disciplining the children in a way that would be conducive to the children's growth, and not just venting her own anger. Good wives understand the social and spiritual importance of being emotionally involved and invested, and so whenever they're "not in the mood", they will do the emotion work necessary to engage from the heart anyway. Her effort in this area is a motivating inspiration to the entire family, and is one of the more important ways that a wife glorifies God in the home.

Smiling is a simple and easy way that women can glorify God. Even if she's not feeling genuinely happy herself, smiling can lift the mood of everyone around her, and this, in turn, lifts her own spirits.
So in conclusion, we see that a woman's volitional will to be obedient to God's order and submit to her husband must arise from an ego investment of heart and soul. IOW, she has to want to get involved for her own satisfaction, especially the satisfaction of providing satisfaction to her husband, family, and community, which is how women please the Lord. Otherwise, she'll feeel like she's being controlled/manipulated/etc., no matter whether she actually is or not.

Likewise, Men must utilize their own volitional will to be obedient to God's order and submit to the Lord's directives for his life. He must invest his heart and soul into his mission, his work, and his family. The difference between extolling charisma and being a dancing monkey is whether a man puts his heart and soul into the displayed investment. IOW, he has to want to get involved, not so much for the often times elusive satisfaction of others, but more for his own satisfaction, especially the satisfaction of providing satisfaction to the Lord. Otherwise, he'll feel like he's an automaton who's sitting on the sidelines of life, and just going through the motions.

3. How can men get an ego investment from their wives?

It's important for the man to get an ego investment from his girl because this is a major piece of what keeps her locked into the relationship with him. This is where "compatibility" (i.e. shared values and purposes) becomes a major issue as having a good fit to begin with is the quick and easy way to arrive at a Pareto Optimal Nash Equilibrium (TITS, the “win-win” outcome for the game minded, and “contentment and sanctification” for the spiritually minded).

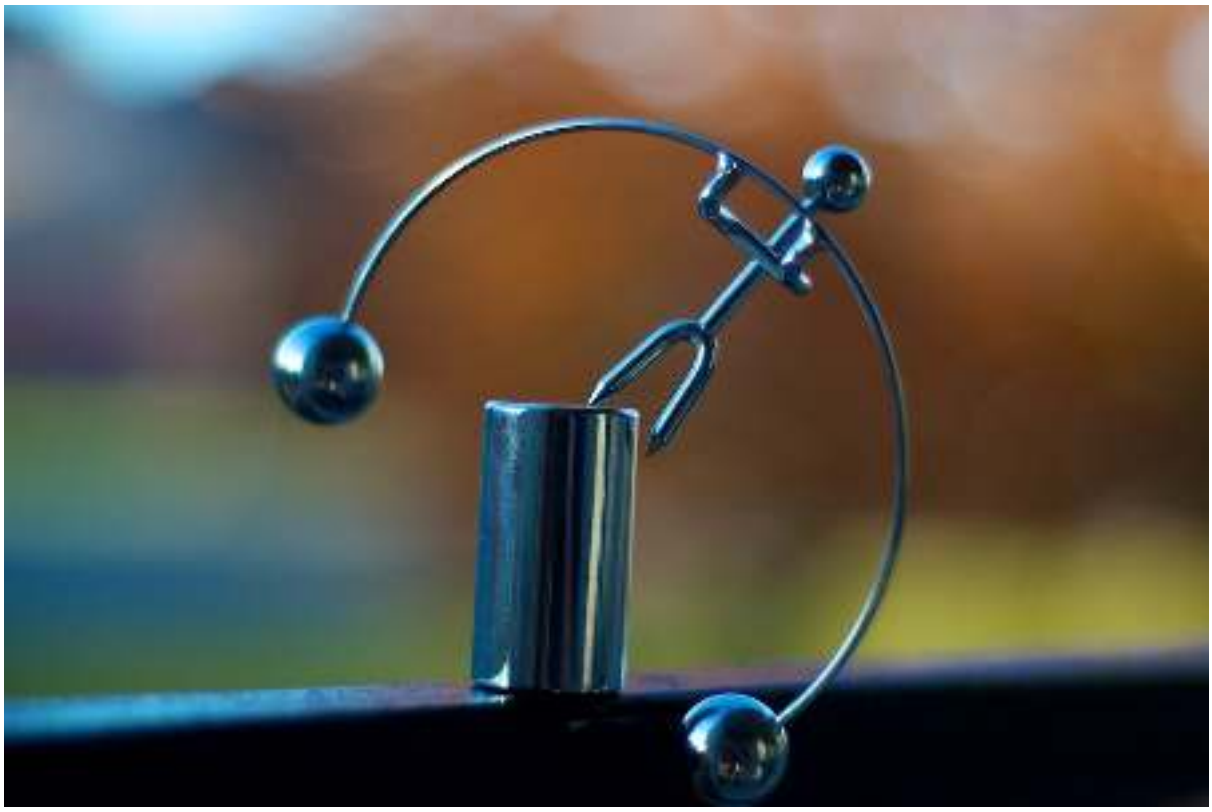
Σ Frame Axiom 15: A Woman’s Trust is a Tempestuous Storm in which a man must do his best to keep his ego afloat.

In the previous post mentioned in the Introduction, I briefly described one solution to the third question.

> “[Husbands can] maintain a balance between her level of challenge and her level of skill, which allows her to attain a state of Flow in the interaction. Flow is important for building confidence, faith, and skill. When all this is firmly established, and her faith in the relationship is growing, then the man can begin to exercise more direct demands over her behavior in the relationship. In the best case scenario, feelings of love, humility, and pair bonding would also develop.”

A lot of readers may be unfamiliar with the concept of Flow, so I’ll elaborate upon this in the next post.



Epilogue

In the past, Red Pill literature has usually addressed the problem of how to create genuine attraction, or “getting her to like you”. But as we know, this only works out for those top 20% men who have the potential for creating attraction in the first place. The way this approach usually plays out for the average man is essentially gynocentric Blue Pilling at best, groveling, or accusations of harassment at worst.

In contrast, the approach described above dismisses this approach altogether, and instead focuses on building rapport and properly managing the relationships you already have. The usefulness of this approach is not limited to men dealing with wimmin of particular interest, but extends to men dealing with most anyone, not just women in relationships.

As you can see, the practice of wife/daughter/COPs/et al. management is not focused on extracting certain feelings or responses from them, but is about asserting masculine authority, assuming control of the interaction, harnessing the motivations in play, and guiding, moulding, and shaping the feelings and responses of others that are already in circulation.

Pursuing Flow to develop Confidence and Trust

The key to personal integrity and contentment.

Continuing from Wednesday's post, Harnessing the Motivations of Others (2022-4-20), here I'll explain in detail how employing Flow in Feedback Loops can be used to build up healthy egos and develop confidence and bonding in a relationship.

First, a primer in Flow.

An Introduction to Flow

Readers who are unfamiliar with the concept of Flow may want to read through the posts I've written on this topic before, to get a foundation on some key concepts that I'll use here.

- Σ Frame: A Study of Csíkszentmihályi Flow (2017-12-29)
- Σ Frame: The Blessings of Flow (2018-01-23)
- Σ Frame: Wisdom, Spiritual Efficiency, and Flow (2018-01-26)

As given in the first post, the central components of the Flow experience are listed below. An abridged significance is ascribed to each one in brackets.

1. Intense and focused concentration on the present moment – [Challenge]
2. Merging of action and awareness – [Contact / Involvement]
3. A loss of reflective self-consciousness – [Worship]
4. A sense of personal control or agency over the situation or activity – [Skill]
5. A distortion of temporal experience, one's subjective experience of time is altered – viz. a transcendental experience – [Eternity]
6. An experience of the activity as intrinsically rewarding, also referred to as an autotelic experience – [Desire / Motivation]

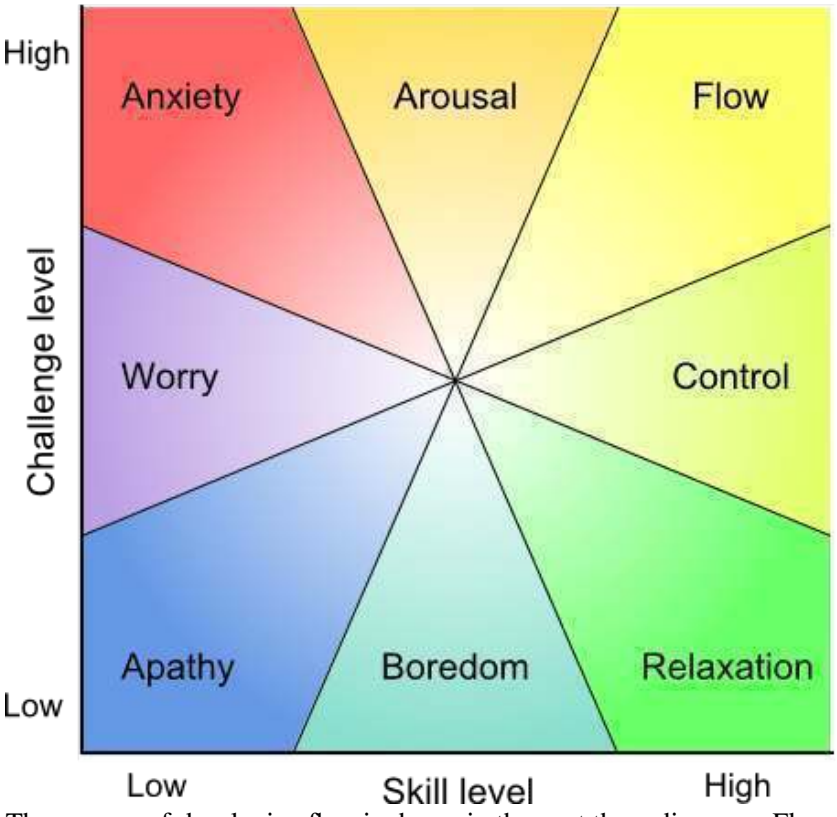
These aspects can appear independently of each other, but only in combination do they constitute a so-called Flow experience.

Developing Flow

Prof. Mihály Csíkszentmihályi introduced the following diagram to illustrate Flow.



The process of developing flow is shown in the next three diagrams. Flow is attained by maintaining a balance between one's Skill level and Challenge level. To begin the long process of building up one's skill in facing a challenge, it all begins with where you presently are, and not where you think you should be.

It should be noted that getting immediate Feedback concerning the efficacy of one's actions in response to a challenge is an important part of developing Skill. The speed of return, fidelity, and quality of the feedback greatly affects the learning curve.

If we turn this around and look at the experience of Flow from a woman's perspective, giving her Feedback is the first step in allowing her to establish the Volitional Cascade chain, as we will see later.

In totality, this hearkens back to what Scott wrote about establishing a trajectory early in life. However, it's never too late to begin.

Using Flow to Develop Your Life and Your Relationships

According to God's design for humanity, the man's ego is built around his work (i.e. the expression of his Mission), while the woman's ego needs to be incorporated into her marital relationship.

To begin with, a man must trust God in his life purpose and develop his own Flow therein (a continually growing balance of skill and challenge). If the reader understands Flow, then this should need no further elaboration.

Red Pill Apostle gave us this prescription which is actually a rough guide for Men pursuing holistic Flow in their broader lives.

> "Married men need to focus on improving themselves, but for their own sake, not for anything to do with their wives. Be active, read, learn and rekindle or develop further interests and hobbies. None of this has anything to do with the Mrs., although she might benefit from them. If you don't have a clear purpose in life pray, meditate on God's word and ask Him to guide you in this. Your purpose can involve seemingly big or small aspects of life and it usually will allow you to use the gifts God has given you. Once you have a peace about what you are supposed to do, get after it unapologetically and let the wife know how you expect her to help you in this.
> The prior paragraph is an exercise in masculinity. It is the act of pursuing your purpose and wanting your wife to be part of that with you, but being willing to move ahead regardless, that she will find attractive. If you apply the same fearless attitude to telling your wife what you want from her sexually, you are going to get much more than you ever thought possible. Be confident when you tell her (not ask for) what you want, as if you have no doubt she'll go along with you, and then be indifferent if she declines."

Overall, RPA is describing the tasks of clearing away the hindrances that would prevent a Man from achieving Flow. Again, a man cannot do this unless he has a healthy ego and a sense of Flow to begin with.

A task that requires mutual coordination can be a Flow bonding experience.
Once a man has his Mission in place, then he can think about taking on a companion and helper in the form of a woman. Attracting a woman's interest and ego investment may be easier than you might think. It might help to think of a woman as a bundle of unique wants, needs, and desires. Among these is a basic desire for Masculinity, which has three main ingredients.

1. Strength, of which Fitness is a basic prerequisite.
2. Mission, of which Skill is an implicit and essential part.
3. Joy and Enthusiasm are attractive and serve to draw certain important others into your world.

The man initiates by noticing a woman's interest in him and his endeavors, and inviting or accepting her into his sphere of influence. During the interaction, the woman will attempt to access the man's attention, energy, time, and so on, according to her desires/interests. Scott's Axiom comes into play at this point. The man accedes her presence and influence and begins to give her feedback about how she can adapt and adjust to the larger enterprise. The woman follows by responding to his feedback.

The volitional cascade chain begins at this point.*

Feedback –> Trust –> Relevancy –> Humility –> Comfort –> Security

Flow is incorporated into the cascade chain in the following step-by-step process.

1. As Feedback leads to Trust and Relevancy, her submission to his authority as an act of obedience to God's order is the feminine version of trusting God. Men should be experiencing more bonding during this process.
2. Relevancy is the process of developing Flow within the relationship.
3. Somewhere between Relevancy and Humility (AKA "falling in love") is the threshold where Flow begins to take effect in the relationship, allowing the relationship to take on a life of it's own. Many couples describe this experience as intuitively knowing what the other needs, and understanding the other's thoughts and intentions without a word spoken.
4. After this, the biggest challenge to men is in enhancing Flow such to give her consistent Feedback that leads her further towards Comfort and then Security.
5. When Security has been attained, neither one is interested in considering other competitive romantic interests available to them.
6. Finally, Sanctification sets in.

Therefore, two very important longitudinal goals for establishing and strengthening an emotionally healthy relationship are (1) to achieve a balanced, well-adusted ego for both the man and woman, and (2) to pursue Flow in the relationship. Ideally, these aspects should be firmly in place before sexual consummation.

Σ Frame Axiom 16: Start focusing on the small things to slowly build an Internal Locus of Control.

 Readers who may still be wondering why the woman's ego investment is important should recall how women apply volitional will when dealing with a man, as described in A Volitional Model of Cascade Courtship (2021-11-15). This study also answered the question of why Women have sex to influence men (2021-11-10). Basically, it is because It's all about her Ego (2021-11-12).*

Flow is enjoyable for all.

Concluding Statements

Ego investment and Flow are like a “glue” that holds couples together, in addition to shared enterprises (e.g. working on his mission, traveling, raising children), and sex.

A woman’s motivation is not purpose driven, like a man’s would be, but instead seeks to establish a cascading chain of increasing ego relevancy. Women see themselves as being responsible for either the success or failure of establishing this chain, even though much of the necessary context lies outside of their control. In fact, it is necessary for her to have the impression that she exercises volitional will in the matter of getting Feedback, or else she cannot make the next step to Trust.

The good news is that men are not rowing upstream and against the current when trying to form healthy ego attachments in their relationships. Women are actively seeking to establish ego relevancy, so men need to be aware of the more psychologically healthy propensities that she has and latch on to them. Always reward the behavior you want from her with ego stroking attention. Bad behavior can undergo extinction when it is ignored (viz. not rewarded with attention) for a sufficient length of time.

Remember, punishment and/or negative attention (e.g. criticism, scorn) is also attention, which is taken to be a positive reward feedback by the woman. Having a history of this type of interaction is why (too many) women have the notion that making a scene is an acceptable way to get the attention that she wants and needs. Moral Guidance Based Feedback vs. Sexual Attention (2021-11-24) covered the importance of moulding wives and daughters, and this should be done with the aim of forming healthy ego attachments, rather than pursuing self-centered imperatives.

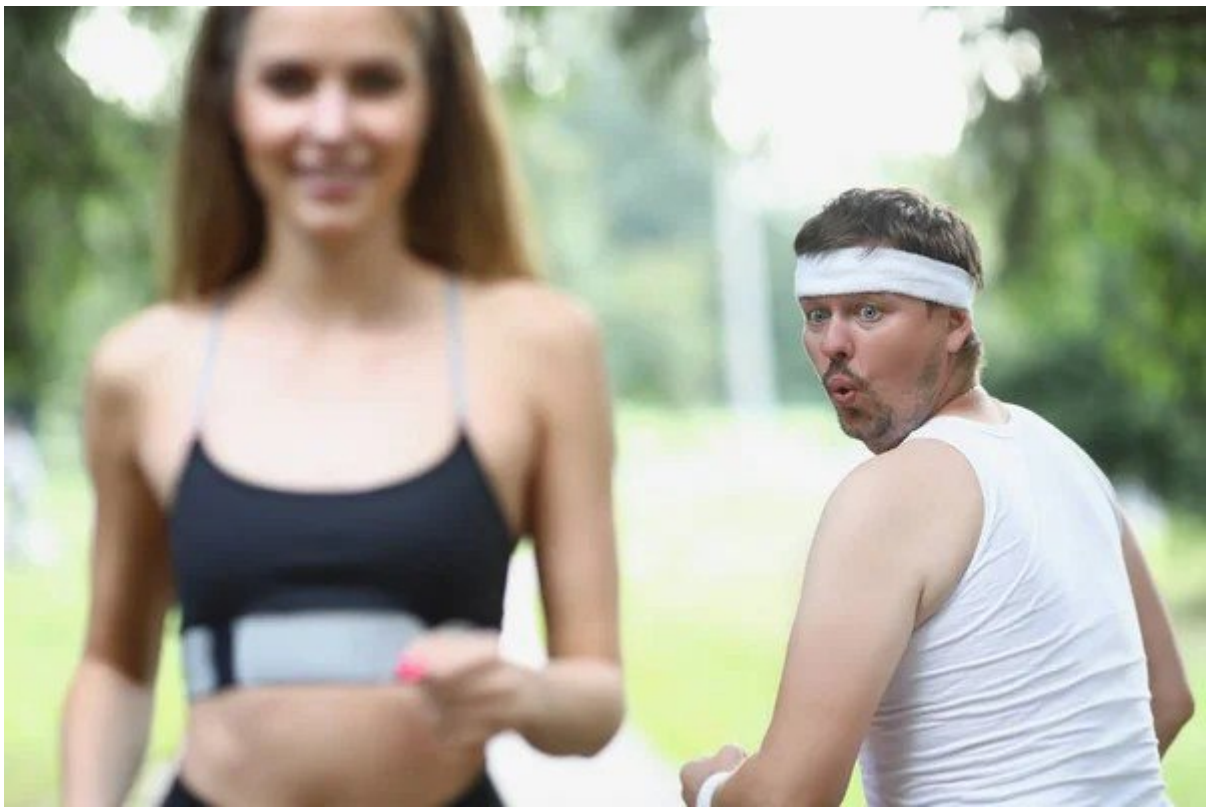
The thing I find interesting about Adam's podcasts with Scott is that, "Hey, here's a Catholic dude and an Orthodox guy, they have different nationalities and a totally different walk of life, and they agree on 90% of stuff and get along just fine." It's an encouragement of faith. They can also be funny at times.

In response to this podcast, I want to reemphasize a running point that may have gotten lost among all the words that have appeared on Σ Frame this month. (Remember, the theme is Overcoming Obstacles!)

The intermediate goal is to get past the blinding obsession with women and sex.



Men must deal with whatever personal issues they may have with the "woman question" and somehow adapt/adjust their desires for a wife, sex, marriage, and/or having children into a larger purpose. Here, I'll repeat two noteworthy lines from the podcast,

Scott (32:45): "If you don't master your passions, your passions will master you."

Adam (39:37): These guys who are spending their time agonizing over [how to get the] chicks are buying into the trap of the system. They're completely being sucked in. They don't understand that the answer to their problems is not how to get the chicks. The answer to their problems is how to step outside their conditioning and start beginning the process of really developing themselves as a man, and discovering what you can do — not who you are — chicks discover who they are — men make themselves. […] If you're sitting around agonizing about how to get the girls, you're basically one of the girls!

For some men, this might mean (as Adam said in the podcast) to forget about women altogether. For other men, it would mean they need to pull their Game together and establish Headship in their relationships. For all men, it means to get serious about overcoming one's personal obstacles and making progress on one's mission.

Listeners might object to the unempathic tone of Adam's podcast, since both Adam and Scott come from the perspective of not really having any trouble with women. Adam tends to disparage the whole idea of continuing to talk about how to attract women. But their overall point about the need to look beyond the wimmin/sex question is a good one for all men to hear.

As for me personally, I am right on the threshold of the proverbial top 20%. When I work out and dress sharp, I'll get IOIs from random strangers every day, young and old, at church, on the train, waiting at the bus stop, walking across town… There have been periods of my life when I could regularly expect picking up a phone number every time I left the house. But… if I don't work out, or don't get enough rest, etc., then my Meet Cute Mojo™ disappears and then I'm just a regular guy. So I know both sides of the experience. In the past, my biggest problems with women was that I was very Blue Pill naive, religiously conscientious, and never developed any Game until late in life (late 30s to early 40s).

A little about Game

DS holds the view that Game is of the flesh. I did too when I was younger, and I totally eschewed all Game as prideful and worldly. Needless to say, I didn't have any Game in my younger years, and those who did didn't like me very much. But after being married for a while, and then coming across the descriptions of and arguments about Game on the Manosphere, I opened up my views and gained a new appreciation of Game. I began to view Game itself as an expression of charisma (although one that is often misused and abused). I developed a revised understanding of the place and value of Game. My view on Game now is that it makes all of life go a lot smoother because it's easier to display social graces and convey common forms of love and grace to others which can then be received as such. To some extent, embracing Game was a solution to my own "woman question", many of my marital troubles, and resolving some of my Inner Game issues, some of which were related to my faith. I don't really have much problem with women any more.

About why I still cover issues with women

First of all, Scott and I both have a passion for helping younger people find a better path to marriage. I believe there are younger Christian men out there (and women too) who want to marry and have a family, but like me, they've had too much exposure to the sexualization of everything in the culture, and too much Blue Pill exposure in church, and it's totally messed up their Inner Game and their ability to deal with women.

Another reason is because I can empathize with men, especially younger Christian men, who find it nearly impossible to deal with being a sexually virile male (e.g. identifying cultural lies, living with a supercharged libido, resisting temptation, developing social efficacy, finding one's purpose, enacting agency, etc.). I recognize the importance of helping men navigate the sex drenched (or sex parched, DOYV) SMP, and the wastelands of modern marriage. As Scott quoted Dalrock (?) in the podcast (at 9:30), "Saving the seeds of civilization while the fire rushes over the forest."

Third, there needs to be a forum where Christian men can discuss these issues. The targeted audience is very small, but the message is critically important to them. Right now, I think Σ Frame, Christianity and Masculinity, and RPChristians may be the only Christian Manosphere sites that concentrate on building/maintaining intersexual relationships and present it as a potential positive.

What else is out there for men? Churchianity? Wokeism? Progressivism? Marxism? Red Pill is fading out and taking on the reputation as a Gen X stint. Just about everything on YouTube and the internet is either Blue Pill or Black Pill, which offers very little transferrable knowledge to those guys in the way of establishing a satisfying, God glorifying marriage relationship.

I've had such a wide spectrum of experiences with women, wrestling with religiosity, and dealing with Inner Game issues that I feel like I need to put everything together and share what I've learned — maybe Millennials won't appreciate it, but I think Gen Z on will. I mean, what are we passing on to the next generation? I hope it's something more than jaded cynicism about women and marriage, or "enjoy the decline", or "forget about women altogether." Even if men actually DO need to forget about women, we need to elaborate on the whys and hows, so that they can process their confusion, develop faith, and get over the obsession.

Civilizationists vs. Nihilists vs. Preservationists

A previous post, The intermediate goal is to get past the blinding obsession (2022-4-25), covered a podcast from Adam Piggott and Scott Klajic that addressed many of the topics that were brought up in April 2022 (Theme: Overcoming Obstacles).

This post adds some historical perspective to an older topic Adam and Scott made a familiar reference to in the video.

In the podcast, Adam and Scott described three philosophical camps of men.

Civilizationists – The view of, “Keep calm and carry on.” (This phrase is attributed to Winston Churchill.) Christians and other conservatives must plow on, marry and procreate, in the midst of the catastrophic destruction surrounding them, and do so in faith, in spite of the risks. Adam Piggott appears to take this stance. Interestingly, churchianity does too, or rather, it presents it as a distant goal to dream of “after college” cough.

Nihilists – The view of “Fiddle while Rome burns” or “Sit poolside [cigar and cocktail optional] and watch civilization crash and burn.” I’m not sure where these memetic phrases originated, but the latter was made famous by Roissy of Chateau Heartiste. This stance was promoted by Brett Stevens of Amerika as a way to hasten the demise of Leftism. Since then it has gained philosophical traction among PUAs and MGTOWs.

Preservationists – The view of “Saving the seeds of civilization while the fire rushes over the forest.” This idea is sort of a middle ground between the first two, having the nuclear family model promoted by Civilizationists coupled with the socially insulated stance of the Nihilists. This is Scott’s stance.

In his describtion of this stance in the podcast, Scott attributed this quote to Dalrock (at 9:30), and said Dalrock used this quote in a private email conversation they had in 2014. Dalrock is famous for this quote, probably because it matches his overall philosophical stance. However, I’ve searched Dalrock’s site and I can only find this quote in one post, Continuing the discussion. (2013-5-24), and there he is quoting Vox/Ted at Alpha Game: Nihilists vs Civilizationists (2013-5-24). So apparently, this quote originated from Vox.

The Schism between Civilizationists and Nihilists

In 2013, Vox described the schism between these two camps in Nihilists vs Civilizationists (2013-5-24).

> "What both camps have in common is a diagnosis. Where they differ is the prescription. This is why they are not functional allies in the long term. Their immediate objectives and priorities have nothing in common and their perspectives are fundamentally different. However, it should be kept in mind that neither side created the problem to which both are reacting, and it should be recognized that both have important roles to play before the course plays itself out."

In the same post, Vox described the strategic value of both groups, and prophetically foretold how their roles would play out.

> "It is the MGTOW who will ultimately destroy the Female Imperative society by removing its foundations. The traditionalists tend to allay the destructive effects of the irrational while the hedonists exacerbate them. This is why the MGTOW incorrectly tend to look on the traditionalists as white knights and useful idiots in the service of the Female Imperative. They erroneously conflate the traditionalists who are simply doing what they have always done with the feminized Church and the female-biased State.
> By withdrawing their services, their seed, their paternal support, and their economic surplus from the women and children of society, they render that society unsustainable. They are responding rationally to the disincentives which that society has presented them. Theirs is a perfectly legitimate response to a society gone mad. More than that, their response is a necessary one, it is part of the pendulum swing that is required before society can return to sanity and stability.
> However, the hedonistic, self-centered MGTOW will never be able to build anything lasting or replace the society which they quite rightly hate. They must rely upon the civilizationists to do that; without the traditionalists still stubbornly working, marrying, and having children despite all of the societal disincentives for doing so, there will be no eventual recovery from the chaotic, barbaric morass into which the equalitarian-corrupted West is rapidly sliding.

> This is why the accusations of lotus-eating on the one hand and white-knighting on the other are both misplaced and ill-considered. Both nihilists and civilizationists are necessary to the process of first destroying, and then replacing, [a Feminine Imperative based] society. One need not agree with the other to respect and understand his — or her – role in the necessary, desirable, and, I would argue, inevitable, process."

At that time, Vox had an even view of both Civilizationists and Nihilists. Recently, Vox has become scathingly critical of the latter camp. Apparently, they're no longer in orbit.

As readers can see from the list of posts above, these two philosophical camps have rammed heads again and again for the past 10 years, and we continue to see this on a regular basis here at Σ Frame.

Note that by early 2018, the need for respect was identified as a key battleground for men, beginning with the Manosphere and then extending to the wider culture. However, persecution ramped up that year and this topic was largely forgotten. I've attempted to raise the issue since then, but more or less inefficaciously. It seems that men have forgotten what it feels like to be respected. Vox's tantrums about MGTOW and his other weirdnesses haven't helped raise awareness of this crucial need for respect at all.

Vox Day earning our "respect". cough

Identification and Motivation

However much insight Vox has offered, he has not addressed the social identifiers and motivations that drive this schism. This is not merely a schism between two philosophical camps disagreeing about their vague notions of the future. There are other reasons that Civilizationists and Nihilists are at fundamental odds. Here are a few.

Class Schism — Under the current system, marriage and having a family is more available to the economic elite and less attainable by those making average wages. This socioeconomic class divide continues to grow wider as time goes on. Civilizationists are busy working the system to earn more money to support their families, while Nihilists are (not so) busy undermining the same system simply because it's a broken system.

SSMV Hierarchy Schism — These days, just as in days of yore, the Alpha Male of the Group™ is not easily convinced to show grace and mercy to the men under him in the hierarchy, men who are not as aggressive, not as athletic, not as popular, and not sufficiently up on their level of the Game. It is much more ego affirming and satisfying for them to summarily ostracize and discriminate against their plebian underlings. LastMod gives us a daily reminder of this reality.

The Exceptionality Clause — Within the church, a Pearl of Great Price™ is not easily convinced that a man who is not in the upper 80% is worthy to open her clam, let alone to be considered worthy of her hand in marriage. To receive any respect from others, including a potential bride and her father, a Christian man needs to prove himself to be exceptional.

RedPillBoomer put it like this.

> "I can clearly see the line that divides the "haves" from the "have not's" with the young men."
> "…it is going to be difficult for the "lower 80%" of men to get a girlfriend; not impossible, but difficult given this current SMP."

Readers may be able to come up with other differences in identity and motives between the "have's" and the "have not's". But my point here is that there is a pattern. The largest difference between the Civilizationists and the Nihilists is that the former has access to realizing their evolutionary imperative of marriage, sex, and procreation; whereas, with the way things stand now, there are a number of hoops and hurdles for the latter camp of men to jump before they can ever consider marriage etc. to be an actionable choice.

Final Statements

The common argument that we often hear is that unexceptional men should somehow make themselves exceptional. This advice may help a small number of men who are on the cusp of Alphatude and need a little edge to qualify them for sociosexual visibility, but it is untenable as a general practice, and unfair to the average man. All that can be realistically done is to raise the quality of the average. But what we fail to see is that we (as a society) tend to only respect those men who can pass women's hypergamous filters. To wit,

- Women want the Alpha badboy.
- Women want an upper middle or upper class man.
- Christian women want the exceptional Christian man.

By accepting all these qualifications for respect that are put upon men, we are still buying into the Feminine Imperative. So the bottom line is that we are still playing by the gynocentric rule book.

To sum it up quite bluntly (CH style), pu$$y makes all the difference in men's outlook on life. Men and women alike judge men by whether or not they can lock down a piece of the pie. Therefore, marriage is for the elite, because hypergamy. I'm not saying this is right nor how it should be, but only that this is how it is. Within this gynocentric cultural paradigm, Civilizationists are the "have's" who want to keep the folds convulging, and the Nihilists are the "have not's" who are broiling in envy and want to "burn it all down". Such is the root of this schism.

Moreover, men are just as much enslaved to their desire for pu$$y (whether it be real or virtual), as women are to hypergamy and the Feminine Imperative. When a man can look past his human evolutionary functions, look towards Christ and His purposes, and start exercising respect for those men who rightfully deserve it (rather than for those men favored for their utility to women), then he might have a shot at ending this schism, turning things around, and accessing the Power of God in his life. For example, this is exactly what Scott has done with LastMod, and both men have been blessed. More men need to emulate these kinds of behaviors. Otherwise, we'll never achieve solidarity and get the respect we need as men.

The Link between Zinc, Male Health, and Depression

Take your zinc with a wink!

Readership: Men
Theme: Overcoming Obstacles
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Introduction

A younger reader told us about how frequent fapping dampened his noetic discernment, whereas abstaining from solo sex reduced the intensity of his sex drive, which in turn, made it easier for him to resist lustful temptations. He writes,

> "Frank personal observations incoming:
> I found, to my great surprise, that when I abstained from p0rn and fapping for an extended period of time (2 weeks to a couple months or more) that my libido did indeed drop off. So I suspect that what I imagined as libido is simply habit and the pleasure-reward system seeking for another "hit". Logically, I don't see how it would be different in marriage but at least there is a productive use for it and a real woman involved.
> Very subjectively, I've also found that my noetic sense seems heightened when abstaining as described. At some point I realized that even one return to viewing p0rn accompanied by jerking off meant my noetic senses were blunted by the next day. I didn't want to think about God, spirituality, or long-game thinking. OTOH, infrequent jerkin' of the gherkin (without p0rn) does NOT seem to have the same effect."

His experience is far from unique. A few other readers have mentioned similar effects.

Nutting is the wrong kind of zinc.

In a reply, Jorgen brought our attention to a link between zinc and depression.

> "At some point I realized that even one return to viewing porn accompanied by jerking off meant my noetic senses were blunted by the next day."
> "This is true. But the more zinc in your diet, the faster you recover.
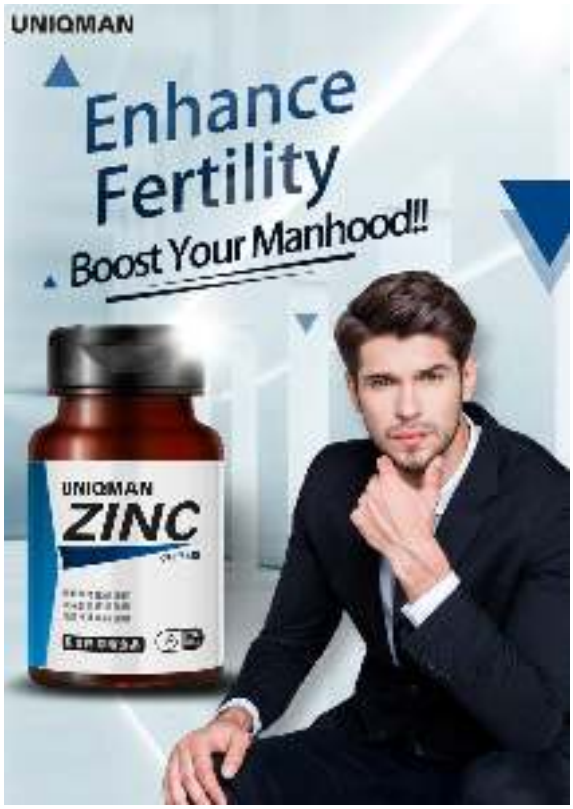
> Jerking + not enough zinc = long term depression = jerking more to try and feel happy = losing more zinc and it being harder to catch up = jerking off even more to try and feel happy = whole thing over again.

> If you do screw up and jerk one day, take a zinc supplement that night so it will only take 1 day to recover rather than 3 or 4."

Jorgen's comment sparked my curiosity about the effects of zinc. After doing some research on this, I found that zinc is extremely important for one's health [emphasis mine].

> "Playing a determinant role in over 300 biological processes, zinc is required for proper cellular function, including DNA replication, transcription, protein synthesis, maintenance of cell membranes, cellular transport, as well as endocrine, immunological and neuronal systems (Prasad, 1995; Nowak et al., 2003b). Dysregulation of zinc is associated with reduced immunological functioning, stunted tissue regeneration, growth retardation, gastrointestinal complaints, and ocular and sensory disturbances. Zinc insufficiency is also associated with neuropsychiatric manifestations that can present as altered behavior and cognition, reduced ability to learn, and depression (Nowak, 2001; Nowak et al., 2003a; Howland and Wang, 2008)." [1]

Of note to men, there are noteworthy correlations showing that Zinc is important for both reproductive health and psychological health.



This kind of zinc is better.

The Role of Zinc in Reproductive Health

Zhao et al. [2] and Fallah et al. [3] conducted a literature review and found a significant correlation between zinc and reproductive health. Excerpts follow.

- Zinc acts as a hormone balancer (e.g. testosterone), and improves prostate and sexual health. [3]
- Zinc plays an important role in spermatogenesis. [2]
- Zn deficiency impedes spermatogenesis and is a reason for sperm abnormalities and has a negative effect on testosterone concentration. [3]
- Zinc levels in sperm are proportional to sperm volume. [2]

- The concentration of zinc in human seminal plasma is higher than that in other tissues, and is nearly 100 times more concentrated than in blood serum. [2]
- Zinc functions as an antibacterial agent in men's urinary system. [3]
- Zn acts as a toxic repercussion against heavy metals and cigarette inflammatory agents. [3]
- Zinc displaces the concentration of harmful elements, such as cadmium. [3]
- Smoking reduces zinc content in seminal fluid. [3]
- Zinc levels in the seminal plasma of smokers and infertile males were significantly lower than that of normal males. [2]
- Ejaculation reduces the zinc concentration in the prostate, which then affects levels of zinc in the body overall. [2]
- Zinc supplementation can significantly improve sperm quality by increasing the percentage of normal sperm morphology, sperm motility, and semen volume. [2]
- However, there are no significant effects of zinc supplementation on the sperm viability, sperm concentration, sperm count or percentage of abnormal sperm morphology. [2]

As you can see, zinc is essential to male health. Also, it appears that zinc may be a link between smoking and reduced fertility.

Now this is good zinc!

The Role of Zinc in Mental Health

Through a literature review, Petrilli et al. [1] showed that zinc is related to one's psychological well being, i.e. mood, depression. Excerpts follow.

- Patients suffering from depression have abnormally low levels of zinc in their bodies.
- Clinical studies show lower serum zinc levels in groups of cases with major depression (McLoughlin and Hodge, 1990; Maes et al., 1994; Siwek et al., 2010; Swardfager et al., 2013).
- Recent meta-analyses demonstrated lower serum zinc levels in groups of cases with depression compared to controls, with significant inverse associations between depression severity scores and serum zinc levels.

- Consistent with dose effects and causality, an inverse relationship was observed between lower zinc levels and higher Hamilton Depression Rating Scale scores (Maes et al., 1994; Liuzzi and Cousins, 2004).
- Studies of patients suffering from psychoses (e.g. schizophrenia), and those who have committed suicide consistently show abnormally low zinc. (See original paper for tables of these studies.)
- Several randomized controlled trials support the effectiveness of zinc as adjunctive therapy for improving mood in both depressed and healthy individuals (Nowak et al., 2003a; Siwek et al., 2009; Sawada and Yokoi, 2010; Lai et al., 2012; Ranjbar et al., 2014; Solati et al., 2015).
- Zinc supplementation also improved mood in cases with treatment-resistant depression in several studies (Nowak et al., 2003a; Siwek et al., 2009).

Other Benefits and Risks of Zinc

In another study, Jarrard [4] reported other benefits and risks of zinc and offered a precaution against taking excessive amounts of zinc.

- 80 mg/day of zinc, either alone, as zinc oxide, or as antioxidants and zinc, significantly reduced the risk of progression of age-related macular degeneration (AMD). [4]
- Zinc appeared to have a synergistic effect in combination with antioxidants. [4]
- Zinc has been found to inhibit prostate cancer cell line growth and invasion. [4]
- Low serum levels of zinc are associated with an increased incidence of prostate cancer. [4]
- An increased risk of prostate cancer was identified in patients with a supplemental intake of more than 100 mg/day. However, only 10 of 2127 patients diagnosed as having prostate cancer during the study had advanced cancer and a zinc intake of greater than 100 mg/d. The correlation to zinc was only found in patients with advanced cancer. In sum, the health professionals data suggest that high levels of supplemental zinc may contribute to prostate cancer promotion in a small minority of patients. [4]
- No increase in prostate cancer was noted in the patients receiving zinc supplementation in the former study. [4]
- At extremely high levels, more than 150 mg/d, zinc may cause immune dysfunction. [4]

Jarrard recommended 80 mg/day, and no more than 100 mg/day of zinc supplements. Moderation, as with anything.

Even better!

Conclusions

Zinc is a plentiful microelement found in many foods, such as fortified cereals, legumes (e.g. beans), mushrooms, nuts, seafood (e.g. oysters), and animal proteins, such as meat, fish and milk (e.g. cheese, yogurt). [2]

A zinc deficiency is a known cofactor of low semen volume, poor semen quality, infertility, prostatitis, depression, psychosis, and poor mood in general.

Sperm has a much higher concentration of zinc compared to other body tissues, so it stands to reason that ejaculation, whether by coitus or cranking lefty, would significantly reduce the body's overall zinc content.

So it seems that Jorgen's claims are more or less accurate. Frequent ejaculation (via. copulation or choking the bird) and/or a zinc deficient diet may contribute towards moodiness and/or depression. So men may want to consider these factors as a possible explanation for anhedonia and/or a means of improving/controlling/maintaining/regulating both fertility and mood. This might even help some men kick the habit of playing individual sports like fly fishing and pocket pool, and get past the blinding obsession.

But any way you look at it, zinc is all good! Take your zinc with a wink!

Update: There is a simple taste test using a zinc sulfate solution that gauges the level of zinc in the body. I've added a link to this information below. H/T: Joe2.

Update: A Summary of Faux-Masculine Archetypes (2022-5-30)

Introduction

Over the past several months, there have been a few readers who specifically requested the topic of Christian Masculinity or True Masculinity, and so I've adopted the mindset to concentrate on this area in the future. Red Pill Apostle has recognized this need too, and has written about the differences between dominating and domineering in one of his posts.

The Bible contains relevant archetypes of masculinity for us to emulate, but although most all the readers here have read the words and stories therein, we're not visualizing the real world application very clearly. This is understandable. We've been snowed by a maelstrom of Feminism most all our lives.

Before the turn of the century, popular culture and entertainment regularly promoted many examples of masculinity. A wide spectrum of archetypes were represented. To name a few…

- The wise, caring, hardworking father (Andy Griffith, Bill Cosby, Jim Anderson)
- The creative inventor (Emmet Brown, MacGyver)
- The ladies' man (Arthur Fonzarelli, John Travolta, Sean Connery, Templeton Peck)
- The leader (Capt. William T. Kirk, Capt. Jean Luc Picard)
- The military hero (Audie Murphy, Gny. Sgt. Hartman, Lt. Pete Mitchell, William Wallace)
- The strong protector (Clint Eastwood, Mr. T, Randy Savage)
- The rugged outdoorsman (Crocodile Dundee, Indiana Jones, Steve Irwin)
- Superheros (Batman, Spiderman, Superman)

In spite of all their faults, all these male role models had a strength of purpose and they met the challenge of overcoming an obstacle. Taken together, these characters provided a well-rounded sampling of masculinity, and this offered a comprehensive model of masculinity for young boys of the time.

Gung Ho, a G.I. Joe character that was popular among young boys in the 1980s and 1990s.
Today, role models such as these are conspicuously absent. Modern men are commonly depicted as…

- Vainglorious pretty boys (Jamie Dornan, Justin Bieber, Ryan Gosling)
- Thuggish degenerates (any mass murderer, MAGA "deplorables")
- Greedy, villainous businessmen (Creed Bratton, Ron Swanson)
- Bumbling dimwit husbands (Al Bundy, Homer Simpson)
- Drug Lords or addicts (Narcos, Walter White)
- Persnickety Nerds (Leonard Hofstadter)
- Tech Geeks (Sheldon Cooper)
- Effete androgynes

Readers might notice that some of the same archetypes are present today, but compared to the previous archetypes, the challenges they face and their strength of purpose are either self-centered or missing altogether. For example, dimwit husbands have replaced the wise father, pretty boys have replaced the ladies' man, tech geeks have displaced the crafty inventor, and thugs have replaced the hero. Sebaceous immature weaklings are the new norm.

Another difference is that no matter which faux archetype is presented, he is either a loner, or else he is under the command of an all-powerful harridan wife or a masculinized Lara Croft / Natasha Romanoff type heroine, who is almost predictably never wrong! Consequently, young men's concept of Masculinity has been corrupted and perverted.

On this, Red Pill Boomer offered a great suggestion.

> "…it might be a good thing to compare and contrast faux-masculine headship (posturing) vs. true Biblical headship. I know you and others have handled the subject of Biblical headship a lot on here, but have we ever compared and contrasted the two? IDK, maybe you did already and I missed it, or it was before my time as being a part of this blog…"

I have written about this many times before, but I haven't labeled it as "faux-masculinity" so you won't find anything by using this search term. I haven't written about it in one stand-alone post that contains a full comprehensive listing of the types and differences either. I've only picked out one or two differences at a time as it related to a topic. I've also not had the habit of listing such a comparison within its own category, so I can see how these posts would be hard to find. So, starting with this post, I'll include such posts in a new category under Archetypes / Faux-Masculinity.

This month I've chosen the theme of Faux-Masculine Archetypes in which I'll review several popular stereotypes of fake masculinity. I have the idea that by objectively (and at times humorously) examining these stereotypes, we'll get some practical insights about where masculinity, or rather, where our concept of masculinity has gone wrong.

We don't need to look too far to find examples of faux-masculinity. As of right now, I'm not sure exactly how many types of faux-masculinity there are. But I've already put together this short list of noteworthy examples for the reader.

1. The Responsible Figurehead / Sock Puppet (2022-5-4) *
2. Mopey Dopey (2022-5-6)
3. The Bungling Dimwitted Lazy Husband (2022-5-9)
4. The Boring Loyal Dude (2022-5-11) *
5. The Armchair Philosopher (2022-5-13)
6. The Decadent Christian (Antimonianism) (2022-5-16)
7. The Decadent Christian (Ressentimentalism) (2022-5-18) *
8. The Decadent Christian (Legalism)
9. The White Knight (2022-5-20) *
10. The Male Feminist (2022-5-23) *
11. The Lecherous Horndog (2022-5-25)
12. The Simp (2022-5-27)
13. The Abusive Criminal / Thug (2022-5-29)

14. The Playboy
15. The Workaholic
16. Bad@ss Chad *
17. Dark Triad
18. The Incel *
19. The Sebaceous Soy Boy *

I won't be able to cover all of these this month, but this is the list I'm starting with. Readers are welcome to pick out their "favorites" for me to focus on, and/or suggest others not listed here.

---

* Update: These types were identified as being a subgroup of the Male Feminist (MF), which was found to have countless subtypes. To add to this list, we have…

- Chivalrous Cuckservatives
- Churchians
- Complementarians
- F boys
- Generic Nice Guys
- Incels
- Liberal mouthpieces
- Male versions of radical feminists
- Manginas
- Nice Guys™
- PUAs
- QTBGL types

The reason there are so many MFs, and so many types, is because most all men across the West have been raised by feminist parents and schooled in feminism from their youth.

The thing that makes them all MFs is that they either espouse feminist philosophy, or they support feminism, either willingly or inadvertently.

One question for us to consider is whether True Masculinity is equivalent to Christian Masculinity. I suspect that it is.

Encapsulating an archetype of Christian Masculinity in particular is a delicate mine field that few dare to enter! Those that do, invariably maintain a steadfast principle of presenting the saccharine sweet or spiritually / sexually eviscerated images of faux-masculinity that are all too common within modern Christianity, as if this were the central core of what Christian Masculinity is all about.

Likewise, by objectively examining these stereotypes, and comparing them to what the Bible tells us, we'll be able to identify exactly where Christian Masculinity has gone wrong, and whether it is any different from True Masculinity. With fruit, we'll be able to find some insights about the sources of these stereotypes and identify the false values and/or false impressions associated with them. Once this is done, we'll be able to call them out and push towards a better model.

Qualitative Benchmarks for Evaluating Masculinity

I've selected five benchmarks of Masculinity to form an objective and qualitative criteria which can be used to evaluate each of the archetypes. These five benchmarks form the acronym SHARP (or HARPS) and have the subcategories listed below.

1. Strength — Athleticism; Endurance; Maintaining Frame; Physical Strength; Stamina;
2. Honor — Ethics; Honesty; Identity; Morality; Reputation; Social Status;
3. Authority — Education; Influence; Position; Power; Socioeconomic Status;
4. Respect — Abilities / Skills; Authenticity; Charisma; Excellence; Integrity; SMV;
5. Purpose — Attaining Goals; Discipline; Incentives / Motivations; Meaning / Significance / Value; Perseverance;

Honor is an interesting category, because Ethics and Morality often have a negative correllation with Status. More attention and honor is usually given to Reputation and Status than Ethics and Morality.

It should be well noted that Respect is linked to Authority through Power.

Abilities / Skills (included under Respect) are traits that branch across Authority, Respect, and Purpose.

I hesitate listing SMV under Respect, but there are reasons for doing so.

1. From a social perspective, honor and respect are predominantly offered to those men with a demonstrated utility to Feminine Imperatives. (Readers may discuss how morally or ethically appropriate this is.)
2. From an intersexual perspective, Tingles = Respect. (This is a fact that cannot be debated.)

Also of note, a man's SMV is primarily based on Donal Graeme's LAMPS (Looks, Athleticism, Money, Power, Status), and these correlate with Strength, Honor, and Authority. Also, Charisma is often added to LAMPS as an SMV determinant, and this would include Respect according to the above nomenclature. Purpose is entirely omitted from one's SMV evaluation! (Although it might be considered in assessing one's MMV.) Is it a coincidence that a man's purpose is the one characteristic that women are entirely blind to?

Honor and Respect

The previous section shows that Honor and Respect deserve special attention in our study of Masculine Archetypes for two main reasons.

1. Honor and Respect are intertwined with Strength, Authority, and Purpose, as well as Abilities / Skills, and SMV.
2. Western culture has somehow developed a propensity to disrespect respectability and dishonor the honorable.

On the first point, it seems that the core spiritual effectiveness of Masculinity hinges on Respect, which is possibly why St. Paul emphasized that wives should respect their husbands (Ephesians 5:33). Furthermore, a Man's identity, ethics, and morality are necessarily tied to Honor. If it is not, then a man ceases to be (relatively) good, by definition.

On the second point, this general attitude of dishonor and disrespect towards good men started about a century ago. The inflection point happened during the Sexual De-Evolution. Since then, the dishonor and disrespect towards men went full throttle within 20 years (by the mid 90s), and has gradually grown to become all encompassing today. Some factions even consider it virtuous to disparage and vilify men!

This general tenor of subtle contempt, condescension, and disrespect towards men has created various animosities and the overall feeling that something is amiss. This topic has been the subject of a long running discussion in the Men's sphere.

Conversely, we can observe how immoral and unethical men receive honor and respect. As a result, men see little value in being respectable or honorable.

Dalrock suggested that we need to focus on respect instead of fairness (which is a progressive value).

Catacomb Resident pointed out that the underlying problem from a spiritual perspective is that we predominantly maintain a worldly paradigm. We commend and revere those qualities that are valued by women, and we give very little credence nor recognition to men who have those qualities which are eternally valued by God.

On this, RedPillBoomer posed a pertinent question about the moral incongruencies surrounding Respect.

> "So Jack, maybe for a possible future blog subject, what is the profile of a man who "rightfully deserves the respect of other men?" What does that profile look like?"

We will consider this question during our examination of Masculine Archetypes. I expect the discussion of Honor and Respect will be interesting.

Epilogue

Masculinity as a discipline and an art of expression has died out in the West. As a result, Men have been pigeonholed into ignominy.

Scott summed up the situation well in a comment.

> "In the current crisis, I almost consider it an automatic fail when we hear what a "real man" is (or other variations of this theme).
> The most common ones come from the tradcons, who try so desperately try to walk the fine line between their weird notions of chivalry (from opening doors to protecting) and worshipping their kick ass daughters with guns who don't need no man. ("Any future son in law better be able to handle a strong, sassy opinionated woman like my daughter!")
> The construct of masculinity will stand or fall on its own merits and the smartest move right now is for men to support each other in the wilderness."

Yes, and in addition to supporting one another, we need to do so with mutual respect.

It's long past time we faced up to the reality that Christian Masculinity is a lost art and discipline.

Through all these studies of Faux-Masculinity, it is my hope that we'll see what went wrong and envision a revised concept of True Masculinity. There is much to be done in the way of developing a new archetype of Christian Masculinity in particular. Outside of Biblical examples, there's very little to work with. It seems like we're starting over from scratch.

Perhaps the biggest obstacle that must be overcome at present is our current notion that Christian Masculinity is depressed, ex-responsible, "figurehead but not head", flaccid, nonproductive, pandering, pedestalizing, obsequious, speak-no-evil, watered down immasculinity. (We'll get to that in the next few posts.)

It is not eternally True. It is a false, worldly mockery of masculinity to be soundly rejected.

Husbands are Heads with no Headship Authority

Bnonn Tennant, Michael Foster, and Doug Wilson have touted a model of Christian Masculinity that we'll look at in this post. They have assiduously avoided nailing it down in concise words, preferring instead to describe it in terms of what it is not. But by reading their walls of text in blog posts and newsletters, it appears to be one in which a husband accepts full responsibility for his wife and family, but care is taken to exercise as little authority as possible, other than what can be done through kind verbal teaching and prayer, so as to not antagonize the Curse of Eve in the wife. Tennant and Foster call this headship, but when we comb through the details, we find that the husband is not actually the head, but merely a figurehead. This is because a husband having "full authority" is toxic, or so they say. The intricacies of Tennant and Foster's model have previously been critiqued by Cane Caldo, Dalrock, and Full Metal Patriarchy. Dalrock and Full Metal Patriarchy have addressed the nuances of Wilson's version in many posts.

As a case study of this model, take a look at this newsletter written by Bnonn Tennant and Michael Foster entitled Toxic Sexuality (2021-12-20). About half way down we find this.

> "One form of genuinely toxic masculinity is hyper-patriarchy.
> This is a theological error, where a father makes himself the sole mediator between his church or state, and his wife or children.
> Essentially, this type of man sees his authority over his family as absolute, so the church and state must go through him to gain access to his family in any and every way."

So if I'm getting this right, Tennant and Foster's idea of Christian Masculinity is that a man should never assume that he should have absolute authority over his home and family, because that would be toxic hyper-patriarchy. (Oh no!) Instead, the church and state should have direct intervention, as if the man should not be trusted to handle his own affairs within the home.

Cuckolded by the State!
This is clearly a sin against the integrity of the family.

> So then, they are no longer two but one flesh. Therefore what God has joined together, let not man separate.
> Matthew 19:6; Mark 10:9 (NKJV)

If someone were to ask why the church or state would want to bypass the man of the family to access the wife and children, it would be apparent that the motivation is not for the best interests of the family.

> No one can enter a strong man's house and plunder his goods, unless he first binds the strong man. And then he will plunder his house.
> Matthew 12:29; Mark 3:27 (NKJV)

In order to rebuild Tennant and Foster's argument, we'll need to cherry pick an anecdotal example of an already broken family that needs to be protected from an abusive husband/father, and use this as a justification for binding the man of the house. But it would be wrong to assume that all the other decent men who are not abusers should be thrown into this mix of miscreants. Well, the fact of the matter is that they already are! Married men are already bound by the Duluth model, No Fault divorce, and the Bradley Amendment. How much more binding do we need? But Tennant and Foster are making the case that it would be theologically incorrect for a man to have significant authority over his family and they did not mention any exceptions for respectable men! It seems that letting a man glorify God by handling his own affairs in his own home is an atrocity in their eyes!

But Husbands should be Responsible Figureheads

And as if that were not bad enough, the next line in the newsletter is…

> "Now, as head of his household, he is its chief representative, and a mediator between it and the outside world."

If I'm interpreting this correctly so far, a husband is like a sock puppet ambassador. Like an ambassador, he is a mediator, but not the sole mediator. Like an ambassador, he should represent and remediate any messy situations that might accrue between his family members and the church and/or the state. Like an ambassador, he doesn't get to express his own views, or do what he wants, or make the larger decisions. But unlike an ambassador, he shouldn't have the authority to make any necessary adjustments, because that's "toxic hyper-patriarchy." So he's a sock puppet ambassador for his family, namely the wife — and she can always call the police if she doesn't like either the message or the messenger.

To me, this sounds like responsibility without authority. Okay, we see this all the time, and this is why husbands everwhere are throwing up their hands. But the kicker is that Tennant and Foster make this out to be the correct doctrinal stance, as they asserted earlier that if a man were to have such authority (as "sole mediator"), then that would be "toxic masculinity" and "hyper-patriarchy."

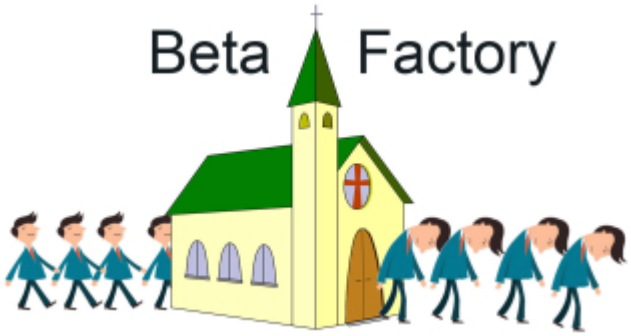
IMHO, saying that husbands are not to be trusted with authority over their own homes is misanthropy!

Case Study — Husband stands by when Wife breaks the law

To exemplify their point, Tennant and Foster offer the hypothetical example of a wife who breaks the law, saying that she must answer to the law for her crime, not to her husband, and that it is the responsibility of the law to hold her accountable, not her husband.

Yes, that's how civil authorities work, but they're using this to argue that the husband is irrelevant — not that he has no authority (which is basically true for the majority of men these days), but that he shouldn't have any authority!* (Again, because that's "toxic hyper-patriarchy.")

Well, well… This stance coincides quite nicely with the goal of misandric Feminism to transfer all civil authority from husbands and men over to the state. Tennant and Foster add the condemnation of false guilt to this agenda by rationalizing the theological application.



Husbands should only have enough Authority to fulfill their Responsibilities

Further down in the same section, Tennant and Foster attempt to shore up their earlier misgivings towards husbands with another contradiction, by arguing that a man's authority should be on par with his responsibility.

> "Authority and responsibility should always be at a relative parity. This is because authority is given specifically to fulfill particular responsibilities with regard to ordering the world in accordance with God's will. Responsibilities cannot be fulfilled unless they're accompanied by the authority to do so. But trying to take authority without responsibility is at best larping—and at worst to make yourself a tyrant."

According to their view, if a man is expected to have full responsibility, then he should also have full authority. But he shouldn't have full authority over his wife and family because that's either larping or tyrannical. Apparently only the law and big government should be allowed to exercise hyper-patriarchy. Or maybe a more logical explanation would be that since husbands should not have full authority, then they should not have full responsibility either, but

I doubt they would agree with that conclusion. Somehow, I'm getting the sense that their underlying views are not that far removed from the feminist view that women should have full authority, and men should have full responsibility. Thus, the mountains of text are obviously necessary to fully expound on the logical backflips needed to square it with the scriptures and make a convincing case.

Epilogue

The newsletter is titled "Toxic Sexuality" but the content is actually about "Toxic Patriarchal Authority." Instead, this confusing newsletter should have been named, "How to dupe Christian men into complying with misandry by painting yourself into a corner and calling it theologically correct", thereby encapsulating modern Christian Masculinity quite well.

Nevertheless, we can thank Tennant and Foster (and Wilson too) for giving us an illustration of Christian Masculinity as a sock puppet ambassador.

As I said in the beginning, it's hard to identify exactly what this model of masculinity is all about. But we can be sure that this model specifically stresses the following.

- Tis better to err on the side of extreme caution, regarding the dictates of others (e.g. the church, the state, and the wife), lest ye be seen as "toxic".
- Avoid being a toxic gremlin by not exercising too much masculine authority.
- Take care that one's responsibility is adequate, but not disproportional to one's authority.
- Allow the church and state direct access to his family in any and every way.
- Represent the family, i.e. the wife.
- Mediate any mishaps or misfortunes that might occur.

It sounds like a Feminine Imperative recipe for keeping the husband busy fighting fires on a daily basis. If a man's home is his castle, then a husband with limited authority is like a castle without walls nor moat. He and his family are left defenseless and disenfranchised, subject to the demands and whims of others. All his assets, yea even his own life, are open for the taking.

Oh, but he is supposed to lay down his life, right? (Ephesians 5:25)

Not if he doesn't have a Life of his own to lay down. A responsible figurehead with no headship authority is not a hero who sacrifices himself for the welfare of others. He is little more than a breadwinner that must be tacitly tolerated and carefully excluded from matters of import. At worst, he is fodder for the cannons of misandry.

In fact, this is the same model of masculinity that we often see in popular culture — the workhorse who is held fully responsible for anything that might happen, but who is cluelessly naive and too powerless to take any action that might have any effect.

Some men are so depressed that it's their new normal.

Readership: Men; Single Men;
Theme: Faux-Masculine Archetypes
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Introduction

Some readers might not consider the listless anhedonic male to be a widely recognized archetype of masculinity, but the fact is, it's common enough that it deserves our consideration. Christian men and especially clergymen are especially prone to this, as we will read later, although they have every reason not to be. Clergymen are powerful Christian role models for younger men. So this post will examine depressed male Christians as a cohort archetype. We'll also look at some influential factors related to this condition and some odd cognitions that depressed men use to justify their depression.

Men's Mental Health

Men and women deal with stress and depression differently. Women are better able to verbalize their emotions, whereas men might not recognize their symptoms as depression, perhaps denying or hiding their unhappiness, so the illness is overlooked in men until it becomes more severe. Women tend to congregate with other women and support each other, whereas men tend to withdraw and are more likely to turn to drugs or alcohol, which exacerbates their condition. Women are more likely to seek counseling or other professional help, whereas men are hesitant to do so.

It is suspected that the number of men having a mild form of clinical or chronic depression is underestimated.

- There are many men who are not downtrodden enough to recognize that they are depressed, nor would they seek counseling for depression. Others too might not recognize them as being depressed.
- Some men pride themselves on being able to pull themselves together in spite of the malaise and therefore cling to denial.
- Some men are so befuddled and terminally downcast that they have somehow managed to incorporate many traits and symptoms of depression into their personality. Thus, their condition is dismissed as “normal” and not properly regarded as depression.

As a consequence, these men lumber through their lives with long faces and a dour affect, they have low motivation, they give slow or listless responses, and they do this with such regular consistency that others find it challenging to even imagine them being in a state of joy.

The reasons for this vary on a case by case basis.

- Some of these men have had a difficult life since childhood. Even after discovering faith, they find that the immediate benefits of hope and joy are limited.
- Some men have grown up in a broken home, or an emotionless home with relationally cold parents, and therefore haven’t experienced the love and grace of God.
- Some of them have endured heart wrenching blows in their careers and marriages.
- Some men are discouraged to the point where they find it difficult to open their heart and be sufficiently trusting enough to display their inner joy, if they have any.
- Some men are disappointed and frustrated with love and the SMP/MMP.
- Some of these men are spergy and therefore angry, distrusting, paranoid, and depressed.
- Some men intentionally avoid exploring the bounds of their faith, because it leads them to get excited, anxious, and fearful about the fresh opportunities they can discern, and they’ve been told that holiness is removed from those passions. This leads to apathy, joylessness, and depression.
- Some men find more peace and emotional stability in maintaining a state of disengaged anhedonia.

I’m not a medical doctor, but personally, I suspect some men suffering from a lifetime of depression have never developed the neural synapses needed to genuinely feel emotions and express their emotional state. It’s beyond just repressed anger, stinted hopes, poor socialization habits, or a chemical imbalance.

What does Christianity and church fellowship offer to these men?

Church of St. Michael, Drážovce, Slovakia.

Church-going Men are Susceptible to Depression

Studies have found that non-church-going women have a greater incidence of depression than their male counterparts, at a ratio of 1.6. However, this is the opposite among regular church-goers, in which men have a higher incidence of depression. In both populations, many indicators of depression are similar, but the actual rate of depression is not. That is, women talk about it more than men do, they report it more than men do, and are more likely to seek help than men are. Among non-church-goers, these indicators correspond with the respective rates of depression among men and women. But among the faithful, these indicators cannot be construed to mean that women have a greater incidence of depression than men do, but rather, it's because men are reticent to talk about their emotions and less willing to seek professional help. As a result, church-going men are somehow less able to deal with depression than women are, and therefore suffer more from it. [1]

Mirola [2] investigated whether what people do and don't do religiously might have both social supportive and coping implications for their mental health. He discovered that…

- Identifying one's self as religious has no effect on depression for neither men nor women.
- Holding a position of authority in the church has no effect on depression for neither men nor women.
- Frequent church attendance ameliorates stress and depression in women, but not men!
- The use of prayer as coping mechanism significantly buffers the negative effects of chronic strains and depression in women, but not in men!

He concluded that women are more likely to benefit psychologically from greater religious involvement.

Mirola notes that it is quite possible that those who are depressed go to church more than those who don't or turn to prayer when they are at their wits end and no other option is available.

Furthermore, Mirola found that there are three main summary forces embedded within religious institutions and in every day life that work in women's favor.

1. Women are more likely to be in and take advantage of supportive relationships made available through their religious activity.

2. Women are more likely to define religious activity as an efficacious means to cope with stress and then use it for that purpose.
3. Women get a sense of community, protection, and social security from attending church and being involved in religious activities, and this has a greater effect on women's mental health compared to men.

> "Frequent church attendance had a negative effect on depression for the full sample ($b = -.334$, $p < .01$). However, as hypothesized, this effect in the full sample is primarily due to existence of a negative effect of frequent church attendance on depression for women. No similar effect appears for men." [2]

So in summary, going to church makes women less stressed and less depressed on the average, but the same is not true for men. This adds to the sizeable number of reasons why the typical church has many more women than men.

Depression among Religious Leaders

It gets worse. Clergy members are at far greater risk for depression than individuals in other occupations. [3] Studies conducted between 2005-2008 found that the rate of depression among men of the cloth ranged between 5.5 to 11.1%. [4]

> "A number of factors were found to be powerful predictors of depression and anxiety, most notably job stress. Clergy engage in many stressful activities, including grief counseling, navigating the competing demands of congregants, and delivering a weekly sermon that opens them up to criticism. The strain of these roles is further amplified by having to switch rapidly between them, which other studies have shown to exacerbate stressful experiences." [5]
> "Furthermore, the study found that pastors' sense of guilt about not doing enough at work was a top predictor of depression, and that doubt of their call to ministry was a top predictor of anxiety. Pastors with less social support — those who reported feeling socially isolated — were at higher risk for depression. By contrast, pastors reporting greater satisfaction with their ministry were half as likely to qualify for depression or anxiety." [5]

Case Study — A Depressed Pastor Rationalizes His Depression

Here's an odd perspective from the author of Building Jerusalem that gives us one example of how the clergy deals with depression inappropriately or inadequately. In Depression slays the idol of productivity (2021-3-16), the author, Pastor Stephen Kneale, wrote,

> "If we aren't busy, we feel guilty. When we are busy, we feel virtuous. In many ways, my depression helps with that. […] …despite how I may view productivity as a mark of faithfulness, the truth is I can't be that productive. I can do some things, but not as much as I can normally. I can get stuff done, but it takes me absolutely ages now. And I still feel guilty about it, but it doesn't matter, because there's nothing I can do about it. I can't make the slowness disappear and the workload increase. It exposes the idolatry of busyness and forces me to slay it."

Yes! Let us be thankful for our depression!

Pastor Kneale seems to have it backwards! He observes that people feel virtuous when they're busy, which I see as both an indicator of emotional health and being well adjusted within one's occupation. But he has the idea that it's somehow less holy of him as a pastor to feel virtuous about being busy! He is thankful to be depressed because it works against productivity, which he believes is an idol!

IMO, work is a blessing to be savored and enjoyed, especially when you're working for the Lord. And based on my own experience with depression, it's the result of repressed anger and frustration that continues on for months and years without any hope of a resolution.

Another pastor in Sydney Australia, Chris Cipollone, carries a similar attitude about his own depression.

> "I am a pastor who lives with depression. And nowhere in scripture am I disqualified for it."
> "In living with personal frailty, I can leave room for healthy leadership frailty, because it is God's strength that is greater."

As we have read above, pastors face an increased risk of depression, but one's own attitude about it can make a difference. IMHO, I'd say these guys are a bit too myopic about their own spiritual state and they need a sabbatical to give themselves some rest and a broader perspective. It concerns me to think that they might be extending these beliefs to the men under his care, and inadvertently teaching them to savor their repressed anger or whatever is contributing to their depression and to be thankful for the dull despondency.

The Church and Mental Health

I want to take a moment to comment on a tangent about how the church usually deals with mental health, as this directly relates to Christian men suffering from anhedonia, dejection, depression and general melancholy.

Christianity has within it a theology involving sin, guilt, suffering, and self-sacrifice, and it is not uncommon for sincere laypersons to be deeply confused over these issues, often without fully understanding exactly how they are affected by it or why. Even mature Christians can come to a place in their lives where they ask themselves basic questions like, "Why does God allow (this) suffering?"

In ages past, the church was largely responsible for shepherding those new to the faith and those going through difficult ordeals. In modern times, it is the field of psychology which addresses those problems within society that were once regularly dealt with by the clergy. Now, only one quarter of people who seek treatment for mental disorders go first to a member of the clergy. [3] This is higher than the percentage of people who go to either psychiatrists or general medical doctors, but lower than it has been in decades past. [3] As a result of advances in psychological treatments, and the receding activity of the church in shouldering responsibility for remediating psychological illnesses, the clergy is now less able and competent in dealing with depression and other forms of mental illnesses in it's congregation, in spite of the availability of modern advances in knowledge about such issues.

In the busy day to day work of ministerial work, most clergymen will seldom wrestle with the Christian theology of suffering and how it relates to mental illness. However, it needs to be recognized that someone suffering from depression or another mental illness is suffering a spiritual crisis as well, particularly the first time the symptoms take hold. [3] This suffering should be properly recognized as a momentous time, perhaps once in a lifetime, when that person is most open to internalizing the gospel of Christ and receiving the heart-felt knowledge of salvation. Therefore, it is necessary for both clergymen and those suffering to recognize how depression and other mental illnesses might fit within Christian teaching on the effects of original sin, the presence of various sufferings and illnesses in our world, God's unconditional love, redemption in this life, and how one may find healing for the mind, body, and soul. Clergymen need to find real, clinically tested, actionable strategies to help their parishioners come to peace with the problems and questions of the soul that are common or which providentially become eminent within their church or parish. Sufferers need to find and access the power of the gospel, the support of a Christian community, the love that is experienced within God's presence, and the overriding hope that Christ can offer to them through Christ's love. Men who are searching for healing should be guided towards an understanding of how their experience fits into and supports God's purpose for his life. In most cases, men who have had hurtful experiences in the past and have found grace and healing are best suited for ministering to other men going through similar experiences. (2 Corinthians 1:3-7) So there is no need for clergymen to have all the answers, but they must face these mental conditions and the preeminent questions, offer actionable choices to those suffering, help them find mentors who can stand by them, and rest in God's truth. The alternative is that the ignorance, uncertainty, and hesitation of church leaders and counselors will leave those suffering from various psychological conditions without a lifeline.

Of course, there's always One lifeline. Mirola [2] found that prayer significantly helps women avoid stress and depression, but not men!

The Bungling Dimwitted Lazy Husband

She's the Boss around the house!

In Running all the big decisions by the missus first. (2020-10-30), Full Metal Patriarchy revisited a phenomenon typical of Complementarian marriages — the idea that the wife is the head of the house. This marital structure is hardly limited to Complementarians. Most men quickly buy into this scheme, because in their minds, they don't want the headaches of continually having to make trivial decisions every day over things like choosing menus for meals, which type of dish detergent is best to buy, and whether the children should wear jeans or shorts each day; nor do they care for the hassles of washing, cooking, and cleaning. They would rather leave these mundane tasks and smaller decisions to the wife.

But complementarianish wives don't see it this way. For them, "head of the house" means exactly that — they're the boss! If the husband voices a concern, it is often dismissed as irrelevant or out of touch. If he states a preference, it is often disregarded, or if not, she carries the arrogant notion that she is being sooo kindhearted, loving, and sacrificial for tolerating his requests and accommodating his whims.

As Doug Wilson put it, he is a guest in his own home.

Unfortunately, these bungling dimwitted lazy husbands are slow to pick up on this kind of attitude in their wives, at least as long as the home is humming smoothly. But when something goes awry, the man is often taken to task, and summarily blamed for not "getting involved", not "helping out", and not "doing more" around the house. But of course, his skill level in cooking lasagna, folding laundry, vaccuuming the drapes, and wiping small butts will forever be substandard to her expert dexterity and keen eye for detail.

We as a culture have more or less accepted this image of the distant bumbling husband/father, a guest whose boorish jokes and off-color quips are patiently endured simply because he carries all the financial responsibilities of the family. For more than 50 years, we've seen this archetype depicted in films and on TV sitcoms — and we've laughed. Meanwhile, women have coopted this archetype as a convincing justification for disrespecting their men.

What is the Bungling Lazy Husband doing wrong?

Citing Ephesians 5:25, Tim Challies tells us that a husband should lead by loving her more, and the way to do this is (1) to increase his commitment to her service, and (2) to make himself as uncomfortable as possible in doing so.

> "Your wife, aware as she is of your sin, should never have reason to doubt that you love her, that you love your children, that you are committed to serving your bride in this unique role. You must be willing to forsake your own desires, your own comfort, your own rights in order to express love for your wife."
> "The godly husband leads his wife with meekness and gentleness. You need to be aware of your own sin and your own failings."

Challies keeps reminding us that the husband should be aware of his sin. I wonder which sin he is referring to. Is it having a lackadaisicial attitude toward, and a lack of diligence in performing the housework? Or is it the sin of appearing too comfortable* and content in his own home? Or maybe it is the sin of not making her feeel lurrved?

Later in the same article he contradicts the above passages when he writes [emphasis mine],

> "The godly husband does not mock or belittle his wife. You must not lead her through scorn or sarcasm or anger or punishment. Lead your wife with special delight and dignity, leading her differently than you would lead a child or an employee. Lead her with an awareness that you are a servant first, a leader second. Do nothing to puff yourself up with pride but everything to show your wife that you esteem her higher than yourself."

Surely the man's thorough ego abasement will heat things up in the bedroom!

Challies also tells us that the husband should do all of the above with confidence!

> "…the godly husband listens to Scripture above the world and leads his wife, confident that God calls him to do just this. Lead your wife with a humble confidence, even when you are called upon to make difficult or unpopular decisions."

So to sum it all up, the bungling lazy husband needs to do the following:

1. Humbly dwell on his sin. Use this guilt trip as a motivation to work harder.
2. Be more diligent in serving the ~~Boss~~ Lord in his unique role of housemeet.
3. Make her feel loved by debasing himself at the most inconvenient times and by displaying authentic discomfort.*
4. He must not ever use any Game techniques, because that would be unChristian!
5. Because true Headship is rather unpopular right now, he must be willing to face persecution and ridicule for being obedient to the ~~Boss~~ Lord.
6. Be confident and bold about doing all of the above!

No chilly challying; no dilly dallying; let's get to work on it now!

Challies is deluded enough to call this Headship! Certainly, readers must recognize the nonsensical efforts of the flesh in all of this. Yes, a man can glorify God and show love to his wife by doing housework, but Challies methodology doesn't quite cut the grease. It's not so much about the man's being a servant or contributing service as it is about sharing the joy of having a mutual enterprise (such as cleaning the house).

Clinical Evidence Indicates Otherwise

* It should be noted that Dr. John Gottman has identified the husband's level of comfort in the home (viz. "physiological soothing") as an indicator of marital contentment and stability. IOW, wives who make efforts to make their husbands comfortable have better marriages. (PDF of research paper.)

 This is a contradiction of the earlier passages because we know these habits will not make wives feeel loved, but instead, it will only make her even more frustrated than she already is. Appeasement is not the way to win a woman's heart.

CH Maxim #54: A woman's happiness is inversely proportional to efforts to accommodate her demands. Corollary to Maxim #54: The more a woman's demands are catered, the more irrational will her future demands become.

The Boring Loyal Dude

Will Smith showcases the shame of being Blue Pilled.

As a case study of the boring loyal dude, I present to readers Mr. Will Smith, AKA The Fresh Prince of Bel Aire. Given Will Smith's stellar career in the arts, music, and entertainment that stretches back to the late 1980s, most readers here might not think of Will Smith as a boring loyal dude. However, what you are about to read should convince you of this unfortunate truth.

Let's briefly review Will and Jada's lovelorn relationship.

1994: Will meets Jada Pinkett on a set of The Fresh Prince of Bel-Air when Jada auditions to play Smith's girlfriend. A few months later, Will divorces his first wife, Sheree Zampino.

December 31, 1997: Will and Jada get married in her hometown of Baltimore on New Year's Eve. In a 2019 People cover story, Jada recalls "infuriating pressure" to marry Will after getting pregnant with their son Jaden. "I never wanted to get married. But my mother was like, 'You have to get married' — she's so old-school — and Will wanted a family. So I said, 'All right, maybe it's something I should do.'" IOW, she settled.

As can be seen, their relationship had an ambiguous start. Jada was reluctant to marry Will, but they got married because of pregnancy. After about 14 years together, their relationship slowly disintegrated.

2011: Rumors circulated that Jada was dating her Hawthorne co-star, Latin music superstar and J.Lo's husband at the time, Marc Anthony.

2013: Rumors surface that Will Smith had an affair with Margot Robbie while filming Focus. There was also talk about Will and Jada having an Open Relationship (OR).

Very high value men might have affairs with other women, but they would never call it an "Open Relationship" because this implies that the wife is making the rounds too and that he is OK with getting cucked. Thus, an OR is hardly ever spearheaded by married men with children. More often than not, ORs are instigated by bored housewives longing to relive their days on the CC. The husband is forced to accept it in order to preserve the semblance of a family, whether or not he has a corresponding side piece in tow.

2015: The 43-year old Jada meets a 22-year-old August Alsina for the first time and an "entanglement" ensues and continues until 2022.

Compare the difference in Jada's attire and body language when she's with Will (left) and when she's with Alsina (right). With Will, she's dressed rather plainly as far as starlets go. She shows utter boredom and subtle contempt. Her eyes are dull and lifeless. She's wishing she were somewhere else — anywhere else. With Alsina, she's wearing a black and gold teaser showing lots of skin. She has an ear-to-ear mischievious smile, eyes full of hedonic lust, and she bends her left knee and opens her legs to him. Notice how her right foot is pointed squarely at Alsina and touching his foot, indicating that she's totally open to him.

July 21, 2017: While promoting her upcoming film Girls Trip, Jada goes on Watch What Happens Live! and says that the craziest rumor she's ever heard about her and Will is that they're swingers. "That's the craziest one," says

Jada. "It's constant. And I'm like, 'yo, I wish. I wish.'"

December 21, 2017: Will posts a long, simp-worthy Instagram for his 20th wedding anniversary with Jada.

> "Love is Like Gardening… I have learned to focus on HELPING you to BLOSSOM into what YOU want to be (into what you were born to be)… Rather than Demanding that you become what my Fragile Ego needs you to be."

Between 2019 and 2022, Alsina writes three songs with references to his "entanglement" with Jada, indicating that their affair is ongoing.

June 30, 2020: The "entanglement" begins to unravel. While promoting his upcoming album The Product III: State of EMERGEency, August Alsina sits down with The Breakfast Club's Angela Yee and claims that he "gave years of his life" to Jada in a romantic relationship with Will Smith's blessing!

On a side note, observant viewers may notice the change in Alsina's appearance since he first met Jada (see previous photo). Before, he was rather masculine, but clueless. After, he's much more aware of himself, but he's soft and feminized (e.g. he's self-conscious, touches his hands, talks about his feelings, has feminized gestures, bleached hair with pink highlights, pink glasses, gaudy dangling jewelry…). This is the effect that cucking cougars have on young men.

On another side note, the fact that Alsina is openly talking about his "entanglement" with Jada is a sign that he has grown out of the infatuation and is now moving on. In essence, this is a confession that releases him from her P power. IOW, their relationship is over. This is one reason why men and women having illicit relationships prefer to keep it all secret, because once they spill the beans, the magical power of sin is gone.

July 10, 2020: The now infamous Red Table Talk occurs. Jada Pinkett Smith openly confesses to having a "relationship" with August Alsina, a man 21 years her junior! Certified cougar status. Although Jada confirms that she had a "relationship" with Alsina, she denies that Will ever gave his blessing, claiming the two were separated at the time. Her confession confirms that her relationship with Alsina has run its course and she's moving on too.

Here, Jada confess her relationship with Alsina as a "healing relationship" and she avoids calling it an "affair". All throughout the talk, Jada is evasive and using soft coded euphemisms for her sins. She would not talk this way if she and Will had already "agreed" to have an open relationship. This is why I believe Will never agreed to having an "OR".

As you can see, Smith is obviously heartbroken in the Red Table Talk video. The editing and commentary brings it out.

As for Jada, she is laughing and carrying on, but every time she looks at Will, there's contempt in her eyes. No respect at all. That look at 3:11 says, "He's cool with everything. Whew… I got away with it!"

At 3:35, Jada explicitly says, "This is not about getting anybody back…"

Will responds, "For me it is."

She shakes her head and says, "If that's what you want…"

I wouldn't be surprised at all if she was thinking to herself something like, "You're such a boring loyal man… I deserved this affair!"

I'm sure she expected to get a much softer, more compliant response from Will by telling him about her adulteries on a live feed. Furthermore, she's attempting to play it down like it's no big deal — and he goes along with it, laughs and makes jokes about it! Certified simp status!

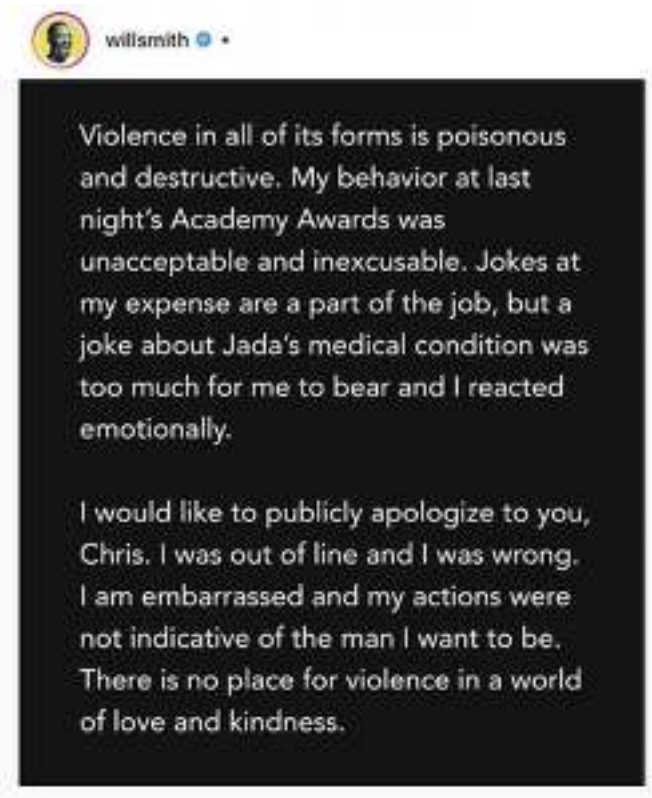
So in the end, Will chose to stick with his explicitly disloyal wife who cucked him off with one too many men and then slyly bragged about it to his face in front of the world. Now he's the epitomy of ignominous shame!

After such a flagrant figurative slap in the face in public, it's not to be unexpected that Smith would resort to a literal slap in the face in an effort to assert his masculinity and retain his dignity. Guilt, shame, turbulent jealousy, harsh cruelty, and physical violence are the ripple effects of sexual sin, gradually propagating outward from the source to everyone near.

March 28, 2022: Chris Rock makes a bad joke about Jada at the 2022 Oscars. In response, Will Smith slaps Chris Rock on stage and cusses him out. F bombs and all. Will brought "West Philly" to the Oscar's. Then Smith wins an Oscar, and in his award speech, he goes on about race, and his people, and standing up for women, and everyone applauds.

It is morally inept to have an accepting complacent attitude about blatant sin, which Smith has been in the altruistic habit of displaying. So it is satisfying to see him finally grow some balls and take action. But IMO, this is a soft response. Chris Rock, as well as all the other men who were pussyfooting with his wife, should be served a knuckle sandwich with a little more sauteed knuckle in it. If not, then there needs to be delivered some kind of message in no uncertain terms that such behaviors will be met with consequences and retribution. Also, the deft responsiveness of this action assigns guilt to those who are guilty. (Rock's red face and stumbling hesitation after being struck indicates that he felt guilty for a moment.) Otherwise, said behaviors will continue with added reckless abandon. The responsibility for taking said action lies primarily on the cucked husband and his true friends.

But the boring loyal dude won't do this. Instead, he covers the transgressions in his search for love (Proverbs 17:9). In this case, it is a wife's love which was carelessly withheld from him and freely given to another man (or men). The next day, Will Smith apologizes to Chris Rock in a tweet.



The expected natural result is that the forning, cucking, and clucking will continue. The disrespect will grow, and the extramarital affairs will carry on unabashed. Jada will become known as another Hollywood hoe hoe, and Will's reputation and state of affairs will gradually decline into ignominy. He can't blame God for this.

Epilogue

Will Smith spent 30 years building up a brand as one of the most likable, most bankable stars ever. And he very well might have just destroyed that through his hapless marriages.

Smith's main failures are as follows, in decreasing order of catastrophic significance.

1. Not being able to keep his d!ck in his pants.
2. The blindness resulting from his misplaced priorities on women, sex, and maybe fame as well, led to his poor choice of a wife — twice!
3. He's not been able to run a tight ship in his marriage.

Of course, not all the blame falls on Will. It is obvious that Jada did not respect him from her heart, as she was hesitant to marry him. (See Scott's Axiom.) But I also suspect something happened between them that turned out to be the last straw. Either Will did something, or failed to do something along the way that caused his wife to lose what little remaining respect she had for him, or she just got tired of pretending to be a wife and mother. Or both. It could have been her affair in 2011, or his in 2013, or maybe animosities had been simmering for a long while before this, or maybe he took a clumsy stab at establishing Headship, and this is what prompted the affairs. It's hard to say.

In spite of this debacle, and his lackluster response to it, I have to say that among all the famous men in secular culture, Will Smith has been an exemplary role model for young men throughout his career, and he is still to be admired for his contribution to the arts and entertainment. During his early career in music, he was renown for being the only "clean" rapper in town. Ironically, his upstanding clean-cut image is exactly what makes him "boring".

Conclusions

It should be well noted that Feminism is founded upon an unshakable faith in men's benevolence and the inexhaustible supply of good will from men. As such, the boring loyal dude is inadvertently promulgating Feminism. Will Smith makes this abundantly clear.

Hallmark traits of the boring loyal dude include…

- He is altruistic without purpose.
- He has a weak commitment to his own purposes.

- He has a poor self-esteem, i.e. a poor understanding of himself.
- He makes stupid concessions, such as agreeing to be in an "Open Relationship".
- His thoughts and purposes are fem-centric or self-centered, poorly developed, or entirely absent.
- He fails to teach and discipline the female, especially in response to her disrespect and poor behavior.
- He is quick to forgive, ignore, or cover an offense, usually done in an effort to preserve the relationship or (re)create love.
- He will easily abandon, modify, or postpone his purposes in favor of the woman's preferences, or under duress of her empty threats and fitness tests.
- He has a poor recognition of personal boundaries and therefore neglects to define, maintain, and enforce boundaries in a relationship on an ongoing basis.
- His authority is weak or faltering because he prioritizes his relationship over his mission. This also undermines his ability to employ various forms of married Game.
- He doesn't understand that forming a vision, determination, detachment, and setting boundaries are necessary to maintain Frame and make progress towards his life purposes.

Moreover, just as the "nice guy" is not at all nice, the boring loyal dude is not at all loyal, and may not appear boring either. On the outside, he appears to be extremely faithful and/or loyal, but this is a facade. In many cases, extreme irrational loyalty is based on guilt, false guilt, or a deep, incorrigible hunger for love. Inside, the loyal dude struggles to maintain an attitude of detachment, or worse, he doesn't recognize that authentic faithfulness requires some amount of detachment. Smith wouldn't be half as loyal to his wife if he himself didn't engage in extramarital affairs.

Last of all, deti gave us a biblical archetype of the boring loyal dude in the story of Samson and Delilah. In this parallel, Jada is Delilah; Will Smith is Samson. Smith is a broken man, and Jada broke him. Or, rather, he allowed Jada to break him. His wife cucked him and humiliated him in public numerous times and then forced him to sit there while she had a tell all about it on her Facebook show and wouldn't even be completely honest about it. The entire sordid series of events has destroyed Smith. Or, he's allowed it to destroy him.

Topics for Discussion

There's much to be learned from poor Will hunting for love (and sex), holding fast to the dreamy Blue Pilled notion that altruism and loyalty will cut the wedding cake anew.

As such, there's so much to talk about here…

About their marriage

1. They had a defacto "open relationship", even though they avoided calling it this.
2. They were "on a break".
3. Jada is literally Tupac Shakur's alpha widow – she's still pining away for him!

About the affair(s)

1. Was there any basis to all the rumors?
2. Will had an affair in 2013.
3. Jada cucked Will. Cougarville. Motor boat. Show boat. Big time.
4. It's taken for granted that the illicit lovers, Jada and August roundly escape censure, but all the shame and disgrace alights on the cucked husband Will.
5. Meanwhile, men of lesser status committing much lesser transgressions are lectured about womens rights and sexual harassment.

About the Red Table Talk

1. Jada insisted that Will go on her show and talk about her cucking him!
2. Jada displayed a complete lack of remorse.
3. Jada's use of euphemisms and doublespeak to avoid telling the truth about her conduct.
4. Why did Jada choose to "confess" this publicly on her show? Was it just to rub it in his face?

About the incident with Chris Rock at the Oscars

1. Was this real, or was this staged and scripted to boost falling Oscar show ratings? (Rollo thinks it's staged.)
2. Jada's manipulation of her husband – one minute Smith is chuckling; then after Jada rolls her eyes and shows her disapproval at Rock's comments; Smith has to "white knight" for her because "Mama's unhappy".
3. August Alsina may not have been there in person, but he was at least one proverbial elephant in the room.
4. If anyone else did what Smith did he would be escorted out and charged with assault. Smith had the full authority to smack Rock because of his status of (1) being an Oscar nominee, and (2) being Jada's husband.
5. If a man did that to a woman who was trash talking his wife, he would be in handcuffs, and there would be GoFundMe's for the slapped woman, "even if she deserved it".

About the significance

1. Toxic masculinity.
2. Toxic femininity.
3. What is the effect of race on all this? Would it be different if the participants were white? Asian? Other races? Mixed race?

Feel free to spend a while Red Pilling this whole mess. Anything we can glean from it will help us further understand the boring loyal dude archetype.

A Description of the Armchair Philosopher

An Armchair Philosopher (AP) is one who has developed a thorough understanding of life and the world through everyday experiences, and has therefore formed a rather complex personal philosophy, in spite of not necessarily having any formal education to back it up.

AP's reasoning relies heavily on a priori knowledge (e.g. deductive reasoning, mathematics, tautologies), as opposed to a posteriori knowledge which depends on empirical evidence (e.g. professional sciences). The 21st century British philosopher Galen Strawson described a priori knowledge this way:

> "An a priori argument is one that you can see is true by just lying on your couch. You don't have to get up off your couch and go outside and examine the way things are in the physical world."

Now days, the pejorative label, "Armchair Philosopher", is often used to discredit or disparage any person expressing their own off-the-cuff philosophy (discovered and formulated by the person who is expressing it), so as to recast such views as unfounded, unscientific, or untrue heresay. However, although the methods of an armchair philosopher are different from those of an empirical scientist, they can complement each other to produce new insights or explain obscure truths.

When considering the historical development of the empirical sciences, armchair philosophers and theorizers have played an important foundational role in formulating original theories that have explained perplexing observations. These theories were then tested more rigorously with further scientific investigation, and the findings became the basis of a new field of science.

In fact, the foundations for the eventual professionalization of psychology and the social science disciplines can be traced to 'armchair scholars' of the nineteenth century. The basic theories for the "hard" sciences originated from 'armchair scholars' of the eighteenth century. The scientific method itself was spawned from the 'armchair philosophies' and resulting communications (thanks to the printing press) of several polymaths of the seventeenth century.

René Descartes (1596-1650), a French polymath widely regarded as one of the founders of modern philosophy. It could very well be possible that the Armchair Philosophers authoring and commenting on Red Pill blogs could become the founding fathers of a new scientific field of Intersexual Dynamics or Sexual Metaphysics, or the like. Many of their theories are already being scientifically examined by experts in Sociology.

The Contemporary Armchair Philosopher

Granted, most Armchair Philosophers living today are nothing like Bacon, Descartes, Einstein, Euler, Gauss, Gibbs, Hertz, Laplace, Leibniz, Maxwell, Newton, or Shockley, all of whom produced original theories that eventually formed various modern fields of science. However, they do share many of the same traits as the old masters, namely being argumentative, critical thinkers, cynical, eccentric, sharply observant, rational, and sarcastic.

Because the AP is so thoroughly logical, rational, and sane, they cast off social restraints, ignore or gloss over emotional issues, and run roughshod over ethical implications as a matter of course. As such, it's hard for others not to become emotionally involved and not to take offense at the insulated Spockish outlook of the AP. Therefore, whatever APs share or comment about abstracted mysticism or the apparent madness all around them, it is often met with strong emotions that evoke more arguments and emoting, leading to a negative energy vortex.

To make matters worse, the AP frequently focuses on many polarizing issues going on in the world that evoke strong emotions. As a result, the AP frequently butts heads with others who are as equally passionate as they are, regarding whatever it is that is going on around them or in the larger world.

If that were not enough to stoke conflict, many APs hold opinions on marriage, race, religion, and sex that are so extreme as to represent a parody of right-wing or left-wing bigotry. As such, APs are the stinking armpit of political debates that strike ire among their opponents.

For all these reasons, those who are circumspectly wise may take due efforts to avoid getting sucked into the eviscerating implications of associating with the AP.

Fortunately, some APs recognize the importance of maintaining good rapport with others and take themselves to task to tone down their rhetoric. Otherwise, they tend to withdraw or else surround themselves with agreeable or compliant persons in order to preserve their own microcosm of reality.

Harold Watson “Trey” Gowdy III, former U.S. Representative from South Carolina (2011-2019) — an example of the Extroverted Armchair Philosopher.

The Two Types of Armchair Philosophers

There are basically two types of Armchair Philosophers, the extroverted type, and the introverted type. Archie Bunker and Jesse Lee Peterson are quintessential models of the extroverted type. Trey Gowdy and Donald Trump also match this image to a large degree. Those fitting the image of the introverted type are Woody Allen, Jordan Peterson, Kevin Samuels, Rollo Tomassi, and Bill Cosby. I’ve included a video of Archie Bunker and Woody Allen as an extreme example of the respective types for those readers who are unfamiliar with these characters. I’ve chosen video excerpts that are short on discourse and long on style in order to give readers a taste of the AP personae and avoid getting caught up in their rhetoric.

The EAPs philosophies are usually built around rough, working-class life experiences, while the IAP’s philosophies are often based on personal challenges or frustrations.

The Extroverted Armchair Philosopher (EAP) – The Bigoted Hawk

The typical EAP has a gruff, overbearing demeanor, largely defined by his principles, purposes, and prejudices. As such, he is trapped by his own mental paradigms, often sincerely believing that he is entirely in the right. He is ill-tempered and frequently berates his long-suffering friends and relatives to “get real” or “fall in line” with his larger world view.

EAPs are gifted with a talent for speech and argumentation, often using hyperboles, malapropisms, sarcasm, and spoonerisms quite effectively.

The Best and Worst of Archie Bunker (Length: 11:55)

The EAP takes great pride in having a resilient Frame that is readily applicable to any situation. In fact, a Frame backed ego is the core value of this type. When his Frame fails in the face of sweeping changes, undeniable evidence, or a mass consensus of disagreement, the EAP copes with the situation by losing his temper, mouthing his poisons, and looking for a scapegoat to fix the blame for his own discomfort. He isn’t necessarily an evil man. He’s witty, shrewd, and often times humorous. But he won't get to the root of his problem, because the root of his problem is his hardness of heart, and he doesn't know it.

At his best, the EAP is a striving, loving father, and a diligent, conscientious worker.

At his worst, the EAP is prone to drinking, gambling and swearing.

The EAP is the quintessential bigot of the worst sort, mocking and belittling a diverse groups of individuals. Any type of demographic group, including Whites, Blacks, Hispanics, Latinos, Asians, Jəws, immigrants, deplorables, rednecks, Conservatives, Liberals, Republicans, Democrats, Fascists, Antifascists, Communists, Marxists, feminists, g@ys, tr@nnys, Catholics, Protestants, Calvinists, Arminians, atheists, PUAs, chads, incels, hypergamous H0es, single mothers, Karens… — basically anyone or any group who is strikingly unlike himself — may become frequent targets of the EAPs barbs.

As such, the EAP fully embodies the cultural icon of the angry white male.

The prototypical Karen is the female equivalent of the EAP.

A Christian EAP may take pride in being religious, even if he rarely reads the Bible, prays, or attends church services. Accurate psychoanalyses using Biblical truths can be stinging, and even when he misquotes the Bible, the intended eisegesis can still ring true and hit the intended mark.

The Introverted Armchair Philosopher (IAP) – The King of the Mole Hill

The best of the IAPs can be very intriguing stand-up comedians. Thus, the virtuosity of the IAP archetype is shown through Woody Allen. They often seem to be lost in their own little world, but in fact, they are quite talented in writing and forming debate-style arguments, and are not as out of touch as they might appear. They are skilled in maintaining concentration and may be talented in playing cards and board games, and in performing magic tricks.

Woody Allen Montage (Length: 11:04)

It should be noted that Allen was very unlike other comedians of his day. He acted "normal", dressed casually, and made no attempt to project a stage "personality". Allen spoke to his audiences in a gentle and conversational style, often appearing to be searching for words, although he was well rehearsed and he did not improvise. His jokes were created from life experiences, and typically presented with a dead serious demeanor that made them funnier.

The subjects of Allen's discussions were rarely topical, political, or socially relevant. Most of his monologues did not discuss then-current events such as civil rights, women's rights, or the Cold War. In this aspect, Allen's example presents a valuable lesson to us in adapting frame — that one should avoid controversial topics such as religion and politics when surrounded by casual acquaintances.

Later comedians, such as Bill Cosby, Rodney Dangerfield, and Andrew Dice Clay coopted certain aspects of Allen's style with great effect.

A mature IAP who doesn't shy away from hot button topics can offer a biting, brutally honest, and satirical commentary on the cultural and psychological tenor of the times. When the IAP is confident and socially well adjusted, he can come off as a dark genius or mastermind.

At worst, the IAP is an anxious, fretful, insecure, intellectual, nervous nebbish (as Allen parodies in his acts). If he is sufficiently forward and expressive of his desires, he can fit the popular image of a sexual pervert, m0lester, or ped0ph!le.

If he chooses to openly display any of the above negative traits, he is not always well received or understood by his audiences. But in spite of his many social faux pas, the IAP finds redemption in his honest incisive truth telling, which in itself draws understanding, respect, and popular appeal, and is oftentimes comical.

It is not uncommon for IAPs to have had an estranged relationship with an authoritarian, ill-tempered mother who served to model their views of the world and hone their habit of forming debate strategies from their youth.

Andrew “Dice” Clay Silverstein stars in The Adventures of Ford Fairlane (1990). Clay is an example of the Introverted Armchair Philosopher.

Virtues of the Armchair Philosopher

The virtues of the Armchair Philosopher (if present) are his authenticity, gut level honesty, being forthright in his opinions, and having a master class resilient Frame. APs can be effective mentors and iconic fathers if they have their act together and can walk the talk.

Some APs are quietly beloved figures to much of middle America. Even groups and races of people targeted by an AP can genuinely like or respect the character of the AP if his logic is sound and his presentation is exceptional.

APs can garner love, grace, and even respect if their world view fits the values and interests of their audiences, or if they are open to changing their views when another individual touches their heart or treats them right.

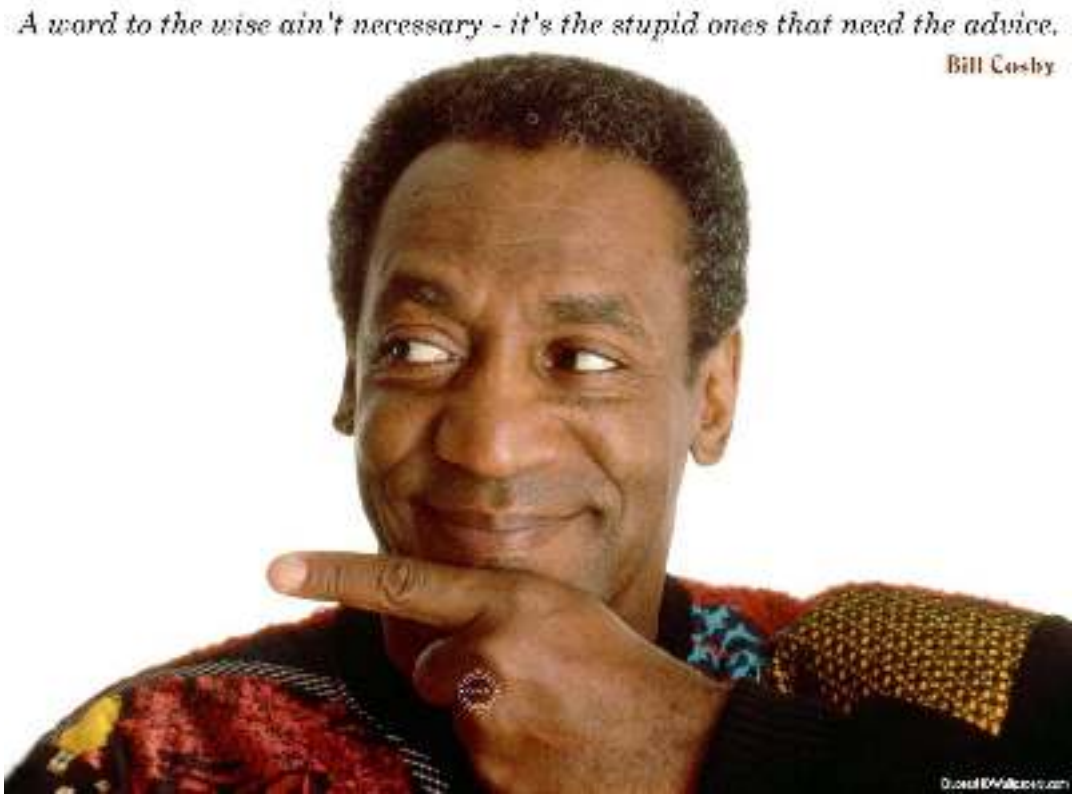
Vices of the Armchair Philosopher

The vices of the Armchair Philosopher (some of which are almost always present) are…

- Intransigence
- A harsh demeanor
- Stubborn cynicism
- Being a $h!t magnet
- Arrogance and pride
- Being prone to racism
- Being prone to bigotry
- Being continually annoying and difficult to deal with
- Having poor personal habits, such as drinking, smoking, cussing, gambling…

- Appearing to be (and sometimes really are) sexists, misogynists, perverts, etc.

The major spiritual fault that is often present in APs is that they are completely absorbed in their own minds, hard hearted, seldom engage from the heart, and therefore live in fear of being rolled by someone with a sharper wit. APs would do well to evaluate the effect they have on others, and identify exactly what is working towards their best interests.



William Henry “Bill” Cosby, American stand-up comedian, actor, author, and TV personality — an example of the Introverted Armchair Philosopher.

Conclusions

As you can see, the Armchair Philosopher is all Frame, and little else. All other facets of his Masculinity (Honor, Authority, Respect, Purpose) are riding on his strength of Frame. Depending on the issue and the context, his willingness to follow through on what he professes to believe (and therefore not lose frame by being a hypocrite) may also play a factor.

The archetypical APs are…

- Frequently blue collar
- Generally disagreeable
- Self-sufficient but not really
- Logical but not very reasonable
- Entranced within their own microcosm
- Either strongly liked, or vehemently disliked by others.
- Frequently at odds with family members and close associates.
- Men who have had a very difficult life, or a traumatic experience in their youth (being bullied, parental divorce, physical or emotional abuse, military combat, etc.).
- Prone to think, do, and say as they please, which tends to set them outside the common boundaries of ethical decency. This can turn out to be either a virtue or a vice.

Because of the APs well-honed mastery of the reframe, and their well thought out philosophies based on their genuine appreciation of how it is versus how things are supposed to be, there's a lot to be learned from these individuals about maintaining Frame.

Masculinity Rating

Frame is the make-it or break-it character trait for either type and is therefore the predominant determinant of one's masculinity. So an AP with a strong frame may appear more masculine than what is suggested in the rating below. Also, Authority, Respect, and Purpose appear as strong suits, especially for the EAP.

The Decadent Christian (Antinomianism)

Foreword

Upon first tackling a study of this archetype, I found it very difficult to describe in plain concise words. Although the outward behaviors are rather clearly self-evident, the deeper nature, mental cognitions, and motivations of this archetype are not.

Then I came across an incisive description of the Decadent Christian written by J. M. Smith over at The Orthosphere, The Disease of Decadent Christianity (2022-4-29), in which he identifies two kinds of Decadent Christianity.

> "…history has shown that Christianity is subject to two fatal perversions, antinomianism and what Nietzsche called ressentiment."

To clearly articulate the decadent Christian, Smith uses the concepts of antinomianism and ressentiment (to be explained later). Upon further examination of these descriptions, and pondering on my own experiences, I've found that there are three different types of decadent Christians.

1. The Hedonist (described by antinomianism).
2. The Anarchist (described by ressentimentalism*).
3. The Legalist (described by legalism)

So this post will describe the antinomianist* / hedonist, and the next post will cover the ressentimentalist* / anarchist. Later I'll study the Pharisaical legalist. I'll cite key excerpts of J. M. Smith's article in this description.

 Suffixes are used to form different inflexions.*

It's all good fun when you're young.

Antinomianism

The Antinomian is a type of nominal Christian who hardly lives any differently from his worldly peers, and therefore engages in casual drug use, consuming pornography, drunkenness, engaging in fornication, extramarital sex, hard partying and carousing, and other forms of licentious dissipation.

It should be noted that Antinomians who call themselves Christians would hardly ever identify themselves as Antinomians or even hedonists. They even might be hesitant to call themselves Christians outside of church.

However, church-going Antimonianists who are familiar with the scriptures have been known to distort the meaning of "Christian freedom" and "spiritual liberty" to justify such a lifestyle. J. M. Smith describes this concisely as follows.

> "Antinomianism is, of course, the false doctrine that the blood of Christ effectively abolishes the moral law for those who are saved, and that "Christian freedom" is therefore a boundless license to do just as the born again please. This doctrine especially prospers among passionate peoples in whom the moral law is weak or altogether absent, but one must admit that it is powerfully fertilized by such Christian notions as election, assurance, and the conviction that one is "saved."

J. M. Smith quotes two classical authors to describe the internal motivations of the Antinomianist.

> [In Lanterns on the Levee: Recollections of a Planter's Son (1941), the author, William Alexander Percy,] explains the antinomianism of many American Christians by relating a conversation he had with a clergyman in Mississippi.
> "I asked a clergyman recently why it was that so many prominent church-goers were crooks in business and hypocrites in private life. He replied: 'They have been born again.'
> This clarified nothing for me and I told him as much. He explained sadly: "When they are born again, they are certain of salvation, and when you are certain of salvation you may do as you like.'

> But I urged horrified, 'People don't really believe that!'
> 'Hundreds of thousands of them,' he rejoined, obviously as grieved as I. 'The ethics of Jesus do not interest them when their rebirth guarantees them salvation.'"

Then the pleasures sweep you away without you being aware of it.

One of the ironies of the Christian experience is that coming closer to God opens the innermost places in one's heart, thereby revealing one's sin and other destructive and unethical behaviors (viz. transgressions). In fact, this is a fundamental element of the full confession of sin and salvation. After this spiritual awakening, it takes time for a person to learn and grow into a mature and ethical Christ-like Christian who is capable of discernment and exercising moral agency.

However, what we often see is that many Christians prefer to indulge themselves in the grace of God for as long as they can get away with it, and do not take the command to be obedient very seriously. This of course, leads others to doubt the eternal value of God's love and grace, and to even blaspheme the Gospel, Christianity, and/or the nature of salvation.

> "Antinomianism is a doctrine of decadent Christianity — [In A Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World (1808), the perceptive author, John Evans,] says it is "nothing more than Calvinism run to seed" — and I will be the first to admit that it is by such means that decadent Christianity accelerates decadence in the wider culture."

In summary, the emotional liberation of living by faith, combined with the rational justification of being "saved", empowers one to approach life with liberal ethics and laissez faire morality. This potent cocktail of faith and fun has the strong effect of encouraging rampant sin in the wider community and culture.

Then it becomes a habit and a way of life which slowly consumes you over the years.

Epilogue

Among non-Christians, hedonism is the norm, especially for younger people. Motivations include…

- FOMO and YOLO
- Avoiding responsibilities
- Building rapport among peers
- The excitement and fun of it all
- Being socially accepted and included
- Evading a deeper awareness of one's self which is often painful

In addition to the above motivations, I will venture to guess that the preponderant cause of antinomian sentiments among Christians is because of spiritual immaturity. More precisely, it is because of an incomplete and/or unbalanced discernment. There is a discernment of life, joy, and social relevancy, and even grace and mercy for one's self, but yet, there is no discernment of any of the following.

- One's purpose for living.
- The need for self-discipline.
- That poor choices carry consequences.
- How one's sin affects others who are weaker in faith.
- How every choice carries a cost of opportunity in life.
- That one is not only accountable to one's self, but also to God.
- How one's choices and behaviors affect one's spiritual condition.

J. M. Smith notes that this the difference between fear-obedience and love-obedience.

> "An antinomian is like a child who outgrows fear-obedience without growing into love-obedience."

Eventually leaving you alone, destitute, and empty inside.

Conclusions

In summary, Antinomianism has several major confounding issues.

1. Freewheeling faith augments and exacerbates the rip-roaring rollicking of the surrounding social group.
2. Sin and dissipation is encouraged and perpetuated by the wider secular culture which promotes and never censures certain sins and therefore never presents an opportunity for repentance.
3. The Antimonianist is blind to all of this. The continual indulgences in self-gratifying sinful behaviors promulgate a lack of discernment, thereby preventing one from becoming further aware of the incongruencies between sin and faith.
4. This lenient and permissive attitude towards sin and dissipation creates a spiritual state in which one's spiritual growth, and that of others too, is hampered by said sin.
5. The combination of the above issues, in conjunction with the added opportunities provided by faith and the psychological support offered by an errant scriptural justification, then leads to a condition in which the Antimonian lifestyle becomes a self-reinforcing cycle or stronghold.
6. The overall message of J. M. Smith's article is that Antinomian / hedonistic types of nominal Christians give Christianity a bad name and reputation. I'll add that it also detracts from the message of the Gospel and repels those with a moral conscience. In the extreme, it can lead others to blaspheme the name of Christ and Christianity as evil and immoral.

Foreword

When I started this study of The Decadent Christian, I expected decadence to be related to hedonism, as I covered in the last post. But during my research, I came across an incisive description of The Disease of Decadent Christianity (2022-4-29), written by J. M. Smith over at The Orthosphere, in which he described another type of decadence related to ressentiment (to be described in the following section).

After gaining a better understanding of ressentiment, I've come to see it as a kind of social Anarchy, and that it is practically everywhere! This type of decadence is even more prevalent than hedonism and perhaps even more damaging and definitely more debasing.

So this post will borrow excerpts from Smith's essay to explore the nature and motivations of the ressentimental Christian. [Images and section titles added.]

Ressentiment

In The Disease of Decadent Christianity (2022-4-29), J. M. Smith at The Orthosphere describes ressentiment as follows.

> "Decadent Christianity also exhibits the perversion of ressentiment, by which is meant a system of inverted values in which everything low is exalted, and everything high is pulled down. This is Nietzsche's argument that Christianity is at bottom a "slave morality" with which inferior men take their revenge on the natural nobles with a "transvaluation of values."
> "It is important to understand the difference between resentment and ressentiment. An ugly woman may resent the fact that she is ugly, but ressentiment would be the system of inverted values with which she (and others like her) attempts to take revenge by denigrating the beauty of beautiful women. A stupid man may resent the fact that he is stupid, but ressentiment would be the system of inverted values with which he (and others like him) attempts to take revenge by denigrating the intelligence of intelligent men."

We have seen this inversion of values taken to a new level in the politically correct West.

- Masculinity is "toxic."
- Headship is "abusive."
- Christian morality is blasé.
- The common man is "deplorable."
- H0mosexuals are branded as "special."
- Illicit affairs are a "healing experience."
- Abortion is called "planned parenthood."
- Recognizing gender differences is "sexist."
- Being indignantly offended is a virtue signal.
- Authenticity is debased or dismissed as raw "white toxicity."
- "Natural" is commonly misinterpreted as barbaric individualism.
- Advocates and seekers of truth are tamped down by the tone police, even within the church!
- Virginity has become a byword. Virgins are ridiculed in public and sold to the highest bidder in private.
- Men who have a more natural and healthy attraction for young, beautiful, fertile, nubile women are compared to ephebophiles.
- Cacomorphiles insist on recasting obese women as "full-figured" or "shapely", and those blimpophobes who disagree are roundly dismissed as cruel and heartless.
- Jaded aging harlots are presented as "sex symbols", and sadly, many men have come to agree, even to prefer women who are "experienced", oversexed, and past their reproductive prime.

The shocker is that these metanyms are not euphemisms — every person is fully expected to adopt these terms as standard English vocabulary in order to be accepted into "polite" society! Anyone disagreeing with any of these delusions is denigrated as a misogynist, a racist, "Edwardian", "Victorian", etc.

Ressentiment within Christianity

Returning to J. M. Smith's essay.

> "Christianity opens the way to ressentiment when it teaches that ugliness and stupidity are not marks of God's curse, and that the ugly, the stupid, the poor, and the lame may therefore have as good a hope of heaven as those who are not so ill favored. The perversion of this teaching occurs when the lowly use Christianity as a pretext to act on their envy and take revenge on the natural nobles. They do this by instituting a system of inverted values in which their lowliness is a mark of holiness — in which ugliness, stupidity, poverty and infirmity are marks of a spiritual superiority."
> "This is the "revolt of all that creeps on the ground against what is elevated," and it of course mirrors the revolt of Satan and man against God.
> We can see that this ressentiment is a perverse and decadent Christianity if we look at its locus classicus, the beatitudes enumerated in the Sermon on the Mount. When Jesus says, "blessed are the meek", He is not saying that "the meek" are henceforth a new nobility that can lord it over those who are bold. Indeed, to say this would be a contradiction because the meek would no longer be meek if they declared that their meekness entitled them to power and prestige.
> Humble folk stop being humble the moment they begin to wear their humbleness as a crown!

How many "Christians" do you know who actively support inflammatory social movements that have no clear goals and even condone violence in support of these social causes?

Black Lives Matter riots in Seattle, 2020.

Summary of Ressentimental Decadency

Ressentiment is the end goal of liberal progressivism and it is also the preeminent zephyr overshadowing 21st century Christianity. As such, nearly every modern social and religious issue has roots in the ressentiment of some facet of life.

The ressentimenal individual discredits and disrespects the beautiful and excellent people of the world by calling them various derogatory names, “privileged” being the most popular one at present. Instead, the ignoble are celebrated and elevated, and those who disagree with these inverted values are shamed.

Those who engage in such kinds of social politicking are thereby acting as an ethical and moral anarchist.

- The ethical anarchist is the type of person who subscribes to non-Christian philosophies, such as Critical Race Theory, Feminism, cultural Progressivism, certain aspects of Wokeism, etc.
- The moral anarchist compromises long revered Christian principles by condoning, affirming, or even participating in social movements such as gender equality, pro-abortionism, g@y rights, and QTBGL+ flourishment, and the brash gasconade thereof.

Christians who do the same are participating as unwitting minions in the evils of Progressivism.

As Vox says, nominal Christian ressentimentalists and authentic Christians cannot coexist.

What is a White Knight?

The pattern for chivalrous manhood was set in the epic that introduced us to Sir Lancelot, the original White Knight.

The symbolic term "White Knight" (WK) was originally borrowed from this epic in the field of business. A WK is a friendly investor that acquires a corporation at a fair consideration with support from the corporation's board of directors and management. This may be during a period while it is facing a hostile acquisition from another potential acquirer (a "Black Knight") or it is facing bankruptcy. WKs are preferred by the board of directors (when directors are acting in good faith with regards to the interest of the corporation and its shareholders).

However, the Manospherian version of the WK has a darker conceptualization of a man who promotes gender equality but practices special privilege for women. IOW, a WK is a man who stands up for women's rights to be an absolute equal to men, but then comes to her rescue and/or defends her interests whenever equality becomes a burden.

In a word, WKs are wholly devoted, die hard, indignant pedestalizers of wimmin.

Real world examples of WKs are literally everywhere!

Much has already been written about the WK, so here I'll collate some noteworthy descriptions and quotes that are already available from the Manosphere.

How did White Knighting originate?

In the 20th century, Christian masculinity was characterized by chivalry. At that time, this functioned as a social grace to women, and it worked because males had authority and respect. Once feminism flipped the balance of power and authority between the sexes, the old practices common to chivalry continued, but in relation to the broader feminization and gynocentrism of the ever progressive culture, those who continued the evolved approach of chivalry inadvertently and unwitting became minions of progressive ressentiment. IOW, modernity has transformed the kindhearted protector of the weak into the simpy defender of the tyrants' whims and weaknesses. Thus earning the derogatory moniker of being a WK.

Dalrock is largely credited for identifying both the archaic and the modern versions of Chivalry as unchristian, and thereby popularizing the negative connotation of the WK.

White Knights Read Blue Pill Reality Only

In general, Blue Pilled men cannot read socially. IOW, they have no psychological theory of mind nor any spiritual discernment. However, the WK has a slightly more nuanced awareness of women, and can thereby read their expectations, but they lack the Red Pill awareness that would allow them to fulfill their underlying intentions of actually scoring points with women.

- WKs are totally ignorant of women's hypergamous nature, and will usually choose to remain ignorant when confronted with the ugly Red Pill truth.
- The WK errantly believes that he is promoting decency, the dignity of women, and traditional values. (However, the underlying motivation for being a WK is not so angelic, as I'll describe later.)
- In general, WKs are clueless about their own need for respect largely because they have crucified their desire to receive a woman's respect.
- Women regard the clueless WK as a Mr. Right Cuck who is easily manipulated and disposed of by various feminine control tactics of the handbag variety.

White Knights are continually AMOGing

WKs will always try to AMOG ("Alpha Male of the Group", or rather, BetaMOG) and champion the women in their social group whenever they're present. WKs are most likely to BMOG if they think it will earn them a good standing with women. They believe that their BMOGing will be sincerely appreciated by women and maybe earn them a girlfriend or get them laid. Unfortunately for them, all their efforts at BMOGing only seal their fate as a 'creepy'* Beta from women's point of view.

Meanwhile, WKs hate getting AMOGed / BMOGed by other men! So anyplace where men and women congregate together on a regular basis (e.g. work, social gatherings, etc.), and there are at least two WK, there is sure to be a scuffle between them as to whom is the most splendid social suffragette.

- WKs engage in c0ck blocking behaviors.
- WK confront other men who women perceive to be "kind of a creep"*, with the intention of playing defense / interference for women and preventing women from having to deal with them directly. (More on this later.)
- WK's don't mansplain, interrupt women, talk over women, nor try to modulate the discussion when women are involved.
- When WKs see another guy talking over a woman, etc. he interrupts him and says, "Hey, she was saying something." Rollo notes that when women incite men to do this, it's a version of "Lets you and him fight."

WKs will play this game until a true Alpha comes along and reveals their BMOGing for what it is – childish social posing.

Rollo describes this rude awakening as follows.

> "[Getting AMOG'd and possibly cucked] is one of the hardest lessons a Blue Pill man has to learn before he understands the importance of being Red Pill aware. Most 'Nice Guy' orbiters/friends never really need to be AMOG'd by a sexual rival because they're ignorant of the nature of Hypergamy. Even the ones who've experienced it personally from a woman, or having it flaunted in their face via commercial Open Hypergamy, these men still want their dream girl to somehow be different. Many a White Knight has been knocked from his horse after having the truth of women's sexual natures viscerally illustrated for him. It's the guys who go > into denial, who fall back on the "Quality Woman" rationale and get back on the white horse who are truly lost."

> "[White Knights have a transactional] mindset of the Beta sexual resource exchange – also known as the Savior Schema."
> The Rational Male: The Utility of Beta Men – Part I (2017-5-31)

 Rollo explains what a "creep" is in the same post.*

> "…what 'creepy' distills down to is a woman's Hypergamous-level revulsion of a man believing he may be someone she would eventually have sex with. Creepy is an insult to Hypergamy."

White Knights intentionally avoid any appearance of truly Masculine Aggression

In spite of all the prissy AMOGing (or BMOGing) going on, WKs are careful to avoid any behavior that might be seen by women as truly masculine aggression. After all, they must always maintain the nice loyal beta image so as to be seen as suitable boyfriend material. Consequently, their muted male aggression comes out in the form of low key disrespect, snide verbal insults, and passive aggressive paybacks, which ironically are all very feminine ways of dealing with conflict.

Rollo describes the underlying motivations as follows.

> "Anything even remotely, positively masculine or Alpha is still a 'man being a man' and this can always be reinterpreted as potentially aggressive or violent. In a feminine-primary social order where feminized men and women are taught that men are inherently evil and prone to anger and violence (the "culture" of masculinity) there's an army of women and White Knight sympathizing men who want nothing more than to stick it to the 'man' symbolically. And when they draw a paycheck from doing so they're all the more eager. Add to this that they feel a sense of moral justification in "making the world a better place" by burning him in an effigy of > all men and you get to where we are now."

> The Rational Male: Divorce Incorporated (2017-8-1)

White Knights are the Useful ~~Fools~~ Tools of the Feminine Imperative

In Riff on This (2017-10-27), Rollo reviews a gynocentric article from The Guardian, entitled, Men, you want to treat women better? Here's a list to start with (2017-10-16). Rollo's riffs point out how many of the "ways to treat women better" are right out of the WK's fool book repertoire.

I'll summarize Rollo's riffs relevant to the WK as follows.

- WKs can easily accept "feminism", and see no problem with it. They do not recognize it as a spiritual rebellion of epic proportions.
- WK express their affinities for feminism and women in general. This is seen most often in self-congratulatory social media posts.
- WK's actively seek to get women involved in whatever they are doing (e.g. work projects, social gatherings, etc.), and give them equal honor and credit for the outcome.
- WK's push for equal opportunity employment for women, and have been known to quit groups or resign from jobs that are comprised of men only.
- WK eagerly comply with the attempts of women to enlist the aid of sympathetic female-allies (who are the same men they implicitly distrust) to help police social discourse and intersexual interactions.

White Knights side with women on every issue.

WKs faithfully follow the motto, "Women are never wrong!" Thus, WKs allow women to control the narrative, control the definition of the language, and control what the consequences are. IOW, WKs have no frame control.

> "Women side with women. White Knights, weak Betas and naive Blue Pill fools side with women. Everyone agrees women are right and men are wrong.
> And this is the intended result: women are not to be held responsible for their actions. They are not to be held responsible at any cost – including the destruction of male lives."
> The Rational Male: Dangerous Times – Part 2 (2018-1-2)

WKs defend and justify women's bad decisions and protect them from the consequences thereof.

WKs expect that their efforts to support and defend the interests of women will get women to trust them. However, women can easily sniff this out and will become less likely to trust them for this specific reason. Women hate this but they tolerate it and say nothing about it because of the immediate social conveniences WK bring to them.

White Knights Act as the Feministas Social Police

WK wholeheartedly act as the feminist social police. The WKs primary tool of policing is through creating various distractions meant to refocus the intent of objectively (amorally) assessing what is otherwise an unflattering aspect of female nature, behavior and/or the motivators that prompt it. For this distraction to be effective, there must be a number of presumptions about what is considered to be appropriate behavior when interacting with women. One of the most ostentatious presumptions is a state of equivalency between men and women. According to this principle, others are expected to first presume a co-equal state between men and women, as well as a co-equal state of mutual goals. If someone deviates from these presumptions, the offending person is subtly distracted, interrupted, sidelined, or objectified somehow. For example, the WK might bring attention to a minor weakness or fault in the offender. "Hey, did you know your shoe is untied? I wouldn't want to see you trip and fall."

When distraction fails, WK will resort to subtler and more extreme measures of controlling the social environment. For example, it would not be beneath them to spread rumors, file anonymous complaints or reports, and/or incite anger and/or disappointment either within or at the offending party.

Rollo predicted that this behavior would become more extreme as time progresses.

> "As we move into 2018 – an era to be defined even more thoroughly by the Future is Female, #MeToo and Enthusiastic Consent – I believe we'll see a push for the following:
> Sexual harassment will indeed be a crime committed by Beta males who fail at a convincing 'Alpha' behavior. As such, the push will be to get Beta men to self-police their behavior via fear. There will be a doubling down on the part of Blue Pill White Knights and 'Feminist Allies' in the wake of the social and legal options. Women will have to be believed of men's sexual misconduct allegations by default. Feminized men will "try harder" and rat out their rivals for any hint of misconduct in an Orwellian effort to be more appealing and identifying with women."
> The Rational Male: Dangerous Times – Part 2 (2018-1-2)

As you can imagine, this takes the childish BMOG scuffle to a new, cut-throat level.

White Knights Conceal Envy with Virtue Signaling

WK's have a hidden dark side that they'll attempt to hide by various "acts of valor" and virtue signaling. These dark aspects include…

- WKs present themselves as "nice guys" more often than not. As Robert Glover revealed, "nice guys" are not at all nice.
- WKs have a desperate need for attention, social interaction, and physical contact with women, and this desperation is born from dealing with women who think they're "creepy".*
- WKs attempt to move into women's comfort zone, both emotionally and physically. They'll use an informal style of "friendliness" to be physically close to women and touch them casually, even women they don't know too well. They will constantly look for opportunities to touch women in ways that won't appear inappropriate or too desperate. But they'll never ask themselves why they feel the need to touch women in general.
- Many WKs are male-feminists / female-allies, and thus are usually facing sexual hara$$ment lawsuits within months of publicly declaring they are male feminists.
- The only reason men say (or even show in their daily lives) they are feminists is because it's a deductive form of Beta Game.

To counterbalance this internal conflict about wanting women, and yet continually being relegated to the dreaded "friend zone", WKs will enviously persecute other men who are able to make advances with women any further than what they are capable of themselves, especially men who they perceive to be "jerks". This envious desire stands as one of the most critical internal motivations for WK's BMOGing, female pedestalization, practicing chivalry, and clinging to their self-imposed false sense of righteousness.

The Popular Benefits of being a White Knight

What we see in society is that the WK persona has attained sort of a safe, clean roll in a cage. As long as he maintains a small number of schmoozy social disciplines, then people will leave him alone.

- He faithfully defends the ever shifting Feminine Imperatives of the day.
- He continually clucks on about the illusory yet popularized social ills, purporting himself to be a defender of such. He might even be so deluded that he sincerely believes the narratives.
- Most importantly, he is completely androgenous and asexual. He never once talks about sexuality, sexual conduct, or gender differences, nor does he ever demonstrate any genuine sexual desire.

This apathetic rejection is taken to be a mind-numbing convenience by the WK. He's not attacked, he's not ostensibly ostracized, so long as the minion valiantly defends the interests of wimmin and actively supports the larger universe of lies within the progressive microcosm.

Now, within marriage (if he should ever attain such a condition), it is a different story. The WK is regularly criticized and condemned by the Alpha widowhood induced, precipitation hardened battle axe (politely known as his “better half”), and is therefore cursed to live a meager existence of ignominy, all the while sucking his ego nourishment out of intellectual pursuits, porn, and video games, or so it is presumed about his secret troglodyte activities.

But outside of the home, in the wider society, the WK holds a somewhat privileged place of ineptitude. He is regarded as a “nice guy” who is not seen to be a risk or a danger to the liberal progressives within his vicinity, and is therefore dismissed from any further scrutiny. Thus, he may conveniently avoid being the target of their vituperative attacks, and therefore pat himself on the back for being the “good” flimsy pawn that he is. He cleverly reinvents his flimsiness as “being flexible” and “accommodating women’s weaknesses”, although he would never say as much.

This place of relative safety presents one of the strongest motivations for WKs to continue along their self-deceptive path of blabbering errancy cloaked by empty valor.

Masculinity Rating

The popularity of the WK as a faux-masculine archetype presents a very serious shift in the popular narrative about perspectives on masculinity.

Introduction

There's so much room for what's called a Male Feminist (MF). Everything from Chivalrous Cuckservatives, to Complementary Churchians, to liberal mouthpieces of "women should vote", to male versions of radical feminists (contemporary MFs who think there's "tons of work to be done"). Some Manospherian authors have even included Blue Pilled incels and Red Pilled PUAs to the list, for the mere fact that they're molding their lives around Feminine Imperatives. So, this is a broad category that might very well include the majority of men.

The differences between a Male Feminist and a White Knight (WK) are as follows.

- WKs have a covert contract. MFers do not.
- WKs conform to chivalrous ethics. MFers do not.
- WKs have a sense of honor, morality, and self-respect. MFers do not.
- MFers are predisposed to angry outbursts, and may resort to violence (and in the worst case, murder). WK would never go there.
- MFers willingly jump on the feminist bandwagon, or make some effort to give that appearance. WK might not.
- MFers will do anything they can to schmooze their way into a woman's panties, even to support a social cause against himself (i.e. feminism) in order to associate with more women. WK are content to work within their own social group.

Similar to the WK, women want MFs for their "allyship", resources, strength, and (im)moral encouragement, but the MFs have other biological motivations to be there.

One Stanford study showed that people who loudly proclaim anti-racist views are often, in practice, more racist than average [1]. Likewise, men who identify as feminist are more prone to sexual misbehavior, especially when they imagine their politically correct beliefs put them beyond reproach.

Where did the Male Feminist Originate?

Male feminists are as old as feminism itself. But up until recently, they've mostly gone under the social radar, except for occasionally receiving attention as a good intentioned but hopelessly pathetic and forlorn victim of unrequited love, which was not a very accurate representation, as we will see later on.

According to Khan [2], the Male Feminist first came to prominence during the cultural tremor of the GamerGate incident in late 2014. It was comprised of men who were otherwise minding their own business opting to fight back against excessive 'feminist' demands that they stop their recreation to spend more time producing resources for ungrateful 'feminists' to parasitically consume. The gamers found that 'feminists' were so unaccustomed to being challenged that they could only respond by demanding that other men defend them. Few men volunteered for this thankless task other than some 'male feminists' and cuckservatives acting as virtual White Knights. The gamers' response was so vehement that shortly afterward and ever since then, 'feminists' have been too hesitant to harass gamers any further.

Khan notes that this was a major victory, and a template of what works against misandry. Whenever possible, 'male feminists' should be exposed proactively and ruthlessly, especially since they are hated by women too, and thus are not a protected group.

Male Feminists are Liberal Socialists

MFers are likely to be liberal and/or socialists. Khan writes [2],

> "Studies have shown that physically weak men tend to be socialists (we include cluckservative socialists in this group). These studies don't go far enough, because they stop short of revealing that women are socialists for the same reason. Ultimately, the likelihood of a person being a collectivist is inversely proportional to how well they could survive in the jungle for an indefinite period. A man who could manage that situation well (whether due to physical strength, resourcefulness, etc.) is less likely to be a socialist in our modern world. A woman attractive enough to get such a man to take her in and share his resources with her is also less likely to be a socialist, whereas women who are unlikely to attract such a benefactor tend to favor socialism. As far as we may think we are from prehistoric times, 'Jungle Survivability' is still the governing factor in what system a person favors. This is also why people who opposed socialism in their prime become socialists in their old age."

Following this description, we can expect the typical MF to be remarkably less masculine and unusually less handsome than the average man.

Two Types of Male Feminists

Overall, there are essentially two types of Male Feminists, although there are countless subvarieties. The difference is largely one of power and status. If a MF has power and status, then this will allow him to attract and exploit women. If he is of the low power and status variety, then he is the one being exploited by wimmin.

The Low Power Male Feminist (LPMF)

The LPMF, AKA Mangina, is the prototypical, simpy soy boy who panders to women and who couldn't punch through a wet paper bag.

The LPMF truly believes in the glorious revolution of establishing a wimminocracy. He is stuck in his head, obsessing and philosophizing about every kind of feminist inspired ideology. He thinks feminism and all that goes with it is the dandiest, most sophisticated cultural wave around, and anyone who isn't a diligent follower never comes up on his radar, or else, they are dismissed as being "a minority", "backwoods", "living in the past", "out of touch", and such.

Cameron told us a story about a high school friend who fits the image of a LPMF. He's a simp. He brags online about how he sits down when he pees so he won't get pee on the toilet seat – to please his wife. He has learned his version of feminism from society and from his liberal mom and dad.

Most LPMFs are annoyingly common, and typically mediocre in attractiveness. They try to make up for their mediocrity by making hamfisted efforts to curry some (albeit limited) favor with the women in their life. They might mimic chivalry on the rare occasion, but tend to avoid it in general because they lack the masculine presence to make it effective, and they know their efforts never comes across as intended. Instead, it only makes him appear to be more of what he is — a thirsty male who, if he's a good boy, will get a little affection, attention, and praise, (all the while hoping for sex, but in vain).

A Male Feminist's Viewpoint: Being a Privileged Ally | Domenic Roberto | TEDxYouth@BHS (2015-6-25; Length: 12:36)

As you can see from the video, too much time spent around women and seriously entertaining their arguments has made him soft, effeminate, emotionally oversensitive, and cowardly.

It can get worse, much worse. An article at The Other McCain [3] describes a "male feminist" named Charles Clymer. If you'll click on the link to his Twitter profile, you'll see that in the 7 years since that article was written, Charles has morphed into Charlotte!

The High Power Male Feminist (HPMF)

HPMF are not always fully sincere in their feminist convictions – they don't need to be, because of their status — but they are capable of putting on a convincing show of agree and amplify whenever hot button issues come up in conversation.

The HPMF has access to female attention because of his status, both of which allow him to appear much more confident and collected than the LPMF. Aziz Ansari and Harvey Weinstein are prime examples of the HPMF. HPMF might be subcategorized into those having a bit of Game and those who don't. The former can get away with their shenanigans for a much longer time. For example, Aziz Ansari got in trouble just for not being adept at seduction. But Harvey Weinstein should have gotten in trouble with the law over 20 years ago.

Exclusive: Video shows Harvey Weinstein behaving inappropriately (2018-9-13; Length: 8:36)

Here, we can clearly see Weinstein's skill in the pick up (e.g. establishing status, creating a sexualized interaction from the very beginning, casual physical intimacy indicating possession, push-pull/hot-cold, escalation, the power of suggestion, using a strong, soft, hypnotic voice, moving the interaction to somewhere private…). It's all straight out of a PUA's playbook.

The thing that makes this interaction so weird is not the banter and flirting. It is the fact that they only just met for the first time after having one business oriented phone conversation! Another odd thing is that in the interview, she says she felt very uncomfortable about his advances, but in the video, she was giving clear IOIs (e.g. leaning in close to him, giving him full extended eye contact and smiling warmly…), and at no time does she ever draw a line nor establish some boundaries of decency. Instead, she falls in with his "friendly" act and goes along with it. She even decides to have another beer! He then interprets this lack of resistance as a signal to continue. Then she goes to his hotel to "finish business"… !!! She was clearly seduced, but in the interview, she won't admit that she was seduced. IMO, her only defense is that she didn't know when to escape.

Male Feminists are Wolves in Sheep's Clothing

Most men have to play the game in order to get anywhere with deceitful, dishonest women (the overwhelming majority). One could take the position that men who do this are desperate and thirsty, and thus masquerade as something they're not in order to get some action. Or then again, given the unchecked feral nature of modern women, one could reasonably ask, "What other choice do they really have?"

Well, with Male Feminists, the first viewpoint would be the correct one. When a man identifies himself as a feminist, you can start the clock on incoming credible sexual harassment/assault accusations. The fact that 'Male Feminists' are often creepy predators in disguise has become widely known and many such individuals have fortunately been exposed and convicted. Being an outspoken male supporter of gender equality is no shield against accusations of improper behavior, nor is it any defense against a social media mobbing [1].

We know leftist and feminist princesses are steeped in "privilege" boilerplate, and are therefore prone to claiming someone harassed them, molested them, raped them, "eye raped" them, and so on. MFers are the real evidence that such claims may indeed be true, thereby opening the floodgates of accusations directed at all men, MF or not. So you see, MFers are not only the enemy of women, but also of all self-respecting men.

Rollo described this rippling impact as follows.

> "What Weinstein and dozens of other accusation of (usually 'male feminist') men following in his wake has > reinforced is that masculinity makes us inherently evil. So evil, in fact, that men must be reeducated by the Feminine Imperative to ensure that one's fellow man (a prospective harasser/rapist/gunslinger) is acting in accordance with the dictates of the Great Masculine Scare of 2017."

> "…in this new shift it's no longer "toxic" masculinity, it's masculinity that is toxic."
> "The difference now is that just being a man makes one a potentially violent criminal – or a potential sexual harasser."
> The Rational Male: Riff on This (2017-10-27)

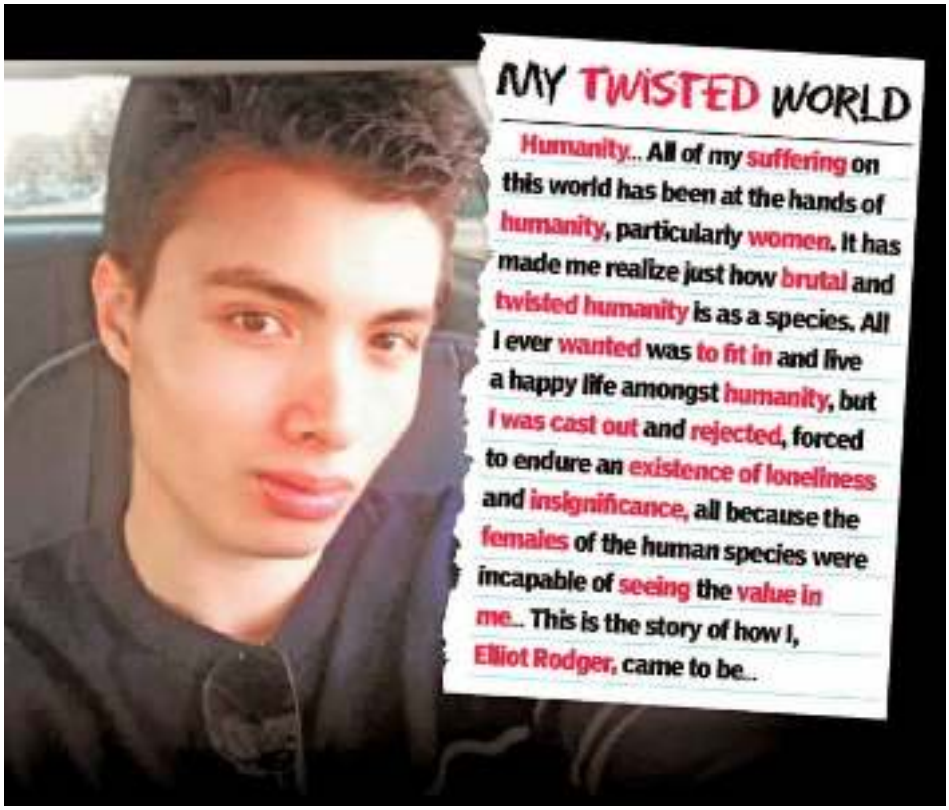
MFers are also the enemy of the wider society. Few incidents encapsulate everything wrong with 'feminism' so completely as the mass murders that sadly have become commonplace in recent years.

For example, the victims of the Isla Vista shooting amounted to 4 men and 2 women. Yet, the shooting is described as 'misogynist' because the shooter was a staunch 'male feminist' for many years but was continually rejected by wimmin. He actually hated pickup artists since they were succeeding where he was not.



E11i0t R0dgər, male feminist and perpetrator of the Isla Vista shooting.

Epilogue

Creepy male feminists are the epitome of 'feminist' ugliness and anti-enlightenment.

Overall, here are the typical traits of a MF.

- They are plebian, low quality men at best, and they are creepy harassers, sleazy molesters, or perverts at worst.
- They are deeply confused about gender / sex roles. (More obvious in the LPMF.)
- They make catering to women, female primacy, Feminine Imperatives, and/or having sex their primary purpose in life.
- MFs are Liberal Socialists in their socio-political orientation.
- They are driven to find acceptance and popularity (among other things) among the trendy progressive crowd.
- The only reason men say (or even show in their daily lives) they are feminists is because it's a deductive form of Beta Game.

- MFers play up being “friendly” and use this to casually touch women and be touchy-feely with them, including women they don’t know.
- MFs have a desperate need for physical proximity and contact with women, and this desperation is born from dealing with women who think they’re creepy.
- They’re totally obsessed with women, so they’ll never honestly ask themselves why they feel the need to touch women in general.
- It is not uncommon for male-feminists / female-allies to be facing accusations of sexual harassment and lawsuits within months of publicly declaring they are male feminists.

Final Admonitions [2]

It is best to steer clear from MFs altogether for a multitude of reasons.

Getting involved in Feminism will, among other drawbacks, make one far more accessible to predators, both male and female, since it is an ideology accustomed to immunity from accountability.

Also, be wary of organizations that say they are not “Feminist” but still espouse the same beliefs, as they are havens for predators all the same.

Glenn Reynolds of Instapundit keeps a running chronicle of the numerous instances where the true nature of such an individual is exposed, and women have written articles warning other women to avoid these sexual predators. The #MeToo movement excised quite a few of these predators, but many still remain.

The Lecherous Horndog

Jack · 25 May 2022 · Archived copy · Original

If women are so Pure and Lovely then why is talking about them so Filthy?

Readership: Men; Single Men;
Theme: Faux-Masculine Archetypes
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 4.5 minutes

There's a common impression that "All men want is sex, Sex, SEX!" This is most noticeable in secular culture, as there are countless examples of articles and blogs that make passing reference to this impression of men.

Here's one such example.

> "…women across the board are entirely fed up with trying to find that one single guy out there who isn't trying to have sex with them on the first date."
> Evie Magazine: How You Can Have Higher Value in the Sexual Marketplace

Or consider this now famous example from Suzanne Titkemeyer, presumably directed towards Larry Solomon (the author of Biblical Gender Roles)…

But this impression is not limited to secular culture. It also occurs within Christianity.

Yes, even Christian men have this assumption that men are horndogs, and frequently characterize certain men as such!

Here's a noteworthy example.

I consider Bruce Charlton to be a leading Christian philosopher of the day. I've cited his work on occasion. Over at Adam's place, he wrote this comment about MGTOW forums.

> "I can only assume that the authors and commenters are unaware of how self-revealing their quasi-scientific analyses of 'women' really are. How such a discourse can self-identify as Christian is evidence only of the vast human capacity for self-deception.
> I speak as an ex scholar and researcher in Evolutionary Psychology dating back to 1994 – with an interest in evolved sex differences – so it's not like I don't know of the research concerning the kind of stuff the MGTOW's incompetently purport to be concerned by; but so egregiously misrepresent.
> At a more personal level; I find it phony, creepy and unmanly to observe grown-up men gossiping (and sharing experiences) about women's behaviour at length and repeatedly. It's something that ought to be discouraged, not indulged under cover of pseudonyms."

I'm taken aback by Bruce's criticism!

Granted, MGTOW forums can be pretty raunchy, but at the most basic level, this is what men do. A man who never expresses any interest in such matters, and/or avoids discussion of the same, is either geriatric or is testosterone deficient.

Besides, thanks to "grown-up men gossiping (and sharing experiences) about women's behavior", we now have a wealth of information to help us understand and deal with women, i.e. The Red Pill.

But Charlton's idea of Masculinity is that a man should never touch on any analysis of women's behavior because that would be "self-revealing", nor should a man even talk with other men about his experiences with women, because that's "phony, creepy, and unmanly."

According to my understanding of Christianity, revealing one's self is an integral part of fellowship, trust, self-discovery, confession, repentance, and growth!

Personally speaking, writing this blog and discussing these matters with other Christian men helps to keep me sharp when assessing my own marriage and in dealing with my wife.

We should not be surprised to see such talk come out of secular men's mouths. But for Christian men, it's a little different. There are a multitude of Bible verses urging Christians to clean up their speech.

- Psalm 19:14
- Proverbs 15:2
- Matthew 12:36-37
- Matthew 15:11
- Luke 6:45
- Ephesians 5:4
- Philippians 4:8
- Colossians 3:8
- Colossians 4:6
- More!

Perhaps the most pertinent verse within this context is this one.

> "Let no corrupting talk come out of your mouths, but only such as is good for building up, as fits the occasion, > that it may give grace to those who hear."

> Ephesians 4:29 (ESV)

From this verse, we find four key conditions for such talk.

1. "no corrupting talk" — It leads men closer to knowing God, and away from sin.
2. "building up" — It serves to teach, exhort, and admonish other men.
3. "fits the occasion" — Be wary of the social context and the overall impact on others.
4. "may give grace" — It invites humility and introspection, and it revives vision and purpose.

On point (1), talking about such things can be either a confession or a profession. Those who are guilty and/or ashamed are unwilling to open up and talk about it. Those who talk about it may be less likely to do something wrong.

On point (2), there needs to be at least one discerning man in the group to steer conversations away from foolish and unprofitable talk, and guide men towards a greater knowledge of themselves and how to apply the truth to their lives.

On point (3), there are times and places when talking about sex and women is inappropriate and some topics and phrases are degrading. But that's exactly why men go to Red Pill or MGTOW forums etc. to discuss such things. That is the right place to engage in such conversations. Unfortunately, even many church sponsored men's groups do not offer a fitting occasion to delve into such matters.

As for point (4), men have a right to discuss what they want, how they want. A lot of men hang around to teach and train. Men do this for camaraderie, belonging, and fellowship. Why begrudge men that?

Conclusions

While I was brainstorming for different kinds of faux-Masculine archetypes, the Lecherous Horndog came to my mind as a prominent concept of males. But as I was studying this and reading up on some examples in which this characterization of men is used, I realized that it's not a true faux archetype; it's only a faux conceptualization of normal men's sexuality that is cast on men in order to demonize their sexuality. So this post will not include a Masculinity Rating.

Concerning the overall criticism of men being constantly obsessed with sex, I suspect that whenever such a characterization of a man (or men in general) is used, it is not devoid of ulterior motives. At least some of it is adopted as a form of virtue signaling and/or social distancing from the person in question. Other purposes for implementing this image may include…

- Attention — Chick crack
- Legalism / Purity Culture
- Self-Righteous feeels good
- Virtue Signaling — "I am better than him."
- Casting Offence — For the sake of creating drama.
- To cast shame and/or derision on the man or men being named.
- Making a distinction of what is perceived to be socially acceptable.
- Displaying indignance, which is a self gratifying expression of pride.
- Social Distancing — To distance one's self from the man or men being named.
- To identify one's self as being different from that, viz. not having that behavior.
- Maybe others?

All this basically boils down to deti's axiom and/or Scott's axiom — You're NOT a lecherous horn dog "only if she thinks you're hot."

Instead of taking such a statement personally, a man may do well to interpret such derision as an attribution error or a form of projection. Of course, discernment and introspection are required as usual.

In closing, I'll very kindly point out that women are 10 times worse! And not only in talk, but also in deed, and they'll keep it all top secret. And yet, a woman has to be undeniably, unmistakably, and utterly defiled before she'll be classified as a 304. Meanwhile, otherwise decent men are recast as perverts for merely thinking about sex or talking about women objectively. So even if Christian men took care to watch their mouths, this may be insufficient towards preventing them from being seen as a horndog. The reason is because one loose accusatory word from a woman does much damage, especially in these times when men are guilty simply by accusation.

BTW, the scripture verses above apply to women too.

Think Before You Sleep: How Simps Are Born (2020-2-28) Length: 15:30

Case Study 1 – Joey and Speed Dating at Comic Con

0:00

Joey: I'm Joey and I'm a huuuge geek!

Joey's friend: Whoever you find, she's got to be able to bring back home to Mom.

Joey: I'm not looking for much. I just want to find a girl who will give me hugs and kisses and isn't my mother.

[Joey's mother ridicules him for meeting women at a speed dating session at Comic Con.]

0:24

Joey: …my mom likes me where I am right now, living at home with her. So as far as she's concerned… any woman in my life is a threat.

0:32

Narrator: I think it's funny to watch someone who is over 300 pounds [Joey's mother] call girls who go to Comic Con “undesirable.” That lack of perspective is why your son is still living with you indefinitely at 25 years old.

1:07

Narrator: What does interest me in this situation is the deep desire for these guy’s mothers to keep them from developing socially so that they remain as adult children forever.

1:17

Jordan Peterson [1]: …so the Oedipal situation, roughly speaking, is when a child is seriously overprotected — usually a male child by his mother — and so the relationship between the husband and the wife was either strained or non-existent and the wife would often turn to the child to be what she isn’t getting from the husband.

Media image of Bates Motel.

Jordan Peterson [1]: The Oedipal mother basically entices the child and says, “Look, here’s the deal. You don’t have to do anything, but you don’t get to leave. But if you don’t leave and you don’t do these difficult things, then I’ll take care of you.” And so the reason she does that is because she’s lonesome and doesn’t have anybody else around and you know, maybe she’s also deeply, Deeply, DEEPLY terrified that if she helps that boy grow up, he will leave and she’ll have nothing.

2:00

Narrator: Our main character Joey’s situation is not the end result of having a large spider-man collection. I mean, the Avengers and the Marvel Cinematic Universe proved that there are a whole boatload of normies who are into comic book heroes, as long as the stories are good. What has actually happened is that no one has taught Joey, or taught any of the men who were on Geek Love, how to be men, and as Jorden Peterson suggested, this epidemic of adult children is occurring because there are no men in the house or the men are weak and the moms aren’t setting their sons up with a strength to deal with reality. In fact, a lot of those mothers are actively sabotaging their sons, because honestly, these guys aren’t incapable of being adults. Both of the examples of men I have on this video are guys who are completely capable of being independent, but their mothers are holding them back.

2:50

Narrator: They're selfishly holding their sons back so they can simp for them […] and what this is essentially saying is something really queer and kind of disgusting…

Scene from Oedipus Complex (2015).

3:02

Narrator: Joey admits that his mom is afraid of him leaving. She's afraid her son will leave because she knows she has very little value as a person. She knows she is so cruel and mean-spirited that she could never have real friends or build a strong relationship with other family members, or God forbid, her own husband! So what she does is takes her son's dependence on her from childhood, never lets him do anything difficult so he's always dependent on her, and finally beats him down at every point while he's dependent so he constantly seeks her approval. You can see her doing this on the show, even though she's being polite for the camera.

Joey: Don't you want me to find… a nice girl to bring home?

Joey's mother: [In a whiny voice] I don't think that's the place to find a nice girl…

3:47

Narrator: [Mocking Joey's mother] Why would you want to date a girl at Comic Con? Those girls are weird. They do drugs and… they aren't good for you!

Narrator: You see how she's giving him negative feedback when he tries to be independent? The end result of this is that his mom has him right where she wants him. He isn't able to do anything difficult because he always relies on her and he is so desperate for her approval that he does things that turn other people off. For example, he gets a date with a girl after the speed-dating session and for their very first date they go home to meet his mom and play video games!

4:00-5:40

[Scenes from Joey meeting a girl at the speed dating event and bringing her home to meet his parents and play video games.]

5:40

Narrator: Joey's need for approval is his mom's self-defense mechanism — to make sure that he simps for his mom instead of some other girl — because the first thing a girl is going to think when he brings her home to mommy on a first date is, "This guy is weird!"

5:55-6:17

[More scenes from Joey's date.]

6:00

Narrator: …you can really see the detrimental effect that Joey's mom has had on him because he was extremely lacking any dating experience at 25, which is something he feels bad about. But when he does the speed-dating event and shows his personality, he ends up being the most popular guy!

6:17-6:56

[Scenes from speed dating event at Comic Con.]

Joey's friend: Joey nails it! Every girl writes their number on his paper.

Joey leads a girl to his bedroom – to play video games!

6:30

Narrator: [Joey is] someone who is perfectly capable of achieving what he wants, but his mom, for her own selfish desires, is holding him back, while his dad basically just sits in the background.

6:45

Narrator: Now I haven't been able to figure out what has happened to Joey in the 7 years since this was filmed, but it seems to me that he was in the process of escaping his mother's grasp before this show was filmed. He lost 80 pounds and after the show was filmed, he moved out of his parent's house.

7:00

Joey: Hey, it's me, Joey! What speed dating at Comic-Con taught me was that… it's very hard to have to bring girls over to the house to introduce them to my mom, or to hang out here at my house if my mom's going to basically be questioning whether or not they're virgins or what their motives are with me or anything like that… This entire experience taught me that it's time to move out."

7:25

Narrator: Even though it appears that Joey made it out, I can't help but think about the people who don't make it, or the people who are less fortunate…

Case Study 2 – Alex

Alex: Hi! I'm Alex. I am 25 and I am a giiiant geek! My love life status is a mix of forever alone and socially awkward penguin…. It's meantastic! I'm a Renaissance geek! I like comics. I like board games. I love Doctor Who, and I am also brony [a male fan of My Little Pony].

Alex looks down and talks out of the side of his mouth when he says "I am a giiiant geek!" indicating self-hatred and shame.

8:00

Narrator: Now of course, it's very easy to make fun of Alex. He is a 25-year-old who lives with his parents. He's overweight. He has an awkward beard, and he watches My Little Pony. Unfortunately, you don't get to see Alex's parents like you do with Joey, but there is a reason the "mother's basement" stereotype exists. There's a formula to create guys like Alex and an overprotective Oedipal mother is how you do it.

8:26

Narrator: So of course you could make fun of them, but I don't think that behavior is productive, because it's guys like Alex who would do anything for a woman just to get her approval. This means he is an easy target to be manipulated by women and a great vessel for toxic female behavior to be developed. And if you think that it's just the attractive ones that engage in this bad behavior then you would be wrong.

8:50-13:12

[Scenes of Alex talking with Carolyn, a young woman at the Comic Con speed dating event.]

Carolyn: What kind of girl do you want to meet when you go to Con? [Chatter]

Alex: I guess you but not crazy and hyper.

Carolyn: So you essentially want my non-evil twin.

Alex: Yeah, I guess!

Carolyn: That's a little creepy, Alex. [Alex laughs.]

9:13

Alex: Some of my challenges with girls are just the girls that I really do like that I'm really interested in. I just wannabe friends.

9:20

Narrator: This girl Carolyn who is not an 8, 9, or 10, or even a 7, knows Alex really likes her. Instead of being completely honest with him and shutting him down so he doesn't sit there and orbit her for the rest of his life, she keeps him around and… gives him dating advice. Clearly no one has taught Alex anything about women, so he doesn't know this, but she is not doing this stuff because they are "friends". She's doing this because she likes the attention he gives her and she's giving him dating advice because she thinks he's pathetic.

9:50

[Scene where Carolyn discovers that Alex is a brony.]

Carolyn (in red) being hostile to Alex, but pretending to be pseudo-friendly. IOCs can be seen in her piercing gaze and sniveling lower lip. Her friend (in blue) glares at him with dismissive contempt. Alex is blindly obsessed and fails to read these IOCs.

10:04

Narrator: If she [Carolyn] really wanted to help, then she wouldn't friend zone him and participate in this weird relationship. But she isn't going to do that because women don't do things like that. [Instead,] they like collecting resources and she knows that she can eventually use Alex's attraction to her to get him to do stuff for free. The most productive thing we can do in this situation is to make sure guys like Alex don't become simps for women.

10:27

Narrator: This reminds me of a comment that gets thrown around by people who are anti-MGTOW where they say, "MGTOW are just incels in denial. They are only Red Pill because they can't get women."

10:40

Narrator: You know what? Mission accomplished! [Let's] Red Pill all the incels, because at least then they won't be enabling bad behavior from women. At the very least, maybe they will stop making everything about women and actually get their lives together. And this is not just some impossible feat for Alex or guys like him. Alex is not retarded. Alex is not autistic. He is just unskilled. The reason he doesn't converse well is because he hasn't practiced very much.

11:05

Narrator: Now there are two important aspects of building the skill.

1. Exposure to new experiences.
2. Repetition

11:13

Narrator: That is how skill develops, and you can actually see this happening with Alex during this episode when Alex goes on to his first speed date. He is absolutely terrible!

11:25

[Scene of Alex awkwardly initiating a conversation at Comic Con.]

11:30

Narrator: Just look at that! In his first conversation, he can barely even speak! But after a little practice he gets way better.

11:40

[Scenes of Alex making conversation at Comic Con.]

12:03

Narrator: He exposed himself to a new experience which was speed dating. He practiced with 30 different people during the event and by the end of the event he got significantly better. After that, he really only needs to fix one thing in terms of conversation, which is that he comes off as weird, and the reason that happens is because he's saying absolutely everything on his mind and he doesn't filter out unnecessary information.

Kate giving IOIs to Alex (doe eyes, open mouth, raised eyebrows).
12:28

[Scene of Alex moving in on Kate, a red head who is giving him IOIs.]

12:45

Narrator: [Jordan Peterson said] that he came to a point in his life where he decided to stop saying things that make him weak.

12:56

Narrator: In the previous clip you can see Alex sitting with the girl who likes him [Kate] and he offers to walk her back to her booth. Not exactly a date, but good enough for him. Then immediately after he offers to walk with her, he says, of course she could just walk back by herself. Do you see how that second statement destroys his offer to spend more time with her and makes him look weird? If he had simply not said that, he may not have gotten rejected by her as soon as they walked out of the room.

Jack: In spite of their nerdiness, I thought Alex and Kate would make a pretty good couple. But apparently, Alex's self-negation (plus the likelihood that she picked up with another guy instead) blew his chances with her. Self-negating statements like this put the brakes on Tingles. She laughed it off, but her IOIs immediately shifted to IOCs. You can feel her disappointment suddenly come through in a fake smile. She may have even taken it as an IOC from him. Maybe it was, and maybe not as an IOC towards her, but towards himself. Maybe she only offered to walk around Comic Con with him in order to have more attention through the camera.

Kate's fake smile at the end of the scene.

13:26

Alex: [Dejected] What happened at the speed dating was that, I'm talking to Kate basically on camera. [After the] cameras are off and we walked away… and what happened was that, basically, she told me after about a minute that she just wanted to be friends. So basically, kind of nothing ever happened. Of course I understand, but it was kind of depressing.

13:52

Narrator: …it's not just Alex who does this kind of stuff. He may be worse than the average person, but everyone is guilty at some point of doing what he did. The key to good conversation is to start thinking about the best things you can say versus whatever insecure ideas come into your head first. I mean, [everyone should get into the habit of] casting out all the bad ideas so we can focus on the things that actually matter and the things [we] have good evidence for. And this can be expanded to every aspect of your being. You can start systematically getting rid of the things that make you weak.

14:27

Narrator: Imagine what Alex's life would be like if you took a razor and shaved that awful looking beard! Imagine how much better he would be if he lost about 120 pounds! Imagine what his life would be like if he stopped spending $5,000 a year on video games and comics and instead invested that into himself! That's how you start living a life that's fulfilling instead of wallowing in self-pity while being taken advantage of by women you like who don't like you back. When you start focusing on bettering your own standing, you will stop caring about which women like you and which women don't.

Masculinity Rating

Simps have a wide spectrum of personalities with a mixed bag of traits. For example, some Simps (like Joey) can display quite a bit of frame control, especially within their field of interest, but other than this, Strength is a recurrent weakness. In terms of Honor, many of them have a solid sense of identity and self-esteem, but are sorely lacking in reputation and social status. Authority is also highly variable. Many Simps have developed considerable authority in formal education or within their areas of interest, however, they are embarassingly deficient in power and influence. Likewise with Respect, as some Simps have well-developed abilities and skills in specific areas, but overall, they lack certain other qualities that would allow them to earn respect from others. Similar to Strength, Purpose is also a weak suit with the possible expection of discipline, as any ambitions they might have are subsumed into their mother's frame.

The probabilities of distribution are skewed to the right, meaning that relatively fewer Simps have higher scores in these areas.

Strength: 0-6
Honor: 2-8
Authority: 0-8
Respect: 0-6
Purpose: 0-5

Characteristics of the Criminal / Thug Archetype

The common stereotypical traits of the C/T are…

- Lower intelligence on the average.
- Goals are immediate or short term.
- Generally low in Conscientiousness.
- A low level of restraint and self-control.
- Self-image is based on a prideful sense of autonomy.
- Motivated by deep insecurities, fear, panic, and dread.
- Often rely on coercion, intimidation, and outright terrorism.
- Grew up without a strong father figure or other male mentor.
- Lacks a clear moral purpose to guide and reinforce his actions.
- True misogynists, but frequently get away with it. (See below.)
- A heavy reliance on brute strength to accomplish short term goals.
- Usually subscribe to a Power vs. Fear ethical paradigm (i.e. a gangster mentality).
- Fail to think things through to the inevitable consequences and long term outcome.
- Purposes are based on self-centered illusions within an alternate paradigm of reality.
- Sexually promiscuous, afforded by the large number of women attracted to this type. (See below.)
- Usually subscribes to leftist / liberal ideologies, but many examples can be found among the far right.
- They have a low interest in religion and are usually atheists or agnostics, but there are a few examples of radical religionists.
- Stereotypical indicators include having a multitude of large tattoos, brandishing pistols, smoking weed, flashing or wearing gang symbols, etc.

Thugs appear to be aggressive, strong, and tough, but deep inside, they are confused, cowardly, dishonest, fearful reactionaries who lack the conviction, sincerity, and courage to protect the values they hypocritically claim to support. Thus, they rely on brute force, fear tactics, and intimidation to enforce their will on others.

It's well known that men who fit the C/T archetype have poor or absent father figures, and this fact is often used to further denigrate men in general. However, focusing on the poor character or absence of a father tends to displace the public's attention to the primary parental influence over these types — their mothers. Mothers of C/Ts are, more often than not, angry, contentious, moody, overbearing harridans — or worse, substance or sex addicts, Bipolar, Narcissistic, and so on. Has it never occurred to anyone that this may very well be one of the main reasons why the father didn't stick around to raise the son?

The Popularity of the Thug Image among Blacks

The American black community associates the C/T with masculinity. There exists a common impression, even among blacks themselves, that black masculinity is all about territorial gang activities, street brawls, drug sprees, and sexual promiscuity with oversexed hoes. Black men who reject or refrain from these behaviors are seen by other black men as lesser men, "acting white", or "Oreos". For example, the gangsta rappers used to make fun of Will Smith for making "rap for white people" because he didn't rap about murdering people, his genitals, or pimping his ho's.

Elspeth noted that men like this are aggravating and perpetuating the institutionalized racism which has undermined the black community since the Great Society reforms of the 1960s, which IMO is the modern whitewashed and governmentally bureaucratized version of the K K K.

> "Sadly, most of the "You're acting white!" people are too stupid to recognize they're denigrating themselves."

Case Study — Kyle Rittenhouse, the Anti-Thug

To further our understanding of the Abusive Criminal / Thug, here I'll present the diametric opposite archetype.

Kyle Rittenhouse is the Anti-Thug. He has the aggressive killer hallmark of a thug, but he also has had a clear moral purpose — and best of all, he's a babyfaced kid with a cheesy smile and a slice of killer in his eyes. He's the full epic hero of his generation!

Lara Logan and Kyle Rittenhouse. Trigger discipline and eye discipline. Note the side arm under his jacket. He's packing and not allowing himself to be distracted by voluptuous mammary glands. H/T: Oscar.

Masculinity Rating

This archetype is a unique form of masculinity because it captures a ressentiment of moral and ethical values.

Authority and Respect are truly earned, not through traditionally moral behaviors and service to ones community, but through Strength, domination, and the Law of the Jungle. As such, the weakness of this archetype is in Honor and Purpose. Even so, this type earns the second highest masculinity rating of all those I've covered this month (behind the Extroverted Armchair Philosopher). However, it should be duly noted that this only occurs within an alternate Power vs. Fear ethical system.

Strength: 8-10
Honor: 0-4
Authority: 6-10
Respect: 6-10
Purpose: 0-6

Average Score: 6

An Overview of the Archetypes Covered

A dozen male archetypes have been investigated as part of our survey of Faux-Masculinity. This post covers some noteworthy points that came up and offers some comprehensive conclusions.

This month, the number of visitors was down 60% of the previous two-month average, indicating a relatively lower interest in Faux-Masculinity. However, the number of views per visitor exceeded 10.5, up from a running average of ~7, and there was an average of 87 comments per post, up from ~60 during the previous month. These numbers indicate that there were a smaller number of readers who were intensely interested in this topic. I trust that those who requested this topic got what they were hoping to find out of this month's theme.

This series received two pingbacks / responses.

2. The Responsible Figurehead / Sock Puppet (2022-5-4) *
3. Mopey Dopey (2022-5-6) @
4. The Bungling Dimwitted Lazy Husband (2022-5-9) #

8. The Decadent Christian (Ressentimentalism) (2022-5-18) *
9. The Decadent Christian (Legalism)
10. The White Knight (2022-5-20) *

14. The Abusive Criminal / Thug (2022-5-29)
15. Bad@ss Chad / PUAs (2022-8-3) *
16. Dark Triad
17. The Playboy
18. The Incel *

19. The Sebaceous Soy Boy *
20. The Workaholic

There were two archetypes (indicated by a #) that are not necessarily true archetypes, but only a faux conceptualization of normal men's behavior that is stereotyped and criticized by women and society in order to control or shame men or to demonize masculinity.

Several archetypes (indicated by an asterisk) were identified as being a subgroup of the Male Feminist (MF), which was found to have countless subtypes. The thing that makes them all MFs is that they either espouse feminist philosophy, or they support feminism, female equality, and/or female dominance, either willingly or inadvertently through compliance. Another interrelated identifying quality is that they all neglect or forfeit Headship as an ongoing habit in both their psychology and their relationships. (Some rare exceptions exist. Certain aspects of Headship masculinity, like determination, domination, and strength of purpose, may be found among PUAs and High Power Male Feminists.)

Adding others to those listed above, we have this list of MFs…

- The Blue Pilled Alpha (2016-11-4)
- The Responsible Figurehead / Sock Puppet (2022-5-4)
- The Boring Loyal Dude (2022-5-11)
- The Decadent Christian (Ressentimentalism) (2022-5-18)
- The White Knight (2022-5-20)
- The Male Feminist (2022-5-23)
- The Simp (2022-5-27)
- Bad@ss Chad / PUAs
- Chivalrous Cuckservatives
- Churchians
- Complementarians

- F boys
- Generic Nice Guys
- Incels
- Liberal mouthpieces
- Male versions of radical feminists
- Manginas
- Nice Guys™
- QTBGL types

Apparently, the reason there are so many MFs, and so many types of MFs, is because most all men across the West have been raised by feminist parents and schooled in feminism from their youth.

The Simp is one subtype that is widely prevalent and therefore appears in many forms. Most Simps will self-identify as a Geek, or a Nerd, or a "Brony", and so on, as seen in the case studies, and so these monikers might be taken as synonyms. The Sebaceous Soy Boy could also be rolled into this sub-archetype as a Simp who is excessively lazy and unmotivated.

Although it is not outwardly apparent, Simps and Thugs bear some resemblance. Both come from a dysfunctional home environment with a poor or absent father figure and/or a harridan mother. Both are lacking social skills. Both have pet interests, with examples of video games and drug habits, respectively. The difference is that Simps have been softened and feminized by an Oedipal mother while Thugs have been hardened somehow, perhaps by rejecting an Oedipal mother. Another difference is that Simps recognize the authority of the Oedipal mother and women in general, whereas Thugs do not recognize any authority other than himself and/or a gang lord.

The Idolatry of Faux-Masculinity

Another way to categorize all the different types of true Faux-Masculine archetypes and other types of Male Feminists is according to their espoused idol. (An idol is the central aspect of one's personal psychology that one will cling to and be intensely reluctant to renounce.) Here, I've listed all the types listed above, followed by the most prevalent idols of that type.

Archetype	Idol
The Responsible Figurehead / Sock Puppet, AKA "The Family / Home Project Manager"	The wife ("Happy Wife, Happy Life"); Having a peaceful home; Having sex with the wife; Posturing as "Traditional" conservative;
Mopey Dopey	Anger, bitterness
The Boring Loyal Dude	Having a comfortable, ordered, no-nonsense lifestyle
The Armchair Philosopher	Ego dominance
The Decadent Christian (Antimonianism)	Impulsive living
The Decadent Christian (Ressentimentalism)	Inverted Feminist / Progressive values
The White Knight	Chivalrous social posturing; Faux honor;
The Male Feminist	Varies, but female propinquity is a common denominator
The Simp / Soy Boy	An Oedipal mother; the blinding obsession;
The Abusive Criminal / Thug	Control, various fears, respect, et al.
Bad@ss Chad / PUAs	Dominance, Winning, Egotistical highs / Sexual expression; P_ssy;
Chivalrous Cuckservatives	Materialistic comforts of capitalism; Perceived nuances of "Tradition"
Churchians	Whitewashed socialization and popularity

Complementarians	Marital harmony, Whitewashed 2nd Wave Feminism *
Dark Triad	Narcissistic manipulation and social circumnavigation
F boys	Sexual dominance and conquest
Generic Nice Guys	Comfort, Covert Contract, Loyalty
Incels	Lust, Envy, Poverty Mentality
Liberal mouthpieces	Acceptance; Relevance
Male versions of radical feminists	Attention, Influence, Power, Popularity
Manginas / Bro's	Autopilot
Nice Guys™	Obsession with "love", Oneitis
QTBGL types	Uninhibited sexual expression, et al.
The Playboy	Pleasures of living
The Workaholic	Earning money, success, flow, et al.

 The wife wants to be a tradwife when it benefits her but also be a feminist when it benefits her. Comprehensively, this requires female primacy and wife pedestalization.*

Ironically, the idol is the thing that is ultimately denied to the respective type. IcemanKimiRai stated a mystical theory that those who sell their souls for material gain, do not live to see the rewards of their plan. Or if he should by any means obtain his desire, he will find no joy in it. The game becomes a never-ending chase for a high that is always denied. Those who bargain with the world, bargain with Satan — and Satan always plays with loaded dice. For example, boring loyal men are prone to be One-itis-ers and are often cucked. Although this is exacerbated by the negative ressentiment of loyalty within the current sexually liberated culture, it is no coincidence.

A Man's best chance of conforming to God's order, gaining submission from wives, etc. is to fight the desire to make any inner propensity (e.g. a covert contract, a peaceful home, lust, marital harmony, sex, etc.) into an idol. Rather than making harmony, peace, sex, etc. as the goal, the goal should be holding God's standards and any standards he sets for his own family fully knowing that this will cause conflict, but a good conflict that is sanctifying. When a man does this there is absolutely conflict, but more often than not, with enough time, fortitude and patience, he will end up with both a submissive wife and the peace, etc. he desires.

Masculinity Ratings

In the introductory post, I set forth 5 benchmarks of Masculinity to form an objective and qualitative criteria which were then used to evaluate each of the archetypes. These five benchmarks form the acronym SHARP (or HARPS) and have the subcategories listed below.

1. Strength — Athleticism; Endurance; Maintaining Frame; Physical Strength; Stamina;
2. Honor — Ethics; Honesty; Identity; Morality; Reputation; Social Status;
3. Authority — Education; Influence; Position; Power; Socioeconomic Status;
4. Respect — Abilities / Skills; Authenticity; Charisma; Excellence; Integrity; SMV;
5. Purpose — Attaining Goals; Discipline; Incentives / Motivations; Meaning / Significance / Value; Perseverance;

The scores for each archetype are shown in the table below, in decreasing order.

Archetype	S	H	A	R	P	Avg.
The Armchair Philosopher (Extroverted)	0-2+	5-8	8-10	5-10	7-10	6.5

The Armchair Philosopher (Introverted)	0-2+	3-6	6-8	2-6	4-8	4.5
The Male Feminist (High Power)	0-5	0	5-10	?	5-10	4.5
The Decadent Christian (Antimonianism)	4-8	0-4	?	?	0-4	4

The Decadent Christian (Ressentimentalism)	0-2	< 0	< 0	< 0	0-10	0

Conclusions

The continuing perpetuation of Faux-Masculine archetypes and the fact that aggressive, masculine, high-earning women can continually get sex from high value/attractive men reinforces several negative outcomes.

- Hierarchies of authority, including Headship, continue to be denigrated.
- Men continue to dwell in the helpless and hopeless position of having all the responsibility with no authority, including in his own home.
- Women become s1uts and hoes early in life, and then become masculinized harridans and Karens after hitting the wall.
- Men are conditioned to accept, and even expected to prefer, a strong, independent, kick-@ss woman.
- A growing asymmetry in attraction between the wife and husband. The wife will be lukewarm in her affections toward her husband. Many will divorce and others will just be roommates in an unhappy but tolerable marriage.
- Christians will go on pretending that the church is full of godly gals of wife material while lamenting that the men are subpar.

Personally speaking, I have seen aspects of myself in every single one of these archetypes, and I've made a few comments to this effect. It's been good to review these things and monitor my own progress in getting out and staying free from these traps.

It's easy to rake men over the coals for "not getting it", i.e. that women don't like nice, kind, affable men for sex and relationships. The best thing we can do is to help guys find fellowship with other men, be aware of the traps and shenanigans, and steer clear of the pitfalls of faux-masculinity – and there are many.

Jack's Take

At first, I wasn't about to delve into the psychology of lipstick colour with Dr. Monika Wassermann and psychologist and sex and relationships advisor, Ieva Kubiliute, because I didn't see how it is related to the Σ Frame blog, since this is a site for men. But then I realized that the psychology of color is not limited to lipstick. It could also apply to hair color, nail color, eyeshadow color, and so on, and that these colors might provide a clue for guys to know what kind of woman they're dealing with. Also, it is well known in the 'sphere that aposematism applies to humans too. So I've put some thought into this, and a bit of reflection on my own experiences with women, and I've compiled a color analysis for the readers.

Color Analysis

Judging by the psychology behind the colors given in the infographic, I've categorized these colors in terms of vetting acceptability. Green and yellow are not included in the infographic, so I did my own research and added these to the list. Other colors, such as clear gloss, glitter, gold, grey, lavendar, neon, silver, white etc. can be found in the articles under Popular Articles about Nail Color. (See below.) With the exception of lavendar and white (which I've added to the list below, lavendar is included in "Pastels"), none of these other colors appear promising.

If a woman uses color, there are definitely some shades that are better than others, in order of more preferable first (according to category).

Acceptable Colors

1. Baby Pink — Kind, girly, and empathetic
2. Pastels — Fresh, feminine, and playful
3. Peach — Friendly, energetic
4. White — Crisp, youthful, methodically organized
5. Yellow — Optimistic, enthusiastic, curious, joyful, high mental and verbal acuity

All these colors are expressly feminine.

Proceed with Caution

1. Nude — Classic, sophisticated, and authoritative
2. Brown — Composed and dependable
3. Orange — Adventurous, excited, and spontaneous
4. Hot Pink — Bubbly, playful, and fun
5. Crimson — Sassy, bold, and confident

Green — Highly variable, ranging from adventurous, powerful, and risky, to earthy and spunky, to peaceful and relaxed. (Read Popular Articles about Nail Color below for more information.)

Colors to Explicitly Avoid

1. Brick Red — Strong and courageous
2. Burgundy — Wealth, power, and money
3. Purple — Individualistic and strong
4. Black — Alternative, cool, Gothic, and rebellious
5. Blue — Exotic, creative, insecure, and attention seeking

It is commonly observed that most women will choose a shade of red (e.g. lipstick, eyeshadow, rouge, etc.) which is towards the bottom of the list.

Conclusions

In summary, here are three good rules of thumb for discerning the meaning of color.

1. No added color is probably best.
2. Colors that are clearly feminine are preferable to colors that are bold, cold, glitzy, or heavy.
3. If the color draws attention, stands out, or is too obviously noticeable, then it's a bad sign.

Did you notice that she's wearing a soft pink lipstick and nail color?
No? That's exactly how it should be.
If a woman chooses a color that doesn't appear feminine and blend into her appearance in a modest way, then this may imply one or more of the following things.

1. She's not mature enough to choose a suitable color.
2. She's not conscientiously attentive to her body and her appearance.
3. She's looking for attention, meaning that she doesn't feel loved and content.
4. She's "experimenting" with color, which implies that she's not emotionally settled.
5. She's trying to make herself feel better about herself or her appearance, indicating poor self-esteem.

Some consideration should be given to the woman's age as well. In general, light or bright colors look better on younger women, and darker colors are more appropriate for older women.

The New P0rn Designed to Entice and Entrance Ultra Conservatives

I want to bring readers' attention to a new type of porn that is quickly spreading across the West. It is poised to throw western sensibilities about fashion and attractiveness back to the 1890s! It also has the potential to undermine MGTOW and transform the Red Pill into a dated Xer mentality!

It is obviously a new type of P0rn because it is fundamentally different from the p0rn of the past, which emphasized…

- Lustful gazes
- Full frontal nudity
- Sexual intercourse
- Odd social interactions
- Macros of genital areas
- Awkward, contorted poses
- Dissipated and jaded models
- Heavy cosmetics, especially mascara
- Heavily airbrushed and photo shopped images
- Virtual nudity (e.g. bikinis, skinsuits, thongs, yoga pants, etc.)

In contrast, the hallmarks of the new Ultra Conservative P0rn include…

- Flowers
- Sun hats
- Bright eyes
- Modest poses
- Straw baskets
- Head coverings
- Wedding bands
- Gingham dresses
- Child bearing hips
- Slender waistlines
- Kind, gentle smiles
- Minimal cosmetics
- Demure expressions
- Pregnant plumpness
- Dimorphous femininity

- Bountiful mammary glands
- A glowing healthy complexion
- No piercings or tattoos!!! WTF?
- Long thick hair with natural color!
- Nubile models, many under the age of 27!
- An acute absence of jadedness, indicating virginity! D'oh!
- Background settings utilizing natural sunlight in natural environments or well-manicured UMC homes!

It's absolutely shocking!

Fuddy Feminists and contentious Karens across the nation are clutching their cats as conservative men everywhere are losing their minds over the new P0rn!

Many men have fallen into a state of psychosis as their minds are running away into fantasy. The most common delusions include…

- Desiring marriage
- Wanting a nuclear family
- Being inspired to work harder
- Getting notions of buying a home
- Having a healthy respect for women
- Imagining the pitter patter of little feet
- Wanting to protect and nurture women

It's completely scandalous!

Conservative P0rn Fakes / Wannabes / Runner Ups / Close but no Bnonna

Ultra conservative p0rn is so popular right now, that there is a wave of fake wannabes to watch out for. Here are a couple that are close to call. To the uninitiated, you can tell the difference from the deadpan look in their eyes — a sure indicator that it's a staged act.

A New Cultural Projection of Christianity

Justin and Hailey Bieber are now beacons of holiness!?!

Justin and Hailey Bieber as Cultural Icons

In an earlier post, How to Change a Hostile Culture (2021 June 7), I discussed the overarching influence and power of the elite, and why it is important for this group to spearhead social changes. That's why the following development has special importance.

Supermodel Hailey Bieber attributes the success of her marriage to Justin Bieber to their shared Christian faith — see this article from Fox News, written by Hailey Baldwin herself: Hailey Baldwin 'wouldn't even be' with husband Justin Bieber if not for Christian faith (2021 June 3).

Some of their photos do project the image of what I think of as a Christian marriage.

However, there are many other photos that give concern. The "Christian" image projected is a bit interesting, to say the least:

A heavily tattooed Justin Bieber (seated) and his debonair wife Hailey, October 2020.
Note the structure of authority that is conveyed in the image. Her high heels and exposed upper thigh convey V Power. Her hands on hips denote authority. The sunglasses portray a dark mystique. He is seated on the floor, barefoot, bent knees, topless, and grasping her calf, all indicating submission and vulnerability. We still see elements of feminism, male submission, female dominance, and cultural convergence in general. It is so obvious that if their positions were reversed, it would be labeled misogynous.

What impact have Justin and Hailey Bieber had?

It's been one year since Justin and Hailey Bieber came out as "Christians". It's time for us to take a look back and see the overall impression that they have made and where it is leading.

Over the past year, I haven't seen very much discussion of Justin and Hailey Bieber. This might be because they've received reduced airplay since coming out as "Christians".

On 1 November 2021, they made a podcast with their pastor and his wife. Readers who opt for sitting through it will have to look past the giggles and bubbly feel goods to understand the real essence of their relationship. To save the reader's time, here I'll pick out some facts and statements that are of interest to our discussion.

At the 7:35 mark they stated that Justin was 24 and Hailey was 21 when they got married, which clearly goes against the overall cultural trend of marrying later. Hailey says she struggled going against this norm, but it was clear to her that God already brought her a husband. She justifies Justin getting married young by stating that "he's had so many life experiences." She said she appreciates Justin because he always supported and empowered her. She obviously looks up to him for his status and career accomplishments, and she mentions being "Hailey BIEBER", his six houses, and so on. She's very much focused on the status, economic comforts, and social perks.

Playing Jenga amid unmitigated opulence, Hailey gives Justin an IOI.

Justin has very dreamy, Blue Pilled notions of marriage and family. At 8:46, the pastor's wife points out that Justin's mother was never married, and asks where he got this idealized image of marriage. Justin replies by saying he learned it from watching movies. Hailey said she had a very traditional family growing up.

The pastor capitalizes on these statements by emphasizing that "Justin Bieber wants marriage and family because it's such a wonderful beautiful thing."

At 11:58, the pastor asks Justin why marriage was a top priority for him. He says he was lonely, he didn't want to do it all alone, there was some serious healing he needed to get past a lot of "trauma and scars", and mental health issues and to function in a relationship. He says, "Hailey accepted me for who I am."

At 17:00, the pastor homes in on how their relationship glorifies God, but he doesn't get into the specifics of how that happens. Compare this to how the Christian Manosphere has identified Headship as the most important element of a relationship that glorifies God.

At 19:55, Justin expresses a lot of insecurity, "rejection issues", and says it took him some time for him to "become more secure with where we were at."

At 21:20, Hailey says during the first year of their marriage, she considered herself to be "independent", until she realized that "marriage is 50/50".

Hailey dominates most of the discussion, but Justin says a few cute or funny things now and then. She clearly wears the pants in their marriage.

At 23:25, the pastor points out that consistency was very important for them to settle down and feel secure in the relationship.

This image depicts female sexual empowerment and male supplication.
The second part starts at 24:00.

Justin says his Love Language is physical touch and quality time. Compare this to Scott's statement, "Sex is men's love language." He credits Hailey for bringing "good changes" into his life, and he names changes like trying different kinds of food.

Hailey says the longer she is married, the less she wants to have children, because they're having so much fun and she doesn't want the "distraction" of having children. Uh oh…

At 30:25 the pastor says,

> "One thing that is happening in culture is that you two are making marriage super sexy. You make it fun, you make it cool."

He asks them, what is the sexiest intangible about the other?

Hailey says, "…when I get to watch you do what you were put on this planet to do." She also says that he has so much confidence in doing his thing. This confirms the importance of a man having a mission / purpose and confidence.

Justin replies, "The way you treat people and make them feel [warm]. Everyone loves you for that." Here we see that men value feminine attributes in a woman.

This image projects male dominance.

Epilogue

Upon observing Justin and Hailey Bieber's marriage, what do we see?

- We see a woman who is attracted to a man for his confidence, experience, good looks, image, popularity, status, and wealth — enough to overlook his shortcomings as a man, e.g. confusion, and possibly emotional / mental issues.
- We see a top 0.001% man with extremely idealistic expectations about women and marriage — a man who could've had any one out of millions of women — who entered into marriage because of his own need for companionship and because she showed barely enough consistency to earn his trust.
- We also see a lot of mixed symbolism. The problem here is that when young people are exposed to both types of images, it reveals no clues about which type of relationship structure is actually Christian, and which is not.

Overall, their marriage is very much like a Complementary Boomer marriage, but with a few caveats.

- For one, it is catered and fully supported by all the trappings of their stratospheric socioeconomic status and wealth.
- Secondly, we don't see clear masculine and feminine roles being played out. Instead, their relationship is better described as a very close friendship with some elements of emotional codependency, especially from Justin.
- Apparently, young Hailey sees no issue with the messages her modeling gig projects about sex, never mind about female role models, but, hey … at least she's "Christian", right?

The best we can say is that they had the good sense to marry young and seek God in their marriage. We do hear them giving God credit for the success of their relationship. There are glimmers of God's glory sprinkled here and there. We can also be happy that they've found the joys of marriage, in spite of their shortcomings. I suspect that this is about the best that anyone could realistically hope for these days.

Image from Vogue: Justin and Hailey Bieber Open Up About Their Passionate, Not-Always-Easy but Absolutely All-In Romance (2019-2-7)

The left image depicts female dominance. The right image depicts feminine passion for male Headship. Which to believe?

The graver issue here is that we do not see many indicators of a Christ centered Headship. Perhaps the only one is that he is more successful than she is and she clearly admires him for this. Perhaps this is enough to make their marriage work out. But as for the public image they project, there are very few behaviors or photographic images that clearly depict Headship. Her naturally florid IOIs might indicate Headship, but one would have to go looking for it with this in mind. Most young people are clueless about this and probably won't pick up on this.

I have to wonder if they even know what Headship looks like, and that Headship is what glorifies God!

This is more of what is coming in the future, even for those who manage to remain nominal "Christians" — carrying the title, and considering themselves such, but not actually living that way.

This is an important development, because as I've written about before, the elite set the cultural stage for everyone else.

Readers may like to discuss the overall impact of the image of marriage they present and how it might affect the overall cultural popularity of marriage.

Do you know your communication style?

The 4 Styles of Communication

Teaching communication styles can be complex and elaborate if the instructor is knowledgeable, or kept simple if someone like me is teaching on the subject. The complexity comes from the fact that while everyone has a dominant style, everyone also has secondary style characteristics that will influence the dominant style to some extent.

Another thing that makes it confusing is that different "experts" have preferred adjectives to describe each of the styles, so we see a lot of close synonyms / antonyms for Assertiveness like…

- Assertive vs. Agreeable
- Aggressive vs. Compliant
- Determined vs. Flexible
- Dominant vs. Passive
- Fast Paced vs. Slow Paced

And likewise for Expressiveness…

- Open vs. Closed
- Warm vs. Cool
- Extroverted vs. Introverted
- Feelings vs. Facts
- People Oriented vs. Task Oriented

And others.

To make matters even more perplexing, the "warm" communication style is also described as agreeable, compliant, open, etc., whereas, "cool" corresponds to aggressive, assertive, determined, and so on. This can obscure the difference between the two dichotomies of Assertiveness and Expressiveness.

Moreover, when viewing information about communication styles, readers may have to take a moment to translate the words being used to the words and concepts they're more accustomed to using. But anyway, the essential ideas are the same.

The listed dichotomies in bold face are those I'll use for the remainder of this essay.

For the vast majority of people, it is enough to know the basics.

- Fast Paced and Warm = Being Liked
- Fast Paced and Cool = Control
- Slow Paced and Warm = Safety

- Slow Paced and Cool = Being Right

If you imagine pace/assertiveness and warmth/expressiveness as continuums that intersect you get a 4 quadrant graph of the 4 available communication styles. These four types also take on various names. Of note, one system of nomenclature uses the terms Passive and Aggressive which are easily confused with psychopathology.

Here's an infographic that gives more information for each of the types. (This nomenclature is called the DiSC model.) A person as far away from the intersection as possible on a 45° angle from the intersection is going to be an archetype of that style.

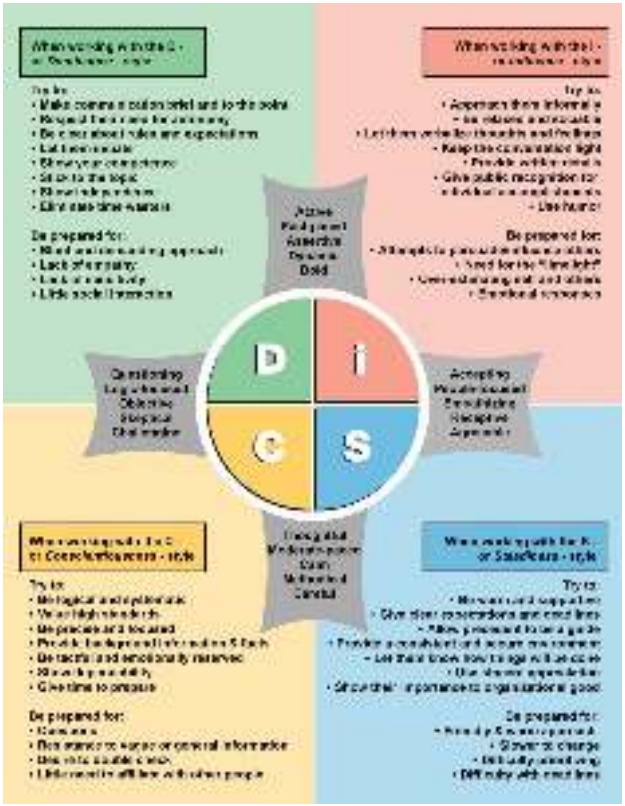

Image from Bishop House Consulting: How do I effectively manage the diverse styles within my team?

Examples

For anyone that is beginning to recognize styles, my advice would be to simplify, simplify, simplify. This specifically means not getting caught in the details of what a person with a given style might say or do in a situation. Most people can pick up on warmth and pace in the first few minutes when they meet someone and figure out the person's style. Getting caught in the details leads to uncertainty and in many cases a good bit of second guessing.

Fast Paced and Warm = Being Liked

Extroverted men are usually fast paced. Guys who are charismatic and popular tend to communicate this way. Scott therefore fits this personality arrangement.

Fast Paced and Cool = Control

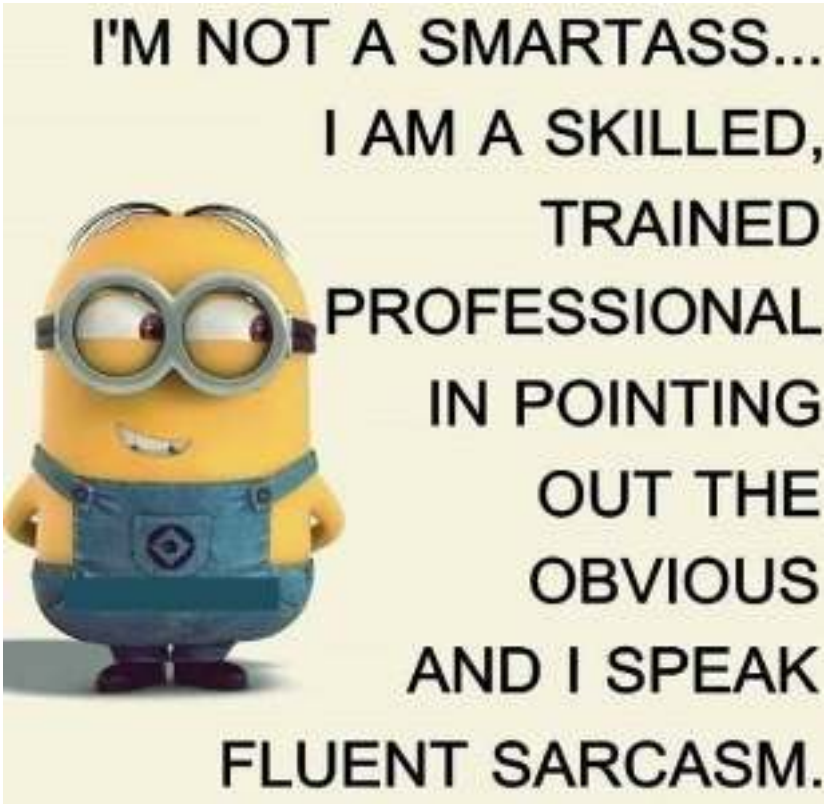
Guys who know what they believe, who know what they want, and are comfortable in their own skin stick to the tack of social efficiency and limiting their personal liabilities. Ed Hurst and Vox Day fit this personality arrangement.

Slow Paced and Warm = Safety

Compromising for the sake of harmony is very common for people who communicate from the frame of Safety. Dalrock writes in this style, and this is my own preferred style too. Jack said this is his secondary communication style. This is also Cameron's dominant communication style. He'll often try to make peace between commenters, and his writing is often more to the warm side of the spectrum.

Slow Paced and Cool = Being Right

Sharkly is as close to an archetype for slow paced and cool as I can think of. He goes through enormous efforts to be right, down to levels of putting minute details in his comments at times if he thinks it solidifies that he is right. Jack said this is (or was) his predominant communication style, but as he's grown older, he's seen how he can come across as a smart@ss, and so he has learned to be more gracious and patient (i.e. Safety), while maintaining a wide frame.



Agreeableness and Personality

Agreeableness is expressed differently according to personality. Although there are outliers, most introverted people tend to be more agreeable, and extroverted people are more assertive.

It has helped me to think of introversion and extroversion as a continuum of energy required for interaction with people. A person who is energized by being amidst people is on the extroversion side and a person who is exhausted by being amidst people is on the introverted side.

My own natural tendency is towards introversion, although my work and age have mellowed that tendency. When I was younger, I'd see a group of people I had not met yet and have to mentally prepare myself to go interact. My oldest son sees a group of people he doesn't know yet and thinks of all the new friends he'll make. I had to input energy into the scenario and my son derives energy from the same scenario.

Mimic the Communication Styles of Others

Communication "experts" often state that the most efficient way to streamline your communications with others is to adopt the other person's communication style. Some people can do this rather easily, but others find it very difficult. They'll say it makes them feel very uncomfortable and/or "fake". Actually, it is impossible to "fake" a communication style as long as it comes from you. When people say they don't want to be "fake", what they really mean goes back to how much effort and energy is required to make that shift. Often times, they'll make this excuse to avoid putting in the effort to develop alternate communication habits. People who practice using other communication styles will often find greater success in having others understand and accept their ideas simply because they are relaying concepts in a style that feels most natural to the listener.

What I have found fascinating over the years is when people "Z out". This occurs when a person is put under pressure to the point they feel stress and they ultimately end up at the exact opposite communication style, and along the way they very briefly utilize the other 2 styles. Watching this happen can be a good way to confirm a person's dominant style as well as being telling of how uncomfortable they feel in that moment.

Challenge

Here is a fun exercise for you. Watch the following video on recognizing communication styles and then observe people as you speak with them at work, family gatherings, or holiday parties. It's definitely a way to have more fun, especially if they are less lively or if you're at a work function where people are more buttoned up for professional reasons. You can even practice using a person's own style when talking with them to see how much you can get them to open up. Don't take the easy road on this and talk with a person who is fast paced and warm. They are naturally open books that will often talk your ear off.

Imposing Masculine Presence

Intersexual Communications

In general, men should pick a woman who is more agreeable than not. However, it should be well noted that personality differences can affect what this looks like and how it is expressed.

For those personality combinations in which the man is extroverted and the woman is introverted, finding a woman who is agreeable should be inherently apparent. But for those men who have a quiet personality and who pair well with outgoing women, determining her level of agreeableness may be a bit of a trick. This is because in this type of personality coupling, the woman will naturally dominate the bulk of the discussion.

A lot of our (Jack and RPA) writings come from this perspective — how a quiet or introverted man can dominate the interaction he has with his wife without losing frame.

We think the way to get a grip on this is to recognize that there are bigger issues than introversion / extroversion that play out in the interaction, namely the man's dominant frame and masculine presence. (We'll cover these two concepts later in this essay.) Younger men who are not accustomed to how their frame and masculine presence appears to others may not realize this, but a man with courage and conviction can be introverted and introspective and still be quite dominant.

Think of a quieter man who is with a woman who is warmer, talks quite a bit, and is fast paced (i.e. being liked is her conversational frame). As long as he is not the type of man who comes across as being scared of his own shadow, he can seem intimidating to her. This is especially true if he knows what he wants in life and is willing to go after it. But if he comes across as being timid, hesitant, or afraid of her reactions, then this masculine aura collapses and he'll lose the dominant frame.

In our last post, Agreeableness and Personality (2022-6-8), we covered four basic communication styles. This post will hone in on a particular dynamic — how introverted men can communicate with extroverted women by…

1. Extolling Masculine Presence
2. Listening and giving Feedback
3. Maintaining Frame

The remainder of this post will explore these three mechanisms and how they may be used by a reserved man to create a dominant interaction with an expressive woman.

Masculine Presence

The concept of Masculine Presence has been around the Manosphere for a looong while, and it is always presented in the context of an Alpha Male slaying chicks left and right. While it is true that it is much easier for an Alpha to discover how his presence has an effect on others (i.e. women), and utilize the resulting feedback to intensify his awareness and augment his presence, it is not a phenomenon unique to Alphas. Average men have been known to exude Masculine Presence, but this particular manifestation is usually avoided in discussions, even within the Manosphere, as there are many men who refuse to accept it or believe it for various reasons. As a result, Masculine Presence continues to remain beyond the awareness of the vast majority of men and thus goes underutilized by many men — much to the disappointment of many women.

I'd like for us to take a step back from the Alpha-based image of Masculine Presence and form a revised view of it that could apply to nearly any man who cares to develop an awareness of his own aura — including and especially Christian men. So here I'll propose a spiritualized definition.

Masculine Presence is an inherent power of spiritual authority at Men's disposal, granted to Men by God Himself.

To avail of this power, it remains up to each Man to develop and exercise his own charisma within his domain of influence. Men can earn large dividends by becoming more familiar with how they are perceived by others in this way.

In the rest of this essay, I'll describe several elements pertaining to how Masculine Presence is manifested and can be utilized to impose Frame, including personality, communication style, addressing the needs of others, listening, questioning, evaluating, and giving feedback. I suspect there are many others.

Viewing Masculine Presence as a uniquely Christian trait will be a spanking new idea to many readers, so to kick start this conversation, we will describe how we handle our own wives to illustrate how our masculine presence can seem imposing to women.

Case Study 1 – RPA and Mrs. Apostle

I would carefully consider what 'dominating' a conversation or discussion looks like.

There are times when Mrs. Apostle is talking a lot and she notices that I'm quiet and have an expression on my face that would suggest I'm judging what she is saying. Often times, this will make her nervous about what I am thinking. There have been times when she noticed my expression and has said, "Uh oh… What are you thinking? What did I do?"

There are other times, especially when we were dating because we were getting to know each other, when I have utilized her communication style in conversation which made her feel like I understood her. She still used 10 times more words than I did, but she felt like it was a good conversation. The reality is that I spoke a little, actively listened a whole bunch and asked her questions that got her to talk (not a hard task) about subjects that interested her.

The next section will cover some basics of good listening skills.

Case Study 2 – Jack and Jill

I've learned a lot from discussing communication styles with RPA. Shortly after our email exchange, (Monday, December 20, 2021), I began to assess me and my wife's communication styles. After studying this for a few months, I can offer the following summary.

Personalities — I am somewhere in between being introverted and extroverted. When I am alone or among strangers, I take a reserved role. But when I'm with a small group of friends, I can't really claim to be the life of the party, but I am leading the activities and guiding the topics of discussion. At times, I can be raucously funny. My wife is more extroverted than I am, and that is what shows up in our relationship, so it makes me take the introverted role. According to the continuum of energy idea described by RPA in the previous post, it's true, because I often feel exhausted after interacting with her.

Communication Styles — I am slow paced and cool ("being right"). My secondary style is slow paced and warm ("safety"). My wife is fast paced and warm ("being liked"), but when she gets into one of her moods, she is fast paced and cold ("control"). Moreover, my wife prefers the proud, egotistical, hubristic, playful interaction, while I prefer the honest, warm, authentic, even affectionate interaction.

According to the “experts”, we should try to mimic each others’ style. It is difficult for me to be fast paced, especially fast paced and warm, because when I try to communicate in this style, I come across as some combination of arrogant, disingenuous, mocking, and sarcastic, and this is unacceptable to her sensibilities.

As for her, she refuses to communicate using my style because she feels like a “deceptive manipulative whore”. (Those are her own words!) Instead, she thinks it’s better to blurt out all her unfiltered, unfettered thoughts, and she’s proud of that because she thinks she’s a truth teller. I find her “version” of the truth is rude, disrespectful, and unbecoming for a woman. I’ve told her so, but she doesn’t agree, so she won’t go to the effort to change her communication style. However, she has become a little more conscientious about her speech.

In sum, her style really annoys me, while she thinks my style is too serious. Trying to change styles is just as awkward; she won’t change her style, and she doesn’t like it any better when I change mine. Even so, I’d have to admit that the “experts” are more or less correct, because whenever I adapt to my wife’s style, she immediately blows up, but then she’ll eventually simmer down and is more willing to listen to what I have to say. So I’ve learned that getting on a roll can be more efficient in taking control of things and/or resolving a conflict.

Masculine Presence — Compared to RPA’s wife, my wife is more sensitive to Masculine Presence. For example, I’ve noticed that my wife gets nervous when I give her undivided attention and especially direct eye contact. Because of this, often times I can get a better, more attentive reaction from her if I pretend like I’m busy with something else and like I’m NOT listening. Furthermore, my wife has some inner game in response to Masculine Presence to the point of her having developed a few psychological defense mechanisms in response to it. For example, if my wife is talking and I have a disagreeable expression on my face, it makes her feel judged. But unlike how RPA’s wife becomes more compliant, Jill’s typical reaction is to get angry. I can be very patient, so I’ll tolerate her anger for a time. But if she goes over the top, or embarks on a self-sufflating ego trip, or starts up with some crazy accusations, or resorts to psychological defense tactics, then I’ll stop listening. If she continues, I’ll walk away. I’ll go take a walk. or go for a bicycle ride to the lake, or go to my office. As I’m leaving, I’ll tell her something like,

- “I don’t think you’re being serious anymore.”
- “You’re just ranting. Calm down and then we’ll talk.”

- "Call me when you come back down to planet Earth."

Because of her intrinsic need for positive attention and to be liked, she goes nuts when I walk away. When I come back, she's in a more agreeable mood. Soft Dread Game.

The Importance of Listening and Giving Feedback

The key to listening is…

1. Staying calm.
2. Hearing what they're NOT saying.
3. Seeing through the emotional static.
4. Assessing how her frame fits within yours, and calling it out when it doesn't.

I (Jack) have learned that at times, it's prudent to hold my peace and let others talk because…

- I've learned from studying psychology and also from experience that if you can get the other person to talk more, then they are more likely to trust you and like you.
- It allows me some time to collect information, assess the other person, and decide how open and trusting I can be with that person.
- Letting the other person talk more helps me gauge their communication style, personality, and temperament, and gives me an idea of how I can best deal with that person.

In both examples in RPA's Case Study, he did the majority of listening, but as you can see, Mrs. Apostle did not really dominate the interaction. She responded by being more considerate of his opinions.

Jack listens to his wife attentively, but only when she is calm and respectful. In Jack's Case Study, he used listening as a tool to hold Jill's attention (based on her need to be liked). Whenever she attempted to dominate the interaction, he withdrew his masculine presence to…

1. Express an intolerant rejection (viz. a strong dislike) of her snippy influence.
2. Employ soft Dread Game whenever she crossed the line.

3. Instill humility and introspection in her.

As you can see, some of the skills and techniques might be different from couple to couple, but in any case, listening offers affirmation to the woman and also keeps her drawn into the man's frame. It also provides feedback to the man that he can use to better implement his Game.

The Man's Dominant Frame

There is one aspect of frame control which encapsulates a dominant interaction.

> "Within every interaction is a frame where one person does the evaluating and judging while the other does the satisfying. The person with the higher value will naturally fall into a frame of evaluation while the person with the lower value will fall into a frame of trying to prove or appease."
> Roosh V: Don't Let A Girl Assert Frame Over You (2018-1-29)

The Question Apology Game (2019-1-6) is an interactional dynamic in which a man uses astute questioning to steer the direction of the conversation with a woman. Here, the man calls out a particular aspect of the woman's work, behavior, decision, performance, etc., and reviews the value of the woman's contribution. It is assumed within the nature of the interaction that the woman must give an account of herself, and/or what she is doing, and why. Motives and priorities are called into question, and reviewed under heavy scrutiny.

Women will naturally resist such perlustration, and may accuse the man of "judging" her, as if that were something grotesquely evil. But through calm and kindhearted inquisition, a man can fashion the topics and questions in such a way as to control the dynamics of the conversations. If the man can elicit her conviction followed by a feedback response of supplication from her, this establishes a hierarchy in which the man assumes the role of the dominant evaluator, and the woman must therefore assume the role of the submissive appeaser.

The interesting part of this dynamic is that a man can Display High(er) Value (DHV) by taking on the role of the inquisitor. When parsing a woman, a man has the upper hand in this respect, since women are given to solipsistic hamstering and are less rational by comparison. This is not to say that a man should rely primarily on reason to "win" arguments, as females are likely to be annoyed by this "mansplaining" approach and will not respond in a compliant manner, but rather that he's better able to keep a clear head and analyze her motives and influence with greater precision and accuracy. Being Red Pilled and emotionally detached is highly valuable in this regard.

How to Avoid Miscommunication

Let this sink in until you "get it" and these concepts begin to click.

1. Listen with your eyes, ears, and guts.
2. Be aware of your own perceptional filters.
3. Let your Masculine Presence do the talking.
4. Take time to understand as you try to be understood.
5. Understand that passive hearing and active listening are not the same.
6. Be aware of any differences in Communication Styles, and adapt if possible.
7. Ask inquisitive, probing questions that are genuine and show interest in her life.
8. Let her feel appreciated by you, by focusing on those aspects of the interaction that would naturally appeal to her communication style and personality.

In summary, all these methods sharpen your ability to employ various forms of operant conditioning. The key is in knowing her intrinsic needs, both communicative and feedback, and fulfilling them (viz. validation) when she behaves appropriately, and starving her out when she doesn't. Good ol' Push-Pull Game.

These needs, according to the 4 communication styles, are as follows.

- Fast Paced and Warm (Expressives) => Need to be liked.
- Fast Paced and Cool (Drivers) => Need to have clear choices spelled out for them.
- Slow Paced and Warm (Amiables) => Need guidance towards finding contentment and peace, and to avoid guilt, regret, and shame.
- Slow Paced and Cool (Analytics) => Need to have a detailed confirmation/explanation without getting confused and/or overwhelmed by said details (viz. avoid Analysis Paralysis).

By employing the above methods, men, even quiet reserved men, can meet the needs of a woman's communication style by active listening, asking questions, and offering validation when appropriate, without ever having to top her at her own communication style.

Continuing on the subject of Agreeableness and Personality (2022-6-8) and Imposing Masculine Presence (2022-6-10), here, I'll convey another case study that should illustrate how adapting to another persons' communication style can streamline the interaction.

Before I tell the story, here's a quick refresher on the needs of the 4 communication styles.

- Fast Paced and Warm (Expressives) => Need to be liked.
- Fast Paced and Cool (Drivers) => Need to have clear choices spelled out for them.
- Slow Paced and Warm (Amiables) => Need guidance towards finding contentment and peace, and to avoid guilt, regret, and shame.
- Slow Paced and Cool (Analytics) => Need to have a detailed confirmation/explanation without getting confused and/or overwhelmed by said details (viz. avoid Analysis Paralysis).

OK, so here's the story. I remember a particular instance of role playing styles at work when I was 22 and nervous about being in front of the whole office. My coworker, Faith,* was playing the part of the customer and I was the salesman trying to sell her on a sweater. She played the part of an Expressive (fast paced and warm) and that is all I had to go on. The conversation went something like this.

F: "I'm thinking about this sweater."

RPA: "That one looks nice. It might work well for you. What drew your eye to that one?"

F: (Lots of words and multiple rabbit trails.)

RPA: (Questions about the different topics she brought up.)

F: (Even more words and talking about life while I listened.)

RPA: (Circling back and tying the sweater into the conversation) "You should totally wear the sweater to the event you just told me about. I am pretty sure that people will think you look good in it."

As you can see, I appealed to her need to be liked. The sales pitch was my own. The questions to her were genuine and I showed interest in her life. I focused on those aspects of the sweater she would naturally be drawn to because of her base need to be liked as an Expressive. As a result, she felt liked by me and she had the idea that the sweater would make her more likeable to others.

This was one of those moments in my life when a concept clicked.

If I had been dealing with a Driver (fast paced and cool) the conversation would have been me briefly finding out why a sweater is needed, then presenting an option that meets the criteria. The pitch would be the executive summary version: "The sweater meets x, y, and z criteria you need and it will do the job you need it to do. Do you want me to ring it up for you?"

Analytics (slow paced and cool) would get enough detail to know the sweater was the right choice, but not too much to avoid analysis paralysis: "This sweater is made of an acrylic/wool blend, which is machine washable, permanent press, easy to care for, and will last for many years."

Amiables (slow paced and warm) would get aspects of the sweater for them to know that it is a solid choice that they would be happy with and would not regret buying. Essentially, letting them know it's a safe choice. "This sweater is comfortable, matches your wardrobe style, and brings out the natural color in your skin tone."

Epilogue

These are all examples of how a mild-mannered man can connect in a meaningful way with a person of any Communication Style, including those with a cold or faster paced style, by asking questions, active listening, and some validation, without ever being that way himself.

Precisely and accurately stated, adapting to others' communication style meets their needs in communication. They are more likely to feel heard and respond positively for this reason.

Using communication styles isn't a form of manipulation, although some people could readily use the skill that way should they so choose. Utilizing styles is relaying information to someone in a manner that is most easily relatable to them. It's a means of being a more effective communicator that actually works quite well.

I have a sneaking suspicion that the Rogerian therapy technique of repeating patient's statements back to them has some positive effects because the patient hears statements in their own style. At the very worst it would make a patient think the therapist understands them to some extent and that alone can be helpful to some.

How to Motivate the Four Personality Types according to their Communication Styles

Introduction

RPA and I described Communication Styles in the last three posts.

- Agreeableness and Personality (2022-6-8)
- Imposing Masculine Presence (2022-6-10)
- How to be winsome by adapting to others' Communication Styles (2022-6-13)

One of the main running points of these posts is that a man doesn't need to have a dominant personality (i.e. Extroverted, Fast Paced, and Cool) in order to be dominant. To make this distinction clearer to readers, it helps to understand that the four Communication Styles are closely aligned with the following Personality Types.

- Analyticals = Slow Paced and Cool / Introverted and Thinking
- Amiables = Slow Paced and Warm / Introverted and Feeling
- Expressives = Fast Paced and Warm / Extroverted and Feeling
- Drivers = Fast Paced and Cool / Extroverted and Thinking

Personality Type	Strength	Weakness
Analytical (Get It Right)	Thinking	Excludes feelings from decisions
	Thorough	Goes too far, perfectionist
	Disciplined	Too rigid or demanding of self/others
Driver (Get It Done)	Independent	Has trouble operating with others
	Decisive	Does not take time to consider other perspectives
	Determined	Domineering, too focused on doing it "my way"
Amiable (Get along)	Supportive	Tends to conform to wishes of others
	Patient	No time boundaries; things do not get done
	Diplomatic	Not assertive or directive
Expressive (Get appreciated)	Good communicator	Talks too much
	Enthusiastic	Comes on too strong
	Imaginative	Dreamer, unrealistic

In other posts, I described how to build trust and rapport by properly managing your relationships with others.

- The Motivation of Desire (2020-12-1)
- Moral Guidance Based Feedback vs. Sexual Attention (2021-11-24)
- Harnessing the Motivations of Others (2022-4-20)
- Pursuing Flow to develop Confidence and Trust (2022-4-22)

When managing one's relationships with people in general, and women especially (e.g. girlfriends, wives, daughters, mother-in-laws, coworkers, and others), one might think that this task is focused on extracting certain feelings or responses from them. However, a man could adopt a wider frame by concentrating on how he can harness the motivations that are already in play (indicated by one's Communication Style) such to guide, mould, and shape the feelings and responses of others that are already in circulation.

Asserting masculine authority and assuming control of the interaction in this way would be a dominant approach by definition, and also a healthier approach, socially, spiritually, and psychologically. Thus, being dominant does not require a man to have a dominant personality, but only to skillfully navigate the social landscape while guiding the motivations of others into productive channels. Thus, the usefulness of this approach is not limited to men dealing with women of particular interest, but extends to men dealing with most anyone.

In this post, I'll briefly cover the basic information you'll need to know for handling each of the four Communication Styles / Personality Types in the following areas.

1. Tips for Communication.
2. Helping them to identify goals and work towards goals.
3. Dealing with projects that they have to work on.
4. Giving praise and recognizing them in a way they can appreciate.
5. Offering constructive criticism.
6. Fostering Motivation.

Here, motivation could be compared to dispensing personalized incentives which are tailored to the individual. Wisdom recognizes that properly addressing the communication needs of certain key individuals has the potential to disentangle the more volatile aspects of larger group dynamics in a community, workplace, or team environment.

Analyticals

Analyticals = Slow Paced and Cool / Introverted and Thinking.

Communicating with an Analytical: Analyticals will test you on the facts and how accurate you are, so you'll need to know your stuff. Effective communication with an analytical personality requires you to structure your communication in a way that will trigger their engagement – deliver the facts, speak to both sides of the argument, and allow them some time to process what you've said.

- Be systematic.
- Focus on the task.
- Look for opportunities to incorporate authority and consistency into your presentation.
- Be prepared to answer lots of "how" and "why" questions.
- Don't get too personal.
- Don't rush unnecessarily.

Goals: When setting goals, you'll want to…

- Be prepared.
- Know your facts.
- Be very specific.
- Cite examples.
- Offer reference materials.

Working on a Project: Analyticals will want to know what they need to do in order to complete a project. They may ask or expect you to help them form networks with other individuals who know more than they do about specific things, or to recommend other individuals who they can consult for supporting information. They may want books, technical papers, links to websites, software, and other materials. Analyticals work best alone, so you might want to consider that when giving them a project. You can give them a deadline, but because they are such perfectionists, they may procrastinate because they want it done perfectly. It's not like they're irresponsible about delivering on their commitments, but it's because they want to be recognized for reliably doing things right.

Giving Praise: When praising them be very specific. Express a genuine appreciation concerning their thoroughness, their attention to detailed information, and their independent innovative thinking. Emphasize how their contribution has streamlined or added value to the project.

Offering Criticism: When criticizing, keep it objective and make sure that you are stating facts and observations and not opinions.

Motivating an Analytical: Not surprisingly, Analyticals love to think and analyze. Often times, being freely able to do this is a motivator in itself. When you're dealing with this specific personality type, it is probably wiser to share as much information as you can while appealing to their curiosity. Allow them some time and space to formulate their own hypotheses and don't pressure them to the point of frustration.

Amiables

Amiables = Slow Paced and Warm / Introverted and Feeling.

Communicating with an Amiable: This type is diplomatic, service oriented, and they have a high degree of empathy. They value authenticity and sincerity more than the other types and find it difficult to relate to authoritative figures, such as doctors and policemen. As such, they need time and enthusiastic emotional investment. Make the effort to build rapport by talking with them about various issues, including personal issues they might bring up that are not really related to the project or the workplace. Being hesitant to close the interaction can end the conversation on a positive note.

Goals: Ask them about their goals and get them talking about what they will be doing to reach those goals. This will help them think through the process, and you can offer guidance, insights, and useful suggestions in a friendly and helpful manner. Be patient because they take a little bit more time than the other personality types.

Working on a Project: With projects, they work best on teams. Give them deadlines. Most likely they will meet the deadlines because they'll want to make sure that their relationships with their coworkers and supervisor are solid.

Giving Praise: When praising them, be specific about what they have done well. Emphasize the positive social implications and how they have benefitted others or have contributed to workplace morale.

Offering Criticism: With criticism, be sure to offer more positive statements than negatives, and always alternate between positives and negatives. Never give them a long list of negatives back to back as this will discourage their interest and erode their motivation.

Motivating an Amiable: Amiables confuse assertiveness and confrontation. They fail to execute because they are afraid of rocking the boat. Your job is to help them develop emotional intelligence, especially when it comes to being assertive. The key to coaching Amiables is to help them get over their emotional sticking points. Identify these issues, reframe their situation as one in which they have a supportive role rather than a competitive one, and help them work through those issues from this perspective. Avoid long lectures and pep-talks. Emphasize cooperation, moral agency, and the good will of others.

Expressives

Expressives = Fast Paced and Warm / Extroverted and Feeling

Communicating with an Expressive: This type thrives on attention, affirmation, and positive feedback. They may not always pay attention to everything you say nor pick up on your main point. So you'll need to be persistent in making yourself heard. Keep it light, be humorous, and pontificate a bit to keep their attention.

Goals: This type is generally resistant to discipline, so a hard line approach won't work. Instead, talk to them about their goals. Have them put it in writing. Make to-do lists with a timeline of schedules. Go over it briefly but remember that you are going to have to revisit this with them again and again because of their flighty nature.

Working on a Project: With projects, they work best on teams. With deadlines you may need to set a series of deadlines for each step of the project, and then check back with them several times to gauge their progress. Make sure that they know that you're going to check back so that they know that they're accountable.

Giving Praise: When giving them praise, spend some time to talk about their own interests with an affirming attitude. Be very specific and bring up the positive effects / responses from others. Make references to their personal characteristics that you know they are proud of. It's better if you can make it fun and entertaining.

Offering Criticism: Expressives are rather sensitive to criticism and can find it very difficult to deal with. So you'll need to couch every critical statement in a tone of swashbuckling hubristic schmooze talk, in terms of their own popularity, that serves to paint a picture of what kind of negative influence they have had without being too obviously vindictive. Avoid using second person pronouns. Say something nice and then state your observation and what you need changed, and then say something nice again.

Motivating an Expressive: Expressives are celebrities at heart. They live for the recognition. They live for the praise. They live for the fun. So you'll get a better reaction from them if you can view them as such. Allow them some avenues (or leeway) for personal expression and toss them some ego candy now and then.

Drivers

Drivers = Fast Paced and Cool / Extroverted and Thinking.

Communicating with a Driver: When dealing with a driver, stay focused on the topic and be results orientated. When describing or explaining something, be brief, and offer concepts not details. Be assertive with them, and always be ready for a challenge. If you can do these things consistently, then you may earn their respect. Otherwise they may try to roll you.

Goals: Drivers want to make an impact and accomplish great things. They need to know exactly what the goals are and if it is not explicitly clear to them, they will fill in the blanks and implement their own goals. So with this type, it is important to coordinate goals. Ask them about their goals until they can clearly articulate them. Find ways to adjust and merge their goals into the larger group goals so that they can hit the nail on the head.

Working on a Project: Because this type needs to coordinate their goals with the goals of others and those of the larger group, ask them about how they want to go about working on the project. Drivers work best on their own, but when this is not possible, you can help by smoothing the road for them to cooperate with others who are working on the same project. You can give them a deadline but they will always complete it before then.

Giving Praise: Get right to the point when praising a Driver. Be short, sweet, and specific.

Offering Criticism: Explain the end result that you want, and how the issue at hand is preventing that. You'll want to be specific. Start by describing what you have observed. Allow them to respond and then suggest some techniques that will help them make greater progress.

Motivating a Driver: Drivers are always very focused on the goal and they know what they want to accomplish. So if there is any confusion about what the goals are, or how it is to be achieved, then Drivers lose motivation. Drivers can be motivated by clear actionable goals and a call to action. They are further motivated when they see that their efforts are successful and have an advantageous or beneficial impact.

Can you identify their Personalities / Communication Styles by their non-verbal expressions?
Among those four in the foreground, clockwise from top center: Analytical, Amiable, Expressive, Driver.

Summary

Here's a short, quick summary of the basic needs of the 4 personalities / communication styles.

- Fast Paced and Warm (Expressives) => Need to be liked.
- Fast Paced and Cool (Drivers) => Need to have clear choices spelled out for them.
- Slow Paced and Warm (Amiables) => Need guidance towards finding contentment and peace, and to avoid guilt, regret, and shame.
- Slow Paced and Cool (Analytics) => Need to have a detailed confirmation / explanation without getting confused and/or overwhelmed by said details (viz. avoid Analysis Paralysis).

In general, Slow Paced / Introverted individuals need time, while Fast Paced / Extroverted people need directives. Warm / Feeling personalities need social interaction, whereas Cool / Thinkers need space.

Red Pill Rollover

An update on how the Manosphere has changed since 2020.

Introduction

At the end of 2018, I predicted a new era of Red Pill awareness.

> "MGTOW will continue running strong during this time, and Christian RP, and Married RP will slowly pick up steam. We're still waiting for a RP Fathers group to kick in. I anticipate that the substance of RP topics will turn to be more personal, and more context oriented."

It's been 3.5 years since then. I was right about MGTOW and that RP topics would become more personal and context oriented. But ever since the great RP schism of 2020, the Christian RP has just been hanging on by a thread, and Married RP is almost totally obliterated. There's no sign of RP Fathers yet.

Here are some changes since my last assessment of the Manosphere in Moon Day Review – The Manosphere Reshuffles its Deck (2020/9/2). I have not included blogs that went down before then. Also, there are a lot of new YouTube channels and Vblogs that are not included here.

Discussion

As you can see, there is a much greater number of Manosphere/Red Pill blogs making an exit than are making a debut. 34 going out, and 14 coming in, compared to 36 remaining steady over a 21-month span. This is a slightly bigger turnover than the last time, in which there were 34 going out, 10 coming in, and 38 remaining steady over the previous 21 months!

All these changes have left the “RP Marriage” category on the Σ Frame blogroll empty! Not surprising, since the topic of marriage has become extremely unpopular these days.

As of now, there are very few remaining authors of the Christian Manosphere who are continuing to produce insights with respect to Biblical proscriptions of masculinity, morality, and the spiritual significance of various topics (e.g. parenting, effective fatherhood, life-purpose, sanctification, etc.). Our numbers are down, but we’re not done yet. I believe there is still much more to be examined through a Biblical RP lens.

Ressentiment, Shame, and Accusation within Progressive Identity Politics

Jack · 20 June 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The universal mechanism for correction has been inverted for ulterior purposes.

Readership: All; Men; Single Men;

Length: 1,300 words

Introduction

In The Disease of Decadent Christianity (2022-4-29), J. M. Smith explained an older argument (originating from Nietzsche) about how Ressentiment within Christianity has debased the religion. I explored this further in The Decadent Christian (Ressentimentalism) (2022-5-18), in which I showed that ressentimented Christian beatitudes parallel the cultural trend of fourth wave intersectional feminism. This is a harbinger of evil that I wish to remind the reader to pay close attention to when reading/watching the news or interacting with others.

During my study of ressentiment in writing this post, I found a few other articles which describe ressentiment from different perspectives and how the rot of ressentiment has infected our lives in various ways. Learning how the tentacles of ressentiment have affected our lives may deeply affect some readers. So this post and another coming up will relay some noteworthy concepts that deserve our greater attention.

One such article was Doug Wilson's No Forgiveness at All for the Pasty White Orcs of Northern European Descent (2022-5-9). In this essay, Wilson paints a precise illustration of the ressentiment within Woke Identity Politics (although he does not label it as such). To concisely capture the description of how ressentiment is applied to police the progressive narrative, I've extracted relevant excerpts from two sections of Wilson's essay, The Shame Factor, and As Woke as the Devil. [Images and section titles have been added. Some passages have been reordered for ease of comprehension.]

The Shame Factor

> "Every social organization polices its own ranks. Not only so, but every social organization has shame as one of the tools in their toolbox for maintaining order. This is true of unrighteous societies, and it is true of righteous ones. The difference between them does not concern whether or not shame is used, but rather what things that society determines to be shameful. Again, not whether, but which."
> "When societies punish, one of the most potent elements of the punishment needs to be shame. When a society is stable and secure, this assigned shame almost always works."

In times past, s1ut shaming saved many young women from the CC and reduced the number of spinsters drinking up the wine cellar. It also kept families together and men out of the divorce mill and the pall mall.

> "…a society is in the process of being taken over by an alternative worldview when a large portion of the population adopts an alien standard of ethics, one that glories in what the older order used to believe was shameful."

We are now witnessing this revision in full force. Clown world takes front and center stage in politics, education, and social media. Christianity and anything remotely traditional is scorned to shame if not criminalized.

> "So you know that a society is falling apart when a large portion of the population is shameless, not humiliated by anything. When that happens, you have reached the point where the center does not hold. That society is in the process of disintegrating, as vast swaths of our generation are doing right this minute. We have a conceited generation, filled with narcissistic helium, who feel themselves to be, in de Tocqueville's apt phrase, "more than kings, and less than men." This is where we are."

An Honor to be Shamed

One of the ongoing points of discussion on this blog is how there is a general attitude of dishonor and disrespect towards good men, while immoral and unethical men receive honor and respect. As a result, men see little value in being honorable or respectable.

> "Every Christian believer who wants to withstand this pressure needs to understand the mechanism of the trap, how the pressure works. That mechanism is called shame."
> "So the only Christians who have been able to stand against the pressures of this woke jihad are those Christians who have been inoculated against the world's shaming devices. This is why I would like to thank the powers that be for giving all [Christians] years to practice on this. Some of the believers who might tend to be the most susceptible to this kind of pressure would be our women… Contrary to [our] expectations, the effect has been quite liberating."
> "As far as the apostles were concerned, it was an honor to be dishonored. It was a grace to be disgraced. It was their glory to be beaten and abused. And when that switch has finally flipped, they have no power over you whatever. That is Christian liberty."

According to Wilson's argument, it stands to reason that good men might expect to be shamed within a corrupt culture, and if they choose to endure such derision, it is a strong indicator that they are truly good, and not simply posture posing for self-righteous virtue signaling. So a partial answer to the ongoing point of discussion is simply that we live in a corrupt society. This is quite apparent and so we already know this at some level. Although this does not offer much comfort or encouragement, it does provide a modicum of consolation.

He couldn't endure the shame.

The Accusation Factor

> "The beating heart of identity politics is accusation. This is what makes it diabolical, through and through. Too many people think of the devilish spirit in terms of severed goats' heads, guttering candles, black clothing and fingernail polish, and pentagrams. That's just junior high devilish stuff. The devil is a high accuser, riding into the council of the gods on his high horse. He accuses Job of hypocrisy and time serving (Job 1:9-11). He accuses the brethren day and night before the throne (Rev. 12:10). "Does that white boy serve God for nothing? Look at all his stinking privilege." He draws himself up to his full height, with his neck full of righteousness, and he points a censorious finger at you and all your sorry ways. Not only so, but his ministers are filled up with the same kind of peevish righteousness (2 Cor. 11:15). They can't handle any of that stinking privilege either, and if you have any of it on you, you are going to hear about it.
> Compare this shining and self-approving self-righteousness to the way of the cross. For all their professions of love for the ideals of egalitarianism, they hate God's version of it — the leveling power of the cross. In the cross, God closes the distance between His holiness, on the one hand, and all princes and all beggars on the other. All men are equally guilty in Adam, and all men contribute sins of their own. The beggars use two-dollar hookers, and princes fly to Epstein's island. All men are corrupt and morally diseased, and this most certainly includes those who have conveniently and quite self-servingly dubbed themselves to be in a sacrosanct victim class. Before His holiness, God flattens every man."

Joy Shaming

Thou shalt be JOYFUL, dammit!

> Those who sow in tears Shall reap in joy.
> Psalm 126:5 (NKJV)

Joy and Sorrow

Joy is a product of salvation (Psalm 35:9) and contentment (Psalm 63:5). Romans 15:13 associates joy and peace with trust in the lord (sometimes translated as faith or hope). Joy comes when justice is served (Psalm 67:4) and mercy is granted (Psalm 106:1). Galatians 5:22 sets joy in a list of fruits of the spirit that contrast with the deeds of the flesh.

There is a common assumption that the "appropriateness" of one's joy within a specific social setting directly corresponds to one's confidence and social efficacy, and to a large extent, this is true.

However, it is a mistake to judge one's salvation, contentment, and trust in God by the intensity or frequency of one's joy. The saints in scripture were joyful at times, but also full of sorrow and suffering in others. Think of Job, the Psalms, or the origination of "the man of sorrows" (Isaiah 53:3).

You will not find "sorrow" or "pain" among the list of deeds of the flesh. Those who pursue the desires of the flesh don't do so for the sorrowful ɦəl1 of it, but rather to avoid the same. There are immediate motivations for sin and disobedience that carry rewards that are quite pleasant and satisfying. Sometimes even redemptive!

1960s style debauchery, with a line of cocaine and a glass of whisky, certainly is a lot of fun!

Joy Shaming

In essence, Joy Shaming is when someone takes issue with the fact that another person has a different expression or intensity of joy than their own, and subjects that person to shame for this reason.

Joy Shaming comes in two varieties, positive and negative.

1. Negative — Mocking and teasing a person for being enthusiastic, open hearted, and overjoyed, as though the person is a naive imbecile or has gone mad.
2. Positive — Objectifying, ostracizing, and/or rejecting a person for not being as upbeat and enthusiastic as they would like to see.

Taken to the extreme, it can break down trust and goodwill between parties.

Joy Shaming — Negative Type 1

Type 1 is most often seen in the world, when cynical, jaded people taunt or tease those who are more expressive of their emotions, especially those who are idealistic, inexperienced, or pure of heart.

To offer some examples…

- When upper classmen haze their juniors.
- When seasoned coworkers play practical jokes on new employees.
- Those who have bad habits single out those without bad habits, making them out to be arrogant, “goody-two-shoes”, or “too good for us”, when in fact, they are more healthy.
- When promiscuous women joy shame chaste women in an effort to pull them down to their level, instead of chaste women shaming those who are promiscuous.

Of note, Type 1 is the social tool most often used to pressure others to join in on the race to the bottom.

Joy Shaming — Positive Type 2

Type 2 is often seen within, but certainly not limited to, evangelical circles.

- When Christian laymen who lack joy are questioned and treated cooly.
- When pastors and elders who lack joy are faced with criticism of their ministries.
- When bible teachers, elders, or pastors demand joy from certain people in the congregation.
- When specific individuals are avoided or shunned simply because they are uncomfortably honest and serious.

I have even seen people going so far as to deny the title "Christian" or "brother" to those they deem to lack joy.

Willem DaFoe stars in Last Temptation of Christ (1988).
The remainder of this essay will focus on Type 2 Positive Joy Shaming within the church.

Reasons for Joy Shaming

There are several reasons "teachers" employ the joy-card, but the basic running theme is that they refuse to engage with someone on a personal level.

1. Arrogance: Teachers won't acknowledge a point or question brought up as being legitimate. "You are just angry / bitter / mad / etc. and lack joy. End of discussion."
2. Deflection: It deflects the inquisition, changes the subject, and redirects focus so now they ask the questions. "Having another bad day, eh? Let's try not to bring everyone down for once."
3. Manipulation: It causes those who have questions or criticisms to doubt themselves, and/or makes them afraid of speaking up. "If you were a true believer / more mature in your faith / etc., then you might see things differently."
4. Shame: It is a shaming tactic in order to appear morally and spiritually superior. "I'd hate to be you."

It should be obvious that "joy" in this context is being misused, or rather abused.

Such tactics are often employed on social media, where a false authority faces an information imbalance – a person knows more about them than the teacher knows about the random person. The teacher then coopts this criticism (any criticism) from a random person to make themselves out to be a victim. That is, the random person is made out to be spiritually wrong or weak by criticizing his moral superior.

Their false demand for an ambiguously defined joy is, in essence, a demand for people to not ask questions or levy any complaints their way. Taken to its logical conclusion, however, demands for joy are essentially a demand for conformity / "works" in order to achieve acceptance, righteousness, and salvation.

Joy Shaming is Intellectual Dishonesty

Wherever there is criticism, there is often the question of whether it is justified. An honest person who is troubled by unfair criticism would acknowledge the criticism and address how the criticism creates division, enmity, etc. But the fact that these teachers resort to accusations of joylessness is interesting. By deflecting and shifting the matter to a person's alleged lack of joy, the criticism is never acknowledged. That deflection is an expression of arrogance — a trait any "teacher" or "elder" should NOT have. (Read Training Pastors and Elders in the Church.)

Joy Shaming is Spiritual Abuse

If a joy shaming tactic is ever used against you by a person claiming to be a church authority, you have encountered a spiritually abusive person. Spiritual abuse is a topic assiduously avoided in church circles, but I'll suffice it to say that it is a fruit of an evil spirit. I encourage all to read The Subtle Power of Spiritual Abuse by David Johnson and Jeff Van Vonderen.

I have yet to see a person employ this tactic (pulling the joy-card) who isn't later revealed to be a false teacher. Red flags should be present whenever a "reformed" person pulls the joy card.

Conclusions

There is a significant difference between Joy and comfort/Peace. Expressing joy is a fruit of the spirit and an expression of contentment and peace. However, Joy can very well be experienced by those who aren't saved. Those who are saved typically have few moments of happiness in their life. Persecution… cough.

It is theologically problematic to associate any criticism of a "teacher" or ministry with joylessness, just as it would be problematic to associate all criticism with several deeds of the flesh. It is especially problematic when the ministry or teacher regularly engages in criticism of others themselves (such as feminism).

Spiritually abusive types tend to focus on the feeelz goods, and avoid criticism and honest discussion entirely. They thrive on ambiguity and habitually toss up word salads. If you see “teachers” exhibiting intellectual or spiritual fragility online, stay away from them.

In dealing with those who truly lack joy, instead of questioning the authenticity of their faith, we should be praying for that person to receive the joy of salvation (Psalm 51:12).

Don’t get caught up in the fear-inducing demands for works, including the emotion work of expressing joy, and extra-biblical mantras such as “Christian hedonism,” etc. If a person chooses to express an inauthentic joy requiring emotion work, then it should be done in faith for the inspiration of others. Authentic joy cannot be demanded of others, and if it is, then this can be abusive.

Ressentiment within Feminism has become a Generational Curse

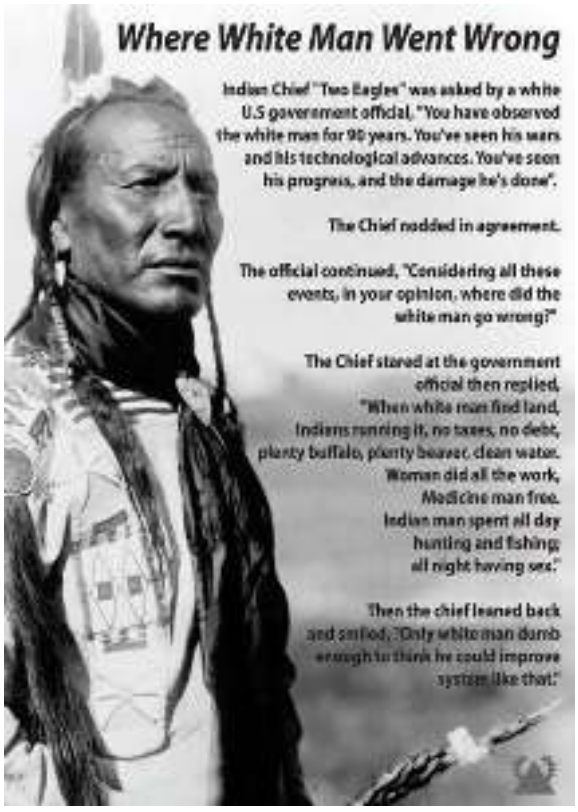
Introduction

In The Disease of Decadent Christianity (2022-4-29), J. M. Smith explained an older argument (originating from Nietzsche) about how Ressentiment within Christianity has debased the religion. I explored this further in The Decadent Christian (Ressentimentalism) (2022-5-18), in which I showed that ressentimented Christian beatitudes parallel the cultural trend of fourth wave intersectional feminism. I wish to remind readers to pay close attention to ressentimented values when reading/watching the news or interacting with others.

During this study of ressentiment, I found a few other articles which describe ressentiment and how the rot of ressentiment has infected our lives in various ways. One such article was a post from Doug Wilson that described Ressentiment, Shame, and Accusation within Progressive Identity Politics (2022-6-20).



In this post, I'll cover an article from Amerika, Fallout From Roe v. Wade Wrecked Gen X (2022-5-9). Here, Brett Stevens described the ressentiment of the Baby Boomers in terms of its effects on Generation X. It should be duly noted that these effects extend to subsequent generations, and may very well continue indefinitely until such time it is checked. I've extracted relevant excerpts from Steven's essay below. [Images and section titles have been added. Some passages have been reordered for ease of comprehension.]

Generation X — The Generation with No Name

The ressentimented value of sex, matrimony, and human life itself lit the destructive fires of Molech for the generation born during the advent of the sexual revolution, birth control pills, legalized abortion, and no fault divorce.

> "Generation X was the first generation of kids to come up in a world where abortion is normal. We belonged to parents who saw us as optional children, or creatures which could have been aborted or avoided."
> "In the same way that people claimed that a lack of legal abortion was oppression, they also found their own children to be a burden if the children did not do exactly what the parents wanted.
> We realized that we were the first generation that was entirely disposable. We were optional children. When we displeased our parents, we know they were thinking fondly of their ability to unmake us through abortion and divorce."

Steven's description really hits home for Gen Xer's like myself and probably many readers too. The feeling that our very existence is an "accident" that was deemed acceptable, according to the mother's moods of that moment, rather than an unacceptable one. The idea that many of our peers happened to come along during a bad parental mood or life circumstance, and didn't make it past delivery. Personally, I often feel that I have friends who I never got to know, who were taken away from this world before they even entered it — disembodied spirits who call out from the world beyond. The numbers prove that my impression is legit.

Generation X — The Generation with a Variable Identity

> "The dominant message of the time was that of individualism."

When I was growing up in the 1970s, I distinctly remember a very popular phrase that was made into a song, and then a book, "Free to be, you and me." My Boomer cousin gave me a copy of this book. It said things like, "Ladies first!", "Love is all around", "Love is for everyone", "It's OK to cry", and "Feeling angry is normal", which were revolutionary notions at that time. Looking back, I find that Gloria Steinem was behind this movement targeted at children.

> "In essence, this was the same bourgeois idea we have always seen in the West when the workers take over: you are a victim, and you have no obligation to anything but yourself as a result, therefore take whatever you can get and get out.
> It is a working class refrain as old as the hills. You are responsible for nothing except to rebel against The Man. The "elites" pick up on it because it gives them an excuse to take out their enemies while claiming to be part of the victim cult."

Back in their heyday of the 1960s and 1970s, the Boomers, AKA "The Me Generation", were famous for rebelling against "The Establishment", which was a code word for traditional conservatism. This was so ensconced within their ethics that Boomers often repeated amongst themselves that "No one over the age of 30 is to be trusted."

> "The individualism of the Baby Boomers meant that for the first time, growing up and getting married to have a family with children (if you could) was not a universal goal. Instead. it was one option for utilitarian "happiness."

It has been said that the Baby Boomers are/were an evil generation. Here's a clue as to why.

> "If you were not happy with your marriage or children, you could claim egalitarian victimhood… that is, you were deprived of something that you should have had. This meant that ironically your children were oppressing you.
> For Generation X, this was a real threat. Kids were getting kicked out of the house at eighteen or even before, turned in to the state, or relocated to distant relatives in the chaos of sexual liberation and divorce.
> Not surprisingly, this generation grew up with a reluctance to form attachments to others. Democracy as a psychological influence seems to take normal groups and turn them into apathetic bourgeois narcissists, and this is just one turn of that cycle."

I suspect that Gen X was not the only generation who experienced such things, but that this generational curse has extended down through Millennials and iGen as well. Just as it is repeated several times throughout scripture (Exodus 20:5; Exodus 34:7; Numbers 14:18; Deuteronomy 5:9)…

> "…you shall not bow down to them nor serve them. For I, the Lord your God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth *generations of those who hate Me…"
> Deuteronomy 5:9 (NKJV)

And so, after all these years, we see the deeper meaning and natural consequences of "Free to be, you and me."

Roe v. Wade is Repealed

On 22 January 1973, the Supreme Court of the United States foisted on the American people one of the most evil government edicts in history. They made child sacrifice, Moloch worship — euphemistically known as "abortion", or "a woman's right to choose", or "women's reproductive rights" — the law of the land. In one of the worst miscarriages of law, justice, logic, and grammar in history, the Supreme Court found a "right" in the 14th Amendment of the US Constitution that anyone capable of reading English knows isn't there.

Before the Supreme Court's decision, murdering babies in the womb was legal in some states, and illegal in others. The Supreme Court made it illegal to make Moloch worship illegal. As a result, since 1973, an estimated 65 million American babies have been sacrificed on the feminist altar of "women's rights".

On 24 June 2022, the Supreme Court finally reversed itself.

First, let's get something out of the way. Black-pilled, can't-win–may-as-well-not-try, doom-and-gloomers will say that it doesn't matter that the Supreme Court overturned Roe v. Wade. These are the same black-pilled, can't-win–may-as-well-not-try, doom-and-gloomers who said that the Supreme Court would never overturn Roe v. Wade. They were wrong then, and they're wrong now. There's no reason to believe they've grown any wiser. They deserve only to be ignored.

Abortion is "Sacred"

Pretty much everything has a spiritual component. The spiritual component of a thing is almost always its most important component, but most people almost always ignore the spiritual component.

Abortion most definitely contains a spiritual component. Child sacrifice always does. That's not my opinion.

According to Planned Parenthood, “abortion is sacred”.

> “Our reproductive health, including abortion care, is sacred. Our ancestors knew what plants and other resources around us were safe for abortion, lactation, fertility, anxiety, arthritis, or any other ailment or health condition we faced. We have always known best how and when to start a family, space our children, how to raise them, and talk to them.
> Yes, our children in this realm are sacred. They are sacred because they are the entities into which we pour our time and love because we want to, not because we are forced to. No one should be forced to stay pregnant if they don’t want to. I am here because of abortion — someone down the line of ancestors knew when it was and wasn’t time for expanding their family. My own children are here because of abortion.
>
> Just as my children and yours are sacred, so is our decision to have an abortion.”
> Planned Parenthood of Illinois: Abortion is sacred. And the Supreme Court can’t take that away from us. (2021/12/3)

Abortion is a “Sacrament”

Feminists have been referring to abortion as a “sacrament” for years.

In describing the book, The Sacrament of Abortion, by Ginette Paris, Fr. Frank Pavone writes,

> “In this short book, the author claims that abortion is a sacred act, a sacrifice to Artemis (known to the Romans as Diana).
> Artemis is both a protector of wild animals and a hunter who kills them with deadly aim. How can these contradictory roles be found in the same female deity? The view proposed in this book is that a mother properly cares for life only if she possesses full power over life and death. Death is sometimes preferable. The one who can provide death, in order that one may escape an unfriendly life, is really loving the one who is being killed.

> Abortion, then, is seen as "an expression of maternal responsibility and not a failure of maternal love" (p.8). "Artemis stands for the refusal to give life if the gift is not pure and untainted… As Artemis might kill a wounded animal rather than allow it to limp along miserably, so a mother wishes to spare the child a painful destiny" (p. 55).
> Artemis, of course, is the same goddess whose worshippers felt so threatened by Paul's proclamation of the Gospel in Ephesus, where a riot nearly broke out and a vast crowd shouted for two hours, "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!" (Acts 19:34). The worshippers of Artemis today should likewise feel that their beliefs are threatened, because the proclamation of the Gospel of Christ is that He alone has authority over life and death. Neither the mother, nor the father, nor the state, nor the individual herself, can claim absolute dominion over life. "Nobody lives as his own master, and nobody dies as his own master. While we live, we are responsible to the Lord, and when we die, we die as His servants. Both in life and death, we are the Lord's" (Rom. 14:7-8).
> The fact that some defend abortion as a sacred act should alert us to the depth of the spiritual warfare that is going on. Abortion has never been merely or even primarily a political issue. It is a false religion. When pro-life Christians, for example, pray in front of an abortion mill, it is not simply a matter of pro-life people opposing false medicine. It is the true Church in conflict with a false Church. One former clinic security guard, after being converted, admitted why he was angry at pro-life sidewalk counselors: "You were coming to protest in front of our church. That clinic was where we conducted our worship."
> Priests for Life: The "Sacrament" of Abortion (2011/6/20)

Again, these are their words, not mine.

Abortion is a Religion

It should have surprised precisely no one when the Satanic Temple "introduced a 'satanic abortion ritual' to argue for a religious exception" to laws restricting abortion.

> "The Satanic Temple (TST) said its adherents should be permitted religious exceptions to perform religious > abortion rituals in states that have put up barriers to the controversial procedure.

> Responding to a leaked Supreme Court opinion draft that would overturn Roe v. Wade, TST said it was committed to protecting "religious abortion access" for its members.
> "In states that outlaw abortion but grant exceptions for instances of incest and rape," TST said in a statement, "members should be permitted a religious exception to perform TST's religious abortion ritual."
> The religious organization introduced the "Satanic Abortion Ritual" to argue for a religious exception under the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), a 1993 federal law which made it illegal for states to interfere in anyone's religion without demonstrating a compelling interest.
> TST's argument was that if it regarded abortion as a religious ritual, then the state could not legally intervene or burden patients with prerequisites. The "ritual" argument came amid a series of lawsuits aimed at Missouri where women are, among other things, compelled to read "informed consent" booklets before going through with an abortion.
>
> One of their arguments was that subjecting its members to these requirements violated one of its central tenets: "one's body is inviolable, subject to one's own will alone."
>
> Fox News: Satanic Temple to argue abortion is ritual in legal challenges to states that put up hurdles to procedure (2022/5/9)

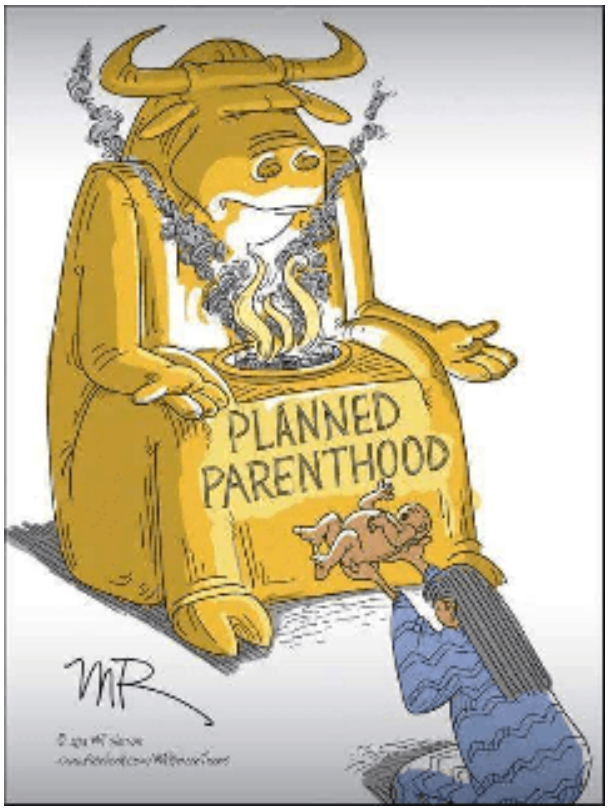
Abortion is Child Sacrifice

Abortion is satanic, Moloch-worshiping, child sacrifice, whether the people involved know it, or admit to it, or not.



God hates the shedding of innocent blood.

> [16] These six things the Lord hates,
> Yes, seven are an abomination to Him:
> [17] A proud look,

> A lying tongue,
> Hands that shed innocent blood
>
> Proverbs 6:16-17 (NKJV)

God absolutely hates child sacrifice.

> [21] And you shall not let any of your descendants pass through the fire to Molech, nor shall you profane the name of your God: I am the Lord.
> [24] 'Do not defile yourselves with any of these things; for by all these the nations are defiled, which I am casting out before you. [25] For the land is defiled; therefore I visit the punishment of its iniquity upon it, and the land vomits out its inhabitants. [26] You shall therefore keep My statutes and My judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations, either any of your own nation or any stranger who dwells among you [27] (for all these abominations the men of the land have done, who were before you, and thus the land is defiled), [28] lest the land vomit you out also when you defile it, as it vomited out the nations that were before you. [29] For whoever commits any of these abominations, the persons who commit them shall be cut off from among their people.
> [30] 'Therefore you shall keep My ordinance, so that you do not commit any of these abominable customs which were committed before you, and that you do not defile yourselves by them: I am the Lord your God.'"
> Leviticus 18:21,24-30 (NKJV)

Abortion Defiles the Land

These five acts that defile the land indicate a societal-wide rejection of the exclusive covenant with YHWH.
The shedding of innocent blood defiles a land.

> [33] So you shall not pollute the land where you are; for blood defiles the land, and no atonement can be made for the land, for the blood that is shed on it, except by the blood of him who shed it. [34] Therefore do not defile the land which you inhabit, in the midst of which I dwell; for I the Lord dwell among the children of Israel.

> Numbers 35:33-34 (NKJV)

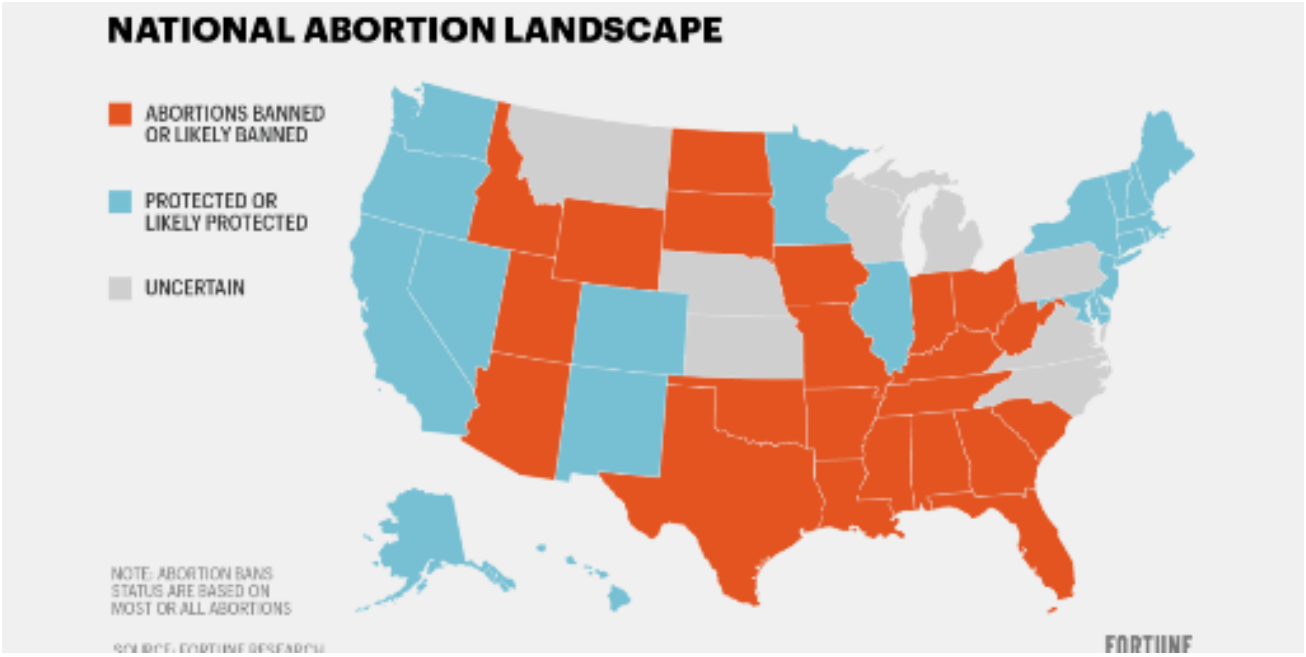
The word defiled appears frequently in the scriptures cited above. Defilement, similar to being unclean, has a spiritual component. A person who is defiled has committed certain acts (i.e. having an abortion) and/or has had certain experiences that cast a spell over one's spiritual constitution such that they come to possess certain emotional predilections and peculiar affections. It also affects one's state of mind such that they are predisposed to irrational subjective biases and they cannot think objectively. The end effect is that one becomes more emotional and less rational, more psychotic and less real, more given over to sentiments and less so to faith and education. Essentially, more feeelz, less conviction.

Worse, defilement becomes a permanent part of one's constitutional identity of the soul, such that one becomes unfit or unable to have certain other experiences in life (i.e. blessings, inner peace, shalom) leading to personal and spiritual maturation.

"Defiling the land" means that the defiling acts affect everyone living in that region, such that everyone becomes empathetic to the psychotic. Leviticus 18:28 indicates that even the natural creation cannot tolerate it. God hates it so much, that He's destroyed nations and empires because of it.

Cleansing the Land

Recognizing these truths is the first step towards cleansing a land defiled by the innocent blood shed upon it, but it's only the first step. There's a həll of a lot of work left to do. Here's where we now stand.



This is where the Black-pilled, can't-win-may-as-well-not-try, doom-and-gloomers will say, "A-ha! You see! It doesn't matter! Abortion is still legal!"

Allow me to present another chart. This gif demonstrates how dramatically concealed carry laws have changed in the USA since 1986.

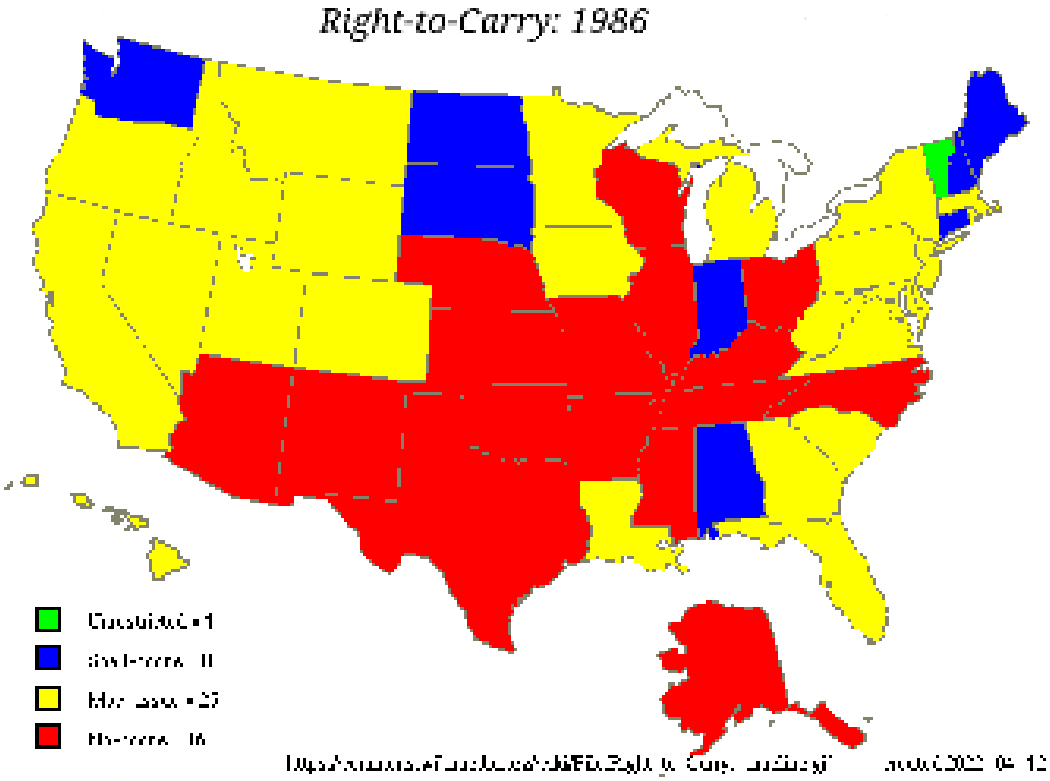


Image Source: HNI: Map of Concealed Carry Laws in the U.S. (2022/4/12)

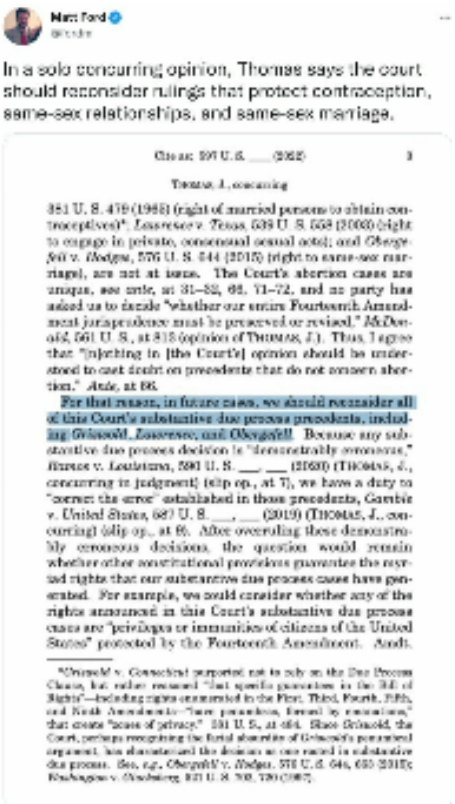
Have there been setbacks in gun rights since 1986? Of course there have been. You didn't expect a smooth ride, did you? Despite those setbacks, the trend is obvious.

"But that'll never happen with banning abortion!" say the same Black-pilled, can't-win-may-as-well-not-try, doom-and-gloomers who said the Supreme Court would never overturn Roe v. Wade. Seriously, they only deserve to be ignored.

Expect setbacks, and expect it to take a long time. I'm 46. Most of the Christians who were my age in 1973 and wept over Roe v. Wade died before its reversal. But, despite the setbacks, and the time it takes, expect us to slowly push the darkness back. And not just in the case of abortion.



I see overturning Roe v. Wade like Gideon destroying his town's idols and daring their pagan gods to do something about it (Judges 6:25-36).

Abortion is the Left's highest satanic sacrament, but not the only one. Not even close. Other idols will fall. It will take time, but they will fall.

Conclusions

None of this means we're out of the woods, as far as God's judgment goes. The USA almost split over slavery. The parallels are eerie. Pro-slavery people denied the humanity of black Africans to justify violating their right to liberty, just as pro-abortion people deny the humanity of babies in the womb to justify violating their right to life. The movement to abolish slavery originated in the church as a consequence of the doctrine of the Imago Dei, just as the movement to abolish abortion originated in the church as a consequence of the doctrine of the Imago Dei. If a similar split happens over abortion, understand that we deserve far worse. As in, Sodom-and-Gomorrah levels of worse.

Our part is to obey God, tear down idols, and leave the consequences to Him.

We rightfully rejoice in this victory, but we understand that this is only one battle in a very long war. We celebrate, and promptly roll up our sleeves and get back to work.

And we might want to consider attending church armed.

Faustian Slip Reveals All

Repealing Roe v. Wade lifted a veil for all to see the proponents' true colors.

Sometimes, idolaters can be quite frank, although it may not be their express intentions to do so.

In this video clip, one female protester gets honest in her efforts to derail the speaker's diatribe on sin and həll.

> Pro-abortion protester shouts "I want sex, I want to come, I want to orgasm!" pic.twitter.com/YIcJgssqPk
> — Valiant News (@ValiantNewsLive) June 24, 2022

She shouts, "I want c0ck! I want sex! I want to come! I want to orgasm!"

At its root, the maxim, "Girls just wanna have fun", reveals women's true motivation for demanding abortion and supporting Roe v. Wade. "Fun" is a euphemism for constant, continual, convenient, free-for-all carousel riding with absolutely no responsibilities nor shame whatsoever.

In another video clip of the same Dobbs protest at Washington D.C. on June 24, here we see Faustians proclaim their true master.

> Protesters in Washington, D.C. break out in a "hell" chant, then a woman shouts "Hail Satan" pic.twitter.com/aWWdc1Kd3B
> — Valiant News (@ValiantNewsLive) June 24, 2022

Note that the female speaker is giving them a fire and brimstone call to repentance, warning them against "going to həll", but what she fails to grasp is that her audience is already living in həll and enjoying it. They shouldn't have arranged a female to deliver that kind of sermon to this crowd, but it does match the unclean context in a Jonathan Edwardsian way — churchian hoes lecturing secular hoes about digging their graves. It's disgusting and hilarious at the same time.

Another interesting thing about these clips is the wide array of personality types. Among the men, there's an atheist (chanting), several male feminists of various sorts (some chads, some clueless betas, some neckbeards, and some smug chubbies), two Mormons, and a few Tyrones. Among the women, there's a couple püssy hatters (one chanting), a hefty termagant in a loud yellow t-shirt, a party girl, a sorority girl, a sweet coquette wearing a green bandanna (exclaiming "Hail Satan!"), and a very traditional looking woman in a black and white sundress.

The Fun must Necessarily be Expediently Convenient

> "It's not just that they murder their own babies. It's that they do it because convenience."

> Gunner Q2: A deep dive into the socialist hive (2022-6-24)

Yes, overturning Roe v. Wade eviscerates the god of materialistic convenience from the equation. This, I believe, is the biggest sting of all to its proponents. No more cuffing on the fly without a care in the world. No more cheap, easy, quick, secret abortions that no one will ever know about. Now an Artemisian must take time off work, travel to Storyville, and pay $$$ as an out-of-stater who didn't pay into the local tax coffer. And as the number of states that ban abortion increase, wimmin in some areas of the country (i.e. the deep South) will need to travel a very long distance indeed to appear for their date with the grim reaper, and they will feel quite embarrassingly out of place in Clowntown.

OTOH, if a woman doesn't go to the extra trouble that is now necessary to terminate a pregnancy, she'll find that that her life instantly becomes much less fun and convenient. She'll be forced to grow up and assume responsibility for herself and a child. She'll also find it more difficult to pursue a degree, hold down a "career", and the clincher – No Mo Hoeing!

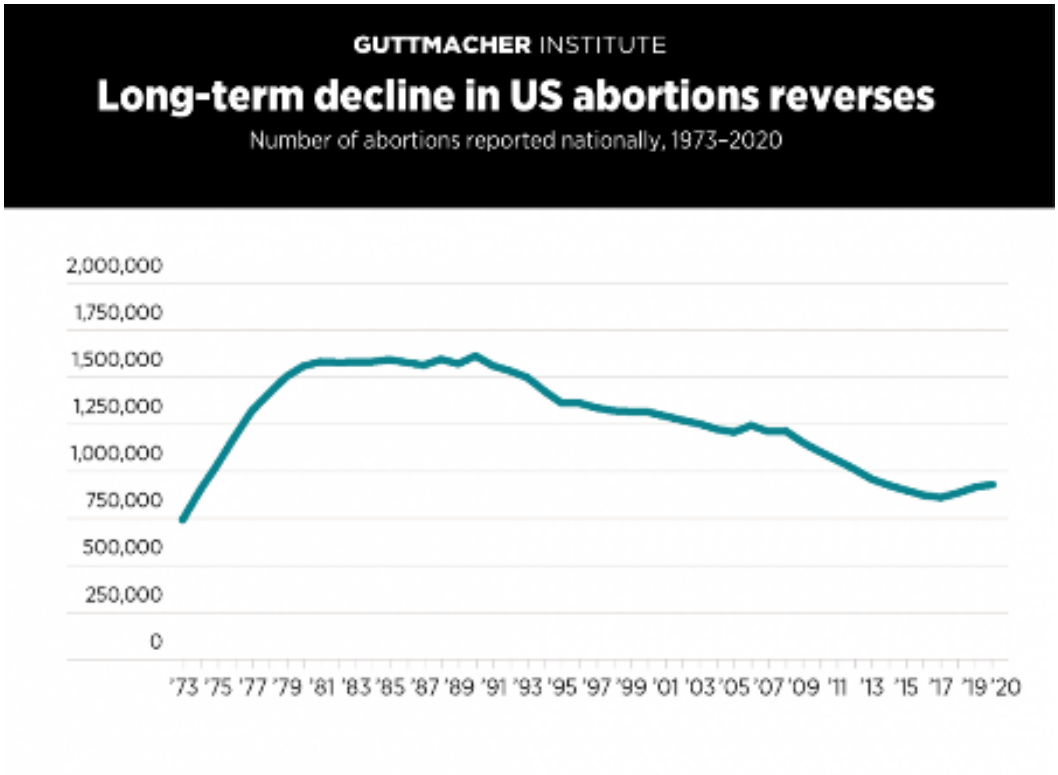
Your body your choice!

How did Roe v. Wade change the population?

Under Oscar's post, No Mo Roe (2022-6-27), LastMod wrote,

> "So I couldn't care less if abortion is legal or not because it doesn't make much difference. Legislation didn't stop abortion from happening pre 1973. Abortion didn't suddenly take off and become more popular after the pro-abortion marches in 1994."

Let's take a look at some data and then decide whether it made any difference or not.



Let's put this data into perspective. I've collected some data from several sources (listed at the post's end) and put together a graph that will make your stomach churn — The Percent of Pregnancies Aborted.

As can be seen in the graph, as soon as abortion was legalized in 1973, and the numbers started to be recorded, 18.13% of pregnancies ended in abortion. Within 7 years, this quickly ramped up to an all-time high of 31.12% by 1980. The rate hovered around 30% all throughout the 80s. 1990 concluded the debauchery of the eighties with an all-time high of 1,608,600 abortions that year — a grand finale of 29.06% of pregnancies. 1992 had an all-time high number of pregnancies, 5,510,229, with 27.75% going in the trashcan.

Moreover, for 12 years (1978-1990), nearly 1 out of every 3 babies were scuttled! When I first saw this data, it made me nauseous, which is probably why Guttmacher et al. will never depict the data this way.

Births and abortions didn't begin to decrease until 1993-94. Ironically, 1993-94 was the same time that the pro-abortion marches swept the nation. After this, the abortion rate began a steady decline, reaching an all-time low (since 1973) of 18% (862,320) in 2017. Since then, it has started increasing again.

In conclusion, LastMod's statement is dead wrong. Passing Roe v. Wade was a strong incentive for women to use abortion as a form of birth control. And as I will describe next, it also cleaned out the gene pool.

I have a pet theory about why the number of abortions dropped off precipitously in 1993-94. Around this time, the generation born after Roe v. Wade (the latter two-thirds of Gen X) was coming of age – a generation that was missing many of its cohorts due to the easy accessibility of abortion. Those cohorts who were missing were the terminated offspring of mothers who aborted them. The theory is that the decrease in abortions after 1993-94 is because those Boomer women who were willing to abort their babies didn't produce Gen X offspring who were similar to their ancestors in this respect. Over a generation (or two), this thinned out the number of women who were willing to abort their babies and grandbabies. In effect, women having an abortion-prone nature have self-selectedly removed their genes from the gene pool over the last 49 years, but especially during the first 20 years, as the last 29 years was from a population descended from stock that had already been picked through.

In scientific terminology, what I have described is a natural (or artificial?) selection resulting in a genetic drift. The bottleneck event is selectively removing ~30% of the birth population every year for 12 years and more than ~20% for another 37 years.

The bottleneck effect is an extreme example of genetic drift that happens when the size of a population is severely reduced.

How will the repeal of Roe v. Wade change the SMP/MMP?

The new ruling introduces a catastrophic fracture in the Feminist Life Script and mixes up women's choices of preferred mating strategies.

The new ruling puts more pressure on women to reassess their life choices concerning extramarital sex possibly resulting in a pregnancy. It leaves them five options.

1. Get married.
2. Embrace celibacy.
3. Have children out of wedlock.
4. Move to states where abortion is legal.*
5. Procure abortions in a state where abortion is legal.*

* Additions from Thedeti.

According to the Feminine Dilemma, women must work out a very complicated decision of whether to join with a man in a long term relationship, or else pursue an independent lifestyle. This new ruling forces a sharp urgency for women to make this decision early in life. It also imposes a strong pressure on women to abandon the Alpha Fux Beta Bux strategy and to get married.

Oh noes! No Mo Roe, No Mo Hoe!

How will the repeal of Roe v. Wade change the population in the future?

The future depends largely on what percentage of women can get their act together and secure a man for marriage, and quickly.

- If this percentage is high, then we can expect early marriages to become more common and the birth rate to go up.
- If this percentage is low, we can expect more out of wedlock births.

On the latter possibility, there are already a large number of out of wedlock births. This number has hovered around 40% since 2007, and will serve as a baseline for future analysis. Of these, there is a number of lower income single mothers intentionally having 2 or more children out of wedlock in order to game the court and/or the welfare system. This demographic serves as a buffer against any drastic changes in the Feminine Dilemma ratios. It will be interesting to see how the number of women doing this might change under the new ruling. We might speculate that the number of women playing this game will increase by default, since abortion is no longer easily accessible. Again, this depends on what percentage of women can get their honeycraft game on and lock down a man in marriage. If a sizeable number of women can't land a man, then we can expect the dolearchy to grow in size and power, possibly until socialism has been attained.

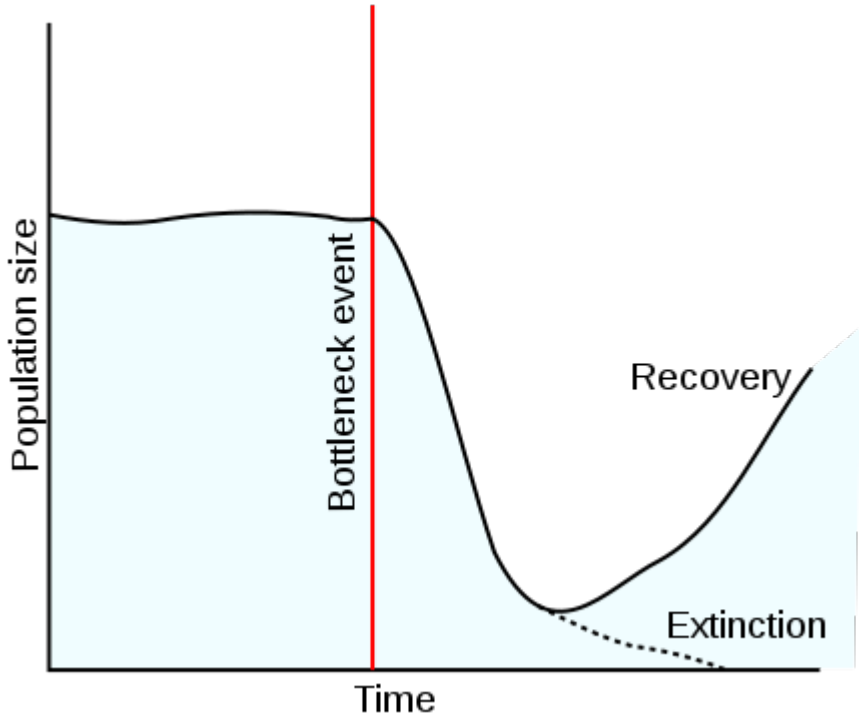
In conclusion, I will speculate that the biggest effect Repealing Roe v. Wade will have on the future population is a sharp increase in the number of minority and working class births (i.e. Blacks). These groups are less likely to use contraception and are less likely to travel out of state to procure an abortion, due to the costs and the time off work it would require.

Only time will tell.



Some populations will recover, while others will not.

The Introduction and the Repeal of Roe v. Wade both happened on a Jubilee?

This is incredible! It just so happens that 2021-9-7 to 2022-9-26 (year 5782 on the Jewish calendar) is a Sabbatical year. The previous Sabbatical year was in 1972-73, and we know what happened on 1973-1-22.

The Jubilee (Hebrew: יובל yōḇel; Yiddish: yoyvl) is the year at the end of seven cycles of shmita (Sabbatical years) and, according to biblical regulations, had a special impact on the ownership and management of land in the Land of Israel. According to Leviticus 25, Hebrew slaves and prisoners would be freed, debts would be forgiven, and the mercies of God would be particularly manifest.

I'm not at all familiar with the Jewish calendar, and I found some sources that put the years of Jubilee along 1960-2009, so I could be wrong about this. But if this is true, it seems like more than a coincidence. Knowledgeable readers are welcome to either confirm or correct this information.

A tragic tale of how a teenage girl was deceived into giving up the CC in exchange for keeping her twins!

Readership: All;
Theme: Abortion
Length: 1,100 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Snookered by Hope

Brooke Alexander became unexpectedly pregnant when she was 18, and she is now a married mother of twins. She initially thought she should have an abortion, but the Texas Heartbeat Act and a trip to a pregnancy resource center caused her to change her mind. Today, she is grateful for her children.

In spite of the happy ending, The Washington Post paints Brooke's story with a grim tone and makes it out to be a tragedy. Not just once, but in two articles, just in case any poor pregnant teen missed the foreboding warnings contained in the first one.

- The Washington Post: This Texas teen wanted an abortion. She now has twins. (2022-6-20)
- The Washington Post: She wanted an abortion. Now, she has twins. (2022-6-28)

The Sorrows of the Depraved

The hallmark of liberal reporting is that they always tell the story from the perspective of a slightly below average person (often times a minority) living a busy harried life, fighting fires, and never finding any peace or rest. Overall, the overdramatized message is that "Life is hard so we have to DO something to save ourselves from pain and suffering." It is also commonly suggested, usually implicitly, that the best way to do this is to escape responsibilities (e.g. abortion, birth control, profligate sex, etc.) and/or get the State involved (courts, police, welfare, etc.). The idea that a husband, father, boyfriend, or brother might be able to smooth things out in a jiffy is never mentioned, even though these are the men who are most likely to pitch a hand.

Father Helping Daughter with Homework

The weeping and gnashing of teeth at The Washington Post becomes more apparent when we look at some of their other articles concerning abortion and the Dobbs v. Jackson decision.

> "The phones started ringing, as they always did, moments after Houston Women's Reproductive Services opened for business at 9 a.m. on Friday — with patients in need of abortions calling to secure a spot on the schedule.
> Then, 12 minutes later, it all came to a stop. The Supreme Court had overturned Roe v. Wade.

Mike drop.

> "Can we still do abortions today?" asked patient advocate Marjorie Eisen, thinking about the 20 women they had booked for appointments.
> Several were already in the waiting room, scrolling through their phones as they waited.
> "No," said Kathy Kleinfeld, a co-owner of the clinic. "We're done."
>
> The Washington Post: 'We're done': Chaos and tears as an abortion clinic abruptly shuts down (2022-6-24)

Oh Noes! Such disappointment!

Here's another article rife with superfluous drama.

The Lily: 400 calls, no more appointments: Texas abortion clinic scrambles to see patients before 6-week ban may take effect (2021-8-30)

> "With purple and blue bangs and chunky silver earrings, Kleinfeld greets every patient with a warm smile, quick to strike up a conversation about the band on their T-shirt."
> "Kathy Kleinfeld's cellphone lit up for the first time on Monday at 3 a.m. By 7 a.m., she had 13 missed calls. When she couldn't be reached by phone, she said, patients emailed, desperate to schedule their abortion with Houston Women's Reproductive Services before Wednesday, Sept. 1, when Texas is on track to ban abortions after six weeks gestation, before most people know they're pregnant."

Gotta nip 'em in the bud before anyone knows!

> "First, they asked for the date of the patient's last period. If they were further than six weeks along, they clinic staff said, they'd have to leave the state. They were fully booked before Sept. 1."

Oh Noes! The HEARTACHE of not being able to expediently dispose of problematic uterine growth tissue!

> "At 9:28 a.m., Kleinfeld announced it was time to "set the phones." For the rest of the day, the calls would go to voice mail; Kleinfeld and others would return them when they could. By lunchtime on Monday, Houston Women's Reproductive Services had received over 400 calls. On a typical Monday morning, Kleinfeld said, they might get 100."

Whadya know? EVERYBODY's getting one! Better get one soon before your chance at shagging Brad and Chad (and maybe their Dad) is gone forever!

> "These phone calls have been the hardest, Eisen said."

Oh Noes! The HEARTACHE of turning young CC riders away to face the natural consequences of their own decisions!

> "Have you tried the other clinics in Houston?"
> "The woman went quiet."
> "It's a seven-and-a-half-hour drive from Houston."

Oh Noes! It's SOOO much TROUBLE to send off a soul!!!

> "Eisen apologized that she couldn't do more to help and wished her luck."
> "She sounded young," Eisen said as she hung up the phone."

Oh Noes! The ultimate horror of ALL HORRORS! To be a YOUNG MOTHER!!!

Epilogue

Reader NaturallyAspirated summed up the tone quite well.

> "Abortion is probably the strongest pillar of modern feminism. Without it, women are subject to the consequences of their sexual behavior…"
> "…women instinctively know that being overwhelmed with passion in the moment by a high value man, especially during ovulation, is the peak sexual experience for them. If they know that abortion is available, they can avoid the … burdens … if they get unexpectedly pregnant as a result of fully enjoying their sexual opportunities. If abortion is illegal, or very difficult, it throws a wrench in the sexual act and ties them to natures (God's) shackles, which they so desperately want to shake off. Women's instinctual / biologic drive, for the modern feminist, must be separated from pregnancy… Since (1) birth control isn't perfect, and (2) female fantasy has an aspect of losing control to an irresistible man, outlawing abortion is like castrating female sexuality, fantasy, desire. It cuts too deep and is essential to defend for the modern feminist."
> "Eve's curse [is] the short end of God's (or mother nature's) stick. Fighting against it is the essence of feminism.
>
> "We will not be slaves to God's design! We will not be slaves to biology! We REJECT the reproductive consequences of pursuing and enjoying our fully liberated sexual pleasures."
>
> The sexual revolution is the feminist revolution at its core. They will fight to the death on this."

This is an excellent example of progressive ressentiment which I've discussed before. Good is evil, and evil is good.

Rest assured, in the coming weeks and months, we'll be hearing a lot more sob stories and rage tantrums from various activists and nooz outlets about how the new ruling crimps the Feminist Life Script.

A warning against despair.

Readership: Christians
Length: 600 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

Last week, deti was rather pessimistic about the Dobbs v. Jackson decision. His attitude was the target of much derision and Joy Shaming from fellow readers.

Deti's general assessments are correct, but yet, something seemed off.

I've spent the weekend thinking about where deti went wrong.

It's not because he's fearful.

It's not because he's disagreeable or out of touch.

It's not because he's inching towards the Black Pill.

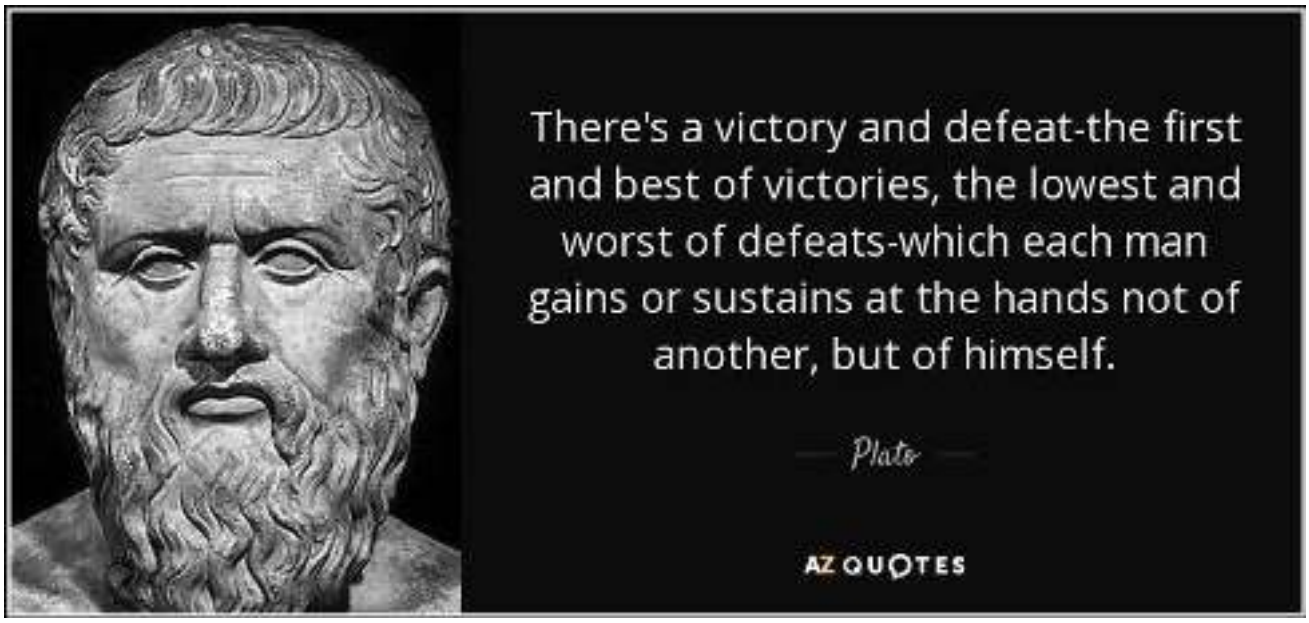
It's not because he is ignorant or stubborn in his despair.

It's not because he's denying the possibility of incremental change.

It's not that he's trying to find the negative in a positive development.

It's not because he's expecting women to initiate change and "take responsibility" for "fixing" the SMP.

Cameron pointed out that deti was being chastised for being realistic. But this is not exactly right either.



Oscar came close when he said,

> "What makes deti a defeatist is that he says that'll never happen, just like he said Dobbs would never happen."
> "What makes a person a defeatist is that their attitude guarantees defeat. Deti's attitude guarantees defeat. By definition, that makes deti a defeatist.
> If deti can't draw any hope from how God used a degenerate New York Democrat like Trump, a swamp creature like McConnell, and a feminist, atheist Jəw like Ginsburg to kill Roe v. Wade during Pride Month, > that's fine.

> But don't get all bent out of shape when others accurately identify him as matching the exact English dictionary definition of a defeatist."

Oscar also stated that deti is maintaining that we didn't actually win anything, and if we did it doesn't matter, and voting in the future won't change anything.

It's not that he's being a defeatist exactly, although that was quite an insightful observation.

So where did deti go wrong?

It's this.

> "…there is no thanksgiving, no praise, no mention of God's merciful hand, or Jesus. All credit to God has been carefully edited out."
>
> "When men neglect glorifying the Lord, and withhold from Him the sacrifice of praise, the spirit of hypermodern humanism soon settles in, followed by notions of fate, then hopelessness, and finally, idolatry. It's a just reward for those who are ashamed of Christ."
> Σ Frame: Censorship of Praise is the Thief of Joy (2018-4-11)

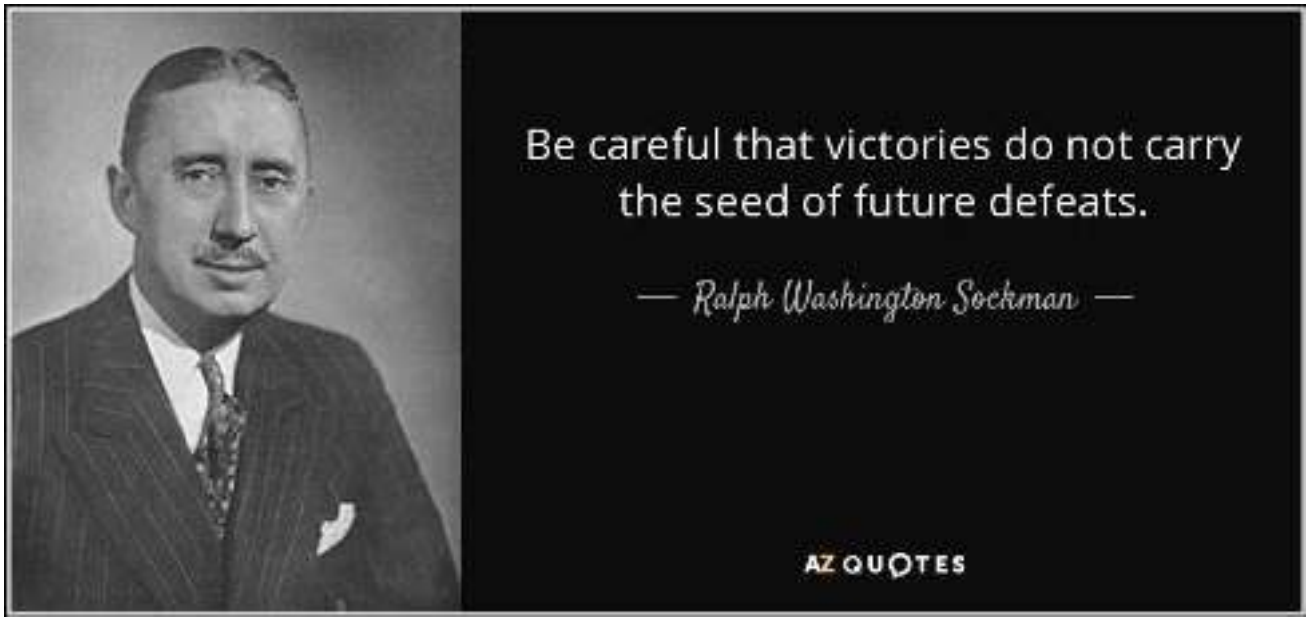
We must not forget Him for whom the victory of this major battle is won.



Info offered us this exhortation.

> "We need to savor the taste of Victory so that we may hunger for more. Then we will be even more motivated to win.
> War involves momentum. And when the momentum is on our side. We must continue to push until we win completely.
> That includes plenty of fervent prayers of the Heart."

Not only motivation, momentum, and prayer, but also joy, praise, and hope. The ungodly faint when the righteous are bold. This is the time to be bold (not pessimistic).

> "Then he said to them, "Go your way, eat the fat, drink the sweet, and send portions to those for whom nothing is prepared; for this day is holy to our Lord. Do not sorrow, for the joy of the Lord is your strength."

> Nehemiah 8:10 (NKJV)

This conclusion might appear to be joy shaming deti, but it is not. It is a warning against Despair in the moment of victory (which is entirely predictable for those who bore the heat of the battle). It is a call to recognize the Lord's hand moving in the American government and in our lives and to be thankful for these developments.

The prayers of millions have been answered last month. This is a time for celebration. The battles will resume quickly, so let's take this fourth of July weekend to be thankful and recharge.

Raise the flag of victory and sound the Trump!

DeSantis steadies de sinking ship

Desantis on Divorce Custody [1]

Desantis just vetoed bill SB 1796 which would have erased permanent alimony and set up a formula based on the duration of the marriage. Part of the bill would have required judges to begin with a "presumption" that children should split their time equally between parents.

When Rick Scott was governor, he also vetoed a new formula for custody.

Creating an alimony structure based on how long the marriage lasted makes sense and is just.

Other states like Arkansas have passed reforms to their custody laws, creating a presumption of 50/50 custody.

Allowing for permanent alimony, regardless of how short the marriage was, is insane and unjust.

The reason for the veto?

In his rejection letter, DeSantis wrote,

> "If CS / CS / SB 1796 were to become law and be given retroactive effect as the Legislature intends, it would unconstitutionally impair vested rights under certain preexisting marital settment agreements."

It's a fake excuse. He's hiding behind the constitution to justify an unconstitutional position.

The Tampa Bay Times explains further.

> "If signed into law, this legislation would have upended thousands upon thousands of settlements, backlogging the courts and throwing many Floridians' lives into turmoil…"

So in his view, it's better not to disturb the already broken system rather than to improve the system.

Why?

All because his constituency is afraid of change.

> "As of Friday, the governor's office had received 5,939 emails in support of the bill and 1,250 in opposition, along with 349 phone calls in favor and 289 against the measure."

Yep, and I'll bet that 100% of those opposing the overhaul are either divorced women or complementary Boomers sock puppeting the worn out gynocentric narrative for their wives.

DeSantis on Education [2]

Over the last 6 months or so, DeSantis has been pushing the Individual Freedom Act.

> "The Individual Freedom Act prevents the teaching of content that could be deemed as racially divisive, or teaches that specific attributes compel discrimination at the K-12 and collegiate levels."

I don't see how such a law could be implemented in any meaningful way. It's too subjective. What constitutes divisiveness? Slavery, holocaust, civil rights, internment camps? It's a virtue signal that won't have any real practical effect.

> "Instead, the new law prompts American history to be taught on the foundation of individual freedom and choice."

Entirely predictable, because it's primarily females who care about education and curriculum, even though it's a right wing issue right now.

> "Students shall develop an understanding of the ramifications of prejudice, racism, and stereotyping on individual freedoms, and examine what it means to be a responsible and respectful person, for the purpose of encouraging tolerance of diversity in a pluralistic society and for nurturing and protecting democratic values and institutions," the bill reads.

Right now Republicans proclaim to be pro-democracy and pro-rights, but they're still stuck on The Enlightenment (as is all of the West). They still want to outlaw certain political speech: Not only CRT, but also flag burning (a form of speech). They have bills mandating education on communism (that will blow back for sure), forcing government contractors to not boycott Israel, and in many states they have a massive effort to eliminate the right to petition.

Opponents, however, argue that the bill restricts educators' ability to teach in the classroom.

Yes, the arguments for censorship and restriction on speech are a two-pronged fork that both conservatives and liberals alike are wrestling with since Zuckerberg's appearance before congress in 2019 and again in 2021.

- If you open up free speech, then it's like hanging a big sign on an industrial strength fan saying, "Throw ALL your $h!t HERE!"
- If you close down free speech, then you get an altruistic həll of political correctness subterfuged with all the annoying misleading lies typical of communist-style suppression.

Note that this is NOT a "choose your poison" scenario. Ultimately, the war over free speech all boils down to "Who's version of the truth is going to be predominantly represented in free speech?"

This actually shows up in the arguments for and against this bill.

Protagonists say…

> "The law protects students and workers from discriminatory indoctrination…"
> "Nobody should be compelled to undergo trainings or lectures that stereotype individuals based on race or other innate characteristics."

Antagonists say…

> "United Faculty of Florida President Anthony Gothard accused the law of censoring professors to avoid offending conservative students, and warned that its enactment could have a "chilling" effect on speech."

Translation: Chilling effect = Liberal code for inflicting well deserved shame on the unrighteous.

The cited article even comes out and says the bill is a stab at limiting speech.

> "The nature of this law is designed to stop students and stop faculty from talking about subjects that conservative politicians dislike," he stated, according to WUFT."

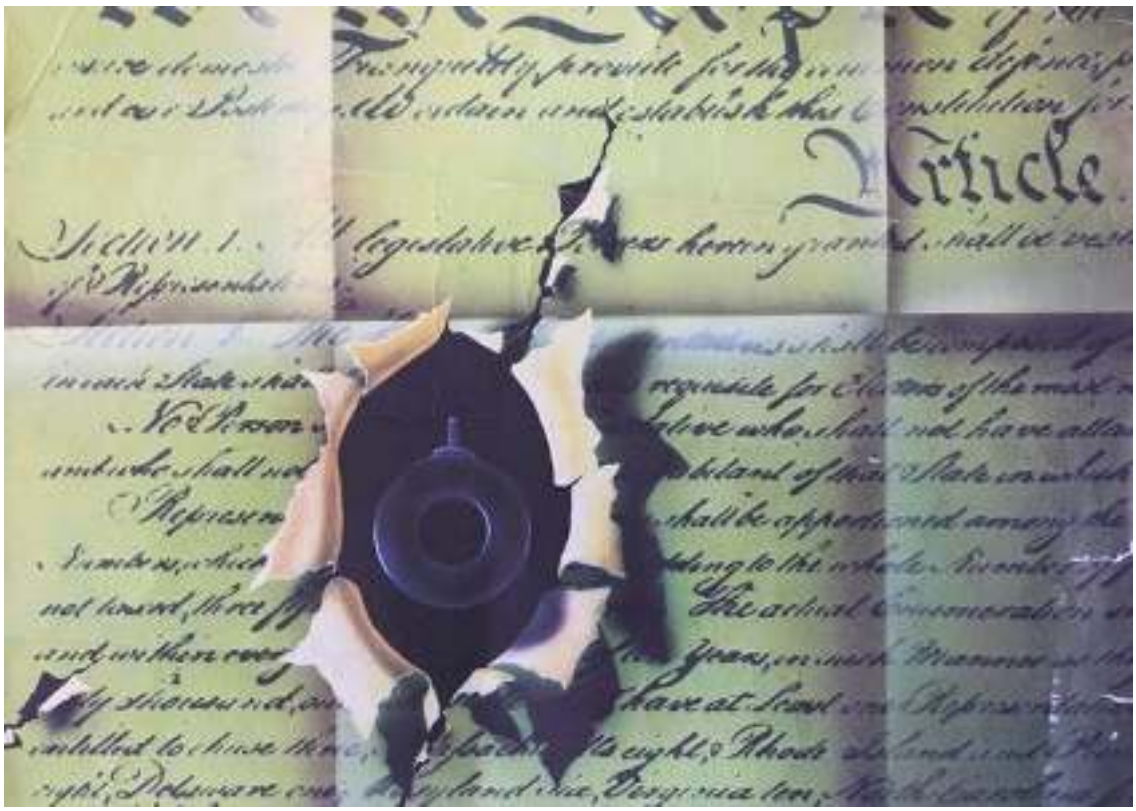
Yes, exactly! Liberals have already created a Politically Correct call-out culture of ressentimented shame and doxing. It's past time for a return to sanity. But this bill is not the way to do it. Instead, the whole educational system needs revamped.

Those of us who are Red Pill aware might be tempted to see this bill as a step away from racially charged Wokism. But it's a mistake to interpret this as Red Pilled or even a return to normalcy. Instead, this should be seen as a hypocritical power grab that is not in accordance with constitutional and civil rights.

Republicans b!tch about taxes and big government. Democrats b!tch about racism and equal opportunity. All this rhetoric is composed of empty promises, and we've seen it again and again. It's all a cathartic farce designed to appeal to their constituencies. Behind all the posturing, of course, they just want control and the squishy benefits of power, but the problem is that they want to use the power of the government to control the people. It's time for us to see through the stage play.

We are prone to think of Progressives as being big bureaucracy, Big Brother™ socialists and are repelled from them as such. But when the pendulum swings back in the next few years, conservatism will be the long arm of big oligarchy, Big Brother™ socialism. And post-feminist Murica will fall for it in their fervor to take out the trash.

On a similar note, people think the Supreme Court is based because of the recent Dobbs v. Jackson decision, but they are fools. The conservative majority has eviscerated the double jeopardy clause over the last few years. Now you can be prosecuted for the same crime twice, so long as the prosecuting sovereign is different. On guns, the court didn't adopt a literal interpretation of the second amendment, but said restrictions are valid if they are historical.



Conclusions

Desantis has demonstrated how even the most “based” political leaders hate younger men and do nothing for us. Instead, they cling to the more politically savvy move to placate geriatric Boomers and female voters, even at the harm of actual producers and men. It’s disgusting.

As far as the Red Pill, maybe we could say that politicians are using Machiavellian tactics, but the way they are going about getting elected is subversive and beta, and therefore very Blue Pilled and defeatist.

All in all, DeSantis is a product of his generation. He doesn’t like Wokeness in education, but supports the debacle of women’s rights. In essence, he’s trying to resurrect the whitewashed gynocratic American society of the 1980s. A true cluckservative!

Sexual Activity among U.S. College Students

The 2018 National College Health Assessment (NCHA) found that 66% of female college students had sex within the past 12 months, down from 72% in the 2000 assessment. [1] NCHA reports for specific colleges or universities [2], including some up to the present year, show that this 2/3 figure stands accurate for nearly every college or university. These reports also estimated somewhere between 45-55% of girls in college having had sex within the last 30 days, and around 30% saying they haven't had sex in the past year. (For an example of one NCHA report, see [3].)

The statistics for men show a lower number of sexually active men, but with more men having multiple partners — ~10% had 4 or more partners in the past year.

F. Sexual Behavior NCHA, Spring 2019

College students reported having the following number of sexual partners (oral sex, vaginal or anal intercourse) within the last 12 months:

2	8.0	9.0	8.8
3	4.9	5.2	5.1
4 or more	10.9	8.6	9.4

Motivations

The Feminist Life Script (2020/12/17) and The Upper Middle Class Career Life Script Model (2021/5/17) observed that one of the primary motivations for young women to go off to college is not so much to prepare themselves for a career, but to jump on the carousel.

Up until lately, this has been a more or less speculative assumption without much confirming evidence other than the raw data described above, but with the downfall of Roe v. Wade, young feministas are now showing their true colors – thus proving our earlier presumptions to be 100% correct.

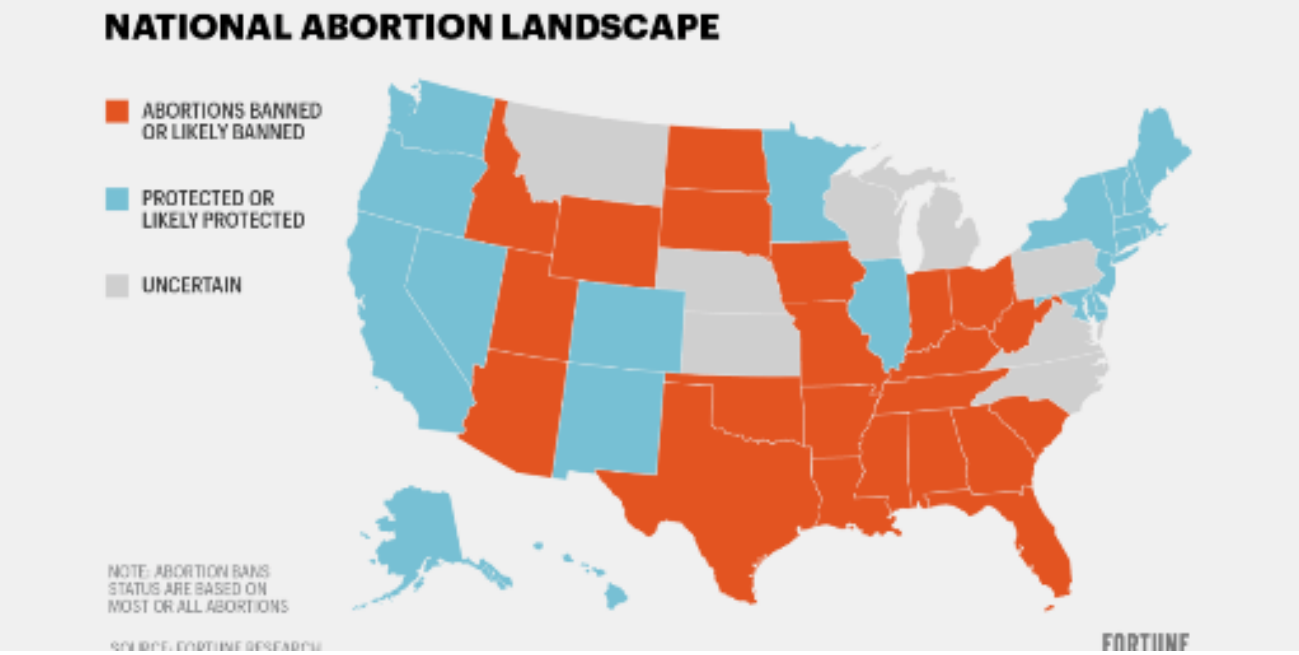
For example, Vice [4] bewails the new reality as follows.

> "After the overturning of Roe, millions of college students found themselves attending institutions where they would no longer have access to certain types of reproductive healthcare. Now, students who had committed to attending colleges or universities in majority conservative states are rethinking their decisions. Meanwhile, rising high school seniors say they now have something new to consider when compiling their lists of prospective schools: the access and right to an abortion."

Apparently, if a college is located in a state that bans abortion, then this one fact alone is a deal breaker for bookwormish bimbos to continue enrolling there!

In fact, a growing number of hopeful hoes seeking steamy stomping grounds for their apex SMV years are now making the geography of abortion bans a primary criterion in their selection. Not only students, but also parents (especially moms!) are saying that they'll reject any schools located in Arizona, Kentucky, Missouri, Ohio, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Texas, etc.



Among those females currently attending college or graduating from high school — and their parents — it seems as though the most popular purpose for attending college is not to major in the fabled Communications or Gender Studies, but to take a few rounds on The Carousel!

Sob Stories

As if this news was not dramatic enough, Vice [4] also reports the simpering stories of several young yodelers who are absolutely heartbroken about the newly imposed restrictions in states where they had previously hoped to attend college.

Sasha Rosenfeld (17) dreamed of attending Oberlin because of "its tradition of activism" and the Judaism on campus. Now she cries, frets, and worries about what she would do if she needed an abortion and couldn't access "care" at college.

Cora Jackson (18), from Maryland, is looking to turn down a full-tuition scholarship at Vanderbilt University simply because it is located in Nashville Tennessee.

Love Lundy (20) said the fall of Roe "is a big scary thing" and she compared the situation to being involved in a school shooting. "I would never send any of my loved ones [to a clinic] anywhere in Georgia, or even Alabama."

Chantal Mann (16) said it would be a major "risk" to attend college in a state that would ban abortion in the future. She doesn't want to go to a state where they have restricted "reproductive rights",* or where there's a risk that "rights"* could be slashed in the near future.

Ashley Huynh (17) said, "The overturn of Roe definitely solidified my decision to go to a college in a state where it will still continue to protect women's rights. Location has never before been more important to me."* She cited an "increased threat" of sexual violence on college campuses as part of her justification. I'm confused as to how a state wide abortion ban leads to an increase in co-ed rape, but I suppose a rape accusation would be a convenient Plan B in the case of an unexpected pregnancy.

Given that the incidence of sex on campus is 66.6% (note the figure), it shouldn't surprise us to see statements like these from many young women. But how do they know they'll be one of the 66.6% of hoes and not one of the 30% of femcels? It would be a shame if they were dispossessed of a "right"* that they would never need to exercise anyway, and yet the majority of activism appears to come from the sexually disenfranchised.

 Many American's carry the notion that a "right" is something written into a code of law. This is a legalistic Murican understanding of rights, and it is ridiculed as naïve around the world. Properly understood,* a right is the ability, freedom, and power to do what is right. That's why it's called a right.

Conclusions

The common consensus is that Red State Colleges are now "restrictive", "risky", "scary", "uncaring", and "unprotective", which is, I suppose, about as much derision as their teenage hamsters can muster for calling a state or an institute of learning "misogynistic." Note that these adjectives have nothing to do with the educational quality of the institution, nor the perceived benefits to their career advancement. The new number one qualification for college selection is the quality and service of garden tool manufacturing made available there (i.e. augers, axes, hoes, and rakes).

Politico warns bacchanalians that most colleges are unprepared for the post-Roe landscape. Some colleges have anticipated a stagnation in enrollment as a result of the new ruling and are therefore making “arrangements” to “support” students seeking the “full range” of housing and “healthcare services” not available on their campuses. (Oberlin is one such college mentioned in Vice’s article.)

It will be interesting to see how the college enrollment in various locations around the country will change as a result of this ruling. Judging by these young women’s statements, we might expect more liberalated women to attend college in blue states, leaving a concentrated concoction of faithful virgins, nerdettes, prudes, and fuglies in red state colleges. We might also expect more high SMV augers and rakes to attend to their craft of hoemaking in blue states, while straight-minded men who are more serious about preparing for a career would prefer to attend college in red states. As a result, I would expect the academic reputation of red state colleges to increase.

In summary, the red state colleges will have the best and the worst, and the blue state colleges will have the best of the worst.

This also introduces a new red flag for Red Pilled men to consider: If she grew up in a red state but chose to attend college in a blue state, she just might be a worn out hoe soon to be rehammered into an axe.

Introduction

One observant post, Is the Pendulum Effect caused by Western Individualism? (2020-10-9) described how the spirit of Western Individualism tempts people to separate themselves from the past and from tradition. This results in a metaphysical oscillation of political, social, and fashion trends from one extreme to the other. The pendulum effect is disruptive, spurious, and wasteful, thereby revealing Individualism to be an evil spiritual influence that upsets both the peace within the human soul and the shalom of a society.

The carnage and destruction caused by Individualism and the Pendulum Effect has gone on full display since the Dobbs v. Jackson decision on June 24, resulting in a multitude of interesting new stories that have emerged over the past two weeks.

Here are a few of the most interesting stories that have emerged during this time (and a few older but now timely posts of interest). Must reads are in bold.

Interesting Observations

- The explosion occurred precisely at 3 minutes and 33 seconds after 4 a.m. local time.
- The stone that was demolished in the blast was the one having text in Hebrew and Arabic.
- In the video, pieces of the monument were flying towards the right in the video, and the cloud of smoke forms on the left. This would suggest it was done with some type of explosive. However, a conventional explosive would also produce a fireball, which is not visible.
- The brightening of the light occurs a split second before the explosion is visible. One possible explanation for the brightening of the light is an EMP pulse originating from the explosion. This would account for the time lag and would explain why the video camera briefly malfunctioned.
- The author of Practical Eschatology suggests that the monument was struck by lightning (viz. an act of God). The presence of a severe lightning storm in that area, the brightening of the light shown in the video, no fireball in the explosion, and the absence of bomb fragments adds credence to this theory.
- There is evidence that a time capsule is buried six feet underneath where this monument once stood. So far, there is no report of this time capsule being recovered.

Mandated Agricultural Failures

International Standards and Technology impose more burden than benefit.

Readers have probably seen the stories about recent events in Holland, Sri Lanka, and other countries, but not much has been said about how all these events are related. This post will attempt to connect the dots and construct a frame of reference that may be helpful to the reader's understanding of these issues.

Environmental Mandates in Underdeveloped Countries

Over the past few years, many countries around the world, with an especially large number of South-Asian and South-East Asian countries, are making extremely intense efforts to improve their agricultural industries, reduce pollution, and construct various infrastructures (roads, water, power generation systems, electrical grids, etc.).

Many of these projects are planned, funded, and managed by Western entities such as IEA, WHO, and the World Bank. Many others, predominantly those in Africa, are supported by Chinese tech firms and brokerage investments. As part of these agreements, specific goals are implemented in an effort to match what is being called "international standards", which is a nice way to describe a carbon copy of the wealthy, materialistic, post-industrial, technologically advanced West.

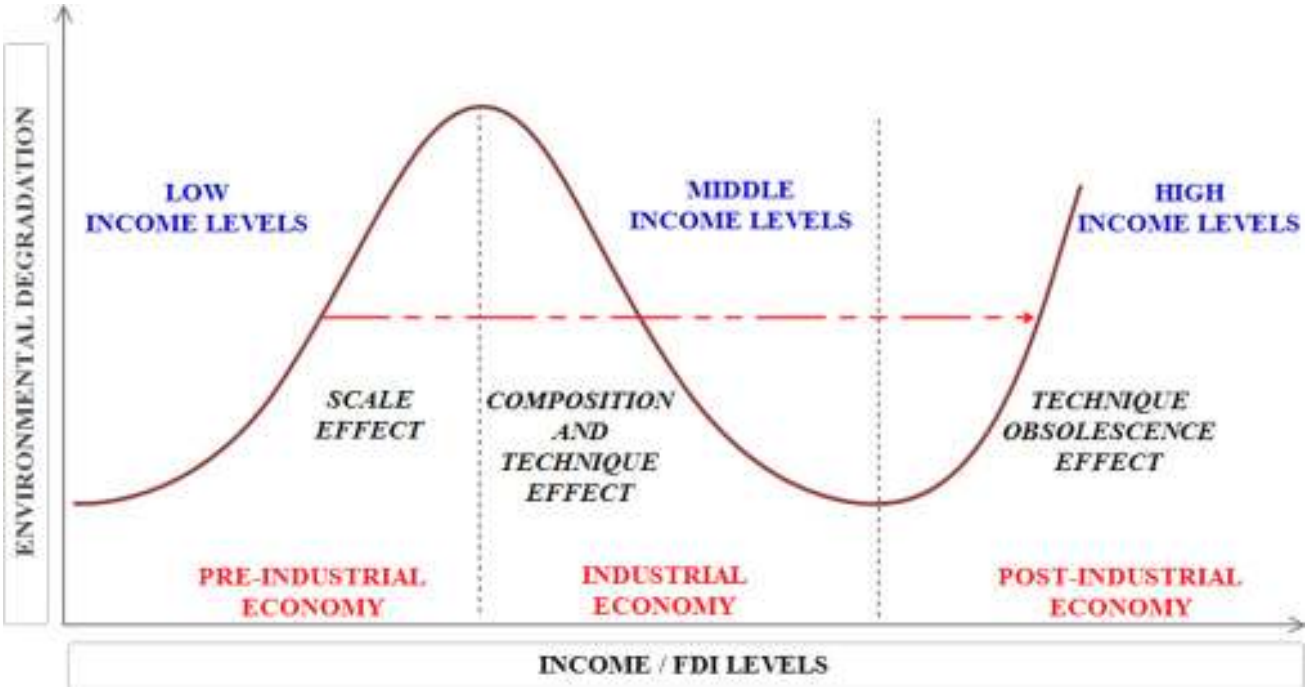
Many countries enter into these international agreements in good faith and for many reasons.

- They're seeking to establish good business relations and trade with foreign countries.
- They wish to build a stronger tourism industry.

- Some are facing dire situations. For example, the water pollution and water shortage in Bangladesh are problems addressed by these projects.
- So called "developing" nations are inspired to go along with these programs because they're star struck by the dream of making their own country as materialistic, sophisticated, and technologically advanced as the U.S. and Europe.

For example, the Indonesian government is playing by the international guidelines with an eye on health and environmental preservation. The Indonesian Ministry of Agriculture Regulation No. 43 of 2019 concerning Pesticides (MOA Reg. 43/2019) stipulates that pesticides should be classified based on their hazard level, which are further divided into prohibited and non-prohibited hazardous pesticides. Prohibited pesticides cannot be used as determined by their active ingredients or additives or based on test results. These prohibitions and standard tests are based on international criteria such as those set out by the Food and Agriculture Organization, the International Agency for Research on Cancer, the World Health Organization Joint Meeting on Pesticide Residues, and the Stockholm Convention (article 10 (2) of MOA Reg. 43/2019).

Farmers are busting their donkeys in a diligent effort to make it work. Sri Lanka also joined Indonesia in this experiment, with similar outcomes, except that the Sri Lankan economy is so small that it cannot shoulder that kind of debt, resulting in a crisis situation. Whoops! Well, not every culture is worthy of "democracy". Countries deserve the governments they have, and all that, right?



Some countries are, in effect, offered investment funds on the condition that certain environmental protocols are adhered to, such that the environment improves and does not degrade, which for some nations, is an impossible task.

Image Source: S. A. Sarkodie, Vladimir Strezov, "Effect of foreign direct investments, economic development and energy consumption on greenhouse gas emissions in developing countries", Science of The Total Environment 646:1 (2019) 862-871. (DOI)
Some governments (e.g. Indonesia, Malaysia) recognize the disconnect and are paying farmers subsidies until sustainability can be achieved.

OTOH, less developed countries that don't join these programs are placed at a disadvantage. They can't receive investment funding, they can't get preferred trading deals with foreign countries, and they cannot depend on foreign help to address dire emergency situations. Without this regular economic activity, cooperation, and influx, their economies languish as others surge on.

Where is all this money coming from? Uncle Sham, of course! Japan, China, ASEAN, and Holland (!!!) are also big players. Fiat loans are given freely, and the responsibility to pay them back in real cash falls on the little people.

Little do they know that it's all built on debt – debt that will soon transform their ancient societies into fawning pawns of the Western PTB.

This is the 21st century version of colonialism — economic entrepreneurship and political alliances, not done by force of arms, but through the lure of $$$ and "modernization".

Environmental Mandates in Developed Countries

Holland appears to be an extreme outlier, compared to all the other nations in these various agro-economic renovation plans. This is because Holland is a country that is already well developed, perhaps more so than many other European countries, so they don't possess the starry eyed dream of obtaining all the trappings of American wealth. The Dutch have less to gain, and more to pay for all of these experiments. In fact, Holland is one of the top five countries making foreign direct investments. And since they're already liberalized, they're not strongly averse to protesting.

American farmers are not exempt from the pressure either. Although they have long been following U.S. guidelines regarding fertilizers and pesticides, they are increasingly faced with technological problems related to farm machinery which are increasingly being controlled by cloud-based computerized operating systems. When these systems break down, and they frequently do, then farmers must call a technician to come to their farm and pay large sums for their services. The frequency and ubiquity of this problem is forcing many farmers to demand ownership rights and user policies that would allow them to modify these programs and how they are implemented in their equipment.

Farmers Are Hacking Their Tractors Because of a Repair Ban (2020-3-4) Length: 11:29

If the technological bottlenecks prove to be too slow in corraling the beast of burden, then a spate of explosions at oil/gas facilities or pipelines and mysterious fires at food processing plants should do the trick.

Conclusions

So far, all of this sounds wonderful, doesn't it? There's just not much to criticize. Poor countries are getting investment funding for all sorts of projects that will make life better and more humane for everyone. The poor are being westernized and democratized. Right? Demarxocracy is prospering. Soon the Liberal Utopia can be (almost) instantly realized!

The underlying problem here is that all these high technology, natural, "green", new, or return-to-nature methods didn't come about naturally as a natural result of the natural development of a green partnership between business and industry themselves, but were mandated into place by carrot-on-the-stick policies outlined by thinkbanks and imposed by governments enviously eyeing incentives offered by the World Bank. As such, there is a major disjoint between the theory and practice, and this disjoint looks quite different for each country. In some countries, farmers continue to trust their governments and are doubling down to make ends meet out of service to their country. In other areas of the world, farmers are drawing a line and shoving off the grand flying flaxseed.

So the real news is not the riots or fuel shortages (move along, nothing to see here), but that all of these worthy projects are experimental in nature, and like most other environmental and social issues, it looks much better on paper than it does in practice. But tedious facts don't make a heart tugging liberal news story that could draw public sympathies.

Of course, foreign bankers and the cognitive elite know much more about farming in Indonesia (or wherever) than Indonesian farmers do. So we must be ejumacated and told that…

- It will take some time for “organic” farming to produce the total yields that nasty chemical farming did in the past.
- It will take some time for farmers to reformulate their agricultural strategies and techniques, and it will take some more time for them to recoup their losses.
- It will take some time before “green” energy can produce enough power to support the grid (unless we “cheat” by redefining natural gas and nuclear energy as “green”).
- It will also take some time for 92.54% of the human population to die off.

So we must be patient!

Illustration by Nicolás Ortega for Foreign Policy.

In the meantime, we must swallow the Paper Marxism (in the form of agreements, contracts, fiat loans, mandates, policies, promissory notes, proprietary computerized equipment, environmental regulations, etc.) in the hope that the bureaucracy will keep everyone dutifully employed running this juggernaut, and everything will eventually work out for the benefit of those at the helm.

If only those #@%& farmers would stop blocking traffic, playing with goats, rioting, etc. and do it the right way this time!

The Breakdown and Atomization of Public News

There has been a steadily growing distrust of the major news syndicates, culminating in an explosion of independent news sources around 2008. The general opinion of the public since then is that the MSM sources are too liberalized, and are pushing elite agendas, propaganda, and social shaping (e.g. Identity Politics), and that they are unacceptably out of touch from the common man. Other than those leftist groups whose ideologies concurrently align with the news sources, no one trusts or believes the news or media anymore, and the news media pretends not to know that they've lost their grip on the public's trust.

Personally, I don't believe a word of the news at face value. I have to do a search and study the issues before I can draw any conclusions. But most people don't have the interest nor leisure time to do so.

Consequently, blogs, vlogs, focus group websites, and YouTube commentators have steadily grown in popularity as the public's main go-to source for news and events. These sources certainly have their biases and peculiar preferences, but at the very least, they are not spouting out the same identical messages from a party line. These people are independent thinkers, so when they write/talk, you are reading/hearing their genuine opinions and rationale, and not a narrative that they were instructed to say/write.

It's refreshing because people like having the choice to make their own decisions about what to believe.

The Fracturing of the Socio-Political Environment, and the Left in Particular

Following the eradication of the news' integrity, and the ever expanding number of alternative perspectives, this fractionation of opinion and analysis has steadily grown. Ever since 2018, there has been a splintering in the Anglo culture. As early as 2019, we noted that the Overton window had divided to form distinct Left and Right factions. The Manosphere followed suit the next year.

The split is not so much between political parties, like Republican vs. Democrat, Tories vs. Labor, Nationals, etc. although that is what is often perceived. In fact, it's bigger than that, and the split is far from being a clear cut dichotomy. Instead, it's more like a panoply of many different identity / interest groups. The most noteworthy are here listed roughly in order from most liberal to most conservative.

1. Anarchists (e.g. AntiFa's, Gazi Kodzo)
2. 4th Wave Feminists (e.g. Social Justice Warriors)
3. Neo-Marxists (e.g. Jordan Peterson)
4. Socialists (e.g. Bernie Sanders)
5. Boomer Feminists (e.g. Complementarians, DeSantis, Feinstein)
6. The Centrist Left (e.g. CNN acolytes)
7. Libertarians (e.g. The Cato Institute, The Ludwig von Mises Institute)
8. Tradcons (e.g. Matt Walsh)

Some Descriptions of Key Groups

Brett Stevens offered this concise description of Conservatism.

> "Conservatism is the idea that all of our problems are known, and the solution to each is the same: people need more self-control and morality, and we need to pick those with the best self-control and advance them above others (similar to martial and athletic competitions) so that those more sensitive instruments can make decisions. This idea arises naturally from the notion of improvement. We don't need new methods; we know what methods have worked for time immemorial. When we promote good people, and demote bad people, > society thrives. To do that, we need a strong moral standard; for that, we need a strong national culture and strong religion. For that, we need a goal and direction. For that, we need a founding transcendent idealism, like the notion of improvement and thus conservation."

> Amerika: Conservatism is realism (2014-5-16)

A Traditionalist wants to stick with what has been proven to be functional, while that which is unproven is questioned and evaluated. That which is demonstratively non-functional is dismissed. Along this grain, Traditionalists believe that there is right and wrong which can be judged by the results of the action rather than the intent of the action. Christian Trads go a step further by rigidly and often dogmatically ascribing their concepts of right and wrong to Biblical principles. Traditionalists appear to be more risk averse when it comes to implementing changes, but in fact, they just have a longer time scale in their assessments of whether something works or not, because they require substantial proof of the utility of the thing. Christian Trads may have a markedly shorter time frame because of their faith in Biblical precepts, and they are prone to retain certain poorly functioning norms for the same reason. Outside of this applied pragmatism, the label "traditional" carries little meaning anymore, because what used to be traditional values have been entirely infiltrated and swept away by progressivism.

Image Source: Britannica: Traditional Chinese medicine (2021-7-28)

A Tradcon is a combination of Conservatism and Traditionalism as described above. One disquieting gestalt of this combo is that Tradcons are quite comfortable in their world views and therefore prefer to ignore the uglier aspects of reality. Consequently, they will sit on their duffs when that reality requires a responsive action, and take comfort in their belief that the ostensible troublemakers of the world cannot succeed in the long term and that the problems that are created cannot last unbearably long. Of note, many Tradcons and Christian Tradcons give off the vibe that morality can or should be legislated or forced under duress. Progressives see this as totalitarianism and fear this intensely.

Neo-Marxism believes that the means of knowledge, culture, and pedagogy are part of a privileged epistemology. It relies heavily on critical theory and seeks to apply those theories in psychotherapy and mass propaganda as the means of political and cultural change. These theories are built upon biased samples of many interrelated liberties (or the perceived limitations thereof) in order to magnify the "critical consciousness" of the public towards unrest of the status quo. Of note, the philosophies and educational practices of 4th Wave Feminism borrow heavily from Neo-Marxist thought.

The Alt-Right is discussed in a separate post.

Feminism has been described ad infinitum.

Identity Politics is the Hawk-Eyed Griffin of Individualism

If we overlook all the splintering, the main scuffle appears to be between the heady Social Justice Left, the Centrist Left powerplayers controlling the government and media, and the stalwart Right. Recently, there has been a rise in Christian Nationalism, which appears to be a coalescence of Right wingers who have grown tired of their pet causes and have retreated and regrouped around what is most important – God and country. Unfortunately, Christian Nationalism is more of a political reaction to progressivism than it is a revivalistic return to Covenant living and theology — which is what is most necessary to redeem the West from floundering in these sociopolitical schisms.

Image Source: ABC News: Judge orders Seattle to stop using tear gas during protests (2020-6-13)

The PTB are quite happy about all these schisms, as it keeps everyone focused on the non-issues.

It needs to be emphasized that the crux of all these schisms centers around Individualism and Identity Politics. Long gone are the days in which we saw ourselves as "honest, hardworking Americans" or "White Anglo-Saxon Protestants". Now we identify ourselves as Boomers, Xers, Millennials, Conservatives, Progressives, Pro-Choicers, Pro-Lifers, Christians, Free Spirits, Gamers, Bronies, MGTOW, Red Pillers… and we carefully avoid being pigeonholed into one of the groups outlined in the previous section, even though this would be much more truthful and socially efficient. The primary reason for the gray-faced anonymity is the fear of backlash and ostracization being inflicted by a perceived Majority which is actually little more than the rhetorical principles of a small but powerful Cognitive Elite Minority. And so we find that atomized Individualism self-perpetuates quite nicely for the conveniences of the PTB. (More on this topic in an upcoming post.)

Yes, Individualism reigns supreme and so divided we fall. Yet, it would be blasé for anyone to identify as an Individualist. It's a core characteristic of Western culture that is assumed on faith. Talking about it is interpreted as an out-group perspective and is therefore either not taken seriously or it is strictly verboten (e.g. see Amerika: Inner Self As The Opposite Of Individualism (2016-10-27)).

We need to rethink the value of Individualism and Identity Politics. It's time to break out of the bug eater's mold and to find a transcendant purpose in our lives (which is not to be confused with Individualism).

Mass Confusion about the Alt-Right

Under Identity Politics (2022-7-13), Oscar says,

> "Tim Pool is "Alt-Right"? I am as confused as ever about the definition of "Alt-Right"."

Yes, the confusion is intentional, from both the Left and the Right.

Rhe Left tries like mad to recast the Alt-Right as "White Suprəmac!sm" with all the connotations, həll's bells, and dog-whistles of a Naz! pogrom.

To wit,

> "The Alternative Right, commonly known as the "alt-right," is a set of far-right ideologies, groups and individuals whose core belief is that "white identity" is under attack by multicultural forces using "political correctness" and "social justice" to undermine white people and "their" civilization."
> A statement from the Southern Poverty Law Center

Even supposedly unbiased sources define the Alt-Right in terms of their stances on rac!sm and gender equality.

> "(in the US) a right-wing ideological movement characterized by a rejection of mainstream politics and by the use of online media to disseminate provocative content, often expressing opposition to racial, religious, or gender equality."
> The Oxford Dictionary

Moreover, you won't find a generous description of the Alt-Right online, due to shadow banning and leftist bias sheltered under the guise of PC-ness.

OTOH, Alt-Righters themselves won't offer a concise description of the Alt-Right, because they refuse to be pigeonholed. The Alt-Right megaphone, Brett Stevens, wrote this.

> "This brings us to the question: is the Alt-Right a movement, or a set of ideas?
> Not all of the people above participate in [nor] organize Alt-Right organizations, nor do they attend demonstrations; they merely agree with its ideas. In my view, this is what makes the Alt-Right so dangerous to the mainstream: a few actors get out there on the internet or in the streets, and at home a much larger group are saying, "I've been waiting for someone to say this for a long time."
> As with most things conservative — because we do not have a single ideological idea, as does the Left — this audience translates into a big tent. Some agree with generalities and find certain specifics off-putting, and others agree with the totality except for some positions that they find alienating."
> Amerika (Brett Stevens): Has The Alt-Right Failed? (2018-10-17)

As you can imagine, this stance of being open to interpretation has a few pros and cons.

Image Source: Entoin: Masquerade Ball – The Glamourous History & A Gruesome Moment Behind This Costume-Culture Party-Phenomenon (2020-11-20)

I'm not sure whether I would be identified as Alt-Right or not, but I do read Alt-Right articles periodically and I feel like I have a rough handle on the main attractive features of the Alt-Right, or at least what I personally find appealing about it. So since this is open to interpretation, here's my own comprehensive interpretation of the Alt-Right.

What is the Alt-Right?

The current mass migration to the Right that is going on now as a cultural movement stretches worldwide (although some nations like Malaysia and Vietnam are lagging about 10 years behind and are still caught up in Feminism). This trend includes foreign nations of non-white ethnicities, but only Western entities use the Alt-Right branding. As such, the core values presented by the Alt-Right are not confined to the white race, and this is especially evident when we see multiracial coalitions being branded, however ironically, as "White Supremac!st" hate groups. The focus on the Alt-Right being exclusively about whites, white culture, hate, etc. is therefore a very biased, narrow, and ethnocentric concept of the Alt-Right.

More broadly, the grand majority of Alt-Right philosophies and values are more intensely concerned about cultural preservation, social capital (public trust and good will), sociopolitical efficacy and order, and the multigenerational security and welfare of one's family and home community – values that any sane person would agree are important to the individual, to the culture, and to the nation. Reading between the lines reveals that Alt-Right personalities react strongly to anything that upsets these values, although they don't always state this explicitly.

If I were to try to nail down the primary appeal (and the glorious aspects) of the Alt-Right, I would say that the metaphysical experiences that inspire the Alt-Right are commonly manifested in the humble comradery, In-Group loyalty, social identity, and societal stability that is found in ethnic consanguinity — a social order reminiscent of that portrayed in The Lord of the Rings.

Image from The Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring (2001 film).

What we observe in the Alt-Right is a collection of independent thinkers that have a strong conviction of these values. In this view, it is recognized that traditional (AKA "cis") marriage, cultural homogeneity (i.e. ethnic, racial, language, and religious), as well as hierarchies of authority, are all strongly conducive to the beneficent ends of domestic bliss, homeland, and homestead.

But in the Woke West, Progressives see everything through the lenses of equality, gender, and race. In this view, all ante-Enlightenment values (including Biblical values) are summed up as anti-democratic, anti-PC, hateful, phobic, racist, sexist, and so on, and are therefore broadly censured, explicitly condemned, thoroughly rejected, and roundly scorned.

But outside of the Western progressive microcosm, all of the aforementioned values find appeal and continual endurance across many races and countries because most people of any race can immediately recognize these factors as a meaningful source of life and social vitality. For example, the Asian version of this set of values is called Filial Piety. Filial Piety is obviously Patriarchal and family/clan-centric in nature, and is largely accredited as the reason why Chinese society has endured for millennia.

In conclusion, I think the Alt-Right is not all about racism, etc. This is only propaganda that the PTB want sheeple to believe as a way to scare them away from discovering the ancient Truths of civilization. We should be wary of how they prioritize these narrow views to the point of being all-encompassing. We should also recognize that all the blame, shame, and fear tactics from the radical Left may very well originate from psychological projections and are thus indicative of an extremely poor willingness to establish social capital (and interracial harmony too). As Vox Day says, "Liberals always project."

Blood is Thicker than Water

It just so happens that the majority of Alt-Right voices in a white majority culture are White and are therefore expressing the glorious joys of being as White as God made them. I think this should not be myopically interpreted as hatred towards non-whites, but rather a celebration of Anglo-Saxon culture.

It wouldn't be surprising nor controversial at all if the majority of Talmudic philosophers were Jəwish and therefore defended the sovereignty of Israel in their writings. Likewise, if the majority of Confucian philosophers were Han and therefore espoused Han centrism. (The translated name of China, 中國, literally means "Central Kingdom".) Also, I believe this multinational diversity is exactly what Vladimir Putin was referring to when he recently stressed the importance of having a multipolar world.

But if the majority of Alt-Right thinkers are White and therefore write from an Anglo-Saxon perspective, then we have a stellar meltdown! Meanwhile, the rest of the world looks on with bewildered consternation. "Why are (Progressive) Whites punishing themselves by denying their heritage?" When foreigners read about "White Guilt" in the MSM, they don't know all the details of American history, so they think some whites are ashamed to be white. They immediately recognize this as a catastrophic crack in the culture.

It is unfortunate for the reputation of the Alt-Right that some of its proponents are starkly racist. Interracial hate need not be part of the basic equation of country, home, and family, but like the Hatfield's and McCoy's (both of which were white, mind you), violent conflict does happen. Intertribal conflict is as old as humanity itself, and this is not confined to strictly interracial conflict only. In fact, a survey of history reveals that contrasting religious beliefs are a more common source of conflict than racism.

This is one of the problems of the "Blood is thicker than water" ethical system espoused by the Alt-Right — something to be compared and contrasted against the problems of liberal democracy – one of which I'll cover in the next post.

I will leave it to the reader to decide which social structure is closer to the Biblical ideal and therefore carries with it God's blessings.

Is Tim Pool Alt-Right?

About Tim Pool

Under Identity Politics (2022/7/13), Oscar says,

> "Tim Pool is "Alt-Right"? I am as confused as ever about the definition of "Alt-Right"."

Tim Pool is a very interesting case study. He started off as the Progressive Left type. He is (or was?) a democrat and is very Liberal in the more classical sense (e.g. wanting big government and social programs). He believed Obama was a "good President" and advocated for Sanders in the 2016 Election. Up until about 2017, Tim was completely 100% Blue minded.

But unlike so many other people in America today, Tim is a deconstructive critical thinker. He analyzes the information / situation, researches the background, and then responds.

Some issues that he's unraveled include…

- The over-the-top PC wokeness of the Left.
- The over-censorship of the Right in social media.
- He knew Bernie Sanders was betrayed and robbed by his own party.
- He has shaken down the money and power grabbing antics of Congress.
- He has criticized the Far Left's support of active violent domestic terror groups and all the insanity created from this.
- He knew HRC was propped up to take the nomination in the 2016 election no matter who got what votes in the primary.

Then he had the granite balls to say, "These are NOT my values and beliefs. I find these actions disgusting and sad."

So he refused to vote for any Democratic POTUS hopefuls, and he didn't vote for Trump in 2016 either, simply because none of these candidates aligned with his values. And yet he did NOT turn his back on the political party he once believed in. So then of course, Prog Libs had to put him out and shout him down as much as they could.

Rhe regressive Left will attack any person that holds views disparate from their own. But Tim Pool received an extra portion of vitriol because he was perceived as an ideological traitor to the Left. In fact, he is just an independent thinker who is dividing and destroying the herd mentality of the NPC sheeple.

In 2017, his opinions about the MGM turned dark, and in 2018, he went to war against practically the whole internet, condemning it as a tool for destroying free speech and a breeding ground for extremism.

He voted for Trump in 2020 and then he announced his support for Trump, which was the ultimate betrayal. Since then he has delivered video after video of scathing assessments of both the Left and the Right. His popularity has taken a severe hit because a lot of his material has been thoroughly shadowbanned on FarceBook, Patreon, Twitter, TikTok, YouTube, and elsewhere. He has refused to go down, and has responded by opening up accounts on several vblog platforms.

Is Tim Pool a Rational Liberal or a Loose Cannon Conservative?

According to my assessment of the Alt-Right (2022/7/15) and the definition of conservatism I offered in Identity Politics (2022/7/13), we get the following description of the Conservative Alt-Right:

A collection of independent thinkers that have a strong conviction of their values, especially the values of cultural preservation, being responsible with the public trust, mutual good will, domestic peace, social capital, societal order, sociopolitical efficacy, and the multigenerational security and welfare of one's family and home community. They believe all of our problems are known, and the solution to each is the same: people need to prioritize the family / community / tribe / nation, exercise self-control, and act with moral conscientiousness.

Tim Pool fits the bill, or rather, he fits this description better than that of any other identity group. The difference between him and most other Alt-Right mouthpieces is that…

1. He doesn't touch on the controversial issues that the Alt-Right is infamous for (anti-immigration, anti-miscegenation, racial purity, etc.).
2. His methods are borne out of conviction and social justice, rather than a foundational transcendent idealism.
3. His concept of how the world works is very idealistic. (The Right has called him "milquetoast".)
4. He still thinks that big government and political reform is the way to go.

In spite of his inverted ideological concepts, every video Tim makes is clear, factual, informative, and reasonable. He has hundreds of videos on YouTube and other platforms. I encourage readers to take a look and decide for yourself whether he is a maverick Progressive or some variation of Alt-Right. The fact that he has been shadowbanned and slandered by the Left is a big clue.

Conclusions

It's been said that…

> "If you're young and NOT liberal, then you don't have a heart. If you're old and NOT conservative, then you don't have a brain."

According to this understanding, Tim Pool has both a heart and a brain, and is following a rather normal path of maturity. He just happens to be someone who has attracted a lot of attention, especially from his own generation, late Millennials and early Zoomers.

In conclusion, I don't agree with the entirety of Tim Pool's perspectives, however, I do recognize him as a person who is not afraid to stand up for what he believes in. He's hated by the left for betraying them, and he's hated by the right because of his liberal background and his "milquetoast" ideals. But in spite of this, he continues to fight against the PTB and churn out new material every week. He does all this no matter how much he is demonetized, banned, and shadowbanned, or how many people try to smear his reputation and spread lies about him.

Isn't this the mark of a man?

So to answer the question of whether Tim Pool is Alt-Right…? Well, he is now. Isn't it amazing how a little bit of introspection can convert someone to a different mindset? It is really funny and surprising coming from a guy who became famous for covering the Occupy Wall Street protests.

The Gender Dysphoria Epidemic

Oscar · 18 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

The increasing prevalence of "tr@nsitional therapy" has led to a growing number of broken adolescents.

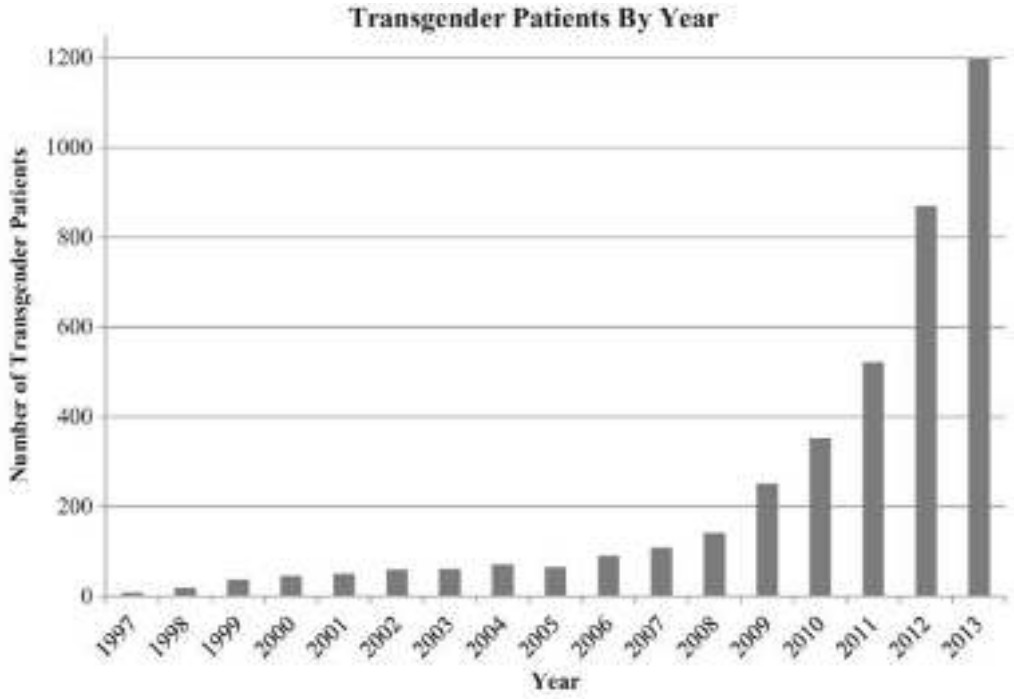
Growing Tr@nsphoria

Tr@nsgenderism is on the rise. So much so, that sex change operations (AKA "gender reassignment surgery") are now an "industry" having its own international market dynamics. Some of the significant factors augmenting the market growth of this industry include…

- Educational institutions and the MGM gaslight / teach / broadcast tr@nsgenderism as an acceptable norm.
- Medical professionals are afraid to discourage tr@nsitioning for fear of being accused as "tr@nsphobic".
- An increasing number of adolescents who identify as something other than what they were born with.
- Careless parents who want to make their children "happy" and "popular", no matter what.
- Laws that prevent parents from interceding in their children's decisions about this matter.
- An increasing number of different types of gender reassignment surgeries available.
- An increasing awareness of tr@nsgender problems (e.g. confusion, suicide, etc.).
- Greater availability and accessibility to gender reassignment surgical centers.
- Widespread public familiarity with tr@nsgenderism and gender dysphoria.
- Greater interest and inclination of patients towards changing one's sex.
- Peer pressure and/or social pressure.



Data Note: Figure displays active transgender patients by calendar year. "Active" is defined as a patient who had a visit in that calendar year and accessed the transgender health program (documented in their electronic medical record) before the end of that calendar year.

Image Source: Reisner, S.L., Bradford, J., Hopwood, R. et al. Comprehensive Transgender Healthcare: The Gender Affirming Clinical and Public Health Model of Fenway Health. J Urban Health 92, 584–592 (2015). https://doi.org/10.1007/s11524-015-9947-2

An article from the New York Post summarizes the situation.

> "In recent years, the number of children experiencing gender dysphoria in the West has skyrocketed. Exact figures are difficult to come by, but, between 2009 and 2019, children being referred for tr@nsitioning treatment in the United Kingdom increased 1,000% among biological males and 4,400% among biological females. Meanwhile, the number of young people identifying as tr@nsgender in the US has almost doubled since 2017, according to a new Centers for Disease Control & Prevention report.
> Historically, tr@nsitioning from male to female was vastly more common, with this cohort typically experiencing persistent gender dysphoria from a very young age. Recently, however, the status quo has reversed, and female-to-male tr@nsitions have become the overwhelming majority."
> The New York Post: 'I literally lost organs:' Why detr@nsitioned teens regret changing genders (2022/6/18)

Stories of Desexed Sufferings

Jack's coverage of Tim Pool brought my attention to one of the most fascinating interviews I've seen on TimCast IRL. In her early teens, Helena Kerschner was groomed by degenerates on Tumblr into believing she was "tr@ns". She began to "tr@nsition" when she was 18, because her parents, thankfully, wouldn't let her when she was in their care. Fortunately, she regretted her decision before doing any permanent damage to herself, and now advocates against tr@nsgenderism.

I cued the video to the point where she tells her story.

Chloe Cole's story is much more tragic.

> "I was failed by the system. I literally lost organs."
> When Chloe was 12 years old, she decided she was tr@nsgender. At 13, she came out to her parents. That > same year, she was put on puberty blockers and prescribed testosterone. At 15, she underwent a double mastectomy. Less than a year later, she realized she'd made a mistake — all by the time she was 16 years old.

> Now 17, Chloe is one of a growing cohort called "detr@nsitioners" — those who seek to reverse a gender tr@nsition, often after realizing they actually do identify with their biological sex. Tragically, many will struggle for the rest of their lives with the irreversible medical consequences of a decision they made as minors.
>
> "I can't stay quiet," said Chloe. "I need to do something about this and to share my own cautionary tale."
> The New York Post: 'I literally lost organs:' Why detr@nsitioned teens regret changing genders (2022/6/18)

She went from believing she was "tr@ns", to taking hormones, to having her body mutilated, to regretting it… All before she even turned 17!

We might be wondering, "Where are her parents? Why didn't they try to talk some sense into her and those doctors?"

The reason is because if parents disagree with an adolescent child's decision to tr@nsition, the youth can be taken away from them and placed into the foster care of others who encourage the tr@nsition. California, Oregon, and Washington even have laws to this effect, allowing adolescents over the age of 16 to be "emancipated" from their parents if the child elects to do so (under the beguiling guidance of a social worker). Some parents have been imprisoned for using genetically correct pronouns for their trans children.

Chloe's body is permanently damaged. There's no way to reverse, or fix, the harm done to her.

Meanwhile, the MGM laments that the growing number of "detr@nsition narratives" makes "transition regret" seem more common than it is and contributes to misconceptions about transgender people in general. SMH

The Christian Response

The tr@ns movement is essentially churning out ever larger numbers of neutered androgynes. Flatly put, it's gross misogyny. We're going to see a lot more of this in the near future, and by "we", I mean the Church. At least some of these mutilated people are going to turn to the Church, and we need to be mentally prepared for that eventuality.

There is nothing new under the sun (Ecclesiastes 1:9). The Church has faced this before. [Emphasis mine.]

> Or do you not know that the unrighteous will not inherit the kingdom of God? Do not be deceived; neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor homosexuals, nor thieves, nor the covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor swindlers, will inherit the kingdom of God. Such were some of you; but you were washed, but you were sanctified, but you were justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God.
> 1 Corinthians 6:9-11 (NASB 1995)

You might be thinking, "Effeminate… homosexuals? Isn't that the same thing?"

No.

In 1 Corintians 6:9, the word tr@nslated as "effeminate" is malakoi (μαλακοὶ) in Greek.

Malakoi literally means "soft boy". Some of these "soft boys" were catamites who'd been castrated before puberty for degenerate men's kicks and pleasures. In other words, they were involuntarily tr@nsgender. That was particularly common in Corinth, which even the degenerate ancient Greeks considered a degenerate city.

Some of these mutilated young men found their way into the Church, and St. Paul reminded them that was no longer their identity. They were now washed, sanctified, and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ and in the Spirit of our God.

We're going to need to do the same.

Those who detr@nsition are called by God (1) to act as a living witness to the sufferings and evil horrors of their experiences, (2) to warn our society against the lies of tr@nsgenderism, and (3) to encourage and mentor others coming through the same experience. (See 2 Corinthians 1:3-7.) This is exactly what we see many of them doing.

Their voices need to be heard.

Conclusions

We've been snowed by all the hype about the Cov!d pandemic. The real epidemic that's going on under the radar is gender dysphoria.

Nearly six years ago, Vox Day wrote,

> "The great line of demarcation in modern politics is now a division between men and women who believe that they are ultimately defined by their momentary opinions and those who believe they are ultimately defined by their genetic heritage."
> Vox Popoli (Ted Beale): What the Alt Right is (2016/8/24)

This may appear to be a dichotomy for those of us who believe that a person is ultimately defined by his/her position in, or outside of Christ. But we need to be mindful of the context. Vox's statement concerns current politics, whereas our spiritual identity concerns our faith in what God has said:

> God created man in His own image, in the image of God He created him; male and female He created them.
> Genesis 1:27 (NASB1995)

The most important source of one's identity is one's position in Christ. Genetic heritage ranks below that. Of course, a person who is obedient to Christ will live in accordance with the genetic heritage Christ gave them… or whatever is left of it after the ravages of sin takes its toll and one turns to Christ. A genetic male will live as a man, and a genetic female will live as a woman.

Introduction

In Mandated Agricultural Failures (2022-7-11), I mentioned how international corporations colonize emerging economies through economic entrepreneurship and political alliances, not done by force of arms, but through the lure of $$$ and "modernization".

In this post, I've copied an excerpt from a Pakistani conference paper published in 2014 [1] that reveals how trans-national corporations lure developing countries into opening their hatches to allow a hegemonic, and in some cases, a dominating foreign influence. The next post will describe the catch.

I've taken the liberty to enhance the English and add relevant images to improve the overall delivery and readability.

Drivers of Trans-National Corporation Power Plays

By coopting the core competencies in developing countries, Trans-National Corporations (TNCs) attempt to dominate these economies with a monopolistic bent of mind, the regimentation of law, and a tactful use of patriotism, with a masterly adaptation of localization as a tool. These corporations thereby push these countries to the edge of chaos through exploration and exploitation, and by seeking to establish their own favorable set of rules, in order to capitalize the developing countries' weaknesses and deficiencies, with wise use of their global value chains. Meanwhile, TNCs are capable of presenting scenes of prosperity, success, and positive influence in these areas.

An analysis of global governance and the American empire has been beautifully described by Barnett and Duvall [2] as having a taxonomy of power encompassing four concepts: compulsory, institutional, structural, and productive.

> "Compulsory power exists in the direct control of one actor over the conditions of existence and/or the actions of another. Institutional power exists in actors' indirect control over the conditions of action of socially distant others. Structural power operates as the constitutive relations of a direct and specific-hence, mutually constituting-kind. Productive power works through diffuse constitutive relations to produce the situated social capacities of actors."

Power Play Tactics of TNCs

The study of transnational corporations (TNCs) is multifaceted so it is quite appropriate here to pinpoint some of their bright and dark aspects for the purpose of deeper clarity and for establishing the focus of study.

10 Bright Aspects of TNCs

1. Foreign Direct Investment (FDI)

Trans-national corporations are always welcomed by the developing countries to expand their operations in their economies and areas of jurisdiction. The reason for welcoming the TNCs to an economy is the inflow of Foreign Direct Investment (FDI), which usually gives a quantum boost to the economic activity of the recipient economic system. FDI is a process which enables the host country to do business for the home country. In the modern era of globalization, the competitiveness is playing a vital role in the economies of scale from individual to business to nation-states. Although the economics of competitiveness may contain its own drawbacks and benefits, nevertheless, it has succeeded in drawing capital from the first world to the third world, thereby elevating the economic baselines of developing economies.

2. Creating Opportunities for Employment

Employment generation is the next blessing which the host countries obtain from FDI. The task of providing a source of income and earning potential to the common man is one of the toughest challenges before the policy makers of every developing country. It requires certain ingredients like vision, missions, leadership, capital, technology, knowledge, skills, human capital development, and most importantly, a lively economic market in which can be sold the products of the employed people. TNCs provide a sufficient answer to all these questions, and therefore their arrival to an economy is considered as a blessing.

3. Accelerated Economic Activities

These nation-states observe an accelerated economic activity once the TNCs start their operations in their system. The capital boost in the economic system, along with the increased number of employed people, results in increased spending, savings, and investments of the individuals.

4. Promoting a Sense of Well-Being among Individuals

The increased employment rate in the host country also brings about a positive change in the lifestyle of the individual. Following the fulfillment of their existential needs, individuals begin to consider how to improve their quality of life. This shift in perspective encourages them to set out on the path of achieving their goals while maintaining a positive outlook on their newly discovered path of prosperity, good fortune, and career advancement. All of these indicators of personal wellbeing give rise to optimism and point in the direction of a greater sense of significance and purpose in life.

5. Corporate Social Responsibility Initiatives

The employment of a large work-force itself becomes a challenge for the TNCs, as it entails the issues of diversity, ethnicity, work-group politics, labor unions, etc. As a proactive stance to these issues and to establish their positive image in the eyes of the world, TNCs deploy their corporate social responsibility (CSR) initiatives. These initiatives ensure certain measures necessary for the well-being of the employees working for them. Such initiatives may include the interventions related to working environment, safety, health, family welfare, education, etc. CSR initiatives help the TNCs not only to brand themselves as employer of choice in the job market, but also as humanitarian organizations in the public opinion.

6. Overflows at Intra, Inter, and Extra-Industrial Levels

The high-tech products, systems, and mechanisms of TNCs are in such great demand that there is a constant deficiency in production. To meet these demands, manufacturing operations are subcontracted to local companies. As a result, the knowledge and practices of TNCs can be learned and capitalized upon by the emerging economies. All these overflows at intra, inter, and extra-industrial levels not only give ample opportunities for sophisticated knowledge and technologies to flourish, but it also delivers a positive impact on the advancement of technology and learning within the host country.

7. Addition of New Colors to the Local Culture

Besides bringing in FDI and employment opportunities, transnational organizations also add new colors to the culture of the host country. Like in Pakistan, it has become part of the culture to serve guests carbonated soft-drinks – a western beverage which otherwise has no connection to the local culture. Similarly, many other western products enhance the local lifestyle in beneficial ways, and western machinery and technology facilitate many tasks of daily living. Thus, the presence of international mega-projects of TNCs opens up new horizons of forming an advanced, hybrid culture by blending the international and local ingredients.

8. Promotion of Sports and Entertainment Activities

Besides the assimilation of the TNCs products in the host country's culture, industry, and social rituals, they also promote themselves through sponsoring sports and entertainment activities. Today, no sports or entertainment event can be organized without a corporate sponsorship. Even the social profiling of the event is underwritten with the endorsement of the corporate sponsors of that event. On the other hand, the branding exercise being conducted throughout the event is also considered as a highly effective tool for advertising the TNC and expanding its corporate culture as well.

9. Clientele to Local Media

The majority of the promotional and branding activities of TNCs are usually done using the highly effective tool of advertisement. Here, TNCs require the media to broadcast their message to the target audience, and the feedback is measured through sales reports. The TNCs have a better capacity to pay for advertising and media in comparison to their local counterparts which are subcontracted to design rigorous and culturally relevant promotions. Whether or not these promotions are effective for the TNCs, they are always beneficial for the local media companies.

10. TNCs as Development Partners of the Nation-State

All this development requires uplifting the social, economic, and environmental aspects of an existing system so that its effects on humans living in that system become more positive than before. The large scale stimulation of a system is a highly challenging task in itself as it involves a lot of delicate parameters. It therefore requires local partners to perform it successfully.

Former South African President Nelson Mandela expressed the importance of partnership between government and business in the following words:

> "Development can no longer be regarded as the responsibility of the government alone. It requires … partnership … There are many ways in which the special skills and know-how of the business community can help to achieve development objectives."

Dunning [3] also denoted that TNCs are capable of effecting the government's objectives and the ease or difficulty with which the government can implement the policies necessary to reach those targets. The development activities can be performed more effectively if the government and the TNCs join hands together.

Introduction

We often hear or read about the shenanigans of law officials and politicians, but we seldom hear any news about the power plays that are pulled by banks and corporations which are an order of magnitude more consequential.

The last post, The Power Play Tactics of Trans-National Corporations (2022/7/20), conveyed an excerpt from a Pakistani conference paper published in 2014 [1] that described "10 Bright Aspects of TNCs" which effectively served to seduce developing countries. This post relays another excerpt from the same paper that reveals how trans-national corporations exert a hegemonic influence that is detrimental to the developing country and its citizens.

The overall message contained in these two posts is how international corporations colonize emerging economies through economic entrepreneurship and political alliances, not done by force of arms, but through the lure of $$$ and "modernization".

Dark Aspects of Trans-National Corporations

Being a Trans-National Corporation (TNC) usually inculcates big size, advanced knowledge, abundance of resources, economies of scale, cutting edge technology, high bargaining power, and most importantly, plentiful financing to back up every venture. These resources provide them the latent advantage to play the game of their choice, on the grounds of their choice, and by the rules of their own choice. TNCs silently or boldly use the tactics of a power play to meet their usually hidden and rarely declared objectives. The literature on TNCs provides a grave critique of them as power players, but provides a naïve understanding of how they do it.

Since TNCs are the primary agent of interdependence occurring in the international economic system, their increasing importance puts serious limits on the state's control of the domestic economy. Factors such as internalization, intra-firm trading, and transfer-pricing hide the actual international transactions and thus, decrease the ability of the national government to control its economy. By lacking this supervision over market activities, the government's interests get into serious conflict with Multi-National Corporations' (MNC) goals: The government needs the information about the market transactions in order to achieve its economic policy objectives, while the MNCs seek to internalize their transactions as much as possible in order to save extra costs, especially those designed for tax contributions. This pattern emerges from the fact that MNCs and nation-states have different goals when assessing and controlling market dynamics. There is no reason to claim that MNCs and nation-states always have conflicting objectives, however, there is no reason to assume that they will be identical or even substantially overlapping.

This study attempts to bring forward a few of their power tactics, therefore, revealing the dark side of TNCs, as briefly discussed below.

1. Stagnating Living Standards of Laborers

The philosophy of maintaining a competitive advantage is one of the strongly existing ideas behind the decision to go international. The interplaying factors behind such decisions include the availability of raw material, labor costs, infrastructure, political support, logistics, and location strategies. TNCs intentionally select specific combinations of these factors that yield lower costs, cheaper acquisitions, greater production, easier maintenance, and speedier distribution bases for their products. One significant factor is that TNCs reportedly pay the laborers deployed at the production bases in the host country in accordance to the local wage rates, which are far lower than those prevailing in the TNC's home country. These local wage standards (in the host country) are developed by their government in accordance to the local economic conditions, and only ensure the minimum levels of economic benefits of an activity which are necessary for one's basic survival in that economy. Adherence to the local wage standards does not provide laborers any chance of improving their living standards. This results in the stagnation of the living standards of the laborers in the host country while the transnational capitalists accumulate the marginal difference between the wage rates in the home and host countries. In addition, the labor conditions are poor and labor unions are often absent. Laborers are reported to work overtime in addition to their normal working hours in order to earn some extra money, which they usually end up by spending on their traumatic miseries or ceremonial needs. Therefore, in spite of the appearance of having great opportunities, laborers continue to grapple with poverty and hasten towards their natural deaths. A coinciding dilemma of this phenomena is that it is in the TNC's interests to keep the poor in a vicious cycle of poverty, as doing conversely may result in a shortage of labor which is a clear threat to their competitiveness.

2. Taxation and Transfer Pricing

Almost every emerging political economy urges for FDI inflow, bringing with it employment generation, an acceleration of economic activity, an inflow of sophisticated knowledge, technology, international best practices, etc., and therefore attract TNCs to include them (nation-states) in their (TNC) global operations. In this effort, the governments usually fall into a bargaining trap with the TNCs, granting them special tax rates and other concessions in their regulatory system. Such tax discounts further increase the already huge competitive gap between the TNCs and their local competitors. Therefore, it inflicts an irrecoverable wound to the local industry. The TNCs also take advantage of the special transfer pricing rates between the home and host countries. This strategic step helps the TNCs become more competitive in the host market, as well as reaping the benefits of accumulating larger earnings through market sales in the wealthier home country.

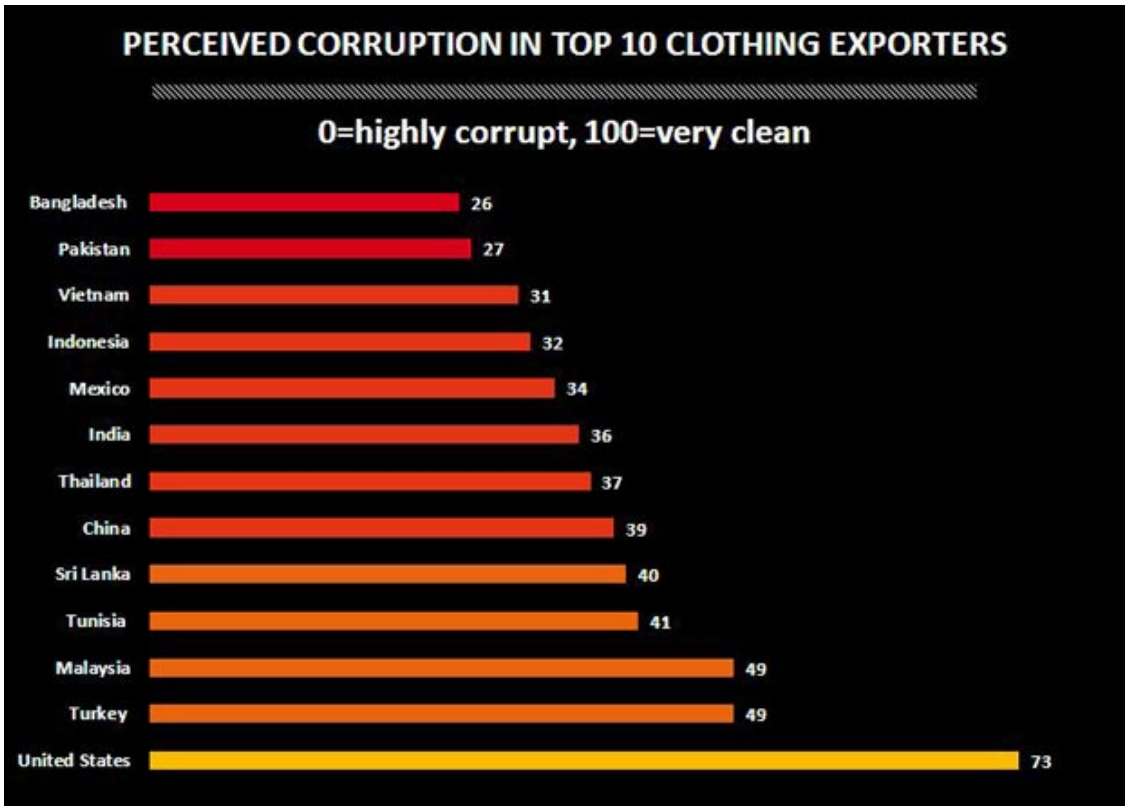
3. Corruption

TNCs are highly resourceful and strictly adhere to their goals. The TNCs goals may or may not be acceptable to the host nor even to the home country in some cases. When TNCs do not find their purposes being fulfilled in a simple and straightforward manner, they attempt to find another way around the hurdle, often by brutally deploying the weapon of corruption to eliminate any obstacles that are preventing them from reaching their goals.

Normally, TNCs involve the top level bureaucrats by offering them direct and indirect undue personal benefits in return for their commitment to guard the TNC's interests through the regimentation of law or through the manipulation of regulatory procedures. This weapon of corruption is usually deployed through licensing, taxation, accounting procedures, financial reporting, information disclosure, concealing the norms of corporate conduct, violating the prevailing labor laws so as to operate in a racist or authoritarian manner, and engaging in brinkmanship in conflicting areas until the opposing party concedes to their demands, etc.



4. Environmental Damage

The literature and current affairs reflect that environmental awareness has been increasing rapidly during the last few decades, especially in the first world countries, giving rise to an intense public concern over environmental issues. New groups, forums, and classes of ecofriendly consumers have emerged in the global market, especially in North America and the member countries of the European Union. This awareness has forced governments to pass laws prohibiting practices damaging the environment and to adopt all kinds of environmentally friendly practices in business affairs. These measures invariably prove to be costly to TNCs and therefore detrimental to their goal of maintaining a competitive market position.

This situation has instigated the TNC decision makers to take solid steps to remove the unethical and environmentally damaging practices from their corporate firms located in first world countries – the majority of which are the home countries of those TNCs. Instead, they shift these practices to the appropriate production facilities in emerging political economies eager to host TNC factories. The TNCs, already being more sophisticated in technology and quality management than these third world countries, give an excellent presentation before the regulatory bodies of the host country and cleverly conceal the negative environmental effects of their operations in the host country. In some cases, the host countries are aware of the risks and accept them anyway in exchange for monetary gain. In case their real face is exposed, the weapon of corruption is there to solve the problem.

TNCs do not hesitate to damage the air, water, and soil for the sake of exploiting resources, or dumping hazardous wastes. The author of this study, during his past, has closely observed a European pesticide giant who had incorporated a dummy business in Pakistan with an objective to import and dump pesticides approaching their expiry date – pesticides which were not allowed to be dumped in the air, land, or water throughout Europe.

Megaprojects: After Bhopal: Cleaning up the World's Worst-Ever Industrial Disaster (2020/9/14)

5. Threats of Sacking the Contracts

Trans-National Corporations usually are in a stronger position than nation states when it comes to bargaining over contracts. In almost all cases, their entry in the host country is a pleasant event, but their departure may carry devastating effects. When TNCs enter an economy, all the stakeholders in the home and host countries express positive feelings. The hosting stakeholders welcome the TNCs, as their arrival means a bulk of FDI inflow and increased economic activities in the country, which implies employment generation, more tax revenue at the corporate and individual level, a new range of products in the local market, etc. Whereas, the investing stakeholders feel safe to open a new market, which in the long run, shifts its wealth to their economic system.

TNCs, being huge, establish an eco-system comprised of key individuals and business networks around them as part of their backward, forward, horizontal, and vertical value chain linkages which ultimately rely on their (TNC) activities. This symbiotic condition alleviates their already strong position before the national governments and sometimes even before the global polity institutes. In such conditions, keeping this ecosystem intact itself becomes a tough challenge for the host government, as little disturbances may result in a backward drift of several decades to the national economy. In case of any conflict between government and TNCs, sacking the contract would become the worst nightmare for the host economy. However, in cases where the TNCs wind up business on their own will, they develop and implement an exit strategy which reduces the incurred losses to the hosts.

In Pakistan, the sports goods giant Nike sacked its production contract in 2006 on six months' notice. This incident, although reportedly due to some conflict between the brand and the vendor (Saga Sports), resulted in the unemployment of 7,000 soccer ball stitchers. The repercussions from this breach of contract further affected 60,000 dependents directly or indirectly, and later become the prime reason for the distorted image of the host country around the globe. The rehabilitation of jobless soccer ball stitchers and their families become a serious challenge for the government, which was later solved after a series of dialogues with its final round between Sialkot Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the Prime Minister of Pakistan, and the executives of Nike in Bangkok. Although Nike eventually came back to the host country with many strict terms, a revised code of conduct, and a new monitoring policy, Pakistan lost its reputation as the leading soccer ball producer and the goodwill of soccer fans around the globe. The damage was irrecoverable – the country which was once the producer of 80% of world's soccer balls is now struggling hard to sustain a 20% share in the global market.

6. Promotion of Consumerism

TNCs have ample resources in terms of technology, knowledge, innovation, and finance, and they operate on large scales to remain competitive. Such large scale production requires acquisition, distribution, purchasing, consumption, and waste disposal at an equal pace, and therefore entails advertisement, sales strategies, shipments, and aggressive marketing campaigns to localize products alien to the host culture. As a result, consumerism spreads throughout the host economy. A few authors have even blamed TNCs for promoting the materialistic American dream of living a lavish and luxurious life which produces high levels of stress among individuals.

In fact, TNCs have well developed strategies to reap the full benefits of the increased economic activity in the system in which they operate. Promoting consumerism, in garb, is an intelligent way of creating and expanding a market in which consumer goods are exchanged for an individual's savings; therefore, providing an effective way of siphoning out wealth from the host country and accumulating wealth in the TNC's home country. This phenomenon also produces a deceleration in the process of national wealth creation.

7. Bullying through 'Ethics' and Licensing

The inherent characteristics of TNCs, such as its large size, resources, manpower, knowledge, technology, political position, bargaining power, etc. are the essential ingredients used when formulating any strategy. TNCs display their power in both the home or host country through the promotion of 'ethics'. Their aggressive strategies not only ensure the fulfillment of their objectives, but also to snub or even crush any of competitors. They wisely use their export policies, franchising, licensing, intellectual property rights, brand protection management, etc. for this purpose. If the imposition of 'ethics' fails, they do not hesitate to silently cross the ethical boundaries at certain times in order to take lead over their competitors.

8. The Sovereignty of the Host Nation-State is at Stake

Trans-National corporations are not bound to any country or nation-state; instead they are bound to their own incorporation having the objectives of attaining a market position and profiteering. If the environment in any host and/or home country becomes unfavorable to them, nothing can stop them from relocating their enterprises to another place of their choice, such to obtain a more favorable environment. Secondly, they acquire such a strong bargaining position that they can take smaller governments hostage to fulfill their agenda. In such conditions, they brutally use their powers to bring their selected agents into positions of authority, which is a severe damage to the democratic process.

No nation-state is safe. Even the flagship democratic countries are held hostage to TNCs. This phenomenon has brought the worst historic example on record when a cartel of oil companies intervened in the U.S. political system to ensure the election of President George W. Bush, twice; a President who later fulfilled his commitments by invading Iraq and giving them access to her rich reserves of oil and gas. All these proceedings and happenings were portrayed in the colors of political, social, and ethical theories by the international media, who itself is the prime partner in creating this criminal ethos with the power to create a hyper-reality in the media. Meanwhile, innocent humanitarian citizens, having grave trust in the government and media, still consider it as a 'war for peace' and a 'war on terror' between a 'good' and a 'bad' nation-state; whereas the TNCs have silently reaped all the benefits.

According to Vernon [2], it is crucial to note that many TNC-state conflicts have always been fueled by the duality of foreign subsidiaries and the use of extraterritorial actions. According to him, Multi-National Corporations serve as vehicles facilitating the extraterritorial reach of one state into the domain of another. TNCs are also used as a passive intermediary for channeling the home country's influence into the host country. This phenomenon of TNCs being used as the primary vehicle of imperialism can be found throughout history.

The First Anglo-Chinese War (1839-42), popularly known as the First Opium War, was fought between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Qing Dynasty of China, with the aim of securing economic benefits from trade in (and forcing opium on) China. In 1842, the Treaty of Nanking – the first of what the Chinese called the unequal treaties – granted an indemnity to Britain, the opening of five treaty ports, and the cession of Hong Kong Island, in return for ending the British monopoly of trading in the Canton System. The war marked the end of China's isolation and the beginning of modern Chinese history.

9. Selling Back Local Resources at a Premium

Transnational corporations select their host countries on the basis of their location and resources (raw material, man-power, etc.). TNCs, particularly those engaged in the trade of Fast Moving Consumer Goods (FMCG), use 'local people' to process 'local material' to produce the 'foreign product.' This 'foreign product' is then advertised as 'export quality' or 'a symbol of having an up-graded lifestyle'; and therefore, is sold back to the 'locals' at high premiums. This type of strategy can be described as 'moving back to go forward' on the part of TNCs. Another example of this phenomenon is how TNCs engage in the trade of bottled drinking water, fruit juices, etc. TNCs add nothing to these products except the packaging and foreign brand identity, for which the 'locals' must pay a premium price. This transfer of wealth to TNCs thereby fulfills their agenda of wealth accumulation.

10. Hyper-Growth Strategies

Trans-National Corporations are very aggressive when it comes to their growth. They use their powers of capital and knowledge to win at the warfront of their own choice. TNCs use the tools and techniques of mergers, acquisitions, joint-ventures, and alliances in both positive and negative ways to ensure their hyper-growth. The objective behind this hyper-growth is not to become an effective 'market player', but rather to become the 'market leader,' more accurately phrased as the 'market controller' with their monopolistic bent of mind.

Infiltrating the Minds of the Masses through Suspension of Disbelief and Social Catharsis/Cathexis

Stages of Sociopolitical Conversion

The MGM/TPTB are steadily working on constructing an alternate world paradigm in which right is wrong, and wrong is right. They've been doing this for decades. The purpose of this is to undermine the standing mythos and introduce a new mythos that is more conducive to the diabolical will of TPTB.

The process of conversion has three stages and works like this.

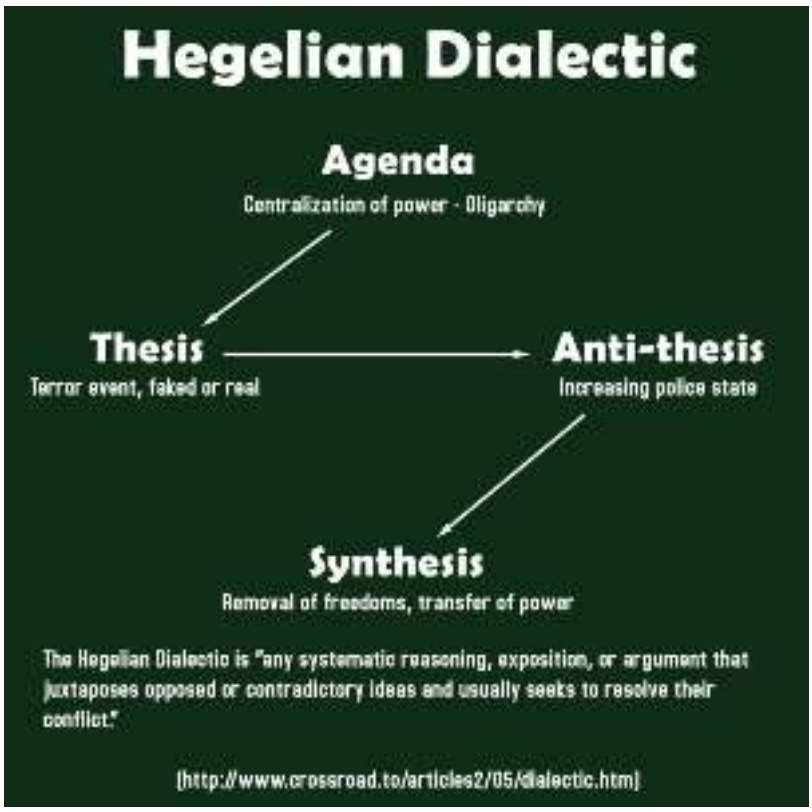
Stage 1 – Infiltration and Subversion

1. Propagandize an alternate viewpoint.
2. Create cathexis* by highlighting dramatic cases of human suffering that illustrate how the standing mythos is destructive, hurtful, problematic, or wrong. Create suitable problems to this end if necessary.
3. Explain how the alternate view is superior to the standing view with respect to suffering and the human condition.
4. Repeat Steps 1-3 ad infinitum until the old viewpoint comes to be regarded as relatively archaic, naïve, oppressive, and/or unpractical. Utilizing shame tactics can speed up the process.

 Cathexis: The concentration of emotional and mental energy on one particular person, idea, or object (especially to an unhealthy degree). Such objects are said to be cathected when an individual attaches emotional significance (with positive or negative affect) to them.*

Stage 1 is also known as the Hegelian Dialectic, which can also be employed in changing a political regime. The Hegelian Dialectic is often summarized as,

Thesis + Antithesis = Synthesis



Most sheeple will eventually be duped into believing the Big Lies™ through repeated exposure. Meanwhile, over time, the masses slowly adjust to the new Synthesis.

For example, we are often told that the purpose of the U.S. Civil War was to emancipate slaves (an ethical mythos), or to settle the sovereignty of "State's rights" (a political/philosophical mythos), but we are never told that the true purpose of the war was to change the sociopolitical power structure of society, simply because War is the fastest, the most profitable, and the most permanent way to do that. Similar arguments apply to WW1, WW2, and others. All the patriotic narratives we have learned in our history classes are little more than socially acceptable excuses intended to conceal and whitewash a much darker refrain.

Stage 2 – Systemic Overhaul

The next stage is to make the new socio-economic-political paradigm permanent and self-sustaining by installing laws, policies, and regulations that support and perpetuate the new system from within.

(The specific methods of Systemic Overhaul will be described in a separate post.)

Stage 3 – Final Conquest

The most violent stage of a war is when the infantries are sent in to subdue any remaining resistance to the last man. Likewise, there are always a few stubborn hold-outs who are willfully resistant to being brainwashed. When it becomes clear that there are still a sizeable majority of dissenters, the PTB will roll out the Psy-Ops in order to erode the last standing objections of ye olde faithful.

The remainder of this post will describe one powerful Psy-Op that is used in social media and the popular cultural narratives: The Suspension of Disbelief.

Suspension of Disbelief

Concerning those who are initially skeptical of believing in a particular paradigm (such as The Matrix), progress can be made in convincing them through a psychological phenomenon known as a Suspension of Disbelief.

The “Suspension of Disbelief” or the “Willing Suspension of Disbelief” has been defined as…

1. A willingness to suspend one’s critical faculties and believe something surreal.
2. The sacrifice of realism and logic for the sake of catharsis, convenience, enjoyment, entertainment, or escape.
3. A literary term of art referring to one of Aristotle’s principles of theater in which the audience accepts fiction as reality so as to experience a catharsis, or a releasing of tensions to purify the soul”

The term, Suspension of Disbelief, was first coined and popularized by Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772-1834). In recent decades, the concept is best known for how it applies to people engaging with fictional works of art, i.e. action, comedy, fantasy, and horror genres.

Cognitive Estrangement (e.g. in fiction) involves using a person’s ignorance to promote a Suspension of Disbelief.

Some trivial but easily relatable examples include…

- Star Wars
- Santa Claus
- Disney Movies
- The Tooth Fairy
- Biden won 74 million votes in the U.S. 2020 presidential election – more votes than any other U.S. president in history!

Less trivial examples that are more nuanced and not as easy to discern include…

- "Women marry for love."
- "Women don't need a man."
- "Women are attracted to nice guys."
- "Women are more spiritual / virtuous than men."
- "Women go to college for the purpose of earning a degree."
- "Men need to be more emotionally open and vulnerable with their wives."
- "I find people who are like X to be attractive. Therefore, I can make myself more attractive to others by being more like X."

Worst of all are the "true lies" that appeal to one's sense of mystical truthiness but are so contextually tortuous that the underlying truths are nearly impossible to apprehend, therefore leading one to ruin. These are lies such as…

- "Married couples should be friends first."
- "Love is easy if you find the right person."
- "It is men's duty to protect and serve women."
- "Sexual purity leads to a sanctified marriage."

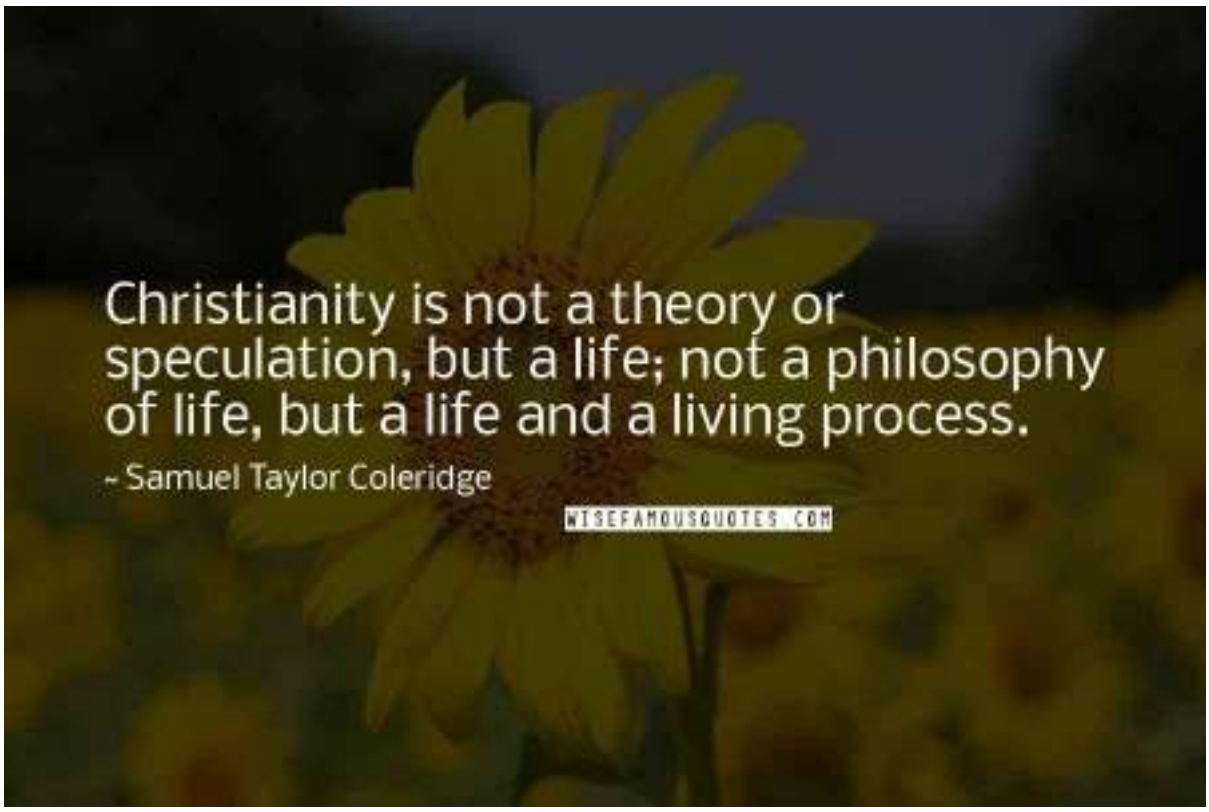
Coleridge described this phenomenon as having a "poetic faith".



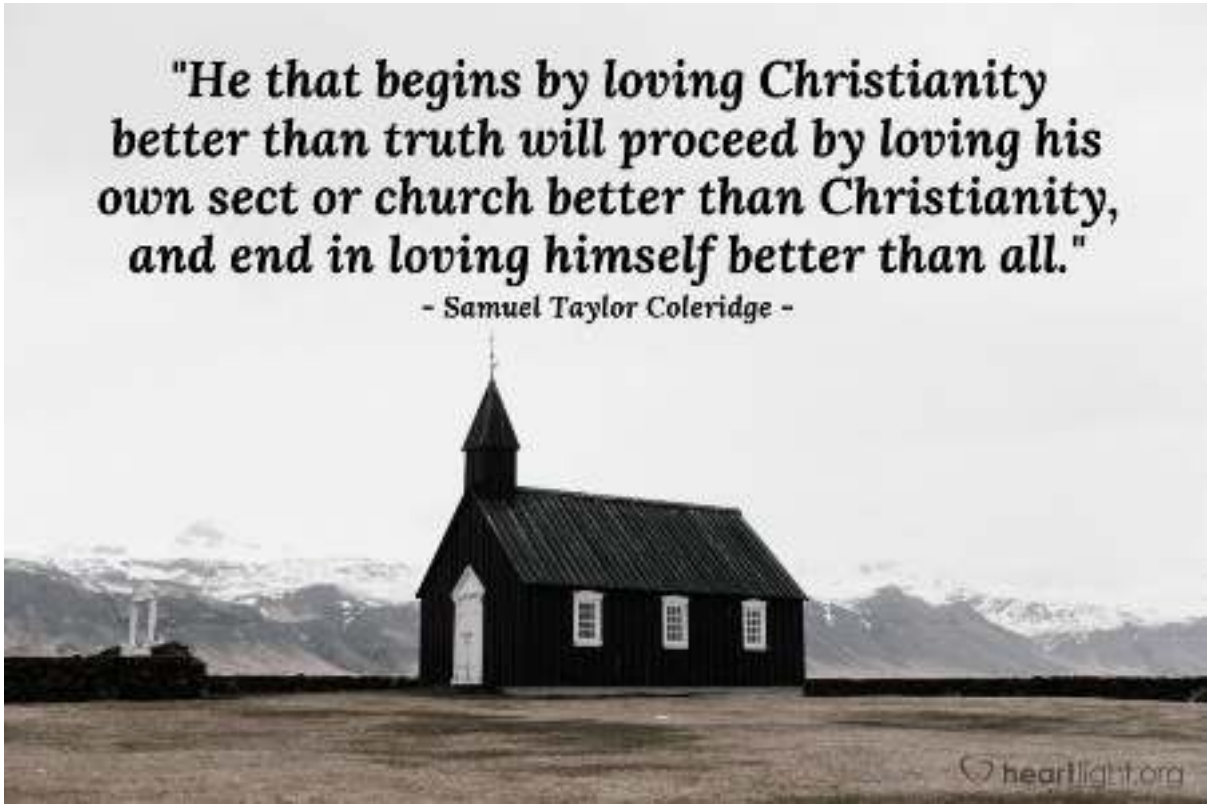
The most diabolical lies are conveyed through a suspension of belief that is without any cognition whatsoever and is therefore accepted without any awareness or evaluative critique. In common language, we describe this as something that is caught, not taught, which stresses the importance of maintaining a good company of friends and associates. Most insidious among these are the metaphysical non-verbal lies contained in the lure of p0rnography (for men) and dramatic romance stories (for women).

How Suspension of Disbelief Works

Psychological critic Norman Holland has elucidated a neuroscientific explanation. When we hear or watch any narrative, our brains go wholly into perceiving mode, turning off the systems for acting or planning to act, and with them go our mental faculties for assessing reality.

Only when we withdraw from our perception of the narrative and stop to think about what we have seen or heard, only then do we assess its truth-value. If we are really "into" the fiction – "transported", as psychologists say – we are, as Immanuel Kant pointed out long ago, "disinterested". We respond aesthetically, even emotionally, but we are without any "skin in the game", and therefore without any inherent purpose that would engage one's will.

Within this alternate paradigm in which faith is strong but the will has evaporated, humans have trouble recognizing lies. We first believe in order to tap into the mythological narrative. We do not judge the truth of what we perceive, even though if we stop being transported and think about it, we know quite well that it is a fiction. Only after exploring the narrative and understanding it to the point where one is able to employ it and willfully test it through applying its precepts is one able to come to a decision about whether it is true or not. Otherwise, one will continue to believe the narrative until a shocking collision with the truth of reality upsets one's delusions.



One then has to make a conscious and deliberate effort to disbelieve the narrative.

People may continue to languish in false propositions simply because…

1. They do not chance to encounter any real world evidence that disproves the false narrative.
2. They do not go to the effort, and thereby take the psychological risk, to prove to themselves that it is false.
3. Or even if they do, they may not find any real world evidence that it is false.
4. They may also have an investment in the false belief (ego, desire, time, suffering, etc.) that they will not want to forfeit, and this repels them from seeking and/or finding the truth.
5. In the final, they continue to believe the falsehood simply because they have a cathexis of being in the transported state. It is cathartic, easy, inspiring, relieving, or it may be perceived as the "safe and secure" position among others who are similarly affected.

In essence, the Suspension of Disbelief allows the media producer (educators, MGM, social narratives, etc.) to slip beliefs into our minds accompanied by a catharsis cathexis to produce a false sense of calm. Afterwards, we are required to make a conscious effort to sort out truth from fiction, which many will never do. (This will be described in more detail in an upcoming post.)

In crass language, the media is slipping a Mickey to the masses to muck them over.

The Comfortable Danger of Social Catharsis

The human desire for Catharsis is the bait used by the Liberal Media to lure one into a Suspension of Disbelief and thereby convert one to Wokism.

Introduction

Have you ever noticed how the internet lights up in response to certain news or other media covering current events? Do you ever look on at the commotion with a sense of being emotionally distant or removed, feeling irrelevant, and wondering how to reestablish your sociopsychological balance?

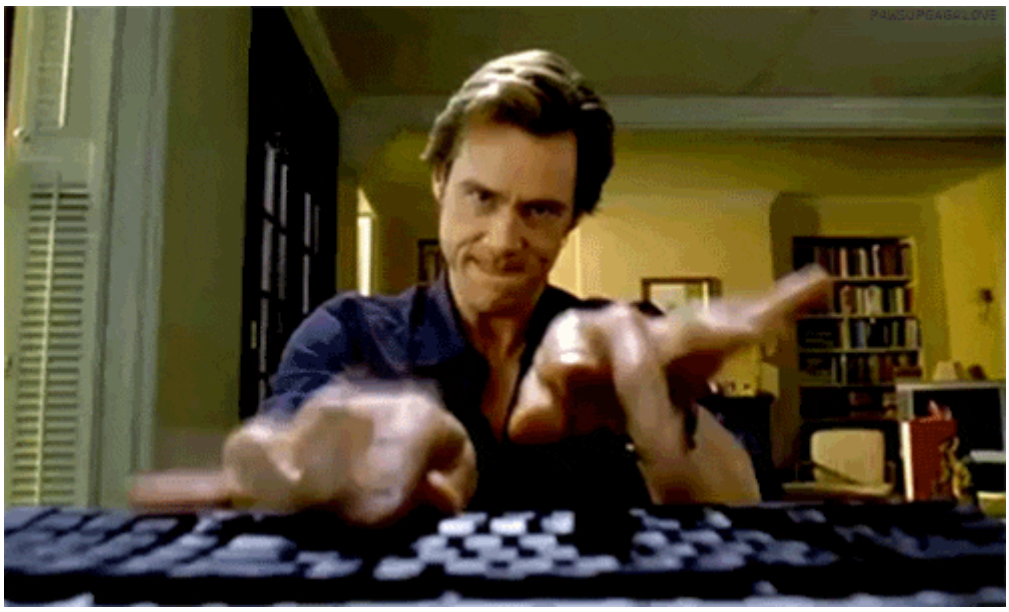
There's no need to worry about how to fit your own convictions into the larger narratives being presented to you, once you understand that it is a part of human nature to respond in such a manner. The whole purpose of the MGM is to get you tuned in to the click-batey sensationalism of the liberal mythos and thereby sweep you away into a converged world characterized by a Suspension of Disbelief. From a personal standpoint, it essentially displaces your thoughts about those things that truly matter in your life. Over time and repeated exposure, it becomes a Suspension of Belief itself.

This post follows up on a previous post, Infiltrating the Minds of the Masses through Suspension of Disbelief and Social Catharsis/Cathexis (2022-7-25), and is written in the hope of helping the reader understand how and why current events can evoke such a meaningless dry splash that only consumes one's precious time and energies.

Social Catharsis

Emotional situations can elicit behavioral, cognitive, expressive, physiological, and subjective changes in individuals. Affected individuals often use social sharing as a cathartic release of emotions.

Bernard Rimé [1] studied the patterns of social sharing after emotional experiences. He found that 80–95% of emotional episodes are shared, and that the amount of social sharing of emotion increases as the intensity of the emotion increases. The affected individuals talk about the emotional experience recurrently to people around them throughout the following hours, days, and weeks. His research suggests that individuals seek social outlets in an attempt to modify their psychological state in order to restore personal homeostatic balance. The results also indicated that this response is irrespective of culture, education, emotional valence, and gender.



Stages of Social Catharsis

Émile Durkheim [2] proposed three emotional stages of social sharing:

1. Directly after emotional effects, the emotions are shared. Through sharing, there is a reciprocal stimulation of emotions and emotional communion.
2. This leads to social effects like social integration and strengthening of beliefs.
3. Finally, individuals experience a renewed trust in life, strength, and self-confidence.

Motives

It stands to reason that the underlying motive and the entire purpose of social sharing is to allow an individual to reach Durkheim's third stage. However, scientists studying emotional affect have found differences in motives for the social sharing of positive and negative emotions.

1. Positive Emotions

A study by Langston [3] found that individuals share positive events to capitalize on the positive emotions they elicit. Reminiscing the positive experience augments positive affects like temporary mood and longer-term well-being.

In general, the motives behind social sharing of positive events are to recall the positive emotions, inform others, and gain attention from others. All three motives are representative of what Langston identified as social "Capitalization". Red Pilled readers will recognize that women are especially prone to these behaviors, but it is true for men too.

A study by Gable et al. [4] confirmed Langston's "capitalization" theory by demonstrating that the relationship quality is enhanced when partners are responsive to positive recollections. The responsiveness increased levels of intimacy and satisfaction within the relationship.

We now have a name for this kind of online behavior: Positive Social Capitalization.

2. Negative Emotions

In contrast to positive social capitalization, Rimé's studies suggest that the motives behind the social sharing of negative emotions are to vent, articulate, understand, bond, and gain social support. Negatively affected individuals do not necessarily seek to restore positive affects but instead often seek out the meaning of life (hello Jordan Peterson!) and emotional support from others in order to combat feelings of anger, depression, loneliness, and stress after a tragic event.

Collective Catharsis

Collective responses to emotional events are similar to individual responses, but on a larger scale.

When communities are affected by an emotional event, members repetitively share emotional experiences. According to Rimé, every round of sharing elicits an emotional reactivation in both the sender and the receiver. This then stimulates and reactivates the need to share in both.

Positive events can bring people together, whereas negative events create a distended need for catharsis that ripples outward like concentric waves emanating from a stone tossed into a pond. The snowballing and self-perpetuating continuance of this social sharing throughout a community leads to high amounts of emotional recollection and "emotional overheating".

For example, After the 2001-9-11 event in New York city and the 2004 terrorist attacks in Madrid, it was found that more than 80% of respondents shared their emotional experience with others.

Stages of Collective Catharsis

Pennebaker and Harber [5] defined three stages of collective responses to emotional events.

1. A state of "emergency" takes place in the first month after the emotional event. In this stage, there is an abundance of thoughts, talks, media coverage, and social integration based on the event.

2. A “plateau” occurs in the second month. Abundant thoughts remain, but the amount of talks, media coverage, and social integration decreases.
3. “Extinction” occurs after the second month in which people come to accept the event and have adjusted psychologically. People gradually forget about the event as its memory is displaced in favor of newer and more relevant events.

Conclusions

We are constantly inundated by liberal viewpoints that invite us to enter into the world wide web of Woke and thereby lose our moorings in reality and sound reason. We are intensely pressured to integrate these viewpoints into our world view and play along with the game of identity politics at the risk of being doxed, ostracized, shadowbanned, shamed, socially rejected, targeted, and/or unemployed if we don’t.

Our initial reaction is to fear such outcomes, but the Lord tells us the opposite.

> [17] “Therefore, come out from their midst and be separate,” says the Lord.
> “And do not touch what is unclean;
> And I will welcome you.
> [18] “And I will be a father to you,
> And you shall be sons and daughters to Me,”
> Says the Lord Almighty.
> 2nd Corinthians 6:17-18 (NASB)

Resisting this urge to merge is not quite as simple as turning off the Boob Tube and opening your Bible. As we have learned from this essay, the human psychological needs for a cathartic release, psychological integrity, trust, and social relevance, all compel a vast majority of people to respond to what is perceived to be significant news and/or world events by talking about it and sharing their thoughts and experiences, thereby attaining a homeopathic balance by keeping themselves within the ever shifting Overton Window.

Readers need to be well aware of any type of news or information that they are exposed to, as this will affect their thoughts and what they talk about in the upcoming days and weeks.

Σ Frame Maxim 33 (Jack): It's easier to tear down than to build up. Destruction is simple but creation is long and labor intensive. A simpleton naturally creates discord, but it requires a united collaboration of the wise to foster civility and unity.

Exit Questions

1. By participating in the cathartic activities surrounding the larger social narrative, are you creating harmony or are you fostering animosity?
2. With each click of the mouse or remote, with each story you hear or read, is your mind converging or diverging from the narratives that are antithetical to faith?

Frustrated Collective Catharsis as an Incentive for Social Unrest

Introduction

After watching the news or other media covering current events, have you ever had the sense that the world (as it is presented by the media) is surreal?

Have you ever had the sense that it makes you so emotional, but yet confused about how it affects you personally?

Does it leave you wondering how to respond or what actions need to be taken, and yet there is no clear course of action to be taken?

There's no need to be confused about this, once you understand that it is all a Psy-Op, and the whole purpose of it is to make you bewildered, consternated, and utterly frazzled, such that you willingly check out.

This post follows up on two previous posts on the same topic, Infiltrating the Minds of the Masses through Suspension of Disbelief and Social Catharsis/Cathexis (2022-7-25), and The Comfortable Danger of Social Catharsis (2022-7-27). Catacomb Resident has added an additional spin on this topic in revealing that a certain type of Catharsis/Cathexis that is focused on subjects that are removed from the viewers spiritual domain is A Matter of Flesh (2022-7-28). This third installation is written in the hope of helping the reader understand how this scheme works to create widespread disinterested ennui. IOW, it uses drama and civil unrest to destroy the Shalom of a society.

Frustrated Catharsis is Intended to be a Motivator

The second post linked to above described how negative events create a distended need for catharsis that ripples throughout a community in a kind of constructive (but actually destructive) interference, leading to high amounts of emotional investment and "overheating". To fully attain an integrated and successful Catharsis, individuals must work through the issues presented and develop a new homeopathic balance, as was discussed in the first post linked to above. When this is not realistically possible, this creates a social tenor in which catharsis is desired and sought after, but may not be forthcoming. This state of not having an adequate catharsis necessary to allow individuals to experience a renewed trust in life, strength, and self-confidence is called a Frustrated Catharsis.

This is not a new phenomenon. Many times in the past, there have been, for political or aesthetic reasons, deliberate attempts made to subvert the effects of catharsis in media, theater, and politics.

Sociopolitical scapegoats carry signs with their names and social transgressions in the Chinese Cultural Revolution. Many scapegoats were condemned to death or were murdered by mobs.

Case Study 1: Brechtian Techniques

The German screenwriter Bertold Brecht (1898-1956), a Marxist sympathizer, identified certain methods of media production that have since been used widely in media presentations and propaganda.

Brecht's brilliancy is showcased by the fact that he wrote stage plays that appealed to both proletariat and bourgeois audiences. Concerning the proletariat viewers, Brecht constructed plays that rejected the naturalistic stage style and portrayed the world at the time in a way that would enable each spectator to adopt a critical awareness of the action they saw on stage. This critical awareness was intended to provoke viewers to work through these issues in their personal psyche and daily lives. Concerning the bourgeois viewers, Brecht viewed catharsis as a pabulum for this audience, and designed dramas which left significant emotions unresolved, intending to force upon this rather socially insulated audience an incentive to take social action.

Brecht's most noteworthy accomplishment was that he identified the concept of catharsis with the spectators' notions of identification with the stage characters. Brecht reasoned that the absence of a cathartic resolution would require the audience to take political action in the real world, in order to fill the emotional gaps they had experienced vicariously through his stage plays. He thereby masterminded the viewers' Suspension of Disbelief by introducing a number of psychological barriers in the presentation that prevented the viewers' complete adhesion to the dramatic actions and characters. These barriers created a distancing effect (Verfremdungseffekt) between the viewer and the representation or portrayal of characters, and are now known as Brechtian Techniques. These techniques can be seen as early as 1930 in his agit-prop play, The Measures Taken, and led to the development of Epic Theatre.

Highlights from workshop of The Measures Taken (2009-12-24) Length: 5:48
Of note, Mao Zedong adopted Brechtian Techniques during the Chinese Cultural Revolution (1966-1976), and certain elements can still be seen today in political rallies in Nationalistic cultures around the world. I have even seen Brechtian Techniques being employed in Christian Churches in Taiwan!

Case Study 2: Jordan Peterson and Thinkspot

American Conservatives are presumably "allowed" to have "free speech" platforms because it is a catharsis – as long as it is owned and operated by TPTB. This scenario is also known as “controlled opposition”.

The problem with all the “free speech” platforms that have sprung up over the last few years is that sooner or later, it is revealed that they are not “free” at all. One by one, evidence came to light that there was indeed censoring and banning going on, accompanied by an unknown number of sock puppet accounts hosted by Big Brother monitors who were presumably paid to hedge maze the constructed narrative among the grass roots, all in the name of “keeping the conversation civil”. Moreover, these platforms deceptively advertised themselves as “free speech” platforms in order to cash in on the clicks of the multitudes seeking an authentic cathartic interaction.

Jordan Peterson’s Thinkspot is one such “free speech” platform for our consideration. Take a look at how it presented itself.

> “According to Peterson, Thinkspot.com, will be a space where creators can monetize their work and users can engage in thoughtful conversation about topics without worrying about Big Tech censorship. An issue that is currently heavily seen on Twitter, Facebook, and YouTube.
> Some argue that these issues more greatly affect conservative voices vs left-leaning voices, and this appears to be true, although from my analysis it seems to be less about conservatives/politics and more about truths coming to the surface about agendas being pushed by the elite through the left.”

> “A nuanced look at this censorship reveals that the political agnostic elite is simply using the left to create a culture of outrage to widen the gap within humanity and create an environment where censorship is widely requested by the people, instead of being unwelcomely proposed by the elite. This is a classic case of the power elite creating a problem, getting the needed reaction, and then proposing their pre-thought solution.”
> Collective Evolution: Jordan Peterson Is Backing A Censorship-Free Platform Called ‘Thinkspot.’ Here’s Why (2019-6-18) [Archive]

What a nice talk! Every deplorable noob and his cousin drew the conclusion that “he’s one of us”, and got the notion that they could interact with Peterson himself on a regular basis, thereby leading to a virtual avalanche of clicks from the multitudes seeking “meaning” and an authentic catharsis.

But in the end, Thinkspot and other similar platforms only offer a Frustrated Catharsis. Readers may be consternated to realize that this frustration was, in fact, the whole point of it all.

So whatever happened to Thinkspot.com? It's still around, but other conservative "free speech" platforms that are observably more "free" left it in the dust. As a neo-Marxist, Peterson wasn't deemed trustworthy enough.

Update: Collective Evolution's article was deleted in September 2021 after Gab took off. We're still uncertain just how "free" Gab truly is, but so far, it's been more "free" than others.

Case Study 3: The TV Series, Unv@ccinated

In reaction to all the damning evidence about the Cov@x that is now appearing, in the form of medical and biological reports, the fudging of statistics, and the alarming decrease in the birthrate, TPTB have come up with a mind and soul numbing social catharsis in the form of a BBC sitcom entitled Unv@ccinated,* which is being slyly touted as a "documentary". This sitcom / "documentary" features a prefabricated reality show type of social experiment in which seven anti-v@x Britons spend five days living together in a house, where they are bombarded with what is purported to be "myth-busting scientific evidence" about the v@ccine. Readers should remain mindful that all the characters are paid, skilled actors and are not genuine, knowlegeable anti-v@xxers, and they therefore constitute a rhetorical straw man.

Readers who are familiar with Brechtian Techniques will quickly identify this whole plot as a bowling alley of king-pin-heads in which those of conviction (i.e. anti-v@xxers) are continually lambasted with ideological shame and ridicule until an increasing number of viewers, including and especially anti-v@xxers, have had a bellyful of the routine. The desired end effect is to saturate the viewers' minds with frustrated catharsis and artificially age the issue until everyone is thoroughly psychologically exhausted and no one is motivated to pursue the opposing opinion (i.e. being an anti-v@xxer). As a result, TPTB can easily sweep this whole issue into the dustbin of history, and everyone will be glad to see it pass and be forgotten, just as China did with all the horrors of the Cultural Revolution. Such is the nature of Catharsis.

The best part of this stage play is that only the bad guys know, and none of the sheeple will be any the wiser (except those who happen to read this Σ Frame post).

Final Statements

Lest we think that the Communist / Left / Liberal / Marxist / Progressive wing of politics has a monopoly on using Brechtian Techniques and manufacturing frustrated catharsis, it can just as easily crop up in Conservative circles as well. In fact, the Left greatly fears their own Techniques being "stolen" and employed by the Right, as revealed in this article from The Interpreter: Gab's gift to the far right (2021-6-1). Of course the Left dislikes what is being said on Gab, but they do not fear what is being said as much as they fear the way it is being said in an authentic cathartic way (viz. truly "free"). That is to say, it is a venue in which participants can attain a sociopsychological homeostasis and reintegrate themselves within an alternative community that is uniquely separate from the Globalist Woke regime.

The Distension of Cathartic Cathexis

Jack · 30 July 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Frustrated Catharsis is regularly instilled by the Liberal Media. Here is one such Case Study.

Readership: All;
Theme: Political Shenanigans
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 5.5 minutes

Introduction

In the last post, I gave three case studies of how Frustrated Collective Catharsis is employed as an Incentive for Social Unrest using Brechtian Techniques. This post will look at one more example in depth — an article from The Wall Street Journal.

In case readers are having difficulty in identifying the Brechtian Techniques used in MGM, one should be aware that the Western propaganda machine intentionally avoids the overt militaristic Power vs. Fear aspects of Brechtian Techniques because of its psychological connotations with Communism, N@zi Germany, the Chinese Cultural Revolution, etc. However, it still survives in a covert muted form.

Once readers become cognizantly aware of this Psy-Op trick, it will become evident in countless articles published daily by MGM.

In covering this article, I wish to point out that in spite of this article's stated intent of bringing awareness to advancing the quality of life for blacks, it serves little purpose other than to arouse and distend past racial animosities, which isn't helpful for blacks — nor anyone else — at all.

The Springboard

The WSJ outdid itself with one article that described what appears to be an expression of frustrated catharsis resulting from a cathartic cathexis. The reader will understand what I mean by this through reading this essay, and I suspect that it is reminiscent of idolatry. Their piece entitled Liberals Choose Racial Catharsis Over Progress for Blacks (2021-6-1) [Archive] highlighted President Biden's trip to Tulsa, Oklahoma to attend the 100th anniversary of the 1921 Tulsa race riot.

An overdramatized scene from the dystopian HBO series Watchmen (2019), supposedly depicting the 1921 riots in Tulsa Oklahoma.
The WSJ reports that this riot "destroyed a prosperous black community and is estimated to have left hundreds of people dead." This account is somewhat misleading, however, because the 2001 Tulsa Reparations Coalition examination of events identified 39 dead (26 black and 13 white), based on contemporary autopsy reports, death certificates, and other records. Several estimates based on sensational newspaper stories and dubious personal testimonies ranging from 75 to 300 dead have added confusion about the exact number, but this is what the WSJ chooses to present as apparent fact, thereby stoking up the drama and racial tension.

The Anti-Climax

Next, the author adopts the pseudo-conservative role of controlled opposition when he writes,

> "These historical milestones … demonstrate how much racial progress has been made in this country in a relatively short time. Yet for progressives and their friends in the media, the events are also an opportunity to push for racial preferences and bigger government. The goal is to link today's racial disparities to past wrongs and to play down or ignore the far more significant role that contemporary black behavior plays in social inequality."

But the author never goes on to offer an opinion about a "corrected" view, nor does he ever discuss how "racial progress" might be achieved. He doesn't even tell us anything further about Biden's visit. Instead, he recounts several blurbs from people who are apparently made out to be Politically INCorrect imbeciles who commit the narrative faux pas of mentioning expert facts that deny or downplay the significance of the riot!

> "George Patrick Evans, Selma's mayor, [was asked] how events of 50 years ago fit into the "current conversation about race relations," he balked at the question. "I'm not sure how it fits," Mr. Evans, who is black, replied. "We have a lot more crime going on in 2015 all over this country than we had in 1965. Segregation existed but we didn't have the crime." [When] Asked about the city's high black unemployment rate, he still refused to racialize the issue…"

How dare he insinuate that blacks might have had it better under segregation!

How dare he refuse to racialize any issue!

Sparks fly!

The apparent message here is that even blacks are ignorant and unmoved by their own history of radical injustice! That is an injustice upon injustice, and an insult upon injury!

The obvious purpose of this mention is to arouse anger and indignance in the reader, and if it does not, "Well then, YOU are the problem!" Or so it is presumed. This constitutes a sly shame tactic and a defacto segregation of the Out Group — anyone who has the balls to disagree with the narrative.

The Hot Button Blizzard

The article goes on to mention many controversial ideas – but only in passing – because the goal here, you see, is to arouse tension, not to educate us about the history of racial injustice nor to convey an opinion about how it can be improved. The task of educating one's self and the burden of proof is therefore placed upon the reader with a blizzard of salty ideas such as…

- Black unemployment
- Housing discrimination
- "…the dubious legality of race-based government assistance…"
- "…the black residents of Tulsa 100 years ago didn't wait around for the federal government to come to their rescue. Within two decades of the riots, homes and churches had been rebuilt, and black-owned businesses again anchored the community."
- "The political left is much more interested in black suffering than in black accomplishment…"
- "…black history is about more than victimization at the hands of whites."
- The idea that blacks had a better life under the segregation that existed before the Civil Rights movement.
- "…it is no longer racist white vigilantes but black criminals who pose the bigger threat to safety in black communities."
- "Liberals blame today's disproportionately high black criminality on the "legacy" of slavery and Jim Crow."

Has the WSJ stoked up your emotions and objections yet? If it hasn't, then you just might be a cold-hearted, deplorable, unempathetic rac!st! So the WSJ author goes on to cover various conflagrations from this angle as well.

- "The Biden administration would much rather discuss white criminal behavior in Tulsa 100 years ago than black criminal behavior in Chicago, Baltimore or St. Louis today."

- "Obama invoked high-profile police shootings, "unfair sentencing" and "voter suppression," giving the impression that little had changed in the past 50 years, his own election and re-election notwithstanding."
- "Liberals focus on this history of black suffering rather than success because it helps Democrats get elected and activists raise money."
- "This country's racist past should never be forgotten or sugarcoated, but neither should it be used as a blanket explanation for present disparities."

Are you emotionally exhausted yet? Is your mind filled with notions of injustices that you feel must be acted upon but which have no clear expression of the will? If so, then you've been stage played, or should I say, "transported" through a Suspension of Disbelief into a state of Cathexis. Here's your honorary tin foil hat, or should I say, the shiny fascinator that will allow one to peacock among the Woke.

The Dragnet

Just in case the reader happens to be a member of another race that is neither white nor black, the author goes further in mentioning several other inflaming issues that have absolutely nothing to do with neither Biden's trip to Tulsa nor the riots there in 1921.

- "History teaches us that the progress of blacks and other minorities in the U.S. is not conditioned on racial tolerance."
- "One of the largest mass lynchings in U.S. history targeted Chinese immigrants in Los Angeles…"
- "Japanese-Americans were put in internment camps during World War II."
- "Today, both [Chinese Americans and Japanese Americans] outperform whites academically and economically and have for decades."

Whew! That exhausts just about everybody in the country. Now we're all on the verge of becoming exasperatingly Woke! Well, that's the whole purpose of this article, isn't it?

After all this diatribe, the article ends with this.

> "The left's focus on the past behavior of whites, while ignoring the present behavior of blacks, might offer some people catharsis, and it might help groups like the NAACP or Bl@ck L!ves M@tter stay relevant. But where is the evidence that such an approach facilitates black upward mobility?"

So after stoning the reader with a barrage of racially charged perspectives, this author offers a very weak final point of argument. It is morally weak because he's relying on the racial cathexis manufactured by the Left to create a frustrated catharsis for all. It is philosophically weak because his premise assumes that Biden's purpose in attending the anniversary in Tulsa is to enhance the upward mobility of blacks. I doubt this is true, and the author never addressed this assumption nor did he establish that it was true. I would rather believe that Biden's purpose was a politically saavy move to highlight racial conflict and to virtue signal, which is another fake catharsis.

So in the end, we are left with a frustrated catharsis over a cathexis that implicitly demands the reader to get involved somehow, or else feel guilty for not doing so. This is a reFrame of the worst sort.

Conclusions

Hopefully, I've made it clear by now how the MGM uses the Suspension of Disbelief, Cathexis, and Catharsis to destroy citizens' inner peace and the broader Shalom of society.

To briefly reiterate the presentation and the impact of the article, as you can see, the article dances around a plethora of hot button issues, but never offers a denouement nor even makes a solid argument. Within four days, the article had attracted over 800 comments consisting of many questions and personal opinions about race relations. So the WSJ succeeded in its goal to create a conflagrating, confusing, and click worthy article.

One commenter, James Crosswhite, was able to identify the subtle underlying purpose of the article, although he failed to identify the catharsis as being one of frustration. He wrote,

> "Offering people some catharsis in our melodramatic spectacle-oriented political age is no small thing. It is in fact the primary goal. If the media does not magnify it, it is neither real nor true. Unfortunately, the catharsis > is cyclical and only temporarily satisfying — though it does ultimately move revenue from here to there.

> A true Aristotelian catharsis would be not a simple emotional purge, but an actual emotional and intellectual clarification, a change in vision and attitude and action. But that would lead to hard and honest policy work and not to further emotional spectacles that come and go, like riots, and celebrities. Biden in Tulsa is neither an action nor an accomplishment. It is a spectacle of useless and irrelevant emotion and exploitation. Promising to violate the Equal Protection Clause is as wrong and foolish and dangerous as it sounds."

Now, unless the reader went to all the trouble and emotional turmoil that would be necessary to thoroughly think through all the issues covered above, and somehow integrate these issues into his own life purpose, the reader would be left feeling a pang of injustice and wanting to whimper simp about racial disparities as a cathartic outlet, thereby propagating even more cathexis of discord and unrest.

And for what? I challenge the reader to show me how Blacks have made significant progress as a direct or indirect result of this WSJ article. This article is little more than a tyranny of emotional sensationalism — a mockery of both the American society and the dignity of Blacks, and an utter distraction and a source of confusion to the reader.

The WSJ is like a sophisticated version of The National Enquirer, only one having divisive and malicious intent.

Hexis Cathexis and Voodoo Catharsis

Cathexis bites the bait. Catharsis reels them in.

A Summary of this Week's Mini-Series

The phenomenon of Catharsis is founded on the human desire/need for psychological homeostasis and to be socially integrated. Catharsis is not anything good or bad in itself. But Christian faith demands that the resulting homeostasis should be in line with God's Word, and that we become integrated into a community of other believers. Ideally, a Catharsis should lead to inner peace with God and a fellowship of shalom. However, the catharsis that is foisted upon us by the world leads to confusion and frustration and serves to keep us locked under the spiritual authority of the principles and powers of this world.

A Cathexis, on the other hand, is usually used with a negative connotation, but it can be either good or bad, depending on the nature of it and what it transfixes us upon. At best, a Cathexis on the Holy Spirit can lead us to glorify and revere God, to fight for the integrity and sanctity of marriage, or to protect children and the infirmed. At worst, a Cathexis can manifest as an addiction (e.g. a desire for wealth, garnering attention, the abuse of mind and mood altering substances, sex, etc.), or even idolatry (e.g. fandom, feminism, individualism, etc.).

Recognizing the vacuum of awareness about this topic, this week I've covered a mini-series on the nature of Catharsis and Cathexis, and how the MGM employs these aspects of human psychology to manipulate the minds of the masses and thus public opinion — which is the real power (and a major fault/weakness) of democracy.

The MGM's larger purpose of utilizing Catharsis and Cathexis is (1) to keep you wrapped up in their fabricated drama and the associated concerns, and/or (2) to wear you out emotionally and psychologically.

If one doesn't feel tired and bored with it all, then that would be a real concern. St. John described this dichotomy when he instructed us…

> [15] Do not love the world or the things in the world. If anyone loves the world, the love of the Father is not in him. [16] For all that is in the world — the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life — is not of the Father but is of the world. [17] And the world is passing away, and the lust of it; but he who does the will of God abides forever.
> 1 John 2:15-17 (NKJV)

Here, "loving the world and the things in the world" points to having an emotional / psychological attachment (i.e. a Cathexis) to false, harmful, idolatrous, sinful, or wasteful activities and obsessions, and also just about any political or social movement that doesn't involve one personally nor fall within one's personal spiritual domain. This includes the regular digestion of gnostic media, MGM, paparazzi drama, progressive narratives, p0rn (for men), romance rubbish (for women), and social fads / ideologies / movements like Beelemzebub, the climate control craze, C0v@x, SeeArtTee, Tr@nsAm, and so on.

CatacombResident pointed out…

> "A key element of Christian Mysticism is detachment from this world and its concerns. It's called Holy Cynicism in some circles. You are seeking peace with God and have zero expectation of peace for this world; this world is doomed. If you can disentangle yourself, then you don't seek entertainment with its storybook resolutions; you aren't drawn in because you don't want that brand of catharsis. Then again, you aren't moved by Brechtian Techniques, either. You become cynical enough without it; his plays become mere noise and annoyance."

Unfortunately for those who have enjoyed this month's theme, tomorrow we'll be moving on to the theme for August, which is Masculine Authority and Responsibility. However, I will continue to point out aspects of Catharsis, Cathexis, Cognitive Estrangement, Suspension of Belief, and the media's mind manipulations when it comes up.

But before we go on, there is one more thing I need to address.

The MGM Deceptively Coopted a Righteous Cathexis in Reporting the Oklahoma City Bombing and the Uvalde Incident

Gunner Q brought up two insightful topics and some excellent questions. He writes…

> "I am liking this series. Recently I've been reviewing the Oklahoma City Bombing, after learning that inner-circle swamp creature Merrick Garland was involved in the prosecution of that. There is an example of Cathexis, but check my math. It's a new concept to me.
> At the time and still today, a big deal was made in the media about the day-care center in the building. 168 casualties but the 19 children were always what made the headlines. This is significant because McVeigh claimed he didn't even know the day care existed. His target was the ATF field office inside the building, which he believed had committed war crimes at the Waco incident (which it had). By generating emotion about the children killed accidentally, the media was able to remain silent about the ATF office.
> The prosecution never brought it up even though he was known to have protested in-person at Waco. They ran > with the emotional appeal so that the jury wouldn't wonder who the other 149 dead were. Also pointing the "white militia" finger at McVeigh, which I consider an example of assigning guilt by association.

>
> I'm told McVeigh tried to bring up the ATF/Waco motivation during the defense, he actually tried for a just-cause defense, but I need serious research to learn more. Anyway, is that Cathexis? Because if so then Uvalde is a more recent example. Spin up the people on 'the police did nothing' then direct the social energy at gun banning?"

Scenes from the Oklahoma City bombing, 1995 April 19.

The two incidents Gunner mentions (the Oklahoma City bombing and the Uvalde incident) are insightful illustrations of how a Cathexis is used to control the narrative. In both cases, concern for the wellbeing of children is actually a "true" Cathexis. By "true", I mean that it is beneficial to the family and society, Biblical, ethical, good, moral, proper, realistic, right, and so on, to highly regard the wellbeing of children above most all other concerns. So in coopting this Cathexis, the media does not need to spin up a moving narrative in order to create a Cathexis attachment in the public observer, simply because it is already there (put there by God and nature).

As Gunner observes, this Cathexis is effectively used to distract the public observer from noticing other issues that are more closely attuned to the causes of the incidents – causes which if known, would undermine the public's faith in government and turn the narrative in a different and perhaps a more truthful direction. As a result, the public observer becomes riveted on the injustice done to the Cathexis (the children), and becomes obsessed with obtaining some form of catharsis related to this injustice. Moreover, the public becomes tied up in the emotional turmoil and their attention is thereby manipulated away from the core issues.

To offer an analogy, it's kind of like giving candy or a toy to a child to keep him occupied or out of trouble while you're doing something else.

Just to be clear, the news coverage of both incidents does not utilize the public observer's desire for Catharsis directly, however, the biased and incomplete coverage of the events indirectly creates an intense need for catharsis in the public, and this is further aggravated by the absence of a decisive resolution which leaves the public observer feeling frustrated and insecure. So in this way the overall "goal" of destroying the shalom of both the affected community and the public observer is achieved.

A scene from the mass shooting at Robb Elementary School in Uvalde Texas, 2022 May 24.

On a more concerning side note, it is rather revealing that we do not see the same intense focus on the well-being of children within the popular narratives surrounding abortion, cohabitation, custody, education, No Fault divorce and divorce in general, politics, premarital sex, society, tr@nsgender dysphoria, and so on. In all these cases, children are sacrificed to the god of individualism without hesitation. So we can assume that the MGM's focus on the well-being of children in the OC bombing and Uvalde incidents is cherry picked, simply because it is an easily coopted Cathexis that can be used to keep the public riled up about their pet cause and thereby distracted from other issues they want to hide. IOW, they focus on the harm done to children not because they truly care for children, but simply because it is an effective distraction that furthers their purposes in these cases.

The Advent of Christian Mysticism

About Christian Mysticism

As readers may know, I've only just discovered Christian Mysticism in the past couple years (from my pastor, Ed Hurst, and NovaSeeker), but I'm finding that it is a very important part of faith, perhaps even the central aspect of the faith experience.

It is also known as the "Noetic sense", "Holy Cynicism", or "Romantic Christianity". The main concept of this is that one is directly seeking peace with God and has no expectation of finding that peace through the philosophies, systems, and institutions of this world — including Aristotelian theological approaches and organized religious institutions with all of their problems. This approach to faith does not exclude Biblical teaching or Christian fellowship, but emphasizes these instead.

Unfortunately, there is just not a lot of information about Christian mysticism. To make matters worse, there is a diffuse fear surrounding the term as it has the connotation of being esoteric, and there is some degree of hesitancy in accepting it as an authentic form of Christian faith. For these reasons, Christian Mysticism is not taken seriously by Mainline Protestants, and is frowned upon in many circles.

To my knowledge, the Orthodox Church is the only Christian sect that has a well-developed liturgy about mysticism. NovaSeeker (who is Orthodox) and I have written a number of posts coming from the perspective of Christian Mysticism. I've also written posts about other forms of Mysticism (Eastern Mysticism and a series on Gnosticism) such to make a comparison. I've listed these posts below under Related. Ed Hurst (who comes from a Calvinist perspective) touches on mysticism rather frequently in his writings at Radix Fidem.

Interested readers who are unfamiliar with Christian Mysticism but who want to learn more may like to start out by reading Ed's posts that focus exclusively on Christian Mysticism. Then go on to read all Ed's posts in the Christian Mysticism category. Also, Ed has written a book about Christian mysticism which you can find here.

Mysticism is Displacing Ecclesiasticism

I want to bring readers' attention to a debate going on in the Sphere between Francis Berger, Bruce Charlton, Kristor, Alan Roebuck, J. M. Smith, and others participating in the comments sections, about the validity, value, place, and purpose of Christian Mysticism, and how this is affecting traditional ecclesiastical Christianity. I believe this debate is important because the current emergence of Christian Mysticism will become a significant movement in the history of Christianity. We are witnessing its conception right here.

Note 1: I expect this debate to continue for some time, so this list of links may be updated in the future.
Note 2: Some time stamps appear to be anachronistic, but are not. The anomaly is due to different time zones.
Note 3: Alan Roebuck asked me some pointed questions about Christian Mysticism here. It's difficult to give him a solid answer because his questions are premised on traditional Protestant soteriology.

Update (2022/8/1): In post 12, Kristor drew a hard line, and in post 13, Berger withdrew. Were looking at a schism!
Update (2022/8/4): We have not heard anything from The Orthosphere since 2022/8/1. It appears they've withdrawn from commenting on the subject, effectively killing the debate through silence.

Bad@ss Chad

Introduction

Bwana Simba requested me to write a post about the Bad@ss Chad / PUAs to add to the series on Faux-Masculine Archetypes, which was the theme for May, 2022. He said this is important because,

> "Chad is revered as a messianic figure nowadays."

Essentially, a Bad@ss Chad is an immature Alpha male who behaves like an egotistical loose cannon. A PUA is someone who attempts to mimic certain tell-tale qualities of a Bad@ss Chad, and can do so well enough to be convincing and effective. Also, it should be noted that the Blue Pilled Alpha is a sub-type of the Male Feminist and should not be confused with the Bad@ass Chad. So for the rest of this post, I'll describe the archetypical Alpha and the associated traits which PUA's imitate.

Natural Winners

The Alpha Male, more than any other male archetype, is naturally attuned to the conquering, dominating, and winning traits of masculinity. This is partly because of their appetite for competition and partly from a buoyant ego, but also due to their strong aversion to losing. As such, they will carefully avoid any situation in which they stand a good chance of losing to another Alpha and thereby lose face within their social circle.

This characteristic will be seen as an underlying and aggravating factor in the other traits described below.

Lack of Purpose

A man needs to have his own domain, including the following.

1. A purpose for living
2. A circle of loyal and trusted friends
3. His own business or otherwise gainful employment
4. A piece of property with a house
5. A wife and children.

A man that fails to achieve all these things will carry a sense of dissatisfaction, inadequacy, and possibly regret. The Alpha male is well aware of these needs, and he finds that all of these elements come quite easily and naturally, except the first – a purpose for living. This is because his ambitions to be number one coupled with his swollen ego displace any realization of a higher purpose that would extend beyond himself. He may find some small purposes, such as getting a promotion, getting laid, or winning a game, but all these come with short lived satisfactions. It is not uncommon for many clueless Alphas to burn through all their opportunities for the last four items in search of a deeper conviction for living.

Arrogant Hubristic Braggadocio

Fellow blogger Jim offered us this first-person glimpse into the mindset of an Alpha male.

> "My wife, after making me my morning coffee, "jokingly" threatened to charge me with r@pe, domestic violence, and all that. Just friendly joking. Ha ha. She observed that this would make her rich, which made it not very funny at all. I "jokingly" quoted the Old Testament, and "jokingly" pointed at the ocean. (Implying that if she called the cops on us she might go for a very long swim.) Ha ha. Just having fun. We laughed. I laughed for real, because when I pointed at the ocean, I passed her sh!t test, and she loved me for passing her sh!t test. Alpha male backed by the supreme alpha male. She points at alpha cop, I point at alpha God. She points at my assets, I point at the ocean.

> That is how you reach cooperate/cooperate equilibrium."

Most non-Alpha men would immediately label this kind of behavior as careless, heartless, unloving, or even cruel. But the interesting thing about this is that women are naturally drawn to men who exhibit this kind of gamesmanship. It incites the damp holey Tingles. It makes them feel loved and secure. However, when men see women respond positively to this kind of @ssholery (absent any Blue Pilled notions), they will view her as an ungrateful fat mouthed drama queen who talks all kinds of arrogant sh!t that she doesn't really mean. Consequently, men lose all respect for this kind of woman and are less inclined to love and value her, and this includes Alpha males. The Alpha is all too familiar with women behaving this way, and therefore carry few(er) delusions about the nature of women. More on this later.

Inner Incongruences

The stereotypical Alpha conveys a social presentation that is incongruent with his own inner self and personal experience. To illustrate how this illusion works, consider how Beta males enviously imagine they will be happiest if they have the confidence and charisma of an Alpha male, complete with the associated athleticism, popularity, a bit of cash, and a rotating series of apparently sterile girlfriends.

However, the Alpha male does not see himself as being so lucky. He is bored with his Beta male friends and finds a bit of ego satisfaction in taking them to task over perceived shortcomings, challenging them, or even ridiculing them. In response, the Beta males cower and stand in awe of the Alpha's perceived excellence, but can rarely match up to the Alpha's expectations. In all of this, the Beta feels humbled and thankful to have an Alpha friend, but to the Alpha, this interaction gets really old, burdensome, and annoying after a while.

Similarly, women are stumbling over themselves and cat scratching each other's eyes out to get their hands and labs on him, and none of them can deliver anything of much value to the Chad other than a good BJ or a fast ride. So at the first sign of female solipsism or sh!t tests, she is out and he's on to the next one. It's just too easy for him to do so.

Then the prior girlfriend comes back and he has to deal with all the hellish fury of a scorned woman, thus confirming his assumption that she was rather worthless to begin with. Even the best quality women cannot give the Alpha what he wants – a smoking hot but loyal companion and helper who sees the world as he does, but yet is loving enough to tolerate all his careless indiscretions and is humble enough to submit to his cruel games and whims for little more than his entertainment. Most women who are of the caliber that the Alpha male desires will not stand for this for very long.

As Rollo once said…

> "Women are utterly incapable of loving a man in the way that a man expects to be loved."
> Iron Rule of Tomassi #6, in The Rational Male: Women in Love (2011-12-27)

The Alpha continually struggles against these differences between his desire for "winning", the reality on the ground, the problems thereof, and the meaninglessness of it all.

This brings us to the next characteristic.

Alphas See the Worst in Women

The Feminine Imperative dictates that women should have unlimited access to loving, supportive, beta husbands/fathers AND unlimited access to hot, strong, dominant monkey sex with ripped Alpha males. Both at the same time, not both in the same man.

Therefore, women, as we know, divide men into groups sexually — the alphas who they desperately want to get banged by, and the betas who they may want to have for emotional and material support. But they don't want emotional support from the Alphas nor sexual aggression from the betas! They want each from each, according to his "type" in her mind.

And "All women are like that" (AWALT). This knowledge of women's fickle weakness is made more obvious through the AMOG effect. Every time a man is mingling in a group of people, all the women present are maneuvering, posturing, and testing in order to know who is the Alpha Male of the group (AMOG). It is essential to female nature to identify the AMOG and capitalize on any potential opportunity with him.

The Alpha observes this skittish disloyalty first hand, and often bears the brunt of it when he is passed over by a woman or is cucked by a more dominant Alpha. And because of the female preference for serial monogamy, it is sure to happen eventually. As the saying goes, "She's not really yours, it's just your turn."

Also, the inherent immaturity of the Bad@ass Chad tends to accelerate this dynamic of branch swinging disloyalty.

And this dynamic is inherently self-perpetuating. You see, whenever a woman expresses disloyalty, refuses to run interference, or displays any hesitancy to readily cooperate with him at any time, the Alpha (rather accurately) recognizes her as unreliable, as a bad investment, and he is therefore disinclined to invest in her (and her/their children).

The Alpha, being the prime recipient of female attention, sees all this first-hand and takes note.

Dominance is Prioritized Over All

Success in this endeavor essentially comes down to the performance of the individual man, and whether he can make himself appear “alpha enough” in her eyes. This distills into one of three outcomes.

1. Female Pedestalization
2. Celibacy or MGTOW
3. Pump and Dump

After this socio-sexual competitive dynamic happens a few times, the Alpha learns that he can keep the upper hand in the relationship (and therefore stay true to his value of “winning”) if he dumps her before she can dump him. Thus, it becomes clear to the Alpha that the pump and dump is the best way to handle things. (Mid-tier men succumb to pedestalization, and lower-tier men go Incel or MGTOW.)

To aggravate matters even further, nature itself, or evolution if you will, has shaped men to play the field, such that men can procreate with more women and do not waste time looking after a chick that becomes pregnant – especially when the paternity of the child is in question. God and nature has created Men to strongly desire a claim of ownership over a woman (such as confirmed paternity, marriage, monogamy, virgin sex, etc.). Conscience and Evolution has planted the knowledge in men that investing in a woman you do not “own” (e.g. adultery, beta orbiter, Sugar Baby, etc.) is an intrinsically bad investment. Men who do this place themselves at a disadvantage.

Alpha males, being the natural champions that they are, are innately aware of good risk vs. bad risk more than any of the other male archetypes, and prioritize extricating themselves from any situation that appears to be a losing gamble. Unfortunately, the way this usually works out wreaks havoc in his own life and the lives of those around him, men and women alike.

Conclusions

The longitudinal effect that Bad@ss Chad's have on other men is to inspire them with hope and confidence for a time, and then crush them with criticism and ridicule. When the Beta underlings discover that they cannot access opportunities for achievement, social popularity, sex, etc. like the Alpha, no matter how hard they try, this is a disappointment in itself. But then he must face a vicious cycle of rejection from both Alpha males and women. This intense belittlement destroys the Beta male's confidence and faith, and creates a very self-destructive situation. In the face of this utter humiliation, the less-than-Alpha male comes to the conclusion that everything is futile and existence is meaningless… for him. The ugly behaviors of addiction, and violence, and a very deep resentment become the norm, and it can be almost impossible to treat. (In future posts, I'll refer to this dynamic as "Jason's Axiom".)

The long and short of the Bad@ss Chad's interaction with women is that he is a mass production s1ut making Alpha Widower which culminates in cynicism, hard-heartedness, and a deep sense of loneliness — in himself and all the women he spoils. The fall-out of this sexual defilement leads to the weakening and/or destroying all subsequent relationships that the woman enters into, including and especially the sanctity of marriage. Children are affected in turn.

The ultimate challenge of maturity to the Alpha male is to see himself as a blessing and inspiration to others, to act accordingly, and learn to be less of a Bad@ss Chad and more considerate and loving to those who gravitate towards his charismatic persona. But for many Alphas, this self-awareness and sense of compassion doesn't come until much later in life, if at all. It grinds their ego and self-esteem too much.

Introduction

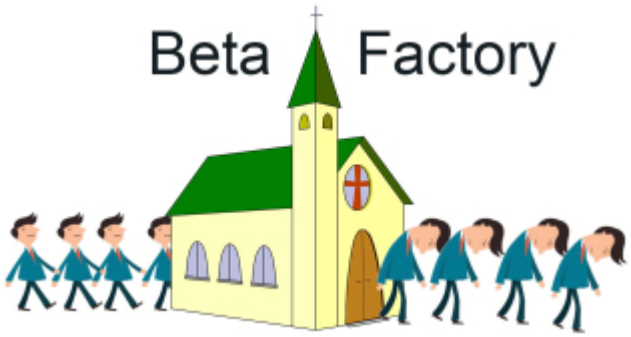
In recent years it has been observed that the modern church is a de facto Beta factory. The most obvious reason for this, to most who frequent here, is the feminization of the church and the relegation of male authority to observer status. It bears repeating that this repels men with any sense of masculine identity while retaining passive Beta and Delta types. This is also one of the main reasons why the modern churchian franchise is so devoid of male leadership.

Another outstanding reason for the demise of Christian masculinity is the deluge of poor teaching which neglects explaining the contextual application to the audiences, and the outright false teaching that reached its critical momentum of popularity in the 1980s and has continued to the present day, thereby displacing a solid understanding of Scripture for more than a generation.

Worst of all are the odd, cartoonish, and effete notions of masculinity that have crept into the church and have somehow earned popular approval through romantically charming, subtly inverted interpretations of scripture. The task of uncovering all these false notions, which are precisely Gnostic in nature, has been a regular topic of discussion within the Christian Manosphere.

Part of all this confusion arises from the fact that there are many Christian teachings which apparently have the effect of domesticating men. This post examines one such idea that is central to Christian doctrine which I believe is largely responsible for this phenomenon. It concerns the Biblical idea of "dying to self".

Written for the benefit of other men who have struggled with the same issue, this post recounts my personal experience dealing with a false conceptualization of this idea, how this held me back in both my spiritual growth and my personal development, and what I have learned from this experience.



A Damningly False Assessment of the Self

In Christian circles, we often hear about how "pride goes before a fall" (Proverbs 16:18), and egotism leads one astray. I've heard this time and again in all my years of church attendance. However, there was never any distinction made that it is the Bad@ss Chads who need to rein in their ego, whereas less confident men should develop their ego. I never apprehended this contextual nuance, even after reading the entire Bible as a youth. So I naturally came to the comprehensive conclusion that another oft repeated phrase, "dying to self" (Romans 6:11; Philippians 1:21) refers to getting rid of pride, and killing the ego. IOW, don't be a Chad!

And that is exactly what I did. Because I believed that the ego was part of the "old self" that needed to die (Ephesians 4:21-24), I killed my ego as a general habit until I had no ego at all. Likewise, I sacrificed all desire until I didn't even know what I desired (Romans 13:13-14). I made altruism my main focus in dealing with others (Matthew 7:12; Luke 6:31; 1 John 3:17-18). I was always introspective and non-judgmental to others, suspecting that I might have bad motivations (Matthew 7:3-5, Luke 6:37-42). I gave no consideration to what others thought of me (Matthew 6:1-34, Galatians 1:10), and simply followed my conscience.

While all this seems rather pious and holy on the surface, later in life I would learn that this approach is essentially a subtle denial of my sinful nature, as in denying that I have one, or that I can manage it myself; not in the more correct sense of denying it from having an omnipotent rule over my life. This is another crucial distinction that I missed somehow.

The byproduct/effect of this approach is that I became crippled by self-consciousness and unaware of my own nature. It also killed all my joy and discernment. It prevented authentic social connections, to the point that others couldn't understand me. They just saw that I had no ego, and they concluded that I was a bad guy. This was really frustrating to me because people often assumed that I was bad — even people I had gone to church with for years — not because I had done anything wrong, but just because I was cynical, distrustful, ego-less, and brashly inconsiderate when confronted with anything that violated my conscience. While in college, I asked my pastor about this, and he told me that it's because "no one knows who you are." He gave me a book about Meyers-Briggs personality types and told me to read it so that I could better relate to others. This did help me greatly, but it didn't get to the core of my problem.

A Life Changing Epiphany

I carried these impressions for most all my life, and I never came across any evidence that suggested that my doctrinal application was amiss. But after having a talk with my current pastor (at the ripe old age of 48), I gathered that something about my earlier impressions were not quite right.

The reason I went to my pastor was because I was having marital difficulties. My wife was being intransigent, stubborn, and vindictive. My pastor insisted that my problem must be that I was proud, but this didn't make sense to me. I'd spent most of my life eschewing pride, as I said above, and besides that, I am too much of a loner to be proud.

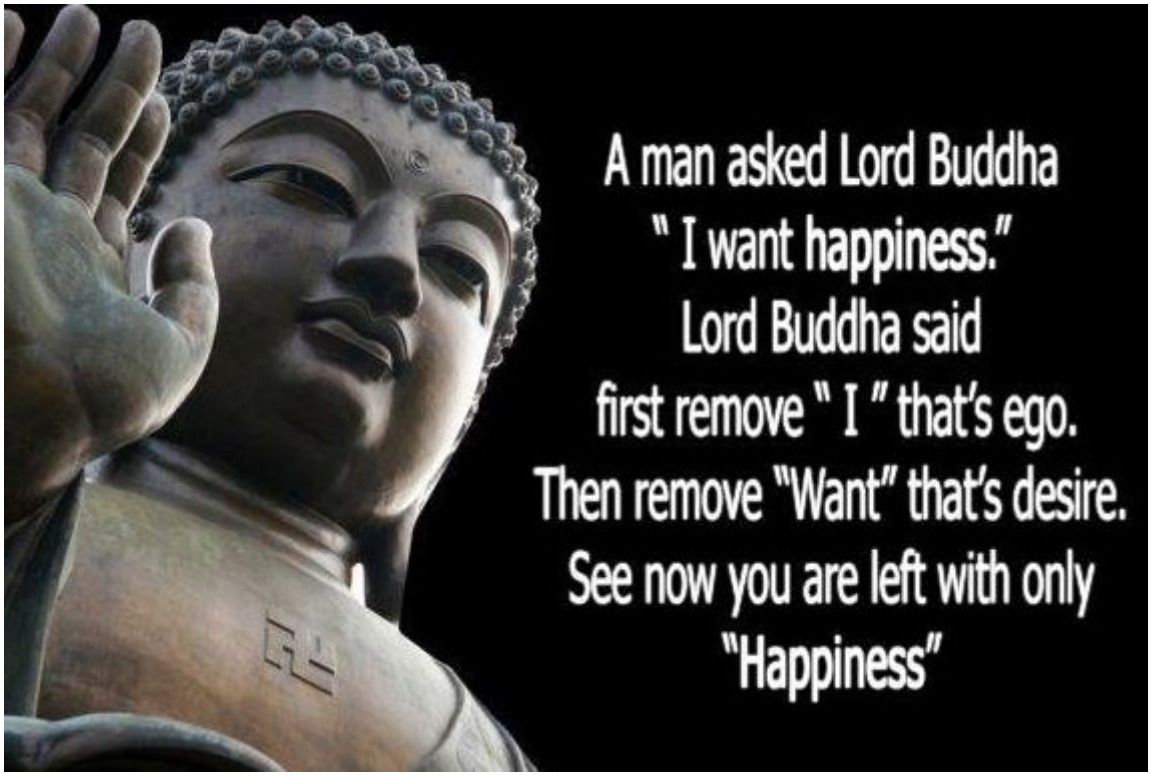
Through further talks with my pastor, and after contemplating this for a while, I realized that my personal issue was not one of pride per se, but rather a general inability to trust due to some childhood experiences. But interestingly enough, being proud and being unable to trust have many of the same effects in one's spiritual life, and they also share many of the same outward manifestations which are noticed by others (e.g. being hesitant or unwilling to engage with others, being suspicious of other's motivations, general cynicism, having difficulty in feeling and expressing thankfulness, poor discernment, unable to maintain a consistent posture of humility, and so on). To make matters more confusing to everyone, I looked more like a Chad, and I carried myself more like a Chad, than not. But I didn't have the flambuoyant ambitions of a Chad.

My pastor told me the approach I took of killing my ego and my desire is just like what Buddhists do. He said I was Buddhist but I didn't know it! I find it bizarre that I got these impressions from reading the Bible and attending church.



Working Out Salvation

Eventually, I realized that in another deeper sense, my pastor was right about my issue with pride. But it was not the pride I had always been warned about. It was a deeper, pharisaical kind of pride that motivated me to avoid the egotistical type of pride typical of Chads. It became clear to me that I went down this path because I did not trust myself and I was suspicious of others' influence on my spiritual life, but I was too young to understand this about myself at the time. Only after attaining the experience of middle-age and then talking with my pastor did I realize that I was distrustful and that this stance of distrust is a reflection of a distrust in God. Only then did it occur to me that my approach of abrogating the ego is not the right way to kill the old self.

Supplementary knowledge (which appeared to be a Divine confirmation) to this insight from my pastor came through Ed Hurst. I was reading Radix Fidem daily at that time, and Ed had several posts that explained the importance of having a strong, healthy, well adjusted ego, and how this is important for one's faith. [As a representative example, go read Ed's post, The Blessing of Ego (2013-8-31).] Ed bluntly pointed out that "The current popular notion that ego is somehow evil is a feminist lie."

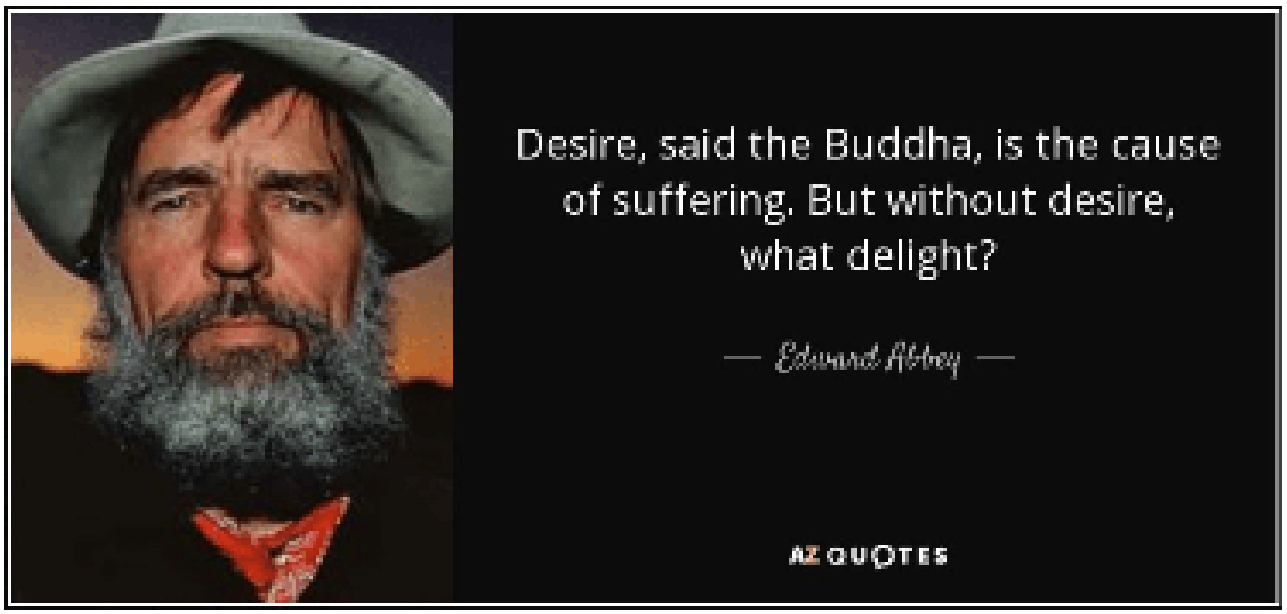
It took me a while to take this in and readjust my self-concept and my world view. The epiphany that made this all click for me was through observing how people who have a poor or maladjusted ego are typically somewhat sociopathic. This also explained why many people jumped to the conclusion that I was a bad guy all throughout my life, even though I was rather straight laced, a regular church-goer, well-practiced in prayer, and well-read in the Bible. They were using my ego as an indicator of my character.

After talking with my pastor and realizing that the ego is an important part of my psyche and not evil, there was one day, in the space of a moment, I found that I suddenly had an ego that seemingly appeared out of nowhere! When I told this to my pastor, he remarked that it had been there all along, but I had repressed it from my conscious awareness. He was glad that I became aware of it, saying that I can now make progress in becoming more spiritually healthy.

Since then, my discernment has slowly been growing. But I can tell you, Buddha was wrong in saying that having no ego leads to happiness. Still to this day, my joy and contentment are still lacking, and I find that dealing with the ego, desire, discernment, trust, etc. to be more trouble than what I feel it is worth. For me, perhaps this is a form of redemptive suffering — learning to embrace those things which I had rejected for so long.



Reassessing Reality

After becoming more acquainted with this truth, I discovered that the ego is the junction between the heart, the mind, and reality. True growth and social adjustment cannot occur unless this junction is healthy and active. A broken ego constitutes a broken man.

Furthermore, I found that it is impossible for a man not to have any ego — to not desire anything for one's self, to not pursue joy and pleasure, to not think of one's self as being good in the basic sense of being made alive and in the image of God; or IOW, "It's Good to be a Man", as Michael Foster likes to say. If a man continually dwells on the truth that he is inherently bad and morally corrupt, as Christian doctrine states, it can be revealing and perhaps deeply motivating to some men (i.e. Chads), but it severely discourages the confidence and self-image of others (e.g. non-Alphas).

Non-Alpha males need to realize that God made us with those desires — to think of ourselves as being good and to think of other people being good, even though we/they are not (in God's eyes), and to want to have a good reputation in the eyes of our peers, even though it is all vanity. Alpha males have a firm grip on this truth of self-esteem, but other men, not so much.

In this case, we could do with recognizing the difference between Coram Mundo and Coram Deo. Yes, in the eyes of God, all are sinful and have fallen short. But in all our day-to-day interactions with others, the strength and stability of a man's ego is a rough indicator of his constitution and a pretty good predictor of how solid and reliable he is. I now see this to be a practical truth that has been carelessly obscured by churchianized interpretations of Proverbs 16:18 that neglect the context.

Chads, on the other hand, need to learn that it is our old man (the sinful nature, our old dying self) that tries to overemphasize desire and the demands of the ego. For Chads to be spiritually healthy, they need to keep those desires balanced with a discerning sense of his God ordained purpose in life, and an acute consideration of others' desires and needs.

> Let each of you not only look out for your own interests, but also for the interests of others.
> Philippians 2:4 (NKJV)

This awareness of the intrinsic motivations of others can be extremely revealing for Chads and non-Chad alike, as it serves to give one a sense of self. In fact, the concomitant conflict and suffering is the main source of feedback for refining our applied wisdom, but only if you perceive this through the viewpoint of discernment, as opposed to one's obedience or holiness, which is legalism. Discernment is key.

Conclusions

In respect to the recent debate over Christian Mysticism, it is clear that attending church, praying, and reading the Bible were all insufficient to shake me out of my false notions surrounding the purpose, place, and value of the ego. In fact, church and Bible reading were the primary source of these misunderstandings, and clinging to these only served to perpetuate my error. Coming to a proper understanding of my self and getting free from these lies required me adopt a mystical approach when engaging in the discussions with my pastor and Ed Hurst through email.

Every man is strong in one area and weak in something else, and this is what makes them immature. The Biblical language for this is "that which is lacking", as St. Paul put it in Colossians 1:24, and "incomplete", going on James 1:4. The Biblically prescribed remedy for being “incomplete” is patience, suffering, and fellowship. Suffering is a natural part of being incomplete, but the things which cause us suffering are a clue that points to that which is lacking. Fellowship is necessary because we learn the things we are lacking from other men who are strong in that suit. Patience is required to willingly engage with other men and build up that which is lacking in each other.

My suggestion to pastors, elders, mentors, and brothers is to identify what is lacking in each man under their care, make this evident to him, and devise a plan of action for developing that part of his persona. Bad@ss Chads would need to take their ego down a notch, but I would guess that the grand majority of men in your churches, especially men broken by the the dog-eat-dog SMP and the Feminized Beta Factory that we call churchianity, would strongly benefit from having an integrated ego and a stronger sense of purpose. These men need encouragement to develop a healthy, well-adjusted ego. Again, the ego is important because it activates, integrates, and functionalizes the soul of a man.

I would be interested to know if any readers are familiar with any Orthodox teachings on either of these two subjects, “dying to self” or “knowing one’s self”.

Sexual Authority and Sanctification

What does it mean to "yield authority over one's body to one's spouse"?

Sexual Authority in Marriage

There has been an intermittently ongoing debate about the interpretation of 1 Corintians 7:3-5.

> [3] Let the husband render to his wife the affection due her, and likewise also the wife to her husband. [4] The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does. And likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does. [5] Do not deprive one another except with consent for a time, that you may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again so that Satan does not tempt you because of your lack of self-control.
> 1 Corinthians 7:3-5 (NKJV)

In the original Greek, the verb, ἐξουσιάζω (exousiazó) translated as "authority" means to actively exercise control over, or to master the object. The words, "over the body" (τοῦ σώματος), means to be master of the body, i.e. to have full and entire authority over the body, to hold the body subject to one's will.

If I were to put this into profanely crass, but easily relatable language, it would be, "I know how to make you come, and if I want to make you come, then as sure as I've got a boner, you're gonna come as hard and as long as I please! (And you're gonna shiver and quiver and be grateful for it!)"

I will go a step further to state that it should be the goal of every married person to master their mate's body in this way. Doing so would require mutual humility and trust.

Controversy over Sexual Authority

Doug Wilson has been taken to the carpet over his interpretation of this passage, specifically about his art of walking a fine line between culture and scripture. A couple Manospherians have done the work of sorting through his stance in the following posts.

- Full Metal Patriarchy: Wilson's Quadruple-Speak: To Doug Wilson's Defenders (2021-10-4)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Sexual authority is only for sex and not against sex (2021-10-5)

Deep Strength's commentary on the passage in question is thus.

> "The intent of the passage starts in verse 3 where each spouse to fulfill their marital duty to the other. Thus, verse 4 speaks that each spouse should rightfully give their spouse sex when they desire it. Verse 5 continues along this theme of not depriving each other except for a special situation where both agree to it for spiritual purposes."

Obviously, this passage of scripture is most pertinent to those couples in which one is raging with desire for a spouse who is not so interested in the cuddly nuptials, and of course, it is the cold-blooded, hard-hearted spouse who would think of it as a dry duty. So DS (and presumably St. Paul as well) is addressing this person specifically. It is appropriate, because this is an all-too-common situation these days, unfortunately.

In response to Wilson's stance, Deep Strength goes on to write,

> "It's an absolutely contradictory reading of the passage to suggest that husbandly authority over the wife's body and the wifely authority over the husband's body means that she should have sex with [her husband] but her authority over [his] body means she can stop [him] from that."

I fully agree on this point, but Wilson, FMP, and DS are barking up the wrong tree. I'll explain why in the second point below.

The crux of this debate lies in the differences between (1) what IS, (2) what one Should Do, and (3) the way it Ought to Be. I'll go into each of these viewpoints and let the readers hash out the details in the comments.

1. What IS

Regular readers are familiar with how husbands and wives sexually defraud each other, and that wives defraud husbands with much greater frequency. I know many readers struggle with this reality, including myself at times. It is what it is.

There's a big difference between structures of authority in theory, and implementing that authority in practice. Sure, we could say that sexual authority over one's spouse is a "right" or an "entitlement" that married couples should have, just because 1 Corinthians 7:3-5 says so, and that would be correct. But saying the words "I do" is not a magic cure-all that automatically establishes one's sexual authority in marriage just because the Bible says that's how it should be.

The simple fact is that reality does not match theory, because of humans' fallen nature.

- In reality, individuals yield to the sexual authority of those whom they're not married to (e.g. adultery, fornication, etc.) and thereby defile themselves within the context of marriage.
- In reality, married people neglect their sexual authority (e.g. wives cutting their hair, gaining weight, "letting themselves go", etc.).
- In reality, married people abuse their sexual authority (e.g. sexual obfuscation, transactional sex, withholding sex, etc.).
- In reality, most wives will do everything in their power to undermine their husband's authority.

These are all examples of disobedience and sin, which work against the proper structure of authority outlined in the Bible.

This unavoidable fact of reality is why I wouldn't say that sexual authority is an "entitlement" of marriage, and calling it a "right" misses the point because this view is self-centered and does not recognize that one purpose of marriage is to glorify God.

Before and after marriage, couples are faced with the task of making the theory, the Biblically ordained structure of authority, including sexual authority, into a reality. This is what Philippians 2:12 means, to "…work out your own salvation…". The believer has to work through these challenges in order to consolidate his domain — a domain that God intends for us to have if we are faithful and obedient.

Furthermore, God calls us to be obedient, not only out of will or mere mental assent, but also from the heart (Luke 10:27). To me, that means our obedience to the structure of authority in marriage should be visceral.

2. What One Should Do

This is the viewpoint that has received the most airplay by Wilson, his detractors, Full Metal Patriarchy, and Christianity and Masculinity in the posts cited above.

The main point is that one should have sex with one's spouse whenever he/she desires it, and should not reject the spouse's advances. The corollary is that one should not leave their spouse disappointed in this area, as this would create a breeding ground for bitterness and resentment at best and adultery at worst. This is the most obvious interpretation of the scripture, and of course it is the right thing to do. However, this poses a significant problem to wives lacking agency, as this would require a willful volition to engage in sexual congress whether or not one is "in the mood".

Wilson's detractors (who are mostly complementarians and churched up feminists) are quick to jump on the "willful volition" aspect of this approach, and insist that they cannot be forced to act against their will. To humor this argument for a moment, I'll agree that it is generally a bad idea to force someone to do something against their will, as this tends to kill the soul of a person. But what Wilson's detractors cannot seem to fathom is that willing submission to God's directives brings grace and love which have the effect of softening a person's heart and bringing them into line with God's will.

So it would seem that these detractors (who are arguing against the scriptures) are one or more of the following.

- They're too proud to concede the argument and do more to please their honey hungry husbands.
- They're too lazy to do the hard work of implementing their willpower.
- They're stubbornly resisting God's grace in their marriage.
- They're afraid to trust God with their marriage.
- They're unwilling to give God a chance.
- Some combination of the above.

But no matter what their motivations might be, the detractors' arguments successfully sidestep the topic and crash the debate into a piddly quarrel over structures of authority, and just as we can expect, how that authority reviles gender equahluty and is therefore morally wrong (viz. "misogyny" and "r@pe" according to the Feminist religion).

This concept of sexual authority is based on a military command style of authority in which the wife is considered an equal in command. Of note, a military command style of authority appears prominently in Power vs. Fear ethical systems, and women gravitate towards Power vs. Fear systems.

Furthermore, there is always an underlying assumption that horny husbands are gnawing at the bit to find some way to force their wives to have sex with them against their will. Only the most astute observers will recognize this subtle twist, which is a form of projection. Now, I don't believe the vast majority of husbands are like this, but are rather wishing and waiting for the flames of feminine passion they received at the beginning of the marriage to reignite somehow. But on the other hand, I suspect that if some husbands were a Chad more dominant, then this would allow them to pass through some of the wives' Alpha filters, enough to get the bed creaking.

Anyway, if we don't recognize this derailment then we've lost the Frame war.

3. The way it Ought to Be

This is the viewpoint that has been completely absent in the previous discussions.

The idea here is a situation in which the husband and wife are so consumed with desire for one another that they can't control their sexual urges for each other. They are literally going together at every opportunity, and making opportunity when there is none. Knocking socks on the regular is absolutely necessary for marital sanctification, as this is the essential constitution of a marriage. Sexual attraction and desirability is an important part of this, but not always necessary, especially as the couple grows older.

You probably won't hear this truth anywhere else, but it is impossible to discuss sanctification without also discussing sex and the stewardship of sexuality. I say this on the basis of the following scripture passage.

> [3] For this is the will of God, your sanctification: that you should abstain from sexual immorality; [4] that each of you should know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honor, [5] not in passion of lust, like the

> Gentiles who do not know God; [6] that no one should take advantage of and defraud his brother in this matter, because the Lord is the avenger of all such, as we also forewarned you and testified. [7] For God did not call us to uncleanness, but in holiness. [8] Therefore he who rejects this does not reject man, but God, who has also given us His Holy Spirit.
> 1 Thessalonians 4:3-8 (NKJV)

Sanctification, for many married people, requires that spouses have the right to the "ownership" of each other's bodies, and this naturally includes sexual and reproductive access and the ecstatic joys thereof. How one dresses and being sexually desirable to each other in general is part of that. Verse 4 says, "each of you should know how to possess his own vessel in sanctification and honor". Attraction can be nurtured and developed or else it can be abused through sin or by failing to nurture it. It is the Christian married person's right and responsibility to control all this. Again, see verse 4, and verse 6 says, "no one should take advantage of and defraud his brother in this matter". Failing to make yourself as comely to your spouse as you can may be taken by the spouse as a form of marital fraud. I'll appeal to the married reader's interests as proof.

If the reader will review 1 Corinthians 7:3-5 and the definitions offered in the beginning of this post, then it is apparent that St. Paul is illustrating this ideal state of marriage, and he's also saying that couples shouldn't try to resist or undermine this ideal interaction but should instead try to create and sustain it as much as possible.

In the past, I have attempted to describe this concept in terms of "sexual authority", but this has not gained much traction among readers. I'll briefly recount this argument.

True authority is defined by the power that one has over others. This power does not necessarily lie in making one do as another says, as by force of will, but rather, it is a power that lies in the spirit of the person (e.g. charisma), such that one naturally gravitates to one's Frame, and wants to comply. Thus, sexual authority is the visceral power one has over others to be desired in a sexual manner. As such, sexual authority corresponds roughly to the SMV scale, but it is amplified in marriage (e.g. wife goggles).

Charismatic Chads have abundant sexual authority, even over women they're not married to. The proof is in the prodigious püssy, even though this is a sinful abuse of said authority. Whereas, a husband who won't work, won't lift, and resorts to p0rn, and a wife who is crass, disrespectful, and lets herself go, are losing/abusing their sexual authority over their spouse in the marriage. Again, I'll leave it to the married reader to relate to this sentiment.

Closing Statements

The fulfillment of sexual authority that a husband or wife has over their spouse is an ideal for the married person to strive after. Done well, this should usher in sanctification and God's glory in the marriage. To some, it will come naturally. To most, they will have to make a diligent effort to be obedient to God in order to attain a state of sanctification. Too many will neglect this marital duty altogether, and reap the bitter consequences thereof.

Prince Asbel (at Full Metal Patriarchy) had a conniption when I suggested these ideas (described in Part 3 above) in a discussion at Christianity and Masculinity, saying that this would require one to be sexually desirable to one's spouse in order to be obedient to God, and that sexual desirability can be lost, thereby rendering one unable to be obedient to God. I disagreed because this is a bad interpretation of my stance. It is bad take because he is assuming that sexual attraction is the central aspect of the relationship and essentially juxtaposes what Ought to Be as a legalistic requirement for what IS, instead of an ideal to shoot for. I invited him to debate the topic, but he declined. In spite of his hard pass, I've offered my arguments above, and his response is still welcomed.

It's too easy to blame everything on Feminism

Is the church feminized as a result of the Silence of Adam? Or was Adam silenced by Feminism first?

Introduction

A couple years ago, Deep Strength gave us an entertaining look at the double standards for bedroom performance that are usually imposed on married Christian men and women.

Christianity and Masculinity: Double standards around sex: the purest example of the feminization of Christianity (2020-6-9)

The double standard referred to here is that the same command to both husbands and wives to have sex with each other (given in 1 Corinthians 7:3-5) receives two drastically different responses from "Christian" men and women. Hence, we often hear phrases like "evil patriarchy" and "oppressive/toxic masculinity" from women whenever this command is brought up, and we hear practically nothing from men.

Although DS did not explain how in the text of this post, the title itself states that the double standards between sexes (among other differences) are a manifestation of the feminization of Christianity.

Although I believe this to be true, I wasn't content with this assumption, and I decided that this manifestation of Feminism within the church needed to be further examined. So in response, I wrote a post Explaining the Double Standards around Sex (2020-06-10), and I reposted it on Reddit/RPChristians under the same title.

In this post, I argued that the double standard is not purely a result of the feminization of Christianity, but is instead a result of the differing viewpoints of men and women and how outspoken they are. It follows that…

1. There is a selection bias based on the inherent differences between the sexes.
2. The church prioritizes women's arguments as the predominating view, and men have no resolve to counteract these arguments.

I'll add a third reason here — the whole idea of a double standard is an assessment based on "fairness" AKA "equaluhty", which buys into the societal-wide liberal consciousness. People who live in fear of the culture of Progressivism have a tendency to shy away from anything that doesn't favor females in a vain effort to make them the same as men, and we see a whitewashed version of this within the church.

As a comparison, we have standards for pastors, standards for teachers, and standards for supervisors, but we don't necessarily hold pastors, teachers, and supervisors to the exact same standards, even though their roles are more similar than those of husband and wife. The reason that Liberals don't attack and deconstruct these roles is because this doesn't further their goal of erasing the distinctions between men and women and undermining the family, which also happens to be one of the primary goals of Satan.

Instead, the right way to think of this is that there are standards for women, and there are standards for men. This is not a new idea, nor should it be sensational.

Anyway, the main point of my post was to elucidate how men and women respond differently to criticism, and that the prevailing viewpoint matches that of disobedient women rather than obedient men. This is neither good nor right.

Precision Control
Here's a case in point.

Case Study – Denying Sex to One's Spouse

Under Deep Strength's post Sexual authority is only for sex and not against sex (2021-10-5), Jonadab-the-Rechabite wrote,

> "There is confusion due to a lack of consensus on the meaning of "force". It plays into the feminist's frame of "abuse", "doormat", and victimhood. Is persuade, compel, or insistence force? Is it the evil patriarchy at work when a refusal to acknowledge the withdrawal of consent as anything but covenant breaking sin? Why does the knee-jerk reaction bring up rape and not defrauding?"

This confusion is a direct result of admitting rebellious wimminz arguments. The words "abuse", "consent", “doormat”, “rape”, “victim”, etc. are all from discontented women’s attempt to gaslight everyone into believing that dominant men are brutish louts and that God’s ordained order is abusive, unfair, and evil. The words “defrauding” and “withholding” are from the suffering husband’s point of view.

Which of these two narratives is more truthful according to the Word of God?

In bizarro world, wives can defraud their husbands and husbands who point this out are called abusive. Women are encouraged to be outspoken and men are supposed to remain silent so that the true abusers (rebellious wives) can blame the true victims (sex starved husbands) for being abusers. An eisegesis of God’s Word is then moulded around this model. No one is permitted to point this out without being branded a misogynist. Women have all the power.

Jonadab’s question (in bold) gets to the core of the matter. As long as men allow this dynamic to continue, they will have a feminized church filled with confusion.

Facts Falling on Deaf Ears

Over at RPChristians, my post had a mixed reaction. It seemed that most of the moderators and commenters agreed with the post, but they didn’t know what to make of it because my reasoning and how it was phrased didn’t sit well with them. I didn’t understand what they didn’t agree with, so I asked DS about this in a private message.

DS told me the issue was my approach to the topic, which I would describe as part analytical, part praxeological, and part mystical. He said most people would say points 1 and 2 are due to the feminization of Christianity, so parsing them out into different things (and not explicitly saying it’s due to feminization) is generally specious to most RPChristian readers. So instead of recognizing my post as a nuts and bolts description of how a church becomes feminized, they read this as me saying that Christianity is not feminized, or attempting to justify why or how it is feminized.

DS explained, for instance, that women’s views only have a predominating expression in arguments if feminism has crept into Churches and leadership. Yes, but my question is, exactly how does this happen? Is it when the mysterious zephyr of feminism has crept into the church, or is it when good men stay silent and let rebellious women do all the talking?

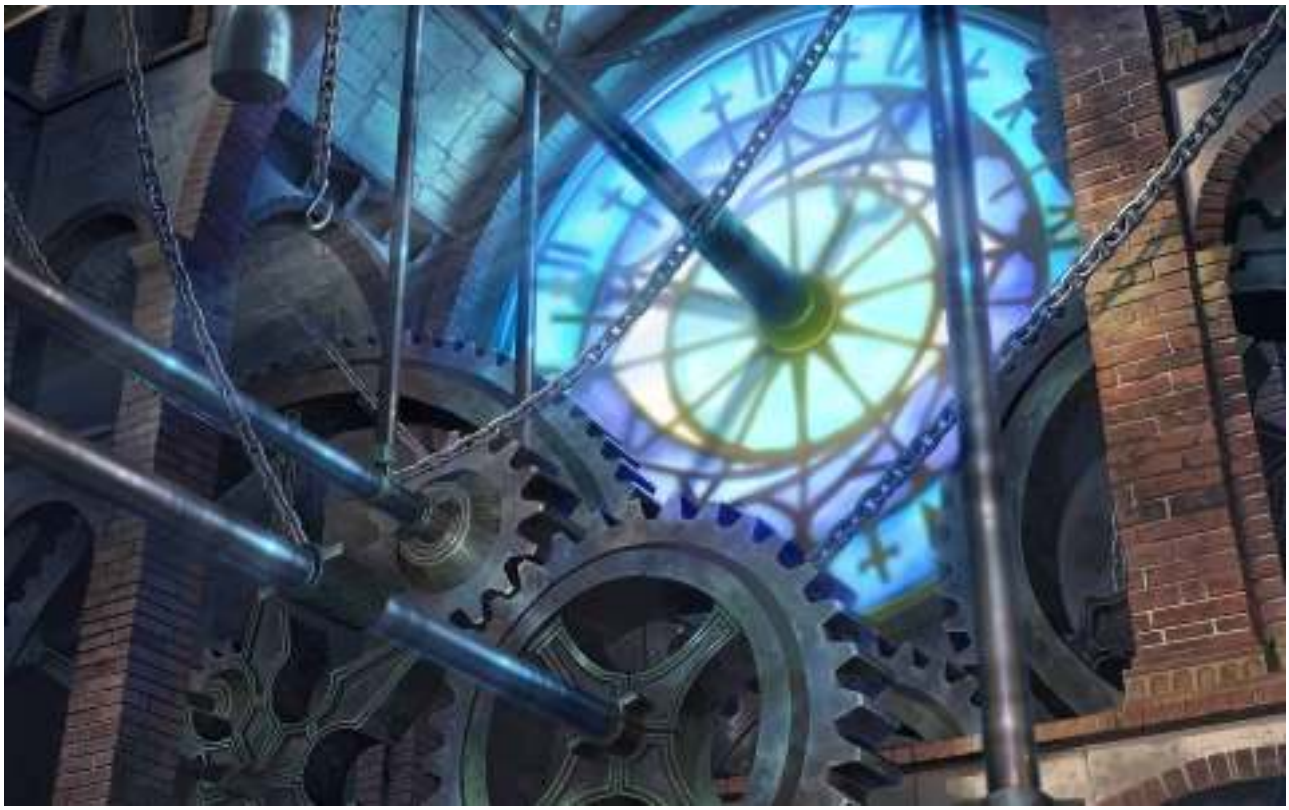
The good men at RPChristians stayed silent on this question. It's easier to blame everything on "Feminism".

So apparently, any cause and effect analysis of real observations, even one that conveys transferrable knowledge, is useless and unsatisfying unless it includes a pat condemnation of Feminism — an abstraction that is already assumed and has no transferrable knowledge.

I think the deeper reason why my approach was not received is because instead of taking the common Manospherian approach of catatonically blaming abstractions (i.e. Feminism, women, or churchianity), it put an onus on men to accept the situation as a challenge to stop tolerating the predominant fem-centric view, and to stop blaming the feminization of the church as a hopeless catharsis. That no one picked up on this gives me some concern for the men at RPChristians.



Conclusions

The Manosphere has long been in the habit of blaming every social ill on Feminism, and rightly so. Ten or so years ago, this was a prophetic revelation. But anymore, the Manosphere has formed a cathexis on Feminism which functions as a catharsis for the ills of Feminism. Feminism is now, and has been for quite some time, a pat answer to every woe. As such, it's easy for us to pin the blame on "Feminism" as an abstract malady in order for us to get a satisfying sense of denouement without delving into the details and identifying the specific methods of the madness that Feminism has created. The question and task for men is to figure out what to do with themselves within this social structure.

All that is required for evil to flourish is for good men to stand by and blame everything on "Feminism".

Conservatives have a similar approach when they identify a problem but do nothing to resolve it.

As for the assumption posed by DS which I addressed in my post, admitting women's arguments as the predominating view (i.e. an inversion of Headship) is the fundamental core of the feminization of Christianity. It's not the other way around, viz. the feminization of Christianity allows women's arguments to be the predominant norm, at least, not until the church has been entirely subsumed by Feminism. The interaction defines the structure. But apparently, the guys at RPChristians think that the structure defines the interaction.

Σ Frame Axiom 7 (Jack): The natural interaction defines the relationship structure according to which model it fits best, not what we think it is or hope for it to be.

I can see how it works both ways, but the thing I don't like about their viewpoint is that it is a dead end approach. Guys won't think that they can change their interactions with women as long as they regard Feminism as a monolithic power that holds immutable tyranny over their lives.

It's important for men to establish and maintain Headship by dealing with their wives (who are women in the church) directly, especially when a top-down approach for tamping down feminism in the church is not a feasible approach (and it isn't for men in most churches).

So instead of quarrelling about which came first, the chicken or the egg, eventually, we're going to have to stop ascribing such overwhelming power to Feminism in the abstract, and start picking apart the tacks and threads that hold it all together. In practice, we should start engaging in some brinkmanship with those who are limited by their need of a rhetorical catharsis and those who presume Feminism will continue to be the overriding norm to which all others have to bow.

A Vacuum of Understanding about Patriarchy

Image Source: TRT World: Orthodox leaders hold first council meeting in 1,200 years (2016-6-19)

Western men have been without real patriarchal authority for so long, that most people don't even know what it is or what it looks like.

But whatever it is, the NPC commoners are grandstanding that it's baaad, simply because MGM, trend setters, and culture shapers say so.

Regular readers already know the popular narrative's concept of "The Patriarchy" is a putridly biased caricature that hardly resembles the real thing. But the Manosphere's idealizations of Male Headship are also rather naïve and half baked.

In lieu of this vacuum of understanding, most people will buy into the Feminist concept of "The Patriarchy", which is limited to a set of things they dislike about men, male authority, and traditional gender roles. You see, Feminism is not a rebellion against patriarchy per se, but against authority (and ultimately against God). Feminists need to affix blame on a scapegoat to gain social traction, and they can't blame authority, because that would reveal their hand. So "The Patriarchy" has become the abstracted straw man.

To further our understanding of how Patriarchy works in practice, this post delves into five theoretical case studies and raises several questions surrounding Patriarchy that have been scantly addressed.

Case Study 1 – Tennant and Foster's Hypothetical Example of a Lawless Wife

One post in the series on Faux-Masculinity, The Responsible Figurehead / Sock Puppet (2022-5-4) reviewed trimmings of a newsletter from Bnonn Tennant and Michael Foster and described how Complementarians renounce their masculine authority by philosophically handcuffing their consciences to a broken system.

In this newsletter Tennant and Foster illustrated a hypothetical example of a naughty wife who breaks the law, and ratiocinated that if the husband interceded for his wife in this matter, then that would be "hyper-patriarchy", which was insinuated to be a bad thing. Their implied conclusion is that the husband shouldn't try to interfere in matters like this, and if he does, then this would be "toxic patriarchy".

They offered a counterargument to illustrate what Doug Wilson might call a "nicely balanced patriarchy", whereby stating that a wife who breaks the law must answer to the law for her crime, not to her husband, and that it is the responsibility of the law to hold her accountable, not her husband. "Nicely balanced" means that the sock puppet husband can still be a little bit lazy, and the headstrong wife can still be a little bit dominant, and they can still have an inverted codependent relationship while also having the psychological satisfaction of thinking that they have a Christian relationship. Tennant and Foster assumed that this is Biblical, or "theologically correct", or whatever, and that this is how things should work.

In Tennant and Foster's example, we aren't given the exact nature of the law the wife broke. One's initial thought is that the wife has committed a crime worthy of jail time, which muddies the waters of the point some, since while the husband does still have authority, she's going to be subject to incarceration to pay her debt.

But what if the example of the wife breaking the law was in the form of a simple traffic violation? Say she's caught speeding a few times, or better yet, violating "texting and driving" laws because those minivan selfies with all the car seats in the back elicit all sorts of "What a great mom!" comments that women love on social media. In such a case, now the civil penalty is monetary. Here the application of patriarchal authority is much clearer. It's up to her husband to reign in her behavior to prevent her from further violations. He gets to do this any way he sees fit without violating the guidelines God gives husbands in the bible.

Basically, Tennant and Foster have either not thought scripture well, which is bad enough, or have thought through scripture, know what it says, and are intentionally misguiding people, which is evil. Either way, they shouldn't be teaching on the topic of marriage.

In reality, Tennant and Foster don't know what patriarchy is any more than Feminists do, or most men for that matter.

Applying Biblical Patriarchy

Oscar asked,

> "What do you think is the theologically correct way to handle that?"

I think the theologically correct way to handle this is to simply state that, yes, this is how it is in the current day, but it's not necessarily Biblically based Patriarchy, as Tennant and Foster claim.

In contrast to Tennant and Foster's claims, when we consider the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy (based on Ephesians 5:22-33) in light of John 10:10-18 and Galatians 2:19-21, we reach the conclusion that a husband should intercede for his wife in such cases, just as Christ interceded for the believer's sins through His work at Calvary.

So how should this be done?

The NT recognizes the authority of governments (Romans 13:1), but Jesus said it is better to work out your problems with others so that you don't have to turn to those authorities (Matthew 5:24-26), which is a hat tip to how things were done in the OT. Again, this goes back to the authority of the husband, as the wife would not be in a position or a state of mind to successfully negotiate her own transgression.

Based on accounts in the OT, the patriarch of the offending party should meet with the patriarch of the offended party and hash out some way to handle the situation together, whether that be tribute, or an indemnity, or punishment, or whatever.

The Modern Application

In a modern context, this would mean the husband should handle the situation and work out the solution. But this has problems in the modern day application.

1. The modern nuclear family doesn't have this kind of social and financial power.
2. This assumes that the wife and family are more or less obedient to the husband's decisions.
3. It opens the door to a multitude of methods for enforcing punishment. A man could be punished for the transgressions of his wife.
4. This suggests that if the husband continues to fail to restrain his irresponsible wife, then the government should also punish him for his failure to do so.
5. All of the above implications would certainly be an incentive to men to execute their authority, but I'm not sure if it would be an incentive to women to submit — not as long as women are predominantly favored over men by the social and legal system.
6. It would be an incentive for ill willed wives to misbehave even more, just to enjoy the schadenfreud of seeing their husbands punished.

So you see, Tennant and Foster aren't the only ones who haven't thought through the Biblical foundations and the logical conclusions of their positions. Most men have no clue what they're asking for when they demand Patriarchal authority and responsibility.

Of course, Tennant and Foster won't say any of this, because not only would they offend wives by asking them to submit, they would also offend husbands by asking them to assume the authority necessary to clean up the wife's messes. Their ethics won't allow them to offend anyone's postmodern sensibilities. So instead, they're urging husbands to open the door to let the gynogroveling church and state do whatever they like (per Romans 13:1), and then mediate the mess with limited authority.

And, they're saying this is theologically correct Headship!

Case Study 2 – Being a Hapless Accomplice

Here's another thought experiment that might shed some more light in the discussion.

Suppose you just met a guy and you were hanging out. He seems kind of shifty, but he's got a lot of charisma and is rather likeable. You overlook this for the time being because you just met and you're still getting to know him. The second time you go to hang out with him, you're driving the car. You stop at a convenience store to grab some drinks. While you're in the convenience store, this guy pulls out a gun and robs the storeowner. You look on in shock and dismay. After the robbery, he tells you to drive. You look at him in disbelief, and he waves his gun at you. You feel like you have no choice but to be the get-away driver.

Later on, the law catches up to you. You tell them you didn't know he was going to rob the store, and that he forced you to be an unwitting accomplice, but all the evidence is stacked against you, including his testimony.

The typical Protestant's response is to assume God is working something great and mysterious in your life and pray for God's will to be done in this situation. If that means going to jail (taken to be an unjust form of "persecution"), then so be it.

How would a true patriarch handle this situation?

Case Study 3 – Being a Hapless Husband

Now, let's suppose a similar scenario happens, except the perpetrator is your wife who's been embezzling money from her employer ever since before you got married. (Let's assume you've been married for one year.)

Tennant and Foster's response is to turn your wife into the authorities, play dumb, and pray for the best.

How would a true patriarch handle it?

Case Study 4 – A true example of Patriarchy: Chinese Filial Piety

I am rather familiar with patriarchy in Chinese culture, also known as Filial Piety in the West. Most men are hardworking, successful, and respectable. The women are feminine, respectful, and content. Families are a source of security and financial stability. People know what's wrong and what's right. Society is well ordered. Social capital is high. Sure, there are some problems, but overall, it's quite nice. This is partly why the Chinese stay within small enclave communities in the West — because the outside culture is a gynocentric mess!

Case Study 5 — A true example of Patriarchy: The Godfather

Most readers are familiar with The Godfather. Although the Italian mob is certainly not Christian, it is a real life, working example of a patriarchal social structure.

Introduction

It's too easy to blame everything on Feminism (2022-8-10) observed how various voices in the Manosphere tend to blame "Feminism" as a catharsis, and thereby stop short of examining the deeper cause-and-effect dynamics. As an exemplary case study of this phenomenon, I referred to a post I wrote in response to one from Deep Strength, and how the good men at RPChristians reacted to this. (Click on the link above to read the full account.)

In making this observation, I seem to have overlooked a different cause-and-effect dynamic — the motives for blaming "Feminism" as a catharsis. This post will break this angle further apart.

Reasons for Blaming an Abstract Entity*

 The Abstract Entity specifically referred to in this discussion is Feminism, which is a synechdoche for another abstract entity — sin. But the same dynamics apply for placing blame on nearly any abstract entity.*

One way to assess a reactive situation is to recognize that there are (at least) three kinds of blame.

1. Name it, blame it, and shame it, to motivate others to change their behavior.
2. Catatonically affixing blame as a catharsis, but with no follow up action, which is akin to a complaint.
3. Affixing blame as a judgment on an identified cause, and then taking action to address the cause.

The observable difference between 2 and 3 is whether an action is identified as a potential remedy and acted upon.

There are several reasons why an action is not taken. Aside from subjective reasons like apathy, aversion, bitterness, cowardice, contempt, false faith, lack of confidence, laziness, solipsism, etc., these reasons include…

1. The causes are diffuse, legion, and/or profound, and therefore a clearly remediating course of action cannot be readily identified.
2. The causes are evident, yet there is still no perceived action that can be taken.
3. Taking action requires a concerted effort by the larger group, in which case the action requires a director, leader, or pastor.
4. The responsibility for taking action rests on others, i.e. the leaders, and these individuals are unwilling to take any effective action for whatever reason. (This is another area of motives that could be investigated.)
5. Realizing that it's not the right time to take action. Other things need to transpire first, which involves waiting patiently, watching vigilantly, praying diligently, and preparing one's self to take action when the right time comes. Discernment and faith are needed to know when this is the case.

Any of these reasons (except 5) may explain why people fall back on complaining and doing nothing. However, this blog is a virtual think tank for coming up with actions and strategies, so I won't be satisfied with stopping there.

In dealing with a difficult situation, the third approach is obviously the best — Affixing blame as a judgment on an identified cause, and then taking action to address the cause. But if we don't have anything actionable that we can actually do to fix our churches, marriages, etc., and the pastors and leaders fail to respond (point 4), then it logically reduces to the second response — Catatonically affixing blame as a catharsis, but no follow up action — simply because there is no follow up action to address the cause.

Trying to beat a dead horse will only lead to frustration.

The Right Approach Depends on the Context

Within marriage, the husband needs to make progress in establishing his domain, and in building a Biblical marriage by maintaining his Headship over his family and his sexual authority over his wife. This has been a focused subject of the Christian Manosphere for at least the past 3-4 years.

Within the church, however, a concerted effort is needed among the congregants. To do this, the pastor(s) and church elders are the key players for spearheading a "movement" or a "revival".

Many readers have pointed out the dire need for proactive and responsive Christian leaders, however, several readers spoke of the futility of asking or expecting leaders and pastors to take action.

Derek posed the question,

> "We do [need good leaders], yes, but if that isn't possible, what will we do instead?"
> "…what do we do about the men who cannot be — or are not called to be — church leaders? Or perhaps more to the point, how do you build good Christian leaders in an environment designed to suppress them?"

The answer is that every Christian man is called to be (1) a leader of himself, (2) a leader of others, if so called by God and/or the necessity of the situation, and (3) a leader of his own family (if he has one). This requires a man to trust in God, as he is essentially swimming upstream alone.

In dealing with Feminism and the corruption of sin within the church and/or marriage, there are three general leadership stances that a man can take, depending on the context. I'll call these stances (1) establishing a domain of leadership authority, and (2) playing the missionary, and (3) shaking the dust off your shoes. Descriptions follow.

1. Establishing a Domain of Leadership Authority

This leadership can be expressed in a variety of ways.

- Identify and establish your domain of leadership. Gather a suitable group of like-minded men under your wing, and guide and mentor them. Find trusted friends who are willing to cooperate and augment your leadership. Find a regular meeting place and get hands-on help to organize your group.
- Spearheading a gathering of men that is led by another man of greater capability and repute, and encouraging these men to follow his lead.

- Married men might make themselves less dependent on external leadership (e.g. Church services, Pastors, sunday school, etc.) and provide the necessary instruction, leadership, and teaching to his family by himself.

If a sizeable number of men can stand up to church leaders in unison, then those leaders will be more willing to listen. If church leaders still won't listen, then you've still got a band of brothers.

2. Playing the Missionary

Playing the Missionary involves targeting specific individuals to be won over to the truth behind one's cause. In this stratagem, the first and most important step is to discern the spiritual disposition of the targeted individuals.

The actions are bifurcated depending on the spiritual state of those targeted.

The Biblical directives, which include both tactical and strategic approaches for dealing with an erring brother to remove the cause of sin (as described in Matthew 18:15-35), can only bring a positive outcome if those sinning are already of a repentant nature.

For the readily repentant Christian, using these tactical and strategic actions (i.e. Matthew 18:15-35) is indeed the best approach. Here, the repentant Christian should be gently corrected, and if this fails to wake him up to the truth, we are to take a couple brothers to confront him.

But when these measures fail, we must conclude that the target is among the unbelievers and so we must treat the problem as a secular one, to which the solution is indirect: the Great Commission. For the non-Christian and the hardened non-repentant Christian, the next step is to foster their repentance as one of the lost.

3. Shaking the Dust off Your Shoes

Men who continually gripe and do nothing may have a credible viewpoint if their churches are totally subsumed by Feminism and they have given up on it and have moved on, even if only in their minds. I believe this would account for a high percentage of men who are leaving the church.

Men who find themselves taking this approach would do well to observe the following directions given to missionaries.

> [13] If the household is worthy, let your peace come upon it. But if it is not worthy, let your peace return to you. [14] And whoever will not receive you nor hear your words, when you depart from that house or city, shake off the dust from your feet. [15] Assuredly, I say to you, it will be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city!
> Matthew 10:13-15 (NKJV)

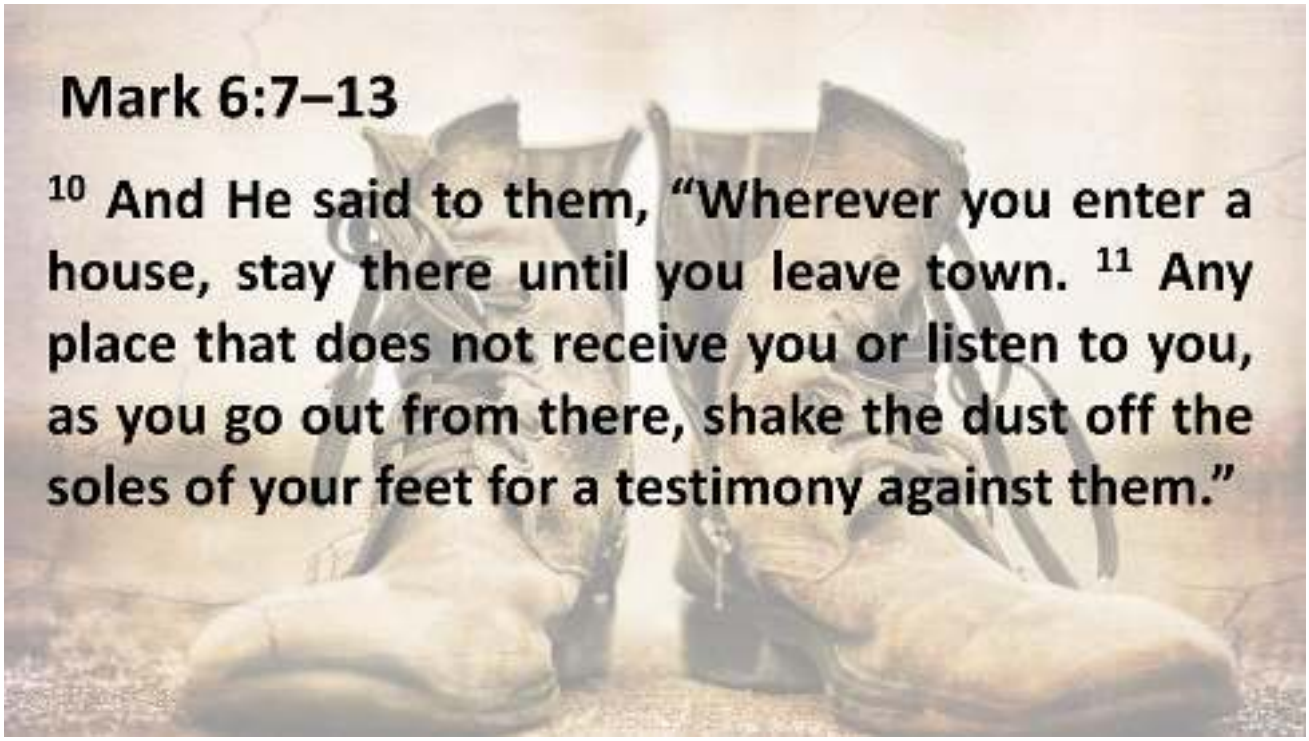
Also, pray for more discernment, adopt a more mystical approach, and seek the consolation and leading of the Holy Spirit to guide you through this difficult period of transition.

Leaving the established group and looking elsewhere for fellowship doesn't need to happen in bad blood, but when the crux of the division is about Feminism, sin, or heresy, then it may be necessary to publicly raise a fuss on your way out the door. In fact, in some cases it may be better to do so, as this will call attention to your cause and serve as a judgment on the unrepentant which God can use to convict and teach others if the Holy Spirit is willing.

For men leaving the church under these conditions, shaking the dust off your shoes (figuratively and perhaps literally as well) is one formality that must not be neglected. I believe that if men take the effort to do so, they will be able to claim a renewed power of conviction and faith.



Conclusions

Is the solution for you and I (who do not run our churches) to go to the pastor, ask him (or the other men and women like him) to repent and call the unrepentant to task, and then leave the church when it doesn't happen? Because that's likely where most in the sphere have ended up: either sticking around in disobedient fake or anti-churches or no longer attending those same churches.

Or put another way, are we trying to take back our churches or are we just admitting that they are lost, cutting our losses, and moving on?

I suspect that for the issues concerning men that are often discussed here, the vast majority of targets will fall into the second category, thus making our actions (here) of limited worth on the wider scale.

This isn't to say that you should not work to fight against the structures of sin's existence (e.g. working to ban abortion; resisting demands to close churches), but that such actions will not and cannot solve the core problem, which resides within the heart of man.

No matter which of the above three approaches a man might take, all of them require definitive action.

Note to the affected men at reddit/RPChristians: Go to the steps of the church that has rejected you. Take your shoes off and pound the soles on the steps. Let this definitive action become your catharsis. Then you will find a freshly renewed life in the Spirit and a more robust vitality for living.

This post conveys an email correspondence I had with a female reader named Juliana on 2022/4/28-29. I'm passing this on to our readers because I believe men will be encouraged to make a greater effort to respect the right kinds of men when they know what kind of impact it can have.

Jack,

I'm a long-term reader of your blog, but will refrain from commenting in the combox since I'm a woman. However, the last paragraph of your recent post about men choosing to respect the right sort of men brought a post of Zippy Catholic's to my memory. I thought at the time it was a shame that his idea was mostly dismissed.

I'm sending the pertinent paragraph, but the whole post and comments are worth reading.

> "So why do modern women find themselves, often against their own will, attracted to bad boys? Simple, really. Female attraction is much more socially conditioned than male attraction: women are natural followers, men natural leaders. Women are very good at figuring out the difference between the appearance of social status and its reality. You can't snooker them – they can't snooker themselves – by putting a nerd in a position of power. A nerd in an artificial position of power is still a nerd, and most women are going to find powerful nerds about as attractive as most men are going to find an obese woman in a bikini. Young women are always going to find themselves unwittingly attracted to men who have actual social status as accorded by our actual society, those who are seen as independent and "cool" in context (which is not the same thing as money, position, etc.); just as men are always going to find themselves attracted to women who have physical characteristics that make for good childbearing."

Juliana,

Thank you for calling my attention to this older post from Zippy. It kick started a fruitful study of the old Game Debate, among other things.

Could you tell me what it is about this post that led you to share it with me? What does it mean to you? How do you think this relates to men choosing to respect the right sort of men?

Blessings to you too!

Jack

Jack,

My sister and I married 38 years ago in a church in which fathers were expressly respected and those fathers extended respect to single men who followed Christ. Fathers were expected to be part of the mate selection process for daughters, and all of the church leadership threw their weight behind fathers. My mother talked frankly to us about women being attracted to bad boys and taught us to disrespect such men and respect good ones. I doubt this teaching would have taken in the absence of the social norms in our church and, in fact, in our prior church my dad was not respected by either my mother or the other men, and I also lacked respect for him. Once we changed churches and I saw him respected by other men, my respect for him improved. This church was not at all Anabaptist/Separatist — it was solidly evangelical in character, but the families were on the cutting edge of the early evangelical rejection of popular culture with most of the families rejecting birth control and homeschooling their children.

Zippy's view on female attraction being socially mediated rang true to me because of my experience in resisting my attraction to bad boys. I was definitely attracted to them, but purposely chose a man who was not rebellious and then my dad affirmed my choice. My sister did the same. I don't believe I would have done this if the men in my social group did not demonstrate respect for good men and disrespect for bad and if my mother had not specifically brought this to my attention.

Scene from Four Brothers (2005).

My husband and I have a son and three daughters and while we did not follow the same practices, the two girls that are married did seek his input and chose good family men. All were virgins, the men because they weren't the sort of men that women currently chase. I followed my mother's practices and explicitly taught my daughters why bad boys are attractive and why they should resist that attraction and train their attraction to good men. My youngest daughter has so far chosen three good men, two of whom declined her interest and remain unmarried, one of whom declined and is soon to be married to a woman who will likely make his life hell.

I may be on the entirely wrong track, but if the way forward is enclaves of like-minded families, male respect for other men will be essential to that project. In my previous church, Jason [LastMod] would have been married — he is just the sort of man fathers wanted for their daughters and, as such, he would have enjoyed the respect of those fathers. Also, if Zippy is correct and my story has any validity, attraction is trained. While visceral attraction only may be lots of fun, but I sincerely doubt it survives the intimacies of marriage entirely intact, and it's simply not practical to expect that every couple will experience that at the beginning. Every long-married couple with an active physical interaction has likely practiced cultivated attraction. Cultivated attraction quite often leads to visceral attraction anyway.

When our youngest daughter was in her early teens we were in a church that tried to practice a courtship model, but the fathers scoffed and preened around the young men who had great potential as husbands and fathers and their daughters did the same. Imagine what could have happened if the fathers respected and mentored those boys and disrespected the bad ones? Didn't there used to be a sort of Masculine Respect Club that men were automatically in as long as they were decent upstanding citizens?

Thank you most sincerely for your interest and for your time and patience with this long story.

Juliana

Conclusions

Juliana has given us a vision of a respectful community of men and how this type of environment has a positive impact that extends over generations.

The takeaway for men is that we need to do what we can to foster a respectful church / community / family / social environment having hallmarks similar to what she has described — one that is characterized by a mutual respect for men, a respect for the right kinds of men, and teaching women by example to do the same.

We should also discourage honor and respect from being shown to those types of men who are prone to only garner respect according to those worldly standards which are contradictory and stand in stark contrast to God's ordained order, and explain to women that this is an inclination of the flesh and how it is detrimental.

Can Sexual Attraction be Trained or Taught?

Yesterday's post, Respect makes all the difference! (2022-8-17) contained one reader's testimony about how respect for the right kinds of men can impact a community in positive ways that extend to future generations.

In the comments, deti wrote,

> "I don't buy her story or her belief that real actual SEXUAL attraction can be trained or taught."

A big part of this problem is Western culture's current obsession with sex and sexual attraction, which is essentially a glorification of the flesh. Another problem is our thinking that sexual attraction is statically and subjectively dependent on certain indicators of attractiveness dictated by the wider culture.

If sexual attraction cannot be trained or taught, then how do you explain the following?

- Men caught up in p0rn and masturbation cannot feel attraction towards regular women, no matter how marriage worthy they might be.
- Men who have sex with many women cannot deeply love and appreciate any one woman (i.e. a wife).
- Women steeped in romance p0rn (e.g. 50 Shades of Gray, etc.) come to see regular men as common, obtuse, and unattractive.
- Women who rode the carousel during their budding years of sexuality become alpha widowed and can never be satisfied with submitting to one man (i.e. a husband).

It's rather obvious that there is some conditioning going on in all these situations — a conditioning that shapes what one is attracted to.

> “She — and others, including you, Jack — might want to believe that, but wanting to believe something won’t make it true no matter how hard we want it.”

I believe it is true based on my own experience. Let me explain.

Case Study – Learning to Love a Different Type of Woman

Everyone in my family is very tall and thin, including the women, so when I was younger, I could never take short women seriously and this included Asian women. I thought they were cute, but I was not really attracted to them. This cut down my perceived pool of eligibles significantly.

After I moved to Taiwan, I was forced to face this propensity and reassess what was most important to me, because Asian women are shorter and less buxom on the average compared to white women. Over time, I found that I was most attracted to those women who displayed respect for me and treated me right, even if they were not very attractive according to the culture’s standards of beauty (which is very different between Eastern and Western cultures) or even to my own concepts of beauty. It was disconcerting to feel attracted to women because of how well they treated me, especially women whom I deemed incompatible or not very attractive. I resisted this for a long while. But over time, I discovered some blessings in this. It taught me to appreciate my own masculinity and respect myself more. (Most Western men never experience this from Western women.)

After dating several Asian women and then being married to one for a while, I now find Asian women to be more attractive than white women. Part of this is because of Western women’s slide into disrespect, depravity, and obesity over the past 20 years, but part of it is because I have had many more positive interactions and good memories with Asian women than I ever had with white women.

These days, I don't find white women attractive at all any more. I can recognize that they are beautiful, but I can't take them seriously because they don't arouse me or move me.

All these changes required me to depend more on God and myself, and less on feelings of familiarity and inspiration from others. It wasn't easy, and it took years to develop, but I learned that the overall interaction I have with a woman has its own dynamics of attraction that can supersede the raw prevaricating desires of the flesh (i.e. male lust, female hypergamy).

You Breed What You Feed

Thedeti goes on to write,

> "This sounds to me like negotiating desire, which we have learned cannot be done. A woman cannot learn how to be sexually attracted to a man. A woman cannot be trained to desire a man sexually whom she does not naturally sexually desire. She either desires him or she doesn't. She either is attracted to him or she is not.
> Most women are not sufficiently sexually attracted to most men to the degree they will be willing to stay with that man for 20, 30, or 40 years or more. They just aren't. Nothing anyone can do will change that."

Deti is accurately describing female desire in the context of approaching a mature woman who has already sampled the smorgasbord of the pen!s platter and has developed peculiar and deeply ingrained affinities for certain men who are well-endowed by various interpretations of the term. Sorry, but it's too late by then. A woman like this has already been defiled (or sanctified, depending on the context, who you are, and how you look at it). Coram Deo, she belongs to another man (or men). As far as marriage minded Christian men are concerned, a woman like this is spiritually lost and gone to Hellenism, and should be vetted out of the list of mating potentials. The unworkable problem is that most all Western women are this way, and this is because this is what family, church, and society has been feeding them since their Disney days.

Virginity before marriage is important for precisely this reason — because a woman's first taste of d!ck is the one that sticks in her subconscious libidinous memories until the day she dies, and this influences her subsequent and consequent assessments of all other men – whether she admits to it or not, and whether she likes it or not.

If you find this woman more attractive than the two previous images, then you may have a conditioned attraction to 304s. If so, then you will have to remove the sex-colored glasses from your spiritual eyes before you go hunting for a wife.

This applies to men too. Men might hold certain notions about a particular woman, but as soon as he sinks his magic wand into her genetic puddle, he'll be singing a different tune. This is why men often change their opinion about a woman after truly "knowing her" through coital congress. Most men are aware of this, and this is partly why men have much lower standards for sex than for marriage. It would serve men well to recognize that sex is undeniably spiritual in nature, and to prioritize standards for marriage first and foremost.

We must Replace our Biologically and Culturally Inspired Hope for Satisfying the Flesh with a new Hope for Holiness and Sanctification

> "Please, stop giving men and women false hope. It's wrong. It's cruel. Better to be honest with men and women, and tell them there is no hope for most of them."
> "Hope is not a strategy."

It depends on what we hope for.

If a man is completely given over to the hope of having a pouty faced, raven haired, s1ut-eyed c0cksucker with beautiful bountiful bouncing b00belicious mammary glands and a heart-shaped @ss hopping up and down on his erect salami in an explosion of unbridled passion, then I'll advise him to give up his notions of being a Christian (at least for the time being), and direct him over to the secular Manosphere.

As it is written,

> [1] It is actually reported that there is sexual immorality among you…
> [2] And you are puffed up, and have not rather mourned, that he who has done this deed might be taken away from among you.
> [4] In the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, when you are gathered together, along with my spirit, with the power of > our Lord Jesus Christ, [5] deliver such a one to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.

> 1 Corinthians 5:1-5 (NKJV)

This is not to say that a Christian man can't have the same, but he won't find it as long as he's floundering in the turmoil of obsessive lust.

You breed what you feed.

> Where do wars and fights come from among you? Do they not come from your desires for pleasure that war in your members? [2] You lust and do not have. You murder and covet and cannot obtain. You fight and war. Yet you do not have because you do not ask. [3] You ask and do not receive, because you ask amiss, that you may spend it on your pleasures. [4] Adulterers and adulteresses! Do you not know that friendship with the world is enmity with God? Whoever therefore wants to be a friend of the world makes himself an enemy of God.
> James 4:1-4 (NKJV)

If, on the other hand, a man is protecting his eyes, placing some boundaries on his relationships, and is working on developing his inner man and pursuing his purpose in life, then he stands a much better chance of attracting a woman who will be doing her best to distract him from all this with the fruits of her flesh and loins – and he'll have better opportunities to marry well and cash in his chips.

Conclusions

The Red Pill has given us a full understanding of the evo-psychological factors and dynamics of sexual attraction. The RP lore is well-developed, highly commoditized, and quickly gaining mainstream status in its advancement across society at this time. This information allows us to fully and clinically recognize all these inclinations and behaviors as part of the fleshly nature, and reconsider how it is to be dealt with from a Biblical perspective.

The overall message behind Juliana's testimony poses the challenge for us to do the following.

1. Reframe what the Red Pill teaches us about sexual attraction and behavior as being the Biblical equivalent of "the fleshly nature".
2. Reassess what culture teaches us about attraction and how to regard it and respond to it.
3. Look beyond the acutely enthralling but utterly fugacious initial feeelings of attraction.
4. Return our attention to the mechanics of interaction and the fruits thereof as the ultimate indicators of the value of a relationship.
5. Create a "culture of attraction" (for lack of a better name) which focuses on (1) how to assess and properly deal with the feral urgencies of evolutionary psychology, and (2) how to properly satisfy the eternal longings of the human soul according to wisdom.

To begin with (and to repeat this from the previous post), we need to do what we can to foster a respectful church / community / family / social environment having hallmarks similar to what Juliana has described — one that is characterized by a mutual respect for men, a respect for the right kinds of men, and teaching women by example to do the same.

We also need to focus our attention on, and give positive feedback to those women who should rightfully have it, and not to those who go attention wh0ring for the same.

We should also discourage honor and respect from being shown to those types of men and women who are prone to only garner respect or attention respectively according to those worldly standards which are contradictory and stand in stark contrast to God's ordained order. We also need to explain to others that this is an inclination of the flesh and how it is detrimental to our spiritual and social lives.

Update

Sharkly, Kevin, et al. have added to the list of actionable steps.

1. Individuals should increase sexual polarity to embellish Biblical gender roles, thereby glorifying God and increasing natural attraction.
2. Work to restore the male honoring biblical doctrine of men alone being the likeness and glory of our Father and Son Godhead, while wives image Christ's church.

3. Teach "that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with braided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array; But (that which becometh women professing godliness) with good works… to love their husbands, to love their children, to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God be not blasphemed." (1 Timothy 2:9-14; Titus 2:3-5)
4. Work to restore men's rights, especially to discipline their wives and children.
5. Work to take men's rights back and establish masculine authority and masculine domains of influence.
6. Deny and remove women from positions where they can effectively teach and usurp power over men, especially within the church.
7. Honor virginity and shame the sexually immoral.
8. Work to correct "White Knight" and "Simp" men for their foolishness.
9. Resist letting Satan, apostate churches, or women, reframe your view or set your priorities.

DeepStrength wrote a response, Objective and subjective attraction measures and what the Church can do about it (2022-8-18), which offers some further observations about the nature of attraction.

DeepStrength's post, Why do most societies have 90-95% marriage rates (at some points) (2021-7-29), offers a description of how male dominated socioeconomic conditions help foster female attraction to males within a patriarchal styled hierarchy.

The Delusion of the Good

It's easier to have the faux faith of a pharisee when you believe the pretty lies.

Lies Built Around Desire and Hope Can Instill a Faux Conformance to the Image of Spiritual Obedience

The most curious and phenomenal characteristic of a lie is that it somehow sets everything straight, at least in one's head. Especially when it produces behavior that is aligned with true obedience to the Spirit, although it is not.

Here's what I'm talking about.

Perhaps the "Pretty Lie" most relevant to the Christian Manosphere is Chivalry. Men who believe in Chivalry are thus motivated to become gallant White Knights in shining silver armor, which on its face, appears to be dignified, ennobled, and the right way to treat women. It is accompanied by a sense of purpose, honor, and the reward of undying libidinous love – all appealing to a man's natural desire to be the well-laid hero of the dainty damsel in distress. The White Knight thereby becomes altruistic, kind-hearted, good-willed, patient, faithful, gentle, self-controlled (c.f. Galatians 5:22-23). His mind is filled with notions of sacrificial "love" as he is eschewing envy, forbearing, pacified, polite, self-abasing, selfless, utterly "appalled" by the appearance of iniquity and evil, and willing to suffer long in the hope of m'lady's tender affections as he bears all things and believes all things (c.f. 1 Corinthians 13:4-7). IOW, he is inspired to instantly achieve all the Fruits of the Spirit and the God-like capability of pure Agape Love – or at least it appears that way to the solipsistic self-conceptualization of the White Knight.

It's all good, right? Well… it appears so, until a man takes the Red Pill and realizes that it's all an amalgamation of a complex waft of lies. Women are not helpless princesses in need of rescuing, nor are they loyal ladies in waiting. In reality, the Chivalrous White Knight is only making himself a minion of Feminine Imperatives, tossed to and fro on the waves of his idealistic passions and the deceitful trickery of parasitic women (Ephesians 4:14).

I give you two more examples of our Christian brothers' desperate adherence to the lies.

1. The View from the Right (feat. Kristor): Game versus the Good (2009-8-27)
2. The Orthosphere (guest post from Dalrock; comment from Alan Roebuck): Must a Traditional Man Accept Modern Marriage? (2013-5-20)

Our Christian brothers, well-meaning as they may be, are stuck in pedestalization and supplication. In this post, I'll review the error of these two approaches, and how it seems to be right, although it is not.

Blue Pill Pedestalization

The first is Kristor, writing in 2009 about Game.

Note: When Kristor uses the term "gamers" and "Gamers", he is referring to Pick Up Artists (PUAs) and Practitioners of Game (POGs), the latter of which could include husbands wrangling with a rebellious wife.

> "…one should understand that only depraved women are attracted to men who are nothing more than gamers.
> Women who are helplessly attracted to rogue men, and thus vulnerable to the deceptions of gamers, are messed up.
> If a woman is to go on living, there must remain somewhere in her a bit of moral purity, for depravity and sin are defects of a basic goodness. Destroy that basis altogether, and you destroy altogether the life in which alone depravity and sin can make their dwelling place. Evil parasitically depends upon the good that it destroys. So, a living woman necessarily has in her somewhere a bit of goodness, that yearns for what will support her true flourishing—that will discourage her depravity, and encourage her virtue. So every living woman is attracted at root to men who are good.
> True men, good men, have reckoned their own death, and pledged their life and its ending to the service of the Good. They do not therefore chafe under the inevitable difficulties and sacrifices of life—including long periods of celibacy, such as soldiers, hunters, and explorers must endure—but rather shoulder them manfully. They do not whine at adversity. They laugh. Thus are heroes made, however humble their predicaments, however meager their ultimate victories, and whether or not anyone recognizes them as such. These are the sort of men to whom the goodness in women, the true womanliness of women, is attracted. Women want heroes; everyone does. We are all tuned to recognize heroism, and follow it, because we are all made to seek and follow the Good. True success with women, then, whether or not it ever bears the fruit of sexual pleasure, lies not in pretending to heroism, but in heroism itself."

Here, Kristor lists out several traits of Good men: stoicism, perseverance, laughing at adversity, bearing burdens manfully – and claims that women are attracted to men who have such traits.

No. No they are not. Women are not sexually attracted to such men unless those men are also cocky funny, confident, dominant, and good looking.

Women want to use men's stoicism, perseverance, facing adversity, and burden bearing, because men who have those traits are providers, they stick around, and they tend to be kind and patient. Women are not attracted to those men. They are willing to use, exploit, and take advantage of such men. But they are not attracted to those men.

And we need to make sure men and women know the difference.

Here's where Kristor, like everyone before him and since him, goes wrong:

1. Sin is not a defect. It's a part of human nature. Every human is born with it. If it were a defect, it could be removed and cured. It could be designed out. You can fix defects. You can design and manufacture a defect-free product. Not so with humans and their sin natures. If sin nature could be designed out, removed, and cured, there would be no need for God and no need for Jesus' atoning death on the Cross. Sin is part of our nature.
2. All women are attracted to Game hallmarks: confidence, dominance, cocky-funny, competence, displays of power, bullying, and cruelty. ALL women are. All women like these displays in men. It's just that some women don't act on it. Most women do act on that attraction, because there's currently no real short term temporal downside to doing so.
3. ALL women are messed up in some form or fashion. Because they have sin natures. ALL women are messed up.
4. Women are not "attracted" to the "good" or the Good. Women like to use the Good in men. Women like to exploit and take advantage of Good men. Women see the benefits of commitment from Good men. Women want those benefits only when they figure out that the bad, cruel men they really want are not going to stick around. But they are not sexually attracted to Good, or to Good men. And, candidly, sexual attraction is the only "attraction" that matters, because it's the incentive that drives men to have anything to do with women.
5. Women are not in any way attracted to good men. Women are not in any way attracted to the Good in men. If they were, they would not need to be taught any of this. IF they were, none of them would need to learn this the hard way.

6. Trad Cons like Kristor like to call women's wanting commitment, resources, time, and labor from Good men "attraction", because it attributes virtue to women's "choices" and because men's sexual attraction and men wanting sex from women is base, dirty, and evil. First, Kristor pedestalizes women unnecessarily. Women's wanting beta bux men is not attraction in any real meaningful sense of the word. It is want and need, use, exploitation, and crass advantage. Second, men's wanting and expecting sex from women is not evil or base or dirty in any way. It is normal and natural. And we as men do ourselves grave disservices when we accept this from tradcons like Kristor and his ilk.
7. Women are not attracted to "heroes". If they were, we would not have a 50% divorce rate nor a rising "never married" rate.
8. Kristor's last point is the usual one: "Yeah, some of you are 'heroes', but no one will ever recognize it as such." Well, then, they're not heroes, Kristor. They might be servants, they might be Godly men, they might be faithful, loyal, and just. But they're not heroes. And no, not everyone wants heroes. More and more women want gamers. More and more women want cocky-funny, irrational self-confidence, and extreme dominance.

Kristor's post is indicative of modern Christian thought — his naïve argument commingles truth with the starry-eyed idolatry of pedestalization, thereby making this whitewashed deception more alluring to uninitiated believers and more politically correct to the heathen masses.

His main error is that he still believes that women are, at their cores, attracted to "good men", at their root, they are attracted to Godly men who go to church, work at decent jobs, and lead basically good, upright lives; men who do what they're told, do what their pastors tell them, men who read their bibles, men who lift up holy hands and speak in vocal fry about "Jesus the lover of my soul."

Kristor gets it totally wrong, just as most of his ilk do. He still pedestalizes women; he still refuses to see the utter depravity and sin nature of all humans, which includes women, because women are humans.

He apparently rejects a central Christian doctrine that is repeated a gazillion times in scripture (Job 14:1-6; Psalm 14:1-3; Isaiah 53:6; Isaiah 59:7-15; Isaiah 64:6-7; Romans 3:10-20; Romans 3:23; et al.):

> "There is none righteous, no, not one… All have sinned and gone astray."

Kristor, that's either true or it's not. You either believe that or you don't. If you really don't believe that women are depraved, then you reject a basic tenet of Christian doctrine, you're pedestalizing women, and I won't go there with you. "All" means ALL, and that includes women.

Blue Pill Supplication

The second is Alan Roebuck, writing in response to Dalrock's guest post at The Orthosphere: Must a Traditional Man Accept Modern Marriage? (2013-5-20).

Roebuck wrote,

> "Dalrock quoted me saying,
> "We must also point out an uncomfortable truth: You may bear some of legitimate responsibility for your wife's unhappiness. Not all female complaints are frivolous. Although it is wrong for the woman to allow these complaints to drive her to divorce, the man should not goad her into doing evil. If you can change those of your behaviors that ought to be changed, to prevent the great evil of divorce, more the better. Do whatever it takes, short of sin or dishonor, to prevent divorce."
> This was the statement of mine that drew the most flack. But my general point was that if a man can save his marriage by making some concessions, then he ought to do so, provided that they are not immoral or humiliating. I do not advocate a general attitude of appeasement, for that is deadly to one's self and to one's marriage. And I acknowledge the profound corruption of proper marriage that is entailed by arming the wife with the right to divorce frivolously. (Whether divorce ought to be granted at all is a matter for another discussion.) But given the evil constraints imposed by the Masters of Society, and the importance for all involved of avoiding divorce, occasional concession for a greater good can be a noble act."

Essentially, Roebuck is saying that whenever men are faced with marital difficulties, they are to "make concessions" to their spouses and "do what it takes" to keep their marriages together. In other words, men are required to supplicate to women to preserve their relationships.

No! This is a recipe for disaster!

Epilogue

This is what our churches are telling men: That women are basically good, they're better than men are, women are not depraved, and women are "attracted" to "Good Men". Since women are so good, then when a man is faced with problems in a relationship with a woman, then it must be entirely the man's fault. He has to "make concessions" and "do what it takes" to keep her.

Then they tell you, "Well, if it doesn't work, you might get divorced. This is war. Some men die in battle. Oh well, guys, if your marriages fail, too bad so sad, you're just unlucky, you'll just have to suffer and die. We'll carefully and assiduously ignore that any children you had will suffer too, but they're just collateral damage. It was probably your fault anyway."

No.

Guys, I've already done this. I've done everything men like Kristor and Roebuck told me to do. I was good, kind, nice. I got the education. I got the career. I made the money. I did the work. I went to church. I treated everyone well. I was virtuous, good, and kind. I asked permission. I stayed inside the lines.

I was a stellar man, by the world's standards, and also by God's. But it was all an effort in the flesh. I thought that if I fit the image of an ideal man, then I should have the concomitant rewards. But it just doesn't work that way.

What did I get for all that effort?

I ended up in a very unhappy marriage to a headstrong and rebellious woman. Now, I'm just trying to save my own life and that of my children's.

Conclusions

Since Kristor and Roebuck and other Pedestalizers and Supplicators who think the same (maybe even including your pastor) have it wrong, then what is the right approach?

To start with, we need to stop lying to ourselves and other men about the nature of women. We need to stop pedestalizing them, as Orthosphere blogger "Kristor" does in the first post at The View from the Right: Game versus the Good (2009-8-27). We need to stop lying to men about what women are really attracted to, completely misunderstanding what attraction is and how it works, and demonizing men and the male sex drive.

We also need to stop lying to women, i.e. our wives and daughters, about their own nature. If we are going to teach young women about their own natures, Kristor's way is NOT the way to do it. Kristor's way is pedestalization, wrongly attributing virtue to women, presuming that women don't have a sin nature, and then placing all the blame on men who then have to work harder to "save" their relationship, as Roebuck told us. All this work just to keep a rebellious woman who has gas lighted everyone who denies the scriptures into thinking she's good.

Don't listen to men who say things like what Kristor or Roebuck have said above.

Women are more choosy and more discerning in selecting mates than men are. If women were attracted to Good men, they would pick Good men, EVERY time, and avoid PUAs and game practitioners, EVERY time. But what we often see in reality is the opposite. Women won't decide they want a good man until the stream of Chads trickles to a standstill because they don't want their post-Wall chasm anymore, the college loan repayment bills come due, and their biological clock is ticking at a deafening volume.

Furthermore, this apparent hatred for good men doesn't change after marriage. If women were attracted to Good men, marriage counseling would not be necessary at all. If women were attracted to Good men, we would not have a 50% divorce rate, professing Christians would not report a divorce rate of "only" 38%, and there would be no need for the Manosphere or any of these blogs.

Stop listening to the men of our churches, Pedestalizers and Supplicators.

- They view men as depraved and disgusting merely for wanting a domain of authority, the blessings of Shalom for our lives, and for pursuing sanctification in marriage.
- They view women as somehow above men and better than us.
- They outright lie to us that women are “attracted” to “good men”.
- They play the blame and shame game to weaken men’s moral fiber.
- They try to inflict false guilt to make men lose heart and become more obeisant.
- They lay all the responsibility on men — a burden which is too heavy to bear.

As it is written…

> [4] For they bind heavy burdens, hard to bear, and lay them on men’s shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers. [5] But all their works they do to be seen by men…
> [6] They love the best places at feasts, the best seats in the synagogues, [7] greetings in the marketplaces, and to be called by men…

Jacob's Masculinity

Poor masculinity leads to problems. An exegesis of Genesis 34.

The Patriarch Jacob Lacked Masculinity

The patriarch Jacob is the Biblical prototype of the "Nice Guy" from Robert Glover's book, "No More Mr. Nice Guy". The Nice Guy exemplifies the opposite of masculinity. The story of Jacob's life shows us what happens in the absence of masculine leadership. I'll keep the points on a summary level for brevity.

Jacob colluded with his mother and used trickery to steal his brother's birthright, then ran away when the relationship got dangerous instead of facing his brother and owning up to what he did. He let his uncle Laban give him Leah first and didn't just take Rachel. Instead, he internalized his weakness and took it out on Leah while putting in another 7 years of service to his uncle for Rachel's hand in marriage.

An artists rendition of Leah (left) and Rachel (right), wives of Jacob.

Jacob's Family Life

According to the scriptures, God saw that Leah was unloved by Jacob and as a consolation, opened her womb to have 7 children. One of the interesting aspects of Jacob's life story are the names of his children and what they reveal about Jacob's marriage to the two sisters.

1. Reuben means, "He has seen my misery" or "He will love me".
2. Simeon means, "He has heard of my suffering".
3. Levi means, "He will join with me in harmony".
4. Judah means "Thanksgiving" or "Praise".

5. Issachar means "man for hire" or "reward".
6. Zebulun means "gift" or "honor".
7. Dinah means "judged".

The names of his children by Rachel are similarly revealing.

1. Joseph means, "God has taken away my reproach."
2. Benjamin means, "Son of my sorrow."

As you can see from the meanings of their names, Leah and Rachel named their sons according to how Jacob was toward them relationally. In these names, we see the fruits of the "Nice Guy" Jacob's bitterness and resentment, the struggle that Leah had with being the unwanted woman, and the shame that Rachel endured as a result of God's response to Jacob's ill treatment of Leah (i.e. giving Leah the honor of having more children). If we look at the larger context and compare how he favored his sons by Rachel, we get an idea of how miserably bitter he was over being tricked into marrying Leah and then taking it lying down.

Genesis 34

The story in Genesis 34 is of Jacob's daughter Dinah getting raped by prince Shechem. There are multiple parts to the story and at any point the application of a biblically masculine course of action could have mitigated further damage to all parties involved.

Dinah goes out on the town of Shechem, named after the prince, to see the culture. She's abducted and seduced/raped by Shechem and she is kept captive by him at his residence. He falls for her and tells his father Hamor to go get permission to make her his wife, so they go visit Jacob. Jacob is silent on the matter when no man should be silent. He could have demanded justice for his daughter, but there is nothing from him. When Dinah's brothers come home from the fields and hear of what happened they are angry. Jacob's lack of a response most likely infuriated them more. Had he told Hamor, "no", and seized the opportunity to exact justice from Shechem, his son's fury would probably have been assuaged. Even if he agreed to the union as the best positive outcome of the situation (since Dinah had already been defiled), and used the situation to forge an alliance with Shechem, he would have been showing the masculine trait of rolling with the punches and staying on top of things. But he didn't do that either. Nothing, not even a word.

Given this vacuum of definitive authority from Jacob, Dinah's brothers usurp the role of Jacob as father and plot revenge. They say that the bride price is for all the men of Shechem to be circumcised, according to the Israelite's tradition. Blinded by the hope of obtaining Dinah and growing the tribe, Hamor and Shechem convince the town's men to go under the knife, and when they are all recovering the brothers go kill every man in the town and take their sister back. They plunder all their belongings, and take the women and children as their own. (This could be a scene straight from Donovan's thought exercise in "The Way of Men".)

MASSACRE OF THE HIVITES BY SIMEON AND LEVI.

The sons, in their thirst to avenge, perpetuated violence on innocent people just like their innocent sister had been assaulted. Basically, they did to the town of Shechem what Prince Shechem did to their sister. This is not the justice of biblical masculinity, this is world of masculinity and revenge. Killing all the men because one was a rapist was overkill, pun intended.

A decisive word from Jacob could have prevented all this carnage, but he remained silent.

When Jacob heard what his sons had done his immediate response was to worry about other's reactions. He chastised his sons because of what the other inhabitants of the area might think of him and what they might do to him. This is a sign of his misunderstanding of masculinity and his weakness in general. The other inhabitants of the land were then worried about what Jacob's sons might do if they are crossed. The inhabitants might not have liked what happened but they knew there would be a price to be paid for treating Jacob's people wrong, and they knew the sons were willing to inflict it.

Epilogue

In Shaking the dust off your shoes (2022-8-15), Jack made the point that no matter what situation a man is in, or what he has decided to believe, he must make a decisive action, if only to make a statement and/or obtain a catharsis. The story of Jacob in Genesis 34 reinforces this conclusion.

Jacob basically shrugged when he found out his daughter had been kidnapped and raped. His failure to act incited his sons to usurp his mantle of authority and respond to the situation.

Jacob's sons took action. Their response was deceitful, unjust, and brought needless death to many innocent men. This goes to show that it is better to take action rather than to leave that responsibility to others, who may not act in the best interests of all concerned, and may in fact make things worse.

What we learn from this is that the absence of masculinity has been causing issues for thousands of years. Its absence causes men to allow themselves to be walked upon today just like it did back then. Only in modern times, a man will get trod over by his own woman along with other men.

Σ Frame Axiom 33: A man should never leave the responsibilities of being the Head of his domain to others, unless the are duly delegated to do so (which is an action in itself).

On a positive note, we see the grace of God shown to Jacob in spite of his personal failures as a man. He became a patriarch and the father and namesake of the Israelite nation. Thus, his life story offers hope to Nice Guys everywhere.

Introduction

My last two posts, Respect makes all the difference! (2022/8/17) and On Curating a Christian Culture of Attraction (2022/8/18) have attracted a lot of attention, confusion, and controversy.

- DeepStrength wrote a response about Objective and subjective attraction measures and what the Church can do about it (2022/8/18).
- Thedeti has written a large number of comments and a post, The Delusion of the Good (2022/8/19), arguing for the immutable paramountcy of "natural" evo-psyche attraction.
- Juliana wrote another email to me with some additional thoughts.
- Update: Catacomb Resident has voiced his evaluation of this discussion in Desire versus Desire (2022/8/25).

Here, I'll respond to Thedeti's comments and DS's post, report some relevant comments from Juliana, and summarize the main points of the discussion around the topic of a "Christian Culture of Attraction."

Ironing out the Issues

DeepStrength wrote,

> "There seems to be some confusion and possible disagreement on various objective and subjective attraction measures…"

Yes. Some readers have latched onto the idea that my last post was largely concerned about somehow changing the nature of "natural" evo-psyche based attraction. I agree that it isn't possible to change the visceral effects of the basic SMV vectors of attraction which have been exhaustively discussed around the sphere. But this wasn't my point.

One of the big postulates in my last post is that much of what we call sexual attraction is primarily of the flesh. Men's obsession with T&A and sowing their wild oats is fleshly in nature. Female hypergamy and women's attraction to bad boys is fleshly in nature. The Bible calls us not to be fleshly minded, but to set our sights on the things of the spirit (e.g. Romans 8). (I know this is easier said than done.) Would this not also apply to how we regard attraction?

My argument in the last post was not that sexual attraction can be changed such that women are not hypergamous, not attracted to bad boys, and so on, but that it can be regulated and guided to some extent, for both men and women, at least enough to allow sanctification in marriage. It must be possible, otherwise Christian marriages will be held hostage by the fleshly nature, as well as the secular world's systems of values, and therefore doomed to fail. The concluding point was that we as Christians should understand how to do this, develop methods for doing this (readers have already contributed several actionable steps), and then do what we can.

You Breed What You Feed

DS wrote,

> "I think Jack errs a bit in using his own experience for saying that "You Breed What You Feed" and using his own example."

It is an error to apply my own case study to model the nature of women's attraction. Deti and I discussed this error in the comments.

I don't think "You Breed What You Feed" contains much of an error.

- A guy who jerks off all the time will succumb to lust.
- A guy who watches cuckold p0rn will develop a taste for the same.
- A woman who hates and distrusts men will be rejected by them and learn to hate them more.
- A woman who bangs Chads will develop a strong affinity for Chads to the exclusion of all non-Chads.
- A woman who remains a virgin until marriage and cultivates love and respect for her husband will find more satisfaction in marriage than one who does not.
- My own story (in my last post) was offered as another example of this. I had more positive interactions with Asian women, so I learned to appreciate it and got more of the same.

And so on. This should be common sense, but apparently it is not.

With attraction, we can chase after the desires of the flesh, and stoke up our sinful passions until we are either acting them out or are frustrated for not doing so, or else we can focus on the things of the Spirit and learn to place our hope and faith in God. I realize that this is an unsatisfying dilemma, and that it is hard to face this truth. But this is the same choice that Christians have faced since antiquity, hence all the suffering for the sake of righteousness.

This brings up the question, how are we to concentrate on the things of God in spite of our own fleshly desires, and make this a self-supporting habit even while we are constantly inundated by the world's influences?

Sex me up with Sexy Sexed up Sexualized Sexuality! Gimmee SSSEEEXXX Baybeee!!!

Another issue of confusion is that it is extremely hard for us to break free from the secular sex-centric thinking and value system that has engulfed Western society and has become prevalent even within the church. From my observations, Western readers are wholly incapable of comprehending just how deeply this is embedded in their psychology and values. This completely ubiquitous preoccupation with everything sexual (culminating in 74 gender identities, a high divorce rate, gender dysphoria, polysexuality, widespread immorality, and so on) is the cathartic idol of our age, and women's behaviors are the proof. It is like a blinding obsession that must never be violated in principle.

Juliana wrote,

> "I wonder if it's even possible to completely understand the depth of sexual wounding we've all suffered, and to explain how entirely obsessed we are, seems even more difficult. It is, however, something we must attempt if we are to survive."

I have no doubt that many people (maybe most of us around these parts) are in the habit of ruminating over some aspect of the self (e.g. desire for companionship, loneliness, marriage, masculinity, sexual expression, sexual temptation, supercharged libido, etc.) in the hope of finding contentment, fulfillment, healing, peace, and restoration. Our sexuality is an integral part of this.

All these factors make it difficult for us to take off the sex colored glasses.

Aren't we Overemphasizing the Carnal Component of Attraction?

When Thedeti argues for the immutable paramountcy of "natural" evo-psyche attraction, I read this as him saying that the flesh is more powerful than any faith in the Spirit and that it is useless for us to think otherwise. IOW, we are all slaves of sin, subject to the market dynamics of the SMP, and faith in Christ makes no difference. Hoes gonna hoe, and God doesn't care if you find a wife! This reckoning is anathema to the gospel.

DS's post emphasizes the individual man's development of the "natural" evo-psyche qualities of attraction (e.g. staying physically active, lifting, looksmaxing, losing weight, etc.). DS finishes his post with this.

> "These are things that can be implemented in various Churches and the wider community, as well as teaching men and women that some of their feelings/desires in the opposite sex are flirting with disaster…"
> "Preparing young men and women for that is critical, and it needs to be followed through."

Yes! This conclusion agrees with the purpose of my last post. However, although these habits are helpful and maybe even necessary towards mastering the flesh (1 Corinthians 9:24-27), it is still an effort in the flesh. For the grand majority of men, this is an uphill climb with limited benefits, and many men have already come to the conclusion that this is not enough.

Juliana reached the same conclusion, but for different reasons.

> "The idea of sexual attraction so you can't "see straight" is nonsensical and removes female agency. God would not hold us accountable for sexual sin if we were unable to see straight when doing it. Women know exactly what they are doing when they give themselves sexually."

I'm flabbergasted!!! Do women have agency?!? /S

UPDATE: I examined this question in depth later in the year. Here's the summary of What we've learned about Female Agency (2022/12/20).

Jesus Came in the Flesh

> [2] By this you know the Spirit of God: Every spirit that confesses that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is of God, [3] and every spirit that does not confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is not of God.
> 1 John 4:2-3 (NKJV)

> [14] Inasmuch then as the children have partaken of flesh and blood, He Himself likewise shared in the same, that through death He might destroy him who had the power of death, that is, the devil, [15] and release those who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage.
> Hebrews 2:14-15 (NKJV)

The perfect incarnation of Christ is a mystery that we accept on faith. But attraction, bonding, marriage, sex, and trust are avenues through which we may better understand how the carnal and the spiritual are intertwined.

Of course, sexual attraction is an integral part of a sanctified marriage, and so it must be included and accounted for, but it should be noted that the fleshly desires (e.g. male lust, female hypergamy, etc.) are the prime motivators behind a "natural" evo-psyche style attraction. Furthermore, we cannot rely on attraction as a blanket reason for justifying the demands of the flesh and the deeds of the sinful nature. Even if a man or woman succeeds in making himself more attractive, enough to find a mate, then it doesn't mean that he has made any spiritual progress in sanctification or in mastering the sinful nature. The latter will lie dormant until a time when circumstance and opportunity let it emerge to do its damage. Getting himself together, losing weight, working out, and so on, might make him more attractive to women, but unless there are marriage worthy women available and willing to tie the knot, it also exposes him to more temptation and more opportunities to screw around. Real spiritual growth and a bit of Red Pill awareness, OTOH, will attract better quality women who would be more likely to marry.

Remember DS's Rule of Reciprocality: Like attracts like; Birds of a feather flock together.

Also remember, our eternal goal is our sanctification and to glorify God, not to satisfy our insatiable sexual appetites and our desire to be humbled through aesthetic and visceral attraction.

Isn't there a Spiritual Component of Attraction?

In her letter, Juliana said DS is correct in saying those pictures of men's ideal body types (on DS's post) create attraction for women, in the same way similar pictures of women create attraction for men. But what he doesn't explain is that if you take away the character and personality, then of course everyone would choose a particular range of body types. For this reason, she says,

> "I object to the idea that visceral attraction explains everything about attraction."
> "One of the reasons I read everything Zippy wrote is because he opened my mind to the errors of nominalism and reductionism. I'm not nearly as smart as he was and so I don't totally understand the ways modernity has damaged us, but I do know that reducing people to only their sexual attractions is very bad. The long tradition of monasticism should at the least inform us that it is possible to rise above our appetites with the help of God."

In a couple comments, I described a little about the role of mythos in attraction. This will be the subject of an upcoming post. I don't think mythos can completely account for all the metaphysical aspects of attraction, but it is certainly one important piece of the pie.

Case Study – Juliana's Story

Juliana wrote her own testimony about how this all worked out for her.

> "It looks like supporting Zippy's point by using my story has ended up with the post being highjacked. To clarify: I was sexually attracted to my husband, [even though he was not at all like one of the ideal body types in DS's post], and he is not what some of your commenters would call alpha. (I intensely dislike the reduction involved in the Greek letter system, so please don't read this as saying anything at all about my husband.) I chose a man I was both attracted to and who would pass my dad's requirements. My sister also chose [a man who didn't have the ideal body type]. These men were on our radar because they were held up as examples of husband material, which by definition was a good man. They were normal weight, but otherwise didn't match [what is purported to be an ideal physique]. We now have enduring marriages, but not as a result of sexual attraction; rather, as a result of our total commitment to marriage as a sacrament. Personally, I have found that > attraction increases as oneness increases."

Make of it what you will, but I see this as evidence of metaphysical attraction. I suppose the male equivalent would be wife goggles.

Conclusions

In addition to personal development, we need to foster a family / community environment that is not so much focused on gratifying the desires of the flesh, but is instead marked by (1) a Biblical / Red Pill awareness of the fleshly nature, (2) protecting women from becoming slores, and (3) guiding young people to make conscious decisions and wise choices in order to achieve sexual contentment and marital sanctification. This is why a supporting community is necessary.

Juliana wrote,

> "I believe the way forward is catechesis, not some "meet cute" magic, because God has given us what we need. His remedy of marriage isn't culture dependent, but right now most Christians just don't understand what marriage is – [the church's] reduction … of marriage to nothing more than a remedy for burning is not terribly compelling, especially given the nonstop negative assault on it. It is most especially not compelling to the feminine mind."

In my previous post, I called this Christian Red Pill catechesis + family / community environment a "Christian Culture of Attraction" for lack of a better description. I suppose it is my fault that many readers have jumped on the word "Attraction" and ignored the words "Christian Culture". I should be more apperceptive of our sex-centric thinking.

The challenge for us now is to identify ways to do this, and to then carry them out. More on this will be forthcoming.

The Limitations of the Exceptionality Model

I've been following along with what Deep Strength (DS) said in his post, Objective and subjective attraction measures and what the Church can do about it (2022-8-18). DS is pointing out how Christian men can bump up their attractiveness by developing PSALM traits and taking a leadership role at church, and then urging Christian men to do this in order to enhance their service ministry and attract more and perhaps better women. (More posts about the nature of attraction, including DS's assessments, are listed below under Related.)

However, I'm having trouble putting together the details of his viewpoint in light of what I've been writing about in the last couple posts, On Curating a Christian Culture of Attraction (2022-8-18) and On Clarifying a Christian Culture of Attraction (2022-8-24).

I see DS and Thedeti as having basically the same assessment — that sexual attraction is the primary and indispensable vehicle for achieving a sanctified marriage. Where they differ however, is that DS believes a man can fill the drill by having a decent paying job, having a sublime purpose for living, maintaining chastity, working out at the gym, getting down below 20% body fat, serving in church, and so on, whereas Thedeti thinks this is a hopeless endeavor because of the inherently broken nature of females.

In my last two posts, I've been arguing that most of this is not much more than an appeal to what women find attractive according to their fleshly nature. In The Delusion of the Good (2022-8-19), Thedeti went a step further to point out how making efforts to assuage or fulfill feminine fleshly lusts is an anti-scriptural and hopeless ordeal.

Putting this all together, I think it might be easier and clearer for DS to simply say that a man must make himself exceptional in the eyes of God and in the eyes of man (and women too if he hopes to have regular marital sex). IOW, a man would have to be a very fit, handsome, successful, and wealthy saint, or like an Alpha version of Jesus himself, or more jokingly put, a hunky monk.

Instinct Magazine: Viral Hot Monk Revealed To Be Burmese Actor (2021-1-14)

This would be an ideal goal for Christian men to have, but it does little to change the scenery on the ground. A similar misassessment (concerning respect) was observed by Dalrock in his post, Is Christian marriage only for elite women? (2019-1-14), in which he wrote,

> "Pastor Foster explained that for a Christian man to be respected by other Christian men he needed to prove himself to be exceptional…"
> "I pointed out that only elite Christian men would be able to marry under this model, since he had also argued that earning the respect of other men was essential to finding a wife. We can't make the average man extraordinary, we can only improve the average."

In our present discussion, the goal is not about earning respect, but finding marital sanctification, but DS is recommending the same approach — stand out from the crowd; be exceptional.

But it is still like Dalrock said; not every man can be extraordinary, so DS's approach is limited to be an individual solution for those men who can make themselves exceptional. Even if we could improve the average, this would be followed by a corrective adjustment in the sexual market due to comparative hypergamy, leaving most men in the same place where we are now.

And yet, we do see some men who are less than exceptional who are relatively more successful in love and marriage than what the exceptionality model would predict (e.g. Derek Ramsey, Ed Hurst, Juliana's, Juliana's sister's, and Rowena's husbands, and others you might think of). Perhaps we should turn our attention to these types of men and their communities to find out what they're doing right (or what they're not doing wrong).

Yes, we could easily write this off as being due to the grace of God (or having a unicorn wife which is kind of the same thing), but I am thinking of the majority of men (and lots of women too) who cannot create a visceral sexual attraction but still hope to avail of this grace. I think the selection process is the key.

Thedeti is well aware of the latter men's predicaments, but he believes there is no hope for grace. DS, OTOH, seems to be focusing on men who are on the cusp of being a top tier man, but who need a little more oomph to reach the playing field by becoming "visible" to women, or IOW, exceptional.

Is the Exceptionality Model Limited to Vectors of Sexual Attraction?

DS has attempted to shore up his position in some comments under the latter post. But I still think he's arguing that attraction must appeal to the desires of the flesh (i.e. women's hypergamy) to be effective towards marital sanctification.

So then, I was a bit confused when DeepStrength wrote,

> "Basically, what I am driving at is that most of the things I recommend at least are not an effort in the flesh."

In his earlier response post, he recommended men to develop PSALM traits – Power, Status, Athleticism, Looks, and Money. I'm having a hard time imagining these things are not of the flesh. He also listed Masculinity, and it's easier for me to see how that could be a godly trait, but as Adam pointed out, Masculinity does not lead to Godliness.

> "They are just natural side effects of being driven with a Spiritual purpose."

PSALM traits are things that men must work hard at to achieve. Masculinity is a discipline that is presently persecuted where it is not lost altogether. How are these things "natural side effects"? I think DS means to say that generating attraction is a natural side effect of having PSALMs, as we already know. I agree that having a purpose can be a motivator, but it doesn't need to be spiritual in nature to generate attraction or even to attain marital contentment. Granted it's rare, but not necessary. Sex and marriage are perhaps the only areas of the human experience in which God grants grace to unbelievers.

> "Obviously, there is the intention of the heart that can make one's true intent good or bad but that is for God to judge, but those of us who are rightly seeking to use our gifts of the Spirit to lead and disciple others are doing a good thing…"

OK, so once a man develops PSALM traits, he should use these traits for God's glory and His purposes. This is good, but even those who don't will be able to generate more attraction compared to other men with less PSALMs. So how is it spiritual in nature? Isn't this basically the same as urging Christian men to do what it takes to compete in the secular SMP (short of having sex) and then whitewashing it by placing it under a higher purpose for serving and glorifying God?

Christian ladies get the Tingles when he sings Holy, Holy, Holy! At least, that's how it's supposed to work according to our current model of Christian Attraction.

> "…and it's natural that those things are also attractive (given God created purpose and attraction both and they synergize when you do the right thing)."

Here, DS is assuming that godliness is attractive. I believe it is in some respects but yet rather unattractive in others. This is why the idea that godliness is attractive still remains a highly contested postulate in the Christian Manosphere.

> "If we reduce things that are "attractive" to be an effort in the flesh then we're essentially throwing out the baby with the bathwater."

DS should correct me if I'm wrong here, but I assume that "the baby" in the idiomatic analogy is either sanctification or the sexual pleasures of the flesh. Or maybe he's assuming that both of these are inseparably concomitant according to either a sex-centric reckoning or the Biblical ideal. Earlier, DS said, "the things I recommend at least are not an effort in the flesh", intimating that he believes attraction is not merely of the flesh, which is what Juliana, Rowena, Elspeth and I have been pecking at. But here, DS is saying that the flesh is the most essential part.

Again, I can follow DS's main point that putting God first can yield other blessings along the way, but the details are not very clear about how this relates to attraction and intersexual dynamics.

Epilogue

The main vacuity in our understanding here, is that so far, the current Red Pill lore about attraction hasn't really established a compelling argument that attraction is anything other than the flesh. (The question of whether there is more to it than this is what I am investigating here.) That is to say, the Red Pill has given us an obscenely vivid understanding of the biological, carnal, and evo-psyche aspects of attraction, but we do not yet have a conceptual framework for the moral, metaphysical, and spiritual components of how attraction works. (I have identified certain elements, such as giving women attention, women's need for attention, bonding, Csíkszentmihályi Flow, desire, ego, feedback loops, headship authority, humility, incentives / motivation, sexual authority, and trust, but how these factors interact to produce attraction and sanctification is still unclear.)

If DS had offered a convincing argument that enhancing one's attractiveness is not an effort in the flesh, then Thedeti would have to agree to Juliana's earlier claim that there must be something more to attraction than merely nubile T&A (for men) and LAMPS (for women). But so far, DS hasn't, and Thedeti hasn't.

Gentlemen, we still have work to do.

Foreword

The Peaceful Wife has an inspiring blog post on Why the Church is the Bride of Christ (2021/9/12) which describes how the marriage ceremony mirrors Christ and his church. It is an interesting look at Hebrew marriage customs and what Christ said and did leading up to his death. There are very obvious parallels that all of Hebrew culture would have recognized.

The thing I find most remarkable about this article is the clear parallels with the Christ : Church :: Husband : Wife analogy.

I grew up in the church, but I didn't know about this hierarchy until Snapper mentioned it about 4 years ago. Since then, it's become a central concept in many of my writings. I've slowly seen the idea become more prevalent since then. I am happy to see that women are now beginning to pick up on this analogy.

Unfortunately, the author of The Peaceful Wife, April Cassady, has announced that she'll be closing her blog. So I'm taking the opportunity to repost this article in full for our future reference.

Introduction

Do you ever stop to wonder why the Bible calls the Church (those believers who belong to Him) the Bride of Christ?

It is fascinating, to me, to study Jewish marriage customs in Biblical times. Especially since God designed human marriage to be a reflection of the relationship between Jesus and His people.

These customs shed an incredible amount of light on what Jesus has done for us, what He is doing for us now, and what He will do for us in the future.

This is EXCITING stuff!!!

I'm going to share 12 parts of the ancient Jewish wedding customs and how they relate to those of us who belong to Jesus. (And all who choose to receive His gift of salvation which you can do right now if you don't know Him yet.)

1. The Father Chose the Bride for His Son

A young man's father would select a bride for his son in another village. Sometimes he went himself, other times his most trusted servant went as his representative as a matchmaker. But the groom's father had to approve of the choice of a bride.

Often, the marriage was arranged before the couple ever met.

For Believers in Christ – We Are Chosen by God

The Father chose us for Jesus.

Scripture

- "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws them," John 6:44
- "I have revealed Your name to those You have given Me out of the world. They were Yours; You gave them to Me, and they have kept Your word." John 17:6

2. The Groom Paid a Large Price for the Bride

Then the prospective groom visited the young woman's home to present his offering of a valuable "bride price" or "mohar." If the woman's father was impressed with the man's offer, he would allow his daughter to determine if she would consent or not.

The young man may give coins, jewels, clothes, camels, or other goods. Today, we think of an engagement ring.

The potential groom could pay more than the "going rate" for a bride price if he chose to. This showed the bride had great value and would be cherished supremely.

The "bride price," in Galilee, went to the bride to provide for her in case something happened to her beloved.

Pagan nations didn't value women/wives. A man could just take a woman and sleep with her and she became his wife. Many other cultures gave no rights to wives/women at all. There were no witnesses and not much permanence or sanctity about marriage.

Jesus Proposed Spiritual Marriage to Us

Jesus paid the greatest bride price ever – His very life. Then we each get to decide to accept Jesus' proposal or reject His gift and offer of eternal life with Him knowing we are "bought with a price."

If we accept His proposal, He will provide for us and we will go live with Him to know Him in full spiritual intimacy in the future.

If we reject His offer, there will be no covenant or provision from Him to us. We reject living with Him in heaven forever and choose separation from Him and His blessings.

Scripture

- "The reason the Father loves Me is that I lay down My life in order to take it up again. No one takes it from Me, but I lay it down of My own accord. I have authority to lay it down and authority to take it up again. This charge I have received from My Father." John 10:17-18
- "But God shows his love for us in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us." Rom. 5:8
- "In him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of his grace," Eph. 1:7

3. The Marriage Contract/Covenant

The couple signed a marriage contract (ketubah) where the groom agreed to provide financially for his bride-to-be and she was legally set free from her family (as her status changed) but she still lived there in her father's house until the second part of the wedding.

The groom also paid the entire bride price and would say, "It is finished." Or, "Paid in full."

The bride agreed to yield her life to the groom and disclose the contents of her dowry. She agreed to keep herself for him, alone. She wore a veil to signify to all other men that she was unavailable. And, still a virgin, she kept herself completely sexually pure, reserved for her husband-to-be.

A covenant was binding, permanent, and sealed in blood. It gave the bride rights, security, protection, and provision.

Jesus Paid the Bride Price and Initiated the Marriage Covenant with Us

Jesus paid the bride price for us and said, "It is finished!" on the cross right before He died. Then we yield our lives to the Lordship of Christ, coming under His protection, provision, love, and guidance. We give all we have to Him. We agree to worship Him alone. We don't cheat on Him spiritually with any other god or false religion.

God also provided a “ketubah” when He entered into the Old Covenant with Israel at Sinai after bringing them up out of Egypt where He detailed His provision and promises and their responsibilities.

They broke that covenant though He was faithful. So He created the New Covenant which is infinitely better through Jesus.

Scripture

- “When Jesus had received the sour wine, he said, “It is finished,” and he bowed his head and gave up his spirit.” John 19:30

4. The Cup of the Covenant

The prospective groom poured a cup of wine (a Kiddush or “the cup of joy”) for his chosen young woman. If she drank from the cup with him, it meant she accepted his proposal of marriage.

Then the groom drinks from the cup as well, and says, “You are now consecrated to me. I will not drink of this cup again until I drink it anew with you in my father’s house.”

The blessing over a cup of wine happens before the betrothal ceremony and before the full bride price is paid. It happens in the bride’s home and signals the beginning of a “sanctification period” of being “set apart”.

Once the bride price is paid, they were legally “betrothed” which meant, essentially, they were legally married. To break the covenant after this would require a divorce. This is what Joseph considered doing when he discovered that Mary was pregnant. Only the groom could divorce the bride. The bride had no recourse to divorce.

A second blessing over a cup of wine happens during stage two of the Jewish wedding, the nuptials at the groom’s father’s house.

The Lord’s Supper Is Symbolic of Jesus’ Proposal of Spiritual Marriage to Us

This is the symbolism of Jesus offering the cup during the Lord’s Supper before His sacrifice on the cross on our behalf. And, like a groom-to-be, He said He wouldn’t drink of the fruit of the vine again until He drinks the second cup of blessing with us at the wedding feast in His kingdom.

Thankfully, we don't have to worry about our Bridegroom being faithful. He is completely faithful, loving, kind, and good. Always doing what is best for us. So there is no need to think about us divorcing Him. And as long as we receive Him and enter into this covenant with Him by faith, we don't have to worry about Him abandoning us.

Scripture

- "The cup of blessing that we bless, is it not a participation in the blood of Christ? The bread that we break, is it not a participation in the body of Christ?" 1 Cor. 10:16
- "In the same way also he took the cup, after supper, saying, 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood. Do this, as often as you drink it, in remembrance of me.'" 1 Cor. 11:25
- Now as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and after blessing it broke it and gave it to the disciples, and said, "Take, eat; this is my body." And he took a cup, and when he had given thanks he gave it to them, saying, "Drink of it, all of you, for this is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many for the forgiveness of sins. I tell you I will not drink again of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom." Matt. 26:26-29

5. The Symbol of Baptism

The bride and groom were each immersed in "living waters," called a mikvah, as a ritual cleansing for purification and a sign that she was a new creation and her past was washed away during the betrothal period.

Jesus and His Bride Are Also Baptized

Jesus was baptized by John the Baptist when He was 30 in the Jordan River.

We are baptized with water after we accept Jesus' proposal (to symbolize our death to sin and this world, our new spiritual birth, and our new cleansed and holy life) and, most importantly, we are baptized with the Holy Spirit.

Scripture

- "And Peter said to them, 'Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins, and you will receive the gift of the Holy Spirit.'" Acts 2:38
- "We were buried therefore with him by baptism into death, in order that, just as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, we too might walk in newness of life." Rom. 6:4

6. The Groom Leaves to Prepare a Place for His Bride

The couple has the following conversation:

Groom: "I have to go. I'm going to prepare a bridal chamber for you at my father's house."

Bride: "Don't go."

Groom: "It is better for you that I go, but I will come back."

Bride: "When?"

Groom: "I do not know, nor the servant, only my father knows the day."

Jesus and the Language of a Bridegroom

Jesus spoke with his disciples and had this same conversation in the language of a bridegroom to his beloved bride.

Scripture

- "In My Father's house are many rooms. If it were not so, would I have told you that I am going there to prepare a place for you? And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come back and welcome you into My presence, so that you also may be where I am." John 14:2-3
- "But very truly I tell you, it is for your good that I am going away. Unless I go away, the Advocate will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you." John 16:7

7. The Betrothal Period

This period means "sanctified" or "set apart." The bride was set apart for her groom and no longer available to other men. The groom would say, "You are consecrated to me."

The groom would give a gift to his bride-to-be to show his love for her and to help her remember him during the time of separation.

The betrothal generally lasted 1-2 years during which time the bride and groom wouldn't see each other. They were both busy getting ready for the marriage.

This period had to last at least nine months to ensure the bride was not already pregnant and to try to verify her sexual purity.

The Groom's Responsibilities

The groom's responsibility was to prepare a bridal chamber for the honeymoon at his father's house and prepare a home for them to live in afterward. The bridal chamber had to be better than the bride's family home where she had previously lived.

Sometimes the groom would leave a chaperone to look after the bride and help her get ready for marriage.

The groom also promised to provide for his bride financially while she still lived with her father.

The Bride's Responsibilities

Meanwhile, the bride prepared her things to leave and kept herself pure for her husband-to-be. She also set herself apart from any relationship or thing that could cause any problems for her marriage covenant and made things right with her family members, preparing to say goodbye.

Another huge task for the bride during this time was to make her wedding garments painstakingly by hand. This would take many countless hours.

She focuses on living for her marriage covenant and preparing to be a good wife, devoting herself to her beloved and dreaming of their future life together.

Jesus' Responsibilities

Jesus is now preparing a place for us in heaven at His Father's house. He is also providing for our needs while we are still here on earth. And He gave us the Holy Spirit as our chaperone and seal of His promise and covenant with us.

Our Responsibilities

We are preparing our hearts for Jesus and setting ourselves apart for Jesus in our current betrothal period. As a gift for us, Jesus gave the Holy Spirit as a gift and chaperone.

During this time, we reveal our purity of faith and heart as we are tested by this separation. There is time for the fruit of our lives to develop.

And we will be clothed in "fine linen" which is our righteous acts. So right now, we are busy setting ourselves apart for Jesus, doing good deeds to wear as our wedding clothes, and preparing for our new home with Jesus.

Scripture

- "It was granted her to clothe herself with fine linen, bright and pure — for the fine linen is the righteous deeds of the saints." Rev. 19:8
- "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus for good works, which God prepared beforehand, that we should walk in them." Eph. 2:10

8. The Uncertain Waiting Period

The bride knew that her groom would come back in about a year or two but didn't know what day or hour he would return. He could come a bit sooner than a year or any time after that. So she had to keep her lamp burning and be ready at any time.

Note: The man could divorce the woman during this time if the woman was found to be unfaithful.

We Must Always Be Ready

Jesus told us to be ready at any time for His imminent surprise return. He has also promises us that He will never leave us or forsake us. Nothing can separate us from His love (Romans 8:35-39).

Scripture

- "But concerning that day and hour no one knows, not even the angels of heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only." Matt. 24:26
- "Watch therefore, for you know neither the day nor the hour." Matt. 25:13
- "You also must be ready, for the Son of Man is coming at an hour you do not expect." Luke 12:40

9. The Snatching Away or Catching Up of the Bride at Night

Only the father had the authority to decide when the bridal chamber was ready and then he would tell his son to go get his bride.

The groom and his friends would go to the bride's village and one friend would go on ahead and shout, "Behold, the bridegroom comes!" and blast a trumpet to alert the bride and her entourage that the bridegroom was coming to get her. This often happened around midnight.

You can read a bit about this practice in the parable of the 10 virgins in Matthew 25:1-13.

- "At midnight the cry rang out: 'Here's the bridegroom! Come out to meet him!'" Matt. 25:6

The groom's friends would go into the bride's house and "snatch away" the bride, lifting her up onto an aperion they held on their shoulders with poles.

They carried her to the groom's home for the consummation of the marriage or the "elevation."

The Rapture of the Church as the Bride of Christ

This, of course, perfectly pictures the rapture (or the "catching up" of the Bride of Christ from her home on earth at "the midnight cry" when "the last trump sounds" at a time she is not expecting. She will be carried from earth to be with Jesus at His Father's house in the place He has prepared.

Scripture

- "For the Lord himself will descend from heaven with a cry of command, with the voice of an archangel, and with the sound of the trumpet of God. And the dead in Christ will rise first. Then we who are alive, who are left, will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air, and so we will always be with the Lord." 1 Thess. 4:16-17

10. The Seven Days Hidden Away at the Father's House

The couple stayed hidden together in the bridal chamber for a honeymoon for 7 days and consummated the union. This was also called, "The Week of the Bride."

The 7-Year Tribulation Period on Earth with the Church in Heaven

The Bride of Christ will be hidden with Jesus in heaven, His Father's house, for the 7-year period, the "70th week of Daniel which is the "time of Jacob's trouble" on earth. During that time, we will become one with Him spiritually.

Scripture

- "He (the Antichrist in the 70th week of Daniel) will confirm a covenant with many for one 'seven.' In the middle of the 'seven' he will put an end to sacrifice and offering. And at the temple he will set up an abomination that causes desolation, until the end that is decreed is poured out on him." Dan. 9:27
- "Since you (the church) have kept my command to endure patiently, I will also keep you from the hour of trial (the Tribulation) that is going to come on the whole world to test the inhabitants of the earth." Rev. 3:10

11. The Public Marriage Feast

Then they appeared publicly together as man and wife (with her unveiled) to celebrate with friends and family and partake in a great feast where they share the second cup of wine and blessing together. Their marriage covenant is sealed forever.

The Marriage Feast of the Lamb

Jesus will publicly appear before the world with His bride at the Second Coming of Christ. He comes on a white horse in the clouds and defeats the armies of the Antichrist that come against Israel in the valley of Megiddo (or Armageddon). At that time, He will set up His glorious kingdom on earth and reign for 1000 years with His bride.

This is what the Jews were expecting the first time He came because the prophecies about the first and second coming were together in the Old Testament. They mostly just noticed the great king part. Not the suffering servant part.

They wanted a great military conqueror and king who would save them from Rome and who would be an earthly ruler. That is not what Jesus came to do the first time. The first visit was for paying the bride price. The second time He comes as the Conquering King when Israel finally recognizes Jesus as their long awaited Messiah and King.

Armageddon on Earth

- "For they are demonic spirits, performing signs, who go abroad to the kings of the whole world, to assemble them for battle on the great day of God the Almighty. And they assembled them at the place that in Hebrew is called Armageddon." Rev. 16:14,16
- "Let the nations stir themselves up and come up to the Valley of Jehoshaphat (Megiddo); for there I will sit to judge all the surrounding nations. Put in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe. Go in, tread, for the winepress is full. The vats overflow, for their evil is great. Multitudes, multitudes, in the valley of decision! For the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision." Joel 3:12-13
- "They will make war on the Lamb, and the Lamb will conquer them, for he is Lord of lords and King of kings, and those with him are called and chosen and faithful." Rev. 17:14

- And I saw the beast (Antichrist) and the kings of the earth with their armies gathered to make war against him who was sitting on the horse and against his army. And the beast was captured, and with it the false prophet who in its presence had done the signs by which he deceived those who had received the mark of the beast and those who worshiped its image. These two were thrown alive into the lake of fire that burns with sulfur. And the rest were slain by the sword that came from the mouth of him who was sitting on the horse," Rev. 19:19-21

The Millennial Kingdom on Earth

- "Then the seventh angel blew his trumpet, and there were loud voices in heaven, saying, 'The kingdom of the world has become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever.'" Rev. 11:15
- "And the angel said to me, 'Write this: Blessed are those who are invited to the marriage supper of the Lamb.' And he said to me, 'These are the true words of God.'" Rev. 19:9
- "Then I saw thrones, and seated on them were those to whom the authority to judge was committed. Also I saw the souls of those who had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus and for the word of God, and those who had not worshiped the beast or its image and had not received its mark on their foreheads or their hands. They came to life and reigned with Christ for a thousand years." Rev. 20:4

12. A New Forever Home

After the great celebration, the groom takes his bride to the new home he has prepared for her and they live there together.

Jesus Gives His Bride a Forever Home

After the Millennial Reign and one more battle with Satan and rebellious people, The Lord will reveal the new heavens and the new earth. The new Jerusalem will descend looking like a bride ready for her husband.

Then God will wipe away every tear from their eyes and make all things new.

Jesus removes all the old things and replaces them with something much more spectacular as our forever home with Him.

Scripture

- "For behold, I create new heavens and a new earth, and the former things shall not be remembered or come into mind." Isa. 65:17
- "And I saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband." Rev. 21:2
- "And I heard a loud voice from the throne saying, "Behold, the dwelling place of God is with man. He will dwell with them, and they will be his people, and God himself will be with them as their God." Rev. 21:3

Rowena Breaks down Female Attraction

Jack · 31 August 2022 · Archived copy · Original

Is Attraction strictly a binary function?

Readership: All; Christians
Theme: Perspectives on the Topic of Attraction
Length: 3,700 words
Reading Time: 20 minutes

Foreword

My post On Curating a Christian Culture of Attraction (2022-8-18) received a lot of discussion about the nature of attraction. Two more posts spun off of the topic of attraction, so I've decided to have a mini-theme about these Perspectives on the Topic of Attraction.

Thedeti voiced a strong disagreement with the question, "Can sexual attraction be trained or taught?" He said that it cannot, under any circumstances, as it is dictated solely by biology and evolutionary-psychology.

Rowena wrote a long email to me on 2022-8-22 in response to Thedeti's statements. In her essay, she made a lot of important distinctions about things that only women would know about. I think it is important for men to know these things. So I have sorted through her ideas, made a few changes, and have presented them below. In fact, most of her ideas agree with what we already know from the Red Pill lore, but the viewpoint comes from a different perspective.

The value of having Rowena's feedback is that women are extremely skilled in hiding their feelings of attraction, and so it may not be easily observed. Secondly, only women would know whether certain things related to their own feelings of attraction are true or not, so we have to trust their word to some extent. The problem in obtaining such a confirmation is in finding an articulate, honest, self-aware, and trustworthy woman.

There are a few reasons why I believe we can trust Rowena's general assessments of women.

- Rowena is an older married Christian woman with children (not a younger woman who is obsessed with her social status and sexual competition).
- She has no personal interest in the outcome of our discussions except that we get it right.
- In her email, she stated that she hoped we could make progress in reestablishing patriarchy.
- Her track record of displaying respect to men. For example, in the beginning of her email, she wrote,

> "I wanted to respond to what Thedeti said, because I agree and disagree with him. Except your forum is not my place to disagree and it may come across as disrespectful. Also being a woman, I know I have the capacity to hamster and to be deceived (that is Biblical). I am aware of that and so I also want to take that into account. So, I respectfully present a few of my observations and if there is truth in them – you can perhaps sort the wheat from the chaff."

I really appreciate the way she wrote to me privately to voice her objections to Thedeti's points. This shows honor and respect to Thedeti as a man, and trust and respect for my authority as a Christian writer and blog host. Her faith does not go unnoticed. I wish more women had this kind of habit.

When Rowena says that she agrees or disagrees with a statement, men should be careful not to interpret this as a logical argument, but rather a confirmation of its truth according to the female experience.

A Trifurcated Hierarchy of Attraction

Rowena described a hierarchy of attraction that is different from the strict bifurcation of the "have's" and "have not's" that we are familiar with. In her model, there are "have's", "have not's", and "depends on maybe's" which roughly corresponds to our SMV conventions.

Thus, statements like the following are not easily answered.

- "Women are either turned on or off sexually."
- "A man can do nothing to turn the needle."
- "Sexual attraction is either there or it is not"

Such statements appear too vague, childishly simplistic, and overly reductionist to the female mind. Furthermore, women conclude that the reason why men have such a simplistic view of "attraction" is because it is based solely on whether the interaction "pays off" in terms of male interests (i.e. ego, self-esteem, sex, etc.). For example, men do not care if they can attract a woman who is grossly unattractive to them. They would consider this an annoyance, not the attraction that it truly is. True, women are the same way, but neither men nor women think this far. For this reason, women are very careful not to allow men any "pay offs" unless it is clearly beneficial to her own interests. Women who do so are considered by other women to have loose boundaries or no self-esteem, casually described as being "easy", "flighty", "flirty", "stupid", "loose", "ungrounded", or "vulnerable", which is the diametric opposite of the widely celebrated Strong Independent Woman™. Men are much more generous in this regard, and often let women take advantage of them.

Putting Rowena's model into an easily digestible bon mot, these three categories of men are summed up as follows.

SMV = 8-10 "The Have's"

Only 8-10's (men very high in good looks and athletic ability – a part of LAMPS) can elicit the raw visceral sexual attraction that Scott and Thedeti are referring to.

For 8-10's, the Tingle button is permanently ON. These men are ALWAYS sexually attractive to women. And to practically ALL women. Even though they may not show it, respond to it, or express interest (because that would be a pay off.)

In this case, Rowena and Thedeti AGREE.

SMV = 5-7 "It depends on maybe's"

There is no sexual attraction but there is no sexual repulsion either. However, sexual attraction or sexual repulsion can be generated if the context changes.

So in this case, Rowena and Thedeti DISAGREE.

For men in the 5-7 category, the question is how to change and/or control the context. The contextual factors of attraction will be covered in the next section.

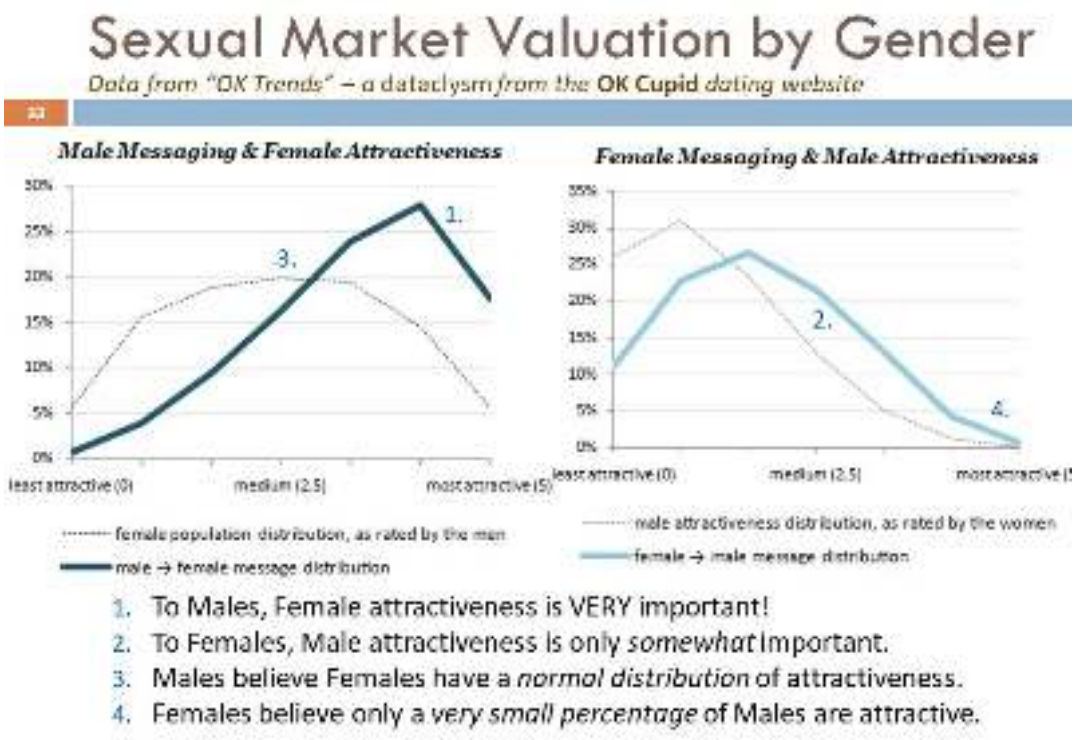
SMV ≤ 4 "The Have Not's"

For men below 5, the Tingle button is permanently OFF. This includes the morbidly obese, profoundly ugly, etc. These men are sexually REPULSIVE. This is not the zone of a lack of sexual attraction, it is the zone of sexual REPULSION, meaning, "No way will I ever let this person touch me!" Nothing can change this.

This is the same for BOTH men and women (some men might have a lower threshold for casual sex), however men and women respond differently to it. Men joke about it amongst themselves, but women have absolutely no sense of humor in this area. So women are much more volatile and dramatic about their repulsion than men are. In fact, this repulsion is so strong that younger women can be very rude in expressing this repulsion and quite nasty in avoiding such men, even going to excessive lengths to avoid any social association with such men.

So, Rowena and Thedeti AGREE here too.

Rowena said most men and women fall in the 5-7 category. 8-10's are exceedingly rare, and below 5's are a very small category. I'll comment that this categorization doesn't agree with the data from OKCupid which indicates that women find the vast majority of men unattractive. But her views do agree with the OKCupid data indicating that women show a large amount of interest in the men in the middle. Make of this what you will.



Contextual Factors of Attraction

There are many fundamental differences between men and women.

In general, Men are aroused by the sight of a feminine figure. Women are also aroused by the sight of a handsome man. The difference here is that men are turned on by looking at nearly any woman who is above average, whereas women are only turned on by a man's appearance when he is tall, lean, well built, and very fit, which is a very small segment of men.

For men, sexual attraction is almost entirely created by a woman's youth, physical proportions, and beauty. But for a woman, sex is not ONLY about physical attraction. There are other considerations that go through a woman's mind.

- Sex is about submission to a man. Essentially, when a woman gives her body to a man, she is submitting to him.
- Sex involves emotional vulnerability. Can she open up her heart and body and be herself without feeling ashamed or being rejected by him for it?
- Sex is bonding with a man. The woman tunes into the man's thinking and world view. They share feelings and emotions. They have synchronicities (e.g. saying the same thing at the same time). Women often describe this as "oneness". This extends past the bedroom into everyday life, and it can be addictive if it feeds her emotional needs. OTOH, Men get addicted to the sex, however, the Manosphere has picked up on the important aspect of bonding.
- Sex is an identification with a man. When a woman has sex with a man, she identifies herself as his, emotionally, physically, sexually, and (with the exception of one night stands) socially too. This is how God created sex to be. However, Women these days don't like the idea of "belonging" to a man, so the way women usually express this phenomenon is by recasting it in terms of her ownership of him. "He is MINE!" "I got a new man!" and so on. This identification is not just psychological, it also includes the spiritual constitution of a woman, hence the Alpha Widow syndrome.
- Biblically, sex was designed to be a ratification of the marriage covenant in which the woman submits to a man's Headship covering. Women who engage in sex but reject being submissive to the Headship covering lose all the blessings and benefits of that covering (and create lots of headaches and sleepless nights for the man as well). This is a vital spiritual aspect of sex that Christian women are (or should be) aware of that our modern culture entirely ignores.

Rowena said Thedeti is mistaken in assuming this submission will happen ONLY if there is raw visceral sexual attraction. The truth is that many women will refuse sex with their husbands because there is a confounding problem with one of the above factors. But Thedeti is right in that if a man is exceedingly good looking, a woman will hamsterize and justify any of these other problems in order to be his sexual plaything.

7 Contextual Vectors of Attraction

As mentioned before, Men are aroused by the sight of a young feminine figure, clear complexion, full round breasts, long hair, slim tummy, WHR < 0.7, etc. For women, a man's health, fitness, and strength are also arousing, but there are other factors that come into play. Some of these overlap with LAMPS and are described as follows.

1. MONEY / POWER

A wealthy powerful man has the capacity to make a woman want to submit to him. (And I am not talking about r@pe.) Money and raw power can generate sexual attraction where none exists. This is assuming the man is in the 5-7 category. If he is below 5 – he is sexually repulsive – any woman who sleeps with a man below 5 is hamstering a justification to sleep with him. But not so with a 5-7 man.

Let me give some examples.

Example 1 – Bill Gates

If Bill Gates was a guy you met in a bar – he would not generate any sexual attraction but he would not be sexually repulsive either. He is in the 5-7 category. A woman might peg him as a regular guy. Not attractive. Not repulsive.

Thedeti would say, "This man has no chance!"

But change the CONTEXT. BILL GATES – the billionaire walks into a bar; she recognises him as BILL GATES. He walks up to her and looks deep into her eyes. And says – Hi. I guarantee you – that woman will 'tingle'. She is not hamstering her way into it. She is genuinely sexually attracted.

SAME GUY – DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

The MONEY, STATUS and POWER generates the tingles!

Example 2 – Donald Trump

Let's consider the older version of Donald Trump. If you meet him as a regular guy – you will look at him as Grandpa. But if the multibillionaire PRESIDENT OF THE USA walks up to you and said, "Hi!"… Well, some tingles would be generated – even if you hated the man. It is the POWER of his position.

SAME GUY – DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

Example 3 – An underworld criminal / don / thug

There are many guys in the 5- 7 in looks category who would never receive sexualized attention from women, but the DANGER in what they do changes the context.

Meet them in a regular situation – woman will not look at them. She is not repulsed. He just does not interest her. She will swipe left so to speak. But she finds out what he does – or she sees him hit someone – suddenly tingles will happen.

SAME GUY – DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

Example 4 – A Serviceman

By serviceman, I'm referring to a firefighter, military, navy seal, policeman… basically anyone in a uniform.

Girl meets him in regular clothes – if he is a 5-7, she will not take a second look.

But when she sees him in uniform – tingles will happen.

SAME GUY – DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

What is common in all these examples is POWER – these men symbolise POWER – through their jobs; the authority they hold.

A woman is NOT hamstering when she sleeps with this man. She is GENUINELY sexually attracted to him.

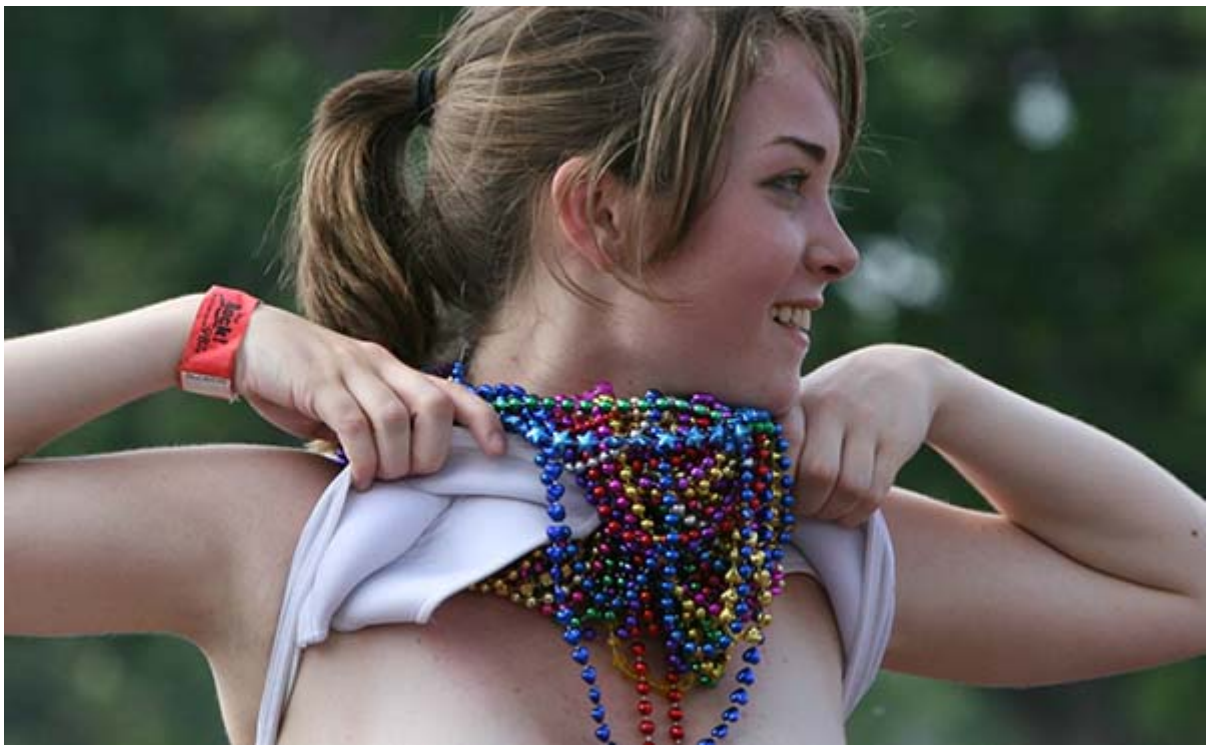
2. STATUS / FAME / REPUTATION

Fame and reputation often ties into the status, money, and power angle.

Actors, CEO's, politicians, sports stars, TV personalities, etc. fall into this category, but the most noteworthy example of this is ROCK STARS.

Look at men like Mick Jagger, Michael Jackson, or Steve Tyler. These men are not objectively good looking – they're not tall, no lantern jaw, and stuff. If you were to meet these men in a bar, they would NOT generate automatic visceral sexual attraction.

But put these men on stage in a rock concert and the context changes. When she sees them play music and sees his musical talent, she recognizes the larger than life image of the man. He is now Steve Tyler from AEROSMITH. He is "THE" MICHAEL JACKSON – the ONE who can dance, do the moonwalk, etc. He is the one everyone imitates with sequined gloves and so on. Now, turn and look at the women in the crowd. They're twerking and flashing their breasts.



Do you really believe these women are going to be hamstering themselves into having sex with these men if asked? Nope! There is ACTUAL and GENUINE sexual attraction that has been AROUSED.

And yet, if any of these women met men like this in a bar — just as REGULAR men — how much visceral sexual attraction do you think they would generate?

SAME MAN. DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

3. ATHLETICISM / MUSCLES

Regular 5-7 man with a Dad bod goes to church. No woman gives him a second glance. He starts working out, loses weight, and starts wearing T-shirts that show his muscles. Suddenly women are feeling up his biceps at the church BBQ.

SAME GUY DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

4. LEADERSHIP

A 5-7 man can stand out from the crowd by being competent, decisive, displaying confidence, conversational skills, having useful knowledge, using practical skills, taking up a martial art, etc. He can also look the part by dressing smart, maintaining good posture, and making eye contact. All these can be learned or trained. These things may or may not create attraction, however, such a man will have a distinctive presence and find it easier to become a leader in his small group at church or in his office. If he is assertive then suddenly women start checking him out.

SAME GUY DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

5. EMOTIONS

Women are emotional. If you can change her emotions – you can generate sexual attraction.

The following are controversial examples.

Example 1 – FEAR

Stockholm syndrome – These women end up sleeping with their captors. A large part of this is the power dynamic. But there is also an element of fear.

Same if she goes on a date which includes some kind of risk or shock.

- Risk: Motorcycling, rock climbing, roller coasters, white water kayaking or rafting, etc.
- Shock: Horror movies, losing her keys, spilling a drink on herself, surprises, if the man is hit on by other women,* etc.

All of these tap into her fear. The FEAR induces humility, which sparks the chemistry of love. The FEAR triggers sexual arousal.

* Dread Game can also generate attraction because it invokes the fear of losing someone. When a woman sees her husband flirting with another woman, she might get angry about this, but it can also make her want to go home and do him.

SAME GUY, DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

Example 2 – GAME

Keeping ethical considerations aside – the manipulation part – not going into whether you should game or not, but on the effect of game on a woman.

The tricks and techniques that the PUA's advocate do have some results. At the core of it is you are manipulating emotions.

People either feel Game works or it does not. A huge part of its effectiveness lies in the charisma of the man, and whether his particular brand of charisma comes across as charming to a certain woman. If the woman can easily tune in to a man's charisma, then she will naturally want to submit to him if only to bask in the exciting warmth of his presence. Imposing Frame tends to reinforce this attraction.

However, it does NOT work if the man is below 5 – that man is sexually REPULSIVE
But if he is a 5-7 it CAN work – because you manipulate the woman's EMOTIONS
She is not hamstering when she sleeps with him. There is genuine sexual attraction where none existed before.

Regularly, when she meets a 5-7, she will not feel anything. But change the CONTEXT – Fear, Dread, Shock, Charisma, Frame, even Flattery – "I am gay but I am starting to feel things for you. Could you help me out?" – Yep! There are women that would fall for a line like that and would sleep with that guy. Not by hamstering but because she is genuinely sexually aroused by what he said.

SAME GUY, DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

6. HORMONES

At certain times of the month, if she's ovulating or if she wants to have a baby, Oh Yeah! Suddenly 8-10 men become practically irresistible, and 5-7 guys become VERY sexually attractive. If he is below 5, sex might happen but with definite hamstering. The rest of the month it will go back to a lack of interest.

But yes, for a 5-7 guy there is actual genuine sexual arousal.

SAME GUY, DIFFERENT CONTEXT!

Unfortunately, thanks to hormonal birth control and all the drugs women take these days, this part is totally messed up.

7. PHYSICAL TOUCH ON A VIRGIN / MARRIAGE

While a woman can be visually attracted to a man, men waaay underestimate the TOUCH of a man on a virgin. When a husband imprints his TOUCH on a virgin – it is her FIRST introduction to sex. It AWAKENS something in her that explodes.

Once a woman has her first sexual experience, the innocence of her virginity is gone, and she becomes sexually ACTIVATED. If a girl loses her virginity outside of marriage, she WILL become promiscuous. Unless she is RAPIDLY married off to him (which is what the Bible advocates). Or she regularly does it with the man she lost it with and then gets married to him. But if her first relationship ends, she will continue to be sexually active – just with another guy, and then another, and so on.

It was this SEXUAL AWAKENING that unleashes a woman's dormant libido that the early church fathers were referring to (in Sharkly's quote), in saying that women were lustful creatures. These church men had virginal wives. They knew how sleeping with their virgin wives pulled the pin on their sexual grenade. They KNEW what they were talking about. Most modern men don't even know this about women.

That is why the early church fathers and all patriarchal societies pursue the template of giving a girl in marriage when she is young and as a virgin. For this reason, for many women across cultures and ages, sexual TOUCH is associated with her HUSBAND. He is the first man who awakens that in her.

That is why women close their eyes when they kiss. It is why women have no problem making love in the dark. It is his TOUCH that stimulates her. Man is VISUAL – he needs to SEE her for it to happen. Not saying women are not visual, but it is secondary to TOUCH.

That is also why sexual abuse is devastating for a girl. A young girl – who has been sexually abused – has ZERO visceral sexual attraction to her predator – but his touch imprints on her. He awakens a desire that, in the normal course, only her husband would AWAKEN. And she goes crazy. That is universally why most sexually abused girls end up promiscuous. If you see an abused 12-13-year-old girl sleeping with anything that moves, she is not viscerally sexually attracted to the men she is sleeping with. She is RESPONDING to what the predator awakened in her and acting out those desires.

Summary

We know that women are extremely skilled in hiding their arousal. But what few men know is that…

1. A virgin's first time having sex is a sexual AWAKENING.
2. Women who are not virgins are sexually ACTIVATED.
3. Women who are NOT virgins and are NOT married are, by and large, promiscuous.

Non-virginal women are going to have sex, and it's just a question of CONTEXT. All women prefer the 8-10 man, but since these men are in very short supply, a 5-7 man will do her just fine — IF the CONTEXT hits her right.

The Christian context for sexual awakening and arousal is marriage. When marriage is postponed until after a woman's first sexual awakening, and if marriage is not seized immediately, then the natural result is promiscuity followed by a deferred and debased marriage.

Women's Attraction to Men Sans Context

- 8-10's will ALWAYS generate raw visceral sexual attraction.
- 5-7 – GREY AREA – NEUTRAL – NOT sexually attractive but the KEY here is NOT sexually REPULSIVE either.
- Below 5's – Sexually REPULSIVE (they first have to get to a 5 – bariatric surgery perhaps!!!)

Women's Attraction to Men having one or more of the above Contextual Vectors of Attraction

- 8-10's – She will DEFINITELY sleep with him and DEFINITELY marry him.
- 5-7 – GOOD chance of sleeping with him at the moment when genuine sexual attraction has been AROUSED. She MAY marry him.
- If he is below 5 – Sex is out of the question. She MAY marry him, but expect a dead bedroom and/or hamstering to sleep with him.

Rowena said Thedeti is mistaken in assuming “lack of sexual attraction” = “sexually repulsive”.

Rowena disagrees with Thedeti in the 5-7 category because the CONTEXT matters and sexual attraction can be generated. She says women are NOT hamstering when they sleep with a 5-7 man under certain conditions. There is genuine sexual attraction which has been generated by the CONTEXT.

Overview

This mini-series on Perspectives on the Topic of Attraction has gone over schedule and into September. There is much more to discuss on this topic, but I'll have to wrap things up in this post. In the last quarter of the year, I will come back to several noteworthy ideas and points that were raised.

On a side note, I've noticed that since I/we spun off on the topic of Attraction, this has become a hot topic around the secular Manosphere and especially the secular Femosphere. Not sure if I/we inspired this or if it's merely a coincidence.

Looking back at the posts and the comments, there were 2 separate topics that came up, and these two topics were then conflated to form a third topic.

Topic 1 – How can a community foster the formation of healthy, sanctified marriages?

Jack's earlier posts on this topic emerged from his theme on Masculine Authority and Responsibility.

- Σ Frame (Jack) On Curating a Christian Culture of Attraction (2022/8/18)
- Σ Frame (Jack) On Clarifying a Christian Culture of Attraction (2022/8/24)

Topic 2 – Attraction / Sexual Attraction / Sexual Arousal

Some readers picked up Jack's verbiage about "guiding attraction" in the first topic and ran with it. The main argument regurgitated the Classic Manospherian adage that sexual attraction is either there or it is not, and nothing can be done to change this. This reframe completely hijacked Jack's (poorly worded) point about guiding young people through the confusion created by sexual attraction and towards sanctification in marriage. Nevertheless, Jack observed that this older topic was still hot and rife with confusion, and adapted to it.

- In Objective and subjective attraction measures and what the Church can do about it (2022/8/18), Deep Strength briefly reiterated the basics of sexual attraction and advised churches to do what they can to help Christian men increase their SMV (i.e. PSALMS + Masculine Traits).
- Thedeti's post, The Delusion of the Good (2022/8/19) picked apart some lies that Christian men are wont to believe about attraction and why they are wrong.
- Catacomb Resident's post, Desire versus Desire (2022/8/25) illustrated the divergent choice between pursuing either the desires of the flesh or the desire for holiness and sanctification.
- Rowena's Breakdown of Female Attraction (2022/8/31) addressed the topic of whether or not attraction can be created, increased, or decreased for men in the 5-7 SMV bracket, and how, such as by changing the context.
- Deep Strength wrote a post comparing The differences between sexual attraction and sexual arousal (2022/9/1) with the aim of sorting out the differences between deti's and Rowena's perspectives.

Topic 3 – Is a blindingly intense sexual attraction absolutely necessary to have a healthy sex life and/or a sanctified marriage?

- Thedeti, et al. have a large number of comments arguing "YES!" to have a healthy sex life.
- Derek, Elspeth, Rowena, et al. have argued "NO" to have a sanctified marriage.
- Deep Strength's post, Biblical Christianity is both good and attractive while Western Christianity is not (2022/8/19) pointed out the problems of trying to implement a Biblical model of marriage within a Feminized churchian culture.
- Jack's post, Only Hunky Monks can find a Sanctified Marriage (2022/8/26) elucidated the fundamental impossibility of requiring a plurality of men to become exceptional in order to achieve a good marriage.
- Deep Strength filled in some gaps in his post at Christianity and Masculinity: What sexual attraction does and does not do (2022/8/28).

Summary

There is a general consensus that it is very difficult to have a good marriage in today's context. Thedeti has insisted that a lack of sexual attraction is the primary reason for this. But Rowena and others have said the reason is not lack of visceral sexual attraction, but is because today the whole focus of the marital relationship is on desires, feelings, and visceral sexual attraction (or the lack of these things), and NOT on the duties and responsibilities of marriage. Especially from women.

Topic 3 – "YES!"

In his comments, Thedeti assumes that raw visceral sexual attraction is absolutely necessary to have a successful marriage. Basically, this argument plays off Σ Frame Axioms 7 and 32 (see footnotes below), with the assumption that Sex = Marriage. Thus, wives who lack sexual attraction to their husbands will drag their non-curling toes in the bedroom, and this eventually erodes the quality and sanctification of the marriage.

This conflates Topics 1 and 2, and this is what has created the disagreement that spilled out in Topic 3.

Topic 3 – "NO!"

The opposing opinion bases their argument on Σ Frame Maxims 13 and 34 (see footnotes). Thus, sanctification relies on both a husband and wife's adherence to Headship more than it does on sexual attraction. Just because a woman has strong visceral sexual attraction to a man — that does not mean she will not detonate. Examples for proof of this are given by Scott's first marriage and SFC Ton's marriage.

We could also consider Hollywood personalities to argue that sexual attraction is necessary but insufficient. Brad Pitt is a 10 just in looks. He's capable of generating raw visceral attraction. And yet! He has had 2 DIVORCES! In the case of second one — he lived with Angelina for more than 7 years — even had kids with her — all before he married her. All the raw visceral sexual attraction he generated was NOT enough. OTOH, Hollywood stars represent a highly nuanced context that may not apply for most readers.
