The proposed amendment would include new grounds for divorce under a situation of Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage by amending the Hindu Marriage Act and the Special Marriage Act. It is a property division law wherein: A wife can file a petition for Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage and, upon citing grave financial hardship, can have a share in the husbands property – self earned both pre and post marriage, inherited property and also inheritable property – duration of the marriage be damned. A husband can also file a petition for Irretrievable Breakdown of Marriage and part with his property – self acquired and ancestral. But the catch is that a husband cannot oppose a petition filed by a wife, which defies any logic or common sense. Feminists have been supporting this law vehemently which has given rise to higher divorce rates, increased spousal murders, and decreases in the number of marriages wherever it has been introduced in the world. More details can be found on www.rollbackirbm.in Does such a law fit with the vision that the lawmakers had when they drafted the Hindu Code Bill?
About the half-truths: Flavia believes there has been a mockery of justice and abuse of laws at the hands of the judges of India who operate within an anti-woman ethos. She cited a few judgements which, according to her, were anti-women. One thing of note was that almost all of her lecture focused only on the rights of the wife. There have been innumerable women – mothers and sisters – implicated in false dowry harassment cases with one arrest being recorded every 3 minutes, but this problem was not visited at all.
As far as the approach of the judiciary is concerned, if the judiciary in India was really anti-woman, then:

- It would not have awarded child custody to mothers in 98% of the cases.
- It would not have had asked men to pay maintenance to their adulterous wives
- It would not have asked men to beg, borrow or steal to pay maintenance to their parasitic wives,

Heck no! It would not have entertained allowing a man sell his kidney to pay maintenance. Unfortunately for the feminists, all these have happened and numerous other judgements favouring women occur far more regularly.
Finally, it was time for the much hoped for Q&A session. A few members of the audience had raised hands and the presiding chairperson initially disallowed any queries but, looking at the large demand from the audience, decided to ask Flavia before closing the session if she was able to take some questions. Flavia refused! Was it fear? Was it living in denial? Was it guilt? Or was it a false sense of superiority?
Almost forty of the sixty audience members swiftly moved to the dais to interact with her. Flavia was obviously overwhelmed by the questions directed at her before being hurriedly escorted out of the building. Some queries might have questioned her beliefs, some she might have dismissed in a state of denial, but one thing was sure; there were no answers for the people who were fishing.

Attending a Male Feminist Forum

AVfM Video Source · 16 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We agree with and endorse Nick's plan to peacefully and nondisruptively attend this forum, and urge others who attend to comport themselves the same.

Institutional sexism and glass ceiling, huh?

Clint Carpentier · 17 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I just got off work, cracked myself a beer and – in a brain-dead haze – looked at the six articles I've been puttering on after dragging my ass home. Most of them scare the piss outta me, but not because they may be over-the-top, taboo, complete failures, or even that I may get my share of backlash for daring to consider such concepts. The problem is that, when I'm not already mentally and physically exhausted, the very real ramifications of what I'm typing tends to trigger my OCD and then my conspiracy theorist boner twangs, sending me into a state of terrified shock as my mind reels with the absurdity that people can't actually see the blatant truth all around them.

Do I really gotta point it out and describe the problems to them? REALLY??? Given that people still drink and drive, and/or use dangerous recreational drugs, I really shouldn't be surprised but, come on humanity, throw me a bone of hope before I water my beer down too much.

My fantasy girlfriend sent me a private message not long ago, eagerly looking forward to my next violating mind-rape of what I consider to be "common sense" (If sense were common, we'd all be wise; sadly, we are not). I tried desperately to cry on her textual shoulder and make sad pitiful excuses with no apologies, all the while making a long-winded assault on her saintly gynotegrity. Unfortunately, the recent changes to the forum caused the mailbox to repeatedly eat my response to her. (It's a plot I tell you! A well thought out plan; damn it patriarchy, where are you when I really need you?) So, for the time being, she's still safe from the ravages of my evil patriarchal harassing texts. So I had to do the next best thing: sob into the wife's ample bosom, until they suffocated me and I passed out, waking up on the floor where she had eventually pushed me off to let me crumple like wet spaghetti. I look forward to the quote-miner's brandishing this iron pyrite.

I finally got tired of staring blindly at my artful works of abject horror and flicked on the Youtube to delve into the ingenious works of AMV's (Animated Music Videos) people manage to put together. Hoping to draw a modicum of inspiration, possibly to gain the day's second wind before I step outside for a shot of cancer and mentally sketch out a battle plan for my next foray into my burgeoning world of article writing and to decide which one is more important, or maybe just which scares me the least, I'm not sure. What I am sure of is that I haven't thrown in the towel. While a timid mouse among giants of activism, I am bold enough to squeak… once in a while.

You must be wondering by now what any of this has to do with the title. The sad truth is; everything. I am not a Paul Elam, or a Karen Straughan, certainly not a Warren Farrell, or an Erin Pizzey, and you know what? I'm good with that. I have no one to blame but myself, and my reasons are my own, though I imagine most of the readers can draw up fairly accurate conclusions as to why I'm satisfied with a place of mediocrity within the "virtual" presence of the thoroughbred icons who have pointed out to me the foundation, when I was dumbly wondering why the house was so damned crooked.

So the title… institutional sexism, and the glass ceiling. Why are men at the top in everything?

While perusing the Youtube, I happened upon a video that encapsulates the answer of why some men dominate. They are lessons that girls typically never hear or, if they have heard it, they've ignored it because fixing their tear-streaked eyeliner was more important. They are lessons of self demand, to continue to push the envelope, to own your determination and your failures. My stepfather and I rarely ever got along, but he told me something about being the best at anything, "take responsibility for anything you do, the buck stops with you: RAMIFICATIONS MAN, look into the future of every move you make; when I work on that freight train, if I make a mistake, PEOPLE DIE! It's that simple." Likewise, when I was in sea cadets (a teenager's version of the navy), I learned another hard life lesson as I rose through the ranks, "your juniors are a reflection of you, they are an extension of you, when they do good, you get the glory; however, when they do poorly, they should never get the blame, you trained them, you lead them, you gave them orders, the buck stops with you, you screwed up, you take the heat, you don't pass blame, and you certainly don't publicly embarrass them, you figure out what went wrong and how to correct it, and then you make it happen."

> If you know what you're worth, go out and get what you're worth! But you gotta be willing to take the hits. And > not pointing fingers saying you ain't where you wanna be because of him, or because of her, or anybody! Cowards do that, and that ain't you! You're better than that!

Or, as Yoda would say, "Do… or do not. There is no try."
I know a guy, good guy, funny man; I refuse to play poker with him. As the story goes, he came from Vietnam with barely a nickle to his name and took up residence in a town on a major highway. He managed to con a few hotel owners into financing his acquisition of a struggling hotel, with the promise of paying them back by a set date; he had it paid off in half that time. Not satisfied with that, he built another hotel in my city, nicest hotel in the neighborhood, I know this, I've done some flooring in all the best ones we have, and he gave me the flooring contract for this one. Still not satisfied, he built another hotel in a neighboring city. Now he has plans to build another hotel in a city a few hours away, and is currently getting into the suburbia game, buying up property on the outskirts of my city. The man is on fire, and he ain't no young buck; he's got grown young ones filling in the wake of his path. He wasn't handed this destiny, he didn't get it through affirmative action, he didn't even inherit it; he saw an opportunity and he exploited it for all it was worth; at any point, his burgeoning empire could have crumbled, and it still can.
But on he goes.

Politics, Sexual Assault and the War on College Men

Jonah Moser · 17 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The war on college male students continues unabashedly with even the President getting in on the act recently by citing the feminist-inspired myth that "1 out of 5" women are victims of rape. Though a Department of Justice report shows a 10-year decline of sexual assault on college campuses, playing politics with the very serious issue of sexual assault appears to be gaining momentum. President Obama has appointed a task force called the the White House Task Force to Protect Students from Sexual Assault. We could easily write the script for what the recommendations that this task force will likely make.

So as a taxpayer, and to appease the rape hysteria feminist proponents, I have the following suggestions to the task force to help them ensure that men are expeditiously driven off college campuses:

1. All enrolled secondary and post-secondary students unfortunate to be born of the male sex should be required to wear a bright, striped uniform with a large decal sewn into their clothing to designate them as potential rapists, a similar program initiated during the 1930s by the German government against a class of people whose only crime was being born Jewish. We should be inspired by their bold action in combating that menace, and must be similarly bold in our action against men, sex fiends that they are.
2. Any male student accused of sexual assault or harassment should immediately have their due process rights suspended, be required to attend anti-male indoctrination training and be forced to stand in front of a specially-trained tribunal in which the outcome will be predisposed to a finding of guilt (because why would they be accused if they weren't guilty?). While this has already been accomplished in part through the passage of the SaVE Act, which was conveniently buried within the re-authorization of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), colleges would be well-served to stop pussyfooting around and get serious about really protecting students from the male population.
3. In order to justify the directing of millions of taxpayer dollars to grow the army of dedicated resources within the rape industry, we should direct the Department of Education to broaden and weaken the definition of what sexual assault (rape) and harassment constitute so as to ensure that a mere allegation would suffice in expelling a male student from campus. This weakened definition would then be used to inflate the number of "assaults" reported thereby justifying the need for additional resources.
4. When contemplating how best to destroy a young man by branding him as a rapist for the remainder of his life, we should lower the evidentiary standard used by a university disciplinary panel for adjudicating sexual assault cases from that of "beyond a reasonable doubt" (a 95% probability of guilt) to the lowest possible standard, "a preponderance of the evidence" (a 50.1% probability of guilt), essentially a coin flip. Several readers will catch on that idea has already been enacted by the DOE through the issuance of the 2011 Dear Colleague letter, but I think we can do better and make the rules even more explicit.
5. To drive home the message that these new protocols are required on college campuses, and borrowing heavily from this nation's past history of intolerance, discrimination and the denial of civil rights to a class of citizen, we should move well beyond merely destroying a man's life when an allegation of sexual assault is made and move directly to "participatory justice" by implementing public lynchings, which can be held in the middle of campus for all students, faculty and administrators to witness.

Do these sound extreme? They're clearly close to reality now. In all seriousness, given the culture of misandry and radical feminism pervading universities along with the kangaroo disciplinary courts that exist on college campuses today, I predict that there will be a tidal wave of lawsuits filed by falsely-accused and expelled male students that will flood our courts as universities continue to implement Draconian measures to appease "rape culture" fanaticism. We should certainly hope so, anyway.

The male body and the masculinity police – part II

Jason Gregory · 17 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We live in a culture where violence against men is prevalent, normalized, excused, and celebrated by the media and in popular culture. Laugh if you want, but the best humor is practically indistinguishable from tragedy. The best comedians understand suffering. The best jokes are lamentations.

We have multi-billion dollar "sports" industries (e.g., the NFL and UFC) that glorify this violence against men. Families gather on Sundays to celebrate this violence. Corporations make billions on the cultural normalization of this violence against men–making the male body the most culturally acceptable locus of violence. All the while, folks scream that "CONSENT" is freely given by the men being violated, failing to understand how these cultural norms influence consent, failing to understand that freedom itself is not the perpetuation of violence against men, failing to understand that consent does not change the underlying fact of violence committed against men. Freedom is not two men beating each other unconscious for entertainment or some false idea of sportsmanship and competition. If you believe such types of violence are freedom and sportsmanship, you have an impoverished sense of both and you are likely perpetuating a culture that glorifies violence against men.

We have a war machine that keeps turning – making billions more in profits off this exploitation, destruction, mutilation, and expendability of the male body. There is no end to it. It never stops because our culture demands it. We defend our freedom by consenting to violence against the male body. We are proud of our "heroes." We celebrate them. We love them for subjecting their bodies and the bodies of other men to violence.

If we learn to hate this violence against men and speak out against it, we are told to "shut the fuck up." If we learn that all war is anti-male because all war is violence against men, our masculinity is policed and threatened because we must be "weak bitches" to complain about male suffering. Even feminists who claim to be working on male issues mock such complaints about male suffering as "man feelz." Some of these feminists insist that male suffering is actually male privilege. Anything else is "assholery."

There is real "assholery": our prison systems. They are monstrosities of prison guard unions, corporations, legal institutions, and law enforcement agencies that are partially sustained by our war on drugs. It is a war that throws men into cages and commits violence against them for non-violent drug "crimes." Instead of rehabilitation, we punish these men with prison rape and other violence. Instead of recognizing our sick culture, we blame the drug addict for wanting to escape. As Krishnamurti said, "It is no measure of health to be well adjusted to a profoundly sick society." While the "right" wags their finger of shame and screams for harsher punishments and more violence against these men, the "left" wags their finger of shame and clamors about "rehabilitating" these men to a profoundly sick culture that demands their submission, failing to recognize that our culture may need more rehab than do these men. Culture may need rehabilitating because it fails to recognize that these men are not dominating and that such violence against them is not male privilege and neither is it a privileging of masculinity. Many are blind to this fact, and some even make the bizarre claim that the suffering of men somehow represents a devaluation of women.

Yes, in our sick culture of male submission, the suffering of men is caused by a society that doesn't value women. In fact, it is claimed, that violence against men is actually the oppression of women. That's what makes sense in our sick culture because the obvious truth is "assholery." If a man learns to say that men suffer violence because men are systematically devalued in our culture—that man speaks pure misogynistic truth.

Only in a profoundly sick culture would violence against men be interpreted primarily as the devaluation of women, rather than the obvious–the devaluation and oppression of men. Only in a profoundly sick culture would violence against men be seen as the overvaluing and privileging of men and masculinity.

Fuck that and all you folks who fail to recognize that the male body is the most culturally acceptable locus of violence. Violence against one man is a "degradation, terror, and limitation to all" men. Most men and boys limit their behavior because of the existence of potential violence against them. Most men and boys box their emotions away to create a front of stolidity, an avoidance of the crushing reality that our culture demands their submission, obedience, oppression, and acquiescence to a culture that doesn't value them, considers them cannon-fodder, expendable capital, human resources, objects-of-utility.

My dad is 76 years old. I had the "freedom" of watching him break into tears a few weeks ago as he recounted some of the horrors that he saw while in the Army. This is a man who never shed a tear or spoke a word about his suffering and the suffering of his Army buddies until he was no longer strong enough to "be a man." At 76, he's no longer strong enough to keep that shit boxed in. It was an emotional prison for him. There is nothing heroic about it. PTSD, survivor's guilt, and being used as human cannon-fodder is not and should not be celebrated as awesome heroics of willpower. It's a prison for men. It isn't male privilege and it isn't male domination. Such things are male submission. Such things are what my father did and experienced in submission to a culture that demanded it of him. Such things are what men do in submission to a culture that doesn't value them.

This is our culture. This is violence against men. It is prevalent, normalized, excused, celebrated, glamorized, and glorified. If you speak out against it, you will be subjected to further ridicule, shame, aggression, and oppression by the masculinity and language police. You will be accused of misappropriating words that are reserved for women because there is no such thing as violence against men. It's not a real thing. It's just plain old violence. Laugh if you want. It's funny how that works–how tragedy becomes comedy, how the best jokes are lamentations, how the suffering of men makes for the best punchlines.

VAM Don't Real

According to this feminist, The Patriarchy™ exists, but violence against men does not. There is no such thing as violence against men; that's just plain old violence. Any suggestion to the contrary and the language and masculinity police will threaten and accuse you of misappropriating words reserved for the privileged class—women.

Editor's note: feature image by Jessica Patterson

Damaged Women Stage Drunken 2 a.m. March On Washington

AVfM Video Source · 17 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When women march on Washington it's serious business. Seriously emotional business that is. Tired of being abandoned, negated, and ignored, the Damaged Women's Coalition knows when they are unhappy, so they want Capitol Hill to stop having their needs put second in the relationship all the time.
Reporters peel back the Onion layers of this complex matter and the result will make you cry… with laughter.

Note: Dr. T has a copy of that tear-soaked letter. Yes, this is an oldie but a goodie.

Just a Quick Note About Male Space

Paul Elam · 18 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following is part of a comment recently left on this website by one of the recent newbies that showed up to defend Nacho Vidal's honor after I did an article about his shutting down MGTOW Forums (which is miraculously back up, btw).

> Male spaces need to be male spaces, without "female allies" cuntsplaining to us what is "constructive" or "useful" dialogue.
> That just hijacks our independence and women end up dictating "our" agenda, like they already have for the last million years.

OK, to set everyone's mind at ease, I only mentioned Nacho because it was necessary to context. I am not going there again.

What I do want to talk about for a moment is the concept of "male space," which is a subject of some importance, as you might imagine, on a website bearing the name A Voice for Men.

Let me state that I emphatically endorse and support whatever any group of men want to call "male space." I may not agree with everything they say, or even any of it. But the right to congregate free of any female participation? Of course, and without caveat.

At the same time I want to call your attention to the second paragraph of the quote from the newbie and tell you that I just had to laugh. And I have to ask, what sort of "independence" is so frail that it can be hijacked, and what sort of man going "his own way" is so weak that he allows women to dictate anything to him?

Courts and laws are one thing, but on a personal level, nobody takes shit you don't give them.

Seriously, as someone who has done a fair amount of spelunking into the depths of male space; who has spent hours and hours meeting and talking with other men outside of the nearest woman's voice or earshot, it leaves me with an observation that I think is inescapable.

If you are afraid of speaking your mind, it is your own fault. If your spine is made of such absurdly pliant material that you fear being coopted by the hint of perfume or the gentle nape of a woman's neck, then perhaps you really are best to stay only in the company of men given to such weakness and fear.

Like I said, I think men deserve whatever space they want to take. If they prefer the company of men, you will not hear me bitch about it. Go for it, and don't look back, it is no one's business but yours.

But to me, "the space you take," is really the operative term.

Please allow me for a moment to channel, as ludicrous as it is, one of my all-time favorite actors, Samuel L. Jackson, who in my opinion was never in better form than he was as the character Jules Winnfield in the movie Pulp Fiction.

I imagine what Winnfield would have to say about our newbies' idea of male space, and I imagine it would be something like this.

"Motherfucker, what the fuck do you mean, "space?" Do I motherfucking look like anyone is going to take my motherfucking space, motherfucker? Just step on up here and see if you can take any of my motherfucking space!"

And that, in the end, is the point. At least according to me and Jules. Space is in your head. It is in your own mind and your own heart. It is in your own way of life and hinges entirely on your own spine.

Discussions among men are great. I love them. But I also live in a real world full of all kinds of people, men and women alike, who would love nothing more than to commandeer my thoughts and actions; who would like me to be of use to them and their agenda in one way or another. And I don't have an internet cocoon where I can, or even want to, escape it. I am perfectly capable of standing my ground.

You have the space you take.

Take it, motherfucker.

Lies your teachers told you: open letter to a young woman

Dean Esmay · 18 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, multiple male members of the A Voice for Men (AVfM) staff received the following email. We will accept at face value that Carly is who she says she is. Here is her letter, and below will be my response:

> Letter Received: Mon, 17 Feb 2014 10:35:25 -0800 (PST)
> From: Carly M <xxxxxxxxx@yyyyy.com>
> To: [Various male members of AVfM staff]
> Subject: Thoughts
> Hello,
> I am an 18 year-old girl from the United States. I came across your website while I was researching studies done on women's rights for my Probability and Statistics class. I was surprised by the statistics posted on your website. At first glance I expected your website to promote equality between genders. Instead I realized you are promoting one thing: men. You seem to believe that everything negative that has been done to you has been the fault of women. I am sorry. Women and men are both equally important to society and to life, you seem to have forgotten this. Your whole website is based on the belief system that men are far superior to women.
> If this is what you believe, then I am sorry. I am sorry on behalf of all the women in your life. I am also sorry for wasting my time writing this email, that I expect you will never read. What you do not understand is that men have had voices since the beginning, however in the last one hundred years women have just began to be able to speak. Those voices will not silence now. Women have realized things can be better, and life can be more fair It is my impression that you believe women plan to "take over the world" and chastise men until the end of time. Some feminists may have this idea, however most women want equality. Most people want equality. Tell me, why should we not deserve equality? I would be very interested to hear the answer. I do not plan to take over the world, I just want to live in a time where I can be taken seriously and not objectified. I have a lot of plans for my future.
> I want to work for human rights, I want to help boys and girls all over the world receive an education. I want to create awareness about racism and sexism too. I want to reduce the statistic that 30% of women and 10% of men will be raped or abused in their lifetimes. I have these plans because I want equality. I expect that you do not take me seriously. That's okay, it just means I have a lot of work to do.
> I know I cannot change your mind, however I didn't write this email to change your mind. I wrote this email because I was struck by the hate present on your website. Needless to say I was very offended, I hope that my email is not hateful, just a different point of view for you to consider. You are correct in demonstarting that there are more than one side to every argument and statistic. I ask that you do some more research, though not online. Think. Just think. Think about opportunity. Think about coexistence. Think about collaboration. Think about a world that is > beautiful for everyone to live in. Think about equality. Change is scary, I know that, however it cannot be stopped. I also recommend you watch the film Miss Representation, it is available on Netfilx.

> Thank you for your time,
> Carly M.

Dear Carly,
The following open letter is written not just to you, but to any young woman who has an open mind and is willing to be challenged on her prejudices.
As a rule, when we get emails or comments like yours, we usually ignore them or just say something rude, because we've heard it all before. More times than we can count. You may interpret that as an "angry" response, but really, it's just exhaustion. There's nothing in your mail which we haven't already addressed a thousand times only to have people refuse to listen. The only reason we did not do the same with you is because you say you are 18 years old. This, to me, indicates someone whose mind may still be open.
The older you get, the harder it is for you to accept new information and new views of the world, so I'm hoping that you or others your age will possibly read this and think about it. Not that people who are older can't change their minds, but the older we get the more closed-minded we tend to get. Life experience and the aging process will do that to you. In fact, if you take away only one message from this entire letter, I hope you hold onto this: that open-mindedness you seem to pride yourself on now? Try hard to keep it as you attempt to understand what I'm saying here and, more importantly, try to hold onto open-mindedness when you start getting up in years. Believe me, the older you get the harder it is to have your mind changed, but it's always worth being willing to change your mind if facts and perspectives you haven't heard before come to your attention.
Now, to the substance of your letter: You say you were surprised by the statistics posted on our site. I'm not surprised, since these statistics have been hidden from you, at least up until this point in your young life. They've been hidden by people with an ideological and financial interest in keeping you in the dark about them–and by people who are just plain prejudiced and bigoted. If you have specific statistics you want to challenge, let us know and we'll take a look, but we don't publish things like that willy-nilly. What we seek, first and foremost, is honest, verifiable information, so if you have something we've missed, please let us know.
You did not specify where you got the statistics either; we have multiple articles and pages where you can find statistics. You may want to look at this page, which is a few years old and needs a bit of updating, but, we stand by the substance of that page and we would have to ask you which stats on it you took issue with before commenting further. But I hope you also stop by our Wiki page of primary references, which contains considerably more information which will probably surprise you even more. (We are still looking for volunteers to help update that wiki as it happens, and you and others are welcome to help improve it.)
By the way, when looking at those primary references, please pay attention especially to the references on domestic violence, rape, and something called the Woozle Effect. You will probably get a better education on these issues there than you will almost anywhere else today.
Now, I have to give you a warning: I strongly suspect that not only are the facts we cite generally correct on substance, but your teachers will be most displeased with you if you try to share them. For, while they are all perfectly good references from multiple independent and scientific sources (at least on the Wiki, which is the real go-to page), they tend to run against the grain of what a lot of people talk about when they speak of "women's rights." Because they expose common, everyday lies that your teachers tell you. What we find is that people who speak of "women's rights" are (usually) incredibly lopsided in what they look at, only taking the perspective of looking at where women often get a crap deal, while rarely bothering to look at where men get a crap deal, or only see men's issues in an "oh yeah, men too" way, or by blaming that mythical beast called "The Patriarchy" for whatever bad befalls men.
And sometimes, they just flat out make things up.
Although you are female, and so you are privileged in this area: men who try to talk about these things are usually personally attacked, and I would expect a boy taking classes with you to get a flunking grade just for having the audacity to present some of this information, at least if he did not come to conclusions that pleased his teachers. Because he's a boy, and boys aren't allowed to speak in ways that might upset women or which speak unapologetically about where men get the short end of the stick. But, because you are a girl, maybe you could help shine a light in the darkness and put the truth out there in the face of what are verifiable lies. I hope you'll think about doing so, anyway.

Anyway, what you have likely been taught by your teachers, possibly your whole life, is that if bad things befall women, it's because they are oppressed as a class, but, if bad things befall men, it's just a side-effect of women's oppression; supposedly, having "male privilege" is great but it has some down sides, and that's their only answer when a man's life is destroyed. If you can free your mind from that toxic lie–and a toxic lie is what it is–you might be able to see what's really going on here. The truth is, the most privileged class of people in the whole wide world are young women living in places like the US, UK, Canada, etc.–and if you want to be treated like an equal, you should not flinch or cry like a little girl if someone tells you that.

You accuse our web site of promoting men. Well, to that we must plead guilty: men have few to no voices speaking about issues that are specific to men, or defending men as a group, in this society. Until very recently in history men never have had such a voice. Because pretty much all civilizations for the last few thousand years have prioritized the needs and desires of women over those of men. For hundreds, even thousands, of years. We aren't used to seeing men suffering or, if we do, we think it's either the natural order of things or, worse, ultimately their fault. Men are not viewed as human beings with innate value by this society, and from what I can see, they never have been.

Now as it happens, I think you will find no one on A Voice for Men who disagrees that men and women should have equal rights under the law, and equal opportunity to pursue whatever they want out of life. We just happen to think that women have become, in recent decades, an incredibly pampered, privileged group of people in our society, and that most of the time, it's men who get the short end of the stick–although that isn't true everywhere and always, it's true in far more ways than you probably even suspect.

You say we "seem" to believe everything negative that has been done to us was the fault of women. Well in fact, if you ask me, and most of the others in charge here at AVfM, we don't believe it's women who are the primary impediment to the Men's Human Rights Movement at all. No, the primary impediment is men: getting men to think of themselves as human beings first and not the disposable utility of women is really hard. After all, men have been prioritizing the safety and provisioning of women over their own self-interests for thousands of years. Putting women first has been the priority for so long, most men don't even know how to think about things any other way.

You say we seem to have forgotten that women and men are both equally important to society. I have no idea why you think that. Women and men are both equally important to society as human beings. Although it does depend on where you look; it's men who do most of the sacrificing and dying for this society, and men who most frequently have their civil rights stripped from them, and some of us are getting pretty uncomfortable with a world that demands "equality" but then ignores the largest minority in this society: men.

If you're doing some statistical research, here's an article with lots of statistics for you to look at written by Janet Bloomfield, one of our senior contributors, on what would happen if all women quit their jobs, versus what would happen if all men quit their jobs. And while you are looking at those statistics–which again, you can verify for yourself, since the references are right there–I would suggest you ask yourself of all the jobs there, which ones most frequently involve loss of life and limb and which ones rarely involve such risks.

If you're interested in sexual assault by the way, don't miss Alison Tieman's Manufacturing Female Victims, Marginalizing Vulnerable Men, which has still more statistics you should look at with a critical eye.

Moving on: You suggest that we believe men are far superior to women. I don't think anyone I work with believes that, although we do believe men and women tend to have different strengths and weaknesses–and statistics do tend to bear that out too you know. Tell me, are garbage collectors, mostly men, "better" people than hair stylists, mostly women? Are firefighters, mostly men, "better" than lawyers, who these days are mostly women? You will find men and women in very different proportions in those and many other fields, but I don't think any of those people are better than the others.

You suggest that we "do not understand…that men have had voices since the beginning, however in the last one hundred years women have just begun to speak."

I had to pause on that, and reflect a while. See, if you were 58 years old, you would have no excuse for believing that horrible lie. But you're 18, and so, not to put too fine a point on it, you are still a young skull full of mush. You probably not only believe that, but you probably haven't until now even had anyone question it for you. See, you've been lied to your whole life about that, and it probably shocks your sensibilities to have someone call BS.
But I will be straightforward and to the point with you: whoever taught you that was helping to repeat a lie. In fact they told you a horrible, hateful, wicked lie, a lie that is sexist and, also, racist to the core.
And if telling you that hurt your feelings, welcome to the world of equality, where people don't spare you from harsh truths just because you're a girl.
If you believe men have silenced women for thousands of years, or that women had no voice for thousands of years, you believe something that just not true. Counterfactual. In error. Furthermore, if you believe that, what you have to believe is that Asian men have been oppressing Asian women for thousands of years, black men have been oppressing black women for thousands of years, European men, Australasian men, and so on, have all been oppressing their women for thousands of years. And those weak women could do nothing about it. So what you believe here isn't just wrong, it's racist.
If you believe women have had no voice for thousands of years, you are also spitting in the faces of your grandmothers, your great-grandmothers, your great-great grandmothers, and virtually all the women of history. And you're spitting in those men's faces too. You are at once making out women to have always been weak, spineless, craven little creatures who never had the strength or courage to rebel against their oppressors… and you are making the men in their lives, their fathers, brothers, and sons, out to have been monsters.
Seriously, it's only because you're only 18 that I'm not calling you a bigot and telling you to go to Hell. But I will tell you, without apology, that your teachers are bigots, and I will ask you to give them a great big "screw you, you for abusing your authority by teaching lying propaganda to young people like this" for me. No seriously. Please do quote me. Screw them. They lied to you, and their lies are toxic.
Here's the truth of history: women have always had a voice, and not only their own voices but the voices of men who have, as a group, collectively made a habit of putting women's needs and desires first and foremost above their own. For most of history, being female was a privilege. It carried certain special rights that only applied to women, and special responsibilities that only applied to women, and through most of history, being male was a burden, a burden which carried certain rights that only applied to men, and those rights were there mostly so they could discharge their duties to women properly.
For at least a thousand years, if not longer, the march of history has been characterized by putting women's needs and even their feelings ahead of the needs of men and boys. And what we do here represents a serious challenge to those unequal privileges women have always enjoyed, but which have become even more extreme over the last generation as women have been given more rights with fewer responsibilities, leaving the burden of women's needs and desires even greater on men.
There is a classic essay on this subject that you may want to read and/or listen to. It's by our good friend and contributing editor Karen Straughan: Feminism and the Disposable Male. If listening to a man tell you these things is hard for you, maybe you'll have an easier time hearing them from a woman.
Finally, you suggest I watch a movie called "Miss Representation." While I'm already pretty sure I'm familiar with everything in that movie, having studied these issues for longer than you've been alive, I'll make you a deal: I will watch "Miss Representation" if you will watch this little movie: Interview with Erin Pizzey. There's a transcript and references you can check, and if you'll promise to watch it and think about it, I'll watch your suggested movie. I suspect my movie will challenge you a great deal, but it may also make you a better person. Erin is also, by the way, not only someone who will challenge you on your beliefs, but has since joined the staff here at A Voice for Men, as so many other women have.
It is a little strange, by the way, that you only wrote to men who work on this site, and not any of the women. Maybe you didn't notice the women, which is kind of common: people seem to be very uncomfortable at the notion that women might speak forthrightly about the concerns of men and boys without putting them at the back of women's bus. If hearing a woman's voice is what you want, please note that in this article I have just linked you to three different articles written by three different women, and an extensive interview with a very important female historical figure, who are all part of the team that makes this site work. If you won't hear a man's voice, perhaps you'll hear those women's voices on these issues.

In closing, I'll note one more thing: you may occasionally see angry remarks or articles on this site. What I would hope you would do with that, when you do see it, is contemplate that there is a difference between righteous anger at real injustice, and what you seem to have misinterpreted as hate–once again, Erin Pizzey has some things that might help you understand the difference. It's something to think about, anyway.

What we are here at A Voice for Men is a group men and women who believe in equal rights under the law for everybody, for the same human rights to be granted to everybody, with reasonable equity for all. These should not be radical concepts, but for some reason these days they are.

I for one hope that one day, you'll be open-minded enough to join us.

Peace.

The Continuing Guilty Pleasures Of Feminist "Philosophers"

Jason Gregory · 18 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Trigger warning: those suffering from immense selfishness, hypocrisy, stupidity, and moral retardation cloaked as philosophy may get their feelings hurt by this article.

Those of you who read my blog know that I have a guilty pleasure—"feminist philosophers." This guilty pleasure is better than chocolate. They are usually a bit more challenging than typical feminists in that they at least try to obscure some of their misandry, dog-shit ideas, and immense stupidity within the container of philosophy. They are usually a bit more cunning.

However, over at "feministphilosophers," I found this article disguised as "Some Thoughts On Epistemic Responsibility." I'm not going to bore the reader with a discussion on epistemic responsibility. I am, however, going to show the immense selfishness, hypocrisy, and stupidity of this "feminist philosopher," one who calls herself "Themistokleia," named after the teacher of Pythagorus—"the father of philosophy."

In her own words:

> I have experienced attempted rape. Surely I would feel differently had my attacker been successful, but for me, what was most traumatizing was not the assault but rather what happened next. It was in a public park. I was able to get away. I ran to a man reading on a bench and told him what happened. He saw I was being followed. He offered to sit with me until it looked like it would be safe to walk home. But that was all he did (and I do mean that was all: he did not offer to take me to the police, to call any one, etc., and it didn't occur to me to ask for those things). I sat with him for two hours on that bench in silence. In retrospect, I'm sure he just didn't know what to do and didn't know what to say—but in those two hours, and in some months that followed, I felt like what happened must not really matter because it didn't seem to matter much to him. I thought that I was being silly for feeling angry, violated, and scared. In those later moments where I didn't doubt myself, I doubted the world at large—the capacity of my fellow humans to do right, to be even minimally decent.
> I don't ever want to be the man on that bench to someone else, whether I think I know what happened or not.

This woman "ran to a man" for protection. She specifically and deliberately brought danger and the threat of harm to this man. He voluntarily allowed himself to remain in harm's way for two hours to protect her. He was willing to offer up his male body as a sacrifice to this damsel in distress.

[image]

As such and according to our "feminist philosopher," this man's sacrifice was more "traumatizing" to her than assault and attempted rape. The two hours of his risking bodily harm to protect this damsel was not sufficient. He should have done more. He should have risked more for her, "but that was all he did…"

Such is the mentality of many men, women, feminists, and even feminist philosophers—people who should know better. Such is a total lack of other-awareness—total gynocentric selfishness. She was not aware of the sacrifice that this man made by allowing his male body to endure the risk of violence for two hours—all to protect her.

What if he had an anxiety disorder? What if he had PTSD and was suffering from previous experiences of violence against his body? What if he was a survivor of rape or assault and running to him for protection forced him to relive all those feelings of powerlessness, helplessness, and suffering? Selfish people like Ms. Themistokleia do not consider these other possibilities. Doing so would require something contrary to their total gynocentric selfishness: empathy.

If she wasn't so selfish, she'd have realized that this man could have been assaulted, maimed, mutilated, stabbed, shot, or otherwise also be made into a victim of violence that she brought to him—making him responsible not only for her safety, but his as well. She was not aware of the danger that she put him in to protect her. She does not value his body at all or even care that she put this man in harm's way by deliberately running to him for protection. She does not acknowledge, at all, his sacrifice, or the sacrifices made by men who have been cultured to perpetuate violence against men in defense of women like her.

Such are the expectations placed on men in our society—to "be a man," be brave, and make your body an object-of-utility for women and for society in-general. She used this man, only to berate and shame him later for not doing even more to protect her. Women like this "feminist philosopher" demand obeisance and say that if a man doesn't sacrifice enough, then he is worse than the possible rapist who tried to assault her.

This is another way in which the male body is made the most culturally acceptable locus of violence by women like "themistokleia." As she writes her "thoughts" on the morality of epistemic responsibility, she neglects to fix her own moral retardation and hypocrisy.

As a philosopher, one would think that she'd have the clarity of thought needed to identify hypocrisy. However, as a "feminist philosopher," she may lack the clarity needed to realize that she is simultaneously arguing for and against the actions of men who rescue damsels in distress.

As a philosopher, she is arguing that a man didn't do enough to rescue her. On the other hand, as a feminist she believes that men who rescue damsels in distress are perpetuating the soft-sexism of benevolence—a form of white-knighting, where men rush in to rescue the poor and weak women who are believed to be incapable of defending their own stupid positions or rescuing themselves from their own stupidity.

I'm not going to rescue you from your own stupidity, Ms. Themistokleia. I'm going to point at it, laugh, and enjoy it for all its guilty pleasure. Such things are better than chocolate. If you're too stupid to see your selfishness and hypocrisy, you have no business in any philosophy department. You have no business doing any philosophy at all. The only academia for you is some solipsistic "women's studies" department where you are free to escape any and all rigorous and critical thought.

Only there will you be free to perpetuate a culture of violence against men. There you will have the freedom to be callously indifferent to male suffering and sacrifices that are made for you by men who you don't even know—free to be as stupid as you like.

As you wrote, "I don't ever want to be the man on that bench to someone else," without realizing that man on the bench was probably not too happy to be stuck there either: babysitting your sorry little ass, and probably sweating at the thought that he might have to take a bullet or knife wound on your behalf. At least the man on the bench had sympathy, compassion, and enough morality to recognize that you were in distress…and that's a lot more morality than you have, given that you completely fail to recognize that he doesn't owe you jack.

Fuck off with your moral retardation, Ms. Themistokleia. Also, drop the mockery you are making of Pythagoras' teacher. You're not worthy of the name.

Why the challenge to "Violence Against Women" programs is essential

Ron Collins · 18 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For over a year now I have been researching the US federal government's programs under the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). I have made a number of significant findings, which I introduce below, but the first thing I discovered going in was the sense of taboo and political terror guarding these programs from any critical examination.

Anyone following the "debate" in the US Congress last winter will remember the steady din of "War on Women!" that arose, overwhelming any vocal critic and castigating any serious questioner of the performance, legality and effect of the actual programs.

One might point out that this lack of reasoned dialogue, and a resorting to taunts and threats in its place, can be found surrounding any feminist initiative, such as calls for "gender quotas" in various (non-lethal) professions, or a traditional female monopoly on reproductive freedoms irrespective of everyday realities for both sexes. And, I would agree. In the case of VAWA and its passage through the 113th US Congress in 2013, to point out (just as one example) that the Act poses certain jurisdictional issues under the 10th Amendment, would be shouted down as no more than "mansplaining," as if the concerns of a select group of people and their political objectives based on pandering to feminist dogma, somehow simply overrides the rule of law or the unforgiving logic of calm reasoning.

Seeing, on first glance, this degree of prejudice and the fear of backlash it produces, my immediate decision in doing research on VAWA was to have a hard look not at the law itself or its history as a federal statute so much as at the programs authorized by the Act, with a view toward their (once again) performance, legality and effect.

On the actual day-to-day performance of grantee functions, little evidence is available that might corroborate any claim that VAWA programs are smoothly functioning, professionally managed, financially accountable, fair-minded, law-abiding operations that properly serve the entirely supportable cause of protecting women and preventing violence against them.

What hard facts can be found tend to suggest the opposite: that VAWA grantees, even when found in violation of financial rules and other operating guidelines, are met only with "recommendations" from the federal government, that these issues are hardly (if at all) covered in the media, and that grantees are generally given carte blanche to run their everyday operations, budgets, allocations, purchases, contract procedures, etc as they see fit, and with an assurance of impunity.

As for the basis of the Act in any foundation of legality, I have argued throughout this effort (and continue to find more evidence in support of an argument) that VAWA is and has been a Constitutional outrage: that from VAWA's early implementation, the law of the land has essentially been set aside to allow the programs to continue functioning at all. And these functions can be shown to include enough instances of fraud, embezzlement, misappropriation and more, to an extent at least warranting further analysis.

VAWA grantees' out-of-court influence on both civil and criminal cases poses hazards to multiple civil liberties as codified in the Bill of Rights (to name a few): due process, right to be confronted by an accuser, presumption of innocence, admissibility of evidence, not even to mention that the very title of the law as in favor of "women" flagrantly discriminates against men and boys in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th Amendment, and the large body of discrimination statutes supported by the Equal Protection doctrine. (The insertion of language on "inclusiveness" has been intended to relieve this, though no evidence seems to exist that any man has actually been "included" for services designed for and run by the women's programs and organizations that make up the bulk of the over 5000 grantees nationwide.)

Several things are obvious at the outset, in terms of effect, but an alarming lack of substantive argument defending VAWA effectiveness continues to suggest that no one really knows whether the dozens of grants programs, or their thousands of grantees under VAWA do any good or not.

During the 113th Congress we saw claims and counterclaims: some saying that VAWA needed to be re-enacted because domestic violence and sexual assaults on women were worse than ever, raising the "1 in 3" banner that few can substantiate in hardcore research, and repeating the ongoing (and demonstrably false) myth that "the vast majority of victims are women"; while others would point to various isolated statistics mostly dealing with conditions years before the initial launch of VAWA, and claim that indeed the programs are effective, that women are safer now than in 1994 when the Act was passed.

Great leaps of logic, and astonishing feats of intellectual sleight-of-hand, somehow combined these contradictory arguments into a "femsplanation": that anyone opposing VAWA as a poor performer of services, or examining its legitimacy on legality grounds, or seeking to explore its effectiveness in empirical terms of known results, was obviously and dismissibly part of this alleged "War on Women." (One may readily consult the volumes of research on the power of this and other false accusations).

No one essay such as this, or a more-annotated research brief than this claims to be, or even a lengthy scholarly analysis which this piece comes nowhere close to being, can explain everything there is to know about VAWA, or about the doctrinal influence it has had over other laws and programs coming into existence around the world. But in presenting this commentary I am making this argument:

We, as guardians of the male future, must look further and deeper, and see what VAWA as a law, as a vast complex of programs, and as a political philosophy, really is and really does.

There is no shortage of scholarly critique, largely authored by female academics (a sad reflection of the political terror on men for speaking up at all to oppose or criticize VAWA) saying again and again, and going back twenty years, that at best VAWA is well-intentioned but not particularly effective, and at worst, that it amounts to an insertion of political feminism into the legal and criminal justice systems.

My own view is that VAWA programs represent a kind of power plant for political feminism:

As long as the threat exists over men, of our livelihoods, families and achievements being dismantled by the legal system on the strength of uncorroborated accusations against us, no opposition to any other encroachments by feminist dogma on our lives as men will be effective.

To continue chipping away at "cultural misandry" without taking the hard, necessary look at just how this form of INSTITUTIONAL MISANDRY does its work every day (and has been for twenty years), is to hope that somehow political feminism will collapse under this current onslaught of improvised and poorly-coordinated argumentation, and it also is to choose against finding and presenting the hard evidence showing that:

In any decent, civil society, the politics of radicalizing one sex against the other has no right to stand at all.

Further reading and resource material on Antimisandry forums:

The VAWA Reading Room (ongoing)
The global reason to oppose VAWA
The VAWA10Q Inquiries: a national campaign
USA: Where does VAWA grant money GO?
The case against VAWA: a project of activism
VAWA research: the basics
USA: WOMEN opposing VAWA (LONG list)
VAWA and PAS: making the connections
US v Ciavarella: MAJOR ruling on judicial immunity

Editor's note: like the linked and referenced items, this article in its original form first appeared on Anti-Misandry.
–DE

Elizabeth Sheehy should fear The COCK Fairy

AVfM Video Source · 18 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Community Organized Compassion and Kindness (COCK) has arisen. John the Other and Diana Davison explain the depravity of Ottawa lawyer Elizabeth Sheehy, and what is being done about her.
Our resident supervillain, The COCK Fairy, also appears to make a public service announcement.

Farcical differences in the training of male and female army cadets

James Williams · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In producing Men's Matters Radio episodes I sometimes try to bring focus on the "little guy" – the one with no voice. It means engaging with otherwise obscure and forgotten people and putting them in front of a microphone so that they can tell their story.

Just like in triage, I have found that it is often the silent ones who are suffering the most or are the ones with the greatest needs.

One of the challenges in fighting misandry and prejudice against males is in getting men and boys to come forward and to speak out. It doesn't seem to come naturally to them. That may be partly due to males being conditioned from birth to not whinge; to "Man Up" when things go against them and just get on with it whilst internalizing any feelings of injustice they may experience. But, it's also due to the conditioning of women and their reaction to men's and boys' problems. What is clear is the prevalence of a general myopia about anti-male prejudice.

See a man suffering – "not my business" or "Ha! Ha! Isn't that funny?" and, if something goes wrong, find a man to blame.

A few days ago I crossed a road at the same time as a woman. As we crossed, a male driver, speeding around a corner, was forced to slow due to the woman impeding his path but, although she was nearer to him and I was well clear, he chose to scream at me and ignore her.

Feminization of the military

The argument about female involvement in military type activities, particularly in traditional male roles associated with combat, is not a new topic. I don't see it as a matter of courage. There are certainly many very brave women on planet Earth.

What is of concern to me is that when combatants find themselves in extremely demanding circumstances, which may take them beyond normal conditions, are they (men or women) capable of not just surviving, but in making a difference? Can they turn disaster into success? When the chips are down, will women be a burden or an asset? Will lowering physical training standards, not only weaken a combat unit, but also put comrades and the women themselves into jeopardy?

Whether women have any qualms about killing, I have no doubt. They can and do kill and can be just as deadly as men. Some of them even relish the thought especially if it means killing men. We have seen their lethality in civilian life and Robert St. Estephe's catalogue of female murderers provides extensive evidence of this and hammers home yet another nail in feminist mythology about the non-violent nature of women.

British Army Cadets

According to the British Army Cadets website, there are about 46,000 army cadets (aged 12 to 18) assigned to 1,700 locations all over the UK. This makes it one of the country's largest voluntary youth organizations with over 8,000 enthusiastic adult volunteers helping to make it happen.

Undoubtedly, such an organization is going to have a lasting impact on a large number of young people by the way they are treated, trained and the real life challenges they face. However, in terms of gender equality, does the difference in the way boys and girls are handled have a negative or positive impact on their attitudes on gender issues? Without a properly conducted sociological study, who can tell?

This episode of Men's Matters Radio was produced thanks to a 16 year old boy, Jordan, who had the courage to come forward. He explained his experiences in the British Army Cadets; the difference in the way boy and girl cadets were treated; and why he left. There were two other boy ex-cadets who were similarly affected in his unit – one could not be contacted and the other agreed with Jordan, but declined to be interviewed. Nevertheless, I hope you will find Jordan's story revealing enough.

In spite of delaying production of this article to allow time for an official response, to date there has been no reply provided by the British Army Cadets. Perhaps they are currently undergoing a thorough investigation of their policies and actions regarding the treatment of boys and girls?

Physical Differences

Both females and males who join a military organization are expected to undertake essential training to get them up to a basic level of fitness and preparedness. It may be stating the 'bleeding obvious' but men and women are not biologically and physically the same. Bone and muscle density is higher in males and leaner body design gives males a distinct physical advantage. Males of the same stature will consequently tend to be heavier.
According to the American Journal of Sports Medicine injuries are common amongst army recruits and other vigorously active populations. However, in the face of certain ideologues who insist there are no differences between male and female because 'Patriarchy' or whatever, it is necessary that empirical research is carried out to prove to the brain dead what everybody else knows through common sense.
The Journal reports on a study of 391 US army trainees (124 men and 186 women) undertaking 8 weeks of basic training. It was found that women had a significantly higher incidence of time-loss injuries than men, 44.6% compared with 29.0%. Its conclusions were that female gender and low aerobic fitness measured by run times are risk factors for training injuries, and that other factors such as prior activity levels and stature may affect men and women differently.
Women are much more prone to knee injuries and stress fractures of the vertebrae, pelvis, and hip and pelvic floor dysfunction which, in a combat zone is a big minus.
To conclude, the blind insistence on equality in all spheres is not only foolhardy, but dangerous. There is no place for political correctness in a battle zone. Lowering physical fitness levels to "empower women" is and will put lives at risk, but I am sure that the Taliban won't mind that.

References

http://www.military.com/military-fitness/marine-corps-fitness-requirements/usmc-pft-charts http://www.military.com/military-fitness/army-fitness-requirements/army-basic-training-pft http://econfaculty.gmu.edu/wew/articles/97/military-fem.html http://www.express.co.uk/news/uk/373000/Should-Britain-ever-put-women-on-war-s-frontline http://www.cnsnews.com/news/article/barbara-boland/female-marines-not-required-do-1-pull http://www..dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2530172/Women-U-S-Marines-SPARED-new-physical-fitness-requirement-wont-three-pull-ups-pass-muster.html http://www.thegatewaypundit.com/2013/12/pc-insanity-female-marines-cant-do-pullups-but-will-be-allowed-to-serve-on-front-lines-anyway/

The Wilhelm Scream of cultural misandry

B.R. Merrick · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A commenter on an article written by some straight dude (who won't be shut up about it) inspired what follows. I entitled it "The Wilhelm Scream of cultural misandry" because of what Private Wilhelm represented in his time and what he represents today. Anyway, the quote:

> In the case of soldiers, especially, we SHOULD cheer them on for allowing themselves to be made disposable.

(emphasis in the original)
Who is Private Wilhelm, you ask, and what is his relation to the above quote concerning other disposable soldiers? He is a fictional character from a film called The Charge at Feather River. At some point in this film, Private Wilhelm is shot with an arrow and then screams. The scream, separated from all other noise one would expect in such a scene (that I haven't seen), was then used in more than 200 movies. It may have been used in two or more films before it received its name, thanks to Private Wilhelm, who is remembered for screaming some other man's scream.
It is used in movies today, such as the not-so-recent Lord of the Rings trilogy. It is, along with cultural misandry, easily heard and seen in a myriad ways across mainstream media and society:

Back during my reparative therapy years, I saw a commercial for a Denzel Washington (oh boy, here we go again) and Russell Crowe movie called Virtuosity. At 1:44 in the linked trailer, a man is picked up by the seat of his pants and thrown over a crowd into an arena. I haven't seen the film and do not see evidence of the Wilhelm Scream in particular being used in it, however, the clip with the guy thrown to his death is just a few seconds after some other guy apparently gets his neck broken by Russell Crowe, who is a cyber-composite of a whole bunch of male serial killers, with appropriate male screaming and other brutal sound effects.
Movies like this are considered guy movies; they're considered date movies when it's the guy's night to choose, or the girl's night and she's a Russell Crowe or Denzel Washington fan (which, if she's a straight female, she most likely is). Nobody's a fan of the stunt man or the extra that is paid a great deal less (and is probably more than happy to deal with less). They have the disposable jobs in Hollywood, the entertainment industry of the society that raised and informed each one of us. The scream is quite common, but so commonly ignored that only those who enjoy the process of listening for it will notice it.
I didn't know about the popular Wilhelm Scream, or the myriad other canned screams of men used by sound engineers in Hollywood. Neither did I know about society's influence in my own mind, back in those days. I stayed away from the tough boys out of incomprehension, an inability brought about not least due to the influence of mass media. I was a misandrist by default.
All I knew at the time was that I was supremely uncomfortable watching a man being picked up like a kitten by the scruff of its neck, rendering all of his power and autonomy thoroughly useless, in a panic over something for which he is completely emotionally and physically unprepared; and made to look like a fool during an agonizing, sudden, shocking, and horrifying death. The trailer for the film, however, is slick and cool. So is Crowe. So don't worry.
Several red pills later, and now I get it: they were just boys when I was growing up. Nothing more. Now that we're all older, they're just guys. Since that's just what I am, I should treat them the way I would want to be treated. Just how did this transformation happen?
I mentioned reparative therapy because when I tried turning from gay to straight, I read a lot of books on masculinity while spending hours at the library. I then spent day after day observing interactions between men, between men and women, between men and their children, and between men and me. This is when the misandry that I had ignorantly embraced began to melt. There is no better way to describe what I learned than to juxtapose two incidents to which I was witness, both of which would otherwise be thoroughly inconsequential:
While visiting a girls' apartment, a group of us were watching television, something at which my generation is supremely good. I watched in fascination as two female roommates, both heterosexual, lay up against each other, while the one in back stroked the hair of the female who laid on her. None of the men in the room seemed to care at all. Why should they? It's expected and ignored.

It's less common to ignore a gay guy lying platonically and fully clothed on another gay guy while giggling like a school girl. So one of the straight roommates, in full the-church-says-not-to-do-that mode, expresses astonishment and enough awkwardness to fill several pews.

That should give you some indication of what I learned. There are unwritten, societal rules for men and women: expected behavior, modes of discourse, code words and phrases, hopes and dreams, and so much more. On top of that my unique Mormon environment placed "God-determined" sex roles. Being spiritually informed did nothing to alter cultural perceptions of male vs. female. It actually augmented a great many of those differences unintentionally.

"You get him, Jack. I don't care what you have to do. Just get him." That line always drew cheers from the audience at our college theater. It's from Patriot Games, starring everyone's favorite patriot, Harrison Ford. In my opinion, it's a tightly constructed and highly intelligent thriller. That movie proves that nobody ever did or will ever do pissed-off better than Ford. I worked at that theater, and the cheers I heard were mostly from women. With few exceptions, those were neoconservative women. That line is spoken by Anne Archer who plays Jack's wife in very neoconservative fashion.

She's understandably upset and afraid. The bad guy (who later dies a grisly death) tried to run her and her daughter off the road, and her daughter is fighting for her life in the hospital. She doesn't care what Jack has to do. Apparently, she's not going to do it herself. Presumably, she doesn't know how. Obviously, as long as Jack is around in full utilitarian fashion, he can be the one to take out the garbage and then get the bad guy. He has the cushy, sexy job. He is the one who grew up in a culture that privileged men.

To make up for the injustice against his wife's sex, one of the things Jack does is participate in the execution of some disposable terrorists (or suspected disposable terrorists) in a North African camp, hoping that one of them is the bad guy. While the movie's composer rips off Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, the viewer is shown an electronic outline of a man's body as he crawls his last few crawls. No scream. Only music.

Unfortunately, Jack doesn't get him. Not yet. But hopefully that other guy deserved it. Ol' Whatshisname.

At least that movie had the idea of showing us a conscience for the main character, and a rough outline of a suffering man. But then, that cyber-silhouette is there not so much to reflect on a life lost, but more to salve the viewer's conscience while he or she (or she or she or she, because Ford is so handsome) watches Ford consent to the death of a man whose connection to the dangerous man who directly threatens Ford is tenuous at best. If you are busying yourself with studying the male mind, that "blip" on the screen begins to mean a great deal more.

As a result, and more than midway through my college experience, instead of being in love with the male body alone, I was also in love with the male mind. I'm glad I didn't pay much for those repairs.

Jason Gregory's article about the devolution of sports and his subsequent article about society's expectations of male violence are describing social phenomena that run parallel with the devolution of the entire culture. In order to see it, I contend that you have to experience simultaneous devolution of misandry in your own mind. Since I am relatively unfamiliar with the world of sports, I will demonstrate what I see of cultural misandry by using another pair of movies:

In the original King Kong, there was a scene included in the cut shown at the screening of the film that featured a group of men who had been shaken off a giant log by the giant ape. Living in the ravine into which they fell were giant spiders that ate the men alive. The audience of the 30s, to its credit, left the theater talking more about that scene than anything that followed, which was roughly half the film. The filmmakers realized that they would have to cut that scene to keep continuity since it was so horrifically memorable.

The modern-day theater-going audience showed no such repulsion, as Peter Jackson, in love with the original, put that scene right back in for his 2005 remake, so that we could all watch the talented Andy Serkis's head being devoured by a giant worm. With all due respect to the equally talented Jackson, that, in my mind, is devolution of the culture, and we're not even talking about sports.

Continuing in the world of cinema, in keeping with a hot topic these days, and to show the deeper meaning of this personal transformation, I credit AVfM's own Dr. T with putting the final nail in the coffin for me concerning the brouhaha over Woody Allen allegedly marrying his own daughter. In the linked video (at about 15:30), she mentions that she believes Allen and his then-girlfriend Soon-Yi were both looking for a way out of their relationships with Mia Farrow, who displays a type of abusive nature by adopting far more children than she can possibly nurture.

It had never occurred to me before that Woody Allen was not actually responsible for anything with which I can now say I disagree, except not discussing his feelings with his girlfriend first, since it involved her daughter. However, to refrain from doing so with someone who you think will react in an unreasonable fashion is perfectly understandable.

What that actually means is that not all vestiges of cultural misandry have been removed from my mind. Here is what I allowed mainstream media, from the nightly news to Saturday Night Live, do to my view of Woody Allen's intensely private life for more than 20 years:

1. He had sex with his teenaged adopted daughter.
2. He kept it a secret from a woman who was practically his common-law wife.
3. He probably also molested another of his daughters, and I even saw video of Allen being humiliated in front of a family court judge who declared him to be an unfit father to his face.
4. The "neurotic New York Jew" act is apparently real, and a serious disappointment.

This is what is wrong with trusting mainstream media to tell the truth about anything. I was completely off. I was totally and completely off. (Well, perhaps not the neurotic-New-York-Jew thing.) Perhaps I would not have been so off if I were free of the remnants of our Wilhelm-screaming-culture.

Now a great film auteur, whose Oscar-winning body of work stretches easily across four decades while it continues to grow, has his name forever associated with incest and pedophilia. He is guilty of neither, to even the slightest extent. It does not matter to me that no court tried to convict him. It does not matter to me that he's an older man married to a much younger love, which is an enviable position for any man. It does not matter to me that his political leanings are left-of-center, which keeps him in his happy Fifth Avenue social circles. It does not matter to me that A-list actors and actresses still line up to appear in his movies. It does not matter to me that he will die with all the creature comforts his amazing career has handed him. It does not matter to me that he can afford expensive lawyers. Nothing makes up for what these false allegations and rumors did to his name, or what I allowed it to do to his reputation in my mind. None of it makes up for how it must make a man feel.

That's how hatred builds. It starts with assumptions that people make every day that they never question. If those assumptions are not premised on truthful, factual information, then it is that much easier for those assumptions to lead to hate.

What are the false assumptions that are supposedly made about women that get feminists so upset, and have convinced so many modern men and women that they are truly implemented against women in our society? Let's list a few:

1. "Women are intellectually inferior to men."
2. "Women can't do the workload of men."
3. "Women are emotionally weaker than men."
4. "Women are seen as sex objects."

Consequently, women need extra help and care due to their shared history of oppression at the hands of men who presumably make such ridiculous assumptions. Let's not even debate the above four alleged assumptions, or the presumed conclusion. Let's just assume the assumptions are existent, and the conclusion a necessary one; then contrast them with one assumption about men that wasn't dreamt up like a straw man, because it lives and breathes in another article's comments. I pasted it up top and I'll paste it again:

> In the case of soldiers, especially, we SHOULD cheer them on for allowing themselves to be made disposable.

How do any societal ideas about women (whether the above four assumptions are popularly held, or there are others I haven't mentioned) that are alleged even come close in hideousness to just one societal expectation of men that can be proven? It is a conclusion about men, a belief (or what I would call an operating premise) that crosses skin color, sex, age, political ideology, culture, economic status, social class, education level, and religion.

It is far more powerful than feminism, because it comes I believe from natural evolutionary principles. I shouldn't have to mention that intellectually we have gone far past evolution as a race of people on this planet, and for reasons heretofore unknown. Regardless, it is why it will sometimes seem like I'm defending feminism, or women too much, or not focusing in the right area. Semantics interest me far less than hateful assumptions, especially when those operating premises are so deeply ingrained that we do not see them, and cannot hear Wilhelm's pitiful-yet-repetitive scream.

The concerns of modern women are legitimate in some respects, but not respecting perspective. As Big Daddy Angry Harry has taught us: "Indeed, there is nowhere on this Earth where the people can be happy if the men are not happy; and it is fast becoming supremely dangerous for millions of men not to be happy."

Would you rather people assumed you were physically or emotionally weaker than another, and so need special care or less responsibility; or would you rather be told that you are more desirable the more you are able to display physical abilities that are either consummate with violent behavior, or an artful recreation of that behavior, and so should expend time, energy, and discipline to achieve that desire?

Feminism will die a slow, strange death, but the Wilhelm Scream will continue to be heard in the background. Cultural misandry is far more malignant and under the radar. The last pitiful cries concerning this culture's supposed misogyny will most likely have to die out first. Such a hoped-for ideal goes beyond any time when there might be any lack of feminist thought, because "women and children first" predates any feminist ideology. I doubt that phrase had anything to do with a lack of females speaking to males about their needs. It will probably continue in this fashion until the culture realizes that – contrary to what female complaints about female troubles try to affirm while the culture embraces the Wilhelm Scream – it never wanted to hear the Wilhelmina Scream to begin with, and still doesn't.

J4MB challenges Vera Baird QC and Professor Susan Vinnicombe

Mike Buchanan · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We have been quite busy on the public challenges front. We start with Vera Baird QC, a gender feminist and former Labour MP in the same mould as Harriet Harman:
Baird was the Labour MP for Redcar from 2001 – 2010, and was appointed solicitor general in 2007. She's now the (elected) Police and Crime Commissioner for Northumbria, a post with an income of £80,000 p.a. From what we can see on her website her concerns about the victims of domestic violence appear to be strictly limited to women and children. She promised Sunderland women she'd tackle domestic violence if elected:
She issued this document before her election: Tackling domestic violence against women and girls. From the document, with gender-specific text in bold type:

> Now Vera Baird has promised a step change in the way the police force will deal with the problem if she is elected in November. Ms Baird has announced plans to introduce a pilot project in Northumbria which will seek to prevent domestic abuse incidents occurring by using active monitoring and management of known serial perpetrators of domestic and sexual violence.
> The proposal is part of five priorities to address the problem of violence against women and girls, which will be adopted by Labour Police & Crime Commissioners across the UK:
> – Develop and roll out an integrated local action plan to tackle violence against women and girls – ensuring that VAWG is also prioritised in the local crime and policing plan and appointing a lead specialist, responsible for delivering the plan;
> – Ensure specialist domestic violence and public protection units within the police service continue to be supported – whilst also striving to maintain the important existing network of independent advisers and advocates to women survivors of violence;
> – Deliver specialist training in dealing with domestic and sexual violence, and stalking – as well as other forms of violence against women and girls, for neighbourhood police officers, for those in specialist protection units and for those involved in commissioning services for the survivors of violence;
> – Support early intervention to tackle violence against women and girls – valuing the importance of working with schools, local authorities and community-based organisations to change attitudes and behaviour;
> – Pilot preventative policing projects in areas including Northumbria– to promote the active monitoring and management of serial perpetrators of domestic and sexual violence, and stalking…
> Vera Baird said:
> "I know from speaking to women's group and refuges the challenge they face in dealing with this problem, especially in light of the cuts in funding from the Tory-led government. As Police & Crime Commissioner I would ensure an absolute commitment to increasing convictions and driving down incidences of violence against women and children."

We've issued the following challenge to Ms Baird:

> Almost 300 studies and reports from around the world show that women are as physically aggressive or more aggressive than men towards their intimate partners:
> http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2013/05/08/women-are-as-physically-aggressive-or-more-aggressive-in-their-relationships-with-spouses-or-male-partners/
> Given the large numbers of male victims of domestic violence in Northumbria, what commitment will you be making – if any – to increase the number of convictions of female perpetrators of domestic violence, thereby driving down the incidences of violence against men and children?

We turn to Professor Susan Vinnicombe, the world's foremost academic proponent of increasing female representation in boardrooms. I read a full-page article in a recent Daily Mail with mounting disbelief. It was written by a young journalist, Ruth Sunderland, and it's about the financial returns in 2013 of FTSE100 and FTSE350 companies with female chief executives:

The article is the usual mix of celebrating women who are successes, whilst downplaying women who are failures. Of the four FTSE100 female CEOs, only one can be reasonably said to have delivered a strong performance in 2013 – Carolyn McCall of EasyJet. Let's consider the three others:
Imperial Tobacco – shares down 8%.
Burberry – shares up 13%, in line with the FTSE100 average.
Royal Mail – shares up 78% but to quote Ms Sunderland, 'The huge hike in the Royal Mail price owes far more to the fact that shares were woefully underpriced than to the acumen of Moya Greene.'
So, just one of the four female FTSE100 CEOs performed more strongly than the average male FTSE100 CEO in 2013. The article's downplaying of female failure is breathtaking:

> Cynthia Carroll left the top position at mining giant Anglo American earlier this year after disappointing investors and has been replaced by a man.

"Disappointing investors?" They lost their shirts. In the course of Cynthia Carroll's five-year tenure at Anglo American £9 BILLION was wiped off the company's value. Here is a link to our piece on the matter, along with further information on the performances of other female CEOs.
Which brings us to Susan Vinnicombe of the Cranfield International Centre for Women Leaders. She's long been the world's leading academic advocate for more women on boards. In the summer of 2012 we asked a House of Lords inquiry (in our written evidence) to ask Susan Vinnicombe whether a causal link existed between increasing female representation on boards, and enhanced corporate financial performance. Here is our blog piece on the matter.
Vinnicombe's exact words at the inquiry:

> Thirdly, there has been quite a push in the past – indeed, we ourselves have engaged in such research – to look at the relationship between having women on corporate boards and financial performance. We do not subscribe to this research. We have shared it with chairmen and they do not think that it makes sense. We agree that it does not make sense. You cannot correlate two or three women on a massive corporate board with a return on investment, return on equity, turnover or profits. We have dropped such research in the past five years and I am pleased to say that Catalyst, which claims to have done a ground-breaking study on this in the US, officially dropped this line of argument last September.

From the Daily Mail article:

> Much as the feminist lobby might wish to claim a victory for woman-power, however, it is impossible to prove that female directors are likely to deliver better returns than men.

It is impossible to prove that, but for one simple reason. The nearest we have to proof of the impact of increasing the proportion of female directors is five longitudinal studies, all of which show corporate financial performance declining. Here is our short briefing paper with the studies' full Abstracts.
Back to the article:

> Professor Susan Vinnicombe of the Cranfield University School of Management, which compiles the annual Female FTSE Board Report, says: 'It is very difficult to say that superior performance is due to a boss being a woman. But there is mounting research that suggests having women on the board is associated with stronger financial performance. This is not quite the same as saying women are the cause of the performance, but there is a strong correlation.'

We get so tired of this sort of tortured language:

> 'It is very difficult to say…'
> '… suggests having women on the board is associated with stronger financial performance'
> 'This is not quite the same as saying women are the cause of the performance…'

It's not remotely the same. Most readers of the article will reasonably assume correlation is an indicator of causation, but all the reports and studies we've seen presenting correlations (McKinsey, Credit Suisse, Reuters Thomson, Catalyst…) say that not only is correlation not an indicator of causation, but it shouldn't be taken to even infer it.

Given that Campaign for Merit in Business has been around for over 18 months, it was long overdue for us to publicly challenge Susan Vinnicombe. So yesterday we made the following two challenges:

> We challenge you to stop misleading people into believing correlations between increased female representation on boards and enhanced financial performance are, or may be, indicative of a beneficial gender effect, thereby justifying in some people's minds (not ours) the government's policy direction of pressuring companies to increase the number of women on their boards, through the threat of legislated gender quotas.
> We challenge you to critique and discredit the five longitudinal studies which show that increasing female representation on corporate boards leads on average to corporate financial decline.

So why are there (on average) positive correlations between increasing female representation on boards, and enhanced financial performance? In our view it's because strongly performing companies can better afford to indulge in some social engineering, and in some sectors where women make up the majority of customers (e.g. the retail sector) it's also good PR.

The vast majority of newly-appointed female directors in major British companies share something in common with the vast majority of existing female directors – they're appointed as non-executive directors. This is a gravy train for shameless middle-class women, few of whom would have any hope of reaching major corporate boardrooms on the grounds of effort, experience and expertise – in short, on merit. It's the workplace equivalent of women seeking to marry rich men. When they do marry them, we don't say the women caused the men to become rich, do we?

Boy With Autism Gets A Surprise From His Favorite Garbage Man

AVfM Video Source · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes a video requires no comment to put a lump in your throat.

60 Minutes: Who has the softer heart?

AVfM Video Source · 19 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The American news show “60 Minutes Overtime” notes how ideological feminism has polluted, and continues to interfere with, sound science, including medical science.

Those outside the United States who cannot view this video may be able to go to this page to view the video instead. (Hat tip: Under the Goddess.)

Were you sexually assaulted by Amanda Childress of Dartmouth College?

Dean Esmay · 20 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following posting by Pierce Harlan, appeared on Community of the Wrongly Accused. Pierce is speechless. I am speechless, almost. But first let me reprint Pierce's words:
I am speechless. No discussion is necessary to underscore the evil behind Amanda Childress's comment. She should be fired for it, if indeed the quotation is correct.

> Amanda Childress, Sexual Assault Awareness Program coordinator at Dartmouth College, [said] campus policies aren't going far enough to protect students. "Why could we not expel a student based on an allegation?" Childress asked at the panel, before noting that while 2 to 8 percent of accusations are unfounded (but not necessarily intentionally false), 90 to 95 percent are unreported, committed by repeat offenders, and intentional. "It seems to me that we value fair and equitable processes more than we value the safety of our students. And higher education is not a right. Safety is a right. Higher education is a privilege."

Thankfully, there was a real lawyer present: "I think the ability of our communities to rely on the processes on both sides of the equation is inextricably connected to a fair, equitable process that is thorough and based on evidence, not just conjecture, speculation and rumor," said Gina Smith, a partner at Pepper Hamilton Law Firm who consults with campuses on how best to address sexual assault and comply with federal laws. "We cannot in individual cases just punt to statistics."
For the record, Ms. Smith summed up the philosophy of this blog. Childress's comment is something we are seeing with alarming frequency among feminist writers: there is no necessity to worry about the wrongly accused because there are so few of them. The chilling suggestion is that we can adjudicate a specific case based on statistics — since it rarely happens, due process is unnecessary.
Source: http://www.insidehighered.com/news/2014/02/12/disagreement-campus-judicial-systems
Here at A Voice for Men, we tried repeatedly, by phone and email, to reach Amanda Childress of Dartmouth College for comment, and to see if she wanted to retract her remarks, or somehow clarify her words in case she was somehow taken out of context. After almost a week she has not responded to any inquiries. We'd like to say we find that surprising, but we're not; hateful ideologues rarely want to answer pointed questions, and it appears that "hateful ideologue" describes Amanda Childress of Dartmouth College perfectly.
It is interesting times we find ourselves in, where institutions of higher learning, which are both directly and indirectly funded by the government, do not feel obligated in any way to respect either the right to free speech or the right to due process. It is an inversion of justice: education is not a right so, therefore, you can destroy a man's life with but a word?
Make no mistake, an expulsion, especially from a prestigious university like Dartmouth, is a very big deal. The ridiculously costly tuition monies will most likely not be returned. Word of the expulsion will reach other Ivy League and comparable prestigious institutions, and so once word gets out, other colleges may refuse you admission. The shame, humiliation, and mocking alone might drive some young men to suicide but, in any case, their academic and post-academic careers will be profoundly and negatively affected, possibly over for good, losing scholarships and/or finding themselves in massive college tuition debt they cannot pay. This is not to be dismissed, as if the destruction of these men's lives is as insignificant as swatting a fly from the air.
While a few of my Libertarian pals won't like this, and will be inclined to say "but it's a private institution, they can do whatever they want!" I call bullshit: not only are all these institutions of higher learning receiving substantial government funding, giving them a higher obligation than "whatever the market will allow," what we are talking about here should be seen as an illegal contract. Outlawed. With the full weight and penalty of law. If you eject a student, you need to give them their tuition money back, period, and you should on top of that be subject to a lawsuit for the damage you've done.

You can't just take someone's money, trash their reputation, then throw them out. People doing this sort of thing should not just face lawsuits, they should risk time behind bars for it and, at the very least, have their government funding stripped.

But we all know that will not fly in the current climate and "the free market" will not fix the problem by itself. In fact, the unfree market, as it is currently rigged, actually incentivizes this behavior: take a young man in, take his money, then chuck him out the door. Everybody wins but that young man, right?

Well, there's one way the market could fix it: young men could start refusing to go to college at all. They're increasingly opting not to, as women are a steadily-increasing overwhelming majority on most of our campuses. Maybe it's time for Dartmouth and other colleges to face an incoming Freshman class of zero males.

Except we all know that won't happen either. Most people are still caught up in the delusion that boys are failing in education because there's something wrong with them, rather than something wrong with the system, and parents will continue to pressure their sons into entering the modern Factory Farm University that routinely grinds up inconvenient young men that is the modern American university.

So there's also another way to fight the system:

As we all know, if you think you've been raped or sexually assaulted, you probably have been. Indeed, Paul Elam, Publisher of A Voice for Men, recently took the brave step of admitting that he may have a memory of being sexually assaulted by Amanda Childress of Dartmouth College. He has taken the courageous step of coming forward with his possible memory.

Here at A Voice for Men we want you to know that if, like Paul Elam, you think you have a memory of being sexually assaulted by Amanda Childress of Dartmouth College or, really, anyone else at Dartmouth College, you should be brave too. With some hunting, we followed links from Amanda Childress' department at Dartmouth College, and found their anonymous reporting form. We all know how valuable and empowering anonymous reports can be–you can have courage without even identifying yourself!

Here at A Voice for Men strongly that if you have ever been sexually assaulted, or just made to feel creeped out and afraid of, Amanda Childress of Dartmouth College, or anyone else at Dartmouth College, you should take the courageous step of reporting Amanda Childress or anyone else for sexually assaulting you or making you feel afraid and creeped out, and give explicit details of what she or anyone else at Dartmouth may have done to you.

Remember, if you think you may have been sexually assaulted you probably were. And if you even think it may possibly have happened, and you don't take the brave step of anonymously reporting, you are helping to promote Rape Culture. So be brave and report!

Feminist Magazine Makes Blockbuster Debut

Paul Elam · 20 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When this was posted on the Facebook page, someone asked if it was for real. Uh, no, but the fact that she looked at it and even wondered said a lot. PE
[image]

Toronto Police Services tweet misandry

Dan Perrins · 20 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On Friday, February 14th, Toronto Police Services (TPS) announced they had investigated a Twitter account that was posting pictures, names, and schools of youths who had made some poor choices as they prepared for adulthood.

From what is known at this time, the Twitter account singled out both males and females for engaging in sexual situations. It is believed the owner of the account created it to warn other youth about peers who made questionable choices when engaging in sex.

In the past there has been a massive public outcry to end bullying amongst our youth. The focus of attempts to end bullying / harassment is, by feminist and social justice demands, concentrated on protecting homosexuals and females. A substantial amount of that bullying / harassment is a result of teenagers transitioning from youth to adult and engaging in adult activities, sometimes far too soon and with little or no forethought about the ramification of their actions.

Teenagers like to explore and are curious.

Sex is something natural for them to explore. Their hormones are gearing them up for that next stage of life; parenthood. And while some may never become a parent, either through genetic misfortune or personal choice, the fact remains that their bodies, for the most part, are wanting to do what mother nature programmed them to do: Reproduce.

Recently, something else has been added to the mix of teenage culture – social media. Twitter, Facebook and Tumblr, as well as other social media websites facilitate the sharing of personal information in a teenager's life with the outside world.

A picture taken while on holidays in Australia is almost immediately available for viewing from anywhere in the world with just a few clicks on a computer or a selfie from their phone.

Technology is an incredible tool and, like any other tool, it can be used for good or evil.

It is the use of those social media sites for malign intent that has created a situation young adults have never faced before. Some of those 'holiday' pictures being proliferating are not family friendly. Viewed a different way, they may be extremely family friendly in their depiction of procreative processes. And, true to form, feminist indoctrinated society demands we only care about the female victims who are caught in these compromising, sexually explicit pictures.

I am going to reproduce two parts from the news report on this matter. The purpose is to hold a mirror up so society can see its indoctrinated bigotry in action. These examples only point the finger at one government entity but this does not mean they are the only government ministry that is guilty of ignoring males. They are just the ones in the spotlight today.

First we have the report by Allison Jones, from The Canadian Press.

Jones acknowledges that "[t]he feed – laced with sexual slurs – appears to have targeted both girls and boys" but the boys disappear from the conversation immediately afterwards.

We should expect the law to protect all people equally. In fact our police services are mandated to uphold the law without prejudice. Instead, what Toronto Police Services did was provide protection with prejudice, as they have done for about the last 50 years. The Toronto police eliminated the male victims from their response.

On February 7 of this year, the evidence of that misandric prejudice was proven in a tweet by TPS regarding this matter. They advised the Twitter account as follows;

> You are about to be under criminal investigation~We suggest you delete all sexual remarks and photos of female victims now ^sm

There is no mention of the male victims, nor any demands made for the deletion of male victims photographs or the sexual remarks made about them. According to the TPS tweet, males don't register as victims in this situation despite both genders being equally targeted.

This is completely unacceptable and in direct conflict with their oath to apply the law equally.
Robbing a person of their self-worth via some online social media site is harmful to any person but when those who swear an oath to protect the public ignore half the population as potential victims it is, by itself, a bigger crime. It is a crime against justice.
I really have a hard time understanding why TPS would, after seeing victims of both sexes, only attempt to protect the females not the males.
To add insult to injury, shortly after constable Scott Mills sent off his tweet to the account in question, he re-tweeted this;

> RT @TheCoffeeCop Please remember that your words have power~Use them wisely~Children are our future #stopbullying pic.twitter.com/ymw8rUKcso ^sm

[image]
Constable Mills, and most likely the TPS at large, clearly understand the power that words have to inflict damage. What he and the Toronto Police Services (TPS) don't seem to grasp is that their words can cause harm equal through exclusion. While a parent is guilty of neglect when they ignore a child, this form of abuse by police is publicly sanctioned.
They have in no uncertain terms used their words and actions to inform males that they are of lesser value than females. They are second class citizens. Males are not worthy of protection. Not worthy to be considered a victim. Not even worthy of mention by Toronto Police when they decide to take action.
When women are present, male victims cease to exist.
This discrimination by the TPS motivated an activist, Jason Walling (aka Raven), to write an open letter to the Toronto Police. Jason has been in the trenches with us for quite some time. He's a boots-on-the-ground activist and one of the founding members of MHRO.ca (Men's Human Rights Ontario)
The letter is provided here and I urge all of you to copy and paste it for emailing to TPS. However, please create an original subject line for your email as we don't want Toronto Police Services ignoring male victims any longer and would like to avoid having our concerns end up in a spam filter. If you feel you can pen a better complaint then by all means have at it and please share it with us so we can document the demand for equal protection under the law. We, as a movement, can not permit actions such as this to go unanswered. This is easy activism you can do from your keyboards. This is part of how we promote change for the better.
Toronto Police Services Board can be emailed via their website
http://www.torontopolice.on.ca/directory/mail.php?id=54

> On February 14th, 2014 a story broke via The Canadian Press that The Toronto Police Services (TPS) were investigating a Twitter account that exposed the purported sexual behaviour of local students. No one here condones the behaviour these students engaged in when they chose to publicly expose the supposed sexual practices of their peers but, what was completely revolting was the TPS(Toronto Police Services) response to these children documenting and publicly shaming each other for their sexuality and then condemning the actions taken by these children against only the female victims.
> It was admitted that both male and female students had been targets of this form of harassment yet, the TPS ultimatum to these crass children was, "You are about to be under criminal investigation — We suggest you delete all sexual remarks and photos of female victims now"(Emphasis mine). The constable (Scott Mills) who sent out this tweet shows a complete disregard for the male victims in this matter.
> Since when does the sex, race or, religion of the victim matter?
> Either a criminal transgression has occurred against a citizen or it has not. If the behaviour was illegal regarding the female targets then it was illegal regarding the male targets. Why was the TPS so eager to protect female students and reluctant to demand the same protection for male students? Does the Toronto Police > Service only “serve and protect” some citizens while adopting the “fine and collect” model for others based on sex or other involuntary factors?

> TPS bears vicarious responsiblity for this disgusting display of its lack of compassion for male victims. Its constables are only following what their superiors have endorsed and condoned in the past. And, what will be done to prevent such blatant anti-male victim bias from being promoted in the future?
> This bias is the very reason many men refuse to seek much needed help when they are being abused. Contributing to the suicide rate of young men being 4 times that of young women. To make that a bit more real, for every Amanda Todd and Reahteh Parsons, there are 8 boys, Rob, James, Alex, Steve, Mark, Ryan, Kevin and,Adam who have also been teased and bullied to the point of successful suicide attempts. The difference is that there seems to be no public outcry to help these boys, no services and little chance that they will be believed when they do screw up the courage to file a complaint. I have one word for you and that word is, “Enough”. We are watching and we are not going to go away. Our sons will be given the same priority as our daughters and, your feminist master’s ideology be damned.
> Sincerely,
> Jason Walling

(Originally Published on http://www.mhro.ca/)

Boycott Dartmouth – MEME

Robert St. Estephe · 20 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
For more information, see Were you sexually assaulted by Amanda Childress of Dartmouth College?

Bane666au's Don't Be THAT campaign

AVfM Video Source · 20 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Banne666au has begun a new postering campaign:

We encourage you to use these posters and spread them far and wide! You may also find some of the posters in our own poster section useful.
Link to image:
http://imageshack.com/a/img199/6311/g…
http://imageshack.com/a/img841/1194/0…
http://imageshack.com/a/img30/4219/8s…
http://imageshack.com/a/img543/1191/u…
http://imageshack.com/a/img208/8492/l…
http://imageshack.com/a/img513/5140/r…
http://imageshack.com/a/img534/2706/h…
http://imageshack.com/a/img691/6150/k…
http://imageshack.com/a/img853/300/3h…
http://imageshack.com/a/img833/1015/7…
http://imageshack.com/a/img706/1990/h…
http://imageshack.com/a/img89/6956/ck…
http://imageshack.com/a/img823/9119/v…
http://imageshack.com/a/img560/7051/i…
http://imageshack.com/a/img802/5485/7…
http://imageshack.com/a/img542/7936/n…
http://imageshack.com/a/img691/3398/d…
http://imageshack.com/a/img839/7760/j…
http://imageshack.com/a/img839/8307/r…
http://imageshack.com/a/img713/8870/9…
http://imageshack.com/a/img163/9573/8…
http://imageshack.com/a/img600/51/m6e…
http://imageshack.com/a/img43/3716/4g…
http://imageshack.com/a/img38/7312/k0…

The dating racket and its "heartless robbers"

Robert St. Estephe · 21 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Diana Davison's recent article on A Voice for Men, "Slavery 101, dating as taught to girls" puts the spotlight on the message of a major, and lucrative, "relationship" literature industry, focusing on the overt message of woman as slave owner / man as slave.
Dorothy Dix, the world's most successful female columnist of the first half of the 20th century, whose columns were syndicated internationally, had more than a few words to say about the matter of female predatoriness and the gullibility of their chivalrous targets. In fact, Dix's writings throughout the fifty years or so tenure as the most prominent female voice in popular media, are a goldmine of insight into the real public discussion of the relations between the sexes in the pre-1960s era (a time period which has been mangled and censored mercilessly by the hoaxers of the official narrative "herstory," which is presented today as fact rather than what it is: ideologically distorted mythology).

The following 1938 discussion of the dating game as deployed by what we might call "militarized" girls of the dating scene of the day describes a state of affairs which had been already for decades a long-standing matter of public concern, namely young men's aversion to matrimony in light of their awareness of the laws which set them up for alimony — or, less frequently, for "breach of promise" lawsuit scams.
Taking a look at an earlier Dix item reprinted on A Voice for Men as "MGTOW in 1929," and whose original title was "Why Can't The Modern Woman See That She Is Killing the Goose That Lays the Golden Eggs When She Places a Commercial Value on Every Endearment a Man Utters, Cries Dorothy Dix," show just how long the seed of the MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) movement has been germinating in the United States.
Dix was never afraid to "tell it like it is." While quite ready to put the blame on the female in the dating scenario when justified, she was equally ready to lambaste to males for their passive willingness to go along with their feminine companions' self-centered machinations. It takes two parties to play the age-old game of chivalric co-dependence.

My take on the message Dorothy Dix is putting across can be summed up in these words: "Boys and girls: both of you — cut the crap!"

***
[image]
FULL TEXT:
DEAR MISS DIX – Do you think the girl who is always trying to save a boy's pocketbook, even though she may not be going to marry him, is appreciated as much as the gold-digger who is out for all she can get? I have always in mind the fact that a boy may not have a great deal of money and try to keep him from spending money upon me, but my friends say I am foolish not to take all I can get, and certainly, as far as I can see, I get no thanks from the boys. So where am I? — Mabel.
Answer – from the way boys complain about how the girls hold them up, and what it costs to take a Jane out for an evening's diversion, I should think that all the young men of your neighborhood would fall on your neck with loud cries of gratitude.
For the gold-diggers certainly are heartless robbers. They go on the assumption that every youth is a millionaire, although they work right at the next desk to him and are perfectly aware that his pay envelope has no more in it than theirs. [AVfM Editor's Note: The "pay gap" theory, a fairly recent concoction, is a fraud. The idea that women could not support themselves before Marxian gender feminists took over universities and promoted government policies based on their fake data is also a hoax.]
They may know that one dinner-dance will send him to a cheap lunch counter for a month; that a taxi takes the shoes off his feet, and a theater strips the coat from his back, but so long as they are given a good time they should worry over what happens to the poor simp who lets them hold him up with a pair of blue eyes and who hasn't enough backbone to say "No" to a female grafter if she has a peaches-and-cream complexion.

***
So one would think that the boys would simply mob the girl for dates who had enough heart and conscience to spare their pocketbooks; who would eat enough at home to stay her stomach until she got back and was willing to dance to a radio instead of demanding to be taken to a club where there was a 20 piece jazz band.
But men are funny things and there is no understanding them when it comes to the question of women and money. Somehow, they always want to make the grand flourish, anyway, as if they had the whole United States treasury behind them.
The poorest boy is nearly always the one who grabs up the check and pays it, who sends a girl the longest-stemmed roses, who buys the most expensive seats at the theater and who gives a dollar tip when a dime was all that was needed.
There are very few men who ever have the courage to tell a girl they can't afford a thing, and it offends most of them for a girl to show that she knows that they can't afford it by suggesting doing something cheaper. So it is difficult for women to know what line to take with men. Perhaps the best way is never to suggest anything yourself but to fall in with the man's plan. Then if he spends more than he can afford the crime is at least on his own head. Though that won't save him from blaming the girl. But that is the chief pleasure men get out of women – making scapegoats of them.
[Dorothy Dix, "Gold Diggers Classed As Heartless Robbers – Girl Who Tries to Keep Boy From Spending Money These Days Is Exception," syndicated, Milwaukee Sentinel (Wi.), Sep. 24, 1938, p. 11]

Note: The original text has an additional letter/reply on a different topic which we have excluded here.
***

Why Engagement Rings Are a Scam

AVfM Video Source · 21 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Of course most AVfM readers will know that we think marriage in the current climate is a terrible deal for most men in general, but everything in this video is true based on what we've read, and it helps demonstrate just how much we've been bamboozled by multiple parts of the culture into stupid ideas of what love is:

"Last Minute Resistance" and date rape

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 22 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The call of the Banshee is usually not something one wants to follow but can, on occasion, lead to an interesting discovery. Such is the case when Jezebel reported the successful removal of a "guide to date rape" from Amazon. Accidental systematic misandry showed its ugly face in this case when Amazon, while de-listing that particular book, still happily sells titles like Valerie Solanas' SCUM Manifesto, which promotes the extermination of the male sex. (I really wonder what would happen to a guy who wanted to publish a "satirical" book on the extermination of the female sex.)

While this article could address censorship, systemic misandry, or Jezebel as a harbinger of social collapse, I've chosen instead to discuss erroneous PUA thinking as exemplified by the ebook LMR Exposed by a PUA named Vincent Vinturi who promotes some, shall we say, rather risky techniques. ("LMR" stands for Last Minute Resistance.)

To be perfectly clear, dating is inherently ambiguous. The feminist fantasy of "enthusiastic consent" is bullshit. What you experience in real life is that interested women will give off "maybe" signals. They may play with their hair and smile from ear to ear while tempting you with seductive glances but, at the end of the date, the burden to approach is typically on you.

Where most PUAs go completely overboard is when they conflate interest that is not well-articulated with clearly articulated disinterest. Just have a look at the opening of the sales letter of LMR Exposed:

> Are you sick of getting a hot girl back to your place, excited at the prospect of fucking her, only to come up against last minute resistance when you go to make your moves…?
> Maybe you go to kiss her but she pulls away. Maybe you reach to undo her bra, but she pushes your hand away…

Here is the problem: there are girls who might be interested in you but who are not willing to sleep with you — yet. The smart choice then is to take it easy. Give her a bit more time, bro! In fact, if you end up in a situation where she pushes your hand away, you have clearly overstepped a line.

PUAs are not known to be a particularly sensitive bunch of people. There are articles floating around on "escalation ladders" where those supposed gurus tell guys exactly what kind of moves to make, and in which order, to "unlock" access to her pussy. This is, yet again, the popular video game analogy taken too far. You're not dealing with some kind of machine or program that expects a particular series of inputs to give you your desired result.

Sexual arousal can dissipate. It's all too easy to imagine some PUA who ended up with a girl in his bed who, through sheer incompetence, turns the girl off so that she indeed no longer wants to sleep with him. This doesn't just happen to girls, though. The more sexually experienced guys reading this probably did experience the occasional hand job that was so piss-poor that it inflicted pain, killing your aspiring erection. Or maybe you've received a toothy blow job. Heck, there are girls out there who kiss so incredibly bad that you immediately lose all interest in them. Consequently, you've got reason enough to not continue any further even though those girls didn't think they were actively sabotaging themselves. Instead, they considered themselves on the brink of a hot love-making session.

Let's continue with this role-reversal. What would you think if such an incompetent girl used force to "overcome your LMR," ripped on your foreskin as she's whacking you, followed by an excruciating knob gobble then climbed on top of you to lay a dead fish in your mouth as she's kissing you? This would be an utterly horrible experience, wouldn't it? Many feminists claim that only men can rape but, if this happened to you, you could legitimately say that you've been raped and violated in multiple ways, and that this experience has traumatized you.

So, now imagine some girl who finds herself in bed with a guy who turned out to be unable to turn her on at all. Everything he does seems forced, and while she might have been wet when she entered his apartment, she wasn't quite so sure about her motivations any more by the time he rammed his tongue down her throat or pulled her hair a bit too hard. Instead of turning her on she found herself questioning his sanity.

Normal people are able to read facial expressions and can use that skill to keep things hot and heavy, correcting when they accidentally inflict pain. Under continued rejection it would be normal to assume that the girl has a good reason for not wanting to follow through and sleep with the guy. But not according to Vincent Vinturi:

> A woman will intentionally strive to turn you off to see whether or not she can derail your sexual train of thought and action. If she succeeds, it signals the man may lack sexual potency… anytime you get pushback as things move in a sexual direction, the woman is testing you for raw desire (among other things).

The absurdity is striking! It seems as if the author never experienced mutual attraction and how it unfolds. Okay, let's assume that there is a very small number of mentally deranged women that really only want to be taken by a man with ample "sexual potency," and who doesn't take "no" for an answer. But this only means that you dramatically increase your risks for rape charges. You think you're going to "game" the judge and tell him that it's all due to evolutionary psychology that she acted the way she did? I'd say that you're better off steering clear of such women than taking the risk. The downside is just too great.
I'll round this article off with a personal anecdote:
One fine, early morning I found myself in the apartment of a girl I had met only a couple of hours previouly, and we were going at it. All of a sudden she bit me hard and then, like a maniac, scratched me hard enough to draw blood. I thought this was quite hot, but it didn't take long until she demanded that I hit her. Thankfully I was alert enough to get the hell out of there.
This was an issue of which I was particularly sensitive because I once had a girlfriend whose gynaecologist tried to get her to press charges against me when she had a few love bites on several parts on her body. All it takes is a weak-minded girl who agrees with her doctor that her boyfriend "is a brute and needs to be taught a lesson," or a vindictive girl who is pissed off because you didn't call her back.
But as we know, for most PUAs any kind of analytical thinking is reserved for "betas."
Let's be overly indulgent and assume for a moment that women do put up "Last Minute Resistance" to test your manliness. There are some pickup "gurus" who even go as far as to claim that "LMR" is an unavoidable part of seduction. It's not. If anything, it is a sign that something went wrong, meaning that you should backtrack or back off. If you've stumbled upon the very small minority of women who indeed want to "test your manliness" you're better off leaving them alone.
There is enough trouble in the world without adding psycho girlfriends to the list.

"Get Over It" – a poem

John Ribner · 23 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Get over it," they demand.
But I'm the one who got hit in the drive-by, man! So excuse me if I can't just wake up and say bye-bye to everything that happened. My blood stained the sidewalk for a week, one week, yet they act like this is just something I just imagined.
Back in '88 I was consumed with hate because someone blasted me in the back. Was he on crack? I didn't know him or his reasons. Maybe it was white boy season when the bullet slammed into my shoulder and punched through my chest. I must confess, I didn't possess a bullet-proof vest, so rush me to the hospital to get this wound dressed. Hey Doc! Why you running those tests? To see if I'm on drugs? Oh. So I'm just another thug in a deal gone bad. That's sad, because it wasn't anything of the kind. I was just in the wrong place at the wrong time.
"But that was 26 years ago," they whine.
Fine! So just forget that someone tried to assassinate me. No need to calculate how much blood I spilled or that they gunned me down just for thrills; no, I should look past all these ills and just get over it. Ignore the nightmares that still come around, when I jump up in bed every time I hear that sound … Pop! More like a firecracker than a .22 round, but firecrackers don't knock you to the ground. Yeah. I should get over it.
Instead, I hold on to my pain while Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder plays its nasty game of molding me into a monster I couldn't hide. Within no one to confide in, I became more terrifying than Godzilla, who crushed toy-box Tokyos where no one got hurt. But the monster inside me, now he really did the dirt … pushing away friends, making sure my relationship came to an end. There wasn't a bed big enough to hold her, me and my hate. And still they thought "get over it" would motivate.
But it didn't.
Not until I'd finally had enough … of this anger, frustration and a half-life made rough by 2.6 grams of lead. I might be messed up but I wasn't dead, so I said, "Maybe it's time to find me, time to reach deep down inside me." Because somewhere beyond the darkest parts that defined me, was the desire to somehow, some way, just get over it.

Dr. Josie Catania, Elizabeth Sheehy, and other whores of the court

Diana Davison · 23 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Among the many abuses of the English language that feminism has wrought is the term "forensic social worker." This is a category of employment. The word "forensic" is meant to dupe the public, and legal system, into thinking that social workers and psychologists practice science. Forensics specifically apply to sciences allowable in court rooms as evidence.

Psychology in the court room is a matter of social unrest. Insanity pleas are not generally well received by the public. While, personally, I believe that the rules of society are very easy to follow and any person incapable of such simple agreements must have a personality problem, I also don't believe they should be excused for their crimes. My opinion is offered here as merely one example of a public reaction when criminals admit guilt but plead "not guilty". There are many shades of individual opinion on the matter and they are just that: personal opinions. The justice system seeks to remove opinion, emotion, and conjecture from the public courts for the explicit purpose of ensuring the laws apply to all persons equally. In other words, justice must be blind.

Contrary to that basic principle, psychologists, "forensic" social workers, and other "expert" witnesses of pseudo-sciences, like Battered Woman Syndrome (BWS), have made an industry for themselves by insisting that courts must try to understand how the criminal felt at the time they broke the law. Even when that law was the indispensable "do not kill people."

The justice system has become corrupted by pressure groups to the extent they even allow so-called expert witnesses to testify about syndromes they just recently made up.

In Regina, Saskatchewan in 1993, Donelda Kay was on trial in Canada for killing her boyfriend. Kay's Battered Woman Syndrome defence was complicated by a couple of factors: The night of the murder Donelda was seen physically assaulting her victim during a house party while he just sat on a couch laughing at her. When she grabbed a knife and plunged it into his heart he was still sitting on the couch. He stopped laughing. Donelda had only been in a relationship with her victim for six weeks.

Luckily for Donelda, Dr. Josie Catania was able to pull some testimony out of her butt that resulted in Kay's acquittal. Elizabeth Sheehy promotes Catania's work in her book "Defending Battered Women on Trial".

> Kay was thus a survivor of what Dr Catania called "multiple serialized battering," a term that she coined to capture the experiences of teen mothers, "where there are short-term relationships, and … within that relationship there is abuse occurring." Dr Catania testified: "[A] person exposed to multiple abuse and violence by different men would be more serious and more debilitating [because] if … more than one person [is] abusing, each abuse constitutes a confirmation or a reinforcement of your value as a person, that each guy tells you, you are no good, you're not worth anything." Kay, she said, "definitely" had the experience of multiple, serialized battering. (p.170)

For those who are unfamiliar with the word "coined", it means that she just made it up.

The social network of psychologists is so effective at creating fast facts merely by repetition that another expert, Dr. Neilson, "reminded [the prosecutor] of the phenomenon of 'multiple serialized battering' (p. 176)" before the end of the same trial in which the syndrome was introduced. Unfortunately, the prosecutor didn't remind Dr. Neilson that "multiple serialized battering" is only a phenomenon in that it had never been heard of before the trial began and had already become a form of expertise among colleagues. Sheehy classifies this fraud as "a stroke of genius".

This brainchild by the Whores of the Court allowed psycho-experts to expand the definition of "battered" to include any women who had been previously battered by a man, even if the bloke she killed didn't happen to be one of them. Kay and her dead boyfriend had only been together for six weeks so she needed a deus ex machina to pull off an acquittal. Experts were happy to oblige. For a fee.

Testimony regarding BWS was allowed for the first time in Canadian courts in 1990, when Angelique Lyn Lavallee was acquitted of murder after shooting her boyfriend in the back of the head while he left the room. Only three years later, allowing this unproven “syndrome” into courts allowed an “expert” in a syndrome not recognized in the DSM to fabricate a whole new branch of unproven study and submit it as forensic. Dr. Neilson could honestly say it was worst case she’d ever seen because, in fact, she’d never seen any before. It doesn’t currently exist.

These trials and judgments are important because the use of precedent, or case law, creates a slippery slope. While the “slippery slope” argument is normally considered a logical fallacy in debate, in the arena of law the need for precision is due to the reality of slippery slope applications. Every written court decision may create a legal precedent and it is the job of defence lawyers to figure out how to use that precedent to keep their clients out of jail.

One prominent forensic social worker, Evan Stark, came up with his own personal theory which has flavoured his testimony in over one hundred court cases. He calls it “coercive control”.

Stark doesn’t support the “violence model” of Battered Woman Syndrome because, he believes, the psychological abuse women experience is far more debilitating than the physical. Evan Stark thinks we need to take the “Battered” out of Battered Woman Syndrome. Well done, Evan. That leaves us with just “Woman Syndrome” as an excuse for murder.

Justice is no longer blind.

MEME – False accusation

Robert St. Estephe · 23 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's a meme.

[image]

All the cool girls are doing it.
***

Male/female suicide rate differential increases again

Mike Buchanan · 23 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In 2011 the male/female suicide rate differential in the UK was 3.0. In 2012 it was 3.5, the highest differential in more than 30 years:
http://www.theguardian.com/society/2014/feb/18/male-suicides-three-times-women-samaritans-bristol
From the article:

> There were 4,590 male suicides registered in 2012, compared with 1,391 female, equating to 18.2 per 100,000 men and 5.2 per 100,000 women, according to the Office for National Statistics (ONS).
> When the data series began, in 1981, the male suicide rate was 1.9 times that for women. But the rate for women halved, with a much smaller decrease (from 19.8 in 1981) for men.

So in the space of 31 years, the male/female suicide rate differential has almost doubled, from 1.9 to 3.5. If that isn't an indicator of society becoming differentially more hostile towards men over that period, I don't know what is. From the article:

> Clare Wyllie, head of policy and research at Samaritans, said the figures showed that the highest suicide rate was among men aged 40 to 44, at 25.9 deaths per 100,000. This bore out the charity's own studies, which have found middle-aged men of low socioeconomic status to be most at risk. "They will grow up expecting by the time they reach mid-life they'll have a wife who will look after them and a job for life in a male industry," she said. "In reality they may find that they reach middle age in a very different position. Society has this masculine ideal that people are expecting to live up to. Lots of that has to do with being a breadwinner. When men don't live up to that it can be quite devastating for them."

Let's reflect on the last line:

> When men don't live up to that it can be quite devastating for them.

Whilst the statement is objectively true, we need to ask why men increasingly "don't live up to that." Men – and particularly low-status men – have been assaulted by the state's actions and inactions for 30+ years with respect to many areas, including:
1. Four out of seven unemployed people are men. Unemployment is a larger driver of male suicide than female suicide. Male unemployment has been increased by mass immigration, which has also depressed wages for unskilled workers. Where state initiatives aimed at driving up employment have a gender dimension, they always favour the employment of women over men.
2. State support of single mothers means that women no longer have to rely on men as partners – their reliance on men as taxpayers is, of course, enormous. So men keep paying the bills, but fewer men have the opportunities of being in a nuclear family.
3. Denial of access to children following relationship breakdowns. Low status men have no prospect of raising the large sums of money required for legal support over the long term.
How can such factors not be driving up the male suicide rate? Suicide is the leading cause of death of young men – driven in part by their education failures in a highly feminised education system.
From the article:

> Paul Bristow, from the Mental Health Foundation, said: "We urgently need to know more about why being male is itself a risk factor in suicide and to do more to help men, especially young men, seek assistance rather than suffer in silence." The study conducted by the University of Bristol and the Samaritans has funding from the Department of Health policy research programme.

You can be sure that no taxpayer-funded studies will point to an obvious conclusion, namely that the increasing male/female suicide rate differential is in large part a predictable consequence of a society which is ever more hostile towards men, and ever more supportive of women.

Subverting MGTOW

John Hembling (JtO) · 24 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) is one of the most significant elements of the Men's Human Rights Movement. This is not a matter of dispute; the only possible dispute is whether MGTOW is just /one/ of the most significant, or, THE most significant aspect of the MHRM.

For members of the general public outside this human rights movement, terms like "the marriage strike," failure to launch," "Peter Pan Syndrome," and other appellations reveal that whether misunderstood and reviled or not, the blue pill public is sharply aware that a small but growing segment of the male population are stepping off that old societal treadmill of protect, provide, serve, and die.

Men refusing to marry is big news. It's the compliant, reliable and long-disposable dog's-bodies of empire, refusing to be used and exploited any longer. It's the quiet slave revolt.

And the slaves, revolting as the blue pill world finds them, are forging a wholly new path for male self-determined identity in the 21st century. That would be we revolting fellows who call ourselves MGTOW. Men, going our own way.

For a great many MGTOW men, rejection of the gynocentric and coercive institution of marriage, along with other societal male obligations, is about reclaiming control over their own lives. And as powerful and important as this motivation is, this revolution of male identity is utterly dwarfed in importance by the wider cultural impact of MGTOW.

Our present culture, that is, our gynocentric culture runs on the appropriated income, the coerced labor, and the corpses of "good" men. It runs on the stolen blood and the appropriated money of married men. Marriage, in every western nation, is a set of laws primarily advantaging women at the expense of men. By laws, of course, what we mean are opinions with loaded guns backing them up.

A married man is one who has agreed with the laws of his nation-state. Those laws provide for the appropriation of his income, enforced separation from his children, and if he can't continue to finance a woman who has used the family court to discard him, he will enjoy a stay in his nation-state's jails.

For a self-identifying MGTOW man – assuming he finds a woman who totally understands the issues of the movement, who both likes and loves him, and even supports the principles of MGTOW – if he were to a marry a woman, then even if she would never pull that trigger, he has agreed to load the gun and put it into her hand. A marrying man is no longer MGTOW.

Some, approaching men going their own way from a philosophical point of view, assert that "men going their own way" can be just anything a self-describing MGTOW man chooses, including legally committing himself to that coercive three-way owner-slave relationship between himself, his wife, and the armed employees of a government. Some say, as long as he chooses it himself, marriage, when selected freely by a man is indeed "his own way." Thus, they claim, men marrying can be MGTOW too. Stated another way, MGTOW can include marriage – as long as the men buying into that social and legal institution chose it themselves.

Yeah, right. And a man can also call himself free who puts the handcuffs on himself and walks into the jail of his own free will.

Does anyone else think this sounds rather silly?

MGTOW brings powerful, fundamental, and profound change to the present cultural landscape. It is deeply dangerous to the present zeitgeist. That danger is increasingly recognized by actors within the mainstream maintenance of social narrative. It is these voices, still part of, or influenced by, the mainstream narrative, who now insist with a growing chorus that marriage and MGTOW are wholly compatible. The men going their own way who insist on an exclusion of marriage from the movement are Luddites lacking vision, according to them.

This, I submit, is how a movement is subverted and rendered impotent.

It is the rejection of marriage by men not even self-identifying as MHRAs or MGTOW that has made our culture's narrators coin terms like "Peter Pan Syndrome" and "failure to launch". The attempts to shame men back onto that old treadmill are clear signal of the active power of self-selected male identity in a culture which – until now – has relied on the willing self-sacrifice of male bodies, for the benefit of higher caste members of society.

Those who refuse to marry are the disposable refusing to be disposable any more.
And even some actors within the broader men's rights movement are now beginning to repeat the claim that MGTOW and marriage are compatible. This, ultimately, is how MGTOW, and its profound power, can be utterly diffused by the culture, and neutralized as a potential path for the self-determinacy of men, from a culture running until now on their corpses.
Well, not so much theirs. Your corpses, your stolen income and your blood.
There may have been a point a decade or more ago where we could credibly argue that MGTOW and marriage might be compatible, with the "right" girl or within the "right" nation-state. Many of the early MGTOW thinkers thought so.
Time and experience has revealed the error in that approach. Unless and until marriage law and custom are completely rewritten, from top to bottom, MGTOW and marriage will never be compatible.

The lethal paternity fraud racket

Robert St. Estephe · 24 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You have been lied to.

Your neighbors have been lied to and your children, if you have or will have them, are being lied to – and the lies are broadcast for a specific purpose: to alter society in a manner that will conform to the misguided, unscientific, collectivist ideals of those who would rule you.

There is a fairytale propagandizing of the "political correctness police" that seeks to obscure crucial information about the history of the sexes which has been censored from education. Though the narrative has been manipulated, the historical records which counter that narrative have not been completely erased.

Instances of female sociopathic personality disorders are, it is well-known, underrepresented in statistics due to the fact that the behavior which is considered normal for women (superficial charm, manipulativeness, predilection of indirect rather than direct communication, relational aggression, histrionics) is similar to that which, in men, would be considered noticeably abnormal and problematic. Yet, when you're a woman, living in a land ruled by the principle of female privilege, many allowances are given.

Violent women who are paid to look after the children of others, but who sadistically abused and even murdered their charges, have been frequently reported in the newspapers of the past two centuries. Before the myth of "female non-violence" was concocted by the architects of the Violence Against Women Act in the 1980s the public had a more realistic view of women – that they were, as a sex, no less prone to violence than men.

According to theories which have become fashionable to teach or, more accurately, preach in our universities nowadays, men are inherently prone to violence whereas women/mothers are not. This misandric philosophy extends to assertions that not only are men insensitive brutes in need of taming, training, and teaching in the ways of women (imagined to be inherently gentle, considerate, unaggressive, and cooperative) but that the worst sort of man is a man who is also a father.

Fathers are males who like the intercourse procedure that results in the birth of his offspring but who has only a shallow capacity for empathy with his own offspring unless trained by a female to learn that art. This is, of course, empirically false.

In the 1930s, the Glady Parks double-murder case was nationally known as an extreme example of female sociopathic sadism. Gladys saw children as meal-tickets and, with her arsenal of charms and lies, she blackmailed men with false paternity claims. When she got tired of the two children she was paid to look after by their widowed loving father, she murdered them.

This child-killer was not seen by fellow members of her sex as a victim of any sort of oppression. The cult of universal female innocence and victimization that we call "gender feminism" had not, at that time, reached orthodox status. In contrast, police officers were required to prevent a mob of women, who had gathered to view this vilest of child-torturing villains, from carrying out the threat of lynching which they had vociferously announced they were about to undertake.

WARNING!

You are about to enter the world of Robert St. Estephe – Restorative Historian.

Whereas journalism once favored objectivity and fact out of principle, it has since strayed into the world of fraudulent fiction and now our newspapers and media centers routinely distort facts, replacing investigative reporting with partisan journalism and outright misinformation. Restorative History inversely seeks to bring accuracy back to the public record through the reprinting of articles erased from the collective consciousness. These are the articles you are not meant to see.

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 1 of 5):

Camden, N. J., Nov 11 –

Miss Gladys May Parks, a 35-year-old pianist, faced another questioning today in connection with the deaths and secret burial of two children committed to her care.

Detectives were frank in saying they doubted the story of the woman who surrendered in Newark yesterday and subsequently was brought here and put in jail on a charge of murder. The bodies of 4 year-old Dorothy Rogers and her brother Timothy, 2, have been recovered, the boys skeleton having been found yesterday by state troopers near Abscoon after Miss Parks had given them minute directions to its location.
The woman denied killing Timothy, and insisted he died from a fall downstairs Dorothy, she said, died after being slapped. Questioning in Newark and later by police here failed to shake Miss Parks in her story. She gave an emotionless recital of the developments since Allen N. Rogers an insurance agent of Woodbury gave her the children to care for after his wife died last April.
Miss Parks in a cousin of Mrs. Rogers.
Two other persons – Anthony Baker Miss Parks' common law husband and George W. Parks her father – are being held here as material witnesses.
~ Alleged Blackmailing Game ~
Detective Sergeant Louis Shaw indicated that today's questioning would seek to determine whether charges of attempted blackmail against Miss Parks could be substantiated.
"Four well known Philadelphia men, and three from Atlantic City have told us of her game," Shaw said. We will not reveal their names because the men need not be mixed up in this affair. She used these children (Timothy and Dorothy) and others to confront the man she was trying to blackmail. She would tell them the children were theirs."
Miss Parks was unmoved in describing the death and burial of the children. She said she was afraid she would be charged with murder. If she told police about what she apparently considered the accidental deaths of Timothy and Dorothy.
~ Miss Parks' Confession ~
According to Miss Parks' confession, she had been trying for some time to discipline Dorothy and slapped her frequently. On Aug. 7 she had occasion to slap Dorothy. Miss parks said the girl fell to the floor, but thinking was shamming she left the room. Returning she tried to revive her by using rubbing alcohol it was then Miss Parks said she realized Dorothy was dead.
Shortly after that Miss Parks moved, carrying Dorothy's body from the old house to one on Burns street house she found the concrete flooring broken in several places so she said she dug a hole and placed the girl's body under the floor. On Aug. 26 she dug up the body wrapped it in the sheet and took it to National park pouring quicklime on it and hiding it under some leaves where it was found recently by two children. It was a laundry mark on the sheet that enclosed Dorothy's body which caused the search for Miss Parks and caused her to surrender.
During the questioning detectives told Miss Parks it was impossible to get a child's body into a suitcase without dismembering it.
"Oh, I can do it she said," here I'll show you.
~ Proved Herself an Adept ~
Taking 6-year old Perdita Morris, daughter of friends of the police matron Miss Parks bent the girl's legs back, folded her arms doubled the child at the waist and closed the suitcase.

"There," said Miss Parks triumphantly, "that's how its done."
Miss Parks said that three weeks after Dorothy's death Timothy fell down stairs. She related how she held the child under the kitchen faucet trying to revive him. That failing she then forced a child's body into a suitcase and took a bus for Absocon. Again she hid a body and sprinkled lime over it.
In a few days she received a letter from Baker in Newark. Miss Parks said, and went to live with him. She stayed there until her surrender yesterday.
["Woman Surrenders – Is Accused of Murder of Two Children – Admits the Deaths but Says They Died After a Slight Punishment – Buried Bodies With Quick Lime. – Alleged To Have Been In Blackmailing Game – Demonstrated to Police It Was Easy to Pack Child's Body in an Ordinary Suitcase Without Dismembering It." syndicated (UP), Dunkirk Evening Observer (N.Y.), Nov. 11, 1929, p. 1]
***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 2 of 5):

Camden, N.J., Nov. 11 –

Police today worked on a theory that four other children may have met the same fate as 4-year-old Dorothy Rogers and her brother, Timothy, 2, for whose deaths Gladys May Parks is used on a charge of murder.

Detective Sergeant Louis Shaw announced that Miss Parks, who is 35 years old, had confessed she had used the Rogers children in a blackmailing scheme.

~ Seven Men Accuse Her ~

He said he had found seven men who accused her of having demanded money of them, after showing them the children are asserting the children were theirs. Shaw said the description given by them men of the four children used in the alleged blackmailing, were "entirely different" from the descriptions of the Rogers children.

"Now" Shaw said, "we are trying to find what became of those other children – whether they, too, have been murdered. We suspect that she may have done with them what she did with Dorothy and Timothy."

Miss Parks ended a widespread search by walking into police headquarters at Newark, N. J., yesterday and surrendering, with her was Anthony Baka, her alleged common law husband, who is held as a material witness.

Police said she admitted having killed Dorothy Rogers by a blow struck in punishment for a childish indiscretion, but maintained that Timothy was killed in a fall down the stairs at her home.

She also confessed to carrying their bodies to Absocon, N. J., in a suit case, of burying them, and then later of digging up Dorothy's body and taking it to National Park.

The Rogers children were placed in Miss Parks' care last June by their father, Allen Rogers, an insurance broker of Woodbury, N. J., whose wife, a cousin of Miss Parks, died about a year ago.

["Woman Admits Using Children For Blackmail – Two Killed And Four Others Sought In Plot To Milch Seven Fathers," The Tucaloosa News (Fl.), Nov. 11, 1929, p. 3]

***

[image]

FULL TEXT (Article 3 of 5):

Camden, N. J. —

Gladys May Parks, also known ax Mrs. Baker, charged with killing one child and suspected of slaying another, today re-enacted how she buried the children in different parts of New Jersey and witnessed the wrath of a group of women who cried out "lynch her."

At National Park, after Miss Parks had shown how she had disposed of one child's body, she was startled when the women who made up a group of 1,000, surrounded the police automobile in which she was, and shouted threats against her.

"Give her what she gave those poor children," one cried. Another with a bunch of flower's in her hand shouted, "kill her and I'll put these on her."

The accused woman was well protected by policemen and detectives.

Tonight Miss Parks was again in the Camden jail, still holding to her story that Dorothy Rogers, 4, and her brother Timothy, 2, came to their deaths by accident.

The police frankly declare they do not believe her but have found no motive with which to confront her and break down her statements.

[image]

~ Gives Herself Up. ~

Miss Parks, who had been sought by the police for a week for questioning in connection with the finding of the skeleton of the girl in the woods at National Park on Nov. 2, walked into the Newark police headquarters early Sunday. After making her identity known she was arrested and confessed she had buried Dorothy at National Park and Timothy at Absocon, near Atlantic City, both last August. The boy's skeleton was found yesterday.

The woman said that the girl died after a beating in which she had no intention of seriously harming the child, and that the boy died after an accidental fall down stairs in her Camden home. Becoming frightened, she said, she hid the bodies and then buried them. The heads were found separated from the rest of the bones, but Miss Parks denies she dismembered the bodies.

Dorothy and Timothy were the youngest children of Alan Rogers, Woodbury, N. J., insurance broker, whose wife died a year ago, leaving six children. Miss Parks was a cousin of Mrs. Rogers and the father consented to let her raise the youngest ones. He never saw the children after turning them over to Miss Parks.
At Absocon today some 50 curious persons followed in Miss Parks' wake as she led detectives to the spot in the woods, where she had buried the body of Timothy.
She began to sob as soon as she bent over the shallow hole, with her hands crossed over her breast.
"Oh, I loved Timmie," she cried, "I loved him so much."
[image]
From the grave the party went to the morgue of Coroner B. Wilson Cunningham where Dr. Isaac Leonard, county physician, had examined the skeleton of the boy. Miss Parks was not asked to view the bones.
The doctor reported that the boy's skull showed there was a severe fracture, but he could not determine whether it was from a blow or a fall.
From the morgue the party went across the state again to National Park, where they encountered the crowd, many of them women. The people had come from all over the countryside and motor cars were parked all around the vicinity.
As the police entered the town, Miss Parks directed them to Essian Avenue, where she said she had left an automobile in August in which she said friends had taken her on the night she disposed of Dorothy's body. She had carried the boy in a suitcase, the same which she used in disposing of the little boy's body, but the friends with whom she rode that night believed she was returning dishes to a friend living in the town.
After showing where she got out of the motor car. Miss Parks took the detectives in the chimp of bushes among which she had laid the body of the girl. The crowd rushed about the police car so that it was impossible for her to leave it. After she indicated how she had disposed of the body the crowd became restive. The angry women pounded on the doors of the automobile. It took the driver 10 minutes to maneuver the car away from the murmuring crowd. Anthony Baka, who has lived with Miss Banks, and who is held at the county jail as a material witness, was not taken with the party. Police said they have no evidence against him.
[image]
["Women Attempt To Lynch Accused Slayer Of Babies – Suspect Says One Child Died During Whipping; Other Fell Down Stairs – Gives Self Up – Police Unable to Find Motive for Killing Children Of Suspect's Sister," syndicated (AP), San Antonio Express (Tx.), Nov. 12, 1929, p. 1]
***
[image]
FULL TEXT (Article 4 of 5):
Camden, N. J. –
Alan N. Rogers, Woodbury, N. J., insurance man and father of Dorothy and Timothy Rogers, was recalled today in Criminal Court in the trial of Gladys May Parks, charged with the murder of the two children.
Rogers, on the stand only 15 minutes, was questioned regarding two poems he wrote about children whom he permitted Mrs. Parks to raise after the death of her mother, the defendant's first cousin.
~ One Poem Barred. ~
Two poems were the out-pourings of a widowed father's heart. That written for little Dottie was admitted into evidence yesterday, but the one he wove around the toddling baby, Timmie, was excluded today when father could not say with certainty whether it was written before or after the child's death.
The poem dedicated to Dorothy, which Rogers said he gave Mrs. Parks when he entrusted her with his two children follows:
If you see God, in the blue of the skies,
You should behold the love that shines in my Dorrie's eyes.
And you've seen the showers come so quickly on a summer day,
Well, the tears in her eyes of blue come just that way.
And have you seen in the spring the whole world so happy and gay?

Oh if you could see the joy and dancing of my Dottie at play.
~ Praised Behavior. ~
Mrs. Lulu Johnson, temporary housekeeper for Mr. Rogers after the death of his wife in 1928, testified to the father's excellent character and the good behavior of the children while at home.
The evidence apparently was introduced to refute Mrs. Parks' declaration she slapped Dorothy because infuriated over the child's bad habits and uncleanliness.
["Father's Verse Barred In Trial – Court Rejects Poem Rogers Wrote to Slain Baby; Other Is Admitted." Syndicated (UP), The Pittsburgh Press (Pa.), Jan. 15, 1930, p. 2]
***
[image]
FULL TEXT (Article 5 of 5):
Camden, N. J., Jan. 20. –
Gladys May Parks was today sentenced to serve 25 years at hard labor for the death of Dorothy Rogers four years of age, and her brother, Timothy, two years old.
Convicted by a jury late Saturday night Supreme Court Justice Lloyd sentenced her to 25 years on the charge of second degree murder for the death of Dorothy, and to 10 years on the manslaughter charge for the death of the boy, the court directing that the sentences run concurrently.
The 35-year-old prisoner took the sentences stoically, facing Justice Lloyd at a distance of not more than three feet. She was permitted to stand before the justice because her hearing is so bad she could not hear the sentence at a farther distance.
~ Appears In Rage ~
Completely surrounded by deputy sheriffs and matrons the woman was hurried from the court room and some time during the next 24 hours will be taken to the state prison at Trenton.
As she turned away from the judge's bench to return to her cell she apparently was in a rage. Her face was flushed, her eyes flashed and she fairly flung herself off the low platform where she stood while hearing the sentence.
["Woman Given Long Sentence – Gladys May Parks Sentenced To 25 Years For Murder Of Dorothy Rogers, 4." syndicated (AP), The Gettysburg Times (Pa.), Jan. 20, 1930, p. 1]

Help a child reach 5

Aldir Gracindo · 24 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is is not really new, however I believe one thing that we should do is give some attention to what we appreciate, as we need to denounce what we know is biased and wrong. Lifebuoy's campaign and the video are heart touching. If you haven't seen it yet, here it is:

As you can see, this is a very different approach from the feminist campaign "Just because I'm a girl," which mislead people to propagate and contribute financially with the ever-present feminist factoids, "women hold half of the sky," "millions of girls disappear from the face of Earth just because they are girls," and so on.
The campaign, created by Unilever's Lifebuoy, is about all children. According to the advertisers, 2 million children under the age of 5 die of infections like Diarrhea and Pneumonia every year. As a company selling hygiene products, Unilever took interest in sponsoring this campaign.
The video and its story of celebration speaks for itself. The video's description says:

> For the past 10 years, Lifebuoy soap has tried to help prevent these deaths by teaching children the simple act of washing hands with soap.
> We now take our life saving mission to Thesgora, an Indian village with one of the highest rates of Diarrhea.

I don't know if the campaign really works, or if Unilever will make mistakes in other campaigns or selling other products. For the purpose of what this note, I don't really care. I believe that this video shows what Humanitarian campaigns are about, and that the governance of gender ideologues is not, plain and simple. This is why I am a MHRA and I promise you, no longer a feminist. When we talk about humans, that includes men and boys. Not as the world Historical criminals, as we see too often, but with acknowledgement, and respect for their lives, their masculinity and their contributions in the Human ecosystem.
Hugs from Brazil,
Aldir.
Editor's note: Aldir is editor of AVfM Brazil.

Tickets for International Conference on Men's Issues Now on Sale

Paul Elam · 25 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ticket prices are going up! Purchase yours now while prices are still low!

If we wanted to find a city that was an iconic testament to masculinity, we'd need look no further than Detroit. Founded by a French explorer named Cadillac, it rose up from humble beginnings in fur trade to become the city that literally changed the world; the city that imagined, designed and mass-produced one of the greatest, if not the greatest, invention of modern times: The automobile; the machine that revolutionized the lives of all Americans and indeed all of industrialized humanity.

For over a hundred years, it survived the conflicts of labor, the scourge of racism, and political corruption that would make Chicago blush. Yet it persevered.

And then it fell into hard times. Perhaps by coincidence, perhaps not, it lost its currency and its stature in perfect lockstep with the masculinity that first drove it to the top of civilization.

Bleeding and bankrupt, it now exists in decay and degradation. Once-great industrial complexes now have the look and feel of 1945 Dresden. City parks are overgrown and derelict. Schools and city services are running on fumes; some have quit running altogether. The only vigor remaining is in the rising numbers of the jobless and homeless, and in the handful of citizens doggedly and tenaciously working to salvage what is left.

It is a city teetering and struggling for its footing. It is seeking, like many men, to find its balance and its place in the world again. Also like men, it is in trouble as most of the world looks the other way.

I can think of no better or more appropriate place for men to dust themselves off and start building again. I can think of no better foundation on which men and the women who care for them can stand together and seek change.

With that it gives me great pride to announce that A Voice for Men will be hosting the First International Conference on Men's Issues on June 27 and 28 of 2014 in Detroit, Michigan.

For the conference we have secured commitments from some of the best known and highly regarded thinkers on men's rights and issues ever assembled in one place. They are as follows:

[image]

Dr. Warren Farrell, author of seven books on men's and women's issues, came to prominence in the 1970s as one of the leading male thinkers of our times. Warren originally championed the cause of feminism, serving on the New York City Board of the National Organization of Women (NOW). However, when NOW took anti-male and anti-father positions he began advocacy for boys, men and fathers. He is now recognized as one of the most important figures in the modern men's movement.

Erin Pizzey, author of five books, including the seminal Prone to Violence, is credited with starting the modern women's refuge movement in Cheswick, England in 1971. Erin is a steadfast human rights advocate who has lectured internationally on the subject of intimate partner violence. She is also an Editor-at-Large and domestic violence policy advisor for A Voice for Men.

Robert Franklin, Esq, is an attorney at law and the former Executive Editor of the Houston Law Review. Franklin writes commentary on our family law system and other related men's issues. He is a journalist for the National Parents Organization (formerly Fathers and Families) a shared parenting and family law reform advocacy group. Franklin is also a periodic contributor to A Voice for Men.

Dr. Miles Groth is professor of psychology at Wagner College in Staten Island, New York. He is the founder and former editor of Thymos: Journal of Boyhood Studies and is the current editor of New Male Studies, an international journal that serves as an open access online interdisciplinary forum for research and discussion of issues facing boys and men worldwide.

Barbara Kay is a columnist for Canada's National Post. She has written on a variety of issues affecting men and boys and has been particularly critical of both cultural misandry and the treatment of men and boys by the modern feminist movement. Kay is a lecturer who has spoken on National Television and at talks regarding her views on the rise of feminism to the detriment of men.

Karen Straughan is an internationally recognized writer, lecturer and videographer. As a mother of young sons, Straughan became concerned about the effects of cultural misandry and began writing and blogging on the subject. She also self-produces video commentary on the men's issues and has amassed 50,000 followers of her work. Straughan is an activist and a member of Men's Rights Edmonton and is a contributing editor of A Voice for Men.

Carnell Smith is a nationally recognized expert in paternity fraud. He is the Board President Executive Director of the National Family Justice Association. He is the executive director of the United States Citizens Against Paternity Fraud. He makes radio and TV appearances (CBS Early Show, ABC World News, Abrams Report), on America's paternity fraud crisis and has been frequently quoted in major newspapers (USA Today, Washington Times, Orlando Sentinel, Los Angeles Times, Chicago Tribune, Washington Post, Philadelphia Inquirer, Star Tribune).

Paul Elam is the founder and publisher of A Voice for Men. Formerly a mental health professional, Elam became concerned about the treatment of men and boys, both in mental health settings and the culture at large. He is also the founder of A Voice for Men radio, a network of internet based radio programs dealing with problems that affect men and boys. He is an outspoken advocate against false allegations and takes a leadership role in A Voice for Men's advocacy for men who are falsely accused or convicted without due process.

Sen. Anne Cools is a member of the Canadian Senate. She became the first Black Canadian to be appointed to Canada's upper house. She is currently the longest-serving member of the Senate. Cools served on the Senate/House of Commons Special Joint Committee on Child Custody and Access, which in December, 1998 issued its report, For the Sake of the Children. A principal recommendation of this report was that, following a relationship breakdown, shared parenting should be presumed to be in the best interests of the child.

Dr. Paul Nathanson is a Canadian academician who, along with Dr. Kathryn Young, co-authored what is regarded as the world's most seminal series of books on the subject of misandry, or the hatred and/or fear of men and boys. Nathanson is a noted lecturer and critic of academic feminism who has been an active proponent in calling attention to the problems faced by men and boys.

Dr. Tara Palmatier, PsyD, is a clinical psychologist who specializes in assisting men who have become entangled in relationships with abusive, high-conflict personalities, many of whom are suffering harassment and persecution through the misuse of the family court system. Also known as "Dr. T," she maintains a website for men seeking to escape abusive relationships and is a regular contributor to A Voice for Men.

Tom Golden, LCSW is a psychotherapist with a focus on men's issues. He is the author of Swallowed by a Snake, The Gift of the Masculine Side of Healing, and The Way Men Heal. Tom is the former vice chairman of the Maryland Commission for Men's Health. His website, menaregood.com addresses the cultural bias that exists as it impacts boys and men.

Along with this fantastic lineup of speakers, there will be a featured panel discussion on news media bias featuring an international panel of AVFM News writers, headed by AVFM News Director Robert O'Hara.

Your master of ceremonies for the event will be Vladek Filler, who will give an opening address and introduce all keynote speakers as each one takes the audience through an important address on 12 different areas of modern life that impact the lives of men and boys.
There will also be various workshops available, including one by Warren Farrell and another by Dr. T and myself.
Other events are being planned and will be announced in the days ahead.
The event will be held at VFW Post 1146 Walter F Bruce at 28404 Jefferson Avenue
Very exciting event, and very exciting days.
Get your tickets now while they are less expensive! The closer we get to the conference, the more the price will increase.

$300.00

All sales are final. While every effort has been made to ensure consistency, individual speakers may change without notice.

Special Addition. On Thursday, June 26, 2014 Dr. Warren Farrell will be presenting a workshop especially for conference attendees. This will be an intimate, limited seating event with the man who started it all.

Go here for details:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/a-voice-for-men/farrell-announces-workshop-for-detroit-conference-on-june-26-2014/

Conor Oberst fights False Rape Culture

Diana Davison · 25 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Conor Oberst made a mistake.
On February 19th, the lead singer and founder of the band Bright Eyes filed a $1M lawsuit against Joanie Faircloth for falsely accusing him of rape. Faircloth had made the accusation in the comments section of an XOJane article about domestic violence and on her Tumblr page. (All are now deleted)
She claimed that Oberst's brother got her backstage after a concert ten years ago and that the singer stole her virginity after ignoring her protests when he started touching her sexually. Brief investigation shows that Joanie Faircloth is an Oberst fanatic who, until recently, claimed that attending the concert was the "Best memory ever!" Either she's lying about the assault or rape just isn't what it used to be.
Faircloth refused to retract her statements after Oberst's lawyers contacted her, leaving Oberst limited options to clear his name. His press statement, printed in Rolling Stone, also announced that "Oberst intends to donate the proceeds of this suit to charities benefitting the victims of violence against women."
And there is the mistake. Not just the misspelling of the word "benefiting".
Faced with false rape allegations you'd imagine Oberst would want to help other men who have been falsely accused. Most likely, the idea was to show that he cares about actual victims of rape but, as it turns out, the women's charities don't care about him. And they don't want his money. Emily Davis, the spokesperson for Right to Speak Out demanded Oberst drop his lawsuit because he's scaring the womenfolk. Her reasoning goes like this:

> Even if Ms. Faircloth was not truthful, vilifying discussion of sexual assault by filing such a lawsuit only adds to the problem of under-reporting that enables sexual assault to proliferate at alarming rates.

Vilifying discussion? That sounds a little bit like, hmmm, what do they call it? Victim blaming.
Ms. Davis went even further. She advises us that people are innocent until proven guilty so we should assume that Faircloth is telling the truth which, incidentally, makes Oberst guilty of rape. Let that one circle around in your skull for awhile. Seems rather appropriate that Davis' brand of logic was published on a site called "Spin". It's not too late to switch your charity choices, Conor.
Perhaps he'd like to consider helping out Community for the Wrongly Accused. Or The Innocence Project. Or A Voice For Men. At least we believe the libel committed against Conor Oberst is a serious crime. If Conor would like to see justice done, and wants to help other men like him, he might want to consider donating to men's rights groups instead of the feminists who encourage women to make anonymous accusations online.
While the feminist site Jezebel claims to understand Oberst's desire to clear his name they don't approve of his method. Where Conor's attorneys have evidence that "[t]he only connection between Oberst and Faircloth was one of artist and fan – a fan who has posted laudatory comments about Oberst elsewhere online," Jezebel accuses him of using "a classic move". The only thing problematic when women, who claim to have been raped, are caught praising their supposed rapist after the event is that it creates powerful evidence that they are lying.
But, we're supposed to chalk this behavior up to one of those weird things women do sometimes when they've been raped. No two women react the same way to rape. Rape is a horrible crime that can turn the victim into a crazed groupie compelled to flood the internet with fanpics and gushing praise.
The facts of this reaction to the lawsuit are simple. Feminists run the nonprofits that fight violence against women. Feminists insist that false accusations don't happen. When you get falsely accused of rape you don't want to give funding to the groups that wish to silence you. If feminists take money from a false allegation libel suit they have to admit women lie about rape.
But some of us care about truth and justice. As a commenter on Jezebel, called HermioneStranger pointed out:

> Wow, MRAs hit this one fast, didn't they?
> I'm sort of surprised he even knew about her accusing him in the comments. There's "so" much said in the > comments about so many celebrities, it seems like keeping track of them to see if someone's saying potentially libelous things wouldn't really even be possible.

Who's got your back, Conor? MRAs (Men's Rights Activists). That would be us.
This comment also correctly points out that women are rampantly typing libelous comments all over the internet with the belief that the victim won't see it. It's sort of a pastime for them. It seems rather unwise to give them more money for their games.
Comments on Jezebel run the gamut of other sins: Saying that Oberst is just filing the lawsuit to get attention. That he's using his financial privilege to silence his victim. That, as quilta21 says, crimes against men don't matter.

> If, he is in fact innocent, I understand his lawsuit, but I agree that he should drop it.
> Maybe, instead he should speak out, talk about it… encourage more survivors of sexual assault to report it, speak up, so that false accusations (if that is indeed what happened) don't get near as much press.
> I'm probably hoping for far too much though

From the same comment thread, GrtWhiteChoclit asks "And what does punishing false accusers do? Does it make you feel better about yourself as a person?"
Obviously we can't count on women to stop false rape allegations, Grt. They're too busy spreading False Rape Culture.

Rape Culture Culture, and creeps

JtO and Janet Bloomfeld · 25 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sexual Assault is a slippery phrase. Not simply due to the continued misapplication of the words by gender ideologues, but because the definition of sexual assault is subjective. Consider the question: When has a sexual assault occurred?
If we are to ask social justice warriors or similarly squirrel-brained solipsists – the answer might be: Sexual assault occurs any time a female feels sexually assaulted.
This is, of course, stupid.
Consider a campaign from the university of Nova Scotia, called More Than Yes:

> "Sexual consent is more than just a yes. It must be loud and clear."

Do you get that, guys? Yes DOES NOT MEAN yes. It means maybe. Depends how she feels about it the next day. If she wakes up and thinks, "Oh my god, what a whore I am!" then, according to the squirrel factory, all her "okays", "yeses" and "oh god, uh, uh don't stop's " will be re-imagined post facto in the legal record as "No! Stop! I'm being raped! Police! Take him away!"
Continuing, the squirrels have more to say:

> "Real consent is mutual and sure. It is not muted, frail, hesitant, or afraid. It is never uncertain, assumed, or silent."

Have these people ever actually had sex?
If a woman wakes up the next day and retroactively feels that she was muted, frail, hesitant or afraid: Guys, you are fucked.
And you know how to make her feel that she's not being listened to, a little vulnerable, unsure of what to do next, or the dreaded "scared"?
Just get up the next morning and leave without saying "I love you". Don't text it. Act like the whole embarrassing fiasco never happened. Be a dick, even a little dick. Come on dude. She dares you. The squirrels dare you.
According to More-Than-Yes:

> Consent cannot be gained through manipulation, intimidation, or threatening behavior. A person who is intoxicated with alcohol or drugs can't give consent. Consent cannot be given by a person who is passed out or asleep. Consent must be continuous and can be withdrawn at any time during sex". Person, is of course code for woman. Men obviously don't need to give consent. Their consent to be sexualized as performing animals is always assumed.

HIM: Do you mind if I kiss you?
HER: Yes, please do.
HIM: Can I slide your panties off now?
HER: Yes, take them off me.
HIM: I'm going to push your thighs apart now, okay?
HER: Yes, push my legs open.
HIM: Is it alright if, while I'm kissing you, I massage your pussy?
HER: Oh Yes, I want you to massage my hot wet little hole
HIM: I now have a pronounced erection, which I'm planning to rub against your anus.
HER: That is okay, please do that.
HIM: I'm doing that, beginning,….now.

HER: Gasp/squeak noises.
HIM: I'm going to pick you up, and carry you over to the bed now, if that's alright with you.
HER: Yes, this corresponds with my plans as well, do proceed.
HIM: Now that I have you, legs apart, on your back on my bed, and myself poised with a throbbing erection, onto which I have rolled a recently purchased condom, I would like your continued consent to slide the tip of my penis between your labial lips, to an initial depth of 3/4 inch penetration.
HER: Oh golly, Fuck me now, fuck me hard!
HIM: Yes, shortly, but first would you mind signing this waiver please, and initial here, and on page 2. My legal counsel here, the fellow you asked me about earlier, in the very nice suit, will counter-sign, Mr. Schicklgruber, here's where you sign. Thank you.
Ongoing and enthusiastic consent.
And if both parties are drunk? Then neither consented? They both raped each other? I think James Taranto had some thoughts on this one.
In the University of Nova Scotia More-Than-Yes rhetoric – which is typical of gender ideological thinking on the issue of sexual consent – "person" is a code word for woman. How many drunk men have had sex on that particular campus? Or on any other? And they were all raped, were they? Really? Their rape frequency statistics must be nearing 100%.
According to published statistics on alcohol consumption in the province of Nova Scotia:

> Nova Scotians aged 60 years and older (55.5 – 64.7%) were least likely to be current drinkers.
> Adults (25-29 years) had the highest current drinking rates at 90.9 – 91.1% followed by young adults (19-24 years) at 89.2 – 92.3%.
> The average number of drinks consumed for all drinkers at a sitting was 3.2 drinks
> Seniors consumed the least at a sitting (1.9 drinks) and young adults the most at 5.5 drinks per sitting.
> 51.7% of students (male and female) in grades 7, 9, 10, and 12 consumed alcohol in 2002.

But, of course, following the rhetoric of campus gender ideologues: "Sex without enthusiastic consent is not sex at all. It's sexual assault or rape."
This campaign and similar campaigns on other campuses, seriously assert an unambiguous intention to micromanage human sexual behavior to the point where saying "okay" to sex is sexual assault. We are not fooling. Why? Because a "person's" (read: woman's, because men are not people) feelings might change the next day. And women retain the right to redefine any experience as assault, depending on how their feelings change about said event afterwards.
Feelings are obviously real to those who feel them. However, sexual assault is a crime which, when it occurs, does so in the real world. You know, the world distinct from the imagination and feelings of adult children. Actual events, including instances of criminal victimization, affect the world in material and measurable ways. This is why, when not distorted by ideological thinking, courts of criminal law function through the process of evidentiary inquiry.
However, whether real sexual assault or imaginary sexual assault, this particular form of criminal victimization is center stage in the ever-unfolding moral panic sold as truth by published, populist, pious frauds dictating their particular moralistic narrative to the public.
And of course in that public fairy tale, women are the ones sexually assaulted, molested, objectified, raped, and harassed. Women:the victim caste, and men: the victimizers, the creeps. Men are, in this moral fable, the creep caste.
The word "caste," above, is central to understanding the power of the word "creep." For this slur to have the destructive impact it does, a sexual caste system must exist.

> Men have the power of choice and women have the power of refusal.
> ~ Jane Austen

Broadly speaking, women both expect and prefer men to initiate in matters of sexual attraction.
The word "creep" gets deployed when a man perceived by a woman as beneath her sexual value dares to indicate interest. Often such men do not even expect a positive response. Obviously there are socially maladaptive men who enjoy provoking socially conformist woman's discomfort, but for most men it's about adhering to socially accepted hierarchy of sexual power. Which is to say, her power.
It's about her power to reject him. Men at the bottom of the social sexual caste do not exist as sexual beings in the eyes of most women. Their caste predetermines their sexual worth, and indicating sexual interest is often just a plea to be acknowledged as a fully-fledged human being.
Without the sexual caste system, and without the ongoing insistence that men choose and women reject, the word "creep" would have no power.
There have been more than just a few public figures tarred with that brush in recent memory. The iconic comedian and director who married his former partner's adopted daughter. A strange, comedicaly neurotic man committing the ultimate sin of spurning an aging woman for a younger, perkier replacement from among the ex-lover's own family. It's not not necessary to like Woody Allen's work to recognize his brilliance. But Allen has been demoted from iconic entertainer and creative genius, to the ignominious and untouchable caste of the "creepy" male.
And creep, the pejorative, has been and remains one of the most powerful rhetorical tools of condemnation of a man in western society. Speaking technically, in actuality it tells a listener nothing about the condemned "creep" male. Truthfully, all anyone is actually informed of by application of that insult is the internal emotional state of a woman flinging that outward judgement. She "feels" creeped out, because of some real or imagined imputation of undesirable motive or character of whatever male was noticed without fitting her checklist of "turns-me-on."
One of this article's authors was once loudly and publicly labeled "creepy" by teenagers whom he had moved his seat in a coffee shop to avoid. He had been reading as he waited for a colleague. Apparently reading in a coffee shop is creepy now.
And in the ongoing cultivation of moral panic at the apparently omnipresent, all pervasive, and universal sexual assault continuously perpetrated against women by men – the words creep and creepy are tossed out in easy routine, particularly by any of the leisure caste whose feelings, or even feigned feelings, are flustered by any masculine specimen judged or imagined to manifest or express any aspect of his own male sexual identity in a manner not concordant with a consensus feminine checklist of "does-he-turn-me-on." Creep! We hear, and turn our eyes away from whatever poor condemned bastard has just been pronounced outcast, unclean and untouchable.
This is one of the problematic uses of "creep." Men are labelled creepy when they express sexual attention towards a woman, without checking her criteria of visible wealth, status, and other makes-her-tingle minutia.
But they can also be called creepy because their male sexual attention is simply imagined. This particular expression of narcissism is tied deeply into Rape Culture Culture (RCC).
Rape Culture (RC) is the gynocentric conceit that all women are so supremely desirable they are in constant danger of being raped by men who simply cannot control themselves. Since this delusion isn't actually true, the term is also a misnomer. However, as populist narrative continues to claim this item of gyno-flattering victimpolitic it's more accurate to use the term Rape Culture Culture (RCC).
It requires women to define themselves as that which is desired by men. Since they imagine themselves desirable, it takes little effort to imagine that any specific man desires them. And those men whom they reject based on insufficient stimulation of lady-boner are thereby defined as "creeps".
Based entirely on imagined desire.
It's genuinely fucked up.
Social death, by the public announcement of squeamish female's feelings. Her feelings – whoever it may be that "she" is – are the only feelings of import, and we are all to abide by such public pronouncement.

A man, no, less than that, a mere male, without conforming to feminine consensus of “does-he-make-me-tingle,” has allowed himself to have, or to express, his own sexual identity. Compounding this crime, a man not conforming himself into a positive, approved-of, deferential-to-women model of success-object or status-object, still imagined he had a right to sexual identity of his own, or expression of his sexuality without first asking permission.
Not tall, not muscular, not stereotypically a leader of men, alpha commander, not a beefcake in Savile Row: The outcast! How dare he be a sexual being?! Creep!! Condemn all such rotters to social death by feminine consensus.
In reality, only high-sexual-status lady-creatures are going to be able to attract the high-desirability man-beasts. It’s not about being at the top of the entire chain of command, it’s more about understanding that almost all women aspire to shag upwards which means by logical necessity, all men must date in the downhill direction.
When men take a shot at fornicating upwards, they are labelled creeps by women who see themselves as having higher sexual status. He, the upward dater, has violated one of the prime gynocentric social rules.
A rule that denies men the right to their own individual sexual identifies.
Creep.
It is an assault on the humanity and the public personhood of a man – because he dared have a sexual identity without approval.
Creep.
It is tossed off flippantly by women and girls, and almost always immediately supported by the agreement of the greater mass of our society.
Creep.
It is sexual.
Creep.
And, it is harassment. It might even be assault.

Pathei Mathos – The Male Experience

AVfM Video Source · 25 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Men Going Their Own Way: while it's an exciting path of exploration, it's also one at times with dark turns and a lot of pain. The incomparable Spetsnaz has a presentation on it that words can't do justice to:

You should subscribe.

This is What a Feminist Looks Like

AVfM Video Source · 25 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

“Remember kids, privilege is the new original sin, and you must redeem yourself in the eyes of the Mother Goddess if you hope to be saved. Convert your local male to indefinite servitude in the name of equal treatment!”
Victor Zen encountered a real feminist promoting tyranny with a smile. Zen oppresses her in the way only a ginger can: by hurling enough bricks of logic to entomb her arguments on impact.

Don’t forget to subscribe to Victor Zen if you are into raping and pillaging or whatever.

Prove your allegations, Glen Canning!

Patrick John Doran (aka TheMadShangi) · 25 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Glen Canning is the father of Rehtaeh Parsons. Rehtaeh was a 17-year-old girl who tragically took her own life (by hanging) after what her friends and family say were two years of torment and abuse. A photo of Rehtaeh's alleged gang-rape went "viral" and the internet has been flooded with allegations and speculation demanding public attention to the case.

When I gave my attention and asked too many critical questions, Mr. Canning developed a problem with me not buying the official story – and expressing my opinion about it on an open forum.

To be clear, these allegations of rape have yet to be proven in a court of law, and the accused will never get the chance to face their accuser. So far, after two official investigations, only two boys have had charges pressed and they are charged with child porn, not rape. As minors at the time of the incident, the accused can not be named. Recently, one of the accused has pleaded guilty for breaching the terms of his release by drinking alcohol.

The child porn charges appear to be a political maneuver to satisfy a biased, bloodthirsty public that has only been fed a lot of hearsay and propaganda coming directly from Glen Canning and Leah Parsons.

In fact, it seems that, in the year since Rehtaeh's death, there's been some public evidence that both Leah Parsons and Glen Canning have been very active in trying to silence critics of the Rehtaeh Parsons story. Leah Parsons was featured on the Dr. Phil television show and used her victim status to shame the producers into submission after an "offensive" question was asked on Twitter. Ahead of the taping, Dr. Phil triggered an onslaught of criticism on Twitter by crowdsourcing opinions on the segment's subject matter. The tweet from Dr. Phil's account asked: "If a girl is drunk, is it okay to have sex with her? Reply with a yes, or no to @DrPhil #teensaccused"

This was followed by the obligatory apology to all offended.

Glen Canning, himself, appears to have used the tragedy and media attention to gain a following on his own, personal Twitter and Blog. He has also seems to have exploited his following on the internet to silence his critics. Several posts from a blogger known as "Baconfat53" have been removed due to legal requests to Google made by Glen Canning himself (for example: this post). The David Amos Rant blog even reports that Glen Canning had asked him for info on the blog's author. An excerpt from an e-mail sent by Glen Canning:

> "On 8/14/13, Glen Canning <email removed> wrote:
> Do you know who bacon fat is? I'm trying to get Anonymous to hack > his blog and out him. “

I have also been personally involved with Mr. Canning and his bullying tactics.
Glen Canning has labeled me a “rape apologist” for expressing my opinion on the comments section of this article. I do not apologize for rape, sir. I condemn it. However, I also believe there is a thing called due process and that allegations as serious as rape should be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.
In the interest of real justice, I have spoken out against the biased media propaganda. Let the accused be tried in a court of law, not public opinion. After two investigations and still no credible evidence to support rape charges, there are plenty of reasons to be skeptical. Especially when you consider the statement by Rehtaeh’s friend, who claimed her and her mother tried repeatedly to get Rehtaeh to leave the house party, where she was allegedly naked and acting flirtatious with the two accused.
One of the four alleged boys was, apparently, not even at the party! Christie Blatchford reported this and the mainstream media lynch mob crucified her for it. Blatchford should, instead, be applauded for having the courage to at least inject some objectivity into the mix and present another point of view other than what was already regurgitated from Leah Parson’s Facebook campaign.
I’ve read all the hype. I know what the allegations are and what the media has reported. I have still seen nothing released to the public resembling anything even remotely close to hard, concrete evidence backing up these allegations.
It seems to me, from where I’m sitting, that Rehtaeh Parsons was not gang-raped, she was the willing participant in a drunken orgy. I do not believe anybody should have taken a picture and spread it around school to smear her reputation. That’s just cruel and intolerable. I also understand the feelings of angry, grieving parents. However, I will not lay down and let you get away with exploiting your victim-card to suppress criticisms of your unproven allegations. You don’t get to claim “at least I never raised a rapist,” Glen Canning. Prove it. I believe the real fault lies with the parents for being irresponsible and failing to supervise their children. Glen, why was your daughter permitted to drink and use drugs at her age in the first place? It wouldn’t be a stretch to assume she would also be sexually active at a party.
I’m not joining the lynch mob you helped create. Call me a “rape apologist” all you like, you just have to prove she was raped first. Put up, or shut up. As for the rest of the good people at AVFM reading this: think for yourselves. That’s the most important message we should take away from this story. Don’t believe everything you read without checking your sources, and be leery of the victim industrial complex propaganda in the media.
Editorial note: this item originally appeared on Men’s Rights Edmonton.–DE Men die in EuroMaidan in Ukraine. Hooray feminism?!

Lucian Vâlsan · 26 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This article is also available in Swedish and Portuguese.

It happened again. The Swedish media did its best to find something feminist (or at least perceivably feminist) in the fact that over 100 men died and over 600 people (mostly men) were wounded during the violent clash between the EuroMaidan protesters and the governmental forces of the pro-Russian Ukrainian government lead with an iron fist by Viktor Yanukovych.

The editor of the Swedish newspaper Dagens Nyheter, Peter Wolodarski, writes in his latest piece[1] that the violent acts that occurred in Kyiv were "in fact" the worst in Europe since the Balkan Wars. Wolodarski then tries to provide a timeline of the events that occurred in the last 4 months in Ukraine in such manner so as not to upset the very thin sensibilities that govern the Swedish media.

He chooses to insert a carefully selected quote from an article published in NY Books[2] by Timothy Snyder which says:

> The diversity of the Maidan is impressive: the group that monitors hospitals so that the regime cannot kidnap the wounded is run by young feminists. An important hotline that protesters call when they need help is staffed by LGBT activists.

There are at least two problems with this quote. The first problem is that it's simply not true.

There are no feminists who run anything right now on EuroMaidan and haven't for quite some time – long before the violence escalated. The feminists, by their own admission (through various propaganda mouthpieces such as OtherNews, The Nation, Anarcho-Communist/Syndicalist websites, etc.) left the scene at the end of last year. They realized that the EuroMaidan, as a whole, thinks it's inappropriate to spout messages like "Freedom, Equality, Sisterhood" or "Europe is sex education" while facing bigger problems like the State sending Orwellian text messages to any citizens who dare to walk the streets and voice disagreement with the State.[3]

The fact that an American intellectual got things partially wrong when it comes to things happening in Eastern Europe is not news for anyone who engages in sensible thinking. Timothy Snyder's report tried to counteract the demonization against EuroMaidan protesters that has been going on in English-language media for the last month with an otherwise sensible article. But, intended or not, the consequence was to give fodder to the Swedish feminist establishment and allow Dagens Nyheter to pull yet another stunt.

This brings us to the second problem with the quote: The fact that Peter Wolodarski should have known better.

Peter Wolodarski was born in Sweden but he is the son of the relatively well-known architect Aleksander Wolodarski, who fled Communist Poland in the late 1960s. Given this connection, his father could have told him what it's like to live in an authoritarian regime, and how feminism is viewed in Eastern Europe. It should have made him think twice and check the veracity of the statement made by Mr. Snyder. It should have provided him with a more honest view.

The fact of the matter is that, besides FEMEN and a few anarcho-communist-oriented individuals, there is no feminism in Ukraine. And both these factions are frowned upon by pretty much everyone in Ukraine.

The anarcho-communists (or anarcho-syndicalists as they sometimes like to refer to themselves) have whined on various forums that they were shown the door when they tried to subvert Euromajdan claiming that the "far-right" (whatever that is) is oppressing them.

Outlets like The Nation rushed to paint everyone on the Majdan as a bunch of violent extremists.

Yet who is the extremist? A bunch of unarmed men being cut down by sniper shots for daring to disagree with the State?[4] Or maybe the music teachers, the violinists, the attorneys or the former sportsmen who also dare to disagree with the State?[5]

The reality is that one can better understand what EuroMaidan is really about by watching the various raw unedited streams that were (and some still are at the moment of this writing) broadcast over the Internet straight from the site of the conflict. This possibility gives us the chance to see beyond what the ideologues of any flavor want us to see or hear. And I, for one, after over a month of watching and listening closely to hours of daily live and recorded broadcasts from Kyiv and other Ukrainian cities, I've never found evidence for most of the claims that the media tells me are happening in the EuroMaidan.

Feminists and women are words to be used interchangeably in the minds of most mainstream Swedish journalists. But if Peter Wolodarski really wanted to talk about the involvement of women on EuroMaidan, then he probably should have mentioned that women were explicitly asked to leave the scene before the violence escalated, both by the leaders of the protests[6] and by the governmental forces.[7] And a significant proportion of them chose to ignore the warning and stayed there to offer food, warm tea[8] and prepare Molotov cocktails.[9] Interestingly enough, this fact remained unexploited by the feminist media and it's quite tempting to engage in speculation as to why this happened.

It's not the first time we've seen this narrative, nor will it be the last.

During the Arab Spring, the Western European media (especially the Swedish media) pulled similar stunts, claiming that women were at the forefront of the fight for liberty – while men were the only ones doing the fighting and suffering the consequences (death and injuries). In one of the few protests dominated by women in Egypt, the favorite chant was:[10]

> Drag me, strip me, my brothers' blood will cover me!

The NY Times article where the quote is coming from even has the audacity to claim that women "stood at the forefront of the initial revolt." Is this how women stand at the forefront of a revolt? By demanding more blood be shed by men?

Going back even more, during the Kosovo war, the Western media literally effaced[11] the men from any reporting – even when men were being killed solely because they were men and women were being carried out from harm's way solely because they were women.

To add insult to injury, organizations such as Women for Women UK seize the opportunity, even today, to commemorate the Srebrenica massacre (in which men were killed en-masse because they were men) to talk about… the sufferings of women.[12]

Let me be clear: I have an enormous amount of respect for the women of Ukraine who didn't submit to the feminist narrative and didn't pull the gender card when shit hit the fan. They've earned my respect and the respect of tens of millions of Eastern Europeans who have been at the point where the people of Ukraine are right now.

But there's also a fundamental truth that can not and should not be either brushed off or sugar-coated. The truth is that men, and mostly men, are the ones driving the revolts against tyrannical regimes and it is men, and virtually only men, who water the tree of liberty with their blood!

If you're a journalist and this truth offends you or, worse, you explicitly refuse to acknowledge it, as is the case with Peter Wolodarski, then you are part of the problem.

AVFM Sverige editor, Gustav Evensen, writes:[13]

> The day I'll read in the mainstream media that "there were men at the forefront of the fight for freedom," in any context, that's the day I will begin to believe that there is hope for equality in Sweden.

Gustav is being kind. The bigger problem than the lack of equality in the media reporting is the huge propensity to outright lying. It would not (necessarily) be evidence of equality if the mainstream media would write about men being at the forefront of the fight for freedom – but it would definitely be evidence of the media becoming more truthful. Unfortunately, we not only lost the balance in the media (if we ever had it) but we've lost sight of even the most basic commonsensical truths. And for that, Peter Wolodarski is partly to blame!

References:

[1] http://www.dn.se/ledare/signerat/peter-wolodarski-moskvas-man-skjuter-medan-putin-ser-pa-os/ – Peter Wolodarski: Moskvas män skjuter medan Putin ser på OS, published in Dagens Nyheter, 24.02.2014 (in Swedish)

[2] http://www.nybooks.com/articles/archives/2014/mar/20/fascism-russia-and-ukraine/?insrc=hpss – Timothy Snyder – Fascism, Russia, and Ukraine, published in NY Books, 19.02.2014
[3] http://motherboard.vice.com/en_ca/blog/maybe-the-most-orwellian-text-message-ever-sent – Brian Merchant – Maybe the Most Orwellian Text Message a Government's Ever Sent, published in Vice, 21.01.2014.
[4] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2563609/Truce-Kiev-collapses-hours-official-day-mourning-28-people-killed-protests-erupts-violence.html – Ted Thonrhill – Harrowing footage emerges of UNARMED protesters being cut down by sniper fire on a day of violence in Kiev that has brought today's death toll to at least 70, published in Daily Mail, 20.02.2014
[5] http://www.nytimes.com/2014/02/22/world/europe/growing-support-and-tea-from-young-women-embolden-kiev-street-fighters.html – Andrew E. Kramer – Growing Support, and Tea From Young Women, Embolden Kiev Street Fighters, published in The New York Times, 21.02.2014
[6] http://www.montrealgazette.com/news/opposition+demonstrator+holds+Molotov+cocktail+during+clashes+with+police+Kiev+February+2014+Opposition+leader+Vitali+Klitschko+Tuesday+urged+women+children+leave+opposition+main+protest+camp+Kiev+Independence+Square+known+Maidan+riot/9521200/story.html – "We ask women and children to quit Maidan as we cannot rule out the possibility that they will storm (the camp)," – Opposition leader Vitali Klitschko.
[7] http://www.france24.com/en/20140218-live-ukraine-kiev-protesters-killed-clashes-police/
[8] ibidem 5
[9] http://www.ynetnews.com/articles/0,7340,L-4490282,00.html
[10] http://www.nytimes.com/2011/12/21/world/middleeast/violence-enters-5th-day-as-egyptian-general-blames-protesters.html
[11] http://adamjones.freeservers.com/effacing.htm – Adam Jones, Ph.D. – Effacing the Male: Gender, Misrepresentation, and Exclusion in the Kosovo War, Published in: Transitions: The Journal of Men's Perspectives, 21: 1-3 (2001)
[12] http://www.womenforwomeninternational.org.uk/blog/in-the-country-2013-peace-march-in-bosnia-and-herzegovina/
[13] http://se.avoiceformen.com/nytt/feminister-och-hbt-aktivister-i-ukraina-lyfts-fram/ – Gustav Evensen – Feminister och HBT-aktivister i Ukraina lyfts fram, Published in: AVFM Sverige, 24.02.2014 (in Swedish)

Editor's note: "Euromaidan" is also spelled "Euromajdan" in multiple sources; the latter appears closer to the native spelling used by the protestors. –DE

The 2014 Oscars... er, THELMAS! And the winner is....

Robert Sides · 26 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Oscars (statues presented annually by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences) will be awarded on Sunday, March 2nd.
The Thelmas are awarded annually, too, by the MHRM for feminist films (real, imagined, or amended) that have done the most to drive gender justice over the cliff:

This year's nominees are:
Acronymph()maniac: BTFU!
Starring Desiccated Valenti (she of the "dry gulch"). This 5-part oeuvre goes beyond the familiar acronyms (SNAFU=Situation Normal, All Fucked UP and LOL=Laughing Out Loud) to the feminist. That is: BTFU=Back the Fuck Up!
Part I focuses on Ms. Valenti's exasperation when she finds her computer data has— YET AGAIN!— been corrupted. She writes a note to herself on the wall: "Back the fuck up!"
Part II is advice given to a pegged lesbian "wide receiver" to "back the fuck up" when her partner presents a salacious strap-on.
Part III is a plea to wimmin world-wide to support other loony lasses, like psycho-sista Prof. Gail Dines: "Please, back the fuck-up/dingbat."
Part IV deals with Thelma's reaction when she finally does the math and sees how high the cliff is ("Back the fuck up NOW, Louise!"). Finally…
Part V deals with a cursed guardian angel. A former feminist, she is punished in the after-life by having to constantly whisper in Ms. Valenti's ear, "Byotch, that's fucked up!"
23 Years A Slave: A Divorced Father's Fate
A supposedly free man, while on a trip to Separation City, is captured by feminist federales. He learns that while married hombres are obliged to care for their kids only until they are 18, his now-ex is forcing him to pay another 5 years…including college. Soundtrack by Devo ("Whip it!")
Captain Pheddup
Yet another too-trusting beta-boyo boater gets captured by feminazis on the Ovarian Ocean. Luckily, the MRM marines arrive in time, rescuing him from the high-seas harridans. The Poonani Pirates are subsequently marooned on Bonobo Island, where females are expected to do all traditional male jobs (like coal mining, Internet creating, and flatulence emitting). As the movie ends, the entire feminist population is seen outdoors: shivering and whining…lacking food, heat, shelter, children, men to blame, and Oprah re-runs.
Cavity: The Search for Male Assets
A never-sated divorced momster has the NSA perform a MMAP (Monetary Martian Anal Probe) on her ex to dig out any remaining money…and/or remnants of his dignity. The gravity of his plight is lost on other males who think only rabid guys get reamed.
Debbie Does Dallas: Buyer's Remorse
A feminist does reverse-cowgirls with sundry sports teams. When her husband espies online evidence of her whorerific behavior, she claims the Gatorade was spiked. Miraculously, others suddenly become responsible for her choices: half the NFL is arrested, hundreds are put on waivers, even more placed in sex-offender registries. Meanwhile ,The Debster nets millions in patriarchal compensation and moves to Femlandia with her 700 cats.
Despicable Men, Part Deux
Women's groups seduce Federal agents, photograph the philandering, and force them to host the Blame Games. Fierce, feisty fembots in Femerica then set out to capture, jail, and punish all males for daring to breathe, sport danglers, and rape Ma Earth with plows (supposedly to feed folks: yeah, right!).
Earnest or Celibate
Western males are forced to attend womandatory courses in cash creation. They learn that if they failest to earnest sufficienteth moolah, they will be denied entry to Poonani City. That is, supposedly equal wimmin will not only close their minds, but their legs, if guys don't bring enough bling.

Femerican Hustlers

There's trouble right there in River City as teh wimminz threaten to play rigged pool games using severed testicles. Luckily, the MRM arrives on the scene: a badass band of 76 trom-boners .They also play chin music on some demented demoiselles who soon pine for lost the daze of whine-and-roses.

Her: The One Never Blamed

A thoroughly modern woman, born without the responsibility gene, demonstrates how vaginates are never held accountable. The film begins with a near-endless list of duties females duck (frontline combat, steel-making, road construction, test-piloting, etc.) and ends with feminists demanding women run everything since, well, they have no experience.

Inside Loony Davis

A documentary, this film explores the gender gap. That is, the void between feminist ears. It explains women's movement mysteries in simple layman's terms. Like why we smell smoke when a feminist tries to think. And why female academics get headaches when they sit too long.

Iron, Man (Then Do the Dishes!)

This historical survey shows how modern males became domesticated. We learn how feminists transformed the descendants of Genghis Khan into today's 101st Diapers-and-Dishes Division. It explains how guys went from manufacturing tanks to giving thanks whenever "She Who Must Be Obeyed" pats their heads.

The Wind Rises: Feminist Filosofy & Flatulence

An average Joe, thinking he's attending a focus group for new, improved Beano, mistakenly walks into a Gender Issues forum. He stays because he mistakes the hot air emitted by feminist fundamentalists for normal fundament emissions involved with legume digestion.

She-wolves on Thomas Ball Street

After a distraught father kills himself, packs of wild feminists proceed to tear his reputation to shreds. They show no mercy, howling at the moon and to media moonbats. They demonstrate, once again, that males are demons unworthy of empathy. Real wimmin don't care about men who die protecting female suffrage. Instead, they focus on grave matters…like entering a room only to see two others wearing your dress style. Rated VI (Vomit-Inducing).

The Invisible Woman: When Responsibility Calls

A modern-day Diogenes wanders the land looking for an honest feminist. He learns that supposed "super women" treat responsibility like kryptonite. That is, they flee it like Hillary does spotted blue dresses.

Prisoners: Married Men in the West

(Original title: The Penile Colony). This tragi-comedy compiles familiar family farces. Like all-powerful men begging for beer money and macho muchachos sitting in Time-Out chairs before being allowed to watch ESPN for 15 minutes. A father living in Indiana is shown on all fours, mowing his lawn with toe-nail clippers, while his wife sips cosmos on his saddled back. "Hoosier Daddy?"

Now, feel free to contribute your own reviews. Use current nominees, or films from other years, or even make up your own…like:

EXODUS, Stage Left!

A rabbi, fed up with his nagging Yeti-of-a-yenta wife, chooses art over alimony. He moves to an island off the South Bronx, changes his name to Gaugin-with-the-Wind, and becomes a guru to Galt-going goyim everywhere.

Joe versus the Volcano

An AFC (average frustrated chump) struggles valiantly, but in vain, to find peace while married to a volatile bipolar bimbo.

The Man Who Would Be King

A fetus named Martin Luther spends month-after-month in Uteria, hoping the lone female sheriff holding him captive will let him leave alive.

Up!

The direction in which Family Court judges advise their male victims to insert their rulings…as in "Up yours!"

The Magnificent Seven

A choir of pro-male women gather at the Temple of the Male Mensch. They kneel before a statue of a 7-foot-long schlong and sing its praises.

Hamburger Hill

A near-70 chubby, cankled Clinton enters the political meat-grinder. Empowered by her philandering husband (Bubba-the-Boinker) and coddled by white-knight reporters, she is shocked to find herself grilled by MRAs, MGTOWs, Go-Get'em Galts, and non-sycophant media.

Here's a site for other 2013 movies:

http://www.imdb.com/year/2013/

Finally, here's last year's offerings:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/miscellaneous/when-oscar-met-thelma/

Nick Reading has a request and suggestion

AVfM Video Source · 26 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On Tuesday March 11 the Unviversity of Alberta will be holding a forum called “Men and Feminism,” including Dr. Barret Weber and Dr. Lise Gotell, who have in the past made allegations about Men’s Rights Activists in general and Men’s Rights Edmonton in particular. They have in the past said that anyone may attend for free, but now want a $3,000,000 insurance policy for Nick Reading to attend if he brings in a camera. Nick calculates that this probably isn’t worth the cost, and instead asks them if they plan on taping their event and putting it online, hoping they do. We hope they do too. Here’s what Nick’s got to say:

You should probably subscribe to Men’s Rights Edmonton.

"Defending Battered Women On Trial" aka Advocating Spousal Murder

AVfM Video Source · 26 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Elizabeth Sheehy has revealed a gold mine of information on how hateful ideological feminists have over the last few decades put together a set of rationalizations and legal practices to allow women to get away with murder.

You should subscribe to John the Other.

EU's Zero tolerance policy and the Swedish State – The Coming Censorship

Lucian Vâlsan · 27 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The European Parliament has accustomed us to anti-free speech legislation and with regulations that defy even the most basic notions of common sense in many areas. But what happens when the EU's zealotry meets the Swedish State's distaste for individual freedom? Well, it's now happening and feminist lies are at the point of contact.

Background information and timeline:

In order to understand the issue we need to understand how deep the rabbit hole goes as it pertains to the EU. The beginning of the current problem goes back 17 years, to 1997, when Sweden was still a new member in the EU.

In 1997, the European Parliament passed a resolution on the need to establish a EU-wide campaign for zero tolerance of violence against women[1]. That document was the beginning of the implementation of the insane laws morphing the EU into the huge feminist State that it is now, all under the guidance of the UN – especially CEDAW (Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women) which has gained clout over gender issues in the UN. That was the first time Europe had seen transnational pieces of legislation of this nature[2]:

> Urges Member States which have not already done so to make violence against women on the basis of the CEDAW definition a criminal act and to carry out a policy in line with all the obligations laid down in the Convention;

Special laws for people identifiable by their genetic code were rightfully considered a no-go zone until then as the memory of national-socialism was still relatively fresh. The resolution A4-0250/1997 broke that taboo however, and it contained 40 recommendations (a record for a document coming out from the European Parliament) that in today's world seems standard procedure for the feminist State but who were truly revolutionary in their time.

After the Pandora's Box was open, a huge number of regulations, reports, resolutions, working documents, recommendations and directives were passed through the institutions of the EU and then shoved down the throats of the citizenry through the subsidiarity principle brought in the EU through the treaty of Maastricht in 1992[3]. The subsidiarity principle is a principle according to which the EU should only intervene where the action of the individual countries is insufficient. And here's the catch: The ideologues in the EU get to determine what's sufficient and what's not. It's the perfect scheme to shove legislation down the throats of citizens and leave them no ability to protest.

From 1997 until 2011, both the EU and its twin sister institution – the Council of Europe (which is, at least in theory, an institution separate from the EU but with an identical agenda and which includes all countries of Europe except Vatican City, Belarus and Kazakhstan) have adopted multiple documents, in many cases seemingly disparate from each other on the issue of violence against women (and only against women).

The idea to fully involve the EU into the issue was validated once again in 2006 when the Swedish liberal MEP, Maria Carlshamre, submitted a legislative proposal in the European Parliament demanding a zero tolerance policy for violence against women and guaranteed income for battered women. 545 MEPs from the 614 present voted in favor of her proposal[4] – a proposal which basically allowed the EU to override any procedures and practices that the local police forces might have had and replace them with the "correct" procedures as dictated by the EU.

In 2010 the European Commission drafted the Strategy for Gender Equality 2010-2015 which, although it's referenced in a lot of documents, little is known about what exactly it entails.

2011 was the decisive turning point when the Council of Europe(CoE) drafted the infamous Istanbul Convention[4] about which we reported at length.

After the pivotal moment in 2011 the EU establishment focused exclusively on gathering all these disparate documents and transforming them into policies to be strictly enforced.

For those unfamiliar with the complicated bureaucratic procedures of the EU, in order for a piece of legislation adopted by the Parliament to enter into force, it also needs approval from the European Commission (not necessary in most of these cases since the proposals came from the Commission itself) and from the European Council (also known as the Council of the European Union or The Council of Ministers).

So they did just that. On December 6, 2012, the Council of the European Union had a meeting in which they agreed with everything Ms. Maria Carlshamre proposed in 2006 and proposed to have the year 2015 declared as the European Year on Zero Tolerance for Violence against Women[6]. If this comes to fruition (and there's little chance that it won't), then the EU will have the legal excuse to focus in 2015 almost exclusively on the topic and thus merge even more policies that will harm millions of men and children in the 28 nations of the EU.

The February 25 resolution

Keeping in mind the meeting from December 2012, and remembering the fact that Italy already adopted the Istanbul Convention, we come to the last plenary of the European Parliament which took place between February 24 and February 27, 2014.

On February 25, in Strasbourg, the European Parliament adopted the document called 2013/2004(INL) which is a resolution with recommendations to the Commission on combating Violence Against Women[7].

This document is basically a condensed version of virtually all feminist-inspired documents that came out from the EU bureaucracy and its affiliates since 1997 until present day and, unlike other more vague documents, this one is also pretty explicit.

The motivation segment of the document (in which the Parliament explains the basis on which it adopts the resolution) is, with the risk of sounding hyperbolic, Orwellian in nature. Article B states[8]:

> Whereas gender-based violence involves victims and perpetrators of all ages, educational backgrounds, incomes and social positions and is linked to the unequal distribution of power between women and men and to ideas and behaviours based on stereotypes in our society which need to be combated at the earliest stage with a view to changing attitudes;

"Behaviors based on stereotypes in our society which need to be combated at the earliest stage with a view to changing attitudes" is basically the justification of the genderless kindergartens in Sweden which are nothing less than a radical ideological experiment with children as young as 3 being used as lab rats for the gender feminist insanity.

Articles C and D are the perfect example of EU doublespeak[9]:

> C. Whereas women are increasingly being subjected to violence at the hands of husbands, partners, ex-husbands, or former partners; whereas in some countries the number of victims has risen sharply and the consequences that they suffer have shown a tendency to become far more serious, extending even to death and statistics show, the number of women killed is accounting for a growing proportion of the total murders;
>
> D. Whereas statistical surveys in some countries show that although the number of murders has not risen overall, the number of women killed is accounting for a growing proportion of the total, proving that violence against women is increasing

Men are the overwhelming majority of the victims of all types of violence. Yet somehow, through this kind of doublespeak, the EU makes it look not only that women suffer more, but that they suffer so much more that the EU needs to make a special law to be shoved down the throats of over 500 million people.

Article G is a matter of serious concern[10]:

> Whereas new stereotypes, and forms of discrimination and violence have arisen recently from the growing use of online social networks, like abusive grooming practices targeting namely teenagers;

In other words, the EU wishes to tackle the speech posted online that "harms women."

As mentioned above, this document is pretty explicit. The non-feminist sector has always asserted that gender-based violence is just a buzzword used by the feminist establishment to enact misandric policies whilst seeming gender-neutral to the general public. Article I clears that up for everyone to see and understand[11]:

> Whereas violence is a traumatic experience for any man, woman or child, but gender-based violence is more often inflicted by men on women and girls, and both reflects and reinforces inequalities between men and women and compromises the health, dignity, security and autonomy of its victims;

So the EU finally admits it: gender-based violence is just a codeword for the women-good men-bad narrative. The document goes on and talks only about "male violence against women" on article M and introduces the concept of feminicide on article N – a concept unheard of in the European jurisprudence until now. The motivation segment of this resolution seems rather copy/pasted from a radfem blog.

But it gets worse with the recommendations segment[12]:

> 1. Requests the Commission to submit, by the end of 2014, on the basis of Article 84 TFEU, a proposal for an act establishing measures to promote and support the action of Member States in the field of prevention of violence against women and girls (VAWG), following the detailed recommendations set out in the Annex hereto;

Why the rush to have it submitted by the end of 2014? Because the idea is to have all the documents gathered when 2015 debuts when it will be (or at least the MEPs hope so) the European Year on Zero Tolerance for Violence against Women. There's no way to sugar coat this: The establishment is stepping up to gather all its weapons and strike hard against individual liberty during 2015.

As stated multiple times, this document is incredibly honest. Proposals 3 and 4:

> 3. Asks the Council to activate the passerelle clause, by adopting a unanimous decision identifying violence against women and girls (and other forms of gender based violence) as an area of crime listed in Article 83(1) TFEU;
>
> 4. Calls on the Commission to promote national ratifications and launch the procedure for the accession of the EU to the Istanbul Convention on violence against women, once it has evaluated the impact and added value the latter would have;

Basically – modify the very Treaty of the Functioning of the European Union to make the EU both de jure and de facto a gynocentric super-state and then use it to shove the Istanbul Convention down the throats of 28 unfortunate nations.

Although this exposé is getting lengthy, it is necessary for the reader to understand how all these are connected to each other and how it all connects with the Swedish State. Proposal 5 gives us the idea:

> 5. Requests the Commission to present an EU-wide Strategy and an Action Plan to combat all forms of violence against women and girls (VAWG), as foreseen in 2010 in the Action plan implementing the

> Stockholm programme, with the aim of protecting women's integrity, equality (Article 2 TEU), and well-being (Article 3(1) TEU) tangibly and effectively in an area of freedom, security and justice, focusing in particular on making women aware of their rights and men and boys (from an early age) of the need to respect women's physical and psychological integrity, in order to help prevent such violence […]

The Stockholm programme as a basis for a EU-wide Strategy and Action Plan as foreseen in 2010 – when the European Commission drafted the Strategy for gender equality 2010-2015, about which very little is known. Let that sink in. And remember this document comes after a European Council meeting in December 2012 which literally pled "no contest" on a legislative proposal passed in 2006 at the initiative of a Swedish MEP.

This may seem like a conspiracy theory – the only problem is that there are all the documents you need to verify the information yourself in the References section.

The brutal honesty of this document continues with proposals 8, 10 and 12:

> 8. Urges the Commission to establish in the next three years an EU Year to End Violence against Women and Girls with the aim of raising awareness among citizens and among all politicians of this widespread problem which affects all the Member States, with a view to presenting a clear plan of action to end violence against women;
>
> 10. Calls on the Member States and stakeholders, working with the Commission, to help disseminate information about EU programmes and the funding available under them to combat violence against women;
>
> 12. Considers that the financial implications of the requested proposal should be covered by the Union budget, Section III (ensuring full complementarity with existing budget line relating to the subject of the proposal);

So there you have it. If you needed absolute evidence that feminism and the EU are virtually indistinguishable and that all feminism really is about is money and political power, this is the best proof. The document speaks for itself and needs no interpretation.

We cannot assert with certainty that the documents released before 2012 were a concerted effort, but, given that it took the EU 6 years (from 2006 to 2012) to agree with the Swedish MEP's proposal and then in only 14 months we already have a resolution urging everyone to adopt the Istanbul Convention and all the radfem-inspired policies, it is very clear that the feminist establishment has been very busy in the 2013 and it intensified its efforts this year. It's not in the EU's nature to be that fast unless there's an underlying (ideological or financial) interest as the driving force – and in the case of feminism, this document proves beyond all reasonable doubt the ideological and financial interest.

And these things already have effects in the EU: Italy already has the Istanbul Convention, Spain, a country which is still recovering from Zapatero's Gender Stalinism regime already has portions of this document translated into the local procedures[13] and it even extended outside the EU all the way till Morocco[14] where the same zero tolerance message is being promoted.

Free speech and Men's Rights in Sweden

Now that we explained how did the EU get to this point and how the Swedish ideologues were the driving force inside the EU apparatus for promoting this, we need to go to the center of the problem: Sweden.

In July 2013, Maria Arnholm (the minister for Gender Equality), Lena Adelsohn-Liljeroth (the minister for Culture and Sports) and Erik Ullenhag (the Minister for Integration) wrote a piece in Expressen announcing that they'll spend one million Swedish kronor (a little over 110,000 €) to combat Internet hate[15]. They write:

> Hatred can be directed against both groups and to individuals, and the last year's intimidation and harassment of female debaters received particular attention.

Apparently, people disagreeing with female politicians and debaters on the Internet is such a huge issue that it deserves governmental action, a vast amount of public funds to be spent and all announced by a joint letter published by three ministers from the government. Their letter goes on to say:

> To help those affected , the government has given the police new tools to identify persons who commit offenses online. Now they can get the IP addresses also of those who commit hate crimes on the Internet. Although the provisions reagrding the penalties need to be reviewed to ensure that they apply regardless of whether a crime is committed on the net or not.

In other words – be politically incorrect on the Internet at your own peril.

But that's not all. In the same day, the same Maria Arnholm co-authored another article with Birgitta Ohlsson (the minister for EU affairs and democracy) published in the same place in which they announced allocating 4 million Swedish kronor (roughly 450,000 €) which were to be administered by the Youth Board (Ungdomsstyrelsen) to combat misogyny on the internet. In addition to that, they also requested the Justice Ministry to amend the Criminal Code to include criminal punishments for internet hate directed at women.

In Sweden, the most powerful feminist organizations ROKS and SKR (Sveriges Kvinno- och tjejjourers Riksförbund) have literally called the political parties to report to them about their policies regarding women because, you see, in Sweden it's not the feminists who seek the support of political parties as it's the case in the Netherlands, Poland or many other EU nations. No, in Sweden, the political parties report to the feminists. So far, Vänsterpartiet (The Leftist Party)[17] and Miljöpartiet (The Green Party)[18] have responded to the call and the feminists are confident that everyone will submit to them. Much patriarchy, indeed.

This month, the organization ROKS was very busy promoting a report about men's deadly violence against women – a report that is based on all such cases in the last two years[19]. There were exactly 7 such cases in Sweden between January 2012 and January 2014 by ROKS' numbers. Yet somehow ROKS manages to spin this as a national epidemic of male violence against women.

But it's not only ROKS and SKR. Recently, a conglomerate of NGOs announced that they will use two million Swedish kronor (roughly 225,000€) from the Swedish Inheritance Fund to tackle Destructive Masculinity Norms[20]. Their idea of such norms? That fathers in Sweden raise boys to become rapists. The purpose of the program? To get an enthusiastic-consent law passed in Sweden which would literally make all men guilty until proven otherwise when an allegation of sexual violence is made.

So there we go: We have the EU's Zero Tolerance policy which is in fact driven by Swedish gender ideologues and we have the madness in Sweden escalating at alarming rates as we speak. We also have a serious effort underway in Sweden to make sure no one goes online and criticizes the policies.

This is what we're up against in Europe right now when the establishment decided to intensify its efforts to eliminate any remaining trace of equality under the law between men and women and all the rights that many took for granted until very recently.

Make no mistake: Things are looking worse in Sweden but Sweden is basically a glimpse into everyone else's future if this madness isn't stopped once and for all.

The immediate solution is to check the list of feminist MEPs and make sure you don't vote any of the people that are on that list in the European elections this May. This may change the dynamics in the European Parliament for a while, but since the establishment is in a rush to pass everything it needs before the elections, other solutions are also needed.

Join us this Friday at AVFM The Voice of Europe radio program with William Andersson from AVFM Sweden. This is war! And we didn't start it!

References:

[1] http://www.legislationline.org/documents/id/8595 – The document A4-0250/1997, passed by the European Parliament.
[2] ibidem 1
[3] Shelton, Dinah. The Boundaries of Human Rights Jurisdiction in Europe. Published on: Duke J. Comp. & Int'l L., 2003, p. 153.
[4] http://www.conventions.coe.int/Treaty/EN/Treaties/Html/210.htm – The Istanbul Convention – full text.
[5] http://www.svd.se/nyheter/utrikes/eu-nolltolerans-for-kvinnovald_272419.svd – EU: Nolltolerans för kvinnovåld, published in: SvD Nyheter, 02.02.2006 (in Swedish)
[6] http://www.epha.org/a/5516 – Council conclusions on Combating Violence Against Women, and the Provision of Support Services for Victims of Domestic Violence
[7] http://www.europarl.europa.eu/sides/getDoc.do?pubRef=-//EP//TEXT+TA+P7-TA-2014-0126+0+DOC+XML+V0//EN&language=EN#BKMD-30 – European Parliament resolution of 25 February 2014 with recommendations to the Commission on combating Violence Against Women (2013/2004(INL)) – full text
[8] ibidem 7
[9] ibidem 7
[10] ibidem 7
[11] ibidem 7
[12] ibidem 7
[13] https://www.msssi.gob.es/ssi/violenciaGenero/EstrategiaNacional/pdf/Estrategia_Nacional_Ingles.pdf – National Strategy for the Eradication of Violence Against Women (2013-2016)
[14] http://www.enpi-info.eu/medportal/news/latest/35988/Morocco:-EU-funded-project-launches-campaign-to-combat-violence-against-women – Morocco: EU-funded project launches campaign to combat violence against women
[15] http://www.regeringen.se/sb/d/16935/a/219439 – Vi ger en miljon till arbetet mot näthat, published in Regeringskanasliet citing the newspaper Expressen, 25.07.2013
[16] http://www.regeringen.se/sb/d/17652/a/221058 – Näthat mot kvinnor ett demokratiproblem, published in Regeringskanasliet citing the newspaper Expressen, 25.07.2013
[17] http://www.kvinnojouren.se/vansterpartiet-diskuterar-mans-vald-mot-kvinnor-med-skr – Diskussion med Vänsterpartiet om mäns våld mot kvinnor (Discussion with the Leftist Party on men's violence against women), published in SKR Magazine, 23.01.2014
[18] http://www.kvinnojouren.se/miljopartiet-traffar-skr – Miljöpartiet träffar SKR, published in SKR Magazine, 22.01.2014
[19] http://www.roks.se/nyheter/2014-02-19/haverigruppens-forsta-rapport-om-myndighetsbrister-klar – Haverigruppens första rapport om myndighetsbrister klar, published in ROKS Magazine, 19.02.2014
[20] http://genusdebatten.se/destruktiva-maskulinitetsnormer/ MiT – Destruktiva maskulinitetsnormer, published in Genusdebatten, 24.02.2014

Man – the walking wallet

Clint Carpentier · 27 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Usually I don't have to put up with stupid shit. As most of you now know, I'm very introverted, so my encounters with "the real world" are few; but the last few of weeks have blown my mind, and I'm not even living in a major city center, I live in a "hick" city. This is spurred on by a video the Youtuber Sandman posted, it had a single line in it which was just too much for me to ignore, and I spent the afternoon at work obsessing over the last few weeks. This is the resulting rant.

I turned up at the flooring shop a couple of weeks ago to grab some supplies, banter with the staff, and make off like a bandit (it was payday). There was this guy at the counter, well-kept younger guy. From what I gathered, he owns a jewelry store, is about to get married, and is about to sign off on flooring bill.

The saleslady dealing with him obligatorily asks, "And you're sure this is the one you want?"

He responds rather off-handedly, "It's the one she picked. Whatever makes her happy, right?"

And the saleslady says something like, "It's usually for the best."

The female manager couldn't resist adding her two cents in, "What do they say? Happy wife, happy life." And he grins ecstatically.

I cannot express enough, the sheer stupidity of this encounter. I was mentally screaming at him, but I could not say a thing, because my job relies on men like him. Single men and single women, do NOT buy flooring. Married women buy flooring, with the money of these walking wallets. Being a jeweller, he should have seen the irony of his situation; men have no use for jewellery, and single women won't spend their own money on expensive jewellery. Jewellers and flooring guys like us would starve if women never got married to blue-pill morons.

Shortly after that, I was working at this older woman's house; and we were conversing, incidentally, over the Olympics. It may have been a mistake, but it was calculated, and the conversation took the direction of my stating that I was an anti-feminist. As a result, we spent the next twenty minutes shooting down the same tired old arguments about so-called male privilege.

While we came to a reasonable middle ground on the rape issue (she abjectly refuses to believe feminism promotes rape culture, but, she decries the thought of young men being falsely accused and convicted without due process), we never did come to consensus on the wage gap.

She then launched into a story about a couple she knew who bought houses, renovated them, and turned them over for a profit. The man had some prestigious profession but she couldn't recall that the woman had a job… she just had the final say on interior decorating.

Look guys, you potential walking wallets, you really need to assess the value of the women you're gonna marry. It doesn't matter if you have the money or not; it really doesn't matter. You can afford to keep her happy but what is she doing for you? What can or will she do for you, that you can NOT do for yourself? I'm talking about YOU spending two-thirds of YOUR net income, to get that value out of her; what is THAT value?

If it's the sex, then you married a prostitute. If you need to spend money on her to make her wet for you, you need to reassess your pick of bride. If money is what makes her tolerate your flaws , you will be spending money on garbage, for the rest of your… marriage. Afterwards, you'll be spending money on her lawyer. Marriage, in this day in age, is legitimized prostitution. It's actually worse. If you demand sex, it's spousal abuse. If you withhold sex, it's spousal abuse. And if she decides you forced her to perform, it becomes marital rape. You're gonna marry her because she's sexy? Well sure… for now.

She cooks? What does she cook? I can attest, that it is cheaper, as a single, to eat out for every meal, than it is to have her cook for you. And unless she's a damn good cook, you will spend the duration of your marriage, LYING about her cooking. They can't cook!!! Just look in the cupboard, it's full of pre-fab meals; you can make that crap yourself, just as good, because they all come with instructions on them.

Before third wave feminism, when women bantered, "what's your recipe?" They really actually meant, "what's your recipe?" Now when they ask it, they expect you to show them a box or can. And they can't even be bothered to make sure you're eating healthy; I wanna tell you a secret: fast food is healthier than most of the crap in the grocery store.

She cleans your house? So you're gonna marry a maid. You know you can hire maids, fifteen bucks an hour, for three hours, once a week. Unless you're a real slob, such as myself; then it's four hours a week. Likely she's gonna demand you do your share of the housework, even if she chooses to be a housewife, so what's the point?
You have things in common? You actually think that she's interested in your hobbies? It's a dating MO to hijack your hobby, to get you interested in them. Once she has succeeded, she's gonna dump your hobby like an old tampon, and she will eventually expect you to do so as well. The goal is that you shouldn't need anything else but her, you should spend more attention on her, she has needs didn't you know about. Your needs will revolve around what she thinks she need – end of story.
She's pretty and brings warmth to your home? Dolls are pretty, and you can buy a fine doll for the expected price of an engagement ring; and it's a one time payment, not a down payment on a lifelong promise to spreading your wallet.
Now look guys, if your answer to any real or imagined relationship problem, is to reach for your credit card, you really need to assess the value what you're purchasing.
That's the real issue; you're opening your wallet, why are you opening your wallet? You bought her a house, demand she pay her half of the mortgage, or you sell it. You bought her a car, demand she make up half the payment, or you sell it. Better yet, covertly bank half your check, and see how long she makes due with the half you have to offer. Will she step up, put up, or fuck off? Learn to say no, tell her to buy it herself. You have no use for flowers, flowers die. Why buy her flowers? Buy her seeds and gardening gloves and tell her to work for her flowers.
Marriage is supposed to be a partnership. That means both parties have expected value, with expected separation equity; the one who puts in more, gets more out. You are opening your wallet at her bequest; do you really think anything will go back into that wallet when the marriage falls apart? Close your wallet.
I've seen more newlyweds fall apart over building brand new houses, than I have over boozing. Something is wrong with that reality.

Prentice Powell Performs 'Good Father'

AVfM Video Source · 27 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Impossible to add anything here:

Lies, Damned Lies, and Charles Clymer

Dean Esmay · 28 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is difficult to know at times what to say about people like Charles Clymer. Having accused A Voice for Men of refusing to debate women and then ignored all requests for debate or discussion with female MRAs, having publicly promised to send us an article with supposed errors or just plain wrong things we've published on AVfM and then ignoring all emails asking him to provide that so we could print it on our front pages (which we would still do by the way) we've instead seen him publicly claiming he wants to "start a debate" on places like Twitter and Facebook and then refusing further debate requests (especially, it appears, with women who might question him) and writing silly things like Five Things More Likely To Happen To You Than Being Accused Of Rape, in which, according to Charles, a man is considerably more likely to be hit by a comet, become an NFL player, be hit by lightning, and so on, than to ever be falsely accused of rape.

We shouldn't have to say so, but all his figures are headache-inducing and wrong. We're used to seeing bad math from feminists, such as when they behave as if that the vast majority of domestic violence victims are women beaten by men. That's just a lie, parity or near-parity in domestic violence is no longer scientifically disputable–indeed, it's hard not to suspect that, in recent years, feminists have turned the rape hysteria knob up several notches because they know the clock is ticking on the Domestic Violence issue: the facts just are not on their side, and they increasingly seem to know it; women are just as violent as men in intimate partner relationships, so what else can they use to gin up fear for women?

But my God, even the Domestic Violence industry has never been so brazen as to be off by factors of thousands, even tens of thousands, like Clymer's article on rape.

Let's be clear here that the problem is not because his math is bad per se; it appears from what I can see that he is adding and subtracting and multiplying and dividing properly–as in, he is not asserting that 3+12=5. Instead, he's applying his math improperly. What he's doing is very much like noting that about 1.1% of motor vehicle traffic fatalities involve motorcycles, and about 98.1% of motor vehicle fatalities involve cars or trucks, and concluding that if you ride a motorcycle you have a 1% chance of dying, and you have a 98% chance of dying if you ride in a car or truck. So, everybody ditch your SUV death traps and get a much safer Kawasaki Ninja!

Does that sound like crazy logic, wrong in multiple ways at once? Well that's because it is. But believe it or not, it's arguably less crazy than what Clymer's written.

Since that Buzzfeed article does not show his work, we probably want to look at his blog post on rape written a few days before the Buzzfeed piece. That article starts by noting the FBI records about 84,000 forcible rapes per year in the US, and the FBI suggests about 8 of those are false accusations. He then goes on to calculate that, given the average man has sex 99 times per year there are 5.1 billion acts of sexual intercourse each year among men aged 15-39 in the US. Divide 5.1 billion by 6,750, and, "the odds of any sexually-active male between the ages of 15 and 39 has a 750,000 to 1 chance of being falsely accused of rape."

Furthermore, "Here's another way to look at it. The National Institute of Justice estimates that men have a 1 in 33 chance of being raped or sexually assaulted in their lifetime. In other words, men are 27,500x more likely to be raped than falsely accused of rape."

So, he calculated the odds of being accused of rape per sex act, and then declared this was the odds of being accused of rape in your lifetime.

We don't even have to ask whether the FBI's statistics are a proper source on false allegations to know this is wrong. And what Charles does not acknowledge is that the FBI statistics aren't sufficient by a long shot; they only include reported crimes. I have known men who were accused of rape who were never reported to the police because the woman backed up and admitted she was lying without ever going to the police. I don't think I'm unusual in that regard; false rape allegations are a very good way to explain away an otherwise-unexplainable pregnancy, getting caught cheating, or even to emotionally manipulate or blackmail someone.

Hell, I knew another girl who accused a guy of raping her in High School; they were both high on drugs and they wound up having sex, and she later told all her guy friends he raped her. She admits she never liked the guy but things got hot when they were doing drugs together at a party. Now, no one went to the police; her friends just found him and beat the crap out of him and it was over. Did he actually rape her? If you ask her today, she'll admit she was high as a kite, and they'd been willingly doing drugs together, and she herself isn't sure what happened. I suspect Charles Clymer and other feminist rape hysterics would angrily fulminate that she was raped if she thinks she was raped. I am not so sure what happened there, just as she isn't; I do know she regretted the sex act they committed while willingly doing drugs together, and her friends beat the crap out of him, but that's all I know, and it's really all she knows.

I suppose we'll have to skip the question of why the man is automatically the rapist if they're both drugged up or intoxicated. But, we also know for a fact that police almost never believe male victims of female-perpetrated rape, and that government statistics intentionally define rape to exclude most female rapists, relegating most victims of females to "something else." The entire discourse on sexual assault is polluted because we frequently mix apples and oranges, and different studies ask different questions different ways and using different definitions, and we have a huge blind spot when it comes to female predators and marginalize them constantly.

And yes, there will be women who are raped who never press charges in the first place. Some of them will be cases where it's because they recognize the circumstances are unclear to outside observers; others maybe because they believe rape hysterics who tell them that the police never believe women–a horrible lie when we know police and prosecutors are often quick to believe women even when there is no real evidence at all, as in the case of Sara Ylen.

Yes Charles, men do get accused of rape by women they've never had sex with, occasionally even of raping a woman they've never been in the same room with, and still go to jail for it. Of all the people freed from jail due to wrongful convictions by The Innocence Project, the majority were men proven to have been not just falsely accused, but falsly convicted, of rape. That won't be in the FBI statistics either, Mr. Clymer. And those were only cases where they could prove the innocence of the wrongly-convicted.

If you want a more detailed, blow-by-blow look at how rigorous statistical analysis is done, and all the other ways Charles Clymer's math makes no sense at all, see Lies, Damned Lies, and Social Media Part 5 by Slate Star Codex (note: Slate Star Codex that is not an MRA blog and from what I can tell its author doesn't like delving into sexual politics, but it's too good an analysis not to mention.) That article would be worthy of distribution by Buzzfeed if they wanted to to take a serious attitude about discussions of false allegations, but I have to wonder if they'd have the courage.

In any case, this is a repeat call-out to Charles Clymer (or any other feminist, male or female, who will accept): female MRAs have challenged you to debate questions like rape, domestic violence, feminism, female predation, or even, whether or not the Men's Human Rights Movement in general or A Voice for Men in particular are hate groups.

You often claim you want debate and discussion Charles. So why aren't you accepting? For that matter, when oh when will you produce the article you promised us on our supposed errors?

It would be nice if Charles and his compatriots were for real, and genuinely wanted to see progress on issues like rape and sexual assault, and greater understanding and compassion for men and women alike. Feminists and MHRAs supposedly share the same goals. I won't hold my breath, but if they won't hear men's voices, it would be nice if they'd at least talk to women who disagree with them.

Naomi Wolf & Karen Straughan (Girl Writes What) debate

AVfM Video Source · 28 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Naomi Wolf and Karen Straughan recently sat down to a talk together. We don't think Naomi was prepared, or at all used to having her prejudices about men and women challenged. We also notice something of a newcomer to the national stage, Antigone Darling, and thought she had a lot of interesting things to say.

If you're interested in what a certain group of libertarians in New Hampshire are up to, you might want to Subscribe to Free State Project New Hampshire.

Whispers of Dissent Within the Feminist Echo Chamber

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 28 February 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Well, the article at The New Republic is up, and it's a mixed bag. Which generally means mostly awful (and offal, heh), but with a few pleasant surprises.

For my part, my over 42-and-change minute interview on a number of different topics was condensed into a single quoted sentence fragment, and a two sentence soundbite about false accusations.

If anyone is interested in hearing what Ms. Matchar and I actually talked about for over 40 minutes, feel free to click here.

Issues we discussed:

Why I got involved in the Men's Rights Movement. Whether culturally propagated rape myths (such as the myth that ordinary, otherwise decent guys will commit rape if they have the chance, an unwillingness to accept the empirical evidence that 90% of rapes of women are committed by a small percentage of men who are recidivists, and frequent comparisons between the attrition rate for rape with the conviction rate for other crimes) coupled with a near-constant public emphasis on the "re-victimizing" of women by the system and how difficult reporting is, discourages women from reporting.

Whether men should be considered rape victims when women have sex with them against their will, through use of threats, force, or drug/alcohol incapacitation. Currently, in statistical data such as that gathered by the CDC, for whom feminist Mary Koss acts as a consultant, such men are not considered rape victims, even if they have been forced into sex. Previous year data in their latest NISVS showed an equal number of male and female victims of sex obtained through force, threats or incapacitation (and attempts, which they did not separate out in either case), and a significant perpetration rate among women, however, Koss (and thus, the CDC) does not consider a woman forcing a man to have heterosexual sex to be rape.Whether, given the large minority of (as I would define it) rapes and attempted rapes committed by women, feminist ideas around rape (that it lies on a continuum of normal male behavior within the culture, that it is tied to masculinity and patriarchal domination of women, etc.) have any veracity.

Whether dubiously framing rape as intrinsic or connected to masculinity serves a purpose for feminists.

My own experience as a victim of sexual assault, and why I chose not to report it.

Whether the predominant rhetoric around rape (of women) as the most heinous of crimes (some claim it is worse than murder) does victims a disservice when it comes to stigma and recovery. When the only message the culture (not just feminists!) tells you is that the worst thing possible has happened to you with an extreme focus on the (long term, often framed as permanent) harms, is there a possibility of victims internalizing this message to the point where recovery is obstructed rather than facilitated?

Whether other voices than feminism have a right to a public opinion about rape and how to combat it.

Whether we are treating women like children when we assign them victim status for making the exact same decision as a man–that is, if two people are equally drunk and both consent to sex while in that condition, is it demeaning to women to assign them all the agency of a piece of furniture by labelling them victims and the men rapists? (Incidentally, commend Ms. Matchar for not calling for James Taranto's head, and even defending him. How refreshing.)

Whether a calm and coherent national conversation about rape is even possible given the fact that posing such a question as the above will lead to 14 feminist articles vilifying you by misrepresenting what you said being published within 24 hours, and NOW starting a petition to have you fired from your job (like James Taranto).

Whether there is any "good way" to deal with a crime that occurs mostly in private and without witnesses, mostly between acquaintances or within a dating/relationship context, and which is based entirely on two people's states of mind.

The false accusation issue was indeed part of our conversation (the only part that made it into Ms. Matchar's article), and something discussed at Ms. Matchar's request. Much of her commentary on the issue and the MRM's stance on it seems outright silly:

> (The Hofstra case has become a touchstone in the MRM community, viewed as proof that a woman will ruin five men's lives to cover her tracks if she needs to.)

Um… no. We don't "view" it as proof. It IS proof. If cases like Hofstra exist, that necessarily proves that such things sometimes can and do happen. On the other hand, I doubt that any MRA believes women who behave in this way are common, just like we do not believe that people who commit sexual assault are common, but Ms. Matchar seems intent on portraying us this way.

As for the "2-8% of rape accusations are false" thing, on the one hand, I'm not sure why it matters. The biggest issue MRAs tend to have regarding false accusations of rape is that the punishment does not fit the crime, in terms of damage done to the victim. The system generally assigns punishments based on the degree of harm done, not on the commonness of the crime. If it didn't, first degree murder would be a misdemeanor while pocketing pens from your workplace or shoplifting would be capital offences.

One can allow that rape is more common than false accusations of rape (in fact, it can be much more common, even if the false report rate is quite high, due to the low rate at which rapes are reported to police), and still consider false accusations of rape a difficult problem that ruins people's lives, and it's nice that the author acknowledges this. But her answer seems to be to convince progressives and feminists to take on (or rather, stop ignoring and minimizing) the issue.

However, from what I've seen, feminists seem to have this idea that taking false accusations seriously will make actual victims fear filing a report, and they typically (and incorrectly) emphasize low prevalence rates for false accusations compared to rape prevalence as a justification for not taking them seriously. I don't think they, on the whole, are in a position to be convinced of anything different.

It is unfortunate that some actual victims of rape are not believed by authorities. I know of at least one case where a woman who, it was later determined, had indeed been raped by a serial rapist, who was fined for filing a false police report. That must have been a terrible situation, and no less terrible after it was discovered that the man had gone on to commit other rapes because her case was not taken seriously enough–a vindication likely more bitter than sweet for her. However, given the high proportion (relative to other crimes) of convictions of sexual assault that result in exoneration (usually through DNA evidence, though often through recanting), I'm going to assert that we fuck it up in the other direction a lot, too.

Feminists tend also, as the author of this piece has done, to consistently misrepresent the statistics. 2-8% is the lower boundary, derived from rape reports to police that can be determined to be definitely false (or definitely unfounded) to nearly a criminal court standard. I could just as easily flip that around and say that "only" 6% of rape accusations are true, because that is the percentage of reports that result in conviction", however, I would never do that because it would be absurd and dishonest. Ms. Matchar (and pretty much any feminist I talk to) is lumping all reports that are not determined definitely false into the "true" category, when in reality, the vast majority of cases can't be proven either way. I suppose it's entirely possible that the false report rate is as low as 2-8%. I suppose it's entirely possible that it's as high as 94%. But I don't think so, either way.

Even regardless of that, the rates she cites have no bearing on informal false accusations made to people other than the police, and which have led in some cases to accused men being assaulted and even murdered. I find it amazing how short American's memories are, considering that a hugely disproportionate number of the black men who swung from trees during the era of lynching were accused of sex crimes.

And I find it odd that Ms. Matchar thinks MRAs are obsessed with false accusations. There are many websites and forums largely devoted, for instance, to men who suffer domestic violence, or to male victims of sexual violence, etc, but as far as I know, only one (The Community of the Wrongly Accused, formerly The False Rape Society) that is devoted to false rape accusations. Most Men's Rights Websites are multi-purpose forums that discuss a wide variety of issues, including false accusations, and much of the conversation about false accusations revolves around how difficult it is to find reliable estimates of prevalence simply because of that large number of cases that cannot be proven either way.

I also find it odd that Ms. Matchar thinks MRAs are inflating the problem of false rape accusations when men are collectively accused of rapiness by the likes of Jessica Valenti, who claims that even otherwise decent guys will rape if they get the opportunity. Given that only a small percentage of men ever rape, what is that, other than a false accusation levelled against an entire gender?

She goes on to condescendingly, indirectly dismiss Paul Elam's concerns over the new, still changing, processes colleges use to handle accusations of sexual misconduct. It's a gorgeous rhetorical trick. First, you state their position like so:

> The way rape is dealt with on college campuses is another bugaboo of the MRM. "We have a problem with feminists hyper-inflating rape statistics, creating a kind of hysteria on campus over a problem that needs due attention from law enforcement," says Paul Elam, the founder of A Voice for Men, widely considered the flagship website of the MRM.

Then, you follow it up with something like this:

> The site, which features essays pontificating on society's SUPPOSED anti-male bias

[emphasis mine]
In the space of one sentence fragment, you have just invalidated any claim made by the owner of said website, which is portrayed as just a bunch of people "pontificating" about things that don't really exist. Neat-o, huh?
Next trick is follow it up with typical feminist black/white, all-or-nothing zero-summing:

> But the far more pressing issue in terms of the way that colleges address rape accusations has to do with the institutions ignoring or mishandling cases of sexual assault. Occidental, along with a number of other elite colleges, came under federal investigation last year for precisely this. The case was brought by 37 current and former students, including several men. According to the complaint, administrators explicitly discouraged students from coming forward with sexual assault reports. This is not unique to Occidental—similar cases have arisen at the University of North Carolina and Swarthmore, among others. This kind of discouragement, shaming, and victim-blaming is exactly why we need anonymous reporting and more stringent anti-sexual assault policies, say victims' advocates.

Voila! You have just succeeded in deflecting the attention away from valid concerns over due process rights by pretending that there exists no means by which colleges can take accusations of sexual misconduct seriously while still being fair to those who are accused. And you can do it by implying that the solution to some colleges ignoring their own policies is not to require them to enforce those policies, but to bring in more stringent and draconian policies.

> The MRM's tirades and hijinks certainly don't meaningfully add to the debate surrounding the way we handle sexual assault. But to totally ignore the issues that they raise does not further a productive conversation.

I'd like to again invite readers to listen to my interview with Ms. Matchar, as well as Paul Elam's and Dean Esmay's, and get a feel for the "tirade-like" nature of our answers to her questions. Compare "hijinks" like Men's Rights Edmonton's "Don't be THAT Girl" campaign, with feminist "hijinks" such as this poster. Compare the calm and measured tone of a men's advocate like Warren Farrell, Miles Groth or Pierce Harlan with the feminist reaction of dishonest, furious, spittle-flecked moral outrage to James Taranto's article on drunk sex, or to a presentation about the problems boys face in society.
While I will not deny that tirades and hijinks exist within the MRM (Patriarchy Party, anyone?), the assumption that progressives are even capable of having a calm, reasoned, fair-minded and balanced discussion about rape is dubious at best, self-evidently false at worst, as Ms. Matchar indicates in her very next breath:

> Unfortunately, it's difficult to talk about these issues in progressive or feminist circles, where discussions of sexual assault prevention can quickly degenerate into angry hyperbole and name-calling. Among progressive media circles, to suggest that sexual assault and sexual assault prevention can be less than clear-cut is to court accusations of being a rape apologist.

Hell, I just got called a rape apologist by Naomi Wolf during a panel discussion last weekend for having the temerity to say that one reason so few rapists are prosecuted is because, given the nature of the crime, rape is difficult to prove or disprove. The only thing that separates it from a legal act is two people's states of mind–her lack of consent and his awareness of her lack of consent. Before I could even finish my thought, she turned to me and, face inches from mine, called me a rape apologist.

What I had said seems like a clear-cut statement to me, one that even agrees with feminist rhetoric on rape (that rape is about consent, and that rape is difficult to prove), yet if you're one of the "bad people", saying it apparently means you're a rape apologist.

I mean think about it. Feminists fought hard to eliminate such requirements as corroboration or physical evidence of resistance from sexual assault law. They fought and succeeded in making rape a crime whose actus reus is contingent on the lack of consent of the victim.

And yet I got called a rape apologist by a feminist for saying rape is a crime based on consent.

After the panel was over, I went up to her and said I couldn't believe she called me a rape apologist. She said I sure sounded like one, to which I attempted to reply, "For saying rape is about consent?" She interrupted me mid-sentence, claiming that as a rape survivor, it was too upsetting for her to discuss.

And perhaps the most ironic thing about what she said is the accusation by a young feminist during the Q&A for my talk at Ryerson University, that Naomi Wolf herself is a rape apologist, who (allegedly) engaged in victim-blaming regarding the Julian Assange case.

What a labia traitor you are, Naomi! Shame on you.

But back to Ms. Matchar:

> So unless progressives want the MRM to lead the dialogue on these issues, perhaps they should start addressing them more comprehensively and less reactively. There will almost surely be more MRM rape campaigns in the coming year, says Dean Esmay, the managing editor of A Voice for Men: "We will continue to look for ways to stir things up." Ignoring the matters these campaigns raise risks ceding the conversation.

And there lies the rub. MRAs want to have a conversation about rape. Feminists and other progressives, in the main, like Naomi Wolf, want to have a monologue about it. An "everyone else sit down, shut up and listen quietly" kind of monologue.

The term "rape apologist" is more a tactic than an assessment of someone's position on rape, intended to serve as a conversation ender, a way of either shutting someone up, or giving others moral permission to ignore what they say. It's also a way for feminists to separate the "us" from the "them", to identify and target an enemy and maintain their "vagina monologue" on sexual assault.

Naomi Wolf pulling the rape victim card was another attempted conversation ender, one which I gracefully accepted, not because such a tactic is effective in shutting me up, but because, like most feminists and progressives, she does not seem able to look at the problem in anything resembling an objective way. A discussion with someone so emotional they cannot handle a conversation they insist on having in the first place, the moment there is a difference of opinion is going to be pointless waste of time.

Ms. Matchar warns progressives that ignoring the issues and concerns raised by the MRM may mean ceding the conversation to us. And here she's got it wrong, yet again. The feminist conversation about rape is not a conversation at all, but a one-sided, biased, moralizing lecture that does not permit any deviation from the party line, even by other feminists.

Which makes me wonder how long it will be before Ms. Matchar herself has the scarlet letter pinned on her, merely for stating it's a bit of a stretch to characterize James Taranto's article on drunk sex "rape apology".

If even Naomi Wolf can be labelled a rape apologist for being skeptical of what might well be politically motivated, trumped-up or inflated accusations against a man detested by the US government (among others), then letting Taranto off the hook for his “obvious rape apologia” could well get Ms. Matchar in hot water among the sisterhood. Feminists are all too happy to turn on each other over such things.
Which leads me to commend Ms. Matchar for defying, even in these small ways, the orthodoxy of progressive feminists, and to advise her to watch her back. The Feminist Sisterhood might not be too happy with her right now.

Call to Action: Probe RAD for Intel

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 1 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Rape Aggression Defense (RAD) systems is a self-defense network run primarily by cops serving different demographics. Each demographic is provided a different curriculum. RAD certifies instructors in three day courses, and provides armor so instructors can simulate attacks on female students.

RAD programs appears on universities all over the United States and Canada. Here is a promotional video for the Virginia Tech implementation.

The RAD program on Kennesaw State University (KSU) and in Georgia is directed by SGT Trudi Vaughan. KSU implemented RAD for Men (RFM) in 2012, ten years after implementing RAD for Women in 2002. The time gap could be explained away as a lack of demand on the part of men, but Title IX responsibilities prohibit KSU from making that excuse.

However, RAD for Men is not "Rape Aggression Defense for Men." Instead, it is "Resisting Aggression with Defense for Men." RFM does not present itself as a rape aggression course for men at KSU.

Vaughan's statements on RFM in the KSU paper, The Sentinel drop hints about RFM's content:

> It focuses a lot on what your responsibilities are as a man […] When women say 'no,' it doesn't mean 'no until you talk me into it'; it means no. […] Typically males are raised to always stand up and fight […] The whole educational aspect of this is letting them know that it's okay to make a better choice, a better decision.

What "responsibilities," and why the finger-wagging?

Aggressors can be men or women but are always called the "RAD Man" (see above).

I approached KSU Security on January 3rd with requests for appointments, but I did not get Trudi Vaughan's card until February 5th. During January, KSU Security sent me to a David Arnold in University Relations (UR). Since I said I was from A Voice For Men (which I admitted had lots of readers), Security said I needed to go through UR.

A Lieutenant B. Haynes did not follow up with her offer of an appointment after my time with UR, which forced me to visit KSU Security in person several times until I got Vaughan's contact information. I captured audio recordings of two of my four security visits.

Once I got in touch with Vaughan, she provided good answers to the wrong questions, vague answers to the right questions, or no answers at all. While Vaughan did attempt to tell me about RFM, her account was comparable to promotional language used to advertise the course in different colleges. In fact, compare the first paragraph from one of her emails (which you can download at the bottom of this article)…

> The Resisting Aggression with Defense is a comprehensive course for men designed to raise awareness of the impact of aggressive behavior, recognize how aggressive behavior impacts participants' lives, encourage participants to take steps to avoid aggressive behavior, and to look at how individuals can be part of reducing aggression and violence. Each participant will explore resisting aggression, while progressing on to the basics of hands-on defense training.

…With the first paragraph of RAD for Men by Boston College. Differences have been bolded:

> ~~The~~ Resisting Aggression with Defense (R.A.D.) is a FREE comprehensive course for men only, designed to raise awareness of the impact of aggressive behavior, recognize how aggressive behavior impacts participants' lives, encourage participants to take steps to avoid aggressive behavior, and to look at how individuals can be part of reducing aggression and violence. Each participant will explore resisting aggression, while progressing on to the basics of hands-on defense training.

Vaughan removed "FREE," "only," and "(R.A.D.)" and added a "The." The one RFM email blast on KSU last year said that male KSU students may attend for free, so why does Vaughan chose to remove two words that are consistent with the promotion from an obviously duplicated paragraph?

[image]
Email blast from KSU for RFM. Source: Screenshot of my KSU Gmail account
KSU charges non-students for enrolling in any RAD program. It is possible that Boston College can afford to provide RFM for free to everyone, but it is not clear if that is the case. I honestly don't know why the words "FREE" and "only" were removed. All I can say is that it does not make me any less suspicious.

I pressed for more information, and Vaughan invited me to RFM. No RFM classes on KSU are scheduled at the time of this writing. Vaughan claims this is due to a lack of space that was previously available to her. While I am fine with enrolling in RFM to see what is offered, questions like "What are the specific responsibilities RFM teaches men?" are simple enough that I do not need to do so.

For that reason, I persisted with my questions and asked to meet for an appointment.

Vaughan was so reserved that I roped in David Arnold and KSU Police Chief Roger Stearns. Vaughan caved and said that she could not answer because the information I wanted was in a copyrighted manual. I need to enroll in an unavailable class to get answers. From an email:

> The organization that certifies our instructors requires that students enroll in the program in order to get the copyrighted reference manual and any specific information in the manual.

I am a student of a state university that pays for RAD to even be on KSU. Asking a question for noncommercial, informative purposes without explicitly requesting copied course material would not be copyright infringement.

I called RAD Systems and got the same response. Thankfully, the woman on the other end openly acknowledged that women rape when I told her about the "RAD Man" title being applied to both men and women on KSU. She also stressed that responsibility was geared toward personal safety and not toward risking one's life to ensure safety for others.

Although RAD Systems hustles money with the "rapist-in-the-bushes" scare, the call made RAD Systems seem purple-pill.

Therefore, Vaughan and KSU are more concerning as of now.

What Was Said?

Download the correspondence files and try to digest how much time and effort went to simply get questions answered. Although the EML files are few in number, they store conversations months in the making. Note that sensitive contact information was removed from the emails. You can view the EML files in Thunderbird, Outlook or some other email client.

Now What?

My next contact is RFM's Anthony Solano, a Susan B. Anthony grant recipient. I am not pursuing Solano until the after my open records request with KSU's Legal department.

I requested all available RAD records, which turned out to have a $500 fee. I'm meeting KSU Asst. Legal Counsel Reggie Lampkin this Tuesday to negotiate record retrieval and to assert my rights.

Also, I am now looking for male students who took RFM so I can learn of their experiences.

In the meantime, I could use your help.

What can we do?

Correspondence with KSU Security started in January. Correspondence with Vaughan started in February. Correspondence with legal council started in March.

All because KSU Security fears questions.

Why the biased promotion? Why the evasive pedantry?

I'd get these answers myself, but I am too wrapped up in red tape to do so without your help.

Vaughan's contact information is public, so ask her questions by calling (770) 595-4418 (You may have to leave a voicemail). If Vaughan goes dark, try RAD HQ at (225) 791-4430. If you call RAD Systems, be sure to mention Vaughan's conduct.

Skype Premium users in one-party consent states should grab MP3 Skype Recorder or Free Video Call Recorder for Skype and capture the conversation (both tools are easy to learn and use). Be sure to speak for yourself as a concerned citizen.

Do not assume others will call. Take a few minutes to see what you can learn.

Once you are finished, tell us about your experience by commenting below. If you have a recording with private information, email me at sage@avoiceformen.com and I will bleep it out so that the recording is publishable.

What's in it for us?

Intel.

What we learn helps MHRAs make informed decisions in a university setting. By learning about RAD, we open new avenues for collegiate men's rights organizations.

Given the lack of detailed information, we cannot draw many conclusions. We need answers first. Be sure to avoid conjecture, and don't pass any judgements until evidence is obtained.

If you don't know what to ask Vaughan, here are some suggestions:

- "What are the specific responsibilities RFM teaches men?"
- "Can you elaborate on your statements in the Sentinel?" (read some examples)
- "How is answering a student's or a taxpayer's valid questions copyright infringement if the asker does not want your materials?"
- "Why did it take ten years for RAD for Men to be implemented alongside RAD for Women on KSU?" (Title IX violation?)

Vaughan, if you are reading this, know that we detest bullshit. Answer carefully.

We'll be in touch.

When is sexism actually sexism?

Jim Byset · 1 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is reproduced from our friends at Men's Human Rights Ontario

BY Baldwin Bravo

THERE is an old saying, 'ask a stupid question, unleash a wave of outrage on a global scale.' Or, at least, I think it goes something like that.

Earlier this week, a reporter in Australia asked an extremely stupid question of 19-year-old Canadian tennis player Eugenie Bouchard. Bouchard had just made Canadian tennis history (yes, such a thing actually exists) by becoming the first Canadian woman to reach a semi-final in a Grand Slam. It was the latest milestone in Bouchard's amazing journey in becoming a serious force in world tennis. A smiling Bouchard, breathless but clearly thrilled with her win, was asked – 'if you could date anyone in the world of sport, of movies, who would you date?'

Social media reacted instantly with severe criticism of the reporter, an accomplished athlete in her own right, as well as the network that prompted her to ask such a question.

[image]
Eugenie Bouchard prepares to serve. Copyright: Edwin Martinez
My first reaction to this story was that there is no story here. It is a stupid question to be sure, but sexist? On the surface it would seem that yes, it is possibly a little sexist, but no more sexist than asking a male athlete what kind of car he'd most like to own. Sexist, but nothing worth getting your Y-flys in a twist over.
But look a little closer, and you'll find that the answer to the question 'would a man be asked this?' is an overwhelming yes, a man would be asked this question. American swimmer and Olympic gold medalist Ryan Lochete, was asked this very question in a cringe-inducing article by that most progressive and venerable of media institutions – the Huffington Post.

The mental obstacle here is the word 'man'. I don't know about you, but when I picture a 'man', he's in his mid 30's to mid 40's. If we were to pose the question "would a 40 year old woman be asked that?" we would tend to assume the answer is no… that would make it ageism rather than sexism. Do we still need the pitchforks and torches? Of course not, ageism is not society's pet form of discrimination.

It's just a stupid question.

But, of course, there is more to it than that. This is, we are told, 'just another example of female athletes not being taken seriously.'
And again I find myself in agreement. That the "only" question the network could think of to ask this young woman after all she has accomplished is about cute boys, then that is indeed quite sexist. Except that isn't what happened.

The clip that was included with just about every story that was written about this was only a moment in a much longer interview. Eugenie was first congratulated on her accomplishment, then asked to comment on the match itself, then asked about her coach, then asked if her on court composure transfers to her off court life, then the stupid question, and finally she was asked to comment on her past experiences in competitive tennis.

One stupid question notwithstanding, she was very much taken seriously as an athlete.

Interestingly, if you compare the full interview with the clip that has been included in articles published by sources such as The National Post, you will have no doubt noticed something else.

The clip, it seems, conveniently starts just after reporter Samantha Smith reveals that this is a question submitted by a viewer. It wasn't the reporter's question, it wasn't the network's question, it was a fan question. Does anyone believe that this was just an accident?
There seems to be a much bigger story here than I originally thought. Not a story of sexism, but a story of deliberate, manufactured outrage.

Bouchard made over $550,000 from her exploits at the Australian Open. That was more money than she had made in her entire career to date. She also broke into the elite group of top twenty female tennis players in the world.

Maybe it will be easier for her to do the intelligent thing and brush off the question for what it was – a dumb question from a dumb person – solely designed to provoke outrage – and nothing else.

Why Men Don't Wear Condoms

Hopeland Cash · 1 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> Men are idiots.
>
> – Popular Science

Those three words sum up most of society's view on men, especially when it comes to sexual practices. This bothers me for a number of reasons, not least of which is that I am a man.

But it also demonstrates a level of willful, malicious ignorance that could only be born from a truly gynocentric culture. That Popular Science article is on the topic of condoms and is trying to get men to use them. Condoms came onto the scene in Europe in the 16th century. Even then, the main goal was not preventing pregnancy (the good old days before Over Population), but to prevent Sexually Transmitted Diseases such as syphilis.

The concept is simple: put a wall between two sources of bodily fluids, preventing transmission of any infectious agents that might be present in either.

Easy, right?

Wrong.

Even after four centuries of development and contributions from brands likes of Trojan and KY, condoms are still not as widely used as some would hope, especially in the developing world. For the developed world, 28% of married couples use condoms as their primary contraception; in Japan it is 80%, but in the developing world it goes down to less than 10%.[1]

In the face of ever present AIDS epidemics, many organizations have been working to increase condom use, especially in Africa. In South Africa, safe-sex information is rampant and condoms are freely available, but their usage so far only covers one condom per week for each adult male.[2] Either they're not getting lucky, or they're just not listening. In other regions, results of condom-drives are even spottier, to the point that the World Health Organization has begun campaigns of mass adult male circumcision in hopes of reducing HIV infections, but with mixed results.[3]

That brings us back to the original question: Why don't men use condoms? In the face of AIDS spread, numerous other unsightly or life-threatening STDs, and the well documented risks of unplanned fatherhood, why don't men all just slip on a rubber every morning, you know, for when the time comes?

The question has been asked, but, in my opinion, only skin deep. The most common reason (and I refuse to use the word "excuse") given by men is that condoms reduce pleasure. Hence the Gates Foundation offer of $100,000 for the design of a condom that actually increases pleasure.[4]

Most commentators are happy to deride men for this pleasure-seeking stance, probably because it fits so nicely into the public image of Man As Lustful Beast. But, with all the perils facing the unprotected man, is pleasure-for-pleasure's-sake the real reason for low condom adoption? They've asked, Is it because condoms reduce pleasure?, and have gotten a resounding Yes–but have been typically unwilling to dig a little deeper, to treat their male subjects as human beings, and ask, Why are men so worried about reduced pleasure?

Unprotected sex is risk-taking, so why take the risk? An analogous example is a drug abuser. Addicts take drugs to get high, have a buzz, rave like mad, step out of themselves, etc. With hard drugs like heroin and cocaine, or hell, even alcohol, their numerous detrimental side-effects are well documented. It's reasonable to think no sane person would willingly use these substances. Yet they do, and in flocking herds. Why?

Most people are not thrill seekers. Most people do not need to live on the edge of danger. Most people are normal human beings, so if they are abusing life-damaging drugs, it has to be for a reason. Self-medication for depression, escapism from a hopeless life, gaining the competitive edge in sports or work… Drug usage isn't a sickness, it is a symptom, just like men's unwillingness to use condoms is not an example of male irresponsibility, but a symptom of a twisted view on male sexuality.

And I say twisted because we likely once had a perfectly healthy interpretation of human sexual behavior, but it has been twisted by corrupt social forces. Men, for more millennia than we've had a calendar to count them, have been taught to identify heavily with their own sexuality, to find a large portion of their sense of self-worth from it. For most of history, a man's value stemmed from two requirements: that he could go out and kill whatever needed to be killed (be it men in war or animals in the hunt), and that he could then come home and fuck his woman like a man!. Mere fertility is not enough; a man must be virile, filled with stamina and vigor. Anything else, even if he is a genius, champion athlete or master artist, renders him less of a man.

And to the inevitable rehashes of the well-worn attacks on the mythically delicate "male ego", I say simply, Bullshit. As a young American man, I have endured, since childhood, a perpetual bludgeoning with messages promoting female self-esteem. And then you, dear misandrist commenter, are going to tell me that a man's "ego" isn't worthy of consideration? I ask you to step away now, because hate-speech is not welcome here. Men's lives matter. Men's feelings (and yes, we do have them) matter. We matter.

And sex matters to men, maybe beyond what is natural. For most of human history, men have been taught to self-identify with their own hyper-sexualization. Men are penis-wielders first, human beings second. Our sense of self-worth is derived, in large part, from our ability to "perform" sexually. It's the same mindset that makes men work themselves literally into early graves. They could live longer if they worked less, but they are providers first, human beings second. That message has been driven home generation after generation, father to son, wife to man, television to vegetable. But now, after thousands of years, the message has been changed. Now men are being told their penis is a potential disease vector and that it has to be tightly bagged before usage.

What's sexier than Zip-Loc, right?

[image]
200 year old condom, with user's manual
Mixed messages to the extreme. Condoms do reduce pleasure, fact. With all these thousands of years of social conditioning, men associate self-worth with sexual performance, and the primary measure of sexual performance is the amount of pleasure achieved/provided. In asking men to use pleasure-reducing condoms, we are asking them to overcome generations of indoctrination and to actively take part in reducing their own self-esteem. It's asking the junkie to stop shooting up when it's the only thing that keeps him going.

Some may still ask of men, Why so serious? Why do men identify so much with their sexuality. Can't they be happy just being alive? The idea that men are socially conditioned to their own detriment is still not commonly accepted. Patriarchy, right? So, let's look at a another analogy, this time a fictional one about women.

Men tend to find self-worth through sexual performance. Women tend to find self-worth through sexual appeal; being beautiful, being attractive, being desired by men, that is what women have long been taught to seek. Whatever changes feminism has wrought, the core mating paradigm remains the same: women present, men pursue. Condoms hamper that pursuit. What if we asked women, for health reasons, to reduce their sex appeal?

Let's pretend there is a gel that women can buy. When applied, it unobtrusively coats the vagina with a protective layer that blocks STDs with a failure rate comparable to condoms. Great, right? Ah, but there are side-effects. And I'm not talking about female condoms here, which have their own pleasure-spoiling qualities. No, for these STD-proof women, it isn't their pleasure which takes a hit (about half of women fake orgasms anyway, so that's not their goal). What suffers is their self-image, their sense of beauty.

When a woman using this hypothetical little wonder gel becomes sexually aroused, it makes her puff up. Not like-a- balloon puff up, but it makes her look and feel, let's say, 15-30 pounds heavier, just temporarily. No negative effect to health, but during sex, the woman feels fat, and she knows she looks fat to her partner. Don't think thick girls are ugly? Change weight gain to breast reduction, skin discoloration, etc. Anything unattractive. Whatever the details, she has to become ugly to have safe sex.

How many women do you think would jump at that opportunity?

Now think about the same feeling for men, being told they need to slash their primary metric of sexual success for the sake of health safety.

Am I saying men are all sex-crazy? Maybe, but I don't blame men for that. If condoms are emasculating, it is only because they present a sharp reversal of social expectations; asking a man to be less of a man. I don't think WHO is attacking male sexuality on purpose, but their PR, well, blows. I don't think men are necessarily even overly sexual; it's society's, women's and men's evaluation of men based on their sexuality that's the problem.

At this point, men haven't been left with much anything to find self-esteem from, penis-wielding being about the only semi-respectable occupation not taken by women. In such a climate, asking for rampant condom use may be the dildo that breaks the camel's toe.

Is condom use a good thing? Definitely.

Is widespread adoption going to be easily achieved? Not until we stop treating men like walking vibrators and actually look at the human psychology of why condom use is not appealing. It's not just about the fuck for us. If it were, we wouldn't care how hot she was, or if she brought a girlfriend, or how loud she screamed our name. But we do care, because we judge ourselves on how we perform.

We don't think with our dicks, but we sure as hell measure ourselves against them.

References:

[1] Condom Prevalence – Wikipedia
[2] In South Africa, free condoms are big (but not big enough for some, it seems)
[3] Circumcision in Africa not preventing HIV
[4] Develop the Next Generation of Condom

Fair Warning

AVfM Video Source · 1 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Some of you know that I have been considering moving from strictly writing / postering to other forms of activism. To add to my activist tool-box I've been attending courts to bear witness, and to support men who are experiencing corruption in those courts. There will be more of me attending courts in Southern Ontario. Things are changing for the better folks. – DP

Killing for Equality

Paul Elam · 2 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Last year in West Footscray, a smallish suburb just a stone's throw outside Melbourne, Victoria Australia, Phillip Bracken pushed his common law wife, Helen Curtis, to the ground. As she lay helpless he took the rifle he was holding and put two rounds in her head.

The next two bullets punched into her abdomen. Finally he fired the fifth and last round, boring a hole through her wrist.

Last week, at the end of his murder trial, the verdict was delivered.

Not guilty.

It was not because the accusations against him were not proven. Bracken admitted to the acts, precisely as described above. He was acquitted on the grounds that his domestic partner, known in Australia as a defacto wife, had physically, emotionally and psychologically abused him during the relationship. That abuse rose to a level characterized in Australian law as "intimate terrorism."

It was also brought out at trial that Curtis had made threats to murder Bracken's father, which he feared she would follow through with.

The only charge that remains against him at this point is the possession of an unregistered weapon, for which he is out of jail under his own recognizance.

This story puts an interesting twist on recent news coverage of University of Ottawa law professor Elizabeth Sheehy, who has asserted in her new book, Defending battered Women on Trial, that women not only have the right, but the moral obligation to kill their abusers. She contends that women who kill under these alleged circumstances should not be charged or tried for murder.

So, using the rationale of that university law expert, Phillip Bracken is a social justice hero, who has just been recognized as such by the nine women and three men who sat on the jury that gave him a pass.

This is despite the fact that Bracken had nearly countless options in front of him at the time he snuffed the life out of Helen Curtis.

At the point he was in possession of a loaded weapon, and she was on the ground before him, he had a range of options. He could have walked away. He could have trained the weapon on her and summoned police. He could have unloaded the weapon to ensure that it was not used by either party to deliver lethal force.

Instead he riddled her with enough bullets as she lay on the ground to kill her four times over.

I have little doubt that Curtis was every bit the abusive monster that Bracken claimed her to be. In fact, given that what was presented to the jury of her behavior and character was sufficient for them to issue a pass to a male for her murder, I would venture to guess that she was record breaker of a harridan.

And if we are to accept that Philip Bracken had a legal or moral right to kill her, then we forego the right to criticize the likes of Elizabeth Sheehy. Unless, of course, our only real objection to Sheehy's ideas is that they are gender specific; if we are ok with murder as a way to deal with abusive partners as long as it affords men and women equal rights to kill.

Who actually thinks this way? So far, it has only been feminists (without the caveat of equality), and I hope above all else that it remains that way.

What happened in West Footscray, Australia is a natural consequence of feminist jurisprudence and governance. Like the occasional women who wind up severed from their assets and their children in a corrupt family law apparatus, now some women will simply be rubbed out by husbands who they may be abusive toward.

The resultant actions of the justice system will be to give killers a pass because the people left standing, most notably the killers, said they had it coming.

I feel no more and no less repugnance for this verdict than I do when it happens to male victims. Murdering someone when you don't have to is vile. And so is the criminal justice system that finds excuses for it.

Perhaps, however, this particular kind of tragedy will serve some purpose in the end.

Ladies, welcome to the legal margin.

Thanks to the feminist insistence on our absolute reverence for "victims" (aka those who don't have the good sense to get away from abusive people), the tide is turning, and not in your direction.

The courts are going to start regarding those of you who put the "bad" in bad relationships, or who have been accused of such, as something less than human. With this ruling, and the precedent it establishes, there will surely be others who line up for their slaps on the wrist after taking you out.

Who knows? Maybe when enough men walk away from murder charges after killing women they did not have the sense to leave, someone will notice the stench of what is going on.

In the meantime, ladies, enjoy an emerging equality of which I am sure you never dreamed.

And sleep well.

Paul Cavanaugh Denies Corruption; Misleads Voters Again

Paul Elam · 2 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of years of scandal, legal malfeasance and ongoing public controversy, Hancock County District Attorney Carletta Bassano has decided not to run for re-election when her term expires.

So far two ADAs from Bassano's corruption-addled office have thrown their names into the hat to take her place. The net result of either of them being elected will mean that the entire operation, including the disgraced Mary Kellett whose license to practice law was suspended for several items of malfeasance, will remain intact doing business as usual.

One of those two candidates is ADA Paul Cavanaugh, who was captured recently on videotape politicking with a group of local Republican women. He was being asked questions about the systematic abuses of power that have been exposed in the Hancock County office over the past several years.

Not only did Cavanaugh deny that he believes any such systemic problems exist, he goes on to put on a convincing display of the problem itself by minimizing and misleading the people he is addressing about the conduct of Mary Kellett, and by making highly inappropriate public statements about an active case involving Vladek Filler, literally trying Filler on his own as he postures for the camera and the political group.

The conduct in this video is worthy of bar complaint on its own, even as Cavanaugh denies that there is a culture of corruption in the office he now wants to head.

A side note for you Mr. Cavanaugh. Two, actually. One, you lied to your audience (quelle surprise) when you characterized the MHRM as a group that sees women as a problem. The problems, just like the ones you lied about in this video, are systemic. They involved men like you every bit as much as they do women like Kellett. No one in this movement ever claimed that corruption had a gender. It is men like you that shape our beliefs.

Two, take a look at the faces on the people in this video. You know, the ones listening to you talk. Do they look like they are buying your bullshit? As a prosecutor you should be a good study in body language and other forms of non-verbal communication. What does it tell you?

Do you think this is the last time you are going to have to face questions about the corrupt railroad your team has been running disguised as a prosecutor's office?

And one last question. Did you really think that concerned citizens were just going to move on to something else after your buddy Kellett got a slap on the wrist for making a mockery of the criminal justice system at the expense of Vladek Filler and countless other men?

Your office needs new leadership, Paul; someone with a very large broom in their hand with a mind to use it on you and everyone else currently in that office. It is the only way to turn your den of thieves into an instrument of the law that commands respect.

Video and background for this story courtesy of Integrity 4Maine.

What an appropriate name.

Julie Bindel, men, women and murder

Mike Buchanan · 2 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Some weeks ago I was a speaker in a debate at Durham University, arguing for the motion, "This House believes feminists are all too often sexists in disguise." One of the two women opposing the motion was Julie Bindel, a prominent lesbian gender feminist journalist. An account of the debate was sent to me by a man in the audience. In my opening 15-minute speech I had the following to say about homeless people:

"Men are discriminated against even when they're homeless and living on the street. Across the UK about 90% of homeless people are men, many of them ex-military, suffering from undiagnosed and untreated Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. State support of ex-military people with mental health issues, overwhelmingly men, is derisory. The reasons for there being so many homeless men include being at the end of the queue when it comes to social housing.

"Some months ago I wrote a blog piece on homelessness, and a female social worker who works with the homeless sent in this comment:

> 'If a homeless woman comes into our offices on a Friday afternoon, I'm obliged to offer her money, accommodation, food and clothing. If a homeless man comes into our offices on a Friday afternoon, I'm obliged to send him back out onto the street, with nothing.'

"As a sexist policy position, that takes some beating.

"It hardly needs saying, I hope, that homelessness is a leading cause of shortened lives, often through suicide. I've already mentioned that three times more men than women in the UK commit suicide. It's the single largest cause of death of young men, and a major cause of death of disadvantaged men in mid-life."

In response Julie Bindel said this:

"Mike told you a lie about… or the woman who emailed him told you a lie about how homeless men are told, 'Go sod off', and women are told [tone changed to mimicked gentle voice], 'I'll give you food, I'll give you clothing, I'll give you shelter.' I can't tell you how many women are in B&B accommodation, or even in tents in Lincoln Inn Fields in London, who have been abused, who have been trafficked and who have been thrown out of their homes, and they have their children with them because the majority of women end up being primary care givers because men piss off and can't be arsed.

"So that's all I want to say. Please, just look at the credible statistics – and look behind them. Look at the definition of domestic violence and ask yourself, 'Is somebody saying, yes, I've been domestically abused by my wife?'… and they mean nagging? Is that really the same as being terrorised in your own home to the extent that you actually take your children, leave your pets behind, all your belongings, and run away to a refuge? Just ask yourself. Thank you."

The following is an extract from my final five-minute summing-up at the debate, just before the vote from the 300+ strong audience. I was heckled by Julie Bindel as I was speaking, and that section is highlighted in yellow:

"Let's imagine that someone emailed you a link to the website of a campaigning organisation called 'Justice for Men' – nothing to do with my party. 'Justice for Men' – sounds innocuous, doesn't it? You click on the link, and beneath a sinister logo you see the strapline, 'Women, men and murder'. You then read this, on the first line of the home page:

> 'Justice for Men was established as a campaigning organisation that supports and advocates on behalf of men who have fought back against or killed violent female partners.'

"I find the idea of an organisation supporting and advocating for men who have fought back against or killed their female partners repellent, and an example of extreme sexism. If any of you in the audience wouldn't find such an organisation repellent and sexist, would you please put up your hands now?"

[In an audience of 300+ people, almost all university students, not one hand were raised.]

"Thank you. There is, however, no campaigning organisation called Justice for Men. But there is one called 'Justice for Women', and it was co-founded many years ago by Julie Bindel. Beneath the sinister logo on their website is the strapline, 'Men, women and murder'…"

> BINDEL: "Lies!"
>
> [Audible sharp intakes of breath from the audience]
> BINDEL: "No sinister strap line, no sinister logo."
>
> BUCHANAN: "The strapline is 'Men, women and murder…'"
>
> BINDEL: "No!"
>
> [Laughter from women in the audience, and some applause.]
>
> BUCHANAN: "I looked at it yesterday, Julie…"
>
> [Further more strident interruption from Bindel, speaking over Buchanan; "And it's actually injustice scales"]
>
> BUCHANAN: "I looked at it yesterday, unless it's been pulled…"
>
> BINDEL: "I think it must be one of your spoofs then Mike."
>
> [Buchanan goes on to deliver the remainder of his summing up uninterrupted.]

"Certainly not… I can give anyone the URL. The first line on the home page says:

> 'Justice for Women was established in 1990 as a feminist campaigning organisation that supports and advocates on behalf of women who have fought back against or killed violent male partners.'

"I can't think of a more astonishing example of sexism than to support or advocate for people of one gender who'd fought back against or killed partners of the other gender.

"I spent some time on the Justice for Women website earlier this week. As we might expect, the website portrays a parallel universe in which women have no moral agency, so when they carry out crimes – even murder – it's only in reaction to bad men. Men are to blame not only for their own actions, but those of women too. In this parallel universe, it seems, a woman is to be held no more accountable for her actions than the smallest child.

"Back in the real world, we saw earlier that where domestic violence is one-way, women are more likely than men to be the perpetrators…"

Julie followed my summing-up with her own, and started:

"I wasn't going to talk about this, but I'm going to have to, because obviously Mike has raised my organisation Justice for Women, and the reason why we set this up 20 years ago was the tragedy of this handful of cases of women: these rare cases compared to men who kill women when there's been a history of domestic violence. Who, because they have no other option, because they have tried and tried and tried to go to the police for help. Because their children have been threatened. Because quite frankly, they go off their heads with distress, with the fear for their lives and the lives of their children through the horrific sexual violence and domestic violence that they have endured…"

An enterprising male student googled 'Justice for Women' http://www.justiceforwomen.org.uk on his smartphone near the end of the debate, found the logo and strapline, and showed the image to Julie Bindel after the debate had ended. He told me she'd then stormed off.

The strapline, "Murder, men and women" was removed from the website a few days after the debate. We've posted blogs pieces with links to cached copies showing it was in use shortly before the debate, and as far back as 2006 at least.

After the debate I emailed Julie Bindel a link to our blog piece with the comments made by a female social worker with respect to the different support offered to homeless men and women, to prove that neither I nor the social worker had lied.

Given that Julie Bindel had publicly called me a liar twice in a debate with an audience of 300+ people, once shortly before the audience vote, I felt a written apology was in order, so we could post it on the J4MB blog and comment on it. She fell ill with flu not long after the debate, and it wasn't until 4 February that we had a lengthy and cordial phone conversation, in the course of which she said:

> I'm very sorry about calling you a liar when it turns out that you weren't… so please accept my sincere apology for that… it was a genuine mistake on my part.

I accepted her apology, of course, but she then quickly changed the subject, so I never discovered which instance(s) of calling me a liar she was "very sorry about." I've emailed her four times (28 + 30 January, 14 + 18 February) requesting a written apology. On 30 January I pointed her to our public challenge on the matter.

No written apology has been forthcoming, hence the need to publish this piece.

Maybe one day a prominent gender feminist will have the decency to publicly apologise for having made demonstrably incorrect statements in debates, in newspaper articles, in TV or radio interviews, or in other situations. Given the lack of response to our public challenges of prominent feminists and their male collaborators, we shouldn't be optimistic, because these people have one thing in common. They're all utterly shameless.

MGTOW and women's adult agency

John Hembling (JtO) · 2 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A few days ago, while working with a female friend, I encountered something entirely new in my experience. An explicitly non-feminist woman who, as far as I can tell, has abdicated her own personal agency.

My friend and I had been flirting with one another. Neither of us had any intention beyond verbal exchange. By itself this isn't noteworthy, except where personal agency and my own MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) practices overlap.

For the uninitiated – this unwieldy appellation refers to a subset of the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) consisting of men who actively reject many of the social requirements and obligations of normal masculine identity, on the grounds that such norms are self-destructive, and conform to an inequitable sexual hierarchy.

As a MGTOW, I maintain a ledger of those of my female friends and colleagues who are allowed to enter private space with me.

This might need a bit of explanation. The culture we are all presently living in increasingly promotes the idea that women are endlessly victimized. Sexually, socially, economically, and by men. By the patriarchy.

This idea was encapsulated over a decade ago in a remark by the feminist, ACLU board member and civil libertarian Judith Levine.

> "men [are] so powerful that they can 'reach WITHIN women to fuck/construct us from the inside out."

Left unstated, but clearly implied is the idea that women are weak, helpless, and lacking volition or agency over their own lives. Whatever a woman does, whatever the outcome, she owns no responsibility. This is also central to the presently populist idea that a woman choosing to having sex while drunk is incapable of making any such choice. Indeed, a woman who participates in a sexual encounter after a couple drinks is a victim. She's a rape victim. The man, similarly drunk who also made a choice to join the sexy times isn't a victim. Nope, he's a rapist.

If you think this is profoundly stupid, like I do, you probably also think women are fully sentient, capable and self-determined adults, like I do.

But our feminist culture keeps saying, albeit indirectly that they're helpless, weak, feeble minded, and inferior. And this is why, when a woman says she is victimized, maybe raped, maybe sexually assaulted, or possibly just scared – our culture moves to destroy whatever claimed, perceived or imagined menace, malefactor, or malevolent man might plausibly be responsible. The mendacity of this idiotic ideology exceeds imagination. But this is where we all live now.

It's also why, as a man going his own way, I require a statement of personal self-ownership from any female friend or colleague before they will be allowed into private company with me.

"I, the undersigned declare by my signature that I am an adult, acting with all the self-possession, agency and volition of a fully realized person. In contrast, I state clearly and forcefully that I am not an object, lacking volition or will, or acted upon without my own agency or intent. I also express by my signature that I do now, and may in future enjoy the company of this ledger's owner, including potentially private and adult social intercourse, and any incidents of note may also be documented by me in this ledger."

But my friend, by her own choice, can't sign that statement.

I had suggested to her that I would not invite her over for a cup of coffee, on the basis that she might mistakenly interpret such invitation as for nothing more than a cup of hot coffee.

She responded with the suggestion that checking out the second hand stores in my neighbourhood could constitute a date, also asking whether I am married.

I don't date, but it would have been pointless and rude to say so.

But am I married? Recall, neither of us has any actual intent of getting naked. So naturally, I asked if we were about to have a sordid, sexually depraved and inappropriate encounter.

From her: "Goodness! Is that an option?!?!"

In other circumstances, it might have been an option. I don't know. I won't be a party to anyone violating a trust relationship, Here's where it becomes a bit complicated.

My friend is married, which, by itself doesn't mean what it used to. "It's complicated" is more than just a social-media personal status update. I don't have a wife, or even a girlfriend, in any recognizable sense of that word. But that doesn't mean I have no sexual relationships with select friends whose genitals happen to fit neatly together with my own. However, those are relationships of trust, unconventional as they might be.

What I don't do is lend myself to the violation of a trusting relationship – whatever term it's called by.

As matters turn out, she's not simply married, she's in a relationship in which she is entirely financially taken care of by her husband. Indeed, according to her, because she is completely financially supported, her commensurate obligation is to provide sexual access to her husband, whenever he wants.

Reading a book? That can wait. Making a sandwich? That can wait. However, it's a bit more complex than that. In fact, My friend's identity is not her own. Her identity, and it's expression, including her sexual identity apparently is to be expressed only at the discretion, and with the permission of her husband.

This, by the way, is not some archaic manifestation of female-crushing oppression. She's a highly intelligent, capable, witty individual. She's connected and has considerable influence in her own professional sphere. This strange lack of self-ownership is a choice she has made about how she lives her own life. She has chosen to defer her own self-expression, and her own agency and volition, into the hands of somebody she has arranged to have pay all her bills. What she conveyed to me was not just the simple and common statement that she is part of a monogamous relationship. She made it clear that she by her own choice doesn't own responsibility for her own decisions, or her own sexual expression.

Her husband, the guy with the wallet, and yoked plow-horse that he is, might even be a happy beast of burden. I hope so.

But since on-demand sexual access, as well as determination over her expression of sexual and personal identity is the commodity exchanged for complete financial support. I did a little math, while writing this article. I've had to make assumptions, obviously, such as the value of their mortgage. Let's assume for argument's sake, it's $ 600,000 over 25 years.

That's 87 dollars per day. If we double that to allow for clothing, and other living expenses – we're still only looking at 175 dollars per day.

Maybe I should make my friend an offer for a day of mutual entertainment..

But here's the problem. If she and I were to go antiquing, or used-bookstore-hopping, or have a simple cup of coffee, I would require her signature in my ledger – asserting her own adult agency.

But she cannot, in all honesty sign that document. She is, by her own choice, a non-adult. She doesn't possess her own independent autonomy. As a MGTOW, only women who are fully autonomous, self-actualizing and volition-owning agents of their own identity are permitted into my personal life.

She has disqualified herself from signing my ledger. As such, she is not allowed into my private company. Too bad.

> I, the undersigned declare by my signature that I am an adult, acting with all the self possession, agency and volition of a fully realized person. In contrast, I state clearly and forcefully that I am not an object, lacking volition or will, or acted upon without my own agency or intent. I also express by my signature that I do now, and may in future enjoy the company of this ledger's owner, including potentially private and adult social intercourse, and any incidents of note may also be documented by me in this ledger.
>
> Name:
> Date of Birth:
> Driver's Licence:
> Today's Date:
> Signed:
>
> Witnessed:

West Virginia Speaker Tim Miley Won't Talk Court Reform

John Brown · 3 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is a classic example of someone who has the power to fix a problem, but, instead, through his inaction, allows the corrupt West Virginia Family Law Court system to destroy thousands of innocent lives:

West Virginia Speaker Timothy "Tim" Miley, (D), is in a great position to reform the broken family law system. Instead, he's playing ignorant while rolling out the tired "hand over the camera lens" stunt when questioned about his political inaction.

For months Miley has been aware of proposals to clean up West Virginia's "Judicial Hellhole" including the family law system. In recent weeks Miley has been ducking telephone calls about the important issue.

Miley can duck, but he can't hide.

Monday night, February 24th, 2014, PutnamLIVE.com met Miley on his home turf. We drove to the West Virginia Capitol, in Charleston, and stunned the speaker by walking right up to his podium and asking why he hasn't taken the important steps toward Family Law Court reform in West Virginia. It may be the first time a House Speaker has been Ambush Interviewed at his podium.

Ever the politician, Miley claims he hasn't seen the proposals. He didn't answer about not opening his email. And he didn't tell anyone why he hasn't returned our telephone calls. He also didn't offer to meet with Family Law Reform proponents to hammer out emergency legislation to solve the problem.

Instead, Miley repeatedly put his hand over our video camera's lens and asked PutnamLIVE.com to leave. We did. But the broken West Virginia Family Law system remains behind, along with Miley-if he manages to get re-elected in November. Fathers have a huge say in that matter. And we're betting they won't be voting for Miley-especially after watching our video.

"It's amazing that they won't fix the broken Family Law Courts," says PutnamLIVE.com's Publisher Mark Hallburn, a single father. "Many politicians are divorced fathers. Regardless of their marital status, most of them are fathers. They know about the problems. Yet they sit back and watch children and fathers being abused. It's disgraceful!"

When jackass politicians like Tim Miley show their arrogance and ignorance, chidlren lose.

Here is a list of the proposals that Miley is ignoring:

1) Temporary orders must be subject to immediate appeal.

2) Reporters must be allowed in Family Court rooms.

3) All public officials must be subject to recall.

4) Two year terms for all judges.

5) Child custody decisions made by juries of parents.

6) Judicial Investigation Commission is made up of civilians instead of judges. Full time employees, meet weekly on each case. 10 days to file charges.

7) All judicial complaints become public record.

8) All orders are stayed until appeal is decided.

9) Temporary orders have a 10 day limit.

10) BOTH parents must take psych exam.

11) If psych exam isn't taken, that person automatically loses custody.

12) Rules 5, 11, and 17 are nullified.

13) All court pleadings, appeals, recusals, etc., must be acceptable in plain English.

14) No judicial immunity.

15) Judges may be removed from case automatically upon recusal request.

16) If judge is sued by a litigant, automatic recusal.

17) Automatic 50-50 joint custody if that was situation prior to divorce/separation.

18) If a partner is removed from the home, settlement is made on day of removal.

19) Any judge that violates a court rule is automatically disqualified.

20) Citizens may start impeachment proceedings with automatic legislative session triggered by impeachment filing.

21) Unless child abuse can be proven, each spouse may take child out-of-state for travel.

22) No restrictions on overnight visits unless child abuse is proven.

23) DVP registry is open to the public/press.

24) Term limits for judges.

25) All civil court orders must be enforced by all law enforcement officers.

26) JIC must be able to immediately suspend judges – with pay – until a final hearing.

27) JIC must be able to prosecute judges for criminal and civil misconduct.

Related:

Major Family Law Reforms Proposed

Getta Man School of Labor Management for Women

AVfM Video Source · 3 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Hannah Wallen has a new program for the ladies. Check it out!

You might want to subscribe to Hannah Wallen.

The real Rape Culture

AVfM Video Source · 3 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The feminists are correct when they say we live in a rape culture, but not as correct as they'd like to be. Youtuber Goodfella breaks down the feminist narrative for us:

You should probably subscribe to Goodfella.

Alison Saunders, Director of Public Prosecutions, and the show trials of men in the UK

Mike Buchanan · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Alison Saunders (53) is a barrister and a career civil servant who joined the Crown Prosecution Service ('CPS') at its inception in 1986. The CPS is the taxpayer-funded body which decides who's charged with criminal offences, so it's the body which has been responsible for launching (at huge cost to taxpayers) a series of show trials of prominent men, many of them elderly, on charges of sexual offences – including rape. Most have been acquitted on all or almost all counts.

Few of these trials would have taken place in more enlightened times, as the quality of evidence is almost invariably either woefully poor or non-existent. Some alleged offences date back 40 years or more. The women alleging the offences retain anonymity even when the cases fail, while the men's identities are revealed across the mass media as soon as they're charged.

The women stand to receive large sums for compensation from the public purse if their cases succeed. Women making false allegations have everything to gain, and nothing to lose. Some of the men have been financially ruined by legal costs, and it's a wonder that none of them have yet committed suicide. It's surely only a matter of time before one or more of them does so. Doubtless feminists will dance on their graves.

The 2010 Conservative-led coalition agreement committed the coalition to re-introduce anonymity for suspects of sexual assaults and rape, but the coalition reneged on the commitment once in office.

All you need to know about Saunders's ideologically-driven views on how the law should treat possible perpetrators and possible victims of rape can be found in a Guardian interview from January 2012 (link below), written almost two years before she was appointed head of the CPS, as Director of Public Prosecutions, in November 2013. Her predecessor in that role was Keir Starmer. In December 2013 the Labour Party announced that Starmer would lead an enquiry into changing the law to give further protection to victims in cases of rape and child abuse – which would, of course, mean less protection for alleged perpetrators, overwhelmingly men. It would be unthinkable that such an enquiry could recommend the introduction of anonymity for people suspected of sexual offences.

The Guardian interview of Alison Saunders:

http://www.theguardian.com/society/2012/jan/30/rape-victims-acquittals-chief-prosecutor

An extract:

> In an interview with the Guardian, Saunders said she believed jurors were coming to court with preconceptions about women that affected the way they considered evidence. These beliefs need to be challenged if more trials aren't to end in acquittals.
>
> Saunders said prosecutors and detectives involved in rape cases were now trained to challenge myths and stereotypes, particularly around women who have been drinking, or those who say they have been sexually assaulted by a current or former partner.
>
> "We have done lots of training … but there has never been that debate on a wider social basis. You can see how some members of the jury can come along with preconceived ideas, they might still subscribe to the myths and stereotypes that we have all had a go at busting…
>
> "There have been a lot of developments about what judges can say to jurors. Judges cannot do rape cases unless they are specialists and they have been through the myth-busting courses."

So, the life experiences and opinions of jurors aren't adequate for the challenge facing them, to weigh up evidence and come to a rational decision? You can be very sure that the 'myths and stereotypes' aren't in jurors' minds, but in the minds of ‘prosecutors and detectives involved in rape cases’ who are now ‘trained’ and ‘specialist’ judges who ‘have been though the myth-busting courses’.

You can be sure those courses will be riddled with feminist propaganda, stressing that women should NEVER bear the slightest responsibility for putting themselves in risky situations. And women’s accounts should ALWAYS be believed… even when they’re unbelievable. This is nothing less than a feminist-inspired attack on the jury system, and a witch hunt of prominent men.

Who, you might reasonably ask, would be most interested in becoming ‘trained’ and ‘specialist’ prosecutors, detectives and judges? Ideologically-driven people, surely.

Laura Kuenssberg recently interviewed Ms Saunders for Newsnight. It’s the file dated 27 February on our YouTube channel – link below – and I should like to take this opportunity to thank the gentleman behind the ‘ManWomanMyth’ and ‘Humanity Bites’ channels for editing our pieces and posting them onto our channel:

There are three sections to the piece, all worth watching:

0:00 – 0:27 Introduction

0:28 – 4:02 Background (much of it is absurd feminist-inspired narrative, but stick with it – typical of BBC output)

4:03 – 9:03 Alison Saunders interviewed by Laura Kuenssberg. The footage is cut short where the interview moves onto an unrelated topic.

No, seriously, what about teh menz?

Jared White · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Does anyone remember a time when a feminist could step onto a stage, any stage, be it national or local, and proclaim women were oppressed by men and not be challenged by anyone? There really wasn't so much as a flutter of an eyelash indicating that someone, anyone needed to process that statement, which, in most cases, was made off the cuff in some speech about why tax dollars should be funneled into some women-only program.

Now don't get me wrong. The statement is still made regularly by feminists and those amongst the general population who can't be bothered to look into the facts of history. But the point I'm making here is that there was a time when someone could utter disgusting things, like men being "oppressors," as if they were saying the sky was blue and almost no one would even challenge the assertion. It was as if those who knew it wasn't true who decided to let the lie continue unabated, supposedly content with the knowledge that even though it was a mischaracterized exaggeration of how men and women lived before technology wiped a massive portion of sweat from our brows, women had it worse and continued to have it worse in just about every aspect of life. So the male-excluding programs and initiatives were needed… even though the people peddling these programs were saying some pretty mean-spirited and untrue things.

But now things are different. Sure, feminist women and men can still proclaim the penis to be a weapon deserving of caution tape or that men are animals in need of training from feminists in order to be decent human beings. These things can still be said, but the difference now is that when these things are said outside of an echo chamber full of like-minded individuals something astonishing will often happen: a hand attached to an individual with questions will rise. These questions, to the fear and frustration of many feminists, will be legitimate challenges to their illegitimate claims about history, gender, and most especially, men.

One public display of how this will affect feminists has recently graced the front page of this website. The discussion between Karen Straughan, Naomi Wolf, and Antigone Darling is a perfect example of why feminism has never been and will never be about helping both men and women.

But, Jared, Not All Feminists Are Like That™ you say? So what?

The ideology of feminism stems from the presumption that men are advantaged over women. Whether you are a feminist who believes that men are at fault for this or "society" is at fault for this doesn't matter. Men being advantaged or having their lives set on "easy mode" is the problem, correct? So then to fix this problem that advantage must be eliminated, correct? So no matter where you start, your end goal is to take things away from men that you feel are an advantage so that women can be "equal." That is why the basis of every feminist initiative has been one or both of the following.

1. Help women
2. Help men learn how to help women

That's it. That's all there is to feminism. Even the vicious attacks on masculinity and male sexuality are all derived from the basis of elevating (helping) women. There never was and there never will be a feminist initiative created on a third basis of helping men.

I'm sure most who viewed the presentation gave most of their attention to Naomi Wolf. Not because she had the most thought-provoking things to say, but because almost everything she did say was one hollow statement after the next. "We should all come together and hold hands for the betterment of humanity and feminism will get us there" was basically her response to everything Karen and Antigone had to say. The reason being is because she wasn't there to debate either of these women. She was there to win over the crowd. Naomi did her damnedest to ensure the crowd heard what she perceived they wanted to hear, and that feminism wasn't dragged too harshly through the mud.

And she wasn't without help. It is my understanding that the sole purpose of a moderator in a debate is to be impartial and ensure everyone gets their say. While the moderator in this debate didn't flat out interrupt Karen or Antigone, she made sure to follow-up every one of their non-feminist supporting statements, and I do mean every last one, with "oh but maybe we should look at it this way because feminism is rainbows and butterflies". Or at least that's what I took away after viewing it.

Back to the point of this article: Naomi demonstrated the changing climate hovering above these issues perfectly. I challenge anyone reading this article that doesn't subscribe to any group advocating for the awareness of male issues to point out just how many male issues Naomi actually spoke of in her long tirades of how feminism is about helping everyone. Yes feminists, I'm talking to you too. That is, if you can get past the euphoria that washed over your brains after one of the audience members Googled the National Organization for Women's stance on shared parenting. It took Karen asserting the sensible notion that to prove a rape occurred means one would have to prove a lack of consent to knock Naomi from her wave of nirvana.

It was only one issue she wanted to stick with, if you're having trouble counting in your skim through the video. One issue repeated about three or four times I believe in an off-the-cuff manner: that women were oppressed by men. Meaning, it was a sound bite, or at least a cliche she's repeated so many times she doesn't even think you can challenge it. As underrepresented as male issues are, I'll take that sound bite even though its use was in no way geared toward raising awareness about those issues. No, the sound bite was rehearsed the same way politicians rehearse their speeches. But that isn't important. What is important is the impact that people like Karen and Antigone are having on people like Naomi when they challenge that sound bite.

If it was up to feminists, male issues would continue to remain in the dark, like they have for the better part of the last century. But because of websites like AVfM, feminists can no longer proclaim wife-beating to be an accepted and encouraged practice of the past without someone bringing up the reality: that men were whipped and beaten for such acts. Feminists can no longer say domestic violence is a gendered weapon men use to control women without someone bringing up the glaring fact that DV is nearly equal between men and women and often reciprocal. No one, not even Naomi Wolf, can claim that rape is something only men do to women without someone pointing out the fact that men and boys take up a large portion of sexual victims and that women commit sexual assault almost as commonly as men–which is why she had to rehearse that sound bite about women's oppression inserted into many of her responses.

The very fact that sound bite was even necessary should be considered a victory. All across the web feminists are suddenly proclaiming themselves champions of both male and female issues. And their proof? Well, some feminists throw out a couple of male issues in one or two of their articles. That's something, right? Of course when it comes to actually doing something about those issues…well…that's where things get a bit difficult. You see, feminists are human beings, a hard fact to swallow I know, but it's true, and human beings are adaptable creatures. It's why we're still here on this planet. But adaptation is often slow so flaws are inevitable in any evolution. Feminists who go as far as to list male issues will usually say without hesitation that these issues need action. But they don't want anything to do with that action and they definitely don't want those "woman-hating MRAs" to do anything about those issues either. So where does that leave men?

Waiting for feminists to get done with helping women.

Feminists don't want male issues given solutions unless those solutions come from the ideology of feminism. That is, helping women or helping men help women. Of course if this model is followed men will never receive the help they need.

Let's pretend for a minute that rape is actually a crime committed only by men to women. Forget about gay men or lesbians and don't ever bring up female-on-male rape as anything other than super-duper rare. You with me yet? Good. Now say everyone dropped everything and focused all their attention on ending rape, which is basically the Holy Grail quest of every feminist everywhere. But, in an impossible turn of events, let's say rape was successfully eliminated. Now then, tell me:

How the fuck would that end false rape allegations?

What, you think that if all rapists were jailed false allegations would suddenly stop happening? Or maybe you think that because we would know there are no more rapists that anyone making an allegation would have to be a liar and thus we would just jail them too? Or maybe just ignore them, since jailing false accusers is rarer than actually finding the Holy Grail?

What about paternity fraud? Would catching all of those pesky "deadbeat dads" end the sickening epidemic of women lying about the fathers of their children?

Women were given the right to abort decades ago. Did that solve the male issue of not being able to decide whether or not they are going to be a parent? No.

Women have this right, even if you take abortion out of the equation. But men? Nope. A man's right to parenthood is actually a woman's right to decide whether or not he is going to pay for her children. Even if those children aren't his.

Maybe if we focus all of our attention on how women attempt suicide more than men, the inconvenient fact of men killing themselves more than women will just go away.

You don't think so? Me neither.

So then what about the men? What should we do? Send all of them to one of those "Man up" programs endorsed by Naomi? I'm sure the thing society needs in its search for a solution to male suicide is a program that tells men it is their responsibility to be meat shields for the superior sex that is Woman.

About three years ago a blog with the same title as this article was created by a feminist. A wave of popularity from an opinion piece about the feminist movement and men's rights is what jump-started the creation of that blog. The article was almost revolutionary, given the fact that its author was a nineteen-year-old feminist woman who frequented feminist websites dedicated to nothing more than disenfranchising the MRM and making light of male issues. Yet there she was, chastising feminists for excluding men from the whole equality-of-the-sexes process.

So then what happened next? Exactly what I said would happen in an opinion piece of my own. The creator of the blog and most of its contributors gave lip service to some male issues, but didn't really do much else. Also, any male issues discussed were spoken about in such a way as to absolve feminism of any responsibility for the conception or prevalence of said issues. Things like paternity fraud and false rape accusations were rarely given mention, if at all, save for fair warnings to new readers that feminism would not be bad mouthed anywhere on the website.

Three years later and what has changed? Not much. The website has folded under its own dishonest and hypocritical weight, and the creator, after a brief stint at The Good Men Project, has faded into obscurity. But the lesson many learned from that website, which was basically a much smaller version of The Good Men Project, is that feminists are their own worst enemy when it comes to giving legitimacy to their claims of helping both men and women. They just can't do it. Not without risking the damnable ire of the sisterhood. Something Emily Matchar, like every feminist who dared give legitimacy to male issues before her, is learning the hard way.

But it goes deeper than the threat of having their feminist card taken away. Feminists literally can't help men. They are incapable of approaching any issue from the perspective of helping men. The programs they create for men are all based on this notion: men who haven't done bad things to women taking responsibility for bad things other men have done to women and sacrificing themselves to protect those women.

Man Up

Men can stop rape

*The White Ribbon Campaign (*Both historic and modern)

*RAD for Men (*Not conclusive yet but Sage is on it)

Man Up (There's one in Ireland too)

There are many, many more but you get the idea. In the feminist ideology there is no such thing as helping men because there is no such thing as men needing help. All men need to be instructed on how not to be rapists and abusers of women. And it is a man's responsibility, after receiving said instructions, to defend women from these rapists and abusers. It is a man's responsibility to intervene when a woman is in danger from anything and rescue her. That is the message of feminism: women are weak incapable children with no agency, who hold no responsibility, and need protection from men, by men.

So, what about the men? Feminists don't give a damn.

That's why the MRM is here.

18 Reasons to Not Give Your Girl a Dime

Paul Elam · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Oh, the sacrifices I make for AVFM readers. This very evening I read an article from COSMO titled. "18 Reasons Not to Give Him a Blowjob." It was a devastatingly stupid piece, even for COSMO, offering such sage advice (to women who apparently need it) about why it is a bad idea, among other things, to have someone else's venereal warts in your mouth.

What the piece did not deliver on substance, it did at least provide an opportunity for some levity. Here is essentially the same piece, with sexes and circumstances switched around just enough to make it pretty serious.

It's light reading, but I promise you it is better than what you would have read in COSMO – which I grit my teeth and suggest you read first.

So, why should you not give your girl a single dime?

Because you are not obligated to.

1. Because she is being an insufferable bitch. If you insist on paying her for behavior, pay her to act like she is a normal human being.

2. Because you don't feel like it. You earned it. Spend it on you.

3. She won't return the favor. Well, unless you count a shitty tie from Target on your birthday, or occasionally picking up the tab at Starbucks.

4. Too much whining. Just because her tastes always seem to exceed your financial capabilities doesn't mean her infantile wailing is part of the transaction. Hint: Hookers usually fall silent and leave after payment is made.

5. Smell. Face it. Greedy, entitled bullshit stinks. If you catch a whiff, don't imagine that a shower is going to help.

6. If anything about laying your hard earned money out there makes you feel uncomfortable. She may have really big tits, or really small ones. Or maybe she has spit out a couple of kids and she has the saggy kind that have more striations than the surface of mars. Maybe you can learn to love any of them as long as there are two of roughly the same size. That does not mean you have to pull out the plastic. If you really want to test your credit limit over her boobs, just ask her about it. You can be assured she will have some helpful tips.

7. If she is grabbing your crotch while asking for money. The worst. Take the handjob and then go hit a sports bar, by yourself.

8. If your body is super sore from work. Forty hours of using pipe wrenches and other tools can remind you very quickly what puts the butter on your bread.

9. If you're too tired. In the immortal words of ~~Samantha Jones~~ every man who ever did real work, "They don't call it a job for nothing.

10. If your meticulously balanced check book looks awesome. She won't improve the aesthetics.

11. If you're only doing it because you think it is required foreplay. Depending on the woman you are with, that may be the case. And true enough, in the end you're getting fucked.

12. If she starts doing that thrusting thing down your pockets and you are not into it. Some people like to be robbed during sex, or at the very least they don't care, but if you're not one of them, just cover your pockets with your hands and wait for her to notice. It's the "Third grade teacher holding up his hand in a noisy classroom until all the kids are silent" technique.

13. When it looks like something is wrong with her mind, BPD-wise. But I hope I don't have to tell you that.

14. When you're annoyed with her for any reason. The moment you finance a better mood for her, likely so you can get back to the sex she really isn't otherwise interested in having with you, is the moment a relationship starts to shrivel and die like a salt-slug. And trust me, when it is over you will need all the money you can get your hands on.

15. When you have stuffy nose, or a hangnail, or a paper cut, or a mild headache, or when you are experiencing none of these things. You need a woman who is a match for you intellectually. That means she can find her purse when bills come due or the dinner check arrives. If she is too stupid, or entitled to do that, then find another woman.

16. In the shower? This is the one exception. Give her all the cash you have on hand.

17. If she demands that you pay for everything. Deciding to do that yourself is pretty crazy, but hey, who am I to question your choices? But a woman who expects it of you is pretty uppity, not to mention useless. And if her demands are the reason you are throwing cash at her, do yourself a favor. You can do the same thing, and have a lot more fun, at a titty bar.

18. You ask her to carry her own financial weight and she refuses. Whether you elect yourself as the designated ATM in your relationship is your business, but if she won't cough up the cash after you've made it clear that you want her to, that's a dealbreaker.

Killing for Equality

AVfM Video Source · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In Australia, a man kills a woman and gets away with it because she was abusive. John the Other has some thoughts worth pondering.

You may also want to watch this video, and in any case you should subscribe to John the Other.

18 Reasons to Not Give Your Girl a Dime

Paul Elam · 4 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Oh, the sacrifices I make for AVFM readers. This very evening I read an article from COSMO titled. "18 Reasons Not to Give Him a Blowjob." It was a devastatingly stupid piece, even for COSMO, offering such sage advice (to women who apparently need it) about why it is a bad idea, among other things, to have someone else's venereal warts in your mouth.

What the piece did not deliver on substance, it did at least provide an opportunity for some levity. Here is essentially the same piece, with sexes and circumstances switched around just enough to make it pretty serious.

It's light reading, but I promise you it is better than what you would have read in COSMO – which I grit my teeth and suggest you read first.

So, why should you not give your girl a single dime?

Because you are not obligated to.

1. Because she is being an insufferable bitch. If you insist on paying her for behavior, pay her to act like she is a normal human being.

2. Because you don't feel like it. You earned it. Spend it on you.

3. She won't return the favor. Well, unless you count a shitty tie from Target on your birthday, or occasionally picking up the tab at Starbucks.

4. Too much whining. Just because her tastes always seem to exceed your financial capabilities doesn't mean her infantile wailing is part of the transaction. Hint: Hookers usually fall silent and leave after payment is made.

5. Smell. Face it. Greedy, entitled bullshit stinks. If you catch a whiff, don't imagine that a shower is going to help.

6. If anything about laying your hard earned money out there makes you feel uncomfortable. She may have really big tits, or really small ones. Or maybe she has spit out a couple of kids and she has the saggy kind that have more striations than the surface of mars. Maybe you can learn to love any of them as long as there are two of roughly the same size. That does not mean you have to pull out the plastic. If you really want to test your credit limit over her boobs, just ask her about it. You can be assured she will have some helpful tips.

7. If she is grabbing your crotch while asking for money. The worst. Take the handjob and then go hit a sports bar, by yourself.

8. If your body is super sore from work. Forty hours of using pipe wrenches and other tools can remind you very quickly what puts the butter on your bread.

9. If you're too tired. In the immortal words of ~~Samantha Jones~~ every man who ever did real work, "They don't call it a job for nothing."

10. If your meticulously balanced check book looks awesome. She won't improve the aesthetics.

11. If you're only doing it because you think it is required foreplay. Depending on the woman you are with, that may be the case. And true enough, in the end you're getting fucked.

12. If she starts doing that thrusting thing down your pockets and you are not into it. Some people like to be robbed during sex, or at the very least they don't care, but if you're not one of them, just cover your pockets with your hands and wait for her to notice. It's the "Third grade teacher holding up his hand in a noisy classroom until all the kids are silent" technique.

13. When it looks like something is wrong with her mind, BPD-wise. But I hope I don't have to tell you that.

14. When you're annoyed with her for any reason. The moment you finance a better mood for her, likely so you can get back to the sex she really isn't otherwise interested in having with you, is the moment a relationship starts to shrivel and die like a salt-slug. And trust me, when it is over you will need all the money you can get your hands on.

15. When you have stuffy nose, or a hangnail, or a paper cut, or a mild headache, or when you are experiencing none of these things. You need a woman who is a match for you intellectually. That means she can find her purse when bills come due or the dinner check arrives. If she is too stupid, or entitled to do that, then find another woman.

16. In the shower? This is the one exception. Give her all the cash you have on hand.

17. If she demands that you pay for everything. Deciding to do that yourself is pretty crazy, but hey, who am I to question your choices? But a woman who expects it of you is pretty uppity, not to mention useless. And if her demands are the reason you are throwing cash at her, do yourself a favor. You can do the same thing, and have a lot more fun, at a titty bar.

18. You ask her to carry her own financial weight and she refuses. Whether you elect yourself as the designated ATM in your relationship is your business, but if she won't cough up the cash after you've made it clear that you want her to, that's a dealbreaker.

Police video interview of a woman, false allegations or not?

Attila L. Vinczer · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sault Saint Marie – Ontario

Have a look at this video and tell us if you think this woman is telling the truth or telling a lie to the police:

She alleges her boyfriend ripped her clothes off, choked her, caused her to fall down the stairs, called someone to dispose of her body and attempted to ram a Dr. Sholl's foot powder bottle up her rectum and/or vagina. Her story falls apart several times. She seems to be creating the story right at the police station. It is long, but worth viewing the entire 2 hours and 12 minutes.

People–and "people" includes women–make up lies for various reasons to inflict harm. In our current society, we tend to especially enable this against innocent men, boyfriends and fathers. Many of those men and boys end up charged with crimes, jailed and ruined for life. Yet we think it's wrong somehow to turn a skeptical eye toward any woman who wants to make an allegation, because of our "rape culture?" I commend the Detective in this video as she seems to be aware this woman is more then likely lying to her.

I spoke with a process server at the Newmarket Courthouse the other week. She told me that nearly every divorce document she has served in the past 10 years contained allegations by the applicant women of Domestic Violence, sexual assault, rape–or, as she put it, the "silver bullet," meaning, an allegation that the husband had sexually abused their child.

I am a victim of a failed false sexual allegation made against me and very sensitive to these matters. She would say to me on the phone, "I am going to have you put in jail and will enjoy doing so!" Then she produced a perjured affidavit in court making such gross false allegations, it would make you go into shock! The only thing that saved me from certain jail was a digital recording of the entire event and conspiracy to jail me.

Watching this video brought back feelings of horror, when dealing with women who proclaim false allegations to police.

AVfM has an adage for men: ABR, meaning Always Be Recording. There's a reason for this, and it is not "paranoia."

Update*: For more information on this case, see this BrainSyntax page.

Andybob's Corner: Getta Man School of Labor Management for Women

andybob · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of our favorite (and our most strongly upvoted) commenters at AVfM is a mysterious fellow named "AndyBob." Funny, bitingly insightful, a joy to read – it is always worthwhile to slow down and read his thoughts carefully – and more than once.

Every now and then we like to round up some of Andy's work for your enjoyment, and ours. Here's one comment he made that deserves its own special place, in response to this delightful video by Hannah Wallen:

Andy's comment:

Spoilt little rich gal feminism may run Get a Man School of Labour Management for Women, but they offer graduate courses for every member of the leisured class.

A few years ago, I saw a British TV programme on Discovery Channel that claimed to be an examination of what drove the chivalric impulses of men. It was, in reality, a transparently anti-male shame-fest. Where are have all the gentlemen gone – you know, those sexist pigs who offer to carry women's suitcases for them?

Hidden cameras were set up showing different women struggling up the stairs of London train stations with large heavy suitcases. One woman was an epically plain, pear-shaped battleaxe well into middle age. The other woman looked like Jessica Alba's cuter younger sister. The premise was to see how many men offered each woman assistance with their respective suitcases, both of which seemed to be laden with bricks – or a couple of dead bodies.

Obviously, the producers were hoping and expecting that the cute girl would be bombarded with offers of assistance from hordes of erect and salivating men, while the homely woman would be all but spat on. Much to their disappointment, it, didn't quite pan out that way.

The cute woman got a few offers from a few polite men. One of these was a man of about fifty who was later questioned rather rudely about his motives. Before it even came out of his mouth, I just knew that she probably reminded him of his daughter. His manner had been fatherly and protective. I was right. He was clearly shocked by the insinuation that he was trying to get into her pants. It had obviously never occurred to him.

The homely woman received a few offers as well, though not as many. Of course, the producers assumed that it was because men were less inclined to help a woman who looked like their mother – or, in this case, a woman who looked like their obstreperous maiden aunt.

This woman's mannish clothes, short back and sides and sour expression made her look like a women's studies professor who was likely to scold the presumptuous patriarchs for patronizing her by offering help. You could actually see men approaching her, catching a glimpse of her pissed off mug, then giving her a wide birth. Not in the mood for a lecture today thank you very much.

It escaped everyone's attention, except mine, that no offers of help came from women.

The programme was infused throughout with the assumption that both of these women were somehow entitled to be offered help from total strangers with penises whose utility should have been at their disposal. At no point did it ever occur to the producers or commenters that men owned their utility and had the right to offer it to whoever they wished. If a man wants to offer it to a pretty girl, that's his business. He doesn't have to justify it to anyone. It is his to give, his to withdraw and his to withhold.

There were the usual lamentations about how 'fings aint what they used to be', and how society would be a better place if we all helped each other. No-one twigged that, apart from those ever-present white knights, most men won't offer such assistance because we've been led to believe that women prefer to carry their own bags, and are perfectly able to do so. That's what feminists tell me, and I believe them – surely they haven't been telling lies.

GMSLMW has its work cut out for them – and, no, I won't be offering them any help.

Reality is Overrated if You Love Your Body

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Kennesaw State University is getting dumber.

I received this email blast on Monday afternoon:

[image]

Mirrorless Monday is the first day in Love Your Body week where reality itself is suffocated in saccharine denial sitting at the intersection of comedy and tragedy. Bathroom mirrors are completely covered in paper and people are invited to write positive messages about their bodies on the paper.

Self-esteem issues instilled by a childhood filled with unrealistic media is an interesting point for discussion, as is eating disorders brought on by those insecurities. But a proposed solution should probably not include feeding students sugar-coated mixed messages as an esoteric form of "therapy."

A covered mirror inviting unwarranted optimistic writing says "Love your body! But don't look at it. Instead, write what you wish you would see, you worthless sack of infected pus."

I asked who was behind the event and ended up with a flyer detailing the week's festivities. KSU Student Life told me that both men and women's bathrooms would be affected by Mirrorless Monday, which the flyer describes as "a day when the mirror doesn't judge you." I visited men's restrooms in the following buildings:

- Social Science
- Science and Mathematics
- Library
- Student Center
- Student Recreation Center
- Kennesaw Hall

There were no covered mirrors. This was disappointing because I already ran over to the bookstore and bought a big Sharpie. I had planned to write all sorts of things, like "I love my body so much that I never want to see it again!" and "Reflected light is privileged!"

Sadly, the mirrors scribbled with empty-headed niceties could only be found in women's restrooms. I wanted to find who was behind all this. Because KSU is ridiculous about answering questions, I had to walk in the following path just to find Shameka Wilson, the Director of the Women's Resource & Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center and the sponsor for Mirrorless Monday:

[image]
It's like Family Circus, but somehow even lamer.
I called Wilson (no recording this time) and found out that they didn't bring a man along to get access to the men's restrooms.

Whatever. I was too exhausted to start another quarter-long conversation with KSU staff. Trudi Vaughan's cowardice is about all I can handle.

There was also a photo shoot ("STEP ON IN AND SMILE PRETTY," says the flyer). At least the cameras get a "shot" (heh) to share their story. But today, students are going to bring their own bathroom scales to smash with hammers. I'm guessing this is to give women the illusion of control so that they don't have to deal with the burden of responsibility.

Granted, an anorexic or bulimic woman may on some level benefit from beating what is basically an unconventional effigy. I don't know enough about the relevant psychology to take a side on that. But given the obesity rates here in the Southeast, I suspect that most attendees do not need a hammer to break the scales. Call me cynical, but I expect a rehashing of fat acceptance by undisciplined cake chutes who blame men for preferring to look at strippers.

I could be wrong.

But I do know for a fact that both scales and mirrors report reality. They tell you something about yourself you might not like, and that makes them evil. Why reject and attack what would never lie to you? A KSU Dietitian told me that Love Your Body week was meant to end the "abusive relationship" between women and their scales or mirrors.

My understanding of body acceptance is that one accepts his or her body for how it is, not by remaining blissfully ignorant of facts about it. Even if one did have a serious eating disorder, at no point can responsibility be put on anyone but that person to make a change (possibly with the help of good friends). But no, apparently if you love your body, you must cover or smash the honest and replace their function with your wishes.

If the participants of Love Your Body Week wanted to escape all possible forms of judgement, I wonder how they are handling the Zumba workout at the end of the week.

Now that I moved into my new house, I have a lot of unused boxes lying around. My new Sharpie needed a purpose, so I put ink to cardboard to make some tributes for the scale smashfest.

[image]
He would never lie to you.
I'll be bringing my buddies Wednesday to see what happens when what cannot tell a lie meets those who cannot handle the truth.

Scales may not report a number that is as representative as body fat percentage, but don't judge them for what they are!

Scales are our friends.

Don't be that girl.

Do you own any FTSE350 shares? If so, sell them – now!

Mike Buchanan · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Do you own shares in any FTSE350 companies? If so, we recommend you sell them as soon as possible, and the objective of this piece is to explain why. The key reason is that the government is intent on bullying FTSE350 companies into having gender parity on their boards, regardless of the overwhelming evidence provided to the government on numerous occasions (including in the course of House of Commons and House of Lords inquiries) by Campaign for Merit in Business ("C4MB") which shows conclusively that increasing the proportion of women on corporate boards leads to financial decline. It's more an inexperience effect than a gender effect. The short C4MB briefing paper on the matter can be read here.

Shortly after David Cameron became Prime Minister in May 2010, leading a Conservative Party-led coalition, he appointed a Labour Party peer, Lord Davies of Abersoch, to report on how (not whether) to increase the proportion of women on major corporate boards. There was a great deal of talk at that time of the notion that companies could improve their financial performance by appointing more women onto their boards – the much-vaunted "business case" for doing so. The notion was, of course, always a fantasy. To sustain the fantasy, correlations (between female representation on boards, and enhanced financial performance) were misrepresented as causation, something which continues to this day.

The Davies Report was published in February 2011. It's so ideologically-driven, we doubt the Fawcett Society would disagree with a sentence in it. The report is here:

140304 Davies Report, published February 2011

We recommend you look at page 3 of the report, the first page of the Executive Summary. There you'll find this:

> Evidence suggests that companies with a strong female representation at board and top management level perform better than those without (1) and that gender-diverse boards have a positive impact on performance.(2)

In the report, sources of material cited in references are identified at the base of the pages. Reference (1) takes you to a 2007 McKinsey report, "Women Matter," which explicitly says that observed correlations between female representation on boards and enhanced financial performance aren't evidence of causation and can't be taken to even imply causation. Reference (2) is more interesting – because, as you'll observe at the base of the page, no source of material is cited. We've put in numerous FOI requests to the DBIS, including one very recently, so we know that to this day they have no evidence for the causal link they're clearly implying. In plain English, there's no "business case" for increasing the proportion of women on boards.

One of the key recommendations of the Davies Report (published in February 2011) was that if FTSE100 companies hadn't "voluntarily" (we'll return to this weasel word shortly) achieved 25% female representation on their boards by 2015, the government should consider introducing legislated gender quotas. One of the key contributors to the Davies Report was Professor Susan Vinnicombe, leader of the Cranfield International Centre for Women leaders, who admitted to a House of Lords inquiry that she had no evidence of a causal link between increasing the proportion of women on corporate boards, and enhanced financial performance. Two months ago we publicly challenged her with the following, and have yet to receive a response:

> We challenge you to stop misleading people into believing correlations between increased female representation on boards and enhanced financial performance are, or may be, indicative of a beneficial gender effect, thereby justifying in some people's minds (not ours) the government's policy direction of pressuring companies to increase the number of women on their boards, through the threat of legislated gender quotas.
>
> We challenge you to critique and discredit the five longitudinal studies which show that increasing female > representation on corporate boards leads on average to corporate financial decline.

A link to our blog piece with the background to the challenge of Susan Vinnicombe: Our public challenges of Professor Susan Vinnicombe

We turn to Charlotte Sweeney, a woman described in the Foreword of a new Department of Business, Innovation and Skills ("DBIS") report – to which we'll be referring shortly – as follows:

> …a senior HR executive with over 20 years' experience in equality, diversity and corporate culture shift within the Banking sector.

Ms Sweeney has been riding the EDI (Equality, Diversity & Inclusivity) gravy train for 20 years. Wow. She's covered some mileage, and six months ago she was the woman appointed by our odious socialist Anti-Business Secretary, Vince Cable MP, to report on how the "voluntary" (that weasel word again!) code for executive search firms is progressing. The purpose of the code – established in response to a Davies Report recommendation – is to put pressure on executive search firms to drive up the proportion of women on the "long lists" and "short lists" they present to major corporate clients considering the recruitment of new executive and non-executive directors.

After her appointment, we publicly challenged Ms Sweeney with the following:

> Charlotte, good afternoon. We have five longitudinal studies showing that when more women are appointed to major corporate boards, financial performance declines:
>
> http://c4mb.wordpress.com/improving-gender-diversity-on-boards-leads-to-a-decline-in-corporate-performance-the-evidence/
>
> If you refute these studies, could you please outline why? And if you know of any reports or studies showing a causal link between increased female representation on boards and improved financial performance, could you please email me at mike@j4mb.org.uk with directions to them? Please don't send me reports (e.g. McKinsey, Credit Suisse, Reuters…) which make it perfectly clear they're reporting correlation, not causation, and that correlation neither proves nor even implies causation. Thank you.

A link to our blog piece with the background to the challenge of Charlotte Sweeney, to which (of course) we never received a substantive response:

Our public challenge to Charlotte Sweeney

Ms Sweeney's report for the DBIS was published this afternoon. It has the snappy title, "Women on Boards: Voluntary Code for Executive Search Firms – Taking the Next Step" and it's downloadable through this link:

140304 Charlotte Sweeney's Eomen on Boards report

The report's content from beginning to end is mind-numbing and predictably packed with the Orwellian doublespeak employed by people engaged in social engineering exercises. To spare you the pain of reading the whole report, we've done so on your behalf. One thing we're pleased to say is that C4MB has clearly impacted on the claims made in such reports. The only mention we could find of the fantasy that more women on boards leads to enhanced financial performance was this gem, at the start of the Introduction:

> Gender parity on corporate boards continues to be a hugely debated issue both within the UK and the European Commission. The business case for gender parity on boards has been widely articulated and is clear.(3)

Reference (3) takes you to – honestly, we're not making this up – The Davies Report!

What's worth drawing from Ms Sweeney's report? Well, it's made clear the 'more women on boards' social engineering initiative will extend to the FTSE350 in time, and beyond 2015 – neither of which comes as the slightest surprise. But this is the first time the government's objective of 'parity' on corporate boards – 50% women, 50% men – has been revealed in an official publication, to the best of our knowledge. Again, to be frank, we're not surprised. It was long ago admitted to a parliamentary inquiry that the 25% goal for women on FTSE100 boards was 'only a major milestone on a longer journey'.

Extracts from the report's "Foreword," signed by Vince Cable MP and Lord Davies:

> We are entering the home straight. The actions taken by UK listed companies in 2014 will determine whether we succeed in achieving the target set by Lord Davies and his Steering Group to reach 25% of women on FTSE 100 boards by 2015. Women currently occupy 1 in 5 of all FTSE 100 board positions. The target is encouragingly close and equates to a net increase of around 50 more women on FTSE 100 boards. This is clearly achievable, so long as we take action now…
>
> We would particularly like to thank the executive search firms that are already pushing hard on this agenda, who have played a crucial and significant role so far in improving the number of women on British boards. However, there is still more to do and we need to see consistent and concerted action from all 70 executive search firms signed up to the Code to ensure a successful outcome in 2015 and beyond.

The Executive Summary starts with:

> The business case for increasing the number of women on corporate boards has been widely articulated and is clear. Since the launch of Lord Davies's original report there has been a step change in the perception and commitment of gaining more diversity on FTSE 350 boards.
>
> In January 2014 women accounted for 20.4% of corporate board members of FTSE 100 companies. This continued the positive trend and was up from 19% in 2013, 12.4% in 2010 and 9.4% in 2004. Although the pace of change has increased, and current trends suggest the target of 25% by 2015 set out by Lord Davies in his 2011 report will be achieved, we cannot be complacent and assume further progress will be made without further considered focus.

So there you have it. A Conservative-led coalition, with a male feminist Prime Minister and a socialist Business Secretary, is intent on destroying major British corporations on the altar of gender equality. Hopefully Cable and his socialist chums will have discovered a wealth-generating alternative to capitalism when the inevitable crash comes.

If we were investing our money, it wouldn't be in the shares of FTSE350 companies. There's only one way those shares can go in the medium to longer term, given the social engineering exercises assaulting these companies' boardrooms, and that's down. For those of you intent on holding FTSE350 shares, we can only hope the knowledge that half the directors of those failing companies will be women will bring you some cold comfort. Just don't say we didn't warn you in good time.

Thank You, Men, For...

AVfM Video Source · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We'll send a "you're welcome" to this thoughtful young lady, with a caveat:

…you're welcome, but we increasingly wonder why any guy would do any of this anymore. A "thank you" may no longer be enough. But, it is a start.

And we're glad you're reading things from the Anti-Misandry forum (which yes, gentle readers, she did acknowledge in her lowbar).

In any case, since she seems to have many other sane and decent things to say, AVfM readers may want to subscribe to AlyssMajere.

True Gender Equality

AVfM Video Source · 5 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adrien Martinon is a 17 year old High School student in his last year at the International School of Panama. He comes from a Panamanian mother and a French father, and grew up speaking Spanish and French simultaneously. He went to the French school Paul Gauguin in Panama, only really coming into contact with English until 6th grade, when he entered the International School of Panama.

Adrien is an International Baccalaureate student, yet has a lot of other interests outside of academics. He enjoys reading fiction, and is deeply intrigued by Philosophy, Physics, and the study of different cultures. When he can, he practices Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu and loves Thai boxing. He is in full support of equality within a society, whether it is by race, nationality, or gender.

He identifies as an egalitarian before anything, but he has become highly interested in the Men's Human Rights Movement spreading across Canada and the United States. He wishes to raise attention to the ways in which men are discriminated against, due to misconceptions about gender roles and traditional values. He hopes he can bring a change to the way people view men's issues.

He would like men and women to feel comfortable discussing them and working towards solving them.

“Don’t Be That Guy” reaches University of Ottawa

Jean-Pierre Laroche · 6 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

 Note: See important editorial postscript below. –DE

On February 24 2014, Crime Prevention Ottawa, with the complicity of University of Ottawa’s Community Life Service posted bilingual versions of the infamous “Don’t be that Guy” posters. I immediately saw the obvious bias in these posters, as there are no other crime prevention campaigns currently visible on campus, and these posters target only males as perpetrators, and only males of one race. But even if it had “diversity” and targeted males with darker skin, it still would be unacceptable and against Ontario’s human’s rights code. Here is the code:

This Law in French

This Law In English

As a person of multiracial background myself, the racist and sexist hypocrisy of these posters is obvious.

The rules for posting at University of Ottawa include the following:

“13. Persons or groups of persons whose posters compromise the Rights or the reputation of another person or group of persons will be denied posting privileges. Furthermore, with regards to the parties involved, Community Life Service cannot be held responsible for damages resulting from such postings, be they authorized or not.

1. Posters with words or images that incite violence or confrontations will be denied posting privileges.”

You may judge by yourselves if those posters violates any of the mentioned rules.

[image]
Taken on february 24th in Jock-Turcot centre
[image]
Taken on february 24th in Tabaret Hall

[image]
Taken on february 24th in Tabaret Hall
I decided to complain at the Community life Office, The following Chain of email followed.

> From: COMMLIFE
>
> Sent: Wednesday, February 26, 2014 1:43 PM
>
> To: Geres, Kristen Cc: Demers, Francine N
>
> Subject: RE: Poster Request University of Ottawa – Crime Prevention Ottawa
>
> Good afternoon Kristen, We had someone come to our office to complain about the posters. I didn’t think his complaint was founded but here are the points he brought up:
>
> -No racial diversity (EI: The aggressors on all 4 posters are white, mostly white female)
>
> [Author’s note: I only said that there was no diversity.]
>
> -Factually incorrect (EI: A drunk women CAN give consent and it is not wrong to sleep with her.)
>
> This guy would like to have your input on his complaint. His name is *. He’s a first year student in Arts and his email address is **********
>
> I told him that I would bring up this matter with you but that I didn’t see anything wrong with your posters and refused to remove them. It would be nice if you could CC me when your respond to him.
>
> Thank you and have a great day.

Amélia Sauvé

Commis aux réservations et à l'affichage / Reservation and Posting Clerk

Service de vie communautaire / Community Life Service

Université d'Ottawa / University of Ottawa

From: "Worsfold, Nancy"
Re: FW: Poster Request University of Ottawa – Crime Prevention Ottawa

Hi **********,

I am sorry that you don't like the "Don't be that Guy" campaign. "Don't Be That Guy" is an internationally successful behavioural marketing campaign, developed by Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton. It sends the message that sex without consent is sexual assault. The Ottawa Hospital and Crime Prevention Ottawa are supporting this campaign locally because it sends a visual message to men clearly demonstrating their role in ending sexual assaults. The images are stark and edgy and get people's attention but they are not sexualized or pornographic. We are aware that it makes some people uncomfortable.

Nevertheless, only by talking about sexual assault and bringing it out into the open, can we end the isolation of survivors and work toward prevention. The engagement of our community is absolutely vital in ending sexual violence.

I agree that more diversity in the posters is a good suggestion – in fact it is a suggestion that I have made to the folks in Edmonton. Nevertheless, they have been extremely generous in sharing the material with us and many other cities.

With regards to your concern about the law: drug facilitated sexual assault is an assault that is committed upon a person rendered incapacitated by alcohol or drugs thus being incapable of giving or withholding consent. The Canadian courts have been clear on this, even if the general population has not. The posters were developed in partnership with the Edmonton Police and the Ottawa campaign is supported by the Ottawa Police Service, the posters are factually correct.

Fast Facts about Sexual Assault:

- The majority of sexual assault victims are young, in one StatsCan study over 50% were under 18.
- Sexual assault is a common occurrence. 1 in 4 girls will be sexually assaulted before they reach 18. The lifetime probability of a woman being raped is 1 in 17.
- 9 out of 10 assaults are never reported to Police. We cannot ask Police to solve this problem; we all have a role to play in ending sexual violence.
- The vast majority of men do not commit sexual assault. When they are engaged in ending sexual assault, true progress can be made.

****

Nancy Worsfold

Executive Director/Directrice génerale

Crime Prevention Ottawa/Prévention du crime Ottawa

To: "Worsfold, Nancy"

Re: FW: Poster Request University of Ottawa – Crime Prevention Ottawa

You are using shaming tactics to promote misandry and the hatred of men, with no empirically proven results. Having more allegation being made doesn't mean more crimes are being reported. You are oversimplifying a > complex issue and creating an environment of hatred, distrust and fear. Men aren't idiots, they know what consent is. Maybe we should start a campaign that helps niers understand that stealing bikes is not ok? Or maybe we should teach Jews that fraud is a crime! What about teaching Muslims not to blow their self's up? [Author's note: Although undoubtedly there will be fools who think I believe those hateful examples to be true, I do not. I was using them to illustrate the obviously hateful hypocrisy of the campaign.]

>
> "My concern with the law" comes from a clear concept: it's not because you are under the influence you can't consent. If it was the case, our prison would be filled with white women who assaulted men. "9 out of 10 rapes aren't reported to the police" k. No false rape allegation are ever prosecuted by the police, even if they constitute an enormous part of all allegation. "Sexual assault is a common occurrence. 1 in 4 girls will be sexually assaulted before they reach 18. The lifetime probability of a woman being raped is 1 in 17." I wanted to be respectful in my answer to this patronizing morally depraved message, but your level of ignorance of basic math is sincerely scary. You can't have a 1 in 4 chance being raped during childhood, then switch to one in 17 for your entire life. Your first ensemble is include in the second, id est the second has to be as big or bigger than the first one, therefore demonstrating that at least three of your statistic are entirely pulled out of someone's ass. You can't know how many people get raped and don't report it to the police, if you don't know how many people get raped, and you can't know how many people get rape if your statistics on the subject contradict basic rules of quantitative methods. I am tired of misandry and gynocentrism being justified by pseudo-science, I have being falsely accused of rape twice in my 19 years of life, and I can tell you that because of this witch hunt, nobody believed my innocence until I was proven innocent.
>
> There are real rapists out there: they know what their doing and by implying otherwise you are encouraging presumption of guilt, and helping actual rapist into manipulating their victims into not reporting it to the police. Maybe you should start a "don't be that girl" campaign where we teach women not to lie about rape? Maybe the staff at crime prevention would learn something from it.
>
> (Took me 5 min after I woke up without doing any research to write this, basic logic defeats your reasoning, go back to the drawing board.)
>
> **********

I invite anybody who takes issue with the "Don't Be Guy" campaign at Ottawa University to write to the Ombudsperson Office of the university, to the directors of Crime Prevention Ottawa, or any members of the city council.

—

Editorial note: any enterprising students, staff, or faculty at the University of Ottawa feel like checking out our poster page? –DE

 Important editorial postscript: In the hours since this article was published I received a phone call from Jean-Pierre informing me that it appears someone has been tearing down the "Don't Be That Guy" posters. As has always been our repeatedly-stated policy, we do not endorse vandalizing or tearing down posters whether we agree with their contents or not. We support free expression, and that includes hate-speech like the "Don't Be That Guy" posters. What we do support is expressing opposition in a peaceful nonviolent manner. We would like to suggest that anyone who has impulsively removed posters put them back, and instead consider putting up posters with our own message on them, so as to be part of the market of ideas and not to censor anyone. –DE

Discredited journalist attacks Bane666au with insane stupidity

Dean Esmay · 6 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

An increasingly depraved, futile former journalist, in an effort to regain some relevancy, has decided to start attacking YouTube vloggers who speak out about misandry, infantalization of women, and historical misinformation.

Using his stock-in-trade methods of quote-mining, disingenuous demands for references proving that the sky is blue, well-poisoning conclusions issued before offering evidence, explaining "what someone means" before actually looking at what they say, and other Michael Savage/Michael Moore style dishonesty, he goes after Bane666au. These tricks have been his only tools for so long, he seems incapable of noticing that they're failing, and makes no attempt to re-adapt. Rather than becoming more rational, he has doubled down on the crazy, even while his mainstream journalist friends slowly walk away from him and his feminist masters slowly begin getting stingier and stingier with their wallets.

Here's a news flash for those giving this guy money: you're wasting it. Not only is he no longer serving your purposes, he's actively harming your cause. Ginning up hysteria, which is all this guy was ever good for, doesn't work anymore ladies. I don't think even the widely discredited SPLC would pay much attention to him anymore.

Anyway, as mentioned, the depraved, futile faux-journalist decided to go after Bane666au, and amusingly, even with minimal experience dealing with this sort of dishonest trickery, it took Bane about 5 minutes to skewer it with no less prominent a source than…. Jezebel:

The Jezebel article in question: 12 Years A Slave: Rage, Privilege, Black Women and White Women.

It's weird enough that people keep repeating the discredited notion that women were considered property and, hence, slaves throughout most of history. The claim itself is patently false; as a rule, being a woman no more made you a slave than being a man made you a slave-owner.

But that's not the weirdest bit. What's super-weird is denying that anyone ever even claimed this. A few minutes of research will turn up far more than just that obscene privileged-white-girl Jezebel article. Here's a few more, chosen at random::

Quote from one of the contributors to the ideologically tainted and increasingly irrational "RationalWiki": "Up until the last 50 years, women have not had the power to say anything, much less define roles. Women could not vote, or own land, or say no to sex, or say no to marriage, or hold jobs, or wear pants, or use birth control, or have a business, or be the legal guardian of their own kids. Women were property. Your argument is, in effect "slaves defined in part, what slavery was and what the roles of slaves and owners were". To "create" roles, of any kind, you have to have the power to do so. Godot Chúc mừng năm mới 18:47, 12 February 2013 (UTC)" (And yes, while that "RationalWiki" editor is getting some pushback, you'll see still more of this kind of crazy in that discussion, and actually being taken seriously.)

Women's History Network: "…patriarchal baggage of marriage where women were property to be transferred from one man to another."

Irreverent Feminism: "Before the 1920s, women were property and belonged either to their fathers, or when they became of marrying age they belonged to their husbands."

The Question of Gender: Joan W. Scott's Critical Feminism: "Women were property."

Borders of Desire: "Women were property.'

It should go without saying: all of those assertions are not just false assertions. They are hateful, bigoted, nasty assertions that are horrifically disrespectful to the women of history, not to mention the men. (In other words, deeply misogynist in one direction and deeply misandrist in another.) But what's really weird is that anyone would claim it's not true, when anyone who's been following ideological feminism for any length of time knows that this "women were property with no power and at the mercy of their husbands" claim is an everyday, ordinary observation within the cesspool of hate that is the ideology of feminism.

Bane's got it right: it is not enough, apparently, for gender ideologues to make false claims about history. Apparently, when they are caught making a false statements, they don't just refuse to admit they were wrong, they refuse to admit they ever said anything wrong in the first place.

What, do they think "Jedi Mind Tricks" actually work? Well maybe they do, on the feeble-minded.

Anyway, check out Bane's new poster campaign and, while you're at it, subscribe.

Return of Kings: the Alpha Kings and the Queens who love them

B.R. Merrick · 6 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I occasionally read articles at the web site "Return of Kings" because I find self-appointed alpha males somewhat amusing. Okay, not only amusing. It can be a bit of a turn-on when I'm observing them from behind safety glass. I'm old enough now, however, to see that the gap between fantasy and reality is wide enough to be taken seriously. When I do so, I remember that I'm no fan of hanging out with or having to deal in any other way with "alphas." Almost to a man or woman, I think of them as jerks. I reserve the right, as I did with jocks and various other categories of "tough" guys, to change my mind if I ever actually meet a nice one. But when a man acts or thinks like a jerk, the face, the hair, the body, and the physical display of anything that might be sexually arousing goes right out of the safety-glassed window. As hokey as it sounds, handsomeness eventually has to come out of a man's eyes.

My mild interest in articles about "hot babes," "fat girls," "wimps," "masculine virtues," "irritating fags," and treating women like cheap whores to turn them on may dissipate soon, but not before I trash an attitude frequently expressed at that website that thankfully has little hope of being resurrected on a grand scale on this soil any time soon, thanks to the massive cultural change that is currently underway that will benefit gay and bisexual men across the world.

I'm not talking about the gay Left's political victories with gay marriage and banning reparative therapy for minors. I'm talking about a significant percentage of the rising generation having no problem with homosexuality. ("Please, that is so gay!") I'm talking about things like NALT, a Christian effort at reaching out to the gay community. I'm talking about old-school Republicans George and Barbara Freaking Bush witnessing at a lesbian wedding. Something major is going on, akin in my view to 1989.

I remember when the Berlin Wall fell. It was an astounding and surprising transformation, even though the world had been watching for four years as Gorbachev opened up the Soviet economy to more free market reforms, ostensibly to save socialism. On his stated goal, he failed spectacularly, and the world is, in my view, a better place for it. Well-known homo Leonard Bernstein flew to Germany and conducted Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, replacing the phrase "Ode to Joy [Freude]" with "Ode to Freedom [Freiheit]," on Christmas Day, in reunited Berlin. Thankfully, for the tiresome anti-gays at RoK, he didn't mention a word about his homosexuality during the performance.

According to Kings Returned, that is why corporate sports are being ruined. Not due to the violence, nor the regulation by coercive, death-oriented institutions; but to the first openly gay NFL hopeful holding a press conference. The tenor of the article implies that the writer would rather have gay and bisexual male athletes keep their mouths shut in the locker room, so that "alphas" can go along in their dream world thinking that not a single guy in the showers is ever turned on by the sight of their penises.

Just to get this out of the way, gentlemen, I have disturbing news for you if it hasn't dawned on you already: If you've ever gotten naked in a room full of men, you were not only checked out non-sexually by virtually every single man in the room (scientifically proven?), but at least one of them was definitely-yet-briefly aroused by glancing at your dick. If you don't like knowing that, change your clothes and shower at home from now on. And now, back to hating certain kinds of men.

In an even sadder way, these "alphas" are showing an almost total lack of concern for what is presently happening to gays in Russia, because, yet again, their precious corporate, state-sponsored, state-sanctioned, and state-celebrating sporting events (which are termed "masculine" in the article in spite of the fact that so many of them also include the feminine) are being marred by alpha male Obama (whom neocon "alphas" love to hate), who sent three gay representatives to the Sochi Olympics to quietly protest hyper-alpha-male Putin (with whom the Return of Kings "alphas" seem to have an unending fascination) defending Russia's latest salvo against citizens that do not fit the Russian Orthodox mold in Putin's alpha mind. (And "mold" has more than one meaning.)

The writer of that article even slams gold medal winner Brian Boitano in an over-the-top, sarcastic tirade about his officially coming out in preparation for going to Sochi. I'd like to see the shit-headed writer of the article who calls himself The Archangel Michael do that kick (at 2:00 in the linked video) that Boitano did in the 1988 Winter Olympics, one year before the Wall fell. I guess if you're a fag, magnificent athletic ability counts for nothing.

Neither do crimes against humanity. The atrocities being exacted on gay Russians (and you can be certain that the majority of those crimes, especially the violent ones, are being committed against gay men) that are making the headlines – while Putin's alpha farts make the tweets – are being attributed to the anti-gay laws that have recently been passed by Putin's government, and sanctioned by the prime alpha himself. From Policy Mic:

"The violations of fundamental, constitutionally protected rights of Russia's gay citizens have included multiple bans on gay pride parades in Moscow and other cities, hefty fines to gay rights groups accused of acting as a 'foreign agent,' denial of registration to nongovernmental organizations, and regional laws banning the propaganda of homosexuality to minors, which served as a basis for the federal law enacted by Mr. Putin and unanimously passed by the State Duma. Against this backdrop, violent attacks on gays or 'suspect gays' are becoming commonplace [emphasis mine]."

From an English translation of Article 6.21 of this ridiculous and dangerous law: "Propaganda is the act of distributing information among minors that 1) is aimed at the [sic] creating nontraditional sexual attitudes, 2) makes nontraditional sexual relations attractive, 3) equates the social value of traditional and nontraditional sexual relations, or 4) creates an interest in nontraditional sexual relations."

Once a word is turned into a legal word, there are any number of political interests that will focus on that word to get what they want. (Think gay "marriage"; then think about the legalization of "marriage" to begin with.) Therefore, since Tchaikovsky, like Bernstein, was a gay composer, and since so many male ballet dancers lean in that direction, perhaps there should be a ban throughout Russia on performing The Nutcracker at Christmas, since any minor exposed to all those twinkle toes may eventually put two and two together and realize that some dead Russian man was, as Monty Python put it, "just an old poof who wrote tunes."

Perhaps it's time for Russians and the RoK alphas, most of whom seem to be in love with Putin (in a thoroughly non-sexual way, of course), to make a choice. Whom do they love more: a composer with a hell of a symphonic cycle and cannons firing during his 1812 Overture; or an idiot politician with crony capitalist friends that platonically kiss his ass, and who loves to show his bare chest to the cameras every chance he gets? Is "alpha" synonymous with "stupid"? Thus far, it appears to be synonymous with "slightly bi-curious."

The Policy Mic article continues: "Foreign citizens or stateless persons engaging in propaganda are subject to a fine of 4,000 to 5,000 rubles, or they can be deported from the Russian Federation and/or serve 15 days in jail. If a foreigner uses the media or the internet to engage in propaganda, the fines increase to 50,000-100,000 rubles or a 15-day detention with subsequent deportation from Russia." I wonder if my dreamgirl Tilda Swinton was fined for holding up that "Marxist" rainbow flag in Red Square?

Speaking of dreamgirls, and introducing another favorite neocon phobia, I used to absolutely love Victoria Jackson. I still want to. I keep waiting for the bizarre shift in her thinking to be a great comedic hoax. Sadly, it doesn't seem to be. In the spirit of the original gay-hating article from Return of Government-Over-All-by-One, she says:

"Why do liberals embrace Shariah law even though 'beheading your wife' seems to go against the feminist movement's mantra? Why do liberals embrace Islam knowing it frowns on homosexuality?

"Because they have the same goals. Progressives, communists, liberals, globalists and Muslims want to destroy America. When that goal is reached, they will fight for top billing. It will be bloody."

This is an article where Miss Jackson (I have to call her that, because I'm nasty) called a gay kiss on the television show Glee, "Sickening." A kiss? Jeez, Victoria (nasty boys don't play by the rules), you could have at least had the courtesy to pick something that would really gross people out, like fellow neocon Devvy Kidd, who reduced the ages-old phenomenon of one man romantically loving another man to "bowel movement sex."

All of these people are still in the throes of the idea that there is some huge, Marxist conspiracy to overthrow American government, as if it would be peachy keen without Leftist influence. This is why hatred of Muslims goes so well with hatred of gays and, of course, hatred of men, in the neocon mind.

What escapes their neominds is that Marxists may embrace anything that tears down representative government; however, minus Marxist influence, that same "patriotic" system would continue to take money from men by force, compel men to register for selective service, imprison more men than any other civilized country, and routinely lie to these men about its own doings, even the men who try to save people like good little utilitarian boys.

Minus Left-leaning influence, a center-to-right government run by neocon alphas would apparently permit the quiet, underground expression of male homosexuality, which leads men like Bernstein and Cole Porter to marry women while screwing men on the side. (What every woman wants!) They would also graciously monitor any light brown man who looks Middle Eastern.

These people are hysterical about non-events that they ramp up with their rhetoric, like the "Ground Zero Mosque" screamed about by neocon Pamela Geller, which is actually two and a half blocks away from the World Trade Center, is located in the vicinity of other Muslim buildings that have been there for years, and – this is the clincher – is being run by men who had nothing whatsoever to do with what happened at Ground Zero on September 11, 2001. Little Miss Guilt-by-Association Geller goes to great lengths to frighten people by putting the Statue of Liberty in a burqa, right on the front cover of her broadside against a worldwide religion with many different facets and expressions, a tome entitled Stop the Islamization [sic] of America. Understand that it's a given, in the minds of these faux-conservatives (the "con" in "neocon"), that it is Muslim men, along with the Islamophilic alpha males and females in American government, that will presumably be enforcing this terror on American women.

The bogeyman can be a Muslim. He can be a gay man who "recruits" minors. He used to be communist, although it's a-okay with alphas if he used to be KGB (as long as he's shirtless and pumped). For people who think like this, men simply cannot be accepted for who they are, because men are the primary doers in society, usually egged on by their women. Those out doing are noticed by everyone, and if what they're doing looks suspect or frightening, then obviously they will be the ones to receive the hysteria of neocon females, and the fed-up attitudes of neocon alpha males who think that being exposed to a different expression of male sexuality means that their sacred male space has been invaded. I hate to break it to Ms. Kidd and all the alphas that are as pissed off as she is about Alphabama lifting the ban on gays in the military: They were already in the military. It's just that now they don't have to be silent or lie about it. Better keep your panties on, boys.

RoKers (Return of Kings wannabe alphas) talk about the red pill, but then they keep barfing bits of it back up. Their sexy bitches are content with the blue one. All of these blue or bluish-purple pillers represent the soon-to-be retired notions of neoconservatism, with its "family values" containing anti-Islam and anti-gay rhetoric. It will be a positive boon for zeta males and all other men when neoconservative virtues are drowned out by society's mocking crescendo, as a central tenet of neoconservatism is its appeal to outdated conservative ideals that used to be much more widespread in a white-bread, nuclear family America, where rich white women like Betty Friedan had an easy time of convincing rich white men to continue with their self-hating ways by being utilitarian and disposable, and having their sexuality tamed by societal and religious forces, while women got to do more and more of whatever they wanted.

Now that religion is being assaulted by rapidly advancing scientific discovery, and neoconservatism's negative political influence has been exposed by the sunlight of the Internet, we can expect the shrill voices of alpha males and the women who get wet for them to fall silent, some out of exhaustion, but mostly due to the indifference of a culture that will someday be guided by a millennial generation that accepts homosexuality simply as something other than default setting, and nothing more horrifying than that. Honestly, people, that is so gay!

Should there be more coverage of women's sports on television?

Mike Buchanan · 6 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There's been a lot of coverage recently of the notion that we 'need' more coverage of women's sports on TV. I beg to differ – other than with respect to women's beach volleyball, obviously. So I was pleased to be invited to discuss the issue on BBC Radio Tees recently:

The sections:

0:00 – 8:56 Mike Parr interviews Shona Malcolm (head of The Ladies' Golf Union) and myself.

8:57 – 11:51 Pre-recorded interview between Mike Parr and Steve Hewlett, a broadcaster and media commentator.

11:52 – 15:47 Mike Parr interviews Eleanor Pinder, who works on a number of projects with Middlesbrough football Club, and is a netball player.

At 13:56 Mike Parr asks Eleanor Pinder, "Is the quality of women's football as good (as men's football)?" Her response:

> 'Erm… it's a different level, I suppose, not so fast potentially, but that doesn't mean it's not watchable.'

'…that doesn't mean it's not watchable.' Priceless. Just after the end of her interview there's a very brief exchange between Mike Parr and 'Nick', the traffic reporter. It's the final 17 seconds of the piece, starting at 15:30. Don't miss it.

Indian National Elections and decline of misandrist Congress Party

Anil Kumar · 6 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

India's national elections will be held in 9 phases from 7th April till 12th May. Last 10 years or two terms are ruled by a coalition Government led by misandrist Congress party. This situation is expected to change this time.

Misandry in India has a lot of political support in India. The country is often referred to as a socialist republic and all political parties are expected to swear by socialism to participate in the electoral process. In this article, I will give an overview of the dynamics in Indian political system and then I will connect it to misandry and anti-male discrimination.

The decades of India's freedom struggle against British was fought by the Indian National Congress Party, led by M.K.Gandhi. After independence, this party won the democratically held elections for about 2 decades without much opposition.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Indian_National_Congress

The political system in India is somewhat similar to British Parliamentary System, where the Prime Minister is elected indirectly by the elected representatives of lower house of parliament. India became independent in 1947 and the partition of the country created a deep political divide with about 14% of independent India's population being Muslims. M.K.Gandhi never wanted to become Prime Minister, but he remained king maker as usual. Jawahar Lal Nehru, a very rich and powerful freedom fighter became first Prime Minister of India. Gandhi got assassinated even before India's constitution was written. India became a democratic republic in 1951.

Indira Gandhi, Nehru's Daughter:

Nehru's daughter Indira Gandhi married to a man of Persian origins, who coincidentally had also the surname of Gandhi. Nehru was a socialist. He died in 1964 and soon his daughter became prime minister of India. She never claimed to be a feminist, but she was more ruthless than Vladimir Putin. She got India into Nuclear club and played extremely divisive politics. She worked with East Pakistan rebels to break Pakistan into two parts and the free East Pakistan, which later became what is today known as Bangladesh. Before 1971, current Pakistan and Bangladesh were together a single country, though geographically separated by 2500 miles.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Indira_Gandhi

Decline of National Congress Party:

Indira Gandhi's divisive politics and hardline stands ultimately led to quite some rebellions including the rebellion by Sikhs in 1980s, which led to her assassination. The Hindus went on to riot and more than 3000 Sikhs were murdered in Delhi and any other parts of country in a few days after her death. Her inexperienced pilot son Rajiv Gandhi was made Prime Minister by her Congress Party. Indira Gandhi also funded the terrorists of Liberation Tigers of Tamil Elam (LTTE) in Sri Lanka in 80s. Sri Lanka is a small Island nation located in Indian Ocean just south of India. In 1991, her son Rajiv Gandhi also got assassinated; this time by female suicide bombers of LTTE.

The Congress Party wanted the widow of Rajiv Gandhi to lead the Party. Now, here is the problem. She is an Italian, who became citizen of India only in 1983. She refused to get into politics. The dynasty politics played an important role in India for these 3 generations, though the country is supposed to be a democracy. People like me wondered, if it is a democracy or some sort of kingdom, where sons and daughter inherit the throne.

So, the Indian National Congress, which fought the British so well using non-violence in the freedom struggle, became a big nuisance for people of India after Gandhi's death. It also rigged the elections in Kashmir for decades, which ultimately created unrest, rebellion and terrorism. India has to permanently station more than half million troops in Kashmir. In last 66 years, the entire country became corrupt, the judiciary became dysfunctional. People somehow got used to it and tolerated it. During the cold war, India aligned with USSR.

The Indian Congress Party's divisive politics included all kinds of vote bank politics and it also promoted the culture of bribing people to vote. Vote banks were created on the basis of castes and religion.

Smaller Regional Political Parties in India:

By 1980, that is 30 years after independence, many smaller political parties emerged in India. Some of these political parties just specialized in a region or state and provided localization based on people's needs. Some of them successfully defeated the Congress Party in their native states and started governing these states. Today, almost 30% of seats in parliament are held by 12 to 15 smaller political parties.

The current performance and popularity of some of these smaller regional political parties show that they will continue to exist in India's political system for quite some time to come.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_recognised_political_parties_in_India

India's Conservative Party (BJP):

This political party today is as large as the Congress Party.

In 1980s, the conservative Hindus started rallying around a 60 year old Hindu Nationalist Organisation and its political party called Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) or Indian People's Party. The rise of this nationalist and somewhat intolerant party is due to Congress Party's divisive politics. The Hindus for a long time suspected that Congress Party is appeasing Muslims for their votes and is discriminating Hindus and they need to do something about it. However, Muslims never really benefitted from policies of Congress. After independence, occasional riots occurred between Hindus and Muslims. There were always allegations of politicians engineering these riots. The goons and criminals also got integrated into India's political system. The whole political system became a big mess.

Hindus make up about 80% of India's population. In 80s, the conservative Hindus became frustrated with Congress Party and the nationalist BJP made them rally around a movement directed against Muslims. This party created an agenda to reclaim the land, where a famous 15th century mosque stood. It claimed that the mosque was built by demolishing an ancient Hindu temple of great spiritual significance. Since 80s, this party grew in strength and by 1991, the thousands of supporters of this party attacked and raged that mosque to ground and constructed a symbolic temple in the same site. This resulted in widespread riots and some 3000 people of all religions died in the process. This did not reduce the popularity of this right wing political party, as people were already fed up with terror attacks from Pakistan funded terrorists and the rebellion in Kashmir, and they looked for nationalism.

In 90s, the Congress Party weakened further and by late 90s, the right wing conservative BJP won enough seats to form the Government. To prove their nationalist credentials, BJP got 3 nukes tested in 1997. It also governed the country somewhat better than the Congress Party and gave people the hope that it may clean the system.

Sonia Gandhi, Widow of Rajiv Gandhi:

At that stage, the leaders of Congress Party again approached the widow of Rajiv Gandhi requesting her to lead the party just the way her husband, her mother-in-law or her husband's grandfather had led the party and the country. This time the lady from Italy, who speaks heavily accented Hindi, agreed.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sonia_Gandhi

From 1999 to 2004, the right wing BJP formed the Government for a full 5 year term and it mostly did good development work including modernization and development of India's infrastructure. By that time, the services and software industry also propelled the younger generation of hard working Indians into the world scene.

But, in the national elections of 2004, the right wing BJP lost in spite of a lot of good work and the dying Congress Party now led by the feminist Sonia Gandhi became single largest party. It could somehow gather a coalition of small regional parties to form the Government. Her foreign origins put any chances of her becoming the Prime Minister to rest. The leaders of her Congress Party now installed a former Governor of Reserve Bank Manmohan Singh as puppet prime minister. The feminist Sonia Gandhi ruled the country from the background. Manmohan Singh is a soft spoken person with no experience in politics.

Rise of Misandry and worsening corruption in India:

The electoral reversal for right wing BJP in year 2004 proved very costly for men as the Congress Party with the help of Communists started massive onslaught on men's rights. By that time, these were only two credible political parties available in national scene though there were a lot of small parties, who were forming Governments in some of India's 30 odd states.

One of the reasons for fall of BJP is its ring wing position. It failed to get out of its somewhat radical past in spite of good developmental work it did for the country. The 15% Muslims and 5% Christians distrusted it and never voted for it, though many of them may not have really loved the Congress Party. Many small, but powerful regional political parties also refused to partner with BJP in any coalition. This helped the misandrist Congress Party.

From 2004 to 2009, the Congress Party, though weak and crippled, showed a lot of arrogance and passed badly drafted domestic violence act and promoted the large scale misuse of section 498a law against husbands. That is also the same time India's men's movement grew rapidly and it barged into the Indian media.

Congress Party now got back to its old ways and attempted to push a bill in parliament to reserve 33% of seats in Parliament and State assemblies for women. It aimed at women's votes to consolidate and regain its old strength. Some of the regional parties who provide crucial support to Congress Party scuttled the bill in Parliament.

After its first 5 years term, the Congress Party did better in elections in 2009 as it won 206 out of 545 seats in Lower House of Parliament. Its attacks on men's rights continued. Though it could not really push for women's reservation bill, it almost got the bill to give half of husband's property to wife passed.

The Indian MRAs met hundreds of members of parliament and even protested outside the Prime Minister's house to oppose the bill to give husband's property to wife, while the wife is free to retain her property as individual property. Thousands of mobile text messages and tweets were sent to MPs during parliament sessions as well.

As Congress Party started portraying the conservative BJP as a misogynist party, BJP also started behaving like a party of white knights, as it failed to develop strong conservative arguments against the Congress Party. BJP also decided not to risk losing women's votes (49%) due to propaganda of Congress Party and Communists through Indian media.

During 2011 to 2013, massive scams and corruption scandals by Congress Party, involving billions of dollars, were unearthed by anti-corruption civil society activists. This rocked the parliament and the Indian society. Thousands of people took to streets in major cities like Delhi and Bangalore. Many sat in hunger strikes for days to demand corruption free governance and special laws and structural changes to stamp out corruption. Many called it, India's second struggle for freedom.

As a result of these protests, some ministers of the Congress Party and its coalition partners ended up in Delhi's high security prisons for couple of months. In this age of social media, the party very badly lost whatever minimum reputation it had.

The Indian MRAs were also victims of corrupt police and judicial system, where police often extort bribes worth thousands of dollars by intimidating men and their families who are implicated in false cases. These MRAs joined the anti-corruption movement and started giving indirect support against the misandrist Congress Party.

Emergence of a Libertarian Party:

In October 2012, a new libertarian party called Aam Aadmi Party (common man's Party) was born out of this massive anti-congress and ant-corruption movement. Like Tea Party of USA, this party showed complete contempt for the rotten system and conducted rallies terming many parliament members as thieves and goons. It advocated for more power to people and smaller Government. It also blamed the influential business houses of funding the corrupt politician to get special favours in various policies and in mining and oil industries.

This new political party fascinated many middle class and poor sections of the society. Most of its members were young people in their 20s and 30s with absolutely no experience in politics or Governance. Large sections of people in India started seeing them as honest political party and some compared it to the Congress Party during the Independence movement led by Gandhi.

This party openly declared that it will not take any donations from Business houses for funding its elections. Thousands of people volunteered for its campaigns in the State elections in Delhi State in November 2013. In elections for the State of Delhi, this political party unexpectedly won 28 seats out of 70, while the BJP won 32 and the ruling Congress Party got decimated as its seats in State assembly diminished from 40 to just 8. As no party got majority, the elections are due again and this time the Libertarian Party is expected to win majority of seats.

Indian National Elections in 2014:

The term of the current Government will be over by May 2014. The India's National Elections are largest in the world and they are due in the month of April and May, 2014 and the results are expected to be announced in mid-May. Due to the huge population, the elections are held in multiple phases in a period of 30 to 40 days.

The poll surveys indicate massive losses for the misandrist Congress Party. It was always on a decline, but it remained in power with support from smaller parties by sharing power. But, this time it is expected to do very badly and its end may come very soon. The Congress Party is expected to get less than 100 seats out of 543 constituencies for which the elections will be held. Its feminist leader Sonia Gandhi has now put her son Rahul Gandhi to lead the battle and she has prepared him for the throne. He is now harping on women's empowerment in political rallies.

Indian MRAs have officially called for voting against the Congress Party and the Communist Parties.

The conservative BJP is expected to win more than 210 seats and it is expected to get support from some regional parties to get to the midway 272 mark in the lower house of 543 seats.

The Libertarian Aam Aadmi Party may not win more than a dozen seats, but may capture 7% to 15% votes on an average in more than 100 seats, where it is fielding its candidates. That is not at all a bad result for a party which is not even 2 years old. This party appears to be on center left and it may harm the Congress Party much more than the conservative BJP.

This Wikipedia link shows current state of India's Lower House of Parliament in a pictorial manner. It clearly shows how diverse the Indian political scene is, with presence of a lot of regional parties, though BJP and Congress are the main national parties and in future the Libertarian Party may capture power, while the misandrist Congress Party dies a gradual death.

http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Lok_Sabha

Men's Rights Scene after Elections in May:

The Congress Party has made men second class citizens in India. Its loss and gradual demise is a very encouraging sign for men's movement. Its loss in elections may put a stop to downward slide of men's rights, though we may not quickly recover the lost ground.

The Indian people still do not realize the damage misandry is doing to the society. If the conservative BJP comes to power, it may work to reform the judiciary and bring more accountability to the court system. This may help men's movement. The growth of the libertarian Aam Aadmi Party may reduce police brutalities and extortion by police.

The real success of Men's Movement in India will ultimately depend on its own leaders than the outside forces. The good news is that most new entrants into the movement are in their 20s. The movement can grow rapidly, if these young guys are guided properly to lead the movement.

The Male Soldier

AVfM Video Source · 6 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's hard to know what to say about this video besides, please watch this:

I added a comment I believe relevant to this:

One important thing you may have overlooked here, and I mention it because I've seen others mention it elsewhere and encountered it myself in some of the men I work with: it is NOT uncommon for guys to come home from deployment only to find that their wife or girlfriend has left, alienated them from their children, and sometimes even in child support arrears they didn't even know they owed until they got home. So it's yet another massive kick in the face to a lot of these guys. Just wanted to mention that because I've talked to MORE THAN ONE veteran who's had this sort of thing happen to them. It appears that the legendary "Dear John" letter every G.I. used to dread getting no longer applies; he doesn't even get that courtesy. Instead he may just get home and find her and the kids gone and a bill he can't pay–a few have even returned just to be put in jail for not paying child support they never got notice that they owed. It's nightmarish. –DE

Feminism in a Nutshell v2.0

Jared White · 7 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7drl2nUWffQ]

Lyrics

Trigger warning

Trigger warning

Trigger warning

He's back

Greetings class. It is my great pleasure today to re-introduce to you a prominent member in our cause to educate students about the fight against misogyny.

As always, we urge you to please brace yourselves with whatever self-esteem sustaining rituals you use to keep the truth at bay and the ideology of feminism safe and sound behind your barriers of denial.

And now, our Speaker.

For those who hadn't heard, feminism is about equality.

Anyone who denies this is just a raging misogynist.

To prove this, here's a brief rundown of what the movement has given us so far.

Enjoy.

An idea someone thought you should know about men

Took it to the extreme now masculinity's a sin

With views sproutin' nationwide levels of politicism

All about women guess that's why they call it feminism

Step up cause the men were runnin' wild and on the loose

Rapin' and abusin' women no one who knew just what to do

Until the feminists came along with the ultimate solution

Break the male sex with fifty years of persecution

Don't worry bout the menz

Cause the patriarchy's got their back

The biggest challenge now

Teach these brutes the proper way to act

Feminist guidance keeps the boys from turnin' into rapist men

And lets em' know they gotta sacrifice for all the lives of women

Females rapin' men is way too miniscule

Too fuckin' rare

False allegations

When it comes too suffering they don't compare

Men hold all advantage over women don't you even dare

Try and add male suffering to the issues we don't want it here

Instead go find some caution tape

Grab a penis

Wrap it up

We'll have these weapons off the streets before they get a chance to fuck

The dignity and peace of mind straight out of women's bodies

And We'll train these men to know their place so they won't hurt nobody

It's a simple process

All you gotta do is just ignore the past

All the men who died ain't important you can let it pass

Women were the unconditional slaves of their husbands

So to care about the men who lost their lives

Nothin' but redundance

Lynch mobs formed on the basis of a woman's word

Swords run through a man's face cause of what was heard

Bullets ricocheting back and forth inside a man's skull

All because a woman cried rape

That's irrational

Women never lie

It's a truth you need to understand

There's never been a woman who would rape or beat up on a man

All the rapists and abusers hold the male chromosome

That's why we made these classes set up under every college dome

Just brush off those who don't agree as mongorers of hate

When a woman fucks a man against his will that's just a date

Penetration is the only form the definition states

Cause the CDC has spoken only men can stop rape

Keep the female bigots out ya mind only men discriminate

That thing they call misandry isn't it's all fake

Misogyny is all that fuckin matters in this world

That's why the only real victims are women and girls

Men and boys can fall behind in school jobs and life

The only ones they got to blame are in the mirror am I right

But if a woman struggles anywhere feminism's on the case

Blamin' men and gettin' money for some female only space

And tearin' down the spirits of the men who group together

To discuss the issues plaguin' males maybe try and make em' better

But as a feminist let em' know male spaces are forbidden

The only thing a group of men should do is protect women

Rest assured feminism's all you're ever gonna need

For tools to handle every implication of equality

We took a hammer to the rigid gender roles enforced

Women got set free and kept their male workhorse

Now the choices all belong to women you can count em' off

Stay at home

Go to work

Be a parent

Pass it off

Equality is only for the women to enjoy

That's why feminism is a fuckin' patriarchal steroid

Anita Sarkeesian Steals Intellectual Property, Sells It, Then Ignores Demands of Victim

Paul Elam · 7 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I have a question I want to pose directly to the feminist community online and in the world at large.

In particular it is addressed to the writers and editors of Jezebel.com, feministing.com, Double X, feministe.us, Pandagon, "Free" Thought Blogs, The Good Men Project and individuals such as Amanda Marcotte, Jessica Valenti, PZ Myers, Tory Shepherd, Jaclyn Friedman, David Futrelle, Lindy West and any and all of the entities and individuals who identify as feminist advocates.

Do you welcome thieves in your community?

Just as importantly, do you welcome them into your community by intentionally refraining from calling them out when they steal?

The question is not as rhetorical as it sounds. It is actually a bit of a test from my childhood memories of my Uncle Floyd. Yes, Uncle Floyd was a real person; a quiet but sometimes colorful character who had a propensity for summing people up in sometimes abrupt fashion.

One of the many "Floydisms" that I grew up with was quite simple and direct. "Show me a liar and I will also show you a thief."

So far in life I have not been misled by this little gem of wisdom, which brings me, and all of you, to Anita Sarkeesian.

I recently found the following posted to the internet. It contains some very compelling information that she, one of your BFFs, one of your chosen ones, is quite literally a thief. Since reposting permission was granted in the article itself, let me just share it with you in full.

> Hello. I am the professional artist who painted the Princess Daphne image that Feminist Frequency/Tropes vs Women has been using as part of their logo and branding in several places online.
>
> Here's one of several online examples: https://www.kickstarter.com/projects/566429325/tropes-vs-women-in-video-games
>
> My original artwork is here: http://atomicginger.blogspot.com/2009/05/princess-daphne.html
>
> I don't have a record of licensing this image to Feminist Frequency for commercial use. Do you have any relevant paperwork showing that your company has legitimately licensed this image, and that this is a simple misunderstanding instead of intentional copyright infringement?
>
> Since you state in interviews that the video series infringing on my copyrighted work is non-profit: do you also have valid proof of 501(c)3 status, or a transparent breakdown showing that the Kickstarter campaign's net earnings (including derivative opportunities such as paid speaking engagements & site donations) are not being used to benefit any private shareholder or individual.
>
> I don't mean to be harsh, but content creation is how I make my living and professional reputation. I typically do not license my work or lend endorsement in situations where there isn't the utmost transparency. I would greatly appreciate a speedy response (within 24 hours) so we can proceed to resolve this situation.
>
> Thanks for your time,
>
> Tamara Smith
>
> (FYI, letter is based on these open source letters, and remains open source for anyone who it might help. Feel free to use.)

http://cowkitty.net/post/78808973663/you-stole-my-artwork-an-open-letter-to-anita

To perhaps shed light on Sarkeesian's reaction to this inquiry, the following was also posted by the OP at cowkitty.net

> Long Story Short: You stole my art, used it for commercial purposes, and won't even respond to my polite inquiries.
>
> Financial and legal complications aside, I hope you understand that you've taken away my personal voice and ownership as a fellow content creator. Without my permission or knowledge, you've taken my work out of context to use for your own agenda, leaving me no control over how my work is seen or used. I found myself surprised to be incidentally supporting and endorsing a campaign I had no prior knowledge about.
>
> Content is gifted, donated, licensed, commissioned, and purchased. It should NOT be stolen.
>
> On one hand, it's super cool to know that my art was in a TedTalk. (!!!) But on the other hand, you googled "Princess Daphne", downloaded my fan artwork from my own blog website, removed the background & signature, placed it into a branding logo, and continued to use this stolen work even AFTER raising $150k on Kickstarter.
>
> Ok ok, benefit of the doubt. Copyright law can be complicated. Maybe you thought that any images on Google must be free to use however you want. Honest mistake, no harm no foul?
>
> Except that I (and several of your supporters) have tried to contact you to nicely resolve this via your website, Twitter, and even Kickstarter. Unfortunately, there's been no response from you of any kind. I'd assume you were away from the computer, except you've still been actively engaging on social media during this time.
>
> Honestly, I don't have the time/energy at the moment to try to get you to notice me. I do hope one day you'll attempt to resolve this situation, and fully understand why stealing is not only morally wrong, but also detrimental to content creators of all mediums.
>
> I'd still really like to resolve this issue, so I hope you find the time and consideration to one day respond to the original letter I sent you, re-posted below.
>
> Thanks,
>
> Tammy

Now, here is the problem, among many. Regardless of the merits of Anita's assertions about video games, the fact is people who do art "for a living" generally lead very spare lives. So much talent in the world, so little money to pay for it. Not that it would matter a bit if Tammy was rich like The Donald. Stealing is stealing.

It is just that it seems so particularly atrocious for someone who raised over $160,000 for a project (with a fundraising goal of $6,000.00) to go about pillaging the intellectual property of others–and this is not the first time she's been caught at this. Anita appears to be in the habit of taking what others created, erasing their identifying markers, selling that product as her own, and then not even bother to acknowledge it or respond to inquiries about why all of this happened.

This is what a feminist looks like?

Sorry, that time I was being rhetorical.

Everyone in the men's rights community, and a quickly growing portion of society at large, know that feminism is an ideology peddling in lies. From the wage gap, to the facts about DV and rape; even our history itself has been shaped by rampant falsehood into something it never was, for profit and power.

This brings us back to my Uncle Floyd. And this also brings us back to you, feminist community. Now that the cat is out of the bag (yet again) on Anita Sarkeesian, I want the world to see which one of you has the integrity to stand up and insist that she find a way to resolve this, and that the victim of her thievery is compensated for her loss. Or I want the world to see what I suspect is the truth; that not one in the lot of you has any integrity.

You will remain silent, broadcasting the message that stealing is a viable path to spreading your message. Or, perhaps, you will attack Tamara Smith for having the audacity to protect her intellectual property and stand up publicly to one in your crooked crowd. Or maybe one of you will attack me for calling you out on your corrupt standards and try to turn the subject to something other than the fact that Anita Sarkeesian is a dirty thief operating with your blessings.

You will prove that there is no honor among thieves, nor among liars.

Man Up: a poetic response...

Clint Carpentier · 7 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A manly masculine man stands up and give a list of ten poetic responses to the derogatory dehumanizing silencing heartless phrase, “Man Up!”

Goshen College changes webpage demonizing men for "psychological rape"

Jonathan Taylor · 7 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, I covered how Goshen College declared on its website that male students who breathe heavily, whistle, and stare at women are the equivalent of rapists (yes, they really did). It was part of a set of "tips" for men to "stop rape." It read:

"Don't allow psychological rape or commit it yourself. Psychological rape consists of verbal harassment, whistles, kissing noises, heavy breathing, sly comments or stares. These are all assaults on any woman's sense of well-being."

I managed to preserve a screenshot of the page (click to enlarge):

[image]

A thread on Reddit was also started up to ask Goshen College to correct these horribly biased statements. This is what the webpage looks like now:

[image]

And on that same Reddit thread, a user named GoshenCollege recently posted this message:

"Greetings from Goshen College. I appreciate you bringing this webpage to our attention and sharing your concerns about it with us. It was an old page that had not been reviewed in a very long time. We have removed it and are assessing improved resources for our students to help them reduce sexual violence against anyone."

– Jodi Beyeler, Goshen College Director of Communications and Marketing

Goshen College is still hosting one more page on sexual assault that demonstrates anti-male bias ("acquaintance rape prevention for men/women" – screenshot preserved here). We cannot hope to correct all the misguided and biased approaches to sexual assault on college campuses at once, but we can celebrate the baby steps as we make them.

Well done.

Editorial note: This item reprinted from A Voice for Male Students, which you should be reading regularly. –DE

Challenging Dickie James, Board member of Women's Aid

Mike Buchanan · 7 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Our thanks to a supporter, Ray Brown, for alerting us to this matter. It relates to a woman, Dickie James, who has the following profile on her Twitter account @DickieCJames:

> CEO of @StaffsWomensAid. Board Member of @WomensAid. Tweeting own views. Mother. Feminist animal lover. Writer. Hate injustice. Partial to G&T.

Ms James "favorited" a tweet posted by "Radical Feminist," whose Twitter account is @RadicalFeminist. [Note added 21:35 March 2, 2014: a supporter has just informed us that Ms James's "favoriting" of the tweet has been retracted, following the publication of our public challenge. Perhaps a response to our challenge is forthcoming? Don't hold your breath. Our experience tells us these people are utterly shameless.]

"Radical Feminist" tweeted a link to an interesting blog piece (published in June 2013) about fathers and mothers bonding with their babies. The blog piece referred to a study which reported that fathers' oxytocin levels are raised by playing with their babies. Oxytocin has been describes as the "feel good" hormone. 'Radical Feminist' tweeted a link to the blog piece with this line:

> Abusing children raises fathers' oxytocin levels

"Playing" has been twisted by her man-hating mind into "abusing." Tim Brown emailed us the following:

> Just wanted to share with you an exceptionally offensive and misleading tweet by a typically hateful radfem. I know that's not exactly news, and attention seeking by provocation is probably deliberate from a radfem. But I think sometimes what is notable is who favourites or retweets this sort of content, it can be revealing.
>
> https://twitter.com/RadicalFeminist/status/439702968724905984
>
> If you read the blog entry she has linked to, you will see her tweet is a remarkably sick, twisted and wilfully false interpretation of the research mentioned on the blog. Anyway, the tweet was favorited by Dickie James, a Board member of Women's Aid, and to my mind it's worth calling out and drawing attention to someone in her position that's supporting such an obscene level of dishonesty and open hatred towards men. Here's her profile: https://twitter.com/DickieCJames. Might be small potatoes in the grand scheme of things but it really disturbed me as a father so I thought I'd share.
>
> Also, I think groups like Women's Aid do have a platform of power and influence which is often wielded in a way that is rarely questioned, mainly because the surface of their cause like most charities seems sympathetic.
>
> I'm thinking particularly of whenever shared custody policy is talked about, followed by the usual scaremongering thrown around by feminists suggesting it would pose a risk to women and children. The source of that type of excuse used for obstruction seems to be cited from groups like Women's Aid. So in that sense I'd regard them as worthy of challenging when they're expressing alignment with the sort of extremely malicious statement found in this tweet.

We agree with our supporter. Women's Aid do need challenging, and far more than they're accustomed to with the mainstream media. For the time being, though, we're emailed a link to this piece to Staffordshire Women's Aid, with the following message to Dickie James:

> Ms James, we publicly challenge you (1) to apologise for having favorited the hate-driven tweet which is the subject of this blog piece, and (2) to condemn 'Radical Feminist' for having misrepresented fathers playing with their children, as abusing them. You can email me at mike@j4mb.org.uk. Thank you.

We've also emailed a link to the piece to Polly Neate, CEO of Women's Aid. Our list of unanswered public challenges of feminists (and their male collaborators) is becoming lengthy:

http://j4mb.wordpress.com/our-public-challenges-to-feminists/

NOW Backs Wrong Horse in Florida Shooting Case

Robert Franklin · 8 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Big name feminists are about to fall on their faces in the Marissa Alexander case, if they haven't already done so. President of the National Organization for Women, Terry O'Neill and president of NOW's Florida affiliate, Donna Slutiak, are calling for the resignation of Jacksonville prosecutor Angela Corey. Her offense? Corey has refiled charges against Marissa Alexander who was convicted in 2011 of multiple counts of aggravated assault with a firearm. Here's the latest (WTXL, 3/6/14). And here's a good summary of the case (Media Trackers, 7/16/13).

What's knotted NOW's knickers? As you might guess, Alexander claims she should be acquitted of her crime because she was defending herself against a violent boyfriend. Of course she's reading directly from the feminist script, so O'Neill and Slutiak have gone to bat for her. Here's the whole of their press release on the matter.

> "The Office of State Attorney Angela Corey will seek to put Marissa Alexander in prison for 60 years if she is convicted for a second time. Alexander was previously sentenced to 20 years for firing a warning shot at her abusive husband in Jacksonville, FL. Her conviction was overturned on appeal, but State Attorney Angela Corey wasted no time refiling the same charges and a retrial is scheduled to begin July 28.
>
> Corey claims to be following Florida law in seeking a new 60 year sentence, but prosecutors have extremely wide discretion in deciding what charges to bring against a person in the first place, including deciding not to prosecute at all if the prosecutor determines that the Stand Your Ground law applies. Instead of using her prosecutorial discretion in a responsible manner, Corey is misusing her office in a way that endangers the lives of domestic violence survivors. That she would try to mislead the public about her role in the criminal justice system of Florida only adds to the outrageousness of her conduct.
>
> If Alexander were to receive a 60-year sentence, what would that mean for other domestic violence victims who try to defend themselves? Survivors need support from our legal system, not fear of being convicted if they stand their ground against their abuser. Corey should resign from her position and be replaced with a State Attorney that will defend victims, not prosecute them."

Now, let me be clear at the outset. I agree with NOW that 60 years in prison would be far too harsh a sentence for anyone who did what Alexander did – fire a shot in the direction of, and miss, her boyfriend Rico Gray and his two young sons. But unsurprisingly, the NOW officers get the rest of it wrong.

Back in the August of 2010, Alexander gave birth to a child who may have been fathered by Gray or perhaps by her ex-husband, Lincoln Alexander. Three days after giving birth, Alexander left the child in the hospital and went to Gray's house. He wasn't home, but she parked in his garage, let herself in and spent the night there. (The two were nominally a couple, but Alexander hadn't lived in Gray's house for two months prior to her unannounced arrival.)

When Gray showed up the next morning, he cooked breakfast for the two adults and his two sons who were with him. All went well until Alexander handed him her phone on which she had photos of her newborn. She encouraged Gray to scroll through the photos while she retired to the bathroom. Gray was glad to see the photos of the child until he ran across text messages to Alexander's ex that strongly suggested the baby was his, not Gray's. Upset about her apparent attempt at paternity fraud, Gray opened the bathroom door and confronted Alexander. An argument ensued. What happened next is the nut of the controversy.

Here's Alexander's side of the story as she told it in court and as reiterated by the appellate court:

> After Mr. Gray accused her of infidelity and questioned the paternity of her week-old baby, she testified, she locked the bathroom door, yelling at him to leave, but Mr. Gray broke through the door, grabbed her by her neck, and demanded to know when she last had sexual relations with her ex-husband. She tried to push past him but he shoved her hard into the bathroom door. After struggling for what felt like an "eternity," she > testified, he relented and she ran from the bathroom straight to the garage.

>
> Once inside the garage, appellant testified, she tried to leave the premises altogether but could not get the garage door open, and instead retrieved a gun (for which she had a permit) from the glove compartment of a vehicle in the garage. She then walked back into the house, she said, holding the gun by her side because she did not know whether Mr. Gray had left or not. As she walked into the kitchen, Mr. Gray saw the gun, and charged her "in a rage," saying, "Bitch, I'll kill you." Startled, she raised the gun into the air and fired. Mr. Gray ran. According to appellant, she was forced to fire her gun into the air as a warning shot because it was the "lesser of two evils."

This incident followed a two-year period during which Mr. Gray had apparently been violent toward Alexander on more than one occasion. He was arrested at least once, friends and relatives testified he had a reputation in the community for violence and others had seen bruises on Alexander they understood to have been inflicted by Gray. A defense expert testified that Alexander "met the criteria for 'battered person's syndrome.'"

By contrast, the jury also heard testimony the trial judge described this way:

> At this point, Rico Gray Sr. opened the bathroom door to confront the Defendant regarding the texts. A verbal argument ensued between the Defendant and Rico Gray Sr. For this reason, Rico Gray Sr. stepped out of the bathroom and yelled for his sons to put their shoes on because they were leaving. Rico Gray Sr. returned to the bathroom and demanded that the Defendant explain the texts and the verbal argument continued. During the verbal argument Rico Gray Sr. stood in the doorway to the bathroom and the Defendant could not get around him. Either Rico Gray Sr. moved from the doorway or the Defendant pushed around him to exit the bathroom.
>
> Rico Gray Sr. moved to the living room where his children were. Subsequently, the Defendant emerged from the master bedroom and went into the garage where her car was parked. The Defendant testified she was trying to leave the residence but could not get the garage door to open. (The Court notes that despite the Defendant's claim she was in fear for her life at that point and trying to get away from Rico Gray she did not leave the house through the back or front doors which were unobstructed. Additionally, the garage door had worked previously and there was no evidence presented to support her claim.) The Defendant then retrieved her firearm from the glove box of the vehicle. The Defendant returned to the kitchen with the firearm in her hand and pointed it in the direction of all three Victims. Rico Gray Sr. put his hands in the air. The Defendant shot at Rico Gray Sr., nearly missing his head. The bullet traveled through the kitchen wall and into the ceiling in the living room. The Victims fled the residence and immediately called 911. The Defendant stayed in the marital home and at no point called 911. The Defendant was arrested on the date of the incident.
>
> The Defendant posted bail prior to arraignment and was ordered by the Court and signed a document through Pretrial Services stating she was to have no contact with the Victims in the instant case. However, the Defendant continued to have contact with the Victims in this case, more specifically with Rico Gray Sr.

Once out on bail, Alexander not only contacted Gray, she assaulted him, was re-arrested and her bail was revoked.

The trial judge found that as a matter of fact and law, Alexander was not entitled to immunity from prosecution under Florida's Stand Your Ground law. Here's the appellate court's ruling.

Those are the two dueling sets of evidence in the case for whose defendant, NOW has gone to bat. As the concurring appellate judge stated, "it appears the jury rejected Appellant's version of events." That's putting it mildly. It took the jury just 12 minutes to convict Alexander. She was sentenced to serve 20 years in prison, but the appellate court ruled that the trial judge had given an erroneous instruction on the issue of self-defense, so Alexander will get the new trial Angela Corey is giving her.

Apparently Corey has announced that she'll attempt to convince a jury to sentence Alexander to 60 years in prison, which, as I said, is clearly excessive given the nature of the crime.

Whatever the final outcome, NOW has chosen this case to draw its line in the sand. It's an unwise choice. Oh, I know what they're thinking. They're thinking that, because Corey was the prosecutor who failed to get a conviction in the George Zimmerman case, they'll get enough liberal backing to at least smear her and, in the process get some press for the "battered woman" claim.

First, they claim Corey should simply refuse to prosecute a woman who discharged a firearm in the direction of a man and his two children. I can't imagine why any prosecutor would do that, but NOW's officers seem to think the case has something to do with Stand Your Ground. It doesn't. Had O'Neil and Slutiak actually read the findings of the trial judge, they'd know that Alexander tried to assert SYG immunity and failed as she obviously should have.

The rest of the NOW press release is just Nonsense 101. They want us to believe that Alexander shouldn't be prosecuted because it would discourage other DV victims from "defending themselves." But that conveniently overlooks the fact that the jury found that Alexander was doing no such thing, and indeed never seriously considered the possibility. Twelve minutes in the jury room is just long enough to say, "Does anyone here think she should be acquitted? No? Well, let's try to figure out this form the judge gave us," and then actually fill out the form. NOW will never admit it, but no one on the jury had the slightest doubt about Marissa Alexander's guilt.

That may be because the jurors noticed certain things about Alexander's behavior that O'Neill and Slutiak will never tell you. First, she had three avenues of escape – the garage and the front and back doors. She'd gone unhindered into the garage but, instead of simply leaving, she got the pistol and re-entered the house.

Second, if she believed her life was in danger, why didn't she call the police once Gray and his boys had fled? He was the one to dial 911, not her. That's not exactly the behavior of someone in fear for her life.

Finally, after her arrest and release on bail, Alexander returned to Gray's house several times even though she was forbidden to do so by court order. Again, those aren't the actions of someone who's afraid the other person is a danger to her.

NOW will tell you that Gray himself admitted to Alexander's version of events, which indeed he did. What NOW won't tell you is that he did so only to try to help Alexander beat the rap. He later recanted his deposition testimony.

It's beginning to look like the U.S. isn't Canada in which seemingly a claim by a woman of domestic abuse at the hands of a man gives her carte blanche to commit any form of violence against him she chooses. The cases out of Canada in which women get a judicial pass for their violent – sometimes murderous – crimes are too numerous to list. But suffice it to say, there are enough to prompt one veteran Canadian prosecutor, David M. Paciocco, to refer to "battered woman syndrome" this way:

> [I]t is a prime illustration of what is known in the literature as "junk science." Indeed, it flatters the theory to call it "science" at all…[i]

So it's no surprise that feminism not only embraces the concept, but created it out of whole cloth. I won't go into all the absurdities of "battered woman syndrome," which, in any case, are well-known to readers of this site. But to me the salient feature of Lenore Walker's brainchild is the fact that literally any behavior on the part of the woman can be called evidence of it.

Does she deny physical abuse by her partner? That's proof of BWS because it shows she's under his control and will say anything to support him. Does she say he did physically abuse her? That's also proof of the syndrome. Is there no evidence of physical abuse? She's still a "battered" woman because "battered woman syndrome" doesn't require her to have been, well, battered. Psychological abuse is sufficient. Does she never tell any friends, relatives, police, lawyers, doctors, co-workers, neighbors, counsellors, etc. that she's abused? That proves he's controlling her. Does she tell some of those people? That's proof of abuse. Does she take no reasonable action to separate herself from the man she claims is abusing her? That's "learned helplessness," a key element of the syndrome.

Does she take that reasonable action? That's proof of abuse.

You get the picture. "Battered woman syndrome" is a continuous reaffirmation loop; every fact, every allegation is yet more evidence that a man's abuse has rendered his female partner incapable of functioning as an autonomous adult. Until she does. In ways never explained by BWS proponents, shooting the man is yet more proof of "learned helplessness."

Needless to say, NOW's claim that Marissa Alexander is a "survivor" of domestic violence is so much claptrap. Yes, Gray has been violent toward her, but of course she's been violent in return. Theirs looks very much like one of those relationships in which one violent person finds another and romance blossoms.

Those relationships are far more complex and ambiguous than the likes of Terry O'Neill will ever admit. Alexander returned time and again to Gray; he gave testimony trying to protect her from criminal responsibility. That's co-dependency, not "battered someone syndrome." Feminists' preferred narrative of "woman – good, man – bad" is almost never accurate. The 13 people who know the most about the case – the judge and the jury – didn't buy it, and neither does Angela Corey, who seems to think she'll have no problem getting another conviction.

If Marissa Alexander is the type of "victim" NOW wants to back, they'll get no argument from me. I'm perfectly happy to watch them fall on their faces in public. But it's telling that she's the horse they've chosen to ride. Can't they find someone, somewhere who's a bit more sympathetic? Apparently not.

And that alone tells us all we need to know about "battered woman syndrome" and the theory that any woman who cries "domestic violence" should be able to shoot – or shoot at – her male partner.

Last year, a survey conducted for the Huffington Post revealed that only 23% of Americans call themselves feminists. My guess is that it's stuff like this that explains that pathetic showing.

1. [i] Paciocco, David M.; Getting Away with Murder: The Canadian Criminal Justice System, Irwin Law, 1999, p. 306.

So you think you are sexually harassed...

Clint Carpentier · 8 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Well, that may be true, but is it systemically aimed at all women? And is it truly to put you in your place? And is it really misogyny? At what point does a high levity work environment become directed sexual harassment? And should one's delicate feelings dictate the level of tomfoolery in a workplace that is already naturally serious?

Boys and men have "blow-off" levels, and when it's kept bottled up, bad things tend to happen. These things aren't always abusive or violent, or even so much as critical, but can easily escalate preposterously.

I don't know, personally, how women operate together within a group, because I usually avoid gaggles of women and girls. Having been the victim of gaggles in high school, I have every reason to avoid them now. Being the only male – or one of a few – makes one a target, having no recourse but to put up with the objectification, or shaming, or jokes, or what-have-you, lest you're accused of sexual harassment for your unsolicited wit; or worse, a significant other confronts you later for "hitting on" his girl/woman/wife, and having to either knuckle up or try to explain that you have no interest in her without making it sound like she's not interesting (and I've encountered bastards who just want the excuse to knuckle you down, so talk is pointless). Sexual harassment works both ways ladies; moving on.

I am a tradesman, I work for a living; my trade requires both mind and body, and a certain level of one-on-one social skills. The blue collar workforce is dominated by men, and point of fact, dominated by men with more testosterone than your average college geek, coffee shop espresso latte master mixer, and grocery bagger. The average BCW (blue collar worker) will find his "better half" at some bar or party, or possibly some friend of a buddy's SO. Why the bar? Because after a grueling day of muscling and measuring and blistered palms and munched fingers, a brew is a nice way to unwind; extroverts like company to recharge, introverts like myself, prefer to be alone.

On a typical construction site, you're going to find a certain level of good natured derogatory speech aimed at one another. It's not to one-up each other, or to self-ego boost, or even so much as to climb any imagined social ladder. It's to keep the mind sharp, help with levity in a dangerous environment, and to generally enjoy the hard fought benefits of "free speech". It can be things as silly as mama jokes, or as aggravating as finding your tape measure at the bottom of a bucket of drywall mud (keep track of your shit, or you're wasting time looking for it!). Sometimes you'll find a broom-handle up your ass while you're climbing a ladder, not to speed you up, but to raise your awareness in a precarious predicament; how are you gonna handle a swarm of yellow-jacket wasps bursting out of a roof when you're twenty feet up? Even mocking each other's vehicles; hint, utility usually wins out over economy and features. And it's not just in the work force that men encounter "trigger warning" speech.

My stepfather bought a house just as I started high school, and he regularly commandeered my aid to help him do this that and whatnot around the place. I was half his size, and had grown up in rentals and apartments, yet I was expected to suddenly be a man. "Fuck, man, what'd you do that for? Use what's between your ears for more than keeping your skull from collapsing!" "quit pulling like a girl, put your back into it!" "it's gonna take you forever to unload that, pack more per trip!" "is that all you got? Lean into it, PUSH!!!" This might sound like tyranny, and at the time, it felt like it, but he was there beside me doing the mule's share of the work.

When I began my trade, I was 160 pounds and soft; when you're over six feet tall, that is scrawny. I struggled doing things that now I look back on and laugh. I remember my journeyman telling me to go get a roll of carpet from the van (The roll was twelve feet long, but it had fifteen lineal feet rolled up in it); for context, it wasn't a killer carpet, it was light weight and rolled up reasonably tight, so even given my own wiry frame I could pack it into the house if I balanced it properly on my shoulder. It was bulky, not heavy, and its length made it unwieldy but not unmanageable; and I was thinking my boss was an asshole – which he was, but carrying carpet was a lesson I would have to learn regardless. I'd watched him carry rolls of carpet before so I knew the basic mechanics of it, but theory and practical are rarely so cut-n-dry.

So there I was fighting this roll of carpet out of the van, and then fighting to get it up on my shoulder. With no mental meter to gauge "half-way," I found myself thinking this carpet was insanely heavy, and then I discovered the boss and the homeowner were at the door smoking and laughing at me and my struggles, and he shouted, "move it forward, move it back, forward back, whatcha doin?" I was mentally cussing at him, which meant I wasn't focusing on what I was physically doing, which translated to over-compensating and missing the halfway point. That's when the worst happened, the roll broke (we call it a break, but really it just bends over while on your shoulder), and he laughed some more and said, "there's nothing for it, that's how it's coming in" (meaning, even if I'd found the mid-point after, the break made the roll unbalanced and unwieldy. So I moved back and extracted the rest of the roll from the van, only to discover the heavy end was behind me; so I had to hunch forward to keep it from snapping my back, while pushing the "light" end forward to keep it out of the dirt. With my feet spread wide, and every part of me hyper extended, I quickly realized the inherent instability of bipeds; every step was a fight against myself. I couldn't see where I was going, I could only see the dirt right below me – so with best guestimate I turned the roll and began trudging. When I got halfway I heard his voice off-center saying, "you taking that to the river or what?" Followed by laughter and, "we better go rescue your carpet."

My job requires a lot of clean-up before during and after completion. There were a number of times during my training period that my boss would look at me and say something like, "well aren't you a good little bitch," "you'll make a good wife someday." Different skills required different positions, activities and, not surprisingly, different commentary, like, "quit wiggling your ass at me." Or just outta the blue, for no real purpose at all, I'd be told, "you know you got blowjob lips don'tcha."

I finally cut myself loose from him and with a single tool box, and a borrowed work van, struck out on my own. Now, until this point I'd had to stay clean shaven and have a buzz cut; neither were my choice because I have a baby face, it's a hindrance on so many levels, but let's keep this professional. I quickly learned that even though I had five years experience, and was twenty four, I still looked like I should be in high school, and greeting my customers bore that out, "you're doing this job? You seem awful young, are you just doing the prep work?" I grew my hair and face as quick as I could, being a native half-breed, the hair grew fast, but not the face (thanks mom); and I noticed a shift in how I was perceived, I became an adult in people's eyes, my words carried weight in regards to my skills.

Around this time, I had a sales guy who was fun to torment and who took it in stride and gave back just as good. One day I pulled into the back of the shop and saw his car sitting there, all by its lonesome (can't have that); so with my well trained reversing skills, I backed up beside it and parked my van with a foot to spare. He came up to me the next morning saying I'd parked too close to his car, he had to climb in from the passenger side, to which I grinned and answered, "yeah… that was kind of the point." He shook his head laughing and said, "get the fuck to work."

I recently did a job, where the homeowners, general contractor, my boss, and I were discussing a carpet manufacturing flaw. There was a pattern bow in the carpet, and it stood out horribly in the hallway… where I'd had to seam it together. My boss is down on his knees measuring and taking pictures, I nudged the GC and said covertly, loud enough for all to hear, "you know what happened eh, I just tucked this part, then I kicked the piss outta that part, and then got lazy towards the end." Followed by more banter between serious talk, like when I looked at the GC and with a completely serious look on my face, I said, "you know what the problem is, the house is crooked, fix the house." Everyone had finally come to terms and my boss was at the door, the GC was wandering off, the homeowners looked at me sadly; then I looked towards the retreating GC and bellowed, "That's it, I've had enough of your crap, I quit, I'm taking my toys and going home… I'm telling my mom on you!!!"

I remember a time I showed up at a job site, some construction was going on, about half a dozen guys were there bustling about. I just needed to get into the basement and slam in carpet in a bedroom; but the driveway was all blocked up with trucks. I only really needed one truck moved so I could get to the basement door, so I got a hold of one of the guys and let him know, in much less PC but more humorous manner. The guy called for the site's "Toby" (the FNG, greenhorn, lackey, etc) and told him to move the truck, "ok, uhhh… is it an automatic?" The guy looked at the Toby flabbergasted, "what, you can't handle a stick?!" Well as I waited for the guy to move his standard pickup, I got to hear chorus of ribbing about sticks and girlfriends and how a man should be able to handle a stick in sticky situations; one of them going so far as to describe intimately the motions of shifting, "… if she wiggles or bucks, you're in good; if she hops and gags, you've done it wrong; you want her to purr, not choke". The poor Toby was beat red as he attempted to go about his job.

My biological father was telling me a story one day about electrical work. He was roughing in a house (running wires through a house frame before the drywall goes on) and he told his Toby how he wanted the ends cut. "I told him, 'when you run the wires into the outlets, leave enough hanging out that I work with when I get back to do the rigging' he asked me how much is enough, so I told him, 'about the length of your cock' and then I went about rigging up the power box, I thought for sure there'd be like eighteen inches of wire hanging out of each outlet, but when I got back to inspect his work, there was more than two inches, man I tell you, I felt so sorry for his girlfriend."

If you don't understand banter, or levity, or ribbing, or refuse to acknowledge such communication, then everything a man says will be construed as sexual harassment. We often use banter to relieve work stress. It's pretty sad when banter you're not even involved in, is grounds to get a man fired. So the next time you see the office Toby humping the photocopier, unless his pants are down, ask him about it before running to HR to file a complaint; I seriously doubt he's sexually assaulting the equipment, or sending you telepathic patriarchal messages about his intentions towards you, or running off copies of his penis to remind the office gals who's in charge; perhaps it's giving him grief, or maybe he's bumping it back into place, or maybe, oh I don't know, the poor guy IS running off copies of his penis, because the boss lady told him to or lose his job.

Just some things to think about.

International Women's Day: promoting gender war

Jason Thompson · 8 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Portuguese and Romanian.

International Men's and Women's days involve numerous objectives, with both days highlighting issues considered unique to men or women. The following highlights two central narratives of IWD and IMD respectively; women's supposed fight against oppression, and men's attempts to promote positive recognition of men and boys in a misandric society.

Several popular myths concerning the origins of International Women's Day exist, and after a survey of the literature it seems the variety of accounts have created confusion for commentators. For example, a widely bruited falsehood about IWD which surfaced in French Communist circles claimed women from clothing and textile factories had staged a protest on 8 March 1857 in New York City. This story alleged that garment workers protested against very poor working conditions and low wages and were attacked and dispersed by police. It was claimed that this event led to a rally in commemoration of its fiftieth anniversary (in 1907), with this commemorative gathering constituting the very first IWD. In response to these legendary claims Temma Kaplan explains that "Neither event seems to have taken place, but many Europeans think March 8, 1907 inaugurated International Women's Day."[1]

This fantasy of origins clearly attempts to position International Woman's Day in a narrative of woman-as-victim, but it goes further. Speculating about the origins of the 1857 legend Liliane Kandel and Françoise Picq suggested it was likely that some felt it opportune to detach International Women's Day from its true basis in Soviet history and ascribe to it a more 'international' origin which could be painted as more ancient than Bolshevism and more spontaneous than a decision of Congress or the initiative of those women affiliated to The Party.[2]

Whilst numerous apocryphal stories of this nature exist, we can safely say that International Women's Day was first initiated by German socialist Clara Zetkin in 1910 as a way to promote socialist political objectives and was always referred to by the political name 'International Working Women's Day'. Observation of the event was primarily restricted to the Soviet bloc. It wasn't until the 1970s when women outside of the Soviet bloc looked to celebrating the event that the word 'working' was increasingly omitted along with much of it's socialist meaning.

Beginning in the 1970's IWD became subject to a feminist revision. Whereas IWWD was previously used to highlight working women's oppression by a bourgeois and powerful upper class of both men and women, 1970s feminists revisioned the basis of the day by stating that it was now men alone, as a class of "chauvinists," who wielded all power over all women who had each become victims of men's domination. It was men's oppressive rule which IWD must now focus on overthrowing.

A decisive moment of the feminist revision came from the United Nations which officially endorsed and promoted the event from the late 1970s. Along with this endorsement the UN worked very hard to get rid of IWDs socialist traits, a move which was not accepted by many socialist women's groups. For instance, in 1980 in Sweden, the socialist women's 'Grupp 8' rejected working with other women's organizations to promote IWD because it wanted to maintain the socialist origins and aims of the event: "We have now conducted a number of discussions within our organization and come to the conclusion that, as representatives of the socialist women's movement, we cannot take part in a joint-party March 8 demonstration. After all, from the historical perspective, March 8 is the 'International Socialist Working Women's Day' and our organization feels that this should absolutely remain the case. Changing this would be like changing May 1. For this reason we are unable to endorse the UNs appeal."[3] The revisioned event was seen by many as a betrayal of both it's history and fundamental goals.

A popular slogan circulated on International Women's Day on posters, pin-buttons, T-shirts, bumper stickers, and in print media.

With this new ideological turn women were no longer viewed as part of the privileged upper class, and those former oppressors of women- i.e. capitalism; traditional gender schemas imposed by powerful men and women; various laws, language and so on- were reduced to one all-encompassing enemy: males and their patriarchal belief system. The new ideological basis for IWD was elaborated in the late 1970s-80s under the label "patriarchy theory"[4] and it's arrival correlated with a sharp increase in the numbers of women observing IWD,[5] an interest generated by heightened concerns or fears over 'patriarchal oppression' of women.

It's true that women have sought to dismantle restrictive gender stereotypes, but IWD appears more concerned with perpetuating those gender stereotypes rather than dismantling them. In light of the oversimplified explanations proposed by feminist 'patriarchy theory'[6] one hopes that whatever issues remain for women that they be explored in more sophisticated and nuanced ways to give International Women's Day a more credible platform for promoting gender equality and improving gender relations.

International Men's Day, as conceived by Dr. Jerome Teelucksingh in 1999, has a completely different ideological basis to both the early and later phases of International Women's Day. Although the objectives of IMD occasionally intersect with those of IWD, such as advocating equality between the sexes, it is primarily concerned with celebrating positive portrayals of men and other issues unique to men's and boys experiences. This approach is deemed necessary in a social context which is often fascinated with images of males behaving badly, eg. media portrayals of males as stupid, emotionless, greedy, violent, dangerous, power-hungry, selfish, irresponsible and so on. Such negative male stereotypes are frequently promoted in an attempt to shame males into behaving more positively, ignoring the fact that the negative behaviours do not apply to the vast majority of men and boys, or that such negativity may detrimentally impact the self-image and self-esteem of boys, which in turn impacts their willingness to engage in intimate relationships and in communities. In highlighting positive images of men IMD attempts to show that males of all ages respond more energetically to positive portrayals than they do to negative stereotyping.

In summary, International Women's Day started as a day for women to promote socialist objectives, especially for proletarian women to fight against oppression by the powerful upper classes comprised of men and women both. In the 1970's it became a new movement claiming that men alone oppressed women, and that IWD will be used as a vehicle to highlight, primarily, the results of an assumed gender war. Said differently the focus of IWD shifted from a class war, to a gender war.

International Men's Day is not based on the assumption of a gender war. IMD is primarily about celebrating positive images of men as an alternative to negative male stereotyping, the aim being to inspire a new generation of men and boys to develop self-worth and a desire to participate in a society that will (hopefully) one day be free from misandry.

References:

[1] Temma Kaplan, On the Socialist Origins of International Women's Day, in: Feminist Studies, 11, 1985, S. 163-171.
[2] Liliane Kandel / Françoise Picq, Le Mythe des origines à propos de la journée internationale des femmes, in: La Revue d'en face, 12, 1982, S. 67-80.
[3] Silke Neunsinger, Worlds Of Women; International Material in the Collections of ARAB, p23 – letter by Grupp 8, Stockholm, 1981
[4] Lindsey German, Theories of Patriarchy in International Socialism second series no 12. 1981.
[5] 1900-2010: Increased interest in IWD correlates with the emergence of 'patriarchy theory'.

[6] Sandra Bloodworth, The Poverty of Patriarchy Theory Originally published in Socialist Review (Australian), Issue 2, Winter 1990, pp. 5-33. (DOC)

The definition of feminism

AVfM Video Source · 8 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What does the word “feminism” actually mean? It’s important to define your terms.

It’s also important to recognize that what some people tell you a word means is not reflective of reality.

You might want to subscribe to Alyss Majere.

Father and Child Anguish: “Daddy, Why Are You Crying?”

Paul Elam · 9 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is a true story.

When my son was born, he was probably the ugliest baby I had ever seen. I know that sounds terrible, but it’s true. Still, I was very happy about his arrival and participated in his feeding, changing, bathing, and play time. I was working 40-45 hours a week in a field service industry. I traveled from location to location performing maintenance and repairs on equipment.

I would get home and participate in my son’s evening activities. My wife at the time had another child from a previous (but very brief) marriage. My son’s half-sister is only 2 years older than my son, and so I had previous “baby experience”. Both children enjoyed “daddy time” rolling around on the living room floor, watching “A Nightmare Before Christmas,” several dozens of times (on VHS by the way), and having me read to them in the recliner. It was exhausting but very satisfying as I’m sure many parents can attest.

Before my son turned two my work and then marital situation began to deteriorate. Sometimes things happen where a company isn’t performing well in the market and needs to “downsize”. This is exactly what happened in my case. I was “let go.” Along with the loss of the job came a loss of the company vehicle which I had been using (as allowed at the time) for personal errands. It was also the only vehicle we had at that time. I picked up a fairly cheap used vehicle and found a new job at a single facility about 25 miles from the house, but making less than I was before. With a family to support, I had to take what I could get.

The reduced income caused some friction in my marital life as I’m sure anyone who has gone through a familial fiscal crisis can tell you.

Sometimes when things begin to go wrong, they only continue to do so until a minimum energy is reached. It’s as if once the boulder atop the mountain starts falling, the only thing that can stop it is for it to reach the ground. My car broke down. It was not a minor issue like a belt or an alternator; it was a transmission. My job was roughly 25 miles from home and my car was now wheels-up. I managed to catch a ride with another employee of that facility who lived near me for about two weeks. Unfortunately, they moved to be closer to work. With no way to get to work (not even bus service) I lost my second job.

A few months later and savings were all used up with no job and no car. We decided (more accurately my then-wife decided) that we would move across the state to live with her parents since the house payments were now seriously in arrears. The bank foreclosed and I lost my house. Within a fortnight of moving in with her parents, I was told by my son’s mother that she wanted a divorce and that I had to leave.

I still remember the feelings of helplessness and despair as I realized that my stepdaughter and I would be forever estranged and that I would miss out on a good deal of my son’s life. As I wept, my stepdaughter came to me, held my face in her tiny hands and asked, “Daddy, why are you crying?” Even just typing that sentence caused tears to stream down my face again.

My son was two days shy of his 2nd birthday and so didn’t understand what was happening. I wept again when my aunt graciously came out to pick me up. She had a spare bedroom and would allow me to stay with her until I got back on my feet. She had talked to the manager of the only commercial enterprise within walking distance of her rural home (a convenience store) to set me up with an application/interview. I was grateful.

I walked the half mile to the convenience store on odd shifts, weird hours and seldom reaching 40 hours per week (usually 34-38) for a mere $5.25 per hour. This was in the late 1990s, so that’s not a lot of money. Still, I paid for my own food and also paid $50 per week as child support to my ex wife. She allowed me to see my son every other Sunday, since I worked Saturdays. My aunt was kind enough to drive me to the “half way” point to facilitate my visitation.

Slowly I built up some cash reserves and my aunt offered to sell me her old car, since she was getting a new one. I made monthly payments to her on the amount she would have gotten for it as a trade in. Once I had wheels again, it was a fast track to getting a better paying job and eventually my own apartment. I hate to think what would have happened to me if my aunt hadn't helped me then.

While I was still working at the convenience store, the soon-to-be ex-wife had been living with a local pot dealer near her parents' house. Sometime before I got my aunt's car, the ex left the pot dealer for another guy. I'm going to have to start naming these folks just for convenience. Let's call the new guy Zack.

Zack wanted to marry my ex. The problem with that was no divorce had been applied for, much less granted. Shortly after I got my wheels, but before I found my first better-paying job, I was handed paperwork to sign. Documents written by a paralegal, for an uncontested divorce. I was very nearly broke, just getting back on my feet. I had no money for lawyers to fight any of the conditions of the agreement. It was all fairly standard stuff: joint custody with the mother being the primary custodial parent, alternate weekend visitation for the father. Joint custody means simply that both parents have the authority to make decisions about their child; school decisions or medical decisions. It does not mean equal time with the child.

I signed. What else could I do?

My son was 2 and a half when the divorce finalized. It was very rapid because there were no marital assets and both parties had signed an agreement which included child support. Fortunately, I managed to avoid the type of child support payments that had to be overseen by the state. I had kept receipts of all the money I had given since the separation. I continued to keep the receipts throughout.

Thus began the cycle of alternate weekend visitation. Once I was working a Monday-Friday job, I had the full 47 hours every other week to see my child. His new stepfather could see and interact with my son 6 times more than I could. Zack and my ex moved even further away from her parents (and me) for his job. While still within driving distance, It was nearly an hour away.

The artificial nature of this visitation arrangement made it difficult to have any meaningful impact on the direction of my son's life, or the forming of his character. There were times when he would misbehave at mom's house and I would hear about it from her when it was my weekend. Needless to say, disciplining my son for something I didn't witness during my precious time with him was not high on my to=do list. I spoke to him on the phone when he got older, but phone conversations with a 3-5 year old are…well, limited in scope.

The limited contact also made me want to do something fun and interesting when I did get to see him. Who wants to punish their child or waste time just hanging out at the apartment during the 14.3% of the child's life they get to participate in?

I was going to use the phrase "Disney dad" here but the connotations are decidedly anti-father. Take a look for yourself.

I had no choice in where they moved. I had a better job than convenience store clerk, but was also now paying my own rent, electric, and food bills along with an increase in child support amount. Hiring an attorney was simply not an option.

So the years pass and the pain has become routine. Years and years of seeing my son grow up in stroboscopic bursts of time. Years of trying hard not to weep in the car on the trip home from dropping him off at his mother's, so that I wouldn't crash my car. Years of sitting home on my non-visitation weekends trying to fill the time. Sometimes there were women I was dating, sometimes not. The "not" times sucked.

Every so often Zack would move again, but never any closer to me. Eventually the same forces which caused my downward spiral began working on Zack. He lost a job, got another one, had car troubles, had strained finances, and moved… a lot.

Well, I got stable in a job, and with a wonderful woman. We began living together and things got a lot better for me and for my relationship with my son. Since he was older now, we could talk on the phone more often and about significant things. Little did I know that things always seem brightest just before they completely fall apart.

I got a panicked call from my ex one day while I was at work. Zack had been arrested for molesting my son's half-sister. My ex had never worked and was about to be forced to move back in with her parents again. She offered me the chance to be the custodial parent. I jumped at it. I told my boss I was leaving for the day. I called my significant other. I wrote up an informal modification to the custody arrangement which included the fact that I was current on child support and relieving my ex from ever having to pay me child support. I drove to where I was to pick up my son. I took him with me for the final 5 years of his childhood.

Needless to say, that was an emotional day. I got my son enrolled in school in the district I lived in. I had to take a few days off of work to get everything done. Fortunately, my boss and company were very supportive. Things began to settle in a bit in our new routine. Unfortunately, it wouldn't last.

My son had been witness to the molestation of his sister. He had also been physically (but not sexually) abused by Zack. I made had a point of asking him if Zack treated him well, and my son had always assured me that he did. Children sometimes have to hide the truth due to fear. I never saw any marks on my son that would lead me to think physical abuse was occurring. It came as a complete surprise to me.

My son had some problems dealing with his feelings about his own and his sister's abuse. I got him counseling sessions to help. I talked to him about it. We both cried and hugged and forgave each other for our parts in the events.

My son is now a student at university, though he doesn't know what he wants to do after school. He still has some issues with the psychological trauma of his life with Zack, but they're becoming fewer and fewer. He's healing. We stay in touch. I love him very much.

I'm a man of somewhat mathematical bent so I did some simple calculations that may surprise you:

Every year that I was the non-custodial parent I was able to spend about 58-59 days with my son. Less than 60 days out of every 365. Zack was able to spend over 300 with my son.

In the 11 years that I was the non-custodial parent I was with my son for just under 2 of them. I lost 9 years of his life. He lost 9 years of my contact.

That's half of his life to this point.

We lost half of his life.

This is why I have a problem when people tell me I'm "privileged" just by virtue of my being a male.

Get some time.

Editor's note: Subman blogs at Periscope Depth. –DE

Put down that gun, lady

John Hembling (JtO) · 9 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ladies, I have a question for all of you. In fact, this question is a big bigger than just me, casting about for an answer. It's a serious question, and needs a real answer. Indeed, it's a question other men in your life deserve an answer to, as well. However, unless any of the men in your life are MRAs (wouldn't you be lucky) then the non MRA men in your life are, in all probability not only too terrified to ask you, they are too terrified to even conceive of the question. Nevertheless, they deserve a real answer from you.

The question, ladies, is what are you doing about the gun in the room?

Of course this question by itself is going to need some unpacking. A vast majority of you ladies, when asked this question are likely to respond with some variation of "what gun?"

This is the metaphorical "gun" of proxy violence placed by the consensus of our culture in the hands of women, and pointed by that same consensus; squarely at men in any interaction they have with you, ladies.

The fact is that a woman can, by speaking a few words, summon violence in the form of police or other chivalry-practicing men. The simplest is an accusation of rape, or sexual assault. Downgrading the scale of possible response, sexual harassment, and so on. In our culture, this is a reliable method to summon and pointing that gun which every woman brings to every conversation with a man. There are some consequences to frivolous use of the gun, but compared to the consequences to the man, the fallout is minor.

In addition to this reality, even without an overt initiation of violence by proxy, an entire cast of characters will enact violence and coercion against men, on women's behalf, with no direct initiation by those women. Chivalry-practicing men, officers of the courts and family courts, social services employees and many other functionaries will, with even half justified reasoning destroy any man if it can plausibly be justified by the claimed fear of a woman perceived to be under threat.

This is the gun in the room. It is present in every interaction between any man and a woman. It's a gun pointed squarely at the neck of every man you have an interaction with. And ladies, the grip and trigger of that gun is placed, by cultural consensus, into your hand.

So what are you doing about that gun? What are you doing to put that gun away, to unload it, to take it off the table, and take the every present threat of violence and coercion out of your interactions with your male friend, your brother, and the man or men you may claim to love?

In fact, for what appears a majority of women, aside from an unstated threat of violence-by-proxy, women seem content to structure social and romantic relationships with men through a practical application of coercion and manipulation.

A review of dating advice, written by and for women will indicate a lot of fluffy, feel-good pseudo-new-age you go girl advice. It will also include a persistent thread of male-targeted coercion, psychological abuse, and continuous demeaning comparison to pets and livestock. A good man, boyfriend or husband, apparently is a servile, compliant one. And for those who don't keep to their assigned lesser station – "we" hope you like the dog-house, and sleeping alone, boy.

And for those who find themselves embroiled in the rolling cluster-frack constituting marriage 2.0, a set of problems exist which nobody seems willing to talk about, or attempt solving, except on "hate-sites" like AVfM. In the interest of clarity, Marriage needs defining before we can seriously address it. Many believe it is the legal union of two people (usually a man and a woman) by which they become a romantic partnership, or a family. This is the popular conception, and it is incorrect.

Although it is two people who form the partnership constituting a marriage, there is an invisible third party present in any such arrangement. This is the state, which manifests as police, social services, child “protection” agencies, legal interveners such as the Elizabeth Fry societies, the family court, and financial institutions who comply with decisions of the family court system. And all these collected entities – referred to by the shorthand of “the state” — are interested parties in the private union between the man and woman who willingly or not, find themselves married in the view of the law. But wait, willingly or not? This is the 21st century, nobody in the western gets married unless they want to.

Unfortunately, lengthy co-habitation of two people is treated in most jurisdictions as automatic marriage. This is simply the functionaries of the state inviting themselves to bring coercion and force into the private relationship of people who might otherwise be friends.

And the coercion and violence by proxy brought by the collected entities we refer to as “the state” is enacted almost exclusively on behalf of women, against men. This is the gun in the room. It’s the metaphorical pistol grip you placed in your hand, and aimed at every man you’re having lunch with today, or sleeping next to tonight.

And, ladies, you cannot have failed to notice the rising public rhetoric of peril from gender ideologues driving our culture’s narrative? On college campuses, we are told that rape culture is rampant. Every single male student is a serial rapist, just waiting to realize his potential. This of course enables the escalation of draconian star chamber policies for dealing with the most specious of sexual misconduct allegation, and the ever rising enforcement, of male criminalization and thought policing. All, apparently, for the alleged benefit of women. Those who are supposedly victimized by their own supreme sexual power.

This is the gun. You have it ladies, our culture has put it into your hands, and pointed it squarely at your male colleagues, your brothers, your sons, and at the guy you wish would get over his social awkwardness and ask you out already.

Why won’t he ask you out? Why are men so chickenshit? Why do men treat you like a bomb ready to explode at any moment?

Well, what are you doing about that gun in your hand?

You might think that gun is conferred into your hand, and pointed at your male colleagues and friends by our society’s unspoken consensus, by forces bigger than you, which you don’t control. So how can you possibly do anything?

There’s a number of things women can do about the gun in their hand, but if the solutions are provided by me, then any pursuit of de-escalation becomes simply a throwaway gesture, serving only to deflect the question, of what You are doing, about the gun in the room, on the table, and in your hand.

What are you capable of doing about that gun in your hand?

Don’t wait to be challenged by somebody looking down that barrel back at you.
You can start by acknowledging that it’s there.

How Many Saturday Night Live Writers Does It Take To Be Funny?

AVfM Video Source · 9 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We aren't sure how many Saturday Night Live writers it takes to write a funny skit, but it's pretty obviously more than they currently have. ⍰

Saturday Night Live, for our readers outside of North America, is a venerable comedy skit show on the National Broadcasting Company in the United States. It was once highly culturally relevant here, although these days almost everyone agrees the show is pretty lackluster anymore. Anyway, this weekend they made fun of the Men's Rights Movement, and just… wow. Not even one good zinger in the whole plodding skit. Good lord, if they were gonna make fun of us, do you think they could have come at least close to the broad side of the barn?

I could write a funnier parody of us all by myself–in fact, I'm pretty sure I already have, and more than once, actually.

That skit was about as funny as a skit showing Barack Obama eating watermelons and tap dancing. Or Sarah Palin raping children.

Here's a tip to the current crew of SNL writers: To do real satire, you've got to come close to showing you at least somewhat understand, and at least on some level have some small bit of sympathy for the person or people you're mocking; a recognition that they're human, that you may not like them but you do recognize they are human beings and not animals. Otherwise it just doesn't work.

In any case, I think Victor Zen has the best attitude here:

In the meantime, let's hope one of these days the SNL crew decides to learn something about what they're mocking it before trying to mock it. Oh, and be sure to subscribe to Victor Zen. He assures me personally that, if you do, he will not torture any kittens for at least one whole week! –DE

“Rape culture” fanatics don’t know what a culture is

Barbara Kay · 10 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In a recent edition of the Post, there is a very thoughtful and serious discussion of whether the phenomena of “rape culture” even exists. It will no doubt receive the usual stream of invective — accusations of trivializing rape, denying that sexual assaults occur, implying that women who drank too much deserved to be raped. Hardly real criticisms in any intellectual sense, but they will come.

These critics — that seems almost too kind a descriptor for them, but alas — don’t seem to understand that a denial of rape culture is not a denial that rape exists or an expression of indifference to the pain it causes its victims. The world is imperfect. Bad or disturbed people commit crimes, including rape; good, well-adjusted people don’t. My heart breaks for children killed by their guardians, and in a perfect world none ever would be, but even 100 children dead at the hands of their parents does not make Canada a child-killing culture, or anyone who’d say so a child-murder denier.

Indeed, the more closely one follows the increasingly hysterical volleys of rhetorical fire back and forth on this issue, the more apparent it becomes that those who speak of a rape culture don’t understand what the word “culture” actually means. To result in a “culture,” a phenomenon must be widely accepted as the norm. It is culturally normal in some countries for women to be virtual chattels, governed by patriarchal standards of honour; to be married against their will; to meet blame from their kinsmen and indifference or even hostility at law enforcement and court levels when reporting sexual assault; to be shunned as unmarriageable — or worse — for the “shame” of having been raped, and so forth. There we can legitimately speak of a “rape culture.”

Here, where women are socially and legally equal to men, official sympathy for rape victims at every institutional level has created a climate so overwhelmingly sympathetic to female victims of sexual abuse that the emerging cultural danger is injustice to falsely alleged perpetrators. We are gripped by a baseless, but pandemic, moral panic in which significant collateral damage is beginning to pile up.

Moral panic fuelled by ideology and righteous indignation quickly corrodes the critical faculties and blinds even otherwise intelligent people to objective facts. The numbers on campus rape don’t even come close to the famous “one in four” [women on campus are victims of rape or attempted rape], even taking into consideration unreported rates (i.e. multiplying reported rapes by 10, or even 100).

Where did that figure come from anyway? From bowdlerized research.

It began in1982, when Mary Koss, then a professor of psychology at Kent State University in Ohio, published an article on rape in which she expressed the orthodox — and remarkably misandric – feminist theory that “rape represents an extreme behavior but one that is on a continuum with normal male behavior within the culture.”

Koss undertook a survey whereby she arrived at the one-in-four figure. To get there, Koss mischaracterized responses. For example, 73% of those she characterized as rape victims said they had not been raped. And 43% of the alleged victims said they had continued to date their alleged rapists. Nevertheless, the one-in-four meme took hold. The survey was published in Ms Magazine in 1987 and “took the universities by storm,” producing what can rightly be termed a rape-culture industry: expensive, over-staffed rape-crisis centres, hotlines, rallies, conferences, sexual-assault procedures consultancies and inter-collegiate sexual-assault networks.

You can produce any culture you like if you dumb deviancy down. If you change “against her will” to “without her consent,” as we have, that is a huge paradigm shift from what we used to think of as rape: i.e. forced sex. And if a drunk woman can’t give her consent, another moved goalpost, she is ipso facto raped.

Last word to brilliant feminist (the kind I like) Camille Paglia: “The feminist obsession with rape as a symbol of male-female relations is irrational and delusional. From the perspective of the future, this period in America will look like a reign of mass psychosis, like that of the Salem witch trials … The fantastic fetishism of rape by mainstream … feminists has in the end trivialized rape, impugned women's credibility, and reduced the sympathy we should feel for legitimate victims of violent sexual assault."

Amen to that, sister.

Editor's note: this item originally printed in The National Post.

The Wisdom of Odysseus

Peter Wright · 10 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The story of Odysseus' confrontation with the Sirens was written almost 3000 years ago, but remains as instructive for men today as is was back then – the message being to resist our primal urges and opt for the more rational approach.

The scene takes place during an ocean voyage where Odysseus and his crew are assailed by sweet-singing Sirens who come disguised as beautiful young women with the aim of deceiving them. By singing beautiful songs the Sirens would lure sailors to shipwreck on the rocky coast of their island, after which they would kill the men and feast on their flesh. In a demonstration of MGTOW ingenuity, Odysseus advises his crew to put wax in their ears, and has himself tied to the ship's mast to stop him being lured into the Sirens' trap.

The Sirens were later encountered by the Argonauts who passed by unharmed with the help of the musician Orpheus who drowned out the Siren's bewitching songs with his own music. The Sirens were so distressed to see a man hear their song and yet escape, that they threw themselves into the sea and drowned. – PW

* * *

THE ODYSSEY, BOOK XII – Translated by Samuel Butler

The Goddess Circe advises Odysseus about the deadly Sirens

"'So far so good,' said she, 'and now pay attention to what I am about to tell you—heaven itself, indeed, will recall it to your recollection. First you will come to the Sirens who enchant all who come near them. If any one unwarily draws in too close and hears the singing of the Sirens, his wife and children will never welcome him home again, for they sit in a green field and warble him to death with the sweetness of their song. There is a great heap of dead men's bones lying all around, with the flesh still rotting off them. Therefore pass these Sirens by, and stop your men's ears with wax that none of them may hear; but if you like you can listen yourself, for you may get the men to bind you as you stand upright on a cross piece half way up the mast, and they must lash the rope's ends to the mast itself, that you may have the pleasure of listening. If you beg and pray the men to unloose you, then they must bind you faster…

“Here she ended, and dawn enthroned in gold began to show in heaven, whereon she returned inland. I then went on board and told my men to loose the ship from her moorings; so they at once got into her, took their places, and began to smite the grey sea with their oars. Presently the great and cunning goddess Circe befriended us with a fair wind that blew dead aft, and staid steadily with us, keeping our sails well filled, so we did whatever wanted doing to the ship’s gear, and let her go as wind and helmsman headed her.

“Then, being much troubled in mind, I said to my men, ‘My friends, it is not right that one or two of us alone should know the prophecies that Circe has made me, I will therefore tell you about them, so that whether we live or die we may do so with our eyes open. First she said we were to keep clear of the Sirens, who sit and sing most beautifully in a field of flowers; but she said I might hear them myself so long as no one else did. Therefore, take me and bind me to the crosspiece half way up the mast; bind me as I stand upright, with a bond so fast that I cannot possibly break away, and lash the rope’s ends to the mast itself. If I beg and pray you to set me free, then bind me more tightly still.’

“I had hardly finished telling everything to the men before we reached the island of the Sirens, for the wind had been very favourable. Then all of a sudden it fell dead calm; there was not a breath of wind nor a ripple upon the water, so the men furled the sails and stowed them; then taking to their oars they whitened the water with the foam they raised in rowing. Meanwhile I look a large wheel of wax and cut it up small with my sword. Then I kneaded the wax in my strong hands till it became soft, which it soon did between the kneading and the rays of the sun-god son of Hyperion. Then I stopped the ears of all my men, and they bound me hands and feet to the mast as I stood upright on the cross piece; but they went on rowing themselves. When we had got within earshot of the land, and the ship was going at a good rate, the Sirens saw that we were getting in shore and began with their singing.

The Sirens call to Odysseus

“‘Come here,’ they sang, ‘renowned Odysseus, honour to the Achaean name, and listen to our voices. No one ever sailed past us without staying to hear the enchanting sweetness of our song—and he who listens will go on his way not only charmed, but wiser, for we know all the ills that the gods laid upon the Argives and Trojans before Troy, and can tell you everything that is going to happen over the whole world.’

“They sang these words most musically, and as I longed to hear them further I made signs by frowning to my men that they should set me free; but they quickened their stroke, and Eurylochus and Perimedes bound me with still stronger bonds till we had got out of hearing of the Sirens’ voices. Then my men took the wax from their ears and unbound me.

Men, Math, and Masculinity – Part 1

Thomas Impelluso · 10 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Can one attribute the low rankings of women in engineering to feminist inspired interventions?

Is it possible that by attempting to eradicate a non-critical advantage in math, that we are distilling math and engineering education for both boys and girls?

Bertrand Russell once said: "Mathematics is the field where we don't know what we are talking about." This reveals the nature of mathematics – which is distinct from the machinery called arithmetic (which is taught in elementary school). Mathematics is an abstract discipline, relying on internal visualization and abstract focus.

Recent research has shown that women have more neurons that travel between the brain's hemispheres and men have more neurons that travel along the hemispheres.[1] Some suggest this enables a woman's communication and multi-tasking skills (I rarely see published articles that object to these abilities in women), and men have a greater ability to focus and single task (I usually see published articles that object to these abilities of men).

Men created the language of math through visualization and abstraction. In addition to the aforementioned biological differences, there is social research to indicate that the top one percent in math will always be male dominated.[2] And it is this one percent that gives rise to the thirty point difference in math SAT scores.

But does this gender difference at that top level matter? Are current interventions failing because they are inordinately focused on a percentage that has little relevance (except to feminist ego)?

The top one percent in mathematical ability does not drive science, engineering and technology; they populate math departments. The top twenty-percent in math drives civilization and women are capable of thriving and excelling at that level. I contend that women drop out in greater numbers from engineering than they normally would have if, instead, they were not given false assurance through current "Girl Engineer" programs; or if the pedagogy had been properly constructed to draw them into the top twenty, ten or five percent; or if we did not create artificial silos between the sub-disciplines of math to enable assessment strategies. I believe that if proposed redresses are premised on "misogyny," the fix will fail. Mathematicians and engineers do not have a problem with women, today. It is politically correct interventions that have a problem with the nature of math and engineering.

In part, I believe that the very thing that will inhibit women from advancing in engineering is society's diminishing respect for aspects of the masculine mind and a feminism that has migrated from a focus on social equality and now insists on biological equality.

Men dissect; and this is a reflection of the very masculinity that current popular discourse disparages. Popular media views men as cold for their desire to "conquer" and "dominate" the observable world. The popular discourse prefers a holistic understanding of the world. And it has dulled the distinction between magic and beauty, undermining one aspect of the masculine brain.

When I see a rainbow, I want to slice it open, analyze it and understand it from a perspective grounded in mathematical physics. I want to dissect it as if it were an object (e.g. Why are the colors reversed in the internal secondary rainbow in a double rainbow?). Contemporary talk-show culture paints this as if I am objectifying the rainbow, and that I should simply relax and appreciate its spiritual magic: I have been told as such and by women ("Can't you just enjoy the beauty of a rainbow?"). I claim, however, that my curiosity is my way of trying to understand the physical world that surrounds me. Magical mysticism is lazy; beauty reveals itself through cold understanding.

The top one percent in math is male dominated because of the male brain, and this will likely never change. The few women in the top one percent think like men. Sophie Germain (April 1, 1776 – June 27, 1831) admitted to dressing like a man to attend the French Academy to make her contributions to engineering. A feminist would suggest she did this to circumvent the patriarchy. I suggest she blossomed in male culture. When a man suggests that to succeed in math, a woman should think like a man, he is rebuked. But what is wrong with thinking like a man? I have no objection when the media insists that my compassion derives from my feminine nature. I take that in stride. So what is the problem with accepting that math/focus/abstraction derive from masculinity? When did it become an insult to think like a man?

The top twenty percent of men and women can excel in mathematical applications in science and engineering but academic feminists and policy makers have become fixated on the top one percent. Google "math, boys, girls, scores" and see hundreds of funded research papers that purport to explain a thirty point difference in math scores. Does this difference really matter considering that those thirty points are attributed to the top one percent? Whenever women excel over men in any discipline, their virtues are extolled in the media. When men excel over women, the media paints this as a bad problem that must be fixed — and now we are "fixing" engineering by simplifying math.

The institutions driving change in mathematics education are reducing mathematics down to machinery and algorithm in an attempt to close a slight gender gap. In the process, they are making math boring and this will have ramifications in later years. They are meeting with some partial success. Girls excel at the machinery of calculations: division, subtraction, algorithms, numerical methods, integration and so on – what we know as arithmetic. But then the abstract nature of math reveals itself as essential as their studies advance. Then, in reaction, women start to drop out of engineering when they see a false advantage evaporate. Society blames misogyny for this.

I am in awe of mathematicians, for they evince one aspect of masculinity in its cold detachment from reality and its embrace of abstraction. I am not in that top one percent: and I am fine with that. But I find those men as inspiring as chess players (there are also papers that try to explain the disparity in chess, too; none of which make any sense). There is an anecdote from the life of Linus Pauling; He was delivering a guest lecture and after scrawling theoretical mathematics all over three blackboards, a student raised his hand and pointed out that 7 times 8 had been multiplied wrong in one of the earlier steps. Pauling just waved away the fact that the numerical conclusion was obviously not accurate. Pauling's answer was, "Oh, that error, yes; it does not matter; numbers are just placeholders for the concept."

The solution in engineering is to raise expectations. Instead, we are doing the opposite. We are lowering the bar on math by eliminating the abstraction; and we have practically deleted physics from the elementary school curriculum. And we are doing this to eradicate a gap in math that stems from the top one percent. We are no longer inspiring and challenging our better students. The goal should not be to ensure that girls score as well as boys at that distal end – let nature take its course, there, without interventions. The goal should be to create interventions that retain more girls in the top ten or twenty percent while continuing to inspire the boys. And this could be done with interactive technologies if feminism relaxed the stranglehold of its obsession on the top one percent.

Society today condemns the very masculinity that created mathematics. The Asian countries, less riddled with politically toxic academic and common feminism, are out-performing the world in math, while the more feminist countries are failing in math. One does not have to embrace the misogyny of eastern culture; but by the same token, the west has embraced a misandry.

Today, we are reducing math to word games. Common Core Math in the U.S. is a perfect example of this: it is reducing math to verbal skills. In the future, girls will soon excel over boys in math (which, of course, will not really be math: just exaggerated arithmetic). But then girls will get to college and confront the wall of abstraction without teachers who can inspire them with a detached (and, yes) masculine perspective. Naturally, the politically correct will blame male custodians or male bus drivers or a campus rape culture or maybe they will turn on male fruit flies down in the biology labs, and blame them. Many more boys will never get to college: they will fail out of it, never having learned the abstract underpinnings of math. (The new SAT will actually reduce the number of math questions and increase the number of verbal questions.) But I suppose that will make the politically correct happy, for then there will be total equality: NO men in the top ten percent and NO women in the top ten percent. Feminists will get what they wanted: a country of total math and engineering equality: zero = zero. Meanwhile, China, and its excess of two hundred million men will dominate technology.

AN ANECDOTAL ASIDE:

Engineering has two aspects: SYNTHETIC and ANALYTIC.Synthetic goes by the name ENGINEERING DESIGN.Analytic goes by the name APPLIED MATH AND ENGINEERING SCIENCE.
Today elementary schools are trying to teach engineering. But in reality, they are teaching Engineering Design, only: build Lego Robots, toothpick bridges, etc.; and then write reports and project plans. The girls excel. The boys don't. This is because "design" hinges on collaboration and communication: verbal and communication skills.

However, future engineering will derive from APPLIED MATH AND ENGINEERING SCIENCE. We need the math to create new microscopic machines and quantum computing and robotics. And the girls have been deluded into thinking that engineering is about communication and not math. It is not that girls cannot do this, but that policy makers do not know what engineering is really about. They think they are inspiring girls; but they are inspiring with only half the picture. And when the girls fail, feminists will blame misogyny and male exclusion practices.

Some men have excluded women from engineering; but that type of misogyny is now nearly non-existent and not enough to warrant interventions. Contrary to what some think, men do not exclude women from engineering; men seek a place to call their own (a distinction between cause and effect). Today, spaces for men are vanishing while spaces for women continue to blossom. Rather than interpret male resistance to female engineers as a negative view of women, why not consider it a self-indulgent desire for a male space? Then, upon recognizing that, and curtailing the negative stereotypes of male spaces, maybe men will be more inviting to women in engineering. What do feminists want anyway: to change men and destroy all male space (even disallowing sixth grade boys to pee in their own bathrooms), or to understand the issue and help women? These days, it appears to be the former. Consider the discipline of dynamics.

When I was in the fourth grade, boys learned to pee while standing. We often made a mess (boys are always in motion, fighting with the world, it seems), but the custodians were paid to clean the mess.

To understand dynamics (the study of motion), one must brutally sever an object from its surroundings. Then, one must replace all formally contacting objects with forces. This is the essence of Newton's third law.

I remember, one time, this one kid peed out of the third floor window. That afternoon, the boys kept laughing in class and we all got in trouble because no one wanted to snitch.

This process is called the creation of "free body diagrams." It is not holistic, it is not integral. It is brutal rupture of an object from its environment, enabling one to focus on it exclusively.

The boys would compete against each other as we aimed our streams, like rockets launching from a silo.

Then, after such isolation, one employs the discipline of differential equations to model the trajectory of an object. Naturally, it is not entirely accurate: it is only a model aimed at a prediction.

Often, we would joke with each other. Sometimes, we made fun of each other. Sometimes we deliberately aimed at each other. But eventually, we learned to pee while standing.

Then, one must solve the differential equations. In reality, one could inspect the terms and anticipate the motion, but today students drive blindly and relentlessly to get a number and overlook the beauty of the predictive quality of equations. We turn to computer programs that circumcise the complicated equations to obtain an answer (an answer that is often sterile and meaningless: just a number). Today, students turn to computer programs to get an answer in order to do well on a test. But in that process, a deeper understanding of the phenomena never emerges.

We boys learned to pee by watching each other and getting a little jealous of each other's aim. Maybe, sometimes, we were jealous of that one kid's parabolic fluid trajectory out the window.

You see, one does not need to solve every equation. In reality, one can inspect equations and deduce their "tendencies." One could see, from looking at equations, that the "tendency" of an equation is to reveal a behavior. But engineers are losing the ability to "envision" the "tendency" of equations as we continue to sterilize math in order to check bubbles on an exam. Today, students are expected not to act until they know they have a direct hit on the computational solution and a numerical result.

The process of not solving the equations for complete solutions, but using them to extract information, is a critical aspect of engineering focus – and is being lost. In the past, one did this by sketching a solution on the back of an envelope, often in a sloppy way.

Lately, I have come to find out that in some schools, the boys are told not to pee while standing until they first learn to pee properly. This is humiliating for them; for they are indirectly told that the boy's room is not for them alone (it's bad enough there are so few male spaces; now even the men's room does not belong to them). They are lectured on how to be boys and are expected to be boys on the terms of a custodial staff.

To help the girls, we are removing the detached abstraction of math and replacing it with a simplistic arithmetic of word games that are more suitable for girls and their communication skills.

Much worse, the very ability of boys to get down and dirty with math is being "fixed." The walls of disciplines – strictly enforced for testing and evaluation (but not for learning) – discourage the ability and/or desire to question the legitimacy of physical models. Who would want to question a model if the teacher might incorrectly assume your question is one of ignorance and not insight?

So that is why I tell my son to pee while standing despite what the school says. For the goal is not the end. To pee while standing is irrelevant; the goal is to learn how to pee while standing (to learn how to do what men do, with other boys): the goal is a process, not an end. The goal is to aim, to miss, to reload, to aim better, to make the attempt at a solution, to splatter the floor, to abandon one method, to learn that the world will not end if there is urine on a wall, to reload, to pee out the window and watch the parabolic flow of fluid, to get a partial solution, to break a barrier and finally hit the target. And if the school has an issue with how boys learn, they can remind the custodians and teachers that they work for the students, not the other way around. It's a toilet, not a boy.

Let the boys be boys, again. We have already ensured social interventions to respect a woman when she says "no". Now it is time to back off from the endless vilification of men for a while and tell the feminists to take a step back from the continued vilification of things masculine. Let the boys have their recess, let them shoot things (and study trajectories of imagined bullets or urine), let them fling mud or footballs; yes, even let them be slightly aggressive. Otherwise, we should learn to speak Chinese.

References:

[1] Madhura Ingalhalikar, et. al. Sex differences in the structural connectome of the human brain, PNAS vol.111 no.2, 9/2013
[2] Benbow, et. al. Sex Differences in Mathematical Reasoning, American Psychological Society, Vol.11, No.6, 11/2000

Editor's note: Feature image by DonkeyHotey

Update: Professor Impelluso was, not long after publication of this article, subjected to a campaign of lies, harassment, and abuse from Gender Ideologues on Facebook and other sites run by hateful ideological bullies. That gave rise to his writing a reasoned response, which you may want to also read. See Men, Math, and Masculinity, Part 2. –DE*

Are Women Raising Sonsbands?

AVfM Video Source · 10 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Willie Havmire has some thoughts here on something that will undoubtedly offend a lot of people, but actually describes reality for millions of single mothers and their sons:

AVfM Editor-at-Large Erin Pizzey has a term for what Havmire describes here this which is even more hard on the ears: “emotional incest.” It’s when a mother uses her son to fulfill not just her economic needs but even her emotional needs. It doesn’t literally mean physical incest, but EMOTIONAL; the relationship she wants to have with an adult man she tries to hold out through him, and this warps both her and more importantly, him as the child. It’s a sad cycle but it’s real, and more people should recognize it and try to correct it, not out of shaming people per se but in loving them enough to make them look at the truth.

This video is sure to spark some discussion that’s for sure. We’ll look forward to seeing what else Willie Havmire has to say.

Schools that punish boys for doing the right thing

Jonathan Taylor · 11 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What does the concept of discipline mean to you? Better yet, what does it mean to be a disciplined person? I'll offer a rough description.

A self-disciplined person is often one who self-regulates their behavior in the pursuit of a balanced and civilized life for themselves and others. When someone in authority disciplines someone, the theory is that the punishment will teach them to self-regulate their behavior and set up a pattern of "doing the right thing" of their own accord.

I'll go out on a limb and say that this is common-sense. Apparently some people have forgotten this concept, however. Even worse, they are in charge of our children.

There appears to be a perverse and disturbing trend among some schools to punish students – mostly boys, apparently – for doing what most of us would consider the right course of action. Sometimes the punishments are quite severe. While teachers and administrators do this in the name of "discipline," what they are really doing is teaching students to distrust and fear those in authority, which actually works against the goals of discipline.

I have two stories for readers today. The first concerns an 11 year-old boy in Chicago. From an article at Opposing Views (my comments are interspersed):

> An 11-year-old boy, Caden Cook, was suspended from school for voluntarily turning in a non-firing plastic toy gun to school personnel.

And let's be clear about this: he didn't give up the toy gun because he was asked to. He wasn't even asked. He gave it to school personnel before they even knew he had it.

Continuing:

> Frederick Funston Elementary School in Chicago instituted a random pat-down screening procedure as part of its security at the beginning of the school year, reports The Rutherford Institute, which has come to Cook's defense in the matter.

Something about the idea of security officers ritually performing a pat-down of 11 year-olds seems out of place. Is aggravated assault really that much of a problem among prepubescent/borderline pubescent children? Are schools now like prisons, where we have to constantly search their persons and property for fear that kids might bring in a shiv or something?

Something just tells me that this is extremely disrespectful of the kids.

> All students are physically separated from their bags and randomly chosen for pat-downs before going through metal detectors. Bags are also searched at random.
>
> Caden Cook, a sixth-grader, had forgotten he held a plastic toy gun he had played with the previous night in his sweater pocket while waiting in line at school security. He alerted school security personnel, explained he accidentally brought the toy gun to school and relinquished it to security.

This is what zero-tolerance policies look like in practice, folks.

> "This case speaks volumes about what's wrong with our public schools and public officials: Rather than school officials showing they are capable of exercising good judgment, distinguishing between what is and is not a true threat, and preserving safety while steering clear of a lockdown mindset better suited to a prison environment, they instead opted to exhibit poor judgment, embrace heavy-handed tactics, and treat a toy gun like a > dangerous weapon," said John W. Whitehead, president of The Rutherford Institute.

Caden Cook was also forced to undergo counseling by the school. But that begs the question: exactly how is counseling supposed to help Caden modify his behavior, other than teaching him to walk on eggshells in fear of suspension for what he may have forgotten this or that day? Is the counseling intended to help him come to terms with his punishment, so that he can somehow come around to the idea that administrators "did the right thing"?

I have no doubt Caden needs counseling, but not because he needs to learn how to respect authority. Rather, he needs to be counseled that far too often those in authority simply lose their minds and act without discretion, sometimes at the same time that children like himself take responsibility and initiative and act like adults.

He also needs to be told that this entire ordeal is not his fault. Accidents happen, and he's just a kid.

I am ashamed to say that this next comes from my home state of Texas. This boy was suspended and sent to alternative school for two months for telling a teacher he accidentally packed a beer for lunch. From an article from ABC News:

> Christi Seale says her 17-year-old son Chaz accidentally confused a beer can for a soda can and packed it in his lunch.
>
> "He was in a hurry, running late. We were talking about school and he put it all together and took off for school," she said.
>
> When he realized his mistake at school, Chaz gave the unopened beer to his teacher. But that teacher then reported it to the principal at Livingston High School, who suspended the boy for three days and then sent him to an alternative school for two months.

A lot can be said about this next statement:

> Chaz said, "I gave it to the teacher, thinking I wouldn't get in trouble, and I got in trouble."

And he learned from his mistake.

Chaz didn't just "get in trouble," however. He didn't just get a "stern talking to." He got two months of alternative school for not drinking a beer he accidentally brought to school, and instead reporting his accident to the teacher.

Welcome to modern education, where a 9 year-old boy can be suspended for calling a teacher "cute," a student can be suspended for sexual harassment for hugging a teacher out of gratitude for breaking up a fight, and other students can be suspended and placed in alternative school for acting like responsible adults and informing education personnel of the relatively harmless property they accidentally brought to class.

That's insane. It's also unacceptable.

And we wonder why kids are being alienated from our school system.

Editorial note: this item originally appeared on A Voice for Male Students. –DE

Military Justice Improvement Act Fails, But Won't Die

Michael Conzachi · 11 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Last Thursday, the Military Justice Improvement Act (MJIA) failed in the Senate on a 55-45 vote, 5 votes shy necessary for passage. But have no doubts: although this legislation did not have sufficient votes to proceed to the House, there will be additional attempts to push similar legislation through. We can count on modifications and with members of both parties grandstanding on this issue, some form of military justice changes will eventually be made.

Just minutes before I submitted this article for editing, the Senate voted 97-0 to abolish the century old "good soldier defense" in sexual assault cases in the military. The new legislation would change the military rules of evidence to prohibit the accused from using good military character as an element of his defense in court-martial proceedings unless it was directly relevant to the alleged crime. The "good soldier defense" could encompass a defendant's military record of reliability, dependability, professionalism and reputation as an individual who could be counted on in war and peacetime:

Senator Claire McCaskill, the primary proponent of this change described it as "the ridiculous notion that how well one flies a plane should have anything to do with whether they committed a crime." That is true but the Senator missed a fact in that ability is not a component in this change. It has to do with character, honesty, and integrity. This proposal will now move onto the House.

I suspect that many members of the military, veterans, NCFM & AVFM readers and constitutional advocates contacted their respective legislators and asked them to vote against this bill, not because they are rape apologists, but rather because this bill was so far removed from basic due process and constitutional protections.

That's not stopping those in the Senate from chipping away at every original proposal in the first draft of the act. Little by little, these changes will be implemented. Some command authority has already been removed, and the statute of limitations for sexual assault cases in the military has been eliminated. We may now see cases coming out of WWII and Korea.

As I have reported on in the past, this legislative proposal was sparked by what many have said is an "epidemic" of sexual assault in the military. This so called "epidemic," was based on an anonymous Department of Defense Survey that claims that there were approximately 26,000 sexual assaults in the military during fiscal year 2012.

One part is true, the survey was in fact anonymous, but it was conducted by the Defense Manpower Data Center (DMDC) a separate component of the Department of Defense. Their website at the time of the writing of this article indicated that their security certificate was not valid. Their website does not list any names, contact information or phone numbers. Why their security certificate is invalid at this time is unknown. Who are they and what is their function is unknown.

A copy of the 600 page report and survey was obtained through a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request and can be found here: "2012 Workplace and Gender Relations, Survey of Active Duty Members, Tabulation of Responses."

There were also several other organizations who took part in the formulation and analysis of the survey including defense contractor SRA International . Public records reveal that SRA International was paid approximately a half million dollars for this survey. Preliminary information, pending the compliance of an additional FOIA request reveals that SRA International, has spent substantial sums of money on political candidates and lobbying, and has been the recipient of nearly $500 million dollars in defense contracts primarily for conducting "surveys," since 2002.

One has to suspect that any survey conducted by the U.S. Government and its contractors is driven to arrive at a pre-determined outcome. The figures of 26,000 cases of sexual assault are an extrapolated figure based on the number of satisfactory responses received; essentially it's a guess.

What was counted in the figure were actual cases of sexual assault, sexual harassment, and what is described as "gender-related behaviors" such as asking someone out on a date who didn't want to be asked, adjusting yourself; virtually anything that is offensive to anyone, primarily females. This figure included time periods up to one year prior to the service member entering military service.

The actual reported figure was approximately 3,500 cases that included everything; sexual assault, harassment and gender related behaviors resulting in approximately 300 courts martial convictions, and another 1,100 sanctions through non judicial punishment (Article 15).

This epidemic that many are repeating ad nausea is fiction. Any politician, reporter, advocate, or anyone else to infer that our nation's military is infested with uncontrollable sexual predators should be embarrassed and ashamed of themselves. I challenge those who make this claim to offer an apology to our military, and I have never seen such a lack of integrity, and a level of ignorance on the part of some of elected leaders who repeat this information as if it were accurate.

What has also been repeated are the claims that most victims do not report incidents? Some of that might be true in that it is usually the case with male victims. But the claims that 90% of victims do not report it are utterly ridiculous and there is no way to validate that figure. As they survey indicates, some alleged victims were not aware or did not consider that certain acts were violations, so they didn't report them.

If you go onto the websites of every military instillation, there are large tabs and links that go right to the offices that handle cases of sexual assault and harassment. In fact, the survey reflects that 96% of all military members are fully aware of the resources available to victims of sexual assault and harassment, and have had specialized training sessions and briefings on sexual assault and harassment.

Do sexual assaults, harassment, and offensive behavior occur in the military? Of course they do and no one is going to deny that. Do they happen in such great numbers that they must be classified as an "epidemic?" Absolutely not, nor does this require sweeping legislative reform that discriminates and is constitutionally defective. Should we convict violators and rid the military of sexual predators? Absolutely! Should it be done in a manner that violates constitutional protections and due process? Absolutely not!

If Gillibrand and her angry, hysterical, and ravenous supporters get their way, an allegation alone, void of any other verifying information will initiate a process that will be disastrous for any military member.

During WWII, General George Patton made a statement that rings true to this day. He commented that some politicians would wipe their ass with the American flag if would get them a few more votes. Do we see a pattern here?

There were a number of provisions in the MJIA however the emphasis was focused on the sexual assault component. Other serious crimes were covered in the proposed legislation and there were a number of amendments. The reader's digest version and amendments would codify the following changes with respect to allegations of sexual assault, sexual harassment, and "gender-related behaviors." Some of these changes have already been implemented in unrelated legislation.

- Expansion of definitions of sexual assault and harassment.
- Elimination of the statute of limitations for sexual assault cases.
- Criminalization of "gender-related behaviors."
- Elimination of command authority in sexual assault & harassment cases.
- Elimination of commander's ability to overturn a wrongful conviction.
- Eliminate accused's ability to challenge wrongful or dishonorable discharges, or loss of benefits.
- Eliminate accused's ability to offer positive character references or superior service records in any proceeding involving sexual assault or harassment.

- Virtual elimination of cross examination of alleged victims of sexual assault in probable cause (Article 32) hearings.
- Immediate referral of alleged offenders to courts martial by severe restrictions in probable cause determination hearings.
- Provide sanctions for uninvolved third parties such as non-commissioned officers and commissioned officers in the chain of command.
- Provide expanded and additional advocates for sexual assault victims above and beyond what is provided now such as medical and counseling personnel, advocates of various types including religious counselors and advocates, and assigning personal attorneys to alleged victims.
- NO wording, provisions or sanctions for false allegations, false accusers, or anyone who provides false information, who may or may not be alleged victims of sexual assault or harassment.

What Gillibrand, her co-sponsors and supporters are trying to accomplish is to expand what constitutes an offense, remove command oversight of any type, send sexual assault, harassment and offensive behavior cases directly to courts martial, to limit an accused's ability to offer an affirmative defense, to place evidentiary restrictions on the accused, to severely limit and in some cases eliminate the appeals process and discharge status, and to provide sanctions for uninvolved third parties regardless if they had knowledge of the incident or not.

During all of Gillibrand's and her cohorts comments, grandstanding and parading of victims, she and the others have not uttered a syllable, word, or has given any attention or voice to those who have been falsely accused, nor the problems they have faced or will face in the future.

Within the past week, two high profile Army cases are in the news. At Fort Bragg NC, Brigadier General Jeffrey Sinclair is being court martialed for sex related offenses involving a subordinate. What gets missing from most mainstream news media outlets is that his accuser claims that the General forced her into sex acts and threatened to kill her family, but even after those allegedly occurred, his accuser continued to send sex filled text messages to him. Does that sound like someone whose credibility is in question? To top that off, the judge in the case has ruled that there was undue command influence in the case, as evidence was kept from the defense until the last minute.

Also in the last week the Army's top sexual assault prosecutor, Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Morse was relieved of duty as a result of allegations of groaping by a female JAG attorney which occurred more than two years ago. Given all of the resources of reporting, the confidentiality, the advocates, the investigative resources, and what should be known to the female JAG attorney; why did she wait two years before reporting the incident? And why was this announced the same day that the Senate was voting on the MJIA? More than likely, LTC Morse's career in the Army is over, and his employment prospects in the public sector will be affected.

Is everyone starting to see the pattern of inflaming the public with the shrills of an "epidemic," salacious allegations and inaccurate reporting?

Like any other ill-conceived legislation, certain types of legislation morph from their original legislative intent. If this legislation passes in any similar form, an unsubstantiated allegation of any type will result in sanction, discharge, and/or conviction.

A life altering and lifetime event for those caught up in the hysteria of an invented and manufactured "epidemic."

There is no arguing that incidents occur and problems arise in the chain of command, but to turn portions of the Uniform Code of Military Justice into a college kangaroo court to satisfy the delusional ranting's of special interest groups and political grandstanding will further decimate the morale and effectiveness of the military; a process that has been in steady decline in the past 5+ years.

Readers are urged to contact their respective political representatives and ask them to vote no on the Military Justice Improvement Act or any version of the act that is sure to be re-introduced at a later time. We must deal with facts, logic and common sense solutions, and so must our legislators. As this affects our national security, we cannot rely on misinformation, contrived, manufactured, and inaccurate statistical data, hysteria, and political grandstanding.

Please refer your Representatives and your Senators to this article and others that have been posted for those facts.

Useful PDFs:

2012 DoD Survey Report Tabulations of Responses & Questions

2013-12-15 NCFM FOIA Request DoD Survey

Military Justice Improvement Act Bill Description

Guns for Domestic Violence Accusers in Kentucky

Ron Collins · 11 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Kentucky's Lexington Herald-Leader has recently reported:

> FRANKFORT, Ky. — Domestic violence victims in Kentucky could gain quick access to temporary concealed weapons permits under a bill that passed the House after emotional debate Friday.Abuse victims receiving court-issued protective orders meant to keep their assailants away would be eligible for the 45-day concealed carry permits. Supporters said the short-term permits would provide a measure of self-protection at a time when victims can feel most vulnerable.
>
> …The bill [House Bill 351] cleared the House on a 79-13 vote. It goes to the Senate, which is considering similar legislation.

House Bill 351 is hardly a "gun-control" measure. Far from it. Nor can it credibly be called a measure to "prevent violence." Indeed, this may be the first case in US history where guns and domestic violence have been addressed together by a legislature in the sense of arming alleged victims rather than dis-arming alleged abusers. It strains credulity to see this as a means to less violence, or as a path to the safer presence of guns.

The contingencies of how this law will affect both guns and violence in Kentucky are almost too numerous to list. But it makes for strange bedfellows to imagine the largely campus-feminist, anti-patriarchy DV professions, and the flag-waving, God & country gun rights community, actually working in common to reduce domestic violence by means of a kind of State-sanctioned vigilantism, to transform an individual's unproven status of victimhood into an armed sentry-post on the front lines in the fight against domestic violence.

So many nightmare scenarios arise, it is hard to know which ones to highlight:

- Most obvious is the urging of inexperienced weapons handlers into a belief that "a gatt in the hand means the world by the tail" (spoken by Humphrey Bogart in The Big Sleep). The inherent threats to bystanders, children, family members, police, and shooters themselves, are familiar to anyone with basic firearms knowledge.

- As protective orders are not criminal convictions, innocent people may well be gunned down with the State's pre-approval, never having been arrested, indicted, tried or convicted for anything, nor any evidence having arisen other than one person's hearsay that any crime had ever occurred at all.

- The strain on service providers is potentially enormous: shelter employees, attorneys, counselors, educators, social workers, transitional housing management, medical staff, truly anyone in contact with the one under the Court's protection, now faces the unknown of whether their client is armed or not, and what may ensue in their presence if she or he is.

- Protective orders, once a crime-prevention tool, have morphed into a crime-entrapment device by prosecutors who know they cannot convict on DV charges lacking evidence, and who use the orders to ensure that almost anything the party named in the order does (going home, seeing his children, shopping in the same store, earning a living in the same workplace, etc.) is potentially a new crime that a jury indeed can convict on. This measure now recruits the protected party, not only to presume a threat by someone they may well have already made homeless, childless and unemployable, but further to respond to that threat with lethal force and be assured in advance of impunity. (See: "Criminal Law Comes Home" by Jeannie Suk)

- Domestic violence intervention tends largely to be geared toward a presumption that "the vast majority of victims are women." Even if this utter myth were true, what of the male "minority?" Men presumably may seek this same protective device of a court order plus a concealed-carry status, but is society prepared for men gunning down women with the State's approval, and thereupon acquitted of (or never charged with) criminal actions by the State? Could any effort being made for better provisions serving male victims of DV ever recover from even one such occurrence?

- The potential for judges, prosecutors and even the State government being held as accessories to violent crimes, or respondents to wrongful-injury or -death suits, is uncharted territory. If a shooting occurs under these conditions and the evidence says the shooter was in no immediate danger at the time, will the court that gave essential permission to fire upon a named individual then reverse itself and find the shooter guilty of a crime, or will it protect its own interests by letting her/him walk regardless of the evidence?

The possibilities of horror, bloodshed, legal quagmire and programmatic dysfunction seem not to have even been considered at all. This measure is pure politics, showing an unholy alliance of incompatibly opposed factions whose agendas scarcely bear the potential for common ground:

- The gun industries see a market largely among women while gun-rights supporters see free advertising for the "armed populace" mindset;
- DV professionals see a radically new "by any means necessary" approach to victim protection, targeting predominantly men, which they may or may not be prepared to deal with but apparently have decided to embark on. Lost in the political glare is how this flies in the face of their own historic position that guns bring violence, and that controlling guns means controlling violence.

Aside from a political puzzle of just who, in this bizarre bi-partisan drive toward anarchy and vigilantism, has hustled whom, one wonders how long it will take before an increase in violence, an increase in gun crimes, an increase in the kinds of vendettas and feuds and mutually-abusive households that so often are at the root of the abuses, become the motives for this same macabre and reckless coalition to try and undo the harm it is about to do.

Further reading & discussion:
Kentucky: trading DV allegations for guns

BBC – a job creation scheme run by women, for women

Mike Buchanan · 11 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A disproportionate amount of the BBC's output is designed to appeal to women, particularly its TV output, and the situation is getting worse with each passing year. Even when men are presenting programmes, or are the key characters in documentaries etc., it's almost as if all the viewers are assumed to be women. I'm a fan of the TV chefs "The Hairy Bikers," but it has to be said that ever more of the content of their shows is information light and entertainment rich. They're often put in situations designed to make them look silly, e.g. dressing up as sumo wrestlers.

A number of people have alerted me to the domination of women in the television sector, and it's not unique to the BBC. But because it's not a commercial organisation, women have managed to manipulate their way to the top.

This is the latest edition of the Hairy Bikers' latest series, The Hairy Bikers' Asian Adventure. The credits start at 58:33. The programme will be available on iPlayer (in the UK, at least) until 27 March.

http://www.bbc.co.uk/iplayer/episode/b03wvbv1/The_Hairy_Bikers_Asian_Adventure_Thailand_Beaches_and_Mountains/

Here's a breakdown of the roles of the people associated with the programme:

WOMEN (13)

BBC Commissioning Editor

Series Producer

Producer

Executive Producer

Edit Producer

Editor

Production Executive

Production Manager

Home Economist

Development Producer

Assistant Producers (2)

Production Co-ordinator

MEN (8)

Editor

Researcher

Dubbing Mixer

Online Editor

Colourist

Sound

Photography

Additional Photography

The most important jobs are being done by women, while the technical jobs are being done by men.

As Steve Moxon outlined in The Woman Racket (2008), women display a very strong same gender preference when recruiting and promoting staff, while men don't, contrary to feminist conspiracy theories such as the "glass ceiling".

Two-thirds of public sector employees are women, while one-third of private sector employees are. We're seeing ever more preferencing of women by women in the private sector as time goes by. As Steve Moxon outlined in The Woman Racket (2008), women display a very strong same-gender preference when recruiting and promoting staff, while men don't, contrary to feminist conspiracy theories such as the "glass ceiling". Steve and I were members of a panel which gave evidence to a House of Commons inquiry ("Women in the Workplace") in November 2012:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zwqTi6HN0pM

Two women were on the panel. One was the renowned sociologist Dr Catherine Hakim, whose paper on Preference Theory, published in 2000, we cite all the time. Her research showed that while four in seven British men are "work-centred," only one in seven British women is. And that isn't changing over time, whatever feminists might wish to believe.

The other woman on the panel was Heather McGregor, who for many years has been the owner and Chief Executive of Taylor Bennett, a London-based executive recruitment company. We challenged a claim she made during her evidence at the inquiry, concerning the financial impact of increasing the number of women on corporate boards in Norway (following legislated gender quotas, in 2005) and she altered her evidence – as published in the final inquiry report – accordingly.

Ms McGregor was a founder member of Helena Morrisey's 30% Club, which aims to increase the proportion of women on major corporate boards. A third of FTSE100 chairmen are members. A reasonable person might think that Ms McGregor is keen on gender equality, so let's look at the gender balance of Taylor Bennett:

http://www.taylorbennett.com/team/#/meetourteam

Of the 17 people in the company, just three are men. In the past it's been only one or two.

Tammy Bruce's Feminism 2.0: Recycled Tripe

AVfM Video Source · 11 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Paul Elam was not a fan of Tammy Bruce's Feminism 2.0. Neither is Alyss Majere.

You may want to subscribe to Alyss Majere.

Dr. Paul on the “Bossy” Double Standard

Dr. Paul · 12 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In honor of the current feminist insanity to remove another word from the human vocabulary (if it is applied to women) Dr. Paul has decide to offer up an old writing, incorporating the new twist. PE

Double standards are bad business. And ladies, Dr. Paul takes a very dim view of the practice. As always, I am here to help you overcome such social maladies and move on to a more functional life.

When it comes to functionality, I’m your huckleberry.

Nowhere is the double standard more obvious than the age old idea that goes something like the following:

When a man is angry or “in control,” he is powerful and assertive. When a woman is angry or “in control,” she is just being bossy.

This one, ladies, really chaps my ass, so to speak. First, as I said, I hate double standards. God knows I live with enough of them. But there is something about this one that really chaffs my cheeks more than any of the others.

It is not just the unfairness or the antiquated thinking. This one gets my dander up because it is, well, because it is true.

You see, many, many women in this culture, and more than a fair share of men, don’t know the difference between being strong and being rude and overbearing. And the difference is obvious to everyone except those who are bossy.

Do I need to say that again?

If you are ignorant of the nature of strength and leadership, it likely has you trapped in bossy mode when what you are probably seeking is respect and a sense of authority; two things that are much easier to come by when you understand what they mean.

Don’t worry. Dr. Paul is here to help those that can be helped. We have to start with some real basics for a lot of you, so we better not waste any time.

First, getting people to do what you want isn’t necessarily power or strength or respect or true authority. Getting them to want to do things, however, is all those things and more.

When people follow your lead and give you their time and energy because they respect you (not just because they are paid), now, that is strength. When people do what you want because you complain till the sound of your voice is like fingernails on a chalk board or because they fear you? Well, that’s what we call just being bossy, a bitch, a jerk, an asshole, prick, dick or any other number of names that human beings regularly use for tyrants who don’t know the difference between leadership and bullying.

Sure, some of those word imply sex – both of them. And all of them convey the same idea. People don’t like, petty, power hungry people of either sex.

Deal with it, bossy.

Let’s look at this from another angle. How many times have you heard a woman say, “People tune out my ideas or don’t listen just because I am a woman?”

Now, how many of the women making this complaint were respected leaders?

How about none?

Strength is about standing on your ideas without the need for approval, not whining till people validate them and pat you on the head for being so brilliant.

Not everyone is going to listen to you or even give a damn. Get over it; it’s called life, and no, it isn’t fair. Or as my father used to say, “Fair is what you pay on the bus.”

If someone calls you bossy, even better, if several people call you bossy, the best thing you can do is get a mirror and self assess; determine whether they have a point, and if applicable, put the brakes on your bossiness and start figuring out how to lead.

And how about this for a newsflash? Leaders command attention, but not by acting like they are desperate for it. There are women like the many women who write for this site. You think no one here is listening to them? They are strong, independent women. Do you hear anyone around here at “misogyny central” calling them bossy?

But I must admit that women like these have a sneaky little trick up their sleeve.

They actually have something to say worth listening to. They pull people in. They don’t drag them or bully them. So they get respect and are considered leaders in their respective areas.

Imagine that. For some reason these women think that what they have to say is supposed to have inherent worth. They don’t just assume that because they are talking that it makes them worth listening to.

And they bring something else to the table that seems to do wonders for their credibility.

Competence. Things like writing skill; knowledge on particular subjects; and a self-assurance that does not hinge on forcing others to agree with them, offer feigned respect or avoid words they don’t like.

Are we learning anything here?

Once again, conviction, respect, and competence; strength.

Whining, petulance, and manipulation; take your pick of pejorative, including bossy.

Now write that down 100 times on the chalk board.

The same goes for demanding respect when you have not earned it.

I have some news for you on that one. You can hashtag this #sillybullshit to the moon and back, and respect will still be earned. It’s not a prize that comes in every box of Gender War Cracker Jacks; it’s the natural consequence of good character, competence and actual, not manufactured, personal strength.

It is equally repelled by whining and manipulation. And it is, despite what anyone tells you, one of the few things your sex cannot be cashed in for in any meaningful way.

You should always keep that last part in mind, because much of this stuff is rooted in the manipulation; in the power of social coercion, which is very, very different than real power.

Your sex card is great for getting compliance. It works with the average guy like dead shrimp in front of a hungry catfish (though if you are really attractive it makes a lot of average women hate your guts). But where men are concerned it is also why they invariably lose respect for you, or never develop it in the first place. And trust me, no matter what they say, they don’t respect you when you play that card. And they shouldn’t.

How else could it be? If you don’t respect yourself enough not depend on your sex and social politics to control other people, then don’t whine about double standards, even the ones that actually exist.

And that is what all of this powerless wailing about leadership vs. bossy boils down to. It is just another load of hokum designed to help you demand that which you have not earned from people with enough common sense not to give it to you in the first place.

I will leave you with a couple of suggestions; food for thought, as it were, for women who get called bossy; who, in keeping with the point of this talk, feel like they are regarded as officious harridans instead of the powerful leaders they imagine themselves to be.

One, eliminate the words “As a woman,” from all dialog you have with the world at large. Dr. Paul gets nauseous when he hears this one. When you have a chance to get people to listen to your opinion, prefacing everything you say with “As a woman,” is like shouting out “My opinion has more weight because I have a vagina!” It is literally begging people to ignore you.

And two, dump all the focus on how you feel about words. People in leadership positions, if they have the guts to be surrounded by anything but a bunch of “yes men,” excuse me, “yes persons,” are going to get called lots of things by lots of people. No one cares. It is part of being in charge. It is part of being on top, or even in the middle, to know that plenty of people would like to knock you down. The least of your worries is their vocabulary for your shortcomings.

Needless to say, “As a woman, I feel…” is the double whammy of death. Every utterance of this monstrous and quite deserved killer of respect and power should come with its own handgun and target to stick to your foot.

If you want shape people’s perception of you as a human being instead of a set of genitals, or a bossy woman, let your ideas and facts speak for themselves. And learn how to lead people toward sharing your vision.

If you can’t do that, you’re no leader, and you are not strong, whether you are male or female.

The World's Fastest Patriarchy Disproof

Josh O'Brien · 12 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists often chatter about 'Patriarchy' as if it is an indisputable fact of life. Rarely do they acknowledge anything to the contrary. It can be time-consuming and difficult to put together a factual, adequately sourced, eloquent argument, especially since it's so blatantly obvious to anyone with common sense, and your arguments will likely be cherry picked, ignored, or blocked. So this article is essentially a handy guide to disproving patriarchy, very quickly.

Patriarchy is defined as a system in which all of the societal power is held by men as a class, and is used to oppress women as a class.

This is an interesting theory, but does not hold up to any real scrutiny or critical thinking.

For the purposes of quick dismantling, I will split societal power into four areas, or spheres.

The spheres are social, political, economic, and educational. The group which controls the majority of these spheres is the group with the power. Feminists claim that the group with control is men. Let's see how that holds up to some critical thinking. Hint: Not well.

First, Educational. In the educational sphere it is clear that women have the power. They are more likely to be in education, less likely to drop out of education, more likely to get degrees and finish their education, more likely to teach, and more likely to be on decision-making boards concerning education.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Second, Political. In the political sphere, women still have more power. Women are the majority of the electorate in the majority of states. In a democratic system, the will of the majority is the will that is enforced as law. Therefore, women as a class have more political power than men as a class. Just because women don't choose to use this power to elect other women does not mean they do not have the power. If every woman in America wanted a female president, there would be a female president. If every man in America wanted a male president, there would not be a male president. In the UK, where Parliamentary Sovereignty and a lack of a codified constitution allow any law to be made, even ones which contravene basic human rights, women could literally institute any law they wanted as long as they all agreed upon it.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Thirdly, moving onto the Economic sphere. Despite producing and being responsible for the existence of less than 50% of the US' GDP (Gross Domestic Product), an estimated 63% of it is controlled by women. Yes, women control over half of the US' GDP, despite not producing even half of it. That means that they control not only their own money but some of men's money, too.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Finally the Social sphere. More difficult to quantify, but just as easy to understand. All throughout society there are obligations for men that place power in female hands. The obligation of chivalry, carrying with it protection, financial support, emotional support and submission to a female whim. The obligation of instigating a relationship, placing all risk of rejection on male shoulders. The obligation of trust, meaning that men feel forced to believe women in the face of all evidence. This, combined with the undeniable fact that issues affecting men are given less support than those affecting women, such as domestic abuse, rape, alimony or any number of other things, shows a lack of male power.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Now, the Social sphere is the only one which I can see being contested, as it cannot be factually quantified, but even if the social sphere were male controlled, that would still be 3 spheres under female control, a majority. Thus meaning: women would still have the majority of control in society.

So no, we don't live in a patriarchy.

One final point would be that just because women have this power does not mean they all exercise it, as we can see clearly in the world. Just because women can vote women in, does not mean they do, for example. But power is not dependent on use, simply possibility of use. Even if women all sat in the home as housewives voting for men and never exercising any of these powers, they would still have the power.

SOURCES:
Women in Education: http://collegestats.org/articles/2012/08/9-signs-we-have-a-boy-crisis/
Women and GDP: http://www.businessinsider.com/infographic-women-control-the-money-in-america-2012-2
Women and the Electorate:
https://www.census.gov/content/dam/Census/library/publications/2011/dec/c2010br-03.pdf

Kafala – how immigrants are enslaved in Gulf Cooperation Council Nations #kafala #nomorekafala

Chris Deslone (aka @mensrightsrdt) · 12 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

If you're a foreign worker in Quatar, you must have your employer's permission to leave the country. It's been described as indentured servitude, but that's only if things go well. In the case of any dispute, say a salary dispute, an employer can, and often does, withhold that permission, effectively trapping you as a slave.

Zahir Belounis, a French-Algerian football player was lured in with a contract, but his club dropped his salary and refused to give him permission to leave until he abandoned claims to his salary.

> "I have lost everything. Now I want to come back to my country. Give me my freedom. Here you can stop someone leaving if they have done something, made a mistake [ie, committed a crime]. I have nothing against me. Nothing, nothing, nothing."

He was only released after the French President François Hollande and Tim Noonan , president of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) intervened on his behalf

How many are enslaved by the Kafala system in GCC nations and lack the resources to appeal to international presidents?

His is certainly not the only story. ITUC estimates that 500K -1 million human beings will be needed to construct the 2022 World Cup stadium, and that 4000 human persons will die due to labor conditions, which are lower in Qatar than other nations in the area.

Sharan Burrow, General Secretary of the ITUC describes it thus:

> "Migrant workers are trapped in Qatar under the strict kafala system. To be injured and trapped in Qatar is even worse.
>
> "Injured workers face being stuck there without being able to work, without pay, in a country where your employer owns you, sharing a room with ten grown men recuperating from injuries.
>
> "We are appealing to the Qatari Government to grant a kafala amnesty to injured workers giving them the choice to change employers, or to leave the country with their end of service benefit.

Fifa's reputation is on the line, and should be. But so is the reputation of the nation of Qatar, and they just don't seem concerned.

#kafala entrap the the "usual" victims poor, the immigrant, the uneducated. Much is written about trafficking in female (but not male prostitution, which is far more commonplace than most people think), but it goes beyond that – it includes construction workers, domestic workers, and others–must human trafficking have to be sexual to be a bad thing? This is modern day slavery of millions of men and boys as well as women.

What can you do? we're trying to get #kafala and #nomorekafala trending on Twitter. Get the issue attention, link the term #kafala to slavery and human trafficking, and support organizations that fight human trafficking in every capacity, and not just of one type.

Misandry and Emptiness: Masculine Identity in a Toxic Cultural Environment

Paul Nathanson & Katherine K. Young · 12 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: this is a long essay, much longer than we normally publish as a single article. We think it's worth your time, so sit down, relax, and read. –DE

Masculine identity has become increasingly problematic due to technological and cultural changes over the past ten thousand years, beginning with the horticultural and agricultural revolutions but gaining momentum with the industrial, military and reproductive revolutions. Egalitarian feminists have unwittingly exacerbated the problem by equating sexual equality with sexual sameness, leaving men unable to make even one contribution to society, as men, which is distinctive, necessary and can therefore be publicly valued—that is, unable to establish a healthy collective identity specifically as men. The result of this emptiness is a growing tendency to give up either by dropping out of school and or by committing suicide. Ideological feminists have thrown down the gauntlet, on the other hand, by ascribing to men a highly negative collective identity. The result of this misandry is an increasing number of men who believe that even a negative collective identity is better than no collective identity at all. No solution will be possible without challenging pervasive assumptions about both boys and men.

The academic world is changing, albeit at a glacial pace, when it comes to the study of boys and men. The assumption of feminist academics since the 1980s has been that all received knowledge—that is, earlier research by male scholars—was actually about men, not women. Therefore, it made sense to focus attention instead on the latter. Those who have done so, with the aid not only of huge investments by both private and public funding agencies but also the establishment of new university departments and academic societies, have achieved a great deal. We have much more information on women than ever before. Interpreting that information is another matter, especially in a heavily politicized context, one that seldom acknowledges a clear distinction between women's studies and feminist activism. Moreover, the resulting theories about women almost invariably result in theories about men. Scholars must continue to examine all research for political and ideological biases, at any rate, because they cannot claim that any field is immune to empirical verification or at least to reasoned scrutiny without turning scholarship into the equivalent of orthodoxy or ideology—about which more in due course.

In any case, the initial premise about earlier research (that it was all about men) is inaccurate. It was often de facto about men, to be sure, but seldom de jure about men. In some cases, this was due to the fact that anthropologists had greater access to male subjects than to female ones. In still other cases, it was due to the fact that historians found more written records by men than by women. In still other cases, though, it was due to the noble but naïve assumption that men and women were very similar in most ways; this meant that it was unnecessary to dwell on the differences. The point here is that not much of this pre-feminist scholarship was the result of any specific interest in men, let alone bias in favor of them. And much of the scholarship that was specifically about men was actually about elite men, "alpha males," not ordinary men. In short, we still need research on men. We need it now [more] than ever before, in fact, because of the fallout from research that, despite continuing respectability in academic circles, is profoundly biased against boys and men.

This brings up an additional problem on the academic scene. Not all of this bias comes directly from women. Some of it comes indirectly from women. That is, it comes from male feminists (of a branch that we will discuss in a moment). Adopting the feminist notion of "engaged scholarship," they established the field of "men's studies" at least partly in the hope of changing (other) men by converting them to feminism instead of merely studying them. And one problem with this approach, among many others, is that it requires scholars to see men through the eyes of women, just as earlier scholars, ironically, had seen women through the eyes of men. This is the immediate reason for efforts to establish a parallel, or new, men's studies or male studies. Although the new male studies must foster modern academic standards, not postmodern political ones, it need not rely on the straw man of perfect objectivity (which, as everyone has always known, finite beings can never attain). The new male studies can rely on historically or scientifically verifiable evidence, in other words, but still take boys and men seriously on their own terms. Otherwise, the subjects become nothing more than tokens of some political theory that “we” know but “they” do not. The model here would be what phenomenologists and cultural anthropologists once called epoché: trying sincerely and systematically to bracket out either personal attitudes toward the subjects or cultural assumptions about them and cultivating at least preliminary empathy for them.

Our purpose in this essay, though, is to discuss only a few closely related problems, out of many, that American boys and men face at the moment. We have selected these problems partly because of their centrality in the research that we have done over the past twenty-five years but also because of their marginality in the research that others have been doing. Many or possibly most academics in traditional men’s studies work in the social sciences, at any rate, whereas we work in the humanities and arts. We see these problems primarily as cultural ones, albeit ones that entail both emotional and social problems.

With all this in mind, we will discuss masculinity in connection with (1) identity and (2) feminism.

IDENTITY

We began our research on men with the following hypothesis, which we invite social scientists to verify or falsify on empirical grounds: that no person or group can have a healthy identity without being able to make at least one contribution to the larger society, one that is distinctive, necessary and publicly valued. The underlying problem that men face in our time, especially young men, is how to create a healthy collective identity specifically as men—that is, a healthy form of masculine identity. This raises at least one obvious question: Why not be satisfied merely with a healthy personal identity? We can think of several reasons. First, the obvious and undeniable fact is that humans are social beings. We require families, friends, allies and communities or nations. Although we are always different in some ways from other people, we are always like them in other ways. This means that we can always identify ourselves at least to some extent with them. How else could anyone expect support when in need or peril? There is no such thing as a personal identity, either healthy or unhealthy, without the larger context of a collective identity.

Second, personal identity for men can now emerge only at the expense of collective identity. Any man can feel good about himself as an individual even now, after all, by adopting one of two strategies that prevent him from feeling good about himself as a man. The first requires dissociation from other men as a male feminist and thus becoming an honorary woman. This amounts to self-hatred, a phenomenon with which Jews and other minority groups have long been familiar. And self-hatred is surely, by definition, profoundly neurotic. Worse, this strategy has a specifically moral consequence: abandoning or even targeting men who, misandry and emptiness notwithstanding, still feel a compelling need for some positive identification with their male bodies. The other strategy, as anyone who watches the news knows by now, requires dissociation from society and thus becoming an antisocial threat to it. We will return to that strategy.

Third, the fact that women have created a healthy collective identity for themselves—and also, directly or indirectly and intentionally or unintentionally, an unhealthy one for men—means that men must choose between accepting what women think about manhood and thinking for themselves about manhood. In other words, they must establish a collective identity. But this presents a big problem. The legitimate sources of collective identity for women have expanded immeasurably over the past few decades.

We refer not merely to new career possibilities but also to the more subtle and more general sense that all things are possible for women (or even, in some cases, that women are innately superior to men). During the same decades, however, the legitimate sources of collective identity for men have contracted or even disappeared.

FEMINISM

Feminism has emerged over the past few years. Masculine identity, on the other hand, has been a problem for the past few thousand years. Nonetheless, feminism has exacerbated that problem. Feminism can be defined in many ways. Some feminists focus their attention on the relation between gender and class, others on the relation between gender and sex, gender and religion, and so forth. This is one reason, among several, why feminists insist on their diversity, inclusiveness or multivocality.[1] From the specific perspective of men, however, there are only two kinds of feminism. They differ according to what each says about men and therefore what effects each has on men. In this section, we discuss (a) misandry, the intentional result of ideological feminism (which has exacerbated the problem by assigning men a profoundly negative identity) and (b) emptiness, the unintentional result of egalitarian feminism (which has exacerbated the problem inadvertently by denying men any positive identity).

MISANDRY

By now, the word "misandry" is in common use. It was not so in the early 1990s, when we began our research on misandry (although the word "misogyny," of course, had long been in common use). Misandry is hatred toward men. We refer here not to anger but to hatred. Anger is an emotion and transient; hatred is neither. Hatred is a culturally propagated way of thinking. Although hatred entails psychological and other problems, it is truly a cultural problem and therefore a moral problem as well.

Many people now acknowledge that misandry is a characteristic feature of popular culture in our time.[2] But not all of these people, let alone those who refuse to acknowledge the existence of misandry, agree on where this phenomenon originated or whether it has any significance. Is the prevalence of misandry due to commercial opportunism, which, in the contexts of both entertainment and advertising, relies heavily on both positive and negative stereotypes? Or is it due to political correctness, which prohibits the negative stereotypes of some groups, but not others?

Either way, some people—both men and women, though for different reasons—openly condone the misandric status quo. Women have no power, they claim, and therefore require protection from misogynistic stereotypes. Men have such godlike power, on the other hand, that even the most hostile stereotypes cannot actually harm them; these stereotypes are inconsequential, they say, and therefore (from one point of view) insignificant. At the very least, we suggest, public disapproval of misogyny but not of misandry reveals a deeply embedded double standard and therefore corrodes the very notion of equality, a fundamental feature of democracy.

But, we argue, misandry is due primarily to something much more sinister and much more destructive than even a double standard, whether in the context of commerce or etiquette. Underlying the attitude of those who condone misandry—they often hide behind the anonymity that pseudonyms confer on bloggers—is a perverted notion of justice, which makes it synonymous with revenge. Men have used misogynistic stereotypes to serve the economic and political interests of men, according to many people (once again, both men and women, though for different reasons), so that women may now use misandric ones to serve their own economic and political interests.

Obviously, this conclusion cannot rely on the Judeo-Christian "Golden Rule" (expressed either as "do not treat others as you would not have them treat you" or as "treat others as you would have them treat you"). But this moral principle, which underlies the prophetic worldview, did not go unchallenged even in late biblical times. Opposing it directly or indirectly was a very different worldview, one that encouraged a reinterpretation of scripture. This worldview emerged as a religion in ancient Persia but eventually spread, without the particular theological superstructure of Zoroastrianism, throughout the Mediterranean world. This requires us to pause here for an explanation.

In 597 B.C., Nebuchadnezzar II conquered the Jewish Kingdom of Judah and later deported much of the population to his capital city of Babylon.[3] The captives considered this exile an unprecedented calamity, because it seemed to refute their belief in God's providence and even their belief in God's existence. In other words, traditional explanations for innocent suffering were no longer convincing. Persia soon conquered Babylon and allowed the return of these captives to Jerusalem. By that time, however, they had begun to absorb some features of the Persian worldview. As monotheists, to be sure, most Jews rejected the Zoroastrian religion as such: two competing gods, one good and the other evil. Nonetheless, some Jews found in its underlying premise a satisfying explanation for innocent suffering: two competing but vaguely defined cosmic principles, one good and the other evil. God was inherently and eternally good, Jews continued to believe, and could therefore not be the source of evil. But neither, they believed, could any other god be the source of evil. One solution was a quasi-divine figure: an angel who, by rebelling against God, introduced evil and continued to foster evil among "his" followers. And Jews were by no means the only ones to find this metaphysical premise useful. By the Hellenistic period, what we now call “dualism” had become a generalized mentality. In other words, it had become part of many competing religious traditions and philosophical systems. St. Augustine found it not only among contemporary Christians, for instance, but also among the Manicheans, a group that he had joined before turning to Christianity.

Of importance here is that from this metaphysical premise, moral and political ones followed. These amounted, collectively, to a titanic and enduring struggle between those who were faithful to God (“us”) and those who were not (“them”), a struggle that would end only at the end of history with the final victory of God and his faithful followers over their enemies—which is to say, any or all outsiders. This dualistic mentality co-existed uneasily with other biblical ones.[4] Not surprisingly, both Jews and Christians have sometimes ignored the Golden Rule and its corollaries—love your neighbor as yourself or even, among Christians, love your enemies—and identified specific groups of people not merely with theological ignorance or competing political interests but with an ontological evil that matched the metaphysical evil of their gods.

Of even greater importance here, though, is the fact that this dualistic mentality, like other religious phenomena, has taken secular forms in political ideologies on both the right and the left. These ideologies, like some earlier religious ones, have not one but several characteristic features (most of which, though not necessarily all of which, they have in common).[5] In addition to dualism (believing that “they” are inherently evil) are the following closely linked characteristic features of ideology: essentialism (believing that “we” are inherently good); hierarchy (that “we” are inherently superior to “them”); collectivism (that the politically defined group is more important than either the individual or the larger society); utopianism (that a new and better world order will supersede the current one); selective cynicism (that the intentions of all people, except our own, are sinister); revolutionism (that merely tinkering with reforms of the current world order, instead of replacing it with a radically different one, will not do the trick); consequentialism (that the end, no matter how unpalatable in ordinary circumstances, can justify the means); and quasi-religiosity (that the political worldview, like older religious ones, confers ultimate meaning, purpose, community, identity and so forth).

Ideological feminists are not in the majority, but they are also not all on the lunatic fringe. On the contrary, they produce exceedingly sophisticated theories (such as the conspiracy theory of history)[6] and adopt equally sophisticated strategies (such as working within the established law schools and government bureaucracies instead of rioting in the streets, to achieve a social revolution that most people still find hard even to imagine). They develop these theories at respectable universities, moreover, and disseminate them through respectable publishers.[7] Eventually, these theories enter the popular culture of movies, sit-coms and talk shows. What was once truly radical, in other words, becomes conventional wisdom (until ideologues up the ante once more). In short, ideological feminists are at least as influential as egalitarian feminists in the journalistic, the academic and especially the legal circles that produce policies and laws. Although they often use the egalitarian rhetoric that is de rigueur in a liberal democracy—one that permits only gender-neutral language, for instance, in legislation—closer examination of both their statements and the results of their campaigns reveals a worldview that is anything but egalitarian and often relies on double standards.[8]

For ideological feminists, men are not merely deluded. They are the ultimate, eternal or even ontological enemies of women. Either they or their remote ancestors (or both) are responsible for all suffering and injustice. Most ideological feminists do acknowledge exceptions for men who convert to the new worldview, but these male feminists function as honorary women. They are acceptable not because of their maleness but despite it.

Some ideological feminists, moreover, refer to history in overtly theological—that is, to use the more precise word that these feminists prefer, “thealogical”—terms. From this point of view, primeval men instigated a titanic conspiracy not merely to usurp power from women but also to replace the female principle of a great goddess with the male principle of their own gods. Either way, men have oppressed women ever after and will do so until the advent of a feminist utopia. It does not take much imagination to see this ideological story as an upside-down version of earlier Western stories about human origin and destiny. The biblical story blames Adam and Eve equally for sin (what Christians eventually called Original Sin). Some post-biblical interpretations, however, assign most of the blame to Eve and her female descendants. The new, ideological version simply reverses that post-biblical interpretation by blaming primeval men and their male descendants.[9]

This conspiracy theory of history, we argue, is the ultimate premise of ideological feminism, though usually in secular form, and thus of misandry. Dualism itself originated long before feminism of any kind and long ago became deeply rooted in Western thought, to be sure, but ideological feminists have exploited it in modern times. The point here—the point that we make throughout our series on misandry—is that misandry must not remain some dirty little secret. It is pervasive, even prevalent, not only at the seemingly innocuous level of popular culture (in entertainment, say, and advertising) but also at the institutional level of elite culture (in research, teaching, legal codes and law enforcement). And it relies firmly on feminist ideology.

Misandry originates as a cultural problem, to be sure, and therefore entails moral problems. In addition, though, it entails emotional and other problems. Though not social scientists, we find it very hard to imagine how any boy can become a healthy young man in such a contaminated cultural environment, just as we find it hard to imagine the analogy for young girls, blacks, gays or those who belong to any other target group.

It would be folly, therefore, to ignore feminist ideology, let alone misandry itself, in the interest of political expediency. And yet, the problems that boys and men currently face did not begin with the emergence of misandry, let alone the rise of feminism. This brings us to another major problem.

EMPTINESS

We make a clear distinction between ideological feminism and egalitarian feminism.[10] Unlike ideological feminists, egalitarian feminists have no general theory about the ultimate origin of conflict between men and women. From their point of view, only one thing matters: Women have found it harder than men to enter public life—that is, to build careers outside the home. Some attribute this problem to the greed or ignorance or prejudice of men. Others attribute it to the fact that motherhood places special demands on women. Still others attribute the problem to both factors. All, however, believe that sexual equality is the solution (although some define that as equality of opportunity and others as equality of result,[11] each of which entails specific legal consequences).[12] From the perspective of men, however, this approach is somewhat naïve. Equality is a noble ideal, to be sure, but egalitarian feminists have tended to overlook its unintended consequences for men (and therefore, indirectly, for women as well).

Our point here is that these unintended consequences are about to complete a disturbing process that began not a few years ago but a few thousand years ago. Human history is the history of successive cultural revolutions, most of which have been technological and all of which have led to the gradual obsolescence of men and by now left men without a distinctive and necessary function as men, without the possibility of being publicly valued as men and therefore without the basis for any healthy identity specifically as men. Here, now, is a summary of our "revolutionary" theory.[13] It took one or two million years for primates to become humans. As Luigi Zoja[14] says, this involved several developments. Humans used their hands to carry things, for instance, not to walk. They could have sex at any time, moreover, not merely during "estrus."

And their brains expanded not only in complexity but also in size. This meant that birth had to occur while human newborns were still smaller—and therefore less developed—than those of other primate species. And this, in turn, meant that human infants needed parental care for much longer than other primate infants did—a project that required the cooperation of fathers and was the context in which "pair bonding" evolved. All of these developments are natural, which means that they involve genetic factors, but some are cultural as well. Pair bonding,[15] for instance, relies heavily on cultural support systems such as the social arrangements that reward men for being active and enduring participants in family life.

Early humans lived in wandering bands that probably relied at first on scavenging. During the long Paleolithic period, they continued to live in wandering bands but relied increasingly on hunting and gathering. We have no reason to believe that these early communities oppressed either women or men. People did whatever they had to do in the interest of communal survival. Features of both the female body and the male body made it advantageous to assign at least a few tasks either to women or to men. Whatever else they did, for instance, women perpetuated the community by giving birth to infants and nursing them. Whatever else they did, men protected the community from predators and usually provided it with food and other products from big animals. Both women and men faced mortal danger. Women often died in childbirth, and men often died from wounds. The point here is that maleness—innate features of the male body—conferred a healthy collective identity on men just as femaleness did on women. In other words, maleness was the foundation for various forms of masculinity that, by serving communities, commanded public respect.

The problem, for men, began not in the very remote past but in the relatively recent past. We refer to the Neolithic Revolution. Approximately twelve thousand years ago, humans began to rely at least partly on gardening (or, in some cases, on pastoralism). This required them to live in settled communities that provided fertile land and access to water. For the first time, it became practical to store food and other resources. Also for the first time, though, it became desirable to raid the stored food and resources of other communities. This state of affairs sometimes led to the emergence of militaristic societies and therefore to military leaders or chiefs, who accumulated excessive property and power. Closely following the Neolithic Revolution was the Agricultural Revolution, which introduced the iron plough and irrigation. Among the results were much more food and much higher populations. It was in this context that the early civilizations emerged. Characteristic of these were urbanization, occupational specialization, social and political hierarchies, often literacy and eventually "world religions." These religions, apart from anything else, created moral and philosophical principles to curb the rampant injustices perpetrated by early chiefs and kings.

At this point, the male body's distinctive characteristics—its size, strength and speed[16]—still conferred masculine identity on most men: elite warriors (who wielded weapons) and the masses of serfs or peasants (who used iron ploughs to till their fields). But an ever-increasing number of men—artisans, scribes, priests, merchants, traders, bakers, administrators and so on—no longer relied for their identity on their naturally endowed male bodies. They relied instead on culturally established attributes, such as literacy, that society ascribed more-or-less arbitrarily to men but not women.

Fast-forward now to the late eighteenth century. Most men by far were still peasants. A few, either aristocrats or those who worked for them, were soldiers. Men of both classes, therefore, still required brute strength. The Industrial Revolution, however, changed all that by greatly increasing the number of middle-class men—which is to say, those men who did not need brute strength for tilling fields or wielding weapons. A few of these men were entrepreneurs (the industrialists who established mills and mines) or financiers. Others acquired enough education to enter the formerly elite ranks of professional lawyers and physicians. Still others—most men, by far—became proletarians. They worked along with women and even children at the new mills and mines, until reform movements demanded protection for women and children (which meant keeping them at home). Men with the lowest status were those who relied on their muscles; men with the highest status, on the other hand, were precisely those who did not.

The Military Revolution marked another profound change in the history of men. In one sense, this was just another technological development. Military hardware became increasingly complex. At the same time, it became decreasingly reliant on brute strength. Instead, it became increasingly reliant on literacy and eventually on higher education. This trend became clear to everyone during World War I. Those who planned and organized campaigns had the highest status; those who followed their orders in the trenches had the lowest status, that of "cannon fodder." But the Military Revolution refers primarily not to technological change but to cultural change. Historians usually discuss this as an offshoot of the French Revolution, but its impact spread far beyond the French Republic or even the West. We refer here to "universal" military conscription. Every citizen was now a soldier (or potential soldier) by virtue of merely being a citizen.

This calls for an explanation.

According to the new social contract, military service was now the price of citizenship. Being “willing” to fight and possibly die for the State was the hallmark of every citizen. Because the State protected women from military service, however, it refrained from granting them full citizenship. Being a full citizen (“willing” to fight and possibly die for the State) was therefore simultaneously the hallmark of being a man (as distinct from being a woman). Citizens demonstrated their masculinity primarily and ultimately in battle (or scenarios in everyday life that became metaphorical battles), and the State appropriated the bodies of citizens by virtue of their maleness alone (because the law made no distinction between men who wanted to risk their lives in battle and those who did not). Even though conscription laws confer masculine identity on those who have male bodies, thus reaffirming the ancient link between maleness and masculinity, it does so at a very high cost to men (and to any society that encourages men to believe that their ultimate value is as fighters). For one thing, conscripts have very low status within armies. Moreover, they often end up dead or mutilated on battlefields.

Women in some countries are now demanding the abrogation of this social contract by allowing (though not forcing) women into combat. However, after more than two hundred years and many social changes, men find it hard to establish a collective identity that relies on something else. Women can already provide for themselves and protect themselves (with help from the State, in both cases, if necessary).

The Reproductive Revolution has undermined the only remaining source of masculine identity for men: fatherhood. Many factors have contributed to this problem: new movements that trivialize fatherhood (single mothers by choice, for instance, and same-sex marriage); new movements that demonize fathers (ideological forms of feminism); new industries that reduce fatherhood to routine medical procedures (sperm banks and surrogacy); new technologies that would eliminate fatherhood or even maleness (avant-garde procedures such as cloning or parthenogenesis); new legislation that undermines even the remnants of fatherhood (joint custody, say, or abortion on demand as a private matter “between a woman and her doctor”)—and so on. Many social scientists now believe that fatherhood has no inherent links with either masculinity or maleness. Others believe that fatherhood has no distinctive or necessary function within family life. The implication is that fathers are assistant mothers at best and potential molesters at worst. Is it any wonder, then, that popular entertainment routinely presents fathers as buffoons or worse?

Back now to egalitarian feminism and the inability of men to establish a healthy form of identity, as men, in our time—that is, to the emptiness that men experience as a result. Herein is a great irony. When it comes to the historic (though culturally variable) relation between maleness and masculinity, it is egalitarian feminism, not ideological feminism, that undermines the most direct link between early and modern men. Even if we were to eliminate the toxic misandry of ideological feminism, we would still be left with the paralyzing emptiness that comes (to men) from egalitarian feminists. Even journalists sometimes recognize what academics fail to see. In his review of Warrior, A.O. Scott discusses why boys and young men in some environments turn to extreme versions of masculinity, ones that focus on whatever remains of certain traditional symbols of masculinity—notably those that refer to combat. “They fight, he says, “because every other way of being a man has been compromised, undermined or taken away. Patriarchal authority, as represented by Paddy, is cruel and unbending until it turns sentimental and pathetic. The roads to an honorable life promised by work and military service are mined and muddied by the greed and mendacity of the institutions—government, schools, banks—that are supposed to uphold integrity.”[17]

We use the word “emptiness” for lack of a better word. In a way, after all, the problem for men has been human history itself, a process that has gradually deprived men of any legitimate sense of fulfillment specifically as male humans. But “human history” fails to convey the experience of that lack in daily life. The word “emptiness” conveys precisely that. Emptiness is the residue of a life without identity and therefore without meaning or purpose—or without meaning and purpose and therefore without identity.

To some extent, of course, modernity leaves almost everyone spiritually empty and therefore without a healthy identity. Despite its many advantages, after all, modernity often involves a profound rupture with tradition and meaning, with community and home, and especially with the sacred. This is precisely the void that political ideologies on both the left and the right have tried (with catastrophic results) to fill since the late nineteenth century. They have allowed people who lose one source of collective identity to replace it with another. Instead of establishing it in connection with family or religion, say, they do so in connection with class, race, language or sex. But because these ideologies rely so heavily on dualism, pitting "us" against "them," the price is very high. They solve one problem by creating another. Or, to put it in a slightly different way, they solve problems for some people by creating problems for other people.

At the moment, this applies to women and men.

CONCLUSION

Boys and young men now have, at least in theory, only two general ways of responding to the emptiness of their lives. Very few are intellectually and emotionally able to confront emptiness directly, of course, so many do so indirectly by (1) trying to ignore the misandry that underlies and exacerbates emptiness or (2) internalizing it. Some try deliberately to ignore misandry along with all other potential sources of pain by resorting to unbridled hedonism and therefore succumbing to raw narcissism. But hiding from pain by seeking personal pleasure as an end in itself has become characteristic of our society in general—not only in the licentious fantasies of popular entertainment but also in the sordid facts of daily life—and therefore says little about any segment of society in particular.

Others, however, unwittingly internalize misandry. And this is something that very few social scientists, if any, have acknowledged so far. The one social problem that they inexplicably fail to see should be self-evident to everyone: the toxic fallout—the pervasive ridicule, contempt, punitive attitude and even hatred—of a society that has no room for its male population per se. One way of internalizing all this misandry is clearly destructive (but also, ultimately, self-destructive). In this category are those who act up, attacking a hostile society. Even a negative identity, after all, might be better than no identity at all. The other way of internalizing misandry is clearly self-destructive (but also destructive in other ways). In this category are those who give up, succumbing to the apparent emptiness of manhood and thus abandoning an indifferent society. This almost certainly provides at least a partial explanation for the high rates among male people of both dropping out of school and committing suicide. Sociologists and psychologists have long noted these pathological patterns in young men—Michael Kimmel, for instance, has popularized the idea that American "guys" are pathological almost by definition[18]—but have generally refrained from attributing them to the direct or indirect fallout from feminism and the resulting collapse of masculine identity. By that, once again, we mean the impossibility of establishing a healthy collective identity specifically as men, one that relies on a healthy notion of masculinity.

In short, for whatever reason, social scientists tend to ignore the proverbial elephant standing silently in its corner. Instead, they usually attribute pathological patterns to more familiar (and somewhat less politically risky) causes such as poverty, racism, testosterone, evolution, popular culture and the like. Some social scientists have indeed linked the social and psychological pathologies of these boys and young men with father absence, for instance, but few if any have followed the logic of this insight by linking father absence in turn with identity absence—that is, with emptiness.

Kimmel describes masculinity in our time as "guyland." Whatever else critics say about Kimmel's feminist theory—and we say a great deal about it[19]—no one can deny that he has described a noteworthy phenomenon. It amounts to notion of manhood that repudiates not only the innocence of boyhood but also the maturity of manhood, which is both cross-culturally and historically unprecedented. Kimmel argues that being a "guy" originates in the unearned sense of "entitlement" to masculine privilege (and hostility toward women for denying it). We argue that it originates in the natural sense of entitlement to a healthy masculine identity of any kind. It is easy to argue about the prevalence of "guys" or even about precisely what makes them tick, but it is surely not by chance that the appearance of this psychological twilight zone has coincided with two profoundly significant facts of life for boys and men in our time: the rise of feminism (which either unwittingly denies the possibility of a distinctive masculine identity or deliberately acknowledges only a sinister one) and the absence of anything even remotely like coming of age. Fewer and fewer boys want to become men because fewer and fewer men can convince them that doing so would mean demonstrating their ability to contribute something distinctive and necessary to society. No one has yet come up with a solution to the problem of toxic masculinity in a toxic cultural environment, but no one ever will without first identifying it correctly.

Notes

1 Another reason is to maintain their own legitimacy as liberal feminists despite the "radical" approaches of a few other feminists. From this point of view, tolerance means never having to say that you are "sorry" for (much less to challenge) those who say ugly things in your name.

2 In Spreading Misandry: The Teaching of Contempt for Men in Popular Culture (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2001), the first of five volumes on misandry, we discuss the negative portrayals of men in popular culture during the 1980s and 1990s. By "popular culture," we refer to a wide range of media: movies, sit-coms, talk shows, news shows, magazines and so on. The negative imagery of men ranges in severity from ridicule to dehumanization and even demonization. To summarize our findings: The men these productions portray negatively are either inadequate, evil or both; the few men these productions portray positively are honorary women—either feminists or minority men. Gay men, in particular, often get free passes in gender politics. Our point is not so much that these negative stereotypes harm boys and men (although they do), but that they are symptoms of a much deeper cultural problem (which we explore in later volumes).

3 Judah was the southern Jewish kingdom. Assyria had already conquered the northern kingdom, Israel, in 722. Its population, deported and assimilated, became the "ten lost tribes."

4 Those who turned to dualism identified evil not only with enemy communities, whose evil took on eschatological proportions, but also with closely linked cosmic principles. Just as they polarized "us" and "them," for instance, they polarized "spirit" and "flesh" (a metaphysical distinction and conflict that was particularly important to Christians such as St. Paul). Some theologians identified the former, in turn, with maleness and the latter with femaleness. To do that, they had to reinterpret non-dualistic texts accordingly.

5 Nathanson and Young, Spreading Misandry, 199-218.

6 See note 9.

7 Paul Nathanson and Katherine K. Young, Legalizing Misandry: From Public Shame to Systemic Discrimination against Men (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2006) 269-308. This volume, the second of five on misandry, is about the institutionalization of ideological feminism by legislators, lawyers, judges, bureaucrats and the like, all of whom rely, in turn, on the institutionalization of ideological feminism by academics who produce and interpret statistics. We begin this volume by continuing the discussion of popular culture in Spreading Misandry, but with our focus on journalism instead of entertainment. To be more precise, we focus on the journalistic feeding frenzies that so often accompany high-profile legal or quasilegal cases about conflicts between men and women and lead to legislative change. Examples include the Senate confirmation hearing for Clarence Thomas (which provoked a "national dialogue" on sexual harassment) and the avalanche of court battles over "recovered memories" of sexual molestation or even "satanic ritual abuse" (which provoked the modern equivalents of witch hunts). Most of the volume is directly about legislative change due to the influence of ideological feminism in connection with every point of contact between men and women. Neither the laws that govern these contacts (such as conflicts over sexual harassment, divorce, custody, affirmative action) nor the rules that govern their interpretation, implementation and enforcement rely any longer on philosophical notions such as equality of opportunity and legal principles such as the presumption of innocence.

8 For one example, see Nathanson and Young, Legalizing Misandry, 471-477.

9 See Katherine K. Young and Paul Nathanson, Sanctifying Misandry: Goddess Ideology and the Fall of Man (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2010). This volume, the third of five on misandry, is about the ways in which feminist ideologues have used religion to bolster their claim to female superiority and simultaneously support their conspiracy theory of history, that evil originated in an ancient revolution during which men overturned an egalitarian society, established patriarchy, and began the oppression of women. More specifically, it is about various attempts to reverse a familiar paradigm of profound importance. According to the Bible, Adam and Eve live in paradise under the aegis of God; Adam and Eve succumb to sin, which leads God to expel them from paradise and into the world of chaos and conflict as we know these in everyday life; the remote descendants of Adam and Eve return to paradise of one kind or another at the end of history. The new version is slightly different: men and women live in paradise under the aegis of a Goddess; men succumb to sin by installing their gods, which leads to the creation of patriarchy; women return to paradise, possibly with some male converts to feminism, at the end of patriarchy. But feminist extremists and separatists are not the only supporters of this revised myth. It has deeply influenced even some liberal forms of Christianity and Judaism.

10 People classify forms of feminism in many ways according to need. From the specific perspective of men, only these two forms are significant.

11 For political reasons, some people refer to equality of result as “substantive equality” and to equality of opportunity as (mere) “formal equality.”

12 Equality of opportunity entails, among other things, universal access to higher education. Equality of result entails, among other things, affirmative action in order to ensure the equal representation of all groups in universities (although advocates seldom build in mechanisms that would ensure the end of affirmative action once they have reached their goal, which is why they do not promote affirmative action for men despite the majority of women in universities).

13 For a detailed discussion of these revolutions, see Paul Nathanson and Katherine K. Young, Replacing Misandry: From Primeval Man to Postmodern Man (forthcoming). This is the fourth of five volumes on misandry. The fifth and final volume is Transcending Misandry: From Ideological Feminism to Intersexual Dialogue (forthcoming). There, we move beyond misandry per se. Our focus is on the present and future, therefore, more than the past. The word “dialogue” usually refers to a way of discussing conflicts and resolving them in connection with common ideals—justice, say, or compassion—instead of resorting to intimidation or violence. Among the most familiar forms of dialogue has been interreligious dialogue. This originated in the 1960s as an offshoot of ecumenism, the Christian movement that sought greater understanding among the churches (and sometimes institutional union). It did not take long for many people to realize that interreligious dialogue could include not only Christian denominations but also non-Christian communities. Under Pope John XXIII and his successors, for instance, Catholics sought not to convert Jews and other non-Catholics but to foster forgiveness and reconciliation. Religious communities responded to this idea in many ways. Some feared it on historical grounds as a disguise for proselytism and ignored it. Others welcomed it on practical grounds in the interest of combining forces to solve social problems such as poverty, political problems such as tyranny, or even religious problems such as the rise of secularism. Still others welcomed it on intellectual grounds to the extent that they could reaffirm their own distinctive identities by learning about those of other communities. Nowadays, “dialogue” refers to a possibility for any groups in conflict: religious, racial, ethnic, linguistic—and sexual. But overuse and misuse has almost drained this word of meaning.

14 Luigi Zoja, The Father: Historical, Psychological and Cultural Perspectives, trans. Henry Martin (Philadelphia: Taylor and Francis, 2001), 29-45.

15 See David Schneider, “Primeval Kinship: How Pair Bonding Gave Birth to Human Society,” Evolutionary Psychology 6.4 (2008): 557-562.

16 Most men are slightly bigger, stronger and faster than most women are. Although sexual dimorphism (differences between the males and females within a species) is a feature of our species, its degree is very minor compared to those between the males and females of many other primate species. Scientists have found correlations between low degrees of sexual dimorphism and the participation of fathers in family life, and between high levels and the absence of fathers from family life.

17 A.O. Scott, “A Tale of Jacob, Esau and Muscles,” review of Warrior, New York Times, 8 November 2011, C-4.

18 Michael Kimmel, Guyland: The Perilous World Where Boys Become Men (New York: Harper, 2008).

19 See chapter 1 in Nathanson and Young, Transcending Misandry (forthcoming)

Editorial note: This item originally appeared in New Male Studies; An International Journal (NMS), an open access online interdisciplinary journal for research and discussion of issues facing boys and men worldwide, Volume 1, issue 1, and may be freely distributed under the GNU General Public License. An interview with the authors may be found here.

Peter-Andrew: Nolan(c): A Danger to Self and Others

Al Martin (TMOTS) · 13 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Grab yourself a good single malt or any other beverage of choice, for I am a windbag.

The Men's Right Movement (MRM) is as diverse (God I hate that word) as any movement has ever been. Men, women, hetero, trans or gay; we embrace those of different backgrounds, ethnicity, religion, or politics as long as the primary tenets of the movement are front and center: human rights and compassion for men and boys, same as for women.

Unlike ideological feminism, human rights for men and boys does not mean that the other side of the coin is to be ignored, forgotten, or vilified in some warped sense of reparations or retribution. A cursory look into the inner workings of the MRM specifically, places such as AVfM and its affiliates, will undoubtedly enlighten the reader that men and boys are in fact human beings deserving of the same rights as any other human being. Deserving of the fundamental rights afforded to all humans regardless of genitalia or other such Politically Correct divisiveness. Yes, dear readers, the males of this world are indeed human with feelings of joy, sorrow, pleasure and yes, even anger.

Anger is a human emotion that although at times may negatively affect the situation at hand, but none-the-less it is a valid emotion. Dictionary.com defines anger as;

> A strong feeling of displeasure and belligerence aroused by a wrong; wrath; ire.'

Movements have always had "displeasures" with the status quo. A system that oppresses a specific group or section of the population tends to elicit some sort of action by its benefactors. And those actions of the displeased tend to sometimes show a perfectly normal and justifiable emotion: anger.

Think back of the racial inequities of the '50s and '60s and '70s and even '80s–I am old enough to remember much of it, and even if you are not you will have at least read about it. Most folks would certainly agree that the grievances of black human beings were reasonable and appropriate and deserving of an angry response–and that society needed to change. Anger tended to be in the forefront of many of their responses, justifiably in most cases. Forcing a whole group of people to underclass status based solely upon their skin color is so last-century. Sadly, there are those that still to this day think that blacks are somehow lesser human than whites, but, this article isn't about race relations.

Here we are, in the 21st century and a new level of oppression, discrimination, and downright hatred has reared its very ugly head. It's not new and in some circles, it doesn't even exist let alone warrant a place in word processing spell checkers.

Of course I am referring to misandry, meaning the hatred of men. The bastard sibling of the "misogyny"that feminists and most western governments claim is rampant and causing all of society's ills with its supposed father, the "patriarchy".

Anyhow, let us get back to the reason for this article: the angry participants within human rights movements.

Personally, I believe that we must remind ourselves to not blindly accept, support nor legitimize any and all anger as acceptable or even justified. While anger is a normal, healthy, even vital emotion that we must allow people to express, sometimes angry actions can be beyond reasonable. Civilized discourse does not always have to be civil, because sometimes anger is a necessary part of getting your voice heard. It is a tool of rhetorical necessity. But we as a movement must differentiate, if not distance ourselves, from violent, psychotic, or otherwise dangerous actions. This is a difficult endeavor when those in opposition tend to align any and all harmful discourse, specifically that which would reflect negatively, with all in the movement.

Feminists, of course response to such negatives within their movement as anomalies, fringe or radicals, and "not real feminists." Wait, no, they only do that sometimes. And in any case they rarely condemn it.

In any case, they very rarely afford us or others the courtesy of saying "this person does not necessarily represent the whole." As such, it is often necessary for us to do it for ourselves.

Serious members of the MRM take exception to those that would blemish the very real reasons for our movement. Men's' rights, fathers' rights, and anti-feminism are not about being "anti-woman," and no amount of saying it's so will make it so. That is not to say that there are no "nutters" or misogynists that claim to be MRAs, for there are. But these folks are not indicative of the MRM (or MHRM as some prefer) and should always be identified and such and, whenever possible, ejected from organizations which strive to forward compassion and human rights for all.

Enter one Peter-Andrew: Nolan(c). He is also known as just plain Peter Nolan. He is also known as Joschua Boehm, Joschua-Brandon: Boehm, Peternolan9, and even "John Rambo."

Now, I could end this article right now with one simple statement: Peter-Andrew: Nolan(c) is a nutter and his views and actions do not represent the men and women of the MRM. But, what's the fun in that? We probably should get specific and say why.

The obvious I will dispense with right way. What sort of narcissist would try to copyright their name? And what's with the stupid colon?

Moving on: Peter-Andrew: Nolan(c)… oh screw that. I am not going to continue with this name silliness. Nolan, as I shall now refer to him, is indeed an angry man. As with many men (and some women I might add) within the MRM, he has been taken to the cleaners so-to-speak by an ex. He has justifiable reasons for being angry.

As stated previously, anger is not necessarily wrong. Humans being humans and all, they will have human reactions. But actions caused by anger can be wrong. Especially when they cross over into hatred, statements of violence, advocating dangerous and illegal activity, slander and libel, or desires of death upon other persons. Nolan, I am afraid, is guilty of all of these things.

An Australian now living in Germany, Nolan is a product of a system that considers men as nothing more than sperm-donating wallets to do the dirty work and heavy lifting. So it stands to reason that Nolan would be angry at the system. But "angry" doesn't even begin to describe Nolan's actions or his state of mind.

Nolan began his trip to lala-land from the humble beginnings of yet another screwed-over husband/father statistic. A story which he has chronicled here fits the typical narrative that a good many men know all too well. Nolan states:

> "All through that time I have conversed privately with her father and offered the hand of love and peace such that the damage that was doing could be minimized. In November 2007, as part of a peaceful settlement, I offered a roughly 2/3 to 1/3 split to which included the maximum awardable child support in Australia. In talking with this offer was deemed 'more than generous' by both on the basis that had refused to work, against my non-consent, for 14 years of the 18 years marriage. Further, I paid the vast majority of expenses for and raised them as my own as best I knew how. Let's not mention I renovated two houses with the skills taught me by my Uncle while sat on her arse and did bugger all."

Sounds like a man taken to the cleaners by a corrupt court system to me. He goes on to say:

> "She took the proceedings hostile by committing many counts of perjury including false allegations of adultery, domestic abuse, abandonment, and being a poor father to my former children."

There you have it: using the courts to take everything a man has, unsubstantiated claims of abuse, alienating the children, all textbook stuff those in the Men's Human Rights Movement have heard a million times. Sadly though, as his troubles escalated, so did his spiral down into the pits of dementia. More Nolan:

> "THAT is what you married men have to look forward to with the criminal scumbags in the legal fraternity. The scumbag criminals in the legal fraternity did that just to try to make it harder for me to bring them to justice. Well? They failed. And I expect men like YOU, dear reader, to take severe exception to the fact that the Family Law is actually unlawful and that your lawyers, magistrates and judges are criminal scumbags."

Claiming that the family court system is full of scumbags is probably true, but you'll notice the thinly veiled hints of conspiracy beginning to show.

> "As a law-abiding man I have determined that ALL those who committed crimes against me will be brought to trial before a common law court. A common law court is a 'people's court' and has superior recognition in law than the corrupt 'Family Court' and 'Australian Federal Magistrates Court'. And if you, dear reader, do not think these courts are corrupt I have news for you."

Nolan now implies himself to be somewhat the legal eagle, and attempts to school us as to proper terminology and practice. Additionally, he now exposes his belief in "personal sovereignty" wherein no court of law in any land has jurisdiction over him. To further exemplify that, from his book The Truth Be Told:

> "This is a Lawful Notice to women and their mangina lackeys who would make up lies and slander me.
>
> My calling, Peter-Andrew: Nolan(c) and the strawman name PETER ANDREW NOLAN(c) is copyrighted worldwide. So is my image and all aspects of my human self. Here is the contract for that copyright.
>
> http://www.crimesagainstfathers.com/australia/Forums2/tabid/369/forumid/190/threadid/1103/scope/posts/Default.aspx
>
> Any woman or mangina lackey who uses my name, my calling or my image without my written consent signed in red ink by my hand only is violating my copyright.
>
> The cost of copyright violation PER VIOLATION is 1,000 troy ounces of 99.99% pure gold. So all of you women and mangina lackeys might want to consider that before you write your lies about me. I will pursue copyright violations ANYWHERE IN THE WORLD so as to collect gold to be able to re-distribute to those I perceive as in need. Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to take gold off women and their mangina lackeys and give it to men who are struggling to raise their boys because of the oppressive nature of the western 'legal' system today.
>
> Any slander of me will be pursued ANYWHERE IN THE WORLD. So if you women tell lies about me and try and[sic] slander me to damage my business you will be pursued. I will take your property off you as a point of honour.
>
> If any woman wishes to make a rebuttal for anything I have said they are welcome to do so directly to me at peter@peternolan.com on an Affidavit with a Notice of Intent and Proposed Remedy signed under penalty of perjury and full commercial liability."

UH-OH! I'm in trouble now! Maybe I should have gotten his permission to do an opinion piece based on easily and readily available information on the internet! And in case you doubt his superior abilities, please allow me to have Mr. Peter-Andrew: Nolan(c) (or is it Joschua-Brandon: Boehm(c) I forget) to tell you in his own words how like uber-totally-awesome like totally he is!

> Firstly, I am one of the top Business Intelligence Consultants in the world. I have been doing BI for 22+ years and been in IT for 30+ years. We can build data warehouses about 2x faster and cheaper than anyone else can. We are now licensing our software on a subscription basis so that it is easier to acquire.
>
> Under the calling of Joschua-Brandon: Boehm(c) I am also the sole founder of the global Mens Business Association. This is a global business network that will operate outside the jurisdiction of any government > entities.

>
> I am one of the worlds leading experts in law and governments. We have decided we don't like the existing governments so we are creating a way of doing business outside the existing governments jurisdiction.
>
> We will have our own courts, own passports, own laws, own contracts, own work permits, own bank, own currency. You name it. It if is run by the guvment today we are going to have an alternative that can be used by choice.

And that is just the illuminati anti-government stuff, it gets better folks. Nolan really begins to shine a light upon his neurosis and hatred of women with little gems like this;

> "I shall be placing her before a court in Ireland, in front of 12 men (women failed the challenge to try her justly) and those 12 men will define what remedy she is to pay for the crimes she has committed. My commitment is that NO MAN can be given more severe remedy than is delivered to . is going to be the Irish Test Case for women being truely 'equal'. As in 'equal before the law'. We shall see how she likes that."
>
> Too many men have had their right to liberty violated by women who tell lies to the police to get their husbands arrested to 'teach them who is boss around here'. Who is boss around here, in Australia, in the future, will be the man of the house.
>
> To any woman who complains? F off. I am not interested in the comments of ANY women. Women have been asked for 2.5 years to assist stop the needless deaths of tens of thousands of men. They ALL refused. You women can stand back and see what condoning perjury, kidnapping, extortion and theft gets you. ANY WOMAN who attempts to impede my progress in this activity will be charged with obstructing a peace officer in the course of his duty as well as attempting to pervert the cause of justice.
>
> ANY WOMAN who gets in my way will be facing a jury trial of 12 men to determine if you have committed a crime. You can 'get on board' or 'stand aside'.

Now I ask you folks. Are these the words of an "angry man" that has gotten beaten down by the divorce and family courts? I say no. These are the rantings of a man who has gone above and beyond, blaming the illuminati, government, courts, and most of all women. He has now entered the nutter zone.

So disillusioned is he that when he finds himself with possible allies – or at least folks who might actually listen to his "remedy" – he takes loonyville to an all-new high. Below are but a few excerpts from a recent chat session whereas he literally goes over the edge. The following was captured [unedited] last month in a public chat forum for Men's Rights Activists and Men Going Their Own Way:

> [2/13/2014 7:39:48 PM] peternolan9: I am the only man in the world who has had the guts to video record a family court matter and put it on YT and tell the guvment involved I will kill anyone who tries to incarcerate me for that.
>
> Man in the man-o-sphere are a bunch of fucking pussies who deseve everything happening to them…..you take the crimes commited against you up the arse and all you do is whine…..no guts…it is a total disgace.
>
> [2/13/2014 7:40:19 PM] peternolan9: You are not "men" at all….and it is shown by the fact that no other man has done what I have done IN THE ENTIRE WORLD.
>
> Pussies.
>
> [2/13/2014 8:07:42 PM] peternolan9: "So basically, you're okay with men dying if they don't serve YOUR purpose."
>
> No..I have no concern with useless eater losers kiling themselves if they are not willing to defend the children of their land….and fuckwits like you try to tell lies about me because you have no track record to point to…

> Go and kill yourself…be fertiliser..then you would be doing somethign useful.
>
> Until you have equaled my track record? Fuck off and die.
>
> [2/13/2014 8:10:17 PM] peternolan9: I started this with "there is no point talking to men in the mra area becayse they are not willing to listen yet"
>
> And this short interaction shows exactly that…
>
> A bunch of losers who tolerate disgusting and disgraceful behaviour..
>
> That is why the MGTOW boards just went down…you tolerate shitheads and fuckwits…..no one can take you losers seriously…certainly not me.
>
> I expect to be treated with the respect I have earned…and those who tolerate fuckwit
>
> [2/13/2014 8:23:38 PM] peternolan9: @all,
>
> my opinion is that in the mens rights/fathers rights area you are well advised to kick out and fuckwit loser who slanders another man and any fuckwit loser who does not show due respect to men who have earned it.
>
> Until you are willing to do that? These fuckwits poison everything they touch….kick them to the curn and tell them to go kill themselves in some mans rose garden and be fertiliser such that they are doing something useful….get rid if the liars, the slanderers, the men of no honour…they are of no value to anyone…they are worthless human scum who would make the world a better place by not being in it.

"Go and kill yourself." This is the sort of thing you say to men who've had their rights violated and, frequently, their lives destroyed? Everyone who doesn't do things exactly the way he wants them to is a fuckwit loser, demands for respect he really hasn't earned and titanic rage at anyone who doesn't give him exactly what he wants?

I think you probably get the point. The fact is that this article is just a smidgen of the vile hatred and bad advice this man trades in. He is not just angry, he is giving bad, dangerous advice that could land you in jail, and abusing anyone who questions his judgement. He wishes deaths on those who disagree with him. He is telling people who may or may not be emotionally unstable (he has no idea) that they should kill themselves. This is the ravings of a lunatic living on the fringe who spends his time attempting to turn himself into a pseudo-martyr.

Last year, Emily Shire attempted to put up the lunatic Nolan as a good example of our movement. Interestingly, even when we informed her that we repudiated Nolan and highly questionable behavior attributed to him, she issued no retraction or apologies. For the record we also think he offers dubious and legally dangerous advice; maybe you'll have success with some of his recommended methods or services, but we are doubtful.

The MRM and specifically AVfM doesn't need nor want so-called Men's Rights advocates like Nolan. Those who deem it necessary to use individuals like him as a poster child of the men (and women) within the Men's Human Rights Movement need to take notice: Nolan is NOT a Men's Rights Activist. Actually, now that I think about it, I think Nolan would better fit within the feminist ranks. Right up there with the likes of Dworkin, Steinem, Marcotte and the rest of those hate-mongers.

For those readers inclined to slow down looking for the dead bodies in an auto accident may wish to check out the below links for more examples of Nolan's madness. Me? I've had enough. I'm going to open up another cold one and just keep this article handy for the next time someone throws this guy up as an example of who we are and what we do. He ain't, folks.

'nuff said for now I think!

Trigger Warning

Those of you easily triggered by a PTSD reaction to stupid crazy insanity may wish to avoid the following links. Read at your own risk!

http://theweek.com/article/index/251753/a-short-guide-to-the-mens-rights-movement http://www.buzzfeed.com/ryanhatesthis/this-is-what-happens-when-anonymous-accuses-you-of-faking-a http://peternolanstalker.blogspot.com/2012/11/peter-andrew-nolan-wanted-in-four.html

http://www.crimesagainstfathers.com/australia/Forums/tabid/82/forumid/39/threadid/45/scope/posts/Default.aspx

http://omegavirginrevolt.wordpress.com/2013/06/29/the-reason-why-the-manosphere-attracts-scams-by-the-truckload/http://www.rawstory.com/rs/2013/10/22/ohio-university-student-attacked-by-internet-trolls-after-shes-misidentified-as-alleged-rape-victim-in-online-video/http://kickass.to/z01-my-court-meeting-2009-11-26-with-captions-t8040023.html

http://www.quatloos.com/Q-Forum/viewtopic.php?f=37&t=6922

http://ironorchid.kinja.com/peter-nolan-the-mra-redpill-member-who-doxxed-innocent-1451980101

http://peterandrewnolan.kinja.com/

http://ironorchid.kinja.com/peter-nolan-the-mra-redpill-member-who-doxxed-innocent-1451980101

http://justgroundsonline.com/forum/topic/listForContributor?user=3hsx03cwfo0hm http://www.jewishterrorism.com/category/peter-andrew-nolan-facebook-stalker/http://peternolanterrorist.blogspot.com/2013/06/where-scumbag-mulsim-terrorist-peter.html

http://kickass.to/k04-kevin-flanagan-slandering-peter-andrew-nolan-19-01-2014-mp3-t8619531.html

http://www.henrymakow.com/peter_nolan.html

http://loveforlife.com.au/content/11/03/26/peter-andrew-nolan-lawful-notice-police-be-they-peace-officers-or-policy-enforcers-http://www.nswpolicecrime.com/viewtopic.php?f=31&t=482&sid=119c7323326ac7054af03a6d1308db63

http://pbedit.blogspot.com/p/blog-page_14.html

http://www.webmaster-talk.com/threads/240039-Introducing-Peter-Nolan

http://manofthemonth.wordpress.com/2012/11/12/motm-november-2012-boycott-american-women-author/

http://www.worldofsuck.net/index.php/peter-nolan-second-wrong-doesn?blog=10

http://www.nydailynews.com/news/national/ohio-student-called-false-rape-accuser-hiding-school-article-1.1495081 http://www.godlikeproductions.com/forum1/message1846696/pg1

http://www.mensbusinessassociation.com/Forums/tabid/752/forumid/85/scope/threads/Default.aspx

http://www.the-bi-professionals.com/

http://www.manbook.biz/

http://www.man-bank.biz/

COMMENTS left in various forums. Notice the frequent zing between apparently almost-sane and completely insane comments, and the use of the various names listed at the top of this article:

http://www.returnofkings.com/3579/the-manosphere-is-approaching-a-tipping-point#!

http://cboye.wordpress.com/2012/04/01/well-that-was-obscure/

http://www.happierabroad.com/forum/viewtopic.php?t=14852

http://www.the-spearhead.com/2011/09/27/australian-rape-political-prosecution-going-to-high-court/

http://manofthemonth.wordpress.com/2012/11/12/motm-november-2012-boycott-american-women-author/

http://www.broadsheet.ie/2012/11/09/id-like-to-thank-my-agent/

http://therationalmale.com/2013/05/06/remove-the-man/

http://www.guilfordian.com/opinion/2013/09/13/feminism-should-not-be-a-dirty-word/

http://www.fstdt.com/QuoteComment.aspx?QID=87880

http://www.returnofkings.com/15304/hugo-schwyzer-pulls-a-mark-minter#!

http://www.patheos.com/blogs/bristolpalin/2013/06/climbing-with-tripp/http://www.varight.com/news/e-w-jackson-makes-a-stirring-speech-in-mechanicsville-tonight/http://www.returnofkings.com/23597/the-growing-epidemic-of-sexual-dysfunction-among-women#!

The most important reason to attend the International Men's Conference in Detroit on June 27 & 28

AVfM Video Source · 13 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What better reason could there be?

Remember, you can register right here.

ESPN hosts take a stand for due pln Ray Rice case

Ty Henry · 14 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In a what could be a watershed Red Pill moment in sports media, ESPN Radio and TV hosts Max Kellerman and Marcellus Wiley turned down a ticket on the "Crucify Ray Rice Express." Instead, they called for caution and patience for the facts to unfurl, and patently rejected the concept of male self-defense as a moral failing.

Ray Rice is a star running back for the 2013 Super Bowl champion Baltimore Ravens, with a sterling reputation for character, work ethic, and is well known for his infectious and ebullient personality.

That all took a major hit Valentine's Day weekend after a fateful night at a New Jersey casino. On February 14, Rice and his fiance, Janay Palmer, went to dinner at Revel Casino. Details are still sketchy, but witnesses say that a verbal altercation ensued at some point during the evening, and that at some point it became physical, with Palmer striking Rice a few times. Both parties were arrested for the disturbance.

Within days, a video surfaced that showed Rice exiting an elevator, dragging a limp Palmer in front of him. Based on this, many were ready to make Rice into Ike Turner or Jim Brown, without regard to circumstance.

On the other hand, WIley & Kellerman, who host "SportsNation" on ESPNU, took a nuanced view. If Palmer was beating on Rice as some reports allege, then she was partially responsible for the end result.

Neither man took sides, which is victory for fairness and a bold position in this social and political climate. Kellerman took a firm stance for treating women as, well, fully sentient human beings and moral agents, stating emphatically, "if an adult strikes another adult, you are at their mercy."

Wiley, a former NFL Defensive Tackle, relates a story where his live-in girlfriend began to strike him about the face. He was able to maneuver himself out of the house, and get to a neighbor's, but recognizes that had he been in the house when arrested, HE would have been the one in the headlines (and the mugshot).

Kudos to Kellerman and Wiley, both fathers of daughters, for taking a stand for due process and against the entitlement to hit with impunity that drives many women to write checks they can't possibly cash. At the very least, we know two households where both boys AND girls are being taught the message, "keep your hands to yourselves." With what we know about gender parity in domestic violence, if more folks similarly raised their daughters the same way, the rate of intimate partner violence would plummet.

Feminism seeks rights without responsibilities

Ernest Belfort Bax · 14 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following quotes are excerpted from the writings of E.B. Bax, on the subject of rights and responsibilities for women. – PW

"These dogmas of "advanced" faith in the Woman Question are… namely, that women ought to have all the rights of intellectual capacity with all the privileges of physical weakness, otherwise expressed, all the rights of men, and none of the duties or hardships of men. For it is a significant and amusing fact that no mention is ever made by the advocate of women's claims of the privileges which have always been accorded the "weaker sex." These privileges are quietly pocketed as a matter of course, without any sort of acknowledgment, much less any suggestion of surrender."
Some Heterodox Notes on the Women Question (1887)

"Now in order to maintain this position it is necessary to assume the complete intellectual and moral equality of women with men, while judiciously conceding their physical inferiority. A desire, conscious or unconscious, on the part of these Socialists, as of other advocates of Feminism, is to make out a claim for women to all that is honourable and agreeable in the functions of human life, while safeguarding them from any obligation to accept rough or dangerous duties. Thus Bebel, in his "Frau und der Sozialismus," while maintaining that no social function filled by men ought to be inaccessible to women, since any seeming unfitness in the latter is only the result of certain cruel oppression at the hands of vile man, yet is careful to guard his fair clients from the danger of being called upon for military purposes, even of defence."
Feminism in Extremis (1902)

"What does the woman's-rights movement demand? Female privilege, and when possible, female domination. It asks that women shall have all the rights of men with privileges thrown in (but no disagreeable duties, oh dear no!), and apparently be subject to no discipline but that of their own arbitrary wills. To exclude women on the ground of incapacity from any honourable, lucrative, or agreeable social function whatever, is a hideous injustice to be fulminated against from platform and in press – to treat them on the same footing as men in the matter of subordination to organised control or discipline is not to be thought of – is ungentlemanly ungallant, unchivalrous! … Advanced women and their male supporters in demanding all that is lucrative, honourable, and agreeable in the position of men take their stand on the dogma of sex-equality. No sooner, however, is the question one of disagreeable duties than "equality" goes by the board and they slink behind the old sex-immunity."
The "Monstrous Regiment" of Womanhood (1907)

"From all we have said, it will now be evident, one would think, to the most prejudiced reader that modern English Law, following obsequiously a deluded or apathetic stage of public opinion, has solved the problem of the division of rights and duties between the sexes, by conceding to woman all rights, and imposing on man all duties."

The Legal Subjection of Men, Chapter IX: A Sex Noblesse (1908)

"This public opinion regards it as axiomatic that women are capable of everything men are capable of, that they ought to have full responsibility in all honourable and lucrative functions and callings. There is only one thing for which unlimited allowance ought to be made on the ground of their otherwise non-existent womanly inferiority, and that is their own criminal or tortious acts! In a word, they are not to be held responsible, in the sense that men are, for their own actions when these entail unpleasant consequences for themselves. On the contrary, the obloquy and, where possible, the penalty for the wrong-doing is to be shifted on to the nearest wretched man with whom they have consorted."
Why I Am an Anti-Suffragist (1909)

"From being part of a general code of manners enjoined upon a particular guild or profession it has been degraded to mean the exclusive right in one sex guaranteed by law and custom to certain advantages and exemptions without any corresponding responsibility."
The Fraud of Feminism, Chapter V: The "Chivalry" Fake (1913)

"Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking."
The Fraud of Feminism, Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement (1913)

Brantford Lawyer accused of second scandal

Dan Perrins · 14 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On February 26, 2014 I made a video called "Notice Given: If You Lie about Men I Will Expose Your Lies"

The video was made as a direct result of what I witnessed in a case before the Brantford Ontario Courts. In the video I mention Tom, a regular guy who is going through a pretty tough custody battle.

Tom alleges that his ex-wife's lawyer, David Maltby, has acted dishonestly in the case and that he has intentionally obstructed Tom's efforts to achieve a just resolution to the matter. Tom claims that Maltby has intentionally entered false information on court forms; delivered court documents to the wrong address outside of the prescribed time; and that his ex, Cindy, made it difficult for him to visit his child.

While Tom's allegations are yet to be tested in a court of law, Maltby (a Brantford lawyer whose main areas of practice are family, real estate and civil litigation) has acted unprofessionally before. Maltby was found guilty by the Law Society of Upper Canada of misleading a client and delaying delivery of legal documents to a second lawyer the client hired. According to Maltby, "I delayed the case although it was commenced through another lawyer. I acknowledged what I did and admitted I had not served my client well." Maltby had lied to his client over the course of SIX YEARS, telling her that he was working on her behalf (while under retainer) despite the fact that he hadn't begun any legal action.

That case was originally covered by Susan Gamble, of the Brantford Expositer.

On February 23, 2014 I was given the opportunity to view the trial record delivered to Tom's mother on February 19. The trial record contained numerous documents spanning approximately three years of appearances. There are several discrepancies in the trial record produced by Maltby, some of which were not even known to Tom. These discrepancies, however, corroborate Tom's claims of dishonest acts by Maltby.

The opening sentence of the cover letter states that Tom's mother's place was the only one on record Maltby had. This claim from Maltby, however, isn't accurate. Men's Human Rights Ontario has obtained copies of documents that prove that Maltby had documents in his possession with Tom's real address on them.

The first set of documents below are called a Form 8 (General). On page 2 of this document there is a date of July 14, 2010 and next to that the clerk of the court line starts off with "David" and then the letter "M" and what looks to be an "A". These 2 letters are scratched out and under them a last name of Thompson is entered.
[image]On page 3 of the Form 8 we have under the respondent's (Tom's) section his correct date of birth entered. I confirmed his correct date of birth first via Tom's birth certificate, second confirmation was by his mother. Also on page 3 of the Form 8 in the section where the children are listed; in this section Tom's non-biological child is missing.

In the check box where it asks if the parties or the children have been involved in court cases before, it is indicated that an application was discontinued and the parties had reconciled.

[image]
Page 5 of the Form 8 is signed by the applicant Tom's ex 'Cindy' on July 14, 2010.

The next document is a Form 35.1 Affidavit in support of Claim for Custody or Access, dated on page 2. Cindy indicates in section 3 that there is a non-biological child to Tom involved.

[image]
She also states she has only been involved in a custody or access case with the biological child of Tom and Cindy in section 4.
[image]Page 5 is signed by Cindy and a commissioner for taking affidavits. The date on this is July 14, 2010. The signature is David Maltby's. Also on the trial record with a date of July 14, 2010 is a Form 6 B, affidavit of service.

Maltby indicates he served both documents on Tom and that the 'author' was Cindy. On the first sheet of all 3 documents in the bottom right hand corner is the website logo "www.DIVORCEmate.com"

According to the company website DIVORCEmate is, "Software for the Canadian Family Law Practitioner" and is only available to law practitioners according to its Try Now section; "Note: Trial installation keys will only be provided to family law professionals."

This seems to indicate that the signature found on page 2 of Form 8 is that of Maltby, or there is a David Thompson Cindy visited shortly before Maltby who has a habit of starting to sign his last name with the letters M and A and they also use DIVORCEmate

David Thompson also has a habit of switching from using all capitals in his first name to using just the first letter of his surname capitalized. The way David Thompson enters the date bears a striking resemblance to how Maltby signs the date too.

It seems very unlikely Cindy went to 2 different lawyers on July 14 to get her paper work done.

At tab 16 of the trial record dated November 22, 2012 a Form 25F Restraining Order, Final is issued.

In the respondent section where Tom's name is to go his date of birth has been changed from 1966 to a different month day and year. It now reads off as Jan 1 1967. Also of note in the respondent section of this form is Tom's correct address. This disproves Maltby's letter that arrived with the trial record which claimed Tom's mother's place was the only address they had on record.

Going back to the claim made by Cindy on her Form 35.1, in section 4 she claimed she has never been involved in a custody / access case before. However, I was able to talk to the father of Cindy's first child and confirm that there was another custody battle. The custody / access case took place in 2006. This information was deliberately left off the Form 35.1…. and David Maltby was Cindy's lawyer in that case as well.

In an interview I did with Matt, the father of Cindy's first child, he also claimed documents were delivered to the wrong address. Matt also claimed, like Tom, that Cindy made it difficult for him to see the child.

All of this evidence will be entered in a complaint with the Law Society of Upper Canada against Maltby according to Tom.

Those who would lie about men are no longer able to do so with impunity in Southern Ontario.

Feminism's cracking foundation

John Hembling (JtO) · 15 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism's credibility problem is growing.

It was always there. It was always going to get bigger. And now, for the die-hard fans of that particular cult of gender, hatred, violence-by-proxy and self-selecting phony victimhood, even for the self-identifying feminists it's getting harder to ignore.

Rape culture? Are you fucking kidding me? Of course, campus feminists have been driving our culture's social narrative with a made-up statistic claiming 1 out of every 4 female college students is being raped.

You can visit the gender studies web page of almost any major university for this nugget of so-called reality.

According to the Sexual Assault Centre of Hamilton Ontario: "1 in 4 women will be sexually assaulted."

Roger Williams University repeats the 1 in 4 statistic and, in an effort to bolster the legitimacy of the claim, includes a citation of the original debunked Mary Koss "study".

Apparently, whatever young gender studies acolyte updated the RWU facts page wasn't aware that linking to the Koss study, well-known for its fraud would not increase believability of the claim.

The University of the Sciences in Philadelphia claims of their web page that Approximately one in four college aged women is date raped or experiences an attempted date rape during her college years.

At Duke University, where an estimated 7300 female students attend annualy, the campus police department's web page reports that between January 1 and March 1 2014, there were three incidents of sexual misconduct. They were, one incident of sexual assault, one incident of sexual battery, and one molestation of fire extinguisher.

Although the police report doesn't include much detail, the fire extinguisher was painted a particularly slutty and inviting shade of red, and the report on the duke.edu police summary page did not use the term "tampering with safety equipment" or "vandalism".

But if 1 in 4 college women are sexually assaulted on college campuses, assuming 8 years on campus, there should be at least 60 rapes at Duke between January and March this year.

If we include the fire extinguisher, only 3 incidents of sexual victimization amounts to merely one-twentieth of the expected number. Perhaps, later in the year, as we approach christmas, rapes escalate, due to abundance of christmas decorations, or snow, and possibly roofies in the egg-nog.

In reality, only .0125 % of the women and fire safety equipment on any particular college campus are likely to face rape, sexual assault, or molestation.

And this, according to feminists, is rape culture. Apparently. But feminism's credibility problem is growing. It's increasingly obvious that the matter of the empress having no clothes is widely understood. But just like any totalitarian regime, social pressure produces outward agreement that; oh yes, we all love Dear Leader.

And "we" all have to keep pretending, too. At least, those of us who aren't snotty-faced kids, naively believing our kindergarden teacher who told us to tell the truth.

But, the empress has no clothes, and a cult of phony self-selected victimhood, violence by proxy, and cultivated conflation of masculine identity with malice is a road to guaranteeing an ever increasing societal disfunction.

In late February the National Post ran an article by Barbara Kay, called Rape culture and the delusions of the feminist mind.

Unlike the snotty faced kids at AVfM, pointing out the emperor's pimply and bare ass, Barbara Kay's mention of that populist public feminist fraud signals a non-trivial crack in the foundation that a crooked house is built on.

Even the gender ideologues at squirrel-central are trying, as fast as they can, to paper over the bigger holes in their own public myth making.

A fraudulent accusation of rape, against a musician of significant accomplishment, filed not through any police force or legal court, but in the emotionally frothy forum of internet comments threads on a dozen different web-sites. Ordinarily, the narrative from the populist cult of gender would be uniformly that she is the victim! The accusation is proof!!!! He is a rapisssssszzzzzzt!!! And, by the way, and in addition to these noble truths we all hold self evident, anyone who dares to question such orthodoxy is a R-A-P-E … A-P-O-L-O-G-I-S-T !!!!!!!!!!

However, rather than follow that well worn path, our friends, the squirrels over at Jezebel have come out on the side of sense. The fraudulent accusation of rape, and the devastation of such vicious attack-visits into the life of a man so accused, was actually recognized by Jezebel squirrel-editorial board:

> Last week, Bright Eyes musician Connor Oberst filed a lawsuit for libel against a reported "anonymous commenter" who posted on various websites that he raped her. But Joanie Faircloth was not anonymous—she left the original comments under her name, and her commenter account was linked to her Facebook. Her broad social-media presence left quite a record, too, and now it will be used to discredit her. It turns out the Internet is not a vacuum, and what we say can have very real consequences.

This is the squirrel-factory recognizing the increasing divide between their own cultivated narrative, and the widely held values of a broader audience. The violent, psychopathic and socially toxic ideology leaves a lot of back-pedalling and explaining to do.

Returning to Jezebel, "what we say can have very real consequences." Fraudelent accusations, which a year ago, mainstream feminists have said almost never happen – are now acknowledged for the carnage they bring. Social justice, accusation, indictment, and penalty absent of the evidential inquiry of a court of law, practiced by the morally superior – turns out not to be such a great idea.

And, of course in the emerging realization among gender ideologues that theirs is the unreasonable point of view, a great repositioning will follow. This will last, of course only as long as public discourse continues to correctly point out the hatred and violence at the heart of gender ideology. The populist public hallucination that the demographic least impacted by violence is society's victim class is not what a rational minded demographic will cling to for multiple decades.

Indeed, the dialling back of feminist rhetoric from the flat absurdity of rape culture, sex-differentiated alcoholic unconsent, or mono-directional domestic violence, to merely unreasonable stupidity. Such as the stupidity of claiming the sexual demographic dying in mines, fishing, logging and every other death profession are the secret overlords of the world, while the leisure caste dominating the spending of disposable income, and the electorate, and higher education are, by some strange measure; oppressed. It's called patriarchy, and when suicide rates, death rates, employment rates, education are pointed out in obvious refutation, well, we are all to be assured that "patriarchy hurts men too, stupid".

Of course, prior to rolling back the excesses of an ideology promoting male extermination, spousal murder or rhetoric addressing economically marginalized men as out-of-date appliances, that ideology has accomplished much we will all be left with.

As a culture, we have become inured to the feminist screeching of the word victim to excuse acts of profound violence when committed by women. Whether it happens to be true or not, a narrative of past personal grievance is obediently trotted out whenever murder, or rape, or brutal violence committed by woman makes it into our media. So, we are now accustomed to an acculturated belief in not only women as automatic-status victims, but also violent offenders with an automatic cultural pass for any violent or criminal act. Nicole Ryan who hired a hit man to kill her husband was excused because her murder trial was causing too much stress. Kasey Anthony excused of the murder of her infant because, apparently, her father mistreated her as a child.

Meredith Borowiec avoided the 12 year sentence that prosecutors reccomended for the dumsper disposal of 3 of her 4 infants, 2 of whom died as a result of the her bagging and binning them. Why is she, a serial killer of her own newborn not in a prison cell for the remainder of time? Because, according to Judge Peter McIntyre, speaking to Borowiec said "You have no criminal record. All three offences were committed while your mind was disturbed while giving birth. In law, your responsibility was diminished."

Good news for infant killers. Do it quickly after your kid is born, while that particular pass for killing a baby remains in effect.

We also now have an indoctrinated merging in our culture of our conception of women – who happen to be our sisters, colleagues or friends – with the concept of gender ideologues. Those being the same gender ideologues who have taught us by their actions that they are violent, censorious, totalitarian, amoral promoters of human damage for the questionable benefit of playing king of the hill in an endless and cynical game of moral one-up-manship and false piety. The perceptual line between ideologue, thug, tyrant, and the people supposedly spoken for by such is blurred. Women, who have been too long conflated in public discourse with feminists, now enjoy a deep mistrust earned by the cult of control-by-culitvated victim status.

"Pop-feminism," as a movement, valorises feelings above reason, cynicism above hope. It has regressed to a point where anything at all, no matter how irrational or how narcissistic, can be celebrated as 'feminist'.

But assuming this cult, recognizing loss of control on public discourse, continues to dial down from frothy squirrel frappe to mere slimy squirrel smoothie what will be left?

Absent the violence by proxy of feminism's collaborating enforcers – we end up with a social emotional exhaustion about any claim of victimhood, even from actual victims when they happen to be female. If all sex is rape, as gendered thought police now insist – then exhausted, nobody can muster much actual care for real victims who might be dotted around our social landscape.

However, in the growing public acknowledgement of what most of us have known privately for a very long time, we are afforded the opportunity for honest expression without the fear of life-derailing social reprisal.

As a culture, we don't have to tolerate the demands of liars, tyrants, thugs, and bullies, simply because they claim our rejection (of their abject reality denying stupidity) amounts to hatred of an entire sexual demographic.

Feminists, after a generations-long tenure in sole charge of gender discourse, should get used to being told, sharply and without apology – to fuck off.

Editorial note: Feature image by Ryan Joy

E-mail RAINN on Saturday, March 15, 2014

AVFM · 15 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The current FBI definition of rape is "The penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim." As we've said before, this erases victims of rape who are forced to penetrate, generally men forced to have sex with women. The number of victims who are erased this way is not insignificant; according to the 2010 CDC NISVS, it's almost equal to the number of women who are raped.

While the FBI definition doesn't have a direct legal impact, it affects how crime statistics are collected and serves as a model to state legislatures. This continued erasure is a self-perpetuating cycle that must be stopped. Rape victims who are not ciswomen victimized by cismen need more support. With this in mind, I'm asking any readers of this post to help me in an effort to try to create a world in which fewer rape victims are erased.

While it's probably unrealistic to expect the FBI to change their definition again in the next few years, it might be possible to encourage certain other organizations to stop erasing male victims. RAINN in particular is a very popular source of statistics regarding rape, some of which erase many victims.

I'd like to get as many people as possible to contact RAINN at info@rainn.org and/or chelseab@rainn.org on Saturday, March 15, 2014, asking them to consider using a more gender-inclusive definition for their statistics and rape awareness campaigns. It would be best for all of this contact to happen all on the same day; it's easy to ignore a few scattered pleas, but a flood of concern is harder to brush off. Until that date, I'd like people to reblog this post and spread the message as much as possible. Talking to local feminist groups or other gender rights-oriented groups is particularly important. Additionally, I'd like anyone interested in taking a more active role to contact me; a clearer line of communication would help me organize this effort.

While we most likely will not succeed at actually getting RAINN to change their policies, this campaign will increase the visibility male victims, help us learn how to organize social justice campaigns, foster positive connections with feminist groups, and encourage greater activism within the MRM and egalitarian movements.

What do you guys think?

-DJ

info@rainn.org is the "umbrella" RAINN e-mail for contact. Here's a possible general model for e-mails directed there:

I'm an individual concerned about gender issues. While RAINN's overall message and purpose is amazing, your methods often are both problematic and uninclusive.

Your definition of rape, which can be found at http://www.rainn.org/get-information/types-of-sexual-assault/definition-of-rape, is pretty intersectional. However, it directly contradicts one statistic regarding male victims that can be found athttp://www.rainn.org/get-information/statistics/sexual-assault-victims. The current FBI definition of rape is "The penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim." This erases victims of rape who are forced to penetrate, generally men who are forced to have sex with women. The number of victims erased this way is not insignificant; according to the CDC NISVS, it's almost equal to the number of women who are raped. More information on the topic can be found at http://permutationofninjas.org/post/57003274589/gender-symmetry-in-sexual-assault-an-analysis-of-the.

You should change some of the information on your site and materials to more accurately represent the facts. Additionally, some particular campaigns, such as http://www.rainn.org/get-information/sexual-assault-prevention/men-can-help, should become more inclusive. Changing the message from "men can try to stop rape" to "everyone should try to stop rape" would be a good start towards addressing sexual assault without erasing male victims or female perpetrators.

chelseab@rainn.org is an e-mail line for membership inquiries. Here's a possible model for e-mails directed there:

Mrs. Chelsea Bowers,

I'm an individual concerned about gender issues. RAINN's overall message and purpose is amazing, and I'd be interested in joining and supporting your organization. However, your methods often seem both problematic and uninclusive.

Your definition of rape, which can be found at http://www.rainn.org/get-information/types-of-sexual-assault/definition-of-rape, isn't the best, but it's okay. However, it directly contradicts one statistic regarding male victims that can be found athttp://www.rainn.org/get-information/statistics/sexual-assault-victims. The current FBI definition of rape is "The penetration, no matter how slight, of the vagina or anus with any body part or object, or oral penetration by a sex organ of another person, without the consent of the victim." This erases victims of rape who are forced to penetrate, generally men who are forced to have sex with women. The number of victims erased this way is not insignificant; according to the CDC NISVS, it's almost equal to the number of women who are raped. More information on the topic can be found at http://permutationofninjas.org/post/57003274589/gender-symmetry-in-sexual-assault-an-analysis-of-the.

You should change some of the information on your site and materials to more accurately represent the facts. Additionally, some particular campaigns, such as http://www.rainn.org/get-information/sexual-assault-prevention/men-can-help, should really become more inclusive. Changing the message from "men can try to stop rape" to "everyone should try to stop rape" would be a good start towards addressing sexual assault without erasing male victims or female perpetrators.

Thank you, and I'd love to hear back from you!

(YOUR NAME)

Editorial note: reprinted from Permutation of Ninjas. –DE

Map: which sex receives more education worldwide?

Jonathan Taylor · 16 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Here's an interesting map that should raise more questions than it answers: which sex receives more education worldwide? We'll be dissecting and analyzing this map in this article.

Click it to enlarge:

The first question regarding the map should be its credibility. This map was not produced by any particular research institution, but by a man named Alexandr Trubetskoy who apparently has a penchant for making infographic-style maps.
I wouldn't begrudge anyone making maps, graphs, and so forth, regarding educational data on their own, however. As this website has documented time and time again, many of the education "experts" have been out to lunch when it comes to the topic of educational equity for men and boys. So we can't reasonably expect a wealth of presentable material from them anyway.

On a similar note, I made my own graphs regarding degrees conferred by sex, for example, from data from the National Center for Education Statistics. I made them because I searched high and low for graphs made by "the experts," but – lo and behold – I could not find any.

Let's look at some of the claims made about this map. According to Alexandr Trubetskoy (my comments are interspersed):

- This map shows which gender has more years of expected education in their country.

So it's not entirely based on what education grown men and women have received over the past several decades, but rather a rough prediction of the degree of education men and women are expected to receive, on average.

- Data was taken from the CIA World Factbook and UNESCO statistics through UNdata.

Unfortunately, no direct link to the actual data was given. Instead, the links direct us to the front pages of the CIA and UN Data websites. This is a strike against the credibility of the map: you can't make people hunt for data through a labyrinth of links and expect it to be taken at face value. You must provide direct links to direct data.

That is not to say that the data is incorrect, however. I think the map can best be described as an approximation of the distribution of education between the sexes, rather than anything exact.

Also, briefly off-topic: is anyone else intrigued by the fact that the CIA has a "Kids Zone" on their website?

Continuing:

- Generally, in developed countries, women are most likely to spend more years in education than men. A notable exception is South Korea. The opposite is generally true for low-income countries.

This should surprise no one. In countries that are very poor, traditional gender roles (such are the male provider / female child rearer role) are much more rigid and exaggerated. There are also many more barriers and limitations regarding access to birth control that tend to trap women in the child rearing role earlier in life (which also, consequently, tend to trap men in the provider role).

Never underestimate the impact of the introduction of birth control in western countries. Compelling arguments can be made that birth control is the single advancement that is the most responsible for women's empowerment and liberation. Indeed, the radical jump in women's education occurred around the same time as the advent and proliferation of the birth control pill (mid-60's onward).

And let's also remember that the birth control pill was invented by men. The same men who – we are told by Feminists – have historically wanted to do nothing but oppress women.

Trubetskoy continues:

- Middle income countries typically have women receiving more education, or have men and women with an equal number of years.

- France, Germany, Japan, Switzerland, Ireland and the Netherlands are major high-income countries where women do not typically receive more years of education than men.

Not sure I agree with everything there. I have some questions regarding the map:

- Does Saudi Arabia really have more educated women than educated men?
- Are Germany and Switzerland really that equal when it comes to education between the sexes?
- Are countries like Indonesia and Malaysia really "equal" concerning education between the sexes because these countries are so advanced in terms of educational equity and human rights? Or is it instead because these countries are so poor and marginalized that they have such little education for anyone regardless of sex? In essence, are such countries educationally "equal" between the sexes only in the sense that men and women both equally have little to no education?

We already know that, in most western countries, women receive substantially more education than men do. So the map is spot-on in that regard. It also confirms a lot of hard data that we have on the matter.

We may be coming back to this map in the future. It is interesting and intriguing. Thanks to Alexandr Trubetskoy for putting it together.

The importance of Emily Jarman's voice

Mike Buchanan · 16 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Every now and then a feminist engages with one of our articles and effectively nominates herself for our "Whiny Woman of the Month" award. Sadly, by doing so, a woman disqualifies herself by virtue of rule #17 in The Whine Club Rule Book, the rule about self-nominations. Emily Jarman has posted a lengthy comment on one of our associated blogs, The Alternative Sexism Project. Her comment is to be found after a piece we posted titled, "How to train your woman like a dog", and it's reproduced in full at the end of this article:

http://thealternativesexismproject.wordpress.com/2013/11/23/how-to-train-your-woman-like-a-dog/

Comments on the Alternative Sexism Project website aren't moderated – a matter which will evidently come as news to Ms. Jarman, as you'll see shortly – but we've warned visitors to the site that if we get a stream of feminist nonsense in the comment streams, we'll introduce moderation. Ms Jarman's comments will appear so manifestly ridiculous to followers of AVfM and our three blogs, that rather than delete it – which would take a matter of seconds – we're going to leave it visible for all to see.

We'll point people towards it at every opportunity, to illustrate our points about feminist thinking. What we won't do is spend more than a little time refuting nonsense we've refuted many times before, or sending her information that shows her claims to be absurd. No feminists ever engage with evidence-based rational arguments, and we're guessing wildly that Ms. Jarman would be no exception. We spend our time engaging with people whose brains are capable of engagement, not brainwashed feminists.

Less than ten minutes after she'd posted her comments, she sent me an email with the same comments, and the rather grandiose subject title, "The importance of my voice". Hmm… Narcissistic Personality Disorder, possibly? We might nominate her for the next "Entitlement Princess of the Month" award.

Ms Jarman's comments take up the rest of this post; we have added one or two things in square brackets:

"Firstly the article to which you refer was posted by a man who went on to say that he did not mean to say that men were less complex than women and he was only writing a funny article. Now before I go on, if you think for a minute that I am in line with your views or sick 'Anti feminist league' [http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com] then you are sorely deluded. In some of the entries written on the J4MB website [http://j4mb.org.uk] you claim that women are out of the woods [other than female forestry workers, obviously] and that there is equality for women, or rather even inequality against men. One of these books written by 'Mike Buchanan' (leader of the site) was entitled Feminism: The Ugly Truth [thanks for the plug] and by taking one glance at this appalling website I am guessing that this book is hardly talking about the ugly truth when it comes to female discrimination. And yes I understand that this man is named Buchanan after Tom Buchanan in The Great Gatsby, a misogynistic, racist character who is meant to be loathsome and considered to have no intelligence, though you clearly idolise (yes I, a women, am capable of reading books!!! You must be so shocked and appalled) [Emily, you're becoming ever more detached from reality. I've never written a word about The Great Gatsby in my life, and I'm fairly confident my surname comes not from a character in any book, but from my recently deceased father. Do go on…]

To begin my reasoning behind women being anything but 'out of the woods' when it comes to gender inequalities, I would like to raise the point that out of 27 MPs in the UK cabinet today, 4 are women and that only 22% of the MPs in the House of Commons are female whereas 52% of the UK population is female, therefore the role of the government in representing the electorate has clearly massively failed here.

[No, Emily, it's women who have 'clearly massively failed here'. For decades they've failed to apply to become prospective parliamentary candidates (PPCs) in anything remotely approaching the number of men who've applied, hence the 'need' for anti-meritocratic all-women PPC shortlists, 'family friendly' working hours, taxpayer-funded creches… and still quite a few of the 2010 intake of female MPs are leaving politics before the 2015 general election! Far more men than women want to be MPs, far more women than men want other lines of work. So what? Should MPs accurately reflect the proportion of people in the country who have one leg, stammer, who are clinically obese, short, who are hate-driven feminists? The last category, at least, is grossly over-represented in the House of Commons. Let's start to restore some balance by removing Harriet Harman and Yvette Cooper, shall we?]

I would also like to point out that a woman has a 1 in 5 chance of being raped whereas a man has a 1 in 10, meaning its [sic] doubly as likely that a girl will be raped as opposed to a man [Er, no. It's not. You need to watch Alison Tieman's video http://j4mb.wordpress.com/2014/02/11/alison-tieman-on-rape-versus-being-forced-to-penetrate/]. Statistics published by the police also conclude that 93.7% of rapists are men. Therefore even you can clearly see that decreasing female sexual assaults needs to be dealt with before male assaults (not that that isn't important as well) [thank you, that's very kind] and therefore the claim I saw on your website that male assault is not only more serious [it doesn't say that] but more common [it doesn't say that] is totally false.

Men should be equal to women, I could not agree more. However as women are so much more highly discriminated against not only in everyday situations [such as?] but in terms of livelihoods [such as?], jobs [as opposed to 'livelihoods'?] and general international opinion, [why, curse that 'general international opinion'! Hopefully Laura Bates and The Everyday Whining Project are working around the clock to change that? If so, the problem should be sorted within a week or two] you should not attempt to persuade people that men are that ones that are not equal with the privileged women as I am sorry to break it to you, but you are so inconceivably wrong I can not quite believe a website like this exists in the 21st century [I can quite believe you can't quite believe that], these are not in accordance with the progress the rest of the world is making toward viewing women are [sic] increasingly equal to men.

I realise that you will not be publishing this as you are far too cowardly [oops, how did that realisation work out for you, Emily?] however I would like my voice heard, [me too – this is gold dust for us] even if its [sic] only by one person who reads this, then that is my voice made slightly louder and my aim achieved. [The aim of looking absurd? Consider it achieved spectacularly.] By not publishing this comment but many made by men, I can assume that you wish for nothing more than to duck [sic] tape my mouth shut and prevent my voice from ever escaping as I am a women. [On the contrary, I hope you'll be posting lots more comments. We invite you to spend 24/7/365 doing so.] By prompting men's voices to be so much louder (not that they shouldn't have a voice, just that it should be equal) then you are openly declaring your sexist and misogynistic approach to the world. If I don't see this comment I posted, I will be forced to view you as nothing but sexist pigs."

Don’t be THAT guy: Attila goes to Ottawa

Jim Byset · 16 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As regular readers of AVfM are no doubt aware, the “Don’t be that Guy” poster campaign has once again raised its bigoted head. This time the campaign has made an appearance in Canada’s capital – Ottawa. However, while the posters did attract some media attention, it wasn’t nearly as much as previous occasions. What’s also of note is that for the first time the posters were torn down. It seems that someone at the University of Ottawa had had enough. While AVfM does not condone censorship, we certainly do understand the anger that motivates such action. Labeling an entire gender as potential rapists while simultaneously ignoring the realities of sexual assault and rape is clearly morally bankrupt. That is why we sent our tireless Director of Activism Attila Vinczer to Ottawa armed with glue, some “Don’t be that Girl” posters, and a gutful of FTSU attitude. AVfM spoke with Vinczer upon his return from Ottawa. Below are some excerpts from the conversation:

Hi Attila – so first off – how did you get to Ottawa?

Well, I drove to Ottawa. It took about four-and-half hours – got a nice present from the OPP on the way – a speeding ticket. I told the officer that I couldn’t accept his kind gift but, you know, he insisted.

What’s your take on the Don’t be that Guy campaign?

The Don’t be That Guy campaign is absolutely ridiculous. The message of that poster, of that campaign, is completely wrong. It paints guys in a way that men are like that – and they’re not. It goes hand-in-hand with the one-in-four nonsense. It’s a misleading campaign and stigmatizes men.

What happened when you got to Ottawa?

I met with William Mullins-Johnson, Janice Fiamengo, and Stephen Bindman. I have worked with Bill for years, who talks about wrongful conviction stuff – Stephen teaches a class to law students about wrongful convictions. We had lunch and talked about Elizabeth Sheehy and agreed that her proposals are just ludicrous. Bill helped me poster – we put out fifty Don’t Be That Girl posters – one of them was the one about the woman hitting her child and the glass ceiling poster. We walked about for about an hour-and-a-half – and went into the faculty of law where we put up about five or six posters.

Was there any reaction?

The posters instantly drew attention. We got a few snarky looks from students – particularly women – but it was pretty peaceful. We got a few, what I’d call condescending stares. There was a sense of passive hostility although nobody bugged us or bothered us – even inside the university. That was probably because Bill is a huge guy – he’s 6’6, 200lbs. We got a lot of posters up really high thanks to him. But what we noticed is that people actually stopped and read the posters – the creators (Men’s Rights Edmonton) did a good job in that regard.

Did you see any Don’t be that Guy posters?

We didn’t see any – I heard that they were being torn down, so they were long gone by the time we got there.

How did it feel to put up the Don’t be that Girl posters?

It felt very good to put up those posters – I felt we were balancing it out so that people were seeing both ends of the spectrum and we need to be persistent – someone needs to put these posters up consistently. Every time I go to Ottawa from now on I am going to put posters up. Although I’m going to use rubber gloves – the glue is very sticky. The guys from Men’s Rights Edmonton gave me advice on that one – they’re professionals.

“Ban Bossy”- Why ‘Feminism’ poisons EVERYTHING (Part 2) #banbossy #OwnItDontBanIt

AVfM Video Source · 16 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Thunderf00t remains one of the best science-vloggers alive, with his gentle humor, rigorous defense of reason, and ability to disagree without being disagreeable–although even people who are polite and thoughtful in their criticism of course run into rage and contempt from hateful gender ideologues. Still, his takedown here of “Ban Bossy” and others among the usual suspects is masterful.

You should subscribe to Thunderf00t.

Letter to CBC News: Misandry, feminism and public broadcasters

Wolf Moehrle · 17 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sent: Feb. 22, 2014

Hubert T. Lacroix
CEO Canadian Broadcasting Corporation
CBC/Radio-Canada Corporate Communications
P.O. Box 3220
Station "C" Ottawa, ON K1Y 1E4

CBC Ombudsman
P.O. Box 500
Station "A" Toronto, ON M5W 1E6

Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission
55 St. Clair Avenue East
Suite 624
Toronto, ON
M4T 1M2

Dear Mr. Lacroix,

I am writing this letter in response to a perceived problem with your organization, and I am forwarding a copy of this letter to the office of the Ombudsman within the CBC and also the CRTC in Toronto. Whenever I hear or see something in media of any kind, whether it be on the CBC or another broadcaster, or other form of media, I will voice my opinion to that organization. And I have sent emails many times to various on-air personalities in the hope of drawing attention to material that I either find inaccurate, biased or offensive, and I have never received a reply to any of these emails. It is my hope that this letter will be an indication to you that the matters I have outlined here are serious and deserve at the very least to be addressed. I do not expect any reaction from the Ombudsman within your organization except perhaps to reduce this letter to a single sentence like, "Listener feels women's issues over-represented" and then insert it on your website.

MISANDRY, FEMINISM AND PUBLIC BROADCASTERS

Throughout human history there have been individuals or organizations that have stood up to tyranny, oppression and all manner of social injustice and in so doing have changed the attitudes of millions and have caused the implementation of legislation in order to alleviate suffering and promote social harmony. It happened in the Civil Rights movement, with Jews, with First Nations people, Japanese Canadian, gays & lesbians, women's rights and many others.

The focus of my letter and issue I wish to address is of the women's movement and anyone who chooses to call themselves a feminist. Feminism is not about equality. Equality is what I am attempting to promote. Feminism is the dogma that we are required to accept on faith alone. And I would like to be very clear about one thing – I am not against women in general, and clearly there are still many countries where women are considered second-class citizens and suffer at the hands of men, but Canada and other developed countries do not fall into this category. I am only referring in this letter to an imbalance of power that exists between men and women in developed countries. Discussing women's issues in underdeveloped countries is an entirely different conversation.

When social change is required, as it was in the past with groups like the ones I have mentioned above, then we need to look very closely at the actions by individuals or organizations that perpetuate these issues as well as existing laws that contribute to social attitudes that are destructive or immoral. And we should then endeavor to examine the validity of statements made by those bringing forth arguments that oppose the social norm and those who insist on maintaining the status quo. We should conduct in-depth research and have open discussions with the best and brightest people we can find in the hope of forging a better world for us all. This is how we change and grow as a people, and we are standing the precipice of such a change now. In the past, whenever social norms are challenged, there is generally a backlash from society because people believe what they want to believe and are offended by anyone who challenges this belief. For example, when it was thought that the Earth was in the centre of the universe then all those who suggested otherwise were shunned or in some cases put to death.

Asbestos and tobacco producers insisted their products were harmless until they could no longer deny the evidence. During the civil rights movement when activists insisted on giving equal rights to black people, there was a backlash from the majority of whites because they saw it as a threat to their power, authority, and social standing. What's interesting is the backlash that we're seeing now from the feminist movement against any attempt at even discussing the subject. When such a debate is organized at a university they will swarm and protest such an event calling it, "hate speech on campus". If such things cannot be discussed in a university setting then I would like someone to explain to me what exactly a university is for. This is the story that should be the focus of the media.

Instead public and private broadcasters choose to embrace the same tired old rhetoric that we've been hearing for the past 50 years, without an examination of evidence or reference to statistical facts, and in so doing they allow themselves to become a platform for a destructive ideology on behalf a shrinking and self-serving demographic known as "feminism". When did this become the purpose of a public broadcaster? Why is it acceptable for the CBC to perpetuate the ideas of this organization? There was a time when Christianity was considered the 'norm' and no one was allowed to question it and this is where we are today with feminism. We don't hear Bob McDonald on Quirks & Quarks talking about the Earth being 6000 years old because we prefer scientific facts over hearsay and tradition. Feminism is the belief that men are powerful and potentially dangerous agents who act upon others, while women are seen as objects at the mercy of outside forces and at all times require protection.

These are easy lies to tell and just as easy to believe because there is no socially engrained taboo against attacking men and there never has been. Society has been well and truly conned by feminisms pathological lying. We've been duped by our own instinctive perceptions of men and women, and our own internal biases that serve the interests of women over those of men. Feminists are selling a snake oil patriarchy theory and its time we saw it for what it is. Eventually this ideology will crumble as it is beginning to do already. Ultimately people will value logic and evidence over blind faith, which is also the reason why so many people are turning away from religion. People want to know the truth and the supporting evidence. Hearsay is indefensible.

These are the issues that should be tackled by the best and brightest reporting team of a public broadcaster. What became of the cunning news men and women who dared to look behind the stories and examine the issues to their root causes in the hope of educating the public so we might not be enslaved by corrupt institutions that through our ignorance would further their own agenda? What exactly are we so afraid of? I can understand such leanings from privately funded media because they relay on advertising revenue and therefore must pander to social norms. But I hold the CBC to a much higher standard, and I enjoy much of the programming on CBC Radio One and listen to it most of the day (I do not care for CBC Television programming).

I have written to Anna Maria Tremonti on a number of occasions because her programming leans periodically towards a feminist ideology, which I find offensive. If there is a story from anywhere in the world dealing the suffering of women she will cover it without presenting a counter-point if there is one. Canadian men are suffering and dying every day as a direct result biased laws and publicly funded organizations that favor women over men, something I feel is worthy of coverage, but I have only heard Rick McGinnis Ray tackle issues concerning men – and only when it happens on a mass scale of brutality in far off lands. I have never heard Anna Maria Tremonti address men's issues. It's a little bit like having a much loved on-air personality who is very good at her job, but every once in a while she'll reveal in her reporting that racial segregation is not such a bad thing. How long would such a person continue to be employed? What is it that has allowed men to be discredit in every conceivable way and this attitude become so common as to go almost completely unnoticed? It seems to me that something that affects half of our population in such a devastating way should be worthy of news.

Included in this envelope you will find a DVD containing some videos downloaded from YouTube. If you watch only one of these I would recommend it be the one by Karen Straughan. These are MP4 video files and will require a program similar to 'VLC Media Player' for viewing.

For more information I would encourage you to visit a website called: www.avoiceformen.com or simply view videos posted on YouTube by Dr. Warren Farrell, Karen Straughan, Stefan Molyneux, Paul Elam, ThinkingApe-TV, Bar Bar and manwomanmyth.

Very sincerely,

Wolf Moehrle

[image]

"To learn who rules over you, simply find out who you are not allowed to criticize"

(Anonymous)

[image]

Lady Sarkeesian's Brave Knight, Ben Kuchera

Mateusz Wacek · 17 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Have you ever wondered if Anita Sarkeesian had a male version?

Neither have I, but we have our answer, nonetheless. Ben Kuchera, from video game web site Polygon, wrote an opinion piece, riding in to be a valiant knight to damsels like Lady Sarkessian. Like any decent knight, he is on a quest to slay a dragon, and he managed to find one. Let's take a look at this train wreck of logic:

Kuchera starts off with the title, "It's time to leave the brothels and strip clubs behind when real victims fuel your narrative." Now, I wouldn't have as much of a problem if he stuck with this. I haven't found any convincing evidence that causally links video game violence to real world violence, but I could respectfully disagree, unless he managed to present significant evidence to back up his assertion (spoiler alert: Evidence doesn't show up in his article), and I would have to reconsider. However, the title itself is misleading. He doesn't decry the use of violence (in the general sense) to fuel a narrative. He only attacks violence against that one demographic that is least likely to experience violence but is most protected.

Kuchera gives an extensive list of games that include prostitution and/or strippers, and indicates this proves that sex for money of some kind is pervasive, and a tired cliché. Fair enough. It shows up often games, as do many other settings. If the reason for wanting to get rid of brothels and strip clubs is that they are clichéd, then other settings are far more deserving of the cutting room floor.

"The use of these locations as shorthand for "seedy, gritty location where criminals meet" cuts across the genre lines, and the use of sex workers as little more than background imagery is already disturbing."

Here is where the real issue comes up: It's not about clichés after all. It's about "ongoing violence against the female characters in the game, as people you meet in these strip clubs or brothels have a tendency to either be beaten as a way to prove that a male character is uncaring and brutal, or they turn up as corpses." Therein lies the problem. The reason that Kuchera wants to get rid of these locations is that they depict violence against women. Disregarding for the moment that there's no mention of just how often such violence is portrayed (he says that the female characters "have a tendency" to be beaten or killed, which is more than a little vague), the real problem is that he singles out violence against women as the reason. Other clichéd locations, urban ruins, bars, castles, and spaceships are often backdrops for scenes of violence, but the violence is against nameless male mooks, so no need to worry. For a guy who started his piece decrying clichés, he sure fell back on a big one. It's the old "violence against women is worse than against men" cliché.

The next part is also problematic. "This is a shallow way of exploring a very real societal problem. and often unpunished due to the nature of the work and an unwillingness to go to law enforcement. This is made violence against sex workers goes underreported worse when law enforcement itself is part of the abuse. Lawyers have argued that the murder of sex workers is a lesser crime than the murder of 'certain classes of individuals.'"

Are other "very real societal problems" acceptable to be explored in a shallow way?

War — you know, where mostly men get killed (even though Hillary Clinton doesn't seem to think men are the majority of victims, though she acknowledges they are the majority of the ones dying) — is pretty real, and is in quite a few games. He states how terrible violence against sex workers is, and backs it up with shaky links. The first is to an article on AlterNet that contains some anecdotal evidence. The last one is about a lawyer trying to get a defendant acquitted for murder by, indeed, claiming, "Shouldn't that be reserved for people who are guilty of killing certain classes of individuals?" What was left out was how, "Queens Supreme Court Justice Richard Buchter immediately rejected Scarpa's rationale." That kinda shows that actually, the thinking of sex worker murder being acceptable is, well, rejected.

Despite Kuchera's weak support for his claim, the claim itself isn't the problem. I do agree that violence happens against sex workers, and that said violence is bad. That's pretty obvious. The problem is that the claim doesn't really support his main argument. He doesn't explain why sex workers don't belong in games. Simply because there is real life violence against them is not enough of an argument, as there is plenty of real life violence against soldiers, and he doesn't call for war to be a taboo topic for games. His paragraph about sex worker abuse is more an appeal to emotion than an actual support for his point. It's meant to get the reader to feel, rather than think.

Let's move on: "These are issues that aren't often discussed, but games tend to be uninterested in telling the human aspect of this story." Nice generalization of gamers… I'm sure Kuchera has statistics to back that up somewhere… you know, surveys of gamers so that he can determine how cold and heartless they are.

"These characters exist only to die or be beaten in order to flesh out male villains. It's a version of the kicking the dog trope, except in this case the 'dog' is a human woman."

There we go. Here is where Kuchera undercuts his own argument. He talks about the "kicking the dog" trope, and emphasizes that it's a "human woman" who is in the role of the "dog," in a vague way of suggesting that video game makers are dehumanizing women… saying women are dogs… something like that. He found a way to link women to dogs, and pin it on game designers. Anyhow, the trope in question is one where a character is shown to be evil by doing a blatantly evil action. The "dog" in question is a metaphor (as is "kicking"), and the page he linked to has examples of male humans taking the role. However, the trope relies on the one being "kicked" also being seen as sympathetic — otherwise it really can't establish the evilness of the kicker. A villain beating on characters we feel nothing for doesn't cause much of an emotional response. The reason prostitutes, and women in general, are used for this is because the audience already has feelings of protection toward women, and disgust at violence directed towards them. Male victims are very often beaten and killed in video games, but game designers don't expect players to shed a tear while the entrails of Nameless Male Mook #6,739 decorate the screen.

To use Duke Nukem as an example (and I'm using Duke as an example since it's been a favorite target for feminists), women characters are killed in the game as a way to show how evil the aliens are, and to give more reason to slaughtering them. Male characters are also killed, either as background, to show that the aliens are tough (classic "redshirts"), or sometimes for comedic effect.

Kuchera isn't done there. "Player interactions with sex workers can sometimes lead to a 'health boost' or some other form of reward within the game. Prostitutes are therefore represented as objects to be exploited for the player's personal gain."

And this makes them different from other Non-Player Character in just what way? The old man pacing around the campfire and handing out quests also exists just to be interacted with for the player's personal gain.

"These women are used as set pieces, objects to keep the narrative flowing. That's an offensive way to treat a population that is already at such a high risk of violence from their employers, customers and law enforcement."

Men are also used as set pieces to keep the narrative flowing. In any modern military shooter, your fellow soldiers just exist to add to the narrative, make it feel more like a real battle, and then there are the enemies who exist just to be killed for some reward. I'll just list the games where the majority of those killed are male:

- Virtually every single video game involving killing. Ever.

The only reason why it's so disgusting to Kuchera and those who think like him is that these particular characters are women. Maim and kill all the men you like though.

After beating readers over the head with how bad violence is when it's against women, and how it's so bad, that it doesn't belong in video games, Kuchera ends by going back to claiming it's really about the overuse of clichés, as though that's the real reason."These levels don't need to be stripped from gaming entirely, but we need to begin to see how tired and lazy they've become when used as shorthand for 'gritty underworld location.'" That's the reason: people who use strip clubs and brothels are just not creative.

He does end with, “It’s also important to look at the real world cost of normalizing violence against sex workers, or at least responsibly address the fact that designers and writers are using real world suffering as a cheap way to develop their characters. It’s time to find other options.”

The first part of that is nothing I’d argue with. Obviously, violence in the real world is bad. However, if he tries to make it a generalization that if something involves suffering in the real world then it doesn’t belong in games, there is no reason why every single other form of violence also should be removed from games. If it were the case that real-world suffering is taboo, then every game from Amnesia to Zombies Ate My Neighbors should be banned.

But apparently, violence against women is the only kind that is unacceptable to Kuchera.

It’s buried in the comments section where we get what this is all about, by the way:

Kuchera states, “I get that a lot of male gamers can’t / won’t / or don’t see why that’s a problem, or they take that criticism personally, but that’s not evidence that this isn’t a serious problem.”

In his article, Kuchera gets to show that he is a Good Man, and he proves it by showing how much more enlightened he is than all those Bad Men. The other male gamers are all misogynists, but not him. He has an article to prove he’s morally above them.

Logic: another form of female oppression

Diana Davison · 17 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In July, 2013, The Oxford Journal of Legal Studies published an article called Myths about rape myths by Helen Reece, Reader at Law. The paper was soon followed by a debate called "Is Rape Different?" hosted by the London School of Economics (LSE) Department of Law. The debate resulted in quick condemnation by feminists who felt that people like Helen Reece should be banned from public platforms.

Feminists were infuriated by having their research and scholarship challenged by an academic and the response to Helen's work on "rape myth myths" took until March, 2014 to compose, but it was worth the wait.

The main criticism in J. Conaghan and Y. Russell's thirty five page response [1] is that Helen unfairly frames the discussion in terms of logic. Their complaints are fairly straightforward, predictably ridiculous, and the rebuttal finally descends into streams of feminist phrases and rhetoric that amount to the usual meaningless drivel. But, it's good for entertainment.

Conaghan and Russell are outraged that "Reece comes across as the voice of common sense, drawing on scientific facts and hard evidence rather than ideology or dogma to support her stance." How dare she?! How were they to have predicted such an underhanded tactic?

After asserting, on their own merit, that feminist scholarship has created "a backdrop of an empirically verifiable social understanding" they are disturbed that Reece debunks that scholarship by "reduc[ing] to questions of empirical fact" and that "[t]his is done through the use of an analysis contained by dichotomized concepts like truth/falsity and sameness/difference".

Since when does the law care about truth? Surely it's a conspiracy against feminist scholars.

This truth versus falsity discussion continues to cause the authors much distress. They refute accusations of confirmation bias by asserting that all the feminist scholars agree. They argue that rape myths can still be held by people who don't consciously hold them, because they are actually subconscious. We are to believe that unconsciously held rape myths (which can't be tested) are empirically proven and, in turn, provide the "scaffolding for a rape culture." Rape culture, of course, also has a mountain of evidence: many feminist scholars say they've seen it.

Feeling disadvantaged by frameworks of logic and common sense, the authors quickly move to criticism of Helen's language. Accusing Reece of using words with "emotive potency" they take issue with rape researchers being called "'elite'" or "'super-elite". Other words they claim are emotionally manipulative are: "stigmatizing", "smuggling", "manipulating","dripping", "galloping", "body politic", "quarantine", and "clean".

Let's compare the language used by Conaghan and Russell in their reply.

After the condescending preamble, "[g]ranted her intentions appear to be good," we are soon told that "beneath the surface neutrality of Reece's presentation, we would argue, lie murky, agenda-filled depths." To most people, that sounds a little emotive. Hyperbolic, even.

To appear generous and compassionate, they state that Reece's work is "timely and provocative," but Conaghan and Russell immediately go on to characterize Helen Reece with words including, but not limited to, "crude," "simplistic," "convoluted," "scathing," "seductive," yet "rigid," "unhelpful," "hoisted on her own petard," "covert," "sleights of hand are deployed," using "tactics" with "partiality" and a "failure to engage" which are "sadly emblematic," "subtly executed" attempts to create a "binary" "dichotomy" where "good (necessarily) triumphs over bad and right (necessarily) prevails over wrong."

In a truly astounding sentence, given the pretence of non-emotive scholarship, Conaghan and Russell tell us "[i]t is difficult to gauge from a close reading of the text to what extent Reece consciously resorts to legerdemain to bolster her position." If it's difficult to gauge, why bring it up? Surely, not to manipulate the audience!

Conversely, of their feminist scholar friends they say there is "a mountain of evidence" and a "harmonious backdrop" with much "consensus" in the "feminist discursive space." So Helen should just butt out.

Putting emotive words into her mouth, Conaghan and Russell tell us of Helen's work, "[w]hat is unstated but, we would argue, implicit, is a resolve to free rape discourse from the tentacles of a perceived political correctness, to dislodge it from the hegemonic grip of a regime of permissible and impermissible views prescribed and patrolled by feminist researchers and policy-makers."

The authors feel that feminists should answer these difficult questions themselves. Presumably in their safe spaces. They admit that "[o]f course, few feminists would deny that the sphere of public discussion is always politically and culturally imbued in ways which limit and constrict the discursive possibilities", but that opening up debate to the general public will result in wrongful expectations of simple logic. Feminists have worked long and hard to change what comprises science and they aren't about to lose all of that hard won ground.

As a sacrificial peace offering, they throw two of their own scholars under the bus.

Helen Reece uses quotes from the feminist narrative work of Mary Koss and Donald Dripps. Conaghan and Russell discount Dripps as "crude" and having made "casual, unsubstantiated claims" – unlike the rest of them. Their treatment of Koss is somewhat more hysterical.

They claim Reece took Koss's "extreme statement," that the public condones sexual violence, out of context. They ask "who, other than (apparently) Koss, actually labels public attitudes in this way?" In addition to Conaghan and Russell themselves asserting in the same paper that "rape culture" exists ("rape culture" being a phrase describing an entire fictional culture which has rape supportive attitudes) the answer to their question is that almost every feminist believes the "extreme" statement of Mary Koss. That's why the authors keep telling us rape myth attitudes exist and are based on "a mountain" of empirical evidence.

Conaghan and Russell then decide that if they can't beat us with logic, they'll baffle us with bullshit. They proceed to explain that Koss was doing "multi-jurisdictional" surveys spanning diverse populations and that "it becomes clear that her comments are directed not at any particular population but at the challenge of rape supportive attitudes – wherever they exist" and that "Koss's remarks are insufficiently targeted" to justify being quoted.

Well. That's good to know. Feminists should stop quoting her and referencing her work.

After all the vitriol and the squirrel factory is done manufacturing their rhetoric with which to build a rape-culture-vanquishing-empire made of straw, the authors gift us with a moment of frustration towards Helen Reece. "This insistence upon a firm distinction between sex and rape is curious".

Curious, indeed. The feminist aversion to common sense and logic isn't unusual or surprising for most of us, but it is delightful when they stop hiding that fact.

1. Conaghan J, Russell Y. Rape Myths, Law, and Feminist Research: 'Myths About Myths?'.Feminist Legal Studies. 2014;22(1). Available from: http://dx.doi.org/10.1007/s10691-014-9259-z

A Message from Tom Golden: Come to Detroit

AVfM Video Source · 17 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Check out this video on Tom's channel and see the low bar for tips and suggestions:

Conference Description and Tickets

The Scope of Harmful Impressions

AVfM Video Source · 17 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Video games are the next stage of evolution for humanity's physically manifested imagination. We have gone from still pictures, to moving pictures, and finally to interactive pictures. Meanwhile, the Internet has enabled people to depict taboo subject matter more easily through all mediums. Depictions of violence and sex cause controversy between those who seek a free, diverse culture and those who wish to enforce moral standards.

Victor Zen —a fan of the twisted and a former hobbyist game developer— reminds us that feminists like Anita Sarkeesian cast rational, free-thinking grownups as impressionable children that require her guidance.

Subscribe to Victor Zen for commentary, book reviews, interviews and activism updates in the state of Georgia, USA.

Prosecutor Mary Kellett Needs Your Help — To Leave Her Job

Paul Elam · 18 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

AVFM does not endorse any political party or specific candidate. We do, however, endorse the general welfare of men and boys. In that spirit, it is time to show prosecutors Mary Kellett, Carletta Bassano, Paul Cavanaugh, and William Entwisle the door.

Permanently.

Mary Kellett's district attorney's office in Ellsworth, Maine, which controls both Hancock and Washington counties, is up for reelection. It appears after more than 30 years of terrorizing the community with selective and corrupt prosecutions, the Kellett gang is faced with a community that wants change and opposition that smells blood in the water.

The Vladek Filler affair was a watershed moment which neither Kellett, nor Bassano, nor the community in Maine can ignore.

Last year, following years of prosecuting Vladek Filler and scores of other innocent men, Mary Kellett finally earned the distinction of being the first prosecutor in Maine history to be found guilty of and sanctioned for misconduct. Her consequences for withholding evidence of Filler's innocence, ignoring court orders and instructing police to violate defense subpoenas for exculpatory evidence only resulted in a 30 day suspension – which was suspended. It is paltry punishment on the surface, but a devastating career blow just the same.

The Maine Supreme Court Judge Ellen Gorman accepted Kellett's plea deal with the Bar Counsel and stated:

"This is a serious sanction…It is a sanction that will continue to follow Ms. Kellett for the rest of her life. Should she decide or be asked to leave the prosecutors office, it would hamper, if not completely preclude, her ability to find practice outside of a prosecutors office."

In other words, Kellett is now damaged goods, untenable for private practice but still allowed to continue her spree of malfeasance from the Ellsworth DA office. Her supervisor, DA Carletta Bassano, sees nothing wrong with Kellett and told the local newspaper, "I have full confidence in Mary, her judgment and the performance of her responsibilities."

That confidence is what assisted Mary Kellett all the way to the State Supreme Court for sanctions by enabling her to act so brazenly with the power of here office. It is the confidence produced by a culture of corruption in the Ellsworth DA's office.

Today they want that to continue by cornering the District Attorney's election.

[image]
Cavenaugh
Enter ADA Paul Cavanaugh. Yeah, the same Paul Cavanaugh who continued to legally harass Filler in Mary Kellett's stead.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/feminism/government-tyranny/maine-raises-the-bar-on-corruption/

The second candidate is Kellett's office buddy, assistant district attorney William Entwisle, who is running as a Democrat with hopes of "continuing the work that the District Attorney's Office has been doing." He boasts of being a board member of a local VAWA funded group, "Next Step DV Project."

http://bangordailynews.com/community/bill-entwisle-democratic-candidate-for-washington-hancock-d-a/

[image]
Entwistle
It is interesting to note that Kellett's and Bassano's office employs 28 people — of which only 3 are men, and two of them are now running to perpetuate the insiders club that has already run amok.

One is running as a Republican and one as a Democrat.

They are not, however, alone in the race.

Matthew Foster is an Ellsworth Maine defense attorney who came close to beating Carletta Bassano in the 2010 election. It is unknown what he plans to do to clean up that corrupt DA office or whether he will be willing to fire or prosecute Mary Kellett, but it is clear he is willing to call out deceptions from the office.

[image]
Foster
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=DkCJNt8mayk

He is running as a Republican and more information about Matthrew Foster can be found on his website and Facebook page:

http://www.mattfosterforda.com/

https://www.facebook.com/matthew.foster.9862

If Mary Kellett has a political enemy, it is a former prosecutor and local defense attorney Steve Juskowitch. He ran against Carletta Bassano and her predecessor, the notorious Boss Hog of Hancock County, former DA Michael Povich. Povich was the longtime DA who made Carletta Bassano, Paul Cavanaugh, and Mary Kellett what they are today. Against tough odds, Juskewitch ran again and again in hopes of removing both Povich and his crew from office. He previously ran as a Republican and Independent, but is currently running as a Democrat for reasons that make sense to him.

[image]
Juskowitch
It is also noteworthy that for a long time Juskewitch has been defending Kellett's victims and speaking out against Kellett's office for their unprecedented abuse of prosecutorial discretion. He was the only Ellsworth attorney who showed up to speak out as a press conference held by SAVE at Vladek Filler's hearing:

http://youtu.be/4Gna6sbo8-8?t=7m35s

More about Steve Juskewitch can be found on his website:

http://juskewitch.com/Steve-Juskewitch.php

The publicity surrounding the Filler case has changed the political climate in the Bar Harbor area. For the first time in 35 years, the control enjoyed in two counties by the clan of Povich prosecutors is no longer assured.

Currently Filler is currently going through an uncommon proceeding called a Post Conviction Review. He is challenging his misdemeanor conviction on the grounds of prosecutorial misconduct by Mary Kellett and Paul Cavanaugh, and he has a case. The people of Ellsworth Maine may have had enough.

The Primary Elections will be held on June 10.

A Voice For Men intends to follow the Primary and general election very closely and strongly encourages everyone to speak out against the corrupt practices of the current prosecutor's and voice their support for Matt Foster and Steve Juskewitch for the Primary elections.

Post Comments in articles below to call for Mary Kellett, Carletta Bassano, and Paul Cavanaugh to be elected out and fired from the Ellsworth DA office:

http://bangordailynews.com/2014/03/18/politics/elections/four-file-papers-for-da-race-in-hancock-washington-counties/?ref=comments

http://fenceviewer.com/site/index.php?option=com_k2&view=item&id=85437:few-surprises-in-candidate-filings&Itemid=938

Oh, and if you live in the area as a registered voter, you now have options in two different political parties. Take your pick.

Does this guarantee that there will never be unfair prosecutions in Ellsworth, Maine again? In short, of course not. Votes for Cavenaugh or Entwistle, however, are guaranteed to roll snake eyes. More of the same crew, more of the same corruption.

The End of Rape Culture

Jim Byset · 18 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A curious thing is happening at the National Post right now. During the course of a fortnight, the National Post has printed four articles on rape culture. Rape culture, for those of you who don't know, is the idea that we live in a society whereby rape — of women — is an accepted practice. Evidence that we are living in such a culture comes from our apparent comfort with sexualizing and objectifying women, the prevalence of prostitution and pornography, victim-blaming, slut-shaming, and trivializing rape.

Quite often, statistics and facts accompany the theory – with feminists and activists quoting numbers that are, on the face of it, pretty terrifying. While there doesn't seem to be a consensus as to exactly how many women are being raped or sexually assaulted (advocates of the theory never include data on male victims,) what is clear is that the numbers are absolutely huge. Indeed, they're so big that they're simply not credible. Many noted academics, critics, and commentators such as Christina Hoff Sommers have repeatedly argued this point but to little avail. While critics of feminism have been effective in ripping the theory to shreds, gender feminists plow on regardless – safe in the knowledge that neither politicians nor the mainstream media have any interest in confronting their claims.

That comfortable status quo, however, might be about to change.

Over the past two weeks, the National Post has aggressively challenged the concept of rape culture. Barbara Kay, long noted for her rejection of feminist thought, wrote two articles in which she critiqued the spurious tenets of rape culture theory. Brian Hutchinson penned a piece in which he investigated the origins and veracity of foundational "statistics" that underpin rape culture and, just days ago, the National Post Editorial Board threw their considerable weight behind the push to openly scrutinize the ideological feminist idea of "rape culture."

Kay, speaking exclusively to A Voice for Men, sees the recent coverage as part of a greater awareness, and skepticism about the claims made by feminists.

> I am very pleased to see the Post's editorial board taking a definite stand on this issue[.] I think perhaps it is a sign that there is only so much fear-mongering you can generate without adducing evidence for it before public skepticism takes hold. According to rape culture claims, the risks to campus women of sexual assault are higher than the risk of any other crime on earth. And yet women walk around the campus seemingly blithely unaware of the terrible fate in store for them or their girlfriends (based on the one in four/five figure). There is a cognitive disconnect here, and ordinary Canadians are puzzled by it.

As well they should be – the idea that we live in a rape culture that normalizes rape of women clashes spectacularly not only with official crime stats, but also with the dim view that society in general takes of sexual assault and rape — a point that Margaret Wente of The Globe and Mail recently explored, saying that,"[the] manufacture of "rape culture" is a triumph of ideology over substance. It has inflated a serious but uncommon threat into a crime wave."

The key word here is inflated. Feminists routinely buttress their theories with statistics that are not congruent with reality; they use definitions and methodologies that result in a hopelessly skewed picture. No reasonable person — even for a moment — would believe the "statistic" that one-in-four women are raped on university campuses, yet that is the conclusion that Mary P. Koss came to in her now infamous (and repeatedly debunked) research.

Amazingly, 73% of the women that Koss characterized as rape victims, did not share that view — they did not think that they were victims of rape. 43% of these supposed rape victims went on to date their "rapists."

Clearly Koss' definition of rape is just plain wrong and an honest scholar would address that. Koss chose not to address the problem, however, and so have the countless feminist academics who've since mimicked her methodology. What exists as a consequence is a strange form of hysteria across college campuses, and, to a lesser degree — across society. Kay believes that the success of the feminist propaganda machine, in popularizing the myth of a "war on women" is directly responsible for promulgation of rape culture.

> Once you accept… that the urge to violence against women is a chronic and unabating evil, situated in the hearts of men, and ready to spring out at any opportune moment, you have created a moral panic with no basis in evidence, just a theory that violence against women is a continuum from a child's stolen playground kiss on the cheek to the calculated rapes of women in Bosnia-Herzogovina. No amount of vigilance, therefore, is too much, and no woman is therefore really safe. In fact, a very tiny percentage of women are at actual risk of violence from men in our society, and of those who are, much of it is avoidable.

The recent debacle at Wellesley College is a perfect example of this hysteria. American artist Tony Matelli's temporary art installation – a statue of a fairly ordinary looking man sleepwalking in his underwear was deemed by students as an "inappropriate and potentially harmful addition to our community." Admittedly — the statue is unusual — and at a stretch unsettling — but it's a statue. It doesn't possess agency and has nothing to do with rape. Yet, these staggeringly obvious facts did not deter Wellesley students from setting up a Change.org petition to have the "triggering" statue removed from its location on campus grounds, which, depressingly, garnered some 988 signatories.

> [T]hat is the point of it (rape culture) – to sow terror of men in order to convince authorities that women continue to need support, that the rape-crisis industry is not only necessary but in need of expansion, and therefore even more funding in this area is called for. The real beneficiaries are stakeholders in jobs created by the moral panic.

It is difficult to draw any other conclusion. Rape culture just doesn't make any sense. It contradicts the general societal view of rape and sexual assault as a heinous crime; it contradicts how seriously the legal system views such crimes and relies on debunked, dishonest research. It also describes a picture that Kay says is completely at odds with crime statistics.

> "The fact is that instances of rape have gone down in the general population. If they have gone up on campuses, there have to be other factors at work. Why has there not been more emphasis on facts and statistics around the phenomenon? Because the case for rape culture collapses when you start looking into the stats. Even if you multiply reported rapes by 100, you still don't get figures that add up to a "culture."

It is vital, according to Kay, to continue to put pressure on those that perpetuate such theories by asking questions, and demanding answers.

> "[We should ask] the same questions we should ask of someone who promotes the idea that there are packs of stray dogs roaming the city and we are in danger of getting rabies from their bites: Show me the evidence. How many police reports of bites? How many hospital admissions for rabies? How many stories of bites and rabies turned out to be urban myths? Why are the rabid dogs only roaming around in this city and not in the nearby ones? Is "rabies" a misnomer in most cases for "infection"? Has "rabies" been redefined in this city and not in others? How is it that so many of the self-reporting victims were so drunk when they were bitten that they can't remember feeling the pain of the bite?"

These are questions that feminists need to answer. There should be no more talk of "triggering," no more ad hominem attacks or appeals to emotion. If feminists want their theories to be taken seriously then they should be made to publicly defend them. If they are not willing to do that then financial support should be withdrawn from programs that support such spurious theories. It is high time for a critical audit of rape culture theory, and the industry it supports.

Feminism's "aggressive weakness"

Ernest Belfort Bax · 18 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Weakness, to whose claim chivalry may per se be granted, forfeits its claim when it presumes upon that claim and becomes aggressive." E.B. Bax

* * *

I instanced the Tooting tramway incident as an act of commendable pluck on the part of those concerned in it to boldly challenge the attempt of woman's righters to "jump the claim" to chivalry as a special right of the sex they champion. But there is another point Feminists conveniently overlook. It is this: That granting the "weakness" argument, this very weakness, to whose claim chivalry may per se be granted, forfeits its claim when it presumes upon that claim and becomes aggressive. Aggressive weakness deserves no quarter – à la guerre, comme à la guerre.
Women's Privileges and "Rights", Social Democrat, Vol.13 no.9, September (1909).

In the present article I have only dealt briefly with one aspect of this question. I may point out in conclusion that the existing state of public opinion on the subject registers the fact that sex-conscious women have exploited the muscular weakness of their sex and have succeeded in forging a weapon of tyranny called "chivalry" which enables them to ride rough-shod over every principle of justice and fair play, Men are cowed by it, and fail to distinguish between simple weakness per se which should command every consideration, and that of aggressive weakness which trades upon "chivalry" and deserves no quarter.
'Feminism and Female Suffrage' in New Age, (1910)

"Even taking the matter on the conventional ground of weakness and granting, for the sake of argument, the relative muscular weakness of the female as ground for her being allowed the immunity claimed by Modern Feminists of the sentimental school, the distinction is altogether lost sight of between weakness as such and aggressive weakness. Now I submit there is a very considerable difference between what is due to weakness that is harmless and unprovocative, and weakness that is aggressive, still more when this aggressive weakness presumes on itself as weakness, and on the consideration extended to it, in order to become tyrannical and oppressive. Weakness as such assuredly deserves all consideration, but aggressive weakness deserves none save to be crushed beneath the iron heel of strength. Woman at the present day has been encouraged by a Feminist public opinion to become meanly aggressive under the protection of her weakness. She has been encouraged to forge her gift of weakness into a weapon of tyranny against man, unwitting that in so doing she has deprived her weakness of all just claim to consideration or even to toleration."

Chapter 5: The "Chivalry" Fake, in The Fraud of Feminism (1913)

Ban Bossy – the Reality Edit #banbossy

AVfM Video Source · 18 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A recent video series suggests we should band the word “bossy” because this stops women from achieving. Bane66au has an edit on this video which its creators might find helpful in sharpening their reasoning skills.

Subscribe to Bane666au for more wisdom.

Can you be trendy and marginalized at the same time? Men and their issues can.

Isaac T. Quill · 19 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Certain terms have been very trendy of late and the one that has pissed off a great many people is the infamous “rape culture”. There is no point in rehashing what that meme is supposed to mean, because I want to have a life and don’t have a millennium to waste on debunking feminists’ ideology, their manipulation of social psychology, and the engineering on Moral Panic going back at least 40 years. “Rape-crisis feminism” has been a toxic cocktail of misinformation, mythology and social bullying since the 1970’s. Even RAINN has had enough, and is now very publicly distancing itself away from the rape culture meme. They are even telling that to The White House.

I’m always nosy about what is going on behind the scenes. I’m too old, too jaded and way too realistic to accept anything on-line at face value. What is interesting is looking at other things that are trendy, and even using Google Trends. You type in a word or phrase and Google lets you know what has been getting used, how much and when. It can even show you where the trend is happening. It’s not 100% accurate but it is a reliable snapshot.

I did a simple experiment – I typed in “rape culture” and compared it with the word “misandry”. And the results say:

Google trends analysis of the terms “rape culture” and “misandry”

Just in case you were not able to believe your eyes – yes “misandry” is the red line and statistically it’s used more than “rape culture”. For the last 8 whole years the word “misandry” has been trendier than “rape culture”.

This leads to one very large question: If misandry is being talked about so much on the net, and it’s trendier than rape culture, why is it so little mentioned in mainstream media?

Someone tells a rape joke and it’s front page news, but someone passes a law that specifically disadvantages men and you fight to find any mention, except in the feedback asking why the subject is getting ignored. Question rape culture and contrast it with real world male issues and all you get thrown back at you is derision and “What About Teh Menz?”

I have a theory, and it’s called advertising revenues. The honey trap is “rape culture,” which appeals to the one group who have been found to buy on-line and page graze from subject to subject, page to page, shopping venue to shopping venue. In so many ways we saw that last year with the Feminist FaceBook rape campaign – control the media and you control their revenues streams too.

Misandry gets used by people who don’t behave that way so they get advertised at less and are less useful to so many people’s bank balances.

Male Disposability is even being articulated by the subroutines that search the net, measure content and show the trends – cool hard rational computing gets the reality, but the wetware of journalist infected with the “rape culture” meme leaves half the population ignored and reality skewed.

But then again they have to justify reality to their editors and the editors measure content by revenue and income. It seems that until men stop being trendy and drive the media marketplace mad for male money, disposability will reign.

Danielle Paradis' initials, Karen Smith of SAVE's human rights violations, and other things

AVfM Video Source · 19 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

False allegations never happen, so we demand to know what's going to be done about Karen Smith of Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton's alleged atrocities. Nick Reading has an update on ths, and other items.

You might want to click here to see the lowbar links and, oh yes, subscribe to Men's Rights Edmonton, and maybe even throw some Paypal bucks to them.

Men Going Their Own Way: A growing phenomenon whether you like it or not

AVfM Video Source · 19 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

MGTOW, Men Going Their Own Way, are increasingly prevalent in our culture. Some are not even aware of what MGTOW is, but are MGTOW by default. The “scary” part? The fact that an increasing number are aware of exactly why they’re doing it:

This growing phenomenon will not stop, nor will it change at all until more men become self-aware on these issues, and begin unashamedly asking, loudly and without apology, “what’s in it for me?” and get an answer deeper than sex and platitudes. The more men who do this, the more other men will do this. This will likely make many women very uncomfortable, to which we can only say, “Cry Me A River.”

By the way, you should subscribe to Sandman.

An interesting advocate appears

AVfM Video Source · 19 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When we first saw this video, to be honest, we weren't sure if we were just getting trolled. As we look at the rest of the channel, she seems generally interested in a lot of issues and to not just be a parodist. Even if her observations are not particularly deep, she looks relatively sincere.

The overt usage of sexuality to sell her message is frankly a bit distracting, but it would seem rude not to acknowledge that someone else is out there spreading a message friendly to the rights of men and boys.

The right kind of rape awareness project?

Chris Deslone (aka @mensrightsrdt) · 19 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> I truly believe [rape] is a problem that transcends gender.
>
> Kelly Kendziorski, producer of "Yeah, maybe no"

I and others have tried to add notoriety to TLAs and NGOs for heavily couching or distorting their statements on rape and domestic violence against men, when they let them through at all.

When I found Yeah, maybe no. at Reddit and saw the project, I was not excited. Readers, forgive me, but I've watched the rise of The Good Men Project (which should be called the feminist-approved man project) and sat through countless refrains of "feminism helps men too" and then my jaded eyes read through this:

> One of the most unique aspects of this film is that it focuses on sexual violence from a male perspective. In working with a man, I had to cut out a lot of language that relied on negative stereotypes of men and women and focus on the nature of the violence itself. Stepping out the "violence against women" box allows for a deeper examination of the power dynamics present in intimate-partner violence and shows how there are more similarities than differences between male and female survivors.

I still got the general impression that the director wanted to go around asking men what it felt like to rape someone. It wasn't long before I found some confirmation, in a comment about someone accused of domestic violence but whose alleged victim dropped the case:

> "Thanks! That is so sad. He was my new favorite, but it's hard to be into someone being taken to court for DV. :("

What she tweeted later, though, compelled me to reach out to her:

> People who are victimized by women are so much less likely to speak out and be believed.

When invited, she came to Reddit to discuss her project, and said she's willing to include the perspective of a man (or men) who has been raped.

> I'm hoping that my film can help others who have been in that situation. I've been open about my own experience with sexual violence for a while, and for whatever reason, it's a man talking about his experience that I relate to the most. It has challenged me to change my default language when talking to be more honest about the fact that violence happens to people regardless of their gender. As I mentioned, I didn't go into this project looking to make a comment on identity politics, but I met a man who was open and honest with me, and I'm doing my best to share his story in a way that helps people who have also been there.
>
> In the course of making it, I've had a number of men talk to me privately about their experience and thank me for making this film. It opened my eyes to the difficulty they have in talking about violence. This is a really complicated topic with a lot of fear and anger swirling around it. Sexual trauma is a huge problem, and the justice system often does more harm than good. I don't think my film can solve all these problems, but I hope it can be a resource to help make things better for people who have to live through the experience of sexual violence.

So I asked about the one thing that would make it a much more valuable project for us to support.

> If you had a man coming forward to discuss his experience as a rape victim of a woman, would you have room in your film – or an important, promoted followup – for the segment?

And she said yes:

> Yes. And if you know someone, send them my way. Trust is super important for me when making a film, so I don't like to aggressively seek specific demographics. It's a sensitive topic and it's important that no one feels like their story is being exploited. However, I'm more than happy to use my skills and platform to work with someone who wants to share their story of being victimized by a woman. I truly believe this is a problem that transcends gender.

So I hope she finds the right interview. True, verifiable (enough), and with someone willing & articulate enough to tell the important part of the rape dynamic that we know is usually omitted.

She also mentioned, in addition to her indiegogo project, another Indiegogo project "focusing on male victims of childhood sex abuse with two men and one woman producing. Not quite the same, but I'm sure they'd appreciate some support as well." Ocala on Indiegogo also looks promising. In my opinion, that wasn't the act of someone grabbing for money, but of someone who really wanted to help raise awareness. I also hope she gets the financial support that her documentary needs in order to finish the project.

Jessica Valenti as Feminist Heroin

August Løvenskiolds · 20 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Jessica Valenti, one of the most virulent and brutal haters of men on the planet, has just been named "Humanist Heroine" for 2014" by the American Humanist Association.

We view the selection of Valenti with a mixture of disgust and vindication – disgust at the unthinking cruelty of the American Humanist Association (AHA) in appointing such a hateful ideologue as one of their darlings, and vindication of our long-stated view that neither feminism nor humanism is equipped to address the human rights of boys or men in any significant or thoughtful way, and that organizations like A Voice for Men are essential to achieving goals of protecting and, where necessary, restoring the equal human rights of men to life, bodily autonomy, property, freedom and parenthood.

While we intend to write more on Valenti, for those of you who may have missed it, reprinted below is one of our articles that dissected one of Valenti's disingenuous videos, so that the incoherence of both Valenti and the AHA is made clear. Enjoy, if you can.

Jessica Valenti on explaining feminism to men

Originally published July 12, 2014, by August Løvenskiolds for AVFM.

Do you ever try to talk to your brother, your father, or someone in your life about feminism, but you get the sneaking suspicion (or the clear-as-day realization) that they just don't get it?

So begins our old friend Jessica Valenti's second effort at video blogging for her new feminist masters at The Nation magazine. Like a hypergamous woman trading in one husband for another, Valenti has aborted her motherly duties at Feministing in favor of a subordinate position at The Nation, a long-time liberal rag that doesn't like her very much.

As if to underline their intense hatred of Valenti, her new owners insisted that one of her new job's early efforts be #AskJessica: How Do You Get Men to Understand That Feminism Is Important? – which, ironically, is such a fabulous, unexpected gift to the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) that we should all be squealing and queefing with delight, if, in fact, men were permitted to do such things.

Bear with me while I explain.

Have you ever heard of the expression "to talk out of the side of one's mouth"? The idiomatic meaning of this phrase is "to lie", "to say contradictory things" or perhaps, "to speak in a disingenuous fashion". In the video Valenti displays a distracting facial tic wherein her mouth seems to drift to her right side even as she spouts some of the most disingenuous crap ever mouthed by a feminist – and that is saying something. (In other videos from Valenti, both before and after this one, the facial tic seems absent.)

I mention this tic as the elephant in the room that made me determined to deconstruct Valenti's rhetoric for the edification and education of us all – and, as a poorly linked (and edited) entry in Wikipedia asserts, "People are biologically evolved to detect the deceptive intention of other people by observing the asymmetry in the face. When people are lying, their muscle on the face[sic] gets very imbalanced."

So, how does Jessica advise feminists to get hesitant or doubtful men to understand that feminism is important?

Jessica's first point is: "Don't talk to brick walls." At first blush, one might ask, she is surrendering? Could Jessica seriously be telling feminists to NOT talk to men about feminism? Well, not really – a man dubious about feminism is a "real-life troll" to Valenti, and not to be bothered with – or so she says.

What Valenti doesn't say is that, in the gynocentric blue pill world where men define themselves by their utility to women, a woman who is miffed or tearful is placing a lot of pressure on the men in her company to do something –

ANYTHING – to ease her discomfort. A woman who suddenly goes silent when discussing feminism sets off alarm bells in blue-pill heads that the Lady is Hurting, and men will quite literally kill themselves and/or each other, if necessary, to appease such women.

How do we know that this is Valenti's real point? The shaming comment about "real-world troll" is all the proof needed – Valenti is instructing feminists, in effect, to insult the living shit out of resistant men in order to beat the resistance out of them. It takes a lot of red pills for men to recognize this tactic for what it is – the men at freethoughtblogs, for example, will never grasp how they have been manipulated by feminism into abandoning their beloved skepticism – but we can see it in all of its painful clarity.

Valenti, of course, can't say "shame men" this explicitly, because that would mean she would have to take responsibility for her emotional brutalization of men, as well as it would prove that her claim of patriarchal men always oppressing women was crap. Her passive-aggressive assault maintains her plausible deniability while being absolutely clear in her message of feminists asserting and maintaining dominance over blue-pill men's emotional lives.

If a feminist called me a "real-world troll", I might re-frame the point explicitly, and say something like, "Oh, how lovely – you can't prove your point logically, so maybe inflicting pain on me will help. Try crying instead. Maybe that will work. Waaaa! Waaaaaaaaaa! Nope, maybe not."

If you are lucky, she'll shut up and leave you alone after that.

Jesus, that was fun – and the fun is just starting, since we've got 5 more points to go.

Jessica's point two is "Meet people where they're at." In other words, use the pop culture interests of the men as an entry point to introduce feminism. Jessica uses the HBO network's show Game of Thrones or, alternatively, a feminist musician whose music the guy already likes, as examples of subjects that can be used to inject feminism into an otherwise innocuous conversation. Jessica apparently misses the point that the extreme privileges of pop culture icons make them discordant subjects for a Marxist philosophy that seeks to kill both privilege and those who supposedly have it.

If someone pulled that Game of Thrones crap on me, I'd point out that Game is pure fantasy that pales in comparison to the Starz network's series Spartacus, an adaptation of the historical story of male gladiatorial slaves rebelling and fighting for freedom against the mostly female characters that exploited them cruelly. And, anti-feminist musicians like Woman of the Year winner Katy Perry and Album of the Year winner Taylor Swift are hotter than Helen Reddy any day.

Jessica's point three is "Try not to get angry." Seriously, that is what she says. I fell out of my chair laughing when she first said it, and it still makes me chuckle. Who the fuck does she think she is kidding? A calm, happy feminist is a shitty feminist, and Valenti knows it – moments later she rephrases it as "don't get too angry".

Shut the fuck up, Jessica.

Before I tackle this point 3 in detail, I should note that like point 1, this is (explicitly, at least) not a "way to talk to men", but rather, an excuse for failure in talking to men. Point 2 is the only "actionable" point of the entire video – the only point where women are asked to assume some agency or action. Points 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are all designed to make feminists feel better about their failure and passivity. No people of action would ever tolerate an instruction manual that is more than 80% devoted to explaining why it is okay to fail.

This feminist devotion to passive failure robs women of the very goals of equality that feminism allegedly supports, and it plays out about across women's lives, even in their sexual dysfunctions. Men having sex expect to orgasm, and it they fail to climax, they actively seek to address the situation. Women, by contrast, are told it is okay if they don't orgasm – they can just blame their orgasmic incompetence on their partners.

The only oppression here is feminist Valenti's repeated message that women are failures who can expect to keep on failing, and failing, and failing….

I'd guess that Valenti also knows that women have little to no control over their anger, and that ordering them to control it (as Valenti suggests) only makes the ensuing explosion of anger all the more violent. The more one violently abuses men, the more care men take to "walk on eggshells" and become hyper-vigilant, which Valenti hopes will force men to engage with feminism. Again, saying "don't get angry" is like saying "don't think about pink elephants", and again, Valenti preserves her deniability.

When I speak to people in my life about Men's Rights, I tap into my anger – it gives me a laser-like focus and a demeanor that grabs people's attention. Styles of the expression of male anger include the "pit bull" (loud, red-faced barking, about 3/4 of men) and the "cobra" (cool, deadly focus, about 1/4 of men). My cobra-style has served me well, and if your way of expressing anger trends more pit-bullish – well, I'm not sure if that will work for you in discussions of feminism and men's human rights, but if you can master the focusing of your anger, I'd say, go for it – it works well for me.

As Jessica expands on this point, she says that asking questions can get past men's defenses – questions like "why they believe pay inequity is not a problem" (because the notion that women are paid less for identical work is a bald-faced lie, Jessica – if it were true, then women would be 100% employed, because it would be more cost-effective to hire cheaper women than more expensive men).

Jessica's point four is "Expect pushback." Yes, this is not a way to talk to men, but rather, it is just an excuse to fail. Another one. "How to deal with pushback" is the obvious and more proactive choice, but feminism and women's agency are two things that are rarely seen in the same room together.

Jessica's point five is "Fighting for gender justice is not a zero-sum game." Of course, Jessica doesn't include gender justice for men at all – she is talking about fighting for gender justice in the developed world (where things are great for women, comparatively speaking) as opposed to fighting for gender justice in places where female genital mutilation is commonplace. Jessica is suggesting, in essence, that a woman in America with a fading manicure needs as much attention as a young girl facing a rusty razor blade clitoridectomy elsewhere.

Of course, men facing genital mutilation only show up on the feminist radar as a point of humor and derision. Nor does she allude to the numerous feminist groups and feminist-influenced agencies that have written the zero-sum game into political and legal policy and promoted it culturally in federally funded campaigns addressing sexual abuse and domestic violence in a one-sided, zero-sum manner.

She also doesn't seem to realize that conceiving of gender justice as a "non zero-sum game" requires women shutting up and listening to men now and again.

Hmmm. Maybe that's one way you could sell feminism to men: by listening to them for a change. Jessica encourages feminists to ask questions of men but only as a means to find entry points for her ideology. But listening and engaging with men's concerns is a surprisingly active activity and we all know feminism's stance on female agency and men's real issues – they have time for neither one. Anyway, I digress.

Jessica's point six is "You're not going to change everyone's mind." Again, we see the culture of female hypoagency – women expect women to fail – and then, have men rush to the rescue.

At the time of this writing the Youtube page for #AskJessica has about 5000 views and the downvotes are outpacing upvotes by about 3 to 1. The comments are being heavily censored but the most highly upvoted comment suggests a debate between Valenti and our own Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat). Of course, Karen would obliterate Jessica in such a contest, but it would be interesting to see an actual test of Valenti's 6 talking points play out in the real world.

Still, if Valenti loves medieval fantasy worlds, then a debate with GWW is a consummation devoutly to be wished, if only to see a thousand natural shocks play across Jessica's twisted, mocking maw.

After all, debate is active, and I'd put my money on the woman with agency – who doesn't pre-excuse her failures – any day of the week.

Frying Elizabeth Sheehy's Battered Wives

John Hembling (JtO) · 20 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Battered Wife Syndrome – or BWS is real. Which is to say, it exists. In Canada.

However, Battered Wife Syndrome is a thing distinct from being a category of post traumatic stress disorder. The name cleverly includes the word Syndrome. But Battered Wife Syndrome is not a psychological condition. Battered Wife Syndrome isn't even a condition which affects wives, or women, whether they're battered or abused or not.

Battered Wife Syndrome is simply a legal defence for the killing, by a woman, of a man, in the Canadian court system. It is justification for the killing of another human being. It is also a fraud, a hoax, and undiluted weapons grade, unequivocal nonsensical twaddle.

And by the way, that redundant statement, noting the killing of a man, and then clarifying with the addition of the phrase "human being" was purposeful -– because most of the time, when you read or hear the word "man," you have been conditioned by our culture's prevalent ideology to dis-associate the word from recognition of the deceased as a member of your own species.

On the evening of 30 August 1986, Angelique Lynn Lavalee and Kevin Rust hosted a party at their home in Winnipeg Manitoba. During that party, Lavalee, 21 years old, shot Mr Rust in the back of the head, killing him as he walked from the room where the couple had been arguing.

Could a woman who shot a man in the back of the head have been acting in self-defense?

A jury decided she could, acquitting Lavalee in a supreme court decision written by judge Bertha Wilson. This verdict was influenced by the testimony of Dr. Fred Shane, a psychiatrist credited with "extensive experience" in the treatment of "Battered Wives."

In fact, Dr Shane's work on Battered Wife Syndrome is described by the doctor himself as "seminal" in that field. Indeed, he is one of the pioneers of the use of Battered Wife Syndrome (BWS) as a legal defence in Canada. As such, he was not just an expert legal witness in cases relying on BWS, Shane was heavily invested in establishing and maintaining the legitimacy of BWS as a legal defence. Dr Shane cannot be considered a disinterested party. This, by the way, provides a logical basis to challenge any acquittal in which BWS was used, and in which Dr Shane collected his fee as an expert witness.

The Battered Wife Syndrome hypothesis attempts to explain why abused people may not seek assistance from others, fight their abuser, or leave the abusive situation. Some individuals within abusive relationships may suffer from low self-esteem, and may believe that the abuse is their own fault. Such persons may also refuse to press charges against their abuser, and may refuse offers of help.

There is no consensus in the medical profession that such abuse results in a mental condition severe enough to excuse alleged offenders. Neither the DSM nor the ICD medical classification guides as currently drafted include the syndrome in the sense used by lawyers. But even if the condition of previous abuse exists, and even if such prior trauma produces a condition of mental incapacity, or learned helplessness, then the resultant choice to use violence or lethal force by an individual previously subject to abuse remains criminal.

If you are a man, and your male room-mate repeatedly assaults you over a period of time, you will be rightly and correctly jailed if you later kill him. This is so obvious that inclusion of this reality within this article may appear strange. However, the existence in law of the Battered Wife defence necessitates the painfully stupid need to actually make so obvious an observation. Suffering from previous incidence of violence is not a legal, nor a moral defence of murder.

Correction: past violent victimization is not a legal defense of killing for anyone except those who our society has, at the insistence of feminists, deemed incompetent and helpless. Specifically, women. Taken farther, if such prior trauma actually induces a state of mental derangement whereby violence seems reasonable to the affected individual, that person represents a hazard to themselves and the public, and should be treated medically, if not criminally.

However, the ideological approach to excusing of such violence appears designed to amplify and enable violence engendered by past trauma within our culture. It might be plausibly argued that the ideological basis for maintaining the continued credulity of our courts towards a BWS defence of killing has the purpose of excusing murder – based on no more than unsupported claim of past victimization.

Indeed, Elizabeth Sheehy, author of Defending Battered Woman on Trail, promotes the idea of killing in preference to simply leaving a violent relationship. On the question of why women do not leave abusive situations, Sheehy told the CBC on December 19th, 2013, that women can't leave abusive men because, upon leaving, their risk increases "nine fold." In January she told Meghan Murphy of Feminist Current that the risk is eight fold. Sheehy should be forgiven such gaffes; when you're making up the numbers on the fly, they tend not to stick in the memory.

Sheehy includes in her book a case of a woman whose murder-excusing "syndrome" of being a Battered Wife stemmed from a previously exited relationship. The man who she was excused of murdering had, according to Sheehy, only been involved with her for six weeks. Too bad for him, dead after being stabbed through the heart with a kitchen knife. Donelda Kay's syndrome as a "battered wife" was due to her violent relationship with a previous boyfriend.

Page 163 of Sheehy's Defending Battered Women on Trial introduces Donelda Kay's trial for the murder of Dennis Noel Gordon with a clear description of Kay initiating and escalating violence which Gordon did not participate in, and which Kay finally escalated to the point of fatally stabbing the seated man in his heart.

Prosecutor Dutka's opening address presented the case against Kay as open-and-shut. Kay was at a party in a Regina apartment where she argued sporadically with her partner, Gordon. None of the witnesses had seen Gordon touch Kay all evening. All would testify that she had done the pushing and the hitting, escalating a silly argument into a homicide.

Dutka told jurors that they would hear that Kay has asked Rebecca Bourassa, a young witness who had retreated from the party to an apartment across the hall, Apartment 3, for a knife. Kay then grabbed the knife from Bourassa's floor and charged into the next apartment and stabbed Gordon as he sat in a chair. "You will hear none of the Crown witnesses testify that they saw Donelda Kay being attacked by Dennis Gordon that night," Dutka declared. You will not hear that she was being beaten… you will not hear that she seemed afraid."

Sheehy spends the remainder of the section on Donelda Kay in post-mortem character assassination of the murder victim, Dennis Gordon. Since Gordon was dead, and unable to offer testimony in his own defence, it was a fairly straightforward matter to paint him in the colours of a violent abuser–which Kay's defender, Edward Worme proceeded to do for the remainder of her trial. However, although the coroner's examination of Gordon's corpse indicates, among other things, bruised knuckles consistent with punching somebody or something, all such claims made to villainize the dead victim, amount to circumstantial demonization of a man stabbed while sitting down.

But the work of legal interveners and activists, such as Professor Elizabeth Sheehy and Dr Fred Shane through the promotion of "BWS, to legalize spousal murder, hangs directly on the book by Lenore Walker, called simply, Battered Woman. This book and its conclusions form the foundation on which the pseudo-science of "Battered Wife Syndrome," and the legal Battered Wife Excuse for murder both rest.

A review of The Battered Woman by Robert Scheaffer introduces the book as: "…a preposterous and indefensible work of pseudo-scholarship that has nonetheless attained near-icon status within so-called 'Women's Studies.'"

Walker's is the book relied on and credited by Elizabeth Sheehy in her present and ongoing activism to legalize murder (when committed by women) in the Canadian court system.

However, as rapidly as we may appear to be racing towards a culture in which killing is only murder when the corpse has breasts or ovaries, in law, what justifies a violent or deadly act for a person of one demographic, also justifies the very same for anyone of another demographic.

Actually, it's worse than that. Feminist advocacy of legalized killing based on "Battered Wife Syndrome" not only seeks to decouple that legal excuse from any abuse committed by a man targeted for killing. It doesn't end there: actual violence itself is no longer necessary for gender ideologues to justify killing.

Sheehy, on the first page of Defending Battered Women On Trial's acknowledgement section names the "ground breaking work" of Evan Stark, whose insights and analysis have –- according to Sheehy –- shaped her thinking.

Stark is the author of Coercive Control, published by Oxford University Press in 2009, which expands the definition of domestic violence to include insults, withheld affection, and denial of sex.

From the Starks article on which his 2009 book of the same title is based:

"Applying the violence model to the typical pattern has fragmented women's experience of abuse, made the multi faceted nature of their oppression invisible, and elicited victim-blaming responses"

The victim-blaming incidentally being decried by Stark, incidentally, should not be confused with that practiced in a courtroom against the victim of a murder, as in the case of Donelda Kay's killing of Dennis Gordon.

However, as the profiteers of the domestic violence industry abandon the need for abuse or battery, moving their rhetoric from "violence against women" to "coercive control," they are redefining what they mean by violence. Encompassed now are a wide range of behaviours not normally considered violent. This has the consequence of not merely reclassifying many healthy relationships as abusive, a move calculated to criminalize more men, and justify their killing by female partners. The grievance industry profiteers re-classifying domestic abuse by a range of emotionally controlling and manipulative behaviours are, without apparently realizing it, putting women squarely in the crosshairs as viable targets for killing by their partners. It's increasingly well-known that in violent relationships, women are at least as violent, or more violent than their male partners. But on top of this, women are also far more often the practitioners of the types of abuse listed, informing Stark's model for "coercive control".

According to Stark:
"There is now compelling evidence that the combination of coercion and control is the most devastating form of abuse, as well as the most common."

Interestingly, Stark provides a number of tactics of such abuse – including "withdrawal, threatening to leave, withholding affection or sex" from a victim, curtailing association with friends, social isolation, demeaning the physical characteristics of a subject, and "saying or doing things in a public setting that insults or embarrasses them."

In Stark's framing, the abuser is universally male, and the abused universally female, but the tactics described are recognizable as those commonly used by women in romantic relationships not usually recognized as abusive.

And this is the justification advanced by Stark, by Walker, and by Elizabeth Sheehy, for the killing of an offending partner. Ladies, are you paying attention? The argument being advanced to justify spousal murder and intimate homicide by these people is being framed using the male pronoun as a placeholder for "offender," but uncorrupted law does not recognize sex, and it's women who are now being defined by feminists, based on their behavior, as the people appropriate to kill.

Is that what we want?

Fathers Rights guru Dr. Stephen Baskerville talks with AVFM News

Robert O'Hara · 20 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Last week Dr. Stephen Baskerville was kind enough to invite Robert O'Hara into his home for an interview.

Baskerville, a professor at Patrick Henry Collegein Purcellville, VA and author of "Taken Into Custody," has long been thought of as the academic hero of the fathers rights movement. He has spoken extensively in the news media concerning the family courts and the demise of the rights of fathers.

Toward a Feminist Calculus

Osulle Pmi-Samoht · 20 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: We have recently uncovered an important paper that was somehow rejected by traditional, patriarchal peer reviewed journals that oppress womyn and silence their voices. We made arrangements for us to publish this piece for the first time, so the world may know the truth and explore important new areas of higher mathematics. –DE

TOWARD A FEMINIST CALCULUS

Osulle Pmi-Samoht

Professor of Gender Studies

Abstract

This paper responds to recent literature suggesting that disparities in math abilities arise from biological differences between males and women. This response scaffolds its argument on a feminist perspective that resists hegemonic masculinities which have dominated math, and provides a place for feminist notions of temporality, uncorrupted by phallocentric physics which subordinate time and space. We commence with a study of how an inclusive math was decimated by the first fundamental theorem of the calculus and the toxicity of Classical Newtonian Physics. We close by suggesting a return to a gyno-centric calculus which values women's ways of knowing.

Part 1: Background

Calculus can be divided into two sub-disciplines: the integral calculus and the differential calculus. We theorize that the differential calculus subjugates the integral calculus. We suggest that these performative forms flaunt their oxymoronic effect by shaking the pigeon pair of their masculine and feminine origins.

We believe the Integral Calculus is the more appropriate tool to model the physical world, for it disembodies marginalization in favor of intersectionality.

Foremost, in its semiotic iconicity, the integral manifests wholeness in its fluid S-curve as evinced by Figure 1.

[image]
Figure 1: The Integral
[image]
Figure 2: The Madonna

The S curve represents the "feminist-as-producer" of textual meaning and bridges the chasm between mathematical symbols and written words. This form was created in response to the destruction of the fertility goddess cultures an an attempt to keep the memory alive and react to the domination of "equation over word."

Specifically, curved visuals, such as two dimensional circular lines and other free flowing forms devoid of closed surfaces enable feminism; while males are privileged by three dimensional hard cylinders with defined edges.

We can find this form, this intersecting fluid S-representations of the goddess (Figure 2). Such forms suggest the umbrella of a gendered performativity capable of sexual reproduction without patriarchal hegemony – one that denies, and with success, the infusion of sperm.

The overarching goal of integral calculus is to span the boundaries of mysticism and to totalize knowledge and "women's ways of knowing" (WWK). It is to accumulate, accept, convolve and involve the sum total of effects. It does so by recognizing the value of every interval adding to the sum. The integral calculus is exquisitely non-performative: it exists. Integral non-performativity can only be understood as a process of iteration – a regularized and constrained repetition of norms necessitated by processing. Feminist calculus repeats itself until it gets it right, even when it's wrong.

Part 2: The destruction of fertility: the arrival of the male.

Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz first eschewed the beauty of integral calculus by mathematics, performatively, it to a world view of separation: the differential calculus. Unlike the integral calculus and its respect for WWK, the differential calculus tramples; it destroys, separates and rapes. The focus of such a male calculus is differentiation: rates, change velocity, speed and acceleration, hurtling normative cultures from one big bang to the next, restrained by masculine terror, violence, rape and the spray of seminal fluid.

We argue that the very symbolic representations suggest male-oriented normativity. Consider the ostensibly innocuous forms.

- Figure 3. Time differentiation (with a superposed dot):

> [image]

- Figure 4. Space differentiation (with a superscripted prime):

[image]

But dare we explore the hidden meaning in these symbols that, in themselves, are the cause of the disparity in math scores between feminists and males? The clue can be found in the Leibniz notation: in long lost archives recently unearthed. The dot, upon microscopic examination, reveals its essential symbolic duality: the two testicles reaching toward infinite domination. For this is the original intended notation laid bare. The prime, upon microscopic examination, is representative self-extending male hegemony: it is the phallus.

- Figure 5. A microscopic inspection of time differentiation

[image]

- Figure 5. A microscopic inspection of space differentiation

[image]

Can it be no wonder why males outperform feminists in math? The very semiotic nature of the language dissuades feminists from working with males when these two symbols are juxtaposed, one on top the other.

[image]

Figure 7. Juxtapose time and space differentiation symbols

These are no accidents.

The differential calculus is a rapacious mathematical formulation demanding power over time and space, obliterating the communion of place: Feminists' Place. It represents the first world-wide manifestation of rape culture and enables male math domination over feminism. Essentially, feminists are locked in a room by males Preventing Participation (PP) in higher abstractions.

Part 3: The split in integral wholeness

Early feminist theoreticians attempted to fight this onslaught of male domination. Initial attempts to refute differential calculus were successful in the creation of two forms of integration studies to combat differentiation. This split was presaged my early feminists rhetorical studies. The result was inevitable: the only way a feminist calculus could save itself was by giving birth to another form of itself, like the Madonna herself.

In a valiant attempt to resist the marauders of the feminine mystique, the integral calculus split itself into two forms: the definite integral and the indefinite integral, the latter resisting understanding and dissection in support of Women's Ways of Unknowing (WWU). Ostensibly confusing, these two forms represent a misrecognition that necessitates a narrative reality: definite integral = WWK; indefinite integral = WWU.

Simply put: the definite integral attempts to maintain WWK, while the indefinite integral ventures forth into WWU. To put this more clearly, women know and women unknow and unknowing is a knowledge not known by males who un-know the knowing known by feminist knowers of knowledge.

Both the definite and indefinite integral present not necessarily fixed, exhaustive, or universal categories of how women (vis-a-vi males) know in direct disagreement with the ruthless brutality of knowledge that endeavors to perpetuate the hegemony of masculinities.

However, the saving grace of the indefinite integral and WWU was soon obliterated by the arrival of Issac Newton.

When Newton postulated the First Fundamental Theorem of Calculus, he linked the Differential and Integral in the duality of hetero-normative relationships. The success of this theorem put an end to the advancement of the integral form and its more natural feminine mystique. In doing so, Newton made the more holistic integral calculus subservient to the differential through an insufferable (yet reversible) process that subordinates matriarchal and other gatherer-societies.

(In a follow on paper, we will discuss how the definite and indefinite integral beckons the notion the butch-fem dialectic and its potential to rebuke normativity and undergird transitions between gendered performances. Until such time, we endeavor to put forth a feminist call for action that abandons the first fundamental theorem of the calculus.)

It is time to reject the first fundamental theorem of the Calculus as misogynistic.

Proposition for feminist action: Rejection of the first fundamental theorem of the calculus.

We infer this to mean that we reject the first fundamental theorem of the calculus.

Part 3: The defilement of matriarchal mathematics

We reject all fundamental classical mechanics based upon the first fundamental theorem of the calculus, particularly the laws of motion.

Newton presaged a violent rape of integral knowledge and WWK/U by proposing a toxic formulation of motion:

$$\boldsymbol{F} = m\boldsymbol{a}$$

Figure 8. The Patriarchal Law

We must interpret this in the context of rape culture that pervades our campuses, today. "F" is the accepted symbol for the act of male penetration by force, domination and conquering: the rapist. It is a vector. Like all vectors, it protrudes and extends in space; it rapes space; it Fucks space. The origins of such vector masculinities are found at the time of increasing European and American power and the rise of global imperialism and global capitalist economy. In other words, modern masculinity has had to do with global violence and its seminal spray directed by the vector.

In contradistinction, the ultimate icon of woman is the Marxist valuation of the feminist: the goddess, the integral S form, the mother ("mom", "matriarch", "mommy" or the more ubiquitous " ma "). We herein reveal that the fundamental law of motion, F = ma, reveals itself to be a rape equation: the essence of the male desire to conquer and contain the female form: to fuck the mother: F.ma.

Simply put: Men's Rights Activists, patriarchs, those concerned about the welfare of men and boys and professors of applied mathematical physics are mother fuckers.

We feel that such a framework of motion works a-productively as both a category of self-identification and a category of other-attribution and moreover, that at times it might de-negotiate a gap between one's sense of self and one's public legibility as gender variant.

CALL TO FEMINIST ACTION: F = ma is a rape equation that must be banned from college campuses.

This package of thought first arose in the 17th-18th centuries, as a philosophical account of why Newtonian science was superior to its scholastic predecessor. According to this account, the feminist predecessor science, which represented objects as intrinsically possessing secondary qualities and ends (allowing for WWU), confused the way things are with the ways they are related to emotionally subjugate human knowers (Male Ways of Knowing: MWK). Males then erroneously projected their own mental states and value judgments onto things. Adoption of the objective methods enabled the successor scientists to avoid these errors and achieve an "absolute" conception of the universe dominating knowledge.

Feminism objects to each element in this package as a normative ideal and as a general description of how science works. We desire a return to a world of Unknowing and propose an alternate dialectic based on a revised algebra.

5. A Feminist Algebra to subvert the masculine Calculus

SEMIOTICS OF ALGEBRA

In linear algebra, the letter "x" is often used to denote the independent variable; the letter "y" is used to represent the dependent variable. In algebraic instruction, this reveals itself as

[image]

Figure 9. A masculine algebra

Is this not a surprise? The letter "y" is symbolic of the male chromosome. The letter "x" is symbolic of the feminist chromosome. A close inspection reveals the theatricalized trajectories of a notation which, while inducing "border as metaphor", lowers math scores between feminists vis a vis males, empowering marginal positionality. This was then cast as parenthetical " (" and ")" prison noted symbolically here as ("()") in which the feminist forms have been ensconced in strikingly representative vaginal openings. Ostensibly it has freedom and independence; but it is confined. We insist and demand a change from masculinities. Henceforth, we point toward a more inclusive feminist functionality – an icon freeing the ovulating x chromosome from its patriarchal prison.

[image]Figure 10. A Feminist algebra

However, we joyously point out that recent theorists have been suggesting more daring algebraic forms to invigorate feminist performativity in mathematics. And we agree such forms have greater potential to level the playing field in feminist mathematics such as this miraculous statement that clearly reveals WWU:

[image]

Figure 11. An improved feminist algebra

Finally, we take the necessary step of also repudiating linear algebra and empowering the non-linear with its dizzying sense of feminist amusement. Surely F(M), M(F) and the more hyperbolic F2F(M) and MM-1(F) more appropriately pathologize the masculine continuum.

Indeed, how joyous!

Summary

We demand a formal algebraic representation that undergirds female confidence in mathematics. We support the interrogation of methods through which this subjugation merged. We suggest a realignment of key theorists purported to provide a critical break in feminist theory with citational and clitoral traces to force a re-imagining of our historical legacy and place within it.

Conclusions

In summary, we repudiate the differential Calculus. We seek the disuse of the First Fundamental Theorem of the Calculus. We reject Newtonian Mechanics and all three laws of motion. We aspire to a feminist math where things do not move: we deny acceleration and force. We affirm inertia. We insist that WWU (unknowing) is the most suitable framework for feminist theory.

We call on a new order of feminism premised on a provocative taxonomical confusion that subordinates knowledge.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Gloria Steinem; without whom, no fish would have bicycle.

AEI and RAINN Challenge Mary Koss and the Rape Culture Lie

AVfM Video Source · 20 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We aren't sure what exactly to make of this video's "1 in 40" statistic, or the omission of female perpetrators and male victims, but nevertheless we find it significant that more and more mainstream groups, left and right, are starting to challenge gender ideologue lies openly:

The American Enterprise Institute could be called a fairly mainstream libertarianish-conservative group, but they do real scholarship and fairly moderate advocacy. You can subscribe to them here.

CAFE to hold Lecture at UofT on Family Court and Shared Parenting

Dan Perrins · 20 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Repost

From the Failure of Family Court to Equal Shared Parenting:
Moving Beyond the Gender Paradigm

Friday, March 21, 2014, 8PM
Ramsay Wright Laboratories, Room 110
25 Harbord Street
This event will occur on the campus of the University of Toronto

Hosted by the University of Toronto Men's Issues Awareness Society.

[image]
Dr. Edward Kruk
Dr. Edward Kruk, author of the new book "The Equal Parent Presumption" and newly elected President of the International Council on Shared Parenting will join us at the University of Toronto Friday, March 21

Short talk description

The family law system is broken. It is biased against shared parenting responsibility, its adversarial system fuels parental conflict and family violence, and it is particularly damaging to the father-child relationship. But there is hope. The public overwhelmingly supports a new paradigm: the equal shared parenting presumption. Dr. Edward Kruk will discuss his research, put forward a new legal framework for equal parenting in Canada and comment on current legislative efforts to change the system for the better.

Abstract

This presentation will examine fathers' and mothers' perspectives on their children's needs in the divorce transition, and their responsibilities in relation to those needs, as well as their views on the responsibilities of social institutions to support divorced parents. Fathers' and mothers' views of the salient issues regarding post-divorce parenting, with a focus on the process and outcome of child custody determination, are examined. It will be argued that both non-residential fathers and mothers experience the harmful effects of existing child custody laws and socio-legal policies, and speak strongly to the need for family law reform in the direction of an equal shared parenting presumption. Both women and men support the establishment of such a presumption in equal measure, as both mothers and fathers are at risk of becoming disenfranchised from their children's lives via "primary residence" judgments. The need for inter-sexual dialogue on the matter of parenting after divorce is urgently needed, and divorce scholars, practitioners and policy makers are urged to abandon the dominant gender paradigm in regard to the legal determination of parenting after divorce.

About Dr. Edward Kruk

Edward Kruk is Associate Professor of Social Work at the University of British Columbia, specializing in child and family policy. He has practiced in the fields of welfare rights, child protection, school social work, hospital social work, and family services. He is currently teaching and practicing in the areas of family mediation and addiction.

Edward's first book, Divorce and Disengagement: Patterns of Fatherhood Within and BeyondMarriage, was the first in-depth study of the experiences of divorced fathers and the phenomenon of father absence after divorce. His second book, Mediation and Conflict Resolution in Social Work and the Human Services, explores the application of mediation in eighteen fields of practice, with a focus on theory and practice relevant to each field. His third book, Divorced Fathers: Children's Needs and Parental Responsibilities, examines fathers' perceptions of their children's needs in the divorce transition, and parental and social institutional responsibilities to those needs. His new book, The Equal Parent Presumption: Social Justice in the Legal Determination of Parenting After Divorce, based on emergent trends of egalitarian parenting and non-adversarial conflict resolution, outlines a "best interests of the child from the perspective of the child" and a responsibility-to-needs approach to post-divorce child and family policy.

He writes a popular monthly blog, "Co-Parenting After Divorce," for Psychology Today, and he has been cited as "Canada's leading child custody expert" by two national newspapers. He was recently awarded the Queen Elizabeth II Diamond Jubilee Medal for his service and research on the best interests of children of divorce, and was elected as the inaugural president of the International Council on Shared Parenting.

He is a founding member of the Bounce Collective, a group of progressive West Coast DJs known for their diversity of musical styles, and all-night dance parties.

For a full bio please see www.edwardkruk.com. For more on the International Council on Shared Parenting please visit twohomes.org/en_html

Black Man, Save Yourself

AVfM Video Source · 21 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Anyone who thinks the issues we make noise about are “white” issues needs to wake up. The Straight Shooter tells it like it is:

The only thing we’d likely add to this is that while these problems may have first been noticed in the black community, they are increasingly becoming things men and boys in all racial and ethnic groups are facing–and the one thing the Powers That Be most want to avoid is men ceasing to be in conflict with each other over race. If they did, men might start to see where their common interests as men lie and begin supporting each other.

Those at the top of the power structure would not like that one little bit.

IamBaal’s video is here and you can subscribe to The Straight Shooter here.

Rape Hysteria & the Rape Culture Lie Must End

Caroline Kitchens · 21 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Rape is as American as apple pie," says blogger Jessica Valenti. She and her sisters-in-arms describe our society as a "rape culture" where violence against women is so normal, it's almost invisible. Films, magazines, fashion, books, music, humor, even Barbie — according to the activists — cooperate in conveying the message that women are there to be used, abused, and exploited. Recently, rape culture theory has migrated from the lonely corners of the feminist blogosphere into the mainstream. In January, the White House asserted that we need to combat campus rape by changing "…a culture of passivity and tolerance in this country, which too often allows this type of violence to persist."

Tolerance for rape? Rape is a horrific crime and rapists are despised. We have strict laws that Americans want to see enforced. Though rape is certainly a serious problem, there's no evidence that it's considered a cultural norm. Twenty-first century America does not have a rape culture; what we have is an out-of-control lobby leading the public and our educational and political leaders down the wrong path. Rape culture theory is doing little to help victims, but its power to poison the minds of young women and lead to hostile environments for innocent males is immense.

On college campuses, obsession with eliminating "rape culture" has led to censorship and hysteria. At Boston University, student activists launched a petition demanding the cancellation of a Robin Thicke concert, because the lyrics of his hit song "Blurred Lines" allegedly celebrate "systemic patriarchy and sexual oppression." (The lyrics may not exactly be pleasant to many women, but song lyrics don't turn men into rapists. Yet, ludicrously, the song has already been banned at more than 20 British universities.) Activists at Wellesley College recently demanded that administrators remove a statue of a sleepwalking man: The image of a nearly naked male could "trigger" memories of sexual assault for victims. Meanwhile, a growing number of young men find themselves charged with rape, named publicly, and brought before campus judicial panels informed by rape culture theory. In such courts, due process is practically non-existent: Guilty because accused.

Rape culture theorists dismiss critics who bring up examples of hysteria and false accusations as "rape denialists" and "rape apologists." To even suggest that false accusations occur, according to these activists, is to engage in "victim blaming." But now, rape culturalists are confronting a formidable critic that even they will find hard to dismiss.

RAINN (Rape, Abuse & Incest National Network) is America's largest and most influential anti-sexual violence organization. It's the leading voice for sexual assault victim advocacy. Indeed, rape culture activists routinely cite the authority of RAINN to make their case. But in RAINN's recent recommendations to the White House Task Force to Protect Students from Sexual Assault, it repudiates the rhetoric of the anti "rape culture" movement:

> In the last few years, there has been an unfortunate trend towards blaming "rape culture" for the extensive problem of sexual violence on campus. While it is helpful to point out the systemic barriers to addressing the problem, it is important not to lose sight of a simple fact: Rape is caused not by cultural factors but by the conscious decisions, of a small percentage of the community, to commit a violent crime.

RAINN urges the White House to "remain focused on the true cause of the problem" and suggests a three-pronged approach for combating rape: empowering community members through bystander intervention education, using "risk-reduction messaging" to encourage students to increase their personal safety, and promoting clearer education on "where the 'consent line' is." It also asserts that we should treat rape like the serious crime it is by giving power to trained law enforcement rather than internal campus judicial boards.

RAINN is especially critical of the idea that we need to focus on teaching men not to rape — the hallmark of rape culture activism. Since rape exists because our culture condones and normalizes it, activists say, we can end the epidemic of sexual violence only by teaching boys not to rape.

No one would deny that we should teach boys to respect women. But by and large, this is already happening. By the time men reach college, RAINN explains, “most students have been exposed to 18 years of prevention messages, in one form or another.” The vast majority of men absorbs these messages and views rape as the horrific crime that it is. So efforts to address rape need to focus on the very small portion of the population that “has proven itself immune to years of prevention messages.” They should not vilify the average guy.

By blaming so-called rape culture, we implicate all men in a social atrocity, trivialize the experiences of survivors, and deflect blame from the rapists truly responsible for sexual violence. RAINN explains that the trend of focusing on rape culture “has the paradoxical effect of making it harder to stop sexual violence, since it removes the focus from the individual at fault, and seemingly mitigates personal responsibility for his or her own actions.”

Moral panic over “rape culture” helps no one — least of all, survivors of sexual assault. College leaders, women’s groups, and the White House have a choice. They can side with the thought police of the feminist blogosphere who are declaring war on Robin Thicke, the Sports Illustrated Swimsuit Edition, male statues, and Barbie. Or, they can listen to the sane counsel of RAINN.

Caroline Kitchens is a research assistant at the American Enterprise Institute.

Editorial note: this item reprinted with Ms. Kitchens’ permission originally appeared in Time. –DE

MHRM, MGTOW, and creating a counter-culture

AVFM · 21 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A recent discussion between Paul Elam and Dean Esmay about the upcoming film The Red Pill should help people understand how many of us view the 'Men's Human Rights Movement' (MHRM) and Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). I found it so inspiring I spent a few hours hammering out a transcript of the relevant bits to share below. I hope you get as much out of it as I did. The relevant bits start at 3:38 minutes into the video. –PW

Paul: I wanted to have a discussion for a few minutes a little bit on the nature of social movements, of how they happen, and the fact that this is a part of the process. It's not like with American civil rights that a bunch of African Americans got together and said, "Hey, our rights are being violated," then all of a sudden white America said "Oh, yeah, Ok, boy, that's really true, so let's just fix it up." The idea that any social movement has ever made progress without there being conflict, without there being condemnation…. there were other black people that were just outraged at the beginnings of the civil rights movement and who wanted nothing to do with it. It was the same thing with feminism, the same thing with gay rights, it was the same thing with any kind of movement I can think of – there's always an initial reaction from society to condemn it, to put it down, to make fun of the people that participate. First they ignore you, then they make fun of you, then they fight you and then you win, and we are reaching the fighting stage of this battle. And of course we get mostly negative press: that's why we need to have a movement! It's because of these entrenched ideas.

So what do we do with this contingent in the men's movement that somehow thinks that our success is measured on getting people to say things nice about us, and getting people to write good things and to make good movies that speaks our point of view? And I'm saying this about a lot of people I respect; I'm not trying to put anybody down. But is seems to me a sort of not looking at history the way all social movements have developed and taken that into account when analyzing what's going on now.

Dean: Some people get immediately angry when you start comparing us to any other civil right movement, which is a little frustrating because they are saying, for example, if you make a comparison to black civil rights they say, "What, you are saying you have it as bad as people with segregated lunch counters?" If you mention Jews in Germany they say "Oh you are saying your just as badly off as as that," and if you mention almost any other movement, people seem to think we're saying it's exactly the same for us. Well no it's not, because if you look at any of those social movements none of those were exactly identical either – all we are doing is drawing parallels. And when looked at from that context, I actually think the most relevant movement to compare us to if anything is the gay rights movement, maybe just because it's more modern, but it is more contentious, homosexuality hits buttons in people in ways that others don't.

So let's look at the gay rights movement: the epochal moment of that is generally agreed to be something called Stonewall, where a bunch of gay men (oh and by the way mostly men, almost entirely men) got tired of police raids coming into gay bars and arresting everybody for being gay, and pretty much rioted over the thing. And so there was Stonewall–then as everybody knows gay rights just broke out everywhere and it was all over. Right? NO, is didn't. Apartheid in South Africa, is our situation that bad? No, that's not the point. The point is apartheid in South Africa, there was the movement to end apartheid, how did it go? Forty years of apartheid and then Nelson Mandela walks out of prison and it's over. Is that how it went? NO! But it's how it looks in the history books.

Even if you look at something really big, say the fall of the Soviet Union, if you are young enough or you are just not thinking hard enough you think that what happened is that one day there was the Soviet Union, then the Berlin Wall come down, and it was over: democracy in Russia. Did that happen that way actually? NO! It is still playing out in fact. Martin Luther King gives the 'I have a dream' speech in 1963 – an epochal moment on human history. In 1968, five years later, there's race riots still, in fact maybe the first race riots if I remember right.

I think within the men's rights community we have our cynics who think none of this will change, and I think this is where some of the more hardcore MGTOW (men going their own way) come from – none of this can change, it's all biological determinism, it really can't change, people cant change, men won't change, women won't change – to which I say no, and I don't have to choose either social constructivism OR rabid genetic reductionism.

Paul: Part of that that really bothers me sometimes is that, 1. if this were solely biological determinism, and everybody was cast into a role that they could not break out of, we couldn't have men going their own way. That phenomena could not exist. Now, is it different, yes. The fact of the matter is that this is the first movement that really does challenge gender roles. This is the first movement that really does go against a lot of human drives. And it makes it tougher for that reason – there's no doubt it's harder. I look at it from an understanding of counter-culture, and I think that is a critical part of understanding what's happening here. There is not going to be a men's rights day parade in Washington DC with 200,000 people on the green, and a Men's Rights Act passed in Congress, and all these things that we normally consider iconic of civil rights movements. What there can be though is counter-culture, and there already is one: MGTOW is a counter-culture; MRAs are a counter-culture, both men and women. they are people that have taken the Red Pill and have changed their perspective, or whatever you want to call it. But they are forming a sub-community that is growing, just like we saw with the Romantics, like we saw with the bohemians, like we saw with the beatniks, and like we saw with the hippies. You can call hippies whatever you want – you can't say they didn't change the culture.

Dean: The Hip-Hop movement.

Paul: Yes, all these things have a tremendous impact on the culture at large. That's how you change a culture, is with counter-cultures. It's the only way that cultures change and that's what's happening right now. What happens is that more and more people start looking at this stuff and challenging their own ideas, and that's already happening. But we're not going to get there by worrying every time a journalist writes something that's nasty. Just spell the URL correctly, spell my name right – get it [the message] out there, get more people to the site, get more people to the MGTOW forums, give more people a way to look – those comments out there in the internet actually change things for the better. And the comments now look tremendously different than they did even two years ago; and article out there that comes out that is profeminist, none of its going unchallenged any more, they have to delete it in order to keep their forum clean.

But I wanted to talk about this because I just wanted to reiterate the idea, and maybe try to infuse more of this in discussion – that we are not here to make friends with the mainstream. We are not here to maybe one day wake up and have every legislator in every State suddenly talking about our issues. Eventually that will happen, it will become a part of the culture, but the way we get there is the way we've been going, which is to talk about this stuff unapologetically. And to have other people, people like CAFÉ do great work, and they don't take the same track we do. But I remember as a kid watching the Olympics and seeing a runner –I forget his name- but he got a gold medal, and instead of putting his hand over his heart when they played the national anthem, he raised the black fist for black power, and that was needed at the time, that was a part of a counter culture, a movement that eventually brought real change to society. And I raise mine too!

Dean: I can't emphasize this point enough. I've met a lot of people within the men's movement, and some outside of the men's movement, mostly MGTOWs and some PUAs who think that what men's rights activists do is we go out, and we primarily lobby government officials, and try and get new laws passed and sign petitions. Well we do a little of those things but the fact of the matter is that we mostly engage in counter-culture exactly like you just mentioned, Paul.

I'll tell ya, just mention for example the civil rights movement of the 1960s. I don't think this point can be missed. After the civil war and the end of slavery, people were denied all sorts of fundamental basic human rights for about 100 years, almost to the day. In 1964 President Lyndon Johnson staked his entire presidency on getting something called the Civil Rights Act of 1964 passed. While there were some little things in it to criticize, it was the legislation that went bang – there will be no more discrimination in the United States. It was followed in one year we had the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which guarantees a voting right to everybody no matter what; if they were of age it didn't matter, no more literacy tests, no more of that bullshit, counting jellybeans in a jar. No, everybody gets a vote.

So, civil rights are now established in America? Not really. Three years later we saw riots. three years later (I believe it was the 1968 Olympics where that guy was raising his fist in black power?), and we saw all sorts of civil unrest through the 1970s around race issues, and we still haven't fully resolved race issues, although I think you'd be a fool not to think things were orders of magnitude better now than they were 50 years ago.

Similarly here, we can see all the legal changes we want. For example we've seen this new move Divorce Corp, where the director is trying to get a movement together to change laws on child custody and divorce in the United States. Those may pass, but this will not necessarily mean things get better overnight, because a: there will be a lot of remaining issues, and b: the courts have historically found ways to get back to doing business as usual regardless of what the legislation says. So I believe in my heart that anybody who isn't in this thinking that short term is ten years, and that long term may mean 100 years, is not thinking straight. And if you don't have that level of patience then you need to get it. That's why I for example have always considered the MGTOW, even the ones who say "I'm not a men's rights activist – I don't want it, they're full of shit they are wasting their time" — that's why I've always believed that every MGTOW, whether he wants to admit it or not is a form of men's rights activist. Because just the act of saying "I'm not playing this game anymore" is an act of disobedience to the wider culture and become something that we MRAs can point to and say, "you see those guys, now you can keep calling them losers, and whiners and whatever you want but guess what; there's more and more of them all the time – you think you might wanna stop and question your own assumptions as to why those guys see things that way?"

Paul: Dean that's why no matter how much flak we get from some of the more extreme MGTOWs out there, the isolationists who point at MRAs and say we're a bunch of manginas or whatever, we are always going to support the MGTOW community and the idea of men going their own way. We are absolutely going to be behind that with every resource we can and every way we can and publishing literature on that, because the best solution that this culture has is showing men, one at a time, that they don't have to buy this bullshit corporate lie, marriage lie, and everything else that's going on out here that really just sort of grabs men from the moment they are born and raises them to be useful and disposable – that they don't have to participate in that. And the worst that feminist governance makes things for men then the more that that philosophy is attractive to them.

We're not really building the movement, feminism is, and certain aspects of traditionalism is, building the MGTOW movement. Certainly running around –and I know Dean and I disagree on this, or we might- but running around using guys on the battlefields to go kill and die for corporate interests is not a really great alternative for men, it doesn't work out so good in the long run; I've been in the VA hospital enough and seen the results to know how good that is for men in the end. But they've never felt like there's been an option, men felt like there's the military traditional route, then the option to go the feminist route, but there really wasn't many options and now there finally is one; there's an alternative for men to say, "Y'now something, I don't have to do any of this stuff. I can make my own way, I don't have to climb the corporate ladder and become a success in the eyes of other men, I don't have to run around dedicating my life to pleasing women, I can do what I want to do" – and they are actually starting to take up on it despite the biological determinism that's preached by some of them.

Dean: That's right, men are opting out of marriage and commitment all over the world, not just in the United States, Canada and etc. They're opting out all over the world and a lot of then don't know why they are, but the more that we spread the message the more of them will start to think "yes, this is why, I've never thought about it before but yeah." And I believe more men will start asking the hard question of "Oh, well you want to have a relationship and make a baby with me, well I might like to make a baby but why would I do that, and what's in it for me?" And that's just a shocking question to normal ears in this culture. But that can change. There's a lot that can change, but I don't believe any effective political change will happen without cultural change first – which is why what you are saying about counter-culture is absolutely correct.

I have a theory, a rather radical theory, so somebody can check me on it. Google up sometime something called "preference falsification," which is a psychosocial theory as to why there are sometimes very sudden social changes when people didn't think anything was going to change at all. I'm actually pretty much of the opinion that, in shorter time than people might believe, feminism might get a stink on it faster than people might think it will.

Paul: I think it's already happening.

Dean: I think it may even fall as an ideology, and here's where I get in trouble with some of my friends in the movement: if feminism falls as an ideology and nobody takes it seriously anymore, we actually have a bigger problem to face waiting on the other end anyway. Which is all the things that Warren Farrell talks about, all the things Tom Golden talks about, most of the things that you just talked about: if we find the vilification of men ends, does the end of using men as disposable utilities come with that? Does the end of men seeing their identity through the approval of women end from that? Does the social expectation – "Oh, well feminism is dead, therefore it's your job to be the provider" reappear?

So even if we see the Women's Studies departments shutting down one after the other, and more and more women (which by the way we are seeing all the time) show up and say, "I'm not a feminist, this is bullshit, I don't want anything to do with it" — feminism could evaporate and become a minor ideology that nobody takes seriously anymore, or that people actually loathe like the White Supremacist movement, and still the underlying problems will be there. Which is why, once again, the movement has to be about creating a counterculture and getting men to stop thinking of themselves in terms first and foremost of what women or society expects of them, but start thinking in terms first and foremost of themselves as human beings, and as male human beings second, and pondering what that means. But you are not a disposable utility, even if you choose to do something "heroic" (I don't know if I even want to put that in scare quotes), something heroic like be a fireman, or go ahead and join the military because you don't quite share Paul's view that all of our wars are for corporations- you've chosen that because you chose it, because you made the thought process that, "No, this is what I really want to do, I believe in that conflict over there," or "I believe I want to fight fires" or "I believe I want to be a cop and I want to save people," or whatever it is. But you didn't do it because, well, "this is going to make me a man."

Paul: I think it's really important to remember that as we see more and more women, as we already are, saying "I'm not a feminist, I hate feminists because…" – fill in the rest of that sentence guys, it's, "I'm not a feminist, I want a man to take care of me." That's what you're hearing from most of these women. What do they say – NAWALT….. well I was talking to somebody the other day and I heard a new one – EWALT: Enough Women Are Like That. I think it's really important to remember that; we're not just fighting feminism here, we're not just trying to overturn discrimination in family courts. When feminism falls, and it will, because it's a sick corrupt ideology that can't stand the pressure of any weight on it – it's like a house of cards that will eventually buckle – we think we are seeing that now. But when it does I can promise you a resurgence of male utility-oriented traditionalism is going to rush in and claim victory; all I'm saying is don't let it claim you at the same time, because if you do and that's your agenda, then we are right back at square one with gynocentrism, and personally I don't want to be there.

Dean: Because you just mentioned gynocentrism I'm going to mention Peter Wright's awesome site Gynocentrism.com, which goes into the historical roots of a lot of this stuff –a lot of the stuff feminism is secretly based on that they don't even recognize- and why you don't have to believe that all this shit is simply embedded in our genes and unchangeable. Also go to MGTOW.avoiceformen.com where Peter Wright is doing some stellar work in bringing forward 'men going their own way' material. Also know that all MGTOW have our full support in order to define themselves in their own lives – and competing sites too, we welcome competing sites; we need as many voices as possible including voices who don't like us- more power to it.

Why I hate the feminists who desecrate my father's memory

Mike Buchanan · 21 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of the feminist narratives which angers me the most is that men are inherently violent, and that if more women were in charge of countries, we'd see fewer armed conflicts. Given the readiness with which some women manipulate men to assault and even kill men who've displeased them – "violence by proxy" – it seems to me a ridiculous claim. The fact that in most cases of unreciprocated domestic violence the perpetrator is a woman surely tells us that women are not inherently less violent than men.

A few months ago my father (Malcolm) died, at the age of 90. He was born just five years after the end of WW1. A gentle, kind and generous man who grew up in the Outer Hebrides, he was a lifelong hero to me, in no small measure because on his 21st birthday, a few days after D-Day, he jumped onto a Normandy beach as part of the unit supporting General Montgomery. Recently the BBC broadcast a remarkable documentary about the men who served in WW1, 2014 of course being the centenary of the start of that conflict. It moved me deeply, because it said so much about the sense of duty men – such as my father – feel to protect the vulnerable, often at terrible personal cost:

I found the documentary very moving. It consists mainly of interviews of men (and a few women) recorded about 50 years after the outset of WW1, in the early 1960s – about 50 years ago. Any man who watches the documentary will surely stand a little taller after watching it. Any woman who watches it – any woman with a heart, anyway – will surely be grateful that men (then, as now, as always) have been prepared to die in order that women and children don't.

50 years after my father jumped onto that Normandy beach I took him to visit the Normandy beaches, the war cemeteries etc. It was the first time since WW2 he'd been back. We went to one of the British cemeteries in Bayeux, where he politely asked to be left alone as he walked down line after line of graves. It was clear from the crosses on the gravestones that most of the men who'd died on the Normandy beaches were around 20 years of age, as he'd been at the time. Many were only 17 or 18. We later went to the enormous and impressive American war cemetery, with crosses and Stars of David marking the final resting places of huge numbers of similarly young men – all facing the United States – and I recall thinking that any European spouting anti-American sentiments should be required to spend an hour or two walking slowly around that place.

Whilst walking past all those graves my father evidently had tears streaming down his face – the first and only time I ever saw him cry – and he was obviously laying some ghosts to rest. He was to live for another 19 years, and I saw him regularly over those years. It was rarely he didn't find the time to say how much that trip had meant to him. A wonderful father. A wonderful man.

I wrote a short blog piece when he died, saying I thought he was from the last generation of men who weren't automatically vilified on account of being men. He never came close to understanding about feminism, maybe the two things were related. It's been speculated that feminism was enabled and energised by the notion that it was men who'd started two world wars – and other wars – and that men collectively were somehow to blame. The facts that only men were in positions of real power at that time, and 99% of the victims of those wars were men, were of course never considered worthy of mention.

Tsumami of Old Sperm Hits US – TV Drama Issues Alert

Jack Goodfellow · 22 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There are 40,000 untested rape kits sitting on dusty shelves….no, strike that. There are 140,000 untested rape kits lingering in the moldy backrooms of…no, strike that too. There are 500,000 untested rape kits hidden deep in the shadows of police stations and warehouses all across America. Hidden! Just like the terrible rapist hidden in the body and soul of every human male above the age of twelve years old.

500,000 rapes. 500,000 times the police have deftly discarded the evidence that could have prevented these demons from striking again, but rather than make the effort, they hid their shame where no one could find it. Thankfully, Dick Wolf, Creator and Executive Producer for the television show, Law and Order, had the vision (or better, an actress on the show – let's not give a man too much credit) to let American women know of this crisis.

We all know that men love to rape women. A man's rape impulse traces all the way down to the sticky wads of DNA that they leave in, on and around their victims. A man, one could assume, would rape anything. A dog. A fern. A hot meatloaf fresh from the oven. Men are rapists. It's that simple. To continue with rape party that America has become, they hide the evidence of their crime. Thank the lord for Police Procedural Television. Where would we be without it?

But wait, maybe there's more to this?

Rape hysteria is a favorite weapon of feminists. Money is a favorite thing of business. Capitalizing on confusion and hyperbole is a favorite strategy of politicians and for the last thirty years, gathering personal data with no definite purpose from private citizens has been a favorite activity our security apparatus.

First – The Disclaimer

Is rape terrible? Yeah. It is.

And now, the disturbing reality

Where did all of those rape kits come from? Is it possible that storing these away wasn't a conscious decision to keep women from the justice they so obviously deserve?

There's this incredibly ground breaking and highly unConstitutional law called the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). Sounds great. No decent person actually wants violence against women. I certainly don't. I also don't care for violence against men.

The short version of what this law accomplishes, concerning rape kits, follows:

A woman is entitled to a free "rape," exam even if she chooses not to press charges. In other words, rape kits are free to women in clinics and hospitals, no charges and no police necessary. Nationwide, baby! They can also be given in situations where a woman doesn't request it. Say, when she's unconscious.

The catch phrase you will hear in the MSM over the next – forever – will be, "decides not to cooperate with law enforcement." Previously, if a woman requested a rape kit, the police were brought in and if she didn't press charges, she might just get a bill for about $800 two or three weeks later.

That's what the, 'decides not to cooperate,' means. She didn't press charges. Maybe she decided she wasn't raped. Maybe she was frightened and maybe….who knows?

VAWA was designed to give women some flexibility in their rape charges. If they decided the next day or a few days later not to press charges, they had an out, no bill and the police had to let the matter go. The police may have never even been called. But – the rape kits were stored, just in case if she decided to press charges.

So why are there all of these rape kits? What's with the tidal wave of old sperm? Is it a backlog? If you were to listen to the feminist's numbers, there are $320,000,000 worth of untested rape kits out there and virtually every state in the country, all of whom were mandated to keep these, refused to pay for the testing in cases where the woman chose not to press charges. Some of those kits don't even have an actual person associated with them.

Read that number again. Three hundred twenty million dollars.

So where did all of the rape kits come from? VAWA gives hospitals the ability to perform a procedure guaranteed to be paid for by the state. States decided not to bite and stored the kits rather than pay for processing (in cases where the evidence was unnecessary or a case was never brought). That's a literal pile of golden sperm and people are coming to collect.

Did you think Dick Wolf put that story line in his show for free? The average statute of limitations for rape is around 5 years (though most states have loopholes). It's pretty hard to convince a jury that a rape occurred when you didn't bother to press charges five, seven or ten years ago.

What does that tell us? Most of those rape kits, however many there actually are, and however many can be traced to an actual person, apply to cases that could never conceivably be won.

Welcome to the business of feminism.

Was it about rape or money (for hospitals and the organizations that can go out and lobby for the federal government to pay for those untested kits)?

For politicians, is it about rape or having the ability to peel another fifty or so million from the budget and give it to the people you want to give it to so that they can perform tests on kits that are, for the most part, attached to nothing?

Yeah – I think rape kit is a good term for this.

Right about now, if you are a feminist, you hate every word I've written and the implications behind them. If you're not, hopefully you hate the picture that the VAWA paints and this whole rotten gambit on the part of feminists in league with the crooked souls behind these charades.

Good. Let's join hands in our hatred of this incredibly clever and terrible system.

I imagine a rape victim's perspective, if they happen to be female. is that to push forward with a rape charge is a soul crushing, traumatic experience. That's reasonable, and many, not out of cowardice, but out of a desire to simply live, will just want to move on. Leave the evidence on the shelf, let the guilty party know that it's there, the police are aware of him and he'd do best to get out of town. If she's a college student, given the relaxed requirements for evidence in academic institutions, the rape kit isn't even necessary. From that perspective, the VAWA achieves something. It gives a woman power in a situation that robs and violates a person's power. I get it.

Now think of a man's perspective. Given the current flavor of rape hysteria in the United States, if a man and a woman become intoxicated and have intercourse, he's a rapist and she's a victim. She couldn't consent. Feminists conveniently forget that he couldn't consent either. Haven't we all rolled over in bed after a night of heavy drinking, seen the creature that lay beside us and felt victimized?

Feminists also like to paint a picture where if a man's DNA is found in a rape kit (not necessarily from sperm – it could be from a strand of hair), he's a rapist. That might be true if he had been charged and convicted, but now, by not pressing charges and just putting that kit on a shelf, the massive machine that is law enforcement and national security can take that man's DNA and start playing with it. They can toss it in databases and run it against any DNA found at any crime scene anywhere.

Guess what – the same goes for the girl. That's right, she left her DNA and blood and tissue and hair samples in those kits too.

Does this matter? Yes.

By using this twisting, weaving, clever little road, feminists and the powers that be managed to create a system where women are given a set of options where they are most likely not going to press charges in the cases that matter.

You read that right. There's no pressure to actually go after the real rapists, but there is an incentive to have the evidence collected when there wasn't a rape. For example, on those days when you roll over in the morning and don't like what you see.

This gambit, and that's all that it is, gives authorities the ability to gather and maintain incredibly personal data that will be processed and held indefinitely. It isn't even evidence. Oh, and there's the $320,000,000 for the insurance industry – they had to get their piece. Do you see?

If there is ever a time when it is a good thing for police to pressure a victim, rape is it. Of those supposed 400,000 rape kits, at least a few should have been processed, charges should have been brought and a person should have gone to prison. This would have made the world safer for all of us. How many of those people will actually be convicted now? How many would have been convicted if the police weren't cut out of the mix?

But in those supposedly 400,000 untested rape kits, there is a wealth of personal information associated with people who have never been charged or convicted of a crime. Frankly, the vast majority never did anything. They remained untested because someone casually decided not to press charges or because there wasn't a person to associate with the test or, simply, because there wasn't a case. Yet all of that personal information, the imprint of your being, was collected and stored. Ladies and gentlemen, nothing in this world is free.

To put it simply – The Violence Against Women Act helped truly violent people go free, helped some businesses prepare for a large payday, helped feminists further their rape hysteria and you, ladies and gentlemen – you got raped. You got to go through the exact same data collection procedure that a convicted criminal goes through without ever having a charge brought.

Oh, that's right, you also get to pay for it in the form of taxes and debt.

Double rape.

The right to Be There

Hopeland Cash · 22 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I respect the National Parents Organization. I have been reading their publications for years, reaching far back into their years known as Fathers and Families. They do good work and Robert Franklin covers a wide range of vitally important topics in regards to father's rights, a core part of the Men's Rights Movement.

Now, however, I must cry foul.

In an article published on March 17th titled New Jersey Father Barred by Law from Delivery Room, Franklin discusses a judge's ruling in New Jersey:

> A New Jersey Superior Court judge ruled last week that an unmarried father, Steven Plotnik, has no right to be in the delivery room for the birth of his child and no right to be notified of when the mother, Rebecca DeLuccia, goes into labor.

Franklin goes on to agree with the decision, although he says "reluctantly":

> Within its limited context, Judge Mohammed's decision makes sense
>
> …
>
> Do I want courts to start ordering mothers in labor to allow fathers into their delivery rooms whether they want them there or not? No. And if the rest of the law on fathers and children were set aright, Judge Mohammed's ruling would be no big deal.

And it is there I must disagree. The decision does not make sense, it is a big deal and I absolutely do want courts ordering for those men to have access to the birth of their children.

Parental rights are a Constitutional Right and no parent can (constitutionally, not that most judges pay attention to that) be denied the right to act as a parent without a finding of unfitness. Parental rights are a legal default, a presumption that cannot be waived without evidence that doing so is in some party's best interest, supposedly the child's.

And that does in fact, despite evidence, media depiction and court precedent to the contrary, apply to men as fathers. Any man who is a father has a right by default to be a father, to interact with and care for his child free of interference from the state or any individual.

And, I say, to be there at the child's birth. Mother's privacy be damned. That child is as much his as hers and the mother's wish for some pittering "privacy" is no grounds for barring a father from being present at the birth of his child, a monumentally important event in his life and the life of his newly born child. There is likely no more powerful or fleeting moment of father-child bonding.

And that should be denied on one woman's whim? No, if paternal rights are constitutionally protected, that includes the right, unobstructed, to be present at a child's birth. Franklin says:

> The spectacle of a father, who may be crazy or violent or who is estranged from the mother being able to get a court order allowing him to be present at the birth of his child regardless of all else seems a bit much.

It is not a bit much, it is hyperbolic fear mongering the likes of which I expect from feminists. Crazy or violent? A vanishingly small percentage of the population. Estranged? Well, tough nuggets. He's still the father, the child is still half his and the mother has no right to block his access at birth or anywhere else. If there are going to be court orders, it will be ones showing the father to be unfit, because without such a finding no one has any right to keep him away. His parental rights are the default, and the court has to overturn them, not the mother's wish for the father to be barred from attending the birth.

If not, why stop at birthing? The mother claims the father is "unsafe" in some emotionally based way impossible to prove, that his presence is just too stressful, and poof!, no more bedtimes, birthdays, soccer games or sleep overs. In the New Jersey case, there doesn't even seem to have been any claim of abuse or violence, and not even the formality of a restraining order. The court simply found:

> …that it would be an undue burden on the mother to require her to notify the father when she is in labor or require his presence during labor. It would invade her sphere of privacy and provide unwarranted strain on the mother.

And, most tellingly:

> A father's interest in the child pre-birth is not equal to the mother's interest.

That about sums it up. You wanna be there, daddy? Too bad, piss off, and thank you very much. Does a father's interest ever surpass or even match a mother's? Most judges seem to think not, and this case exemplifies that. A mother's desire to privacy trumps a father's right to be present at the birth of his child.

Maybe that'll be a new cry in divorce cases. She wants privacy at home, so dad just has to go! After all, who wants a nasty, hairy, overly Y chromosomed man sleeping next to you when he can pay the bills just as well from a motel somewhere. Make no mistake, this ruling will do nothing to reduce Mr. Plotnik's child support requirements. As always seems to be the case, for men it is all responsibilities and no rights.

And as usual, social science is on our side. It is an established fact that having an involved father greatly benefits a child's well-being throughout their life. It has also been shown that fathers, much like mothers, emotionally and physiologically bond with their child at birth, thereby encouraging a meaningful ongoing relationship between father and child.

Barring a father from attending his child's birth isn't just a breach of his constitutional rights, it is abuse of the child. Whatever your stance on fetal-personhood, once the baby is out and breathing it is an individual human being and keeping it from its father is abuse.

This case is just another example of a father's rights taking a backseat to the subjective happiness of a mother. If mothers want fathers out of "their delivery rooms", they'll have to prove it is medically unsound for them to be there. Anything else is criminal obstruction of a father's constitutional rights and is little different from full-blown maternal kidnapping.

Birth Control Deception is Sexual Assault

Brent Baldwin · 22 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Canada's top court has upheld the sexual assault conviction of Craig Hutchinson, a Nova Scotia man who pierced condoms in an attempt to impregnate his girlfriend. Hutchinson faces up to 18 months in prison, and will have to register as a sex offender.

Court documents show that Hutchinson, 43, had begun piercing condoms in 2006 after his girlfriend had expressed doubts about their relationship. She later became pregnant and he confessed his deceit through text messages.

The seven judges agreed that the appeal should be dismissed, although they arrived at this conclusion differently. Four of the judges said that although the complainant voluntarily agreed to have sex with Hutchison, that consent was "violated" by fraud because the woman had been "deceived" about the condition of the condoms. The remaining three said that the consent never existed, because the complainant only agreed to have sex with an intact condom. What they all agree on is that there was no consent. And that means it's sexual assault.

From the judgment:

"In other words, without voluntary agreement as to the "how" — the manner in which the sexual activity in question occurred — there is no consent within the meaning of s. 273.1(1)."

The question you have to ask yourself is "Why, oh why, would he DO that?" Well, he thought it would save his failing relationship. How on earth he thought a deception that deep would repair a broken relationship is beyond me, but that's what he thought. To surreptitiously attempt to take away someone's choice not to become a parent is unforgivable, and to think that this might repair a relationship is completely irrational. Heartbroken people sometimes get irrational, but that does not forgive it.

Something like this may well be a rarity, but at least we know that when such a deception is discovered, the law of the land will protect the injured party. There is, of course, one thing that concerns me. As my father used to tell me as he taught me to play golf, "for a rule to be fair, it has to be applied equally". Will this decision be applied equally?

I know, we've heard it for decades, "Why would a woman do that?" Well, it might be rare, but it still counts, right?

For example, one might think it could repair a failing relationship, or turn a dead-end relationship into a marriage proposal. It's pretty foolish, and deceptive, but it made sense to Mr. Hutchinson, right? And let's face it, girls have a lot more options when it comes to birth control. Women, quite frankly, have more opportunity to be deceptive about pregnancy… it is, of course, the rare person who would do such a thing, but rarity doesn't make it okay, does it?

It still counts.

Maybe it's for money? I can hear the Women's Studies graduates laughing already, I know, how much money do single moms typically get… I know, I've heard it before. But you know what – not everyone had their degree financed by mom and dad; some people actually have lower standards than you. Not common, I know, but rarity doesn't matter, remember.

It still counts.

Or maybe she's married or in a stable relationship, she wants kids and he doesn't? Chances are, he's not going to have her charged, but she knows what territory she's entering. Or how about the even more common 3rd child? Journalist Leah hardy writes a fair bit on this phenomenon:

"As I say, this is pretty taboo stuff. But one woman who is happy to voice her belief that men really shouldn't have too much say in the matter is mother-of-four Jerry Hall. In her role as agony aunt, she unrepentantly told a woman who longed for a third child in the face of her husband's opposition: 'Honey, remember, the more you make love, the more chance there is of a happy accident… Chances are he will get used to it. If not, having a baby later in life is an especially good idea: you will get alimony pretty much until your pension kicks in."

It still amounts to the same thing, a violation as to how the sexual encounter is to take place. It is removing someone's choice to become a parent through deception. It's fraud, and it removes consent. You can say it doesn't happen all that often all you want, it doesn't matter how often it happens.

It still counts.

"While the Crown did not establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the complainant's pregnancy was the result of the damaged condoms, Mr. Hutchinson exposed her to an increased risk of becoming pregnant by using a faulty condom." Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin and Justice Thomas Cromwell wrote in the majority decision. "This suited sufficient deprivation for fraud."

It strikes me as pretty straightforward. But only time will tell if this ruling will be applied equally.

Amanda Marcotte's rapey date with RAINN

August Løvenskiolds · 23 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Not long ago, the toothsome writer and feminist stalwart Amanda Marcotte got to feeling, well, frisky is the word, I think. Maybe it was more like peckish. Or twitchy.

Maybe it was the sugar-frosting on her Oaties, or the crunch of her carrots that had her all bothered.

Whatever it was, Amanda had an itch that needed some scratching, so she checked her box at PlentyOfFeministsWithoutBikes and discovered that both her and a certain hotty named RAINN – the "Rape Abuse & Incest National Network", a website you can find by typing in "Rape.com" – shared a lot of interests in common, namely, addressing the issues related to the crime of rape and more importantly, fighting sexual violence in general.

Amanda was intrigued and then, excited. Could a hook-up be arraigned between a rape culture journalist and "one of the most active and important organizations in the country fighting sexual violence", as Amanda coyly put it?

Amanda was transfixed by the question and was determined to get an answer. She ran home and got all tarted up – she added extra hair extensions to her already formidable armpits and crotch, put on her nicest thong and her flaming red bra. She completed her seduction outfit with some faux pleather boots, a clutch of pearls and a tie-dyed Che Guevara body shirt to match the left arm tattoo that reads "Hatred as an element of struggle; unbending hatred for the enemy, which pushes a human being beyond his natural limitations, making him into an effective, violent, selective, and cold-blooded killing machine. "

She was ready.

Now, for the phone call.

"Hello, RAINNY? Yes, this is Amanda Marcotte, the journalist with Slate?" (Amanda always seeks to build a feminist consensus when she talks by ending every spoken sentence with a question mark.)

"Anyway, I saw your profile on, like, POFWB, right? And I'm like, we should meet-up and talk, right? Because the White House is doing a paper or something on rape, and we have that in common, right?

"SO, if, you are interested in getting together – you ARE? I'm so pleased, right? How about we go, like, grab a hot dog at Chippendale's in Roslyn Heights, m'Kay? Ten O'clock, see you there!?"

The music was pounding to the beat of NSFW Blurred Lines and the cocks were flapping as Marcotte plowed through the screaming crowd of women to the remote table where RAINNY sat quietly. Amanda was a bit disappointed that RAINNY was wearing a drab business suit – how bourgeois – but she decided that, really, it was what was under that suit that mattered the most.

After a few drinks and a bit of small talk about Hillary and Femen and those awful Men's Rights Advocates, Amanda started to close the sale.

"Waiter, another round for the table? RAINNY, I'd like to take you home and teach you about rape culture?"

"Wut?" said RAINNY.

"Oh, you know, RAPE CULTURE – the very useful way to describe the idea that rapists are given a social license to operate by people who make excuses for sexual predators and blame the victims for their own rapes, you know?"

RAINNY was nonplussed. "Well, I think that in the last few years, there has been an unfortunate trend towards blaming 'rape culture' for the extensive problem of sexual violence on campuses. While it is helpful to point out the systemic barriers to addressing the problem, it is important to not lose sight of a simple fact: Rape is caused not by cultural factors but by the conscious decisions, of a small percentage of the community, to commit a violent crime."

Amanda's own heart was in her throat. This seduction was not going well. Perhaps she could nag RAINNY into going home with her to "discuss" rape culture.

"RAINNY, you're making me scratch my head, here, and I feel like you've been leading me on? The concept of rape culture has been really useful to me in getting stuff from men, and what are you doing here but trying to undermine me? Come home with me and we can talk about it?"

RAINNY was clear in response. "Amanda, it was nice getting to know you, but when it comes to believing in your 'rape culture', you need to accept that NO means NO, as in, NO, I reject your rape culture as a dumb myth. There has never been one bit of proof that such a thing exists anywhere, and honestly, your continuing to harp on it is getting to be, well, a little creepy, and NO, I won't be going home with you, either.

Amanda unbuttoned the top 3 buttons on her shirt dress and smiled with a twinkle, "Do you like my bra? I call it my 'burning bra' because it is so red – get it? If you come home with me and we talk about how rape culture is bad, I'll let you play with it."

RAINNY stood up. "Amanda, this is weirding me out. Thank you for the drinks but I have to work in the morning and you are getting a little silly, honey – can I get you a cab?"

Amanda stood up, her face redder than her politics, her question marks faded as her shirt, and started screaming. "YOU are the sloppy one! YOU are embarrassing and misguided! I'm going to denounce you! I hate you! Taking precautions for people you care about makes YOU a VICTIM-BLAMER! RAPE APOLOGIST! MISOGYNIST! EM-ARR-AY!

RAINNY made a smooth but quick exit from the club, and Marcotte flopped down in her chair. "Now, who is going to love me?" she muttered. "I think I'll get drunk and get laid? Maybe that will show that dog some rape culture, right?"

Editor's note: feature image by James G. Milles

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Men, Math, and Masculinity – Part 2

Thomas Impelluso · 23 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A few weeks ago, I submitted an essay about "Men, Math and Masculinity," now renamed as Part 1 for this is a Part 2 I did not intend to write.

There was a backlash, on Facebook and on other web sites. The backlash began as an email trickle and I was soon overwhelmed with hate mail informing me I should not be teaching and that I hated women. I had to stop reading the emails.

So now I would like to respond, point-wise.

First: I never said women cannot do math.

Second: I stated that after forty years of interventions, there remains a 30 point gap in math scores between high school men and women; this gap will not go away. That is a fact.

Third: I stated that this 30 point gap is due exclusively to the top one percent scores. If one ignores the top one percent, the average math scores are the same for men and women. However, what has happened is that math competence is dropping precipitously for both men and women. And that is a fact.

Fourth: I stated that there are biological differences in the brains of men and women. Women have more inter-hemispheric neurons and men have more neurons that run along the hemispheres. These are facts. It is possible that this gives rise to a male ability to focus, and the female ability to multi-task and communicate. And while this has no bearing on day to day life, it likely impacts the top one percent male and female achievers. It is possible that those top one percent in math, created math as a reflection of the male brain. (There was a lot of hate email on the broken reference links. The links were not broken; they were references. So please exploit your communication ability: use a library.)

Fifth: I stated that women are immensely capable of achievements in math needed for participation in engineering. But the constant tweaking of the math curriculum is ruining math for boys and, more so, for girls. And this, I think, is causing boys and many more girls, to drop out.

Sixth: I stated that it is likely that the top one percent in math will remain male dominated (just as nursing is likely to remain female dominated).

Seventh: Despite the aforementioned, I did say that women are eminently capable of being in that top one percent in math, but when they do, they are thinking like men.

BEGIN DIGRESSION

Many feminist theorists are deconstructing masculinity. I take no issue with this.

Some feminist theorists suggest that masculinity cannot be analyzed as a performance by men, the way femininity can be analyzed (using feminist methods); they claim it is difficult to pry maleness and masculinity apart. I take no issue with this, either.

Some suggest that lesbians can "perform" masculinity "without men." I take no issue with this.

If masculinity is a performance, and if maleness is tied too tightly to it, then it is logical to assume lesbians can consciously "perform" masculinity better than men. I take no issue with this either.

The only issue I take is that when a feminist/lesbian/drag-kings wishes to "perform masculinity," they only "perform" brutes and not mathematicians.

So what is wrong with suggesting that there is another form of masculinity, math, that can also be "performed" by women? And that if we taught women how to perform this, they would excel in math and engineering?

END DIGRESSION

So, yes, I do think that some of the world's greatest female mathematicians appropriated masculine ways of thinking: Sophie Germain (she dressed like a man) and Emily Noether (who was a substitute teacher for her father). What is so wrong about thinking like a man? And as a reminder, of those I named in my essay, who were in the top one percent, two were male and one was female.

Eighth: I suggested that while math is abstract, it is a fabric we wrap around the physical world. In fact, Issac Newton invented calculus to study physical motion. And if we want more children to study math, we should reintroduce physical activity into the classroom: let them play games, see physics and then intuit the math. Let them kick soccer balls to see the Magnus effect; let them throw footballs to see the gyroscopic effect; let them throw rocks to see the parabolic trajectories. Instead, we are removing physical activity. And now children, and especially boys, no longer have the ability to envision math, physically. In fact, if you want more girls to study math, one way is to re-introduce the physicality that boys so desperately need (and much more than girls at that age); instead we are only introducing drugs to eliminated physicality (especially in the boys).

Ninth: Despite what people now think, we are NOT introducing engineering into the K12. We are introducing design. And if we blithely think that will fix the problem, we are in for a shock when students enter college and hit the wall of analytical engineering. We are relying too much on design engineering in the K12 and that will cause problems.

To those lunatics who emailed me and told me they did not want me teaching their daughters, I can only say this: you are right. I should not teach your daughters. Your thinking has likely already done them too much damage.

I have no issue with women being better at communication and multi-tasking. That was all we heard last year during the US budget crisis: "if women ran Congress, there would have been no shut-down." I also think it is possible women might have a slight edge in general practice medicine; I now see a female MD and she is good. And I take pride when my wife tells me I am thinking like a woman. So when did it become misogynistic to suggest that thinking in math is thinking like a man?

When feminism was about economic, political and social equality, I supported it. But now it is about biological equality. And that, specifically, was my point. If you want to fix the math scores for boys and girls and draw more girls into engineering, we must set aside our obsession over a top one percent, learn how men think (for men created the language of math) and find ways to bring this thinking (abstraction, visualization, physicality, focus) back into the math curriculum for both boys and girls.

Gloria Steinem said, "We've begun to raise daughters more like sons…" Is that any different from what I wrote? I am just giving the details on how to do it and its possible positive ramifications.

If there was a slant of male pride in my essay, is that such a problem? In a world where men are vilified as murderers, rapists, spouse beaters, child molesters and for holding responsibility for society's ills, is it so wrong for someone to take pride in being a man and in what men have achieved?

Also, the closure of my essay, about peeing while standing, was meant to be self-effacing fun. I am still reeling at all that hate I received over that closure. It was meant to be an anecdotal touch of humor, a joke – to induce laughter.

Here's a joke: How many feminists does it take to change a light bulb? Answer: That's not funny!

And, finally, if we do not start to teach math (as opposed to arithmetic), differently, in a language which the boys might just understand naturally (no different from how girls communicate better, naturally: nothing wrong with either), but which could readily be supplemented with "translators-based technologies" for the girls (to encourage their participation), then we will fail as a technical society. And that's really not funny.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

A Real Study of Japanese "Herbivore Men"

Masahiro Morioka · 23 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Much has been written in the English-speaking world, inside and outside of the men's movement, but precious little has come directly from Japanese sources who are fluent in both languages and who look at it from an academic, versus ideological or cheap pop-cultural, point of view. Below are some general characteristics of Herbivore Men as described by Japanese philosopher Masahiro Morioka. Although this is a fascinating portion we have reprinted here, we strongly recommend reading his entire paper, A Phenomenological Study of "Herbivore Men". – DE

[image]
Obviously, however, men cannot be divided into only "herbivore" and "carnivore" types. For example, regarding romantic relationships, the distinction between "late bloomers" and "experienced lovers" is also important. It also seems better to distinguish between those who are herbivore deep down inside and those whose superficial behavior patterns are herbivore. Table 2 divides men into eight categories along these lines, with columns for each male romantic characteristic and methods for women to approach having a relationship with each type of man.[4]

[image]
Of course, I acknowledge that this division of young men into eight categories is a bit forced, but I think it is a more useful framework than simply dividing them into herbivore and carnivore types.

I conducted extensive interviews with four actual herbivore young men, and by doing so was able to learn what sort of things they think about in considerable detail. There were several things that stood out as distinguishing characteristics. First, when it comes to love they do not put a very high priority on a woman's appearance. Of course, like normal men they are attracted to cute and beautiful women, but they are fully aware that this is not the decisive factor in romantic passion. This applied to all four of the young men I interviewed. They also have difficulty with women who dress and present themselves in a particularly "feminine" fashion. As for why this is the case, one of them suggested that it was because when he is with a girl who demonstrates an exaggerated femininity he feels compelled to be very "manly" in response. Another wondered why it should be necessary to add a sexual relationship once he has built a good relationship with a woman. He also said it was "scary" when a woman tries to seduce him directly.

All of them said that when a woman suddenly touches them or comes on to them out of the blue they are bereft of feeling. The reason for this is that the situation develops without their being able to understand why they are being seduced. If a woman is going to come on to them, these men want her to first clearly state her affection for them in words and gradually engage in more and more intimate communication. They want to begin by becoming emotionally intimate; they want physical contact to arise naturally only after emotional communication has been carefully established. Within male culture, until now there has been the idea that a man's role is to doggedly pursue a woman even if she puts up a bit of resistance; a woman may say no at first, but this is just a pose and eventually she will accept the man who pursues her. Herbivore men are acutely opposed to this kind of "manliness."

Some of the young men I interviewed were "late bloomers" with little experience of being with a woman, but others had considerable romantic experience. It seemed that the herbivore men with a lot of experience, having lost their illusions about women, did not feel a strong need to engage in romantic relationships. Regarding marriage, too, there were those who expressed a strong desire to get married and those for whom it was not particularly important. In these areas there seems to be considerable diversity among herbivore men.

The existence of young men referred to as "herbivore" has been clearly demonstrated, but what percentage of young men in Japan fall into this category? No empirical surveys have been carried out to answer this question. Many simple questionnaires have been conducted by magazines and on the Internet, but they are of no scientific significance and little credence can thus be given to their results. To begin with, it is presumably meaningless to conduct questionnaires asking "Are you a herbivore man?" at a point in time when there is no consensus within society as a whole about to what exactly "herbivore man" refers. Among these surveys, however, perhaps the most interesting was an Internet questionnaire conducted by M1F1 Sôken in February of 2009 involving 1000 men aged twenty to thirty-four in the Greater Tokyo Area.[5] 60.5% of these young men answered that they were herbivore men.

As I noted above, these responses are from a time when the meaning of "herbivore men" had not been defined and thus cannot be given much credence. The next response, however, is worth noting: 62.8% answered "I am not assertive in romantic relationships," and 46.7% said "it is foolish to spend a lot of money to get close to (someone of) the opposite sex." In other words, a majority of young men were already not assertive in romantic relationships and slightly less than half felt that spending a lot of money on romantic relationships was foolish. To some extent this can be seen as giving support to Fukusawa's view that the number of men who are not assertive when it comes to love and sex is increasing.

So what do we see when we take an international perspective? The concept of herbivore men emerged only very recently in Japan, so we have no idea how many such young men exist in other countries. Here I would like to note that the international mass media has shown an interest in herbivore men. The People's Republic of China's Xinhua News Agency reported on herbivore men in Japan on its website as early as December 1st, 2008. Accompanying this article there was a large photograph of a slender, fashionable young man wearing black-rimmed glasses eating vegetables and bread.[6]

The earliest reporting on this phenomenon in English was an article that appeared in the Japan Times on May 10th, 2009.[7] On June 8th, 2009, CNN published an article entitled "Japan's 'herbivore men' – less interested in sex, money," and broadcast a report on television. On CNN's website there was a photograph of a young, androgynous-looking Japanese man peering into a mirror and applying lip cream.[8] Several other articles appeared in English-language newspapers, and reports also appeared in French[9] and Spanish papers.[10] If you search for "herbivore men" on the Internet you will get a large number of hits. A traditional-character Chinese translation of my Lessons in Love for Herbivore Men was published in Taiwan in 2010, and a simplified-character Chinese translation was published in the People's Republic of China's mainland in the same year. If the concept of herbivore men spreads to other countries in the future it will become possible to conduct international comparisons concerning this phenomenon.

References:

[3] Masahiro Morioka, Herbivore Boys will Bring Your Last Love（最後の恋は草食系男子が持ってくる Magazine House, in Japanese – 2009).
[4] Masahiro Morioka, Herbivore Boys will Bring Your Last Love（最後の恋は草食系男子が持ってくる Magazine House, in Japanese – 2009).
[5] http://m1f1.jp/m1f1/files/topic_090326.pdf, accessed October 21, 2011.
[6] http://news.xinhuanet.com/lady/2008-12/01/content_10438030.htm, accessed October 21, 2011.
[7] http://www.japantimes.co.jp/text/fl20090510x1.html, accessed October 21, 2011.
[8] http://edition.cnn.com/2009/WORLD/asiapcf/06/05/japan.herbivore.men/index.html, accessed October 21, 2011.
[9] http://www.lemonde.fr/cgi-bin/ACHATS/acheter.cgi?offre=ARCHIVES&type_item=ART_ARCH_30J&objet_id=1099338, accessed October 21, 2011.
[10] http://edant.clarin.com/suplementos/zona/2009/07/05/z-01952827.htm, accessed October 21, 2011.

Editor's note: Permission to reprint this article was supplied by the author.

Who was Alois Dvorzak?

AVfM Video Source · 24 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A haunting piece broadcast very recently by Channel 4 News, not a programme with a reputation for showing much concern for men, to put it mildly:

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=QQ-7GFkh5X0?list=UUKhX1c3ow6BrzdzP3ydpeZQ&w=750&h=420]

Would the authorities ever treat an elderly woman with Alzheimer's Syndrome so inhumanely? The question hardly needs to be asked, the answer's so obvious. Men are officially treated as sub-human in Britain today – even when they're not British, as in this tragic case. The same is true for men in many countries, and unless we act – and act soon – things are surely going to get even worse. And that's why you should make it to the Detroit conference (27/28 June) if you possibly can. I hope to meet you there. It's going to be a landmark event – Mike Buchanan

Arrest, Prosecution, and Sentencing Discounts For Women

AVfM Video Source · 24 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Alyssa Majere highlights some example in the favoritism women generally enjoy in the criminal justice system.

For more thoughts from this Honeybadger, subscribe to Alyss Majere.

Men's Human Rights Ireland launches with Save Our Sons (SOS) campaign

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 24 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: The following is a contribution from our friends at Men's Human Rights Ireland, who've just officially launched their organization. They are an on-the-ground group with big plans for the future. You can find their excellent site: Men's Human Rights Ireland. Please stop by and give them your support. –JB

I've been on Facebook for just about 4 years, been through wars, nonsense, seen off enemies, dealt with smear campaigns and some truly awful crap. I've helped a lot of people during that time who were being harassed on-line by trolls and wannabe-campaigners of all sorts. I have a list of contacts for all sorts of people going back 4 years. From law enforcement, anti-child abuse campaigners, anti-bullying campaigners, trolls, troll hunters, to hackers – I got them all. I helped people to stop being harassed by smear campaigners and helped to get websites, YouTube accounts, and Facebook profiles removed which were harassing innocent people.

All of this led to me being harassed as well. I've been named on anti-paedophile websites and had my home address published by trolls and paedophiles, not to mention people calling me on my home phone to threaten me. I am still here. So last year I got talking to a guy called Aoirthoir, seemed nice enough and he told me things which didn't make sense. Things like domestic abuse was roughly 50-50 which I didn't believe for one minute, and that more men were raped than women, and that there were more women paedophiles than male ones. I just didn't buy any of it. So I read and read and read government reports galore. After reading a lot I found out that everything he said was true!

The red pill is a bitter pill to swallow.

Now I am an ARM (Activist for the Rights of Men.) As I said I've done lots of things during my time on Facebook. Originally I went on there to post jokes and have a bit of fun. I ended up fighting bullying and all sorts of other things which culminated in me making a group which was directly responsible for the arrests of over 30 people. That was over 2 years ago. I am proud of all I've done. I've helped many people, and many of them do not even know that I stepped into their lives to help them. All of it has been on-line and it has cost me money, stress, sleepless nights, some terrible nightmares, trips to my solicitor and the police.

Two years later nothing really important has been happening till 5-6 weeks ago I had an idea. I've seen the "I don't need feminism" pictures which caused a few feminists to choke on their white wine, to which they responded with "I need feminism because…." pictures. All very unimportant in the scheme of things really. It just seemed to be tit for tat. I wanted to make a difference.

So my idea was to get 100 flowers and give them out for free near where I live, and ask women to pose for a picture while they held up a sign expressing support for human rights of men in Ireland. I wanted this to be a worthwhile event, so I took the idea of 4-1 the ratio between men and women taking their own lives to say it was a human rights issue. Tell women about male suicide rates and how it affects everyone – men, women, and children. Irish culture and life has become toxic for men. I spoke to over 80 women, all of whom knew at least one person who killed themselves, several in the last few months. The overwhelming majority of them were men. (The suicide rate is officially 4-1 but we estimate it could be far higher if drinking oneself to death, or mysterious car crashes were taken into account.)

The response we received was fantastic. Many people offered money, on the spot, to help us. We gave out over 80 flowers on that day, all of which had the website details (www.menshumanrightsireland.org.) It rained twice during the event but it didn't stop us; we were there to fly the flag for MHRI. Many women said that they didn't want their picture taken because they weren't wearing makeup (we'll be better planned for that next time,) but every last woman I spoke to wanted to help more.

They all realized that men have it tough in Ireland and that is why so many kill themselves.

The Irish Mammy is a fearsome creature who will fight tooth and claw for their sons. My own mother attacked a girl one time who had been bullying me. Women are aware of the pervasive nature of misandry; they know, for example, that media and advertising has been extremely biased against men for the last number of years. They now need to see the connection between suicide and that misandric atmosphere. Yesterday opened more than a few eyes. We're going to make sure that we continue to do that at our next event – and we hope that more people will join us.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Men's Human Rights: Halifax, Public Notice

Dan Perrins · 25 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Attention, interested parties, citizen and government entity alike of Nova Scotia, or anywhere else in Canada. Let me introduce myself. My name is Dan Perrins.

I believe some proper introductions are in order. I am the News Director for Canada at A Voice for Men, the largest international men's human rights news reporting and advocacy organization. I am also associated with Men's Human Rights Ontario.

I am a Canadian Men's Human Rights Activist who advocates for equal treatment under the rule of law and that the same compassion, consideration and care be shown to all by society.

I care little about what titles a person or organization may hold when they lie about men, it only matters that they have. Gender ideologues have lied about half the human race for a very long time. Unchecked, this trend is inflicting damage on all. Part of my work is to expose those lies.

Today I received a report of libelous/slanderous claims made about Men's Human Rights Activists from Halifax in Nova Scotia. Those claims were a direct result of provocative posters, which are a parody of a government endorsed series of posters stereotyping all men as potential rapists.

Men's Rights Halifax is a Canadian group which occasionally provides A Voice for Men with news and engages in activism along with MHRO. They contacted us and let us know they had recently put up parody posters, similar to posters we have on our site, which parody or otherwise object to hateful, bigoted attitudes about men and boys.

I believe we need to make some facts about our aims crystal clear.

Again.

We, at A Voice for Men and those we associate with have a zero tolerance policy for violence, or any advocacy of it.

We recognize that feminism and equal rights are not synonymous, or in reality even similar. We also see that feminism and women are not interchangeable; one is a hateful ideology, the other are just people who happen to be female. We assert feminism is ultimately a misogynistic ideology, treating adult women as children who are not responsible for their actions or their decisions, and who are incapable of personal agency. The ideology is also hateful toward men, regarding them as inherent perpetrators, rapists, and abusers.

We hold up these ideas for public examination, backed with rational thought, research and other forms of factual evidence.

We recognize that criminals commit crimes. Crimes are not committed by groups identified by race, religion, or sex. In other words, our view of criminal problems in society is the exact opposite of what is espoused by feminism.

We invoke our human rights. We recognize and uphold human rights for all. We do not hold one above the other, we treat all equally on the merit of their actions, and words.

Again, this is in opposition to the prevailing attitude among feminist ideologues.

We assert and recognize that recent court rulings, like the case involving Nicole Ducette, provide examples of systemic discrimination against men in the Canadian criminal justice system. We see it also in the work of our academicians, like Elizabeth Sheehy, a law professor who now asserts that women have a moral obligation to kill men they determine to treat them abusively. Being able to hire an individual to kill someone and not be held accountable for the crime of attempted murder sent a clear message to all Canadians that women are a privileged class who have been given legal sanction to murder if they so choose.

We also recognize the same privileged class of individuals are not being held accountable to the fullest extent of the law in cases of infanticide.

We recognize that said privileged group of individuals have bodily autonomy protected by law while males are not. (S 268.3)

And we have seen little more than myopic, bigoted reactions, and attempts to censor for raising our voices about these issues, even from law enforcement.

In every circumstance it was those who wish to censor freedom of speech as well as freedom of association who are the most aggressive and openly break laws which put lives in jeopardy.

We know what happens to a person when they openly talk about issues from a male perspective using logic, sound rationale and science to prove their points.

We have outlined what we believe to be the majority of issues and or injustices males face today.

We are aware of posters on the Halifax municipal website promoting sex-based fear and hatred. The posters insinuate all men are rapists.

They inform those who would hang the poster this:

> The posters are provocative and may be triggering/offensive for some people. We believe the message needs to be hard-hitting to reach and leave a lasting impression on our target audience – men between the ages of 18-25.

Halifax municipal government was absolutely correct about the posters being triggering and offensive.

Those offensive posters triggered a response from your local Men's Human Rights Organization, who were deeply offended.

Posters hung by your local men's human rights activists are simply a mirror held up to the blind bigotry and hatred endorsed by feminist ideologues. They are a satire/parody of incredibly heinous posters the city of Halifax has endorsed.

The sooner we can end ideological induced bigotry, the sooner we can move forward on the issues faced by the half of the human race which have been ignored and censored. And the sooner we can find and implement evidence based solutions to problems the government is now attempting to address with hysteria, disinformation and serving as a mouthpiece for gender ideologues.

That is a betrayal of the citizens you are charged with protecting.

If you have any further questions or allegations you would like to have addressed feel free to contact us on our websites.

We have a strict recording policy, I might mention; we are well versed in the ways of those who don't want their remarks to be open to public scrutiny.

Sincerely,

Dan Perrins
Canadian News Director For AVFM.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message.Click here to contribute.

A Message for Feminists and the Halifax Police Department

Paul Elam · 25 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I have a message for some feminists, and for the authorities of the Halifax Police Department. It is one to which it would be beneficial to listen.

There was a recent Tweetstorm and some mainstream media contacts to AVFM regarding a poster campaign out of Men's Rights Halifax, one of the growing number of men's rights organizations in Canada.

Here is one of the posters alleged to have been placed by that group:

[image]

There was a lot of hostile reaction to the poster. Some of the dissenters were also reaching into the area of alleging copyright infringement. Here is a sample from the some of the convulsive tweets that sprang up from it.

[image]

Noting the ridiculous claims of copyright infringement by those having fits over the poster, allow me to give a little info on their intent, and this funny little thing we call "The Law."

Regarding the "Don't be THAT Girl Posters," AVFM regards these as parody, which protects them from claims of copyright infringement. They are a reaction to the "Don't be THAT Guy" posters, which quite seriously carry the implication that all men are potential rapists, likely to commit rape if not told otherwise in public campaigns.

Here is just one example of "Don't be THAT Guy."

[image]

We find this message not only offensive, but bigoted and misleading. The posters AVFM issues, and we assume those done by other men's rights groups like the one in Halifax, are done to highlight the reprehensible nature of the "Don't be THAT Guy," campaign through the use of parody.

And it is very effective. Plenty of hypocrites are highly offended when "Don't be THAT Girl" posters put a spotlight on how bigoted their approved approach is.

For example, consider the poster included in this post. We do not believe that the appropriate way to deal with child abuse is to tell all women not to abuse children. Child abusers come in both sexes, even though the majority are women. Targeting the sex of the abusers rather than the abuse itself is about as credible as targeting theft and drug use with a "Don't be THAT Black Person" campaign, or trying to address banking corruption by advising people not to be "THAT Jew."

Or targeting sexual assault with "Don't be THAT Guy".

For the simpler minded in society, the ones who think all men need to be targeted as potential rapists, this might help with some perspective.

We are not holding our breath around here, though.

For those of you screaming, "It's not the same!" Well, yes it is. It is exactly the same, whether you choose to deal with it or not. Either way, the posters will continue, and I dare say accelerate the more you caterwaul. Turnabout is fair play in a fair world. You don't deserve the right to rig the game.

We are not quitting. None of us.

If you want the poster campaigns to stop, END the "Don't be THAT Guy" campaign of bigotry, and do it now. While you are at it, quit demonizing men. As long as you are spreading hate and lies, we are going to use parody and other methods to point it out.

And this brings us to the Halifax Police Department, from which the following tweet was taken from the interwebz:

[image]

And what, precisely, does the Halifax Police think they are going to do? Do they intend to arrest, harass or use brutality to enforce the feminist narrative?

It is not normally my style to be chippy with police departments. They have a rough, often under-appreciated job. This tweet, however crosses a line.

Be it known that if anyone legally placing posters is arrested or harassed by police selectively "enforcing law" in a way that discriminates based on ideology, A Voice for Men will fund legal action against them without hesitation. We will dedicate every resource we have to it. And we will not quit, ever.

I will not say any more than that at this time, except to say this is fair warning, and that I am tweeting this to Halifax Police Department.

Update: From the Twitter feed of another person in Halifax who purports to be outraged, we have discovered three other posters. We take the same position on these as we do those above, and reprint them here for reporting purposes. –DE

[image]

[image]

[image]

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Teach men to not rape

John Hembling (JtO) · 25 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Do you think men should be taught not to rape? Do you think that men, and by extension, boys, need to be taught not to rape?

If so, then you are, in all likelihood, a feminist. That's the polite term – the term serving to obscure the reality. To believe that half the population – based only on their sex – are biologically inclined towards the violent crime of rape is to enthusiastically embrace hatred for the entire male half of the human race.

Teach men not to rape.

It's an increasingly common feature of feminist public messaging. It appears on posters glued up around university campuses, with the endorsement of those school's administration and student societies. It's printed in neat block letters on placards and displayed on signs at public gatherings of feminists too. Sometimes, these are called slut walks. A reminder to any men present that they, lesser humans that they are, will be tolerated, only so long as they can remember to behave as if they are fully human, and not rape the women they attend classes with, rape their female colleagues, or swing from the rafters while flinging their poo at passers-by.

By contrast, "Teach nrs to not steal" isn't included in student or faculty public messaging. Nor does the CBC run ads reminding Jews to not cheat. And nobody is carrying a "teach Chinamen to drive" sign, marching through the downtown of any North American city. And no one runs "teach homos not to molest children" either.

Of course, unlike non-thieving blacks, non-cheating Jews, everyday gays, and the car-driving Chinese who we don't need to publicly "educate" in order to not steal, cheat, disrupt city traffic, or molest children, since they don't do those things – the men-folks presently still allowed to walk around freely in public, almost as if they are human beings, certainly DO need to be continuously reminded to not rape. Right? Right?!

Some feminists who also happen to be unfortunate enough to be male, even think so too. Of course they're not like those other, bad men. They're different, they're the few good ones – the male feminists. The ones who, by superior education and socialization manage to not rape their mothers, sisters, female friends and colleagues. After all, men, when properly socialized can be trained to perform a number of different tasks, and can even be used as a source of revenue by careful female management.

Teach men to not rape.

Interestingly, the term "rape culture," widely popularized to indicate that our culture's values include support for, and promotion of female victimizing, male perpetrated rape, is now quickly falling out of fashion. Partly because, apart from not being an activity supported by anyone's cultural values, rape is a major crime. In fact, it is second only to murder in our legal codes, and in prison, where convicted rapists go, a rapist is about as low in the social pecking order as it's possible to be apart from the sexual abusers of children. Barbara Kay of Canada's National Post newspaper, The American Enterprise Institute, and even largest anti-sexual violence organization in the US, RAINN – have all publicly repudiated the term as unhelpful, and fraudulent, and as the hysterical fear mongering propaganda of an out of control cult of gender, hate and proxy violence.

No doubt some new, cleverer imprecation of male identity will soon spill from the mouths of the modern cult of hate.

Here, wear this white ribbon to show us you're not one of the bad ones. You properly loathe yourself, and you'll help us hunt the non-conforming, disobeying male animals still kept around to do heavy lifting or dangerous and dirty work.

Skipping forward 50 years, when your grandchildren discover your gender studies textbooks in the basement or an old, antique USB drive with photos of you in your youth attending a slut walk, will you be ashamed that you were one of the last to abandon that disgraceful cult of hate from the past?

Will your neighbors roll their eyes or shake their head at you, the obsolete, but now harmless old bigot? Will you fly the flag proudly, reminiscing of the good old days when we could still shoot coons at night? How many modern Americans have preserved knowledge in their own families of slave ownership? How do modern Germans feel, I wonder, knowing that some of their grandparents, or great grandparents wore the uniform of the Third Reich?

Teach men to not rape.

If, today, this rhetoric is something you give voice – then shame is what you should properly feel, and extinct is where your particular ideology of hate is headed.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

AVFM Spring 2014 Fundraiser

Paul Elam · 25 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Spring is in the air (in the northern hemisphere). Flowers are starting to bloom, bird's nests are being built, the days are getting longer and the cycle of rebirth and renewal has begun again.

And it brings with it our seasonal fundraiser for AVFM.

Each fundraiser it is my task to remind you of why it is important to help fund our work, and to show you more of what you have to show for it.

The struggle for putting men's issues on the map is slow and arduous. It is about so much more than growing a website (which we have done beyond our dreams). It is about shaking an entire culture out of an ideologically and even biologically induced coma and forcing a discussion that few people want to have. Results are difficult to measure.

After all, since AVFM was born till now, and despite many other men's rights initiatives, we still have VAWA, the plague of a completely corrupt family court system, an apparatus of higher education that is quite literally insane (and in places fundamentally evil) and a morally bankrupt feminist narrative that clings to the mainstream media like toxic sludge.

That being said, in my mind we have made clear and convincing progress.

Not only have we built, maintained and strengthened the undisputed online flagship of the Men's Human Rights Movement, now measuring our annual traffic in the millions, we have also attracted the participation of virtually every significant academician, writer, advocate, journalist and thinker alive on the issues facing men and boys.

The days of leading advocates who would shy away from AVFM because of our refusal to play nice with the proponents of hate and bigotry have all but disappeared.

The key note speakers at our upcoming conference on men's issues in Detroit, who span across most every line of sex, sexuality and race, include a blogger and a senator, a YouTuber and an internationally recognized journalist, online activists and leading academicians. They are all standing with AVFM.

Do I think it is coincidental that the dialog across the board on sexual politics is beginning to change; that feminists are starting to backtrack, wail and claim they have cared about men and boys all along? No, I do not.

While we certainly cannot take direct credit for the incredible work of others, we can take credit for hacking away relentlessly at the taboo against speaking out rationally and morally on the subject of feminism. We can take credit for being the first ones to start popularizing the idea of pointing to the lies and injustice being perpetrated on this culture by feminism and saying "No more!"

So it no longer shocks me when I see an organization like RAINN, the largest anti-sexual violence organization in the US, reject the concept of "rape culture" as an ideological canard and urge the government to end the star chambers now plaguing our colleges and universities.

Nor does it surprise me to see the American Enterprise Institute calling out "rape culture" in the same way, while granting us permission to run works by the people doing it.

I am not shocked the Wall Street Journal now runs articles that could have been written by the most unrepentant of MHRAs at A Voice for Men.

I was not dumbstruck by the fact that ABC News 20/20 came looking for us, or that they backed off after making fools of themselves.

I am not even particularly surprised that an award winning filmmaker is now making a documentary on this movement, with AVFM very much in the center of it.

Sure, there have been attacks, and there will be more. That is the nature of shaking up a world running on delusion. Even Saturday Night Live has joined the effort to paint a picture of us as though the SPLC was holding the brush.

But one thing in my mind is certain. The men's movement is now officially on the map. And AVFM was a huge part of putting it there.

As I tell you with each fundraiser, it takes money to make this happen. I really wish that we could run this place on duct tape and baling wire. And sometimes we do. But the fact is that the more we grow, the more it costs.

So, again, I am here asking you to pitch in with what you can to help us carry on. At this point I am happy to say I am not asking for you to help us start a movement, but to keep the one you helped us start going — and to help drive us home.

Free Fundraising Thermometer by:
Easy Fundraising Ideas

Donate

AVFM Radio: A Bigger Home and a Brighter Future

James Huff · 26 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As many of you know, AVFM Radio has seen a big change recently. We moved away from Blogtalk Radio, removed AVFM News and Activism from our weekly line-up, and have adopted “The O’Hara News and Editorial”. Some of you are worried about the quality of the changes, and what this means for AVFM Radio in the future so we are going to set the record straight for all of our listeners.

The move away from Blogtalk was a necessity for the expansion of AVFM Radio. We could only offer up to three hours of programming per day in one time block. We have begun to outgrow what Blogtalk can offer us. The intention of the staff of AVFM Radio is to provide up to eight hours of live programming per day Monday through Friday and four hours in the morning on Saturdays (U.S. Central Time specific).

Broadcasting our shows on Live365 was decided upon for a few reasons. We can broadcast twenty-four hours a day. We can broadcast continuous playlists of old shows. The quality of the broadcast has increased from 32 kbps mono to 128 kbps stereo, and the there are no requirements for show scheduling. The AVFM Radio Team can break into any currently playing archive with a live broadcast at any time.

Unfortunately, there have been some technical issues which have only recently been ironed out. Blogtalk provided us a chat. We have replaced the chat with a new chat room. Blogtalk provided us with archive hosting. We are currently in the process of finding a home for all of the AVFM Radio archives and are nearing a solution. Blogtalk provided us with a call queue. Finding a way to replace that was difficult on a shoe-string budget, but your AVFM Radio Team found a way to create a call queue.

The element of human error exists in the new systems set up for broadcasting on Live365. There are a lot more individual parts for the AVFM Radio Director to work with during a broadcast. Recording is done with a specialized hardware and software setup. This means the archives will always be of the same quality as the live broadcast.

The call queue requires chewing gum, duct tape, and baling wire to make it work, but the Director also knows that its reliability is entirely dependent on his attention to detail when setting up the system for a live broadcast. Any deviation in the required method results in dropped calls, dead air, and backroom discussions being aired live.

Please be patient as the Radio Director learns how to stand on one leg while touching his nose and reciting the alphabet backward. Eventually we will be able to provide a very well-polished product for our listeners, and please pay no attention to that man behind the curtain.

We intend on expanding AVFM Radio operations in ways that will bring Men’s Rights to the electronic devices of thousands of new listeners. We will be providing more and specialized programming, greater quality, and even breaking news to all who tune in to listen. We can also continue to provide a voice to our listeners as they call in and engage the hosts on our live shows.

The main site will also be sporting some changes eventually. There will be a Live365 player on a specific Radio page as well as a monthly calendar telling all our listeners the times and dates of their favorite shows. With any luck, we will also be providing direct links to all the archives of every show we have ever had, all filtered for greater quality and converted or recorded in 128kbps.

Host a show – We Need Your Help!

This brings us to the best part. The AVFM Radio Team is proud to announce the start of an open application process for hosts and show ideas. Shows must be one hour long and broadcast between the hours of 8AM and 8PM Central Time Monday through Fridays.

We will be flexible in the scheduling, and can offer as little as one one-hour show in a week if so desired. Please send all submissions to Radio@avoiceformen.com. The Director will be contacting those with the best submissions for phone and video interviews. We hope to flesh out our programming and provide a variety of red-pill perspectives to the public.

Welcome to the new era in Men's Rights media, folks. We have had a great run over the last three years, but now it is time to kick it up a notch. Let us raise our voices and take our message beyond the written word so the entire world can hear us. Let us provide information, support, and hope to the men and boys who need it. Let us smash the pendulum of gynocentrism together!

♦

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message.Click here to contribute.

Breaking the pendulum: Tradcons vs. Feminists

Dean Esmay · 26 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish and Portuguese.

The pendulum that is, and the pendulum that isn't

> The Modern Girl with the lipstick and the cocktail is as much a rebel against the Woman's Rights Woman of the '80's, with her stiff stick-up collars and strict teetotalism, as the latter was a rebel against the Early Victorian lady of the languid waltz tunes and the album full of quotations from Byron; or as the last, again, was a rebel against a Puritan mother to whom the waltz was a wild orgy and Byron the Bolshevist of his age. Trace even the Puritan mother back through history and she represents a rebellion against the Cavalier laxity of the English Church, which was at first a rebel against the Catholic civilisation, which had been a rebel against the Pagan civilisation. Nobody but a lunatic could pretend that these things were a progress; for they obviously go first one way and then the other. But whichever is right, one thing is certainly wrong; and that is the modern habit of looking at them only from the modern end.
>
> –GK Chesterton, "St. Thomas Aquinas – The Dumb Ox," 1933.

In light of the "invention" of Feminism 2.0 by Tammy Bruce, which is clearly a callback to what we at AVfM sometimes call the "tradcon" (Traditionalist Conservative) mentality, I think it may be time to explain why many of us in the MHRM view "traditionalism" as being about as troubling as feminism. It should also help explain why we do not believe the Men's Human Rights Movement to be a "pendulum swing." Throughout the decades it's been popular to say that "feminism has gone a bit too far, now the pendulum is swinging back," and some are tempted to see the Men's Human Rights Movement as a part of the "swing back" against the "extremes" of the "women's movement." It isn't, but explaining why it isn't will take some exploration. In this essay I will attempt to address both misconceptions at the same time.

There is a "tradition" that has come up in the modern, English-speaking world which looks something like this: a man will marry a woman, he will do all of the providing, she will do all of the nurturing (of him as well as the children), and they will function as a "nuclear family": Dad+Mom+the kids as a singular unit arrayed against the world.

This "tradition" is a relatively modern innovation that came mostly out of the Post-World War II era, and is mostly a product of government planning to help soldiers returning from the war find their way "back" to what government planners defined as a "normal life" – never mind that this had not really been "normal" for most people for most of history. Governments in the developed world spent huge money creating planned communities for returning soldiers so each man could have his own "castle" of a home into which he would put his wife and 2.5 children. Postwar government planning was essential to making all of this happen.

In the abstract, especially from the viewpoint of someone in 1945, this probably sounded like a pretty good plan. Like many such visionary plans, however, it didn't quite work out that way. We know what happened: Men often felt isolated and under enormous pressure to provide, and they and their family were ruined if there was any major problem with their career. Meanwhile, discontented housewives found themselves bored and constricted, resulting in, among other things, the likes of Betty Friedan. But it wasn't just feminists; the children of that era rebelled against all that artificial conformity, giving us the Beat generation, the hippies, a ton of really good music, and utter social chaos by the late 1960s.

Fast forward to today, and we have many "conservative traditionalists" who, in looking backwards through history, seem to pretty much restrict their vision of the "traditional family" to that conformist 1950s vision of how things are "supposed to be."

These “traditionalists” will also occasionally look further back in history to see the families that worked this “nuclear family” way, but fail to notice they’re primarily looking at upper class aristocrats and upper middle class lawyers, doctors, accountants, and other stable high-earning professions, and to assume those families were the norm, instead of what they really were: only a tiny minority. Men who were able to proudly say “my wife doesn’t have to work” were always a minority–and even they usually budgeted for a nanny or even a wetnurse to help mother with her burdens.

But modern eyes often spin that into a vision of how throughout all of history, “the family” has meant Dad+Mom+their children arrayed as a lone unit united against the world, without any other support system than that.

In other words, people we call “tradcons” are frequently hewing to a “tradition” that is mostly a recent invention. Throughout virtually all of history, up to and including much of the world still today, “the family” or even “the nuclear family” meant something very different: what it usually was was father+mother+the kids as part of an extended family, with grandmothers and grandfathers and aunts and uncles and/or cousins frequently living under one roof, or in very close proximity to each other, in a mutually supportive environment. “The family” was all these people, usually dedicated to helping each other, often forming alliances with other families to their mutual benefit. Even in societies where it was the norm for the youngsters to move away, they usually moved in mutually supportive groups together only a day or two away from the rest of the extended family, whom they would often get back together with in times of trouble. Even in societies when young men struck out on their own, they usually did so in mutually supportive groups, not alone against the world.

The ancient idea of “the family” was not “we get together and have dinner at holidays and provide each other some emotional support.” It was much more a matter of, “we work together during the day, we make our meals together, we live in one house or adjacent houses, we fight off enemies together, when one of us is sick we all get together to help. Two of our young’uns are getting hitched? We may need to build them a house because we can’t fit them in here right now so let’s give ’em a new place over on that hill up yonder.”

Survey other cultures and you will find that this view of “family” is still the norm in much of the non-English-speaking world. Adult children living with, or near, extended family members is not considered in the least bit unusual. This was also true in most of the English-speaking world, for most people outside the upper classes, for centuries. Indeed, in many eras, for a man to be still living with his parents at age 30 would not be considered “failure to launch,” it would be considered a normal, everyday thing. If he had a wife she’d likely move in there with him, or he might move in with her and her parents. Or, with support from family or friends, the young couple might strike out “on their own,” but it would be in an environment where they were establishing communities with other like-minded souls to help each other, and often with help of other family members too.

We often consider such arrangements to be strange and sick somehow today, when through most of history and most of the world it was just normal.

Arguably, much of the change began around the time of the Industrial Revolution, as Paul Elam wrote in The Dynamics of Male Fear. This was the historic era of the 19th Century where men first ripped away for most of the day from family and children. Prior to that, in virtually all cultures, “father” was as much of a part of children’s life as “mother,” most of the time anyway, and as a child “your family” usually meant more than those two adults. The extended family was the real “nuclear family.” Or even if you were settlers in a new area, family and close friends were there to provide support.

The view of the “nuclear family” began to change when we began sending men into coal mines and oil rigs and factories for 12 hour days. It only accelerated in the post-World-War II milieu as governments, trying to make sure returning soldiers had something to do, cemented this with the notion that “a man’s home is his castle” and every man should have his own castle, plus the required wife and kids within it, separate and arrayed against the world (QED), possibly hundreds or even thousands of miles from the rest of their families or anything they understood to be the community they grew up with.

Man as sole breadwinner, woman as sole childrearer: it's an innovative and arguably bizarre arrangement that has not described reality for most of human history.

And by the way, if you're a religious traditionalist, you won't find this "one man shall be 100% responsible for providing for one woman who will be 100% responsible for nurturing the children" arrangement described as the norm anywhere in the Bible either. Except for maybe Adam and Eve, look through all the stories of family throughout the entire Bible, New Testament or Old, and what you almost invariably see is what I've just described: extended families. Even the rich, wealthy patriarch invariably had not just his wife but his sons and daughters, and often their wives and husbands, living with him.

And the notion that women don't own property, or work on anything other than childrearing? Here's a great passage from the Book of Proverbs, Chapter 31:

> 10 Who can find a virtuous wife?
> For her worth is far above rubies.
> [11] The heart of her husband safely trusts her;
> So he will have no lack of gain.
> [12] She does him good and not evil
> All the days of her life.
> [13] She seeks wool and flax,
> And willingly works with her hands.
> [14] She is like the merchant ships,
> She brings her food from afar.
> [15] She also rises while it is yet night,
> And provides food for her household,
> And a portion for her maidservants.
> [16] She considers a field and buys it;
> From her profits she plants a vineyard.
> [17] She girds herself with strength,
> And strengthens her arms.
> [18] She perceives that her merchandise is good,
> And her lamp does not go out by night.
> [19] She stretches out her hands to the distaff,
> And her hand holds the spindle.
> …
> [24] She makes linen garments and sells them,
> And supplies sashes for the merchants.
> [25] Strength and honor are her clothing;
> She shall rejoice in time to come.
> [26] She opens her mouth with wisdom,
> And on her tongue is the law of kindness.
> [27] She watches over the ways of her household,
> And does not eat the bread of idleness.

What? Obligations for women, and admiration for women who work and provide? What kind of craziness is that?

This is a book which a conservative estimate puts as at least 2,200 years old, possibly as much as 3,000 years old. A woman buying fields and planting them? Bringing food from afar? Making things and selling them for her family? Strengthening her arms and working willingly with her hands to help her family? You don't have to be religious at all to recognize the historical significance of this. The notion that women only make babies and keep the house clean is a fairy tale, and a pretty modern one at that. Women have always owned property, women have always had jobs outside the home. What form it took varied from culture to culture and era to era and individual to individual, but this is nothing feminists, or modern-day "liberals," invented.

Today's feminists often refer to the modern innovation of "Man as sole breadwinner," obscenely, as "oppression of women" when by any sane standard the person with the greatest burden and responsibility in any such arrangement is the one thrust into the sole-breadwinner mold. That is part of what drives so many men to drinking problems, marital discord, and suicide. But modern-day "tradcons" tend to view this as "the way things ought to be," because that's what they perceive to somehow be in the interests of women–never mind how body-and-soul crushing it might be on a man. They sell that self-sacrifice as "being a real man" rather than what it really is: dehumanizing reduction of a man to nothing but a utility to be cast aside if he fails.

And nobody ever seems to think "wait a minute, when did all this become the norm in the first place?"

It's certainly not the way most people have ever lived. It's certainly not in the Bible or almost any major religious tradition. So why do we think that's a "tradition" now, something we should "get back to?" How do you "get back to" something that was never really the norm in the first place? Moreover, why would you want to?

This is not to say no man should ever accept the role of breadwinner. But in an environment where all he's worked for may be ripped away from him on a whim, why on Earth would he?

Furthermore, we tend to think of "the women's movement" as something that popped up 50 years ago. It isn't. It first started out in middle and upper class families back in the 1800s, in a time where "middle class" simply meant "somewhere between the aristocracy and the vast pool of the poor." The Middle Class, in the 19th Century, would be broadly understood to still be only perhaps 5-10% of the population; the vast majority of people were still poor, usually living together in huts or manors in extended families.

Did modern feminism arise from "the left," the "liberals," the "progressives?" Yes, it did. Did gynocentric traditionalism arise from there? No it did not. It comes mostly from "conservatives" who are hewing to an artificial tradition that was never reality for most people to begin with, and has little historic, biblical, or even evolutionary biological basis.

Back to the "Women's Movement"

The "women's movement" (if it can properly be called that, for it has hardly ever spoken for all women) has always been a product of mostly privileged middle and upper class women who feel constricted by the norms imposed on them by society, with hardly any thought, except in maybe glancing or offhand ways, about the discontents of roles assigned to men. The 19th Century woman whinging that she couldn't be a lawyer was making a laughable complaint to the 99% of men, let alone women, who had no hope at all of ever becoming a doctor or a lawyer or a banker. Most people were parents and busy rearing children well before their 20th birthday, and doing so under conditions that we would today call abject, wretched poverty. Women, like men, had hardscrabble lives, and the complaints of privileged upper middle class white ladies would have been as laughable and annoying to them as they are to any open-minded skeptic today–possibly even more so.

The notion of feminism and anti-feminism as a "pendulum swing" of men's rights versus women's is false. There has indeed been a pendulum swing for the last century or two, but it has been an entirely gynocentric pendulum: Which discontents of privileged ladies will rule the day?

You think I'm joking? Let me repeat the quote from G.K. Chesterton that I opened this essay with, and remind you that Chesterton was writing in the 1930s, some 80 years ago:

> The Modern Girl with the lipstick and the cocktail is as much a rebel against the Woman's Rights Woman of the '80's, with her stiff stick-up collars and strict teetotalism, as the latter was a rebel against the Early Victorian lady of the languid waltz tunes and the album full of quotations from Byron; or as the last, again, was a rebel against a Puritan mother to whom the waltz was a wild orgy and Byron the Bolshevist of his age. Trace > even the Puritan mother back through history and she represents a rebellion against the Cavalier laxity of the English Church, which was at first a rebel against the Catholic civilisation, which had been a rebel against the Pagan civilisation. Nobody but a lunatic could pretend that these things were a progress; for they obviously go first one way and then the other. But whichever is right, one thing is certainly wrong; and that is the modern habit of looking at them only from the modern end.

>
> –GK Chesterton, "St. Thomas Aquinas – The Dumb Ox," 1933.

Stop and read that again, and contemplate his reference to "the Woman's Rights Woman of the '80s" and realize he meant the 1880s. With a few updates to the musical and literary references, he could have written those words today in 2014 and hardly anyone would blink.

That is a pendulum swing all right, but it's not a pendulum between "women's rights" and "men's rights." It's a pendulum swing between one way women view themselves and another way women view themselves, with men on the sidelines mostly just watching this inter-generational tennis match.

So-called "conservative" and "traditionalist" women are often against feminism, but what they seem almost invariably to be talking about is women retaining special privilege and special status and special power, for women exclusively. Feminists claim to be rebelling against this, but in their talk of "oppression" they are never looking at women's role in creating and maintaining the status quo, never acknowledging the special privileges women have always enjoyed, and never acknowledging that when they ask for "rights" they almost never want the responsibilities that go with them, laying the responsibility for whatever goes wrong on men (or "The Patriarchy," which is as real and as threatening as Overlord Xenu and the Flying Spaghetti Monster).

So yes, there is a pendulum swing, and a pretty old one. That pendulum swings back and forth, back and forth, decade after decade: which way will we put the interests of women in the center of our concerns? The "traditional" way or the "new" way?

What's not even on this pendulum is any concern for the welfare of men and boys, except in how it affects women.

That, ladies and gentlemen, is gynocentrism. It is putting concern for the happiness, welfare, safety, needs, and discontents of women at the center of our focus, the center of our concerns. And men are important to those caught in that pendulum-swing–but only in how men will serve the interests of women.

A diversion on the issue of "progressive" or "conservative"

Because the issues we talk about are so often falsely portrayed as "left" vs. "right" (another form of pendulum swing most of us are uninterested in being part of, by the way), it is probably best to talk about what "progressive" or "liberal" actually mean, and likewise what "conservative" means.

Properly understood, "liberal" or "progressive" means open-minded, willing to change, and pragmatic. Properly understood, "conservative" means resistant to change, prudent, moderate. If you doubt me, check a dictionary. While the dictionary does not necessarily reflect popular usage, it does point us to what the root ideas of a word usually mean.

Thus, understood by the dictionary definition, both progressivism and conservatism are arguably good things. But in reality, throughout much of history, so-called "progressives" frequently push willy-nilly in ways that often sound good but make things worse, and we also have so-called "conservatives" trying to conserve things that make no sense, or hewing to traditions that they think are ancient but are no older than a generation or two.

Don't believe me? Here's GK Chesterton again, this time writing 90 years ago:

> "The whole modern world has divided itself into Conservatives and Progressives. The business of Progressives is to go on making mistakes. The business of Conservatives is to prevent mistakes from being corrected. Even when the revolutionist might himself repent of his revolution, the traditionalist is already defending it as part > of his tradition. Thus we have two great types — the advanced person who rushes us into ruin, and the retrospective person who admires the ruins. He admires them especially by moonlight, not to say moonshine. Each new blunder of the progressive or prig becomes instantly a legend of immemorial antiquity for the snob. This is called the balance, or mutual check, in our Constitution."

>
> —G.K. Chesterton, "The Blunders of Our Parties," 1924 (as reprinted in The Collected Works of G.K. Chesterton, Volume 33.)

Tell me that doesn't sound spookily like today's politics in most of the English-speaking world. And while Chesterton's speaking here of the British Constitution, it applies pretty well to the US and other countries as well. Even "Constitutional" traditionalists in the United States are frequently speaking of a "tradition" of Constitutional interpretation that is nowhere near as deep or ancient as they think it is; they are for example quite fond of quoting James Madison's writings in the Federalist Papers, but they almost never quote from The Anti-Federalist Papers, which were run concurrently with the Federalist papers in opposition to Madison and the other Federalist writers, pointing out things in the new Constitution that they didn't like, and predicting things that Madison and the Federalists denied would ever happen–but soon did. Modern Constitutional traditionalists fond of quoting Madison also, usually, do not examine the fact that when he became President, Madison governed in ways that were often in direct opposition to what he'd written in the Federalist Papers, and when Madison was challenged on that, he said of those debates that led up to the Constitution's ratification that they had no proper place in Constitutional interpretation. Thus even these American "Constitutionalists" are frequently hewing to an invented tradition that never described reality in the first place. Madison was an 18th Century pundit and a politician, and nothing more.

Look at Chesterton's words again: the progressives frequently run us into ruin, and the conservatives meanwhile do whatever they can to prevent us from fixing the ruin, admiring the ruins as if they are an ancient proven tradition.

And the Traditionalist ladies, like Tammy Bruce, or her progenitor Phyllis Schlafly, want to get us "back to" a tradition of female power and sexuality that was never real, and those seeking women's "liberation" haven't got any specific ideas anymore of what they want to be liberated from except, apparently, responsibility for their own choices.

For an example of how this gynocentric pendulum keeps swinging back and forth, just watch this amazing segment from a show aired on April 15, 1973: a debate between feminist Ann Scott and "traditionalist" Phyllis Schlafly on whether or not to ratify the Equal Rights Amendment, on the late William F. Buckley Jr's Firing Line:

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YWyv5Fw0JSk

Watch both women carefully, but especially watch and listen to Schlafly: she isn't arguing that women should have less rights than men, or that women should be subordinate to men. She is very clearly and unambiguously arguing that "equal rights" would harm women, giving them no rights they didn't already have but placing responsibilities on them they did not want.

Concern for men? None. Right in that one debate you have the feminist-traditionalist pendulum, swinging back and forth. Schlafly won the day on the Equal Rights Amendment, which was not ratified in the United States in part due to her efforts–which were efforts to convince women that equal rights would be a step down for them.

It worked. Although, for the record, A Voice for Men endorses and supports reviving and ratifying the Equal Rights Amendment. And we do so because we want to break the gynocentric pendulum. We actually do want equal rights and responsibility under the law, and for men and women to be free to choose their own path in life, and to face the consequences of same. In many ways, as Tom Golden says, equality will be a step down for women, who have become accustomed to either "traditional" privilege or to the newfangled "feminist" privilege of "empowering women."

Whether it's the "liberal feminists" or the "conservative traditionalists," the result is the same: "ladies first"–in all things except that which is dirty, nasty, dangerous, or soul-crushing.

The roots of the gynocentric paradigm

Where did the gynocentric worldview come from? Some argue that it's inherently genetic and is entirely part of immutable female nature or immutable male nature. Meanwhile, most of us in the MHRM tend to think biology always plays a role in human behavior, and so does culture; we tend to think human behavior is neither "socially constructed" nor "biological." Nor is it even really 50/50; instead, it's 100% both! Biology plays into culture, culture plays into biology. And in any case, thinking, sapient beings can recognize their biological urges and make conscious choices to accept, reject, or modify them. That adaptability is what being human is about.

The debate about where exactly gynocentrism became the defining tradition of our culture is probably a long one. What I believe is that while "protect the women and children" has biological and even God-given roots, even Christian thinker C.S. Lewis wrote in the 1930s that the idea of "courtly love," in which a man essentially became the vassal of a woman whose interests he lived to serve, was something everyone understood to be something rich nobles invented. To quote him directly:

> Everyone has heard of courtly love, and everyone knows it appeared quite suddenly at the end of the eleventh century at Languedoc. The sentiment, of course, is love, but love of a highly specialized sort, whose characteristics may be enumerated as Humility, Courtesy, and the Religion of Love. The lover is always abject. Obedience to his lady's lightest wish, however whimsical, and silent acquiescence in her rebukes, however unjust, are the only virtues he dares to claim. Here is a service of love closely modelled on the service which a feudal vassal owes to his lord. The lover is the lady's 'man'. He addresses her as midons, which etymologically represents not 'my lady' but 'my lord'. The whole attitude has been rightly described as 'a feudalisation of love'. This solemn amatory ritual is felt to be part and parcel of the courtly life.
>
> —C.S. Lewis, The Allegory of Love: A Study in Medieval Tradition, 1936

How is it that almost 80 years ago a hugely popular writer could blithely observe that everybody knew this "courtly" tradition of a man putting all of his interests subordinate to a woman was a somewhat odd innovation, but today almost no one seems to know it? The courtly tradition of man-as-vassal, putting all his needs and interests subordinate to that of a woman, was not even something most people accepted 100 years ago. Yet today, we accept some genetic reductionist arguments that this is all just the destiny of biology? How is it that this Christian writer could see so clearly that this was an invention of man not God, and that this was nowhere to be found in the Bible, yet today we have religious "traditionalists" who think that's exactly how God intended things?

A full look at the historical and anthropological record is beyond the scope of this essay, but suffice it to say that if you look carefully at both the anthropological record and ancient history going all the back to the first civilizations with writings, the ancient Chinese, Greeks, Romans, Babylonians, and so on, you will not find the idea that men's interests are to be subordinate to women's as having common currency among them. Indeed, you will find that, while you had individual things that could be considered gynocentric–the ancient City of Athens was named for a Goddess, after all, and adoration of the Virgin Mary goes back to at least the 4th Century if not earlier–and you might find individual attitudes in history that might be considered gynocentric, you rarely found entire cultures founded entirely on the principle that women's needs must be at the center of everything. That, my friends, is a fairly modern innovation, at best a thousand or two years old, and not one we are required to embrace. Nor is it something God or Darwin tells us we're required to embrace.

For a fuller look at the history of where gynocentrism became an overriding cultural force, rather than one of many balancing forces in human life, I still recommend exploring Peter Wright's excellent Gynocentrism web site. I also recommend Peter's essay "'Traditionalism' – WTF is it?".

Conclusion

The Men's Human Rights Movement is most definitely not a part of a "swing back" to "earlier times" that were better. It is a rejection of the old paradigms altogether. We aren't interested in swinging the pendulum one way or the other; we want to smash it and throw it away completely. It isn't a choice between women's rights and men's rights. It isn't a choice between feminism or traditionalism, the way things are versus the way things were. And it is not left versus right.

It is the radical notion that men are human beings, and should see themselves as human beings first, and should be afforded the same rights and considerations as anyone else. It is the radical notion that men, collectively and as individuals, owe women nothing whatsoever. We do not owe women our protection. We do not owe women provision. When it comes to protecting anyone else, our first question is, "Why should we?" And when it comes to things like intimate relationships, marriage, children, we ask, boldly and without apology, "what's in it for us?"

And if the answer, dear ladies, is nothing but "my company and access to my vagina," most of us will simply say "no thank you." We need more than that, and we need proof you'll keep your promises. And that proof looks pretty thin on the ground in the popular and legal culture right now.

Does this make you uncomfortable? Too bad. Because men have every right to ask those questions, and be given answers that, as to them, shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness.

And to quote Tammy Bruce, who claims women's ancient power is the power of "no?" We say this:

Civilization was built in part by men saying "no" to women. No to their sexual advances, no to relationships they did not find desirable, no to unreasonable demands. Many of the most productive men in history were men who refused to marry or have children. You may not like hearing that, but it's the truth. Collectively, men owe women nothing. And more of us are going to continue saying "no" to women until we are given a good reason to say otherwise.

You're going to get equality ladies, whether you like it or not. That's what the Men Going Their Own Way and the Men's Human Rights Movement are really all about.

Editor's note: article image courtesy of Europa Phoenix. –DE

Why Rape is Seriously Hilarious

AVfM Video Source · 27 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Why do people think that boys being sexually abused by an adult is totally cool and that they “scored”? Because society gives them no other choice. The following performance piece by Andrew Bailey exposes the reality in a direct and moving way.

Why comments are disabled on this video on YouTube, I don’t know. But feel free to comment here. PE

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Ikd0ZYQoDko]

Meanwhile, a woman gets 12 months in jail for repeatedly raping an 8 year old boy.

http://www.avoiceformen.com/allnews/paedophile-jailed-for-a-year-for-repeated-sex-with-eight-year-old/

Karen Straughan at New Hampshire Libertarian Forum 2014

AVfM Video Source · 27 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Karen Straughan has given another amazing speech to a group of Libertarians. Will any group other than libertarians be open-minded enough to invite her to speak? We hope so.

If interested you, can subscribe to the Free Staters here.

Editor's note: article image courtesy of Europa Phoenix. –DE

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

The courts martial of Brigadier General Sinclar

Michael Conzachi · 27 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Another forced, feminist politically correct, and politically driven sexual assault criminal prosecution of a high ranking military man falters. Prosecutorial misconduct. false allegations and perjury on the part of the accuser are cited as the prime reasons for the outcome. The long drama being played out in the military courtroom at Fort Bragg, North Carolina involving the trial of flag officer, Brigadier Jeffrey Sinclair has finally ended. He has been fined $20,000, faces no jail time, and his career is likely over.

General Sinclair, the former Deputy Commander of the famed and historic 82nd Airborne Division, had faced a slew of charges including adultery, various command violations, forcible oral copulation, sodomy and death threats.

http://www.militarycorruption.com/

The ordeal involving the highly decorated combat veteran began in 2012 when rumors and then news reports surfaced that Sinclair was involved in some type of sexual assault/harassment related allegations. In short order Sinclair was formally charged by JAG prosecutors for a host of charges that could have sent the flag officer to the Leavenworth Disciplinary Barracks for the rest of his natural life.

Jeffrey Sinclair reached the flag rank of Brigadier General without being part of the club, the "ring knockers," meaning he is one of a handful of Army officers to have reached flag rank without having attended West Point. Various news reports reveal that BG Sinclair did not follow the rules of political correctness, and many military chat rooms and social media pages referred to him as being similar to the famed General George Patton; a no nonsense and hard driving leader.

It seems that BG Sinclair took the route of being a warrior, of concentrating on his job and duty of eliminating our enemies, and did not follow the touchy-feely feminist rules of political correctness. His leadership and management style riled some powerful feminists and a number of neutered, politically correct boot-lickers at the Pentagon. It also got the dander up of some extremist ideological politicians, as well as our intellectually challenged Secretary of Defense.

It has been rumored that "Horn-dog" BG Sinclair had a problem with keeping his package zipped up in his ACU's, kind of like the problem that General Petreaus had. I grant you, the married Sinclair's proclivity for hotties, and his lack of control of his Johnson is problematic, but did it rise to criminal proceedings? Did the sexual escapades of General Patton, General Eisenhower, and General Sherman reach the level of criminality? http://www.hoover.org/publications/defining-ideas/article/137071

Oh wait, neither General Petreaus nor his paramour Major Paula Broadwell, both West Point graduates, were ever charged, much less sent to courts martial. In fact Major Paula is still in the Army Reserves, and the only sanction she has experienced is to have her security clearance lifted. The retired General eventually resigned as the CIA Director because of the scandal.

Sinclair's primary accuser is an unidentified 29 year old female who has been referred to only as "Captain Bo-Peep." As evidence in the courts martial is now becoming clear, the poor-poor saintly, brave, super-brave victim who came forward, had engaged in a three-year steamy sexual relationship with the stud-muffin general. During that time period, the pure and angelic captain sent the general over 1,300 sex filled text messages and emails complete with X-rated photos. Hmmm? Apparently the sweet nun-like captain learned that she wasn't the only side nookie that the general had, and voila, she screeched charges like forced sodomy and oral copulation, and claimed that Sinclair had threatened to kill her family if she revealed the affair.

The only problem with that is that Miss Captain Angel Wings continued to send steamy sex filled text messages and emails to the general, professing her love for him, after the alleged violations occurred.

During the course of the investigation and the various pre-trial hearings, Captain Bo-Peep made numerous contradictory statements, committed multiple acts of perjury and attempted to destroy a cell phone that contained sex filled text messages and explicit photos. During her testimony at the courts martial, the stumbling, fumbling captain was asked to confirm or deny that she wanted the general to divorce his wife and marry her; she flatly denied it.

The defense then provided an email from her that contradicted her just completed statement.
There is speculation that Captain Bo-Peep received immunity of some sort for her tearful perjured testimony, as she will most likely be hailed as a brave hero by feminist politicians and Pentagon leaders, rather than face punishment for her role in the illegal affair or the false allegations she levied. In fact she will probably receive a promotion to Major and be given a cushy Pentagon job.

The judge ruled that there had been serious prosecutorial misconduct and unlawful command influence in the case, when emails were kept from the defense. Many were from the chief JAG prosecutor LTC Will Helixon to Fort Bragg Commanders, advising them of his concern as to the alleged victim's credibility and honesty. When it was made clear to him that the prosecution would proceed despite proof that the accuser lied and that this was a sham of a courts martial, LTC Helixon quit in protest. He was promptly labeled incompetent, unstable and suicidal. At least one member of the prosecution team demonstrated a sense of integrity.
How many times have we seen whistle-blowers being labeled delusional, dishonest, or suicidal while reporting, and eventually proving, their claims? That mantra is getting about as old and tired as the mythical "sexual assault epidemic" in the military.
The bottom line is that it is clear that General Sinclair is a horn-dog and that he let the little brain over-ride the big brain. He did have and admit to having an adulterous affair, and for that he has paid and will pay dearly. Did the fact that Sinclair wasn't one of the glorious West Point "ring-knockers" have anything to do with the initiation of an inquiry and courts martial? Did the fact that Sinclair was an ass-kicking warrior who did not follow the politically correct rules of the Pentagon feminist pitbulls and other neutered, feminized, beady-eyed boot-lickers, have anything to do with this? Was there, or is there, an element in the military or political hierarchy that was intent on bringing down a high ranking military man for sex related offenses, at any and all costs, even when their chief accuser was determined to be a liar, and the prosecution was tainted?
After several million dollars in tax-payer funds being wasted, all we have in the end is an inappropriate adulterous consensual sexual affair. Sinclair pled guilty to having a sexual affair with a subordinate officer, possessing pornography in a combat zone (allegedly the dirty pictures sent to him by the accuser) impeding an investigation, and pressuring others to send him explicit pictures. This apparently was done as a tactical move so that the photographs were then prohibited from being introduced as evidence pending the outcome of the more serious charges. Kind of sounds like some of the antics of JFK and Bill Clinton, doesn't it? Nookie sessions, dirty pictures, the tactical placement of a Cohiba, and a soiled blue dress!
This case has gained national notoriety and Sinclair had the financial resources to obtain competent legal counsel, but if such a despicable miscarriage of justice can be brought against a general, what do think is happening to other men of lesser rank and notoriety, and considerably lesser financial resources with which to defend themselves?
As I have exposed in many of my prior articles as well as those of many others, there is no "epidemic" of sexual assault in the military. As this case demonstrates, there is an "epidemic" of hysteria and the myth of a manufactured epidemic of sexual assault in the military, and no expense will be spared, nor will any prosecutorial misconduct be curtailed, in pursuit of this myth.
I am sure that we haven't heard the last of this case, and the usual bunch of man-hating rad-fem politicians and military leaders will call for more "reform" and more legislation to combat this terrible "epidemic." Let's hope that some political and military leaders will demonstrate the same type of integrity that LTC Helixon has demonstrated, and say, "Enough, let's use a microgram of common sense here."
This dramatic event is bad for everybody. Sinclair should have used his head and kept his zipper zipped. Captain Bo-Peep should have used her head and not engaged in an affair with a superior officer and married man, sending him more than 1,300 sex filled messages and photos. The tax-payers are on the hook for the waste of millions of dollars, and another black eye of ineptitude and misconduct has been put on the JAG Corps, the Army, and Pentagon leaders.
Is this the kind of atmosphere we want to project and cultivate in our military today, where males, no matter their rank, will be vigorously pursued and prosecuted to the ends of the earth, while females are given a free pass? Will cases that amount to nothing more than a consensual affair between two consenting adults be escalated to national prominence and relentless prosecution at all costs in order to justify a non-existent epidemic?

We shall see if Captain Bo-Peep, Major Paula, and other females in the military are held accountable for their own willful participation in these acts, but I doubt it. The double standard is clear and overwhelming.
I wonder what the reaction is of Senators Gillibrand and McCaskill and their cohorts are now, since the highest profile military sexual assault case in modern times has blown up like a smart bomb? That smart bomb in this scenario is called “THE TRUTH.”

California's Senate To Declare Women Are Houseplants

John Hembling (JtO) · 27 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There is a bill presently active on the floor of the California State Senate, which if passed into state law, will legally redefine almost all consensual sex as rape. It is California Senate Bill 967.

The full title of the bill is : An act to add Section 67386 to the Education Code, relating to student safety.

It certainly relates to student safety. It makes all sexual activity completely unsafe for male students. If a male student has any sexual contact of any kind with a female colleague, no matter how much both parties to such contact participated of their own choice and volition, the simple fact that a male student has a sexual identity is enough to send him to jail as a rapist.

How does consensual sex come to be defined as rape under the new proposed State law?

Section 1.a.1 of the senate bill's text includes the following phrase:

"Consent must be present throughout sexual activity"

And this consent is explicitly not the nonverbal agreement that almost all sexual activities in the entire history of the human species have been conducted under for the span of recorded time. No sir. Consent, as defined in the language of Senate Bill 967 requires

"An affirmative consent standard in the determination of whether consent was given by a complainant. "Affirmative consent" is a freely and affirmatively communicated willingness to participate in particular sexual activity or behavior, expressed either by words or clear, unambiguous actions. It is the responsibility of the person who wants to engage in the sexual activity to ensure that he or she has the consent of the other person to engage in the sexual activity. Lack of protest or resistance does not mean consent, nor does silence mean consent. For that reason, relying solely on nonverbal communication can lead to misunderstanding." (and jail)

Anything less is rape, so says the law. Or, so it will say when Senate Bill 967 passes into statute.

This bill, once law, will jail thousands of young men as rapists – and none of them will have committed rape, except as defined by a new legal standard no sane adult would ever agree is anything except normal, non-pathological, non-coercive, and nonviolent consensual sex. But in the language of California Senate Bill 967, that will, under color of law, be rape. If you live in the state of California, then you, or perhaps your son, will be jailed by it. He will be ruined for his lifetime. Rendered a criminal, a sex offender, and a casualty of your inattention and indifference.

If you are a woman in California, particularly, if you are of college age, or a more mature returning student, the implications of this potential law are a little different for you.

We will set aside, for the present, any considerations of compassion or concern you might have for male friends, colleagues or relations.

The model of consent defined by this bill, and the ideologues who pushed for its drafting is one which starts from an assumption about you. That assumption will, with this bill's passage become reality, as defined by law.

You are an object, not a person. That is not to suggest you are not possessed of a mind, or that you lack the capacity for intention, simply that under the model of consent posited by SB-967, you are a houseplant. If you are a woman, you probably have a vagina, maybe boobs, too. It's likely you also have a mind, eyes, ears, vocal cords and even legs which can, under direction of your mind, convey you between the bathroom and the bedroom, among other places. Okay, maybe you're not a houseplant. You're a sea-sponge. Immobile, passive, voiceless, lacking volition and agency. Sure, sure, you've still got a vagina, an anus, a mouth, eyes, legs, ears, and even a mind. Hell, you might even have some sort of education. You might even have distinguished yourself from other houseplants and sea sponges by pursuing some sort of career. You're a highly accomplished house-plant, congratulations.

But under California's Senate bill 967, you're not a person, you're a thing. People, as distinct from you, have agency. They have sex. If you're a woman in California, People, as distinct from you, have sex as active participants. You, on the other hand, are no more than a passive receptacle. You are simply the warm, wet hole that a human being might or might not want to fuck. By "human being," of course, we mean a person with initiative, agency and volition.

Under California's new proposed law, the people who might or might not want to fuck you – will be required to repeatedly check in with you during the act.

Do you want me to fuck you?

Yes please.

Do you want me to unbutton your jeans?

Yes, kindly do that, since I lack any capacity to do it myself.

Shall I slide your panties off?

Would you? Thanks, I was hoping somebody might do that, glad you came along!

Is that a yes? If not, I'm going to have to leave, and file a twenty-seven-B-slash-six, damned paperwork!

Yes! Slide my panties off!

Ah excellent!

Now then, shall I press my erect penis against your labia, sliding the shaft against you for a minute or so, but not quite penetrating?

Uh-huh.

Sorry, what?

Mmm-hmmm.

Unfortunately, that's an ambiguous response. Under state law, only with a clearly enunciated yes can I continue, otherwise, this becomes a violation of the criminal code.

Oh, right, I forgot about that, yes, please, and yes to fucking me, too.

Thank you, unfortunately, under section 4.3.a.iiiv.24 of California's department of education code, I have to ask at each step, so, if you don't mind, now, would you like me to….

Sounds like a hot Saturday night, doesn't it.

But don't worry, ladies, you're more than just a sea-sponge. You're a sea-sponge with a loaded gun. You don't even have to load it, aim it, or pull the trigger yourself. Which is fortunate, for you, ladies, as sea-sponges lack fingers, eyes and any sense of direction with which to aim a firearm. Other people will load, aim and pull the trigger for you. All you need to do is nothing at all. Which, for you, is convenient, since you are either a passive filter-feeding bottom dweller, or a potted plant which happens to have a vagina.

Plants and sea-sponges are not troubled by anything as abstract as having a moral compass, either.

Aren't you lucky, ladies, not to be human beings, or in any other sense, people?

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

FBI drops Southern Poverty Law Center as linked resource?

Jonathan Taylor · 27 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Important Update: While this story was reported by multiple mainstream outlets, contacts to AVfM today have led to questions as to its veracity. A look at at least one FBI web site shows them still linking out to SPLC as a partnered source and is being refuted by SPLC-supporting sources. More updates as we get them. -DE*

Editor's note: As AVfM Contributor and former SPLC Fundraiser Nurdy Dancing reported in 2012, the Southern Poverty Law Center is an organization that purports to combat "hate" but in fact exists only to raise money for the wealthy con artists who work for it, like Arthur Goldwag. They raise those millions of dollars through ginning up fear, paranoia, and yes, hatred, frequently misleading readers and contributors in order to make those who run it richer. They do absolutely nothing to help the victims of actual hate, and indeed, they even accept money from genuine hatemongers such as Radical Feminists, while frequently portraying people with opinions they don't agree with as "hate." Their repeated use of discredited journalist hack and hatemonger David Futrelle, who is a repeatedly-documented liar, only further cements the SPLC's well-deserved reputation as an organization that cares only about raising money by peddling a message of fear and paranoia, not caring whose human rights are trampled in the process or who is hurt by their lies. SPLC also routinely censors anyone who dares question their rationale on much of anything. We are very pleased that the US Federal Bureau of Investigation has ceased to link the SPLC as an authoritative source on anything, and hope this is a trend that continues. Jonathan Taylor has more to say on the matter. -DE

It had to happen at some point. The Southern Poverty Law Center, the fallen-from-grace organization which Reason magazine has quite accurately characterized as one that "would paint a box of Wheaties as an extremist threat if it thought that would help it raise funds," has been officially dropped from its time-honored position on the FBI list of authoritative sources concerning hate groups.

While the SPLC originally did good work in the 1970s (and occasionally still does today), in the last decade it has devolved into simply an extreme-left political attack group, riding on a tide of donations from gullible and paranoid devotees and shouting "hate speech!" to anyone who happens to think differently from them about… well, about anything.

The SPLC's integrity in regards to its treatment of the rise of men's issues groups and websites over the past five years is sketchy at best. In the spring of 2012, the SPLC created a list titled "Misogyny: the Sites" which attempted to address hatred in the "manosphere."

While some sites on the list actually did harbor suspicious attitudes toward women, the SPLC went too far in most cases, listing benevolent organizations like Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE), and PUA (pick-up artist) websites that have nothing to do with the men's human rights movement.

The SPLC's initial list was published a full year and a half before A Voice for Male Students was launched, but they finally got around to addressing it. Late last year the SPLC published an article on their website which made a pitiable attempt to link this site to extreme right-wing groups. Rather than paint this site in a negative light, however, it had the opposite effect: many people rallied to defend AVFMS (including A Voice for Men), my comments on the SPLC article were overwhelmingly voted up, and traffic to this site increased substantially.

When it became clear that the SPLC didn't have a leg to stand on, they resorted to mass censorship by deleting over 100 comments by men's advocates on their article, which backfired by drawing even more negative attention their way.

[image]

Using the "find" function to discover how many comments the SPLC deleted.

I suspect that David Futrelle (aka “Manboobz”) had something to do with the SPLC’s article concerning my website. He has a history of being an “informant” to them, and was very quick to triumphantly tweet about their article, and rode in to the comments section of an AVFMS article to try to divert the shame away from the SPLC article when it blew up in their face. He also has a history of coming out worse for wear when trying to criticize this site.

Not that I’m worried about Futrelle. The SPLC is his darling, however, so in a way I kind of pity him. It’s almost like seeing someone watch helplessly as their poisonous but beloved pet snake gets put down by animal control after attacking the neighbors.

Or something like that. To use one of his favorite phrases, he’s probably “shocked! Shocked, I tell you!”

When the SPLC published its list of men’s issues “hate sites” two years ago, the list was touted by the Feminist bloggers as solid-gold proof that the issues men’s advocates were raising were just made up, and that we were all simply troglodytes who wanted to send women back to the sandwich mines.

And now here we are, two years later, and the SPLC has been officially de-recognized by the highest investigative authority on hate crimes in the United States. Funny how it all works out in the end.

While the SPLC has lost a lot of credibility due to their reliance upon embellishments and overexaggerations to tug at the heart and purse strings of gullible donors, scrutiny toward their operation intensified in 2012 after Floyd Lee Corkins took their “hate map” and used it to plan out and enact a shooting that was later labeled an act of domestic terrorism.

After Corkins pled guilty in federal court, Morris Dees, co-founder of the SPLC, found himself judged by the same arguments his organization so often employed to judge others. He was effectively hoisted by his own petard. The case provided the perfect occasion for the FBI to reassess the relevance of the SPLC. And the FBI found their relevance lacking.

I wonder what the SPLC’s donors will think now that the SPLC has been dropped by the FBI. Will they realize that their investment was mostly wasted on politics? Will they donate less in the future, or stop donating altogether? Ah, the possibilities!

It’s the beginning of the end for the SPLC, and the schadenfreude is well-warranted. The chickens are coming home to roost.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Ban the word Bossy (Cause it hurts my feelings) #banbossy

AVfM Video Source · 28 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Yet another woman has a problem with the ridiculous “Ban Bossy” campaign, and sees it as belittling women. Probably because it does.

You can subscribe to Monica Edwards here.

University Of Ottawa Students Trample Free Speech

Dan Perrins · 28 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Tonight, March 28, 2014, Dr. Janice Fiamengo was scheduled to give a lecture at the University of Ottawa Campus.

If you want to see what happened, and how those "feminists" who supposedly "support equality" by screaming, name-calling, blowing horns, banging, and pulling fire alarms, see The Fulcrum's Storify reporting of the event.

In short, instead of a lecture with a Q & A period what took place was an organized shut down of free speech. The protesters came armed with noise makers ready to trample on Section 2 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that is supposed to protect all in Canada.

And that is exactly what those protesters did. They bullied their way in and took that blessed document, which is the highest law in the land, and wiped their arses with it.

They literally over turned and trampled on the most sacred of rights in a free and democratic society.

The freedom of expression.

This is an extremely sad day for all Canadians. What has just happened in our nation's capital was the collective spitting on every soldier who fought and died to protect freedom of speech world-wide.

These groups, who would silence voices to protect their narrative, are no better than any other totalitarian regime who sought to prohibit freedom of speech in the past.

They are the enemy of freedom and human rights, not the anointed protectors. They are a virus infecting society. Here's who some of them appear to be, but we're sure there's more than them behind this thug behavior.

You can also see the effective techniques of the closed-minded, bigoted hate mongers at the university recorded right here. Not much to see, just a lot of noise to hear as people tried to talk and be reasonable and got shut down.

But we have word from Steve Brule that he got a lot of footage that will likely be online on his channel soon, so stay tuned folks. We'll probably have plenty more to see in the days and weeks to come. The war for freedom and equality against these lying bigots will continue.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Don’t bash a violent bitch

John Hembling (JtO) · 28 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Author’s note: On logging into AVFM to post this article, I was somewhat discomfited to note that the bastard named Paul, who founded this site, had just written and published an article closely mirroring my own. A mere 51 minutes before I logged in, he was hitting publish. I texted Paul, informing him of his several personal shortcomings. After some exchange of pleasantries, we agreed my piece would follow his on a 24 hour delay. So forget what he said and pay attention to me. Godammit.

Danielle d’Entremont is a student at Queens College in Toronto. She’s a feminist. She’s also a bit of an asshole too, being one of the “activists” who recently tried to silence and shut down a public presentation by Professor Janice Fiamengo. Additionally, she’s also apparently the victim of an assault. That last distinction is one she doesn’t deserve. Nobody “deserves”, as d’Entremont reported, to be punched multiple times in the face. She’s also certainly much tougher than me.

Recalling more turbulent days of my late teens, any time I was punched in the face more then once, I definitely looked worse for wear than slugger d’Entremont, even with her chipped tooth and all.

Whoever it was who beat up on d’Entremont is an even bigger asshole than she is. However, there is some speculation, particularly among feminists, that d’Entremont’s assailant was a supporter of the Men’s Human Rights Movement.

Whether any of Slugger d’Entremont’s friends or supporters actually think a Men’s Human Rights Activist attacked her, or whether their speculation is pure political posturing is a matter of major fucking doubt. On initially reading of her alleged assault, I contemplated the possibility that she had contrived to have herself slapped in the face hard enough to raise the superficial bruising evident in her face-book selfie.

Yes, apparently after being assaulted, the first thing Danielle d’Entremont did was take a selfie and upload it. Seriously.

But, obviously, my suspicions are uncharitable. Likely borne out of the nearly continuous stream of purposeful lying and misdirection from feminists addressing the topic of the Men’s Rights Movement.

She may have actually been assaulted. But who did it? The news of the alleged assault includes a statement by Constable Steven Koopman.

> Police in Kingston said they are investigating an assault on a Queen’s student and are aware of the “potential context in regards to the topic of feminism, equality and that men’s issues awareness group.”
>
> “We are aware of it, we’re not discounting, it but at this point what we do have is an attack on a female from an assailant that appears to be unknown to her,” said Const. Steve Koopman.

I wish I lived in Kingston. I’d go talk to Constable Steve myself because, both personally and as a representative of both the men’s rights movement and of AVfM, I want whoever chipped d’Entremont’s tooth and bruised her face to be arrested and jailed. I hope they have not neglected to consider that sinister character calling herself professor Fiamengo, or, as she’s known within unlicensed bare-knuckle boxing circles : Janice the menace. Paul, for his part thinks it was her and Professor Miles Groth together, working under Dr Warren Farrell’s orders

But if it turns out to be a vocal supporter of the men’s rights movement, I will tie the noose to hang the attacker myself. Okay, that’s hyperbole. I will write a lengthy and cruel character assassination of any self identified MRA who was stupid, ignorant, and misguided enough to think violent assault was a useful thing in which to engage.

If whoever conducted the alleged attack fancies themselves a supporter of the Men’s Human Rights Movement and happens to be reading this, you, son, are on my permanent shit list. And Paul’s, and Dan’s, and Dean’s and Diana’s and Karen's and Harry's, and Typhon's, and just about every other serious MRA I can think of.

Here's the reality, I expect that whoever bashed Danielle d'Entremont in the face is somebody she knows, who has been dealing with her for years. Maybe her attempt to silence Professor Fiamengo was what did it, maybe it was something else. The timing of the incident, thus far, does not indicate a connection.

An individual attempting to censor and silence somebody speaking on human rights concerns of any group, men or otherwise, is likely an individual that's an asshole with a past.

We are all interested in seeing the perpetrator of this particular assault promptly arrested. While Slugger d'Entremont is not an individual I find sympathetic at all, nobody should be subjected to violence. Not even censorious, totalitarian, anti-male gender ideologues.

Coming an hour after Paul Elam, and publishing twenty-four hours later, he's right about one thing; the public narrative being constructed, that this human's rights movement thinks with its fists, is an insultingly stupid farce.

It's not even us being insulted here, it's you.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

False claims of rape and harassment are now employed as “tools of social change”

Jonathan Taylor · 28 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is unfortunate that such an article has to be written, and that we would live in such an age where it is relevant to the politics of modern academia.

But so it is.

Yes: there is a rash of campus activists – most of them (if not all of them) Feminists – now brazenly making false claims of rape and harassment and using them for activism purposes. Most often, these false claims are made as a means to “raise awareness of the problem of rape on campus,” an interesting notion since if rape were such a big problem on campus there would be no need to make up fake rapes at all.

But sometimes these false claims of harassment/rape are employed as a means to directly leverage power against a man who advocates an idea which a particular Feminist disagrees with. On a similarly disturbing note, there is no evidence that our academic institutions have disciplined the vast majority of these false accusers, even though they have punished other students for far less.

I’ll cover some of the major cases here in brief.

Meg Lanker-Simons at the University of Wyoming

[image]

Read the full AVFMS article on this case here.

Meg Lanker-Simons was a prominent Feminist blogger with nearly 60,000 followers. She had received an award by Think Progress for blogging the GOP primaries, and her Tumblr posts were widely shared over the internet. For being one woman in an oppressive patriarchy, she had quite a powerful voice.

But apparently that wasn’t enough. In her last semester at UW she decided to give her activism an extra “punch” by writing out a rape threat against herself and submitting it to the Facebook page UW Crushes, which then reposted it on their page (this is a page that reposts anonymous “crushes” students submit to the page).

The fake threat took the campus by storm, sparking a massive campus “anti-rape culture” rally which was covered on television by CBS and led by Lanker-Simons. She dramatized the event and heroized herself as much as she could, portraying herself on social media as a frail and innocent victim of an oppressive “rape culture” who was standing up for everyone else who was similarly victimized. At the same time she spread the rumor that the rape threat might have been posted by the UW Crushes page admins themselves to get more likes and shares for the page.

After an investigation, the police discovered that the initial UW Crushes post had been submitted by an IP address registered to none other than Lanker-Simons. According to police documents, she confessed to the hoax but then retracted her confession. She was charged with interference with a police investigation.

Instead of bringing this case to a merciful close, she decided to waste everyone’s time and taxpayer money by dragging out the legal process for six months, after which she accepted a plea deal in exchange for a “minimal fine” and no jail time.

The University of Wyoming did absolutely nothing to punish her. She graduated and went on to attend law school. She remains a blogger with many followers, and there is no evidence that she has been called out or marginalized by her Feminist friends at all.

Dr. Annette Kolodny at the MLA Convention

The most nakedly dishonest attempt by Feminists to squash alternative points of view through "harassment" policies occurred in 1991 at the Modern Language Association Convention. It was then that Dr. Annette Kolodny, a former dean of humanities at the University of Arizona, proposed a new definition of discrimination: "antifeminist intellectual harassment."

This type of "harassment" essentially characterizes any criticism of Feminism, women's studies departments, or even possibly anything a woman says or does (since it's about the "effect" not the "intent") as harassment. Although the proposal was not officially acted on, it serves as a reminder of the mentality of many academic Feminists. It begins:

Anti-feminist intellectual harassment, a serious threat to academic freedom…

Let's stop right there. Academic freedom hinges upon freedom of speech. That this proposal claims to "protect" academic freedom while at the same time setting out to destroy it is very consistent with the tendency of Feminists to project upon others the very abuses they themselves intend to inflict. Take a look at how broad Kolodny's definition of "harassment" is as the proposal continues:

…occurs when (1) any policy, action, statement, and/or behavior has the intent or effect of discouraging or preventing women's freedom or lawful action, freedom of thought, and freedom of expression;

(2) or when any policy, action, statement, and/or behavior creates an environment in which the appropriate application of feminist theories or methodologies to research, scholarship, and teaching is devalued, discouraged, or altogether thwarted;

(3) or when any policy, action, statement, and/or behavior creates an environment in which research, scholarship, and teaching pertaining to women, gender, or gender inequities is devalued, discouraged, or altogether thwarted.

The proposal can be found in Dr. Kolodny's book Finding the Future: A Dean Looks at Higher Education in the Twenty-First Century, page 105.

Michaela Morales at Middle Tennessee State University

See the news report here. Video below:

When an anti-abortion preacher showed up at MTSU to "spread the word" about the evils of abortion, Michaela Morales decided that countering offensive speech with better speech was too passé. When the preacher turned to the side to talk to someone else, Morales approached him from the side, rubbed her breasts against him, and then screamed at the top of her lungs "Get the fuck off me. Get your hands off my breast now!"
She then proceeded to push him off an embankment and onto a concrete sidewalk, where he lay – apparently in pain, since he was clutching his head – for several minutes.

After lifting her arms up into the air triumphantly, the crowd cheered Morales for falsely accusing the man of sexual assault and then assaulting him. There is no evidence that the Middle Tennessee State University did anything to punish her.

It should also be noted that although the title of the video above describes Morales as a Feminist, no evidence has proven whether this is true.

Mindy Brickman at Princeton University

Mindy Brickman was a Feminist and a sex-assault victim advocate at Princeton University. She decided that the best way to convince her friends that rape was a problem on campus was to falsely tell them that a male student had raped her. Her friends started a gossip campaign against the young man she accused, and later she repeated the lie at a Take Back the Night rally on campus.

She refused to bring her accusation before campus administrators or the police. Princeton University launched its own investigation anyway, which turned up absolutely nothing.

Facing increasing scrutiny, Mindy wrote out an apology which was printed in The Daily Princetonian. You can read the apology on page 6 of the publication here.

Mindy Brickman was never punished for falsely accusing a male student of rape, putting him through hell, and likely destroying his reputation. The apology was considered enough by the administration.

Tanya Borachi at the University of Florida

An excerpt from The Gainesville Sun:

A woman who told authorities that she had been attacked in the Campus Lodge apartment complex parking lot last week now has said she made it all up, according to Gainesville police. Tanya Borachi, 22, recanted her story on Wednesday and told Gainesville Police Department detectives she fabricated the story "as a lesson to women in the area that an attack could happen to them," according to a report.

I hope we are starting to see a pattern.

In a follow-up interview on Wednesday, after GPD Detectives Martin Honeycutt and Joe Mayo pointed out several inconsistencies in her story, she reportedly admitted making up the tale. Detectives were skeptical of Borachi's report after they realized she had not been truthful with them about several aspects of the case, Tobias [a Gainesville PD spokesman] said, but detectives with the sexual crimes unit and members of the special operations unit continued to work on the case.

Tobias said that Borachi gagged and bound herself, and that her roommate was not part of the scheme. "Her roommate was duped, too," he said. Susan Jennings, a representative of the company that handles security for Campus Lodge, said she was "relieved that it was a false alarm. This is a reminder of the importance of safety."

Marian Kashani at George Washington University

From the Reading Eagle we hear this story:

"Why would anyone fake a rape? A troubled conscience might have its reasons. That's what Marian Kashani, 19, a sophomore at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., did. She not only lied about rape, she embellished her story with racist details.

Kashani, a rape counselor who works on a crisis hotline, told a reporter for her school newspaper that she knew a white woman who was raped on campus at knifepoint by two black men "with particularly bad body odor." When they were done, she said one of the men told the woman that she was "pretty good for a white girl." A fake policeman backed up her story by phone.

There are goats aplenty in this sordid episode. Kashani is one, obviously. She insists she only wanted to bring public attention to [in her words] "the problems of safety for all women." She got attention all right, but she's less likely to contribute to the safety of women than to racial animosity and renewed skepticism toward women who cry rape.

Indeed, Marian Kashani should be criticized for contributing to racial animosity. But what is so often overlooked when false claims are made is that these false accusers are also contributing to animosity against men.

Desiree Nall at Rollins College

Ms. Nall was not just a student, and not just a Feminist. She was the president of the Brevard County chapter of the National Organization for Women. She is also a false rape accuser. The Baltimore Sun tells the story:

During the 2005 campuswide sexual assault awareness week at Rollins College in Winter Park, Fla., then-23-year-old Desiree Nall told police that she was raped by two men in a college bathroom. Fear and panic swept the campus as police initiated a manhunt for the rapists.

Police noticed many inconsistencies in Ms. Nall's story, and one female police investigator stated that there was "no evidence to support the sexual battery complaint filed by Desiree Nall." According to press reports, Ms. Nall, then the president of the Brevard County Chapter of the National Organization for Women, eventually told police that she was "not a victim of a sexual battery, as earlier reported in her sworn statements."

Feminists' lack of concern over the harm caused by false rape allegations is evident in the fact that even today, Ms. Nall remains in the leadership of Brevard County NOW.

Just like Mindy Brickman at Princeton University, Desiree Nall decided to make her false accusation at a time her school had designated for sexual assault awareness. She knew that the hysteria over the issue would peak around that time, a hysteria which would reduce the chances that her accusation would be publicly scrutinized.

And she knew that her false rape claim would contribute to that hysteria, especially as the president of a Feminist organization.

"Take Back the Night" group at Oberlin College

Imagine putting yourself in this student's shoes. From The Toledo Blade:

Earlier this year at Oberlin College, a group calling itself "Take Back the Night" posted signs across campus identifying a freshman as "Rapist of the Month." The freshman, an 18-year-old studying philosophy, recalls the day the signs went up. He was getting his mail when he noticed students crowded in front of a bulletin board. They were reading a sign – a sign calling him a rapist.

"My initial reaction was complete shock, complete disbelief," says the freshman, who requested his name not be published. "My friends gathered around and said, 'Hey, what's this all about?'" He tore the sign down, along with several others on campus. The next few days were spent denying the accusation – to friends, acquaintances, and the media.

"I haven't even dated at Oberlin," he says. 'I don't drink. I don't do drugs. I couldn't have gotten myself in that kind of situation.' Adds friend Stacy Tolchin: "He's probably almost boring."

Such tactics are not surprising, says junior Ted Chapman, sitting in the courtyard outside the Student Union. He says tensions have been so high the last couple of years that he has virtually quit dating. Friend Dave Roscky nods in agreement. Nearby, sophomore Emily Lloyd says men are missing the point. "So many women get their lives totally ruined by being assaulted and not saying anything. So if one guy gets his life ruined, maybe it balances out."

Did you hear that, folks? "It balances out." Let's try a little role reversal:

How do you think it would go down if a men's group on campus decided that the best way to raise awareness of false rape accusations was to go out and rape a student? Furthermore, how do you think it would be received if a student dismissed it by saying, "so many men get falsely accused of rape, so if one woman gets raped maybe it balances out."

Methinks it would not go over well.

Michelle Gretzinger, Tania Mortensen, and Bonita Rai at the University of Hawaii

For this story see Heterophobia by Dr. Daphne Patai, chapters 3 and 4 (p.72-87).

Ramdas Lamb was a well-liked professor and undergraduate adviser for the religious studies department at the University of Hawaii. A well-traveled Hindu monk (for which he took the name Ramdas), his genial personality and instructional skill had contributed to the department nearly doubling in size in a mere two years.

One day he asked his students to read several articles about sexual harassment and rape, one of which sparked a discussion about false accusations. This greatly disturbed Tania Mortensen, a sex-assault victim advocate for a group called CORE (Creating Options for a Rape-Free Environment) who ”vehemently denied that women ever lie about rape.” Michelle Gretzinger, who the semester prior had told other students she had been raped (and who would later make numerous false rape accusations against Dr. Lamb), as well as Bonita Rai, were also offended.

All three of them accused Dr. Lamb of creating a “hostile environment” by allowing false rape accusations to be discussed at all. When their accusations gained no traction, however, Michelle Gretzinger escalated the charges and falsely claimed that Dr. Lamb assaulted her “between ten and sixteen times in her own apartment after driving home from his once-a-week class,” something her attorney characterized as “mentor rape.”

Gretzinger’s false rape accusations drug him through the courts and the mud for three and a half years, which devastated his reputation among the faculty. It ended up in federal court, where it took a jury of four women and four men just a few hours to recognize that it was in fact Gretzinger who was the villain, and Dr. Lamb who was the victim.

There were numerous problems with Gretzinger’s accusations. The dates she specified did not even accurately fall on class days. Despite claiming to being traumatically raped ten to sixteen times, she never notified her husband of these horrid serial rapes that were allegedly going on. In addition, according to reports by other students, she had continued to demonstrate enthusiasm in class for Dr. Lamb’s lectures during the time she was supposedly being “raped.” She also signed up for one of his future courses during this “rape period” as well.

Militant Feminist Student at Harvard University

Similar to Dr. Lamb, Dr. Alan Dershowitz at Harvard claims he was threatened with a sexual harassment claim after allowing a discussion on false accusations of rape in his classroom. Unlike Dr. Lamb’s case, the would-be accusers never filed an official charge, and Dr. Dershowitz was never taken to court or falsely accused of rape.

On pages 82-83 of her book Heterophobia, Dr. Daphne Patai recalls Dr. Dershowitz as saying of the event, ”Despite the fact that the vast majority of students wanted to hear all sides of the important issues surrounding the law of rape, a small minority tried to use the law of sexual harassment as a tool of censorship.”

In Conclusion

Folks, this is the kind of world we live in. These false accusations are not “errors in judgment,” but moral failings that threaten an equal and just society that values the pursuit of truth. It is long past time the world cast off its fears of “offending” people who have no love of justice, no tolerance toward alternative points of view, and no sense of how to treat a fellow human being.

It is long past time we expose these tyrants, and oppose them.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Also please note: this item is reprinted from A Voice for Male Students, which you should also be reading.

Society focuses solely on the needs of men?

Catreece Macleod · 28 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I got into about one half of a conversation with a friend of mine recently where I presented arguments and evidence, and she simply replied, “No, you’re wrong,” and that was the end of the conversation. In most cases she’s a good skeptic and generally picks apart problems very well. The problem that I ran into this time, however, was her stance that men don’t need a “men’s day” because society already cares only about the problems men face, and ignores the problems women face.

I pointed out a long list of issues that society and government happily endorse in relation to women, but also a long list of men’s issues that they consider sexist for even talking about. The response was simply “I am NOT having this conversation with you.”

“I am NOT having this conversation with you.”

Therein, she sadly lost a bit of my respect. As a skeptic, one should be skeptical of everything in their life that they’ve been told, and question it to the core. Look at things from a rational perspective and consider whether it truly matches what you see in your own, every day life, and, if not, to ask where this disconnect comes from.

My skepticism led me to realize that the claim that society cares about men’s issues is a lie. If this were the case, prostate cancer would flat-out trounce breast cancer for funding and awareness on a plain, easy-to-see scale. Instead, we see the reverse; a 3.5:1 ratio (1) of funding for breast cancer over prostate cancer, where every man should be concerned about breast cancer, and it’s deemed sexist to even suggest we should care about prostate cancer.

This is a clear and present example, one out of many, which showcases that it clearly isn’t what we’ve been told: the issues men face don’t receive biased favor by society and government, otherwise situations like this wouldn’t be the norm.

The fact is, skepticism is about using cold, raw logic to look at problems you would rather consider emotionally. You have to look at the world through the concept that everything is wrong until proven otherwise. That she refused to even consider that she might be wrong, and ended the conversation by saying “You are wrong and I’m very sorry, but I am not willing to argue about it,” an actual quote, without any further evidence, showed me sadly that she was considering the situation based purely on emotion, not logic. She wanted it to be true, but wouldn’t even question the basics when presented with a pile of evidence. She wouldn’t even attempt to refute it with more than a “no” like a child, and this kind of hurt to witness.

Don’t get me wrong, she’s very intelligent and great conversation generally speaking, but this has showcased for me just how emotional the argument is, and that it can shut down even the most logical and rational people I know, to the point they refuse to even shine the light of logic upon their own arguments.

To return to the male problems society supposedly focuses upon more than women’s problems… what are they? Despite my best efforts, I honestly can’t think of any. What male-only issues are being considered seriously by society and government as a whole?

Wages? No, that’s women primarily. If it affects men, it’s a global issue like minimum wage which affects both men and women.

How about circumcision? No, there’s really no backing for that on a larger scale, and guys are generally told it’s not that big a deal so ignore it. If you told that to a woman about female genital mutilation, you’d be blasted for it, so clearly this isn’t the case either.

Maybe… the 1150% (2) increased rate of male deaths and injury in the workplace? No… actually there were laws passed specifically for increasing the safety of women, but not for men. Hrm.

Wait, what about… uh… that boys are now a minority in college attendance? No, the narrative is that there aren't enough women in college, despite comprising 17% more of the population in relation to males (3).

I'm running out of ideas, here. Where are all these male issues that are being focused on with society and government backing these issues? Shouldn't they be out in the open and clearly obvious?

I mean, we could look at "women's issues" and it's easy:

Wage gap, lack of women in higher positions of authority in companies, lack of women in politics, breast cancer, female genital mutilation, violence against women, domestic violence against women, rape against women, the list goes on and on. I could probably fill a few paragraphs easy just listing off examples of women's issues which are taken seriously by society as a whole and given strong government backing but what we have so far is adequate enough for the purposes of this demonstration.

For someone to claim that men are the ones who have their issues looked at by society and women are not, you simply have to ignore all of this painfully obvious information to the contrary. I propose the opposite: you have to set aside your convictions and emotional beliefs, then ask yourself "What do the facts actually say?"

In the end, logic wins out. Women have their issues taken seriously by society, and an enormous focus on awareness and funding for such. Men only get considered when it harms women too, in most cases.

The skeptic in me tells me to question that which I thought to be true, to read up on the actual evidence, and view it from a logical perspective. This is why I no longer consider myself to be pro-feminist in ideology. I looked at what was claimed to be true, and found it wanting under the watchful gaze of scrutiny.

Skepticism isn't just about religion; it's about everything in life, and that includes all the "truths" you want to believe. It doesn't mean that everything you're skeptical about will be false, sometimes it really is true; but it has to provide evidence for that. Saying "No, you're wrong" is not proof, no matter how much you want it to be, and it's this truth that has led me to accept that society doesn't focus solely upon the problems of men; if anything, it's quite the opposite in practice.

References:

1:USA Funding of cancers by type; UK Funding of cancers by type; Breast Cancer incidence and death rates; Prostate Cancer incidence and death rates
2: Bureau of Labor Statistics, USA, on Fatal Occupational Injuries; most recent statistical data compiled (2011)
3: Bureau of Labor Statistics, USA, on College Enrollment

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

A whiff of bullshit at Queen's University

Paul Elam · 28 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I know people who don't know me think I am angry all the time, and I can understand why. But I'm not. I rarely indulge in a lot of anger about the work I do because it is too consuming.

But now I am angry. I am 100% completely, undeniably pissed off bordering on rage. It won't last, but for the moment it is pulsing through my veins like molten lava.

A female student of Queen's University in Kingston, Ontario, who does not want to be identified, was reportedly assaulted outside her home. She was allegedly punched in the face several times by an assailant who knew her name. That was according to another source who also does not want to be identified.

The alleged victim was also a feminist who was very active in opposing the existence of the Men's Issues Awareness Society at Queen's.

She was quoted by Vincent Ben Matak, writing for The Journal, a Queens University website, as saying, "I was punched in the face multiple times and lost half my tooth. This was after a few threatening emails regarding my support for feminist activities on campus. Take care of yourselves and try not to go out alone."

He also quoted police as saying that there was no evidence yet to indicate the assault was connected to her activism, but of course dedicated most of the rest of his piece trying to create the image for readers that she was attacked and beaten by an MHRA because she spoke up in opposition to the men's issues group.

He even titled the article, "A Queen's student involved in the opposition to a Queen's men's issues group was assaulted late last night"

Bullshit.

Normally, I don't get myself into the role of prognosticator, but I am going to call it now. There will never be any evidence that she was attacked by an MHRA. They will probably not catch her supposed "attacker," and the incident will wind up unresolved because there is no evidence to make a case against anyone, or at the very least not against any MHRA. The story will still get major traction with feminist ideologues, though, who will use it to mischaracterize MHRAs as violent so they can continue to attack the formation of new men's issues groups.

This is the same scummy, Futrellian fantasy fiction spin game cooked up by the University of Toronto Student's Union after their members and followers acted out violently against police and against people trying to attend Dr. Warren Farrell's lecture on the boy crisis in Toronto in November of 2012.

They reeled out yarn after yarn about scared girls and alleged threats coming from MHRAs against feminists for just speaking their views. They demanded action from police and from the university to protect the poor, frightened little damsels, all of whom were under direct threat from men's activists.

Yet we never saw a police report, a copy of a threatening message; never an arrest made or charges filed.

Nothing. Not a shred of proof was ever offered, which is understandable because it did not exist.

[image]And that is what we will get this time. See the picture with this post? That is the woman who was allegedly assaulted; the woman "who did not want to be identified."

And a woman who posted that pic on her own Facebook page with a statement about the "incident."

Fuck this. I want proof. If this woman was attacked by an MHRA, I want to be the first to know about it so I can publicly crucify him on this website and throw his ass as far under the bus as I possibly can.

I am betting I never will, though, because I am betting that everything about this is spin. Everything. Bullshit, all of it.

Does she look like she has been assaulted? Yes, at least there is clearly some trauma to her face. And that is what we have so far. A feminist who does not think men's advocates should be allowed on campus looks like she has been injured.

We don't know any more from her about the incident itself because she refused to comment to Matak, because she is "still processing what happened."

Maybe she is waiting for a hundred likes on her pic to get closure.

I know, that is quite insensitive. Six years of being attacked with lies about MHRAs and violence will do that to you. It leaves you caring about one thing more than anything else.

Proof.

Victim X claims to have gotten threatening emails preceding her alleged attack. I want to see them. Email has an electronic trail. I want to know where that trail leads. I want some kind of verification, not just conjecture and journalistic smoke and mirrors from some asshat with an agenda writing for a university website.

I want to hear a police official say they have reason to believe it was men's activists, and then share the identity of the person of interest with the public. I want them to make inquiries to this website to look for leads. With all the victim posturing over the years from feminists about AVFM, I have never heard from a single police official. Not once.

I want to know for sure that this woman, who posts this shit to her Facebook page but does not want to be identified, and her friend, who also does not want to be identified, are not both liars.

I want to see, with all the wolf crying that feminists have done about MHRAs, one tiny, even microscopic shred of fucking proof of anything they say.

I want to know if they are more credible than the zombie apocalypse. Rather I should say I would like to see them prove they are for a change.

And if my hunch, check that, experience, is right, and there are lies involved in this case, I want to see those responsible go to jail just as much as I want to see her attacker, if he actually exists, do the same.

In the end my speculation is just that, speculation. I am not claiming anything otherwise and I am perfectly willing to have my mind changed with facts.

But right now, if I had to bet, I would bet that the Kingston police are getting something less than the whole truth. I would bet that this is a scam job.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

In Response To Stalinist Thugs Who Shut Down University of Ottawa

AVfM Video Source · 29 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As you may have read, an effort to silence Professor Janice Fiamengo was successful at the University of Ottawa last night. The good news is we will likely have the full text of her intended address here on AVfM soon, and we will also be having some enjoyable video footage of the shenanigans put on by the closed minded, bigoted thugs who prevented the speech from happening. In the meantime, we thought you might want to watch this review of some of the most important moments of last year, if you haven't seen them already.

You can subscribe to see more good stuff at StudioBrule, by the way.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

I Don’t Thank Slaves, Rape Victims or Soldiers

Hopeland Cash · 29 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I’m not a solider. I have never been in a war zone, never killed anyone, and the full extent of my combat training is a summer archery course and two books on Japanese swordsmanship. I was raised a pacifist, and war terrifies me. Not just the images of it, the sounds or the smells, but the very concept of war as a singular event or an institution.

And in the modern age it is an institution. War has been industrialized, capitalized, glorified, legalized, rationalized and mythologized for as long as one bastard has been able to talk another man into dying for him.

There’s a saying: Wars aren’t won by dying for your country, but by making the other guy die for his. Witty, pithy, and technically true, but also the usual bullshit. When men are sent to war, they aren’t expected to come back. That’s not the criteria for victory, just a happy coincidence if they happen to still be welcome (and useful) when they return. Low casualties look good in the press, but keeping those men alive is not the millitary’s goal. They just hate to waste investment.

Soldiers go to war so that, when somebody needs to die, they are there to do it. They lay down their lives so someone else won’t have to. They face the worst horrors imaginable. They fight and die to protect what they believe in.

I refuse to thank soldiers for that.

There is a push in the Men’s Rights Movement to get people to be more thankful for all the shitwork men do, from cleaning sewers to soaking up bullets in the Middle East. People say men put their lives on the line for the service of others, so we should give them a smart salute, a pension and a hearty Thanks.

I think that’s bullshit too.

I don’t thank a slave for a hard day’s work.

I don’t thank a rape victim for her stimulating services.

And I don’t thank a soldier for getting his identity crushed, his humanity stolen and his life ruined.

I thank people when they do something kind or helpful, out of a sense of loyalty or altruism, not when they get hurt. That’s all society does to soldiers: hurt them. Society uses and abuses men in general, but soldiering is the ultimate manifestation of the practice. Soldiers are the blunt instrument we use to clobber other countries and peoples we don’t agree with. Not just America, but any nation throughout history who has employed military force. Soldiers are implements of wholesale slaughter, but I’m not going to criticize all the men of history who participated in war. I don’t blame them; I pity them.

There is nothing heroic about war and I refuse to thank a soldier for his participation, because he is the victim. He is the indentured servant ground through bootcamp until there is little humanity left in him; the serial rape victim being butchered a little more each day on the battlefield; and he is the “freed” slave returned to his home with nothing and no idea what to do. What is heroic is that these men survive and, in the lucky cases, put their lives back together.

War destroys men. It can kill them, it can cripple them, it can leave them mentally traumatized for life. But even if it doesn’t, it leaves them changed. The very process of turning a man into a soldier involves turning him away from being a man, robbing him of his humanity to turn him into a weapon. Thanking a soldier condones not only what he did, but what was done to him.

War, as an institution, is the greatest con ever pulled, the most fantastic scam ever conceived, and we’ve been being played for thousands of years. Our tax dollars go to fund propaganda campaigns, to perpetuate the system of poverty that leaves no other way out, to train/dehumanize the young men, and then to arm them so they can go off and die like good little lambs.

The debate over war and soldiers needs to be re-framed. Blaming soldiers for the atrocities of war is like blaming the gun for a mass shooting, except that here the gun is a human being. Thanking a soldier is a sadistic kind of irony, like kicking a man's teeth out and then thanking him for not bleeding on your shoe. Soldier's are victims of war. Not its perpetuators, not its heroes, but its victims.

There are no Good Wars. They all started with men being coerced into risking their lives, then other men being conned into doing the same to fight them, and so on. None of them ever should have started at all. If all the men of history hadn't been made afraid and ashamed to say no, none of them ever would have. The first wars were likely manned through fear and desperation, but once it was found to be profitable society started pushing to glorify the life of the soldier, to make men want to be soldiers.

It is time for this to stop. I don't want soldiers to be thanked, or to be condemned, but to be promised, Never again. War is the most dehumanizing, cruel, pointless, needless, inhuman form of power control ever achieved. It is pure exploitation of another human being, like rape, but done en masse, like slavery, with the added mindfuck that a soldier's one job is to kill other human beings. That is not natural, that is not noble, that is sick.

When I see a veteran proudly wearing his uniform, I pity him. Not because there's anything wrong with him, but because he has been taken for a ride and will never be the same man again. Whatever he believes about his Cause, he has been changed, twisted, and turned into a tool to be used and disposed of on a whim. Throughout history, soldiers have been the pawns strewn on the board, sent to slaughter one another until the king or emperor or president with the most left "wins". Numbers chewed through a meat grinder.

I have no respect for the military because it is a criminal organization that exploited my forefathers and continues to exploit my brothers. No amount of benefits will make it right and no number of heroic homecoming parades will change what it really is. War is wrong and it needs to stop. Being grateful to soldiers is just another way of asking more young men to follow. It's no different than victim blaming, denying something wrong was done and leaving the door open for even more lives to be ruined by the ravages of war.

The next time you see a soldier, don't say Thank you. Say I'm sorry. Most of them aren't alive to hear our apologies, but they didn't die for us. They didn't die for anything. They were murdered by a consumptive system and they deserve nothing less than to never have another grave join their own.

Don't thank them, save them.
Feature image by Phillip James

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Epic feminist fails of our time: #banbossy

AVfM Video Source · 30 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ban Bossy was such a stupid idea that it's hard to accept it was the brainchild of a successful billionaire business woman. Thunderfoot discusses this latest travesty and reveals how inane feminist 'activism' has become.

Feature image of Sheryl Sandberg from Wikipedia

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

“The View” Makeup Assistant Calls Lorena Bobbitt Her “best friend” On Whoopi Goldberg Webseries

Ty Henry · 30 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Karen Dupiche, Emmy Award winning makeup artist on ABC’s morning panel talk show “The View,” called Lorena Bobbitt her “best friend,” stating that she “loved it” when Bobbitt mutilated her husband John, in a rollicking, two minute installment of Goldberg’s new webseries, “Rollin’ With Whoopi.”

The Bobbitts made international news in 1994 when wife Lorena severed husband John’s penis and threw it in a field. Both became quasi-celebrities, as John had his organ re-attached and performed in a adult videos, and Lorena was fêted on talk shows and hailed as a hero by many women and feminists.

Dupiche, who has done makeup for such luminaries as Glen Close, Steve Harvey, and Bonnie Raitt, and is now Elizabeth Hasselback’s personal MUA on “FOX & Friends,” went on to describe with alacrity how she would have rectified Bobbitt’s mistake of throwing the severed organ in a field. Instead, Dupiche suggests she would have thrown it “on Main Street,” “South Orange Avenue,” and “Central Avenue.”

Goldberg chimed in that she would have threw it in the ocean. Dupiche agreed, chirping she also would have “mailed it to (John Bobbitt’s) grandmother and sister in pieces.”

Hairstylist Yancey Edwards followed up that with a crack about the severed penis’ size, saying “it wasn’t THAT big.”

Her official website describes Dupiche as having “the ability to capture any audience with a captivating personality that sparks excitement on national and international television and radio.”

The video begins with Dupiche inquiring, “if a woman kills her husband, we’re going to jail.” Goldberg, who once challenged Joe Biden on violent women, pointed out “not as often as men.”

This is not the first time lighthearted remarks about mutilated men were made on a women’s talk show. In 2011, Sharon Osbourne of CBS’s “The Talk” referred to the attack on John Becker as “quite fabulous.” Becker’s wife, Catherine Kieu Becker, severed his penis as he slept and destroyed it in a garbage disposal.

The View, in its 16th season, is executive produced by BarWall Productions, owned by Barbara Walters and Bill Geddie, Executive Producers of the show.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Danielle D'Entremont, Bellwether?

John Hembling (JtO) · 30 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This morning, the first thing I read was an article about a woman who had faked her own kidnapping, stabbing, abduction and rape, in order to falsely accuse her husband, and send him to jail for the rest of his natural life.

No really, I did.

The article quoted an investigating officer who pointed out that although the fraudster Christine Capurso only faced a misdemeanour charge, the allegations she had made were very serious. If her intended victim, the falsely accused husband had been found guilty, he would have faced a 25 year prison term.

Does anybody else notice the obvious disconnect here? How is it that the allegations proven fraudulent can be described as "very serious" in the same statement noting that her offence was so insignificant it merited only a misdemeanour charge?

If, by fabricating an outrageous story about her own stabbing (she stabbed herself) abduction and multiple rape she was attempting to imprison her victim for a quarter century, why is the legal consequence so minor it doesn't even merit classification as a major crime, or felony? Is it unreasonable to expect that maliciously perpetrated fraud, attempting by deception of police to imprison a man, should result in his potential incarceration being served by the false accuser, on discovery of that fraud?

Just as I am not the only person to ask this question, Christine Capurso's intended victim is not the only person targeted for personal destruction through false allegations.

"Her ex-husband could have faced up to 25 years or greater in prison if found guilty of these false allegations," [Westchester County police Capt. Christopher] Calabrese said. "We felt it was important to be fully investigated and proved to be false so that it would not happen again, as it has happened numerous times in the past.

Numerous times in the past, as well as the present. AVfM contributor Jonathan Taylor recently wrote an article identifying the trend among social justice warriors of using false accusation to silence and remove anyone who might not agree with their particular brand of intolerant enlightenment.

And although gender ideologues like Karen Smith, the executive director of Sexual Assault Voices of Edmonton like to claim "it just doesn't happen," enabling or excusing proxy violence by the state for their own profit, people who prefer to mitigate violence and human harm, like police officers or MRAs, are increasingly alert to the prevalence of the use of false criminal allegations by the social caste for whom such proxy initiation of violence against their victims seldom carries a significant social or legal penalty.

And the phenomenon, while not new, is also not going away. In fact, it appears to be increasingly popular. So popular now that it can't even be ignored by those whose principal role in society is the protection of the leisure caste.

Police prefer to focus on the damage to the credibility of potential victim women, rather than stating the obvious fact that maliciously false allegations are crimes often worse for victims and extended families than the phony claimed rapes in such fabricated attacks would have been, were they real.

When a false rape accuser is publicly outed, the police response is invariably some tut-tutting about how this is very rare, and terribly unfortunate, because it diminishes the willingness of true victims to step forward.

That of course is the standard public statement, and in whatever form it appears, it is craven. What we never see is the public relations or media officer of a police force saying anything like the following :

"This happens so much that the working officers of this police force are all deeply exasperated and exhausted by the apparent willingness of average women to tell such an outrageous and destructive lie for such trivial reasons. It makes us all want to go on killing sprees, and we all have to be drilled by our departments to not talk about any of it in public."

Steven Berkimer and Pierce Harlan have maintained a series of blogs, including False Rape Society, and Community of the Wrongly Accused, cataloging fraudulent rape accusations reported from around the world in mainstream media.

Mainstream media continues to supply new news stories in which women, for reasons ranging from boredom to sexual frustration, level false rape accusations against men. In a majority of these cases, the falsehood of the accusation comes to light soon afterward, and although the falsely accused have been arrested, fired from their jobs, blacklisted, severed from their kids, assaulted, driven out of communities and had their lives generally ruined, the false accusers usually skate away with little consequence.

And nobody can really ignore it anymore.

Nearly 6 years ago, I began predicting that in a culture where the law protected one demographic, but did not govern that group, and where it governed another demographic, without protecting that demographic, a society would adapt. The members of a social caste governed but not protected by law, would begin to seek redress of grievance through other means, such as the use of retributive violence.

Aside from the apparent rise in the use of false accusations of rape by members of our culture's leisure caste, we also have established and elite gender ideological academicians driving changes to criminal law in Canada, towards the legalization of spousal murder by women.

The Community Organized Compassion and Kindness organization in Canada continues to document and expose the pro-murder legal advocacy of Elizabeth Sheehy and her fellow ideologues. Sheehy's recent book, Defending Battered Women on Trial, is effectively a manual for female killers and their lawyers on how to get away with the convenient killing of an inconvenient male partner.

The eradication of due process for male college students accused of sexual misconduct is another move towards the law governing, but not protecting one group, and protecting another and providing no legal accountability for that group's members. In previous discussions of the sexually-selective elimination of due process, I have made what some might call the hyperbolic claim that gender ideologues advocating the erasure of due process actively want women to be killed.

If, in a society in which law has previously been applied equally, protecting and governing everybody, what happens when the application of law changes? What will happen to the function of a culture in which the law selectively governs one group, while not protecting that group from criminal victimization? And the law selectively protects another group, while affording no accountability or redress of grievances for those not within the protected group?

The answer seems obvious: a social caste who are governed by law but not protected by law will begin to seek redress of grievance through less modern methods than the nonviolent conflict resolution afforded by equal courts and laws. Grievances will be redressed by retributive violence.

Now, having explained what should be painfully obvious, I'm going to have to state one more fact which shouldn't need explaining. A great many gender ideologues read this site, so this is for them. Yes, I think retributive violence is a bad outcome. I oppose it, in fact, much of my work as a writer has been to never have to say, about my 6 year ago predictions, that "I Told You So".

So, to amoral, sleazy slanderers for hire pretending that predictions of societal violence are actually endorsement of such, at least thanks for the additional exposure and traffic you give us.

Returning to current events, now in the news is a Queen's University student, allegedly assaulted by an unknown man who, according to the "victim" knew her name; Danielle d'Entremont.

The Mainstream reporting of this event is presently drawing conclusions that d'Entremont's activism as a campus feminist, and her efforts to silence academic speakers on men's human rights issues, may be related to her alleged assault. Apparently, d'Entremont's participation in a campus feminist effort to shut down a men's human rights issues awareness group may also be a contributing factor.

The Huffpo reporting on the story even includes, almost like a bonus a throw-away comment about allegations of sexual assault, made against members of the men's hockey team. There might even be an actual sexual assault in there somewhere. Unfortunately, in the climate enthusiastic consent, yes-means-no if she changed her mind later, and of a-rapist-in-every-closet-and-under-every-bed, it's hard read about on-campus rape accusations and take them seriously.

But if some pea-brain fancying himself a champion of men's human rights indeed was responsible for her chipped tooth and allegedly punched face, that hypothetical amateur pugilist will see the entire Men's Rights Movement turn against him. I'll be one of them.

However, most men's human rights activists paying attention to this case believe that If Danielle d'Entremont was actually assaulted, it was almost certainly somebody with a history of her antagonism and abuse, and straightforward intolerant bigotry by d'Entremont driving their assault. Maybe Danielle's participation in campus though policing and censorship contributed, maybe not.

But what if something else is happening?

What if our society has begun, under the smog of sex-selective feminist jurisprudence and justice to seek redress of grievance by avenues not within the law? If the law has ceased to provide reliable justice based on social caste, then eventually, groups held in contempt by law, treated as unworthy of protection from victimization will address grievances by other means.

However, if this is finally happening, it will not be Men's Human Rights Activists participating in such vigilantism. Rather, it will almost certainly be members of what we often call the "blue pill" public, who, unaware of this movement, wake up in feminism's version of Orwell's nightmare and react without a philosophical understanding of how our culture came to it's present state. They will react without realizing how such a rise in violence will feed into feminism's threat narrative. It will be the under-educated, and the financially and socially marginalized realizing that feminist influenced courts and laws provide "equitable" dispute resolution to only the leisure caste and only violence, theft of income and property, and indifference for anyone else.

And grievances by women or injuries committed by women will be addressed by the blue pill public, including men, with direct force.

The reaction from gender ideologues will, of course be to demand, and be gifted with ever more totalitarian measures from governments and other groups whose business is stealing and stamping out inconvenient human rights like free expression or the right to not be killed, arbitrarily imprisoned, brutalized or enslaved. A casual reading of almost any college's code of acceptable conduct will provide examples of this process for anyone skeptical of this forecast. If the prediction isn't evident on a first reading, swapping male and female pronouns generally makes the apartheid visible.

This, by the way, is what feminists want, because it will give urgency and apparent vindication to the feminist threat narrative. That women are a class of perpetual victims. Thus, enabling and allowing greater violence and more violent eradication of basic human rights in service of the "protection" of women. And that will make the problem worse still. Lots of men will be injured and killed as well, obviously, but who cares about that? Men have always been, and will always be the majority of the population weathering society's violence. The story of a beaten up man don't help Huffpo or any other commercialized channel sell much advertising

But is that what we're seeing the beginning of? Maybe. I truly hope not.
I don't want to say I told you so.
Again.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

From Challenge to Success! CAFE Report on Queen's and U of O Inaugural Events

Dan Perrins · 30 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following was originally posted at CAFE, I am reprinting it here as being of interest to our community. –DP

Wow. What a jam-packed 2 days on the road with the Canadian Association for Equality. I only have time for a brief post but expect a full report later in the week. Pictures to be posted as well.

Thursday, March 27 – Queen's University, Kingston: Dr. Janice Fiamengo and the Queen's University Men's Issues Awareness Society host an inaugural presentation that attracts the largest crowd of any "men's issues" event that CAFE has hosted or sponsored. 350 people pack into a room meant to hold 250, with 100 more watching it streamed live upstairs and easily another 100 unfortunately turned away at the door! The video is up on YouTube on the Channel StudioBrule. A heated yet productive discussion period follows the talk and continues well after the official event has concluded. Congrats to our Queen's friends and we look forward to working with you again soon!

Friday, March 28 – University of Ottawa: No sooner have the introductions given way to our guest speaker than disruptions begin featuring hollering, trumpets, horns and other noise making devices popular among the anarchic types. CAFE's Ruben Avila braves the storm and valiantly attempts to come to an agreement with opponents to show mutual respect and reserve their comments or questions to the end, when they will be welcomed and responded to. But to no avail. As Dr. Fiamengo tries a second time the same response ensues.

CAFE springs into action. With the resourcefulness and a sense of turning challenge into opportunity that is quickly becoming the organization's hallmark, CAFE organizers and our University allies work with the amazing security team at U of O to setup a second room across the hall. Despite having waited 45 minutes nearly every one of the 100+ attendees wait dutifully and then march across as the event is officially moved. At the security-access door to the second venue guards and organizers ask each entering to abide by U of O policies which prohibit the disruption of sanctioned campus events. Those who had broken the policy at the previous venue were denied entry as each entered, single file, to watch the talk. Dr. Fiamengo resumed her remarks at about 8pm, finally delivering her talk to a full house. Protesters amass in a gang in the hallway just beyond the new venue, waiting for the event to end. Is there any irony, given all the talk that CAFE creates an "unsafe space" on campus, leading to the bullying and harassment of students, that at U of O security was required to build a wall to protect us from the bullying and harassment of the protesters. In other words, our event was the safe space.

But that's not the whole story. As the talk is coming to its end protesters, now having waited 45 minutes and frustrated by their failure to hijack or ruin the event, finally got around to the one desperate move still available to them. They pulled the fire alarm. This development followed almost immediately after the "gang" assured me that their actions did not violate any U of O policies. With the alarm's electronic system having been broken security was unable to disable the alarm and we were then forced to evacuate the building.

But as we waited outside for security to try to fix the problem, something amazing happened. U of O students started to gather around the event organizers. United by a desire to learn and hear each other out a discussion was sparked. These students had waited an hour, been dragged from one room to another, then forced to leave the building and were now waiting in the cold at 9pm for a third attempt to conclude the event. And they were not going to let their night be hijacked by those who would commit crimes and break University policies to censor and deprive them of deciding things for themselves. Some of those students even re-entered the building to help us carry out our CAFE items. They apologized on behalf of the University for their colleagues' behaviour, to which we thanked them but told them there was no need as CAFE treats each person as an individual. Many who started on the fence ended very interested in our message of equality and open dialogue and readily signed up to attend future events. And there will be many future programs, as we continue to prove that, one way or the other, we will bring an awareness of men's issues to university's across Canada

Protests drive up interest. Security fees help raise funds. Disruptions unite the rest of us. If you're interested in genuine dialogue join us. If you're trying to stop us from raising consciousness on life and death issues like suicide, fatherlessness and workplace safety, you will keep failing. And we will keep going.

Thank you to everyone who contributed each in their own way to guarantee someone else would have the chance to learn something new over the last two days. You made this a success.

- Canadian Association for Equality

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Stefan Molyneux: Estrogen Based Parasites #killallmen

AVfM Video Source · 31 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Love him or hate him, anarcho-capitalist/libertarian Stefan Molyneux's clearly been paying attention to the issues faced by men and boys and the hateful nature of gender ideologues. Will people with other political points of view also start to get wind of how serious these issues really are? Only time will tell we guess. In any case, it gets most interesting about 10 minutes in.

AVfM Interview with Alyss Majere

AVfM Video Source · 31 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dean Esmay recently sat down to an interview with new Honeybadger YouTuber Alyss Majere. We enjoyed talking to her and hope you will enjoy our talk and her other videos as well.

Items referenced in the interview:

Alyss Majere's channel

Rape Support Group

"Why Rape Is Sincerely Hilarious" by Andrew Bailey

"I was raped" by Alyss Majere

White Feather Campaign

Honebadger Brigade

Anti-Misandry

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

The Invisible Suffering of the Codependent Man

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 31 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Prostitution is legal when it is called “adult entertainment,” “escort services” or “marriage.”

Brutally honest prostitution was exiled by vainglorious social justice warriors with suspiciously clean white armor. But it was honesty that was exiled, not prostitution.

Prostitution 2.0 (“P2” for brevity) uses lies and addiction to increase profits from private webcam shows, pornography, diamonds and Valentine’s Day merchandise. Sex sales have been liquidated and reinvested in selling prospects of affection. You don’t have to sell sex when you could sell a lap dance or three hours where you pretend to be a girlfriend. There is no better indication of how lonely we must be than the profit margins for suppliers of prepackaged love. That is a clear indication that affection is in demand, but there is a shortage.

P2 vendors would not be sitting on a pile of cash if men felt loved.

If a man could buy sex or feel respected by women, he would feel no inclination to fall into the sophisticated machinery ready to consume him.

The pus-lubed web of lies woven by P2 make life worse by performing two functions:

- To facilitate courtship between codependents and narcissists.
- To encourage male codependency and female narcissism.

Although the above functions are unintentional, they are observable characteristics that emerged from private sector operations.

For the unaware, codependency is a psychological condition characterized by an obsessive preoccupation with others, often to the expense of one’s own self. Narcissism is an obsessive preoccupation with one’s own self, often to the expense of others. Codependents and narcissists are naturally attracted to one another, and have a relationship comparable to a tick and a lemming.

Yes, there are cases in which a narcissistic man harms a codependent woman, and these cases are exactly as sad. However, these cases are not developed by gynocentric mainstream marketing influences that actively encourage a specific codependent-narcissist configuration.

Marketing is not geared toward what she can do for him, but rather what he can do for her. Remember, every kiss begins with Kay and you should say that with flowers. She won’t love you unless you have Axe body spray (yuck), dandruff shampoo, flowers, candy, cards, jewelry and the head of a dragon you’ve slain.

Even feminists belching about socialization must admit that men are told to buy affection.

When an emotionally healthy woman is perpetually given gifts and unwarranted affection as the primary consumer, she will learn to expect the Disney princess life. When an emotionally healthy man is competing in a buyer’s market for cock, he learns to treat himself like a product first and a human being second. PUAs profit from the insecurities that understandably incubate in these men, which means even confidence is a commodity as opposed to something you develop with experience.

Both men and women learn to be manipulative to get a slice of their respective pies, and the manipulation tactics are comparable to those of codependents and narcissists. Codependents appear altruistic, loving and kind, but are often simply buying friendship in a desperate attempt to avoid facing the curdled puddle of piss that is their self-esteem. Narcissists (who are self-loathing in a different way) act as enticing Venus flytraps, so codependents only realize how royally fucked they are once they see escape is not simply a matter of buzzing off.

Since buying sex is illegal in most jurisdictions and asking for sex may prompt a witch hunt, a man’s basic emotional and physical needs are turned into addictive commodities that provide the illusion of sexual contact and social acceptance during masturbation.

Cough syrup for an eternal cold.

Is it any wonder why the stereotype of the horny heterosexual man developed? A man's natural libido has been amplified by a view that sex is the ultimate form of approval, and approval is the Holy Grail for codependents. While feminists screech about acceptance and inclusion, they ignore the men who are desperate for both.

Because we live in a culture of "yes might maybe mean no but perhaps not," actually having sex has become the primary and least ambiguous means to feel accepted. However, the process leading up to sex is a dangerous, maddening journey fraught with peril, confusion and possibly court summons. Any insecure man preoccupied with sex is not interested in merely sex, he is desperate to break out of a downward spiral of crippling loneliness beaten into his skull.

Sex emotionally completes the codependent Western male. Sadly, his passivity prohibits him from articulating his multifaceted torment brought on by a judgmental consumer culture. This is especially so in the face of an angry woman with an audience. Any reactionary fearful blubbering on the part of a man cast into the spotlight (especially on TV) is cast as stupidity and misogyny. Other men who as desperate as he is will join in on heckling him, all in the name of seeking acceptance and perhaps sex from their chosen goddess. Men will actually assist narcissistic women in stripping a dazed and confused man of his identity and dignity, probably before he had a chance to even develop either in a hostile environment that stunts said development.

Men, as the cult-urally designated codependent, deserve sympathy, but also criticism for funding their own turmoil. Men cast their own cocks as worthless, and narcissists-in-training happily agree while sucking the raspberry center out from a heart-shaped chocolate.

Breaking codependent habits is a slow, difficult process that involves unraveling a complex neural network that literally programs a man to be self-destructive in the name of "love." This cannot change quickly, but it can change.

Women have every choice to use prospects of sex to introduce ambiguity and emotional hazards for their own benefit, and may even cast innocent flirting as rape, criticism as verbal abuse, and compliments as insults. If more women made the choice to treat men like human beings (even in rejection), fewer men would sink deeper into their internal void.

What can be done to create a society of healthy reciprocal relationships between mutually compassionate partners?

Unfortunately, we cannot directly control a psychologically unprepared culture. There are too many interrelated factors at work. The only reliable escape is the realization that the game is rigged.

This is why MGTOWs will change the world without casting a single vote in a ballot or spending any money.

The system cannot handle a man who says "no."

Why Is Discussion of Boys and Men Opposed?

Miles Groth Ph. D. · 31 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This past week Professor Janice Fiamengo of the University of Ottawa was heckled (at Queens University) and, the next night, forced to stop speaking (at the University of Ottawa) because of the topic of her lecture: boys and men in contemporary society. Why is the topic considered dangerous enough to be met by violent protesters?

I can think of topics that are supportive of, say, racism or anti-semitism being protested, given the history of harm done to racial and ethnic groups. But such talks would most certainly not be about promoting such attitudes and would most likely take up the history of such attitudes. I can also think of lectures on topics such as pro-abortion being anticipated with angry protests against the practice being promoted. But in a university setting, it is never or should never be a matter of promoting any attitude or practice (except, perhaps, being open to every topic for disucssion). At universities, every topic must be open for discussion. This is what makes the university different from a soap-box or a political speech: any topic, no matter how difficult to consider, must be allowed to be openly presented for discussion and debate, without worry that the speaker will be shouted down or prevented from speaking. The university extracurricular lecture format has traditionally provided for this. Of course, no one is required to attend such a lecture.

Now consider the topic of boys and men as such: male studies and why they are needed. Why is the topic opposed? What are the psychological reasons for individuals to pre-empt discussion of the topic? Why may it not even be broached without a speaker being insulted, jeered at, or the event cancelled because the safety of attendees becomes an issue (when a fire alarm is set off, although there is no fire.)

My question is, Why does the topic itself, Boys and Men, cause individuals to attend an event that promises to deal with the topic in order to ensure that the topic cannot be discussed? Why are individuals drawn to places where they will be made angry? Or if they are already angry, what sort of anger wants to have its heat further inflamed? What sort of individual hate needs public demonstration?

I am deeply interested in the well-being of boys and men and for that reason was invited to write a blog entry here from time to time. Some of the response to my discussions has been off-topic and some of it has been angry. As I think about recent events in Canadian universities, I see similarities.

It should be clear that favoring something (the discussion of the well-being of boys and men) does not imply opposing something else (for example, the well-being of girls and women). Generalized dismissive comments here are equivalent to loud opposition in the lecture hall, where because tables are pounded, horns are blown, or a fire alarm is set off (all occurred when Professor Fiamengo spoke) so that audience could not hear the lecture or the lecture had to be cancelled.

Non one is required to read what is presented here, just as one need not attend a talk on male-positive approaches to understanding issues concerning the well-being of boys and men. Yet some seem to some here because they are angry or because they want to feel more anger. Taking a male-positive stance causes some to become angry. But why? Would it not be just as irrational to go angrily to a place where pro-female discussions of girls' and women's well-being are being held in order to denounce them? Such discussions are regularly held and quite popular, and they are not opposed, shouted down, or disabled. Nor should they be. They should be encouraged. But why are there such responses to pro-male discourse?

I would argue that such attitudes reflect an underlying contempt for men, the reasons for which are not clear. This contempt has been termed misandry (a term coined near the end of the 19th century). It is the counterpart of misogyny (contempt for females). For a psychologist, the question becomes: What engenders hatred or generalized contempt for a group of human beings–such as males–based on accidental features of anatomy (sex, skin color, stature and the like)?

Typically, a person's (most often, a child's) experience with a single individual that has been traumatizing causes the person to generalize to all individuals with shared features. And so, for example, a boy who has been harshly treated by his mother as a result comes to fear and hate all females, all of whom remind him of his mother. In the absence of such an experience, social psychologists provide a different explanation and invoke prejudice as the motivating attitude that causes an individual to fear and then hate all members of a given group. Perhaps the individual has heard generalizations about the group from authority figures (parents) before the capacity for critical thinking has developed and an irrational prejudice against a group is the result.

What is the case with females (and some males) who experience contempt for all males? Either we have a collection of individuals who have been traumatized as children and later meet. This is commong among self-help groups. Or we have individuals who share a prejudice. All have heard early all in the formative years generalizations about males that are as irrational as generalizations about racial or ethnic groups. But have they heard such talk in the formative years? Do many parents talk to their children about how awful males (dads, brothers) are? That seems unlikely. Are such ideas heard in elementary school? One would hope not.

It is an open question which explanation is better here–shared trauma or arttitude formation. Perhaps it is a mixture of both sorts of individuals.

I write as a psychologist and therefore believe that individuals with similar experiences as individuals find each other and group psychological forces take over. When we look back on any period of social conflict between groups (for example, racial groups), we find that the group psychological explanation (attitude formation) is more useful than a political (sociological) explanation that may after the fact be invoked to explain or justify the psychological effect.

The discussion about boys and men must take place and it will, but this is a difficult time. Students especially need to be taught the discipline of listening. They should then make up their minds about what to believe, but only on the basis of information and critical discussion.

Laurie Penny of New Statesman: petulant, dishonest child of privilege who's been caught again

Diana Davison · 31 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Laurie Penny is a petulant, prepubescent performance artist, play-acting at being both a journalist and a grown-up. But failing. Previously referring to herself as a media professional, which I'd not contest, she has now taken to calling herself a reporter or journalist. These categories of writing have a marked difference which will, inevitably, become an insurmountable inconvenience for Ms. Penny: Journalists report facts.

Skipping back and forth between New Statesman and The Independent, Penny filled the vacant shoes of disgraced plagiarist Johann Hari in 2012, just long enough to follow in his disgusting footsteps. Fabricating quotes and failing to cite her sources where it didn't suit her colourful narrative, Ms. Penny is not troubled by her lack of integrity. Trivial expectations of honesty in journalism were responded to with an assertion that all journalists are subjective, and she's somewhat proud of her methods.

Given Laurie Penny's disrespect for her art, it's not surprising to discover that she has lied. Which article hardly matters but, in this case, it was a discussion about men's rights and an encounter she had with Mike Buchanan, founder of the Justice for Men and Boys (& the Women Who Love Them) political party in the UK.

Penny misrepresents the details of their meeting to make it look like Buchanan, who was visiting friends in London at the time, was homeless and unable to find work. She finds him pitiful. Given that Laurie is a self-described defender of the poor and was eerily in the exact situation she describes for Mr. Buchanan, she takes a hypocritical stance in her projection or, more likely, is knowingly dishonest.

Mr. Buchanan retired from his business career about four years ago and informed Laurie Penny of this fact. But, you see, money matters very much to Laurie Penny. Money and hairstyles. That's about how deep her ambition goes. When she flinched at Mike Buchanan's proffered hand it was not because he was male, and she a man hater, it was because he appeared to be beneath her. She is 28, he is 56 years old.

She is chic, he showed up disheveled in an attempt to accommodate her interview request at short notice. Penny recorded the lengthy interview, during the course of which Mike Buchanan explored numerous areas in some depth. Virtually nothing of what he said appeared in the article. It's all too obvious that for Laurie the only objective to be gained by meeting Mike Buchanan was to seek material for a personal attack. It was journalism of the lowest order..

Quickly advancing her agenda driven pathos, Penny inserts the word "white" into Buchanan's concerns for men and then calls men's rights activists racist. This slippery segue to her ensuing rant is not to be taken seriously. Accusing people of racism is a "go to" technique of Ms. Penny's to gain audience support.

As historian David Starkey noted, Laurie Penny is nothing but a child with a penchant for making personal attacks then crying foul when her vitriol backfires. At the June, 2012 Sunday Times Festival of Education, Penny declared Starkey to be "playing xenophobia and racial prejudice for laughs" then fabricated charges of tax evasion on they fly, after which she sat meek voiced, pale faced, and lip quivering while Starkey exposed her for her own money grubbing, uncharitable behaviour.

> Now I think that that is as mean and grasping as some runt comedian, and I will not be lectured to by a jumped-up public schoolgirl like you .

(Editorial note: It might be helpful to non-British readers to note that in England, unlike elsewhere in the world, a "public school" is an expensive, posh private school. There's nothing wrong with that, it's just hard not to note the irony of another privileged Social Justice Warrior spew lies about anyone who questions her, embarrassing even those who titularly share her values. –DE)

Anyway, to her distress, the audience did not take her side and there was no applause in her favour, only jeers.

> As Miss Penny continued speaking, Claire Fox, director of the Institute of Idea think tank stood up and told the journalist who has written for The Independent and the Guardian, that she was a disgrace to both women and the left.

Purportedly, those are the things that are nearest and dearest to Ms. Penny's heart: feminism and social justice. Nonetheless she shook off the criticism and got back to her devious business because Laurie Penny is not an honest reporter, she is a pop icon in the modern, infantalized world.

If she really cared about the causes she pretends to fight for, Laurie Penny would be very concerned about the condemnation that her colleagues from the Occupy movement have directed towards her. Sporting a new hair colour and style for every publicity event, Penny brags about being an integrated member of the revolution but showed zero concern for either the three-part revelation of her misquoted friend or the anger from a presumed ally whom she publicly called a "cunt" just for the dramatic effect.

Laurie Penny has been called the "voice for a generation" but she is obviously just a voice for herself.

As sociologist Frank Furedi pointed out in an Intelligence [2] debate, "[t]he very idea of a generation is a banal, unsustainable concept. The idea that a biological accident, the fact that you happen to be sharing the same calendar, binds you together in a common experience is inane."

He goes on to explain that Penny's so-called "Generation Rent" has mostly been failed by "child centred rearing" which has robbed them of a "heroic imagination" and, instead, taught modern youth to protest with phrases like ""Bail us out!' "Give us a handout!' 'Take better care of us!' It's almost like an infantalized reaction."

Furedi and Starkey are not alone in noticing the perpetual childishness of the self-obsessed Ms. Penny.

> Of course, extending child-like innocence into adulthood is a very difficult thing to get right — hence Laurie Penny is one of the most bitter and twisted people in public life.

But raping the world of honest journalism is not Laurie Penny's concern. She's too busy counting her followers on Twitter, planning her next hairdo, and choosing which of her leftover friends are most disposable next time she needs a good punchline.

Being a fad is not easy. The hardest part must be trying to keep from her mind the fact that all fads have a limited shelf life. Just as being sort of cute, like children are, has helped her get away with shoddy, unethical writing. Laurie Penny's fame will fade with her youth because she focused on building a personality cult instead of learning how to do her job well.

As Furedi tried to explain, "we end up with a very sordid generational tension that is really about the small things in life. It actually distracts young people, or could distract young people, from having a vision of the real possibilities that could occur."

There is no point trying to reason with Laurie Penny. No point discussing the real issues, asking her for more attention span outside of her own, solipsistic world than she can afford, nor in requesting integrity she hasn't had to develop. Laurie is what I call an OPK (Other People's Kid); ultimately, she's their problem not ours.

While Laurie Penny stomps her feet like an adolescent, crying that nobody understands her – she's right. We don't want to understand her. She's a spoiled brat and we are adults with better things to do than worry about why The New Statesman still continues her employment.

I guess she's just privileged.

Feature image by Susanne Nilsson

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Mike Buchanan's public challenge of Laurie Penny for her misrepresentation & her racism

Mike Buchanan · 31 March 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Life doesn't get much better than discovering you've been misrepresented by a prominent Gender Feminist journalist. Being (incorrectly) branded a liar – twice – by Julie Bindel in the course of my talk in the recent debate at Durham University is something I shall treasure to the end of my days. A supporter has just drawn my attention to a piece written by Laurie Penny for the New Statesman, published online on 25 March:

What drives the men who think feminists and foreigners want to wipe them out?

I met Ms Penny sometime around Xmas. She contacted me seeking an interview for a New Statesman piece, while I happened to be staying with friends in London. When we met, I proffered my hand to shake hers and she visibly flinched, as she had on the previous occasion I'd met her, when she'd sat next to me on a bench at Covent Garden underground station. At first I mistook her for another feminist ray of sunshine, Kat Banyard.

Ms Penny and I had a coffee – she paid, I didn't offer to pay, lest I be accused of benevolent sexism – at a coffee shop of her choosing in London. I'd politely declined her earlier suggestion of meeting in a public house in Soho. I was carrying a suitcase that day because I'd stayed the previous evening at a friend's place in London, and was due to spend the next evening at another friend's place in London.

The interview lasted for about an hour. We covered a lot of ground, and Ms Penny recorded the discussion. The only reason for relating these mind-numbingly boring facts is that they relate to areas in which Laurie Penny misrepresented me in her article, in the first of the following paragraphs:

> Some months ago, in a nondescript London coffee shop, I met Mike Buchanan, a "men's rights" activist and the leader of the small, single-issue party Justice for Men and Boys. The former procurement worker, in his mid-fifties, was dragging a suitcase – he described himself as between homes and without a stable job and was moving from one friend's sofa to another's that day. It was only a few years ago, when he was looking for work and "a huge woman" turned him down for a job in public-sector procurement, that Buchanan realised that women had too much power.
>
> "I think men are trashed, as you go down the social scale," was one of the first things he told me. "As you go down the social scale, men are totally disposable. A man on the minimum wage – what chance does he have?"

Now, what does this 'journalist' get wrong in just one paragraph?

The 'job in public-sector procurement' was a consulting assignment, as I explained to Ms. Penny.

"… he described himself as between homes…" No, I didn't. I explained I'd stayed overnight with a friend in London (where I don't live).

"… he described himself as… moving from one friend's sofa to another's that day…" I simply said I was staying overnight with another London-based friend that evening.

"…he described himself as… without a stable job…" No, I didn't. I retired about four years ago from my work as a business consultant.

Far more important than such matters, however – and what has the fact that the coffee shop she chose was "nondescript" got to do with anything? – is Laurie Penny's conflation in the article of "white" with "men"' It seeks to portray advocates of men's human rights as racist, when they're manifestly not. It's the favourite tactic of hate-driven gender feminists seeking to divide men. The tactic is both cynical and racist, as well as becoming increasingly ineffective… as are all feminists' shaming tactics, happily.

I've posted Ms Penny a link to my blog piece, and posed her the following public challenge:

> Your recent New Statesman piece appears to suggest I'm homeless – is that what you meant by 'between homes'? – and jobless, while I'm neither. I have a home, I'm living off my company pensions, and I haven't once sought employment for the past four years. I challenge you to substantiate your assertions by 5pm next Thursday, 3 April, or publicly retract them, and apologise accordingly. Feel free to retract them and apologise by sending me an email mike@j4mb.org.uk and I'll make the apology public on your behalf. If I don't receive a retraction and an apology by the deadline – which is surely a racing certainty – I'll add this to our long list of unanswered public challenges of prominent feminists http://j4mb.wordpress.com/our-public-challenges-to-feminists/.
>
> I shall also be considering legal action on the grounds of defamation, and possibly other grounds.
>
> Have a nice weekend.

Please note: AVfM is in the middle of its Spring Fundraiser. Please help us continue to spread the message. Click here to contribute.

Fraternities Against Pornography (FAP) – a new program at Dickens University

Jonathan Taylor · 1 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Today marks the beginning of Sexual Assault Awareness Month, a month dedicated to the dismantling of Patriarchy and Rape Culture. It is a time for many Feminist students, faculty members, and administrators to collaborate to develop awareness programs and anti-violence strategies. But as emails circulate through Women's Studies mailing lists, as ideas percolate in the minds of hopeful activists, and as the posters are painted and banners hoisted, one burning question cycles through their minds:

Where is the support from all the men?

"We've been trying a new approach in the past several years," said Dr. Ambrea Rosen, chair of DU Women's Studies. "Instead of teaching women not to 'get raped,' we began teaching men not to rape. The problem is that men are more likely to listen to other men than to women. And peer mentoring and peer counseling, we have found, are far more effective lead-ins to bystander intervention, which is the general direction we're heading."

It seems that someone has finally heeded the call. Richard Fawnmore of DU's Alpha Epsilon Chi chapter founded the men's group Fraternities Against Pornography (FAP) in February this year after his girlfriend left him during a period of time in which he was – in his own words – "watching Brazzers like crack." "FAP is pretty much the only thing that pulled me out of that," said Fawnmore. "I'm like…standing on a windswept mountaintop looking back at the path I took to get here and I'm like, 'woah, I can't believe it took me so long.'"

Fawnmore was quick to inform interviewers of his noble aspirations with FAP. "We're doing more than just criticizing social norms.We're taking a stand against a culture which degrades women by portraying them as sexual objects. Since sexual assault is also about viewing women as objects rather than people, it's pretty obvious that pornography culture inevitably feeds into rape culture. As guys we really have to challenge other men to be better than that."

Although Dickens University will be the home to the first chapter (specifically called DU-FAP), Fawnmore hopes it will be the start of many FAPs to come as it spreads to other universities.

Although the early criticism of the program included accusations that it was not gender inclusive enough, Fawnmore quickly clarified his group's position. "We want to make sure people know that women can be FAPpers too. Although they can't really go about it in the way we can, our honorary FAP sisters can join us in spreading the message that pornography harms everyone in their own way."

FAP hasn't had any problems drawing in new members since its creation two and a half months ago. At the student center this last Friday, new FAPper Michael Nelson passed out flyers featuring statistics by Dr. Mary Koss's recent sex-assault study which concluded that, since the advent of internet pornography, rapes have increased by 501.2% on campuses nationwide. Koss's groundbreaking methodology features more gender-sensitive definitions of rape that were unrecognized by previous studies. Such forms of rape include tipsy rape [1], stare rape, catcall rape, yes-means-no rape, he-asked-more-than-once-so-it's-coercion rape, and regret rape.

"It's amazing how much rape you can see in the world when you stop using the Patriarchal definitions we've had for…well, forever," Nelson said as he handed out flyers to nearby students sipping on strawberry banana smoothie at Dickens's student center. "It gives me a whole new outlook on the men I've been friends with my whole life," he continued. "And men everywhere, really. There's so much I see now that is wrong with most men. Not all men of course, but most. But the good thing is that we can work to change that."

FAP faculty sponsor and professor of sociology Colin Bunkworth has been openly supportive of the students' efforts. When asked why he supported the organization, Dr. Bunkworth said, "The new study by Dr. Koss, with the new gender-sensitive definition of rape, really opened my eyes. Once you see the multivarying levels of oppression that reside in the patriarchy-pornography-rape culture matrix, along with all its inherent microaggressions and triggers, and once you realize how men fit into that, any well-educated person like myself would rush to FAP. It's more than an opportunity. It's the right thing to do."

But not everyone sees FAP as a sign of progress.

"These expanded definitions of rape are problematic," said Harold Blackwell of DU Men's Human Rights. Why aren't these definitions reflected in any criminal codes? Is the rhetoric of these activists really proportionate to the problem? Or are they taking a problem that has some truth to it, blowing it out of proportion, and demonizing men in the process? And while we're at it, why can't we talk about men who are raped too?

Blackwell didn't stop there:

"Why don't we talk about Profeminists like Jonathan Allen at Brandon University, who teaches Fifty Shades of Grey as a graduate-level course? Where is the outcry over women's pornography? If men's pornography is an embodiment of 'rape culture,' how is BDSM-oriented women's pornography not?"

On campus, Feminists and their FAPper allies see their concerns as disingenuous symptoms of a deeper problem: a reactionary backlash among insecure men who are struggling to maintain their white supremacist capitalist ableist imperialist ethnocentric heteropatriarchal privilege.

"It's disheartening, really," said Molly Coddle, president of the local chapter of the Feminist Majority Foundation. "Despite decades of anti-violence initiatives, nothing has stopped the tsunami of rape on college campuses. Women like myself live under a climate of constant fear and intimidation that often prevents us from performing the most basic of daily tasks."

She paused for a minute to deposit her Starbucks cup into a nearby trash bin.

"We've tried everything to stop the violence," she continued. "We've participated in anti-violence campaigns that hold all men accountable for sexual assault. We've established women-only parking lots that give women access to lighted areas and require men to take the longer, darker path to their cars. We've given women priority seating on university buses. We've established on-campus hearings where administrators who previously adjudicated things like plagiarism now adjudicate felonies like rape, with the assurance that no female student will ever be punished for making 'false accusations.'

"We've done this and so much more, and people still look upon us as bitter manhaters for doing nothing more than breaking the silence. Really, all we do is advocate equality for women. Nothing more."

Standing nearby, fellow Feminist Beth Anderson nodded in agreement. "Some people just don't understand us. The word 'Feminism' gets a bad rap, but the thing is we're really quite forward-thinking and revolutionary. I don't think the problem is that we've 'gone too far' in dismantling Patriarchy and Rape Culture. It's that we haven't gone far enough."

When asked what she thought of the controversy, DU Women's Studies chair Dr. Ambrea Rosen offered her insight. "Many men's advocates say that Feminists don't understand men's issues. But I think we understand them very well. After all, as Profeminists like Dr. Jackson Katz say, violence against women is a men's issue. To a Feminist like me who truly cares about men, I can't think of a more important men's issue than that."

Congressman Alan Grayson Not Charged With DV: Case Closed?

Robert Franklin · 1 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Since one contributor to AVfM recently published a short list of feminists who leveled false allegations about one thing or another and received no punishment or even criticism for it, I thought I'd mention the recent case of Democratic Congressman Alan Grayson of Florida. It seems he and his wife Lolita Carson-Grayson are going through a divorce. They have a couple of kids, so we wouldn't be surprised to find that Mom alleged domestic violence against Dad. For at least a couple of decades now, prominent family lawyers have been decrying the use of false allegations of abuse to get a leg up in custody battles, so why would it be different here?

And sure enough, that's just what Ms. Carson-Grayson did, and it didn't take her long. She filed for divorce earlier this year, and by March 1st, was claiming the Congressman had gone to her house and pushed her against the door causing her to fall. Gilding the lily, she went to an emergency room the next day claiming injuries.

Her main point was to gain an advantage in the custody battle and, like clockwork, a judge issued a restraining order against Grayson and gave temporary custody of the children to his wife. Easy.

But it looks like Ms. Carson-Grayson could use a bit of instruction from the domestic violence industry. Her complaint was never going to convince anyone because the congressman went to her house on the day in question with an aide. He did so precisely because he figured his wife would get up to something like this and he wanted a witness. Into the bargain, the aide video-recorded the whole thing and – guess what! – it showed exactly what Grayson has said all along – that his wife was the aggressor and he did nothing but retreat from her physical abuse. (Always Be Recording.)

Armed with the video evidence and the testimony of at least three eyewitnesses, the police refused to pursue charges against Grayson and the family court quashed the restraining order.

So, all's well that ends well, right?

Hmm, not quite. What's most remarkable about the otherwise unremarkable affair is that it's over. Here's one article from the Miami Herald that purports to wrap things up. Congressman Grayson's office released this statement:

"Ms. Carson-Grayson has apparently dropped the petition for injunction that she levied against the Congressman last week, and will no longer pursue a restraining order against him. Ms. Carson-Grayson's complaint was voluntarily dismissed today.

"While this is certainly positive news, we want to emphasize that these baseless charges should never have been brought in the first place. Two eyewitness accounts, video evidence, a thorough police investigation, and Ms. Carson-Grayson's own 911 call confirmed the Congressman's innocence – and that Ms. Carson-Grayson was, in fact, the aggressor.

"For the sake of the all parties involved, we sincerely hope that this concludes Ms. Carson-Grayson's efforts to misrepresent and exploit the family's private affairs.

It looks like someone's forgetting something. The police and prosecutors are forgetting they have incontrovertible proof that Lolita Carson-Grayson committed at least a couple of crimes. First, she assaulted her husband and then she filed a false police report claiming he'd attacked her. Do prosecutors have probable cause to charge her? You bet they do. Indeed, I'd say they've got proof beyond a reasonable doubt. It's now almost four weeks since they've known to a certainty that she was guilty, but no charges against her have been filed and no one appears likely to do so.

For the Herald's part, the entire tone of their article is that, if he's not guilty then no one is, despite slam-dunk proof to the contrary. It, like police and prosecutors, is happy to overlook the obvious.

In short, for Lolita Carson-Grayson, hers was a free shot. If it had worked, she'd be all but certain to get sole custody of the kids. In the event, her ruse failed, but she'll suffer no adverse consequences.

Do I have to add that no one in the domestic violence industry has come forward in this high-profile case to decry the use of false allegations? I thought not. Where are the DV activists who excoriate Carson-Grayson for making it harder for true victims of violence to be believed? Nowhere in sight. For that matter, where are the sages of the DV industry, like VP Joe Biden, a member of Grayson's political party, who point out that women are just as likely as men to commit intimate partner violence? Unseen and unheard.

Of course Congressman Grayson could be one of those himself. After all, he voted for the renewal of the Violence Against Women Act that's done as much as anything to promote exactly what's going on in his case. He personally voted to fund an industry that did its best to destroy not only his family, but his career in public office. He was very nearly hoist with his own petard. Will he learn his lesson? Will he think twice before next uttering the pithy phrase "War on Women?" Why do I doubt it?

The criminal case against Grayson is dead, as is the restraining order, but the divorce and custody case is still very much alive. Carson-Grayson lodged a false allegation of abuse against her husband. As such, she's proven herself willing to use any means necessary to come between the children and their father. That looks very much like parental alienation. Will the family court take notice and give custody to him? After all, there's nothing to indicate he's unfit to care for them. So, faced with one parent bent on alienating the children from their father and the other with a clean parental record, whom will the court choose?

Plus, the anti-dad crowd has put much time and effort into the notion that children who observe their parents engaging in domestic violence are harmed thereby. When Carson-Grayson attacked her husband, their two children were playing in the yard. They saw the whole thing. Will the court take notice and give custody to Dad along with the concomitant order that Mom pay child support? I won't hold my breath.

All of which is to say a single thing – that in this case, there have been and will be several opportunities for the legal system to instruct Lolita Carson-Grayson that her actions will not be tolerated, that there are consequences to lying, physical abuse and parental alienation, but that system has taken none of those opportunities, and likely will not. And that means the same will happen again. And again, and again, and again, in countless families across the country and the world. As long as mothers are told in no uncertain terms that such behavior is at least tolerated and usually encouraged, why wouldn't it?

Hey, what's a mother to do?

Germaine Greer On How Women Abuse Men

AVfM Video Source · 2 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Germaine Greer, Australian gender bigot extraordinaire, recently said some incredibly insane things about men and incredibly backwards things about women. Sargon of Akkad gives her an epic schooling.

Julia Tourianski Declares War: The Body, Sex & Rape

AVfM Video Source · 2 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Libertarian Julia Tourianski sent us her video declaring war on gender ideologues. Does anyone spot a trend here?

You can subscribe to her channel, BraveTheWorld, here.

Professor Adèle Mercier: It Wasn't Rape, He Was Asking For It?

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 2 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There appears to be an ongoing campaign to discredit the Men's Human Rights Movement by claiming we are violent and dangerous. It started with an unsubstantiated allegation that a Men's Rights Activist threatened and then physically assaulted a feminist student. Despite the fact that to date no eyewitnesses, camera footage, or any other corroborating evidence that any MRA was involved in any physical altercation at Queen's University, this report is now being used to try to deny any need for men to have their voices heard and issues explored free of feminist monitoring and approval.

In a letter to the editor dated March 31, published in the Queens University Paper, Andrew Howard argues that men should not create their own spaces to address their issues outside of feminist oversight. Among other things, he uses the unsubstantiated insinuation that some MRA must have battered a student. Since he signs his letter with "Sci '14" I assume he must be a science student of some sort. Thinking he might understand science, I replied with an extensive list of statistics that feminists choose to ignore when creating their campaigns that present men as more likely to be rapists than rape victims. One of those statistics was this:

95% of abused boys in juvenile facilities reported being attacked/coerced by female staff.

– Sexual Victimization in Juvenile Facilities Reported by Youth, 2012

Now I had more to say than that, but, almost immediately, someone going by "Adele Mercier," whom we presume to be Adèle Mercier, Associate Professor of the Queen's University Department of Philosophy, offers the following rebuttal to my presentation of that statistic:

> Dear Alison,
>
> [image]
> Adèle Mercier, Associate Professor, Queen's University Department of Philosophy
> I know that statistics can be hard to interpret, but you need to learn to read before you spread misinformation into the stratosphere.
>
> You said: "95% of abused boys in juvenile facilities reported being attacked/coerced by female staff". This is FALSE.
>
> Re-read Google "Sexual Victimization in Juvenile Facilities Reported by Youth, 2012"
>
> "Sexual victimization" is there defined as ALL SEXUAL ACTIVITY with facility staff.
>
> And the numbers are that, among males in juvenile facilities:
>
> 5.2% of MALE YOUTH engage in unauthorized sexual activity with MALE STAFF;
>
> 89.1% of MALE YOUTH engage in unauthorized sexual activity with FEMALE STAFF;
>
> 3% of MALE YOUTH engage in unauthorized sexual activity with both male and female staff.
>
> This merely reflects THE PROPORTIONS OF GAY AND STRAIGHT MALES in juvenile detention centers, (and the fact that even people in detention centers like to have sex.)
>
> Also noteworthy:
>
> "As a result of the high rate of staff sexual misconduct reported in the NSYC-1 (10.3%), new items were added to the NSYC-2 questionnaire to better understand the circumstances surrounding incidents. Youth were asked a series of questions related to their relationship with the facility staff prior to sexual contact. Among victims of staff > sexual misconduct:
>
> Nearly two-thirds said that staff told them about their personal life outside of work (69.1%), treated them like > a favorite or better than other youth (63.6%), or gave them a special gift that the staff would not have given to most other youth (62.3%). Almost half (49.2%) said the staff member gave them pictures or wrote them letters. Nearly a third (29.8%) said that the staff member contacted them in other ways when the staff member was not at the facility. More than a third (36.7%) said youth gave the staff member pictures of themselves, and more than a quarter (28.1%) said youth gave the staff member a special gift.

>
> When youth were asked who initiated the sexual contact, 36.4% said that the facility staff always made the first move, 17.4% reported that the youth always made the first move, and 46.3% said that sometimes the facility staff made the first move and sometimes the youth did.
>
> Youth were also asked to describe the sexual relationship with staff. Nearly half (46.3%) said the incident was usually just sexual. An estimated 40.1% said the sexual contact was more like friends with benefits, and 13.6% said that they really cared about each other.
>
> Among the 840 youth who experienced staff sexual misconduct WITHOUT FORCE, 5.1% reported the involvement of a male staff member (2.7% involved male staff only and 2.4% involved both male and female staff).
>
> So the 95% that you cite is of MALE YOUTH who experience sexual misconduct involving FEMALE STAFF WITHOUT FORCE.

Wow! Of course ~90% of sexually abused boys in juvenile facilities reported a female attacker who used force. That means female staff physically attacked 90% of the boys abused by staff in juvenile detention facilities.

But even if we look at separate claim of "without force," I want to highlight this: Mercier's defense–a feminist philosopher's defense, apparently–of the female predators abusing underage boys in juvenile detention without overt or obvious force. It seems to comprise of the following rationale:

"He wanted it." "He seduced her." "He touched her first."

Where have we heard these excuses before?

And all this on an article that argues feminists should have control over the discourse over men's issues. Control over how boys talk about abuse they may have experienced when growing up.

Why, according to one feminist at Queens, it's not really abuse at all! He was asking for it!

To see more of this feminist "philosopher" known online as Adele Mercier engaging in ludicrous statistical diversions and rape-apologia, and to assure you I am not making any of this up, here is a set of screen captures taken last night. Forgive if they're a bit untidy, screen-capping a long conversation is hard, but none of these have been altered in any way.

Final question to ponder: will she now play Damsel In Distress, and claim she is being "harassed" and "attacked by evil thuggish violent Men's Rights Activists" (like me) because we're publishing all this? Or will she act like an adult and admit her hypocrisy? I guess time will tell.

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

Update*: It appears that Francis Roy has an even better screen capture, in PDF form.

How to Change the World: Part One

Philip W. Cook · 2 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is an extraordinary moment. Whether it will be ceased with the alacrity it offers is up to you. Perhaps because of my background as a former member of the "main-stream" media I offer these suggestions. It is true it was not always main-stream in a sense, for a time it was "alternative" or "progressive" radio. In other words, I reported in a major U.S. city about NSA spying on long-distance telephone conversation monitoring for key-words back in 1974 via "Zodiac" news service. Nothing new there at all.

Nevertheless, I did move on to more main-stream broadcast radio and TV news as a director of news departments. After leaving the daily news business, I have been involved in various "men's and boys" issues for a long time and was responsible for new legislation in this regard. As well of course, bringing the issue of male victims of domestic violence to the forefront of the public consciousness not only through my books, but in hundreds of "main-stream" media appearances or radio talks.

So, we come to this moment in history. As have most of you, we are vitally and rightly concerned about what is going on in the campus environment and the Dept. of Education and U.S. Justice department. (The Justice Dept. new definition of "rape" and what it means and who was behind it-"Feminist Majority" has yet to be written about or noticed by C.H. Sommers, Cathy Young, Kathleen Parker, James Taranto or anyone else save me in When Women Sexually Abuse Men but that will come in time I am sure).

The extraordinary moment is the recent RAINN statement opposing and offering concrete alternatives to the current campus witch hunt. RAINN is the Rape Abuse Incest National Network. A key quote here:

> The FBI, for purposes of its Uniform Crime Reports, has a hierarchy of crimes — a ranking of violent crimes in order of seriousness. Murder, of course, ranks first. Second is rape. It would never occur to anyone to leave the adjudication of a murder in the hands of a school's internal judicial process. Why, then, is it not only common, but expected, for them to do so when it comes to sexual assault? We need to get to a point where it seems just as inappropriate to treat rape so lightly. While we respect the seriousness with which many schools treat such internal processes, and the good intentions and good faith of many who devote their time to participating in such processes, the simple fact is that these internal boards were designed to adjudicate charges like plagiarism, not violent felonies. The crime of rape just does not fit the capabilities of such boards. They often offer the worst of both worlds: they lack protections for the accused while often tormenting victims.

I dispute their repeating the DOJ estimate 1-in-5 of campus rapes or sexual assaults, but that is to be expected from a group that is advocating for greater awareness. It is not true, but that does not matter for your purposes.

It is true that FIRE has been in the forefront fighting these measures and Barbara Kay in Canada has written about the similar situation there. As brave and as logical as these articles and posts are however, it will not change the tide. The forces arrayed are too powerful, too entrenched, and the voices that seek to be heard for reason are simply too small.

What could practically be done to stop the tide of acceding to the radical or gender-feminist as opposed to 'equity feminist' agenda is the issue, and how to effectively and practically effect change or stop their mantra of 'every man is a rapist or a potential one' and if you actually read and believe their writings the ultimate goal of criminalization of all heterosexual acts and procreation and begin to protect basic civil rights on campus or off is the question of the moment.

The RAINN statement represents a golden opportunity that does not come around very often. How to most effectively use this moment is the question I wish to address in this essay.

Helen Smith author of Men on Strike said it best in TV interview (paraphrased from memory here) " The only reason you are interviewing me is because I am a woman. Men are not allowed to speak for themselves. They are dismissed as 'whiner's or complainers' or men's rights activists and are not given the time of day." Simply put, men are not allowed to speak for men, and certainly they are not allowed to speak for women or even gender-issues of any stripe.

How exactly right she is.

We have now however, a main-stream quite respected group who has taken the extraordinary step to make common-sense change suggestions to current policy and ethos on campus. They have also set out in detail the disastrous consequences of current policy. Their credentials are unassailable and come not from a 'men's right's' group or even some group vaguely or closely associated with such. I don't know much about who they are per se, but I surmise they are mostly led by women.

Carpe Diem. Seize this moment! How to do that in a practical easily-doable and realistic way is the subject of the following essay:

#1. Write a snail-mail typewritten letter to the managing news producer, news director and assignment editor of your local news. That is, three network affiliates and If you have one independent or Fox News affiliate. Be sure to include your local address, contact info., etc. When I was in the newsroom, such a very rare letter was not only passed around the newsroom, and the News Director (me) hell, sometimes it was sent on to the general manager and even the station owner. It really does not happen very often when someone takes the time to do it. Not email, not twitter, not contact form, not telephone call- snail-mail letter only.

#2. Do the same thing with your local newspaper (those that still exist). Email submission is ok for op-ed or letter to the editor. Not good for letter suggestion of a an important story that has yet to be covered. (For this, skip the form comment box, instead find the actual email address of managing editor and several reporters who might fit the bill. To do that, simply find one email address end of one reporter. For example, the paper uses a format of first initial and last name @seattletimes.com. That should work).

#3 Write a letter to your newspaper and submit an op-ed. (Adhering to the guidelines for word-length etc.)

#4. If you are a graduate of a particular college submit an article or letter to the alumni (usually monthly or quarterly magazine). Do the same thing for the college (student) newspaper.

What you should say:

#1. Never ever identify yourself as being part of group or associated with a men-friendly endeavor.

If you can, get your partner or a female friend to submit it under her name. Or, find someone who is friendly, agrees with you and is willing.

#2. Pick the parts you like most of the RAINN press release, repeat it verbatim and give credit to them.

#3. Say it makes sense and say why. You can use part of the AEI article written here as an opinion piece in TIME, for your rationale which references the RAINN statement. It's a good guide and O.K. But, remember that 80% of the working (paid) news media are democrats/liberal. Therefore, a reference to, or allusions to an article by AEI will be dismissed by them as 'conservative' or republican. Don't do it. Steal the thoughts or emphasis if you must, but do not reference it.

#4. Most important, relate it to your LOCAL college or university. Find out what their policies and procedures are currently. (The key to getting to reporters to act is to do the work for them-always assume they are lazy as hell). If you can find the time to do the LOCAL work to give them contact information to find a person (or better yet Mother) of a man falsely accused or kicked out of college or suspended under the kangaroo court of campus that's the best yet-they exist and their numbers are growing. Get it to them and supply the information, I guarantee that story will get heard and reported on. Do the work and find them if you can!

#5. Each person must act locally. Your chances of getting national attention (unless you are a prolific work-hound like Barbara Kay, Cathy Young, C. H. Sommers, Kathleen Parker, James Taranto or others are minimal at best. Don't bother. Leave that work to the people who have the time (because they actually get paid for the work) and the already established credentials. Newspapers and broadcasters only pay attention (90% of the time) to local issues and local examples. Find the local examples, your chances exponentially increase. Give the editors/reporters that (with permission) contact information. Do the work for them.

#6. The golden opportunity exists only because a female-led 'victims' group has come out against and offered concrete alternatives to the current insanity. Use their statements and no other group. Sure you can state your opinion in support, but link it to a concrete LOCAL example. If you don't have the time to do that research fine, then make it general, but if you can possibly spare the time, find a local example or simply state the Dept. of Education rules and show how it relates to your local campus, and go to their website or find other information which shows how they must(under threat of withdrawal of federal funds institute kangaroo court rather than police investigations). FIRE is the best source for this. You can find national examples of the actual results to illustrate in number of places and here is one good example (note it was written by a 'feminist mother' and in the Wall Street Journal). Another good reference is this from the American Association of University Professors.

#7. Recognize that the news media is a 'herd' animal. The book Boys on the Bus remains the best book ever written on how the news media really operates. Now of course, it would be the majority of the reporters, Women on the Bus. The ethos however, has not changed. It's a myth that reporters via to ask questions at a news conference. I know, I've been there. Get one 'main-stream' outlet to report it, and it becomes golden and others follow. Don't get that one and the rest ignore it. When you do get that one, let others know that it is now a 'legitimate' story and suggest a possible new angle or others to talk to. Find a local representative of RAINN if you can, find mothers of sons to talk to about it. Do the follow-up work for the media outlet, never rely on them to do the work. Keep talking to them, then once they have the bit in their teeth, suggest other new stories always legitimizing your story with what one another 'main-stream' media has done. Here's an example . True, it is the first daily newspaper of any kind that has ever covered the reality of 'debtors prison' which exists in every state throughout the nation, but it is start. Use the 'legitimacy' of one good reporter or editor to establish your credentials as a source and do the work that is needed to lead them to, or better yet give them a local example. If you can, and know the issue well, suggest or (best) give them 'experts' to talk to (local) who have concrete practical alternatives. Attorneys, social workers, police officers, etc., etc. "Professionals" of some stripe.

#8. Never think that even if you succeed in getting local "major" coverage of the issue(s) via the news media means that success in state law or federal law influence follows. I know via experience. Sure, I got a major U.S. city T.V. station to do a prime-time hour long documentary on my new legislation proposal (regarding reducing parental alienation in divorce proceedings). That is something that station had never done before or since (they actually pre-empted network programming-meaning they had to get permission from the network and lost money). But it took two sessions of the legislature (the rule of thumb is three sessions) for new concept legislation to pass. Nevertheless, it did pass and now three-quarters of that states counties have implemented the legislation I wrote. That aspect and how to do it in a practical and effective way is the subject of Part two (when I get around to it) of "How to change the World." I can't tell you how many times I've heard "men's right's" activists of various stripes say, "Why if only_____would cover this story, things would change." Balderdash! It takes hard and sometimes difficult but practical work. There must be a concentrated practical and fully written out proposal. It also only takes a surprisingly few dedicated people. How to find them and how to do it is the subject of that essay. Recently for example, ONE person with the help of ONE set of parents, made a huge difference in likely changing the wording of this crazy legislation in California.

In any case, now comes the time. RAINN has presented to you a unique and extremely rare opportunity. Whether or not you choose to do something with this stroke of good fortune is up to you. I humbly suggest that it is an opportunity you cannot let pass you by. If you choose to let it go by, then frankly, it is your choice, but recognize it is your choice and no one else's. Carpe Diem!

Fighting Wikipedia Corruption & Censorship

Dean Esmay · 2 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Update: For more on how you can work around Wikipedia corruption and bullying, see Partnership with WikiMANNia.

Wikipedia has a problem. And that's a problem that affects the whole world.

Wikipedia is now the #1 reference resource on the Internet. Whether you love this fact or hate it, it will not stop being a fact any time soon. And unfortunately, in recent years numerous groups with resources and willpower have emerged to tromp minority voices on Wikipedia, a problem which has only worsened with time.

It used to be that with Wikipedia, all you had to worry about were errors written by people who didn't know what they were talking about. Nowadays you don't just have to contend with mistakes on Wikipedia, though. You also have to contend with overt censorship, bullying, and ideological thuggery–all of it invisible on the front pages of Wikipedia, but which can be seen on Talk, Revision, and Blacklist pages all over Wikipedia, by the people who control what the general public sees on the front pages.

While this rarely happens on noncontroversial issues (you can for example probably trust Wikipedia to tell you accurately what actor appeared in a film), if an area is remotely controversial and one side of an argument has financial and human resources the other side does not, the censorship becomes undeniable.

One of the areas where this is an acute problem is Wikipedia's grossly discriminatory practices on men's rights issues; they tromp the Men's Human Rights perspective whenever possible, while bending over backwards to accommodate Gender Feminist ideologues. These feminist ideologues frequently and often hatefully tromp dissent and insert gynocentric gender ideology all over Wikipedia, poisoning much of Wikipedia's content.

For just one example, you should see the way they blacklist, censor, block, and vandalize the A Voice for Men page, accusing anyone who even tries to help on that page of working for AVfM, often undoing work to improve that page–work done by people we've never even heard of, who are just, in Wikipedia spirit, trying to help. This is clearly being done by Wikipedia editors with an axe to grind, using ever-shifting Wikilawyering to get away with erasing, reverting, and otherwise undoing the work of people who are just trying to contribute what is clearly accurate, encyclopedic information. They've even used the Wikipedia spam blacklist, meant to protect against spammers, and turned it into an HUAC-style blacklist instead, blocking AVfM out of pure malice; while the excuse they use is that years ago some people were inserting AVfM links inappropriately in some articles (and by the way, if we caught anyone doing that we'd ban them from AVfM forever), they have consistently refused any and all requests from any parties to remove us from the blacklist or at least add us to the whitelist on articles that are directly relevant to the prominent people who have contributed articles to A Voice for Men, or to the issues we examine. You can't even add articles Erin Pizzey has written on A Voice for Men on Erin Pizzey's page, or things Warren Farrell or Miles Groth have written on AVfM to their respective Wikipedia pages, because AVfM is blacklisted. We have articles written by distinguished historians, social scientists, and other academics, but their work cannot even be cited if it's published here. Even though these people have Wikipedia entries, you can't point readers to articles they've penned here. Hell, you can't even link AVfM itself on AVfM's own page because it's blacklisted. We were not even allowed to type out the url of the web site, a Wikipedia editor reverted and and declared that since AVfM is blacklisted, even a non-hyperlinked reference to where to find us on the web was censored.

Even more delightfully, they reject, automatically, any objections by anyone affiliated with a site that's been put on their McCarthyite blacklist. Indeed, when we first tried a private protest, then published a complaint about the Wikipedia censorship, the wikilawyering rationalizers used that as further proof we needed to be blacklisted: how dare we complain in public about being censored! This is still more proof we must be censored!

Can you get more Orwellian?

But let's be clear, it's not just AVfM: These Wikipedian ideologues who abuse their power (like those who run the Wikipedia Feminist Task Force) also often harass those who try to run the Men's Rights Portal, having kept the Men's Rights portal on probation for years, jumping on any excuse to portray anyone friendly to the movement as violent, dangerous, harassing, threatening, and so on. It's to the point where most Wikipedians interested in the subject of men's human rights just give up. Even adding prominent and important sites like Anti-Misandry, The Spearhead, Toy Soldiers, and other important sites will run you into static–although, quelle surprise, the Good Men Project and other feminist web sites with much less traffic and prominence than AVfM get a free pass all over Wikipedia. Even notorious discredited faux-journalist Dave Futrelle's site isn't blacklisted, despite his multiple documented cases of journalistic dishonesty, quoting people out of context, spinning their words, outright lying, and other hatemongering.

Still, as someone who's been a Wikipedia editor for about 10 years (my first recorded edit was in 2004 I believe), I find all this shameful. Yes, Wikipedia has always been imperfect, but in the early days I never believed it would become a site dominated by ideological thugs. But that's exactly what it's become. Not just in the Men's Rights arena, but in any area where people with an ideological axe to grind and the resources to quash dissent are available. The Wikipedia Feminst Project, giving students credit just for inserting their ideology all over Wikipedia, is a symptom of a larger problem: Wikipedia, a project I used to love and hold dear, can't defend itself from those who wish to subvert it and who have the resources to quash dissent. Nor can it defend itself against anonymous users who will engage in "well-poisoning," saying batshit stupid things pretending to represent a certain point of view to make that viewpoint look crazy and thus justify a ban on anyone else expressing those views. Apparently, that kind of sock-puppeting isn't something Wikipedians even want to quash.

There is no point in protesting Wikipedia's censorship on Wikipedia; indeed, gender ideologues who hate us will often go in there, pretend to be one of us, and do that exact thing to make us look bad.

No, the path to resistance to censorship is nonviolence, and creating alternative resources.

So, in the light of this ongoing censorship of men's rights (and other) issues, and dominance by hateful Gender Feminist dogma that's infected Wikipedia, AVfM has been working diligently to try to combat it with other resources. The truth is, there have been numerous efforts in the English-speaking world to create alternative wikis with information and viewpoints Wikipedia censors. Most have failed to get more than a little traction. Still, we have to try.

One way you can help is with the AVfM Reference Wiki. Now that wiki is meant to contain mostly just primary research references, but you can help expand it; all you have to do is sign up here and then after you have your account go here and request permissions to add content. (Does that process sound complicated? Well it is, to prevent vandalism, and also, if you can't figure out how to sign up for an account and then after that just go and ask for permission to add content, explaining who you are and why you want to help, well, how serious can you be?) And by the way, we aren't just looking for people to volunteer to add information, clean up typos and grammar, etc. We're also looking for a volunteer to actually take the lead on the AVfM Reference Wiki, making a point of monitoring it regularly, figuring out how to organize content, etc. If you're at all interested in that, please leave a comment or drop me a note.

The AVfM Reference Wiki is, however, limited in scope: we want to keep it restricted primarily to strong fact-based, verifiable empirical information, and as free from opinions, speculations, or general debates or etiquette or whimsy. We want it to be useful for activists trying to make their case to a skeptical public, getting them information that's hard to find elsewhere.

But what about issues like terminology, history, debates within the movement, and so on? Also, what about non-English speaking Men's Rights Activism? We are a movement that is global and are getting involved with people who speak many languages other than English. What about them?

Well we have an alternative project on this that will be announced within the next day or two. So watch this space.

In the meantime, if you think you can help on the AVfM Reference Wiki, adding to the body of scientific, fact-based, primary reference material, please follow the steps above and pitch in, we definitely need more help, including leadership help, there. And if you want to get involved in an international effort to cover more than just the dry science, and to help Men's advocates from around the world with a general-purpose Men's Rights Movement wiki in multiple languages, you'll be pleased to see the upcoming announcement. So stay tuned!

Its like Bax told us 100 years ago:

> When, however, the bluff is exposed… then the apostles of feminism, male and female, being unable to make even a plausible case out in reply, with one consent resort to the boycott, and by ignoring what they cannot answer, seek to stop the spread of the unpleasant truth so dangerous to their cause. The pressure put upon publishers and editors by the influential Feminist sisterhood is well known.

Wikipedia is now bunk. Time to work around them.

Update: For more on how you can work around Wikipedia corruption and bullying, see Partnership with WikiMANNia.

Canada Needs You

Dan Perrins · 2 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My recent appointment to Canadian news director has me thinking about how best to serve you, our readers and supporters.

Canada is a lot of ground to cover. We are a busy lot here in Canada, I like to say "Us Canucks don't pass the buck." We are very active in the advocacy of men's human rights. (Something us as Canadians all should be proud of.)

We have to be.

About 8 men a day kill themselves in Canada.

For everyone of those 8 men I am going to go out on a limb and say they have female relatives along with male relatives who cared deeply for those lost souls who decided on a permanent solution to their problems.

Which means we are not just trying to find proper solutions for men but for society as a whole.

Something feminism doesn't seem interested in doing.

Canada, like many other developed countries, is a fairly hostile environment if you are born male. Its fairly hostile for those who are not male and care about the well-being of boys and men as well.

The issues for men in Canada start in the cradle with male genital mutilation being legally sanction and end in the grave. Sometimes by their own hand as mentioned earlier in this piece, or due to the fact our life expectancy is on average 5 years less than women.

In the past I've been called a one man army, incorporating, activism, news stories, opinion pieces, and lectures in my repertoire of FTSU. To twist the phrase a little;
I'm a one Dan army™.

I've shown you what can be done, how you can do it, while being in the trenches towing the line for sometime now in Ontario. Just 1 of our nations 10 provinces and 3 territories.

We have an estimated population of 35,344,962 for 2014, Ontario having about 39% of that estimated population. About half of which are boys and men. All of which are being woefully failed by our government on multiple issues from municipal to federal.

It is just too much for this 1 Dan advocate / writer army to cover.

This means we (AVFM) are in need of some positions to be filled by dedicated volunteers. People who are willing to step up and take responsibility for some of the things I can't cover due to being maxed out.

I'll be honest with you I shovel a lot of internet gravel everyday. I put in 16, 18, 20, even 24 hours at time just trying to get the very best information out for the public to absorb.

That was before I became the news director for Canada.

I swear, if I could, find hours 25 – 35 in a standard 24 hour day I'd be working through them too, just to stop 1 more suicide.

So now that you know what the demands on me are I come to you hat in hand asking for your help. Your help to make Canada less hostile towards men. Your help to move us from a misandric society to one which shows the same level of compassion consideration and care towards men that it shows towards women. Your help in the future of half of society.

Your help to put an end to 8 men a day killing themselves in Canada.

I'm not asking for a lot of your time.

What I am asking for is dedicated volunteers from each province to handle the news for each province and or territory.

Given Ontario is the largest of provinces and my backyard I'll help the Ontario volunteer.
For the other 9 provinces and 3 territories I am looking for a few good people who can take on the responsibility of writing up 300 – 400 word news reports. If you can put pen to paper efficiently and competently and believe you can accomplish this I / we want to hear from you.

We also are in need of people behind the scenes, for as I like to say we are the men's human rights machine, and there is a part for every person to play.

I am asking you to help fix the issues men face from cradle to grave in Canada.

I look forward to hearing from the many talented individuals in the MHRM community. We can do this. All one need to do is look back 2 years ago to see how far we've come.

If you're in Canada and you want to help, drop me a note at d.perrins@avoiceformen.com and soon we'll create a mailing list for Canadian volunteers!

To a Passerby Feminist

AVfM Video Source · 3 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Victor Zen responds to the following comment from "real" feminist Amelie Mangelschots. Amelie has the unusual quality of being respectful and polite in her approach, but Zen still manages to identify her dogmatic influences in a response.

Amelie's original comment follows (edited for spelling and format):

> Hi!
>
> I would like to respectfully point out something I consider flawed logic in your video… You say feminism is not what it claims to be, that feminism fails to keep its promises, … What I heard as evidence for this, were some examples of people who claim to be feminists who've done some pretty horrible shit in the name of it. I get that that's upsetting and intolerable.
>
> Then again, you state the possibility of there being a branch in antifeminism that would like to see women back in the kitchen, possibly using not all that friendly methods themselves, and you would like to distance yourself from that. Presumably, a person can only speak for themselves, and by proxy perhaps those people of whom they know they are like-minded within the group they're all a part of.
>
> Applying the latter logic, I fail to see how it is then all of a sudden correct to assume that the abominable behaviour of certain groups of "feminists" should be a correct reflection of all feminism, and why it should be applied to the entire ideology. I'm going to do a dangerous thing here and go ahead to say I'm one of those "nice" feminists. In fact, I can speak on behalf of a 1300 people strong online discussion group when I say that the feminists who pull the kind of crap you righteously call fucked up bullshit on, would be kicked the hell out of there before they could say "men are scum". But true, I can't speak for feminism as a whole, just like those insane idiots that sadly call themselves that too, can't either.
>
> I could apply the logic you use on feminism to antifeminism and men's rights movements just the same, if I really wanted to. I coud apply that logic to men. Or to cats. Sure, I was raped by scumbags. Sure, I am regularly called a slut, a whale, a whore,… by random male strangers simply for walking outside. Sure, I get groped when I go out. Though you will NEVER hear me say that MEN are the problem or that MEN have let me down and that it means shit to me when they come and say "oooh, but I'm a NICE man". Just like I've had death and rape threats from MRAs, for example. Should I go ahead and say that men's rights movements should be opposed because some MRAs are scum? I hope not.
>
> I've been called a feminazi and a fat whore by people who had no clue I'm a feminist, simply because as a women I had the audacity to talk about street harassment by people who claim exactly the same things you do. This does not make me think I should oppose YOU ~~or~~ your causes necessarily, it makes me think that particular person is a giant asshole.
>
> I'm speaking about objectification in mainstream media in an anti-sexist gathering next week, a speech in which I will also focus on the burden stereotypes and ideals put on men, and the unfair image it gives of them. You know. As a feminist. I do that because my point as a feminist is that 1)there is the concept of patriarchy and the rigid gender stereotypes it provides for both men and women, 2) that the basis for these stereotypes is that masculine is better than feminine (hence feminism) and 3) that these ridiculous stereotypes and assumptions about gender hurt women AND men and that that is why it should end. I also think that while men are also disadvantaged, women are disadvantaged more (also hence feminism), though that absolutely does not mean men's issues should not be addressed or that there is no place for them within feminism.
>
> I could ramble on, and I wouldn't mind if you disagree on what I assume to be the cause of these injustices, but I do assume, or at least hope that we can for example agree that
>
> - Men should have equal chances when it comes to custody

> - Men should not be demonized as rapist, sex-crazed monsters
> - There should be a more equal gender balance in ALL strongly gendered professions
> - There should be more recognition and respect for male sexual violence and domestic abuse victims > and so on and so forth. Of course I talk about women's issues. Of course that doesn't always include simultaneously talking about men. Just like some people talk about animal testing and don't simultaneously mention the disappearance of rainforests. It doesn't mean we don't agree on things and it especially doesn't mean we don't care.
>
>
> And after all that… I agree that certain groups of feminists and certain feminist individuals are way messed up, misinformed, spreading lies,… Then again, your side of the fence is not free of the same behaviour. In the end I can only hope that the both of us can be critical enough individuals to not blindly accept, and to realise that any ideology will always be an umbrella under which plenty of fucked up people reside, yours, mine, and anybody else's. You might condemn the messed up interpretation and the messed up actions because of it, but not the whole of it. I don't think you'd go and be anti people of colour because one of them raped your sister and some others robbed a house in your neighbourhood, for example…
>
> Sorry for the long post..

Here is the response video:

Farrell Announces Workshop for Detroit Conference on June 26, 2014

Warren Farrell · 3 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Boy Crisis and Fatherlessness with

Warren Farrell, Ph.D.

June 26, 2014

A Voice for Men Conference

Detroit, Michigan

This half-day workshop is designed for people who wish to deepen their compassion for men without alienating everyone else. It will clarify the biological basis of this resistance, and offer "work arounds" to create receptivity, via boys' issues and how children benefit from paternal involvement.

To this end, I will present new data (from my book-in-progress on The Boy Crisis) as to why boys are in crisis and what we can each do about it. I will invite you to participate in exercises that will immerse you in an emotional experience of your connection with your dad.

Perhaps most important, the workshop is an opportunity to make a transition from you reading about me, to me getting to know you—so I may help nourish the potential leaders in the room. Thus the workshop will be limited to 50 participants. It will be a pleasure to share my birthday (June 26) with you!

Time: 1 pm-5 pm

Tickets Now through May 3, 2014 $79.00

May 4 through June 3 $89.00

June 4 though June 26, $99.00

The Interview with Miles Groth they won't want you to read

Jedediah Bila · 3 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In the current political climate, the topic of "women's issues" makes daily headlines and is regularly featured as a priority on television and radio. But what about men?

In the face of some alarming statistics with respect to male enrollments in college and male suicide rates, I was left wondering: why is this happening and what's being done about it?

I sought out the expert opinion of Dr. Miles Groth, a Professor in the Department of Psychology at Wagner College. In addition to being a practicing psychoanalyst in New York for thirty-five years, Dr. Groth is founding editor of New Male Studies: An International Journal, a consultant for publications and international policy-making organizations on boys' and men's health, and was the editor of two journals, International Journal of Men's Health and Thymos: Journal of Boyhood Studies.

I spoke with Dr. Groth not only about the aforementioned alarming statistics, but also about the role of modern feminism in it all, what's really going on in some Gender Studies classes and the response by female students, the formation of men's centers and subsequent reaction by some female faculty, the distortion of the word "sexist," and more.

And now, for the interview some won't want you to read…

JB: Your research focuses on declining enrollments of males in college—currently at 40%—and how that relates to the way men are experiencing campus life and the college classroom. Can you tell us about what you have discovered?

MG: At this point, I wish it were 40%, but the latest data show a nationwide rate of 37%. It is an all-time low for male enrollments in tertiary education. Parity was reached in 1980, when there were for the first time as many women as men attending college or university in the Unites States. Many schools had gone co-ed in the 1970s to accommodate the increased women applicants and this was great news for all. A longtime imbalance had been redressed. However, during the last ten years, the 50% male enrollments have declined to the current rate. Projections (if this trend were to continue) indicate that the last male to be awarded an undergraduate degree would be given it in the year 2037. That is certainly not going happen, but that is the projection based on the rate of decline over time as plotted statistically.

The major reason young males are not matriculating is a campus atmosphere that is unwelcoming. Some rather cynically have suggested that the economy is to blame and that males have decided that it is futile to pursue higher education since there will not be any jobs waiting for them after graduation. That argument does not hold water, since the economy affects women and men without discrimination. Women, too, are faced with challenges finding employment suitable to their investment in higher education when they graduate.

The reason is very clear. It is voiced by young men who enroll but may leave after several semesters: We do not feel welcomed. The environment is anti-male in many classrooms. Administrators, who are now for the most part women, are not interested in how active young men are in college life, with the exception of athletics. Lack of engagement of men in on-campus activities and organizations was one of the first signs of young men being turned off by college life.

JB: I have long taken issue with aspects of modern "feminism" that have distorted feminism's initial intent and purpose, and have in turn had a negative effect on both women and men. In your paper Meeting Men: Male Intimacy and College Men Centers, you write "… a young male scholar who witnesses a malignant image of him painted in a gender studies class will say nothing. He will put up with it. He has learned that if he does speak out, he will likely be charged with wielding the overbearing assertiveness that comes with being an embodiment of willful male 'attitude'. And so he sits, silent, in disbelief that the professor could be talking down to him and about him. Of course, in doing so, he loses credibility in his own eyes."

Can you expand upon that a little for me in terms of the cause and effect with respect to the "young male scholar," as well as such an event's rippling effect on campus life at large?

MG: I teach a Gender Studies class at Wagner College. I am one of two male faculty who teach courses for the minor. The other is in Religious Studies. My classes average thirty students. Of those, roughly five will be guys. As I have learned through the years, they have taken a Gender Studies course with some wariness, assuming that what they have heard from other students in other Gender Studies classes—that they will likely not be taken seriously in the classes, which while supposed to be about gender (male and female) are almost always only about women's lives—will be true. Men (and boys) are portrayed in stereotyped ways—sexual predators, dead-beat dads, dumb jocks. The presence of misandry in classrooms has been documented by two Canadian scholars, Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young, in a series of books published by Queens-McGill University Press.

It is not just a matter of anecdotal reporting at one small liberal arts college. Classes other than those in Gender Studies—most notably in the social sciences but also in some of the humanities, including History—are also environments where young men are not taken seriously. Their views are considered to reflect a by-now mythic notion of male political privilege and so they are bypassed, given short shrift or even dismissed with sarcasm.

After enough of this, males learn to sit quietly rather than face being ridiculed. Of course, it is the goal of a college professor to admit into discussion even the most controversial positions. This is the uniqueness of the college campus environment. Even the most unpopular views must be heard and discussed.

For example, if I want to argue for creationism, I must be permitted to have my day. A class on the origins of the species must entertain all theoretical positions and the professor must at the end of the day say: Now you have heard the best arguments of a variety of contrasting views. It is up to you to think critically about what you have heard and decide for yourself which theory best explains the facts as they are best understood. You will not be graded on which position you support, but only on how well you represent it and contrasting positions, and how cogent your arguments are for the position you support.

Young males are reluctant to argue for pro-male positions because they have learned they will be dismissed as malignant, simply because they are pro-male. They soon learn that only pro-feminist and now often anti-male views are acceptable discourses in college classrooms. Beyond the classroom, the vast majority of gender-specific co-curricular programs and events are inspired by ideological pro-feminism.

This year on our campus, Women's History Month was observed, but there was no mention of International Men's Day. There are date rape seminars for incoming freshmen (the 17- or 18-year-old males attending sit in such sessions wondering, "Who are they talking about? The idea has never crossed my mind") but no seminar, for example, on violence among men.

JB: In your paper, you reveal "For those of us who teach undergraduates, it is well known that putting down men has never been a hobby of young college women. The source of the practice was and is some faculty, albeit a small but powerful group, whose animus against men has been institutionalized, for example, in the compulsory 'date-rape' consciousness-raising seminar required of incoming fresh-men in most schools, or in more and more course syllabi."

Tell us a little more about what you have witnessed in your years of teaching and why it is so potentially destructive.

MG: I mentioned some of this earlier—the compulsory date rape seminars for freshmen and the sense of disbelief they cause to be registered in young male freshmen. Let me add two points. The faculty I have mentioned are a minority, albeit a powerful minority. Most faculty and administrators are not driven by misandry. On the other hand, male colleagues have not been vocal about the presence of misandry on campuses, nor have the women faculty who are moderate in their views about gender. In fact, as it happens, most women still like men. Most female faculty do like their male students and enjoy teaching them as they do their female students.

Pressure on administration and a few decades of ideological feminism have, however, produced a "climate of opinion" that is misandric, and this is difficult to counter. Open discussions of the issue of misandry in society and on campus do not take place. This is about to change, however, as your interest in the research reflects.

Women like men—their fathers, their male partners, their brothers, their sons. Men like men—their fathers, their brothers, their sons, their friends … and, until recently, themselves as men. (This is another issue. Men and boys have come to hate themselves, both as a result of the image portrayed of them and of the roles they are compelled to play, but also given what they hear about themselves and, especially as young boys, come to believe about themselves. As a result of self-hate, the suicide rate of boys and men has increased at an alarming rate over the last twenty years. It is 4-6 times higher in teenage males than in female peers. The life expectancy of males is about seven years less than for females, compared to a two-year difference a century ago.) Courses that are pro-male are now necessary to offset the misandric curriculum.

A second point: Young women in college are not buying into the rhetoric of misandry. This has led to a recent decline in numbers in Women's Studies programs across the country. Gender Studies programs, too, have seen declines in enrollments and some have closed. This is because of the anti-male tone of many of them.

Here I want to stress that young college women are increasingly ignoring and opposing misandric faculty and courses. But since they have become entrenched in the curriculum, there will be a period of time for adjustment. More Male Studies courses will be offered.

I would like to add that I am one of four scholars who are the core faculty of the first Male Studies graduate program ever, which will launch in the fall of 2013 at the University of South Australia. The graduate certificate program will expand to a master's program and then to an undergraduate major in Male Studies. For some who may be wondering at this, recall that history has not been about most men. It has been about a few powerful men who have done tremendous harm to most men, women and children. We have everything to learn about the male experience—most men's experience—not the behavior of a handful of powerful men who dominate the history books.

JB: You discuss the formation of men's centers. What does a successful men's center look like? What is its functionality? What does student participation look like in terms of activities and discussions? And how much resistance is faced by women's groups and feminist groups to the formation and sustenance of such centers?

MG: Men's centers on college and university campuses are starting to form—slowly but surely. They follow on pioneering work documented in a book I co-edited that appeared in 2010, Engaging College Men: Discovering What Works and Why. The men's groups (study groups, as I like to think of them) are quite different, depending on the ethos of the campus. What they have in common is regular meetings to discuss issues such as masculinity, relationships with women, fathering and the family. At some schools, men are notable for their work in service, including Habitat for Humanity and more extensive projects overseas. These groups are open to women on campus. The men who attend come from all disciplines and racial and ethnic groups. There are no dues, by-laws, initiations and the like. Our group meets weekly throughout the semester. Sometimes a film clip or a guest is the focus of discussion.

But … the numbers attending are small. The guys who meet are courageous, inasmuch as they face skepticism among some of their male and female peers. I think more attention will be given to the men's centers, however, and for one reason in particular. Especially for small liberal arts colleges, the decline in male enrollments will very soon translate into a situation where women will not want to apply since there are so few men on campus. That will put such schools in as precarious a situation as the young men find themselves in.

Moreover, where there is underlying hate—prejudice, irrational contempt—for any constituency on campus, the "weather" for thinking, discussion and learning will be inclement. The climate is already unhealthy. It has to improve.

JB: Let's talk specifically about The Men's Center at Wagner College in Staten Island, New York. What is your role there, how many members belong, and what have been your successes/challenges?

MG: The Men's Center at Wagner College, which for two years has been supported by an alumnus of the college and his wife, is in its fourth year. We were one of the pilot programs reported on in Engaging College Men. We have been able to offer a retreat nearly every semester for 8-10 of the men. The group has averaged about a dozen men each year. This is encouraging, since the meetings are held in the evenings and students are busy after dark.

For the most part, most faculty on campus have ignored the Center and the group. I have been fortunate that our President has supported the initiative from the start and we get excellent coverage by our public relations officer. This year we brought to campus the cast of The Human Experience, a documentary about several young men who discovered their own peace by traveling around the world witnessing the suffering of others and learning what they can do to alleviate it. We also brought back a former member of the group who had gone on to serve in the Peace Corps in Kazakhstan. A fair number of the group have gone on to graduate study—one in Philosophy, another in Clinical Psychology. Another is in Public Service. Interestingly, there is no formally organized women's group on campus. I understand there have been several informal groups, though.

For the most part, the reaction of most has been to ignore us. My role is as facilitator and mentor. I do not attend meetings, though I advise the group facilitator, who coordinates meetings and arranges retreats. I gained the support of the President at the outset, as I mentioned, but we are not a "club" on campus. This has meant we do not need to strain any budgets and we retain our autonomy. I report on the group on Facebook, where we are called "Sodality."

Each year I recruit some new members who are my students. My office serves as the space for the Men's Center. This year's student facilitator is using his experience to meet a requirement of his Senior Learning Community, a feature of the curriculum that Wagner is well-known for nationally. I like to think I model a certain outlook that aspires to harmonize relations between young men and women of college age.

It is certainly not a good environment that tacitly or overtly excludes or marginalizes a part of its community.

JB: How do you respond to those who argue that any one-sex exclusive club/center—be it for women or men—shouldn't exist and is sexist in nature? Of course we see this argument much more in opposition to groups exclusive to men than to those exclusive to women, but some individuals are opposed to both. Your response?

MG: The very word sexism (see the Oxford English Dictionary) is problematic. In modern usage, it has always referred to discrimination against women. We forget that there is discrimination against men, for example, in conscription. All societies have relied on sexism to make them work. It is only when the discrimination does harm to one of the sexes that it is not in the interests of society and is prejudicial against individuals in a group. This may sound odd—that sexism is necessary. We must discriminate in favor of one sex or the other in certain matters in order that society will work. As for the standard view of sexism—discrimination against a group, women or men—and homosocial organizations (YMCA, YWCA, fraternities and sororities, fraternal orders, monastic orders and so on), there has always been an inclination on the part of men to enjoy doing certain things with other men only, and so also for women.

There are good reasons for the effectiveness of such organizations, including reduced sexual tension. Our group "Sodality" takes its name from an old word that means brotherhood. In certain settings, brotherhood and sisterhood can be very comforting. If I am man, there are things only another man can appreciate—about my body, for example. So, too, for women in groups. These groups are not primarily about empowerment (which I think has been the view of feminist organizations, however), but rather about a sense of common experience, understanding that does not require a lot of explanation, and acceptance based on shared features.

Males and females have deep-running differences. I know this is not the currently common view of social constructivists, but it is a view that can be defended with success, and it is a view of ourselves that can be taken seriously. So, in the best sense, sexist groups are essential to society. This is especially important at another level for young males and young females who are trying to understand who they are and what is expected of them in society.

For those who say none of the old expectations are valid, I would respond by asking for a reality check on how well we are doing in a time when the family is disintegrating as an institution, fathers are regularly excluded from the lives of their children (the divorce rate is about 50% and divorces are for the most part initiated by the female spouse, who gains "custody" of the children), and most men are seen as disposable and a bad joke.

JB: What is your long-term goal with respect to your research on this matter?

MG: I would like to see the establishment of a men's study group on every college and university campus in the United States, Canada, the UK, Europe, Australia, New Zealand and South America. You might be surprised to know I have had interest in such groups shown by individuals in Iran, the Republic of Georgia, and Bulgaria. This is a worldwide phenomenon in a global village. For most men it is going to be a challenge to speak out about their experience. It is also going to take the courage of women who like boys and men—mothers, men's partners, sisters, daughters—to speak out about what is good about males. I know that college and university senior administrators are very aware of the importance of this issue and want to see a stop to the hemorrhaging of young men from the body of the their campus community. This will be good for girls and boys, women and men.

And what a waste of energy on the part of so many on campuses to be invested in hate of any sort. Better than that is mutual support and cooperation among females and males.

Miles Groth, PhD, is a full professor in the Department of Psychology at Wagner College, Staten Island, New York. He chaired his department for six years and for seven years directed the college's Honors Program. Dr. Groth studied at Franklin and Marshall College, Duquesne University and Fordham University, where he completed his PhD. He trained as a psychoanalyst in New York and has been in private practice since 1977. Dr. Groth is the author of three books and co-editor of another volume, chapters in nine books, twenty-five articles and forty-eight book reviews in twenty different peer-reviewed journals. He has contributed occasional pieces to newsletters and newspapers, entries in two encyclopedias, and has served as a consultant for publications and international policy-making organizations on boys' and men's health. He edited two journals, International Journal of Men's Health and Thymos: Journal of Boyhood Studies, which he founded. He co-founded the website www.boyhoodstudies.com. Dr. Groth has lectured residents in psychiatry on integrating psychodynamic psychotherapy with traditional inpatient treatment. He has written invited papers for presentation in Australia, Canada, England, Italy, Hungary and Lithuania, as well as at ten colleges and universities in the United States. He is founding editor of New Male Studies: An International Journal. His current areas of scholarly interest are the psychology of boys and men, existential psychotherapy, and continental philosophy. He resides in New York and may be reached at mgphd@rcn.com.*

Editorial note: You can find more about Jedediah at Jedediah Bila.com.

Fun Conversation with Dean Esmay and Karen Straughan

AVfM Video Source · 4 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This was made back in September ’13 but we never got around to posting it on AVfM. It was just a little talk after the Men & Boys In Crisis rally in late September. A meandering conversation some people seemed to enjoy.

Film by Shawn Sutherland.

By the way are you subscribed to the AVfM channel?

Feminist Rape Culture, Adèle Mercier Statuatory Edition @queensjournal

AVfM Video Source · 4 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It appears that Professor Adèle Mercier is definitely someone who marginalizes and minimizes male victims of female predators. In addition to comments she apparently made just a few days ago online, in a recently-published letter she continues her denial of the reality of female predators.

AVfM assistant managing editor and Men's Human Rights Activist Alison Tieman has some choice words for Professor Mercier and her ilk.

Transcript of this video can be found on Genderratic.

Oh, and you should definitely subscribe to Alison's channel.

The Everyday Sexism Project: key element in “fourth wave” feminism

Mike Buchanan · 4 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My eternal thanks to a longstanding supporter and donor to the party, Cathy, for alerting me to a book which was published on 8 December 2013, my 56th birthday – Kira Cochrane’s All the Rebel Women: The rise of the fourth wave of feminism (Guardian shorts).

The Kindle edition is the equivalent of just 71 pages – it was clearly judged prudent not to exhaust the brains of fledgling feminists – and very reasonably priced at £1.99, about a third of the price of my own Feminism: the ugly truth. Its sales put it at #2 in the ‘Feminist Criticism’ category, well ahead of my book, it has to be said. The book’s full Product Description on Amazon:

> On a bright day at the Epsom Derby, 4 June 1913, Emily Wilding Davison was hit by the king’s horse in one of the defining moments of the fight for women’s suffrage – what became known as feminism’s first wave.
>
> The second wave arose in the late-1960s, activists campaigning tirelessly for women’s liberation, organising around a wildly ambitious slate of issues – a struggle their daughters continued in the third wave that blossomed in the early-1990s.
>
> Now, a hundred years on from the campaign for the vote, fifty years since the very first murmurs of the second wave movement, a new tide of feminist voices is rising. Scattered across the world, campaigning online as well as marching in the streets, women are making themselves heard in irresistible fashion.
>
> They’re demonstrating against media sexism, domestic violence and sexual assault, fighting for equal pay, affordable childcare and abortion rights. Thousands are sharing their experiences through the Everyday Sexism project, marching in Slutwalk protests, joining demonstrations in the wake of the Delhi gang rape, challenging misogynist behaviour and language, online crusaders and ordinary people organising for the freedom of women everywhere.
>
> Kira Cochrane’s ‘All the Rebel Women’ is an irrepressible exploration of today’s feminist landscape, asking how far we have come over the past century – and how far there still is to go. Whether engaging with leading feminists, describing the fight against rape culture or bringing immediate, powerful life to vital theories such as intersectionality, ‘All the Rebel Women’ binds everything together into one unstoppable idea. This is modern feminism. This is the fourth wave.

So Laura Bates’s Everyday Sexism Project is a key element in the fourth wave of feminism. Wow. That’s why this book is the best birthday present I’ve ever received, even if I only found about it some months after my birthday. We usually refer to Ms Bates’s mission in life as The Everyday Whining Project. It inspired us to launch The Alternative Sexism Project where men have left stories explaining how sexism affects men a damned site more than it does women, often leading to men’s early deaths. What is the state’s relentless disadvantaging of men and boys, and relentless advantaging of women and girls, if not sexism in action? The male/female suicide rate differential in the UK rose steadily from 1.9:1 (in 1981) to 3.5:1 in 2011. I can’t think of a better litmus test for how society treats men and women.

Laura Bates’s project also inspired us to launch The Whine Club.

Laura Bates deservingly won the inaugural Whiny Woman of the Month award, which gave her automatic membership of the club. Her award certificate can be downloaded right here.

There are now quite a number of women in the club, and they can only leave if they make a public commitment to stop whining. Surprisingly none have, to date. Here’s a list of the current members.

At J4MB we fondly think of Laura Bates as the gift that keeps on giving.

Male-friendly song(I): Parazitii – Goana dupa iluzii

AVfM Video Source · 5 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Male-friendly song is a project that purports to bring one non-English song per week with a red-pill message. Today we bring a song from the 20-year old Romanian hip-hop band, Paraziții (The Parasites) alongside with the translation of the powerful lyrics.

Parazitii – Goana După Iluzii
(The Parasites – The Rush after Ilusions)

Homeless man talking:

I was 22 years old when I got married. I made a mistake. I married an older woman who had three children of her own from a pervious relationship. Anyway, I got married, then later on I got divorced. The I started to pay child support, judiciary expenses and other bills. I eventually lost my house – in which I had a mental breakdown at the time. Back in those days I was working at the maintenance department in the Colentina trams depot. After the mental breakdown I was taken to the hospital and I was admitted and stayed in the hospital around 3 months in the recovery facility of the Bălăceanca Psychiatry Hospital. After that, I kept on working as much as I could and just when I got back enough on my feet financially to afford to rent a room for myself, I got fired!

Cheloo:
Your woman is a stranger who fucks at work;
You no longer fuck her, you don't have the time, you're tired and she's not a rock.
You still theoretically love each other – heck, easy to say!
But all that's left is the habitude and the shadow of a reverie.
You get a vacation for 10 days in 3 years – it's all for the money
And a common future created for the American company.
You give your life for the company
– get a bonus once in two months
You're the best and if you cave in We'll admit you to the insane![1]
Three phones at once are ringing,
How bad! But you know you're just in the beginning!
You hate the subway, get a leasing, pay the rent,
You live in the suburbs and think you're happy for not living in a tent!
You have air conditioning and a LCD in your restroom,
But it's a holiday when a cold beer and vodka awaits you home.
The banks are watching, pay up! It's an insensible System! We need to be bounded for the long run – it's incredible!

Homeless man: At this point, I live on the streets or wherever I can. I'm begging, because I'm hungry, I'm thirsty and so on and I have no choice. But I don't steal – I don't believe in taking stuff from people by force. If they want to give me something, that's great, if not… well,… life's tough.

Cheloo:
We drive with the legal speed,
We take our kids to school,
We have a fog on our eyes,
And an empty spirit.
We're being treacherously lured into a lethal
Trap, we're eager to climb up on an unreal

Social ladder. Time is money and only with money it awaits,
When you start climbing down, you'll shockingly see it lacks stairs.
With your back against the wall and an insufficient credit,
You get wings of wax enough to fly out of the flat!
It's indecent not to have an address in your ID, and this is how
The cops start running after you to beat ya!
The State wants to know if you're well wrapped,
When you get to sleep in the park with 3 jackets covered.
Your fortune is a few small bags,
The nights are long
When you're hungry
But you're allowed to tremble free as the birds
Covered in cartons.
You no longer have a name, you don't need it!
You've become invisible,
You're a creepy homeless and a creep everyone calls ya,
It's incredible!

Homeless man: It's very hard to live on the streets and not having a place to stay and from that position to want to do something for yourself – yet you don't have the financial possibility, first of all for the papers, for food, for personal hygiene – you need money for all of these.

Ombladon:
We have luxurious mansions near filthy blocks,
Top class cars stopped next to wagons on the stop[2].
We have discos next to churches and cops filch
4 grades mayors who can't even hold a speech[3].
In the Parliament there's theft, sleep and millions are produced,
Down in the street there's theft, sleep and hunger is induced.
The State takes you down, the State also lifts you up,
The State gets you down on your knees (then it lifts you up again?)
Nope! It makes you give it a blowjob!
We break the criminal code, of course,
For we're many raised to create rumpus.
We have sunny days, we watch them from the window,
It's not enough to be sunny
If you don't have enough money
To enjoy the days in the shadow!
We throw ourselves in the life like we're blind and chubby,
When children appear one no longer affords having a hobby!
With smiles on the face, with thoughts
And foams!
That's how we live in Romania, with bads and goods!

Homeless man: A man living on the streets always thinks: I must struggle, I have to go there, behind the block or whatever the place where I'm staying is. Then I have to be fearful for either the police can come and hurt me or someone else who doesn't like me. At one point, the idea of going to work emerges: But how? I need to be clean and fed in order to work. How will I maintain my job if I hadn't got any rest in the previous night since I had no place to stay? It's incredibly hard to maintain a job if you have no place to live.
The thing is that there are quite a few people who want to work and make something with their lives but they can't do it now unless they're a little bit helped.

References

[1] “Being admitted to the insane” = (Romanian expression) being forcibly placed in a psychiatric facility
[2] stopped on the stop = (eastern European jargon – existent in other languages as well) Stopped on the red light (stop = traffic light, semaphore)
[3] The literal translation of this verse is “Mayors who only graduated the first 4 grades and can’t even speak Romanian properly”. Graduating only 4 grades is considered to be de facto illiterate by Romanian standards and an elected official not being able to speak the Romanian language properly is held to high ridicule in a constant manner. At the moment this song was written (2007) the number of illiterate mayors was much higher than it is today and this fact was considered a national shame.

#cancelcolbert – Yes They Really Are Stoooopid

AVfM Video Source · 6 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You’re wrong because penis! And color! No really!

You can’t make this stuff up.

You should subscribe to Thunderf00t if you haven’t already.

A Friendly Note from Adèle Mercier

Paul Elam · 6 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following was just received in my inbox. It appears to be from feminist and alleged professor, rape apologist and victim blamer Adèle Mercier of Queen's University Department of Philosophy.

> Adele Mercier adele.mercier@xxxxx.com 7:12 PM (8 minutes ago)
>
> to editors, jac
>
> Dear editors of A Voice for Men,
>
> I am giving you twenty-four hours to remove from the internet all libellous representations of me as a "rape apologist," a "victim blamer," a "pedophile" and other such falsehood and innuendo that your site has irresponsibly allowed to be published.
>
> Please acknowledge receipt of this message immediately.
>
> Adèle Mercier
> Dept of Philosophy, Queen's University, Kingston, CANADA K7L 3N6
>
> LOGOS – Logic, Language & Cognition Research Group
>
> Departament de Lògica, Història de la Ciència, Universitat de Barcelona, SPAIN
>
> Justice will only exist where those not affected by injustice > are filled with the same amount of indignation as those offended.
>
>
> –attributed to Plato

Well, indeed that deserves a response, and that right quick!. Given Mercier's socio-sexual political orientation, she does not seem acquainted with the concept of free speech, nor the dim view we take down this way toward abridging the right of human beings to express their opinions in an arena where ideas are free to be challenged.

She now thinks she can bully me/us into removing said opinions, guaranteed protection by the Constitution of the United States, with stiff legal provisions now in place for those who frivolously seek to use charges of libel as a way to silence those who oppose their views.

Sorry, Adele, you need my enthusiastic consent for something like that to happen, and you just don't have it.

Even if I were inclined to give your demands consideration, which I am not, I am afraid you have been little help in helping me help you. One, you cite nothing specific. It is as though you want me to scour this site for all statements that may be about you and determine whether you think they are libelous, as though I am in your head and not my own.

While it may not seem unusual to you to have a man read your mind and anticipate your needs/desires, I am afraid it is out of the sphere of my experience and personal interest. If there is a problem, point to it, like where it actually is, and I will look at it again with all the fervor I expect you deserve.

I am also forced to inform you that several comments made under your name on the internet, something easily verifiable in the process of normal discovery, have contained statements very much consistent with the idea of your being a victim blaming rape and pedophilia apologist.

Do you now deny that these statements were yours? A simple, direct and honest answer, even in the comments to this post, will do.

See, here is the deal, and I mean this in the most collegial way. I knew someone with a problem similar to yours once in my life. He was a really nice fellow, who people had taken to calling “Stinky” for a nickname. That name hurt his feelings, much as yours appear to be hurting now.

Admittedly, part of the problem was that despite his good nature and gentle ways, he was not very active in the personal hygiene department. In other words, he stank. Ergo, “Stinky”

With some encouragement he took measures, namely bathing, to address his body odor issues, and before long people started calling him by his real name again.

It was like magic.

By actually doing things that prevented giving people the impression he was odiferous, it had a marked impact on how he was perceived.

I suggest that you, too, may be able to benefit from this same personal life strategy.

If you are saying repugnant, misguided and bigoted things in public, there will be negative reactions, mainly from people with a distaste for repugnant, misguided and bigoted thinking.

Hate is like body odor. Stinky is usually the last person to notice the problem.

As to your ultimatum, sorry, things like that (and feminism) have been failing to impress me for a long, long time. I suggest you take a look though the history of this site. You might want to ask yourself if there is anything, and I do mean anything here that suggests to you that a snotty, officious email from an overly entitled child of privilege is going to make us do anything.

Kind regards,

Paul Elam, publisher, A Voice for Men

ADDENDUM

Mercier’s comments presented and addressed in AVFM article.

Mercier has apparently made a successful push to have all her comments and responses to it removed from Queen’s Journal. I just don’t think she gets it. The internet is forever, cupcake.

The GREAT RAPIST FIASCO of a Brazilian president #rapeculture

Aldir Gracindo · 6 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There are three kinds of lies: Lies, damned lies and statistics.

Mark Twain

This is election year in Brazil. The incumbent President, Dilma Roussef of the Worker's Party, used the taxpayers' money to sponsor the greatest feminist false statistic about "rape culture" so far. It shook the world. And then it all went so wrong.

Dilma is a feminist, no doubt. Of the worst kind. I could mention three examples to illustrate that [1] But those are just our president's moral failures, and they seem to be widespread, cultural. Recently, however, Rousseff fell 7 points on the polls. Different factors may have caused that [2]. But yet, the President was ahead of the other possible future candidates. And then it happened.

IPEA (the Brazilian federal government's "institute for Applied Economic Researches") published an astonishing report on "Tolerance to violence against women" in Brazil. National and international newspaper announced with awe:

> 65% of Brazilians believe that women with clothes that show their bodies deserve to be attacked.

Well, in the reader's imagination and for the media, "attack" went to "rape" very easily. There it was, the Brazilian "rape culture" brought to light! It made the headlines in every national newspaper, and international too. BBC Network, the Washington Post, El País in Spain, in Denmark, Turkey, and more — this is what the world heard: how Brazil was a country of rapists.

The journalist feminists in every Brazilian newspapers were talking about how how malignant Brazilian males were. That, regardless of the blatant methodological errors in IPEA's research.

The "specialists" started giving interviews, about how men see women as property, using women is a right, she is not a human being, she exists to serve; our society reinforces male supremacy. "Reality is much worst then what was said. Women are guilty of being women", stated another great "specialist," anthropologist Miriam Goldenberg, researcher of the "feminine universe" for 25 years.

One of the biggest broadcast networks in the world, Globo, featured the news. It even was inserted in their evening soap opera (they're very popular in Brazil, called "novelas"): "That's early stages of humanity!", said the character.

On twitter, the President took all the political advantage of being a feminist president fighting our "machista" culture.

The Minister of the Secretary of Policies for Women, Eleonora Menicucci, stressed how "regrettable" the results of the studies were, and that it was needed to do much more to tackle violence against women, especially campaigns. They really believe that the fight against violence is just for one part of the population–the female part. The former Minister was bothered that some judges were "inadequately" applying "Lei Maria da Penha" (the Brazilian domestic violence/violence against women law) to protect male victims.

A feminist journalist, Nana Queiroz, took a picture topless, with an inscription in her arms, starting the campaign "I don't deserve to be raped". The next day she said she was very scared for receiving multiple rape threats. The Federal Police got involved, and the President herself publicly showed solidarity to Nana.

But in a first search to the supposed "rapists," a bunch of teenaged internet trolls was found. As one of my friends said, "they no doubt would rape their own hands."

The many, even though a minority, who dared to contest the research were "raped" (I mean, verbally attacked), no matter if we were professionals in the field, common people, or men's rights activists such as myself.

Some obvious things about us seemed to be forgotten with the great media factoid of "most Brazilians support raping women who dress provocatively." For one, Brazil is the last country in the world where we would be intolerant to women's bodies being shown. We are the country of carnaval, of the "Girl from Ipanema," of the smallest bikinis worldwide and the bikini wax, of the Globeleza. Women in Brazil work with shoulders, knees, cleavage and legs showing. We are a tropical country. Every weekend, a multitude of micro-shorts and long heels invade all spaces, as in any western warm country. The very uproar and indignancy in the popular reaction should be another clue about how wrong is to presume that Brazilian culture is a "rape culture." If people normally thought that way in Brazil, why the commotion, instead of just defend that lie, "yes, of course they deserve?" That would mean virtually every woman in Brazil, of course, because Brazilian women use short clothes and show their bodies. The same paradox always: the success of feminist hoaxes would never happen if men's sexuality was not enormously protective of women, rather than rape-inclined.

Part of the report itself was just considered non-important by the feminist "specialists" and the mainstream media::

91,4% agreed that the man who beats his wife must go to jail;

82,1% disagreed that the woman who is beaten in her home must be quiet about it, for her children's sake;

68,1% agreed that it is violence to tell lies about a woman to others;

89,2% disagreed that men can curse or yell at his own wife.

Even with this ignored, there were other problems: methodology flaws.

The research was made through a series of statements. They interviewed 3,810 people, and asked if they agreed or disagreed with a statement. The word "rape" was never mentioned, which might remind you of other statistical hoaxes on the topic.

About the most famous statement:

"Women with clothes that show their bodies deserve to be attacked." – 65% of the interviewed agreed with that statement.

Well, "deserve" and "attack" in Brazilian Portuguese are polysemic words.

To "Deserve", can mean (1) "be worthy of, (2) "entitled to", (3) "incur", (4), "to earn" and (5) "draw upon oneself and (6) "become worthy of." Well, there is the popular myth that women in sexy clothes draw attention not only of men, but sexual criminals. Statistically, that is inaccurate and doesn't help to prevent sexual assaults. And feminist activists don't help either, because they rather do what they always do and propagate prejudice, conflating men with rapists: "Teach men not to rape, not women to fear." This is how these ideologues and activists (don't) help people to prevent rape.

To "attack," in Brazil, also has different meanings: (1) aggress, (2) criticize, (3) chastise, reprehend, (4) Hit on, flirt with, and (5) throw, shoot.

So the question is so open to personal interpretation as to make it meaningless!

Another statement to make the headlines was:

"If women knew how to behave, there would be less rapes." – 58% of the interviewed with that.

That surely sounds evil. And it's also our prejudice that makes it so, because "behavior" can mean to be moral or immoral–but in Brazil, the word also means "procedure." If people had knowledge about how to proceed to prevent robbery, would there be less robbery? If people knew how to proceed on the street, would that reduce the number of car accidents, or people being run over? Would you say you agree with those statements? So the same statement could mean a violent, misogynist mentality… or simple logic and humanitarian concern.

It was a trick question, in other words.

That was not the only problem with the research "proving" Brazil's misogynist culture. This is important to stress: 66.5% of the interviewed were women!

Additionally, the interview was made with people available at home, during the week and during business hours. The average income per capita, per home, was approximately the minimum wage (R$ 531,26); 41.5% were under primary level; 22.3% had finished primary; 30.8% had high school level; and only 5.4% were in college. As the report says, the most educated were less likely to agree with the ambiguous statement. To the "experts in gender," that meant that higher education reduces "machismo." Well, perhaps higher education reduces the possibility to be tricked by polysemy in the ideological questionnaire instead, and "machismo" might have nothing to do with it at all.

Other interesting statements and how they brought the "specialists" to curious conclusions:

"Dirty clothes should be washed at home." – 89% agreed.

That's a popular saying in Brazil. The English version of it is basically, "don't air your dirty laundry in public." To the gender ideologues, that means that people think domestic violence against women shouldn't be reported to the authorities. That is more then biased, because people tend to agree with general popular sayings. For instance, how many people could you find who would agree that "A leopard cannot change its spots," "Better safe than sorry," or "The apple never falls far from the tree?" They must be misogynists too!

"Every woman dreams of getting married." – 50.9% agree totally, 27.8 agree only partially.

Well if people agree with that, they might just have all women they know loving to see bride dresses in magazines. According to the "gender specialists", however, here's what it means:

> (…) almost 79% of the population has a very stereotyped notion about women's life ideals. Believing that every women has as life project getting married and build a family is compatible with the idea that women can only find plenitude in a stable relationship with a man or yet, that she depends on a partner that sustains her, and finally, that she is more maidenlike and has less sexual desires, not aiming, therefore, the life of a single woman or many partners. (Page 6)

The whole document, actually, is a radical feminism manifesto.

This is how billions in public money is spent on "gender issues" worldwide. In Brazil, to produce this tripe, our Dilma removed the former board of IPEA, replacing them with loyal party members. That's how the Institute for Economic research started producing ideological feminist statistics instead of real economic statistics.

For this specific study, the "Presidenta" (she eliminated the neutral form of the title and made all official documents have a feminine gender for "President") put IPEA at the disposition of (1) the international feminist lobbying organization, UN WOMEN, and (2) the biggest feminist lobbying organization in Brazil, CFEMEA. This is how the Brazilian "rape culture" study was made.

But I have saved the best for last.

Yesterday IPEA published a note. The most sensationalist "finding," those "65%" of Brazilian rape apologists, was an error. A big, gross, amazing error: They had shifted the percentages with that of another item in the research. Actually, only 13.2% of the interviewed "totally agreed", while 12.8% only "partially agreed."

Perhaps that was caused by the hurry to publish the results? The director of the research immediately resigned.

Now, show me a feminist fiasco bigger than the Brazilian "rape culture" scandal, if you can. Until then, just look on in amazement at this example of feminist lies and duplicity.

Have a great Sunday, a great week,

Hugs from Brazil,

Aldir.

References:

[1] Every year, during International Women's Day, she makes a pronunciation that includes the issue of "men's violence against women," i.e. typical gender feminist propaganda. Women's oppression, and violence as having only one direction: men against women.

[1.1] Last year, on IWD, she announced social measures to reduce the price of food for poor families, because, you know, family is women and women are family.

[1.2] This year, same date, she went one step further, by complimenting all Brazilians and then saying that from that moment on the conversation would be between her and Brazilian women; yes, only women.

[1.3.] She also decided that in case of divorce, the houses in government home financing for poor families would go to the woman (unless the father would be the one the keeps the children… meaning, practically, whenever the ex-wife wants). No matter that the overwhelming majority of the homeless in Brazil are men (82%). And curiously, most of them are just "on strike." Or to be more accurate, they have given up on everything because they built their families and lives around a partner and the relationship ended badly. I don't know about you, but I've always wondered what would make a functional, normal man just stop fighting and go to sleep in a catwalk. Do you? Well, there you have it: most of them just didn't learn how to go their own way sooner, wealthier and mentally healthier.

[2] The constructions for the FIFA World Cup are delayed. She spent hundreds of millions of US Dollars in Cuba's infrastructure, is blind to Maduro's State violence in Venezuela and there are evidences indicating corruption, lately in the Petrobras's scandal. But the social policies grants a good voting basis of the poor people for the Worker's Party.

[3] One of the critiques published about the methodology:
http://exame.abril.com.br/brasil/noticias/pesquisa-dos-65-aquela-do-ipea-sobre-estupro-e-contesta?page=2

Fighting Wikipedia Corruption: AVfM Partnership with WikiMANNia

Dean Esmay · 6 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A few days ago I talked about the ongoing censorship of men's rights issues and feminist distortion of information in Wikipedia. This was the bad news.

The good news is, an industrious group of dedicated German Men's Rights Activists have, unnoticed outside the German-speaking world, spent the past five years building their own competing wiki known as WikiMANNia.

WikiMANNia ("mann" is German for "adult human male") is dedicated to men's issues and critique of gender feminist indoctrination and gynocentric ideology. Since 2009 they have consistently produced high-quality, feminist-ideology-free information on men's and boys' issues with great success in Germany. WikiMANNia articles on important topics frequently feature very near the top of German search engine results.

For some, the deliberate exclusion of a feminist view from articles addressing other subjects might be seen as an anti-woman bias within the WikiMANNia project. Such an impression is mistaken, although understandable from individuals living in a feminist-dominated culture. To be clear, although feminism purports to be either pro-woman or pro-equality, it is an ideology, almost a religion, carrying a set of assumptions which when applied to writing on almost any topic perverts the meaning of such writing.

On October, 30 2010 an International Anti-Feminism Meeting took place in Switzerland. This led, in 2011, to the editiorial team of WikiMANNia launching basic versions of WikiMANNia in English, Spanish, and Italian. Unfortunately the "International" aspect of the meeting was limited to the three German-speaking countries of Switzerland, Austria and Germany. So unfortunately no contact with the English-speaking Men's Rights Movement took place, and contact with those in other non-German languages was limited, much to the WikiMANNia team's frustration.

Some articles where translated into English in rudimentary fashion. But this attracted little attention in the English-speaking world. The frustration of the German group was, until now, to find people who would allow them to fully enter into the English-speaking world.

We now hope to see that change. After months of talks with the management of WikiMANNia, I have the honor of announcing that AVfM has entered into partnership with WikiMANNia. German WikiMANNa will greatly benefit from an English version and AVfM will benefit from the offerings of this terrific German team.

We strongly encourage anyone reading this with a general interest in the Men's Rights Movement globally to sign up for a WikiMANNIA account, and begin helping to improve it.

The German team will keep control of WikiMANNia, but we hope to build an independent English-speaking editorial group with its own focus within WikiMANNia. And we hope you will help!

Most German Men's Rights Activists have limited skills in English. Thus one of the first things needed is someone to clean up the grammar and syntax in many of the English-language articles already there. Even if you speak no German, it doesn't matter. If you can take the somewhat clumsy English and make it stronger, that's all you need to do. You can also add new articles and information, and possibly others will work to translate those to German as well.

Do you speak both German and English? Then perhaps you can contribute to both German and English articles. Also, do you speak Italian or Spanish? Then perhaps you can help with the Italian or Spanish articles, which the German group is also very interested in expanding!

Because of Wikipedia McCarthyism, we want to see WikiMANNia grow, just as we want to see the Men's Human Rights Movement grow internationally, with people of all nations able to take part and cooperate.

On AVfM's front page menus, you will notice there are now two items under "Wiki" – the AVfM Reference Wiki

(which is purely for academic references), and WikiMANNia, which is for anything and everything else. We encourage all members of the Men's Rights Community to contribute to these projects. If you have purely academic, hard-science references, great, the AVfM Reference Wiki is narrowly focused on that one thing: academic references, please sign up to help with that. Whereas if you want to help with more generalized topics–Men's Rights Movement figures, history, debates within the community, etc. WikiMANNia is perfect for that.

We see this as not just a great way to expand the reach and scope of the Men's Human Rights Movement, but also furthering the goal of making our movement truly global, with men's advocates gaining knowledge and insight and strategies and even terminology from those of other nations.

For example, I have a new favorite new term I've learned from the Germans: Purple Poodle!

So please, go now and sign up for WikiMANNia, and help spread the Men's Human Rights Movement globally.

Finally, while ordinarily, this notice might close with an imperative to go forth and FTSU, what we're really doing here is the opposite.

The creation and expansion of a reference explicitly excluding gendered ideologies is the un-doing of vandalism and censorship in other sources. So, meine Herren und Damen, go forth and help restore un-corrupted knowledge to the world!

Challenge to Women: Spread this meme!

Hannah Wallen · 6 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Since they first noticed the men's human rights movement, feminists have scrambled trying to stifle it with ridicule, shaming, attacks on its validity, and much territorial pissing on the concept of gender issues from a male perspective. They've dedicated whole blogs and internet discussion forums to strawmanning and then bashing the movement, i.e. a movement that exists only in their imaginations rather than the actual movement that we're part of. There have even been hit-pieces done on us by mainstream media sources, often ignoring most of what we actually say.

They've attempted to silence the movement by belittling men's issues and calling it a "backlash against feminism." Not a rational response and objection and an effort to talk about things outside the feminist narrative. No, just a "backlash." They've attacked serious men's issues discussion with accusations of "misogyny." They've tried to marginalize the movement with women-first arguments, trying to make every issue about women's problems first and foremost. They've tried absorbing the movement with claims that feminism's often anti-male rhetoric is a way of handling men's issues. They've tried pushing the movement aside with ridicule and the promotion of false stereotypes.

What they haven't done is explain why they're so vehemently opposed to a society in which men's human rights receive recognition and consideration equal to that afforded to women's human rights.

So I have a question for them, one that is fairly simple, and should be easy to answer:

What is feminism's criteria for determining whether a human being merits having one's human rights recognized and considered by society? If being human isn't enough, what other requirement do they have?

Inspired by a challenge from John Gormley of Men's Human Rights Ireland, I've posed that question, in a similar style to the "I need feminism" meme. This is the image:

I'd like to see two things about this become things that opponents of the MHRM can't ignore: the question itself, and the contradiction women in the movement represent to the stereotype of MHRAs that opponents of the movement have pushed, that we're supposedly "anti-woman" and "misogynist."

The first speaks for itself; the second is why I'm specifically asking women to do this. Feminist critics of the men's human rights movement, who claim that it's men who marginalize women, men who silence women's voices, men who refuse women the right to make our own decisions–they would rather pretend we don't exist than admit that we just don't agree with them. They don't want to acknowledge the validity and importance of men's approaches to men's issues outside the bounds of feminist ideology. They sure as hell don't want to acknowledge that there are women involved in that. So they just don't.

I don't think we ought to take that laying down, especially not from a group that has made exploiting the belief that "women are marginalized" its method of operation.

It's time we stop tolerating the bullshit.

It's time for us to get right in our opposition's faces with a demand for an explanation of their attacks on men's human rights activism.

I'm asking other female men's human rights activists to post the same message to whatever media you regularly use, whether it's Facebook, Twitter, Tumblr, or even just in a comment in answer to this article.

"I support men's rights because men are human. What other reason do you need?"

It's time to demand answers.

Men's Rights Cross Canada Campaign: April 4-8, 2014

Dean Esmay · 6 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Starting this weekend at least nine Canadian cities, including Halifax, Hamilton, Burlington, Toronto, Windsor, Saskatoon, Vancouver, Calgary, Ottawa, and possibly others will be experiencing a nationwide postering campaign carrying an anti-Misandrist message, and holding up a mirror to society's double-standards in law and social attitudes about men vs. women. Posters will be appearing all over Canada, placed by volunteers acting on their own initiative under a simple premise: If not us, who? If not now, when?

The posters are a parody of the hateful, misandrist international campaign to ask men to stop violence against women – never mind that men are the majority of victims of violence and never mind that when it comes to Domestic Violence all the available science shows that women are as violent if not more violent than men are. Nevertheless, self-hating men and man-hating women have joined in an international campaign to demand that men take responsibility for violence, and violence against women only. By doing so these bigots demonize the male half of the human race and infantalize the female half.

Although these posters are a parody, they also carry a serious message, for the problems they point to are real. So a simple question comes: is what's good for the gander also for the goose? If we're going to hold all men responsible for terrible things done by some men, are we going to hold all women responsible for the terrible things done by some women? And should the law treat everybody the same or are some people "equal-er" than others? And if these posters are somehow tasteless and obscene, why aren't the "Don't be THAT guy" posters not also tasteless and obscene?

Participating organizations across Canada this weekend include Men's Rights Edmonton, Men's Rights Calgary, Men's Rights Halifax, Community Organized Compassion and Kindness, Men's Rights Saskatoon, and others.

The following is a sample image of the posters that will be in use:

[image]

We're proud to say the particular dumpster image in use in many of these posters first appeared in the A Voice for Men Meme group on Facebook, and was inspired by many of the similar posters we encourage people to use on our poster page. A Voice for Men fully supports this effort by our brothers and sisters in Canada. We encourage everyone to use posters like this in peaceful, lawful manner. Everyone who wants to participate in confronting misandry should do so.

Indeed, while we especially commend Canadian men's activists, we hope to see this message spread across the United States and around the world, wherever misandrist messages about "toxic" or "hegemonic" masculinity and "patriarchy" are bandied about by hateful gender ideologues, and wherever you see a message telling you that men should stop violence against women instead of telling people to stop violence against each other.

So by the way, while this is a coordinated Canadian effort this weekend, if you're outside Canada there's no reason you can't go forth and do the same right now in solidarity–wherever you are!

Go forth and FTSU people. Today, Canada. Tomorrow, the world!

Editorial Update: Reports and photos and videos are coming in to the Men's Rights Canada page. We expect more to come in the next few days as activists get their photos and videos in. Also, word is that they're declaring a Bonus Round for Monday and Tuesdays in some bonus cities!

Adèle Mercier is at it with the threats again

AVfM Video Source · 7 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Well, it Adèle Mercier continues to do her best to emulate Saul Goodman, issuing ultimatums to the completely underwhelmed members of the MHRM.

This time, TB made the cut for Adele's targets who refuse to be targets. Our good friend Alison responds in proper form.

> Dear Alison Tieman,
>
> I am giving you twenty-four hours to remove from the internet all libellous representations of me as a "rape apologist," a "victim blamer," a "pedophile" and other such falsehood and innuendo that your site has irresponsibly allowed to be published or otherwise propagate. That includes your slanderous video on A Voice for Men.
>
> Please acknowledge receipt of this message immediately. Blah, blah, blah. Grrr, Grrr. [OK, I added that last part in. PE]
>
> Adèle Mercier
>
> Dept of Philosophy, Queen's University, Kingston, CANADA K7L 3N6

A poem: Feminists Killed Curt Cobain

AVfM Video Source · 7 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Words as printed on YouTube video here:

> Feminists killed Kurt Cobain
> Men my age are all the same
> They hate themselves & feel ashamed
> For what they are & cannot change
>
> Little heads filled up with lies
> Raised only to apologize
> For thousand-year conspiracies
> In gender-studies histories
>
> Put down at home, drugged up at school
> Helped to sit still & follow rules
> Help follow what their teachers say
> Look, see how well the girls behave
>
> Men chastised, demonized,
> Healthy males pathologized
> A man is just a dirty ape
> Longing, lust, desire: all rape
> Your body is a loaded gun
> And all that it has done is wrong
>
> Girls demands are sacrosanct
> Boys complaints beneath contempt
> A 'good' man knows his sex is bad
> The life of ease that he has had > A good man turns his back on men
> Puts women first in everything
>
> White knights, on their hobbled steeds
> Still cling to laws of chivalry
> Passed over by the queens they save
> A joke to all the other slaves
>
> Ashamed of all their endless wealth,
> Those riches that they've never held,
> The privilege we've never felt
> Only endless shame
> All of us the sons of Cain
> Feminists killed Kurt Cobain.
>
> –
> Feminists killed Kurt Cobain
> Who'd rather die than bear that blame
> That curse he carried from the womb
> Still with him laid out in the tomb

He screamed onstage & pierced his flesh
Put on make-up, wore a dress
Numbed the pain when he could score
Then shot his face across the floor

Feminists killed Kurt Cobain
Men my age are all the same
Generations X & Y
Hate themselves & want to die

Too late for them, too late for me
We've been what we were made to be Can't turn back, can't start again
But then no-one can, I wonder when
The tide will turn, the waves will part
Our lives were laid out from the start

A man today's no easy ride:
Three-fourths of all the suicides
Nine-tenths of all the deaths at work
And more in war, dead in the dirt

Under hateful ideology
Hatred becomes ordinary:
A man in pain should make us glad
A man in pain should make us laugh

Each loss for men, each tragedy
Crowed over like a victory
A victory for who? Are we not one? Are we not family?
Does our thirst not match your need?
If you cut us, don't we bleed?
Don't we grieve, just like you do?
Your loved ones torn away from you?

We used to walk in sunny glades
& share the cup of blessed rain
Warm each other winter nights
Watch children play through summer's light
Work together in the fields
Share the bounty of their yield
Stand together, sacrifice
& not be bought for any price

Now the girls get told get what you can
After all, he's just a man
You're right to think it's right to take
Yes you go girl, you make him pay
The girls get taught they must get on Like work empowered anyone:
To sell your life for dollar bills
Taking calls & stacking shelves
In offices & factories

> Fulfilment sought in drudgery
>
> I'm dreaming of a brighter age
> Where all are loved, where all are praised
> For what they are, what nature made
> Its words are heard & ways obeyed
>
> Where prison rape is not a joke
> To decent, well-raised gentlefolk
> And mutilated genitals
> A horrifying spectacle
> No matter which land they occur
> Regardless if they're his or hers
>
> I'm dreaming, & I dream alone
> This world's insane, as we all know
> I sit & wait, I hope, I pray
> The human race will find its way,
> Again
>
> Feminists killed Kurt Cobain
> Men my age are all the same
> They hate themselves & feel ashamed
> For what they are & cannot change
> Too late for them, too late for me
> I can't say what is going to be
> This age will pass, & all within > & these words too, & me, & him
> Where to next, nobody knows
> The light is dim. But still it glows
>
> (February 20, 1967 — April 5, 1994)

You should subscribe to Laudanum Byron.

A Woman Asks The Everyday Sexism Project: Seriously?

Lana Voreskova · 7 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]I finally bit the bullet and logged on to Everyday Sexism. It is a website set up to allow women to post their stories of the horrific misogyny and sexism which supposedly pervades our societies. The site is being lauded all over the other online feminist echo-chambers as "brave" "revealing" and "visionary". Mostly it's just one after another poster whining about some guy saying something she didn't like or complaining because a man looked at her boobs. I was thinking about instances from my own life which I could post on the site that would compare with some of the entries I read:

I was sitting on the grass reading on the campus of the college where I work last summer. A young guy walked over to me. He noticed the book I was reading was Russian and asked me where I was from. I told him.

"Russian girls are the most beautiful in the world." he said.

"Ha ha." I replied. "And I suppose you say that when you meet a Spanish or Polish girl?"

"Well obviously" he laughed, "but I'm lying when I talk to them."

"You speak English well" he continued. "Are you part Irish?"

"No, I'm 100% Russian."

"So you don't have any Irish in you at all?"

"No" I smiled, knowing the punch-line already.

"Would you like some?" the guy said.

It was a silly conversation that we both knew was going nowhere. Nobody was threatened or offended or violated or any of the things feminists want us to be. It was harmless banter. I didn't take any offence because – well – because I'm a grownup.

So this is a story of sexism and apparent "misogyny" that I could post on Everyday Sexism. The problem is that I don't believe that this man was some sinister sexist woman-hater. He was just joking. That's right feminists – a joke is an alien concept to you I know, but it usually involves someone making fun of someone else but without any intention to harm. The funniest jokes are usually the ones that feminists would call "inappropriate" or "offensive" which is why a day at a feminist seminar is never going to be a barrel of laughs.

Some of the posts on Everyday Sexism are indeed disturbing tales of rape and sexual abuse. Many of them are obviously fictional but I'm sure some of them are true. The overwhelming majority of the posts, however, are simply shrill petulant whines by pathetic insecure people who consider themselves victims because someone once said something they didn't like. One woman claimed to have been left feeling "devastated" because she had overheard a racy joke–and no, I'm honestly not making that up! I am leaving a few examples below which are typical of the entries on Everyday Feminism along with my own thoughts on each one.

Here are some whines of wisdom from a male user called Tim who obviously considers himself to be a thoroughly enlightened individual:

> Some of the men at my place of work met up earlier for drinks before the Christmas party. Topic of discussion when I joined them was 'Who are your top 3?'. Meaning the 3 women in the office you'd like to do.

Oh my! The sheer horror of it. We can feel the righteous, right-on anger boiling from his post. We can only hope that poor Tim got the counseling he needed after that ordeal. I get the impression that Tim is only in his early twenties, so listen up Tim. Here is some free advice from an older woman: Your colleagues were indulging in some harmless banter. In England they call it schoolboy humour. It is sometimes childish but it is completely harmless and natural. Only a chronically insecure prude could possibly find it offensive. Furthermore, you seem to completely underestimate women. You obviously have no idea what kinds of conversations groups of women have about men. I can assure you that they tend to be ten times more "vulgar" and "sexist" than the example you are bleating about here.

Listen carefully Tim. Nothing is less attractive to a woman than a fawning, sycophantic gelding. Do yourself a favour and grow a pair, and stop being such a prissy little baby.

A user called Claire, though, has suffered even more abuse than poor Tim. Claire describes how a male colleague at the next desk asked her to hand him a pen. The pen she handed him was a very large one. When she gave him the pen, he uttered this shocking abomination – "so you like them big, do you?" I am speechless! Poor Claire will probably never be the same again.

Now User ACM makes her bid for victim-of-the-month. "Every time I see a man reading page three" she snivels, "it makes me feel exposed, vulnerable and victimized." Really? "Exposed," "vulnerable" and "victimized?" and all because some guy is looking at a picture of a topless woman? I thought the phrase was, "I am woman hear me roar," not "I'm a woman hear me blubber pathetically about something completely inconsequential."

User Poppy goes for the sympathy vote: "I've only been kissed twice." she says, "and both times it was unexpected and I did not initiate it." Poor Poppy has only been kissed twice. On the face of it there doesn't seem to be any mystery as to why that is. One question for Poppy, though: Would it have been OK if you had initiated it, or would that have meant that you were being oppressive or something?

BrokeGirl chimes in with her harrowing tale of the awful misogyny she experienced in a deli. The guy behind the counter offered her two burritos instead of the one she had ordered. She never expected her refusal to illicit such a terrifyingly misogynist response. The disgusting pig joked, "I understand. Gotta keep that figure."

My heart goes out to this noble victim. BrokeGirl, wherever you are, we salute your bravery in the face of such unspeakable horror!

User "anon" has this shocking tale to tell. Reader discretion is advised:

> A male examiner walks past and starts talking to guys I was with about how they think it went and what careers they want in the future. Never made eye contact with me, spoke to me or acknowledged my existence.

Hmmmm. Just a thought here: Maybe he didn't want to look at you for fear of you accusing him of objectifying you or something. Maybe he was afraid to talk to you because he was sure whatever he said would be taken as sexist. Maybe he was wisely giving you a wide berth for his own good. You see, anon, men don't generally like engaging with whiny, oversensitive simpletons who expect them to walk on eggshells.

Next, Susie tells us how she went to work wearing no bra with her boobs sticking through her dress. Susie thinks bras are oppressive, you see. Her male boss predictably "oppressed" her by making a very reasonable request to cover herself in the workplace. Susie blubbers plaintively about how she felt "disrespected"

Well, no, Susie. Your boss has the right to expect his employees to dress appropriately for work. The fact that you put him in the uncomfortable position of having to ask you to cover yourself is just selfish. You were the one being disrespectful.

Susie comes back to tell us how, on the Paris Metro, two men–yes that's right, two–took out their penises and stood masturbating while staring at her on a crowded carriage.

Sorry Susie, but nobody who has ever been on the Paris Metro is going to believe that for a minute. Anyone who tried that on the Metro would be lynched by the other passengers. You need help, Susie, because your demons are very much in your own head.

User “F” tells us that “Many Men still think its acceptable to touch a woman’s boobs or bum in clubs.”

“Many” men? How many is that? Is it twenty or two hundred or two million? Sorry, “F”, but they don’t. I don’t know what kind of clubs you go to. Maybe you’re wandering into strip clubs by mistake? I have been on this planet for thirty-three years and I have been groped by a stranger on the bum an entire total of once. This seems to confirm to me that most men do not consider it acceptable to touch a woman without her consent. Oh, and no, I wasn’t traumatized for life. But thanks for asking!

Ariana wades in with this particularly petulant whinge:

> My boyfriend likes to call me his girl when we’re alone. It’s a term of endearment and, according to him, should be interpreted as a sweet gesture. Am I the only person who doesn’t like belonging to anyone other than myself?

No Ariana, but you are probably the only person who is so “offended” by what is obviously a term of endearment. You might also be the only person who is unaware that you have the right to break up with your boyfriend if he bothers you that much.

OK, this is getting really boring. It just goes on and on. There is page after page of this drivel – literally thousands of entries, all from these woefully insecure people who probably should never be allowed outside without supervision. If this is representative of the quality of the character of people who Western universities are churning out, then the Western world is in deep, deep trouble.

Of course, this website is designed to do what most feminist sites are designed to do: paint women as perpetual victims who constantly need to be protected, and cast men as disgusting, woman-hating brutes who think with their penises.

If there is any site that I have encountered that is truly insulting to women, then it is The Everyday Sexism Project. I would like to say to any men reading this that most women can actually take a joke. Most of us are actually grown up enough not to have a breakdown whenever we hear someone say something we find distasteful. Most of us have nothing in common with the pathetic, whiny, dribbling half-wits on The Everyday Sexism Project.

As I often say: Feminism is not about strong women demanding equality. Feminism is about weak, insecure women who can’t handle equality. And The Everyday Sexism Project is just one more example of that.

Editor’s note: This item first appeared on Men’s Human Rights Ireland, which you should visit and support!

Radford vs. Stollznow: Tempest in the Skeptic Community

Robert O'Hara · 7 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On Wednesday of last week, Ben Radford, a well-respected and well-published member of what is broadly known as "the skeptic community," published a website dedicated to answering accusations of gross sexual harassment made by Karen Stollznow, another prominent member of that community. Radford announced that he is suing Stollznow for fraud, libel, defamation and tortious interference with contractual relations. Radford had earlier this year published a moderate column examining false allegations but had otherwise remained strictly silent on public allegations made against him by multiple members of the skeptical community.

Wednesday's release by Radford follows months of controversy after Scientific American published a piece by Stollznow last August in which she claimed she was the target of sexual harassment for years. The column, since removed from Scientific American, can be read at the Internet Archive: I'm Sick of Talking About Sexual Harassment by Karen Stollznow. (AVfM has archived its own copy for journalistic purposes if it should disappear from other sources.)

While Stollznow did not name Ben Radford directly, the indictment became more than implicit when in the course of a few days a number of "Atheism+" and "FreeThought" bloggers, tweeters, Youtubers and Facebook posters named him as the perpetrator. Included in the choir of finger pointers, speculators, and insinuators were Ian Murphy, P.Z. Meyers, Rebecca Watson, Jason Thiebault, Amanda Marcotte, David "Orac" Gorski, Ophelia Benson, and Stephanie Zvan. Enterprising members of the Skeptic community have strongly objected to this behavior for some time, though objections mostly fell on deaf ears while Radford remained silent.

Radford, in the meantime, was publicly ostracized by co-workers and close friends. His ties with the Center for Inquiry and many other professional relationships were severely strained as rampant internet commentary, based on loose speculation and poor understanding of research on false allegations, continued, with the common presumption among most of the speculators apparently being that men accused of rape and sexual harassment should probably be presumed guilty until proven innocent.

During the entire last quarter of 2013, Radford, through his lawyers, repeatedly requested that Stollznow publicly retract her statements claiming they were false and defamatory. Stollznow repeatedly ignored these requests until in March of this year when Stollznow's husband, Mathew Baxter, contacted Radfrod offering to settle a lawsuit filed against Stollznow on February 17th by Radford by issuing a retraction. After weeks of collaboration between Baxter and Radford in crafting a retraction Baxter reassured Radford in an email that it was OK to publish said retraction on his Facebook page, which he did.

After publication Stollznow denied agreeing to a retraction and ten days ago on March 27th, started a defense fund under the byline "Give a Voice to Sexual Harassment Victims" which has already raised nearly $60,000, even though there is strong reason to believe that this campaign, which is defamatory of another person, is arguably a violation of Indiegogo's terms of use since it is widely known whom Stollznow has accused. This leads to another interesting question: are sites like Indiegogo now the go-to funding source for anyone who wants to make an allegation against someone else in court, without even providing proof of the wrongdoing to donors?

In any case, since its publication on Scientific American, Stollznow's article claiming to have been sexually abused was removed. Also, an article quoting Stollznow's allegations by Amanda Marcotte published on Slate.com was also removed, with Slate giving the explanation that it "did not meet our standards for verification and fairness."

This drama accompanies a rash of accusations directed at prominent members of the atheist community regarding sexual misconduct, harassment and misogyny. Nearly all accusations and smear campaigns have been initiated by members of the Atheism+ and FreeThoughtBlogs communities or their supporters.

Last summer, PZ Myers posted an article claiming an acquaintance of his had told him Michael Shermer raped her. Shermer's lawyers issued a cease and desist order to Myers, who has yet to remove the post. Also, in a highly publicized incident, Amanda Marcotte called for the removal of Center for Inquiry's CEO, Ron Lindsay following his giving a speech critical of feminist ideology at the 2013 Women in Secularism conference in Washington D.C.

Smear campaigns against anyone countering the feminist ideology of Atheism+ have become so common that a Wiki page titled "Witch of the Week" has been set up enumerating many of the targets. However, Radford's case stands apart because he has meticulously documented all correspondence with Stollznow and others regarding his relationship with her. Emails from Stollznow indicate that it was she who initiated a long-lasting sexual relationship and that she wished it to continue even after she married. In a well-written timeline, Radford indicates the accusations started only after he complained to a colleague that she was not pulling her weight in the production of the Monster Talk podcast which he, Blake Smith, and Stollznow hosted.

A RocketHub fundraiser dubbed "Ben Radford Legal Fund", aiming to defray Radford's legal expenses, has only collected a meager $2,590 at the time of this article being published. Despite this, many in the atheist community are supportive of Radford.

AVFM has been approached by several critics of Freethought Blogs and Atheism+ to cover this story since the publishing of his response to these allegations and, because we believe false allegations, especially against men, to be a poorly researched area but one where there's reason to believe they are not uncommon, even if the "Free Thinkers" accept that as axiomatically true. Even if they were rare, however, the notion that men should be presumed guilty until proven innocent is anathema to the values of a liberal democratic society.

Whether members of the atheist or skeptic community or the men's advocacy community or not, accused men deserve the presumption of innocence. Furthermore, to our eyes, the case against Stollznow is incredibly damning. We hope the fundraiser for Radford succeeds, and we still wonder why Indiegogo is allowing a defamatory fundraiser against Radford for what is very possibly a false accuser on its pages.

"It very much appears that Ben Radford has been the subject of a false accuser, and rather than express any skepticism of the allegations at all, the ideological bullies within the FreeThoughBlogs and Atheism+ communities have done little but behave cruelly toward what may be an innocent man, and otherwise followed their unquestioned faith in the Holy Teachings of Feminism and the Doctrine That False Allegations Are Rare-even when copious research suggests they may not be" says A Voice for Men Operations Manager Dean Esmay. "Radford has done what we advise all men to do: document everything, no matter how hard that work would be, because in when it comes to society today, men are Guilty Until Proven Innocent."

Esmay said he encourages people to donate to Radfords legal fund, saying that he considers the case a way to counter the efforts of ideological feminists to co-opt the Atheist/Skeptic Movement.

"His case should be the watershed moment that finally leads the skeptical and freethinking community to question ideological feminist dogma and start to see women as being as human (and therefore as likely to lie and manipulate and backstab) as men are."

Radford has stated in his post that he will not comment further about the case until it is resolved.

Sources:

http://benrlegal.info/

http://www.scrible.com/contentview/page/24IG1900IK14P2M300C3G0BQ4KA426A3:40191410/index.html?utm_source=tb_permalink&utm_medium=permalink&utm_campaign=tb_buttons&_sti=671497

http://www.freezepage.com/1393885774OBBYKLYGDC

http://thetimchannel.files.wordpress.com/2013/08/159838891-shermer-cease-and-desist-letter-to-pzm.pdf

http://www.skeptic.com/podcasts/monstertalk/

http://phawrongula.wikia.com/wiki/Witch_of_the_Week

https://www.indiegogo.com/projects/give-a-voice-to-harassment-victims

http://freethoughtblogs.com/pharyngula/2013/08/08/what-do-you-do-when-someone-pulls-the-pin-and-hands-you-a-grenade/http://www.rockethub.com/projects/41435-ben-radford-legal-fund

http://www.rawstory.com/rs/2013/05/20/an-open-letter-to-the-center-for-inquiry/
[vimeo 90183985 w=500 h=375]

Feminism v. Equality

Diana Davison · 7 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists often use the word "equality" in a puzzling manner which reverses the original meaning. To feminists, and social justice warriors, "real" equality requires biasing society to advantage some people over others based on their gender, race, or other claimed oppression group. This idea that equality can only be achieved by treating people unequally reaches a level of stupidity that only feminism can attain.

"Substantive equality," like most feminist terms, can be quite confusing for those who don't defer to debauched dictionaries or champion corrupted concepts.

While free societies count on justice being blind, feminists were unhappy with the results of impartiality in the courts – namely, women were being convicted of more crimes. Under the guise of promoting equality, radical feminism has succeeded in bringing bias back into the legal system by arguing that women are, in fact, not equal to men and should not be treated as such under the law.

Despite some opposition from rational thinkers, "substantive" has trumped "formal" in the legal applications of equality.

"Formal" equality is the name given to what most of us think of when we hear the word equality. It's the classic and extremely popular idea that all people should be treated as equals. The legal intention is summarized by the phrase " equality before and under the law." Laws are meant to be applied equally to all people and all people are expected to answer to the law equally. This principle is often visually depicted as a blindfold adorning the statues of Lady Justice which are common to court houses across the globe.

The popular idea that all people are equal and should be treated as such was written into the constitutional legislation of most modern countries, and there was much rejoicing.

But not for long.

The Women's Legal Education and Action Fund (LEAF) explains how the founding mothers of feminism discovered that, to their dismay, the "Supreme Court of Canada rulings were determining that women were the 'same before the law' meaning that one woman would be treated the same as another woman." This was somehow troubling to them.

LEAF took up the cause of implementing and shaping the discourse on substantive equality to ensure that Canadian women would cease to be treated the same as men or, indeed, each other in a court of law. They have had much success.

Writing for the National Post in March, 1999, George Jonas deftly explains, to no avail, the purpose behind the feminist ploy of splitting equality into two types. His article is worth reading in its entirety but the brilliantly worded opening is sufficient here.

> Assume you're a feminist. To further your political objective, which is to secure advantages for your group, you need to replace a liberal principle, namely equality, with an illiberal principle, to wit, inequality. It would be bad form for you to say so, of course, but that's not all. In an essentially liberal society such as Canada, pushing inequality would be useless. It simply wouldn't fly.
>
> But what if you stuck an adjective — say, "formal" — in front of the word "equality"? Then you could contrast "formal equality" with a newly minted concept for inequality that sounded better — say, "substantive equality." Now you're on track. While you couldn't sell the idea of replacing equality with inequality, replacing "formal equality" with "substantive equality" might have legs.
>
> Presto, the feminist party line.

This corruption of equality “before and under the law” is not exclusive to Canada. The International Women’s Rights Action Watch outlines the agenda of the UN’s Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women, more conveniently called CEDAW.

> The concept of equality is traditionally understood to mean “the right to be equal to men”. This becomes problematic when it is extended to the understanding that women must be treated exactly like men if they are to gain equality with men. It implies that women must be treated according to male standards, obscuring the ways in which women are different from men and how they will be disadvantaged because of these differences.

What are these “male standards” which are so problematic? A standard of excellence, perhaps?

Feminists insist that women are innately flawed in a way which handicaps them. They argue that women can not be held equally accountable both before and under the law by claiming a meaningful difference between the words “before” and “under”. If you get lost in the semantic debate here, you are not alone. Their argument attempts to win the debate by spinning in nonsensical circles for long enough that opponents get dizzy and stumble away.

With their usual abuse of the English language, feminism has adopted an “equality” theory (“substantive equality”) that remains controversial and which is certainly not accepted as either practical or attainable. Given that the construction of stable, sustainable communities is typically accomplished by men, feminists have thus far not needed to bother themselves with such details. They fight for what they want and let everyone else worry about how to make it work without destroying society.

Failing to explain how courts can be “patriarchal” while consistently and historically depicting Justice in the form of a woman since ancient Egypt’s Maat, feminists again fall flat in the face of equality when they claim that jails are not appropriate places for women.

In February of 2011, the APPG (All Party Parliamentary Group for women in the penal system) wrote a heartfelt letter to the UK’s Ministry of Justice stating that women “have greater needs than the adult male prison population.” They made recommendations for how to treat women differently than men claiming that “the biggest single improvement government could make would entail a change of ethos.”

“Change of ethos” is just a fancy way of saying that the legal system should stop sending female criminals to jail as if they have equal responsibility before and under the law. Apparently, unlike men, going to jail makes women depressed.

No single group has fought longer or harder than feminists have to ensure women cease to be treated as equals within society. The same feminists who have so effectively stripped women of legal equality quickly accuse others of bigotry or misogyny whenever they are challenged. This silencing of reasoned voices has created a bizarre gynocentric tyranny in which some are more equal than others by virtue of their inequality.

It is, in fact, a truly cunning stunt of history.

Social Justice Warriors Still Poison Everything #cancelcolbert

AVfM Video Source · 8 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What else can we say? Ladies and gentlemen: Thunderf00t!

Fascinating: The Transformation of Mr. Spock and the Decline of American Masculinity

Dr. Douglas W. Texter · 8 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When I was a child, I very much admired Mr. Spock, the half-Vulcan, half-human first officer of the Starship Enterprise. The Vulcan's signature image included a raised eyebrow and the utterance of a single word: fascinating. Indeed, in my teenage years, Spock intrigued me enough to mention him as a possible dinner companion when the admissions-essay prompt on my University of Pennsylvania application asked me who, living or dead, fictional or non-, I would like to share a meal with. Spock got me into the Ivies.

Live long and prosper.

Today, Mr. Spock—along with the concept of masculinity that he represents– finds himself living in a trailer park and not at all prospering. This transformation of the Vulcan first officer—from the calm, collected, rational being played by Leonard Nimoy to the troubled, priggish Star Fleet officer played by Zachary Quinto–sheds some light on the demise of American masculinity in the last forty years. In this essay, I'm going to explore the historical origins of the Mr. Spock of the 1960s, discuss the vision of masculinity that this character represented, and then ponder Spock's withering under phaser fire from the Feminist movement and photon torpedo hits from what the British sociologist Frank Ferudi has termed "therapy culture." Finally, I'll meditate briefly on what we've lost through the transformation of Mr. Spock.

When the Vulcan first officer stepped onto the bridge of the Enterprise, it was 1966. The planet had suffered from the effects of two major world wars. A third inter-continental conflict, the Cold War, with its brush fires in Korea, Cuba, and Vietnam, threatened to explode into a conflagration. Since 1914, approximately 100,000,000 people had died from war, starvation, revolution, genocide, poison gas, carpet bombing, and the effects of two atomic weapons. One of the roots of all the carnage was unchecked emotionalism. Patriotism and nationalism are simply emotionalism run amok. While there's nothing wrong with a good Fourth of July parade, super-nationalism consists of nothing but strong emotions manipulated by politicians and a powerful armaments industry.

Adolf Hitler, the master emotional manipulator, convinced the population of Germany to destroy over eleven million Jews and other "undesirables" and lay waste to half of Europe. Japanese Imperialism and even the class rage of the Bolshevik revolution were manifestations of unchecked emotions manipulated by unscrupulous leaders. These emotions led eventually to the Rape of Nanking and the Battle of Stalingrad: complete disasters in terms of human rights and civilization itself. The Allies, prosecuting what Studs Terkel has called the "good war," also fought with barely controlled rage. Consider the firebombing of Dresden, which set the air of the German city on fire, and the instant atomization of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Paul Fussell writes in Wartime: Culture and Understanding in the Second World War that Admiral "Bull" Halsey hung from the tower of his flagship giant banners reading, "Kill Japs. Kill More Japs. Kill. Kill. Kill." Clearly, strong unchecked emotions had brought death and destruction to the world; such emotions combined with the splitting of the atom led the US and the Soviet Union to the brink of nuclear annihilation in the 1950s and 1960s.

Into this environment beamed one of the most philosophically interesting and humanly-needed fictional characters of the twentieth century: Mr. Spock. The Vulcan hailed from a planet that had almost destroyed itself because of emotional excess. Then emerged a Gandhi-like semi-messiah named Surak, who preached the use of logic and emotional restraint. Vulcan philosophy seemed to combine the best of Stoicism with Buddhist meditation practices. Interestingly, while Spock, whose raw physical strength far surpassed that of humans, could certainly employ violence when he needed to, he preferred negotiation leading to the mutual meeting of needs.

Often reminding Kirk of the larger stakes in any particular situation, Spock served as Jim Kirk's right hand man: "As you know, Captain." Beyond keeping Kirk from making a fool of himself, Spock existed first and foremost as a scientist, who wanted to understand, not to destroy. In addition, Spock hailed from a family of diplomats.

Diplomacy recognizes emotions, but it tries to contain them within a field of logic.

Spock's cultural decline was foreshadowed in one late-series episode. Broadcast in 1968 and the show's one nod to the counter-cultural revolution in full swing both on American campuses like UC Berkeley and in the works of Frankfurt School Marxists like Adorno and Marcuse, "The Way to Eden" has the Enterprise pick up some space hippies, who are seeking the planet Eden, a paradise. While Jim Kirk is beside himself with the hippies' deportment, Spock actually sympathizes with their counter-cultural values. Indeed, he understands their antipathy toward over-engineered society. In exchange for their better behavior, Spock even uses the Enterprise's computer banks to help the 24th century hipsters to find their planetary paradise. Thus, Spock, while serving logic, clearly empathizes with the desire for a better world represented by the counter-cultural movement of the sixties. He's far from being a heartless stooge working for "the man." However, the difference between the hippies and the Vulcan is that while both seek a better world, the latter won't allow himself to be overpowered by emotion. He seeks compromise based on rational decision-making.

To my mind, the Spock of the 1960s represented one possible healthy role model for men. He understood the power of his emotions, respected difference, and kept his impulses under control, all the while seeking Plato's good and Aristotle's truth. And it's important to realize that historically Spock represented a sane alternative both to the political disasters preceding him and the cultural nastiness that followed.

Fast-forward to the end of the first decade of the twenty-first century. A lot has happened to American masculinity and American culture since Jim and Spock beamed off the Enterprise for the final time. Simply put, the Eden-seekers have carried the day. Second-wave feminism, which was just getting started when the hippies searched for Eden, has reached its destination: the complete destruction of masculine values. Healthy masculinity, which never denied emotions but kept them in check because of a respect for their power, has fled the stage. Therapy culture, described so well by Frank Ferudi, teaches us that we are all out of control emotionally and that we can never hope to gain control of our emotions without paying vast sums of money to people who are there to "help" us. Reason and utopian dreaming have been replaced by a winner-takes-all identity politics that respects only the quantity of representation and not the quality. The Spock of the 1960s, created and written by men and women who had witnessed emotions gone amok, has been replaced by Homer Simpson as the paragon of masculinity.

God help us all.

Into this cultural mess steps the Spock of JJ Abrams. Jim Kirk has been transformed from an explorer who reads Moby Dick into a juvenile delinquent only interested in shagging Orion girls. His Vulcan friend isn't much better. This is not your father's Mr. Spock. This Vulcan is portrayed as a prig who needs to get in touch with his human side and feel more, not less. Gone are the history lessons that created the original Mr. Spock. Granted, the destruction of one's planet would emotionally compromise anybody, but ironically the reason the villain destroys the planet Vulcan is is the seeking of revenge, the very thing that the 1960s Spock knew drove all civilizations to the brink of disaster. Making out with Uhuru, this Spock ultimately wants Kirk to destroy the villain. Nimoy's Spock would have recognized that by extracting revenge, he's creating more hatred.

This sea change of a cultural icon suggests the demise of American masculinity. When I was a child, my father, born in 1927, and part of the Greatest Generation, often told me, "Play it cool." This was the cool of Spock, of Steve McQueen in The Great Escape. This coolness represented a masculinity in touch with but in control of its emotions, a masculinity that emphasized the reaching of goals while practicing self-mastery.

Today, It seems as though America offers two versions of masculinity, neither of which is very healthy. The first is male as buffoon, as represented by Homer Simpson. Homer couldn't understand his own emotions if he fell over them and is incompetent at almost everything. The battle of the sexes so hilariously conceived of by James Thurber in the 1920s and 1930s has ended in the ascendency of Homerism and the XBox. The second version of masculinity in today's culture is the antithesis of the first prototype: the hyper-masculinity of the stockbroker, the warrior, and the athlete. Unlike the first kind of men, these guys know exactly what they want. Unfortunately, as Bernie Madoff, Norman Schwarzkopf, and Lance Armstrong have shown us, what they want is often domination and victory–at any price.

We've come a long way from the Spock of Leonard Nimoy and Gene Roddenberry. The journey has been, for most men, pretty emasculating. We are told to let our feelings all hang out. What has that gotten men? A divorce rate of fifty percent and the revenge politics we've practiced in Iraq and Afghanistan. But the original Mr. Spock still offers us a way out of the cultural malaise men find themselves in today: Play it cool. Search for the truth. Practice meditation and maybe even celibacy. Empathize with the practitioners of identity-based politics. But don't slavishly agree with them.

And despite women seeming to fall for soft men, whom they tend to dump, if we develop our inner Spocks, we will reclaim a kind of masculinity that the world needs and that women really want. If you don't believe me, ask Uhuru.

Fascinating.

An alternative to Paper Abortion

Hopeland Cash · 8 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Paper Abortion refers to the concept of men (being non-fetus-carriers) having a legal equivalent to an abortion. Now, no actual abortion is involved; whoever may be carrying the baby, a Paper Abortion does not terminate the fetus. What is done is a termination of paternal rights and responsibilities. As far as the father of the child is concerned, the child is/was/will never be born, so he has no claim to be with it and cannot be called on to support it.

Just as if it had actually been terminated. He is, in effect, not a father.

Paper Abortion is not a popular idea. Many feminists argue that the discussion shouldn't even be held, but, unfortunately for them, we live in a nation believing in free speech, so the discussion has been and is being held. Do men deserve equal reproductive rights? Should fatherhood be able to be forced on a man where motherhood wouldn't be on his female counterpart? If not, how exactly do we fairly enact paper abortion so it won't be exploited by genuine deadbeats?

All valid questions rising from a valid concern. In the modern age of All Inclusive Equality, any imbalance between differing groups should be at least addressed. The imbalance here is clear: after conception, a woman has the option of abortion to terminate the pregnancy, preventing herself from becoming a mother. Men have no such option. Once they have sired a child, as long as it is carried to term, he has no legal means to not become a father. He can and likely will be forced to support the child, even if he never wanted to be a father.

By any reasonable definition that is an inequality.

So, given the assumption that women have greater reproductive autonomy (I'm sure there will be comments refuting that, but given…), how can the prenatal parental playing field be leveled?

Paper Abortion is one option, but, as I said already, it is unpopular. So, in the name of fairness and justice, I propose an alternative, a way to equalize men and women's parental rights without encouraging deadbeat dads.

Instead, let's create more deadbeat moms!

No, seriously.

I'll break it down: Society doesn't like to give men (as a group) more rights. Never has. Makes it harder to keep the workforce in check. Feminists say it's an attack on women. Giving men something in line with abortions would increase their reproductive rights, which is seen as a threat to women's rights. So Paper Abortions are out; no additional rights for men.

Society also doesn't like to take rights away from women (as a group) (at least not any more; history is a fucked-up place). As feminism has marched on over the last century and into its fourth wave, whatever has been gained has not been likely to be given up. The point being, there's no taking abortion away from women. For legal, moral, medical and practical reasons, it's not happening.

So, no giving rights to men, and no taking them away from women.

What can we do?

Well, rights tend to be balanced by responsibilities. Every child learns that growing into adulthood brings more rights and privileges, but also duties and requirements. So, if women have more reproductive rights than men, but we can't actually change the distribution of rights, we should change the distribution of the corresponding responsibilities.

Let women have access to abortions. They can save women's lives. Men do not carry children, so they have no need for the procedure, no need for a equivalent. It is a biological difference, so let women have at it.

What needs to be equalized is the legal burden placed on parents. If we're going to accept women having abortions, we have to realize that they won't only have them for medical reasons; women do and will have abortions to terminate an unwanted pregnancy.

Let them. Women shouldn't have to carry an unwanted child. That is cruel to mother and child.

However, getting out of pregnancy need not be the same as getting out of parenthood.

Men can't, after all. Once his sperm is loose, if it conceives a child, he is its father and there is nothing he can do. He is responsible for it. Period.

Let the same be done for (to) women. Don't make them carry through an unwanted pregnancy, but enforce the parental responsibilities they have inferred. Once a person, man or woman, has conceived a child, they are responsible for it. Even if a woman has an abortion, she has still conceived, which means she is a mother.

How, you ask, can a woman still be a mother after an abortion?

Simple: adoption. Any time a woman has an abortion, she should be required to subsequently adopt a child. The father of the aborted fetus will be made the legal father, and she the legal mother. They are both responsible for it, must pay for it, care for it, must raise it as if it were their own. The woman does not have to go through the rigors of pregnancy, but she still must face the responsibilities she has taken upon herself by conceiving a child. She becomes a mother whether or not she has an abortion.

Equality is as simple as that. Abortions all around, for whatever reason, but evenly enforced parental responsibilities via adoption. If you conceive a child, you have to care for a child (even if it isn't genetically your own. But don't worry, it'll probably come to identify as your child, so same diff). There are a huge number of children in need of adoption in America alone, and this would help relieve their pain by giving them parents.

Women would then be on the same footing as men, knowing that if they conceive a child they will become a parent, albeit adoptive, even if they didn't want to. There won't be the backdoor any longer of hoping your (female) partner will have an abortion and free you both from parental responsibility, but at least it will be evenly cruel and unfair. Women can still have abortions for medical reasons, but that won't get them out of being a parent, just as men have no way to terminate their parental responsibilities. If a child is conceived, both parties are on the hook, no exceptions. The mother will still be the one to decide if they're on the hook for their own child or an adopted one, but there will be a child in their lives, his and hers.

If she didn't want to be a mother, she should've kept it out of her pants.

Editorial note: Given how stupid and dishonest some of our critics are, we feel it necessary to point out that this article is ironic and satirical and meant to force people to think what they're really saying when they say "if he didn't want to be a father he should have kept it in his pants." That we even have to say so explicitly is a sign of the times we live in. Adopt a child whether you want to or not! –Ed

Where's she driving that economy to?

Clint Carpentier · 8 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

So I was thinking about math and money. Forget government subsidies and welfare, and other gynocentric bailouts for a moment. I'm thinking in terms of cash in hand.

I can't understand women's selective comprehension of numbers as meaning anything. All through school, I remember girls saying, "Math is hard, math is tough, I don't like math…", and now my own girls are going to school and I'm hearing it all over again. And throughout my life I've looked around and seen women in jobs which handle money; cashiers, bank tellers, accounting, waitressing, receptionist, etc. How does one differentiate money from math? I suppose a bloke like myself – who can't be bothered to differentiate gold from ore – just wouldn't understand. But I feel the real issue has more impact than # vs $; if I am correct, be afraid, be very very afraid.

Most of the money changing hands is done by women with limited and/or poor education. As such, this means that fickle poorly thought out spending habits are what drive the economy; is it any wonder economists run scared when asked what they predict the state of the economy will be in six months; today it's fifty shades of grey, tomorrow it's the latest kitchen appliance destined to collect dust after one use, the day after… what?

You go to a department store, and who's taking your money? Some moderately cute girl who can't do basic math in her head on a single item (much less multiple items) without the assistance of a virtually flawless machine called "the cash register", or a calculator back-up. Now, I can give you an anecdote or two about this (one of them very recent), but anyone who "consumed" before the time of the laser scanner will remember this sound (tickatickatickatick tick err… tickatickatickatick tick err… tickaticka…; you get the idea).

I wanna talk about vehicles right now. Men require specific vehicles for specific tasks; and often find that the standardized extras are really so much wasted money. Looking at pick-ups, one has to wonder what a woman needs with a pick-up, seriously; you can't find a half ton pick-up with a long box; the only reasons for getting a short box is for looks, and for ease of parking, end of story.

When men buy a pick-up they do so for a specific reason, to haul things, and no matter how you try to wrap your skull around it, the short box is completely useless; not two feet less useful, it's useless; a long box can comfortably hold a snowmobile, dirt bike, ATV, or gawd forbid, construction material built on a 4×8 dimension, or, drop the tail gate, and you can put 12 foot goods in there, and you're still under the legal overhang limit of 4 feet; so there you go, an easy riding pick-up that can do whatever you want it to do, short of heavy construction, but it no longer exists because of the demand for the short box.

And that wasn't good enough, the short box was still too big for the people demanding these vehicles, but a new demand came out at the same time, something that didn't even exist beforehand, because of it's complete lack of utility, the half ton crew cab mini box, commonly known as the Avalanche. Look, if you want a big car with a massive trunk and shitty gas mileage, buy a Cadillac; oh wait, no, because Cadillac has also moved into the useless market of SUV, as has Buick, Chrysler, Lincoln, and Porsche… seriously??? Porsche??? One of the most useless SUV's on the market is also one of the most expensive. Ok Lamborghini made a one limited edition SUV sometime in the '80s; however, it was designed with a specific task in mind, but why they wanted the market on desert warfare baffles me, none the less, it was a good desert four-wheeler.

And to top things off, compact cars have gotten bigger, what's up with that? I thought the point of a compact car was that it was… well, compact. So back in the day, when a compact could squeeze four people into a tin frame covered in tinfoil, for the modest price of a couple thousand, it was enough to please the budget of a low miles driver. Canada's bestselling car (Honda Civil) used to be "compact"; today, it is within a veneer finish of being a full size family car, managing to squeeze in a fifth person, and a multitude of safety features, for whopping fifteen grand.

I question the necessity of those standardized safety features; yes, vehicle fatalities per capita have indeed gone down since their implementation, but at the same time, vehicle accidents per capita have gone UP; so we pay more, to survive so we can… pay more, to do it again. Remember, a lot of these safety features are single accident safety features; a fender bender is no longer a case of banging out the dent, slapping on some bondo and a coat of paint and be on your way; you crack any of the lights, it's hundreds of dollars worth of damage. And on that note, I gotta wonder if it's the safety features which are saving lives, or the roads themselves; during the time that traffic fatalities have been reduced, interstates have been built, Trans-Can highways have become multi-laned and in the twenty years I've had a license, I've literally watched curvy BC roads get straightened and widened, and tree lines moved back; and laws regarding seat-belts and alcohol strictly enforced. Remember, while most accidents will happen within five miles of home, working men are much more likely to become a traffic statistic, and we commonly hit the highways… at speed. And danger zone barriers have gotten exponentially better at preventing fatalities, at better than highway speeds… for transport-trucks.

And just because it bugs me, I want to point out that a family van comes with multiple DVD players, multiple lighter sockets; both of which are standard issue. However, you won't find an ashtray or an actual lighter; both of which have become "optional". Granted, I don't smoke in the family wagon myself, because smoking is my bad habit, not my kids'. So even when making long trips, I make plans to either go without, or make do with potty stops; but why make do with a lighter socket at all if there's no lighter to put in it? Why not… GASP… install an outlet?

So let's look at the vehicles specifically designed with men in mind. The standard work pick-up is the draft horse of the blue collar world, has everything needed to drive and haul goods; very little in the way of frills, in fact the standard safety rating is three at best, which means a good wreck will really mess you up (so the family he's working to provide for – the least likely to get into a serious wreck – get the best protection plus needless gimmicks; yet the one needed to provide such creature comforts and is most likely to get into a severe wreck, gets the protection of what amounts to a leather hardhat). Priorities people, we got'm.

The ATV is the mule of off-road vehicles; it goes anywhere, does everything. The snowmobile is like the dogsled, there's nothing fancy about it but it gets the job done. The dirt bike is like a pony, it will get you from point A to point B in the closest thing to line of sight, or as the crow flies. Likewise, the road bike will get you to where you want to be – or maybe just a journey of discovery – but it's noisy and uncomfortable and downright dangerous, but a lot of fun; and the infamous crotch-rocket does exactly what it was designed to do, it goes fast. They put lights and gauges on it to make it street-legal, but it's not a street bike, those things are just a distraction, the sitting position is not conducive to checking your speed is within limits.

Sports cars are the thoroughbreds of the automotive industry, and they present a particular sense of refinement and means, and they still don't have unnecessary frills. Most of them, on first glance, still appear to be very much bare bones; again with minimal safety features. Muscle cars are pretty much the warhorse, and hyper-cars are mutated frankensteinian monstrosities only the truly insane would spur to the limits, as Jeremy Clarkson once said, "If you show up at the pearly gates with a fireball behind you, that's a cool car."

How about houses. Men and women shop for houses with two different mentalities. Men look at a house; it's got a driveway and/or garage, enough bedrooms for the kids, shingles are new, yard is basic so easy maintenance, recently renovated so shouldn't need to do any work for the next ten years, the price is reasonable and there's space for a man-cave. Women look at the house and it doesn't really matter how illogical the basic design of the house is (and let me tell you, some house designs, baffle the fuck outta me; don't design while blackout drunk, just don't do it). She will look at the same house and think, "it's got so much potential."

Her man is going into life debt as it is, doubly so if he's already married her and she's already digging his grave good and deep; and gawd forbid he says no to any upgrades she takes a fancy to, and fancy she will because there's fourteen channels of Home & Garden extreme makeovers to surf while he's busting his ass to pay for the blasted thing, and to cut costs he will have to use his spare time to bust his body renovating the damned thing. Don't ever buy a house!

Or how about new houses; they're such a deal. If you're a newlywed hubby do yourself a favor, or two in fact. First, if you're the one paying for it, make sure it's in your name alone. Second, don't ever, ever ever ever, let her know or see it until it's completed and ready to move in. Building a house on the pretext of "our home" is the quickest route to divorce that I've yet to come across, and every damned one has gone way over budget.

Why do I know this? I'm the floorlayer, I'm one of the last of the construction crew who has to deal with these couples, I get to hear the sordid history of these houses, the structural changes, the paint schemes, the supposedly wrong cabinets, the upgraded riggings, etc. And I show up with low quality flooring and see a dirt bike, snowmobile, and brand new mustang GT in the driveway all sporting pretty little "for sale" signs. "Our home" is his nightmare. Don't ever build a house if you're still in that five year twitterpated phase.

BC is contemplating raising the minimum wage to $14/hr. The concept is to make minimum wage a living wage, and to raise the minimum wage to match the cost of living (someone's smoking some really good crack). The problem isn't that minimum wage is… minimum. The problem is that single mothers glut the minimum wage market, and they can't make a living on it. Couple that with the more driven women (who still avoid blue collar work like the plague) who advance themselves in the white collar service industry and you get an economy built on a house of cards. Women can pat themselves on the back and claim independence all they want, it doesn't change the fact that the service industry survives on the spending of women. In short, if one can't spend (because they aren't married to a wallet), the other won't earn.

Now, they do happen to do one thing right… which happens to be wrong. A basic understanding of math will show you just how wrong this "right" is. Women have a prehistoric disposition for "sales" – put bluntly, shopping for the better deal or just plain getting cheaper shit. The problem with this is that first world employees will only work for so cheap, worker's unions made sure of this and you can't get a first worlder to work for a dollar a day. Even back when a dollar was still worth a blowjob, we just don't work under those conditions; we may be disposable, but we still have a modicum of pride.

The CEOs found that it was cheaper to have shit made on the other side of the biggest fucking ocean on this damnable rock and ship it back here, than it was to make things right here in North America. Sure, it's cheap, fine. But every dollar that leaves for China is a dollar that will never come back, because China doesn't need much from us, they're quite happy to manufacture cheap (and I mean cheap) knock-offs of anything North America has to offer. So while we buy basic goods like… clothing and… well fuck, everything's made in China, and our dollar is worth less and less. And because all these "basic" products are made overseas, it's cheaper to throw away a broken product and replace it, than it is to try to repair it. More money frittered out of the economy. And to make matters worse, we are losing our industry intelligence, one product at a time.

Sexual Assault on Campus: A Quiz Show

AVfM Video Source · 9 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Tom Golden, who will be a keynote speaker at the International Conference on Men's Issues, hosts his very own game show with two very well known contestants. Their answers were very consistent!

Why Call It Rape Culture?

Janice Fiamengo · 9 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Note: The following is the redacted version of a talk scheduled to be given at the University of Ottawa on Friday, March 28, 2014, under the auspices of the Canadian Association For Equality (CAFE). Entitled "What's Equality Got to Do with It? Men's Issues on Campus and Feminism's Double Standards," the talk was initially delayed by a group of students who stated that, as hate speech, the talk must not be allowed. The students banged drums, sang songs, and blew a horn while organizers and campus security pleaded with them to save their objections for the Q & A period. Eventually, the talk was moved to another room, but there the heckling and interruptions continued. Finally, the fire alarm was pulled, thus ending the formal event.

It's a strange experience to find oneself arguing in favor of something that seems self-evidently true but is publicly denied, and arguing against something that seems self-evidently untrue but is widely proclaimed—especially at a university, traditionally thought to uphold the rational pursuit of truth but too often now merely the guardian of sanctimonious platitude. There have been platitudes aplenty recently at the University of Ottawa in Ontario, Canada, where a small number of incidents has sparked talk of a rape culture. About this rape culture there has been much breast-beating and pious statement intended to promote the idea that university campuses, and our society in general, are hostile to women.

University President Allan Rock has declared these to be "very troubling times" for the University, and affirmed his commitment to "forge new strategies" to end "men's violence towards women." It is not my intention to focus in detail on the two incidents that so exercised Rock, about which I know only what has been reported in the newspapers. Instead, I want to look at the conversations that are taking place around the idea of rape culture and consider their unfortunate effects on the men who, in increasingly diminishing numbers, still work and study on campus.

The idea of rape culture derives from the rape crisis feminism of the 1970s and 80s articulated by such misandric writers and activists as Susan Brownmiller, Andrea Dworkin, Catharine MacKinnon, and Mary Daly. These theorists defined a stark polarity between men and women, positing that, under patriarchy, all women are oppressed, terrorized, and made vulnerable by systemic male violence, threats of violence, and a culture that objectifies and demeans them; and that all men benefit under this system, whether they rape or not.

Most people who speak for feminism today on campus declare energetically that feminism has become much more sophisticated and nuanced since then; that it employs "intersectionality" to take account of the many other social identities—of race, class, sexuality, and so on—that inflect the gender order.

But despite these reputed advances in feminist theory—really no advance at all, but merely a more detailed hierarchy of oppressions employing the same simplistic binary framework—the gender model is still firmly grounded in the view of the world articulated by Dworkin in her famous "I Want a 24-Hour Truce" piece, in which she declared that because of the fact of rape, no woman could be free in North America and no man could be held innocent. For Dworkin, all men must bear collective guilt because they live "in a world of his supremacy based on the existence of his cock and she […] in a world of humiliation and degradation because she is perceived to be inferior."

Attempts to challenge this model by showing that rape is less common than feminist statistics show, or that men are also the victims of rape (see especially Peter O'Donovan's recent compilation of statistics) as well as of false allegations of rape, are routinely met with dismissiveness or outrage by those who claim to value equality. Simplistic feminist assumptions about male privilege and aggression are evident in current campus discussions.

The two incidents connected with the University of Ottawa are, briefly, as follows. In February of this year, U of Ottawa Student Federation President Anne-Marie Roy discovered, via an anonymous email, that five male students, four of whom were involved in university politics, had made sexual statements about her on Facebook, a humiliating discovery for Ms. Roy.

The statements referred to the oral and anal sex that the participants wanted to have with her. The statements were not intended to be public and were not intended for her eyes. After she confronted one of the students, all five sent her an email of retraction, saying that they never intended to threaten her in any way, apologizing for the coarse and unacceptable nature of the statements, and resigning their university positions. Roy had every right to be angry and to confront them.

In a more sensible age, that might have been the end of the matter; however, the incident quickly became public at the instigation of Roy, who brought the matter to the Student Federation's Board of Administration and stated publicly that the young men's casual discussion reveals a rape culture that is "all too prevalent at university campuses."

The incident has been widely reported in newspapers with the headline "Vicious Online Attack," though the conversation about Roy seems to fit the category of aimless sexual fantasy more than attack. Nevertheless, high-ranking university officials lost little time in expressing their solidarity with Roy. Former Canadian Governor-General Michaëlle Jean, now Chancellor of the University of Ottawa, participated in a press conference in which she declared that rape culture was a widespread "disease," not only at the University of Ottawa but on university campuses all across the country. It was getting worse, she maintained, and must be cured.

University President Allan Rock, formerly a Liberal politician in the Canadian federal government, also made a public statement, declaring himself "appalled" by campus rape culture as well as male violence against women generally, and stating his intention to set up a Task Force to make recommendations for improving women's safety at the U of Ottawa.

About the other incident in question, there is less to be said as not much has been made public. It involves the suspension of the U of Ottawa men's varsity hockey team over allegations of sexual misconduct following a complaint against a number of team members. Police from Thunder Bay, the scene of the alleged incident, are investigating the matter, but no charges have been laid. The U of Ottawa is also conducting an internal investigation. Some members of the hockey team (one of whom was not even in Thunder Bay at the time of the alleged incident) have said that they feel betrayed by the university, which is treating them all as if guilty of misconduct.

The two incidents have been reported by major Canadian newspapers, and one university administrator has called for the five students who participated in the online conversation about Roy to be suspended. This seems a severe punishment for words never intended to be made public. But rape culture hysteria authorizes an extreme reaction.

It is now an accepted truth among university elites that references to sexuality and gender, even in this case private words, have serious, even criminal, import—at least when spoken by men about women, though not the other way around. Men's guilt in sexual matters is taken for granted, as is the need for dramatic declarations of sympathy for wounded womanhood. And while universities should be vigilant about women's safety and well-being, the hypersensitivity about a non-existent rape culture does nothing to promote either security or sane thinking.

Something of the garbled logic around rape culture is evident in a March 6, 2014 statement issued by the Association of Professors at the University of Ottawa, which I received just over three weeks ago. The APUO is the bargaining agent for the University of Ottawa professors and other teachers, counsellors, and librarians. The specific concerns of the APUO relate to workload, benefits, salary negotiations, and grievances. I'm not sure why it felt it necessary to involve itself in the so-called scandals in any way, but it did. Under the heading "Rape Culture, Misogyny, and Sexism on Campus," the APUO championed the cause of Anne-Marie Roy unequivocally:

> The Association of Professors of the University Of Ottawa (APUO) expresses its support for the decision of the Student Federation of the University of Ottawa (SFUO) President, Anne-Marie Roy, to break the silence about the rape culture on our campus. As Ms. Roy notes in her public statement, "The fact that the five men could so casually discuss and joke about me and the position students have elected me to hold in such sexually violent ways points to how normalized rape culture, misogyny and sexism are on our campus and in our society. This kind of behaviour has clear impacts on women; it creates an environment that is intimidating, threatening and toxic. Women on this campus and in our society deserve better."

Notice immediately the presence of the familiar chestnuts and faulty argumentative techniques of rape crisis feminism: the phrase "break the silence" used by the APUO board, as if rape is never discussed on university campuses, clearly untrue; the elision in Roy's quoted statement of any distinction between talk of "sex" and talk of "rape," as if there is no material difference between a fantasy shared with friends, abhorrent as it may have been to her, and a plan actually to enforce the fantasy against her will; the misuse of language whereby something obviously unacceptable—something Roy knew would embarrass the men who engaged in it (and would not harm her own status in any way)—is said to be "normalized"; and finally, the exaggeration, in which one incident, already acknowledged and recanted, becomes proof of a much more serious and extensive social problem, a whole "environment," amorphous and ever-present, that "threatens" women.

To all of this the APUO wholeheartedly agrees, and then in the very next paragraph, flatly contradicts its endorsement of Roy's allegation:

> The APUO fully agrees with this statement and believes that the vast majority of the University of Ottawa students, support staff and faculty, both female and male, find gender based discrimination, intimidation and sexual harassment to be completely reprehensible and at odds with the most basic values of our community.

For anyone with any concept of what a culture is, it is nonsensical to say that "there is a rape culture on campus" and then to say immediately, without missing a beat, that "the vast majority" of U of Ottawa students, support staff, and faculty find the students' words "completely reprehensible."

We either live in a rape culture, in which rape is condoned and implicitly approved, or we don't.

And when a group of university professors cannot keep their argument straight from one paragraph to the next, we are deep in the realm of ideological double-think of an Orwellian cast, the equivalent of mental auto-pilot. If such statements had no serious consequences, this would be matter merely for a chuckle at what passes for thought at university these days.

Unfortunately, our present moral panic has various consequences, including the potential to create a good deal of unfounded fear, as well as self-righteous outrage, amongst young women and to exacerbate what is already an anti-male environment on university campuses, where men are browbeaten to wear the hair shirt of collective guilt as potential rapists.

A now familiar element of the rape culture discussion is the extent to which rape crisis feminists seek to silence anyone who denies or even questions that a rape culture does prevail in our society. It is perfectly legitimate in disagreements to argue over facts and to point out flaws in an opponent's reasoning. But it is not legitimate to claim that one's opponent's position is so heinous that it must not be heard at all. This is what rape crisis feminists do in constantly suggesting that merely to articulate an anti-feminist position produces the harm that feminists claim—a culture of intimidation and threat that is "toxic" for women—and that therefore such discussion must be prohibited.

A rape culture is one that accepts, tolerates, and even condones rape, blaming the victim when it happens and excusing the perpetrator. There are cultures in the world, certainly, where victims of rape are not given sympathy, where rapists are not punished for their crimes, and where victims are blamed. In Iran, Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Sudan, Yemen, and Pakistan, one can find such cultures, where little girls have their noses cut off by their families because they appear to be acting immodestly, where acid is thrown in the faces of women who violate standards of female behavior, where girls are married off at age 7, 8, 9, and raped by their husbands, where female genital mutilation is practiced to keep women pure, and where women are honor-killed for having a boyfriend.

That is a rape culture. If Anne-Marie Roy actually lived in a rape culture, she would have done everything in her power to prevent the dissemination of the sexual comments made about her, knowing that such publicity would have led not to her promotion as a champion of women but to social, if not literal, death.

Feminists routinely deny, as a core article of faith, that rape is widely considered a heinous crime in North America. One perfect example of such denial, chosen almost at random, comes from mainstream feminist blogger Amanda Marcotte, who stated in a recent post (March 18, 2014) for Slate Magazine that rape culture is an essential term of anti-rape analysis. Outlining her disagreement with an American organization (the Rape Abuse and Incest National Network) that rejects the term, she argues that "Rape culture is a very useful way to describe the idea that rapists are given a social licence to operate by people who make excuses for sexual predators and blame the victim for their own rapes." A "social license to operate" is a dramatic statement about the extent to which rape is reputedly approved and tolerated.

As we read on in Marcotte's post, however, we come to see that in defending the phrase rape culture, she is not really interested in evidence-based argument about whether rape is condoned in North American society or not. Her primary interest is in protecting, through rhetorical fiat, the feminist right to define rape as feminists see fit: in other words, to define rape as anything a feminist says it is. Amanda Marcotte, we may remember, was hired to be the chief blogger for John Edwards' presidential campaign in 2007, and she is the same woman who blogged about the case of three lacrosse players at Duke University who were wrongfully accused of rape in 2006.

Even after the charges were dropped against the athletes, she maintained caustically that the "poor dear lacrosse players" were not worthy of the presumption of innocence: whether found guilty or not, they were undoubtedly despicable men, morally if not legally guilty. Why? Because men rape women, and women never lie about it. This is the fundamental plank of rape crisis feminism that underlies discussions about rape culture.

For Marcotte, the term rape culture is necessary to highlight "all the cultural reasons that rapists are not held responsible" for their behavior. Here is her list of such so-called myths:

- the myth that false accusations are common;
- the myth that rapists are just confused about consent; and
- the myth that victims share the blame for drinking too much or otherwise making themselves vulnerable.

According to Marcotte, only by tackling these cultural problems will we be able to see clearly that rapists know exactly what they're doing and punish them for it.

Marcotte's list demonstrates the perfect feminist circle of illogic at work: if you believe that just because a man has been accused of rape doesn't mean he is guilty of rape, then by Marcotte's definition, you are a part of rape culture in suggesting that an allegation may well be false. If you were in conversation with Marcotte, you might stop her and say, 'Hold on, I'm not talking about rape, let alone condoning it. I am talking about a false charge of rape.'

That's a myth, says Marcotte. Women do not lie about rape (or do lie, but only in statistically inconsequential numbers). In Marcotte's feminist world, there are only two options: the recognition of the rape that exists or the denial of the rape that exists. And if you "deny" by holding to the myth of false accusations (but see Edward Greer on the complex reality of false accusations), you are strengthening the rapist's so-called social licence. To strengthen the rapist's social licence is dangerous since it promotes rape. We see how easily the way is paved for the silencing of critics of rape culture.

It is in light of the embargo on reasoned analysis of feminist claims that one notes the slavish pro-feminism of the "Snapshot Message" of Allan Rock, President of the University of Ottawa, in response to the Facebook incident and the investigation of the varsity men's hockey team. The Snapshot Message is Rock's regular means of communicating with the university community, sent via email. His rape culture statement of March 6, 2014 is politically correct claptrap of the first order, blithely discarding the presumption of innocence for members of the men's hockey team and pathetically eager to declare his feminist bona fides to the extent of outlawing anti-feminist thought.

While stressing that the allegations against the hockey team are "unproven," Rock falls in line with the rape culture position in assuming that they're almost certainly true—at least to the extent that they reveal something real and repugnant about male sexuality. He notes that "these allegations, along with the disturbing on-line conversation about Ms. Roy, point to a need for a broader conversation" and "raise troubling questions about attitudes and behaviour."

One must ask the obvious: how can unproven allegations point to or raise questions about anything? They may remain unproven, in which case there is nothing to point anywhere. It is disturbing to see a university president claiming a wide-scale problem based on one Facebook conversation and an unproven allegation. The assumption that the sexuality of young male athletes, even if not actually criminal, is aggressive and dangerous to women—deserving of public denunciation and disavowal—is an instance of reflex misandry by a top university official.

Rock does even more, however, than acknowledge "troubling circumstances." He calls for a Task Force on Respect and Equality. And he makes clear that it will have a broad mandate. Here is one of the questions that concerns him:

> "Can we be clearer in telling our first-year students, our freshly hired faculty, our newly recruited staff that we will not accept words or conduct that suggest such violence is acceptable."

Note that: "… we will not accept words or conduct that suggest …"

Not "… we will not accept violence" or "… we will not accept calls for violence or threats of violence …"

But "… we will not accept words or conduct that suggest such violence is acceptable."

This is a very wide net to cast, a flexible and capacious definition of what the university will not accept.

The clear implication for men on the university campus: don't even think about a joke, a comment, a compliment, an observation, a gesture, a facial expression, anything at all that might "suggest such violence is acceptable." The University of Ottawa, in line with all universities across the country, already has a stringent and hyperactive sexual harassment policy that defines sexual harassment broadly as any "unwanted sexual attention," including words. But Rock's statement implies that further regulatory and punitive measures may well be necessary to keep men in line.

And if that doesn't go far enough, Rock's final words in his "Snapshot Message" are even more remarkable: "I conclude by saying that as appalling as these events and allegations have been, they have been a catalyst for a frank discussion […] and a fearless inventory of our practices and assumptions."

Aside from the rhetorical overreach of this statement—what words would he use, one wonders, for an actual act of violence on campus that would be stronger than "appalling"?—Rock's determination to conduct an "inventory of assumptions" is noteworthy. As a free-born citizen of Canada, I reserve the right to protect my assumptions from scrutiny by any University Presidential Big Brother. The last thing a university should be inaugurating is an inventory of assumptions. Violence and threats of violence are unacceptable. Period. Thoughts are free. The fact that the University of Ottawa's President doesn't understand that is unsettling.

Equally unsettling is that the President's Message—like the APUO statement, like Amanda Marcotte's blog post, and like all the feminist models of rape and sexualized inequality on which they are based—takes for granted that sexual violence is a one-way street, with men as perpetrators and women as victims.

"Violence by men against women," Rock asserts, "is all too common in our culture, our entertainment, and our attitudes." Never mentioned in his document is the fact that men are also the victims of sexual assault (see the 2007 study by D.A. Hines finding the cross-gendered nature of coerced sex) and men are more likely than women to be the victims of violence generally.

Why is President Rock so eager that "women in particular" be offered an environment free of harassment? Likely it doesn't even cross his mind, or the minds of anyone advising him, that men are deserving of compassion and protection too. And it won't reassure equality-minded men reading the document to see his statement that "The University of Ottawa is known for the expertise of our feminist scholars and our legal analysts." These scholar-ideologues almost certainly won't have anything to say about male victims, since it is highly unlikely that they even acknowledge the reality of male victimization.

Partly as a result of the success of the feminist narrative—and partly for other reasons—the problems of men are largely ignored by a society trained to believe that men's suffering matters less than women's, if it is even recognized at all. If there is a culture on university campuses, it may well be a culture of indifference, and sometimes outright hostility, to men's lives. We hear next to nothing about the challenges that men are facing in the early twenty-first century: the fact, very noticeable to anyone who cares to look, that the proportion of young men at university is at an all-time low and continuing to decline.

Where's the public outcry and the panel discussions about the truly staggering fact that men on campus are now outnumbered by women by a ratio of nearly 2 to 1? What about other problems: the high suicide rate among young men, particularly men of undergraduate university years; the very poor performance of boys in our elementary schools; the life-long emotional and social problems of many boys who grow up without fathers; the depression many men battle as a result of divorce and the loss of access to their children?

Feminist activism has already been remarkably successful in creating a campus environment that focuses exclusively on women's security and perspectives to the detriment of men's. The SFUO (the Student Federation of the University of Ottawa) includes in its Statement of Principles a mandate to "act against the oppression of women [but not of men] … and other disadvantaged groups," a mandate that has been used by other student unions to refuse accreditation to men's issues clubs at the University of Toronto and Ryerson.

Like other Canadian universities, the University of Ottawa has a Women's Centre (one that serves the "diverse needs of marginalized genders") but not a Men's Centre. It posts "Don't Be That Guy" posters, which target all men as potential rapists, especially of inebriated girls, and which do not acknowledge that young men are sexually coerced by women. And it will almost certainly go the way of other universities in promoting draconian new guidelines to define women's [but not men's] sexual consent.

As a woman advantaged by feminist policies who has seen highly qualified men consistently passed over in hiring competitions, experienced the knee-jerk misandry of feminist colleagues, and witnessed the shaming of young men in university classrooms past and present, I want no part in rape crisis feminism. Right now, however, its status as the secular faith of the contemporary university seems depressingly secure.

Divorce, West Virginia Style – Mountain State Abuses Children And Elders

Mark Hallburn · 9 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I moved to West Virginia, in April of 2000 after marrying Dolores Martin, a woman who was in bankruptcy and stopped her college education-midway–but a woman who professed to be a Christian and who, I saw, was a loving, Godly, family-oriented woman with huge potential.

Fifteen years after we married, (August 29, 1998, we lived in San Diego County before 2000) Dolores divorced me after I helped put her through college, helped her get a teaching credential and masters degree, helped remodel her home (she failed to keep the promise to put me on the deed) stood by her through five miscarriages and a stillborn, and fathered a child that she admitted, under oath, was brought into the world years AFTER she knew the marriage was over. (The courts are letting her get primary custody of our son-anyway!)

What am I getting in return for my love and loyalty? Judge Michael J. Kelly has limited my parenting time to every-other-weekend, with no overnights, has me paying her attorney fees, child support, and won't let Matthew leave the state to visit my father, in California, where he lives with severe health problems that won't allow him to travel to West Virginia.

It's even worse.

In 2012 Kelly refused to let Matthew travel, with Dolores, (she was afraid I would kidnap our son and permanently move him to The Golden State) to visit my dying mother, Nancy. Without that final visit, Matthew's grandmother died, while Kelly continues to lie and say that his mandated budget was never filed. (It was lost by the courts once, but included in a Father's Day visitation motion that Kelly denied. That's called "Gotcha" judge.) When I told the West Virginia Supreme Court about Kelly's lie, and the robbery of Matthew's final visit with his grandmother, they sat, silently, and, to this day, refuse to hold Kelly accountable for his evil screwup. Kelly also wouldn't allow Matthew to visit me, for Spring Break, in Myrtle Beach, South Carolina. (I was working in the travel industry and had free passes to nearly every fun thing that a father and son could enjoy.) Matthew is being held hostage in West Virginia by Judge Kelly and the family court system.

Mentally stable judges encourage children to visit their grandparents. Mentally stable Supreme Court Justices don't allow mentally unstable judges to prevent such visits. When the courts fail, mentally stable legislatures make laws to protect families. However, in West Virginia, my family was abused. And the abuse continues.

West Virginia claims to cherish family values. The truth is that in The Mountain State, Judge Kelly and the state's Family Court system practices child and elder abuse with full permission of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals which has been repeatedly rated a "Judicial Hellhole."

What did Matthew do to be robbed of time with his father? (I have NEVER been accused of child abuse) A final visit with his grandmother? Visits to the beach, zoos, Dodger games and Disneyland? (Judge Kelly refused to order the beach and zoos to be moved to West Virginia–then arrogantly made fun of my suggested compromise). What did Nancy Halburn do to be deprived of a final visit with her grandson? Nothing! They are innocent victims of a psychotic judge and a corrupt court system that allows Kelly's abuse and refuses to make public any official complaints about judges. The "probable cause" hearings are held in secret and the names of the Judicial Investigation Commission members that vote are kept from the public. Complainants are not even allowed to present their own case.

Kelly's order banning Matthew from visiting his grandmother was under a "temporary" order that lasted a whopping 11 months. Under West Virginia's Supreme Court rules "temporary" orders are not subject to appeal. That meant neither I, Matthew, or Nancy had any recourse to overturn tyrant Kelly's order banning the final visit. In other countries they call this a dictatorship. In West Virginia such unconstitutional conduct is called "business as usual."

In case you're wondering about Matthew's ability to visit his other grandmother, Kelly allows Dolores' mother, Margaret, to live with him. Can you say "biased judge?" I knew you could.

When I do get to see Matthew, I have to pick him up – and drop him off – near my ex-wife's home each time. This means four drives to her town each visitation weekend. From Kelly to the West Virginia Supreme Court, none of them will find a middle ground or alternating trips.

In 2012, while under the "temporary order" I volunteered Matthew to Dolores for Mother's Day weekend. She refused to do the same on Father's Day weekend and Kelly refused to make her. He has yet to order a replacement weekend. I also missed out on Easter Sunday, 2012, and Dolores violated the court order and refused to allow me any time on Easter Sunday for 2013. (Kelly ordered make-up time, for 2013, weeks later. However, the Easter activities that we missed were not available.) In the final order Dolores gets all day for Mother's Day but I only get a portion of Father's Day. Biased is Judge Kelly's middle name. When I contacted then Chief Justice Menis Ketchum prior to Father's Day, 2012–he crapped on the First Amendment's "No Law" clause against petitioning government for grievances and ordered me never to contact the West Virginia Supreme Court. This worthless order came complete with a threat of prosecution. Ketchum was never prosecuted for his violation of federal constitutional law!

In West Virginia, I am paying taxes to an out-of-control government that is stealing my precious time with my son! It's appalling!

You might be saying that there has to be more to this story. There is: In 2012 I published the now infamous video of Putnam County Family Court Judge William M. "Chip" Watkins screaming at Pastor Art Hage. The video "went viral" and after Supreme Court Administrator Steven D. Canterbury initially tried to cover Watkins' misconduct and announced that The Putnam County Screamer would not be charged, I testified at his disciplinary hearing and Watkins acted like a punk when I told him to "Turn around and face me like a man." Because of Watkins' reaction, the disciplinary committee handed him a four-year suspension that was upheld by the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals-not because the justices wanted to (punish one of their own) but because they knew they were being watched by the world.

Watkins was allowed to collect pension credits until he, ultimately, resigned in November of 2013–or he would still be suspended from the bench–while fattening his pension. That's another West Virginia Supreme Court rule designed to protect the Cretins in Black Dresses.

Meanwhile, it's no secret that Kelly is paying me back for exposing Watkins to the world. (Kelly was appointed after Watkins was recused-he was Dolores' bankruptcy attorney before we married) And he is retaliating against me with full permission of the West Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals. This includes Kelly sanctioning me for trying to recuse him and asking my ex-wife for a copy of her lawyer's license. Once, when I paid the sanctions-TWICE-Kelly jailed me for two hours. (He blamed the clerk's office for not getting him the first check but ignored me telling him SEVEN times that his secretary had the second check.) You guessed it, my complaint was determined to be "unfounded" by the West Virginia Judicial Investigation Commission, that panel of judges which exists, primarily, to cover the backsides of the judges that screw up. Nevermind that the courtroom video and documents prove Kelly to be a liar that violated my civil rights!

West Virginia often begs companies to move here and bring much-needed jobs. Why would they? Most companies are owned or managed by fathers. Why would a father move his company to The Mountain State and allow his child to be taken from him by the corrupt Family Law system? I didn't move a company here-I started one. And, now, I only get 44 hours a month with Matthew. So this is a family AND an economic issue.

I've publicly called for reporters to be allowed into Family Law Court hearings. (West Virginia is one of 30 states that violates The First Amendment and does not allow the press.) Family Law Judges are protected by secrecy. So they regularly abuse without being exposed. While Family Law hearings are video recorded, parents are terrified of releasing those videos because they know judges will retaliate-as Kelly retaliates against me. (Pastor Hage's children were all adults. He had nothing to lose by exposing Watkins). I've called for complaints against judges to be released to the public and that probable cause hearings be held in public. I've called for recall elections for all public officials, term limits for judges, and two year terms for judges-to hold them accountable. Currently Circuit Court and Family Law judges have eight year terms and are not subject to recall. I've called for child custody decisions to be made by juries of parents. (If you shoplift a $1 candy bar you get a jury trial.) Nothing is more important than our children but they don't get the same rights to a jury hearing that common criminals get. I've publicly called for an independent civilian review board to deal with judicial complaint. But the West Virginia Legislature doesn't care about judicial integrity. They'd rather see citizens get screwed in Family Law Courts. Is it any wonder that West Virginians leave The Mountain State every day? While the population of The United States grows each day, West Virginia remains under two million people.

One other thing: Both parents should be required to take a psych exam. If one doesn't-child custody shouldn't be awarded. In my case, I spent $800 for the exam and lost a day of work. Dolores refused to take her exam, was only fined $100 for contempt, and, despite violating the court order, given primary custody of Matthew. This is called a judicial joke! Judge Kelly ignored testimony by the psychologist that he personally (without our knowledge) observed Matthew and I playing in a park-in a completely acceptable and positive situation. Instead of focusing on that positive, Kelly continued his misconduct and focused on "personal conflict" issues made in my report. Of course, what Kelly failed to state, in our final order, was that my restricted parenting time was virtually the same as it was in our lengthy temporary order. Judges with agendas (Kelly is anti-father) will never be deterred or stopped by the truth. All that they want is whatever they want-no matter how unethical their desires are or how many people they hurt to promote their agenda.

I mentioned the 11-month "temporary" order. One reason was that Kelly violated Rule 22(b) and issued his final order two months late. When I filed a complaint the WVJIC said he has a large caseload. They let him get away with breaking the law! Don't be surprised. Judges are allowed to break rules on a regular basis in West Virginia.

My motions to have the Court order Kelly to take a psych exam are still being ignored.

In West Virginia, Kelly and other child and elder abusers are allowed to run over the rights of children, fathers, and seniors without fear of discipline for their misconduct. Why is that? Because the ultimate child and elder abusers are the West Virginia Supreme Court Justices who enable the child and elder abuse of Kelly and other family law judges. It's called Divorce-West Virginia Style. I am hoping that telling my story will embarrass the so-called "leaders" of The Mountain State into fixing these problems. But I am not holding my breath!

Pay gap debunked–again #feminism #mrm

AVfM Video Source · 10 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The gender pay gap has been debunked again, and this time the White House itself finally has some egg on its face over this persistent and pernicious lie.

Our friend Christina Hoff-Sommers is still a little too inclined to bend to feminist sensibilities and talk about women facing discrimination but not men, but then again, given her body of work on sticking up for boys and other work pointing out ideological feminist lies and hypocrisy, we'll thank her for this video anyway!

You can subscribe to the American Enterprise Institute channel here.

Wrongfully convicted William Mullins-Johnson files $650,000 fraud suit against Christine Rupert

Attila L. Vinczer · 10 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

AVFM EXCLUSIVE Sault Saint Marie, Ontario, Canada

William Mullins-Johnson has filed a $650,000 civil claim against Christine Rupert in Superior Court for fraud.

William Mullins-Johnson (who prefers to go by Bill Mullins) was wrongfully convicted of rape and murder in Canada. He spent many years in prison. After his release from prison in 2005, but still a convicted felon, Bill moved to Toronto while awaiting appeal of his conviction. He had always maintained his innocence and wanted to be near where the ensuing legal proceedings would be held. His mother left her Sault Saint Marie home to stay with him, acting as his surety so he could stay in Toronto. In 2007 his conviction was finally overturned at the court of appeal. He was truly a free man.

Subsequently, a multi-million dollar award for wrongful conviction was advanced to Mullins in October 2010, creating a major media buzz. To avoid the relentless flurry of media calls, Mullins decided to drive out West for two months with his then-new girlfriend, Christine Rupert. But Bill soon began to believe Christine had a drinking problem. After getting very drunk one night at the Casino, she became belligerent with Bill, who then began to think he wanted no part of a woman like that. He told her to go upstairs and pack her things. Bill drove her to the Vancouver Airport, gave her $700 for a flight back to her home in Kitchener, and broke off the relationship.

The following morning, according to Mullins, Christine begged to come back. She had spent the night at the airport instead of leaving for Kitchener. Bill's decision to allow her back would eventually prove to have serious consequences.

[image]
Christine Rupert & Bill Mullins
June 2012
According to multiple sources, Rupert had begun courting Mr. Mullins in and around the time she knew he was about to receive a $4.25 million dollar settlement for his wrongful conviction and malicious prosecution. The essence of the Mullins Statement of Claim is that Christine Rupert committed fraud from day one to defraud Mullins of his millions. She waited the 3-year period normally establishing common law marriage to occur, then immediately filing her Application in Family Court against Mr. Mullins. There is evidence that she very carefully orchestrated this fraud.

An on-line friendship had fostered between Bill and Christine in the years prior. They eventually met at her home and adjoined with Canada Court Watch advocates to rally against Children's Aid and Judicial abuse in Canada. Ontario CAS had strongly lobbied for his wrongful conviction. During this time, Christine begged Bill to take her out of Kitchener where she rented a home. She moved in with Bill in August, 2010 in Sault Saint Marie, Ontario.

Using the proceeds of his settlement, Mullins purchased a large 3,500 square foot house in Huntsville, Ontario. The two of them moved into the 42-acre property in Huntsville in April of 2011. This is where Bill thought he would form a family with Christine.

Bill had wanted a camp-site getaway near the water, but Christine talked him into buying a second house in Bracebridge instead, convincing him to rent out the Huntsville property instead. Leveraging the Huntsville property, Mullins purchased a second home in Bracebridge, Ontario. The couple moved in February, 2013. This new property, situated on the Muskoka River near Santa's Village, has been described as a 3,500 square foot mini-mansion, with a beautiful full stone fireplace and the finest amenities. Bill put Christine on the title of both homes, as well as on a joint bank account to manage their finances and properties. Bill was in love.

[image]
Canada Court Watch members at rally
The relationship between William Mullins and Christine Rupert became troubled early on. On June 11, 2011 Bill caught a glimpse of something unusual on Christine's FaceBook "Cafe World" game–messages from a fellow player asking her to call him. This resulted in a heated argument as Bill questioned who this was who was secretly messaging her to call him. In response to this query, she said she wanted to leave. She was free to leave, but Bill would not allow her to take his truck, and they began quarelling.

Unbeknownst to Bill, Christine dialed 911 during the argument. Hearing only an argument, the Ontario Provincial Police used GPS satellite technology to pinpoint the exact location of the originating cell call. Two officers showed up followed by an ambulance. Bill was shocked and could not understand why the police or the ambulance were there. He asked them what they were doing there. The officers explained the GPS gave their location and they wanted to know how Christine was doing. One officer went into the house to speak with her while the other spoke with Bill. Bill said that they only had an argument. Meanwhile, in the house, the older officer found a small amount of marijuna inside the house and threatened to arrest Mullins.

Bill told the officers to leave. He also told the OPP officers he had been abused by police before and believed they intended to abuse him now. The police left while the ambulance took Christine without explanation. No charges were laid and he never saw those police officers ever again.

Unable to ascertain where Christine was by texting, calling, or emailing her, Bill managed to get word from a common friend, Suzanne LaFlamme, who texted that Christine had a stroke and was in the hospital. Christine meanwhile claimed to others that she was in a woman's shelter. According to Bill, it turns out Christine was actually in Kitchener, which is where Bill finally caught up with her. They talked in her truck, and Bill wanted to know what was going on and how long she had been in Kitchener. She said she did not know and seemed she had not slept in days. Bill then left Christine in Kitchener. Two years later Bill found evidence she had been smoking crack during this time in Kitchener.

Various sources have been contacted by this reporter, confirming that Christine Rupert had her children taken due to extensive drug use. William Mullins-Johnson had to be present for Christine's supervised visitation with her then 9 year old son because of this.

A number of days after the encounter in Kitchener, Christine called Bill in Huntsville. They met at a WalMart parking lot where they had a discussion. According to Bill, there was a lot of pain between them. A couple of days later they spoke with each other again. It was during these discussions that Christine begged to come back to Bill. Within their second meeting, he said he was not sure if he wanted her back. He agreed for her to come back on condition they entered into marriage counseling. Christine hesitated, but then agreed. In total she was gone for about 10 days. But the June 11 incident came up a number of times in the coming two years.

Bill took out a $50,000 line of credit at the Bank of Montreal and bought Christine a brand new Tahoe truck. He wanted Christine to have a safe vehicle to see her kids in Kitchener and the means if she ever wanted to leave.

In August of 2013, Bill rushed to Sault Saint Marie Ontario. His aunt was deathly ill and not expected to survive. Christine did not want go with Bill during his time of difficulty. She preferred to stay, entertaining her guest friends at their luxurious home in Bracebridge. The aunt unexpectedly recovered. Bill called that he was coming home sooner than expected, but Christine who usually was anxious for him to return, told him to wait and come home in a few days. When Bill returned, he could smell the odour of burnt Brillo and suspected crack was being smoked in the house. Bill and Christine argued about this, and about Derrick, a hired hand doing odd jobs around the house. Christine would not agree to fire Derrick.

About a week after his return from Sault Saine Marie, Bill realized his relationship with Christine Rupert was doomed. He told Christine he felt she had set him up like a mark, and her attraction to him was all a sham. He left peacefully on September 1, 2013, moved back to Sault Saint Marie and bought a house.

Christine Rupert had prepared an application in Family Court dated September 10 making claims against Bill. The original application, later amended by her lawyer MacFarlane, was never served on William Mullins(-Johnson). Examining the Family Court Application reveals gross inconsistencies including what appear to be various serious allegations including sexual abuse, rape, assault and unlawful confinement. The document is rife with innuendos to make Bill Mullins appear to be a dangerous man. We are left to consider why a woman who describes a man to be so dangerous would leave Kitchener in the first place to begin a relationship with such a supposedly violent man.

Tom Walkling is Bill's personal therapist. Walkling had worked with Bill to help him deal with many difficult years of being wrongfully incarcerated. Rupert Claims in paragraph 35 of her application that Tom Walkling stated the following, "That she should leave the house, that he feared for her safety, that she should pack everything and leave, 'Don't get shot in the yard,' that he is Aboriginal and his extended family have guns for hunting." When asked about these allegations, Walkling said he would not have made such statements in that context.

Bill is very upset that anyone would imply Aboriginal people are violent and that they would hunt people. Yet this same inference was repeated by Justice Thomas M. Wood within his finding of fact. To someone reading such a document without knowing the other side of the story, one can easily be misled to think it must be true since a Judge said so.

Nearing the end of September 2013, Christine Rupert made application in Family Court for a restraining order against William Mullins. He was given a 5-hour window of opportunity to collect his belongings from his own home, under OPP supervision. The OPP refused to assist despite a court order to do so. They eventually showed up for two hours and presented Bill a $610.00 invoice for two hours of their police services.

While Christine Rupert is on title of both properties and a joint account holder, she did not contribute any of her own money to acquire any of the assets she is now making claim against.

Christine Rupert claims she had a chair thrown at her, was raped, sexually assaulted, threatened to be thrown through a wall, threatened that she would be shot, was unlawfully confined, insinuating Aboriginals are violent, and other outlandish remarks in her Family Court Application. The police have not investigated said claims, no significant evidence has been offered, and no charges have been laid against Mr. Mullins in relation to these allegations by Rupert.

A process server at Newmarket Courthouse in Ontario, asked to comment on the story, said under conditions of anonymity that over the past 10 years she has seen that nearly every application made by a woman to the family court contains one or more allegations of rape, domestic violence, and sexual assault. She also said that something she called "the silver bullet" is often used, which is a claim the male committed child molestation. This process server, who wishes to remain anonymous, stated that making these allegations guarantees immediate child custody and control of the matrimonial home. She said that Family Court is outright broken because of things like this.

A York Regional Police Officer, also speaking under condition of anonymity, said he has seen gross injustices in both Family and Criminal Courts. He said he could never do police work on the street again, given the outcome he has witnessed in the courts where people, mostly men, are routinely unjustly prosecuted and incarcerated.

A motion was scheduled by Mullins in Bracebridge Court, heard by Justice Tom M. Wood, February 24, 2014. The purpose of the motion was to deal with the Mullins v. Rupert $650,000.00 Statement of Claim for fraud. The motion is to have the matter heard in Toronto where it is more likely an impartial hearing can be expected. Allowing the fraud suit to be heard in court, Mullins believes, would render the Rupert Family Court application baseless and fraudulent.

[image]
OPP and Chad Wells
Canada Court Watch has found extensive corruption at the Bracebridge Courthouse, where a number of protests against Justice Wood have taken place. During one of these peaceful lawful protests, Justice T.M. Wood ordered Chad Wells arrested. He was unlawfully arrested, detained and harassed by Bracebridge OPP officers for a number of hours. The entire event was captured on digital audio. Wells was eventually released from the courthouse police holding area.

Meanwhile that same day Vernon Beck, founder of Canada Court Watch, was threatened with arrest by the same Justice. Mr. Beck describes the incident. “I was in the courtroom in support of D.H. who was being ill treated by Justice Wood. I had never before met him. In open court Justice Tom Wood sternly asked, ‘Is Vernon Beck in the room?’ I identified myself. Justice Wood immediately instructed me to leave his courtroom. I asked him to make an order to that effect. He refused and said if you do not leave you will be arrested!” There was no just reason to order Mr. Beck from the courtroom. He did not want to be arrested that day.

A Forester local paper covered this rally.

Justice Wood brought down his decision on March 3, 2014 regarding the Mullins and Rupert motions returnable on February 24. Justice Wood, in Family Court, made certain findings of fact based on the hearsay of Christine Rupert. He made the following order, without a trial, without cross examination and without taking into account all relevant facts.

● William Mullins(-Johnson) is to pay Christine Rupert $10,000.00 to cover her legals expenses against Mr. Mullins and the right for Rupert to seek further advances.

● Mullins motion to dismiss or stay Christine Ruperts application, dismissed.

● Mullins $650,000 fraud Statement of Claim against Rupert moved to Muskoka from Toronto, consolidated into the Family Court application of Rupert and taken as the response to the Rupert Family Court Application.

Mr. Mullins says, “The entire Family Court Application by Christine Rupert is founded on fraud including racial discrimination. The ruling by Justice Thomas M. Wood is a slap in my face thwarting my fraud civil suit that would flesh out the truth. He is instrumental in circumventing due process. Moreover, making an impetuous ruling awarding unjust monetary gain to a fraudster, Christine Rupert.”

Mr. Mullins says he will fight tirelessly to ensure he is not subject to a second judicial abuse in Ontario, Canada. One wrongful conviction by irresponsible authorities is enough, and abuse by civil authorities like this should not be tolerated.

The ruling by Justice Tom M. Wood is being appealed by Mullins’ lawyer. A leave to appeal motion is set to be heard Wednesday, June 18, 2014 at 9:30 a.m. at 3 Dominion Street, Bracebridge, Ontario.

Writers note: The information contained here above and herein I verily believe to be true based on information provided to me by various sources.

Mullins_Johnson_Claim

Bracebridge_ruling_MARCH_3,_2014 (1)

Letter_and_Amended_Application_from_McFarlane

Johnson_Motion_for_Leave_Mar_11.14

Why is NPR so Sexist?

NCFM · 10 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article was written by NCFM Member Ray Licht

The media seem to be very biased against men nowadays. This is especially true of advertising media. There is a very simple reason for this: women are largely or exclusively the deciders concerning most product choices. Some have estimated that women make 80% of all consumer product decisions. Naturally, in a situation like this, advertisers are going to tend to aim their ads at women. As a result, advertising media are also going to aim at women in order to attract more advertising revenue, which is, of course, their main goal. In this situation, advertising media certainly do not want to offend women. However, the advertising media can largely ignore or even offend men with little consequence. Some women may even be more likely to buy advertisers' products if they and their media do insult and belittle men. There is little chance for men to receive a fair deal in any advertising media—e.g., television, radio, newspapers, magazines, and the internet. For example, check out another article on this website (http://ncfm.org/2013/12/action/anti-male-media-bias/) that shows that 95% of all negative portrayals in TV ads are of men.

I am not happy about this situation. Of course, I wish that all media were totally fair and unbiased at all times. But this is not happening. I do not like it, but I do understand it. Of course, women could correct this problem immediately by refusing to buy products that portray men negatively in their advertising I do not see this happening anytime soon. (But women should keep in mind that it was primarily men who passed women's suffrage, Title IX, the Violence Against Women Act, and all other pro-woman legislation. Men may have been slow, but they finally righted some past wrongs. Now it is women's turn to help men.)

But certainly men should get a fairer deal in media that are not funded by advertising. In the U.S., advertisers' effect on National Public Radio and the Public Broadcasting Service should be much less, and therefore NPR and PBS should not be as biased against men as other media. Also, since *NPR*and PBS receive some governmental support and oversight, they should contain no sexism. However, this does not appear to be true. Public broadcasting seems to be even more pro-female and anti-male than advertising media.

To explore this situation with public broadcasting, I examined the reporting for NPR's news program, "All Things Considered," during February, 2014. I found the bias favoring women and against men staggering. It seems unlikely that all this negative focus on men and positive focus on women is by accident. It appears to be intentional. I found many of the effects of the sexism found in advertising media in ATC as well.

Positive portrayals of women and their activities are everywhere in the media. ATC's Olympic coverage followed this pattern. When "All Things Considered" was not giving results of events, but giving human-interest reports, ATC focused mostly on women. Examples included hockey player Kacey Bellamy (2/5) explaining how much her parents and little sister sacrificed so she could play hockey, slopestyle skier Devin Logan (2/10) also focusing on how much her family helped support her, Noelle Pikus-Pace (2/14) discussing how hard it was to balance motherhood and training for skeleton, and one report on the fitness of curlers (2/18) even mentioned that the men's Canadian team put out a beefcake calendar of shirtless team members. This non-advertising medium is falling over backwards to pander to women.

Most media today have a strong feminist bias. This bias often appears as promoting all rights for women but all responsibility for men. Public broadcasting and ATC probably have a stronger feminist bias than most. For example, on 2/7, ATC gave a mostly fair report on accusations of child sexual abuse against Woody Allen. However, the report did contain a quite feminist quote from a woman demanding that we automatically believe women and girls who claim sexual abuse. This, of course, assumes that women never lie, and would negate the fundamental legal concept of "innocent until proven guilty."

ATC gave two very feminist reports on American women's ski-jumping team members who fought to get the event into the Olympics. The reports contained the usual feminist accusations of discrimination and embarrassing excuses for not allowing women to compete (e.g., a woman's uterus might fall out). Of course, the official reasoning for not allowing women's ski-jumping was that it was too dangerous and the women were not competitive enough. These reasons were discounted in the reports.

This brings up another common effect of bias in the media: spinning situations hypocritically to either glorify women or portray them as victims—whichever benefits women the most. Often one situation can be spun in both ways. ATC's reporting on the American women's ski-jumping team did both. Women sued to get the event into this year's Winter Olympics. In the first segment (2/2) the women were portrayed as victims of the Olympic Committee who were unfairly denying women participation for spurious reasons—fear of injuries and lack of competition. However, in the second segment (2/11) we learn something conveniently left out of the first report—that our best female ski-jumper, Sarah Hendrickson, had a major knee injury six months before the Olympics. Instead of using this fact to imply that the Olympic Committee may have had a point about injuries, it was used in the story to explain Hendrickson's poor showing in the competition. ATC returned to portraying women as victims in a 2/12 segment on the physics of ski-jumping, where they expressed sympathy for another American ski-jumper, Lindsey Van, who also injured a knee—" jammed her leg bones together and her knee cartilage essentially exploded." Although not mentioned in any ATC program, Jessica Jerome, the final member of the American women's ski-jumping team, also has suffered a major knee injury.

There is a controversy currently in explaining why women seem to suffer more knee injuries than men for the same abuse (especially in basketball.) Some argue that women's knees are structurally different from men's, which leads to more injuries. Others counter that women have the same knee structure, but generally do not play sports as much, especially as youngsters. As a result, women have weaker leg muscles and do not learn how to cut and land in a way to avoid injury. But the ATC reports seemed to imply that the Olympic Committee was just a group of male chauvinist pigs unjustly victimizing women.

One does not need to be an expert to see that the Olympic Committee's point about lack of competitiveness may also be valid. There is a vast difference in the showings of men and women in many events, e.g., slope-style skiing, slope-style snowboarding, and moguls. This is something we all see, but we are not allowed to say out loud: the performances of the men are far more complex and dangerous. And the women's events are often on easier courses. Yet, women suffer more injuries—the women's rate of injury for all events was over 40% higher than men's during the 2010 Winter Olympics. It may be paternalistic, or it may be responsible for the Olympic Committee to take these issues into account. But the Olympic Committee did not deserve the treatment it got from ATC. After suing to be let into the Olympics in ski-jumping, I fear now that women will sue the Olympic Committee for being injured.

ATC's hypocrisy and spinning can also be seen in other Olympic coverage. As I mentioned earlier, skeleton athlete Noelle Pikus-Pace was portrayed as a victim when she complained of the difficulty of being a mother and training for the Olympics in a 2/14 ATC report. The segment left the impression that women have a much more difficult time participating in the Olympics than men. However, in a separate interview of Pikus-Pace airing on 2/24 (I guess women are important enough to highlight twice), we find that her husband took a leave of absence from his job in order to take care of their kids while she trained and competed. Why was this information not included in the earlier report.

Another example of bias found in advertising media as well as ATC is ignoring men and their activities, or highlighting negative aspects. Sports are not exclusively male activities anymore, but still, they are a major focus for most men. One of the major sporting events of the year is football's Super Bowl. ATC barely covered the game at all. However, the program did highlight several negative aspects of football. The ATC shows on the Friday and Saturday before the Sunday Super Bowl both carried reports on concussions in the NFL. The 2/14 program contained a report on Congresspeople demanding a name change for the Washington Redskins. A segment on bullying on the Miami Dolphins team also appeared on 2/14.

But ATC highlighted more positively features of the Super Bowl of more interest to women. The show on the day before the Super Bowl contained a segment on how advertisers were aiming at women during the game. The show on the day after the game contained a report on how entertainers benefited from performing during halftime.

Another common practice by the media is to purposely find women to highlight, and present them either as victims or as success stories. (A recent example of this in the general media is that all of the victims I have seen highlighted in news reports of GM's faulty ignition switch have been young women.) Women are often highlighted even if they are not direct victims. An example of this occurred in one of the segments on concussions in football mentioned above—a wife of an affected player revealed the effects of the concussions on her and her three daughters.

It appears ATC also purposely went looking for women to highlight in success stories. In a 2/5 story on the drought in California, ATC found a female mayor to interview. I found that about 25% of the mayors of California are female. So it is not unreasonable to assume that they picked a woman by chance. But still, it is 3 times more likely for ATC to have selected a male mayor, if the selection were made randomly. However, consider a segment on 2/13 concerning The Chronicle of Philanthropy's 50 top charity donors. The magazine's list contained 29 men, 18 couples and 3 women—Millicent Atkins being the only self-made woman on the list. Guess who ATC selected to highlight in it's report. That's right, ATC picked Atkins, even though she was listed 50th (ATC did not reveal this fact) and she died in 2012. It is unlikely that Adkins was chosen by chance. I also would think ATC would have picked a donor still alive so the segment could have included an interview. Instead, ATC instilled the story with feminist ideology by telling us how smart, frugal, and hard-working Atkins was, while working in a man's world.

Of course, in a negative story the media will find men to hold responsible. On 2/4, ATC presented a report on the insincerity of public apologies. ATC gave five examples in the report: Lance Armstrong, Chris Christie, Rob Ford, Sean Phillips (Denver Broncos), and Reed Hastings (Netflix.) All are men. I guess women never do anything that requires an apology.

A related strategy of the media is to hide male victimization. Instead of referring to male victims as "men," media often use words like "workers," "miners," or "people" to hide the gender of male victims or to imply that women are also victims. However, the media will almost always explicitly tell us of any female victims. On 2/5, ATC presented a segment on a report by the United Nations on child sexual abuse by Catholic priests. The transcript of the ATC story contained 12 uses of the words "child" or "children" even though the vast majority of victims have been boys—over 80%. The word "boys" did not appear in the report. Another example of this occurred on 2/26 in a report about the excessiveness of zero-tolerance programs in schools. The report mentioned blacks and Hispanics are punished more often for violations but neglected to mention that the vast majority of punished students are boys.

This effort to hide male victimization can be extreme. In another 2/26 report, female reporters discussed the murder of at least 59 "students" in a school in Nigeria by a militant group. The students were locked in a building which was set on fire. Any students who escaped were shot and their throats cut. It wasn't until halfway through the report that we learned that all of the students killed were boys. The girls in the school were told to go home. If only girls had been killed, I suspect ATC would have portrayed it as a horrific hate crime. But there was none of that for the boys. Instead, the reporter focused much of the report on the fact that a nearby girls' school had been closed in order to protect the girls. This resulted in a fear in the reporter that girls in this school and others would not receive needed education. But the reporter showed no concern for the education or lives of the boys who had been killed or the boys who also may refuse an education for fear for their own lives. This report not only minimized male victimization, but focused on a relatively minor victimization of girls. I find it incomprehensible that a journalist feels the education of girls is more important than the horrible slaughter of boys.

Another inclination of the media is to highlight the first woman to accomplish something. This is quite common. Oddly, we rarely hear about the first African-American, man, or other minority to achieve. ATC highlighted that Janet Yellen was the first female Chair of the Federal Reserve during its 2/11 show. Other media had mentioned this fact over and over, but it was odd that ATC was still mentioning this after Yellen had started her new position. Will ATC keep mentioning this forever? When will Yellen just be the "Chair of the Fed?"

This tendency was taken to an extreme on 2/27 when Cheryl Boone Isaacs, the current President of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, was described as "only the third female president" of the organization. The segment even mentioned the names of the first two female presidents. (To be fair, the segment also mentioned that Isaacs was also the first black president of the Academy.) How high will the numbers need to go before ATC does not need to mention this aspect of women's achievement? It must also be noted that the main point of the report was to expose the white-male makeup of the Academy and possible bias in the Academy Awards.

The media also seem to concentrate much attention on breast cancer. Any new medical development obtains national attention. I think it is safe to say that breast cancer is the most media-covered disease in the country. One would think that the most-covered disease would not predominately be restricted to half of the population. On 2/12, ATC covered the release of a Canadian study concerning the value of mammograms. The study found that mammograms do little to save lives. This is a controversial topic and receives much debate. There is a similar debate in the medical field concerning men and prostate cancer, but it receives little media attention.

Violence against women, especially sexual violence, also seems to get more attention than the statistics would lead one to expect. After all, men are the victims of violence far more often than women. Yet, the focus in the media is on violence against women. On 2/11, ATC had a segment on a conference on sexual assault on campus. The report gave as fact a controversial statistic that 25% of college women report being sexually assaulted. (The reporter attributed the statistic to a Center for Disease Control study, but it appears to be from an almost 20-year-old Department of Justice survey with fundamental credibility problems. The survey concluded 25% of women in college were victims of rape OR attempted rape.) The segment also quotes a student who states that we should focus primarily on abusers and not on alcohol, drugs, hooking up, or other contributing factors. (In other words, women can do whatever they want even though feminism will continue to blame men–all men–with the inventions of "rape culture" and the "patriarchy.") But the segment had little discussion of new rules and standards implemented by the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights. Universities must now use the lower evidence standard of "preponderance of evidence" instead of "clear and convincing evidence," and can deny lawyers, witnesses, or any cross-examination in disciplinary proceedings. This allows universities to punish men for sexual abuse with little more than an accusation—something that cannot happen in the criminal justice system. It undermines the concept of due process and turns our colleges into kangaroo courts.

Book reviews are a frequent feature on ATC. Most of these during the month were slanted toward women, promoting female authors or books about women and their interests. Segments included reviews of books highlighting the history of perfumes, one woman's World War I story, a woman's childhood expressed in poetry, short stories about relationships, a woman's adventures after being kicked out of a conservative sect, an historical romance in China, and a singer disappointed in her partner and life. There was even a segment on a beginning writer winning a contest to have her romance novel published. And strangely, An Unnecessary Woman was reviewed twice.

ATC focused on women in many other reports during the month. These segments included reports on the lack of contestants for agricultural queen contests (2/3), a presidential debate in Afghanistan which discussed how to preserve women's rights (2/7), romance novels (2/9), getting more women into NASCAR (2/15), focusing on girls getting vaccinated against HPV (2/19), Native-American women and domestic violence (2/20), how the American Bar Association underrates women (2/26), and how managers refuse to let women telework (2/27). The focus was on women throughout the month.

On those rare occasions where men as men were mentioned, it was usually in a negative context. For example, a segment on 2/16 was entitled "Fumbling Through Fatherhood." In a 2/25 segment on dating for older singles, a woman stated that even if the men she dates are older, that does not mean they are mature. This same woman said she had no luck meeting a man at work. Of course, a man trying to meet a woman at work probably would have turned into a segment on sexual harassment.

Even a report on President Obama's Program, "My Brother's Keeper," on 2/27, could not let stand that young minority men have disadvantages and are victims. The report included a quote that these men should not receive special treatment. It also contained an admonition from the President that even though the program was there to help them, the men have a great responsibility to help themselves. Wow! I do not remember seeing anything like that in any of the many reports about women's victimizations. Again, women have rights, men have responsibilities.

Here is one final shameful and odd example of bias on NPR. It appears the quiz show "Wait, Wait, Don't Tell Me" has been guilty of cheating in order to give women a better chance to win. (It is difficult to know for sure, since it appears many questions and answers are edited out of the show—an absolutely odd thing to do on a quiz show.) Men on the show have often suffered the disadvantage of fewer questions. This resulted in women being only 42% of the contestants in 2013, but 63% of the winners. The cheating appears to have stopped, but please check out past shows athttp://www.npr.org/programs/wait-wait-dont-tell-me/archive. Observe the number of questions for each player during the Lightning Fill-In-The-Blank section at the end of the show.

PBS's problems are similar to those at NPR. The network has aired many programs just for women with nothing comparable for men: "Women and Money," "Menopause and Beyond," "Living Courageously: the Spirit of Women," "Powder and Glory" (women and cosmetics), "On the Contrary," "Unleash the Power of the Female Brain," Apollo Wives on "American Experience," "Women War and Peace," "Makers: Women Who Make America," "Women Who Rock," "Breaking the Silence," and "Telling Amy's Story."

Regular programming such as "Bill Moyers," "Nova," "Need To Know," "POV," "News Hour" and "Frontline" also often have had shows from a very pro-woman and anti-male perspective. Examples include speculation that Shakespeare was a woman and that Einstein stole his ideas from his first wife. Interviews have included Kavita Ramdas of the Global Fund for Women, Gloria Steinem, Leymah Gbowee of the Liberian women's peace movement, and Billie Jean King. Subjects have included the women's movement, nerdy women ignored for being too smart, women balancing life and work, powerful women and other feminist ideology. The day before the Super Bowl, the "News Hour" had a segment on sex trafficking near the game. Wordgirl is a superhero who usually defeats bad men. Even "Sesame Street" has angelic female characters but mean, grumpy, stupid, and obnoxious male characters.

It is evident that public broadcasting is heavily biased for women and against men—and it appears to be intentional. This is surprising given that NPR and PBS do not have the advertising pressures that many other media have. Also public broadcasting has governmental overview. Public broadcasting should be fairer than most other media. But this does not appear to be the case.

Do not take my word for it. Transcripts and audio recordings of the ATC programs mentioned above are online at http://www.npr.org/programs/all-things-considered/archive. Please see and hear for yourself. I assume NPR will not delete or change them in response to this article.

This constant positivity toward women and negativity toward men in advertising media as well as public broadcasting must have an effect on our children. Girls must grow up believing they are superior as well as constant victims. Boys must see themselves as worthless dregs. This needs to stop, especially in public broadcasting.

I used to donate to my local NPR and PBS stations. I will not contribute again until the bias stops. Perhaps Congress could encourage public broadcasting to stop the sexism.

A Handshake in Passing

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 10 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Good things come from having more participants in a global discussion.

The MGTOW movement's exponential growth hit a new milestone at the founding of mgtow.com, a one-stop station on the information superhighway with a route leading only where the visitor wants to go.

In case any of you happen to have been comatose in the past couple of years, MGTOW stands for "Men Going Their Own Way," and it refers to a group of individuals who decided that their lives are their own, and no one else's. It is not my intention to offer an exact definition of what makes a MGHOW (Man Going His Own Way), but one sentiment in MGTOW holds true: A man is his own boss.

A MGHOW is a self-made Divergent, meaning he has consciously decided to be incompatible with a system ready to exploit him. While it is not our business to tell any man what to do with his life (even if he decides to live the stereotypical school-job-wife-kids-lawsuit-resentment-death template), we are happy to see more and more men realize that there are more choices available to them than what society tries to make obvious or easy.

The founding of mgtow.com is only the next example of a new cultural awareness. The site would not exist if there was not an entire community of self-owning individuals ready to make their voices heard.

Any place where people can stop by to share experiences that go beyond the restrictive rules of society weakens the tyranny of conventional systems by simply existing. Gynocentric or misandric agents will try to use shame and ridicule to silence, but such opposition only strengthens MGTOW resolve.

If you are a MGHOW that joined mgtow.com, I extend my hand to you at this moment for a handshake and a welcome. We have crossed paths on roads less traveled, but we will part, possibly temporarily, on own adventures in life. Although I may not agree with everything you say on varying topics, no opinion of mine makes me hesitate in welcoming you and mgtow.com on the map. At the end of the day, your life is yours, and my life is mine. We stand in solitude, not necessarily united or divided, but as who we are with the relationships we choose to make on our own.

The picture is of the beginning of a society after hitting the reset button.

I could go on to describe mgtow.com in other ways, but there is one philosophical oddity that I cannot reconcile: MGTOW and mgtow.com defies description itself. The community lacks a centralized, institutional definition, which by nature enables the freedom and self-actualization necessary to respect a man as his own man. At the risk of seeming hypocritical, I would compare MGTOW in a Taoism in one sense: The mere act of describing the experience of life under it, you fail to capture its pure essence. It is not identity, it is not dogma, it is just new minds and new faces on a crumbling foundation that does not know how to handle new agents.

Mgtow.com, welcome to the stage. I simply offer you a handshake, and wish you the best on your journey.

After all, it's yours.

The Mask You Live In (Parody)

AVfM Video Source · 11 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is a parody of The Mask You Live In.

▶ OFFICIAL – http://RobHustle.com
▶ FACEBOOK – http://Facebook.com/RobHustle
▶ TWITTER- http://Twitter.com/RobHustle

What the fuck is infanticide?

John Hembling (JtO) · 12 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On April 10, 2014 Huffington Post ran an article summarizing the guilty verdict handed down by a Vancouver court to child killer Sarah Leung. The former mother had twice placed her newborn in a plastic bag and left it out with the trash. Only one of the dead infant's bodies was found.

The article itself opens with the following:

> A Vancouver jury has convicted a 28-year-old woman of two counts of infanticide in the separate deaths of her two newborn sons, finding her guilty of a lesser crime than second-degree murder.
>
> The jury returned with the verdicts for Sarah Leung on Thursday night, concluding six days of deliberations following a trial that began in February.
>
> Leung's lawyer, Richard Fowler, said Friday the case remains an "abject tragedy" but that the jury came back with the right decision.
>
> "I think personally it's an example of our justice system at its absolute best," he said in an interview.

If this is our justice system at its best, we are all in fucking trouble.

If Sarah Leung's infants had been killed by a man, say, for example, the father – would the charge have been infanticide? Or would it have been the far more serious crime of murder?

You, reading this article, should know the answer. I don't even need to state it here.

So what the fuck is infanticide?

It's a lesser criminal offence, introduced in Canada in 1948 as alternative to what previously would be categorized as murder. However, prior to the introduction of the statute, Canadian juries often found women not guilty even in the face of overwhelming evidence.

Infanticide was a legal innovation allowing juries to produce a guilty verdict where they would have previously refused, because the murderers were female.

Juries, whether Canadian or otherwise, have never had any difficulty convicting men who kill infants. In the modern social context, wherein a newborn doesn't threaten the family, mother, or tribe by draining scarce resources, murdering an infant is abominable.

So why does infanticide exist? Why are women given the unique privilege of killing their babies with a legal escape hatch from criminal responsibility?

Either women are inferior, less capable than male adult people and the law recognizes this as fact, or women are socially superior, of a higher caste, held exempt from the laws against murder which govern other, less privileged groups.

Possibly, in a slightly variant version of the first narrative, inferiority and imbecility is fabricated and maintained by women in order to accomplish the second scenario – a supreme social caste positioned above the law.

Manslaughter is also a lesser offence than murder. In Canada it carries a minimum sentence of 4 years in prison, and a maximum life sentence. The premise that the legal system lacked a description for crimes not quite murderous is erroneous. We had that covered.

Unless you're a woman who murders a baby.

Section 237 of the criminal code of Canada states: "Every female person who commits infanticide is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years."

Sexually selective justice has no place in any society where men and women are supposedly equal under, and before the law.

[image]

Canada's Infanticide Culture: MRA on Newstalk 1010

A Voice for Men News · 12 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Raz of Men's Rights Edmonton recently appeared on Newstalk 1010 in Toronto, where he got some irrational harassment and scoffing, although he acquitted himself well. Make special note of how they questioned whether or not letting women off easy if they murder is really something people should be concerned about, then read the news below:

Almost on queue, after the scoffing of the Newstalk 1010 set, and the abuse Raz got for saying women are given special privilege and treatment in Canada and not equality, news broke in Canada that a woman who in 2010 killed one of her children, then in 2011 killed another one, hiding both in the trash, was let off with a wrist slap because of special laws that give women only light punishment for killings that would put a man in jail probably for life.

This leads many in the Men's Rights Community, having said all along that the idea that Canada is a "rape culture" is nonsense, to start wondering openly: is the truth that Canada suffers from an Infanticide Culture?

Will Canada's feminist establishment continue to defend these obscene laws giving special privilege to women? We predict the ones in power will–even if the ordinary, everyday coffee shop feminist thinks it should be different and keep repeating the obscene lie that "feminism is about equality."

The reaction to the Women Eating On The Tube site shows exactly how sexist, hypocritical – and humourless – feminism can be

Peter Lloyd · 12 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sorry sisters, but the double-standard reaction to 'Women Eating On The Tube' shows exactly how hypocritical – and humourless – feminism can be.

After 48 hours of brow-beating and trolling, Britain's feminist community are hoping that a fun, irreverent, tongue-in-cheek blog about ladies masticating in public will be removed from the internet.

The Women Who Eat On Tubes group, which was set-up in 2011 and has more than 21,000 members, has sparked controversy in recent days with opponents claiming it encourages people to 'objectify and humiliate women' who are unaware their picture is being taken.

Film-maker Tony Burke, who set up the Facebook page in 2011, has insisted it was created as a 'human observation' that more women ate on the Tube than men and he had not intended to hurt anybody.

A British Transport Police spokesman has since admitted that three people have contacted them about the group, including one woman who had her picture posted online.

Speaking to MailOnline, Mr Burke, 39, said he is now weighing up whether to shut down the page due to the 'constant barrage of toxic hatred' on social media. 'I'm considering taking the group down,' he said.

'I need to think about it carefully. I don't want to be seen to be backing down but I need to think about my family.

'There are more important things to think about.' And he's right – there are much bigger fish to fry.

One example is TubeCrush: a website which has encouraged women to objectify men on the London Underground without their knowledge for more than three years.

When it became a global sensation in 2011, it was lauded as a peak-time pastime by everything from Pinterest to the Evening Standard, who wrote a gushing feature about it, claiming: 'Flirty females are using their smartphones to capture the dishiest of the Underground's two million daily commuters, and uploading the unsuspecting men onto hit website TubeCrush.net.

'The cute commuters are then rated and commented on by admiring women – with surveys taken as to which Tube lines have the hottest men (so far, overwhelmingly, the Northern line is winning).'

How creepy.

Here we had women taking pictures of men based on their looks, their muscles and the bulge in their trousers – with the sole intention of humiliating them.

[image]

Disturbingly, some of the lads in the photographs didn't always look old enough to be sixteen, while others – wearing shorts in the summer – were snapped sitting down as the material rode up their legs.

I couldn't help but wonder: how desperate were these women?

Given that this all started happening at a time when a record number of female teachers were sleeping with male minors (and, of course, frequently avoiding jail) this was hardly something to encourage.

Shortly after the advent of TubeCrush, another blog called 'Men Taking Up Too Much Space On The Train' was launched – and hailed as hilarious.

One columnist in Grazia even celebrated it by saying: 'I love it. Now when will there be one about men taking up too much space in the world?'

Soon after, when Game Of Thrones actor Richard Madden used the Bakerloo Line and sat with his legs slightly apart for comfort, one woman publicly demanded he be – and I quote – 'castrated.'

Hilariously, when the tables are turned – even in a way that is utterly non-sexual and non-violent, like women eating food on public transport – it's considered misogynistic.

How hypocritical.

Yes, had Tony Burke's blog been the first-of-a-kind, I would probably agree that it was violating with a little 'v.'

I would also wonder whether it stemmed from casual, everyday sexism. But, given that these women started it all, they've got no right to complain.

Sure, they think they're redressing an age-old imbalance of being found attractive by heterosexual men, but objectification is nothing new for both genders. In fact, women frequently objectify men via their wallets.

If they are sex objects, then men are success objects. Now, thanks to TubeCrush, they're also being leered at by peeping toms in pencil skirts.

But, as TubeCrush is about to re-launch with a bigger and 'better' site, how can men take action?

The answer: turn the tables and play them at their own game.

I was once travelling on the Northern Line when a young woman was trying to surreptitiously take a photograph of a man in a suit.

Hilariously, her flash went off – at which point he started filming her with plans to put the footage on YouTube – which caused her to scurry off at the next stop in shame.

That's because what he did is exactly what the Women Eating blog does – it holds a mirror up to double standards and levels the playing field.

It takes away the thrill of it all, which – in women's case – is objectifying without being objectified.

The same thing happened when a bunch of female law students from Australia recreated the Robin Thicke video for Blurred Lines with men in pants. It was the best way to make their point.

But, given that countless feminists have been unable to recognise this, what can we all learn from from this week's furore?

That feminism – for all its gains, for all its boldness – is still marred by irrational double-standards. On the one hand we're told that women must be treated equally to men, but when they are – for good and bad – they don't like it.

Quite frankly, they've got off lightly.

Imagine if, like millions of British men, women were routinely denied access to their children in a divorce.

Or if schools were failing girls more than any other social group. Or if 99 per cent of the war dead were female.

Or if women died ten years earlier than men because the NHS didn't dole out equal funding.

Guys taking pictures of women on the underground is nothing in comparison. It also isn't sexist or sinister, but simply boy power.

Normally, I'd dread travelling by the tube at rush hour: there's always some wretch who stands on my Grenson brogues or a tourist with no sense of special awareness.

Or, worse, a teenage girl who thinks she deserves to be given a seat by an old man simply because she's female.

But, now, my journey will take on a whole new level of enjoyment, because – just like women across London – I'll also board the love train with my camera at the ready.

Isn’t equality wonderful?

This article was originally published in mailonline, and is reposted here with Mr. Lloyd’s permission.

The Silence Is Deafening: Feminist Establishment Challenged

Dan Perrins · 12 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

April 8, 2014 is a day for the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) to remember. On that day, an activist group from the MHRM attended a feminist lecture to ask questions.

Our destination: Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario

Our reasons:

1) To protest and to provide a public service announcement about a resident educator from Queen's University: one Adele Mercier. Mercier made public her views about incarcerated juvenile males who are sexually abused by adult female staff. She suggested that some of those sexually abused youth were "asking for it." According to Mercier, the sexual abuse is actually consensual sex because some of the youth surveyed admitted to initiating the sexual acts. Those juveniles wanted sex with the adult women who were in positions of absolute authority over the incarcerated youth. A prohibited sexual union. There can be no legal, meaningful, or enthusiastic consent given in a jailor-prisoner relationship.

A silent, pervasive power reminds those who are incarcerated that they are at the mercy of their jailor at all times.

That same silent power silences victims' voices from being heard.

2) To present alternative views to feminist theory, to ask questions, and to protest at a panel discussion entitled "What's Feminism Got To Do With It?" hosted by the Levana Gender Advocacy Centre, at which Mercier was scheduled to speak. Shortly before the talk, the centre announced that Mercier had been removed from the panel, claiming that she had been removed from the event about a week prior.

This reporter can confirm that that claim is a lie. Here is a screen grab from April 4, 2014, in which Mercier is listed as being a panel member: APR 8_ What's Feminism Got To Do With It_ _ QueensEvents

The special guest speaker was Jaclyn Friedman, the same valley-girl feminist ABC's 20/20 went to when A Voice for Men founder and publisher Paul Elam was interviewed by 20/20 last year. ABC has been silent about that fiasco too—well mostly. They did issue a retraction in regards to the libel they engaged in.

We arrived at Queen's University around 5 p.m. after making a couple of stops for coffee and a few last-minute supplies. The ride was filled with optimism and speculation about what would be awaiting us when we arrived. (We did enjoy a few laughs at recent feminist antics; they do make it so very easy to ridicule them.)

We also discussed some of the issues men face. The MHRM is never silent about the issues facing half the population, which, inevitably, as a sexually dimorphic species, affect all of the human race.

Unlike feminists.

Well, that's not entirely correct. Some feminists, like Mercier, do speak about some of the issues, but the problem is that Mercier and her ilk try to diminish the crimes committed against males by insinuating that they asked for it. Mercier et al. are fine with males being the victims of female-perpetrated crimes and abuse. Their only concern is that no female should be punished for her crimes against a male.

Their end game is to silence male victims, the same silencing/censoring game they've been playing for about 50 years now.

And now their feminist silencing/censoring of male victims has become deafening.

But society is no longer listening to feminist silencing/censoring tactics. They are listening to the voices of those who recognize the suffering and issues faced by all humans. In short, they are listening to the MHRM.

Society is listening to the silenced voices, the censored voices.

Upon our arrival, we split into two groups to poster the high-traffic areas surrounding Queen's University while remaining respectful of the more aesthetically pleasing structures around the university and keeping them poster-free.

We were not there to employ feminist tactics. We have respect for—and show that respect to—communities. Nor do we care to recklessly endanger lives by creating false alarms.

But we did get busy hanging those babies up high and in the most visible places we could find.

We weren't silent while postering: if the opportunity presented itself, we engaged individuals in conversation as we provided a public service announcement to the citizens of Kingston and the population of Queen's University.

We managed to get in about an hour's worth of postering before proceeding to the lecture hall.

Things got interesting when we were about to enter the event. Security personnel met us and informed us that six people had been singled out for refusal of entrance: Steve Brulé, his assistant, and the four of us.

We had some questions about their attempts to refuse our entry, but security personnel were fairly limited in their replies. I can understand why. They hadn't been given answers either. All they knew was that the organizers had requested that we be denied entry. The Levana Gender Advocacy Centre was attempting to censor non-feminists' questions and comments.

They wanted silence.

Our group was not willing to be deterred by the proxy thuggery requested from Queen's security via the Levana Gender Advocacy Centre. I want to make it very clear that Queen's University security personnel were professional at every step of the way in their actions. Any heated discussions that took place were due to the event organizers' lack of inclusiveness.

Yes, you heard me right, feminism—that great institution of inclusiveness—was not acting so inclusively. In fact, they were exclusionary in their acts. We, apparently, had the "wrong-coloured" feminist skin and were to be denied a drink at this privileged propoganda fountain.

They wanted to silence any discussion that might lead people to understand that feminism doesn't have the solutions for the issues males face. Any discussion that would show people that being a non-feminist and part of the MHRM doesn't indicate you hate women. Or doesn't mean that you want to restrict women's voices or rights.

The Levana Gender Advocacy Centre wanted to silence equal compassion, consideration, and care for men. The centre and its feminist theory have been doing it so very well for the last 50 years or so. The threat of proxy violence via security personnel was a direct result of that inclusive silence demanded by feminism.

Their attempts at thug rule didn't stop there either.

Outside the entrance was a group of about 10 to 15 people. They had angry, stern looks on their faces and stood like they were on guard. I wondered if they were aware of the violence feminists are known for and were there to prevent it from happening again. They even had a dog with them. It was a fairly muscular dog, looked to be a Boxer cross (I later found out is was a Boxer–Rhodesian Ridgeback cross). I was concerned for the dog's well being—if it were bitten by a feminist, who knows what type of rabidness might infect its gentle nature.

This gang was there at the request of feminists. They were thug vigilantes (or "thugilantes") brought in by feminists to inflict proxy violence and to intimidate any non-feminists into silence.

Obviously, this group was lied to by feminists and had not met anyone from the MHRM; nor had they ever met anyone like me.

I interacted with them, asking some questions. I asked them if the dog bites; the reply was no. So I asked to pet the dog and was given permission. I gave "Fido" a good scratch behind the ears. Fido's reply was a silent, happy, vigorous wagging of his tail.

I am still concerned for that dog's well-being. He was brought there as an intimidation tactic, to be used as a weapon if need be. That noble animal would have ended up being destroyed if he were used as intended that night.

Finally, after some lengthy discussions, we were permitted access to the lecture. We were given stern warnings about being disruptive, although we weren't told how the organizers defined "disruptive."

Would the use of horns, noise makers, and yelling out lies be considered disruptive? The very same actions that feminists took when Dr. Janice Fiamengo spoke here a week prior? Disruption was not what we were there for, nor would it be our form of protest. We leave the childish and life-endangering tactics to feminists; they have lots of experience with it.

After the lecture was done, the floor opened up for a Q&A. The look of fear on the faces of the feminist panel members every time we raised our hands to ask a question was enjoyable. What was not so enjoyable was how the mic runners continually ignored our raised hands. If you paid attention, you could see what was happening. When one of us would raise our hand and a feminist noticed, she or he immediately raised their hand. Even though we had raised our hands first, the feminists were handed the mic and given the chance to ask a question.

When the feminists in the crowd started to run out of questions, I watched as one feminist about four rows in front of us and sitting with one of the mic runners scrambled to come up with a question. She immediately raised her hand and managed some inane praising question that had already been answered by the panel.

At this point, I'd had enough. I calmly stood up with my hands behind my back and waited. Jim got a little nervous and asked me to sit down, so I had a quick conversation with him and did so. But the intentional ignoring of our attempts to put forth questions continued, so I stood back up.

I stood their silently, symbolic of the silence and censoring of male victims. The same silence demanded of males by feminists for the last 50 years.

And then something amazing happened.

A female audience member noticed me standing in silence and raised her hand. When the mic runner approached her, she didn't ask a question but pointed out the silent elephant in the room.

The silent elephant she pointed out was how the Levana Gender Advocacy Centre's leaders and volunteers were actively silencing voices. The voices of those who would scrutinize their feminist hypotheses. The voices who would bring logic and rationale to the discussion instead of fear and hyperbole.

It was that peaceful, silent protest that the public in attendance that night paid attention to. They had witnessed what feminists are capable of and were not impressed.

The silence of male victims is deafening and is driving feminist rhetoric out of public discussions.

Ignoring the abuse of fathers

Clint Carpentier · 12 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've heard the stories, heard the screams. I've gazed upon the cradled babies in the nursery ward. Giving birth is an amazing feat of zero skill, and it still amazes me. It amazes me that this is the epitome, the pinnacle, the supposed female trump card to all male accomplishments. A man lands on the moon with analogue technology and proves Galileo's theory of air resistance, but never mind that, another woman gave birth, just as well as any other female animal on the planet. A man creates life in a petri-dish, but never mind that, some broad stole his sperm and created life herself.

Anyway, I'm not knocking the dangers of labor, men know all about the dangers of labor; there really ought to be a better word for giving birth.

So here, we have the amazing feat of giving birth. Your life is in jeopardy for a matter of hours, a few times in your life. The number is less than three if you're an educated career woman. Of course lesser educated educated, less talented, less professionally accomplished women, tend to have far greater experience in the field of giving birth.

This is the only "job" affording prestige, praise, and credit, for just exercising a biological function. So, why is it a trump card? If I hadn't spayed her, my dog could do it. Our pets are so good at this that we have to spay and neuter them, lest we're inundated with kittens and puppies.

I have an aunt who was so prodigious a natural birther, my uncle swears that when he arrived at the hospital (half-corked), the nurse stepped out to fetch the doctor because it was time, and my aunt shot him with his second child. "The door had just closed, and I shit you not, there was a baby in my arms, while I was still on the other side of the room." Of course, not all births are this easy.

But I'm not interested in the obvious center of the show here.

I lucked out, my wife can't dilate more than six centimeters, so she has to plan cesareans. I wasn't around for the first attempted natural birth, which took three days of hoping, and finally an emergency c-sec. She told me a few stories about a nursing nun who was being snarky at her agony. No, I want to focus on something else, and I want to be told I'm wrong; I wanna be shown evidence proving I'm wrong.

You see, I have also heard stories, have also seen the scratches and bite marks, on the fathers who braved the maternity ward. And these same brave men praise the bravery of the mothers of their children. They proudly display scars the mothers-to-be inflicted upon them during the ordeal. Sometimes a father will reminisce amusingly about how he'd been temporarily deafened when she had screamed right in his ear for waxing sympathetically over her tribulations.

I hear these stories only from men. I know, men aren't the only people comforting these women during birth; some women don't have a man at the time. But what I don't hear, are these stories from the female nurses, friends, mothers, sisters, etc, who are there to console and coach these single mothers-to-be. Why is it, I'm only hearing accounts of weathering physical abuse and injury from the fathers?

You see, if I am correct, and it is only fathers who suffer this abuse, then delivery of such injury is selective. I can see no call for it. In fact, fathers-to-be should avoid the maternity ward altogether, as they are obviously not welcome. If birthing is license to mistreat, abuse, or injure a father in the witness of medical professionals, then what deterrent exists, preventing continued abuse in private? And for that matter, what indication is there that she doesn't abuse him already? If endangering your own life once or twice provides license to abuse a man, what does that say about our society. Particularly when he endangers his own life as a matter of routine to support you?

So, I want to hear a rational female explanation. Tell me how I've got it wrong.

The sacred cow of maternity

Hopeland Cash · 13 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My article from last week about paper abortion has led to some interesting discussion, online and off. What I've been brewing on since, however, isn't the topic of abortions or paper abortions themselves, but a question that will occur to anyone who dares try to discuss them: Why is men's right to paper abortions so fiercely opposed? In almost any venue, anger at the specter of "infringement" of women's right borders on the rabid and irrational. I saw this within my own family and it appears in the media whenever paper abortions are discussed. Why is that?

I come from a liberal family and have three sisters of varying ages and a not-so-varying stance on my status as a Men's Right Activist. I wrote the article about paper abortion knowing full well (and maybe hoping just a little) how controversial it would be among the general population and my own family. I knew my sisters wouldn't agree with any argument in favor of paper abortions, nor would any left-of-center woman. Hell, far-right women would probably say I'm encouraging "deadbeat" behavior.

But that's the point that kept coming to mind for me. Why is abortion and paper abortion such a hot-button topic? Few things get people so worked up. Abortion (non-paper) has come to be seen as a "basic right", but how can any right be "basic" if it is only granted to half the population? After all, only a little over 10% of abortions are for health/safety reasons. For the rest, it is effectively a 'morning-after-the-morning-after' solution, emergency birth control. Handy, definitely, so why so much opposition to giving men a legal equivalent?

I think it's not really about abortion at all, and what made me realize this was a conversation I had while making breakfast. It was shortly after the publication of my article and I was discussing it with some family members. Not female family members, though. My father and teenage brother. Both of them are well aware of the many issues faced by men, but neither is as much of an MRA as me (Red Pills for Christmas?). We were discussing the article, and by extension abortion and paper abortion and men's responsibility and women's rights and all the other bullshit feminists try to block paper abortion with. The usual (and irrational) argument is that men don't give birth, can't understand it, don't bear the same burdens, and so can't be given the same rights of choice. In essence I argued back that childbirth is nothing special and so there's no reason for women to have exclusive access to abortions. I admit, I was a little worked up; it happens easily when discussing men's rights. Eventually, to make my point, a bit hyperbolically, I said:

> Giving birth is no different than taking a piss.

Now, remember, these were two men I was talking to, both moderately well informed about the MRM, and yet their response was down right chilly. They weren't hostile but both were perhaps just a bit short of shocked. Even for me, this was apparently an extreme stance.

But I kept arguing the point logically.

- Giving birth is a biological function.
- Women evolved to give birth.
- Almost every mammal on the planet does it.
- There's nothing special about the act of childbirth.

But no, it seemed I had sinned. The discussion quickly died away and I was left with the distinct feeling I had violated a taboo.

If I ever drop that line on one of my sisters, I'm bringing a flak jacket.

All that is anecdotal, yes, but it is illustrative of how a larger social construct filters its way down into our thoughts and our daily lives. Our society is suffering from a Maternity Cult. I don't mean a literal cult, but a cultural complex which mythologizes and even deifies childbearing. This is nothing new, of course. Fertility goddesses and reverence for childbearing date well into pre-history. It is likely humans were worshiping childbirth before they'd figured out men were involved. (Probably still footing the bill back then, though)

But even today? Yes, even today, even in the developed, secular world. Women's status as incubators grants them most if not all of their social privilege. They are viewed as the creators of life, hence women and children first and the tendency (policy) of the mainstream media to always paint female deaths in war zones as far more tragic than those of men. Throughout the ages, women have been considered more reproductively valuable, despite most societies being monogamous. The whole mystique of women as nurturing, caring, delicate beings deserving protection and special consideration stems, I think, from their childbearing function. Biologically, it is the only unique feature of the sex. They're smaller, yes, but short men receive no such special treatment. Motherhood is the driving force behind female privilege, and therefore a driving force behind feminism, which seeks to enhance female privilege while avoiding any social responsibility.

Hence the bloody war over abortion, paper and medical. Women's ability to bear children is worshiped, and therefore they are granted total control over the children they miraculously, mercifully, beautifully bring into the world. Child custody imbalance, maternal gatekeeping, international kidnapping, abusive behavior during birth, murderous behavior after birth. All tolerated, not just because the child belongs to the woman, which it effectively does in today's world, but because society wants us to act like she did us a favor by giving birth so we shouldn't question her in any way regarding the child. Mother knows best.

I'm not saying pregnant women shouldn't be given consideration. Like anyone in an altered state of health, their diminished physical capacities should be taken into account. But let's be realistic and practical and still treat these women as adults. Adults undergoing a draining physical experience, but still adults. It was their choice, after all.

The extreme opposition to paper abortion is just one part of this cultural mindset of mommy-worship. To grant men any control/influence over how/when/if a child is raised would be to infringe on woman's divine status as Chalice of Life. It's not even up for discussion if a woman should have exclusive control of any given power over 'her' child. Automatic yes. To suggest otherwise, whether by calling for paper abortions or simply agitating for equality in family law, is seen as an affront to womanhood itself, the purest form of misogyny, a violation of their god-given rights of motherhood.

Now, let me be clear. I am pro-choice (or anti-life, your call); I think women should have the right to abortions. But it is time to cut all the crap worship of childbearing as if it is a magical, mystical, rainbow-infused super-power granted unto them by almighty Mother Earth over which men have no rights.

Giving birth is a biological function that evolved over millions of years, in humans as well as in just about every other female with hair/fur on the planet. But people still seem to think childbearing is some sort of sacred endeavor. A common argument is that it is so "dangerous" to give birth. Well, maybe it was a century ago, but not so much today. In the U.S., less than a thousand women die during childbirth each year. That makes the odds less than one in one-hundred-and-fifty-thousand. That makes it about as dangerous as being a truck driver. And truck drivers are over 90% male. We're even.

No, I won't worship women for giving birth. There is nothing special or sacred about the event. It is a natural biological mechanism. We praise small children when they successfully relieve themselves, but after a certain age successfully carrying out your body's automatic functions should lose its sense of wonder. Men are often ridiculed for being comically obsessed with biological functions like farting, belching and urinating, but women obsess over their periods and pregnancies and then receive special privilege for it.

Who is it that never grows up?

Giving birth is not the most important achievement. However, what is special, what does set humans apart of other animals on Earth, is what comes after.

Parenting. That is the miracle. What has made humans great and allowed us to build a civilization out of the dust is our ability to communicate and to teach our children, to pass on our knowledge. Any rabbit can give birth to a litter, but only humans can bond, nurture and teach in the way we do. Only we pass stories down through the generations, leave legacies for our offspring and build a world that will be better for them.

And men do it too. Pregnancy and childbirth is a biological function, a side-effect of intercourse. It's not sacred, but what we do with the result can be. The modern maternity cult blinds people to the contribution of fathers, allows for the abuse of children by unfit mothers, and strangles society with the demands of privilege for the supposedly incredible act of childbearing.

If we stop worshiping women for giving birth, we can focus on what really matters: the needs of the children that come from it. They're the miracle. Mothers and fathers both make them happen, but the real work only begins after the first nine months.

Feature image by William Murphy

Delicate patriarchy victim Amanda Marcotte is learning to think

August Løvenskiolds · 13 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I still remember the look in my father's eyes when I first learned to ride a bicycle.

It was rough going – I crashed and crashed but I was determined to get it right. Dad both encouraged me and made it clear that I could always try again tomorrow with no loss of his love or respect. Finally – finally – the wobbles damped out and I made it all the way down the street, and back, without falling.

Dad was crying. I didn't understand his emotion then, but his little boy was growing up. The milestones of life are often wet with tears.

As one grows and matures, one's understanding of life's complexities grows more profound. Whether riding a bike, mastering the nuances of formal logic, chess, forensics, video games, quantum physics, or individual spirituality, the growth of our mental and physical processes is a remarkable testament to our humanity, our humility, and our roles in community.

Our growth gives us valuable, and even critical insights into both the world and the people around us. The cost of growth can be high – we shed the innocence of youth, the idealism, and the friends we can no longer relate to. Often, those former friends misunderstand our growth as a betrayal of those core principles that informed those friendships.

If, for example, you were friends and allies with Suey #CancelColbert Park, but you come to the startling conclusion that white men are people, too, then Suey will hate you like the treacherous sea swallows ships:

> Salon: What is the best way to work with white people, to get them on our side?
>
> Suey Park: I don't want them on our side.
>
> You don't want them on your side.
>
> This is not reform, this is revolution.
>
> So what do you want to see happen in your revolution?
>
> I mean, it's already happening I think. The revolution will not be an apocalypse, it's gonna be a series of shifts in consciousness that result in actions that come about, and I think that like, at this point is really like, ride or die, in terms who's in and who is out. I don't play by appeasement politics, it is not about getting my oppressors to humanize me. And in that sense I reject the respectability politics, I reject being tone-policed, I think we need to do away with this idea that these structures are … that the prisons can undergo reform and somehow do less violence as a structure. But any example like that.
>
> Wait, can you ask that question again, I got distracted real quick, there was a bird outside my window.

Ah, the sweet, easily distracted idealistic stupidity of youth! Oops – I just humanized that bigot. Yikes.

Many Men's Human Rights Advocates despair of debating with feminists and I share their concerns – feminists seem trapped in a stage of moral development devoid of the understanding of either societal morality (obeying laws as a part of the social contract) or universal morality (principles of justice that require us to treat the claims of all parties in an impartial manner, respecting the basic dignity of all people as individuals).

Instead, feminists are mired in a care-and-concern group-based morality where "relations of special obligation to family, friends, and group members…often include or presuppose general obligations of respect, fairness, and contract". Because men are demonized through the feminist "patriarchy theory" (or "rape culture"; take your pick), men are the OTHER in the feminist world, and hence, NOT worthy of respect, fairness, nor contract – nor even basic human rights.

That is how and why feminists laugh at male suffering, ignore the intense misandry of other feminists, protest and pull fire alarms at lectures about men's problems, and treat accusations of the rape of a woman as equal to a conviction – men are the ENEMY, guilty by default, and worthy of less respect than a slug. Men bad, woman good.

This wretched state of moral development is identical to racism – othering a person because of his differing race and embracing a bigot of a similar race. It is identical to religious hatred – the extremist Christian who hates all Muslims, or the extremist Muslim who hates all Christians.

Without a universal understanding of morality – one that values all people, man and woman alike – feminists doom themselves to an eternal echo-chamber of hatred, and engaging in any sort of dialog with them seems both pointless and hopeless.

But as much as feminists try to "other" me as a man, I reject the urge to other them as women, or even as feminists. I choose to hold on the hope – however faint – that they can, as individuals, grow out of their group hatred into a more nuanced understanding of the problems we face – the human problems.

One feminist, at least, is now showing signs that she is breaking out of this echo-chamber. Who could believe it would be legendary man-hater Amanda Marcotte?

Marcotte is famed in feminist circles for her othering of men: "misandry", to her, is a nonsense word, She insists that "women aren't raised in a culture that tells them they're entitled to attention from men" but God help you if you disagree with her or tell her "no".

Marcotte even tried (and failed, spectacularly) to rape-shame RAINN – the Rape Abuse & Incest National Network – into buying into her beloved rape-culture crap.

But recently, Marcotte has been tinkering with a more nuanced tone to her writing about men and feminism. The differences are small but telling, and once other feminists figure out that Marcotte is going a bit soft on man-hating, they are going to go insanely angry, like Jessica Valenti did when the New Republic wrote about Paul Elam and A Voice for Men.

The specific article by Marcotte was published by Slate, and relates to the sexual peccadilloes of U.S. Representative Vance McAllister and a married female staffer, Melissa Hixon Peacock, who were caught kissing for 30 seconds on camera.

Marcotte rightly questions the judgment of other feminists (Rep. Jackie Speier and Jarvis DeBerry, among others) who characterized the obviously consensual face-sucking as "sexual harassment". A veteran of the John Edwards presidential campaign, Marcotte has experienced enough on-the-job high jinks to where she can distinguish between actual harassment and plain old screwing around:

> This difference is not trivial. Anti-feminists already love to accuse feminists of being uptight prudes for speaking out against coercive and harassing sexual behavior. It's probably wise to avoid giving them ammunition by tying the word harassment to a situation where both parties appear, on tape at least, to be throwing themselves into it whole-heartedly.

Now, of course, the supposed "prudery" of feminism has never been a major concern of the Men's Human Rights Movement – the lunacy of the "all Penis-in-Vagina sex is rape" crowd is obvious to everyone who is not a feminist, and Marcotte is not signing up for the Sammich Mines just yet, but look at how far she's come:

- Instead of ignoring or dismissing (othering) "Anti-feminists" out of hand, she engaged their concerns in open discourse.
- Instead of blindly supporting her feminist allies, she called them out on their logical (and tactical) fallacy.
- Instead of blaming hegemonic male sexuality, she recognized the sexual agency and enthusiasm of that Peacock woman.

Small victories, and perhaps short-lived ones, but cracks in the foundation of feminism have a way of spreading – and Men's Human Rights Advocates are the ones swinging the sledgehammers to good effect.

You haven't earned a big old Texas hug and a smooch yet, Amanda, but here is a small nod to the growth of your moral and mental maturity, and we can hope that there is much more to come.

And no, those aren't tears on my cheeks. It is hot in here; it is raining; the sprinklers went off with the fire alarms.

Feature image by James G. Milles

We have unfinished business in Ellsworth, Maine

Paul Elam · 13 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

If you do a search for Mary Kellett on this website, you will get page after page of returns dating back to 2010. The same thing will happen if you do a search on Vladek Filler.

They are historically entwined, these two. Kellett is the now sanctioned and disgraced prosecutor from Hancock County, Maine who is nonetheless allowed to continue her extralegal and injudicious attacks on the citizens of Maine from a rampantly corrupt office under DA Carletta Bassano's enabling watch.

Filler is her most famous victim; the man she had convicted of sexual assault by misleading a jury, withholding exculpatory evidence, instructing police not to comply with defense subpoenas and a number of other acts of malfeasance.

As most know, Filler's conviction has been overturned due directly to Kellett's misconduct, and she eventually became the first prosecutor in the history of Maine to ever be referred to the Maine State Supreme Court for disciplinary action.

It is fair to say that the Kellett-Filler story is the story of AVFM. Before the bigots of Toronto, the cacophonic wailing of a legion of outraged ideologues, the many threats to sue and silence us found their way here to be summarily dismissed, there was the story of Vladek Filler, a loving father and husband savaged by a court system that was as toxic and malicious as his former wife.

Because, however, the readership of AVFM, and many other men's organizations, including SAVE and NCFM, stood up to expose and protest this injustice, the course of Vladek Filler's story was changed for the better.

As long and arduous as our trek has become, and despite our joy that Vladek is now free and with his children, it is not over. Justice has still not been served, and will never be served until a broom has been taken to the Ellsworth Prosecutor's Office, and a thorough housecleaning has been performed.

And because of what we have done as a movement, this is now possible.

Carletta Bassano has wisely decided after being stained with Kellett's disgrace not to run for re-election. That, in and of itself, means nothing. The problem there is systemic. Two of the same office's cronies have stepped up to run, one as a Democrat, the other as a Republican. Paul Cavanaugh, one of the would be contenders, made a play to get a judge to gag AVFM from writing about Kellett's antics when we were bringing so much local attention to her conduct.

This is how the club wants to "replace" Bassano.

The point here is, of course, that two of the same crew are now aiming to corner the political market on the upcoming election for the "new" District Attorney. The result of that will be that Mary Kellett remains there as a malignant prosecutor, finding a new Vladek Filler under every rock; and finding more children to damage and destroy in the process.

The result will be that the same back-slapping band of criminals will be doing business as usual in Ellsworth, Maine, victimizing the community it is supposed to protect.

This is part of a complicated insider's network, with a long and complex story, but for the first time there is some actual hope that business as usual in this little corner of Maine can be changed to "yesterday's news."

Political opponents to the gang in charge now smell blood in the water. Despite all the spin, the power and influence that these players have exerted over media sources like the Bangor Daily News, and the public denial of corruption from people like Cavanaugh, there is a growing element in the Hancock County community that is tired of the embarrassment, and, quite frankly, tired of the corruption.

There is a growing consciousness that something is just plain rotten, and with it a push to do something about it. As one outsider candidate, experienced former prosecutor and local defense attorney Steve Juskowitch, said, "I know what's wrong and I know how to fix it."

He is not talking about street crime. He is talking about Carletta Bassano's prosecutor's office.

It is just my opinion, but "fixing it" can only mean one thing coming from Juskowitch, who has spoken out often and publicly about the misconduct of that prosecutor's office.

That is why I am going to Maine next month, and that is why I am inviting you, challenging you, to join me.

On Saturday, May 31, 2014 there will be a rally staged on the courthouse steps of the Hancock and Washington County Courthouse in Ellsworth, Maine. I will be speaking there, and so will local political leaders, all of us with one thing in mind.

Ending the corruption.

The event is being sponsored by Integrity 4 Maine.

I would like to urge all those who can possibly make this rally to attend. And if you can't make it, please help us by posting this to your Facebook page or Tweeting it. Write about the event on your blog or mention it on your favorite forum. Even if you have differences with AVFM, you still most likely abhor the conduct of people like Mary Kellett, Paul Cavanaugh and Carletta Bassano, and this is a great opportunity to help bring about a change for the better where it matters.

The time for standing by idly, or even just writing about it, when entrusted public servants abuse their power and authority is over. These corrupt officials have been destroying families and children for years, hiding behind false narratives and smiling into the face of a misled, betrayed public.

It is time to wipe that smile off their smug faces for good.

Mike Buchanan on London Live TV discussing 'women in senior roles'

Mike Buchanan · 13 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

'London Live TV' was launched last week. It's run by a sister company of two left-leaning papers, the Independent and the Evening Standard. I was invited onto a discussion panel on one of their flagship lunchtime shows. The presenter, Claudia-Liza Armah, emailed me the following questions beforehand. My thoughts follow each:

> "We'll be asking why we need quotas to get women on boards."

We need neither quotas, nor the threat of them, given we know that increasing female representation on boards leads to corporate financial decline. Our briefing paper on the matter: Increasing gender diversity on corporate boards leads to declines in financial performance: the evidence

> "Is enough being done to encourage and help women to progress to senior roles?"

Too much is being done, mainly at taxpayers' expense, although men pay 72% of the income tax collected in the UK, women only 28%. Given that on average women in senior roles perform less well than men – and virtually all the women on FTSE100 boards are only non-executive directors – NOTHING should be done to 'encourage' or 'help' women.

> "What effect are initiatives such as this having on men in the workplace?"

Men see women being promoted ahead of them, even when the women are markedly less experienced and/or have less expertise. Almost every week we're emailed stories – from men in both public sector and private sector organisations – of women being promoted above more experienced male colleagues, and the male colleagues then having to work overtime (invariably unpaid) teaching the women how to do their new jobs! Preferencing of women for senior roles solely on the grounds of gender understandably makes men both angry and demotivated.

* * *

I was told two other people would be on the discussion panel. One was Helena Morrissey, the founder and still the leader of The 30% Club, which campaigns for higher female representation on the boards of major British companies. Around a third of FTSE100 chairmen are members and have thereby personally committed to increasing the number of women on their boards.

J4MB and its associated organisations have presented many FTSE100 chairmen with 'Toady' awards. One of the first was presented to Sir Roger Carr, chairman of Centrica plc. This article was prompted by our learning his daughter Caroline was at the time (late 2012) Goldman Sachs's Global Head of Diversity and Leadership, and on the club's steering committee.

The other person on the discussion panel was to be Sarah Churchman, Head of Diversity and Inclusion at PwC, an international professional services firm. She was interviewed for International Business Times.

I'm too pushed for time to watch the seven-minute-long piece. Harriet Harman MP, our rottweiler, is whining again. She wants to be taken to the park to terrorise the other dogs – the male dogs, specifically. If you watch the piece and think I should watch it – e.g. if Churchman claims (or, more likely, implies) that corporate performance improves when there are more women on boards – please email me mike@j4mb.org.uk. Thank you. I'll then publicly challenge her.

Hours before the discussion I was told Morrissey wouldn't be joining us. Barbara Kasumu, the chief executive of the charity 'Elevation Networks' was replacing her. I spent time on her website and saw nothing to suggest she'd have anything perceptive to say in the discussion.

An hour before the discussion, I was in the 'green room' with Barbara. I explained my qualifications to talk about the subject of women (and men) in senior roles, having worked in senior roles in business for 30+ years (until my retirement in 2010) and led Campaign for Merit in Business for the past two years. I explained I'd collected a lot of evidence showing a causal link between increasing female representation on boards and corporate financial decline, and offered her our short briefing paper (the second link in this article) to read, to help her prepare for the discussion. She declined, and spent the remainder of the hour sullenly tapping away on her smartphone.

Not long after, a young woman wearing dangerously high heels marched confidently into the room, and I was introduced to Emma Sinclair, serial entrepreneur, CEO of Target Parking, Daily Telegraph columnist. It transpired that Sarah Churchman, like Helena Morrissey, wouldn't be joining us. Ms Sinclair promptly exited the room and next met us in the studio just before the discussion, where we were unable to talk.

The ladies were startled when I said during the televised discussion that if there's a 'need' for more women in boardrooms, by the same logic there's a 'need' for more white sprinters in the Olympics 100 metres men's final. Emma later 'tweeted' about the discussion, and I pointed her to a video. It was created by the man behind the legendary 'ManWomanMyth' and 'Humanity Bites' YouTube channels. In the video I appear along with Erin Pizzey and Steve Moxon, author of The Woman Racket (2008): On white sprinters and female CEOs

One of my favourite 'ManWomanMyth' videos is the one in which he explained that feminism is a female supremacy ideology: Female Supremacy

I need angry women who hate men because...

AVfM Video Source · 14 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Appears there is more advice for men (that we didn't need, nor ask for) appearing all the time. Who would have thought? Youtuber Goodfella provides an entertaining reply to this latest piece of womanly advice to men. – PW

Stollznow accuses Radford of “Recruiting” AVFM to continue his harassment

Robert O'Hara · 14 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Yesterday, Karen Stollznow, skeptic writer and now-notorious harassment-accuser of Ben Radford, another prominent skeptic, posted an update on her Indiegogo fundraiser stating Radford had “recruited” AVFM to “spread his word” in order to harass her even further. She also made a string of false claims including AVfM was a hate group accusing her of violating Indiegogo’s terms of use and pocketing fraudulently collected money.

Her post reads:

> My harasser continues to try to spread false information about me while demonstrating his harassment. He has recruited the help of a hate group to help spread his word. “A Voice For Men”. They claim now that this campaign is a violation of Indiegogo’s terms. It is not. They claim that I am planning to just pocket this money. I am not. They claim that my insurance is covering my costs so this money is fraudulently requested. Not true. My harasser was clever in his lawsuit and included things that my insurance could not cover, like claims of fraud.
>
> These are the same techniques of silencing the victim that many of us have encountered and suffered through. I will no longer be silent. My day in court is coming…

[image]

Last week AVfM posted an article titled “Radford vs. Stollznow: Tempest in the Skeptic Community” which enumerated many of the claims Radford made on a website devoted to answering Stollznow’s accusations of sexual harassment, which he says have done tremendous harm to his reputation and employment life as well as his personal life. Also last week, AVfM Radio aired an edition of The O’Hara News and Editorial which featured editorial commentary by the hosts and a guest from the skeptic community named Mykeru who spoke in defense of Radford and was critical of Stollznow’s accusations and the support she received from the Atheist+ community.

No one on the editorial, administrative or news staff has ever reported being contacted by him directly concerning Stollznow’s accusations or the pending lawsuit. The issue was brought to AVfM’s attention by several members of the skeptic community expressing their desire to highlight and question the very public accusations being leveled against Radford and to explore the possible motivations behind them.

Nowhere in the article and at no point during the airing of last Tuesday’s edition of O’Hara’s News and Editorial was it said definitively that Stollznow’s Indiegogo campaign was fraudulent or that it was in violation of Indiegogo’s terms of agreement. It was suggested, however, that it may be in violation of Indiegogo’s terms of service and that Indiegogo should question the wisdom of allowing a campaign that, for which there is ample proof, is directed towards preventing a victim of libel from receiving justice in court.

Relevant quote from the article:

> “…ten days ago on March 27th, [Stollznow] started a defense fund under the byline “Give a Voice to Sexual Harassment Victims” which has already raised nearly $60,000, even though there is strong reason to believe that this campaign, which is defamatory of another person, is arguably a violation of Indiegogo’s terms of use since it is widely known whom Stollznow has accused. This leads to another interesting question: are sites like Indiegogo now the go-to funding source for anyone who wants to make an allegation against someone else in court, without even providing proof of the wrongdoing to donors?”

In no part of the article and at no point of the radio show was it said that Stollznow was going to pocket the money and at no time did AVfM claim she was going to use her insurance to cover her legal expenses. At one point during the radio broadcast Robert O'Hara did suggest that anyone who donated to Stollznow's fund-raiser was a defacto contributor to the payoff Radford was likely to receive upon winning his case against Stollznow because the evidence was so overwhelming. It was Radford himself, not AVfM who stated on his website that Stollznow had asked her homeowners insurance to pay for her legal expenses.

AVfM is not a hate site.

Insinuations that AVfM was a hate group made by the SPLC in its Spring 2012 Intelligence Report have since been retracted and the SPLC has lost its status as an unquestioned authority on hate movements. According to AVfM management, numerous claims that they and other men's rights organizations are hate groups have been debunked, and AVfM is quick to point out that members of the Men's Rights Movement, almost entirely without exception, reject bigotry, hatred and violence.

Stollznow's post sparked heated reactions in the skeptic community as well as within AVfM management. Despite protests over her obviously false claims the controversial post remains on her Indiegogo page and many feel its existence is proof that she is a disturbed, if not disordered, person.

"Now, we don't really care that Stollznow has lied about us because we get lied about all the time. It comes with the territory when you either attack ideological feminism (it garners the same type of slanderous responses that you get when you answer Creationist lunacy) or when you try to defend the rights of boys and men specifically, even when the science clearly shows that they're in deep trouble in our educational and legal and social systems in multiple areas (even if individual men are often fine, as a group men have problems no one wants to talk about and get mad at you when you do talk about them)" wrote AVfM Director of Operations, Dean Esmay, in a string on the popular atheist website "The Slyme Pit" yesterday.

"Although from a publicity angle it's probably not worth trying to address AVfM's reporting (and that's what it was: reporting) on the Radford/Stollznow case, the fact is that this response by Stollznow is probably further proof of libel and ill-intent by Stollznow. It certainly cements in my mind that she's probably a classic Cluster-B personality disordered type."

Mykeru, the skeptic guest on last week's radio show, has answered with a YouTube video in which he refutes Stollznow's accusations and asserts that it was he, not Radford, who contacted AVfM to report the story. He also denies having any personal contact with Radford concerning the matter, stating that he only met him once during a conference years ago and has not spoken to him since.

AVfM News will be covering this case and will report the outcome as soon as it is announced.

Sources:

https://www.indiegogo.com/projects/give-a-voice-to-harassment-victims?c=activity https://www.indiegogo.com/about/terms

http:// benrlegal.info/

http://slymepit.com/phpbb/viewtopic.php?p=176515#p176515

http://washingtonexaminer.com/shocked-anti-defamation-league-slaps-fbi-diss-on-hate-crimes/article/2546305

http://www.splcenter.org/blog/2012/05/15/intelligence-report-article-provokes-outrage-among-mens-rights-activists/

http://www.splcenter.org/get-informed/intelligence-report/browse-all-issues/2012/spring/a-war-on-women

Sparky Fister Takes On The Stupid So We Don’t Have To

AVfM Video Source · 15 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Vaginas, Cars and Rape Culture, Oh My!

You should subscribe to SparkyFister.

Suicide – The Problem They Claim To Be Working On But Aren't

Dan Perrins · 15 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Last year I wrote a piece about a young gentleman who was prevented from attending the Dr Warren Farrell lecture at the University of Toronto. He was searching for answers why his two friends committed suicide.

In that article it came out that suicide visited my family 32 years ago.

My brother, Anthony believed he had no options left and took his own life. It affected my family, friends and me profoundly, permanently. The intense, extreme sorrow, wasn't just limited to his male relatives. All of us, male and female alike, were devastated by his permanent solution to a passing problem.

That's what made the laughing of Big Red (feminism's "empowered woman & champion") so reprehensible. That laugh at male suicides drew anger from society.

Red made herself a social suicide victim, hated due to her own depraved indifference to male suicides.

It produced the calling of bullshit and ridicule from me in an article about feminists 'working on it' or on any other problems men face.

Suicide is not an easy topic to discuss, but failing to do so will only increase its prevalence. It's an issue men face which must not be left for feminists to solve.

This picture is one of the male suicide victims Big Red laughed at. And sung about:

Here's a picture of my brother Anthony:

[image]

Men make up 76 – 80% of suicides depending on the age group studied.

At the age of 22 he was in the 80% range, for all ages its about 76% of suicides.

For the years 2001-11 a total of 31,165 males died by their own hand, a total of 9695 females did the same. For those 10 years, men made up 76% of the suicides.

[image] (link is reliant on cookies. If you wish to confirm the numbers you will have to go to the CANSIM tables and un-check all the other causes of death and check the male female boxes)

A decade of feminists "working on it."

About a year has gone by since my article. Another year of feminism 'working on it' which filled graves across Canada with male suicide victims at a rate of about 8 men a day.

The movement lost one of our own, Earl Silverman, to suicide in that year. Someone whom I had come to know, respect and consider a friend over a 2 year span of regular talking and trying to work together.

[image]

In a cruel coincidence Earl killed himself about 2 weeks before the anniversary of Anthony's death. 2 weeks before that I had my last conversation with him. It was 40 minutes long and I told him numerous times if he ever needed to talk he could call me any time.

He did not.

In the past I've received calls from men who are distraught, feeling helpless, angry, depressed believing there is no solution. These are the hallmarks for contemplating suicide. For some, its years of abuse from a corrupt misandric court system /society. Others are still wet after the initial hosing down of scalding misandric sewage from a corrupt legal system.

We are constantly reminded of military suicides. Those suicides demand special dedicated attention and help. Another area where men make up the vast majority.

Knowing this lead me to reach out and contact the local mental health care professionals in an attempt to gather information for the MHRM to use if any of us receives a call from a man in trouble.

The local crisis line really had very little information to offer, other than to send me to a local feminist organization, which is already misandric in its beliefs. I have looked at the organization before, the 1 in 4 claims that domestic violence is a gendered issue, blah blah blah "working on it," blah.

Feminist lies are promoted for society to gasp at, and for feminists to use to emotionally extort money from society. The same confabulations have given rise to mandated policy promoted in the courts.

And the same scalding misandric sewage that drives men to an early grave.

My next call was to the local Canadian Mental Health Association (CMHA). I've visited this organization before. It was linked in the piece I mentioned at the beginning of this article regarding Big Red.

I know they have 11 papers dealing with women's mental health that is easily found in the side bar of their site where they have a tab labeled women.

There is no corresponding tab for men.

[image]

There is one paper for for men on the CMHA site. You'll note it lists two, but this one from DECEMBER 1, 2002: "The Effects of Depression and Anxiety on Canadian Society" is listed under the women's tab as well. Still leaving the papers for men's mental health 10 papers behind.

An absolutely unacceptable situation, considering which sex is filling up the vast majority of those graves.

Canadian mental health organization(s) are aware of these issues. There have been papers commissioned for those issues by the Canadian tax payers.

A 1995 Statistics Canada Health Report paper by Kathryn Wilkins brings up the topic of suicide 20 times, with the author stating in her findings that;

> "… public health interventions to reduce male death rates will probably yield the most gains when targeted at young adult men."

In July of 2012 the issue of males as the ones being ignored and making up most of the suicides remains in place. The paper by Tanya Navaneelan titled "Health at a Glance Suicide rates: An overview" confirms again this deadly fact that men are the ones killing themselves far more often then women. Navaneelan doesn't candy-coat this fact and states:

> "Using vital statistics to explore different aspects of suicide in Canada has shown that males are far more likely to commit suicide than females."

Let me just repeat that last little bit in case anyone missed it;

> "… males are far more likely to commit suicide then females"

I can't, as a men's human rights advocate, permit this situation to continue. I have reached out and received a reply from the local CMHA. I am currently in the process of drafting a letter to them highlighting the fact that men have for the last 10 years of available data been 76% of the suicide population. I will be requesting information to help those who might receive a call, to direct them to the best services.

The manager who replied to me suggested we have a phone conversation. I'm not willing to go that route. The consequences of information being lost in a phone conversation is too dire, and permanent.

I'm not interested in being angry about the discrimination tacitly condoned in the mental health community. I know there are good therapists out there. I am reaching out to them in the hopes that they will understand this issue affects us all and needs to be corrected.

I owe it to Anthony and Earl to fix this problem, as there were 8 more of them today.

Queen's University Pedobears Earn Over 9000 Trolltard Points

Dean Esmay · 15 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Queen's University femistasia, almost certainly without a single femanon among them, have creepypasta'd Anonymous to create the funniest threat we've gotten all year:

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=XhsTckEZW4k]
These are obviously not even moralphags, just trolltards. Queen's University femistasi should check out this important instruction manual on how Anonymous really rolls (no one else should bother).

As we recall, someone else tried to claim to be Anonymous a year or two ago to threaten JudgyBitch. It of course wasn't real, and neither is this. Those of us who know how this works can spot a fake a mile away, and b/tards everywhere are encouraged to make a meme out of this pedobear's unfappable image, if they want:

[image]

Meanwhile, our new word for "pedophily" and "rapey" on AVfM shall henceforth be "A.Mercier" or just "amercier" for short.

I felt amercierd by that scary threat, didn't you?

(Important note: if you didn't understand one word of what I wrote above, don't worry about it. As a member of Anonymous I don't have time to explain it.)

Update:

Did We Hit A Nerve, Amanda? Like Phony Surveys Much?

August Løvenskiolds · 16 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My last couple of articles about Amanda Marcotte, one discussing her disastrous attempt to shame RAINN into supporting the ludicrous feminist notion of rape culture, and the other exploring her subtle softening of her anti-male rhetoric, must've hit a nerve.

Well, it might not have been me or my work, specifically, but something has put an Over 9000 tonne bee in her bonnet, and her former moderating tone has collapsed into a pile of deranged, shrill, and incomprehensible lunacy. And I mean, even more so than usual.

Marcotte begins by characterizing "men's rights" as code for being anti-women's rights, claiming that men's human rights activists oppose:

- women's right to be free of violence,
- women's right to be autonomous in their sexual and relationship decision-making,
- women's right to be treated as equals in education and
- women's right to be treated as equals in labor.

All of these claims are lies.

Violence. Contrary to feminists who call for violence and even genocide against men, Men's Human Rights Advocates and AVfM have always condemned violence against both women and men alike. Noting that men are more likely to die of violence than women, AND that women who kill are rarely seen as criminals does NOT equate to calling for violence against women.

Sexual Autonomy. Contrary to feminists who seek to dictate absurd standards of consent that turn innocent men into rapists, MHRAs recognize that human consent to sexual relationships can be a complex and subtle process and that women and men alike have the agency to consent to sex even when they have had a glass of wine with dinner.

Also, contrary to feminists who seek to undermine efforts to expand the options for effective male contraceptives, most MHRAs support reasonable contraception access for everyone, men and women alike.

Equality in education. Contrary to feminists who STILL think there is discrimination in education when a large majority of university students are female, MHRAs seek to address the factors that lead to men being discouraged from pursuing higher education – factors like the feminized educational norms and the epidemic of false rape claims and general rape hysteria on campus.

Equality in labor. MHRAs have no issue with the idea of equal pay for equal work, but once you correct for the lifestyle and employment choices of men and women, the so-called pay gap touted by feminists evaporates. Men overwhelmingly take on arduous and dangerous jobs that few to no women are interested in, and those men are compensated accordingly and justly.

MHRAs also point out that, if the pay gap actually existed, it would unfairly advantage women seeking employment, since employers would be keen to hire less expensive employees (women in this scenario), in much the same way that outsourced and immigrant labor tends to accept lower wages than other workers they may displace.

Bricks of Logic

But all these bricks of logic are dismissed by the loopy Marcotte because she found a survey on reddit that supposedly shows that most MRA's (on reddit, anyway) are young, atheistic, and yet, somehow conservative in their politics – according to the survey, the vast majority of MRAs – 87% – are between the ages of 17-20, and 96% of us are 25 or under.

Marcotte then goes off on a wild tangent, claiming that those vast number of boys will leave atheism as they grow up, have sex, and moderate their views under the harsh tutelage of Christianity and feminist housewives:

> The big question here is where do they go when they age? MRA blogs and forums have been around for awhile,[sic] so where are the older ones? They're clearly growing out of it. I'd like to say they are going to grow up and grow out of misogyny, and hopefully some will. Unfortunately, I do think a large chunk will probably just drift into the Christian right and abandon their atheism. You get a little older and start craving an orderly house and stop feeling oppressed by shaving and showers. The possibility of having a wife who indulges you with regular sex, housework and nightly cooking starts to sound much better than the hamster wheel of hitting on women out of your league and getting rejected and turning online to blame feminism.

Marcotte's failures here are manifold, for she is still too blinded by her own female privilege and notions of "misogyny" to recognize that advocating universal human equality – as MHRAs do – is NOT misogyny, and that it is, in fact, a stage of moral enlightenment that is more permanent than she can appreciate, because she has never experienced it. Feminism's role in silencing men and their advocates is invisible to her, as is the bravery of the men and women who are finally standing up to that crap.

But Marcotte's biggest failure is that she has been trolled and fooled by an obvious feminist troll – a detailed examination of the individual responses to the survey (available here and also through the reddit.com link above) indicates that a large number of the responses were automatically generated – for example, responses 443 through 525 are nearly identical and were submitted milliseconds apart, a process only possible through an automated effort to sabotage the results.

When you are a feminist who has been fooled repeatedly by the debunked wage gap, wildly inflated domestic violence claims and the infamous 1-in-4 rape lie, I guess it is easy to screw up further and believe other fake statistics touted by feminist liars and pseudoskeptics like Stephanie Zvan..

While overall statistics on the demographics for MRAs/MHRA's may be lacking, Marcotte and others might consult this and this to get a better idea of the real distribution of ages and other demographics on men's rights. If she cares at all, of course. The growing number of female MRAs must also trouble Amanda, which is probably why she likes phony statistics that erase those women and silence their voices.

Someday, Marcotte may actually start reporting the truth. Until she does, employers in the media like Slate.com and RawStory.com would do well to steer clear of a gullible fabulist like her.

The Honeybadger Brigade Will Not Be Silenced

The Honeybadger Brigade · 16 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is in response to the Queen's University Phony Pheminist Anonymous from The Honeybadger Brigade:

The statement is as follows:

"Greetings, Queens University Feminists.

We are honey badgers.

A recent video purported to be the work of Anonymous sounds suspiciously like something a recently-embarrassed university professor would say. Far be it from us to determine what narrative such a group may or may not embrace. Certainly nobody besides Anonymous themselves could obtain the imagery and music used in their videos… and certainly a group so well known for advocating against government tyranny would jump at the chance to support one dedicated to increasing government intrusion into private lives. By all means, a group which has recently uploaded videos calling for defense of the homeless, 95% of whom are men, would ally itself with a group most well known for attacking and demonizing men.

We all know that Anonymous can be manipulated simply by invoking the name and associating it with your pet ideological message. Your highness has summoned them in the manner of their own personal idiom. Surely the entire legion must respond to your command… so we're quaking in our boots, chilled to the bone from the moment —

No, we're not.

We're not the privileged princesses you're used to dealing with.

We're not the property of feminist academia.

We're not as easily intimidated as you are embarrassed.

We are honey badgers.

Honey badgers are for human rights.

We are individuals.

We do not regret.

We will not be silenced."

The conflict started when Adèle Mercier stood to "counter" a well-referenced speech by Janice Fiamengo with "I don't know what you're talking about," as if denial could negate everything Janice had described.

Later, MRAs commented on a letter to the editor which decried the idea of men discussing men's issues outside the controlling oversight of feminism. In response to the claim, Alison Tieman cited statistics showing male sexual victimization by female perpetrators, which have been ignored or even covered up by feminists. The examples clearly show that feminism isn't serving men's needs when it comes to men's issues. Among the examples was a Bureau of Justice study on faculty victimization of youth in juvenile detention facilities found that 95% of faculty perpetrators against boys were women.

Adèle responded with blatant rape apology, and several MRAs called her out on it. That is explained in this story by Alison.

Alison made a video on the topic.

Shortly after, Professor Mercier, embarrassed that her rape apology was becoming more and more public, sent Alison a letter demanding removal of all reference to the discussion from the internet.

In other words, in response to having her attention drawn to the similarity between her own statements and those feminists decry as rape apology, instead of learning and growing, Adèle has chosen to flounce.

The 24 hours has long passed, and the videos and news article are still up. Queens university is well aware of Adèle Mercier's comments, and they've done nothing. In the meantime, the Honey Badger Brigade was made aware of the "Anonymous" video yesterday evening.

Clearly this isn't what its creators intended for it to look like. Even if one knows nothing else about Anonymous, the fact that the comments are closed gives it away. They always want discussion. While we'd still respond no matter who we thought made that video, the likelihood that either Adèle herself or one of her young feminist followers made it determined the flavor of our reply, all except for the last line.

We will not be silenced, regardless of who does not approve of what we have to say.

Please add Honeybadger Radio to your Google circles, and subscribe to HoneyBadgerRadio. –DE

Professional Damsel In Distress Embarrasses Center for Inquiry – Again

Dean Esmay · 16 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Quoth Melody Hensley of the Center for Inquiry:

> I'm really sick of the stupid lies that get flung about me. Yes, I have PTSD from Twitter, blogs, horrible videos, cyberstalking.
>
> — Melody Hensley (@MelodyHensley) November 23, 2013

No, seriously. And don't let anyone question her:

> @NeptunFallen You are very insensitive to question someone that has a life altering disorder. This is harassment. You will be blocked. — Melody Hensley (@MelodyHensley) April 9, 2014

How about some icing on that cake, to make sure we really understand how bad her twitter-induced trauma is?

> If you are in the military and you are harassing me about my PTSD, expect that I will be speaking to your commanding officer. — Melody Hensley (@MelodyHensley) April 13, 2014

There's more to say, but we think Thunderf00t pretty much says it all:

Oh, but let's let this embarrassment to the once-respectable Center for Inquiry respond, so we aren't accused of "silencing" her:

> So I hear Thunderfuck is responsible for this cybermob attacking me. He should join up with AVfM and make it official.
>
> — Melody Hensley (@MelodyHensley) April 15, 2014

> That video is harassment.
>
> — Melody Hensley (@MelodyHensley) April 15, 2014

Until today, we've never published anything on Melody Hensley. Although we happen to know at least one gay MRA (there are a number of those, you know) who she called a stalker just for questioning her and suggesting she and other feminists were hijacking of gay men's experiences and co-opting their issues. In any case, we've never so much as spoken to Thunderf00t, let alone joined forces with him.

Who knows? Thunderf00t may not even like us. Maybe one day he or The Amazing Atheist or some other person in the "skeptic community" who isn't completely nuts will make a video about why we suck. If it's sane and rational, we'll try to accept the criticism. If we think it's wrong somewhere, we'll say what we think is wrong with it. The thing is, unlike feminists, we do not demand that people identify with our cause or movement in order to support them or their work when it's rational and sane and based on documentable fact. Hell, we don't always even agree with each other, let alone expect everyone else to.

So, subscribe to Thunderf00t, who isn't "one of us" and doesn't have to be to be in order to be worth watching. In addition to making really awesome science videos, has taken up the cudgels to identify and call out hateful pseudoscientific ideology in what is loosely known as the “skeptic community.” Identifying people who are toxic to free inquiry by malicious false claims of harassment, innuendo, quote-mining, whispering campaigns, and playing damsel-in-distress is a noble endeavor. It’s good to see anyone sane making note of it.

The Men's Human Rights Movement Needs You

AVfM Video Source · 17 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NK8JRc4_6SA

Collegiate Activism Director Sage Gerard will be present at both the May 31st rally in Maine and the June Conference in Detroit, and he is encouraging everyone to join their MHRA brothers and sisters. As a low-income student, Sage still makes a case for why the expenses are justified, and how your presence makes the MHRM a lasting influence on the planet.

Of course, those who cannot attend are still greatly appreciated for both the moral and financial support that made these events possible in the long run. You are catalysts for change that loosens the grip of gynocentric and misandric tyranny.

If you cannot attend, you can still show your support by subscribing to Sage's channel. While he would also appreciate help with expenses like anyone else, he has made it clear that if it is at all possible for you to go to Ellsworth, Maine or Detroit, Michigan, you should save your money instead and come to town.

$1,000 Reward for the Arrest & Conviction of Danielle D'Entremont's Attacker

Attila L. Vinczer · 17 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Today in Kingston Ontario the following posters will be appearing in and around the city of Kingston, Ontario, near the site of Queen's University, where a woman named Danielle D'Entremont claimed to have been viciously attacked in the middle of the night by an unknown assailant, with hints that she was assaulted due to her feminist activism and that this was also somehow related to the talk to that Professor Janice Fiamengo gave at Queen's University that week.

The Men's Human Rights Movement has always been strictly anti-violence and anti-censorship. We believe even those who strongly criticize us, or who try to silence us, deserve to be heard. Indeed, we have always stated that we want people to read and hear their words, as much as possible. If anybody involved in the Men's Human Rights Movement in any way physically harmed or seriously threatened anyone, we would instantly denounce them.

Furthermore, to repeat, we want everyone to have their voices heard, including feminist activists. It is our view that the more feminists speak about their views, and the more people hear what they have to say, the better off all society will be.

So no matter who attacked this young woman, we want them found, arrested, and prosecuted.

The following poster is quite serious, and will remain a standing offer.

[image]

We are quite serious. Any legitimate information we receive will be forwarded to law enforcement.

If you have such information to help legal authorities find the assailant, please contact me through Men's Rights Canada or here through A Voice for Men. Thank you for your cooperation.

Let's find out what really happened here, and make sure the human rights of all people are protected, and that Freedom of Expression is never imperiled in Canada.

Love's Bitter Rebuke – Over Generations

Andy Thomas · 17 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

PART 1

I will always remember my mother's words.

"You'll never forget your first love," she said as I cried into her arms.

For some months, I had been keeping a terrible secret. My girlfriend, my first girlfriend, had been raped. They didn't just rape her; they broke her nose. A knife was used. She was cut. There were two of them.

Picture Alley Sheedy in The Breakfast Club — well, that was Louise. Her soft Irish accent, long black hair and scruffy oversized jumpers made me love her with all my heart.

We were both seventeen years old and still at school.

Louise had met my mother just once, but things hadn't gone well at all. My mother had ignored her and when she had left, she pronounced caustically that Louise looked like she had "come off a council estate*," and that I was never to bring her to the house again.

I never understood my mother's snobbery. So much of my mother's behaviour left me terribly confused. In any case, her prejudice was unfounded — Louise was actually from a wealthy Irish family who lived in the expensive part of town. They were also puritanically Catholic. If anything, I had assumed that my mother would approve.

I had a part-time job at the time pushing trolleys around a local supermarket car park, and it provided me with just enough money to run a rusty old Datsun. At weekends I used to heap body filler into the gaping holes around the bodywork, and slap on some industrial paint in the hope that it would stop it rusting to death. In the evenings, I would drive it around to Louise's place and we'd cruise around and find a quiet spot to park up.

There, we'd kiss, engage in foreplay and lie in each other's arms while we talked.

It was during these moments that she told me about what happened to her only a few months before we had met, and she swore me to secrecy. The fact that I betrayed her to my own mother has haunted me most of my adult life (it is only relatively recently that I have come to a realistic reconciliation with the past).

"You'll never forget your first love," is what my mother said when I told her.

"What do you mean?" I replied, confused. "It's not over."

At that point, my mother stepped back from me, her face turning cold. Then after a moment or two she spat, "Get lost!" before turning her back and walking from the room. Those words were a typical retort my mother used, but nevertheless I was left standing there, shocked, confused, hurting desperately and so utterly lost.

Over the coming months my mother conducted what I now consider to be an "emotional war" in order to get her way. Drunk on gin, she would accuse me bitterly of "killing her," and threatened suicide unless I would agree never to see Louise again.

"You're destroying me," she would complain. "Can't you see what this is doing to me!"

I would not agree to give up Louise, but I had already confessed to her that I had told my mother, and Louise had become distant from me as a result. Later, she would refuse to see me altogether.

My father, having been brought up in loving home, was a reasonable and rational man. He was so utterly ill-equipped to understand what was happening.

"Your mother's right," he would say trying to rationalise her behaviour. "She must know something about that girl."

I loved my dad, but his understanding of the situation was so utterly awry and I was so utterly confused, that neither of us could relate to each other during that time. I realise now that my mother put my father under tremendous strain, in effect pressuring him to pressure me.

My school study petered out and I spent the days on long walks around the suburbs. I had few friends, and any attempt to express myself to outsiders ended in failure and misunderstanding. So I remained distant, said nothing, and slowly became detached from everything and everyone.

I ate little and my weight fell dramatically.

I spent my long walks lost in my own thoughts, trying desperately to make sense of things. During one of these walks, I was distracted by an advertisement billboard.

“So strange,” I remember thinking, having been brought out of my reverie by the imagery of a chimpanzee drinking a can of soda when, out of nowhere, came a sickening blow.

I almost blacked out and half-blinded, thinking that I had been punched, looked around desperately to see where the attack had come from. But there was no one, and as I stared down at the blood pooling in my hands, I realised that I had simply walked full speed into the concrete lamppost while looking the other way. I dreaded going home, for I already knew what my parents would think.

“She’s had you beaten up!” I was told when I got home.

While I initially tried to explain, I sensed how unlikely my lamppost story sounded and was resigned to that fact that any protestation was pointless. My dad took the keys to the rusty old car from me and declared that I would no longer be allowed to “drive that girl around.”

The sad irony was of course that, by then, I no longer had any contact with Louise — not that either of them would have believed me if I had told them.

The last time I ever saw Louise was when, on a Saturday afternoon, she walked across the car park where I was pushing trolleys at the supermarket. She never looked at me, and as she disappeared from sight, I began to feel that I was bleeding internally. I never finished the shift, but simply walked away from the job.

I heard later that her parents had sent her to Ireland. “She needs a priest,” I was told by a caustic old woman who worked on the tills at the supermarket.

I never saw Louise again.

It wasn’t long after that things came to a head when my mother burst into my bedroom one evening swinging a heavy piece of wood in a drunken rage. It was a baluster, a piece of wood roughly the same shape and weight as a baseball bat, which my dad kept around in case of burglars.

“If you ever see that girl again, I’ll kill you!” she raged.

I swear to you now that if she had struck me, I had no intention of even lifting my arms to shield my face. At that moment, I cared for nothing and said simply, “Go ahead.”

She didn’t strike me, but instead started to smash up the room. I simply stood back and did nothing while she went berserk. It was my dad who, on hearing the commotion, came in and stopped her. I will always remember his words to me after she had left the room. I can quote them verbatim, and here they are…

“This is not your mother, this. Whatever it is that you are doing to her, it’s time to pack it in.”

He was wrong — that was exactly my mother. But at the time, I had no alternative perspective and with no way to understand such things, I had come to accept that, somehow, in some way, he was right.

I sat my exams, having done little revision, and as soon as they were over, I left home with a rucksack and some foolish notions about living “on the road”. I camped on a mountain side in the English Lake District for a few weeks, before finding a job and boarding in a remote pub called the Kirkstone Inn.

In the years that followed, I slid gradually into self-imposed isolation, characterised by drinking and self-harm. I ached so much to be with Louise, and I cursed myself for failing her. My mother had got her way in the end, and I lived for years with a confused sense of guilt and repressed anger that I had no way of reconciling.

PART 2

On my first day at school at the age of six, my mother had told me that there was no point in me going there because I was only going to be a road sweeper when I grew up. I can remember crying and insisting that I wouldn't, while she explained to me, rather matter of factly, that I was stupid and that she was telling me for my own good. That is my first memory of her calling me "stupid", but not my last. In the years that followed, she never missed an opportunity.

Despite the events of my last year in school, I actually passed my exams, but only just. Half an hour into one exam, I was lying in bed not caring when a teacher turned up at my house in his car to collect me. Nevertheless, having initially thrown away my place at university when I had left home with the intention of tramping the roads, I eventually went to University and got a degree in Physics — proving in my own mind that my mother was wrong about me.

In reality, however, I was a very troubled young man and throughout it all, what I so desperately looked for was a meaningful answer to the question, "What was so wrong with me?" Having no useful framework with which to understand either myself or the past, I was groping around in the dark with questions I could not even begin to formulate.

"So how does that make you feel?" I was asked, at various times through the years, whenever I tried counselling.

And I would stare at the floor, wringing my hands, as I replied, "Well, I don't know really."

It was always the same — meaningful answers were always held just out of reach by those who knew them.

It wasn't until my mid-thirties that things began to change when one day I had a profound revelation while walking home from work. It so shook me so that I stopped at the next telephone box I saw and made an international call to my sister.

"Our mother was an emotional bully, wasn't she?" I asked tentatively the moment she answered the call, not even waiting to say hello.

There was a short pause, and when she replied her words were the very first chink of light to penetrate darkness that was my confused inner world.

"Yes," she replied. "She was."

The first time I tried to speak to others about what I was discovering, I was told rather angrily, "That's a terrible way to talk about your mother!"

Those words shamed me back into silence for a while, but it would not last. I had begun to challenge the invisible cultural taboo that had prevented any rational scrutiny of my mother's behaviour. In fact, I was now on the way to realising a meaningful answer to my question, "What was it that was wrong with me?"

What was wrong was simply that I had been the subject of childhood emotional abuse in the form of my mother's sustained criticism, ridicule, interrogation and bullying as far back as I can remember. There was, in fact, a far bigger picture to be uncovered here than just the one depicting the fallout over Louise.

The astoundingly simple answer was that there had never been anything "wrong with me". I had never been "defective" — I had just been a normal child like any other. This, for me, was a life changing realisation.

Throughout childhood, my mother had taunted me, telling me that I was stupid and that everyone was "laughing at me." As a result, the message I internalized at a very young age was one of shame and inadequacy. I don't have a single memory of my mother ever cuddling me, playing with or reading to me. It was my dad who did all these things, and it is not lost me now how fortunate I am to have had that from him.

Now, here's the thing…

The things my mother said and did were normalised in my family. My father had grown up in a loving environment in which motherhood was sacrosanct, and this was the framework with which he made sense of the world. In my mother, he only saw what he wanted to see, and rationalised what didn't fit. Through him, she had a license to speak and do as she pleased.

She was beyond all reproach.

My mother would rarely talk about her own childhood. She opened up only once when, in my early teens, I found her sitting on the kitchen floor, drunk and crying. This was the only time she told me that her own mother used to openly express how she wished that she had been killed instead of her teenage brother, who had died in a motorcycle accident shortly before I was born.

My mother continued to drink and died a slow and lingering death, her brain corroded by the ammonia in her blood that her liver was no longer able to remove. Toward the end, she regressed into a child-like state, and my dad spent his last days spoon-feeding her and taking her to the toilet.

One of the saddest memories I have is of him sitting with his arm around my mother, who was no longer fully aware, and trying to comfort her.

"I don't know how we will do it," he said, "but somehow we'll get through this."

I knew as I watched him that there would be no way "through this", but only continued decline.

Within a year of that moment, both my mother and father were gone.

My dad had worked hard in a manual job from the age of fourteen, and spent the little retirement he had as a full-time carer for my mother. My parents were deeply in love with each other, and toward the end he often remarked how he would not have had things any other way.

After my mother's death, my father lived just long enough to put all his affairs in order and then, one day while out walking, he sat down and just died. After all the years of trauma and distress thrown up by my mother, I find it most distressing how he had managed to arrange things so that his own passing would be of no trouble to anyone. It is only now that I can begin to appreciate how, in those last few months of his life, he must have grieved so.

PART 3

I still find it difficult to tease out the good moments from bad, and properly reconcile the past. There were certainly good things about my mother, and some good times with her, and it would be wrong of me to paint an overly negative picture.

As a child, she had been cruelly bullied by her own mother, which, other than the astute observations of a relative, had been culturally invisible at the time. As an adult, she had been put on a pedestal and emotionally spoiled by my well-meaning father whose chivalrous notions about gender came from a bygone age. Never had my mother been expected to deal with the fallout from her own behaviour.

Recent UK legislation aims to make emotional abuse a criminal offence. While it's undoubtedly a good thing that its seriousness is at last being recognised, its criminalization is utterly wrong-headed and will ultimately benefit no one except an army of lawyers and bureaucratic enforcers. The scope for institutionalised injustice here, I believe, far outweighs any benefit it could bring.

The solution lies, not in ever more punishment, condemnation and social exclusion, but in a sea change in our attitudes toward the generational nature of abuse. My mother didn't know how to be a mother because she was never properly mothered herself. Had the right kind of therapeutic intervention been available decades ago — one that would not have implied criminalization and shame — the effect on my family could have been transformative.

On the other hand, the involvement of the police and judiciary would have undoubtedly torn us apart and destroyed all our lives.

Abuse within the human family is not new — it has always been with us. Human beings are not inherently bad, rather the lives of our ancestors were characterised by subsistence level survival to which they were brutally adapted. Today, we still experience the echo of that in our relationships, on our streets, and in our prisons. If we could ever effectively dampen out this destructive echo from the past, we could transform human society within a few generations.

Whenever you encounter a damaged adult who is racked by deep insecurity, or who is emotionally destructive or physically or sexually violent, you are almost certainly looking at a battered or abused child who has simply grown up. Condemnation and contempt, without a willingness to investigate and to understand, ensures only continued ignorance and misunderstanding for new generations of children, and their children.

No, human beings are not intrinsically bad, but we are easily damaged in childhood, irrevocably so in extreme cases. Ultimately, however, it's all about how we treat children, not about how many people we lock up.

Notes.
* In the UK, a "council estate" is a social housing development.
Louise's name was changed in this for anonymity reasons. Wherever she is today, I hope she is happy.

Consent: You Don't Have It

John Hembling (JtO) · 17 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I hope nobody minds too much if I spend the entirety of this article talking about my penis.

It might seem self-indulgent of me, of course. I do have my reasons. For example, I have been listening and reading for a number of years, as just about every single other voice within our shared (and fabricated) cultural narrative that tells me, and tells you, and tells anyone within hearing, in the most authoritative and condemning terms, all about my personal, private sexual parts. Yours too, if outboard plumbing is what chance favoured you with.

For some, all P.I.V. – "Penis in Vagina" – is rape. But, of course, never mind the rape; aren't we all inured to that chorus of hatred by now? Nobody seems to remark at the reduction of the most intimate act of physical affection to mere mechanics.

But our culture's predominant narrative has more to say, not just on nuts bolts and screws, but on the sexual organs of just less than half the human race.

> Man's discovery that his genitalia could serve as a weapon to prehistoric times, along with the use of fire and the first crude stone axe. From prehistoric times to the present, I believe, rape has played a critical function. It is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear.
>
> —Susan Brownmiller

According to this, for a man, his genitals are not a physical connection to sexual identity, or spirituality as manifested in some religions. It is not even an integral part of himself as a physical being. No, in this narrative, a penis is an implement of pain and damage. It's a weapon.

A more vicious and cruel imagining of human beings as other, and as enemy, it's hard to fathom. But, it gets worse.

According to feminist orthodoxy, rape, rather than being a rarely-occurring violent crime, is a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear. All men, against all women, in a process of conscious and purposeful intimidation.

But all of that is old news, isn't it?

Consent. Enthusiastic, ongoing, affirmative consent, and without it, the usual implied agreement by which sex is actually engaged by real people in real world is now reclassified as a violent crime–but only men are the criminals obviously.

Let's pause here and make one thing clear.

You: The feminists engaging in all this narrative-shaping and reality-bending declaration of the identities, the sexuality and the intentions of people who not only aren't you, but of whom you clearly have no hint of understanding.

You do not have my consent.

You don't have my consent to declare anything about my penis. You utterly lack my consent to hypothesize on my intentions, sexual or otherwise. You have not ever asked my permission to discuss, never-mind to declare by decree what my motive might be, what my sexuality says, or what the purpose of my penis is. It's mine, its private, you are not invited to touch, to spy, to grope unskillfully at my most intimate sexual parts or my sexuality.

My sexuality is not yours to use, or abuse for your own amusement, or in construction of your narrative. You, the feminist, however, seem utterly unconcerned that your own admonitions about consent apparently do not apply to your exercise of fiat power.

But as forbearing and accommodating as I am, and so many other men evidently are, I have had entirely enough.

I am entirely sick and tired of the assault on my sexuality. If you are a feminist, I mean you are sexually assaulting me.

The feminist narrative on sex, on masculinity and on my penis is an assault. Your narrative, feminist, is sexual assault.

I am not playing word games. This is not a clever play of rhetoric. The present feminist narrative on sex, on male sexuality, and the feminist narrative on my penis is nothing short of ongoing sexual abuse.

As feminists, you have been for a very long time using my sex and sexuality. You have used my sex in cultivation of your frankly vile hate-narrative. But you do not have my consent.

So in all this assault on the sexuality, and all this abuse of the sexual identities of men and boys by feminists, should I now explain, as to a classroom of mentally challenged children – the affection, loyalty, devotion of men, the natural love of almost all men towards women? Should I here, enrich the tyrants still controlling our public narrative?

Wouldn't such a gift, bestowed onto a movement of sexual abusers, also be abused and used as another tool of human harm?

Just as my sexuality, and men's, is not on offer to ideologues in service of their cultivation of hate, neither is it free to use as entertainment, or indulgence, or as assumed service to be denied by a sexual gatekeeper.

And you, the feminists, you do not have my consent, or that of any of the other men or boys you continue to sexually assault and abuse.

Christina Hoff Sommers weighs in on “Ban Bossy”

AVfM Video Source · 18 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Christina Hoff Sommers, one of the few rational women to hang on to the word “feminist” (although we’re not sure why she bothers, in our view the word has been too polluted by hateful ideologues and liars to be worth it) has taken on the Ban Bossy campaign in her new web series, “The Factual Feminist.”

If this was the true face of feminism, I doubt many of us would object anymore. We think she’s tilting at windmills, but we salute her for embracing reality over ideology.

Reward for Finding Danielle D'Entremont's Attacker Doubled, Feminist Groups Challenged to Match

Dan Perrins · 18 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Wednesday March 26 2014, Danielle D'Entremont, a feminist activist who openly criticized the Queens University men's issues awareness group, reports that she left her apartment in the dark of night and was attacked by a man who knew her name. She informs the world via facebook and also states this;

> I was punched in the face multiple times and lost half my tooth. This was after a few threatening emails regarding my support for feminist activities on campus. Take care of yourselves and try not to go out alone.

The chain of events of how her attack was reported as we understand them went as follows:

1. D'Entremont made a status update on facebook with a photo, showing some swelling, bruising and a chipped tooth, that she was attacked. Included in that status update was the claim she had received threatening emails regarding her activism prior to the attack.
2. She reported the attack to campus security.
3. They helped her file a police report.
4. An investigation was launched.
5. Insinuation that a Men's Human Rights Activist was behind the attack permeated news reporting of the assault.

The attack did happen the night before Dr. Janice Fiamengo was to give a lecture. A lecture questioning of Feminist Theory, at Queen's University, where D'Entremont is a student. D'Entremont was a student and a feminist activist who protested this event.

Right now on the original Queen's Journal news piece about the attack there are over 1,000 comments. Comments from all sides of gender politics. They range from calling her a liar, to feminists championing her and pointing an accusatory finger at the MHRM, and everything in-between.

The feminist position appears to be that it must have been a Men's Human Rights Activist.

My position, and believe I can say its the majority of the movements position, is: I'm open to the remote possibility it was someone who thought they were an MHRA. Our movement is and always has strongly condemned and eschewed violence, and our record over the many years of doing this has been one of constantly being accused of being violent even though none of us has ever been violent and we've made it repeatedly clear we would condemn anyone who was even a little violent. So I say they might be someone think they are an MHRA because our whole movement has been based on non-violence and to inflict violence would be contrary to a core tenet of the movement. However the possibility does exist that someone who thinks they are an MHRA did attack D'Entremont.

If that is the case, no kid gloves or special treatment should be used when that individual stands before a court and answers to the charge of assault. And they should expect no mercy from the MHRM.

I think it far more likely that she was not attacked by an MHRA, because despite years of our being accused of violence, none of us has ever perpetrated any. But what I think does not matter.

What matters is we have allegations / insinuations of someone being responsible for an assault against someone who was only exercising her right to free expression and, like it or not, we are doing something about it. It does not matter if we agree with D'Entremont or not; violence is not acceptable.

Yesterday Attila Vinczer traveled to Kingston Ontario, home of Queens University, and peppered the town with reward posters offering $1000.00 for information (which will be kept confidential) leading to the arrest and conviction of the individual responsible for D'Entremont's attack. 200 posters were put up and handed out to the locals.

Shortly after this was announced, and before Attila had returned from postering, Paul Elam of A Voice for Men matched Men's Rights Canada's offered reward, increasing it to $2,000.00 (Shhhhh, it's part of our evil plan to "silence women on campus." I'm probably fired now for letting you in on this patriarchal secret. Patriarchy does hurt and help men after all, right?)

Paul also issued a challenge for other men's rights groups to add to the reward pot. On that note, others noted that perhaps Paul has not gone far enough in his offer. Maybe feminists would like to help in the reward for the arrest and conviction of the individual(s) responsible for the attack on Danielle. Will they? We now publicly invite them to do so, and if they are interested they can contact us (contact info is on our Masthead).

Freedom of expression (speech) and freedom association is a Chartered Right in Canada and when it is threatened by violence it falls on us all, feminist and non-feminist alike to make every effort to have those individual(s) brought before the courts to answer for their violence. Violence serves no purpose in an open discussion. It certainly serves no purpose in gender politics, AVFM / MHRM has been steadfast in its position on this from day 1.

We'd like to know what actual steps the feminist community is taking to ensure the attacker is caught. Right now we're not seeing much from the feminist community other than Over 9000 pedobears and a slew of unfounded allegations.

If they really are committed to ensuring her attacker is brought to justice there should be no reason they wouldn't help. They certainly spared no effort in rallying the troops to support her immediately after she was attacked.

Their support in condemning the attack is there, but are they willing to take that extra step and help ensure her attacker is brought to justice?

Does the feminist community really want Danielle's attacker caught as much as the MHRM?

The reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of Danielle's attacker just from Attila and AVFM alone is now at $2000.00 and there is every reason to believe it will be increased.

Are feminists as committed as the MHRM to ensuring violence is never used to silence an individual's right to free expression, and to make sure criminals are brought to justice in Canada?

Women's Legal Education & Action Fund: The first rule of LEAF is don't talk about LEAF

John Hembling (JtO) · 18 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The second rule of LEAF (Women's Legal Education and Action Fund) is that you don't write abut, or talk about LEAF.

At least, not without their permission.

That's what they told me in a phone call after I explained I was writing an article about equality, as defined by feminism.

I had called to ask the definition of a phrase used by the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund on their website: "Substantive Equality." How does addition of the word "substantive" affect the definition of the word equality, to which it is attached as an adjective?

By itself, equality is already slippery. In the context of law or basic civil rights, it generally has two distinct, and mutually exclusive, meanings. The most obvious of these is equality of either opportunity, or of rights in the eyes of the law. This is a straightforward definition most Canadians and Americans will recognize. However, without an identifying prefix or suffix, what some practitioners of Social Justice mean when they use the word "equality" is "equality of outcome." They mean use of quotas, reserved seats, or group-specific discrimination to ensure that a pre-determined numbers from selected demographics are represented in a field of what previously would have been achieved by merit.

The two "types" of equality, as mentioned, are exclusive of each other. The reason equality of opportunity and equality of outcome don't overlap is that people are not identical to one another. A child of recent immigrants, may work significantly harder, and achieve more than a child raised in the comfort and convention of the suburban middle class.

If the immigrant kid professionally outperforms the comfortable suburban kid because he worked harder in school getting an unequal result, tough luck for anyone who prizes equality of outcome. On the other hand, in some cases growing up in an established community, and being connected to the business associations of an already prosperous network might give the comfortable suburban kind an advantage that kid whose parents arrived by boat doesn't have. This isn't equality of outcome either. And, again, tough shit.

But life isn't fair, and not everybody has smart, or well-connected parents.

However, when we, or anybody else, attempt to impose equality of outcome, we do so by suppressing the choices and the rational discretion of individuals. We can only create equal outcomes by using force against other people.

In attempting to unnaturally create an artificial equivalence of outcome, we must step on and suppress individuals, as well as diminish the actual achievement of members of a favoured group who would have succeeded by their own merit.

But LEAF, the women's Legal Education and Action Fund has their own terminology. They call it "Substantive Equality." And yes, this is how they explained it to me when I called them to ask them.

Q: What does the word substantive change about the word equality?

A: "Um well, it's the basically it's the kind of equality that Canada has signed on to. And what it means is, like, a formal definition of equality would mean that everybody gets the same thing. Substantive equality has to take into account um history and patterns of discrimination, and seek to allow the law to benefit everybody equally. So it doesn't necessarily mean everybody is going to get the same thing."

So, as with "social justice," which is the opposite of justice, "substantive equality" is the opposite of equality.

And this is what the largest feminist legal activism organization and intervener in the Canadian Criminal Courts promotes as equality.

If, as is often claimed women have in history been discriminated against – then treating them actually equally eliminates that discrimination or imbalance.

Reverse discrimination – or, as it's called by Social Justice Warriors, "substantive equality" – is practiced by those who above all should know better. It is inexcusable.

So what are these equality warriors with deep pockets and law degrees actually seeking? Legal discrimination, a tilted playing field, and one group advantaged over another in the eyes of the law. However, because in history, other, different discrimination existed, they get to claim that what they're doing now is actually equality. Are you convinced?

But, of course, none of this can be talked about, certainly not including mention of the name of LEAF (the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund), because as their education manager told me on the telephone today, their permission is required before public mention of any of it.

I need their permission to talk about it. I'll get right on that.

Note: This item first published on Community Organized Compassion & Kindness. –DE

The New Yorker's Jeffrey Toobin: 'Cynical and Devious' Male Inmates Abused Female Guards

Robert Franklin · 19 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Last year, the Department of Justice completed its study of sexual abuse in adult prisons and juvenile facilities. It wasn't a happy time for feminists. The studies showed that most of the sexual abuse of inmates is committed by guards and most of that is committed by female guards.

Female wrongdoing, particularly sexual wrongdoing, is the type of thing feminists prefer to keep out of sight since it contradicts their narrative of female innocence and male corruption. Worse, coming as that information did, in studies not subject to their censorship, readers were able to draw conclusions free of feminist instruction.

So, what to do? Well, if you're Adèle Mercier, you simply drop all pretense of intellectual integrity and claim that, in the case of boys abused in juvenile facilities, "they were asking for it." Yes, if the sexes were reversed and a male commentator said the same about girls abused by male guards, Mercier would be screaming for his head on a platter. But one of the many privileges of being a feminist is freedom from the inconvenient strictures of intellectual honesty.

So much for the juvenile facilities, but what about the adult ones? We now have our answer. It appears in a New Yorker article by Jeffrey Toobin. Now, Toobin barely mentions the DoJ studies, but his article is plainly an answer to the uncomfortable questions they raise about the sexual abuse of male inmates by their female guards.

Unsurprisingly, Toobin peddles the standard feminist line that somehow the sexual contact between the men in cages and the women who held the keys was a matter of – what else? – male power and female helplessness. He doesn't waste much time getting to the point. Just 600 words into a 5,200-word article Toobin says, "Cynical and devious men succeeded in dominating women who were nominally their keepers."

How does he manage the feat of turning the base metal of facts into the gold of feminist mythology? It wasn't easy. Indeed, I'd say he failed altogether. His "evidence" for the proposition is the thinnest gruel, but I suspect it'll be enough to nourish those who've swallowed the feminist Kool-Aid. Against a backdrop of women clearly acting in their own self-interest, Toobin cobbles together a sorry mishmash of self-contradiction and intellectual hocus-pocus that would make anyone but a feminist blush.

The Baltimore City Detention Center (BCDC) is over 200 years old. It's located in a high-crime part of the city and houses over 2,000 male inmates awaiting trial, sometimes for months or years. Those inmates are overseen by 650 correctional officers. Almost all inmates and guards are African-American and the most powerful gang in the place is called the Black Guerrilla Family. Guards are mostly culled from the surrounding community, and few men there qualify. The job requires a high school diploma, clean urine and a clear criminal record, leaving most local men looking elsewhere for work. About 75% of the guards – about 487 people – are women.

There's currently a federal investigation under way into the criminal activities inside the BCDC and nine inmates and 27 guards have been indicted. Much of Toobin's article relies on information gleaned from that investigation including wiretaps of cellphones used by inmates.

From the look of things, the BCDC was the Wild West. Inside the walls and out, pretty much anything was for sale. Into the jail came tobacco, marijuana, prescription drugs, and food, most of it under the control of the Black Guerrilla Family and its head man, Tavon White. Payment by and to the gang was handled via cell phones – also controlled by the BGF – and the use of Green Dot MoneyPak debit cards. As the major mode of communication, cell phones too became valuable contraband inside the jail.

Under the indifferent eye of the jail's administration, business boomed with inmates often making more money than they could on the outside. Tavon White, for example, bought a BMW and a Mercedes Benz while in the BCDC. One intercepted phone call revealed him saying he netted over $15,000 per month. Not bad for a man living in a cage.

But of course none of the contraband that was the heart of the inmates' enterprise made it into the jail without the guards' help. Guards enthusiastically participated in the sale of contraband inside the BCDC.

> Female guards smuggled the contraband into the facility, concealing it "in their underwear, hair, internally and elsewhere," according to a government filing.

Plenty of guards took part. Between 60% and 75% of the female guards were involved in the smuggling and sale of contraband. That's between 292 and 365 female guards joining in the fun.

Why did they do it? Money, of course. The limited supply of all types of contraband inside the prison meant prices were stratospheric. A single gram of pot fetched $50, or $1,400 an ounce. Female guards supplemented their regular incomes by buying cheaply on the outside and selling dearly inside the walls. One guard, Adrena Rice was recorded by the feds thus:

> When I came back in the jail, I'm like, shit, I'm not going to stop making my money. You feel me? I seen what the fuck was going on, asked a few people what was up and who was what and what was what. I am just about my money. You hear me? I love money. I love it. I swear to God.

The BCDC was just the place for her.

> Rodney, a thirty-nine-year-old former inmate, said, "They can buy a ten-dollar pill on the street and sell it for a hundred dollars." Others spoke of cigarettes sold for a dollar apiece… Guards would buy Percocet on the street for five dollars a pill (or obtain it free through Medicaid fraud), then sell it inside for fifty dollars a pill.

With a (literally) captive market and huge mark-ups for all goods sold inside, it's no surprise that so many guards got in on the action. Nor is it a surprise that some of the guards became sexually involved with inmates. Some percentage of women will always be attracted to the wealthy, the powerful and the famous. That's true in everyday life and it was true in the BCDC, where a clear hierarchy of inmates ruled as virtual potentates, and some of them, like Tavon White, were affluent as well. As White bragged on the phone one day,

> "I got elevated to the seat where as though nobody in the jail could outrank me….Like, I am the law….So if I told any motherfucking body they had to do this, hit a police, do this, kill a motherfucker, anything, it got to be done. Period."

With power and money like his, it's no surprise that female guards would be attracted to White. And of course his immediate subordinates benefited from much the same type of privilege. Guards made good money in contraband that no one bought or sold without the permission of the BGF. Therefore, guards and the gang's chiefs had important financial relationships. That those led to sex was like one domino knocking down another.

The guards seem to have been very enthusiastic about sex with inmates. One of White's paramours, Jennifer Owens was recorded saying this:

> Me and my sisters we was talking right….So I said you know what makes me stay with him? Sex! It's that I have two babies by him. Leave him for what? No one's going to give me sex like that.

One law review article described the attraction inmates had for guards this way:

> In reported narratives of women who became sexually involved with men in custody, they spoke of all the benefits of partnering that they were denied in relationships outside of custodial settings and that they had > access to inside… They described male inmates' physical and emotional availability. They also described feeling in control of the relationship…

(Astonishingly, neither Toobin nor the author of the law review article notices the obvious – the stark difference, clearly described, between love on the outside and love on the inside for those guards. Why would guards enjoy better relationships with inmates than with men in everyday life? Because they had greater control over the inmates. They said so themselves and it's intuitively true. After all, there were 2,000 inmates to choose from and if one didn't express the right kind of love and affection, another surely would. The guards had the inmates under their thumbs in ways that were impossible elsewhere. But, because those facts interfere with his narrative, Toobin misses the obvious.)

In short, female guards, according to objective facts and their own descriptions of their motivations, had a pretty good thing going. They rather lavishly supplemented their salaries, got good sex with men they liked – or in some cases loved – in relationships they felt good about, and that they couldn't have on the outside.

To many, including the guards, that looks like a win/win situation. Adult women sized up a situation and made rational choices about how to behave to bring about the greatest benefits to themselves in the context of the jail.

And we can't have that. The idea of women acting autonomously in their own perceived self-interest is not favored by much of our news media and popular culture. So it fell to Jeffrey Toobin to convince New Yorker readers that, far from the female guards making their own autonomous choices, "Cynical and devious men succeeded in dominating women who were nominally their keepers."

He makes a hash out of it. Against all the evidence that contradicts him, Toobin offers little to support his thesis.

He begins his thankless task by taking us in The Way-Back Machine to the 1970s when murderer, thug and revolutionary philosopher, George Jackson founded the Black Guerrilla Family. He had a low opinion of women. Toobin quotes him thus:

> Women like to be dominated, love being strong-armed, need an overseer to supplement their weakness…It is for them to obey and aid us, not to attempt to think.

He also quotes a Jackson letter saying "The white theory of the 'emancipated woman' is a false idea." That is, women prefer subordinate status because they lack agency, so any notion of emancipation, i.e. that they can be different, is false. (Do I need to point out the obvious irony? While Toobin rightly disdains Jackson's take on the female half of society, his article embraces precisely those ideas. Jackson saw women generally as weak and feckless; Toobin describes the female guards exactly the same. But again, he fails to notice.)

Jackson was killed in prison in 1971. Because he founded the BGF, because he held disdainful views of women and because the BGF exists today in the Baltimore jail, Toobin hopes readers will conclude that leaders of the BGF hold the same views of women.

But, sadly for his narrative, he offers only the barest hint that they might. His sole evidence for the proposition is that a Jackson follower and BCDC inmate, Eric Brown, in 2010 wrote a manifesto called The Black Book in which we find, "The Black Woman naturally serves the Black Man by…Consoling him, Cooking for him, Rearing their Children." He goes on to say a man is entitled to discipline his wife by use of first, verbal reprimands, second, refusing to have sex with her and third, "he beats her lightly."

Did anyone in the BGF follow Brown's recommendations? If they did, Toobin doesn't let on about it. That may be because The Black Book lays down a lot of other laws for black men that the BGF ignores. For example, Brown "condemns the use and sale of drugs," practices that make up the major activity of the gang inside the BCDC. Since the BGF ignores the rule against drug use and trafficking, why should we believe they adhere to Brown's take on women? Toobin makes no effort to answer the question, for what I suspect are obvious reasons.

But the core of Toobin's argument is that the BGF profiled the female guards, selecting the weak and vulnerable to "prey on."

> Tavon White preyed on vulnerable women. According to a government filing in the case, documents found in one Maryland prison "detail how new B.G.F. recruits are taught to target a specific stereotype of a C.O. (corrections officer), specifically women with low self-esteem, insecurities and certain physical attributes. According to these B.G.F. documents, these C.O.s are prime targets whom B.G.F. members can manipulate easily." (Parenthetical mine)

Did the strategy work? Amazingly, Toobin never asks the question, much less answers it. Never mind the fact that the aforementioned documents weren't even found in the BCDC. No evidence is produced that (a) White or anyone in the BCDC ever read The Black Book, (b) anyone followed any of its suggestions at all, much less those on how to treat women or (c) they met with any success at recruiting vulnerable guards. Indeed, Toobin only refers in passing to one guard who seemed to develop a love for an inmate named Steven Loney.

But far more remarkably, Toobin blithely ignores salient facts. For example, there were between 292 and 365 female guards actively involved in the illegal buying and selling of a wide array of contraband inside the BCDC. Were they all "preyed upon" because they were "vulnerable?" Please. In fact, many of those guards had been employed at the BCDC for years and participated avidly in the goings on. Spending years as a prison guard in a place like the BCDC is hardly a prescription for maintaining one's maidenly innocence. And of course the money was good.

What about that female guard that constitutes Toobin's sole example (out of hundreds of guards) of a vulnerable woman "seduced" by an unscrupulous inmate? Here are the facts as described by a federal prosecutor:

> "[The guard] was one of the very most prolific of the abusers of the system, one of the ones who worked the longest and hardest at smuggling and generally subverting the proper administration of the Baltimore City Detention Center."

Sound like an innocent lamb to you? Federal Judge Ellen Hollander didn't think so; she sentenced the guard to 42 months in prison.

And that, my friends, is the extent of Toobin's "evidence" that female guards were the witless dupes of male inmates. It amounts to three things: (1) Blandishments from a long-dead thug and a book that possibly no one read and that in any case everyone ignored, (2) a vague theory that inmates targeted uniquely vulnerable guards supported by (3) a single "example" of a guard described as "one of the very most prolific of the abusers of the system." That's Toobin's case – thin gruel indeed.

Now, a word about language. Feminists talk a lot about the "intersectionality" of issues like race, sex and class. So it's interesting that Toobin, who's carrying the water for feminism, describes the BGF and Tavon White in terms we might expect from the Grand Dragon of the Ku Klux Klan.

Recall that he quoted George Jackson saying women "need an overseer to supplement their weakness…" Jackson used the word "overseer" advisedly, connoting as it does a slave master. Jackson then was speaking in explicitly racist and sexist terms, comparing men to slave overseers and women to their charges. The term was both offensive and intended to be, and Toobin quotes it with appropriate condemnation.

Which makes all the more remarkable his use of the term "preyed on" to describe the BGF's relationship to female guards. It's impossible that Toobin is unaware of the long history of comparing black men to animals, specifically predatory ones. That's mostly been applied to their relationships to white women and often used to promote the lynching of black males accused of rape. But Toobin applies the concept to black male/black female relationships which places his article squarely within one of the most reprehensible of feminist traditions.

Feminism has always had its problems with race. In 1851, white feminists held a Women's Convention in Akron, Ohio at which black former slave Sojourner Truth spoke up to inquire "Ain't I a woman?" As a poor, uneducated black woman, she saw all too clearly the chasm between her and the toney white women at the meeting. In the early 20th century, white suffragists abjured the concept of votes for all women, preferring to leave their black "sisters" in the dust. When Betty Friedan wrote that, to cure the "oppression" of being white, highly educated, and kept in leisure by a working husband, women needed only the tonic of wage work, many black women gaped in astonishment. And black women, who know well the history that white women's cries of rape produce the strange fruit of black men hanging from trees, understandably look askance at white feminists' use of "rape" to increase the incarceration rates of men, particularly black ones.

Again, Toobin knows this. His use of frankly racist terminology at all is disgraceful. But that he does so in a liberal publication promoting feminist values continues one of the worst traditions of a movement that's already so offended people that only 20% (according to a Huffington Post/YouGov poll) identify with it. You might think that using racism to promote feminism would be beyond the pale, but no. Intersectionality? Never heard of it.

The New Yorker piece, like the absurdities of Adèle Mercier, is both the good news and the bad. It's bad because these people continue to peddle their snake oil in places of influence – major universities, widely-read publications. But it's good because their arguments are so weak, so at odds with facts, so violative of basic decency and morality that they horrify as many people as they convince. Probably more. The more feminists talk, the more people they alienate.

That's something to celebrate.

Bachelorhood as a fine art (1900)

Peter Wright · 19 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following gem is from an American Magazine that circulated in the year 1900 called The Bachelor Book. – PW

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

War against boys. Are the ADHD drugs unsafe?

Tom Golden · 20 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Have you heard anything in the media about the meds used for ADHD being unsafe? I would bet not. But guess what? There's been quite a bit of scientific data pointing towards that very possibility. Just have a look at this page:

http://www.leonardsax.com/stimulants.html

Leonard Sax, M.D. has been pointing out these potential risk factors for some time and I can't remember seeing any articles in the news media other then those written by Sax.

The worst thing about these potential side effects and brain changes resulting from these meds is that they center around de-motivating the boy. The very thing that the medicine is trying to do, to help him focus, is negated by this potential impact of simply not wanting to get out of bed. Here's what Sax says in his excellent book on boys, Boys Adrift:

> "The stimulant medications appear to exert their harmful effects by damaging an area of the developing brain called the nucleus accumbens. Independent groups of researchers at the University of Michigan, the Medical University of South Carolina, the University of Pittsburgh, Brown University as well as in Sweden, Italy, and the Netherlands all have found that exposing laboratory animals to these medications, even at low doses and for short periods can cause permanent damage to the nucleus accumbens, the part of the brain that is responsible for translating motivation into action. if a boy's nucleus accumbens is damaged, he may still feel hungry, or sexually aroused. He just won't feel motivated to do anything about it."

Sax states that we can't be certain yet about the damage in humans since the evidence is not fully in. However, he asks parents a simple question: Would you like to volunteer your son for a trial?

Most parents would say no. But that is only if they know the dangers. At this point very few people seem to know these drugs may be risky. I have seen no headlines, heard no "60 Minutes" reports or specials on NPR. I have heard nothing about the possible risks involved. Silence. Just consider what might happen if medications used for mostly girls were found to have a similar risk. There would be a firestorm of articles about the misogyny of the medical professionals and the pharmaceutical companies labeling them as patriarchal evil doers and oppressors. It would likely be front page material. But not so with boys.

But it gets worse. The media is usually informed by medical professionals and those folks are simply not speaking up, or worse yet, they are saying the opposite. Take Dr Biederman for example. Dr. Joseph Biederman is the chief of pediatric psychopharmacology at Massachusetts General Hospital. You know, the hospital associated with Harvard University. Here's a bit from Wikipedia about Dr Biederman:

> In 2007, Biederman was ranked as the second highest producer of high-impact papers in psychiatry overall throughout the world with 235 papers cited a total of 7048 times over the past 10 years as determined by the Institute for Scientific Information (ISI).[2] The same organization ranked Biederman at #1 in terms of total citations to his papers published on ADD/ADHD in the past decade.[3]
>
> Biederman was the recipient of the 1998 NAMI Exemplary Psychiatrist award. He was also selected by the Massachusetts Psychiatric Society Awards committee as the recipient of the 2007 Outstanding Psychiatrist Award for Research. In 2007, Biederman received the Excellence in Research Award from the New England Council of Child and Adolescent Psychiatry. He was also awarded the Mentorship Award from the Department of Psychiatry at the Massachusetts General Hospital.

This is someone who's opinion is counted by all and especially by the media.

And what does Dr Biederman say about these drugs. According to Sax he has been “strenuously encouraging” their use. Why would the head of Harvard’s hospital pharmacology not mention the risks of these drugs? Well, we don’t know but we do know one thing, Dr Biederman received 1.6 million dollars from the pharmaceutical companies and never bothered to tell anyone. You do the math.

Then there is Dr. Fred Goodwin, former chief of the National Institute of Mental Health (NIMH). Apparently Dr Goodwin has been singing a similar tune about these drugs being safe and guess what? He has now been outed as getting 1.3 milion dollars from the pharmaceuticals.

How many more Biederman’s and Goodwins are out there? Maybe these doctors are part of the reason we haven’t been hearing much?

Parents need to know the risks involved. If the media and our medical professionals won’t do it, we need to. Send this article and its links to parents who might need to know this information.

More from Leonard Sax, M.D.
Risky, Even Used as Intended
More info on Biederman, Goodwin and the kickbacks.
Boys Adrift on Amazon (on Kindle)

From the mouths of (hot) babes

B.R. Merrick · 20 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A modern complaint of modern women on modern sides of modern social and political aisles is over the "exploitation" of other modern women, and the idea of womanhood in general, supposedly inherent in what is chiefly a male hobby that spans ancient to modern times: the viewing of erotica.

I'm certainly not afraid of the word "pornography," but that's essentially what pornography is: erotica. It is designed to give you dirty thoughts. I say "dirty" not to denigrate the practice, but because the word is sexually provocative; and because I wanted to point out that the word "dirt" was put in there by society for a reason.

After all, what is dirt? It is rotting plants, mostly. It is also rotting animals, fish, birds, eggs, larvae, insects, and some of it is rotting humans. It is pooped out by worms. Worms are gross. Oddly enough, penises, which share a similar shape to worms, are often considered beautiful, even if the individual considering its beauty is merely the straight male who possesses it along with not the slightest interest in anyone else's.

In complete disregard for this beautiful thought, and in ignorance of the philosophical implications of our species' ability to understand beauty at all, we often make dirt of male humans in gigantic, hideously violent spurts. Not unlike ejaculation, which ironically, as John the Other has so eloquently stated, is not violent, but is instead a beautiful thing.

Understand that I refer to violent imagery above only in vague, symbolic connection with male sexuality; and merely because the act of "shooting" semen out of something that also displays a remarkable ability to reshape itself into something resembling so many handguns (go search for the image of the inside hole of a trigger, from the British gay porn studio Triga) is often associated with what is actually a thoroughly peaceful act. We frequently hear debates and controversy ignited over "sex and violence" in entertainment, and blithely ignore the gnawing feeling that we are equating the two. We must also concede that we sadly have to sometimes deal with what turns out to be a direct link from one phenomenon to the unequal, sickening other. Two guesses which one is sickening.

In spite of that company name and logo (and in my refusal to defend or condemn them while merely pointing them out), the non-sickening, non-violent squirtathon is brought to the often thrilled viewer thanks to the male who performs the act. This male is more likely to have a booming voice, lots and lots of body hair, muscle, heft, girth, weight, bodily strength, a mind focused directly and immediately on the task at hand, emotional intensity, bravado, machismo, clear signals of sexual thoughts and inclinations, and a whole lot of physical manifestation (and thereby frank admission) of powerfully intimate human desires. Even if the man in question is more diminutive, his body will bear the signs, chiefly between his legs, that he is still, on average, stronger and hairier than most females; and naturally designed for bodily penetration.

The end result is often an unexpected pregnancy. The first human pregnancy was undoubtedly so. It is instinctual for the man to insert his penis in the woman's vagina. It is instinctual for the woman to want it to happen. It doesn't take long for a human with an undoubtedly naïve human intellect to experience a growth in that intellect when he realizes that the act of shooting that stuff out of his yump when he was masturbating the other day reoccurred when he was connected to Unga. She didn't get big with child before he put it there.

Now Mog, Jr. is smoking wowza with Gorg, Nunk, and Hmf instead of contributing to the hunt. He's no good. If only Unga weren't so desirable.

You see, if Jr. isn't going to help with the hunt, then perhaps we should think harder before making another one. On the other, non-masturbating hand, if we get less help with the hunt, there will be less hunting. If there is less hunting, we will be hungrier. Hunger pangs make us a little more anxious about dying. That would turn us into dirt. Who wants to be dirt?

To go around thinking of the act that too easily makes dirt of humanity leads very often to the act itself. When you're that freaked out about kids that turn out all wrong, to tolerate individuals, whether male or female, who encourage such thoughts becomes more and more unthinkable.

In such a dirty conspiracy, you are undoubtedly going to see more doers doing, and when civilization comes along, those doing the dirty doings can spend more of their working time doing only the doings of dirty deeds done dirt cheap. Enough disgusting alliteration. The point is: Most of those doers, at any given time, in any given place, are undoubtedly assumed to be men, because they are doing outside where it's visible. The women are usually inside with a smaller group of tiny people. Those women doing inside have to keep it clean. Those men outside are dirty. "Don't drag that filth in here!"

All the men – not just the dirty ones – are then engaged in setting up a marketplace, now that they have built civilization with their backs and with the legs of once-wild animals that they domesticated, all done outside and for your viewing pleasure. Since I believe that humans created markets naturally out of a natural inclination for intellect far beyond the rest of the animal kingdom, it is easy to see that there has always been a market, throughout the history of civilization, for the creation of erotica in order to please the libido of the doer after all that doing, with the erotic handiwork of other doers sympathetic to the doer's seemingly shared libido.

Thus, before Satan invented photography, a man's visual libido required an artist's hand: on a vase; in a painting; in a sculpture; even a little doodle. If the man desirous of the erotica had a doodle that was even littler, he may be more likely to welcome the skills of an artist with the charm requisite to encourage a prudish female to disrobe, if his smaller size caused him any undue and totally unnecessary shyness. In other words: Regardless of endowment, a lot of guys would rather take care of business in private. If she's not around, his hand always is. How nice to pleasure more than one bodily sense at a time by staring at a dirty cave drawing. Mog realizes that once ejaculation has taken place, the male mind has a tendency to completely change track. Unga is safe from his yump and its attendant ook and all's right with the world.

Meanwhile, Mog, Jr. is high on wowza and banging half the cheerleading squad. He's not allowed in that cave, and everybody thought the cheerleaders were going to practice. Oh, and he's been to that cave plenty.

Mog, Jr. needs a lecture. He needs to be threatened. He needs to be indoctrinated. The cheerleaders need therapy. Otherwise, it's dirt for us all.

Clicked the back button yet? I sure want to. You see, we've just entered a great, big, gray area. I say Mog and Mog, Jr. need to talk. But were they talking before, and about what? Is Mog separated from Unga? Is he allowed access to Jr.?

That's a whole other article. The point is, they're both looking at erotica. They both whack it. They both experience a hormonal change afterward that lasts for a unique length of time depending on various circumstances, and the access to pornography helped at least some of the time. Actually, it helps an increasingly larger proportion of the time.

Unfortunately, feminist Unga claims, it is at the expense of an exploited female. She can only get away with this argument if the woman has a lower libido; or if her interests in sexual expression always and everywhere lay with no pun intended elsewhere than his.

This is categorically false, and I can prove it with one hand a magazine: an old copy of Cheri, a magazine clearly not designed for me (except that it totally like secretly is). On page 40 of Issue #190 from July 2012 the reader can read an interview with one Chanel Preston, which I'm sure is her real name. She works in the pornography industry as a starlet. Her parents named her after a perfume so that men would be rather luridly attracted to her:

I never had issues with critics. Sometimes I want to read things just to see what people think. The only issue I have with them is sometimes they recap what happened in the movie and they don't really critique it. Sometimes I'm like, 'Wait a minute. What about that scene?' (Laughs) 'Did I do a good job?'

It appears from this single quote, and several others that are far less safe for work, that Ms. Preston does not feel the least exploited, but is indeed anxious to know what others thought of something of which she is very proud.

But surely, the feminist retorts, that interview is a fake. They can write anything they want in these magazines that employ dirty-minded male photographers, writers, advertisers, and sub-editors. They can make it look as good as they want.

After unsticking my hand from page 40, I then mused backward to page 21 where I discovered that another "exploited" porn starlet whose parents named her Jesse Jane is the Entertainment Editor! Her filthy mouth is (this is getting Back-Buttonish), um, rather busily engaged right next to several paragraphs describing, in her own entertainment-editorial words, the contents of various pornographic dirt chunks geared mostly at heterosexual men and anybody else who might have a remote interest in naked men and women and the things they do in private, like this formerly Mormon adult female, whose face and self are beautiful to me, although we will never meet.

It appears that Ms. Jane also feels fairly *un*exploited. But perhaps she is secretly propped up by Le patriarcat sale from underneath… as it were.

Well, underneath her name on the same stained page are contributing photographers Tammy Sands; Suze Randall; Holly Randall (Twins? Perky twins?); Viv Thomas; and the good misogynists at Photorama, whose "No Girls Allowed" sign is no doubt prominently displayed near the entrance. Good thing, ladies. Film is icky and ruins your nails.

Putting the magazine down out of sheer exhaustion, I now realize that I haven't even begun to discuss the non-exploitation of numberless women who now run their own websites; participate for pay in chat rooms; post videos of themselves having sex with their boyfriends at websites that allow free membership and free video postings; chat it up with their fag bangles at porno-posting gay men's websites; and the phenomenon that makes me want to sacrilege all over the place with remembered parts of the Latin mass thanks to an education in music: the CFNM revolution from within the supposed sacred core of Third Wave Feminism, but which actually has played itself out in countless ways throughout history for privileged women, and I'm not talking about Madeline Kahn in History of the World Part I, except that I like totally am.

(I encourage straight male strippers everywhere, after careful Internet research, to work parties of females only in large groupings. The occasional crazy is far less likely to have the necessary supporting witnesses, whereas you should have plenty. And the non-crazies really, really like it.)

I will not even go further to point out the corporate-sanctioned, heavily exported, thoroughly unexploitation-oriented gay pornography that manages to refer to imagery that is thoroughly non-violent, even on the same island as Triga, like MenAtPlay. Which I just pointed out. Oops.

The reason Tammy Bruce wants to be taken seriously as a "Fourth Wave Feminist" by (I suspect literally) modulating her voice is because I think deep down, she realizes that what we are watching with all of these filthy females on film is volition at its zenith; and simultaneously in the minds of some of those who volitionally choose to stay clothed with the majority, its nadir. I think she also sees that modern actresses who are Oscar-hungry are more than happy to show a volitional, good-hearted female rubbing her crotch up and down a fireman's pole to excite male customers who are not allowed to touch, but are happy to insult.

Women choosing to be openly sexual are going to look slutty to many. Women's choosing to appear sexually desirable to males predates civilization. Feminism isn't necessary. So now The Fourth Wave is a regurgitation of the first three, and women are still exploited in pornography because they are.

Setting aside the Circles of Reason, it will suffice my purposes here to simply state that both men and women experience a great deal of sexual arousal, and look for multiple ways, many of them grotesque, to satisfy curiosity and the overall pursuit of happiness along the way. When an individual among them bears physical signs of arousal on the exterior; when that individual reveals in multiple studies to have a brain designed for greater amounts of focus on a single activity at a time; when that individual has a body that appears, due to a generally greater amount of muscle, to be designed for violence; that individual is far more likely to be singled out for humanity's collective shame over its collective animal nature. Here come the scapegoats. Most of them have dinks.

Ban Bossy and other feminist fails

Diana Davison · 20 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ban Bossy is just one of many epic failures but, behind the laughable exterior, there is an underlying illness that needs to be exposed. Feminists hate free speech because they can't defend their ideology with facts.

Diana Davison offers some "lived experience" as a challenge to feminists who seek to silence dissent.

Feminists stoop to a new low

AVfM Video Source · 21 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following video shows a wasteful government & NGO-funded campaign by feminists painting males as abusers of women. Although we don't know how much money was wasted on the planning, construction, and implimentation of this experiment – not to mention the money that went into the purses of those feminists who created it – we are betting it cost a cool half-million to produce.

Danielle D'Entremont: Where is the feminist outrage?

Paul Elam · 21 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

To The University of Toronto Student's Union, Ryerson Student's Union, Huffington Post, Jessica Valenti, Charles Clymer, Tori Shepherd, Vincent Matak, Amanda Marcotte, David Futrelle and similar others:

You have all either helped spread or even profited from spreading the idea that men's human rights advocates pose a threat of violence to women, particularly feminist women. Some of you have gone to extremes in this pursuit.

Recently a young woman, Queens University student Danielle D'Entremont, claims to have been physically assaulted outside her home in circumstances that led her and some of you to insinuate that it was a men's activist who committed the alleged crime.

So far, men's activists have pledged $2,000.00 for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the individual responsible, if indeed there was ever an assault committed in the first place.

That leaves us with a simple question. Why aren't any of you stepping up and either joining us or pushing in other public ways for this supposed crime to be solved?

It would seem that accomplishing that would not only foster justice for D'Entremont, it would also be a key opportunity for you to prove your contentions about the men's movement. It would provide a very damning example of our actions, which you could cite in the years ahead.

You will undoubtedly need such a talking point since the SPLC has been so publicly and terminally discredited.

Where is your outrage for this young woman, one of your ideological sisters? Where are your demands for justice on her behalf?

It seems that all most of you have mustered so far is to blithely parrot D'Entremont's innuendo and to mock the skepticism of MHRAs who are not convinced that a crime was committed, save perhaps a false police report.

Seriously, given that all of you have a great deal of investment in discrediting us, this is your big chance, isn't it?

To be frank, I am baffled by your rather tepid reaction. This could and should be a watershed event in your work to underscore your claims.

Unless you think she is lying.

It is hard for me to imagine a world in which feminists believe one of their own has been assaulted by an MHRA, for doing nothing more than expressing her views, and aren't raising all manner of hell about it. It is harder still, for me to comprehend why AVFM and Men's Rights Canada are more invested in finding answers to all this than you.

What kind of movement contains people that will try to silence dissent by pulling fire alarms, pounding batons on the floor, tearing down posters and shouting down speakers at public events, but then suddenly become blasé when one of their own, a woman, gets punched in the face repeatedly for simply being a feminist?

My money is on the idea, and I don't think I am alone here, that it is the kind of movement filled with people who may not really want this case to be solved; with people who think she is lying.

If that does turn out to be the case, it looks like we will need to find a movement that is concerned with false accusations.

That should not be too hard to find.

Okay, MGTOW, I get it now. If this is the option, I'd pass too

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 22 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Isabel Chalmers has written a truly compelling, heart wrenching piece at Thought Catalogue about how her slutty days are behind her and she's ready to offer her vagina to a Nice Guy now. That's so sweet Isabel. Let's see what you have to offer:

Dear Nice Guy,

Note the lack of plural. Isabel is not talking to Nice Guys as a group – she is addressing that one special Nice Guy to which she is obviously entitled.

I don't know you yet but I'm so ready to date you. Seriously, I am. For a long time, I dated bad boys. Yes, I was that girl you blame for always coming in last. I guess I dated bad boys because, somehow, I liked their unavailability, sexy sideways glances, and late-night calls. I fed off the chase and mystery they provided me. I saw them as a challenge that I always happily accepted. Let me tell you, I've dated so many jerks throughout the years. A lot of times, I ended up being disappointed with how it ended with them, and wondered why I always had such blind optimism about these guys I clearly knew were jerks to begin with. But to be honest, I don't regret any of it now.

You dated men you knew were unavailable, and the juxtaposition of "sexy" and "late night calls" strongly suggests you were a booty call for a whole bunch of them. You fed off the fact that they made you feel desirable – they chased you. Your word for these men is "jerks." A lot of times you ended up disappointed? A lot of times? You're kidding, right?

Let's stop for a second here, Isabel, and think about what makes these guys "jerks." They function to pander to your inflated sense of sexual worth, respond exactly as if your sole value lies in providing sexual services, you prefer them over decent men who are clearly around and yet somehow it's the guys who are "jerks?"

You claim to have repeatedly experienced "blind optimism" about these men, but what exactly were you optimistic about? You deliberately chose men who viewed you strictly in terms of late night booty calls, and you were hoping that would proceed to what? Marriage? A long term relationship? That you would turn your Bad Boy into a Nice Guy? Be his saviour? His Florence Nightengale? Why not just pick one of the Nice Guys in the first place?

Because then it wouldn't be all about you?

Just a theory.

I learned a lot from each and every one of those bad boys. I learned something from every un-answered text, from every "I'm just not looking for a relationship" talk, and from every lame excuse as to why he just couldn't make to my house party until after 1 am. I guess I never let the jerks get to me. I realized it was never me; it was always them. I was born with an abundance of self-confidence. Maybe that's why I was never too bothered by each guy who was a jerk to me. Maybe it was because I was smart enough to realize I never actually wanted to end up with a jerk. It was always you I wanted, Nice Guy.

Eight sentences, ten uses of "I." Hmmm. Looks like my theory might be on to something. Oh, but good for you, realizing those jerks were the perfect receptacles for your decisions and your responsibility. Hey, it couldn't possibly be you that was the problem, right? Nope, nopity, nope, nope. It was always them.

If you have so much self-confidence, honey, then why do you need to be continuously reassured of the fact that you are an object of desire? I think you are confusing self-confident with narcissistic. I'm glad you weren't bothered by each guy who was a jerk to you (and just how many are we talking about anyways?). I wonder when it will occur to you that those jerks gave you exactly what you wanted from them. When someone gives you what you ask for, how is that being a jerk?

With all that being said, I'm ready to date a Nice Guy.

Good for you. Why would a Nice Guy want to date you? What do you have to offer now that you've ridden every bad boy in town?

I've learned all the lessons I need to learn from bad boys. I now have the ability to distinguish between when to give up on a relationship and when to fight harder.

Uh, and how did you learn this, when all the bad boys rejected you as serious girlfriend material?

*I know all the excuses and lies and can see when it's right to say a big 'f*ck you' or an 'okay, I'll let you make it up to me.'*

I'll let you make it up to me?

Oh honey, you are a peach!

[image]

I know what it's like get all dressed up for a night out only to sit in your room watching Netflix, crying and staring at your phone because the person you had plans with never showed.

Is this the abundance of self-confidence you were talking about earlier? Because that is just what self-confident girls do – cry and stare at their phones.

And that a "got too drunk sorry" text is not a sufficient excuse or apology.

But why would such a text surprise you? You've chosen men who have an extremely limited view of your value, which you have explicitly encouraged by responding to the idea of being "chased." You want "mystery" – I think the mystery here is that you are shocked that sometimes men prefer cold beer over the stand-by pump and dump. Yeah, that's a blow to the ego, ain't it?

I know all these things. My mom always said that the problem with people who end up unhappy is that they don't know how to walk away from something that has already served its purpose.

Charming. They've gone from bad boys to jerks to things. I think your Mom is wrong, by the way. People end up unhappy because they do not understand a fundamental truth about human beings: we are happiest when we make others happy. Of course, your Mom trashed her marriage when you were just kids and then remarried and now you live in a giant jumble of stepmoms and stepdads and stepkids and halfbrothers and assorted relatives that come and go along with the divorce decrees. Not surprising you would see others as simple tools to learn you something new.

Well, I can see now that bad boys have served all the purpose they possibly could in my life and that it's time for me to learn a new lesson. I want to learn from you, Nice Guy.

That's nice. You want to learn. What exactly? And what do you have to offer in exchange for this new learning you're gonna acquire from Nice Guy? And what happens when you're done learning? Is the Nice Guy just another thing for you to discard?

Why in the hell would any man sign up for that?

It's time for me to learn what its like to have someone to fall back on when I feel weak.

Do you know how to offer that same strength in return? If your happiness has to do with discarding whatever has served its purpose, why should any Nice Guy trust that you are going to be there for him when the time comes?

It's time for me to understand what its like to open up to someone without the fear that I'll be emotionally shamed or that it will scare them away.

Do you know how to offer the same support in return? Again, if your happiness is a revolving set of men who serve a purpose and then get tossed to the curb, why should any Nice Guy believe you will never emotionally shame him or run away?

It's time for me to understand why people write love songs or tear up at the end of the notebook. I want to know what it's like to be desired for more than my body, for someone to look at me with passionate eyes, slowly but surely falling in love with my mind, body and soul.

Aaaaand here we have it. The unvarnished truth. You want to be desired now for *more*than just your body. That's not enough. You now want to be desired body, mind and soul. You are the star of the whole universe! Every atom of you is precious! You're the specialest snowflake that ever snowflaked!

Ugh. Seriously? That's what you think distinguishes bad boys from Nice Guys? Bad boys chase your body, Nice Guys chase the whole package?

Here's the thing about adult relationships, Isabel. No one chases anyone else. Mature relationships are not about you feeling your special feelings. They are about giving.

I'll let you process that for a moment.

Your Nice Guy will give to you, absolutely. That's what makes him a Nice Guy. But you are sadly mistaken if you think you just get to take, take, take until Nice Guy has served his purpose.

I want to know what it's like to have someone who will always show up, who will always make time for me and who will always respect me. I want to know what it's like to be able to count on someone, and know that even though love is never safe, I will be safely hurt by them. Mostly, I know I can learn all these things from you, Nice Guy.

And what will you offer in exchange? Can you be counted on? Can you be trusted never to hurt him? Will you always make time and always be respectful? There is nothing in your letter, Isabel, that suggests you have the faintest inkling that there might be some requirements on your part to interest a Nice Guy.

I don't want anyone thinking I hate bad boys. I don't hate them; I'm just done with them. I have to thank bad boys for a lot actually. Bad boys have taught me how to depend on myself. How to pick up my broken pieces. They've allowed me to secure the perfect break-up remedy. Booze, friends, rebounds, cry, workout, acceptance, find new bad boy, repeat.

You're done with them. Discarded. Tossed aside. Ready for the next victim. Gosh, prepare for men to line up around the block for the chance to be your next casualty. And it sounds like there have been rather a number of causalities in the past. Always a charming quality in any woman.

I understand myself so much better because of these bad boys. I know what I'm like at my worst. But I'm ready to know what I'm like at my best.

Well, kudos to you for admitting you have no clue what you look like "at your best." Sadly, Isabel, you also have no clue what you at your best is supposed to look like. You just want that Nice Guy to throw caution to the wind and hope that your "best" turns out to be a decent human being? That's rather a lot to ask.

I promise you this, Nice Guy: I don't know you yet, but I will be a nice girl to you in return. I will show you what you're like at you're best. I will treat you with the respect you deserve and will always answer your call when you need me. I will show you what all those bitchy girls couldn't.

Yep, we're back to Square One: you're gonna show that Nice Guy what he's like at his best. You're gonna save him! Here's the thing, cupcake, Nice Guys spend most of their lives "at their best." That's what makes them Nice Guys. He doesn't need you to show him jack shit. He doesn't need you to save him from those bitchy girls (and recall that you were one of those bitchy girls).

He doesn't need you for anything at all.

If you want a Nice Guy, you will have to make him want you. He doesn't need you and never will. But if you want to be wanted, you'll need to cultivate some qualities that will make his already nice life better. Here's a short list:

Loyalty

Steadfastness

Good humour

Generosity

Intelligence

Selflessness

You see, Isabel, Nice Guys have those qualities in abundance. But why should they give them away? Those are qualities that, when reciprocated, create beautiful, long-lasting relationships in which both partners are happier and more content than they were before the relationship.

So, I guess all there is left to say is… I'm ready whenever you are.

Don't hold your breath.

Lots of love,

JB

Substantive Equality, a golf handicap in the law

John Hembling (JtO) · 22 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What do you call the opposite of justice? Many people would say the answer is injustice. However, what if you subscribed to a particular ideal which had goals that when attained would advantage you but would be sharply destructive to just about everyone else – and to achieve these goals, you needed widespread public adoption of your goals as if they were something positive for everyone.

It wouldn't be effective to speak about such destructive intentions in plain language. It would make more sense in such a case to use a different word than injustice to describe what was the opposite of justice. In fact, if the social standing of individuals, or their social demographic could be used to selectively suppress their basic freedoms, such as freedom to speak – and for individuals of another social demographic to have their demands elevated above anyone else – you'd need some pretty manipulative rhetoric to accomplish this.

How about altering the term justice, by placing a positive sounding adjective in front of it. Like social justice. It's a pretty neat trick, and it convinces nearly everyone who hears it that selectively suppressing or elevating people's fundamental human freedoms based on which demographic they belong to is a good, positive practice, and convincing them it's not the practice of what not so long ago, we would have called apartheid.

But what about another positive sounding word? We'll start this time with equality. We're talking about the legal concept where any two people are equal before, and under the law. If an individual wants to exercise their right to free expression – or of association, or if they commit a violent act. It wont matter what demographic you're from, whether you're white, or black, or heterosexual or homosexual, or religious, or nonreligious, or male or female. In a society practicing legal equality – the skin colour or the sex or the sexual preference of an individual should not matter.

But what if you belonged to a particular demographic and you wanted to be given an unequal advantages based on membership in your personal social class?

You might start with a popular piece of modern mythology, like the phrase "rule of thumb." That phrase originated in the middle ages when modern standardized tape measures and rulers did not exist. So, tailors, builders and other craftsmen would use a part of their own body as a measuring device. The first segment of most men's thumbs are about one inch long, and this became a standard way of measuring materials such as cloth, wood, rope and so on.

However, the phrase rule of thumb, because it was so widely used was soon applied as a shorthand reference to general guidelines in all manner of human endeavour. As a rule of thumb, most personal digital devices are USB compatible, and as a rule of thumb, I water my houseplants about every week or so. The original literalist meaning of the phrase, in which an inch is measured using the the thumb as a ruler is mostly forgotten.

Writing from a particular ideology of gender attributes a different origin to the phrase rule of thumb.

It is claimed: "the phrase rule of thumb is inherited from the notion that men were entitled to beat their wives with sticks as long as they were no thicker than the man's thumb".

If this were true, it would reflect an accepted character of brutal malevolence towards women by men through much of human history. It would indicate a naturally existing sociopathy of an entire sexual class. A class of monsters.

It might even provide a modern justification to allow the killing of members of such a caste of brutal subhumans by members of the caste those thumb-thickness bludgeoning victims.

It could certainly set the tone of a historical narrative, used to justify the practice of gross inequality – in the present – at least for those who don't think for themselves.

Even if history showed a mountain of female corpses balancing the millions of men killed in wars, and in industry through the ages – even if the phrase rule of thumb had a practice of brutality by one sex against the other as it's origin, which it doesn't, unless you count the brutality of that narrative against men, it would remain utterly immoral to transfer culpability for wrongdoing by an individual in the past long dead, onto an individual in the present who had no part in that claimed wrongdoing.

I phoned the west coast offices of LEAF, the women's legal education and action fund, and referring to the phrase used on their website "substantive equality" I asked Cassie Arnold, their Education Manager of what the word "substantive" changed about the meaning of the word "equality".

This was her reply:

"um well, it's the basically it's the kind of equality that Canada has signed on to. And what it means is, like, a formal definition of equality would mean that everybody gets the same thing. Substantive equality has to take into account um historic patterns of discrimination, and seek to allow the law to benefit everybody equally. So it doesn't necessarily mean everybody is going to get the same thing"

So, to ensure that I had understood her correctly, I compared "substantive equality" to a legal golf handicap.

"so it's sort of like applying quotas or a handicap to certain groups, sort of like, it's a legal golf handicap is what it is"

She said:

"In a sense, yeah, you could call it that."

Your grandfather, or maybe even your father committed a crime. He's not around anymore – but we're all outraged at that historical misdeed. You, who weren't there at the time, and didn't even exist when this misdeed was committed – you're going to get in the barrel and take a beating for it. Your son, who hasn't been born yet, we're going to put him in the barrel and make him pay as well. Oh yeah, the crime? Rule of thumb, didn't actually happen, but that's okay, it makes for good outrage, so we'll just keep repeating it until it's simply accepted as common knowledge.

And we're going to call this whole scheme "Substantive Equality". It's like a golf handicap, applied in law, based on the demographic from which you come.

A bachelor tax – not so unlikely

Lucian Vâlsan · 22 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There is a lot of discussion, particularly in MGTOW circles, but also in the wider MRM, about the likelihood that the State could introduce a bachelor tax in case too many men decide to go full MGTOW and opt out of family life. Whenever this topic is brought up, many think that an outright bachelor tax is unlikely given that it hasn't happened for quite some time now… or so you might think. Of course, it depends on how one defines "quite some time" but a European country had such a tax that was abolished in the last days of 1989.

Now, a form of "bachelor tax" is existent today in many countries in the form of tax credits or deductions awarded to those who are married or who have children in their care. But Communist Romania went one step further and levied a tax on all the individuals who were still childless by the age of 25.

Context

Under Nicolae Ceaușescu, the Romanian Communist Party decided to increase the birthrate in the country – being dissatisfied with how the population recovered numerically following the World War II.

The first measure came in 1966 when Romania shifted from a country with some of the most liberal legislation with respect to contraception and abortion, to a country closer to a theocracy.

The decree number 770/1966 banned abortion almost entirely except for rape and incest victims, those whose pregnancy threatened their lives, those who already had 4 children, those who were over the age of 45 and those who were at a high risk of transmitting serious genetic diseases to the child.[1] The decree also specified that in those cases where abortion should be allowed, that decision ought to be taken by a special commission on case-by-case basis.

This decree led to a spectacular increase in birthrates in the next few years, but then it started falling again – mainly because the population started to find workarounds but also due to back alley abortions.

The second measure occurred in late 1970s when already scarce contraceptives started to slowly disappear from socialist commerce. The contraceptives were never outright banned but by the early 1980s huge areas of the country were de facto contraceptive-free (especially the towns and villages). The only way you could get contraceptives was from the black market (and only in the big cities) or, in some rare occasions, through special allowance from a regulated drug store (but it would take at least 2 months just to get 10 condoms or a 30 day supply of oral contraceptives for women).

The de facto ban on contraceptives also produced minor increases in birthrates and then more drops. Therefore, in 1980 Decree 770 was amended and restricted abortion even further to only those who had 5 children in their care.

It should also be noted that in 1981, the Communist regime decided to pay the entire national debt (which it did by May 1, 1989) which led to a draconian ration program on everything – and that means literally everything, including the most basic goods such as butter, oil, bread, potatoes, electric energy – you name it.

The celibacy tax

In this context, of absurd desire of the supreme leader to increase birthrates and to pay off national debt by quite literally starving the population gave birth to the so-called celibacy tax of 1986.[2]

The celibacy tax was not per se a tax on those who were celibate – but a tax on the individuals who were still childless by the time they were 25. The goal of the State was to increase the population (in order to have more workers available to build the Communist dream – even though it was already a nightmare of North Korean proportions). Consequently, getting married was not enough. Getting married was recommended because you could request a bigger apartment from the Party (virtually all apartments and most of the houses were owned by the State) but in order to avoid the celibacy tax, one had to have at least one child.

The cost of the tax varied between 150 and 350 lei[3] per month and it was levied from one's salary using the model of social security taxes widely used today virtually everywhere in Europe. In other words, you could not avoid paying it since the money was deducted from the salary in advance.

At an exchange rate of 12 lei to the dollar, the maximum tax was 30 1986 dollars – which is roughly $63 in today's money.[4] That may not seem a lot until you take into consideration that salaries rarely exceeded $250 per month (a minister had a salary of 3060 lei/month – which is 255 1986 dollars) – it's more than clear that the celibacy tax was a serious burden representing 12-13% of salary on top of already existant taxes — no small amount given the collectivist nature of that regime.

In theory, the tax applied to both men and women (regardless of their marital status) but in practicality, the tax was paid overwhelmingly by men. This is also clear due to the fact that everyone – men and women – referred to this tax in the common lexicon as taxa pe sulă (literally the tax on the dick).

The reasons for this had a lot to do with biology and with inherent gynocentrism. A woman could get a certificate of infertility fairly easy (even if she was fertile) and that certificate would exempt her from being subjected to this tax. Like in all communist countries, the doctors were State functionaries and were as corrupt as any other functionary in that era so for a few hundred lei or for a few packs of Kent (that cigarette brand was a common currency for many bribes) a doctor would write almost anything you needed on a certificate, as long as it was likely to be true. And given the poor state of the general health following the draconic rationalization plan implemented in 1981, it was quite likely for a woman to be infertile for a certain period of time. Also, due to gynocentrism, a doctor was more likely to accept to lie in a certificate when a woman requested it than when a man did the same.

The tax was levied independent of marital status. Fertile men married to infertile women would routinely be subjected to the celibacy tax. Divorce was, in theory, an option, but there were disincentives for divorce – like the danger of being relegated to a lower paid job for no longer being "morally reliable".[5]

For some people (mainly men) this tax was just the tip of the iceberg because the official propaganda pandering to the pre-existent gynocentrism fed in to a system of peer-pressure on the childless, a pressure even worse in some ways than the tax. Ana Pop, former employee in a Chemical Plant in Baia Mare during that time said[6]:

> The worst part was that there was a sort of shame induced on those who were childless. It was a genuine psychological drama which affected those individuals more than the material taxation.

Again, there only a minority of women were subjected to this tax. The most famous woman who was subjected to this was Olympic gymnast Nadia Comăneci,[7] who turned 25 just when the tax was introduced in 1986. Some speculated that she was specifically required to pay (despite the common practice of exempting sportsmen and sportswomen from some of the ridiculous laws) as a punishment for her attempt to defect in 1981[8], though Comăneci only mentions increased monitoring upon her return in 1981[9]. No mention of increased taxation as punishment.

Forgetting

As is the case with many tragedies that happened during the Communist era, the culture nowadays is experiencing a willful period of forgetting; a serious concern given that those who forget their history are bound to repeat it.

Many of the people who have been subjected to this tax, or had people in their families who were, are unwilling to talk about it and would rather just simply to forget everything. There are very few articles in the press talking about it – despite the fact that everyone in Romania over the age of 30 knows it existed or knows someone who was subjected to it.

Although there are still people around who have known men who eventually committed suicide because they couldn't "man up" and fulfill their duty to the Party and have children, nobody wishes to study this. There are a few dozens of studies about how communism impacted women in Romania – but no study whatsoever about, for instance, how many men committed suicide as a direct result of communist family policies.

It is often claimed that communism affected women more due to the harsh restrictions on abortions which lead to the death of a few thousands of women from back alley abortions. That's true. The harsh enforcement of the Decree 770 led to a lot of deaths and even more imprisonments of both women (for attempting to have an abortion) and men (for trying to help) – but in the same time, virtually 100% of political prisoners who were tortured and killed were men. And the memory of that tragedy is also fading away.

In 1946, the average life expectancy at birth for men in Romania was slightly over 65 years and for women it was 72. In 1989, the life expectancy for men was 65 (lower than in 1946) and for women it was slightly over 74.[10] Yet somehow this fact also goes unmentioned – just like the celibacy tax. But that's a story for another day…

References:

[1] http://www.legex.ro/Decretul-770-1966-363.aspx – Decree no.770 Issued by the State Council of the Socialist Republic of Romania. Published in the Official State Bulletin no.60/October 1st, 1966 (full text – in Romanian)

[2] http://jurnalul.ro/scinteia/special/celula-de-baza-a-societatii-oficial-indivizibila-319713.html – Celula de bază a societății – oficial indivizibilă, published in Jurnalul Național, March 13, 2009

[3] http://www.glasul.ro/view_article_numar.php?show=26054&name=Celibatul_si_lipsa_copiilor_taxate_aspru_in_comunism&numar=2010-12-15 – Ionuț Horoba – Celibatul şi lipsa copiilor – taxate aspru în comunism (Celibacy and the lack of children – harshly taxed under communism), published in Glaslul Maramureșului, December 14, 2010.

[4] http://www.westegg.com/inflation/infl.cgi – Inflation calculator: What cost $30 in 1986 would cost $62.76 in 2013.

[5] ibidem 2

[6] ibidem 3

[7] http://www.historia.ro/exclusiv_web/general/articol/iubirile-nadiei-epoca-aur – Marian Burlacu – Iubirile Nadiei în Epoca de Aur, published in Historia

[8] Ryan, Joan – Little Girls in Pretty Boxes – 1995, Doubleday, p. 201

[9] Comăneci, Nadia – Letters to a Young Gymnast – 2004, Basic Books. p. 121

[10] http://ije.oxfordjournals.org/content/early/2011/03/16/ije.dyr061/F1.expansion.html

Here come the lawyers to AVFM, yet again

Paul Elam · 23 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial Update: See here for more on the story.–DE

Editorial Update 2: See also how The Raw Story is serving you a half-cooked story. -DE*

Does a wife who may have driven a husband to suicide with the assistance of our corrupt family court system, then have a legal right to claim copyright — of his suicide note?

According to attorney Rachelle E. Hill, of Bean, Kinney and Korman, and a judge, that is precisely the claim. Their lawyer has written the offices of A Voice for Men to demand that we remove a post from the forums containing the note.

It is not going to happen.

The text of the note was posted to our forums months ago. We considered doing a feature story on it at the time, but opted not to because we had no credible corroboration that the story was factual.

Attorney Hill, her law firm, and the suicide victim's former wife have now resolved that matter to our satisfaction. The demand letter itself is sufficient for us to believe that the following note is genuine.*

> The love that my daughter and I shared was truly special. She is a such a sweet, kind and gentle spirit. I am so sorry that I will not be there to see her grow into a beautiful woman. It absolutely crushed me to not be in her life over the last three years. I worked very hard as a father to build her confidence and self-esteem. She is smart, funny and considerate, but she didn't know it yet. I pray that she realizes her strengths and her confidence in herself will continue to grow. I love you dearly, [name redacted].
>
> My son [name redacted] was just entering Kindergarten, when I lost access to him. He is gregarious, outgoing and a great athlete. He is smart and fearless. He could have just as much fun by himself as he could with other kids. Even the older boys in our neighbourhood wanted to play with [name redacted]. It absolutely breaks my heart that I will not be able to help him grow into a man. I love you to, [name redacted]. I miss you both so much.
>
> My identity was taken from me, as result of this process. When it began, I was a commercial real estate broker with CB Richard Ellis. I lived by the Golden rule and made a living by bringing parties together and finding the common ground. My reputation as a broker was built on my honesty and integrity. When it ended, I was broke, homeless, unemployed and had no visitation with my own children.
>
> I had no confidence and was paralyzed with fear that I would be going to jail whenever my ex-wife wanted. Nothing I could say or do would stop it. This is what being to death or 'targeted' by a psychopath looks like. This is the outcome. I didn't somehow change into a 'high-conflict' person or lose my ability to steer clear of the law. I've had never been arrested, depressed, homeless or suicidal before this process. The stress and pressure applied to me was deliberate and nothing I could do or say would get me any relief. Nothing I or my attorneys said to my ex-wife's attorney or to the Court made any difference. Truth, facts, evidence or even the best interest of my children had no affect on the outcome.
>
> The family court system is broken, but from my experience, it is not the laws, its the lawyers. They feed off of the conflict. They are not hired to reduce conflict or protect the best interest of children, which is why third parties need to be involved. It should be mandatory for children to have a guardian ad litem, with extensive training in abuse and aggression.
>
> It is absolutely shameful that the Fairfax County Court did nothing to intervene or understand the ongoing conflict. Judge Randy Bellows also used the Children as punishment, by withholding access for failing to fax a receipt. The entire conflict centered around the denial of access to the children, it was inconceivable to > me that he would use children like this. This is exactly what my ex-wife was doing and now Judge Bellows was doing it for her.

>
> To all my family, friends and the people that supported me through this process, I am so sorry. I know my reactions and behavior throughout this process did not always make sense. None of this made sense to me either. I had no help and the only suggestion I got from my attorneys was to remain silent.
>
> At first, I did what I was told, remained silent and listened to my attorneys. Then after I had given my ex-wife full custody to try and appease her, I learned about Psychopathy and emailed Dr. Samenow about my concerns and asked him for help. Of course, I was ignored. As the conflict continued, I was forced to defend myself. When that didn't work, I thought I could get the help I needed by speaking out. There is no right or wrong way to defend yourself from abuse. Naively, I thought that abuse was abuse and it would be recognized and something would be done. I thought speaking out would end the abuse or at least get them to back off. It didn't. When no one did anything they were emboldened.
>
> I took my own life because I had come to the conclusion that there was nothing I could do or say to end the abuse. Every time I got up off my knees, I would get knocked back down. They were not going to let me be the father I wanted to be to my children. People may think I am a coward for giving up on my children, but I didn't see how I was going to heal from this. I have no money for an attorney, therapy or medication. I have lost four jobs because of this process. I was going to be at their mercy for the rest of my life and they had shown me none.
>
> Being alienated, legally abused, emotionally abused, isolated and financially ruined are all a recipe for suicide. I wish I were stronger to keep going, but the emotional pain and fear of going to court and jail [because of exorbitant child support] became overwhelming. I became paralyzed with fear. I couldn't flee and I could not fight. I was never going to be allowed to heal or recover. I wish I were better at articulating the psychological and emotional trauma I experienced.
>
> I could fill a book with all the lies and mysterious rulings of the Court. Never have I experienced this kind of pain. I asked for help, but good men did nothing and evil prevailed. All I wanted was a Guardian Ad Litem for my children. Any third party would have been easily been able to confirm or refute all of my allegations, which is why none was ever appointed to protect the children or reduce the conflict.
>
> Abuse is about power and control. Stand up for the abused and speak out. If someone speaks out about abuse, believe them.
>
> Please teach my children empathy and about emotional invalidation and 'gas-lighting' or they may end up like me.
>
> God have mercy on my soul.
>
> Chris Mackney

This link will give you a copy of demand letter, which like the suicide note, has the children's names redacted.

Letter.

Within that document we note that an Arlington County, Virginia judge has ruled that Dina Mackney, the widow of this suicide victim, is authorized to seek reasonable legal remedies to force a large number of websites, where this information has already been made available, to remove the information in question.

We reject the notion that our publication is in violation of copyright laws, and that the suicide note is not covered by fair use statutes.

We also believe, given the horrific state of our family courts, it is in the compelling public interest that his final words be published and disseminated as robustly as possible.

The chief responsibility of A Voice for Men is advocacy for men who have been trampled in precisely the ways outlined in this tragic note, and to do whatever is within our means to address the disproportionate suicide rate in men, especially as it relates to high conflict divorces.

If what Mr. Mackney said in his final note is true, and we have no reason to believe that what amounts to his dying words are less than that, then what this threatened legal action represents is an attempt by his former wife to chase him down – even into the grave – to issue the final and complete edict for his silence in the face of horrendous abuse.

It is an act which will also probably eliminate any chance those children ever have to know how their father felt and what he was thinking before taking his own life.

I will gladly take residence in my own grave before I comply with that kind of agenda.

- Addendum – the suicide note provided here is not complete. The complete version of the letter is available here:

http://www.brainsyntax.com/Portal/Material/1/Lasttestamentofalovingfatherabusedbythefamilycourtsystem.pdf

Fear and Loathing in Kingston, Ontario: Confronting Lies at Queen's University

Paul Elam · 23 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Okay – straight off the bat I want to do some housekeeping. I immediately apologize to fans of the late Doctor Hunter S. Thompson, but I'm going to stick with this title and motif because it's extremely appropriate, for reasons that will make sense later.

Second – since I went to Kingston on April 8, 2014 more as an activist than as a journalist, my objectivity is all shot to shit; so, with that in mind, I'm going to do something that I don't normally do here at A Voice for Men (AVfM) – I'm going to write this in the first person, completely from the hip and from my perspective.

I'm not trying to give an unbiased account but I am going to give an honest account. In fact, I've tried writing this piece a couple of times already and have found the process extremely frustrating. It's been frustrating because I'm very aware of the fact that I wasn't at Kingston to report the story – I became part of the story, and, as such, have to be very careful about what I write.

It's a long time since I studied journalism, and studying journalism now is a lot different to what I learned. When I was in college, the internet wasn't the place it is today. Citizen journalism, blogging, social media, and the benefits of the democratization of information that we now enjoy, were still developing.

Back then, we had the Quick Chat Café and terrible internet sites. There was no Wikipedia – no YouTube – and newspapermen were curiously poking around the internet, wondering how it worked and in many instances treating it with suspicion and scorn. Hacks made predictions about the imminent death of the newspaper industry, and indeed their own, impending obsolescence. The internet was a new frontier and there were many changes.

Having said that, some things haven't changed. If you're a journalism student these days, there are timeless rules and knowledge of which you ought to be aware. You still need to know the law as it pertains to your profession – you need to understand what constitutes libel, slander – and the difference between the two. You need to know how to construct a sentence, how to proofread and copy-edit. There are still prickly, pedantic lecturers who explode into Old Testament paroxysms of lunatic rage when they see a greengrocer's apostrophe, a dangling modifier, or some other grammatical faux pas. You need to know how to ask questions and how to do solid research. And, for a lot of people, you have to practice picking up the bloody phone and talking to other human beings – this last skill is one that is deteriorating rapidly, in my opinion, as we seem to increasingly rely on text-based communication platforms.

You also need to know about ethics and objectivity. Of course, when we look back at the recent history of journalism we see resistance, albeit sporadically, to traditional ideas of objectivity and to the journalist's role. In most instances, the rule is that a journalist has to recognize the line between reporting the story, and being in the story. If you can't see that line – or if you can and just don't give a damn, then you probably need to find a different profession. Unless you're Hunter S. Thompson.

And you're not him.

And neither am I, for that matter – which is why I began this piece with an apologia.

The problem I face is that as both an activist and a journalist I often find myself in situations where I have to make a decision between acting, and reporting; if I act, then I don't get to report because if I do, I jeopardize my perceived objectivity. When we held the rally at Queen's Park last year, I helped Attila Vinczer a little with the preparations for the event. I made some posters and attended a meeting here and there. But, when it came to the actual event itself, I stood back. I knew I was going to write about that event so I did what I could to maintain distance. It's not always easy. Activism is based on volunteerism. Dedicated volunteers are often difficult to find and so the effect is that the greater burden falls on the few, while the many, busy with the realities of life such as employment, family, health, etc. help how and when they can. It is easy, therefore, to be pulled in a bunch of different directions and to find oneself in situations that can be tricky to navigate.

This happened to me just recently.

The news of Danielle d'Entremont's alleged attack in Kingston caused a lot of consternation within the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM.) The reporting of the incident was, to say the least, embarrassing and slapdash. Vincent Ben Mattak of The Queen's Journal wrote a deliberately inflammatory and deceptive article in which he parroted d'Entremont's baseless insinuations levelled against the Queen's Men's Issues Awareness group. That story, like d'Entremont's version of events, stank. Yet, a number of media outlets ran with it; it was a predictable, if not depressing development. d'Entremont's account simply doesn't hold up to any degree of scrutiny and as that scrutiny increased, she has sought to remove herself from the controversy. That didn't stop those opposed to the MHRM, however, from using the alleged assault as political currency. As soon as d'Entremont posted her "no makeup selfie" replete with facial swelling and a chipped tooth, feminists went on the offensive, spewing forth the usual, by-now boring canards regarding men's groups.

While this was going on, I was working away in the background, trying to find a way to figure out what happened. I wasn't too interested in the comment sections except as a potential source of information. I'll state right now that I remain highly skeptical of d'Entremont's attack claims and I flat out reject the idea that an MHRA was responsible. I can say this with confidence because I've never seen MHRAs physically attack their opponents. Ever. In any case, I was busy beavering away and racking my brain when the Mercier situation exploded. Mercier's comments, even for a feminist, were amazingly repugnant. I'm delighted that Alison Tieman was on hand to bring them into focus in the way she did. Of course, this meant that focus was also put on Mercier; it was important to figure out what her deal was and what was motivating her bizarre remarks – other than what was obvious. When we looked at her, we realized that Friedman was coming to town and not only that, but Mercier was going to be on the panel; it was an opportunity that we couldn't miss, and, since it was in a matter of days, the chances of getting a large group together were small.

It was then that I made the decision to forgo the pen and paper and to use other tools.

We put the word out on Facebook in an attempt to get more activists at the scene; it was a risky strategy as we knew that by doing so we'd alert the fem-a-loons, but we went with it anyway.

The next day or two were spent organizing. We worked on the material we'd need, and figured out the logistics of getting people to Kingston. I picked up Suzanne McCarley from the airport the day before the rally and the next morning Danny Boy and Attila turned up at my place – fired up and ready to go.

It took four hours or so to get to Kingston. The mood in the car was amazing; everybody was joking, laughing, and drinking terrible coffee from Tim Horton's. There's something very, very special about getting together with other MHRAs. For those of you who, like me, are relatively new to the movement, the feeling of isolation can be unknowingly intense. Taking the "red pill" doesn't really put a stop to that; it just means that you see things for what they are and, in a horrible way, that can make things worse. If you don't have anybody to talk to, or to share ideas with, the world can seem like a very shitty place. Meeting with like-minded people is cathartic; for that moment of time sanity returns to the world, and that while there's a massive fucking fight ahead – you're going to take that fight because you're really not alone anymore. That's how it felt, driving to Kingston. The mood did shift a little as we arrived at our destination though. When we got to the campus the feeling was still high, but we did become a little quieter. "Am I the only one who feels nervous about this?" I asked. I don't recall receiving an answer one way or the other.

The first stop was to check the venue. We went in and had a snoop around. I found it somewhat ironic that a feminist lecture should take place in a building whose purpose is to further understanding about biosciences – although I kept that particular observation to myself. I was focused on finding the lecture hall as well as figuring out our plan of action. We quickly found our way into the lecture hall and left an Adele Mercier poster on the speaker's lectern. After that, we posed briefly for a photo in the lobby, then decided to get to work.

We broke into two teams – myself and Danny Boy and Suzanne and Attila. We didn't have a specific plan of attack as we didn't know the place too well. It was more of a case of "you go that way and we'll go that way," and that's exactly what we did. Danny and I, from what I can remember, headed west.

We were careful to make sure that everything we hit was legal; we made sure not to poster mailboxes or anything stupid like that, but made a point of hitting anything especially visible. A few people stopped to check out the posters and we talked to everyone who showed interest, explaining what we were doing, why we were doing it – and giving a very general account of the issues. Most got it – some didn't. It was quite the experience to go on a poster run with Danny. Nonchalance is not an adequate enough word to describe the "I do not give a fuck" attitude that he displays when working. I guess that comes from having not only a firm belief in what you're doing – but also the experience. Danny's been at it a long time, and it shows in his willingness to clamber up lampposts to hang posters or in his amazing ability to engage with people that he meets.

While we were doing all of this we were also in contact with AVfM and the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE.) I spoke with a representative of CAFE who told me that Mercier had been pulled from the event. I wasn't surprised – I'd made such a prediction to the group when we were on our way to Kingston. We were doing something that hadn't been done before – an MHRA group was going on the offensive for once; we were raising our voices in opposition to something that was reprehensible, disgusting, and that would undeniably cause a male lecturer to lose his job. Mercier and her ilk have enjoyed the luxury of being able to spout their hatred in cloistered university environments – deluding themselves into thinking that they're speaking out against something. As soon as opposition came her way however, she ran, like the pathetic coward that she is.

We stayed out for about an hour then made our way back to the venue. The lobby, which was earlier inhabited by groups of uninterested but busy students, now had a number of people present. Steve Brule was there with his camera gear. Organizers for the event were there too and it was patently evident from their body language that they weren't happy with our presence.

The trouble started, I suppose, with Brule. While not an MHRA or a member of any MHRA organization, security immediately singled him out and told him that he wasn't going to be allowed into the venue. We later learned that organizers of the event were communicating through Facebook and it was here that the decision to remove Brule was made. To his credit, Steve remained perfectly calm and reasoned in the face of obvious bullying and intimidation; he stood his ground.

While this was going on Danny decided to go outside to hand out flyers where he met a group of feminist thugs who had brought along an attack dog. Danny asked them what they were doing and without a hint of irony they replied "we're here to make sure no one gets hurt." Of course, Danny being Danny, he immediately undercut their effectiveness by petting their dog. They may as well have brought a fucking poodle for what good it did.

Security didn't seem too bothered about this – or too bothered about the group of thugs inside the venue who were at this point milling about and attempting to stare us down.

By now the atmosphere was becoming quite unpleasant; if I include Steve Brule in our numbers – we were a massive, fear-inducing six people all in, to the two hundred or so slated to see Friedman, who arrived surrounded by a phalanx of security guards and a couple of flunkies.

[image]
Danny doing his bit at Queen's

I was worried about Danny so I called him inside. Meanwhile, Brule was still making his points with security and Attila Vinczer had joined in to see how he could help. At this point, I was sitting away from the action; I was organizing our literature and keeping an eye on what was going on. I decided to take a photo of the group discussion with security and when I did, something rather bizarre happened. As I lined up my camera, I noticed two people move at pace directly into my shot. When they got between the group and me, they raised their hands to their faces – and then proceeded to hang posters around the lobby with "no photography allowed" written on them. I was a little puzzled by this at first but it didn't take me long to figure out what they were doing: they were putting on a show – demonstrating to security that they were "justified" in hanging their posters and justified in refusing entry to Steve Brule. They weren't bothered by the many students who were taking photos and video with their camera phones though…

After some more nonsense with security we decided to go inside – leaving Steve and his assistant behind. The lecture was about to begin and it was important that we got people in to explain why we were there, and what we were speaking out against. Mercier's absence didn't really change anything – if she hadn't got the courage to explain her words in public then we'd let those students know what we thought – and why they should care too.

Of course – we had to get past security first – who, at the behest of the fem-a-loons, had now decided to refuse entry to all of us, for no reason whatsoever. We immediately challenged this and demanded, politely, for an explanation for the refusal. After a lot more nonsense and argument they eventually decided to let us inside, provided that we didn't disrupt the event or take any photographs. I guess what they actually meant was that we shouldn't bring in noise makers; I guess they meant that we shouldn't bring bullhorns; I guess they meant that we shouldn't scream and shout like animals; I guess they meant that we shouldn't pull the fire alarm. We did none of those things, and, again, security did nothing while feminist goons continually attempted to intimidate us – now standing within earshot of our discussion.

The tension in the auditorium was palpable. Danny and I spotted Suzy and Attila and sat with them – as we walked down the steps we could feel the stares burning holes in the backs of our heads. This was hostile territory – no doubt. Sitting down was a relief, but it didn't take long before the heads in front of us turned around to catch a repulsed glance. While we didn't make it clear at the time – we found this amusing. The idea that a tiny group of MHRAs, there to protest rape apology and to insist upon an end to hypocritical double standards could be a threat to anybody was bizarre, laughable, and about to make complete sense.

All eyes were on us. It was going to be a long night.

[image]
Garbage cans aren't just for Oscar the Grouch
Shortly after we were seated two of the organizers introduced Friedman. The introduction, without any exaggeration on my behalf, without any attempt at hyperbole, was completely apeshit crazy – utterly insane. I mean waking up in the morning and eating raw chicken breast off the floor insane. Presumably referring to d'Entremont's alleged attack, the speaker for some reason actually began crying, and immediately set to work on whipping the audience into a paranoid terror – "as we were deciding whether or not to hold this event, we talked a lot about safety – and fear," she said, while sobbing. It was a theme that was constantly reinforced throughout the event. On two separate occasions women referred to their "fear" and began sobbing uncontrollably.

The next speaker began by saying "my silences have not protected me. Your silences will not protect you," and went on to reinforce the threat narrative by saying "in the past few weeks many of our friends and colleagues have been silenced by fear." She didn't mention why they were afraid. "We have stayed home, sat down, and passed the mic." She didn't say why they did this either but continued "tonight… is for those women who have been so terrified because they were taught to respect fear more than themselves." She also didn't say, funnily enough, who taught them to feel like that. Was it the six MHRAs present at the talk? Or was it something else? Was it the never-ending mantra of rape culture – teaching women to fear men whom they don't know, and even those they do in complete defiance of objective reality?

I'm betting yes.

Friedman's talk was entitled "What's feminism got to do with it?" and was ostensibly an attempt to "talk back" at Professor Janice Fiamengo's talk that was held at Queen's two weeks previously. Friedman's lecture didn't address any of Fiamengo's talking points. Instead, Friedman lectured those present on her canned version of sexual consent – and issued forth a laundry list of prescriptive edicts on how to engage sexually with the opposite sex. At one point she even encouraged women to engage in childish mind games to assess the personality of prospective partners.

However, like the opening speakers, it didn't take long for Friedman to talk about fear.

Friedman invited the audience to think about what a rapist looks like before putting up an image of a dark figure on the screen behind her. The figure appeared to lurch forward, held a knife and was, while humanoid, clearly not human. It had large, beaming white sockets for eyes and an evil grin literally from ear to ear. It was scary looking but Friedman insisted that while that is what people think about when thinking about rapists, it's not the reality. The reality was, yes, you've guessed it – a white guy. He was a good looking white guy with nice teeth, great hair, clean shaven and athletic. He carried a backpack, indicating his student status. This is what a rapist looks like – he's the nice guy who smiles at you from across the cafeteria and you should be very, very afraid. It was yet another cynical ploy intended not to inform, or to help – but to generate fear. It was particularly cynical because Friedman set up a false equivalency from the get-go; by invoking the image of the monster she gave an image of a rapist that nobody would actually agree with if they gave the matter any thought. The reason is because nobody actually believes in monsters – no functioning adults in any case. Adults realize that human beings rape – both men and women.

So, why the monster?

Friedman used the monster not to represent a rapist, but the fear of being raped. Rape is a horrible, personal attack and can be violent, hence the knife. Rape is an impersonal soulless act, hence the white eyes, indicating a lack of a soul, and is supposedly carried out in the shadows out of sight – and never spoken about – hence the dark figure. So, what Friedman was actually doing was subtly encouraging the audience to take their fears about an act that is extremely rare and is actually on the decrease, and to invest them in the average guy that they come across on campus.

Is it any wonder then, when this qualifies as rational discourse on a university campus, that there was such a reaction to our presence? Is it any wonder that people treated us with nothing less than loathing? Is it any wonder that they were 'afraid?'

Friedman's lecture was full of such false equivalencies and poor analogies (she at one point compared impaired driving to rape) and was constantly punctuated by her unbearably irritating laughter. Mercifully, she stopped talking and the Q&A began. We immediately raised our hands and were immediately ignored. Time after time we were passed by until one brave soul in the audience, clearly fed up with what was going on, pointed to Danny Boy, who had stood up to protest the deliberate stonewalling. "There are three gentlemen over there who've had their hands up from the beginning," she said, pointing to our little group. It was an amazing moment. Many people in the crowd applauded and just like that – the moral high ground was snatched from the organizers – just like that they were shamed, and not by us, but by their peers.

We asked a couple of questions and made some comments – I highly doubt that we had much, if any impact on the people in that auditorium. I doubt it because it's patently clear that for that cohort at least, the damage is done; they are simply beyond help. I can't remember how many times I shook my head, or raised my eyes heavenwards, or sighed, or said "Jesus Christ" or "for fuck's sake" under my breath that night. It was a lot – and I'm sure it was often enough in response to the whooping and hollering of the indoctrinated attendees – too far gone to realize what's happening – too far gone to realize that they're no longer just students; they're now cultists.

For the most part, these young men and women have been conned. They've been tricked into believing that their participation in feminism will somehow secure them space on the right side of history. Consequently, ethical and moral behaviour take a back seat to the immediacy of ideology – pulling a fire alarm is okay because MHRAs are violent. Walking into an academic lecture and screaming like animals, slamming desks and intimidating people is okay because we don't want any "hate speech" on campus. Making up lies about your opponents is okay because the end result is all that matters. Turning up with an attack dog to "keep people safe" is okay because we live in a rape culture.

After the lecture, we went to a pub. We were tired, but also somewhat exhilarated. We'd been to Queen's to face down a rape apologist – and she ran. We put her face all over that university and by the end of the lecture left the building firmly in the belief that we'd had a successful, if exhausting outing.

When we got to the bar one of the feminist goons from the lecture came in; as he walked past our table he looked at me. I looked up at him and offered him a nod and a smile – a genuine smile. I was no longer at Queen's – the lecture was over – the grief, the strife, was done as far as I was concerned. I was now sitting with friends, having a beer and a chat. I hoped that my acknowledging him and the scene that he encountered would give him a little pause for thought. Maybe he'd nod back, or smile – maybe – if only for a split-second, he'd notice our humanity.

He walked past with a scowl, and I went back to my beer.

Editorial note: AVfM and Men's Rights Canada continue to offer a $2,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and capture of Danielle D'Entremont's alleged attacker, and continues to challenge feminist groups and feminist apologists to match that offer. –DE

Update: Check out this recording made in a men's room at Queen's just before the lecture that "violent" Men's Human Rights Activists supposedly "disrupted."

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=KaQQcScmzCA]

US Marine: When a girl hits you

Joseph Kerr · 23 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: this is a republication of a piece we published last year. As a new piece of news, a friend has begun raising funds to help this battered dad. You can contribute here.–DE

What do you do when a girl hits you?

I was sitting across the desk from the child protective services supervisor, who spoke with confidence of things he didn't know.

"You've been to Iraq, we know all the guys who come back are fucked up in the head… If you need medication to stay focused or to see someone for mental issues — we know the military just sends you to war and spits you back out on the streets — we can help you with that."

That's one hell of a worm in the water. I had steady hands on my gear as the bullets were flying. My voice was confident when addressing senior leaders no matter the circumstance. Now I wore a nice-guy smile and kept cool as the guy who was going to decide if I was fit to see my daughter again belittled my Marine Corps career and used my stack of medals to weigh the scales against me to prove my psychosis.

My hands lay gently on the table; the identification tabs from jail and the hospital were stacked on my left wrist. I turned my head slightly. He'd have to continue to insult my manhood and military service into a baseball-sized lump enveloping my eye.

"What do you do when a girl hits you? … You wouldn't just stand there, right? I mean you're a big guy, you're a Marine, you're trained to fight, the Marines wouldn't teach you to get beat up…."

Clever.

Getting hit by a woman is a new kind of scary for me. I can face fear, I can fight scary, but I can't hit a woman. It's a prisoners' dilemma for the assaulted. The guy laughed at me when I said there's nothing to do except just turn away. I asked what he'd do if I were a woman and started hitting him in this private interview room. "I'd grab your arms and hold you back," he said. I countered, "that's going to be tough for you to explain why I'll have your handprints and bruises on my arms and there's not a scratch on you."

He made a final attempt to reduce me to a crazy-veteran archetype. One more question and I could relieve him of the work required in an actual investigation.

"So the police thought you were lying, right? That's why they arrested you. If they believed you they wouldn't arrest you."

Breathe. Think. Pause, not too long. The words have to sound calm. Breathe.

My marriage wasn't great. Heck, let's be straight, it was on the verge of collapse. Probably had been there for at least two years. I was staying for the kids. My wife and I fought (verbally) nearly every time we had more than a few sentences to say to each other. We were roommates with chidden running around. It was horrible, but each weekend I was home and I had my kids. My two awesome kids. I'd take them out as often I could and do anything I could so they didn't need to be in the middle of their mom and I.

Finally it was going to end. She wanted to move out of state with the kids and had no interest in discussing sharing custody. "We're not discussing it, you can't stop us from leaving. Sign it or I'll get a lawyer and make you sign it." She handed me a do-it-yourself version of divorce papers.

I reached out to some divorce lawyers. This life sucks for me, for the kids, for everyone. What do I do? "It's a game of chicken in your house now," the lawyer said. "Neither one of you can leave with the kids, and the first one who leaves without them is a step behind in trying to get custody."

Is there a worse possible way to resolve such a pending disaster?

Then the email confirmation — plane tickets, one adult, two children, one way, leaving soon. Tomorrow morning would be different, but sleeping on the couch was normal. I ended up on the ground next to the stairs. She kicked my head into the solid wood base. I blacked out, came to, stood up, bleeding. My daughter was screaming, "Stop hurting daddy!"

It was over. We were over. I headed out the door to the police and then the hospital. My daughter stopped me. "Daddy, you need to go to a doctor, here take this," she handed me a bandage. "I love you" was the last thing I said to her. It's been almost a month.

I walked into the police station falling apart. What happened? What will I do next? What happens on Monday? What happens for the rest of my life? How will I explain what just happened to my kids? My head was spinning as much from the injury as from the complete collapse of my home life. I knew the officer, I had came by the night before suspecting that my wife was leaving with the kids, he assumed why I was crying, "hey man, it's alright, you knew this was going to happen…."

I pulled off my sunglasses and revealed my bloody face. "Whoa, what the hell happened?"

I started piecing together what happened. The argument, her throwing the breakfast I was making for the kids on the ground, grabbing my laptop, the stairs, my kids, screaming. I pulled out the Band-Aid and broke down again.

"Is she hurt? Did you hit her…?" No. Never. I waited.

"We're sending a car over there to talk to her." I waited some more.

"You wife is telling a bit of a different story, as happens a lot in these situations, she says you threatened her.

"We're going to take you into custody now.

"Stand up and put your hands behind your back."

An hour later I was handcuffed to a hospital bed waiting for CAT scan results to know if my head was bleeding. I looked at the officer.

"What do you do when a woman hits you?"

"I don't know what to tell you, man" he confided. "We don't like doing these things, but our hands are tied. We have to look at who is the primary aggressor."

Stop Violence Against Women aggregated legal writings and produced a list of determining factors for the primary aggressor. Below is a portion of the list:

- The height and weight of the parties
- Which party has the potential to seriously injure the other party
- Whether a party has a fearful demeanor
- Whether a party has a controlling demeanor

Like most men, I am taller and heavier than my wife. I'm a Marine veteran with combat training. Studies have shown that gender (either biologically or by social framework) plays a role in being fearful. Women are more likely to report being afraid[1].

In 2006, the spokesman for the New York Mass Transit Authority, Gene Sansone said, "a lot of psychologists agree that people are more receptive to orders from men."[2] Of the full list of 12 criteria to consider, it seems unlikely the man in any situation wouldn't have at least these four lined up against him from the moment the police start looking at the evidence. Another third of the list involve prior histories, and the final few ask the officers to weigh the injuries of both.

The two officers escorting me to and from the hospital and then to central booking didn't have any advice when I asked what I should have done. "Sorry, man."

They never took photographs of the side of my face.

Thirty hours later I stood in front of a judge and had a county prosecutor argue against me: "His wife is afraid of him. She said he…"

Released on my own recognizance; order of protection outlaws me from contacting her or my kids for a year.

A few days later my eye had an almost cartoonish discoloration. I'd gone back to the ER complaining of headaches and the light bothering me. She cleared out my bank account. I was a friend's couch away from adding to the homeless veteran population — 62,619 + 1.

I sat across from my lawyer and talked about the other time. She grabbed me and ripped my shirt. Her nails cut my face. I bled. I tried to walk out the door. She blocked the door. I was a gym-every-day, active duty Marine, fearing someone a fraction of my size. If she had a penis I'd have a dozen ways to put her on the ground. Instead, I was left to sneak out a bedroom window and spend the night in a parking lot.

I tried the police and now in front of a guy practicing law for nearly as long as I've been alive I tried again.

"What do you do when a woman hits you?"

"Run. Run and don't go to the police"

That's it.

I reached out to a few domestic abuse support groups. "How can this actually be happening? How can I be the one to have been arrested? Why?"

I spoke to a nice lady on the phone and tried to pass my confusion into a question they were built to answer: legal advice, criminal cases, orders of protection. I was going to have to get rid of this order of protection if I was going to get my kids.

"Sir, are you calling about domestic violence?" — yes.

"Okay, we're going to help you. Has there been an arrest?" — yes, me.

"Ummm, wait what?"

Their web site mentioned they deal specifically with custody in cases of domestic abuse. Sounded like exactly whom I needed.

Then came the second punch. "Do you have custody of the children?" No, that's why I'm calling.

"I'm sorry sir, our charter only allows us to help domestic abuse victims who have custody of their children."

This silly game of catch-22. Why don't I have my kids? Should I have taken them with me as I went to the police station? Should I have asked them to explain the nice officer how mommy had hit daddy and be an accomplice in her arrest? Would any of it matter? There were no injuries on her; plenty on me. They'd have just watched their dad get handcuffed and be as confused as I am.

At this point I couldn't help but think beyond my situation. How I am I going to explain this all to my kids when I see them again. What would I tell my son if he ever was in a relationship that had gone as bad as mine had? If he called me up one night and said, dad….

"What do you do when a woman hits you?"

I never realized how much violence against men by women was a part of TV shows. There must be something disarming in realizing that the larger, stronger man is allowing the woman to do something physically to him. One of the classic tropes of the Seinfield series was Julia Louis-Dreyfus pushing the other male characters[3].

Sometimes it was playful, sometimes it was out of anger, but it was always her pushing him.

The HBO hit show Newsroom takes it a step further with Olivia Munn's character, a socially awkward economics Ph.D. When someone suggests making up lies about her online to get a story on an internet prank group she grabs the guy and throws him up against a wall and yells at him[4]. After her ex-boyfriend posts naked pictures of her online she goes to her office and kicks him in the groin then punches him in the face, finally taking a photo of him laying on the ground with blood pouring out of his nose[5].

The character's anger could be understood for either gender, but could the violence? There is no way a guy could go to his ex's office and touch her no matter how grievous her transgressions, yet somehow Munn's attack feels like a triumph over her emotional tailspin during the majority of the episode.

So, what do you do when a woman hits you?

Guys can laugh off a slap from a girl. It's a punch line in sitcoms whenever there's a crass joke. But be careful that those never become more than playful. Because I've never found a helpful answer to the question. I hope you never have to.

---

[1] "Gender role and behavioral avoidance: The influence of perceived confirmability of self-report," McLean, Carmen P., Ph.D., University of Nebraska – Lincoln, 2007 http://gradworks.umi.com/32/62/3262188.html

[2] "Voices Down Below", by Justin Rocket Silverman, AM New York, 2006

[3] Seinfield YouTube clip http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=h-XgvHPt1cg

[4] Newsroom YouTube clip, Season 1, Episode 8 http://youtu.be/LZC0Nz255KQ

[5] Newsroom screen grab, Season 2, Episode 5 http://imgur.com/a/GN3ou#0

A version of this post entitled "What Do You Do When A Girl Hits You?" was originally printed an a web site where they don't have much compassion or respect for men.

Editorial note: once again, you can contribute here if you want to help make a difference in this case.

25 Examples of the Usual Rape Culture Bollocks

AVfM Video Source · 24 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sammy Allouba takes on the absurd Everyday Feminism Project's 25 examples of rape culture. Thanks Sam, we wanted to do it but we didn't have the energy!

Subscribe to DoomRulz for more rapey rapiness.

Why Feminists Cannot Be Trusted To Discuss Rape of Men–At All

AVfM Video Source · 24 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Jaclyn Friedman, Adele Mercier, and their feminist supporters have demonstrated, for all the world to see, that feminists have no right to control the narrative on sexual assault–and no place, at all, in any way–in the discussion of male rape victims. Alison Tieman explains.

You should subscribe to Alison Tieman.

Gender Tribalism

Peter Schwartz · 24 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's Note: This text first appeared in The Return of the Primitive: The Anti-Industrial Revolution (New York: Penguin, 1999, pp. 205-218.) This essay, published in the late 1990s, seems to describe events as they have unfolded over the last 40 years in many respects. –Ed.

Feminism has become a form of gender tribalism, a collectivism that denigrates individual agency and accomplishment in favor of the group or sisterhood. Positing women as the victims of oppressive forces beyond their control, feminism is today the leading voice in declaring women to be helpless and incapable of accomplishment without significant government aid. A mentality of entitlement and dependency has come to replace the more liberating idea of individual accomplishment; a "neo-hausfrau" movement. Feminism has degraded men and women alike. The rhetoric of liberation obscures a movement that replaces individual responsibility and achievement with a tribal mindset subservient to the group.

All forms of collectivism rest on a certain metaphysics. The collectivist tenets—in economics, that production is primarily a social effort; in politics, that the group, not the individual, has rights; in ethics, that the individual must sacrifice his interests to the needs of society; in epistemology, that the judgment of an individual mind is subordinate to the collective consensus—all stem from a deeper premise: that the individual is impotent to cope with reality. The individual, on this premise, cannot sustain his life on his own, and must depend upon the group for survival.

This viewpoint, as applied to women, is what feminism essentially promulgates.

Of all the supposedly demeaning views of women for which feminists condemn our "patriarchal" society, none is remotely as denigrating as that held by feminism itself. It is, today, uniquely feminists who depict women as congenitally helpless, endlessly "victimized" creatures.

It is feminists who declare that, without government aid, women are compelled to accept only 75 percent of what men are paid—that their advancement at work is blocked by a "glass ceiling," which only the weight of government can shatter—that women cannot be expected to hold full-time jobs unless government provides day-care services for their children—that women cannot get hired for the better jobs or admitted into the better schools, except through "affirmative-action" preferences—that women cannot attain self-esteem as long as Playboy-type material (which, a court rules, has "a negative impact on the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance") is legally permitted to be sold.[1]

The message of such feminist stands is that the individual woman cannot succeed in life by her own efforts and on her own merit. She is at the mercy of forces she cannot control, unable to obtain work, education or self-respect without the succor of a (governmental) nursemaid.

This is not merely a journalistic description of what feminists see as an unfortunate condition of women at present. This is, rather, a part of their basic philosophy—a philosophy that holds metaphysical powerlessness to be woman's normal state.

And it is a state that feminists actively foster. They want women to believe that the way to attain one's goals is to rely, not on individual merit, but on the power of the group. According to feminism, acquiring the specific abilities necessary for success in some area should be of little concern to women. In fact, they should dismiss the very need for such abilities. What they should count on, instead, is the fact of their gender.

For example, the average woman scores lower on the Medical College Admissions Test (because of deficiencies in her knowledge of science) than the average man. Should women who want to be doctors come to the logical conclusion that they need to study harder? Should women be advised to master science, so that they can be accepted on the same basis as men, irrespective of gender? No, say the feminists; the only conclusion to be drawn is that not enough women are being admitted—so the qualifications must be changed.[2]

If a woman wants to be, say, a firefighter, the feminists do not encourage her to make sure she measures up to the demanding physical standards. What matters most, she is told, is that there be a representative contingent of her gender at the firehouse. And if she does not meet the standards? She should not have to, feminists retort; women are rightly due their quota of such jobs.

With all their prattle about female "empowerment," feminists disavow the only legitimate meaning of that term: i.e., the individual woman's self-created power to make herself into a value, the power to make an employer want to promote her or a school want to enroll her—as a mutually beneficial exchange, based on her objective ability, not as a sacrificial accommodation to her gender. But that would be too independent an approach for the feminists to sanction.

Their implicit message to women is: "You cannot succeed on your own—but you don't have to; your collective will get you what you want."

Ironically, when the contemporary feminist movement began, in the 1960s, people believed that its message was the exact opposite. They believed that women were being urged to abandon the traditional "hausfrau" mentality—i.e., the assumption (held by females no less than by males) that women were incapable of dealing with existence outside the confines of the kitchen and the bedroom. People believed that women were being urged to seek their own careers, to reject unchosen duties to others, to assert a moral right to the pursuit of their own happiness, to embrace the real world by becoming airline pilots, neurosurgeons, music composers and CEOs.

But the collectivism at the heart of the movement quickly surfaced, revealing feminism's true nature. It became clear that women were expected to obtain all these new positions, not by earning them qua individuals, but by demanding them qua females. It became clear that the hausfrau image, far from being rejected, was being endorsed by feminism—in an updated, uglier form.

Whereas the old hausfrau mentality said that women could not perform the more demanding jobs as competently as men, this same mentality now says that women should not be required to. Now, the fact of gender supposedly entitles women to their "fair share" of corporate vice presidencies, irrespective of ability. Now, under this "neo-hausfrauism," women don't have to earn any reward— they just have to call upon Momma State to grab it for them. Now, as before, the conclusion for women is: gender determines all.

It is only the perverse influence of modern collectivism that permits such moral debilitation to be termed "liberation."

In pushing this philosophy, feminism attracts the very worst among women. It draws all those who want to be absolved of responsibility for their lives. Every housewife who feels guilty for having forever given up her pursuit of a career—every mindless scrub nurse who regrets having abandoned her ambition for something more—every bitter woman in a dead-end job or a dead-end life—are all reassured that their plight is not their fault. The individual woman cannot succeed—feminist doctrine proclaims; so she is not to be reproached for her failures.

One type of woman, however, is to be reproached: the woman of true independence. The woman who wants to judge and be judged according to individual merit—who scorns the crutch of "affirmative action," who succeeds on her own and who is proud of it—is chastised as a traitor to her tribe. She would never have achieved anything—feminists resentfully insist—had it not been for the collective efforts of all women.

Feminism rests upon dependency. It tenaciously recruits—and molds—dependent, self-abnegating women. It inculcates in them a belief in their metaphysical helplessness—and then waits for them to become docile members of the flock.

Feminism wants to enshrine the very mentality from which it claims to "liberate" women. It seeks to re-channel the hausfrau mentality—the desire to be provided for—by simply switching the object of dependence from husbands to the “Sisterhood.”

The leaders of feminism advocate the creed of the social worker. The social worker exists, not to help people escape from trouble, but to persuade them that life inherently is trouble—from which escape is impossible without the help of the social worker. Feminists want to instill a similar state of mind, by convincing the individual woman that she is doomed to frustration and failure— unless she hitches her wagon to the collective caravan of womanhood.

At the root of this malign conception of women lies a premise about free will. Feminists implicitly believe that women have no genuine volition and that their choices in life are not freely made.

Thus, according to feminism, a woman is never to feel guilty, no matter how low she may have sunk. Has she thrown her life away in a loveless marriage, in drug addiction, in prostitution, in violent crime? She could not help it, feminists tell her. Her choices are not the cause of her misery. Society did not allow her to do anything else. It is society, not she, that needs changing. And the only true “choice” a woman can make, therefore, is a collective one: to stand in solidarity with her female comrades.

The heroines of the feminist movement are not the women who achieve productive lives by their own efforts, but those who announce how empty and impossible their lives would have been without the maternalistic aid of a feminist-sensitive state. The woman who has no real self to assert—who pleads to be taken care of by her “sisters”—who preaches loyalty to quotas and subservience to the collective—who declares that the source of her unhappiness is not her own irrational choices in life but a tyrannical culture—it is she who is held up as a model to be emulated.

Because feminism regards volition as a myth, women are consistently portrayed as victims.

Since they are not held responsible for any failure to attain some end, every frustrated whim of theirs is taken as a sign of victimization. It is taken as evidence that women are being denied their rightful share of the goods. “Feminist consciousness”—says one author—“is consciousness of victimization.”[3] (Emphasis in original.)

The actual “victimizer” is, of course, reality itself. If a woman wants to be hired for a certain position or to gain entry into a certain school, not because she qualifies for it, but because she belongs to a class whose desires are not being fulfilled—then it is reality that is the barrier. For it is reality that demands objective qualifications. It is reality that presents us with the unbending law of causality, the law which states that a job can be done only by those who can do it. It is objectivity—the need to adhere to the requirements of reality—that is feminism’s real enemy.

But feminists dismiss the very concept of an objective reality, because the volitionless woman cannot survive in such a world. She cannot accommodate herself to a universe that makes such rigid demands upon her. She wants the “flexibility” of the non-objective. She feels ineffectual in an objective reality—so feminism repudiates it for her.

“Feminist analysis”—says a professor at the University of New Mexico Law School—“begins and ends with the principle that objective reality is a myth.”[4]

Thus feminists denounce the “exclusionary” means by which society evaluates doctors, lawyers, soldiers. Why, they ask, should women be judged by objective standards? And if one answers: because reality and reason mandate it—their reply is: Why should women be bound by reality and reason? Why can’t a woman be allowed to construct a more malleable world, a world she feels is more hospitable to her wishes? Why shouldn’t she be judged, for example, by her compassion for the ill, rather than her ability to perform surgery—or by her aptitude for telling stories rather than for logically analyzing legal principles—or by her capacity to bond with her fellow soldiers rather than to run an obstacle course in full military gear?

As the president of City College of New York, complaining about a lack of “diversity” in universities, writes: “Institutions of higher learning in the United States are products of Western society in which masculine values like an orientation toward achievement and objectivity are valued over cooperation, connectedness and subjectivity.”[5]

Why, feminists wonder, should even immutable facts stand in the way of women's egalitarian desires? For instance, why should women pay more for annuities just because they have longer life expectancies? Why should they pay different medical insurance premiums just because they incur pregnancy-related costs?[6] Why should females not be members of the Dallas Cowboys and the Vienna Boys Choir? As one feminist organization claims: "There is no such thing as fair and unfair discrimination."[7]

In this war between women and objectivity—between whims and reality—it is considered "discriminatory" to give priority to the latter combatant.

But since reality per se is not very responsive to political protests, feminists direct their grievances against the party they blame for "inventing" such an unyielding universe: men.

It is men who push the idea of objectivity—feminism argues—as a means of keeping women subjugated. It is men who arbitrarily refuse to indulge a woman's whims, as they insist that she be judged by merit, not gender. It is men who are to blame for every female who becomes a stewardess rather than a pilot, a cheerleader rather than a quarterback, a secretary rather than a vice president.

Feminists observe that males have somehow managed to succeed in reality. They have somehow been able to acquire the jobs, the wealth, the fame, the happiness. The way for women to do likewise—feminists maintain—is, not to master reality, but to harness its surrogate: the male. How? By acting like the children feminism believes they metaphysically are, and petulantly demanding that their desires be accommodated—by men. By insisting that they be given their "allowances," in the form of prescribed quotas of jobs, promotions, college admissions, etc.—to be produced and financed by men. (At least, the old hausfrau method of directly latching onto a husband for financial security was a more honest form of dependence.)

This evaluation of women as non-volitional ciphers, and of men as their vile oppressors, is implicit throughout the feminist philosophy. But there is one area in which this view is made virtually explicit: sex.

Sex between a man and a woman is not what it seems, according to feminists—i.e., it is not really voluntary. Law professor Susan Estrich, for instance, writes: "Many feminists would argue that so long as women are powerless relative to men, viewing a 'yes' as a sign of true consent is misguided."[8]

Other feminists contend that a woman cannot be held accountable for her decision to engage in sex. "There could be many reasons why a woman might not resist a man's advances so that unwanted intercourse could occur without force. The woman … may be confused. Her socialization may make it difficult for her to resist."[9]

In other words, women—adult women—are incapable of saying no when they do not want to have sex. They are the passive, deterministic products of their "socialization." Consequently, feminists say, women cannot be held responsible for having sex, any more than children can.

This idea of women as volitionless doormats obliterates the distinction between the voluntary and the forced. Do women have a rational faculty, by which they choose whether or not to engage in sex?

Not according to feminists, who declare that "verbal coercion" constitutes rape. And what is "verbal coercion"? It is "a woman's consenting to unwanted sexual activity because of a man's verbal arguments not including verbal threats of force."[10] (Emphasis added.) So whenever the man utters anything indicating a desire for sex, any subsequent sexual activity, no matter how willing the woman is, may well make him criminally liable.

This is why, in incidents in which men are denounced (sometimes correctly) for "sexual misconduct"—such as the one at the Navy's 1991 Tailhook convention—no differentiation is made between actions in which the women willingly engage and actions in which they are forced to participate. To the feminist, it is all "coercive."

On this view, it is not the objective facts that are legally decisive, but the woman's subjective emotions. Says law professor Catherine MacKinnon: "I call it rape whenever a woman has sex and feels violated."[11] (Emphasis added.)

Facts are simply brushed aside by feminists. Since women are seen as incapable of exercising volition, the crucial distinction with respect to sex is, not between the woman's giving and withholding consent, but between her feeling and not feeling "violated" —a feeling on the basis of which men are to be indicted, tried and sentenced.

A study of college students ("Project on Campus Sexual Assault"), sponsored by Ms. magazine in 1985, is widely hailed as an authoritative, scientific survey of the prevalence of rape in American society. It found that over 25 percent of college-age women had been victims of rape or attempted rape. This reinforced the portrait of a patriarchal culture in which women are under constant attack by, and need constant protection from, their natural enemy, the male.

Yet it was only the survey's distorted definition of rape—based on the view of women as "socialized" puppets, unable to make their own decisions—that led to such a conclusion. For example, according to the questionnaire, if a woman accepts a drink from a man and they then willingly have sex, it may be considered rape, because the man has "impair[ed] the other person's judgment or control by administering any drug or intoxicant."[12]

In fact, of those classified by the survey as having been raped, 73 percent indicated that they themselves did not believe that the sexual activity in question constituted rape. And over 40 percent of the "victims" had sex again with their "attackers."[13]

This neo-hausfrau movement believes that women must be treated like children. They cannot be trusted to give "informed consent," they cannot be relied upon to know whether they have been raped and they need continuous parental supervision to make sure their needs are being met.

When a march on Washington was organized by the National Organization for Women to publicize "violence against women," the objects of the protest were, not just rape or battery, but reductions in welfare spending and cutbacks in affirmative action programs. As reported in the New York Times, the feminists "equated what they called 'political violence' with physical attacks."[14] A parent who beats an infant and a parent who withholds meals from an infant are both guilty of physical abuse. Similarly—feminist thinking goes—adult women are "victimized" by a denial of welfare benefits as much as by a real assault.

Just as the essence of rape, according to feminists, is not the act of physically forcing a woman to have sex, so the nature of its evil is not the coercion—but the collective "discrimination" by one class against another.

This primitive, tribalist view is most openly advocated by MacKinnon, who writes: "Sexual violation is both a practice and an index of inequality between the sexes, both a symbol and an act of women's subordinate social status to men."[15] Unable to perceive a woman as an individual even with respect to her being the target of an actual rape, MacKinnon sees the crime as being committed against the tribe. It is not that a particular woman has been attacked by a particular man—or even that physical force has been used—but that one collective has been judged "inferior" to another.

Rape should be prosecuted as a "sex equality case," MacKinnon says. In a rape trial, the central questions about the accused would include: "How does this man treat women sexually? Is he a sex bigot?" If the courts were to adopt this approach, she concludes, "At least rape would be called in law what it is in life: sex discrimination."[16]

But if the essence of rape is "discrimination"—what is the difference between sex and rape? The act of sex is undeniably "discriminatory" —it discriminates by gender. Doesn't that make it inherently evil?

Whether the claim is that "yes" equals "no," or that rape equals "inequality"—sex is transformed by feminists into the archetypal act of aggression by men against women. Sex per se becomes rape. And all men become guilty of it.

Rape, says one "acquaintance-rape educator," "is not some form of psychopathology that afflicts a very small number of men. In fact rape is not that different from what we see as socially acceptable or socially laudable male behavior."[17] Rape, says a noted feminist author, is "a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear."[18] (Emphasis in original.)

What is the source of this enormous hostility toward men, and particularly toward sex between men and women?

The act of sex, Ayn Rand writes, is an act of metaphysical assertion: "To a rational man, sex is an expression of self-esteem—a celebration of himself and of existence…. [I]t is his response to his own highest values in the person of another."[19] (Emphasis in original.) Sex is an affirmation of an individual's self-worth, of his or her capability to live successfully in reality and to experience the joy of such success.

What assessment of sex, then, follows from an opposite metaphysics? If sex is good because it celebrates the individual's capacity to master reality and achieve values—how must feminists, who believe that a woman fundamentally lacks that capacity, perceive sex?

To them, sex is a union, not between two partners sharing their highest values, but between two antagonistic forces: a brutal despot—who wantonly denies woman her due by insisting that she earn her place in the world: and a feckless, perpetual victim—who desperately clings to others for her basic identity and for her very survival. On this view, sex for the woman is not a joyous affirmation of her sense of self-value, but an intolerable reinforcement of her sense of helplessness—and of her resentment toward the man for not being helpless.

Sex, according to feminists, is sheer oppression. The woman is being dominated. She is being "taken" by her enemy. Sex is the quintessential "victimization" of woman—the woman who lacks the capacity even to assert her own will in the face of male "verbal coercion."

Feminist theorist Andrea Dworkin, who depicts sex as "wartime invasion and occupation," presents this view unabashedly: "Physically, the woman in intercourse is a space inhabited, a literal territory occupied literally: occupied even if there has been no resistance, no force; even if the occupied person said yes please, yes hurry, yes more." The fact that women may judge sex to be good makes the act all the worse, she says. These "occupied women [are] more base in their collaboration than other collaborators have ever been: experiencing pleasure in their own inferiority, calling intercourse freedom."[20]

Dworkin's is not some "lunatic fringe" viewpoint. Her odious characterization of sex follows logically from the feminist metaphysics. If the individual woman is a powerless, volitionless nonentity, then sex is a combination of callous invasion and abject collaboration. Dworkin is merely being more consistent, and is taking feminist ideas more seriously, than many of her feminist cohorts.

The doctrine of feminism pervades today's culture. To question and oppose its "politically correct" tenets, especially within academia, requires an independent mind. That is, it requires precisely the faculty whose existence feminism will not acknowledge—and whose force it cannot withstand.

Feminism needs to be repudiated by everyone—man or woman—who recognizes the crucial need to think, and to act, by oneself. If you understand that a human being's basic identity is selfcreated, and is not the product of gender—if you grasp the fact of your capacity to achieve your own goals by your own effort—if you indignantly reject the demand that anyone live by the guidance and the power of the collective—then do not permit the ideas of feminism to go unchallenged. Expose, and condemn, the self-effacing dependency that this "liberation" movement cultivates. Above all, let people see that the ideological battle over feminism is not between the female and the male— but between tribalism and independence.

Footnotes

[1)] "Canada Court Says Pornography Harms Women," New York Times, February 2, 1992, p. B7

[2)] On the Medical College Admission Test—the only standardized test available to medical schools— women attain a mean score 88 percent that of men on the physical sciences section of the test; and 90 percent on the biological sciences. Yet in recent years, according to the Association of Medical Colleges, equal proportions of male and female applicants have been accepted to medical schools. ("Women seem to communicate better in the interview," says the associate dean of admissions at Harvard Medical School.) See Martin L. Gross, The End of Sanity (Avon Books, 1997) pp. 72-75.

[3)] Sadra Lee Bartky, Femininity and Domination: Studies in the Phenomenology of Oppression (Routledge, 1990), p.

15.

[4] Ann Scales of the University of New Mexico Law School, quoted by David Brock in The Real Anita Hill (Free Press, 1993) p. 384.

[5] Yolanda Moses, quoted in a New York Post editorial, "CUNY Does It Again," May 26, 1993, p. 18.

[6] The Supreme Court has endorsed this view, ruling in 1983 that sex-segregated actuarial tables violate the Civil Rights Act of 1964 because "under the statute, even a true generalization about a class cannot justify class-based treatment."

[7] An official of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, quoted in The Intellectual Activist, July 29, 1983, p. 3.

[8] Quoted by Katie Roiphe in "Date Rape's Other Victim," New York Times Magazine, June 13, 1993, p. 30.

[9] Charlene L. Muehlenhard and Jennifer L. Schrag, quoted by Norman Podhoretz in "Rape in Feminist Eyes," Commentary, October 1991, p. 33.

[10] Roiphe, op. cit.

[11] Quoted by Carol lannone, "Sex and the Feminists," Commentary, September 1993, p. 31.

[12] Christina Hoff Sommers, Who Stole Feminism? (Simon & Schuster, 1994), pp. 212—213.

[13] Ibid., pp. 213—214.

[14] "Thousands in Capital Protest Attacks on Women," New York Times, April 10, 1995, p. A1.

[15] "The Palm Beach Hanging," New York Times. December 15, 1991, Section 4, p. 15.

[16] Ibid.

[17] Py Bateman, quoted by Podhoretz, op. cit., p. 30.

[18] Ibid. (from Susan Brownmiller's book Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape, Bantam, 1976).

[19] Ayn Rand, "Of Living Death," The Voice of Reason (New American Library, 1998), p. 54.

[20] Quoted by Podhoretz, op. cit., p. 31 (from Andrea Dworkin's book Intercourse, Free Press, 1988).

Editor's note: AVfM thanks Richard E. Ralston, Publishing Manager for the Ayn Rand Institute, for permission to reprint Mr. Schwartz's text, which was also reprinted in the journal New Male Studies, from which this copy was obtained.

The Suicide Note Dina Mackney Did Not Want You To Read

AVfM Video Source · 25 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of legal threats to censor a dying man's message to the world, a number of online sources, on YouTube, Facebook, and elsewhere, have taken to copying his message and even making videos of it reading it out loud. One of these is Gary Costanza, aka JerryTheOther:

He's not the only one. Victor Zen and others are dong it too. It's being mirrored all over multiple sites.

Do you think Dina Mackney or her friends or relatives are aware of not just how much damage Dina's done to her children, but of how very, very stupid it was to try to silence the internet?

The Devil Makes Work For Idle Hands: Facebook Censorship

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 25 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We know Facebook likes to ban Men's Human Rights Activists for the tiniest things but lets feminists get away with advocating all sorts of hateful things that if it were reversed it would get us banned as "misogyny."

So I wasn't exactly surprised when I logged into my Facebook account 4 days ago and I see a "Log in" status.

I just know I'm in trouble again.

And sure enough, I'm suspended from Facebook, and was informed I now had 30 damn days to consider my "sins."

I posted this link some months ago……. you can see clearly the woman in question was a gold digger (took a man for thousands of pounds and years of his life).

So I got a picture and put "Gold digger" on it, that got me a 30 day ban on facebook.

You can see it here:

[image]

God forbid we say such a thing about a woman who behaves like this!

I've had a lot of bans and warnings for various things which were innocent, too. My last ban on facebook was for this link from a knitting site.

Crazy I know!

The one before that was for sharing a facebook status from a page on facebook that got me 30 days as well and they didn't even remove the original post from the wall.

You can see why I feel like Facebook hates me. Or maybe just hates Men's Human Rights Activists.

I've a habit of annoying just the right people, and I posted on my UN page a chart which lists the incidences of rape over a 30 year period which shows that rape is becoming less of a problem than it was before.

Not to worry folks I happen to know that people who regard me as an enemy hate seeing me, but really worry when they can't.

I have 25.5 days to be idle and idle I shall not be.

We are hitting the streets again shortly more than likely next weekend (supposed to be this weekend but we had to change it at last minute)

Come see our website by clicking the image below!

Campaign 2014
Save Our Sons
MENS HUMAN RIGHTS
IRELAND
www.menshumanrightsireland.org

It is Time to Stop Waging the War on Sexual Violence with the Memes of the Hangman

Pierce Harlan · 25 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The impulse to eradicate sexual violence is a noble one, but sadly, the rhetoric employed by modern feminists in pursuit of that goal is a chilling echo of the lynch mobs gathered at the hanging trees of the old American South. Like the lynch mobs of old, modern feminism is animated by a disturbing hostility to the due process rights of the presumptively innocent. Anyone who would deny that hostility is a liar, a fool, or both. It is time to stop waging the war on sexual violence with the memes of the hangman.

No doubt feminists will recoil at this premise, just as they recoil when anyone dares to speak up for the rights of the presumptively innocent. Cue the spouting and sputtering of "rape apologist!" and "victim blaming!" — responses that have all the thought behind them of the tics associated with a severe case of Tourette syndrome. Compare the rhetoric of the hangman's sympathizers with the over-the-top rhetoric of modern feminism, then tell me who's the extremist, and who's just telling it like it is.

The Lynch Mob:

The motivating impulse of the lynch mob was that rape was an offense so heinous, it demanded "instant and severe punishment" — vigilante justice — without waiting for due process. As one writer put it, lynchings "are extraordinary measures demanded by extraordinary occasions."

Underlying the defense of lynchings was the assumption that rape accusers were "victims" just because they said so. The hangman and his sympathizers had no doubts about the guilt of the men and boys hanged–"their guilt was clear in every instance," clucked one writer. Another explained: ". . . the utmost care is taken to identify the criminal and only when his identity is beyond question is the execution ordered." And: "As the most careful precautions are taken against this result it is not a likely thing lest the wrong man is executed."

But due process wasn't just unnecessary to the fair administration of justice when rape was alleged, due process was a hindrance to the fair administration of justice. The criminal justice system was "incapable" of meting out the punishment that was needed, a punishment that spared the victims of "negro" atrocities the humiliation of testifying in courts.

The lynch mob was convinced its cause was righteous because it was convinced that "negro" males were prone to rape. This was from a New York Times editorial dated August 2, 1894: "It is a peculiar fact that the crime for which negroes have frequently been lynched . . . is a crime to which negroes are particularly prone." And this is from the New York Times, September 16, 1897: ". . . [T]he negro . . . seems particularly given to this odious crime." The "negro," you see, had "an evil nature," and a "colored" male was deemed at least three-and-a-half times more likely to rape than a white man. C. McCord, The American Negro as a Dependent, Defective and Delinquent at 220 (1914).

What was the lynch mob's reaction to those who denounced lynchings? To malign them as "fanatics" and victim blamers, of course. The folks who called for due process never "say[ ] or do[ ] anything to discourage the crime which provoked" the lynchings in the first place, said one lynching sympathizer. Indeed, these "fanatics . . . have assailed the victims of the brute's lust . . . ."

Does any of this sound familiar? In fact, all of it should sound familiar. The echoes of those shrill voices resonate in modern feminism.

The Modern Feminist:

Women don't lie about rape: How many different ways do feminists tell us that every rape accusation must be believed? That false claims are essentially non-existent or so rare that they are unworthy of discussion? That accusers are "victims" and "survivors" merely by virtue of their accusations? That an acquittal in a rape trial must mean that justice wasn't done? Among the most appalling sins of modern feminism is the insistence that an accuser in a given case must be believed because rape occurs in other, unrelated cases. "Reforms" in the rape milieu that chip away at the due process rights of the accused are typically justified by insisting that women don't lie about rape. See, e.g., here. The assumption of guilt based on an accusation is something the grinning mob at the hanging tree would have understood.

An accusation is enough to warrant punishment: And since women don't lie about rape, why on earth should we wait for an adjudication to exact punishment? Why wait for a hearing to expel a student on the basis of the accusation? Why wait for a trial before plastering the mug shots of the accused on television and talking about the alleged rape as if it certainly happened? Why bother trying to figure out if any members of the team are guilty before punishing all the members of the team? Why wait for a hearing before decreeing that "alleged perpetrators should automatically suffer life-upending punishments like expulsion from their residences upon accusation . . . ."? Why wait to know if an artist is guilty before talking about boycotting his films? Who needs due process when you know you are right, even though you couldn't possibly know you are right?

The courts can't give women justice: How many ways do modern feminists insist that women can't get justice when it comes to rape? That jurors don't properly judge cases due to their misconceptions about rape? That the standard of proof is too high in criminal cases, so "victims" need the kangaroo courts of college disciplinary proceedings, where it is much easier to obtain an adjudication of guilt, to get "justice"? Just as the lynch mob was intent on sparing the "victim" from testifying, the feminists, too, insist the accused should be spared from being cross-examined by the accused in college proceedings, and that in criminal proceedings, the "victim's" burden should be lessened by flipping the burden of proof to force the accused to prove there was consent.

Feminists attack defenders of the presumptively innocent: Just as the lynch mob sympathizers attacked the "fanatics" who decried lynchings and branded them victim blamers, modern feminists malign those with the temerity to defend the due process rights of the presumptively innocent with labels such as "rape apologist" and "victim blamer." A Harvard professor recently blamed her participation in a dust-up with this blogger as a reason why she was denied tenure. In our on-line debate, she studiously avoided the principal point of our defense of the wrongly accused while going out of her way to compare our Web site to "white supremacist websites . . .." Such is the state of public discourse when it comes to this subject.

Rape is Normalized: To the lynch mob, rape was "normalized" for "negro" males. For the feminists in the modern age, rape is "normalized" for all males, white or black. Just as the "negro" male supposedly was prone to rape, modern feminists think that men, as a class, are prone to rape. Feminist Jessica Valenti believes that rape is normal for men, even decent men: "Rape is part of our culture; it's normalized to the point where men who are otherwise decent guys will rape and not even think that it's wrong. And that's what terrifies me."

The view that rape is culturally embedded in the DNA of masculinity is so loopy, divisive, and counter-productive that even RAINN, the nation's leading anti-rape organization, has decried the "rape culture" meme and the "inclination to focus on particular . . . traits that are common in many millions of law-abiding Americans (e.g., 'masculinity'), rather than on the subpopulation at fault: those who choose to commit rape." Did the feminists' react by following RAINN's sensible cue? Nope. They denounced RAINN.

In his State of the Union Address of 1906, President Theodore Roosevelt condemned the hanging of blacks by vigilantes. He quoted a religious leader of the day: "As Bishop Galloway, of Mississippi, has finely said: 'The mob which lynches a negro charged with rape will in a little while lynch a white man suspected of crime. Every Christian patriot in America needs to lift up his voice in loud and eternal protest against the mob spirit that is threatening the integrity of this Republic.'"

Sadly, more than 100 years later, Teddy Roosevelt was right. The "mob spirit" is alive and well, and it isn't targeting just black men. It has wrapped itself in the mantle of political correctness and gussied itself up with PhD's in Women's Studies programs. But all of the noble intentions in the world to eradicate rape can't whitewash an appalling hostility to the rights of the accused. To deny that is to learn nothing from the disgraceful era when the lynch mob flourished.

Parental Alienation Awareness Day: Raising Awareness of The Abuse

Ron Collins · 25 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: Today is Parental Alienation Awareness Day. See the list of Parental Alienation Awareness events for more info. –DE Much has been written and discussed on the issues surrounding parental alienation, or "Parental Alienation Syndrome". That one of a child's or children's parents may become cut off from and out of touch with them has become a norm in modern life. The application of "family law", and its attendant use of expert testimony, to back up motions to separate children from a parent has in recent years become an enormous influence in the lives and futures of children from across the economic and cultural spectra.

There are those who claim that "parental alienation" talk is mere junk science, that arguments in favor of children's continuity with each of their parents are used by abusers to hide and even perpetuate their abuses of the children or the other parent or both. Indeed, for its first six years the Violence Against Women Act contained language encouraging petitioner's counsel to use a respondent's claim of alienation as in itself "evidence of abuse." The language was quietly altered in a later reauthorization, but the mindset still stands in the divorce and custody fields, that such claims of children being harmed by lack of access to a parent are generally made by abusive spouses trying to use court strategy to cover their own misdeeds, or even that the exercise of one's First Amendment right to petition government for redress of grievances in behalf of one's children is itself a form of direct abuse of the ex-spouse.

Those who do support further emphasis on ending the separations of parents and children seem to be divided into two intellectual camps: one sees PA as a "syndrome," apparently a behavioral issue with the alienating parent; while the other view is that parental alienating conduct is indeed criminal and to be prosecuted as a crime against the state such as any other criminal violation. Brazil has tried this second course, to the extent of writing new criminal law into its constitution with which to prosecute alleged perpetrators and enact corrective measures in behalf of children affected. It is beyond the scope of own study at this point to comment on how the effects of this law have manifested themselves, but the field is open to research in a major nation following the criminal interpretation officially.

In the US, the topics of PA and PAS are still highly controversial, with much resistance to the idea that they are worth discussing at all.

But the major flaw in the entire approach to this serious problem for children's futures is this: that it is taking place among the wrong people, and for the wrong reasons. At the forefront of any debate on the future of children must be parents and families, not lawyers and social workers. Children by their very existence make immediate relatives of two groups of people who were previously unrelated. The birth of a child is the merger of two families, and every member of each of a child's parental families is for the rest of their life part of their own birthright, identity and heritage, whether with or without working relationships and ongoing ties to each.

In short, to alienate a child from one parent is to cut that child off from half a family, not just one person. A father or mother is the window into an entire culture in which they lived and grew for a lifetime before a child was born, a complete way of life. Parenthood, whether under one roof or not, is not only the act of raising children but of enacting an influence of two lifetimes lived by two parents, intentionally or not. Parents must decide whether a child is raised as half a human being or a whole one.

Parental alienation essentially is a ruling by whatever power that one-half of a child's mortal existence is ill-founded and not worth upholding as fundamental reality in the child's upbringing. It is far more than a violation of a parent's rights in custody rulings, it is indeed an enduring form of mental and emotional torture and brainwashing, a permanent house rule that half of who a child is may not be discussed or addressed. Whatever may have been the original grievance against an alienated parent, real or manufactured, the ongoing results of PA are embedded deeply into a child's perception of reality itself for a lifetime.

Much more will no doubt be debated before any legal or systemic changes take place, and I anticipate that most of the content will be geared toward the winning of legal cases and not to the enduring legacy of new generations of adults now and from now on, who have lived lifetimes in the confusion and doubt bestowed on them by a parent who followed legal counsel and expert advice long ago, and came to accept the repelling of the other parent and everything about them as a lifestyle and a way to raise a child.

Until the effects on all civilization are addressed, of a growing population of young people living half-lives under the delusions and disclaimers and dramatics of an alienating parent, the true victims of parental alienation, and the ones least aware of it or prepared to face its power in their lives, little will change.

Editorial update: please also check out Fathers Contact. –DE

My 77 cents

Jack Goodfellow · 25 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There is a debate between Thomas Sowell and Harriet Pilpel where the issue of a wage gap between men and women is discussed at length. If you are not familiar with either of those names, Harriet Pilpel is (or better, was) an attorney and feminist activist. Thomas Sowell is an economist and Ivy League professor. Here's a summary of the debate:

Harriet Pilpel's position: Women earn 77 cents for every dollar that a man earns.

Thomas Sowell's position: Using the Department of Labor's figures, along with existing data, when the earnings of all women, versus all men are compared, the sum of all earnings by women is less than that of men. When 1 woman is compared to 1 man and they have the same education, same time in that industry and position and are working for organizations with comparable earnings, women earn more.

When did this fascinating televised debate take place, must have been recent, right? This is a recent issue after all. Ten years ago, if you believe feminist propaganda, women were barely permitted in the workforce. Twenty years ago they had to ask a man permission to urinate or breathe.

The debate took place in 1981.

More than three decades ago feminists were throwing that 77 cent figure out there and they've never stopped.

Even as women have come to dominate the educational landscape, completing undergraduate and graduate degree programs at a rate of 2 to 1 over men, even as the number of female Executive Officers has steadily risen, even as women have taken, year after year, a greater role in politics, business and academia, even as we are approaching the day when a female President will take office, the one thing that has never changed is this dubious 77 cents.

Isn't that amazing! It never dipped down to 71 cents, never rose a little, creeping up to 79 cents. Nope – 77 cents. Ask a feminist, 77 cents. In more than 30 years, regardless of all of the changes to the world in which we live, the wage disparity claimed by feminists has never moved so much as a penny.

Forget gender issues. Forget your search for the Loch Ness Monster. If there was ever a mystery to be solved, this statistical anomaly – the mere fact that as billions of people have shuffled in and out of the workforce, male to female income disparity never fluctuated so much as a penny – this is the most incredible event in human history.

You would sooner traipse through a prairie filled with four leaf clovers than magically come to a situation where year after year, by chance, women were paid 77 cents to every man's dollar. Some invisible hand must have been at work to make this so.

We like to compare the market's force to an invisible hand, so perhaps the monster is there? Somewhere, in some massive conference room, the Patriarchy has gathered and from there they review every single employment offer letter, every paycheck and with great care and tireless effort, they make certain year after year that women are paid exactly 77 cents for every man's dollar.

Honestly, that's the only way this happened. Or, feminists are full of it and they're pulling that 77 cents out of their backsides. I won't say which of those scenarios I believe, but the former is very unlikely. The Patriarchy of which feminists speak – judging by the way feminists describe them – would be working to turn that 77 cents into 50 cents, 10 cents and then nothing. What do they have to gain by never seeing the number adjust?

Time and time again, this wage gap myth is shown to be so much bunk. Women, as a whole, do earn less in the marketplace. They also, as a whole, work fewer hours. They also, as a whole, gravitate towards positions which the market values less and, they do this other funny thing. They have children (I know, I know, men have children too) and tend to move away from the market as a result.

Let's move on to the big question of the day. Why, if it is so likely that feminists are pulling that 77 cent figure out of their backsides, have they continued to do so for more than three decades? Why does feminist brigade after feminist brigade cry out this specific number, even though anyone with more than ten years of workplace experience knows it is so much cow manure? And, why aren't more people calling them on it? People in very high places like to spout that figure even when they know it is ridiculous.

Words are powerful things. They're seeds, really, idea seeds. You plant the right words in the right person and watch ideas and images and as a result, new behaviors blossom.

This 77 cents is a seed and nothing more. It is a seed that feminists, a highly organized political group, have sown in women's minds for nearly half a century. The idea that blossoms in the minds of young women, who I am certain are intelligent enough to realize that a figure like that couldn't happen by chance, is that men in the workplace secretly conspire to cheat women. You see, if a feminist came out and said "the market is cheating women. They're out to get you!" women might question that. When they cry out, "77 cents!" time and again, they bypass one's natural reluctance to question paranoia.

Just think of all the things to be gained from this idea seed – the belief that the market is out to cheat women:

1. It gives women the impression that men in the workplace are against them. In other words, it creates an enemy of men and automatic allies of women.
2. It is a narcissistic seed as well. What can be more narcissistic than to believe than millions of people are conspiring against you? In other words, it gives women this impression that they are secret targets, unwanted interlopers who must struggle against a terrible, unseen, foe. Quite a boost to one's self esteem isn't it? That you could be so critical to others based solely on your gender. You must be important if they have to work so hard to cheat you.
3. It creates competition where there is none and drives women to produce. "Pay me less, I'll show you what I'm worth!" This idea that women are targets permits them to be more aggressive, even unprofessional. Why wouldn't it? The market must not be very professional if it exists solely to cheat women.

All of this amounts to the final idea – the great oak that springs from this seed.

Work is something other than work!

That's it. The goal of this lie – the unwavering 77 cent figure – is that work (at least for women) is something other than work.

[image]If you listen to a feminist, work for a woman is a crusade! It's a swashbuckling adventure where every day you fight an all-powerful organization of men. These men run around like savage apes with one hand grasping their cock and balls and the other hand trying to get at your slender feminine throats.

Every promotion is a magical thing.

To even get a job in this terrible environment is amazing. Hell, throw in the other myths, you know, the ones that claim that no woman escaped their kitchen labor-prisons before 1965, and the claim that male work just isn't as taxing or laborious as their work… the excuses just pile up.

If feminists truly cared for women and if they didn't outright hate men, they might tell you the truth. Work is work. The marketplace isn't fair and equitable. Women earn less after having children because they tend to figure this all out after having children. That's the day when so many women realize how little of this world is about them and their swashbuckling crusade against the invisible men out to cheat (and rape and kill) them. Strangely enough, men tend to earn more after having children for the exact same reason. Be honest – if business owners could really get away with paying women 77 cents on the dollar for the exact same outcome, men simply wouldn't get hired.

If feminists truly cared for women, they might tell you what virtually everyone with some time in the workplace knows about pay rates. I like women. I'll tell you.

Take the amount of money that you generate for an organization and divide it by 3. If you are an average employee, that's the most you can earn. There ya go! That's it! There are no evil men in a hidden room. Everyone isn't against you. Thirty percent is the cap. The reason is strictly a matter of numbers. You get 30%. Another 30% goes to overheads, benefits and taxes and the company gets the rest. It's that simple.

If you can't figure out what you earn for a company (say as a contract administrator in the corporate office), your pay is based purely on the market and how long you've been with the organization. Same goes for a janitor or someone working on a production line. Add in some additional skills and you become more valuable.

People who can monetize their exact worth to an organization tend to make more. People who can't, make less.

Another tidbit – every organization in the world will pay you less if they can, but they'll pay you more if you know your worth to them.

There are no monsters here. No one is scrutinizing every paycheck ever written to make certain that women only get 77 cents to a man's dollar. Once you figure this out, you'll start earning more (if you want) very quickly. Once you figure this out, you may even decide to earn less and enjoy life more. Imagine that? It was a choice all along.

But – and this is a big BUT – once you peek through the curtain and get a glimpse at reality you'll have to live with the fact that work is work. It's something that you have to do every day, even when there aren't any shadowy mythical monsters striving to destroy you.

When you realize that work is work boys and girls; every day becomes a struggle not with others, but with yourself. A struggle with your own narcissism and ego, your own overblown sense of yourself in a world of billions. It becomes a struggle to mitigate and understand your actual value to others. Your mom may love you, but if your only skill is talking and not delivering, get ready to be kicked in the ass for a few years. If you listen to feminists, that ass kicking is because of men hiding out in a room, plotting against you. If you look at the reality, the ass kicking is just the market's way of saying – I can't make anything off of you, produce or go home.

If you can't figure out how to work with others, how to motivate others, what value could you have when anything big and profitable requires more than one person?

When you compare the achievements of some Chief Executive Officers with the achievements of some janitors, the CEO lost. A Vice President at one company can earn less than an associate at another. These are the realities of the workplace. Work is work. Your vagina or your cock doesn't make it anything else, though feminists will sell you that if it helps them. What does it do for you?

Does that idea help you to grow?

Does it help you to become a true adult that sees actual living breathing people all around and not just enemies, allies, and means to an end? That's how psychopaths and paranoid-schizophrenics see the world and they live in perpetual hell. Feminists, through their hate, their disgust with actual equality and growth, plant these seeds. And for six decades women have bought it to their own detriment. The result is today and it is ugly.

They never saw me coming: A new MHRA tactic?

Gary Costanza · 26 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Take heart my friends. While those “protesters” planned their disruption of the recent Fiamengo lecture at the University of Ottawa. Due to the ridiculous tolerance of the disrupters, they were successful; see it here.

I covertly FTSU! I waltzed into a feminist hornet’s nest, camera in hand, unannounced and unexpected–definitely unexpected, as these feminists rarely/never hear an opposing view—and upset their cozy world of smug arrogance and bigotry. I love doing that. Hundreds of these feminist propaganda events happen in every college campus with nary a contrary word until now. I attended the screening of the documentary “The Education of Shelby Knox” as part of a feminist film festival, with the subject of the movie in attendance to lecture and answer questions. I filmed the whole lecture as well as my reactions to her speech, feminism and men’s rights in general – SHE WAS SPEECHLESS! I blasted feminist BS such as the patriarchy, “rape culture,” and the war on women’s reproductive rights. I plan to attend one or more of these feminist film discussions and enjoying lunch on them, so expect some more FTSU! Here’s the video:

What happens when Jezebel lets a man take over? Brilliance, quite frankly!

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 27 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Well, this has been one of the most interesting weekends I've ever seen on Jezebel, with virtually all of the posts coming from a man named Mark Schrayber. Mark lectures in psychology at San Francisco State University, and he is a former behavioural health counselor.

Part of me thinks Mark is gonna be in for some hell come Monday for posting a lot of articles that don't show women off in their best light. Let's take a look:

First up, he writes about Wendy Williams suggesting that it is okay to trick a man into getting you pregnant by going off birth control, using the justification that hey, it's your body, your choice, right?

Oh dear, well that's not consistent with Jezebel insisting that birth control sabotage is something men do to women, and it's a form of control and abuse that must be stomped out immediately! Power-Hungry Men Sabotaging Women's Birth Control Is a Real Issue, shrieks Katie J.M. Baker!

> "Increasingly, birth-control sabotage is viewed as a tool not for baby-crazed female stalkers, but for a class of predominantly male abusers who want to exercise control over their partner's body, make her dependent upon them, or secure a long-term presence in her life."

The commenters at the Wendy Williams piece are definitely aware that publicizing the issue has some drawbacks. For women.

> Sigh. This will just be used as "proof" by MRAs and other misogynists that women tricking men into getting them pregnant is a common occurrence.

A helpful MRA at Jezebel points out that the behaviour doesn't have to be rampant to be unacceptable:

> I think MRAs and most nice feminists agree that this kind of deception is reproductive coercion and should be criminalized.
>
> And for the record, I don't think most MRAs think this kind of thing is "rampant." It's just that the legal environment allows and facilitates this is unacceptable.

Then, Schrayber follows up with an article exploring the Cult of Victimization, writing about a woman who is suing the estate of child she killed while speeding, because he inconsiderately caused a "shock to her system" by putting a human sized dent in her SUV and then dying. Her enjoyment of life has been lessened. Not as much as the real victim's enjoyment of life, of course, but $1.35 million ought to compensate the True Victim for the pain she has suffered.

Aaaaaand, it takes Jezebel commenters about ten seconds to find a man to blame: the woman's husband, who apparently was driving behind her and since paternalism is so beloved by feminists, they quickly embrace the idea that he is responsible for her actions. I hope he countersigns her checks, too, once she gets that big pile of cash, because consistency is important, right? He should probably approve her vote, monitor her communications and determine which educational opportunities she is allowed to pursue. In for a penny, in for a pound?

> Don't forget to mention the part where her husband is a police officer and was driving behind her that night!

> It should also be noted that her police-officer husband was following her that night, was first on the scene, and told her to go home after the accident with no breathalyzer. I smell a cover-up.

And of course, there are the obligatory comments that back up cupcake, and understand her anguish at being forced to kill children. It's very traumatic, apparently.

> It's good to remember that the woman who struck & killed the victim may possibly be in shock/mentally unwell as well—killing a living person is a huge deal, and killers deal with it in different ways. Maybe she really is just completely callous and a sociopath, or maybe she's going through her own panic/guilt/fear/nightmare/irrational response, herself. She may feel that she was driving "normally," after all, plenty of us do speed slightly and it is generally considered socially acceptable—the cell phone use not so much. She may feel a LOT of anger towards these kids for having been irresponsible bikers (and we all know that people on bikes, even the nice ones, sometimes take liberties with stop signs and lights and endanger drivers as well), anger that she doesn't know how to channel properly.

Next up we have a teacher who gave a student a full contact lap dance that included "rubbing her butt across his lap and swiveling around to put her head between his legs".

And the commenters backpedal furiously, confronting their own prejudice and straight forward refusal to consider boys legitimate victims, ever, under any circumstance:

> The teacher is 100% wrong, whether the kid liked it or not is irrelevant (in that regard anyway). Frankly, if you're an adult teacher and you can't stand your ground against middle school kids' peer pressure, you're probably in the wrong profession. However, having said that, I highly doubt this kid was "terrified." I don't think there is ANY correlation whatsoever to how he felt about the situation and what should happen to the teacher. The two are not connected in any way; she should be penalized in accordance with her school's policies whether the kid loved it or hated it. But, as far as him being terrified and wanting a journal to write his thoughts in, yeah I doubt that. I'm surprised this article was written by a guy. Were you never in middle school? Every guy I asked (and I asked several) said they would love it. Now, I repeat, that has NO bearing on the fact that that nutbar teacher was 100% wrong. But I'm pretty sure that kid loved every minute of it. Very very very few 14 year old boys care about a new pencil or a journal to write in, over getting a full-contact lap dance from a willing adult woman. Sorry. But yeah that teacher needs to go.

Hell, this kind of crap should not be a crime! It's just crazy!

> I tend to agree with you, though. Should she be disciplined, up to and including being dismissed? Yes. Should this be a criminal offense? Oh, for God's sake. HONESTLY.

I'm sure a male teacher who gave a female student a lapdance that included putting his head between her legs would just be good clean fun, too, right?

And speaking of fun, the next story involves a woman arrested for offering to fellate a horse on Craigslist, and no, I am not making this shit up.

Naturally, the woman's behaviour is excused or downplayed, because …. Oh, fuck, I have no idea why anyone would even attempt to justify it, but here we go:

> This doesn't really have to do with your point, but it's weird to me that bestiality is considered such a "horrific crime" by most people. We do so much shit to animals without their consent, it's weird to apply it almost exclusively to sex.

> Touching a big slimy horse dick with your mouth is disgusting for sure, but I feel like people are overreacting.

And of course, the woman is the victim here!

> Why post the photo of her except to attempt to publicly humiliate her, (not to mention potentially outing her as transgender,) and ostracize her from the community for the duration of her life? That's pretty damn cold, bestiality aside.

One weekend, one man, and we have women sabotaging birth control, women suing dead children she herself killed, women lapdancing young boys, women sucking off horses and just to round things out, Schrayber reposted an article about how Lauren Cox should not be in Time's 100 most influential issue, because she's gasp not that influential.

Oh dear. Something tells me Mark is in for a spanking Monday morning. He appears to have missed the memo that women are not to be criticized, their bad behaviours are not to be pointed out and their disgusting sexual proclivities are not to be questioned.

Why?

Because the commenters demonstrate beautifully what a pack of hypocritical, contradictory, bigoted, chauvinist zealots modern media feminists are.

I love it, personally!

Keep it up, Mark! I think you should be editing Jezebel every day of the week!

Schrayber for editor! You'd get my vote. Well, as long as my huband approved, of course.

Lots of love,

JB

Misandry and Emasculation within Disney's Beauty and the Beast

Josh O'Brien · 27 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I wrote this essay for two reasons. Firstly to show some of the more subtle anti-male undertones in things which are seen to be pro male or even anti-female, and secondly to show how easy it is to use subjectivity to make a point that cannot be refuted. All others doing essays of this nature wrote about misogyny or negative stereotypes of women (Vanity, weakness etc.) I decided to go the opposite route both to credit my ideas and to discredit those of the others.

Disney's Beauty and the Beast can be seen as a very honest way of depicting how society feels about the gender roles of men and women. Firstly, of the main characters, two out of the three are in fact males. The interesting thing about this balance is that despite there being a higher number of males in the film, they are both shown to be at least partially villainous. Throughout the entirety of the film, the only two characters, main or otherwise, who truly embody and possess typically masculine characteristics (chivalry, a wish to fight to protect women, strength etc.) are both depicted as being wrong, evil, and negative. The first of these two men is Gaston, by all accounts the villain of the piece. His great crime? He believes that he has a duty to woo Belle, something which in context is not such a bad act. He believes, according to the long espoused value of men being the ones to make the first move, of men being the ones who are forced to take the rejection when it comes and of men being the ones who are forced to make themselves entirely powerless in the relationship, that he should try to make Belle love him. This value is not a misogynistic value, and is in fact a value that has been endorsed throughout the entirety of time, as it places women on a pedestal as special and deserving of extra privilege.

Gaston's other crime as far as Belle and the audience are concerned, is that he sees a giant, monstrous beast, who appears to have kidnapped a woman that he is romantically interested in, and he decides that the best course of action is to 'man up' and defend someone helpless. Gaston in this action is a perfect example of the disposable male, the idea of men as tin soldiers that you can throw at a problem until enough of them have died that it is fixed. For very little gain of his own (simply another chance to ask a girl who will say no for a romantic engagement), Gaston feels and acts as if he is expected to risk his life. Which he does. And, this is depicted as one of the most evil acts of the film, because it does not allow Belle the choice to have been kidnapped by a giant monster.

The other character from the main three who makes use of any of the masculine traits is the eponymous Beast. He is part hero and part villain, and in this way can be seen to perfectly embody the current love/hate reaction that modern day society has when it comes to men being masculine. Until he meets Belle, he is simply what his name would suggest. He is unable to control his baser urges, unable to think or act on anything more than instinct, and not capable of emotions beyond the barest scratch of the surface. He is strong and independent. Everything he does is simply a masculine trait which is exaggerated. Except that is, for the one trait that is seen to be his redeeming characteristic, and the trait which turns him from villain into victim: his sadness, his wish to be what he truly is rather than what he is forced to be, his search for true love. Typically, these are things which we associate with femininity rather than masculinity. When you consider this in context, it becomes clear that of the dozens of traits that Beast possesses, the only ones that do not need to be toned down or removed are the ones which are feminine.

Society shares this opinion, evident in actions such as the banning of play fighting and toy guns, and the encouragement to sing and dance and to do other 'girly' playtime activities, right from the child's young and formative years. But Beast is not only an interesting topic when discussing the hugely misandric elements of the film because of this, it is also worthy of discussion because of the tipping point, the turning point, the face heel turn, whichever name you choose. He fully makes the transformation from villain to victim when he meets and is guided by Belle, a woman. If we remove the fantasy and the characters, and look at it purely in terms of actions, then we are met with this path of characterization.

1: Horrible, evil masculine male who cannot control himself (Villain)

After meeting a woman he becomes:

2: Possibly a redeemable person, he has a few feminine traits

After changing to suit a woman he is:

3: A victim in need of love and affection to limit his masculine traits and become a feminized person, thus entering the stage of being worthy of society.

Yes, Beast becomes a good character we are expected to sympathize with, only when he has a feminine touch. When a woman enters the equation and puts her foot down, she brings emasculation and shame for his maleness, and thus begins the process of making him "acceptable". This same value is shown through sitcoms, television shows, films and every other form of media. It's one of the most basic story lines. Man has masculine traits (sleeping with multiple partners or demonstrating and taking pride in physical prowess, both are biological and social urges) and this means that he is a bad person. But then a woman, the paragon of love and emotional stability and all things good in the world, comes around and 'fixes' him. How does she 'fix' him? By emasculating him. By taking out all of the masculine traits and replacing them with feminine ones. By forcing this man to defy the biological urges which make him 'less' than a woman, and because of this, unworthy of love.

Being unworthy of love is another theme. Beast must woo Belle in order to make himself into a good person. His entire life literally hinges around a woman. She is necessarily, the centre of his universe, and the thing that matters most. He would do literally anything for her. And this is the only even semi-masculine trait which makes him a hero. This is the trait which makes him worthy of empathy. A willingness to sacrifice himself on the altar of womanhood, to better the life of a woman he does not even know.
Editorial note: Feature image by Loren Javier. -PW

Sexual assault in America: Do we know the true numbers?

AVfM Video Source · 28 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of the few people left who call themselves “feminist” that we still have much respect for looks at the rampant rape hysteria being caused by the U.S. government’s Centers for Disease Control:

Maybe next time she’ll address the ludicrous “enthusiastic consent” defintiion of rape?

“You Do You” Feminism’s Recycled Tripe

AVfM Video Source · 28 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Victor Zen’s patience is finally trampled by a torrent of stupid from a recent TEDx talk at the University of Georgia. Even after drilling a hole in his brain and screaming incoherently, his arguments make more sense than Lindsey Cook’s “You Do You” feminism, a needless and narcissistic rebranding effort for feminism designed to recruit insecure young women.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7mcOggZoOMA

Don’t forget to subscribe to Victor Zen for book reviews, media interviews, real time college activism, pertinent social commentary and the occasional ginger rage.

High School Teacher Leah Bakely Teaches How To Make False Rape Accusations

Jonathan Taylor · 28 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Notice: if you have evidence of the name of the Connecticut high school where Leah Bakely teaches sexual education, please contact this site.

If ever there was a question as to where the world would receive its supply of rape hysteria, ready-made with all its due-process-be-damned dismissals of the presumption of innocence, its sneering denial of the harm false accusations cause to the wrongly accused, and its promotions of false rape accusations by its now-iconic shtick of "this isn't really rape but I'm going to call it rape anyway," have no fear: Huffington Post College is sure to provide.

Now, instead of some insane rambling by Lulu Chang at Dartmouth about how every male student who is acquitted MUST be a rapist (why? Because they're male, of course), instead of Tyler Kingkade telling us that an art statue of a sleepwalking man in underwear at Wellesley is somehow "pro-rape," and instead of Soraya Chemali telling us how UCONN's sports team's mascot (a husky) promotes "rape culture," we are treated to this article by high school sex ed teacher Leah Bakely.

The title of it is innocent enough: "Why every student should know the definition of consent." To kick off her article she even charitably provides us with a dictionary definition:

con·sent |kənˈsent|: Permission for something to happen or agreement to do something
Of course every student – and every person, for that matter – should understand the definition of consent. But given how often your everyday man and woman's consent is a Feminist's rape, and given that those who dominate the discourse on gender issues (especially at Huffington Post College) so often lean in the Feminist direction, the delicacy and importance of the issue requires us to examine what the author actually means when she says the word "consent."

So what is Ms. Bakely's definition of consent? Let's dig in.

> The absence of a 'no' is NOT explicit consent.

True enough. But let's be careful to remember that the absence of a verbal "yes" does not in and of itself mean "no," either. And yet, as we'll see later, this is exactly what she thinks.

> Explicit consent CANNOT be obtained if either partner is under the influence of any drug (alcohol is no exception)…

And there you are wrong, Ms. Bakely. Indeed, if such is the case, I myself have been raped many times over. And so has virtually everyone I know.

There is no such thing as "tipsy rape," and Ms. Bakely and her fellow purveyors of rape hysteria should know better. If someone is incapacitated (that's the magic word) by alcohol – for example, totally wasted and passed out – then no, consent is not present. But there's a difference between being "under the influence" of alcohol and being "incapacitated."

I guess to Ms. Bakely, every romantic dinner involving wine is just a rape waiting to happen. Wouldn't you love to date her? Or perhaps a woman just like her?

> Explicit consent is — and is only — the presence of enthusiastic and voluntary "yes" on the parts > of both partners.

No, no, no. In absolutely no legal code do we see a requirement that consent be "enthusiastic." Nor do we see a requirement of a verbal "yes." Again, if such were the case, I and many of my male friends and family members have been raped hundreds of times over.

If such were the case, then I can't help but wonder how I would recover from the shock of knowing that – at one point – someone consented to having sex with me, but she wasn't hyperventilating and screaming "OH MY GOD, OH MY GOD" every second like a porn star. And how do I come to terms with the fact that I have consented to sex in the past, but it hasn't been with raging enthusiasm?

It seems that there's so much rape to go around that everyone's a rape victim nowadays.

As I said after Goshen College declared that all men who merely stare at women are committing "psychological rape," we're all rapists now. Every one of us. Which means that rape isn't anything special or unique. On the contrary, it's something every adult – male and female – has experienced at one point in their life.

So if someone comes up to you and says "I'm a rape victim," what's the appropriate response? None other than this:

So what? Isn't everybody?

And that is an entirely reasonable response – in the kind of world where everything is rape. A world where rape itself has lost all meaning. The kind of world these people want to create.

As usual, Feminists & Friends blame everyone else for the trivialization of rape, even as they go about trivializing rape as a matter of course. It doesn't matter to them. Whatever demonizes men and gives women power in the short term. That is the only thing they really care about. Not men. Not women. And – in the long run – not rape victims.

We aren't done yet, however. There is more that can be gained from this article. She continues:

I wish someone had taught me these definitions before college.
And that should tell you exactly where she is getting this warped idea of what rape is and isn't: our institutions of "higher education." Aren't they supposed to teach students how to think, not what to think? Or have they instead "progressed" beyond that?

Lucky for me, I somehow managed to avoid being sexually assaulted or — God forbid — sexually assaulting someone even before I knew the definition of the word.
Oh, don't worry Ms. Bakely; you've probably sexually assaulted many people in your lifetime. You just won't know it until someone tells you a new definition of consent. A definition you haven't heard before, because it isn't the real definition.

Just like what you're doing with us right now.

Unfortunately, many people — particularly college-aged women — are not so lucky: one in four of them will be a survivor of rape or attempted rape by the time she graduates.
And this is why we deconstruct such lies here (see the recently posted video). Whenever you broaden the definition of rape, all of a sudden everyone is a "victim." And that's exactly how people arrive at these ludicrous numbers.

> Sadly, in many high schools, discussions about consent and communication are noticeably absent from curricula. In my experience teaching sex ed. to high school students in Connecticut, I've found that these students can often barely comprehend what it would even mean to consent to a sexual activity.

In other words, they can barely comprehend how an insane person like Leah Bakely would have a job as an educator, attempting to indoctrinate them into her definition of sexual consent. They can barely comprehend this because, in this messed-up age we live in, students today are living in greater psychological proximity to the real world than many of their teachers.

But let's remember: some students will unfortunately believe what their teacher is telling them is correct. Some students are still rather naive and impressionable, and look upon people like Ms. Bakely as authority figures. They will go out into the world and into their relationships with these definitions – Leah Bakely's definitions – of sexual assault. They will have consensual sex.

And then they will cry rape and wreck some young man's life. If they don't falsely cry rape based upon the consensual experiences they've already had after they were ~~educated~~ indoctrinated out of them by their teacher.

This is why we need to watch what these people are doing. Academia – in the humanities especially – is churning out people like Leah Bakely left and right. They deserve to be put on full-blast for all the world to see.

> There is no doubt in my mind that many sexual assaults — and not just those that occur on college campuses — would be prevented if more people knew the definitions of explicit consent and sexual assault.

On the contrary; there is not a doubt in my mind that many false rape accusations would be made against innocent people if more people accepted her way of thinking. I won't stand for it. And if you value the well-being of men and boys as much as the well-being of women and girls, you won't either.

Again: if you have evidence of the name of the Connecticut high school where Leah Bakely teaches sexual education, please contact this site.

This item reprinted from A Voice for Male Students.–DE

What are Kangaroo Court Judge Kathryn Solarzano & Elizabeth Gertz Trying to Hide?

Suzanne McCarley · 28 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A New Stalker has emerged in the never ending Stalker-Serial False Accuser Pauley Perrette Saga: Deputy Los Angeles City Attorney Elizabeth Gertz. Apparently with the assistance of Judge Kathryn Solarzano.

AVFM & NCFM have issued media requests for cameras in the trial of Francis Shivers. Those requests were denied by Judge Kathryn Solarzano. See full documentation, in PDF form, at the end of this article.

What is the Los Angeles County Superior Court Trying to Hide?

As these recently obtained and constructed public record documents reveal, a new stalker in the Francis Shivers – Pauley Perrette saga has emerged: Deputy Los Angeles City Attorney Elizabeth Gertz.

To give those who have been following this story an update, Francis Shivers will be in court again this Thursday, May 1st at 8:30 at the L.A. County Superior Court, Airport Branch, 11701 South La Cienega Blvd., Los Angeles, in Department D, the courtroom of Judge Kathryn Solarzano. Since the court is open to the public, please feel free to attend along with other trail watchers. Please be respectful and courteous, follow all rules of the court, and do not disrupt the proceedings. Please advise us of any unwarranted detentions or searches, seizures or destruction of any of your property.

This hearing, prompted by Deputy City Attorney Gertz, is a far-reaching, and it is now blatantly obvious what is happening: a delusional attempt to cause a phony "probation violation" by Mr. Shivers based on his Facebook postings. Ms. Elizabeth "Loony Lizzy" Gertz, using her brain surgeon and Einstein-like intellect, thought it would be a good idea to visit Mr. Shiver's Facebook page covertly as an "anonymous friend," to see and monitor what he was posting on social media. Wow, that was original and clever, wasn't it?

Since she already admitted it in open court–our heads shake in wondrous amazement–she had to follow through with her declared intention to violate his probation. You can also see her response in PDF form at the end of this article; that response was preceded by Mr. Shivers' attorney, Mr. Sanford Passman's Brief, also at the bottom of this article. It would appear that the "asleep at the wheel" attorney, Mr. Anthony Brooklier is no longer involved in this case.

You can see from Mr. Passman's Brief that he makes the points that it is clear that there has been no complaint, up to this point by serial stalker and false accuser Pauley Perrette, unless she comes up with something at the last minute. The only one who is raising a ruckus is the prosecutor, Elizabeth Gertz which means she will have to take the stand and testify under oath. My guess is that she will stumble and fumble inside of two minutes, even if common sense would dictate that she give up on this foolish endeavor.

We will also see if Miss Stalker Pauley shows up to court on Thursday, which would mean she would have to take the stand. That will probably not happen on the advice of her new legal counsel, not the prior legal counsel of corrupt and proven perjurer attorneys Ron Litz and Alexandria Lavinsky, if they are still practicing law, or if they are now on the French-fry line at In-and-Out.

It seems as though plus-sized Looney Liz Gertz is not happy with the fact that young Francis has exercised his First Amendment Rights by posting his formal complaint of Gertz to the California State Bar, in which proof was provided showing that Gertz is in violation of countless state bar professional rules of conduct violations as well as Subornation of Perjury, Conspiracy, and Civil Rights violations. Looney Liz was also displeased with some of the comments generated by Mr. Shiver's postings, none of which are threatening or are in any violation of any law.

Gee, that is not a stretch; any criminal would certainly be upset by the revelation and proof of their crimes being aired in public.

What is truly head shaking is what would prompt a prosecutor, any prosecutor to go to the extent of attempting such ridiculous and child-like tactics and obsession with attempting to send Mr. Shivers to the big house at any and all costs? Why isn't someone higher up on the dysfunctional and incompetent food chain putting a stop to this?

It would seem that providing proof of multiple felonies by a rogue prosecutor in the form of trial transcripts; her own spoken words, is insufficient to get, what is now clearly obvious, a very disturbed and dangerously obsessive prosecutor removed from a criminal case.

Oh, and by the way; Perrette was also proved to be a liar, once again, for like, the thousandth time, in that complaint through the trial transcripts; her own spoken words. We have lost count after a thousand or so lies.

Now that proof has been provided that the only true criminals in that courtroom are Elizabeth Gertz and Pauley Perrette, plus a handful of paid Perrette liars who testified at trial; we and the thousands of readers to the articles on this circus must wonder what kind of circus in going on in that courtroom?

Is there not a judge present who is supposed to swear an oath for the equal administration of justice? Is there not a judge in attendance who is supposed to follow the law, to exercise good judgment and common sense? Is there not a judge in attendance who is tasked with monitoring either over-zealous prosecutors or defense attorneys, and that due process and constitutional protections are followed? Is there not a judge in attendance who is supposed to insure that the taxpayer resources are applied effectively and efficiently? Or is there a muted mannequin dressed in a robe, sitting in that chair, watching this loony tunes circus unfolding before her and sitting silent, confused or "star struck?"

A Voice for Men and the National Coalition for Men were wondering the same thing. Earlier this week, and in the hopes of bringing the truth to the public and the thousands who have been following this story, official media requests were submitted to the court for authorization to bring cameras in the courtroom.

Less than 24 hours after submission, both the AVFM and NCFM media requests were denied by Judge Kathryn Solarzano. Well, it's official now, Judge Solarzano has been formally informed and has acknowledged that the prosecutor in this case, one Elizabeth Gertz, is the subject of a State Bar complaint for prosecutorial misconduct.

We shall see if Judge Solarzano, since she is now fully aware and has signed the media request denials, if she will recuse Looney Liz and have her escorted out of the courtroom, hopefully into the hands of some really nice doctors with nice clean white coats and a large butterfly net.

We, and many others wonder, how is it possible that the drunk driving court hearings of Lindsey Lohan and Justin Bieber, at that same courthouse are given unfettered media access, prompting a horde of cameras and reporters to the courthouse, yet the criminal antics of serial false accuser and stalker Pauley Perrette and the corruption of delusional rogue prosecutor Elizabeth Gertz not worthy of public scrutiny not permitted to be filmed.

What is the Los Angeles County Superior Court trying to hide?

Why are the true criminals in this matter, Pauley Perrette and Elizabeth Gertz (and a few others; Angela, are you paying attention?) not on trial in this courtroom rather than the true victim in this, Francis Shivers?

The answer is explicitly clear and that is that they don't want the general public to know or learn just how utterly corrupt this system truly is, and how some segments of the criminal justice and judicial systems have been compromised by the close proximity of celebrities.

There is one good thing that Looney Liz has done for Mr. Shivers. By her actions, she has kept that door open and provided further proof and evidence that will assist Mr. Shivers in his civil action. Thanks Liz.

It could be said that the evidence and proof that Pauley Perrette is a liar and Elizabeth Gertz is a delusional corrupt prosecutor is overwhelming. That would be an inaccurate statement, rather it could be said that the evidence and proof is epic. What does that say about the local L.A. political and public official leadership?

Despite thousands of pages of evidence, letters, official court files, declarations, transcripts and other evidence being supplied to the LA County Grand Jury, the California State Bar, the Los Angeles City Attorney, the California Commission on Judicial Performance, the LAPD Internal Affairs Unit, the LAPD Office of Inspector General, the FBI Public Corruption Unit, The United States Attorney for Los Angeles, the California Department of Consumer Affairs (an intentional dig on Nazarian), the California State Senate and Assembly Judiciary Committees, and Cops-4-Causes, not one public or elected official has uttered so much as a syllable of this mind-boggling miscarriage of justice.

Does that bother anyone? Should the general public be concerned with such routine miscarriages of justice? Should the general public be afraid?

A Voice for Men and the National Coalition for Men are extremely appreciative of all of the efforts of the volunteers and for those who have contacted us anonymously and please keep the information coming. For those few public officials who have contacted us and have provided invaluable information, you can rest assured that your identity will never be revealed, and you should prepare yourself for reprisals and frivolous employment actions should your identity be learned by your employer from within.

The readers of AVFM & NCFM are assured that these organizations and the volunteers and advocates tirelessly working on this will never give up, NEVER, until the true criminals in this scenario are locked up behind bars, lose their jobs, lose their fortunes, or are held accountable for their actions in full compliance with all laws, due process and constitutional protections; those same things that Mr. Shivers has not enjoyed.

Documents referenced in this article:

2014-04-21 Gertz response to Shivers Brief

2014-05-01 Brief re Gertz Facebook

AFMV Denial Form from LA County Court

NCFM Fax, Confirmation and Denial Media Request

Toronto Domestic Violence Symposium Featuring Erin Pizzey & Professor Martin Fiebert – June 6 & 7

Attila L. Vinczer · 28 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Canadian Maltese Charitable Service Trust is hosting the first Domestic Violence Symposium in Toronto at The Metro Toronto Convention Centre, June 6 & 7, 2014. Tickets are now available here. This is an event you can not afford to miss. We will have the finest academics enlighten us on what DV is, how to effectively deal with Domestic Violence (DV) issues from the perspective of an abuser, a victim and how to effectively manage authorities if you are caught in a violent domestic scenario.

[image]
Erin Pizzey & Martin S. Fiebert
Our Keynote speakers are Professor Martin S. Fiebert and Erin Pizzey. Together they possess over 100 years of DV expertise bringing to our audience important facts about Domestic Violence and the effect it has on our families and our communities.

In addition to our Keynote speakers, we have a number of other fantastic presenters. Professor Miles Groth, Vernon Beck, Senator Anne Cools and Walter Fox are confirmed, while we await confirmation by a representative from Yellow Brick House, a prominent woman's Shelter in Aurora, Ontario. We will also be presenting material provided by Dr. Paul S. Links, a leading expert on matters concerning the high suicide rate of males.

This conference is designed for professionals and families.

On Friday, the Toronto DV Symposium will focus on presenting to, Doctors, Nurses, Paramedics, Police Officers, Educators, Social Workers, Lawyers, Judges, LSUC (Law Society of Upper Canada), Members of Parliament, Members of Provincial Parliament, Children's Aid Society Workers and those who provide support to DV victims.

On Saturday, the Toronto DV Symposium will cater to the family. Men, women, husbands, wives and children. Our presenters will bring light to what Domestic Violence (also known as Intimate Partner Violence or IPV) is, how it affects all of us and what we can do to alleviate and mitigate the damage DV can cause.

Domestic Violence is a family matter, that affects men, women and most significantly, our children. The myth that DV is caused by men against women is slowly being dissolved as a fallacious innuendo that only men are responsible for DV. Professor Fiebert will provide data that clearly shows men and women roughly equally initiate DV in intimate relationships.

Every one of our presenters will touch on a significant area of DV as it affects all of society.

- Professor Martin S. Fibert – Research Facts about DV
- Erin Pizzey – DV Shelter, effect of DV on men, women and children.
- Dr. Miles Groth – Effect of DV on students in the classroom.
- Vernon Beck – Reflecting on his hands on experience dealing with men, women and children subject to DV.
- Walter Fox – A legal perspective about DV.
- Senator Anne Cools – Concerns within Family and Criminal Court as it relates to DV.
- Representative from Yellow Brick House (awaiting confirmation)

For those seeking an education on the focus of this confernece, see the following link: "SUMMARY: This bibliography examines 286 scholarly investigations: 221 empirical studies and 65 reviews and/or analyses, which demonstrate that women are as physically aggressive, or more aggressive, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners. The aggregate sample size in the reviewed studies exceeds 371,600. "

We look forward to seeing you there. Please share this event everywhere. Purchase your tickets and be part of an auspicious event as we deal with matters concerning DV and its affect on families and our society.

Special thank you to A Voice For Men and Canada Court Watch for their support of this event.

The call by feminists to treat men better: a rebuttal.

Paul Elam and John the Other · 28 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes critiquing feminist isn't exactly fair play. It's just not sporting to flame the writers on smaller platforms than the one we're working from ourselves. This rule of thumb has been harder to adhere to as AVfM has grown in traffic and influence. Today, the rule is set aside because the site being addressed, although small, indicates an evolving change in the prevalent and populist public hatred typically heaped onto male identity and sexuality.

The article in question is called,"Sexuality, Gender and Relationships: How to Get Men Involved in the Discussion." The unattributed author posted the piece to Reddit, inviting readers of the mens' rights sub-reddit to read and respond. However, that individual also indicated that the target audience is not men themselves, but those who believe men are the problem, and need to modify themselves to suit the preferences of others.

"The article is written with a specific target audience in mind – those that think that the problem is men, and men need to change."

With that audience in mind, the article is probably a project of good intent. However, the author registered a fail at trying to steer the "conversation" toward reason or away from bigotry.

With that in mind we want to volunteer our corrections to the misandric assumptions, and offer praise for the attempt to embrace reality, crippled by denial though it was.

The title of the article implies that discourse on sexuality, gender, and relationship is incomplete without the input of men. It also implies that men have not been speaking up, and struggling to be heard for as long as people have been having the conversation They talk about this radical new idea as though it were just accidentally discovered.

The article's opening:

"We need men to participate in dialog about sexuality, gender, and relationships."

Uh, we are. And when we do we are routinely shouted down, censored, vilified and shamed. So we kept talking, just not to people like you. The conversation is going much better.

What was that you needed again?

Next we are treated to this little gem:

"Until they do [join the conversation], we won't stop sexual violence, and there is a limit to how far the women's movement can go."

Yeah, there is indeed a limit, and it has been reached. Feminism's use-by date is starting to fade under a patina, but not the kind that makes it more valuable. Clinging to the delusion that sexual violence is uniquely masculine is just one of the many ways feminism has walked itself into a wall, and it is why there is a quickly growing number of men and women rejecting the toxic narrative and saying "no thank you" to the invitation to the "conversation."

The article continues:

"In general, men haven't arrived at the discussion table (let alone collectively change[d] their behavior)."

Sorry, we skipped the classes on "changing the collective behavior" of our sex. And we intend to keep on skipping them. So certain of this are we that we have formed our own classes. If you are teachable attendance is free.

It may not be THE perfect conversation, but it beats the hell out of appealing to men to participate in a discussion that requires them to demonize themselves and others; a conversation they know will ultimately require them to shut up if they don't like it.

If that is what you are trying to sell strong, informed, intelligent men in 2014, you better get Zig Ziglar on the case – or change your thinking. Otherwise you will be stuck with the same boring lackeys that have you out here now hunting for fresh meat.

The article lists supposed strategies for engaging men in gender discourse.

"Create conversations where it's clear that men are going to be honored, rather than made fun of or spoken about like they're nothing but dangerous."

We are not quite sure how this is going to be accomplished. How do you create a conversation with men that does not address them like they are nothing but dangerous, when you have already established that your purpose for the discussion is ultimately to get everyone to accept that all men are dangerous?

We will save you the suspense. You don't.

"Men are used to getting lynched in discussions about sexuality, gender and relationships, and as a consequence they avoid the topics."

Duh.

As a consequence of perpetual cultural lynching of male identity – men, especially those who have a vested interest in discussing sexual politics, have rejected the narrative in which they are the designated monsters. Or more simply put, they are telling the lynch mobs to bugger off.

They are smart enough to see the clearly implied lynching in the "appeal for inclusion" we are now addressing. The fact that it is disguised in with such lackluster effort only makes it more insulting.

Feminists, you are all keen on cultural awareness. Our culture, a culture of men and women talking about gender issues without being on a leash, aren't poised to jump up and down and yell, "Yippie! They are gonna let us talk! We actually exist now!"

Nor are we going to be moved by anything like the following:.

The author of the "genderequality" blog asserts that his/her readers and feminist colleagues and comrades must "find our compassion and love for men if we want them to step into the dialog"

Perhaps we should be grateful for the acknowledgment that they don't know where their compassion and love for men is to begin with. Hey, at least there is some insight, even if limited. Then again, being grateful for crumbs of something that normal people don't have to go looking for isn't in our culture either.

We have an abundance of compassion and love for men right here. So if you don't find yours in the sofa cushions or under the bed, we are willing to share.

Those addressed by genderequality's author as "we" really need to engage in a wrenching, agonizing, courageous and brutally honest self-evaluation of their own lives, then go looking. Not for their compassion and love, but for redemption.

And we are pretty sure that would pique the interest of a lot of men they now seem keen on reaching.

"We have to admit that those of us in the progressive movement often have deeply entrenched and negative views about men and male sexuality, and that this keeps men from engaging."

Almost correct again. The deeply entrenched negative views about male sexuality do not prevent men from engaging. They keep men from respecting you or taking you seriously, save of course the sycophants who don't care much what you think as long as they get the chance to tell you they agree with it.

This of course begs the question on what this particular writer is looking for. Is it men to engage in "discussions" about gender and sexuality? Or is it just seeking males who conform to and validate their sick ideas?

There is, as we speak, a great many men (and women) who are more than willing to engage people with deeply entrenched negative views on men and male sexuality. Indeed, men have persisted to engage people with these ideas in the face of a fire-hose of abuse, censorship, yellow journalism, smear campaigns and fraudulent accusations.

Did we mention all this abuse comes from feminists? Did we have to?

This is indicated in widespread use of the acronym for men's rights advocate as an insult. The letters of MRA creatively mapped to "malevolent rotten a-holes".

Comedian Joe Rogan remarked in April 2013 on Twitter:

"The weirdest thing I'm being called is an MRA or "Male Rights Activist" as an INSULT. I mean, why should men have rights? Are they people?"

Returning to the point made at genderequality that they need to, "Create conversations where it's clear that men are going to be honored," we'd like to say something to the author.

After decades of feminists abuse and lies heaped onto men, by people like you, the men you need to reach are happy to ask you to shove your offer to magnanimously hear your lessers, and shove your opinion. When you can see and empathize with why they feel that way, you will have found your missing compassion and love.

It will also earn you a seat at the table here.

You actually can find your way into the discussion that you claim to be seeking. All you have to do is show up with a convincing demonstration that you have corrected your mistakes, and that you have matured enough to become an actual part of the solution.

That kind of accountability and maturity, or rather how far you really are from having it, is demonstrated in the next point in the article:

"Teach men the difference between the level of pleasure they're used to, and the level of pleasure that is possible."

Let's address the most fundamental problem in this imperative.

"Teach men."

Yes, let's invite men into a conversation about sexual politics, honoring and loving them while we do so, from a pulpit built on the arrogance sufficient to assume that feminists qualify to be the instructors of men in a one-way relationship.

Perhaps when they are done with males, they can teach black people how to talk white and not get strung out on crack.

Men are fully capable of sorting out their own experiences of sex. A proposition for instructive feminism to enhance pleasure for men? It is too comical to rise to the level of insulting, but it tries.

Indeed, that the first two points of persuasion listed included the mentions that [1] "Men are used to getting lynched in discussions about sexuality" and [2] that women should teach men "the level of pleasure that is possible" is considerably more revealing than the author likely intended. These are the tools of coercion. First the stick, then the carrot. Or in this case, first the noose, then the vagina.

Moving along to the next item in genderequality's list:

Put the eradication of homophobia near the top of our social change agenda; homophobia is not just about sex, but about a broader fear of male-male intimacy.

We'll start here by mention of the language used in this bullet item. The terms: "eradication" and "social change agenda" stand out.

Noting that the anonymous author is writing from a feminist and (likely) female perspective, what's also increasingly obvious is the authoritarian and totalitarian character of their discourse.

What's admitted truthfully is that "[most] men can't even sit together in a room and have a meaningful conversation about their sexuality with one another."

Unstated is the obvious fact that men engaged in such discourse are routinely shamed and marginalized. But by whom? Who is it in such powerful control of public consensus on matters of sexual identity? Who would even have the power to silence, isolate and shame men for the offense of being human?

This is not to say that there are not some men who, on their own, have an irrational and hostile reaction to homosexuality. Part of that so-called "discussion" we might have with those gender ideologues who so much want to "honor" us might consider that "hypermasculinity" is driven by competition for their holy of holies – because women respond to it. It is the same force that drives men to sell themselves out to gain approval from gender ideologues and other women who hate their guts.

In the article's conclusion the author admits another superficially obvious reality: "[B]ecause we – those of us that advocate gender equality and sexual liberation – almost completely control the debate. Collectively, we can fairly comfortably keep men's issues marginalized, which is what we've been doing."

A couple of obligatory points here. One, those who advocate gender equality and sexual liberation have not had control of the public discourse. Feminists have. Those of us actually practicing what we preach have only just begun to be heard.

Second, those who erroneously think they have complete control of the dialogue just have not noticed that their monopoly has ended.

Or perhaps they do.

Perhaps that article was posted to Reddit, replete with promises of inclusion and honoring their former victims, is part of the growing body of evidence that feminists are trying to adjust to a new world that no longer nods like so many millions of bobble-head dolls whenever they spew factoids and crazy ideas.

Recalling that in commentary about the genderequality article, the author stated "The article is written with a specific target audience in mind – those that think that the problem is men, and men need to change."

Of course this person neglected to notice that the article is saturated with that very idea. It's only appeal will be to people already convinced that "men are the problem," or willing to be convinced if it gets them some approval.

We have a radical idea. It is really, really out there on the fringes. It's an idea so strange it deserves its own website, YouTube channel and FaceBook page with literally dozens of followers:

If you want to get men to get involved in a discussion on "sexuality, gender and relationships," include how men actually experience sexuality, gender and relationships. Not how you want them to tell you they experience those things, not in the tone that best suits or least offends you.

You claim to have been in complete control of the discourse? Fine. If that is true, then shutting up and listing for a while should seem to be a rational and obvious next step. After that, if you can enter a rational discussion with adults, then adults have the habit of responding favorably.

In case it s not obvious, men and women here are already way ahead of you, doing this every day, in ever-increasing numbers. Feminists are welcome to join us in a rational and reasoned debate on the issues, or even to find common ground, but they have chosen not to with remarkable consistency for the six years we have been here. They have, in fact, undermined and even threatened people who sought to establish such a dialog.

Those comfortably keeping "men's issues marginalized," i.e., you, are the problem.

Solutions, solutions, solutions.

The activists and actors of the evolving men's rights movement have been hard at work for decades. However, in a climate of nearly universal censure, vilification and marginalization – it is only in the past few years that MRAs have begun to be heard, or have started to influence the discourse. Concurrently, if feminism were a sound system, we could say it has started blowing speakers.

After so many decades, that must be unnerving, considering public knowledge of the malevolent character of feminism's public myth making.

It might even rattle feminists enough to extend pointless (and wholly unbelievable) olive branches to trust and honor the men they have been crapping on for two generations.

What's also well-known is that feminism also has an established history of co-opting other movements and re-purposing them as vehicles of the feminist narrative, to the detriment of the co-opted group. The modern secular movement and the occupy movements are just two recent but stark examples.

Now that men have a small, but growing public voice – the next feminist project will undoubtedly be to play nice long enough to reclaim their monopoly. Recall that this is the same feminism which still rests of on the writings Solanas and Dworkin, and whose current "respectable" legal activists promote the idea that women should kill men, rather than leave allegedly abusive relationships.

It is very simple. If you want a productive discourse with men that honors all participants, that seeks evidence-based understanding and solutions to problems related to gender, sexuality and relationships, then your solution has a simple but almost miraculously efficacious first step.

Reject feminism as an ideology of hate and start over.

From there you can maybe get therapy or other form of counsel to help you live a life where your compassion and willingness to give fair hearing to the ideas of others; where your valuing of addressing the problems of all people absolutely without lines of division, and where problems are measured by behaviors and not genitals.

In other words, go find your moral compass and let it, not your ideology, lead you back here. If you can do that there is a community of like-minded people waiting here for you. And you will have everything you claim to want.

If you can't, feminists will love you even more for failing.

http://www.genderequality.com.au/1/post/2014/04/sexuality-gender-and-relationships-how-to-get-men-involved-in-the-discussion.html

Black Men First, Then The Rest

AVfM Video Source · 29 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Something many of us at AVfM have maintained for some time now is that most of the negative cultural forces against men in the United States started with the black community (and other minority communities), and spiraled outward from there. This video is sure to infuriate many who watch it, but while we don't have to agree with every single word here, there's more powerful truths here than most in this society would care to admit.

This also goes back to something else we've said many times before: when we stop allowing cultural forces to set men against each other because of race, and men start to come awake to reality and see their shared interests and their shared experiences, social change is going to come. Maybe faster than a lot of people realize.

Subscribe to MRDawson38 for more.

On Feminism's Infantilization of Women

B.R. Merrick · 29 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ladies, I give you Stu, one of AVfM's many old hands. He is going to give it to you hard:

> I have some news for all you whiny women. You become strong by having to endure, and put up with things. You become tolerant by exposure. This is why men are stronger than women to begin with, because we had to be, because we had to do the heavy lifting for ourselves, as well as for you, and the children. You don't become strong, physically, mentally, or emotionally, by having every little thing that annoys you removed, and being protected from the slightest inconvenience… that… is how you grow weak and pathetic. You don't become tolerant by being able to reject or silence, or censor everyone else's view and opinions to protect your delicate little feelings… this is how you become a narrow-minded bigot who thinks your way is the only way that should be allowed… for anybody, not just yourself.
>
> This is what feminism has turned you into. A weak, pathetic, physical, mental, and emotional cripple, who needs to be protected and provided for in every way… and can't even stand a small annoyance without thinking the world must stop and devote its resources to removing that for you.

One hardly needs to say another word. However, I'll endeavor to explain in greater detail how weird it is that someone I've never met wrote exactly what I think.

I shall now reveal what for me is rapidly becoming another operating premise: Humans have always been and will always be inherently and primarily emotional creatures. Eventually, we spout logic in relation to some level of emotional control. Logic and emotional control, however, ought not to be confused with ego, a remarkably sophisticated natural phenomenon visible in various parts of the animal kingdom; that reveals itself in virtually infinite complexity throughout humanity. As I see it, logic tries – or at least ought – to straddle both id and ego. Let's make no mistake about it, however: Id came first and, no pun intended, came hard.

Babies have no logic. If they did, they'd get the fuck out of most households, as I see it. Being a baby is traumatic. There are no words.

What are words? Words are tools used by humans to quickly and efficiently communicate: requests, commands, emotions, artistic expression, emotions, education, debate, emotions, desires, emotions, sociability, warnings, threats, emotions, etc.

Did I mention feelings?

Anyway, back to id-babies: There are no words. Pretend the following is not composed of words and tell me whether you agree if it's safe to assume that this is a general idea of what goes through the id-baby's head:

Pain! Painpainpain Warm Other PLEASE! Pain! Pain!… Pain… pain… warmotherwarmother good… hmm.

Repeat every fifteen minutes from 3 to 4:30 AM. This will go on for a few weeks or months. Much of this will go on in some fashion for years. Much. Are you prepared for it? Where are the limits for you? Why?

Uh oh. Before the hugely emotional feminine creatures reading this think I'm dropping subtle hints about staying barefoot and pregnant, let's change over to talking about working women and their apparent lack of confidence. Let's see if, unlike infants, the pain they experience when enduring at least a portion of each workday in the absence of sexual harassment can be expressed in actual words. Here is an article on "The Confidence Gap" from The Atlantic.

Long, boring story short: The article basically says that tests were done, feelings were felt, and to quickly sum up, women mysteriously have a lack of confidence when it comes to taking on difficult and unfamiliar workplace tasks, and when it comes to positioning for promotion. Because men are more willing to take risks, they are considered to have “too much” self-confidence.

Too much.

Yes. Yes, it is too much. Stop taking risks, breeders. It’s the same as looking at her tits. Anybody seeing the connection to infants?

First Wave women (most of whom were white and middle class) complained until they got the vote. But the complaining didn’t cease. Second Wave women (most of whom are white and middle class) claim to have removed the stigma of women competing in the corporate, imperial work environment. But the complaining hasn’t ceased. Third Wave women (most of whom are white and low class) state that they have “liberated” women from sexual mores by making them into sluts à la Blanche Devereaux. But the complaining continues.

What if it simply goes on ad infinitum? What if there are just too many things to complain about? What if this is what the complaining is actually designed to do, like an infant complains because that is the extent of the infant’s logic? What if the social scientists who proclaim their advocacy for women embrace an ideology that, at its root, sees something “wrong” with society that has to be made “right,” otherwise, we shall experience less “progress”?

Then I can imagine that we will see more reports like this one at Third Age, where we are lectured by women who make more than their husbands that “when men refuse to share child care and household chores despite having slimmer paychecks than their wives, marriages often don’t survive.”

I saw an ABC News report that I can no longer find that said much the same thing. I have never met a husband and father who did not take on a great deal of household work. Much of it centers on the car, the lawn, the driveway, the walkways, the exterior, the roof, the garage, the basement, the machinery, the plumbing, the electricity, the poisonous fumes, the weather, the errands, the kids, the job he has to hold down, the moving of heavy objects, the garbage, getting items off of the high shelves, the diapers, and the finances. Who are these guys who hold down jobs, marriages, and reproduction, who do not contribute a substantial amount?

This is a report that freely admits that for these women, there is no glass ceiling, at least not in their own homes. Yet one woman is allowed to joke about how she’s beginning to feel like an ATM (welcome to Manhood!); and men still need to endure a lecture about how now that their wives are making more, they are expected to work their asses off at home just like their housewives would have. I’m sure.

Now we know the truth: It doesn’t matter. It’s not enough, and obviously will never be. By the way, you have way too much self-esteem about your job, buddy.

How do you spoil a child? Infants know no language. By the time she’s three, she knows the language. Communication on an abstract level is possible. Can she figure it out on her own? Chances are she can. Just ask the late, great John Holt.

We think of spoiled children as being given everything they want as far as expensive toys and clothes. Yet you can find rich kids that are not spoiled. How does spoiling then occur?

By, regardless of whether they’re moneyed or not, giving them everything they want. There’s a difference between being given something expensive as a gift, a reward, or payment for goods or services rendered; and being given the thing simply because you asked, or worse yet, because you threw a tantrum. Children are spoiled because, as Stu correctly pointed out, they do not have to work for it. They do not have to experience failure. They do not survive massive failure. The massive failures are the most important for self-esteem. For God’s sake, you cannot reach maturity without dealing with massive failure multiple times over several years.

This does not mean that a parent should do the exact opposite and deliberately sabotage the “unspoiled” child’s volition. You would expect a tantrum-throwing brat, however, to accuse a suddenly non-gifting parent of doing just that.

Feminism is a sickened ideology run mostly by women who view the world through the “progressive” prism: If they don't see "progress" as they have already narrowly defined it, then the work of changing humanity for the better will not cease. We've had well over a century of "progress" now, but the tantrums will not die down. That is because human nature, to people who think in this manner, is an ugly thing. When ugly people succeed at fulfilling the demand of an individual used to getting her own way (because at some earlier time she felt oppressed), that individual sees an ugly outcome: "It doesn't look right… It's not a high enough percentage… Not enough women agree with me yet."

There will never be enough of a percentage or enough agreement. Feminists do not understand humanity. They do not understand individuality. They do not understand natural processes, like human sexual evolution.

These women do not understand womanhood because they have some different thoughts, ideas, and urges than most women. It doesn't surprise me that, although most lesbians are probably less concerned with feminism, many prominent feminists are lesbians; being gay in a society that has done nothing but denigrate and silence her views can galvanize a gal. I can see such an individual, with perhaps a few more traditionally masculine qualities, being less disposed for anything approaching traditional womanhood. The pain of believing you have to stay silent can easily be projected onto an unaccepting society that needs to change its collective mind so that such an individual can feel safer.

And then there's Björk. I have no idea what her politics are (I keep hoping that someone who talks about music schools like she does has no politics at all), but I can tell you that such a free-thinking artist has no need for infantilizing social norms. Her album Vespertine was culled from spending days on end indoors while the sky is dark in Iceland, making noises with odds and ends around her house. She would record them, then use them in her electronically complex music, most of which she would write herself, or in collaboration with any number of male musicians. On occasion, she writes songs referencing her vagina. Weird.

And then there's Julia Margaret Cameron, the great British photographer who started her career at the tender age of 48: "By the coercive force of her eccentric personality, she enlisted everyone around her as models, from family members to domestic servants and local residents [emphasis mine]." Another weirdo.

And then there's Laurie Anderson, a bizarre yet successful performance artist who, as is clear in this Cameron-like photograph, made the very end of Lou Reed's life worth probably every single hurt he ever had. And then there's Oprah Winfrey. And Madonna. And Camille Paglia.

The list of individual women who don't quite fit in, or who stand out as having accomplished something extraordinary, is quite long if one is paying attention. How do you get to such a level of expressive success if you are handed what you ask for?

Just read some of the quotes in this HuffPo article from famous women, one of them Björk, concerning feminism and the supposed lack of its influence on the hard knocks they undoubtedly suffered in the brutally competitive entertainment industry, which knocks surely included little to no reward for endless hard work, and on top of that, waiting for lightning to strike:

> No, I wouldn't say feminist – that's too strong. I think when people hear feminist, it's like, 'Get out of my way, I don't need anyone.' I love that I'm being taken care of and I have a man that's a leader*. I'm not a feminist in that sense* [emphasis mine]. – Kelly Clarkson (a tradcon?)
>
> I don't really think about things as guys versus girls. I never have. I was raised by parents who brought me up to think if you work as hard as guys, you can go far in life [emphasis mine]. – Taylor Swift
>
> I'm not a feminist. I hail men, I love men, I celebrate American male culture – beer, bars, and muscle cars. – Lady Gaga, who apparently later told the LA Times she is a "little bit of a feminist."
>
> [I don't identify as a feminist] because I think it would isolate me. I think it's important to do positive stuff. It's more important to be asking than complaining…
>
> And if you complain once more, you'll meet an army of me. – Björk (Okay, the second one's not a quote from > the article, but hardly a coincidence, eh?)

>
> I'm not a feminist, I'm a humanist. – Madonna

By the way, did you ever see where that last one lived when she was trying to hit it big in New York? Sharing a bathroom in a building full of down-and-outs, rationing snacks from a local deli, and dancing her little ass off at Martha Graham's studio. Speaking of Graham: There's another oddball who didn't need a women's movement, and who remained largely misunderstood and under-appreciated during her lifetime, while she almost single-handedly invented modern dance.

No one handed it to a single one of these women. I never heard a story of a single man holding a single one of these women back. Every last one of them put herself out there and got smacked in the face on a regular basis. (Martha Graham had to figuratively give the finger to an Italian audience once.) If they didn't, you never would have heard of any of them. They'd be in a middle-of-the-road, middle class existence with a couple of kids, a divorce or two, a mortgage, and a boring-as-fuck office job. This is called settling. There's nothing wrong with settling, as long as you own up to it if that's what you're doing.

Feminists don't understand the details of success. There is no meaningful success that does not follow on the lessons of massive, unjust failures. Feminists continue to blame phantom social forces and an ephemeral evil lurking within masculinity, even as every social force, every political movement, and a seemingly endless supply of masculine souls have kowtowed to the vocalized wishes of women for a century. Consequently, modern women in general are spoiled, and rottenly so.

This is always what happens when children are given whatever they want whenever it is requested: they are almost totally unprepared for when life will, without any coercion on the part of any other human, overwhelm the senses with burdens that come from angles and dimensions never considered. There will undoubtedly be feelings felt, and a subsequent subornation of rational thought. Worse yet, the spoiled that are unjustly made to suffer by the universe will not see natural cause and effect. This ensures that when the unstoppable shit hits the spinning fan, the fetid results will bring out more complaints, and the one that can always be relied on to be more visible by virtue of physical action will be expected to perform. When he fails, or when the memory of the honored requests has faded out of spoiled feminine habit, we can expect the banshees to wail again. And again. And again. And again. And again.

This is yet one more reason why Men Going Their Own Way is such a good thing: The requestee is absent. The requestor will have to look elsewhere: to her sisters, or inside herself. The five senses, with the mind acquiring information at a rapid pace, will develop: ideas, thoughts, reflections, emotions, and Socratic processes galore. It's going to go off in a different direction with each one of them.

No more time for social movements. Time to get hands dirty with oil, grease, calluses, cuts, bruises, writer's cramp, carpal tunnel, and paint. Long past time to stay late at the office, past 8:30. If the car breaks down on the way to an appointment, get on your smart phone and smarten up.

> We won't save you. Your rescue squad is too exhausted. – Björk again

Sadly, ladies, it's the only way to grow up. You live in a world with occasional harassers and rapists, both male and female. Focusing on a handful of nasty sorts and assigning them all the same sex has distracted you, for decades, from reality. This is one of many reasons why I detest the phrase "reality television." The complaints your empire is teaching you to have will not help you a single, teeny, tiny, little bit when life's metaphorical tornado comes along and flattens everything you were building. The universe invented tornadoes, not The Patriarchy.

It is easier than at any previous time in human history for a female to start her own business, take up a new hobby, or make an instant online friend. It is incredibly easy for a modern woman to lie to a cop about a man, ruin that man's life, and never suffer the consequences. You are far less likely to be imprisoned, or to receive harsher punishment. There is federal funding in the millions geared to helping you live longer and healthier by virtue of your sex. Schools are bending over backwards to admit you. Boys are raised not to hit girls. I can assure you, ladies, whatever you're complaining about… shut up.

…and get to work. – Björk gets the final word.

What role has feminism played in the shooting at Fort Hood and its aftermath?

Michael Conzachi · 30 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Now that I got your attention, I will state that feminism did not have a direct effect on the tragic events that occurred on Wednesday at Fort Hood Texas. I will not go to the extremist extent of blaming every tragic event on feminism, however there are some things that you should consider.

First of all, everyone within the MHRM & Community is deeply saddened by the tragic events and the senseless loss of life. My comments here are based on the various news reports, interpretation of the information available up to this point, comments from some military members including some assigned to Fort Hood, and my own experiences.

When scenarios such as this occur, many form opinions based on less than the facts. There are the usual calls for gun control, and comments about mental health issues and PTSD. The readers should be aware that not everyone who seeks out counseling services in the military does so because they suffer from PTSD. In fact, the Army and the other branches make psychological counseling available for all of their members, especially those who have served in combat areas. Simply seeking out counseling in the military does not automatically mean that someone is suffering from PTSD.

Let's start with what we know. On Wednesday, Army Specialist Ivan Lopez opened fire killing three and wounding 16 before he took his own life. News media reports indicate that one of his grievances was the fact that the Army had only allowed him two days leave to bury his mother. Whether or not we will ever learn his true motives is unknown.

Staying with that thought, let's consider this. Numerous directives from the Pentagon and the Defense Advisory Committee on Women in the Services (DACOWITS), of which some in the military refer to the group as the "Super-Feminists" or jokingly, the "Lesbo Circle of Doom," allow for and promote an immediate leave period of five days for same sex military couples to marry. There are numerous articles that anyone can find on the Internet on that subject.

Keeping that thought in mind. How is it that a large contingent of feminist dominated military and Pentagon leadership enacts policies that favor, prioritize, and give expanded benefits for same sex couples; yet Specialist Lopez apparently was only allowed two days to bury his mother?

If that was you, and you could only get two days to attend to your mother's death, and you see same sex military couples being allowed five days immediate leave to marry; wouldn't that bother you a little, regardless of what your opinions are of gay and same sex couples? Where is the equality?

There is so much information that is out there on the same sex couple, gay, lesbian, and transgender issue in the military, that the articles cannot be counted. If anyone is interested, all you have to do is to Google the names of the DACOWITS and Pentagon members and include the word "gay" in the search terms and there are literally thousands of articles on that subject matter.

The issue of Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder is problematic in the military and many in Congress have advocated for more resources to address this problem, but the reality is that the issue of same sex couples, gays, and women in combat are at the top of the list of priorities of many in military leadership and advisory positions.

There is another interesting fact that has come about as a result of this shooting.

As the news reports and press conferences have indicated; Specialist Lopez was confronted by a female military police officer. The news reports have not yet stated whether this female military police officer is part of the Military Police Corps or if she was part of the civilian Fort Hood Police.

I can only speculate as to what occurred in those few moments before Lopez took his own life. The Fort Hood Commanding General's news conference and various news reports indicate that this female police officer suddenly encountered Lopez and that they were approximately 20 feet away from each other. The news reports reveal that the female police officer, "engaged" Lopez, but initially did not define what they meant by "engaged."

It had been reported that the female officer ordered Lopez to raise his hands and he initially complied, raising his hands above his head. Lopez then lowered his hands, removed his firearm from his waistband area, put the gun to his head and shot himself, ending his life. It had also been reported that the officer fired one round and apparently that round missed. When or at what point this occurred is unknown.

I conducted an initial Google search on this incident and found over 320,000 articles describing the actions of this female police officer as "heroic" and "hero" and "heroic cop" and various other similar descriptions. Some of the questions from some of the reporters at the various news conferences revolved around the "female officer" and the "heroic female cop."

Contrary to the ogling by the news media of the actions of the "heroic" female cop, before the facts are known, there were only 68,000 Google hits and less than two dozen articles that mentioned the actions of 19 year veteran Sergeant First Class Danny Ferguson who died in the shooting. SFC Ferguson had multiple combat deployments since 2001.

SFC Ferguson attempted to block an unlocked door to prevent Lopez from entering a room where a number of soldiers had taken refuge, and whose lives were sparred. SFC Ferguson was shot four times through the door and died of his wounds. Many have called his actions heroic and they are, as a number of lives were saved. Sadly, the number of articles and press attention given to SFC Ferguson pales in comparison to the attention and articles on the actions of the so called "heroic" female officer. That is just one example of heroism in this tragic event, as many others displayed heroic actions, but I wonder if we will hear of them.

Getting back to the female officer that the press has gone gaga over, and taking into consideration my own experiences of being in similar situations, I have a number of questions.

If, as the reports claim that the female officer was within a distance of 20 feet of Lopez and at some time she fired at least one round at him and missed, I would question any male or female's firearms proficiency. I can't completely vilify this officer as I was not there and am not privy to the facts. I can say however that being 20 feet from an armed suspect is actually very close and someone with basic law enforcement training should have hit their target.

Secondly, the reports claim that Lopez had raised his hands above his head when ordered to do so, then lowered his hands and was able to remove his weapon from his waist area, put the gun to his head and pulled the trigger. All of those actions take a significant period of time.

Would a male officer immediately close that gap with Lopez and engage him in a physical confrontation, or fire his weapon enough times and accurately to neutralize the threat? I don't know.

In my extensive training and experience in dealing with knife wielding suspects, a person wielding a knife can close a gap of 27-30 feet and stab an officer before that officer can react quickly enough to pull his weapon from his holster and engage the suspect, and that is with having your hands at waist level.

The point being is that officer, or any officer would know that distance and physics would dictate that in a distance of 20 feet, it is possible to physically knock down an assailant. Again I can only speculate, but one thing that is fact is the vast number of articles of the so called "heroic" female officer and the mainstream press' infatuation with her actions, even before the facts are known.

So the questions I pose are; is there a priority in the Pentagon and military leadership of gay, lesbian, same sex couple, and anti-rape training issues, over issues of psychological treatment of military members and veterans? Is there a mainstream news media rush to judgment and glorification of the actions of a female police officer, even before the facts are learned?

I think we can safely say that the answer to both of those questions would be yes.

The mainstream media has been quick to call upon the PTSD mantra, the gun mantra, and the “heroic” actions of a female law enforcement officer, before all of the facts are known. I think it reveals the cultural mind-set of many in the media that just based on the fact that a military member seeks out psychological services, who has been in a deployment area is some type of crazed maniac.

In this case that might be true, but it may also be true that Specialist Lopez’ actions may involve many components including the trauma of losing his mother and the apparent indifference, and inability of being allowed to properly address that issue in his life.

When these tragic events happen, we have to look at all of the facts, including those facts that some would rather not be revealed. There is usually a cumulative effect of stress, a number of factors and events that led up to an individual going overboard. Let’s consider those events as well.

One thing is certain however, and that is the absolute love affair with the reporting the so called heroic actions of a female law enforcement officer. Her actions may be heroic and we may know that in time, but would the press have reported this event in the same light if it was a male officer who confronted Specialist Lopez?

Are the military’s priorities of same sex couple, gay, and women in combat issues harmful to males in general?

I think those are good questions.

We’ll see if we get some answers.

Feature image from Wikipedia Commons

$3,000 for Danielle D'Entremont's Elusive Assailant – Where Are The Feminists?

John Hembling (JtO) · 30 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For those who might have forgotten, it was March 26, 2014 – that Danielle D'Entremont alerted the world to just how rough and physically dangerous it is to be a campus feminist, or even a woman at a Canadian university in the modern age of misogyny.

Danielle alerted the world with a Facebook message and an uploaded selfie – showing a chipped tooth, and a visible bruise, high on the side of her face.

[image]
Danielle D'Entrement's facebook selfie
She reported that she had been : "punched in the face multiple times and lost half my tooth. This was after a few threatening emails regarding my support for feminist activities on campus. Take care of yourselves and try not to go out alone."

Despite our oppositional point of view to much of feminist ideology and rhetoric, the attack came as a shocking illustration to the shockable among us within the men's human rights movement – just how much constant peril women endure, both on university campuses, as well as ever-present danger throughout every other avenue of life in Canada. Other places too, probably. Cough.

In the ensuing media hoopla following the uploaded selfie, mainstream and campus media freely speculated that the alleged assault was committed by one or more men's rights advocates – such as those who had allegedly already sent threatening emails to D'Entremont. The names of such sinister senders, undoubtedly now known to the Kingston police, have not yet been made public. Obviously, the investigation cannot be compromised by such details yet.

Canadian men's human rights activists were so horrified by the horrendous assault and accompanying Facebook selfie that Men's Rights Canada's Attila Vinczer organized a thousand dollar public reward for information leading to the arrest of D'Entremont's alleged attacker, as well as a cross Canada postering campaign alerting the public of the attack, and of the offered reward.

Shortly afterwards, AVfM offered a further thousand, doubling the reward for information leading to the arrest of D'Entremont's alleged attacker.

Today, the Canadian Association for Equality published a press release, adding another thousand dollars to the reward money. Together, these three organizations, cash-starved and under funded as they are, have a standing reward of $3,000 (Canadian) for information leading to the arrest of D'Entremont's alleged attacker.

Physical violence is something we have long condemned, and whatever alleged person allegedly committed this alleged assault must be found and charged.

Interestingly, as these rewards have been accumulating for the past month, and while D'Entremont's alleged attacker remains allegedly at large, no feminist organization at all has contributed or offered any campaign or award for information about Danielle's alleged attacker.

Of Canada's many, many feminist organizations, some are publicly funded, and others have very deep charitable and Non-Government Organization (NGO) pockets indeed. But none have contributed to efforts to locate D'Entremont's's alleged attacker, nor have any offered additional reward money for information which might lead to the arrest of her alleged attacker.

It is almost as if Canadian feminist organizations believe – callously and cynically – that no such attack took place. That no effort or money whatsoever has been offered or expended by feminists in locating D'Entremont's alleged attacker, it is almost as if Canadian feminists believe the Facebook selfie and claim of multiple punches to the face were made up by the young campus feminist.

In fact, a particularly jaded commentator might even speculate that feminists cruelly believe D'Entremont may have gotten herself drunk, and fallen off a toilet, hitting her face on the cubicle wall – then later uploaded a selfie to Facebook in a poorly conceived bid for attention and sympathy.

But surely, no feminist would ever be so cynical that they would think such a thing of a fellow feminist. Female victims don't lie; this is a well-known fact.

However, the lack of effort or monetary reward from feminist organizations for the arrest of D'Entremont's alleged attacker remains puzzling.

Now that CAFE has increased the offered reward money (to date, in total between all organizations) to 3,000 dollars, we are sure D'Entremont's alleged attacker will materialize soon. Real soon now, we're sure.

Jezebel, Feministing, Manboobz, Bitch Magazine, Ms. Magazine, National Organization for Women, National Council of Women of Canada, Women's Studies groups, Canadian Federation of Students, Canadian Feminist Alliance for International Action (FAFIA)–you're going to be stepping up to help match the reward money and assist with the investigation soon, right?

Right?

We're sure you all will, real soon now.
We thank you all for your kind attention.

Humanist Counter-Theory of Primitive and Strict Religious Cultures

Ali Mehraspand · 30 April 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
"Love" by Shabab Golchin
Authors Note: This text does not seek to advocate or defend any cultures, religions, etc. It should be obvious that critical analysis of a culture is not the same as embracing it.

Physical sciences are very fascinating. Their approach to understanding the world that may not match their preconceptions is simple: Find theories that explain the phenomena that have been observed. Validation of a theory is then based on its ability to predict the result of experiments. If a phenomenon is observed that does not fall in line with the theories, that phenomenon will not be marginalized, the theories will be replaced instead.

But social "sciences" can get so tainted with bias that an endeavor at capturing different phenomena with a theory can tend toward shrinking all phenomena down into the theory at hand. This same thing has happened with feminism: the "Patriarchy" theory can in fact explain a portion of some social dynamics. But there are many phenomena in total in total contradiction with the Patriarchy theory. But instead of acknowledging the need to replace this theory, Patriarch Theoriests have reduced three arguments to explain away all discrepancies:

1. Patriarchy hurts men too.
2. Those women are bargaining with the patriarchy.
3. In a patriarchy, women have internalized hatred of themselves.

If one entertains the possiblity that these ideas belong in the trash can, the disequilibrium drives rational people to searching for a Humanist counter-theory: the notion that men and women equally build a society, and that cost/benefit arrived at by consensus drives most cultural forces.

In the search for such a counter-theory, this article examines some phenomena that have, so far, been in total authority of feminist theories; "Patriarchy" is the accepted theory for all of them, by most people. These phenomena concerning traditional and primitive cultures have, until now, been used to dismiss any doubting of the Patriarchy Theory. But let's look at them with a more humanist counter-theory, that assumes people create cultures, not just men:

I – Polygamy

In order to resolve the many fallacies around this phenomenon consider the following scenario:

There are 8 men and 8 women and enough food for only 13 people, which means that three people will die of starvation. So, order and number men with their status from top to bottom so that the richest man is numbered one and the poorest is numbered eight. With polygamy in the picture, one can expect that four women will marry the man number one, and four will marry the man number two. This way no matter how hard they work, it is guaranteed that the three people starved to death are men numbered six to eight–who of course had no potential mates either.

Many look at the broad sexual horizon a polygamous man has in comparison to his wives, while they never consider that the difference between their quality of life might be coming from the fact that the man came from the upper-class and the women came from the lower-class. But the sort of person who inserts herself into this scenario as a rich woman might feel oppressed–if she disregards the many lower-status single men as available to her as mates, and if she disregards the many lower-status women that benefit from polygamy.

As an example, in the United Arab Emirates, many women are campaigning that the government should make polygamy easier for men, and they object to men who will not marry more than one wife, because these women claim that men rejecting polygamy increases spinsterhood!

Furthermore, this is far from the first time somebody has lookedat polygamy as unfairly beneficial to women and harmful to men. For example, 6th Century Iran: one of the most polygamous cultures to ever live. The Sassanid dynasty of the Persian Empire was extremely powerful, while classism was raging throughout the nation. The son of a blacksmith was only allowed to be a blacksmith, and the son of a peasant would always be a peasant and deprived of education. The only way somebody could change the class they were born into was by the institution of marriage.

A man named Mazdak did the impossible: his rebellious doctrines in many areas mostly opposing classism brought a revolution in less than thirty years. One of his pivotal beliefs was to oppose polygamy; his ideas of free love triggered some of his followers to go as far as suggesting that women should consider having several husbands. Mazdak believed that polygamy had given women the opportunity to leave their peer-status men, so that men from the same lower classes as them would still have work hard just so as to send the fruits up to the new higher class these women had married into. These lower-class men also never had a chance for sexual activity. In the end, Mazdak and several thousand of his followers were arrested and murdered in a day[1].

How about polygamy today, in the modern world? It is essential before extension of these concepts to point out how much effort has been put to exaggerate how widespread this phenomenon really is; any think that men as a norm have several wives in certain parts of the world. So what is the actual number of polygamous men in Saudi Arabia, which perhaps is the most polygamous country on Earth?

By studying the 2007 demographic survey report of the Ministry of Economy and Planning of Saudi Arabia, in Table 17 we find that the number of married men in Saudi Arabia is 3,251,091. The number of married women is 3,271,913. It is easily deduced from these two numbers that the number of polygamous men is under 0.64% and over 0.21% of married men (That would be less than 0.38% of men of age group of over 15 and over 0.12%) [2].

With a sharp eye, one can confirm the concepts put forth earlier. Because in this same table we find the following for the age group of over 15:

Number of men: 5,542,684

Number of divorced men: 45,371

Number of widowed men: 23,596

Number of women: 5,438,584

Number of divorced women: 128,095

Number of widowed women: 292,899 (Compare with widowed men to see male disposability.)

With all of these numbers one can easily determine that the number of men over 15 who have never been married is 40.1% whereas the number of women over 15 who have never been married is 32.1%. These numbers show similar trends for any age groups; for example for the age groups of over 30 the numbers are 40.04% for men and 33.12% for women.

Now in a culture where sex is not available outside marriage, these numbers show that there are more men who cannot ever get married than women.

But all the debate around this subject is about women's spinsterhood. Remember, many women of Saudi Arabia think that men refusing polygamy is the reason for their spinsterhood–as opposed to their own hypergamy, their desire to marry only upper-class men.

[image]
Saudi women asking married men to marry them too–four fingers means four wives allowed per man!
Since lower-status women of rural areas are more prone to get involved in a polygamous marriage, the lower-status men of their village are left with no potential mates. The numbers discussed above support this theory quite well.

Now let us hunt for the fallacies people have to accept regarding polygamy, if they believe it is all about "Patriarchy" (i.e. men's supposed domination and power over women):

1. They are confusing classism with sexism.
2. They are ignoring the element of hypergamy.
3. They lack understanding of finite sets.
4. They disregard how the population had outpaced the necessities of life for most of history.
5. They disregard women's agency.
6. They prioritizing crotch over stomach in the face of famine.
7. They are blind to the many men who have zero sexual horizon.

II – Sexual What?

Feminism often claims to have sexually liberated women. Putting aside the fact that feminism is not in the top ten reasons for sexual liberation, especially in bipolar Islamic cultures, the concept of sexual "liberation" of women indicates a period of sexual captivity of women (apparently at the hands of the patriarchy). The hijab for instance looks like a great example of it. The implicit notion here is that men (as captors), coerce women into sexual captivity.

So why it is mostly men who rebel against sexual restrictions in traditional and especially Islamic cultures? And why it is mostly women who promote it? That is in total violation of "Patriarchy" theory but this is precisely the case: it is women far more than men who support these restrictive dress codes and mores.

Restricting sex to within marriage and placing the role of provision onto men creates a complicated dynamic wherein structural sexual restraint by women equals more pressure on men to provide. Roughly speaking it means that sexual starvation of men, and its inevitable dual response (sexual possession of women) are entangled with the life-necessitating labor of men.

First law of economics: A decrease in supply increases the price. If sex, a central desire of human life, is only "rewarded" to a man if he has qualified for it economically, there will be no bound to how much labor you can access. Just let the human greed take over and you will see women themselves extremely actively taking part in sexual restraint. This is the building block of hypergamy, the desire of women to increase their status by marrying high-status men. Hypergamy herein does not only mean the inclination to marry up, but is an indicator of the differing expectation of the genders, driven by sexual politics.

[image]

As a result, this counter-theory predicts that "sexual liberation" of women in a primitive culture (such as a tribe living several hundred years ago) leads to men not having to go through the test of hypergamy, which actually liberates men from labor. Interestingly, most animals are not monogamous and in most species, a male might provide one meal at most to copulate. Would it not make more sense for a "patriarchy" to reward its men with several women for the same labor, rather than just one?

As mentioned above, hypergamy is more powerful in sexually-restricted cultures. This is why in Islamic laws, a woman does not even have to do housework; it is the man's responsibility to hire housekeepers. A woman according to Islamic laws does not have to breastfeed her own children either; it is her husband's responsibility to hire a lactating woman to feed his children.

It should not need explanation but physical labor for survival in the deserts of Saudi Arabia might not have been as fun as a job in an office with air conditioner, but how these laws managed to favor women under such conditions show how our counter-theory has been at work. It is not a bad idea to review the numbers discussed under polygamy; 30% spinsters in Saudi Arabia for 40% male bachelors. A powerful hypergamy also creates a bigger age gap for married couples for obvious reasons.

One related subject is clothing restrictions on women, which is most ridiculously discussed in feminist circles frequently in connection with “patriarchy” and “male domination.” But the underlying dynamics which had led to hijab are essentially those mentioned above.

In reality, in these cultures, girls who tamper with hijab, or refuse it, are most popular among men. The first thing many women do when they notice a man staring at them, however, is to reach their veil to cover more of their hair. And, more importantly, it is mostly women themselves who stick their noses into how other women dress. Note in the following video that the only person who objects to the girl with no veil is a woman in Chador. (This sort of dressing is illegal in Iran.)

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Bda1n8A7Bx0

As must be evident from the law of economics mentioned above, a traditional woman wants hijab for other women to improve the price of her own sexuality. Whereas a man wants every woman out of hijab–save maybe his own wife.

This by the way is probably why traditional women hate prostitutes (and any girl who does not comply with the dressing code for that matter) so much; because prostitutes literally cash in hypergamy and by doing so, lower the price of sex by adding to the supply. (The newer versions of gynocentrists, i.e. feminists, also hate prostitution and pornography for that matter.) In this regard it must be mentioned that a study has recently found that women respond to a commercial with sexually explicit content more negatively if the price of the commodity is cheaper.

A lot more can be said about all this, but explanation of a lot of phenomena by this counter-theory, including why men’s sexuality is seen as predatory, will be left for later. But most who promote hijab insult men’s sexuality, and insinuate that women’s body is too precious for men to see. Muslim men used to be raised to keep their “innate animal desires” in check and not to look at the overlord women, who by the way have the absolute power to commit violence by proxy just by pointing their finger at a man she is angry with, and other men will land blows upon him as if from the sky.

Finally it is worthwhile to mention that feminists have felt the decline in price of the vagina as a result of “sexual liberation” of women. It is fascinating to watch the pitiful attempts of the so-called third wave feminists who politely ask women to “know their worth” and not sleep with “no-bodies” so as to keep the price high.

III – Confusing Religionism with Sexism

Amusingly, except for very strictly religious men, males in Islamic cultures generally love to see women without hijab, which is the key point here: confusion of the existent religionism with the imaginary sexism. Meanwhile, many non-religious or secularist women feel the restrictions of a theocracy and confuse it with the restrictions of a non-existent Patriarchy.

If the highly religious (which by the way always includes more women than men) rule, the reality of a theocracy at most is oppression of people (the non-religious) by people (the highly religious). However, by considering only how women are affected, “people oppressing people” becomes “people oppressing women.” The next step to helping to ignore the oppression of the men is to show only instances where a man exercises the power, and people oppressing women becomes men oppressing women. This is what happens when a narrow world-view tries to explain something bigger and more complex than their theories will allow.

Conclusion

This is how the feminist conception of “Patriarchy Theory” looks:

[image]

But given all that we have said here, does this theory truly make sense?

[1] Mehdi Naghavi, S. A., “Historical and Materialistic Analysis of Mazdak’s Doctrines”, Ph,D Dissertation, University of Tehran, The Atai Press, Tehran.

[2] “Population and Housing Characteristics in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia”, p. 79, Demographic Survey 1428 H., 2007 .

That Guy T: Three Recent Feminist Outrages

AVfM Video Source · 1 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We were happy to discover a promising new YouTuber commenting on sexual politics: That Guy T!

You should subscribe to That Guy T.

Endocrine Disruptors: Are Our Boys and Men at Risk?

Paul Elam · 1 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following article is another example of a problem that impacts boys and men considerably more than women and girls. The difference is that this problem does not seem to be a result of feminism, gynocentrism, or our white knight legislators. This is a result of our lifestyle, our corporations, and our biology.

The sad truth is that we are living in a world that is saturated by chemicals that mimic human hormones. These chemicals have been dubbed "Endocrine Disruptors" since their mimicking confuses and throws off the delicate balance of our human endocrine system. EDC's as they are called, (endocrine disrupting chemicals) are all around us. They are in our streams, our lakes, our grocery stores, our carpeting, our lawns, our cars, in the food we eat, in our toothpaste, soaps, plastics and just about everywhere you look. Most of these are derivatives of fossil fuels, often plastics. They are in fertilizers, pesticides, even the byproducts of pills like birth control pills, This stuff is everywhere.

But what is the big deal? Why get hyped up about these small amounts of chemicals?

The informative endocrinedisruption.org web site states that "Endocrine disrupting chemicals (EDCs) interfere with hormone signaling in a variety of ways depending on the chemical and the hormone system." They go on to state that "biomonitering of chemicals in the blood and urine has shown that 100% of the people tested have EDC's in their bodies." So this is not about someone else, this is about you and me.

This is not a small dilemma. The same web site states that EDC's have been implicated in neurological diseases, reproductive disorders, thyroid dysfunction, immune and metabolic disorders and more. But guess what? These chemicals impact boys and men considerably more than they do girls and women. Look at the list of problems that are thought to be related to EDC's and males: ADHD, autism, learning disabilities, delayed puberty, hypospadias, obesity, early testicular cancer, male dysgenisis syndrome, prostate cancer and more. Almost all of these problems have been growing each year. ADHD has been increasing by 3% each year since 1997 and 5% a year since 2003. Many scientists are starting to believe that EDC's are a part of this problem.

Imagine the havoc you could wreak if you started taking hormones into your body, you could throw off a very delicate balance of a finely tuned system by increasing the amount of one hormone or another. Imagine we started giving boys and girls additional estrogen on a daily basis. What do you think would happen? It would likely confuse their biological system and throw the normal process into chaos. Right. This is a crude description of what is happening in our world today. Both boys and girls are exposed to substances (EDC's) that mimic estrogen (most EDC's mimic estrogen or in some cases block testosterone) and these substances are throwing off the natural balance of the endocrine system. But these are in such small amounts, you wouldn't think they would be that harmful, right? Wrong.

The endocrine system is extraordinarily sensitive. In fact, it is amazing. It makes decisions based on infinitesimal amounts of hormones that are released in the body. One of the pioneers in understanding Endocrine Disrupters is Theo Colburn, PhD. Listen to the way she describes things in her book Our Stolen Future "The endocrine system is so fine-tuned that it depends on changes in hormones in concentrations of a tenth of a trillion of a gram to control the womb environment. That's as inconspicuous as one second in 3,619 centuries." This is why it is so critical to worry over even tiny amounts of chemicals around us that mimic hormones. A tiny amount can cause big problems.

The place those tiny amounts can cause the biggest difficulties is in the womb. It's a contained environment that is controlled by minute amounts of hormones. Developmental actions and processes are started and stopped in the womb by these tiny amounts of hormones. If the mother has EDC's in her system from the food she eats, the soft plastic raincoat she wears or drinking from plastic bottles this can cause difficulties to the infant in utero. This is obliviously the most vulnerable time since fetal development is often related to minute changes in hormone levels.

If you have substances in utero that throw off that sensitive balance by mimicking natural hormones you can have permanent damage to the fetus.

Then shortly after birth the infant may be less vulnerable but is often subject to plastic bottles from which they drink warm liquid, plastic pacifiers they suck on, or a huge array of other ways to ingest EDC's. Have you ever taken a swig of water out of a clear plastic bottle that had gotten warm in the sun? When you did, did it taste plasticky? What you were tasting was the endocrine disrupters that had been released from the plastic when heated. You just got a dose of estrogen.

Theo Colburn calls EDC's the "stealth" chemicals and for good reason. The government has been testing for cancer producing agents for some time but the tests needed to evaluate a possible endocrine disrupter are much more subtle. With 12,000 new chemicals entered into our country every day it would be an overwhelming task to keep tabs on them all. This means that many of the endocrine disrupters are probably going under the radar. The EPA has been mandated to test for EDC's for some time but has dragged its feet to such a degree that law suits have been filed to force them to do so. According to Colburn the corporations are spending mega-bucks to keep this quiet. They have a huge investment in their products and seem more concerned about their profit than about human suffering.

So how does this stuff manifest?

Scientists were shocked to find that male alligators at a lake in Florida had shriveled testicles and genitals. The gators also showed high levels of female hormones. What was going on? They struggled to figure it out and ultimately came to the conclusion that these poor gators had been victims of EDC's from the pesticide DDE that had found its way into the lake. These chemicals had created chaos in the male gators and their genitals proved it.

Male fish are also taking a hit from EDC's. Many fish across the country are now swimming in water that has higher levels of EDC's. Fish tend to have their sex determined by the levels of hormones in their bodies. When the hormones are at a certain level that fish will be male, when it is at a different level it will be a female. So now we have fish swimming in water that is higher and higher with EDC's that mimic estrogens and guess what happens? The EDC's impact the males in a profound manner. They turn the males into non-descript fish that has genitalia that is a bizarre mix of male and female. It is the male fish that have been seen showing the bizarre genitalia, sometimes the male fish will grow eggs instead of testes! What a mess.

But what about humans?

One of the suspected connections with EDC's is that of changing the timing of puberty for both boys and girls. Girls onset of puberty has been steadily getting younger and younger. It used to be that girls would enter puberty around 11-12 years old with boys lagging about a year after them. But now guess what is happening? Girls are entering puberty when they are 9 years old on average and even younger in the black community. At the same time the boys puberty is becoming delayed. Many experts are thinking the EDC's mimicking estrogens plays a part in this.

Human males also seem to be taking the hardest hit from the EDC's. American boys today are three times more likely to be born with genital abnormalities then boys 30 years ago. The frequency of smaller then normal penis's, hypospadias, and undescended testes are all examples of this.

Scientists are also thinking that the drop in testosterone levels of boys and men in the past 30 years may also be due to the EDC's. A 35 year old man today has 20% of testosterone of a 35 year old man 30 years ago. Men just aren't like they used to be…

Leonard Sax points out that the bone strength of boys seems to be deteriorating. Boys today are nearly twice as likely to break bones as boys were 30 years ago and many are thinking this is related to lowered bone density due to EDC's. It seems at the same time that girls bone density may be going up. Go figure.

The only good news is that we do have some power in limiting our exposure to EDC's. Eating whole foods that are unprocessed, eating organic foods that have not been exposed to pesticides, wearing clothes are have not been treated with chemicals, and on and on. We all need to become more informed about this problem, especially when it comes to women who are thinking about getting pregnant. For more information on EDC's you can find some great information on youtube. Here's a start but I would urge you to google it and see what you find.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Some beginning resources:

Theo Colburn, PhD. has done a video titled the Endocrine Disruptors, The Male Predicament. It is a quick introduction to this problem from the scientist who first named the problem back in the 1990's. <7 minutes

Theo Colburn – Endocrine Disruption: Are Males at Risk? < 48minutes

PBS FRONTLINE HORMONE DISRUPTERS / XENOESTROGENS < 4 minutes

Theo Colburn reads letter to the white house about EDC's < 18 minutes
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

AVFM's Attorney Responds to Dina Mackney's Threats

Paul Elam · 1 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As regular readers of this site will know, we were sent a demand letter from an attorney instructing us to remove a portion of a suicide note written by Christopher Mackney and posted online just before he took his own life.

Our immediate decision was in line with how we have normally handled law firms and others who threaten us for practicing freedom of speech. We post their letter to us, and our response to it.

While it does not change our course of action at all, it does behoove us to count on something other than our own tenacity and dedication to see us through times like this. Fortunately we don't have to. The Randazza Legal Group, who has provided us with invaluable services in the past, has taken the official legal reins on this case and is representing us with Dina Mackney's attorneys.

A letter went out today to that law firm, and there is no reason it should not be shared with the many AVFM readers and contributors who support the activism conducted from this website.

It is obvious to me that the Randazza Legal Group understands our position and will serve our interests vigorously and professionally in whatever comes to pass from this egregious attempt to obliterate Chris Mackney's final words and thoughts.

We are going to fight this, wherever it goes.

RLG letter

A note to readers/commenters. Publishing personal information about anyone involved in this case that includes addresses, names of employers, email addresses, social media accounts or any other information that might result in harassment will be removed and the users IP address will be banned forever from this website.

KSUM 2014 Spring Report

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 1 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Kennesaw State University Men's (KSUM's) has concluded its Spring semester of operations, with summer operations on the horizon. This report summarizes key events and lessons for the education of other MHRA student groups.

Campus Engagement

KSUM has gained over ten members (prospective and official) since its founding. The most successful promotional tactic has been table events, because we engage students directly with a smile.

[image]
Feminist: "Patriarchal, white supremacist, motherfucking fuck fuck…"

[image]	When tabling, keep electronic or paper sources ready to back up your responses to objections. Some helpful canned responses are here on AVFM.

Advisor Bailout

KSUM's first advisor abandoned ship when she saw the Southern Poverty Law Center's (SPLC) unsubstantiated allegation of A Voice for Men (AVFM) being a hate organization. She then assumed that KSUM is a formal subsidiary of AVFM (It's not) because AVFM hosted the promotional fundraiser for KSUM, and because I work at AVFM.

The ex-advisor maintained ideological disagreement even after being informed that the SPLC declaration was never official. This was an organizational emergency because an advisor must be present for KSUM to host events, namely the November conference.

[image]	Avoid single points of failure! Look at what your organization depends on and plan on how to adapt in the event of a disaster. An advisor's fear of the boogyman should not threaten your organization.

Thankfully, a new advisor was found and the KSUM constitution was updated to soften the blow in the event something like this happens again.

Growing Volunteer Effort

It is because of the generosity of you and the MHRM community that KSUM even exists, and it will be because of the MHRAs in the KSU community that the organization grows. But the reality of the matter is that KSUM is stepping up its volunteer effort to handle the workload.

By promoting aggressively and developing mutually beneficial relationships with the other student organizations on campus (such as KSU TEDx, College Libertarians and the Non-Normative Anti-Assimilationist Students), KSUM connects with member bases with relevant interests.

[image]	Initially, no one cares about you or your organization. Build relationships by going to other people's meetings, talking to strangers and lending a hand. People are generally creatures of reciprocation, so if you give a shit, they give a shit. (Unless it's a "you give, they take" relationship, in which case run away).

If anything, the KSUM conference on November 1st will generate the interest necessary to build a new officer team. Stay tuned for more details on the conference after AVFM's conference in Detroit.

Activism

Renaming the KSU Women's Resource and Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center

Starting March 3rd, KSU hosted Love Your Body Week (LYB), a week-long event meant to raise awareness of eating disorders. We were drawn to LYB because of its gendered execution.

On March 5th, LYB hosted South Smash, an event where people were encouraged to smash their own bathroom scales with sledgehammers.

At the event I met Shameka Wilson, the director of the KSU Women's Resource and Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center (WRC). As it turns out, WRC offers IPV prevention services to both men and women, so we asked Wilson why the name was not gender neutral. Wilson said changing the name was "one of her battles," although she would not say who was battling her, and why. Wilson eventually stopped responding to my emails.

[image]
Dr. Sanseviro, Dean of Student Success
Dean of Student Success Dr. Michael Sansivero and the Non-Normative Anti-Assimilationist Students of KSU (NA) claim that the name of the center is defended by Assistant Dean Dr. Bob Mattox. Mattox allegedly feels it is best that KSU follow conventions that "empower women," even when branding.

Dr. Mattox will meet with us on May 13th to discuss renaming the WRC to the "Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center."

Wish us luck.

Resisting Aggression with Defense for Men Audit

[image]
The front of one of KSU's RAD Manuals
I will not recount the full story of KSUM's struggle with RAD Systems for brevity reasons. Just know that KSU appears to be teaching innocent men to be responsible for violence against women.

KSU Security invited me to enroll in RAD for Men, but no classes were even scheduled. The 60+ day aversion of my emails, phone calls and in-person requests for appointments prompted me to call bosses.

[image]	Restrict yourself to one email a week if you are simply reminding someone to get back with you (otherwise you will seem spammy and no one will ever help you). After two weeks of trying, you can start calling bosses to lay on some pressure.

A Georgia Open Records request was filed to view the RAD manuals (which have copyright protections strong enough to withstand artillery fire). The KSU Legal Division allowed me to view the manuals only once, but my phone battery only managed to capture a non-representative subset of the content before dying the death of a traitorous coward.

[image]	Keep all recording devices charged and available at all times. There are words and actions you simply should not leave off the record. Wear a coat with many pockets to carry everything comfortably.

Assistant Legal Counsel Reggie Lampkin later claimed that copying specific pages of the manual or even letting us look at the manual again would make KSU a distributor of copyrighted materials. This violates federal copyright law even though The Georgia Open Records Act says a citizen can get a copy. The state and federal law contention limits us to financial documents, of which we requested records leading back to 2010.

Only financial records going back to 2012 were procured by KSU Security, and they dropped contact yet again.

The records I have contain no summaries, but hundreds of pages of airline itineraries, certificates and letters with individual dollar figures. This made the report difficult to review.

I will be attending RAD for Men during the Summer semester to continue auditing the program material.

Diversifying Reading Materials in the Gender Studies Program

The KSU gender studies program has reading materials geared towards feminist philosophy, slavery of the U.S. southern aristocracy, and LGBT issues. This reading list reflects the popular image of diversity, but the material is not actually diverse enough to tell the whole story.

I approached the gender studies coordinator and the Interdisciplinary Studies director with Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young's trilogy on misandry. [1][2][3]

We learned that the reading materials are determined by individual faculty members by their own courses. KSUM is now going door to door to introduce professors to roads less traveled. In the event we are locked out, we will approach the Board of Regents to stress the importance of complementing existing scholarship.

[image]	You better be good at sales. There are times when being in-your-face is NOT the way to go. Confrontational messages put a target on the defensive, so they are best used when you have an audience of thinking people. When persuading someone one-on-one to care about men's issues, a positive, persuasive tone is ideal.

Conclusion

In this report we covered the current goals and problems experienced KSUM for the Spring semester. As always, take the lessons embedded in the history of KSUM and apply them to your own circumstances. And be sure to tell your own story. A live record of direct experience benefits the MHRA community by showing the consequences of practical, lawful action.

Here's looking forward to a Summer of growth of compassion for men and boys.

Chris Mackney didn't suicide – he drowned

AVfM Video Source · 2 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Despite attempts by lawyers and an ex-wife to delete Chris Mackney's existence from the public record, he will not be forgotten. YouTuber Gregory Becker gives a moving tribute to a man he says did not suicide, but rather drowned as a result of misandric forces he was powerless to stop. Like a rat in a scientific experiment, Chris Mackney was forced to swim and swim till he no longer had the energy to remain afloat.

More from Gregory Becker here

A Call to Action: Women, Religion, Violence, and Power by Jimmy Carter (a review)

NCFM · 2 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Former US president Jimmy Carter has written a book on women and gender that richly deserves superlatives in a broad number of categories. Unfortunately for the author, the distinctions of this work are almost entirely (around 99.9%) negative.

Let's start with the basics. Much to my surprise, on reading this book, I discovered that Jimmy Carter is quite possibly simultaneously the most insecure and the most egotistical author I have ever read. This is not something I say lightly, nor is it an insignificant achievement, dubious though it may be.

Virtually every page is peppered with Carter's pronouncements of his own fearless, illustrious achievements to advance female welfare throughout the world. The Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW)? Carter claims credit as it happened during his presidency. The Violence Against Women Act (VAWA)? Ditto. Appointment of many more female to cabinet positions than had ever happened previously? The same. Presidential pardons? Jimmy Carter, fearless crusader for the wellbeing of women, did it all and broke all existing records. Women as judges? You guessed it, Carter yet again.

Occasionally Carter chivalrously allows as how his wife Rosalynn might have helped a bit on a few matters, and from time to time he mentions female heads of state and other luminaries who also assisted, never failing at a chance to glorify himself by implication while ostensibly praising others. Of course some of us see CEDAW and VAWA as at best dubious accomplishments but that is another matter.

This book really starts to seem like a joke after a while. Is there nothing women have accomplished that wasn't spearheaded by our 39th president, who clearly considers himself an honorary woman? Not only does it come off in the end as anti-feminist, a result I'm sure the author didn't intend (no woman could do anything without a man—Carter's—assistance) but his boasting to advance himself of the numerous achievements he cites regarding third world women's welfare comes off as exploitative and imperialistic. Latrines in third world countries? The Carter Foundation did it. Monitoring the election process in Liberia, which resulted in Africa's first female leader? That was Reagan. Just kidding. Carter once again.

Next question: Is there anything good about men (other than Carter) at all? Or for that matter, any challenge that they face in their life? Has a woman ever behaved other than angelically in the history of the world? The answer would seem to be no to all these questions, judging from this book. Carter talks of "humility" being needed to change social norms, seemingly unaware of his utter lack of this quality.

The book has no footnotes. How could it? I have no clue how Carter would be able to back up such fabrications as the suggestion that "women suffer the most during and after war"? Really? Women suffer more than the countless men who die? So many of its platitudes are completely not subject to being documented.

The factual elisions become almost breathtaking after a while. One can almost glimpse points where the author may have had a momentary passing chance to glimpse a vision of a more nuanced view of gender in the world today, and then, whoosh!, the moment passed and Carter reverted to the more comfortable man-bad, woman-good dichotomy that dominates his book. One point when things might have played out differently comes at the end of the first chapter, which Carter finishes with the sentence, "I still believe… there should not be any distinctions in rules of behavior for males and females." Fair enough, and yet in the very next sentence, which starts the second chapter, the author leaps into a discussion of his time serving as a Naval officer during World War II. Does the thought even cross his brain to address the obvious distinction in "rules of behavior for males and females" in regards to who had to fight and who didn't? Not to mention the special contribution males have made to all wars and especially to this most critical of all wars. It doesn't occur to Carter even for a moment or if it does, he hides it well.

Another point where the author really had to work at keeping his blinders on is when he talks about incarceration percentages for black women rising astronomically while completely neglecting the much higher numbers of incarcerated males and particularly of black males. He takes at face value the report of the UN's special rapporteur on violence against women (it goes without saying that there is no such special rapporteur on violence against men) that incarceration conditions for women are worse than those for men, even though this flies in the face of everything we know about prisoners and about women's preferential treatment. The author's analysis of date rape is similarly one-sided.

Carter decries a system "based on the presumption that men and boys are superior to women and girls," yet constructs a system that makes the diametrically opposite assumption and recites it like an incantation throughout this 200-page book that seems oh so much longer than it is.

No book is totally without any redeeming value, and Carter's is no exception, though he comes close! In terms of the craft of writing per se, he is a fine writer and the book is attractively produced. His perspective is interesting that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights would not be possible to pass in today's world given the increased polarization between countries, the fading influence of the five permanent United Nations members, and that memories of the devastation wrought by World War II have faded. I believe the author is right on all counts here.

Jimmy Carter has written about twenty other books and for all I know the others are all excellent. He won the Nobel Peace Prize, although certainly that is not an infallible bellwether as it was also prematurely given to Barack Obama. But A Call to Action reads like an infomercial for all things Jimmy Carter and a boring and monumentally biased one at that. Avoid at all costs what quite surprisingly turned out clearly the worst book I have ever reviewed out of over two hundred volumes.

The reason for Carter receiving this "prize" from me is the author's eminently unforgivable treatment of the pay difference between men and women. We have known for many years that almost all gender-based pay distinctions arise from differences in men's and women's work behavior, as was extensively documented by Warren Farrell in Why Men Earn More. Over and over, numbers presenting aggregated pay for men compared to aggregated pay for women are presented by Carter as if they have any meaning whatsoever. Our 39th president, like Michael Moore, tries to raise himself up by attacking the monolithic (and defenseless) entity of "men." This is the face of evil, folks. He talks near the end of the book of "reducing sexual violence of all kinds" [italics added]. Really? All kinds? Or only the kinds that will win you approval from feminists?

Carter's one departure from feminist brainwashing is his trouble with abortion. Amazing he was honest about this; it may blow his chances to be promoted to sainthood by the National Organization for Women and the author seems to crave recognition and acknowledgement like no one I've ever encountered before. And I'm politically left of center and considered the man one of the less objectionable presidents when in office. Jimmy Carter has managed to pull off an epic achievement in reverse. Save your money and your brain and avoid it at all costs.

A Call to Action: Women, Religion, Violence, and Power. By Jimmy Carter. New York: Simon & Schuster, 2014. 211 pages. $28.00.

Editor's note: this review originally appeared on the National Coalition for Men web site. It was written by Steven Svoboda.–DE

Men's Rights and Poverty

Hopeland Cash · 3 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> Did you ever think what those sleepers are that underlie the railroad? Each one is a man, an Irishman, or a Yankee man. The rails are laid on them, and they are covered with sand, and the cars run smoothly over them.
>
> – Henry David Thoreau, Walden

Today's culture of misandry could be considered the greatest complex of oppression and abuse seen in the modern age. Over three-billion men and boys are routinely exploited, overlooked and abused, with it all rationalized as necessary, as fair, or as simply not happening. This system of inequality is likely the largest (by head count) oppression of a single distinguishable demographic of the last century, if not of all history.

However, there exists another structured inequality that is even more far reaching: poverty. For centuries the greater masses have been exploited by the wealthy to further grow their riches and to wage war between houses, kingdoms and nations at the whim of the plutocrats. Make no mistake, the mass poverty we experience to this day is enforced with the sole intent of sustaining the status quo; it is no accident, but a requisite of the current system.

Together, these two cultural complexes, misandry and poverty, oppress and abuse the vast majority of humanity. Poverty consumes the working class, unemployed and homeless, and even the middle-class man is not spared mistreatment due to his gender. Alone, each seems a nearly insurmountable hurdle to overcome in the fight for an egalitarian society, and together they form the greater mass of the world's injustice and abuse.

However, misandry and poverty are not truly separate and they do not need to be combated individually. Born from the evolution of ancient cultures, both are now tools of the world's corrupt controllers, carefully considered and cultivated for the benefit of the powerful. Misandry and poverty support one another, feed on each other, and in reality the fight against one is the fight against both. Men are the fodder ground down and consumed by the modern economic system, but that is only possible as long as men do not fight back. Were so many men not trapped in poverty, such vitriol against their sex would not be tolerated. Without the repressions of a misandristic culture, men would not tolerate so many of their brothers being condemned to live with almost nothing.

The fight for Men's Rights is the fight against wealth inequality. Out of the systems of misandry and male disposability sprout the weed of poverty, using the fear and low self-esteem of men to enrich the wealthy. Winning men their rights will be a blow against global poverty, not because men are more important or their financial well-being of greater impact, but because cutting away the injustices and abuses of men and boys will strike at the roots of the cultural complex that facilitates mass poverty. The oppressed men of the world are the fuel for exploitation and freeing them will help free us all.

One of the front lines of the fight for Men's Rights is Father's Rights, striving for reform in family law and changes to how society perceives and treats fathers. Modern family law was born from seemingly well-intentioned legal agitation in the mid-twentieth century, but it has come to contribute in profound and long-lasting ways to poverty. Not as a conspiracy, but as a cultural gestalt that drives people to compete for resources where collaboration would better serve everyone's interests. It is the Men's Rights Movement that will make for that collaboration.

The current landscape of family structure in the west continues to put the greater burden of financial earning on the husband/father. This imbalance discourages women from contributing fully to family economy and puts all the proverbial eggs in a single basket, leaving many families destitute in the event of the husband losing employment, as happened en masse during the Great Recession. Increasing men's work-life balance will encourage married couples to better balance their earning, insulating them against the ravages of a fickle economy.

However, things are far worse and far more complex when divorce enters the equation. Upon separation an even more rigid relationship of provider-dependent is enforced. Alimony does little to encourage female participation in the workforce and leaves men suffocating under crushing fiscal demands. This drains his own wealth, and keeps the woman from building hers, thereby contributing to the poverty of both and limiting upward mobility. Serial marriage-divorces compound the problem, creating a downward spiral of debt.

With children the problem becomes even more pronounced. Child support doubles down on the burden of alimony. Blatantly unbalanced custody orders leave mothers un- or underemployed and fathers financially and emotionally trapped under the heel of the family court and vulnerable to the whim of their ex-wife. All this weakens the family economy, draining parents' resources and dooming many children of divorce to a life in poverty.

Improving father's rights will balance parenting time, improving the quality of life for everyone involved. Separated fathers with meaningful relationships with their children are happier, healthier and contribute more to the economy of the children. Children with regular access to their fathers grow up healthier as well, and less likely to themselves become impoverished as adults. More balanced custody allows mothers to work and earn more, providing for their children and their own (now independent) retirement.

Greater father's rights will further boost the economic well-being of families by (a) reducing the number of needless divorces spurred on by the current system, and (b) stopping the extortive flow of money into the overfull coffers of family law attorneys. Father's Rights is a cornerstone of the fight for Men's Rights, and one that will help raise many broken families out of the clutches of poverty.

Deeper than abuse of fathers, however, and perhaps a core cause of it, is the larger cultural view of men as cattle. Cattle to be driven to work and strain until they die seven years younger. Cattle to be forced onto the front line of war, disaster and danger because it's their "duty". Cattle to suffer in silence and "take it like a man" so others can be given life-saving aid. All this has been trained and beaten into men for millennia until even men themselves don't question their own martyr complex, their self-valuation based on utility.

This is why misandry thrives. Men are conditioned to not speak up and to internalize the hate they encounter everyday, and hate it is, even the so-called "noble" ideals of self-sacrificing manhood. To teach a boy that his life is less valuable than his sister's is to teach him to hate himself. This also contributes to global poverty by teaching men to accept being an exploitable utility without wanting anything in return. Men have always been the backbone of the economy, whether as serfs or salarymen, doing the lion's share of labor, paying the majority of income tax and putting in more hours at paid work. Where men go, the economy follows, except that the men themselves do not control the flow of wealth they produce. This allows the rich to feed off the working class, draining resources for their own self-serving desires.

Liberating men from their cultural shackles will free them to build wealth for themselves and those they choose to care about, not for the anointed few or whomever society decides to force upon them as dependents. Men should not be shamed and pressured into working themselves into early graves. Let every adult contribute equally and then share in what is earned, because we will all be wealthier for it.

The fear must also be stopped. Men are cowed into their role of utility by imposed, irrational fears leveled to control and exploit them. "Performance culture" drives men to disregard their own well-being for the sake of impressing others, fearing being rejected as sub-standard. The gynocentric structure of relationships burdens and drains men as little more than gift cards; spend and discard. Any man who dares speak out against the practice is shamed and punished, so wealth continues to be siphoned away to products and industries men don't even care about, leaving them with little but their bread and pay-per-view circuses.

Men must strike out, not violently against their oppressors, but boldly onto a new trail. Men are half the population, and the greater bulk of the world's production force. The economy is in their hands, if they will take hold and demand that, for once, it do something for them. Not out of selfishness or greed, but because the system as it stands exploits them and their families and only the men themselves can make it better.

Don't waste money on shows of wealth; cars, suits, property and trophy girlfriends give only a false sense of worth. Your money will just feed into the pockets of corporations who don't give a damn about you.

Stop letting others drain your hard earned wealth; pay your taxes, donate to your favorite charity, but don't let anyone tell you how to spend your money. Every dollar is a piece of your life and it is yours. Don't be an ATM for anyone else's bad habits.

Refuse to participate in the scalping-fest of family court; no sane man should expose himself to the risk of divorce. It is little more than self-accepted human bondage.

Corporations can't do a damn or earn a cent without you, so don't settle for that cubicle job just because you've got alimony due and your new date likes expensive wine. Work should be fulfilling, not soul crushing, and if you cut off all the fiscal leeches you will have much greater options in jobs.

Men will never be given rights. Rights have to be demanded, taken, and defended. When men free themselves from their shackles, the industrial machine will have lost its sheepish workforce, and men will become the force working for their own good, the good of their brothers and of those they love. The gross injustices of male homelessness, unemployment and early death are all ignored by the leisure class because they facilitate our culture of unsustainable spending, but it is time to stop tolerating the abuse of our fathers and brothers and sons.

There is enough to go around if we don't let the select few hoard resources. It is shame and fear of rejection that keeps men working and dying for strangers, rather than finding their own definition of self-worth and working to enrich their lives, not someone else's bank account. Stand up and refuse to be anyone's utility; that is when the cycle of bloodstained consumerism will be stopped. Men carry the economy, but they don't have to be crushed by it.

Phyllis Schlafly Embraces Hypergamy & Male Disposability

AVfM Video Source · 4 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There can be no doubt that feminism as we know it today emerged from the political left. But as Barbarossa notes so eloquently, “the enemy of my enemy is not always my friend,” and the fact is that if conservatives can’t face up to criticism on areas where their own “side” of the political world has also contributed to problems for men and boys, they aren’t being all that helpful. Let’s let him explain.

We don’t always agree with Bar Bar, but we agree more often than we disagree. In any case, you can subscribe to him here.

The Raw Story – slightly cooked

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 4 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The title of this article is oddly fitting. First, the name "Raw Story" refers both to an online publication, and also the kind of story you get when you hear all sides without any key voices being silenced.

Interestingly, The Raw Story (a publication that claims to promote independent journalism) does not seem to possess the virtues consistent with its brand. It seems to prefer its "raw" stories just a bit cooked after all.

[image]
Travis Gettys is gonna give it to you raw
Travis Gettys has cooked an appetizing piece on Chris Mackney's suicide letter. He kicked it up a naw'tch by using my stunning face as the featured image since I read Mackney's suicide letter and encouraged the public to circulate the original footage.

The article reception was mixed. Some comments were sympathetic to Mackney, while others were openly anti-Mackney and anti-MHRA.

But one thing held constant in comment moderation of Gettys' article: MHRAs are not allowed.

Peter Nolan was not censored as aggressively as others, most likely because he's more consistent with what The Raw—I mean "The Cooked" Story wants people to see as representative of the MHRA perspective. To be fair, Nolan claimed to need to create a new account to subvert being banned. Resident grandwizard and rapey beaty beardman Dean Esmay smelled the misrepresentation sizzling on the grill, but unfortunately an apple was shoved in his mouth, and he was used to garnish a bowl of Shut the Fuck Up a la Gordon Ramsay.

[image]

You'd think that the use of my picture is an implied invitation to sit down at the table and comment over some tea and biscuits, but that's why you're not a journalist, I guess.

[image]
Well, they seem like nice people.
This is indicative of a bad journalistic habit, not an isolated mistake. John Hembling was also thrown under the bus a while back by being cast as the rape apologist that ideologues desperately want to believe exists, without bothering to note the context in which that video was made, ask any questions of a man who's very easy to reach, or even linking to his YouTube channel so they could see things like what his video was really all about.

Bugger actually contacting him to ask about it (said contact information being, again, astonishingly easy to find), they don't even let people who know him and what he's really about comment. Do you spot a pattern here?

So, if The Raw Story feels I am misrepresenting their attitudes, then they must admit that is what they do themselves. But I am not excusing my speculations of character. In fact, I will be the actual journalist here by acknowledging the possibility that I am misrepresenting The Raw Story.

After all, I am fallible.

So if I am being unfair to The Raw Story, then I challenge The Raw Story to give us the raw story.

Silence will serve as evidence that my character judgments are not speculation, but fact.

But let's not lose sight of the topic. Chris Mackney publicly published a suicide note, committed suicide, then his ex-wife attempted to claim the suicide note as intellectual property. A DMCA claim was filed against A Voice For Men demanding the removal of the note from the AVFM Forums, and the Randazza Legal Group responded with the most elegant "Fuck you" a lawyer could possibly articulate.

An open-minded, curious individual would want to know the raw story, including facts on what fathers go through in family courts. The intellectually healthy will look past character judgements to begin with and seek the facts about Mackney, assuming that Dina Mackney and her thugs at Bean, Kinney and Korman have not already removed them from public view.

We are the ones providing the raw story. Mackney died and openly shared his last words in a Hail Mary attempt to warn the public of the nightmares men face in custody hearings.

The Raw Story cooked the facts to make them tasty and easy to swallow, but at the cost of vital intellectual nutrients that are part of this complete breakfast.

The red, bloody truth is not easy to swallow, nor is it tasty.

Question is, are you an adventurous eater?

ADDENDUM: Here is an archive with screenshots of deleted comments alongside verbal abuse by anti-M(H)RAs that made the cut. There are over a thousand comments on the article now, so be sure visit that thread for full context. Remember kids, if you are not popular, you're wrong! -VZ*

Don’t Be Stupid

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 5 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recent reception of my reading of the Chris Mackney suicide letter has made the following brief statement necessary.

Impulsive vigilantes have taken it upon themselves to post private information on Chris Mackney’s ex-wife after hearing of Chris’ suicide letter. This information included her home address. One user even advocated violence on my channel, right before being swiftly banned.

Before this escalates any further, let me say one thing to the most impassioned vigilantes that happen to be reading this article: Don’t be stupid.

Going after the ex-wife gives the courts ammunition, gives gynocentric and/or misandric publications an excuse to rehash tired propoganda, and fuels anti-male values.

Granted, the media will dishonestly cast most of us as evil no matter what we do, so our appearance is not the main concern. The main concern is that vigilante action will cause undeserved harm to many people.

If Anita Sarkessian can get $160,000 for being “oppressed” by 4chan comments, imagine how much a witch hunt would secure for mothers at the expense of men currently struggling to be heard in family courts. The last thing fathers need is a stronger legal precedent that subjects their stories to lockdowns more aggressive than the one imposed by Bean, Kinney and Korman. Male suffering is vastly under-examined in scholarship and in the media as it is, and no progress can be made if the system feels a greater incentive to hide pertinent information.

If that is not enough to convince you that directing anger at the ex-wife is a bad idea, rest assured that feminists are just waiting for the next opportunity to point and say “SEEEE?! This is why you need us! This is why Feminism is the answer!” Going vigilante gives them that roasted opportunity on a silver platter with an apple garnish.

Nothing any of us do will bring Chris Mackney back from the dead, let alone make him feel some sense of fulfillment about the courts.

In fact, aggressive, misplaced anger will simply create more Chris Mackneys once our already callous system decides that it is still not protective enough of women. Chris’ children will also suffer more than they already have if anger is directed toward their home.

Not that you don’t have reason to be angry. You do. Oh God, you really do. But that anger can be channeled into more productive activism such as reading public court records, questioning authority in public spaces with a camera in hand, poster campaigns and individual lobbying with local decision makers. The best activism is not only peaceful and assertive, but also justified. The Mackney suicide justifies peaceful activism because it serves as yet another piece of evidence to toss on the pile. New advocacy opportunities will arise if activists are serendipitous.

Use the Mackney story, if anything, as a reason to step up your game and set a better example as an independently-minded citizen. Use your anger as fuel for motivation, and use your motivation as a catalyst for change. Lighting torches and raising pitchforks will only prompt the corrupt to feel justified in their own actions.

Take care not to give them that power.

This is what feminist justice looks like

Diana Davison · 5 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists have found a way to bypass democracy and use the Canadian Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms to create an unjust society. This video explores how feminists enabled Canada's most despised criminal to escape justice.

This is what feminist justice will look like if we don't stop them.

Editorial note: Diana Davison's channel, which you should subscribe to, is right here.–DE

Are Irish men at the mercy of their wives/partners?

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 5 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I speak to a lot of women during the course of my day and I've been telling them about what I do on facebook and on the street when talking to lots of different people.

I like talking to people, like debating with people and just generally shooting the shit.

I like asking questions of people to gauge their responses to things.

For example I recently asked a women if husbands are at the mercy of their wives and she said, "My husband has nothing to fear".

So I asked if you decided to make him leave, could you and she said no she'd never do something like that.

So I said so if you really really wanted to you could.

I suggested if she went to An Garda Síochána and made a complaint of domestic abuse would she be believed?

Then asked if he did the same thing would he be believed?

So I got from that that her husband was at her mercy.

I've asked others as well and the response is always the same, yes husbands/boyfriends are at the mercy of their partners.

Thus far I have a 100% track record at getting the response I expect, which is that men have no privilege which can be determined at any stage.

I've even spoken to a 16 year old girl about this and she agrees that men have far far fewer rights than women do.

Men in Ireland are committing suicide at 5 times the rate of women in Ireland today. Three hundred and eighty six confirmed male suicides took place in 2010 and the number has not decreased since. The 2011 figures saw a rise in male suicides, which accounted for 84% of all suicide deaths.

Men don't feel welcome in our society today, because their issues are treated as second class problems and they generally get no sympathy for these problems.

Our SOS campaign is going around the streets of Ireland attempting to raise awareness of the damaging nature of Irish society which has left men without a real identity, and hopefully helping people to recognise that many of these troubled voices aren't being heard.

We want to target crisis points in the lives of men, whether that be divorce, experiencing domestic violence and intimate partner violence against them, unwanted sexual experience, or other environmental factors involving high stress and low support. These are the times when men need help the most, and that help isn't there. Suicide counselling is a valid, proven and very valuable approach but a far better one is to remove those factors which cause suicidal tendencies in the first place, coupled with a robust outreach and activity programme centred on mens issues. The Irish University Times called the number of male youth suicides an epidemic last year, but the country continues to not care. It's time for that to change, we're going to make noise about it and we're not going to stop until people are listening

Well be out again shortly to push our SOS campaign which is related to the lack of men's rights in Ireland.

Anyone who's be in Dublin and willing to stand beside us please contact us at info@menshumanrightsireland.org

Interview with Attila Vinczer on legal harassment of boys

AVfM Video Source · 6 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A video made by Attila Vinczer, naming public figures Carol Taggio, Dameian Muirhead, and Janet MacMillan, all named in a public lawsuit, is under legal threat of removal for “privacy violation.” The original video under threat of removal is currently to be found here.

In the below lengthy and detailed interview, Attila Vinczer describes issues he and his sons have had with school officials Carol Taggio and Janet MacMillan, and York Regional Police officer Dameian Muirhead. We have reached out to all three for comment but have not heard back from them as yet.

We were informed that Taggio has retired and no current contact information for her is available. We left messages for MacMillan and Muirhead and will be happy to interview them if they are available.

Vinczer’s YouTube channel can be subscribed to here.

Feminist Biology. No Seriously, Feminist Biology.

AVfM Video Source · 6 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Our favorite feminist, Christina Hoff Sommers, steps up to challenge another item so ridiculous only a Women's Studies department could possibly endorse it.

Sick of Rape Culture BS

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 6 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Belle Knox, Duke Porn Star, sex-positive feminist and activist for sex workers has some thoughts on rape culture. They're stupid. Big surprise.

> I was at a friend's house when the topic of college rape arose. I mentioned that I knew of someone who had been accused and prosecuted for sexual assault. My friend was quick to jump in and say, "Oh, I'm sure he didn't rape anyone. The girl probably was drunk and regretted it in the morning. It happens all the time."

How about instead of parroting the usual ideological bullshit which has been so thoroughly debunked that even RAINN is distancing itself from the words "rape culture", how about instead of doing that, you actually listen to these women, who are supposedly your friends, and find out how they know this information? Why don't you begin with the assumption that these young women are not in fact emotionally immature simpletons incapable of a single original thought or observation of their own?

Try respecting women, especially the ones you call friends.

> Yeah!" my other friend chimed in, "That happens a lot. Like girls dressing all slutty then getting drunk at frat parties…"

Again, how do they know this? Have they been to a lot of frat parties? Are they familiar with how women act? Do they have first hand experience observing this exact phenomenon play out? Have they had the experience themselves?

How is it that rape culture zealots can, on one hand, insist that any woman who reports a sexual assault must be believed with no questions asked, but women who appear to have some knowledge of false accusations of rape are to be shouted down and not believed for one second? Do you trust young women to give honest accounts of their own experiences, or do you not? Or is the case that you only choose to believe what matches your pre-conceived ideas?

> Did I mention that both of my friends are 19-year-old women?

So adults then. Glad we can agree on that.

> In a few sentences, my friends had epitomized slut and victim shaming. In that moment, I felt enraged that my female friends had perpetuated rape culture.

Or, you know, they critiqued it in a way not consistent with your particular ideological stance, which is apparently forbidden? Refusing to toe the party line makes them stupid and incapable of understanding?

> I also felt sad. Sad for every victim who has been or ever will be doubted because of the mainstream ideas surrounding sexual assault. When we allow ideas like this to be accepted, we only isolate the true victims and discourage them from reporting.

Look carefully there. You have two victims: those who are doubted and the true victims. You yourself appear not quite able to accept the mass cognitive dissonance that comes with accepting all claims of rape at face value and refusing all observations that suggest for a lot of cases there is some grounds for doubt. Even when those observations come from other members of your cohort. Even when those observations come from your friends.

> It makes me sad to know that if I were to ever become a victim of sexual assault, I likely would not be believed. And for the record: statistical studies indicate false reports make up two percent or less of the reported cases of sexual assault. (Roger Williams University, 2012)

Well, I suppose that depends, doesn't it? Are you a true victim or not? The occurrence of false allegations is by no means as cut-and-dried as you would like it to be, which you already know. And the 2% figure has no scientific basis whatsoever by the way. But you know, even if it were as low as you suggest, that would not matter. The point is that false allegations of rape are not handled in a way that suggests the gravity of that accusation. They are simply laughed away.

> Our culture of victim shaming is present in subtle ways. During O-Week, I was constantly reminded to watch my drink and only walk in groups. Don't get me wrong; these are practical tips. But essentially, they tell women that they can behave in a certain way to avoid being victimized.

Every adult person can behave in certain ways to avoid being victimized. Why is rape such a special crime? There are things every adult can do to avoid being mugged, which we heartily encourage, and no one for one second thinks we are victim-blaming.

Rape is a terrible crime. But it's not special. Sorry snowflake.

> But, why don't we tell men similar things? Why aren't there anti-rape campaigns targeting women? Why don't we focus on telling men not to rape, instead of telling women how to not get raped?

Because generally speaking, men don't rape. Rapists rape. New information suggests there are a whole lot of lady rapists out there too (no, seriously, and big time), but we don't for a moment believe we need to teach all women not to rape. Or murder their infants. Or any other heinous crime committed by a small percentage of a large population.

> I propose that we educate men about what constitutes rape. In North Carolina, having sex with someone who is legally drunk is considered rape.

Which means that if you have sex with a drunk man, you just raped him. Perhaps you need to start your campaign teaching women that equality under the law means the laws apply to both men and snowflakes.

This is a stupid law, by the way. Why in the hell do you want the justice system in your bedroom deciding whether you've had too many Cosmopolitans to have sex with your boyfriend?

> Perhaps we should make it a focus during O Week [editor's note: orientation week] to educate our students about the laws of consent, so that no one may ever revert to Robin Thicke's mantra of "Blurred Lines."

How about we teach young women the same thing? That hot guy who previously did not give you a second glance? The one with beer goggles who now can't quite make out that you are not his type? Yeah, that one? He won't rape you no matter how much he has to drink. There is no relationship between sexual aggression and alcohol intake.

But you sure as hell can rape him. Take advantage of beer goggles and you are committing rape. You are a rapist.

> How about we teach young men that when a woman says stop, they stop? Or that if a woman (or man) is drunk or unconscious, they should help them, instead of taking advantage of them?

How about we teach young women the same damn thing? An erection is not a sign of consent. A drunk guy is off-limits. I'm not sure if you're just grammatically confused, but your "they" refers to young men exclusively. Why aren't women under any obligation to help drunk men and women?

> Our society needs a paradigm shift as it relates to our sexual assault prevention efforts. How about we stop teaching women how to not be a victim and instead attack the culture that creates the perpetrators instead?

How about we go even further: teach everyone not to be a victim, acknowledge that there are likely just as many female perps as male and if we can all stop for ten seconds and act like responsible goddamn adults, none of this is an issue.

> I dream of a day when my daughter can walk down the street without the fear of being assaulted.

Hyperbolic bullshit. Try to at least be consistent. Most "rapes" are committed by individuals known to the victim and do not occur while walking down the street. This is simple fear-mongering. Better send your daughter out with a survival kit, too in case an errant tornado touches down. It can happen!

> And yes, I think that I should be able to wear whatever the hell I want without being labeled as a slut.

Oh, no doubt you do. And I 'm sure you would not be at all offended by a man walking down the street in yoga pants so tight you can get an accurate sperm count from half a block away.

> This idea that men cannot control their impulses is archaic and offensive.

And here is where the real heart of the story lies. Go back and reconsider what your friends told you: it is not men at all who have troubling controlling their impulses.

> Alcohol + lowered inhibitions + slutty clothes + social events = women having sex they regret

It is not men getting trashed and having sex and waking up the next day looking around for someone to blame, despite the fact that lots and lots of men have sex under conditions that absolutely constitute rape.

You toss out Blurred Lines, but appear not to have actually listened to the song. It's the girl who is sexually aggressive. Do you realize that? She grabs him. He takes that as indication of desire. Then he lets her decide what to do next. He makes his willingness clear, and hates that hers is not, but does nothing more than issue an invitation for her to "get at me".

> I hate these blurred lines
>
> I know you want it
>
> I know you want it
>
> I know you want it
>
> But you're a good girl
>
> The way you grab me
>
> Must wanna get nasty
>
> Go ahead, get at me

And that right there is the problem. Survey men about their sexual pasts and you will find ample evidence that rape occurs with as much frequency as female reported rape. Here's a particularly charming story about a female rapist, in which she appears to have zero awareness that she actually committed was probably a fairly traumatic rape:

> Mary, 26, who makes the walk about every two weeks, describes her first experience as the epitome of post-hookup embarrassment. “It was New Year’s Eve,” she says, “and ignoring the fact that I was on the heaviest day of my period and had hairy legs, I basically forced myself on a guy I hated because he was the only single male at the party.” She woke up disoriented, wearing a g-string/tampon string combination.

Eww. I wonder how the guy feels about that one? My guess would be he has taken a stern vow not to let himself be talked into a situation like that ever again.

And while there are likely some men who are deeply affected by those kinds of experiences, most seem to understand the role they played in their own victimization and they get over it and move the fuck on.

Because that’s what accountability means. That is what agency means. That is what being an adult means.

So Belle, do us all a favor and stop peddling this ridiculous story that women are not to be trusted or believed when they report observations that don’t match up with your ideological axe. Stop reciting this insane litany about only men being rapists and how women are never responsible for their own safety and well-being. Quit with this “women are basically children and men should be punished for women’s bad behavior” paternalism. We’re all sick of it.

“Rape culture” will end when women do one thing:

Grow up.

You seem to be enjoying your fame and notoriety, Belle. Why don’t you do some good for a change and be the first one to try?

Come on snowflake.

You can do it.

Grow the fuck up.

Lots of love,

JB

#FreeCoyoteShivers Update!

Suzanne McCarley · 6 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Francis "Coyote" Shivers is free! For now. Judge Kathryn Solarzano made the correct ruling in a May 1 hearing, during which Prosecutor Elizabeth "Loony Liz" Gertz attempted to "violate" Francis Shivers' probation by trying to rescind his First Amendment rights. Loony Liz didn't like his use of social media to publicize the embarrassing (to her and to her favorite Star Crazy star, Pauley Perrette) facts of this never ending three ring circus – er – court case.

She tried to claim that his publication of her malfeasance was somehow a threat to Perrette—you know, the "real victim here." She also tried to keep out of the official record Mr. Shivers' official complaint to the California State Bar of her prosecutorial misconduct–a public complaint which cites her knowingly, intentionally, and willingly allowing Ms. Perrette to commit perjury while under oath, resulting in his wrongful conviction. Judge Solarzano didn't bite. Indeed it appears that Solarzano came to court armed with a dusty old document known as the United States Constitution, no doubt to the chagrin of Loony Liz, Prosecutor For The Stars. Solarzano ruled, again correctly, that Francis Shivers is not in violation of his probation on his (falsely obtained) conviction for violating Pauley Perrette's (falsely obtained) restraining order. We don't yet have the transcripts so I may be paraphrasing Judge Solarzano's words:

> Mr Shivers is not a stalker, Mr. Shivers has never been charged or convicted of stalking. He was convicted of violating a restraining order, which is very different.

and:

> Mr. shivers has a right to say he was falsely accused. He has a right to say he was wrongly convicted. He has a right to publish proof of this.

In addition Solarzano refused to "take away the liberty of a man based upon speech which Perrette claims is annoying."

Furthermore, Judge Solarzano refused to accept yet another declaration from Perrette in lieu of testimony. If Pauley Perrette wants to insist that she feels "threatened" by Francis Shivers' Tweets and Facebook posts, she'll have to show up in person and testify under oath. We predict she won't be doing that. With all of the facts, backed by official documents and transcripts that have been released, Pauley Perrette will never place herself in a position where she would be subject to cross examination and where her lies will be exposed yet again.

However the final hearing on Mr. Shivers' alleged probation violation will be in early June and Our Dear Pauley will have the opportunity to testify is she so chooses. If she wants to, she can claim under oath that she feels threatened by her ex-husband's revelations of the truth and of her abhorrent, delusional, and lying behavior.

As this case progresses, we will be there to report the facts on an issue that has affected so many across this country: the misuse and criminal exploitation of the restraining order process. I'll close now with a couple of messages I snagged off of Shivers' social media accounts:

[image]

[image]

The Saga of NCIS star Pauley Perrette and her jealousy-fueled narcissistic abuse of the restraining order process is a long one. Multiple stories on her and her crooked cronies like John Nazarian, Daniel Luis Rivas, Elizabeth Gertz, a special unit of the LAPD, and more have been published on AVfM. Here are some of the other stories we have documented and published about the infamous Restraining Order Terrorist, Pauley Perrette.

- Star Crazy: The Drak Side of Pauley Perrettte

Pauley Perrette, Francis Shivers, and Yellow Media
Shivers vs the restraining order mafia
Pauley Perrette schmoozes the police
NCIS Pauley Perrette's pals: Daniel Luis Rivas
Perrette setting up Shivers again?
John Nazarian Tries to Change the Subject
What are Kangaroo Court Judge Kathryn Solarzano & Elizabeth Gertz Trying to Hide?

Editorial note: image of Star Crazy Perrette used under Creative Commons license from Wikimedia Commons. –DE

The Art of Effective Trolling: Or, How I Trolled Radfem @fakerobotgamer, the 7th Most Hated Redditor Worldwide

Jack Outis · 6 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> "Make sure I am not proud of what you want to shame me for" — Master Troll, Franc Hoggle

For the TL;DR Here's the link to Anna's defeat on storify

http://sfy.co/dfln

Otherwise:

DISCLAIMER: I TROLL OUT OF MY OWN VOLITION. THESE ARE ONLY MY OPINIONS AND I DISCOURAGE OTHER PEOPLE FROM TROLLING.

I, the troll

Let's get this out of the way. Online, I am a troll and a writer. I am proud of both. As a writer I seek to research and construct the presentation of an idea. As a troll I seek to research, wear down and de-construct a target. As a writer I choose subjects that expose hypocrites. As a troll I target adult hypocrites. As a writer I seek to express clear ideas that will preemptively answer the opposition's rebuttals & questions by frustrating them. As a troll I seek to express clear ideas and questions that will preemptively get under the opposition's skin by offending them. As a writer I consider political correctness as optional at best. As a troll I consider political correctness obsolete. As a writer I uphold logic and values we, as a functional society should agree on. As a troll I uphold logic and no values because online, neither my target nor I are part of a functional society. It's not sick, it's amoral; on the Internet, nobody gets offended.

But today is an exception: as a writer I have chosen to describe my trolling.

As a troll I seek to surreptitiously own the emotions of my targets as they have no conscious control over them. My target's emotions run free like dogs with a neglectful-narcissistic owner, pooping and peeing on everybody's property. As the neglectful-narcissistic owner avoids having control over their own "emotional dogs" I might as well put them on a leash and make them maul their owner. Why? Because the neglectful owner's narcissism relies on others taking care of their emotions. I count on my targets getting offended, on them failing to control their emotions, on them being impulsive. I count on them not looking away from what I write while I massage their eyes and mind with sandpaper gloves. I count on them displaying/parading what I write thus promoting me, as getting offended is always an impulsive, vulgar public affair. Getting offended means my target will publicly ask people for intellectual help and will also publicly ask for me to be censored. They promote me for free because hypocrites never get offended in private. My job as a troll is to caress and massage someone else's eyes and mind with a 40-grit sandpaper glove simply because they are too narcissistic to look away from what I write. Again, it's not sick, it's the internet. Besides, the difference between "thorough" and "obsessive" is how offended the person is.

Welcome to the Troll Club

If anything, there is a silent, observable behavior among trolls which translates into the following unspoken unofficial "rules" of the "Troll Club"

"Rules" of the Troll Club

- The first rule of the troll club is that you never get offended, your job is to offend people.
- Second rule is, your job is to offend people, trolls never have the "right to get offended".

- Third rule is, if you get trolled, take the hit and shut up. If you get offended, you are not a troll.

Translation, "you take what you dish out, If it's too hot, get the fuck out of the kitchen, don't be a hypocrite". Beside this, there are no written or spoken rules, anything goes on the land where religions go to die. The Internet.

The Sad State of Trolling on Twitter

The lack of rules in the "trollosphere" also has its disadvantages, namely rape threats and death threats issued by low-level trolls has only helped hypocrites like Anita Sarkeesian to be given money for free. Every screenshot of a rape threat was exchanged for donations in her now infamous kickstarter. Quite literally, every troll issuing a rape/death threat was giving Anita money. Same applies to every single SJW and radfem on social media, every rape/death threat they receive only helps them.

I impolitely disagree with those low-level trolls. I think "Twitter deserves a better kind of troll"*.

Compare

BAD TROLLING
Feminist: "When I think of an MRA I think about their dick in the gutter, torn off with my teeth"
Dumb Troll: Fuck you!+Rape threat
Result: Feminist parades rape threats then gets $$$ +brownie points Prestige: None

SANDPAPER TROLLING
Feminist: "When I think of an MRA I think about their dick in the gutter, torn off with my teeth"
SPTroll: "Do you enjoy their blood+sperm in your gums? Does mutilating a human being give you a sense of power? Justice? Satisfaction? Be proud…"
Result: Usually the hypocrite (AKA feminist/SJW) tries to delete their tweet
*Prestige: The whole exchange is "Storify-ed."

A better troll should use zero threats, zero swearing, zero sexual innuendo, just sandpaper questions for attrition. By sandpaper questions I mean questions that are logical, truthful, legitimate and almost Socratic but have been stripped from all the limitations of political correctness. A better troll should also always use some "prestige" at the end of the duel with another troll. What is the "prestige"? Well, it is what makes your trolling better because you make your targets publicly accountable for every word they say because you don't let them erase anything. The "prestige" is represented by online tools such as "Storify.com" which are separate from Twitter & allow you to document everything your target says before they try to erase it. It requires a little extra multitasking but it is worth it. (I suggest keeping an off-line copy in case Storify.com goes down in the future.)

Lastly, a better troll should mainly target the kind of people nobody would defend: other trolls

Second Disclaimer: Just to be clear, I do not use racism/hate inducing material/sexual innuendo/threats/swearing as tools for trolling adults only. Yes, I am a flawed troll, I shouldn't have principles. (I do swear, but rarely)

(*by taking a cue from Christopher Nolan's Joker & "The prestige" by the same director. Yes I am also a proud Christopher Nolan groupie)

Troll eats Troll

Be advised, if you are a troll seeking to troll a fellow troll you may be eaten alive. There is always a price to pay and trolling a troll implies you may lose and become the main dish. Get rid of your ego, morals and self-esteem then gag yourself with an apple* while typing just in case . Ego is a heavy anchor not worth dragging when trolling.

As a better troll I decided to start looking for an ideal target.

I was therefore, looking for another troll that everybody knew about, someone so hated, so despised that the idea of defending such universally-hated troll would only tarnish and smear their defender. What kind of nonsense would Jezebel/Salon-like sites not defend or even dare touch with a 10-foot pole? Could a racist, widely hated, genocide-enthusiast, Westboro Baptist Church-like, zealot TERF-radfem even exist? I really doubted someone like that would even be possible in real life. Until…

(*the apple is enough, no latex attire needed)

Meet Anna, AKA @fakerobotgamer

The 7th most hated Redditor Worldwide

Let's say you were raised in a heavily religious background, let's say you are upset with men, scratch that, let's say you openly state "I hate males" & you are also lesbian. Lets say that you also espouse racism and genocide. Let's say you actively encourage people to embrace such views and you even have subreddits dedicated to such ideologies. Let's say that you have a well documented hateful & traceable online track record. Let's say you apply for a job, and, when they find out about your hateful online track record they avoid hiring you (a conflict-prone person, a liability) but you try to get them fired because they are "bullying you" & you even have the gall play the victim by storify-ing them. Let's say that the reddit poll of the "10 most hated people on Reddit" is featured on a "little" high circulation site called the "daily dot". Let's say the idea is confirmed by the massive audience at the daily dot. Yes, it is unanimously decided you are the 7th most hated redditor worldwide.

Impressively hateful, isn't it?

With this impressive online CV, @fakerobotgamer got the job. She immediately became my chosen target.

Luring & Defeating target Anna in 3 stages

Stage 1

The Baiting of target Anna

If you want to catch bears you bait them with "bear-crack" AKA a mixture of marshmallows, sugar, dog treats & maple syrup they cannot resist.

But if you want to catch a hypocrite radfem troll what kind of bait do you use? Yes. You use "hypocrite-crack" AKA a mixture of inflated ego, personal insult and challenge they cannot resist because they will want to parade it to their audience.

To start my research, I went to her online profiles looking for evidence she was indeed a radfem and not an impersonator. The evidence checked out, I found plenty of hate and also that she has several cats and a dog. In nature, if you want to get the most vicious reaction from a female animal you threaten their cubs to distract her. In Anna's case her pets were used to create a collage where her cats had text balloons saying they did not want to be treated like human babies and that they would rather die of parvo than keepliving with her. (Reminder, a low-level troll would have threatened her or her cats. I, the better troll, chose to make her cats "say" the raw most likely truth instead; she uses them as maternal objects because she is broken and cannot be a functional mother. The "parvo" bit was just the rotten cherry on top.) It appears the text balloons struck a nerve (quite wounding indeed as I would later find out). Just like in nature, the female animal living in @fakerobotgamer's hypothalamus did not disappoint; she viciously responded on Twitter with a barrage of ragging tweets. I, on the other hand, initially responded by just "favving" her raging tweets, just to give her some extra frustration.

(Side note: as with most poisonous things in nature, I expected the container of her poison to be brightly colored–A.K.A her head. But most of her selfies had been removed, hard to tell what bright color her hair is now)

Stage 2

The sandpaper questioning of target Anna

Before she responded to the bait I had been planning what raw nerves to caress & massage with 40-grit sandpaper gloves. These were the radfem traits I wanted to discuss with her, unencumbered by any politeness or political correctness

Example
Trait
"Has a history of molestation/ sexual abuse"

Sample sandpaper question:
"Were you molested/sexually abused & was it a family member?"

Explanation
The question is based on Socratic questioning & does not qualify as a threat at all, quite the opposite, it could be asked in a court of law if needed. It is especially grating and abrasive because according to PC dogma, we are not supposed to ask it in everyday life. Again, a better troll should use zero threats, zero swearing, zero sexual innuendo and be direct and raw. Anyways you get the idea, here is the rest of the traits shared by SJW's and radfems. (I won't go into sample questions for each because well, you also get the idea)

Common Traits of SJW's

- Has a history of molestation/ sexual abuse
- Sexual abuse led into radicalism
- Embraced feminism as a religion to cope with trauma
- Has untreated PTSD+Erotomania+Delusions of persecution
- Raised by single mother
- Has daddy issues
- Struggles with science math and STEM in general
- Claims of oppression to compensate for inferiority complex
- Holds a humanities degree but little or no formal scientific training
- Has a tendency for public speaking more than actual work
- Constantly censors language by using the word "offensive"
- Expects nobody to get "offended" when making vicious comments when angry
- Has an "US VS THEM" mentality
- Has a history of conflictive relationships at work
- Constantly displays screen-shots of "attacks" on social media
- Claims is constantly at risk but has filed ZERO police reports

Stage 3

Exposing Anna's defeat on storify

We are at stage 3 now. The trolling of @fakerobotanna was successful and you have to read it to believe it. Anna seeks to hide her misadventure on storify as much as possible. Fortunately we were at over 1000 views at the time of this writing.

Here is where I ask you dear reader to share the storify link on Twitter, Facebook, G+, TO EXPOSE THIS

RACIST, HATEFUL RADFEM

Here is the link
http://sfy.co/dfln

Thank you for reading.

Tucker Carlson Says Rape Is Great!

AVfM Video Source · 7 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

TJ Kirk, aka The Amazing Atheist, calls out Tucker Carlson. We don't (necessarily) agree with him that Bill Maher or others who talk like this are any better but otherwise: right on, TJ:

What someone should ask Tucker Carlson, and anyone else who thinks like he does, if they can acknowledge that young girls also often fantasize about older men, or that young teen girls have reported enjoying the sex they had with their teachers or other much older authority figures. And then ask them to try to explaining still why they have such a double-standard.

More details on this matter at Media Matters. In the meantime, you may want to subscribe to the Amazing Atheist, whether you're an atheist or not.

I Owe a Tremendous Amount to Hanna Rosin

Joe Wilson · 7 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I owe a lot to Hanna Rosin. No seriously. I really do. Four months ago I couldn't tell you who she was. I also couldn't tell you who Warren Farrell, Paul Elam, Karen Straughan or the two dozen or so names were I've come to know over the last few months.

But it all started with Hanna.

It was Friday, January 3rd. I was killing a little time over lunch, reading over articles on The Blaze, when I came across one that sounded hilarious: "Time Magazine Presents 'Five Reasons We Are Definitely Witnessing the End of Men'." As someone who spends a considerable amount of time following conspiracy stories I've come to learn you can't believe everything you read. But I thought the title warranted a quick look at the article. So I read it.

I would find out later that The Blaze writer did a fairly good job at conveying Hanna Rosin's sentiment when relaying Hanna's assertions about half the human population. Hanna Rosin had made the assumption that "Men are Obsolete." In the weeks to come I would learn exactly how correct she was–and I was mad!

Initially, it wasn't the revelation that men were on their way out that made me angry. At this point I was still convinced I was reading up on some crazy conspiracy theory. No, but I was mad at Hanna! You see it wasn't the fact that she was making an observation and somehow conveying compassion over the subject matter. Any compassionate human would at least handle the subject with an ounce of tact. No, it was more like "Ha ha he he, men are going way of the dinosaur. Let's uncork the champagne!

Here are the FIVE assertions she makes in her original Time article:

1. It's the end of men because men are failing in the workplace.
2. It's the end of men because the traditional household, propped up by the male breadwinner, is vanishing.
3. It's the end of men because we can see it in the working and middle class.
4. It's the end of men because men have lost their monopoly on violence and aggression.
5. It's the end of men because men, too, are now obsessed with their body hair.

She goes on to explain how boys are falling behind and not doing well at school. This is something I know too well. For years my wife, a school teacher in a bad location of Toronto, has been sharing her statistics on how boys have been progressively doing worse.

So I got working. Hanna Rosin had sparked my flame. Was there any truth to what she was saying? And if so why wasn't the mainstream media covering any of this? Surely, 60 Minutes would have covered this years ago before things started getting out of control? No. Hanna was right. She was also an asshole for having the audacity to laugh at us men while we were down. And if she could, she would kick us while we lay there–for good measure! I was convinced she was an evil woman. I later found out she had a son. How could a mom glow at such a potentially dismal future for her son???

Now, a week had gone by and as the weather furiously blasted away outside I worked away inside. I was now a confirmed Men's Human Rights Movement Activist. I was busy reading articles on AVFM and watching a ton of videos. I had swallowed the red pill and there absolutely no way I could go back. I wasn't sure I really wanted to go down this newly discovered path. Something told me I would become cognizant of a lot of information I didn't particularly want to hear. I was right. The movement had opened more doors than I had wished for. Some of these doors were very painful personal insights into my own past experiences. But at least now, instead of being buried within some deep dark chamber in my subconscious mind, I was dragging it out into the open and making some therapeutic progress.

And it all started with Hanna. On account of her, I now use every opportunity to talk to people about MHRM. I participate in social discussions and I also began my own blog. Recently I wrote an article on how Hanna had diminished the suffering of a mentally disabled boy by two older girls and how she showed no disdain for the girls who tortured him. Oh, I was no fan of Ms. Rosin and I had completely written her off–until I came across a more recent article.

I was doing research on a newly-released paper "The Sexual Victimization of Men in America: New Data Challenge Old Assumptions." The paper will become one of the hottest topics for MRAs in the weeks, and months to come. It essentially confirms evidence that has been presented by MRAs for years, that men are about as likely to be raped as women are and that women are quite often the primary perpetrators. And as I scoured the internet for anything related to the paper, I found an article…..by Hanna Rosin!

Several things came to mind. None of them good. Before getting past the title I had already made up my mind on what was likely to unveil. Hanna had already decimated the story of the two girls torturing that poor boy. Nothing, absolutely nothing in that article, showed any compassion for the boy victim or any contempt for the girls who tortured him. Only compassion for one person: the boy's mother.

But, I couldn't resist, and so I read Hanna's take on the new Research Paper and, well: it was good! She didn't hold back anything or distort the facts to suit a feminist agenda. She didn't question the validity of the study. She didn't minimize the reality. Her title and subtitle were spot on:

> When Men Are Raped
>
> A new study reveals that men are often the victims of sexual assault, and women are often the perpetrators.

I agreed with every bit of it. Except perhaps for a moment at the very end where she attributes the emerging data as a consequence of feminism's purported attempts to breakdown stereotypes. No Hanna, Men's Rights Activists have been saying all this for many years only to be spit on and name-called by feminists, when not completely ignored.

But I really didn't care about that. I was genuinely happy because Hanna's post reached a hell of a lot of people – most of whom are probably not associated with the men's rights movement. Her article (at the time of this writing) has been retweeted 2K and has been posted over 25K on Facebook! Those are impressive numbers. And either directly or indirectly the numbers are going to be difficult to ignore….especially by feminists. Feminists will have to face the facts. First CDC statistics–now this study–and now even mainstream media is taking a closer look.

This paper could severely throw the feminist agenda off course. With men no longer touted as the only rapists and women no longer the only victims the ramifications could have profound effects on the allocation of government funds. It is also poised to cast more doubt on an increasingly failing feminist movement.

I'm not sure I'm ready yet to bury the hatchet with Hanna just yet. But, I'll give it some time and we'll see what else comes forth. "You will know them by their fruits."

The meat grinder, Edmonton style: The Aaron Joseph Harms Story

Suzanne McCarley · 7 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In September 2013, Joseph Aaron Harms began writing a blog, "Tortured by the Canadian government." Much of his story is there. In eight months the site has garnered 16,000 views, rather impressive for a guy nobody's ever heard of.

After being contacted about the case by Men's Rights Edmonton, A Voice for Men reached out to Harms and began investigating his case. We now have the complete story and the documentation to go with it. This article is the first in a series that will bring his story to an even wider audience.

Joseph Harms' nightmare began almost three years ago, and it has yet to end. On May 21, 2011 his fifteen year old common-law stepdaughter, Angel Roberts, called 911 and reported that he raped her. On October 9, 2013 Joseph was acquitted during his trial, after Angel confessed in court that it was all a lie. He is still facing very-much-related "unrelated" false charges of assaulting his girlfriend and "assaulting" police officers, who broke down his door without identifying themselves while threatening to kill him, during an unjustified and unlawful raid. He defended his home and his person. I've heard that the bear spray he used on them hurts like hell, and I hope it did.

The consequences of Angel Roberts' false accusation are staggering. Joseph Harms was questioned and arrested, and he has since been subject to nonstop pressure and coercion to confess to anything at all, which might justify the initial charges and conveniently discredit him as well. He has lost his home, his family, his pets, his job, and everything else he has worked for in life. He was questioned and detained for several days without an attorney. He was denied much-needed medical attention. He was denied bail through an act of fraud, and then refused release when his bail was finally granted. He was physically and mentally abused while incarcerated (In a future article, medical records will show his condition the day he was released). He was denied contact with those who could help and support him, both while in remand and under the conditions of his bail. Most of his attorneys worked against his best interests, both actively and passively.

Police, crown prosecutors, and at least one of his own attorneys have lied and have mishandled exculpatory evidence. He and his friends have been victims of harassment by law enforcement, including the unlawful police raid that resulted in his currently-pending charges. His girlfriend was forced to relocate in order to avoid police pressure to falsely testify against him. His bail restrictions have prevented him from working in his field. Police even attempted to have his bail revoked, when he was away from his approved residence while he was in the hospital recovering from a suicide attempt. Police have wantonly destroyed his personal property during unlawful searches. It took two and a half years to bring his first case to trial.

There is a long list of well documented Charter Rights (what Americans would call Constitutional Rights) violations against Joseph Harms. This is not a case of a man falling through the cracks. This is a case of a man being shoved into chasms. None of it would have happened had he done as instructed and pleaded guilty to a crime he didn't commit. But he said "no." He refused to shuffle obediently into his place in line for the Criminal Justice Meat Grinder, and he paid for it with everything he had, almost including his life. This article is an introductory overview of the entire case. Future articles will explore the events in greater detail and provide more documentation. Some of the linked documents are very long, and the redacted trial transcripts are difficult to read, but worth the trouble.

In her statement to RCMP Corporal Rick Dozois on May 21, 2011, Angel Roberts—who has a history of making false accusations—claimed that after an argument over chores that afternoon, Joseph sexually assaulted her (1). She also claimed that during the assault he picked her up bodily and set her down on her bed. This statement should have been the first clue that she was lying, because at that time Joseph was suffering from a herniated disk. One week prior to the alleged assault he injured his back while at work, and according to a medical report—ironically dated the day of the alleged attack—he would have been unable to lift a teenage girl:

> Range of motion of lumbar spine is decreased in all ranges. In flexion by 39%; in extension by 80%;and left > lateral flexion by 80% in right lateral flexion by 30%. Truncal rotation is reduced by 50%…Unable to lift greater than 20 pounds from waist height…(2)

Indeed in order to detain Joseph, the police had to remove his lumbar support brace, and it was noted that he was in excruciating pain throughout his interrogation – er – "interview."

Corporal Dozois is one of the four investigating officers whose trial testimony was stricken because the judge declared them "less than credible" in a Voir Dire hearing during the trial (3, p.107-121). Another, RCMP officer Colin Folk, has been brought before the RCMP review board at least twice for excessive force. His actions were found to be justified by the same law enforcement organization that has been maliciously hounding Joseph Harms for three years. The Mounties were clearly determined to get their man and they probably thought they had an easy open-and-shut case. Harms was injured, not well educated, and of relatively low social standing; he appeared to be exactly the kind of man who could be easily railroaded by the criminal justice system. They were sorely mistaken in their assessment of Joseph Harms.

The first of several documented (4) violations of Harms' Charter Rights was his detention without access to an attorney. He was held for a few days at the local jail, then transferred to Edmonton Remand Centre, all before he saw an attorney. He fired his first legal aid attorney on the spot when—without so much as looking at Joseph's file—the man told him "You plead guilty and I will get you the best deal possible." Police, prosecutors, Edmonton Remand Centre staff, and at least one defense attorney spent the next nine months lying and actively working to prevent his being granted bail. Unable to provide evidence that bail should not be granted, they mishandled exculpatory evidence and lied about its existence. Edmonton officials even refused to release him after his bail was granted. Throughout those months, he was denied medical attention, physically abused, and mentally tormented. Six weeks after Joseph's release on bail, enough DNA evidence test results had come back to make a conviction nearly impossible, yet the prosecution still pursued the charges. His preliminary inquiry—scheduled for June 2012—was postponed until December 2012 because Angel Roberts decided not to show up, and instead went drinking with her friends.

While on bail he was forced to move from approved residence to approved residence five times. He was constantly followed and watched, and he and his new girlfriend frequently received mysterious and threatening text messages. In June of 2013, based on the patently false pretense for which evidence has yet to be shown, police unlawfully raided his apartment without identifying themselves as police. He defended himself from the attack with bear spray and was subsequently charged with thirty-three counts of various assaults against police officers and one count of assault against his girlfriend. Based on the latter charge—another false allegation and the pretence behind the raid—the courts forced a restraining order against him, separating them very much against her will. She had to relocate to escape pressure from police to falsely testify against Harms. Eleven of those charges are still pending, and that trial is scheduled for December 2014.

The trial for the false rape claim was scheduled for October 2013, and it played out rather like a circus, beginning with a Voir Dire hearing which resulted in the exclusion of testimony from RCMP officers Richard Dozois, Colin Folk, and two others, and continuing with the false accuser Angel Roberts wandering around the courthouse talking with other witnesses. The trial ended after Angel admitted on the stand to lying under oath. On October 9, 2013, the trial was concluded by acquittal.

> — my confession first. When court started, I didn't want to put Joseph in jail because I didn't feel like deeming somebody for doing wrong. I just was hoping he would just stay away from me and my mother. Because I have known him since I was nine years old, and him and I never got along a lot, but when we did — I never had a father-figure in my life, and I didn't want to put him in jail because — because he cared about me a lot. (trial transcript p.189)

After Angel Roberts made this statement, and after she had been shown to have changed her testimony several times, the prosecution decided to force an acquittal by not presenting any further evidence. How could the Crown possibly do otherwise? Five of the Crown's key witnesses had been caught lying, including the accuser herself. Had there been physical evidence, perhaps the prosecution could have continued with minimal testimony from non-credible witnesses, but there was never a shred of physical evidence indicating the slightest guilt on the part of Joseph Harms. In fact the physical evidence also proved that Angel Roberts is a liar, and not a very bright one.

So why did the criminal justice system spend two and a half years (three and counting, if we include the charges resulting from police harassment of Joseph Harms) doing everything in its power to ruin an innocent man's life? Was it perhaps to pad the stats and justify the employment of the people who've been persecuting him? Was there never any malicious intent, and these people are just that incompetent and stupid? Perhaps the Police and the court decided to punish him for having the audacity to say, "No" to his self-proclaimed "betters."

Watch for further updates as we tell you more about this horror story–and the man who refused to kowtow and plead guilty to something he never did. And while you do, wonder how many other men's lives have been ruined because they foolishly pled guilty to something they didn't do, hoping to make it all go away.

1. Angel's original statement (PDF)

2. Joseph Harms Medical Report (PDF)

3. Harms trial transcript (PDF)

4. Charter Notice 2 14 (PDF)

A Blue Pill Story

Christian Chiasson · 7 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Our story begins with a young man in his teens. His sexual desires are just beginning to bloom as he enters biological manhood. He confuses this with a desire to be publicly pair bonded with a young woman because all of his life up to this point he's been told to be a nice guy, to respect girls and to treat them nice. And so he does. He's been so deeply indoctrinated with the idea that mistreating girls, and only girls, comes with a punishment far worse than that of murder, and the idea that viewing women from a sexual viewpoint is wrong no matter what the situation. He is completely unprepared for what awaits him.

Our young man is in the 10th grade. He has several dating prospects around him. Day in and day out he hangs out with young women his age, trying to be noticed as more than just another teenage boy in school. He wants to be seen as a sexual being, as worthy of female attention. He develops a more mature sense of humour, he studies hard because he wants to match women intellectually, he wears all of his best clothes, his best pair of shoes, he engages these young women in thought-provoking conversation. He does all this because he's been told this is how to attract women. Little does he know he's been lied to.

Fast forward 5 months, about half way through the school year. He's been unsuccessful in securing a mate. He begins to become confused, but doesn't question the instructions he's been given. He presses on with the unfounded belief that soon he will succeed.

Fast forward once again to the beginning of 11th grade. He was not successful the previous year and he walks in with what appears to be a new-found sense of confidence, despite him actually being more confused now than he ever was. He is still not questioning the validity of the instructions given to him since birth. A small pinch of desperation begins to set in as he tells himself "This is the year. I will succeed". He, of course, is lying to himself.

2 months, 4 months, 8 months in and no success. He struggles to keep the desperation and depression hidden. He begins to question himself. Maybe he isn't worthy. Maybe he's not good enough. He questions himself, but still will not question the instructions he was given. He calls himself a male feminist, a true blue pill teenager. He tries to appeal to women by expressing his belief that they are more than he is. He accepts the lie that is transference of guilt. He accepts the lie that marriage and the nuclear family were forms of oppression, rather than a necessity for survival. He accepts the lie that men working in a coal mine for 14 hours a day, breathing in coal dust, was a privilege rather than a responsibility and a sacrifice. He truly believes this. It isn't just a tactic to appeal to women. He truly, and wholeheartedly believes he is less than a woman. He is still unsuccessful and depression takes hold by the end of the school year.

The following year, grade 12, he walks in with his head hanging low. He's given up. He is 17, going on 18 in a few short months. He decides he will finish school, go to college, and start his career before trying to find love again.

This is foiled by the fact that when he was 4, he was struck by a taxi cab, operated by a young 16-year-old who stole it from his father in order to make some cash for the weekend. The result of this event was 1 night in the hospital and a small 8,000 dollar settlement, placed in a trust fund, which would accrue interest until he turned 18 when it would be turned over into his possession. He continues with his life at school for the next few months, patiently awaiting his 18th birthday. He plans to spoil himself a little bit in the hopes that material possessions will cure his depression. He has no idea how naive he is.

Winter holiday comes quickly, and he has 2 weeks off school. He is expected to be back to school shortly before his 18th birthday but he plans the day off anyways. He's eyeing a brand new laptop and MP3 player, and with the trust fund soon to be his, he can afford it. But little does he know that something is about to happen that will confuse him more than any of his failings with women.

The day he turns 18, he makes his way to the bank to find just over 16,000 dollars has been turned over into his bank account. A smile appears on his face as he takes his access card back and buses to the nearest future shop.

He's going to buy that laptop right away. He's always had an interest in computer technologies and finally he will have one of his own to tinker with. His hope is to get into IT, and he's been teaching himself about computers since he was 11. He's familiar with the inner workings of a desktop by this point, even doing his co-op education program at the IT department for the local University. He shows great promise in the field, and with an IQ of 141, he is quite good as solving issues accurately and timely. He just needs experience with the smaller and more compact laptop technologies.

The following day he shows up to school sporting his brand new laptop at his side. He has plans to type his school notes, rather than hand write them, from that point forward. This catches the attention of the young women at school, and immediately they know he has money. He tells them about the taxi cab and the trust fund, and that he had received it the previous day.

From this point women seem to flock to him but he is still far too naive at this point to put 2 and 2 together. He doesn't know they want his money, and he doesn't really question it despite being unable to find anything else about him that has changed to make him more appealing to the opposite sex. He simply accepts his new-found appeal and presses on.

Over the next few months he has a few short relationships, but none of them lead to anything physical beyond hand holding and cheek kissing. He is 18 years old and still a virgin. A secret he tries hard to keep as the idea of a male being 18 and still a virgin is shameful to him. He does not want anyone to know but he doesn't know how to approach the topic either. He's under the impression that the very mention of sex turns women off and he's afraid of losing the little bit of female attention he has. That is until he meets a young woman in a nearby city.

They both begin dating and she challenges everything he's learned up to this point. She initiates sex on the first date. He initially lies to her about his sexual past, or lack of one to be accurate, and tells her he isn't a virgin. He doesn't go big with the lie though. He tells her he has had a few encounters but nothing to brag about. The relationship lasts until his trust fund dries up and he is still too naive to realize where his sudden appeal came from. 18, broke and again single he seeks other relationships locally. He finds none and will remain single until he is 22.

By this time he's regretting how he frivolously spent his entire trust fund on others instead of investing. Women became a distraction and as a result his grades plummeted and he could no longer get into any good University or College. His choices were to repeat the 12th grade, or acquire his GED and enter the workforce. With increasing pressure from his parents he chose the latter.

He began working for a call centre company that handles tech support for the Xbox 360 console and Xbox live service. Making only minimum wage, but punching in enough overtime, he was able to make enough money to move out into his own place, with a roommate of course. His roommate was a coworker who had been falsely accused of rape. He signed off as a surety to get him out of jail but at this point he is still too blue pill to know that false rape accusations occur any more than 2% of the time. He signs reluctantly, partially believing the accusation is actually genuine. The 10 months living with his coworker quickly become toxic as the belief that the accusation is genuine starts to creep into the forefront of his mind. He starts believing he's helping a rapist escape punishment and this begins to eat away at his conscience.

During this time a new tenant moves into the apartment upstairs. A very attractive, independent woman who catches our young man's eye. They begin talking and things begin to evolve. She tells him about her abusive ex boyfriend and he quickly develops a sense of empathy and compassion for her. He feels bad that she was treated this way. The relationship only lasts a few months when he finds out she cheated on him with the very same ex she claimed was abusive. Shortly after she leaves our young man and gets back with her ex.

After 10 months, the trial was over and his coworker, and roommate, has been found guilty. His mind spirals into a state of guilt as he believes he has betrayed the very women he was raised to protect. The fact that the evidence for the guilty verdict was flaky or non-existent does nothing to diminish this state of mind. Within days he quickly pulls surety and sends his roommate back to jail before the sentencing date. His roommate is forced to get his new girlfriend to sign. Our young man moves back in with his parents and carries with him a feeling that he's failed and betrayed women everywhere. He does not feel like a man.

As the years pass, our young man tries desperately to figure out why he has such bad luck with women. He's a nice guy. He's compassionate, he's empathetic, he carries a torch for women's rights and he defers to the women around him for direction. He's completely unaware that the very women he defers to see him as a directionless loser. He believes he's doing the right thing, but is completely unaware that his unmasculine, feminine, behaviour is self sabotaging.

4 years pass before he meets who he believes in the woman of his dreams. He falls head over heels in love quickly. They begin a relationship and initially things are amazing. He's never been so happy. She's the perfect woman, and the very sight of her face lights his heart on fire. Her touch sends him into a state of bliss. He just wants to be around her. A few months pass and he begins to notice she is spending less and less time with him. Not just that but often also forgetting plans they make together. He finds himself going to her place to do nothing more than dog sit while she goes out with friends. The depression begins to develop as the idea that he's simply being used as a means for her to neglect her responsibilities. He is still far too naive to accept this truth, but begins expressing annoyance and frustration. They begin fighting and he tries tirelessly to shift the blame on anything but her. She can't be using him. She's perfect and he loves her. He is completely blind.

He goes over to her place one day, as they have plans, but once again finds she "forgot" about them. He spends the entire day, and most of the night alone in her apartment as she spends her time partying and getting drunk. He goes to bed, only to be woken up at about 2 in the morning to a heavily intoxicated and angry girlfriend. She screams at him, kicks him out of her apartment, and pushes her deep freezer up against the door. He returns home for the night.

The next day he returns to find the door has been blocked by the deep freezer, but the door isn't locked. He manages to push his way into the apartment. She is on the couch, still passed out and a plate of food has been knocked over onto the carpet. The dog was not taken out, and as a result defecated and urinated on the floor. He waits patiently for her to wake up.

When she finally regains consciousness she finds him sitting opposite to her, the food on the carpet, the deep freezer out-of-place and the shit and piss on the floor. She asks our young man what happened, and he tells her with tears beginning to stream down his face. The events of the night before, coupled with the events of his past have left such a scar that he cannot hide it any longer. He's breaking, and the cracks can't be contained much longer.

She apologizes profusely and explains this is a pattern of hers. This isn't the first time she's done this and our young man is not her first victim. He accepts her apology on the condition that she begin attending AA meetings. She agrees.

They call for local AA meeting times and decide the next day, a Wednesday, would be a good time to start. He goes with her, right at her side, to show support. Little did he know that she was not taking this seriously.

The following week, when she was supposed to go to her second meeting, she skipped out. A week later, she skipped out again. She wasn't hiding her inability to take responsibility very well, but he was still very much blind to it.

During the next few months he continued to shift blame on anything and anyone but her until they decided to move in together. They found a place across town, a new neighbourhood and to him a new beginning. Things were good for a week. She began exhibiting the same behaviour as before, but she grew in toxicity. She began blaming her toxic behaviour and neglect on him. Several times removing his keys for days, or weeks, at a time so he could not go anywhere. He was 26, and his girlfriend was essentially grounding him for her own behaviour.

What's more is that she began demanding that he not talk to family or friends about certain things. Any breach of this resulted in her threatening to end the relationship, and again grounding him by relinquishing his keys. She also began controlling his finances. Where he couldn't spend a dime on himself, she would shop all day. Buying useless items that most of the time remained unopened and unused for weeks or sometimes months.

Soon she met another man and was spending large amounts of time with him. Our young man wouldn't dare tell her not to spend time with this other man but soon things got to be too much. She began making plans with our young man, only to cancel them because the other man wanted to hang out. It got to the point where she would make plans with our young man, only to call the other man on the phone just minutes after and make plans with him instead, right in front of our young man. He was beginning to feel unwanted. He tried incredibly hard to find ways to bring back the feelings they shared in the early days of the relationship, but failed time and time.

She began to intentionally try to frustrate and anger our young man each week, to the point where he felt he had to leave for the weekends, freeing up hers. While he was recovering from the week before, she was partying and enjoying herself.

It all came to blows one day when our young man finally reached his breaking point. Almost a decade of lies, betrayal, and selfish, toxic women had finally broken what little spirit he had left.

One morning, 14 months into the relationship, the man and his psychologically abusive spouse made plans to spend the day together. It was one last chance for the woman to prove she actually cared about him. After a quick lunch at the coffee shop, and a trip to the nearby grocery store, he discovered that one of the woman's friends had been waiting outside for the couple to return home. During the walk home the man listened in as their plans were once again, and for the final time, cancelled. He realized she cared nothing for him and was simply looking for excuses to spend as little time as possible. He walked ahead, quickly, and left the two women to walk back alone.

When she and her friend returned, she found our young man on the balcony having a cigarette and trying to calm down before deciding how to deal with his new-found epiphany. She opened the door, and began interrogating him. As calmly as he could, he told her that he knew their plans are shot, that she was going to spend the day with her friend instead and that they would talk about it when she returned. The woman's friend spoke up, telling the man not to talk to her that way. Not to be disrespected in a place that he calls home, he bluntly told the friend to shut the fuck and stay out of it. An argument ensued when the friend told the man she thinks he should move out.

The man asked the friend multiple times to leave his home, but she refused. He exercised his right and forcefully removed her from the apartment. The argument between the couple continued, until she told him that he had fucked up worse than ever before. She relinquished his keys, went to her friend's house and they both called the police. The man was arrested under a false domestic abuse allegation and removed from the home.

He had experienced first hand how easy it is for a false accusation to be treated as genuine, if the accuser is a woman. And how easy it is for a woman to make a false accusation without guilt for what she puts another person through.

On that day, an MRA was born.

Our young man now thinks back to his former roommate, and he was falsely accused. He is filled with guilt once again, but this time for betraying his friend. He knows he doesn't deserve forgiveness, but he hopes his friend can forgive him someday.

Our young man is forever changed. His eyes wide open to the truth. A giant red pill shoved down his throat in the form of his own false accusation story. He's become the uncaring jerk he always tried so hard not to be. He is shamed by women for becoming the very thing those women molded him into through his experiences with them. Yet he feels no shame at all. Not anymore. He is reborn, living for himself, defining himself and rejecting any and all external definitions of himself.

Once a blue pill beta, now forever a red pill zeta.

What feminists don’t know

AVfM Video Source · 8 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

“I am a feminist, and I DON’T KNOW…”

You may want to subscribe to Realraven2000.

Canadian Senator Anne Cools' ongoing battle against gender feminism

Diana Davison · 8 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Senator Anne Clare Cools was appointed to the Canadian Senate in 1984 by Pierre Trudeau. She was the first black senator in Canada and the first black female senator in all of North America. Beginning her political career as a member of the Liberal party, Senator Cools is now an independent and has continued to boldly and conscientiously speak out against gender feminism where it threatens to undermines the integrity of Canadian society.

In her foreword to The Most Dangerous Branch, a book by law professor Robert Martin about corruption in the Canadian Supreme Court, Senator Cools provides a history of the battle to curb the power of judges to alter laws outside of the proper parliamentary processes.

> The Canadian courts' foray into politics on the ground and justification of Charter rights and Charter values is currently termed judicial activism. Some have called it kritarchy, that is, government by the judges."

In numerous Senate Chamber speeches, Senator Cools has addressed gender feminism, even introducing the word gynocentrism on March 4, 1999, while confronting "judge bashing" and feminist influence in the Supreme Court.

In that speech, Senator Cools challenges the Senate to research the roots of current feminist demands upon the legal system in Canada.

> Honourable senators, one wonders what American feminist Catharine MacKinnon's book, The Theory of the Feminist State, has to do with law and jurisprudence in Canada. What does a raw, gender feminist, ideological diatribe that seeks to criminalize man-woman sexual relations have to do with the Supreme Court of Canada, or with an Alberta Superior Court judge, the grandson of Nellie McClung? Catharine MacKinnon, a gyno-centric feminist, postulates that man-woman sexual relations are abhorrent because they violate women, and that in a patriarchal society all heterosexual intercourse is rape. MacKinnon helped to craft sexual assault laws in Canada. This gender feminist ideology has driven much law in Canada, and consequently has driven much injustice. It has ravaged law, justice, many careers, and many human lives. It worked for many years. It was even lucrative. It resulted in positions, jobs, grants, and even appointments to the bench. It created a terrible silence as it inflicted obvious injustices on many. It was buttressed by feminist terrorism and aggression, ready to pursue to destruction anyone who gets in its way, while chanting its mantra that all evil and violence are men's, and that all goodness, virtue, and truth are women's.

In confronting and exposing feminist fraud, Senator Anne Cools has been relentless in both her research and her demand for answers from those responsible. Having devoted her life's work to domestic violence, Senator Cools is in a unique position to recognize the deceit and manipulations of feminist rhetoric when they misinform the public and the legal proceedings.

In a debate about firearms and domestic violence Senator Cools addresses outrageous claims by feminist groups regarding the level of danger and fear caused to women by the existence of guns in society:

> Honourable senators, I am disquieted that much testimony before the Senate committee was either incorrect, inadequate, misstated, manipulated, exaggerated or loaded as a gender issue. Some confounded the issues. Their techniques include playing with percentages and combining the unrelated, and are obvious to those knowledgeable in the field."

Senator Cools notes that even feminists acknowledge their own fraud as shortly after giving "testimony stretching credulity and scientific inquiry" to a committee regarding Bill C-68, Dr. Katherine Leonard was overheard by another witness asking “How did you like that science fiction?”

In a stunning summary, Senator Anne Cools offers the following assessment:

> Gender feminist theory is an example of intellectual fraudulence and is a theory based on philogyny, tribadism and misandry. This theory currently stalks the social and political life of this country. It is predatory, and seeks to dominate and terrorize. It is a personality disorder in the body politic of this nation.

Currently the longest-standing member of the Senate, Senator Anne C. Cools is a beacon of hope for Canadian men. She has advocated for fathers’ rights, helping to produce a Special Joint Committee report called For the Sake of the Children, recommending shared parenting. She monitors the activities and advances of gender feminism and their influence on the courts to overstep judicial bounds and corrupt the Canadian constitution. With full awareness that challenging feminist ideologues is dangerous business, Senator Cools has fearlessly challenged them at every step.

And yet little progress has been made.

As Senator Cools has noted, “there is something very wrong going on in this country and there are many issues that are needing attention and there are certain issues that are needing correction. Let us look at them because I tell you, the hundreds and thousands of people whose lives are being destroyed daily is so obvious that I do not understand how it does not just hit everyone. “

People like Senator Anne Cools don’t give up. The lack of progress is not discouraging, it is incentive to become more innovative and find new ways of communicating. Men’s rights activists, like Senator Cools, are not fighting a single battle as if it’s a chess game with a time limit. We are fighting for something bigger: reason, rational discussion, equality, and justice.

That’s a fight that never ends and one that should never be given up.

Editorial note: Senator Cools will be one of the featured speakers at the International Conference on Men’s Issues, June 26-28 in Detroit. –DE

Dear Feminism: NAFALT goes both ways, part 1

Hannah Wallen · 9 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

NAFALT: Not All Feminists Are Like That. It's usually the argument used to say that not all feminists are evil man-hating narcissists and liars. Which seems to sometimes be true. But there's another side to saying Not All Feminists Are "Like That": feminists are in the habit of claiming feminism is responsible for things they were never responsible for things they claimed.

Recently, PolicyMic published an article apparently intended to help renew feminism's sinking reputation. The article, an opinion piece by Elizabeth Plank, listed off 23 Ways Feminism Has Made the World a Better Place for Men.

It would seem like a pretty good reason to be thankful, if feminism actually improved the world for men. Unfortunately for men and the author of the piece, her assessment is far from accurate. Let's take a look at those claims.

1. It gave our economy a huge, long-lasting boost.

No, it didn't. Ms. Plank writes as if feminism is responsible for women's place in the workforce after World War II, a view that ignores work done by women prior to the war, and the conditions which led to women temporarily filling some work areas that were previously dominated by men.

Not only were women a part of the workforce prior to WWII, they were involved in the industry that transformed the American labor force from being mainly family labor and apprenticeship to wage labor: The textile industry. They also were involved in areas we now think of as traditionally male. An account from Great Britain, Parliamentary Papers, 1842, Vol XVI shows that at least one politician was appalled to see Welsh girls and women facing the same working conditions as men in English coal mines. Further down that page a woman describes the work and goes on to state that it was even harder to do while pregnant ("in a family way.")

So what was Rosie the Riveter all about?

Prior to WWII, women who did hard jobs did them out of need for income, just like men. These women couldn't afford to be choosey because they were poor. Upper class women didn't seek out jobs in coal mines and textile mills, take positions serving other households, or otherwise subject themselves to harsh labor. They stayed at home because they could, or they engaged in activism, wrote, or sought education, earned credentials, and took higher end, higher paying jobs.

Rosie the Riveter was about women stepping up to fill work force roles vacated by men who were drafted or volunteered to fight in the war. The effort was not so much a feminist initiative to change women's roles as it was a social response to suddenly changing labor needs, and it occurred because of something completely unrelated to feminism: The Fair Labor Standards act of 1938, which dramatically altered the dynamics of the labor market. The law established a 44 hour work week (later shortened to the 40 we know today) and outlawed oppressive child labor practices. The need for large numbers of women to enter the manufacturing labor force was in part created by the shorter work week, which increased the number of people it would take to produce the same results, and in part by the removal of children from the work force, which left women as the default replacement for men.

Outlawing child labor, though it was a needed and obviously right step for the U.S. government to take, was not a response to feminism. Support for the movement to end child exploitation in the work force was partly a result of the shrunken Depression Era job market, and pressure to reserve jobs for household-supporting adults.

Unless feminism caused the stock market crash of 1929 and started the war which pulled men from factories in the early 40s, you can't really claim credit for boosting the economy, Rosie or not.

2. It helped men achieve better relationships and more satisfying sex

The first paragraph attributes improved relationship satisfaction to sharing housework, a tradition that normally exists when both partners work outside the home. As discussed in response to the first claim, that's not a result of feminism, but changes in the overall structure of the employer-labor dynamics during the depression era.

Further, it's not necessarily true, according to a Norwegian study, "Equality in the home," by Thomas Hansen and Britt Slagsvold. They evaluated data from two surveys with a combined total of 18,934 respondents and found that the divorce rate among couples who shared housework equally was around 50 percent higher than among those where the woman did most of the housework. Though the researchers stressed that they found little evidence of cause and effect, they noted that lacking clear roles can add stress to a marriage. While this doesn't mean people should fear a cooperative effort in the home, it does reduce the credibility the article's claim.

The article also misreports the results of this study, which found that the human tendency to be better at relationships with people of like mind as oneself politically and socially also extends to feminists. Big surprise, but far from a shining moment of feminist benevolence toward the overall male population.

3. It successfully overturned laws that discriminate against men.

One would expect something of substance for a claim like this, but instead the writer credits feminism with the result of Craig v. Boren (1976,) a case that was ruled on by male judges who cited the Equal Protection Clause of the 14th amendment to the U.S. constitution, and stated the state's statistical claims on drunk driving didn't justify violating it. Feminism was not involved in the decision.

4. It made life a little easier for single men.

The first example is yet another misrepresentation of the nature and reasoning behind a court case undertaken by the American Civil Liberties Union, an organization not defined as feminist, but an overall civil rights organization. The ACLU takes on a wide variety of cases, covering a range of issues not limited to feminist causes. Moritz v. Commissioner (1972) was a tax case in which an adult caregiver of an aging parent had been denied on the basis of his marital status a tax deduction for covering the expense of a home health care aid to stay with her while he worked. As with Craig V Boren, it was decided based on the Equal Protection clause of the 14th amendment. Feminism is not the determining factor in whether or not an individual is covered by that clause. If ideology was the determining factor in Ruth Bader Ginsburg's choice to advocate remedying an injustice against a man, and she as an ACLU associate would have ignored the case had sexism not been the particular injustice, that's a prejudice, not a type of support.

The author's use of the image from the TV show Full House displayed with that claim is misleading, as the deduction in question was specific for care for an adult dependent, not anything to do with children.

5. It expanded the possibility of more sexy time opportunities.

This claim cites a benefit to women as if it's a benefit for men. Birth control for women is a protection for women, providing women with a measure of control over their own fertility. While this is a good thing, it's a benefit to women that is controlled by women, not a tool for men to use to protect themselves from the unwanted condition of parenthood.

It also credits feminism with something that feminism didn't achieve. While feminists had an impact on use of modern forms of birth control by women, the existence of birth control preceded feminist activism by thousands of years. Its acceptability preceded feminism, as well. It wasn't until after the American Civil War, when the Comstock Law of 1873 was passed, that there was controversy over birth control in the U.S. Interestingly, the law was passed for the same reasons that were purportedly behind Margaret Sanger's founding work which launched what is now Planned Parenthood: To keep poor people from reproducing too much faster than rich people.

That raises another point; the claim also ignores the sexual behavior of humans. Birth control was not created because people couldn't have sex without it, but because people were having sex, and wanted to prevent pregnancy. It didn't increase opportunities for copulation, but merely added to the variety of ways women use to avoid pregnancy.

On the other hand, feminists have (unsuccessfully) opposed an increase in male birth control options, and in the past even opposed condoms because they would take control of reproduction away from women by giving men the ability to prevent their own contribution to pregnancy. While feminists are all for women having control over their reproductive health and the level of responsibility they choose to take, they're not so keen on affording men the same right.

6. It gave men more reproductive control through abortion legalization.

This claim is more of a support for the idea of abortion than discussion of any benefit to men. A woman's access to abortion does not give a man any reproductive control. It gives women the ability to get out of parental responsibility. If she chooses not to do so, the father of her baby is on the hook for support should she choose to retain custody and demand payment. Abortion as a form of birth prevention is completely outside of men's control, not a contributor to their tiny repertoire of options.

7. It triggered the FBI to change the definition of rape to include men.

This is one of feminism's more insidious half-truths. Feminist groups did support an expansion of the definition of rape, but their sympathy and advocacy for male victims has been limited to those victims who fit their agenda, the same as their sympathy and advocacy for female victims. This is why they've focused so heavily on penetration; it allows them to appear compassionate while continuing to exclude victims of female perpetrators from their advocacy.

The effort has influenced government agency responses to sex crime, as explained in the video Mens' Rights vs Feminist Rape Culture explained using Puzzle Pieces. As a result of that exclusion, male victims face systemic, institutionalized indifference.

We can talk about what feminism has done for male victims when feminists reverse that damage.

8. It gave men some well-deserved time off from work.

The FMLA didn't do anything for men that it didn't also do for women. It's not an anti-discrimination law, but a social welfare law based on beliefs about the employee-employer relationship. The law's application to men isn't a feminist choice, but exists because the law would violate the 14th amendment if its application were limited to women. This is at best lip service from feminists, and at worst an attempt to insert gender into a pitch for supporting a political stance.

9. It helped male survivors of violence in the military pursue justice.

The example given is of a case that is far from as cut and dried as the article paints it – and which may be an example of feminist-lead railroading of an accused man. This is feminism attacking men while simultaneously claiming to benefit them. Feminist activism on this topic has been about accusing men and blaming men, despite information that indicates otherwise.

"Men can stop rape" will not help end female perpetration. Pretending that sexual assault is a male behavior only helps to perpetuate the cycle by hiding abusers who don't fit feminism's narrative.

10. It ensured that the burden of war doesn't only fall on male shoulders.

Women currently make up a grand, whopping 14% of the U.S. military despite having been eligible for decades.

The largest percentage of women in the U.S. military are in the Air Force. The smallest percentage are Marines. Feminist involvement has led to the military subjecting male soldiers to increased risk of false allegations of sexual misconduct. Trying to proclaim female participation in the military a feminist success is pitiful.

11. It made the struggle for civil rights a reality.

This claim relies on two things: conflating women with feminism, and the hope that the reader won't remember the work of male civil rights activists. It's a pitiful attempt to ride the coat tails of a movement that feminist demands actually put at risk.

12. It kept prisons safer for male inmates.

Just Detention International was founded in 1980 by Russell Dan to deal "with the problems of rape, sexual assault, un-consensual sexual slavery, and forced prostitution in the prison context." Its battle against sexual assault in prison is not a feminist effort, but a decades-long humanist effort. It's not even a feminist organization. Using a single individual involved with the organization to try to claim feminist credit for the organization's work is shameful and childish.

Although the feminist Stannow can be credited for trying to shoehorn the situation of sexual abuse in prisons into feminist theory by first focusing on a minority of victims–men victimized by other inmates–and ignoring the majority of victims–male inmates victimized by female staff and female inmates victimized by other female inmates. All while wrapping her criminal ignorance in a feminist bow–male on male inmate victimization is actually female victimization because the man being penetrated is seen as "the woman" and thus prison rape is really about the rape of women in the community, the real victims of rape.

When feminist theory has had its way with the reality of sexual violence, the truth is left huddled in a shower, trying to wash itself clean.

At the same time, feminists are responsible for perpetuating existing discrimination against men in criminal court. How helpful is that?

13. It enabled men to spend more time with their children.

This one starts out with wrongfully giving feminists credit for women working, established as false in response to the first claim. The link in support of the paternity leave claim does not show that feminists were behind its creation, and it doesn't look good considering the author's track record of falsely claiming other groups' successes as feminist activism.

Regardless, while the author claims that feminism has enabled men to spend more time with their children, feminists have contradicted her by actively fighting against fathers' rights using demonization of dads as deadbeats and abusers. Currently, women in the U.S. are awarded custody the majority of the time, and interference with Dad's time with the kids is common. Instead of assisting men in spending time with their children, feminist activism has resulted in enabling women abusing custody laws to evict fathers from their children's lives.

Editorial note: click here to Read Part Two. –DE

Independent Women's Forum on gender pay gap

Mike Buchanan · 9 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I hadn't heard of the Virginia-based Independent Women's Forum before recently. Firstly a supporter pointed us to an interesting free book, published in 2002, about how Women's Studies textbooks mislead students. After we published a short piece on the matter, a second supporter pointed us the IWF's short (3:00) video about the gender pay gap, published last year. Our hunch is it was made with a young female audience in mind. It's well put together, and delivers its key points in a very digestible manner:

You may wish to subscribe to the Independent Women's Forum.

The Istanbul Convention: Sleepwalking Into Ruin

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 9 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Modern western societies are enormously complicated affairs composed of byzantine organisations and influences, often difficult to understand and navigate – despite which most of us get how the system works.

We vote for our local politicians, they have certain powers, they do things that influence our lives. We vote for national politicians, they have wider powers with further reaching effects.

Changes to these powers and the results of legislation created under this authority are closely scrutinised by voters and political pundits, journalists and special interest groups – not much is missed, as a rule.

And yet we are often blind to the very real power wielded by those in faraway offices and boardrooms, often acting on a transnational basis, which will unquestionably reach down and touch every one of us in our day-to-day lives through that same political system we so confidently feel we understand.

The very existence of the Istanbul Convention is unknown to many, even to high level journalists in national newspapers, politicians and pundits alike. It has been quietly put together, quietly pressed, and quietly ratified by enough countries to make it binding across those European states who have signed it, from the first of August 2014, with the last three being Spain, Andorra and Denmark. It will be going before the European Parliament soon, and if ratified there will become binding across the EU.

What is the Istanbul Convention?

In short, it's an agreement that governments will undertake to act within its guidelines, said guidelines being essentially a feminist blueprint to inflict every manner of injustice on half the population purely because they have male genitalia.

Let's take a look over some of its articles and statements:

> "Recognising that the realisation of de jure and de facto equality between women and men is a key element in the prevention of violence against women"

…but not violence against men.

> "Recognising that violence against women is a manifestation of historically unequal power relations between women and men, which have led to domination over, and discrimination against, women by men and to the prevention of the full advancement of womenRecognizing the structural nature of violence against women as gender-based violence, and that violence against women is one of the crucial social mechanisms by which women are forced into a subordinate position compared with men"

Now we get to the meat of the matter – this is feminist patriarchy theory in a nutshell, which can be boiled down further to "men are bad, women are good". Oh they'll deny that's what it means but it's the villainisation of men in every circumstance, especially those circumstances where gender is not an issue, such as domestic and intimate partner violence.

> "Recognising, with grave concern, that women and girls are often exposed to serious forms of violence such as domestic violence, sexual harassment, rape, forced marriage, crimes committed in the name of so-called "honour" and genital mutilation, which constitute a serious violation of the human rights of women and girls and a major obstacle to the achievement of equality between women and men"

So the exponentially more boys than girls suffering genital mutilation not only don't exist but are an obstacle to equality. This was actually ratified by national governments.

> "Recognising that women and girls are exposed to a higher risk of gender-based violence than men"

A bald lie put about by the recent FRA survey results, which used typical feminist falsification methodologies to decide who had been assaulted or raped and who hadn't. The reality is that domestic and intimate partner violence is equally distributed between men and women, with if anything women being more violent.

And with shades of or rather outright wearing the desiccated skin of communist Romania we get to article 5:

> "Article 5 – State obligations and due diligence 1 Parties shall refrain from engaging in any act of violence against women and ensure that State authorities, officials, agents, institutions and other actors acting on behalf of the State act in conformity with this obligation. 2 Parties shall take the necessary legislative and other measures to exercise due diligence to prevent, investigate, punish and provide reparation for acts of violence covered by the scope of this Convention that are perpetrated by non-State actors."

Looks like being a police officer just got a whole lot more dangerous, at least if they're facing an armed woman.

There's much more of the Orwellian doublespeak, you get the general idea. Skipping on a bit, we get to the good stuff.

> "Article 8 – Financial resourcesParties shall allocate appropriate financial and human resources for the adequate implementation of integrated policies, measures and programmes to prevent and combat all forms of violence covered by the scope of this Convention, including those carried out by non-governmental organisations and civil society."

I'll wager their beady little eyes were alight with avarice when they penned the above. Create a moral panic using vastly distorted and outright fabricated statistics, quietly push for ratification of a very dubious convention, thus invoking legal authority to resolve the nonexistent problems, and… profit!

Article 12, point 4:

> "Parties shall take the necessary measures to encourage all members of society, especially men and boys, to contribute actively to preventing all forms of violence covered by the scope of this Convention."

Now as I recall there was an effort by radical feminists to do something like this in Ireland back in 2000, they called it "The Exploring Masculinities Programme for Transition Year Boys". The clown responsible was one Maureen Bohan, head of the newly created Gender Equality Unit within the Department of Education. As a true feminist believer, she postulated that masculinity was a social construct rather than something innate to men, and wanted to conduct ongoing social experiments on young Irish boys in order to “cure” them of their “sickness”. Thankfully at the time the attempt was derailed by watchful journalists, and yet here we are again.

This section of the Convention is intended to turn schools across Europe into feminist indoctrination camps, simply and bluntly.

And it goes on in a similar vein. Article 18 is the essence of the Duluth model, which means that in all cases of domestic violence the man is responsible whether or not the female present is willing to press charges and whether or not he is actually responsible, he can be arrested or thrown out of the house by police officers without any judicial proceedings, article 27 report your neighbours, article 31 fathers don’t get to see their children, and last but not least article 55 which means that for example if a false rape accuser withdraws their accusation, feminist groups and the state can still prosecute for rape.

What it isn’t

The Istanbul Convention isn’t legislation. These aren’t laws but rather guidelines to help shape laws, a billyclub to influence politicians into creating legislation in their own countries.

It will be left to local feminist groups (and there are many powerful feminist groups throughout all European governments, in particular Ireland) to put the squeeze on politicians, while the watchdogs to help maintain “progress” are a group called GREVIO, the modern-day witch-finder generals tasked with enforcement.

“Using a report-based procedure, the GREVIO will assess the different measures a state party has taken to give meaning to the convention. In addition to reports received from the state party under scrutiny, it may draw on information from NGOs. National parliaments are also invited to participate in the monitoring. Should the information received be insufficient or should a particular issue require immediate attention, the GREVIO may travel to the country in question for an inquiry.

On the basis of the information at its disposal, the GREVIO may adopt reports and conclusions aimed at helping the state party to better implement the convention. It may also adopt general recommendations addressed to all state parties.

In addition to the GREVIO, a second entity composed of the representatives of the parties to the convention will be set up: the Committee of the Parties. Its tasks will include, among others, electing the members of the GREVIO and issuing recommendations to state parties concerning the measures to be taken in order to implement the conclusions of the GREVIO.”

What can be done to stop it?

So what can be done? It can be opposed on two levels, one is the European Parliament and the other is locally for those already or soon to be under its lash.

However the EU doesn’t elect the politicians who write the laws, the electorate does, and it’s the electorate (both men and boys and the women who care about them) who will be adversely affected by this Convention. So what needs to be done is to raise awareness among voters of the implications of the agreement and keep a watchful eye on legislation resulting from the Convention to be opposed.

Make sure your politicians and community groups know of the danger that now hovers over their menfolk, and remind them that ideological misandry does not belong in decisions made by those in power.

The following message has been sent to all European election candidates that we could find email addresses for:

Dear election candidate,We would like to draw your attention to and solicit a response from you on the matter of the Istanbul Convention, which was recently ratified by the Council of Europe. This is a collection of guidelines complete with taxpayer-funded compliance inspectors which embodies radical feminist ideals, and will infringe on if not remove entirely many of the individual human rights of EU citizens.It has been quietly ushered in and ratified bysleepwalking politicians in ten states across the EU, hence becoming binding as of August the 1st, this year. The wide-reaching effects and ramifications of this toxic agenda cannot be overstated, so we urge you to investigate this matter fully and respond at your earliest convenience.The full text of the Istanbul Convention can be found here:https://wcd.coe.int/ViewDoc.jsp?id=1772191and our analysis of it can be found here:http://www.menshumanrightsireland.org/index.php?n=72Please be aware that your response or lack thereof will be published for our rapidly growing readership.
Thank you for your time,
Mens Human Rights Ireland.

The list of email addresses for these candidates is as follows, and we encourage people to contact them and voice their concerns in a polite, positive and supportive manner; running for election isn't easy:

brian.hayes@oir.ie
mairead.mcguinness@europarl.europa.eu sean.kelly@europarl.europa.eu simon.harris@oir.ie emer.costello@europarl.europa.eu lorraine.higgins@oir.ie phil@philprendergast.ie patthecope.gallagher@europarl.europa.eu kieranhartley4europe@outlook.com
Thomas.Byrne@oireachtas.ie mark.dearey@gmail.com brid.smith@dublincity.ie ray@directdemocracy.ie cnicfhearraigh@gmail.com damon.matthew.wise@gmail.com nessa.childers@europarl.europa.eu marian@marianharkin.com election2014@ronanmullen.ie lukeming.flanagan@oireachtas.ie eamon.ryan@greenparty.ie http://paulmurphy.nationbuilder.com/contact_us http://briancrowleymep.ie/contact/http://www.fiannafail.ie/people/contact/mary-fitzpatrick/
http://www.jimhiggins.ie/ep/contact/contact-jim-in-ireland

No email contact address could be found for these candidates, if anyone has one for them please let us know:

Jillian Godsil
Richard Cahill
Diarmuid O'Flynn
TJ Fay
Mark Fitzsimmons
Jan Van De Ven
Ben Gilroy
Thomas Darcy
Grace O'Sullivan
Lynn Boylan (Lynn Ní Bhaoigheallain)

Matt Carthy
Liadh Ní Riada
Deirdre Clune

We will be following up on those we couldn't find email addresses for and those who don't respond via Facebook, Twitter, and the social media over the coming days. Further events and initiatives to raise awareness will be announced soon.

We can be contacted at info@menshumanrightsireland.org

Note: This article originally published on Men's Human Rights Ireland.

Hey Amanda Marcotte, did you know "1 in 5" is really 1 in 5,446?

August Løvenskiolds · 10 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat) has noted, rape is a unique crime in that it can often occur only in the mind of the alleged victim. Between adults, the same sexual acts can also be characterized as consensual sex to outside observers (or participants) if they have no understanding of the alleged victim's actual internal mental state, or lack thereof.

The importance of this mental state is best summarized by the Latin legal term "mens rea" or "guilty mind," a necessary element in most criminal prosecutions. The intent to do harm can not be ascertained where the perpetrator is unaware that harm is being done. This core, essential principle of law has vanished when it comes to the crime of rape. Instead of concerning ourselves with the accused's state of mind and presumed innocence, feminists demand we concern ourselves only with the feelings and thoughts of the accuser.

The contents of a victim's mind are, admittedly, important. Even a depraved perpetrator who WANTS to rape will fail if his or her desired victim is mentally willing.

In addition to mens rea, we must also concern ourselves with what "rape" has been degraded to mean. Feminists have lobbied for decades to expand the definitions of rape to include sex with women who have been drinking – although women used to be considered adult and equal enough to men to be able to drink alcohol and consent to sex all in the same evening, feminists are now crying foul. That is not the sort of equality feminists want.

Instead, they seek to keep women in an infantilized condition relative to men. Men, if they are wise, must decline the bubbly advances of tipsy lady-flowers lest the delicate sensibilities of these women transform the experience during their walk-of-shame hangover time and, feeling slightly put off, they have "recovered memories" of nonconsent. #ThanksFeminism

The push for the recognition and greater visibility (and risibility) of intoxication rape got a boost recently when my love-muffin Amanda Marcotte cited the 2007 U.S. Department of Justice funded study entitled rather blandly " The Campus Sexual Assault (CSA) Study", hereafter "CSA", as the latest source for the feminist claim that 1 in 5 women will be sexually assaulted in college on campus. The CSA claims that an overwhelming percentage of those sexual assaults are "intoxication" related.

If Marcotte were anything like a journalist, she might have read the CSA study herself to see if it actually supported these claims of "1 in 5" but, lazy woman of leisure that she is, she instead cited the gold standard: that a male journalist had checked the numbers, so everything must be fine, right? Please get my date another Grey Goose Martini? The maths do so give ladies like Marcotte the vapors.

According to Marcotte, "The White House spent this week rolling out its task force for combating sexual violence on campus, and part of the campaign has been to routinely cite the claim that 1 in 5 female college students is sexually assaulted during her time in school." [emphasis added]

If Marcotte were anything like a journalist, she might have read the study to see if it actually supports this claim. It does not.

The first clue that Marcotte is either lazy, lying, or both. "1 in 5" occurs at the end of page viii/9 of the CSA, which states "In the CSA study, sexual assault includes a wide range of victimizations, including rape and other types of unwanted sexual contact (e.g., sexual battery"[such as forced kissing or fondling, as defined on page 3-14/55].

In other words, in this study, grabbing a breast (sexual battery) during a drunken make-out session as an exploratory move towards greater intimacy would count as the equivalent of a full-blown jump-out-of-the-shadows-with-a-knife rape, if the woman disapproved of the act. Both cases are counted as sexual assaults in the CSA, and one has to wonder if college women are so naive they see both as equivalent crimes. (The answer: they aren't naive at all, despite what Marcotte and other feminists assert. But we'll get to quantifying that later.)

At this point, the illustration on page xiii/14 reports that these sexual battery boob grabs occurred to 75+144 = 219 of the women out of 1,073 total sexual assaults. That's about 20%, so the 1 in 5 sexual assault number is really 1 in 6 if those horrible boob grabs are excluded.

The second clue is that although 5,446 women enrolled at two universities were asked to participate in the survey, less than 43% did (42.2% and 42.8%, page x/11). Not much is known about the 57% of women who declined the paltry $10 bribe the CSA authors paid the students who wasted 15 minutes clicking through the online form, but the authors imply that their overall findings can be extrapolated to the entire campus population of women – a shaky assertion at best. I would argue that some women who haven't been sexually assaulted (or who might be sexual predators themselves) might be reluctant to waste their precious time on some dumb survey when they otherwise could use it for studying – or shopping for shoes. You know, important stuff.

Digging down into the CSA, even the authors admit that "It is logical to surmise that students who did not participate in a survey about sexual assault may differ from those who did participate" [page 3-7/48].

Considering this alone, the "1 in 5" number falls to about 1 in 11, or 1 in 14 if you eliminate sexual battery – but it gets a lot lower.

The third clue that something is amiss is in the results section at the top of page xiii/14 – quoting the report, "Nineteen percent of women reported experiencing completed or attempted sexual assault since entering college…" [emphasis added].

Why the hell are attempted assaults – those that failed by definition in this context – counted as the same as completed ones? So, both grabbing a boob while making out AND pantomiming a boob grab are both sexual assaults in this study? The study admits that only 13.7 percent of women experience "completed" sexual assault, not 19 percent. All of a sudden, the numbers fall again – from "1 in 5" to "1 in 11" to "1 in 14" to now "1 in 19" .

The fourth clue that something is amiss is that most of the "campus" assaults touted by Marcotte [see above] occurred where? OFF CAMPUS.

"The majority of sexual assault victims of both types reported that the incident had happened off campus (61% of incapacitated sexual assault victims and 63% of physically forced sexual assault victims)" [xvi/17] . So, "sexual assault on campus," per Marcotte, somehow includes off-campus assault as well. Even Amanda can't be so stupid as to blame colleges for sexual assaults that don't occur on their campuses – can she? The University of Wisconsin has little jurisdiction over the drunken sex that happens on South Padre Island in Texas over Spring Break.

Removing these non-campus assaults from the numbers, and the original "1 in 5" bullshit number that Marcotte parroted has now dwindled to a paltry 1 in 31.

The fifth clue that something is amiss is the tiny number of supposed victims who bothered to report their supposed assaults to school or police authorities. On page xvii/18 of the report, it is admitted that the students didn't think it was serious enough to report (56% forced / 67% incapacitated) or that they didn't think a crime had been committed or harm intended (35%/35%). In other words, these women didn't consider themselves to be victims at all, and they certainly did not consent to being called victims, even though both the CSA and feminists like Marcotte want to force them into a victimhood status they are resisting. Being involuntarily cast into the role of rape victim – when you are not one because you don't agree that you are one – is both ludicrous and a violation of personal autonomy.

So, let's dig deep down into the study for the real numbers. In Exhibit 5-7 on page 5-16/79, we finally find the total number of forced sexual assaults on campus – 49 out of 5446 female students surveyed. This is equivalent to 1 in 111, not 1 in 5.

The number of intoxication sexual assaults (including sexual battery) on campus was 196 – exactly 4 times larger, but still equivalent to about 1 in 28 overall, not 1 in 5.

And finally, in a line on Exhibit 5-9 on page 5-27/90, we discover how many of the 5446 women were so upset by their 526 supposed intoxication sexual assaults that they sought criminal charges against their alleged rapists – 1. That's right. One did. One woman, maybe the same one, also filed a "grievance or other disciplinary action" with university officials.

One woman in 5,446.

While feminists bemoan the low reporting rate of sexual assaults, at some point someone will notice that maybe women aren't too delicate, or too scared, or too stupid, or too helpless to make those reports. Maybe this wildly inflated and histrionic feminist rape mongering does not reflect the reality of normal women.

There are other howlers in Marcotte's beloved CSA study – here are a few of them:

In the bottom of Exhibit 4-1, over 40% of college women reported being drunk/high during sex, with half of those doing it more than once a month. I would speculate that women who regularly practice intoxicated sex might actually be enjoying it, and that efforts by feminists to criminalize their preferred sexual habits and partners will not be well-received. This explains why some women say they aren't feminists because they love men – perhaps those women aren't ignorant of feminism, but rather, they understand the ways that feminism demonizes men and subverts their own sexual practices.

"Women who experienced physically forced sexual assault before entering college had almost 7 times the odds of experiencing forced sexual assault since [after] entering college…" [page xiv/15]

The fascinating implication here is that certain women are rape-prone – either rapists tend to focus on them, or they make poor decisions that place them at a much higher risk, or they unconsciously seek situations in which dangerous encounters occur, or their sexuality is such that they continue in relationships with their supposed rapists. It is no wonder feminists are so obsessed with their anger toward so-called "victim-blamers" – that these rape-prone women might start taking actual responsibility for their own safety has to drive feminists nuts.

When the CSA looked at women who had experienced BOTH types of sexual assault (forced and incapacitated) before college, those women were 8 times as likely to experience both since entering college [bottom of page xv/16] as compared to other women – meaning that women who had repeat experiences in dangerous situations were less capable of (or less willing to) take steps to protect themselves from repeating the supposed trauma.

"In the CSA study, we consider as incapacitated sexual assault any unwanted sexual assault occurring when a victim is unable to provide consent or stop what is happening because she is passed out, drugged, drunk, incapacitated, or asleep… " [page ix/10 – emphasis added]

Why was the word "unwanted" used in the above? Can passed out, drunk, incapacitated or sleeping women actually want sexual assault? According to this phrase in the study, they apparently can, which is why only unwanted sex in those situations counts as sexual assault, even though the rest of the study makes no clear distinction between wanted and unwanted sex while tipsy or tired. Marcotte has lazily (or maybe drunkenly, I guess) endorsed a study that violates the feminist's "sober-enthusiastic-consent-or-else-rape" standard.

Good for you, Amanda.

This is not an exhaustive list of the problems with this study: the citing of nine flawed works by feminist Mary Koss, the data massaging, the bribing of participants, the programming errors, and many other diamonds of comedy await the intrepid souls who can bypass their laziness and trigger warnings to dive into the report.

Marcotte's closing statement in her article includes the penultimate line "This issue isn't about demonizing men as a group or scaring women into thinking men are inherently dangerous."

Correct, Amanda – it is about misleading the public by lying your ass off and using inflated statistics you don't care to check.

[A note on page numbers in the cited study – the CSA has its own convoluted page numbering scheme but the pdf document reader uses a straightforward absolute page count. "page viii/9", for example, means "page viii" was printed on the report and the absolute page number was 9.]

Review of Men on Strike by Helen Smith, PhD

AVfM Video Source · 11 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Victor Zen continues his book reviews by touching on the polarizing and groundbreaking book Men on Strike by psychologist Dr. Helen Smith. For the unaware, Dr. Smith writes for PJ Media and speaks in defense of men who realized that the system is geared against them.

Zen has some constructive criticism, but only because he has high hopes for the book's future as a staple for a more balanced approach to gender.

You can buy Men On Strike to support Dr. Helen's work.

Also, won't you subscribe to Victor Zen for more book reviews, interviews, activism reports and commentary?

But what did the boy REALLY want?

B.R. Merrick · 11 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've mentioned the television series Big Love in a previous article. I have a feeling that, after talking about it again in this article, I'll be talking about that TV show again and again and again. It touches upon so many vitally important and even visceral ideas surrounding male and female relationships. With the brouhaha in our culture over sexually molested boys "wanting it" and sexually molested girls being the "real" victims (except when it's "good rape"), the myriad lessons that this brilliant program has taught me shine down like moonbeams through clouds. I thought I'd share one of the subtler and most powerful lessons of all.

The basic story outline of the program concerns a secretly polygamous household run by Bill Henrickson (played well by Bill Paxton, complete with Utah-hick accent) with his three wives: Barb (Jeanne Tripplehorn), Nicki (Chloë Sevigny, my fave), and Margie (Ginnifer Goodwin). By the end of five seasons, it is clear that the creators of the show are intent on showing the vital differences between polygamy that is voluntarily entered into and that which is coerced. In other words: The power dynamics that are inherent in sexual relationships are laid bare and open for critical analysis through all five seasons.

In mid-run of the show, it is discovered that second wife Nicki was previously forced into a polygamous marriage that she left; she also left her baby girl. When the secret is betrayed, she is reunited with her now 15-year-old daughter, Cara Lynn (Cassi Thomson), who displays a remarkable ability with mathematics. Cara Lynn is tutored privately by her math teacher, Greg (Christian Campbell), who begins a sexual relationship with her. When the "affair" is discovered by the family, it is immediately stopped, and Cara Lynn is sent to another school.

Also midway through the series, it is discovered that Margie lied about her age to Bill when they were married. He thought she was 18. Turns out she was only 16. That's a hell of a way to ruin Christmas dinner.

Both issues come to a head 'round about the same time, resulting in yet another family squabble about the endless f—ups (Mormonspeak) within this roly-poly family, in which Bill defends himself for marrying Margie while simultaneously condemning Greg as a "sexual predator." How odd that the central protagonist could get away with saying so when the difference is technically one year, when both females are technically adults by virtue of their fertility and pubescent transformation, and when all participants are voluntarily engaged.

Bill does have one more reason to distance himself from the moniker of "predator" in that he thought Margie was legal age; Greg knew d— well that he was having sex with someone underage, and also was aware that it all had to be kept secret to keep himself from losing his job, his reputation, and perhaps his freedom. However, are these really enough reasons to put these two men into completely different categories?

In my opinion, they are. And now I shall explain.

In order for sexual expression to be something other than trauma, it is requisite for the participants to each be able to display a certain base level of autonomy. Due to the various disabilities, illnesses, and external circumstances with which adults can suffer, such volition can be expressed in a multitude of ways and be mutually understood. In spite of the variety of ways to communicate sexual desire, the constant that is held throughout voluntary sexual expression is our collective ability to recognize when full autonomy is present and when it is not.

"Rape culture" is the ridiculous idea that men in general seek to remove some level of autonomy from women so that they can b— more chicks. "Good rape," a phenomenon taught to us by Eve Ensler that seems to have mysteriously disappeared from her best-selling play, is the even more ridiculous idea that if a teenaged female "enjoys" the advances of an older woman, the difference in autonomy between the two individuals is not a concern. Raping a younger female in this fashion has something "good" about it, and is therefore not truly a part of the "rape culture" which we men supposedly enjoy.

Actual rape is very close to the original definition of rape, which still means "to steal." It can only occur when the volition of at least one party has been reduced, or is already in a reduced state by virtue of at least one of several means: physical inability to communicate refusal (such as a handicap or unconsciousness); emotional inability to express disinterest (such as the emotional immaturity of a child too afraid to say, "No"); physical or emotional inability to remove oneself from a dangerous situation (such as being pinned down, held at gunpoint, or any number of extortionary means); etc.

Such an individual has had full volition stolen, and traumatic memory has been added to the thought process that will inform all future volitional, autonomous acts. Much of the happiness that might have been abundantly present in any number of future moments has also been stolen.

Therefore, as I see it, in Big Love, Greg is guilty of statutory rape, and Bill is not, by virtue of the following criteria culled from the storyline:

1. Margie was basically living as an adult at the time, gainfully employed; Cara Lynn had never paid a bill or held a job.

2. Margie knowingly began an affair with a married man who she knew was a polygamist; Cara Lynn was lured into a relationship with a man much older whose personal life she knew nothing about.

3. Margie was raised in a society that liberated women by virtue of the tireless efforts of countless men inventing and manufacturing machines, along with Post-Enlightenment ideas that liberated the human conscience; Cara Lynn was brought up in a fundamentalist religion with rigid sex roles (and probably didn't know what The Enlightenment was).

4. Margie knew a world of romantic love freely chosen by both parties; Cara Lynn knew a world of arranged marriages that benefited only the men and women at the top of the religiously fundamentalist social heap.

5. Margie was not in a subordinate role to Bill, even though she was being paid to baby-sit and working at his store (both voluntary acts); Cara Lynn was subordinate to her tutor in numerous ways, especially in the sense that she could not choose where she went to school, or even if she attended school at all.

6. Margie was sexually experienced; Cara Lynn was a virgin.

True, the difference in their ages was only one year, but that's something that unthinking people conclude. The difference of a year is superficial; the differences explained in the six points above run deep in the human psyche.

So what does this have to do with the statutory rape of boys? Everything.

There is a thought-provoking and controversial book written by a gay psychologist named Alan Downs called The Velvet Rage. It's a tome written specifically for gay men and concerns what Downs claims is the high level of shame that gay men experience in their early lives, and where that shame can lead.

I can't say that I agree with everything in the book, but I did find it compelling. One story in particular stood out, involving the sexual abuse of a young gay boy who had a paper route. His first sexual encounter with a grown man, who invited the boy into his home instead of just giving him the collection money, was described as "very exciting and equally terrifying."

The reason this stood out is because when the now-grown man retold this story to other gay men, he spoke with pride and enthusiasm as they laughed with him, like Tucker Carlson. They can laugh if they want, but Downs was observant enough to state:

"I can't help but notice that [he] has never really been able to maintain a committed, long-term relationship as an adult. His current relationship has existed for three years – the longest one to date – but, by his own admission, only because he and his lover have sex with other men…

"The effects of childhood sexual abuse can have more severe consequences for a gay man. A sizeable number of all people who are sexually abused in childhood have extreme difficulty regulating their emotions as adults… Borderline Personality Disorder… Dissociative Identity Disorder… substance abuse… suicidal behavior… deliberate self-harm… antisocial (criminal) behavior…

"A child is quite capable of strong sexual feelings [the 'exciting' that accompanied the 'terrifying'] but at the same time is not capable of handling the emotional aftermath of such feelings… What may have seemed like a harmless and even highly erotic act, is often devastating psychologically [emphasis mine]."*

The world looks at the surface and sees boys getting on with being boys. Then they're shocked when boys who got on with being boys kill themselves when they are men.

Boys are fascinated by men. Most boys, beginning at about the ages of 11 to 14, while still having a great deal of emotional, intellectual, and physical curiosity about men, will start to experience an increasing interest in the female body. A boy's or girl's natural curiosity about bodies and sex ("Whatever that is," thinks the child) can be satisfied in any number of ways that are quite healthy and not traumatic. Nudist gatherings come to mind, something more prevalent in Europe than America, which lack I believe is to the detriment of healthy childhood curiosity. Yet one scholar after another after another after another keeps coming home with the same information: Engaging children and naïve teenagers in adult sexual activity – with everything we see that adults can do to screw up their lives with sex – is traumatic. Apparently, it is even traumatic when he wanted it.

Children exhibit increasing amounts of autonomy as they grow older. I am convinced that they will exhibit more at younger ages when they are left to themselves to self-regulate. However, here is a list of things they have yet to accomplish regardless of how fast they mature:

- Running a small business
- Going for a job interview
- Paying rent
- Paying the electric bill
- Paying late fees
- Groaning under a mortgage
- Going into debt with a credit card
- Getting a car towed
- Being lied to about the car you're buying
- Being laid off
- Going on a date
- Unrequited romantic love
- Waking up with a hangover yet going to work anyway
- Being pulled over for speeding

And one of my personal favorites, something no man should do without:

- Midlife crisis

When an adult gets into bed with another adult, this is all understood. None of this is understood by a teenager who is kept from the world. None of this is understood by a "juvenile delinquent" getting a lap dance from a grown female prison guard.

I believe that boys will certainly be boys. I believe in leaving them alone to be boys. When people are engaged in sex, it can hardly be said that they are being left alone. Quite the contrary: He or she is united, however briefly, with the mind and body of another. There should be no doubt that an adult is going to take (re: steal [re: rape]) something almost entirely different away from such an encounter with a boy who “wants it.”

So we are left with the question posed in the title of this article: What can we honestly say that a boy wanted from such an encounter? How about acceptance? Love? Satiation of natural curiosity? Advice? Communication? Companionship? Emotional intimacy? Assistance? Confidences? Nurturance? Friendship? Are any of these hidden desires understood by the aroused adult? Is the boy capable of fully expressing these things? Is he good at poetry or something? Has he ever written a convincing love letter?

I remember when I watched Franco Zeffirelli’s version of William Shakespeare’s Romeo & Juliet. It dawned on me that Shakespeare’s true effort probably had much more to do with juxtaposing the impetuous, hormonal, unthinking duo against the childish prejudices held by both of their families. That certainly seemed to be what Zeffirelli was after. Every line was uttered with a slightly ridiculous earnestness. Their teenaged love was matched by their teenaged violence. This is much closer to the truth about the childlike (or childish) approach to newly discovered sexual emotions.

Every new emotion to a human can easily be an overwhelming experience. Adults can cry for many different reasons due to the ongoing conscious experience of living life while experiencing new combinations of emotions, both familiar and unfamiliar. How much more likely are we to see children cry for new and overwhelming reasons? Adults, having imbibed the lessons of that which was once emotionally daunting, think of sex as being something other than terrifying – unless, of course we are talking about children in adult bodies, in which case, the adult is free to cry, “RAPE!”

Actual children, on the other hand, are far less likely to know what sex and rape are, what the difference between them is, or if what they are experiencing should be considered one phenomenon but not the other. What the boy who “wanted it” actually wanted will probably not be adequately expressed for many years. If he makes it that far. In the meantime, cultural misandrists everywhere who paint half the human race with the sickly color of horndog, sex-crazed maniacs should learn to shut the h— up so that the healing for those already suffering can begin.

I can’t wait for feminists to try and take credit for the healing process of heterosexually molested boys. The men’s movement is already prepared and p—ed off Big Time.

*Alan Downs, The Velvet Rage: Overcoming the Pain of Growing up Gay in a Straight Man’s World (Cambridge: Da Capo Press, Perseus Books Group, 2005, 2006), 144-145.

Title IX legal Expert Brett Sokolow on sexual misconduct cases and DOJ/DOE directives

Robert O'Hara · 11 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On April 24th, 2014, Brett Sokolow, Executive Director of the Association for Title IX Coordinators and President & CEO of The National Center for Higher Education Risk Management (NCHERM), issued a statement regarding disciplinary actions against male students involving accusations of sexual misconduct. This statement was highly critical of the manner in which recent proceedings took place and mentions there were five instances in which he felt the accused students were not guilty. He went on to suggest changes in the way schools conduct such cases.

This statement is significant because it comes following years of heated controversy concerning both the Dear Colleague Letter and the Blueprint letter issued by both the Department of Justice and the Department of Education. Both have faced severe criticism from many members of the higher education community and advocates for free speech and due process. AVFM News has also covered developments concerning the both the Dear Colleague letter and the Blueprint Letter extensively since the Dear Colleague letter was issued in April of 2011.

Sokolow is arguably going to be the ultimate authority schools facing litigation by students disciplined or even expelled will turn too if the number of lawsuits claiming sex discrimination and violation of due process rise.

AVFM News approached him last week asking for an interview and he was generous enough to grant our request on the condition that it be done via email and that neither the questions nor the answers be edited. Several email exchanges took place over the course of three days, with nothing of significance omitted:

AVFM: Briefly tell us about the Association of Title IX Coordinators, the NCHERM and your history with them.

Sokolow: I founded The NCHERM Group in 2000. It is a law and consulting firm that serves higher education and K-12 on high risk health and safety issues. We represent more than 50 colleges as counsel and have consulted with more than 3,000 different campuses. We also represent victims and those accused of violating campus policies, but only selectively. I'm not partisan in the sense that I don't believe in taking the same side no matter what. That wouldn't make me an expert, it would make me a gun for hire. Instead, I choose cases and clients solely on the merits. If I think you have the right argument legally, I'll have your back. That makes me a little hard to pin down, but it also allows me a consistency of principle when involving my firm in cases.

AVFM: You stated in your "Tip of the Week" letter that "Finding each of the accused in violation of sexual misconduct is sex discrimination. We are making Title IX plaintiffs out of them."

Was this statement in response to the recent lawsuits filed against the University of Delaware and other schools by men who had their right to due process violated and had their academic careers, and by extension, their futures ruined by unfounded or false accusations of sexual assault?

Sokolow: The question seems to state conclusions on which I don't wish to state an opinion here. And, no, my answer had nothing to do with Delaware, or any filed particular lawsuits. I was referring to cases of internal campus discipline, so far. Some of those may result in lawsuits if we cannot correct this trend. Again, I'm not pro-victim, pro-accused student, etc. when I take this stand. I am pro getting this right. Some campuses are too hot on this issue. Some are too cold. My advice is intended as a corrective because colleges owe it to all students to get this just right. There has to be an integrity to the process or the process is failing systemically.

AVFM: On April 4th, 2011, the Department of Education issued it's now infamous "Dear Colleague Letter" instructing institutions of higher education to use the "preponderance of evidence" standard (50.1% convinced that a crime occurred) instead of the "clear and convincing evidence" standard during proceedings in which a student is accused of sexual assault. Why do you think the DOD found it proper to lower the standard of evidence in such cases?

Sokolow: The Department of Education did not lower the standard in sexual misconduct cases. More than 80% of campuses were using the correct preponderance standard in 2011 when the DCL was published. Only a handful of campuses were using higher standards at that time. I think a debate on the standard is less productive than accepting it, and working hard to ensure that campuses apply it correctly. If the evidence is over 50%, the accused has violated policy. If the evidence is 50% or under, the accused is not in violation. We spend our time working on helping college decision-makers to understand how to accurately weight that evidence and analyze it to get to an appropriate outcome in every case.

AVFM: The Dear Colleague letter did state that schools would be in jeopardy of loosing their Title IX funding if they did not comply to the new standard. There has been much criticism of this coming from columnists in publications like the Chronicle of Higher Education and the Wall Street Journal.

Have any of your members complained about having to comply with these new standards?

Sokolow: Yes, some of our members feel uncomfortable with the preponderance standard, especially in really close cases where what is more likely than not is only show by a feather's worth of evidence. Overall, most are accepting of it, and some are empowered by it. To balance it, we've encouraged the field to adopt a gatekeeper standard, which allows early dismissal of complaints in the investigation phase, when they do not evidence reasonable cause to indicate a policy violation.

AVFM: Do you think it is proper to have schools involve themselves in prosecuting serious crimes like sexual assault in the first place?

Sokolow: Schools don't prosecute anything, let alone serious crimes. When schools address sexual misconduct, it is as a form of sex discrimination covered by Title IX, a federal law that requires campuses to remedy such discrimination. Colleges really have no choice in the matter. Some are quite proficient at addressing this kind of misconduct, and some are still on a learning curve. That is problematic, because while the campus is getting its act together, it may fail to adequately protect a victim (male or female) who complains of an assault, or it may fail to protect an accused student (again, male or female), which was the point of my original commentary. I've written about protecting victims for years. I intensely dislike the argument that colleges should get out of this business and just leave crimes to the criminal justice system. That is really an argument for rapist privilege. It's true that campuses need to be better at this, but so does the criminal justice system. Factual records are very damning of police misconduct in sexual violence cases all over the country, and successful prosecution of campus sex offenders is a rarity. So, when the argument is made that colleges should just leave this to the criminal justice system, the subtext is "let the sex offenders get off scot free," because, that is what will happen if colleges don't provide another option through their own processes.

AVFM: "When schools address sexual misconduct, it is as a form of sex discrimination covered by Title IX, a federal law that requires campuses to remedy such discrimination."

Discrimination against which sex?

Sokolow: Title IX protects against any discrimination on the basis of sex or gender in federally funded educational programs, so that's anyone's sex or gender.

AVFM: "I intensely dislike the argument that colleges should get out of this business and just leave crimes to the criminal justice system. That is really an argument for rapist privilege."

Is giving an accuser another means outside of both the criminal and civil courts to have someone more easily punished by their accusations not an argument for accuser privilege? Does this not fly in the face of the doctrine of double jeopardy and the important tradition of protecting the rights of the accused?

Sokolow: It is an important tradition to protect the rights of the accused. All Title IX is doing is creating a level playing field to also protect the rights of the accuser. Double jeopardy is the Constitutional right not to be tried twice for the same crime. Since colleges don't address crimes, this is inapplicable. The best analogy is to the OJ Simpson trials. He was acquitted criminally, but held liable civilly, for the same acts. This is not double jeopardy, and the courts see the campus process as a civil process, that may parallel criminal prosecution without causing double jeopardy.

AVFM: "Factual records are very damning of police misconduct in sexual violence cases all over the country, and successful prosecution of campus sex offenders is a rarity."

Is it not a fact that the student tribunals used in investigating and punishing students accused of sexual misconduct are rank amateurs in the science of evidence collection and who also have been known to be indoctrinated in such principles as "rape culture" and the idea that women "never lie" about rape? Is this not tantamount to police misconduct?

Sokolow: Yes. We've been working for 15 years to move away from student panels, and in fact away from the due process adversarial hearing model. In Title IX-covered cases, we believe that a professional civil rights investigation by well-trained investigators addresses the problems your question identified, and is the preferred resolution mechanism today. In fact, the White House Task Force report last week embraced this model.

AVFM: How common do you think it is that those who falsely accuse are punished for their crime/misconduct?

Sokolow: Rarely. In fact, we often try to get them help. The fact is that most people who allege campus sexual misconduct when it did not occur do in fact believe that it did. That means they are not filing a false complaint, which is a complaint known to be false, and which is filed with malicious intent. Our job is to discover whether the underlying facts can prove or disprove the complaint. Sometimes, we can show conclusively that what the complainant alleges did not occur, but we still don't consider that a false complaint unless we can show they know it to be false.

AVFM: In your "Tip of the Week" you stated "But, in a recent case, the campus policy stated that intoxication creates an inability to consent. Thus, in any situation in which a male student and a female student have sex, and both are intoxicated, this college will commit an act of gender discrimination by only charging one of them. If both are intoxicated, they both did the same thing to each other. Why should only the male be charged if both students behave in ways defined as prohibited by the policy? I'm not suggesting we charge both. Surely, every drunken sexual hook--up is not a punishable offense, especially if the parties know what they did and liked it"

Tell us why you think female students are held to a lower standard of behavior then male students.

Sokolow: If a male came forward, who was drunk, and accused a female student, I think a lot of campuses would process that complaint the same way they would if the female student made a complaint about the male student. This is problematic no matter what the gender or sexual orientation permutation of participants. If the question is about why campuses think that drunk sex should be disciplined, I'm not sure, except that they mistakenly think intoxication and incapacitation are the same thing, which they are not. If you are asking why female students are making complaints when they have drunk sex, I think it may be because of what they are being taught in high school, or at the beginning of college. If the college thinks the standard is one of intoxication, and it teaches that, intoxicated students come forward to complain. One other thought is that college administrators may think this is what the government wants them to do, but I've had OCR dismiss many drunk sex cases without opening investigations, or after short investigations. I think that addresses the extent to which I think anyone is held to a lower standard.

AVFM: Do you think it will be a challenge to convince Title IX administrators to change this clearly discriminatory practice?

Sokolow: I don't think it's clearly discriminatory. I think policy can be applied in a discriminatory way on some campuses, and I think the debate that my commentary and articles like this can foster will help to move many campuses in the right direction.

AVFM: In your "Tip of the Week" letter you gave a list of factors which should be weighed in determining whether a respondent was to be found culpable in a sexual assault case. The first factor you suggested was whether or not the "respondent knew that the complainant was drinking or using drugs and may know how much/what kind."

Why do you think it is proper to make the respondent responsible for what the plaintiff was consuming of their own volition?

Solokow: So, anything that happens to you when you get drunk is your own fault, apparently? Once you're drunk, it's open season for me, because you've made a mistake that excuses any abusive or criminal act I might now commit? Let me turn that question around, and see if holds any water. A person who gets him or herself incapacitated by alcohol or other drugs is responsible for what they did to themselves, but why should their inability to protect themselves, or make rational, reasonable judgments excuse anything that someone else might do to them in their weakened state? Your argument, taken to its logical conclusion would excuse murder if an incapacitated victim invited you to shoot them.

AVFM: Allow me to ask this then. You state verbatim in your statement:

"This is shown by the totality of evidence composed of some or all of the following factors that the respondent knew or should have known:

1. The respondent knew that the complainant was drinking or using drugs and may know how much/what kind"

Does "should have known" apply only to this first factor or only the remaining factors?

Sokolow: It applies to the totality of the factors.

AVFM: On May 9, 2013, the Departments of Justice and Education issued a findings letter announcing a resolution agreement with the University of Montana. The findings letter, which refers to the agreement as "a blueprint for colleges and universities throughout the country to protect students from sexual harassment and assault," explains the Departments' interpretation of applicable legal standards and the terms of the agreement and defines sexual harassment as "any unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature."

This letter has been criticized by freedom of speech proponents and Senator John McCain sent a letter to the DOJ asking why it feels it can write legislation independent of the legislative process.

Do you think that the DOJ and Department of Education have over stepped their boundaries in this case?

Sokolow: No. I think groups like yours, and some free speech interest groups, have misconstrued this resolution letter for your own purposes. It's insulting to people's intelligence and manipulative. All the letter says is that victims should report unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature, and that campuses should remedy such conduct when reported. It does not say that campuses should impose discipline on someone who engages in unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature, unless that behavior rises to the level of creating a hostile environment. And, campuses should not do so, especially public universities. Obnoxious and offensive speech is often protected speech and it is incumbent on campuses not to abuse this legal standard to punish what is commonly recognized as protected speech. Of course, I'm sure groups like yours will be there to remind them, if they over-reach.

AVFM: "Obnoxious and offensive speech is often protected speech and it is incumbent on campuses not to abuse this legal standard to punish what is commonly recognized as protected speech."

The May 9th resolution agreement broadened the definition of sexual harassment as "any unwelcome conduct of a sexual nature" including "verbal conduct." And that this "need not be subject to objective definitions."

This clearly could get a student in serious trouble for asking someone out on a date or talking about a film featuring adult content. Also, there is a serious departure from a supreme court decision on sexual harassment to use an objective definition.

How is this not an abandonment of the protection of free speech?

Sokolow: Actually, this is a definition that the Department of Education had embraced back in its 2001 Guidance. It's nothing new.

The regulatory standard and the court standard are different. We advise public campuses to never use this standard to impose discipline unless it also meets the definition of creating a hostile environment.

Editorial postscript: No doubt many readers will have pointed questions about some of Sokolow's answers. Regardless, Sokolow has been very generous with his time and will likely face criticism from colleagues and clients alike for talking frankly about these difficult issues. We thank him for speaking as frankly and honestly as he has with us.

Feel free to be as critical as you wish but also please join AVFM in thanking him for granting us this interview in the comments.

Tony Stott calls for an end to sexism in dealing with Domestic Violence (interview on ITV Wales)

Mike Buchanan · 11 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Tony Stott has long been a valued supporter of Justice for men & boys and its associated campaigns. He has a particular interest in the issue of domestic violence ('DV'). For some time he's been leading an initiative challenging the Domestic Violence legislation which the Welsh government plans to implement in 2014.

The below was written by Tony:

"DV is about intimate relationships and can be instigated by men, women, or both. It is gender-neutral as both men and women can suffer from and be responsible for DV in broadly equal measure. This simple humanity is supported by a huge body of international research and practical experience i.e. just two meta studies covering some 400,000 international subjects over many years demonstrate that women are as violent or more violent than men:

Prof. Fiebert http://www.csulb.edu/~mfiebert/assault.htm

Prof. Straus http://www.icpsr.umich.edu/icpsrweb/ICPSR/studies/29583?q=international+dating+violence+study%2C+2001-2006&permit[0]=AVAILABLE#accessNotes

The NSPCC revealed Childline receives 14% more calls complaining of physical abuse by mothers compared with fathers

http://www.nspcc.org.uk/news-and-views/media-centre/press-releases/2012/12-07-23-childline-urges-children-to-speak-up/childline-urges-children-to-speak-up_wdn90922.html

Erin Pizzey founded the first ever women's refuge in Chiswick, London, in the early 1970s, and noted that some two-thirds of the first 100 women seeking refuge were as violent, or more violent, than the men from whom they were seeking refuge, and to whom they would likely return.

These findings contradict the Welsh government's (WG's) old-fashioned "radical" ideology that says only men use violence to exert control over women and that women only ever act in self-defence. New (but unbelievably old-fashioned!) legislation is due to be introduced to the Welsh Assembly in May 2014.

Healing Men created a petition to urge the WG to take a more modern, evidence-based, proven and humane approach to DV:

Petition https://www.assemblywales.org/epetition-list-of-signatories.htm?pet_id=878

Video http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zrAjrxaxUtg&feature=youtu.be

An ITV flagship programme, Coronation Street, featured a male victim of DV and a journalist with ITV became aware of our petition. He asked if I would contribute to a news item on male victims of DV which was to address some very important issues and, crucially, raises a challenge to the radical policies adopted by the WG and shows our determination to oppose it.

The points raised by Simon Borja from Safer Wales/Dyn Project are good points and well made. We must make men more aware and attuned to the nature of DV and how violent women can be. However, be aware that "Safer Wales" is Radical and calls from men are "assessed" to see if that man is a victim and also an instigator. Given the inter-relational nature of DV it is unsurprising that some 47% of men are classified in this radical way and similar results may be expected from women, but women are never assessed – never have been, and probably never will be. Yet this radical bias and prejudice is being used as a key element in new legislation on DV within the WG.

The Radical Safer Wales / Dyn Project for men was set up by and operated from Welsh Women's Aid premises in Cardiff.

The WG's stated position is "masculinity is associated with violence in many cultures and Wales is no exception… all interventions must address men's violent behaviour" (original emphasis). This incendiary position has led to considerable outrage and opposition from psychotherapists, academics, practitioners and charities involved in the sector. The position as well as the new title of the bill is clearly sexist, discriminatory, abusive, and lays the WG open to legal challenge. A solicitor and human rights barrister as well as two leading charities have pledged to support a man or men disadvantaged by this new legislation.

We also need to consider the effect of this government policy on how boys, as men in waiting, view men and masculinity – and their emerging place in Welsh society – when their government openly holds and expresses such views about men and masculinity. Suicide is the leading cause of death of young men across the UK.

The Minister responsible, Leslie Griffiths AM, asserts the new legislation based on the above position and entitled "Ending Violence Against Women, Domestic Abuse and Sexual Violence (Wales) Bill" is not sexist. The Minister's use of language is curious.

Coming to a Legislature near YOU! This position and legislation are to be used as a trail-blazer for similar policies in the English, Scottish, Northern Irish and European legislatures as well as elsewhere.

This is a very grave issue for men's and boys' human rights.

Tony Stott

www.healing-men.net "

Taxpayer-funded Male DV Shelters = socialism?

AVfM Video Source · 12 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Barbarossa takes on the question of whether there should be taxpayer funded services to help abused men–he answers strongly in the affirmative–and while doing so goes into some depth about his feelings about what he sees as unrealistic ideals of libertarianism.

As always, Barbarossaa is good at challenging us to think harder about what we advocate for. Agree with him or disagree with him on any particular point, you dismiss him at your peril. We suggest you subscribe for more.

Male spaces must not be allowed to exist!

Lucian Vâlsan · 12 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"There must be no male spaces! This is not allowed!"

Or at least this seems to be the message conveyed by a significant proportion of the European media following the appointment of Portuguese-native Helena Costa as manager for the French Ligue 2 football (soccer) club Clermont Foot Auvergne 63.

The middle class Guardianista-style pricks that we usually call "journalists" regarded the news of Costa's appointment as another progressive step forward and the French press rushed to pick some statements from the (all-male) players in the hope that they can find something to spin into some patriarchally misogynistic conspiracy against the poor little female coach. And they found as the left-back Emmanuel Imorou told L'Equipe that the players have asked questions to each other along the lines of "who is she?" and the goalkeeper characterized her naming as a "smart media stunt" – a characterization which enraged the aforementioned pricks even further, despite the fact that it's the truth, an aspect which, although uncomfortable, has even been admitted by Costa herself. Because yes, in the feminist mind, google-ing the new coach's name and pointing the obvious is now misogynistic.

As it's usually the case with feminist ideologues, the issue is not the naming of Costa per se as supposedly the first woman to coach a team in the first two divisions in Europe. By the way, that information is also false. Duygu Erdoğan coached for Galatasaray Istanbul replacing none other than Fatih Terim. The fact that she spectacularly failed is a different story – but the point is that the press rushed so hard to make ideological points out of Ms. Costa's appointment that they got their facts wrong. Who would've thought?

But as I was saying, the issue is not Costa's appointment – the issue is the so-called "progressive" journalists' obsession with destroying anything and everything that could possibly be construed as a male space – and professional European football is one of those spaces – and inserting more victimology and gender identity politics into a field that has largely been free of feminist meddling so far.

Karen Straughan explained multiple times that the women who go into overwhelmingly male-dominated fields and stay there are going because they like the masculine environment and they like it as it is. And this seems to be the case Ms. Costa as well given that she coached mostly boys' teams (junior level) with which she conquered the World Championship twice with the youth team of Benfica. She then moved to coach the national women's football squads of Iran and Qatar – a period which she grudgingly admits she didn't enjoy entirely but it was a necessary stage for her career.

Even more so, if we are to be completely honest, the highest amount of misogyny and disrespect towards her in her career so far didn't come from male players or the fans – but precisely from middle class progressive "open-minded" pricks who decided to ban Iran's Women's national squad from the British Olympiad because they didn't like the costumes the players were going to wear (despite the fact that players like Petr Čech had played with a similar equipment covering their heads in the recent past).

In other words, her success has so far been curbed precisely by the "progressive" do-gooder westerners who under the guise of "rights for women" actually hurt women more. And, unfortunately for the non-feminist women and the wider non-feminist majority, this is not the first, nor the last case of this occurring.

Yet in the minds of many journalists, Ms. Costa is already a victim simply because many commentators have rushed to question whether she is indeed fit given her young age and lack of experience to be the coach for a squad that will have a difficult time next season in their quest to avoid relegation. Of course, the fact that all young and inexperienced male coaches' abilities are questioned in a similar manner each time they're appointed to a club that's perceived to be "too big" for their credentials suddenly became irrelevant for the feminist commentators.

The Guardian commentator Anna Kessel goes out of her way to paint Ms. Costa as a victim-to-be and acts offended because people who know what football is about asked the questions that are regularly asked when young managers are appointed. And then she goes like this:

> While it seems football is quite accepting of appointing men as managers with no qualifications and little coaching experience, a woman's CV tends to be pored over and minutely analysed.

But is this true? The answer is a resounding NO. "Football" is not even by far "quite" accepting of appointing men as managers with no qualifications – because football in Europe is a multi-million euro business (at least at the first and second divisions' levels) and appointing an under qualified manager has serious consequences. Even appointing a well-experienced and qualified manager often times has serious negative consequences (the case of Moyes at Manchester United speaks volumes about that) because generally naming a manager is often times like rolling a dice since there are a lot of human factors to consider that the clubs cannot possibly predict.

A couple of politically incorrect truths

There are a few aspects that everyone knows they're true but they're increasingly kept out of the discussion. But I'll spare a moment to at least state them.

1. Women's football is inferior to men's football. This is a self-evident truth that anyone who has watched more than two football games notices. The reason is simple: biology. Real biology not feminist biology. Consequently, someone who has never played in professional men's football and coached junior boys' teams and women's squads is by definition a less qualified candidate in comparison with someone who has played in professional men's football and didn't coach anyone. Even Jose Mourinho, the statistical outlier that everyone points out when this argument is brought up, still played at professional level for seven years in Portugal and Brazil scoring 13 goals in 94 matches. Yes, unimpressive, but Ms. Costa scored 0 goals in 0 matches.

2. As a manager, coaching a men's football squad is the real test. As a corollary of the first statement, Ms. Costa's previous experiences are in many ways irrelevant. In the modern history of football, there is only one example of a coach coming from a women's squad to a men's squad who actually succeeded. That is Per-Mathias Høgmo, the Norwegian man who took over the Norwegian side Rosenborg BK when the "Troll kids" were on a relegation spot. In just two months he avoided relegation and qualified the team to UEFA Champions' League group stage. A huge performance. But Per-Mathias is a statistical outlier. Most of the coaches who came from a women's club spectacularly failed. So the commentators who are questioning whether Ms. Costa is fit or not aren't signs of misogyny but signs of realism after looking at the success rate statistics.

In this context, France's Women's Minister's Twitter commentary, Najat Belkacem, who praised the French club for "understanding that giving a place to women is the future of professional football" is at the very least laughable. Giving a place to women (an expression which sounds dangerously close to affirmative action) will not be the future of professional football. Ever. At least not as long as professional football is organized around competence. Are feminists planning to change that? For Messi's sake, I hope they won't!

All men are guilty

But if the French and the British press limited themselves to just imply that men's football's maleness is a problem, Oana Dușmănescu from Gazeta Sporturilor went one step further and actually said it:

> For this is the truth – male football is the last citadel that's holding on the equalizing ground of today, the redoubt in which estrogen pervades the hardest. (…) Men are defending their bastion as best they can and, from their point of view, any weapon is valid and justifiable.

That's right folks. All men are guilty because women don't succeed in men's football and if they dare to question the abilities of a coach who happens to be a woman, then they are "defending their bastion" to keep estrogen from pervading. Am I the only one who sees this as both misandric and misogynistic?

Now, of course, nobody has a problem with the femaleness of, let's say, rhythmic gymnastics, a sport in which the presence of a man is more exotic than the presence of a lion in Oslo outside of a zoo. No one is arguing that rhythmic gymnastics' "femaleness" is keeping men from successfully competing. Yet somehow, when the shoe is on the other food, there's suddenly a problem.

The reason for which this way of thinking is exhibited are many and worthy of a separate and more ample discussion but the short version is that since immemorial times, many people (mostly women but also some men) have seen the very existence of a male space as a threat. And now, thanks to gynocentrism on steroids (i.e. feminist "thought") it's more acceptable than ever to fight tooth and nail for more and more female-only spaces and for the destruction of anything that resembles even remotely as a male space.

Men's football is not (and hasn't been for quite some time now) a male-only business as ideologues like Duşmănescu or Anna Kissel would have you believe. Women work and have been working in football related businesses for quite some time as scouters, assistant managers, impresarios, translators, PR, advertisement, medics and even referees as well as many other positions that are necessary in the current way the European professional football (i.e. Men's Football) is organized.

But yes – European football is a sport designed by men to be played by men against other men and to be watched and understood mostly by men. And it's nothing wrong with that. Just like it's nothing wrong that rhythmic gymnastics is a sport designed by women to be played against other women and to be watched and understood mostly by women.

Feminist ideologues have been wondering why is Ms. Costa's appointment news in the first place – but in the same time, they were the only ones who actually made it news for the people who don't live in France in the Clermont-Ferrand area. The same feminist ideologues ask everyone to "embrace the new diversity" – yet none of them seems to be capable of understanding that we're not the same, we never have been, and trying to make us all the same is no diversity at all.

P.S.: Who's willing to bet that in the very likely event that Helena Costa will be sacked (as most of the managers in general are sacked before the end of their contract) the entire press will cry sexism?

This article is also available in Swedish.

Unequal justice in Maine: Paul Cavanaugh

Suzanne McCarley · 12 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]Paul Cavanaugh, Assistant District Attorney (ADA) in Hancock and Washington Counties, Maine, wants to become the new District Attorney, replacing his boss Carletta Bassano, who had the good sense not to run for re-election. Unfortunately for the citizens of Maine, Cavanaugh's record suggests quite strongly that all he has to offer is more of the same: Corruption and bias due to a desire to collect funds from the Federal government for phony prosecutions. We encourage anyone who can to attend the State Accountability Rally at the Hancock County Courthouse in Ellsworth on May 31, 2014. The event is sponsored by Integrity4Maine.

The following are just a few examples of Paul Cavanaugh's record as a public "servant."

When thirty-one year old married mother of two, Tina Mason, pled guilty to charges of sexually abusing a thirteen year old boy, prosecutor Cavanaugh requested the court only sentence her to thirty days in jail and only temporary placement on the sex offender registry. Mason, with her husband by her side, argued that her own sons needed her at home. The young male victims' mother stated however, "You have taken something from my son that no one should ever take. You have no remorse. Shame on you. You are getting off easy." Prosecutor Paul Cavanaugh said he was "satisfied" that the judge accepted his request for Mason to spend only thirty days in jail for molesting the boy.[1] Mason was investigated for possibly having had another inappropriate relationship with another boy at the school she taught, however those allegations were not substantiated.

By contrast to Mason's thirty days in jail for sexual misconduct with a child, when Vladek Filler was convicted for Class D misdemeanor assault which usually warrants $300, Cavanaugh argued Filler should be imprisoned for at least three months and up to a year and should not be allowed to avoid jail because he's a single parent and primary care giver to his children.

In 2012, forty-six year old teacher Dianne L. Leach pled guilty to two counts of gross sexual assault of a thirteen year old 8th grade student. Prosecutor Paul Cavanaugh requested the Court cap Leach's sentence at no more than six months in jail. Leach's attorney stated that Cavanaugh's recommendation allowed defense to argue for even less prison time. The young boy's aunt Karen Manning voiced her discontent with the gender bias stating "it's a slap on the wrist. I believe if this was a man and it was a female 13-year-old teenager he'd get prison time."[2]

On July 13, 2013 the judge rejected Cavanaugh's six month recommendation and sentenced Leach to twelve months in jail. On the same day, forty-one year old Mark Smith was sentenced after he pled guilty to one count of gross sexual assault which took place ten years earlier (2003) and which his attorney called a one time "15 minutes of stupidity" with a thirteen year old babysitter. Unlike with Leach (who pled no contest to two counts of rape), at Smith's sentencing prosecutor Cavanaugh argued for a much harsher punishment for the man, sending him to three years in prison for the one incident of "15 minutes of stupidity" ten years ago which apparently did not involve any intercourse.[3]

People like this should not be in positions of government power. Cavanaugh is as corrupt as his "retiring" (actually running away because she's afraid) boss, Carletta Bassano. Maine needs better. America needs better.

1 http://new.bangordailynews.com/2008/11/21/uncategorized/woman-31-gets-30-days-in-child-sex-abuse-case/

2 http://www.wabi.tv/news/27397/former-substitute-teacher-accused-of-molesting-a-student-pleads-no-contest

3 http://fenceviewer.com/site/index.php?option=com_k2&view=item&id=75777:man-gets-prison-time-for-2003-sex-assault&Itemid=938

Can you just “man down”?

George St. Jones · 12 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

If you are a male and have ever admitted to feelings of inadequacy or anxiety there’s a good chance that your concerns were met with comments such as these:

“Just get out there and do it.”
“Get over it.”
“Just be you and start feeling confident.”
“Suck it up.”
“Deal with it.”
“You’re x age and still feeling this way? Come on man, it’s time to grow up.”

In short, “man up.”

This sentiment is pervasive in our culture (as well as many cultures around the world) and it is almost always aimed at males. Never mind that there isn’t anything about being male that guarantees power, confidence, reliability, or success; my interest here is in the usefulness of this cliche as advice, which is usually how it’s framed. To start, let’s look at the quotes above. The general idea being expressed is that the person is acting weak, needy or passive, and therefore they need to be stronger, more independent, more assertive, just like that. The assumption here is that their problems are trivial, that they shouldn’t need any help or support, and that their expression of anguish, frustration, pain, or fear means they’ve given up, submitted, surrendered, retreated.

Wait, what is it that they often say about assumptions?

When you tell someone to “man up,” what you are saying is “be less like you and more like me.” Okay hypothetical flawless life-guru, that means people can just choose to change in the opposite direction right? Now that we’ve established that, let me ask you a question:

Can you “man down?”

If you are, for example, extremely secure in yourself and confident around people you are highly attracted to could you choose to become anxious and insecure instead?

No?

So if you can’t “man down”, what makes you think someone can “man up”? Is it fair to expect that of them?

I think people often downplay, or just don’t consider that other people are who they are in the exact same way they themselves are who they are, but just with different outward results. The problem with the sentiment of “manning up” is that who we are is largely a result of our past experiences, and these experience s differ greatly between people. Take social anxiety for example. If you have good experiences with people throughout your childhood and adolescence you’ll be secure in your adequacy and likability. If however, you have had enough bad experiences with people to make you doubt your self worth, you’ll be completely insecure and anxious. It’s not as easy as “being confident” or “finding your balls.” To ask someone to just start succeeding is like asking them to grow a new arm. It’s not advice.

Next time someone advises you to “man up” as if it’s the easiest thing in the world to do, ask them if they could just “man down.” When they invariably say no, ask what the difference is. I’ve done this before and people usually get totally stumped because they’ve never thought of it like that before.

That all being said, this does not mean that people cannot change. A series of positive experiences and some practice can change a person affected negatively by their past. I know about this from personal experience. It isn’t easy to change but it can be done. I don’t mean this article to imply that not one person in one instance has ever been helped “manning up.” My point is that its usefulness as advice is much less than its pervasiveness in our culture suggests, and in reality what it does most often is just hurt people.

The cover image depicts the painting 'Anxiety' by Edvard Munch

Pick-Up Artist, or Be Yourself? Be Yourself.

AVfM Video Source · 13 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

OGFurious, after reading multiple books on Pick-Up Artistry and tried some of the techniques. And in the end, while some of it works, he sees a problem:

We think he's got a point. Do you?

Hidden Information On Boko Haram School Attacks

Ali Mehraspand · 13 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

How long has it been since you heard of the name Boko Haram for the first time? It is all over the news now, so fill in the blank: They are a group of militant Islamic terrorists in Nigeria that _____. (Fill in the blank.)

Boko Haram means "western education is sinful." Thus the purpose of this group is to terrorize local people into not having their children attend schools which they consider "sinful." How do they go about doing this? Well, according to hundreds of media news outlets, they apparently take girls hostage. There you go; the blank is filled. "Kidnap girls."

This has prompted campaigns such as Bring Back Our Girls. Different Countries such as France and US are now determined to destroy this group. US planes have begun air search for the schoolgirls. So far so good, we applaud them. Nobody should be allowed to kidnap girls who want education.

They should, however be allowed to murder savagely, any number of boys and men apparently. The fact that the international news have abruptly gone to a state of frenzy, does not mean that this idiotic group has come to existence just recently, after taking several hundred schoolgirls hostage. They have been in business since the eighties and they are called terrorists for a reason.

In the past years, Boko Haram has attacked school after school, slitting open the throats of boys, burning them alive, and on more merciful occasions just shooting them down to make the point that in their mind this kind of education is "sinful." 2,000 "people" have been murdered so far this year by Boko Haram. Yes, "people," means that almost all of their victims have been men and boys. In the school attacks in which they set boys on fire however, they would let the girls go. As opposed to letting girls go, in the recent conflict at Chibok, they held 200 girls hostage, offering to hand them over in return for their arrested members.

The Nigerian President Goodluck Jonathan is now so outraged that he has declared that the kidnapping of the girls is the beginning of the end of Boko Haram's terrorism. Who would have thought that kidnapping girls was the last straw? Murder of men and boys of course has not warranted such a harsh attitude in the past. The President now accepts help from other countries to destroy Boko. President Barack Obama has said that the kidnapping of Nigerian girls and sectarian conflicts worldwide are a sign that "we have not extinguished man's darkest impulses."

This also has brought about a hashtag campaign called “bring back our girls.” Boko Haram must be having second thoughts right now. After all, you might want to murder 2,000 men in less than a year, but you don’t wanna not listen to a hashtag, especially with Angelina Jolie on their side disgusted at you calling you a kidnapper. Oh, yes she calls them kidnappers.

The media coverage is very enlightening. We dare you to examine media’s distorted coverage without getting a headache. Most of them do not mention killings at all. The ones that do mention the killings, mostly use phrases like “students” instead of boys, and “people” instead of men.

But let’s examine the ones that do have enough decency to point to killings. If you take a look at Boko Haram’s victims, you will find that there are two sorts of victims: “people” and on very rare occasions, “people including a woman/girl.” As an example, when in February 56 boys were murdered in a coed school attack and girls were let go, the associated press wrote “dozens of students were killed…” in the title and several paragraphs later: girls and women were spared. Let’s make it clear that this is the oldest trick in the book: The least read part of the article is the middle, even less than the last paragraph.

As for topping insanity with plain crazy, this also is a “scientific” article on Boko Haram by two ~~scholars~~ nuts, Jacob Zenn and Elizabeth Pearson. First sentence of the abstract is enough read for this piece of garbage:

> This article addresses an under-researched aspect of Boko Haram’s activities: gender-based violence (GBV) and its targeting of women.

Is it just me, or is complete insanity the new fashion rage for these people?

Amy Schumer, Special Snowflakes, and Rape

Jason Gregory · 13 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's just harder to be a woman in general, and you get treated differently in the world in general. Everyone deals with you a little differently. But I can't complain about being a female comedian. For me, I can't say it's been harder. I've had a really nice road to where I am now and I've worked really hard and it's paid off. –Amy Schumer

It's just harder to be a woman. This seems to be the premise underlying most of Amy Schumer's comedy. Going through a synopsis for each of her TV show episodes is like reading a litany of feminist grievances about how it's so much harder to be a woman.

There's the usual whining about menstrual cycles. And she does a lot of whining. There is a heaping helping of how women struggle with body image and how women's bodies are objectified. There are complaints about double standards—one for sluts and another for studs. There seems to be a lot of comedy about sexually transmitted diseases. And, of course, rape is a topic in her comedy.

Amy coined the term "grape" in one of her comedy routines. The term references the so-called gray area of rape. Schumer describes this gray area in her own words:

> It's not whether or not something is rape. It's the gray area of how to handle it. It's not always black and white, 'he did that and he's going to jail.' It's a really hard decision—how to handle it. Every girl I know has had a sexual experience that they're really uncomfortable with, that was really questionable. In some cases it was absolutely rape, but they didn't think it was the best idea for them to try to prosecute it.
>
> "So when I say the part of that joke—which I don't say anymore because I did it on the show—'some guys think a girl sleeping is a suggested no. That's a no!' When I say that, the whole joke is the hope that maybe a guy will hear that joke and know that this isn't ok, because that comedian talked about it. And a girl will hear it and feel less alone, because she knows that it happens to other people. That's my goal with that joke. I would never just make a rape joke to make a rape joke. It needs to have a point and be really funny. I think rape is the most horrible thing you can think of and that's why people use it as a punch line."

It's all a very clever and comedic way in which to draw attention to some of the complex problems women face in regards to rape. According to Schumer, it's also a very personal issue. During one of her appearances on "The Opie & Anthony Show," she described her first sexual experience as rape, saying "one of my boyfriends kind of raped me. That's kind of how I lost my virginity…I was like seventeen, hahah…we were drinking and hanging out and then I passed out and I woke up…and I go 'what are you doing!'…I woke up to him having sex with me…We went and visited a college together the next day."

She goes on to describe another gray area, saying "This never happened to me, but they're like starting sex…and the girl falls asleep and the guy finishes. That's a gray area… I don't know. I've never fallen asleep, but I've had like two guys fall asleep while they were going down on me…I just like kneed him in the ear [and said] 'get back to work!'"

Amy goes on to describe how it would be tough to date rape a guy who is passed out drunk or asleep, saying "That would be pretty tough…for you to be asleep, that would be so much more difficult…to rape a guy…I mean. I'll try it." She later describes herself as a "sociopath" and says that she likes to watch rape "porn, where the girl is sleeping and the guy wakes her up."

This all provides a very interesting backstory to a speech given by Schumer at the "Gloria Awards and Gala" that was hosted by the "Ms. Foundation for Women" in honor of Gloria Steinem's eightieth birthday. The speech went viral when Jennifer Vineyard published a transcript of it on Vulture. At last check, the article had over 186 thousand "likes" on Facebook and thousands more tweets on Twitter.

Schumer posted a tweet thanking those who passed around her speech.

According to those in attendance and many more who read the transcript, the speech was inspirational. Contained within was a powerful message about womanly self-esteem. There was also, contained within the speech, the description of a possible sexual assault, or, as Schumer might say, a "grape."

Folks were so busy indulging in Schumer's message about womanly confidence and lauding her about it that they missed what may have been Amy's admission of her sexually assaulting a man too "wasted" to give meaningful consent. An anonymous writer over at Thought Catalog published an article about this admission.

In Schumer's speech, she talks about how great high school was for her, saying "I was running my high school…People knew me. They liked me. I was an athlete and a good friend. I felt pretty. I felt funny. I felt sane." High school was great for her. She was a special snowflake there.

The transition to college didn't go so well for her.

Schumer says that "being witty and charismatic didn't mean shit. Day after day, I could feel the confidence drain from my body…I was getting no male attention, and I'm embarrassed to say, it was killing me."

Schumer talks about how she put on her Freshmen 30 pounds in "record-breaking time" and blames men for being too shallow to appreciate her. She blames men for her loss of confidence. She blames men for her experienced loss of status as a special snowflake.

Clearly, college was traumatic for her. The unchecked narcissism of her female ego was forced into a confrontation with the reality that she may not be a special snowflake—that she might be alone and indistinguishable—something that men learn to deal with when they experience rejection—something that Amy had little, if any, experience with until college. She seems to be completely unprepared and not equipped emotionally to deal with rejection. She seems unaccustomed to the lack of attention paid to her throughout childhood and high school.

This is all very traumatic for her and she is desperate for attention and restoration of her status as a special snowflake. She seems to believe that she is entitled to that status and so proceeds to entitle herself to the attentions of Matt—the first guy in college to finally pay her what she is owed.

Schumer says, "He barely spoke, which was perfect for all the projecting I had planned for him." Make no mistake about it. Matt was nothing more than a tool to Amy. She used him as a tool to try to restore her self-esteem. To her, Matt was a means to an end. She wanted him to call and pay her with attention—something that other men had refused her.

When Matt finally did call, Amy was filled with a rush of excitement and began feeling like a special snowflake again. She shaved her legs and washed her armpits, running over to his dorm room, expecting to have a fun-filled day—a new day of many forthcoming days in which Matt would pay her the attention that she deserved.

Amy finally arrives and discovers that "It's Matt, but not really. He's there, but not really. His face is kind of distorted, and his eyes seem like he can't focus on me. He's actually trying to see me from the side, like a shark…He's fucking wasted."

Schumer goes on to disregard any moral responsibility to actively care about Matt. She disregards the fact that he is too "wasted" to give any meaningful consent to sex. She puts the narcissism of her ego before Matt and explains that she "wanted to be held and touched and felt desired." She says, "I wanted to be with him. I imagined us on campus together, holding hands [so that others could recognize that]…I am lovable."

She gets into bed with him, but he smells like "skunk microwaved with cheeseburgers." She says that they tried kissing, but his "9 a.m. shadow" scratched her face. His "alcohol swollen mouth" was like the mouth of somebody who had just been given Novocaine. His penis was too soft for penetration.

At this point, she realizes that Matt is too "wasted" for sex and not worthy to restore her status as a special snowflake. Amy begins to again feel the deficit of attention owed to her. She begins to feel alone and indistinguishable. She feels "faceless and nameless…just a warm body…" She looks around the room and hopes to "distract" herself or "disassociate" herself from the surroundings and escape the depths of her low self-esteem.

Matt starts to go down on her, but he "falls asleep every three seconds and moves his tongue like an elderly person eating their last oatmeal." His drool is the only wetness between her legs because Matt has passed out and is now snoring into Amy's vagina. Matt's failure to give good head is the last straw for Amy. She "escaped from under him and out the door," never hearing from him again.

Let's be clear. Matt was never anything to Amy. He was nothing other than an object-of-utility—a means to an end. She saw him as a means to restore her status as a special snowflake and demonstrated no care at all about him as a human-being. His extreme intoxication and inability to give meaningful consent was seen, by Amy, as a hindrance to her goals.

Not once did Schumer express or demonstrate an iota of care for his well-being as a human-being. Not once, as a sober party, did she act on her moral responsibility to refrain from having sexual relations with a person too "wasted" to give meaningful consent. Not once did Schumer grant a concrete context to the personhood of Matt. Again, he was nothing other than an object-of-utility.

She took from him all that he had to give and it wasn't enough. She actively engaged in her own narcissistic self-indulgence and desire for attention and status, neglecting her moral responsibility to care for another human-being.

Schumer says that she is a sociopath. Given the lack of moral responsibility and care described in her speech, I'll take her word for it. I believe her.

Schumer's comedy is celebrated by various feminists as a different voice—a woman's voice in a sea of misogyny. However, it may turn out to be a voice of unchecked narcissistic female ego, wrapped in sociopathic charisma and attention-seeking. That's not really a different voice and neither is it a special one.

It simply is a voice—one in a sea of many who routinely claim that it's just harder to be a woman because everyone deals with you differently.

Editorial note: for a different take, see Christopher Cantwell's point of view. –DE

The tiger in the alley – a story every woman should know.

Jack Goodfellow · 13 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine if you will a dark, damp, alley in the most dangerous section of a vast and terrible city. The brick walls sweat dirty water. The stink of trash and week old food lingers in the air. It's never really quiet there and the most terrifying sound is that of footsteps echoing behind you too late at night or too early in the morning.

You stand across from this alley for some reason or another. You are waiting for a bus, maybe a taxi or just on the street trying to get air slightly fresher than that found in your cramped apartment. And then, far down on a corner, you watch as a 900 pound Bengal tiger strolls into view and casually walks towards the mouth of that alley. Head low to the ground, muscles rippling, yellow eyes steady, it comes close to you, snorts and, thankfully, turns and disappears down into the cut between two tall buildings. It disappears into the alley directly across from you and you exhale, hard. You have been spared a terrible death.

Just as you turn to go back into the relative safety of your building, a click clack click clack sound rolls over you and you spin about to see that a young women is slowly walking up the street across from you, following in the footsteps of that Bengal tiger.

She's a younger woman, alone and tired. She could be coming from a night shift, thoughts of a warm comfortable bed and little else circling through her mind. Maybe she was out, enjoying her youth in the company of friends. Each step takes her closer to that alley, where, you suspect, the tiger waits in the shadows, tail curling–and for some reason, you don't yell.

You don't yell as she comes closer, her tired head hung low and staring down at the lights reflecting off of the wet concrete.

You don't yell as she comes within inches of that alley.

And you don't yell as she suddenly turns towards the darkness, pointing herself down the throat of that alleyway, and you don't yell as she disappears.

She screams and the screams continue, for a short while. Soon after, you stand on the street listening to the relative silence, the faint sound of a wild cat tearing the flesh away from its conquered prey.

Are you, if that were you, a decent person? I can't answer that.

Are you moral and good? Again, I don't know and I barely understand those words.

Could you have saved her? Ah yes, you could have. Very easily, you could have saved that young woman. A shout. A scream. It would have been easy.

Change this female character to a male and the same would be true. It would take nothing more than opening your mouth and employing your vocal chords to prevent the terrible and the unfortunate.

So I ask, would you scream or would you press your lips together and watch the young woman turn into the alley? Which person are you? What is the quality of your character?

If you thought about this and honestly can say that you would shout, stomp your feet and wave your hands in an attempt to warn the person turning into the alley, *yo*u are not a feminist.

I will write that again and hope that you will read it – If you are willing to warn the person of the danger in that alley, you are not a feminist.

Feminists are smart. They have managed to twist and contort our world into something sick that is perpetually under their control – but it came at the expense of men and many women. A feminist will tell you that you live within a culture that has been designed to permit and promote the rape of women, young and old. They have inundated you with this idea that all men are potential rapists. All boys are potential rapists who must be taught not to rape. Anything with a penis is a potential rapist who must be taught not to do that.

They tell women that they are never safe, and no action on their part could prevent them from harm. Devoid of accountability and responsibility, they allow women to turn into that alley. They watch, thinking of them as victims in their crusade. Ladies, gentlemen, you are nothing more than this to a feminist.

Get ready, because I'm about to wave my arms and shout, scream, stomp my feet and pass rancorous gas – Don't go in that alley! Don't go in that alley!!

Based upon the statistics published by Montana State University, more than half of the men involved in committing rape were under the influence of alcohol at the time and more than half of the women that reported being raped were under the influence of alcohol at the time. More than 90% of these cases involve men and women under the age of 29.

Don't want to be raped? Don't want to become a rapist? Be very careful regarding your consumption of alcohol. That's all – do that and you are more likely to be bitten by a shark in Kansas than to be raped.

There isn't a widespread conspiracy to shuffle women into being raped. The laws have not been steamrolled into making it easy for a man to violently push a women to have sex. If you are a woman, the easiest way to protect yourself is to be careful when you consume alcohol and to abstain from drugs.

Feminists are by and large a political and philosophical group that has based their entire movement on not shouting as people turn into those dark alleys, ignorantly walking into the jaws of monsters. They tell boys they are the monsters and young women that they should walk where they wish and then stand back, silent, waiting for any calamity and even for just the thought of an impropriety. They feed from this. They exploit you. Ladies and gentlemen, feminists are ingenious parasites, suckling on the consequences of your ignorance.

Consider that, be warned and when a feminist opens his or her mouth, look for the fangs. You'll find them. Look for the twirling tail. It's there. Feminists are the tiger and at the same time, they are the person who says nothing as you are eaten by them.

Janice Fiamengo & Justin Trottier on “The Agenda”

AVfM Video Source · 14 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Want to watch some feminists spin wildly like the final cycle on a washing machine? Just watch them try to rationalize their responses to Justin Trottier and Janice Fiamengo:

We’re pleased to see The Agenda with Steve Paikin discussing these issues seriously. And three cheers for Professor Fiamengo and the Canadian Association for Equality.

KSUM Heats Up Struggle Against Gynocentrism

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 14 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dr. Bob Mattox is one of the Assistant Deans of Kennesaw State University, and an authority over the KSU Women's Resource and Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center (WRC). I sat down with Dr. Mattox, Mrs. Wilson (the director of the WRC) and Dr. Gunn (The director of counseling) to discuss renaming the WRC. A record of the meeting is available for review (EDIT: The meeting recording is no longer available, but the meeting is still summarized below), with KSUM (prospective) advisor names bleeped out for reasons related to preserving organizational stability.

[image]Given my previous discussions with the Non-Normative Anti-Assimilationist Students of KSU and Dean of Student Success Dr. Sansiviro, my initial impression was that the WRC was simply an IPV counseling center with an arbitrary gynocentric sign slapped on the front. That impression was close, but not quite right. Turns out that the WRC is a neutral IPV center with aggregate services for women that distort the brand.

For those of you unaware of the story leading up to this meeting, I met Mrs. Wilson briefly when attending KSU's Love Your Body week. In that chance discussion, I learned that the WRC had services available for men as well. Obviously, one of KSUM's activist missions was set to changing the name of the WRC to reflect services rendered. As I state in the video above summarizing the meeting, the WRC combines two functions that can be found in the first two bullets of the WRC mission statement:

> - Advocacy and support for members of the KSU community who are survivors of sexual assault and other forms of interpersonal violence.
> - Training and education on a variety of topics that address women's and gender issues.

The branding is in a catch-22. If the name stays how it is, campus men will be unaware of the support available to them according to the first bullet point. If the name changes to simply "Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center," then women on campus would be unaware of the female-specific programs in the center. Mrs. Wilson mentioned these services included helping women transition to a career with a child at home, or things of that nature.

Two subscribers on my channel put it best.

[image]

Dr. Mattox responded to my concerns about campus engagement with preliminary talk of reorganization by late 2015. New buildings are under construction all over campus since KSU has acquired tons of capital from its ongoing Southern Polytech State University (SPSU) acquisition. The merge is a game changer across the entire state of Georgia. SPSU is predominantly male university with strong engineering programs, but a small student population of about 6,000. In Fall 2011 (when SPSU did the last release of its fact book), 4590 of 5784 students were male (79%). KSU is currently a predominantly female campus (~60%) with 24,604 students by Fall 2012.

The new KSU student body, assuming these numbers remain roughly the same by next year, is estimated to be 29,194 with a 50.7% male population. The estimation will simply have to be loose given the lack of up-to-date information from SPSU, but we can conclude that the gender population gap on campus is closing.

KSU's adaption to the 50/50 split, according to Mattox, is to isolate the IPV Center from the women's resource division. This would leave the IPV center as the gender neutral entity it was supposed to be in the first place, and put the WRC in its own location. Title IX was the next topic off my tongue. While I am personally unconvinced that a gender-centric center would accomplish anything other university services could not, I wanted to make sure that a men's center had a presence if a women's center was available.

Mattox told me that a men's center is in KSU's future.

But given that the IPV center has gynocentric aggregated functionality with no equivalent male aggregate, counsel will be contacted once more to discuss KSU's current Title IX standing. Mattox defended the name as being useful for traditional reasons, and since every other campus in the University System of Georgia is doing the same thing. Erin Pizzey was kind enough to talk to me on the phone before my meeting. Considering that she was the person who started the tradition, her "LOL wut" was remarkably useful in blowing Maddox's appeal to popularity and tradition out of the water.

But it turns out these IPV administrators never heard of Pizzey.

I have suggested that KSUM act as a future volunteer pool for the reorganization effort, because KSUM is meant to be a place for action, not commentary. In exchange, the administration will offer assistance in seeking tenured academic advisors who are not afraid of political ramifications. The search will extend to SPSU, where the faculty is certain to have more experience with men.

The meeting with Mattox, Gunn and Wilson has opened many incredible opportunities for KSUM to make KSU a more equitable community.

But as always, KSUM remains an ongoing story. Every accomplishment contributes to a lasting presence on campus, and therefore a proven model for a grassroots activist organization.

Moment Of Clarity : Entertainment Royalty Status Doesn't Grant Respect From Women In Your Family

Ty Henry · 14 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As you may have heard or read, musician Jay Z was recently physically attacked by pop music sensation Beyoncé's sister Solange.

Some of the happiest folks on earth this morning must be the staff of Parkwood Entertainment.

For those not in the know, Parkwood Entertainment (PE) is the public relations arm of the Beyoncé Knowles empire, and let's just say there is lots of overtime on horizon.

To bring you up to speed, TMZ released footage allegedly of singer Solange Knowles, little sister of the Grammy winning superstar, assaulting Beyoncé's husband, rap icon and business mogul Jay-Z (ne' Shawn Carter) in an elevator of New York City's tony Standard Hotel:

The grainy video, ostensibly leaked by hotel security staff, shows Beyoncé, Solange, Jay-Z and a bodyguard in the elevator. Beyoncé enters first, followed by Solange, Jay, and the bodyguard. Immediately upon entry, Solange takes an aggressive posture, suggesting spillover from a dispute in the adjoining hall. Within seconds, the blows ensue, Solange punching and then kicking Jay until the bodyguard grabs her from behind. Beyoncé, standing just beside Jay, does nothing to intervene.

While holding Solange, the bodyguard appears to press several buttons. Speculation is that he pressed one of the emergency stop buttons to protect privacy. After a minute or so, the bodyguard lets go, but remains in between, but steps to the door as it opens. This leaves an opening for Solange, who after exchanging a few words with Jay, resumes the attack, prompting the exiting parties to re-enter the elevator. At that point, Beyoncé does step in between the two, albeit gingerly, and after the bodyguard. Eventually, all three exit.

Arguably the most influential female artist of her generation, Beyoncé has been the Heroine of Hypergamy, from clarion calls for cuckoldry ("Jumpin, Jumpin") to aggressive, unvarnished shaming anthems ("Bills, Bills, Bills"), to iconic, cheeky kiss-offs ("Single Ladies", "Irreplaceable"). Ironically, the creator of the decidedly un-feminist "Bow Down Bitches" couldn't get her own sister to "Fall Back." That may reveal more than Beyoncé intended, as the optics now place her as a metaphor for the feminist indifference to men as victims of domestic violence.

"Hitting my husband? No big deal, go ahead. GRRRL POWER!"

Some questions and observations in the immediate aftermath:

1. In the aftermath of the video, Twitter exploded, the most popular hashtag being #WhatDidJayZSayToSolange. The subtext is the tried and true trope of divergent gendered inquiry; if a man hits first, it's "what an abusive jerk!" If a woman hits first, it's "what did that jerk do/say to cause her to hit him?" The conversation of a clear unprovoked assault is still framed in a fem-centric manner; if the victim has a penis, let's first look to his culpability before we "pass judgement."

2. It seems karma has paid a visit to the Knowles family. A decade after her watershed thug-love anthem with Destiny's Child, "Soldier," defined a man by his willingness to "stand up for me," Mrs. Carter was quite tepid in standing in the breach for Mr. Carter in the face of an assault by another woman. Moreover, the irony is rich that the sister of the woman at the forefront of the "#BanBossy" feminist campaign has provided a textbook object lesson in the sort of "bossiness" that has infected the American Black Community for two generations running; that even the most minimal failure to defer to a black women entitles them to strike physical blows.

CNN's Don Lemon spoke Tuesday morning about seeing women in his family "acting up" in family gatherings. It's as if he took a page out of M. Night Shyamalan ("Those Whom We Don't Speak Of") with his euphemisms. That said, Chris Cuomo's steed must be exhausted at the amount of laps he took to rescue Solange, from qualifiers about whether it was "really her," to the "we don't know what he said to her" fallback excuse. (See transcript from CNN.)

1. Keeping to that narrative, this "attack privilege" has begun to trickle to other communities. Will we start to have this conversation about standards of behavior for women, or will men defending themselves continue to serve as helium for the World Star Hip-Hops and other Super Giant Stars in the online universe?

2. As testament to how the Red Pill has penetrated popular consciousness, many on Twitter are asking why no incident report was taken, nor any arrests made, including ESPN's VAW Crusader-In-Chief, Jemele Hill.

3. And the most important question in the imminent is, will Solange Knowles be cited, or will some contrived narrative arise to minimize the attack, such as the trickling rumor that Jay-Z somehow provoked the attack by "doing something" to Beyoncé? Indeed, there is talk of a criminal investigation–of the hotel's security staff!

The situation continues to unfold, and merits monitoring. But one thing remains certain; Beyoncé and Solange, you got some 'splainin' to do, and your house PR firm may or may not be able to protect the "family brand" this time.

But for Jay-Z, we suspect this is a Moment of Clarity:

Editorial note: article title photo used under Creative Commons License from Wikimedia Commons.–DE

Domestic Violence: Articles of Faith

Ron Collins · 14 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of the consistent findings in my research has been that domestic violence professionals, and the politicians who engage in the issues associated with it, speak in a specialized language both among themselves and to the larger public. Within this manner of speaking are a number of presumptions and "givens" that are, upon deeper examination, shown to be little more than articles of faith, a kind of pseudo-facts that easily summarize and justify certain prejudicial approaches to the problems of domestic violence, stalking, sexual assault and generally abusive behavior.

Here I want to examine some of these, first on face value as code terms, and then invite readers to contribute their own input into what these ideas mean, where they come from, and how they influence the thinking of the Domestic Violence (DV) industries and the public perceptions of the entire topic.

1."The vast majority of victims are women…"

Best I can tell, this is a paraphrasing of something stated by former Senator and now US Vice-President Joe Biden. He is often quoted in Justice Department documents saying this, and as a self-defining premise it stands unchallenged at the heading of a program named after one sex, and belatedly offering to "include" the other. The "vast majority" meme is so oft-repeated and -referred-to as holy writ in discussions of DV, that it obscures the mass body of evidence to the contrary, as if the question of who is victimized by these crimes against humanity were settled for all time and against all challenge.

2."Victim/perpetrator…"

This concept is more powerful than meets the eye. It essentially limits the entire discussion to settings where one helpless victim is continually at the mercy of one motivated, overpowering perpetrator, and invalidates entirely the idea that a household or relationship may be mutually violent or abusive. It also neatly discounts the influences of substance abuse/addiction as contributors to abusive conduct, as well as post-traumatic effects, prescription medications, third-party actors such as cuckolds, in-laws and gang members exerting influence over household behavior. "Victim/perpetrator" logic essentially paints a picture of the helpless woman, cowering defenselessly before the monstrous man and awaiting her next beating, and ignores the available facts on all the other different kinds of abuses and their motive factors.

3."Power & control"

Another canonical notion, that abusive conduct is exclusively motivated by a perpetrator's obsessions and a victim's helplessness against them. The hidden subtext that is often not mentioned by name but generally implicit (see item #1), is that power and control are patriarchal objectives, that a man abuses a woman because he believes he has the right to. This postulates that only men are motivated to violence and abuse by a quest for power, and also that this is the only possible motive for any kind of abuse. Indeed, I ran across a statement by a "scholar" parroting all the above ideograms the other day, who made so bold as to say that fighting between a couple could not be described as domestic violence because it was not motivated by power & control. In other words, children traumatized for life by Mommy's nightly bouts over a fifth of Jack and an eight-ball of crack with her latest boyfriend are not really victims, because neither of the adults was trying to control the other…(?)

These are probably the Top Three in the Holy Canons of DV practitioners and activists, but there are others. Feel free to contribute & comment, and I will add more as they arise in my ongoing studies.

4. "Get out while you still can"

This scattershot advice is something I see often in discussion threads on DV, where a woman will write in vaguely describing a situation where a man has done something like open her mail, or argued with her in a heated manner, and the other ladies in the thread will descend on this content with this well-meaning and universally applicable solution. Naturally, it never occurs to anyone that a woman has a brain in her head, that she is looking for outside justifications for what she is already planning to do (leave a man and take his kids away), and that she has the cognitive ability to know in advance what these groups want to hear in order to tell her what she wants to hear in return. This also applies in law offices, women's shelters (with all the needed application forms for free services to "victims"), and courts of law.

5. "He had it coming/ she was driven to…"

This one is attended by much tragedy, bloodshed, and innocent loss of life. Anything from a woman abandoning a man for reasons unrelated to his being violent, to taking children from their fathers, to premeditated assaults and homicides on unsuspecting men outside any acts of violence being defended against, to women killing their own children and committing suicide, has been explained historically all too often by this dangerously reckless idea. Its usage implies a complete inability to accept the notion of a woman's culpability or the suspect nature of her own intentions and motives for them. It is probably, in its way, one of the most insulting degradations of women that exist, a suggestion that a woman's actions are only re-actions, and not something she is even capable of being in charge of herself.

6. "My Abuser"

There seems to be an unwritten law among DV people, that their legitimacy of commitment is defined by their credentials as victims. As "survivors" or "recovering victims" their professional objectivity is not called into question by their personal experiences, nor even by their ongoing inability to see any case before them through anything but their own personal lens of experiences. Such participants in discussions or in casework (again, generally women) will put information from a case file or one woman's verbal descriptions of her circumstance, into a larger context by relating it back to their own background, using the term "My Abuser" as a biographical reference to why they have the right and the mandate to be involved in this kind of work at all. This "My Abuser" person apparently has granted them license for life to see only through their own prejudicial perspective just what is happening in everyone else's life. In a creepy kind of way, "survivors" constantly referring to their personal Abuser has a resemblance-in-reverse to born-again converts who have learned to explain everything about themselves in terms of their relationship with Jesus; the Abuser persona lives on and re-defines them as human beings as a sort of anti-messianic figure who has given their new lives post-abuse a whole new meaning.

7. "He must have done something to deserve it"

This one, like #5 above, is used as a catch-all disclaimer for that other totally explainable outcome: maternal abandonment of fathers and the removal of children from them. #5 is used mostly after the fact in cases where a woman clearly has been the one whose harmful acts can be proven. This one is used more often where no violence is ever shown to have occurred at all, but a woman is given sympathy and support for deserting a marriage, home and man by onlookers who will simply assume that it had been his conduct and not hers that had made the relationship untenable.

I got one of these just today, from a woman who was commenting on a thread of mine at LinkedIn about trying to re-establish contact with my son after four years' silence, which his mother claimed back then was a 12-yr-old boy's idea, and included not just me but my entire family. The woman wanted to know what had happened between the two of us that might have preceded an act of parental alienation, then became indignant when I asserted to her that her question was immaterial. I went on to explain to her, as patiently as I could, that she was not even recognizing the premise behind her question, and that she would not have asked it at all if it were a mother trying to get back to her child and not a father. "What happened?" is not a question that has any bearing on parental alienation, as the obvious answer is "she got pregnant and they became parents, and the rest is nobody's damn business unless a crime is PROVEN to have been committed."

But with "he must have done something to deserve it" used to rationalize everything from marital desertion to castration, and hanging in the air like a toxic cloud, people don't even see just how double the standard is, when they go fishing like this poor gal did, to find some angle where she could point out to me that, if I could just address the poor mom's feelings about me, maybe the whole thing would blow over and all could be forgiven. That there is anything to forgive, except a mother's choice to cut a boy off from half his family and then blame it on him, is the unspoken premise behind asking "what happened between you two?"

These are all posts authored by me aka "Rof L Mao Esq" on the Antimisandry.com thread linked above. Other posts by other AM members not seen here may be viewed by following the link to the original thread at Anti-Misandry.–RC

Chris Mackney: suicide note

AVfM Video Source · 15 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Putting the empathy deficit in a light you don't see often enough.

Dina Mackney would rather you not see this.

An Analysis of the Women in Aliens

AVfM Video Source · 15 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The movie Aliens is considered a landmark film in a number of areas. Sargon of Akkad has a look at why men and boys tend to love this film–and illustrates how utterly disappointing most feminists are to so many people:

You may want to subscribe to Sargon of Akkad.

A Letter to Rachel Maddow

John Hembling (JtO) · 15 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In Turkey, as I write this, there are, as you already know, approximately 150 miners trapped one mile below ground in a burning coal mine. It was you, Miss Maddow covering this disaster on your show on MSNBC who brought it to my attention.

These 150 miners who may still be alive, or not. There are also, based on your report, at least 270 already dead.

Watching your video segment, describing this, and similar mining disasters – I was overwhelmed by emotion, and for the first time in more than 30 years, I wept.

But, not for the miners still trapped a mile below the earth's surface, in what may become their mass-grave. I did not cry, even for those who are already known to be dead. Miners, loggers and workers in all manner of dangerous fields die by the hundreds all over the world on a daily basis. A fact that while tragic, is so commonplace that it is rarely considered by people not directly affected.

Your report Miss Maddow provoked my temporary loss of control and my tears, by the words you used to describe those who are trapped a mile below ground, and those who are known to now be dead in that particular burning coal mine.

You called them people, and also, significantly, men. You also listed a series of other, and similar mining disasters, catastrophic events resulting in hundreds of deaths, and in some cases, thousands of deaths at a time.

http://www.msnbc.com/rachel-maddow-show/watch/deadly-mine-disaster-leaves-turkey-reeling-256242243933

Quoting you, Miss Maddow:

> "..in 1907, a year later, in Monongah West Virginia, the worse ever coal disaster in the US – two huge explosions, one man is saved. But 367 American men and boys are killed. In 1913 in Wales – 439 men are killed in one mine, in one gas explosion. 1942 in China, that's the worst one ever in the world, 1500 ("snuffed out 1,549 Chinese and Koreans") coal miners killed in a single accident. In South Africa, in 1960 – a mine collapses, more than 400 men killed. "

You see, Miss Maddow, I am writing to thank you for noting in your MSNBC report something that I have never seen in any other mainstream news or media.

What you clearly named, and is what nobody else in the media ever mentions. The humanity of men and boys who die.

The usual format is this:

"Turkey mine explosion: more than 200 dead and hundreds trapped".

This is a headline from theguardian.com addressing the same Turkish mining disaster your MSNBC segment covered.

But 200 of who dead?

The 600-word article includes twenty references to the men trapped, and to the men already dead.

- coal miners
- colleagues
- death toll
- hundreds still trapped

- Twenty people initially made it out
- 200 and 300 workers
- hundreds of miners stranded underground
- the corpses of miners
- how many workers were trapped underground
- trapped workers
- their faces and hard hats covered in soot
- relatives of miners
- workers were 420 metres deep
- worker

The word "people" is used 4 times. Miners appears 7 times, including once in a caption on the article's included photograph.

And the men attending this disaster, trying to prevent the deaths of their colleagues and countrymen, they're not men either, they're just "rescuers."

The word "men' is not used. You know, the people the article is about. They are not men. They're workers, miners, they're a "death toll", and sometimes even people – but they're never men.

That it is men who die in 93% of workplace fatalities, and 97% of military combat fatalities is never mentioned. It is a fact hidden behind the selective use of job titles and euphemisms by every single mainstream reporter, journalist and talking head – every time a large number of men die.

In other disasters, when people other than men are killed, the pattern of reporting is a little different.

"Airstrike killed at least 14 civilians, including women and children"

The article following that headline notes three women and five children among the dead. The word "men" is not included, although a little rudimentary arithmetic will indicate that the remaining six are the corpses of men. If any of the dead children were male, that's hidden behind the word "children" as well.

That phrase, "Women, and Children" is the common key, used in almost all reporting, to let us know whose deaths matter. When people have been killed, blown up, vaporized by modern military technology, drowned, burned to death, suffocated hundreds of feet below the ground, or crushed under rubble, and if those dead people did not have ovaries – or were not children – then their deaths do not matter. Their humanity, prior to being extinguished by mishap – is hidden behind euphemisms like "death count" or job titles like, "miner," and "worker". It is one of the ways in which the corpses of those who are almost all men, and on which "civilized" societies run – are kept hidden from public view.

It's what allows modern cultures to keep killing men, for everybody else's convenience.

> "Did you ever think what those sleepers are that underlie the railroad? Each one is a man…. The rails are laid on them, and they are covered with sand, and the cars run smoothly over them. They are sound sleepers, I assure you. And every few years a new lot is laid down and run over; so that, if some have the pleasure of riding on a rail, others have the misfortune to be ridden upon."
>
> ~Henry David Thoreau

Except for you, Miss Maddow – you called them men. You pointed out that the humans regularly dying in the dangerous business of mining are the human beings called men and boys. Thank you.

I hope you haven't jeopardized your job. Really.

Editorial note: title image used under Creative Commons License as specified here. –DE

The inevitability of MGTOW

Jack Goodfellow · 15 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When a MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) man and a woman engage in discussion it's incredibly easy to predict what will be said:

"Aren't you afraid of dying alone?"

"Don't you crave companionship?"

"What are you going to do when you get old and need someone to care for you?"

"What about children? You can't have children on your own."

Then, after these and any number of variations on these, the cork in the bottle, the final conclusions are any or all of the following:

1. "You just never grew up." – a way of shaming a man and declaring that he never became a man.

Or…

2. "You just haven't met the right woman yet." – Feigned sympathy and a statement that amounts to the idea that eventually you will get it.

Or…

3. "You just hate women." – The most clever of the conclusions, it implies that you were damaged by a woman (because only a damaged man could have anything but complete love and devotion for women) and, if you were able to be damaged by a woman, you were never worthy of a woman in the first place.

Shame, shaming sympathy, and veiled attacks followed by more shame. It's all predictable.

There's something else that is predictable too – the overwhelming number of men that will ultimately decide to toss away the risk associated with entering into legally-binding social arrangements with women.

The explanation for this inevitability is as simple as explaining why healthy 40 year-old men do not spend their Saturday afternoons attending the birthday parties of their 5 year old friends. It's as easy as understanding why bankers do not give out mortgages to 12 year olds and why it's pathetic for a middle aged man to spend hours at the playground exchanging baseball cards with third graders.

As so many (possibly most) young women have been reduced to an infantile state, healthy, mature men have become able to see beyond the façade and recognize female behavior for what it has become, they will avoid those relationships the same way grown men avoid land deals with six year olds. And the real tragedy here is that all of those statements listed above could be of tremendous value to women if they understood them from a male point of view.

1. "Aren't you afraid of dying alone?" and "Don't you crave companionship?"

Physically, we all die alone, but it is easy to believe that a person would face the experience of death with a greater sense of peace and well-being holding memories of a life that included deep, intimate, connections to other human beings. These types of memories can be a source of strength and that's a commodity when facing one's own end. Likewise, companionship is an instinctual desire, craved by humans at the core, a genetic predisposition important for our survival and mental health.

So, yes to both yet men will still inevitably choose to lead their own lives, avoid marriage and forego fathering children. The reason is simple: Women can no longer be counted on to provide those things.

The culture designed, and so cleverly implemented by feminism, has sunk countless women into a state of arrested development while also creating a legal structure that amounts to a gun pointed at the heads of all men. Women have largely become children backed by thugs.

They expect men to care for them, coddle them, protect them, bend to their will, and accept any idea or perspective they put forward. If a man refuses, expressing his mature self, they can call in the police who will arrest him for nothing. The Family Courts will take his children, property, and future earnings. The District Attorneys that will prosecute on any outlandish assertion of rape or impropriety (at least any assertion made against a man.) All of these things serve to accomplish one thing – subsidize the lifelong childhood that women have been flung into by feminists.

How can a child backed by goons be a companion? And who wants to lie on their deathbed remembering the trauma of having dealt with that quality of life (or, if you submit, a life of constant emasculation)? This doesn't ease your final moments.

2. "What are you going to do when you get old and need someone to care for you?"

Children cannot care for adults because children do not understand what it means to get old. How can a woman that ascribes to feminist dogma relate to the feelings that mature men experience, the sadness and regret at not having achieved everything we wanted? They have been convinced that nothing in their lives is their responsibility.

There is a pain and a joy that comes from realizing that you never had any control over where you started, but you could always control the direction you went from there. That control is limited at times. There are forces in the world completely separate from you, but in everything you can make a choice. Women have given away their ability to choose in exchange for an infantile bliss. Their care can never be anything other than a child's care – simple, ignorant, a little sweet, but of little substance or worth. They simply do not understand well enough to have genuine compassion.

3. "What about children? You can't have children on your own."

You're right. It takes two to tango and no one allows single men to adopt, but it is out of concern for their unborn children that men will choose not to have them. A man cannot provide safety for his children when shackled to a woman-child in command of thugs. If at any time he chooses to act in his own children's best interests where that conflicts with this infantile woman, she can destroy him and/or the children with near legal impunity. Generation after generation of single women have raised increasingly apathetic, violent, or rage-filled boys, unprepared and emotionally distraught and often violent girls, and still they push for laws to continue paternal alienation with no sign of it being reversed!

There often simply is no right woman and, in their state of suppressed maturity, it's impossible to even hate such women. They are dangerous and frustrating lost opportunities best avoided by men.

So it has, and will increasingly become such, that a man can only truly be a man if he steps forward and screams, "NO! I will not do this!" Then, he must walk away and define his own self and his own life, separate from women, their damaged children, and the thugs that have subverted her independence and drawn all of her power to them in exchange for giving her a fantasy land fit for newborns with no ambition to ever grow up.

A Young Student's Anti-Feminism Speech

AVfM Video Source · 16 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of the things we often say here at AVfM is that we in the Men's Rights Movement are working on a generational task, to change the dialogue and influence future generations. Young people like this help tell us that we're having an effect.

Well done young sir!

Annelie Sjöberg pilloried by The Sisterhood for Asking Inconvenient Questions

William Andersson · 16 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There's a special place in Hell for women who Betray the Sacred Doctrine of Feminism. That´s how one could reformulate a classic feminist book title after having, with increasing distaste, experienced the last few days the formidable lynch mob against High School teacher Annelie Sjöberg from Norrköping.

She has been called "Piglet," "Gender Traitor," "Rape Defender," and worse in quantities of idiotic posts in public social media. They have contacted and harassed her employer and headmaster, both by telephone and email, in the hope that she will lose her job and her livelihood. They have also contacted the leadership of the Centre-Party where Annelie is active, hoping, I suppose, that she would be excluded from politics as well.

A special place in Hell? What for, the uninitiated ask? What could Annelie possibly have done to deserve being subjected to vile persecution of this kind?

Did she hurt or maybe even kill someone? Has she perhaps behaved stupidly or badly? Been rude? Jerked the pacifier from a baby or tortured a kitten?

No, actually none of the above. Her crime consists in the fact that she had the nerve to question the One and Only, according to the net-feminists, True Doctrine. The smelly mix of feminism, Marxism and Stalinism that goes under the name of radical feminism, and that too many naive fools in this country still believe stands for good.

To these idiots, let me just say: come on, it's high time that more people than Annelie Sjöberg wake up and "face the music." Can it be that a high school teacher from Norrkoping is the only woman in Sweden who is brave enough to stand up to these hateful internet bullies?

The national media should show what happens to those who dare to question these ideologues, how they are hunted, attacked and silenced, but we all know how it works: it's men who commit internet hate crimes. Women are victims. So they have told us. It would perhaps be a bit embarrassing to suddenly sing another tune now. Therefore, they will not come to Annelie's rescue.

When the feminist cult hunts in packs on the net, as they always do, media doesn't care. The reactions from the Swedish media, when SVT's reporters' digging recently showed the truth about left wing violence, largely explain why.

Annelie Sjöberg went together with a few students to a public feminist panel discussion, filmed it and asked three adequate and fairly harmless questions. This was seen by some within the cult as if Annelie had, lo and behold, criticized feminism–and what's worse, she did it as a woman. It is seen by feminists as a far worse crime than when a man does it, which of course can be seen as a tad ironic in context.

The feminist flock succumb to the very behavior towards women that they would otherwise curse in their reeking blog posts.

Men, especially us white heterosexual men who are not ashamed of our gender, are already considered pigs by proxy. Therefore one can ignore our protests over being treated like second-class citizens. Knowing the level of a pig you are on the pig scale is a bit tricky, so let's dwell on that for a moment. Myself and other MRAs are high-level pigs. MRA 's with penises have almost all pig criteria against them. Men are judged according to a pre-determined feminist template. It contains nothing about our character, or the way we conduct ourselves as humans. Nor about how we view and treat others. Nor are they concerned about what we actually say and write. Such things are totally uninteresting to a feminist in her assessment.

No, because the feminist cult is racist, sexist and intolerant, they are assessing a man only by using four established criteria:

- Sex (of course, or in feminist-speak; gender)
- Race (the more white you are the more pig are you)
- Sexual orientation (Straight = pig)
- Political opinion (less feminist = more pig)

In other words, if you're a white heterosexual man you are an arch-pig by proxy. Even if your name was Jesus Christ and you could walk on water, it would change nothing. Additionally, if you refuse to confess to a doctrine which only despise you, you're an even worse arch-pig. Sorry.

However, if you lie down flat in front of the cult leaders' feet and lick their boots while you admit to being a patriarchal pig and that you hate yourself and all other men, you could possibly reduce your pig status slightly, but only slightly. From the top of the pig scale where MRAs, fathers' rights activists and equalists are, it gradually falls. Mitigating factors for men are:

Being brown or black.

Merely, at least sometimes, being willing to take another man in the bum.

Walking around in dress and high heels.

You are less pig-like on the feminist scale if you are dark-skinned, willing to from time to time dance the chocolate cha-cha, hate your own gender, paint your nails, dress in a dress and high heels and vote for the feminist party. That way you can actually be partly accepted. Why do you think feminists across Europe loves Conchita Wurst? For his amazing voice? But even he must not think that he will ever be seen as equal. The man who believes that is in for a surprise. A man is still a man. Nothing can be done about that.

The feminist words of equality are about as true as their role models, Lenin's and Stalin's, were in their time. Understand? Good! Let's continue then.

When men criticize feminism it's thus not so bad. It's expected; men are pigs and everyone knows that pigs are stupid. In other words, it is easy to shake off that criticism. "Oh that's just misogyny from bitter old men who are afraid of losing their privileges." (What privileges they are, nobody knows.) But when a woman ventures into the sacred pussy temple and starts questioning the sacred doctrine in this way, it is suddenly seen as something totally outrageous. The hatred and bloodlust that is always latent beneath the surface are awoken. Revenge must be exacted. Annelie must be hunted by all possible means like an injured animal over the net until … yes, until what?

So far, Annelie has stood up and tried to reason with her opponents wherever the attacks occurred. This is the way most of us non- cultists choose to resolve conflicts. However there are two kinds of opponents on which this method is wasted:

1. Criminal organizations: These usually solves conflicts according to the edicts in the Old Testament, an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. Or rather both eyes and the whole damn row of teeth. This group is no stranger to getting people to see things their way through threats and intimidation rather than with factual arguments.

2. Cults: To reason with a cult is by definition useless because they are not open to any other worldview than their own–ever. Try to invite in Jehovah's Witnesses the next time they come visit, and see if they are open to reconsidering their view on the state of things if you do not understand what I mean. This group as well, has made itself known to use threats and intimidation to "correct" its ranks.

Annelie Sjöberg's involuntary war against the cult began pretty innocently already April 13 when she replied to a Tweet posted by Natashja Blomberg, aka Lady Dahmer, feminist blog queen and pack leader.

[image]

> (Translation: Lady Dahmer: EVERY time I post a pic of my fat body people start telling me how unhealthy it is > Annelie Sjöberg: Then don't!)

Sjöberg, secure in the belief that the internet feminist wolf pack, like most others on Twitter, possesses what is called humor, humility and self-distance, stepped right into a hornet's nest. Soon the cult's storm troops charged into the extremely-offended Blomberg's defense and attacked as a pack, like they always do, and just like always when it comes to feminist hunting techniques, the weak spots of the opponent are to be identified and exploited. It's a successful technique that's been used several times before and often managed to get critical people to keep quiet and disappear from the debate. The best known case is Pär Ström. They finally found also his weak spot.

[image] We recognize the methods

In Annelie's case it was her livelihood and employment as a teacher that were identified as her Achilles heel. After that was established it was not long before the underlying threats began to appear. Most aggressive was one of the cult members named Sofia Capel, a white woman who lives the high life in London, drinking champagne, and on the whole seems very oppressed. Sofia Capel operates a closed feminist group on Facebook with 6,000 members. There the plans for "Operation Crush Annelie" were made and discussed.

But it was on Twitter Sofia Capel came with her first threatening comment.

[image]

> (Translation: SofiaC: Do your bosses know that you are retweeting anonymous misynogists?
>
> Annelie Sjöberg: Don't know any anonymous misygonists at all. But a lot of men and boys that love girls/women.)

Now Sjöberg had to be made to understand that she probably had better stop questioning the feminists, and also stop sharing tweets of their political opponents if she wanted to avoid unpleasantness in her workplace. They were sooooo concerned about the schoolchildren's welfare. (Feminists always are "concerned for children").

Now the hateful campaign escalated more and more. How the hell could they allow a woman who does not recognize the One True and Holy Doctrine to work with children? My God! Call the police, the fire brigade, all the country's newsrooms, the government and His Royal Highness the king! Now!! Poooooor children, having a teacher who does not worship feminism and thus does not stand for all peoples equal rights?! FOR GODS SAKE DO SOMETHING!

Please, all you people who believe that feminists stand for equality and human rights: Try like this courageous high school teacher to have a discussion with them. Ask them some critical questions as she did. If you dare and have a job you can afford to lose. It is an indisputable fact that this isn't the behavior of a democratic political movement, but rather of gangsters and brainwashed cults. Which of these that best describe today's loony feminism, you get to decide for yourself. I honestly do not know.

Annelie clarified her views so that there would be no misunderstanding about where she stood in matters of democracy and human equal rights.

[image]

> (Translation: Annelie Sjöberg: Violence and threats are always wrong, whichever side it comes from

[image]

> (Translation: Annelie sjöberg: I strongly dislike both right wing extremists and left wing extremists views and their hateful messages)

She even apologized if she by ignorance or accident had retweeted any extreme person's tweets, and clarified her own position. Hardly what most people would consider to be extreme views, or a bad behavior, right? But feminists are not like most people, which Annelie now has come to experience. Annelie does not seem to be the type of person who is easily intimidated by bullies, rather the opposite. But feminist wolf packs online are not like just any bullies. They do not stop at writing crap about you. They attack you where you are weakest. To destroy your life is the goal. Their hate is nasty.

That is how it all began.

What followed, and how it all escalated you can read in the blog WTF? He gives an excellent account (in Swedish) in four parts. Part 1 , Part 2 , Part 3 and Part 4

In the blog Gender Debate, you can read Annelie's own version in a guest post.

The blogger Jussi H Lundell also writes an excellent post, on the subject: The strange reality of having to express support for brave women like Annelie Sjöberg time and time again.

Natashja Blomberg backs down in her last post and claims to have had an attack of conscience and come to the sensational conclusion that it may not be entirely fair to destroy a person's life just because she has behaved badly online? (Behave badly = questioning feminism).

Wow, what an insight.

Whether it really came from the heart or from the rising amount of attention around the whole thing and that it simply started to become a little too hot under her feet, we cannot know. Your guess is as good as mine. My guess? Well you have to guess that too.

Finally, I want to send a big congratulations to both Annelies employer, her political party and her students. Such straight-backed, wise, and brave educators and politicians are a rare thing in Sweden today. I sincerely hope you all have the sense to appreciate her accordingly.

If not then raise her salary immediately.

UPDATE:

Since the article was written the following has happened: Annelie came damned close to losing her job after some of the students' parents called and expressed concerns of sending their kids to a school that employed "people like her." However after people in support of Annelie also started to contact the school, the principal said that he now has understood the whole picture and the risk seems to have been averted. (Or perhaps he just realized that the truth was published on several blogs?)

Natashja Blomberg on the other hand claims to have lost several advertisers on her blog. I guess justice sometimes prevails….

Even in this country.

Editorial note: this item originally appeared on A Voice for Men-Sweden and was translated into English. –DE

A MGTOW journey. Classification: Declassified

Mark Charles (Mr. C) · 16 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is a short essay on my opinions regarding rape and gender equality. I have written this only as I am tired of being criticized by ladies for my lifestyle choice (celibacy) and of having people (i.e. the same ladies) accuse me of sexism anytime I respond to their questions regarding my opinions on equality. What follows is simply my account as to why I have come to the conclusions that I have drawn contrary to all I have been told to believe at school and university. Perhaps by making this public it may challenge the opinions of others—please realize I do not seek to change anyone's minds. I am simply trying to outline the reasons why I think the things I do. If anyone can provide a counter-argument which can disprove that which follows I would be very appreciative if a reply or comment can be left as I would desperately like to believe something else about the world.

I genuinely believe that there are no women's issues. Women's studies courses should be abolished. There should not be a ministerial position for women's issues. There should not be women's advocates on campus. Laws relating to sexual violence need to be rewritten so that they are not framed in gender terminology.

The reason for this is two-fold. Put simply, any issue that can affect a person can affect another person. Men experience rape, domestic violence, discrimination at work, and sexual objectification. There is no issue that is only applicable to either men or women. Dividing the political landscape into gendered issues in this way simultaneously does two things: one, it refuses to acknowledge that men can and do experience the same things as women and two, it demeans these issues by relegating them to the status of "women issues" i.e. of less importance than "male issues" like economics and war. In short, my experiences have led me to believe that equal rights can only be achieved by granting equal responsibilities, not by giving any group of people a hand up or by setting targets for ensuring that X number of Y group will be represented in Z body.

Positive discrimination is an oxymoron. It would not be out-of-place in George Orwell's 1984. The idea that any group of people should have access to careers, or anything else for that matter, for which they are not qualified actively sabotages any attempt at achieving genuine equality. Ultimately, you do not end discrimination by simply discriminating against a different group of people.

I reached these and several other conclusions on the subject of gender based-ideology though my experiences as outlined below. Please do not think that I share this lightly, or that I am seeking sympathy or that I am trying to justify my own bitterness. I share this in order to illustrate the consequences of the gendered approach to gaining equality which have, in my opinion, been counterproductive at best.

At the age of 23 I was raped. I was approached by a man in a nightclub, who spiked my drink before he followed me into the toilet and violently raped me. The following day I reported the incident to the police. The specialist officers informed me that because I am male I could not be a victim of rape and that I am, by definition, a rapist. They stated that whilst they could not stop me from reporting the offense that they would prosecute me for wasting police time should I follow that course of action. The reason they gave me was that as a man, legally, I could not be raped because I am not in possession of a vagina.

At this time I was in a relationship with a woman who primarily identified herself through her sexuality. She felt that the most appropriate way for me to get over my new-found fears and feelings of disgust around sex was to have more sex with me. In fairness, most of the those encounters were consensual, in that whilst I may not have wanted sex at that time, I was prepared to trade it in exchange for intimacy. I was however, experiencing a whole bunch of psychological problems relating to the rape, specifically heightened anxiety, panic attacks, flashbacks, suicidal feelings, etc. This particular young lady was, on the last time I was intimate with her, very insistent that we have sex, despite my protestations. This was an occasion wherein I was experiencing flashbacks primarily triggered by her touching me without my consent. As she climbed on top of me I begged her to stop as all I could see in my mind's eye was the man who had raped me 3 weeks previously. Her response was to continue with renewed enthusiasm.

She noticed that I was crying and still pleading with her to stop so she hit me several times in the face and carried on until she reached that point of ultimate pleasure. Afterwards, she was very angry that I did not want to have sex with her and voiced this opinion with some gusto. Following this, in the immortal words of Iron Maiden, I ran to the hills and elected to remain celibate for over 5 years.

Eventually I healed and ended up in relationships with women again, some positive, some less so. At the age of 33, I dated a lady who worked for the police. Once again it appears that I am a terrible judge of character as she was quite selfish and had a tendency to overreact over nothing. Long story short, she wanted to have sex and I said no so she pushed me onto the bed, hiked her skirt up and did anyway. No longer being in such a bad place I picked her up off from me and said I wasn't interested at that time. Her response was to say "that is unacceptable to me" and she got on top of me again. Again I said no and picked her up off me, to which she replied that she didn't care and once again pushed me back onto the bed and started again. I picked her up again, and explained that if I was to act like that towards her I would be looking at a long prison sentence and rightly so. She replied "man up" and for a fourth time did the same thing. At this point I picked her up off of me for the last time and told her that she could not treat me or anyone else in that manner and I left.

This was only a few months ago and it has massively affected the way that I view women. I have become celibate once again and find it very difficult to trust anyone who shows any interest in me. While I feel that I am able to stop such a situation from ever occurring again it will always be by subjecting myself to the risk of violence, false accusations, or other repercussions. The easiest way for me to look after myself at this point is to not associate with anyone who wants to have sex with me.

Following the first incident I went to the police who informed me that no crime had occurred due to my gender. I stated that I wanted to make a statement regardless as I felt that there was a rapist targeting men (and women) in the community whom I could identify and would bear witness against. The police informed me that if I chose to do this that they would prosecute me for wasting police time.

I sought out support from rape crisis who informed me that I cannot be a victim of this crime, only a perpetrator. I was informed that I cannot visit any rape crisis center because my presence would be too upsetting for "genuine" (i.e. female) victims. At this time, I was studying for a degree in sociology and part of my course was on feminism. Over the course of the next 3 months I attended lectures and seminars wherein I was informed that all men (me included) use rape to keep all women in a state of continual fear. I was taught that all men are potential rapists simply waiting for their opportunity. I had to read treatises by Mary Koss and Andrea Dworkin; I had it stated to me that, as rape is a crime of power, any man who is subjected to this crime should be automatically incarcerated for life–the logic being that any man who has had his "power" removed by the act of forced sex will immediately seek to "regain" this loss of power by simply raping as many women as possible, therefore, in order to protect women we should imprison male victims before they have the opportunity to further victimize women.

I'm not convinced that there is a rape culture in the way that it is portrayed by feminists. But I do think that there is a hidden rape culture that operates against men. As it is not a serious crime for a man to be raped—it is classified as the less serious "sexual assault," but then only when a man is raped by a man. When a man is raped by a woman it is not a crime in most cases. We refuse to offer support to male victims, we blame men for being victims of rape, and we hold them accountable as a group and as individuals for the actions of a criminal minority, and feminists call for our incarceration not only without due process but without our having committed any crime ourselves.

We understand that we are worthless. We know that we are utilities; wallets and vibrators to be used by any woman who decides to at any time. We know that we can be physically assaulted by both men and women alike and that society, the police and the courts tolerate this. We know that any woman can raise a false allegation against us that legally has to be believed and treated seriously, whereas we cannot even report a crime without leaving ourselves at risk of prosecution.

We make rape jokes to trivialize our own experiences—humor exists in all places to ridicule trauma, to make light of the horrendous and to comfort the distressed. Feminists have taken this as proof that there is a rape culture at work against women, that we who make these jokes are part of a global patriarchal conspiracy to keep women down. The truth is that we laugh because we are tired of crying, and crying hasn't helped us.

We are criticized for trying to laugh off the fact that we are not protected by the law, that we have no access to help or support or victim services following that which feminists have decreed to be the worst crime against the person that a human being can be subjected to. We are blamed for the existence of a crime that we are the victims of. We are bombarded with posters and internet campaigns telling us to not be that guy. We are discriminated against in court by the gradual erosion of our right to due process. We are told that we're not real men because of our weakness—that weakness being to abhor violence and to be unwilling to put ourselves at further risk by defending ourselves for fear of very real legal and social reprisals.

I have learnt from my experiences. I have absorbed and digested information and I have come to my own conclusions. That is to say the following: rape is not important. It is the act of a minority of self-centered, monstrous individuals who have all the moral agency of a parasitic wasp. And we know that wasp stings are painful but not permanent. The only permanent issue is if you happen to be a wasp. Because that pain (i.e. self- loathing, worthlessness, moral weakness) is a part of you. The reason you feel the need sting others is because you are too emotionally stunted to possess a single iota of empathy, respect, compassion or any other value that separates humans from the baser life forms.

Rape is not important to me because by imbuing it with importance I allow it to continue to affect my life, and that is something that I cannot do. Rape is a gift. It is something that has been given to me by several individuals, all of whom forced sex on my unwilling person due to their own insecurities regarding their desirability, attractiveness and self-worth. And it is a gift of self-loathing. Sometime ago it occurred to me that rape is a shameful act. But it is not my shame. I have never forced myself on anyone, nor have I ever had the desire to do so.

I forgive my abusers. Those feelings which I have suffered for 10 years, are a gift from the few criminals who have successfully violated me. I forgo their gifts as these are not my issues to deal with—these issues are theirs. I forgo them and give them back. Let the parasites deal with their own behavior, it is not a reflection on me.

By the same token, I refuse and reject the society that tells me that rape of men is acceptable. I reject the opinions of the lunatics who have steered the discourse on rape exclusively towards a gendered view of the world rather than treat it for what it is—a criminal act. I reject the ideas of Dworkin and Firestone and Koss, all of whom have publicly stated that men who are raped somehow deserve it. I reject gendered interpretations of the law by the police, by the courts, by individual solicitors and professors at university.

I reject the notion that discrimination can ever be positive. But equally, I forgive you all. I reject your stupid double standards and I give you them back to you. I remove myself from your world entirely and live by my rules, under my direction, taking responsibility only for myself. I reject your ideas on relationships, parenthood, governance and employment rights. I refuse to engage with a society that blames me for the crimes committed against me. This is what forgiveness is. In short, I forgo your world and the consequences of your ideas, your attitudes, your crimes and I gladly return it all to you.

And I hope you choke on it.

Sex: The New War on Men

Gordon E. Finley Ph.D. · 17 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It cannot have escaped anyone's notice that on May Day (May 1, 2014), and within hours of one another, the nation and the media have been bombarded with more than a half dozen exquisitely choreographed and coordinated reports demanding action based on claims of skyrocketing sexual assaults occurring on campus and on the battlefield.

But are these claims plausible? I argue not.

Singly, or in combination, all of these claims suffer from one or more of the following five fatal flaws.

1. Sexual allegations made by females are not taken as allegations but rather as "settled fact." These claims do not even consider the possibility that women might lie about any manner of things sexual and there is no statistical correction for false sexual allegations.

2. Women commit sexual assaults on men but female sexual perpetrators only rarely are prosecuted and male reports of abuse by female sexual predators only rarely are believed.

3. In order to "cook" the rapidly rising numbers needed for political effect, the Obama Administration has demanded that all investigations lower the standard of proof required for conviction or expulsion from "clear and convincing" evidence to a "preponderance" of evidence, which basically is a coin toss.

4. In order to falsely boost the rapidly rising numbers needed for political effect, the Obama Administration has moved the goal posts by expanding the definition of "sexual assault" to activities and circumstances most citizens would not even remotely consider to be rape. The former definition of forcible rape has morphed into anything sexual without "consent" and with the determination of "consent" left entirely up to the woman, even to be determined on the morning after.

5. Forcible rape is ranked second only to murder as a serious crime. Yet, Obama and the Progressives want to remove the investigation and prosecution of sexual crimes from the venues of the police and the courts and rather transfer these responsibilities to unqualified but ideologically sympathetic administrative units in universities and the military where the conclusion is foregone. Under Obama and the Progressives, men are stripped of all due process and cross-examination rights that they normally would be guaranteed in a court of law. Truly innocent men have no way to prove their innocence.

Finally: Men — don't drink and have sex. A core principle of the Obama Administration's New World Order is this: If alcohol crosses anyone's lips, the male automatically is guilty of sexual assault and the female automatically is an innocent victim. With the consumption of any amount of alcohol, consensual sex does not exist.

The overwhelming onslaught of exquisitely choreographed and coordinated claims suggests that Obama and the Progressives are launching a War on Men to get the votes of women and advance their political base. This War clearly is designed to create not only "hostile work environments" but "dangerous work environments" for men on campus and in the military. This War further appears to be designed to eliminate men from the institutions to which they have striven and attained in the past and rapidly to make these coveted, prestigious and high paying positions open only to the political base of Obama and the Progressives.

Will Congress and the nation succumb to this loss of due process for men?

One hopes not. In my view, the words engraved above the entrance to the United States Supreme Court should prevail and apply equally to the sexual lives of both men and women: "Equal Justice Under Law."

Editorial note: this item first appeared on NCFM.org. –DE

The Bully In Blue: Constable Colin Leo Folk

Patrick John Doran (aka TheMadShangi) · 17 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, AVFM has published a piece concerning the story of Aaron Joseph Harms (The Meat Grinder Edmonton Style — The Joseph Harms Story) — a man seemingly being persecuted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) and the Edmonton Police Force over alleged sexual abuse committed against an Angel Roberts, a proven liar, having confessed to lying three times while under oath in court. Multiple false allegations against several people and no repercussions, except for her victims. It's all there in the court transcripts, but there's another layer of stink in this sordid little horror story far more sinister than the conniving behaviour of a psychopathic little princess. It's the officers involved. Mainly: Constable Colin Leo Folk.

Now there is an interesting sample Mr. Harms has provided, when his lawyer asks Constable Colin Leo Folk if he was ever the subject of any disciplinary action or ever been accused and or brought in front of the RCMP review board…

> MISS HAYES: Now, in you were the subject of some disciplinary proceedings with the police; that's correct? There was an investigation into your conduct?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I'm sorry, regarding?
>
> MISS HAYES: My recollection is that it may have had something to do with a tasering incident?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Yes, I believe in 2009.
>
> MISS HAYES: And so as a result of that was there any findings made by the disciplinary board?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I'm sorry. Just so that we're clear, can you shed more light on the incident?
>
> MISS HAYES: Pardon me?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Which incident was this that I was —
>
> MISS HAYES: I guess I should clarify. Has there been more than one incident where you've been involved in disciplinary proceedings?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I have been the subject of complaint on two different incidents, yes.
>
> MISS HAYES: Can you advise us as to what those two occasions are.
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: One of the incidents was an incident that happened at the multiplex in Athabasca where I deployed pepper spray on a crowd of people. That was one. It went to the review board and a use of force — an RCMP use of force, they investigated that and found that I was more than justified in that. And then I was — I'm sorry. I don't recall the tasering incident you speak of.
>
> MISS HAYES: Okay. Well, then what — when you said there's a second one, sorry. If it's not the tasering one, then what's the second one?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: There was one where I was involved in taking an individual down to the ground as a result of a police chase that ensued and he made a complaint that I used excessive force, and that also was clear to the board that it was acceptable force.
>
> MISS HAYES: Just give me one second. I might be able to give you some details that will refresh your memory.
>
> I will leave my questions at that, Officer. Thank you for your time today.
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Thank you.

The most interesting part of Leo Folk's testimony, for me, was dubious claims that Mr. Harms was blurting out that he was a child molester. It just didn't make sense, and he sounded like a complete idiot on the stand. Look closely as he makes out like Mr. Harms was confessing in the third person:

> MISS HAYES: Now, when he makes a comment, "he" being Mr. Harms, to Constable McDonald, I believe you said something to the effect of, Larry, why didn't you just say you would kick that child molester — or kick the child molester's ass, did it occur to you that he could be referring to someone else?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Hey may have, yeah.
>
> MISS HAYES: He may have been referring to someone else? Because certainly it would be odd to refer to yourself in third person?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Yes.
>
> MISS HAYES: And he didn't do that at any other point in the investigation?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I don't know how. . .
>
> MISS HAYES: I apologize. Normally in the admissions, I did this, I did that, not speaking about himself as if he's another person. That's fair; right?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Yes, yeah.
>
> MISS HAYES: So on this one incident you'd agree, as you have already, that it's possible he's speaking about someone else?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: He's labelling somebody in his statement a child molester, yes.
>
> MISS HAYES: And this is one of those ones that it's just difficult to tell because we don't have any context for it; right? Because you remember the statement, but you don't remember what was said around it?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Right.

The amount of bullshit emanating from this officer's statements is just putrid. He excluded/avoided writing down exculpatory statements and wrote down a response without recording the context of the conversation leading to that statement. Another officer present only recorded the exculpatory statement as being of interest so the context of the other statement was obviously innocuous to the charges.

The whole thing just stinks. First of all, we have Folk enter the home without announcing himself as the police. He claimed Angel was home alone yet all others present, including Angel testify that her mother was home. Folk then elaborates to say Samantha arrived while he was talking to Angel. This is obvious fabrication and therefore perjury.

> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I attended the residence. Went to the front door. Knocked on the door. The door — the inside door was open; the screen door was closed.
>
> MS. JOYCE: How long does it take you to get from wherever the call comes to get to this residence?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I was in town when the call came in. I think I was about four or five blocks away, so a matter of maybe less than five minutes.
>
> MS. JOYCE: Did anyone else from the RCMP attend with you to this residence?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Later on there was another member who attended, yes.
>
> MS. JOYCE: Describe the residence as you first approach it?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: It's a house. The front door, you go up a set of stairs. The main door to the house faced south. You go inside the house, there's an open area, a foyer area there, and then from there you go into the living room area of the house.
>
> MS. JOYCE: Did you have any information or any, I guess, suspicion of who you would find within that house?

> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Yeah, I believe the house to be — Angel Roberts resides there.
>
> MS. JOYCE: And what did you know about her involvement in this investigation when you first attended?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Regarding this investigation?
>
> MS. JOYCE: Yes.
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Nothing.
>
> MS. JOYCE: Continue on with what happens when you arrive at the door?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I got to the door. I knocked on the door. There was no answer on the door. I could hear a female inside crying. I walked into the residence, saw her, Angel Roberts, crying hysterically on the couch. Went in to talk to her to find out what was going on.
>
> MS. JOYCE: Was there anyone else with her at the time?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: No, it was just her.

In Angel and her mother's original statement — and his field book — they all say that she wasn't alone. She was with her mother.

> MS. JOYCE: And did you know her or recognize her when you saw her at this point?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I did, yeah. I know who she is.
>
> MS. JOYCE: What happens from there?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I went and talked to her. At first she wasn't too forthcoming with any information. She was pretty upset and crying. I talked to her for probably a minute to two minutes, and then she advised me that her stepdad, Mr. Harms, had — had molested her.
>
> MS. JOYCE: Did — what words did she use?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I have to check with my notebook.
>
> MS. JOYCE: Do you have that notebook with you today?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I do, yes.
>
> MS. JOYCE: And are there — have there been any additions or deletions to those notes since you made them?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: No.
>
> MS. JOYCE: They're in your own handwriting?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Yes.
>
> MS. JOYCE: And did you make them at or near the time of this investigation?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I did, yes.
>
> THE COURT: I'm going to ask if you can allow — be allowed to refer to —
>
> MS. HAYES: No objection, sir.
>
> THE COURT: Thank you. Please do, yes.
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Angel stated that her dad had got mad, grabbed her by the face, threw her on the bed, and put his hands down her pants.
>
> MS. JOYCE: What happens after you get that information?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: As I'm talking to Angel about this, her mother, Samantha Roberts, came home and walked through the door. Samantha asked what was going on. Angel was still very hysterical and crying, so I explained to Samantha what Angel had told me happened, and then asked Samantha and Angel where Mr. Harms was. And again, it was really hard to get any information other than what I said that Angel had told me > she was very hysterical, crying, very upset. Samantha went downstairs and came up and told me that Mr. Harms was downstairs in the basement.

>
> MS. JOYCE: What did you do after getting that information?
>
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I went downstairs to talk to Mr. Harms.
>
> MS. JOYCE: So if you can describe the setup of how, in this residence, you get downstairs to the basement?
>
