> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: There's the living room area, and then you go through the living room area into the kitchen area. At the back of the kitchen area there's — to your right there's a set of three or four stairs that go down and then it turns into the basement and goes down, I'm guessing another ten steps to the basement.

> THE COURT: I'm sorry. I didn't understand —
> MS. HAYES: Sorry, officer, I don't mean to interrupt here. I just wanted to interrupt because I note that the officer is reading from his notes, and I'm quite content to have him rely on his notes to refresh his memory. I'd just like it to be clear on the record when he's in fact speaking from memory and when he's relying on his notes to refresh his memory.

Such clarity turned into relying on notes. In fact, in Folk's notes, none of this is mentioned about the layout of Mr. Harms' home, the number of stairs, 45 degree turns… so if this is not in his notes or reports, could this be Mr. Folk's selective memory at work?

> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I looked around the corner and saw Mr. Harms sitting on a couch slouched forward. I observed a can of beer in his left hand and a black handgun in his right hand.MS. JOYCE: What did you do after you saw that?
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I instructed Mr. Harms to drop the firearm. I'm just referring to my notes.
> MS. JOYCE: Yes.
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I instructed Mr. Harms to drop the firearm. He replied to me, don't come down here. I stated again to Mr. Harms to drop the gun and he replied that it was a BB gun and placed it at his feet. I asked him to throw it further away from him, and he picked it up or actually — I'm sorry. I asked him to kick it away from him. He picked it up again and threw it into the corner of the basement.

> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: As soon as I observed Mr. Harms had a firearm in his hand.
> MS. JOYCE: And, sorry, that — I might have been unclear in my question. I was talking about before you get to that point where you can see Mr. Harms, where you're just coming down the first couple of steps, had you done anything at that point with your — anything on your utility belt?

> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I had not, no.
> MS. JOYCE: When you draw your side arm, how did you hold it?
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I held it in my right hand.
> MS. JOYCE: And where would you have been pointing it or aiming it?
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: The entire time I had it pointed at the ground. The location of where I was, it was a very thick, solid concrete wall that I was looking around. I wasn't in a really good position to — at that time to be pointing my side arm at Mr. Harms. I felt from where I was that I was in a safe position to instruct him to drop the firearm.
> MS. JOYCE: How was he holding the firearm when he first — sorry. And I'll say Mr. Harms. How was Mr. Harms holding the firearm when you first saw him?
> CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: When I first came around the corner, Mr. Harms had it in his right hand and he had it just draped over his leg in front of him.< MS. JOYCE: Okay. Did that change at any point? CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Yes. When I asked him to drop it, he began waving it around and then he said, don't come down here. MS. HAYES: Sorry. I missed the last part of your answer. CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: He was waving the gun around and said, don't come down here. MS. JOYCE: What kind of, I guess, tone of voice or behaviour was Mr. Harms showing when he says, don't come down here? CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: I could tell Mr. Harms was extremely agitated and upset. MS. JOYCE: What happens after Mr. Harms throws the gun -- or sorry. You called it a firearm and I'll call it a firearm, and I think the Court will hear eventually that it is a BB gun, but what happens after Mr. Harms throws the firearm? CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Well, Mr. Harms actually stated to me that it was a BB gun at that time when he threw it. So I holstered my side arm and came down the rest of the way down the stairs and positioned myself between Mr. Harms and the -- and the firearm. MS. JOYCE: So then about how far away from you are Mr. Harms -- yes. How far away are you from each other? CONSTABLE LEO FOLK: Originally Mr. Harms was sitting on the couch and I positioned myself on the couch as well to the right of Mr. Harms about 2 and a half, 3 feet.

So he has grounds to charge, but doesn't. Instead he holsters his weapon and sits down beside an alleged rapist without securing the weapon? This is an officer with 6.5 years of experience and he lets his guard down because a drunk suspect assured him it was just a BB gun. That seems pretty illogical to me. The rest of Mr. Folk's testimony was laughable with Mr. Folk going back and forth between his selective memory and his notes. The BB gun wasn't even entered into evidence. Mr. Folk would then go on to claim that he was sitting there between Mr. Folk and the firearm in a state of fear. So what, he's just sitting there staring at it as if it were a cobra? He had every opportunity to secure it, but chose not to. Instead, engage in what he called "small talk" with the suspect.

There's so much more, but I'm going to skip right to the Judge's final comments about Folk's credibility:

> Ruling (Voir Dire)
> THE COURT: Goodmorning. Please be seated.
> I apologize for keeping you waiting, and I apologize in advance for what are likely overly long reasons. As they say, if I had more time, I would make it shorter.
> So here are my reasons on the voir dire, which, of course, was held at the outset of this five-day jury trial and calls on me to decide if certain statements are admissible, either on the basis of voluntariness or alternatively on the basis they do or don't comply with the Charter right to counsel, or alternatively to that, if they don't, whether they should nevertheless be admitted under Section 24(2) of the Charter. On the evidence that I heard yesterday, I find the following facts.
> Of course the events regarding these statements occurred on May 21, 2011, in the town of Athabasca. Constable Folk responded to what I gather was the Harms'/Roberts' residence in Athabasca after he became aware of a 911 call relayed to him via the telecom service, that call being from a hysterical female person stating she had been molested and thereafter the phone being hung up. That call came in around 1724. I'm going to refer to the 24-hour clock as I go through my reasons.

Constable Folk responded accordingly. He was already on the road, and he managed to get to the, what I'll call the Harms' residence, about five minutes after the call came to his attention. He initially dealt with Angel Roberts. He had had previous dealings with Angel as well as with Mr. Harms. Though she was still hysterical, within a couple of minutes Constable Folk was able to glean from her that she alleged her stepfather, Mr. Harms, had threw her down on a bed and molested her by putting his hands down her pants.

Constable Folk testified, and I accepted, he made some effort to try to understand more fully what she alleged, but didn't get very far. He, therefore — I'm sorry. Before he had any contact with Mr. Harms, Samantha Roberts came into the residence. All that she added to the voir dire evidence is that she located Mr. Harms in the basement, told Constable Folk that's where he was, and that led then Constable Folk to having an encounter with him.

Constable Folk decided he — or concluded he needed to go downstairs to talk to Mr. Harms. As he descended into the basement, he noted Mr. Harms sitting on a couch with a handgun in his right hand, or what he believed to be a handgun. Constable Folk ordered Harms to drop the gun. He testified, and I accept, that rather than do so, Harms began waving the gun around, stating, Don't come down here, or words to that effect. He described Harms as being extremely agitated and upset. In answer to Harms' response of, Don't come down here, Constable Folk repeated his demand that the weapon be put down, or words to that effect. This time Harms did comply and noted that — said, again, words to the effect that, in fact, the gun was a BB gun. I accept on the evidence — I haven't seen this gun, but I certainly accept Constable Folk's evidence that the gun looked real, that he had an apprehension that it was real. There was no way that he would know during any of his dealings in the basement with Mr. Harms that, in fact, it wasn't a real gun, that it was only a BB gun, or perhaps even some other kind of replica gun.

In any event, Harms did put the gun down at his feet, and then later, momentarily later, on a, I gather, further demand from Constable Folk, he threw it or kicked it further away.

In any event, it was described as being several feet — ten, 15 feet or so — away from where Harms remained sitting. Folk then approached Harms.As I mentioned in argument, or during argument yesterday, I found that while Constable Folk appeared to hesitate in examination-in-chief to say what he knew — or what he knew at least subjectively when he went into the basement after speaking with Angel, I find that in cross-examination he admitted that at least at that point in time as he's entering the basement and particularly when he sees what he believed to be a gun in Mr. Harms' possession, at least at that point in time he knew that he had reasonable and probable grounds to arrest Mr. Harms at least for a gun offence, if not for a sexual assault on the basis of what he had taken from Angel in his brief dealings with her upstairs.

I also agree with the Crown's position that nothing turns on Constable Folk's drawing of his side arm as there was no evidence Mr. Harms even saw it nor is there any evidence in the voir dire really that Constable Folk or any of the other investigating officers did anything to threaten Mr. Harms or make any promises or inducements or anything of that nature that goes to that aspect of the issue of voluntariness, and in argument very little moment — there was very little on the, what I'll call the usual aspect of voluntariness objected to by the defence.

Notwithstanding he had grounds for an arrest for something, Constable Folk decided not to arrest Harms at the moment he entered the basement, or even at the moment the gun had been kicked off into the corner or somewhere else in the room. And Harms — rather, Constable Folk is standing, either he's sitting down on the couch with Mr. Harms or he's standing a few feet away from Mr. Harms — his evidence was a little bit, I found, confusing in that regard. He gave two different, if I can put it this way, stories at different points in his evidence about whether he had further dealings with Mr. Harms while sitting on the couch next to him or standing next to him or close to him.In any event, whether he's standing or sitting, at least by then Constable Folk, it was clear in his own evidence, he had grounds to arrest — certainly he had detained Mr. Harms. He had grounds to arrest him at least for a gun offence, if not a sexual offence. He did not, of course, provide him with any Charter warnings or the right to silence, right against self-incrimination warnings at that time. He gave as his excuse or reason officer safety.

He indicated in his evidence that he did — he wished not to inflame an already volatile situation. He was in a basement with only one exit. He was alone. He was apprehensive about the existence of a gun. Even though it was off out of reach, I take it that he was concerned that it was still in — and I don't intend this to be a pun — it was still in harm's way. And I give Constable Folk every benefit of the doubt on those points.

He also described Mr. Harms as being intoxicated, although not to the extent Mr. Harms, in Constable Folk's estimation, didn't know what was going on. And I find on all of the evidence, for what it's worth, while there was some evidence going to the consumption of alcohol, little evidence, little acceptable, credible evidence going to the extent of how that consumption resulted in actual impairment or intoxication. The evidence, particularly from Constable Folk, at that point in time was of red, glassy eyes, slurred speech, and the presence of a beer can, little else. The only other evidence was that of Constable McDonald, as I recall, where he walked into the room and smelled alcohol on Mr. Harms' breath. That evidence didn't come from Constable Folk. In any event, there was obviously evidence of consumption, not much detailed evidence to go to whether, in fact, Mr. Harms was intoxicated. Lots of evidence, though, that Mr. Harms was, as Constable Folk put it, up and down in terms of his behaviour, demeanour, and that was something he took into account as well in terms of the volatility — what he understood to be the volatility of the situation.

Having decided not to make an arrest at that point in time, there is no doubt on the evidence, that Constable Folk had decided to detain Mr. Harms pending the arrival of backup in the form of Constable Dozois for assistance. In these circumstances then, Constable Folk decided — at some point, I'm not absolutely sure, he decided to reholster his weapon. I'm inferring from all of these circumstances that took place after he was convinced — or unless I've missed this aspect of the evidence — after he became convinced that the gun had, in fact — the handgun that Mr. Harms had been in possession of had been kicked off or thrown off somewhere else into the room, at some point Constable Folk then reholstered his weapon. And he said he did so because he felt that would actually assist him in being able to deal with any unforeseen circumstance. He didn't want to be tied up with a gun in one hand if he needed to do something to deal with the situation that Mr. Harms presented.

In any event, having reholstered his weapon, having either moved into the room to stand next to Mr. Harms or, indeed, perhaps having sat down next to him on the couch, and having made a conscious decision not to inform him that he was under arrest, or for that matter that he was detained, and for sure not having informed him of any of his constitutional rights or rights against self-incrimination, fatally Constable Folk then decided to question the accused. There is no officer safety basis for his action in deciding to question the accused.

In cross-examination defence counsel elicited from Constable Folk the common sense — or asked him the common sense question: If you were trying to diffuse an otherwise volatile situation, why would you then start asking an accused about the thing which presumably had created the volatile situation in the first place, in other words, why would you start questioning him about the alleged sexual offence. I appreciate the question that he asked was a very general one, what's going on or words to that effect, but I conclude that the question was meant to elicit information, potentially at least incriminating, going to the investigation which Constable Folk had initiated upstairs before he entered the basement. It was clearly an inappropriate police response without any justification. The proper police response would have been to continue in good faith to attempt to maintain or diffuse a potentially volatile situation pending backup from Constable Dozois, but to then go on and begin questioning, even in a brief general matter, in the circumstances here is conduct which, as will become more apparent, I find to be objectionable.

Of course, the evidence is that immediately upon being asked the question, What's going on, Harms responded by stating words to the effect that he stripped her naked, referring presumably to Angel, to teach her a lesson because she's a whore. That statement, of course, it's conceded in argument, was in breach of Harms' Section 10(b) Charter rights.

The voluntariness of the statement is not much in issue, but that doesn't matter in my view because as a matter of concession the statement is clearly inadmissible.

While I found on Constable Folk's own evidence that even before the statement he believed he likely had grounds to make an arrest, either for sexual assault, but clearly for the gun offence, he had those grounds at least subjectively in his mind when he elicited — when he asked the question and elicited the statement.

I'm just editing on the go here, Counsel. I don't want to be unnecessarily repetitive.

I'm referring to — or I was struck, frankly, by Constable Dozois evidence that when he entered the basement at around some point before 1825 — Constable Dozois talked — used the timing of 1825 as when he, I believe, seized the gun in the basement. That's what I took from his evidence. He was, therefore, in the basement at some moments before that, entered the basement, saw the two individuals sitting on the couch, concluded they were, in fact, talking about the investigation. I'm not sure I can give a whole lot of credence to that because even on Constable Folk's evidence they were talking about some prior difficulties in the relationship Mr. Harms had with Angel. That wasn't given with any — in any detail in the voir dire, so I can understand why Constable Dozois might have misunderstood just exactly what was going on at that moment. But what struck me was his evidence, Dozois' evidence, that he then heard Mr. Harms make an admission with regard to the more immediate or the more — that day's alleged offence, and it was then Constable Dozois who immediately intervened to arrest Mr. Harms. That is not really even close to what Constable Folk testified to. Folk, of course, testified that it was only in answer to his general question that elicited the remark about stripping her naked, and after that there was nothing else said that — in the conversation between he and Mr. Harms that went to the day's events, rather, they were speaking about prior — a prior context. And, of course, it was Constable Folk's evidence that while Constable Dozois was present when Constable Folk arrested Mr. Harms that he was only there to assist.

Constable Folk was clear that he arrested — he being Folk — arrested Harms, handcuffed him, and took him upstairs.

I am unable to reconcile the evidence. I found, frankly, Corporal Dozois to be a generally credible officer. I found Constable Folk to have some difficult — I had difficulties with his credibility, at least in this case.

Constable Folk, again to expand on the evidence that he gave in combination with the evidence of Constable Dozois — Corporal Dozois, Folk testified that he Chartered and cautioned Mr. Harms outside of the residence, either near the vehicle, his police vehicle, or in it, not later than 1824. There is mention of 1818 and a caution — a Charter and caution. It wasn't absolutely clear to me when those two warnings were given, but I conclude on the evidence that they had been given to Mr. Harms not later than 1824.

Constable Folk said nothing about Corporal Dozois coming outside and instructing him to Charter and caution Mr. Harms. I find on the evidence that at every turn Mr. Harms indicated he did wish to speak to a lawyer. I appreciate that when finally given the chance to use a phone in a phone room at the detachment, he was perhaps less than diligent in exercising the right. The evidence wasn't fully explored in that regard because it wasn't particularly relevant. That wasn't the basis of the alleged Charter breach.

I find that on the evidence that Mr. Harms did refuse to waive his right when he was asked if that was his preference, and even much later he refused — in the context of refusing to provide a warned statement, he again asserted that he wished to speak with a lawyer.

Going back to what occurred at the scene, Constable Folk handcuffed Harms and escorted him to the vehicle where, as I say, Charter rights and a caution was read. I do not accept the implication in Constable Folk's initial evidence-in-chief that at or near this early point in time he was following Corporal Dozois instruction to keep Harms handcuffed owing to the need to preserve DNA evidence, nor do I accept that immediately after arriving at the detachment, Constable Folk knew or was informed he needed then to keep the handcuffs on, again, to preserve DNA evidence. I find on all of the evidence that Folk only learned of the need to preserve this DNA evidence when he was instructed to do so by Corporal Dozois at around 1907.

It's worth noting that Corporal Dozois initially testified that he told Constable Folk at the scene he needed to preserve DNA evidence, but when he was pressed on that point in cross-examination, Dozois agreed he could not recall just when he provided these instructions, and that in due course he agreed that those instructions may well have been provided by phone or by radio.

The best evidence that I have then is, perhaps ironically, from Constable Folk who, I take it, was referring to a time noted in his notebook when he agreed in cross-examination that he received instructions at 1907 to keep the handcuffs on on account of the need to preserve DNA evidence.

There was a lot of confusing evidence given by Constable Folk about when he left the scene and when he arrived at the detachment. His initial evidence, or early — earliest evidence in the voir dire had him leaving the scene at around 1830 or 1835. He had around five or ten minutes earlier completed his Chartering and cautioning of Mr. Harms. He initially testified he hung around the scene for five or ten minutes, apparently to have some further dealings with Corporal Dozois and apparently to make some notes in his notebook. He said it would have taken him about five minutes to travel from the Harms residence to the RCMP detachment where he would have arrived at around 1835 to 1840.

I appreciate that later in his evidence he attempted to change his evidence arriving at the detachment closer to 1850 or 10 to 7, reasoning that he had stayed at the scene for a longer period of time. I don't consider Constable Folk's later evidence on these times to be particularly credible. I'm not sure it matters, though, because whether he delayed at the scene or whether he delayed at the detachment up until 1907 when he received the instructions from Corporal Dozois or whether he delayed a bit at both ends of the spectrum that I have just laid out, the bottom line is that for no valid reason or explanation that's before me in the voir dire, there was a period of delay of around 35 to 40 minutes after Mr. Harms had unequivocally asserted he wished to speak with a lawyer, which, as I say, had occurred by 1824 hours at the latest.

I have taken into account Constable Folk's evidence that he decided to wait outside the residence because Corporal Dozois was inside still dealing with the complainant and her mother. That evidence, even taken together with the evidence of Corporal Dozois, makes no sense to me. There is no suggestion that Folk was being brought in to assist Dozois in his dealings with the complainant and her mother. No suggestion that at the scene anyone needed to wait at the scene to secure it. Constable Parker was already on his way for that purpose, having been called in apparently by Corporal Dozois. Constable Folk was clearly the lead investigating officer here, and although he took direction from Corporal Dozois with regard to the — eventually with regard to the need to preserve the DNA evidence, I don't accept, frankly, that Corporal Dozois needed to come out onto the curbside to instruct Constable Folk to administer the Charter and cautioning. Folk was unequivocal in his initial evidence that he did that outside in or near the vehicle, and that makes sense to me, that's what one would expect in an investigation, rather than waiting to be instructed to give those very basic information rights to an accused who was clearly under arrest, handcuffed, and obviously in police custody.

In spite of the conflicting evidence, which as I say I find hard to reconcile, the bottom line here for me is that Constable Folk was obliged immediately to take steps to facilitate Mr. Harms' request to speak to the lawyer. There was no officer safety reason for staying at the scene. Staying at the scene, whether he did or didn't, I find doesn't matter to me. I suspect he didn't, but there is this irreconcilable evidence. Staying at the scene to make notes in the circumstances of this case, in my view, would not be a valid reason to delay the exercise of Mr. Harms' rights. There was nothing else in the evidence — nothing in the evidence that Corporal Dozois was aware that Mr. Harms had asserted his right to counsel, his right to speak with a lawyer. I should have thought that had Corporal Dozois been aware of that, he would have — as a professional, he would have been concerned for Mr. Harms' immediately-arising rights to be put in a phone room with all of the usual safeguards around the exercise of the right to counsel. In any event, didn't have any evidence from him that he was aware that Mr. Harms had asserted that right from the get-go.

So in terms of delay, I understand that Constable Folk was obliged to leave the scene — whether he did or didn't, he was obliged to leave the scene as soon as he could have, in other words, immediately upon Mr. Harms' assertion of right around 1824. The evidence is clear that it should have taken him no more than five minutes to reach the detachment. Irely also on Constable Parker's evidence that that's how long it took him to get to the Harms' residence when he left the detachment to attend there to take photos and secure exhibits. It's reasonable to have expected that by 1830, therefore, Harms would have been given his opportunity to call a lawyer. The imperative of keeping him handcuffed, at least in Constable Folk's mind, did not arise on the evidence until, as I've said, 1907, almost 40 minutes after Mr. Harms had asserted his interest in speaking with the lawyer.

Moving on. According to Constable Folk's evidence — and I have noted already that he was very much aided in his evidence in the voir dire by referring to his notebook. He seemed to have a difficulty remembering a lot of what occurred here simply by memory and referred back to his notebook on many occasions, and that's fine, but it's something that has to be noted. He was, of course, the lead investigator. He, therefore, should have been expected — I would have expected him to be of all of the members involved in this investigation, Constable Folk's notebook would have been the most comprehensive, the most thorough. His notebook, then next — I shouldn't say next. I haven't seen the notes. I am informed by the evidence that at 1905 he did make a note of a statement that Mr. Harms made, and it's verbatim. "I don't give a fuck. I'll plead guilty to this. I don't know what else to do. Yeah, I ripped off her pants to teach her a lesson."

Notwithstanding his role as lead investigator, inexplicably, I find Constable Folk was unable to give any evidence about the context of the statement, although he agreed there had been some what he called innocuous conversation with Harms before and after the statement was blurted out. And when I refer to conversation, it could be clearer in the evidence, but there is at least the suggestion that Constable McDonald was around. I'm not sure that Constable Parker was around at all this time because he was out gathering evidence and taking photographs and buying nail clippers. He eventually did respond.

But at this period of at 1905, it appears that McDonald was probably around. There — and I'm — I find on the evidence that even though there was no evidence of the context, there had been some discussion between Harms, Folk, and/or McDonald. I also note that at 19 — this is a comment made at 1905, which is two minutes before Constable Folk says he was advised in some manner by Corporal Dozois that the handcuffs had to stay on.

In his own evidence Constable Folk didn't identify any particular problem with Harms around the time Constable McDonald first became involved. Constable Folk talked about Mr. Harms being up and down throughout his dealings with him. Constable McDonald, and later on Constable Parker, in the context of taking fingerprints — fingernails said Mr. Harms wasn't acting in any particularly remarkable fashion. They did say that when they came on shift around seven, they noted some fracas or some dealings, some noise, some argument in a cell area. The suggestion that that was occurring while Mr. Harms was being booked in is something that I was unable to find in the evidence.

In any event, going forward from the 1905 statement or blurting out, some five minutes later at 1910 Constable Folk made a further note in his notebook that Mr. Harms stated, "Larry," and I quote verbatim from the evidence yesterday, "Larry, you should have said I'll kick the child molester's ass," closed quote, to which Larry, who was apparently Constable McDonald, replied, "I don't do that," closed quote. Again, aside from recording what Larry replied, there was no other context given from Constable Folk's notes or for that matter from his memory except that there was likely some conversation before and after the blurting out in question, and that it was of an innocuous nature.

There was at least one further specific note in Constable Folk's notebook that's of some relevance here. It's that at some point Mr. Harms said words to the effect he was at his wit's end, on medication, and not thinking properly. Constable Folk at first testified this occurred around the time he was removing Mr. Harms' handcuffs. He then changed that evidence and said that those comments were made around the time or during the ten or so minute period that Mr. Harms' fingernails were being collected. Just relying on Constable Folk's evidence for a moment, it couldn't — it's not at all clear, if that's all the evidence I have, just when the fingernails were being taken. It's doubtful it was as early at 1910, if only because Constable Parker had yet had an opportunity to stop and pick up clippers. He had only left the detachment shortly after coming on shift at 1900. He went to the scene of the alleged offence, took pictures, gathered exhibits, then went shopping for clippers, and then finally returned to the detachment.

Constable McDonald helped clear up timing issues, though, putting the collection of the fingernails at between 1935 and 1948, a period of about, well, 13 minutes, close enough to the ten-minute estimates that the other witnesses gave. This evidence, taken together with what I have found was the likely time of arrival at the detachment at about 1830, leads to the conclusion Mr. Harms was at the detachment, handcuffed, for it appears was an hour and a quarter before finally being afforded his right to counsel. Part of that period of time is the fingernail collection process, and I appreciate that in this voir dire no particular objection was taken by the defence that that process wasn't appropriate or somehow it violated Mr. Harms' rights. Take away the fingernail collection period, and again, and at the risk of being unnecessarily repetitive, I'm dealing with a situation that either there was an arrival at the detachment at 1830 or a delay at the scene of the investigation right up until 1907 when a reason then came into existence for Mr. Harms to remain handcuffed, and once that reason came into existence, it became reasonable for him not to have access to a telephone because to do so might well jeopardize the collection of relevant evidence on the investigation.

There is some evidence that Mr. Harms was experiencing significant discomfort, if not excruciating pain, while handcuffed with his hands behind his back, some evidence that he had a back condition that was known to the police, and that he was on medication. I'll come back to that presently. The evidence is clear that he was provided access to a telephone only by the time of 1950 hours or 10 to 8. Constable Folk testified that he told Mr. Harms he could use the telephone only after DNA evidence was collected. That may well have happened, that may well have been said, but I have no reliable evidence as to when it was said, and I would not conclude that it was said at any point earlier than 1907.

As was pointed out in argument by defence counsel, it is hard, I find, not to fault Constable Folk, or at least to question his credibility as to what was said and wasn't said around the impugned statements at 1905 and 1910, when, in the circumstances, Constable Folk not only failed to record the context of these statements, but he also failed to record at least one statement Mr. Harms made which was exculpatory. Constable McDonald, who I found was a straightforward witness and of course only really peripherally involved in this investigation, he was good enough to record in his notes that an exculpatory statement was made, although he had some difficulty remembering that in examination-in-chief and only did remember it when he was taken to his notes during cross-examination.

At the end of the day, on the evidence it's hard not to conclude that nearly from the get-go in this investigation Constable Folk could have cared less about Mr. Harms' right to counsel or his right to silence. That was obvious as early as the encounter in the basement, the unconstitutionality of which is conceded by the Crown, although not for Section 24(2) purposes. That what I find to be Constable Folk's cavalier attitude with regard to Mr. Harms' rights continued at the detachment by virtue of the unexplained delays in facilitating the right to counsel and by taking selective notes of statements the Crown now wants to adduce in evidence against the accused.

Turning to the legal issues and to deal first with the aspect of voluntariness, as noted in argument, there is no serious challenge to the voluntariness of the two statements that remain in issue, taking away, of course, the statement that was made in the basement.

I am persuaded in this case by Ms. Hayes' reliance on the case of R. v. Hunter which, of course, follows R. v. Ferris. In argument Ms. Joyce doesn't take issue with the state of the law set out in those cases, and I had little argument that that law doesn't or shouldn't apply quite closely to the facts of this case and to the 1905 and 1910 statements respectively. I don't intend to quote chapter and verse from Hunter, but what I find is important is to observe that on the facts of this case we're dealing with utterances. We're also dealing with a situation where there is some evidence of a context around those utterances but no detailed or concrete evidence of what that context in fact was. That is very much similar to what's observed at paragraph 6 in Hunter where the witness DiCecco overheard a gun remark, but said, I quote from paragraph 6 in the Hunter case, quote, "There might have been conversation between the accused and his lawyer both before and after the utterance, which he was unable to detail in his evidence." The Court in Hunter then discussed in some quite detail Madam Justice Conrad's reasons in the Alberta Court of Appeal version of Ferris and her approach of posing examples of possible surrounding context which would make the utterances arguably innocuous and thus not probative but still significantly prejudicial. And without trying very hard, I can easily use such examples on the statements here.

The 1905 statement, again, "I don't give a fuck. I'll plead guilty to this." Well, at question, what is he saying he'll plead guilty to? He may well, for example, have been talking about the firearms offence. Although at least on the indictment before the Court, there is no such offence being pursued.

I also note that an intention to plead guilty is something that is not an admission of fact so much as arguably only consciousness of guilt, which would be right up there with a statement such as I'm sorry, but — and it's very often the case that accused individuals say, I'm sorry, forgive me, but for what. It's entirely speculative and is not, in my view, probative of anything.

He then said, "I don't know what else to do. Yeah, I ripped off her pants to teach her a lesson." I'm not persuaded in the absence of context that that comment, particularly the last phrase, isn't or couldn't be read as being a sarcastic remark. For example, yeah, right, I ripped off her pants to teach her a lesson. I don't know. I should note that the utterance made at 1905 cannot be informed by the earlier inadmissible statement made in the basement. They are, of course, similar, but in terms of allowing the jury to have the 1905 statement, obviously they would not have the inadmissible — subject to 24(2), they would not have the inadmissible basement statement to help put the 1905 statement into some context.I also find that the comment "I don't know what else to do" does help inform the entire utterance and leaves me concluding that it's impossible in the absence of context to give any meaning to the entire statement made at 1905 hours.With respect to the 1910 hour statement, "Larry, you should have said I'll kick the child molester's ass," I find without gilding the lily that there is very little, if anything, that jumps out as being meaningful about that statement. Little, if anything, that is probative of anything in the case against the accused, as I understand it, coming out of the voir dire, and that in spades that statement does not meet the test set out in the Hunter and Ferris cases.

With regard then to these two statements, to paraphrase from paragraphs 19 to 21 in Hunter, I find their meaning is speculative and the probative value of them is therefore tenuous yet the prejudicial effect is still substantial. They should, therefore, be excluded on the basis it would be impossible for a jury properly instructed to conclude that these overheard utterances or either of them was an admission.

Turning to the Charter breaches, the first breach, of course, is admitted. I'll come back to Section 24(2). I have been very tempted to find the second breach on account of the unexplained delay of almost 40 minutes that I've spent considerable time dealing with in my reasons so far in enabling Mr. Harms the right to contact a lawyer. I have some concern that I have been unable to — I have not been provided with any authorities that tell me that 40 minutes, even in the context of a constitutional right to be immediately provided with the ability to contact a lawyer even in the face of the — what's clear is that the right without delay means immediate, that as much is apparent as recently from the Suberu decision, which of course is the companion to Grant, but in the absence of authority in a situation like this, not an impaired driving investigation, but a situation where an individual is being investigated for sexual assault and other offences, I have some hesitation to conclude that even a delay of up to around 37 to 40 minutes in the circumstances is a clear violation of Section 10(b) breach. I'm very tempted to find that is the case, but in the circumstances I'm going to stop short of making that finding if only because — and I have spent some time attempting to put my finger on authorities that assist me in that regard, but I simply haven't been able to find any. I have not been provided with any. That wasn't the basis for the Charter notice filed by the defence. In all those circumstances, while I continue to have significant difficulties with the unexplained delay, it is not — it doesn't get me, doesn't quite get me, to the point where I would conclude that there was a clear Section 10(b) breach. As will become apparent momentarily, I do take into account Constable Folk's behaviour in connection with that delay when I assess the admissibility of the basement statement under Section 24(2) of the Charter.

Turning then to the Section 10(b) basis that was pleaded, so to speak, in the Charter notice, my conclusion is that there is no Section 10(b) breach based on the cases such as Caputo, Plaha, Wittwer, Morin and the like. These are all cases in which there was ample evidence police conscripted statements from the various accuseds after taking otherwise inadmissible statements. None of them take out — take away the Harper case, which is extremely unusual and not a case such as what we're dealing with here, in my view.

Take that case away, and there — when I went back to read all the cases that were provided to me, none of them dealt with a situation such as we have here where we have utterances which on the evidence were not clearly conscripted from Mr. Harms. I have commented on my dissatisfaction with the state of the evidence coming from Constable Folk in particular around the context of the statements that were made, the utterances that were made — I wouldn't call them statements. I would simply refer to them as utterances.

My reasons on this aspect of the Charter application aren't meant to detract from my earlier findings and the application of the Hunter line of cases on voluntariness and reliability and prejudicial probative considerations, but I am unable to make the jump to conclude by some kind of inference that, in fact, the utterances at 1905 and 1910 were somehow conscripted by the authorities in a manner that violated Mr. Harms' Section 10(b) rights. That may have been the case. In the absence of admissions from the police witnesses in the voir dire, the only other person who could have given evidence in that regard was Mr. Harms himself, and of course he's not obliged to provide that evidence.

But on the other hand, it is his Charter application to establish a breach under Section 10(b), and in all of the circumstances here I can't get to the point where I find, based on the Caputo and other lines of cases — line of cases — that there is a breach.

And so while I have excluded the 1905 and 1910 statements based on the Hunter line of cases, I would not exclude them based on a Section 10(b) infringement.

Finally, then, I need to deal with whether I would exclude the basement statement, which is conceded to be unconstitutional but — well, no, that's not quite right. It's conceded to be in breach, but is not unconstitutional in the sense that it should still be admitted under Section 24(2) of the Charter.

I'm not going to spend a lot of time articulating the Grant test. We all know what it is.

If this was a written decision to be published, I would be much more categorical, but in the interests of time, I will simply note that I — if I haven't already done so in my reasons, I will affirm or confirm that I find the basement breach was serious, not minor, not inadvertent in any sense of the words. I find that Constable Folk knew or ought to have known — and I'm dealing now with the first part of the Grant test, which is the seriousness of the state conduct in question — I find Constable Folk knew or ought to have known he had no right to be asking Mr. Harms a single thing from the moment he formed reasonable and probable grounds, and I have been, I hope, categorical about when he did so, whether or not for a weapons offence or a sexual offence or both. As I have said, I don't argue with the need for officer safety, but officer safety has nothing to do with the fact that Constable Folk posed even the general question that he did pose, which led to, from Mr. Harms' perspective, a seriously damaging utterance or statement. I shouldn't call it an utterance. It was a statement in response to a question. In my view it's hard to imagine a more bright line constitutionally protected right that should be well understood by anyone engaged in the administration of justice, particularly in the criminal sphere, that upon arrest or detention an individual's rights must be read to him, and upon an affirmative response, an immediate and reasonable opportunity must be provided to facilitate the right. That comes right out of Luong and all of the other cases which ad nauseam have instructed participants in the administration of criminal justice how rights are to be exercised.

Here the evidence is of an officer who simply moved forward with his investigation, either in ignorance of or with willful disregard for well-established Charter standards.

The deliberate nature of Constable Folk's actions, in my view, negate considerations of good faith, and it is conduct which the Court should and does wish to distance itself from.

This conduct weighs heavily then in favour of exclusion. I should note that I have informed myself, aside from Grant of course, spent some time reviewing a couple of cases that were not in argument but I'll mention for the record. A very recent decision, an excellent decision, of my colleague Justice Ouellette in a case called R. v. MacLean which is at 2013 ABQB 60, I think, or 65. I'm going from memory. And in MacLean there is a reference to the Court of Appeal's earlier, much earlier, decision in the R. v. Small 1998 ABCA 85, which was a case also involving a sexual assault investigation, statements taken in breach of Section 10(b) rights. And even in that case, or I should say in that case, there was not any finding of anything approaching bad faith. The Court concluded that even in the absence of a violation that was not — I'm sorry. Too many negatives. Even where a violation was not deliberate or was simply based on an admission or perhaps negligence, the fact is that taking a statement in violation of Section 10(b) was seen as being a serious violation that on the exclusion test, as it then existed in 1998, resulted in the exclusion of the statement.

Grant also stands for the proposition that it is most often, if not more often than not, that statements taken in violation of Section 10(b) rights will be excluded, all else being equal.

With respect to the seriousness of the impact of the violation of the breach on the accused's interests, typically this is a factor that weighs in favour of exclusion, and that is my finding here. The reasons for that in the cases are legion. The impact on the interests of the accused include the fact that there is a reasonable expectation that having exercised his right to counsel, Mr. Harms may well have decided that he wished to remain silent.

The point of the right of counsel is to inform him of that, to affirm what he's been told, of course he wasn't told anything here at the outset, and so all the more — this breach is even more egregious because he didn't have an opportunity even to hear from Constable Folk that he had a right to remain silent, and of course I'm only talking about the basement statement now.

So cases, for example, like MacLean, like the Berger case from 2012 in our Court of Appeal, older cases, Sinclair from the Supreme Court of Canada, and they go on and on, the cases commenting about the need for a person detained or under arrest facing legal jeopardy must be immediately advised of his rights under Section 10(b) and of course his right to silence at common-law, and to be provided with an opportunity, if he wishes, to exercise those rights. That is the serious impact on the interests of the accused in this case, and clearly they weigh in favour of exclusion.

Finally, society's interest. Clearly in many cases that weighs in favour of inclusion. Here, and I'm then going back to some discussion also in MacLean, which is a similar case on its facts, there was concern in MacLean, and I think also here, for the reliability of the statement made in the basement, what the statement was, it's — again, there is — we know the context. It's in answer — a statement made in answer to a general question, What's going on here. It's fair to say, even without hearing from the accused on the voir dire, that a Court or a trier of fact, in this case, may have a misconceived idea about why that statement was given, particularly in the absence of a warning around Section 10(b) of the Charter around the right to silence and the right against self-incrimination. Was that statement made, for example, by an accused who in his own misconceived way of thinking about things may have thought making that statement was in his best interests in terms of getting himself out of a predicament? It is — the cases have said, and MacLean says, for example, that in circumstances like that — and, again, they're even worse because in MacLean the rights had been read to the individual and then questioning continued. Here, it's worse because there were no rights read. Can it be said with any confidence that the statement given was, in fact, reliable, and is it in society's interests to have such statements that go forward to a trier of fact, whether a judge alone or a jury, for consideration when the statements have been taken in what I find to be a clear violation of the accused's rights?

While typically this part of the Grant test then does weigh in favour of inclusion, here, if it does, which I have > some doubts about, it does only very weakly.

> The fourth aspect of the test is to balance the factors I have just discussed. In my view, the strength of the case made or the case that exists under the first two factors, and the weakness of the case in the third factor, all militates in favour of the conclusion that the administration of justice would be brought into disrepute if the statement made in the basement was admitted into evidence and, therefore, it should be excluded. I say that recognizing that exclusion is not automatic, but it has to be only — it only follows once there has been a balancing of the first three factors of the Grant test, which I have tried to do. There is little, if anything, here on the facts as I apprehend them and the application of the law to them that would militate in favour including the basement statement into evidence.
> So I apologize for taking so long. That is my ruling on the voir dire. For different reasons, all of the statements are inadmissible.

There's also the issue of conflict of interest. Say, you're a Constable on a police force investigating charges of sexual molestation. Is it really appropriate to be friends with an alleged "victim" on Facebook during an investigation?

Look real close at the name "Colin Folk" in the "Friends" list on Facebook. No wonder his testimony is "less than credible" according to the judge. From the evidence I see here, it's clear there's a personal agenda.

This kind of conduct is unacceptable.

Australia's ABC Obliviously Repeats Deceitful Propaganda

Tom Voltz · 18 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The ABC (Australian Broadcasting Corporation) is usually renowned for its quality journalism, but with this article by Ursula Malone and Juanita Philips, the two clowns responsible for this dog turd of an article, have reached new depths of idiocy, the likes of which have rarely been seen outside of the casts of the more asinine reality TV shows. How supposed professional journalists can be so gullible and so lacking in basic journalistic fact-checking is completely beyond me.

This entire travesty of journalism was initiated when Tracy Howe, Chief Executive of Domestic Violence NSW, created an online petition calling for "zero tolerance" (whatever that is supposed to mean) on Domestic Violence and urging the Prime Minister to "host a national summit with state premiers and key stakeholders."

And the reason for this? Well, according to her, Domestic Violence in Australia has reached epidemic proportions. Epidemic, she says!

I will take a moment's pause to allow you to complete your panic attack.

According to Ms. Howe:

> We need mobilisation on this and it has to come from the top. We are pleading with Tony Abbott to lead on this. I think it's about saying for once we are going to pull together all our resources and treat this in the way we would if it was a national disaster of any kind, like a flood or a bushfire, and deal with it head on.

Wow! Sounds like a pretty serious emergency. Reports of Domestic Violence (DV) must be increasing at an absolutely alarming rate!

But wait a minute… According to the NSW Bureau of Crime Statistics & Research, the prevalence of DV has remained almost level since at least 2001, probably far longer. In fact, since 2001 it has actually dropped slightly, so DV is actually decreasing, not increasing. Hmmm, how strange!

OK, enough of the Socratic method.

What is going on here is nothing but yet another publicity stunt by a feminist-run DV organisation. While there is nothing inherently wrong with that (apart from certain journalists being so easily manipulated by this sort of cheap trick), the fact that they are manufacturing a crisis and using the standard false-narrative that only women are victims and only men are perpetrators, which means they are promoting their campaign by stepping on the necks of every man in Australia–and there is something wrong with that. Every time this false narrative is reinforced by this type of manufactured media crisis, it makes it more likely that society at large will view all men as violent and dangerous, and makes it that much harder for male victims to get help. The effect is subtle but cumulative.

But who cares about men, right? Certainly not Domestic Violence NSW, that's obvious.

But that's just the beginning, so let's move on. Those of us who have been in the MHRM a while will recognise this next canard:

> Domestic violence is the leading cause of death and injury in women under 45, with more than one woman murdered by her current or former partner every week.

Yet another piece of (almost*) totally fabricated tosh that the authors swallowed whole. According to the latest available data (2003), the top 5 causes of death & disability for women 15-44 are:

1. Anxiety & Depression
2. Migraine

3. Type 2 diabetes
4. Asthma
5. Schizophrenia.

Violence (let alone the subset of Domestic Violence) doesn't even make the list, & since DV prevalence has actually dropped over the past decade it's likely to be even lower down the list now than it was when these figures were collected in 2003.

The "DV is the leading cause of death in women under 45″ canard was prompted by a single, largely discredited, study conducted by VicHealth. I say "prompted by" rather than "from" because, even if you count that study as a legitimate source, it didn't even say what they claim it says. What it actually said was:

> Intimate partner violence is responsible for more ill-health and premature death in Victorian women under the age of 45 than any other of the well-known preventable risk factors, including high blood pressure, obesity and smoking.

…which is a long way from the leading cause of death in Australian women. But note that qualifier, "death and injury." So any injury? Notwithstanding the fact that men are at least twice as likely to be victims of violence in general, violence in the home may be a leading cause of injury for women. But it's also a common cause of injury among men. Leave men out and what do you get but a useless statistic?

Without knowing more about the personal opinions of the article's authors, it's impossible to know whether they swallowed this rubbish from Domestic Violence NSW out of an ideological bias or simply out of sheer incompetence, but either way, it doesn't speak well of their standard of professionalism. This kind of sloppy work is flat out unacceptable coming from two so-called professional journalists. What I'd really like to see is the ABC take a stand and actually hold the authors responsible for such egregious breaches of basic journalistic ethics but, yeah, I won't be holding my breath.

But let's continue because the worst is yet to come:

About 2/3 of the way into the article I was briefly heartened to see the following heading:

> "Calls for Shift in Focus From Women to Men"

"Finally!" I thought. They are going to mention the fact that men make up a significant proportion of DV victims too. Yeah, I know, I know. I'm a hopelessly optimistic idiot. Predictably enough, we are treated to the same old reheated tripe about how men need to take responsibility for and prevent Domestic Violence. The worst of this came from none other than the NSW Police Assistant Commissioner, Mark Murdoch who is quoted in the article as saying:

> Men need to wake up to the fact that it is a men's problem … until they wake up to that fact, nothing's going to change.

It's a men's problem is it Mr. Murdoch? Then how do you explain the fact that at least 1 in 3, possibly as many as 1 in 2, of all DV victims are male, and that the overwhelming majority of these men are abused by female partners? Why is it solely men's responsibility to "wake up" to this problem and solve it when almost 1/2 of the perpetrators are female? Why do women get a free pass when almost as many women as men are violently abusing their partners?

At first I was disappointed to hear such words come from a policeman, but that was until I found out that at his level, he is more politician than policeman. All he is doing here is parroting feminist rhetoric in order to stay out of the feminist firing line and keep his career on track. That's some pretty cowardly behavior coming from someone who leads, and is supposed to set an example for, the people that protect us from criminals. These people risk their lives every day but Mr. Murdoch can't even bear to risk his career prospects. He should be ashamed.

I think I know what men need to "wake up" to. They need to wake up the fact that, as far as feminists, traditionalists, and politicians like Mr. Murdoch are concerned, that thing hanging between men's legs is not genitalia but a police badge, and by having one you are obligated to protect and serve the innocent. And by innocent, they of course mean women, no matter what any particular woman has done.

All of the evidence shows that Domestic Violence is not a gender issue but a generational issue, that men and women are equally susceptible to becoming violent to their partner(s), and that the vast majority of abusers were themselves abused as children. This fact-based message is the one that should be being promoted by people like Tracy Howe and Mark Murdoch, but instead we continually get this ridiculous ideologically-based message that only causes more fear and hatred towards men, and more neglect of male victims in genuine need.

It is this message that makes DV prevention campaigns utterly ineffective, it is this message that creates a world where male victims are referred to perpetrator-counselling services when they call a Domestic Violence hotline because there are no services available to deal with male victims, and it is this message that leaves male victims so utterly neglected and isolated that they often see suicide as their only viable option.

It's sick, it's hateful, and the people who perpetuate it are nothing less than bigots.

Being a sloppy journalist like Ms. Malone or Ms. Phillips is one thing, but people who cynically exploit men for their own ends Like Ms. Howe and Mr. Murdoch should be ashamed of themselves.

The end of feminism – a prophetic fiction

Peter Wright · 18 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Many have read Orwell's prophetic book 1984, but few in the MHRM have heard of the 1971 pulp fiction novel The Feminists, an equally prophetic work detailing events that have unfolded -and continue to unfold- in the area of gender politics. Set in the year 1992, the story recounts the rise of misandry and feminist governance that saw women in charge of every detail of civilization, and of a growing resistance movement (to feminism) that mirrors the sentiment of antifeminist groups today.

The story tells of how one resistance group, while living in a network of secret underground tunnels, plans and executes a successful bombing (which I hasten to add no one in the MHRM would ever consider doing) at a public gathering attended by both the feminist President and a local Mayor named Verna. The deed is one of many attempts to undermine feminist governance and hasten the end of misandric culture.

During the bombing the feminist President is injured. From a hospital bed she organizes an emergency meeting with executive members of her government, including her old friend and Mayor, Verna, who was witness to the bombing. The following is the pivotal scene in which the President addresses her guests, and where she makes the intriguing suggestion that an increase in female antifeminists has made it impossible for feminist governance to continue. – PW

Here's a summary from the back cover, followed by an excerpt from the end of the book:

THE STORY THAT HAD TO BE WRITTEN—SO TIMELY, SO FRIGHTENINGLY POSSIBLE, YOU WON'T BELIEVE IT'S FICTION!

Take a look into the future…women now rule the world—or most of what's left of it—and their world is not a pretty place to live in. Men have been reduced to mere chattel, good only for procreation. THE FEMINISTS are working to eliminate even this strictly male function…

Men must get permission to make love to any female—even if she is willing—or the penalty is death!

Follow one man's story as he is hunted for just such a crime. In desperation, he stumbles upon the hide-out of the subterranean people—others, like himself—both male and female—who have broken the law of THE FEMINISTS. Hiding in abandoned subway undergrounds, this group of gallant and desperate people wage a guerilla war to overthrow their enslavers.

Excerpt from the book:

> The president glanced from one to the other of the women, her eyes finally settling on Verna and softening as if she was remembering their long years of friendship during the rise to power. She smiled weakly and then fixed her gaze on her own hands. There was a look of defeat on her face.
> ”It has been the policy of our administration to conceal the unfavorable aspect of Feminist control,” she said, her voice almost a monotone. “I’ve spoken to some of you individually about the resistance in Los Angeles and Chicago.”
> ”The pigs can be overcome,” the Secretary of Defense interrupted. “We beat them once, we can do it again!”
> ”No,” the president said firmly. “We won’t beat them again. We are no longer merely fighting the male element of society. An increasing number of females have joined forces with the men.
> “Traitors!”
> The president lifted her head and stared at the Secretary of Defense coldly. “This country,” she said, “is in the midst of a revolution like it has never known. The only thing keeping us from being ousted is the lack of communication. If the revolutionists in each city did not think they were fighting alone, they would be in control. Fortunately we’ve dissected the country by cutting off all forms of communication.” She met Verna’s stunned face. “The resistance movement in New York has been minor in comparison,” she said. “But all these groups will soon unite. It’s inevitable.”
> The Mayor, feeling her legs growing weak, turned and sank into a chair.
> “The time has come for us to objectively examine our control,” the President said. “Unless we return the rights to males that make them equals, our country will be torn apart.”
> “But they’re not equals!” the Secretary of Defense insisted.
> “Thirty percent of the female population has suddenly decided they are, “ the President said. “To retain control we would be fighting our own sex.” She closed her eyes and sighed wearily. “In short,” she said, “we must face the fact that Feminist control has failed.”
> The mayor felt as if she had been struck. “Then it’s all been in vain,” she mumbled.
> ”Not entirely,” the President told her. “Not if we concede now. Unless we allow ourselves to be beaten and forced into male servitude, we can maintain our dignity. Remember, I said equals. In the future, men will consider us in higher esteem. Many of the changes we have brought about will remain in effect. Our control, even though only temporary, has proven that our sex does not make us inferior. “
> ”Is this what you intend to tell the public?”
> ”It is.”
> ”You will create mass hysteria.”
> ”I don’t think so,” the President said. “Granted, there will always be a segment that will resent my decision to reunite the sexes. I suppose there will be guerilla fighters who refuse to comply, but they will be a minority. I only hope none of you are among them. There are many problems our country must face once the question of sexual superiority is conquered. All of us are needed. We must rebuild our environment and stop starvation.”

Gender Equality debate at Cluj Napoca – Impressions, criticisms and praises

Lucian Vâlsan · 18 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As AVFM News announced, I led a small non-feminist team attending the event called "Debate: Gender Equality and Women's Rights" that took place at a hotel in Cluj Napoca in the context of the European elections that are due to take place on May 25th.

Let's start with the positive things.

Contrary to what non-feminists would have expected, the presence of cameras (there were multiple cameras rolling) and AVFM Logo on my press identification did not seem to bother anyone.

Even though some of the points made during the debate were at the very least questionable and misandric and some of them downright horrific, the individuals assumed their positions and, for the most part, they welcomed (or at the very least allowed) criticism and feedback.

With the notable exception of a self-described "sociologist and leftist activist," who called me a "troll," individuals both from the panel and from the public listened to what I had to say and some of them even agreed and were surprised to find out that there still are voices who dare to question the predominant gender narrative aggressively promoted by the EU without appealing to religion or tradition. This was highly impressive for me given that a while ago in another country I was booed for arguing in favor of a non-EU-friendly opinion even though we were at a debate competition (so it didn't even necessarily mean that the respective opinion was my own).

Most of the individuals who disagreed with me were more than civil and some of them even asked me for more information about the topic and ways to contact me in the future. Whether they will contact me in the future or will change their minds on certain topics is of little importance at this point. What's more important now is that I was able to have a civilized disagreement in a mutually respectful discussion on issues that are usually treated with way too much emotion. That's something to cheer given the hostility with which the non-feminist message is usually met with.

Barring the moment when she ref[image]used to publicly agree that the premise is wrong, even though she agreed with the facts I presented, the moderator, Elena-Alis Costescu from the Rațiu Center for Democracy, behaved exactly like a moderator of a debate should behave – i.e. not take sides. She upheld Ion Rațiu's principle of fighting tooth and nail for one's right to disagree so at least in that respect the organizers were inspired to pick her as the moderator of the event.

Even though there weren't too many people attending, virtually all positions were present, from the boring and snorting speech of the establishment libertarian, from traditionalist to statist utopians and from non-feminism to downright communism. The communism part was quite disturbing to me. It felt like 1989 never happened. There were even some shocking points that even the feminists in the chamber considered strange. So, if the organizers' intent was to have every opinion present, they definitely succeeded in that regard.

The not-so-positive things

First of all, the organizers failed to mention that they are a far-left organization even after they distributed their "Citizens Manifesto" to the participants. They insisted that they are an "apolitical" organization and that their manifesto was created following "consultations" with the citizens of Europe.

The fact that they're on the far-left was not even by far my biggest problem with them. The fact that they insisted they were not was disturbing. Dishonesty is something that I find far more loathsome than disagreement over politics. You can't claim you're "apolitical" when your manifesto virtually coincides with the agenda of the Nordic Green Left and your website openly promotes class struggle, anti-capitalism and everything that one would expect to find in a communist publication. Their manifesto could be a separate story in itself for another time in another place.

Second of all, the organizers' premise of the event was mostly misleading and in some cases downright wrong. You can't have a fruitful debate about gender equality when you're only willing to talk about women and you can't even have a fruitful debate about women's rights when you're starting with misleading premises.

Thirdly, the lack of microphones. Except for myself and the female attorney, all the other people who spoke at the event have done so in such a low voice that it's a tough job for the people processing the videos in order to make them audible for the larger public. And it's not that the equipment we used was broken or underperforming. Even there, as I was listening to the talks, it was sometimes difficult to hear what some people were saying simply because they were speaking with very very low voices. A few microphones and an amplifier would have helped a lot both the press and the participants. Some of the participants were saying at the cocktail party after the event that they couldn't hear some of the points being made and so they renounced the idea of signing up to speak and ask questions.

The "context" of the event and the points made in the debate

There were quite a lot of points made during the debate but most of them were made using misleading data at best and downright wrong data worst.

On the facebook page of the event there were two major facts – or, better said, a fact and a "fact" – named as the "context" in which the debate is taking place. The first one goes like this:

> Romania occupies the 65th spot in the international table from the "State of the World's Mothers report 2014" published by Save the Children, which makes this country the last in the EU at a considerable distance from Hungary (55th in the table) and Bulgaria (44th).

Now, I provided the source for you so you can read it yourselves and analyze it. The organizers didn't bother to direct the potential participants to the source of the claims.

The problem with that report is that it's not really reliable. The same report claims that British mums have as tough a job as Belarusian mums and that American women face the same risk of maternal death as those in Romania and Iran.

Is anyone sane really believing that British mums who have a life expectancy of 80 years have as tough a job as their counterparts in Belarus, a communist dictatorship with Europe's lowest life expectancies? You don't have to be sociologist to understand that those numbers aren't giving the whole story.

As for the other comparison (US-Iran-Romania), the lifetime risk of maternal death is defined as the probability of a 15 year old girl to die of a pregnancy-related issue, under the assumption that the current levels of fertility and mortality will not change in the future. And herein lays the problem. This indicator was last time measured in Romania in 2010[1] and was on a descending trend compared to 2008. And since the fertility and mortality levels have changed drastically in the last 4 years, the results of this Save the Children report are simply irrelevant to the current climate. And these kinds of misleading numbers are being used throughout the report – thus rendering it unreliable for the current situation.

One should also note that the report is taking into consideration the child mortality rate (defined as the death of under 5-year-old children per 1,000 births) – which in theory is a good thing to consider. In practice however, countries like Poland or Romania record as actual people the children who are born and die in the incubator days or even hours later. In countries like Belgium, for instance, these kinds of births aren't recorded as "children born alive" – so from a statistical point of view, Belgium is advantaged even though in practice it may very well have the same child mortality rate that Poland and Romania have.

Further on the facebook page of the event it reads:

> Also, in Romania, approximately 11,000 cases of domestic violence against women are officially reported each ear

At first I was thinking that in a population of almost 20 million people, the number could be plausible. But I made the fatal mistake of actually looking for the source of the claim. And I found this[2]:

> In the year 2010, 11,232 cases of family violence were reported in which the physical and emotional abuse were the most common (in over 1,200 situations). Over 3,300 allegations were made using the national hotline, and from those, 2,419 were referring to negligence situations and 543 related to physical abuse, according to the data provided by the Ministry of Labor, Family and Social Security

Ooops! It seems like we have a classical case of taking all the victims of all forms of domestic violence and call them all… women.

When I pointed this out to the panel, the moderator tried to equivocate, claiming that the number is anyway unreliable since most DV goes unreported (a claim which is anyway improvable and unfalsifiable). I insisted that family violence and domestic violence exclusively against women are, plain and simple, two different things and that the whole premise of the "context" is simply a lie. The moderator refused to admit the mistake and instead focusing on the fact that they didn't say "exclusively" as if that made things better.

[image]I kept insisting and brought up the results of Erin Pizzey's over 40 years of experience in the field and the hundreds of scholarly investigations that exist on the topic[3] which make it more than clear that domestic violence is not and never has been a gender issue. To my surprise, the panel acknowledged that male victims of domestic violence exist, and in a higher proportion than many would think, but they refused to even consider that domestic violence is closer to 50-50 divided by sex in Romania, claiming that my data might be true for other countries – as if Romania is somehow located on Pluto where disturbed individuals exist in radically different proportions than in Europe.

To nobody's surprise, the panel dodged my question of whether it's fair or honest to focus solely on women and considered my analogy with the firefighter throwing water only on the front and left wall of a burning building to be "exaggerated". But if we can't talk about this on a debate on "gender equality," then where should we?

Things went from bad to worse when the topic of gender pay gap arose. First, the two candidates for the European Parliament were happy to learn that the gender pay gap in Romania is "only" 9% favoring men and then Adela Mîrza from the New Republic went on to say that if it were for her, she would have a law or a structure in which women are paid significantly better than men solely because they're women and they have another job at home as well.

Time-use surveys across Europe[4] show that both men and women do around eight hours of paid and unpaid work a day – so her claim of women's "second job" at home is baloney at best and outright crap at worst. Even some of the feminist-leaning people in the chamber asked her if she means it and acknowledged that such thing is blatantly discriminatory towards men. And she made it perfectly clear that she wasn't joking. Gabriela Rădoiu Leș from the Civic Force Party however distanced herself from such positions and even said that the State should not have the power to tell private companies how they should pay their employees.

Before rushing in to praise Gabriela Rădoiu Leș, one should also know that she expressed her "hope" that Romania would ratify the Istanbul Convention by the end of 2015. The same Istanbul Convention that institutes classes of "compulsory feminism" being taught to 10 year old children (Article 12.4) or makes feminist organizations to be both prosecutors and judges in allegations of violence made by females against males – and the State would just rubber stamp their "discoveries."

But perhaps the most bizarre points that were made in the whole event belonged to Adela Mîrza (the New Republic Party) and a female attorney from the audience, whose name is inaudible on the recording.

Adela Mîrza said that she would want the media to be censored in order to counteract the objectification and denigration of women in the media. When I asked her who should have this power she unequivocally said that the State should do it. When I reminded her that the free market of ideas has changed a lot of things in the Romanian media in the last 10 years, she dismissed the idea that the free market of ideas is enough. And then a few minutes later she referred to herself as ”a libertarian with a moral anchor.” But where exactly is the morality when you want the State to censor TV shows that you don’t like?

The female attorney proposed that the State should fund courses aimed at women to teach them how to manipulate men. And no, she wasn’t joking. And no, none of the candidates disagreed vehemently – although they did question whether it is appropriate for the State to fund such an endeavor.

In all fairness, the panel agreed with me that, at the very least, the gender pay gap numbers don’t tell the whole story and that such differences in remuneration are natural due to the inherent differences between men’s and women’s interests in career and also due to the inherent biological differences which simply make women highly unlikely to do certain jobs at a comparative level with men. Also, both of the candidates admitted that they have never been discriminated against on wages and that they’re also unsure whether the gender pay gap numbers are really that relevant. I don’t know, however, how is this view compatible in Mîrza’s mind with her willing to create a structure that pays women more because they’re women. But I digress.[image]There were some other non-feminist points that got across to the panel – such as the fact that it’s absolutely normal and logical for a policewoman to be prevented from advancing while she’s on maternal leave or the fact that some managers who decide to stop employing women are not necessarily misogynystic but are simply trying to prevent their business from going bankrupt or work understaffed due to the sometimes lengthy parental leave policies that some European countries have in place.

The latter point was made by the same female attorney who proposed State-funding for female-oriented manipulation courses. And she gave an example from a German hospital where 6 or 7 women in the already thin staff got pregnant and went home in just one year and, consequently, the (female) manager decided to stop employing women for a while in order to avoid paying more people to stay at home than people actually working in the hospital. I don’t know whether she intended or not, but she basically explained eloquently how the feminist-inspired and State-enforced policies for women turn out to be more misogynistic than the alleged misogyny that the business managers supposedly have.

Conclusions

There were more things that were said during the event but you’ll get to see them once the English subtitles for the video we have of the event are done.

All in all, the event went better than I would have expected. The participants were friendly and polite with me and my team after the event and the moderator specifically looked for me to gather feedback being particularly interested in knowing what I thought was wrong in her performance as a moderator so she could improve her debate-moderator skills for future events. This surprised me in a pleasant way although, in all fairness, this is what a moderator should do because that’s a moderator for. But after dealing with hostile moderators so many times, seeing a glimpse of professionalism is refreshing.

One of the organizers (after asking to see my press identification) promised they’ll look to check the reporting of the event on avoiceformen.com. I extended an invitation to do an interview with a member of the organizing team but so far have gotten no response (to be fair, there was a week-end in the middle so that could explain their lack of response).

Although I’ve been harsh with their way of framing the debate and the omission of their politics, I congratulate them for the outcome of the event. The fact that nobody was shouted down, recording was allowed freely and their inspiration in picking the moderator are things for which I honestly congratulate European Alternatives Cluj Napoca.

If every debate about gender equality in Europe would be like the one in Cluj Napoca, the entire climate would be far less misandric and being a non-feminist would have long become the norm.

Check out the European Alternatives NGO (particularly the Citizens Pact project) and see if they're coming into your area. They are organizing events like this one across the European Union until May 25th and if one takes place close to you, by all means, attend to it and contribute. No-one can guarantee that things will go like in Cluj Napoca, but it's an indisputable opportunity to get non-feminist points across directly to future MEPs.

In the upcoming elections, don't forget to avoid voting for proven feminist MEPs. Check the list of feminist MEPs for that purpose.

Rape Culture Panic Is Not the Answer

This Is What a Child Molester Looks Like (NSFW)

Warning: This video is likely Not Safe for Work, and is disturbing.

I first spotted this video as a Facebook video, though I have since seen it in several other spots on the internet, including Liveleak, who obviously obtained it from somewhere else. It has appeared and disappeared from several places on the 'net; when we tried to put it up on YouTube, YouTube instantly struck it down as violating "community standards."

While I normally tend to think YouTube is a little arbitrary and sometimes draconian about what they remove, in this case I can see why they'd want to remove it; we do after all here see a boy as he's sexually assaulted and molested by an adult woman, to the huge entertainment of a bullying, out of control crowd. The boy is obviously trying to go along with good humor, fear-grin plastered across his face, but as things progress it's obvious he's being humiliated, shamed, and disturbed over sexual behavior he doesn't fully understand, and being mocked the whole time for it. I don't think I'll ever forget the look on his face as the camera finally cuts away.

I had some struggles with knowing whether we should put this on A Voice for Men, and there was much discussion amongst the editorial staff about whether we should put this up. In the end, I decided that it's already been seen on enough internet sites that there's no hiding it, and there's a greater purpose to showing this to people, and making sure we have our own copy so it can't be lost down the internet memory hole. This is now on our server, where it will stay, permanently, as a news reporting item.

A woman sexually assaulted and molested a little boy in public while people laughed and filmed it. This happened:

http://archive.avoiceformen.com/video/FemalePaedophileSexual.mp4
Now the fact of the matter is, as most in the Men's Human Rights Movement know, female-on-male sexual predation is far, far more prevalent than almost anyone in the wider society wants to believe. Female sexual predation of children is also far more common than most people believe; crime stats don't reflect it because women are rarely arrested or prosecuted for it in all but the most blatant and obvious cases–and even things like this appear not to be "blatant and obvious" to a public that is often completely unable to see anything lacking a penis as a sexual threat.

But sexual assault, child molestation, and child abuse is exactly what this video is.

We don't know who these people are in this video. I don't think we need to. I think we need to watch this, and listen to that crowd howling with laughter and encouragement as this little boy does his best to smile and go along with the "joke" but finally can't take it anymore and his true emotions begin to show on his face… and this was so "funny" people actually recorded it and put it out.

If anyone doubts that female sex predators are far more common than generally believed, I still strongly recommend reading When Women Sexually Abuse Men: The Hidden Side of Rape, Stalking, Harassment, and Sexual Assault by Philip W. Cook and Tammy L. Hodo. You may also want to listen to our extensive interview with Philip W. Cook.

The fact is that women sexually abuse men, as well as children, at rates orders of magnitude higher than almost anyone in society wants to believe. Law enforcement is oblivious to it. Popular entertainment and everyday "rape and sexual assault awareness" campaigns would have you believe that the sexual predator almost always wears a male face.

But the sexual predator doesn't have a male face. Sexual assault is not a gendered issue. It's a human issue.

Well, it is if you think little boys are human, anyway.

By the way, is it worth mentioning that at least three different studies–on which there has been no followup for decades–have shown that between 60 and 80% of male rapists were sexually abused by a woman in childhood?

Nah. Probably no point. That would again involve seeing men and women as equally human and vulnerable and predatory. And we can't have that.

Hanna Rosin Needs To Learn Basic Math

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 19 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Here's another laughable piece from Hanna Rosin – surely you remember her – the lady sitting in her comfortable home designed, built, sourced, maintained, heated and powered by men – wondering if men have become obsolete.

I don't know why I even bother with this delusional witch, but let's look at her new article about how father's totally don't get fucked in family courts even though mothers get equal or superior custody arrangements 91.1% of the time. When you're looking at percentages in the 90 range, you know you're dealing with equality. #feministequality. Lean In, ladies! How is it that you are allowing those sneaky bastard men to prevent you from getting equal or better custody arrangements 100% of the time?

Last week the actor Jason Patric went to court to "fight 'til I'm dead," as he put it, to see his 4-year-old son. Patric and his girlfriend conceived the child through in vitro fertilization, and a judge earlier denied Patric any paternal rights*. Since then, Patric has become a hero to frustrated fathers everywhere who are alienated from their ex-wives and girlfriends. Patric is part of a movement of vigilante fathers who challenge the assumption that mothers should have any more rights than they do. Skier Bode Miller famously challenged a girlfriend's right to move to New York after she got pregnant with his child, and earlier this year a group of Utah fathers sued the state over a law allowing mothers to give up their babies for adoption without their consent. The courts, argued one of the Utah plaintiffs, treat men "like they're scum—like they don't have rights at all as far as having a relationship with their children."*

A few comments here: First of all, vigilante means a member of a self-appointed group of citizens who undertake law enforcement in their community without legal authority, typically because the legal agencies are thought to be inadequate.

Fighting for parental rights through the court system is the exact opposite of vigilante.

Secondly, the fact that Patric didn't literally fuck his son's mother, and used IVF instead, has little bearing beyond legal loopholing in this particular case. Patric is not only the child's biological father, he was present in his son's life from birth up until the courts decided that his failure to actually put his penis in his child's mother and ejaculate to cause her pregnancy invalidates his right to be his child's father. Patric presented plenty of evidence to demonstrate his involvement in his little boy's life. His son calls him "Dada." Case fucking closed, in my opinion.

It used to be that women had to worry about men disappearing after they got pregnant or divorced. Now, some women have the opposite problem.

The opposite problem? Problem? Fathers wanting to be in their children's lives in a meaningful way is a fucking problem? So basically, Hanna, children are the personal property of women and any attempt by fathers to define their own relationships is a problem needing to be addressed?

A growing fathers' rights movement is aggressively challenging what it sees as the courts' assumption that the mother is the only real parent. Men's rights activists air their grievances about unfair child custody laws on sites such as A Voice for Men and on subreddits like Men's Rights and The Red Pill. Last year, Ken Cuccinelli was tied to a men's rights group advocating for divorced fathers. "Men are angry at losing their kids in the divorce court and taking their dream of raising them and reducing it to a child support payment and every other weekend," writes one men's rights blogger quoted in Michael Kimmel's 2013 book Angry White Men. And that view is shared by the broader public. One recent study showed that people are generally in favor of joint custody, but they believe that divorce courts are seriously slanted toward mothers.

> ….grievances
> ….unfair

> ….angry
> ….white
> ….men

No axe to grind here, Hanna, right? You're just being objective and looking at the facts? No engagement of any caricatures or stereotypes at all. Nothing to see here, move along.

It's so cute how hoi polloi think they understand the world they live in. Darling little plebes who actually believe they are capable of parsing and comprehending the reality around them. Oh broader public, you're so adorable. Shush now and let the smart ladies tell you how things really are.

But is this actually true? "There's a real perception—even women share it—that courts are unfair to fathers," says Ira Ellman, a custody expert at Arizona State University. But in fact the great revolution in family court over the past 40 years or so has been the movement away from the presumption that mothers should be the main, or even sole, caretakers for their children. Individual cases like Patric's may raise novel legal issues, but on the whole, courts are fair to men, particularly men who can afford a decent lawyer*.*

Hold up, now. Men who can afford a decent lawyer is not most men. And the very fact that a good lawyer is needed strongly implies the laws are anything but fair. If they were fair, and applied with true equality and generosity, why would a fancy lawyer be needed? And how is it that women can manage to face the courts over custody matters and not need a good lawyer?

Perhaps because the courts are biased in the women's favor? Just think for one goddamn second about what you are saying, Hanna. Black defendants get treated very fairly by the courts if they can afford a good lawyer. Therefore systemic discrimination against blacks in the courts doesn't exist?

Cases like Patric's and Miller's, which involve fathers who never married the mothers, are relatively new to the courts, but divorce courts have a long history of trying to keep up with changing gender dynamics. In the 1970s, family courts began to move away from assuming a model of breadwinner husband and dependent wife. Instead, courts assumed interdependence, meaning that husband and wife shared assets and domestic duties. Pretty rapidly, Naomi Cahn and June Carbone explain in their new book, Marriage Markets: How Inequality Is Remaking the American Family, the rules became more "gender neutral." As the image of an abandoned, innocent wife faded, alimony declined. The maternal presumption that mothers should automatically get custody of children in the "tender years"—meaning younger than 7—also faded. And the vast majority of states moved toward an assumption of joint custody. In 2000, for example, a new law in Wisconsin directed courts to maximize the time children spent with both parents.

The "rules" may be more gender neutral, but nice dodge, Hanna. We are not talking about the "rules". We are talking about how they are applied. Rules mean jack shit if they are not actually being enforced.

Men's rights activists complain that despite the legal changes, mother preference still lingers, and studies have shown that through the 1980s sole mother custody still prevailed. But more recently judges have been catching up to the law.

Yeah, just shut up already all you fathers who actually love and want to be with your children. Mommy has spoken. The children are hers. Stop complaining.

According to one of the most thorough surveys of child custody outcomes, which looked at Wisconsin between 1996 and 2007, the percentage of divorce cases in which the mother got sole custody dropped from 60.4 to 45.7 percent while the percentage of equal shared custody cases, in just that decade, doubled from 15.8 to 30.5. And a recent survey by the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers shows a rapid increase in mothers paying child support.

Oh dear, Barbie. Here comes the math, from the actual study.

Sole custody goes to the mother 45.7% of the time

Primary custody goes to the mother 13.0% of the time

Shared custody is agreed to 32.4% of the time

45.7 + 13 = 58.7

58.7% of the time, mothers are awarded sole or primary custody

45.7 + 13 + 32.4 = 91.1

91.1% of the time, mothers are awarded equal or more custody

Sole custody goes to the father 7.0% of the time

Primary custody goes to the father 1.9% of the time

Shared custody is the same as women, obviously – 32.4% of the time

7 + 1.9 = 8.9

So fathers are the sole or primary custodians of their children in 8.9% of all cases, versus 58.7% of the time for women.

7 + 1.9 + 32.4 = 41.3

Fathers get equal or better custody 41.3% of the time, compared to 91.1% for mothers.

8.9% vs 58.7%

41.3% vs 91.1%

Not only are fathers nowhere close to equal treatment, they are not even halfway.

I'm beginning to think my joke about #feministequality isn't a joke at all.

Berkeley law professor Mary Ann Mason tracked the changing priorities of divorce courts over three decades. The biggest recent change, she writes, is the courts' preference for the "friendly parent," meaning the one who can get along with the other parent. Mothers who get in the way of a father's involvement can in fact be penalized by the courts. In their book, Cahn and Carbone tell the story of the Renauds, a divorcing Vermont couple whose case was resolved in 2004. Before the divorce, the couple shared child care. The mother took Fridays off to be with the children, and the father took them to and from day care and was an involved dad. The marriage ended when the father told the mother that he was having an affair with a colleague. In another era, the mother would have gotten sole custody of the children and alimony, but not much child support. Now, "the mother's ability to retain custody depends on her willingness to support the father's involvement," Cahn and Carbone write. In this case, the mother accused the father of abuse and neglect. When the investigators could not confirm the charges, the court awarded the father 50 percent custody and made the mother's custody contingent on her working to repair the relationship with the father.

That's nice, Hanna. You cherry-picked a single court case in which the mother's custody is contingent on her being a decent fucking human being to her children's father. Go back to the very beginning and look at Jason Patric again. His child's mother, supported by courts that give not one single fuck about either the father or the child, is denying him any access to his son at all. Do you have any idea how much that vindictive shrew is hurting her own child? Where does he think Daddy went? Is Daddy dead? Why can't I see my Daddy anymore.

The real inequality in family courts these days is not based on gender, but on income. Wealthy men have successfully fought against proposed reforms that would have forced them to pay more child support. With elite, college educated men, "it's outrageous how little they can end up paying in child support in some cases," says Ellman, the Arizona State professor. But poor men are in a different predicament. Welfare reform in the 1990s included an effort to track down fathers who weren't paying child support. As the economy sank, those fathers fell behind on their payments and often wound up in jail or permanent debt, as Elaine Sorensen of the Urban Institute has documented.

How dare those wealthy men refuse to shell out to their gold-digging ex-wives? The bastards! Of course, if the wives were truly concerned about the welfare of their children, wanting to provide them with all the resources their wealthy father offers, they would have stayed married.

Poor men put in jail because they were dumb enough to become unemployed? Yeah, let's throw them in jail and make them beholden to the women who gave birth to their children for the rest of their natural lives. Make sure those sorry bastards turn every penny over to the children mother.

Rock. Hard place. Pick one, please, but only if you're male.

A father who never married the mother of his child has a much shakier legal status. Petitioning the courts for paternal rights as a father who had a child out of wedlock is complicated to do and much less likely to be successful. A legal system that has evolved to recognize equal, interdependent parents doesn't really apply. As Cahn and Carbone have written, in this social class the women are generally better off and choose not to marry the fathers, precisely because they want to avoid future legal disputes over children. If that father is Jason Patric or Bode Miller, he can probably afford a lawyer and get sympathetic publicity. But if he's not, the best a poor father can hope for if he wants to impact his child is to be a steady paycheck.

So, the moral of the whole story is that courts are totally fair to men as long as they are rich and married. Unmarried men have virtually no chance of obtaining custody of their own children and women would be wise to never get married because …duh…then no man will ever be ever take her personal property children.

…the best a poor father can hope for if he wants to impact his child is to be a steady paycheck.

This sentence is why the MHRM exists in the first place.

Keep talking, Hanna. You make our work easier with every stupid word you write.

So–thanks?

Lots of love,

JB

23 More Ways Feminism Has Made the World a Better Place for Men

B.R. Merrick · 20 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

At first, I thought that Hannah Wallen had done a brilliant job of deconstructing – really, destroying – the falsities in Elizabeth Plank's article about "23 Ways Feminism Has Made the World a Better Place for Men." However, although I originally thought that Ms. Wallen's efforts were laudatory, I had one of those sudden, inexplicable moments of doofus clarity. The phrase "doofus clarity" may sound like an oxymoron, but that's only because the word "oxymoron" is hilarious. (Like "gubernatorial." What the fuck?)

I suddenly realized 23 actual ways in which feminism truly has been a boon for the modern male. Now I feel a bit sorry for Ms. Plank and the terrible take-down she has suffered. Therefore, I shall be turning in my men's movement ID and party coupons shortly, but not before I observe the following:

24. Feminism has made lacrosse a safer sport for men. After the lives of three perfectly innocent young men were destroyed by a lying, soon-to-be murderess (and one of those guys was quite obviously not even attendant at the party where this great big nothing happened), the feminists who had jumped the gun and prematurely ejaculated at Duke University ran into the streets by the thousands, demanding the mendacious woman's head, and insisting that every false rape accusation be met with the punishment that would be intended for the innocent male. Since then, the rate of false rape accusations has severely dropped, and the feminist-led candlelight vigils for Mangum's final victim, Reginald Daye, have never ceased. They are also outraged, as am I, that she will be released from prison after only a few years, free to lie and murder again.

25. Manscaping is a thing of the past. Feminists rightly pointed out that leg and armpit shaving, and now Brazilian waxes, have mostly to do with what women expect of other women. They realize that the idea of men oppressing women into shaving various body parts is absurd, noting that women in other cultures, like many parts of Europe, shave far less. They understand that encouraging men to engage in this ridiculous activity reduces them to an arbitrary feminine standard. They are happy to explain that women throughout human history have been more than willing to have sex with men who are hairy on various parts of their bodies, and have always found it attractive and arousing. Besides, feminists argue, men have more important things to worry about, like getting drafted and dying younger, two bullet points they never fail to mention (nor do they ever trivialize or ignore). Consequently, as manscaping has decreased, women's respect, admiration, and appreciation of masculinity has increased in directly opposite proportion.

26. Male spaces are springing up all over the place. There has never been a demand from feminists for unisex gyms or clubs. As "women only" spaces have been created, the women who frequent these places have always and everywhere insisted that the men should have like places to commune amongst themselves. This has led to a reduction in claims of sexual harassment in the workplace, and Military Sexual Trauma in the military.

27. Men are increasingly acquiring equal custody in divorce disputes.

28. Men are far less likely than at any previous time in human history to be falsely accused of child molestation, and not at all likely to be arrested for such false charges, which, as feminists are fond of saying, would be in direct violation of basic Constitutional protections (like the need for the accuser to carry the burden of proof).

29. Men are far less likely than at any previous time in human history to be falsely accused of domestic violence, and not at all likely to be arrested for such false charges, which, as feminists are fond of saying, would be in direct violation of basic Constitutional protections (like the need for habeas corpus).

30. Now that so many more women are earning their own money (although at less-than-equal proportions to men for exactly-positively-no-mistake equal work), men are far less likely than at any previous time in human history to be forced to pay child support when they do not have equal custody (or no custody at all); and alimony is a thing of the past.

31. Feminists do not believe in "good rape"; or differentiating between "rape rape" and rape that's not really rape. They did not coin these phrases. They tell other women to stop using these phrases, and openly acknowledge that more men are raped than women. How, they ask, can that be good?

32. Men no longer make up the majority of suicide victims. They are now far more likely to openly express emotional distress, beginning in boyhood, and not be laughed at.

33. Feminists were at the forefront of ensuring that an equal amount of federal funding is made available for prostate cancer research as there is for breast cancer research, since roughly the same numbers of men suffer from the former as women from the latter.

34. Feminists are to be credited with pointing out that the supposed exploitation of women in pornography and popular culture is nonsense, ably demonstrating that women also enjoy, from time to time, the sight of a naked, aroused man. (They also have made it clear that male porn stars are paid less for equal work, and have called for compensation on behalf of these poor, manscaping dudes.) As far as popular culture is concerned, say feminists, the rail-thin women portrayed on all the covers of those magazines sold in stores and on newsstands are marketed specifically to other females. Feminists also point out the ways in which the hyper-masculine is marketed specifically to males, resulting in steroid use with its physical and emotional dependency, as well as the abomination mentioned in 25 above. (I know that Ms. Plank pointed out manscaping as a good thing in her list, but I'm pretty sure she was being sarcastic. Just like me all over this fucking article.)

35. Feminists have been at the forefront of showing the world that boys, like girls, are natural learners who don't need to be indoctrinated and drilled. They called a halt to boys being drugged into submission when they were unable to get those boys removed from schools where they did not wish to be. Daycare centers have disappeared from the face of the earth, and we no longer see disaffected teenaged males, who know nothing about their surrounding communities (and don't want to know), hanging out at McDonald's with nothing to do.

36. Inflation is extinct. So are long, boring commutes. Thanks, feminists!

37. Feminists are genuinely fascinated by the great and generalized differences between the sexes, while carefully noting any crossover that they might see. They gear the social sciences around these findings and celebrate them: "Vive la différence!" When they share these amazing discoveries with the world, it leads to greater appreciation between the sexes for the great and generalized contributions of the other. Thanks to the tireless efforts of feminists everywhere, women no longer run screaming from the room when men point out that girls like to play with dolls because it's part of their nature.

38. It was feminists' embrace of gay men, and not the spontaneous, a-political Stonewall Riots (or the Left-leaning, gay male-initiated Mattachine Society), that liberated gay men from the shackles of silence and shame. This proves that whenever there is a movement afoot for any oppressed group, feminists never jump in after the fact to claim responsibility for that group's liberation.

39. We see a great many more women running to fill the vacancies left by sick, dying, and dead men in construction work, along with all the other dangerous work there is to do requisite for keeping the modern world functioning like so much blood through so many civilizational veins. Thanks to feminists, women love doing tough jobs for long hours. It makes them feel like equals to men, which is the only thing they want.

40. The black American community is now run by men and women alike, with the important contributions of black fathers made indispensable. Since Big Black Daddy can once again safely bring home the bacon (now that far less than 10% of black men likely to have small children are imprisoned), governmental welfare programs – along with their penchant for getting the attention of naturally hypergamous black women – are ancient history as they are no longer necessary.

41. Play dates, along with the rest of the hyper-safe, supposedly kid-friendly, heavily regulated culture, are also a bygone relic. Boys can once again climb trees, swing on ropes, run off to a friend's house at a moment's notice, venture into the woods, improvise a sport, and negotiate their own games, with little to no adult supervision whatsoever. Feminists rightfully decried the adverse and paranoid effects of that made-for-television movie Adam, which took the grief of two actual parents and hyperventilated it into American culture, as if all mothers everywhere should be deeply concerned about nefarious, nebulous, nasty men doing despicable things to younger males. They showed the world that feminists are far less likely to be governed by fear than the rest of the populace. And, since they believe in the equality of the sexes, they never fail to point out that women are a significant portion of the problem when it comes to missing and abused boys; thus, feminists conclude, the culture is wrong-headed to so frequently portray men alone as the villains.

42. Feminists invented the number 42.

43. Women are no longer beholden to a consumer culture. Betty Friedan's work in The Second Wave had nothing to do with the comforts of suburbia. After all, to her, the luxurious home for which her husband drove on long, boring commutes to afford was nothing more than a comfortable concentration camp: Auschwitz with nicer sofas.

44. Feminists realized long ago that the greatest contributions to society frequently came from the minds of self-educated men, regardless of formal education. Recent examples in modern history include men who are still living, many of whom are heavily into computer technology: Bill Gates, Robert Noyce, Gordon Moore, Andrew Grove, Larry Page, Sergey Brin, Jeff Bezos, Jack Dorsey, Evan Williams, Biz Stone, Noah Glass, the late Steve Jobs, etc. Putting two and two together, they concluded that access to formal educational institutions is not nearly as important as encouraging women to use their own minds to make their own decisions, without blaming men and patriarchal oppression every step of the way. They frequently point out the easy access to public libraries, the Internet, and various modes of travel that most modern women have at their disposal. They also never fail to express gratitude to the memory of so many historical men for their invaluable contributions; nor do they ever fail to point out the sex to which each of these men is attached (Bill Gates, Robert Noyce, Gordon Moore, Andrew Grove, Larry Blah, Blah-blah Blah, et blah). In their awe of these great male minds, feminists are far less likely than other women to thank men only in the context of what they do for women, or how they make women feel; and are far more likely to express gratitude simply for the existence of men for their own sake, like men frequently do for women.

45. Feminists routinely denounce women who laugh at men that are mutilated for life and permanently separated from their sex, their very identity. They can be counted on to patiently remind these cruel women that it's never funny in the reverse, and that humans in general deserve at the very least our empathy when these ordeals have to be faced. They can be counted on to reflect for long periods of time concerning exactly how horrendously awful a man's life can be when such a terrible thing happens. They also never change the subject when it is brought up.

46. Men no longer have to be concerned about getting vasectomies, using condoms, or performing coitus interruptus to prevent unplanned slavery. Heterosexual sex, which is supposed to be a warm, intimate, and satisfying phenomenon, is no longer a minefield. As is evident from this link, men are happier than ever being married to women. Just listen to some typical entries from that link, which I have taken the time to weave together like one of Wordsworth's lyrical ballads:

(My thanks to various anonymous bastards for helping me with the wording. The innuendos, however, are mine. All mine.)

I really wanted to find a 47th reason that feminism has been so goddamned, motherfucking wonderful for us all, but unfortunately, for some strange reason, my sarcastometer now has busted glass. That's never happened before. Once I have it fixed, I promise to get back to supporting my newfound fag-hag Elizabeth (Lizzie-boo-boo for short) in pretending that my newfound precious ideology isn't nearly as awful as other people are insisting it is.

Exposing The Raw Story (and Roxanne Cooper's) Misogyny

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 20 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"The Raw Story" has an honesty problem. Despite their claim to be a bastion of independent and progressive journalism, they have repeatedly shown that they will throw honest reporting and journalistic integrity out the window if it helps them sell a phony, prepackaged, sensationalist narrative to their gullible readers. And they have–repeatedly–shown that they prefer to silence any voices which challenge the prejudices and petty bigotries of the people who work there. In addition to pre-emptively banning people they've written stories about from commenting on those very same stories, a recent email correspondence between a member of our staff and Roxanne Cooper, publisher of The Raw Story, confirms that just being a known MRA or noting childish behavior by radical feminists is sufficient justification to ban someone from commenting on The ~~Raw~~Cooked Story. (You'd think they'd at least have the courtesy to mention that in their Terms of Service, but who are we to say? It's Roxanne's world, after all, and she doesn't have to allow any independent thoughts in her publication.)

As a case to illustrate the lack of ethics and journalistic integrity at Roxanne Cooper's The ~~Raw~~Cooked Story, we noticed that they recently ran a thunderingly stupid article supposedly about MRAs. In reality, this story took commentary from a Reddit group called "The Red Pill"–a non-MRA group known to sometimes be hostile to MRAs–and grabbed some stupid remarks from them out-of-context. Then they twisted those remarks from The Red Pill group to look like rape advocacy, and declared this to be proof that "MRAs" strategize on how to get women drunk to rape them–because apparently, in Roxanne Cooper's ~~Raw~~CookedStoryLand, men can rape drunk women but women can't rape drunk men. This is like taking an article from Elle magazine, declaring it representative of feminism, and then twisting Elle magazine out of context on top of all that–layer upon layer upon layer of stupidity and dishonesty, in other words.

And then they further went ahead and auto-banned any known MRAs from commenting to point out their error or challenge their hateful bigotry, pretty much however polite those comments were.

Then some MRAs that Roxanne's people apparently didn't recognize, like Alison Tieman, got in there, and some even more enlightening things happened. Apparently, once it was realized Alison was female but an MRA, they were flummoxed; they obviously hoped Alison would match their bigoted, misogynist prejudice that female MRAs are stupid and gullible and ill-informed and were frustrated when, instead, they found they couldn't even answer basic questions she posed, or be bothered to look at data she offered that challenged their prejudices. They were able to answer only with name-calling and "lalalala I can't hear you!" But still, Alison has a vagina; they couldn't ban her just yet, could they?

But then Alison committed the greatest sin of all: she exposed the misogyny of The ~~Raw~~Cooked Story's community. This could not be tolerated; who does this woman think she is, to dare speak heresy in The~~Raw~~CookedStoryLand? She must be silenced! Lord knows Roxanne doesn't want her self-loathing misogyny, or the hateful closed-minded intolerance that permeates her community, to see the light of day. It might make all that independent-ish thought of theirs start to look a little less truthy than it does now.

But too bad; in an act of genuine independent journalism, as opposed to the faux-journalism of TRS and the ideological thuggery of Roxanne Cooper, we present Alison's expose on the den of woman-hating that is The Raw Story.–DE

The misogyny that dare not speak its name

Raw Story recently wrote an article attributing statements made by members of the Reddit community "The Red Pill" to men's rights activists. Although these statements were not made by self-identified men's rights activists, they were also not very controversial—amounting to tips to avoid being crime victims–unless viewed through the feminist lens that women can't consent to sex while drunk.

In an amusing twist, feminist Amy Schumer recently gave a speech in which she detailed having sex with a man so drunk or incapacitated he was going in and out of consciousness. Instead of stopping it and trying to ascertain if her partner actually was consenting or running on autopilot with no clue who he was engaging with sexually (even him calling her by another name didn't give her pause) she apparently allowed her egotistical impulse to be seen as desirable by a high status male to dictate her actions.

Now if having sex with drunk people is automatically rape than Amy Schumer is a rapist. A much-lauded-by-other-feminists rapist.

In the comments on The Raw Story, I called out this feminist double standard. After five hours of commenting and having moved far from the original topic, I was banned permanently from commenting at Raw Story.

Not after calling out Raw Story and feminism's double standard regarding rape–but after I engaged in the greatest sin of all: Calling out feminist misogyny.

Here's a transcript of the exchange prior to my banning:

Bagelsan
It's adorable how there's always that one random female MRA running around, desperately bleating anti-feminist talking points. Does she think that will make the boys like her? Is she 10-years-old? Is she going to wake up hungover [sic] and regretting the whole sordid thing? Is she ever going to realize that bending over backwards to prove that she's not an icky feminist will result in zero respect from anyone, male or female? Is she ever going to get over her hate-crush on Amy the comedienne?
Truly a mystery for the ages. Let's watch. [image]

Alison Tieman
A feminist!
Did she take a rational look at the evidence–both for and against–before concluding that women are oppressed or does she simply assume it based on her unexamined and unconscious misogynist belief that women are "acted upon" and men "actors."
Will she ever realize that her persecution complex is what's oppressing her?
Let's find out. XD

Bagelsan
Actually, it's a funny story: a little handbook came along with my vagina, which laid out all the tenets of feminism to me at a young age. Did you not read yours?

Alison Tieman
I certainly did. And then I looked at the publication notice on the edition page.
It said "Church and State press."

Bagelsan
Oh, you got the goofy one. No wonder you're confused! Mine was pretty straightforward, and basically said that people shouldn't rape each other and that men shouldn't act like assholes to women and vice versa, and so on. But I did hear there was a publication error that got some women awfully mixed-up… I think your edition instructs you to obsessively repeatedly link to random YouTube videos? That's a doozy of a typo.

Alison Tieman
Ah so you're a representative of "Church and State Press."
Sorry, I'm just not buying your product anymore. It's not about equality, it's about selling women a persecution complex that turns them into terrified sheep.

Bagelsan
You don't agree that people shouldn't rape each other? Because that's all I'm "selling" here.

Alison Tieman
I don't agree that most people need feminists to tell them not to rape each other. In fact it's time for "most people" to tell feminists to knock their rape apologia off.

Feminist Amy Schumer gives widely acclaimed speech in which she confesses to sexually assaulting her male sexual partner:

http://thoughtcatalog.com/anonymous/2014/05/wait-a-second-did-amy-schumer-rape-a-guy/

Feminist Mary Koss scrubs male victims of rape by women from government statistics:

http://youtu.be/0ncjGFIFPJI

Feminist Professor Adele Mercier engages in rape apologia directed at male victims:

http://youtu.be/PBNQPJ0UTCg

Feminist Jaclyn Friedman fails to call out fellow feminist rape apologist:

http://youtu.be/o4hgQm5fV2I

Feminist groups block or remove men's protections against rape by female sexual predators.

http://toysoldier.wordpress.com/2013/03/06/a-sad-day-for-male-rape-victims-in-india/

In addition to all that feminists promote campaigns that demonize male by presenting them as more likely to be rapists than rape victims despite all the evidence to the contrary!

Bagelsan
Oh dear, the copy paste is back. You should sue whoever misprinted your vagina-book; that technique is not very persuasive.

Alison Tieman
Vagina book? Seriously, you're reducing me down to my genitals?
Tell me, Bagelsan, have you given any thought to the counter argument against women being oppressed by men?

Bagelsan
Let me guess, is it that women are oppressing men? Or are you still stuck on that tired old myth that "patriarchy" means "all men"?

Alison Tieman
Answer the question or simply walk away.

Have you given any thought to the counter argument against women being oppressed by men?

Bagelsan
Look, ma'am, I've heard and considered lots of so-called "counter-arguments" to the straw-position of all-men-oppress-all-women or whatever you think feminists believe. Have you got a new one, or should I just say that yes, I probably have?

Do you believe that men oppress women more than women oppress men, on average.
I never said "all men oppress women" only "women are oppressed by men." That means a belief that, on average, men oppress women _more_ than women oppress men.

Bagelsan
Well, if you'd read my comment just above you, that question is a bit meaningless, yeah? But sure: all else being equal women face more oppression on account of being women than men face on account of being men. You totally cornered me into saying something not particularly controversial. ;D

Alison Tieman
Have you given any thought to the counter argument to that?

Bagelsan
Are you implying that there's only 1 theoretical counter-argument to that, which I must have either considered in its entirety or not? That's a very limited point of view. I'm afraid I can think of several counter-arguments, but you haven't specified which one I'm supposed to address.

Alison Tieman
Chose what you consider to be the strongest counter argument to the proposition that men oppress women more than women oppress men.

Bagelsan
Then yes, I do think that oppression runs along multiple axes, including race and nationality and socioeconomic status, and that gender interacts dynamically with all of these other factors to create a sort-of meshwork of oppression (you might be familiar with the term kyriarchy) along which people can be found to relate to each other down gradients of power. Saying that "men mostly oppress women" or whatever does little to address this more complex model of human interaction, which is actually something that feminism has been working on quite a bit (with varied success) and which I might posit remains our current greatest weakness as well as our greatest opportunity to really flesh-out and develop our strategies and effect some proper change.

Alison Tieman
That's not an argument against women being more oppressed by men then men are by women, on average.
It's simply stating that race and class based oppression exists.
Try again. Although I have to confess at this point it's looking like you base your belief less on a rational analysis and more on internalized misogyny.

Bagelsan
So you think that "other factors also play into oppression, it is not merely gender or sex-based" is not the best counterargument to the idea that oppression is fundamentally male-on-female? Then what do you consider a more convincing model of human interactions that I should abandon feminism for? I'm fascinated.

It's not the best argument against the idea that men oppress women more than women oppress men. That's because we're not talking about other forms of oppression aside from men oppressing women more than women oppress men so oppression based on other factors are not relevant.
Again, what is your best argument against the idea that men oppress women, on average, more than women oppress men. Without bringing in tangents about other forms of oppression that do not relate.

Bagelsan
Other forms of oppression really, really do relate. And I'm sad (albeit not surprised) that you don't understand that.

Alison Tieman
Do these other forms of oppression change the fact that you believe men oppress women on average more than women oppress men?

Bagelsan went silent at this point

And lo, I was banned from Raw Story promptly after this exchange. Even though I'd been commenting, up to that point, for 5 straight hours calling out feminist double standards towards men and boys.

Apparently when you defend men and boys against feminists as a Men's Rights Activist, that's okay. But when you start defending women and girls against feminist attack?

It's the misogyny that dare not speak its name.

Update SPECIAL Bonus Round: The Raw Story Feminists say the darndest things, exclusively on Honeybadgerbrigade.com!

Yes to men's rights (provided it never actually happens)

Hopeland Cash · 20 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Awareness of men's rights issues is on the rise around the globe. Slowly but surely, the unique plights of men and boys are receiving coverage in the mainstream media, though with varying degrees of positivity. The growth in awareness is not surprising given the clear and logical basis of most issues voiced by the MRM and the dedication of men's rights activists. However, a quiet, veiled obstacle still pervades public discourse on men's issues. In any social circle, even the most rigorously documented and obviously fair calls for social reform will be met with a particular type of evasive response from non-activists.

Most often this occurs when a non-MRA is presented with one of the more basic, less controversial men's issues. Faced with a simple call for change built from well established studies and statistics, they will agree that reform is called for. Of course fathers should have fair time with their children. Of course boys should receive good education. Of course men should have access to birth control options.

However, things get problematic after that initial show of support. No one can argue with bare bricks of logic, so even those who don't believe in men's rights will tentatively agree lest they look as foolish as a climate change denier. Instead of openly disagreeing, they begin tacking on caveats. Like a lawyer adding clauses, a pseudo-supporter adds buts and ifs, saying reform should be made but only under very specific, politically correct and usually pro-feminist conditions.

A good example is paper abortion, the right for men to knowingly terminate their parental rights and responsibilities, disavowing anything to do with an undesired child. When this issue is raised, most fair-minded people will say "Sure, men shouldn't be forced into parenthood". What follows, though, is usually some variation of "…as long as the law doesn't let men duck responsibility."

A similar example is Parental Alienation Syndrome. Often, when an instance of PAS is shared, the response will be agreement that it is wrong in that case, but that in some cases (i.e. abusive partners) it is alright and in the best interests of the child. This is the equivalent of the Don't Be That Guy post campaign, painting all men as potential abusers against whom PAS may be the only defense.

That is where the meaningful conversation ends. If a feminist is asked about paper abortion, there won't be a conversation, but most normal people will politely agree, then shut down the discussion with a tagged on condition that serves only to demand more discussion on the finer legal details of how the reform should be implemented. It is a stalling tactic meant to derail the discussion onto a track of endless debate over how exactly equality should be implemented, rather than working to actually make it happen.

This bureaucratic delaying has left family law reform in the UK languishing for years. On an individual level, most people will agree that fathers get a raw deal post-divorce, and reform is often agreed with, but always with the addendum that the changes shouldn't "give custody to abusive fathers", even though only a tiny minority of divorces include allegations of abuse and that mothers commit twice the abuse of fathers.

Despite abusive fathers being present in only a single-digit percentage of divorce cases, that same argument is always raised, cautioning activists to slow down in case they overstep and put children at risk. This tactic is meant to avert attention from meaningful men's issues toward the phantom dangers of social reform. It is fear mongering used as the last line of defense against men's rights, an impotent barrier erected against the coming tide of reform. These aren't real arguments, but reflexive flailing from pro-feminists desperate for a way to fight back.

This practice is proof that men's rights has advanced past the stage where it can easily be fought. There are no viable arguments against the core MRM issues, so anti-MRAs resort to stalling and derailing, to slowing down the progress of the movement with needless objections. It is little more than filibustering, but it has been going on for years, and not just by feminists.

Gynocentrism runs so deep that even non-feminists, be they liberals or conservatives, balk at the idea of men's rights. In part it is fear of change, but it is also shameless defense of female privilege blocking any attempt to improve the lot of mistreated men and boys the world over. Even when presented with irrefutable facts of injustice, most people will dance around the issue by fishing for minor arguments over details. It is vital that MRAs not get pulled into the quagmire of debate fielded by these faux-supporters; they agree with core men's to save face, but their true opposition is shown by their evasiveness. Even young, unmarried men, possibly the greatest beneficiaries of men's rights, will pipe up with these blocking tactics, so afraid to upset the boat and anger/oppress women.

It's not a matter of "with us or against us" absolutes, but of recognizing that reform is needed and agreeing to get it done. Yes, a poorly written 'paper abortion' law could leave loopholes to be abused by deadbeats, but that risk is no reason to not write a law at all. No one wants a family law system that rewards abusive fathers, and repeatedly raising that concern serves only to defame the activists fighting for reform by implying they don't care about children. With other men's issues as well, no MRA wants reform to come out unfair to women or girls, but to be just for everyone.

Blocking social reform with cries of concern over fallout is the traditional weapon of those with entrenched privilege. Similar attacks have been fielded against every movement for liberation of oppressed races and persecuted religions, and even against the early feminists. People feared women entering the workforce would displace men, and now they fear giving men equal rights will let them run amok abusing women and children.

Major men's issues are far too real to be ignored any longer and activists can't afford to be bogged down by platitudes and diversionary arguments. People who raise such quibbles may not openly oppose men's rights, but they aren't true supporters and will continue to drag their feet every step of the way. They are trend followers who meekly back-up feminism because of its popularity; they will only change allegiances when the MRM has already made real progress. Energy shouldn't be wasted on winning them over.

Instead the focus must be on finding real activists who are willing to challenge the status quo and push boundaries in the name of equality. Feminists will be pushed back and the politically correct lackeys will have to step aside while true activists do the work of abolishing injustice.

When discussing men's rights or recruiting for the cause, remember to pick your battles and always bear one guideline in mind: unless their support for men's rights is continuous and enthusiastic, they don't actually want it.

Julie Schenecker convicted of murders of her two teenage children

Michael Conzachi · 21 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Jury Rejects Ex-wife of Retired Army Colonel's Insanity Plea

Defense Attorney unsuccessfully tries to blame husband.

The Tampa Florida murder trial for 53-year-old Julie Schenecker is now over. A jury has convicted her and she has been sentenced to life without parole.[image]

In January 2011, while her husband, now retired Army Colonel Parker Schenecker was stationed in the Middle East, Julie Schenecker murdered her kids, 16-year-old Calyx and 13-year-old Beau. She shot both in the head at point-blank range, Beau in the car while on the way to soccer practice and Calyx while she did her homework on the computer. For extra measure, Julie sent a second bullet into their heads just to be sure.

After the killings, Julie Schenecker, covered in blood, wandered near the back porch in a Zombie-like trance until police arrived, where she admitted the killings and stated that she did it because her kids were "mouthy." Shortly after the arrest, Parker Schenecker was granted a divorce, (ya think).

When arrested and during the so-called "perp walk," Julie Schenecker shook, twitched and trembled with "bugged out" eyes in front of TV cameras, akin to just departing from an alien spaceship at Roswell. It was apparent that an insanity defense was going to be used, and it was.

Shortly after her arrest and in preparation for the upcoming trial, Schenecker's defense attorney, Edward Brennan blamed her husband Parker, claiming that he was responsible for the deaths as he knew his wife was mentally ill, but did nothing about it.

This site and others like it have numerous stories of men being eviscerated and have been subjected to phony restraining orders for attempting to seek out mental health treatment for their disturbed wives, as this of course causes emotional trauma worthy of court intervention.

Information, testimony and evidence presented in the case reveals that Julie Schenecker has had a long history of mental health issues and several hospitalizations. She was diagnosed as being Bi-Polar along with several other personality disorders and apparently was abusing alcohol and OxyContin.

Damming evidence was introduced at trial of a journal that Julie had been keeping, outlining her murderous plan including evidence that she had purchased the handgun used to execute her kids just days before the tragic event.

Evidence was also introduced of a history of minor traffic accidents on the part of Julie and at least one prior inquiry of child protective services into an allegation that Julie had slapped around Calyx months before, however that inquiry did not lead to the filing or criminal charges or the issuance of a restraining order.

Lots of warning signs and red flags, but the dots were never connected.

A female headshrinker for the defense Dr. Eldra Solomon testified in Hillsborough County Court in Tampa that Julie Schenecker was "insane" at the time she killed her son Beau and daughter, Calyx, that the 53-year-old former Army linguist was off her rocker when she shot dead "execution-style" both her teen-aged children. It's clear she was "off her rocker" but certainly capable of distinguishing between right and wrong.

The jury didn't buy it, found her guilty, and she will spend the rest of her miserable and delusional life behind bars, and may she rot in hell. Too late for 16-year-old Calyx and 13-year-old Beau, two good kids who were good students and good athletes, and who had all of life's treasures before them until they were executed by their mother.

We have seen this time and again in cases of murdering moms where the mental health warning signs were ignored or missed. Or, when concerned husbands or partners tried to get intervention for mental health issues were then subjected to being the recipients of restraining orders for doing so.

None of us can Monday morning quarterback each and every situation, but one must wonder if the gender roles and scenarios were reversed, would mental health and child protective authorities have taken a different path? How many more times will we have to report on a similar tragedy? I'm afraid, way too many.

“We have no agenda,” says Ban-happy Mod on Raw Story

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 21 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Raw Story has banned MRAs and MGTOWs for who they are, sometimes before they even make a single comment. Dannyboy has emailed Raw Story publisher Roxanne Cooper (@AlterRox) and will be sure to add hashtag #rawstory to call out the clear bias exercised against John Hembling (see his response here), Alison Tieman, and Dean Esmay, myself, not to mention many others that dissent from Raw in their comment sections.

Roxanne, in the spirit of independent progressive journalism, was dismissive and presumptuous.

[image]

But that’s not the fun part. Deep in the comment section of the article Raw published with my face, a comment mod called enthous has posted the following garbage after a long string of deleted comments that challenged a feminist reader (See bottom of thread).

Oh no he dinn’t
Go find that comment right now on enthous’ feed, and confirm its existence for yourself under “Men’s rights activists dispute woman’s copyright claim over ex-husband’s suicide note.” It may be deleted later given how dishonest the Raw Story happens to be.

Oh, shoot. I think I just made my ban permanent, if it was not already. The comment policy says this about banworthy offenses (emphasis mine at the end of the paragraph):

> 6. Anything else our moderators, staff or freelancers deem disruptive. We wish this could be a comprehensive list, but we’ve been on the Internet long enough to know that there will always be someone who can some up with some offensive thing we haven’t thought of before. A good rule of thumb is that if you are writing it to piss someone off, stop. If you are trying to trump something offensive someone else said, stop. If the other person “insulted you first,” stop and flag their comment for a moderator and/or email tips@rawstory.com instead of replying with another insult. If the Secret Service would be asking us for your ISP address if they read it, stop. If a little voice in your head says, “The moderators might challenge this,” listen to that voice before submitting the comment.

But forgive me enthous, of course you all don’t want to look like you have an agenda! That’s why you moderate articles that insinuate MRAs advise men on bedding drunk women, where even female MHRAs like Alison aren’t allowed to exist. That’s why you and your buddies ban people pre-emptively. That’s why your policy page expects visitors to read your minds to guess if you’ll approve of their thoughts.

Sarcasm aside, sometimes if you want a job done right, you have to do it yourself. Please either go to the comment section of my video on this subject or the comment section here and say everything the Raw Story would not let you say. I am going to be tweeting Roxanne like a crack-addicted canary with links to this article and my video saying that you are the people she has forcibly silenced.

I ask anyone reading this to tweet the same. Again, the handle is @AlterRox.

Let one thing be very clear: The Raw Story is not a qualified journalistic source. It had several opportunities to write an addendum, an apology, or something to correct the dishonest, sensationalist garbage it pukes out of computer monitors everywhere.

Even if Raw were to post facts from time to time, ask yourself if that alone excuses its denial of discourse based on the fact that you might be correcting something they said about you.

Queen's Journal follows up with Paul Elam

Paul Elam · 21 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Following is another email that I felt was best answered publicly:

Hi Paul,

I hope you're doing well. This is Sebastian Leck from the Queen's Journal. I interviewed you two weeks ago for a feature article we're releasing at the end of this month.

After receiving feedback from my editors, I have a couple follow-up questions for you. Feel free to answer over email – I know you are away until the 23rd.

When did you start following the events at Queen's? Was it after the assault of Danielle D'Entremont or before that?

Given the alarming history of Canadian student's unions, academicians and feminist ideologues undertaking efforts to suppress free speech and harass those practicing it, particularly in regard to men's issues, we have followed events at many Canadian campuses for quite some time, including Queen's. It was not until the news story about the alleged attack on D'Entremont that Queen's became of heightened interest to AVFM.

I will also offer you a respectful correction to how your question is framed. The "attack" on Danielle D'Entremont is alleged, not factually proven. It is not journalistically sound for you to assume anything else.

It is, as far as anyone at this point knows, allegation only, and for reasons that anyone at Queen's Journal will likely never question, a dubious one. .

There has been more than adequate time for a police investigation, which has resulted in no support of her claims. We have a feminist community — along with D'Entremont herself — being conspicuously silent, They have actually withdrawn from the case itself, which leaves me with a question for you and your editors.

Do you actually believe that there is a possibility that a men's activist physically attacked this woman, literally for being a feminist, and the feminist community is not aggressively demanding action and answers? Even a modicum of journalistic integrity demands that you explore this. I have every intention of doing that myself.

Shortly after my return home AVFM, and I hope other men's organizations, will be offering another reward for information about the case. While the reward for the arrest and conviction of her alleged attacker will stand, we will be offering a separate reward for anyone who provides information conclusively proving how, in fact, D'Entremont was injured.

In fact, I will go ahead and take this opportunity to offer a $1,000.00 reward to anyone who can provide conclusive, corroborated proof of how Danielle D'Entremont was injured on the night in question, regardless of how it happened, even if her injuries were self-inflicted. I am also appealing to all other men's rights (or if they prefer men's "issues") organizations to add to the reward fund and to keep adding to it till we reach sufficient money to provide incentive for someone to produce the verifiable truth of what happened.

I have made it no secret that I do not believe she was attacked by an MHRA. I am also very skeptical that she was attacked at all. In short, I think her story warrants great suspicion, and if there is anyone out there who can shed light on actual facts surrounding her allegations, AVFM will pay for that proof.

D'Entremont's allegations, if true, would represent an absolute demand on all members of the MHRM to take pause and consider better ways to further our calls for non-violent change. If false, they represent the very lack of integrity — on a disgusting scale — that we have historically experienced from the feminist community. Either way, I want to get to the bottom of it, and don't intend to stop till I do.

If, after a reasonable period of time, AVFM has not been able to secure answers directly from the people involved, we will hire private investigators to find out what we can.

Now, to your next question.

"We spoke in depth about the language used on AVFM as well as your views on Adele Mercier's comments. However, an objection the Queen's Men's Issues Awareness Society had about the poster campaign wasn't that Adele Mercier's comments were moral or defensible (they strongly disagreed with her), but rather that the posters had targeted her personally by calling her as a "rape apologist" instead of providing details about what she actually said. How would you respond to that objection? Why did AVFM choose to approach the poster campaign in that way?" [bold text his]

We called Mercier a rape apologist because that is what she is, and the facts support it. The lengthy details supporting that are not practical to contain to a single poster, which should be obvious on its face, but they were the subject of thorough examination and comprehensive reporting on my website – and they are proven in Mercier's own words. Mercier issued a shameless public diatribe of rape apologia. The fact that your editors appear curious about anyone speaking to that honestly rather than asking her to explain her conduct is telling.

To be even more frank, I find it quite ironic, as someone subjected to the same type of labeling with no evidence behind it that would survive honest intellectual scrutiny, to even be asked this question by you or anyone else, but for what it is actually worth to you, that is my answer.

Regarding the concerns of QMIAS, I have the following to say. While I support the mission of QMIAS, their opinion of the language used by myself and others at AVFM regarding this case or any other is not relevant.

They are a men's issues group in an environment that is politically and socially hostile to their very existence. I expect them to be forced to use more caution and even be more conciliatory with the bigotry launched at them and organizations like AVFM by ideological zealots. They are more vulnerable to specious allegations in their environment. AVFM is not beholden to anything but the truth and the issues we represent. Those offended by our delivery would be better served to start acknowledging and addressing the problems than in whining about the fact that we are often conspicuously assertive and provocative when we challenge them to do so.

In fact, you might observe that in pursuing this line of inquiry, rather than questioning rape apology being issued by academicians in one of your universities, you and your editors provide a pretty obvious motivator for our tone.

In that light I respectfully advise you that tone concerns are not going to deter us from demanding change or from confronting hate as expressed by ideologues like Adele Mercier in whatever tone we deem necessary.

I am only left with one remaining item that I think will assist you in writing an informative feature piece, should that be your intent. Find out what is going on in your country with regard to gender ideology and decide whether you are going to be a part of the problem, part of the solution or just a credible journalist reporting on it.

If your choice is the latter, please consider your current direction.

I am linking you to an article by Dr. Warren Farrell on events in Canada that have happened since his lecture on issues faced by boys in our culture was met with violence, harassment and the abridgement of free speech at the University of Toronto in November of 2012. Try to disprove anything in it.

If you find what he has written is true, then please examine your questions, and those from your editors again and consider whether you are inquiring from a position of being informed, or of willful, aggressive ignorance.

I wish you good luck with your story.

Kind regards

Paul Elam

Mission Statement

AVFM · 21 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Introduction

The Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is a complicated and often misunderstood social phenomenon. We address a wide variety of issues that affect men and boys — and ultimately women, as well as the culture as a whole. Additionally, there is a great deal of disinformation about this movement on the Internet and in the mainstream media. With that in mind, we offer the following outline of our mission objectives.

Mission Statement

The past 50 years have been a time of remarkable change in the world of western women. With the help of technology and forward thinking, our society has thrown off sex-based expectations for women, allowing them access to the path of self-actualization. We now live in a world where a woman's role in life is one of choice, not a destiny shaped by tradition, determined by biology, or forged in law. This revolution in freedom and identity, however, will not be complete until the same standards find their way into the lives of the average man. The absence of that complementary change in the lives of men has created an imbalance that erodes the autonomy of both sexes. Unless that changes, the imbalance will only worsen.

Freedom from sex-based expectations for just one sex will never result in freedom for either sex. It is simply a foundation of exploitation on which tyranny is built and administered.

As a society, we are already on that path. The noble idea of freedom and equity between the sexes has been corrupted. It has become a malignancy on our social consciousness. What used to be cooperation between sexes is now gynocentric parasitism that inhabits every level of men's existence, from cradle to coffin. The efforts to enhance the rights of women have become toxic efforts to undermine the rights of men.

It is time for a movement that truly favors humanity, not a particular sex. It is time for feminism to fulfill its promise of equality, and to quit making a mockery of it. With that ideal guiding our path, we hereby proclaim the mission of A Voice for Men as "Changing the Cultural Narrative."

Changing the Cultural Narrative

Since the turn of the 21st century, men's advocacy has seen a shift toward changing the cultural dialogue on social and mainstream media. That challenge to popular narratives, so many of them gynocentric and misandric, has amounted to a grassroots effort involving a considerable amount of deconstruction, an effort ultimately in the service of promoting a greater and better range of choices for men.

A stronger emphasis on cultural narratives forms a legitimate second wave of men's rights activity in contrast to the lobbying of legislators and requesting reforms to misandric laws that characterized the earlier advocacy of the twentieth century. It is our understanding that, with few exceptions, laws governing gendered expectations are eventually brought into line with the prevailing cultural expectations.

Such an enterprise is not new. Similar narrative revolutions in religious beliefs and social orientations have happened throughout history, where cultural pressures led legislating bodies, and even individual magistrates, to interpret and draft new laws in the light of said expectations.

For this reason we long ago adopted 'Changing the Cultural Narrative' as the site's byline. This makes a clear statement about what AVfM's mission is and has been since the start, and addresses disinformation spread in some corners of the internet claiming the MHRM, and specifically AVFM, is about lobbying the government for legitimacy and legal recognition. Those claims are about as credible as the SPLC. What they say is simply not true.

AVFM's mission focuses pretty much exclusively on changing the cultural dialogue. We have never lobbied politicians for laws, we don't seek a "Violence Against Men Act," or even changes in divorce and custody law. We admire, report on and support those undertaking such efforts but that is not the same thing as doing them. We are certain, though, that changing the cultural narrative — forcing a new dialogue — opens the door for laws to change in a positive way even if we are not an active part of those efforts.

Our Values

    - AVfM regards gender ideologues and all other agents of misandry as a social malignancy. We do not consider them well-intentioned or honest agents for their purported goals and extend to them no more courtesy or consideration than we would klansmen, skinheads, neo Nazis, or other purveyors of hate. We will educate them where they are willing to learn, but hold them accountable for their ignorance as much as their actions;
    - We take no side at all in partisan political struggles and, after weighing the evidence at hand, generally view all organized mainstream political options as gynocentric;
    - We support and endorse only non-violent reactions to feminist governance and in fact are trying to prevent future acts of violence that feminist governance has already inspired;
    - We oppose gynocentrism in all its forms;
    - We oppose all state authority over or interference in the private lives of consenting adults engaged in any form of interpersonal relationship;
    - We take no stand on religion or lack of religion. We neither endorse nor oppose religious principles.
    - We encourage a greater and better range of choices for men, backed by cultural blessing, as essential to a healthy functioning society.

Dr. Jennifer McIntosh, Anti-Father "Researcher" Humiliated

Robert Whiston · 22 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Jennifer McIntosh is an infamous anti-father "researcher" whose work has helped the family court system abuse millions of children by helping to estrange them from their fathers. Recent work by professional researchers has found that many of her claims are irresponsible if not outright fraudulent, and news of this has finally broken in the mainstream media even as McIntosh runs for cover. Robert Whiston explains. –DE

A few weeks ago the breaking news across the internet was of a crashing McIntosh.

Judging from what you will read below, Bettina Arndt, the highly respected freelance journalist (with a doctorate in psychology to boot) might well have been fighting to get her article critical of McIntosh's 2010 report published (and uncensored) in "The Age" newspaper. But get it published she did.

Bettina Arndt's article has been censored by lawyers hired by McIntosh trying to stifle the story by insisting on redactions – no doubt to save McIntosh's blushes, not to mention her professional reputation and pension. But we can grasp how explosive it was merely by reading the version that was probably heavily edited by the newspaper's legal team.

McIntosh has not endeared herself by outlandish and somewhat juvenile claims concerning what she sees as the motives behind Profs. Warshak and Nielsen who she feels are somehow ganging-up on her ("Professor Richard Warshak – Overnight Care: What Works? and "Professor Linda Nielsen – The Role of 'Woozles' in Custody Law".) Rather than address the points made by the 110 experts, McIntosh is taking it personally and turning to dropping out sneaky remarks to the media about her critics in true "the personal is the political" style.

The inference must be that Warshak and Nielsen are not engaged in academic liberty and the pursuit of truth but instead are playing some sort of "gender warfare" game which is about as far away from science (and the reality) as one can imagine.

But isn't this the epitome of the adage "By their fruits shall yea know them." Isn't this the pot trying to call the kettle black? And who's better placed than McIntosh to know all about that?

> McIntosh'ed at last

McIntosh has finally been "McIntosh'ed" herself by her peers and betters, over claims that "sleepovers" for children under 4 years old is "stressful." What tripe, and it has now been shown to be utter tosh. She's been brought down to earth with a bump by her impudence and some well-directed (and deserved) "Triple A" flak. The question now is, will she go the same way as Flight MH 370? She's killed more people and hurt more families than were on that flight, that's for certain.

In extraordinary shenanigans behind the scenes which are only just emerging, it would seem McIntosh hired lawyers to protect her reputation from (in what she must have judged) total annihilation. One can only speculate, until it is confirmed or not later, that McIntosh shrank away from the danger of what might have been a devastating exposé by a newspaper intent on revealing the truth of what other academics thought of her views.

Much is supposition but what might have also agitated the Melbourne based child psychologist, McIntosh, is the stinging rebuke by her peers and betters. They conclude that McIntosh inappropriately used her study to suggest that any regular overnight care by fathers was damaging to infants and toddlers. Their verdict was that:

- "This study [by McIntosh] provides no reliable basis to support custody policy, recommendations or decisions."

What greater blow to one's ego and reputation can there be than that ?

> The authorised version

In fact, Bettina Arndt wrote two articles on April 28th 2014; one was called, "Empty days, lonely nights" and the second was entitled "Movement on father's overnight access."

The first article referred to a dawning that the accepted belief that children aged under 4 should not stay overnight with their separated or divorced father was wrong-headed. This is the diet that has underpinned the West's family law system for years and Bettina Arndt dared to ask the impertinent but sound question "Has it all been a huge mistake ?"

The second article, "Movement on father's overnight access", highlights the current rethink following the publication of two academic papers and the American Psychological Associations's journal, "Psychology, Public Policy and Law". The one paper by Prof. Richard Warshak is endorsed by 110 leading international experts and the other by Prof. Linda Nielsen describes how the McIntosh study was "woozled" and was misused in custody matters.

- NB. For those like me, not au fait with Woozles, they originated (their etymology) was in 'Winnie the Pooh', where he and his friends become obsessed with the idea that they are being stalked by a frightening beast which they call a Woozle. In fact, they have gone full circle and the 'woozle's' footprints are in fact their own." A 'woozle' in the social sciences is a belief or claim based on inaccurate, partial, or flawed data that is repeatedly misrepresented, misinterpreted or 'woozled' in ways that influence public opinion and public policy. It's a polite way of restating Goebbels' (the master of propaganda), maxim that the successful technique depends on confining itself to a few points and repeating them over and over." [1]

Both Warshak and Nielsen's papers are highly critical of a key 2010 study, i.e. McIntosh's, that found any regular overnight care by fathers was damaging to infants and toddlers, and the worldwide experts challenged the policies espoused by McIntosh in her damaging sorties into UK (the Norgrove report) and Israeli policy making.

The Warshak paper, supported by 110 experts world-wide, said McIntosh's findings should not have been used as a platform for developing public policy in this area. It is this critical paper that McIntosh is now trying to dismiss by calling it nothing more than a "petition." McIntosh's over-confidence meant that she was always 'riding for a fall' and in flat contradiction to the facts (i.e. that her ambition was to alter policy), McIntosh has been forced to draw in her horns by lamely claiming that her research finding should never have been used for making policy:

- " . . . . . McIntosh has told Fairfax Media she pointed out in her research paper that her findings should not have been used for making policy."

Strange then that the whole world and his dog saw it differently.

However, four years after writing her report about her study, in April 2014, in "Parental separation and overnight care of young children: Consensus through Theoretical and Empirical Integration" (published in the Family Court Review), McIntosh examines the current research evidence and acknowledges with the "help" of two co-authors that:

- " . . . . . cautions against any overnight care during the first three years have not been supported".

But that does not undo the damage already done.

Standing in what must have been the teeth of a Force 8 gale from international experts, the weasel words pleadings of McIntosh's lawyer cut no ice with any one in the know:

- "Unfortunately, she cannot control how these conclusions are extrapolated by third parties and then attributed to her. However, it is important to confirm that she is not the source of such extrapolations."

Oh, the poor dear. Given the pandering to publicity she has carefully nurtured and the clear access to the levers of power afforded to her by her coterie, one finds it amazing that she has lacked any alacrity in the stemming of what she might see as slander, libel, skewing and distortion.

Any opinions counter to McIntosh's counted for nought while her policy-making recommendations were in the ascendancy but now some key organisations, such as the Australian Association for Infant Mental Health, are re-evaluating their position. Many of the Family Relationship Centres (FRCs) which offer the compulsory mediation required prior to custody awards made by Australia Family Court are revising their policies and advice to court staff regarding overnight care of infants.

Matt Stubbs, acting Clinical Services Director of "Interrelate" family centres is on record as saying:

- "Given the new positions papers that have recently been published we will be reviewing the literature that we give to parents to help them make the best decisions they can for their children."

Is it any wonder that McIntosh now feels she is under the microscope ?

Feeding frenzy

Given the above and assuming blog readers have absorbed one or both of Arndt's articles, one can imagine the consternation among the McIntosh coterie – for McIntosh has acolytes and is not entirely alone in her views, as my previous articles have pointed out (see below):

1. "Israel gets McIntosh'ed" (May 2012) https://robertwhiston.wordpress.com/2012/05/25/38/
2. "Why McIntosh's work should be ignored" (Dec 2011) http://equalparenting.wordpress.com/2011/12/11/12/
3. "McIntosh's Madness" (Dec 2011) http://robertwhiston.wordpress.com/2011/12/16/34/
4. "Norgrove and McIntosh's 'junk science'" (Nov 2011) http://robertwhiston.wordpress.com/2011/11/24/33/
5. "Australia's Shared Parenting Experiment" (Sept 2009) http://sharedparenting.wordpress.com/2009/09/13/1/

Forensic slaughter

If Bettina Arndt reached anywhere near my conclusions (see URLs above), one can understand why McIntosh was in fear of any such careful and/or public scrutiny of her study. Her coterie are hyper-sensitive to criticisms as I have alluded to before; removing their Keystone totem from their theoretical architecture would collapse their edifice.

In 2007, McIntosh had published a report highly critical of the Australia's Coalition government's shared custody reforms and her 2010 report was along the same lines. She then went on to wreck shared custody plans in the UK as this 'Wicked Witch of the East' turned her attentions northwards to Britain.

It was these two reports (2007 and 2010), that Bettina Arndt had in her critical sights.

Smacks of desperation

According to the grapevine, as soon as McIntosh heard that Bettina Arndt was preparing probably an in-depth story or an analysis of her 2010 study, fear must have gripped her and prompted her to act

And what is the best form of defence – attack.

Among the cerebral corridors one can imagine a re-run of the 'Murdoch and News of the World' panic scenario with a flurry of letters to editors, lawyers, politicians and anyone else she might have known to chime in on her side.

So against that background it would not be beyond speculation to envisage Dr. McIntosh (not even a professor but only a part-time adjunct) on a damage limitation exercise. This began with an assault upon Professor Warshak, describing him as an "impassioned advocate" who was seeking to discredit her and driven by his own political agendas. Dr McIntosh added that her work had been "interpreted in a particular way by fathers' rights groups for some time." So by this she must mean that the 110 experts who endorsed Warshak's paper were fathers' rights advocates.

Duh ! ! Is this latent paranoia, or what ?

Aussie politics

It was Prime Minister John Howard in 2005-06 who advocated a bigger role for fathers in their children's lives but it was the Rudd government which opposed it and began dismantling it when Labor was elected in 2007. Rudd was a few years later stabbed in the back by his political colleague Julia Gillard.

Philip Ruddock, the attorney-general who implemented the 2006 reform neatly summed it up in this way:

- "Our government supported the right of children to contact with both their parents, provided the child is not exposed to any risk.. . .. "Labor has sought to wind that back. They've long been captured by the female lobby determined to retain sole control over their children.

One can reasonably suppose that the 'determined female lobby' referred to was comprised at least in part by McIntosh and her coterie because right out of the blocks in 2007, McIntosh published a report highly critical of the previous governments shared custody reforms when no data had actually had time to be compiled.

So when Labor's new attorney-general (Robert McClelland) was looking to appoint a lead researcher to "review" the subject, McIntosh and her new "pre-schoolers" study, was the obvious candidate. The results were only ever going to be bad news for children's relationships with their fathers and a rolling back to a dark Gothic form of repressive child custody.

Paranoia

So obsessed with her reputation and overwhelmed by the feeling she's been inexorably backed into a corner, McIntosh doesn't realize she is in this process of demeaning herself before the eyes of the academic world and that she has in fact, delivered her own "coup to grace."

McIntosh has tried to exonerate herself and duck the criticisms by reneging on her previous posturing and claiming that her research paper findings should not have been used for making policy:

- ". . . .the conclusions in [her] research were only ever gender neutral, and cautionary only as to frequency of overnight care of infants in particular circumstances." – Fairfax Media

McIntosh unravelling ?

One of the experts who endorsed the consensus paper which opposed McIntosh's alleged findings was Don Edgar, director of the Australian Institute of Studies. He declared himself to be "disturbed" that research findings were used against fathers' access to, and visiting rights with, young children. He went on:

- "Those who endorsed Warshak's careful review paper are not ideologists for men; they simply object to the misinterpretation of data [emphasis added] and its misuse in family law policy.

- "Children need consistent contact to form bonds with fathers and other carers, not just mothers, and lack of early contact denies children both the right to dual parenting and to on-going child support from their fathers."

So clearly he too, Don Edgar, saw McIntosh's study being used by politicians for the formulation of policy and this interpretation was not limited to Civil Rights groups or fathers groups.

For decades now fathers have been targeted for not being consistent in their contact visits with their children (mainly to do with the paying of child support and the type of award given). Across Europe in the region of 40% of children of divorced parents later lose contact with their father. And for decades past all governments, though badly advised by committees packed with feminists groups, have tried to address the issue but to no avail.

The one and only time government got it right, in the English-speaking world, was in Australia. The solution as fathers groups had universally been trying to impress on both politicians and academic alike, could only be shared parenting.

But perversely that same group – though for another reason – now want to call a halt to this progress and consign fathers and children to creatures visited at Zoos – and as infrequently.

It is just possible for McIntosh to snatch victory out of these particular jaws if she continues her redemption; her epiphany; her Damascene conversion.

Diana Bryant, the Chief Justice of Australia's Family Court, is reported as saying that she expected her court's personnel, including judges, family consultants and experts to be familiar with current research, including recent developments regarding overnight care.

If that turns out to be true then there are real signs of a new consensus which could profoundly affect current policies. But will McIntosh give up her spots so easily ?

More feminist propaganda from the BBC – Kirsty Wark's 'Blurred Lines: The New Battle of the Sexes'

Mike Buchanan · 22 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The BBC recently reached a new low in documentary making. Look for the file dated 8 May 2014 in the J4MB YouTube channel:

http://www.youtube.com/channel/UCKhX1c3ow6BrzdzP3ydpeZQ/videos

Kirsty Wark – a relentlessly feminist presenter on Newsnight and elsewhere – presented a fictional world in which misandry doesn't exist, only women suffer from sexism, and more. It was, in short, a deeply sexist programme. Wark interviewed vile women such as Germaine Greer and Laurie Penny and appeared utterly in awe of them, whatever garbage they spouted. Can you imagine such airtime being given by the BBC – or indeed any mainstream television or radio channel in the world – to the issues facing men and boys, which are leading to such poor life outcomes for many? Nor can we.

At 00:43 – 00:58 Wark utters this priceless remark, setting the tone for the hour-long stream of feminist propaganda which was to follow:

> Is there a new culture in which men – and it IS mainly men – seem to think they have the freedom and the right to speak about, write about, and portray women in a derogatory – even abusive – way?

As a statement of female supremacy, that takes some beating. Heaven forbid that men even think they have the freedom or right to hold women accountable for their actions and inactions. The following is a selection of some of the lowlights and highlights. Rod Liddle, a Spectator columnist, made some very sound points, as did an Australian stand-up comedian, Brendon Burns.

1:37 – 1:58 It's time to introduce a hatchet-faced 'journalist'. Laurie Penny talks nonsense.

1:59 – 2:21 Rod Liddle talks sense.

14:00 – 16:07 Sexism in comedy.

16:08 – 18:34 Brendon Burns.

26:12 – 27:50 Women in public life, Twitter threats, blah, blah, blah…

27:48 – 29:34 Rod Liddle speaks of receiving a message in which the sender hoped he'd die of cancer, and another message saying he looked like 'a drug-addled middle-aged lesbian'. Instead of offering sympathy to Liddle, Wark replies with 'That's quite insulting to lesbians!' and Liddle good-naturedly agreed.

29:35 – 31:57 All feminist 'documentaries' must feature at least one hatchet-faced academic. This time we're treated to Dr Clare Hardacre, a linguist at Lancaster University. Not someone you'd imagine going to comedy clubs on a regular basis.

31:58 – 32:50 Rod Liddle talks sense.

32:51 – 35:28. Laurie Penny witters on about 'geek culture', 'geek misogyny', 'nerd culture'…

40:34 – 42:37 Anita Sarkeesian talks nonsense. Anyone wanting to find out the truth about this woman should check out these links:

43:14 – 45:48 Germaine Greer talks yet more nonsense.

54:58 – 55;30 Ditto.

55:31 – 56:06 Laurie Penny drones on again.

56:29 – 56:54 Clip from a video produced by Australian students, which Wark judges 'witty'. The song's lyrics include references to emasculation and castration. Presumably Wark would find a video produced by male students with references to female genital mutilation less 'witty'?

If anyone at the BBC has the slightest interest in the sexism faced by men – although from the evidence to date, nobody at the BBC does – (s)he could start researching with a visit to one of our associated sites, The Alternative Sexism Project.

Conscription is slavery

Jon Gunnarsson · 23 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Romanian.

Quite possibly the single biggest injustice that has been committed and is still being committed against men is military slavery, also known as conscription or compulsory military service. This involves a person (almost always a man) being forced to live in a place his masters choose, usually a cramped room he has to share with fellow slaves. He has to eat what his masters give him and has to obey their orders, even if doing so causes him discomfort, pain, or humiliation. He even has to obey when he is ordered to kill other human beings or to risk his own life. For these services he is paid only a pittance.

Unlike chattel slavery, this servitude is temporary. There are also certain limits to what superior officers may order a military servant to do. But these are differences of degree, not of kind. Conscription and military service are still forced labour, which is a form of slavery.

The Forced Labour Convention of 1930[1], which has been ratified by 177 countries[2], gives the following definition:

> For the purposes of this Convention the term forced or compulsory labour shall mean all work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered himself voluntarily.

Thus, conscription is clearly forced labour. Labour services are exacted from men, who have not volunteered for them, under the threat of imprisonment (or in some cases even execution). But of course governments don't like it if they are limited in exploiting male labour. And so the convention hastens to add a list of exceptions that are not be considered compulsory labour. The first of which reads, > any work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws for work of a purely military character;

In other words, the authors of the convention are fully aware that military service fulfils all the characteristics of forced labour as they have laid them out, but they want to exempt military service. No justification is given for this. No justification is possible.

Many attempts have been made to provide a justification for military service, but none of them stand up to scrutiny. One argument states that protection against foreign invasion is so important a task that it cannot be left to volunteers. Everyone has the duty to to defend his homeland, so every able-bodied man should be compelled to do his part.

While protection against invasion is certainly important, there are a great many goods and services which are of much greater importance, but still get done by voluntary labour. No one has to be conscripted for baking bread or building houses, and yet there is no shortage of bread or houses.

If the army does not find enough volunteers, it can do what any employer does when faced with the same problem: offer higher wages or better working conditions. If more important industries such as agriculture and construction can do without slave labour, then so can the army.

Another popular argument asserts that conscription improves the moral character of the army since a conscript army is based on the principles of solidarity, equality, and brotherhood. Because everyone is conscripted regardless of education and class, the army gets access to the brightest and most talented young individuals the country has to offer. In contrast, a professional army is a band of mercenaries and will attract primarily uneducated and unsavoury people.

But this is complete nonsense. One could advance the same argument for slavery in any industry. ("If we free plantation slaves, only dumb brutes will pick our cotton. Slavery is important to foster a spirit of equality and camaraderie!") Any industry wants to have bright and talented employees and there's no good reason to privilege the army in this way. A professional army has the massive advantage that only those people join who actually want to be soldiers. Conscripting everyone not only causes tremendous suffering, but also pulls people away from other occupations for which they have greater talents and are more motivated to excel in.

The last refuge of the supporters of conscription is practicality. Maintaining a large professional army during peacetime is prohibitively expensive. To solve this problem, they propose a small standing army of professionals supplemented by a large reserve of conscripts who receive a few months or years of basic training, after which they return to civil life and can be called upon in case of war.

It is indeed inefficient to have a large standing army, but that is not actually an argument in favour of conscription. It is perfectly possible to achieve the same result with voluntary contracts. The army can hire reservists, i.e. people who receive basic training and then go back to civil life. They are paid a small annual or monthly sum in exchange for being obligated to work as soldiers in case of war. Such a scheme would mean that the army is forced to pay market prices for labour, which is of course more expensive than slave wages.

This cost must always be paid, but in a war fought with conscripts, a disproportionate amount of that cost is borne by the involuntary soldiers. So rather than fostering solidarity and equality, conscription actually generates inequality. Conversely, having the army pay this price is less unequal because the full cost is spread out over all tax payers. This may still be unjust because people who are opposed to the war are forced to pay for it, but at any rate it is less unjust than forcing millions of men to donate their labour and risk their lives.

Moreover, massive armies of barely trained infantry are a relic of the past. Today's wars don't require large numbers of warm bodies, but highly trained specialists using advanced equipment. Missiles, bombers and carriers don't require very many people to operate, but those people need to actually be well-trained. The only real use for large infantry regiments is the occupation of foreign countries and the suppression of domestic rebellions. And improving the army's ability to do that seems to me a big negative.

Thus, we can see that conscription is not only immoral, but also economically inefficient. You may have noticed that I did not stress the one fact that most MRAs bring up first: gender equality. The reason for my neglect is that it is merely a side issue. The important point is that conscription is reprehensible and would be no less so if women were also conscripted.

Two wrongs do not make a right. Unfortunately, many MRAs are so blinded by the slippery concept of equality that they endorse the idea that conscription should be either abolished or extended to women, as though both were an acceptable outcome. For example, the National Coalition for Men (NCFM) has filed a lawsuit against the U.S. Selective Service system[3]. In it, the NCFM is, > calling for the Selective Service to stop discriminating against men and women by requiring both men and women to register for the draft, or by requiring neither to register for the draft.

This view is abominable. Slavery doesn't suddenly become acceptable because everyone is equally enslaved. Our case must rest on a general opposition to conscription. Bringing about gender equality in this area by also forcing conscription upon women would be more unjust than the current systems because it extends the injustice of conscription on an even greater part of the population. Someone who prefers a state of universal conscription to one of male-only conscription is not a supporter of men's rights, but rather an enemy of women's rights.

Aside from being morally reprehensible, it is also questionable whether demanding equality in regard to conscription (i.e. the view that either both or none of the sexes should be conscripted) makes sense from a strategic point of view. A popular view asserts that demanding equality is merely a ploy to achieve the abolition of conscription and that faced with the two choices, governments will opt to get rid of conscription to avoid the public outcry over women being forced into military service.

But this is a spurious objection. The very fact that there exist countries where women are also conscripted is a strong indicator that female conscription is not necessarily abhorrent to the general public. There is a very real chance that this ploy will backfire and lead to extending conscription rather than abolishing it. One also has to take into account that female conscripts will most likely do easier and less dangerous work than their male counterparts, so there won't be many women returning in body bags who might spark public outrage.

Appealing to gender equality instead of liberty and justice is a dangerous path to take because most people still believe that women are disadvantaged. By focussing on equality, this becomes a matter of men versus women. In this arena, it is very difficult to sway public opinion in favour of men. Supporters of conscription can argue that this inequality is compensated by other disadvantages women supposedly have, such as lower income, doing unpaid domestic work, and generally living in a patriarchal world. The limited success that the MRM has had so far shows how difficult it is to convince the public of the errors of these arguments.

The more promising approach is a principled and general opposition to conscription. The general public is much more receptive to appeals for justice and freedom than to appeals against misandry. It is a sad fact that most people are only concerned with male suffering if it isn't explicitly male, but just general suffering. Under the influence of the MRM, this will hopefully change one day. But until then, millions of men around the world are being kept in military slavery. For their sakes, we must use the most effective ways of swaying public opinion.

If Only Society Was More Like Whoopi Goldberg

Tom Voltz · 23 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As some of you may be aware, Whoopi Goldberg has received backlash, from both feminists and traditionalists alike, after voicing her opinion on Solange's elevator brawl with Jay Z. If you are not familiar with the story, you can view her original comments here and her later clarification here.

Her opinion can be summarised as "Men should, and do, have the basic human right of self defence, even if his attacker is a woman".

You'd think that most reasonable people would agree with her on this. Nevertheless, some people seem to disagree:

How these people can be so blind is amazing to me. It's as if they simply can't see how problematic the implications of their attitudes are and how far from anything that could legitimately described as "equality" they are. All because they have been indoctrinated by the mindless mantra that has been drilled into everyone, especially boys, for centuries, perhaps longer: "You never hit a girl".

Well, as a lot of people are finally waking up and saying, that's nothing but a load of total rubbish. The simple fact is that there are situations where a man hitting a woman is completely acceptable and indeed, even appropriate. Gender equality is not achieved by giving women special social and legal protection from physical retaliation when they decide to initiate a physical attack on a man. It wouldn't be fair if men could do it and t's not fair that women can do it. This is an attitude that needs to disappear from our culture if true equality is ever to be achieved. Until then, all this promotes is an entitled and bullying attitude from those women who are unscrupulous enough to take advantage of it, and prevents men from exercising their right of self-defense. People need to get used to the idea that, regardless of sex, if you hit someone you had better be prepared for them to hit you back, and if that's something you find unacceptable then don't hit anyone!

Of course, I'm not by any means advocating that anyone, of either sex, attack anyone. On the contrary, the initiation of violence is, in almost all cases, abhorrent. However, self defense is a different matter altogether, and has long been considered a right under both UK (including the Commonwealth) and US law. It is also arguably considered to be a fundamental human right under Article 3 of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

You may choose not to take advantage of it, depending on the situation, but the option to defend yourself from attack should always be open to you, regardless of your sex, or that of your attacker. If a man is being physically attacked by a woman he should have every right to defend himself and that includes fighting back to neutralize that threat, not just blocking any blows that he can and hoping his attacker eventually gets tired and goes away, which is what men are currently limited to at the moment.

Now THAT is equality. Equality of rights and equality of responsibility. These two (rights and responsibilities) must go hand in hand or all we end up with is socially and legally endorsed bullying and abuse. Physical abuse in this case.

Feminists are fond of bandying around the phrase "Feminism is the radical notion that women are people" and are very quick to point the finger when they think they are getting a raw deal. I'd argue that feminism is no such thing but I do of course agree that women should be afforded the same rights and be treated with the same level of respect as men. However, they don't seem to be too bothered about applying their standard to themselves when the same motto demands that they take responsibility for their actions. They want to benefit from the freedoms and privileges that come with being treated as an adult but they don't want to be held responsible for their actions like other adults. The phrase “Have your cake and eat it too.” comes to mind.

What is it with feminism and double standards? Often it seems like double standards are the only standards they have.

However, feminism is not itself to blame for this “never hit a girl” attitude, it’s been around for waaaay longer than feminism. Sure, feminists are more than happy to take advantage of it and use it for their own ends, but the blame for initiating and maintaining it falls squarely on the head of gynocentrism, just as so many of the other problems facing men and boys do.

This is why it was not just feminists but also white knighting traditionalists who were critical of Whoopi Goldberg’s comments. Although they may seem, on the surface, to be unlikely bedfellows, both of those groups are gynocentric to the core and two sides of the same coin. This is why whenever resistance to gynocentrism is voiced in the media (rare that it is), you will often see these two groups voicing eerily similar talking points and the backlash over Whoopi Goldberg’s comments is an excellent example of this.

So here’s to you Whoopi. Well done for having the intelligence, integrity, and courage to see through the gynocentric BS and for speaking out in favour of true gender equality, despite the backlash you were inevitably going to receive for it.

All of us here at Men’s Rights Sydney are giving you a standing ovation and, if you are ever in Sydney, there’s a frosty beer here with your name on it.

Ex-PUA Elliot Rodger commits mass-murder; Establishment attacks all non-feminists

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 24 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: A deranged lunatic named Elliot Rodger appears to have recently committed a horrendous and despicable mass murder. Predictably, the Men's Human Rights Movement is being blamed by many. In addition to an open smear by The Daily Kos, at this writing smear campaigns are being conducted in the comments sections at Jezebel and the SPLC, and we expect more attacks on our community in the next couple of days; an angry ex-PickUp Artist (PUA) recently committed an atrocity, so human rights advocates are to blame? The level of doublethink here is high; much of the MHRM is skeptical and critical of the PUA community, and most of the PUA community is anti-MHRM. But still, while simultaneously conflating "PUA" with "MRA" (which is is already an apples-and-oranges comparison), the irony is that this murdering scumbag was an Ex*-PUA, and a member of an Ex-PUA community that ejected him for his psychotic violent ramblings, as reported by Forbes. Yet still, somehow, any people critical of feminism or gynocentrism in general are to blame. We think Fidelbogen explains why this is very well. –DE*
This article is also available in Portuguese.

The Daily Kos, a widely-read political left journal, has recently published the following article. Read it carefully, but bear in mind that the Daily Kos is a well-known reactionary bastion of the SJW (social justice warrior) tribe.

This journal is a mouthpiece of the feminist Establishment if ever there was, and here we see the maxim borne out, that feminism cannot tolerate the existence of people who are not feminist. Mind you, the Daily Kos does not clearly confess to being a feminist publication, but presumptuously saddles you, the reader, with the burden of figuring this out. Okay, fine. If they will not be forthcoming about their feminism, then I will have no choice but to LABEL them.

The Daily Kos article is purportedly about the mass-shooter Elliot Rodger, but that is only on the surface. The political subtext goes far deeper.

It is probably a safe bet that Elliot Rodger is not a feminist. Yes, I'd fearlessly wager my life savings on that.

But additionally, if you have read the article, you will know that Elliot Rodger is a mentally unstable chump with serious issues, apparently of a sexual nature. You will know that he has been a reader of "PUA" and "manosphere" literature on the internet. Consequently, you will know that he makes the ideal poster kid for every feminist's idea of a politically outspoken non-feminist person.

Anybody with any sense can tell you that non-feminist people number in the billions, and that all moral generalizations about them are simply irresponsible. They are not an organization, not a "movement", but simply a demographic – and incidentally, the majority of the human race. As such, they make a cross-section of human nature. Let that be noted.

But mark my words, the feminist Establishment will capitalize on this tragedy to slander the majority of the human race – the part that is not feminist. They will waste no time trotting out comparisons to Marc Lepine and George Sodini, and as the Daily Kos article does, they will depict non-feminist men and women as members of the PUA (pickup artist) cult. Weird as it sounds, they will try to brand non-feminist men and women as "a nebulous group of pickup artists and misogynists who have found each other online" – never mind how freaking bizarre it is to paint the majority of the human race that way!

But friends, that is how feminism rolls. And their behavior is not hard to decipher, not hard at all. They are making Elliott Rodger a propaganda stand-in for any non-feminist person who is outspokenly critical of feminism.

Now listen closely, because this is where it gets tricky. We have no evidence yet that Elliott Rodger was anything but apolitical in regard to feminism as such. He was not outspoken about feminism, and he apparently had nothing say about male human rights in an ideological way. He was by no stretch an intellectual with an "analysis". He was only a sexually frustrated chump with mental issues, who apparently “hooked up” with PUA literature, and websites like “the Manhood Academy”.

And yet, the feminist journal Daily Kos deliberately links Elliott Rodger with anybody, anywhere, who dares to speak his or her mind critically about feminism. How do they do it? Simple. They tag Rodger and his activities with the label “men’s rights”. In the minds of the Daily Kos audience, that is enough to justify a cultural lynching of the entire politically activated non-feminist population. Chillingly simple, isn’t it?

Notice that I used the phrase “politically activated”. That means, that if you are a nice little non-feminist chump and don’t stick your head above the parapet, then you won’t catch any of the propaganda machine-gun fire.

Yes, if you are a nice little non-feminist chump, you will not end up like Warren Farrell or Janice Fiamengo. But if you won’t keep your mouth shut, they will clump and tar you with this Elliot Rodger guy, and put you on the Southern Poverty Law Center hate watch list.

Again, if you are a good little non-feminist, and if you act meek and humble, they will leave you alone and not shove you into the same tar barrel with Marc Lepine and George Sodini and this Elliot Rodger guy.

Yes, they will leave you alone.

For now, anyway.

Little RED tic-tacs

Jack Outis · 24 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Year 2005. I am waiting at a law firm for my appointment. Two women talking at the office next door, one is the lawyer, the other the client. Their door is almost open. They can't see me but I hear everything they say.

Long story short, a guy had been hired by a company but he quit the job to go work with the competition and the first employer wanted to get back at him. This is the most meaningful part of their conversation,

Client: I want you to sue him for breach of contract

Female Lawyer: Won't work, he quit before he signed

Client: I know, I just want him to run out of money & suffer. Just find a way…

The client was an older lady in her early sixties and her words stuck in my mind, like an ear worm:

> "I know it does not make sense I just want him to run out of money and suffer"

My lawyer arrived and interrupted my listening but even later that day I kept thinking about those words the older woman said, the same night I wrote that sentence on a piece of paper and took a good long look at its sheer cynicism.Then the translation hit me,

ORIGINAL: "I know it does not make sense I just want him to run out of money and suffer"

TRANSLATION: "Rules don't apply to me, I just want to be right"

I tried other translations but I kept coming back to the first one

"Rules don't apply to me, I just want to be right"

I then started to imagine the woman at the law firm with those words inside, idea "bubbles" coming from her head when she was silent (or about to give a nonsensical answer). I applied the same "bubbles" idea to unscrupulous divorced wives in family courts then to feminists then to demagogues. It was a near perfect match every time.

When it comes to feminists, it's not what they say that counts, it's what they do–and their actions are perfectly expressed by the words,

> Rules don't apply to me, I just want to be right"

The reality is that I didn't know the guy they wanted to sue and I shouldn't have cared – after all, law bends to the one that has the most money. But her words kept bothering me, for no apparent reason. It was like a tiny tic-tac sized pill-idea that had gone into my mind that kept growing and bothering me until it exploded into frustration. Then I had to sit down to reason over it. Why did it work like that? Why did I have to sit down and reason something so visceral?

Some toxic people are very talented at crafting those little tic-tac bits of psychological poison. In an odd way, when I listened to those women's conversation, I became that old lady's forever-unknown poison collateral. Unfortunately, toxic women like her exist everywhere. Even more unfortunate are those who befriend or marry them along with their daily poison.

Here's another perfect example of that kind of daily poison: a rich guy in his 60's who was at a cocktail party (at his house) was talking about his collection of sports cars to his friends and his (very) hot twenty-something wife, whom he'd had had an argument with earlier that day. He was eagerly talking about his passion for his cars, and when the hot wife got fed up with the car talk and she just "casually" said the following before going for a drink, "before I met you, all my boyfriends had trucks."

> …before I met you, all my boyfriends had trucks.

Let that sink in…

That sentence is a carefully crafted, deliberately poisonous tic-tac sized idea intentionally designed to look innocent, but will do enormous delayed damage. Why would she say that? Why did she make that far-fetched comment when they were talking about sports cars? What did the past boyfriends have to do with it (if anything at all)? You can read too much or too little into it, but my belief is that cars are a metaphor for sexual performance for some people, especially power/status-hungry people – in which case she told her husband (in front of his friends) the following;

ORIGINAL*"…before I met you, all my boyfriends had trucks"*

TRANSLATION: My past boyfriends fucked better than you.

In case the husband had reacted she could have easily said "But, baby, it was just a comment…" which means she could have used that form of plausible deniability but the poisonous meanings of the tiny sentence were clearly deliberate and multi-layered.

Add to that she was smoking hot, the guy was in his 60s and not very good-looking, but rich. Imagine the nightmare of living with someone who is actively using psychological warfare against you day in and day out. Imagine having to gulp down 20 or more of those venomous tic-tacs every week. That has to wear you down. It is psychological warfare in its pure form of deliberate, concise, pre-planned attrition.

The Male Lego Mind

Like many men, as a child I loved Legos, and that possibly led to math and logic, then what I do today for a living. Most likely I am one of millions men with those neurological male traits; seeking logic in things, even if it looks like a waste of time, including feminism. Very often, we males (and a few odd women) want to find out how things work even if it seems a waste of time. Perhaps for those reasons it was important for me to understand why, for no apparent reason, this sentence had bothered me:

"Rules don't apply to me, I just want to be right"

The statement above is in itself an unreasonable position. Why? Because you are openly disrespecting the rules and on top of that you are cynically imposing your ego as a false justification; it means it's not about logic, it means you just "want to be right." Be it for a males or females, for yourself or others, saying you want to cheat because your ego says so is morally irrational. The short answer is that the sentence bothered me because trying to rationalize something morally unreasonable is 50% of the headache.

So what is the other 50%?

That is the "tic-tac" effect, which is a term from a comedian suggested to me by Dean Esmay. In a nutshell it describes how some toxic women, during arguments, have mastered the art of inserting a tiny "tic-tac-sized" idea into a male's mind to foster psychological warfare. I suggest watching the video while remembering the few (or many) toxic women you've had in your life. That, and the male reaction he illustrates, is exactly what makes it worth watching. Even if you don't like this particular performer, watch it, and see how much of yourself you see in it, along with what you remember of interpersonal verbal conflicts you've been involved in that you've lost and never understood why you lost.

Cures for a Poison

We already know the problem – the poisonous tic-tac ideas crafted by feminists in their little Candy Factories of Doom – but what is the cure or the prevention? What are the choices for us men to react to verbally poisonous women who spew hateful misandrist garbage? Possibly, it boils down to 3 choices

1. Play it macho and help her damage you
2. Try to prove her wrong logically
3. Give her RED tic-tacs

1. Play "Macho"

How do we men defend ourselves against those poisonous tic-tacs given to us by hateful feminists? Well, Warren Farrell put it best:

> "The weakness of men is the facade of strength; the strength of women is the facade of weakness." –The Myth of Male Power

The men who are unfortunate enough to try to reason with misandrists, or worse, choose a toxic sociopath as a partner, never see her as flawed. On the contrary, a man will sometimes excuse every fault and defect he sees in a woman. To him she is not poisonous at all. He will defend her and play macho every time she attacks him. We have all been there. The more you play it tough, the more you're drinking the poison and declaring victory.

"Ha! I eat those tic-tacs with every meal…I am a tough dude!"

Sure, "every meal," – that constitutes the undetected problem. It's not "a little poison" once a year, no, it is a continuous daily supply of venom. And you're bragging about it. The more you play macho, the more you are placing yourself at the mercy of a sociopath, and the more you place yourself at her mercy, the more long-term damage you will accrue.

How many weeks or years are we talking about?

How how much daily colorful shaming can a macho take?

How much anger and stress can that macho version of you take?

Infinite?

The more you take the macho stance, the more vulnerable you become in the long-term, and the more background (personal/emotional/financial) info you give to her in those seemingly quiet moments of reconciliation–and the more tic-tacs she is actively making in the background of her mind for you to swallow any time you eventually disagree again. The more often you just absorb the poison, the worse it gets, and either you do what she wants you to do and you lose and feel frustrated and ashamed, or if it's a personal relationship the more you're likely to pay the ultimate price: break-up/divorce. Yes, she will turn the relationship into a hostage situation and charge you all costs and penalties as ransom, all for a dead hostage.

Sure, a "macho" go will always say he is "invulnerable," which only proves Warren Farrell's logic,

"A man's biggest vulnerability is the illusion of his absolute strength"

Truth is, she will get you by attrition. Logic does not matter, morals do not matter, what she wants is to be right or, in other words;

"Rules don't apply to me, I just want to be right"

2. Try to Prove Her Wrong

How many times have you asked yourself in the middle of an argument "Why does she keep coming back to the same point!?" Then you calm down, try to explain very patiently to her the reasons, and then… she goes back to square one. Then you explain again, and take more time to explain even more patiently and then… she goes back to square one. Over and over again like a relentless mindless machine. You can spend days or weeks explaining with the best logic you are able to express and she will do the same thing over and over. Guess what? Often times you are just frustrated, sick and tired and you just end up doing what she wanted. But, why?

Because her point, from the beginning, was to "be right," not to reason with you. She got you by attrition.

Logically she will not win every time and in those cases when you explain the reasons to her and there are people present she will have to "agree." Of course, "agreeing" means she will be busy in the back of her mind making a new batch of extra poisonous tic-tacs for you, always with a smile. Or, in other words.

"Rules don't apply to me, I just want to be right"

That means you may have won in front of people but she will keep the grudge and put you in her to-do list. Later on, she will get you by attrition – just wait, she will eventually get to it. It is sad but true, our usual male way of reasoning problems does not count, all that counts is her "being right."

Even worse, when it comes to your partner, often times you are cornered because they threaten you with break-ups, divorce and debt – again, the relationship becomes a hostage/bargaining chip. Your only real choice is to get out with as much of your dignity as you can, and never go back.

But, at least when it comes to debating feminists, there are other choices–such as "RED tic-tacs."

3. Giving Them RED Tic-tacs

"I offer my opponents a bargain: if they will stop telling lies about us, I will stop telling the truth about them"

— Adlai E. Stevenson II

This isn't relationship advice. Playing the game this way in a relationship will make you a psychopath. But if you're out in the world trying to reason with misandrists, you are almost certainly dealing with people regularly who are dealing in this same sort of psychological warfare.

So let's get this out-of-the-way: we don't offer bargains. This is about telling the truth about them to FTSU. Also, let's say it openly, RED tic-tacs: let's call it Really Effective Directness. RED tic-tacs are designed after the model of poisonous tic-tacs used by feminists. Why? Because we have to learn to think like the enemy and use their weapons against them. RED tic-tacs also have a delayed effect, and will sooner or later explode into the feminists' emotions. With a monumental difference; RED tic-tacs are based on truth, not lies, honesty not threats, legitimate questions not illegitimate ones.

Let's compare,

Ingredients for a Poison tic-tac:

- indirectness
- demagogy
- lies
- ego+narcissism
- implications
- libel
- hypocritically correct
- seeks concealment

As a result we have a poisonous tic-tac that

- Is indirect
- Relies on demagogy/ emotions
- Relies on lies
- Services the speaker's ego and narcissism

- Relies on implications and unreasonable quetions
- Allows the use of libel
- Is hypocritically correct through PC-ness
- Seeks concealment of its lies

Whereas:

Ingredients for a RED* tic-tac:

- directness
- reasoning
- truth
- universal human values
- factual
- brutally honest
- seeks exposure

As a result we have a RED* tic-tac that

- Is direct
- Relies on reasoning
- Relies on truth
- Services universal human values
- Relies on statements or reasonable questions
- Only allows the use of facts
- Its purpose is to be brutally honest
- Seeks exposure of its own facts and the opposition's lies

RED tic-tacs are much harder to craft, because you have to research and think before crafting them, but since they tend to be short and brutally honest you just save a lot of time otherwise wasted in political correctness babble.

I could give you flowcharts, theory, and formulas, but all that is boring. Nothing is better than a real-life example from a truthful, talented and unapologetic speaker. And I will give you a practical, real-world example.

Here is the setting; after a comedy show has ended, people are having drinks and relaxing, and the leading comedian is friendly and talks to some of the audience members. Then a feminist approaches the comedian and tries to engage him with 3-4 poison tic-tacs about some jokes he made in his act. This is all on video. Notice the camera is rolling and people are having drinks while listening. Have popcorn? Here we go:

Feminist: "You know? I don't like the way you talk about women. You do comedy but I do a lot of sex talk and I work mostly with tragedy, you may laugh but you aren't gonna get any material from me tonight. I do make fun of clownish dumb men… HEY LOOK AT ME IN THE EYES WHEN I AM TALKING TO YOU!"

Male comedian: OH YEAH? I was thinking, stop the intimidation techniques, I am allowed to think, you cannot control me. –Raises voice considerably– DON'T TRY TO GO AROUND CONTROLLING PEOPLE, YOU ARE AN OUT OF SHAPE OLDER WOMAN AND YOU WANT TO CONTROL PEOPLE BECAUSE YOU ARE AN UNHAPPY PERSON. DON'T TRY TO TELL ADULTS WHAT TO DO, THAT IS NOT HOW YOU COMMUNICATE WITH ADULTS. YOU WANT TO CONTROL PEOPLE, THAT IS WHY YOU WERE TELLING ME TO LOOK AT YOU IN THE EYE, BECAUSE YOU ARE INSECURE. YOU ARE INSECURE BECAUSE THE FIRST THING YOU DO WHEN YOU COME AND TALK TO ME IS TALK ABOUT YOUR ACT, YOU YOU YOU AND YOU. HOW ABOUT TALKING TO OTHER PEOPLE LIKE HUMAN BEINGS. HAVE YOU TRIED THAT?

Feminist: Hey please lower your voice, you don't know m..

Male Comedian: I DON'T NEED TO KNOW YOU! YOU NEED TO HEAR THE TRUTH ABOUT YOURSELF! Besides, I already got material out of you.

That male comedian used a barrage of RED tic-tacs in pure direct language. Zero politeness by using the facts he saw about that feminist. What did she do in response? She tried to conceal the fact she was being exposed (she even threatened him physically, but that backfired even worse. Plus, when a hypocrite tells you to "keep it quiet" you know you are hitting where it hurts.

The comedian didn't need to lie, or be polite. He was just brutally honest and exposed her and her actions while she desperately sought concealment. The best thing is that it all was captured on video–and that is the trick, because that night, that insecure feminist went home with several RED tic-tacs bouncing inside her head, and you know the next morning she saw herself in the mirror and remembered the comedian's hurtful, truthful words over and over – and is possibly still reflecting on them to this day.

Then she probably found out about the 2.1 million views her impulsive babble got:

That is a lot of delayed emotional explosions inside her head. (By the way, this is a good time to remember the ABR rule–always be recording.)

When you are engaging most feminists, you are in many ways getting heckled by her. Therefore it is your responsibility to respond with brutal honesty, intelligence, zero politeness and complete self-restraint like said comedian. Always record your exchanges, and if you lose the exchange, watch it to learn until her babble does not upset you (yes it is possible but not easy). If you won, watch it to learn – chances are you still made mistakes, nobody is perfect.

Be as Cool as a Tall Glass of Icy Water

Even the most effective weapon is useless if the user has no training. If you plan on making RED tic-tacs you have to learn how to deliver them, otherwise you will fail. Again, If you cannot control your emotions, you will fail at delivering RED tic-tacs.

Delivery is key, and in this case we also happen to take cues from the enemy. How? Well, the delivery of the RED tic-tacs is the polar opposite of the delivery used by feminists. Let's compare:

Verbal delivery of a feminist using poison tic-tacs

- Emotion driven
- Relies on shaming tactics
- Ready to get offended/plays victim/emotionally explode
- Will constantly use mockery

Whereas:

Verbal delivery of an MRA using RED tic-tacs

- Reason driven
- Relies on factual delivery and exposure of lies
- Remains cool/stoic
- Will only use pithy humor to highlight the opposition's stupidity (used very sparsely)

I will give you a shining practical example of the use of self-restraint via Marc Rudov the man just ignores whatever feminist noise is thrown at him and just powers through. Nothing sticks to the guy (he seems to be made of teflon, graphene or both). In many of Rudov's interviews and debates feminists constantly mock him and bombard with shaming tactics, such as in this video. Yet, he just powers through, either showing an inexpressive face or giant grin when he proves the competition wrong.

A side note, Marc Rudov's many appearances on FOX news are "fenced" debates with chosen FOX female anchors, which only affirms the rigged nature of the discussion, yet he does get away with making a few of them almost fly into a rage while he remains stoically calm. It is a complete contrast to see Marc as cool as a tall glass of icy water while the female anchor becomes a cute boiling pot of failed poison tic-tacs.

Rudov and Rogan are two of the best examples of counter-heckling feminists with RED tic-tacs (Rudov changed his tune in recent years from MRA to more "branding-consultant," but his book on women is still full of quotable knowledge. Like all books, just take what is useful.)

Important note: your impulsiveness will be your defeat

There is no need to sugar coat it:

Do not lie to yourself. If you are impulsive, you will fail. If you cannot control your emotions, you will fail at making and/or delivering RED tic-tacs.

Why? Because getting upset easily is a detrimental trait. It is an enormous obstacle. If you are serious about learning how to make and deliver RED tic-tacs you have to learn how to be less passionate, to be ahead of the game, to avoid falling for the trap of attempted provocation, attempts to get under your skin.

Self restraint pays off. Look at what happened to "Big Red": she had zero self-restraint while the guys who spoke to her were as cool as a tall glass of icy water.

What would have happened if one of them had yelled at her impulsively? That would have been an authentic, long-term damaging setback for the Men's Rights Movement, but these men managed to masterfully restrain their emotions.

Make no mistake, it is likely they were upset in the inside, but that is exactly the point of self-restraint and stoicism: you are the boss, not other people, not your body, not your emotions, but you; your mind is the only boss.

The point of all this is simple: those who argue with feminists need to understand the enemy and how the enemy thinks. If you aren't studying how they work and creating a counterstrategy, you are setting yourself up not to just lose, but to feel terrible about yourself afterwards.

Whereas if you fight effectively, you have turned the tables.

When you realize the opponent isn't in it for the honest desire to reach mutual understanding and truth and fairness and only wants to cause harm and humiliation, you must either not engage at all, or engage in a way that lets you turn the tables completely.

The choice, as always, is yours.

Peter Wright · 24 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I was recently drawn into a conversation about the variety of contrary positions held by Men's Human Rights Advocates: i.e. individual advocacy for men vs. group advocacy; traditionalist vs. progressive beliefs; women friendly vs. women shunning; gay vs. straight; faith-based vs. atheist; marriage vs. celibacy; victim narratives vs. no victim narratives; Republican vs. Democrat and so on.

That variety is further demonstrated in the contrary opinions of AVfM articles where we read, for instance, the neotraditionalist articles of Janet Bloomfield, versus the anti-traditionalist rants of John Hembling.

How is one meant to build a coherent mission statement out of this mess of contrary opinions?

AVfM's mission statement gives a few basic guidelines, but stops short of pushing any Thou Shalt commandments. Lets take a look at the current mission statement:[1]

Mission Statement

The past 50 years have been a time of remarkable change in the world of western women. With the help of technology and forward thinking, our society has thrown off sex-based expectations and limitations for women, allowing them important, long-deserved access to the path of self-actualization.

We now live in a world where a woman's role in life is one of choice, not a destiny shaped by tradition, determined by biology, or forged in law. This, we think, is as it should be.

This revolution in freedom and identity, however, will not be complete until the same standards find their way into the lives of the average man. The absence of that complementary change in the lives of men has created an imbalance that erodes the autonomy of both sexes. Unless this changes, that imbalance will worsen.

Freedom from sex-based expectations for just one sex will never result in freedom for either sex. It is simply a foundation of exploitation on which tyranny is built and administered.

As a society, we are already on that path. The noble idea of freedom and equity between the sexes has been corrupted. It has become a malignancy on our social consciousness. What used to be cooperation between sexes is now gynocentric parasitism that inhabits every level of men's existence, from cradle to coffin. The efforts to enhance the rights of women have become toxic efforts to undermine the rights of men.

It is time for equity-minded men and women to engage in the final push for freedom for both sexes, and indeed for all human beings. It is time for the interests of humanity to take precedence over the interests of men and women as political factions and social adversaries.

It is time for a movement that truly favors humanity, not a particular sex. It is time for feminism to fulfill its promise of equality, and to quit making a mockery of it.

With those humanist ideals guiding our path, we hereby proclaim the mission of A Voice for Men as "Changing the Cultural Narrative."

Changing the Cultural Narrative

Since the turn of the 21st century, men's advocacy has seen a shift toward changing the cultural dialogue on social and mainstream media. That challenge to popular narratives, so many of them gynocentric and misandric, has amounted to a grassroots effort involving a deconstruction and reconstruction, an effort ultimately in the service of creating a greater and better range of choices for men.

A stronger emphasis on cultural narratives forms a legitimate second wave of men's rights activity in contrast to the lobbying of legislators and requesting reforms to misandric laws that characterized the earlier advocacy of the twentieth century. It is our understanding that, with few exceptions, laws governing gendered expectations are eventually brought into line with the prevailing cultural expectations.

Such an enterprise is not new. Similar narrative revolutions in religious beliefs and social orientations have happened throughout history, where cultural pressures led legislating bodies, and even individual magistrates, to interpret and draft new laws in the light of said expectations.

For this reason we long ago adopted 'Changing the Cultural Narrative' as the site's byline. This makes a clear statement about what AVfM's mission is and has been since the start, and addresses disinformation spread in some corners of the internet claiming the MHRM, and specifically AVFM, is about lobbying the government for legitimacy and legal recognition. Those claims are about as credible as the SPLC. What they say is simply not true.

AVFM's mission focuses pretty much exclusively on changing the cultural dialogue. We have never lobbied politicians for laws, we don't seek a "Violence Against Men Act," or even changes in divorce and custody law. We admire, report on and support those undertaking such efforts but that is not the same thing as doing them. We are certain, though, that changing the cultural narrative — forcing a new dialogue — opens the door for laws to change in a positive way even if we are not an active part of those efforts.

[unordered_list style="green-dot"]

    - AVfM regards gender ideologues and all other agents of misandry as a social malignancy. We do not consider them well-intentioned or honest agents for their purported goals and extend to them no more courtesy or consideration than we would klansmen, skinheads, neo Nazis, or other purveyors of hate. We will educate them where they are willing to learn, but hold them accountable for their ignorance as much as their actions;
    - We take no side at all in partisan political struggles and, after weighing the evidence at hand, generally view all organized mainstream political options as gynocentric;
    - We support and endorse only non-violent reactions to feminist governance and in fact are trying to prevent future acts of violence that feminist governance has already inspired;
    - We oppose gynocentrism in all its forms;
    - We oppose all state authority over or interference in the private lives of consenting adults engaged in any form of interpersonal relationship;
    - We take no stand on religion or lack of religion. We neither endorse nor oppose religious principles.
    - We encourage a greater and better range of choices for men, backed by cultural blessing, as essential to a healthy functioning society.

[/unordered_list]

The interesting thing you'll notice above is that rather than taking sides on the big issues, most statements are non-committal – no stand on religion, no side in partisan politics, supporting those already in a family unit or marriage whilst strongly cautioning against it's dangers in the current zeitgeist. About the only thing A Voice for Men takes an unequivocal stance against is misandry, gynocentrism, and the multitude of problems it causes.

Why aren't the above position statements more absolute in support for one side or the other of popular issues; has AVfM gone soft on mission?

No, not really soft, but smart.

And respectful of individual male self-determination.

Like the endless stupidity that arises from arguing which is the One True God, trying to nail down the One True MHRA Stance on every issue is equally ludicrous. Rather, defining the MHRM becomes partially an act of stating what it is not, of saying neti neti – "neither this, nor that" to every partisan position people attempt to reduce it to. The MHRM can't be reduced to traditionalism, it can't be reduced to progressivism, nor conservatism, liberalism, atheism, activism, or any other ism.

Then comes the important question of what the MHRM is – the definition that everyone can agree on despite differences in ideology.

Clearly the movement involves cultural and self-advocacy for males in the face of a misandric world… but to what end? AVfM and the wider MHRM – MGTOW too – is based on men having a choice to believe whatever they damn well want to believe and to be afforded the agency and cultural blessing to follow their dreams. The fight for options, for a greater and better range of choices for men and boys is the Ace-card that trumps all partial positions; eg. the fight for educational equality, for greater reproductive choices, for genital integrity, more equitable health cover, fairer treatment in family court, and so on.

That constitutes the one defining goal that most MHRAs hold in common even when they violently disagree with each other on other issues.

So by all means boast that you've won the right to be a traditionalist (though the MHRM denounces the gynocentric aspects of it), or to be a celibate, or intactivist, or to receive a university education as a result of your hard-fought men's rights activity, and I'll be the first to offer congratulations. Just don't tell me that the entire MHRM should be aiming for that one choice you decided to opt for.

Voices for choices, millions of them….. that's what the MHRM stands for.

Note:

[1] Since writing this article, AVfM's mission statement has been revised and expanded to include further meta-ideological commitments. The above article has been edited to include the new statement.

Murderer kills six: 4 men and 2 women. Cause: Misogyny!

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 25 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: we were particularly warmed to see that Jessica Valenti was bold enough to blame this one on misogyny outright. Well done Jessica. Can you illustrate male disposability better? Anyway, readers should expect more on this story in the coming days. –DE
This article is also available in Portuguese.

By now you have probably heard of the Isla Vista Shooting, carried out by a disturbed young man named Elliot Rodger. Elliot, who may have had autism and/or Asperger's Syndrome, was living in a facility designed to help him address awkward social skills. Elliot was part of an on-line community called PUAHate, a website devoted to revealing 'the scams, deception, and misleading marketing techniques used by dating gurus and the seduction community to deceive men and profit from them.' Elliot posted some very disturbing videos on YouTube in which he rails against the women who rejected his advances and muses about killing all the men on the planet except for himself.

> 'If you could release a virus that would kill every single man on Earth, except for yourself because you would have the antidote, would you do it?
> 'You will be the only man left, with all the females. You would be able to have your pick of any beautiful woman you want, as well as having dealt vengeance on the men who took them from you. Imagine how satisfying that would be.'

It seems that Elliot was an equal opportunity hate monger, torn between wanting to kill women and wanting to kill men. Ultimately, when the bullets started flying, he killed 6 men and 2 women, and he injured several others, whose gender is not clear at the moment.

He also killed himself.

I'll confess it came as a shock to me to see the actions of this deeply distraught, confused individual linked wholesale to the Men's Rights Movement. The Daily Kos took no time to proclaim Rodger was "influenced" by the MHRM, although it presents absolutely zero evidence that this was, in fact, the case.

> The Men's Rights Movement as they call themselves is a nebulous group of pickup artists and misogynists who've found each other on line, and are attempting to create a movement based around their hatred, disdain, and fear of women.
> We know for a fact that Rodgers [sic]was influenced by this movement, as he is subscribed to multiple "pick up artist" or "mens rights" channels on YouTube. (For those here that don't use YouTube, when a user subscribes to a channel, they receive notifications when that channel posts a new video.)

Except that all the links the KOS posts lead to Pick Up Artist sites, and none lead to MHRM sites.

Jezebel commenters are quick to repeat the same error, insisting that Pick Up Artists and Men's Rights Activists are one and the same – something that would almost be amusing if they stopped to consider the number of married women with children who are part of the MHRM. How exactly are we Pick Up Artists?

SPLC commenters make the same connection, again with no evidence at all.

> Aw, dammit. I had this terrible feeling, for quite a while now, that something like this would happen. And now > it has.

> Honestly, just EFF the "Men's Movement". Eff 'em all.

The Frisky follows suit, claiming that murdering 6 men and 2 women is "textbook sexist MRA (men's rights activists) bullshit at its most entitled and violent." I appear to have been absent the day the textbook was issued.

Jessica Valenti proclaims that "misogyny kills", blithely unconcerned with the fact that more men than women were killed. Killing men is misogyny? That's an interesting interpretation.

While it clear to me that nothing more than ignorance and prejudice is informing these writers about the MHRM and MRAs, I wonder how the association between PUA and the MHRM came to be? Because I came to the MHRM out of a concern for the legal and social equality of men and women, and not out of bitterness born from dating and interacting, I know very, very little about the PUA community. I have encountered Chateau Heartiste, and have even written posts pointing out that some of his material is terribly mistaken, but I do not recall ever encountering any serious discussion of political and social issues that affect men and boys on his website.

And the most poignant irony for me is that Elliot was a member of an ANTI-PUA site, so not even part of the PUA community at all. His fantasies included killing both men and women, but the focus appears to be stubbornly on how much he hated women. He killed more men than women, and yet the focus is stubbornly on the female victims.

The only conclusion I can come to is that this is political grandstanding, with no evidence or facts to support the assertion that Elliot was a member of any MHRM communities. In a desperate attempt to paint the MHRM as violent and hateful, prominent media feminists are ignoring evidence and body counts to create an association between the desire for social equality and murderous rampages.

This is both sad and totally expected. Sad that feminists will take the dead bodies of innocent young people and parade them as evidence for something that doesn't exist and never has. Sad that media feminists will step over the bodies of dead and injured men to fuss and fawn over dead and injured women and then claim they are interested in equality. Sad that feminists will mourn dead women but not dead men. And sad that feminists will insist that a community of men and women working to ensure that both boys and girls, both men and women, are treated fairly and equally are the reason for Elliot's tragic, deadly outburst.

The fact is that Elliot's outburst does indeed highlight an issue of central importance to the MHRM – the inadequate, almost non-existent treatment of mental health problems for young men. Socially, our treatment seems to be to wait until the tortured young man puts a bullet in his own head, and just pray that he doesn't take innocent victims with him.

As a strategy for health, it's not working very well.

Compare that to how we respond to women who are mentally fragile after giving birth. We screen for Post Partum Depression and throw money and resources into keeping both the women and their children safe, because if we don't do that, a lot of babies will end up dead. Women struggle with mental issues, too, and take it out on the innocent. But rather than ignore those women and hope for the best, we create programs designed to identify and help them.

There was tons of evidence, especially on YouTube that Elliot was a dangerously unwell person, struggling with demons he likely could not understand and certainly could not cope with. A society that had true compassion for men and boys would respond to hurting men like Elliot, the same way we respond to hurting women.

So in that sense, yes Elliot is linked to the MHRM and MRAs. He is one of the men and boys we are fighting for. If we had stepped in, Elliot would be alive. His life matters, too. If we had resources and means to assist young men struggling to integrate into our complex society, his victims would be alive.

Two beautiful young women lost their lives in Isla Vista. But so did four beautiful young men. And thirteen other people were wounded. Either way, they deserve our compassion, too. They are more than grindstones on which to sharpen a political axe.

Because men are people, too. Why is that so hard for some people to remember?

Lots of love,

JB

Lecture 1: Staring Out from the Abyss

The following is the first lecture of Adam Kostakis' landmark online series about gynocentrism. The series was published on AVfM in 2011, but for those who didn't catch them we are making them available again. Here is the first of twelve mind-blowing articles. – PW

Lecture No. 1

"I love an opposition that has convictions" – Frederick the Great

The Battle of the Sexes has degenerated into a Dirty War, and we are, each of us, being drafted into it by forces who care not a whit for equality or fairness.

Propaganda, as a tool of control, is effective only insofar as the vision of the world that it presents concords with the perception of the world experienced day-to-day by its targets. The wider the gap between the perceived world and the propagandistic representation of the world, the less effective – and therefore less useful – the propaganda will ultimately be. We have reached a juncture at which women are increasingly rejecting feminism as irrelevant or inapplicable to their lives, because the world that feminist orthodoxy describes does not appear to be planet Earth. At the same time, we are approaching a zenith of feminist control over the actual inhabited world, which combines state repression with gender tribalism, both forces intensifying exponentially as they use each other as leverage to climb ever higher.

I am reminded of an ancient riddle, which asks, 'how high can one climb up a mountain?' The answer is 'to the top,' because once you reach the summit, the only possible way is down. Feminism has no obstacles left; total control is within its grasp, and by total, I do mean in the sense that it shall be totalitarian. The victim card has served as an entry pass through the back door of state and supranational institutions. Now empowered over men, feminists have re-established the principles of Valerie Solanas' Scum Manifesto, declaring – in language clearly evocative of the Final Solution – that we shall soon witness The End of Men. The 'sex war' is not cooling down as women approach (or in some cases, surpass) equality with men – it is heating up. Feminists are not only publicly inciting male hatred and getting away with it, they are using their positions in government, in academia, in think tanks and in the media to make their violent fantasies a reality, advocating the renunciation of men's basic human rights.

To take one recent example, the Secretary of State of the most powerful nation in the world recently announced that an international mobile prosecution unit shall be established specifically to target men around the world. To take another recent example, a leading feminist has suggested that certain legal principles designed to protect innocent citizens from persecution and unjust imprisonment, dating back to the signing of the Magna Carta, should be withdrawn from men. Nor is feminism a problem confined to the Western world. Men are subject to the arbitrary rule of women in India, facing severe penalties for inadvertently causing the slightest offense.

None of this squares with the 'women-as-victim' cliché, which has so usefully served feminists in getting to this point. Nevertheless, feminism is firmly entrenched and in control of the mechanisms which boast the monopoly on physical power, legitimate or otherwise. There is hardly any countervailing force which remains. The West has found its new Imperial Mission to replace Global Christendom: enforced worship of women. As any dissenting voice is immediately and violently stamped out, feminists are free to radicalize their anti-male agenda to the point of moral sickness and to unleash unto the world all manner of vindictive atrocities.

For you see, when propaganda has ceased to be an effective tool of control, one seeking control will simply find other means. Control of the state – the monopoly on physical violence – is the means which feminists have sought. But unlike propaganda, which manipulates the mind, state control only brutalizes the body. The power of the controllers always ultimately rests upon the resilience of the controlled, hence consent must still be manufactured. The Roman Empire did not last for five hundred years by the exercise of brute force, but by mass support; the Emperor was glorified as a mortal deity, and even the smallest townships in his realm voluntarily erected statues and altars in his honor. For too long, men have been worshiping at the altar of the female, and it is tempting to believe that this psychological submission will not yield even in the face of physical oppression or extermination – that men will march to their demise like sacrificial lambs, hoping to win women's favor with their last servile actions. But proclamations regarding The End of Men may well turn out to be as empty as those which were made nearly twenty years earlier, concerning The End of History. The so-called Clash of Civilizations which followed led that author to refute his own position. We should be optimistic that a true Clash of the Sexes will soon have feminist-minded women eating crow.

As feminism grows ever more powerful, and begins to realize its radical ambitions, it will simultaneously exhaust its capacity for manufacturing consent. Those chivalric illusions which ensure the consent of men, and which feminism ultimately rests upon – 'women-as-victim,' 'women-as-precious,' 'women-as-helpless,' and so on – will become rather more difficult to maintain in time. The more force is advanced against men to bridle and inhibit their lives, the more discontent shall be nurtured among them. The misandry bubble is due to burst, and with every example of overreach, which sees yet more good men cast into the role of criminal and subjected to humiliating and vicious punishments, another crack appears in the wall, another step we take closer to the day that the whole hateful edifice collapses under its own weight – and, crucially, under ours.

Our task, then, is twofold: first, to prepare the ground, in order to hasten the collapse of feminism.

Second (and complementary to the first): to construct the ideological weapons to help prevent a feminist resurgence following its collapse.

Both of these goals require, not force, but some propagandizing of our own. Things being the way they are, this does not require us to distort the truth. On the contrary, we shall, for the most part, be exposing those truths which others have distorted; revealing the facts to a wider audience than has yet received them, diligently and unapologetically. As one notable activist in the field recently put it, he does not need to attack feminists – all he needs to do is quote them. Simply exposing feminist hatred to the disinfecting sunlight of the world might well be enough to turn the tide – which is why enormous energies are expended on misdirecting, discrediting, neutralizing and obscuring the arguments and advocates of the opposition.

One key strategy for the achievement of our task was announced at an April 2010 conference, in the form of Male

Studies, a new discipline already facing hostility from an academic world that has long been a bastion of radical feminism. That this sore thumb, this thorn in the side of scholarly uniformity should provoke such outrage as it has done should not be surprising. Here is a selection of topics which Male Studies is set to cover:

> Socioeconomic factors leading to males' over-involvement in the criminal justice system, underemployment and limited opportunities as fathers, resulting from changes in child custody law (economics, forensics, law, public policy);
> Misandric representations of boys and mature males in the media and advertising (media studies including cinema, television and internet, and advertising);
> Accounts of the experience of being male (history, literature, autobiography);
> Pressing issues related to the emotional well-being of boys and older males, most notably depression and suicide (clinical psychology, medicine and psychiatry, social work).

Friedrich Nietzsche, writing in the late 19th century, warned that if one gazes into the abyss for long enough, then one shall find the abyss gazing back into them. It must be deeply troubling for feminists, to wake up one morning and find other people deconstructing them, having made it their mission in life to expose and correct feminist wrongdoing.

This would seem to be the reason for the abusive response, from the feminist sector, to the idea of men discussing issues of sex and sexism without the supervision of women. It matters not what feminists think of Male Studies, because feminists are not the discipline's target audience; its success is not dependent upon their approval, a fact they will no doubt have trouble reconciling themselves to. Regardless, even if they launched a concerted campaign to stop men from discussing their experiences through the fora of academia, they are incapable of preventing this from happening elsewhere. The true sticking point for would-be dictators today is that we live in an Information Age. It is rather difficult to control the flow of information when our very epoch is defined by it. So, let's have these discussions right here, right now – as long as people can use the internet to congregate and speak their minds, nothing can stop us. Let's have these discussions in a million other places too, out in the real world – because if men had never spoken up about their experiences, as men, then we would not be looking forward to the commencement of Male Studies in the near future.

There are already a great number of websites devoted to Men's Rights issues; indeed, these seem to have proliferated over the last few years, sprouting up all over the pasture like so many delicious mushrooms! For most of these weblogs, their content needs no greater unifying theme than opposition to feminism. Given the growing and active network of people concerned about the status of men today, it has become possible to push the envelope a little further. This weblog aims to encourage the intellectual crystallization of what we are calling the Men's Rights Movement, by taking a narrow lens across a broad range of topics. This weblog is dedicated to the elucidation of Gynocentrism Theory.

What is Gynocentrism Theory? To put it simply, it is a system which explains social relations between the sexes. It supersedes Patriarchy Theory, the cornerstone of all feminist thought. Now memetic, Patriarchy Theory has proved a remarkable tool in denying men their rights, including their most basic human rights to dignity and bodily integrity, on the pretense that all men are oppressors (or at least, allied with oppressive men from whom they receive benefits) and that all women are victims of male power. Gynocentrism Theory is the articulation of many years of effort by various thinkers in the Men's Rights sphere to describe a vision of the world which more accurately reflects the experiences of men – and many women, too. In contrast to the simplistic, black-and-white tribalism of Patriarchy Theory, Gynocentrism Theory does not equate male fulfillment with the holding of tyrannical power over women. Gynocentrism Theory does not accept that men act as a power bloc. On the contrary, Gynocentrism Theory exposes the divergence between demographics and interests; fundamentally, that while a small number of men may be the ones holding social and political power, this by no means implies that they do so for the benefit of all men; and that in fact, more usually, they do so for the benefit of most women and to the detriment of most men. Gynocentrism Theory advocates that power be understood as multi-faceted, and that policy has historically been a matter of appealing to, and protecting, women.

The above, no doubt, shall make heads spin among those who assume that power at all levels can be identified according to the shape of the genitals of those who get to make important decisions – regardless of what they actually decide.

Any more shall be beyond the scope of this introductory lecture. And so, we shall continue this train of thought next week.

I bid you all a reflective day, and I'll be seeing you again.

Sooner than you think.

AVFM · 26 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: Today America observes Memorial Day, in honor of its own who have fallen in war. We ask that regardless of your politics, you be respectful in any comments left here. The following poem is one of many that are popular among Americans on this day. It honors specifically those who fell in Belgium and Northern France, but for many is considered symbolic of all those who were lost. For those of you who served and are here to read this, we are glad you are here. And for those who lost loved ones, we grieve for you. And we don't need to tell this audience, but we need to remind others, who those buried under those headstones are: overwhelmingly, they were men. –DE

In distant field of sunny France
Where strangers come and go,
Amid the farms of Flanders, where
The fragrant breezes blow,
Our solder-dead in quiet sleep
'Neath crosses row on row.

Here shrapnel shells once shrieked and burst
And took their toll of death;
The very wind, itself a foe,
Bore poison on its breath.

Above their graves the birds now sing
As round that home of yore,
When, carefree boys, they romped and played;
Those childhood days soon o'er,
The boys to brave and strong men grown,
They romped and played no more.

They put aside their childish toys,
A man's work each must do,
And when their country called for them,
To her they answered true.

"We must protect our native land:
She shall not suffer wrong
For she has reared and nurtured us,
We're men and we are strong.
We'll bid good-bye to those we love;
It will not be for long."

With aching hearts and tear-dimmed eyes
We watched them go away.
Some have returned but many sleep
In foreign lands today.

Where English roses bloom and fade,
In France where lilies grow,
Among the fields of Flanders, where
The scarlet poppies blow,
Our soldier-dead are not forgot
Though strangers come and go.

White Ribbons are for Women Too!

Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) · 26 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I would like to dedicate this post to the White Ribbon Campaign, a worldwide group which does such fine work depicting men as violent dirtbags and perpetrators, and women as innocent doves.

To my knowledge, the White Ribbon Campaign has never categorically admitted to being a feminist organization.

The White Ribbon Campaign has the following hash tag on twitter:

#whiteribbon

The WRC may also be messaged on Twitter:

@whiteribbon

The above video was filmed with the unwitting cooperation of the London public, at the sly instigation of two very convincing actors – one male, the other female.

> "To raise awareness about domestic violence, Dare London in England set up three hidden cameras in a crowded park and staged two scenarios of domestic violence to see how strangers would react. When the man in the PSA physically attacks his girlfriend, several onlookers rush to woman's aid. But when they recreate the same scenario with the woman physically attacking her boyfriend, it's a different story."

The only thing I don't like about this is that they haven't got the stones to say that 50% of DV victims (not 40%) are men. They're still afraid of appearing politically incorrect, I reckon.

Still, I count this video as a "smoking gun." Watch this, and you will understand why female violence against men is "invisible". The underlying dynamic will become painfully clear to you, and if you still refuse to see what's going on you are either a feminist or a moral idiot. Same difference, come to think of it.

When we are discussing items like this, we must never forget to underscore the moral nexus between feminism and such things. Breaking the silence about feminism, every chance you get, is a vital exercise that demands diligent practice.

The social double standard illustrated here is part of traditional culture. Feminism did not "create" this, but feminism most certainly feeds upon it, and grows fat upon it, and wouldn't long survive without it. Feminism is, in point of fact, only a modified form of traditional culture. Everything comes from somewhere, nothing emerges de novo from an ahistorical void, and so finally, there is nothing new under the sun.

Editorial note: Another hashtag to use, which is trending hot at the moment, is #yesallwomen and we suggest that yes, all women should see this video and read this message. –DE

Lecture 2: The same old gynocentric story

Adam Kostakis · 26 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the second of twelve lectures. – PW

Lecture No. 2

> I'm not cut from the same mold. I don't read from the same old story. – Pennywise

My readers must understand that the concerns which Gynocentrism Theory addresses are not limited to feminism. Feminism is still fairly new on the scene, while Gynocentrism has been around for as long as recorded history. The Men's Rights Movement seeks to address problems associated with feminism, but does not limit its attention to these problems. Many of these problems existed prior to the emergence of feminism proper in the late 19th century, although they have been expanded and exacerbated since. Feminism is only the modern packaging of Gynocentrism, an ancient product, made possible in its present form by the extensive public welfare arrangements of the post-war period.

In spite of its radical rhetoric, the content of feminism, or one could say, its essence, is remarkably traditional; so traditional, in fact, that its core ideas are simply taken for granted, as unquestioned and unquestionable dogma, enjoying uniform assent across the political spectrum. Feminism is distinguishable only because it takes a certain traditional idea – the deference of men to women – to an unsustainable extreme. Political extremism, a product of modernity, shall fittingly put an end to the traditional idea itself; that is, in the aftermath of its astounding, all-singing, all-dancing final act.

Allow me to clarify. The traditional idea under discussion is male sacrifice for the benefit of women, which we term Gynocentrism. This is the historical norm, and it was the way of the world long before anything called 'feminism' made itself known. There is an enormous amount of continuity between the chivalric class code which arose in the Middle Ages and modern feminism, for instance. That the two are distinguishable is clear enough, but the latter is simply a progressive extension of the former over several centuries, having retained its essence over a long period of transition. One could say that they are the same entity, which now exists in a more mature form – certainly, we are not dealing with two separate creatures. Take any of the great Empires that swept the globe – the Roman, the Ottoman, the Spanish, the British – and you shall find Gynocentrism as the order of the day. Such extensive geopolitical enterprises, historical testaments to man's triumph over the earth and sea, were built and maintained by men perfectly accustomed to the idea of dying for the sake of their women. It is an idea that has outlived nearly every other, and endures to this day in our American Empire. That men should sacrifice themselves utterly – their very essence, their being and their identity, to save women that they do not even know – is neatly encapsulated in that popular phrase, 'women and children first.'

(And if you're paying special attention, you will notice that it is never uttered as 'children and women first.' The very thought is absurd! This is because what is really meant by the phrase is 'women first, children second.')

The endurance of these social and class codes owes nothing to totalitarian control. Even when staging bloody revolts against tyrannous monarchs and landed elites, men aspiring to power left the Gynocentric code well alone. The self-sacrifice of men is a sexual constant which has survived all regime change. Gynocentrism, it seems, was not entirely without benefit to men; in peacetime, a man could be fairly assured of a stable familial structure and of his own paternity for the children he helped to raise. Regardless, what was offered to men was essentially compensatory. For most of history, men apparently considered this compensation to be reasonable enough – or perhaps, Gynocentrism was so deeply ingrained that they simply did not consider it at all. Through their actions, they affirmed (and renewed) Gynocentrism, and whether it went by the name honor, nobility, chivalry, or feminism, its essence has gone unchanged. It remains a peculiarly male duty to help the women onto the lifeboats, while the men themselves face a certain and icy death.

It is only now, with the political and social developments of the 20th century that have driven a wedge between the sexes, that the kind of thoughts found on this weblog can emerge. Late modernity provides us with new conceptual resources – new ways of thinking, which can be traced back to the Enlightenment of the 17th-18th centuries. Out of this intellectual melting-pot eventually crawled feminism, a vindictive blend of classic Gynocentrism, victim fetishization, radical utopianism and liberal presuppositions.

It would be an oversimplification to say that feminists set out to make gains. On the contrary, they made demands for both gains and losses. They wanted to gain men's rights, but lose their traditional female responsibilities. This, it seemed, would put women in a social position equal to that of men. It was an argument rooted in the liberal tendencies of individualism, civic equality and self-definition. In rhetoric if not in reality, feminism asserted its points of concurrence with the most admirable aspects of traditional liberalism: equality before the law, the abnegation of arbitrary rule, and so on. Extending rights to all women appeared, logically enough, to be the successive phase of human liberation following the extension of rights to all men.

It was assumed – more fool us – that once granted equal rights, women would voluntarily adopt the accompanying responsibilities that men had always fulfilled. This did not come to be. Feminists were happy to gain men's rights, and lose women's responsibilities, but they were horrified by the suggestion that they should adopt men's responsibilities as a corollary. Rather than men and women sharing the burdens of the world, we got the White Feather Campaign:

> This campaign began in the early days of the First World War in Great Britain, where women were encouraged to pin white feathers on young men who were not in military uniform. The hope was that this mark of cowardice would shame them into 'doing their bit' in the war. The practice soon spread to Canada, where patriotic women, in response to declining voluntary recruitment figures, organized committees to issue white feathers to men in civilian clothes and publicly denounced the 'slackers' and 'shirkers'.

It is surely worth remarking that many of these women were suffragettes; and thus, even as they campaigned for equal rights with men, they used shame as a tool for ensuring that men, and only men, fulfilled traditionally male obligations. Particularly, duty to give up their own lives, because they were men, for the sake of women. Whatever disadvantages women may have faced at the time, there is surely no greater coercion than death.

Much has changed since the First World War, and the feminist project to slack and shirk on women's responsibilities while extending their license to act however they damn well please has met with wild success. And it is precisely this state of affairs which begs certain questions, made possible by the conceptual resources we have inherited from the Enlightenment: what if a man doesn't want to live this way? Why should men continue to fulfill or perform their traditional obligations, when women will not live up to theirs, but neither will they adopt the responsibilities corresponding to their rights at present? The questions arise: were men wrong, all this time, to sacrifice for the sake of women? Should we, in fact, have no obligations to women whatsoever?

The reason why the Men's Rights Movement arouses such hostility, from both the left and right, is because it is the first attempt in history for a sex to attempt to break out of its traditional role. Feminism is not this; it is the entrenchment of the power that women already held. The Men's Rights Movement today goes far beyond simple accusations of feminist wrongdoing. Its adherents labor at historical analysis and social criticism, and with the benefit of two-and-a-half centuries of imagination and innovation stemming from the Enlightenment, can easily conceive of a world in which men, for the first time in history, are not required to self-sacrifice for women.

This is surely the future, and it is an inevitable reaction against – thus, an unintended consequence of – feminism itself. In times past, when men could claim compensation for their self-sacrifice, they accepted that this was simply the way of the world. In the absence of compensation, and with the screws being turned ever tighter on men in every sphere of life, they are provoked into questioning the new arbitrary rule, and into formulating their very own liberation project in response.

My statement above – that political extremism, the product of modernity, shall put an end to the traditional idea – should now be clear. Feminism, which is the extreme form of Gynocentrism, shall put an end to Gynocentrism altogether through the reaction which it creates. We are fifty years into the tremendous final act; a grand, orchestral performance, a theatrical display making unprecedented use of sound and light to confuse and cast illusion. But if all the world truly is a stage, then all men and women are actors – with roles of our own choosing, now free to toss aside the scripts we have been handed and create a new story in place of the old.

And when the curtain finally falls, I do believe that there shall be no encores.

Please sign this White House petition to declare A Voice for Men a terrorist group

Dean Esmay · 27 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Honestly, I had no plans to write about this ludicrous petition on the White House web page. When I first saw it I chuckled. Then another person sent it to me. And another. And another. And another. Here at A Voice for Men, people keep sending us this petition on Facebook, in email, in Skype chats. Every time we turn around, someone is talking about this petition, and almost all of them are panicked, angry, or upset by it.

Whenever we try to tell people that it means absolutely nothing, they just amp up their own adrenaline levels further, getting more and more agitated about this thing. So, I'm going to make a point: I have just now signed this petition, and I urge everybody reading this to do the same.

And then, after you sign it, I want you to come back here, and share a big belly laugh over the fact that you let yourself get scared over nothing. And then I hope you go urge all your friends to please sign it too.

Things you need to know about these White House petitions:

1. They have no force of law of any kind, no matter how many people sign them.
2. Any moron can create a White House petition, to do anything. At this writing there is a petition to declare a National Steak Day, and another to build a military base on the Moon. You can also create a petition demanding that America should change its national bird from the Bald Eagle to the Purple Poodle. You can create a petition demanding that feminists be shipped to Antarctica where they can create a man-free paradise for themselves.
3. The White House ignores all petitions which do not reach at least 100,000 signatures.
4. Even if a petition does get 100,000 signatures on it, all the White House is required to do is issue a statement in response. That's it. Nothing else. A response statement.
5. It is totally impossible for the President of the United States to declare the Men's Rights Movement a terrorist group. It is not a "group" for them to do that to. Now, the petition does mention A Voice for Men in particular, and they could in theory declare AVfM a terrorist organization, but that would require them to, ya know, find some evidence of terrorism. And if they investigated us, all they'd do is find "terrorist activity" that amounts to peaceful nonviolent protest, criticism of gender ideologues, and petitioning government officials for redress of grievances. And some potty mouth. Yes, folks, in the minds of feminists, that is terrorism. Woohoo! How are you doing today, my fellow terrorist?*
6. In the absurdly unlikely scenario that the US Government did declare A Voice for Men a "terrorist group," all that means is people in government would be assigned to read A Voice for Men every day. And I don't know about you, but I'd like to have multiple government officials reading A Voice for Men, or certain other men's rights sites, every day. I can't think of a better way to get converts to our cause within the government.

On #4, nothing would delight us more than to have the President of the United States forced to in some way acknowledge the existence of the Men's Human Rights Movement and A Voice for Men in particular. Whether he condemned us, declared us dangerous, declared us meaningless, or made fun of us, it just would not matter. Just having him utter the words "Men's Rights Movement" or "A Voice for Men" would make millions of people curious about us. Billions, potentially.

Here's the truth: Dave Futrelle has been, far and away, the very best recruiter and advertiser for the Men's Rights Movement as a whole, and A Voice for Men in particular, who has ever lived. His feminist backers are, we think, starting to figure this out, and likely his source of funding is diminishing as he gets ever more desperate to remain relevant, and his Mainstream Media buddies who used to rely on him as a source increasingly figure out that he is not reliable and that using him as a source puts egg on their faces. In the meantime, Arthur Goldwag and the Southern Poverty Law Center probably come in at #2 behind Futrelle as being the biggest recruiters and promoters of the Men's Human Rights Movement in history; just by encouraging totally irrational fear and hatred of us, they have made countless people aware of us, and decent, thoughtful people who might otherwise never have found us came to look, saw what we actually stood for, and stayed.

Arthur Goldwag and David Futrelle are the Bull Connors of the 21st Century and, as such, are the best friends the Men's Human Rights Movement has ever had. If they did not already exist, we would have to make them up.

If President Obama got on National Television tomorrow and said "A Voice for Men is a dangerous, pernicious, evil, malevolent force in America, and I have instructed the FBI, the NSA, and the CIA to monitor them closely" we would publish a big personal welcome to all the new government employees assigned to read our site. We would also send a personal thank-you gift, probably flowers and chocolate, to President Obama, with big wet sloppy kisses for Michelle. We would also send flowers and chocolate to Goldwag and Futrelle for their tireless efforts to slander and smear nonviolent human rights activists, for their hatred and irrationality have done nothing but strengthen us.

That petition is the height of reactionary, McCarthyite hysteria. Any rational person knows that Thomas Ball set himself on fire in front of a courthouse in protest, with no intention of injuring anyone but himself–and he was not a member of A Voice for Men. Elliot Rodger was never a Men's Rights Activist at all. No one named in that petition was anyone we had even heard of until after they were dead. The fact is that every word of that petition is a lie; they might as well have added "and they eat poop and torture kittens" to it.

But no matter. This smear-petition can only help us. So, we're not kidding here; not only have I already signed it, I hope you sign it as well.

Because if peaceful nonviolent protest and petitioning government officials for redress of grievance is now classified as terrorism, America is doomed, and everyone sane will see that for what it is.

So come on haters and bigots. Keep it up. You're too stupid to know that all the hate you spew at us only makes us stronger and you weaker.

By the way, to the people who created this petition? I hope we see you in Detroit. You will go down in history as no better than those who turned firehoses on peaceful civil rights activists.

Not only do I hope more feminists sign this petition, but I hope every Men's Rights Activist does as well. Please, everybody, sign this petition today, and make the President take a stand. No matter what stand he takes, it's heads we win, tails they lose.

A Voice for Men is, and always has been, an unwavering supporter of peaceful protest and free speech, and utterly condemned all violence, including incitement to violence. If that's your idea of terrorism, you've got holes in your head, and we want as many people as possible to see that.

* No we're not actually terrorists, and anyone who can't tell this is satire is being foolish. Having opinions someone doesn't like isn't terrorism, people. –DE

University of Oregon men face witch-hunt rape accusations

Kevin Hornbuckle · 27 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In early May the University of Oregon dismissed three basketball players from its team amidst a fire storm of controversy over a sexual encounter which took place at an off-campus party on 8 March 2014. The encounter was detailed in a police investigation report which was leaked to the media, and charges of favoritism to college athletes soon carried the headlines in news reports.

A campus activist group, "University of Oregon Coalition to End Sexual Violence" mounted protests to pressure the administration to respond decisively to what its members characterized as gang rape. The local newspaper, The Register Guard, applied political pressure to the University of Oregon to make "examples" of the three alleged assailants, Damyean Dotson, Brandon Austin and Dominic Artis. News articles quickly appeared in the Wall Street Journal, the L.A. Times, the New York Times and ABC News. Much of the coverage speculated about the possibility of a cover-up in order to allow the three players to have participated in college basketball's celebrated March Madness tournament.UO's athletic director Rob Mullens and coach Dana Altman were soon fearing for their jobs. On 9 May they held a press conference to denounce the three students. President Gottfredson told the media:

> "The type of behavior in the police report, released this week, is utterly unacceptable and will not be tolerated. I understand and empathize with the outrage people feel. As a father I was appalled at what I read. As president of this university I am angry and disappointed over this profoundly disturbing incident."

Gottfredson went on to describe the complainant as "the survivor" and asserted that student privacy laws prevented him from disclosing information about students. Yet he announced the suspension of the three male students and that they were dismissed from the team. "They will not be playing basketball at Oregon again."Just what could spur such controversy, worthy of national attention? The short story is less interesting. But let me relate it in distilled form: It turns out that the actual events shrink to an understandable form as long as Artis-Dotson-Austin-Police-Report without imputing one's own sexual preferences into the rights of others.

A female student named Amanda Jasmine went to a party in a house off campus. Before going to the party she consumed some peach flavored alcoholic beverage. Witnesses later said they did not believe her to be drunk.

Amanda Jasmine flirted with three basketball players and the four of them went into a bathroom and engaged in sex acts with each other. Another woman entered the bathroom and sought to join in. Her interest was rebuffed and after a break the four returned to the bathroom where she performed oral sex on the three players (see KVAL video of Kelsey Alston).

Soon she left the party with them in a cab and went to the apartment of Dominic Artis. There they engaged in group sex and afterward Artis invited the woman to spend the night and she accepted. The others left. In the morning two students had sex with each other before the woman took a cab home.

Later that day (the day after the party) Amanda Jasmine went to the apartment of a friend of the players. She spoke with him about her experience and eventually the two of them had sex.

This synopsis of events could have been deduced by university administrators who read the police report. They could have and should have concluded that four students had engaged in group sex. No university policy prohibits group sex, and the sex lives of students is not the business of university administrators. Now to add the complicating factors. It was the father of Amanda Jasmine who called UO police on 10 March, two days after the party. They left phone messages for Jasmine but she did not return the calls. On 14 March she contacted the Eugene police who then went to interview her for the first time. A different officer interviewed her again later to sort out what the first report termed "inconsistencies."

The inconsistencies resulted in a decision by the Lane County district attorney's office to not file charges. In an interview a local TV news reporter persistently needled district attorney Alex Gardner and suggested that the three male students should "get their day in court" in order to prove their innocence (see KVAL video "sexual activity isn't necessarily criminal")

Much to the disappointment of sexual assault prevention activists, the D.A. did not find evidence of sexual assault. Amanda Jasmine had opportunities to resist or escape and she did not. She elected to spend the night with Artis, and texted him the next morning that she'd made it home safely via taxi cab. She told police that, "We were all drunk and it got a little bit out of hand."

A witness told police that Jasmine appeared to be flirting with one of the male students after she'd given him oral sex in the bathroom at the party. Jasmine told police that she allowed the three men to sexually touch her. "I think I just gave up. I let them do whatever they wanted. I just wanted it to be over and to go to sleep." When the New York Times ran its first story on 6 May, reporter Joshua Hunt deceptively reduced that statement to, "I think I just gave up."

Also absent from the NY Times story is Amanda Jasmine's statement to police, "I want them to get a slap on the wrist."

After the police report was leaked to the Register Guard newspaper, protests generated outrage and outrage generated more protest.

Protesters on campus held signs declaring:

> "I live in a rape culture"
> "Passes on the court, free pass from the courts"
> "UO: Expel Rapists"

There was no evidence that a rape had been committed, yet the administration began to encourage outraged protesters in various ways.

President Gottfredson told the UO faculty senate on 14 May:

> "President Obama has identified sexual assault at colleges and universities as a significant threat to our campuses, our communities, and our country. The White House Task Force reports that nationally, one in five women is sexually assaulted while in college. One in five. This is shocking to many people. It is appalling. But I promise you, this figure does not shock the good people on our campus, and others across the nation, who work in student health centers, campus counseling centers, and Dean of Students offices. Those who work every day to protect students and to provide them with support services, advocacy, and education regarding sexual violence are all too familiar with this statistic."

The 'one in five' statistic has been refuted by several researchers, notably Christine Hoff Sommers. The inflated ratio is achieved by placing unwanted attention into the same definitional category (sexual assault) as rape.

Psychology professor Jennifer Freyd was interviewed on Oregon Public Broadcasting and boasted that she'd just attended President Obama's announcement of the White House Task Force to Protect Students from Sexual Assault.

Freyd has capitalized on the opportunity the alarm has generated. That she herself has fed the controversy by repeatedly stating false statistics on the rate of sexual abuse may not escape the scrutiny of the ethics panel of the American Psychological Association. Ethical standard number 5 states:

> "Psychologists do not knowingly make public statements that are false, deceptive or fraudulent concerning their research, practice or other work activities or those of persons or organizations with which they are > affiliated."

Other ethical standards prohibit human rights violations, and misuse of the psychologist's work.

Freyd's professional activities have focused on what she calls "institutional betrayal." Her questionnaire to detect institutional betrayal is designed to measure whether an institution responds adequately to sexual assault.

Question 13 of one version of the questionnaire asks, "If you told anyone about your experience/s, how did they react?" The three players, had they been asked this question would have been quick to answer:

> 'The police interviewed two of us and we told them what happened. And they listened to recordings of phone conversations we had with the woman who engaged in group sex with us. They declined to file charges, even after the D.A. reviewed the evidence.'

Could there be a deeper betrayal than ruining the lives of the three young men? Rape accusations are forever. A Google search of the term "UO rape" produces thousands of instant hits. Those can't be erased.

Now to answer the question: yes, there is a deeper betrayal. The following paragraph is from ABC news:

> "Speaking to reporters on Friday afternoon, coach Dana Altman said the decision to dismiss the athletes from the team was ultimately made in the "best interest" of the players, the team and the university because of the intense scrutiny they faced. The players were no longer on campus."

So you see, their lives were ruined for their own good.

How is it possible to turn reality so completely on its head? It was years in the making, of course, built on hubris, tradition–and money, the mother's milk of corruption. Now faculty members want a full accounting of how this incident could have happened. Which is to say, they want to cover up what has really happened.

Carol Stabile is the director of the Center for the Study of Women in Society at UO. She spoke as a member of the faculty senate on 14 May:

> "We need an investigation that is fully independent of the influence of big sports or the Greek system," Stabile said. "We need an investigation that asks the hard questions about system breakdowns in our policies, procedures and campus climate. And then we need to look the answer in the face, publicly and bravely. Anything less just isn't going to cut it."

The hard question which has no chance of getting asked on the UO campus is this: Why do we refuse to consider that the woman, Amanda Jasmine, lied?

There is more than sufficient evidence that she wanted to be with the players, wanted to have sex with them, and then misled police and university officials about what actually happened.

Professor Freyd zealously promotes a need for "campus climate" surveys, her own specialty, and Gottfredson dutifully beats the same drum, claiming that it will address sexual assault on campus. But who needs a weather report then you're drowning in a deluge?

The climate is impunity for female students who make false allegations. There is no survey to discover the amount of fear male students have about becoming the target of false allegations. It can happen as a result of simply asking a classmate for a date, and it can happen after consensual sexual activity between a male and female student.

At a few universities male students have begun to assert their rights to due process by filing civil suits against university administrators.

In April a suit was filed by engineering student Drew Sterrett against University of Michigan. Sterrett's suit alleges that he was denied due process rights after that university suspended him for sexual misconduct following an investigation that grossly violated his rights to due process. Sterrett charges that the encounter was consensual, and that the investigators suppressed evidence of consent. Remarkably, his dorm mate was in the top bunk while the two below engaged each other with enthusiasm. (Sterrett v U. Michigan)

Earlier this month a male Columbia University student filed a complaint in federal court in New York. "John Doe" was suspended for sexual assault based on a preponderance of evidence, the standard promoted by President Obama. Five months after a single sexual experience in a dorm bathroom, for which "Jane Doe" first retrieved a condom, the female student decided to report the experience as non-consensual. No police report was ever filed, and Jane Doe never sought medical attention. Therefore the only evidence was her verbal representation.

John Doe's attorney told a reporter from Legal Insurrection, "Particularly of note is the fact that even the complainant believed the sanction to be too severe and personally appealed the decision." The suit cites lack of procedural safeguards to be the basis of presumed guilt.

The culture of impunity on campuses has become a cancer so aggressive that absurdity is allowed free rein. For example, at the 14 May University of Oregon faculty senate meeting Dr. Freyd read from a letter she wrote two years ago "portending a sexual assault problem at UO," wrote the Oregon Daily Emerald reporter.

We should be alarmed, right? Here is a credentialed faculty member who warned of something two years ago which has now resulted in great personal harm to a student because the warning was not heeded.Reciting her letter, Freyd read: "Currently, the University of Oregon fails to comply with its obligations under Title IX regarding sexual harassment and its discriminatory impact on students. We cannot wait until a Penn State-type incident occurs until we take these issues seriously."

In the alarmist tornado over Eugene, gloating has become a substitute for academic integrity. The Penn State case happened because real sex offenses were committed against minor children who had no ability to consent. There was a cover-up which destroyed the credibility of the athletic department and perhaps the university in general.

To compare the UO situation to Penn State is profoundly stupid and inappropriate. But to brag to the faculty senate that you warned the administration (Gottfredson was present at the meeting and had addressed the senate) reflects nothing less than a depraved political agenda. Freyd's payoff appears as demand number three in the Coalition to End Sexual Violence's list of demands to Gottfredson : more funding for "climate research."

The university president has hinted that he will meet the demand, which is to fund more surveys designed and administered by Freyd and her students. Of course, no climate survey is going to prevent students from having consensual sex; neither will any survey prohibit a student from lying about her participation in sexual activity.

Personally, for a long time I have been aware of the trend on campus toward unequal justice. When this incident broke into the headlines I decided to follow it in detail. The hypocrisies flowing out of the university became so great that I filed a complaint of Title IX violation with the Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights.

The complaint can be viewed on my Facebook page, along with supporting evidence and some comments which illustrate how political correctness has mowed down support for Constitutional rights. Naturally I'm being called "rape apologist."

Federal intervention is needed at University of Oregon because the University of Oregon has inverted the presumption of innocence into a presumption of guilt. Male students are presumed guilty, even when there is evidence demonstrating that the accuser is not telling the truth. The office of student affairs, responsible for enforcing Title IX, is a violator of Title IX and so cannot be trusted to enforce it. That's the real cover-up.

The complaint argues that to falsely accuse of sexual misconduct is itself sexual misconduct. Male students who would shout "Whore!" at a female student would be disciplined for contributing to a hostile environment. But female students who publicly declare innocent male students to be rapists, well, they get grants and publicity, and the general endorsement from the university administration.

It's hard to keep count of the number of times Gottfredson has verbally endorsed Obama's sexual assault task force. He repeats the mythical "1 in 5" with such passion he appears to be self-flagellating in a ritual enacted in the suffering hope of retaining his job, which really does appear to be at risk. A faculty member's website posts daily entreaties for Gottfredon's firing or forced resignation.

Indeed, the president of the university shows no ability or interest in putting a stop to the gang which I've begun to call the new McCarthyites. It is a fitting pejorative for people who destroy others with character smears designed to cast themselves as defenders of virtue and morality. Like McCarthyism, there is a political objective. President Obama is pandering to a student voting block which Hillary Clinton will rely on heavily when she runs for President of the U.S. The University of Oregon is a vast bevy of Democratic voters, especially every four years. The critical key is to motivate voter turn-out.

I am not personally acquainted with any of the three (now former) basketball players. That does not matter, as the attack on them is an attack on the rights to presumption of innocence and privacy. For example, if the university president had called a press conference to denounce a softball team member as a disgusting lesbian, I would join the protest to protect her rights to access higher education, and I'd join the loudest of demands for firing the president. But that is only a hypothetical incident. Reality rarely drops itself into your lap as a warm, fuzzy gift.

Adam Kostakis · 27 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the third of twelve lectures. – PW

Lecture No. 3

"Have you ever actually looked up the word feminist in a dictionary? It means equality between the sexes. It is not about hating men. This is very simple and you would know if you actually looked it up" – Diva

Following on from last week's overview of Gynocentrism then and now, I propose that there is a common thread of female-worship running through, and linking, traditional conceptions of masculinity – historically expressed in what we might call 'patriarchy' – and feminism, which has taken over state and supranational institutions, and is poised to unleash the explicit persecution of men.

It may well take many more of these lectures before this is fully elucidated, but I mention it here for two purposes. The first is a reminder that reference to this common thread runs through all these musings: that Gynocentrism has been with us for a long, long time, and has only changed its form, not its content. This is the crux of Gynocentrism Theory, and it is the narrow focus which I am taking over a broad range of subjects.

Secondly, to shift the discussion towards feminism. There is the danger of reading into Gynocentrism Theory a minimization of feminism's effects, considering that it is only the most modern version of a phenomenon which is centuries old. On the other hand, though, it is the most active form of Gynocentrism that we must presently deal with; it is the enemy, and as the all-singing, all-dancing tremendous final act in this regard, it is a phenomenon worthy of study in its own regard.

Better the devil you know! It is said that it is better to know thine enemy, but feminists are highly effective at obscuring their own intentions, actions, history, and penchant for the use of eristic. Amidst the smoke and mirrors, a chorus of shrill voices from all directions can be heard to proclaim, "it's not our job to educate you about feminism!"

Fine – then we shall have to cast around for ourselves, burrow for gems of knowledge, and procure our own judgments on what feminism is. And since feminists themselves have disavowed their role as our educators, the conclusions which we reach shall require no sanction from them. If it is not their job to educate us about feminism, then it could hardly be anybody else's but our own, could it? And yet, strangely enough, when we do seek out knowledge for ourselves, they object most vociferously to our findings, as though they do in fact covet the role of educator after all. It has been repeatedly suggested that we might like to check the dictionary.

This is a spurious request, not least because there is no 'the dictionary'. There are, rather, dictionaries (plural). The Appeal to Dictionary is one which is made by people who, to put it bluntly, are not very bright. Such people apparently believe that language is a finite array of words, each carrying a single objective definition, the final arbiter of which is The Dictionary.

In the real world, language is ever fluctuating and it is corruptible. It is a collection of meanings, designated by terms – but quite how these are configured is determined by the vagaries of time and place! And very often, people disagree about how terms are, or should be, designated to meanings – and how meanings are, or should be, designated to terms!

The very existence of contested terminology, then, seems to refute the Appeal to Dictionary. Where disputes arise over the definition or use of a term, this is an indication that we have several meanings (or ideas, or concepts, if you prefer) huddled together under the same word-umbrella. To put it another way: there are several things, but they are all designated by the same word. A given configuration of terms to meanings may benefit certain people, and be of detriment to certain others!

Let's take an example – sometimes, the claim that feminism supports women in making false rape allegations has been refuted by a reference to feminism's stated support for sexual equality. "Feminism," a feminist would say, "is about sexual equality, and nothing more."

And yet false rape allegations still exist – as does feminist complicity in the making of them. This issue has only been deprived of recognition in language. The feminist has expertly obscured the complicity of feminism in the making of false rape allegations, by whitewashing the ideology as being "about sexual equality, and nothing more." If we accept her argument that feminism only refers to support for sexual equality, then we no longer have any terms with which to discuss or understand false rape allegations, beyond viewing them as a series of unrelated incidents. Certainly, we wouldn't be able to consider false rape allegations in their proper context, which is as part of a system of control and persecution. The phenomenon of a false rape allegation is surely not explicable by what we understand when we say "sexual equality," and since feminism is about nothing more than that, we are left with no linguistic resources with which to meaningfully speak about it; we have been struck dumb. In short, we have an existing thing, but it is no longer designated by any words. How then could we draw attention to it, criticize it, oppose it?

Let's take another example. A feminist may well create a false partition in the problem of Father's Rights by defining it in such a way that feminist culpability is overlooked. She could, for instance, say that "patriarchy is to blame for the unequal treatment of fathers." Once again, she has controlled the language – meanings are split between terms, or they are compressed into one, and the intended outcome is that the guilty party avoids being taken to task!

Now, you might think – "why does this matter? A feminist might say this or that, but I don't believe her; my own experiences tell me that it's not true, and I'm unlikely to be fooled by what she says."

That's all well and good. But there are a lot of people out there who will be fooled by what she says – including those who possess the very real physical power to imprison you, destroy you, or alienate you from your loved ones. Feminists aren't just saying this to people like you and I – their nonsense gushes forth in all directions, like crude oil from a burst pipe, flowing towards anybody who will listen, and especially those who can "do something about it." Their message comes through, louder than a rushing waterfall, whether you want to hear it or not – and their whole project depends upon the relentless repetition of a dozen or so mantras, and the sinking of their sentiments into the collective subconscious. This is why they endlessly prattle on, typically parroting stock phrases like subordinate cells in a hive mind! They do it because it works – at least, until somebody stands up and points out that the Emperor's not wearing any clothes.

And then, all hell breaks loose!

It was necessary to speak at length on this point, because we must realize that political language is never neutral, and implications are always hidden in the configuration of ideas and terms. The role of Men's Rights Advocates is to critically assess the feminist use of language, and to determine where we would be well-served to separate out several ideas which are referred to by one term, or to compress several terms into one. We should never respond to a feminist argument without first looking critically at the terms through which it is being conducted. To put it in Gamespeak, we must "control the frame!"

The Appeal to Dictionary can be summarily dismissed. Official dictionaries represent establishment positions. Feminism, as it is in vogue, is officially defined in the way that its adherents would like the world to see feminism; it is not defined in a way that describes, or accounts for, the totality of the project. That which happened, or still happens, but does not reflect the establishment view, is simply ignored. To define feminism as is to brush aside much of its unpleasant history – and to deprive skeptics of the resources for an unofficial linguistic and historical analysis of the term. This old revision of the Wikipedia page 'Feminism and Equality' contains plenty of material which disputes the black-and-white dictionary definition, although the page itself has fallen prey to the very same forces which seek to delimit the linguistic opportunities of their critics. Thankfully, Wikipedia archives old versions of its articles, so the efforts of one Nick Levinson in exposing the explicitly anti-male tenor of several famous feminist works has not gone to waste. Let's get cracking!

> Jill Johnston, in Lesbian Nation, called for men to eliminate the qualities they hold as men. "Man is completely out of phase with nature. Nature is woman. Man is the intruder. The man who re-attunes himself with nature is the man who de-mans himself or eliminates himself as man […] A small but significant number of angry and historically minded women comprehend the women's revolution in the visionary sense of an end to the catastrophic brotherhood and a return to the former glory and wise equanimity of the matriarchies."
> Mary Daly, in Gyn/Ecology, wrote in favor of reversing power between the genders […] "As a creative crystallizing of the movement beyond the state of Patriarchal Paralysis, this book is an act of Dis-possession; and hence, in a sense beyond the limitations of the label anti-male, it is absolutely Anti-androcrat, A-mazingly Anti-male, Furiously and Finally Female."
> "Do women need land and an army . . .; or a feminist government in exile . . .? Or is it simpler: the bed belongs to the woman; the house belongs to the woman; any land belongs to the woman; if a male intimate is violent he is removed from the place where she has the superior and inviolate claim, arrested, denied parole, and prosecuted. . . . . Could women 'set a high price on our blood'?" – Andrea Dworkin
> Phyllis Chesler, in Women and Madness, drew on matriarchal history, Amazon mythology, and psychology and, with some ambivalence about relying on biology alone as a justification, argued that a war between the genders has always been underway and that women would benefit from using their full powers to be the exclusive wielders of political power to produce an unequal society in which men live but are relatively powerless, even if such a society is no more just than a patriarchy, and called for feminist women to dominate public institutions in their self-interest. "Amazon society, as mythology, history, and universal male nightmare, > represents a culture in which women reign culturally supreme because of their gender […] In Amazon society, only men, when they were allowed to remain, were, in widely differing degrees, powerless and oppressed […] If women take their bodies seriously—and ideally we should—then its full expression, in terms of pleasure, maternity, and physical strength, seems to fare better when women control the means of production and reproduction. From this point of view, it is simply not in women's interest to support patriarchy or even a fabled 'equality' with men."

> One organization that was named The Feminists was interested in matriarchy. Two members wanted "'the restoration of female rule'".

Unless the aforementioned organization and books did not really exist, we are forced to conclude that feminism cannot only have been about the advocacy of women's rights on the grounds of equality with men. At the very least, what we must say is that some feminists may have supported equality, while other feminists have overlooked equality and have outright supported female superiority. And neither can the latter group be reduced to a handful of fringe lunatics. As Nick Levinson points out (much to the chagrin of feminist moderators), two and a half million copies of Phyllis Chesler's Women and Madness were sold.

That's a whole lot of hate.

And a whole lot of energy is spent actively sweeping this kind of thing under the rug, by those who have since realized how damaging honesty can be to one's case. Modern feminists are far more rhetorically disciplined than their forthright foremothers, and have concluded that unpopular plans are not helped into motion by being discussed openly. Rhetorical discipline adds a whole new layer of subterfuge to all that has been said regarding the designation of terms to ideas. It will not suffice only to look at what they say; we must watch carefully what they do. And haven't some of the above recommendations come true, per the actions of feminists? Is it not now the case that male intimates accused of violence are removed from their homes in which the woman has the superior and inviolate claim, as Andrea Dworkin hoped for? Have feminist women not dominated public institutions in their own interest, as Phyllis Chesler advocated? As Gynocentrism Theory tells us, women already had a "high price on their blood" – much higher than that of men, at almost any time in history. This simple fact is the reason why it was possible for the prescriptions of radical feminists to be achieved in the first place – and for dissidents to have been so effortlessly marginalized.

Still, times change. Establishments are overturned, and words are officially redefined. If the new definition of a word proves more accurate, then it must have existed for some time, unofficially, before the word's revision. Sometimes, establishments must change before terms catch up. The dictionary lags behind definition, because the establishment is stuck in the mud. I predict that, as we reach a critical mass opposed to feminism, and shortly before its collapse, we may well see some concessions in the form of alternative definitions of the term becoming accepted.

Paul Elam · 28 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

With no particular surprise it has come to our attention that there are efforts underway to prevent us from following through with AVFM's First International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit, June 26-28.

Among other efforts there is a protest planned for Saturday, June 7 in the Grand Circus Park Historic District.

We remind you that this is a protest designed to silence the voice of people like Erin Pizzey, the woman who started the battered women's shelter movement; to silence Sen. Anne Cools, the first Black female Senator in North America and founder of one of its first battered women's shelters; to silence Dr. Warren Farrell, former chairperson for the National Organization for Women and ranked as one of the top 100 thinkers of the Twentieth Century by Financial Times.

That is just to name a few.

More importantly, it is an effort to silence the issues; to silence the voice of half of humanity.

While I find the nature and intent of this protest to be beneath simple contempt, I nonetheless value the right of free speech. That includes speech that is designed to bait others into reaction.

We are even aware that now the protestors are seeking "actors" to use in some fashion. The idea that these actors are likely intended to pose as MHRAs committing misdeeds is clearly within the realm of possibility.

For this reason and others, I am instructing all AVFM staff to NOT attend this demonstration for any reason. Ignoring this request will be taken as an immediate resignation from your position with AVFM, regardless of what that position is. No exceptions.

I strongly encourage any MHRA that genuinely values our mission to consider that there is nothing whatsoever to be gained by attending this event and engaging these people in any way. Indeed, there could be much to lose in doing so.

Our event is on June 26-29. We have a contract. And we have a program that is approaching being sold out. We are going to continue and will deal with any hurdles that come our way. But we will not engage with pranksters, misfits and thugs. Much better to leave them to the Detroit Police Department, whom we are informing of everything we can find out about the protestors in advance.

I ask everyone at AVFM and the MHRM to remember why we are having this conference. It is to highlight the issues faced by men and boys, not to indulge the violent fantasies of gender ideologues.

Regarding the conference itself, please accept a word of caution. There could be protests there as well. In fact, it would be a bit surprising if there were not.

It will be the objective of our security team, from the head down, to see that anyone who violates the law, causes illegal disruptions, incites or acts out in any way violent, is placed in handcuffs and leaves the facility in a police cruiser.

We do not care if you call yourself a feminist, an MRA, MHRA or something else. Anyone acting out illegally will go to jail, and AVFM will cover travel and other expenses of those needed to go back to Detroit to testify against them later at legal proceedings.

I know this may sound harsh, but above all it is our objective to host a safe and secure conference which allows us to further the mission we all value.

Pauley Perrette Co-Conspirator John Nazarian Under Investigation, AVfM asks for Restraining Order

Suzanne McCarley · 28 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There have been recent some developments since the previous posts regarding corrupt, unethical, and Pauley Perrette criminal co-conspirator, private investigator John “How to throw your husband out (by dialing 911 and falsely accusing him)” Nazarian.

The California Department of Consumer Affairs, Bureau of Security and Investigative Services has officially opened an investigation out of their headquarters Sacramento Office, into the unethical and criminal activities of Mr. Nazarian, Case # IA2014927.

You can see the latest AVFM fax sent to Investigator Mr. William Ziegler, wherein it was asked that the Department of Consumer Affairs petition for a restraining order against Mr. Nazarian while the investigation is under way. Under California state law, Mr. Nazarian will have to surrender all firearms and provide proof to the court of doing so. As the AVFM fax indicates, there have been additional complaints filed with the FBI, Los Angeles Field Office.

Besides Mr. Francis Shivers and his immediate family members, there were other persons and organizations to be included and listed as protected persons in the restraining order petition. Since word has spread via twitter campaigns, it appears that others have also contacted the Department of Consumer Affairs or who have filed complaints of Nazarian’s abhorrent, unethical, and criminal conduct.

It is re-assuring to a certain extent that another of the dozen different governmental entities and oversight bodies has officially opened an investigation into the criminal activity flagrantly flaunted by Mr. Nazarian, and his involvement in the Pauley Perrette “Star Crazy” celebrity/public corruption scandal.

To date, we are still waiting to hear what, if anything, the Los Angeles County Grand Jury is doing with respect to the public corruption complaint that was filed on July 31, 2013, that consisted of over 1,500 pages of information.

We are still waiting to see what the California State Bar will do with the complaints involving Perrette criminal co-conspirators, attorneys Alexandra Lavinsky and Ronald Litz, and Los Angeles Deputy City Attorney Elizabeth Gertz. As of yet, despite providing PROOF of criminal conduct on the part of these lawyers, there has been no action or sanctions levied by the State Bar.

The readers who have been following this case have indicated that they not only want to see action, they want to see booking photos. We agree, and AVFM and the volunteers, advocates, trial watchers, and others who have participated in this ongoing saga will not rest and will not stop until these criminals are behind bars.

Recently, an organized online effort resulted in the hashtag #JusticeForCoyoteShivers trending worldwide three times in one day, peaking at Number 6. During the latest court hearing, #FreeCoyoteShivers had placed as the Number 2 Worldwide trending topic. There is a growing army demanding justice in this case.

The University of Illinois at Chicago revealed a report of an extensive study http://www.uic.edu/depts/pols/ChicagoPolitics/leadingthepack.pdf in February of 2012 that lists the City of Chicago as the most corrupt city in the U.S. Not surprisingly, Los Angeles came in a close second. We disagree and when you throw in the abuses of the restraining order system and the vast indifference of unethical and criminal conduct by some public officials and lawyers, we believe that LA should top the list.

We’ll see what comes out of this investigation of Mr. Nazarian and it is hoped that his title will change from Mister to Inmate Number. Maybe John will luck out and become cellmates with the other corrupt LA PI to the Stars Anthony Pellicano, who is currently a resident of the Federal Department of Corrections.

For those readers who have contacted us and others; if you have information or a complaint involving Mr. John, please call Mr. William Ziegler in Sacramento @ (916) 575-7000 or fax (916) 574-8676. Please voice your concerns of threats, witness intimidation, or possible acts of retaliation or reprisal from the LAPD, the LA County District Attorney's Office, or the Office of the LA City Attorney.

It is recommended that complaints or information be put in fax form and to obtain a fax confirmation to provide proof of an electronic trail of information. If you must talk to someone on the phone, record your conversation and to be in compliance with California State Law, you must advise the other party that you are recording the conversation.

Adam Kostakis · 28 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the fourth of twelve lectures. – PW

Lecture No. 4

> It is as if the ordinary language we use every day has a hidden set of signals, a kind of secret code – William Stafford

To recap on last week's lecture: Men's Rights Advocates should not be afraid to play around with words; to reframe debate; to recast conventional linguistic usages however we see fit. Don't be afraid to make a game out of it. Use words – and the meanings you choose to ascribe to them – to mock, humiliate, and confuse your enemies. Here's a good example – it makes use of typical feminist phraseology, but with one major difference:

> Not all patriarchs are like that. I am a patriarch – and proud of it – but that doesn't mean that I, personally, am responsible for what other patriarchs do, particularly not those radical patriarchs. But patriarchy isn't a monolithic entity. There isn't only one kind of patriarchy. There are lots of different types of patriarchs who have different views.

Note that defining yourself as a patriarch need not imply that you define yourself as feminists think that patriarchs should be. Feminists are not linguistic arbiters; you are absolutely free to call yourself a patriarch using your own definition of the term, which may or may not coincide to some extent with their definition. Whatever the case, though, you certainly don't need to explain which qualities you possess that, in your mind, make you patriarchal. However, upon announcing that you are a patriarch, you may find feminists attempting to trick you into giving some definite shape to your patriarchy; the shape having already taken form in her mind, her task now is to get you to acknowledge it. She will say something emotive like, "oh, so you think men should just be able to rape women with impunity?"

Your initial response, of course, will be a furrowed brow. Then you will say, "of course I don't think that. And yet I am still, most certainly, a patriarch."

In this example, you could define patriarchy any way you please; having decided in advance that feminism is non-credible, you have dismissed altogether any feministic notion of what patriarchy is. You could even, if you like, define yourself as a patriarch on the grounds that you support equality between men and women. Yes, that kind of wordplay will wind them up no end, because feminism depends upon a peculiar configuration of words and meanings, which may not be circumnavigated without signaling a threat to the ideology's power base.

Does the suggestion above sound preposterous? Well, I can but refer you to a real example of a social movement, the success of which has depended, for the most part, on its adroitness at linguistic manipulation. I am speaking, of course, of feminism, the proponents of which have made it their business to recast perceptions of reality through the redefinition of words. But this weapon is available to all those who are marginalized; it is the establishment which must defend its orthodoxy, not the outcasts! And while feminists once made great use of this strategy on the linguistic battlefield, it has become a point of vulnerability for them now that they control the machine, rather than rage against it. Now, you see, they must consolidate their gains; they must conserve what they have created; and thus, they are placed on the defensive, guarding their etymological orthodoxies from those who beg to differ. As I noted in the first lecture, their capacity for controlling perceptions of reality is faltering. The iron is hot. It is time to strike!

But, have I been too quick to dismiss the definition of feminism as offered up by feminists? I think I may have been. Even essentially contested concepts, as W. B. Gallie referred to them, must have meanings which are greater than normative, else communication about them would be rendered impossible. That is – there must be some amount of general consensus over what feminism is, between feminists and anti-feminists, or we would not be able to argue about it! Even despite the differences between a feminist's view of feminism and of our own, some shared content must exist at some level, or we would be talking about entirely different things. They might be talking about the feminist movement, while I am talking about horse-rearing, although we both refer to our respective subjects as 'feminism' – but we wouldn't have much to say to each other, would we, if this were the case?

So, I shall posit the following as a universally applicable definition of feminism; that is to say, it must fit everyone's criteria for what feminism is, in spite of the different perspectives that different people hold on its nature. It is a suitably limited definition, since it can encompass only those parts of feminism which all definitions hold in common. So, here it is: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

That, then, is what everybody who discusses feminism holds in common regarding the concept, whether they are supportive, skeptical, or nihilistically indifferent. No feminist, I think, would deny that this is, at the very least, the 'bare bones' of feminism, even if she would prefer to flesh it out in a lot more detail. But that will not do, for beyond this narrow inference, we disagree with each other. To be as objective as possible, then, we must take only that which everybody agrees upon, and that is our universally applicable definition.

Note that there is no mention of equality. This is because, as I uncovered last week with the help of one Nick Levinson, there are a number of feminists who explicitly did not pursue equality, but supremacy. So, equality cannot fit into the universal definition of feminism, since certain feminists themselves – who were very famously, unequivocally feminist – disavowed it. To say that feminism is 'about equality', then, would be to place oneself in diametrical opposition to several extremely influential feminists! And why, that would be … misogynistic!

Nor can feminism be said to be the project for increasing the power of women relative to men, since, in this counter-feminist's view, feminists are often quite content to increase the power of women in an absolute sense. That is, they endeavor to grab all they can for women, without reference to the status of men. The phrase 'relative to men,' then, only serves to imply that women are power-less relative to men at present, thus casting feminism in an unfairly favorable light. In reality, once women do achieve power which is at an equal or equivalent level to that of men, the demands of feminists do not stop. What we find is that female power becomes entrenched, and extended, and when it surpasses male power, this is simply referred to as 'parity' and ignored by feminists – at least, when they are not gloating over men's newfound powerlessness.

Nor are we able to list, in our universal definition, the specific areas of life, or spheres, in which the feminist project applies. This is because feminism is inherently universalizing; it seeks to colonize and dominate every single facet of life where men and women meet. It aims for domination in every sphere of life, actual and potential.

You may disagree with some of the points above, particularly if you are supportive of feminism. But this does nothing to change our universal definition, because all we can say about those points is that they are contentious. That is, feminists and non-feminists, who are educated about feminism, disagree about these aspects of feminism, and it would simply be biased to take one or the other view for granted. That would be like consulting only Jacobins on the historical accomplishments of the Jacobin Club, or like canvassing only conservatives to explain modern liberalism. It would be a good example of poor methodology, and would help us very little in our search for truth. Right? So then, our universally applicable definition cannot be expanded beyond that which we stated before: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

We must not be swayed by feminist attempts to deny the universalizing tendency inherent to feminism. In their attempts to win the debate over what feminism is, feminists are notorious for abridging their own ideology to a nub of its whole, and presenting their support for – and your dissent from – feminism as resting entirely on a single issue. Let me give an example, in which you are confronted by the Appeal to Franchise. You have just stated that you do not support feminism. Your feminist opponent's next move is to reduce the entirety of feminism to women gaining the right to vote – thus implying that you must oppose this, since you claimed to oppose feminism. You must simply remind all onlookers that feminism is about more than this and cannot be reduced to a single item as she has tried to do. You can openly state your support for that single item – in this case, the vote – while nevertheless maintaining your antipathy towards feminism, this being in no way reducible to women's right to vote.

Essentially, your conscience is clear, and you are free to label yourself a non-feminist – and even, an anti-feminist – sans the implication that you therefore support every single thing that feminism opposes.

So, to recap: the only thing we are all going to be able to agree on is that feminism is the project for increasing the power of women. As you may have noticed, feminists go a little further than this when speaking about what they think feminism is, and they shall have plenty of half-truths and obfuscations to offer up if you ask them politely enough – though remember, it's not their job to educate us about these things.

As such, we may leave them to their own fluffy fantasies, and move beyond the universal definition to one which more accurately accounts for men's experiences of the world.

So, here is the definition I offer up: "feminism is the most recent, and presently the most culturally dominant form of Gynocentrism. It is a victim ideology which explicitly advocates female supremacy, at every facet of life in which men and women meet; it does so in accordance with its universalizing tendency, and so it does so in each sphere of life, including but extending beyond the political, social, cultural, personal, emotional, sexual, spiritual, economic, governmental and legal. By female supremacy, I refer to the notion that women should possess superiority of status, power and protection relative to men. It is the dominant cultural paradigm in the Western world and beyond. It is morally indefensible, although its adherents ensure that their hegemony goes unchallenged through the domination of societal institutions and the use of state violence."

In response to last week's lecture, Primal offered up his own definition of feminism, which is not quite the same as mine, but the two are certainly complementary:

> Gender-feminism is an overarching ideology built on a stack of bald-faced lies. As the primary reverse-sexist superstition of Post Modern age, it forms the foundation for female sexual supremacy in the name of 'gender' equality. Like other half-baked Utopian fantasies, it is totalitarian to the core. It is formed from a witch's brew of recycled but dis-credited ideological relics from the trash heap of history…relics like Marxism, Romanticism and Classism. It's proponents proudly destroy well-established standards of scholarship to force others to take the ideology seriously. It's adherents have spread like carcinogenic pathogens in authoritarian institutions…that is wherever power is perverted for political reasons. It's philosophy is nonsensical, circular, and self-serving. As the primary moral foundation for the mainstream hate groups which operate in the name of Women's Rights worldwide, gender-feminism is a dangerous dogma and one that has no place in civil discourse.

Both of our definitions are rather lengthy, although I think it is useful to have a statement of exactly what we mean by the term. It could be much shortened and presented as follows: feminism equals female supremacism.

That the shortened version is more memorable is offset by its unfortunate implications that i) only women are feminists, and ii) all women support feminism. Neither i) nor ii) is correct. The charge of supremacism alone is not really sufficient for our purposes; it leaves too much left unsaid regarding what this supremacism is, and about the success rate of feminism so far. For shorthand purposes, it will do, but it should be remembered that it is a reduction of broader definitions as worked out here and elsewhere.

What may be more useful for our purposes in presenting our view of what feminism is is a brief statement of its goals. Feminism essentially seeks the following goals:

(1) The expropriation of resources from men to women.
(2) The punishment of men.
(3) To increase (1) and (2) in terms of scope and intensity indefinitely.
I feel that such a definition will strike a nerve with feminists themselves – because it hits a little too close to home. That the real-world effects of the feminist project have indeed been (1) and (2), and that these have increased in scope and intensity over the years (3) is frankly, irrefutable.

Time has yielded the truth about what happens when feminist-minded women come to occupy the most powerful positions in society, and that is that Men's Rights are systematically trashed. The more power that feminists have, the more new laws are created to accomplish greater confiscation of men's property and intensifying violations of their liberty, bodily integrity, and lives.

But there is hope. For it is deeds, not words, that shall speak our enemies. Have a pleasant weekend, everyone.

No Common Ground – Short documentary on men's rights

You want to blame the MHRM for Elliot Rodger? Blame gynocentrism instead.

Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) · 29 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There have been a couple of articles on why the mainstream media is dead wrong trying to blame the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) for the shooting spree Elliot Rodger went on. The absurdity of those accusations has been led bare by fellow AVfM authors Janet Bloomfield and Luigi Logan already. My goal, in this article, is therefore to highlight some facets that show an infinitely stronger link of the horrendous act Elliot Rodger committed to, no, not the MHRM, but to gynocentrism.

What strikes you when you read up on that young man's life is that he seemingly had it all. He was certainly good-looking, came from a privileged background, and was highly intelligent. By no means do I want to justify the utterly dark and reprehensible prose in his manifesto, "My twisted world," but it is safe to say that he was very intelligent. He was certainly more articulate than most of the children of the elite I've met in my life.

Eyeballing it, I am tempted to say that he was in the top 1% of the population in terms of wealth, education, intellect, and social status. I furthermore hold the opinion that he was very good-looking. For a less mature audience I would now have to add "not a homo," but suffice to say that he is far above average. Looking at those factors alone, one wonders what drove him into insanity. He had it all. In his manifesto he recounts a childhood that has very little to do with Joe Average: early childhood in a stately home in England, exclusive communities in California, private kindergarten, elite high schools, celebrity friends, extensive travels.

When reading his manifesto, some traumatic events stand out: being bullied at school, or experiencing the divorce of his parents. I noticed some commenters remarking that feminism is to blame for undermining the family unit, which then would allow you to conclude that feminism is, at least partly responsible, for Elliot Rodger's shooting spree. This does not seem to be an implausible argument, but this is a tangent I do not intend to follow here.

There had been a rather unfortunate string of tragic events in his life. Elliot Rodger was apparently highly sensitive to the reactions shown by others. Obviously, the divorce of his parents came as a major shock to him, but that was hardly the only factor. His father was, due to his job, often absent, the relationship with his mother was not without problems either, but it certainly pales compared to the extreme levels of emotional abuse his stepmother Soumaya inflicted on him. For instance, knowing about his insecurities, it appears Soumaya relentlessly pushed his emotional buttons:

> I had an argument with Soumaya while I was visiting father's house. It started when she began to boast that my brother Jazz was recently signed by an agent to act in T.V. commercials. She said that by the time he is my age, he will be a successful actor. I talked about how Jazz was already so socially savvy for his age, and how I've always envied him for it. She told me he will never have any problems with girls, and will lose his virginity while he's young. I had to sit there and listen to the bitch tell me that my little brother will grow up enjoying the life I've always craved for, but missed out on.

When reading his manifesto, it is also quite obvious that he did not know how to befriend people. Instead, he was expecting things to somehow happen. He does not make a move, even when presented with the opportunity, like when a good-looking girl smiles at him as they are crossing paths on a private beach in Malibu. His inactivity allows him to maintain the belief that no woman is interested in him. Of course, his approach to social interactions is directly influenced by mainstream media nonsense. As a girl, you can lean back and just wait for something to happen. As a guy you are not so comfortable, and inactivity may easily lead to involuntary celibacy.

I don't want to speculate too much, but it is quite telling that his parents did not intervene when he spent entire days playing World of Warcraft. It is the combination of parental neglect, and his hyper-sensitivity towards social rejection that made it very difficult for him to interact normally with his peers. Are those consequences of feminism destroying the family unit? Sure.

What I found particularly moving was the following part in his manifesto, describing an event that happened when he was 11 years old.

> I accidentally bumped into a pretty girl the same age as me, and she got very angry. She cursed at me and pushed me, embarrassing me in front of my friends. I didn't know who this girl was… She was only at Pinecrest for summer camp… But she was very pretty, and she was taller than me. I immediately froze up and went into a state of shock. One of my friends asked me if I was ok, and I didn't answer. I remained very quiet for the rest of the day.
> I couldn't believe what had happened. Cruel treatment from women is ten times worse than from men. It made me feel like an insignificant, unworthy little mouse. I felt so small and vulnerable. I couldn't believe that this girl was so horrible to me, and I thought that it was because she viewed me as a loser. That was the first experience of female cruelty I endured, and it traumatized me to no end. It made me even more nervous around girls, and I would be extremely weary and cautious of them from that point on.

Here was another part in his manifesto that stood out to me:

> The way I was treated by girls at this time, especially by that evil bitch Monette Moio, sparked an intense fear of girls. The funny part of this is that I had a secret crush on Monette. She was the first girl I ever had a crush on, and I never admitted it to anyone. To be teased and ridiculed by the girl I had a crush on wounded me deeply. The world that I grew up thinking was bright and blissful was all over. I was living in a depraved world, and I didn't want to accept it. I didn't want to give any thought to it. That is why I immersed myself entirely into my online games like World of Warcraft. I felt safe there.

What I found particularly upsetting was the spin of this part on some other website, where that woman now claims to be "devastated," as her father is cited as saying:

> "She's devastated by this," the dad said in a phone interview. "She doesn't even remember this guy. . . . She's always been the most delicate kid you'd ever want to meet. For him to call her a bully, this kid was really disillusioned.
> "She was 10 years old," the dad added. "He was two years older than her. He was in my son's class. She was in the seventh grade and he was in eighth grade. . . . Can you imagine a 10-year-old kid bullying a 12-year-old? This little, petite girl bullying him?"

Yes, Mr. Moio, I can perfectly imagine cruel a young girl bullying a young boy, particularly one who is perceived to be "weak". I think you have to be incredibly naive about the world to assume that girls are always sweet and innocent.

Not to go off a tangent, but I once witnessed a small girl on a playground pushing a boy who was smaller than her, then ridiculing him with the words, "You can't hit me back because you're a boy and boys aren't allowed to hit girls." Normally, girls chose psychological warfare over physical aggression, though.

With other students bullying him, and seemingly being unable to establish himself socially in school, Elliot Rodger grew up becoming increasingly insecure and feeling like an outcast. Subsequently, he builds up a fantasy image according to which he would finally belong and be one of the cool kids if he only had a girlfriend. The fantasies he describes of how happy his life with a girl on his side would be could be taken from ads and movies, and presumably came from that.

Having no experience with girls, and not really knowing what to do about it, increased his frustration year after year after year. He died a virgin. He never even kissed a girl. Given how prevalent sex is in the media, and how frequently men get told that their entire self-worth solely depends on how valuable they are for women, it is no surprise that men with a more fragile psyche are susceptible to those messages. Indeed, it takes quite a strong will to ignore mainstream media nonsense.

Being inexperienced with women is, by itself, not a big problem. You don't need to have sex. However, our gynocentric culture heavily promotes the idea that the purpose of every man's life has to be to please women, in some way or another. Examples are guys who willingly let themselves being exploited by gold diggers, or people pursuing risky endeavors with the hope of high financial gains, which then would give them access to women. No, not everybody shares this motivation.

A very good argument can be made that progress of society has been due to people, mostly men, following their intrinsic motivation. Nobel prize laureates hardly ever drown in pussy. The one exception I can think of is merely confirming the rule — and that guy, Richard Feynman, had a cynical view on women in the hookup culture that was evolving in his day. (In Surely You're Joking Mr. Feynman! – he stated, "I adopted the attitude that those bar girls are all bitches, that they aren't worth anything, and all they're in there for is to get you to buy them a drinks…")

In the PUA scene it is not uncommon that men spend a large amount of their savings on dubious coaches. They hope that finally, once they get it, women will come flock to them, which will then vindicate their existence. It's as if without women their life was completely worthless. The question those guys never ask, though, is how they can even know that it is so great to be with a woman. I don't want to sound too crass, but rubbing one out compares quite favorably to what some women I've hooked up with delivered in the bedroom.

Further, what many guys can attest, having a girlfriend or wife can be a real pain in the neck, to put it mildly. If you haven't looked into the abyss yourself yet, then I warmly encourage you to read some of the articles Tara Palmantier has contributed to this site. No, none of this is an exaggeration. "Cluster B" personality disorders are not the figment of the imagination of a woman-hating patriarchy, but a sad fact of life. In fact, the more women you meet, the more attractive celibacy becomes. There are simply too many damaged women out there.

Again, how would an inexperienced man know that being with a woman is great? The harsh truth of the matter is that they can't know it. If you point this out to them too bluntly, though, they tend to get defensive. People normally don't like their delusions shattered. What those involuntary celibate men think they know is a product of the entertainment industry. Sure enough, the PUA industry feeds into the same nonsense and wants to tell guys that they will feel like superstars if they only learnt to get laid, or that having a girlfriend would finally give their life meaning. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Being bombarded with the message that you are nothing if you don't have a girlfriend, or that you are a loser if you can't get laid, imposes a serious toll on the mental health of many young men. Virgin-shaming is part of life for many men, and so is having your sexuality questioned by women if you do not reciprocate their interest in you.

Many men have been rhetorically asked whether they are sure that they aren't gay, just because they so happened to not find a particular woman who fancied them particularly attractive. Just like some women need to learn that merely being a woman is not a sufficient for getting any guy you fancy, so do many guys have to learn that their self-worth is not a function of how many girls they picked up, or how many months or years they spent in relationships.

But what happens to guys who don't get laid? Many are quite desperate. Some spend thousands on dubious dating coaches. Others go abroad, hoping to have better luck elsewhere. Some fall into depression. The following quote is also taken from Elliot Rodger's manifesto, but it is hardly the statement of a madman. If you swallow blue pills for breakfast, you likely think similarly:

> A man having a beautiful girl by his side shows the world that he is worth something, because obviously that beautiful girl sees some sort of worth in him. If a man is all alone, people get the impression that girls are repulsed by him, and therefore he is a worthless loser.

I genuinely wonder what would happen if we told young men about the possible dangers of getting involved with women: that they may get tricked into pregnancy, that a divorce may rob them of half their assets, that they might have children they come to love only to have them torn from them, that a mentally unstable girlfriend or wife may make them clinically depressed, which might threaten their career, that sex isn't that much better than masturbation, but just different, that escorts provide a safe and cheap alternative, compared to an abusive girlfriend?

In short, what if the warning messages we share on a site like A Voice for Men where not relegated to a mere niche of the Internet, but part of the mainstream? I contend that we would see a lot less of the mental health problems among young men than we witness today. It might even have helped prevent Elliot Rodger's horrible killing spree. It might also lead more women to realize that men's feelings matter too.

Elliot Rodger was not a product of the PUA community, and he was not influenced by the MHRM. If anything, he, and the people he took with him, were a sacrifice at the altar of gynocentrism. As long as we, as a society, don't make a concerted effort to build the confidence of men, so that they learn that their self-worth is not determined by women, it will only be a matter of time before we will read about the next mentally deranged individual going crazy.

There is also good news coming from Sweden

Lucian Vâlsan · 29 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Many non-feminists were rightfully upset when the news that the radical Marxist-Feminist party "Feminist Initiative" (Feministisk Initiativ, sometimes abbreviated F!) got a seat in the European Parliament.

The fact that such a radical party, which advocates nothing less than re-education camps for men and a charter that makes the old Soviet Union look like a nice place, could be voted in a country that many think of as a highly enlightened and civilized is indeed a shock. On the other hand, knowing the fact that Sweden is a consensus-driven society and anyone who doesn't conform to the consensus is facing social ostracism (just ask Pär Ström) perhaps the fact that F! was voted isn't really much of a surprise.

But [image]if we really look closer to the vote, we notice that most of their supporters come from a tiny district of Stockholm called Södermalm-Enskede, a district where all the "cool" people live – the journalists, the so-called opinion-leaders and generally the upper middle class left-wing pricks. The Swedish equivalent of Guardianistas. As you can see on the graph, in that place, F! was the second-most voted political party, lagging only behind another radical party – Miljöpartiet de Gröna (the Green Party). This tells us that the support for these kinds of nutjobs isn't wide and huge at all.

In the last 12 months or so, Sweden has actually achieved tangible progress when it comes to the treatment of men and the apparent nationwide anti-male consensus is cracking apart more and more. So let's review these things a bit.

Law combating parental alienation

On July 1st, this year, an amendment to the Swedish Family Law will enter into force. This amendment deals essentially with what we call parental alienation.

The amendment voted just two weeks ago extends the criminal responsibility for parents who deliberately prevent their children from seeing the other parent.

This amendment also fixes the problem that many custodian parents faced when trying to get their children back home from the other parent who refused to let them go. Until now, if a parent did that, the parent could be charged with abduction.

This will immensely help the fathers who have gained custody of their children in court but had the courts refuse to enforce it, and faced the problem that if they enforced it themselves, they would face abduction charges. There are at least a couple of thousand Swedish fathers who are in this situation–which is a lot for a small country.

Prison time for false accusers

Lately, the Swedish judiciary has started to follow the model employed in Norway and started imposing custodial sentences for those who make false allegations of rape.

Until very recently, the false rape charges stories looked pretty much like in Britain, France, or other places – woman cries rape, compelling evidence is found that she's lying, and then slap on the wrist (a fine at best). Well, not any more. Just at a google search for "false rape allegation" you find two women being sent to jail just in May alone. One on May 6 and one on May 7. That's cases resulted in more jail time in two days than Britain imposes in 6 months.

You will see in many places cited that Sweden has the highest rate of rape in Europe. What it is never said is that Sweden has the highest reporting rate of rape in Europe. It's not the same thing as the increasing number of accusers jailed for outright lying shows.

Other countries when found to have the highest reporting rate of rape in Europe have responded with more misandric legislation. Sweden however, took the course to just investigate more thoroughly and punish harder both the genuine offenders and the liars.

I don't know about you, but to me, this is real progress.

Serious review of previous cases

The Swedish judiciary is going through a serious process of reviewing its previous sentences given in the times when radical gender ideologues were largely the only ones informing the public narrative.

Just two cases come to mind: Sture Bergwall (aka Thomas Quick) and the recently acquitted 66-year-old man who will go unnamed.

This 66-year-old man was sentenced for aggravated assault, gang rape and other acts of violence right in the middle of the Swedish version of pedophile hysteria mixed with the feminist-driven hysteria of gender violence. It was a time when the radical feminists in particular led by ROKS (see the documentary Könskriget for reference) managed to convince the public that there is a huge network of pedophiles and child murderers in Sweden which includes judges, policemen, attorneys, politicians and CEOs.

Well, it turns that it was all a lie. And this man served 10 years in jail because of that lie. And the Swedish judiciary actually had the courage to admit it, free this man, clear him of all the charges and open the process of him getting reparations. That is a big deal in a civil law country. If you think it's hard to overturn a wrongful conviction in a common law country (U.S., U.K., etc.) – well, in a civil law country is at least twice as hard because the State has all the power and the State can literally deny evidence because potato under civil law.

As for Thomas Quick, that's an already notorious case internationally. Thomas Quick was until recently a convicted serial killer. What was the evidence? His "confessions." Not an iota of any other corroborating evidence. No bodies, no DNA, no fingerprints. And his "confessions" also lacked any details. But why confess in the first place? Well, it turns out he was on drugs. Drugs put in him by the State.

Long story short, the State over-drugged him for a mental disorder that could and should have been treated without filling him with drugs. And those drugs affected his judgment to the point that he quite literally became a different person and began describing events that never occurred.

And, he also had the bad luck to become even more mentally unstable at the hands of the State right when there was the aforementioned hysteria in the country. And also the staff at the mental facility over drugged him thanks to feminist leaning policies which quite literally deemed masculinity as a disease – so they drugged male patients harder because… well… they don't know exactly why either.

But the fact that the State was not only willing to reconsider but actually thoroughly reviewed the case and admitted all the wrongdoing is huge progress. There were people suggesting that he was innocent as early as 2002 – but saying that was pedophile and murder apologia.

Maskulint Initiativ/Male Initiative

Right after the elections, 4 Swedish guys set up a Facebook page called "The Male Initiative" with the message "It's about seeing the person! Not the gender".

Just 24 hours later, as I write this piece, the page has over 28,600 likes and the founders have already been contacted by the Swedish media.

To put that number into perspective, the Liberal People's Party (Folkpartiet), founded in 1934, has just slightly over 8,000 supporters and has been on Facebook for 5 years and got 9.8% in the last elections.

Let's put it another way: In 2007 Pär Ström became involved in the public debate about gender equality and was met with severe bullying both online and offline and a lynch mob of hatred was formed against him for daring to speak his mind. The group he founded barely got over 100 members… in 6 years.

And now, just in 24 hours, over 28 thousand people are willing to publicly associate with such a message. Our own page, AVFM Sverige started being contacted by some of the feminists trying to have a discussion with us. And they were even almost polite. Nothing of the bitterness that used to be the default status merely 6 months ago!

At this point, the AVFM Sverige team and I are working to see how serious these people are from Maskulint Initiativ. But even if they aren't serious, that huge number has already sent a huge shockwave throughout the Swedish circles and is bound to make an impact on the public discourse and move that discourse even more outside of the feminist control.

And that, my friends, is what I call real progress.

Sverigedemokraterna/Sweden's Democrats

I left this at the end because it's a slightly controversial issue, in the sense that the political party called Sweden's Democrats is hated by many, sometimes for good reason, sometimes as a result of media manipulation.

But whether you like SD or not, here's what this party's spokeswoman had to say about feminism and equality:

> One of the things I see as most important to me as the Sweden Democrats' representative on gender issues is to show that our policy is the one that is really aimed at equality. (…) With a consistently equal treatment under the law and against any form of quotas or special treatment, it is our policy to look at the individual instead of to their gender. With increased opportunities for families to shape their own lives, we think all the choices should be considered of equal value, instead of trying to direct people to the choices that the State currently considers to be the best.
> I'm not afraid of differences, but I'm afraid of a policy that provides various conditions based on gender. For me it's a given that men have the same automatic right to custody of their children as women, regardless of whether the parents are married or not. To me it is obvious that such a thing as "affirmative action" can never exist. To me it's obvious that you will get the respect and acceptance of your choice, no matter what sex you have, the choices you make and whether they fit into an old standard or a new one. That's what equality means to me, and that is what I will be working for.

That's right. You read it well. That quote might as well been taken off avoiceformen.com if you ask me.

And here's the good news – this party got almost twice the percentage Feminist Initiative got, (standing at 9.9%) which effectively means that they'll send two MEPs – twice that of F!.

The fact that such a political party with such a message not only exists in Sweden, but gets twice the support of a radical feminist party is big step forward, especially considering that the entire Swedish mainstream establishment, especially the media, was overtly against them in the most partisan way conceivable and the same establishment was overtly for the Feminist Initiative in the same partisan manner.

Is Sweden's Democrats a perfect party? Absolutely not. There is no such thing as a perfect political party. A perfect politician wouldn't be voted for by anyone.

But the fact that they got such support in the elections despite the mainstream culture hitting them with the usual trifecta of racism/sexism/classism, speaks volumes about the fact that the Swedish consensus enforced by shaming is shaking badly. There is an increasing number of men and women in Sweden who are actually willing to stand up and say "enough with this crap!" Enough with affirmative action, enough with gender divisive politics and enough with the frivolous allegations of "sexism" or "racism" to anyone who dares to disagree with the mainstream's so-called "progressive" consensus.

These are all things that were quite literally inconceivable merely two years ago. In 2012, any Swedish non-feminist would've thought you're out of your mind if you thought that a party standing firmly against affirmative action or gender divisive politics would get as much as 3%, let alone 10% in a Swedish election.

Just less than 3 years ago, Joakim Ramstedt (Daddys Sverige) was being called a pedophile for daring to fight for the custody of his daughter and against the frivolous allegations made against him. Just a little over 2 years ago, Sweden was rightfully worthy of the name Absurdistan.

Is this good news enough to downgrade Sweden from the exponent of gender divisive politics of Europe and the hotbed of mainstream misandry? Well, no. Not really.

The most voted political party, Sveriges Socialdemokratiska Arbetarparti (the Social Democrats), believes that more Sweden in the EU is the answer. A little over a week ago the editor-in-chief of the Debatt (debate) section of Nyheter24, the most relevant news source in Sweden, wrote an article entitled no less than Yes, I hate men.

But these reports are good enough for me to no longer consider Sweden as Absurdistan. The debate is finally taking place. The consensus is rapidly breaking and the old shaming tactics of the mainstream are becoming increasingly inefficient. This provides something that all activists need, especially non-feminists in Sweden: Hope.

For the first time since the assault on Swedish culture initiated by radical feminists in late 1980s, there's actually a hope and real life confirmation that a debate about the disingenuousness of feminist politics can indeed take place. For the first time in goodness know how much, the so-called progressive consensus shows weaknesses and members of the consensus are actually reaching out to have a discussion instead of spouting venom and throw more accusations of the usual trifecta of racism/sexism/classism and other imputations of malice.

And that, gentlemen and ladies, is what I call real progress.

Lecture 5: Anatomy of a Victim Ideology

Lecture No. 5

> The weakness of men is the façade of strenght; the strenght of women is the façade of weakness. – Warren Farrell

Among the worst mistakes that freedom-loving people can make is to stereotype feminists as a small, motley crew of angry lesbians who have long since ceased to be relevant. Take note: this stereotype helps them.

I must repeat myself: this stereotype helps them.

Let that sink in for a moment. Every time you have belittled feminists as a bunch of cranky old hags that nobody takes seriously, you have helped to obscure their program and indeed, their very existence as a form of organized power. Belittle them, you must – but do so in a way which exposes, not obscures! For feminism is far from being a relic of the past. The feminist movement is taken very seriously indeed by those with the power to enforce its core aims:

(1) The expropriation of resources from men to women.
(2) The punishment of men.
(3) To increase (1) and (2) in terms of scope and intensity indefinitely.

Obscurity assists the realization of these goals by creating doubt amongst potential opponents. The misidentification of feminism as a cultural artifact which no longer holds sway over the operations of government and society is a product of feminism's own metamorphosis. Note that the essence, or substance of feminism has not changed over the years, only its form, or packaging. The change of packaging has proved so effective that some now deny that the product still exists.

Au contraire. As much as the times changed with feminism, feminism has changed with the times. In the transformation of feminism from a movement opposed to government and society at large, into a movement which controls the state and public opinion – and uses this position to persecute the new enemies of the state – its strategies underwent a certain cultivation. Today, feminists no longer need to throw temper tantrums to get their way, because while they once raged against the machine, they now control it. This is the truly profound shift in Western societies since the height of consciousness about feminism in the middle of last century; it is not that feminists have become less relevant, but more.

As Fidelbogen recently put it:

> Feminism is now lodged in the institutional structures, hence, "respectable". I might compare it to organized crime, which was openly thuggish in the early racketeering days, but once they got their people into "city hall", and into electoral politics, learned to wear a silk tie and play the game in a different way.

When feminists were outside the tent, causing offense was one of their prime weapons – poorly disguised as edgy boundary-pushing. Who remembers this lovely piece of propagandistic hate, published in the 1970s?

The above is precisely the kind of thing that feminists today like to pretend never happened. Now that feminists are inside the tent, they are forced to defend their gains; in the 1970s, when the above picture was produced, they attacked from the outside, and sought to tear down official morality rather than (as they do now) define and dictate it.

And how better to maintain control than by punishing those who attack, or who might attack, the new status quo? We are of course referring to men, who stand to lose the most from the three core aims of the feminist project as listed above. Today, feminists believe that women have the inalienable right to not feel offended, and they do not hesitate to employ state violence to enforce this. Prosecuting those (men) who cause offense is their new weapon, one which has replaced the old (causing offense). Of course, persecuting people merely for being offensive is rather less charitable than men were to feminists before feminists took over. But, as Gynocentrism Theory tells us, men were only charitable to offensive women in the early days of feminism because women already exercised substantial control.

Do feminists believe that they are doing right? The answer is an unequivocal yes for most of them – they truly do believe that they are a righteous people, and even when they become cognizant of doing wrong, they rationalize that they are also, simultaneously, doing right. How could this be? Well, let me show you how it works, by tracing the anatomy of a victim ideology.

Once a period of consciousness-raising has propagated the belief that the members of a group are – by their essential nature as members of the group – victims, the group shall pursue two objectives:

(1) To equalize with the designated 'enemy' group;
(2) To forge their own 'victim identity,' separete from and unaccountable to the 'enemy' group.

You will notice that, while the first objective brings the 'victim' group closer to the 'enemy' group, in terms of status, expectations, autonomy, etc., the second widens the gulf between them. The first objective, we are told, will unite us in our common humanity, and bring about liberty for all, and other nice things like that. But as soon as we get close to this, there tends to be a drift towards proclamations of the importance of the second objective. Nothing will ever be enough to satisfy the 'victim' group, because they view themselves as essentially and inherently the victims of the 'enemy' group, regardless of what may have changed in reality. A victim ideology is anti-contextual, and its followers – the self-designated 'victims' – shall never see themselves as anything but. Their victimhood is affirmed in advance, and the facts must be made to fit the story. In other words, they will spin any situation into one where they are most harshly treated.

This is why feminists like Hillary Clinton can get away with saying things like > women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat.

Well, sure – losing family members to horrible deaths is so much worse than actually having to die those horrible deaths. That is, if your whole worldview is tainted by sexism and you reduce the status of men to Protecting/Providing Objects. In Mrs Clinton's quote, no humanity is ascribed to men whatsoever. The real problem is not that they are traumatized, mutilated and blown to pieces per se; it is that, because of their being subject to atrocities, men will not be able to fulfill their protecting/providing roles quite so effectively. It is, therefore, women who lose out, because men don't actually matter except insofar as they can assist females. This is precisely the kind of attitude which emerges out of a victim ideology. The entirety of existence, in all its wonderful complexity, is reduced to black-and-white primitivism: my people matter, your people don't. Or, as we shall see, my people good, your people bad. Anything good for my people is good, no mind whether it is good or bad for your people.

This kind of thinking is known as Manichean Essentialism, and it is the metaphysical cornerstone for feminism as a whole. Decades of consciousness-raising have ensured that women are reflexively considered to have been wronged, whatever the facts. Whenever genuine examples of women being wronged cannot be found, compensatory privilege becomes the sanctioned goal. That is, women are treated more leniently in one regard because they are believed to be disadvantaged in unrelated regards, or just disadvantaged in general. One recent example of this from the United Kingdom is the order issued by Dame Laura Cox to judges that they must treat female criminals with greater leniency, a ruling which simultaneously reduced British men to second class status while green-lighting abusive women who might otherwise have been deterred.

There are some who go further than this. Baroness Corston, who explicitly identifies as a feminist, believes that women don't really deserve to be punished at all when they commit crimes. Her 2007 Government report advocates that all women's prisons should close, and that even the most violent and abusive female offenders should not be locked up. Indeed, they > would no longer go to one of the country's 15 women's prisons, which would all close. Instead, killers such as Rose West, serving life for the murder of ten young women and girls, would be sent to "homely" local custody units. There they would be allowed to live as a "family unit" with between 20 and 30 other women prisoners, organising their own shopping, budgets and cooking. The units would also allow them to stay close to their families … All the women's jails would shut within the next decade, and could instead be converted into prisons for men … The report claims: "Women and men are different. Equal treatment of men and women does not result in equal outcomes."

The above is a classic example of Orwellian Newspeak. Anti-feminists of all stripes have been saying for decades that men and women are essentially different. Feminists have insisted that men and women are essentially the same, and we must therefore have equal treatment. But as soon as equality works retrograde to the goal of female empowerment, it is dropped like a hot potato, and feminists twist themselves around in incredible semantic gymnastics to justify the sudden turnabout.

> Women also (sic) never be sent to jail to “teach them a lesson”.

Of course they shouldn’t. Women shouldn’t have to actually learn how to abide by the law, much less how to be functioning members of civilization. They should be allowed to run wild and free, abusing and destroying anything they please with absolute license. They shouldn’t even expect a slap on the wrist for their misbehavior – that would be domestic violence, don’t you know?

But if feminism truly was about equality, shouldn’t feminists be pushing for new laws to criminalize more women, rather than their anti-egalitarian approach of imprisoning less women and more men? Or does equality only matter when it is women who are deemed unequal? (In and of itself, this would imply strongly that women are a privileged class like no other.)

The female incarceration rate is just one-eighth that of men in the United States (Wikipedia, accessed 10th October 2010), while women account for only 5.7% of inmates in Great Britain (accessed 10th October 2010). Surely, if equality was the goal, we would be relaxing the punitive, feminist-inspired laws against men, and seeking to punish more women instead. I can think of nowhere in modern society that is more male-dominated or unrepresentative than the penal system – something which, in the interests of sexual equality, needs to change.

But no – flatly contrary to the principles of neutral, impartial justice, feminists deem it a good thing for its own sake to lock up fewer women! It is as though women who are guilty of crimes aren’t really guilty – and are therefore victims of whatever is done to them as punishment. It is a popular notion that women are disadvantaged – generally, inherently, essentially, within the very fiber of their being – and so must be disadvantaged in every particular area of life; thus, anything done to assist them must be a reduction of unfair disadvantage. Any rationally-minded person can see how absurd this all is, and I include leading feminists in this, as they are shrewd but not stupid. Just deserts, deterrence, fair treatment, civilization itself be damned; this is Gynocentrism in action.

To recap, victim ideologies such as feminism seek to:

(1) Equalize with the ‘enemy’ group;
(2) Forge their own ‘victim identity,’ separate from and unaccountable to the ‘enemy’ group.

That these two objectives are in contradiction is not just a logical flaw; it’s part of a strategy which allows the ‘victim’ group to shift its stance as circumstances require. Objective (1) might be consistently pursued for a little while. But if the movement comes under scrutiny for disadvantaging the ‘enemy’ group, the ‘victims’ can just switch to objective (2) and emphasize the importance of their own uniqueness in ways for which equality does not suffice. Or, as feminist Germaine Greer puts it:

> In 1970 the movement was called 'Women's Liberation' or, contemptously (sic), 'Women's Lib'. When the name 'Libbers' was dropped for 'Feminists' we were all relieved. What none of us noticed was that the ideal of liberation was fading out with the word. We were settling for equality. Liberation struggles are not about assimilation but about asserting difference, endowing that difference with dignity and prestige, and insisting on it as a condition of self-definition and self-determination. … the visionary feminists of the late sixties and early seventies knew that women could never find freedom by agreeing to live the lives of unfree men.

Once equal status has been reached, the rhetoric of equality can be discarded, because who wants to be only equal to a man anyway? Here, in black and white, is a statement of female supremacy.

Same as it ever was.

If equality had ever been the end goal, then men's disadvantages would have been addressed seriously, and not exacerbated while men themselves were goaded. To this day, the only time a feminist bothers herself with an issue of male disadvantage is when it benefits women to point it out – as in the case of parental leave. Enforced equal paternity and maternity leave rules out any disincentive that employers have to hire women. A feminist will set aside her 'all fathers are rapists and abusers' shtick, just long enough to insist that men should have equal rights to parenting – but this is typically presented as a demand that men shoulder the burdens of raising children so that women may be empowered in the workplace. Even when injustices against them are being redressed, men are tools for female betterment.

Same as it ever was.

Another example is male rape in prisons. This is occasionally highlighted by feminists, but only because men can be shown to be the oppressors, allowing them to attack maleness itself. Feminists pick up the torch once the rapist has done his part; they complete the rape victim's sexual humiliation by destroying his self-identity, poisoning his mind with aspersions that maleness itself is to blame for his victimization; and so a fundamental, immutable part of himself was the cause of his rape. They force upon him the identity of rapist along with rape victim, their vilification of 'toxic masculinity' serving to assure him that he shares the abusive characteristics of his abuser. On the other hand, the high level of female culpability in child abuse, both sexual and non-sexual, is ignored or denied.

This is why our universally applicable definition of feminism could not have included any reference to 'equality' – it's not a reasonable statement to make if we're using analytical tools more incisive than Manichean Essentialism. The universal definition remains, and no ground can possibly be ceded: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

Power in what regard? Power to do what? Such questions inevitably arise. The answer, if you've been following closely, is obvious – whatever they please, no matter who else is harmed. Silence is not consent, but it is complicity, when you have the power to draw attention towards abuse and the resources towards stopping it, yet you fail to do so on the grounds that the abusers have genitals that resemble your own.

And that's what it comes down to, folks – we are dealing with primitives in pantsuits.

John Hembling (JtO) · 30 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Another mentally disturbed individual has picked up a gun and murdered his way into international headlines. This time in California, this time a 22-year-old, this time leaving behind a video record of his motives. Elliot Rodger was socially isolated, sexually frustrated, and apparently fully convinced of his own perfection as a highly desirable object of what he believed was deserved adulation from women who, it turned out, were not turned on by him.

Mr Rodger was not just sexually frustrated, he was socially isolated, and, unable to recognize his own neuroses. He elected to "punish" not-attracted-to-him women by killing them. Two women, along with four men, became his victims before Rodger shot himself following a gun battle with California police officers.

Now, according to some elements of mainstream media, Mr Rodger was not a mentally ill, very confused and angry sociopath, nope, he was a Men's Human Rights Activist (MRA) – Seriously.

This idea, repeated, to their shame, by "respected" sites like Huffington Post and Time is so irresponsible and bottomlessly stupid that even being an active MRA, and thus slandered by them, I am most affected by a mortified embarrassment on their behalf.

Some commentators outside the Men's Rights Movement (MRM) have admirably already pointed out the falsehood, noting that Mr Rodger shot and killed twice as many men than women. At least one self identifying men's rights activist has made the deeply unfortunate comment that "not all MRAs are like that". Not all of them? For fucks sake; how about no MRA. Ever.

If, in fact, that very confused and mentally deranged young man had immersed himself in this movement, he would never have acted out his violent fantasies. He would not have killed anyone, including himself.

That bears repeating.

If Elliot Rodger had found the Men's Rights Movement, and not simply the how-to-get-laid Pick-up Artist (PUA) segment of what is often mischaracterized by the term "manosphere" he would not have picked up a knife or gun.

Had Elliot Rodger actually become an MRA, he would have found an empowering way to heal from the psychological wounds which drove his violent fantasies: Wounds which led him to kill four men, two women, and then himself.

This is the part not yet mentioned by any MRA. Elliot Rodger was as conventional, mainstream and blue-pill in his self-identity as the most devout of male feminists. He took his personal identity from the consensus of the women around him rather than rejecting a publicly conferred male identity.

The most obvious fact in Rodger's "my twisted life" diary was his desperate, unfilled need to be validated as a person of worth by the women he saw as arbiters of men's identities. This is pure, undiluted mainstream thinking. And I am being excessively generous by use of the term "thinking".

Among Elliot Rodger's neuroses was that he suffered from an advanced, weapons-grade version of what I have previously termed female consensus conferral of public male identity.

Within the wider Men's Rights Movement, a sub-genre exists almost entirely focused on self-determined male identity. This determination is separate from, and independent of the normal model of female consensus conferral. I refer, of course, to that movement of unwieldy acronym: MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way).

Elliot Rodger, to his detriment, was not his own man. He did not go his own way. He went the way of gynocentric culture and became, almost literally, the poster-boy for mainstream, pathological gender ideology.

So, for all you bleating feminists figuratively rending their clothes over this tragedy – if you want fewer Elliot Rodgers in the world, then you want more MRAs.

Threats of Violence and Death Against Doubletree Hilton in Detroit Over Men's Conference

Paul Elam · 30 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dear readers and supporters of AVFM and fellow MHRAs,

We have encountered what we hope and expect will be a temporary issue on our path to Detroit for the First International Conference on Men's Issues in June.

As we have seen so many times before, gender ideologues who do not believe that any discussion of the issues faced by boys and men should take place unless it meets a feminist (anti-male) litmus test, have resorted to the tactic of threatening violence against innocent people in order to silence free speech.

I am just recently in receipt of a letter from the corporate management of Hilton Hotels. This letter leaves little to the imagination about the kind of individuals we are dealing with, and what their intent is in this matter. It is quite simply to make the conference event unsafe and cost prohibitive through threat and intimidation.

There are two things I need to make clear. One, I have no animosity toward Hilton management regarding this matter. In every interaction we have had with them thus far, they have been professional, courteous and accommodating.

I recognize that they have valid concerns about the safety of their employees, other guests and indeed our conference attendees. I share those concerns. This was clearly a hand that was forced on them, just as it has been forced on us.

To ensure that there is no backlash against any individual at Hilton, I have had the individual's name who signed the letter redacted.

The other thing I want to make clear is that we have every intention of making this conference go forward. We have never given up on anything we intended to do, and we do not plan to start now. We will not fall silent in the face of fascists and ideological thugs who would use heinous threats to maintain control of a public discourse that is in dire need of balanced, sane change.

That being said, the prospect of 72 straight hours of coverage from 7 police officers is financially daunting. We do not yet know what the costs associated with this will be but are now in contact with Detroit Police to secure those services as well as securing the liability policy required.

It has been said, over and over again on the pages of this website, "First they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you and then you win."

And so now, we are fighting. And we plan, regardless of the outcome here, to keep fighting. We will not be silenced by bullies, nor will we be disheartened by the antics of those we have long known to be morally bankrupt.

Please stay tuned, because we will be asking you to join that fight. There will necessarily be a fundraiser established to help defray the cost of the added security and insurance. Look for that to commence in about 48 hours or so. In the meantime, if you intend to help us with the added costs, please wait till that outreach for funding is officially launched.

If you want to assist now with many of the other abundant costs of this event, of course you will find the donation button at the upper right of this page.

One of the best ways you can support us now is to purchase one of the remaining tickets and to attend the event.

We are making history here, folks. Sometimes, almost always in fact, that proves to be a somewhat messy business. We are prepared to deal with that business and to emerge from it in a new era for men and women in this culture.

Daisy Kler Lying to the Public

Diana Davison and John Hembling · 30 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In February 2014 the government in British Columbia set aside $5.5 million dollars to address domestic violence problems. This money is in addition to $70 million that they invest every year. On May 5, 2014 Daisy Kler, of Vancouver Rape Relief, stated repeatedly on CBC's BC Almanac radio show that there is "no political will" to stop domestic violence. That was the first of many lies.

"No political will," in Daisy Kler's world, means that $75.5 million dollars designated to prevent domestic violence is meaningless because they didn't offer it directly to her. One point of annoyance in her CBC speech is that Daisy had to phone the ministry herself. That apparent lack of political will is further complicated by Daisy's admission that an entire ministry exists, by name, to deal with domestic violence. She states "There is an office of domestic violence within the Ministry of Children and Families and Development. We have made contact with them today, that was on my initiative, not theirs." Daisy is really annoyed they didn't call her.

The government, with their lack of will, seems to have listened closely to feminist rhetoric and followed the advice of women's groups who've recently been insisting that only men can stop violence against women. $1 million has been assigned to men's programs. That's the million that Daisy wants. And she has reasons.

> [A]nger management somehow conveys the message that abusive men need to manage their anger. In my experience, men store up their anger. They don't take it out on their bosses, they don't take it out on bus drivers, they don't take it out on their friends, they come home and they take it out on their wives and their girlfriends. So, this notion that there's something to be managed about their anger really doesn't um, speak to the, my, uh experience which is that men actually, on purpose, attack the women in their lives who they're in an intimate relationship with.

In addition to spreading this idiotic nonsense, Daisy insists that "in [her] 15 years of working in, on the front lines with battered women and women who have been sexually assaulted I know that very few times will officers arrest on a breach." As an "expert" in domestic violence, Daisy must also know the fraudulence of her claims about police guidelines.

> Yeah, the police often have some discretionary ah, power, so what I've heard just in the last week is, "well that's not really a breach,", "you cant really call that a breach," so if there's no will from the higher-ups saying domestic violence is a serious issue and you're to take it seriously, on every level, then they still make ah, discretionary decisions that are negative; have a negative impact on women.

The police response and protocol with domestic violence reports is set by the Attorney General (higher-ups) which, in BC, allows for zero discretionary power. Where there is any evidence of assault or threat the police must arrest or they'll be found in neglect of duty. Police do not want to risk their careers by playing foolish guessing games. In discouraging women from trusting police Daisy has failed in her duty to the women she claims to help. She has dishonestly disparaged the very people who work to protect the public.

Another travesty committed upon the battered population is the warning that women are at greater risk if they try to leave their abusive partner. The number of women Vancouver Rape Relief claims to have successfully assisted far exceeds the number of women who have been killed by their partners. Telling women who are currently afraid that they are in more danger by leaving is grossly irresponsible. If a battered woman stays in the relationship while afraid of dying her chances of escaping harm are none. If a woman leaves the relationship in which violence is occurring, even if risky, her chances of survival greatly increase.

But Daisy's motives for spreading disinformation are quite clear. She tells us "I did speak to the office of Domestic Violence uh today, and I spoke to Clark Russell. And we know that this is um, a lot of the money hasn't been divvied out yet. We certainly haven't been consulted uh, formally about what we think would be an important, ah, important issues to deal with."

It's all about the money.

Daisy Kler doesn't think the money should go to treatment and prevention targeted at men because she believes men are untreatable. But, mainly, she thinks men haven't done enough to deserve the money.

"The reason why there are services for women is because, more services, partly is because the women's movement created them, not government. And government funded them later so men are welcome to create their groups on their own, ah, just like the women did in the women's movement."

Though Vancouver Rape Relief won't counsel or assist men, Daisy claims that Vancouver Rape Relief has "no problem" giving out phone numbers to men who are looking for resources. For men who aren't comfortable calling a group that claims men intentionally harm women, you can bypass them by calling us directly.

The Vancouver Men's Help Line

Lecture 6: Old Wine, New Bottles

Adam Kostakis · 30 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This article is also available in Portuguese.

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the sixth of twelve lectures. – PW

> Whatever crushes individuality is despotism, by whatever name it may be called. – J. S. Mill

So much of feminist analysis revolves around this concept. A man who punches his wife is not just angry at her; he is attempting to dominate her. A man who disagrees with a woman and talks over her is not just being rude; he is trying to dominate her. A rapist is not really that bothered about sex; his crime is a display of power, he just wanted to dominate the woman.

You see, the fact that these things happen at all is not enough for the male-bashers of the world; they shall forever require more grist for the misandric mill. Punishing actual criminals is one thing, but it's simply not gratifying enough to leave it there – they need to articulate what their womyn's intuition has always told them, and go on the attack against all men. The problem, of course, is that the overwhelming majority of men don't attack women in any perceptible way whatsoever. The solution, as feminists found, is to play Dr. Freud and posit some subconscious, underlying motivation – a dark, sexual, deviant, violent mentality, which acts as a universal explanation for male behavior.

You see, even when men are not actually engaging in criminal acts, the criminality is still there, it is just latent – so the feminists would have us believe. The idea that all men possess an inherent, latent evil, and that women do not, serves as a useful cover for all sexist hate speech against men. We find it at work in senseless diatribes against a non-falsifiable "rape culture," in campaigns to prohibit the private consumption of pornography, and in apologia for malicious women who falsely accuse men of sex crimes. Consider this statement from Mary Koss: "rape represents an extreme behavior but one that is on a continuum with normal male behavior within the culture."

Inherent male deviancy, so they say (or imply), manifests as a continuum of dysfunctional maleness, covering everything from a simple verbal disagreement, all the way up to the murder of a spouse. All male actions which do not contribute towards the feminist project – increasing the power of women – are to be taken as evidence of an innately flawed masculinity which seeks, above all, to dominate the fair sex.

Put it this way. Would you say that being murdered helps to increase a woman's power?

No?

Well, what about losing a verbal sparring match – does this help to increase her power? Or doesn't it? It certainly seems that one will have greater autonomy if she can more easily convince others that her view is correct.

So, if both of the above examples exist on a continuum of women losing power, the corollary of which is patriarchal domination, then of course men are to blame. That is, if our analysis is based in dubious, feministic assumptions.

The concept of domination, so taken for granted in its present manifestation, is a supreme example of the linguistic shifting I have discussed previously. As a term, it carries ideological contraband, concealed in an overcoat of righteousness. Originally, the term domination, which has its root in the Latin dominus, referred specifically to the power exercised by a master over slaves. Like so many other terms that feminists have seized upon in order to manipulate perceptions of reality, domination has become an object of semantic bleaching.

What is really interesting about all this, is that our new concept of domination – as unjust hierarchy, to be opposed and attacked – has been put to use in a specific direction: as a sponsor for true despotism. The single most obvious red flag marking the road to despotic rule is the encroachment of the public sphere into the private lives of individuals. Despotism is precisely the type of unjust hierarchy with which we identify domination; yet if the latter term is broadened sufficiently, to encompass all areas of private life, then a crushing and brutal dictatorship is the inevitable result.

This is the context in which we should understand the feminist slogan which has had the most staying power: the personal is political. Note that (according to the slogan), the personal is not only a matter of interest to the political; it does not form part of the political; it is not of equivalent importance to the political. It actually is the political.

The two terms are presented as though they are identical, interchangeable.

The personal is political.

If this is true, then there does not exist the smallest space of privacy which is a matter for the individual alone – that is, over which the individual is sovereign. It is true enough that a private life worth anything would not be possible without an overarching public structure – it is law which protects all the liberties that make private lives and interests possible. To use J. F. Stephen's favorite analogy, law is the pipe through which the waters of liberty flow. It is when public life – the state – fails to recognize its own limits that society becomes threatened by despotic rule.

Intellectuals of all ages have come up with the most ingenious of reasons for why it is that their mode of thought is superior to all that passed before. The majority of people have simply assumed this without the need for justification whatsoever. What is peculiarly modern is the construction of artificial boundaries between our own time and epochs past. We do not, for instance, consider ourselves to be living on the same historical plane as those of Medieval Europe, let alone of Ancient Greece. These are times inexplicable and inaccessible to us. It is a seductive fantasy by which we explain away any fears conjured up by the horrors of history books. We like to believe that bloody autocracies will confine themselves safely to those pages, and that such things could not happen here, not now; not in real life. Surely, we have moved beyond all that. We are Enlightened, unlike the human beings that existed before us.

But are we not on the same historical plane that gave rise to Soviet Communism and the Nazi party? These particular reigns of terror occurred within the last century, no matter how much we might like to think of ourselves as having progressed beyond such barbarism. Supposedly, we in the Western world abhor totalitarian regimes; and yet the rise of the two mentioned previously is indicative of a trend existing within our political culture. Among the baggage we have inherited from the Enlightenment is the concept of utopia. The term was coined in the 16th century, and it designated, for the first time, the notion of a perfect socio-political order. With the birth of this idea, the seeds were sown for the cleansing of human impediments as an operationalized political program.

Prior to the Enlightenment, human life was mostly assumed to be cyclical. As surely as the sun would rise in the morning and set once more in the evening, so great powers would rise and fall, only for new ones to take their place. Such was the science of Polybius, whose historical works did not arrange events in chronological order, but presented human experience as a unity. Dynasties, empires, cultures, people and their communities lived and died in the swings of the cosmic pendulum.

One of the major conceptual innovations of modernity is progress as the guiding ideal in politics and society. Not only do we assume that we are constantly on the move away from our own history; the belief persists that it is only a matter of time before each problem yields to a solution. Faith in human knowledge has never been so great as in the Information Age; we actively seek to overcome what were long considered intractable facts of life.

The purpose of this digression is not to cast doubt over the possibilities for human knowledge, nor to suggest that an attempt to improve the human condition is an ignoble pursuit. It is to point out that we are all children of the Enlightenment, no matter where we fall on the political spectrum. It is to point out that there are certain peculiar assumptions which form the base and scaffolding of Western political thought, and it is upon these assumptions that ideologies as diverse as conservatism, liberalism, National Socialism and feminism are built.

The -ism itself is an altogether modern phenomenon. An -ism (or we might say, an 'ideology') assumes a difference between how society is and how it ought to be, predicated upon a specific moral view of the world. This is obviously true for those ideologies explicitly advocating change – liberalism, socialism, feminism, and so on. It is just as true for conservatism and traditionalism, ideologies which (as they see it) aim to resuscitate the baby that has been thrown out with the bathwater of the ages.

Typically, that which ideologues find so objectionable about the world is its existing configuration of power. The great texts and speakers of the ideology describe a configuration of power, argue for its recognition as injustice, and then present the means for achieving the desired change. The means may involve working through the existing institutions of state, or they may necessitate their overthrow, or they may shun mainstream practices altogether and advocate working their magic through civil society.

Whatever the ideology implies in practice, this is a marked difference from what went before. Progress, not recurrence, is at root of all political expectation. Whether this is progress towards the classless society, or ethnic purity, or the return of traditional virtues, progress is the constant. The view that something is wrong and something needs to be done about this, as a political statement, is a recent invention, one which defines our shared political culture. Conservatives are caught up in the same 'progressive' web, but then, so too are iconoclasts, who signal their compliance with conventional modes of thought even as they state their intentions to break away. The more they struggle against this inevitability, the more stuck they find themselves. To take a relevant example, feminists have sometimes declared that they are moving away from 'patriarchal' assumptions altogether, and building up their own worldview from scratch, quite untainted by male influence. In truth, nobody starts from scratch, and feminism remains deeply embedded in modes of thought which have evolved over centuries, exclusively through the minds of men. The feminist ideology, and all of its innovations, simply could not occurred without centuries of work by men beforehand.

Next week's lecture shall take a closer look at the feminist assertion that the personal is political, and the hidden implications contained within this catch phrase. In the weeks that follow, we will consider the concept of utopia, which has been mentioned only in passing here. A brief comment here will suffice: utopia is the logical extension of progress, in that it is the end of all progress, the final stage of human existence. It is a profoundly dangerous idea, one responsible for the most oppressive regimes and bloody revolutions the world has ever known. While personal power and glory may have been the motivating force behind the actions of despotic individuals still in recent memory, it was a collective, utopian vision that aroused their followers to make manifest the most violent of fantasies. In all cases where utopians grip the reigns of power, the human beings which do not fit into their vision of a new world order are treated as the living garbage of a faded regime.

It is with disgust and horror that the West looks back at the utopian despots of the twentieth century, and yet these particular despotisms correspond to a tendency that forms the infrastructure of our own politics. The disgust and horror is real enough, though, and perhaps the most truly progressive shift in recent times is the rejection of extremism, in all its forms, by populations determined to leave behind the century of genocide.

Only, it's not that simple. You can pull up the heads, and tear the stalks clean from the earth, but unless you dig out the roots, you will find those flowers in bloom again before long. Utopianism, with the cleansing of human impediments that it always implies, is coded into our political DNA. Widespread detestation of the recent, failed totalitarianisms will not make this go away; it can only make the despotic tendency fall quiet for a little while. A new despotism can only emerge if it does so silently, in disguise as something quite different – perhaps as organized opposition to certain forms of unjust domination, the solution for which is always to increase the power of the state relative to the autonomy of the individual.

The personal is political, say the feminists.

I can hear the goosesteps getting closer.

To All the Feminists Who Aren't Like That

Paul Elam · 31 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In the wake of our planned conference in June becoming the target of death threats, I thought this was a good time to make an appeal to all the feminists who aren't like that.

I know for a fact that you are out there. I have seen you for years now, in places like Reddit, on our Facebook Page, Youtube channel and in the comments of this very website.

I have even gotten emails from many of you, admonishing me to consider that in criticizing feminism that I am actually condemning a whole group of people, most of whom are only interested in gender equality and justice; who believe that all voices deserve to be heard, including men's.

Many of these same feminists have claimed that they too, are very invested in resolving gender related problems that affect men and boys.

Indeed, were I to include all of my interactions with those who claim to be feminist, I would have to say that most of them fit the description of people interested in justice and equality for all.

However, what I see in the actual actions of feminists in the landscape of gender politics has often been very different from what has been claimed by so many people, both men and women, who tell me that feminism is not really about those actions.

Now is the time we can put this to the test. I am asking for the real feminism to please stand up.

We have an event scheduled that includes the first Black female senator elected in North America. It also includes the woman who started the domestic violence shelter movement for women. It includes a three time board member of the National Organization for Women who was named one of the top 100 thinkers in the 20th Century by Financial Times Magazine.

Another academician speaking is a gay man who has dedicated a career to understanding gender issues.

This is all alongside a nationally recognized journalist, psychologists, psychotherapists and other experienced advocates for men and boys.

The death threats from feminists, in the attempt to silence these esteemed speakers, has resulted in the conference incurring tens of thousands of dollars in additional security costs.

We plan on launching a fundraiser tomorrow to address those needs, but I want to give the feminists who stand by free speech and assert decisively that these thugs do not represent what feminism is about, to have an early shot at helping us address the gender issues that impact men and boys in an open forum.

The paypal button below is offered for feminists only. It is a $25.00 one-time donation to help us with security costs that were inflicted on us by others calling themselves feminists.

You can show your support, and the true heart of the feminist community by assisting us with the security to have a safe conference with honest and open dialogue.

The donation thermometer will reflect the donations we receive.

Thank you in advance for those who wish to help.

Public letter to Emma Howland-Bolton, teacher at Detroit public schools, regarding threats of violence and death by protesters under her organization

Jonathan Taylor · 31 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Addressed to the following:
Emma Howland-Bolton, protest organizer and administrator: emma.howlandbolton@gmail.com

To Emma Howland-Bolton:

My name is Jonathan Taylor. I am the founder and publisher of A Voice for Male Students, the leading Men's Human Rights website for men and boys in education. I note – as is widely available on public record – that you are a teacher in Detroit. From one teacher to another, greetings.

I am writing to call upon you to take an opportunity to enhance the credibility of your protest. In summary, you have been heavily invested in organizing a protest that has included threats of violence and death against organizers, attendees and hosts of the upcoming conference at the Double Tree hotel in Detroit. Indeed, these threats of violence and death have become so pervasive and severe that the hotel is now requiring an entire squadron of police to station themselves at the premises for 24 hour-a-day security for three days straight so that people cannot be killed for simply listening to academics and advocates speak at a conference.

I am calling on you to immediately remove from the Facebook group of which you are the administrator the posts and users which advocate violence and other forms of criminal conduct (examples here and here). In addition, I am calling on you to make an immediate public announcement on that Facebook group and any other social media channels you use to organize your event in which you denounce all exercise and suggestion of criminal conduct for both the current and all future protests. I am calling on you to do all of these things – not pick and choose those you prefer.

As you well know, the upcoming First International Conference on Men's Issues unites academics and advocates from diverse backgrounds and across the political spectrum. The roster of speakers includes Dr. Warren Farrell (three-time board member of the National Organization for Women-New York), Senator Anne Cools (the first black female senator to be elected to Canada's upper house), Erin Pizzey (the founder of the first battered women's shelter), Dr. Paul Nathanson (a gay academic who has written numerous books on gender issues), and many more.

While your protest is ostensibly predicated (as you erroneously claim) on the notion that this group of academics and advocates are responsible for violence against women (including the likes of Elliot Rodger, who – it would be apropos to note – murdered twice as many men as women), you have provided no evidence of a direct link to support these accusations. Furthermore, no one has ever been able to directly link Rodger to any Men's Human Rights website, social media channel, or organization. My own website – the leading Men's Human Rights website for men and boys in education – published an article sternly criticizing his actions.

Simultaneously, as an event organizer and facilitator you have failed to exercise discretion in taking any stance whatsoever against protesters who make threats and suggestions of violence and other forms of criminality among your own rank and file as today, 5-31-14 at 12:51 PM. These threats and suggestions of violence and criminality have remained on your group for at least three solid days while countless posts by men's advocates asking for nothing more than a calm, civil discussion were deleted left and right.

You were far, far too slow in addressing this. And you know it.

Your prior history of facilitating and organizing protests also includes other events that have escalated into criminal conduct, demonstrating a cavalier "it's ok for us, but not for them" stance toward criminal behavior. This includes the group with the disconcerting title “By Any Means Necessary,” of which “any means” includes illegally trespassing into and occupying a closed public building to “protest” its closing down well after its final hours, resisting arrest, and obstruction of justice (related: video).

Given your history, it reasonable to both call to this to public attention. Given that these disconcerting double standards are predicated upon ideological worldviews (which often have a “totalizing” effect on the people who adopt them), I think it also reasonable to be concerned in what capacity you – as an educator – enforce double standards toward your own students on the basis of sex, both in methods of instruction and discipline.

As I noted in a recent article, threats of violence are common among those who oppose the human rights of men and boys. During the 2006 Duke lacrosse false rape case, students paraded around a banner reading “castrate,” an open call for violence against the three young men who were falsely accused of rape. In a staggering example of inverted moral reasoning, they rationalized their call to violence by saying they were opposing an incident of violence which, as it turned out, never happened.

Last year those protesting men’s advocates who were sponsored by the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) to speak at the University of Toronto called for violence if their demand that the university close down the event were not met. In pursuit of a sexual misconduct policy which defined rape so broadly beyond its legal definition that it essentially eviscerated due process, the Feminist group “Radical Womyn of Antioch” threatened Antioch College with violence if they failed to adopt their policy [1].

Given that there is historical continuity and precedent among those who oppose the human rights of men and boys with threats of violence, it is imperative that we challenge it. You may be wondering why I am addressing you specifically. As follows.

While it is true that you are listed as but one of several administrators of the Facebook group protesting the upcoming conference, a thorough review of the posting history reveals that you are one of the most active – if not the most active – administrator on the page, posting new links and content on a regular basis.

You have acted as the primary networking administrator of your group, networking and bringing in protesters from Take Back the Night groups, shelter workers, women’s advocacy groups and bloggers, hotel workers, public officials, and more. You have also engaged with users on a comment-by-comment basis far more consistently than any other administrator. Given your disproportionate investment and profile relative to other administrators, you have effectively established yourself as the “go-to” point of contact for the protest.

In other words, you have leadership. And with leadership comes responsibility. It’s not just a party.

There is one more reason why I am singling you out other than your clear prominence in organizing and facilitating these protests: you are an educator. That in and of itself should come with its own class of standards, as those upon whom we confer such public faith should be individuals who exhibit a standard of behavior, professionalism, and due diligence that is nothing short of exemplary. Doubly so when those in their charge are impressionable children.

Leading men’s advocates have had no problem denouncing violence in the past. In a “heads up” for an academic speaking event last year at the University of Toronto the staff at A Voice for Men – in strong and clear language – threatened to automatically sever ties with any men's advocate who engages in violence (attacking or defending) and hand them over to the police. Indeed, they have told men's advocates to not even defend themselves if under attack, but rather to either retreat or – if they cannot – to curl up on the ground in a fetal position while others filmed and contacted police.

A Voice for Men and their affiliates have also partnered with men's advocates at the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE), offering a reward of $4,000 for a Feminist student who was allegedly (but not confirmed to have been) assaulted. When they encouraged Feminists to match it they were met with silence.

And Voice for Male Students has always maintained a policy of nonviolence. Indeed, it is one of its nine founding values.

In an ideal world there would be no need to explain to you why a policy of nonviolence is essential to any human rights endeavor. I belabor this because it is unfortunately not so apparent to our opponents. Violence can be compared to George Washington's characterization of government: a "dangerous servant and a fearful master." Violence does not breed peace, but only more violence, and it inevitably harms those who initiate it.

I'm not asking you to agree with the issues presented at the conference. Issues which, I remind, will be represented by academics from diverse backgrounds and across the political spectrum. But I do strongly disagree with is the widespread permissiveness among our opponents for threats and suggestions of violence, death, and other forms of criminal behavior that have no place in a free and enlightened society. Indeed, slander, libel, misrepresentation, and censorship – historically the bread and butter of our opponents – while remaining pervasive, has now become the least of our concerns.

It doesn't take a lot to openly denounce violence. A Voice for Men has done it. A Voice for Male Students has done it. We can do it easily. We're still waiting on you to do it.

I look forward to your substantial and more evenhanded public reaffirmation to nonviolence by the end of tomorrow, 6-1-14.

Regards,

Jonathan Taylor

The Misandry Behind Misogyny

Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) · 31 May 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The recent spate of feminists shrieking "misogyny!" following the Elliot Rodger rampage needs to be placed in the right context; i.e., is said misogyny of one deranged man a cause or a symptom? More specifically, is it a primary cause or a secondary cause? This is a question medicos ask all the time, for example, with respect to HIV (as primary cause) versus opportunistic infections such as pneumonia (secondary cause). The question of primary versus secondary is also relevant to cancer when trying to establish the source of the secondary lethal tumours that metastasize at locations removed from the source.

So is misogyny the source of Rodger's rampage? Or was his misogyny an expression of a wider, systemic hatred as it manifests in modern society in 2014? Consider the misandry that provides the foundations upon which feminism is built. Misandry is the driving force behind feminism, the purpose of which is to shame men and their achievements – a sentiment extended into schools where boys are taught that they should be ashamed of their manhood and their heroes. We now have a feminist industry, and a revised education system that regards competition (boys) as something nasty that is to be discouraged, versus collaborative, facilitative conformity (girls) as the greater good that is to be encouraged. Instead of celebrating the achievements of great men, feminists prefer to notice only the worst among men and shame boys and men for that. That's misandry at work.

And if schools are going to devote large portions of their syllabuses to shaming boys for what they represent, then does it not follow that some boys might grow resentful? Does it not follow that perhaps, just maybe, some might lash out at some crucial stage of their development? As children sometimes do when an abusive and controlling parent oversteps the limits in trying to contain their thankless, wayward son or daughter. Do feminists so lack commonsense? So much for women's "empathy" as feminists like to portray it.

Consider, for example, the misandry of feminists, like David Futrelle. He prefers to shame men because King Leopold of Belgium [1] was a man, rather than celebrate men because George Washington, Isaac Newton, Johan Sebastian Bach, Ludwig van Beethoven, William Shakespeare, Galileo Galilei, Nikolai Copernicus, William James, David Hume, and so on and on and on, were all men. What's with that? We're sure that David means well, but perhaps someone might like to sit down with him one rainy afternoon to try to explain to him how a man like Mahatma Gandhi was different to a man like Adolf Hitler. Surely we can afford him at least this much, given all that he has done to promote AVFM in the media and raise public awareness to our cause. And if he still doesn't get it, maybe he'll switch his emphasis to an endeavour that for him at least, is more productive… like cat grooming, or feline health supplements, or preventing furballs in your favourite moggy.

Why are feminists so keen to bring men down? Feminists' failure to distinguish between great men versus thugs is projection that speaks volumes of their stunted emotional development, and their view of the world in simplistic, two-dimensional terms. Think of how toxic this feminist attitude is to our cultures, how much harm it has caused. With feminism, we are supposed to be ashamed of the men (The Patriarchy) who are responsible for the cultural achievements that make modern, advanced society possible, and we are supposed to make amends to women for all those millennia of patriarchal oppression… all without any reference, of course, to women's hypergamy, and no reference to the dynamics of provider/provided-for that have always been integral to the workings of most every culture throughout human history.

And so the boys in our schools are being shamed for their competitive natures, and are being taught to make amends for all those millennia of patriarchal privilege and entitlement… like the privilege of dying in wars or the entitlement of dying on construction sites, to cater to the providing for women. And our feminists have the gall to call Rodger's rampage misogyny. Of course this is not to excuse said rampage – there is never any excuse for violence, ever. But we do need to understand the cultural forces that lie at the source, and the misandry that might inspire the misogyny.

Feminist misandry is not confined to our children's schools. Misandry often begins in the home where women are (statistically) the primary abusers of children. For example 32.6% of child fatalities were perpetrated by the mother acting alone, while 16.6% of child fatalities were perpetrated by the father acting alone (Child Maltreatment 2002) [2] – and mothers are inclined to abuse their sons more than their daughters.

From a wider, cultural perspective, how primary nurturers treat their children has repercussions above and beyond a few disgruntled kids that don't fit in – it has relevance to cultural values, what a culture stands for, and indeed, what it means to be human. According to Dr Jill Stamm (video #9) [3] of Arizona State University, 90% of a human brain's wiring is accomplished within the first three or four years of life. Which seems to suggest that the primary nurturer's role on a child's brain wiring, over the course of up to 16 years, is certainly not going to be trivial.

Children learn a lot while under the guidance of their primary nurturer – most importantly, they learn what matters, they learn about who is expected to be the provider and who is expected to be the provided-for. When children play with their toy trucks or their doll-houses, all this takes place under the care of their primary nurturer. Children learn about civility, tantrums, love and how to get their way, usually under the care of their primary nurturer. Children first learn violence from their primary nurturer. And so it is that Stephen Baskerville's observations [4] linking single-mom households to criminality would seem to be self-evident.

We know how the old adage goes… behind every great man is a supportive woman. But behind every criminal you are more likely to find a toxic, child-abusing mom.

It might at first seem odd that feminists do appear to recognize cultural conditioning – indeed, at a simplistic level they obsess about it. Yet fail to understand mom's role in said conditioning. For all their unsubstantiated prattle about The Patriarchy, where might The Matriarchy fit in? Simplistically, with the innocence of vindictive children, they think that a culture is either patriarchal or matriarchal, seemingly oblivious to the fact that every culture on earth that has ever existed has always been comprised of men and women. Feminists don't seem to understand that every culture has both patriarchal and matriarchal elements. And in their subjective obsession with The Patriarchy, it is they that most render women invisible. In this sense, feminists are the most balanced sexists on earth… they are both misandrists and misogynists.

As surreal as all of this is, what is scary is not that feminists exist, but that society takes these freaks seriously enough to establish misandric government programs that trash the most basic human rights of men and boys. Within contemporary feminist culture, Rodger's rampage received extra fuel- becoming a self-fulfilling outcome of a relentless misandric program. Everything that feminists have ever incited is coming true. Feminists' relentless yapping about misogyny and rape culture is naught but pure projection. Their misandry is the source. It is misandry that is the first cause. It is misandry that is the real killer. And it is upon misandry that the foundations of feminism have been laid.

Lecture 7: The Personal, as Contrasted to the Political

Adam Kostakis · 1 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the seventh of twelve lectures. – PW

> They prided themselves on belonging to a movement, as distinguished from a party, and a movement could not be bound by a program. – Hannah Arendt

Last week, we looked at how the concept of domination has become a justification for encroaching despotism. It should not come as a shock to attentive readers that virtually every keyword in the feminist lexicon is used in a similar way. Whether the term being discussed is misogyny or rape or patriarchy, the tendency is to broaden its meaning to cover as wide a semantic area as possible, smuggling the maximum possible ideological contraband within an overcoat of righteousness. The real-world effect of all this is to restrict male autonomy through the criminalization of men's actions. The limitless possibilities for semantic bleaching correspond to extensive prison sentences and crippling fines. The intention is to criminalize the norm. Every move that a man makes should send a shiver down his spine, should force him to look over his shoulder, with a panic-stricken expression, wondering, "what new law have I just broken?" Men are to live in a perpetual state of surveillance and presumed guilt – a panoptical existence in which they are repeatedly chastized for doing wrong. That is, according to an invasive, alien moral standard that they are invited to obey, not understand, and certainly not to question or refute.

But when the criminalized behavior falls within the domain of actions in which both men and women engage, the argument requires a corollary that it is different, and worse, when men do it. For instance, certain nasty individuals of both sexes engage in sexual harassment, but we must understand that when men do it to women, it is chalk, and when women do it to men, it is cheese. The two, we are assured, are incomparable, regardless of how a victimized man might see things – after all, even in his victimhood, he is blinkered by his privilege.

The whole fairy tale is aptly summed up in the feminist mantra, the personal is political. As was discussed last week, the proper context in which this claim should be viewed is the recent history of the Western world. Particular focus should be given to a current within our shared political culture, which has given rise to despotic government and threatens to do so again. How else are we to interpret a statement that all things within the domain of the individual are in fact the business of government? If we do not own or control those things which are personal to us, there cannot be anything to speak of that we do own or control, up to and including our lives.

But it would be a mistake to view the mantra simply as a statement of belief, i.e. that its speaker merely believes the personal to be political. All manner of people have all manner of kooky theories, and a group of people communicating their belief that all aspects of our lives are managed by the state would be about as troubling as tin foil conspiracy theorists or the Flat Earth Society. When a feminist says that the personal is political, however, she is not simply stating a belief; she is making a call to action. There are implications hidden within the phrase.

Last week's discussion involved a section on ideologies, and the progressivist assumptions at the roots of Western political culture. To recap, ideologies assume a difference between how society is and how it ought to be, predicated upon a specific moral view of the world. What this means, as far as feminist analysis is concerned, is that if the personal is not currently political, then it should be made that way. Practically all feminist innovation consists of making those things which are personal into political matters. The logical end-point is to be found where there are no strictly personal actions, no personal utterances, intentions, thoughts or beliefs; all of these, expressed publicly or privately, would be strictly political. Every decision, down to the minutiae details of everyday life, becomes a political matter for which individuals are held to account, not as individual transgressors, but as members of an oppressive class which must answer for its sins.

'The political' is another one of those essentially contested concepts – in other words, it is one of those concepts most open to abuse. It is an elusive idea, which can be grasped but never precisely pinned down – and attempts to do so are rather like trying to grab all the air in an inflatable mattress. One of the things we can say about 'the political,' is that it has not always been identified with 'the ideological' – which seems sensible enough, since 'the ideological' is a product of modernity, a relative newcomer as far as politics is concerned.

Once upon a time, 'the political' was a term which referred to Kings, Queens, courtiers and nobles, their struggles and their successions; but certainly not to doctrine. That change came about gradually, with the steady fall of religious fervor that marks modernity.

I am aware that I skate close to etymological fallacy, so let me clarify what I am arguing. I am not complaining that there is a proper meaning of terms such as 'the political' which has fallen out of fashion. I have previously acknowledged that language is forever in flux. As a corollary, I do recognize that objectively correct definitions are something of a rarity. My purpose, in highlighting linguistic change, is a correlative highlighting of social change! The one rarely undergoes a paradigm shift without bringing the other along. There is immense power in language, to not only reflect but to define the experiential world. If we want to understand how things came to be the way that they are, we should cast a searing torch beam over historic changes in vocabulary – it is here that we will find the notional germ cells that gave rise to the feminist disease.

Such as in the case of 'the political'. Today, everything controversial is reflexively considered a political matter. Whether we are discussing a person's unusual lifestyle, or a new work of art that pushes boundaries, or a website that advances an innovative worldview, we feel quite certain that what we are discussing is a political statement. The controversial, then is political; or perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the unusual is political. Non-conformists of all stripes are prompted to attach some political purpose to their actions or beliefs. The effect of this very public challenge is to lock individuals into a system of pervasive control; stepping out of line makes one into a target.

And this is precisely what feminism requires – for men to stand in line, and to target those who do not. It's a lot easier to pursue the project for increasing the power of women when you can effectively gag those who stand to lose the most from its success.

The flip side to all this is women's exponentially increasing and 'compensatory' license. It is men alone whose private lives are to be locked into the system of public control; women, in contrast, are to enjoy the spoils of victory in a new era of female sexual anarchism. Perhaps the only consolation we can realistically take is that despotisms are great generators of spiritual enlightenment among the oppressed. It was the persecution of early Christians that drove pious men and women to live alone in the desert, in imitation of Jesus Christ – it was only in the fifth century that these monastics were co-opted into the Church, having sought a purely ascetic existence as an alternative to the material world that had driven them out. Similarly, the oppressive regimes of the Hellenistic period led many in the Greek city-states to embrace mystical philosophies which advocated turning away from the world. Given that we are well on our way towards feminist despotism, it is not surprising that a parallel development is fledgling, in the form of the Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) movement. MGTOW have rejected the Gynocentric demand that men must define themselves according to their sexual prowess. Accordingly unburdened, many MGTOW have taken up introspective deliberation on the nature of man and masculinity – discussions which are androcentric and therefore not accountable to feminist orthodoxy. At its core, the MGTOW movement turns away from the world – from marriage, children, self-sacrificing employment, even relationships with women altogether – seeking solace from hostile agents as did the ascetics and mystics of the ancient world.

Although I endorse the MGTOW lifestyle, I am conscious that it is not enough – for fulfillment or for survival. Feminism is simply not in the business of leaving men alone. It is a progressivist ideology, which means it just keeps on growing, with no internal checks on its own activities; it has no brakes! All attempted self-criticism yields to further radicalization. Unable to perceive the world from outside of the feminist bubble, its disciples think and act in an anti-contextual, abstract fashion. The only checks on the activities of such ideologies must come from the outside – i.e., from the rest of society. If feminism will not slow down and stop of its own accord, then external agents must build a brick wall in its path. This is a moral requirement – the alternative is to allow it free reign, in which case we will inevitably end up with despotism. Thus far, feminism has proved remarkably socio-dynamic, and has faced very little political resistance – meaning that the velocity of persecution is set to increase.

I should like to clarify. The word 'feminism' can refer to more than one thing. Most obviously, feminism the movement is the not precisely the same thing as feminism the ideology; rather, the former is driven by the dictates of the latter. Feminism the ideology is a victim ideology, which means that it exists in defense of a certain class of people which has been designated as the victims. The dual objectives goals of a victim ideology are, as I have remarked previously:

(1) To equalize with the 'enemy' group;
(2) To forge its own 'victim identity,' separate from and unaccountable to the 'enemy' group.

If objective (1) is ever achieved, then the ideology simply ceases to be, which means that the movement also ceases to be. The movement, however, is not an inorganic entity which mechanistically fulfills the needs of the ideology. It is made up of people who have become dependent upon it, psychologically and financially. The end of inequality, however it was originally measured, would spell disaster for Women's Studies graduates everywhere. For instance, the inability of feminist organizations to admit that rape rates are falling and that false allegations are reaching epidemic levels is down to the losses that would be sustained by ideologues sitting in (usually empty) rape crisis centers. The ideology cannot be permitted to die – there is far too much riding on it, namely, the movement, and whatever goodies its principal actors have managed to get their paws on. As with many people, the threat of redundancy is enough to bring out a hard-line conservatism, which insists, in this case, on the existence of brand new oppressions still to be overcome. There is an awful lot of money riding on the continued perception that women are disadvantaged. Feminism is not merely a movement any more, but an industry – aptly referred to by some as the sexual grievance industry.

Should this industry crash, it would leave a hole in the purses of career feminists nearly as large as the hole it would leave between their ears. The alternative to continued state support for the overcoming of new oppressions is almost unthinkable. It would not only mean an end to men subsidizing their own persecution – it would also threaten to leave a psychic vacuum in the minds of professional feminists. Whatever would they do, should they be deprived of their blood money?

The feminists do, of course, have a backup plan. I refer you to objective (2). The reason why victim ideologies tend to die hard when equality or even supremacy of the 'victim' group is achieved is this: they shift their aims towards the inherent separateness of the 'victim' and 'enemy' groups, and refuse accountability to the rest of the world. Indeed, any attempt by a person external to the designated 'victim' group, to hold the members of said group accountable for their transgressions, is tarnished as the effort to roll back objective (1) – and the person who dared to raise the complaint will be called any number of amazing names.

A victim ideology is necessarily tripartite in its understanding of time. The past is identified with Oppression, the present with Struggle, and the future with Liberation. This tripartite historiography is a constant. If any one of the three states – Oppression, Struggle or Liberation – is removed, then we no longer have a victim ideology. It falls apart, owing to its inconsistency. There must have been past Oppression, as this justifies the present Struggle, which also must be the case for the present, as a matter of tautology -; what else would we be talking about?

Struggle must be towards something, and this is Liberation, promised in the future. Below is a diagram of sorts, presented from the feminist perspective:

It is a childish caricature, fitting for a childish worldview. Note what is required for the tripartite Oppression, Struggle, Liberation to make sense – the actor who did the oppressing, who must be struggled against, and from whom the designated victims shall be liberated. This is, of course, men.
The above picture is presented from the feminist perspective, in which time moves horizontally, from left to right. In the real world, time's arrow is broken. We are frozen permanently in the present phase, and from there, time moves vertically and downwards:

There is simply too much riding on feminism (i.e. the sexual grievance industry) to allow the actual liberation of women to be acknowledged. If it were to be admitted that women are not only liberated, but the recipients of a number of advantages over men, then the movement and the ideology, and thus the industry that is feminism, would become moot. Women's current role, which is perhaps more appropriately described as Privileged, is not even conceivable on feminist time. Liberation must always remain a future goal, and can never be permitted as a present achievement. Feminism is self-sustaining this way – by forever propelling itself into new Struggles. The tripartite understanding of timeis independent of context; it is fundamentally abstract and anti-contextual. The tripartite is assumed before the truth about the world at any given moment is ascertained, and the facts of the world must then be hammered out into a feminist-friendly shape.

It is of little consequence that all the great Struggles have been won. Feminists can just create new ones. And since men are (as the case must always be) the oppressors to be struggled against, it is quite justifiable to take away whatever power they still possess.
Until they possess none.

Christina Hoff-Sommers: Where does "rule of thumb" come from?

AVfM Video Source · 2 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Christina Hoff-Sommers does a great job of taking apart common feminist myths. This time she takes on the “rule of thumb.”

Let’s hope she takes on the perennial urban legend that wife-beating goes up around the time of the Superbowl and other sporting events.

Lecture 8: Chasing Rainbows

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the eighth of twelve lectures. – PW

> Equality, rightly understood as our founding fathers understood it, leads to liberty and to the emancipation of creative differences; wrongly understood, as it has been so tragically in our time, it leads first to conformity and then to despotism. – Barry Goldwater

What is it that enables us to live meaningful lives? This is a question with a long history, and after more than two thousand years of scratching our heads, our species is not much the wiser. Answers fall just as easily as they are formed. Perhaps the only real wisdom to be imparted by centuries of soul-searching is that the solution cannot be reduced to the realization of only one value. Efforts to bring about a social system based upon the realization of one value in particular – be it religious doctrine, the will of the nation, or social equality – have invariably resulted in widespread repression, and not the golden age of peace and virtue as postulated by their ideologues. In contrast, those societies which have managed to create and maintain the space for people to actually live what they might call 'meaningful lives' are those which have kept a number of values in balance. This is not a very exciting solution, but it is better to be dissatisfied with the great mysteries of life than to be enserfed or 'disappeared' by a regime in pursuit of a more enticing dictum.

Whatever the case, the argument for autonomy seems convincing – balanced, as it must be, against other values. It is difficult to see how one's life could be considered meaningful where one does not possess even the most basic rights of self-determination. On this point, I am superficially in agreement with the feminists, who have made autonomy (and not equality) their guiding principle. Of course, in their case, it is only women's autonomy that matters, and this is to be extended as far as possible. Nevertheless, we do agree that autonomy, in and of itself, is a good thing, although I would qualify my support with the corollary that it must be balanced against other values so that it does not become license.

It is the most spectacular irony, then, that so long as they remain feminists, women will never knowingly taste freedom. Feminism is a victim ideology which freezes women perpetually in Struggle; it cannot afford to indulge in Liberation, else the game is up. To continue playing, feminists must imagine that they are under the control of external forces which are responsible for every fate that befalls them. They have a name for this mass delusion: The Patriarchy. Every bad decision, every unwanted consequence, every minor inconvenience can be traced back to this mystical, mythical and invisible system of control which exerts influence over women, in much the same way that animistic tribes explained severe weather phenomena by reference to angered and vengeful deities. If feminists are to pretend that Struggle is still relevant, then it cannot be admitted that women are in control of their own actions, for this would imply that they are free moral agents. Women must be made to believe that they are delicate vessels being tossed about in an ocean storm, with navigation and steering rendered futile, and no land in sight. Perhaps we could contrast this to the MGTOW movement, which resembles a series of wooden canoes, light but durable, whose occupants paddle alone on calm seas – for the time being, at least.

Even when women are privileged beyond their wildest dreams – which is inconceivable in feminist theory – they still may not be considered free. Women are not permitted to enjoy freedom; it must be denied for the ideology to survive. It must be reiterated, until it comes to mind reflexively, that "we still live in a patriarchy," and "women are still not yet equal," and so forth. Feminism's adherents can never rest, because they will not allow themselves to. They are forever chasing rainbows.

They are mentally barricaded in, shut off from the very world that they impose their designs upon. They are forced to conceive of themselves forever Struggling, lest they become Liberated, and therefore irrelevant. As I said last week, a tripartite perception of history (past as Oppression, present as Struggle, and future as Liberation) is a constant of feminism, and this is decided upon in advance of the facts. Regardless of context, the present is Struggle, with Liberation perpetually set some way off into the future. As the proverb states, tomorrow never comes.

As I have mentioned previously, feminism is fundamentally anti-contextual, deciding upon the story in advance, and then fitting the facts around this. The process is simple. Take the key points about the given situation, and through the use of dislogic, eristic, moral relativism, symbolism, self-contradiction and dreamlike fantasy, frame the discourse as one in which women are moving from Oppression to Liberation, but will not get there without feminist Struggle.

This is not to say that feminism operates statically. The first step in the process just described is to draw in the facts from real life. If feminists did not do this, their preaching would have zero appeal to the non-feminist sector, because it would seem to have no bearing on the experiential world. Feminism is anti-contextual in the sense that the story is decided prior to the facts, but it is nevertheless dependent on the context of any particular situation. The real life context must first be experienced and understood, and only then can it be co-opted into feminist discourse. To take a clear example, feminists in the United States today do not agitate for women's right to vote. They would get nowhere if they did, because, having the vote, they have nowhere else to go (in this regard). The franchise is not now a relevant issue in the context of the real world. On the other hand, the fact that most business leaders are men will be verified by most people's experiences of the world; this, then, can be drawn into feminist discourse, as an example of Oppression.

Forgive me for being overly simplistic. It must be made clear how the process of manufacturing Struggle is playing a pivotal role in the changing nature of rights.

What is a right? As it has typically been understood, a right is a claim which, in usual circumstances, is inviolable. In other words, if I have a right, then I have some kind of claim – the permission to do something I wish to do, or to be protected from something I do not wish for – and other individuals may not deprive me of this claim. To take a clear example, I have the right not to be assaulted – other individuals are not permitted to assault me. They may do so nonetheless, in which case they have transgressed against my right; they have done what they are not permitted to do, and prevented me from doing (or avoiding) those things which I am permitted to do (or avoid). Accordingly, I am permitted to seek recompense for the violation of my right.

A theory of rights requires an enforcer, in order to prevent rights transgressions and provide recompense to those whose rights have been violated. The enforcer that we are familiar with is the state, particularly those institutions involved in the creation and practise of law: the legislature, the judiciary, the police force, and so on. It is necessary that the state possesses the monopoly on the use of force, else its rule would go unenforced, and there would be no deterrent against rights violations. In an extreme case, the citizens may rise up and overthrow a weak state, subsequently instituting their own form of justice which may be far from impartial. Max Weber famously described the state as "the monopoly of the legitimate use of force." I have left out the word 'legitimate' from my definition here, because it strikes me as an entirely subjective judgment, not to mention an inevitable one from the point of view of those in control of the state. Those who seize power and use it to persecute one section of the population will surely believe their own monopoly on the use of force to be legitimate – indeed, they will most likely believe their own use of force to be of greater legitimacy than that of the regime which they deposed, no matter how that regime conducted itself.

Note that there is no inherent limitation to the concept of rights; there is no in-built brake system. There can never be a point where we say, "now we have all the rights." There will always be potentially more rights that we could possess. That is not to say we categorically should possess more rights. The full possession of all conceivable rights would be an inconceivable license – total autonomy, in which all claims would be permitted. This would mean that the individual with license would be free to violate the rights of others. In this case, the rights of others would be meaningless whenever they encounter the licensed individual. Logically, all people cannot have total possession of all rights, because each would be permitted to infringe upon the rights of all the others – which means that nobody's rights would be secure, and the strongest individual or group would be entitled to establish arbitrary rule by physical force alone.

Clearly we need limitations, and the Constitution of the United States of America is the exemplar in this regard. As the finest statement of personal liberty and representative democracy the world has ever known, it exists to protect a number of fundamental rights from being overturned by the strongest collection of individuals – namely, the government. Laws may come and go, but so long as the constitution is upheld, the foundational rights of the individual citizen are set in stone – or, at least, are extremely difficult to remove or alter. Where a government repeatedly violates its own constitution, it (ideally, at least) runs the risk of being overthrown by an uprising of citizens, who would, together, form a stronger collective.

The United States Constitution, adopted in 1787, built upon the liberal philosophy of the time, most especially that of John Locke. Sections of the Declaration of Independence, signed eleven years previous, are more or less lifted from his Second Treatise of Government. The ideas expressed in this work are not those of the liberalism we know today; they sit somewhere closer to what we would now term libertarianism. It was only in the second half of the nineteenth century that liberalism underwent the profound transformation into the collectivist ideology we more readily associate with the term today.

In his 1859 text, On Liberty, J. S. Mill introduced a new articulation of the traditional liberal moral defence of individual rights. It runs something like this: individuals have the right to do whatever they choose, so long as this does not harm others. Mill exercised caution when considering the application of this principle: one would not be harmed, for instance, by losing in open competition (e.g. the free market). Following Tocqueville, he voiced concern that democracy, if unmoderated, could devolve into majoritarian tyranny.

We may thank the successors of Mill for the perversion of individualist liberalism into a collectivist and authoritarian philosophy. It was one small step from Mill's axiom – individuals have the right to do whatever they choose, so long as this does not harm others – to the doctrine of New Liberalism: if I cannot do what I would otherwise choose, then somebody must be harming me. It was the self-proclaimed 'liberal socialist,' Leonard Trelawny Hobhouse, who built upon Mill's premises and added a new twist: that freedom is not good in and of itself, but must be subordinated to some higher end. It follows that any freedom which is not subordinated to this higher end is not morally justified. It was the social radical Richard Henry Tawney, building on this development, who advocated an egalitarian society based on the premise that "freedom for the pike is death for the minnows" – in other words, that certain identifiable groups are not deserving of equal autonomy, but must have their share restricted. It was Lester Frank Ward who disavowed the individual altogether and argued that the state should direct all social and economic development, including the happiness of its citizens. Perhaps most tellingly of all, he was an enthusiastic supporter of the notion that women are innately superior to men. To quote an especially relevant passage:

> And now from the point of view of intellectual development itself we find her side by side, and shoulder to shoulder with him furnishing, from the very outset, far back in prehistoric, presocial, and even prehuman times, the necessary complement to his otherwise one-sided, headlong, and wayward career, without which he would soon have warped and distorted the race and rendered it incapable of the very progress which he claims exclusively to inspire. And herefore again, even in the realm of intellect, where he would fain reign supreme, she has proved herself fully his equal and is entitled to her share of whatever credit attaches to human progress hereby achieved.

The purpose of this detour into the changing nature of rights was to hone in on the historical developments that precipitated certain aspects of modern feminism. Some contributors to the Men's Rights Movement have somewhat abstractly attacked 'modernity' and 'Enlightenment values.' This is fine if they are intending to attack individual autonomy in general, but we must look more carefully if we actually want to get to the root of the problems facing men, as men, today – which, I would argue, coalesce into the deprivation of male autonomy. It is modernity, and particularly Enlightenment thought, which made individual autonomy a possibility – and it is social liberalism, and most especially feminism, which are turning it into an impossibility for men.

The innovation of social liberalism is conspicuous in the section of the Ward quote above which I have emphasized. It is entitlement; the creation of new obligations for others to fulfil; the construction of rights claims, not rights of individuals, to be held equally, but against an identified segment of the population (the 'enemy' group). Of course, every right, if it is taken seriously, demands obligations of others – if I have a right to not be assaulted, then you must not assault me, and vice versa. The difference between such a claim and the claims of New Liberalism is that the former is an obligation to inaction, while the latter is an obligation to action. My obligations to inaction mean that I cannot transgress certain boundaries – the rights of other people. I may not hurt them, steal from them, or do damage to their possessions. I am forbidden to do certain things which would interfere with the autonomy of others, but apart from that, I am free to do as I please. Obligations to action are of a different sort altogether: the one who holds me to such an obligation has the power to command me. I am told how to act, and I am forbidden to act any other way. This curtails my autonomy.

For instance, if you require some object in order to accomplish a certain project, then your autonomy is curtailed if you do not possess the object. Therefore, you have a claim to my object, presuming that I possess one. It matters not if I have earned or otherwise rightfully own my object; the theory goes that you should have it anyway. Claims of ownership and desert are subordinated to the autonomy of individuals, which translates to the wants (not needs) of specially identified 'victim' groups. If, say, I am interviewing a man and a woman for a position in my employ, and the woman demands that she be given the job as a crucial step in her career plan, I am denying her autonomy by not employing her, even if she is the least qualified candidate. She needs the position in order to achieve what she ultimately wants, and so she is wronged if she does not get it. The doctrine of New Liberalism – if I am unable to do what I would otherwise choose, then somebody must be harming me – clearly serves the victim agenda of feminism. Any limit whatsoever on the actions of women, including those introduced in the name of fairness and impartiality, can be taken as a new Oppression according to this doctrine.

'New' or 'social' liberalism is in fact the perversion and corruption of liberalism – and it finds its highest expression in the caste system of rights feminists are busy creating. Women's rights, a catch phrase once trumpeted as a progressive march towards a fairer future, has become the trump card that never loses its value, ready to be played any time a woman wants to 'get one over the guys'. In the early days, the idea of Struggle was more creditable, and even seems admirable in retrospect. Women struggled for rights which men possessed: the right to vote, the right to own property, the right to divorce, the right to the same wage as a man doing the same job. Once upon a time, it was perfectly plausible, to an unbiased observer, that feminism meant to bring about equality between the sexes. That is not to say this view is inherently correct, only that it was believable, from a point of view external to feminism, that the feminist project carried this altruistic goal.

But what are the women's rights advocated today? The right to confiscate men's money, the right to commit parental alienation, the right to commit paternity fraud, the right to equal pay for less work, the right to pay a lower tax rate, the right to mutilate men, the right to confiscate sperm, the right to murder children, the right to not be disagreed with, the right to reproductive choice and the right to make that choice for men as well. In an interesting legal paradox, some have advocated – with success – that women should have the right to not be punished for crimes at all. The eventual outcome of this is a kind of sexual feudalism, where women rule arbitrarily, and men are held in bondage, with fewer rights and far more obligations. To date, the transformation of rights into obligations to action have given us a welfare state in which, according to The Futurist, > virtually all government spending […] from Medicare to Obamacare to welfare to public sector jobs for women to the expansion of the prison population, is either a net transfer of wealth from men to women, or a byproduct of the destruction of Marriage 1.0. In either case, 'feminism' is the culprit […] Remember again that the earnings of men pays 70%-80% of all taxes.

Feminism views the independence of individual citizens as a barrier, not a safeguard. Personal autonomy hinders feminism's progress in moralizing the world and bleeding men dry for the benefit of women.

Women's rights? It's nothing but a power grab.

Demanding Accountability in Maine

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 3 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Integrity4Maine held a rally this past weekend against the prosecutorial misconduct infecting the District Attorney's office in Hancock County. Carletta Bassano's (the current DA) office has a reputation for falsely convicting innocent people by withholding exculpatory evidence and engineering biased testimonies from clients. This is the same office that houses Mary Kellet, the Asst. District Attorney and prosecutor with a per capita prosecution rate that is forty times higher than the general U.S. population.

The stories around the DA's office became part of a national conversation when Kellet landed in hot water in her attempts to destroy Vladek Filler, an innocent father. Integrity4Maine made the DA's office a large part of its life as an activist organization after following the activities of its laywers. I4M's founder, Brian Danielson, served as the master of ceremonies at the rally and addressed the crowd of 32 with detailed knowledge of how utterly bent the system is.

The corruption is systemic, and is supported by a network of cronies including Paul Cavanaugh (who does not even acknowledge that corruption exists) and Bill Entwisle. All of the prosecutors are, in essence, partners in crime. To put it simply, if you are accused of a crime in Maine, they will strip your human rights to convict you.

This will happen even if you've never committed a crime at all.

Paul Elam was originally scheduled to speak at the rally, but fell ill and was unable to attend. I went to Ellisworth, Maine to speak on behalf of AVFM in Paul's stead. Roughly 90 minutes of footage of the speakers was captured, but not all of it is subject for release. Some of the speakers were victims of the DA's office, and it is assumed they would rather not be publicized. Full speaker clips of the individuals shown here will be available soon.

But in the meantime, take a look at this video on my channel I put together to hit the high points. If you share the video, you would help me show the world that yes, activists are doing things.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Qw24vH33gTI

It's important for you to understand how this affects you personally. A court systems works a little bit like a brain (although admittedly the analogy is limited). As you know, a brain constantly rewires itself through behavior. When you do something like drive a car, you are actually making it easier to do the same thing again. We call this "practice," and practice ultimately creates habit. In the court system, systemic habits are called precedents, and are formed by the combined behavior of attorneys, judges and justices.

When a case goes to trial, a certain verdict and sentence makes it easier for the court system to make the same kind of decisions. The hierarchy in the court system places the federal Supreme Court at the top in the United States. When the Supreme Court makes a decision, it becomes precedent for everyone in the U.S. from that point on. Power is instant habit formation across an entire system that controls human lives.

The U.S. Supreme Court once affirmed prosecutorial immunity in Imbler v. Pachtman. Precedent now says you cannot file a civil suit against a prosecutor. Quote Wikipedia: "Qualified immunity, when applicable, shields government officials from liability for the violation of an individual's federal constitutional rights."

Read that over a couple of times and try not to wet yourself. The implications are simply unacceptable to any reasonable human being, and this is not limited to the United States.

This rally was about calling bullshit on the whole mess, and Maine's primaries are coming up on the 10th, where DA candidates will be evaluated. If you want to get rid of corrupt prosecutors, voting them out is essentially the public's only option. Bar complaints are also an option, but not a good one because the same lawyers who are in on the game process the complaints. We could debate the effectiveness —or lack thereof— of voting, but I think we can at least agree that any power the public has is power that they should use.

This is especially so if we could lose our rights the moment we walk though a courthouse door.

And remember, our journey to that door starts with but a mere accusation.

You can lose your rights because someone said so. Today.

I've written enough. Get mad.

Democracy, Dissent and the Men's Rights Movement

Hopeland Cash · 3 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The hallmarks of a democratic society are free speech and exploratory thought. All opinions and ideas should be heard, and individuals and society as a whole should strive to find new, better ways to understand the world and to interact with it.

Unfortunately these are ideals that, like every utopian dream, have not and may never be truly realized. Human relations, whether friendship, marriage, family, community or nation, are collections of compromises. Speech is free, unless it is threatening or hateful. New thoughts are explored, unless they are dangerous, such as the development of new weapons of mass destruction. All good things in moderation.

No matter how democratic, every society defines a list of acceptable beliefs, ideas and activities for its citizens. Sometimes the list is expansive, banning only the most obviously dangerous items, and other times the list is narrow, a rigid regimen of thought that everyone must follow. Now, as has happened time and time again throughout history, the number of compromises is growing. A lengthening selection of views are being deemed hateful and ever more ideas are branded dangerous and retrograde.

With each passing day we are slipping further and further into this trap, our culture's list of acceptability dwindling until the agenda of acceptable opinions on some topics can be counted on one hand. In a few cases, on the joints of a single finger.

In many ways this is understandable on a societal level. One of the functions of a shared culture is to create an environment of stability within which its citizens can thrive without fear or confusion. Shared languages, religions and philosophies all contribute to a nation's wellbeing, but they also limit its scope.

> Freedom is hammered out on the anvil of discussion, dissent, and debate.
> – Hubert H. Humphrey

That is the reason for the vital importance of a counterculture within society. Counterculture does not only mean revolutionaries fixated on tearing down society, but on the everyday dissent of thinking citizens re-examining their assumptions and challenging their neighbors. This spirit of dissent is the heart of democracy, reaching for the boundaries of free and experimental thought. Pushing the limits of acceptability, wrestling with taboos, challenging "common sense" assumptions; that is what a healthy counterculture does, and it benefits society greatly.

Without the challenge and back-talk of a counterculture society inevitably slips into patterns of ideology which, however irrational, go unchallenged and grow into a major force of influence. Pagan priests created rituals to elevate themselves, church leaders demanded strict adherence to doctrine, early scientists tried to force reconciliation of religion and science, then clung to outdated theories that could be easily disproven by actual scientific thought.

It takes open thinking to challenge assumptions and it is the duty of a democratic society to balance safety and exploration. Today's society is becoming less and less willing to entertain new thoughts, instead opting for the comforting embrace of dogma and doctrine.

Not church doctrine, but cultural. Ever fewer worldviews are deemed acceptable as the anointed sectors of society force their lens of thought more and more onto the general population. Not just conservatives, but so-called "liberals," who are no more interested in new ideas than a 14th century bishop. Liberals now have their own very well defined worldview, with their interpretations of various issues all carefully laid out, and they refuse to accept challenges to them. They challenge the old ways, but are interested only in imposing their own version of The Way Things Ought To Be.

This is how intellectual honesty dies: when there are no more liberals–in the proper sense–just different camps of conservatives each trying to force their own beliefs on the rest of the world. No matter which side of the abortion, climate, war, or other debate you are on, it has to remain a debate, not a screaming match. Dogma, whether born from tradition or progressiveness, can never foster democracy. Only truly free and exploratory thought can. Life is a work in progress and human society will never be perfect, so we have to always be looking for new, better ideas.

> Discussion in America means dissent.
> – James Thurber

That is why a new counterculture is needed. The social reformists of the 1960s shook up the world, but many of their ideas, even the most innocently but fundamentally flawed, have been adopted as gospel by the liberals–liberals-in-name-only.

A new breed of true Liberals is needed, aligned not left or right, but forward. Individuals "widely open to new ideas, willing to depart from established opinions or conventions" and to reopen debate across the cultural spectrum. Of the many candidates for such a force of reform, the Men's Rights Movement may be the strongest and best-rooted for the task.

There is a storm of misinformation swirling around the Men's Human Rights Movement the likes which is usually summoned only for the most extreme movements. The mainstream media has always been a platform for social conformity and now as ever it pushes the dominant social narrative. Rape hysteria, smear campaigns against the MHRM, bald lies and distortion of facts, all to paint the MHRM as a radical hate movement. The Men's Human Rights Movement, however, is not a radical movement, is not calling for the dissolution of society as we know it, and has goals which are squarely in-line with the most basic human rights.

And that is what makes it powerful. Seeing the self-destructive ideological mistakes of their detractors, men's rights activists prefer to gravitate to issues with well documented statistics and facts to back them up, not mere base sentimentality. That is why the MHRM will be successful.

And that is why the cultural agitation of the MHRM has much broader implications than the institution of equal rights for men and boys. By challenging the assertions of the pseudo-liberals, the MHRM is the proverbial foot in the door, taking the beating but forcing open the door to allow debate. Without MRAs crying foul and demanding truth society will sink ever deeper into post-liberal gynocentrism, adopting a new system of rigid cultural rules that will be as oppressive, demeaning and factually wrong as any ancient system.

> Bring it on. Dissent is central to any democracy.
> – Harry Belafonte

By being the counterculture, by demanding debates be held and forcing the return of intellectual honesty, the MHRM can be a force of wider good in society. Make our politicians banish dogma, force our scientists to be objective, return our universities to bastions of free thought where no one fears persecution because of the arrangement of his chromosomes.

Society is buying into doctrine again, whether it originates in 1070 or 1970, and only Men's Human Rights Activists have the drive, the dedication and the bravery to stand up to the ideological bullies who would strangle democracy rather than be exposed to the disinfecting light of public debate.

With each victory of the MHRM, the debate will spill-over into other sectors, inspiring forward-thinking dissent far beyond the reach of men's issues. Men's rights are worth fighting for in and of themselves, but more important is the act of defiance itself. It is the willingness to challenge, to stand up and ask "why?" that makes democracy possible–and the challenge must be continuous or dogma will return.

Any belief can become doctrine, and we can never know what corner the next ideological bully will emerge from–maybe even someday from the MHRM itself one day–so every idea and assumption must be challenged, repeatedly and thoroughly, until only the truth wins out. This ideal has been lost in the muddy waters of political correctness and it is up to the MHRM to remind thinking men and women around the world that it is every person's duty to challenge ideology.

We do it by fighting misandry and gynocentrism, but the very fact that we fight at all will inspire others to step forward also and join the fray, the marketplace of ideas, that is Democracy.

"Turn off the Red Light" campaign intends to actively target all sexually active males

David Walshe · 3 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There is an effort underway to introduce “The Swedish Model” into Irish law on prostitution. In brief, the Swedish model, created in 1999, criminalises the buyer of sexual services but not the seller.

Any consideration of the Swedish model must recognise the genesis of the law and the thinking behind it. The change in the law was incorporated in a government bill, the Violence against Women Act. The thinking which informed the bill was ideologically driven. Its proponents asserted two fundamental propositions: that no woman voluntarily enters into prostitution and that prostitution and sex trafficking are inextricably entwined. No empirical evidence was advanced in support of either even though all that followed was based on them. This is the ideology of radical feminism. The historian Yvonne Svanstrom describes the parliamentary debates as being heavily gendered. In addition, the uniqueness of the proposal was emphasised, all of which took place at an ideological level with no appeal to empiricism which was explicitly rejected.

At one stroke the proposal is to eliminate sex trafficking and prostitution by one simple provision. No woman in prostitution is seen as having made a free choice; instead they are all regarded as innocent victims. The conflating of prostitution with sex trafficking is both simplistic and opportunistic. This enhances the appeal of the larger proposal to eradicate prostitution altogether. However many research workers in the field see prostitution as a complex issue and do not regard it and sex trafficking as the same thing. The sex workers in their alliance SWAI, Sex Workers Alliance Ireland, do not regard themselves as trafficked or incapable of making their own choices.

Much is made of the alleged success of the Swedish law in reducing prostitution.

In 2008, the Swedish government set up an official inquiry, the Skarhed Inquiry, into the effects that the purchase law has had on prostitution and human trafficking in Sweden which then produced a report. The report was sent to the consultation process, where interested groups were provided with the opportunity to comment on it. While many were favourable, those from academic sources, such as the Department of Criminology at Stockholm University were very critical. Two Swedish researchers, Petra Östergren and Susanne Dodillet, analysed the responses and compared them to the official report and found major contradictions. Their study concluded that there was no evidence to support the official claims.

The police are now engaged in extensive operations in relation to the indoor market. Surveillance, phone tapping, monitoring of sites, mobiles, advertisements etc. (National Police Board Sweden, 2010)

Below are comments from another paper which criticises the Skarhed Report:

April 2012 Ann Jordan

> “Lastly, the branch of radical feminism that supports this analysis of sex work uses the rhetoric of ‘violence against women’ and ‘victimhood’ as a tool to silence and disempower ‘socially objectionable’ women. They collaborate with governments to create tools to enforce their views about appropriate gender roles.”
> “It is important to note at the outset that the mandate for the Skarhed Report ensured that the results would not provide any support for abandoning the prostitution law. There is no evidence the law reduced the number of sex buyers.
> The law has been enforced almost entirely against clients of street-based sex workers but the government does not have any evidence of a decrease in sex buyers since the law went into effect. They do not know how many men were soliciting on the street before or after the law. They do not know if men moved from the streets to indoors and online, or out of the country. They have not collected such data and so cannot prove any success in achieving the primary goal of the law.”

In 2008 Kajsa Wahlberg, of the human trafficking unit at Sweden's national police board, conceded that accurate statistics are hard to obtain, but estimated that the number of prostitutes in Sweden dropped 40% from 2,500 in 1998 to 1,500 in 2003.[96] However by 2010 she had conceded that the policy had failed, and that issues around prostitution were increasing as noted in the media which carried out surveys on the street.

Exporting the Model

Fact sheets outlining Swedish policy made it very clear that prostitution and trafficking were manifestations of the same male criminal predisposition, 'male violence against women and children', who are described as victims. A severe threat to society as a whole and indeed the world at large is described.

Present law in Ireland: While some activities connected with prostitution such as soliciting, pimping and brothel keeping are criminal offences, it is not at present an offence for consenting adults to exchange sex for money.

The Turn Off the Red Light (TORL) campaign was begun in Ireland around 2010 to introduce the Swedish Model into Irish Law. There are three core members of the campaign: Immigrant Council, Ruhama and National Women's Council.

They initiated it, organised it together with other groups, recruited other civic organisations including trade unions, provided the narrative and altogether controlled the agenda. It is driven by the ideology of radical feminism with some religious fundamentalism thrown in.

As before prostitution and sex trafficking are inextricably entwined. This conflation of two separate phenomena most definitely suited the campaign agenda and was designed to sway wavering supporters or those with misgivings otherwise. This conflation was also challenged at the hearings before the Justice Committee and has been condemned both by the UN Global Commission on HIV and the Law 2012 and the UNAIDS Advisory Group on HIV and Sex Work 2011.

The campaign has been characterised by heavy appeals to the emotions by use of videos featuring alleged victims and many horror stories. The campaign has powerful supporters both inside and outside Leinster House. Six trade unions Siptu, Impact, Unite, Teeu, Cwu, Pseu have joined as well as INMO and IMO.

The Labour party was an early supporter. Access to Dail and Seanad was regular where talks were given and films, videos were shown. In Oct. 2011 a bill was tabled in the Seanad in favour of the campaign by Sen. Katharine Zappone. Another ardent supporter is Ivana Bacik.

It should be remembered that there was a Europe wide, even international campaign being conducted at the same time.

In June 2012 a discussion document was published by Justice outlining options for Review of the Law. In August a call for submissions was made and in Oct. a conference was held in the Dept of Justice. Over 800 submissions were received but owing to their huge influence most were made by TORL supporters. The opposition consisted mainly of individuals, some academics expert in the field and only one organisation, SWAI.

Hearings were conducted by the Joint Oireachtas Committee over Dec. 2012-Feb. 2013. During these an alarming level of bias was apparent. First, the time allocated was heavily in favour of TORL: overall there were 27 people on that side as against 7 on the opposing side. The opposition was not afforded sufficient time to make a proper case.

Second, it was clear there was a strong bloc in the committee who favoured TORL. Labour had three members, two independents K. Zappone and Ronan Mullen had declared support in the Seanad while on the opening day the Fianna Fail Justice spokesman Niall Collins stated his party's support for TORL. With seven out of fifteen already committed it was clear from the outset that the outcome was a foregone conclusion.

The JOC report was issued in June 2013. As expected it was unanimously in favour of the Swedish Model. Its conclusions are worthy of particular study:

4.3.3 Legal reform

Provision should be made in law for the following:

- a summary offence penalising the purchase of sexual services of another person by means of prostitution, or any request, agreement or attempt to do so; it should at the same time be clarified that no offence is committed by the person whose sexual services are so sold;
- increased penalties for trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation;
- increased penalties for organising or living off the earnings of prostitution;
- an offence of recklessly permitting a premises to be used for the purposes of prostitution;
- the regulation and inspection of premises advertised as massage parlours so as to eliminate those used for prostitution;
- witnesses in cases dealing with sexual exploitation through prostitution and/or trafficking to give evidence anonymously;
- an offence of grooming a child or vulnerable person for the purpose of sexual abuse or exploitation;
- power for the An Garda Síochána to have disabled or vested in them any telephone number in use in the State that is suspected on reasonable grounds of being used for the purposes of prostitution;
- that the accessing of web sites – whether located in the State or abroad – that advertise prostitution in the State should be treated in the same way as accessing sites that advertise or distribute child pornography.

One provision should be noted: a seller of sexual services would be free to solicit but if the other party simply agreed to purchase he would be guilty of a criminal offence. It is also unclear whether payment is in cash or whether it could include gifts, meals, alcohol or entertainment. If these are included any man going on a one-night stand where he pays for such items could find himself facing a criminal rap if things dont work out.

Both Fianna Fail and Sinn Fein endorsed their support for TORL at their Ard Fheiseanna in April and May of 2013. The only people to speak out against TORL in the Dail were six independents: Clare Daly, John Halligan, Joan Collins, Mick Wallace, Richard Boyd Barrett, Luke Flanagan.

However not all events have run in favour of the Swedish Model. It is true that the French Assembly voted in favour in Dec. 2013, but the Danish Ministry of Justice Committee Report on reform of the criminalisation of sexual offences in Denmark (report no. 1534) found:

> According to the report, a criminalisation of the purchase of sexual services (the Swedish Model) will most likely not have any actual effects on the reduction of prostitution in Denmark because a ban on the purchase of such services will be extremely difficult for the police to enforce. Criminalisation will merely demonstrate a general moral condemnation of the purchase of sexual services. The report suggests that this may even have negative consequences for the women providing the services due to potential poorer financial conditions for these women and increased stigmatisation. For these reasons in particular, the committee does not recommend a criminalisation of the purchase of sexual services in Denmark. The findings in the report are based on practical experience with the Swedish model in other countries and existing knowledge about prostitution in Denmark

The Danish Government announced on 21 November 2012 that they did not wish to introduce the Swedish model into Danish law. One should note that the reasons given are the exact opposite of those cited by the JOC in its favour.

On June 29 2013, the Scottish Parliament rejected the Swedish Model. It had previously rejected it in April 2010 and again in 2011. [The proposer of the bill, Labour MSP Rhoda Grant stated:

> "I am disappointed that the Bill has fallen due to not achieving cross-party support when there was such overwhelming support expressed in response to my consultation from a wide range of individuals and organisations. I will continue to press for the introduction of legislation that aims to tackle the demand side of the industry and support for those who have been failed by society."

This shows the determination and the power of the radical feminist lobby.

In a submission to the Stormont Assembly in 2013 the PSNI had this to say about the Swedish model:

> There is a serious concern that displacement or movement into a hidden environment would seriously impede law enforcement capability. The proposal may also be difficult to enforce as Law Enforcement would require corroboration of a transaction between two parties involved.
> Alternative evidence gathering methods utilised by European Law Enforcement partners, who have criminalised this activity is not available to the PSNI. The deterrent value of the legislation would be minimal, in that persons using prostitutes do so in a clandestine way. The legislation, as proposed around the purchase of sex, will present investigative difficulties and in reality would be difficult to police, given the requirement to prove who offered what for sale, and the specific details of the interaction between two or more persons.
> There is also concern that this would draw resources away from Human Trafficking investigations into a prostitution enforcement role. Law enforcement activity to reduce demand for the product of organised crime has concentrated on public awareness rather than criminalisation. It Is suggested that demand reduction is focused on awareness within the area of human trafficking. Whilst there are many advocates of the Swedish Model in the criminalisation of the purchase of sexual services, there is conflicting information available.
> Recent PSNI experience and investigations in Sweden have highlighted concern that significant levels of trafficking and prostitution still exist despite the introduction of legislation to criminalise the purchase of sexual services. The prostitution environment in Sweden is not comparable to the situation existing in Northern Ireland, in that the majority of Prostitution is on-street or females involved in prostitution being transported to residences or addresses.

> The majority of prostitution within Northern Ireland is through independent prostitutes who are not trafficked or controlled by organised crime groups.

UglyMugs conducted the largest recent survey on escorts working in Ireland. The vast majority (97%) was self-employed (and not controlled by an outsider); the others had worked for another party such as an escort agency. Such statistics bear out the fact that sex workers are exercising choice and are not always coerced into prostitution.

Norway

The Swedish law was introduced here in Jan. 2009. To judge from the annual reports from ProSentret, the city of Oslo's resource center on matters related to prostitution, it has not been a success.

Since 2008, the number of prostitutes in the streets of Norway has decreased by 30 percent, but the annual report of 2011 from "Pro Senteret", the city of Oslo's resource center on matters related to prostitution, also shows that prostitutes are now coming back regardless of the new legislation.

Estimates from Oslo show that 850 women sold sex in Oslo last year, compared to 500 women in 2009. This is an increase of 70 percent according to the "Pro Senteret" annual report of 2011.

A newspaper report 22 Jun 2012 ran the story:

Norway should rip up a law that criminalizes sex buyers, Oslo's social affairs chief believes, as a new report shows a marked rise in violence against prostitutes working in the city.

Anniken Hauglie (Conservative Party) called for the law to be scrapped after the city's official help centre for prostitutes, Pro Sentret, released a report on Friday detailing deteriorating conditions for sex workers in the capital.

"The reality is that the law has made it more difficult for women in prostitution," Hauglie said. The Pro Sentret report indicates that the law has in fact made prostitutes much more susceptible to violence at the hands of their clients as the sex trade moves further underground.

The 2012 annual report by Pro-Sentret, Oslo's official "help centre" for sex workers has this to say:

> "there is no reason to believe that there has been a reduction in the prostitution market in the past year. On the contrary. Much suggests that the Norwegian prostitution market remains fairly stable in terms of the number of people who sell sex, nationality and how prostitution is organized."

More recently, it revealed new venues for prostitution in Trondheim in bars and restaurants and tanning salons are increasingly being used.

Ireland

The figures for trafficking (all purposes) produced by AHTU, the Anti Human Trafficking Unit are as follows:

- 2010: 78
- 2011: 57
- 2012: 48

These are alleged cases many of which are still being investigated. This is important to remember since TORL try to confuse the issue frequently and the Dept of Justice confirms that many alleged cases turn out not to stand up.

The 2012 Report, Friday 20th December 2013, indicates a further reduction in the number of reported cases of human trafficking compared to previous years. An examination of data between 2009 and 2012 indicates that the number of persons originating from outside of the EU reported as victims has been declining on a yearly basis.

Noting the level of reports of human trafficking of children for the purposes of sexual exploitation in the Report, the Minister said,

> "With regard to the abhorrent human trafficking of children for the purposes of sexual exploitation, it is important that we recognise that the offences that are reported for 2012 arise predominantly outside of the context of prostitution. Human Trafficking is very broadly defined in Irish legislation and offences relating to child pornography, for example, may often contain the elements of human trafficking – such as recruitment and sexual exploitation – that will bring such actions within the legal definition of human trafficking.
> The reports concerning 21 of the 23 children in 2012 related to offences such as child pornography, sexual assault and sexual indecency, rather than exploitation through prostitution. That is not to say that the trafficking of children for exploitation through prostitution may not be occurring, 2 cases of that nature were reported in 2012 and remain under investigation."

TORL has made a number of claims in the course of its campaign which it has not been made to account for by the media:

- The claim that it has 1.6 million supporters
- That the trafficking for prostitution trade is worth €250 million p.a. to organised crime
- That 75% of prostitutes entered the trade as minors. Indeed the further claim that the average age of entry is 14 has also been made.

More generally it has made claims that prostitutes suffer a wide range of disorders and abuses including ptsd. Much of this is based on the "work" of one Melissa Farley, a notorious radical feminist who has been cited for unprofessional conduct and has been slated by many researchers in the field around the world for biased claims. Farley is quoted many times in the references submitted by ICI, Ruhama and NWC. She was dismissed as unreliable by Judge Susan Himel of the Ontario Superior Court. Her findings in relation to prostitution in New Zealand were categorically denied by the Government. She quoted figures five times greater than those given by the Government.

Some quotes from submissions made by NWC, Ruhama and ICI

NWC:

The prostitution of women and girls constitutes a fundamental violation of women's human rights and a serious form of male violence against women. The system of prostitution perpetuates patriarchal views on women's sexuality and legitimates male domination in society.

The dearth of any effective legislation in Ireland to curb the sex industry sends out a message to men and boys that women are sexual commodities to be bought. The current situation legitimises the traditional sexuality of dominance and submission.

The situation whereby adults in the absence of any degree of control or duress or lack of alternatives, discreetly agree to exchange sex for money seldom occurs.

Ruhama:

Essentially what men purchase is the power to be violent with the likelihood there will be no sanctions.

Male abusers can act with impunity because they know that women in prostitution will not be believed or taken seriously by the criminal justice system.
If one woman is for sale then potentially all women are for sale

Education/Attitudes to Condom Use: Recommendations for education of men in changing attitudes to condom use are to be welcomed, but should not, and arguably cannot be restricted to sex buyers. Such initiatives must (and generally do) target all men who are sexually active, who can be classed as 'potential buyers'.

ICI:

If a man is determined to get paid sex nothing can stop him in countries where prostitution is tolerated/legalised and where the availability of women is unlimited. In fact the chances that he will brutalise more prostitutes is much greater because the likelihood is that he is not committing a crime in legal terms. Who is to stop him? If however, there is a ban in operation, this man will be seen as the offender that he actually is.

What you can do

Write or contact your TDs and put your views to them based on what you have learnt. Emphasise the point that this is just another aspect of the way men are being demonised. If you are a member of one of the six trade unions that supported TORL raise this at a union meeting. Ask why you were not consulted. They will try to avoid debate at all costs. They hate to be associated with radical feminism or religious fundamentalism.

The unions are: SIPTU, TEEU, IMPACT, UNITE, CWU, PSEU. The same applies to IMO, INMO. Try to get a discussion going. If they stonewall get a signed petition and send it to the General Secretary. If you are a Labour, Sinn Fein or Fianna Fail supporter make sure your representatives know your feelings. Raise it at local meetings. These three parties have signed up to TORL. More than twenty local councils also signed up, many of them by unanimous vote. Put this to your local councillors and ask them to reconsider.

For a powerful look at the position here read the article by Fionola Meredith from 2013. Nick Davies' piece on trafficking outlines the way that hysteria has taken over discussion. Another piece of essential readingby an expert in the field is by Eilis Ward last year.

The PSNI document is here. The reports by ProSentret are here for 2011, 2012 and 2013.

The very extensive reports into the review of Danish law are here and here. These last are the Danish reports 2012. See p.60-69 Vol I, 469-576 Vol.2, however these are in Danish only. The English version of the latest monitoring report by the Swedish police was published May 2013, and covers the year 2011.

Oslo

Norwegian women organizations believe Norwegian newspaper VG's recent coverage of prostitute Hege Grostad gives a one-sided representation of the sex industry.

Norwegian tabloid newspaper VG published a 15-page- story about Hege Grostad working as a prostitute in Oslo.

Hege Grostad is a university student, Mensa member and lobbyist. She finds the term "selling your body" distasteful, and describes her job as "relaxing". For the past two years she's also been one of Norway's 3,000 sex workers, and is at the heart of a grassroots campaign to decriminalise and regulate the sex industry.

According to the article presented with a smiling picture of the Grostad (27), she sells sex to finance her studies and now wants to change the law criminalizing prostitution in Norway.

Pro Centre, the Swedish sex workers advocacy group, believes

"All people are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one other in a spirit of brotherhood." – The Universal Declaration of Human Rights

Pro Centre believes that all work in relation to prostitution must be based on human rights. Prostitution is an act, not a character trait of some human beings. Prostitution involves two parties: one person buying, and one person selling, sexual services. We want to live in a society where no-one feels that prostitution is the only available option. We cooperate with individuals, respecting the choices that they make in the situations in which they find themselves. Pro Centre wants to replace myths and prejudices about prostitution with greater insight and knowledge.

We want to live in a society that instead of stigmatising women and men who sell sex shows solidarity with them. Society should invest heavily in preventing prostitution and in providing help to people who are looking for alternatives to sex work. Female and male sex workers must be included as equal partners in the processes that relate to them and their lives. Pro Centre aims to support individuals by making them aware of their rights and responsibilities, and helping them to maintain their self-respect and good health so that they can take control of their own lives and realise their true potential.

Lecture 9: False Consciousness & Kafka-Trapping

Adam Kostakis · 3 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the ninth of twelve lectures. – PW

> Never mind whether it's Critias or Socrates who is the one refuted. Just concentrate on the argument itself, and consider what on earth will become of it if it is examined. – Socrates of Athens

It is necessary, at this point, to set aside the the thread I have been weaving, and take a detour into the deep wilderness of feminist logic. The phrase feminist logic will strike most of my readers as a misnomer – if not an oxymoron! – so let me reassure you that what I really mean is feminist attempted logic. And there is nothing logical about that, I assure you!

First, why is the use of logic so threatening to feminists? We know, assuredly, that it is – with some feminists going so far as to claim that logic is nothing but a tool of the patriarchy. Of course, this is absurd. Logical argument is, by definition, a collection of valid inferences – so it is not possible to argue against logic. To put it another way, you cannot reason against reasoning, because the very attempt to do so involves the (attempted) use of reason. The only way to attack logic without using (or attempting to use) logic would be to attack it most randomly – that is, without entailment. The argumentative points you make, in attacking logic, would have to have no relation to each other whatsoever. You could not say, for instance:

> Men use logic to defeat women in argument, therefore logic is a tool of the patriarchy because the use of "therefore" indicates a logical consequence, i.e. it indicates entailment, which is a matter of logic! This leaves the feminist with two unfavorable choices: she can state that logic is a tool of the patriarchy, without reference to premise, evidence, example, definition, and so on – without any reference, indeed, to reality; or she can accept that her own argument, because it attempts to link two propositions together on a logical basis, is itself a tool of the patriarchy – and as the proponent of the argument, so is she!

Hence, the appropriate response to the feminist argument that "logic cannot be trusted, because it is a tool of the patriarchy," is to say: "and so are you! Hey – as a patriarch, I appreciate you doing my job for me!"

But again, why is logic so threatening to feminists? Could it be that feminists are simply misguided about the nature of logic? That is doubtful. Having seen feminists defeated by logic many times, I am quite sure that they fear it because that their beliefs cannot withstand it. Like any cult, feminism does not allow its members to investigate the truth, nor does it tolerate free and open discussion of its core beliefs. Still, none of this makes a bit of difference to us – as non-feminists, there is no human authority obliging us to hold our thoughts or tongues on the matter of feminism.

Yes, feminists fear logic because it contradicts other ways of 'knowing' the world – e.g. being told what to think. They also fear that logic will discredit ideological 'truths.' Feminists want you to see the world as they say you should see it – they certainly don't want you coming to your own conclusions! Particularly not conclusions critical of feminist orthodoxy, derived, for instance, from the process of asking questions and receiving unsatisfactory answers. And yet this is precisely the outcome that feminists guarantee, when their anxieties over criticism and the consequences of open discussion cause them to react, kneejerk-fashion, with shaming tactics.

What would a discerning neutral observer think, when he hears a reasonable question answered with an attack against the interlocutor's character? Will this inspire him to adopt all tenets of the questioned set of beliefs? Is he more likely to feel threatened into submission by the shaming tactic used against the gadfly, or to feel offended by proxy at the ideologue's evasiveness and insulting manner?

Ideologues don't tend to ask themselves searching questions like these. Small wonder, then, that the word 'ideology' began life as a term of abuse. It was not until Marx and Engels wrote The German Ideology that the phrase took on the characterization we associate today with identity politics. One's ideology, they claimed, is the product of one's social position – that is, whether one is a proletariat or a bourgeois. The socialist proletariat are the possessors of the ideology which reflects truth, while the capitalist bourgeoisie possess only 'false consciousness.' It is never explained how it is known that things are this way around and not the other – i.e., why can't the bourgeoisie possess true ideology, and the proletariat be subjected to false consciousness? That question does not need to be answered, because Marxism is a closed system of thought. It is like a man who stands not on the ground, but somehow, on his own feet; any one part of Marxism stands upon the other parts of the theory, and does not depend upon the vagaries of the experiential world for support. In other words, what happens in the real world does not matter – Marxism is self-verifying. The truth which backs up its claims is located within the theory, utterly independent of any contrary evidence that can be gathered from the actual experiences of actual people.

It is much like feminism, then – being abstract and anti-contextual, deciding upon the story before the facts are known. Feminism, to feminists, requires no justification outside of itself. It is impenetrable by external argument, and thus irrefutable – because it is inherently unreasonable. That is to say, it cannot be reasoned with. It is a waste of time trying to get feminists to see sense, and every MRA soon learns that he will more easily squeeze blood from a stone. The only discourse which will make feminists sit up and change their ways is the discourse of power: and this is a discourse that must be backed by action. Anti-feminists must be comfortable with the idea of wielding power over feminists, at least enough to marginalize them into irrelevance. This is the end game. Building critical mass is how we get from here to there, but we take a step backwards every time we indulge feminists in their sophistry.

Take, for example, the feminist sophism that we are 'locked in' to a perspective determined by the sex we belong to. Any counter-feminist argument launched by a man, no matter how accurate his observations, no matter how evidenced his claims, can be dismissed on the grounds that it was made by a man. The argument goes like this: "you're only saying that because you're a man. If you weren't a man, you wouldn't have a male perspective, and so you wouldn't be saying that." The implication is that a male perspective is inherently wrong – that a man, owing to his being a man, is incapable of grasping truth. So you see, this is really the same 'false consciousness' trick as practiced by Marx and Engels and their followers – the feminist has not explained how or why it is that a woman's perspective, owing to her being a woman, is necessarily the one which yields to truth.

The 'false consciousness' trick is, ultimately, an evasion. In one dishonorable move, the feminist has sidestepped the argument itself and attacked the interlocutor – "you can't possibly be right, because you are male." For the feminist, this is enough. She considers the matter closed, and moves on. By the same undisclosed reasoning by which Marx knew that the proletariat possessed the truth, the feminist 'knows' (i.e. strongly feels) that her own ideology possesses the truth. But that undisclosed reasoning, whatever it is, does not work in reverse. The feminist is confident enough that a counter-argument, using the same tactic – "you wouldn't be saying that if you weren't a woman" – is inapplicable and impossible. The implication is that feminist women view the world objectively, whereas mere men are 'locked in' to a privileged perspective and cannot see the way things truly are. An attack on the perspective of a man, for it being a male perspective – even the identification of a perspective as peculiarly 'male' – is nothing less than a statement of female supremacy.

As for non-feminist women, they too are oppressed by 'false consciousness.' You see, when women use their own minds to decide things for themselves, they are being manipulated by the patriarchy! But when they stop thinking for themselves, and defer to feminist consciousness without question, then their minds are 'liberated!' Do you see how this works?

Now, I hate to ruin their fun by being a man who says things he wouldn't say if he wasn't a man, but there's something that doesn't quite make sense about all this. What the feminists are trying to impart is a kind of sexual determinism. That is, the notion that they are attempting to propagate is one which states that our actions and behaviors are determined according to our sex, and we have no freedom of choice in the matter. We are moral robots, hard-wired from birth to view the world in one particular way, from which we cannot deviate.

This theory would only be meaningful if it could tell us how men and women will act or think. Yet, both men and women are far less predictable than the pigeon-holers of the world would like them to be. There are, for instance, feminists who are men, MRAs who are women, and people of both sexes who buck all the trends we can imagine. Feminist sexual determinism, then, has become a useless theory; if there is any truth to it, it is limited to those aspects of human behavior that cannot be identified. It has been reduced to tautology: we will always do those things which we will always do!

It hardly needs stating that men and women are not two opposed and internally homogeneous classes of people. Feminists would very much like them to be. Indeed, feminism rests upon this faulty perception. The idea that men and women should be opposed to each other is a feminist construction, and any deviation from this is a threat to the whole feminist enterprise – hence the imperative of familial destruction. This is also why the most venomous attacks are reserved for male 'feminist allies.' That small number of men who exert the strictest self-discipline in accordance with feminist orthodoxy come under the most fire for being not feminist enough. This happens because every man who is pro-female in the slightest is a thorn in the side of feminism, just as much as the most outspoken anti-feminist woman (perhaps even moreso: in the case of feminist men, there is no equivalent to the 'false consciousness' argument used to dismiss anti-feminist women). It must be denied that feminist men could ever be feminist enough! The illusion must be maintained that men are 'the enemy' – and this means repudiating the friendly intentions of male allies. In declaring themselves feminist, those men fail to conform to feminist sexual determinism, thus contradicting feminist theory and threatening the progress of the movement as a whole. It is not so easy to paint them as atavistic brutes, and this is largely down to their own efforts to make themselves amenable – which is precisely why they receive such vitriolic scorn.

To get back on track: there is more that Marxism and feminism hold in common than the Appeal to False Consciousness. Both fit a certain template, upon which we could map any modern radical ideology. Again, it is developments in language and thought which allow for the theoretical configurations making possible social movements like feminism. Socialism was only possible once the state and the economy were conceptually distinguished – in feudal times, no distinction between the two was discernible, rendering moot the possibility of a socialist system being idealized. It was in response to the rise of capitalism, with all that this entailed – Enlightenment thought, economic individualism, free markets, free labor, an end to tax farming, the formation of the business and working classes – that Utopian socialism and (later) Marxism became possible in the realm of the imagination.

Similarly, nationalism – in its modern form, as an ideology – only became possible once society and culture were distinguished in language and thought. Our question here is, what had to be distinguished before feminism could become a possibility?

This is a question which would take a great deal of space to answer – more space than I have available here. It will suffice to say that the escalating liberties being granted to men resulted in a divergence of expectations between men and women. Reasonably enough, we might think, a small number of women began to question why the Enlightenment notion of individual freedom extended only to men. However, what is often missed is that these women began from a position of strength – they were already the beneficiaries of Gynocentric cultural codes that placed them high above men, atop pedestals. Over the coming decades, men tripped over themselves delivering whatever women demanded. It is likely that most of them sincerely believed that individual freedom should be extended to women as to men. But the very fact that Gynocentrism was already in full force meant that female supremacy was the only possible outcome of feminism. The 'equality' feminists sought was an 'equality' to do all the things men are permitted to do, and to retain their traditional advantages over men, accrued through centuries of Gynocentrism. The recipients of additional advantages are, of course, not equal at all, but privileged at the expense of all others. This was always the intention.

Despite the occasional claims of feminists that they are dispensing with all forms of male thought and creating anew, feminism slots in neatly with other radical ideologies which preceded it (and which were, of course, dreamed up by men). To take the most obvious fact about modern radical ideologies, their basis is in forms of association – Marxists oppose the proletariat to the bourgeoisie, nationalists oppose their own culture or race to a culturally or racially diverse society, and feminists oppose women to men. The key relationships, used by ideologues as total explanations for all human phenomena, correspond to the forms of association which are emphasized. For Marx, the key relationship is economic – the control of the workers by the capitalists is an economic relationship, and all else (politics, religion, culture) is mere 'superstructure' atop this 'base.' The superstructure may change, but nothing fundamental will alter unless the economic relationship of the classes is reconfigured. Similarly, for nationalists, the key relationship is cultural (or racial, if the two are differentiated). This is the 'base,' upon which everything else is built. Changes to the superficial structures on top of the 'base' (e.g. modifications to political and social institutions) are irrelevant; the only fundamental change will come about via transformations in culture and/or racial demographics.

We find the same pattern in feminism. Opposing women to men, the key relationship for feminists is, of course, sexual. It is the relationship of men to women which determines all else (politics, economics, culture, religion, and so on). The elements of the superstructure may well change, but until the domination of women by men is smashed at the base level, nothing fundamental will be achieved.

It is this belief which ultimately explains feminist attempted logic. Their attempts at rational argument are clouded by a belief in collective guilt – that all problems or inconveniences faced by women result from this base relationship (the domination of women by men), so that, as long as problems or inconveniences remain, it must be the case that men (collectively) are dominating women (collectively). It does not matter if a particular man is innocent – he is still 'the enemy,' as feminists are more than willing to admit (see: The Redstockings Manifesto). Nor does it matter if a particular woman is guilty – she is absolved in the name of collective innocence.

And on these grounds, we encounter the peculiar feminist debating tactic called Kafka-Trapping. I did not invent the term; the credit must go to Eric S. Raymond, whose original article on the subject is linked below. Nor did Eric intend the term to be used only for feminists – any member of a victim ideology can effectively Kafka-Trap their opponents. The name, Kafka-Trapping, is a reference to Franz Kafka's work The Trial, in which the protagonist is told that he is very, very guilty, although his crime is never specified; and, as he soon discovers, the only 'way out' is to admit his guilt (though he knows not what of), thus acquiescing in his own destruction.

In Eric's own words, a Kafka-Trap is:

> an unfalsifiable claim, about thoughtcrime, intended to induce guilt so the subject becomes manipulable.

The most chilling thing about this tactic is that the Kafka-Trapper declares your mind to be out of bounds to you – her judgment is a dismissal of your own opinion about your own thoughts. Think you know what you think? Think again, buddy!

Now, I shall reproduce, from Eric's blog, six models of the Kafka-Trap which feminists will use against you. Learn them. Know them. Recognize them for what they are: nothing more than ad hominem evasions. Calling out the tactic, as a Kafka-Trap, is sufficient for its refutation.

> (Note: in the following examples, I have used the terms 'sexist' and 'sexism' but these may be replaced by 'misogyny,' 'woman-hating,' 'patriarchy,' etc.)
> Model A Kafka-Trap
> Your refusal to acknowledge that you are guilty of sexism confirms that you are guilty of sexism.
> Model C Kafka-Trap
> Even if you do not feel yourself to be guilty of sexism, you are guilty because you have benefited from the sexist behavior of others in the system.
> Model P Kafka-Trap
> Even if you do not feel yourself to be guilty of sexism, you are guilty because you have a privileged position in the sexist system.
> Model S Kafka-Trap
> Skepticism about any particular anecdotal account of sexism, or any attempt to deny that the particular anecdote implies a systemic problem in which you are one of the guilty parties, is itself sufficient to establish your guilt.
> Model L Kafka-Trap
> Your insistence on applying rational skepticism in evaluating assertions of pervasive sexism itself demonstrates that you are sexist.
> Model D Kafka-Trap
> The act of demanding a definition of sexism that can be consequentially checked and falsified proves you are sexist.

It is the last model, Model D, which I find the most intriguing. It implies – and my experience with feminists verifies – that simply asking how to not be sexist will be taken as evidence of one's sexism. The reason why I focused so heavily on definitions in my earlier lectures is because of the utility of attaching concrete meanings to terms. If we have a concrete definition of sexism, for instance, I could check my own behavior against this definition, and potentially discover that I do not fulfil any of the criteria – i.e., I am not sexist. But this does not satisfy the feminist notion of collective guilt. It feels like a panicked response on their part, then, to insist that any man who tries to discover whether or not he is sexist is automatically sexist simply for trying to find this out. In other words, he is a sexist for not wanting to be a sexist. Could there be any clearer indication that feminists want men and women to be two conflicting classes of people?

The purpose of the Kafka-Trap is to leave absolutely no room for the trapped individual to believe in his own innocence. A denial that he is oppressive is further evidence that he is oppressive; the only other option is to admit that he is oppressive, which is also evidence that he is oppressive. (Note the following from the Violence Wheel, designed by the Domestic Abuse Intervention Project: "saying the abuse didn't happen" is abusive. So, you see, whether you plead "guilty" or "not guilty" in a court of law, both pleas are evidence of your guilt.) Oppression is alleged because the individual is a member of a group – but not necessarily one that he identifies with. The in-group identification is ascribed to the individual by the operator of the Kafka-Trap. To quote from Eric once more,

> Real crimes – actual transgressions against flesh-and-blood individuals – are generally not specified. The aim of the kafkatrap is to produce a kind of free-floating guilt in the subject, a conviction of sinfulness that can be manipulated by the operator to make the subject say and do things that are convenient to the operator's personal, political, or religious goals. Ideally, the subject will then internalize these demands, and then become complicit in the kafkatrapping of others.

That actual transgressions are not specified is true for all models apart from Model S, in which a specific transgression is specified, but any doubt regarding the alleged victim's account of things is taken as evidence that the doubter is guilty along with the alleged perpetrator. How familiar this all sounds! Is it not the precise experience of anyone who encounters feminists while discussing the prevalence of false rape accusations? On that note, I shall refer you to a comment from the feminist Amanda Marcotte, which she quickly deleted, but not before Fidelbogen saved a copy:

Let's talk about Amanda Marcotte some more, shall we? In fact, in her honor, I would like to define a seventh model of the Kafka-Trap, Model J:

> Model J Kafka-Trap
> Even if your innocence is proven in a court of law, this not only confirms your guilt; it also confirms the guilt of the (legal) system that found you innocent.

Exhibit A for Model J is a series of comments that Amanda Marcotte made in the wake of the Duke Lacrosse false rape accusations. Unable to accept that the accused men could possibly be innocent (hey, why do we even have trials?), she said the following:

> In the meantime, I've been sort of casually listening to CNN blaring throughout the waiting area and good fucking god is that channel pure evil. For awhile, I had to listen to how the poor dear lacrosse players at Duke are being persecuted just because they held someone down and fucked her against her will—not rape, of course, because the charges have been thrown out. Can't a few white boys sexually assault a black woman anymore without people getting all wound up about it? So unfair.

Leaving aside the content of her raging diatribe, doesn't the style of her writing strike you as that of a twelve-year old, perhaps one who has only just discovered swear words, and believes that using them as much as possible is 'cool'? In the spirit of this post, then, and given the evidence before us, I hereby believe that Amanda Marcotte is, in fact, twelve years old. Any argument to the contrary, from Amanda or anyone else, will be taken as further evidence that she is twelve years old.

All right then. Since she has clearly not been brought up properly, I shall recommend a regimen of discipline that will soon have her speaking as a proper young lady should! I suggest, first, that Amanda Marcotte shall have her mouth vigorously washed out with soap; next, that she shall receive a stern, bare-bottom spanking (over some patriarch's knee, of course); and then, that she shall be sent to bed without dinner for a week. This will soon set her straight! And since I refuse to believe any evidence to the contrary of my opinion that she is twelve years old, any disagreement with my opinions on this matter shall only reinforce my contention that she is utterly deserving of this punishment. Now, what do you think about that?

Why women's shelters are hotbeds of misandry

Dr. Gerhard Amendt · 4 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

At the very moment when the operation of women's shelters in Germany has been subjected to scientific study for the first time, the German Bundestag's Family Affairs Committee has decided to review the question of whether women's shelters should receive funding guarantees through the German federal government. Given the political ideology of women's shelters and the ramifications of such a step, this proposal should be taken under serious review. The answers to a number of questions are still outstanding. Have the services performed in women's shelters stood the test of time? Are the shelters operated in a professional manner, and have they moved on from an ideology that views men as the perpetrators of violence and women as nonviolent? Have women's shelters developed a professional understanding of family conflicts that enables them to extend their efforts and include all members of a violent family?

As usual, the slated funding guarantees are based on no more than the convenient statistic that "every fourth woman will become the victim of relationship violence at some time in her life." Since there is no comparable data that would apply to men, the number is poorly suited as legitimization for women's shelters. Up until now, reference was made to the role of women as victims, and funding for such institutions was automatically renewed. The effectiveness of the shelters was not monitored. At the same time, the statistic was used to popularize their work. In the pre-Christmas season of 2007, a media campaign was launched in Austria under the slogan "Verliebt. Verlobt. Verprügelt" (In Love. Engaged. Battered). The German lottery also runs public service spots pertaining to the matter. While all this has little bearing on the circumstances under which men and women actually conduct their lives, it couldn't document more clearly a bias against men.

When women's shelters were first being opened more than 20 years ago, the object was to focus public attention on the experience of violence from a woman's perspective. The founding of the Bremen women's shelter can be traced to just such an intention on the part of the author, who at the time endorsed the risky attempt to provide political lay self-help. This coincided with the spirit of the times and its sensitivity to violence as an aspect of women's lives – although it did not extend to men. In those days, the author, too, was unwilling to imagine that women's shelters would make a substantial contribution to a hostile polarization of society into violent men as opposed to irenic women, thereby creating many years of stagnation in gender discourse.

Ignorant Family Policies

Today, we know more than we did 25 years ago about the partnership dynamics that trigger violence. More than two hundred studies in the USA and Canada have produced findings that have added to public knowledge and increased understanding in political circles. But it is precisely the field of family policies that offers stubborn resistance to the very essence of this research, namely, that women behave just as aggressively and violently as men, and even slightly more often. This also applies to their behavior toward their children. It is particularly conspicuous during phases of a divorce that are high in violence. All counseling agencies should be expected to help limit violence so that children, above all, do not become actively or passively involved in the violent episodes between their parents.

A major survey of divorced fathers conducted by the author in Bremen showed that violence occurs in 30 percent of all divorces, with 1,800 men reporting physical or psychological abuse by their partners. This represents a significantly higher rate of incidence than the approximately ten percent seen in relationships under everyday conditions. Within the 30 percent of divorces where violence occurred, sixty percent was initiated by the men's ex-wives or ex-partners. Our survey findings revealed that within the most conflict laden context of an adult life, women, too, initiate violence. Only from the perspective of women's shelters does violence emanate exclusively from men. Instead of making divorce conflicts more tractable, women's shelters actually exacerbate them. The »every-fourth-woman« statistic is therefore being used to document the necessity of changing the Domestic Relations Law of 1998, because allegedly the sole source of danger for children during a divorce is violence stemming from their fathers. By pursuing this approach to family policy, the advocates of women's shelters are attempting to use prejudice as a means to rescind the right of children to both of their parents.

The 60 percent of divorce-related violent incidents that are initiated by women inflict great suffering on the fathers involved. Their statements are genuine. Yet there is a difference between science and the ideologically based enemy image adopted in women's shelters, and it lies in the evaluation of the numbers. Whereas science attempts to resolve conflict, the proponents of women's shelters book hostility toward men as political success. Accordingly, we do not claim that women experience episodes of violence in exactly the same way that men do. To make that assertion, we would have to survey them, which we have not as yet done – and neither have the »every-fourth-woman« agitators.

We have, however, arrived at an entirely different set of conclusions. We assume that women experienced the abuse in a similar way as their partners, namely, as stemming from the man. American studies confirm this. But if both parties are mutually accusing each other of starting the violence, then what is actually true? Both statements represent subjective truths. Generally, neither of the parties is lying. Unlike during their happier times, however, both of them now feel aggrieved and are no longer able to communicate with each other verbally. They lapse into lethal silence, scream at each other, or resort to physical blows. In such cases, marriage and family counselors can help to restore the couple's destroyed ability to communicate. Once the partners reestablish a common language, they have the option of entering into a process of reconciliation or choosing to separate with respect. They and, above all, their children do not lose their positive experiences from the past.

Women's shelters are incapable of providing this kind of professional intervention because of their ideology: they view a man as every woman's enemy. For them, it is a foregone conclusion that women do not engage in violent acts. According to the ideology espoused in women's shelters, this is always a given, and mutual talks between a woman and her partner are therefore superfluous. To this end, women are politically manipulated into a victim role and men are collectively denigrated. Consequently, the residents of women's shelters are allowed to experience themselves only as victims and not as participants in a relationship that has turned violent.

Women's shelters represent a world where the joy of life is missing, and efforts to resolve relationship conflicts have been replaced by existential despondency or even self-hatred. Misandry appears to offer a way out. This oppressive atmosphere surely accounts for the high rate of employee turnover at women's shelters and the dissension within work teams. It enables one to understand recent research conducted in the USA which found that women are increasingly steering clear of shelters despite the severity of their conflicts. They do not want to be forced into a world that despises men. Their own problems are burden enough.

The advocates of women's shelters are unfazed by objections that they are compromising the ethics of the helping professions, for professionalism is not their goal. On the contrary, they self-confidently label themselves as "partisan," which is synonymous with viewing women as victims who face sinister male powers and an indifferent public. Professional ethics have been deliberately replaced by political motives. And that is by no means selfless. It gives them a narcissistic high and a sense of moral superiority over the rest of the world. It is a mixture of elitism and pretended self-sacrifice.

In the founding years of women's shelters, this elitism functioned as a gateway for the disparagement of existing professional organizations that were sponsored, for example, by Protestant churches, the Catholic Church, or the German state governments.

In that respect, little has changed. The proponents of women's shelters believe that their combative, anti-patriarchal rhetoric will have a greater impact than professionally trained counselors and therapists. Most of them seem unimpressed that they are not genuinely helping those who seek counseling, because they attribute their failure to a lack of political insight on the part of the women. Their sense of mission appears to provide greater narcissistic gratification than the tough, daunting task of working with violent families who have elevated physical expression to the language of everyday life and otherwise no longer have much to say about each other.

The Feminist Ideology: A Hotbed of Misandry

Granted, there may be shelters that have jettisoned their ideological ballast, but even the term "women's shelter" itself always implies the disastrous ideology of radical feminism, whereby relationships between men and women are characterized by their respective status as victim and perpetrator. According to that, women can do nothing and men are completely in charge. Thus, women's shelters perpetuate the destruction of communication within partnerships as a political project within the gender discussion.

The conclusions are obvious. The concept of ideologically based women's shelters is no longer needed. What families with violence problems urgently need is a network of counseling centers that can provide unbiased and nondiscriminatory assistance to all of the parties involved. For family violence is systemic and psychodynamic in nature. If a woman strikes her husband, and the husband strikes his wife, then there is a high probability that they are also abusing their children. And children who have been struck, boys and girls alike, are in turn more likely as adults to strike their own children or partners. This sets the course for the reemergence of intra-family violence in the following generation. Society continuously accumulates a growing potential for violence. And mothers who do not strike their children, but instead leave the task to the children's father, are no less integral parts of the scheme of violence – as is the parent who simply remains silent in response to the entire situation.

Family Counseling Centers against Domestic Violence

Instead of women's shelters, what we need in the future are specialized counseling centers for families with unresolved violent conflicts. These would be staffed by well-trained men and women who cooperate based on professional ethical standards. They would intervene directly during violent family crises and, in extreme cases, provide a temporary safe haven for men and children and women, to the extent this has not already become unnecessary due to a personal protection order. We need family counseling centers that can step in and have an impact at the very source of the ongoing intergenerational cycle of violence. A public that is dumbfounded by the apathy of youth welfare offices and horrified by school murders and the corpses of children should approve government funding only if those who seek counseling are assured to receive effective assistance. Counseling therapy simply must be kept free of political ideologies. The only place where this does not apply is in undemocratic societies.

Likewise, we need to initiate a new discussion at colleges and universities. Political correctness has given rise to a prohibition on thinking about women in terms of aggression and violence, and this must be confronted with the findings of international research.

Brainwashing Men, and Brainwashing Women

Tom Golden · 4 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For many years that I have been shocked and confused by the vehemence and persistence that feminists attack males and also male feminists attack men and masculinity. Both blame men for most ills in the world. I have always scratched my head and wondered how they could get so vitriolic and juiced. It has also confused me how the feminist males could be so self-deprecating. Then I ran into the brainwashing material by Robert Lifton and it started to make some sense. The male feminists are exhibiting very similar behaviors to the people that Lifton studied who had been brainwashed. The feminists also seem to share some characteristics with the communist Chinese brainwashers. The following article will give you a beginning knowledge of the work of Lifton and you can be the judge about drawing a connection between the two. I am in no way totally convinced but it sure seems to be a likely connection worth discussion. See what you think.

American psychiatrist Robert Lifton studied both western and Chinese citizens who had been through China's brainwashing attempts in the early 1950's. This group had undergone a powerful psychological experience at the hands of their captors who had done their best to brainwash them. Lifton, who uses the term "thought reform" rather than brainwashing conducted interviews with many of those who were imprisoned and later released. Oftentimes the interviews took place very shortly after their release. He averaged 15-20 hours of interview time with each of the 40 subjects. He pulled together his ideas from this effort into a book, Thought Reform and the Psychology of Totalism, A Study of Chinese Brainwashing which was published in 1961. The book has become a classic and has been instrumental in our understanding of the Chinese attempts at brainwashing.

Lifton's basic outline of the essence of brainwashing has been used in a variety of areas outside the strict arena of brainwashing. One is religious cults and their attempts at thought reform. Another has been abusive relationships where the abuser seeks to "brainwash" his or her victim. In both these areas it could be argued that what transpired was technically not brainwashing, at least not in the exact same sense that Lifton observed. There were no chains and handcuffs, and no literal imprisonment. However, the Lifton outline is extremely useful in exposing the path and structure of the extreme manipulation in both these areas. The cult seeks to transform the member into a devoted and non-questioning adherent and will use a variety of methods to make this happen. Similarly, the abusive person attempts to manipulate the abused person in numerous ways. Both the cults and the abusers have a common trait, they both start by attacking the identity of the subject. By attacking that person's sense of self they soften the individual's ability to maintain their personal view of the world. This is clearly seen in the abusive relationship where the abused will often get to the point where they see the abuse as necessary and their own fault rather than an abusive act.

This idea of attacking the identity is actually Lifton's first element of the thought reform process. He describes the experience of a priest who was one of those he interviewed. The priest told him in detail how the Chinese captors had hammered away at him that he was not really a father. They told him he was living a lie. He was not really a father and not interested in the well being of people, he was instead an imperialist spy, who was greedy and only thinking of himself. When the priest would answer truthfully he would be rebuked and told he was lying. He would be put in chains and handcuffed and made to stand for long highly painful periods. Sometimes he was kept awake for long periods. He was being taught that if he offers the wrong answer, no matter how truthful, he will face severe punishment.

Lifton sees this first step as being crucial, and even a pre-requisite for all that is to follow. Without the identity being "softened" many people will simply not shift away from their world views. Damaging the identity in some way is imperative. You can think of an abused person who is beaten on a regular basis. This person has been told that the beatings are their fault, that they are the problem and if they weren't so bad the beatings would never happen. The abused person slowly loses sight of their own identity, and over time loses sight of even their own perspective. They start to identify with the perspective of the abuser, and even side with the abuser. If you communicate with an abused person like this you will hear those messages loud and clear, “This abuse is my fault.” Following Liftons basic path they have swallowed the perspective of the abuser and their own identity has been significantly compromised.

The idea of brainwashing a cult member or an abused person are both taking Lifton’s ideas and applying them on a micro level, the level of an individual. But what about applying these same ideas on a macro level? I think there are some very interesting connections when applying Lifton’s ideas on a more global level.

One area I see where they can be easily applied is in connection with feminism and the obvious attacks on men’s identity. Over the last 50 years men have experienced the most dramatic drop in loss of status of any group ever in our history. I cannot think of any group of a similar size (roughly half the population), going through such a contrast in labels. Men in the 1950’s were seen as good, were seen as helpful, were seen as productive, were seen as those who made the world a safe place. Since that time men’s identity has been attacked until in today’s world men are seen as anything but the above. They are seen as the problem. This is a huge turnaround and one piece of this has been the relentless attacks on men’s identity. Just think of all of the phrases used by feminists and others, “Men Are Pigs” “All Men Are Rapists” “Men are Greedy” and on and on. Men have been linked to causing wars, ruining the economy, being the source of violence, and just about every negative you can imagine. Men’s stock has dropped in a huge way and a part of this drop has been the attacks on men’s identity. These attacks started with feminists but so many others have now joined in including the media, the government, academia and even from the water cooler. At this point, in 2014, men are now seen as the problem.

Like the Chinese captives and like an abused person, if you hammer away long enough at the identity you will start to have an impact. We can see this today when we observe boys simply not wanting to grow up as male, boys who are enamored with the feminine and ashamed of their masculine. Indeed the default view of men and masculinity is very negative. This sort of macro attack on men and masculinity does not have the personal and intimate impact of an individual repeatedly avering your lack of goodness as happened so often with the Chinese captors. Instead, it has the power of being global and accepted by not only individuals but by academia, the courts, the government and the people at large. In some ways it reminds me of Lifton’s stories about the Chinese surrounding the individual being brainwashed with people who shouted at him for hours about how he was a spy, he was wrong, he was a liar, he was an imperialist and more. Those interviewed spoke of the power of this technique of having no ally and being surrounded by people who all believe you were an “imperialist.” Men and boys today are totally surrounded by negative feedback about men. There is no place for them to turn that says a positive word about men. They face a barrage of negative information about their sex from home, school, television, movies, the courts, the government and just about everyplace you can see. All have been convinced that the goodness of men is simply not prevalent and that there is basically something wrong with men. They, men, are wrong, and wrong simply because they are male. This has got to have a powerful long term impact on every boy’s and man’s identity.

Lifton emphasized repeatedly that the attacks on the identity made by the Chinese captors were made from a group that was held to be infallible. If any prisoner were to question any aspect of their captors, even a tiny issue, he would be punished severely and told clearly that the captors were infallible. In fact, the prisoners lived in an environment that demanded a respect for the infallibility of the captors. Just think of the abusive person expecting no questioning of their abuse. They demanded that their perspective, the abuser’s perspective, was the only correct viewpoint and in essence that they were infallible. The same can be seen in today’s feminism. /in some ways the adherents maintain that the doctrine of feminism is infallible. You can see this in action in the total intolerance of feminists to allow even discussion of men’s issues on college campus’s. You can see it in the remarkably violent and caustic response to AVFM’s planned conference on men’s human rights. The response includes death threats to innocent bystanders apparently because the topics don’t please them. (more on how men’s issues is a threat to feminism later) I saw this sort of totalism first hand while I was a part of the American Psychological Association’s Division 51 listserv for the study of men and masculinity. Questioning of feminism was basically not a good strategy. Only two people were banned from that group and both were active in questioning feminism. The reason given for one man being banned was that he mentioned male victims of domestic violence too often. It didn't mesh with the feminist meme and had to go! Men were only the perps! You can easily see this same sort of thing on feminist online forums. Anyone who disagrees is immediately banned from being a part. You can see this in the feminist attempts to silence people like Warren Farrell from speaking at a Canadian University blocking the entrances and pulling fire alarms. His message that drew such ire? He was planning to talk about the needs of boys. This was somehow translated into being hateful toward women and misogynistic. We could list many more examples. It seems clear that feminism has existed in an environment that disallows questioning and assumes its infallibility. There is obvious intolerance for views that differ from their own.

So the stage is set with an infallible source who is attacking the identity. What happens after that?

You must learn to feel GUILTY, and then BE GUILTY

With infallibility hammering away and identity starting to falter it brings on self doubt in large amounts. This sets the stage for the very important element of inducing guilt and shame. The captors did everything they could to force the person to take on blame for anything that might have happened to them in their lives. This is repeated unmercifully. It is hammered home that the person (and their imperialistic way of life) is the real source of all their troubles. They are to blame. And the blame is related to their stupidity of going along with the imperialistic ways. (Can you hear the same meme that men have been stupid to follow their misogynistic ways of the patriarchy?) Behind this is the implication that if they would only accept the infallible ways of their captors that all would be better. Some of those who were imprisoned spent several years going through this sort of thing. It is not hard to imagine that after years of identity dismantling and guilt inducement that the end result would be a very shaken person who assumed they were the problem and needed to find a way out. Any way out.

The guilt starts to open them up to a negative part of their identity that is more accessible now due to the original identity having suffered fractures. This puts the captive in touch with a part of himself that is indeed less than good. One could even say that it puts him in touch with the evil within himself. This of course, leaves him vulnerable to identifying more closely with this negative part of himself and this identification lowers his sense of integrity and forces him to question his own morality and goodness. This is just what the Chinese want to happen. Yes, they want them to feel guilty but the end product is not meant to produce an individual who feels badly about what he DID. The end product is meant to produce an individual who feels bad about who he IS! They want him to know that he is an imperialist who is therefore responsible for the actions of all other imperialists. You must learn to feel guilty, and then importantly, BE and ACT guilty.

Lifton says that a theme that was prevalent was that "only those who confess will survive." Confessing was something that the prisoners learned to do. In fact, confessing was one of the few ways that prisoners were able to ease their burden of punishments even though they totally disbelieved what they said. At first, knowing that they were lying, they would give false confessions to try to please the captors and avoid painful chains and handcuffs. Often times the Chinese would punish them for these early confessions claiming that they were lies with the implication that these confessions were not nearly strong enough and failed to match the crimes the Chinese were maintaining they had committed. Those that Lifton interviewed would speak of the impact of their false confessions. They said that each false confession tended to further break down their identity and their own world view. What began as a ploy to lessen punishments and ingratiate themselves with the Chinese quickly bit them in the butt and left them confused about who they really were. They started to see themselves as what the Chinese had been telling them, they saw themselves as liars. This further confused the captives and left them reeling. Lifton talks of how the men became "lost in the labyrinth of their own false confessions." It became very confusing.

Slowly their confessions might be accepted just a bit. As they were accepted the captive would strive to offer more confessions that might please the Chinese. They quickly learned that the only way to maintain self esteem was by self-flagellation. The more they blamed themselves and beat themselves up the more they would avoid severe punishments. The drill became deprecate self and idealize the Chinese.

We can see this sort of thing in both the abused person and in male feminists. When the abused person can tell the abuser that they know they are at fault for the beatings, this will obviously bring at least a temporary harmony and relief. For male feminists, after hearing repeatedly that men are the problem, they find that the more they self-deprecate and distance themselves from all things masculine, the more the feminists will accept them. Self esteem is now bolstered not by truth or creativity but by deprecating oneself. You can see this sort of male self-deprecation on youtube repeatedly. These men go on and on about what awful beings they are, they are male. It is not a pretty sight but it makes a bit of sense to me now knowing that this is a part of the brainwashing they have experienced. They seem to expect that their self flagellation will bring them acceptance from their reformers. The courser the hairshirt the better. Their identity is now based on their own guilt. Their esteem is now based on how much they distance themselves from anything masculine and apologize for having been masculine and therefore misogynist. They have begun to not only feel guilty about their actions, but to BE guilty about their actions. They have been misogynists, like all other men, and must atone. But like the prisoners, each time they confess it has an additive impact on their own identity and their sense of who they are.

One of the things the Chinese captors would encourage was for a prisoner to turn against his own people and blame them openly. When doing this the prisoners were more likely to come into the good graces of their captors. Those interviewed also spoke of the psychological impact of blaming their own group; even though the blaming was at first intentionally false, the end product was that they would feel less identified with their origins and more inclined to align with the Chinese. When the person sees themselves as the problem, and publicly claims that their original group is the problem, this admission, even when false, tends to detach the accuser from their own group. These false accusations of their own group are basically betrayals. When a person betrays a group they are far less likely to identify with that group. With each betrayal the thinner the attachment becomes. They had become what the Chinese had accused them of at the beginning. They were liars. Now the original accusations of the Chinese had been transformed into self accusations.

Lifton's work helps us to see that if the male feminists are anything like those brainwashed by the Chinese that self-flagellation and male bashing are probably important activities for them. Their self esteem and identity are tied to them. The more they do it, the more they are aligned with their "captors." Each time they openly blame men and masculinity for the ills of the world and blame themselves they likely lose a little bit more of their identity as men and take on a bit more identity as feminists. It reminds me of the "Dear Woman"video on youtube where the men apologized to the women for all of the ills that masculinity had created. That video makes a little more sense to me at this point knowing the dynamic of self deprecation and accusing one's group.

Just like the Chinese brainwashing victims we can see how the male feminists self-deprecation and volumes of hatefulness towards masculinity increase, it results in more detachment from being identified as male and more self-deprecation and male bashing. This likely starts slowly but it is obvious that it can pick up steam and become a runaway self-deprecating and blaming train since it often gets positively re-enforced. I have seen a few of those trains myself!

Just imagine for a minute that you were a male feminist and had gone through this process for years of blaming both yourself and your own sex for most of the world's problems. You did this blaming over a long period of time and transformed your identity from its original state into a new state that is built on a shaky feminist foundation. This new identity is somewhat brittle and has little room for areas of grey. One would assume that it would be a fairly precarious perch that required more blaming to maintain. The more we blame the more we feel a bit of self righteous stability. Now imagine that you run into someone you know who is talking about men's issues. What does that do to you? It likely throws you into chaos due to your precarious perch. In order to maintain this adjusted identity you need to maintain the attitude that men and masculinity are indeed the problem. If someone starts to claim that men have needs and have areas where they face hardship and discrimination that becomes very difficult to hear. How could that be that the group that is responsible for the world's ills have special needs? Does not compute. When someone threatens that stance what does it do to you? It's not hard to imagine that it would get you very upset very quickly. Tolerance for the target group having needs is likely very limited. You have much to protect and if men and masculinity have problems of their own that puts a hole in your ability to blame them for the worlds's ills. Men's issues becomes a threat.

Here's a quote from the Lifton book that tries to summarize the experience of those going through the brainwashing:

"Their situation was like that of a man taken suddenly from his ordinary routine and placed in a hospital for the criminally insane, where he is accused of a horrendous but vague crime which he is expected to recognize and confess; where his assertion of innocence is viewed as a symptom of his disease, as a paranoid delusion; and where every other inmate is wholly dedicated to the task of pressuring him into a confession and a "cure.""

This paragraph does a good job of summarizing the experiences that Lifton wrote about. But does it also describe fairly well the experience of an unsuspecting young man entering a woman's studies class? It sure seems like a good match to me as it describes his impossible situation and dilemma.

So drawing from Lifton's material we can see that male feminists, in response to feminist pressure are likely to:

1. 1. Self-deprecate in order to prove their allegiance to the new captor which also detaches them from their original identity.
2. 2. Blame men and masculinity. By betraying their own identity they further detach as they hope to ingratiate themselves.
3. 3. The blaming and self-deprecating make it very difficult to openly discuss the hardships and discrimination that men face. Try to imagine a southern white in the 1950's trying to discuss the hardships and discrimination faced by southern blacks. They would have a similarly difficult time.

But what about the Chinese brainwashers. Are feminists in any way like them. Let's turn to that next.

The Eventual Outcome of Feminism, Part I

Adam Kostakis · 4 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the tenth of twelve lectures. – PW

> The founders of a new colony, whatever Utopia of human virtue and happiness they might originally projected, have invariably recognized it among their earliest practical necessities to allot a portion of the virgin soil as a cemetary, and another portion as the site of a prison. – Nathaniel Hawthorne

It seems sensible, at this stage, to pose the question: why is all this happening? The answer I can offer up, for the purpose of this lecture, is not historical but psychological: it offers explanation through reference to the mental state of feminism's operators. There certainly are historical processes at work, explored elsewhere, but no social movement survives purely for the sake of its history. Nobody is born a feminist. There must be some stimulus, or stimuli, working to remodel formerly non-feminist women and men into activated feminists. But we cannot explain feminist conversion by the agitation of those already existing feminist activists. We can certainly believe that feminist activism plays a role in recruitment, but this is not adequate as an explanation. Why would an individual then commit to feminism, rather than any other particular social movement whose advocates engage in agitation for the purposes of ideological recruitment?

It must be that feminism offers such individuals something that other movements do not. I propose that, by opening up space for perfectly satisfying, collective man-hating, feminism offers a form of catharsis eagerly seized upon by those already predisposed to misandry. There are probably as many rationalizations for misandry as there are individual feminists – we would have to explore the intimate details of an individual feminist's life, particularly her mental culture, to come to a conclusion about when and why she decided to blame an entire sex for each of her inconveniences. What is common to them all is hostility to masculinity, i.e. maleness. When the initial excitement brought about by mutual indulgence in sexual hate has died down, the lines of communication between feminists remain open. Feminism provides more than the opportunity for catharsis. The feminist soon realizes that she need not restrict herself to echo chambers, but might try her hand at real change. A thrill rushes through her at the thought of not just disparaging, but actually hurting men. Backed up by an extensively organized, generously funded and institutionally-connected movement – one that enjoys a rosy reputation as defender of that greatest virtue of our time, equality – she sets to work. Feminism is a misandrist's dream.

Implicit in what I have written above is the corollary that feminism does not create misandry. Feminism promotes, endorses, reinforces, organizes and aggrandizes misandry, but it does not generate it outright. A woman who is not antipathetic towards men will not become so upon exposure to feminist thought. More likely, she will recoil at its odious philosophy. Feminism simply provides a space for women and men who were already misandrically-inclined to congregate and make plans.

The forerunner to feminism was traditional Gynocentrism, a self-sustaining social system which taught women that men should sacrifice on their behalf, and taught men that they were defective women. The female privilege inherent to this sexual ecology was undoubtedly accompanied and reinforced by animosity towards men – the 'flawed' sex – most particularly those men who did not conform to the Gynocentric role expected of them. Feminism departs from this model, not only in the sense that it provides organization for this misandry, but also in the instability of its operations. Feminism relentlessly demands greater male sacrifice for the benefit of women. This is a process to be intensified without an end point. Such a process lacks forward planning or any semblance of equilibrium. Ever greater constraints are placed on the very class of people whose labor and genius sustains the social order in which feminism can thrive. The parasite is killing its host, and will either be purged or die along with it. Feminism is simply not sustainable.

But it is not as though feminists think in these terms. Despite their forays into such recondite subjects as jurisprudence and post-modernism, feminist thought ultimately resolves to the validation of primal emotions. The central tenets of Western-style justice systems, evolving as they did under patriarchy, aspired to impartiality and objectivity in all proceedings. We speak of habeas corpus, the right to trial by jury, the presumption of innocence, punishments which fit rather than exceed corresponding crimes, and so on. That these doctrines of civic freedom have lasted for so many centuries is testament to the integrity of the generations of men who inherited them. Feminists, in their efforts to replace these 'outmoded, patriarchal' institutions, do not engage in anything like the deep thought that begat their careful construction. Much less do they entertain the notion of impartiality. All feminist legal innovation – whether it is introducing the presumption of guilt (for men), advocating an inquisitorial rather than adversarial trial system (for men), or proposing that women should not be punished at all when they commit crimes – flows from the same source: the violent and vindictive emotions of individual feminist operators. Feminism is so dangerous because it exists to validate these emotions, and to assign them a permanent place in discussions over how society might be better organized.

The success of feminism in this regard can be appreciated when we consider the popularity of collective guilt, anathema as it is to the principles of neutrality and impartiality underpinning our liberal justice systems. Collective guilt is an emotional discharge, a visible effect of concentrated class hatred. It is an attack on the verifiable truth of individual moral agency. Under a system of collective guilt, one's actions have no bearing on one's fate. Human beings are sent to the gallows for the circumstances of their birth. There is no purpose for trials, or any institution which exists to ascertain the facts of the case and to assign guilt. Guilt is already assigned; the facts are irrelevant. What follows collective guilt is collective punishment.

Feminists are not yet in a powerful enough position to deliver collective punishment to the entirety of the male sex. Instead, they cast as wide and as deep a net as possible, hoping to snag as many men and boys as they can. Wherever an individually identifiable man appears on their radar, he becomes the latest pariah, even if the accusations against him are weak and unfounded. This is irrelevant; all that matters is that he has been identified. Then, he becomes the target for unbridled angst, a public piñata, an effigy of all men, of maleness itself. He becomes the personification of the entire male sex, and the collective punishment that feminists yearn to deliver unto all men is inflicted onto him. Even after he is proven to be innocent of all accusations, the attacks intensify, as though the reluctance of the world to acknowledge his guilt is an even greater injury than the charges brought against him. In a short while, he will be forgotten, and a new whipping boy will be discovered. Until that time, feminists will try to outdo each other in editorials, speeches, and in the comment sections of newspapers and weblogs, calling for the most grotesque mutilations and acts of violence against him.

An impartial legal system, which treats human beings as individuals, is a barrier against collective punishment. To do away with it altogether would allow for the punishment of many more men, on the basis that they are men, which is why feminists have fought so relentlessly to overturn impartiality. Bit by bit, feminist agents within government, academia and the legal system have replaced individual moral agency and the rule of law with the micro-management of people. As the mantra goes, the personal is political – it is, increasingly, the business of the state. Even when not explicitly framed like this, the underlying principle of all feminist innovation is to bring the state to bear down, ever more closely, on our personal, everyday existences. If the personal really is the same thing as the political, then political correctness must be personal correctness – a perverse and pervasive system of control which scrutinizes an individual's every move, in order to lock him into place. You must be personally correct, in terms of your beliefs, your desires, your pursuits, your tastes – right down to the jokes you are permitted to laugh at – according to their standards. They being the self-declared 'victims' of society, who are nevertheless powerful enough to enjoy lunch with the President and set out the terms on which the government is to run your life.

The idea is not that men should overcome all the obstacles in their struggle to be politically/personally correct. After all, those who are demanding that men run this daily gauntlet are the very same people lining up to beat them with clubs as they try. The idea is that men should, so to speak, die trying. The intention is that men fail. For as long as average men manage to live peacefully, and even successfully, more and greater incursions into their personal space shall be required. It is at the point of failure -; when men have failed to live up to the increasingly constrictive rules set out for them – that they can be punished. The ordeal gets tougher by the day and with each passing of new legislation.
At the extreme end of societal micro-management, we find states like North Korea, a brutal, totalitarian dictatorship which controls all forms of media, place severe restrictions upon speech, association, movement and access to information, and detains dissidents and their families in concentration camps where many die from starvation or medical experimentation. Western societies are separated from the continuum of despotism, on which we find North Korea, by a small number of fundamentals, some of which have already been referenced: respect for the autonomy of the individual, the presumption of innocence, the separation of executive, legislative and judicial powers, etc. These doctrines correspond precisely to those which feminism aims to tear down. The violent, vindictive emotions from which feminism springs are, by nature, irrational; there exists no internal, rational boundary, to suggest that enough is enough once a certain benchmark is reached. The furious impulses at the heart of feminism would not stop short of constructing a totalitarian regime which restricts men's speech, their association and movement, and detains them in concentration and labor camps where they are subject to starvation and mutilation.
Are we so far removed from savage regimes like North Korea that this is not a possibility? We should not allow ourselves to be misled by appeals that we live in a democracy, and that the leaders are ultimately accountable to the people. Our democracy is only ostensible, offering little real choice. The bipartisan consensus between leading parties ensures that the state continues to grow, and the feminist agenda is further promoted, whether the new government cloaks itself in red or blue. Facing no serious political opposition, the leaders do not have to bow to the people to secure their mandate. All public pandering is superficial, though highly effective, in the same way that all totalitarians have enjoyed the popularity of the masses. By definition, totalitarians must be populist: the support they must mobilize, in order to remain in power, cannot be that of an armed minority alone. In exchange for the sponsorship of the masses, totalitarians caress their egos, giving enthusiastic praise to them for their courage, declaring them the inspiration of all progress. At least, the greater part of them are praised. Groups which are not in favor are, in contrast, treated with contempt prior to their destruction. It is the majority which becomes tyrannous – as Alexis De Tocqueville warned – when the leaders isolate a particular segment of the population for blame and castigation. Enjoying their glorification on behalf of the leader, the chosen majority will side against the undesirables, and treat them with abominable malice. It is a story that has played out, over and over, throughout history – not least in the populist tyrannies of the twentieth century.
Today, our leaders exalt the feminine and malign the masculine – a prejudice running so deep that it has become normalized, to the point where few consider it unusual for the President to bash men on Father's Day. Men – who are, indeed in the minority, making up 49% of the population – are suffering the early stages of the tyranny of the majority. Leaders of all parties pander, first and foremost, to the female majority, and particularly to the pressure groups set up (supposedly) in their interests. More pernicious than this is the entry of women into politics – not because of the fact that they are women, but because almost every female politician, whatever her party allegiance, makes women's issues her priority. In contrast, male politicians swear their allegiance to the principles of their party and to the demands of their constituents, but not to men's issues. There are no politicians who make men's issues a priority, but plenty – male and female – who run on the cross-party, women's issues platform. The world is not so simple that we can say men are over-represented because they are present in greater numbers. Although there is a greater number of men in politics, it is women who are over-represented, because more politicians represent them than they do men. The sex of the politician makes no difference to the legislation that he passes. In courting the female vote, and particularly in his efforts to please feminist groups (organized misandry), he will perpetuate and extend chivalry, he will publicly belittle his own sex, and he will pass ever more anti-male legislation, sanctioning the brutalization of ordinary men.

Systematic destruction follows systematic contempt. The eventual outcome of feminism is nothing less than a Holocaust, the almighty crescendo to mark the success of a century or more of sexual warfare and the demonization/degradation of the masculine. Those men, such as the male politician who has stoked the fires of gender tribalism to win votes and benefit his own career, will become the concentration camp facilitators and the enforcers of population reduction programs. They shall be the Uncle Toms, the Judenräte atop white horses, who will ultimately meet the same fate as the men they have helped exterminate. The anti-male, homicidal and genocidal violence in feminist rhetoric is well documented:

> The male is a domestic animal which, if treated with firmness … can be trained to do most things – Jilly Cooper, SCUM (Society For Cutting Up Men)
> I want to see a man beaten to a bloody pulp with a high-heel shoved in his mouth, like an apple in the mouth of a pig – Andrea Dworkin
> Kill your fathers – Robin Morgan
> Life in this society being, at best, an utter bore and no aspect of society being at all relevant to women, there remains to civic-minded, responsible, thrill-seeking females only to overthrow the government, eliminate the money system, institute complete automation, and destroy the male sex – Valerie Solanas, SCUM Manifesto
> It is no accident that in the ancient matriarchies men were castrated, sacrificially slaughtered, and excluded from public forms of power; nor is it an accident that some female supremacists now believe men to be a distinct and inferior species or race. Wherever power is accessible or bodily integrity honored on the basis of biological attribute, systematized cruelty permeates the society and murder and mutilation contaminate it. We will not be different – Andrea Dworkin
> Why have any men at all? … The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately ten percent of the human race – Sally Miller Gearhart
> If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males – Mary Daly

The stock feminist response is to point out that these quotes are from radical feminists, who have not been active for a long time, and do not represent mainstream feminism. While it is not exactly true that they do not represent mainstream feminism, we can find more recent examples of feminist attitudes:

> It is time that government had a strategy on changing men away from power and oppression as part of its strategy for women and gender justice … Changing future agendas for women involves changing men; changing men involves deconstructing men and reducing men's power; and, in the longer term still, this may even involve the abolition of men" – EuroPRO-Fem, a European men's pro-feminist network

The following is extracted from a recent discussion on a feminist weblog:

> Allecto: I think there is a very simple solution to the 'problem' of the team sport of gang-raping that is so popular as a form of gay male bonding between football players.
> Mandatory castration of all men who play football and all men who watch football. This would be a quick and easy solution.
> bonobobabe: I like your castration idea. I'd take a step further and castrate all male babies at birth.
> Mary Sunshine: There is no remedy for this situation other than to halt the emergence of any more human males.

Two caveats must be advanced before we go any further. The first is not a compromise; it is not self-censorship or moderation. It is a statement of fact. The overwhelming majority of women do not, and would not, support the extermination of men. The question of whether all or most or only some feminists support the extermination of men is one that I shall address in a couple of weeks' time. Clearly, there are feminists who do not openly support the extermination of men. Nevertheless, they have a role to play in the process, as do all misandrists. For the time being, it will suffice to say that all feminist self-reflection and self-criticism reaches the verdict that they are not being 'feminist enough,' i.e. it results in further radicalization. I quote from the back cover of Zillah Eisenstein's The Radical Future of Liberal Feminism, a feminist text which arrives at this very conclusion:

> Eisenstein shows that liberal feminism is 'self-contradictory' because it 'accepts liberalism and at the same time rejects its patriarchal base.' Yet in truth, feminism is 'potentially subversive', to both liberalism and the capitalist patriarchal state, and it must and can become radicalized as it pushes against the limitations of what can be accomplished within the context of the state … Eisenstein advances the view that liberal feminism contains within itself the seeds of radical change.

The significant point about the above quote is that Eisenstein, the feminist author, rejects the 'patriarchal base' of all liberal institutions; that is, she would happily do away with legal impartiality, equality before the law, presumptive innocence, and so on. Retaining these doctrines, which exist to protect innocent people, is not on the feminist agenda, and Eisenstein comes to the very same conclusion that I have presented in this lecture: that liberal feminism will become radical when it achieves all it can through the liberal state. The violent and vindictive emotions will not be satiated, ever. Once feminism has gone as far as it can go through the liberal state, 'liberal feminists' will turn against it and plot its overthrow.

The second caveat is that the physical destruction of men is not inevitable. It is the logical outcome of feminism, but our future is not set in stone. Given that feminists have explicitly called for forced male labor and the presumption of innocence to be removed when men are accused of rape, and that lawmakers are seriously floating the suggestion that those found guilty of sex offences should be physically castrated, we might conclude that we are already some way down the feminist road to hell. Feminism has no internal brakes; a victory does not temper the feminist's violent emotions, but provides the momentum for her to push for greater results, in the knowledge that she can get away with hurting men. Any barrier to the progress of feminism will therefore have to come from outside feminism. It is up to external agents to build a brick wall in feminism's path.

We are more than sixty years into an organic process that will leave humanity with an irrevocably changed society. The catalyst for the abolition of Gynocentrism is its own radical and unsustainable expression in feminism. Those same social and conceptual changes which made feminism possible prompt the question of why men should put up with any form of Gynocentrism. The critical mass of opposition to Gynocentrism, resulting in its overthrow, will be reached as soon as feminism is exposed to the world. What remains to be seen is whether feminism shall expose itself, or whether it will be exposed by counter-feminists. The former will occur if the movement becomes powerful enough to explicitly launch the physical destruction of men. My own view is that feminists will make this final roll of the dice, and that they will be ultimately unsuccessful, although many men will suffer tortuous deaths. The other possibility is that feminism is exposed in advance of this, preventing much of the violence, and allowing for the repeal of all Gynocentric rule with minimal bloodshed. Whatever the case – whether feminism exposes itself, or is exposed – it is done for. Cast in the disinfecting sunlight of the world's gaze, held to account for its grievous transgressions, never again will feminism be tolerated.

Paul Elam · 5 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Our traffic over the past few weeks has significantly increased. That means a lot of new readers to welcome. Many new readers, likely most of you, are here because you have been told some very negative things about us. You have been told that we hate women, that we support and excuse rape and that we promote violence against women, particularly feminist women. You have been told that we are homophobic, transphobic, regressive ideologues.

You have been told that we are a lobby of privileged white males who are disgruntled at our loss of power. You have even been told that among our followers are psychopathic killers who commit unspeakable atrocities, or at the very least we appeal to individuals of this ilk.

The most recent example of that was Elliot Roger, a deeply disturbed young man who went on a shooting rampage recently in Santa Barbara, California. In fact, since the day of that shooting our traffic has increased 30%. That is not too surprising considering there are so many people out there trying to wipe the blood from that tragedy on our backs.

Here is one very good example (of many) of what I am talking about. If you want to read the article you can click on the image.

Using Google will locate other examples for you.

I am going to demonstrate to you clearly why the assumptions about Elliot Roger, and indeed all the other allegations about the men's movement are provably, undeniably fatuous. That is, unless your mind is impervious to reason and evidence. Or perhaps if you have an agenda that is as impervious to morality and integrity as it is to evidence and reason.

I don't say that to insult or alienate. My reasons for the qualification will become clear to you as we move along.

Let us start with the claims of misogyny and the insistence that we are against women's rights. I invite you, after you look for and fail to find material here that demonstrates hatred for women as a class, to peruse the following list of women who have either published on this site and/or endorsed us; who are active team members in our operations or who spoke at our first International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit.

Erin Pizzey, Alison Tieman, Janet Bloomfield, Dr. Tara Palmatier, Dr. Helen Smith, Suzanne Venker, Karen Straughan, Janice Fiamengo, Sen. Anne Cools, Suzanne McCarley, Barbara Kay, Dianna Thompson, and Hannah Wallen.

Please use Google to take a look at the work of these women. See their writing. Assess what you find in their personalities and perspectives. And please ask yourself a few questions:

Do any of these women appear to be anything but intelligent, accomplished, fully autonomous women? Do any of them appear obsequious or deferential to men?

Or do they appear fiercely independent, outspoken and competent?

Are they not indeed, each and every one of them, precisely what feminism promised that women would be free to become?

I will inform you that among these women are those that actually started the battered women's shelter movement for the world, both in the UK and in Canada, before America started similar efforts. One of them is the first black female ever to be a senator in North America.

Now, does it stand to reason to you that this group of socially active, outspoken and independent women would join ranks with men who hate them, and want to roll back their progress or take their rights away?

Are the women who actually started the battered women's shelter movement now scheming to further violence against women everywhere? Or are they so stupid that they can be hoodwinked by a gaggle of bitter, miserable white cis-male failures pining for their privilege?

I submit to you that the evidence proves that the only way you can come to the conclusion that these women are supporting misogynists is behind the force of chosen, aggressive ignorance. It is either that or blind stupidity.

Yet here is what is being distributed in response to the conference at which these women wish to speak.

This, or something like it at places like the Daily Kos, is most likely what brought you here. That is actually a good enough thing because this is where their lies come to die in the minds of objective, intelligent people.
I could spend the rest of this article pointing out, in a thousand ways, why we don't hate women or anyone else; how we are a remarkably diverse group whose membership crosses all lines of sex, race, sexuality, religion, lack of religion and political orientation. But there is no need to do that when the truth of that blazes across thousands of pages on this website.
I would rather spend the rest of my time here telling you not just who, but what we are.
What you will see emerge across the pages of this site, and what rises to show itself in the work and activism we do in "real world" settings, is a meritocracy that extends far past our shared work into a growing society of men and women who treat each other (and expect treatment) based on character, values and actions.
It is actually what feminism promised, and failed miserably, to deliver.
As feminism endlessly chides men, infantilizes women and promotes women-only services (very interesting conduct for a movement based on equality), and as it foments hostility between the sexes with victim narratives and false statistics — we build bridges with each other.
What we don't do, is build bridges with balsa wood. With equal rights comes equal responsibility. Respect is earned, not based on genitalia, but on deeds. There are no princesses here (even in feminist clothing). They are not tolerated. There are no patronizing patriarchs here. They are not tolerated.
Or actually it is better to just say they just don't last. They lose interest in being here because the community we are building does not support expectation or privilege based on sex, sexuality or anything else.
If you have concern about that being true, I ask you to ask the women here, though I point out that asking men AND women alike should be the correct direction if you don't base credibility on sex. Or you could just hang out and watch what happens in this place without asking anyone.
I would also like you to know that this impacts the relationship that men have with each other as well. One example of that is the gay men who frequent here, write for us and are a part of this community.
What we do between men and women also happens between men and men. We regard men as human beings, regardless of their sexuality. And most of us feel that this is the salve that heals what has in recent history been inflicted on gay men. We feel they have been punished because they did not fit in the same social scheme that the men and women here now reject from their own lives.
Oh yes, as to the allegations that we inspire mass murder? Well, I linked you to the Daily Kos article furthering such specious ideas. If you can find anything resembling proof of their claims, please let us know here in the comments or by email. We have scoured everything and can't find it.
Let me finish this welcome to AVFM and the men's movement by saying there is a reason we have worked (and yes, sometimes provocatively) to meet the goal of you being there reading this article right now.
The plain fact is that men and boys do have problems and this society needs to have a much different dialog about those problems than it has ever had. The reasons for that are found throughout the over 3,000 feature articles on this website.
We are admittedly tenacious and unrelenting in insisting on this dialog. We have been met with death threats and illegal protests for doing so.
We are, however, a collection of men and women from all walks of life, now stretching across the planet, who are committed to this dialog taking place. We are not going to be silenced from it.
And we are growing.
The plain fact of the matter is that with every traffic spike to this website, often consisting of people who have seen negative allegations against us, we end up retaining more open minded readers. And supporters. And activists.
That leaves only one question. That question is whether you came here out of curiosity, with an open and skeptical mind, looking to find what all the accusations and innuendo were about. If that defines you, then you are our intended audience. You are the person we are trying to reach. And you are the kind of person we are increasingly succeeding in winning over.

The main reason for that is that we have a community that is not plagued by sexism. The exact opposite of what you have likely been told.
If you came here with a hateful heart, looking for something to dig up and take out of context, have at it. There are a few intentionally written pieces of provocation that will suit you just fine. And please do so with our thanks.
It is people like you who have taken AVFM from a one-man blog to a full-blown publication and movement that won't be stopped.

The Eventual Outcome of Feminism, Part II

Adam Kostakis · 5 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Adam Kostakis' landmark online lectures on gynocentrism were published on AVfM in 2011, but for all who didn't catch them then we pleased to run them again. Here is the eleventh of twelve lectures. – PW

> Propaganda, as inverted patriotism, draws nourishment from the sins of the enemy. If there are no sins, invent them! The aim is to make the enemy appear so great a monster that he forfeits the rights of a human being. – Sir Ian Hamilton

The physical destruction of maleness is the logical outcome of feminist governance. The more feminist governance exists, the more anti-male persecution there will be, and the closer to Holocaust we will find ourselves. More feminism will not result in greater sexual equality. More feminism is not the solution to the problems addressed by Men's Rights Activists. Feminism is the problem. How could it be otherwise? Feminists believe that a debt is owed to them by all men, and they are perfectly content to recover this debt in blood and suffering. No matter how much pain they inflict unto the world, it will never be enough to satiate their violent, vindictive emotions. Rather, the more harm they inflict upon men, the more normalized this becomes, and – like a drug addiction – they will need ever greater 'highs' to satisfy the hate, culminating in the Final Punishment, the total eradication of men.
Note that I am not mincing words. I will not tread lightly around this subject. I will not resort to euphemism or conceal my message 'between the lines'. I will not leave you with the mere implication that Male Holocaust is the eventual outcome of feminism, before quickly moving on to talk about other things, as though airing the idea should be an embarrassment for the speaker. I am fully aware that mine is a marginal view of feminism, and may be considered by some to be 'extreme', but then the widespread misunderstanding and misrepresentation of what feminism is is just another symptom of the sickness I am describing. I will state, quite openly, that this is the conclusion I have reached, having considered all the available evidence, and it is a conclusion I would encourage nobody to take lightly. The imminent attempted eradication of half the human race calls for writing unimbued by flippancy or fancy. It does not permit me to enter into civil discussion with those who will be attempting said eradication or cheering it on from the sidelines. There is no object in a respectful exchange of views with such people; the very idea appears, to me, to be an ugly parody of truly civilized discourse – sort of like Neville Chamberlain trying to appease Adolf Hitler. No, my aim is to convince as many people as possible that this is, indeed, the truth, and thus to propel them to do whatever they can to stop a humanitarian disaster before it begins. To that end, I shall tell it like it is, and call out the enemies of humanity as I see them – and they are feminists, who are even now, as you read these words, beavering away at stamping that official seal onto their key tenet of Collective Male Guilt.

No matter how far down the rabbit hole she has gone, the feminist is cognizant, at some level, of the fact that a person must have actually committed a crime in order to be guilty of it. Initially, this fact appears before her, phantomlike, as an inconvenient truth, a sticking point, an irritant – like a lump in the throat, or a speck in the eye, that simply will not go away. This irritating truth is a logical interceptor, a pile of debris left on the tracks. She wonders: must I stop and turn around? Can my feminism, this wonderful vehicle for my catharsis, be reconciled with my assumptions of human individuality and legal impartiality? Of course it cannot, and if she remains a feminist, she abandons the latter. Treating individuals as individuals destroys any legitimate appeal to Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment, and vice versa: subscribing to notions of Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment negates the possibility of treating individuals as individuals. Having made her choice, she ignores this truth, that individuals must individually commit acts to be held individually accountable for them. It becomes irrelevant; revenge is higher on her list of priorities. Individual responsibility has ceased to matter for her, and it must cease to matter for others also. Those who remind her of it are attacked (cue the shaming tactics), and eventually, the fact itself is attacked. Individual responsibility is the product of false consciousness; all men carry guilt. Biological essentialism, once the stock in trade of the fascist far right, is resurrected as justifier of the authoritarian New Left.

Feminists are uninterested by truth. They do not formulate their principles based upon analysis of collected truths. The starting point for all feminism is misandric emotion, and subsequent principles are formulated upon this. Truth is largely incidental. It is greatly appreciated when it appears to coincide with feminist arguments, and outright attacked when it does not; otherwise, it is irrelevant. Facts are a tool of the patriarchy; feminism aims to elevate subjective passions and wills to the lofty quarters previously reserved for what can be objectively verified.

Detractors remain, of course, pointing out the awkward, inconvenient, irrefutable truths. For instance: even if we accept the fallacious claim that one in four women gets raped, that would imply that, at most, one in four men commit rape, assuming that each rapist commits only one rape. But this is not very realistic, since we know that there are serial rapists, whose recidivism would drive the number of guilty parties down significantly. Could anybody who touts the 'one in four' figure realistically disagree with this assessment? Such people are forced to conclude, with us, that at least three quarters of men have never and will never rape anybody; in other words, they are demonstrably not rapists. Is it not monstrous, then, to tar one hundred percent of a demographic with the crimes of less than a quarter? Perhaps we should hold rallies, in the style of Take Back The Night and so on, in which we chant "three-in-four! Three-in-four!" until people get the message that the overwhelming majority of men are not rapists and do not deserve to be labelled as such. What do you think?

Whatever the case, Collective Guilt appears to be ruled out – but we underestimate feminist creativity. While some of feminism's more demented followers have asserted that "all sex is rape" – making nearly all men into rapists for having engaged in consensual sex at some point, including that initiated by women – most of the 'third wave' has gravitated to a phony rationalization that a 'rape culture' persists among men en masse. Rape culture doctrine holds that, although a minority of men in fact commit the act of rape, the other seventy-five percent (or, if we are being realistic, a significantly higher percentage) are cheering them on from the sidelines, deriving pleasure vicariously from the knowledge that women are being sexually attacked. Collective Guilt is secured. The truth – that men are more histrionic than women when it comes to rape claims – is immaterial and can be safely denied or ignored.

Further examples of feminist creativity – finding innovative ways to blame all men for the crimes of a small number – can be found for every subject that they write about. I will not list them here because our discussion must move on. It will suffice to say that all such creativity resolves to the myth of 'the patriarchy' – that individual men who do not control or abuse women nevertheless, somehow, simply because they are men, actively support the processes through which other men do control women. The only thing that a man must do to be guilty of this is to be male; ergo, by existing, he is guilty. All feminist male-blaming creativity is a variation on this bio-essentialist theme, and all of it serves to legitimize Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment.

The feminist process of destroying men and maleness will not necessarily follow a defined plan. It does not have to! To this very day, historians continue to debate whether there was ever a direct order given for the Final Solution, or if the Holocaust was the result of cumulative radicalization within the totalitarian, anti-Semetic state bureaucracy of Nazi Germany. It is at least conceivable, then, that the murder of millions can be achieved organically, after a significant period of demonization which leaves most of the population indifferent (if not hostile) towards the scapegoat. Very few people are actually needed to carry out a genocide – typically less than ten percent of a population, often less than five. Indifference is all that is required of the remainder.

Having said this, there is at least one explicit plan for Male Holocaust, which was emphatically not written as a satire, even if its author later brushed off troubling questions with this claim. While the SCUM Manifesto is remembered today as a bizarre relic which in no way represented mainstream feminism at any time, it's worth pointing out that the text only achieved 'classic' status because of its overwhelming popularity. Even if we were to contort ourselves into believing that Valerie Solanas intended the text as a joke, we cannot believe the same about her followers. Of these, perhaps the most famous would be Robin Morgan, who included excerpts from SCUM in her anthology Sisterhood is Powerful, and stated her sincere aim that the "Feminist Revolution" would achieve not "some false state of equality," but "a proud gynocratic world."

Still, SCUM hardly contains the blueprints for male extermination. The feminist project has not followed SCUM to the letter, though this is perhaps because there is no letter to follow. The text is more statement than program; it is the violent, vindictive emotionalism laid bare, the ugly face of feminism unmasked, the dissected contents of a dirty bomb formerly disguised as a birthday present. In the long run, the publication of SCUM has probably benefited anti-feminists most of all. It is proof positive that feminism is, at least in part, supportive of female supremacy and the elimination of men; and that such views, when initially aired, were received with enough support from the feminist sector to make the book famous. Would feminists today be so dismissive of SCUM if anti-feminists had not seized on it as evidence?

To get back on track: while there certainly are individuals working within state bureaucracies whose chief aim in life is to make men suffer – and indeed, government departments have been set up for this very purpose – an official order to eliminate men has not (yet) been given, as far as we know. But one does not need to be given, for the situation may come about organically. For decades, males have been subject to the worst possible demonization in mass media – including, earlier this year, the portrayal of newborn babies as inherently evil, rapists-in-waiting. The slurs made against all men, which cannot possibly be justified on the grounds of deterring that small number of men disposed to committing crimes, are typical of a dehumanization campaign. The aims of this long hate crusade are threefold. First, that women, being exposed to the endlessly repeating feminist hate loop, will adopt the view that men are violent, inhumane oppressors, and are therefore deserving of whatever evil they suffer. Although most women will initially oppose this message, the endlessly repeating hate loop, because it is so persistent and pervasive, eventually breaks down psychological resistance. Once the hate loop had gathered enough momentum to carry itself, and was becoming bigger all the time, like a snowball rolling down a hill, then our cultural guardians needed only to intervene occasionally in order to fine-tune its content. E.g. it was not enough for a woman to only fear 'strange men'; it had to be transmitted to her that her own husband, her father, her son, etc., are activated cells in 'the patriarchy' which is oppressing her, that they are each a 'potential rapist,' and so on.

The second aim of the dehumanization campaign is to get men to turn on each other. That this forms part of feminist methodology is not surprising, since exploitation of masculinity and male physical muscle, to be used against other men for the benefit of women, is the central plank of historical Gynocentrism. In addition to appealing to powerful men to pass punitive legislation enabling the brutalization of their less powerful brethren, feminists drive wedges between common men. By promoting to men the message that their own sex is full of rapists, abusers and pedophiles, men will be less inclined to identify with other men, or with men in general, and will feel much less in the way of mutual support or sympathy. Even as the sexual grievance industry indefinitely expands the meanings of emotive words like 'rape,' 'violence' and 'pedophilia,' any man accused (not even charged, let alone convicted) of any of these acts becomes a persona non grata among his own sex. Even worse, the falsely accused man (or the man 'guilty' under the new definitions of these terms) finds himself on the receiving end of vigilante justice by outraged men who have swallowed the feminist line that male abusers are rampant everywhere (therefore this accused man must be guilty). When the falsely accused and the newly criminalized are being loaded onto train cars for deportation to death camps, men who have not yet been accused will turn their heads, consoling themselves with the thought that those men must be abusers, and so they are deserving of whatever happens to them. The men who have not yet been accused are lulled into a false sense of security, believing that they will be safe, so long as they continue to obey the feminist state.

The third aim of the dehumanization campaign is to normalize brutality against men. Feminists are boiling a frog, as the proverb goes. The cumulative brutalization of men occurs in increments, each of which appears to be objectionable, but not appallingly so (except, perhaps, to those who are paying close enough attention to perceive the creeping despotism). Already, we have surpassed situations which would have caused men to pour onto the streets in revolt had they been achieved in one fell swoop – the enslavement of men by family courts and child support laws, rape trials held in secret and without a jury in Sweden, the negation of the presumption of innocence for men in several states, mandatory arrest laws for men who call the police because their girlfriends have stuck knives in their chests, men being incarcerated and sold into sexual slavery in debtor's prisons because their wives were bored, and so on.

As the brutalization of men becomes the norm, practised by more people, a greater number of misandrists will become emboldened to act out their hate. Feminism does not entail men 'losing privileges,' or suffering for a little while until the sexes are in balance and life becomes a perfect harmony. The more feminism, the worse things will be for men, right up to the point of extermination. The level of persecution corresponds precisely to the level of feminist governance. When a great mass of feminist bureaucrats set to work, finding innovative ways to persecute men, the individual feminist bureaucrat realizes that there is no limit to what she can get away with.

I would like to talk a little more about exactly why this is. From its earliest days, feminism was envisioned as a cultural war. Making misandric persecution a reality meant that the dehumanization and brutalization of men had to become normalized phenomena – background noise, those aspects of existence nobody bats an eyelid at, those facts of life that adults resign themselves to, the unpleasantness of which can be explained away by defeatist mantras like "it's just the way things are," "it sucks but what can we do about it," and "men and women are different, so just man up and take it." Creating this kind of hostile indifference towards Men's Rights was necessary because it is the foundation upon which active persecution stands. Saying that hostile indifference has become normalized is another way of saying that it is normal for people to practise hostile indifference. In other words, enough people practise hostile indifference for it to be considered normal. That is, a great number of people practise hostile indifference, and are not taken to task for it, because it is sufficiently widespread to rule out the possibility of individuals being taken to task for it.

What we have, then, is hostile indifference towards men as a characteristic of the social organism as a whole, and it is within state bureaucracies that feminists congregate to build active persecution upon this normalized hostile indifference. The hostility and indifference towards men allows them to get away with this, because it affords each misandric individual anonymity and irresponsibility. She did not create this situation; she is not personally responsible for it. She is not the only one pushing for active persecution; everyone else is (at least) indifferent in this regard, and anyway, there are plenty of others working in the same field. Being pre-emptively 'let off the hook' through anonymity and irresponsibility, the individual feminist forms part of a collective mob whose members can indulge in a sentiment of invincible power, allowing them to yield to emotions which would otherwise have been restrained. Purely numerical considerations – strength in numbers – enable the individual operator to evade all questions of guilt and culpability. They become mere cogs whose existence and purpose is nonsensical when abstracted from the greater machine. They simply do as they are told, they simply 'go along with' what everyone else is doing – ostensibly harmless, unremarkable, dutiful.

Where a state seeks to achieve some ideological goal, its bureaucracy becomes the archetypal model of human consciousness overwhelmed by crowd psychology. Every collective acts collectively, that is, without pausing to allow the individuals to reflect, without consulting the individuals, without requiring that they give their enthusiastic assent. The collective acts with immediacy, according to its will, leaving absolutely no room for criticism from individuals within or without. Individuals within the collective act as all the others do. They are, by definition, anonymous and unaccountable. Excited by an idea, and indulging in the power of numbers, a collective does not allow or admit that anything could prevent the fulfilment of its will.

The feminist mob acts in the same way that all ideology-based collectives do – by magnifying the miniscule transgressions made against the collective, and trivializing atrocities perpetrated against others. An almost perfect example of this comes from the feminist website Sociological Images. First, the magnification of the miniscule. In September 2010, one of the site's authors announced her outrage that a line of rulers (i.e. measuring sticks) commemorating great scientists in history included Marie Curie under the heading "Great Women Rulers of Science." A horrific injustice, this is not. Still, at this point, we might simply assume that those habituating the blog are fragile people, finding themselves easily offended by much in life – we might think that they would feel the same way if they stumbled upon some equivalent version of these rulers with the sexes reversed.

We might think this is the case, until we scroll down to the comment section and find an accusation that Paul Elam's A Voice for Men site is nothing but a load of "whining." Now, in the two weeks prior to that comment being made, A Voice for Men had discussed the following:

> A police state that arrests and incarcerates male victims of domestic violence and enables female perpetrators to continue criminal behavior; a ten to one death gap concerning capital punishment that works against men; a five to one death gap against men related to suicide; the staggering attrition of males in higher education and employment; the utter lack of reproductive rights for men, and the incidence of false rape allegations against men which even the police are calling epidemic.

At first glance, the cognitive dissonance is astounding. Could the feminist really have dismissed discussion of such human interest issues as these, while her own counter-movement has nothing more offensive to talk about but the headings on rulers (which actually highlight, not obscure, the fact that there have been great female scientists)?

As Paul succinctly puts it, "women's whining = pursuit of justice. Men's pursuit of justice = whining." In following this simple maxim, feminists adhere perfectly to the dark elements of crowd psychology: magnifying the miniscule when it concerns them, and trivializing atrocities when these are committed against others.

Like all other collectives governed by the principles of crowd psychology, feminists have a tendency towards the power of suggestion: that an idea only needs to be spoken aloud for it to be taken as the gospel truth. Of course, this only works with certain types of ideas – most obviously, those which aid in magnifying the miniscule, but certainly not the ones that draw attention to the non-trivial atrocities suffered by others. It matters not that the cries of rape advocates – "one in four!" – are based on a study, the methodology of which is so flawed that any serious researcher would have transferred it directly from the printer and into the big round file. Young women will continue to pour onto the streets chanting it – "one in four! One in four!" – why? Because it serves the crowd to have been transgressed against in such a way, because it provides them with those feelings of righteous indignation which serve as a springboard from which they may launch the active persecution of the targeted class. No individual need bother checking the facts, and the crowd would not pay any attention to one who did anyway. As an example of this power of suggestion in action within a feminist state bureaucracy, we need look no further than the United Kingdom's former Minister for Women and Equality, Harriet Harman, who was eventually ordered by a judge to stop spinning the lie that rape has only a six percent conviction rate. Even then, rape advocacy groups like Women Against Rape have continued to refer to this completely invented figure. Evidencing one's claims is a trifling matter, and one subordinated to the necessity of exciting the mob.

The power of suggestion is particularly pronounced in the feminist crowd because it is mostly composed of women, and women are more impressionable than men. This is not an inherent difference between the sexes, but a socialized defect. A lifetime of privilege, of parasitic exploitation and entitlement, of juicing the fruits of another's labor, has left many women devoid of character, with unrealistic views of the world which leave them open to certain kinds of manipulation that men are not so easily taken in by. Feminism is ideological snake oil, and impressionable women are its customers. If an idea excites them, if that one-in-four statistic sends a shiver down their spines, if it causes them to feel something so strongly, then there must be at least an element of truth to it – so the unconscious mental processes go. How could something that is not real affect her in a way that feels so real? Impossible, one would think. Once feminists understood and appreciated the malleability of women, they had merely to present astounding statistics which, when recited endlessly, to the point that they become background noise, exist on some plane beyond truth and falsehood, the plane of popular consensus, and so cannot be refuted by the evidence that most men would have asked for upon originally hearing the claims.

For the same reason, we find the tendencies among feminists to simplify, and to go immediately to extremes. An exceptional instance of violence against women becomes, for feminists, the rule which is practised against all women, everywhere. A college student making a rape joke to his fraternity brothers becomes a microcosm of society as a whole. On that note, making a rape joke is the same thing, for feminists, as condoning the actual rape of human beings. There is no room for nuance, no accounting for the thousand shades of grey that exist between black and white; only the two colors perceived by monochrome Manichean Essentialists. A rape joke could conceivably and consistently be made by people spanning the entire spectrum of opinion on rape, in the same way that people can make jokes about dead babies, tasteless though they may be, without necessarily supporting or contributing towards infanticide. This is common sense stuff, but common sense stuff does not excite the passions of ideological mobs. Collectives such as feminism rely, for their shared understanding, on a fundamental lack of nuance – to infallibly appeal to all its adherents, an ideological collective must propagate a small number of simplistic, exciting, image-like ideas. In the case of feminism, which is an ideological collective based upon the validation of violent and vindictive feelings held towards men, we should not be surprised to find that these image-like ideas are so often characterized by violence.

Feminism's validation of immature, simplistic, exaggerated, generalized and extreme ideas results in violent emotion as a guiding principle of justice – in other words, the Collective Guilt and Collective Punishment I have already discussed. Feminist jurisprudence flows directly from the violent and anti-male emotions of individual feminist operators, emotions which are, in turn, validated by the ideological collective which has successfully constructed a climate of hostile indifference towards men. There is not even the pretense of impartiality in feminist jurisprudence – it is openly 'anti-normative,' seeking favorable conditions for female criminals while indefinitely expanding the scope of punishable male deviancy. Those who advocate and practise it are open about their vindictive sexism, and their reforms continue, under the radar. We are heading towards explicit male persecution because there is nowhere else this can go and very few people willing or informed enough to stand up and say 'no'.

For those who would deny that feminism condones and advocates violence against men, I need only direct you to their own creations. Here is the banner for feminist website Feministe:

Now, despite the relatively tame content of this particular site, does it seem conceivable that the out-of-frame target of this little girl's firearm is not a grown man? It's a clever trick, because the target is not shown, allowing for plausible deniability on the part of the site's members. After all, feminists don't shoot people, do they? As Fidelbogen puts it:

> Try looking at the little girl in context with the word FEMINISTE directly behind her. Note the synergy of the two elements, how they combine into a visual-conceptual unity of message – effectively amplifying and reinforcing each other.

Moving on, we might consider the hilarious irony of feminists voicing concerns over the likelihood of Pick-Up Artist Roosh Vorek being violent while simultaneously making violent threats against him:

> I must find out his real name so if I ever meet him I can suckerpunch him in the dick.
> I think Roosh is a great example of what truly needs to be purged.
> I'm wondering if his blog is violent enough to notify the DA's office.

I'm wondering too. But what I'm wondering about is why the phrase 'cognitive dissonance' gets thrown around by anti-feminists in situations like these, since the feminists' behavior is perfectly consistent. It is simply that they have magnified all miniscule transgressions against women – such as, a vaguely insulting comment from a Pick-Up Artist – and have trivialized all atrocities against men. When it is appreciated that feminist operations are all characterized by double standards in their dealings with men and women, it will be understood that there is no 'dissonance' here at all, cognitive or otherwise – their behavior is fully consistent with their twin assumptions that every inconvenience a woman faces is a humanitarian tragedy, and that men do not matter at all. Thus, after decades of feminist teeth-gnashing about the horrors of domestic violence, and how it is a subject so serious it should never be joked about or taken lightly, feminist website Jezebel produced a now-infamous article gloating over the greater incidence of domestic violence perpetrated by women, and issuing direct threats to men generally that the website's authors will act abusively towards them should men "fuck with" them. Now that men are the victims, it's acceptable to post amusing pictures of battered men; to refer to female-perpetrated abuse as "busting open a can of whupass"; to refer to male victims as "the dudes" and to employ veiled shaming tactics implying it is their own fault for not fighting back. If you follow the link, please check out the comments – make sure you click on 'All' and scroll down to get a proper impression of what feminists are really like when they think they are safely out of the world's gaze.

The image-like ideas that feminism employs are not connected by logical bonds, although they are all consistent at base because they all contribute towards increasing the power of women. To the uninitiated, it appears that the various antics of feminist activists are not at all connected, and that the most contradictory, dissimilar ideas are supported side by side. E.g., feminists simultaneously advocate for the censorship of softcore pornography targeted at men and lament that there does not exist more explicit pornography featuring naked and aroused men for the consumption of females. This only leads to sputtering accusations of 'cognitive dissonance' if one takes for granted that feminists assume their own philosophy is universalizable. If they did assume this – if their goal truly was sexual equality and impartiality – then it would indeed be true that feminists would be irrational and could fairly be said to suffer from cognitive dissonance. But this is not the case. Their philosophy is not intended to be universalizable. The aim is not to apply a uniform standard towards men and women; it is to level women up and level men down. It is to grant women more rights, indefinitely, and to force new obligations onto men, indefinitely. Double standards are the feminist rule, not the exception.

And what is the logical outcome – say, if tomorrow, feminists got everything they are advocating for today? We would be plunged immediately into a two-tier system of rights and obligations, where men and women form distinct castes of citizen, the former weighed down by the obligations that enable the latter to luxuriate in their total autonomy. Life for women would be a literal lawlessness, while men's every move would be dictated from above, geared to the purpose of providing for all female needs and wants. It would not be inappropriate to call such a system sexual feudalism, and every time I read a feminist article, this is the impression that I get: that they to construct a new aristocracy, comprised only of women, while men stand at the gate, till in the fields, fight in their armies, and grovel at their feet for starvation wages. All feminist innovation and legislation creates new rights for women and new duties for men; thus it tends towards the creation of a male underclass, the accomplishment of which will be the first step towards the extermination of men.

At present, feminism displays all the hallmarks of a dangerous movement about to become fascistic: its adherents demand blind submission to dogma, they are unable to discuss its principles, they desire to spread its ideology (by whatever means necessary), they are intolerant of those who do not embrace it, they immediately rush to generalization, they demand authenticity and conformity to a rigorous standard of morality, and they utilize bio-essentialist rhetoric and violent imagery to denigrate their targets. The (often literal) dehumanization of men, coupled with feminist governance, could not be leading anywhere but the enforcement of Collective Punishment, the idealized end point of a principle of justice based upon the validation of violent, primal emotion. Not one iota of sympathy, of fellow human-feeling, is to be felt for innocent men subject to the worst atrocities.

Holocaust is the ultimate utopian vision of some radical feminists, and they are perfectly open about this, discussing the male-free world of the future as insipidly as if they were discussing holiday plans. Other radical feminists imagine a future in which men's numbers are greatly reduced and the remaining males are kept as slaves. Still others dream of a society similar to ours, but with women in the lead in all spheres of life, with all pretense to equality abandoned. Earnest feminists, meanwhile, do not necessarily intend any of these outcomes, but as they are members of the collective, they will act as members of the collective, and even if they do not participate in the active persecution of men, they will be forbidden – as an unspoken rule – from exhibiting any sympathy at all for men, no matter what they suffer. Those who do are promptly expelled, labelled anti-feminists, and subject to vicious attacks by the in-group. No feminist will stop the process of male elimination, nor will she feel any regret once it is complete, as long as she remains a feminist.

The destruction of males does not require a majority of feminists to even be on board; it is an organic process which unfolds naturally in time, and once a certain point is passed, there will be no stopping the attempt. Women like Hannah Rosin, who desire not equality but female supremacy with men as a permanent underclass, will find that the psychic forces which led them to agitate for this do not simply disappear once sexual feudalism is achieved. Feminism is a movement based upon the gratification of those psychic forces, the permanent, hateful needs of misandric women, and no limits will be reached for as long as men can be made to suffer even more.

Utopian visions supposedly present the perfectly just and moral society, but really, they envision the end of morality altogether. Utopia is that in which nobody makes an immoral decision; thus, nobody really makes moral choices. Rather, they have been socialized so well – through intimidation or brainwashing – that they always make the same choices. This silly little fantasy has inspired tyrants to send millions to their deaths. Early modernity is marked by the two most prominent examples of this: the French and Russian revolutions. Both were fought on the premise that the old regime would give way to a new age of human perfection. Both ended in failure, but not before soaking their countries in blood. The historian Hippolyte Taine wrote that it was by invoking "liberty, equality, fraternity" that the architects of the French Revolution were able "to install a despotism worthy of Dahomey, a tribunal similar to that of the Inquisition, and to accomplish human hecatombs akin to those of ancient Mexico." Similarly, Communism was presumed to be the realization of freedom and all human potential – until it was actually realized. Communist countries repressed and starved their populations, worked them to the point of exhaustion, banned free speech, purged dissidents, and invaded other countries with a zeal for imperial conquest that must have seemed rather surprising to those who saw communism as an ideology of peace. And all this, not for any existing object – not for land, or resources, or for freedom – but for a social order that had never existed and was merely imagined.

We should not expect Feminist countries – capital F, standing for explicit Feminist Governance – to be any different. Feminist countries will starve and repress, they will force men and dissenting women into labor camps, they will ban open discussion, commit murder on a grand scale, and they will invade other countries, all in the name of liberating women. If there is anything we can learn from the last few hundred years, it is that humanity repeatedly fails to learn the important lessons. After men, which group shall be persecuted? Must we all take a turn, as though our biological characteristics make us representatives of those who appear similar to us, across all time and space? After the horrors of the Soviet regime and the Holocaust, is it not sensible that we all agree to cease judging heterogeneous groups of people by bio-essentialist standards, and damning them all to hell on earth because of the apparent crimes of a minority (be this in reference to the Elders of Zion or to 'the patriarchy')?

Now, I am well aware, that simply asking these questions is not going to change anything. It is certainly not going to change any feminist minds. But I am not here to plead with feminists. I am here to interrogate them, to embarass them about their future plans, and to spread the word about what those plans are. Because even the self-proclaimed enlightened, progressive feminist movement has not learned the lesson that humanity should now be well-versed in. In contradistinction to them, I say – peace be with you.

Adam Jones is a Canadian scholar and photojournalist who serves as the Executive Director of Gendercide Watch, an NGO that "seeks to confront acts of gender-selective mass killing around the world." Dr. Jones has traveled to over 85 countries, studying how gender influences violence on an international scale. Jones advocates for both men and women globally, and writes essays on genocide that are often compiled into books like Gender Inclusive.
Dr. Jones wishes for men's advocacy to expand beyond Western conceptions of male victimization, because male victimization in areas outside of Western civilization are often not discussed. Jones has faced feminist backlash in the peer review process for his critique of modern scholarship and media (under which female victimization is emphasized to the point male victimization is incidentalized, if not excluded altogether). Jones claims that friends have assisted in his efforts to publish, including some feminists. However, the opposition to Jones' work came almost entirely from the feminist camp.
Feminists from different branches of epistemology in academia have been at odds, such as feminist empiricists and the Marxism-derived standpoint theorists. This may explain why some helped Jones in spite of strong ideological opposition.
Please watch Victor Zen's interview with Jones below. Zen brings questions from many people from community, including Alison Tieman, Lucian Valsan, Karen Straughen's daughter, Dean Esmay and so on.

> Feminism helps men too! – late 20th century folk saying

If you have spent even a short amount of time browsing the multitudinous websites and blogs of the Men's Rights sphere, you will have no doubt encountered a feminist detractor or two asserting that "Not All Feminists Are Like That." This has become so common that MRAs have taken to referencing this as the "NAFALT" defence. But should the claim be so readily dismissed? Depending on the context, the feminist might well be right. A hypothetical feminist who stumbled upon my last two posts, which point to the eventual outcome of feminism as the physical extermination of men, might well object that she does not hope for this future, and therefore is Not Like That – and she is not necessarily wrong.

Of course, our hypothetical feminist would not have read closely enough, for I clearly stated that the physical extermination of men is more likely to be attempted as the result of an organic process, beginning with hostile indifference, followed by active persecution through state bureaucracies, without the requirement that extermination be consciously articulated or advocated by any more than a small number of feminists. The others only need to go along with the programme; they do not need to understand where it will all end. At the heart of this is the dichotomy between Earnest and Radical Feminists.

On the face of it, this distinction seems to imply that, as feminists are fond of saying, feminism is not monolithic. In other words, some feminists might read from the gospel of Mary Daly, while others just want a fair deal for women. This is a more elaborate version of NAFALT, but it does not explain why two ostensibly conflicting ideologies are referred to by the same name: feminism. In fact, stating that feminism is non-monolithic sidesteps the issue of how all these different sub-feminisms relate to each other and to feminism as a whole. Would feminism still be feminism if one of its sub-feminisms were removed? Possibly. The death of eco-feminism would not spell disaster for feminism in general, or for any other sub-feminism in particular. But what about the two main prongs of feminism – Radical Feminism, which is openly misandric, and Earnest Feminism, whose supporters "just want a fair deal"? Could feminism survive the death of either of these? Or does the ideology as a whole owe its existence to their reciprocity? Is their relationship inherently and intrinsically symbiotic?

I contend that the differences between Earnest and Radical Feminists are superficial, accounting only for the perceived differences between feminists themselves. The intellectual distance between two feminists in disagreement might seem, to them, to be vast indeed; a philosophical Grand Canyon! But to non-feminists, who stand far away from them both, and observe feminism from a distance, the two bickering ideologues stand very close to each other. Yes, we can just about see them on the horizon – two small figures, shouting over a pothole!

The feminist, having automatically ruled out the legitimacy of any space that is non-feminist, perceives feminism as the whole world, and on this tiny plane of existence, the interval of a few feet is colossal – large enough to justify drawing a chalk line on the ground, and saying, "that is your space, this is mine, and we are not like each other! Certainly, we are not a monolith!" But, to the non-feminist, who is not blinkered by ideology, and thus perceives much more of the world generally, the feminists in the distance are standing nearly on top of each other as they quarrel over their claims to a small piece of land.

In other words: the distance between objects becomes more significant the closer you get to them. And if you pay no attention to anything that is not those objects, then those objects will appear to be the entire world! And thus any distance between them will seem enormous, because you lack any sense of scale. Feminists are not in any kind of position to know how much they differ from each other, from the perspective of the non-feminist world; they cannot judge because they lack the prerequisite non-feminism.

So when a feminist tries to pass off the elaborated NAFALT defence, as apologia for herself or for the atrocious behavior of her sisters, you must remind her that she is in no position to judge how far she differs from other feminists! The differences she perceives might seem very significant from her own subjective point of view, but she must be made to understand that she is a participant in the social organism called feminism, that she speaks from within the big tent, and thus has absolutely no right to tell us how we should look at the tent from outside! The non-feminist world, you must explain, experiences the force of feminism from one direction in particular, and when we turn to look in that direction, we see infallibly that the Earnest Feminist stands proudly, side by side, with the Radical.

Now, I would presume that such an arrangement as exists between Earnest and Radical Feminists is one of necessity. Feminism requires both the acceptable public face of the salesman (trustworthy, just trying to make an honest living), and the momentum, that inner drive that keeps the whole show running (greasy, oiled palms on the factory floor). Neither could exist without the other. If only the public face of Earnest Feminism existed, it would get nowhere, because there would be no molten core of misandry, no dynamo at its centre to motivate action. On the other hand, if only the combustion engine of Radical Feminism existed, the movement would fold overnight, being exposed immediately as the politics of hate. Without the engine, all you would have is an object that looks nice but goes nowhere. Forget the paintwork, and nobody would want to buy it.

Whatever it is, feminism must be marketable if it is going to be successful – so its marketability alone cannot tell us anything about what it is.

Earnestness and Radicalism are two sides of the same feminist coin. The dichotomy allows for Radical attacks against men, followed up by the Earnest defence that feminism is a nice doctrine, or at least it is not monolithic, and anyway, anyone who is against it "just hates women." The two sides fit together like two pieces of a jigsaw puzzle, the picture only making sense when they are combined.

Yes, feminism is one single, simple entity, monolithic in its aspirations, merely presenting different faces depending on context. The various manifestations of feminism, whether intended for public consumption or not, hold in common the constant that they seek to increase the power of women. This is the locus, the centre of gravity of feminism – whether it appears as a belief in innate female superiority, or as the aspiration to female domination in material terms, the actualization of female power will be present in some form or other. Without this epicentre, around which all else revolves, the movement could not survive; its sudden implosion would send its members spinning out of orbit in all different directions. The only thing which binds feminists together is the belief that the status of women must be elevated and the status of men must be relegated; that women must be made more superior, and men more inferior. Beyond this, there are only side issues, arguments which have no bearing on the primary thesis of female supremacy. These side issues are a distraction for the outside world, allowing for feminism to remain intact and coherent even when its activists appear to run into disputes.

Now, we are already clear on the aims of Radical Feminists. I have already described the plans they have for men and maleness. Radicals are content for all men to be exterminated or enslaved. They have openly declared war on men, and the future, if they get their way, can be summed up by the infamous pictures of Lynndie England, in her little soldier's outfit, sexually humiliating naked men, using dogs to attack their genitals, and so on. The Radical Feminist dreams of this abuse, not confined to an Iraqi prison, but normalized across the world. The victims would not be Iraqis, as Iraqis, but men, as men. Much like the Army personnel who imagined that they were delivering

In the Radical Feminist mind, all men are guilty, inherently, as men. “All men are rapists” is not just a relic of the past; it is the horizon that Radical Feminism is pushing us towards. By this, I do not mean that all men will become rapists, but that all men will be indicted as rapists. Any punishment, then, no matter how extreme, will become justified against this class of heinous abusers and violators. (Note that, in one of the Abu Ghraib torture pictures, the soldiers have written “I am a rapeist (sic)” onto the thigh of one of their victims – even though it was the soldiers themselves who were carrying out the rapes. The parallel to Radical Feminism is chilling.)
We know this about Radical Feminists, but what about those who “aren’t like that” – namely, the Earnest Feminists? It is true enough that many, perhaps most, Earnest Feminists do not look forward to a future in which men are enslaved or exterminated. Their role is not to dispossess men and shove them into prisons, but to convince us that there is no sex war. Even as men are imprisoned, tortured and murdered by state agents acting in the name of feminism, Earnest Feminists will pretend that there is not a war happening. Indeed, the effectiveness of the feminist project depends on the misperception that a war is not happening. They frame this desperate situation as something other than it is: progress towards equality, opening up dialogues, liberating people from restrictive gender roles, and so on.
No. This is a war, and it is one that feminists have openly declared. The true insidiousness of feminists becomes most apparent when we consider that, having declared war, they proceeded to demand that their enemy combatants show them respect, continue to protect them, and provide for their wellbeing. The duplicitousness in pretending that a war is not happening even as one wages it is a necessary element of the feminist way of war. Chivalry must be sustained if feminism is to advance. Women’s wellbeing must remain a priority for men. If it is not – if men en masse suddenly became cognizant of the war that has been declared on them, they would organize and found permanent initiatives to defend themselves. They would seek to remove female privilege. There would be no guarantee that they would stop once parity has been restored to men and women, but could even continue to push against women – it is difficult to know what would happen in such a situation!
A sex war, fought in traditional warlike style, in which men showed up to fight in the same numbers as women, would undoubtedly result in male victory, owing to men’s physical strength and aptitude for technical mastery. A war fought in traditional style, then, would be a losing strategy for feminists. They must wage war in a different way, which necessarily involves the active denial that war is happening. But what about the very language of “the gender war”? Was this not born of feminist rhetoric? It was, indeed, but it belongs to that period of recent history before men were willing to stand up for themselves. Men began standing up to misandry at a critical point of feminist development – that point when explicit hatred reached an apex then quickly died down. The ‘third wave’ was born. Ostensibly a new version of feminism, the only real difference between the third and previous ‘waves’ is the level of rhetorical discipline. No more do we hear of a war against men (at least, not from the Earnest Feminists), and yet the war continues unabated. And when men react to the war against them, as though it is a war, they are informed that feminism is just about equality, and the act of fighting back against their persecutors makes them horrible misogynists.
After tearing apart entire cities and cultures, after having ground countless men down beneath their tank treads, the feminist army is confronted by one man who has picked up a rock, ready to throw it. Teary-eyed, her lower lip trembling, the batallion leader cries out, “stop being so hateful!”
The transition from second to third wave has not made feminism any less hostile or hateful. This was a superficial change, a rhetorical rejigging – the plastering of makeup onto the public face for public consumption. While the feminists of the second wave openly admitted to hating all men, modern day Earnest Feminists recognize certain categories of men who are not deserving of hatred – conjuring up exceptions to more easily maintain the general rule. Earnest Feminists are less likely to say “I hate men,” and are more likely to say “I only hate those men who are abusive or not active against abusive men.” Still, this is practically all men. Men who are neither abusive nor active against abusive men are the hated vast majority – the general rule. Of course, there are innumerable reasons why a man might not devote his time to being active against abusive men – he might not even have that free time, unlike your typical college feminist. We need not explore the reasons why a man would not be actively against abusive men. It suffices to say that he has no moral obligation to be, particularly since war has been declared on him, and the very people he is being called on to protect are those who wish to destroy him. It is pure female entitlement – Gynocentric privilege – to expect that men should act as their personal bodyguards. And those men who are active against abusive women are not admired for their contributions to humanity, of course – they are hated all the more for it.

Earnest Feminists are not necessarily conscious of their role as denialists. They do not need to be. They fulfil the role just as effectively when they believe themselves to be something else. It might be thought, then, that Earnest Feminists have been misguided, manipulated even, by the Radicals. But keep in mind that they are only as Earnest as they are Feminist. Yes, they are still feminists, and have not been 'tricked' into this identity. It is an identity freely chosen. The Earnest Feminist, remember, stands side by side with the Radical; the former too will Kafka-trap you, she will falsely accuse you, she will tar your sex with one broad stroke. The difference between Earnest and Radical Feminists can be summed up as follows: while the Radical openly encourages and celebrates the spreading of misandry, the Earnest Feminist trivializes, excuses and justifies it. Beyond this, there is no difference, and both seek to increase the power of women over that of men.

Without the Earnest Feminist's false demeanor of reasonableness, feminism would have made no progress. As counter-feminists, we must recognize that the appearance of reasonableness from anybody identifying as 'feminist' is a ruse. Behind the façade is ideological motive, not the capacity for compromise; the desire to dominate discussion, not to work towards collective solutions; anti-male emotionalism, not impartial rationality. One typical Earnest Feminist ploy is to cry "try to see things from my perspective" – implying fairness, neutrality, objectivity, and so on. And yet she has no intention of trying to see things from your perspective, because you are not a feminist, and non-feminist perspectives are by definition illegitimate. What she means is not "let's both try to see things from each others' perspectives," but "I'll see things from my perspective; you see things from my perspective too."

Earnest Feminists exercise a form of control that Radicals cannot, because the latter have abandoned all pretence to impartiality. For Earnest Feminists, this is only a pretence, because the ideology trumps all. Only a 'compromise' which fully adheres to feminist doctrine could be acceptable.

Of course, certain Earnest Feminists go further than this, and imply that they have already incorporated mens' perspectives into their programme: "feminism helps men too!" It's a fair bet that you'll never hear Radicals uttering such nonsense, because harming men is their conscious intention and one that they are open about. Still, the Earnest Feminists might genuinely believe that this is an accurate statement, as they are not necessarily conscious of the harmful effects that feminism necessarily has on men. But this does not make it sincere. A sincere approach to "helping men too" would involve actually asking men how they might best be helped, and then incorporating these answers into the agenda. Instead, Earnest Feminist practice involves telling men what will help them, without deeming it necessary to canvass any more than a handful of marginal pro-feminist males.

The feminist idea of "help" is rooted in Patriarchy Theory – that is, it is rooted in the same animosity towards men which is the cause of the problems that a sizable number of men actually identify as problems. To put it another way, the cure is just more of the disease. Given that feminists fundamentally cannot accept the culpability of their own movement in causing or contributing towards anything negative, they will only ever locate the cause of men's problems in social phenomena which are not feminism. Feminism will not accept even the smallest share of the blame for the oppressive conditions it has brought directly into existence. Men's problems may only be traced back to men themselves, and hence to historical Patriarchy.
It is for this reason that, when Earnest Feminists claim that feminism "helps men too," you do not then see them lobbying against false rape accusations or for equal paternity rights. On the contrary, that kind of lobbying would damage feminist interests; men are of secondary concern, and may only be helped up from those problems that they have caused for themselves. Hence, the terrible tragedy of men not being allowed to wear dresses, even while women can comfortably walk around in pants, is infallibly the number one priority of an Earnest Feminist who sets out to "help men too." The fact that the overwhelming majority of men do not care about this issue and are not personally affected by it is irrelevant; it can be traced back to an impression of Patriarchy, and is also a good excuse to promote emasculation. Earnest Feminists, like Radicals, pathologize normal masculinity. They blame men for not wanting to wear dresses; i.e. they blame men for not having the problems that they tell us we should have. It is, so they say, male-enforced social conditioning that makes men "afraid" of appearing feminine. All evidence suggests that the vast majority of men have greater problems than this, and do not live in fear of appearing feminine. But that's what fits the feminist narrative.
The notion that feminism is helping to "liberate both sexes from rigid gender roles" is particularly laughable, considering that feminism is entirely dependent upon men being forced to retain their traditional role of protector and provider. That has been covered elsewhere.
When men do attempt to raise their own concerns, feminists refuse to recognize them. They victim-blame – e.g. "men are responsible for their own problems" – and attempt to shift discussion back to what they think our problems should be. In effect, men are denied the right to decide what their own problems are. Our real problem, Earnest Feminists earnestly explain, is that we are just too male. Despite what we may claim our problems are – that maleness is increasingly curtailed, that maleness is pathologized, that maleness has become grounds for acceptable discrimination – the feminist response is that maleness actually is pathological and needs to be curtailed even further.
How is it that feminism "helps men," by ascribing negative attributes to maleness? Tell me, was anybody ever helped by others ascribing negative attributes to him? Or would you say that this harms him? Feminism "helps men" by encouraging them to stop being men; to renounce their nature; to hate themselves; to believe that their sexuality is inherently flawed and a force for evil. What help this is!
Here's a fun little juxtaposition:

> "What it boils down to is this: Men, not women, need to be the ones creating the spaces to discuss men's issues."
> Quote from finallyfeminism101 weblog

[youtube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qodygTkTUYM&w=420&h=315](Video: Feminists Disrupt a Forum About Battered Husbands)

Get the picture? It's a game that law enforcement have been playing for decades. The 'good cop' is reasonable, even sympathetic, though of course, he insists that the responsibility for your crime rests entirely with you. The 'bad cop' will just scream at you until you give yourself up. And when you finally do just give up, because you've been ground down, you mutter your complaints, and the good cops over at finallyfeminism101 will remind you of what they said all along: that you need to be the one taking responsibility for discussing your own issues. See how that works? It's not their fault. It's yours.
Yes, Earnest Feminists have supported Radical proposals every step of the way – whether this involves denying men paternity rights, or creating rape shield laws to deny exculpatory evidence and more efficiently lock up innocent men, or diverting stimulus packages from men hit by recession to women who had not even lost their jobs. The only level at which Earnest Feminists disagree significantly with Radicals is the rhetorical. A Radical might say "kill all men," and an Earnest Feminist might say "I don't agree with that," but she will go ahead and advocate that the healthcare gap be increased further, with the full knowledge that men continue to die earlier and suffer worse health overall.

Earnest Feminists distance themselves from the extremist rhetoric of the Radicals, but this is just how the dialectic works – you reach the goal slowly, bit by bit, by getting the other side to compromise with your moderate wing. Earnest Feminists are the good cops – the ones you want to strike a deal with before those nasty bad cops get back. What's often missed is that they are all cops. Compromise with the moderate Earnest Feminists on one issue, and the centre ground shifts: now the deal you struck is taken for granted, and the radical fantasy is a step closer. What do Earnest Feminists do then? Rest on their laurels, content with the compromise they reached? No, they see the opportunity to get even more for women, and so they advocate for more. A compromise is reached again, and the centre ground shifts further towards radicalism.

Fortunately, I know of a way to break a dialectic, and that is to plant your feet firmly in the ground and refuse to budge an inch. Absolutely refuse to compromise on any issue. It's as simple as that. Just keep in mind that behind the veneer of reasonableness is ideological motive, which will shift reality closer to the radical fantasy in which you are actively persecuted. If you can keep that in mind, it becomes very easy to refuse even the slightest compromise with a feminist.

Ultimately, feminists should be ignored. There is no use attempting to debate them, because their ideological motive trumps the possibility of admitting wrongness. Remember that feminist ideology is adopted in order to satiate violent, vindictive emotions, not as a result of logical thought. Those we should make an effort to appeal to are non-feminists, but they are not counter-feminists. That is, they are not yet activated in the struggle against feminism. One could split people up into three categories as follows:

- Revolutionaries (counter-feminists)
- Reactionaries (feminists)
- Civilians (non-feminists)

The goal, then, is to recruit civilians to the counter-feminist side before the feminist camp gets to them. Given the rapid and exponential growth of the Men's Rights Movement, we are clearly already enjoying success in this regard.

Boko Haram: Bring back our boys

The following video by HumanityBites talks about the large-scale murder of Nigerian boys and men by Boko Haram, and which our media and politicians fail to address whilst they simultaneously fall over themselves to take action over the kidnap of girls. It appears that the Western world can think of the Nigerian girls as “Our Girls” but is unable to think of the brutally massacred boys as “Our Boys”.

AVfM Video Source · 7 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Toronto Domestic Violence Symposium is still running today and tomorrow. Erin and others will also be speaking there today so it's still not too late if you're in the area to see Erin, Anne Cools, Martin Fiebert, Walter Fox, and many others. Here's Erin's speech from yesterday. Once again, she'll be speaking again today.

The Symposium is well worth attending, if you can. Ideological feminists are, of course, nowhere to be found. Compassion and facts are not things they're interested in.
That Symposium is still under attack and in need of help, by the way.

Men shouldn't marry

Mike Buchanan · 7 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

J4MB has launched a new campaign Men shouldn't marry. The following introductory piece from our website explains why such a campaign is required, and takes up the rest of this blog piece. – MB

Welcome to a website run by the political party Justice for men & boys (and the women who love them). We campaign against the state's many assaults on the human rights and interests of men and boys.

Our public consultation document outlines 20 areas in which those rights have long been assaulted – there are no areas in which the state assaults the rights of women and girls. The single area in which the largest number of men have been assaulted is in the divorce courts and family law system.

J4MB considers marriage and the nuclear family to be cornerstones of a civilised society. However, for decade after decade, successive governments have undermined the institutions. Over half of the marriages entered into today will end in divorce. The median duration of a marriage now is 11 years, i.e. 50% of marriages will last no longer than that, and many will last for much shorter periods.

Let's consider the issue of risk for a moment.

Imagine a group of ten men, most of them in their 20s or 30s, in a plane. They're all wearing parachutes, and they're about to jump out of the plane at 10,000 feet, to carry out the first and possibly only parachute jumps of their lives, to raise money for charity.

With less than a minute to go before the first of the men will jump, a panel in the side of the plane opens, and the men are just a few feet away from where they'll shortly be exiting the plane. Suddenly, the voice of the pilot is heard by the men through their helmets:

> I have some news for you. The parachute manufacturer has just warned us of a design fault with the parachutes. About half of them won't open when you pull the ripcord, and if this happens in your case, you'll fall to a certain death.

The men aren't troubled by this information, and duly jump out of the plane. Five land safely, five plummet to their deaths. Given the divorce rate over recent decades, men who marry can be likened to these men, blithely ignoring the risks implicit in their decisions.

In some estates in Britain today, 75% of children are raised by single mothers. British men pay 72% of the income tax collected each year, women only 28%. So it's overwhelmingly men who support single mothers. The state incentivises women to replace reliance on men as partners, with reliance on men as taxpayers. The state has been ever more hostile towards the nuclear family, towards men in general (and married men in particular) over the past 30+ years. The radical feminist Germaine Greer said the following in the early 1970s:

> Women's liberation, if it abolishes the patriarchal family, will abolish a necessary substructure of the authoritarian state, and once that withers away Marx will have come true willy-nilly, so let's get on with it.

Women have little incentive to make their marriages work. Men usually bring more financial resources than women to marriages, and typically earn considerably more during the course of them, so when women decide to end their marriages, they often personally stand to gain financially. It's just one of the reasons 75% of divorce applications are filed by women.

The prime casualties of failed marriages are children. 24% of children in Britain today have no contact with their biological fathers, which leads many of them to become dysfunctional, and causes them and others untold misery. The family courts system rarely enforces contact orders, thereby enabling vindictive women to continue denying their children contact with their fathers, grandparents, and others. We consider this extreme emotional abuse of children and all these other people, yet the state enables it. Fathers are forced by the state to continue paying for the support of children who the state ensures they may never see again.

The state gives wives considerable power over husbands on their wedding days, by giving them the prospect of highly preferential treatment in divorce settlements. It's as if the state gives wives loaded guns to use at any point during their marriages, however well they're treated by their husbands. This is toxic for marriage. Our downloadable poster illustrates the point.

Even if you bring most of the financial resources into your marriage, and earn much more than your wife during it, you'll probably find your financial position devastated by divorce, and you'll have to start rebuilding your wealth from a low base, possibly at a stage in your life when that will be very difficult, if not impossible.

It's time to block the beginning of the pipeline of misery which ends in the divorce courts and the family law system. Put simply, if men don't marry, they won't divorce, and they won't suffer any of the grave consequences of divorce.

The solution for the men in the plane was simple. They shouldn't have jumped. The solution for men who are considering getting married is simple. They shouldn't marry, at least not until and unless such time that marriage becomes far less risky for men. There's no sign that will happen in the foreseeable future.

If you're determined to marry anyway, and you'll be bringing more financial resources into the marriage and/or expect to be earning more money during it, you should agree with your partner a prenuptial agreement ('prenup'). [Disclaimer: Nobody associated with this campaign, including Mike Buchanan, has specialist legal expertise in this area. Accordingly they cannot be held responsible for any decisions you may or not make, and you are advised to seek expert legal advice.]

While prenups are not currently legally binding in England and Wales, the consensus among experts in this area appears to be that if they're fairly drawn up by a competent legal expert, the divorce courts will probably recognise them. At the very least, you'll be improving your prospects of a fairer divorce settlement, given your financial contribution to the marital assets. Advice on prenups as well as postnups (postnuptial agreements) is available from a number of law firms, some of which will provide initial advice free of charge. There's some useful background information on the website of this law firm.

What if your partner won't agree to a prenup? It's simple.

> Don't marry her.

Don't listen to any nonsense about prenups being unreasonable or unromantic. Explain that all couples marry with the hope that their marriage will last until one of the partners dies, but 50% of them find their hopes dashed.

Quite apart from risk issues associated with how the divorce and family law systems work, is there anything you can do to establish the likelihood that your marriage will be a success? My book The Marriage Delusion: the fraud of the rings? was published in 2009. In the course of my extensive research I encountered a book which I felt gave sound advice about 'individual traits' and 'couple traits', and how they impacted on the prospects of individual marriages being successful. The book includes some excellent questionnaires. It was written by Jeffry Larson, and it has the snappy title Should We Stay Together? A Scientifically Proven Method for Enhancing Your Relationship and Improving its Chances for Long-Term Success. Buying the book might spare you from marrying a woman you shouldn't, and spare you the enormous emotional and financial turmoil of a failed marriage.

A feminist professor says there's nothing particularly wrong with the conference in Detroit. That's because there isn't? So why, again, are thugs trying to shut us down?

Oh, right, because 3 years ago Paul Elam wrote some satire some people didn't like.

10 Misconceptions about the Men's Rights Movement

Josh O'Brien · 8 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Continuously ignored by the mainstream, hundreds more men and boys are killed by Boko Haram. What's the excuse now?

Jonathan Taylor · 8 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

CNN has a new report for us about the recent activity of Boko Haram:

> Hundreds of people were killed in raids by Boko Haram Islamic militants in northeast Nigeria's Borno state, on the border with Cameroon, with some sources putting the death toll at 400 to 500. On Tuesday, heavily armed men dressed as soldiers in all-terrain vehicles and on motorcycles attacked neighboring Goshe, Attagara, Agapalwa and Aganjara villages in Gwoza district, shooting residents to death and burning homes.
> The attacks forced surviving villagers to flee to Cameroon and into the Mandara Mountains on the border. 'The killings are massive. Nobody can say how many people were killed, but the figure runs into some hundreds,' said Peter Biye, a lawmaker in Nigeria's lower parliament representing the Gwoza region.

Don't be fooled by gender-neutral words like "people." As the article continues to say (which is not said in the CNN television broadcast, which you can view above):

> The attackers, who posed as soldiers, told residents they had come to protect them from Boko Haram and asked them to assemble. They singled out men and boys and opened fire on them, Biye said.
> A local leader in Attagara village, who fled to nearby Madagali town in neighboring Adamawa state, said the death toll was staggering. 'The death is unimaginable. We have lost between 400 and 500 people in the attacks in which men and male children were not spared,' said the local leader, who asked not to be named for security reasons.
> The gunmen pursued on motorcycle people who fled into the bush in a bid to escape and shot them dead. Even nursing mothers had their male infants snatched from their backs and shot dead before their eyes,' the local leader said.

This isn't anything new with Boko Haram, either; back in March of this year I wrote an article that was largely ignored about their singling out and killing of boys in attacks on Nigerian schools. I drew this from reports from news sources that were similarly ignored by the public at large.

In early May the news that Boko Haram had kidnapped 200+ girls, however, catapulted "social justice" warriors into cataclysmic outrage, as I documented here. Politicians like Biden and Obama grandstanded (grandstood?) on the issue and pledged military intervention. Twitter and Facebook "activism" went ablaze, and the mainstream media reported on the girls day in and day out.

The killing of the boys was not just ignored during the outrage, but dismissed. Why?

Many rationalized that no matter how many boys had been killed in the past, the fact is that we can't do anything for them because they were dead, whereas we can still "bring back our girls." My counterargument was that by remembering they are boys and making them a part of the conversation we can potentially save boys who might be killed in the future.

Well, now it's the future. Now more men and boys – hundreds, in fact – have been killed. Far more than the girls who have been abducted. To those "principled dissenters" I have only this to say – what's your excuse now?

The deeper problem, of course, is that when it comes to men and boys there's always an excuse. Just like the 30+ years of men's and boys' academic underachievement that has been ignored by education "experts" – with every excuse given in the book – we don't have reasons.

We have rationalizations.

Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation prepares to fund one sided DV Survey in India

Anil Kumar · 8 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

(YouTube Video of wife beating husband)
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=juqGSTEmSLw
This simple video shows Sanjay Mahajan (name changed), an educated young man in the city of Mumbai, India being beaten by his wife, while his son is seen alternately sleeping and observing the abuse from the couch. When I met him in 2009, he handed me a compact disk containing video of several hours of abuse by his wife. Motivated by scenes like this, I will be travelling to the International Men's Issues Conference in Detroit to highlight plight of thousands of Indian men like Sanjay Mahajan.
If global feminists, Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation and USAID have their way, men like Sanjay will continue to be denied protection from domestic violence in India. Yes you heard it correctly. And unfortunately it's American feminists who have created this situation in India.
Am I being too hasty in making allegations against credible organizations – those which outwardly seem to believe in compassion, love and sympathy for all human beings? Let us look at the facts.
USAID funds lobbies for enactment of Second Domestic Violence Act in India
What is USAID? United States Agency for International Development (USAID) is the charity arm of US State Department. In 2003-2004, USAID funded Indian feminist collective called "Women Power Connect" for lobbying for a second domestic violence act (link).
India already had a domestic violence act called "Section 498a" or the law to protect women from cruelty by husband and his relative and it was enacted in 1983. Needless to say, the feminists in India and the world convinced USAID and the Indian Government to exclude men from any protection while lobbying for a second domestic violence law.
The second domestic violence law of India is named "Protection of Women from Domestic Violence Act" (PWDVA) and it was drafted by Indira Jaisingh, a lawyer of Supreme Court of India and an elected member of United Nations CEDAW (link).
Feminists have opposed protection for men from domestic violence in United States for a long time. Now, a few of them at least in media are acknowledging that DV on so called privileged white men in US is also an issue. However, the same feminist leaders are fighting hard to deny men protection from DV in developing and third world countries.
In short, feminists are promoting violence against men in third world countries.
Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation funds India's Domestic Violence Survey
Since 1992, the Indian Government has conducted a nationwide survey on Family Health covering more than 100,000 people in every 5 to 7 years. The last National Family Health Survey (NFHS-3) was conducted in 2005 and, due to pressure from USAID and feminists, a comprehensive survey on domestic violence was also included. This survey deliberately excluded male victims of domestic violence (PDF link page 493 or chapter 15) .
The manipulation is evident from this question to women on spousal violence. Men were not even asked, if they faced domestic violence (page 520).

> To measure spousal violence by women, NFHS-3 asked ever-married women, Have you ever hit, slapped, kicked, or done anything else to physically hurt your (last) husband/partner at times when he was not already beating or physically hurting you?

The results of this survey were widely quoted and used to lobby for India's 2nd Domestic Violence act for "only women".
The latest Survey (NFHS-4) is planned to be conducted in 2014. Interestingly, though Indian Govt has plenty of money, this survey is funded and its methodology is controlled by Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, USAID, UNICEF, UNFPA and other global feminist agencies. They all enjoy excluding men from the Survey itself.

http://www.rchiips.org/nfhs/

> The National Family Health Survey (NFHS) is a large-scale, multi-round survey conducted in a representative sample of households throughout India. Three rounds of the survey have been conducted since the first survey in 1992-93. Technical assistance for the NFHS was provided mainly by ORC Macro (USA) and other organizations on specific issues. The funding for different rounds of NFHS has been provided by USAID, DFID, the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, UNICEF, UNFPA, and MOHFW, GOI.

Indian Men's Rights Activists have been very vocal about this blatant denial of fundamental rights to men like Sanjay Mahajan and they have written to these organizations involved asking them to include men for the survey on domestic violence.

Feminists' Position on Protection of Men from Domestic Violence

It is clear that influential feminists are waging an undeclared global war on men and have been openly lobbying to deny men any protection from domestic violence in third world countries. Every year, hundreds of feminists from United States travel to India to work closely with their feminist sisters there.

Is it not hatred, by people who work to deny men protection from domestic violence? Does not that make feminists a hate group?

Interestingly, men's rights activists highlighting these anti-social activities promoting hatred and discrimination are painted as hate mongering idiots. The western media to some extent has joined them without trying to find out the facts – and in the process it has worked to discredit itself.

No doubt, there are some men who being frustrated at being denied protection from domestic violence, being denied shared parenting, or being falsely implicated in rape cases are angrily lashing against feminists and perhaps at women in online forums. Is there no basis for their anger?

Is asking for basic human rights of men the same as trying to protect male privileges and patriarchy? Does Sanjay Mahajan in the video above seem like a man with privilege? His own son was there on the couch as his wife was hitting him.

I would request all readers to be sympathetic to male victims of domestic violence in India and write to Bill and Melinda Gates foundation, requesting them not to exclude these victims from the nationwide domestic violence survey. If men are denied their human rights, men in India will not mind protesting peacefully outside offices of Microsoft in various locations in India.

Detroit has a Problem — Sign This Petition to Help Fix it

Paul Elam · 8 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

First they ignore you, then they laugh at you, then they fight you……

As recent history would lead us to fully expect, radical gender ideologues have made it their mission to silence our efforts to address issues affecting boys and men in Detroit at AVFM's First International Conference on Men's Issues scheduled for the end of June. And by "us" I mean a unique, diverse and eminently qualified line up of experts on gender issues, including those affecting men and boys.

We have a former National Organization for Women chairperson and two groundbreaking women who founded the international women's shelter movement in two countries. One of them is the first black female to take office as a senator in North America. Also speaking will be psychotherapists, psychologists, attorneys, academicians and dedicated advocates from the United States, Canada, Great Britain, Australia and India. We have concerned attendees coming from around the globe to hear vitally important messages about their sons, brothers, fathers, husbands and other men they love.

It seems unthinkable that this petition is actually necessary. Who would have imagined that in 2014 we would have to petition a city, especially one so steeped in the historic struggle for civil rights, to demand that we be allowed to stand publicly and speak to issues like suicide, homelessness, corruption, incarceration, the welfare of children and the state of education?

Yet that is exactly what is happening.

We are calling on the city of Detroit to take note. Radical feminists have corrupted the idea of gender equity. They have transformed it into a Marxist agenda of oppressive control, including the silencing of all opposing views.

You are seeing this play out on the streets of your city right now.

We are asking people across the world to sign this petition. Even if there is not a single boy or man in your life, please help us help boys and men and help us preserve the tradition of basic civil liberties.

Tell Detroit this is unacceptable.

PLEASE SIGN THE PETITION TO THE CITY OF DETROIT HERE.

Boko Haram Gendercide: A Vote Of No Confidence In The United Nations

Isaac T. Quill · 9 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

From The Outset, I Propose that AVfM at the Detroit conference take a vote of no confidence in The United Nations due to the Institutionalised Gender Bias and Institutional Sexism that has been known for many years and which The United Nations have failed to address. In parallel, AVfM should call for censure of Ban Ki-moon as Secretary General for the failures since appointed 01 Jan 2007.
The failures of national governments, other governments (USA, UK, Europe, The Whole Of Africa) and transnational organisations such as The United Nations is simply yet another example of Institutional Misandry and the politicisation of male disposability.
The United Nations has made boys and men vanish in their internal paperwork – just as they did for decades over sexual assault (See AVfM Wiki – Misandry In International Law). When you look at the latests publications from the UN Security Council dated 22 May 2014 the invisibility of male victims is clear.

> SECURITY COUNCIL AL-QAIDA SANCTIONS COMMITTEE ADDS BOKO HARAM TO ITS SANCTIONS LIST
> Boko Haram is responsible for a series of major terrorist attacks, including a wave of bombings in Kano, Nigeria in January 2012 that killed more than 180 people in a single day. Another major attack was the August 26, 2011 bomb attack on the United Nations headquarters in Abuja that killed at least 21 people and wounded scores more. The group was also responsible for the December 25, 2011 attack on the Saint Theresa Catholic Church in Madalla, Nigeria, that killed at least 37 and wounded approximately 50
> Since summer 2012 Boko Haram has undertaken a campaign of violence against Nigerian schools and students. In June 2013, the group attacked schools in Maiduguri and Damaturu, Nigeria, killing at least 22* children; in July, an attack on a school in the village of Mamudo, Nigeria killed at least 42* people, most of them students. On September 29, 2013 Boko Haram attacked an agricultural school in Yobe, Nigeria, shooting dead 50* students in their dormitory as they slept.
> On April 14, 2014, Boko Haram abducted approximately 300 girls from a school in northern Nigeria. Abubakar Shekau claimed responsibility for the attack in a video released by Boko Haram and threatened to sell the girls into slavery. Boko Haram militants subsequently attacked a staging base for rescuers on May 5, 2014, killing an additional 310 people.
> Security Council – SC/11410 > * indicates exclusively male victim – Gender-based Violence .

Gendercide is gender-selective mass killing. The term was first used by Mary Anne Warren in her 1985 book, Gendercide: The Implications of Sex Selection. Gendercide, the ultimate for of gender-related violence.
There has been the social meme and idiom of long standing that rape should be viewed as “A fate worse than death”. It is possible to recover from rape and many other traumas, but from death there is no recovery and likening rape to death on gendered lines is sexism and manifest gendered bias.
Boko Haram have been an emergent issue in Nigeria since 1995 – with media attention occurring in 2002. The United Nations Itself have been targeted by Boko Haram – 2011 Abuja United Nations bombing, in which 21 died and over 60 were injured. One would expect the United Nations to have been interested in the safety of their own employees and agents and interested in fully grasping the nature of such a threat. Ban Ki-moon described the attack as an “assault on those who devote themselves to helping others”.
The gendered nature of the violence and deaths is ignored and the fact that the dead victims were male is simply brushed over. Gendercide is tacitly accepted as the price of doing business, provided the dead are all male.
The UN is clear – men and boys are less valuable than girls and women – male are less noteworthy and gendered violence against males is not to be treated as significant.

This shows that the UN fails to meet its own mandates under the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which reads:

> Article 2.
> Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status. Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty.
> Article 3.
> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.
> Article 7.
> All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

The abject, deliberate and institutional failures of the United Nations from Ban Ki-moon as Secretary General through the Security Council (China, France, Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, and the United States, Argentina, Australia, Chad, Chile, Jordan, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Nigeria, Republic of Korea, Rwanda) to even address the gendered nature of the Boko Haram Violence brings the whole United Nations into disrepute.
If you search Google and other search providers for references to Gender-based Violence and the United Nations every returned result is for violence against women. There is a complete negation of even the possibility that men can be subjected to violence along gendered lines and simply because they are male.
Of most concern is the following UN Policy Document is Ignored and not addressed:

> WORKING WITH MEN AND BOY SURVIVORS OF SEXUAL AND GENDER-BASED VIOLENCE IN FORCED DISPLACEMENT
> (2012) United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees – Source

The document commits The UN and all partners to addressing Gender-Based Violence against boys and men, and yet it seems that someone forget to send out the memo from UNHCR Geneva to the rest of The United Nations.
Gender-based violence (GBV) is a term used to describe any harmful act that is perpetrated against a person's will, and that is based on socially ascribed differences between males and females. The Violence of murder based upon being solely male is the most extreme form of Gender-based violence and yet this extreme violence is unrecognised and un-commented upon.
However the United Nations have rejected the term Gender-based violence (GBV) and use The term Sexual and gender-based violence (SGBV), saying:

> "Sexual and gender-based violence (SGBV)1is a particularly disturbing phenomenon which exists in all regions of the world. The term refers to any harmfulact that is perpetratedagainst one person's will and that is based on socially ascribed(gender) differences between males and females.It includes acts that inflict physical, mental, or sexual harm or suffering, threats of such acts, coercion and other deprivations of liberty,whether occurring in public or in private life."
> Action against Sexual and Gender-Based Violence. 2011

The constant linking of gender-based violence to sexual violence causes perception to be skewed in only seeing the female victim and never the male, even when he has suffered sexual violence and rape
It is most odd that internally the United Nations should create and maintain this link when Authorities advising globally do the opposite:

> What is gender violence?
> Gender violence is violence that is targeted at women or men because of their sex and/or their socially constructed gender roles. Gender violence disproportionately affects the members of one sex more than another. The recent conflicts in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda have seen many examples of gender violence. Examples include: the forcible recruitment of young boys into the army who are put through violent indoctrination, and then made to perform suicidal missions in order to prove their masculinity; and the killing of pregnant women by the slashing of their wombs and removal of their fetuses.
> What is the difference between gender violence and sexual violence?
> Sexual violence is violence which includes a sexual element, such as rape, enforced prostitution, sexual slavery, or sexual mutilation. Gender violence is usually manifested in a form of sexual violence, but can also include non-sexual physical or psychological attacks on women, men or children, as in the examples above.
> The Women's Initiatives for Gender Justice – the International Criminal Court (ICC)

It has to be asked why the United Nations in its practices, policies and publications still fails to work with the rest of the world, with academics and institutions set up by the UN – such as The International Criminal Court – why is the UN out of step with international Human Rights and ignoring gendercide, the ultimate gender-based violence when the victims are boys and men?
This is the same pattern of Institutional Fail articulated by Lara Stemple in her 2009 paper "Male Rape and Human Rights" in which she observes:

> I show that numerous instruments in the human rights canon, including U.N. treaties, resolutions, consensus documents, and general comments address sexual violence while explicitly excluding male victims. I argue that the female-specific approach is best understood in the political context in which these instruments were developed:
> Source

That same negation is all too evident in SC/11410, May 2014.
The negation of the male is Political and not simply institutional failure – it is a product of decades of promoting gender bias within the United Nations, and the results have now become embedded in society, media and mainstream politics – The Disposable Male is here and global, and it's time for boys and men to be recognised as victims and named as such when gender-based violence, especially gendercide occurs.
All institutions and governments which fail to address the reality of this gendered violence should be called out as in disrepute and where possible also called to account under the internal laws of each country and under any treaties or legal instruments that exist.
A vote of no confidence in The United Nations and public censure of secretary Ban Ki-moon should be recorded, and on each occasion that The UN again ignores gendercide and gender-related violence it should be brought back for public consideration, attention and calls for action.
Authors Note: as of time of writing (08 June 2014) the only news coverage located by search engine which featured "Boko Haram" and the term Gendercide was from Live Action News (MAY 30, 2014) – NIGERIAN LEADERS PLAN ABORTIONS FOR BOKO HARAM VICTIMS; NO OTHER ALTERNATIVES DISCUSSED. The article makes the following claim;

> "The Boko Haram tragedy has drawn attention to the plight of women on a global level. Human trafficking, sex slavery, gendercide, female infanticide and abandonment — they are all real and thriving occurrences on an international level. The need for real feminist voices (like Malala Yousafzai's) is as imminent today as it was during suffrage and the misogynistic antics of yesteryear."

This incorrectly co-opts the term gendercide implying that it relates to the kidnapped girls and removes focus from the actual victims who are all male. Co-opting language and denying of reality has growing recognition as The Misandric Antics Of Today.

#MenArePeopleToo

Shawn Edwards · 9 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As much as I am happy to see the international community paying attention to the problem of Islamic fundamentalism and terrorism in Nigeria, I can't help but notice the widespread hypocrisy and double standard of the mainstream media in reaction to the kidnapping of 234 female students by Boko Haram. Let us review the facts. Here is a list of recent massacres by Boko Haram in Nigeria:
(1) 6 July 2013: Boko Haram militants attacked Yobe State school dormitory and killed 42 people, all male, most of them teenage boys staying at the residential school. Some victims were burned alive [1] [2].
(2) 29 September 2013: Boko Haram attacked the College of Agriculture in Nigeria. Only the male sleeping quarters were targeted: "[The terrorists] appeared to know the layout of the college, attacking the four male hostels but avoiding the one hostel reserved for women". 40 school boys were killed [3].
(3) 16 February 2014: Boko Haram attacked the Christian village of Izghe. They went door to door and forced the men in the village to gather, then they hacked and shot them to death. Women were let go out of the village. 105 men and 1 elderly woman were killed. She was a brave grandmother who was trying to protect her grandson [4].
(4) 25 February 2014: Boko Haram militants barged into the Federal Government College of Buni Yadi in Yobe State. They threw explosives into dorm rooms as they sprayed the rooms with gunfire. According to an eye-witness "students were trying to climb out of the windows and they were slaughtered like sheep by the terrorists who slit their throats. Others who ran were gunned down." All 24 buildings were burnt to the ground during the attack. 59 students, all males, were killed in the attack. Some died from gunshots or knife wounds, while others were burned to death [5] [6].
(5) 14 April 2014: Boko Haram attacked the government girls-only Secondary School in the town of Chibok in Borno State, Nigeria. Approximately 234 female students were kidnapped [7]. Most students were Christians. A video footage of them was later released showing them as converted to Islam, saying Muslim prayers and reciting verses from Quran. The search for girls is still ongoing. [8]
Overall, the insurgency led by Boko Haram has killed some 2,000 people since 2009, majority of them men and boys.
With a tiny degree of oversimplification, I can summarize the reaction of the international community to massacres (1) to (4) as: "who gives a shit?" That must have been particularly disappointing for the terrorists, i.e. Boko Haram! Terrorists usually know that they cannot murder all or majority of the citizens, neither can they shut down all the schools. Therefore, they pursue the goal of terrorizing people by making headlines through violent acts (hence the term terrorism). The most depressed terrorist is the one who carries out a massacre that nobody cares or talks about. Terrorists hate to kill or be killed in vain…
Then came the kidnapping of the school girls (5) and the whole world reacted to it in a frenzy and panic, of course mostly with empty talk and "progressive" gestures, but no tangible plan to rescue the poor girls. I am sure Boko Haram leaders have lost a lot of sleep over Michelle Obama and Hollywood celebrities tweeting pictures of themselves holding the "bring back our girls" signs. Here is a very brief list of celebrities (out of thousands of celebreties) posing with the sign: Michelle Obama, Adriana Lima, Cara Delevingne, Irina Shayk, Selma Hayek, Anne Hathaway, Ellen DeGeneres, Sylvester Stallone.
The mainstream media coverage of the issue has been superficially sentimental and pathetically dishonest. Most sound bites (or even full articles) barely mention the previous massacres by Boko Haram, nor do they provide enough history and background on this terrorist organization's ideology and atrocities. Even when they do mention the previous mass murders by Boko Haram, they mostly use sexless genderless phrases like "students" instead of boys, and "people" or "villagers" instead of men. However, whenever the victims are female, the whole story becomes about the victims' gender. Even when Boko Haram specifically targets their violence towards men (e.g. they collect and kill all the men in the village, but spare all the women), the victims are nothing but "people" or "villagers" in the news headline.
This whole story is a testament to how the society's indifference to men's suffering ultimately hurts everybody, both men and women. The terrorist militia wanted attention, so they started with slaughtering and burning alive hundreds of men and school boys. Nobody gave a fuck. After a few years of attempting, they had to (in their sick mind) "escalate" their atrocities to kidnapping innocent girls. Boko Haram's leaders had correctly predicted that the mainstream media (especially the Western media) would pay attention to them only when they start hurting women, and they were proved right.

It is plausible to think that the extra attention paid to the kidnapping incident in Nigeria is merely because the victims are still alive and can be potentially saved. Indeed I believe that this hypothesis might bear some truth. But, do you seriously think that if a terrorist group captured 200 boys and slaughtered thousands of girls, the headlines would be #bringbackourboys?

But, do you seriously think that if a terrorist group captured 200 boys and slaughtered thousands of girls, the headlines would be #bringbackourboys?

There are theories hypothesizing that some degree of "male disposability" and indifference or less sensitivity to men's suffering in the society might have evolutionary roots in our species [9]. But now that we no longer live in caves, isn't it time for us to transcend our deeply embedded but primitive evolutionary biases and realize that #MenArePeopleToo ?

Excuse Me, What Is So Wrong With Being Anti-Feminist?

Jack Goodfellow · 10 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

If you haven't seen Dean Esmay's interview on Fox 2 News Detroit, watch it. It's great and after you watch it about five times (you won't be able to help yourself), watch it again, only this time, turn off the volume. Watch the eyes. Watch the expressions. Note the subtle changes in body posture. Read the hateful tweets displayed at the bottom of the screen throughout.

There is so much going on in this interview. Many of the deeper issues at play here almost instantly come to the surface. For example, there is an obvious fundamental disregard, on the part of the two females, towards the very concept that men are equal to women. There's the rush towards shaming tactics. There's the drive to blame men as individuals for a legal system that has been gamed for decades by the feminist lobby.

There's one thing in particular that Dr. Heather Delaway, the feminist representative said, that bears particular scrutiny. It's simply incredible that she said it, kind of like Jack Nicholson's character in, 'A Few Good Men,' shouting, "You're goddamn right I gave that order!"

Her main argument for condemning the International Men's Conference, was, in her words:

"I think it's not the actual conference program that's the problem. If you look at the conference program, it's not an issue. It's all of the social media that's very anti-feminist, it's the messages that are begin sent by the group."

On the surface, from a certain point of view, that statement has some validity, because on the surface of our thoughts, the knee jerk, unprocessed, reactive side of thinking, Anti-Feminist = Anti-Women. To be Anti-Women is obviously sexist and to outright oppose the existence of more than half of the population of the planet is extreme at the least, insane at most. Right?

The problem is that Feminism does not equal Women. Feminism is a political movement. Even when Lollipop Feminists, the brand churned out by freshman gender studies classes the likes of which Dr. Delaway undoubtedly teach, exclaim, "Feminism just wants equality for men and women," it takes exactly one question to reveal the political nature of what is being said.

When you say equality, do you mean anything having to do with legislation, the courts or the manner in which government and the citizenry interact?

Lollipop feminist replies: No, we just want men and women to be treated equally…

How?

Well, there should be laws…

THAT'S POLITICS!!!!

And colleges should….

THAT'S POLITICS!!!!

And businesses should be made to pay women…

THAT'S POLITICS!!!!

If it involves a law, a college (most of which get all of their funding through loans for tuition made possible by government), the workplace, how rape is defined (you know, so that the legal definition makes it impossible for anyone other than a man to commit rape), the types of judges put on the bench in family courts, it's POLITICS.

Any large-scale group activity shy of open discourse that does not intend to change laws or public policy is a political matter and if it is a political matter, the core concept of a free democratic people is that every view can be expressed. You don't have to like them. You can shove your fingers in your ears and go, "LA LA LA LA LA!!!" But they still get to be said.

When this professor says that her problem with an International Men's Conference is that there are Anti-Feminist messages, that is no different from a Republican trying to shut down the Democratic National Convention because they are expressing Anti-Conservative messages. Of course they are!!!

And this is the problem. Feminists do not believe that they should have to explain themselves or argue their positions or even engage in the political game. They want no opposition, no counter point, no alternative views to their own, yet they still pursue the passage of laws that are directly aimed at giving women preference in the legal system, stripping men of their personal and parental rights and turning all men, legally, into second class citizens.

Watch Dean Esmay's interview and turn off the sound. This is what you see. In that professor's sideways glances, in the slump, in that cocky smile, in the way she almost always faces the other female in the conversation (the only other person there she feels it is necessary to speak with), the way she places her palms up, hands at chest level (body language to show this has become a personal plea), she shows that the argument is not about men's rights. At least not to her. She's amazed she even has to make an argument. What are these silly people thinking?
Her only argument, visible in body language throughout, explicitly in words towards the end, is that the man sitting next to her and all of the people that he was there to represent, have no right to engage in a political discussion that is contrary to the political position that she and other feminists have taken.
So when that Lollipop Feminist says, 'We just want equality,' how can this be taken seriously when feminists believe that (most) men are so far beneath them that they should not be permitted to gather and discuss their positions. They don't think you have a right to speak.
And she said it.
Good shit.
Addendum: There was a tweet below in the interview that read something like, "If men have any of those problems this man just listed that is a YOU PROBLEM, not a gender problem." To the person who sent that message or agrees with it, I beg you to attend the conference and find one man (there will be more than that there) who has had a family court give full custody of his children to his wife when he did absolutely nothing wrong. No domestic violence. He paid whatever she asked and still she did everything she could to poison the relationship he had with his children for no other reason than to punish him for not doing exactly what the professor in this video was outright expressing.
To certain women, men do not have a right to disagree with what they declare. The courts, by way of the feminist lobby, have been overtaken with this idea that if a man does not do what a woman wants, he should suffer, his children should suffer and to even disagree with this calls for instant shame that it is the failure of the man. The only failure that a man can have in this situation, the only, 'YOU PROBLEM,' that a man has in this situation is to NOT stand up and call this for what it is. If you don't like men, that's fine, but children have a right to a relationship with both parents even if a woman doesn't like it.

Inspiring Father's Day Stories

Real Dads

In order to widen my perspectives and earn a living I started ghostwriting privately published autobiographies for a fee. The tales below are true, although identities are disguised.

Two years before Castro took over Cuba, Faustino was twelve and returning on a flight to Havana from Miami where his dad took him on a shopping trip. Over the straights of Florida one of the airliner's four engines caught fire. After efforts to extinguish the flames remotely failed a steward announced the pilot decided to ditch the plane.

Recently Faustino told me, "I'll never forget the panic in his face. Some passengers began to scream as he told us to buckle our seatbelts, put on life vests, remove our shoes, and brace for the impact."

Despite the steward's attempt to stop him Faustino's dad disobeyed. He unbuckled his seatbelt and knelt in front of the boy where his body could act as a modern-day airbag. He told the child, "Once the plane stops, get out. Don't wait for me."

Fortunately when the airplane nearly reached sea level the flames went out. The plane was diverted to a Cuban military airbase instead of Havana's municipal airport. But at least the touchdown was with wheels on dry land.

The scariest episode of Faustino's life taught him that he was his dad's number one priority. Consequently, the boy resolved that he would never intentionally do anything to disgrace the family name. Thereafter Faustino took all of his dad's advice seriously because he knew – beyond a shadow of doubt – that his father always had Faustino's best interests at heart.

The boy's family escaped Castro's Cuba for Florida in the early 1960s. Like most refugees they had no money. Within weeks of arriving Faustino's dad held down three jobs. But nothing ranked higher in the dad's priority than the boy's education.

Earlier this year Faustino told me, "Even though I was only sixteen dad announced that I was to start electrical engineering college courses. I never questioned the decision. When I brought the University of Florida diploma home after four years, dad hung it on the wall of his home office where it remained until he died 35 years later."

As an adult Faustino left Florida and became prosperous in Silicon Valley where he worked with some of the era's legendary figures. Recently I asked how he could be comfortable taking risk on volatile start-up businesses.

Faustino said, "Although dad never explicitly told me that I could recover from failures, I felt instinctively that I could because of his example. Upon arriving in Florida dad possessed almost nothing, yet he made a good life for our family. Additionally, the unconditional family love left me feeling that even if I did fail, there was a parachute."

During most of his career Faustino lived 3,000 miles distant from his dad. Nonetheless, they talked on the phone almost every day. Typically his dad asked, "Are you okay? Do you need any money?"

Mary was two years old during the Great Depression when her mother gave the girl to the baby's aunt and uncle. The otherwise childless couple managed a hotel in a small Mississippi town not far from New Orleans. Although it seldom snowed that far south one winter when Mary was seven an icy blast brought freezing rain. It was a rare chance for the town's kids to slide around on the streets and sidewalks in their shoes. They called it ice-skating. Since auto and pedestrian traffic gradually ruined most of the ice as the day progressed, Mary and her friends looked for a spot uncorrupted by adults.

Mary volunteered the hotel's roof and led her friends up the fire escape. Soon a porter discovered the frolicking children. He ran into her uncle's office breathlessly describing the situation. Her uncle hurried up the fire escape, ordered Mary's friends home, and took the girl to his office.
Reminiscing 75 years later Mary said, "I don't ever recall dad being so angry. I was never so ashamed."
I asked, "Did your uncle spank you?"
After jerking her face upward a bit and dropping her jaw, Mary began gently shaking her head: "My dad never laid a hand on me. The shame I felt was bad enough. I could not endure his disapproval. That's all it took to make me behave."
As an adult Mary moved to Florida and raised a family with her only husband. Presently the eighty-something widow teaches a college art class. She always refers to her uncle as her dad.

For nearly a century strawberries have been a big crop in the west central part of Florida's peninsula. Until the 1970s fresh berries were customarily shipped by railroad to major markets such as New York and Chicago. Since the berries were perishable it was best to ship them quickly after picking. At harvest time shippers bought the fruit at auctions located near rail-side packing plants.

Owing to its perishability, buyers had to monitor a number of variables affecting the fruit's value at destination. Among the biggest problems was freeze damage resulting from infrequent winter blasts into central Florida. Freeze damaged berries began to rot as they rode the rails northward.

During the 1920s and 30s Roger Foster's dad sold fresh fruits in New York, originally from a pushcart. After the business grew big enough to operate a company-owned packing plant the family moved to Florida, while business partners managed the New York operation. Thereafter, Roger worked with his dad and brother at the Florida plant.

Sometime during the late 1940s a freeze stretched down into central Florida on a Thursday night. On Friday morning Roger's dad told him to buy all the strawberries he could get at auction for 12-cents a pint. Although Roger was puzzled about why his dad wanted to buy damaged fruit, he began the morning auction by purchasing berries at the specified price. Soon, however, Roger questioned his dad's judgment and phoned the office.

"Dad, I don't need to be paying 12-cents a pint. There are almost no other buyers. I can get all the berries we want at 8-cents a pint."

"That's okay. Just pay 12-cents like I said."

Shaking his head, Roger returned to the auction and complied. But after another hour or so he phoned a second time.

"Dad, 12-cents a pint is too much. I can probably get all we want at 6-cents a pint."
"Don't worry son. Stay at 12-cents, like I said."

By the end of the auction Roger had purchased an entire railcar-load of berries, which was shipped to New York that afternoon. The next auction was the following Monday. Due to Friday's unusual bidding, on Monday morning Roger asked his dad for instructions on the new day's auction.

"Just go through the motions of participating. Don't buy anything. Merely pretend to be competing."

With knitted eyebrows Roger asked, "Why dad? Why did you have me pay 12-cents a pint on Friday but only want me to pretend to be buyer on today?"

"Our Friday shipment sold well in New York because there were few other supplies available. When today's shipment arrives in the city, New Yorkers will have already tasted the freeze-damaged goods we shipped on Friday. They won't buy anymore berries for a while."

Roger and his dad passed away years ago, but Roger's son, Gary, presently runs the $100 million business.

Ed Sanders grew up in the 1930s and 40s on his dad's north Florida turpentine farm. Since nearly all the workers were African-American, Ed's first friend was a black boy the same age. Although named Joshua, Ed called him Cousin. If there had been a nearby river the boys would have been 20th century salt-and-pepper versions of Tom Sawyer and Huck Finn.

Since wild animals were abundant in Florida woods, Ed's dad wore a holstered pistol. Sometimes the boys used their dog to distract snakes as they sneaked-up behind the reptiles to behead them with sticks. They carried the decapitated bodies home like a couple of cats proudly dragging along assorted victims.

Ed was five years old when one of the turpentine workers got in a fight with a white man at a nearby town. Ed's dad took his employee to a hospital. That night the KKK arrived in Ed's front yard and torched a small cross. Ed's dad stepped onto the porch with an unloaded shotgun and a box of shells. He listened to the Klan complaints long enough to identify the leaders.

Suddenly he loaded the shotgun, snapped it shut, and announced, "We're done talking." Pointing to the ringleader he said, "I've got two shells in this gun. The first is for you." Facing to the leader's sidekick he added, "and the second one is for you." Nodding to his holstered pistol he concluded, "If any more of you want trouble I've got my six-shooter." After a moment that seemed like an hour to Ed the group dispersed.

Later that year Ed and Joshua were waiting with Ed's dad at a bus stop to attend their first day of school in the first grade. When the bus door opened Ed's dad motioned for him to go aboard. The boy turned to Joshua and said, "Come on Cousin, let's go."

Ed's dad interrupted, "Cousin's not going."

After a pause, Ed started to back down the steps saying, "Well, if Cousin's not going, I'm not going."

But his dad stopped Ed in his tracks by saying, "Yes you are. Cousin is taking another bus."

In adulthood Ed became a thriving businessman who was invited to the White House several times and Joshua had a successful military career. Presently the two old friends talk monthly by telephone.

List of Lawsuits Against Colleges and Universities Alleging Due Process Violations in Adjudicating Sexual Assault

Jonathan Taylor · 11 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On April 4, 2011 the Department of Education issued its disastrous "Dear Colleague" letter to colleges and universities across the United States, requiring administrators who had neither the investigative nor prosecutorial prowess of the criminal justice system to determine the guilt and innocence of students accused of felony sexual assault, and to reach their conclusions independent of whatever the police and courts decide.

Worse – the Department of Education demanded these schools determine guilt via a radically low standard of evidence for sex-assault cases: the "preponderance of evidence" standard. Under this model if an administrator feels that there might be a 50.01% chance that the alleged crime occurred, he/she must find the student guilty ("responsible") for sexual assault. This is further complicated by the lack of numerous other procedural safeguards and methods of evidentiary examination.

Predictably, a wave of lawsuits soon erupted as young men wrongly accused of sex crimes found themselves hustled through a vague and misshapen adjudication process with slipshod checks and balances and Kafkaesque standards of evidence. This page is dedicated to cataloging their legal challenges against schools which – they allege – have violated their rights to due process, unjustly destroyed their names, deprived them of educational opportunities, and committed various other crimes against them in the process of "just following orders."

A few things to note:

1. This list is sorted alphabetically by state, then by school.
2. Blank cells refer to information not yet obtained or determined rather than left out through error.
3. This list will be periodically updated. If you know of any cases that are not covered here, please inform this site in the comments section at the bottom, or via the contact form.
4. Thanks to Stop Abusive and Violent Environments (SAVE) and National Coalition for Men-Carolinas for sending me their lists. What follows is my own revision of their lists, with some additions and subtractions.

Male anger is not a crime, nor a mental illness

Yes. Many of us are angry. Not all the time, not so we can't manage daily life, not to the extent that we cannot love, not so much that we are on the verge of psychotic actions. But yes, there is cause for anger among today's men.
We are angry that our children are so easily taken from us, and so easily trained to believe that we abandoned them. We are angry that our sexuality and our anatomy are the butt of constant abusive jokes. We are angry that so few women take us seriously, because, well, they know they don't have to. We are angry over being blamed for all the evil in the world, evil that harms us as much as anyone else. We are angry at being told for a lifetime that it is our fault that women cannot have everything they demand, and angry that it is never noticed how hard we try to help them with that.
We are angry that, every time one man does something stupid and destructive, he becomes a metaphor for all men, and the entire civilization points at us and says, "see? SEE? We always knew you were all lethal psychopaths!!" But when a woman kills or maims or castrates or abandons, we are told she had good reason, naturally something that is our fault. We are angry that entire programs are funded and administered for the betterment of women, while we are glibly informed that our "male privilege" has already provided us with the same opportunities.
I daresay it would make anyone angry, to live with the constant knowledge that the outright dismantling of our lives, achievements and goals is never more than a 911 call away, and that we probably will never have the chance even to defend ourselves by due process should this occur.
It is insulting when women we've never met and to whom we pose no threat, hesitate to share an elevator or accept the help of a stranger. It is degrading when women who know nothing about us try and interfere with our children or tell us what a father is. It is exhausting when every decision we make, every idea we have, every thought we share, is summed up matronizingly as "male" this or "testosterone" that.
All this together, and a lot more, is doing great harm to the future of manhood. Young men are running out of reasons to marry, or work with children, or make contributions to their communities, when at every turn in a young man's life he is bound to be told that his very nature, his masculinity, his pride, his sense of worth, are dysfunctional holdovers from a bygone age that he must correct in himself so that he will not be perceived as threatening or domineering.
For many, many years I accepted the messages of a feminist education and an emerging female-dominant culture. I believed that men before me had done all the harm I was told they had done, and that the good was not worthy of mention. I believed that women's grievances were legitimately anchored in male conduct, just like I was taught to, and did my best to be a different kind of man, the kind women would approve of, just like I was taught to.
It was a trap, a lie. We were told we needed to be better fathers, so we made every effort to be a kind of dads we had never even seen ourselves. And they take our children away. We were told that we needed to be more attuned to our feelings, so we learned more about our inner selves, only to find that what we revealed could and would be used against us, across a marital pillow, in front of our children, or in courts of law.
And when we now turn and say, "wait, this has gone far enough", we are told condescendingly what amounts to "get over it" as we go on coexisting in a world geared more and more for the instant gratification of female desires. We are told "this isn't just about YOU", as we have little trouble figuring just who it IS about, and no, seldom is it about us, whatever it is.
There is no patriarchy. Male domination is not an institutional norm. Our hormonal composition does not explain all the wrongs of history. The shape of our reproductive mechanism does not explain war, crime and the arms race. Et cetera, et cetera.
And yes, it bloody well gets on our nerves to be told, constantly, what we are, what we must become, what is wrong with us, and why we must never, EVER try to be in charge of anything, beginning with our own lives.

Who are men aside from their usefulness?

Dear Daughter: A father's letter to his little girl

John Ribner · 12 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dear daughter,
I know I'm probably the last person you want to hear from, but I felt compelled to write you this letter. Your grandfather is dying, you have a five-year-old brother and two step-brothers, and though you no longer share my name, I still miss you and think about you all the time. You need to know this and so much more.
Twenty years ago, I found out I was going to be a dad and I was both excited and scared. I worried if I would be a good father, if I would be able to take care of you, and if I had any business bringing another life into this world; but once you were born, all of those questions disappeared the moment I saw your face. I knew I loved you more than life itself and I vowed to do anything and everything to keep you safe. Never in a million years would I have believed that my love for you would be put to the test, but it was. I never believed I would be forced to prove that I could be a good father to you, but it happened. And I never believed in an evil so uncompromising that it would force a man, me, your father, to walk away from his sweet, beautiful child whom he loved so much.
I found out that such an evil exists and my life has never been the same since.
This evil that I speak of is one so strong that it can turn lies into reality and makes the truth seem like lies. This evil cares nothing for anyone but itself, and it is aided by a legal system that profits from the misery it causes between children and their fathers. The pain, the anger, and the complete devastation committed by this evil has gone unchecked, aided lawyers and courts and the so-called laws they're designed to enforce.
You know this evil, dear daughter… it is the evil that came from the people who told you I didn't love you, and that I left you. It is the evil that took you from me no matter how hard I fought.
It was they who demanded sole legal custody of you; they even told the court that it was the "only reasonable solution." To further show how reasonable they were, they also said that I was a horrible person who wanted to hurt you. This didn't bother me because I'd heard these lies before. Unfortunately, it was what you said, dear daughter, that hurt me the most. When you said that you were afraid of me and didn't want to see me anymore, I realized that I no longer had a place in your heart or your life. I flew over 2,300 miles to fight for you, yet in that instant, I realized that anything worth fighting for was long gone.
Losing a child is every parent's biggest fear and this evil forced me to face that fear. They not only made me stare that fear in the face, they made it a reality… one that I've had to live with for nine long years and counting. I hope you never live to understand what it's like to have the one thing you love more than life itself just taken away from you for no good reason. At least you were happy, though. You seem to be living quite the wonderful life and I'm happy for you; I'm reminded once again that life goes on.
If you're still reading this, dear daughter, I would like to leave you with this offer: if you ever want to know the truth about everything that happened between us, I would love to have the chance to tell you. I'd be glad to show you the stacks of paperwork – the letters to judges, the Governor and the Friend of the Court – as well as the attorney's bills, that show a desperate father trying to do everything he could to keep his daughter in his life. I know you once told me that you don't want to talk about the past because it's too painful, but there's so much more to our story than you've ever been told, and it's equally painful for me not to talk about it. In the end, I will respect whatever you decide. Just know that I am here and I haven't forgotten you, and I haven't stopped loving you.

Sincerely,

Your father.

Brainwashing Men, Brainwashing Women, Part 2

Tom Golden · 12 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Part one went over the basics of brainwashing and began to look at some of the similarities that male feminists seem to share with those who were brainwashed by the Chinese. We discussed how the parallels we were drawing were not precise and were general though striking and eye opening. I think a similar situation can be seen when we turn to the similarities of the feminists with those who were doing the brainwashing, the communist Chinese.

We saw how the Chinese first depended on attacking the identity of the captives and added the prolonged use of guilt and shame. This was all done within an environment where they (The Chinese) were held as infallible. I think a good case can be made for some strong similarities existing in the way feminism has attacked men and boys. It is a curious question why they would do so. Let's start there.

So why did feminism attack the identity of men? Well, it's pretty simple really. Telling the truth that women suffered and faced discrimination due to rigid sex roles just wasn't that sexy and the media and politicians would fail to be interested. But, if you can find a bad guy, you know, someone to blame, then the ordeal becomes sexy and interests the press and those politicians knowing they need something to get re-elected. We will just blame men and claim they are the problem. Hey, we could juice it up even more and call them oppressors!

And that is just what they did.

They did this with the benefit of a gynocentric culture that has always jumped to attention when females claim they are tied to the tracks. If you don't believe that just look at our laws. Time and time again the laws protect women but less so men. The Violence against WOMEN Act, Sexual Harassment Laws, Rape Shield laws, affirmative action, and on and on. The protecting is all for women and little for men. Men are disposable.

It didn't take long to find that the tactic of blaming men as oppressors was actually very effective and very lucrative. The more they did it, the more media attention and funding they would get. And no one complained!

Of course, the obvious truth was that women were restricted not by oppressive men but by rigid sex roles. These roles had been the norm for many, many years and would likely still be in effect except that women became aware that their options were limited by their sex roles and they wanted more options in their lives.

But didn't women have options? Yes, they had many options but simply not the same as they saw men getting. (of course men have never had the options that women had but they have yet to complain, you know, like not dying in wars, or getting to stay at home with the kids while someone else works and supports you, or actually getting compassion and emotional support) What many people don't realize is that in 1960, prior to feminism, women were 32.3% of the workforce. That's right, one third of our workers were women. With all that our gynocentric government has done since then it is now at 47%. That's up only 15%. Women had jobs and worked outside the home. And how about college? Again, what most don't realize is that in 1960, prior to feminism, women received 35% of the college degrees. Does this sound like a group that is oppressed? No. Let's compare them with a group that was oppressed. Slaves. Slaves were 0% of the workforce and 0% of the recipients of college degrees. See the difference? One group is limited by a rigid sex role and faces discrimination that keeps them out of some professions and some top positions etc and the other group is actually oppressed and forbidden to take part in society. Huge difference. There is no comparison. Women have made gains in many areas including getting more jobs as professionals such as lawyers and doctors. They have also surpassed men in obtaining college degrees. In fact at this point women are getting more degrees than men at the same rate that men had gotten more degrees than women in 1970. But guess what? The 1970 figure for women is seen as a sign of discrimination/oppression against women while the 2010 figure for men is seen as a success for women! A part of that misandry is due to feminists and their cronies having gotten away with painting men as the problem and of course we simply don't care so much about those who are the cause of the problem. We ignore their pain and suffering. Sound fair to you? Again, this is just more evidence of our living in a gynocentric world.

The attacks on men's identity were basically a global false accusation. The feminists took the low road and falsely accused their own partners, the opposite sex, in order to get what they wanted. These false accusations likely worked on the feminists in the same ways that we saw brainwashing work on the men who betrayed their own origins. When we betray, we will tend to detach from that which we betray. The feminist betrayals of men likely moved them farther and farther into a detached position. We will also likely be more motivated to collect evidence that the betrayal was justified. This may give us a clue about the extent the feminists have gone in betraying men. Could it be that the more the feminists betrayed men the more detached they became to men?

And what happens when someone is falsely accused? The first thing the accused does is often deny that the attack is very important. From their perspective they know that it is false, it is bogus. They know it is untrue. They figure that in a short period people will figure this out and all will be well. They trust that that common sense and compassion will prevail. A part of this early denial is the minimization of the impact that such a false accusation can have. It seems to me that this is just how men responded to the early false accusations. They laughed it off and figured such nonsense would never have much impact. They were wrong. What is the worst thing about a false accusation? It is almost impossible to disprove. Individual men could say that they were not oppressors but there was no way for men to speak as a group and disprove the false accusations of these constant attacks. And they started to spread.

So the feminists/women had made a choice: Insure more stuff for women by attacking men's identity and integrity. They frankly seemed like naturals at this tactic. Labeling men as every sort of bad meme one can imagine. Men were pigs, men were rapists, men were greedy and unwilling to share with women, men were violent and bullied innocent women in relationship, men were insensitive, men were oversexed, men were testosterone poisoned, men never grew up and the list goes on and on. Men were bad. Bad. Bad. Bad. Not some men, but men in general. Just try and imagine someone saying similarly negative things about women as a group. I bet you can't even imagine it.

In order to maintain this lie of men oppressing women they needed to paint men as more and more terrible oppressors. They proceeded to create oppressors at every street corner. Men were oppressing women and keeping them from getting jobs, they were sexually harassing them on the job, men were oppressing women and keeping them tied to the home, men were oppressing women via domestic violence and beating them at home, men were oppressing women by raping them, by keeping them out of schools, by limiting their pay, by keeping them out of boardrooms and top jobs. Men men men. Bad guys. This was drilled into the consciousness of a receptive and gullible public who cheered on the poor dears who had been so oppressed by these evil men. And the funding flowed. The agencies created. The bureaucracy begun. The American public loves an underdog and hates a bully and that is just how this fight was painted, the men were bullies and the women were underdogs. The American public still thinks this way to this day due to these lies.

Bullies don't deserve any special treatment. In fact people tend to hold the attitude that bullies should pay for their bullying. Things like affirmative action might disadvantage men but they have been bullies/oppressors and have "had it all" for years. The prevailing attitude is that now it is their turn to suffer. Add that to the fact that men are already seen as disposable and these things create a situation where men are much less likely to get any compassion and more likely to have people nod and accept that they experience disadvantage. No compassion for them.

This drill went on for years and as it progressed the media and academia picked up the bull horns and started to attack men just as it had been started by mostly feminists. This eventually expanded to nearly every sphere of American life. The media, academia, the courts, the legislatures everyone had gotten in on the act of blaming men. Now it was common for all of these factions to beat up on men. No one cared. Men were fair game. They were oppressors, they were egocentric bullies. All things masculine were seen as a problem, all things feminine were seen as a solution. The men were the oppressors and deserved it. The fact that so many others were now carrying out the attacks on men's identity relieved the feminists from having to do so. You rarely hear the men are pigs line or other degrading comments much any more but it is there. After years of attacks the entire culture has taken on the anti-male attitude. It is automatically assumed by most people and because of this it simply does not need to be voiced. The negative stereotype of men has become a part of the cultural fabric.

Along with the attacks on male identity came the guilt and shame. This could be seen in all of the name calling and identity attacks but was additionally related to attempts to demean both men and masculinity with blame for the problems of the world. This was not an attempt to make men feel guilty for a specific behavior or something they had done in their lives. No. It was more an attempt to have men BE guilty. To be and feel guilty simply for being male. You were guilty not for something you had done, but for something you were. You were male. This is quite similar to the communist Chinese tactic of having their captives live in a world of shame and guilt over who they were not only what they had done.

There were some places with a much higher density of male hate and contempt than others. Probably the area with the most hatred espoused was academia. The women's studies departments were run by radical feminists who voiced this message repeatedly. Anyone who disagreed would face a great deal of hardship from the university administration. Accusations of misogyny were used as weapons. Entire faculties started living in fear of appearing in any way to be anti-woman or being pro-male. They were petrified and even to this day the people I know on college campuses are afraid of the gender politics of the feminists. Very few will speak up even a little in opposition to women and feminists. Everyone knows to stay silent and not draw attention to oneself. These people have been known to be ruthless and consider themselves infallible. People live in fear of them. This of course is very similar to the Communist Chinese brainwashers. They routinely attack the identity of men, shame and guilt them as being misogynists and do so from a place of infallibility. Two peas in a pod.

I think that this high density of man hatred has been at least partly responsible for the lack of gender diversity in resources on today's college campus. Almost every place you look are more things for women but there is almost nothing for the men outside of huge mega-buck athletics that doesn't really help the average guy. Women's Centers, women's safety, women's groups, women's health. etc.

The density of the male/masculinity hatred on campus must also mean that our college campuses are one of the more effective brainwashing centers. All those that pass through, both males and females, get indoctrinated into the anti-male stereotypes from their freshman introductory welcome workshops to their last day on campus. It is little surprise that on college campuses we tend to see more male feminists.

It also dawned on me why feminists are so quick to call males misogynists when they are simply talking about the needs of men. I have noticed this for years that simply mentioning men's needs will bring on an accusation of hating women. They are very quick to point out that what is being said is misogynistic. But why would simply voicing men's needs be misogynistic? Well, it can't be, but what I have assumed over the years is that feminism has a very old habit of voicing the needs of women while at the same time attacking men as the problem. Could it be that they are simply expecting the same hatefulness they have practiced for years to come back at them from those who start to voice the needs of men? Seems like a possibility to me.

Tremendous damage has been done to both men and boys and women and girls over the years. It is going to take a long time to start to shift these hateful attitudes. Men and boys deserve both choice and compassion. At this point they are getting very little of either.

#EndFathersDay: Happy Father's Day, You Piece Of Shit

Tom Snark · 13 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In light of the disparaging #EndFathersDay campaign currently playing out on twitter, we thought we'd bring you this old classic written by Tom Snark in 2011 that captures the spirit of what fathers and Father's Day have become in the eyes of a misandric world. PW

#EndFathersDay

Hey, fathers!
It's your special day!
It's the one day of the year that we take a break from exalting mothers and actually acknowledge your contributions to creating life and raising children. (Well, all right, we acknowledge your contributions all year round when they are of the financial sort and we want you to pay up.)
So, how shall we celebrate this special day?
A new necktie, perhaps; a silk leash around your neck, a symbol of your bondage, just to make it perfectly clear what your family keeps you around for.
Along the same lines, how about a new wallet?
Or how about you just get called a piece of shit?
That's what Prime Minister David Cameron has done, in so many words.

> Runaway fathers are like drink-drivers, blasts David Cameron
> David Cameron is launching a full-scale attack on fathers who abandon their families – calling for them to be "stigmatised" by society in the same way as drink-drivers are.
> The Prime Minister's intervention – in an article for The Sunday Telegraph to mark Father's Day – is one of the most outspoken he has ever made in defence of traditional family life, which he describes as the "cornerstone of our society".
> Mr Cameron said Britain needs to be made a "genuinely hostile" place for runaway fathers, who deserve the "full force of shame heaped upon them" and are "beyond the pale".

So, on Father's Day, of all days, Cameron has launched an attack on absent fathers, without any thought given as to why fathers might become absent in the first place. And the reason for this has nothing to do with male fecklessness or irresponsibility, despite what traditionalists and feminists preach.
No, the reason why fathers leave their families is because they are forced out. Britain is already a genuinely hostile place for fathers, who have to deal with the full force of shame heaped upon them, and who are already seen as 'beyond the pale'.
Blaming men for being forced out of their own homes by ex-wives 'looking for a better deal' and the state mafia which Cameron himself ultimately controls is a whole new level of sick.
But, of course, there is rhetoric and then there is politic. The government is committed to making significant cuts all round, which means that the baby mammas won't be able to depend on the timely arrival of a welfare check as they once did. Cameron (or whoever writes his speeches) is not stupid; his government has already faced criticism and protest for scaling back public sector jobs and services. He knows that the clucking hens of Mumsnet could cost him the next election if he appears to be denying single mothers the cash they are accustomed to receiving.
So he covers his own ass by picking a target that he knows a lot of women love to hate: men.
And so the grand project of scapegoating men continues.
But, in regards to those men who have children and make no effort to be a father emotionally or to hand over their cash: can there be a moral case for blaming them, given that they have no reproductive rights to speak of?

Men cannot choose to terminate a pregnancy; whether or not a child is born is a decision left entirely up to the mother. It is entirely her choice; he has no rights, and no say on the matter.
But still, he will be expected to pay; even in the case that the mother commits fraud to access his frozen sperm without his permission and has children without telling him.
Even Keith Macdonald, dubbed "Britain's worst father" by the Daily Mail for fathering at least ten children by ten different women, did not choose to become a father.
So why should he be held financially responsible for the choices of their mothers?
Indeed, since no man has the right to have children, no man chooses to become a father.

> Another mother of one of his children, Stacey Barker, 22, said: 'Men like him should be made to have a vasectomy or be fined or even jailed.'
> The mothers are entitled to jobseekers' allowance, income support, child tax credit and child benefit. Most also get housing benefit.

Yes, a lot of women would rather subject a man to genital mutilation or debtor's prison, than give up the perks of single motherhood. And yet, these women all chose to have sex with this man; and they all chose to carry his children to term. While Keith Macdonald could have chosen not to have sex with the women, he had no choice about whether or not the children were born. Each of the women could have chosen to have an abortion; none of them did. So why should he pay a single penny for someone else's choices?
Speaking of debtor's prisons, they actually have those in the United States, for 'deadbeat dads' – a feminist slur against alienated fathers who lose their jobs and can no longer afford crippling child support bills. This is a particularly cruel slur given that feminists have actively kept unemployed men out of work:

> Originally, the "stimulus" (which was supposed to keep the official unemployment rate well below its current level) was supposed to be spent on infrastructure. The I-35W Mississippi River Bridge collapse in Minnesota in 2007 and the DC Metro crash earlier this year in June […] showed that spending on maintaining current and building new infrastructure has been insufficient for a long time. The stimulus would have been a good opportunity to begin to correct this massive error as solid infrastructure is necessary for long term economic growth (not to mention safety), but womens' (such as NOW) groups objected. They called the original stimulus "burly", "macho", and "sexist" demanding that the stimulus be spent on women. This was despite the fact that millions of men were losing their jobs, and education and health care added jobs primarily benefiting women. NOW and the other womens' groups were successful with the stimulus was skewed towards education and health care leaving infrastructure in the same dangerous state it was before. In addition the gap between male and female unemployment is the largest in the history of unemployment data going back to 1948 when such data began.
> This "women oriented stimulus" along with other things has caused the federal deficit for this year to surpass 1.8 trillion dollars, far beyond the deficit of any previous year. This causes more men to be unemployed since this massive federal debt is sucking capital out of the private sector which destroys jobs. Literally, there is no capital for new business creation and business expansion that would create jobs.

Not content to keep men (many of whom are fathers owing child support) out of work, NOW has also been pushing to reduce the amount of owed child support needed to chuck an unemployed man in prison:

> RI NOW Supports
> Promoting Economic Justice
> Would decrease the amount of child support arrearage constituting a felony from $10,000 to $5,000

In feminist thinking, 'economic justice' equates to criminalising and imprisoning as many men as possible – particularly those already victimised by circumstance or the feminist groups themselves. There is a certain inefficiency to their cruelty, however, since a man's child support debts continue to accumulate while he sits in prison, obviously unable to work.

The feminists have a solution to this, though, and if you guessed slave labour camps, you would be right. I wish I was joking. I quote April McCaffery, who writes for Examiner as the LA single parenting correspondent:

> Deadbeats don't mind going to jail because then they have food and shelter paid for by YOUR tax dollars.
> Deadbeat dads should be forced into slave labor. It's the only possible solution that might actually lead to results.

Since we've moved onto America, how does the Premier of the most powerful country in the world acknowledge the role of fathers on Father's Day?
Well, typically, he uses the occasion to bash fathers. In 2008 he said the following:

> if we are honest with ourselves, we'll admit that what too many fathers also are is missing – missing from too many lives and too many homes. They have abandoned their responsibilities, acting like boys instead of men. And the foundations of our families are weaker because of it.
> We know the statistics – that children who grow up without a father are five times more likely to live in poverty and commit crime; nine times more likely to drop out of schools and twenty times more likely to end up in prison. They are more likely to have behavioral problems, or run away from home, or become teenage parents themselves. And the foundations of our community are weaker because of it.

Perhaps somebody should have mentioned to President Obama that around three quarters of divorces are initiated by women, who proceed to use the biased family court system to impoverish men and strip them of the right to even see their children. When the President blames a group of people for suffering at the hands of the state, it is hard not to see it as blatant oppression.

> We need fathers to realize that responsibility does not end at conception. We need them to realize that what makes you a man is not the ability to have a child – it's the courage to raise one.

More unconstructive 'man up' nonsense. More to the point, a man's responsibility does indeed end at conception. There are no responsibilities without corresponding rights, and a man has no rights over the foetus growing inside the mother's womb. The decision to keep or get rid of it is hers and hers alone, enshrined in law; that is a decision she has to make, based on the evidence at hand.
Will I be able to raise this child? Will I be able to if I am on my own? The failure to ask these questions of oneself does not mitigate one's moral obligations. Reproductive rights are entirely hers, and therefore so are reproductive responsibilities.
Obama continued to lecture fathers on the one day, in 2008, dedicated to them:

> our young boys and girls see that. They see when you are ignoring or mistreating your wife. They see when you are inconsiderate at home; or when you are distant; or when you are thinking only of yourself.

He even used the occasion to venerate mothers:

> We need to help all the mothers out there who are raising these kids by themselves; the mothers who drop them off at school, go to work, pick up them up in the afternoon, work another shift, get dinner, make lunches, pay the bills, fix the house, and all the other things it takes both parents to do. So many of these women are > doing a heroic job

We might compare this to his Mother's Day speech this year. Did he criticise feckless, gold-digging single mothers, and pay tribute to the struggles of fathers? Of course not. He venerated mothers again.

> On Mother's Day, we celebrate the extraordinary importance of mothers in our lives. The bond of love and dedication a mother shares with her children and family is without bounds or conditions. Whether an adoptive mom or grandmother, mother or partner, the women who raise us show us that no hurdle is too high, and no dream is beyond our reach. As sons and daughters, we show our gratitude for the women in our lives who care for us, shape our values, and set us on the path to a limitless future.
> Throughout our history, mothers have made remarkable sacrifices for the well-being of their loved ones […] Mothers are the rocks of our families and a foundation in our communities. In gratitude for their generous love, patient counsel, and lifelong support, let us pay respect to the women who carry out the hard work of motherhood with skill and grace, and let us remember those mothers who, though no longer with us, inspire us still.

Notably, he has not taken the opportunity of Father's Day this year to chastise fathers. A part of me likes to believe that the storm kicked up by the Men's Rights Movement after his previous speeches attacking fathers has persuaded him to tone it down somewhat. Rather than speaking of 'deadbeat dads', he refers to fathers serving abroad in the armed forces, and those who have lost jobs in the recession (in some cases thanks to him caving in to feminist demands to redirect that stimulus package, although he curiously omits this one detail). All in all, this year's speech is a lot more positive towards fathers than those of past years, but he still holds back from really giving fathers their due; compare it to the Mother's Day speech cited above.
So, back to David Cameron. Attacking fathers on Father's Day is a pretty disgusting thing to do, not to mention cynical. He is attempting to deflect blame from government by stirring up hatred towards common men – always an easy target. And yet, men cannot honestly be held morally responsible for creating children until they actually have the right to do so.
This old article sums up the position of Legal Choice For Men:

> Contending that women have more options than they do in the event of an unintended pregnancy, men's rights activists are mounting a long shot legal campaign aimed at giving them the chance to opt out of financial responsibility for raising a child.
> […]
> The gist of the argument: If a pregnant woman can choose among abortion, adoption or raising a child, a man involved in an unintended pregnancy should have the choice of declining the financial responsibilities of fatherhood.
> "There's such a spectrum of choice that women have — it's her body, her pregnancy and she has the ultimate right to make decisions," said Mel Feit, director of the men's center. "I'm trying to find a way for a man also to have some say over decisions that affect his life profoundly."

For as long as men lack reproductive rights, and for as long as we allow women to force men to become fathers when they do not want to, then of course we are going to have 'feckless, irresponsible, deadbeat dads' – although I don't blame them, and I won't call them that. I will call them victims of fraud and financial manipulation. Consenting to sex is not the same as consenting to fatherhood, and any man who has not consented to the latter owes the world nothing.
And that's why Legal Choice For Men seems reasonable to me. A woman does not 'abort' the baby so much as she 'aborts' herself from a lifestyle she does not want. Why should a man not have the right to an 'abortion' on the same grounds? In that case, inviolable contracts could be drawn up, prior to the birth of the child (or even prior to conception) in which the father signs up to fatherhood. If he doesn't sign, he can't be held liable, because it was never his choice to have a child; thus there can be no grounds for requiring him to sweat and toil for the mother's sake.

Strange how feminists are unwilling to commit to this version of 'my body, my choice'.
Happy Father's Day!

American Family Courts, the First Amendment, and Violations of Free Speech

Guy Mann · 13 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Part One of a Two Part Article

(Editor's note: This article was published under a pseudonym, for fear of retribution by the family courts. For Part-II of this article click here – SM)

Family Court.

What a friendly sounding name. A court for families, so open and inviting.

A place where families are welcome and invited, a place for families to bring their troubles and disagreements, where there are people specially trained to help them with their problems, and where issues can be resolved in a fair compromise, so that everyone can be happy.

By its name it would seem offer all these things and more.

And yet, nothing could be better Orwellianly named than this institution; there is nothing friendly about it. It is a snakepit of anguish and despair, impacting millions of people each year.

Although these places look just like traditional courts, and have all the usual trappings you would expect – judges, bailiffs, clerks, witness stands – well, in the world of judicial courts, one of these things is just not like the others.

In fact, it is an open secret among working legal professionals in the field, Family Courts are just not like other courts.

A freakish hybrid stepchild of state judiciaries, these creatures were spawned by the legislative effort at the conjoining of several normal courts, and forged in an unholy pact by legislators to impose state determined resolutions on interpersonal relationships among a family.

These efforts produced the abomination that we call "Family Court" today. (Other proto-family courts with similar jurisdictions have been variously named domestic relations court, divorce court, or even domestic violence courts.)

These statutory courts, ostensibly set up for specialized attention peculiar to familial claims and disputes, were also supposed to subsume the social stigma that defendants had during and after criminal litigation, into a kinder, gentler, criminal-lite type proceeding.

Hidden in the agenda however, and actually driving the legislative conversation, was the subversive statist appeal of side-stepping all the traditional rights and due process guarantees that normally accompany court proceedings, while concurrently enriching their brethren in the law practicing guild.

The wholesale abolition of rights and due process in these courts, was considered a feature, not a bug, in what was to come.

Such was the conceptual inspiration for one of the most intrusive and noxious government institutions in modern times, and the formalized obliteration of personal civil rights in an American court – and apparently to most of modern Western world as well.

Considering all the unprecedented and radical changes morphed into this institution, one hesitates to actually dignify it with the term "court" in the modern jurisprudent sense, as the conduct is more like Napoleonic Inquisitions than American Courts.

As NY Supreme Court Judge Brian Lindsay observed,

> "There is no system ever devised by mankind that is guaranteed to rip husband and wife or father, mother and child apart so bitterly than our present Family Court System."

By re-casting all familial issues into a mutated type of civil court action variously termed "special proceedings", and by radically recasting the concepts of just what a judicial court is, e.g., its procedures, discretions and evidentiary standards, the state had effectively done away with all the inconvenient and expensive due process and constitutional protections required in every other American court.

While retaining the traditional powers of a judicial court – enforcement, fines and imprisonment – none of the checks and balances against those powers were concomitantly retained. Expedience of process and the legitimization of raw state power was the goal.
In creating these special "People's Courts" – not-quite-criminal, not-quite-civil – dozens of due process protections were sloughed away leaving a raw, grinning changeling in its place.
Constitutional procedural protections against self-incrimination, right to an attorney, presumptions of innocence, right to jury were done away with.
Inviolable substantive rights to federal parenting guarantees, property and liberty, became optional concerns and subordinate to statutory directives. Legal financial obligations to others persons were created out of whole cloth and determined from the flimsiest allegations.
The rights to financial and medical privacy were extorted away, as was the Constitutional right to free travel.
The very fundamental right to association with your child was abrogated and made conditional.
Even your right to not be forced into involuntary servitude was abolished.
The high standards of proof whenever fundamental Constitutional and human rights are at stake, standards that must pass clear and convincing evidence or reasonable doubt everywhere else, were degenerated to the lowest standards of "some credible evidence" or "a preponderance of evidence" for dispositive determinations.
Hearsay evidence exceptions were expanded and became the norm, permitting all kinds of dubious accusations, outbursts and implausibles to be legitimized as presumptively true, standards of evidence not seen in America since the Salem witch trials.
Relaxed enforcement of perjury laws encouraged even these low standards of proof, to the point where gossip equates to proven fact.
Rights to appeal were conformed into requests for permission to appeal, which then are rarely granted.
Ex parte (one party accusation) applications and orders were streamlined, standards for restraining orders were reduced to lower than probable cause, to almost any cause.
Preemptive orders without evidence or hearings were normalized and made routine – throwing people out of their homes, pre-emptive removal of children from their parents, pre-emptive seizure of legally owned arms, the presumptive shackling of GPS tracking devices to people, ad hoc property seizures, contradictory or ambiguous conditional orders, restraining orders separating family members on virtually no evidence at all.
All without an avenue for meaningful remedy or review to curtail rogue judges outrageous orders.
In another oxymoron pulled from its standard bag of dirty tricks, euphemistically termed "temporary orders" were used like never before, allowing family courts to get away with things that would never reach constitutional muster as final orders.
Temporary orders, which sound like, and are supposed to be, placeholders that would not last for more than a couple weeks; such orders in their original form are supposed to keep the status quo in place while the situation can be assessed and dealt with conclusively.
But in fact such orders, as in the family courts' rendition, are not temporary at all, nor do they maintain the status quo; such orders usually go on for much, much longer, very often for years. If in place long enough, any order becomes de facto permanent simply by the inertia of being that way for so long.
Dispositive determinations and legal rights that are supposed to be attained only by deliberative due process, effectively become permanent through the abuse of these orders, side-stepping the required hearings, decisions or trial.
(As an example, a "temporary order" placing a quart of milk on a table, so as to maintain the status quo, will similarly not achieve it. After a few days there is nothing temporary about it, it is no longer milk, and the status quo has been lost forever.)
Civil contempt powers were expanded to know no legal bounds, permitting debtor's prison, capricious fines, "innovative punishments" and indefinite imprisonments, e.g., see H. Beatty Chadwick 14 years in prison on domestic court civil contempt (Philadelphia PA), Manuel Osete 3 years civil contempt (Nogales AZ).
In sum, very little was left to resemble what a judicial court traditionally was, nor was there left any semblance of respect or protection of the guarantees of American Constitutional rights.

As Dr. Steven Baskerville observed:

> "Special courts to try special crimes that can only be committed by certain people are a familiar device totalitarian regimes adopted to replace established standards of justice with ideological justice. New courts created during the French Revolution led to the Reign of Terror and were consciously imitated in the Soviet Union. In Hitler's dreaded Volksgerichte or "people's courts," only expediency in terms of National Socialist standards served as a basis for judgment."

In modern courts such as these, standards of guilt have devolved from "innocent until proven guilty", to "guilty till proven innocent", to "guilty even after being proven innocent".
Compounding this judicial heresy, this abuse is meted out in a typically gender genocidal fashion.
Fathers in family courts face a situation similar to discrimination black defendants were subjected to in pre-civil rights Jim Crow courts – the judges were as prejudicially corrupt as the police and prosecutors, a virtual cartel of unconstitutionality.
Defendants/Respondents appearing before them, have had virtually no way to redress the discrimination.
The brunt of the war hammer mentality in these courts is doled out and targeted against men and fathers, 90% of time.
Confronted with this insurmountable edifice, and seeing no way out, it is no wonder that fathers involved in family courts/divorce courts commit suicide at a rate nine times greater than mothers, rather than continue the steady abuse and despair coming from such prejudicial courts.
In sum, by their very creation, Family Courts, so called "courts of equity", are an emotionally driven and politically motivated charade of court practice, a changeling where calm rationality and adherence to law takes a backseat, a place where the judges that control them have taken their cues from the slash and burn "gitter-dun" mentality of their inception.
These judicial high priests are given power by the state to do almost anything with legal impunity, side-step almost every law and ignore every human legal right, as long as it is accompanied by a talismanic invocation of "It is in the best interests of the child", aka – BIOTC.
But just as the ancient high priests abused their unquestioned supposed divine channel to the gods, and could justify anything they wanted in the gods names, the BIOTC invocation becomes a hexbag token, a placeholder, and a hollow excuse to do anything the judge wants to do.
(Even modern day self-proclaimed religious prophets do this very same thing today – substitute their view and put the moniker of divinity/god/sacredness onto it to make it unquestioned, and unquestionable.)
And unlike ordinary humans, their actions are fully immunized from civil suit or review, the wanton discretion coronated to them, is unchecked by any personal responsibility, and knows no bounds of indecency or turpitude, it is in essence a modern rendition of the ancient divine right, "the king can do no legal wrong".
(See Indiana Judge Harold D. Stump, in a family civil matter, unilaterally ordered a 15 year old girl permanently sterilized, on an ex parte request. When sued later for this by the girl, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled he was absolutely immune from suit, no matter how horrendous his orders were. Shockingly, not only are these judges immune, but they can confer their immunity in a king-like fashion even onto lowly civilians who surround him.)
Giving this power to regular constitutional courts is questionable enough, but giving it to the statutory family courts, rogue courts masquerading as real ones, is beyond reason.
Layered upon bad, the situation compounds that bad with even worse . . .

Lawyers At Play in the Great Green Fields of Money

Awakening to the new rivers of cash forcibly seized from parents through the family courts, law schools and the legal guild began to develop whole new course curricula exploiting family law to entice and encourage attorneys into this new lucrative area of practice. What was once an obscure and belittled area of law, suddenly became sexy, in vogue, and bright with opportunities.
Career law students began to take notice of this specialty, which now shined with prestige and possibilities.

Building upon itself, new federal/state family court enrichment laws were enacted that encouraged family courts to enhance the likelihood and amounts of child support payments that could be imposed. Such incentives encouraged granting custody to the parent with a lower income, irrespective of the parent who is actually the best for the child. These laws matched dollar amounts from the federal government to be paid directly to the state(s) for every dollar that they would force one parent to pay another for child support. (Title 42 U.S.C §651, IV-D Federal to State Disbursement funding)

Since a non-custodial but richer parent could be forced to pay far more money, the family courts are financially disincentivized to grant custody to them; such parents are relegated to non-custodial second class parents, visitors actually, and where the poorer parent is favored for custody.

The inevitable result was, that as the traditional wage earner and provider for the family, fathers become the targets of these policies.

Furthermore, as a bonus side-effect from this graft, came the kowtowing to the lobbying efforts of feminist organizations, and resulting in further gender discrimination to fathers seeking custody of their children. Some may say this was not a side-effect at all, but rather the motivating cause.

Much like the civil forfeiture laws encourage the state to effect cash seizures from innocent people, these child support funding laws encourage custody determinations that are in the best (financial) interests of the state, not of the children.

All your Base Are Belong to Us

And yet the courts that are supposed to make fair and equitable judgments upon fundamental core rights, as fundamental as any in a criminal proceeding, have abrogated that responsibility. In fact these matters go beyond constitutional rights, these are even more dear to us than life itself, our children, and our biological rights to be parents to them.

The social engineering and moral presumption of these courts, almost ecclesiastical in nature, manifests in the incipient hysteria embedded in their day-to-day operation; what would be considered outrageous and unacceptable in any other court, is routine and standard fare in these forums.

These courts have become a case study unto themselves of showing corruption flowing from absolute power – of catering to the politically favored litigant, of issuing capricious ad hoc ruling and orders. The steady practice of flippant expedience, and the casual dance of domestic judicial abuse upon perpetually indentured litigants who are literally forced to come before these courts, over and over again, hundreds of times over decades. The orders are never really final, and the cases never really closed.

Even when there is state mandatory statutes limiting their discretion, such as the duration of custody proceedings, the courts ignore them as well without sanction.

The traditional standards of jurisprudence, painstakingly developed and fought for over centuries, standards formed and moored by common law, statutory and Constitutional guarantees, are treated in these courts as casual suggestions and optional guidelines, if they are even considered at all.

Instead, these courts are run in the frontier, shoot-from-the-hip style of ‘justice’ presided over by jurists like Judge Roy Bean.

And the People who Run Them . .

Attorneys don’t just accidentally become family court judges, they lobby hard to get there.

Unfortunately, it is the very same personality dynamic of presumptive self importance that would bring such people to a place where they would come to impose moral, interpersonal and intra-familial decisions upon other people. It is the same personality traits that leave them uniquely ill-suited to lord over those who are most in need of measured objectivity and the impartial application of the law.

These are the type of people who we come across in normal daily life who are self-opinionated and snap-judgmental, people who impose their will in social situations. The difference is when they achieve the powers of a judge, you cannot just walk away from their distasteful behavior.

No kindly sages of wisdom, they come to these positions with the feral mores and self-preservation instincts of an attorneys, politicians and schoolmaster, absolutely the opposite of the composure or training with the social responsibilities entrusted to them. They often come with an insular life experience and limited worldview, inflexible mores, and parochial attitudes and prejudices. Their area of expertise and training is political science and adversarial based resolution of legal disputes.

Family court judges are not schooled or trained in psychology or child psychology, they come with no sophisticated knowledge of inter-familial dynamics other than their own personal experiences, no schooling in human social interaction, no knowledge of intra-societal dynamics and are suspicious and wary of any non-standard, but perfectly healthy familial lifestyles and communities.

As such Family Courts, and the judges who run them, have developed into islands of mini-tyrannies, almost entirely unaccountable, and attracting the type of people that thrill over exerting the kind of one-on-one personal power over others that can rarely be experienced legally elsewhere in modern America.

Accustomed to that stance in society, family court judges are loathe to be restrained from their otherwise almost unlimited power that they wield over others coming through their courts.

How it was, and Change is in the Air

Long used to playing in their little exclusive sandbox, Family Courts (and their professional codependents – CPS, DSS attorneys, assigned attorneys and guardian ad litems, mental health evaluators) have routinely abused the people sucked into their web, unconcerned to the wreckage visited upon them.

Traditionally, the outrages suffered have been mostly contained and muted. Even though the judicial abuse affects millions, the public at large just didn't hear much about it, because most people want to put such pain behind them, or are embarrassed by the proceedings. When people did complain it is assumed that they were just whining about not winning, and not much sympathy or attention is spent upon sore losers. The facade of fair and evenhanded justice in these courts was and remained intact.

In the not-so-distant past, family court judges generally did not concern themselves about litigants' discontent. Whining or complaining, no matter how outrageous the circumstances, it was just a matter of course, and ignored as such.

Unless the litigant was a public figure, a government official, or a journalist, such complaints usually went nowhere anyway, and judges knew that.

Inevitably only the politically connected, or those with a public voice were treated deferentially.

The aggrieved literally had no one to complain to. Friends and relatives were disempowered to do anything about it. Local officials were often part of the same institutional mindset as the abusive judge. Reporters and journalists didn't care, as it was not much of a public interest news item to write about.

Judicial complaint procedures and appeals take thousands of dollars, intricate expertise, and months to be even heard. They are unlikely to be entertained, and by which time if they do, it makes no difference anyway. Although these are supposed to be the "correct" avenues to undo illegitimate behavior by a judge, they are ineffective by design, and actively serve to delay and keep the status quo.

Principled attorneys who have an issue with family court judicial abuse, similarly cannot complain (e.g., see Leon Koziol, Esq., Barbara C. Johnson, Esq.)

Practicing lawyers in front of such judges are effectively silenced by the sheer occupational hazard of having to practice in front of the same judge they were complaining about. In many jurisdictions any such criticism is presumptively considered professional misconduct; for many such reasons attorney criticism would be professional suicide and all attorneys know it.

But, intuitively over the years, though effectively covered up, many knew that something was fundamentally sick with the system. Albeit, most victims of the system were either unable to articulate it, were kowtowed into silence, afraid to rock the boat lest their children be taken away, or through ignorance and lack of resources have been unable to complain or to publicize the abuses.

However, as these rogue courts began casting a wider net, with ever so much more finer mesh, exerting jurisdiction over more and more people, and as their orders and laws became increasingly more onerous and widespread, a new and better informed crop of people have begun to show up in front of these judges.

Lacking the funds to proceed traditionally in "the right way", these new types of litigants often had no choice other than to proceed pro se (self represented) in court, without the unctuous attorneys who would normally buffer their interactions with the judges. These new litigants were far less reflexively deferential to government and its officious despots. These were people who were necessarily more informed of their civil rights, more willing to educate themselves, and were more willing to share their experiences to the public.
The proliferation of legal self-help resources abounded as they had never before, and people took advantage of them. (e.g., Nolo Press, Legal Zoom, Youtube legal tutorials)
The predictable thin skinned responses of family court judges to these uppity pro se litigants, soon led such people to become pro se antipathists, and then full blown pro se activists, and loud public critics of the family court judges.
Affronted by such independence, and tolerating nothing less than complete obsequient obedience, family court judges have treated such litigants more harshly, and subject them to disproportionate hardships and punitive conditions, often using their children as pawns and victims to punish the parent.
This treatment in turn motivated them to speak up even more loudly and critically about their cases, and about the courts that are assaulting them, in an ever escalating response.
Often in doing so there is the sense that they simply have little or nothing to lose.
It has been said that extortion only works, when an alternative path is offered to the extortionee.

The Petulant Judges

Change comes slowly in the insular and entrenched society of family court judges.
Judges are conservative and don't keep up with societal changes. With no need to change, judges' styles, expectations, attitudes and professional habits and prejudices pretty much stay the same. Their protected little fiefdoms stay moored in time as the world goes by them.
Having grown complacent and entitled to the unquestioned power they wield within their bulletproof enclave of absolute immunity, where they are insulated from any personal responsibility of their actions, these judges develop the emotional expectation of absolute obedience and submission.
When confronted with independent or reasoning people, the anger and ire they experience, is emotional and retributive in nature. Entitlements they have always had and that was never questioned, now someone, anyone actually, has the gall to criticize them, and in the public no less.
Given the background of the people involved and the artificially charged situation in place, it is almost predictable that such judges' response would be petulant and feverish, overreaching beyond their legal authority or jurisdiction in trying to hold onto and control the public narrative.
Yet, because they have the presumptive power to do so, with no immediate oversight or correction, these judges will lash out their umbrage upon those who would report their behavior to the public – they will sanction, punish, curtail and extort such critics' speech through various judicial devices, including denying access of a parent to their child even when the speech has nothing to do with parental fitness.

Change comes in unexpected ways.

But the world moves forward in ways no one expects, particularly to those who have been entrenched in power for so long.
In the past 15 years or so, the phenomena known as "The Internet", has become a new societal wildcard that most family court judges aren't quite familiar with – they are not aware of it as the phenomena that intrinsically is, or of the passionate online communities it supports and nurtures, or the popular journalistic publishing medium it has become, reaching millions of new readers and viewers.
Journalists and writers who in the past had the insurmountable cliff-face to broach via the traditional gatekeepers of the mainstream media and publishing houses before ever reaching a viewer's eyes, are now empowered with an easy path and ready audience of millions, who could now view newly produced content and reporting.
Just as technologically clueless as many older politicians (e.g., "The internet is a series of tubes", Sen. Ted Stevens), most of these judicial dinosaurs still don't understand either the magnitude, significance or impact of the internet upon society at large; they try to abbreviate it, and pigeonhole it into their small minded worldview as just some newfangled hobby that young techy people waste their time with these days.

Staid, ossified family court judges treat bloggings, internet articles, facebook postings and youtube videos with an annoyed scorn and umbrage, quite differently than their respect for traditional media (radio, tv, print magazines and newspapers). Because of this old worldview, they will often treat litigants involved in internet activities as unruly children needing to be curbed and disciplined. These judges live in the past, anachronistically not yet recognizing that the Internet IS the contemporary media of journalism and public social commentary today.
As the 9th Circuit recently held:

> "The protections of the First Amendment do not turn on whether the defendant was a trained journalist, formally affiliated with traditional news entities, engaged in conflict-of-interest disclosure, went beyond just assembling others' writings, or tried to get both sides of a story. As the Supreme Court has accurately warned, a First Amendment distinction between the institutional press and other speakers is unworkable."

Obsidian Finance v. Cox #12-35238 (9th Cir. 2014)

> "With the advent of the Internet and the decline of print and broadcast media . . . the line between the media and others who wish to comment on political and social issues becomes far more blurred." Citizens United, 558 U.S. at 352″

The most ironic thing about these family court jurists, supposedly learned scholars of law, chartered protectors of human rights, and dispassionate arbiters of disputes, is that they have in fact become petty tyrants of their domains. Jealous keepers of the standard narrative, they see red when any view critical of themselves or their domain makes it to public awareness, and like sadistic ant-burning, fly-leg pulling bullies, they will abuse their powers and breach their public trust by punishing anyone expressing such criticisms.
Worst of all they will punish the truly innocent in their zeal to sanction such parents.
Treating children as pawns – collateral damage in fact – these judges will exploit the parents' love for their children in order to extort, blackmail and shame them into submission.
For these judges it is the institution they work for, and its image, that is far more important than any children they purport to revere, much as how the Catholic church had protected its own priests and public image before ever being shamed into protecting children from abuse of its own clergy.

The Evolving Law on Free Speech, The Internet, and introducing Family Court Judges to the 21st Century.

Although it is illegal to criticize family court judges in many countries (Australia, Britain), such is not the case in America.
The high ideals of American exceptionalism in protecting free expression and free speech is explicit in our Constitution, and covers the right to public trials, freedom of the press and freedom of public speech. The complementary guarantees of free association, freedom to parent one's child, freedom to express grievances with governmental action and agency, and freedom of religion or personal belief, are part of the same set of ideals, in protecting personal freedoms under American jurisprudence.
The absolute sounding nature of Constitutional rights notwithstanding, the courts do permit intrusion upon them by the government if they find a compelling reason.
Governmental intrusions into our lives are ranked differently as to their civil rights offensiveness in modern jurisprudence, some acts receiving greater presumptive deference from the courts than others. Of these standards, "strict scrutiny" is the most stringent standard to be overcome before an official action is allowed to trump a Constitutional right.
The right to free speech and free expression is in that category.
This rule, applying to any form of governmental prohibition against a person for the act of simply expressing oneself to others, or publishing one's views in a public forum, is considered one of the foundations a free society, and a core freedom indicative of a true democracy.

When the government, in any number of its methods (e.g., by statute, regulation, court order, or forced agreement), prohibits the speech of a person before he even says it, this is known in legal terminology as "prior restraint".
Prior restraint of free speech occurs when a person is threatened with punishments, sanctions, fines or imprisonment, prior to actually even saying or publishing the subject speech or analysis, and it is considered the most heinous and odious official acts any governmental actor can presume to command upon another.
As the Supreme Court observed:

> "[P]rior restraints on speech and publication are the most serious and the least tolerable infringement on First Amendment rights . . . If it can be said that a threat of criminal or civil sanctions after publication 'chills' speech, prior restraint 'freezes' it."

Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976)
also see Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931), Reno v. American Civil Liberties Union, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
Rare exceptions to this very fundamental rule, run only where there is an immediate risk of danger (e.g., yelling "FIRE!" in a crowded theatre), an explicit incitement to violence ("KILL HIM NOW!"), or undermining exigent and immediate criminal or military operations ("Get ready, they are at your door!"), in all these examples prior restraint relates nothing to the content of the speech, and all relating to immediate irreparable danger inherent in the form or circumstance of the speech.
This standard is determined by the so-called Imminent Lawless Action standard of review, where prior restraint is acceptable if the subject speech is presumptively dangerous, and incites a violation of law that is both imminent and likely.
Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105 (1973)
The Constitutional courts have held that all other speech can be legally addressed after its utterance or publication, through the use of traditional legal avenues such as defamation suits, breach of contract actions, improper disclosure sanctions, etc.
Yet, the rogue courts that Family Courts have become, recognize no federal authority over their own discretion, and free speech is one the first federal rights to be derided, laughed at, and casually throttled with impunity by family court judges.

In Part Two of this article, through investigations and interviews I have made, I report upon this exact behavior by Family Court judges across the nation, and reveal the flagrant, and illegal, imposition of "prior restraint" imposed in widespread patterns of judicial abuse.

Update to Campaign for Free Speech Fundraiser

Paul Elam · 13 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Update on Security Fundraiser:
First, please accept our profound thanks for your immediate, energetic and positive response to raise money for security needs at the First International Conference on Men's Issues.
As many of you may know, the venue for the conference was changed recently. That does not, however, mean we will be providing less security for the event. We are again negotiating a strong and highly visible police presence as well as providing our own private security team.
All insurance we have purchased will be transferred or rewritten to cover the new facility. Legal fees have already doubled our original expectations and we are expecting yet another bill.
To put it shortly, we are going to use your donations for precisely the same reasons as indicated in the original appeal, but at a different location. All reward level donations will be honored as promised.
Thanks to your unprecedented support for a men's event, the conference is going on as planned, and is garnering even more support from the local community and public officials. Again, thank you all for this badly needed and very important event.

Kind regards,
Paul Elam

London Police Commissioner to follow feminists' guidance on how to deal with sexual offence cases

Mike Buchanan · 13 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There are few things that make us more incensed than when senior men in public life follow the lead of feminist ideologues such as the man-hating Alison Saunders, Director of Public Prosecutions. Sir Bernard Hogan-Howe, Metropolitan Police Commissioner, is often referred to as the country's most senior police officer, responsible for law and order in London, a city with over eight million inhabitants. This piece on the BBC website really brought the red mist down. An early extract:

> Officers are not always "sensitive and empathetic to the rape victim's account", Met Police Commissioner Sir Bernard Hogan-Howe has said. At the launch of an independent review of the investigation of rape, Sir Bernard said the force needed to "drastically improve" how it handled rape cases. More than 80% of sexual offences victims do not come forward, he added. The review, part of a national action plan, will be led by ex-Lord Advocate of Scotland Dame Elish Angiolini. The outcome will be published in February.

How can anyone know how many sexual offences victims don't come forward? Surely a ridiculous 'factoid' invented by feminists, which he's swallowed hook, line, and sinker. The article continues:

> Sir Bernard said: "For a while, I've been concerned about how we, the police, approach and deal with sexual offences. "This is our brave attempt to try to resolve it," he added.
> He said people did not seem to "trust the criminal justice system to give them the assistance they need" and about 80% of those who come forward to report were "vulnerable" through drink, drugs or psychiatric illness. "My concern has been whether or not the investigators are always as sensitive and empathetic to the victim's account, as they should be."

'People' did not seem to 'trust the justice system'. In this context we can safely replace 'people' with 'women'. 80% of the 'people' coming forward were 'vulnerable'. What proportion of this 80% had ingested alcohol or drugs voluntarily? What proportion of them had consensual sex, but later regretted it, turning a consensual act into a criminal offence? If a woman who's not 'vulnerable' through drink or drugs has consensual sex with a man who is, and the man later regrets his decision, are we to say she raped him? Surely either, or neither, must be true. Later in the article:

> Director of Public Prosecutions, Alison Saunders, said: "We have seen an increase in the last few months of referrals coming through, but we need to improve the court process once the victim has decided to engage."
> Ms Saunders said she would be in favour of judges warning jurors about the dangers of them having an unconscious bias at the start of a trial rather than at the end.

Ah, that useful feminist trump card, 'unconscious bias'. By definition, you can't deny you have it. So as a juror you're supposed to set aside all you've learned in your life, and all you've learned from others, about how men and women in the real world interact with each other, and fill the void with feminist narratives designed to ensure conviction rates are increased. It's a cynical corruption of the jury system, and if all this has anything to do with justice, I'm a Koi carp.

"Tech guys THINK! It's awful!"

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 13 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Salon's Tricia Romano is upset because jobs at Amazon are bringing icky tech guys into her dating pool. Romano's whining sets a new standard for unintentional comedy thanks to her pompous sense of entitlement. And you know what the thing is that twists her panties most? The fact that the nerdy men she goes out with have standards.

Some think working with computers is detrimental to social skills, but that's only true if computer use keeps you from practicing social skills. As a web consultant of 8 years (I started working early), I believe the marvelous machines sitting on your desk or lap change the way you see the world. Working with computers teaches you to break problems down to the simplest parts possible and trace a path to a solution in often unambiguous steps.

The social butterfly techie may sometimes seem anti-social to the uninitiated, but really they are just especially good at spotting bullshit. Techies don't just call out bullshit, they know exactly where in a bullshitter's head bullshit lies based on connections to a single bullshit sentence. No bragging is intended. This ability is developed over time dealing with customers and tracing back reasons for which a system breaks.

This kind of thinking most certainly affects dating. Some techies are socially awkward due to lack of social skills, while others, like myself, have antisocial habits in dates due to too much practice.

Let me elaborate by bringing in Romano's stupid thoughts about her date with a geek.

> I don't think he asked me a single question about myself. Our date—if you call these impromptu Internet meetings, dates—lasted an hour. It felt more like a job interview, but not the way a date is supposed to be a job interview. There was no grilling about where you were from and what your family was like and what you were looking for.

I'll confess that I would totally make a date out like a job interview. I mean, who the fuck are you? I won't ask you about your family because, well, I don't care. I'll care about your family when they are my friends. Until then, they can all spontaneously combust in a Burger King for all I care.

And you know I'm right, because I didn't see you try to set an example by asking about his family.

It's not your date's problem that he cannot absorb assumptions directly out of your head.

> No, I spent a half hour or more listening to him talk about his job. Since I am not in the tech industry, I don't understand any of it. It was all job speak—the type of language ladder-climbers use; it was the kind of talk that shuts vaginas down cold.

It's true that you need to BE a techie to truly understand a techie. Stupid bosses, clueless clients and clumsy coding are way more entertaining than your boring family and your opinions. We're at an impasse here. Either show us the robot you passionately built in your secret lab or ask the waiter for the check.

> I hadn't been out of the house all day, I work from home and I see no people except in a computer monitor, so human company, any kind really, was necessary. The restaurant was about to close and we had to go elsewhere or part ways. Even though I was bored, I wasn't ready to go home, and I wanted to get a second drink. He offered wine back at his house and I said no. He was good-looking enough, but I wasn't going to be able to get it up for a boring tech dude. And my city, Seattle, like San Francisco is lousy with them.

So you are the one stuck without social contact in front of a computer, but when you finally peel your ass off the chair, you need to have James Bond himself shake you without leaving you stirred? Well, excuse us for our career choices, hon. If a good-looking white collar promising free booze is not enough to make you prefer something other than your monitor and a vibrator, then that's on you.

> As technologist and writer, Jeff Reifman, pointed out in a post titled You've Got Male: Amazon's Growth Impacting Seattle Dating Scene, Amazon, which is located less than a mile from my house, has had a huge, awful impact on Seattle's dating scene. He estimated that in the 25–44 age group, Seattle "has 119 single men for every 100 single women, slightly better than San Francisco at 121—but equal if you add in the impact from nearby Bellevue, which is an awful 144."

What a bummer for you that you are guaranteed a choice of a partner even when all of your friends get hitched. Why do MEN have to be around, right? Gross!

> You might think an abundance of men is a great thing, but as a wise woman once said, "The odds may be good, but the goods are odd."
> Hold the Champagne, girls.
> But Reifman's post confirmed that as Amazon grows, the number of (boring) men grows too. The gender disparity is bad enough in San Francisco that one company, The Dating Ring, has resorted to flying women into San Fran from other cities.

Did the demand for outside women come from guys that went out with you first?
Things got worse when Ramano quoted another moron named Violet.

> "There were a lot of tech men. I could talk a blue streak about them. I don't have much positive to say. The biggest thing, the thing that bothered me the most is I felt like my intelligence was greatly devalued," she wrote. "I am a smart woman. I have a master's from Berkeley in philosophy. My brain is very abstract, though, the exact opposite of so many men in tech who have very concrete/literal brains. They interpreted information as intelligence. I constantly felt like I wasn't seen or valued by them, even though I experienced a lot of them as having a very limited view of the world."

Wait, what did you say?

> They interpreted information as intelligence.

Run that by me one more time.

> They interpreted information as intelligence.

I actually developed writer's block for a moment there. I sat here starting at the screen thinking of something witty to say, but you killed my capacity to press keys without making the plastic crack.
No, they do not interpret information as intelligence. Rather, they understand that intelligence is useless without information. Not everything you say is intelligent just because its abstract. Software work in particular requires abstract thought since you are basically building invisible machines inside physical ones. But eventually those invisible machines need data, or else it just sits there in the void.
With your abstract brain playing around with no concrete ideas to ground them, you basically doom yourself to never saying anything genuinely smart people can process. In other words, you're babbling, and they're staring at your mouth wondering when it will close.
I can picture the date now.
Alto: "Life is best experienced with a good epistemology and a humble appreciation for beauty."
Nerd: "Uh-huh. Hey, check out this watch I built. See that light? That's my bullshit detector. It flashes when someone pretends to be interesting."

> Carla Swiryn, a matchmatcher for Three Day Rule, a start-up that offers curated online dating services in cities like San Francisco, Los Angeles, New York, and Chicago, said that her female clients are often hit with a double whammy: “I often hear women say they either date A-holes or nerds—or if they’re really lucky, both in one,” she said. “They feel like they’re dealing with someone who has poor social skills, not a lot of style, and isn’t that attractive, or is decently good-looking, successful, or cool, but by default knows it and acts like it, with a huge ego and selfish mind-set in tow.”

I love this! These ladies are dealing with what men have been dealing with for a long time!
I can’t begin to tell you how awful it’s been seeing the same attractive woman with the personality of an oven mitt. I like animals! I just want a guy to cuddle with! I eat food! Meepmeepmeepmeep Game of Thrones is infinitely more interesting than sex with most women. There, I said it.

> Arlene said that she was once contacted by a Microsoft programmer on OKCupid who required that she read Neuromancer before “he would consider taking me out on a date. He was not joking.”

Let me translate that guy for Arlene: “You must be interesting for me to be interested. Give me some indication that we have something in common, because God knows I don’t want to talk about your family or any other inane fucking shit.”

> Why were they so awful? What was it about guys who work in tech that made them worse than lawyers or other white-collar industries?

They are not desperate to get laid? They are actually obsessed about their passions instead of you? That they have life figured out and you don’t?
Or maybe your frustration has a much simpler reason.
They are men you can’t control.

NCFM Member's saga: Three DUI's, car wrecks, suicide attempt, drug abuse... and she gets custody of the children!

NCFM · 13 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I am watching the two Cichlid fish flit about the aquarium in the playroom. My 3 year old son and I picked them out last week. At the pet shop he set his sights on the ugliest fish in the tank, a tan and pink "calico" with black markings. It looked like a burn victim. I picked a pretty blue one to counter it and he named them Namo and Dad.

I have not seen him since May the seventh 2014. It was a Wednesday and one of the two days I am allowed to spend eight hours with him each week (plus every other weekend). I spent half of that day in court and since this is my off weekend I did not see him more than 12 hours this week. Today is Saturday the tenth. I will see him Monday.
That Wednesday presented itself as a horror show from the second I got to my attorney's office. I sat down and was informed that his mother would serve no jail time for the three D.U.I.s she had received over the last two years. A hurried agreement on her behalf by Judge Daniel Miliron and District Attorney Julia Wilt had spared her at the last minute and screwed me.
Later that afternoon I went to court hoping as the fit parent to gain custody of my son. I was in for another surprise. Despite being made aware of the three drug related D.U.I. offenses, all of which she was found guilty for and the suicide attempt by intentional overdose while home alone with our two year old son, Judge Sullivan granted her custody of our son again.
It's a horrible thing to wish the mother of your child in jail but it was my failsafe in the custody case that had been drug out for the last 3 years. The past two years had been the most telling. Her drug and mental health problems were getting to be too big for her and her family to hide. The Suicide attempt when she was alone with our child. The night I came home from work and found her passed out in an armchair in front of the television while our less than two year old boy played with a full bottle of Percocet at her feet.
Two times she had been committed, once voluntarily but she walked out of rehab before completion and the second for the intentional overdose.
When she got her first DUI she had just dropped our children off at our home and then turned around to get toilet paper from her parents' house. The police dropped her off an hour later because she had been driving erratically on the highway miles out of the way.

The second DUI she was again returning home from her parents house when she smashed into two parked cars destroying them both and rolling her Nissan Murano over onto the side walk upside down in front of the neighborhood tavern.

The third DUI came within 18 months of the first. She was still on probation from that first one and had yet to go to trial for the second. She was pulled over again for driving erratically near her parents' home. I was working as an EMT at the time of that incident and my boss a policeman and paramedic was the one who went to the station and verified her impairment.
With the exception of the incident of my son using a full bottle of opiates as a baby rattle you need not take my word for any of this. Everyone one of these incidents is documented by the police and courts, however she has yet to spend one day in jail and as of now the courts say she will not. Rather she will serve forty days of house arrest. On top of that the court also says that she is fit to have custody over my son even though I am here and able and anxious to care for him.
I have no criminal history over the last 13 years. I have worked full time hours ever since my son was born, own my house outright and paid off my truck in full.
At this point it is actually beginning to feel like a conspiracy perpetrated by the courts and her family to take my son away from me. Even I think that sounds crazy but what other reason could there be for a judge to forgive her for 3 drug related DUIs in a county that has notoriously little tolerance for that sort of thing and a completely different judge to decide that she is the more fit parent?
If she has custody of my child while she is on house arrest does that not effectively put my innocent son under house arrest?
I don't believe that what Judge Miliron did is legal. I know it is not ethical. He placed her on a house arrest program that monitors her for alcohol consumption when all of her D.U.I.s are DRUG related. She is not receiving any punishment for her original crimes or her multiple probation violations.
What Judge Sullivan did is in no way in the best interest of my son.
Furthermore, after all of this, as a social worker she is being allowed to continue working with developmentally disabled children, so the next child she puts at risk might be yours.

On Privilege and the Inexperience of Pundits

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 13 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Victor Zen talks about how privilege is cast as original sin to frighten the impressionable into positions of ideological servitude. In doing so, he reveals that the most evil people tend to consider themselves the most loving. The tyrannical emotionally manipulate others and themselves into a consensus and bark commands to build the utopia in their heads, without any regard to the costs involved.

Matriarchy, and the flight from fatherhood

Why are so many fathers separated from their children? For every man who is not actively engaged in the lives of his children, there is a story, of a decision that was made by someone. Many would have us believe that the norm is irresponsible, immature men who fear the commitments of parenthood and shirk their role out of pure selfishness. But how true is this?

Not just for Father's Day, but every day, the realities of fatherhood need to be scrutinized through a new lens, of an inescapable truth about childhood and the life of families: that motherhood, not fatherhood, is seen more and more as the senior position in the parental hierarchy. Whether a good thing or a bad thing, it is rare indeed to see a family unit with or without the father present, that is not clearly skippered by the woman of the house.

I have never been particularly drawn by the idea of patriarchy, of "what I say goes" and "my home is my castle", or even in every case "father knows best." I haven't lived it, haven't seen it, wouldn't know how to go about it, don't really see the need for it. But the very notion of male headship of a home, or even an equitable sharing of parental authority as opposed to an openly matriarchal model, has been under siege now for generations. Fatherhood as anything but a subordinate adjunct to motherhood, at whatever level of participation, has become the extreme exception whether parents live in the same home or not.

There is widespread agreement that fathers play a vital role for children throughout their lives. In whatever form advocated, it is common enough to see the role of fathers spoken of positively. But what is this role to be, by whom defined, and to what extent is it incumbent on mothers to allow and facilitate and honor it, lest it become impossible to carry out?

Canadian journalist Barbara Kay has remarked that "misandry in family law arises from an ideology that sees children as their mothers' property." This was a comment on divorce and custody law as discriminating against fathers, within a much broader talk that covered a great many topics on men's issues, but it comes as close as any analysis I have seen to describing what is increasingly the foundation of family life for today's fathers: maternal seniority, or more simply put, matriarchy, is what poses the core requirements of parenthood to fathers.

So what does this say to address why so many children grow up without their living, unincarcerated, non-institutionalized, fully capable fathers?

My Father's Day challenge to my readers is to ponder this: are men apart from their children for being no good, for being failures, for being dangerous to them? Or have a great many just not ultimately suited the preferences of someone with whom they conceived a child, someone who has assumed from the start that she may outrank and overrule her child's other parent at will and in perpetuity?

In today's world, there are few things to "move on" from that are accompanied by so many ways and means and rationales for leaving them behind, as fatherhood.

So a great deal of what I see, hear and read around Father's Day rings hollow with me, and not entirely for personal reasons: I have come to live with the knowledge that fatherhood with all it has to offer, under the rule of matriarchy, has become optional.

A Karen DeCrow Appreciation

Warren Farrell · 14 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Karen DeCrow and I were friends for more than 40 years. In the early 70's, when she was President of NOW (the National Organization for Women) and I was on the Board of NOW's NYC chapter, she asked me to run NOW's Task Force on the Masculine Mystique. When others protested my incorporating expanding liberation toward men, Karen supported me.

Karen and I worked together on my organizing the men's section of the Women's Strike for Equality in D.C.. She valued men as an auxiliary, but also sensed we had our own work to do—not as apologizing oppressors, but as fellow humans in a parallel straight jacket.

In the early 70s, Gloria Steinem, Betty Friedan, Karen and I would often say, "what the world needs is more women at work, and more dads at home." This was N.O.W.s position until about 1973. However, as divorces increased, NOW started hearing from moms who were dropping their memberships because, as the complaint usually ran, "I know my child best; I know what she or he needs. If I don't want the dad involved, it's for a reason—he's either a bad dad or we've had a bad experience and I just need to take my children away and start a new life."

N.O.W. was caught between supporting equality versus jeopardizing its base. It chose to not jeopardize its base. Gloria and Betty, while not changing their position rhetorically, looked the other way as NOW intensified its efforts to portray men either as deadbeats or self-interested ("they just want the money") or prone to domestic violence. Karen was the only other leading feminist who not only spoke differently, but agreed to speak at fathers' conferences. Karen's courage marginalized her from the feminist leadership and the millions of dollars of speaking fees she could otherwise have obtained.

I knew what Karen was enduring, because I took the same road she took. While my break was cleaner, Karen tried to walk the tightrope of the balance between integrity and retaining feminist colleagues and friends.

When she agreed in 2005 to write the foreword to my Why Men Earn More: the Startling Truth Behind the Pay Gap–and What Women Can Do About It, she shared with me some of her lifetime of worries about losing feminist support. It wasn't just the lost speaking fees. It was the isolation. It was desiring to lead, but being kept at arm's length by feminist leadership.

As Karen shared that, I recollect envisioning a devil and angel fighting inside her. In the case of the foreword and in other cases I witnessed, Karen almost always chose the angel of integrity.

With Karen's death passes a feminist who, were her leadership allowed to be the guiding light, would have allowed millions of children to have a dad to guide them and love them.

I posted a classified ad in The Sentinel, the school paper, that describes KSUM as a place where "we critique feminism for the damage it has caused due to its inherent hatred of males."

In an effort to protect her brand, an unnamed feminist sent the email below to me verbatim. My response is best made public.

> I am a feminist female student, and seeing your "Calling All Non-feminist" ad scares me.
> The 'hatred of men' did not come from feminism, and is not a feminist ideal. Misandry is the distrust and hatred of men, which is what I think you're trying to speak out against (and misandry isn't a real organization or anything). Both feminism and misandry are two very different philosophies that originate from the severe oppression and violence women have suffered for centuries. As a female (being such an easy target for violence) it scares me to see men against feminism—something that attempts to better the lives and quality of life for both women and men/all sexes and individuals in general.

> And you know—if it weren't for feminism women would not be able to really make any of their own choices or decisions (history shows that men always made those decisions regardless of what the woman wanted or how she felt about it, or how it would unfavorably affect her). If it weren't for feminism, women wouldn;t be attending college, they would not be able to excel in their careers, they would not have the right to choose what they do with their own bodies (i.e. sex, forced rape, pregnancy), etc. Again, feminism stresses for equal rights among all individuals, both female and male, while also stressing the importance of having the right to choose. Not only that, feminism tries to protect women from violent crimes because until recently it was okay to rape and beat women.

It's very frightening to be a woman especially when aware of all of the statistics, news reports, and women of whom I know that have suffered traumatic experiences because of the abuse inflicted upon them from certain (not all) men.

> Signed, A Feminist

Hello, and thank you for your email.
Advocating for men and boys entails opposing misandry and gynocentrism. I do not claim that feminism is the source of all hatred of men. But rational non-feminism emerged in response to hatred committed, enabled, or otherwise perpetuated by feminists. A discussion on feminism's inherent hatred of males is worthy of its own book, but this website has more than enough information available for your hopefully thirsty mind.
Don't worry, I will provide plenty of verifiable sources as I address the problems in your message.
[image]
KSUM Posters near the library (click to expand)

First of all, you have no reason to be scared of something just because it's different.
Men and boys are human beings with thoughts and feelings of their own, and the numerous issues affecting them (from violations of due process to workplace mortality and suicide) have not been adequately addressed by those professing to be for equality. They don't need an ideology to share in the compassion of their fellow human beings, and crawling out from under feminism gives them the opportunity to think outside of the box.
That said, feminism is subject to criticism like any other ideology. Equitable feminists like Christina Hoff Sommers and the recently passed Karen DeCrow offer refreshing objectivity, but the individual contributions of "the good feminists" are drops of pure water in a polluted ocean that too few people bothered to clean when bigots littered. Good apples don't ripen the bunch, and the bunch is not defined by the dictionary (see #4 in the linked article).

> As a female (being such an easy target for violence) it scares me to see men against feminism—something that attempts to better the lives and quality of life for both women and men/all sexes and individuals in general.

If we consider all forms of violence, I am far more likely to suffer violence as a man than you are as a woman. Popular stats that suggest otherwise are often exaggerated (e.g., "1 in 4 women are raped"). As a victim of mugging, I can promise you that it is not only women who are afraid to walk alone at night.
To say that you are an easy target is laughable. If a man hurts you, the public would seriously consider ending the man's life either literally or figuratively. But if you hurt a man, you might get away with it.

You can punch a man in the throat while screaming that he tried to hurt you, and he will be cuffed unless he caught you on tape. But on campus, the "Dear Colleague" letter helps ensure a false conviction anyway.
"How Can She Slap" and the media's silence in Boko Haram's slaughter of boys are telling, as is your ignorance of the male victims of Elliot Rodger. In each of these cases, men bled more.
I personally called local media outlets at rallies in Dayton, OH, and Ellisworth, ME, and none of them bothered to cover the due process violations we were protesting. After witnessing other exclusions from the media, I learned other harsh life lessons:

- A man cannot peacefully protect his church from vandalism without being sexually abused by feminist protesters.
- A man cannot crack an innocent joke without a feminist getting him fired.
- A man cannot attend a speech about boys without being verbally abused by violent feminist protestors.
- A man cannot record corrupt individuals in a public place without being struck (by a woman associated with the domestic violence industry, no less).
- A man cannot be allowed even to THINK about anything other than feminism without a woman like yourself expressing fear that could be used to harm him.

And you're scared?

> I highly recommend that you take Introduction to Sociology or Feminist Theory to learn the facts.

Facts like "until recently it was okay to rape and beat women?" When was it ever "okay" to rape or beat a woman? The only times that would even come close to being true is when considering abusive adherents of Abrahamic scripture, or belligerents in politically unstable areas. And even then many of the victims of erupted violence still include men. Did you get your talking points from a KSU course?
My credentials are in order and are available on request, but I want you to actually ask for them so I have some indication that you care. I expect to see yours as well.
You try to be academic when your role models are anything but. When I interviewed Dr. Adam Jones (an international gender violence expert), he mentioned being opposed for critiquing feminist methodology and gynocentric media coverage. He was impeded by ideologues, even though his contributions led to a more balanced discourse. Dr. Janice Fiamengo was treated with similar disrespect by feminist protestors at the University of Ottawa, as were Dr. Paul Nathanson (a gay man), Dr. Katherine Young, and Dr. Warren Farrell at the University of Toronto. Our own Alison Tieman caught feminist professor Adele Mercier committing rape apology. Oh, and Mercier helped bully Fiamengo.
Feminists make an active effort to hide evidence in an academic setting, even if it means abusing degree-holding professors, gays, women, boys, or anyone else.
I brought Nathanson and Young's scholarly trilogy on misandry to instructors, but none of them are prepared to teach the material. I know from first-hand experience that KSU has a massive blind spot, so don't pretend you are educated after being instructed by the pedagogical equivalent of a Mobius strip.
But even if feminism was harmless and inclusive, there is still feminist non-action that shows why KSU Men needs to exist.
I have butted heads with KSU security from January to the present time auditing the Rape Aggression Defense (RAD) systems implementation at KSU due to questionable comments in the Sentinel. This involved multiple meetings with legal counsel, sifting through public financial documents, and struggling to get the simplest questions answered about how men are treated in the program.
Our goal was to make sure men and women were treated equitably between the RAD for Men and RAD for Women courses. In what we hope was a result of our efforts, KSU Security has started promoting RAD for Men and RAD Basic (for Women) in the same email blast. This didn't solve the problems we have with it, but baby steps, right?
Quick question: Where were you? I couldn't find you or any other feminist anywhere.

We've never seen both classes promoted together before.

Let me share some other experiences you missed.
We want to rename the Women's Resource and Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center to simply "Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center." The IPV center offers services to men and women but is branded such that men don't know that the services are available to them (I didn't even know until the director told me in a chance conversation). Assistant Dean Dr. Bob Mattox told me that the IPV center has an aggregate function exclusive to women, with no comparable facilities offered to men.
This was an opportunity to lobby for an equitable presentation of institutional services and fix Title IX imbalances. Where were you?
You have likely walked right by this poster about gender symmetry in domestic violence on the fourth floor of the Social Sciences building.
[image]
Poster on KSU Discussing Gender-Symmetrical IPV

Somebody has gone out to do more research to make sure that both men and women are more equally represented in interpersonal violence (IPV) survey populations, which shows that women are not unilaterally threatened.

Where were you?
One time when I was staffing KSUM's table, a feminist dropped off this hate note and then walked off without a word.
Where were you?

Feminist: "Patriarchal, white supremacist, motherfucking fuck fuck…"

A Voice for Men has pooled money with the Canadian Association for Equality (whose video you cited), Honey Badger Radio, and other men's rights activists to find the alleged attacker of feminist Danielle d'Entremont.
Where were you? Or any other feminist, for that matter?
You wrote that feminism is working for everyone. Are you sure about that?
It was only when you noticed non-feminism's growth that you revealed your existence. The only opportunity you took was to protect your brand against the men and women who realized that feminism is not helping.
And you want to shove us aside so that feminism can take credit for the work we've been doing in its absence?
You are in walking distance of the human rights missions we started.
Where were you? Where are you?
KSUM has ads everywhere, including a big-ass 42″ x 56″ banner in the Student Center.
To every feminist at Kennesaw State University: If you want equity, show up and prove it.

> When women say they hate men, they usually say it for a reason.

Good lord, this is the exact opposite of proving it. You just excused hatred of a demographic while calling yourself equitable.
We pick up the mess you're pretending to clean, and we explore alternative thoughts because yours don't work. We won't let anyone tell us what to think, how to think, or when to speak. And we certainly won't wait for you to fulfill a promise you never intended to keep in the first place.
If that makes us look misogynistic, then that's not our problem. We certainly didn't spread that message, feminists did. Because for some stupid reason, they are scared of the idea that men want a change that doesn't include your way of looking at things.
You passed up several opportunities to work toward equality. Not all feminists are misandrists, but feminism as an ideology is based on harmful myths about men, and the biggest myth is the myth of male socioeconomic omnipotence, also known as the capital-"P" Patriarchy. Patriarchy is your excuse for remaining willfully ignorant of male pain. Patriarchy is your excuse for countless videos of feminists saying why feminism is a good thing. Patriarchy is your excuse for blaming men's problems ON men, so the system that benefits men apparently hurts them too, creating an inconsistent, non-falsifiable farce that makes you look like an even bigger idiot.
It takes hatred of men to believe what you do.
And through all of your linguistic gymnastics, you avoid doing any work outside of branding every ass you can with your iron.
We call ourselves non-feminists, and this includes harmless male and female humanists on the fence who don't call themselves men's rights advocates either. They are also welcome. Your contempt is so deep that you never thought for a second of how broad "non-femimism" is. So, did you insinuate that we are all misogynists because you love men and are trying to reach out in the spirit of equality?
You and I both know that's bullshit.
But in spite of our disagreements, I still invite you to become a member of KSU Men because we are open to all.
To you, and to every KSU student who cares about equity, click here, click "Join Organization," and sign in with your KSU NetID. (It says we have five members as of this moment because it will take a few days to get all recent signatories on the official roster.)
We meet every Tuesday and Thursday at 4:30 PM EST in CL 3050. We do not fear dissent, and we understand that we are fallible human beings who need to find the best ideas through rigorous, civil debate. (Also, free donuts.)

Speak your mind and be heard. But be warned: you will be treated like a human being here. Something tells me you won't like that.
Now if you'll excuse me, I have to get back to work with the talented, courageous people who make KSU Men possible.
The door will be open.

Thoughts From Afar

Susan Morris · 15 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When I first consulted a solicitor about divorcing my husband, I did so with great sadness. I'd been married nearly twenty years, and it had taken me nine of those years to make that decision, not least because I had married as a Catholic and we had always known that divorce would not be for us.

Haydn, my husband, was a lovely man, but unknown to us he was suffering an undiagnosed illness, compounded by ever-mounting work pressure. He was self-medicating by consuming ever-increasing amounts of alcohol, and I … well, I was self-medicating the emotional effects of a long-delayed but finally diagnosed gynaecological condition and series of operations that left me unable to have children. My drug of choice was work.

Haydn was an alcoholic, I was a workaholic. The only difference between us was that mine was a more socially acceptable condition. As he drank more, I worked more to be able to cope with what was happening to us. Finally, I knew it couldn't go on. For the sake of our individual future health and welfare, we needed to be apart.

And so I found myself sitting in the solicitor's office, listening as he began to give me the wisdom of his years of training and experience.

"You've given him the best years of your life, you're entitled to …"

What a bloody cheek! I was thirty-eight. I was going to decide what were the best years of my life, thank you very much! And, as far as I was concerned, they were yet to come.

"No."

He started again…. "You're entitled to …"

"No."

He looked at me and said, "As your solicitor, I must advise you."

"Okay. Advise me."

And so he did.

My response was to say, "Now your conscience is clear. You've advised me. Now we'll do it my way. Haydn and I came into this marriage fifty-fifty. We've shared everything for twenty years. We'll go out of it fifty-fifty."

And so we did. The marital home was sold and everything divided down the middle. Neither of us got very much money as there were mortgage arrears and other bills to pay.

Haydn had been living with his parents for some months. They had a holiday caravan on the coast, and Haydn and I met there to sort everything out, mostly amicably. On only one item was there a sticking point. The amount wasn't much and I gave in, deciding that we needed to move forward, but the principle still rankles. Though, in the general scheme of things, it was minuscule.

The divorce petition was evidently shaped like a boomerang because it bounced in and out of the divorce court as I twice submitted it and twice withdrew it.

I decided that now that we were separated and there was space between us, all three hundred miles of it, I didn't need the divorce. It was more important for Haydn to be able to get his health back, not tip him further over the edge.

We'd been separated for five years by the time I finally brought about the divorce, without the need for a solicitor apart from witnessing my signature. And I only did so then because I was about to be made bankrupt, a casualty of a recession during which I had lost my job and then my home in a time of negative equity. I didn't want any comeback on Haydn—hence the divorce—but by then he was able to cope with it.

Haydn and I remained in telephone contact as he went through treatment for his alcoholism, but it always seemed weird to me that his pattern of behaviour didn't seem to fit that of what I thought I knew of alcoholics.

Finally, on one of his frequent alcohol-induced inpatient stays in the local mental hospital, the doctor had a light bulb moment: "You're not an alcoholic! You've got manic depression."

And so it proved to be. Haydn was not an alcoholic. He was suffering from manic depression, now known as bipolar disorder. Once he received the correct medication, he began to live his life again.

And what a life!

For a while he still attended AA but was politely invited to leave (in Haydn's words, he was thrown out) for daring to suggest that there was life after alcohol. My quiet husband who wouldn't say boo to a goose had become a rebel. Haydn was never able to work in a paid position again but did much work in the volunteer sector. He became chairman of the local mental health outpatients group. Haydn had always been able to talk with people from all levels of society and now he took it further. Dressed in his motorcycle leathers he'd arrive at people's doors in answer to calls for help from drug and alcohol addicts. Haydn never took drugs (other than his prescription medication), but as he said, drugs or alcohol, the causes and effects are the same. No matter how people talked, he could talk the same way, using posh language or the language of the street. He gained their trust and never abused it.

On one occasion, shortly after joining the motorway on his fast motorbike, he was pulled over by a speed cop. Fearing a speeding ticket, Haydn sat there, watching the policeman walk up to him.

"Now, now, Mr Morris …"

"How do you know my name?"

"We know all about you and the work that you do. Just keep your speed down," and with that admonishment, off went the speed cop, leaving Haydn sitting there bemused. And relieved.

Haydn would get quite upset if, in his words, he "lost" somebody. But he knew that if somebody was really intent on killing themself, they would do so, sooner or later.

He was invited to ride in the funeral procession with a chapter of the Hell's Angels. It was a great honour. They knew he had tried to help their mate and it was their way of respecting him for it (though they didn't quite like the way he smelled. Haydn washed. They didn't!).

And so, for a few short years, Haydn lived the life I'm sure he was destined to live: one of helping people. My only regrets are that he had to go through such hell to get there and that it cost us our marriage.

But he wasn't really strong enough in himself for all the work he was doing. Finally, there came the Christmas in which there was no card from him. Always, his had been the first card to arrive. I was sure that the absence of a card meant he was ill again.

Haydn died a few weeks later. I'm sure he was worn out, not only by the effects of his illness but also by his efforts to help others when he really wasn't strong enough in himself.

The crematorium was packed, with people standing at the back. People came from all walks of life and from several organizations to honour the man who gave so much of himself through such a terrible illness.

[image]

Haydn and I had lived together twenty years. We'd lived apart another thirteen years. Divorce after five years of separation had simply been a legal device to make things simple. It had never meant the ending of our emotional marriage. Emotionally, he had never been my ex-husband, but now Haydn was my late husband. And I was a widow, not an ex-wife.

Of course, for a long time after he died, I was angry. We hadn't gone through all of that just for him to die! And it took me a long time to be able to see motorcyclists in black leathers on big red powerful machines without getting upset.

Why am I telling you all this? Because I think so much stems from the attitude of that solicitor.

"You've given him the best years of your life. You're entitled to …"

If I had been caught up in the heartbroken emotional moment of ending the marriage (or a different and not so stubborn type of woman), I could easily have given in to the solicitor. But fortunately I was able to withstand his pressures.

I was lucky. Haydn and I were lucky. We went on to live lives that neither of us had expected, that certainly were not on our agendas so many years before but that were fulfilling in their own way. And, more importantly, there was never any animosity between us.

I have read of so many couples who intended to divorce amicably but who, once the lawyers got involved, finished up at each other's throats, barely able to live on the same planet, let alone speak to each other, leaving so many men harbouring bitter thoughts against the wives who took them for every penny they had and more.

I have to wonder just how many of those women did so because their solicitor said, "You've given him the best years of your life. You're entitled to …"

It is somewhat ironic that it was a male solicitor. It was some years ago, but I have no doubt that the same attitude still exists, with both male and female solicitors.
What do we do to change that legal mindset?

Why Still a Feminist: A Question for Christina Hoff-Sommers

AVfM Video Source · 16 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Someone we've long been a fan of, Christina Hoff-Sommers, has an answer to a question she gets a lot. We think it's a fair answer, but we have another question we hope she will one day answer:

We think Dr. Sommers would be well-served to acknowledge that figures on poverty often erase men; men are the majority of the homeless population by far, and they frequently die as a result of it, often by their own hand. And even in the third world, it's good to look at where women are treated badly but it's important to look at where men are treated badly because the horror stories there are huge and deserve attention too; in most of these supposedly "male dominated" societies men are frequently beaten to death, tortured, enslaved–and yes, women play a role in that. As long-time admirers who have even learned from you, we would like you to address that some time if you can.

It's fair enough for there to be a women's movement, but given the horrors men frequently face that are as bad as what you describe, is there also not a need for a strong men's movement that looks after the interest in men and boys as well?

In any case, we hope our readers will subscribe to the Factual Feminist. –DE

Workplace Inequality: When One Side Has an Escape Hatch

*[TRIGGER WARNING FOR FEMINISTS: ANY REFERENCE IN THIS ARTICLE TO THE STERILIZATION OF GIRLS IS SATIRE INTENDED ONLY FOR ILLUSTRATIVE PURPOSES. THE AUTHOR IN NO WAY ADVOCATES ANY SUCH ACTION.]

> No woman should be authorised to stay at home to bring up her children. Society should be totally different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one.
> —Simone de Beauvoir (In "A Dialogue with Simone de Beauvoir" [1])

The other day as I was walking in the sunshine, pedestrians suffered the inconvenience of having to step off the footpath and onto the road because a team of sweaty, singlet-clad workmen with dirt and dust sticking to their skin were digging a trench. Shovelling spades of dirt alongside the trench with the precision of surgeons wielding scalpels, the workers hardly raised any dust into the path of pedestrians. They were all men, of course, and I could fairly confidently conclude that they weren't digging the trench for the joy of it. Between the trench and the road, a number of well-dressed women holding designer handbags in their manicured hands were waiting at the bus stop, scowling at having to contend with the little bit of wind-blown dust that our spade-wielding surgeons could not avoid. Oh, the inconvenience.

I wish I had had a camera. There could be no more compelling example of the dynamic between slave and entitled. No doubt some of the women were off to work at jobs that they would not be in were it not for affirmative action policies, to account for all those millennia of oppression of women by men. So what was the likelihood that any of the women standing at the bus stop would trade places with any of the men digging the trench?

A Natural Law of the Universe

Simone de Beauvoir understood the nature of the problem. Her above-referenced comment to Betty Friedan, while coming from a woman's perspective, was ultimately an expression of a fundamental law for all life throughout the universe. Namely, every living organism is inclined to choose the path of least resistance, least pain, greatest reward. All organisms are pain-averse and reward-seeking; if they weren't, they would die and life itself would not be possible. Neither ecosystems nor free markets can exist without this principle. Yes, even free markets: between two items identical in every way but bearing different pricetags, a sane person will always choose the cheaper. Likewise, consider choosing between a life committed to a STEM trajectory that typically promises high stress, long hours and working in a demanding environment versus staying in a comfortable home and being provided for by someone who is committed to said high-stress, high-performance treadmill. To someone for whom both options are culturally sanctioned, the preferred choice should be obvious. The options become even more pronounced when said provider is a miner or construction worker. No woman needs to be oppressed by any patriarchy, nor anyone else for that matter, in order to choose the most comfortable option. The great law of the universe cuts across all living organisms, all persons across all cultures, all lifestyles and both sexes. Women instinctively realize where the better deal lies. No women's studies major is required to understand this, though if they must … Simone de Beauvoir.

Now, it is true that it is often difficult to see how the other side experiences their world. While we might expect that some women will perceive the grass to be greener on the provider side, a free market based on equal opportunity will test a woman's resolve and the question will, with a bit of serious introspection, be laid to rest. It must also be said that the questions are not always unreasonable—old-boy networks have their own history of privilege and entitlement, and challenging these is to the benefit of both men and women. But these kinds of questions have little part to play in the contemporary feminist agenda.

An Escape Hatch Changes Perceived Risk and Motivation

So how do we resolve the issue of gender inequality in the workplace? The only way to approximate true gender equality in the workplace is to remove the stay-at-home option that is available to women. Exactly as de Beauvoir suggests. The question is: How do we accomplish this in any meaningful way?

De Beauvoir understood that women are raised in this world with an escape hatch. This ever-present soft option wires women's brains (relates to the topic of neural plasticity [2]). For example, Haier et al. (2005) [3] found that men's and women's brains differ in the distribution of white (glial) and gray (neural) matter, with intelligence tests showing that on average, men used 6.5 times as much gray matter as women did, but that women used 9 times as much white matter as men did. Soft and hard options wire brains differently.
Women have permission to leave if the going gets too tough, or even not to consider going there if it looks too much like hard work. The reason that so few women do STEM courses is that they don't have to. It's the reason why so few women work in mines or construction sites, or sweep roads or dig trenches—they don't have to. This has nothing to do with The Patriarchy oppressing women. What woman would choose to work in demanding, stressful situations or dirty, life-threatening situations if they didn't have to? Does one really need a women's studies degree to answer this question?
And once we realize that stay-at-home women don't work because they don't have to, a whole slew of other don't-have-tos falls neatly into place. For example:

- Women don't rob banks because … they don't have to.
- Women don't get into violent confrontations because … they don't have to.
- Women don't pursue stressful career paths because … they don't have to.
- Women don't pursue dangerous career paths because … they don't have to.
- Women don't pay for their share of the expenses on a date because … they don't have to.
- Women are less likely than men to be homeless because … they don't have to (provide for themselves).
- Women are less likely to be imprisoned because … they don't have to (take the same risks as men).
- Women don't fight in wars because … you guessed it, they don't have to.

These are all different ways of saying pussy-pass. Of course "because they don't have to" comes with subtexts; for example, "because they have men doing it for them" or "because they can."

- Women work in air-conditioned offices instead of dusty, dangerous mines because … they can.
- Women stay at home because … they can.
- Women (prostitutes) accept payment for selling their bodies because … they can.
- Women rely on men to take the initiative because … they can.
- Women rely on men to do the heavy lifting because … they can.
- Women cry because … they can.
- Women play the helpless victim because … they can.
- Women have a rationalization hamster because … they can.

Nobody is being oppressed. Women do these things because they can.
The subtexts that women enjoy as entitlements become the subtexts that men actualize as obligations.

- Men work because … they must (they have no choice).
- Men work in dusty, dangerous mines instead of air-conditioned offices because … they must (nobody is going to provide for them).
- Men pursue stressful career paths because … they must (they know what has to be done to secure their place in the hierarchy).
- Men pursue dangerous career paths because … they must (they know that a provider raising a family has responsibilities).
- Men get into violent confrontations because … they must (sometimes their survival depends on it, and sometimes wars require it).

- Men pay the expenses on a date because … they must (it's just what providers do, and women will look elsewhere if said date does not deliver on his obligations).
- Men pay for sex because … they desire (men are never desired for anything other than what they can provide).
- Men take the initiative because … they must (they would finish up with nothing if they did not).
- Men do the heavy lifting because … they must (they would receive no reward if they did not).
- Men don't play the helpless victim because … they must not (they receive no reward for it other than a cardboard box and homelessness).
- Men don't have a rationalization hamster [4] because … they don't have that luxury (their assumptions are constantly being tested and revised in accordance with the penalties exacted for wrong choices).

Let us take a closer look at this rationalization hamster phenomenon because it kind of wraps up our point about the relationship between experience and character and how this relates directly to how brains are wired. [5] Women's solipsism and impulsiveness rely on the fact that they don't need to have their perspective of the world tested. Their rationalization hamster is at liberty to scamper hither and thither, rarely having to contend with consequences or having to take responsibility for bad choices. Again, it is their ever-present soft option—the option to stay at home—that colors their risks and becomes habituated and wires their brains.

This is all another way of expressing the point that Alison Tieman makes in her video [6] describing gender roles in the context of actor and acted upon. When we talk about equality in the workplace, we are talking about changing the relationship between actor and acted upon … and we are ultimately talking about changing biology.

De Beauvoir's observation makes perfect sense. But where her reasoning falls down is in the assumption that you can somehow manipulate women's motivations through propaganda and the force of law. Nothing could be further from the truth because the mere availability of the soft option, whether or not it is taken, colors all choices and the risks associated with it. The same option, to a woman or a man, is the difference between suck-it-and-see and do-or-die. A woman can entertain the idea of being a fireperson as a dare, maybe for a joke or for a laugh, and affirmative action will enable her to actualize her whimsical flight of fancy. She is at liberty to suck-it-and-see and then have a laugh if it does not work out. A fireman, by contrast, is unlikely to perceive his role in quite the same way. For him, it's a career choice, an identity, a way of life, a statement of something that he stands for.

The Solution

The only solution that might bring us in any meaningful way closer to true equality in the workplace is to close the escape hatch; bolt it down, lock it up and throw away the key. More specifically, permanently sterilize all females before they reach reproductive age. Only this step can stand any realistic chance of removing the stay-at-home option from women's choices. Only this step might make redundant the primary nurturer role that justifies the stay-at-home option for women. Only this step can stand any chance of rewiring the brains of men and women so as to make women more competitive with men in the workplace. Why? Because it is the only way, ideally, that both women and men will see every option with the same shade of do-or-die or suck-it-and-see.

So are we prepared to accomplish de Beauvoir's vision by removing women's soft option? Will we make these sorts of changes in the interests of equal opportunity in the workplace? If not, then we are stuck in a division of labour based on gender roles. This division of labour has nothing to do with patriarchal oppression and everything to do with biology. If we want to establish true equality in the workplace, then the only way to do it is to change biology, thereby changing the cultural options that depend on it. And we do this by making the sterilization of girls a compulsory rite of passage always performed before they are able to reproduce. Like their mothers before them and their grandmothers before them.

True, there are some minor glitches in this strategy that need to be ironed out, but at least it is more realistic than the current trashing of men's rights in the interests of an "equality" that never was—an "equality" that relies on denying men their rights and disregarding the complex web of risks, demands and complexities that color men's options.

Clint Carpentier · 17 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I remember Karen Straughan asking Paul Elam in an interview if AVFM was averse to publishing happy moments. AVFM can often come across as “doom and gloom” due to the nature of its content, but that isn’t to say that AVFM is wallowing in apocalyptic proselytizing or that its writers are nihilistic. The truth is, we understand that the good days outnumber the bad, but it’s the bad we need to focus on by necessity. There’s no point in trying to bring awareness to fix parts that are already subjectively “right” with our lives. It’s the bad that needs to be dealt with. Having said that, much of our lives are fairly satisfactory and/or happy. On top of that, most people like to be somewhat private. After all, how credible can a site be if the majority of articles are about long walks on the beach, or dry-humping in the kitchen, or mock-playing at abusive spouse? I could write a whole long-winded article about how much joy I get out of bitching and complaining while mowing the excessively large lawn I don’t know why I have that is overflowing with equipment to occupy yard apes who leave snack wrappers in the damnedest of places; I’m sure a neighbor’s sock drawer is close to empty. But I digress.

It was Father’s Day, or so I’m told. The days all blur together and holidays tend to just pop up, like yesterday, when I got home from work. Anyhow, I thought I’d share a touch of happiness for all the haters who think my life is miserable for having opinions about relationships that don’t jive with gynocentrism.

The 40th anniversary of Rape Culture™. Why feminists won't be celebrating it, and why MRAs should embrace it.

> You can fool all the people some of the time, and some of the people all the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time. — Abraham Lincoln

The term "rape culture" has been bandied about since the 1970s. Its origin is from the title of the film Rape Culture™, produced in late 1974 and released in January 1975. The film's 40th anniversary is upon us, so surely there must be plans in centres of academia, at the National Organization for Women (NOW), and across the universe and pantheon of feminism for such a momentous event's ruby celebration.

Imagine the marketing opportunities for Ruby Slippers and Walk a Mile in Her Shoes. One can only hope that the world of feminism includes some competent marketing types who will grasp the links and not allow this promotional gift to pass the world by. It needs some expertise well above the capacities of the average academic type being sisterly on campus with marker pens, badly written signs, and a penchant for pulling fire alarms.

As an aside, Walk a Mile in Her Shoes has no Wikipedia page because the name is also a campaign launched in recognition of World Water Day, March 22, which started in 1993. World Water Day and A Mile in Her Shoes concern access to safe drinking water in underdeveloped nations, where children, predominately girls, take 10,000 steps per trip carrying water, often three times per day. The average US family uses over 150 gallons of water per day, while in developing nations families have available on average only 5 gallons, carried long distances by children.

The image of a child with a bucket on his or her head just can't compete with hoards of entitled middle-class women attempting to convince the world that they are at risk of immediate sexual assault—living in constant fear—and cheering on grown men in six-inch red stilettos. Can't have that, so there is no Wikipedia page that could undermine the image that so many entitled middle-class types use to prop up their social agendas and push them out globally. After all, the North American feminist fear of rape trumps Third World thirst every time.

The following two images illustrate just how warped the Googlearchy combined with social agendas can be: the first is an image search for the phrase "Walk a Mile in Her Shoes" and the second simply adds the word "Water" to the search.

Google Image Search for "Walk a Mile in Her Shoes"

Google Image search for “Walk a Mile in Her Shoes”+Water

You can see that the first image is exclusively linked to First World fixations, with stiletto shoes and rapists hiding behind every shadow, and that in the second image the meme of First World female security even invades and overruns the basic necessities of life. Red stilettos pushed their way up the Googlearchy rankings and thirst was pushed out of the picture. Some are so privileged and they don’t even know it.

But back to the main issues and thrust of this article: the term “rape culture” has recently been pushed into the mainstream media in the USA through political activism. You can even chart its rise using Google Trends. It really got going in early 2012, which coincides with two political matters that are concurrent in very odd ways—but more of that later.

Rape culture: it just sounds so right that it has to mean what people think, doesn’t it? It’s been accepted and swallowed hook, line, and sinker, with journalists, pundits, and so many others failing to ask the basic questions—what does it mean and where did it come from?

Those failures and deliberate omissions are promoting sexism, racism, intellectual fraud, financial fraud, distorted perception, and are even distorting history. The Googlearchy has played its part, driving indifferently valid, indifferently accurate, and indifferently biased net content up its search rankings with no quality control or validation other than social pressure and financial gain. It is influencing politics and social perceptions globally. If you have the capacity, will, and herd-mentality supporters to link and quote content, you can define reality and then demand that the rest of the world follow you or be marginalised.

Many won’t even recognise that there is a difference between “Rape Culture” (upper case) and “rape culture” (lower case). There is. The main and simple difference is that “Rape Culture” (upper case) is the name of a film inspired by the work of a not-for-profit group called Prisoners Against Rape (PAR) founded September 9, 1973, by Larry Canon and William Fuller, inmates of Lorton Reformatory Virginia. “rape culture”(lower case) is what has been done to the equality and civil rights work of PAR since 1975. What academic terms mean and what Joe and Joanna Q. Public think they mean are very different, and so it is with “rape culture” and especially “Rape Culture.”

Academic sources define rape culture as follows:

> Rape culture is a concept of unknown origin and of uncertain definition; yet it has made its way into everyday vocabulary and is assumed to be commonly understood. The award-winning documentary film Rape Culture made by Margaret Lazarus in 1975 takes credit for first defining the concept.

Blackwell is available in both print and electronic versions: the e-format is updated three times per year. Reviewers say of Blackwell: "The most up-to-date work on this topic … Essential. Lower-level undergraduates through faculty/researchers."*
So Blackwell is just about the most basic starting point for sociological academic sources, recognised widely across the globe as the best place to look up anything in sociology written in the English language and for everyone from the lowest student to the highest faculty member. Blackwell recognises the distinction of lower and upper case because "Rape Culture" is a proper name and is the name of the film Rape Culture™.
The actual truth and history of Rape Culture™ is fascinating, and it reveals many amazing people who deserve recognition and celebration for their work and courage in addressing inequality, racism, sexism, the normalisation of sexual assault as a control mechanism within institutions, and the mass indifference of those with privilege in society.

- William Fuller, Black Male Prisoner, Lorton Reformatory
- Loretta Ross, Black Woman, DC Rape Crisis
- Yulanda Ward, Black Woman, DC Rape Crisis
- Nkenge Toure, Black Woman, DC Rape Crisis

Loretta Ross, a woman of some standing in the area of reproductive rights, rape, and social justice, has even said this of the work with Prisoners Against Rape: "Oh, I've forgotten to tell you about Prisoners Against Rape. One of the more interesting things that happened when I was at the Rape Crisis Center is that we got contacted by a group of black men who were prisoners at Lorton Reformatory.—But I did enjoy dealing with Prisoners Against Rape" (Interview, 2004/5).
In the 1970s, the most raped and marginalised groups in US society were black men and women, and the most at risk of rape were black male prisoners in the US prisons systems. The use of rape and threat of rape as riot control and punishment is even a cultural joke in "Don't Drop the Soap." Rape of women in prison is seen as abhorrent, but rape of male prisoners is made into a joke and even a board game. You can buy your own box set of cultural misandry (not suitable for children) on Amazon. The Washington Post says of it: "A hilarious, yet artful romp in which five players vie to be the first out of jail" Kris Coronado, March 9, 2009.
I remain amazed that in these media-driven times with instant access to so much data, resources, and video, so few have noticed that Rape Culture™ exists. Given how easy it is to learn on the move, watching on a smartphone, hooked into Twitter or Facebook, and how easy it is to share media via webpages and email, it seems almost impossible to believe that the film has just been overlooked by so many. How Is That Possible?
Here is an excerpt from the film Rape Culture™. It was located through the website of the Academy Award–winning filmmaking organization Cambridge Documentary Films—they have a current webpage about the film.

The original excerpt in QuickTime format is located in the Internet archive Wayback Machine and was archived February 13, 2006. It's amazing what net content has been recorded for posterity. You just have to know where it is and how to retrieve it. There was even contemporary reporting on the film in academic journals and other media:

- Judy Norsigian, Women, Health, and Films, Women & Health, January 20, 1975, Vol. 1, Issue 1, pages 29–30.
- Rape Culture Film, Panel In Ridgefield, The Ridgefield Press, June 23, 1977.
- Rape: Mix of Sex, Violence, and Economics, The Lewiston Daily Sun, January 27, 1977

Some, such as Friada Kleine, seemed to make careers out of organising screenings and discussions, especially in the Michigan area. In fact, there was an outburst or renewed interests in rape culture (lower case) in Michigan in the mid-'80s and then again in the mid-'90s.
A little known fact, which is so hard to find due to the Googlearchy, is that the first submission ever to Congress that used the term "rape culture" refers to the film Rape Culture™. That was due to the work of William Fuller of Prisoners Against Rape, who submitted evidence to Congress in 1978. It's all there in the historical record, but you have to look for it.

> 1973 found me studying intensely books and other materials related to rape. It was also in 1973 that I conceived of and organized a group named Prisoners Against Rape. We held weekly education meetings here in prison with members of the outside community at which we dealt with the many aspects of rape and other violence. I initiated and replied to nationwide correspondence, visits, interviews with the media and Rape Crisis Centers. I was also involved with the making of a group film titled "Rape Culture."

Some interesting facts about the term "rape culture": if you search for it using Google, the Blackwell Encyclopedia of Sociology 2007 entry is not even in the top 100 results. If you use Google Scholar to search for it…, it simply does not exist. You have to ask Google for "rape culture"+definition before Blackwell even gets a mention, and the term is still absent from Google Scholar.
In Google Scholar you will find The Wiley-Blackwell Concise Encyclopedia of Sociology, which in its less than half-page entry on page 493 fails to mention any history or origin details. That is truly troubling, as it shows that scholars are deliberately not using Blackwell as a reference and going for lower quality sources. Could it be that they are showing bias and demand a definition that does not contain doubt? Or is it that once they grasp that the origin involves black male prisoners they seek ways to make both the male and racial issues vanish along with any doubt?
Rape Culture™ the film was noticed to be missing from Wikipedia in January 2011. A dialogue was started on the talk pages (now archived), and existing editors simply refused to address the issue. In the end, on May 7, 2012, a separate wiki page was created for Rape Culture™. The main wiki page was edited to include references to the film, and the objections began to heat up. Editors continue to claim that there are multiple sources for the term "rape culture," and yet they can't provide any academic or independent sources to support their claims. As such, it's original research and not allowed. However, it's defended and protested by a cadre of wiki editors because they have to have their reality and not the actual reality as set out under Wikipedia rules. It's shocking too just how much these feminist editors push US-centric bias, not even looking for sources outside the USA, such as the work of Professors Upendra Baxi of India or Taboho Meitse of South Africa. The racial and systemic bias is quite disgusting.

The actual Blackwell Encyclopedia reference was added to the Wikipedia page January 21, 2013—and the page read, "rape culture is a concept of disputed origin and meaning …" But that wasn't allowed to stand for long—the page was reverted and the editor attacked for using quality references that met all the required standards of Wikipedia.

The battle raged for days, with multiple reverts and editors being attacked on multiple fronts with accusations of racism, hate crime, and unwiki ways—and then they were blocked for all eternity because they used quality academic sources that a cadre of feminist editors could not allow to stand. It's all there for review in Wikipedia if you know how to look for it. The reference to Blackwell managed to survive until 00:54, February 12, 2013, and then it was banished, never to appear again. One point that was of great contention were references to rape culture being a term in sociology, as that encourage others to look for references in that academic field, and of course the basic one is from the Blackwell Encyclopedia of Sociology (2007).

Of most interest is how on May 2, 2013, an editor then attempted to cover up the issue by linking to The Wiley-Blackwell Concise Encyclopedia of Sociology and its far less detailed and less than half-page entry in an attempt to misdirect editors and the public as to sources and quality. Of course it also means that the doubt is removed as expressed by Professor Joyce E. Williams. It's all standard smoke and mirrors and the psychology of abuse.

So it's now clear to me why the 40th anniversary of the coining of the term "rape culture" will not be celebrated by the feminists of the developed world. They simply can't risk all the truths coming out, the correction to texts and student mindsets and professors who have peddled less than scholarly knowledge in an effort to defend tenure as they look at the finishing line of a pension they can't afford to lose. They also can't afford the racism and bias to see the light of day.

#SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen anyone?

There are many who believe that feminism is a conspiracy theory, and I can see where they are coming from. Personally, I see the issue as one more of undue influence and the desperate need that many have to be liked and in the right. I have no doubt that there are small and very well-informed groups that have been using social psychology to get their own ways to control national groups by emotive misinformation. It's all very clear when you study the Woozle effect that there are combinations of foolishness, mendacity, and deliberate exploitation at play. The history of moral panics linked to child battery, anorexia, domestic violence, and now rape all have the same pattern and evolution, except rape culture is the first to be significantly linked to the Internet.

One reason that so many will really not want any scrutiny of rape culture or its history is the recent publication by Lara Stemple and Ilan H. Meyer, "The Sexual Victimization of Men in America: New Data Challenge Old Assumptions," in the June 2014 issue of the American Journal of Public Health. The commentary on the study alone raises many eyebrows: the authors' analysis of how the CDC hid the truth of male victims is withering. The CDC's National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NISVS) 2010 was publicly published after inexplicable delay in January 2012. It was an odd coincidence that just a few days earlier (January 6, 2012), the FBI had announced it was adopting a new definition of rape as well.

The fact that the new FBI definition coincided with the CDC definitions was not in any way seen as coincidental or linked in any way with the CDC's delay in publishing the report. There were raised eyebrows, though, given the great number of people who had campaigned for rape by envelopment to be included in the new definition. But of course those details have been blocked too, and the CDC apparently knew of this while drafting its 2010 reports. Concerns raised by Stemple and Meyer's findings are summed up here:

> In one of the studies included in the analysis, the CDC found that an estimated 1.3 million women experienced nonconsensual sex, or rape, in the previous year. Notably, nearly the same number of men also reported nonconsensual sex. In comparison to the large number of women who were raped, nearly 1.3 million men were "made to penetrate" someone else. Despite the use of these two different categories, the CDC data reveal that both women and men experienced nonconsensual sex in alarming numbers. – Press Release, April 30, 2014

So the CDC found alarming numbers of both men and women subjected to sexual assault in the USA, the same number of men and women. Odd how the CDC ignored the alarm bells.

It puts those claims of "1 in 4" in context because surely it must mean that 1 in 4 college males are subjected to sexual assault during their college career, with the most likely assailant being college women? That agrees with a number of studies that have found that 43% of high school boys and young college men reported they had an unwanted sexual experience, and of those, 95% said a female acquaintance was the aggressor (Study, March 2014).

> Rates of sexually aggressive behaviors among women vary from one segment of the United States to another, but the evidence presented here shows that as many as 7% of women self-report the use of physical force to obtain sex, 40% self-report sexual coercion, and over 50% self-report initiating sexual contact with a man while his judgment was impaired by drugs or alcohol (Anderson, 1998). Given these numbers, it is appropriate to conclude that women's sexual aggression now represents a usual or typical pattern (i.e., has become normal), within the limits of the data reviewed in this paper.
> From Deviance to Normalcy: Women as Sexual Aggressors, Peter B. Anderson, Ph.D., and Dyan T. Melson, M.Ed. Electronic Journal of Human Sexuality, Volume 5, October 23, 2002.

And:

> Almost 1 in 10 respondents (9.3%) reported having used aggressive strategies to coerce a man into sexual activities. Exploitation of the man's incapacitated state was used most frequently (5.6%), followed by verbal pressure (3.2%), and physical force (2%). An additional 5.4% reported attempted acts of sexual aggression.
> WOMEN'S SEXUAL AGGRESSION AGAINST MEN, 2003

So now there is a real problem because those who have peddled and benefited most from the "rape culture" moral panic will have to address the sexually aggressive behaviour of American college women, and given that they sexually assault at the same rates as men are reported to, it will have to be an equality issue, equal for both genders, just as it was back in 1974/5 when a little known film was made called Rape Culture™.
Can't we have a celebration, even if it has taken 40 years for the truth to come out and for the real equality and civil rights issues to take a step forward?

Caitlin Roper professional victim, amateur man hater

Greg Canning · 17 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Online Opinion an Australian leftist website recently published a piece by Caitlin Roper a victim blogger and the West Australian coordinator of feminist group Collective Shout titled "The male cloak of invisibility."
Roper argues that Australia is facing a serious epidemic of "men's violence against women" manifest as "rape, battering, abuse even murder." But rather than provide evidence for such an assertion she simply links to other feminist advocacy groups (White Ribbon and UN Women) that are not independent arbiters of the current status of peer-reviewed violence research but rather the well-funded vocal mouthpieces of feminist orthodoxy.
So what is the current evidence concerning partner violence in Australia?
The most authoritative source of information it the Australian Bureau of Statistics Personal Safety Survey, with information collected in 2005 and again in 2012. Even this research is tainted by feminist ideology and gender bias in that the 2012 sample included only 22% of male respondents (a decrease from 27% in 2005). None the less it showed on both occasions that men account for at least one in three of the victims of partner violence in Australia, but more importantly that the vast majority of perpetrators of dating and partner violence against men were female – only 6 or 7 per cent of incidents involved same-sex violence.
In relation to sexual assault the 2012 Personal Safety Survey found that almost one in three victims of sexual assault during the previous 12 months were male whilst more than one in three victims of physical and/or sexual abuse before the age of 15 were male.
Since 1989 the Australian Institute of Criminology through the National Homicide Monitoring Program has collated data on homicides. Rather then epidemic rates of partner homicide, current rates are reported to be at a historic low, with at least one in three victims of intimate partner homicide being male. This of course is likely to be an underestimate as homicide by proxy usually by a man on behalf of a woman will not be recorded as a partner homicide and typical female methods of homicide such as poisoning may go undetected.
Roper uses well-worn feminist techniques of conflation and selective citation in an attempt to stimulate moral outrage. Combining statistics like one in three women will be victims of partner abuse in their lifetime with a few anecdotal examples of the very worst cases, attempt's to paint all partner violence as this severe form (intimate terrorism) when in fact a vast majority of that "1 in 3 " group will have only ever experienced some minor relationship conflict, which according to current definitions could be as trivial as a mean word or a threatening look.
In typical feminist rhetorical style Roper takes the opportunity to infuse her article with overt male hatred and repeated references to "naming the problem" of "men's violence against women" and the "gendered nature of men's violence" as if no other type of violence and certainly not any form of female violence exists.
I guess Caitlin has not checked out the statistics on: non–therapeutic termination of pregnancy, post-viability and post-birth termination of pregnancy/the fetus, infanticide, neonaticide, filicide, women's predominant roles in child abuse, neglect, elder abuse or the extent of women's use false allegations of abuse as a tool of abuse. It's as if these aspects of female violence are "softened or made non-existent" by a complete refusal on the part of feminists to even acknowledge them let alone NAME them.
No feminist piece on partner violence would be complete without the ludicrous claims that this "men's violence against women" is accepted tolerated and even condoned by society. I have yet to see a single reputable person argue violence against women is ok. But female violence against men of course IS routinely minimized and excused, after all what did he do to deserve it? This is one of the issues explored by Dr Nerdlove in this excellent article "Invisible Victims: Men in Abusive Relationships" with thanks to Judgy Bitch for sharing the link.
Psychologist Adam Blanch, a father and therapist with both clinical and research experience of male victims of partner abuse, wrote a thoughtful and well referenced response to Roper's polemic titled The fallacious stereotype of 'male violence', and why it's being sold to you. It is well worth a read.
Roper didn't like Blanch's response and took the opportunity launch an ad hominem attack against him (and the very concept of men's human rights in general) titled 'Bash a bitch': How Men's Rights Activists Hate Women sub-titled A Voice for Men: harassing and abusing those who defend women.

Her lack of any real understanding of the field of partner violence is clear when she parrots other prominent feminists and the media in using repeatedly debunked factoids such as "Violence is also the biggest cause of injury or death for women between 18 and 45." Let Tom Voltz educate you on that one, Caitlin.
Rather than responding to the very valid points in Blanch's article Roper makes only fallacious misrepresentations of men's human rights, its advocates and AVFM. I believe that's called "derailing the conversation," Caitlin.
Part of that derailing involved out of context rehashing of an old satirical article by Paul Elam just like those protesting the Detroit conference did. Of course that article continues to broaden the exposure of AVFM and as was intended attract new interest to men's human rights; fortunately some people understand satire – thanks for that Caitlin.
She goes on to claim

> "A Facebook group with links to MRA group 'A Voice For Men' has been formed for the purpose of harassing and abusing Collective Shout members in Townsville."

Not to my knowledge and I reckon as the Australian News Director for AVFM and resident of Townsville I would probably know about it. Oh hang on "with links to," covers all manner of sins, doesn't it? Well if someone reading a website, is a "link to" then yeah, one of the group members had a link to AVFM just like I have a link to News Corp, Fairfax, Blogger, Facebook and many other media and social outlets so clearly anything I do is endorsed and ratified by those organisations.
I decided to contact the group and conversed with one of their number and whilst I don't agree with their use of vulgarities in expressing their opinions (this tactic is best left to Clementine Ford a feminist blogger with limited vocabulary) he seems like a reasonable bloke and there is scope for developing a link with AVFM and perhaps even forming a local men's human rights collective. This is something I will explore when I return from the Detroit conference. Thanks for making the connection for me Caitlin.
What is clear is that Roper has "links to" the virulent end of anti-male hate because she condemns the exposure of gender bigots who advocate eugenics and genderocide such as Vilet Tiptree / Pamela O'Shaughnessy. Yes, she has discovered the underbelly of hate at Radfemhub and it would appear she is fully on board with the agenda, even Betty McLellen has come out of retirement with comments to support her. Meanwhile Pamela O'Shaughnessy has released a post dated (29 July 2014) retrospective of her outing as a vicious gender extremist .
If one has any inclination to understand why Caitlin Roper has become embroiled with this band of gender lunatics you will gain insight by reading her victims blog Brighter Than Before My journey of recovery from sexual abuse. (I'm not there yet) in which she details 12 months of allegedly repeated rapes of which she remembers very little, all allegedly by the same boyfriend that she continued to see. Alleged rapes that, despite gaining a restraining order against said boyfriend at the conclusion of the relationship, were not reported then – rather, she decided to wait 10 years to report and is now surprised that the police won't investigate. Well, they would but apparently according to Roper only if the alleged rapist agrees to talk to them! Roper's response is straight out of Dr Betty's feminist therapy but more on that and "collective shout" later…

Disturbing: Woman burning copies of Dr. Hoff-Sommers' book The War Against Boys

Jonathan Taylor · 19 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There's something symbolic about burning a book that fits perfectly well with the mentality of our opponents. I believe the phrase is "intellectually bankrupt."

The vast majority of our opponents don't have arguments. Developing arguments would involve actually considering potential counter-arguments, which would in turn cause a very discomfortable next step of introspection … of questioning their own positions.

Since arguments are out of the question, our opponents instead adopt the methods of name-calling, violent threats, logical fallacies, and censorship. And you can see this played out over and over again in the articles here on free speech.

The woman below is burning an older edition of Dr. Christina Hoff-Sommers' book The War Against Boys. You can purchase the new revised edition, which was released late last year, at Amazon here.

The woman in these pictures is the author of a Tumblr blog. Here is a screenshot of her original post. I will be adding one of these pictures to the key AVFMS page "The Face of Misandry in Academia." Check it out if you haven't already.

AVFM Exclusive: Documentation of Title IX complaint against Emerson College surfaces, questionable accusations abound

Robert O'Hara · 19 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In the midst of an increasingly energetic campaign, led by the Department of Education (DOE) and accompanied by the White House, to investigate Title IX complaints against dozens of colleges and universities, AVFM has received a copy of one such complaint against Emerson College in Boston, Massachusetts.

Last fall, Emerson College was beset with a massive amount of local as well as some national media coverage concerning the alleged mishandling of several sexual assault investigations conducted by their Title IX personnel. Three students—Sarah Tedesco, Jillian Daugherty, and Sarita Nadkarni—were very vocal and accommodating in response to press inquiries of their allegations and the school's handling of them. All three alleged that Emerson fostered a hostile environment by failing to investigate, by discouraging them from reporting their assaults to the police, and by failing to inform them of their rights.

In October 2013, the three students filed the Title IX complaint with the help of End Rape on Campus (EROC), an organization that has been a driving force behind many of the recent Title IX complaints filed with the DOE in recent months. The Emerson complaint is featured on a list of 11 schools EROC had "assisted" on their website.

On May 1, 2014, under mounting pressure from groups like EROC, the DOE released a list of 55 colleges that were to face investigations into Title IX violations of sexual assault policy. "We are making this list available in an effort to bring more transparency to our enforcement work and to foster better public awareness of civil rights," Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights Catherine E. Lhamon said in a statement. "We hope this increased transparency will spur community dialogue about this important issue. I also want to make it clear that a college or university's appearance on this list and being the subject of a Title IX investigation in no way indicates at this stage that the college or university is violating or has violated the law."

The announcement followed much fanfare from the previous week, with President Barack Obama and Vice President Joe Biden weighing in on promises to protect women from sexual violence and to bring more transparency to the federal government when it comes to violations of civil rights.

"Colleges and universities can no longer turn a blind eye or pretend rape and sexual assault doesn't occur on their campuses," Vice President Biden said after the White House issued a 20-page report on April 24 that set guidelines on how schools should deal with sexual assault. "We need to provide survivors with more support and we need to bring perpetrators to more justice and we need colleges and universities to step up."

On May 28, the DOE released the names of five more schools that are to face investigations into Title IX violations.

The document given to AVFM News earlier this week by an anonymous source outlines the cases of four complainants: the three students mentioned above and one anonymous student. It is poorly written and was labeled as a draft in its file name. Currently it is not clear whether the entire document has been released to the school or to the local press, who has covered the complaint extensively. It must also be made clear that AVFM cannot verify that this document is genuine, as recent Title IX complaints have not been made public by the DOE. In order to protect the identity of the document's provider, AVFM cannot provide details about how it came into that individual's possession.

AVFM has redacted all of the names of the accused in the document and also any information that could lead to their identification.

Complainant #1: Sarah Tedesco

In an October 10, 2013, article published in Emerson's student newspaper The Berkley Beacon, Sarah Tedesco stated that after reporting an October 12, 2012, assault to campus authorities and Emerson police, she was encouraged to discontinue the police investigation.

"She said she thought that because of everything that it would be in my best emotional interest to drop the charges through the Cambridge Police Department," Tedesco said of a campus housing official investigating the incident. "She said she thought that it was taking over my life and hurting me emotionally."

Tedesco, citing her "emotionally impressionable" state at the time of the above suggestion, told the Beacon that she took the advice. She also stated that the reason the case was then, and apparently is still now, unresolved by both the police and the school was because she took this advice. The Title IX complaint states that there was evidence in Tedesco's sexual assault collection (rape) kit connecting one of the two students allegedly involved in Tedesco's sexual assault—one from Emerson and the other from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT)—but no disciplinary action was taken against the individual by the Emerson College Police Department (ECPD), the Office of Student Conduct, or the Cambridge Police.

Tedesco's accounts to the press and in the Title IX complaint state that she received threatening texts from one of her alleged assailants during and after the aborted investigation and that she was the victim of another alleged rape by the same assailants in April 2013.

One remarkable detail the local press has not mentioned about the complaint is that one of Tedesco's alleged assailants is a female student at Emerson. Also, the only DNA evidence cited from the police investigation of the alleged rape was the presence of female saliva in Tedesco's vagina.

The Title IX complaint states that the alleged male assailant hit Tedesco's head against a wall in a fraternity house office at nearby MIT and then forced her to the floor, where he penetrated her vaginally. Additionally, the complaint stated that "due to her intoxication, incapacitation, and trauma," Tedesco did not remember her alleged female assailant being in the room when questioned by officials after the event, even though the only evidence present of any sexual contact was that of a female's saliva in Tedesco's vagina.

Tedesco's complaint goes on to allege harassment during the adjudication process in the form of text messages from her alleged female assailant, which, according to Tedesco, included information that "only someone present during her assault would know." Tedesco said she informed school officials, who told her that because the text messages were sent anonymously, they could not prove the assailant sent them. The complaint stated that in a final report emailed to Tedesco after the investigation's closing, Emerson said they had attempted to track the messages through their IT department but were unable to trace the source. The report also stated that the college had urged Tedesco to go to the Boston Police and have the messages professionally tracked.

Puzzlingly, Tedesco did not go to the police at this point. The explanation provided in the report was that officials had recommended during her initial complaint (before the presence of any threatening texts) that she not involve the police any further and to drop the investigation.

Complainant #2: Jillian Doherty

The second complainant, Jillian Doherty, told The Berkeley Beacon that she reported her assault a year after it allegedly occurred and that she initiated the investigation process when her alleged assailant was studying abroad—not allowing him to directly respond to her accusations.

According to the complaint, Doherty was raped by a fellow Emerson student on April 6, 2012, after responding to a Facebook message from the alleged assailant asking her to come over and engage in consensual sex at his residence. She complied with this request, engaging in admittedly consensual sex with him, but said that immediately after the consensual encounter he allegedly forced her to engage in anal sex.

"When Doherty initially refused XXXXX's request for anal sex, he verbally harassed Doherty," states the Title IX complaint. "XXXXX then anally penetrated Doherty without warning or her verbal consent. Doherty's extreme pain and emotional distress during the attack caused her to begin to cry out while XXXXX was still actively assaulting her. She pleaded with XXXXX to stop several times, but he continued to rape her. XXXXX finally stopped raping Doherty when he passed out from intoxication and/or exhaustion."

The alleged assailant was reported to have had only six beers.

Her alleged assailant reported to investigators a year later that he did not remember having anal sex with her, only consensual vaginal sex, before showing her to the door and saying goodbye.

Doherty confided in her roommates about the sexual encounter shortly after the alleged event. They in turn told investigators that they had got the impression that Doherty had just experienced a bad sexual encounter, according to the Title IX complaint. It was only after confiding in a friend a week later that Doherty "realized" that she had been raped, and instead of reporting it to the police or the school administration, she told her therapist in spring

Even though the complaint states that Doherty was "unable to make sense of what happened," she had contacted her alleged attacker via Facebook messages, which were said to be private and were not provided in the Title IX complaint (nor is there any mention that they were provided during the investigation), accusing him of raping her anally. According to the complaint, she said he messaged her back, claiming he had no memory of assaulting her. The complaint does not specify when this exchange took place.
However, the Title IX complaint did specify that on March 2, 2013, nearly a year after the alleged assault, Doherty filed an informal report of the rape after learning about a letter writing campaign organized "to open the college's eyes to the rape epidemic happening at Emerson." She wrote several high-level Emerson administrators, including President Lee Pelton, who, along with all the other recipients, responded promptly both in a private email as well as a public statement posted on the school's website.
An investigator was promptly assigned to Doherty's complaint, and after a month of deliberation the board of investigators proclaimed that the alleged accused was "not responsible" for raping Doherty.
The judgement summary reads:

> "1. Both [Jillian] and [XXXXX] admitted to consuming alcoholic beverages during the night of the alleged incident and to being intoxicated at the time of the alleged incident.
> 2. The Board concluded that both [Jillian] and [XXXXX] genuinely believed [they] were telling the truth in [their] statements concerning the incident. However, the Board found it more likely than not that both [Jillian] and [XXXXX] were unable to fully and accurately remember what occurred at the time of the alleged incident due to their respective alcohol consumption.
> 3. [Jillian] testified during the hearing that [XXXXX] engaged in forcible, non-consensual anal sex with [her]. However, [Jillian's] testimony in this regard was inconsistent with an account of the same event [she] provided to a witness on the day immediately following the alleged incident.
> Based on the above findings, the Board concluded that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding that it is more likely than not that the Respondent violated the College's Code of Conduct as charged. Accordingly, the Board found the Respondent "not responsible" for the charges and no sanctions are being issued against the Respondent."

The Title IX complaint charges "unequal treatment" during the hearing, further stating that a letter of character had been submitted to the board on behalf of Doherty's alleged attacker, which Doherty did not have an opportunity to review beforehand. This, in spite of the complaint stating that Doherty herself chose to leave the Boston area during the time of the hearing.
Emerson College is repeatedly cited in the complaint for not informing Doherty of her right to contact police. The complaint also states that Doherty herself would have gone to the police initially had she known that the school would have "mishandled her case to the degree that they did." This contradicts a statement Doherty made in an interview with The Berkeley Beacon, in which she said she did not go to the police because she "didn't feel she had sufficient evidence to present to law enforcement."
Complainant #3: Sarita Nadkarni
The third complainant, Sarita Nadkarni, reported to have been assaulted in the early hours of March 13, 2013, after a night of celebrating her birthday with friends.
The account in the Title IX complaint states that on the way back to their dormitory after enjoying drinks at Lolita's, a local establishment in Boston's Back Bay area, Nadkarni and one of her friends were approached by two men. After her friend asked one of the men for a cigarette, she then asked if they could take a picture of her and Nadkarni to commemorate the event. The men accompanied the women on their way back home and bought them coffee at a 7-11 en route.
The foursome reached the dormitory, where Nadkarni's friend asked if the two men could join them in their dorm room to drink some beer. Nadkarni reported that she agreed after hesitation and only on the condition that her friend sign the two men in, making her "responsible" for their presence there.

Nadkarni spoke briefly to a dormitory neighbor who had accompanied her and her friend that night but had returned to the dormitory early. Speaking of her guests, Nadkarni told her that she "might sleep with one of them." While in the dormitory, Nadkarni did in fact have sex with one of the men while both her friend and the other man were still in the room. After finishing, the man said he needed to step outside to have a cigarette. After he left Nadkarni and her friend in the room with the other man, the other man started to kiss Nadkarni. Seeing this, Nadkarni's friend left the room, leaving the door locked on the inside.

The Title IX account of what happened next seems to contradict logic.

The complaint stated that the man started to perform oral sex on Nadkarni, but she did not stop him because she felt "confused." He then allegedly started to penetrate her digitally while choking her. Then he stopped choking her to "masterbate [sic] on her face," and that in spite of her being alert and the man having both hands occupied, she was "physically unable to stop him." Only when the man tried to get between Nadkarni's legs did she "finaly tell him to stop," according to the complaint. He did, however, allegedly continue to "painfully digitally penetrate her," but upon hearing someone at the door she was suddenly able to push him off in order to get off the bed to open it. Nadkarni then went to the bathroom and subsequently the shower room, where the dorm neighbor whom she spoke to earlier questioned her about what had happened. After hearing Nadkarni's account, her neighbor asked whether Nadkarni had consented. When Nadkarni said no, her other friend who had been in the room with her and the man said, "You totally consented. I saw you kiss him, made sure you were OK, then left. You were fine."

The complaint attributes this contradiction of accounts to "Emerson College's lack of Consent education," even though only one witness saw the two engaging in consensual kissing and neither witness saw what had actually happened after that. Nadkarni chose not to go to the police and instead showered and went to bed. The complaint also attributes this act of self-volition to the school's lack of education, stating that "Once again, because of the poor education on what to do after being assaulted, [her friend] was unaware to tell Nadkarni not to shower, or warn Nadkarni about the loss of evidence if she chose to."

Complainant #4: Anonymous

The fourth complainant is listed as anonymous in the report, crippling Emerson's ability to defend itself during the Title IX investigation.

The complainant was allegedly assaulted in early April 2011 while on her way home by a stranger who had stalked her and upon catching up to her attempted to kiss her. She fought back and he then allegedly bit her lip, calling her a "cunt whore." Instead of contacting the police, she went directly home, where she stayed in bed for the rest of the weekend.

According to the report, a friend was finally successful in telling her to go to the Emerson Police Department, who were accused in the report of mistreating the complainant by simply admonishing her when saying they could have had a chance to capture the suspect had she reported the incident sooner.

"Sarah Tedesco and Jillian Doherty are two attention loving girls who are going on every news station that they can get on just to act like they were Raped when I know that [alleged assailant in complaint #2] was innocent from speaking to some of his friends," wrote an Emerson student who wishes to remain anonymous in an email to AVFM News.

"As an Emerson student, I know that this community is not suffering from a 'rape epidemic' like these girls are saying it is. There is very little rape, look at the statistics online in their Clery report," the student continued. "The school has been since before 2011, when the original Dear Colleague article came out and before this entire rape frenzy on college campuses started, working on prevention programs. These two manipulative girls did not say any of this when talking to media. They just sat silently and lied going on man hating sprees."

In Emerson's 2013 Clery report, the data show that in 2012 there were three reported sexual assaults on the Boston Campus of Emerson College. The first three complainants in the Title IX report account for the entirety of these. The fourth complainant reported in 2011, which accounts for one of only two reported sexual assaults in that year. There were no reports of sexual assault in 2010.

According to Emerson's Office of Institutional Research's 2013 Factbook, the total enrollment in the fall of 2012 was 4,489, with 1,582 (35%) male students and 2,907 (65%) female students. If the first three complainants were, in fact, raped that would make the percentage of women on campus raped that year to be 0.1%, or 1 in 969 female students.

Mike Buchanan · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

About two months ago I was in a panel discussion on London Live TV talking about 'women in the workplace' I was recently invited back to discuss 'everyday sexism'.

Claudia-Liza Armah, the presenter, kept asking me where I got my statistics from, although I'd explained they were official government statistics – to no avail. She asserted – as she had in the earlier discussion – that the UK 'needs' more female engineers, in response to my pointing out that at Brunel University, female postgraduate engineering students are entitled to an additional £15,000 p.a. grant solely on the grounds of gender.
The other two panellists were Daisy Buchanan, no relation, a pleasant woman despite being a Guardian journalist, and Dina Rickman, a freelance journalist who's also an assistant editor at HuffPo UK. I enjoyed a discussion with Daisy before the recording, although my eyes rolled involuntarily when she expressed her admiration for two prominent whine merchants, Laura Bates and Caroline Criado-Perez.
Ms Rickman joined us only two or three minutes before the discussion. Unable or unwilling to respond intelligently to reasoned arguments in the discussion, she pathetically resorted to saying this to me:

> I don't know if you know any women.

This is, of course, just one example of the shaming tactics used by feminists unable or unwilling to engage with reasoned arguments. I pointed out that British men and boys are relentlessly disadvantaged by the state's actions and inactions, and challenged the three women to provide even ONE example of where the state disadvantages women or girls. Ms Rickman summoned the full might of her intellectual powers and came up with 'the gender pay gap'. Seriously, she did. The remark inspired a supporter to design a 'Meme of the Week'.

David Futrelle falsely accuses Canadian Senator Anne Cools of homophobia

andybob · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

David Futrelle has launched a blistering attack on Canadian Senator Anne Cools, accusing her of having actively campaigned "against gay and lesbian rights for decades."

LINK: Senator Cools is one of Canada's leading opponents of gay and lesbian rights.

Senator Cools, one of Canada's most passionate and pre-eminent advocates for the rights of men and boys, has been invited to speak at the first International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit later this month. This should provide a clue as to the timing, and the nature, of this attempt to smear the reputation of this admirable woman.

Clearly, this hatchet job on Senator Cools has been designed to whip up a frenzy of indignation and outrage among the gay rights community with the aim to rope more of them in to supporting the anticipated feminist protest of the conference.

When terrorist tactics fail, bring in LGBT.

At least, that is what David Futrelle has obviously resolved to do after his ideological allies' threats to conference participants and the staff and guests of the original venue, and their demand that all public discussion about men's issues be silenced, failed—and left them looking like dangerous and deranged bigots violently opposed to one of the MHRM's most cherished principles: freedom of speech.

Opponents of the men's human rights movement frequently attack individuals associated with it by presenting their views as supporting, promoting, or advocating some form of extremist position—misogyny, racism, rape-enabling, and, of course, homophobia—with the transparently obvious intention of trying to discredit the entire MHRM.

However, few of our opponents have used this dishonest tactic with more dogged regularity—and lazy and perverse delight—than has David Futrelle.

Supporters of AVfM will be very familiar with Futrelle's methods, not to mention the man-hating, trigger-prone hypochondriacs who huddle at his "We Hunted the Mammoth" site in the hope of being fed cherry-picked tidbits in order to indulge in their peculiar brand of faux outrage—like the "evidence" provided for Senator Cools' alleged homophobia.

For those new to AVfM, or who have never been able to stomach going anywhere near the site run by the Bigot Formerly Known as Manboobz, [Ω], what follows should provide insight into how the reasonable, logical, and considered opinions of a woman too intelligent and independent-minded to follow a PC script can be twisted and truncated with insinuation in order to demonize her personally and to misrepresent and mischaracterize what she actually stands for: the rights and welfare of men and boys.

Before Futrelle even mentions Senator Cools, he casts doubt on the veracity of Paul Elam's unequivocal declaration that AVfM is a site that supports men of all sexual orientations.

"We regard men as human beings, regardless of their sexuality. And most of us feel that this is the salve that heals what has in recent history been inflicted on gay men."—Paul Elam Futrelle attempts to do so by pointing out that there is no "mention of lesbians" in this declaration and pretends not to realize that the reason why lesbians are not mentioned in this declaration at A Voice for MEN is due to the rather obvious fact that lesbians are not men. Elam doesn't mention koala bears either, for exactly the same reason.

Futrelle takes the opportunity to offer his own utterly fatuous explanation for why lesbians were not included in this declaration about men on a site about men: "Elam does not seem to like women very much." Futrelle does not feel the need to validate this damning claim with any supporting evidence.

To further present his case that AVfM is a hotbed of homophobia, Futrelle takes a pot-shot at managing editor Dean Esmay by stating that he "likes to present himself as a champion not only of gay men but of lesbians as well, boasting in one recent tweet that 'I have been lesbian-supporting since the '80s.'" The reader is meant to cast doubt on Esmay's "boast" simply because it was made by Dean Esmay—and because Futrelle expects them to.

Just in case the reader finds these examples of AVfM's rampant homophobia less than compelling, Futrelle completely undermines his own argument by linking to one of his old posts in which Elam denounces Chris Key (who, as far as anyone knows, was never heard from again) for being "a homophobic asshole."

Futrelle then highlights this rather prophetic quote from an AVfM commenter called Dusty:
"Here, feminists prey on the occasional alienation that gay men feel at the hands of heterosexual men who have been raised to think that homosexuality is immoral or even pathological."
It is ironic indeed that those gay men who may feel alienated at the hands of heterosexual men are the very same type of gay men that feminists, like David Futrelle, are now trying to persuade to join them to protest at the conference (supposedly just for straight, white, homophobic men, even though it's no such thing) in Detroit. It is even more ironic that Futrelle goes on to attack me, a gay man, for pointing out that lesbians co-opted the gay rights movement and infused it with their radical feminist agenda. They immediately began bullying the gay men connected to LGBT into working against their own interests by doing things like—oh, I don't know—protesting conferences that focus on their own rights as men.
This same post has Paul Elam trying to account for the virulent misandry in the work of trans-woman Men's Studies scholar Raewyn Connell by speculating that it could be connected to the self-loathing she felt when she was a man. Something must be driving this trans-woman's seething hatred of men, and if someone has a better suggested explanation than that offered by Elam, they are more than welcome to share it.
Before moving on to discuss the accusations against Senator Cools, it is important to point out that this is the sum total of the so-called evidence that Futrelle has gathered to prove the existence of what he calls AVfM's "anti-gay agenda." After years of tirelessly sifting through the thousands of articles and comments on this site, this is all he has: Paul Elam welcoming gay men as men deserving of human rights, denouncing a homophobic bigot, and taking a trans-woman to task for her rampant misandry; Dean Esmay stating that he is a long-time supporter of gay and lesbian rights; and me, for making many of the same points made by John Lauritson, Stonewall organizer and founder of the modern gay rights movement, who was actually there when the radical feminist lesbians literally barged in carrying the same 2x4s they still use today to argue that LGBT has been cynically exploited by ideologues who couldn't care less about the rights of any men—gays included.
Even accounting for Futrelle's famously low standards, this collection of "evidence" is pretty pathetic.
Senator Cools opposed adding "sexual orientation" to hate speech legislation in Canada for exactly the same reasons that I would vehemently oppose any such legislation in my country of residence. It is an attack on freedom of speech. It is exactly the kind of attack that feminists are currently levelling against the MHRM. Anyone who does not understand that such legislation can be used as a weapon to punish those who dare to express unapproved opinions, and to invoke fear of doing so, fails to fully grasp the lengths that ideologues, like David Futrelle, are prepared to go to impose their version of utopia onto the rest of humanity.
One can only shudder at the ease with which criticism of LGBT, the nonsense that is queer theory, and gay men protesting a men's conference could be interpreted as "hate speech against sexual orientation." Futrelle interpreted AVfM's inclusion of gay men as evidence of homophobia, and does the same with Senator Cool's vigorous defense of free speech. He dismisses it by sneering that "the passage of the bill in question did not lead to millions of Canadians being rounded up and arrested." It will probably never happen, but the groundwork for such an eventuality should never have been laid in the first place—and Senator Anne Cools was one of the only people in Canada with the integrity to point it out.
Senator Cools drove home the dangers of legislating against hate speech based on sexual orientation by referring to "a document called the Journal of Homosexuality, particularly, volume 20 in 1990," in which the subject of the entire volume was "pedophilia and male intergenerational intimacy, historical, social, psychological and legal perspectives." She pointedly asked if such legislation would legally forbid anyone from criticizing any of the articles it contained, such as "Man-Boy Relationships."
In one fell stroke, Senator Cools exposed the perils of exempting an entire demographic from criticism. It could give immunity to individuals within that demographic from receiving strident condemnation when it is genuinely warranted. Predictably, Futrelle insinuates that Senator Cools connected homosexuality to pedophilia, and all but froths at the mouth in his attempt to do so. Senator Cools did nothing of the kind, which Futrelle knows very well. There is no limit to the deceit in which he will engage to discredit anyone connected to the MHRM.
Senator Cools doesn't believe that morals should be subject to legislation either. She contended that such legislation would expose “millions of Canadians … who hold moral opinions about sexuality, to criminal prosecution.” These are the “windows into people’s souls” that Elizabeth I believed the state had no right, or need, to peer into. Those who oppose homosexuality on moral grounds—whether those grounds are religious, philosophical, or simply personal—have every right to do so. Unless they impede the rights and welfare of others, one’s morals are nobody’s business but one’s own.

Mankind should welcome living in this age, where we are finally free to debate the relative merits of our moral positions without the fear of the kind of reprisals so familiar throughout much of human history. Implementing hate speech legislation would cast us back into the Dark Ages when such freedom was forbidden—the Age of Enlightenment would have been for nothing.

Futrelle focuses a great deal on Senator Cools’ supposed objection to gay marriage by referring to her fascinating presentation to the Canadian Senate.

It is a passionate and comprehensive examination of marriage from an historical, social, biological, religious, and legal perspective in an effort to define marriage as a concept and a practice. It is a no-holds-barred attempt to understand what marriage is, and what it actually means—something I would have thought was rather imperative while discussing legislation that would redefine it as dramatically as including same-sex marriage. Senator Cools’ perspective, and David Futrelle’s condemnation of it, can be summed up with this quote from her presentation:

“Human life is so vital and the man-woman sexual act in procreation is so pivotal that the body of law called the law of marriage buttressed this sexual act. It did so because the law understood that lust, like all human passions, is not to be trusted. Lust and sex on their own have no public character and contain no public interest or public good. Marriage is about man and woman in a peculiar act of bringing forth offspring.”

Whichever way you look at it, this is a fair and reasonable summation of why marriage was instituted and how it is still widely perceived within society. You would have to be a bit of a fool to object to Senator Cool’s contention that homosexuals do not engage in sex for the purpose of procreation, or that it isn’t a good idea to place one’s trust in lust, or that lust contains “no public interest or public good”—and you would have to be a complete moron to find evidence of homophobia in what are some glaringly obvious truths. Futrelle has managed to do both.

It may come as a surprise to Futrelle, but I don’t know any gay men who engage in sex with their partners in the hope of one of them becoming pregnant. I’ll hazard a guess that Futrelle doesn’t know any either. For most gay men, sex is pretty much centred around lust—and, of course, an opportunity to express affection. This is just a plain and simple fact—and has nothing whatsoever to do with homophobia.

Futrelle has attempted to besmirch the reputation of Senator Anne Cools, a brave and outspoken advocate for the rights and welfare of men and boys, with a false accusation that she is a homophobe who supports “a bigoted agenda.” I hope the good senator takes heart in the knowledge that Futrelle has levelled the same accusation against me, a gay man who doesn’t follow the feminist-approved script either. It is all part of his own agenda of spreading disinformation about anyone connected with the MHRM in order to discredit it as a legitimate human rights movement.

Futrelle’s methods of deception have become so familiar to the readers of AVfM that it has become commonplace to dismiss him as an irrelevant and pathetic buffoon. His attempt to smear Senator Cools on the eve of her appearance at the International Conference on Men’s Issues is an outrage that proves him to be an inveterate liar who will stop at nothing in his dedicated campaign to derail it. He is doomed to fail in this venture but still deserves the sternest of rebukes for pulling such a shabby stunt.

Full marks to Janet Bloomfield (a.k.a. JudgyBitch) for standing her ground against the kind of shame-laden bullying for which feminists, like David Futrelle, are notorious. The accusation of homophobia particularly rankles because it continues to be made without any evidence whatsoever to support it—and overwhelming evidence to the contrary. I am one of many gay/bisexual men and women who proudly support AVfM and its goals precisely because, as Paul Elam made crystal clear, it considers “men as human beings, regardless of their sexuality.”

AVfM also staunchly supports freedom of speech. This means that even if Senator Anne Cools really did oppose gay marriage, she would have every damn right to say so—and I would support that right. It still wouldn’t make her a homophobe.

You see, that’s how we roll at AVfM. Unlike David Futrelle, we actually practice what we preach—a concept that a hopelessly bigoted ideologue like him would never understand.

35 Practical Tools for Men to Fool the Feminist Revolution

August Løvenskiolds · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Young feminist, PhD candidate, and budding civil slavemaster Pamela Clark penned—or, rather, accumulated from others—35 ways for her male feminist sycophants to further check their privilege (debase themselves) for her pleasure. As it happens, I effusively agree with every fucking one of her edicts, except, of course, that my reasons for my agreement are based on the understanding that what women want, what women say they want, and what women respond to are usually completely different things.

Let's slog through Mistress Pam's whipping points (in boldface) to see how one can use fawnery to turn feminist demands into a living hell on Earth for those bossy, wannabe oligarchs like her.

Rules for Men:

1. Do 50% (or more) of housework. I agree—in fact, I do 100% of the housework because I absolutely refuse to live with a demanding, entitled, lazy woman like Mistress Pam. If you are a man who lives with a woman, you need to humiliate her with both her 77% paycheck (Mistress Pam's claim) and her poor domestic skills. This will let her know that she is inferior if not obsolete relative to you, and that without you, she would be lost in a dangerous world. Oh, and make sure she does what little housework you leave her to your exacting standards—and yes, watching porn online should be an integral part of those standards.

2. Do 50% (or more) of emotional support work in your intimate relationships and friendships. Although Pamela's feminism supposedly teaches that women are strong and independent grown-up adults, Pamela herself believes that women are frail, delicate flowers who fall apart without the ongoing and overwhelming support of the emotional tampons she calls feminist "men." I completely agree—men can support "equality" by dominating women emotionally as well as professionally, domestically, and physically. While some feminists might call this "misogyny," Mistress Pam prefers "hunky."

3. Consume cultural products produced by women. Again, I completely agree—Spanx for Men looks awesome! As soon as women start building cars; generating electricity; running water systems; drilling for oil; growing crops; slaughtering cows, pigs, and chickens; designing airplanes and cellphones and home appliances, etc., I will consider becoming a shameless bootlicker and buying those cultural products, but only if no men are involved in their production because giving credit to the men who build and maintain civilization is a part of the icky patriarchy.

4. Give women space. I absolutely agree—too many women seem to expect the men around them to rush to their aid if they, like, get caught in an undertow while swimming in the Gulf of Mexico, or get attacked on the street, or get drunk, pass out, and almost drown in their own vomit. I used to save the lives of women like that— four times, in my real lived experience, I put myself at risk to save them—but no more. I was too blinded by my male privilege to realize that saving women's lives is oppressive and patriarchal to them. Now, if I see a lone woman getting sucked under the tide or passed out on the street at night, I scamper the other way so that I can reasonably claim I had no idea she was in danger.

5. … but insert yourself into spaces where you can use your maleness to interrupt sexism. Yes, I agree with this one completely too—for example, whenever I see a woman striking a man, I demand she stop using her female privilege to hit men who are culturally forbidden to hit back. What kind of monster hits someone she knows won't hit back? Likewise, when women get default child custody in a divorce, I use my male logic and reason to point out that this is sexism, pure and simple, and that shared equal custody should be the default if our goal is equality.

6. When a woman tells you something is sexist, believe her. I absolutely do believe she thinks that, just as when a man says something is sexist, I believe he means that too. That's equality, right? For example, when a woman claims that abortion laws are sexist, I agree, because men get no say in the abortion decision but are on the hook for 18 years of child support if the child is not aborted. That's wrong—men should have the option to renounce fatherhood legally, just as women can renounce motherhood through both abortion and safe haven laws.

7. Educate yourself about sexual consent and make sure there is clear, unambiguous communication of consent in all your sexual relationships. Oh, hell, yes! Since most insurance payouts for campus sexual assault are made to falsely accused men rather than women claiming assault (the graph on the right side of page 2 of this link), it behooves men to understand that resisting crazed women making lying claims of rape is far more lucrative overall than, say, not resisting it or taking a plea bargain. Use your phone to record her consent, and text her the day after to show you had proof of ongoing consent both before and after the act.

8. Be responsible for contraception. Completely agree—consent to sexual intercourse is NOT consent to fatherhood, and no woman deserves 18 years of child-support payments for a single sex act. Wear a condom and dispose of it where she can't get to it. Bonus points if you can add hot sauce to it before she has a chance to inseminate herself against your wishes.

9. Get the HPV vaccine. If you are a man, I definitely agree. There are a lot of sexually aggressive women looking for baby-daddies out there, and a condom might not protect you from HPV, especially when she forces you to perform cunnilingus on her or simply demands that you kiss her feminist ass even more. If you are a woman, of course, you should avoid taking precautions like vaccination because precautions are victim-blaming. Instead, you should teach men to teach viruses not to attack women.

10. Have progressive "name" politics. I definitely agree—if you are so obsequious and stupid that marriage to a woman sounds right for you, be sure to make your kowtowing complete and take HER last name as yours. That way, the last vestige of your manhood will be stripped away from you and she will dump your unmanly self sooner rather than later, meaning that you can go back to the blissful life without women as soon as possible. Nothing says "unromantic loser" to women more clearly than "Guess what, future wife, I'm going to take YOUR last name!"

11. If you have children, be an equal parent. Absolutely agree—especially in divorce, demand equal custody and join the effort to strip away the laws that assume women make better parents than men, even though feminists support those laws.

12. Pay attention to and challenge informal instances of gender role enforcement. Agreed—for example, if you are at a family function or dinner party where women are showing off their cooking skills, bring a superior dish to the party that illustrates that men are excellent chefs too.

13. Be mindful of implicit and explicit gendered power differentials in your intimate/domestic relationships with women. Indeed, agreed—note that women tend to avoid direct power (for which they can be held accountable for their poor decisions) in favor of indirect power, violence by proxy, and subtle influences that are less accountable. Examples of this abound, but my favorite one is the excitement and glee of bystander women when two men are in a fistfight—men they encouraged to fight—a position that is reified by the misandric culture of cheerleading, formalized by feminists as "enthusiastic consent."

14. Make sure that honesty and respect guide your romantic and sexual relationships with women. Agreed—flaky, dishonest, and/or disrespectful women need to be dumped suddenly and completely, with no further contact or acknowledgement. The cleaner the break, the faster the recovery.

15. Don't be an online bystander in the face of sexism. Agreed—especially since feminists heavily moderate or close comments to their blogs. Join websites like A Voice for Men so you can challenge feminists (as I am doing in this article) who make, say, or post sexist things on the Internet, especially on social media.

16. Be responsible with money in domestic/romantic relationships. Agreed—women seek wealthy men they can harvest for their resources, so take whatever steps you can to hide funds and build a war-chest for when her hypergamy kicks in and she tries to rape your wallet through breakup/divorce. There is a reason the vast majority of the homeless are men, and the reason is that feminists don't care about poor guys except to sing "Cry Me a River" when they die.

17. Be responsible for your own health. Agreed—feminists only care about men's health when illness might impair that man's earning potential as a slave to her whims. But you are more than a slave to some crazy master, so act like it, and take care of yourself for YOU, not her.

18. Don't ogle or make comments about women. Agreed—women crave male attention, and the less you notice them, the more alluring you appear to women, as well as the more you undermine their self-esteem.

19. Pay attention to the gender of experts and key figures presenting information to you in the media.

Agreed—although knowledge, experience, trustworthiness, and insight are important, always remember that the male hormone testosterone is truth serum, and that some key figures may have insufficient levels of this vital hormone, particularly so if they are feminists.

20. Ensure that some of your heroes and role models are women. Absolutely agreed—Karen Straughan, Alison Tieman, Janet Bloomfield, Erin Pizzey—these are just a few of the many, many heroic women in the men's human rights movement who stand up for men against feminist hate every day.

21. Praise the virtues and accomplishments of women in your life to others. I just did that in Step 20, so yes, agreed, and I do that every day.

22. Have integrity with your male friends. Agreed—there is nothing shameful inherent to men or male sexuality, and telling my male friends that they don't need some crazy woman's approval to be valuable is a daily mission for me.

23. Don't treat your spouse like a "nag." Agreed—nags are annoying and it is better to dump them than to put up with their ongoing lack of respect for men's rights and autonomy.

24. Know that acknowledging your own sexist opinions and stereotypes you hold is not enough. Agreed—you have to call out the feminists who use them to try to shame and control you like a slave, and teach men to resist feminist lies.

25. Befriend females. Agreed—if you must deal with "females," female dogs can make great companions, and female cats can make excellent pets as well. Female humans, usually called "women," on the other hand, are too resistant to domestication these days and should be given a lot of space (per Step 4 above). If you are forced to deal with them on a close, regular basis, keeping feminists in the "friend zone" is one method of fending off or delaying a false rape accusation.

26. Find female mentors/leaders. (i.e., Be subordinate to females.) Despite their general poor reputations among feminists, mothers, as long as they eschew feminism, can make excellent mentors and leaders of young male children and adults.

27. When in a romantic relationship, be responsible for events and special dates associated with your side of the family. Agreed—wives can be very jealous of your relationship with your parents and siblings, so don't let your wife interfere with your other family relations.

28. Don't police women's appearance. Agreed—a woman with toilet paper stuck to her shoe, or spinach/lipstick in her teeth, or a rip or other flaw in her clothing should be allowed to continue to embarrass herself in front of more people than just you. Humiliation can be hilarious if handled properly by not protecting her from it.

29. Offer to accompany female friends if they have to walk home alone at night… Agreed—offer to do it, then flake out and say, "Oops, gotta go," so that feminists can experience the same flaky behavior they display to men. Remember, feminists are strong and independent, and they hate it when you try to be the "Ultimate Gentleman." It seems as creepy to them as "Ladies' Night" in a sports bar.

30. Inject feminism into your daily conversations with other men. Agreed—men need to know that feminism is a crock of shit and that you can stand up to feminist lies and still be in favor of equality—REAL equality that doesn't involve the sexist chivalry that feminists seem intent to demand and preserve.

31. If you have a tendency to behave inappropriately toward women when you are under the influence of drugs or alcohol, do not consume drugs or alcohol. Agreed—even the most ingratiating men have to get extremely drunk to consider having sex with a feminist, but that will just leave you open to a false rape claim that she will concoct during her hungover walk of shame the next day. Better to be sober, feminist-free, and, hence, jail-free.

32. Be aware of the physical and emotional space you occupy, and don't take up more space than you need. Agreed—feminists need a lot of space, and the hirsute ones most unpleasantly so. Best avoid them completely.

33. Walk the walk about income inequality. Agreed—study the so-called 77% pay-gap lies carefully, as even some feminists are starting to do, and destroy this lie whenever idiots like Mistress Pam are dumb enough to repeat The Gender Wage Gap Lie.

34. Get in the habit of treating your maleness as an unearned privilege that you have to actively work to cede rather than femaleness being an unearned disadvantage that women have to work to overcome. Agreed—it is silly to suggest that women can grow through facing adversity; only men can do that. Feminism has taught me that the only way for women to advance is for groveling men to give women the “free” stuff that men have earned and women have not. If all this free stuff demanded by feminists makes women feel useless and unworthy of their accomplishments, well, who cares? Vagina! VAGINA!

35. Self-identify as a feminist. Speak about feminism as a natural, normal, uncontentious belief because it should be. Don’t hedge and use terms like “humanist” or “feminist ally” that reinforce the idea that the F-word itself is a scary word. Agreed—and since I also agree with every other point on this insanely stupid list, then I MUST be subservient to feminism, right? Right?

To the Feminist Still Confused about KSU Men

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

QUICK ANNOUNCEMENT: (1) KSUM now has its own YouTube channel, but needs to reupload videos (annotations and all) from scratch since YouTube cannot move videos from one channel to another. Many KSUM links have been broken, but will be restored where needed. (2) We just got a second adviser. –VZ*

The feminist who wrote me recently sent five follow up responses, with a sixth following my request for her to slow down before my inbox reaches critical mass, detonates a Silicon Valley server and sets California on fire again. The first email showed surprising maturity, but the desperate follow-ups showed that spreading feminism remains her priority.

The emails boil down to "I'm sorry for acting misandric, but anti-feminism can't be okay."

I will respond with selected quotes for brevity, but check out the full conversation in context.

> […] I do apologize for my fearful misandric rant. […] I now understand where you're coming from and what your group is about. […]

Thank you for being an adult. I honestly expected you to throw mud from under your feet until you struck a septic tank and blamed KSUM for getting shit everywhere.

> And you're right, this is something we all (feminists/anti-feminists) should collaborate on, discuss and focus on. […] I think in order to create positive change in our society, both of our groups (groups labeled "for men/anti-fem" or "for women/feminist") should work together instead of conflicting with one another and create more gender-neutral awareness.

I'll be blunt: If a feminist organization offered KSUM a partnership, we will steer the ship away while screaming. If we're by a waterfall, fuck it, jagged rocks it is. We are non-feminist for a reason.

All you did was prevaricate to try and show me the true Scotsman, but I don't care about the purity of any idea that is never executed.

Many feminists are openly cruel in the name of equality, and we owe their boldness to the lack of accountability in the movement. This is why "your" feminism doesn't matter.

Marketers may disagree with me, but the service matters more than the brand.

I could start a dumb movement about "nourishment" called Yummyism, but if followers were eating babies, would you trust that Yummyism was in touch with your nutritional needs? More importantly, would you trust Yummyism when other Yummyists criticize you for being "against nourishment" while hand-waving away infanticidal cannibalism?

Now replace "yummyist" with "feminist", "nourishment" with "equality", and "baby-eating" with "censorship via fire alarm, verbal abuse, book burning, media neglect, Valerie Solanas, public sexual assault, pre-emptive banning, inflating stats to ridiculous levels, lying about false accusations and generally being assholes."

Furthermore, I did not say that everyone should collaborate or focus on any one thing. I don't think that way. If you help KSU Men, it is because you want to help and not because you want to validate your brand loyalty.

We won't save the world, but we do what we can and that will never be nothing. We may even fail, but no one can say we didn't make an effort. Now, unless there's a good reason for your absences from this week's meetings, I will count them against your integrity.

> Feminism is supposed to bring both sexes together to do what you (and many other groups that speak for oppressed/marginalized groups) are trying to do.

Then explain the violence. The men's rights community would eject me like a fighter jet if I behaved like a feminist protester in the spirit of men's rights. Meanwhile, you could go rouge, play the victim and feminists will typically not even judge.

Hyperbole? Tell that to the guy who got pushed off a ledge after a feminist screamed he was touching her breasts (he wasn't).
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AHCuWKo1FV0
The Patriarchy would never allow this, but the Patriarchy doesn't exist, so that's a moot point.

> […] when women see a group that is focused on men and claims to be anti-feminist, it looks anti-women and leaves an unsettling and frightening feeling

Tell that to these independently-minded anti-feminist women, who you just tried representing in another failed guilt trip. Call into their radio show and ask them what they think of anti-feminist men's rights activists.

> Also- by advocating the hatred of feminism and anti-feminist argument, are you saying that women shouldn't have the same human rights as men? Because that's what it really looks like.

What, do you think we're designing a Rophenol distribution center? Handing out brochures on how to make rape more discreet? Reversing women's suffrage?
Get real.
Feminism is an ideology and women are a demographic, so they are not the same. A woman can lead a free life with her human rights intact and fight feminism, but that concept is a big hurdle for you.
We don't care what you do with your life because that's your business. The people who say "But that makes you feminist!" make me want to fellate a chainsaw. I'd rather be called a misogynist.

> […] there are different types of feminism- inclusive, intersectional, egalitarian, etc.

So? I'm not going to appreciate the rotting tree trunk that fell on my house because a few branches have blossoms. I don't care about types of feminism who think they got equality right any more than the denominations of Christianity that think they got the Bible right.
I once got dragged to a service in a non-demoninational Church where a Ned Flanders wannabe gave me uncomfortable eye-contact while not letting talent stop him from making Jesus cry with his guitar scratching. However, the church was more tolerant than big churches or radical churches. Meanwhile, it's the big and radical churches that color my opinion of religion in practice, just like how it's the powerful feminists that color my opinion of feminism in practice.
I oppose feminism because I am for the separation of church and state.
Do you care what a preacher in Missisippi says Christianity is about, or do you care about what the entire institution gets away with? I'd rather see an ideology practiced out from behind the veil of marketing language and brainwashed zombies that enable systemic horseshit. Everyone is more honest that way.
Feminism at its core is a nonsensical oppression narrative. If men looked like human beings with their own problems (god forbid), a multi-billion dollar network would perish. Hate makes money, and hatred is an equal opportunity practice. Powerful feminists oppress you and me, and Patriarchy is the scapegoat that keeps fear money flowing.
To quote a lyric from Bo Burnham's song "Love is…":

> …love is being the owner of the company that makes rape whistles, and even though you started the company with good intentions trying to reduce the rate of rape, now you don't want to reduce them at all cause if the rape rate declines you'll see an equal decline in whistle sales…. Without rapists, who's gonna buy your whistles?

At no point did you experience KSU Men for yourself. Instead, you tried to get me to validate your hallucinations by firing off rationalizations and promises of teamwork.

Some of the people who signed up for KSUM are women, and the door is still open to you. You are an independently-minded adult, so I'm not going to hold your hand and promise you puppies and kisses because your dogma told you to be scared.

If that's a problem, then by all means keep convincing yourself that you are not totally useless while hard-working people scramble to put out fires. If you email me again with anything other than "I will be at the next meeting," then your message will go straight in the trash because it only wastes your time and mine.

You apologized for being unreasonably scared and misandric, and that cooperation was important. I won't accept the apology unless you overcome your fear.

An apology means nothing if you don't change.

Mike Buchanan has applied to go on a UK Feminista course. Wish him luck!

Mike Buchanan · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

UK Feminista is the creation of Kat Banyard, a radical feminist whine merchant and the inaugural winner of our "Lying Feminist of the Month" award for an absurd claim she made on Channel 4 News about the frequency with which schoolgirls in the UK suffer sexual harassment. Needless to say, she's never retracted the claim (lying feminists never do). Our blog piece on the matter, which contains links to the Channel 4 News piece and Banyard's award certificate, are here.
We've just learned UK Feminista is running free Feminist Activist Mentoring (FAM) courses in Birmingham, details here. In the introduction, they say:

> Are you an individual with a vision to organise for gender equality but need confidence to get started? Then UK Feminista's FAM course is for you!

I'm clearly just the sort of person they're looking for, so I've applied to go on the course—it's free—and I feel quietly confident I'll be accepted, given my responses to the questions on the application form.
What campaign or project are you working on or planning to get started?
Justice for men & boys (and the women who love them) http://j4mb.org.uk
Anti-Feminism League http://fightingfeminism.wordpress.com
The Alternative Sexism Project http://thealternativesexismproject.wordpress.com
Campaign for Merit in Business http://c4mb.wordpress.com
Men Shouldn't Marry http://menshouldntmarry.wordpress.com
Why do you want to take part in this course and what do you hope to gain from it?
I want to learn from the course how I might persuade more men and women to care about men and boys the way they currently care about women and girls. The impact of sexism on men and boys is appalling, as you know, leading to poor life outcomes for men and boys compared with outcomes for women and girls. Just a few examples below:

- Suicide (#1 cause of death of young men): The male/female suicide rate differential has almost doubled in the past 30 years; it's currently 3.5:1.
- Denial of paternal access to children.
- Lack of support for male victims of DV.
- Education: Only 40% of university students are men, while female postgraduate engineering students at Brunel University are being offered additional sponsorships of £20,000+ p.a. on the basis of gender alone.
- MGM is commonplace, FGM is illegal.
- Employment (most unemployed people are men).
- Political representation (all-women PPC shortlists).
- Homelessness (90% men).
- Justice system (far harsher toward men than women).
- Paternity fraud (commonplace, yet not one British woman has ever been convicted of it).
- Threats of legislated gender quotas driving poorly qualified women onto corporate boards, despite evidence showing one consequence will be declines in corporate financial performance.
- Resources devoted to male-specific diseases (e.g., prostate cancer) much lower than resources devoted to female-specific cancers (e.g., breast cancer), although almost as many men die from prostate cancer as women die from breast cancer.

I look forward to the course.
Where in the UK are you organising for change?
Everywhere.
Are you working on your own on this campaign or with others / as part of a group?
With others (men and women).
Participants are stronly (sic) encouraged to attend all 4 days (both weekends) of the course and carry out an assignment between sessions. Do you expect to be able to participate in the full course?
Yes.
Would you need any financial assistance for childcare costs, other care costs or travel expenses to enable you to attend the course? Please estimate how much this would cost per 8-hour day of training.
Travel expenses at cost, payable in advance. Happy to buy drinks for the ladies on the course, so long as this wouldn't be construed by them as benevolent sexism. If it would be, then they can buy me drinks, because benevolent sexism is fine with me—it's the malevolent form I'm not keen on!
We are looking for free/affordable venues to host the course. Please let us know if you have access to a space we could use.
The Sahara Desert.
Equal Opportunities Monitoring
Please answer the following questions if you feel comfortable doing so as it helps us to monitor and improve our practices. Your answers will not affect your application.
Age
107.
How would you describe your sex/gender?
Infrequent / male.
How would you describe your sexuality?
Heterosexual.
How would you describe your ethnicity?
North Korean.

Godwin's Law

Catreece Macleod · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Farsi.

That's right, we touch on it now and then, but no one wants to go all the way, so let's just get it over with so we don't have to deal with Nazi analogies ever again, okay?

Godwin's Law

> From Wikipedia: Godwin's law (or Godwin's Rule of Nazi Analogies) is an Internet adage asserting that "As an online discussion grows longer, the probability of a comparison involving Nazis or Hitler approaches 1" — that is, if an online discussion (regardless of topic or scope) goes on long enough, sooner or later someone will compare someone or something to Hitler or Nazism.

Yes, we're going there today. We're going to compare feminism with Nazism and how this is both good and bad. So let's start with a simplified history lesson on these two movements, as they actually had somewhat comparable roots. It's amazing how hate movements start off eerily similar to one another.

The Early Days

In the beginning, there was World War I, and thusly followed the Bitchslap of Versailles—a treaty to end the war that was basically one big clusterfuck of various treaties. Everyone was allied with everyone else, one tiny country's dictator died—Archduke Franz Ferdinand—because he was a fuckwit who was assassinated and was sewn into his uniform that his doctor was afraid to cut open to perform surgery, so yeah … great starting point.

At Versailles, the French were pissy about the whole thing and tried to lay pretty much all the responsibility on Germany. Surprisingly, US President Woodrow Wilson was the voice of reason here. He basically said, "Whooooa, slow down, guys, what the fuck? No, seriously. What. The. Fuck. You don't really want to do this, do you? This is going to fuck Germany over hardcore … you're going to make a lot of innocent people suffer on petty vengeance, and it's going to bite you in the ass."

France's reply was pretty much: "Non, ve simply vhant to slap zhem vith zhe velvet glove … filled with a brick" (except they did the overly cheesy French accent better than I can in text).

English Prime Minister David Lloyd George essentially said, "Oh, right-o thar, ol' chap, can't do, sorry, election year. The voters want blood and I want to be re-elected. You're totally right, ol' boy, but what can you do?" and went along with the bullshit anyway.

And yea, thusly, so did the Great Depression fuck over Germany even worse than everyone else. The currency at the time was literally falling so fast that a law was passed to pay workers twice a day in cash because the money wouldn't be worth half as much by the next day. People had to cart out wheelbarrows full of money to buy bread because the paper the money was printed on was worth more than the money itself. Note that was wheelbarrow*s*, plural. Shit was crazy, yo.

And this is the environment out of which Nazism was born—one of excessive weakness, hatred, and fear. The government was falling apart, and political parties turned more into gangs than anything else … and the Nazis were one of the biggest gangs out there. Their methodology of getting elected was simply to have their political opponents "have mysterious accidents." Great guys, really. We know how it goes.

When they were the only stabilizing force around, people figured, "Hell, why not, may as well vote for them, they're the only assholes left."

With this the Nazis gained a great deal of political power, their violent streak, and a massive sense of entitlement à la "We deserve better than this bullshit. No, the world owes us better than this bullshit." These were the seeds of destruction, as we'll see in a moment.

So what happened with feminism? Where are its early roots? Didn't it just magically pop up in the 1970s?

No, no, it's been around a lot longer than that, I'm afraid. Closer to 150 years, actually, but there's a starting point here that's important—when it got its first big head of steam.

Let's go back to 1914. World War I and the White Feather Campaign, overseen by one Mrs. Humphrey Ward, a well-known author at the time.
The White Feather Campaign took root in England and involved women attaching white feathers to men not in uniform in order to shame them into going off to die in the ditches of trench warfare. The women had no fear of being drafted, and shame was a wonderful tool to get the men to go off to war.
This was one of the first bits of entitlement that the movement displayed: the capacity for women to tell men what to do when they were at zero risk themselves. The men really were shamed, and did enlist, showing that women had the power to send men to their deaths with just a word and a feather. Women have no power? Women need no power—they had men to do shit for them.
In 1917, in the US, about 900,000 men were drafted for World War I, some as young as 18 years of age. They challenged it, said it was unconstitutional, and on January 17, 1918, the Supreme Court basically said, "Fuck you, you get to vote, so you have to fight. This is how this shit works"—despite the fact that the actual drafting age was lower than the age to vote, meaning boys who couldn't vote could get drafted because they could vote … except they couldn't. Right …
On June 4, 1920, women were given the right to vote too … sans the mandatory draft. Huh? So the only reason men are allowed to vote was because they could be killed off on a whim, but women are allowed to vote because … tits? Seriously, American men could be sent to war at age 18 but could not vote until age 21, regardless that that was the excuse for why they were allowed to vote. It wasn't until June 22, 1970, that men finally got the right to vote at the same age they could be told to go kill themselves. Fun fun fun.
These were the seeds of entitlement from which the earliest branches of feminism sprung. Women's suffrage was based on the idea that women deserved to vote because they were women, but men deserved to vote because they paid for it in blood, except for the fact that men still paid with their blood without the right to vote, so it was kind of lopsided.
Trust me, I'm all for women being able to vote. I rather like being able to vote myself, and without that movement, I couldn't. Except … I also stress that the reasoning for why women could vote, while men aged 18 to 21 couldn't, was absolute, total bullshit.
Either everyone should have had the right to vote without being drafted or no one who couldn't be drafted should have had the right to vote.
Even today, men can still be drafted, and women can't, but men "pay" for their right to vote with the draft, and women "pay" for their right to vote with … erm … being female? Huh? Interdastingsk. Funny how feminism has no problems with that, and in fact, when men bring up that fact, they're told to shut the fuck up because it's not a real problem, despite being blatantly sexist.
Regardless, in both cases, both Nazism and feminism began from similar roots: violence toward others and a huge-assed entitlement complex.

Foothold

Getting a foothold is the crucial step for a hate movement. To garner any support, you have to provide something relevant to people. Something that makes them like you. Something that lets them point to all the good you've done, and to ignore the bad.
The Nazis pulled the German economy out of the shitter, built new roads, set up a powerful infrastructure, rebuilt Germany itself, held the Olympics, and sparked a sense of national pride with the whole Aryan race dealie by telling normal citizens that everyone was just jelly of the German master race, which is why they were trying to beat them down.
People just loooove to be told how awesome they are, and even more, they love scapegoats. Mmm, scapegoats … what better way to make people agree with you than to give them a common enemy, tell them they themselves are awesome, and hand them free stuff? It even lets people ignore that the Nazis got into power in the first place by murdering their political opponents! SWEET!
Hey … that sounds familiar …
Oh, right, because that's what feminism did, pretty much one for one. Even the murder.
See, in the 1960s and 1970s, feminism wasn't exactly liked all that much. It was too radical, too violent, and too filled with hatred, and the normal average person could see that. It was pretty fucked-up shit, to be perfectly blunt. Even women didn't want anything to do with it for the most part.

And then Erin Pizzey started the first domestic violence shelter in the world. She realized quickly on that the women going there were often as violent as the men they were fleeing from, and she quickly traced the root back to violent family history. If you have violent parents, you're probably going to be violent too and seek out a violent partner. Who would'a thunk?

Well, obviously the feminists wouldn't'a thunk that at all. They were absolutely certain that it was only men who could be evil and vile or violent because … well, they were a hate movement. It's kind of their schtick.

Within a few short years, feminists realized that they needed some good PR, a common enemy, a way to tell women how awesome they were, and some example they could use to show they were being a benefit to society instead of a menace.

Oh, hey, that'sssss a nice domestic violence shelter system you have going there, Erin … it'd be a shame if anything were to … happen to it, if ya get my drift.

Yeah, they kicked Erin Pizzey out, and were violent as hell. They constantly harassed her, sent her death threats, and eventually assassinated her dog. The fuck? Yes, you heard me right. They murdered her dog as a warning to her to get the fuck outta Dodge. Nice people, those feminists. Friendly, loving, non-violent, especially toward their fellow woman!

And in return, they were rewarded with being able to lie to people by telling them that only men are violent (scapegoat), that women are angels who are oppressed (they're the only ones in need of domestic violence shelters), and that they're being useful to society (protecting those poor, battered women, ignoring the men in need entirely—after all, if we refuse to build shelters for them, we can point to how there are no men's shelters, so obviously they don't need them! Sweet deal, huh?).

Thus, the hate movement of feminism got its foot in the door, using pretty much the same core tactics as the Nazis had used—except that their scapegoat was men rather than Jews, and their good deed (although stolen) was domestic violence shelters instead of the Autobahn, and they instilled gender pride instead of racial or national pride.

Even from the start, feminism was about hatred toward men. This was a well-known fact at the time, and it wasn't until feminism applied coercion that it became well liked.

Silence

Your average German didn't know what was going on with the Nazis. They thought they were fighting back against people who had attacked them first. They thought that the Jews were simply being deported. They thought that they were fighting a just war, and that they were winning. They knew the average Nazi: they were friends and family, really nice, ordinary, regular people.

The thing is, management were total assholes.

There were only a few hundred Nazis who fucked the whole thing up for everyone. Keep that fact in mind. A few people at the top who put the orders in and a few assholes on the ground level who went along with it and were given the power to make anyone else back down the moment they questioned it. A small number who were corrupt and malicious to the core and who were absolutely certain that they were in the right and would change the face of the world.

They slipped their people into the higher ranks of the military and the government, quietly converted children throughout the schools and their youth group, and ousted any teachers who wouldn't teach their propaganda.

And in the end, it worked.

This is where feminism is right now. It's right behind the curtain, just barely out of earshot. The average feminist is a really nice, ordinary, regular person—your friends and family. They think they're fighting the good fight against tyranny and injustice.

The thing is, management are still total assholes.

There are only a few hundred to maybe a few thousand feminists who are truly rotten to the core, much like the Nazis, except that they're the ones calling the shots, also like the Nazis. They're the ones making the laws, publishing the horribly mangled studies, teaching bigotry in schools, and converting our youth to their cause, quietly slipping their own people into the upper echelons of society.

Much like the Nazis, feminists have removed teachers who don't agree with their narrative; most teachers in schools are women, and most of those are feminists now, especially in universities and colleges, and even more so in the human resources departments that handle disputes between students or faculty.
The average feminist is a good person fighting for what they believe is a good cause, but they've been lied to by a powerful propaganda machine. Any time they support feminism, they support those who create malicious laws, who break down the judicial system and due process, who reinforce bigotry and hatred.
"Not all feminists are like that." But enough of them are, and they're the ones in power.
"Of course they aren't." Not all Nazis were like that either. But enough of them were, and they were the ones in power.
The problem isn't that "Not All Feminists Are Like That" by any means—it's a silly notion. The problem is that the funding goes toward projects of hatred. The problem is that support goes toward vile acts and cruel deeds. The problem is that every time someone stands up for the average feminist, they're supporting the actions of the ones who are malicious by not holding them under scrutiny.
Right now, feminism is preparing for its concentration camps. It hasn't set them up yet, but it would absolutely love to, and is putting the pieces into place to make it a reality. And all the while, no one is able to say, "Wait, this is bullshit. What the fuck?" because, after all, Not All Feminists Are Like That.
Just the ones who matter are.

The Choir of Hate

You can't fight a war without soldiers. You can't have a hate movement unless it's supported by the general populace. You can't create acts of vast malice without complacency …
To the feminists who are reading this, take a look at what you've been supporting and tell me this is what you really want. These are the ones in charge, who make the laws, who power the movement, and who spend the money you support them with. Is this really who you want speaking for you?

The End

You may notice that these are big names are big—they're senators, education administrators, authors, congresswomen, and bigots one and all.

You may wonder if the quotes are simply taken out of context; in their actual context, they're actually far, far worse.

These are the people in power; these are the people who are the rotten 1% of feminism. They're the only 1% who needs to be rotten because they're the 1% who has both the power and the desire to abuse that power, and every claim of "Not All Feminists Are Like That" gives them another layer of immunity to criticism.

This is how a hate movement is formed. No one questions it, everyone makes excuses for the ones in power, and everyone feels they're doing the "right thing" by traveling down the slippery slope in the name of justice and to help the underdog.

Remember, Nazi Germany was the underdog. They were the ones who were crippled and weak, and they used that to leverage their people into backing them with the promise of a better future.

Feminism has taken the same road, using the same tactics to cover up that it's a hate movement at its core.

Godwin's law only applies if there isn't an actual direct correlation.

We let the Nazi war machine free because no one would stop it. No one would decry it. No one would stand up and say, "This is fucking bullshit, what the fuck!?" They were silenced with shame, by overt removal, or simply "disappeared."

The first two of these are already in place: mansplaining and removing people from college and university campuses. We're not too far away from the third—they just need to erode due process a little more on the rape laws and then they'll be able to disappear any man they want to on a whim. No questions asked, no answers given, merely an accusation is all that will be required. If you think that's impossible, check the laws—we're almost there already.

I've already covered how feminism hurts women in other articles, but this is more important than how it affects me personally. This is how it affects everyone, both men and women together.

Remember, the average German, hell, even the average Nazi, was a pretty good person. They believed in what they thought was a just cause, following along blindly as the wool of propaganda was pulled over their eyes time and again. They knew that the hatred was there, lurking at the corners of their vision, but they let it slide.
The average woman and the average feminist are still good people who honestly believe they've been supporting a just cause. We simply can't afford to ignore the hatred we see now, skulking in the shadows, in our peripheral vision. We need to direct the spotlight of criticism harshly upon it so it can wither and die in the light rather than make excuses for the vileness and protect that malice with a wall of average feminist human shields.
If we don't put an end to this now, and embrace actual egalitarianism fast rather than feed this hate group … well, there's a poem that describes this all too well. You may have even heard it before.

Personal Responsibility

Catreece Macleod · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Spider-Man was wrong.
Well, his uncle was, anyway. The maxim "With great power comes great responsibility" isn't exactly correct. Rather, the reverse is accurate: With personal responsibility comes greatness and personal power.
Now, while you ponder that thought for a moment, let me add one more note so you know where I'm coming from. Normally I wouldn't make mention of this, but it's relevant to this particular topic of personal responsibility.
First off, I'm transgendered; more so than that, I'm also Lithuanian, female, bisexual, and, interestingly enough, legally blind without my glasses since I have less than one-tenth of what's deemed to be "normal" vision.
Why does this matter? Here's the catch: it doesn't. None of it does. And that's what our topic is today: the death of the Oppression Olympics and the reclamation of personal responsibility.

Oppression and the Disadvantaged

So, you're oppressed. You're disadvantaged. You were dealt a shitty hand. A bad roll of the dice on your character sheet for reality. The whole world has it out for you, and it just isn't fair that other people have it so much easier than you.
Guess what? That goes for almost everyone on the planet. Most people aren't born into the lap of luxury. Most of us have had to scrounge from scraps in some way, shape, or form.
Here's the big secret, though: Shit happens, and while some people cry about it, others go out and do something to change their fate by taking a direct hand in what happens to them.
The victim narrative fucked me over for many years, as it did for many others. I was afraid to do anything to try to change my position in life. I was crippled with the mindset that stuff simply happened to me and there was nothing I could do about it. This victim mentality prevented me, like it does most people, from ever getting up off my ass.
Such is the narrative that the wide range of social justice warriors have created—one in which those of us who are disadvantaged in some way, shape, or form are considered to be incapable of bettering our position in life and therefore we should just give up.
Let's look at an example, shall we?
Let's say I leave my car parked in front of Walmart, with the front doors unlocked, the driver door hanging wide open, the key in the ignition, and the car running. I leave it there for two hours, completely unattended, and when I step back out … lo and behold, my car has been stolen.
Wow, I sure didn't see that one coming, did you?
Now wait a moment. Before you tell me that I should've locked my car or at least closed the door, might I point out that that's victim-blaming? Why, even suggesting that I could've had any hand at all in preventing my car from getting stolen is victim-blaming.
Yes, this is the narrative that's been spun and thrown around as if it means something, from those who are disadvantaged to those who have been raped.
Rather than point out that the vast majority of people didn't steal my car, or that there were some simple precautions I could've taken to severely lower the chances, the social justice warriors rush to my aid and tell me there's nothing I could've done, that the person who stole my car is 100% to blame, and anyone who tries to help me lead a normal life rather than one of fear and terror from that point on is victim blaming.
No.
The way to "empower" someone is to give them the tools to better their position in life. You don't live their life for them, you don't carry them, you don't try to lower the standards or knock down everyone else around them. That's not what makes our lives better. What makes our lives better is, strangely enough, actually improving our lives by degrees over time and interspersing with noticeable increases that stand out compared with where we currently are.
A new job. A raise. A promotion. A better house. A better car. The details are irrelevant as to what's better—just that it's something significant enough to be "better" than where we were the day, the week, the month, the year, or the decade before. Some way to show progress.

The thing is, so long as someone is told they can never improve their position in life, they're not going to garner these things. Telling a rape victim they could do nothing to prevent it only artificially extends the feeling of helplessness, stringing it out much longer than it needs to be. Letting them know that they can do something to prevent it from happening again, or at least limiting the chances of it, puts them in a better position than they were in previously.

This also means that we should stop trying to carry those who don't need to be carried. It prevents them from ever feeling that they have any control over their own lives.

Feminism is especially bad for the "You'd be nowhere without me!" claim it imposes on women in general, but many other forms of social justice warrior provide similar problems every time they try to do all the work for someone rather than letting that individual realize they can carry themselves.

Our greatest power is the power to be self-actualized human beings. The capacity to better ourselves and the situations we find ourselves within. The power to be more than we are.

The first step to all of this begins by saying, "I can change my destiny."

Wealth and Poverty

I've seen both extremes of this spectrum personally—I've lived in comfortable air conditioning, with practically anything I could want for … and I've lived in squalor in a ghetto, barely surviving on only a spoon of peanut butter and dry pasta to eat every day for months on end. I've had people just assume I'm a straight white male, and I've been on the receiving end of hatred from even my own family due to how I was born. I've supposedly had oodles of "privilege" while simultaneously being one of the most supposedly "disadvantaged" people in society. Funny, that.

And you know what? Honestly, I've learned that it's largely irrelevant whether you're born into the lap of luxury or are starving to death. As humans, we adapt to any given situation with remarkable ease. If you're starving, then something as simple as a glass of milk or a hamburger can bring you great joy. If you're catered to in every way possible, then these same things aren't remotely of the same value to you.

We require a baseline for happiness with which we compare our current situation against, and that baseline shifts and alters depending on our life experiences. No matter what you do, you will never be "perpetually happy." If everyone treated you kindly, if you had no fears, no problems, no harmful situations coming your way, you'd still never be truly happy.

First World problems are not inherently any worse than anyone else's problems. If you took the starving child in Africa and dumped them into the life of a millionaire, I can guarantee you that, within a mere decade, they would be furious if someone brought them a drink that didn't have quite enough ice in it.

Our expectations change based on what someone can do for themselves and how far they exceed our expectations. Our respect, from others and our own self-respect, is largely derived from whether we meet these expectations, whether we better ourselves or stagnate, whether we rise to the challenge or falter and fail.

It's not about being born better off than others, oddly enough, or even being supposedly "privileged" or "oppressed"; what matters is what you do with what you have and how you improve your position in life relative to where you are.

The truly great individuals in this world have always made the best of what they have had. It's part of what makes them truly great. Possibly the only thing.

Where others falter and say, "The world is against me, I give up," truly great individuals rise and persevere in the face of audacity, challenge their fate, and do what others believe to be impossible.

I am not one of these people. It'd be nice if I was, but I'm not. I'm working on it, though, and that's the important part. I've learned that it isn't enough to wallow in misery, blaming the world for my failings. Sure, the world's against me. It's been a hell of a lot more against me than it has for most people, but that's irrelevant—what matters is that I've learned to plow through hardship and better myself along the way.

The greatest strength we can ever possess is the understanding that we can better our position in life no matter the opposition we face. From actual slaves in literal chains to those who have climbed Everest, it's all the same. When you realize that challenges can be overcome, or at least fought against, you can become better as a person and therefore better your place in the world.

You may always remain a slave, but you may become the leader of the slaves, which is still better than where you were, and honestly, that's what's important. It's a strange realization that you can be happy as a slave, but it's oddly true—so long as we are continually improving our position in life, even if that position still sucks, the fact that it's better than what we had before is the part that we hold important.

Even if you went from being a slave to a millionaire, it's irrelevant; without continual progression—if you stagnate—you'll be dissatisfied in life.

Does this mean we shouldn't free the slaves of the world? Hell, no. Of course we should. But the fight doesn't end there, and that's the point. Just being free isn't good enough. Just being given advantages in life doesn't make you happy. Being given the advantages of the supposedly "privileged" doesn't make you happy—you'll perpetually want more.

And this leads into how to do that.

The Truly Great

The truly great adapt the world to themselves; if life gives them lemons, they don't just make lemonade. They corner the market on lemonade, build a small fortune off it, then liquidate their assets and invest in something bigger, always bettering their position in life.

This is the true key to happiness in life—we always look for "more," we always want things to be "better," we need to know more, to do more, to be more, to have more. It doesn't matter how much we have at any given time, but only that there could be more than what we already have or that we could be more than who we already are.

To better ourselves and our position in life is what matters. It doesn't matter where you are or who you are—you will always seek out "more."

Consider someone in the desert; a glass of ice cold water could be heaven for them, simply because it's more than they have currently. For someone in an air-conditioned mansion, a glass of water is simply a given.

As our situation in life improves, so, too, does our desire for "more" and so, too, follows the expectations put upon us.

For the person in the desert, simply finding an oasis, or that glass of cold water, is all that's needed for them to be respected and adored. The millionaire, however, gains nil for respect in the exact same action. As the millionaire gains more, the expectations put upon them are increased so that the millionaire has to do more just to be considered vaguely adequate.

Respect is earned, not mandated, and it must be garnered from doing something difficult. Sometimes survival is difficult enough for some people, and they're given adoration for pulling themselves out of a desperate situation. For a leader, a CEO, a president or prime minister, or other figure of authority, however, they're held to higher standards. Survival just isn't good enough. They have to do more than those near the bottom. What would garner respect for the average person on the street would provide little else but scorn for those at the top.

As such, making things easier for someone doesn't do anything to help them. Programs like affirmative action provide zero respect. If you're given a position in a company not because you earned it but because you were mandated it above someone who was better qualified, you simply will never earn any respect for that … because you literally didn't earn any respect.

To this end, we must strive for equal opportunity; give people the tools they need to succeed! Let them fight on an even playing field, give them the training and knowledge they need to do their best … but we still have to accept that, in the end, whether they rise to the challenges presented or not is on them, not us.

We can't expect equal results. They never will be. Some individuals will rise to the top because they are willing to do what's necessary to become the best. Others will never be fit for these positions of power, no matter how much you try to prop them up.

The key is that people who are taught to fight for what they want, to strive for excellence, and to take life by the horns will succeed no matter how many obstacles are placed in their way.

Those who are coddled, are allowed to relax, and have the standards of entry lowered for them will always fall behind because they won't be able to confront the challenges they face in their new position.

Let's return to our desert scenario again, shall we?

We have someone in the desert who requires water. Rather than let her find her own, or give her the training on how to find water, someone drives up and hands her the water. There's no respect gained from this, and she has learned nothing on how to better her position in life. Now that she has water, however, she's carted off to be a village leader, yet she has no problem-solving skills because she's used to people simply handing her solutions to her problems. She's a useless leader and brings down everything around her, harming not only herself but her entire community.

This is where affirmative action and similar drives lead us—failure for all.

Women should be given all the opportunities in the world to improve and prove themselves, but they shouldn't be given handouts to forcibly make them "equal" to men. The same goes for all other minorities or disadvantaged groups.

Stop hand-feeding us. Teach us how to stand on our own two feet, and tell us that we can succeed if we take those tools and use them properly.

By trying to cater to us at every turn, you're really only harming us as individuals and holding us back from our true potential.

It took me years to learn that, and I'm worse off for not having learned it sooner, so this is my message to everyone out there who feels disadvantaged or that the world owes you—no, it doesn't, and being privileged sucks almost as much as being disadvantaged. It's all about how you learn to work with what you have. Nothing more, nothing less.

Personal Responsibility

We must take responsibility for our own actions; that's the moral of this whole post, but it goes further than that. It's not enough to be complacent when others are harming those around you. There are two sayings I'd like to make use of here:

> "The only thing required for evil to triumph is for good men to do nothing."

> "The small and the weak will belittle you, and try to make you fail, but the truly great will make you feel that you, too, can be great."

These are paraphrased, but you get the idea.

It's not good enough for you to better your own position in life, but rather part of greatness is derived from strengthening those around you, bolstering their resolve, and granting them the tools—be it knowledge, wisdom, inspiration or ambition—to better themselves as well.

You also can't sit idly by and allow someone to cause harm to others, even if they believe it's in their best interests. No one thinks they're evil, not even the most hated dictators or serial killers in history. Invariably, they justify their actions. The path to hell is paved with good intentions, after all.

The social justice warriors believe they help those who are disadvantaged by holding their hands the whole way, by fending off the criticism needed to grow, by insisting that only the perpetrator of a crime is at 100% fault and that the victim can never do anything to make it less likely to happen to them in the future.

We can't allow this to continue. This has to stop.

Hatred comes in many forms, and when you segregate the world into the "haves" and "have-nots," this invariably will breed resentment and some of the worst hatred and bigotry out there. Those on the top can view those on the bottom with disdain, but often those on the bottom can view those on the top with malice just as easily.

Rather than striving to bring themselves to the top, they seek to bring the top down to their own level. This helps none of us, and never truly provides happiness, as was covered earlier. Dragging someone down with you into the mud doesn't make you happy—you have to improve your position based upon where you are, not where you are in relation to someone else. This is an all-too-common mistake that so many people make. They believe if they harm another, then they will feel better in comparison.

It just doesn't work that way, unless you're a psychopath, in the clinical definition of the term.

For the rest of us, it's an obligation for us to root out this behaviour and put an end to it quickly. Build people up, teach them how to better themselves, give them the tools to become truly great, and we will simply have a better society overall.

In this particular case, we have an example—radical feminist hatred, in which these individuals have come to believe that the only way for women to be happy is for the mass genocide of males.

It's not enough to better your own self but also to explain to these others that they don't need to live their lives filled with hatred and anger. There are better ways to bring all of us to a better place.
Unfortunately, there are those of us who simply have given up on this. Rather than truly help those who need it, there are those who have given way to letting it slide or making excuses for those who need help the most among us.
For example, David Futrelle has become complicit in protecting these wounded individuals, and rather than trying to help them achieve a better life, he has been neglectful, coming up with excuses for such hatred. By not helping them grow out from their hatred and showing them how to better themselves, he perpetuates the problem.
A recent series of events surrounding Futrelle makes him an ideal example of what not to do, as can be seen here: David Futrelle covers for violent feminists.
Personally, I disagree with the specifics on how to handle this, but I do agree that this can't be allowed to continue. He has harmed so many women by encouraging their bitter anger and self-destructive tendencies rather than by providing them the tools to better themselves.
This is merely one example of thousands, or likely millions or more.
In the end, our personal responsibility extends beyond ourselves and must be applied via proxy to those we care about. We can't change the viewpoints of others, nor can we physically force them to succeed, despite the best attempts of social justice warriors everywhere.
We can, however, give them the tools to allow them the opportunity to succeed. The rest is up to them—they have to make the choice to better themselves.
I am Catreece MacLeod. I've been a victim, and I've harboured hatred for those who had an easier life than me, but no more. I'm better than that now. When I claimed responsibility for my own actions, for my own life, and my own destiny, I gained the first of many tools I needed to forge my own destiny anew.
The cycle of hatred ends with me because I can't force anyone else to stop. It stops because I no longer perpetuate it. I no longer harbour hatred for those who have more than I do. Instead, I seek to elevate myself to their level, and what I've found is that those who witness that resolve are willing to reward it and help me as I help myself, regardless of gender, sexuality, race, religion, or any other factor.
I am responsible for my own life, and while my hardships may be more than those that some others face, the point is largely irrelevant. No one else can live my life for me. No one else can be held responsible for my decisions. No one else can force me to succeed. You can offer me help, you can offer me hope, and you can offer me the tools needed to better myself, but you can never carry me.
And to any social justice warrior out there, to any feminist, to any other minority or individual who feels oppressed or disenfranchised, I invite you to join me in a better future for all of us, to break the cycle of hatred, and to claim personal responsibility, which unlocks the greatest power available to you—control over your own life.

Why Ted Hsu Voted Against Equal Parenting

AVfM Video Source · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

According to Canadian MP Ted Hsu, equal parenting is not in the best interests of children. This is why he voted against Bill C560, the Presumption of Equal Parenting. He says this in an interview published on StudioBrule right before going off to visit both of his parents and the rest of his family for a barbecue. Hsu provided little in terms of a justification in the interview, as if he had a justification to begin with.

Is David Futrelle covering for violent feminists?

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 20 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editors note: This item is being republished as Al-Jazeera Stream is airing a show today using a proven journalistic hack and friend to gendercide apologists posing as an "expert" on men's rights activists, and who also conflates PUAs, ex-PUAs, and MRAs as if they were all the same. – PW

David Futrelle has made a name for himself in the blogosphere by tracking down what he defines as misogyny for the purpose of mocking it. Futrelle insists that the "manosphere" is rife with hatred of women, and he is relentless in exposing that hate. How well does he deal with the hatred within his own movement? Let's take a look.

In 2011 an intrepid explorer by the name of Agent Orange infiltrated the private forums of radical feminists at RadFemHub and he screencapped their conversations. RadFemHub has since been turned into an archives, but the original Hub was "a collective radical feminist blog and its purpose was to post fresh, original radfem content, provide a male-free and safe platform for women to discuss, and promote radical feminist perspectives and interests." The Hub delightedly proclaimed half a million page views, so these were not one or two crazy cat ladies in the basement but actually a rather large group of like-minded women.

When Agent Orange posted the files, Futrelle went about gleefully mocking them, as he promised he would do. He writes, "These files are apparently so vile and incendiary" and wonders, "What dastardly secrets do these files expose?" and he proceeds to mock the supposed violence and hate by reproducing a few comments about a midwife and a woman who would like to castrate men who create computer viruses. Nothing particularly violent or hateful about castration, right? Futrelle downplays the comment by writing, "That does seem a little excessive. Though I don't think she means it literally."

Let's think about that for a moment. This is a man who harps relentlessly on a single comment Dr. Warren Farrell made, that was misquoted, back in the 1970s, insisting that Farrell meant something he did not mean. This is the man who insists that every word of satire written by Paul Elam is to be taken as the gospel truth. This is the man who insists every word ever written on any blog he doesn't like is to be interpreted literally and all other interpretations are just pure misogyny. And just to reiterate, once again, the "Bash A Violent Bitch" article was a satirical response to an article at Jezebel called "Have You Ever Beat Up A Boyfriend? Cause, Uh, We Have," in which three editors and numerous commenters giggle over punching, kicking, hitting, and slapping their male partners, often with a sense of pride and cheerfulness that is alarming, to say the least (click images to enlarge).

Castration? I'm sure she didn't mean it literally. #SeemsLegit.

Futrelle complains that the files have no context and are "just a bunch of files with no explanation," and he ends his piece by writing, "MRAs, more melodramatic than emo kids." That's a harsh charge! More melodramatic than emo kids?! What is all the melodrama over anyways?

Not at all, Maggie. In fact, I'm one of those bad, shameful feminists who wish we could all just kill the fuckers (whether it's a practical tack to take or not). BUT, isn't it frustrating when you're out with a lesbian and still all you can think/talk about is men? For the most part, I'm not interested in being reminded they even exist - especially in lesbian contexts...

Ugh, I sooo understand all those papers by Denise Thompson now.

I needs to be so unfashionable to have boys and then they would be aborted before seeing the light of day just like millions of girls who are aborted every year and no one sees the harm in that. I think secretly many women already abort boys they just keep it quiet because of the outcry it would initiate! I frequently hear women lamenting having boys and some make a conscious decision to have no more just in case they have a boy. "The trouble with boys' is becoming an issue here in UK as they are the worst behaved and hardest to educate and so on and on.....younger boys are becoming more and more violent in their actions even to the point of maiming and even slaughter (other boys mostly and sometimes girls) they seem to be on a self destruct mode.....
I agree with the earlier remark that feminist have a greater chance of bringing up boys in the 'sisterhood model' but from my own experience that does not work....anymore than trying to raise your daughter's as out and out feminists....all children are deeply subjected to mainstream patriarchy at a very early age..from the moment they are dressed in pink or blue....you are your hue from birth it seems !!!!!!
As a RFem....violent revolution is the only answer .....we feel we are loosing the battles (maybe , maybe not) but the war is yet to be won.....I am just foot tapping and waiting for the time when I can sneak up and catch them unawares that's when we as women will win the war.....
Anyone ever read Copperwoman?

Very interesting insights, Lucky. I agree with most of it, though not all of it; e.g. okay, they may hate each other sometimes, but why would they kill each other, especially when they share the common interest of bonding over hatred of womyn? Too optimistic, IMHO.

I wish we could kill men and, though I agree it probably can't be done, I often daydream about men disappearing from the face of the earth, or catching a deadly disease that would only target them, or something like that. I hate men.

"My anger has meant pain to me but it has also meant survival, and before I give it up I'm going to be sure that there is something at least as powerful to replace it on the road to clarity."
-Audre Lorde.

> … I wish we could kill men … I often daydream about men disappearing from the face of the earth….

Gosh, why all the melodrama, guys? Killed, flayed, boiled, caged, exterminated, bombed—it's just a joke, guys! I'll bet you're laughing, right? Oh, but don't worry, the women who made those comments were roundly condemned by the other commenters!

Oops. Not so much. The comments were indeed taken out of context, but guess what? The context makes them worse, not better. Putting them back into a conversation that sufficient numbers are participating in to generate half a million page views builds the case that feminism is a troubling movement fomenting hate and daydreaming of real violence. Are we going to wait until the day that violence happens, or are we going to start labelling feminism for what it really is: a hate movement?

You can read the entire "context" right here. Have a vomit bag on hand.

David Futrelle, who insists that a satirical article called "If You See Jezebel in the Road, Run the Bitch Down" is to be taken literally and held up as irrefutable evidence that the MHRM is dangerous and violent, is rather curiously silent about radical feminists discussing the murder of men. Futrelle's blog was used as a source by various media to create the false impression that the MHRM was directly responsible for the deaths of five men and two women in the Elliot Rodger killings.

This is the same Futrelle who failed to notice the rampant hatred of men and threats of violence in files he admits to downloading and reading. Or is he choosing to deliberately ignore and therefore implicitly endorse that violence? I wonder which it is? Is Futrelle the worst researcher in the world, or is he covering for the violence and hatred expressed by his own?

One of the key actors at RadFemHub was a woman named Pamela O'Shaughnessy (aka Vliet Tiptree or Karma), who also operates a blog called A Voice For Creepy Men. A few days ago, O'Shaughnessy reprinted an article from Futrelle's site, but when the heat was turned up on Futrelle on Twitter, the post curiously disappeared. We have a screencap of the post, though. It's the Internet, folks, and nothing really disappears.

Hmmm. I wonder why that post came down? Could it be that Futrelle obsessively googles himself and discovered a post reproduced without permission and demanded the author remove it? It's possible. Sure. Why not? Or is it the case that Pamela of RadFemHub and David are still in close communication and he is not only aware of the extreme violence and hateful rhetoric of feminism, but he secretly agrees? It would explain a lot, but, hey, it's just a guess.

At the end of the day, Futrelle has never, ever once condemned the awfulness of the Agent Orange files, which he downloaded, and which have been sent out on Twitter feeds that he follows and reads. It is virtually impossible that Futrelle has never seen the files (he admits he read them!), but even if he really has never laid eyes on the most hate-filled comments, there is still no plausible explanation for why he would not investigate such a serious accusation against a movement he strongly endorses and supports.

Feminism is a hate movement. When they think they are alone and no one is watching, they plan the mass extermination of men. They daydream of murdering men. They want to maim men. Shoot men. Strip their skins off and boil them for glue. Please tell me what words like that are, if not hate.

Not all feminists? Half a million page views. Is that enough for you to sit back and think it through? Feminism is a hate movement. Full stop. I look at the face of my little son and imagine one of these witches being his teacher, his doctor, his friend's mother, a random woman on the street, and I fear for him.

The International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit is history in the making. It's the first salvo in what is shaping up to be a long war. One that we are going to win.

Hey, David? You better pick sides, dude. And you might want to look in a mirror. You're a man. Are you sure you'll enjoy being put on a leash, put in a cage, or put to sleep? One of your friends said that.

And you said nothing.

Lots of love,

JB

When cops can't get their stories straight: Corporal Richard Dozois

Suzanne McCarley · 21 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On May 17, 2014, Patrick John Doran published an article called "The Bully In Blue: Constable Colin Leo Folk," detailing the ridiculously inconsistent and contradictory voir dire hearing testimony of one of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) officers involved in the arrest of Aaron Joseph Harms.
http://www.avoiceformen.com/mens-rights/the-bully-in-blue-constable-colin-leo-folk/
Constable Colin Folk was one of four officers who were excluded from testifying at Harms' sexual assault trial because their testimony was ruled less than credible; indeed, the most credible aspect of their testimony was that it implicated them in the violation of Harms' Charter rights (similar to US Constitutional rights). The other officers were Corporal Richard Dozois, Constable Larry McDonald, and Constable Thomas Parker. All four of the officers who handled the incident on the night of the arrest screwed up so badly that they were not permitted to give evidence at the trial. I can't help but envision the Keystone Cops scrambling around, bumping into one another, and in general making fools of themselves. Fortunately, their lawlessness and idiocy helped lead to Harms' acquittal. Unfortunately, their lawlessness and idiocy led them to arrest and imprison a man they knew was almost certainly innocent.
The voir dire hearing was held October 7, 2013, the first day of Harms' trial for an alleged sexual assault on his perjurer stepdaughter Angel Roberts, which allegedly occurred in May 2011. A voir dire hearing is a "trial within a trial," often held without the jury present, the purposes of which include determining the admissibility of evidence and the competence of witnesses.
http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Voir_dire
http://legal-dictionary.thefreedictionary.com/Voir+Dire
The hearing began with Folk's testimony, much of which was reported in Doran's article, and I will refer to it here as well. Dozois' testimony ranges from evasive to blatantly contradictory. It begins with a relatively innocuous omission that might easily go unnoticed. When Crown Prosecutor Joyce asks Dozois how long he has been a member of the RCMP, he answers (page 45):
20 A: About 14 and a half years.
22 Q: Where have you been stationed during that period of time?
23 A: Eight and a half years in Morinville and the remainder of the time, 4 and a half years, in Athabasca.
As the average nine-year-old can tell you, eight and a half years plus four and a half years equals thirteen years. Not fourteen and a half years. Where was he during the other year and a half? Does it matter? Chances are the answer is totally unrelated to this case, so why lie? Why take an oath to tell the truth, then promptly tell even an innocuous, by-omission white lie? Why would Dozois begin his testimony with an inaccurate statement and risk being exposed to the world as dishonest, stupid, and/or careless to the point of negligence?
If the above was his only lie, it might be a fluke, but much of the rest of Dozois' testimony is even more confusing. In his account of the events that transpired in the Harms residence, he contradicts not only himself but also Folk. As the first officer on the scene, Folk testifies that he had called for backup as soon as he saw Harms in possession of a gun. According to transcript page 46, Dozois describes the summons to Prosecutor Joyce as "not standard." He doesn't elaborate on how it deviated from what he called "standard." Later, under cross-examination by the defense (Ms. Hayes, page 57), he agrees that it was not "like an officer in distress type call." These statements are not specifically contradictory, but they are conveniently vague in that they allow him to later claim that he was both keenly aware of the situation and yet not really paying attention.
36 Q: After the initial complaint comes in and you find that Constable Folk is going to 37 attend, what happens from there?
38 A: Constable Folk radioed me and provided me with — I'm not going to say a standard — 39 it appeared with what came over the radio that he required my assistance to the 40 residence that he went to.

then …

28 Q: MS. HAYES: When you were requested by Constable Folk to attend at the 29 residence, it certainly wasn't like an emergency call; correct? It wasn't like an officer
30 in distress type call?
31 A: No.

Dozois then describes the events leading to his arrest of Harms (one of two different arrests described in this hearing). He testifies that he had responded to the backup call and entered the basement, where Folk and Harms were in conversation, seated on a couch. He claims that he didn't recall the specifics of the conversation (Joyce, page 48). However, he also claims (to Joyce, page 48, and to Hayes, pages 58-9) that due to Folk's demeanor, and also due to the not-quite-standard nature of the backup summons, his senses were heightened and he listened carefully to what Harms said.

2 Q: After being advised that Constable Folk is downstairs what did you do?
3 A: I went downstairs.
5 Q: And what did you observe downstairs?
6 A: In the basement I observed two people, Constable Folk and Mr. Harms, and both
7 were in conversation when I came downstairs.
9 Q: Where were each of these people located?
10 A: They were seated on the couch in the basement.

Then to Ms. Hayes:

1 Q: So when you went in and were directed downstairs, I know you've indicated you were
2 acting in a professional manner, so certainly upon seeing two people talking I suspect
3 you just hung back a little?
4 A: No. When I went downstairs I was within a few feet. I walked right op to where 5 they were.
7 Q: I apologize. That's probably awkward on my part in terms of questioning. I guess I
8 meant you didn't go and immediately insert yourself into their conversation?
9 A: No.
10
11 Q: You let them continue their dialogue that they had going on back and forth?
12 A: Yes.
13
14 Q: And your evidence today is that you simply don't remember what they were talking 15 about?
16 A: That's correct.
17
18 Q: Would it be safe to say that they were talking about something related to the 19 investigation?
20 Yes.
21
22 Q: Or did you –okay.
23 A: Yes.
24
25 Q: So would it be fair to say you don't remember specifics, but it was clear to you upon 26 arrival that they were talking about this incident?
27 A: Yes.
28

29 Q: And it was a back and forth, both of them were stating things, asking questions. It 30 was an exchange between two parties?
31 A: It was.
32
33 Q: When you referred to hearing the admission made about the clothing being removed,
34 was that something you elicited or something that was said between the two of them
35 that you overheard?
36 A: That's what I overheard.
37
38 Q: At that point is when you chose to insert yourself into the investigation?
39 A: Yes.
40
41 Q: That's fair?
1 A: Yes.
3 Q: So the best we can say is they're clearly having a discussion about the investigation,
4 that disclosure is made, and then at that point you arrest him.
5 A: Yes.
7 Q: Now, when they are having the discussion on the couch, certainly no one's in a good
8 mood; that would be fair to say?
9 A: That's correct.
10
11 Q: But at the same time there's not physical contact between the parties?
12 A: No, there's not.
13
14 Q: There's not a sense that either on the part of Mr. Harms or on the part of the officer 15 that either one of them is about to lunge at another or anything like that?
16 A: My senses were heightened in the basement as a result of being summoned to the 17 residence by Constable Folk in the fashion that he summoned me. When I got to the 18 basement, his eyes were averting to the corner, so I knew that there was something
19 that he wanted to get my attention about. I couldn't see. The basement was dimly
20 lit, and Constable Folk's demeanour was not normal to me.
21
22 Mr. Harms was agitated, and maybe nothing specifically said at the moment that 23 would indicate that a violent interaction was going to take place, but I was very 24 focused on my being in the basement and to assist Constable Folk with Mr. Harms.
25 Q: And I guess the fair way to say it, you're alive to the possibility that something could 27 happen, but at present there was no immediate need to intervene. Is that a fair way
28 of describing it?
29 A: Yes.

Why would Dozois find it necessary to portray himself as relatively oblivious to the conversation between Folk and Harms while simultaneously being alert enough to catch Harms' alleged "disclosure." Obviously, he must have heard the disclosure in order to have arrested Harms, and also obviously, with two officers testifying to having heard the same confession, it would sound more like the truth. However, as Folk's supervisor, Dozois couldn't afford to testify to hearing Folk questioning Harms without having cautioned him of his Charter rights. To do so would clearly condemn Folk. The moment Folk walked down the basement stairs and saw the gun (which he didn't know was a replica), he had probable cause for an arrest. He should have cautioned Harms immediately before asking him so much as "What's going on?" Folk blatantly violated Harms' Charter rights, and Dozois testified that he (rather conveniently) didn't hear the specifics of the conversation that occurred before the arrest. Perhaps all of his senses were "heightened" except one—his hearing.

http://www.canada.com/edmontonjournal/news/story.html?id=6acccca1-4320-4324-8c8b-2902cb2dd44c

"After briefly helping to clear the scene, Kehler said he consulted with the other two officers and it was decided he should retrieve the patrol car. He can't remember who made the decision, or whether the decision was made by consensus. Dozois made no mention of the conversation in his testimony."]

Back to the case at hand: immediately after Dozois contradicts himself on the witness stand, he further distances himself from any violations that Folk may have committed with this exquisite example of verbal sleight of hand (page 59):

31 Q: Is there a reason that you did not personally charter and caution Mr. Harms upon 32 arresting him?
33 A: Constable Folk entered into the investigation at the residence and was dealing with 34 Mr. Harms. My role was to assist Constable Folk in a backup scenario, and 35 Constable Folk, who was on duty that night, and the first arriving on the scene, and 36 myself being called back for an overtime shift, it wouldn't necessarily be normal for 37 me as a supervisor, to take over the arrest and caution. That's not saying it 38 can't be done.

Makes you wonder what kind of supervisor doesn't step in to correct an officer who is breaking the law.

In addition to contradicting himself, Dozois provided testimony that is in direct conflict with Folk's testimony. Both of them claimed to have arrested and handcuffed Joseph Harms.

From above, Rick Dozois:

3 Q: So the best we can say is they're clearly having a discussion about the investigation,
4 that disclosure is made, and then at that point you arrest him.
5 A: Yes.

From page 17, Colin Folk:

18 Q: Okay. And then what happens after your backup arrives?
19 A: I advised Corporal Dozois of the situation when he came downstairs, and I advised
20 Mr. Harms he was under arrest. I handcuffed Mr. Harms, took him out to my 21 patrol vehicle, and read Mr. Harms his rights verbatim.

So who made the arrest, and when? Who was in charge? Who said what, and when? Does the police academy teach classes in obfuscation and selective memory loss? Is it any wonder the judge found these two officers "less than credible" and prohibited them from testifying in the rest of the trial (and the two other officers in this little club)? I hope Crown Prosecutor Joyce sincerely thanked that judge for sparing her the humiliation of having to parade these clowns in front of a jury.

Leon Walker: The Consequences of Speaking Out

Leon Walker · 21 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My name is Leon Jermane Walker and I am a whistle-blower. For reporting the discovery of a gross waste of government funds and for reporting the endangerment of my child by her politically well-connected mother, I have faced years of ongoing persecution at the hands of Oakland County Government, my former employer. As a result, my career has been ruined, I've been financially destroyed, and in only a matter of days, my family and I will be evicted from our home.

On February 1, 2010, only weeks after I had submitted to Oakland County Government the findings of an investigation I had conducted after discovering what appeared to be a financial boondoggle, I was arrested and charged with a five-year felony by the Oakland County Prosecuting Attorney. I'd learned details of this scheme when, out of fear for the well-being and treatment of our daughter, I reviewed emails written by my wife. In reviewing the emails, I discovered that some correspondence outlined the existence of an ongoing wasteful purchasing scheme that was possibly being used to siphon hundreds of thousands of dollars a year from Oakland County taxpayers. In this same email, I also learned of the prolonged and ongoing endangerment of my daughter and stepson.

The arrest effectively silenced me, which I believe was my persecutors' goal. Parties mentioned in the emails as being involved with the financial scheme included my then-wife, who was a long-time government employee; her second husband (I was her third), who is a long-time government contractor; and his attorney, whose brother was a high-ranking elected official in Oakland County. I believe, and admitted evidence has since suggested, that political influence was used to initiate my malicious prosecution. I was charged with a felony under the claim that reading my spouse's email was a crime. The emails were in an account that I had created before the marriage. I had accessed it with the password I had used when creating the account, and this was during our marriage, in my home, on my computers, and on my network. I read those emails out of concern for the safety of my child, a concern that was validated by my findings—and in reality, the situation was much worse than I'd ever imagined.

My story was published in the local media on Christmas Eve 2010, and within days it became international news. In response to this coverage though, I received additional attacks from Oakland County, this time from multiple agencies within the government, including my employer, the Executive Branch. Their attacks eventually included a second even more baseless computer crimes charge against me, as they claimed that a request I'd submitted eight months prior under the Freedom of Information Act was somehow a computer crime. Lies were spread about me in the media, and authorities began to covertly attack me in family court, providing defamatory claims in written reports released directly to my ex-wife to aid her in custody disputes. They harassed and intimidated my co-workers and friends, making it fundamentally impossible for them to appear in court as witnesses on my behalf out of fear of being persecuted themselves. Some co-workers were even coerced into making dishonest claims about me in criminal proceedings.

It took two and a half years for me to overcome my persecutors. After surviving years of delays, threats, and attacks, I was finally exonerated when the Oakland County Prosecutor's Office dropped the charges against me the day before trial was to begin. After they had persuaded employees to reverse their earlier claims against me, Oakland County dropped the charges outright. A public trial where the facts of the case could have been presented in court was never allowed to occur.

During this process, actually soon after the Prosecutor's media attacks against me began, I approached a prominent local civil rights attorney to represent me and my interests. At the time, she claimed to be emphatically in support of me but eventually refused to take any action or even speak publicly on my behalf until I'd won the case. When I'd finally succeeded, however, she reaffirmed her support but refused to pursue the case for months. Her claim was that filing charges at that time would harm the Democratic-incumbent Prosecutor in the upcoming election and give her Republican opponent an edge. Totally shocked by this position and statement, I began to seek other counsel. In response to my efforts, my attorney rushed a woefully inadequate complaint and filed it in Federal Court. This complaint omitted almost any reference to the Oakland County Prosecutor's Office as well as its staff and the civilian parties that had aided them in their attacks. She then modified her argument to me as well, now claiming that she wouldn't make claims against prosecutorial conduct because of immunity. This claim was thoroughly contradicted, though, by her actions in her own successful argument against prosecutorial immunity in Wendrow v. Michigan Dep't of Human Services, a case in which she aggressively pursued the prior Oakland County Prosecutor, who happened to be from the Republican Party, which she opposes. After I allowed her to drop from my case due to this very obvious conflict making her unfit to represent my interests, I believe that her actions in communicating with other firms have effectively left me blackballed from representation on my civil action. Without counsel for an extended time, my civil case was eventually dismissed with prejudice, fundamentally stripping me of my right to hold Oakland County accountable for a large number of their actions.

With the criminal charges dismissed before trial and the civil case dismissed as a result of the actions of my attorney, I was never given an opportunity to have my name publicly cleared. No opportunity to clarify the facts to the masses, with frivolous criminal charges and slanderous "hacker" claims from the prosecutor leaving my name soiled with the toxicity of doubt, suspicion, and uncertainty. My professional reputation has been destroyed.

This ordeal has had an absolutely devastating impact on my life and the lives of my family. My career path as a successful IT professional has been fundamentally ended. I have been financially ruined, forced into bankruptcy, and unable to find any work for more than a year after being harassed away from my job with Oakland County. I was for a time dependent on welfare, experiencing the social judgment and stigma which that entails. With utilities shut off more than once and trouble paying for my car, I was forced to sell property, work odd jobs, and appeal to charity when possible to take care of myself and my daughter. After more than a year of searching, I was finally successful at finding employment, although with a long commute and significantly less pay than what I'd known before.

Compounding these terrible experiences, my daughter has made a horrifying claim of being abused by family while in her mother's care. The claim was reported to authorities, but all criminal investigations were halted without action, as the Oakland County Prosecutor first sat on the complaint for months before transferring it to Genesee County, who have held the complaint since without any action or notification of status. It was almost a year before I could even obtain the police report. In the meantime, my daughter is scarred and has faced tremendous scrutiny and pressure by the family of her alleged abuser for speaking out herself. She has been severely traumatized by this. With the political influence that my ex-wife has and the apparent willingness of Oakland County officials to so abuse their authority and influence to attack me, I don't feel safe for me or my family anymore.

The financial impact on me for speaking out has been tremendous. As mentioned, my career has been ruined. Most potential employers dismiss me even before an interview, even when they acknowledge the quality of my skill set. I have been repeatedly told of the "alarm" and "concern" they have with me because of my experience with Oakland County. As mentioned, after more than a year of desperately searching, I finally found a job late last year. Unfortunately, the damage has largely been done. The expenses and losses I took in defending myself in this process were well over $100,000, far more than I could ever afford. As a result, my mortgage wasn't paid and I was forced into bankruptcy.

This week though, things have reached depths that even I couldn't image. I faced the very difficult task of explaining to my wonderful, amazing daughter that soon we'll very likely be forcibly evicted from the home that we've managed to hold on to through all of this fight. What she's known as home for her entire life is being ripped away by Freddie Mac. With my mortgage company likely exhausted from my long-term financial difficulties, they lied and cheated their way through the foreclosure redemption to prevent me from saving my home, and Freddie Mac's legal counsel has been equally callous and disingenuous. Our backs are now against the wall. We have been forced to face this traumatizing reality; we may soon lose our home.

The pain this is causing me is difficult to explain. I spoke out in the public interest for something that I thought I'd be rewarded for. I thought we as taxpayers would benefit, as my findings would be used by responsible people in government to save us all millions in waste. Instead, maybe hundreds of thousands of dollars were wasted to destroy me for this. I thought that my actions would protect my daughter from abuse. Instead, she's faced the worst type of abuse while local law enforcement is so politicized and hostile toward me that my daughter and I don't even receive protection.

These are apparently the consequences of speaking out. My life and the lives of my family are in ruin. My career prospects have been decimated, and clearing my name seems a near impossibility. I'm even facing eviction from my home by a government agency. I haven't just been failed by the system as a whistle-blower, I've been victimized by abuses of government in the worst ways possible.

What is the state of our nation when this has been allowed to happen?

Honor Killings and Husband Killings: What They Won't Tell You

Ali Mehraspand · 21 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: this article is also available in Romanian.

For a long time, feminist organizations in the Middle East have received huge amounts of funding from the West (mostly from the United Nations or undisclosed sources). However, tens of thousands of feminist organizations in Iran also receive funds directly from the Iranian government, under the guise of Islamic feminism (more about this in future posts). These entities have a monopoly on politically incorrect statistics that make it difficult for anyone to address the many issues facing men and boys. One of the issues that has been gnawing at me for some time is honor killings because, in reality, the true victims of honor killings are almost exclusively men. It is impossible to get your hands on statistics to prove this, however, yet all the while Iranian feminist organizations have at their disposal data on any topic you can name.

While studying husband killings, I had a major breakthrough as I scavenged through a labyrinth of censorship that led me to solve the statistical problem of honor killings.

HUSBAND KILLINGS

In an effort not to complicate these issues further, let us start by addressing a huge problem in Iran: husband killings. Better yet, let us start with all the murders.

From 2001 to 2010, the average murder rate per 100,000 people per year in the US was 5.45. Since approximately 2,000 people per year are murdered in Iran, its average murder rate is 2.56, which has deviated only slightly in the past 10 years. In other words, the chances of getting killed in the US are twice as great as getting killed in Iran. Both countries share a similarity: approximately 25% of all murder victims are female, with Iran seeing an increase to 28.8% in the past year. Among Iran's 78 million people, 576 women are murdered annually compared with 1,424 men.

As discussed here in Farsi, when this subject is mentioned, feminists blame men for the high rate of husband killings. As mentioned here in Farsi, enormous censorship is at work not to reveal the extremely politically incorrect statistics of husband killings. However, criminologist Samira Kalhor revealed that husbands murdered by their wives comprise 22% of all murders in Iran, whereas women who are murdered by their husbands comprise 27% of all familial killings in Iran. (A familial killing is a murder in which the perpetrator is a relative of the victim, no matter how minor their familial relationship. For example, a murder in which the victim and the perpetrator are cousins is a familial killing.)—Huh, apples and oranges!

Kalhor did her best to make the number of murdered wives look bigger by comparing different categories, but since familial killings are only 31.9% of all murders, it is further deduced that only 8.6% of all murders are wives who are murdered by their husbands. Thus:

Fact #1: In Iran, 22% of all murders are husband killings, while 8.6% of all murders are wife killings.

It is perhaps a good idea to point out that this 22% is almost as many as all the murdered women combined, which probably means that in Iran women kill men far more than men kill women.

Armed with these facts, we can carry on to honor killings.

HONOR KILLINGS

Honor killing is actually a misnomer because there is no English equivalent for the word Namous. It has been translated as "honor," but the two words do not carry the same connotation. Namous is committed out of a behavioral propensity found in some portions of Islamic cultures called Gheirat, which we will not bother explaining here but will mention that it is enabled and maintained by women too. Anyway, men being killed, lynched, or beaten for matters relating to Namous, or honor, as mentioned earlier, comprise almost all of the victims. So when I first saw the media reports representing honor killings as gender-based violence against women, I was surprised. Later I found out that the term "honor killings," unlike its original phrase Ghatl haye Namousi, has been defined by the UN and feminists to exclude the overwhelming majority of its victims: men, many of whom were murdered by other men at the behest of women or sometimes directly by women. How did they do that? Honor killings occur when the family members of a woman kill a man for matters violating honor; on very rare occasions, it has been seen that some families have killed their own female member. So here is the key contrast: Male victims of honor killings are not family members of the perpetrators, whereas female victims of honor killings are family members of the perpetrators.

Guess what? Feminists have placed honor killings as a subcategory of familial killings! There you go: all male victims have simply evaporated by a single move of mental gymnastics. As an example, here is a UN report on honor killings in Egypt. As can be seen on page 2, all the victims are female family members of the perpetrators. Is it too rude of me to mention that in this report 25% of the perpetrators are women? What about if I suggest that women only kill if they have somehow failed to commit the murder by proxy, which is what mostly happens: honor killings at the behest of women? Many other tricks are played in that report, but it has been useful to make the necessary point here.

Although neither wife killings nor husband killings are technically honor killings, most wife killings have been counted by feminists as honor killings. So there you go again: in that UN report, female victims of spouse killings have been reported as honor killings, which accounts for 52% of all reported honor killings. This of course inflates the number of male perpetrators.

Although the numbers for male victims do not exist, the next few paragraphs will attempt to find the lowest bound (minimum number) of male victims in Iran.

By using Fact #1, we get that 8.6% + 22% = 30.6% of all murders in Iran are spouse killings, and according to Iran's police, 31.9% of all murders are familial killings.

Therefore, 1.3% of all murders are familial killings but not spouse killings. It is absurd to think that the entire 1.3% are female victims of honor killings, but we generously assume so.

According to Iran's police, honor killings account for 18.8% of all murders (in the police's definition of honor killings, male victims are included).

There are two possibilities here. The number reported by Iran's police may or may not overlap with spouse killings. If there is no overlap, then the minimum percentage of male victims of honor killings out of all murders is easily deduced:

18.8% – 1.3% = 17.5% of all murders

Male victims of honor killings account for at least 17.5% of all murders in Iran, whereas female victims, as stated before, are far less than 1.3%. Thus, even if we assume generously that female victims account for 1.3%, then:

Fact #2: At least 93% of all honor killings include a male victim, provided that spouse killings have not been considered as honor killings.

Now, there is the possibility of overlap in the police categories of spouse killings and honor killings. So let us investigate such a scenario. Two questions arise:

1. How many wife killings (which account for 8.6% of all murders) are honor killings?
2. How many husband killings (which account for 22% of all murders) are honor killings?

A blind person can easily tell that if it was up to feminists, all of the female victims of spouse killings and none of the male victims of spouse killings would be categorized outright as honor killings.

Even if we count all the wife killings as honor killings (and none of the husband killings), we get the following for the bounds:

1.3% + 8.6% = 9.9% of all the murders in such a stupid scenario are female victims of honor killings.

18.8 % – 9.9% = 8.9% of all the murders in such a stupid scenario are male victims of honor killings.

Even in such an absurd scenario, at least 47.3% of victims of honor killings are men and boys. Once more, we say "at least" because:

1) We counted all familial killings that were not spouse killings as female victims of honor killings.

2) We counted all female victims of spouse killings as honor killings and none of the male victims.
The lower bound on male victims is therefore 47.3%, found by a maximum exaggeration in favor of female victims. We don't have the actual number of male victims and can only speculate it to be well over 80%.
All in all, when it comes to this subject, the level of corruption is deep, and the feminist tactics are summarized as follows:

1. Change the definition to exclude male victims.
2. Count all kinds of familial killings (persons murdered by relatives, no matter how minor their relation) as honor killings—even if the murder was for something else entirely.
3. Report the resulting twisted statistics as if the perpetrators are men.
4. Rob women of any agency in such cultures and start blaming the patriarchy.

One key difference between the framing tactics of honor killings and those of domestic violence and rape is that honor killings really are a gendered issue because the majority of victims are male.

REASONS FOR HUSBAND KILLINGS

Since questions about the high rate of husband killings are being whispered now and then, feminists are quick to find a theory to defend it: it is because women do not have the right to divorce. This is a big lie, which has been debunked before [1]. If anything, it is actually the other way around: it is women who have the most rights to divorce in Iran. Recent statistics confirmed that 80% to 90% of divorces in Iran are initiated by women; and if you are curious, the number is actually pretty high: 150,000 divorces per year.
There is the possibility, however, that some women actually believe this feminist myth to be true. But it is unlikely that this can be a good explanation for such a disparity between genders in spouse killings.
A noteworthy possibility for such a high rate is that when women initiate divorce, especially if their husband is neither abusive, nor ill, nor addicted, etc., they will probably have to let go of part of their Mehrieh. If you do not know what Mehrieh is, see [1]. So if they can get away with murder, they will inherit most of their husband's possessions and not settle for a mere 25%. Like this story in Farsi, in which the man the woman married after her husband's murder turned out to be the murderer; and while the victim's family maintained that she had had an affair with their son's murderer and was actually complicit in his murder, she denied this. In the extremely chivalric judicial system of Islamic countries, male witnesses fall from the sky in favor of women. So this case is not considered a husband killing because the wife was not found guilty.
If you are wondering what happens to these women, there seems to be a huge and peculiar disparity for punishment in Iran's all-male-judge judicial system: of the 580 people who received the death sentence in Iran in 2012, only 9 were women. So in theory, according to Islamic law, the judge should grant the right to choose the death sentence to the victim's parents. But this does not reflect the reality, for 440 husbands are killed annually by their wives. It seems that men in high positions create obstacles if the murderer is a woman. More will be said later on the exceptionally chivalric judicial systems of Islamic countries.

Chris Gethard Is an Incredible Douche and Gets Pwned by RamzPaul

Paul Elam · 22 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

First, for the record, I want to say that as the founder and publisher of the most widely read men's rights website in the world I do not believe RamzPaul has ever made a single comment here, much less written an article, nor have I seen his presence on other "men's rights" websites. I have never talked to him (though I have enjoyed many of his videos) and don't know anything about him personally. So far as I know, he's not really a "men's rights" guy at all, just a feminist critic.

That being said, the exchange between him and comedian Chris Gethard is one of the funniest fucking things I have ever seen -n my life — thanks mostly to the fucktardery of Gethard.

What strikes me most about Gethard is the transparency of his lifelong insecurity, longing for attention, and abysmally poor self-image in relation to women. The approval-seeking (based in the absence of it) is obvious to the point of being pathetic.

Paul obviously cut him to the quick, because what we are left with is a man who has at least a modicum of real celebrity lashing out against a comparatively unknown YouTuber in reaction to a short and humorous poke at his stupid ideas.

I am embarrassed for him.

Anyway, as Paul aptly points out in his last video, the beauty of the Internet is that no one has to be fooled. Everything is on the record. I am presenting the entire exchange here. (Note to Chris: Removing your video won't help. I have a copy and will host it on one of the servers I have in three continents.)

This, ladies and gentlemen, is what an obsequious, groveling white knight looks like compared with a man who Goes His Own Way.

Gethard's original attempt to serve a shame sandwich to men who don't get their sense of worth from a pat on the head from a woman who barely tolerates them, a big screen TV, and an anchor of debt around their necks:

RamzPaul responds:
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zq3LqSzzF0s

Gethard gets all butthurt and lashes back with enough misguided invective to make David Futrelle jealous. Note that Gethard says in one breath that "fuck the girls you want to fuck" is "just gross" and in the next breath says that doing that is just fine because some women enjoy it too. He says a lot of other stuff that is equally brain-numbing and vacuous:

RamzPaul offers some sage advice:

Personally, I think Paul went very easy on him. But I don't expect readers here to.

AVfM Classics: Male/female discrepancies in transsexualism

Jesse · 22 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ed. note: With nearly 5000 articles, AVfM is pleased to introduce a new AVfM Classics feature – reprints of some of our classic articles from the past.

While transsexualism has been and remains a poorly-understood condition, certain consistent aspects have been outlined by experiment and observational evidence. One of these aspects is the discrepancy between the sexes, which several, mostly European studies have shown is quite wide, with around three times as many male-to-female as female-to-male transsexuals. But, what are the reasons for this discrepancy? To examine that, we must first examine the phenomenon of transsexualism itself.

Many would suggest that the cause of transsexualism is inherent and genetic. They point to differences in the brain structures of transsexuals, prior to any treatment with hormones or surgery, as evidence of these inherent differences. Transsexual brains appear to be more like those of the sex they identify with, rather than those of the sex they are associated with by virtue of their chromosomes, hormones, and primary and secondary sex characteristics.

These studies are problematic, however, since they tend to feature incredibly small sample sizes that make any statistical conclusions suspect. Further, even if we accept discrepancies in the brains of transsexuals as an assumption, this is a far cry from establishing that these differences are inherent. Indeed, there is strong evidence that human brains are extremely malleable, up to and throughout adulthood. Brains can quickly and dramatically rewire themselves in response to the right stimuli. Of course, this capacity is even greater in childhood.

Humans are tremendously intelligent and adaptable creatures. We are born with few instinctual behaviors, but the capacity to learn a tremendous number. And our first type of learning is imitation. Before we understand any language, before we even have a concept of self as separate from the other, we imitate. We are vastly impressionable. While it seems true that we have some aspects of personality that are set from the start, would it not be very strange to label any one aspect of personality, or even array of personality traits, as inherently "masculine" or "feminine"?

Certainly, some are more typical of one sex or another, but the fact of the matter is that there is no such thing as "what it's like" to be a man or woman. If one is a man or woman, they have a sense of that contribution to their experiences, but that cannot be said to be a typical experience of being a man or woman. Each person's experience is unique; this is even more true when taking into account people throughout history and in other cultures today.

There do not appear to be any hormonal or other consistent physical differences between transsexual individuals and others of their born sexes beyond those in the brain. Many transsexuals report having the initial inklings of their transsexual feelings arise very young, and while these assertions can easily be questioned in individual cases, there is no reason to doubt that, for many, this is the case. Certainly, some modern cases of apparent early childhood transsexualism have received a fair amount of media coverage.

But, given that the inherent, prenatal explanations for transsexualism are highly questionable, what other explanations are there, and why might these lead to the discrepancy between male and female rates of transsexualism? This area is fraught with difficulty. Few modern studies seek any explanation beyond the genetic and inherent. Indeed, modern research almost seems to put the cart before the horse, seeking reasons to validate the assertions of identity politics it takes as a given. Still, by using information from related fields of study, one can begin to build a case for an altogether different and quite environmental explanation.

That a parent's own sexual identity affects how he or she deals with children has been shown in studies, as have differences in how parents treat children according to the child's sex. Indeed, this is even the case when parents are unaware of the differences in their actions and reactions towards their children. These sex-based differences in approach are present from a very young age, and are shown to have profound effects on children.

But how might these effects lead to transsexualism? Children begin forming ideas of gender roles very early, and these ideas are simplistic, exaggerated, and extremely rigid, to the point of outright cognitive dissonance when their stereotypes are not adhered to. Children seek to understand their social environment and their place in it. It is important to realize that children have no deep, abstract understanding of gender roles. If a five-year-old boy identifies as a girl, it is not because of some deep-seated existential angst or abstract understanding of his own sex and gender, but because he associates more with certain simplistic and rigid stereotypes assigned to girls.

And why would a young boy associate more with the stereotypes assigned to girls? Well, one good reason would be because he wants to, because he regards his stereotypes of women as superior. For instance, in a feminist household, expressions of masculinity may be viewed with derision, or, when there is a father present, as a source of shame. Even without such associations, however, a child often just spends more time with his or her mother. While it does not occur until after a large proportion of gender ideas are formed, school also exposes children, primarily, to female role models. Not to mention the fact that many behaviors typical of boys are frowned upon and even drugged out of them in modern school environments.

And where do boys find themselves today? Today, women can be anything they want. Women can be action heroes, happy homemakers, corporate executives, and powerful politicians. There are two categories of fashion, fashion for everyone and fashion for women only. Women are the ones seen as beautiful and glamorous. Women are kind, gentle, empathetic, and allowed to freely express emotion. With the traditional strengths of men now seen as irrelevant or even negative, why wouldn't a boy rather be a girl? Is this not as good an explanation as any for the discrepancies between MtF and FtM transsexualism?

It is simply implausible that a child that associates with the opposite sex label has any real understanding of what that means, but unfortunately, such associations often stick. Further, this gender dysphoria is extremely harmful, frequently leading to severe depression and high suicide and poverty rates for transsexuals. As one might expect, researchers believe that male-to-female transsexuals are the hardest-hit by these problems.

There are several reasons for this, from the far greater shame associated with men breaking gender roles than women, to the simple fact that, after puberty, MtF transsexuals have a much harder time passing as women, due to body size, facial and body hair, and other secondary sex characteristics, than FtM transsexuals have passing as men. Neoteny is relatively easy to overcome with hormone therapies. There may be other reasons, such as different social pressures that tend to lead to each type of transsexualism, but these are poorly studied.

These arguments, while highly speculative, do raise important questions for how we approach raising boys in a changed culture. If, indeed, the way the sexes are treated by parents, teachers, media, and the rest of society leads to gender dysphoria and its often dire consequences, we must renew our efforts to define a new and modern role for boys, or to seek to end these gender stereotypes altogether. The rigidly controlled idea of what passes for masculine in our culture does a disservice to boys and men alike. Until boys are able to associate positive roles and freedom with their sex, it should be no surprise that a greater proportion of them wind up rejecting it, much to their own detriment.

Men Defending Themselves Is Harassment, Says Law Professor

Pierce Harlan · 23 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Former Iowa State University basketball player Bubu Palo has filed a civil action for defamation against the woman who accused him of sexual assault two years ago. Criminal sexual assault charges had been brought against Palo, but they were dismissed before trial. A forensic analysis of a blouse the alleged victim wore the night of the incident determined that it had been torn after the alleged assault, contrary to statements the alleged victim had made under oath.

The local newspaper that reported the story quotes Stanford law professor Michele Landis Dauber saying this about the Palo lawsuit: "I think that there are valid public policy reasons that a judge might want to look very carefully at such a case and make sure that there's really good evidence to support (the defamation claim), because otherwise it is going to be very harassing of sexual assault victims."

Dauber's comments are the legal equivalent of gobbledygook. The standard of proof for defamation claims is preponderance of the evidence. "Really good evidence" has no legal meaning.

Does Dauber mean that a judge should require Bubu Palo to produce evidence beyond a "preponderance of the evidence"? If Dauber didn't mean to suggest that, why did she bother making the statement? The implication of Dauber's quote is that because the alleged defamation arose in the context of a sexual assault claim, the plaintiff should be subjected to a different—presumably enhanced—standard than plaintiffs in every other defamation action. (If Dauber meant something different, she can tell us, and we will happily report it.)

In other news reports, Dauber is said to advocate for expulsion in cases of sexual assault. We wonder if Dauber thinks that in cases calling for life-altering expulsion, the university should be required to "make sure that there's really good evidence to support" the charge? Because—you know—"otherwise it is going to be very harassing of" presumptively innocent young men? Or do Dauber's concerns run only one way?

Dauber is also on record opposing the right of persons accused of sexual assault to cross-examine their accusers, saying, "Having the 18-year-old rape victim be cross-examined by the guy who raped her? That's just wrong, wrong, wrong."

Please note that Dauber doesn't bother to opine whether it's "wrong, wrong, wrong" for a young man who is wrongly accused of sexual assault to cross-examine his accuser. Perhaps the idea that a young man might be wrongly accused of sexual assault never crossed her mind.

The local newspaper reporting on the Palo case also quoted Beth Barnhill, executive director of the Iowa Coalition Against Sexual Assault, who said that lawsuits against alleged victims are "really unfortunate." And: "I think it can discourage reporting. It's a terrible precedent, and I think that there are a very small number of false reports."

Barnhill's comments are staggering in their hostility to fundamental notions of fairness. The injustice in suggesting that a defamation claimant should be deprived of his right to legal redress because the alleged defamation occurred in the context of a sexual assault claim is self-evident. Only in the loopy milieu of gender politics are such statements uttered with a straight face.

If Bubu Palo is able to prove defamation by a preponderance of the evidence, he could be awarded a significant monetary judgment, and such an award might discourage others from reporting false claims.

Unmasked: The Face of Abuse

John Ribner · 23 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Face of Abuse: What does it look like to you? A man with a five o'clock shadow and a "wifebeater" T-shirt, perhaps? He's probably sitting in a well-worn recliner and shouting, "Shut up, bitch! Go fix me a turkey pot pie!" If this is the image you conjured in your mind's eye, then you don't know Jacqueline about the Face of Abuse as it appears to far too many men.

Similar to the supernatural creature known as the Hydra, the Face of Abuse is a loathsome monster with many faces. And like that nightmarish serpent, the Face regenerates two heads for each one that's severed, and its breath and blood are the deadliest of poisons. Unlike the image of the male chauvinistic brute that mainstream society associates with abuse, the Face can be female, and at first she seems far from the dreadful reptile of Greek mythology.

This Face of Abuse begins as one of exquisite beauty. Ask any guy who's come eye to eye with this she-beast and at first he'll describe soft, loving eyes, angelic cheekbones, and a smile that took his breath away. Beneath this façade of expertly applied lipstick and eyeshadow, however, lurks a monstrosity that harbors a seething animosity toward men. It won't be long before she attacks her unfortunate Victim with unmatched and unchecked violence and ferocity; such is the case for a creature spawned upon the arid plains of No Accountability. Punching, scratching, biting, and kicking are all too common, and the law of the jungle dictates that the Victim must suffer these attacks in silence and restraint: bruises, cuts, and even trips to the hospital are a regular occurrence, yet the damage to his psyche goes even deeper. If there's an upside to this incarnation of the Face, it's that it doesn't last long.

After being moved to violence, the Face becomes a mask of righteous indignation. Cloaked in this pretense, she reminds her Victim that this is what happens to those who disrespect her. "If you were any kind of man," she hisses, "you'd apologize. Either that or I'll find someone who knows how to treat a woman." Her toxic breath is so painful to her Victim's central nervous system that he's willing to do or say anything to stop the pain. Only then will the Face's sweet, innocent beauty return, but not without the warning "If you do this again, I'll make you regret it!"

The Face can adopt a look of blinding anger, especially in the heat of a discussion. What starts out as a disagreement quickly escalates into her unabashed use of household weapons: anything sharp, heavy, and deadly that can be swung, thrust, or thrown is used by this she-devil when in attack mode. She will think nothing of hurling a steak knife at the Victim's head, and she will not flinch when the blade skims past the face of their four-year-old child whose only "crime" was wandering into the kitchen in search of Mommy and Daddy. At best, the Face will remove this blindfold and replace it with another mask—one of shock—and then another—the look of righteous indignation. Once again, the toxic cloud fills the room as the Face says, "I didn't do that. You're crazy." By now, the demon's Victim will do anything to bring back the beauty of what he thought he knew; but by now, her porcelain mask is starting to crack and the vibrant paint and delicate gilding are fading fast.

Beneath her many veneers lies the Face's true nature, and it's one of pure evil. This hideous monstrosity is a rarity, only showing herself when she genuinely feels confident in her power. The Victim might experience this after he comes home to find his best friend in the clutches of the evil beast. It is here that her pantomime of normalcy begins to fail, revealing something so vile, so wicked, and so depraved that seeing it forever changes the Victim. With venom dripping from her fangs and tongue, the Face relishes her hateful words, saying, "That's right, I'm in love with him and he loves me. So why don't you just leave, just get the fuck outta here for good, so we can be together!"

While demonic sadism is the true nature of the Face, she has other disguises. Desperation and panic blush upon her cheeks when her true nature has been discovered. Pale-skinned and wide-eyed, this grasping jackal digs dark talons into her Victim's skin, drawing blood while shrieking, "Wait! I … I didn't mean it. Don't leave me. Please!" In this state, it's easy for this succubus to transition back to the thing of beauty she started out as … but only if the Victim chooses to stay. If he keeps walking, he'll shatter her magic, leaving the Face forever trapped in her most monstrous form. This is why she tries so hard to prevent her Victim's escape.

A mistress of camouflage, the Face's final incarnation is her most deceptive. Like a snake shedding its skin, she transforms into the Eternal Sufferer; then, by fang and stinger, she spreads her poison. Between tears, she details the horrors she suffered under the Victim's brutish hand. A virulent toxin to his reputation, this substance is sweet nectar for police, prosecutors, and judges, and soon it's their faces that the Victim sees. Their naked hatred and contempt for him will be exhibited in how he's treated. As the Eternal Sufferer, the Face also turns the Victim's friends and family against him, including his own children. The youngest of the Face's victims, these children won't remember all the times the monster attacked their father; the Victim, however, will never forget those chilling words the Face spoke just before she attacked him for the last time: "Daddy's hitting Mommy! Call 911 just like I told you!"

So, what more do you need to know about the Face of Abuse—except that this is the Face of Abuse society doesn't want you to see?

What Those Who Oppose Our Conference Look Like

AVfM Video Source · 23 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following videos show the intimidating and violent behavior of feminists attempting to stop people talking about male suicidality, male homelessness, the disappearing of males in higher education facilities, workplace injury, depression, physical health, fathering, and other benign but nevertheless important topics. The intention of protestors is simple: to censor men's voices, and thereby leave unchallenged the feminist discourse that pretends to explain men's lives. These, in short, are typical of the people who oppose our conference.

How some feminist shaming tactics discredit feminist theory

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 24 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Portuguese.

I recently got an idea remembering an upload of an interview I recently put up and something I said in part of it–that some of the shaming tactics that feminists use actually discredit their theories and their ideology. So, without further ado, let us tackle the first one:

"MISOGYNIST!"

According to feminists, our society has a big problem with systemic misogyny. In fact, all societies are bogged down in pervasive social and institutional misogyny. In patriarchal societies, this misogyny is not only normalized, it is often invisible to non-feminist plebes like me, because we're so used to it, we just don't see it. We've internalized the idea that it's okay to hate women.

Yet, for decades, perhaps longer, one of the most reliable shaming tactics feminists and other women's advocates have used to bully or silence men (and some women), is the accusation of misogyny. Say something a feminist doesn't like? You'll get called a misogynist. Criticize feminism's theories or actions? Misogynist. Disagree with feminism's analysis of a problem, or object to their proposed solution? You filthy misogynist. You're only saying that because you hate women. Even if you're a woman, you don't get let off the hook–nope, you suffer from internalized misogyny, dontcha know? And oddly enough, up until not that long ago, this shaming tactic was really effective–especially against men.

It's only been since Jezebel-style feminists started seriously overusing this shaming tactic that regular folk began to develop a resistance to it. Some men are starting to NOT shut up the moment a feminist pulls the "M" card. Granted, most of these shame-resistant men are speaking with a layer of protection between the accusation and their everyday lives–in the relative anonymity of the internet. We're not at the point yet where dropping the misogyny bomb on a man can't seriously damage his life, his career or his social standing. But we're getting there.

But it would behoove us to consider how it is even possible that an accusation of misogyny wields any power at all in a culture where misogyny is supposedly normalized and pervasive. Remember, our society hates women.

According to US tech journalist Quinn Norton, apparently hacker culture's answer to Anita Sarkeesian, men in this society are raised to hate women. Her proof? Trolls who attack women online (and who, we must then assume, never attack men).

So there you go–according to her, the problem is not a relatively small handful of complete assholes emboldened by the anonymity of the internet to attack anyone and everyone who crosses their paths, for reasons known only to them, and who tailor their insults and trolling to the target audience (rape threats for women, death threats and accusations of faggotry for men)… Nope, it's that men (not some, not many, not a few, just men) are raised to hate women.

Misogyny is not the attitude of an individual–it's a key cultural value of our society, a value men (again, no qualifier, so in general) are raised to internalize. And yet most men accused of misogyny feel shame. Enough shame to either shut up or desperately try to explain that they are not really misogynists. Why would they do this if they've been raised to hate women in a culture where misogyny is a normalized cultural value?

The accusation could only have the power to shame and silence someone if society was not pervasively misogynistic. The power of an insult is the power to bring to bear the weight of society's disapproval. It requires the culture in general to disapprove of the behavior, attitude, or attribute targeted by the insult. The fact that an accusation of misogyny can work as a shaming tactic at all to silence and bully people, or to damage their lives and social status, would actually reflect that our society is not pervasively misogynistic–at least, not in the dictionary sense that misogyny is an attitude of hatred or dislike of women. The fact that this accusation seems particularly effective when leveled against men also demonstrates that Quinn Norton is kinda full of shit. If hating women were a value normalized by the culture, and if men were raised to hate women, then calling a man a misogynist would have as much power as shouting "nigger-hater" at a Klansman in 1920.

So in that sense, this standard feminist shaming tactic actually discredits feminist ideology.

But it goes further than that.
Now let's look at the reverse. Misandrist. Call someone a misandrist, and if they actually know what it means, you'll get not shame or adjustment of behavior, but a shrug and a "yeah, whatever" from most people. From others, you'll get a perplexed look, and from still others, you'll get hoots of laughter, references to "beard tears" and "manfeelz" and the blithe reply that "misandry don't real." Some more polite feminists will tell you that misandry is really just secondary misogyny–that misogyny is the root cause of all sexism, and misandry is just an unfortunate side effect that would not exist without misogyny. This implies that misandry will, as if by magic, disappear once we've exposed and rooted out all the misogyny in society and properly cleansed our filthy sexist souls of it.
More than this, social media companies like Twitter and Facebook are actively working, with the help of feminist "training", to eradicate misogynistic content from their sites. Fairly benign T-shirts have been pulled from store shelves after outraged people objected to the message that "a girl might be too pretty to do homework, so she makes her brother do it for her." What a terrible, insidiously harmful message to spread about women and girls!
On the other hand, hashtags, memes and facebook groups abound, proudly proclaiming things like "men are pigs" or "kill all men". There's even a website called ihatemen.org that boasts a quarter of a million users. There's also a series of children's books, with related merchandise, called "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them." International radfem conferences named after the SCUM manifesto attract feminists from all over the world, some of whom hold teaching positions in major universities.
In a culture where the contempt for men and boys is this pervasive and permissible, it's no wonder most people can't or won't be shamed into silence or into altering their behavior simply because they've been accused of misandry. While many people accuse feminists of misandry, or accuse feminists of hating men, the accusation just doesn't have the power to silence them or make them stop what they're doing. This is because society's values are such that even if hating men is not exactly considered "great," there's no real harm in it, especially if the hater is a woman.
So if misogyny is at the root of all sexism, and misandry is just an unfortunate side effect of it–you know, secondary misogyny or "patriarchy hurts men too", then why is it so much more socially acceptable to express hatred and contempt for men than women? And how on Earth does the accusation of misogyny actually result in someone shutting up and going away?
Now let's move along to another:
"RAPE APOLOGIST! RAPE ENABLER!"
According to feminists, we live in a rape culture. This rape culture can be described as follows. Here's en excerpt from the book "Transforming a Rape Culture":

> A rape culture is a complex of beliefs that encourages male sexual aggression and supports violence against women. It is a society where violence is seen as sexy and sexuality as violent. In a rape culture, women perceive a continuum of threatened violence that ranges from sexual remarks to sexual touching to rape itself. A rape culture condones physical and emotional terrorism against women as the norm.

Hmmm… given that definition, and given the "fact" that for many feminists this definition describes our society, one would expect that an accusation of "rape apologia" would have no real power to shame and silence anyone. After all, he's just fitting in. He's normal. His behavior is condoned by the culture.
Not just that! There would be little to no public discussion or censure of trolls who dish out rape threats against women on the internet. Anita Sarkeesian would never have been able to rake in almost 27 times as much money as she'd requested in her kickstarter, or get a plethora of all-expenses paid speaking engagements as far away as Sweden, if society condoned sexual violence and emotional terrorism against women. While the trolls who have targeted Sarkeesian and other (mainly feminist) women with threats of rape and sexual slurs may think that kind of behavior is okay–heck, even fun–internet trolls are a mere subset of a culture, not the entirety of it. The greater part of mainstream culture has strongly condemned this behavior, and is actively attempting to eradicate it.
Oddly enough, a recent survey of Swedish journalists found that though women were more likely to get threats of specifically rape and sexual violence than men were, men reported receiving more threats overall than women did.

The same was true for abusive feedback. For women, that abuse was more likely to have a sexual context, but men received more abuse overall. Again, this is trolls–a small subset of people who delight in upsetting their targets–tailoring their abuse to extract maximum effect. For a man, that might be a threat to kill his family. For a woman, especially a feminist–well, we all know what typically upsets them, right? Hint: it starts with an R.
Yet the main thrust of the cultural discussion we are currently having over mean people on the internet is about threats of sexual violence, abusive comments and sexual slurs against women. Such threats and abuse have been described by feminists as an attempt to "silence half the population" (that would be the half with vaginas), while the heavier proportion of threats and abuse received by male journalists doesn't even seem worth talking about.
Sure sounds like we live in a culture that condones sexual violence and emotional terrorism against women, huh? Where women are terrorized and abused into silence, while men are somehow free to express their opinions any way they wish, without any blowback at all.
Oh wait. It actually looks like we don't live in a rape culture, at least not one that can be described as targeting women specifically, or even predominantly. This is precisely why an accusation of rape apology (in the context of female victims), particularly against a man, is enough to bring the weight of mainstream social disapproval down on the heads of anyone so accused.
Now, if you want a REAL example of rape apology, I'd suggest you read what feminist Mary Koss, consultant for the US Center for Disease Control's National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey's definitions, and originator of the infamous 1 in 4 college rape statistic, has to say about male victims of female rapists:

> "We acknowledge the inappropriateness of female verbal coercion and the legitimacy of male perceptions that they have had unwanted sex. Although men may sometimes sexually penetrate women when ambivalent about their own desires, these acts fail to meet legal definitions of rape that are based on penetration of the body of the victim."

"Ambivalent about their own desires"? I suppose that comes across as more scholarly than saying, "Dude, what's wrong with you, you know you wanted it. You should be stoked that you got laid! High five!"
And this is not just a radfem attitude–if it was, it wouldn't have found its way into one of the US's largest surveys of intimate partner and sexual violence. This is a core, mainstream cultural value–that men are or should be incapable of not consenting to sex. It's not even victim-blaming–you need an acknowledged victim to engage in victim-blaming.
That is institutional, systemic rape apology, not just informing the attitudes of a few people within a culture, but informing research, policy and law. The very fact that this attitude exists, while any questioning of a woman's personal responsibility to keep herself safe from violence (of any kind) is considered rape apology, and can be used as a shaming and silencing tactic, neatly discredits feminist descriptions of rape culture.
Feel like doing one more?

"YOU GUYS ARE SCARY/DANGEROUS/WANT TO HARM WOMEN"

According to many feminists, gender violence against women is systemic and pervasive–a global epidemic. Eve Ensler's V-Day event, A Billion Women Rising, was billed as a worldwide demonstration to draw attention to the "1 in 3 women globally who will be victims of rape or violence in their lifetimes." Most recently, the 1 in 3 has morphed into 1 in 2 in some circles. And according to many feminists, this gender violence against women is an intrinsic part of The Patriarchy. It has a purpose, and that purpose is to keep men dominant and women terrorized and subjugated to them.
Just as internet trolls are portrayed as specifically attempting to silence the half of the population with vaginas, gender violence against women supposedly exists to keep women in their place. This is simply how Patriarchy maintains the subordination of women and the supremacy of men–by raping and beating up the ladies so they are kept in a state of fear and helplessness, either by their own victimization, or their awareness of the victimization of other women and the understanding that they could be next. As Marilyn French wrote in her book, "The War Against Women",

> As long as some men use physical force to subjugate females, all men need not. The knowledge that some men do suffices to threaten all women.

Now, I'm not even going to get into the credibility of these stats–the 1 in 3s and the 1 in 2s–because the accuracy of their claims is irrelevant. It is sufficient to understand that to many (perhaps most, maybe even all mainstream feminists) these stats are considered credible, and that violence by men against women is particularly egregious–more egregious than that of men against men, or women against men, or even women against women–because of the patriarchal context.

Remember, kids, intention is everything. When a woman hits her husband (which practically really almost never ever happens at ALL, right?), she is frustrated, or lost her temper, or is trying to get out from under his boot heel, or is feeling unheard. When a man hits his wife, he is asserting his patriarchal dominance, keeping her in her place, reinforcing his proper status as The Man in the relationship. And remember, in a patriarchal society like ours, this type of violence is not only "common," it is normalized, expected, endorsed, condoned and excused, and the attitudes that lead to it saturate the culture so pervasively that we don't even notice them–just like when you live in a pulp mill town, after a while you just don't smell the sulfur anymore.

So how is it that an accusation that a man–not even an MRA, just a man–who has an unpopular opinion "scares women," is dangerous to women, wants to harm women, or has even offended women, is such an effective shaming tactic? Why is it that if said accusation sticks, it can mean social death for said man? Why is it that men who've been so accused have been forced to step down from a prominent position–Larry Summers and Justin Vacula come to mind.

More than that, why is it that there is currently a man on criminal trial in Toronto because tweeting politely at three women that he disapproved of their actions left them allegedly in fear for their safety? Why, when the actions he was disapproving of were a concerted smear campaign targeting a game developer, an attempted blacklisting of him among employers, and a poster campaign naming and shaming him in his community, because something he did offended them?

I mean, we live in a patriarchy, right? Patriarchies utilize violence or the threat of violence against women to "keep women in their place." It's normal. It's condoned. It's expected. It's just what men do. As such, a woman accusing a man of scaring her with his words, or having ideas dangerous to women, or wanting to harm women, or of hurting the feelings of women, would be essentially shooting blanks. In fact, if we lived in a society where gender violence against women was normalized and excused, and where men were privileged and dominant, it might be the three women on trial in Toronto, for conspiring to undermine or destroy a man's social status and livelihood when all he did to deserve it was conform to society's values and expectations.

Such a shaming tactic can only work if society on the whole disapproves of violence against women–particularly male violence against women–and endorses the use of threats, hostility, and social annihilation by women to keep men in their place. The very fact that said social annihilation derives from social values condemning violence against women completely discredits the idea that gender violence is a female-targeted phenomenon, and that it is systemic or institutional function of society's norms.

Meanwhile, the ladies of SCUM and radical hub, with their contemplation of male-targeting infanticide and mass chemical castration, continue to hold their international conferences, female audiences continue to roar with laughter anytime a man gets his dick cut off, men continue to be the majority of victims of nearly all forms of violence and death, and male victims of female violence continue to be largely ignored, when it isn't lauded as an expression of Girl Power.

And the fact that feminists use the above tactics, to either shame a man into shutting up or changing his behavior, or to recruit the efforts of white knights, the legal system, corporations, and the weight of public censure to do so on her behalf, kinda has to mean that they know it works. If it didn't work, they wouldn't do it, would they? And if they know it works, they must have some inkling as to why. Which must mean that they are either suffering from extreme cognitive dissonance, or they're well aware that aspects of their theories are questionable, if not highly suspect.

Important video for those curious about the Men's Human Rights Movement

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 24 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to those of you new to what we do here. Although most in the Men's Human Rights Movement believe that feminism alone is not responsible for all the problems men and boys face in our society, of you want a good starting point on understanding why feminism is frequently criticized, this classic essay will help explain it to you. It's one of AVfM Contributing Editor Karen Straughan's most famous works. –DE

Not too long ago I had it out with a feminist who had come into a male-safe space from a feminist blog just to scoff at the idea of male disposability. She basically said that the entire concept was a myth, that men's lived experiences were completely wrong, and that they were just a bunch of whiners who were complaining over nothing.

That got me thinking about the concept of male disposability and how that interacts with the feminist movement. Male disposability has been around since the dawn of time, and it's based on one very very straightforward dynamic: when it comes to the well-being of others, women come first, men come last. This is just the way it has always been. Seats in lifeboats, being rescued from burning buildings, who gets to eat: really, society places men dead last every time, and, society expects men to place themselves dead last every time.

Humans have always had a dynamic of "women and children first" and that has not changed at all. The 93% workplace death gap has to be evidence of this, if only because there's nobody with any kind of importance or power who's interested in changing it at all. In fact I remember reading an article in a British Columbia paper not long ago that described the increasing proportion of female injuries on the job as a huge problem, and the insane thing was the change reflected a decrease in male injuries rather than an increase in female ones. Men's injuries on the job had gone down because the economic downturn had put so many men out of work in the resource sector that there just weren't as many trees or pieces of heavy equipment falling on men as there had been before. And yet, this was framed as a huge problem for women that required immediate action to solve. It's like if men aren't dying at work that 20 times the rate that women are, we must be doing something wrong as a society.

Back when we were still living in caves that attitude was necessary for human survival. Nature is a really harsh mistress, especially when you think of all the animals that never get to die of old age. Things were a lot different for humans through most of our history on this planet than they are now. Life was dangerous, human settlements were small, isolated from each other, and one big disaster that took out a lot of women pretty much meant the end of the entire shebang for that group of people. So really, the level of importance that a human settlement placed on the well-being of women and children reflected almost always how successful that settlement was. And that can be expanded to encompass entire societies.

I keep hearing from the feminist camp that femaleness has always been undervalued by society and that maleness is preferred. But I've always contended that it's the exact opposite: the feminine is intrinsically and individually valuable, simply because females are the limited factor in reproduction. When it comes to producing babies, every woman counts, whereas biologically one very happy man could probably do the work of hundreds in that regard. So the level of instinctive importance we humans place on the safety and provisioning of women and their children is one of the main reasons why we've been able to be so successful that we've come to dominate this planet.

While I will concede that this drive to keep women safe from all harm has often resulted in extreme limits being placed on women's mobility, their agency, their power of decision to direct their own lives, all through history and many cultures, and in many cultures even today, I think it's telling that those cultures tend to be the most backward. When you consider the restrictions placed on women in places like Afghanistan, and then you consider that if we "bombed them into the stone age" it might be progress, I think you could conclude that the most successful societies had a good balance between allowing women freedom and the ability to choose and direct their own paths in life, and the need to protect them and provide for them.

However, feminists will insist that these kinds of restrictions being placed on women in those kinds of societies are the ultimate form of objectification. You lock up your possessions to make sure they will never be lost or stolen or harmed. Honestly, if I were a guy on a battlefield I might appreciate being objectified in that way. I think if I was going to be an object, I'd rather be a sexual one or somebody's prized possession than an object that can simply be thrown in the trash or smashed into pieces in the service of somebody else's purpose.

Feminists also have a very simplistic idea that our willingness to absolve women of their crimes, slap them on the wrist, spare them punishment, comes from a deep disrespect society has for women's person-hood—not seeing them as full human beings capable of looking after themselves, that we see them as children who don't know any better. And while there are parallels there in our desire to protect both women and children from not only their own poor decisions but the full consequences of their shitty behavior, it's really not as simple as they try to make it out to be.

Seriously, even today—even today in 2011!–we fully expect that if it comes down to a man and a woman in a burning building and you can only save one, the expectation is that you choose the woman every single time. So honestly, whose humanity are we placing above whose here? We're not talking about going to work, we're not talking about getting an education, we're not talking about freedom to decide what you want to be in life. We're not talking about getting to take Tae Kwon Do. We're talking seats in lifeboats here. The person in the lifeboat is going to survive, no matter how capable or incapable they are of managing their own life, and the person going down with the ship is going to die, no mater how independent, self-sufficient and awesome he is. That's the equation: one life, more valuable than another, and the woman wins every time.

So honestly, is there any argument, anywhere, that women's humanity has always been held in higher regard by society than men's? To be important to society, a woman merely has to be; a man has to do in order for his life to have any meaning to anyone other than himself. I think it was ManWomanMyth who said our society reduces men from human beings to human doings. I really think that's an apt analogy. We measure a man's worthiness to wear the title of "man" and therefore the title of "human," through how useful he is, either to society or to women, and one of the most useful things a man can do even now in the eyes of society is to put women and children before himself.

While I think there is plenty of argument that this attitude is at least partly innate—the way most survival traits are, even collective ones—if it starts in the chromosomes we really do everything we can as a society to reinforce this dynamic. Studies have shown that even though baby boys tend to cry and fuss more than baby girls, parents are quicker to attend to or console a baby girl than they are a baby boy. Even just the level of acceptance of infant male circumcision in our culture, when female genital mutilation was banned pretty much the first afternoon we all heard it existed, really says a lot about the differing expectations we have for males and females. Speaking as a mother, the last thing I would ever have wanted was to hear my child cry, especially when they're at an age when they're completely helpless, completely at the mercy of outside forces, and utterly dependent on the adults in their lives for every last thing, and yet even knowing how painful that cut is, we expect baby boys only days old to just suck that up.

Just think about what these very first interactions and experiences, these differences in how we nurture our babies depending on what gender they are, what this teaches them: What do we teach baby girls when we attend to their crying so quickly? We teach them to ask for help because their needs are important. We teach them to let us know when they're afraid or in pain because it's important for us to know when they're sick or in danger or hurt, so we can do something about it. We teach them that when they're sad or lonely to summon comfort and comfort will be there. We teach them that they're important. Their needs and well-being, both emotional and physical, are important just because.

And what are we teaching baby boys when we leave them to cry? We teach them that there's not much point in seeking help because it will be grudgingly given if at all We teach them that they should become self-contained in their ability to deal with emotions like fear, helplessness, loneliness, sadness, pain, distress: we teach them stoicism. We teach them to suck it up. We teach them that their fear and their pain are things that are best ignored. We teach them that their emotional and physical well-being are just not as important as other things.

Given all that, is it any wonder it's like pulling teeth to get a man to go to the doctor when he's sick?

What we're teaching that baby boy is all the things a man needs to know and feel and believe about himself if he's going to stand in front of a cabin with a rifle while his wife and kids hide inside. We're preparing him for the day he has to fix a bayonet to a rifle and charge a hill under enemy fire, and we're preparing him to make a decision to resign himself to an icy fate while women and children escape in the lifeboats. We are teaching him to internalize his own disposability.

And baby girls? By attending to her crying so quickly, by letting her know that she's inherently important to us, we're preparing her for the day she has to think of her own safety first, even if it means the man she loves is left standing alone with a rifle in front of a cabin. We're preparing her to take that seat in the lifeboat. We're training her to not allow guilt or empathy or acknowledgment of a man's humanity, or any sense that he might deserve it more, to convince her give her seat to him. Because for millenia, the human species absolutely depended on her feeling 100% entitled to that seat.

And that brings me to feminism. You know, the patriarchy smashers? Those righteous avengers of equality? Dogged dismantlers of every single gender role? What exactly is feminism doing to dismantle this traditional role of the disposable male?

Feminism's greatest victories have only reinforced in everyone that society still owes women provision, protection, help and support just because they're women. In its collective dismissal and abandonment of male victims of domestic violence, it only reinforces in men that it's pointless to ask for help, because men's needs are of no relevance, and their fear and pain don't mean anything to anyone. Feminism teaches us to put women's need at the forefront of every single issue, political or social. Whether that issue is domestic violence law, sexual assault law, institutional sexism, social safety net, education funding, homeless shelters, government funding for shovel-ready jobs—jobs that didn't stay shovel-ready once women got wind of them.

Everywhere you look—everywhere you look!–there are feminists pushing their way to the front of the line demanding women's "fair share" of all of the goodies, the good stuff, the loot, the booty, the cookies. Even if women don't need it. Even if women don't deserve it. And even if somebody else needs it and deserves it more. And they get it, because we give it to them.

Feminism has done nothing but exploit this dynamic of the expectation on men to put everybody else before themselves. Especially women. Women's safety and support, women's well-being, and women's emotional needs, always come first. This is the most stunning piece of society-wide manipulative psychology I think I have ever come across. Feminism has been down with old-school chivalry right from the start. They might seem like strange bedfellows, but they're not. Because both concepts are built on a firm foundation of female self-interest.

We made our way as humans through a really harsh history and we became the dominant force on this planet. One of the reasons we were so successful is because we have consistently put women's basic needs first. Their need for safety, support, and provision. It was in humanity's best interest for women to be essentially self-interested, and for men to be essentially self-sacrificing. But we don't need that dynamic anymore. Our species is in no danger of extinction. We're 7 billion people clogging up the works here!

What's the worst that could happen if we all just collectively decided that men were no more disposable than women, and women were no more valuable than men? In fact the greatest danger I see to us right now is that in our desperation to bend over and give women everything they want and everything they say they need, we've unbalanced society to the point where we're in danger of seriously toppling over.

And really? The only difference I see between the traditional role and the new one for men with respect to disposability is that maleness, manhood: it used to be celebrated, it used to be admired, and it used to be rewarded, because it was really necessary, and because the personal cost of it to individual men was so incredibly high.

But now? Now, we still expect men to put women first, and we still expect society to put women first, and we still expect men to not complain about coming in dead last every damn time. But men don't even get our admiration anymore. All they get in return is to hear about what assholes they are. Is there any wonder why they're starting to get pissed off?

Fallout: Losing face after criticism of AVFMS, the SPLC resorts to mass censorship

Jonathan Taylor · 25 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
"To attempt to silence a man is to pay him homage, for it is an acknowledgement that his arguments are both impossible to answer and impossible to ignore."

– attributed to many people, but most of all John Bryant

I have let the matter of the SPLC sit for a week and a half to see how far they would go, but I think that now is the time to address it before I move on.
I was unsurprised when, earlier this month, Arthur Goldwag of the Southern Poverty Law Center – an organization that is if not extreme-left, one that certainly panders to such – decided to write an article about my site on their blog "Hatewatch." The motto of their blog is "Keeping an Eye on the Radical Right," an interesting notion since AVFMS has criticized ideologues on both the left and the right, and since one of its founding nine values is non-partisanship. The article, while refraining from classifying AVFMS as a "hate site" (the cataloging of which is apparently their bread and butter in more ways than one), nonetheless attempted to paint my site as something born out of partisan extremism, accused it (falsely and without evidence) of dishonestly misrepresenting others, and loosed its gang of dogmatic and mean-spirited online followers to not only attack my site but also (and more perniciously) attack anyone who stepped in to say a positive word about it, or about men and boys.
They also heavily suppressed the comments of many men's advocates in a very dishonest and one-sided fashion.
I was undismayed by their article, however. It gave me the opportunity to clarify where the SPLC and I differ, to demonstrate how the old social justice establishment doesn't meet the needs of today's world, and to show how websites like AVFMS help fill that void. I seized this opportunity by writing an article of my own and commenting on theirs. My first comment was overwhelmingly upvoted. It remains there as of now, but I am curious how long it will stay up.
It was uplifting to see so many people come out of the woodwork to defend my site's work and values, and to advocate for men and boys. Robert O'Hara, news director at A Voice for Men, wrote an article on the matter. The SPLC article (and my response to it) was discussed heavily on the Men's Rights subreddit and Facebook. And many, many men's advocates showed up on the SPLC article itself to comment.
Upon returning to the SPLC article later on, I saw that the site administration had deleted over 100 comments by men's advocates. Someone who had not visited the comments section of their article might be tempted to wonder whether the reason was because many of them were simply making childish rants, personal attacks, and other generally unproductive and insincere statements (trolling). Based on my experience, such would be the go-to accusation from any extreme ideologue with which we, by now, are all too familiar.
On the contrary; much like the chaotic and well-chronicled events at the University of Toronto, the men's advocates were generally well-behaved. It was primarily their opponents who behaved childishly, made a career out of personal attacks, trolled, and even made false accusations. And their comments were not deleted.
It is unfortunate that so many men's advocates spent the time to make comments only to find that they had been deleted. I think there is a bright side to this, however. Since the SPLC resorted to censorship on such a mass scale, it has made much of their comments section almost impossible to consistently and coherently read. In addition, since the SPLC has decided not to delete the childish, trolling, and hateful comments of its supporters, it has forfeited any credibility it might have had for making the claim that they are deleting comments based upon anything other than political suppression.
As a result, the comments section of their article is now an echo chamber that reflects far more poorly on the SPLC than it does on my website. You now simply cannot read the comments section of every other subthread without stumbling over a space where a comment used to be, responded to only by the personal attacks of SPLC supporters.

This is what much of it now looks like:
Just look at that screenshot: three comments by three different dissenters deleted. One of whom (of all people) is Pierce Harlan, a blogger at Community of the Wrongly Accused, who is well-known for his civilized approach. Meanwhile, the comments of those who responded with nothing but childish personal attacks remained. And that, folks, truly is representative of how the SPLC and their commenters like to run things.
And what's worse, when you think about it, is that this is how they would like to run the world, if they could. But we've just begun:
[image]
And of course, any time people bring up the fact that men and boys are falling behind in education it is immediately re-framed by anti-male partisans as some kind of insecurity on the part of men:
[image]
Question: Is it really because men's advocates don't want to come to terms with women being "strong and independent," or because these people don't want to come to terms with the concept of male vulnerability? Given that these commenters never, throughout the entire comment thread, discussed the actual issue of men and boys falling behind in education, I'd say the evidence leans toward the latter.
And by the way, many women are advocates for men and boys as well. Indeed, most of the guest articles on my site come from women. I guess they are insecure about women gaining rights as well?
We continue:
[image]
I think I stopped saying "goober" when I was about 12 years old.
This next SPLC supporter just comes out and says – in response to a deleted comment, no less – that (s)he's not interested in having any real conversation on civil rights or equality, only in personal attacks:
[image]
Let it be known that these kinds of commenters will never become a regular feature at AVFMS, nor will such dishonest and one-sided censorship. Let "veteran civil rights organizations" like the SPLC do things their way. Which they do, a lot. Commenter Aron was perhaps the worst…
[image]
…but Reynardine was pretty bad as well:
[image]
Here's where Reynardine redeems herself, however:
[image]
And another comment from Reynardine, one which – like so many of these SPLC supporters – immediately follows a deleted comment:
[image]
"Dildo Daggins." Yes, folks: these are the types of comments that the SPLC deemed appropriate and productive, while many of the arguments men's advocates made were deleted. Mark Neil noticed this trend and said:
[image]
And perhaps it seems that way, because it is that way. Ian Weaver also disagreed with the tendency of the SPLC to censor comments. His comments stayed up…for about a day or two. The remains of the comment subthread he started are nothing short of proof of his point:
[image]
Yes, funny how that works. It's almost as though Mr. Weaver knew what he was talking about.
But the SPLC didn't just delete people's comments. They also banned people who commented regularly. One of them was Zimba Zumba, who wrote about his experiences on the Men's Rights subreddit:
[image]
Zimba Zumba is a regular commenter on various social and political blogs. On an article on Alternet he also met up with SPLC commenter Reynardine, where she threatened to dox him:
[image]

Not too long after this, we see Reynardine – who just threatened to cyberstalk Zimba Zumba on the AlterNet article – now on the SPLC article falsely accusing Zimba Zumba himself of considering cyberstalking her:
[image]
I tried to let the readers know that her statement was interesting given that she had just threatened to dox Zimba, but discovered that I could no longer comment on the article. After deleting roughly 100 comments from men's advocates, the SPLC decided to lock the thread so that (presumably) no one could comment:
[image]
I also noticed that the SPLC deleted all of the comments by Janet Wilkinson, a woman who commented heavily on the article and who has helped me in email campaigns in the past. And to think that for all the talk about opposing men's advocates who they falsely accuse of "silencing women's voices," they are quite happy to silence women who disagree with them.
Is the SPLC afraid of women's voices?
Interestingly, one of the first comments said of the SPLC article, "An excellent and well written article…I will take a look at Jonathan Taylor's website when I get a chance." His statement is interesting: if you believe an article that comments at length on a website is well-written (which I presume also means that the article is rooted in verifiable facts), wouldn't it make sense to actually visit the website and verify the claims the article makes about it before you judge whether the article is well-written?
And this is another problem with the SPLC community: to them, facts don't seem to be terribly important. Their article about my website was first brought to my attention because I viewed the "referrals" to my website in my site statistics. I noticed that there was one (yes, only one) person who had clicked the link to this website from the SPLC article. When I immediately looked up the article, I found that there were already about 30 comments by people who were all talking about this site, most (if not all) of whom had very likely never visited it.
One of the nine values of my site is evidence-based inquiries and solutions. Evidently it is not one of their values. To the True Believers, dogma, intolerance, mean-spiritedness, and blind partisan tribalism are values to be celebrated.
The SPLC and its supporters have demonstrated time and time again their mentality: if you are not – like them – hanging by your fingernails on the extreme left end of the political spectrum, it can only be because you are on the radical end of the opposite side. We might well remember the wisdom of Obi-Wan Kenobi from the Star Wars remakes: "only a Sith deals in absolutes." And actually, someone made that very point in the SPLC article. Before his comment was deleted, of course:
[image]
I've been up and down the entire comment thread several times. I'm not going to critique the whole thing. It's something you have to see for yourself anyway. But I've compiled a list of those whose comments were deleted. Let me know if I left anyone out:

In conclusion

Websites and organizations like the SPLC and their partner Manboobz may occasionally have a point criticizing a few other websites and organizations. But as I have demonstrated now and in the past, when it comes to assessing my website their efforts are still lacking.
And they are entirely predictable by now. All of their vacuous and underhanded insinuations, all of their baseless accusations, and all of the hateful and childish rhetoric of their supporters, have only served to strengthen my website. They thought to capitalize on my website to legitimize their own existence, but things have worked out to quite the contrary.
In the future, AVFMS will have other challenges. Real challenges. I suppose that, during the year AVFMS was launched, these were a good warm-up. I can't promise that I will pay them much attention in the future, however. They are occasionally useful to clarify to the world where our values differ, but not to dwell on. There is more important work to be done.
2014 is fast approaching.

Domestic Violence: Belief, Bias, and Groupthink

AVfM Video Source · 25 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In this video lecture, Dr. Donald Dutton talks about the subject of domestic violence and of how the associated field of research suffers from groupthink, belief perseverance, and biased assimilation of information. He examines, with several examples, this processing feature both in social science studies of domestic violence and in government responses to the problem. All bias exists in one direction and is not, therefore, simply random error. It exists in the direction of the "paradigm" of domestic violence (i.e., male = perpetrator, female= victim), which has its roots in Mackinnon's Marxist notion of gender relations and, hence, associates maleness with oppression and domination and femaleness with victimhood. These broad associative complexes color all perceptions of intimate violence as being instrumental and dominating for males and self-defensive and acceptable for females. The numerous shortcomings of this view are discussed with examples.

Conference Twitter Feed

AVFM · 25 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

#icmi14 is for general info and @icmi14 is for messages you want posed directly to conference speakers.

There is a Twitter feed, @icmi14, for the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014, from which our Media Director, Janet Bloomfield, will be tweeting relevant updates. We invite listeners/viewers to tweet any serious questions they have for the speakers during their talks, and we will endeavour to have one or two asked on the floor. Additionally, select tweets will be displayed on the video feed (but not who they're from). Remember that this is live television that bears AVfM's logo, and constructive tweets free from profanity are more likely to be chosen than others.

There is the #icmi14 hashtag as well for sharing general messages about the conference (note that the thugs who protested it have promised to hijack it – and note that we'll be blocking any trolls who send to @icmi14).

If you don't have one yet, this is a good time to get a Twitter account–there's a lot of activity on Twitter and your support is valuable – and not only that but Twitter is fun.

Men's Rights versus Feminism explained using magnets

Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) · 25 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Men’s Rights activists seek to bring awareness to how men are acted upon by society, acted upon by other men and acted upon by women. They are opposed by feminists who think that bringing attention to how men are acted upon will take something away from women.
Every era has had its mythology of women’s weakness and men’s strength. Ours is no different and it’s not progressive. How easy is it for you to see Jill as a victim? How hard is it for you to see Jack as vulnerable?

Acid Attacks: Telling Only Half the Story

Dan Perrins · 26 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Acid attacks or vitriolage, we are made aware of them via the media on a regular basis. The effect of acid on human flesh is horrific to say the least.
The images most of us associate with the term acid attack are that of disfigured and deformed woman with horrendous scars where the acid has come into contact with their flesh. The effects, if the acid in the attack is strong enough or not neutralized quickly, are permanent.
Acid attacks are not new. In point of fact women have a rich history of using acid in their attacks.
Our resident historian, Robert St. Estephe, has documented a substantial list going back to 1865 when Margaret Boyle of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania threw acid in the face of her son-in law as he was not the man she had chose for her daughter.
It was the ~~patriarchy~~ matriarchy that forced Mrs Boyle to commit her crime, right?
And over at E Belfort Bax website we can find it referenced as well. The term used for acid by Bax was "vitriol," and according to one of his contemporaries, crime reporter Adam Lee Hargrave, acid throwing was perpetrated primarily by women in his day.
Most of the news fed to us about this particularly heinous form of violence covers about 60% of the story today; about 40% of the victims are men. The feminist organizations feed it to the news groups and they in turn don't bother checking the facts.
Feminists never blatantly lie about gender violence right?
Now since we know feminists don't like admitting male victims exist It falls upon us to bring to the public's attention the other approximate 40% of the victims.
The reasons for these attacks are not really all that important for this article. The reasons are never satisfactory unless a person's life is in immediate danger. They have no safe escape and that is the only tool they have to defend themselves.
Beyond that I don't care if your honour has been insulted, you were jilted by your spouse / lover, or whatever reasons a person may try and use to justify engaging in this crime.
ITS WRONG, no further discussion needed. Wrong if it happens to a woman and wrong if it happens to a man.
But our 'moral betters' don't seem to want to be as bold with their stand against these crimes as you and I are. They have force fed society the same old lie of only female victims. Maybe an odd male child, but other than that, the male victims are kept out of society's view.
Its just the way feminism likes it so they can fill their coffers with donations and government grants for telling just over half the story.
However recently I stumbled across this article and found this quote;

> "Forty percent of the acid attack victims in Pakistan are men or boys."

I tried to track this number down but unfortunately the best I could find other than the quote from Sharon Behn is numbers from the Acid Survivors Foundation.
On their website they have a statistics tab.
The numbers for the year 2013 for acid attacks are 69 incidents of acid being used as a weapon and 85 victims.
Using a global population number of 6 billion the average person has a chance of 0.000001416 % of being a victim of one of the most vicious and heinous crimes know to humankind.
This crime is incredibly rare and for that I am glad. I wouldn't wish this on the worst of the rad-fems.
On page 2 of their statistics tab we they break down the numbers for us; 28 men 44 women and 13 children were attacked with acid in 2013.
The report does not state whether the children were intended or unintended victims injured from being with the adults.

Assuming the children were unintended victims the total number of adults for 2013 is 72. Which means that 38.888% or about 40% of those acid attack victims were men.
On another acid survivors website from Cambodia they have numbers from 1999 – 2013. There numbers show that 40% of the adult victims were adult males, 44.8% were adult females, 7.3% were male children under the age of 13 and 8% were females under the age of 13.
Despite about 40% of the acid attack victims being male acid survivors foundation true to feminist form states:

> "Acid violence is a form of gender based violence that reflects and perpetuates the inequality of women in society."

And helping that lie spread was boosted by COMBATING ACID VIOLENCE IN BANGLADESH, INDIA, AND CAMBODIA
This is subtitled as:

> Report by the Avon Global Center for Women and Justice at Cornell Law School, the Committee on International Human Rights of the New York City Bar Association, the Cornell Law School International Human Rights Clinic, and the Virtue Foundation

Notice the list of organizations who are helping promote this heinous lie that acid attacks is gender violence? All of them owe a duty of care to us, society to be honest but hey their feminists so that duty of care is tossed in the manure pile. Too bad their reports aren't there too, where they belong.
Here is what these alleged groups wrote when describing acid attacks;

> "Acid violence is gender-based violence that reflects and perpetuates the inequality of women in society and as such is prohibited by international law

I call BULLSHIT. There is a about a 10% difference between the sexes in acid attacks. That is not gender based violence. Even if we include the children the percentage of men only drops down to just over 35% that is still not gender based violence.
And what about the criminals inflicting incredible human suffering you ask. Well it is not just men who are tossing acid on women:
Woman throws acid on sister-in-law over land dispute
Two women accused of plotting an acid attack that left a local woman disfigured have been found guilty
Just like every other feminist claim of gender-based violence this one too is a half truth. Omitting the male population from the awareness campaigns is the standard operating procedure of feminism.
To reference my compatriot, Robert St. Estephe again, please note: neither historically nor in modern times have acid attacks been something "men to do women." It's something people do to each other, in various times and places. If you doubt there's anything weird or unusual about women using acid as a weapon, in addition to Robert's other article (referenced above) see Three New York "Acid Queens" of 1901.
I've said it earlier in this article and I'll say it again:
The feminist insistence of acid attack as male-to-female gender violence is BULLSHIT.

Feminists never blatantly lie about gender violence right?
Now since we know feminists don't like admitting male victims exist It falls upon us to bring to the public's attention the other approximate 40% of the victims.
The reasons for these attacks are not really all that important for this article. The reasons are never satisfactory unless a person's life is in immediate danger. They have no safe escape and that is the only tool they have to defend themselves.
Beyond that I don't care if your honour has been insulted, you were jilted by your spouse / lover, or whatever reasons a person may try and use to justify engaging in this crime.
ITS WRONG, no further discussion needed. Wrong if it happens to a woman and wrong if it happens to a man.
But our 'moral betters' don't seem to want to be as bold with their stand against these crimes as you and I are. They have force fed society the same old lie of only female victims. Maybe an odd male child, but other than that, the male victims are kept out of society's view.
Its just the way feminism likes it so they can fill their coffers with donations and government grants for telling just over half the story.
However recently I stumbled across this article and found this quote;

> "Forty percent of the acid attack victims in Pakistan are men or boys."

I tried to track this number down but unfortunately the best I could find other than the quote from Sharon Behn is numbers from the Acid Survivors Foundation.
On their website they have a statistics tab.
The numbers for the year 2013 for acid attacks are 69 incidents of acid being used as a weapon and 85 victims.
Using a global population number of 6 billion the average person has a chance of 0.000001416 % of being a victim of one of the most vicious and heinous crimes know to humankind.
This crime is incredibly rare and for that I am glad. I wouldn't wish this on the worst of the rad-fems.
On page 2 of their statistics tab we they break down the numbers for us; 28 men 44 women and 13 children were attacked with acid in 2013.
The report does not state whether the children were intended or unintended victims injured from being with the adults.

Assuming the children were unintended victims the total number of adults for 2013 is 72. Which means that 38.888% or about 40% of those acid attack victims were men.
On another acid survivors website from Cambodia they have numbers from 1999 – 2013. There numbers show that 40% of the adult victims were adult males, 44.8% were adult females, 7.3% were male children under the age of 13 and 8% were females under the age of 13.
Despite about 40% of the acid attack victims being male acid survivors foundation true to feminist form states:

> "Acid violence is a form of gender based violence that reflects and perpetuates the inequality of women in society."

And helping that lie spread was boosted by COMBATING ACID VIOLENCE IN BANGLADESH, INDIA, AND CAMBODIA
This is subtitled as:

> Report by the Avon Global Center for Women and Justice at Cornell Law School, the Committee on International Human Rights of the New York City Bar Association, the Cornell Law School International Human Rights Clinic, and the Virtue Foundation

Notice the list of organizations who are helping promote this heinous lie that acid attacks is gender violence? All of them owe a duty of care to us, society to be honest but hey their feminists so that duty of care is tossed in the manure pile. Too bad their reports aren't there too, where they belong.
Here is what these alleged groups wrote when describing acid attacks;

> "Acid violence is gender-based violence that reflects and perpetuates the inequality of women in society and as such is prohibited by international law

I call BULLSHIT. There is a about a 10% difference between the sexes in acid attacks. That is not gender based violence. Even if we include the children the percentage of men only drops down to just over 35% that is still not gender based violence.
And what about the criminals inflicting incredible human suffering you ask. Well it is not just men who are tossing acid on women:
Woman throws acid on sister-in-law over land dispute
Two women accused of plotting an acid attack that left a local woman disfigured have been found guilty
Just like every other feminist claim of gender-based violence this one too is a half truth. Omitting the male population from the awareness campaigns is the standard operating procedure of feminism.
To reference my compatriot, Robert St. Estephe again, please note: neither historically nor in modern times have acid attacks been something "men to do women." It's something people do to each other, in various times and places. If you doubt there's anything weird or unusual about women using acid as a weapon, in addition to Robert's other article (referenced above) see Three New York "Acid Queens" of 1901.
I've said it earlier in this article and I'll say it again:
The feminist insistence of acid attack as male-to-female gender violence is BULLSHIT.

The press conference they didn't want you to see

AVfM Video Source · 27 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Apologies for technical issues that have prevented live streaming, but here is the unedited press conference as it happened on 26 June 2014. You may notice the press was polite and asked relevant questions. It's hard not to think some of them were dumbstruck as they realized there was almost nothing any sane person could argue with there. Having sorted out technical difficulties, we will do our best to start livestreaming tomorrow's event first thing, and to get the raw video of Friday's (today's) event up for unedited viewing tomorrow as well.

The AVfM Fundraiser for Summer 2014

Paul Elam · 28 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The quarterly fundraisers at AVfM are always a mixed blessing for me. They provide the lifeblood for what keeps us alive, running, and growing. On the other side of that, I am not particularly fond of asking for money.

This is even more of a dilemma now than it has ever been before.

Recently, we have requested and counted on an unusual amount of financial support related to the conference. So many of you have answered the call and helped with such enthusiasm that the idea of a quarterly fundraiser makes me concerned.

Unfortunately, I have to be more concerned with us continuing to pay bills for general operations, and to cover the almost endless stream of things from the conference—expenses that can make or break what we are doing.

So with that, I am compelled to do again what we do every quarter, which is to ask you to part with some of your hard-earned money to help us stay afloat and further our work.

Though we have a long way to go, we are gaining unprecedented momentum as evidenced by a men's rights conference so successful that the word "historic" is being used by many people.

I, for one, think this is 100% correct, but we still need your help in order to keep us on track to create a historic movement, not just historic events.

The fundraiser will run for 10 days. Please help us reach our goals so that we can find more and more ways to make good history.

Thank you in advance for all of your support.

Paul

Dr. Tara Palmatier—AVfM Men's Issues Conference, Detroit 2014

AVfM Video Source · 29 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sandman shares Dr. Tara Palmatier's presentation from the Men's Issues Conference in Detroit 2014 and his impressions of what went on during the event.

Sandman: "There were fifteen speakers in total, but I will be sharing only three videos on my YouTube channel in the order that I shot them at the conference over the last few days. I will share the second video of Karen Straughan tomorrow, and the third one will be with Terrence Popp from Redonkulas.com a few days after that. A Voice for Men will be selling a DVD of the presentation and I will be sharing the link for that DVD when it's ready for sale. I'll be doing that here on my YouTube channel. Anyway, the first video is from the first day of the conference on Friday, June 27, with Dr. Tara Palmatier."

For those of you who didn't get to see it, we bring you Karen Straughan's talk, in which she refutes the "once upon a time" claim that feminism started as a movement for equality. She explains that it has been always been about misandry, gynocentrism, and blaming men for all the evils of the world.

Ladies, Matt Forney wants to be your daddy

Jack Barnes · 30 June 2014 · Archived copy · Original

MHRAs are known for being critical of anything and everything that affects men and boys in our culture. We are critical of religion and the atheist community, of feminism and traditional conservatives, of social expectations and public policy and law. We are also critical of the behavior of men and, yes, of women in our society. To be blunt, you will probably be hard-pressed to find a more honest and open discussion of men and women than right here. We are not here for a group hug or to make you feel all warm and fuzzy. We are here to tell you the cold, hard truth.

In the beginning of human civilization, strict gender roles were developed based on the needs of society as a whole. These roles were harsh and unfair to both men and women but were a necessary evil for the survival of the human species. As the world evolved into a place of relative safety and comfort, women chose to cast aside the restrictions placed on them by these now ancient gender roles. However, they have been reluctant to accept the responsibilities that come with being a fully realized and capable adult.

Men need to wake up and realize that they are not machines built for the sole purpose of protecting and providing for women and children. Despite what feminists would have you believe, men are, in fact, human beings and deserve to be treated as such. It should no longer be expected of men to protect and provide for women, to be a woman's keeper and caregiver. It most certainly should not be expected that a man be responsible for her behavior. This change must start first with men rejecting these obligations despite society's snubbing of those who choose to live their lives their own way.

Women need to grow up. They are adults, which means they and they alone are responsible for themselves. In order for equality between the genders to become reality, women must take upon themselves the responsibilities that come with the rights they have already been given. They must reject the infantilization that is exerted by feminists and traditional conservatives alike. One way that our society infantilizes women is by not holding them to the same level of accountability as male adults for their behavior. We see it all the time on TV shows like Bridezilla, Desperate Housewives, Bad Girls Club, and Dr. Phil. Personal accountability for women has been replaced with female entitlement. "Grow up" has been replaced with "You go, girl." We don't expect women to behave as adults, and when they don't, we give them a pass and a guest spot on Oprah.

Obviously, there are those who disagree. There are those who say that men should man up and get back to picking the cotton for women and the state while at the same time demanding even more protections and public programs for the fragile flowers also known as the fairer sex.

Enter Matt Forney.

Forney wrote a blog article entitled "How to Beat Your Girlfriend or Wife and Get Away with It" that advocates behavior that is illegal, immoral, unjustifiable, and quite frankly sick. Besides the fact that his article is in favor of domestic violence, the justifications for Forney's position are such that even a newbie MHRA would do an atomic facepalm. Forney doesn't expect the women he enters into relationships with to behave as adults. He assumes that they will behave like children.

It seems that Forney doesn't want to be a husband or partner. He wants to be their daddy. Here are some quotes that reveal Forney's expectations for the women in his life.

> "If she wants to behave like a child, you'll treat her like a child."
> "The goal is to constantly violate her boundaries until you've conditioned her to behave exactly the way you want. And no, you don't ask for permission, anymore than a father would ask a disobedient child for permission to punish her."
> "An undisciplined girl is like an undisciplined child."
> "… many girls will create drama and start arguments with you as a way of getting you to pay attention to them, same reason why a neglected child will go out of his way to cause trouble. If he won't hit me when I break the rules, it means he doesn't love me."

> "By placing her in a submissive position and punishing her in the same way a father punishes an unruly child, you're infantilizing her, imprinting on her her proper station in life."
> "… if you spank her for specific infractions, you'll gradually program her to stop doing things that displease you, in the same way a child learns why sticking a fork into an electrical outlet is not smart."

Um, no. If she wants to behave as a child, then that is her right. Just make sure she does it somewhere else and with someone else. It is not your job to correct her behavior. She is an adult. She should already know how to behave. If she doesn't, it is not your or anyone else's responsibility to teach her. Forney's belief that it is a man's responsibility to shape and mold an adult woman into behaving like an adult is a burden that no man should have placed on him. It is a burden that any intelligent man would swiftly reject along with the woman who doesn't know how to behave.
Not only are Forney's methods the result of chivalry—which is the idea that men serve women as protectors even against the consequences of her own actions—but they are also the result of limited intelligence. His ideas will not produce the desired result. In fact, the opposite is true. Forney seeks to discourage what he calls attention-seeking behavior by rewarding her with negative attention. Makes perfect sense.
How about this, Matty: The first time she starts her childish, attention-seeking behavior, you simply explain to her in a kind, polite way that if said behavior continues, the two of you will be parting ways. Of course, she may test you on this. If she does, politely and quietly show her the door and invite her to come back when and if she can act like an adult.
See, Matty, that's the way adults handle such situations. You think the way to discourage infantile behavior is to convince her she is an infant. The next time my dog chews on my shoe, I'll buy him a chew toy that looks like my shoe. That should work, right, Matt? The next time my wife or any other adult in my life behaves in an unacceptable manner, I shouldn't talk to them as an adult and explain the problem and my unwillingness to tolerate such behavior. No. I should encourage such behavior by giving that person what they want. That is what Forney is saying in his article.
Now you know what I meant by atomic facepalm. Let's try the radical notion that women are adults. I know. I know. That idea is not easy to grasp since feminism and traditionalism tell us the exact opposite. But just for shits and giggles, let's give it a whirl. Let's expect women to behave as adults, and when they don't, we find another woman to spend time with. See, problem solved.
This is the way adults behave when starting relationships. We feel each other out and look for behaviors that are deal breakers. If enough of these "deal-breaking" behaviors exist in a person, we move on to the next. That is, unless you believe that the pool of potential girlfriends is very limited for you. Surely Forney is not so insecure as to believe that he only has a few options so he has to program said current girlfriend into what he wants her to be. Um. Never mind.
I think I see part of his problem. He must have a woman on his arm to feel like a man. If he didn't feel like he must have a woman, then he wouldn't be afraid of being single. If he weren't afraid of being single, he wouldn't have a problem dropping her in favor of a woman who behaves as an adult. This is a problem for a lot of men in our society. They need female companionship to validate their manhood. This is one of the many things that the MHRM would like to see change. Men need to learn that female approval means nothing. To live your life the way you want, not how you think women want, is a very liberating experience. It will also get you laid. Trust me. I've tried it. It works.
We in the MHRM require the women in our lives to behave as adults. When they don't, we simply show them the door. This idea that women should be disciplined is ludicrous to say the least and only reinforces the negative behavior that is all too common among modern women. Most importantly, it places the burden on the man to be a woman's father, not her partner. This is unacceptable on a whole host of levels.
Now, I wouldn't be surprised to see feminists trying to use their long rope of lies and deception to tie this guy to the MHRM. David Futrelle and his mouse girl, Joy a.k.a. Sael Palani, must be positively aroused by the idea. But what I find interesting is that Forney seems to have much more in common with feminists than the MHRM. One example is his antiquated idea that men should serve women as their protectors and providers. We see that all the time from feminists. They ram through ever-increasing draconian laws and policies designed to protect women and only women, even from the consequences of their own actions. Get drunk and fuck a guy, then feel self-conscious about it later? It's not your fault. He raped you.

http://reason.com/blog/2014/06/04/occidental-expels-student-for-rape-under Then there is the idea that women should be provided for. Forney thinks women should be provided parental guidance by their male partners. Feminists work to make sure that the government provides for women like a husband or father.
http://www.academia.edu/1490030/A_Feminist_Family_Agenda_Putting_the_mother_back_into_sole_parenting
Then there is Forney's ideas about sexual intercourse.
"The reason why men want big dicks … isn't because they want to impress girls or please them, but because they want to hurt them."
Why does this sound so familiar? Where have I heard the idea before that sexual intercourse is meant to harm women, not please them?
http://witchwind.wordpress.com/2013/12/15/piv-is-always-rape-ok/
It's obvious that Forney is promoting the same misandric crap that feminists and traditionalists have been shoving onto men for years. It is nothing more than wanting men to stay put in those old gender roles that feminists had once cried were slavery for women. It is futile to assign Forney a label, either conservative or feminist, because in this instance they are both the same. His ideas about the role of men and women in society are not based on equality, as he explains in this last quote from his article.

> "I hope this article helps men and girls better return to their natural sex roles."

No thanks, Matt. Men have had enough of being women's protectors and providers. It's time that women behaved as adults and men began to treat them as such. Oh, and as for the wails and screeches that "not all women are like that"—I know. I married one who isn't like that.

AVFMS Report: The First International Conference on Men's Issues, sponsored by A Voice for Men

Sponsored by A Voice for Men, the First International Conference on Men's Issues was held just outside Detroit, Michigan, this last weekend, June 26-28. Quite fittingly, it was held at the Veterans of Foreign Wars hall #1146 in St. Clair Shores.

As someone who has volunteered at and attended numerous conferences and symposia and been a part of this movement for several years now, I was interested in seeing how it would go. To understand what this conference fully means is only possible if you have been living in this movement for years. As I told Bob O'Hara (AVfM News Director), it is nothing short of the culmination of five years of hard, grinding work, with the implications of finally mounting a movement centered on men's equality issues.

On June 26, the proceedings began with a press conference and a workshop by Dr. Warren Farrell. You may see a video of the press conference here:

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Bzim6hQUoC8?feature=oembed]

Some who have long mocked men's advocates (often for no other reason than sheer irrational hatred) took a quick look at the ~25 reporters attending the press conference and prematurely assumed that this was the men's issues conference proper (which occurred one day later) and gleefully trumpeted commentary about the "low attendance." The increasingly unhinged rag Raw Story got it wrong, and so did the Futrellian acolyte Diana Boston, blogger at "Mancheeze":

Again, those in the audience in the video above are not attendees but reporters, and some of them represent hundreds of thousands of viewers at least. Also, take a look at your average White House press conference and you'll see a similar number of reporters.

Not that the facts really deter them. Our opponents will continue to mock, deride, and degrade us regardless of what we do. After the death threats and the subsequent protest failed to shut down the conference, that's all they can really do. They are a truly wretched bunch, since it's really their own impotent bitterness, angst, and hatred they are projecting on others.

By the way, this is what the conference really looked like:

This is what it looked like while standing near the front and looking back over the main room during a break period when not everyone had found their seats. This picture does not include the people who filled the first several rows of chairs, the people on the stage setting up, the people congregating in the hallway, the people upstairs in either of the two parlors or out on the balcony. Or the people hanging outside among their smoking buddies. Or the people out near the gazebo in the back by the lakeside.

Yes, many attended the conference – including the sensational Honey Badgers, some of whom are pictured here:

Strange, these folks don't look like 50-year-old men wearing fedoras to me! Note, by the way, that the seats are filled all the way to the far back of the room.

So I'm terribly sorry to disappoint the naysayers and slimers, but no—the event was very well attended indeed. Despite the death threats. Despite having to move the conference. Despite the technical difficulties that occasionally arose. Despite all of the lies and hatred poured upon organizers and attendees.

Don't worry, protesters—there's always next year! For this year, however, the last laugh belongs to us.

I estimate that the conference had roughly 225 to 275 people—perhaps more—who filtered in and out over the course of three days. This is actually rather good for a conference-style event. The Project MALES symposia I attended at UT Austin from 2011-2013, which were better funded, more extensively staffed, and sponsored by the prominent UT Austin's Division of Diversity and Community Engagement, did not have as many in attendance.

A full video of the first day is currently unavailable. Here is a preserved livestream of Day Two:

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=eNNpmMTxt8o?feature=oembed]

Here is what the badges looked like:

And here is the program of speakers handed out upon registration (click to enlarge if you need to):

You may recognize the names of these speakers. If not, here is a description of them.

Although I had an average of four hours of sleep each night (the conference lasted all day!), the atmosphere at the event was highly energizing and sustaining. AVfM News Director Bob O'Hara told me he experienced a similar effect.

Before I flew in to Detroit, I was concerned about the majority of the heavy-hitters in the men's movement all being gathered in the same place, especially since the death threats. When I got to the conference, however, my concerns quickly faded. There were police cruisers in the parking lot. During the conference security personnel flanked the walls and performed regular patrols to all open areas inside the building, as well as outside. All was calm, however.

At first, none of the attendees could get in because the conference staff was still setting up. Once I was recognized by the AVfM staff, however, I was escorted past the security personnel who barred the doors.

There were a few subversive attendees. They were annoying but not extreme. I sat between two young men who were tweeting constantly. I couldn't help but glance to see what they were saying. When speaker Erin Pizzey (founder of the domestic violence shelter movement and a supporter of abused men) told the audience that she was a violent child, I saw the man to my right tweet, "Erin Pizzey says she has always been a violent woman."

I sat there and watched him as he tweeted it out. Unfortunately, this is the average degree of moral character of our opponents. I was tempted to track down his tweet and get into a Twitter war with him, but I knew that would only distract me from the reason I had come there: to listen to the speakers and build working relationships with those friendly to the cause.

I found the conference highly enjoyable. So did much of the audience, giving many standing ovations. The speakers were dynamic and diverse in their methods of delivery, from the sage presence of Senator Anne Cools, to the heroic yet frail Erin Pizzey, to the incisive wit of Dr. Tara Palmatier, to the soothing fatherly storytelling of Tom Golden.

Mike Buchanan's presentation about men's issues political groups was provocative. Karen Straughn's critiques of early feminism were just as merciless as they were scholarly. Terry Popp spoke about the experience of divorced military men with calm conviction and the insight of hard experience.

Carnell Smith's discussion of paternity fraud was as passionate as it was humorous. Dr. Farrell's presentation was compassionate as always, and I was glad to see how highly he prioritized boys' education issues. And Stefan Molyneux was perhaps the most engaging speaker, often conversing directly with individuals in the audience.

I could go on about the speakers, but the reality is that you have to see them in action for yourself. I believe there will eventually be a documentary/DVD of the conference that you can buy from AVfM. In the meantime, consider this list of direct links to individual speeches (currently incomplete).

In an incredibly humble act, Paul Elam presented the VFW commander with a check for $2,000, thanking veterans for their service both past and present:

The last event was the panel on activism. I was honored to sit next to Dr. Farrell (among others, of course). This was a chance for panelists to provide the audience with recommendations for effective activism and answer some of the questions raised by the audience.

There were plenty of questions, and unfortunately we weren't able to get to all of them. But it was definitely a rewarding experience. You can watch the panelists speak at the end of the ten-hour video posted earlier in this article.

All in all, the conference was a huge success. The AVfM staff worked extremely hard to make sure it happened, and they all deserve a round of applause. Also, consider donating to their quarterly fundraiser.

I didn't even look at any of the press until well after the event. There were the expected hit pieces featuring the lies men's advocates had come to know well. But so what. At this point it does not matter what our opponents do or do not do, what they say or do not say. They can no longer ignore us, so they attack us. But attacking us has consistently only served to bring us more sympathizers. And this trend is set to continue indefinitely.

Also, this conference represents a huge milestone for the movement, which is finally coalescing into something tangible. A sense of community and camaraderie has been created with this conference. Many people who existed only as screen names were finally able to put a face to the name. And there is also a sense of "we're here, and we've come this far. We're not going back, ever."

There has been positive press coverage as well. Glenn Reynolds wrote an excellent article about the conference for USA Today (a national publication that had interviewed me last year about college men's centers). There was also a nice article by Dr. Helen Smith at PJ Media. Paul Elam and Karen Straughan, as well as the other speakers, participated in numerous interviews. I myself was glad to be interviewed by Fusion Media and PJTV regarding my work with AVFMS.

We will likely continue to see more and more press coverage over the next several days. Plans for the next conference are already underway. As to its location and the list of speakers, only the future will tell.

The EU should stop cooking the numbers

Lucian Vâlsan · 2 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A few months ago, the European Union released a report based on an EU-wide survey that purports to show a huge problem with "extensive" violence against women in the 28 nations that comprise the EU.

The report has a plethora of issues, starting with the fact that it mentions internet service providers as institutions that must be involved in combating violence against women—a suggestion that, when it comes from the EU, is a reason to be concerned.

But while it would take a book to explain all that's wrong with this report, we will focus on the sole claim that 1 in 20 women over the age of 15 in the EU has been raped. What we'll do is take the raw data and try to reach the same number. Moreover, we will use all the feminist assumptions in our attempt to reach the same result using the raw data in several countries. Trigger warning: There will be some oppression since we will be using mathematics.

The feminist assumptions, the approximations, and the methodology

Several feminist assumptions keep resurfacing whenever the topic of rape of women is raised. We will list them here so you'll know what to expect. We will also use several approximations, but we'll make sure those approximations favor the feminist position.

1. There are no false rape allegations. We will work under the assumption that 0% of rape complaints are false.

2. 90% of rapes go unreported. Unless specified otherwise by a feminist source, we'll work under the assumption that 90% of rapes are unreported, so we will multiply the numbers by 10.

3. All victims of rape are women. Some countries don't share the data by the sex of the victim, so we'll assume that all victims are women.

4. Half of a country's population is female. The reality is that the proportion is more like 52.5% in most countries, but for the sake of easy calculus and for the sake of advantaging the feminist position, we'll assume it's 50%. If fewer women are assumed, the number of rapes per total population (the soundbite number) will appear larger.

5. Each new rape is a new victim. We'll use this assumption because if we are to include the fact that many victims are repeated victims of the same offender, we really lower our chances of reaching the magical 1 in 20 number. So we'll assume that each rape instance has a different victim.

Since the EU report uses the wording has been raped and over the age of 15—and considering that the gross of female victims of rape are between 15 and 45 years of age—this means that we'll need data across many years. Since data across the past 30 years is hardly available and since most feminists consider data from the late 1980s as unreliable, we'll take the highest number available in the past 10 years and multiply it by 10 (see assumption no. 2). Then that number will be multiplied by 30 (the age window). The reason we'll do just this multiplication is assumption no. 5, which comes from the belief that all women are under threat, not just a few who happen to be in an unfortunate circumstance.

The calculus

Having clarified that, let's dive into the numbers. We chose Greece, France, Spain, and Russia as countries to consider. Russia will be our control country as a non-EU nation. Greece was chosen in order to have an image on the countries with a lower population.

1. Greece

The highest number of rapes reported to the police in Greece between 2003 and 2013 was in 2008, with 232 instances, and the lowest number was in 2013, with 149 instances [1]. So we'll take the highest number and consider it as the default for Greece. Since we don't have results divided by the sex of the victim, we'll apply assumption no. 3.

Applying assumption no. 2, the "real" rate is 2,320—which is to be multiplied by 30 since we put all on a continuum, as feminists like to say.

Greece has a population of 10.8 million people, so the female population is 5.4 million. Thus, the calculus is:

5.4 million (the total number of females) / (2,320*30) = 77.58

In other words, even when using the entire feminist ideology to cook the numbers, we're still getting 1 in 77 women over the age of 15 raped in Greece. Okay, maybe Greece is not such a great example. Let's try another one.

2. Spain

The highest number of rapes reported to police in Spain was in 2011 (in the middle of the Gender Stalinism), when 1,513 complaints were filed [2]. Again—we'll assume all complaints are legit, all victims are women, this number as the default for the whole period, and 90% of rapes being unreported—which means that the "real" rate is 15,130 per year.

Spain has a population of 46.7 million, so the female population is 23.35 million. Thus, the calculus goes like this:

23.35 million / (15,130*30) = 51.44

Again, even when using all the feminist assumptions, and considering a country that has been under a de facto feminist dictatorship, we still end up with 1 in 51 women over the age of 15 raped in Spain—which is very far from the number claimed by the European Union.

Let's try again.

3. France

According to the feminist source SOS Femmes, of the total number of rape victims, 30.2% are women over the age of 15 [3], the rest being girls and others (i.e., men and boys). Since the EU study focuses on women over the age of 15, we'll take only 30.2% of the highest number and then repeat the process.

The highest number of rapes reported to the police in France was last year, with 8,458 instances.[4] Thus, 30.2% of 8,458 is 2,554.316 (let's say 2,555). Again, we'll use the feminist assumption that 90% of all rape goes unreported and conclude that the "real" annual rate is 25,550.

France's population is 66.61 million, so the female population is 33.3 million. Now let's get the numbers in:

33.3 million / (25,550*30) = 43.44

So even using the feminist data, gathered by Collectif Féministe contre le Viol (Feminist Collective against Rape), and all the feminist assumptions in the book—we still end up with 1 in 43 women over the age of 15 raped in France—more than twice the EU claim.

4. Russia

The highest number of rapes reported to the police in Russia is 6,978 [5]. Since we have no data based on the sex of the victim, we'll assume they're all women and they're all legit. And, using assumption no. 2, we conclude that the "real" rate is 69,780 per year.

Russia has a population of 143.7 million, so the number of females is 71.85 million. Let's get the numbers using the feminist narrative:

71.85 million / (69,780*30) = 34.3

So even using all the feminist assumptions in the book, we end up with 1 in 34 women over the age of 15 raped in Russia, which is still quite far from the so-called "EU average" purported by its latest report.

Conclusions

A healthy principle in evaluating ideas is to take that idea to its limits and see if it still holds water. That's what we tried here. We also discounted the fact that the rates of violence overall (including rape) have steadily declined over the last 30 years. In other words, our numbers were more than inflated.

And we see that even if we take all the feminist assumptions at face value and spin the data accordingly, the numbers still utterly refuse to tell the feminist story that 1 in 20 women over the age 15 have been raped in the EU.

In other words, even by feminist standards, that claim simply is a lie. And it's lies like these that fuel rape hysterias, that fuel terribly misguided EU policy, that unjustly increase the power of the state upon the lives of all of us and eventually negatively affect the lives of all citizens—by making women fear men and by making men fear false allegations from women.

Yes, rape (of anybody, not just adult women) is a terrible crime, and genuine victims ought to be helped. But it's also one of the rarest forms of violence to occur in Europe, and statistically, being a woman in Europe is by far the safest bet, as women are the least likely demographic to ever suffer any form of violence (from mugging to rape or murder) anywhere in the European Union [6].

We can not kid ourselves that the EU takes gender equality or violence seriously as long as the numbers are cooked in such an obvious manner that simply cannot be true by any stretch of the imagination. The sooner these kinds of lies get thrown into the dustbin of history, the better.

Time for CAFE to change the menu

Paul Elam · 2 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

If I ever wrote something that demanded qualification up front, this is it. I want to go on the record saying that I am a personal supporter of the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE), have donated money to them, attended their events, put this website to use regularly disseminating their press releases and have been harshly critical of those who have actively sought to silence their voices.

I sometimes wonder if that support has been my wisest choice.

My feelings along this line are not because representatives from CAFE have publicly thrown AVFM under the bus, even though they have. Nor is it because of the massive elephant that was in the room during the Miles Groth lecture last year, when they thanked so many people for helping them host the event, except for AVFM (after we – meaning AVFM readers — helped them raise six times the security money needed for their presentation).

At this same event a CAFE representative proudly, publicly, and quite sneeringly scoffed at the idea of men's "rights," a shot I interpreted as a direct insult to those of us who actually believe men should have them.

However, my concerns about CAFE now are deeper and more ominous than media miscues, thoughtless remarks and intentional lapses in decorum.

Recently we witnessed CAFE being given the boot at the Toronto Pride Event, with the utterly false reasoning that they did not reflect the values of tolerance and inclusivity. This comes on the heels of a lecture they scheduled by Janice Fiamengo that was simply not allowed to happen, because CAFE officials failed to plan and stood by impotently as it happened. They had plenty of experience to prepare for that event, and appears they did not learn a lot from any of it.

Even this, still, is not my overarching concern about CAFE and where they are (or are not) heading.

As most here know, we recently concluded, with scarcely any incidents, a fabulously successful International Conference on Men's Issues in Detroit; St. Clair Shores to be precise.

At the end of that conference we held a panel discussion on the future of activism. CAFE representatives were invited to participate, and indeed CAFE's Adam McPhee agreed and took a seat with the rest of us, voicing his opinions.

The video of that talk will be released later today with any luck. During that talk, McPhee said something interesting, disturbing actually, given CAFE's track record of how they choose to "do business."

I am paraphrasing here what you will see later in the video. He made a statement that I found as offensive as I did false; something to the effect 'we need to push out the radicals on both sides' meaning feminists and MRAs. The video will provide his exact wording.

First let me say, if there is a working branch of the MHRM that are radicals, seeking radical goals which mirror those of radical feminism, McPhee failed to mention who they are. Personally, I would like to know because I am not aware of them.

Perhaps in a strange way, though, I am.

I can only give you my opinion on what he meant, but one I assert is based on a fair amount of experience dealing with and supporting this group, as well as watching how they handle dissent and conflict.

By MRA radicals, he means AVFM.

If you are a supporter of our work, he means you.

Here is the problem with being a politician instead of an activist. It makes you, well, a politician. And as most informed people in this culture know, politicians are shape-shifters, not so much adopting a set of values and abiding by them, but adopting a set of messages and shaping them as needed for public consumption. Sadly, I have seen CAFE do this from the start, and the most it has resulted in is an inability to do what they set out to do in any public venue. They have been shut down by the tiniest and weakest of bullies despite all their efforts to be seen as the nice guys of men's advocacy.

It quite frankly embarrasses me for them.

When public acceptance, popularity and perceived palatability takes precedence over your values, then your values are not worth much. They are just one more flexible, disposable feature in your toolbox to shape public image. Values of convenience are a betrayal no more and no less than what we see with elected politicians who care nothing of real issues until those issues affect the polls.

Politicians stand for nothing but votes. They invariably find themselves in the public eye more resembling snakes than servants.

If CAFE wants to have a future that includes credibility, not to mention actually raising awareness of issues that affect men and boys, they will need to abandon the PR dog and pony show and start showing some resolve, some fucking spine, for what they claim to be doing. And they will have to take a brutally firm assessment of just how much failure is now being attached to their efforts.

There is a monstrously powerful machine of gender ideology that is now seeking to silence any good faith effort to bring relief to problems faced by men and boys. As CAFE should be able to see with crystal clarity at this point, public posturing in an attempt to portray themselves as the "good guys" vs the likes of AVFM and others who are putting their mouths where their values are, is a recipe for nothing but continued successful attacks from their opponents, and a loss of faith in those who would otherwise continue to support their efforts.

The last thing the Men's Human Rights Movement needs is an activist version of the Good Men Project.

Addendum: Since the publishing of this article, Adam McPhee has penned a response. While I do not agree with some of what he has said, I am thankful to host a platform where dissent, even passionate disagreement, is allowed and fostered. I also want to say that I have spoken to several members of CAFE today and am happy to say that I see a bright future with both organizations moving forward with their missions enjoying mutual moral support:

In Toronto and Detroit, activists allow gender ideologues to betray gay men

Barbara Kay · 2 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The blow fell too late for a counter-punch. But that seems to have been the idea behind Pride Toronto's arbitrary ejection of the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) from Sunday's parade just days beforehand, leaving no time for an appeal of the decision.

The annual Pride event in Canada's biggest city is supposed to be a celebration of all things and causes relating to gay culture and, more broadly, to formerly marginalized sexual identities. It's supposed to be a big tent. But as the treatment of CAFE (pronounced café) shows us, only those groups with a politically correct agenda are seen as acceptable.

According to its own policy, Pride Toronto doesn't permit cancellations after June 21—thereby ensuring that groups have an opportunity to respond to complaints lodged against them. CAFE, which has charity status (giving it more legal standing than most of the other participating groups), took part last year without incident and had two months ago successfully registered to walk this year, its name appearing in official Pride literature.

CAFE was given no substantive reason for the rejection, just a note from the Pride organizers: "It has come to our attention that the work of your organization may contravene the spirit of the mission, vision, and values of Pride Toronto and WorldPride." And that was it. The right to march was withdrawn. At a stroke, CAFE was lumped in with pedophilia-promoting groups such as Men Loving Boys Loving Men, the only other type of group I could find to have been spurned by Pride as inconsistent with its mission.

> Pride is supposed to be a big-tent event. But as the treatment of a men's rights group shows, left-wing activists have a veto on who gets to march.

Although CAFE's broad mandate is freedom of speech, much of its activity has focused on raising awareness of men's issues—including those that affect, say, the right of gay men (and all men) to have equal parenting rights under Canadian law. But feminists regard any such advocacy as a threat to their dogma. And so feminist activists, occasionally aggressive, have attended almost every men's rights speaker sponsored by CAFE on Canadian university campuses. (I was one such speaker two years ago.) It therefore isn't much of a stretch to infer that CAFE was booted from Pride because of the complaints of militant feminists.

More than 12,000 people, including Canadian politicians, actors, and Olympic athletes, turned out to march in Toronto's largest ever Pride parade Sunday.

The parade capped off 10 days of festivities celebrating gay, lesbian, bisexual, and transgender communities. Toronto played host to WorldPride this year, marking the first time a WorldPride festival had taken place in a North American city.

"The energy is always up during this event, but it's just on steroids this weekend," said Steve Nardi, 51, who marched in the parade. "It's been fantastic, absolutely fantastic."

For those who follow Pride politics, a certain irony leaps out here. The Ontario English Catholic Teachers Association marches, even though it is affiliated with some gay-alliance-unfriendly Catholic schools. More controversially, Pride defends the presence of the anti-Zionist group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, perceived as an outright hate group by many Jews, not to mention by many non-Jews, who can see that QuAIA's mandate has nothing to do with Pride's objectives (and in fact makes a mockery of them in focusing negative attention on the only gay-friendly nation in the Middle East).

This incident could not have been more personally ironic from my perspective. I have just returned from the world's First International Men's Rights Conference, sponsored by A Voice for Men (AVfM), held in Detroit. The range of topics addressed included paternity fraud, custody iniquities, the astronomical suicide rates among military veterans, the absence of resources for male victims of domestic abuse, and the "boy crisis" in education. (I myself spoke on misandry in the media.)

Everything went swimmingly. But the fact that it took place at all was a triumph of resourcefulness and determination. For just as CAFE was sideswiped by feminist protest at the last minute here in Canada, so was AVfM. The DoubleTree Hilton hotel, the conference's venue, received threats from feminist activists. Reflexively, the hotel imposed unmeetable conditions on organizers, and another venue had to be found on short notice.

AVfM was luckier than CAFE. Hats off to the Veterans of Foreign Wars Association of St. Clair Shores, Michigan, for its warm and cooperative hosting of the conference.

The Detroit protesters did win one battle in the sense that they imposed a great deal of inconvenience on participants (constant shuttling between motels and the venue), not to mention the $10,000 it cost AVfM for a police presence that wasn't necessary since the protesters' objectives of causing financial and logistical hardship had already been achieved.

The feminist revolution began as a fight for equity reform in law, education, and career opportunity. Those objectives were quickly achieved. But as in all revolutions, justice is never enough for the true believers; for them, the revolution is never over until all dissent from their dogmas is squashed.

And so the purges begin. In this case, the Detroit attempt gave strength to the counter-movement. But in Toronto, CAFE was sent to the guillotine while feminists' knitting needles flashed in the hot summer sun.

The International Men's Issues Conference 2014: An Astounding Event

Tom Golden · 2 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

If you missed the International Men's Issues Conference in June of 2014 you missed an astounding event. Lucky for you it is now online and viewable. (links at the end of this post) The consistent theme that was heard repeatedly during the event was that the old narrative is woefully inadequate and is being replaced with a new one that improves the focus of compassion and choice to everyone, not just a select few. Exposing this old narrative came from almost each speaker and was described in a wide variety of ways.

I do hope that those who attacked this conference and unsuccessfully tried to shut it down by sending death threats to innocent people will take the time to listen to these presentations. I think if they take the time to do this that they will find that the speakers all offer a similar message of wanting the best for all people, not just a select few. They are truly humanitarians. How could anyone want to shut down a humanitarian event?

I am reminded of a book I read many years ago. It was a book on human evil by Scott Peck. The title was People of the Lie: The Hope for Healing Human Evil. In it, Peck explained that evil was most often practiced by those who would attack others rather than deal with their own failings. This sort of attack would then leave what Peck described as the hallmark of evil, it would leave a huge amount of chaos in its wake. Of course I won't need to remind anyone that men's issues consistently focus on events and problems where men and boys are facing huge amounts of chaos whether it is the family court traumas, the domestic violence industry, or some other misandrist avenue.

I couldn't help but notice that the First International Men's Issues Conference had a number of speakers addressing the idea of evil. Sen Ann Cools, the first black female Senator in North America started off the conference by openly asking how anyone could actually believe the feminist narrative that has been thrust upon us all for the last 40 years. Senator Cools told stories of her experience in the Canadian Senate that exposed the half truths and the gynocentric majority that turned their backs on the needs of men and boys. Erin Pizzey then gave a remarkable presentation about the plight of men and boys. She labelled what has been done to men and boys, particularly in the domestic violence arena as done by "The Evil Empire." Then Tara Palmatier, PhD eloquently and humorously pointed out the lopsided nature of acceptance of the narcissism of girls and women and the shame, blame, and lack of acceptance for boys and men on so many levels. The conference started off with three women who very eloquently and powerfully labeled the state we are in and the impact this has on boys and men.

[image]The presentation where I learned the most was from Karen Straughan. I would highly recommend you check it out. I had been duped by the idea that feminism in the beginning was actually for equality. Karen rid me of that notion. She went into detail about the Seneca Falls Convention and showed clearly how the feminist narrative, even in the 19th century, was clearly blaming men for the ills of the world.

There were so many other presentations that were simply excellent. I can honestly say there was not one presentation I heard that didn't get an A. Barbara Kay did a great job in exposing the misandry in the media. Mike Buchanan brought to life the political reality and shared his experience in starting a political party in England to focus on boys and men. Fred Jones inspired us in laying out what it takes to win a fight that may be stacked against you in the start. Golden did okay talking about men and their unique ways to process emotions and Paul talked about the importance of honoring our blue collar men and the fact that the world functions due to their often unappreciated efforts.

Warren Farrell started off day two with a ten point summation of the most important issues we need to address in order to find success. As usual Warren is thinking ahead of the curve! Carnell Smith told the story of cupcake and had us all laughing and inspired to keep any eye peeled for the soul crushing impact of paternity fraud. Robert Franklin exposes the partnership of feminists and family court lawyers and their goals of keeping fathers out of families. Terry Popp focused on the huge problem of suicide in the military and showed the excellent video Purple Heart's Final Beat. Then Stefan Molyneux spoke and began by looking at evil and how it starts and stops, moved to circumcision and then beyond. He really kept us all interested and laughing.

What a great group of presentations. This conference was truly an astounding event.

At this point day two is online on youtube. The present video is a number of hours long and difficult to navigate and find the beginnings and ends of each section. For your convenience the links below will take you to each presentation.

Child psychologist Penelope Leach says sleepovers at dad's "may damage brain"

Jack Goodfellow · 3 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

To begin, from my previous articles I have received feedback that I am not exactly a stickler for providing support for my claims. I respect that, so one of my goals in this article is to be 100% factual. Citations. Notations. Look here to find this. Look there to find that. I'm going to do it right and from a certain perspective: this entire article is about how we support our claims and where we find support for our cause.

Bestselling author and "child psychologist" Penelope Leach made statements to the effect that a child's separation from their mother (i.e., by allowing a child to sleep over at their father's house in cases of shared custody) could lead to the child experiencing permanent brain damage and psychological issues. This was reported in both the Independent and here:

Child psychologist Penelope Leach says sleepovers at dad's 'may damage brain'.

Oliver James, another "child psychologist" and TV presenter, supported Leach's claims by adding, "[I]n most cases, you should do nothing to disrupt the relationship with the primary caregiver. To do so can affect the child's brain development.… After the age of three, it becomes more debatable about whether children will be damaged by living between two homes and by the age of about six, I don't think it's a problem." These quotes can be found in the article referenced above.

While James is saying that the issue is loss of contact with the primary caregiver, the title of the article is "Child psychologist Penelope Leach says sleepovers at dad's 'may damage brain.'" That's the claim being made here: contact with dad causes brain damage. If that wasn't the claim and it was simply a matter of loss of contact with a primary caregiver, then we could say that having a nanny or dropping the baby off at your parents' house for a night away or any loss of contact with a young child causes brain damage. These statements and that article, however, were about none of those scenarios.

The fact that James (in his uncited claim) added that by the age of six it doesn't matter may appear conciliatory; he's essentially saying that contact with dad, after the most important developmental years, is possibly okay. By then the brain is well-formed enough to defend itself from whatever damaging impact a father's contact can bring to bear.

Since Penelope Leach and Oliver James provide no supporting evidence to these claims—not a single study—I thought I would take it upon myself to interview some people who never had to suffer through brain-damaging contact with fathers in their early youth.

Where would I find a group of such people who would be easily accessible, willing to talk to me, and all contained within a small area? According to a number of different studies: prisons. According to the statistical study "Father Absence and Youth Incarceration," the likelihood of being incarcerated is a fairly simple formula. Fatherless + not rich = imprisoned and angry.[1]

So if I wanted to find a large group of people who never had their brains damaged by contact with their fathers in order to find for Penelope Leach and Oliver James the real-world, stringent academic data that would support their claims, prison would be the best place to go. That's where I went.

It was a clear summer day, and the sun sparkled off of the newly built county prison's brick walls. The first thing that struck me was how aesthetically pleasing and modern this relatively small prison seemed in comparison to most of the other buildings and houses in this economically depressed area. Strange, since the road leading to it was lined on both sides by old, boarded-up buildings crumbling into nothing, as though this was a wasteland in which the only shining tower was a monument to incarceration surrounded by the relics of a past-gone era of industry and involvement. But enough of that. I was on a mission to speak with as many people not suffering from father-induced brain damage as I could find.

I knocked on the front door to the prison, it opened, and I asked the guard: “Is there anyone in here who never had contact with their father?”

I noticed in his eyes the weariness of a man trapped in a job he didn’t really care for, in a world he didn’t really care for, suffering from the exhaustion of not knowing how to change it.

“Take your pick,” he said. “None of these people had fathers.”

“Citation, please,” I said. “Do you have evidence to support that claim?”

“Do you want to talk to someone or not, asshole,” he replied.

We went to lockup, and through a thick bulletproof window I selected my test subject like a young princess selecting a bright, shiny new car.

I spotted one—scars, tattoos, and an aggressive, violent manner that screamed, “I do not suffer from father-induced brain damage.”

“I want to talk to that one,” I told the guard. He went about arranging it.

Twenty minutes later I sat in a small, concrete-walled room painted a dull yellow. A guard stood behind me, a thick pane of glass in front of me and beyond it, the young man’s angry scowl staring back.

“Hello,” I said.

“Fuck you,” he said.

“My name is Jack.”

“Razor Blade.”

“Pardon?”

“My name is Razor Blade, motherfucker,” he said.

“Oh. Hello, Razor Blade. Let’s just jump into this. According to Penelope Leach and Oliver James, in situations where parents are not living under the same roof, early childhood contact with fathers leads to, what I have termed, father-induced brain damage. Am I correct in assuming you never had any contact with your father?”

“Fuck you.”

“Yes, fuck me, Razor Blade, but can we continue with my study?”

“You know what I would do to you if you were in here?” Razor Blade said, moving closer to the glass.

“Well, you wouldn’t rape me because according to feminists, men don’t have to worry about that,” I said. “Or anything else, for that matter. But seriously, Razor Blade, I’m here to talk about you, not me. Can I assume you never had contact with your biological father?”

“Fuck you.”

“Does that mean yes?”

“Fuck YOU!”

“I think that means yes. As an aside, I find it fascinating that you are able to communicate using only two words. So, obviously, you do not suffer from father-induced brain damage. Can you tell me about all of the positive aspects of not suffering from this ailment?”

“I run cell block D. I have my pick of the bitches in here.”

"By bitches I assume you mean men who have been overtly feminized through the course of living in a hyper-violent, anxiety-ridden environment. Strangely enough, at the same time, you as well have been feminized by that same environment, though you don't realize it. This feminization has pushed you into filling an overtly and unrealistically dominant, violent, and rage-driven role. I also imagine that you, not suffering from brain damage, understand that this situation is only possible in a culture where healthy, productive relationships between men and other men, as well as men and children, have been deemed unnecessary, damaging, and even pedophilic. The situation you are in is not entirely but to no small part the end product of a culture that holds little value for men beyond a number associated with a bank account, their willingness to equate being a man with doing anything that a woman asks, and, if not that, quietly accepting a legal system that seeks to rob or incarcerate them and does so more successfully and in greater numbers than any other culture in the world. Razor Blade, you are the monster that feminists scream about when they cry, "RAPE," and they made you by destroying the influence that fathers have in the lives of their children. But I have to admit, I'm not seeing brain damage here. I'm seeing soul damage. What do you think about that?"

"Citation please," he said.

"You got me there, Razor Blade, " I said. Just as I had looked into the guard's eyes, I looked into Razor Blade's—there was the weariness of a man trapped in a cage and a role he didn't really care for, in a world he didn't really care for, suffering from the exhaustion of not knowing how to change it.

That's when I abandoned my efforts to find the evidence to support Penelope Leach and Oliver James's comments because even if spending time with a father leads to this mysterious ailment of father-induced brain damage, it is a good thing.

As I drove through the wasteland surrounding that shiny prison back to my home, I felt fantastic. This forty-year feminist-launched attack on men and reality has led to so much dust and decay, so many shiny prisons, so much fatherless-induced soul damage. I felt fantastic because I had found my citation and study in the dust of the crumbling city and along with it a chance to rebuild and redefine. In the dust is a chance to create better relationships between men and women. In what has been broken is the chance to gain a better understanding of what it means to be a man beyond the insane notion that this is found at the end of a leash attached to an unreasonable feminist's hand. If women would hope for a greater love and appreciation from the men in their lives, maybe they'll look into the dust of their broken relationships and have the courage to see that this love and appreciation ultimately comes from that father-induced brain damage. It's a man's thing, and there simply needs to be some change to secure it. I just wish Razor Blade and that guard could have come with me. The answers are not in that prison, but in the dust.

Adam McPhee responds to Paul Elam

Adam McPhee · 3 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I recently posted an article regarding CAFE which pivoted (but not solely) on a remark made by Adam McPhee at our International Conference on Men's Issues. He wished to respond to this, which he did on his personal blog. I offered, and he accepted, to publish this here in the spirit of open dialog. It must be stressed that Adam is speaking here from his own personal perspective and not representing CAFE in his remarks. I will post and feature a response to this in the comments, and then hopefully we can move on in cooperation for the future of men and boys. PE

Paul Elam recently took me to task over comments I had made on a panel at AVFM's first international conference on Men's Issues. Here is my response to his article:

Paul,

I could tell you were angry with what I had said on the panel when you pointed out that "someone" on the panel mentioned radicals, and then you denied their very existence. If I had meant AVFM, I would not have sat on that panel. I have dealt with enough radicals from the other side; I wouldn't deal with those I may consider radical on our side. Everyone I know in what we consider the MHRM, rightly deny participation of red-pillers, PUA's, etc. However, the media does not, and there was a fair amount of media there.

It is ironic that you closed your rant by stating that the last thing the MHRM needs is an activist "Good Men Project". Someone from AVFM mentioned to me at the conference that you recently got raked over the coals in the comments section of an article on masculinists. One of those comments levied the same accusation at AVFM:

"Is it necessary to condemn every fucking group in [the] manosphere? … it seems that inch by inch AVFM is moving towards becoming another GMP."

My response was "good". We should be told when people disagree with us. I despise an echo chamber, which is probably one of the biggest reasons that I am involved in getting men's issues addressed. This is why I wholeheartedly endorse this article. If you dislike what I say, by all means, tell me. That applies to everyone in the men's movement, not just Paul Elam. If you dislike or disagree with what someone is saying, especially those you consider to be leaders of the movement, tell them. Let your voice be heard.

The comment that irked you was spoken while I was discussing a sub-reddit I enjoy occasionally engaging in, "feMRAdebates" where people of all perspectives discuss gender issues. I was adding to what Stefan Molyneux had said about "know thyself".

Many in this movement see feminism, and thus feminists, as the enemy; I don't see it in such black and white terms. At the conference, I believe you yourself mentioned supporting what you call "good" feminists, such as Christina Hoff Sommers, Cathy Young, or Camille Paglia. There are those who do discuss errors of feminism, and speak to men's issues, and do so under the banner of feminism. Like Warren Farrell, I support anything that helps liberate people from staunchly held gender paradigms.

I was telling people to engage with those whose opinions differ from their own, and to learn from them. For those who are anti-feminist, consider it "knowing thy enemy". For those who are just interested in men's issues, then engage perspectives outside your preferred echo chamber. You won't always agree with people, or be agreed with (am I right, Paul?), but you will be better for it.

You will also be helping those who have a poor understanding of what men's issues are by giving them a better understanding of how men and boys are underscored, misunderstood, and underrepresented in the realm of gender discussions. If you are good enough, you may even sway a few opinions. I even find that those who self-identify as "radicals" are occasionally worth talking to.

What I meant was to ignore those who are radical in their opinions. You won't get anywhere arguing with a troll who just hates men/women, or thinks all men/women's issues are invalid. If you do choose to engage with those kinds of radicals, remember that it is not them you are talking to, it is those who are listening or reading along. Someone else on the panel mentioned the old adage of "if you argue with an idiot, they will just bring you down to their level and beat you with experience." As such, keep the higher ground or ignore them.

As for radicals who picket men's conferences in Detroit, or scream in your face at a discussion of men's issues in Toronto, I agree with you; we do not have radicals in the MHRM in that sense. What I liked best about your closing statement on the panel was when you said "if we did have radicals, we would cast them out". If you don't think we have radicals, great. If we ever get some, then yes, we should cast them out for their transgressions against the entire movement.

One of your writers, Andy Thomas (who also has an article on CAFÉ's website), wrote a great article for AVFM a year ago titled "We are the radicals now". He asserts that feminist revolutionaries who think they are radical, are nothing of the sort. He refers to himself as a radical, and says "We are not just radical, we are in every sense the most radical thinking movement in the history of human society." You deny the existence of radicals, and I certainly did not mean the type Andy wrote about anyway. Perhaps we need to discuss what one another's definitions of a "radical" are before you go chomping at the bit.

This is what will separate us from the feminist sphere. When discussing their radicals, or those who are truly man-hating, they tend to claim that not all feminists are like that (NAFALT, to the uninitiated). This is not denying their presence in feminism; it is *not*decrying them as feminists; it is not saying that they reject their form of feminism. It is saying yes, they are feminists, but we're not all like that. If they won't cast them out and say they don't accept them as feminists, then it is worse than the no true Scotsman fallacy. They are not saying no true feminist would say/act like that, they are saying yep, that's definitely an aspect of feminism! If the radical feminists were an illness of feminism, they would be Tourettes, and we're expected to ignore the occasional outburst of "rape apologizing scum" and "shut the fuck up!"

So yes, I support what you said in response. We cannot be accepting of radicals or radical viewpoints, in the extreme sense of radical, if they pop up under the banner of the MHRM. I support your calling me out on something you disagreed with. However, I don't support your trying to turn AVFM readers against someone who you simply disagree with, who also contributes to the recognition of men's issues, because I did not mean them. If I meant AVFM readers, and writers, I would have said that's who I meant, and I would have given specific examples because I prefer to address people as individuals rather than guilty by association.

"At this same event a CAFE representative proudly, publicly, and quite sneeringly scoffed at the idea of men's "rights," a shot I interpreted as a direct insult to those of us who actually believe men should have them."

Does this sound like sneeringly scoffing to anyone else? Sure sounds like someone saying men's rights are human rights to me; someone in support of a men's human rights movement. For more people who use the perspective of a MHRM, you don't even need to look outside your own walls. He also said that is what we, CAFÉ, are. If that displeases you, so be it. I'm sorry if you don't think men's rights are simply human rights.

You say I should hold some resolve, have a fucking spine, and essentially not sit on the fence. Sorry, but I prefer to have an open mind. It's the other side of the fence that is usually stuck in staunchly held world-views (Patriarchy! Patriarchy! Patriarchy!), and that's what you want me to be like? Pass. That's why I'm not over there. Thank you for dissenting from my opinion and reminding me that we are allowed to challenge each other on this side. Please continue to do so. That is what I value about the men's movement.

With all due respect, I would suggest you work harder at practicing what you preach, lest you come across as an overly defensive individual, more concerned with his personal ego gratification than with the ultimate goals of the MHRM. Personally I'm disappointed you didn't feel you could come and talk to me about my comment afterwards, wherein we could have had a discussion on what I meant by my comments and come to a better understanding.

Your light will not get any brighter by blowing out someone else's candle.

Stefan Molyneux unpacks the truth behind the Walt Disney movie Maleficent, starring Angelina Jolie. The film tells the story of a vengeful fairy, driven to curse an infant princess, only to discover that the child may be the one person who can restore peace to their troubled land. But what story is really being told?

When Is Murder Manslaughter?

Peadair Vandriar · 4 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Apparently deliberately stabbing a man in the heart with a carving knife does not require murderous intent. Well, that is what a jury in New Zealand decided recently.

Nothing says "you only wanted to somehow shake your deeply depressed husband out of his funk and make him realise just how 'desperate' your lives had become" like stabbing him in the heart with a carving knife.

The case of Lucille Scollay seems relatively straightforward. The "seems relatively" in the last sentence should be removed, it is straightforward. As Crown prosecutor Mark Zarifeh said, "After spending a night out drinking with Greg Van Dyk, whom she'd become close to, she walked up the long drive to the house and decided to kill her husband. She took him by the shoulder as he lay sleeping on his side, rolled him on to his back and straddled him, brought the knife up and stabbed him in the chest, a deep wound that penetrated his heart."

Lucille admitted stabbing her husband, Guy Scollay, as he slept. Lucille told police she had decided to stab Guy while walking home. Her defence lawyer denied Lucille had murderous intent that night. "It was not a wilful, deliberate act," he contested, "and her immediate horror afterwards bore that out." Further, "No punishment the court imposes could make up for what her, and her family, has lost," he said.

Murderous intent—how do you determine that someone has murderous intent? Well, you could ask them, but the problem is that the guilty will often say the same things as the innocent. The best way to determine murderous intent is to look at their actions.

There are some things that all people know will kill another human being. Cutting their throat, stabbing them in the heart, and shooting them in the head come to mind. Knowing this, those are the sort of actions you do not take if your intent is to highlight the problems in your relationship. If instead your intent is to kill another human being, you do take those actions.

"… her immediate horror afterwards" says nothing about intent. As I said above, the guilty will often say the same things as the innocent. Also, the guilty will often act like the innocent. Murderers can be horrified by their actions; not all murderers are psychopaths or sociopaths. Killing another human being is a revelatory experience; some people are horrified by what they have done and others aren't. Being horrified does not make you innocent of premeditation or make it a less deliberate act.

"No punishment the court imposes could make up for what her, and her family, has lost." The bullshit is strong with this one. Her family did not lose anyone, she killed Guy, Guy's family is suffering, she is responsible for his family's suffering. Because she is responsible, she should be punished—not to make up for what she has done but because she deserves punishment. There is a reason the word "reparations" is in the English language; it is because true justice should have both punishment and reparations. The criminal should be punished, and the victims should have reparations. Her lawyer portrayed her as a victim of her own crime—maybe she is—but that should not change the fact that she is also the perpetrator of the crime and should be punished. Her reparations as a "victim" should not be to get off a murder charge, it should not be for a reduced sentence. She should get counselling if she is a victim, but criminals should not profit from their crimes, even if their crimes make them a victim.

I do not understand why the jury decided she was not guilty of murder. I do not get it. The facts show she planned and executed a wilful and deliberate act that she knew would end in her husband's death. The judge who sentenced her to six years for the manslaughter said, "It was implicitly an act of dangerous violence, involving a lethal weapon." And, "It is inescapable that you meant Mr Scollay serious harm, he being the source of your great unhappiness." In other words, the judge who sentenced her, who could not find her guilty (as that was the jury's decision, not his), knew that she had premeditation. He knew that she intended to kill Guy Scollay, and yet when manslaughter has a maximum sentence of life in prison, he gives her six years. She could be out on parole in two. Even the judge values her life more than Guy's death.

When is murder manslaughter? When the helpless victim is a male and the perpetrator is a woman who is portrayed as a victim of an unhappy marriage.

What do you think, AVfM Nation? Why do you think she was found guilty of manslaughter, not murder? Or are you as perplexed as I am?

Male reproductive rights—female non-responsibility

Gordon Wadsworth · 4 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[dropcap]I[/dropcap]n my opinion, the most culturally revealing issue currently discussed in MHRM circles is that of male reproductive rights. The current paradigm of reproductive rights is a morally indefensible double standard wherein the female is valued for her humanity and the male for his utility.

It is one wherein the female gets to decide when the male is exploring his humanity and when he is reproducing, and one wherein she is under no obligation to inform him which act he is engaged in. It is one wherein the female can use her reproductive power to legally impose involuntary servitude on the male for the purposes of financing her reproductive decision.

What virtually everyone in the MHRM sees as a self-evident and fundamental human right is nevertheless vehemently argued against by the majority of people in this society. And in MHRM circles, there is a general unspoken belief that if we find an argument that is more elegantly constructed, or imbued with some higher order of reason, our point will be acknowledged and accepted. As a result, many well-reasoned arguments have been made to support male reproductive rights.

My favorite entry into this discussion was fielded by John Hembling, who recently addressed this topic with a nice article, and Paul Elam and Girlwriteswhat have also provided excellent videos on the subject.

So what can I possibly add to the discussion?

The limitation we face doesn't exist with respect to the quality of our arguments. The limitation exists in the values of those with whom we argue, and this is an important distinction to understand. The fundamental problem with addressing this topic is that the discussion occurs across two different value sets. Neither side feels heard after the debate because neither side spoke to the other's values. Thus, any discussion on male reproductive rights is incomplete without deconstructing the value underlying opposition to the topic's validity. Regardless of how well-reasoned an argument, if those judging it have a deeply rooted cultural value or belief related to that argument, it will result in a bias.

All MHRM arguments on male reproductive rights hinge on a value of female responsibility, every single one of them. Our society does not value male reproductive rights simply because it does not value female responsibility. Those arguing against male reproductive rights cannot conceive of such a thing, fundamentally because they cannot conceive of female responsibility.

Female non-responsibility is the embedded bias in those evaluating any MHRM discussion on male reproductive rights, and it is the limiting factor for progress in this area. Structuring better arguments in support of male reproductive rights is therefore irrelevant, because the limiting factor is a culture that does not value or even expect female responsibility.

For those new to the MHRM, we value female responsibility very highly. We believe it is only natural to expect equal responsibility and accountability from men and women. We expect men and women to take responsibility for their choices. We expect them to take responsibility for their safety (no, we don't blame victims), and we expect them to take responsibility for their actions, criminal or otherwise. We view women as human beings possessed of all the same cognitive faculties of higher reasoning as men, and we thus see no reason to hold them to a lower standard of responsibility.

Unfortunately, the overwhelming majority of our society does not share our views. Our society does not believe in female responsibility. Neither traditionalists, nor indeed the vast majority of feminists, believe in female responsibility. The feminists might claim to, but their activism proves otherwise. The part feminism played in entrenching cultural female non-responsibility is something I'll comment on at length in my next article.

As a value, female non-responsibility is pervasive and might well be considered the fuel that feeds our fires, and the light that guides our way. The cultural preeminence of this value would put cold fusion to shame if it could be harnessed as an energy source. It's the psychoactive ingredient that makes the blue pill potent, and it has our society teetering ever more dangerously close to a complete overdose with each passing year.

And at this point, rehab is going to be a bitch.

So it is fully predictable that attempting to promote a human rights agenda that hinges on a value of female responsibility is virtually guaranteed to fail. Depending on our culture to understand arguments that hinge on female responsibility is like depending on the Westboro Baptist Church to understand arguments that hinge on cultural sensitivity. These are non-universal cultural values. Not everyone gets it.

This is made clear by the following unfortunate reality of Western culture. Where male reproductive rights are concerned, our society is faced with a choice between female responsibility and male slavery …

… and it chooses male slavery.

I'm not going to deconstruct any of the most common arguments made against male reproductive rights. If you're interested, watch any of the semiconscious individuals on YouTube espousing these arguments and you'll see the value of female non-responsibility in action.

Among those opposing male reproductive rights, two groups have emerged. Among the first group are those who believe imposing involuntary servitude on a male is preferable to expecting a female to take responsibility for her body and her choice. Among the second group are those who essentially understand this is immoral, but nevertheless view the problem as an irreconcilable paradox because they can't wrap their minds around the concept of female responsibility.

Feminism is to blame for this cultural stupidity, because feminism casts women as an oppressed class of non-responsible victims. With pregnancy seen through this filter, our culture essentially sees a pregnant woman as one who has been victimized, even if the pregnancy was of her own choosing. This effect works in tandem with a "patriarchal" reproductive contract still upon us that takes a dim view of men not "taking responsibility" and providing reproductive security for women.

In other words, feminists have amplified female non-responsibility as a cultural value while holding men to the patriarchal paradigm of hyper-responsibility.

Where reproduction was concerned, the "patriarchy" was fundamentally little more than a social contract between female reproductive power and male labor and productivity. Love was often a catalyst for the acceptance of this contract, but in many cases it was not necessary. This system was designed to deploy male responsibility in the form of productivity, in order to enable female reproductive security during a time when the world was much more dangerous than it is today. By trading his labor, the male was able to reproduce. This reproductive philosophy has served our species for centuries.

The patriarchal paradigm was also one wherein technological limitations meant that sex would result in pregnancy, and pregnancy would result in childbirth. Females, just like males, were responsible for the sex act that bound them to the chain of causation culminating in parenthood. As such*, female responsibility played no uniquely important role in the patriarchal reproductive paradigm*, and their culturally acceptable non-responsibility was never made apparent in matters of reproduction.

A womanizing man was looked upon very dimly, because he was essentially breaking the patriarchal reproductive contract. He was accessing female reproductive power for his own pleasure, without contributing his labor and responsibility as called for in the contract. Don Giovanni from Mozart's famous opera was sent to hell in the finale essentially for engaging in this behavior. Thus, the patriarchal contract always considered it a repugnant act not to provide reproductive security for a pregnant woman.

Modernity arrived and erected three important reproductive boundaries. The first is a boundary separating a sex act and a pregnancy. This boundary is made possible by inexpensive and reliable contraception. The second is a boundary separating a pregnancy from a childbirth. This boundary is made possible by widespread access to safe abortion. The third is a boundary separating childbirth from parenthood. This boundary is made possible by the availability of adoption. In other words, modernity ensured that pregnancy, childbirth, and parenthood would now all be arrived at by choice.

The emergence of these choices, exercised at the discretion of women, meant that female responsibility would play a uniquely important role in the new reproductive paradigm. Unfortunately, as stated above, our society neither values nor particularly expects female responsibility, so females gained reproductive choices while the commensurate responsibilities that would normally accompany those choices remained with males.

The feminist movement purported to move society beyond the patriarchal reproductive contract, but the feminists merely vociferously attacked their own half of the contract while ensuring the other would be enforced. The feminist movement has never fought for female responsibility, but only for female choice. They claimed their choice along with their body, but rejected any accompanying responsibility, and no cultural force expected them to take it. Male responsibility was expected and assumed, and as a result no boundary was made between female reproductive choice and male reproductive responsibility. Thus, our society still uses the patriarchal reproductive contract. Feminists have merely breached the female terms of it.

To put this in perspective, Lindy West's recent tirade about fighting the patriarchy conspicuously left one fundamentally important male rights issue off the list. Care to guess which one? It isn't particularly surprising given what I've just discussed, since feminists are loath to advocate anything that might involve female responsibility.

I'll make the necessary addition to her list, since I'm sure it was just an oversight.

"Feminists don't want men to have to take responsibility for the reproductive decisions of women, the assumption that men are responsible for women's reproductive security is part of patriarchy."

Isn't that right, Lindy?

If "my body, my choice" was to be the paradigm replacing the patriarchal reproductive contract, then it should have followed that a woman would gain the power to choose how to deploy her reproductive power, and a man would gain the power to choose how to deploy his labor. Since our culture doesn't expect female responsibility, however, it simply compels male responsibility and labor in order to facilitate responsibility-free female reproductive choice.

My personal view on this issue is a simple one. Males in this culture can expect reproductive rights when females in this culture are expected to be responsible for their decisions.

Don't hold your breath.

MRA protests prompt Highest Court of India to overturn provisions of VAWA

Anil Kumar · 4 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In a landmark judgement Indian Supreme Court struck down the automatic arrest provision of its Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) and went on to order future action or punishment against Police officials and lower court judges, who violate its order and indulge in automatic arrests of accused men. This is historic, though MRAs want punishment and jail terms for women who lie and make false allegations against their husbands (link).

> The Supreme Court yesterday laid down new directions making police officers and judicial magistrates liable for departmental action and contempt proceedings for making "scurrilous" arrests and ordering "routine" detention under Section 498A of the IPC or under Section 4 of the Dowry Prohibition Act.
> The order said,"The fact that Section 498-A is a cognizable and non-bailable offence has lent it a dubious place of pride amongst the provisions that are used as weapons rather than shield by disgruntled wives. The simplest way to harass is to get the husband and his relatives arrested under this provision."

In last 24 hours, MRAs of various Indian Men's Rights Organisations have participated in more than 10 TV debates.

The Background:

India has two domestic violence laws and both are only meant for women. Feminists say, "there is no need for any protection for male victims of DV." The first criminal law against domestic violence called "Section 498a" was enacted in 1983. If a wife complains of physical and mental harassment by husband, his parents and his sibling, then under this law all the accused are presumed guilty until proven innocent and they are automatically arrested without evidences or investigations by police and sent to prison. The accused often remained in prison until their relatives and lawyers secured bail.

Over years this law has become a weapon in the hands of wives, who extort huge sums of money and property from the husband and his parents. If the husband does not agree to give in to extortionist demands of wife during separation, then she and her lawyers attack him with multiple false cases of domestic violence hoping that fear of arrest or a prolonged costly legal battle will make the man to pay up, getting bankrupt in the process.

According to India's Home Ministry, in last 10 years, more than 300,000 women and 800,000 men were arrested under this law. The women are female relatives of men. Feminists, who claim to be so sympathetic to men and women, vehemently opposed any amendments to this law. In fact, when some judges warned about misuse of this law by women, feminists protested outside their courts and sometimes even ransacked the courts. That was before MRAs came into the scene.

In 2005, India's highest court, the Supreme Court at New Delhi warned of legal terrorism if misuse of this law is stopped. Many MRAs testified in Indian Parliamentary committee hearing to dilute the law and to punish women who file false complaints.

Feminist Rumor Mills:

It is to be noted that the feminist evil empire is too good at manufacturing fake statistics about condition of women in West. However, when its an alien culture located at a geographic distance, they efficiently use cultural, religious differences or even some xenophobia to propagate their lies. This is pathetic. It is a fact that most people in any society are likely to dislike or distrust any foreign culture. Feminists did not leave any stone unturned to continue their anti-male hate agenda across the world. Their leaders met at Beijing in 1995, where Hillary declared, "Women's rights are human rights; and Human Rights are Women's Rights". Naturally men have no place in the human rights dictionary of feminism. After Beijing-95, they used UN CEDAW to push for UN Millennium Development Goals (MDG) to extend the reach of their empire across the world.

> Feminists unlike men do not recognize national borders. Feminism is a monolithic radical religion with a firm belief system, which issues fatwas and even death threats for any dissent or criticism.

Global feminist sisterhood claimed that 25,000 women are murdered by their husbands and their parents every year in India. Media picked up this nonsense. Oprah declared Bangalore as “Bride Burning Capital” of India. All these statistics were manufactured. Media is in any case focused on bad news and when a country is huge with 1.3 billion people, it generates bad news at a much faster rate. What western media failed miserably to mention is, the much lower suicide and murder rates of women in India. If women in India are really subjugated, then how come the suicide and murder rates of women in India are lesser than in many western countries? Often feminists generalized poverty related issues into feminist causes and hijacked funds meant for human rights, starving children and poor for feminist causes. The funds of Oxfam, UNICEF and ActionAID ended up with feminist ideologues and they continued their “patriarchy is evil” narrative, by which they basically meant, “men are evil”.

Feminist Extortion Industry:

In India, the feminists expect men to take care of women financially. That means, feminists want men to buy divorce by paying a huge sums of money to their wives. Often they insist the man’s parents to pay, because they claim it is the duty of the man and his parents to take financial responsibility of the woman.

Recently, feminists got a bill in parliament in which they insisted that if a marriage breaks, court must order the husband to give the wife half of his property inherited or acquired before or during marriage, while the wife gets to keep her property as individual property. Please note this in the background context that 30% of Engineers in India are women.

So, a woman uses these one-sided alimony laws and also multiple false DV cases to financially and mentally ruin a guy and then they turn up at International forums with sob stories.

Truth about Dowry Murders:

Feminists forced Indian Govt to classify any suicides of a woman within 7 years of her marriage as dowry death, if her parents complain. Then, Feminists claimed in the media that husbands are killing their wives for dowry by showcasing this suicide statistic as spousal homicide statistic. Media choose to forget the huge difference between committing suicide and getting murdered. So, 8000 suicides of women in a year are now classified by media as murders by husbands. I can not blame media because the IQ of most journalists is very low in any case and I can only pity these journalists for their pathetic lack of intelligence.

You will find articles in western media like BBC or WSJ that every year 8000 women in India are killed for dowry. The reality is most of these deaths are suicides of women who suffer from mental health ailments. India is one rare country in the world, which punishes men for suicides of their wives and girlfriends. Even here no evidences are needed. A dead woman means jailing of husband and his parents or 6 months to a year. A man goes through hell because he ended up marrying a schizophrenic or bipolar woman. There are Indian MRAs who went to prison after suicides of their wives and the courts found them not guilty after couple of years.

Impact of Global Feminism on India:

Feminists in West convinced the Governments for making radical feminism as a part of foreign policy. If a country wanted to do business with USA, then they are forced to implement dictates of feminist policy makers inside US Govt. The childish foreign policy novices in USA never bothered to see issues of the foreign cultures holistically and they trusted feminists blindly. US directly funded feminists who worked for sustaining “section 498a” in India keeping a blind eye to large scale human rights violations.

> In short, US tax payer’s money was used to fund human rights violations in India.

So, the directive of India's Supreme Court against false domestic violence cases is a slap on the face of global feminist establishment. I am sure, they will soon convene a special session of UN CEDAW somewhere in Europe and many Western Feminists will try to arm twist Indian Govt manipulating paranoid alpha males running Governments.

MRA Street Protests:

When Indian MRAs started protesting against arrests of innocent men and their parents under section 498a in 2005, feminists hoped that MRA organisations will vanish in a year or two. However, when it did not happen, they started to learn to live with existence of MRAs and worked in the background using their influence inside parliament and their foreign funded NGOs. However, MRAs reached out to parliament members as well. So, their evil empire of lies started crumbling. So, the parliament and judiciary started openly speaking about false complaints by women.

Angry Harry on ICMI14

Paul Elam · 5 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As I said in the panel discussion that concluded AVfM's First International Conference on Men's Issues, Angry Harry is the one individual who showed us, long before most ever dreamed of it, just how powerful the Internet would become in the battle to bring consciousness of men's rights into the public arena. He was right as rain, and we all owe him a huge debt for his brilliance and forward thinking.

This makes me especially proud to announce that Harry has begun a regular podcast series on the men's movement, which he plans to do about once every fortnight (for us Texans, that's two weeks).

In this inaugural broadcast, Harry considers the significance of the recent International Conference on Men's Issues, some corrective historical perspective on such a conference, and some invaluable advice for how MRAs can make sure that what happened last week actually becomes a pivotal moment in our history.

I cannot strongly enough suggest that we listen to him, one and all.

Harry's future programs will be available on AVFM's Live 365, our Youtube Channel, and on this website.

At this critical point in our history, it is very encouraging to know that Harry's voice will remain at the core of what we do. PE

Purple Heart's Final Beat

AVfM Video Source · 6 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This award-winning video was shown at the First International Conference on Men's Issues last week, as part of the presentation by Terrence Popp, who co-wrote and co-produced it. Not surprisingly, it received little or no mention by members of the press who covered the event. It kind of puts a damper on their obligatory mocking of "male privilege," and it makes their horrified shrieks of "Mind your tone!" ring a bit hollow. We at AVfM are not fond of trigger warnings for the faint of heart and the politically correct, but for new readers we will say that this video is very difficult to watch.

Why mandatory DNA testing may not be a good idea

Lucian Vâlsan · 6 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> "There are no solutions, only trade-offs."—Thomas Sowell

During the first International Conference on Men's Issues, there were so many ideas thrown around that it is bound to baffle the people who are not familiarized with the non-feminist perspective on sexual politics. There was also dissent. This is good, but it will also mean that in the next months, a lot of people with an open mind will be busy processing new information.

We'll focus on one particular idea that floated around the conference—the proposal that DNA testing (or paternity tests) should be mandatory at birth. According to the proponents of this trade-off, this measure would tackle paternity fraud in an efficient manner and would bring the truth as a standard in the relationships of the parents. The truth part is indisputable, but is it really that efficient? And even if it is, at what cost does this efficiency come? Is there a better trade-off between the status quo and the trade-off proposed at the conference?

Since we're not in the business of criticizing for the sake of criticizing, we'll analyze what's wrong with this trade-off and propose an alternative one.

1. Unnecessary cost

Whenever we talk about a service that is to be made mandatory by public policy, we ought to ask ourselves two questions: What is the cost? and Who pays it?

The cost of a paternity test in Europe varies by country (except for France, where it's de facto illegal). In Switzerland, for instance, a laboratory offers the service at a cost of almost 250€ per child tested[1]. In Britain, the most circulated number in the media for a reliable test is £200 (a little over 250€), while in countries like Romania, such a test costs somewhere around 170€[2]. A particular case is Sweden, where such a test can reach up to over 380€ per child tested[3] and slightly less in Norway. Having said that, it is safe to say that the European average cost for such tests is 250€.

And who is going to pay for the mandatory procedure? If we're going to have the state pay for it, at a rate of 250€/father and child tested, the UK government, for instance, is in big trouble since Britain is going through a baby boom at this point, with 813,000 births recorded in 2012[4], which would mean over 203 million euros on this issue alone. Would British taxpayers be willing to fund that? Some media outlets are crying that the state spends too much now on paternity tests, although the actual amount is around 500,000€ per year[5]. Even for Germany, the country with the lowest birthrate in Europe, such an effort would still mean over 165 million euros[6] to cover their over 660,000 births yearly.

In a period when the governments are running out of money, it's highly unlikely that such a cost could be set on the governments of Europe.

If we don't put the burden of paying on the state, then we have to put it on the parents somehow.

Considering that in Germany, for instance, 250€ represents more than a quarter of many Germans' net income, can we seriously expect single-earner families to spend that much money on information that they might not need?

The situation is even worse in countries like Czech Republic, where the gross minimum wage is beneath 330€ per month[7]—which means that the net income is even lower than that. The point is that even in affluent areas of Europe, this would still be a significant cost imposed on all individuals who choose to become parents and in less affluent areas, it might prove to be a disaster.

2. Is the information really so relevant?

For tricked fathers, there is no doubt that the information really is more than relevant. But does this justify an imposition of a cost upon all parents?

The data on rates of paternity fraud is scarce and unreliable to say the least. But there is one thing that everyone agrees on: paternity fraud accounts for a minority of births.

The most scary numbers say that 30% of children have a different father than the one listed on the birth certificate, whilst the most conservative numbers go for one child in every classroom.

In other words, in the majority of cases, or dare I say, in the overwhelming majority of the cases, mothers and fathers get along with each other and are generally truthful. This is a fact observable no matter who you're talking to—even the most hardcore radical feminists acknowledge this, albeit grudgingly, since they tend to resent this reality.

Having acknowledged this reality, is it really efficient to put everyone through the hassle just to get an accurate statistic?

3. Difficulties in implementation

Since we're talking about a compulsory procedure, this means that there needs to be a way to enforce it. And with that comes a huge list of problems.

A significant number of births don't take place in state hospitals in Europe. A third of Dutch women give birth at home[8], and whilst some countries, like Hungary for instance, tried to make home births illegal, the European Court of Human Rights struck down and insisted upon the unalienable right to give birth at home[9]. Since these births occur at home, these are the parents least likely to be willing to abide by this mandatory procedure.

And how would it be enforced? Using the carrot or the stick? If it were state-funded, a carrot would be possible, but that would add to the already high and unbearable cost mentioned earlier. Also, it would turn out to be another monument of inefficiency since the state has proven time and time again how ineffective it can be when it comes to processing applications for pretty much anything.

If it were paid by the parents, the stick seems more appropriate. But how far should the stick go? A fine? And how big should that fine be? Not to mention that most civil fines like these can be relatively easy to avoid in most European countries and in a perfectly legal way.

Also, if the law is too tough (e.g., involving the local versions of Child Protective Services), families would rightfully protest the mandate for being way too intrusive.

4. Denial of choice

There are such cases when the father listed on the birth certificate knows he isn't the father yet assumes paternity anyway for whatever reasons. I know of such a case when the biological father died in some NATO war. And it's a certainty that such cases exist all over the world.

Now, I would never advise in good conscience any man to do such a thing, especially not in Europe or North America, but, on the other hand, responsible adults ought to have the right to make that choice, especially if it suits the needs of the child as well.

If this mandate were implemented, these men would then be put through the long and excruciating process of adoption, which, thanks to the countless moratoria put in place by the European Union, can take years for no reason whatsoever other than inefficient bureaucracy (if you pardon my pleonasm).

A better trade-off: Limited mandate and more freedom

A better trade-off would be to mandate the procedure only when it comes to child support payments. It only makes sense that if you are to force a man to pay child support, you should be damn sure that you get the right man, not just any random bloke who was unfortunate to be at the wrong place at the wrong time—like the few horrible cases presented at the conference. In these cases, if the wrong man is indicated, the test should be paid by the mother (not like the case today in Britain, where the state pays if the mother indicates the wrong man), and if the correct father is indicated, the test should be paid by him.

But other than this particularly narrow situation, paternity tests should be a negative right—that is to say, the state ought not to impede a man or a woman from seeking a paternity test. This is the case in present-day Bosnia, where suspecting mothers and grandmothers are seeking paternity tests as they fear that their sons/grandsons have been duped into raising a child that is not theirs[10].

In other words, any restriction on paternity tests should be abolished. It is really a shame that a country like France outright bans paternity tests, and it is also particularly dubious when some countries require "consent of the mother" for getting a paternity test, thus creating an inherent conflict of interest within the law favoring women who do commit paternity fraud. Also, the time limits for seeking a paternity test for contesting an assigned legal paternity should also be abolished. A paternity test should be admissible in court regardless of whether the child is 3 months old or 17 years old.

With this trade-off, only those interested in the topic would bear the cost without burdening everyone else. Also, the choices remain in place for individuals who want to make them (see argument no. 4), the difficulties in implementation would be severely reduced, and the costs associated would also be far more affordable for most governments.

Also, the law ought to reflect paternity fraud as a more serious crime than it is now. For starters, a mother guilty of paternity fraud should be mandated to pay reparations to the man defrauded.

This trade-off isn't perfect either—that's why it's a trade-off and not a solution. Under this arrangement, there would still be individuals who would trick the system, but the cost for the taxpayer and for the victims is far lower than it is under the status quo in Europe and undoubtedly far-far lower than the status quo in the US.

We live in an imperfect world and sometimes bad people do bad things—but the way to correct this is not by imposing an additional cost upon the majority of people who do not do bad things.

Is the DoubleTree Downtown Hilton Dangerously Negligent, or Just a Bunch of Scheming Liars?

Paul Elam · 6 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The First International Conference on Men's Issues, at least the one for 2014, has come and gone without significant incident. In fact, it was an astounding success. It may well prove to be the seminal moment for the men's rights movement for many years to come.

No thanks to the DoubleTree Downtown Hilton in Detroit, Michigan, where the event was first scheduled to take place. In fact, as it turns out, we were able to have the event, complete with a stellar lineup of speakers and a bevy of media coverage, despite the best efforts of the DoubleTree to undermine what we were doing.

Yes, I mean that literally.

Prior to the event going off without a hitch in St. Clair Shores, a quiet and friendly suburb of Detroit, there were rumors and questions flying across the Internet and the mainstream media about why a change in venue was necessary. It was a complicated affair that we could not take the time to adequately (or prudently) address while scrambling to find another place to hold the event — and accomplish the almost endless tasks associated with making that happen.

Today things are much more relaxed.

While there are still some questions that remain unanswered, primarily because of a lack of transparency from the DoubleTree Downtown Hilton, we have been able to narrow down events to the two most likely scenarios based on what evidence we have.

One is that the Hilton got serious about "escalating" death threats against their employees, guests, ICMI speakers, and attendees, prompting them to go into emergency mode and invoke the security clause of our contract with them. Their demands forced us to raise tens of thousands of additional dollars to literally blanket the event with Detroit police, just to make sure no one wound up dead.

In fact, below is the unedited letter from DoubleTree General Manager Shannon Dunavent explaining the impending dangers and need to secure immediate police protection for all concerned.

That would be the same police that they had not even bothered to call at that point. It is the same police that did not even know about any supposed threats when we called them to inquire; the same police that the DoubleTree used to attempt to shake us down but neglected to even call until after they engaged in an attempt to force us to spend our way out of having our conference.

It was like the following series of events occurred, by the DoubleTree Downtown Hilton's own admissions. A conference was scheduled, death threats were made against all involved including Hilton staff, the Hilton sprung into action and called their own lawyers, started a shakedown attempt on AVfM, and then figured out they might want to let police know there was danger afoot.

It must be noted that during this supposed threat, while Hilton management was fully aware that a sitting senator was scheduled to speak in one of their conference rooms, said senator's office was never notified of any looming threat. In fact, they were not notified by the Hilton of anything at all.

That is one scenario, the best case of which implies such negligence and greed on the part of Hilton management that they were more interested in security clauses than security itself, and they were willing to put the life of a senator at risk to prove it.

The other possible scenario is that what the DoubleTree Downtown Hilton got was a couple of irate phone calls from privileged little college girls who don't want men and women to talk without their permission, and with the help of a sympathetic general manager in the middle of labor problems with the hotel's union, it was decided to use those decidedly nonthreatening contacts to breach their contract with us and keep protesters away from their hotel.

Either possibility leaves the DoubleTree Downtown Hilton Detroit looking scummy, and for damned good reasons.

Mind you, during all this likely concocted nonsense on the part of the Hilton, we were urgently trying to meet the security clause requirements. As it turned out, the only way to do that [hire the Detroit Police Department for the event] was through one contract company that happened to be located in the Houston area.

The Hilton did not tell us this, of course, and sent us directly to the Detroit Police Department, wasting valuable time and effort on our part.

We finally did locate the company we had to do business with, and a very nice lady there was preparing a quote for us when, lo and behold, in the middle of that process, she informed us that her boss had instructed her not to do business with us. Yes, we have that on a recorded phone call, which will be the subject of another (of many) future articles on our dealings with the DoubleTree Downtown Hilton in Detroit, Michigan.

So, as it turns out, while in the middle of meeting the security demands of the Hilton, someone stepped in to sabotage that, making it literally impossible for us to comply, giving the Hilton the excuse to pull the plug.

Gee, wonder who was behind that?

Coincidentally, and because things were starting to stink a bit, we were already exploring options that would serve as an alternative venue (and that, unlike the Hilton, honestly represented the seating capacity of their conference rooms). As those who attended know, it turned out for the better.

Below you will find all the documentation associated with this double fiasco, including the letters from the Hilton in their entirety, and the letter from our attorneys.

A note for Hilton lawyers: I am aware that there is a clause in our contract for the event that prohibited AVfM from publishing your communications with us. In fact, when we still entertained the silly idea that you were being forthcoming and trustworthy, we removed a letter from you from this site that we had published in order to be in compliance with our agreed terms.

You fucked that up when you sabotaged our agreement and breached our contract in decidedly bad faith. The letter is being reposted, without being redacted of names, and it is not going to be taken down. You are welcome to attempt legal measures to force our hand at that. We will be happy to sort that out with you in court, and look forward to the routine discovery that will reveal evidence that your invoking the security clause of our contract was not a fraudulent ruse.

In the meantime, we hope this story serves as a lesson, particularly to those in the political arena. If you want to stay somewhere that might actually have your security in mind, you might be better off staying at a Motel 6.

Enjoy Your Feminist Wedding, Laura Bates

August Løvenskiolds · 7 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The founder of the incredibly man-hating and man-silencing website Everyday Sexism, one "Laura Bates," is planning a feminist wedding. Oh, joy, and my deepest condolences to her spouse, whomever he is—Bates is being coy about naming her victim, though indeed, grooms are mostly superfluous to modern-day weddings anyway.

To celebrate her special day, Bates is not content to demonize and demolish, in an abstract way, men and male sexuality in general and the civilization men built at the behest of women: she has decided that the personal is political and so she plans to enslave, torture, and destroy one exceedingly unlucky bloke in order to reify the feminist inclination to exterminate the patriarchy that feeds, clothes, and shelters her from the hazards of the world.

Now, weddings are steeped in what feminists call "traditional gender roles," even though it is women (and not men) who slavishly enforce those roles. Let's see how well this prominent feminist "walked the walk" of feminism in bringing equality into her wedding and compare hers with that of another beloved feminist, Jessica Valenti.

The Proposal

When, say, fellow man-hater Jessica Valenti was selecting her future cuckold, Andrew, there was no romantic evening, no bent knee indicating the subservience of men to women. Oh, no—as Valenti relates, it was the most unromantic, bloodless proposal ever: "The problem is that there is no proposal story to tell. At least, not the kind most people expect. There were no rose petals scattered on a satin-sheeted [sic] bed, no trips to the Eiffel tower, no ring hidden in a champagne glass. There wasn't even any kneeling. My partner Andrew and I made the leap in the way that suited us best—we talked about it, and jointly decided that we should get engaged."

Laura Bates, however, rejected this loveless farce for a more traditional, supposedly feminist script: "My [nameless] boyfriend kept his grandmother's engagement ring hidden away in a box of cufflinks for months, then made a spur-of-the-moment decision to offer it to me buried in a bowl of popcorn. This would have been romantic except that, in his panic, he chucked the whole lot in, box and all. The result was less pleasant surprise, more genuine bafflement: 'What are your cufflinks doing in the popcorn?'"

Ignoring the obvious charm of popping the question with a charm in the popcorn, and the practicality of avoiding a broken tooth, the Valenti and Bates proposals illustrate the meaningless, nihilistic delusions of feminism—Bates's feminism is a kind of goofy traditionalism while Valenti's feminism erases all feeling and passion from pair-bonding and sexuality. Given the choice between two contradictory bullshit options, it is no wonder that smart men are resisting proposing marriage to entitled harpies like those in this coven.

The Dress

Having lived with Mr. Anonymous Master for five years, Bates was acutely aware that she was undeserving of a white dress symbolizing purity/virginity. But consistent with her brand of feminism that emphasizes the importance of celebrating female narcissism, she opted for the traditional white gown anyway.

Valenti, by contrast and in a slight and unusual bit of honestly, rocked her inner slut with an "off-white" dress.

Both feminists, it seems, will kind of, maybe, fight patriarchal traditions with all the vigor of a dead fish when it comes to their own sartorial elegance, meaning that, despite their rhetorical lies, one should never underestimate the power of a feminist to exploit traditional roles to harvest money from men to buy shoes and wear-once clothing.

The Planning

Bates insisted that, contrary to tradition, Mr. Anonymous Master would be forced into participating in the planning of the nuptials, a task traditionally dominated by the bride. Despite this, in her article she could point to no examples of any input he had or decisions he made about the wedding itself. Now, this contradiction is a key component of the feminist penchant for avoiding responsibility—if her wedding went smoothly, Bates could bask in her success and deny his help, but if something went awry, she could deflect blame onto Mr. Anonymous, even though his involvement in the actual planning was a complete sham.

Valenti, likewise, insisted that "Andrew took a renewed interest in his wedding-planning tasks, recognising that it wasn't just important for the sake of my sanity, but as a political statement too." But also like Bates, Valenti was silent on Andrew's actual contributions to the planning, if any—but she was NOT silent on usurping his areas of responsibility: "From the beginning, Andrew and I agreed that we would not be one of those couples in which the woman ends up doing all of the wedding-related work because she is the person who is supposed to care about it the most. No, we were going to do this fairly. He would take care of booking the music, I would handle the flowers. I would cover the invite list, he would deal with the invitations. Several months later, when I found myself up to my eyeballs in sample invitations and band websites—while Andrew read the newspaper or dallied online—I was ready to throw in the towel on so-called domestic bliss."

And, of course, both feminists wound up completely supporting traditional gender roles—because that is the very point of feminism. Valenti was already planning her divorce.

The Flowers

Flowers are beautiful, sometimes breathtaking. They are also the sliced-off sexual organs of plants and thus are still appropriate at even a feminist wedding, I guess. Bates made sure that a feminist "female" symbol ♀ (Alt-12 on most keyboards) was festooned with floral pudenda (Latin for "to be ashamed") during the photo-shoot for her feminist wedding article.

And yes, Bates did plan to toss the bouquet to all the single folks, men and women alike: "I shall simply chuck the flowers in the air and the boys will be under clear instructions to join in. I want an undignified non-gender-specific scrum." I'm sure no inappropriate groping occurred during said scrum because, you know, that would be Everyday Sexism—oh, and she throws like a girl too.

Valenti's own floral plans were unclear—perhaps Amanda Marcotte munched them down before the formal tossing commenced and Marcotte galloped off.

The Names

The closest Bates comes to naming her new domestic slave is when she relates that they considered portmanteau names "Baylor" and "Tates," which means the poor lad's most likely surname is "Taylor," something Bates never discloses explicitly, effectively erasing his identity. The putative Master Taylor considered taking her name "Bates" as his last name, but "Master Bates" would be a bit awkward for some odd reason. In the end, they took each other's names as middle names, salvaging a bit of Master Bates's dwindling masculinity.

Valenti kept her own last name—even nominal symbols of marital commitment are anathema to her feminism.

In Conclusion

There were LOTS of other traditionalist "misogynist" features to their "feminist" weddings, but really, what can we learn from all this?

When it comes to making a real commitment, either to feminism or to their husbands, both Bates and Valenti come up wanting. They both managed to turn their weddings into feminist shams worthy of the same respect due campus sexual assault claims.

When it comes to marrying feminists, the only good answer is this: Refuse at all costs.

Unprofessional "reporting" from TIME Magazine's Jessica K. Roy

Tom Golden · 7 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: When Time magazine contacted us for interviews and free passes to the First International Conference on Men's Issues, we expected what we have always known of Time magazine: mature, professional reporting. Sure, errors, mistakes, misunderstandings, and bias are all possible, maybe even unavoidable—but mature, professional journalists and their editors know how to try to correct for that, or at least to admit to possible problems. Well, we did see mature, professional reporting from several outlets—indeed, we were impressed by many of the journalists who attended for their neutral and sometimes quite challenging but professional questions. But three reporters—Adam Serwer of MSNBC, Jessica K. Roy of Time magazine, and Monica Hesse of The Washington Post*—showed a gross lack of professionalism, and a level of misreporting, well beyond what can be excused as just misunderstandings or having a bad day. These three reporters—and really, it was mostly just these three—fulfilled the worst fears of the women and men who were part of this conference: that we would be subjected to yellow journalism, hostility, and lies from the media.*

If reporters sensed uneasiness, fear, and even hostility from some of the attendees, they can look to these reporters as proof of the sort of yellow journalism those of us in the men's human rights community have learned through painful experience to expect.

These three "journalists" didn't do their jobs at all. They wrote not reports but opinion-laced editorials disguised as reporting. Although all were forced to admit that we raised legitimate issues—which we view as a sign of progress in a deeply misandrist culture—they could neither restrain their emotional reactions to hearing their personal worldviews challenged nor do the job a reporter is supposed to do: accurately and in an unbiased-as-possible fashion report what was said and happened at an event they were supposed to be covering.

We will be profiling the misreporting of these three journalists over the next week or so. We were planning on tackling the grossly unprofessional Adam Serwer first, who was so rage-filled and irrational some attendees were actually afraid he might start throwing punches, but then psychotherapist Tom Golden got ahead of us and wrote this piece on Jessica K. Roy before we'd finished our piece on Serwer. But it appears that Serwer is friends with Jessica Roy, and they were likely collaborating on mutual hit pieces, so maybe it works out okay to start with Roy. (To see some of Jessica K. Roy's astonishing tweets from the conference, including collaboration with Serwer and others, click here and here.)

Golden's article below is correct about the unprofessional misreporting of Jessica K. Roy of Time magazine, though he misses a few of the inaccurate statements she made to a national audience. For example, Roy claims we had "nearly 150" in attendance when it was actually more than 250, a much higher figure than we had expected when we started planning for what we thought would be a small first-time event. Roy also claims there were a "small number" of women when actually women made up a large number of attendees, many of them women with literally decades of experience in working on these issues; how does Roy think this compares with the average feminist event, especially the feminist events that frequently choose to deliberately exclude men? Why would she marginalize these women, many of them with decades of experience in advocating for men's and boys' issues? She repeats by calling the women a "small fraction," in an obvious effort to marginalize or silence women's voices when those women do not share the mean-spirited, petty prejudices of Jessica K. Roy.

In her second paragraph, Roy says she expected to hear that "Sure, women may have once been unequal, they say, but not anymore and not by a long shot." This already exposes Roy's bias walking in; most of us believe that women and men have both always had it tough, each with privileges and rights that the other sex did not have, and that merely stating that women got the short end of the stick is always problematic when you don't acknowledge where men got the short end of the stick historically. This is something numerous presenters noted: Canadian Senator Anne Cools, our opening speaker, did a masterful job of listing the special privileges and protections women have enjoyed over the centuries, well before anyone had heard of anything called "feminism." Did Roy miss that presentation, or just choose not to listen to it? (You can listen to it in its entirety right here). Had Roy actually talked to any of us in-depth, or paid attention to the presentations instead of busily playing with her phone, tweeting, texting, and Facebooking (which is what we witnessed her doing much of the time during presentations), she would have known that.

Like the even more egregiously unprofessional Adam Serwer, Roy repeats Erin Pizzey's claim that we are fighting an "evil empire" without bothering to ask Pizzey, or anyone else, what she meant by that. Had she, or Serwer, or any of the other reporters done their jobs, they would have challenged that phrasing during the conference and asked for an explanation. They would have received a direct answer too: it's about the literally billions of dollars that flow into ideological feminist organizations worldwide, including not only Women's Studies departments in universities but frequently the many government-funded services that claim to help victims of domestic violence and sexual assault but that actually offer ideological indoctrination and often marginalize and/or victim-blame males instead. Indeed, we could have named names and given specific examples of organizations—and we will, in upcoming articles. We would have also pointed out that these days this "evil empire" includes not only wealthy feminist organizations and activists but also non-ideological corrupt lawyers and judges and court officials. But neither Serwer nor Roy even thought to ask such incredibly obvious questions; they chose instead to have an emotional reaction to words they didn't like and scoff like immature teenagers.

Roy also complains that she felt unwelcome by some of the male attendees. She doesn't mention that she was felt unwelcome by many female attendees too, who noticed her unprofessional demeanor and her bizarre tweets during the conference—which many of us were watching, as she made them in the middle of presentations she was supposed to be paying attention to.

Tom Golden does touch upon what is probably Jessica K. Roy's most egregiously inaccurate statement, which I'll elaborate on here: Roy shows a slide used by Dr. Tara Palmatier that reads, "Quit objectifying me! You're being rapey!" and calls this "a clear nod to the belief that a woman's attire and behavior are causal factors of sexual assault."

In fact, let's state it plainly: this isn't just inaccurate. It's hateful. Jessica K. Roy, you printed an outright lie to readers you had a duty to give the facts to. To a national audience. You owe your readers, and Dr. Palmatier, a retraction and an apology. So do your editors. Anyone who gives a damn about truthful reporting can go right to this presentation and watch: Dr. Palmatier was clearly talking about narcissism as a growing problem, and the double-standards in how we view the sexuality of men and women. She was showing a typical Tumblr-feminist-type meme and selfie. And in reality, Dr. Palmatier has made it clear repeatedly that she hates the shallow word "rapey," which has been invented by, and is used frequently by, Tumblr and Twitter feminists. The word is stupid and loathsome—and it is of feminist origin.

And by the way, did Jessica K. Roy ask Dr. Palmatier about that slide, or any of the other slides she used? No. We already asked: Jessica K. Roy did not ask Dr. Palmatier any questions–about this or anything else. Neither did her friend Adam Serwer. Do you spot a pattern here?

Finally, Roy mentions "large-scale rage campaigns full of name-calling, threats and crusades to get them fired," supposedly by men's rights activists. Actually, Ms. Roy, in our experience, it is feminists who spend the most time threatening people and trying to get them fired; I myself get death threats and threat-oids routinely (I collect them now and keep them in a special folder). And I know more than one men's rights activist who's been hunted down, doxxed, harassed, and gotten fired by feminist activists. I repeat: more than one. Did you think to ask about that either? No, we don't think you did. But, please, let us know if we've got you wrong.

Yet we suspect that Jessica K. Roy and her followers will somehow, in some way, claim that even our writing about her misreporting is "threatening" and "harassment." It's what we in the men's human rights community call "Damsel in Distress" syndrome; it's not how mature, professional adults act, but let's see if it's how Roy responds to being called out for lying to her readers.

For the record, Jessica K. Roy will not be welcome at any future events hosted by A Voice for Men, and if she appears, she will be asked to leave. That will stand as a lifelong ban unless and until we get a retraction and an apology for her lack of professionalism and her betrayal of the editors and readers of Time.

Anyway, beyond all that, here's Tom Golden's very reasonable analysis of Jessica K. Roy of Time magazine's recent misadventure in shoddy journalism.—DE

"Crass ideological opponents"
"Paranoia and vitriol"
"Violent Internet histories"
"A palpable distaste for women"
These men laugh at rape jokes.
Describing a Saturday Night Live sketch as if it attacked our beliefs—when it addressed none of our beliefs at all
Mentioning mass murderer Elliot Rodger

These are things Jessica Roy used in describing the International Conference on Men's Issues and its readers and editors in her Time magazine article.

She went as far as describing a point during the conference when she got the vapors and had to leave the building! Interesting that she doesn't tell us what content gave her this vaporous experience, nor does she tell us when and if she returned.

Here's the way her article starts:

> I went to the conference in suburban Detroit expecting a group of feminist-hating Internet trolls; I found much more.

It is clear that Roy had very strong preconceived ideas about this conference prior to even setting foot in the venue. In other words, she was prejudiced. In her mind, she seems to have thought that these were her enemies, these were violent and vitriolic opponents who said things so vile that she had to leave the building. It's little wonder that her article is desperately biased as she clings to her outdated, half-the-story ideological-feminist indoctrination.

Roy peppered the article with examples of how men are indeed in need of services at times but implied that the "paranoid" and "vitriolic" leadership was not doing a good job of getting them the help they need. Presumably, from her perspective, the conference also failed in that regard.

At some points during the article Roy related content from the conference and then immediately offered a refutation. In most good reporting, I have seen the reporter report what transpired and then, when it is an important point, seek out other expert opinions as a counterpoint to help the reader see both sides. In Roy's case, most of the time she simply saw herself as the expert and worked to refute the claims of the conference speakers. This shows us clearly that this was personal to her; she wanted to refute what was being said. There was "her side" and then the side she was writing about. Her stance as a journalist was biased and far from neutral.

A very strong indicator of her defensiveness and brittle worldview:

> Still, being surrounded by men who belly-laughed at rape jokes and pinned evil elements of human nature wholesale on women was emotionally taxing at best and self-destructive at worst. Once, during a particularly upsetting segment of the program, I had to excuse myself from the auditorium to seek refuge on the bug-filled bank of Lake St. Clair. I kept wondering why I had volunteered to fly 600 miles to attend the conference alone, to surround myself not just with crass ideological opponents, but with people with violent Internet histories who believed my very existence oppressed them. But to emerge on the other side of this with both my sanity and a worthwhile story, I would have to actually adopt a > grain of their advice. I would have to stop feeling like a victim, and in turn cast aside all of the humiliating and unfair and devastating experiences I had collected as a woman.

Of course "belly-laughs at rape jokes" were hardly the norm for anyone there, and all evil elements of human nature were not pinned wholesale on women; women were just held to be as culpable as men by most of the presenters. And men must not experience humiliating and unfair and devastating experiences as men just because they couldn't immediately rattle them off for her when prompted.

As an example of the distorted lens Roy sees things through, when Dr. Tara Palmatier showed a slide in a presentation on clinical narcissism, rather than trying to understand or to expand on what Dr. Palmatier was saying about it, Roy decided instead to try to disprove the assertions of Dr. Palmatier without discussion, by claiming it was about how attire causes rape. This is the work not of a journalist but of an ideologue trying to promote their own view of the world. Give them an alternative viewpoint and they go bonkers.

The question does arise: Why would Time magazine send a reporter who was so biased and closed-minded to cover this conference? Maybe like sending an "earth is the center of the universe" proponent to cover a Copernicus news conference. What would you expect from that? Then again, maybe Time doesn't hire unbiased reporters anymore?

Time magazine is not the only culprit here. The Washington Post also sent a reporter who had strong biases and training that focused more on women's issues and had left out men and boys. The article she wrote is not unlike Roy's. It's biased. Both were obviously steeped in the wrong-headed, half-truth feminist dogma that has been the default of the media for many years. If only either could have listened carefully to the presentations they might have seen the damage their thinking and writing has been doing. Compare either of these articles with this USA Today story on the conference. Note the contrast and that it lacks the bitter hatefulness seen in the other two.

My wife, who attended the conference and is sympathetic to the views expressed at the conference but who could not be described as an "activist," read the Time magazine article and said, "It's hard to believe that she related in the article the way she did. It is just bizarre … her perceptions of the situation, it's way off base."

I must wholeheartedly agree, having been there myself.

Now it's your turn. All of the presentations at the conference are now online and linked below and free for viewing. Have a look and decide for yourself whether you agree with my wife or with Jessica Roy. I am betting strongly on my wife.

DAY ONE

- Senator Ann Cools
- Erin Pizzey
- Tara Palmatier, PhD
- Mike Buchanan
- Fred Jones
- Barbara Kay
- Tom Golden
- Paul Elam
- Special Thanks & Awards Dinner

DAY TWO

- Warren Farrell, PhD
- Karen Straughan
- Carnell Smith

- Robert Franklin
- Terrence Popp
- Stefan Molyneux
- Activism Panel Discussion

C'mon, Paul, What Do You Do With the Money?

Paul Elam · 7 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

With the rumor mill turning these days, I felt it was a good time to make a statement about AVFM finances. It will be easier to link to this than to answer individual questions all over the internet that are popping up.

I am going to cover two areas. One, the finances of the conference (in particular the fundraiser for security), and two, a general overview of AVFM finances.

Regarding the conference, as most know we originally scheduled to have the event at the Downtown Doubletree Detroit Hilton, but were hit with an irrational, unsupported and malicious demand for additional security coverage shortly prior to the event.

Read about it here.

A subplot to this story is that during the lead-up to the event we discovered that Hilton had severely misrepresented the seating capacity of their conference room, resulting in further problems for us.

We had a crowd source fundraiser to cover the security costs, and also engaged simultaneously in exploring other venues because of capacity issues.

At the time we did the fundraiser (with the idea in mind that it was likely going to be at Hilton) we asked for funds and promised donors that it would be spent on police, additional legal costs and that any amount raised above that would be set aside for the next conference.

Many of you reading this made that fundraiser a smashing success.

Ultimately, we ended up at the VFW Hall in St. Clair Shores, where we hired four police officials (three officers and one supervisor) for coverage of the entire event and also hired a local attorney, paying his retainer in advance. We also had to engage our regular attorney, and have not yet been billed for their services.

In effect, we spent the money raised on precisely what we said we would spend it on, and have set aside what little remained for the next conference.

It turned out to be a good choice. We wanted a venue that would meet our seating requirements and that would not run the games on us that Hilton ran, and we got great police protection as well as legal representation locally.

We had a wonderful and successful conference, even though it required additional expenses like all the transportation we ran around the clock from airport to hotel to venue to back.

So where did the money go? Right where I said it would.

Now, speaking to the issue of AVFM finances generally (got your miner's light switched on, David?).

I am the sole proprietor of A Voice for Men. It is my intellectual as well as personal property. Every dollar donated goes right into my pocket. I spend that money on this website and on activist efforts at my own discretion, considering the opinions of the AVFM management team that volunteers to help run this place.

The way I look at it is that the donations are given freely by people who get a really great website (that they could just get for free) and who believe that I use this operation to further issues that they think are important to them.

It is a strictly voluntary arrangement. I don't accept paid advertising (so I never have to worry about depending on sponsors). I depend on the site for my living, and to do as much FTSU as possible while I am at it.

So far, it has worked very well. The generous donors to the site have believed in me enough to support this place into becoming a major online publication as well as an arm of activism unlike anything ever seen before.

The only suggestion I can make for those who do not find that to be an acceptable arrangement is to not donate.

And still I hope they feel free to benefit from the site content as well as our collective work as activists.

But I do not, nor will I ever, make my personal finances a matter of public record.

I have that policy for a number of reasons. One good example is going on right now. I have recently encountered about 10 “MHRAs” most all with new accounts, who are “concerned” about the “lack of financial transparency” about the conference and about AVFM in general.

I know if I put all my personal accounts online, you could multiply those “concerned MHRAs” by a hundred. Hell, an act that stupid on my part might cause Manboobz himself to become an instant concerned MHRA.

And then there is the media. Consider the following exchange I had with one of the dumpster divers from MSNBC.

[image]
Click to enlarge
There is a message about all of this in my blunt response.

Click to enlarge
So here is the rub, folks. At the end of each day, even with the incredible levels of help I get from people like Dean Esmay, David King, Al Martin and every one of the incredible people who work at AVFM, I am still target number one. I am a target for feminists posing as concerned MHRAs, yellow hacks like David Futrelle, and a target for many in the media who would love nothing better than to publish my personal financial information after putting their disgusting spin on it.

I have to bear the brunt of this stuff, so I am going to be the one who makes the calls on what personal information, including income from this website, is divulged to the public.

I have to count on the complete trust of people who support AVFM financially, and I don’t hesitate to say that I know I have earned it a few times over.

Again, if anyone feels like I am a bad investment, then I certainly respect that choice. I don’t seek to change anyone’s mind.

I do think, however, that my financial supporters, especially those who are new and may have questions, do deserve to hear directly from me precisely why I run things the way I do. I will leave it up to them to decide if what I and the rest of the AVFM team provide is worth it.

That is my last word on AVFM and money.

Well, except to say we have still a couple of days left in the current quarterly fundraiser and have not quite made goal yet. Your help, should you decide to give it, is greatly appreciated.

I am Chris Mackney and I have something to say from the grave

Christopher Mackney · 8 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: Christopher Mackney died by suicide on December 29, 2013. Suicide, though, as we examine the details of his life and death, seems an inadequate, even misleading word. In Chris's reality, stated with clarity in his own words, he was murdered; driven to be the triggerman in his own homicide by a vicious and vindictive wife who used a corrupt family court system, family money and an equally vicious attorney to reduce him to such despair that death became the only visible escape from his unbearable pain.

That, at least, is Chris Mackney's version of events, which he documented on a blog from the onset of hostilities against him to the final day of his life.

It is a story that his widow, Dina Mackney, clearly did not want told. Literally chasing him into the grave, she made underhanded use of copyright laws to commandeer the writing Chris wanted so desperately for the world to see, disassembled his blog, and then again used her attorneys to try to bully others into complicity with her wishes to bury him a second time.

A Voice for Men was one of the targets of that legal harassment, receiving a demand to remove a portion of Chris Mackney's suicide note which we had published.

There was never a question of our refusal to comply. What kind of Voice for Men could we possibly be, if we indulged such a dastardly agenda?

We refused to remove the post, and we pledged at that time that AVFM would not let this man's story be buried, either by the apathy of a society that cares little for the pain of men, or by agents of evil seeking to hide their misdeeds from public view.

Today, we start making good on that promise.

Following is Chris Mackney's suicide note in its entirety. It was the last blog entry he made. We will not allow Chris Mackney to be silenced. In fact, we are making it our mission that more people will see his words than he ever would have been able to on his own.

This disgrace of a story will not end according to the designs of those who caused it to happen. PE

I never wanted to speak out about any of this. All I wanted was a fair and reasonable child support, fair and reasonable visitation with my children and be free to move on with my life. The only reason I chose to write a blog and speak out about the abuse was because I thought it would give me some kind of leverage, as I had none.

I made it clear to my ex- wife's attorney that the family court was not allowing me to change the orders, I had no information about my children and my child support was far beyond my ability to pay.

I was hoping for some act of good faith to let me know that they wanted to reduce the conflict. It never came, not in 5 years. I felt that my only recourse was to speak out about the abuse and injustice in order to get the legal and psychological help I needed to manage the conflict, so that we could both parent our children. I reached out to my ex- wife's attorney again to ask for ANY other alternative.

They offered none, so I started the blog. Even after I started my Blog, I reached out again to tell them I would take down the blog if a Guardian Ad Litem could be appointed for my children. They never responded. Dina knew this would be the outcome and didn't care. As long as I was gone and out of the children's lives.

In hindsight, I recognize that my reactions to being bullied, abused and denied access to my children gave my ex-wife's attorney the ammunition they were looking for to bring me into Court, but nothing I said or done would have made a difference. I was powerless. I thought that at some point a third party would be involved that would recognize that my reactions were from the emotional abuse; being denied access to my children and bullied in Court. The Court refused at least six requests for third party intervention. All of the research said that a third party was the recommended course of action in these situations. A third party was the only way to truly understand the conflict.

I was not the person being portrayed in family court. I had no control over anything. The Court would only listen to my ex- wife's attorney granting all of their motions and agreeing to all their "over reaching" remedies.

When I read online about the patterns of behavior of high conflict divorce and how my ex-wife was the one blocking access to the children and negatively interpreting everything I did, I spoke out and tried to address the source of conflict. No one would tell me I was wrong, but no one would speak out about the abuse on my behalf, not the Doctors or attorneys. Experts in psychology have called it abuse, but none would make such a 'diagnosis', which I could then take to Court to obtain relief. As long as the pattern of behavior was not called 'abuse', my reactions would not be viewed in its proper context by the Court.

The way I looked at it was that if I remained silent, the abuse would continue. It did. When I finally decided to speak out, they didn't care.

They didn't care about how it would affect Dr. Samenow, Judge Bellows, our children, themselves or anyone else. They were not going to take their foot off the back of my neck.

They were fully invested in having me out of my children's lives, permanently. Bullying and parental alienation are all forms of emotional abuse. Psychopathy is an emotional dysfunction. People with psychopathy are identified by how they handle conflict. It is the disturbing lack of empathy, guilt shame, remorse that give them away. They are completely unaffected by the distress of others. As long as they get what they want, you may never see that side of them.

If you are in a position of power or status, you will probably not see that side of them either. However, people that are close to them or are of little value to them, will eventually see the pattern. They will slowly begin to realize they are being controlled manipulated and 'gas lighted'. Without even realizing it, you learn to go along to get along. If you break from this, you will experience their wrath. I remember on Memorial Day 2008, when I went to pick up my children for lunch at their grandparents house, Pete Scamardo came outside to confront me. I looked at him and said "Pete, you are nothing but a bully.

He responded "That's right, and I love it!

He said this in front of Dina, he wife and my children. When I got in the car to take my children to lunch, my son asked me "Dad, what's a bully?

Pete Scamardo and Dina Mackney are the most 'successful' father/daughter psychopaths ever to fool the Court. Pete Scamardo has over 100 lawsuits in Fairfax County alone. The litigants in these cases can confirm the patterns. The entire Scamardo family was accused of fraud by Maryland National Bank for $80 Million. Pete and Dina also circumvented the Thoroughbred Ownership licensing laws of Virginia, Maryland and West Virginia. One of her friends from college now refers to her the 'c' word after seeing the real Dina, after working with her.

Most of you will not see that side of her, unless you run into conflict. While I am the one that took my own life, this was a murder conceived and financed by Pete Scamardo who hired Jim Cottrell and Kyle Bartol the day after I discovered he was a murderer, and then paid over $1 Million in legal fees to make it happen.

People 'targeted' by psychopaths call it 'murder by suicide'. I was a good father to my children when I was in their lives. No one can dispute or deny that.

Dr. Samenow even admitted under oath that I had a 'palpable' relationship with my kids. I know I was an extremely loving and positive influence on their lives and it kills me that I even feel like I have to defend my parenting. My children were the only source of joy and happiness in my marriage.

For the Judge Bellows to deny parents and children a 'palpable relationship' and each other's love is corruption.

He did not want it to be known that Dr. Samenow committed fraud or that Judge Terrence Ney had a 'close relationship' with a convicted murderer or a parental alienator. The love that my daughter and I shared was truly special. She is a such a sweet, kind and gentle spirit. I am so sorry that I will not be there to see her grow into a beautiful woman. It absolutely crushed me to not be in her life over the last three years. I worked very hard as a father to build her confidence and self-esteem. She is smart, funny and considerate, but she didn't know it yet.

I pray that she realizes her strengths and her confidence in herself will continue to grow. I love you dearly, Lily. My son Jack was just entering Kindergarten, when I lost access to him. He is gregarious, outgoing and a great athlete. He is smart and fearless. He could have just as much fun by himself as he could with other kids. Even the older boys in our neighborhood wanted to play with Jack. It absolutely breaks my heart that I will not be able to help him grow into a man. I love you to, Jack. I miss you both so much. My identity was taken from me, as result of this process of family court.

When it began, I was a commercial real estate broker with CB Richard Ellis. I lived by the Golden rule and made a living by bringing parties together and finding the common ground. My reputation as a broker was built on my honesty and integrity. When it ended, I was broke, homeless, unemployed and had no visitation with my own children. I had no confidence and was paralyzed with fear that I would be going to jail whenever my ex-wife wanted. Nothing I could say or do would stop it. This is what being to death or 'targeted' by a psychopath looks like. This is the outcome.

I didn't somehow change into a 'high conflict' person or lose my ability to steer clear of the law.

I've had never been arrested, depressed, homeless or suicidal before this family court process. The stress and pressure applied to me was deliberate and nothing I could do or say would get me any relief. Nothing I or my attorneys said to my ex- wife's attorney or to the Court made any difference. Truth, facts, evidence or even the best interest of my children had no affect on the outcome. The family court system is broken, but from my experience, it is not the laws, it's the lawyers. They feed off of the conflict. They are not hired to reduce conflict or protect the best interest of children, which is why third parties need to be involved. It should be mandatory for children to have a guardian ad litem, with extensive training in abuse and aggression.

[image]It is absolutely shameful that the Fairfax County Court did nothing to intervene or understand the ongoing conflict. Judge Randy Bellows also used the children as punishment, by withholding access for failing to fax a receipt. The entire conflict centered around the denial of access to the children, it was inconceivable to me that he would use children like this. This is exactly what my ex-wife was doing and now Judge Bellows was doing it for her. To all my family, friends and the people that supported me through this process, I am so sorry. I know my reactions and behavior throughout this process did not always make sense. None of this made sense to me either. I had no help and the only suggestion I got from my attorneys was to remain silent. At first, I did what I was told, remained silent and listened to my attorneys. Then after I had given my ex-wife full custody to try and appease her, I learned about Psychopathy and emailed Dr. Samenow about my concerns and asked him for help. Of course, I was ignored.

As the conflict continued, I was forced to defend myself. When that didn't work, I thought I could get the help I needed by speaking out. There is no right or wrong way to defend yourself from abuse. Naively, I thought that abuse was abuse and it would be recognized and something would be done. I thought speaking out would end the abuse or at least get them to back off.

It didn't. When no one did anything they were emboldened.

I took my own life because I had come to the conclusion that there was nothing I could do or say to end the abuse. Every time I got up off my knees, I would get knocked back down. They were not going to let me be the father I wanted to be to my children. People may think I am a coward for giving up on my children, but I didn't see how I was going to heal from this. I have no money for an attorney, therapy or medication. I have lost 4 jobs because of this process. I was going to be at their mercy for the rest of my life and they had shown me none. Being alienated, legally abused, emotionally abused, isolated and financially ruined are all a recipe for suicide. I wish I were stronger to keep going, but the emotional pain and fear of going to court and jail became overwhelming. I became paralyzed with fear.

I couldn't flee and I could not fight. I was never going to be allowed to heal or recover. I wish I were better at articulating the psychological and emotional trauma I experienced. I could fill a book with all the lies and mysterious rulings of the Court. Never have I experienced this kind of pain. I asked for help, but good men did nothing and evil prevailed. All I wanted was a Guardian Ad Litem for my children. Any third party would have been easily been able to confirm or refute all of my allegations, which is why none was ever appointed to protect the children or reduce the conflict.

Abuse is about power and control. Stand up for the abused and speak out. If someone speaks out about abuse, believe them. Please teach my children empathy and about emotional invalidation and 'gas – lighting' or they may end up like me. God have mercy on my soul.

Fear & Loathing in St. Clair Shores: Lamestream Media Bungles First International Conference on Men's Issues

John Ribner · 8 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Judging by the media behavior at the First International Conference on Men's Issues, the torch of Woodward and Bernstein wasn't passed, it's been dropped!

What's with this recent crop of journalism-school graduates, anyway? Where's the sparkle in their eyes and the fire in the bellies? Where's the eagerness to challenge conventional thought? Or dig deep to uncover a truth that inspires so much moral outrage that the story demands to be heard? Rather than challenge the current narrative against men's issues, this batch of Pulitzer Prize nopefuls seemed content to simmer in their moral outrage, harshly judging something that is of great importance … and completely beyond their ability to understand.

Take the guy from ANIMAL – Bucky Turco is his name. After asking me if I wanted to be interviewed, I said, "Why not?" and told him why I was at the conference, and even shared a bit of my divorce/custody experiences with him, as well as other topics I've written about here. Things were going well, I thought, until Bucky said, "C'mon! Everybody knows that men have all the power." The notion that this spurious claim somehow invalidates all the things that the esteemed panel members were discussing was not only foolish, it's patently absurd. In the end, I'm glad he didn't use my quotes or my picture in his so-called coverage, which was nothing more than a pathetic post-feminist male's attempt at Hunter S. Thompson, and not a very good one at that. In his piece–where he also confuses the press conference for the main event–he even claims that the death threats AVfM members received weren't true. How would he even know this? The letter from Shannon Dunavent and the Doubletree Hilton people and the thinly-veiled Facebook threats were enough that anyone who takes security seriously knows you can't just laugh it off.

Would anyone have laughed if there were threats to a women's conference? Rhetorical question; I already know the answer.

Moving on, "thinly disguised rage" is how I'd describe the overall attitude of MSNBC's Adam Serwer. I wasn't sure if he wanted to interview me or throw down in a cage fight, UFC-style! He stood at an angle, jaw tightened, hand clenching, and eyes blazing, as he forced questions through pursed lips in a cold, terse manner. I tried my best to both answer him and keep an eye on his fist as it balled up tighter and tighter, practically shaking in his revulsion. It was as if speaking with me somehow betrayed his probable "progressive" (read: radical feminist) indoctrination. To his credit, he asked some thought-provoking questions of the panel, though it's clear that he didn't even consider what they had to say in reply. Suffice to say, his coverage of the event was as far from objective as Pol Pot was from democracy.

Last but not least was my conversation with the guys from VICE. They got a few sound bites off me about why I was at the conference and my issues with the Violence Against Woman Act (VAWA) before I decided to cease the interview halfway through. The reporter and cameraman were doing a good good cop/bad cop routine, with the reporter being a little too good at bad cop. He seemed much too eager and impatient for my liking. To be honest, I suspected a hack job—one that would likely do damage to both John P. Ribner and AVfM—so I bailed. True to form, the reporter did not take kindly to this; since I didn't appreciate his abrupt manner, I guess this makes us even. Their report is the only one I haven't read yet and admittedly, there's some fear on my part; this experience with VICE was actually on the day of the press conference, the day before the main event, and I'm told by others who were there that the VICE people calmed down and became more professional and reasonable with others, so I'd like to see how it all turned out and if they do a better job than those from Time, The Washington Post, and MSNBC.

Despite my unique experiences, I enjoyed the conference. It gave me the opportunity to meet Paul Elam and Dr. Tara Palmatier, two people whose work I've admired for a while. It also gave me an opportunity to see how my brothers and sisters in the “dead trees and ink” club would cover this important event. Being a former newspaper reporter and current magazine writer, I was quite interested to see how these youngsters—no doubt the products of our increasingly failing education system—would treat the subject matter. Would they be fair and objective, the goal of any reporter worth his or her salt? Or would they simply take the easy way out and jack a few details into their venomous diatribes that reflected their own political beliefs and cognitive biases.

After reading what they had to write, let’s just say that I’m not impressed.

Fathers wanted but still not respected

Hopeland Cash · 9 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Overall, June 2014 wasn't a bad month for dads: a recent book Do Fathers Matter? summarizes modern research on the influence of fathers on children; the mainstream media is becoming more friendly toward single and stay-at-home dads; and even the often anti-father President Barack Obama gave an uncharacteristically cordial Father's Day address. After decades of activism, it seems the truth about fathers is getting through.

Then again, the more things change, the more they stay the same. As a people we are gradually and inexorably moving toward the realization that fathers have a profoundly positive influence on their children, so there is a growing demand for paternal involvement in the family. However, this "progress" toward a desire for fathers has not been matched by a growth in respect for fathers, creating a social pitfall. While support is growing for fathers to be involved, it appears society is making this change not due to genuine support for fathers but for purely economic reasons.

Fifty years ago, fathers were largely discounted as important to families except as breadwinners and disciplinarians, and even that began to fade with the rise of the modern socialist welfare system. The government stepped in to provide and protect where men could not or would not. The emotional benefit of present fathers was overlooked and covered up in favor of the Mother-Government mated couple.

The Nanny State, however, has proven difficult to achieve. Myriad attempts have been made at welfare schemes, single-parent support programs, and "Government as Surrogate Husband" initiatives, but divorce continues to be a major indicator of poverty for women, and children of single mothers are some of the poorest and most socially dysfunctional in the country.

Faced with years of these facts, governments and private agencies are scrambling for a way to correct these social ills. Most recently this is manifesting as an up-tick in their desire for paternal involvement. That is unarguably a good thing, but all publicity is not always good publicity. Recent calls for fatherly contribution smack of continued utilitarianism and gynocentrism. Even President Obama's 2014 Father's Day address, while free of his usual Get off your fat asses rhetoric aimed at fathers, is still rife with language meant to shame men into forking out:

> And every chance I get, I encourage fathers to get more involved in their children's lives, because what makes you a man isn't the ability to have a child—it's the courage to raise one.

This is a typical "Performance Culture" remark, labeling as failures men who don't perform as society demands. In this case, a man who doesn't want to be a father (his own choice) is marked as uncourageous: a coward/deadbeat. President Obama continues:

> There's no better feeling than knowing that we can be there for them, and provide for them, and help give them every shot at success.

More Performance Culture speak, framing fathers as utilities, valued not simply for being fathers but only if they live up to lofty social standards. This touches on the fear so many men face—that they won't be allowed to be there for their children, even beginning at birth—but President Obama still ignores the herd of six-hundred-pound gorillas in the room: all the ways society pushes men out of their children's lives regardless of the man's or child's wishes (and well-being).

And finally:

> Let's make sure every dad who works hard and takes responsibility has the chance to know that feeling….

You see what he did there? “Every dad who works hard and takes responsibility.” Make sure you qualify, son, or you’ll never see your kids again. Dance, monkey, dance.

In these and similar remarks is continued the fiction that men don’t want to be fathers. Up to now, it was also taught that they weren’t needed as such. Now the latter propaganda has changed, but only under the corollary that men need to be pushed into being fathers, now apparently because they are important. As long as the fiction of paternal disinterest is maintained, fathers’ rights can be freely repressed. If they don’t want to be dads, why do they need the right to?

To this day, paternal involvement is a privilege, not a right, as evidenced by the abysmally low visitation rates for men post-divorce. However, society is now increasingly trying to rely on the exercise of that privilege to solve its problems. As welfare programs fail to meet expectations, governments hurry to find ways to feed and house children of divorce, to cover for the underperformance of women in the workforce, and to fix the dysfunctional children raised in government-subsidized single-parent households.

To do so, they are turning to men. In truth men already foot the bill for government assistance programs, paying the majority of income tax, earning most of the money spent on sales tax, and running the businesses that pay tax. Now, in a strange twist, the government is trying to take itself out of the loop by putting more pressure on men to provide directly for the mothers of their children. Rather than paying taxes to fund welfare to go to mothers and children, Uncle Sam wants men to be there with the mother and children, paying the bills upfront or taking on the childcare while their wives work.

Will this lead to a lower tax rate? Of course not, but if the government can achieve both—(1) continuing to support underemployed mothers and (2) lowering the deficit—they’ll be all too happy to do so. How better than to continue taxing (mostly men) while also making sure men pay for “welfare” right out of pocket by being an “involved father,” that is, an open wallet; men still have no legal right to be anything else.

It isn’t just the government, though. Society in general is depressingly gynocentric. Society sees that women are hurting economically, that children are spiralling into dysfunction, and that the welfare system isn’t cutting it like the feminists promised, so up go the trumpet calls for paternal involvement to individually pick up the slack where the collective has fallen short.

Problem is, those pesky feminists are still making promises, and society, bless its heart, is still listening. So, when feminists insist women must have total autonomy and control of themselves and their children, but all the social science shows that paternal involvement is perhaps the single biggest indicator of child well-being, how do you reconcile?

Easy: screw over men. It’s always worked before.

The new call for paternal involvement is just a remix of the ever-present siren call for male responsibility. Men are being invited back into the family fold only because the government can’t make the cut. This new support for fathers isn’t an expression of respect for fathers and their impact, it’s an increase in the demands placed on them. If that weren’t the case, we would be seeing politicians calling for family law reform, not just prodding men to get more involved with zero protection.

The new recognition of positive paternal influence is a ploy. They don’t believe it, and if government programs could do the job we wouldn’t be hearing a peep about how much dads matter. The government can’t fill men’s shoes, though, so they’re calling on dads to save us from social ruin, but they are doing so without condemning the countless social pressures that currently force men out of the lives of their children to the detriment of all parties.

Instead, all those negative influences are ignored and men are pushed to just be more involved, as if it were purely their choice. Society is now deciding that it is in “our” best interest for men to be involved fathers. As this progresses, the amount of cultural disdain toward fathers will likely decrease, portrayals of men in pop culture will grow more positive, the cultural support for single-parenthood will wane in favor of couples parenting, and President Obama & Co. will continue to tone back their shaming language to try to make active fatherhood more inviting.

Prior to this ongoing change, shaming tactics against fathers were trotted out with such bone-cracking force not to actually increase fathering (such negative reinforcement rarely works) but to further a very specific agenda. Picture this: bombarded with constant attacks on fathers, declarations that men are incompetent parents, and cruel insults from the likes of the president, how do men react? They recoil, they hand over all parental powers to women. Only the most cowed, easily controlled men are actually willing to parent under their female partner's thumb. The less browbeaten just back off, leaving children in the iron grip of their mothers and opening the door to government "assistance"; exactly what the gynocentrists want: men involved only at the discretion of the mother, otherwise only providing financially (and thus paying taxes into welfare). Given half a chance, these more strong-willed men might actually try to assert their paternity, so they have been shamed away from doing so.

But the socialist dream has stalled. The government can't stem the tide of poverty and delinquency their anti-family policies have created and now they are trying to get men involved. With the legal system so stacked against men, they can safely push them into active fatherhood without infringing on maternal control. More paternal involvement is a good thing, but while the tune has changed the goal has remained the same. This push for involved fathers, if left to fester in isolation, will become more of a curse than a boot.

If demand for fathers increases out of step with respect for them as parents, we will quickly see fathers' position in society deteriorate even further: expectations will increase (Obama's continued harping on the "wage gap" shows there is little interest in increasing expectations on women), but fathers will see no increase in respect or rights. Their full involvement will become more and more mandatory but will still be achievable only on the whim of their female partner, robbing men of the power to perform the duties demanded of them.

Unchecked, this shift could create a brutal polarization: rising support leads to greater praise for involved fathers but also an even stronger condemnation of men who aren't active parents. If men are expected to be more hands-on fathers, those who aren't will face increased stigmatization, even if they were unfairly forced out by a vindictive partner and biased legal system—the problems that aren't being addressed. The injustice faced by fathers will multiply and the depth into disrespect and despair a good father can fall upon divorce will only grow, all totally out of his control.

If nothing changes in this course, society will see the birth of the first real "double burden": little has changed in the expectation for a man to be the primary breadwinner of his family (the opposite arrangement still being well in the minority), but now an ever-greater amount of childcare is being demanded of men.

Work-life balance is all well and good, and government initiatives to increase childcare options, parental leave, and wages will help make it possible for mothers and fathers, but all that is a false dream as long as fathers' intrinsic rights are left aside in favor of continued maternal family supremacy. Any recognition of fathers' positive influence will only be accepted as long as it helps ease men into their new role and is never allowed to go far enough to suggest fathers match mothers' importance to children.

No one but no one should be able to tell a man when, how, or if to be a father. Until that is codified, any attempt to increase paternal involvement will be done at the discretion of mothers. No matter how altruistic most women are, many fathers will inevitably be exploited as just another utility, ground into the dust to cover over welfare's broken promises.

The government may be okay with that, but if children are going to benefit from fathers it has to be on fathers' terms. With few birth control options, no paper abortion, and little sway post-divorce, that is currently all but impossible. If Obama wants men to take on responsibility, he needs to push for them to have the rights to do so as they see fit.

Otherwise, fathers themselves will become the free childcare that socialists have long dreamed of: doing the parenting and paying the bills, all with no rights to their children.

“In My Tribe”: Common Ground Among MGTOW, MHRA, & Game Theory in a Post-Rodger Discourse

Ty Henry · 9 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: To those who are new to the Men’s Human Rights Movement (MHRM), it is important to understand that there is no more of an overlap between the Men’s Rights Activists (MRA) community and the PickUp Artists (PUA) and “game theory” community than there is between the Lutherans and the Elks Lodges—i.e., there may be some Lutherans who are Elks, and there may be some Elks members in any given Lutheran church, and if you squint you may see some shared ideas between these groups (both profess a belief in God and believe in doing good works, for example), but they just aren’t the same. In recent “news” reports (we’d call them ideologically driven hit pieces), some have tried to tie psychotic mass-murderer Elliot Rodger to the men’s movement because Rodger had some peripheral involvement in the PUA community, though even there the irony is huge: Rodger had left the PUAs and joined an anti-PUA group, “PUAHate,” for men seeking to leave the PUA lifestyle. And in another layer of irony amid all the slander, Rodger was also expelled from “PUAHate” for being too psychotic, all before he went on his rampage. The shades of incompetent and outright dishonest reporting on all this are manifold. Still, while we at AVfM have long been highly skeptical of, even deeply negative about, the PUA/game community, Ty Henry makes the case here that this is a form of fratricide we don’t need to indulge in, and that we don’t have to throw anyone under the bus to recognize that both communities are being horribly lied about and should recognize that common ground at least exists. So, let the debate begin! –DE

Men’s Human Rights Activists (MHRA), Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), game theory, and, yes, PickUp Artists (PUA) share one universal goal: that each boy/man can feel free to chart a course for his own life free from social conventions and laws that pre-emptively shame, marginalize, and punish him. Despite the obvious distinctions, in the wake of the Elliot Rodger killings, we should be cautious of “otherizing” one another to our antagonists. Instead, we should recognize ourselves as allies against a common opponent.

> “Men blogging in the manosphere, whether it’s Game theory, PUA, MRA, or MGTOW, all assume a horrible risk for publicly expressing their views that a proponent of feminism would rarely need to consider. Professionally, personally, and to an extent, even physically, manosphere bloggers paint a big target on themselves that very few people would sympathize with their being damaged for their outspokenness. If it looks like patriarchy, it’s OK to set their home on fire, and a feminized world of angry women and their identifier mangina sycophants will line up with torches to do so.”

> —The Rational Male, Build A Better Beta

In the wake of L’Affair d’Rodger, I already had this piece in mind when I read the otherwise skillful interview our own Robert O’Hara had with Al Jazeera. Bob deftly responded to both benign and trapdoor questions (“Do you like women?” = “Do you beat your wife?”) with aplomb, until the interviewer broached the subject of the PUA community with a question that presumed a connection to them when there really is none. But Bob gave the following answer, which isn’t quite true either:

> Pick-up artists, they believe in this magical thing called “game.” And if only you had game, then your whole life would be great. You can have sex with any woman you want, everyone’s going to love you, your boss is going to love you, you’re going to make more money. And they honestly believe this. They’re deluded people.

My critique is not Bob’s opinion per se (we in the men’s rights community are allowed to disagree) but time and place. Let us vigorously debate as we have in the past between the various camps, and as families often do. Our opponents have us ALL in their sights, and are making no distinctions as they ruthlessly lie.

Counter-theory to ideological feminist dogma has many constituent elements. The purpose of the following is to show 1) that game theory and MHRA/MGTOW both have at least one common goal: to seek to improve the lives of men by helping them take the blinders off about how the world really works, 2) how interconnected the schools of thought are, and 3) that we can have our squabbles (like this from Paul, and this) while never allowing outsiders to use our words as partitioning devices to leave us further riven. As we've caught the broader society's limelight, and hit with the wrong end of the shit-stick, in the wake of the Elliot Rodger saga, it's crucial to recognize this interconnectedness and how men's lives have been improved by both. MHRA and MGTOW can maintain their distinctiveness from PUA and game awareness while at the same time recognizing its members as "fellow travelers" down this road of rejecting society's flawed narrative about men. Indeed, there is no reason why, say, PUAs can't believe in men's rights, as many do. Public "othering" of each other when questioned by outlets not associated with the "manosphere" or MHRA/MGTOW represents internecine conflict that is unnecessary, and harmful, to all members of our "tribe." I'll start with my story.

My Red Pill Journey—A Play in Three Parts

My grandmother had converted me early into a news junkie, as I spent many evenings watching Walter Cronkite and Jerry Dunphy on her couch. Nightline with Ted Koppel had been regular viewing for most of my teen years on that spring evening of my senior year in high school when the show led with multiple clips of women gathered in groups, weeping as if a beloved professor or classmate had died, or some catastrophe had just occurred. Turns out, something did:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=emGrmwtdCfA

Mills College had decided to admit that virulent vermin known as men. After 16 days of strikes and untold acts of civil disobedience by the student body, the board of trustees changed course (turned tail?) and reversed its decision. This L.A. Times guest op-ed by Father Patrick Arnold of the University of San Diego is where I first heard the term "misandrosy" and is where I trace the origin of my red pill journey.

My third serving was during my sophomore year in college. Working in a library during my first 16 months of college was pure gold, and never more so than when I came across Norman Podhoretz's Rape in Feminist Eyes, a classic, comprehensive, erudite, and airtight takedown of the still-germinating field of "rape crisis" feminism, in which Podhoretz exposes threadbare the "demon penis" philosophies of Andrea Dworkin and the hypo-agency/hyper-agency dichotomy foundational to "non-violent sexual coercion," prophesying the current wave of codified expansionist sexual violence definitions. I consider it the Magna Carta of the subject, and 23 years later I've still not read a better essay.

In between, I heard Ross Jeffries say the following on The Tom Leykis Show in early 1991.

"There's what women say they want. There's what women think they want. And there's what they actually respond to."

Those three sentences affected me with all the subtlety of a roadside IED detonated at the base of my brainstem. I loved women, but was perplexed by them, until I heard those words. It was a moment of clarity, and suddenly everything made sense.

Back then, Tom Leykis was a local, albeit quite popular, host in my L.A. metroplex, whom I'd been listening to since I was 15. Bear in mind, the post-1994 iteration of Leykis is nothing like he was then—he had the same manner and rapier wit, but social issues, current events, and hot political topics dominated his show. Indeed, Leykis was a bit of a purple-piller when it came to women, fond of saying women wanted equality "when convenient" but yet on his third of four marriages (opposite of the advice he now dispenses), albeit with pre-nups for the final two. It could be argued that Ross Jeffries was an inspiration to Leykis's unabashedly pro-male format, as Jeffries gave Leykis some of his best ratings whenever he appeared.

Leykis also gave A Voice for Men founder Paul Elam his most friendly guest platform, allowing him to speak for an hour, unedited and unfiltered.

And therein lies the irony: the progenitor of the modern pickup artist heavily influenced the manosphere's most beloved talk-show host, who was happy to share Paul Elam's message.

Did Jeffries and Leykis imbue this then-18-year-old with priceless knowledge when I conversed with them on the call-in line? Did I run out and blow $20 on the book Jeffries was hocking? Not at all, as about 18 months prior, I had made a decision after my junior year to dial-back the amount of time spent with "female friends." Never was I cross, but I had grown weary of being the emotional tampon for women I thought were cute, listening to their "boyfriend issues." Needless to say, I gained my first girlfriend that summer, and subsequently more girls seemed to find me arousing. By college freshman year, I had gained my "footing" with talking to women, so I was already starting to "get it." Of course, it didn't hurt that I was 6'3", 195 lbs, and an avid basketball player. Although some of what my mom had told me was true ("Women like TALL"), I was in the midst of a long-term, two-year, ego-crushing heartbreak from the first girl ever to lay with me. Nevertheless, I felt validated, something crucial for a testosterone-laced new adult man who had not had his dad in the home and was just beginning to navigate the treacherous waters of the sexual marketplace and was experiencing some extremely choppy waters.

Allies vs. Friends

Joseph Stalin was the most brutal of Soviet dictators. What's also true is that he saved Europe in World War II. The turning point in the war was the Battle of Stalingrad, in which Stalin's generals surrounded and trapped the German battalion's advance on the Caucasus oil fields, trapped them in the city, and allowed the Russian winter to do the rest, so weakening the Eastern Front that they could not stop the advance into Germany. Without Stalingrad, there would be no successful Operation Overlord many months later.

The Soviets were by no means our friends. They were, however, necessary allies.

PUAs and game theorists, by contrast, are not analogous to the Soviets in terms of diametric philosophical opposition to MHRA and MGTOW. Regardless, our opponents have us ALL in their sights and are making no distinctions as they deploy their artillery.

Game Theory vs. PUA

PickUp Artistry (PUA) is unabashed applied male sexual hedonism. Nothing more, nothing less. Every man, even gay men, with any sort of single sex life has engaged in "picking up" someone in some form or another. Just like diet regimes and multi-level marketing scams, many "get you laid" programs have the element of swindles, and men can completely lose their own identity in pursuit of "lay counts." On the flip side, they can serve like jumper cables to the sex lives of some—it's no substitute for a working battery (read: developing your own personality), but they can get you on the road to where you want to go. There's no such thing as self-improvement schemes that work for everyone, and by the same token, rare is the guide that is universally useless for everyone. As a sales professional, I learned many techniques, but ultimately I had to adapt each one to the client/prospect, product, and my style of delivery. Caveat emptor.

The problem with "game" is a branding and semantic one. The connotation of "playing a game" just rubs some people the wrong way. In the African-American community, however, there is widespread comfort with the term on many levels. Although it's only about 15 years old as a popular phenomenon, the idiom has been around as a catch-all for both intersexual relations and a general life skill for decades in black inner cities, with our common lexicon replete with phrases like "you played yourself"(see Ice-T video of the same name), with even women extolling the virtues of a silver-tongued parrying as prerequisite to coupling. The advice novelist and audio-blogger Tariq "Elite" Nasheed uses our concept of "game" to promote practical self-improvement for men, and women, with his panoply of books, lectures, and Internet call-in radio shows.

But rather than go down the ethno-linguistic rabbit hole, I'll keep things simple. There have always been masculine and feminine biological drives and imperatives. Correspondingly, social conventions, mores, and laws, although always in flux, have been put in place across civilizational history to check both for the cohesion of a society. If you view feminism as the philosophical and governance arm of unchaining feminine imperatives and hypergamy, while bending and constraining the masculine, “game” is no longer “magical.” It’s self-evident . . . and necessary.

The Rationale Male, married and himself a sometime-critic of PUA seminars and DVD pimps, recently discussed where his approach differs against the backdrop of the Rodger killings.

“What’s more legitimate, my prescribing some course or template to follow that leads a man to a success that ultimately I define for a reader, or my laying out an accurate landscape for his better understanding and he creates his own success with it?
Are you your success or my success? I’d rather a Man be his own.
Most men already know what the keys are, and most even know how to use them, but what they really want is confirmation that they actually have the keys.
My approach to Game is defined in much broader terms than simply “how to get girls,” and I think for the better part of the manosphere the understanding of Game has evolved beyond rote memorization of scripts and plans. It’s gotten to a stage where even the most enthusiastic proponents of PUA techniques acknowledge a need for an individualized approach to relating and interacting with women based on a broader applied understanding of feminine psychology, sociology and the particular conditions that apply to themselves as well as the women they’re interacting with.
It’s been noted before, my approach to Game is descriptive, not prescriptive.”

The relentless and unabated pursuit of “more notches” can lead to an empty existence, and some men already have both the attractiveness and charisma to attract partners easily. However, men who encourage the rejection of evidence-backed theories under the umbrella of the catch-all “game theory” out of hand do boys and men the greatest disservice. Just as girls should have an idea of how boys’ worst impulses can manifest if left unchecked, the landscape is littered with the carcasses of men who, had they gone into their relationships/marriages understanding the mechanics of women’s worst impulses unchecked likely would not have immolated themselves, self-medicated, committed suicide, or gone on murderous rampages. Pages like The Rational Male have done more than even MRM/MHRM pages to explore how hypergamy affects the interactions between the sexes, and the ever-fluxing social conventions that shape-shift to conform to it, while remaining cognizant that “underpinning all of these areas of specialization was still the need to internalize and personalize Game in a Man’s life.” Correspondingly, game theory mixed with a little MGTOW would show boys and men that “opting out” partially (like YouTuber Barbarrossssa) or fully (like YouTuber Sandman) are both viable and rational options which are not antithetical to a fulfilling life.

For those who scoff that one can be MGTOW and game-adhering, read one or more of Roald Dahl’s stories of Uncle Oswald, a bachelor who traveled the world with hedonistic flair, collecting walking sticks, and getting rich, with only one ironclad rule for sex with women.

Balance in the Force

To use a Star Wars analogy, 60-plus years of one-sided gender discourse have put “The Force” out of balance. MHRA and MGTOW are there to restore this balance on the broader philosophical and legal side. Likewise, on the intersexual relations front, multiple generations of women have been weaned on Cosmopolitan, The Rules, and Sex and the City, to name just a few popular sources for modern women, all with the prevailing lesson being that women are entitled to make the masculine heel and genuflect before them, bending all social conventions to the Princess Paradigm. Thus it’s reassuring to know there is a faction willing to snatch off the tiara, throw it in the mud, and laugh heartily as the pearl-clutching ensues. PUA is our countervailing influence to the Fem-Centric Relationship Industrial Complex, the carnal IRA to our Sinn Fein. Why should we unilaterally disarm when the Ulster Party isn’t?

That is not to say that men should feel compelled into being “sexual performers.” I, for one, am not interested in treating my sex life like a video game. By the same token, let’s check our sanctimony at the door and admit some hard truths. Like Dahl’s Uncle Oswald, all men have that Lothario in our circle who makes us feel a little more alive when we’re around him. We may not feel like BEING him, but we’re happy he’s out there, if only to live vicariously through (my good friends on the University of Arizona basketball teams in the 1990s come to mind). Which leads me to . . .

PUA Shaming = Slut Shaming

As MRAs/MHRAs, we have a vested interest in ending "slut shaming," both as a philosophical (sexual hedonism is not always harmful) and practical matter; as has been demonstrated by Pierce Harlan and others, fear of shaming is the fuel of much regret asymmetry that leads to false rape allegations like the Kobe Bryant, Hofstra, and Oregon cases. Why then are we so easily goaded into internecine food fights with those men who choose to live their lives in a more hedonistic fashion? If you're uncomfortable defining your existence by "lay counts," fair enough. If the commodifying pickup gurus reek of snake oil to you, that's fine too. But the foundation of the MHRM is to allow men to choose masculinity in their own way while taking an "agreeable disagreement" posture if you do not approve.

I believe Bob O"Hara fell into a "Let's You and Him Fight" trap on Al-Jazeera, and the trained journalist and public relations pro in me cringed as Bob took the bait, riffing that "game" was some hoax akin to Christian Science and stating that all who believed in it were "delusional." This was based on the demonstrably false presupposition in the interviewer's question that Rodger was "connected" to PUA communities. His comment left the unsophisticated reader with the impression that PUA is more likely to lead to destructive behavior than the MRM/MHRM, an impression that is poisonous. However, Bob's response should have been: "We disagree with game on much, and agree on some. But if you'd like to know more about PUAs and game theorists, ask them, not us." Like any family, we should never offer our words as partitioning devices that opponents can use to make us further riven. It's just another form of proxy violence.

Even after I realized the NBA and major college basketball were not in my future, I would still take some tactics and moves of some players to adapt to my game. Even though I knew I would never be like them, adapting components used by the best in the world only made me better, and it didn't make guys like James Worthy and Joe Dumars "magic tricks." Some guys really ARE that good. Likewise, as men experimenting is how we learn best. That includes different ways to interact with women. Eventually I found ways that work for me, comporting with my sense of decency and my basic personality, through trial and error, making sure not to compromise who I am. I find it needlessly antagonistic to burn the toes of young men testing the waters simply because they have one foot in the game pool. That young man was, and still to a point is, me.

Common Ground

Ironically, Bob's next answer based on MHRA outlook and "game aware" philosophy correspond to each other. Both teach men to focus on improving themselves, from physical fitness to their dreams and goals, all the while "safeguarding" themselves from traps. MHRA and MGTOW focus on the problem from the pragmatic, social, and legal hazards for men in relationships, while game awareness teaches men to observe behavior above all else when interacting with the opposite sex and understand its origins. Game theorists take down feminists, as well as simpering white knight academics like Michael Kimmel; impart lessons we should learn from male feminists like Hugo Schwyzer; and both game and MHRA/MGTOW teach men how to withstand and combat social conventions that shame the masculine for nonconformity. Paternity fraud is nothing more than the sizzling poop-pile of the dualistic procreative impulses game theorists like The Rational Male have broken down, most of which have a basis in research, impulses most women keep in check but today incur no obvious and immediate penalty when they don't. Both endorse men maintaining control of their own reproductive futures and mitigating risks of being put on the hook financially or emotionally (see the "real man" meme). Indeed, some game theory actually does a better job of explaining these ever-shifting shaming tactics and their origins. When you listen to Sandman discuss the MGTOW observations of "Male Harems," it's just the functional destination of being in "the friend zone." From either perspective, the point is clear: you are being used in order for a woman to keep your attention fixated on her, whether the reason is ego-edifying, utilitarian (disposability), or both.

It's likely that if Elliot Rodger had immersed himself in the MHRM or MGTOW communities, he would have been less likely to go on his rampage. Like Sandman said, Rodger could not stomach truly “going his own way.” This corresponds to The Rational Male’s postulations that Rodger could not come to grips with the red pill truths as they presented themselves. Know this—had he immersed himself 100% in game awareness (or even PUA), he would have been just as unlikely to commit those acts of murder. Indeed, the most critically thought-out, well-crafted, and incisive breakdown came from Roissy, despite what you may think of some of his more sophomoric snark-laden riffs.

We can condemn Rodger’s actions with all our muster while still recognizing that every boy/man has suffered some disillusionment after realizing he’s been lied to about “what women want” or while trying to reconcile what he’s been taught about girls after getting assaulted by two of them simultaneously, emotionally bullied, or seeing his efforts to be “the good man” go for naught.

Men’s counter-theory is a buffet table. If you’re going to run a 5K or hike, eat the salad and carbs. If you’re in a celebratory and indulgent mood, then by all means grab some apple pie with a dollop of sorbet to chase down the prime rib. At different times in your life, men may want and need different things, and those things are always there, on the same “table.”

Conclusion

This “renaissance age” is too important to be allowed to be squandered with finger-pointing. Like steel forging steel, the best ideas survive the trials of fire. But fire can both heat our home and burn it down. I, for one, will not set one room in my house alight, as each room contains something valuable, and fire rarely stays in the “other” room.

It is particularly gratifying, in the afterglow of the First International Conference on Men's Issues, that we get another reason to celebrate as a community.

On November 1, 2011, after 15 months online, our "little globe" hit its first 1,000,000 visits. I was so encouraged at the time that I wrote the following:

> After 15 months online we are rapidly approaching our first million visits to AVfM. And if current traffic holds or continues to grow we will have at least twice that much after another 15 months. I am betting we do even better than that thanks to the dedicated efforts of all the people who contribute quality additions to the growing library of MRA literature, and the increasing number of men and women who are stepping up to rattle the worlds cage with FTSU.

I actually worried at that point if I was being overly optimistic. It turns out I was not. We did, in fact, hit more than twice that much in the next 15 months.

And here we are, less than three years from the point we hit our first million, about to go over the 10,000,000 mark. I have to say, it feels pretty good.

Something else from back in that day. At the time I made that post I said, "After a slight leveling off when the site was rebuilt, we are tracking upward in Alexa ranking again, headed toward a coveted place in the top 100,000 worldwide rankings."

That seems like a lifetime ago. Since then our numbers have blown the doors off Alexa and AVFM has become one of the top 30,000 most visited websites in the world and one of the top 12,000 in the United States.

Let me take this great moment to thank all the recent donors in our current fundraiser, which ends tomorrow night. If you would like to help us celebrate this milestone with a couple of bucks in the tip jar, we will be happy to take it and put it to use. Or, just sit back and take a look at that globe, think about the incredibly successful conference we just had, and about the one we are planning for next year and know that you are a part of it.

100,000,000 visitors will be here before you know it, and then ten times that, because we are never going to stop.

As we grow, we hope to do even more. More organization, effecting more change in the public discourse, and, importantly, the day we can start serving men and boys with even more tangible, direct services.

There was a time when I doubted that could ever really happen. But those days are gone. The Men's Rights Movement is going forward because it must, and AVFM is going to be the spearhead of it happening.

A wonderful day/evening to you all.

Rage-Filled, Unprofessional Adam Serwer Embarrasses MSNBC & "Now With Alex"

Dean Esmay · 10 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We're going to tell you a little story about Adam Serwer of MSNBC. But first, we want to make a few things clear:

A number of highly professional, ethical, and hardworking journalists were given press passes to the wildly successful First International Conference on Men's Issues on June 27 and 28, along with its warm-up, a press conference on June 26. Many of those reporters asked hard, even uncomfortable questions and published critical but reasonably accurate pieces. Even reporters who weren't there were able to do the serious work of seeking us out to ask questions and get clarifications; take, for example, this highly negative piece, which, whatever its flaws, the reporter actually took the time to contact us to ask serious questions, even if he gets a few things wrong in our opinion. We may take issue with some reporters' conclusions, we may think that they have missed some important questions they should have asked, but overall they clearly did their jobs as professional journalists.

So there's an important message about AVfM we want to make clear here to the press before we talk some more about Adam Serwer of MSNBC: We don't care if you're critical of us. We don't care if you think we're evil; although we're not. We don't care if you think we're wildly wrong about things either; in a country that at least purports to embrace liberal democratic values, people should be free to think whatever they want. We don't care if you like us or what we have to say. Challenge us on any point, tell us we've got our facts wrong if we do, even call us names if you want. But know this: We are a part of the media universe, and you do not, and will not, exclusively control the narrative. You are citizens entitled to free speech and free press, and so are we. And you are subject to criticism, just like we are.

If you lie about us, we will call you on it publicly. A press pass isn't a free pass to abuse us or our supporters. The privilege of a press pass comes with the basic duty to cover the event like a journalist—otherwise you wouldn't have been given one. If you get in free to cover an event that many people paid hard-earned money and worked long hours to be part of, only to fail basic Journalism 101 due diligence, that press pass will be revoked and your ass will be thrown out. If you abuse a press pass and then fail to do the basic work of asking questions and requesting clarifications before you write about something, or fail in your duty as a journalist by twisting, distorting, and misreporting, you and everyone you know will be hearing from us. As will the general public.

So. With that made clear, we will repeat that there were a number of journalists given press passes to our conference who did their jobs. There were three who did not, and who instead chose to lie to a national audience, embarrass their editors, and abuse the privilege that a press pass grants. And one of these three was rage-filled Adam Serwer of MSNBC, part of the NBC Universal corporate juggernaut.

Multiple conference attendees noted that Serwer was antagonistic, sneering, and hostile during the event—the very picture of what "unprofessional" looks like in a reporter. Now, in fairness, none of the conference presenters reported this behavior—but that may be because, so far as we can determine, Serwer did not ask a single question of any of the presenters he wrote about, even though all of them were available pretty much all day for any questions or clarifications a reporter might seek.

Other reporters sought out our presenters to ask them questions and request clarifications before they wrote about them. Adam Serwer of MSNBC did not. Journalism 101 fail.

Serwer did talk to random attendees though. In those cases, sometimes at least, Serwer was visibly shaking with rage, refusing eye contact, clenching fists, and spitting out questions in almost robotic fashion, as if he'd rather punch people than talk to them like human beings. Many of us also watched him apparently collaborate online with Time's Jessica K. Roy on a hatchet job instead of asking questions of the presenters he was busy writing about.

Both conference attendees and online viewers reported being absolutely flabbergasted at Serwer's "reporting." They compared this error-filled piece of Adam Serwer's yellow journalism with their own conference experiences and the online videos of the event and openly asked, "Was he even in the same building?"

Well, we saw him there, so we can confirm that he was in the building at least part of the time, though he doesn't seem to have asked the staff or presenters much of anything.

Adam Serwer's offering of journalistic tripe is so full of prejudices and errors we don't even know where to begin. I mean, it's tempting to ask him why on Earth he thinks a recent Supreme Court decision about employers paying for women's contraception has anything to do with our event, since we don't control the Supreme Court and men have no real birth control options in today's world anyway. But that would just be a distraction from the main issue: Adam Serwer of MSNBC lied to a national audience, and disgraced MSNBC and its editors and producers, with ideological axe-grinding apparently more important to him than doing his job. Worse yet, this error-laden piece led to, among other things, this bizarre segment on MSNBC's "NOW with Alex Wagner."

Now, this piece by Alex Wagner and her comedian buddy is gobsmackingly shallow in its own right. I mean, my God, even though one of her assistants (Allison MacDonald, who at least purports to care about civil rights and equality just like we do) called me to ask for some video of the conference, and emailed back and forth with me throughout the day about it, all Alex Wagner apparently chose to do was trash-talk us using Adam Serwer's ridiculous yellow journalism as her primary source. They didn't even try to talk to Dr. Tara Palmatier or learn to pronounce her name before trash-talking her to a national audience, in what sure looked like a case of classic relational aggression/bullying to us.

And yes, for the record, I offered to put them in contact with Dr. T. or any of the other presenters if they wanted it, and they chose not to before running their segment. And Alex actually thinks men have more reproductive rights than women? Really, Alex? What color is the sky on the planet where you come from?

But this article isn't about "NOW with Alex Wagner" really; they just relied on Serwer's error-filled hit piece, and they weren't the only sources to do so. For example, the perpetually enraged screed-writer TBogg of The Raw Story used Serwer's misreporting practically verbatim.

In case you don't think we do any due diligence of our own, let's make another thing clear: we wrote to Adam Serwer of MSNBC before we ran this article you're reading in order to give him a chance to issue retractions, clarifications, expand on any points, or respond to any complaints we might have, or to point to anything we might have misunderstood. After Serwer sent us an email over the weekend asking questions we consider to be none of his business, I emailed him to let him know I had questions of my own and asked if he would be willing to respond to them. He did not answer. The next day, Sunday, I emailed him those questions, along with a copy to another member of the MSNBC crew, asking him to either answer by end-of-business day on Monday, July 7, or at least ask for an extension if he needed more time.

As of mid-day on Thursday, July 10, he has not responded. Here's that email:

subject: Questions for Adam Serwer and his employer, NBC Universal

Mr. Serwer, a few questions we would like answered before we go forward with our piece profiling you and your reporting, as well as subsequent on-air reporting on us on MSNBC's "Now With Alex" which, amongst others, like The Raw Story, used your reporting as the basis for their own stories:

1) You opened your piece by claiming that at our conference, "feminists were ruining everything." Who exactly said that to you? Or is that something that you merely perceived, and if so, what led you to believe feminists were ruining everything? We wouldn't agree that feminists were ruining everything, so what makes you think it?

2) You noted that Erin Pizzey called feminism an "evil empire." Did you at any time bother to ask her what she bases that on? She would tell you it has to do with literally billions of dollars in government and private donations that go into programs and organizations dedicated to ideological feminism; did you think to ask her or anyone else about this? If you did not ask anyone why they see feminism as a multibillion$$ empire, why did you not ask, or ask us to name any of the ideological organizations that receive this money? If you did ask, why did you not print the responses?

3) You also called Erin Pizzey's criticism of one particular politician, Hillary Clinton, "overtly partisan." Can you explain how an English woman who cannot vote in and does not live in the United States can be partisan about a US politician? Furthermore, can you explain how criticizing one particular politician is partisan in your eyes? When Barack Obama criticized Hillary Clinton in 2008, was he being "overtly partisan?" Please elaborate on how criticizing one politician is partisanship.

4) You reported "over 100 attendees" at the conference, but the correct figure is over 250. Did you bother asking anyone about that before running that number, which makes the conference look smaller than it was?

5) You claim in your piece that "What animated most of the speakers at the conference was feminism and how it needed to be defeated." But here is complete video of all the speakers:

Anyone watching can see that many of the speakers did not mention feminism at all, and of those who did, most only mentioned it in passing and some acknowledged openly that there are feminists who are widely admired in our movement. Why did you therefore report that feminism was the main topic when it was not?

6) You wrote, "Although generally understood as an ideology of equal rights for women, at the conference such feminists were called "equity feminists," discussed the way Democrats might refer to "sane conservatives" or Republicans to "good liberals." In other words, a largely fictional exception whose purpose is merely to define the whole as extreme. Feminists, for many of the speakers, were the enemy."

This is clear opining, not reporting, on multiple levels. We were given to understand you were there as a reporter. We are confused: did you misrepresent yourself as a reporter when your mission was to inject your ideological preconceptions and prejudices onto us, in which case we would have charged you for a ticket? Do you claim journalistic integrity, or merely that your piece for MSNBC was an opinion piece only and should not be subjected to fact-checking or used as a reliable source on the conference's events? In short, were you reporting or opining? If it was opining, please explain why anyone is using it as a journalistic source. If it was not opining, please explain the errors mentioned so far, and the ones I will mention later:

7) Do you consider yourself a feminist? If not, why not? If so, how do you think this may have affected your reporting and your ability to give a factual, honest account of our conference to your readers?

8) You reported, and I quote you here, "the audience laughed when speaker Fred Jones mentioned his fears about his son being raped after being arrested in New Orleans." Video of this is available free online and clearly shows that, in a room of over 200 people, Jones was giving a rousing, moving, passionate, and funny speech, then suddenly stopped and mentioned his worry for his son—and the entire room grew quiet, with nothing heard but a few obviously nervous and uncomfortable and confused laughs. You could have otherwise heard a pin drop. He then quickly moved on to other subjects and back into more inspiring motivational material. Any sane person present or watching that video can verify this, and that your reporting was therefore highly misleading. Do you wish to apologize now for your slandering of the conference attendees, or issue any form of clarification or retraction?

9) You wrote, and I quote you, "At the conference, feminism was responsible for turning wives against their husbands, bleeding them dry in divorce proceedings and separating them from their children, levying false accusations of rape and abuse against good men, or creating an ever-present culture of hatred where men are vilified." You correctly quote Mike Buchanan* as having such an opinion. Others issued very different opinions, and in fact I can tell you that would not be anything close to an accurate representation of my opinion or that of others I work with, although most of us would see some truth in some of it. Why did you report in a way to lead readers to believe this was the position of the entire conference or its organizers?

10) You quote Dr. Tara Palmatier, who has written extensively on her humorous concept of the Golden Uterus Syndrome, as being, "fleece your ex-husband in divorce court and take assets you didn't earn, you deserve it, take that bastard to the cleaners, force a man into fatherhood with an accidental pregnancy, hey, if he wouldn't commit, sometimes you gotta push him into it."

Yet this does not describe how Palmatier has repeatedly described Golden Uterus Syndrome, and as this video of the presentation clearly showed, what she said was, "I believe men are more susceptible to gender-shaming because of our mother-centric culture. If a boy is raised to believe it's his job to make his mother happy and please women, he will be more susceptible to shaming tactics. If he was raised to make his mother happy and his mother was abusive, he will be especially susceptible to gender shaming tactics. Meanwhile, we have removed the stigma and shame from bad female behavior. We now view behaviors that were once shunned in women as acts of female empowerment. Being a bitch or a female [garbled] is considered a sign of strength in women. Being promiscuous is an act of female empowerment. Demanding to be treated like a princess is condoned and encouraged. We deify mothers, even the bad ones, to the point where it has become what I call The Golden Uterus Syndrome."

This is actually what Dr. Palmatier has frequently described—humorously—as Golden Uterus Syndrome, which can easily be verified by just asking her or looking at her online writings. By any chance did you think to ask Dr. Palmatier any questions at all about her presentation or what she meant before you ran this quotation in the way you did?

http://youtu.be/zxSTwlOz4P4 *

11) In The Raw Story, firebrand opinionator TBogg of FiredogLake fame wrote that you, Adam Serwer, "drew the short straw" implying you were in some group he knew of who were to potentially be sent to the conference. This raises three questions: a) What exactly is your relationship with TBogg, b) why would he imply that he, you, and others were in some kind of circle of journalists who might have to attend the conference and you were just the unlucky one, and c) since you were apparently TBogg's sole source for the misreporting of the entire conference as being about blaming women, or blaming feminists, when anyone watching or attending the conference can see it wasn't (again, see here: https://www.youtube.com/playlist?list=PLHLREeMe4S0OmV_BYAfWNWi0qQzu2FWzK), do you plan to issue any clarifications or retractions so that others relying on you as a source will be able to give a more balanced view of the conference and its attendees?

12) Attendees, including one professional journalist who was there who asked to remain anonymous for the purposes of this reporting, described you as frequently hostile, shaking with rage, asking questions in robotic and even sneering fashion of attendees. Others, who you also wrote on, report that you did not talk to them at all. Can you explain to us if you were angry while you were at our event, and what exactly you were angry about? Do you feel you may have anger issues that may have tainted your reporting? And again, do you feel that what you were doing was reporting or just opining?

13) MSNBC's Alex Wagner, apparently using you as a source, claimed that at the conference the message was that "every single one" of men's problems were the fault of women and/or feminism. The video of the entire conference shows that this is clearly, and unequivocally, untrue. Wagner even blamed us for inventing the word "rapey" when the only use of it we can recall was by Dr. Palmatier who explained how much she hated this word. Did you have any direct contact with Alex Wagner or her production staff before they aired their ridiculous hit piece here? And do you have any opinion, at all, on whether it was appropriate for MSNBC and/or Alex Wagner to run this piece without themselves interviewing Dr. Tara Palmatier or any of the other conference presenters to get their opinions and their takes? What is your relationship with Alex Wagner and her staff, if any?

I have CC'd a member of Alex Wagner's staff so she can see these questions and ponder them herself. Please note that we will be running our profile on you and your reporting this week, along with a profile and report on two other journalists who we believe egregiously misled their readers to a national audience, and that if we don't hear from you by end of business on Monday July 7 we will print that you had no response at this time. If on the other hand you feel you need more time to formulate a response, please feel free to let me know.

And Allison, if you have any further questions for us, please do feel free to reach out, before we do our piece on what we feel to be Alex Wagner lying to a national audience about our conference, its presenters, and its attendees.

Thanks much, hope you're both having a good 4th of July weekend.

As of now, we assume Adam Serwer's response is "no comment" until we hear further from him.

For now, we will close this sorry story of the unethical, unprofessional, and just plain dishonest reporting of Adam Serwer of MSNBC. We will just repeat for the rest of the press: we don't hate you; indeed, we don't hate anybody. We do hate lies, and if you lie about us or our supporters, expect to be called out on it, publicly, and without apology. We're as much a part of the media as you are, and you'd better get used to it.

- Two errors in the original email, Erin Pizzey gave the searing opinion of feminism, not Mike Buchanan, who tells us that that statement is not one he would make although he sees some truth to it, and we accidentally sent Adam a link to all the videos in the part where we meant to give him Dr. Palmatier's video, though he could have found it himself with less than a minute's effort anyway.

A Trigger Warning About Trigger Warnings

Catreece Macleod · 10 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Before we begin dissecting the concept of trigger warnings, let us first define trigger warnings.

A trigger warning is a warning mentioned at the beginning of a piece of media in much the same way someone would place a spoiler warning, except the spoiler in this case is that you might be offended or trigger a bout of anxiety.

Urban Dictionary, however, describes trigger warnings a little differently:

> "A phrase posted at the beginning of various posts, articles, or blogs. Its purpose is to warn weak minded people who are easily offended that they might find what is being posted offensive in some way due to its content, causing them to overreact or otherwise start acting like a dipshit. Popular on reddit SRS or other places that social justice warriors like to hang out."

Not entirely inaccurate, all things considered, but there's more to it than that.

The purpose of this article is to break down why trigger warnings are in and of themselves actually quite harmful to the very people they supposedly attempt to protect.

Even the mere mention of a "trigger warning" tells someone that a topic is being discussed, which means that they've already been triggered by the trigger warning, so the whole concept of trigger warnings is nonsensical by default before we even cover how harmful they are in practice; by their very own reasoning, a trigger warning is a trigger, so now you need a warning for your warning so you can warn while you warn. Silly, huh?

One of the biggest frustrations here is that the only real way to "fix" this—other than by removing trigger warnings entirely—is to place a warning that there's a trigger warning since even the trigger warning itself can be a trigger to the overly sensitive since it specifically denotes the fact that whatever the trigger warning is in reference to is something bad.

It gets to the point where simply seeing a trigger warning could potentially create fear and anxiety before even knowing what the trigger warning is even about. Just the mere fact that there's a trigger warning at all states you have a reason to be afraid.

Don't believe me? Let's get into the specifics of how this is even possible.

No Pain, No Gain

That's right, work it! Feel the burn from the flamers!

Well, perhaps not, but the concept is sort of true. When it comes to physical exercise, that pain you feel is the muscles being torn slightly as they're forced outside of their physical limitations. The body reacts by rebuilding the muscles stronger for next time, making them more durable and more capable of withstanding the same rigors that harmed them in the first place.

The same goes for mental exercise: no pain, no gain. Much in the same way as muscles rebuild stronger, your mind makes associations and builds upon new neural paths via repetition.

So let's say you have a phobia of spiders. How is this normally treated? By exposing an individual to spiders. Go figure. Maybe pictures of spiders, perhaps actually touching a live spider—it depends on the severity of what the individual has for a phobia and how far along they are in their treatment.

The concept is quite simple: if you associate spiders with "doesn't hurt" or "not bad" frequently enough, where you aren't harmed, eventually your brain creates an association with the idea that spiders aren't bad. Over time, the previous association with “spiders = fear” will gradually be forgotten, and the new association will override it.

The reverse works as well, which is a problem when it comes to trigger warnings. If you have a trigger warning that says TRIGGER WARNING – SEXUAL VIOLENCE, all you’ve managed to do is reinforce the concept that even thinking about sexual violence, much less discussing it, is something to be fearful of.

In this manner, it becomes impossible to ever overcome the fear of such. Rather than susceptible readers being able to talk about the issue or recover, the trigger warnings continually and perpetually reinforce the concept for susceptible readers until even the mere mention of such is enough to “trigger” someone.

In effect, the trigger warnings themselves are a positive reinforcement of fear.

Note that by the term “positive reinforcement,” I don’t mean it’s beneficial. What this means is that it re-emphasizes that pattern of thought, making the fear worse than it was before.

In this manner, proper positive reinforcement would be to try to associate the concept of sexual violence with something along the lines of recognizing that the vast majority of people aren’t sexually violent.

The negative reinforcement method would be to actively discourage fear of the topic, such as by telling yourself, “No, I’m strong enough to overcome this.”

Knowledge Is Power, Information Is Ammunition, and You Are Unarmed.

The above statement is true, so let’s see about arming you, shall we?

When you’re afraid of a topic, you are at the mercy of that topic, regardless of what it is. This is true of all forms of fear: you either control your fear or your fear controls you. Pick one or the other because you can’t have it both ways.

Knowledge is the primary tool to break the grip of fear.

For example, I’m scared of flying. Planes feel like they’re made from cheap plastic, the negative g’s you get on takeoff and landing are terrifying, and you hear about plane crashes all over the news.

However … I’ve watched more than enough of the show Mayday, which involves re-enactments of plane crashes, and then the forensic work to figure out how they happened.

You’d think I’d be even more terrified by this kind of a TV show … and yet the opposite is quite true. The thing I’ve learned is that plane crashes are amazingly rare, which is why they stand out as being so important in the news. I also learned that for every plane crash that occurs, they will spend months and years researching it into the ground, and then arrange a list of recommendations to enforce that will prevent it from ever happening again. It’s through knowledge that I learned I have a higher risk of dying in a car accident on the way to the airport than I have a risk of my plane crashing.

The fear-mongering that goes on in the media is the primary cause of why people become afraid of this crap in the first place.

I used to be afraid that I would be raped. I used to be afraid that I would be a victim of domestic violence. I used to be afraid of a lot of things, really … and then I actually did my research and found out how ridiculously overinflated these issues had become.

One in three women will be raped in their lifetime … we’ve heard this quote a lot lately, haven’t we? It’s terrifying! Isn’t that horrible? Wouldn’t you be right to be scared shitless about that?

You would be, if it were true. Except … it’s not. Not even remotely.

The origin of this statistic is laughable.

The original study, headed by Mary Koss, is ridiculous. For example, if a man offers a woman a drink in a bar and the woman declines and he loses all interest afterward, that would be classified as “attempted rape” because the thought process was that a woman can’t consent to sex while drunk (though the same study claims men can somehow magically consent while drunk) and that the only reason to offer a drink is to attempt to have sex with her.

From there, this “attempted rape” is filed under “attempted sexual assault,” which eventually becomes conflated into “sexual assault” in general and gets rolled into the “20% of women are sexually assaulted” statistic. From there, it’s misquoted into “20% of women are raped,” or 1 in 5. Another hop and a skip along, and the 1 in 5 is misquoted time and again until it’s 1 in 4, and then 1 in 3.

Congratulations, we’ve just gone from a guy offering a drink and being declined and losing interest after that to a claim of a woman actually being raped.

What do you find when you go through this kind of information and look at the actual numbers? The more accurate statistic is that about 2% of women will be raped in their lifetime.

That’s still too high, as that still means 1 in 50. But that’s a lot better than what we’ve been told, and it certainly makes me feel a lot more comfortable to realize my chances of being raped are a hell of a lot less than I first thought they were.

Knowledge will set you free from fear. When you learn the truth, that’s when you realize you’re in a much safer position than you thought you were and you can garner a bit of comfort from that. When you realize that at least 98% of men aren’t rapists, and in fact absolutely find the mere concept abhorrent, it’s a lot easier to relax around guys in general.

A culture of fear can only exist by telling people they’re constantly in a state of extreme risk. The single greatest tool to combat that fear is knowledge of how low that risk really, truly is.

The Truth Will Set You Free—But First It Will Piss You Off

Have you ever gone swimming? The water seeming just a bit too cold, you probably didn’t want to do more than dip in your toe. If you jump in, though, it’s all over in a moment and you can enjoy yourself afterward.

This is much the same correlation with trigger warnings in relation to topics that bother you. So long as you dip your toe in, yes, the water will be cold, but if you jump into the debate, dig through the statistics and studies, and do your research, you’ll find that the pain and discomfort only lasts a short time, letting you get back to your regular life a lot quicker.

The thing is, though, as you learn how much you’ve been lied to by propaganda and fear-mongering, you’re probably going to get pissed off.

I know I certainly wasn’t amused to learn just how mangled the domestic violence and rape statistics I kept hearing were. It was more than a little frustrating to realize that there were people out there continually feeding me bullshit just so they could profit from my fear.

If you want to not live your life in perpetual fear, you have to confront the things you’re scared of. Looking at statistics that show how rare something is can help you realize it’s exceptionally unlikely to happen to you, for instance. You could go to a support group or discover others who have had similar issues and learn how they got through them and returned to their lives once more. Therapy is another major option. Hell, just reading up on ways to prevent such events can let you take command of your life rather than being a leaf on the wind.

Get Over It

Seriously, I have to agree with the Eagles on this one—”Get over it,” and not just because it’s a catchy song.

Sure, it’s probably going to sting a bit, but that’s the trade-off: one tiny bit of hurt in the short-term to be able to free yourself of the problem forever.

It really comes down to deciding whether you want to take control over your own life or whether you are willing to wallow perpetually in misery for fear that anyone might even mention or hint at something that bothers you.

It's that simple: misery for life or get on with your life. Which is more important to you? Having victim status forever or not being triggered into a fit of misery over the tiniest of things?

It's not that simple to carry through on the "get over it" option, but really, what is as easy to do as it is to say you will do it? Not much in life, to be blunt, and anything worth doing tends to be pretty hard.

It is worth it, though, to escape from the snare of fear.

If you trigger something often enough and nothing bad happens, you associate it and the event with being safe. If you trigger something and panic, running away in fear, then all you've done is associate it with terror, which reinforces the problem as I stated earlier.

Trigger warnings perpetuate the act of running away, plain and simple. Will you face your fears, and be free of them, or let them rule your life?

Have you ever been assaulted? Raped? Attacked? The best cure is to surround yourself with similar people who won't do that sort of thing to you. If a black man raped you, make friends with some really great black men, and you'll learn it was one individual who was a total piece of shit instead of all black men, for instance. If you run away any time anyone even mentions assault, or black men, or whatever, you're just going to reinforce to yourself the idea that all situations even remotely similar are worthy of fear by association, even when they're not.

We know racism is wrong, so you probably don't really have a problem with black men, do you? But we've managed to convince ourselves as a society that you can't be sexist against men, so it's fine to be afraid of him as a MAN, but not a BLACK man.

Yet that's all trigger warnings really are—they're racist, they're sexist, they're whateverist, when you think about it. It's fear and prejudice against something without a rational cause by applying it to all instances of whatever it is in a discriminatory fashion.

Whatever it is that you're afraid of enough to need a trigger warning, it needs to be discussed rationally to deal with it. When you fall to fear alone, you lose all hope of ever tackling the problem.

So again, we come back to the same point again.

Get over it.

You do no one a favour by living in fear—especially not yourself.

Let the nonsensical trigger warning craze just die already. It has done nothing but instill further fear into those who would otherwise be able to make a full recovery.

You may notice that this site doesn't have trigger warnings, at least, none that are serious rather than in parody. There's a reason for that. We don't support fear-mongering, nor victimizing people further by preventing them from overcoming their fears.

We're not afraid anymore, and you don't have to be either.

Why do some women “get it” quicker than men?

Catreece Macleod · 11 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I had an interesting conversation recently with John Narayan of Melbourne, Australia, and he had a question that I think warrants further discussion.

He asked, “Why do the women in the movement seem to just get it so much easier than the men?”

I had a few answers for him at the time, but I’ve found myself dwelling on the issue for a few days now, and the one overwhelming conclusion I’ve come to is that it’s indicative of a much deeper problem—one that emphasizes the need for the men’s human rights movement in the first place.

Is it even true?

At first, I wasn’t honestly sure. Maybe yes, maybe no. It was hard to guarantee one way or the other, though with the Honey Badgers, me, and several other rapidly rising females within the movement, the question did seem to hold some significant merit.

I couldn’t guarantee 100% as a falsifiable statement that it was guaranteed to be true or false, but I could state that, from checking with the personal experience of quite a few different major names in the MHRM over Skype, that the consensus seems to be that the women who do get involved distinctly do appear to catch onto the full scope of the problems men face and the importance for activism in regards to such much quicker than the average man in the movement.

I’m sure there are those out there who would love to claim this is further “proof” that women are smarter than men, but I’m a skeptic and under even cursory examination, that doesn’t seem to be the case.

Rather, there’s quite a few reasons to be addressed, and likely even more than I’ve discovered myself so far. By the end of this article you’ll have your answer, but first we need to work our way through to that point.

So, for now, let’s break this into three main sections: a) The Cons Men Have; b) The Pros Women Have; c) The Conclusion Reached.

The Cons Men Have

Due to the very nature of what it is we’re fighting, men actually are at a bit of a significant disadvantage when it comes to realizing where they’ve been harmed, much less realizing, let alone accepting, the full scope of just how bad things have become.

First and foremost, men have been practically taught from birth at this point not to question the “fact” that they have supreme privilege over absolutely everything and then some. This set of blinders is instilled in a variety of ways which makes it remarkably effective.

In particular, one may note that the whole concept of “male privilege” flat out means that men are somehow “superiour” to women, that they have more power, more strength, etc. etc.

It’s an ego stroke, and a big one at that, yet phrased as a backhanded compliment. Even so, the fact remains that people in general like to think of themselves as powerful in some way or another typically. As a quick example, from Sparta to Nazi Germany, women were taught that they were powerful as they birthed the most powerful men in existence. This method of “Oooh you’re so biiig and strooong” has been played out throughout history time and again to lure people into going along with a raw deal, such as having your children removed from you at an early age. Play up to the ego, and people will make all sorts of concessions to their rights.

Truly, if you look at it, a lot of guys actually like the idea of being supposedly all powerful. After all, power means you have control over your life, and when you’re treated as little more than a mule, that supposed control is often the only thing keeping people from rebelling.

Once you wipe away the yellow paint and discover it's lead instead of gold, however, that's when suicide starts to kick in from the sudden realization of helplessness and total lack of hope.

In fact, society itself has been structured in such a way that men are continually reinforced, both via positive and negative reinforcement, to accept their role.

Terms like "Man up" showcase this quite well, but so do many other things, such as berating men who cry, or avoiding men who require help. A man should help himself and others, never should he be on the receiving end.

With such a pervasive mindset which is reinforced from all sides, it's actually quite shameful for men to even so much as question what society is doing to them.

With post-modernist discourse gradually taking over our culture, especially in the areas where one is normally supposed to encourage asking questions such as universities, rather than questioning the status-quo, men are now being told quite frequently to shut the fuck up, or to check their privilege, or otherwise do damned near anything but speak up.

As stated, universities are supposed to be the place where we challenge assertions of reality, and break down the narrative to place it against scientific rigor – however, as of the last few decades, especially in the "social sciences", which are hardly science at all, it's changed so that the whole point now is that if it "feels" right, it must be right, no matter how many piles of evidence you have to the contrary..

And, after all, men being more advantaged than women "feels" right on so many levels, so is it really surprising that it can be difficult for a man to even consider the areas where he might not be?

Additionally, for every thing that hurts a man, there's always a justification that it's okay – it's helping society or women or someone else, so it's fine if they get hurt. It's manly to get hurt, after all, when it's in defense of someone else!

With this in mind, even if a man is grievously wounded emotionally, it often just doesn't register as a "bad" thing.

A woman raped by a man? HORRIBLE! How could he be such a monster!?

A man raped by a woman? Well, she must have needed it pretty badly, so it's a noble sacrifice to be made to make her happy.

Women have been taught that they're in need of protection, that they're delicate flowers and need to be cared for, while men have been told they're garbage whose only value occurs when they're being harmed to help someone other than themselves.

In short, men have a laundry list of programming and propaganda to break through which specifically targets them as individuals and as a group.

In addition to that, however, is the origins of where the men of the movement come from. Most men aren't interested in men's rights, largely for the reasons above. So where do the men that we do get come from? Well, largely they come after that "red-pill moment", when something so vehemently terrible occurs to them that the facade of power crumbles away and they see the rotten husk of subservience beneath.

Going through divorce court, family court, being raped by a woman, things like these major events are required to deal enough trauma to shake free the belief it's "all men's fault".

As such, the vast bulk of the men of the MHRM are actually just average guys who have been horribly wounded and come seeking answers. They aren't always the best, nor the brightest among men; they're average joes on the street who got nailed hard. They're still mostly indoctrinated, and still have to fight through a large chunk of that programming and propaganda a bit at a time.

Largely, these individuals are only aware of the depth of problems on a highly cursory level – they've glimpsed it, but don't really understand just how rotten things are.

Even many of the major male leaders of the MHRM have taken years to dig through the bullshit before they could truly grasp the severity of the situation.

There are some truly brilliant minds out there who have caught on quick without issue at all, but you'll also find they're the minority, as is to be expected.

The Pros Women Have

So men have some disadvantages, got it. The real question is, however, do women have some advantages in this particular arena? We sure do. Let's take a quick look at a few of them, shall we?

First off, while women have been undergoing a heavy dose of indoctrination of dogma and propaganda themselves, a large portion of this is limited to "you're a victim!" and "men are bad, mm'kay?".

Given that the vast majority of the women in the MHRM aren't interested in being victims, all that really takes is the slightest hint of compassion for fellow carbon based meat units – I mean, uh, humans – to discount most of the rest of the female programming.

With this in mind, it's relatively simple of a task for intelligent women to break down the programming thrown at them compared to the far more intensive programming the men have been force-fed.

After all, we covered that most people want to be powerful, and as such, for men being told they're strong it's a lot harder to admit that they're weak, than it is for women being told they're weak to admit that they're strong.

The next major thing that crops up is when we look at how women are taught better communication skills in general.

Often women are taught from a young age to pick apart arguments and go looking for the tiniest of cracks in anything that's being discussed. This is normally done with a bit of a malicious intent, but it can be easily turned towards potent debating skills.

Another major bonus women in the movement have is that they've been largely taught their whole lives to be on the lookout for pain and suffering, while men have been taught to ignore it. When a man is hurt, he's systematically taught to shrug it off and ignore it, while the woman is taught to try to remove herself from the situation or to remove whatever it is that's harming her.

To that end, it shouldn't be surprising to us when a woman is more likely to actively try to seek out exactly what a problem is, rather than ignoring it. After all, this is what we see with our health, is it not? A woman feels sick, and she'll probably go see a doctor. If a man feels sick, he'll probably try to wait for it to go away rather than get it checked.

This callous attitude towards personal injury often means that wives the world over have frequently had to be the voice of reason to tell their husbands to go see a doctor in the past, and it's largely the same reason the women in the MHRM are needed to tell the men that the horrible things society has been doing to them should probably be looked into rather than ignored.

Really, though, the biggest advantage the average woman in the MHRM has over the average man in seeing the problems men face, is that the average woman in the MHRM isn't the average woman.

Seriously, think about it – the average male MRA is such largely because they're just a normal guy who's been wounded.

The average female MRA isn't your average gal, though – she's vastly more likely to be a powerful critical thinker and someone who rejects feminism already. She likely came to the MHRM without needing to be prodded by a red-pill moment, but rather probably figured it out on her own.

In large part, we're essentially comparing the cream of the crop of women to the average man, to which one should really not be all that surprised when that comparison winds up being lopsided.

When we compare someone like Karen Straughan to James Huff, for instance, suddenly there really isn't that large of a gap any longer. They're both brilliant minds, and excellent at what they do. I don't personally agree with either one 100% of the time, by any means, yet there's no argument at all that they're wonderful critical thinkers.

The average male MRA is… well, the average male.

The average female MRA is anything but the average female.

And hence, we find the key behind the odd dichotomy.

The Conclusion Reached

With all of this in mind, there are a few things we can surmise.

The first on that list is simply that the MHRM attracts both critical thinkers and the average man, yet typically only seems to attract the critical thinkers when it comes to women.

The second thing we discover is that the men, in general, have a systematic set of factors which actively deter them from actually even considering if there's something harmful being used against them, and even if there is, they're furthermore conditioned to ignore it even if they know that to be the case.

The fact that so many men are joining the MHRM when they're specifically being trained from birth to ignore their problems should be a major indication that something is really, seriously fucking wrong.

Women are taught to complain the moment they're uncomfortable, hence why "micro-aggressions" are even a thing at all.

Men, on the other hand, are taught to endure, and by the time a man speaks up, it's generally because it's already at a life-or-death level of importance.

As such, we should be horrified that men are starting to speak up in such large numbers… if a man speaks up at all, it's usually a sign of serious, major problems because they simply don't tend to do so unless they've already exhausted all other options available to them to tackle the problem on their own.

The third conclusion to be reached is that the MHRM desperately needs women within its ranks. It's not that women are better than men, or that they fill a minority quota, but because men have been so heavily conditioned to ignore being harmed that, even when it's staring them right in the face, they still tend to ignore it.

Women have the advantage of being outsiders, especially when they're the critical thinkers that the movement tends to attract.

This means that the women in the MHRM are often better suited to seeing the elephant in the room that the men have been taught to glaze over and often can't even see when it's right there.

With all this in mind, I think I can actually answer John's question, now.

Yes, the women in the movement do seem to "get it" quicker than the men do, on average, and the fact that this is the case is in fact evidence of just how disenfranchised the men actually are.

The fact that men are even starting to recognize the yoke tied around their collective neck at all is an indication that they've been beaten in the face so often that the blinders have been knocked out of place.

The harder society tries to force men into subservience, and the more blows to the head they take, the better a view they're going to get of their chains.

We're a pair of oxen, really, side by side – each one chained and wearing blinders, only able to see the chains upon the other.

Which is exactly why we keep being told not to look at each other. It's all hate speech. It's all anger and pointless bickering, or patriarchy, or whatever. The absolute last thing that anyone wants us to do is to look at each other and actually open a dialogue where one of us might inadvertently slip up and say “Do you find those chains you’re wearing heavy?”

After all, if we turn our heads and state “But you’re the one wearing the chains…” we might both have it click, and suddenly realize that we’ve both been bound this whole time.

And if that ever happens on a large scale, all hell is going to break loose.

With the first International Men’s Conference on Men’s Issues completed, that day is nearer than it has ever been. The day when we actually talk with one another and truly understand how screwed over we’ve both been. The day when we set aside our differences and help one another. The day when we finally make a better tomorrow for everyone, for men and women combined.

And I look forwards to it.

Tomorrow is closer than you think.

On Journalism and Bucky Turco

Paul Elam · 11 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I would like to invite all men's activists, no matter how experienced you are with unfair and biased treatment in the media, to go open a trash can lid before reading this.

Done? Good.

Now, please take any idea you have ever had about bad reportage, of the lack of integrity and objectivity of which a journalist could possibly be guilty, and throw it directly into the trash.

Close the lid securely. You will never see bad journalism the same way again.

Enter Bucky Turco (no, I did not lift that name from a rejected Sopranos script), a writer for Animal New York, who attended, however briefly, the press conference for the First International Conference on Men's Issues on June 26.

Turco subsequently wrote a hit piece on the actual conference, which he never attended. That, in and of itself, is not too surprising. There were media writers who attended and also went violently on the attack.

The difference, however, is that this time we get a slight peek behind the scenes into how this guy's mind actually works. What we find is an unctuous sleaziod so vile and disingenuous that he makes Monica Hesse and David Futrelle look like Woodward and Bernstein.

Following is a recording of a conversation he had with operations manager Dean Esmay. Note the sneering and condescension he offered about two children who were at the event, and how critical he was of their behavior – as well as the implications about their parenting.

The fact is that both of these children are autistic. I happen to know because I have met them and met their families. One of the two boys, to which I have become quite attached, by the way, was tugging at the lanyards of some attendees. Part of his condition is an obsession with things being in order. The way the lanyards were hanging irregularly off the necks of some attendees was upsetting to him and he was trying to correct that in order to feel more comfortable.

Actually, it would have made a good story for the setting, given the disproportionate incidence of autism in boys. Well, it would have had there been a real journalist on hand.

Instead, there was Bucky Turco.

It is clear from the conversation that Turco's only interest was in digging about the two boys and questioning Dean because he mistakenly thought the mother was his wife. It is also clear that he suspected Dean of forcing and restricting her to the parking lot outside in order to get his kids out of the way.

The mother was actually Dean's ex-wife, and she was there in support of her husband, AVFM writer John Ribner. She was not forced into the parking lot, as I am betting she will show up in the comments and gladly tell you. She was being a supportive partner to her husband and a loving mother to her children, which Turco desperately wanted to reframe as two undisciplined brats being booted to the parking lot with the little wife playing the involuntary babysitter.

When he found out he was wrong, he did not bat an eye. He just stayed on the attack, looking for anything to twist into dirt.

I would start a rant here, but all I can think of is metaphors for pond scum and various kinds of excrement.

Mind you, all this is set against the backdrop of Turco listening to about five minutes of a press conference (his words) and then misleading his readers into thinking he had attended and reported on the entire event. He even titled the piece "Inside the First International Conference on Men's Issues." As you will hear in the recording, he was never inside anything more than his own twisted imagination.

There is more, including his ridiculous attempt to cast doubt on the idea of threats to the conference that were reported to Detroit Police. Turco, investigative genius that he is, tried to debunk that story by questioning the wrong police department. That, too, is on the recording.

At this point, the best thing to do is allow you to just listen, but I have to warn you, you might want to have that trash can handy, especially if you have eaten in the last week. And be prepared to see and hear more tomorrow, as Dean Esmay and John Ribner do a live hangout on the story.

There will be enough facts to make Turco run like Carl Lewis in the other direction.

Either way, welcome, ladies and gentlemen, to the new low of lows in the modern culture of jaundiced journalism. Bucky Turco has set the bar, and you can wipe the soles of your shoes on it.

 Clarification: re: “Mind you, all this is set against the backdrop of Turco listening to about five minutes of a press conference (his words) and then misleading his readers into thinking he had attended and reported on the entire event.”

It is agreed that Turco was physically present at the press conference for more than five minutes. The reference to the five minutes was taken directly from Turco’s phone conversation with Dean Esmay at 5:45 of the recording. Whether Turco was at the press conference for five minutes or for the duration does not change the fact that he never attended the main conference, a separate event entirely from the press conference, which featured a significantly different lineup of speakers, was advertised and ticketed separately, and had different admission standards than the press conference. Turco was aware of this as he had requested and had been granted free admission to the main conference, which he did not attend. Turco misled his readers at Animal New York to believe he had attended the conference, which he had not.

 Update 2: A version with much-improved sound has been uploaded and is now shown here, for anyone who was having trouble hearing it clearly before. Still isn’t perfect but should be better.

What Is Stop Violence Against Men Day?

Angry Harry · 11 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Stop Violence Against Men Day – which occurs on the first day of every month – is a day in which people are reminded that violence against men is just as wrong as is violence against anyone else.

After all, men are human beings too!

Furthermore, violence against men is, and has been, a huge problem right across the planet – for many thousands of years, spreading misery among millions of people.

Indeed, wars throughout the whole of history have, essentially, been wars against men.

True, most of the perpetrators are men, but any intelligent person knows full well that any victims of violence are victims of violence; regardless of who is the perpetrator.

And yet people nowadays seem to think that if, for example, men are violently assaulted by other men, then the assaulted men just do not count as victims.

Male victims are simply swept under the carpet

These male victims are simply swept under the carpet, psychologically speaking, and they are cunningly disappeared from view.

Indeed, the official domestic violence statistics also sweep them under the carpet by specifically excluding male victims of domestic violence if the perpetrators are men.

There is no moral justification for this. It seems to be just a ploy to hide the true scale of the problem of violence against men.

Indeed, many media organisations such as the BBC bend over backwards to hide the sex of the victims of just about anything whenever these victims are men, but they highlight and headline their sex to an almost embarrassing degree whenever these victims are women.

Men dying from prostate cancer become ‘patients’, ‘sufferers’, ‘people’, ‘hospital inmates’, ‘those afflicted with the disease’.

When men are killed in, say, Iraq, then they are ‘Iraqis’, ‘ Americans’, ‘insurgents’, ‘terrorists’, ‘troops’, ‘soldiers’, ‘recruits’, ‘combatants’, ‘fighters”, ‘pilots’, ‘crew’, ‘the enemy’, the ‘allies’.

When men die in mines then they are ‘miners’, ‘excavators’, ‘workers’, ’employees’, ‘locals’.

Whenever any victims are women, however, then they are “women, women and women”.

The appalling levels of violence directed at men throughout the whole of history is often craftily discounted

Similarly, the appalling levels of violence directed at men throughout the whole of history is often craftily discounted by pointing out that it is men who have mostly been at the heads of the powers that have inflicted this violence.

And this is true.

For example, the reigning monarchs in Europe for the past 1500 years or so have been mostly men. And in earlier times, the great leaders of, for example, Persia, Egypt, Greece and Rome were nearly always men.

But these rulers and their elites have both gained and used their powers mostly by enslaving and/or slaughtering millions of men.

Indeed, it is mostly through inflicting violence upon men, or threatening to do so, that they managed to accrue so much power – and to hold on to it – in the first place.

Essentially, violence against men was the route to power.

(For the most part, and comparatively speaking, the women were mostly left to get on with their reproductive roles and their domestic chores.)

History provides us with countless examples of men being slaughtered or enslaved with impunity, with millions of men also being forced into becoming soldiers in order to serve their rulers; oftentimes also being heavily indoctrinated with carefully-crafted mumbo-jumbo in order to turn them into mindless sacrificial drones willing to serve their masters.

Nowadays, in western countries, the situation for men is not so bad.

The vast majority of victims of violence – unjustified violence, that is – are men

But it is still the case that the vast majority of victims of violence – unjustified violence, that is – are men.

This issue needs to be addressed rather than ignored.

But while billions of dollars in the western world are poured annually into campaigns designed to reduce violence against women, there is almost no money at all to support campaigns to do the same for men, even though men make up the vast majority of victims of violence; both at home and abroad.

And so Stop Violence Against Men Day is just an attempt to highlight this problem by making people more aware that violence against men is just as wrong as is violence against anyone else, and that men make up the vast majority of victims when it comes to violence.

So, please spread the word by, for example, linking to this piece, or by referring to “Stop Violence Against Men Day” whenever it seems appropriate to do so – especially on the first day of every month!

#WhenWeSayYES Profits from Dishonesty and Insecurity

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 11 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Last year, Women, Action, and the Media (WAM!) wrote an ultimatum to Facebook to "demand swift, comprehensive and effective action addressing the representation of rape and domestic violence on Facebook." The campaign resulted in the removal of content that could be considered offensive to both men and women, but WAM!'s language explicitly targeted content that was in some way critical to women or feminism alone. Consequences of this campaign included the removal of content that was critical of feminism but was in no way hateful.

The Body is Not An Apology (BNA) was one of the many signatories to WAM!'s ultimatum, which means that it contributed to censorship under false pretenses.

Let us fast-forward to the present. Just recently, BNA launched #WhenWeSayYES to raise $80,000 for a website.

Why? Because they think Facebook is censoring them.

After I demolished my house laughing at the irony, I sat reflecting on the dishonesty while gnawing thoughtfully on a roof shingle. I am now writing this at a nearby library where twelve-year-olds are requesting that I stop being ginger so they can better focus on the serious and productive festivities in which twelve-year-olds often partake.

BNA sells itself as a platform to express and celebrate "radical self-love." I don't know what "radical self-love" is, but after perusing the BNA website, it seems to be something you pay BNA for after crying over unflattering comments about yourself on the Internet. Radical self-love entails "unapologetically" loving your body, as if someone would expect an apology for seeing your body otherwise.

I'm of the mind that sometimes the best thing you can do for someone is to tell them what they don't want to hear. When I weighed 285 pounds ("I'm not fat, I'm adipose-challenged"), I needed someone to tell me: "My house was two stories tall before you went upstairs, could you please save that donut in your fat mitt for one sec—Okay, don't, but at least CHEW!"

Self-esteem is apparently so scarce that people will tolerate its packaging for resale. BNA sells a warm feeling, and nothing more. This is as depressing as paying for a therapist because you cannot approach anyone you love with your problems.

Is BNA a force against cultural intolerance? Not according to its track record. It perpetuated hatred before, and it is currently building a platform on personal insecurities so it can finally control the message once and for all. BNA helped censor the self-actualized while selling self-love by subscription.

Let's look at the campaign's self-defeating copy.

From the section "How will we use the money?"

> - Pay our dedicated staff of volunteers who work tirelessly to develop uplifting content, share thought-provoking writing, and keep our movement accessible to all. ($32,000)

For a movement full of people ready to shove a dictionary open to the word "feminism" in your face, you'd think they'd at least know what "volunteer" means. Maybe they never got past the "F"s.

> - Pay for the cost of developing the world's most comprehensive online information, education, and community-building platform focused exclusively on radical self-love as a tool for personal transformation and global justice. We've partnered with Everyday Feminism, a group that loves our mission and is willing to build our new website at a fraction of its full cost. (Estimated value of the website: $100,000. Our cost:

> $40,000.)

Why do you need $40,000 to tell people to love themselves, and how did you get the cost for "a tool for global justice" down to one-third the cost of one-acre plots with ugly houses on them? And as a web consultant of eight years, I doubt that you couldn't go lower than $40,000. If you could find someone willing to chop off $60,000 of the "estimated" $100,000, then there is no way in hell that negotiation is over.

If you want more proof that BNA is selling a feeling, look at the $10,000 contribution reward on the fundraiser:

[image]
Bah, my kids don't need college.
The founder of the movement comes over for an hour and reads you a poem—excuse me, "personal commissioned piece"—in front of your guests.

How can someone have $10,000 lying around to throw at something like that and still have something to be insecure about? The only reason one would ever have guests willing to come to events like these is because the guests know the host farts money.

At least Sonya takes some money out of that $10,000 to pay for travel and—

> - [We use the money to] Cover the fees of IndieGoGo and perk fulfillment. ($8,000)

Uh, okay. I can understand using funds for perks, but Sonya taking credit for "covering costs" was pretty rude. But wait, she even says that "International travel is possible if the contributor covers the cost of travel and accommodations." Sonya is as wide as I am tall, so saying that $8,000 can't handle shipping Sonya's self-loving ass is grounds for a The Biggest Loser nomination. An international contributor who donated $10,000 needs to pay again for one-eighth of a slumber party.

Anita Sarkeesian does more work than this!

Folks, when we say feminism has an industry, this is what we mean. As much as I'd love to keep making fat jokes, I should stop before this article becomes the next 0% ROI vehicle for the easily offended. If the products and results are invisible, then the money flows anyway. It doesn't have to make sense.

If Facebook can be pinned into submission by an open letter written by feminists, and if people will seriously consider giving away money to organizations like BNA, what does this tell you about power?

BNA does not want you to love yourself for who you are, it wants you to depend on it as a substitute for loving yourself. It's a psychological trick that BNA can't perform if the tech giant it helped wrestle into submission isn't controlling the message exactly how BNA wishes at all times. In order for BNA to make money, it needs people to feel weak and miserable. The emotionally defeated will shell out for any social acceptance they were conditioned to want.

You may think I made a mistake by spreading awareness of this campaign, but BNA already has 34,000+ supporters and some press. The intention is to show how many people are buying self-worth like a drug, and to ask why they choose not to get stronger on their own while saving their money.

To those who think BNA is providing a valuable service, I ask that you seriously reconsider your understanding of self-love. Self-love is a complicated skill that can only be learned through raw experience, not lectures or half-assed thank-yous. If you pay for self-love, then you either, by definition, do not possess the confidence to love yourself or you assume that love comes by covenant. Watching people fund BNA is like watching a lamb offering a lamb chop to a wolf in sheep's clothing.

This is not love, this is sick.

MHRM: counterculture or subculture?

Peter Wright & Paul Elam · 12 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Post-gynocentric attitudes are entertained by an increasing number of people, and by groups like those focused on Men's Human Rights Advocacy (MHRAs), Women Against Feminism (WAF), and Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). While they all demonstrate a reaction against gynocentric culture, it's an error to conceptualize them as engaging in countercultural activity alone.

It should be noted that countercultural involvement is not always conscious and may be an unintended byproduct of committments that clash with the dominant culture. There are few examples of this better than Men Going Their Own Way. They demonstrate a new model for culture, and comprise a peaceful subcultural demographic that is at once countercultural, simply by going about their lives within the larger society.

Before we get to what 'going about their lives' means, let's first make a few distinctions.

To clarify the distinction between subculture and counterculture, the following passages from Howard P. Chudacoff's book 'The Age of the Bachelor' are instructive. Chudacoff asks if the values, behaviors and institutions typical of bachelors comprise a subculture — in other words, a subset of the general culture — or whether they are part of a counterculture that openly conflicts with the general culture. He begins by defining the difference between subculture and counterculture:

> "A subculture exists as a reasonably benign component of a more general culture. The defining characteristics of a subculture may include such qualities as age, ethnicity, region or occupation. The elderly, the Irish, southerner's, and carpenters are all subcultures. As well, a subculture may consist of people tied to each other by mutual special interests, such as bird watching, gun ownership or vegetarianism. According to one authority, the most important element in distinguishing a subculture is the degree to which values, artifacts and identities are shared among members. Such sharing is normally enhanced by the extent of conscious social separation between members of the smaller behavioral group and members of the larger society. Thus hair color can characterize a group but in itself is not a strong enough criterion for special separation — though certain cohorts of redheads or blonds might disagree. Youth or an interest in bird watching, by contrast, more likely would be sufficient qualities to create a subculture.
> In an article published in 1960, J. Milton Yinger, a sociologist and leading authority on subcultures, separated the distinguishing characteristics of subcultures into four types: (1) aspects of life, such as religion, language, diet, or moral values; (2) duration over a period of time; (3) a common origin; and (4) a mode of relationship –indifferent, positive, or conflictual– with the surrounding larger culture. Yinger also distinguished between two types of subcultures: (1) those groups characterized by ascriptive qualities that differentiate the group from the larger society, qualities such as language and religion; and (2) those groups with norms that arise specifically from tension or conflict between that group and the larger society, separate norms common to groups such as youth gangs or homosexuals. He dubbed the second type "contra cultures" which he notes could develop a series of inverse or counter values that stand in opposition to those of the larger society. The term "contra culture" evolved into "counterculture" in the 1960s.
> "According to Yinger, practically every person is born into a culture and is automatically a member of several subcultures, but an individual must actively and voluntarily join a counterculture. Moreover, conflict constitutes an essential element in the concept of counterculture, and such conflict differentiates a counterculture from a subculture. As sociologist William Zellner has written, "A subculture is part of the dominant culture, but some aspects of the subculture's value system and life-style sets its members apart from the marger culture…" That is, a subculture normally does not pose a threat to the dominant culture. A counterculture, on the other hand, "is deliberately opposed to certain aspects of the larger culture." Yinger has added that to understand a subculture, it is not necessary to understand its interaction with the larger society.

> But a counterculture's identities a product of such interaction and can be understood only through that relationship. [Chudacoff, pp.12-14]

The title of this article asks whether the MHRM, and the wider post-gynocentric culture is better defined as a counterculture, or subculture? After reading the definitions above, the answer is unmistakably Both. Post-gynocentric culture defines itself in resistance to gynocentric culture and operates as a peaceful subculture based on human rights, equality, and greater freedom of choice than the larger culture currently prescribes – meta-ideological commitments that will, if we have our way, become principles of the culture at large.

The confluence should hardly be surprising. The Man Going His Own Way usually works, pays taxes, goes to school, socializes with friends, generally obeys laws and is indistinguishable on the surface from his cultural and subcultural counterparts.

However, his personal rejection of marriage, sex based chivalry or treating what relationships he has with women as a financial obligation – as well as his steadfast refusal of sex-based expectations on his values and actions — are all practiced in rejection and defiance of the culture at large. He is, through his personal choice, participating in counterculture, and as such is furthering advocacy by example of lifestyle and consciousness that is "deliberately opposed to certain aspects of the larger culture," per Yinger.

The charge that post-gynocentric culture (including MGTOW and the MHRM) is merely a reaction to feminism can be dismissed. Post-gynocentric culture can't be reduced to antifeminism any more than the black civil rights movement can be reduced to being anti-white, or the gay rights movement being reduced to anti-heterosexuality.

These are grossly oversimplified rationalizations — more symptomatic of cultural prejudice and backlash than credible explanations for the counterculture's existence. It may, however, be said that the drumbeat of reductionism characterized by these misperceptions adds momentum to counterculture's popularity.

Mike Buchanan's interview about positive discrimination, BBC Radio London

Mike Buchanan · 12 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I was interviewed recently at some length (16 minutes) on BBC Radio London by veteran broadcaster Jeni Barnett on the topic of positive discrimination ("PD"). The interview is here. I would ask you to read the commentary beneath the audio file before listening to it, for a number of reasons. It has a little background: Kirsty Wark, a leading radical feminist BBC presenter, has been the beneficiary of PD on the grounds of gender, nationality, and age, and is a supporter of PD—hardly surprisingly. The commentary has the times at which various contributors speak, and ends with some insightful (and at times amusing) comments from a J4MB supporter, explaining how and why the overuse of the word "misogyny" by feminists has rendered the word meaningless.

A (male) speaker who writes for the Guardian predictably followed the feminist party line. I was asked the following question at 22:15:

> Do you like women, Mike?

It wasn't an unexpected question, so I was prepared for it and responded accordingly. In most of my BBC Radio interviews the presenters (of both sexes) have alleged or implied that I'm a misogynist. The men—white knights, invariably—are often worse than the women in this respect.

Bucky Turco: Portrait of the Agenda-Driven, Misleading Modern Journalist

Dean Esmay · 13 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I honestly was not going to write one single word on the front page of A Voice for Men about the obscure publication known as ANIMAL New York and its apparent founder and reporter, known as Bucky Turco. ANIMAL New York (a property of Woven Digital) had requested a press pass to our conference on June 27 and 28, and had been granted one, in addition to being invited to attend the free press conference on June 26 (held at the same time as Warren Farrell's pre-conference private workshop).

We noticed after the conference that ANIMAL New York had posted a couple of short reports, with some accurate, if arguably out-of-context, quotes, and we also noticed that they had not really "attended" the conference they had requested a pass to but rather had only attended the free press conference the day before the main event and just left, asking hardly anyone any questions of any substance. I figured, "Meh, that's the way some reporters are," and that was that. I left a couple of comments on the ANIMAL New York site, pointing out politely that they got a couple of things wrong, that some of the quotes were a bit out of context, and that I didn't think they'd gotten the full story. I also politely gave a link to where their readers could go to look at the whole conference and make up their own minds about its merits, and let it go at that. We had, after all, seen far more egregiously abusive and irresponsible reporting from the likes of Adam Serwer and Jessica K. Roy.

Professional journalist John P. Ribner wrote a brief article for us about the lame coverage of the event from some (not all) press outlets, and how some of the reporters had seemed rude, noting something shallow and condescending that Bucky Turco had said to him while he was sharing experiences such as the way his beloved daughter was ripped away from him. Turco had interrupted John with a rude jab, and John had just walked away. Hey, what can you expect in these times when the pain and anguish of men, young and old alike, is routinely laughed at?

We really didn't think Turco was worth more of our time. I didn't even bother mentioning Turco's lack of professionalism to the ANIMAL New York readers. Why bother? Just give people the link, let them make up their own minds, and move on.

But then I noticed Turco was posting stuff on his Twitter feed about how stupid we were, and was joining in on a juvenile, shallow mock-fest of MRAs with Matt Binder and Sam Seder. And so I, John Ribner, and Rosemary Ribner got into a little bit of a Twitter snarkfest with Turco. He called us stupid, we called him a dumbass, and he seemed dead set on saying that attending a couple of hours of a press conference and asking practically no questions was exactly the same thing as covering the conference for the next two days. It seemed a little misleading to his readers, but I chalked it up to a bit of shallowness on his part, maybe a bit of honest disagreement, and still, in the final analysis, not all that important.

Then he called me, obviously in a rage, and would not calm down when I tried to just be human and reason with him. Instead, he ranted and raved, making some of the most revealing comments about the shockingly shoddy state of modern journalism and ideological indoctrination of our times I have ever heard. It was now clear that reason and humanity had left this man, and all he wanted to do was tear down anyone who would dare question his dogmatic pseudoreligious beliefs about male and female power. And since then, he's continued to tweet about this stuff, crowing about his prowess as a reporter and our general stupidity. Apparently he can't just be a professional, admit to an error or a disagreement of interpretation, or issue an update and clarification like professionals do. So John Ribner and I decided to put together a video to help Bucky understand how journalism works. I hope he and his readers find it helpful:

Bucky Turco is, in the grand scheme of things, a pretty small fish in a big sea. But this sad little tale has inspired us to help him, and other amateur journalists like Adam Serwer and Jessica Roy, learn something about what professional journalism looks like. Or used to look like.

By the way, is this how Woven Digital looks after the interests of the young men it claims to cater to? We have to wonder.

Letter to GoFundMe.com: Stop little Kenai's mutilation!

Paul Elam & Lucian Vâlsan · 13 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dear GoFundMe.com,

A campaign hosted on your website, initiated by a woman named Sierra Westika, has come to our organization's attention.

The campaign aims to raise funds in order to conduct the abusive and barbaric procedure of male genital mutilation, also known by its misnomer, circumcision. Circumcision is a euphemism that essentially hides and/or justifies the infliction of genital trauma for reasons of religion or social custom.

If you think we are exaggerating, we invite you to watch this video made for promotional purposes by a physician who profits from mutilating male children: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SLhEoOQhsVw

Is this what your organization wishes to support? Would your organization host a similar campaign to fund the genital mutilation of infant females? Just because this child's mother wishes to bring harm to her son does not mean you have to give her the platform to beg money to do it.

In October 2013, the Council of Europe called for a ban on genital mutilation of all infants (regardless of sex). The Ombudspersons for Children throughout Scandinavia are lobbying for an effective ban of this procedure under the commonsensical view that children have an inherent right to bodily autonomy.

More and more countries of the world are at a de facto 0% infant circumcision rate – from Finland to Romania, from Zimbabwe to China, and from Cambodia to Spain. As time goes by, the world wakes up to the insanity that is routine infant male genital mutilation. Even in the US the rates are declining. Still, over 100 baby boys die each year from this savage and completely unnecessary practice. 100 baby boys just like Kenai. Let that sink in.

[image]
This is the child that Sierra Westika wants to sexually mutilate using money you provide.
We share these facts with you in order to prove that the "arguments" presented in favor of this barbarism simply do not hold up under honest scrutiny.

So we ask you, Is there anything other than your cut of Westika's appeal for public funding of her child abuse that motivates you to give her a platform?

We strongly urge you to take down the campaign, refund the donors who already pledged for this, and take an honest stance for the bodily autonomy of all children, not just half of them.

By not acting on this issue, you and your staff are essentially affirming that infants have no right to bodily autonomy. We cannot honestly accept that this is your position. But if your actions prove us wrong, you should be horribly ashamed of yourselves.

We believe the little Kenai is entitled to make the choice whether he wants to self-mutilate when he becomes a legal adult – and not to have this choice made for him by others. We believe that My body my choice applies universally.

You have a chance to make a difference in little Kenai's life. By refusing to host this fundraiser, you are upholding Kenai's right to bodily integrity and autonomy.

Please do the right thing,

Best regards,

Paul Elam – Founder and Publisher, A Voice for Men

Lucian Vâlsan – European News Director, A Voice for Men

Editorial note: This letter has been sent to GoFundMe.com Contact page. We recommend the readers of AVfM to also take a stance on this issue. Let's help little Kenai! The contact page is at this link.

WWII-Inspired Feminists Favor Internment of College Men

August Løvenskiolds · 14 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> It, therefore, follows that along the vital Pacific Coast over 112,000 potential enemies, of Japanese extraction, are at large today…. The very fact that no sabotage has taken place to date is a disturbing and confirming indication that such action will be taken. — Final recommendation of the commanding general, Lieutenant General John L. DeWitt, Western Defense Command and Fourth Army, submitted to the Secretary of War, 1942

One of the most shameful failures of American justice was the war-hysteria-inspired internment of Japanese-American citizens in World War II. Evidence from the Federal Communications Commission, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and the Office of Naval Intelligence that these American citizens were of little concern was suppressed, and the lives of these Americans were disrupted forever not because they were saboteurs but rather because they had committed no sabotage at all.

Using similar reasoning, the rape-farming feminists are at it again—using low-rape-reporting and no-rape-reporting colleges as evidence of … lots and lots of RAPE.

The mania of modern-day feminists regarding allegations of campus rape is reaching levels of paranoia and general insanity that has few parallels in history—even the high level of hostility toward followers of Islam in the wake of the 9/11 attacks didn't result in the general internment of American Muslims. What's more, feminists are turning their increasingly toxic attacks on each other in their frenzy to find and destroy any insufficiently unhinged writer for doubting a "rape culture" that has never existed.

In the topsy-turvy, logic-be-damned world of feminist scholarship, colleges and universities that report zero rapes—about 45% of all schools—are the most dangerous, rapey schools of all, and the most rape-prone schools are actually the safest for women.

Wut?

That's right—if you are a feminist, the more rapes, the better. To them, the very fact that no rape has taken place to date is a disturbing and confirming indication that such rapes will take place.

The Stupid, It Burns.

The script for this is so familiar that it feels annoying to have to mansplain it yet again:

First, create a lie, like "Japanese Americans are dangerous" or "1 in 5 women will be raped on campus" (the real number is closer to 1 in 5,446, but who is counting?).

Second, when confronted with overwhelming evidence that your lie is a lie, claim that this evidence itself somehow confirms your point—there can't be zero rapes on 45% of college campuses because [scream this part] ONE in FIVE! ONE in FIVE!!!!! Sabotage!

Third, demonize as a misogynist anyone who points out your lie, much like the feminist liar Mychal Denzel Smith did at Feministing: "Ohhhhhhhhhhhhhh. This has absolutely nothing to do with men's rights. They just really, really hate women. Gotcha."

No, Mychal, we just really, really, hate injustice—and the lying feminists like you who demand it through the ongoing oppression of gay and straight men.

Fourth, strip away the civil rights of citizens, whether they be Japanese Americans or male college students, with no supporting evidence for your bullshit claims.

Fifth, expel the targeted citizens from their homes/campuses without due process of law.

Sixth, claim that when the unjustly damaged citizens dare to fight back through lawsuits that it hurts real victims—but only when it is men who fight back.

Seventh, force them into slave labor. Well, that one is for so-called “deadbeat” fathers who have been stripped of their children, but you get the point.

Feminist Bed Death

The disturbed rants and poisonous lies of feminist writers are both cause and evidence of the death throes of feminism—more and more eyes are opening to the massive and growing failures of the largest ideology of hate on the planet. Feminism lies moribund on its deathbed, stinking of human waste and lashing out in imagined agony, calling out to its supplicants in the vain hope that it can abuse them one final time. The heroine wants one final dose of heroin to ease her passing, but no one is left to care except her cats, who wait and swish their tails, knowing that the feast is just a few minutes away.

Sara Shoener's Totalitarian Ideology

Jonathan Bornstein · 14 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I just read Sara Shoener's recent opinion piece in The New York Times in which she indicts the two-parent home. It is alarmist, one-sided, aimless, radical, misandric, short-sighted, self-serving …

And totalitarian.

To indict our "culture" as simply too philistine for its inclination to preserve fathers, in the face of the endless social maladies resulting from fatherless homes, is a blind advocacy of continued, exponential social chaos. Shoener does this with a transparent scientism, offering hastily arranged statistics that barely clothe her radicalism and misandry.

She starts with positing that all girls are inevitable victims. Her demonization of young girls for whom "marriage is equated with success" is rooted in her distant state of aloofness and academic arrogance. Next, she marries this condescension with the hysterical domestic violence narrative that is dependent upon an obscenely broad definition. In New York State, domestic violence includes "implied" domestic violence; this is a vague allegation that a family equivalent of a "civil liberty" is violated. A poor mood is today domestic violence; as is responsible management of money; a lascivious glance; indeed, anything open to interpretation can be domestic violence under the "implied" revision. For Shoener, at the far left of the sexual politics war, the very idea of marriage and family is now hopelessly domestic violence.

But this goes to the heart of her attack: allegations—mere allegations—of domestic violence is the silver bullet for custody. And this is the radical feminist obsession: custody of de-fathered children.

Her article curiously views domestic violence through the prism of the male-initiated brand. It frames all its subject women as victims of their boyfriends and husbands. Not once does she consider female-initiated domestic violence, ignoring one-half of the phenomenon. Scientism.

We learn that men should never fight to have involvement with their children if mommy does not wish so; indeed, fathers and men are too stupid to realize that they should—in the bizarre Shoenersphere—just magically turn off their instinct to father and redirect this innate instinct to the maintenance of monetary child support.

Also, the "state institutions" that she lambastes as too philistine are products of our valid egalitarian and procreative social paradigm. To ask the state to depart from this reveals the severity of her hateful positions. No, Sara, it does not take a more draconian village; at the end of the day, it takes a mother and a father.

These institutions "reinforce" the family and the participation of the father because they recognize that fathers and children have natural rights to each other. The same rights that women have to the control of the insemination and gestation of their wombs are the same rights that fathers have to a relationship with the product of these wombs. The state should not be a tool to eliminate fathers wholesale, as this article shamelessly advocates.

This piece is a continuation of the radical feminist message that wantonly redefines family at any cost without any regard for the father. Shulamith Firestone died a miserable old cat lady; she, too, had radical ideas about family. In Shoener's defence, she makes a stylish nod toward the two-parent home at the bottom of her attack. But this is a symbolic effort to seem fair-minded.

At the end of the day, Shoener wants women to have all the power over the family and to render everything and everyone else powerless over the socialization of children. The holy right to terminate the fertilization of the womb has metastasized into a totalitarian right to the full control of the product of the womb after gestation as it lives.

Finally, Shoener's piece is devoid of the sentiments of a real mother who thinks of her children first; rather, it reeks of the hubris of a young radical and childless advocate who thinks only of her career and her hateful ideology.

The world she advocates is chilling and hateful.

The cycle of the female abuser

Kimberly Taylor · 15 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

First of all, you cannot immediately spot her, unless of course she is hitting a man in front of you or verbally lashing him with her harsh words over dinner in your presence. Certainly, these are obvious clues. But you cannot assume anything based on economic status, religious affiliation, political party, body shape and size, public demeanor, looks, intelligence, or career status. There are women of all walks of life who present very well in public, but at home they can be just as abusive as their male counterparts.

Through my counseling with women who have an abusive anger language and the men who have experienced this abuse, I have begun to see a new cycle that exists when women are the identified abuser.

When domestic violence advocates typically think of the cycle of abuse, there are several stages the abuser goes through according to the "power and control wheel," that evolved out of many discussions with battered women through the Domestic Abuse Intervention Project (DAIP) in Duluth Minnesota in 1980-1981. This begins with escalation to the explosive stage or outburst of violence phase, and then transitions to the cooling-down phase, and ultimately finishes with the honeymoon phase before the cycle is repeated. This has been illustrated and well known for quite some time as the standard cycle of abuse that has at its core the need for control by the abuser. Many incidences of abuse by men fall into this cycle. Some male abusers who become very violent continue in the abuse phase and do not enter the remorse phase or honeymoon phase. They maintain a level of violence and do not resort to any other phases.

Enter the Female Abuser

Anecdotally, I have identified a different cycle among women in batterer's treatment groups and individual therapy. This cycle is characterized by methods of coercion and manipulation, that when not heeded, is followed by emotional and/or physical abuse. Once the explosion occurs and the woman has attacked the man verbally and/or physically, she retreats for a short time before justification and denial ensues. She will either become quiet and avoid contact for sometime, or she will act as though nothing ever happened and justify all bad behavior. Unlike with men, there is generally no period of insight where they will sometimes acknowledge their bad behavior.

With many men, the honeymoon phase is characterized by the abusive partner being very remorseful for the abuse and saying things like, "I am sorry, I wish you hadn't pushed me to the point where I had to hit you," or "I love you and I promise I will never do it again." Sometimes this is accompanied by very nice behavior and gifts. It typically leaves the abuse victim stunned by the abuse and confused by the remorse. Yet, the abusive women I interviewed said this was not the case for them. When I asked them why they never felt remorse, I received differing opinions. Some said they thought no one would take their spouse seriously since they were women. Others said they believed their partners deserved it. They all had varying reasons, but the common component was they just did not feel remorseful. Most of them said they would just go on with "business as usual" and any confrontation would be met with great resistance and minimization.

Perhaps it is because society is less condemning and more dismissive of a woman who is abusive, resulting in less societal awareness and consequently more room for personal denial. It is also possible that the male is even less aware that they are being abused and may even take more responsibility due to the same lack of societal awareness. In short, the dynamic in the relationship may allow for this denial.

In a recent recent study noted (Gelles 2006), about fifty percent of men and women thought it was okay for a woman to hit a man. With these global attitudes, it is no wonder some women feel justified in slapping their partners. Some even said they knew they could not do too much damage because of their size; they therefore minimized their actions and denied it was abuse at all.

The men I interviewed said repeatedly that the women in their life never apologized for the abuse and never even acknowledged they were abusive. Surely, there are some women who do apologize and who do acknowledge this behavior and recognize that it is wrong. However, more often than not, they are not even admitting it exists. It seems the more we raise awareness that women do slap, hit, and abuse at rates almost equal to men, the more men and society will be likely to hold women equally accountable for their bad behavior, just as society does toward men who abuse. As research has demonstrated consistently, the majority of abuse within relationships is mutual combat, meaning both parties are abusive toward each other at almost equal rates (Straus, M.A., Gelles, R.J. & Steinmetz (2006) Kessler, R.C., Molnar, B.E. Feurer, I.D. & Applebaum, M. (2001).

Why should women get away with abusive behavior when men are not allowed to? Abuse is never okay, and it is very important for there to be accurate assessment of who is the abuser in the relationship. Law enforcement and the courts have a responsibility to make the most accurate determination regarding intimate partner violence to correctly assess the identity of the dominant aggressor.

In many studies, women are more significantly abused, yet they initiate the violence more often than men. According to the U.S. Department of Justice Intimate Partner Violence statistics, male victims were threatened with a weapon 22.9 percent, while females reported being threatened with a weapon 17.6 percent. Women reported the type of attacks at a greater percentage than men with the following forms: rape, sexual assault, attacked with firearms, attacked with knives, grabbed, held, and tripped. Men were also at a greater percentage for being hit by a thrown object.

It was also noted that females were more likely than males to seek treatment for their injuries. In the same study, the male victims said they did not report the incident primarily because it was a private or personal matter. They were also more likely to not report it in order to protect the offender.

I try to work with female abusers to help them take responsibility for their abusive behavior, just like we as a society have asked men to do for years. When I talk with these women candidly in group meetings and explore with them how they perceive their abusive behavior, they do feel remorseful when they are confronted with the truth. When they take a look at how their behavior has impacted their loved ones, they are often saddened and want to make a change in their lives. However, this mirror needs to be held up so they can see clearly how it has impacted those they love. Examining oneself candidly is no easy task, but it is freeing for them and allows them to recognize that they have control over how they act.

Senator Anne Cools: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Anne Cools · 15 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: We will be publishing complete transcripts of the presentations given at the International Conference on Men's Issues, 2014 for those who wish to read instead of listen, and want to be able to search for remarks, and for posterity from this historic event. Our thanks to Rick Westlake for providing these transcripts. The "committee" referred to here by Anne Cools, and her friend Roger Gallaway, was a joint committee of the Canadian Parliament to try to reform Canadian family law. Cools was our first speaker on the first official day of our conference, 27 June 2014.–DE

(Introduction by The Honorable Roger Gallaway, former Member of the Canadian Parliament)

… At the end of 1998 I happened to present, to the House of Commons, the final report of the Committee. It recommended some very revolutionary ideas, such as shared parenting. It recommended that if you're going to allege domestic violence, you'd better be prepared to prove it. And, of course, none of this has come, in Canada, to fruition. Here I am, sixteen years later and nothing has changed in Canada. In fact, if anything, it's backed up.

But the one constant in all of this is Anne Cools. Here we are, sixteen years later, Anne – older, too; yes, your hair is grey, I still don't have any. Here we are, sixteen years later, in the center of North America, as I like to think of it as being, talking about the same things. But I detect that there's more determination, I detect there's a greater perspective, and I detect that Anne Cools has something important to say this morning.

So it gives me great pleasure to join with you this morning in welcoming my friend, and I think our friend, Senator Anne Cools.

I would like to say that this is something of a special moment for me today, because I am in the presence of several of you – but two people, both of whom mean a great deal to me. And one of them is my dear friend who just introduced me, Roger Gallaway. And Roger Gallaway, I would love to thank you publicly for your work for your work and contribution on this file. And I would also like to say to many of you that Roger and I – the two of us – were a multitude, in politics, on the floor of the House.

I would also like to acknowledge again my dear friend, Erin Pizzey …as I said before, my soul-sister my soul-mate, as we came to similar conclusions and did similar work on two sides of the Atlantic. We've been very close friends now for many years, but we always knew of each other's existence before we met. And she and I have traveled a few miles together in Canada, as well…

I would just like to say that the cause that is before you and the things that you fight for are valid and just, and you should pursue your work at all times. I am seventy years of age, and I am on the home stretch of my public career. So you, and younger soldiers, must come. So I encourage soldiers to arm themselves, and to put on battle gear, because it is a fight.

I want to do a few things, but one of the first things I want to do is to offer Roger a little bit of support in respect of what he just said. And the important thing about that committee, and I'll come back to that in a moment, was the enormity of the public support of fathers. And this is not easily understood by many today, who will still find themselves in desolate conditions. And we must remember at all times that no Divorce Act, and no Act of Parliament, ever intended or legislated the dispossession of fathers of their children, or the dispossession of children of their fathers. Somewhere in the idea of the administration of the law, that has been happening and has happened.

But, in respect of what Roger had just said about the enormous support that that committee's work enjoyed, I'd like to quote a poll that was published November 23rd, 1998 in the Ottawa Citizen, in an article actually written by a journalist called Chris Collum, I think it was. I just happened to have it here, inside of another speech. And, the front-page article was headlined – quote: “Public Backs Fathers’ Rights: Astonishing Majority Wants Change to Laws on Access to Children, Compass Poll Shows.” Compass was the polling company that had done it.

The pollster, Dr. Wynn, was quoted in the article saying – quote – “I cannot find an adjective to describe the intensity of public dismay over family issues and the unfulfilled rights of fathers and children. I am surprised, because these issues haven’t been on the agenda of Canadian politics for a very long time. The most astonishing thing is the absolute consensus among men and women about how the rights and obligations of fathers and children are being ignored.”

So yes, the Committee was a tough go, and we won the issues, and we won public opinion. But the Act still has not been changed.

But we fought on. There were two future amendments to the Act, two future bills, and we worked, Roger and I, and buried them both. We got them well-buried. And so, we’re still waiting.

But there has been a lot of change on the ground, and–because I stay in touch with many people on the ground. Last summer I visited a particular jurisdiction in Canada, and it made me very proud and happy of the work that we had done, because I sat in the courts and I heard what the judges were saying and doing. And there was one particular instance where a particular party was seeking to have the other party – it was a wife seeking to have the husband, or the ex-husband, deprived of access. And I actually heard that judge say, “Don’t even ask for it. I do not deny any father access to his children without strong and good reasons.”

So – there’s that happening. So let me just move on to say – Let us look to try to understand how we’ve got here and why we are here, and so on. So I thought I could take a little quick stroll through a look at some of the law, in respect of wives and husbands, and in respect of mutual obligations and expectations and entitlements.

So let us begin, for example – some of this is going to surprise some of you – let us begin with William Blackstone, as I mentioned before, and his work on the common law. In his book, Chapter 15, called “Of Persons, he writes a whole section on relations between husband and wife.

So when women refer to “hundreds of years of oppression,” it’s not quite accurate. Not quite accurate. And I would like to make the point that the law views marriage as a civil contract between a husband and a wife – agreements agreed upon, voluntary unions agreed upon. But they left the holiness of the union entirely to the ecclesiastical law; many people do not realize that, now. So the Church’s canon law used to look after that whole area. And the law, in its civil aspect, treated it as and like a contract. Agreements made, agreements honored. And to dishonor the contract was viewed as a violation of things holy, and things legal.

So … I want to put this quotation out to you, for your own thoughts. And he says, quote – because yesterday, I made the point that men have been the protectors of women for centuries. And all of a sudden, men became the ‘enemies’ of women. So really, it’s a staggering, staggering thing.

So, let me read how Mr. Blackstone concluded that chapter – quote: “These are the chief legal effects of marriage, joint or coverture, upon which we may observe that even the disabilities which the wife lies under are, for the most part, intended for her protection and benefit; so great a favorite is the female sex of the laws of England.”

Remember, all a woman had to do is go to a store and charge any amount of goods, and husband was just expected to pay. And they did, dutifully, you know. So let us understand the position of the law. I have searched Blackstone, looking for that “Rule of Thumb.” It doesn’t exist. It’s not there. It’s not there. So I just want us to set our minds thinking about the protection–you see, because I still wonder, how could we allow such violation of human beings as what we’re seeing today?

So I’d like to cite you the old – you wouldn’t know this, unless you’re from Ontario–Roger would know of this–the old Deserted Wives and Children’s Maintenance Act. This was the predecessor to the Family Law Reform Act of 1978. Quote – Remember, “Deserted Wives” so you’re going to be interested to learn the definition of “desertion.” Obviously if a man leaves and abandons the home, it’s a desertion. But there’s another kind of desertion, which I shall quote:

“Section 2, sub 2: A married woman shall be deemed to have been deserted within the meaning of this section when she is living apart from her husband because of his acts of cruelty; or of his refusal or neglect, without sufficient cause, to supply her with food and other necessaries, when able so to do; or of the husband having been guilty of adultery that has not been condoned and that is duly proved, notwithstanding the existence of a separation agreement.”

Here again you see the law protecting women; constant protection. And I knew that act like the back of my hand, because when I was building shelters and assisting women and children in difficulty, that was the Act by which those women were sustained by endowments and payments from Government. That’s a very complicated system under the general Welfare system – very complicated, but we don’t have to go there.

Just to give you another example, the old Married Women’s Property Act of 1859. In that era, women started to be able to own property separately from their husbands. And so let’s look at the — And this Married Women’s Property Act was still in force, I believe, up until the Family Law Reform Act, I think – Roger’s nodding, so it was in force.

So we look at Section 13, and we find that protection, and look at the extent of protection. So, “Section 13, sub 1: Any married woman –” this, having a judgment for alimony, who lives apart from her husband, whose husband is mentally incompetent, and on and on and on – listen to this: “– may obtain an order of protection, entitling her, notwithstanding her coverture, to have and to enjoy all the earnings of her minor children, and any acquisitions therefrom, free from the debts and obligations of her husband and from his control or disposition, and without his consent, in as full and ample a manner as if she were continued sole and unmarried.”

So I’m just trying to show you how the Law has always protected women. And, in the context of social Society, of Society and how it was structured in those days, it made perfect sense. And remember, you know, these laws were made in a time when jobs weren’t plentiful. And besides, all the classes of the community did not marry. Marriage was for those who could afford – could afford – to do these things. I mean, we keep forgetting that. And the vast numbers of – in the British Territories, the vast numbers of persons who were unmarried depended on the Common Law. Therefore you get the expression, “common-law relationships,” to which and from which flowed many benefits.

I also want to show you another kind, a different kind of protection than these, but in respect of protection from criminal prosecution; to diminish responsibility. So I shall go to the Criminal Code, Section 233: Infanticide. Most of us think that the term “infanticide” means the killing of a child, but it does not. It means the killing of a child by a female person. And very few people are aware of this distinction, but it diminishes responsibility. So I shall read you the Section–and I do all of this so you can see I didn’t make any of this up. The idea’s not pulled out of the sky, or out of my pleasure or of my will. I have grounded myself at all times in the Law of the Country, the Law that we are supposed to and have abided by.

So quote Section 233 of the Criminal code, currently: “A female person commits infanticide when by a willful act or omission she causes the death of her newly born child, if at the time of the act or omission she is not fully recovered from the effects of giving birth to the child and by reason thereof or of the effect of lactation consequent on the birth of the child her mind is then disturbed.”

This is contemporary law.

So — I collect these things, and as I have said before, I have made it my business to try to grasp, to understand, the sources and the origins of what Erin Pizzey calls “the Evil Empire.”

I would like to go to the Muses, now. We’re leaving the Law, and we’re going to the Muses, and the poets, and in today’s community, the song writers. So, I’m going to introduce you to a dear old song called “Frankie and Johnny.” I’m not a singer, I’ve never been able to sing. But you remember, Frankie and Johnny were lovers – oh lordy, how they could love, and on and on. Well, we must remember, that everybody forgets that Frankie murdered Johnny – Frankie is the woman; Frankie murdered Johnny, everybody forgets that! And – I'm not wearing my glasses, but let me see if I can read this – so, Johnny had gone out and he was coming on to a very pretty girl named Nellie Bly, a high brown – I mean, this is America – high brown Nellie Bly, let me read this for you:

So it says here, Frankie got out – that's right, she goes home — oh, that's right, she goes to somebody and she says, have you seen Johnny? And the fellow says, "Ain't gonna tell you no lie; Johnny went by 'bout an hour ago with a girl named Nellie Bly." And forward to the refrain, "He was your man, but he done you wrong." This goes through the whole song – "He was your man, but he done you wrong."

Anyway, so Frankie goes home and gets Johnny's gun, and comes back and looks up, and in the window "so high" – and let me quote the poem, "saw her Johnny man a' lovin-up that high brown Nellie Bly … He was her man, but he done her wrong … Then Johnny saw Frankie a'coming; out the back door he did scout – but Frankie took aim with her pistol, and the gun went root-a-toot-toot-toot!" That's the end of Johnny.

So, the Muses include this in a lot of their work. And finally, in this layer, a group of quotations; I come to the Greek tragedy, and Euripides, and Medea. Medea. And this is all stuff I've read, myself, for years. Somewhere around 431, Euripides writes his famous Greek tragedy, Medea, about Medea and Jason and Medea's murder of their two sons. Medea was a Greek enchantress who had helped Jason to obtain the Golden Fleece. When Jason deserted her for another woman, she planned and carried out the murder of their two sons. So I am going to read to you from Medea, from an older version that matches the one I would have read in school many years ago. And this is what Medea has to say:

"Let no man think that I am a feeble, frail-hearted woman, who sits with folded hands. No, let them know me for the opposite of that."

Continuing: "One who knows how to hurt her enemies."

Her maid is very distressed about the act that she's about to commit — and if time allowed, I'd read more of it, because it really is very insightful. But she looks at the maid and pledges the female to silence in the following words:

"Say nothing of the plans I have prepared. Don't say a word, if you are loyal to your mistress, and loyal to the race of woman."

So I just put that out to you, just to inform us of our cultural norms, and to remind us of the standards that we expect to abide by.

So having said all that, I want to come directly to a few of the issues that we canvassed yesterday, and to one of my pet points, which is that violence, divorce, and all of these issues are all about the most vulnerable of all relationships – intimate – intimate love relationships, where vulnerability is the order of the day, and intimacy. So I want to say that my perspective has always been that a balance of fairness and equilibrium, grounded in the notion that human beings and human relationships are extremely complex, and that intimate family relationships involve personal vulnerabilities, elusive dynamics, and multiple emotions.

Managing human relations and human dynamics is challenging, even for the well-equipped personality. For the not-so-well equipped, managing human relations is daunting and sometimes nearly impossible.

Life and human intimacy is a difficult road for many. Human emotions such as love, anger, expectations, and disappointments are driving forces. Human needs and human emotions are compelling. Human complexities, further complicated by the fact that human beings frequently have little or no understanding of what and why they feel, and little or no insight into the effects of their own behavior on those with whom they live.

I wish to quote a very famous theological type. His name was Jacques Gillet, and he wrote a lot on personal discernment. And Gillet – and I got this in a book written by a priest named Father Greene, quoting Gillet saying, "We all work in darkness, in a way." And Gillet says, "There's the darkness in man himself" – in us – "who is incapable of seeing his own heart clearly; incapable of grasping completely the seriousness of his actions and the results deriving from them."

I've counseled couples – and you know, they could be two countries they are so far apart – trying to bring some reconciliation between them. And if you can persevere, and if they trust you, you can do it.

So, on observing human behavior, the inescapable conclusion is that human beings, both men and women, are afflicted by their own imperfections, frailties and woundedness, and this condition seems to govern a lot of human behavior. It appears that the more imperfect and wounded a person is, the less tolerant that person is of others' imperfection and woundedness. Human capacity for misunderstanding is great.

Men and women are equally capable of vice and virtue. Vice and virtue are human characteristics, not gendered ones. I have politically repudiated the two prevalent notions introduced into the public discourse by radical gender feminist ideology: that women are morally superior to men, that men are morally inferior to women, and that somehow men are just plain naturally 'morally defective.'

The false proposition of women's inherent virtue and men's inherent vice has dominated and deformed family and criminal law policy for the past several decades. Much public policy on domestic violence, particularly arrest, charging, and prosecution policy, has been founded on this deformity, wreaking havoc in the lives of people, many of whom are ill [sound issue]

Is that better? … Okay, good. At any event, I was saying that many human beings are ill-prepared and ill-equipped to handle such havoc. And there have been many, large numbers of suicides on these matters. And the empirical evidence on violence within intimate-partner relationships and within families, confirms that domestic violence has been falsely framed as violence against women, and as a gendered issue, and as a woman's question.

I just want to lay out again, that is my position. And I think that I have been speaking with great balance, and fairness, and equilibrium, which is all I've ever strived to attain in the Law.

I want to touch, very briefly, the whole business of The Patriarchy, because this was raised yesterday. And there's another concept that has wreaked havoc on us.

I believe I said, yesterday, that we are not ever to underestimate the sense of protection that men feel for women, because I can tell you I've seen bill after bill being passed, with all the men agreeing, because they were told "this bill was needed to protect women." And so there has been explanation why so many people would vote so willingly on many of these issues.

But let's get to "Patriarchy," to show you the extent to which this — this wrong-headed, misinformed, uninformed, ill-informed point of view has seeped into the entire system.

So, around 1990, the Government of Canada sponsored a multi-million-dollar project. It was called the Canadian Panel on Violence Against Women. Its 1993 report was named, "Changing the Landscape: Ending Violence, Achieving Equality." Its titles and sub-titles were steeped in radical gender feminist nomenclature. Part I was called "The Context." Chapter 1 was entitled "The Feminist Lens." Chapter 1 also called a section called "Looking Through A Feminist Lens." Another section was called, "Patriarchy and Violence," while another was entitled "Heterosexism." Heterosexism!

We panned it in caucus this year – as it came up, the liberal caucus panned it.

The report informed that the concept of "Patriarchy" was essential to the Panel's analysis of the nature of gender inequality and violence against women – I'm speaking about a report of a very respectable panel! The report explained "Patriarchy" thus – quote: "Patriarchy is not just a central concept in feminist analysis. For many women, it is also a daily reality. The most violent and profound expression of patriarchal power sits at their dinner tables every evening, and sleeps in their beds at night."

The report described "Heterosexism" – quote: "Heterosexism is the assumption that a woman's life will be organized around, and defined in relationship, in relation to a man." The report also told that Canadian society is organized around "compulsory heterosexuality," and that "heterosexism" is embedded in all State institutions that women are likely to call upon: the police, the justice system, religious institutions, et cetera.

Colleagues – friends, here – distinguished guests – these concepts had more to do with constructing an ideological framework, and less to do with assisting families in crisis. Nothing to do with assisting families in crisis. And if you have worked with these families, as Erin and I have, you really see people who are begging for help. And I don't know if some of you know a lot about crisis intervention, but there's a point in person's lives – if, at that critical moment, you reach out and give them that help and make that intervention, you're capable of causing them to transform themselves; and they even transform their behavior.

And none of this matches anything that I've ever seen or worked with.

But – anyway, I just wanted to say that by this time I was already well distancing myself from this thing that was being called "Feminism." And the one statement that really took me entirely over the edge was one made by a feminist, an American feminist, whose name is Sally Miller Gearhart. And she wrote an article called, 'The Future, If There Is One, Is Female.' And it was published in her 1982 book, Reweaving the Web of Life: Feminism and Nonviolence. Hold that – "Feminism and Nonviolence." Quote: "To secure a world of female values and female freedom, we must, I believe, add one more element to the structure of the future… (Laugh) …The ratio of men to women must be radically reduced, so that men approximate only ten percent of the total population."

I mean, this is – I mean, how can you take that seriously? I mean – can you take somebody like that seriously? Anyway, for me, that was the end. That was the end! Thereafter, I never described myself, any more, as a feminist.

I want to come, now, to the old phenomena of false allegations and prosecution, and so on, and this, again, has been a great distress and a great set of problems within the system itself. And the practices were developed by certain feminist lawyers, and it seemed to be to make these accusations in the body of civil proceedings. And, as you know, there's a difference between civil proceedings and criminal proceedings; the standard is much higher and heftier in criminal ones. But this became so rampant that if you – and I actually recorded, on the floor of the House, of the Senate, 52 instances of men who were falsely accused of abusing their own children. And the cases that I put were proven; the accusations were proven to be false. And the judges were quite tough and hard in their descriptions. So I only put cases before the House – 52, I just recorded them one after the other, and quoted them because I figure another soldier will come along, at some point in time, and just pick up that work.

But I want to give you, to read to you, from the mind of some of the judges, to see what they were saying at the time. And one of them makes the following statement: it was a case where husband and wife – she had accused him of hitting her; turns out he was nowhere near her, at the time the event was supposed to have happened. But this is what the judge says, and I'll read that to you. Paragraph 19, in acquitting – It was a criminal proceeding, so in acquitting the husband, he made the following statement, the judge made the following statement about the wife – quote: "I find the evidence of the complainant and her mother to be contradictory, confusing, contrary, conflicting, irreconcilable, and quite frankly, false." He also continued and expressed an opinion; it's the only one I've been able to find, in years, about Zero Tolerance policy. And he said the following:

"I want to make two further comments, because one is curious as to how a man could be falsely accused in these circumstances, right up to and including a trial. The reasons are quite clear to me, and disturbing: First, the police apparently have a policy of zero tolerance in domestic-assault cases. Any zero-tolerance policy is dangerous. It is especially dangerous when it is not properly applied."

So that was re: the false accusations between two spouses, by a wife as against a husband.

But I can tell you, in the cases of children, if you want to see men reduced to pulp, is to watch a man who will talk to you about him being accused of sexually abusing his — his little children. And there's something in the hearts of most men and fathers that find that so soul-destroying – not only repugnant, but soul-destroying – that they can be accused of it. I remember one time Roger and I had a particular guy who actually said to him, "Accuse me of murder, but don't accuse me of hurting my child like this!"

So I just want to tell you — any day of the week, we had twenty of these cases coming to our attention. But there's a few judges, more than a few actually, who were taking notice. And I want to take note of another particular judge in a case – and I'm looking for the exact words where he says, he quotes: "There are far too many prosecutors declining to make the hard decision –" This is Justice Saunderson – "There are far too many prosecutors declining to make the hard decisions, lest they offend some interest-group, or incur the displeasure of their superiors who themselves are subjected to pressure from the same groups. The result can be made to work hardship in individual cases."

He's going to continue … he talks about the wife, because he says, the wife herself testified that she was drunk and in an out-of-control rampage against–because she was upset by something the husband's ex-wife had said to her. So the judge continued, and he criticized the Crown for not charging her for her assaults! It's very interesting, saying it created a double standard. And his exact words are, here, quote: "The mere fact of this prosecution sends a very clear message: A woman in a relationship with a man can provoke him, degrade him, strike him, and throw objects at him with impunity; but if he offers the least physical response, he will be charged with assault."

So, having said it, I just threw this out for you.

I'm coming to my last subject matter now, and — and the whole business of the best interests of the child. Because we saw in this period of time, the last many years, where men were treated as observers in their children's lives. And there's one particular judge who actually – a female judge who actually created, said that, in a case: They're observers. The non-custodial parents are "observers" in their children's lives, which of course is now something we reject.

The power of Governments and the State in respect of children and custody is infinite power, and it is never time-dated. And I want to explain to you a little bit, to those who are interested — I searched for about two years, trying to find the origin of the term "the best interests of the child." And I found it; and it was introduced into Canada's divorce law in – Roger, you'd be interested – in 1984, Minister MacGuigan's changes. That government – that bill never saw the light of day, because it died on the old paper as liberals were defeated, Mr. Trudeau's people were defeated in the general election, September 1984. But I remember that bill very well, and the Minister's intention at the time was that by putting that phrase into the bill in respect of custody and access – because his policy was that children of divorce should have maximum access to other siblings, to both parents, to grandparents. And you find this in all of his policy papers, which were distributed across the country, and conferences that he summoned, of people in the field, and I was one of them, at one point. And very clearly — he had been a law professor, so he was a lawyer's lawyer — and he sincerely believed that that term would come on the ground, would transform itself into shared parenting.

And that would have happened if the ground didn't change suddenly.

Let me just come back to where that term comes from. That term comes out of those great powers of the King. The American Constitution no longer – Americans no longer appreciate the sense of the King, in the Constitution, that perpetual sovereign ever-present in the Constitution; but in Canada, it is still alive in our Constitution. And these are the powers of the King. In England, the Lord Chancellor was the most powerful man after the King. He was so powerful he could even cancel the King's letters-patent. And the term, the business, of child welfare, developed out of the King's protection of children, that was owed to the knights and all those individuals who fought for him. That's where you got terms like "wards."

If you remember, when you were children there was a childhood thing called Robin Hood. Remember, Maid Marian was the ward of the King.

So, if the King had knights who left orphaned children, infants–and it was a very sophisticated and complete system–that he owed that child protection, and the lands of that child protection. And that when that child became of age, all those properties were expected to be delivered to that child, who hopefully would fight for the next King.

And at one point, they developed their own separate Courts of Wards, and liveries, to do that. But as time went by, the Lord Chancellor's Court took over those matters. And even to this day, you call the "Law of Equity" – all that, the Lord Chancellor's Courts dealt in what they call the Law of Equity, which is the Law that grants justice, not just Law. The Common Law Courts grant justice according to the Law; the Courts of Equity grant justice which might have been neglected in the administration of the laws. It's a very, very interesting system.

So, in Canada, the Common Law Courts and the Equity Courts merged in 1881. So now every Superior Court judge of Canada has that inherent power to protect children. And the doctrine was called "parens patriae." And this is why something like custody is never final; so they can award custody; if something goes wrong, they can change that custody. But the protection over a child is – protection is eternal. And it's an enormous power; and — well, that's another story for another day. But somehow or the other, the interests of the child and the interests of the child's mother have got confused in the last many years.

So I wanted to say to you that that term, "best interests of the child," was intended to be a ground for greater sharing in the relationship, and a greater sharing in children; because 1984 was a time when all this nonsense was coming to an end, and men were picking up children and taking them for walks – and it's a beautiful thing. I'm a bicycle rider, on Saturday mornings, and – I'm not a good bicycle rider, I have a bad back, but I still do it – and you'll watch these young families, Mum and Dad and two or three little children on bicycles. And it's a beautiful delight to watch. And they don't stop to debate who should stop and change the little one's diaper; somebody just does it. It's a wonderful thing to watch, and it's how couples should relate, and it's how most couples do relate.

But in any event, that is the origin of the term, "the best interests of the child." And I think it's a worthy term, I think it's a worthy concept. It's an ancient concept that can be defended by hundreds of years, now, of jurisprudence. And I would suggest that we would uphold it and defend it, and continue to challenge the orthodoxy in the name of "the best interests of the child."

Now, I hope I've left a few minutes for questions, and I hope that we have a few questions, but that in — a quick summary — is a statement on the state of the Law, on the state of Society, in respect; and a lot of this other stuff about men is just purely imaginary.

Yvette Cooper says more feminism needed in schools

Josh O'Brien · 15 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Yvette Cooper writes the following in The Independent:

> "Whore, bitch, slag, slut," – these are the insults one teacher says she hears levelled at teenage girls on a daily basis. She described girls being "heckled if they dare to speak in class, their shirts forcibly undone, their skirts lifted and held by groups of boys".

And:

> So called "revenge porn" is growing making young lives a misery when an ex posts their half naked photos or stalks them online. The NUS are worried about an increasingly abusive culture on campuses with jokes about rape and 'innocent' groping seen as fairly commonplace.

Josh O'Brien replies to Cooper's hand-wringing claims with the revelation that he has never once witnessed these behaviors from boys—but he has—quelle surprise—seen these behaviors by girls.

More on Selective Service

In this video, Barbarossaaa delivers a passionate rant about selective service and the Equal Rights Amendment, finally asking men to consider whether they are human beings or mere beasts of burden designed for the expendable whims of a gynocentric system.

Barbarossaaa: A brief addendum/correction to this talk – although the Selective Service Act does not explicitly state that one can be disenfranchised for failing to register, failure to do so is in fact a felony carrying up to five years in jail and/or a 250K fine. There are numerous laws on the books today that allow for felony disenfranchisement, and you obviously won't be able to vote while in jail either. Thus, it is implicitly stated as far as I'm concerned. Further penalties include not being able to file a FAFSA, among others.

The KSUM Conference on Educational Equity needs your help

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 16 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Kennesaw State University Men (KSUM) is the first men's human rights student organization to emerge from the A Voice for Men (AVfM) community and the first men's rights organization in the state of Georgia.

We grew a flower in concrete, and with your help we can put men's rights on campus permanently.

KSUM is hosting a conference on educational equity called Male Students in Peril (MSP) on November 1, which is five days before KSUM's one-year anniversary and ten days before the officer election that will take KSUM into the future.

We tell KSU students that there is no need to speak of men's humanity in hushed tones. It is up to us to end educational inequity on campus, and we ask students one simple question: Do you wish to live in a culture of fear, where you are not allowed to speak about the humanity of certain groups of people?

Although students signed a petition saying they wanted KSUM, our members both old and new have been frightened to speak openly. But here are some people who are starting to crawl, slowly but surely, out from under the boot of dogma.

KSUM signatories (private information blurred)
We have a chance to show one of the fastest-growing universities in Georgia what equity looks like, and believe me, they need that lesson. I understand the fear of saying what people won't like, but no risk is too great if it means announcing to the world that men are people too.

MHRM leaders will voice the taboo truth at the KSU Carmichael Student Center on November 1 from 3 p.m. to 9 p.m. EST (speakers are subject to change).

[image]	Johnathan Taylor (keynote) is an expert in composition and argumentation, a walking statistics portal, and the founder of A Voice for Male Students (AVFMS). AVFMS is the go-to resource on educational equity issues affecting males.
	Karen Straughan (a.k.a. GirlWritesWhat) is a Canadian writer, lecturer, and videographer known for her encyclopedic treatises on the gender zeitgeist. She spoke at the New York Libertarian Party, at Ryerson University, on CTV, and from a panel seat next to a flabbergasted Naomi Wolf.
[image]	Janice Fiamengo, Ph.D, is a professor of English at the University of Ottawa and a former feminist. She courageously speaks out against double standards and dogma in scholarship, even in the face of academic animosity.
	Miles Groth, Ph.D, is a professor of psychology at Wagner College in Staten Island, New York, and the founder of Thymos: Journal of Boyhood Studies. Groth is the current editor of New Male Studies, an open-access, interdisciplinary journal for research of issues facing boys and men worldwide.

[image]	Paul Elam, a former mental health professional, is the founder of A Voice for Men, the men's rights flagship organization. AVfM is now an international community with 24/7 radio broadcasts and subsidiary publications in Italy, Brazil, Sweden, Ecuador, and Australia (with upcoming publications in Farsi and Hebrew).
[image]	Sage Gerard (a.k.a. Victor Zen) (organizer, master of ceremonies) is the founder of KSU Men, the first men's rights student organization to emerge from the AVfM community. Sage was interviewed by USA Today, Mother Jones, PJTV, The New Republic, and other publications for activism that can help change campus life in the future. Sage currently serves as the Collegiate Activism Director of AVfM.

The venue is the University Room in the KSU Student Center.
We secured space for up to 422 people, along with the necessary production equipment.

But we have a problem.

Ticket revenue comes after the event and will not be sufficient cover costs, so we need $13,000 in 30 days to cover promotion, facility fees, security, speakers, lodging, and travel. If we go beyond our goal, we can arrange for extended time, additional speakers, or catering.

One of our stretch goals is to hire Dr. Fred Jones, who spoke at the ICMI. His inclusion would be groundbreaking because he is a former professor from the Coles College of Business, the home of KSU's flagship business program. If KSU students see a distinguished KSU professor speak about the risks facing young men today, then words cannot express how successful this event will be.

Ticket sales will start on August 1. *****

I hate to bring yet another financial burden onto this community, but I'm afraid the timing is as good as it is ever going to be. If every AVfM reader repeatedly donated just $1 an hour, we would reach our goal today.

The media is starting to notice us. Recently, Jenny Jarvie from The New Republic and the Los Angeles Times reached out to us, as did a Josh Pate, a Kennesaw journalist who interned for KSU student media.

The resistance is also growing. People are repeatedly ripping down our banners and writing little notes on our flyers.

[image]
"HAHA "men's rights" What rights don't men have – from a man"
I also get emails full of sheer insanity.

She seems nice.
Kennesaw citizens are also a-twittering.

Tweet tweet, motherfuckers.
KSU will soon have its own Title IX-backed football program and an entire new campus from Southern Polytech State University (SPSU) next year. In fall 2011, 4,590 of 5,784 SPSU students were male (79%). KSU is currently (and long has been) a predominantly female campus (~60%), with 24,604 students by fall 2012. The merge will create a roughly 50/50 split in the student body between men and women. This break in enrollment trends creates new opportunities and a need to watch over future developments.

No more rhetoric; it's time for results. This is a huge opportunity, folks. We're not just expanding the dialogue, we are installing the first AVfM-backed student organization on campus and making it last, regardless of what ideologues think about us.

The game-changing KSUM election is coming, and we need people who are just as passionate about men's rights as I am, if not more so.

All I am asking is for you to get excited and make history, because KSUM will not survive without people who care.

Will you help KSUM put men's rights on campus by donating or volunteering?

Note that donations go to KSUM, NOT AVFM.

 EDIT FOR CLARIFICATION: Tickets are NOT being sold for profit. Since the fundraiser is expected to cover the cost of the conference, tickets are "sold" in the sense that there are a limited number of tickets available on a first-come-first-serve basis. Supporters will not be charged for tickets, but are asked to make a recommended donation to help KSUM operations, to handle unexpected costs, and to reinvest in the MHRM community. Contributors who get "free tickets" in the FundAnything campaign are getting priority access to tickets before they are offered to the general public.

Why I'm a Men's Rights Activist now

Jonathan Bornstein · 16 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I am coming out of the closet. Yep. Like many, it took me a long time to come to peace with it, years of soul-searching and introspection. But now I have come out to myself and to the world, and I feel like a weight has been taken off my chest. I am a men's rights activist.

Growing up in the cradle of western feminism, the Upper West Side of New York City, and attending enlightened and well-funded public schools (where as kids we labored over the guilt-inducing importance of the failed Equal Rights Amendment), I was raised to be a feminist. A full-blown—male—feminist. While I never advocated a policy of feminism, I am indeed the product of it. A complete product of it. I had brilliant female teachers who advocated feminism. I shared co-ed classrooms with brilliant young girls whom I admired, whose intelligence I wished I could emulate. We wrote papers on the first female Supreme Court Jurist, Sandra Day O'Connor. While Dad turned me on to the Yankees, Mom took me to the ballet and exposed me to her interests: The Met, Lincoln Center, refined stuff, etc. Mom worked; she was an accomplished full-time educator raising two boys along with my father in our nuclear family. Our synagogues were egalitarian.

Never was I exposed to any messages that specifically reduced women or girls. That was just philistine! Any suggestion that women were on their own merits inferior to men would have been met with rejection and ridicule. Looking back on this indoctrination now, I see a lot of mixed messages.

See, radical feminism exploits the natural confidence of young boys. It seizes boys' engrained disposition that girls are separate and it guilts them. Yes, girls are separate from boys, aren't they? Us boys are taught from a young age that girls are indeed separate. We are taught to be gentle with girls, not rough-house with them, to treat them as ladies, to defer to their feelings, to please them. Young boys are taught to exalt girls. Boys are the dirty ones who ride bikes and fight over a touchdown. Girls are sugar and spice and everything nice. Then, BAM! We enter adolescence and we are told that girls are oppressed, sidelined, overlooked, victimized by some boogie-man patriarchy. What the hell just happened? First I was trained to separate and elevate them, to regard them as fully equals. Now they are ringing the bell of cosmic victimization. Did I miss something?

I finally became acquainted with radical feminist policy when my role as a father was legally shattered. Enter adultery by my wife, followed by an allegation of invisible domestic violence. Jon's life, over. No proof of a crime. Whatever one thinks of my character, (fine, I am obviously scum), let's assume the worst of me, for argument's sake. The crucial point is that without a shred of proof, but with complaints spoken by an admitted and exposed adulterer, my life was ruined. Where are the witnesses? The hospital record? The photos? The police reports? None to be found. This low threshold of "proof" raises the obvious constitutional question about the role of the state. Should the state be so reactive that fathers are removed from children because of the words of a hysterical and adulterous woman who, as a person with the sudden liability of abandoning the marriage, has an interest in my removal? I cannot think of a more tragic sexist policy. And with this I was removed from my children, my home, my clothes, my heirlooms, my photos, my books. My whole life.

The state's mobilization to remove me was the result of the Radical Feminist Legal Complex.

Look, I get it. If a dude hits his wife, charge him. Take him down. Felony. Existing statutes provide for this. But this dilemma is far more insidious. Apparently, New York operates along the thought-crime-like premise that domestic violence need not be "violent"—a concept at war with language and reason, as Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia recently wrote. New York entertains something called implied violence. It is absurdia infinitum. My adulterous wife conveniently claimed fear of me. This is violence to New York.

Since that day in September 2010, I have been to hell and back. Every participant in the systemic process has responded to my pleas with an apathy the likes of which I never thought could exist in a government to which I paid taxed, that once employed me, whose military I was prepared to join, whose public universities educated me. I am viewed differently now. As farm dung that fertilizes a massive—MASSIVE!—governmental process. There is an unmatched zeal "to get me": law enforcement, DAs, judges, court-appointed psychologists, attorneys ad litim—all shielded with immunity.

Today I have a new education to boast. I now know of VAWA, child support, orders of protection available like condoms at the health center, the Duluth model of domestic violence re-education theories, a complicit legal guild, Title IX, Title IV-D, university sexism, a consumer culture that mocks dads, prison, etc. There is an endless horizon of sexual-politics, radical-feminism policies that are reshaping every sense about manhood and fatherhood with which I was raised to see as proper and good. And took as holy. How stupid, right?

And I also learned something else: I am hated. Hated. Yes. I am hated. I get no presumption of favor—ever. The more I seek to remain a dad, the more I am told I am "angry" and thus unfit. The state is deaf to me and to what it does to me. I am also painfully alone.

I have tried to get my story out to every media outlet I can think of. I have found no support anywhere in my fight to be a father. Seems only fellow dads care about dads. Lawyers want money. Cops sneer or arrest. Legislatures are insanely politicized, as are judiciaries. Most dads' groups are seen as "reactive" and "unfocused." The silence of unavailable resources tortures me.

All of this is the result of a social/legal policy informed by vengeful radical feminist ideology, one that seeks to swing with a hammer than to extract with a tweezer.

Look, I am a lot of things: a loving father is paramount. The last thing I wanted is to be "that guy," embittered and ranting about feminism. I just cannot figure out when I became such a bad guy.

So why am I now a men's rights activist? My children. These policies keep me from them. I love them. They need me. And I need them. If this is a bad impulse, I am nothing.

The Manic Pixie Nightmare Harpies of Nathan Rabin

August Løvenskiolds · 16 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There is a relatively recent "trope" (actually based on a very old "stock character type" that feminist idiots have erroneously redubbed a "trope") known as the "Manic Pixie Dream Girl" (or MPDG) and the poor inventor of the term, film critic Nathan Rabin, has just publicly apologized for … what, naming her?

In Rabin's own words: "I coined the phrase to call out cultural sexism and to make it harder for male writers to posit reductive, condescending male fantasies of ideal women as realistic characters. But I looked on queasily as the phrase was increasingly accused of being sexist itself…. I honestly hate the term too. I feel deeply weird, if not downright ashamed, at having created a cliché that has been trotted out again and again in an infinite Internet feedback loop."

But I'm getting ahead of myself—what (or who) is a Manic Pixie Dream Girl? I found the examples of MPDGs in their Wikipedia entry (trigger warning for Dean Esmay: Wikipedia) to be unhelpful because every movie/character listed there is from a romantic comedy, and since I avoid boring rom-com chick-flicks because of their identical plots and dull characters, I haven't actually seen any of the movies that purportedly rock that creature.

However, since actress Zooey Deschanel has played the MPDG and knowing her work in helping to ruin the movie adaptation of Douglas Adams's Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy, I think I have a handle on the concept. For another example, the character of Miss Daisy Wick on the Fox Network's TV show Bones is an overblown super-MPDG, the most extreme of many on that show.

Now, the concept of the MPDG is a useful one—I know characters like them in real life, some of them maintaining their MPDG attitude well into their 40s despite marriage and childbirth. MPD Girls are also examples of neoteny—the persistence of childlike characteristics (both physical and behavioral) into adulthood, which in humans is part of a sexual reproduction strategy, like wearing makeup and sporting pigtails, that emphasizes the fecundity of youth, especially in those whose youth is fading.

But why is the MPDG sexist? Is it because a man dared to name her, or that men are attracted to her? Both.

Rabin's unease and embarrassment with his own purportedly Frankensteinian phrase is intriguing—even Rabin says that "(a)s is often the case in conversations about gender, or race, or class, or sexuality, things get cloudy and murky really quickly."

"Murky," huh. What Rabin leaves unsaid is that he seems to feel that he overstepped the chalk outlines that feminists put down against men who ignore, or fail to shut-the-fuck-up about, ideas and subjects that feminists claim exclusive privilege over.

In feminist discourse, men discussing male feelings and sexual attractions are somehow deemed sexist, oppressive, and just, wow!, wrong! A great example of this that really puts the "jerk" into knee-jerk can be found in Katy Waldman's horribly failed attempt in Slate to satirize Tom Junod's sappy article in Esquire. Junod's admiring ode to the charms of today's 40ish coquettes created a clumsy response of such naked hatred of male sexuality that Waldman has earned the title of Manic Pixie Nightmare Harpy of the Monthlies. Congratulations on your sloppy, gratuitous bitchery, Katy:

> Indeed, it may be said that the best thing that fifty-six-year-old American men have going for them is a men's magazine that will let them announce they are having a lot of sex with a lot of hot women.

> Of course, 56-year-old men have to work for their advantage; they have armored themselves with Financial Times subscriptions and elastic waistbands even as they fumble with their CPAP masks. Still, what has made > them figures of fantasy is their own vulnerabilities. Go to a party: There is simply no one more desperate to bang than a fifty-six-year-old man.

So, a man praises women, and a woman slaps him down for having feelings—gender-role policing, much? How very non-equality man-hating feminist of you, Katy. And fat-shaming. And disability-shaming. And sexuality-shaming. How would you feel, Katy Waldman, if someone called you a fat, lame, and desperate-sounding cunt?

The deep emotional fault line that drove Waldman into becoming a Manic Pixie Nightmare Harpy is a largely forgotten concept called "sexual crypsis," which I discovered thanks to a recent interview posted by Men's Rights Edmonton:

Although the short definition of "sexual crypsis" is "hiding fertility status," the idea goes back deep into the human narrative at least as far as the discovery of sexual shame in the Garden of Eden as one of the founding ideas of human community. Just as human men mate-guard their women, the guarding, by feminist women, of any topic related to human sexuality is deeply tied into preserving this "patriarchal" concept at all costs and even at the expense of the stated goal of feminism—"equality."

Yes, I said it—feminism is patriarchal at its core. After all, what sort of "equality" between the genders means that

1. Women can discuss their sexual desires, but men doing so are shamed for it;
2. Emotional women are coddled, but emotional men are told to man-up/shut up;
3. Feminists protest efforts for men to have a male birth control pill but demand that men pay for women's pills;
4. Women are encouraged to speak at men's rights conferences, but men are forbidden at feminist conferences;
5. Women can demand, and get, "safe spaces" for women, but all-male enclaves are breached by women;
6. A woman who has unwanted penis-in-vagina sex is a rape victim, but a man who has unwanted penis-in-vagina sex is called "lucky"—one of the rare TRUE examples of "rape culture" outside of prisons;
7. The domestic violence that women do to men is ignored, but violence by men on women is universally decried.

Indeed, the age-old question of "What do women want?" remains a question because of the diversionary tactics of those mired in maintaining sexual crypsis—examples include the rage against men who refuse to be "friend-zoned" (and even the feminist rage at the term "friend-zone" itself). Much of the anger, unease, dismay, and discordant psychic pain exhibited by those people—especially journalists—against men's human rights activism comes ultimately from their devotion to maintaining human sexual crypsis.

Without sexual crypsis, the Pickup Artist (PUA) community would disband overnight because human sexuality would be open and un-bride-allied—everyone would be fucking in the streets and scaring the horses, which also fuck in the open when they can.

While the backlash against Nathan Rabin will soon become titanic—never apologize to a feminist, you poor fool, it only shows the male weakness that triggers feminist sexual crypsis anger—the real message for the MHRM is that because our issues by necessity run roughshod over sexual crypsis, we will always trigger anger whether we try to play nice, or not.

So fuck that, and death to the idea that we need to apologize for fighting for men's human rights. Playing not-so-nice is more fun, and it gets the job done.

Salon's misandry on display re: the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Tom Golden · 16 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There was a recent article on Salon.com about the 1st International Men's Issues Conference. The article was not so dissimilar to some other major publications that had an obvious strong bias against men and boys. It needs to be said that there were some very good articles that were much more accurate. An example is the USA Today piece.

This Salon article offered a paragraph about my part in the conference and I found it highly inaccurate. I thought I would take some time here to voice my side of things. I have been interviewed by the mainstream media many times over the years, including The New York Times, The Washington Post, CBS Evening News, CNN, and even the NFL Channel and ESPN. Each of these interviews was fair and accurate in their portrayal of the message I was trying to get across. The Salon article, however, fails in that regard, and the writer seems to have a bone to pick with men and boys. Here's the paragraph in question:

If one of the primary messages of the conferences was "feminists are bad," the other was "men's rights activists are good." In the talk "Men's Unique Way of Healing," social worker Tom Golden covered every inch of the stage with his energetic pacing and pantomiming, opening the talk by holding his hands in the air and chanting, "Men are GOOD!" "How many of you have been told that you don't know how to talk about your feelings?" Golden asked the crowd. His explanation: Men shouldn't be expected to open up emotionally. They sit in a fishing boat all day without saying a word and then exit the boat as best friends. Michael Jordan emoted by crying for his late father after winning the championship. Men are "good" just the way they are, and need not bother with all of that "crying" and "talking about your feelings" stuff.

Okay. So let's take the very first part.

"opening the talk by holding his hands in the air and chanting, 'Men are GOOD!'"

Now have a look at the very beginning of the YouTube video and see if I hold my hands in the air and chant, "Men are good":

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=h7yaH-DVbYQ?start=155&feature=oembed]

I hope you noticed that my hands were behind my back and I said, "Men are good" exactly two times. Not much of a chant. But why would he want to portray me like that?

My guess is that what I was saying went against the grain of his own belief system and he was trying to paint me as a fanatic of some sort. Perhaps he was thinking … "Men are good? No, can't be right. Men are the problem!" And when we don't agree with someone and want to diminish their ethos, what can we do? Say they are chanting! You know, who chants? Mostly religious folks who are far from the mainstream and often seen as fanatics. The default population views "chanting" with great suspicion. So let's just paint Golden as a chanter! LOL Cheap.

Whatever happened to Woodward and Bernstein? This writer actually reminds me of what I might expect from a middle-school student who had it in for the person they were writing about.

But it gets worse. The article quotes me as saying, "How many of you have been told that you don't know how to talk about your feelings? Golden asked the crowd." (The actual quote was "How many men in this audience have heard that? That you are not dealing with your feelings" – considerably different but close.) But then it goes on to say:

"His explanation: Men shouldn't be expected to open up emotionally."

Okay, now this one gets to me. I have spent over 30 years sitting with men in deep emotional pain and have never said and will likely never say that men shouldn't be expected to open up emotionally. He has missed the entire thrust of the talk. What I tried to say was that men have a very different way of opening up and most people can't even see it.

The article says:

"Men are 'good' just the way they are, and need not bother with all of that 'crying' and 'talking about your feelings' stuff."

Yet another horrible interpretation. What I have found, and I hope what I said in the talk, was that men have a different way of getting at their emotions. I never said anything about them not needing to bother with the crying, etc. The fact is that their actions and inactions will often move them to a place of tears. They are just much less likely, for a wide variety of reasons, to do this in public.

The question that arises in my mind is why would this reporter write such a biased and inaccurate piece when all of the rest of the interviews I have done over the years have been markedly different in accuracy? I think it is a small jump to see that this was the first time that I had presented for AVfM in a public men's issues setting. My normal setting is with mental health professionals or with hospices. In those settings people seem very receptive to the message, but once you get associated with men's issues you get slammed. I think what we are dealing with is a culture and a writer who is so gynocentric and so threatened by hearing the idea that men have needs that he fails repeatedly to be able to see and discuss those needs. He shuts down and attacks. This is what people do when they are feeling threatened. Be sure to read the rest of the article and you will see that his slant was not reserved just for me. The entire conference seems to have gotten under his skin.

I wrote a comment for the online Salon article to try to clarify what I actually said, but I think it is falling on deaf ears. Read some of the comments and you will see Archie Bunker and worse. Archie was at least lovable. If you can detach, it can actually be fairly entertaining to read through them. This is a brainwashed group who is vehement that their brainwashing is the only way to see things and anyone voicing a different viewpoint is seen as an idiot who can't get dates. I mean, really? I will paste in the comment I made here.

Enough said.

1. Most men will process their emotions in a way that is very different from the cultural default. They will tend to use action, inaction, and honoring to do so.
2. Men do this for many reasons but the main reasons that were discussed in the talk were that a man's emotional pain is taboo in our culture. The second reason of four was that men are expected to provide and protect and this expectation includes a powerful expectation that men avoid any form of dependency. When men are seen as dependent they are often judged as not being "real men." Men are not dumb enough to fall for that trap.
3. There are physical reasons for these differences starting with the large levels of testosterone that boys (and about 18% of girls) receive at about 2 months in utero. We discussed the probable impact of this on the processing of emotions. The work of Shelly Taylor (The Tending Instinct) showed us that when stressed, men and women have different paths to cope. Men tend to fight or flight. That is, they tend to connect their stress with action or inaction while women do something very different. Taylor found that women will "tend and befriend." That is, women will move towards INTERACTION when stressed. This contrasts with the men's tendency to move towards action and/or inaction. This important bifurcation start to help us understand our differences in processing emotions.
4. The talk then gave two examples of the way men heal. We discussed Eric Clapton and the way he worked with his loss following the sudden death of his young son. We also discussed Michael Jordan and his ways of coping following the murder of his father.

I have been working with men in emotional pain for over 30 years and having someone write that I said, "Men shouldn't be expected to open up emotionally" is pretty shocking and inaccurate. I said nothing of the sort. What I did say was that men have a very different way to process their emotions and we need to factor that in when we help them connect. The material I presented was a summary of what usually takes 3-4 hours to get across. Many details were left out due to time. If you have any interest, I have written two books on the topic*: Swallowed by a Snake: The Gift of the Masculine Side of Healing* and the more recent Kindle book The Way Men Heal.

Chris Mackney: Reaching out for help

Christopher Mackney · 17 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: Last night I spoke with one of the sources I have on the Chris Mackney story. The source told me that Chris had reached out to literally hundreds of people before starting his blog and ultimately taking his own life. I was provided with the email address he used for that work. I immediately went into my email archives with a knot in my gut. When I found no record that he had tried to reach me, I felt a horrible combination of relief and sadness.

We get so many emails from people asking, sometimes begging, for help that we can't provide, lacking both resources and the power to intervene on such a corrupt system.

That moment was a rough one for me personally, but leaves me more determined to bring Chris Mackney's story to light, and the stories of so many other men who no one ever heard of.

The following is the first known blog entry we have from Chris Mackney. It is dated November 20, 2013, just over a month before he committed suicide. It will be followed by others, all of them, until chrismackney.org is launched and our promise to Chris is fulfilled. —PE

As many of you already know, I have been reaching out for help for severe emotional abuse, parental alienation and psychopathy in a domestic relations case in Fairfax County Virginia. When I entered the process, I knew my case was different. I just discovered for the first time in 10 years that my children have a convicted murderer for a grandfather. My ex-wife and her father are extremely abusive and controlling and now I discovered they had hidden evidence of this from me in order to have children.

My case has been in the Fairfax County Circuit Court since October 2008. There have been 54 hearings in the case. My ex-wife and her father have spent well over $1 million in legal fees. I currently owe my ex-wife over $200,000 in legal fees and my children over $125,000 in back child support. The Court has ignored every one of my fair and reasonable solutions to keep everyone out of Court. The Court has put me in jail 4 times, at my ex-wife's request. I have literally begged the Judges in the case to bring in a Guardian Ad Litem to protect the children in a 'high-conflict' family matter that involves severe emotional abuse, parental alienation and psychopathy. 6 times, the Fairfax County Circuit Court has prevented my children from obtaining an attorney to protect their rights, while the mother is spending 4 TIMES the amount in legal fees than I will ever owe my children. Conflict of interest, anyone?

Abusers, high-conflict divorces, and psychopaths are all defined by patterns of behavior. Abusers are able to abuse because they have power over their victim and they manipulate, lie, 'gas-light' and create 'chaos' and control. Acts of sexual abuse, domestic violence, and emotional abuse are the fault of the abuser and can be verified or refuted by looking at the misuse of instrumental aggression. The patterns of behavior either exist or they do not. Unless you choose not to see the pattern.

Emotional Invalidation is how abusers manipulate and control. Emotional Invalidation is debilitating, abusive and among the most emotionally abusive experiences, that leads to PTSD and suicide. I am not a legal expert or doctor, so I can only refer to expert opinion on these subjects, but emotional invalidation is always a factor with psychopathy. Psychopathy is an emotional dysfunction that impacts the ability to properly process shame, remorse, guilt, display a 'conscience' and perceive the the rights and feelings of others. They literally generate fear in others and enjoy it.

I have endured years of emotional invalidation during my marriage and my divorce. I was physically abused, beginning on my honeymoon. My ex-wife abused me in front of our children on January 19th, 2008. The police arrived to find me locked in my son's room with my children, with a ripped shirt and scrapes and marks all over my neck and back. Her father then tried to hide the shirt after the police chose not to arrest her. This can all be verified by the police report of the incident, which should be available to the public. Although it wouldn't surprise me if it was hidden by Fairfax County. Dr. Samenow hid this from his forensic evaluation.

The Fairfax County Circuit Court has prevented my case from reaching the Juvenile and Domestic Relations Court, where Guardian Ad Litems are appointed frequently to identify the source of conflict, at a reduced rate, which is shared by both parties. It has denied every single one of my fair and reasonable solutions to keeping the parties out of Court. It has refused to investigate allegations of severe emotional abuse, parental alienation and psychopathy.

Below is a sample of my filings in this case. The Court has denied EVERY SINGLE one. It is covering up the abuse, parental alienation and psychopathy to protect the reputation of Judge Randy Bellows, Judge Terrence Ney, Judge Jane Roush, Judge Brett Kasabian and Judge Dennis Smith. Each one of these Judges heard about my concerns for the emotional welfare of my children and chose not to grant my petition to appoint an attorney to protect their interests. The Court has willfully chosen to ignore patterns of behavior and the recommended strategy in high-conflict cases, according to the American Bar Association and the sections about 'abuse' in the The National Council of Juvenile and Family Court Judges 'Judicial Guide to Child Safety in Custody Cases.'

The Court is preventing a Guardian Ad Litem from entering the case because according to Judicial System of the Commonwealth of Virginia:

Guardian ad litem (GAL) literally means "guardian for the suit." A guardian ad litem in Virginia is an attorney appointed by a judge to assist the court in determining the circumstances of a matter before the court. It is the fundamental responsibility of the guardian ad litem to provide independent recommendations to the court about the client's best interests, which can be different from advocating for what the client wants, and to bring balance to the decision-making process. The GAL may conduct interviews and investigations, make reports to the court, and participate in court hearings or mediation sessions.

Please read my motions and decide for yourself. Please post in the comments if you think there is severe emotional abuse, parental alienation, psychpoathy, fraud, or a cover-up.

If you want more details or have questions about my case, please post them in the comments. I will provide full disclosure. I will also be addressing specifically the fraud of Dr. Stanton Samenow and how he used his knowledge of Psychopathy to hide Psychopathy from the Court. Then I will go through how Judge Randy Bellows chose to use my children as punishment, which is exactly what alienating parents do to deny access to the other parent. Judge Bellows was not fooled. He was made aware of my concerns and the patterns of behavior before and after I understood psychopathy.

Erin Pizzey: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Erin Pizzey · 17 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: We will be presenting the complete transcripts of all the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014 presentations here on AVfM in the following weeks. Here is the second presentation from the first day, June 27, that of Erin Pizzey, who has devoted her life to helping violence-prone women and men.

Right. I've got half an hour!

Now, in the beginning, I was booted out of the Women's Movement, and I've still got the letter banning me (the liberation movement) from all the collectives, because I stood up and said, if this is your intention in these huge collectives to say that the family is a dangerous place for women and children, I, for one, do not believe you. Anyway – you have nothing to do with women – there has never been a Women's Movement. It was not a Women's Movement. It wasn't about women. It was about a handful of powerful Marxist women turning on men of the Left, and brilliantly deciding they would create a billion-dollar industry.

Now, at the time they were doing this, they weren't involved at all –

(Audio lost for 13 seconds)

– Okay, I'll shout!

So, what happened was that, for those first four years, as the women poured through the doors with their children, I realized – and partly because I'd come from a very violent, dysfunctional family, and it was my mother who was particularly cruel and violent towards me; and I carried this with me on behalf of my own brother and twin sister, that we never had a childhood, it was – we were robbed, by both our parents.

But the one thing I was very aware of is that it is a tragedy when the father is violent, but when it's the mother, it's a catastrophe. Because she is the – she is she carries this baby, and as the women poured into the refuge they'd say, "My baby's not moving, my baby's not moving."

And I'd say to them, "Look, if you smoke a cigarette, you share it with the baby. If you drink a drink, you share it with the baby. The chemicals of rage and anxiety, you share with the baby. What do you expect the baby to do, except to stay thus and be born already wired-up damaged?" Now, MRI proves what I was saying 40 years ago.

The first hundred women that came in, 62 of them were as violent as the men they left. And what I had – trying to say this, and stand up at a time when the militant radical movement was running out of money, they could no longer actually attract women, because they were too radical, and women did not want to hear that marriage was an unsafe place for them; they didn't want to hear that sleeping with men was sleeping with the enemy, and all the rubbish that went with that.

And so what actually happened was, that as far as the women coming in, we began to organize among ourselves because there was nobody else. And most of the women who came in who were violence-prone said, "There is a problem for me, I cannot make relationships." And that's absolutely true.

So as the militant women were coming in – and for them, it was a bonus, because they were looking for funding, and a just cause. What better than innocent women of men's violence? All men, the Patriarchy. What a brilliant funding strategy. You had half the population oppressed by the other half, and you took the money off the other half to pay for it. And this has now created what is a very, very dangerous – I call it the Evil Empire; it has done more damage to relationships between men and women. And I have kept saying, if we do not stop the progress of this infiltrating all parts of everybody's lives, including – the ideology's become like a virus.

But to be anti-feminist is somehow to be a misogynist who hates women. It's not anything to do with that. It is actually understanding the political movement that has come out of what was originally a therapeutic community that would give every person, men and women and children, a second chance to listen and to understand other strategies for survival. Nobody could do it for my parents, because there was nothing at that time. I knew that it needed to be done.

And as the women moved in, and expressed their violent behavior, and were violent to their children, the volunteers and the other mothers were there, and we all worked on the whole concept of what is, and how can you, mother and father your children if no one has ever taught you? And that's exactly what I grew: a huge community.

We were – because women were pouring in from all over the country, we squatted in huge buildings, I owned an enormous hotel in Richmond, the Palm Court Hotel. It had 47 private suites, and 78 mothers and kids moved in there. We had rows of buildings that had been left empty by boroughs; we just took them over at night and left a notice on the door, and the police would come and say, "All right, it's you."

So we were a huge community, men, women, children, all working together. And that was my vision.

So, you could imagine what I felt when I actually – 1974 – we were sitting there and having a small conference to talk to other refuges about how they could set up and we could federate. And in marched highly organized women from across the country, and voted themselves into the National Federation of Women's Aid – who now really own most of the refuges, shelters, in England. And Refuge, my old refuge, owned the others.

In America – I came to America in the early Seventies, and I could see what was happening: exactly the same thing. The women were scribbling Title-whatever-it-was [editorial note: Title IX. –DE], to get the money to create the Empire, on the backs of very fragile women and children. And this is going on 40 years, it's going on and it's getting bigger and bigger and bigger. And I stood back, then, and I was begging: I was saying to people, "This is a fraudulent movement, listen to what I'm saying!" And nobody would say anything; because for a long time, the media, the courts, the agencies, certainly the universities, were preaching this doctrine which was in essence a feminist-Marxist doctrine that eviscerated men off the scene.

But the same thing was going to happen; women would be putting their children, one of the demands was 24-hour nurseries; women would become the earners, men would become dispensable. And it sounded so laughable 40 years ago, nobody would believe me! Now I sit here, and I don't think there's anybody in this room who doesn't believe me.

And many who, [Applause]

And why this is an historic occasion is because this is the first time I've ever seen this many people turn up for a discussion about men and men's issues.

My biggest problem, actually – and this is going to be a very troublesome thing to talk about – my main problem was getting women who come from years, generations, of family violence – not only family violence, but family incest — and saying to women with their 15-year-old sons sitting on their laps wrapped together like pretzels, "Stop it! You can't do this, this is not appropriate behavior!" Because for many women coming into the shelters and refuges, they don't know what appropriate behavior is.

How are you supposed to know, if no one teaches you? How are you supposed to – I mean, I was an extremely violent child. I wrote my memoirs, called Infernal Child. And why would I not be a violent child, when your mother whips you with ironing cords? And you stand in front of a teacher in Canada, in Toronto, and you say, "Look at my legs," which had actually scabbed from the blood, and she says, "Well, no wonder, you're such a terrible child."

And this is going on even today! How many times do you read stories of children going to school, trying to get food out of rubbish-bins with the teachers – good heavens! – ignoring it all. Because nobody wants to speak out.

Yes, there is a huge amount of very normal, ordinary people who go about their daily business and are not at all involved in what we're talking about. But those of us who are in the belly of the beast – who have been born into it, who have had no other opportunities – these are the women I love and work with. I work with and have always worked with violent women.

And you see, this is – from the very beginning – me feeling, actually, it's not a men's issue. Yes, of course men are violent. Men can be as violent as each other. But if you don't mother the mother, if you don't teach the mother how to mother the children, and the father to father the children, what do you expect to happen? My argument was, if we can take and mother the mothers, and the fathers if they want to be included, we could empty mental hospitals and jails.

Ah, but then you come up against something else! As a resident governor said to me – she said, "Every child that's born into a dysfunctional family is a point on my pension." Yes! Now, I think you should frame that, because that tells you about The Beast. And it's like bigger fleas on this body that needs the blood.

And so, what's happening now? I can tell you what's happening in England: If a woman is considered an unfit mother, the child is taken away from her. She then replaces the child within nine months to a year. That child is taken, and taken, and taken – and this fills the adoption quotas, this fills the children's homes, this fills all the needs for all this huge empire that has grown round this very sad human fact – that some children are born into terrible, terrible family situations.

And when "Peter," for instance; his mother was a prostitute, she was incestuous with him, his father sodomized him whenever he felt like it, the mother disappeared, so then he was taken into care; at 13, he strangled a boy of 11, in the bushes.

Right? Everybody was baying for his blood. He was a 13-year-old boy. Who do you put in the dock? His mother? His father? The agencies?

And when, later on, he found a woman and had three children by her, and repeated the pattern and molested his children, social workers had actually said he'd reformed! How could he reform? Nobody had put out a hand to him – they jailed him, and they punished him.

I can tell you, you cannot punish already-battered and -abused children. There is nothing that the state can do to them – even take their lives – when this is what happened to them in their childhood. And I want us to forget about blaming men or women, but actually begin to look at the judiciary, at the social services, at all the people who live off this human misery.

I've got a new approach, now, to men. I say, "How long have you been awake for?"

Because, as Anne said – and we work very closely together – as Anne said, it isn't just that you lose your family, because you have a wife who has, possibly, a serious personality disorder, particularly if she's a narcissistic exhibitionist. And there is no known cure – that is the one thing that will attract men. She's the arm-candy. She's the center of all of the attention, in the middle of the room, and he wants her on his arm. And then it isn't till far too late, what I call the "mask of sanity" slips – and he's trapped.

Now, you can take away – right, you say, "It's her fault, she's taken away my children, she's told them that I've molested the children" – but when he turns to what he's always believed in, when he turns to the place that he pays his taxes, and he finds that it's corrupt. Family courts are corrupt from top to bottom in England. I don't speak for Canada, and I know you don't either, but I promise you – they're secret; no decisions may ever come out of the courts. Terrible injustices are done in there. And to me, I've fought in those courts for 40 years. They have to be disbanded. We have to –

First of all, this whole business of battered, abused, and sexually abused people who grow up unable to make relationships. The courts can't deal with it; they're not set up to deal with it. The fact is – and I'm included in this – the only sanction the court has is to jail; it means nothing to me. So when they try to jail me, from Magistrates' Court to the High Court to the House of Lords, back to acts of Magistrate's Court to jail me – I would have been perfectly comfortable in Holloway. Anything was better than my childhood.

So I want you to understand that we need not only to disband the family courts, but also put this whole subject of battered and abused children, and the kind of therapy and the kind of care that we need to give, into the hands of the people who can really do it, who were trained to understand what's going on. The majority of women in my refuge – the courts were part of their theater. There's no question that anybody would tell the truth under oath.

Having said that of the 62 – the other women were innocent victims of their partners' violence, and yes, their partners were extremely violent; in many cases, dangerous. But they were integrated human beings who had been loved, mothered, and fathered; and once given a hand up, they could move on and regain their lives.

But the work I do is with women who have come from generations of violence. I've always seen – and it has always been – a generational, family issue. The whole business – I've got, how many more minutes have I got? Five.

But the whole business of "patriarchy" and the gathering of billions and billions of dollars across the Western world, the whole business of persecuting men, of demonizing boys, of failing to educate – that has been a huge, fraudulent movement.

And we need to name names – and first on my list is Hillary Clinton. And I accuse her of being one of the leaders of this fraudulent movement; followed by Germaine Greer, by Harriet Harmon, by – Betty Friedan's dead – but all the whole lot of them. And we need to go after them! We cannot allow this to continue. And if we don't stop it, I don't see a future for marriage, for love, or for anything.

And that question about marriage: I see men's point of view. Why on earth would you take a risk that has a 90% chance of stripping you of everything you have, particularly your children?

[Applause]

I'm going to stop now, because I know that you're all desperate for lunch. Thank you!

The First Koalemos Awards

AVfM Video Source · 18 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Koalemos Awards are a celebration of the people who assist us in finding truth by showing us where truth cannot be found. The Koalemos Awards are similar to the Darwin Awards in that they are a satirical, tongue-in-cheek honor. The main difference is that while the Darwin Awards celebrate people who remove themselves from the gene pool in extraordinarily stupid ways, giving desirable genes a better chance to procreate, the Koalemos Awards celebrate people who destroy their own credibility in a public display of stupidity, giving intelligent ideas a better chance to procreate.

You can nominate someone in the comment sections. Five nominees will be evaluated per ceremony.

If you have not already done so, subscribe to Victor Zen because there are too many stupid people on the planet for the Koalemos Awards to end anytime soon.

The rationalization hamster, or “Matria Toxicanus”

Kimski · 18 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A field study by the Chairman of The Royal Kitten Cub Clubbing Society, (T.R.K.C.C.S.), Sir Kimski.

During the past couple of years, I have given much thought to the nature of the creature also known as the “Rationalization Hamster.” According to Urban Dictionary:

> The rationalization hamster is a legendary creature dwelling deep in the minds of the self-delusional, and is particularly common among young liberal women. From birth, the rationalization hamster enters a symbiotic relation with its host, whereby whenever the host feels a craving to do something completely insane and malicious that will have horrible consequences for everyone in the long run, the rationalization hamster will jump on its wheel and run really, really fast, getting the magical hamster wheel to spin out a long sheet of paper full of neat rationalizations for the ultimately devastating action.
> Rationalization hamsters are thought to be a key component in producing liberal scholarly works, particularly those of feminism. Young, liberated women often rely on it to explain their attraction to the asshole who is going to pump and dump them, as well as their contempt for the nice guy who, unaware of the hamster within, strives fruitlessly to gain their true love. Older, liberated women also rely on it for dumping their husbands and using the resulting child support money on jewellery, cars and/or crack.[1]

It has been a source of constant irritation and frustration for most of my life how women’s choices and bad behaviors have been excused with their ability to tap into the mindset of this vile little creature. It has become painfully obvious to me that most people don’t fully understand the true nature of the symbiosis between the two. In the following presentation, I’ll try to disclose some of the recent discoveries of the true nature of the presumed furry, cuddlesome, and lovable entity most people thought they knew.

I give you the Matria Toxicanus, a.k.a. the Rationalization Hamster.

To provide you all with a better understanding of what we’re dealing with here, let’s take a look at the estimated lifespan of the Matria Toxicanus, along with its way of life, viability, and health determinants.

It starts out as an egg-like attachment to the lower cortex of the brain, where it hatches during the early developmental phase of the host. After hatching, the Matria Toxicanus latches on to the dopamine receptors in the brain of the predominantly female host. Much like the mitochondria found in human cells, this parasite has come under speculation by scientists as to whether or not it has been living in symbiosis with female human hosts since the dawn of the human species or if it has achieved its present-day status and dominance as a consequence of the constant grooming, which mostly befalls females in our cultures. It is, however, widely recognized nowadays that the Matria Toxicanus is passed on from mother to female fetus, exactly like the aforementioned mitochondria.

The Matria Toxicanus has an estimated lifespan that follows the host’s ability to produce estrogen, i.e., they will wither and die when the host reaches approximately 40 to 50 years of age. Estrogens are synthesized in all vertebrates as well as some insects, which the Matria Toxicanus presumably belongs to. Their presence in both vertebrates and insects suggests that estrogenic sex hormones have an ancient evolutionary history.

A brief look at the history of the Matria Toxicanus:

It was originally discovered by Dr. William Claude Dukenfield in 1949, during a study of the role of dopamine in the addictive process. A consistent finding in drug-addicted subjects is a lower level of dopamine D2 receptors. In cocaine abusers, low levels of D2 receptors are associated with a lower level of metabolism in the orbitofrontal cortex. Because the orbitofrontal cortex is associated with compulsive behaviors, its disruption may contribute to compulsive drug intake in addicted subjects. This study explored whether a similar association occurs in methamphetamine abusers. Today we can only imagine his surprise when he initially opened the skull of one of the female test subjects, and this creature, now referred to as the M. Toxicanus, was revealed for the first time. A surgeon involved in the autopsy later explained: “It was staring up at him, with its tentacles latched on to the orbitofrontal cortex, and then it hissed at him!”

Dr. Dukenfield unfortunately went insane from the experience, living out his remaining years in a sanitarium without ever fully recovering from the trauma.

Today we have a far better understanding of the M. Toxicanus and its role in the increasing hatred toward men, along with the rise in irrational behaviors of women in the anglosphere. The M. Toxicanus has become somewhat of a favourite study of most male scientists specializing in the field of female behavioral patterns. We now understand that the symbiosis is biochemically based: the M. Toxicanus provides the host with large quantities of dopamine, persistently provided through constant doses to obtain mood changes, which in return provides the parasite with the “feel-good/-bad” proteins and estrogen it needs to survive and grow. And it can grow to quite amazing sizes, given the right incentive from the parents of the host during her childhood, as well as from the grooming of the host herself at a more mature age.

To fully understand the nature of the relationship between parasite and host, some scientists have compared it to an “interior” relationship between a young boy and his dog. The similarities become obvious, given the significant size of some of the M. Toxicanus specimens recovered. As mentioned, it is a symbiosis based on the mutual exchange of beneficiary biochemicals, and in the more radically attached specimens, attempts to remove the parasite from the host have triggered quite violent and overtly emotional responses. Suicide attempts have not been a rare outcome of this procedure.

It is still not fully understood why the parasite persists to live a hidden existence inside the skull of the female host when it could be benefitting from being connected to the host through an outside exterior tentacle as a fully grown specimen, and thereby follow her around much like the above-mentioned dog to a boy. Speculations have been made that an “outside” existence would render the M. Toxicanus more vulnerable to violent detachment done by other humans, when the behavior of the host becomes too irrational or even threatens the very existence of the host. However, an interior existence seems like the most viable solution to the inherent vulnerabilities of the species, even though larger specimens have been known to grow exterior limbs. The Matria Toxicanus will then grow up to eight legs, much like the arachnids, but so far there has been no proven evolutional connection between the two species.

Let me make it absolutely clear to the reader: there is no way that you can possibly compare a hamster with the M. Toxicanus. The small, cuddly, vulnerable, and cute little creature known as the hamster has nothing in common with the dangerous M. Toxicanus. The description and presentation as a hamster is a predominantly feminist choice,[2] with the sole purpose of excusing the dangerous and irrational behavior this parasite is known to trigger in the host. They are not even remotely alike in build, size, or looks. Where the hamster plays on our inherent need for protecting the smaller and more vulnerable creatures, the M. Toxicanus has far more in common with a tarantula in appearance and is at least twice as deadly to anyone attempting to prevent the emotional rush it provides to the host.

Small, beady double eyes look out at you from under a ridge across its body/head, and it has a furry growth on its soft but bony back. As mentioned, the M. Toxicanus comes with eight legs on the grown species, which are usually folded under the specimen inside the skull of the host. It has an additional variety of tentacles of different length and size placed on each side of the body/head. Usually the M. Toxicanus grows to the size of an adult male’s palm within five to six years, but due to the elasticity of the body/head, it is able to envelop the brain of the host completely.

It is a well-known and proven fact today that hosts of the M. Toxicanus have been responsible for matricide, patricide, and infanticide, along with any possible example of violence, self-mutilation, and mutilation of others. Its hosts have a long and substantiated history of causing irreversible harm to the host’s fellow humans, based on the need of the host to validate any irresponsible, irrational, or even life-threatening behavior to and for themselves.

It cannot be overstated just how dangerous this parasite has become in recent years, where it has caused damage to homes, families, property, environment, and the very fabric of civilization. It is rapidly and persistently becoming akin to the Black Plague of the 13th century. And as those more violently stricken hosts have now put an ideology of hatred in place of rational thinking and behavior, M. Toxicanus has become the most dangerous threat to the interactions of humans, along with their mutual relationships, that the world has ever faced.

And in today's increasingly infected societies, no one can hear the screams of men.

American family courts, the First Amendment, and violations of free speech: Part II

Guy Mann · 18 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is being published under a pseudonym, for fear of retribution by the family courts. —SM

Prelude

My apologies to all the readers for the delay in publishing this Part II of this article. After the publication of Part I, I was warned by my counsel that publishing this article, even under a pseudonym, would be very dangerous to the case I am currently fighting in family court. Counsel has advised that the judge would the take the criticisms and analysis in this article personally, and would likely rule against me because of it. However, such threats should never chill the reporting, publication, and information contained in these articles. Additional delays came from a couple more interviews I had to complete for the article and a Men's Issues Conference that I had to attend. However, here is Part II, and I thank you for your patience.

Part II

When inherent fundamental rights clash with the immediate power structure in place, those rights are the first to fall. Under the direction of corrupt institutions the ideal of inalienable rights becomes a misnomer—since the structures in place have the immediate power to deny you those rights, they are no longer inalienable by instant circumstance.

And so it is with the family courts. Although they co-exist in a land where federal constitutional rights abound, and where such rights are legally controlling, these courts routinely ignore them. The federal "inalienable" right to parent one's child is barely ever mentioned or entertained.

A fundamental right is not to be infringed upon unless that right was forfeited by the person. Thus, for example, a person found guilty of some offense, via due process, can be denied the right to his freedom. And yet, federal constitutional parenting rights are violated in family courts all the time. Through no fault or action of their own, parents are routinely stripped of their parental custody rights, and of their free speech rights. Later after months or years of such constitutional denial, a hearing may be held that in itself can take months to complete. In practice, and likely by design, it rarely happens or it is too late to mean anything; usually a "settlement" is extorted from the parent.

In combined attrition, parents are beaten down psychologically and financially, through money spent on attorneys and mental health evaluators, and the continuing corrosive denial of their children. During all that time, CPS and social workers, always looking to justify their existence, are constantly yapping at the ankles of parents, ready to pounce upon the slightest anonymous complaint or contrived folk wisdom, eager to interject themselves into the custody proceedings and shift the presumption of parental fitness using hysterical claims, usually against the father.

Thankfully absent throughout the years of the intact family, it is when a family is dissolving CPS workers pop up like cow patty mushrooms, and like blowflies that are attracted to the whole mess. Suddenly neglect and abuse is seen everywhere it was never seen before. Their mere proximity, armed with official henhouse gossip, is enough to dirty the reputation of the target parent in the custody actions, again usually the father, irrespective of either the legitimacy of their accusations or eventual findings of innocence. And it is no accident, CPS agencies are overwhelmingly staffed and driven by ideological feminists.

And all this is considered a perfectly normal template, applied to the assembly line of families to be processed through their machine; milking parents of their resources, time, money, and quality of life. Most importantly to the system, it is the money that can be gouged from them, through threats of fines, imprisonment, loss of their children, and public defamation. With such extortionate powers, the money pours into the family court system like water—the attorneys, psychologists, therapists, evaluators, visitations centers, the filing fees, and transcripts costs.

Judicial orders and threats move these things along, with police, tasers, guns, and jail cells not far behind for those who don't play ball.

As I mentioned in Part I of this article, all these things, traditionally very hidden from public view, provide a backdrop of corruption that would otherwise be prime for public criticism and expose. But the thing thrives in the dark, and can fester only when not being criticized or revealed. Much as a tyrant like Idi Amin was able to get away with atrocities in Uganda, but only while he kept it hidden within his borders, when it spills over into the rest of the world such regimes collapse under their own top-heavy, brittle, and self-justifying existence.

Similarly, the allergic reaction that most family court judges respond with, to anything even approaching public attention or criticism, is a consequence of their guilty knowledge of what they do, and their need to cover it up. Such judges will misuse the power of their office to silence, sanction, remove children from, and even imprison those who dare criticize their system. It makes no difference to them that everything they do is public record by law and a constitutional right of the public to see them. Aware of the zero-tolerance attitude of family court judges to public revelations, savvy attorneys will naturally attempt to game the system by filing motions in these courts seeking to shut down the opposing side's public speech, motions that in any other court would be considered legally frivolous, and sanctionable.

Information Wants to Be Set Free

As our culture evolves, and since information just wants to be free, we now see increasingly, [1] the popular dissemination and publication of public criticism of governmental institutional abuses, and [2] the reactionary backlash by those same institutions who have grown complacent, sloppy, and self-righteous with the abusive and hidden activities regularly committed out of public oversight.

As they see it, who needs quality control when there are no consequences?

Like cockroaches, the functionaries making up these institutions run for cover when exposed to the light of public attention and will therefore try to subvert any attempt to do so. It is the same dynamic that drives police officers across the nation to falsely assert their right to commit atrocities in public, yet demand that no one be permitted to record them doing it. Similarly, we can see the NSA's reactions to Edward Snowden's revelations of their illegal activities, seeking to shut him down preemptively. Even on trivial matters, the NSA sought to shut down even a T-Shirt manufacturer for selling shirts that mocked the NSA.

With the same mentality, family courts have reacted similarly to public disclosure of their normally hidden inner sanctum. With the fortress-like edifice that family courts hold against any review or oversight, the only thing they seem to respond to is public attention and outrage, and have developed ways to keep their violations out of public view. Illegal edicts, threats, and orders often get conveyed to parents in far more subtle ways, ways that lack a formal written record or order that they can be held accountable for. Family court judges will order or threaten parents from the bench, not issuing a formal written order that they know can be appealed or republished to the public. In this way they avoid the disinfecting sunlight of public attention, yet still manage to convey their threats and censorship.

Case Study #1

For example, on January 19, 2011, Nassau County, New York, Judge Anthony Falanga issued a from-the-bench directive and threat to Anthony Pappas, a Professor of Economics at St. John's University, and litigant in family court. Prof. Pappas had gone public with his complaints and experiences in the courts, of which the judge did not want him to continue, and stated to him:

> "I am admonishing you right now, you are not to communicate with anybody inside the court system, outside the court system, about how you feel you were being treated or anything like that. If you feel I am violating your right to free speech, you have the absolute right to feel that way and do whatever you feel is appropriate. If I decide to hold you in contempt, we'll cross that bridge when we come to it. Do you understand?"

More egregious examples abound, and often occur within the context of counsel seeking to conceal egregious behavior of their clients, and the court's complicit willingness to permit it. Such attorneys will seek a restraining order to prevent the public speech of fathers, who merely want to share or vent their experiences in court.

Often, judges will threaten the father with sanctions if they continue to express their opinions and experiences; sometimes judges will become retaliatory if the father uses other collateral legal avenues to support his efforts while the litigation is occurring in family court. Such judges will threaten to limit access and/or legal custody of their children as a method of control, punishment, and sanction against such "uncooperative" fathers.

Case Study #2

In Indiana, on April 29, 2009, Judge James D. Humphrey gave an ultimatum to Daniel Brewington: If Brewington continued to post and publish his experiences related to his custody efforts in the Indiana Dearborn Circuit court in his Internet blogging, it would be at the risk of losing custody of his children.

Eventually, when he continued to report to the public of his experiences, Brewington was stripped of all access to his children. When that did not stop him from expressing his free speech, Indiana officials eventually convicted and jailed him, by divining in his writings an unstated hidden threat to a judge.

Case Study #3

On March 11, 2013, Gary L. Jacobs, a candidate for the Suffolk county New York legislature, was called into Suffolk County Family Court (Hon. Julianne S. Eisman presiding) to face a family offense petition for harassment, with his ex-wife seeking a restraining order to prohibit his publishing of his family court experiences on his private Facebook page.

After issuing denigrating admonishments from the bench, accusing Jacobs's postings as "bad parenting" and "bad ex-husbandry", and suggestions that he be sued civilly for defamation by his ex-wife, the judge fortunately denied the restraining order and dismissed the family offense petition.

Case Study #4

From 2012, Jason Patric, a celebrated actor, had conducted a public campaign, Stand Up For Gus, to publicize his family court case. He highlighted the inequities where he was denied even the presumption to argue his fatherhood of his child, and he also established a public foundation to fight parental alienation.

On or about February 6, 2014, attorneys for the mother of his child filed a motion for a restraining order to stop his campaign, gag his public speech, and prohibit him from posting on the Internet. Fortunately there too, the judge denied the motion, correctly ruling that such an order would be a prior restraint in violation of the 1st Amendment, U.S. Const.

Case Study #5

On February 14, 2013, Juvenile Court Judge Joseph Johnston suspended Lou and Linda Pelletier's parental rights by remanding custody of their daughter Justina to Department of Children and Families (DCF) agency. In that order was the directive that the Pelletiers were forbidden from discussing or communicating the circumstances of their daughter's removal from their care to anyone.

After almost a year of attempting to regain custody of their daughter, Lou Pelletier decided to break the court order, and in February 2014 went to the public with his story. He had brought his daughter to Boston Children's hospital for a stomachache and cramps, but the hospital then refused to release her back to her parents, asserting that the parents refused to accept their diagnosis of mental illness, not a physical ailment.

DCF then filed a contempt of court petition, citing the Pelletiers' discussion of their case to the media. DCF then later dropped the charge, after 1st Amendment lawyers criticized the gag order as unconstitutional, and public condemnation descended upon DCF and the court

Citing the parents behavior as unacceptable, in [1] being profane to hospital workers, [2] having publicized the case in the media, [3] objecting to the minimal one hour per week visits they were permitted to see their daughter, the judge concluded that the Pelletiers were "impeding progress in this case" and that they were not cooperating with treatment and conditions that were being imposed upon them and their daughter.

Due to the parents' insufficient cowering and refusal to validate the removal of their child for no legal reason, the judge asserted that the parents' custody of their own daughter was against her best interests, and again remanded custody to the state. There were no findings of actual unfitness to conclude this, rather because these parents complained loudly to the media, held obvious animosity to their daughter's captors, and refused to legitimize this treatment, the court ruled they were unfit to raise and care for their child.

Case Study #6

On December 29, 2013, a father, Christopher Mackney, having suffered the removal of his children, destruction of his life, and further judicial abuse upon himself in the family court beyond his limits, drafted a suicide letter detailing exactly how these courts brought him to kill himself. After his suicide, the letter made its way to the media, where it was then published in various Internet publications and websites.

Soon after, on April 15, 2014, not liking the content of the message Mackney had published to the world with his last dying declaration, his estranged wife asserted legal privilege, claiming copyright control, over the letter and sought via cease and desist demands to remove Mackney's letter from publication. These efforts are still pending, and the legal threats still ensuing to the publishing outlets.

Case Study #7

On November 23, 2011, Mark Byron of Cincinnati, Ohio, posted on his private Facebook account the statement:

> ". . . . if you are an evil, vindictive woman who wants to ruin your husband's life and take your son's father away from him completely — all you need to do is say that you're scared of your husband or domestic partner…"

The page was only accessible to his friends, but his ex-wife hacked into the account and read what had been written. She then went to the judge to complain about it. For this generalized free speech lament, on January 25, 2012, Judge Jon Seive of Hamilton County Domestic Court sentenced Mark Byron to 60 days in jail for expressing his angst and observations to his friends. Issuing an order to compel Byron's speech that was just as violative as the order to restrict it, the judge then extorted Byron, offering to suspend and replace the jail sentence if he posted for 30 days on his Facebook page an apology written by the judge and speaking as if he were Byron to his wife.

Initially Byron complied, but after 26 days he took down the counterfeit apology, and went back to court to face the jail time he was threatened with for his expressing his opinions. By that time, a maelstrom of criticism from over the country had descended upon the Hamilton County Court, accusing it of blatant violations of the 1st Amendment's protections of free speech, and Judge Seive capitulated the point, and did not imprison Byron, trying save face by stating that he felt Byron had been punished enough.

Case Study #8

Gary Trieste, a Kingston, NY, father embroiled in a three-year custody case starting in 2011, had at an early stage publicized his case on the Internet and media, his case was written up and commented upon, he appeared in documentaries and radio programs, publishing articles and video exposés on the family court system. In January 2014, during the ongoing custody trial, a 50-page motion was filed against him by his ex-wife, seeking a court ordered injunction preventing him from either publishing, speaking to the media, writing articles, or releasing videos of anything related to the family court proceedings, his family, or his experiences in court.

In April 2014, the Ulster County Family Court ruled that such an order would be a prior restraint of free speech and denied the motion; however, in the closing pages of the order, although Trieste's publications had nothing to do with his fitness as a parent, the judge admonished Trieste's public activism and criticism as reckless and bad parenting, and threatened that such 1st Amendment activity would nonetheless be used as evidence in the trial, putting at question his fitness as a parent in the custody case.

Case Study #9

In 2010, W. David Kimbrell was in the middle of a heated custody battle in Santa Fe County, New Mexico. The court had assigned a Guardian Ad Litem (GAL) for the children, to which Kimbrell vehemently objected to and attempted to have removed as biased and in conflict of interest. The lower court ruled that Kimbrell's attempts to remove the GAL were relentless and improper, and issued an order that Kimbrell should cease and desist those efforts; that order included a provision that Kimbrell could not even communicate his displeasure and complaints to the media. Kimbrell then formed an organization called StopCourtAbuseOfChildren.com (now defunct), from which he continued to publish his issues and criticisms of the GAL.

On July 1, 2011, the court issued an injunction preventing Kimbrell from publishing anything related to his misgivings about the GAL on the Internet. Kimbrell appealed to the NM Court of Appeals, and this order was reversed on the basis that such publications were protected by the freedom of speech clauses of the U.S. Constitution and the New Mexico Constitution. The court sent the case back with instruction to the lower court to determine whether Kimbrell's publications constituted defamation.

Case Study #10

In early 2014, pursuant to a family court custody proceeding, Surrender Malhan was stripped of custody of his two children by New Jersey Essex County Superior Court Judge Nancy Sivilli without even a hearing, as was required by law. After he was interviewed by Channel 9's newsprogram "Chasing New Jersey," and he complained about what the court had done and the improper procedures, Judge Sivilli went ballistic, and on May 1, 2014, she issued a censorship restraining order prohibiting Malhan from discussing, reporting, or expressing himself to any of the press, media, or even on his Facebook or Twitter accounts, and ordered him to take down any and all information he had posted online. The judge's post hoc justification of this order was that any discussion of the court, judge, or proceedings in published or broadcast form would harm the children, using the BIOTC invocation as an excuse to trump his Constitutional rights.

However, in response to the order, Paul Nichols, a reporter for the Bergen Dispatch who wanted to interview Mulhan, filed a lawsuit in the U.S. District of New Jersey court, asserting that such capricious orders were a violation of the 1st Amendment to the Constitution, see Dkt #2:14-cv-03821 WJM/MF. In the lawsuit, Nichols argues that BIOTC analysis can never trump fundamental federal rights, and that Sivilli's order was unconstitutional. The case is still pending review.

Summation

The efforts at suppression of public speech is an emerging and accelerating trend in family and domestic courts in America. People are forcibly thrust into an unrecognizable maelstrom of demands and directives, legal wranglings, and Looking-Glass logic; the conflict of interests between those people's right and inclination to express themselves, complain, or publish their experiences to others via the Internet and other media, unavoidably bumps into the insular and cloistered world of courts, judges, and adjunct professionals (e.g., psychologists, CPS workers, social workers, evaluators, attorneys).

Abuse of the power coming from these courts is nowhere more apparent, self-serving, and hypocritical than family courts. They consider provisional what should be absolute—constitutionally protected free-expression and speech, the right to redress grievances against the government, the right to public court proceedings, and the freedom of the press to publish such information.

Modern technologies are providing such easy broadcast capabilities for speech so as to now become as common place as making a phone call. What once was a major hurdle in information dissemination is now not a hurdle at all, and actually a normal mode of communication, e.g., Twitter, YouTube, blogging sites, Facebook, and special interests websites.

No longer is it acceptable to punish a parent's expression of his experiences in court. Claiming a best interests of the child as an excuse to silence unrelated speech will be seen for what it is—an obvious excuse to protect the judge, not the child.

Threatening a parent's custody or access to his child, solely because of such public expression and criticisms, is the province of sadists and sociopaths, and should have no place in an American court of equity.

The Murder of Sam Degelia Jr.

Michael Volpe · 18 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Publisher's note: As has been alluded to in some of the blog posts by the late Chris Mackney, there was a great deal more to Dina Mackney's family than he knew about going into the marriage. As you will see in this chapter from an upcoming book by investigative journalist Michael Volpe, that is quite the understatement. AVfM will continue to publish Chris Mackney's tragic personal story. Perhaps this post will give you more insight into what, exactly, he was dealing with and why he may have ultimately chosen suicide as a way out. —PE

Author's introduction:

I'm an investigative journalist and my definition of an investigative journalist is someone who inserts themselves in a situation someone somewhere wants kept hidden, and they report on that. While many on the internet have made Dina Mackney into the focus of this situation, that is not entirely accurate.

In fact, the center of power and influence in this situation, according to my investigation, is not Dina Mackney, but her father, Pete Scamardo. What he wants kept hidden is his involvement in the 1968 murder of his friend and business partner, Sam Degelia Jr. Scamardo paid $2,000 to have Degelia Jr. killed in order to collect on insurance money.

In fact, Scamardo, a very successful builder from Virginia, didn't reveal this information to Chris Mackney while Mackney dated his daughter, during their marriage, or during their divorce. Mackney found this out on his own in June 2008, when the divorce was several months old.

At that point, the tenor of the divorce changed. Dina Mackney fired her lawyers, Ain & Bank, and hired a law firm headed by Jim Cottrell, which advertises, "we're not the type to settle, so have your pocketbook open." (Cottrell, it should be noted, denied bullying Mackney to me, as Chris Mackney alleged.)

The revelation of this murder, which is in fact public information but not well-known, was at the center of the calculus of everything going forward.

Many who read this will likely not be most interested in the murder, and that's because like everyone they approach this story through the lens of their own ideology, but if you want to understand what really happened, stripped of ideology, you need to start with this brutal murder, a murder actually committed by the hitman, Charles Harrelson, whose son is the actor Woody Harrelson.

Now, here's the tentatively titled chapter: The Murder of Sam Degelia Jr. —MV

On the evening of July 11, 1968, Jimmy Horn, a bookkeeper, was walking into a cafeteria in McAllen, Texas, the largest city in Hidalgo County, Texas, on the tip of the Rio Grande in South Texas. He noticed his boss, Sam Degelia Jr., a thirty-year-old grain broker, father of four children under ten, and owner, along with his business partner, Pete Scamardo (father of Dina Scamardo) of Commodity Marketing Corporation. Horn asked Degelia Jr. to join him for dinner but Degelia Jr. declined saying that he was waiting on some men regarding a business deal. Jimmy Horn was the last non-murder participant to see Sam Degelia Jr. alive.

Later that evening, Sam Degelia Jr. was picked up by two men, Charles Voyde Harrelson and Jerry O'Brien Watkins. Watkins was a career loser and criminal. According to a February 27, 1970, story by the Associated Press, Watkins had been released from a federal prison in El Paso, Texas, in 1963 and the story described Watkins as, "a former convict" who "at one point was interested in selling machine guns to someone in Mexico."

Harrelson, too, was a career criminal, degenerate gambler, drug addict, and described by his former girlfriend, Sandra Sue Attaway, as being charming and kind when they first met but turning violent and pressuring her into committing crimes, including her participation in the murder of Allen Berg, months before the murder of Sam Degelia Jr.

Woody, left and Charles, right, Harrelson.
For better or worse, Harrelson is today known mostly for being the father of Woodrow (Woody) Tracy Harrelson, born July 23, 1961, who would first achieve fame as Woody Boyd on Cheers, and is now known as a movie star in movies like: White Men Can't Jump, Indecent Proposal, Natural Born Killers, and No Country for Old Men, of which the book upon which the movie was based borrowed from Charles Harrelson's alleged deeds. It's been reported that Oliver Stone, when making Natural Born Killers, encouraged Woody repeatedly to act like his father when Woody played a psychopathic serial killer in that movie.

Woody Harrelson would later say that his father disappeared from his family home in Houston in 1968, shortly before the murder, and Woody didn't communicate with him until 1981.

At the time of the murder, Charles Harrelson was shacking up with Sandra Sue Attaway, who was in her early 20s, when she met Harrelson. Attaway was an attractive twice-married, twice-divorced woman with few skills when she left her young son with her mother to move to Houston in 1967. She told a police investigator that she first met Harrelson on August 3, 1967, in Houston and by September 3, 1967, Attaway had become so taken that she took off with Harrelson to Las Vegas, where Harrelson proceeded to quickly lose the $5,000 he started with and just as quickly as they'd arrived in Las Vegas, she told Texas Ranger TH Dawson for a report he published on January 21, 1969, they were on their way to Des Moines, Iowa, where Harrelson claimed to have work available.

Attaway described to Dawson an existence like this which continued for about a year, where Harrelson would swoop into some area, run up debts, or otherwise get in trouble, and rush, with Attaway at his side, out to another town. Attaway also said that as the relationship progressed Harrelson became more violent and Attaway was beginning to learn more and more about the business he was in.

"I was not allowed to have any girlfriends or go anywhere without him. I was beginning to find out what bad things he had done such as collecting bad debts for a booking organization run by Jack Strauss the previous summer. I asked him if he hurt people when he did this and he said, 'Of course.' I had no doubt that he would because he had hurt me too."

By 1968, Attaway had tried and failed on multiple occasions to extricate herself from Harrelson. By April 1968, she was helping him commit a murder for hire. He told her that a carpet dealer named Allen Berg had cheated an associate of his, Frank DiMaria, out of $7,000, and that Harrelson had been tasked, for $2,000, with collecting the purported debt. Here's what Attaway said happened next to Dawson.

> On a Tuesday night, he came into the apt. and said he wanted me to make a phone call and he would tell me exactly what to say and that I was to repeat what Allen said so that he could me what was being said. He told me to talk the boy into meeting me somewhere which was done and he was to meet me at the Brass Jug Club. (Author's note: Attaway lured Berg, according to her testimony, with the promise of oral sex.)
> He had already bought the red Cadillac 1967 convertible with a white top at a used car lot on Post Oak Freeway from a man named Martin and we went in it. I drove and he told me how to go. We drove around the club and the boy into the club and drove around the block and stopped by the boy's Cadillac as he walked back across the street. Chuck jumped out and forced Allen to enter our car by use of a gun and shove.

Attaway said they drove to a secluded area unfamiliar to her where she proceeded to get the car stuck in the mud. Harrelson proceeded to force Berg into the trunk and fixed up the car.

Attaway said they kept driving, with Harrelson noticeably nervous, when "he said to stop right where we were."

Harrelson then forced Berg out of the trunk while Attaway said she waited in the driver's seat, and assumed that Harrelson was going to rough up Berg. Instead, she heard a shot.

"I jumped out of the car and looked behind the car. Allen was laying on the ground on his face," Attaway said in the report. Berg wasn't dead, and Attaway described how Harrelson later used a rope to suffocate him after he noticed him still alive as he was digging a hole for Berg's body.

This particular murder for hire was recently documented by Berg's brother, David Berg, in the book, Run, Brother, Run, released in 2013. Though Harrelson claimed to Attaway that the murder had to do with money owed to DiMaria, in Run, Brother, Run, the motivation for the murder was payback. DiMaria had worked briefly for Berg, running his carpet business in San Antonio, until Berg accused him of stealing. Berg's father then spent the next year telling any banker in Texas not to loan any money from "the thief who stole us blind."

"Leonard [the investigator hired by the Berg's] had told Dad that Frank DiMaria was behind Alan's death and that the motivation was spite: he wanted to destroy Dad. He had paid someone else to commit the murder: Charles Harrelson, a thirty-one-year-old contract killer whom the Texas Rangers suspected of having murdered a dozen men or more."

After describing the murder of Allen Berg in excruciating detail, Attaway next told Dawson about how she met Pete Scamardo, who she apparently first met at around the time that Harrelson committed the murder for hire of Berg.

> Meanwhile, I had met a man from Hearne, Texas, named Pete Scamardo who was introduced as an old friend of Chuck's from Huntsville and Chuck told me, not in Pete's presence, that Pete had some business they were discussing. About the same time that Allen was killed Chuck came home with some white powder packaged in a prophylactic which he told me was heroin and that Pete had brought it back from Mexico and considered himself completely unsuspicious because he was a businessman and had never been in any trouble Chuck was to try and sell the stuff for Pete as Chuck had more contacts. I remember now that Chuck had picked the heroin up from Pete while he was staying at the motel on South Main near the Domed Stadium and I believe that it was the Rodeway Inn but I am not sure.… Then, Chuck told me that there was no place in Houston that he could find to sell the heroin and that he had gotten the name of a contact from Frank Dimaria so we went to K.C.

Things didn't go as planned in Kansas City, and instead of selling the heroin Harrelson got arrested and was forced to get rid of the heroin he intended to sell for Scamardo.

Attaway told the investigator that Harrelson now owed Scamardo.

> Sometime around June or July (1968) Chuck told me that he had to pay Pete Scamardo a favor owed him and that he and Jerry (Watkins) were going to fly to the Valley and kill a man for Pete so that he could collect some insurance on a business partnership on a policy they had on each other.

By the summer of 1968, Scamardo was facing financial difficulties, according to trial testimony at his trial, and since Harrelson now owed for the heroin he lost, Scamardo came up with a plan. He would pay Harrelson $2,000 to kill his business partner and best friend since they were in second grade, Sam Degelia Jr., because as business partners, according to Run, Brother, Run, he'd collect $100,000 in life insurance, "$50,000 that went directly to a bank to pay off their business loan, and $50,000 Scamardo would pocket by stiffing their other creditors. For his part, Harrelson would receive $2,000."

Berg continued later quoting Harrelson as saying that even he, a contract killer, thought that Scamardo was depraved. "Isn't it hell when your best friend kills you to collect the insurance?" said Harrelson to Jerry Watkins, who helped him kill Degelia Jr.

The murder of Sam Degelia Jr. didn't end the financial troubles of Scamardo so on September 13, 1968, Scamardo, along with his attorney Owen Stidham, went to the office of Bob Musser, a local polygraph expert. According to an Associated Press story published in Big Spring Herald (Texas) on March 6, 1970, Scamardo was visiting Musser's office because he was trying to borrow more money to clean up debts in his business and he couldn't get the loan.

The reason he couldn't get the loan was because Scamardo approached Sam Degelia Sr., the father of the man he'd just had murdered, and Degelia Sr., suspecting that Scamardo had had his son killed, refused to lend him any money until he was cleared of his son's murder.

If Scamardo thought that visiting Musser would clear his name, he would soon be in for a rude awakening. After a series of questions, Musser suspected that Scamardo was indeed the killer and Musser testified at Scamardo's trial, "I told him it sounded like he had a very good motive for having Degelia killed."

Musser continued in his testimony: "You're right," Musser recalled Scamardo saying, "I had Sam shot."

Scamardo's lawyer, Percy Foreman, attempted to keep this testimony out of the trial, arguing it was hearsay evidence, but the judge ultimately allowed it.

On December 7, 1968, Scamardo was arrested and charged with the murder of Sam Degelia. Watkins was arrested on the same day and Harrelson was already incarcerated in neighboring Brazoria County after being arrested for the murder of Allen Berg.

Curiously, both Scamardo and Harrelson retained Percy Foreman as their counsel. Foreman is considered among the greatest lawyers in the history of the USA. Foreman, in his career, lost only 50 out of more than 1,500 cases in which his client was charged with murder. His clients include James Earl Ray, the killer of Martin Luther King Jr., and the socialite Candy Mossler. In fact, Foreman has his own Wikipedia page in which Harrelson is singled out as one of his famous clients, but in 1968, Woody Harrelson wasn't yet famous, making Charles Harrelson a curious client for someone of Foreman's stature.

Whatever the reason, Foreman was worth every penny. In Harrelson's first trial, Foreman put on a nightclub singer who claimed that she had been with Harrelson at the time of the murder. The trial ended in a hung jury: 11 for conviction, one for acquittal.

In Run, Brother, Run, David Berg said that this particular stunt was standard operating procedure for Foremen, whose ethics trailed his effectiveness.

"Foreman's second step (the first being character assassination of the victim) was not just backup: it was bulletproof. In case character assassination alone might fail, he reached into his stable of 'reserve witnesses,' as he called them: former clients and others who repaid his favors by swearing to have been with his defendant at the time of the crime. It wasn't just opposing prosecutors who knew that Foreman operated this way: his colleagues and even attentive laymen understood that he would do anything, no matter how dishonest, to win at trial."

Foreman died in 1988 and obviously couldn't be interviewed for the book.

As a result, Scamardo was tried without the benefit of a conviction of Harrelson. The sensational trial included testimony by Musser and Attaway, who detailed the story of how Harrelson lost Scamardo's drugs and how this led Scamardo to manipulate Harrelson into killing Degelia Jr.

The trial was a true battle of the legal titans, with the defense putting on 26 witnesses and introducing 81 items into evidence and the prosecution calling 62 witnesses and introducing 80 items into evidence.

Though the Hidalgo County District Attorney, Oscar McInnis, asked for the death penalty for Scamardo, the jury only convicted him of being an accomplice to murder and sentenced him to seven years' probation and no jail time.

In the book, Run, Brother, Run, David Berg said this was tantamount to getting away with murder.

> As in the case in Brazoria County against Harrelson and DiMaria, Foreman represented the accused > murderer and the man who was alleged to have hired him in this case, Pete Scamardo, who did not remain alleged for long. On March 31, 1970, Hidalgo County veteran DA, Oscar McInnis, obtained a conviction against Scamardo for being an accomplice to murder—an astonishing victory for any prosecutor facing Foreman. But Foreman never stayed down for too long: during the punishment phase, Foreman introduced evidence of Scamardo's otherwise clean record and his devotion to church and family—and convinced the jury to probate every day of his seven-year sentence.

> Probation for murder! Thank you, Percy.

The idea that Scamardo had an "otherwise clean record" only meant he'd never been convicted of any other crimes. In fact, in a Texas Department of Public Safety report from August 30, 1968, Scamardo admitted to Texas Ranger, TH Dawson, that murder was only the most recent of his crimes.

"Deputy Sanchez and I went back to Hearne on Thursday, 8-15-1968, and contacted Scamardo at 8AM the next morning. He confessed to me that he and Sam Degelia Jr. had been involved in smuggling heroin from Mexico and that he could not afford to take a polygraph test."

Foreman, it should be noted, was also no angel. According to Run, Brother, Run, Foreman repeatedly got himself in legal trouble but defended himself to acquittals.

"Foreman himself has been charged with several crimes, from using foul language in the presence of a minor girl to subornation of perjury (knowingly putting on false testimony). Representing himself, he won them all, only burnishing his unbeatable image."

The author, David Berg, it should be noted, has been a long-time practicing attorney in the same area.

Harrelson was tried again in 1972 in Brownsville, Texas. Texas Ranger Tol Dawson, the lead investigator on the Degelia case, was in the courtroom with a perjury arrest warrant for the nightclub singer, but she had learned of it and fled to Aruba. Without the help of her testimony, Harrelson was found guilty and sentenced to 15 years in prison. With time off for good behavior, he was free in five years. He was found not guilty of the Berg murder.

At Harrelson's trial, Scamardo testified on behalf of Harrelson and claimed the $2,000 he'd paid Harrelson to collect on a series of bad debts in his business. In Run, Brother, Run, David Berg details how McInnis destroyed this narrative when he was able to cross-examine him.

"As a matter of fact, you didn't get any bad checks in your business to amount to anything, did you?"

"Yes sir, we got a number of checks that did not clear the bank."

"All right sir. Then can you give me a list of the people that he collected bad checks from you and Sam?"

"No sir, I cannot at this time."

"Well, can you name just one person that he ever collected a check for, for you or Sam?"

"I don't recall at this time, no sir."

"So out of forty-five checks over the past three years, you can't tell the jury just a name of one of those people so that we can get him down here and see whether or not this man collected a check from him?"

"I'm sure I could check and find out."

"Well, think about it a little right now. Can you give us one right now?"

"No sir, not that I can recall."

McInnis tried on a number of occasions to have Scamardo's parole recalled for perjury, including this particular exchange, and on one occasion a trial judge on January 14, 1974, had found that Scamardo perjured himself during his testimony at Harrelson's trial. Here's part of trial judge's findings:

> It then and there became and was a material issue before said Judge and jury in the trial of said judicial proceeding, whether about the middle of November, 1968, the brakes on the 1969 Oldsmobile belonging to Pete Thomas Scamardo went out while he was driving from the Scamardo Gin, near Caldwell, Texas, to Hearne, Texas, in company with Charles Harrelson in another car, and whether Pete Thomas Scamardo left his automobile parked in the parking lot on the same day at the Oldsmobile dealers in Hearne, Texas, to have said brakes repaired; and the said Pete Thomas Scamardo, did then and there, before said Judge and jury, upon the trial of said Cause, under the sanction of said oath administered to him as aforesaid, wilfully and deliberately state and testify that about the middle of November, 1968, the brakes on the 1969 Oldsmobile belonging to Pete Thomas Scamardo failed while en route from the Scamardo Gin, near Caldwell, Texas, while accompanied by Charles Harrelson, and that he, Pete Thomas Scamardo, parked said automobile on a parking lot at the Oldsmobile dealership in Hearne, Texas, so that the brakes could be repaired, which said statements were material to the issues in said cause and which said statements were deliberately and wilfully false, as he, the said Pete Thomas Scamardo, then and there knew when he so made the same; whereas in truth and in fact in November, 1968, at said time and place, Pete Thomas Scamardo had no trouble with his brakes, and in truth and in fact he did not leave his said automobile at the Oldsmobile dealership in Hearne, Texas, to have the brakes repaired.

The court explained that this statement amounted to perjury: "The Court finds that the statements alleged in the State's Petition to Revoke under Paragraph VII were made by the Probationer (Scamardo), that the same were false and constituted perjury, and that the same were material to the issues involved in the trial. The Court further finds that the foregoing is a violation of Condition 'a' of said Order placing the Defendant on probation, namely: the Defendant shall 'commit no offense against the laws of this State or of any other State or of the United States.'"

Once again, Scamardo escaped any punishment when the court found a technicality, claiming that while he did commit perjury, his perjured testimony wasn't material to the case. "The statements made by Probationer, to-wit, that he, Pete Thomas Scamardo, did not drive (the rented car) it to Houston, Texas, were false and perjurious. However, the Court finds that this statement was not material to the issues involved in the trial and otherwise the Court finds there is not sufficient evidence to warrant revocation of probation under paragraph four."

Despite being found guilty of committing perjury during another man's murder trial, he was NOT found to have violated his probation and again avoided any jail time.

Harrelson would go on to be convicted of the 1979 killing of Sam Wood, a federal judge, in 1981, and die in prison in 2007. The murder of Wood was the only murder of a federal judge in the twentieth century.

Hidalgo County has a long history of corruption, which includes the 1979 conviction of Oscar McInnis in his own kidnapping plot as well as the 1994 conviction of Hidalgo County Sheriff, Brig Marmolejo, for taking bribes from drug dealers.

In a December 1994 Texas Monthly story on Marmolejo's conviction, a lawyer in the area was quoted saying this: "There's more corruption in South Texas than Brig Marmolejo and Brig's not necessarily the most corrupt among them."

Meanwhile, Pete Scamardo moved with his family, including young daughter Dina, to Fairfax County in Virginia, where he reinvented himself as a fine upstanding citizen and real estate developer and investor. After the building of Tyson's Corner Center—a mega mall first built in 1968 in unincorporated Fairfax County between McLean and Vienna, Virginia, which boasts of having more visitors yearly than Disney World—extensions to the local highway, Virginia State Route 7, caused a real estate boom in the area. In 1988, both Tyson's Galleria, an upscale mall built across the street from Tyson's Corner Center, and Fairfax Square, an upscale mixed use development were built.

Scamardo was in a position to take advantage of the boom and became a multi-millionaire, possibly worth as much as $100 million.

He's been the subject of a number of profiles, including one in The Washington Post on August 23, 1999.

> Fifteen years ago, Pete T. Scamardo was shingling roofs and putting up aluminum siding in Northern Virginia. His small contracting company had two full-time employees.
> By the mid-1980s, his real estate interests were valued at more than $80 million, according to sources, and his enterprise, the Centennial Cos., was on its way to becoming one of the half-dozen largest commercial developers in the Washington metropolitan area.

That particular puff piece failed to mention anything about Scarmardo's role in the murder of Sam Degelia Jr.. Mackney reached out to The Washington Post on a number of occasions, asking that they run his story, but the paper declined. They had no on-the-record comment for me for this book. The author of the puff piece in The Washington Post is David Hilzenrath, and he currently works for the Project on Government Accountability, a watchdog group, and he also didn't respond to my email to explain himself.

Another article from the website Bis Now said Scamardo has developed "more than one million SF (square feet) of office condos in the region."

Bis Now didn't mention Scamardo's murder conviction and they didn't respond to my email for comment to explain the omission. The author of the article, Stacey Pfarr, also didn't respond to an email for comment. She is currently a realtor in Delaware.

The three realtors featured in the Bis Now story are Barbara Bechtle, Ellie Bechtle, and Ken Traenkle, who all work at Verity Commercial Real Estate in Reston, Virginia, and none responded to emails for comment on their business relationship with Scamardo.

Scamardo owns a home in McLean, Virginia, and a farm in Upperville, Virginia, one of the wealthiest cities in the country.

The charity Charity Works featured Scamardo's wife, Andrea, as one especially dedicated individual to charity in its August 2003 issue.

> Andy Scamardo is our "Steel Magnolia"—you wouldn't believe how tough and hardworking this quiet Texas lady can be. Her organizational skills, quiet charm and wonderful laugh are legendary and served her well in co-chairing the 2002 extravaganza. This was not a gala, but a huge production—everything had to be contracted for separately, and on the day of the Gala, had to arrive on time and in the proper sequence. At midnight, when the guests left, Andy rolled up her evening gown and coordinated removing all the equipment. At 3:30 in the morning, we found Andy, broom in hand, sweeping the National Building Museum to insure that was in perfect shape.
> Andy grew up on a cotton farm in Hearne, Texas. She attended the University of Texas and worked for IBM and Paine Webber. She met her future husband Pete in Austin and married him 39 years ago. Andy and Pete now split their time between their home in McLean and their Sunnyside Farm in Upperville (Virginia) where they raise horses and cattle. The Scamardos have two daughters. Stefani is married to Warren Haynes, and Dina who is married to Chris Mackney.

That charity also didn't respond to an email for comment for this book.

Warren Haynes is the former guitarist for the Allman Brothers Band and has played with the Grateful Dead. Stefani is a disk jockey for SiriusXM Radio, according to Haynes's Wikipedia page, as well as the manager of Haynes's current band, Govt. Mule. Stefani Scamardo didn't respond to an email for comment for this book.

Though Andrea Scamardo is presented as a fine upstanding citizen in the charity newsletter, a March 24, 1970, story from the Associated Press suggested she may have lied during testimony in her husband's trial.

> Sam Degelia Sr., the victim's father, was put on the stand to dispute testimony given Monday by Andrea Scamardo, the defendant's wife. Degelia testified that he did not have a brother named Ben Degelia.
> Mrs. Scamardo said that Harrelson, the alleged triggerman, was a cousin-in-law of the victim. She said this relationship existed because Glenda Watson, a niece of Harrelson, married Anthony Reina, a nephew of Ben Degelia.

All wasn't always good for Scamardo, and on May 10, 1991, he was featured in The Washington Times, and this time it was due to an $80 million lawsuit filed against him by the Virginia bank, Chevy Chase bank. That story, too, failed to mention the murder of Sam Degelia and Scamardo's role in it.

Since the 1970s, Scamardo has been a defendant or plaintiff in more than one hundred lawsuits just in Fairfax County, Virginia.

Chris Mackney also accused Scamardo of doing an end run around Virginia laws and using his daughter as a front in order to get a horse racing license in an email to Dr. Samenow.

"I wanted to bring to your attention the fact that my wife and her father were involved in a felony conspiracy, during the course of the marriage when Mr. Scamardo used his daughter to obtain a Virginia horse racing license."

I sent an email to Kimberley Mackey, the administrator for the Virginia Racing Commission, asking her if these charges are accurate, but that email was left unreturned. I also sent one of several emails to both Dina Mackney and Pete Scamardo asking them to confirm or deny these charges, but they also didn't respond to this and several other emails.

Mackney's claim about the horse racing license raises another question … how did Pete Scamardo, a convicted accomplice to murder, get a real estate license? I posed that question in an email to Amanda Pearson, the media relations person for the Virginia Department of Housing and Community Development, but she didn't respond to the email.

“Why did you stay?”: An IPV survivor’s story

John Ribner · 18 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

“If she was so crazy, why did you stay with her?”

I hear it all the time, especially now that the good folks at AVfM have encouraged me to share my story. In doing so, the question comes up, especially from those who might doubt that a woman is capable of the unfathomable acts of evil that I charge “Peaches,” my ex, of committing. “Come on!” they say. “If she was so bad, you had to have seen some signs of it early on.” I’d be lying to myself if I said she just flipped an imaginary toggle switch in her brain that made her go crazy after I married her. Truthfully, she raised many red flags along the way, but I willfully chose to ignore things such as:

- Strange men and women showing up at her house looking for her, all the while giving me dirty glances.
- Saying I was both “the love of her life” and the man who “ruined her life.”
- Locking herself in the bathroom and gulping down pills when I got my college acceptance letter.
- Her ex-boyfriend always obtaining our phone number, no matter how many times we moved.
- Long, drawn-out re-evaluations of our relationship, usually at 3:30 a.m. before the day of a mid-term or final exam.
- Her disappearing for days at a time, leaving our daughter and I at home without money or a vehicle.
- The verbal, emotional, and physical (yes, physical) abuse on a monthly basis.
- Using lies and manipulations to turn my friends and family against me.

So how could someone who comes from a good family end up with such a monstrous and destructive harpy? Well, I didn’t come from a “good family.”

I call my childhood home “Trauma Central” for a reason. The environment was rife with the same destructive, narcissistic patterns outlined in Nina W. Brown’s book Children of the Self-Absorbed. My parents’ constant need for attention and validation thrust me in the role of both providing that for them and being seen only as an extension of them. And when life threw them a curveball, it was me who bore the brunt of their frustrations. I was constantly told that I was “bad,” “stupid,” and “useless,” and I entered adulthood wearing this identity about me like cloak. At 43, I’m still paying the taxes on that “inheritance.”

In short, growing up this way made me easy pickings for Peaches.

In the beginning, she seemed perfect: smart, funny, and, above all, not shy when it came to physical affection. In short, she gave me the love and acceptance that had eluded me my entire life. Naturally, I jumped head-first into a relationship with her, making her my everything. And because I finally found what I believed to be a permanent source of my love/attention/validation drug, I didn’t dare question her on the many strange occurrences mentioned above. I also sat by helplessly as her bizarre and abusive behavior continued to escalate into all-out war in the married housing dorms. I wasn’t about to risk losing my “one and only” source of love, acceptance, and emotional/physical comfort … not after going without for so long. What if I couldn’t find someone else?

I also stayed because Peaches’s dysfunction felt … normal.

There have been many studies about why people stay in abusive relationships. Some psychologists say our want for the familiar causes us to recreate patterns we know are bad for us. Neuroscientists talk about brain chemistry and how we can become addicted to the chemical reactions produced by negative experiences, especially if that’s all we know. Personally, I think they’re both right: Peaches’s dysfunction was definitely familiar, and I can’t deny a certain addictive quality to the relationship despite its toxicity. And so I stayed, soldiering on as best I could under extreme duress.

Trauma Central played a more direct role in my staying as long as I did. One family member was delighted that my daughter was the first and only grandchild in the family, and this person lavished my child with time, money, and attention. This family member had a vested interest in Peaches and I staying together, so much so that it became easy for that person to believe Peaches's constant litany of abuse at my hands, my alleged alcoholism, and other loutish and chauvinistic behavior she suffered ever so valiantly. In short, this family member was as easily conned by Peaches as I had been, and it was made all the more easy because she already considered me a piece of shit anyway. Perhaps this is why this person refused to help me when I tried divorcing Peaches for the first time.

Eventually, I got off this crazy rollercoaster. After all the arguments, assaults, lies, bankruptcy, and threats, I caught Peaches in flagrante delicto with someone I thought was my friend. At great financial and emotional cost to myself, I left and filed for divorce, this time for good. By believing I deserved far better than what she was capable of giving, I was at least able to defy both Peaches and that part of Trauma Central that would do anything to keep me shackled to this abusive woman. It wasn't a perfect parting, however. Thirteen years later, I was forced to allow Peaches's new husband—the ex-boyfriend mentioned above—to adopt my daughter. It was the last mechanism of control she had over me, yet it was the strongest, and the brutal realities of that decision still haunt me to this day.

At the end of all this, I thought it would be hard to tell this chapter of my story. After all, who's truly willing to paint an unflattering but true picture of their former self? But after sharing it here on AVfM, I feel a sense of freedom; it's the kind that only comes from unburdening yourself of something you've carried for far too long. Now, what I find more difficult is trying to imagine someone asking me why didn't I leave Peaches sooner … especially if the one doing the asking is someone who ardently believes in the phenomenon of "battered woman's syndrome."

On privilege

Jack Barnes · 18 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For several weeks I have been watching some of the major and not-so-major feminist websites. One of these not-so-major websites is everydayfeminism.com. Don't let the name fool you. This website is not just a slime pit of hatred and bigotry towards men, it's a social justice warrior's wet dream. That's right, they spew hatred against whites, Christians, straight people, able-bodied people, cis-gendered people … basically anyone who falls on the wrong side of their checklist of privilege and oppression.

That's the same checklist they pull out of their ass and use to determine who is worthy of consideration and who deserves to be silenced and marginalized for the sake of equality. Don't ask me to explain it. I didn't go to college, therefore my brain is still intact, therefore I'm unable to explain "equality by discrimination." In the spirit of the mindfuck that is social justice dogma, I bring you "5 Simple Ways Men Can Respect Women" by Melissa A. Fabello .

Fabello begins her article with stereotypical feminist fervor.

"Come on, guys," we're collectively calling. "It's time to get your shit together."

I agree, men should start getting their shit together. AVfM is a good place to start.

"I get the impression that we're fed up with the microaggressions committed against us on the daily…."

Uh-oh. Some guy must have made himself comfortable while sitting on the subway by spreading his legs too far apart for her liking. Someone get this perfect example of the strong and empowered modern woman a fainting couch and a therapist. I don't know how she had the courage to get out of bed in the morning.

"Here are five simple things you should probably stop doing if you want to show that you have respect for women and actually see them as equals."

For the sake of brevity, we are going to discuss only three of them.

1. Stop Mansplaining.

Fabello starts off this section by recounting an occurrence on Facebook.

"Recently, a friend of mine who was fed up with having her life experiences invalidated by men posted an article on Facebook about the phenomenon of mansplaining."

Some poor guy with the nerve to have a different opinion than hers—and a belief that since he is a human being he might be able to add to what he believed was a discussion—had this to say:

"I really don't think this happens as often as you think it does."

Could it be possible that when a man offers his opinion he isn't belittling you but is just sharing ideas? Therefore, when a man disagrees with you, it isn't mansplaining. Maybe it's something that adults do on occasion called discussing. Fabello's reply is:

"You just did it."

Meaning that he just mansplained.

Fabello continues our education on mansplaining with the following example that I have paraphrased:

It's when a bunch of feminists are complaining about the wage gap and a man comes in and offers evidence in the form of studies that the wage gap doesn't exist.

She ends with:

"But have more faith in women, fellas. We're smart and articulate, too."

What did we learn from this section?

When a man has a different opinion than any woman, he shouldn't express his disagreement. To do so means that he doesn't respect her or consider her an equal.

If we want women to know that we respect them and see them as equals, we should refrain from calling them out when they are wrong.

To express an opinion that differs from a woman's means that we do not have faith in any woman's ability to articulate an issue and that we question all women's intelligence.

2. Stop Asking for Education.

"I'm an educator. Literally. That is my job title. And besides doing it for a living, I also do it as somewhat of a hobby—especially on the Internet."

Which does not mean you do it well.

"But when you show up in my notifications like 'Can you explain to me how cultural appropriation is racist?'… you're exercising your male entitlement."

So you are literally an educator who refuses to educate. Makes sense.

"I hate to break it to you, but women don't owe you—well—anything."

So now "educator" is synonymous with "woman"? Education: You're doing it wrong.

What have we learned from this section?

Don't ask any woman to explain herself; to do so means that you don't respect her or see her as an equal. Don't ask any woman to literally do what they literally claim as a job title and a hobby because patriarchy? Not sure what the logic behind this one is.

3. Stop Staying Silent.

Shut up! No, wait! Stop staying silent! Keep with me and I will show you where this goes.

In the next section, Fabello talks about an old boyfriend who failed to inform a co-worker that what said co-worker was saying made him uncomfortable.

"This guy would ask my then-partner at least weekly questions like 'What do you think of the new girl?' and, when female co-workers passed, 'Would you hit that?' … 'You should say something,' I would always answer. 'Just tell him that this makes you uncomfortable.'… If your friend says something screwed up, say something. Because he clearly needs to hear it, and he needs to hear it from you. I know that women are probably (hopefully) calling him out, but that's the nature of oppression my friend: A person in power (like a man) isn't as likely to listen to a person not-in-power (like a woman) as he would be to someone he perceives to be more "on his level" (like another man)."

What have we learned from this section? If someone says something that makes you personally uncomfortable, immediately demand that that person stop making you uncomfortable because you are allowed to demand to be in a state of perfect comfort at all times and if that makes the other person uncomfortable that's okay because that is how equality works. Am I the only one who has the urge to tell feminists that you're not supposed to drink the bong water?

Let's start with the basic premise of this article: Men are supposed to respect women. I wish someone, anyone, would give me one good reason why I should respect anyone simply based on an aspect of their biology? Okay, first off, everyone deserves basic human respect. This is to say that you treat others as human beings. You don't walk down the street and punch a total stranger simply because you feel like it. That's something the overwhelming majority of adults on this planet understand. However, anything beyond basic human respect must be earned through words and actions. You can't gain additional respect simply by being part of a preferred group in a society based on equality for all people.

While we do not live in a completely egalitarian society, we are getting there. However, feminists seem to want to take us backwards. In order to understand this, we must dig down to the basic fault in feminist logic, which is patriarchy theory. We can see an example of this fallacy in Fabello's article when she says, "… but that's the nature of oppression my friend: A person in power (like a man) isn't as likely to listen to a person not-in-power (like a woman) as he would be to someone he perceives to be more "on his level" (like another man)." She actually believes, despite objective reality, that women are oppressed by men. I remember reading about a time when men had to tip their hats to women and stand whenever a women entered or left a room. Hell, there are people in 2014 who still believe that men have no right to say something disrespectful to women.

This is the gender role that men have lived under for hundreds if not thousands of years. Yet Fabello believes that men have social power over women. How does she suppose we fix this mythical problem? By giving women social power over men? That's the social justice warrior mindset that I was talking about earlier. Equality through inequality. She wants to rewind the clock to a time when women were respected simply because they were born with the preferred plumbing. My thoughts on this are as follows: Congratulations, you have a vagina, a uterus, some breast tissue, and lots of estrogen. Do you want a cookie or something? Women are human beings, nothing more. If you want my respect, you'll have to earn it.

This whole "respect me because I'm a woman" is only the first verse to the equality through discrimination social justice warrior song. The next verse is worse than the first. Fabello doesn't just want women to have social power over men. Let's take a closer look at the lessons we learned from our mistress of pleasing women with favorable attitudes.

"Don't mansplain" means that whenever a woman says something that you disagree with, you keep your mouth shut and don't talk back by offering your opinion. In a society that views men and women as equals, it wouldn't matter whose mouth an idea came out of. The idea would stand or fall based on its own merit. That society would allow anyone to express a different opinion and allow others to call into question said opinion without the biology of the people involved in the discussion having any bearing on the validity of their opinions.

Of course, feminism, which is part of the social justice universe, espouses the belief that a person's biology should have a bearing on the validity of their opinion or even their right to speak at all. Feminists believe the myth that women's voices are or were silenced. So, to ensure equality, men's voices should now be silenced through the social pressure of shaming men who dare to express an opinion not shared by the woman he is conversing with by dismissing his words derisively and sneeringly as "mansplaining."

Men shouldn't ask for an education from a woman, even from a woman who says that her job and her hobby is literally to educate. Men are not to question women; instead, we are to do, think, and say what we are told. Don't ask a specific woman how she came to her conclusions. I want to know why I as a man should not do these things? We used to believe that people with dark skin had to respect people with white skin and enforced those beliefs socially and legally, often with the end of a rope. Blacks were not allowed to question whites. They were to bow and say "yes 'em" when told something. Is this Fabello's idea of equality? Is this what feminists and the social justice cult think is equality? In an egalitarian society, anyone who expresses an idea had better be ready to explain that idea to anyone, regardless of biology.

Men should voice their opinions and not be silent. Wait. What? Didn't she just tell us to keep our mouths shut? Oh. That's right. Only keep our mouths shut when women want us to, but be ready to be their puppet or mouthpiece when they want us to be. See how that works, guys? Don't express different opinions when those opinions dissent from feminism, but be ready to spew feminism from your mouth like your ass is plugged into Andrea Dworkin's tape recorder. Be ever ready to call out men who dare to say something a woman doesn't like. Be ever ready to call out your equals in the name of your superiors.

And that's where we end up. Can any reasonable, logical person believe, after reading Fabello's article, that either of these two groups—feminists or social justice warriors—are remotely interested in gender equality? The ideas expressed in her article can only lead to women being in the superior position in our society. There is no other way around it. This leaves us with only one question left to ask: Is this all a result of extreme stupidity, by design, or both?

Melissa, if you would like clarification on any of the ideas expressed in this article, please don't hesitate to ask. I'm not literally an educator, but I am more than willing to educate you.

Men, power, money, and sex: an interview with Warren Farrell.

Warren Farrell · 18 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following interview first appeared on Psychology Today on July 17, 2014. – PW
This interview is also available in Italian.

Marty Nemko: Warren Farrell is a leading expert on men's issues. He is the author of seven books and chair of the Commission to Create a White House Council on Boys and Men. He served on the board of the National Organization for Women (NOW) in New York City and is an advocate for both sexes having the full range of options, professionally and personally.

I interviewed him about gender roles, power, why men earn more, and campus rape.

Marty Nemko: You're most well-known for your book The Myth of Male Power, just out in a new e-book edition. Many people think men have the power: Look at the Senate and CEO rosters. How would you respond?

Warren Farrell: A small percentage of men have major institutional power but across the full population, real power is about having choices. The women's movement has made it socially acceptable for a mom to work full-time, stay home with the child full-time, or work part-time. That's as it should be. Alas, it's not as acceptable for a man to work part-time, let alone be a full-time parent. Mr. Mom is still a term of derision.

Marty Nemko: But men earn more. Isn't that power?

Warren Farrell: Many men still buy into a false definition of power: feeling obligated to earn money that someone else spends while we die sooner—5.2 years sooner. That's not power. That's being a prisoner of the need for love and approval.

Marty Nemko: In your book, Why Men Earn More, you report that the statistic that women earn 77 cents for each dollar a man earns for the same work is very misleading. Can you give an example as to why?

Warren Farrell: Women who have never been married and never had children earn 17% more than never-married men that have never had children, even when education and years worked are equal. Men don't earn more than women. Dads earn more than moms. Why? When a child is born, a mom is more likely to divide her labor between work and home, earning less at work. A dad is more likely to increase his hours at work—or work two jobs—often taking jobs he likes less that pay more.

Marty Nemko: In Why Men Earn More, you write, "The road to high pay is a toll road." Are you suggesting that high pay and power can be inversely correlated?

Warren Farrell: Yes. For many dads, the road to high pay is not about power; it's about his hope to make his children's life better than his. It's about giving his wife a better life. And to get that higher pay, he often has to forgo work he'd rather do. For example, he might prefer to be a teacher or a creative but to better support his family, he accepts a long-hours, high-stress, technical, travel-intensive, often soulless management position.

Marty Nemko: In your recent Reddit Highlighted Conversation, you cite statistics so startling that some would question their veracity. Would you provide the source for:

- This is the first time in U.S. history that our sons will have less education than their dads.
- Boys' suicide rate goes from equal to girls at age 9 to five times(!) girls' in their twenties.
- More U.S. male military were killed by suicide in one year than were killed in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan in all years combined.

Warren Farrell: Yes. Boys having less education than their dads is from the OECD (Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development), "Education at a Glance," 2010, Table A1.3a

The boy-girl suicide rate is from the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Morbidity and Mortality Weekly Report, 58,1, 2009, and Web-based Injury Statistics Query and Reporting System (WISQARS), 2010.

The U.S. military suicide rate data is from the DOD, uncovered by CBS, in Armen Keteyian, "Suicide Epidemic Among Veterans." CBS News, November 13, 2007

Marty Nemko: The subtitle of your book The Myth of Male Power is: Why Men are the Disposable Sex. How are men the disposable sex?

Warren Farrell: Virtually all societies that survived did so based on their ability to train their sons to be disposable—disposable in war, disposable at work.

Marty Nemko: That's a strong statement. What's your evidence?

Warren Farrell: The evidence is ubiquitous. 92 percent of workplace deaths occur to men, jobs few women would take: oil rig workers, long-haul truckers, roofers, coal miners. Yet there isn't the political will to create regulations that would afford them more protection for these workers. Meanwhile, when women have a less life-threatening deficit, for example, underrepresentation of women in engineering, there's massive expenditure to redress. Although male-only draft registration is a violation of both the 14th Amendment's equal-protection clause and the 5th Amendment's due process clause, it is so unconsciously accepted it isn't even questioned. Only men can serve in direct combat so 98 percent of Iraq and Afghanistan deaths were men.

Marty Nemko: Is the fact that men die 5.2 years younger than women another example of male disposability?

Warren Farrell: It is the combination of facts like men dying 5.2 years younger than women—or men dying sooner from all ten of the ten leading causes of death, plus the fact that we nevertheless have seven federal offices of women's health and none of men's health that together reflect the psychology of indifference toward male disposability. Similarly, men over the age of 85 commit suicide 1350 percent as frequently as women over 85. Virtually no one knows this. If women over 85 committed suicide 1350 percent as often than men, it would be used as the quintessential example of our undervaluing of women. We seem to care more about saving whales than saving males.

Marty Nemko: You said men are indirectly disposable as dads. How do you mean?

Warren Farrell: In a divorce, if the mother doesn't want the father to be equally involved, the apriori assumption is that she's right. Men have to fight in court for that right, and that's expensive.Unless he's rich, he's disposable.

Marty Nemko: What are your thoughts about the current focus on campus rape?

Warren Farrell: The issue first should be addressed before kids get to college. For example, we may need to encourage our daughters to take the initiative when they do want physical intimacy, not just to say when they don't. Our society strives for equality but few experts are asking women to share the responsibility for taking the initiative in sex, thereby risking rejection. During adolescence, women are the more mature sex. It's unfair to expect guys to assume 90 percent of the burden of sexual rejection.

Marty Nemko: What should happen at college?

Warren Farrell: First, make the law the last resort. The law is binary: guilty/not guilty. Sex is nuanced and more nonverbal than verbal. Those nuances have evolved over millennia. A slight change in eye contact means everything in a male-female encounter but would be laughed at in court. And if a grievance is filed, we should not presume guilt. Alas, some accusations are false.

Marty Nemko: What about workshops at college?

Warren Farrell: Yes but both sexes should be walking a mile in each other's moccasins.

Marty Nemko: You've done such trainings, right?

Warren Farrell: Yes. I used to tell college audiences, “Every woman is in a beauty contest every day of her life.” I then invited all the guys on stage to experience that. I had those guys wear bathing suits and had the women be the judges. The guys were stunned at being unseen for their integrity, intelligence, or values. They felt objectified.

Marty Nemko: What did you do to help the young women walk a mile in the guys’ moccasins?

Warren Farrell: I had the women “ask-out” the guys they were most attracted to on a 20-minute “date.” Some did what they criticize men for, for example, lying to get an attractive guy to go out with them. Others went after a less attractive guy to reduce the chance of getting rejected. The guys totally identified with that.

Marty Nemko: What was the outcome of those workshops?

Warren Farrell: Greater compassion for the other sex’s vulnerability, and I formed hundreds of men and women’s groups so they would continue to deepen their compassion after I left campus.

Marty Nemko: Was there any concrete evidence it reduced campus rape?

Warren Farrell: I asked campus sponsors to let me know if any of the workshop participants later were involved in a date rape accusation. Although I had worked with 20,000 students in hundreds of colleges, not one incident was reported.

Marty Nemko: Do you still do those workshops?

Warren Farrell: As political correctness set into the colleges’ psyches, college programs shifted to emphasizing only men understanding women. It would be wiser for programs to help both sexes better understand each other. We don’t need a women’s movement blaming men, nor a men’s movement blaming women. We need a gender liberation movement. We need both sexes walking a mile in each other’s moccasins.

H.O.E. vs. Ex-Wife: Redonkulas does some crass math

Redonkulas.com is crass, rude, boorish, insensitive, and just downright nasty people. If you find them funny, you are a very bad person. Like us.

Hard to beat that math though, isn't it?

Monica Hesse of The Washington Post: Anatomy of a hatchet job

Robert Franklin · 20 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The media fallout from the International Conference on Men's Issues has been pretty well dealt with on A Voice for Men. The usual nonsense from Salon, Time, Jessica Roy, MSNBC, Adam Serwer, Alex Wagner, and the like have been duly skewered for their all-too-predictable dishonesty—and their obvious fear of a rising men's issues movement that challenges their prejudices and their unquestioning acceptance of the dominant cultural narrative. But there's at least one more to discuss: Monica Hesse's article on the conference that appeared in The Washington Post.

If you want to write a hatchet job on anyone, Hesse's article would make a good template. Her first mission was to attack the people at the conference, which means depicting them as shallow, angry, hypersensitive, self-involved losers. Having established, in her readers' minds, the debased nature of conference speakers and attendees, the rest was simple. The actual issues could be caricatured because who would be interested in the concerns of deadbeats with the emotional maturity of children? The balance consisted of verbal swipes at one person or another, one issue or another, ever so slightly leavened with—and this is important to any hatchet job—a few kind words.

So she began her article thus:

> The feminists hadn't shown up yet, but they could, at any moment, with their protest signs and screaming.

See what I mean? Presumably we were all cowering in fear at the prospect of a few feminists showing up with signs. By itself that might not have convinced anyone, but Hesse was careful to add to her portrait of men's issues advocates as frightened, paranoid little boys. Hesse also failed to mention that these things had happened before and that what looked like reliable sources had indicated such protests and worse were threatened this time as well. Mention of any of this could easily be omitted–and so she did. Instead, in her next couple of paragraphs she referred to attendees' perception of the world as a "dangerous place" for men and men being "under threat of attack." She called the tone of the conference one of "paranoia and anger." She called the MRAs there "misfit boys and damaged men." If that didn't convince readers what creeps these men's issues advocates are, nothing would.

Having laid the prejudicial groundwork, Hesse was free to marginalize the issues. Issues that took the speakers two days to elucidate, Hesse skipped through like tiptoeing through the tulips. My own presentation merited six words. Senator Ann Cools got none, and Mike Buchanan only a single clause. Warren Farrell's speech was presented to Post readers as an 18-word quotation.

Indeed, rather than engage with any of the issues, on which speakers talked in such depth and detail, Hesse for the most part ignored them altogether. Instead, her article reflects mostly interviews with usually anonymous attendees, i.e., another tactic of the hatchet job. That anonymity means we can't compare her quotations with a factual record. So, unlike the speakers, whose presentations appear on YouTube and elsewhere, we have to take Hesse's word for it that they said what she claims.

It's a curious way to cover a conference. After all, you'd think readers might want to know what the issues are, how they're viewed, and why. But Hesse carefully avoided that, the better to control the message she was offering Washington Post readers.

But she wasn't comfortable with simply mischaracterizing speakers and attendees or limiting readers' information on the issues. Hesse went on to feed her readers a diet of falsehoods and misleading claims. For example, she claimed that no one at the conference mentioned that custodial mothers are more likely to live in poverty than are custodial fathers, but I, in fact, devoted a significant portion of my presentation to exactly that.

Likewise, she wrote, "A Voice for Men said the hotel was issued death threats by feminists for agreeing to hold the conference…." In fact, it was the hotel management that said that on hotel stationery. She wrote that Paul Elam's writings have been referred to as “hate speech” but declined to say by whom, preferring to let readers conclude that her reference in the next clause to the Southern Poverty Law Center meant it was the SPLC that had done so. It never has, and SPLC’s researcher on the men’s movement has stated flatly that AVfM is not a hate group, but Hesse didn’t let her readers know this.

She used the same tactic in describing Paul’s years-old “Bash a Violent Bitch” piece, writing, “He says he was being satirical.” That, of course, was Hesse’s way of suggesting to her readers that Paul wrote a piece championing male violence against women and then cravenly backtracked, claiming it to be satire. No Washington Post reader will know from Hesse’s piece that Paul originally labelled the article satire or that the Jezebel piece he satirized explicitly lauded female domestic violence against males. And they’ll never know Hesse’s astonishing hypocrisy of criticizing Paul’s satirical piece that’s anti-violence while shielding the feminist article that unapologetically applauded women’s violence against men.

I mentioned that Hesse failed to engage with the issues. Often that’s the case when an opponent of those issues doesn’t have a valid counter-argument to make, which I suspect is the case with Monica Hesse. That impression is reinforced by the few times she did try to engage with the issues. Her efforts were so weak and poorly thought out that it’s no surprise that she didn’t do more of it.

The said “engagement” invariably came in a “yes, but” format. So, when her unnamed interlocutors mentioned being financially ravaged by ex-wives in divorce proceedings, Hesse’s “but” was her false claim that no one mentioned the greater rates of custodial-mother poverty. Of course I had done exactly that, and other presenters at the conference have mentioned it many times in their careers.

More importantly, since non-custodial mothers are far less likely to be ordered to pay child support, are ordered to pay less than are fathers, and pay less of what they owe, their poverty rates can’t be ascribed to divorce courts but to their own behavior. Women generally work less at paid employment than do men and tend to work at lower-paying jobs. In short, the things that explain the wage gap generally also explain the wage gap between custodial mothers and fathers. Needless to say, Hesse mentioned none of that.

> Presenters used historical laws as “proof” that women have always had special privileges — access to their husband’s bank accounts, for example — but didn’t mention that during the aforementioned time period, women didn’t legally have the right to vote.

Did Hesse notice that her example of female “oppression” is also an example of female privilege? Women didn’t have the right to vote in part for one of the primary reasons it was granted to men by the 15th Amendment in 1870. Men are subject to military conscription and slaughter on the battlefield and their voting rights have been explicitly connected to that. (Indeed, they still are to a large extent.) Women’s first privilege came in having no duty of military service, which helps explain their lack of voting rights. Their second came in 1920 when they got the right to vote without the obligation to lay down their lives. It’s not apparent that Hesse knows any of this.

> Participants lambasted the media for deliberately ignoring the high percentage of male rape victims — 38 percent — and also lambasted Slate journalist Hanna Rosin for writing a “misandric” book about the “end of men” — but didn’t note that Rosin recently wrote a lengthy article about the high percentage of male rape victims.

From where I sit, Rosin’s work is among the worst of the contemporary feminist natterers. As a matter of course, her work is misandric and dishonest, sometimes laughably so. But, irrespective of what one thinks of Rosin, according to Hesse, since she wrote a single piece about male rape victims, all else should be forgiven and forgotten. Of course, Paul Elam isn’t entitled to the same consideration from her for some reason. According to Monica Hesse’s thinking, one good turn makes up for a thousand malicious ones, at least when the person is a feminist.

At almost every turn, Hesse opted for the belittling and the denigrating over the respectful. So every speaker she quoted except Farrell had his/her words taken out of context in order to represent them in a negative light. Almost every detail of the conference, its attendees, and its venue was selected for its negative qualities. No person mentioned escaped some form of censure, either blatant or sneaky. Commonly accepted terms such as parental alienation were placed in quotation marks to suggest inauthenticity. Humor was presented as serious. Men's real pain was belittled. (See the coda below.)

Women? There are a great many highly qualified and dedicated women among men's issues advocates. But Washington Post readers don't know that because, with the exception of mentioning that five of the 15 speakers were women and briefly quoting two speakers, Hesse all but totally overlooked the female attendees. She neither interviewed them, counted them, nor mentioned their presence. It's that feminist thing of silencing women who fail to agree with feminism.

In short, Hesse's piece is standard agitprop and a pretty good "how-to" manual for a hatchet job. It paints supporters of men's issues as deadbeats and losers who are so balled up in their own little problems that they can't see how women suffer and wouldn't care if they could. The many legitimate issues raised at the conference were either ignored, misrepresented, or "answered" with arguments that don't stand up to a moment's scrutiny.

So I called Hesse. I was pleasantly surprised at her willingness to talk, and found her defensive but far from the shrieking monster we see so often on feminist websites. We spoke for 40 minutes, and she invariably answered my questions and tried to give context to what she was doing and why.

That said, her defense of her article was hardly persuasive. But her reason for not engaging with the issues was fair enough: she writes for the "Lifestyle" section and her assignment was to give readers "the experience" of being at the conference, not its content. Plus, she didn't have unlimited space in which to write, so she couldn't deal in-depth with the issues and said that to favor one issue at the expense of the others wouldn't give readers a fair idea of what went on. That, of course, doesn't explain her abortive efforts to engage with the issues she chose, but was fair as far as it went.

Her efforts went downhill from there. What was her basis for calling the conference "an island of misfit boys and damaged men?" Well, she thought some of the men there had been damaged by some of life's experiences, which is undeniably true. And "island of misfit boys" is a play on words. Just how that justifies using it to describe adult men and women, she didn't explain. But referring to people such as Warren Farrell, Tom Golden, Mike Buchanan, Carnell Smith, much less Erin Pizzey, Karen Straughan, Barbara Kay, et al. that way is both inaccurate and, of course, intentionally belittling. Did she consider the phrase denigrating? She did not.

Hesse described the conference as a "wounded echo chamber of nebulous statistics." Which statistics did she consider "nebulous?" She couldn't say; she didn't have her notes, but again they were ones cited not by speakers but by her unnamed interviewees.

She wrote that some issues were "not unsympathetic," but that when conference-goers spoke about them, "they sound like they could be feminists." So, I wondered, which feminist organizations was she referring to. Oh, she wasn't talking about feminist organizations, just feminists. Who? She thought for a bit and then cited Sheryl Sandberg, but no one else. Could she think of any feminist or feminist organization that is active on behalf of men's issues? She couldn't. When I pointed out that feminism's unbroken tradition of opposing any and all legislation to improve fathers' rights tends to contradict her claim, she responded, "I'm not going to debate that."

> Elam online is an uncaged coil of rage, whose violent diatribes have been categorized as hate speech, earning his site a mention in a 2012 Southern Poverty Law Center intelligence report about misogynistic sites.

Could she understand how many people would conclude from that statement that it was the SPLC that had characterized Elam's words as "hate speech." She said it wasn't her intention, but only claimed that others have used the term. Which others? She refused to say.

Her article claimed that no one had mentioned the higher rates of poverty for custodial mothers than custodial fathers. When I pointed out that I had done just that more than once, she said she must have been out of the room.

When I pointed out that her description of Paul's "Bash a Violent Bitch" misleads readers, she said she thought his piece was "poorly done satire." When I wondered why she would take aim at a piece that was plainly satire while giving a pass to the Jezebel article that frankly applauded female violence against males, Hesse said, "That could be a fair point," but that she would "have to think about that."

Did she find her article to be a fair and balanced description of the conference and the people there? She did. According to her, mine was the only negative feedback she received, and the conference attendees who emailed her said they thought she'd been fair. Comments to the piece show an altogether different analysis, but we didn't get into that.

On the telephone, Hesse claimed speakers at the conference cherry-picked our statistics, so I asked her to give examples. She criticized Senator Cools's presentation but offered no examples of cherry-picked statistics.

She complained that the conference was one-sided, that it failed to provide context for the many problems besetting men and boys. By that she meant feminist context, so I asked her if she believed that feminists have applied her rule to themselves, i.e., always given the male, or non-feminist, point of view. Her response? "I think they do more and more," but offered no specifics and claimed to know nothing of feminism "in the 60s and 70s" because "I wasn't even born then."

Overall, Monica Hesse on the telephone failed to live up to the stereotype of the misandric feminist. She came across as neither doctrinaire nor steeped in the sort of absurd notions about men and women we so often get from run-of-the-mill anti-reality feminists. She seemed genuine; she seemed sincere. She didn't think she'd done a hatchet job on individuals, a conference, or a movement.

How is that possible? Of course she may have just been putting up a front, but I don't think so. How can her beliefs about her piece possibly square with the fact that, by any rational standard, it's a hatchet job, a shallow, close-to-defamatory exercise in promoting the perception of men's issues and their advocates as undeserving of respect?

My conclusion is that she's probably absorbed gender feminist narratives for so long that she truly thinks they're the norm, that a different construction of reality is, intellectually, an alien species. I believe she's so imbued with misandric culture that using phrases such as "misfit boys and damaged men" to describe her superiors (Cools, Golden, Farrell, Smith, Pizzey, et. al.) both in intellect and in achievement truly doesn't seem strange to her. I think her all but invariable marginalizing of men, the conference, and the movement is simply routine for her; she's seen it so often she doesn't recognize it for what it is. Like a hoarder whose house fills up with junk, she no longer recognizes the junk concepts that fill her mind, crowding out everything else.

In short, I conclude that Hesse believes herself to exemplify NAFALT. She's one of those feminists we're supposed to respect for their sincerity and their thoughtfulness, both of which terms truly describe the Monica Hesse with whom I spoke. She's one of those feminists who is in fact sincerely and thoughtfully blind to their own misandry and knee-jerk resistance to non-feminist/anti-feminist notions. She's a person who can say, and honestly believe, that she requires "the other side" to be given a fair hearing while identifying with a movement that's always done the opposite. For her, feminism is a prison beyond whose walls she can't see and whose yard she believes to be the whole world.

Such, at any rate, is my take on her.

And so, in an attempt to jar her out of her feminist complacency, I made it clear how her article comes across. I explained to her that I try to be fact-based and logical, that I'm not a hot head who jumps to conclusions, that I take people and their work as they come. I told her that I was astonished that she views her piece as fair. I told her I regarded it as very poor and a classic example of disinformation. I said,

> I would tell you that, from the very first sentence on through, almost without exception, your aim is to > denigrate the people and the issues.

She responded by saying that she'd spoken with men there who made statements "of really horrifying misogyny" but didn't quote them in the article "because I didn't think they were representative of the larger group."

To which I said, in essence, "The fact your piece could have been worse doesn't mean it was good enough."

I don't think she took my criticism well, but possibly she didn't reject it outright.

Coda

One of the speakers at the conference was Terrence Popp, an Army veteran of two tours of duty overseas. His topic was the many family court issues facing mostly male veterans returning from overseas deployments. Here's how Hesse could have accurately and respectfully described him and his presentation.

> Army veteran and recipient of two Purple Hearts, Sergeant Terrence Popp illustrated his presentation with a deeply moving multiple award-winning short film about veterans' harsh treatment by family courts that drives many to suicide. Popp then revealed that this film was a re-enactment of his own planned suicide, which he had only aborted when four days before he was to kill himself, one of his close friends and comrades in the military killed himself first. Popp is part of an organization, SecondClassCitizen.org, that tracks divorce among veterans. It finds that 90% of vets get divorced within five years of returning to this country and most lose their children, based on thousands of interviews of these veterans. Due to military regulations prohibiting individuals speaking on behalf of the Army, Popp emphasized that his remarks were his and not the Army's.

But here is what Hesse actually wrote:

> "One presenter, a military veteran speaking on the treatment of veterans returning from war, put up a PowerPoint slide alleging that 70 percent of men returning from war get divorced, and 90 percent do so within five years. When asked about the source of this statistic, he said, "That particular statistic is from my personal observations. I'm just speaking here as a dude."
> One dude speaking to a roomful of like-minded dudes, who reinforce rather than challenge one another's world views."

See what I mean about what non-ideological reporting would look like, and what asking questions of presenters would look like, versus what Monica Hesse did?

Oh by the way, one final note: Terrence Popp did not use PowerPoint for anything. One can only conclude that Monica Hesse of The Washington Post either didn't watch the video or she watched it and it made so little impression upon her she could only remember it as a nonexistent PowerPoint slide. We contacted Popp before running this piece on The Washington Post's hatchet job, and he affirmed that not only did Monica Hesse ask him no questions, either during or after the conference, but neither has any other member of the press contacted him about his presentation or his statistics—other than A Voice for Men and The Honey Badger Brigade.

May we politely suggest that someone at The Washington Post, or any other of our once-great press organs, do a little more investigation on this issue? Or any of the other issues covered at the conference? It might be a start on redemption from hatchet jobs like this.

readers, you can register (hopefully civil) complaints to ombudsman@washpost.com. —DE

“Romantic Love” by Lester F. Ward (1903)

Peter Wright · 21 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following essay is from the book Pure Sociology, by Lester F. Ward. Written over a century ago, the author makes a case for where and when romantic love (a.k.a. gynocentrism) arose. —PW

Romantic Love

It is the psycho-physiological progress going on in all races that have undergone repeated and compound social assimilation, that has laid the foundation for the appearance (in the most advanced races) of a derivative form of natural love which is known as romantic love. It is a comparatively modern product, and is not universal among highly assimilated races. In fact, I am convinced that it is practically confined to what is generally understood as the Aryan race, or, at most, to the so-called Europeans, whether actually in Europe or whether in Australia, America, India, or any other part of the globe. Further, it did not appear in a perceptible form even in that ethnic stock until some time during the Middle Ages. Although I have held this opinion much longer, I first expressed it in 1896.[1] It is curious that since that time two books have appeared devoted in whole or in part to sustaining this view.[2] There is certainly no sign of the derivative sentiment among savages. Monteiro, speaking of the polygamous peoples of Western Africa, says: –

> The negro knows not love, affection, or jealousy. … In all the long years I have been in Africa I have never seen a negro manifest the least tenderness for or to a negress. … I have never seen a negro put his arm round a woman’s waist, or give or receive any caress whatever that would indicate the slightest loving regard or affection on either side. They have no words or expressions in their language indicative of affection or love.[3]

Lichtenstein[4] says of the Koossas: “To the feeling of a chaste tender passion, founded on reciprocal esteem, and an union of heart and sentiment, they seem entire strangers.“ Eyre reports the same general condition of things among the natives of Australia,[5] and it would not be difficult to find statements to the same effect relative to savage and barbaric races in all countries where they have been made the subject of critical study. Certainly all the romances of such races that have been written do but reflect the sentiments of their writers, and are worthless from any scientific point of view. This is probably also the case for stories whose plot is laid in Asia, even in India, and the Chinese and Japanese seem to have none of the romantic ideas of the West; otherwise female virtue would not be a relative term, as it is in those countries. This much will probably be admitted by all who understand what I mean by romantic love.

The point of dispute is therefore apparently narrowed down to the question whether the Ancient Greeks and Romans had developed this sentiment. I would maintain the negative of this question. If I have read my Homer, Æschylus, Virgil, and Horace to any purpose they do not reveal the existence in Ancient Greece and Rome of the sentiment of romantic love. If it be said that they contain the rudiments of it and foreshadow it to some extent I shall not dispute this, but natural love everywhere does this, and that is therefore not the question. The only place where one finds clear indications of the sentiment is in such books as “Quo Vadis,” which cannot free themselves from such anachronisms. I would therefore adhere to the statement made in 1896, when I said, “Brilliant as were the intellectual achievements of the Greeks and Romans, and refined as were many of their moral and esthetic perceptions, nothing in their literature conclusively proves that love with them meant more than the natural demands of the sexual instinct under the control of strong character and high intelligence. The romantic element of man’s nature had not yet been developed.”

The Greeks, of course, distinguished several kinds of love, and by different words (έρως, άγάπη, Φιλία), but only one of these is sexual at all. For έρως they often used ‘ΑΦροδίτη. They also expressed certain degrees and qualities in these by adjectives, e.g., πάνδημος. Some modern writers place the adjective ούράνιος over against πάνδημος, as indicating that they recognized a sublimated, heavenly, or spiritual form of sexual love, but I have not found this in classic Greek. Neither do I find any other to the Latin Venus vulgivaga. But whether such softened expressions are really to be found in classic Greek and Latin authors or not, the fact that they are so rare sufficiently indicates that the conceptions they convey could not have been current in the Greek and Roman mind, and must have been confined to a few rare natures. Romantic love is therefore not only confined to the historic races, those mentioned in Chapter III as representing the accumulated energies of all the past and the highest human achievement, but it is limited to the last nine or ten centuries of the history of those races.

It began to manifest itself some time in the eleventh century of the Christian era, and was closely connected with the origin of chivalry under the feudal system. Guizot has given us perhaps the best presentation of that institution,[6] and from this it is easy to see how the conditions favored its development. In the first place the constant and prolonged absenteeism of the lords and knights, often with most of their retainers, from the castle left the women practically in charge of affairs and conferred upon them a power and dignity never before possessed. In the second place the separation of most of the men for such long periods, coupled with the sense of honor that their knighthood and military career gave rise to, caused them to assume the rôle of applicants for the favor of the women, which they could not always immediately attain as when women were forcibly seized by any one that chanced to find them. These conditions produced a mutual sense on the part of both sexes of the need of each other, coupled with prolonged deprivation on the part of both of that satisfaction. The men, thus seeking the women, naturally became chivalrous toward them. The solitary life of women of high rank made them somewhat a prey to the lusts of men of low degree, and the knights assumed the rôle of protecting them from all dangers. Moral and Christian sentiments also played a part, and we find among the provisions of the oath that every chevalier must make the following solemn vows:

- To maintain the just rights of the weak, as of widows, orphans, and young women.
- If called upon to conduct a lady or a girl to any place, to wait upon her, to protect her, and to save her from all danger and every offense, or perish in the attempt.
- Never to do violence to ladies or young women, even though won by their arms, without their will and consent.

Such an oath, made a universal point of honor, any breach of which would be an everlasting disgrace, and be punished severely by the order of knighthood to which they belonged, could not fail to produce a powerful civilizing effect upon the semi-barbaric men of that age. The whole proceeding must have also given to women a far greater independence and higher standing than they had ever before enjoyed since the days of gynæcocracy in the protosocial stage. Out of this condition of things there arose a special class of poets who wrote lyrics wholly different from the erotic songs of antiquity that go by that name. These poets were called troubadours, and some of them wandered from place to place singing the praises of the great court ladies, and still further inflaming the new passion, which was relatively pure, and contented itself with an association of men with women while conserving the honor and virtue of the latter. This, of course, was a passing phase and somewhat local, being mainly confined to southern France and parts of Spain. It degenerated, as did the whole institution of chivalry, and by the end of the thirteenth century nothing was left of either but the ridiculous nonsense that Cervantes found surviving into his time, and which he so happily portrayed in Don Quixote. But chivalry had left its impress upon the world, and while Condorcet and Comte exaggerated certain aspects of it, no one has pointed out its greatest service in grafting romantic love upon natural love, which until then had been supreme.

But it would be easy to ascribe too great a rôle, even here, to chivalry. The truth is not all told until chivalry is understood as an effect as well as a cause. Whatever may be said of the Middle Ages as tending to suppress the natural flow of intellectual activities, there can be no doubt that they were highly favorable to the development of emotional life. The intense religious fervor that burned in its cloisters for so many centuries served to create centers of feeling, and to increase the sensibility of all those nerve plexuses that constitute the true organs of emotion. Whatever may be the physiological changes necessary to intensify the inner feelings, corresponding to the multiplication and diversification of the neurons of the brain by which the intellect is perfected, such changes went on, until the men and women of the eleventh century found themselves endowed with far higher moral organizations than those of the ancient Greeks and Romans. They had been all this time using their emotional faculties as they never had been used before, and the Lamarckian principle of increase through use is as true of those faculties as it is of external muscles and organs. It is true of the brain, too, and when educationalists wake up to this truth the only solid basis for scientific education will have been discovered. But without a preparation in this latent growth of the emotional faculties neither chivalry nor romantic love could have made its appearance. The crusades, contemporary to a great extent with chivalry, and due also to the surplus emotion, taking here a religious course, became also a joint cause in the development not only of romantic love but also of many other lofty attributes, both ethical and intellectual. They failed to save the holy city, but they gained a far greater victory than that would have been in rationalizing, moralizing, and socializing Europe. Any one who thinks they were a failure has only to read Guizot's masterly summing up of their influence.[7]

Romantic love was due primarily to the greater equality and independence of woman. She reacquired to some extent her long-lost power of selection, and began to apply to men certain tests of fitness. Romantic love therefore marks the first step toward the resumption by woman of her natural scepter which she yielded to the superior physical force of man at the beginning of the androcratic period. It involves a certain degree of female selection or gyneclexis, and no longer permitted man to seize but compelled him to sue. But it went much farther than this. It did not complete a cycle and restore female selection as it exists in the animal world. It also did away with the pure male selection that prevailed throughout the androcratic régime. The great physiological superiority of the new régime cannot be too strongly emphasized. Its value to the race is incalculable. Female selection, or gyneclexis, as we saw, created a fantastic and extravagant male efflorescence. Male selection, or andreclexis, produced a female etiolation, diminutive stature, beauty without utility. Both these unnatural effects were due to lack of mutuality. Romantic love is mutual. The selection is done simultaneously by man and woman. It may be called ampheclexis. Its most striking characteristic consists in the phenomenon called "falling in love." It is not commonly supposed that this so-called "tender passion" is capable of cold scientific analysis. It is treated as something trivial, and any allusion to it creates a smile. Yet libraries are filled with books devoted exclusively to it, and these are as eagerly devoured by philosophers and sages as by schoolgirls.

In the early days and in the upper classes the demands of woman may have been somewhat trivial. Man must do something heroic, must prove his worthiness by acts of prowess, and such acts may even be opposed to true progress. But they at least develop manhood, courage, honor, and under the code of chivalry they must have a moral element, must defend the right, protect the weak, avenge dishonor, and uphold virtue. But in the lower ranks even then, and everywhere since the fall of the feudal system, woman demanded support and the comforts of life, luxuries where possible, and more and more leisure and accomplishment. To-day she demands a home, social position, ease, and economic freedom. More and more, too, she requires of men that they possess industry, thrift, virtue, honesty, and intelligence. Man must work for all this, and this struggle for excellence, as woman understands that quality, is an extraordinary stimulus, and leads to all forms of achievement.

But man also selects. Romantic love is mutual. Woman has as much to lose as man if it results in failure. And man sets ideals before woman. She must be worthy of him and she gently and to understand is most grateful to him. Thus she develops herself in the direction of his ideals and both are elevated. She may also to some extent transform the environment, if it be no more than the inner circle of the family. The combined effect, even in an individual case, is considerable, and when we remember that in any given community, town, city, state, or country, the majority of men and women pass at least once, sometimes twice or several times, through the phase of life known as being in love, waiting and working for the longed-for day when they are to possess each other, struggling to prepare themselves for each other and for that happy event, we can readily believe that such a stimulus must work great social results. The history of the world is full of great examples, but the volume of achievement thus wrought is made up of thousands, nay, millions of small increments in all lands and all shades and grades of life, building ever higher and broader the coral reef of civilization.

[1896] Brilliant as were the intellectual achievements of the Greeks and Romans, and refined as were many of their moral and æsthetic perceptions, nothing in their literature conclusively proves that love with them meant more than the natural demands of the sexual instinct under the control of strong character and high intelligence. The romantic element of man's nature had not yet been developed. This constitutes a distinctly modern need. It is rooted in the lower passion and has grown out of it, but it is distinguished from it by the fact that the presence alone of the object is its satisfaction. This step is an exceedingly long one, and was gradually taken during the Middle Ages, assuming its developed proportions under the knights-errant and the troubadours from the eleventh to the thirteenth century. To-day it prevails throughout Europe, America, and other countries that have been settled by Europeans, and nowhere else. It has completely revolutionized the social life of these peoples and has purified their literature. This is why the older literature requires to be expurgated before it is fit for modern ears. It was too erotic. Modern literature, although it deals with love to a far greater extent than ancient, is chaste, because love means something entirely different from what it formerly meant.

Dr. Tara Palmatier: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 21 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: We will be presenting the complete transcripts of all the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014 presentations here on AVfM in the following weeks. We have already published the first two here and here. Here is the third presentation from the first official day, June 27th: that of Dr. Tara Palmatier, who devotes her entire practice to helping those in abusive relationships with women.

As a special note, this particular presentation was grossly distorted and outright lied about by reporters from both MSNBC and Time magazine, who were apparently working in collusion on a hit piece together to attack Dr. Tara Palmatier and other speakers, male and female, who had the audacity to challenge their worldviews.

As always, our special thanks to Rick Westlake for the transcript. —DE

Okay … Hi! I'm Dr. Tara Palmatier, founder and publisher of Shrink4Men.com. It's a resource for men who are in relationships with abusive women, and it's also a resource for the friends and families of men who are in relationships with abusive women. Can everyone see that okay? Do we need to dim the lights up here a little? … Okay.

Before I get started, I would first like to say thank you to whoever it was that scheduled me to follow the legendary Erin Pizzey and Senator Cools: thanks! No pressure, no pressure at all. (Laughter from audience.) Second, I would like to point out that I am the third presenter to speak at the First Annual International Men's Human Rights Conference, and that would be the third WOMAN presenter. (Applause.)

My, aren't we an interesting group of misogynists? (Laughter.) I hate to tell you guys, but I think we might be doing it wrong.

Okay, the topic of my presentation is "Equitable Relationships in the Age of Female Entitlement: An Oxymoron."

We'll start by looking at the old social contract between men and women versus the new social contract, the rise of female entitlement and narcissism, the vilification of men and boys and the lionization of women and girls, and finally helping men and boys adapt to the new contract.

[image]

For centuries, men and women abided by a social contract. Men financially supported and protected their wives and children; women took care of the children, cooked, and cared for the home. Before modern technology, women's work was often brutally hard, even compared to what men did outside the home.

Over the last 40 or 50 years, feminism has helped blow up the old contract. Some of these changes were necessary and right. Men and women should be treated as equals. Women who possess similar abilities and intellect should be afforded the same opportunities as men. Men and women should be treated equally under the law. Neither men nor women should be pigeonholed by traditional gender stereotypes.

This is not the reality of the new social contract, however. The new social contract, much like the modern marital contract, is incredibly advantageous for women and increasingly onerous and dangerous for men. Feminism has devolved from defining itself as "the radical notion that women are people" to "the radical notion that women are superior."

Feminism is no longer about equality; it is about female superiority. You do not advance the rights of one group by trampling the rights and humanity of another.

[image]

Women have moved beyond equality and empowerment to entitlement, special privileges, and special protections under the law.

In fact, I'd wager that female entitlement is the new female empowerment.

[image]

Women have the same rights and privileges as men, without any of the responsibility or accountability. Meanwhile, men have an ever-growing number of responsibilities and constraints imposed upon them, and gender roles that are trickier than ever to navigate.

This is evidenced by the sentencing disparities between men and women who commit similar crimes. That's Jodi Arias on the [below] slide. It's apparent in how we as a society reflexively make excuses for a woman's misdeeds, whether it is infidelity, sexual assault, or murder, and presume men guilty until proven innocent.

[image]

The new contract is evidenced in family court, in which women are awarded primary custody 82% of the time. It's evidenced by the revival of debtors' prisons for, quote-unquote, "deadbeat dads." Debtors' prisons were supposed to have been abolished in this country in 1869.

It's evidenced in the large number of able-bodied, adult women who are typically the recipients of alimony, sometimes for life. These women are often enabled by the courts to willfully remain unemployed or underemployed, living the lifestyle to which they became accustomed; meanwhile, their ex-husbands live Spartan lives, often unable to save for retirement and even just their basic needs.

It's evidenced by the national domestic violence campaigns that trot out female victims year after year after year—and their donation jar—yet make no mention of the fact that men comprise roughly half of all victims of intimate-partner violence.

It's evidenced by the Violence Against Women Act, a set of special laws that gives women special protections, makes special crimes out of violence directed at women, and robs individuals—typically men—of due process, their homes, their reputations, and Constitutional rights.

It's evidenced by the rampant restraining-order abuse that gives women a tactical advantage in custody and divorce disputes. Restraining-order abuse is so rampant that even attorneys who profit from this broken and corrupt system have acknowledged it.

It's evidenced by the "rape-culture" hysteria being stoked across American college campuses, where all men are viewed as potential sexual predators. If a male student and a female student have sex, and both are under the influence of alcohol, the female student is immediately considered the "victim" even if she—even if the sex was consensual.

It's evidenced by the ever-expanding definition of rape, for women, by the CDC and the FBI, while these agencies continue to ignore male victims of sexual assault.

It's evidenced by the premium we place on women's and girls' lives over men's and boys' lives. A recent celebrity campaign, Bring Back Our Girls, is an effort to raise awareness about the abduction of Nigerian schoolgirls by Boko Haram. Yes, it is awful that these girls were kidnapped. However, we rarely see mention of the greater number of schoolboys who have been murdered by Boko Haram. And make no mistake—they were brutally murdered specifically because they were male, and for no other reason.

One sensitive feminist commenter, when replying to criticism about overlooking the tragic death of these boys, defended the Bring Back Our Girls campaign by rationalizing that, and I quote, "You can't bring back the dead."

Hence, the focus on the girls. And, you know, I've always been told that women are supposed to be the more naturally empathetic sex.

[image]

Women's health issues are given priority over men's health issues. Women and girls are afforded more advantages and opportunities in education while boys and men continue to fall farther behind each decade. Recently, celebrities participated in yet another campaign, called Let Girls Learn, urging teachers, parents, and other adult role models to encourage girls to stay in school and be successful. You know, girls are doing just fine, comparatively speaking, in education. In fact, they're far—doing far, far better than boys.

And I—I have to say, you know, feminists often say they're working on the issues of men and boys. But so far, the closest I've come to seeing any feminist address the crisis of education for boys is Hanna Rosin's book celebrating The End of Men.

It's evidenced in the messages we teach our children. "Never hit a girl or a woman, not if she hits you first, and not in self-defense."

"Teach boys to respect women," compared to the ever-popular T-shirt, "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them!"

[image]

Can you imagine selling the reverse, at Baby Gap … or something?

There are campaigns urging parents to teach their sons not to grow up and become rapists! As if being male means you are more likely to develop into a sexual predator. And, FYI, credible statistics do not support this.

And yet another ridiculous celebrity campaign: Ban Bossy. Sheryl Sandberg, Beyoncé, and other stars are trying to dictate that no one call little girls bossy, even if they're being bossy. And isn't telling people what they can say, or not say, being bossy? Frankly, I see "Ban Bossy" as a campaign to empower female school-aged bullies.

In the late 1990s, during my doctoral training, I noticed that many of my male clients were seeking support for anxiety and depression. They were anxious and depressed due to relationship difficulties. Specifically, these men were suffering emotional, financial, and in some cases physical abuse by their girlfriends and wives. However, none of these men recognized their partners' behaviors as abusive. Even as victims, they had a hard time believing that women could abuse men. I was surprised as well, because none of the psychology programs (all three of them) that I attended discussed female-perpetrated abuse. These men attributed it to their girlfriends and wives being "emotional" or "having issues"—which is true in a sense, but that doesn't excuse the behavior—and were quick to take responsibility for their partners' abusive behaviors.

[image]

I also noticed a significant difference in the relationship expectations between my male and female clients. The majority of men I worked with had pretty low and, you know, reasonable expectations for their girlfriends and wives, while many of the women I worked with had incredibly high and often unrealistic expectations of men and relationships.

[image]

One of my first couples-counseling experiences was with a young married couple; let's call them Jake and Rebecca. During our first session, I asked Jake and Rebecca about their expectations of one another, because sometimes fixing the issues can be as simple as readjusting expectations. Rebecca answered, without hesitation, "I expect Jake to treat me like a princess." I tried to make use of therapeutic humor and said, "That's funny, on your intake form it says you're a dental hygienist."

Jake started to chuckle and then stopped when Rebecca gave both Jake and I a look that could melt lead.

(subvocalized: "Whoops!") I did learn an important clinical lesson that day, and that is, "Flaming narcissists typically do not have a sense of humor about themselves, or their sense of entitlement!"

Unfortunately, Rebecca is not an anomaly. According to psychologists Jean Twenge and W. Keith Campbell, authors of The Narcissism Epidemic: Living in the Age of Entitlement, there has been a 67% increase in narcissistic behaviors and attitudes over the last 20 years, mostly among women. They also estimate that 10% of the population suffers from narcissistic personality disorder—although, let's get real: it's the non-disordered people in close proximity to the narcissist who really suffer.

In 2004, the National Institutes of Health found that 14.8% of the U.S. population meets the criteria to be diagnosed with at least one personality disorder, from a sample of 43,000 interviewees. This study did not include Borderline Personality Disorder, Narcissistic Personality Disorder, or Schizotypal Personality Disorder, and therefore the percentage is very likely much higher. The results showed a slightly larger number of personality-disordered individuals in the younger age groups. And, that's kind of understandable, because adolescence, as one of my former professors—he described it as a time of "transient personality disorders."But you mature and you grow out of it.

So, the percentages diminished successively with each older generation; and according to William Eddy of the High Conflict Institute, since personality disorders generally don't change with age, this study reinforces the other indicators that personality disorders and traits are increasing in our society with each new generation.

[image]

Eddy cites six reasons why personality disorders, including narcissism, are on the rise:

One is instability in early childhood.

Two: Diminishing social glue.

Three: Loss of personal behavior role models.

Four: A society of individuals.

Five: Teaching self-centeredness.

Six: Openness to social complaints.

So, let me summarize this in this really glorious run-on sentence I wrote:

When you add the implosion of the traditional family structure, i.e., the rise and proliferation of single-family households—particularly, to be more clear, single-mother households; the physical disconnection of the Digital Age, in which we're increasingly engaging with a computer screen, instead of face-to-face interaction; the rise of "reality TV" stars and individuals who gained fame by behaving badly; media messaging that the individual is more important than the collective; four generations of "self-esteemers" who have been taught that they are the "specialest snowflakes that ever snowflaked" just because they are the one-and-only snowflake like them that exists in the world—starting with parents buying their little girls Disney-Princess gear; "Women's Studies" offered as a legitimate college major, and not just a class—I mean, what do you you say? "What are you majoring in?" "I'm majoring in ME! And the study of people like me!"; our frivolous-lawsuit society; and then you add to that the cult of "female professional victimhood" that requires fresh male villains and increasingly silly male offenses or "micro-aggressions" to perpetuate the belief that men are this ever-present danger to women; and you get a culture that breeds narcissism as a cultural trait, especially in women.

Okay. Now we're going to get into the next section, which I forgot to make a slide for, which is the vilif—just to remind you, I will say it out loud—the vilification of men and boys and the lionization of women and girls; or as I like to call it, or the alternate title is, "The Shamed and the Shameless."

While narcissism is on the rise in our culture, according to Twenge and Campbell's research, women seem to be more prone to it. Why?[image]

I think it has to do with the lionizing of women and girls, and vilifying and denigrating of men and boys, that has taken place over the last 40 or so years.

Men and boys, as has already been discussed by many of the presenters here, are often the butt of jokes; in TV, film, and advertising, they're portrayed as bumbling buffoons, emotional incompetents, and loutish Neanderthals.

We pathologize male sexuality.

We pathologize the higher activity level and natural rambunctiousness of boys, to the point that we are medicating them with mind-altering drugs—we have no idea how this is going to affect their developing brains over time—just so the predominately female teaching field can have a class of obedient little zombies and make their job slightly easier.

We claim men suck at emotions, but when they do express emotions, particularly anger, we label it as "uncomfortable" or "dangerous." We call men "wimps"—I realize we have kids here, so I changed my original word—who aren't assertive in dating; and label men who are assertive but not attractive to the female object of his affection as "creepy," or my new least-favorite word, "rapey."

[image]
(Editor's note: this is the slide that Alex Wagner of MSNBC and Jessica K. Roy of Time magazine lied to a national audience about.)
Men are expected to be wealthy, handsome, funny, educated, witty, attentive, strong, and sensitive—but not too sensitive; and women are supposed to be admired and revered, just for showing up.

Men are shamed just for being men. They are shamed for not measuring up to women's expectations of them. They are shamed for not earning enough money, of not making the women in their lives happy enough. Fathers are treated as secondary to mothers, expendable and replaceable, even though there's a mountain of research, as Warren (Farrell) mentioned yesterday at the press conference, that shows how essential a loving and involved father is to the psycho-social development of both girls and boys.

I believe men are more susceptible to gender-shaming because of our mother-centric culture.

[image]

If a boy is raised to believe it's his job to make his mother happy and please women, he will be more susceptible to shaming tactics. If he was raised to make his mother happy and his mother was abusive, he will be especially susceptible to gender-shaming tactics.

Meanwhile, we have removed the stigma and shame from bad female behavior. We now view behaviors that were once shunned in women as acts of female empowerment. Being a bitch or a female a–hole is considered a sign of strength in women. Being promiscuous is an act of female empowerment. Demanding to be treated like a princess is condoned and encouraged. We deify mothers, even the bad ones, to the point where it's become what I like to call the Golden Uterus Syndrome.[image]

Fleece your husband in divorce court and take assets you didn't earn? "You deserve it! Take that bastard to the cleaners!" Force a man into fatherhood with an "accidental" pregnancy? "Hey, if he wouldn't commit, sometimes you've got to push him into it!"

Physically assault your husband, or some random guy in a club? "You go, girl!"

Murder your ex-boyfriend? "Well, he must have done something to deserve it!"[image]

When men can be shamed just for being men, and women no longer have any sense of shame, it creates a dangerously lopsided interpersonal dynamic between the sexes. Any abuse committed by a woman can be justified to the point where men are blamed for women's abuse of them, and are labeled "abusive and controlling" when they try to erect boundaries to protect themselves from the abuse they're suffering.

I've worked with countless men who—when they finally worked up the courage to speak with a therapist about their wife's or girlfriend's abuse—were asked some variation of "What did you do to make her treat you that way?" Just imagine a psychologist asking a female abuse victim what she did to make her husband hit her, go through her phone, demand all of her e-mail and social-media passwords, call her names, hit her, abuse her in front of the children! Just imagine, if you can, what would happen if a therapist asked a female domestic-violence abuse victim that. It's despicable, and these therapists should be ashamed of themselves, and not allowed to work with men.

Men who adhere to the old social contract often find themselves at risk of losing their assets, their emotional well-being, their children, their freedom, and even their lives, if they become involved with women who abide by this new social contract in which all obligation, responsibility, and decency fall upon the man; especially if the men legally bind themselves to, and/or reproduce with, these entitlement princesses, personality-disordered predators, and "women-are-superior-to-men" feminists.

In the mid-1990s, I did my masters-level internship at a domestic violence shelter for women and children. I have fairly decent drawing skills and illustration skills, so one of my projects was helping to create a coloring book for K-through-4, for domestic violence education. I included drawings of little girls hitting boys, where the message is, "Little girls don't hit boys, and little boys don't hit girls—let's nobody hit anybody." And the program director told me to take that illustration out. And I asked her why, because I actually remember hitting a boy I had a crush on, with my Winnie-The-Pooh lunchbox, when I was in the first grade, and Sister Andrene told me, Don't do that; I got the message. But the director said, "Well, men are physically stronger than women, so we don't need to tell them that." You know what? Five-year-old boys really aren't any bigger than five-year-old girls. And, as I learned during my internship, domestic violence prevention school programs teach children that it's wrong to hit a girl or a woman under any circumstances, but rarely, if ever, teach the inverse.

Parents teach their daughters to be wary of boys and men who will take advantage of them sexually, control and/or abuse them. We teach little girls that there are bad men out there, and they need to be careful—in fact, some women take it to the extreme and teach their girls and boys that all men are bad. I, for one, believe this is a form of hate indoctrination and child abuse.

Families need to teach their sons about the dangers of abusive women, just like we teach our daughters about the dangers of abusive men. We need to teach our boys to respect themselves, and develop healthy boundaries, even if it is a woman who is trying to violate their boundaries. We need to teach boys it is healthy and right to walk—or run—away from girls and women who are disrespectful, cruel, indifferent, demanding, controlling, demeaning, manipulative, opportunistic, possessive, jealous, emotionally dishonest, unempathic, abusive, crazy, and/or predatory. We need to teach our boys, just like we teach our girls, that it's not okay for a loved one or anyone to lay their hands upon you in violence, that it's not okay to be taken advantage of financially—for instance, he earns all of the money, and she spends all of it, while running up debt and refusing to work.

We need to teach men and boys the warning signs and symptoms of abuse, and that there's no shame in admitting they're in an abusive relationship; and that men, just like women, don't owe their abuser a damned thing—except a view of their backsides walking away from them and, in some cases, a trip to the local jailhouse.

Almost done—this is the last page, I swear!

We need to teach our boys that tolerating abuse from a woman doesn't make them a good man; it makes them victims and suckers, for buying into the bull that "abuse isn't abuse when the perpetrator is a female."

We need to provide boys and young men the same information and supports we provide girls and women. Predators come in all shapes and sizes and sexes, and we need to teach our children, girls and boys, how to avoid and protect themselves. We need to stop normalizing predatory behaviors in females, exhibited in high conflict and personality-disordered types, as normal and/or acceptable—they're not normal. They're not acceptable. It's just as bad and pathological when women exhibit abusive behaviors, and they should receive the same public censure, condemnation, ostracism, court fines, and jail time. I implore mothers and fathers to discuss these issues, when they feel it's appropriate, with their children—and that's sons and daughters. Trust me, you don't want women like this as your daughters-in-law.

Young men need to be educated about the dangers of marriage in terms of the high potential for loss of assets, children, and possibly their freedom. Young men should be warned not to mingle their personal assets with marital assets. We should be pushing for legislation that makes prenuptial agreements mandatory—and binding! I would also love to see pre-custody agreements as well; specifically that a man and woman, who wish to procreate, sign a legally binding agreement on how they will handle custody, should they divorce. And—guys out there—if she's not even willing to discuss that, you probably shouldn't marry her!

We need to encourage men to report abuse by their wives and girlfriends to their medical doctors and primary practitioners, to file police reports and press charges. We should strongly discourage men from practicing chivalry that is self-destructive and enabling of abuse. And police should be trained and required to enforce the law, without regard to sex.

[image]

A rigged game can never be a level playing field. And rigged game is precisely what we have. If we want a future for our children where the standard is to value each other as human beings, then a discussion about all forms of unfairness and inequity must be on the table.

And this conference is a good place to do that.

Thank you! Enjoy your lunch.

Mike Buchanan: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Mike Buchanan · 22 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: We will be presenting the complete transcripts of all the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014 presentations here on AVfM in the following weeks. This is the fourth presentation on day 1, June 27, by Mike Buchanan of the United Kingdom's Justice for Men and Boys (& the Women Who Love Them) party. Mr. Buchanan asked us to add a postscript to the end, which we have done. —DE

(Introduction by Paul Elam.)

Okay, moving on, and thanking you all for your patience: It is my pleasure to introduce Mike Buchanan. I've known Mike for quite some time; this is my first time meeting him, though. I'm a huge fan of his.

Mike is a British writer, publisher, and human rights advocate for men and boys. He is a leader of a political party, Justice for Men and Boys, which will be contesting 30 seats in the May 2015 election. He will personally be contesting a seat in Bedford & Kempston. He's the author of nine books, including The Glass Ceiling Delusion: The Real Reasons More Women Don't Reach Senior Positions. He was interviewed on the BBC, "London Live," and has appeared in countless newspaper articles for his tireless work advocating for British men and boys.

Mike worked for the Conservative Party from 2006 to 2008 but resigned his party membership in late 2009 to protest Conservative Party leader David Cameron's adoption of women-only prospective parliamentary candidate shortlists for some constituencies.

Mike runs four blogs: Justice for Men and Boys, The Anti-Feminism League, The Alternative Sexism Project, and Campaign for Merit in Business. He openly publishes his email, home address, and phone number, and welcomes critics to respond to him personally as a human being. His books are recommended by professors of sociology, psychology, and business. He was formerly a business executive who took early retirement to focus on the issues facing Britain's men and boys.

Please welcome Mike Buchanan.

(Applause. Mike Buchanan takes the podium.)

Good afternoon! We've just come, myself and three British colleagues have just come from a diner just down the road. Now, Americans are famous for their hospitality. At the end of the meal, a guy from A Voice for Men came over and offered to settle our bill. That was just really impressive; I just want to say it's true what they say about Americans.

And being British, we accepted his offer, of course. (Laughter.)

Okay … I'd like to thank Paul Elam, Dean Esmay, and everyone associated with A Voice for Men, for all they've done over the years, and for laying on this conference. I think they've done a great job in the face of adversity, after the enemies of men and boys tried to stop this gathering. I'd also like to thank them for inviting me to speak today. It's a real honor to be here.

In the leaflets we distributed earlier today, we outlined 20 areas in which men and boys are disadvantaged by the state's actions and inactions in Britain today; and I dare say most of those disadvantages would apply in most developed countries. The state colludes with malicious mothers to deny fathers access to their children after relationship breakdowns, which in our view, and I think the view of most people in this room, I'm sure, is emotional abuse of children, fathers, grandparents, and so many others.

The state offers little or no support to male victims of domestic violence. The state disadvantages men with respect to education, employment, and through the justice system it treats men far more harshly than it treats women. The state assaults men and boys in many other areas, too. The extent of state-sponsored assaults on men and boys is truly breathtaking.

The state is like a train which only ever goes in one direction. The speed might vary, but the destination is always the same: ever more privileging of women and girls, regardless of the consequences. So a privileged class becomes ever more privileged over time, while the life outcomes for men and boys steadily worsen.

Now, the facts and figures that I will be outlining today relate mainly to the UK, of course. But I sense the picture is broadly similar in many, and possibly even most, developed countries.

Today I'm going to present the case for the Men's Human Rights Movement to take what I think is an overdue and important next step in its evolution. We need to become an effective force, politically. I'm convinced it won't be long before there are Men's Rights parties in many, if not most, developing and developed countries. And I'll be outlining two very important and useful things that happen when you launch a Men's Rights party.

Let's start the areas of disadvantaging with education. Boys have become ever more disadvantaged by an increasingly feminized education system over the past few decades; and today in the UK, as I think in the US, only 40% of university students are men*. Now, when most students were men, the state deemed it a problem to be addressed. Now that most students are women, funny, there isn't a problem any more, which is nice.

For decades, government programs have sought to encourage young women into traditional male-typical fields, such as engineering. At Brunel University today, female post-graduate engineering students are entitled to additional grants, what they put at over 34,000 US dollars per year, solely on the grounds of their gender. It's—the media's interest in this, absolute zero.

So this is happening, although it's long been understood why women are far less inclined to go into engineering than, say, medicine, and regardless of the fact that fewer female graduates take up careers in engineering. Most female engineers never return to the profession after having children. So taxpayers are bribing women with little or no interest in the field to go into the profession, although they're unlikely to have lengthy careers in it; and at the same time, they're denying university places, and therefore engineering careers, to men.

Now, this is leading inevitably to higher female employment and lower male employment. Already, men outnumber—they have for some years—men outnumber women in Britain, as unemployed.

But this has serious consequences. We know that unemployment is a far-higher risk factor for male suicide than it is for female suicide. And the male—the differential between the male and the female suicide numbers has nearly doubled in the space of just 30 years; it's now 3.5 to 1. Suicide is the leading cause of death of the young men in the UK. So, by denying the young men the same education and employment opportunities, the state is driving some of them to take their own lives.

They contribute to—the state also contributes to the high amount of suicide rate in other areas. We know that denying fathers access to children, following relationship breakdown, is a major driver of male suicide. How could it not be? So is the almost nonexistent provision of refuge places for male victims of domestic violence, which I'll be talking about in a bit of detail. The state is making—the bottom line is, the state is making men's lives so unbearable that, for many of them, they'd sooner end their lives than carry on; that's the bottom line here.

And, by giving ever more privilege to women as a class, by disadvantaging men and denying them support, the state is killing men. It is really as black-and-white as that.

Now, who is it that finances the state that disadvantages men and boys in so many areas? It's men, in the main, ironically. British men pay 72% of the income tax collected in the UK; women, only 28%. In US dollar terms, British men pay an extra 108 billion dollars (that's 108 thousand million dollars) more income tax than British women. I'd be interested to know the equivalent figures in the States, given the population of the US is almost exactly five times that of the UK. If it's proportionate, American men are paying an eye-watering additional $540,000,000,000 in income tax every year, compared with American women.

So it's overwhelmingly men who finance the state-run institutions which assault the interests of men and boys. It's overwhelmingly men who pay the salaries of the individuals working in those institutions. Men are sponsoring their own muggers.

Across the developed world, there's an unholy alliance between the state and feminists. Feminists always make the disadvantaging of men worse than it would otherwise be. Given that they are female supremacists, driven by misandry, the hatred of men and boys, how could it possibly be otherwise?

Feminism has some key vulnerabilities, though, as an ideology, one of which is becoming ever more apparent over time: Feminists' appetite for advantaging women and girls over men and boys is insatiable. For over 30 years, feminists have worked through the state to attack many of the pillars of civilized society, most notably marriage and the nuclear family. We're seeing ever more examples of outrageous advantaging of women and girls, such as the $34,000 additional grants I mentioned earlier on. And, as advantaging of women and girls and the disadvantaging of men and boys becomes ever more obvious to more people, opposition to feminists will inevitably rise.

So what—so, the $64,000 question—what options do citizens in democratic countries have to stop the state assaulting the human rights of men and boys? Decade after decade, men and women have sought to influence governments through presenting rational arguments. So how does that work out, when those arguments show the state's preferred policy directions are harming men?

Let's look at one of our key areas of interest: domestic violence. Huge numbers of studies tell us that women are at least as physically aggressive toward intimate partners as men. It's long been known that while most domestic violence is reciprocal, where it's one-way, the perpetrator is more likely to be a woman than a man. And feminists will tell you that this is because female perpetrators are actively acting proactively, in self-defense; a pre-emptive strike, if you like, I guess. It's very rarely the case, though. Dr. Nicola Graham-Kevan, a leading British authority on domestic violence, reports that just 4% of women, female perpetrators, cite self-defense as a motivation—4%.

Now, some of you will have seen a video recently, set in a London park; it showed the public's double standards when it comes to responding, or not responding, to a man becoming aggressive towards his female partner, and to a woman becoming aggressive towards her male partner. The double standards displayed by the passersby were, though, predictable. Both men and women did nothing, absolutely nothing, to stop the man being assaulted, while they rushed to support the woman who was being assaulted. Indeed, a number of passersby, both men and women, laughed at the situation in which the man was being assaulted. The video went viral in days, and hits reached three million in the first week. It's now been viewed by over seven million people, and the feedback has been overwhelmingly positive. The video was commissioned by ManKind Initiative, a highly respected male charity supporting victims of male abuse; and they recently published on their website an interesting report with 25 key facts about domestic abuse, drawing on the latest government statistics in the 2012-13 British Crime Survey.

Feminists relentlessly claim that a higher proportion of female victims suffer multiple incidents of abuse than male victims, and more incidents using severe force. Both claims are demonstrably false. In the latest British Crime Survey, 38% of the people who were victims of domestic abuse were men; 62%, women. So why are more women than men victims? Though I know some people challenge that. What do we know about abuse incident frequency and incident severity? 21% of both male and female victims suffered three or more incidents of domestic abuse in 2012-13. A higher proportion of male victims, 34%, suffered assaults using severe force than did female victims—28%.

We might reasonably expect refuge places for people to be allocated based on the risk of assaults using severe force; and on that basis, if we work through the numbers, 42% of refuge places in the UK should be allocated to men. Now, it's important to say, we're not saying that there should be fewer refuge places for women; we're simply saying that there should be a damn sight more refuge places for men than there currently are.

In the UK, there are over 4,000 refuge places for women at risk, and only 25 places for men at risk. For every refuge place available for a man in the UK, there are 100 available for women at risk. But the situation is even worse than that for men, because some of these 25 places are available only for either gay or straight men, and some only for men living in the local area of the refuge. So the chance of a battered man finding a refuge place in the UK, near where he lives and works, even when he's in considerable danger from a violent partner, is close to zero.

I repeat, this is known to be a driver of the high male suicide rate. How could it not be?

This brings me on to another claim regularly made by feminists; and it was put to me in a TV discussion only very recently: Feminists say that women should get the vast majority of available refuge places because women are far more likely than men to die at the hands of their partners or ex-partners. But what if we include, in our analysis, deaths by suicide provoked by domestic violence?

I turned to an American researcher, Richard Davis, who published a report in 2009. This is one of the report's conclusions: When domestic-violence-related suicides are combined with domestic-violence-related homicides, the total number of domestic-violence-related deaths are higher for males than females.

Quite an astonishing finding. And you'll never see that in the mainstream media, I can guarantee you. It blows out of the water the whole feminist argument for women to have the vast majority, for virtually all the refuge places to be allocated to women.

Now, most of the key facts about the nature of domestic violence have been known for decades. So what have rational arguments, based on this huge, huge body of evidence, done to move governments to provide practical support for male victims of domestic violence?

Nothing, or virtually nothing.

The mainstream media, too, bears responsibility for relentlessly peddling feminist narratives. In this area, as many others, the general public is woefully misinformed about domestic violence. Some months ago, we sent the BBC a formal complaint about a lengthy piece in their news program in which men were portrayed only as perpetrators and women only as victims. We detailed, in our lengthy complaint, over 50 breaches of the BBC's editorial guidelines in the piece—over 50.

Our complaint was rejected. We weren't surprised. I think it probably takes 100 breaches before they wake up.

When it comes to taking advice on domestic violence issues, the government listens to feminist organizations such as Women's Aid. In Britain, we're only too used to the sight and sound of Polly Neate, the organization's CEO. We recently put on our website a detailed analysis of comments made by a Women's Aid spokesman in an online discussion; we proved the woman had made at least seven statements which were demonstrably either lies or misleading. We presented our evidence to Polly Neate, and invited her to retract the statements. Predictably, she declined to do so.

We've publicly challenged many feminists to retract lies they or their organizations have spoken or written. Not one has ever done so. They're beyond shameless. That won't come as a surprise to anyone in this room, but it's just true.

The lack of impact of rational arguments on government policy directions is undeniable. It's true in domestic violence; it's true in 20 [other] areas. So what alternatives are we left with?

One obvious one is to launch a political party, given that almost half of the electorate is male. We launched Justice for Men and Boys early last year; and it would be fair to say, most—many, if not most—of our policy directions are socially conservative. And we're focusing our effort on pushing the Conservative Party into becoming less hostile to men and boys; so we'll target Conservative marginal seats in next year's general election.

We're recommending to people interested in forming a party that if they form a left-of-center party they shouldn't attack people on the right advocating for men and boys; they should actually attack people on their own side who are abandoning them. If they form a right-of-center party, they shouldn't attack people on the left against supporting men and boys; they should attack, you know, the people on the right who are abandoning them.

The goal must be to force all political parties to change.

Earlier, I used the metaphor of the state as a train that only ever goes in one direction: advantaging women and girls at the expense of men and boys. Staying with that metaphor, our objective is to lay a damn-great concrete block on the rails, at general elections. When the parties know that the price for assaulting men and boys could be five years out of office, they'll have to start making changes.

After we published our party's website, we were both surprised and delighted when two things happened almost immediately that we didn't predict. Donations started arriving from Day One, including some generous ones from people who had been following my other campaigns, that had never made themselves known to us, nor donated anything. And it was an early indication, I think, that when you present something tangible, rather than only conceptual, people are more likely to make donations.

Of course, AVfM recently had the experience on needing to quickly raise $25,000 for additional security here; and a crowd-funder raised the sum in, I believe, under 22 hours. Hour after hour, I was watching donations coming into that, and I thought, Wow, things are changing, this is getting traction. An outstanding achievement, I've got to say. Outstanding.

Now, the second thing that's happened after we launched the party was mainstream media coverage. Within two or three weeks, I'd appeared on a number of BBC national and local radio programs, one of them the Jeremy Vine show, which has a regular audience of seven million listeners. We are getting the media coverage we want, but it was forming the party that was the catalyst—I mean, that's the point I want to make, that things happen when you form a party. People are intrigued.

Most of our coverage has actually come from the BBC, which is bizarre, because I attack them with some frequency.

So launching political parties can be expected to result in media attention, and donations. And the stark truth is that political parties need both if they're going to make an impact against feminism, which has been the defining ideology of the political establishment and other establishments for at least 30 years, I think across most of the developed world; certainly the UK. I'm convinced that if only a small amount of the time and effort currently expended by Men's Human Rights Advocates were directed toward launching and running political parties, the result could be a game-changer.

Along with AVfM, we're convinced the fight for men's human rights can be waged by men and women of any political persuasion, race, creed, sexuality, and any other characteristic you care to name.

At the top of our party's website, from the outset, there's been a quotation from Mahatma Gandhi: "First they ignore you, then they ridicule you, then they fight you, then you win."

Well, our enemies have long ignored us; they've long ridiculed us; but now they're fighting us. They didn't want this first International Conference on Men's Issues to go ahead. They fought A Voice for Men and its legion of supporters—and they lost.

This conference is, without doubt, a landmark victory in the war for men's and boy's human rights. There's absolutely no doubt. The enemies of men and boys had better get used to losing, because they're going to be losing more battles from now on. And the day is coming when they'll lose the war. Let's bring that day forward. Let's get political.

Thank you.

Disney: Vaginas are magic!

Rachel Edwards · 22 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A disturbing trend is emerging out of Disney movies, especially their non-Pixar cartoons: their desire to be more "progressive" is moving them several steps backward in their depictions of men.

While the old Disney formula is flawed and based heavily in gender stereotypes, like Cinderella and her Prince Charming, their new criticism of that formula does nothing more than shift from traditionalism to full-blown gynocentrism. With films like Frozen and Maleficent emerging over the past few years, it is easy to see that they are desperately trying to pander to a feminist audience.

In Frozen and Maleficent, it is no longer romantic love between men and women that breaks the spell. Instead, it is the power of The Sisterhood and the Sacred Feminine that heals everything. It is now the power of female compassion that is the only thing that can bring redemption.

This idea of redemption through women is not entirely new, either. If you look at male Disney characters of fairly recent vintage, you begin to see this disturbing pattern: men are not getting their "progressive" reboot at all. Even in movies where men are the main protagonists, it is only through the influence of a woman that the male protagonist is able to be fully a man. It is almost always the actions of a that bring about story resolution.

For example, Nala tells Simba to stop being a MGTOW and to return to his responsibilities. The Beast becomes a gentleman through the influence of Belle. Tarzan is made "civilized" by Jane's influence. They are perpetuating the idea that men must be made whole by women, but that women don't need men; women just have to be there.

When I mention the Sacred Feminine, I am referring to the idea that women, on their own, are the source of healing, as if they have this sort of inherent magical quality. It is an almost religious, if not outright religious, treatment of women, and they can do no wrong because femininity is sacred. They can destroy entire kingdoms and terrorize people for years. They can be completely toxic to everyone around them, and will still be seen as being worthy of praise and adoration. Whereas men are viewed as being beasts or misguided souls that need contact with this magical feminine energy to be whole.

There used to be a balance to that when male influence could also break magic spells in Disney universes, but now that it's been tossed aside we are left with stories of full-blown gynocentrism.

I say that because in Disney's two most recent offerings, Frozen and Maleficent, they did not create more complex and relatable villains; instead, they shifted the blame to men. They didn't make the male villains in those films sympathetic; they were basically just devils. These were simply films that explained how being an insufferable asshole is okay as long as women are the ones acting that way.

These films have removed the possibility of female redemption through male contact, most likely because feminists feel this is sexist. But somehow it's totally okay for these people to make men these bumbling wanderers that need a woman's magical healing touch to get their lives in order. They have made it taboo to make women villains, but men are fair game and will likely continue to be demonized by Disney and other companies because no one can be bothered to care.

I honestly hope that Disney moves away from this trend and takes a more balanced approach to their depiction of men, but it's fairly unlikely. This gynocentric attitude, and cringing at feminist whinging, has taken too strong of a hold on the company, and more importantly it sells out movie theatres.

Because maleness is an evil, chaotic essence that must be controlled and contained, but vaginas are magic.

We may take issue with the notion that feminists (who control billions in government and NGO and foundation money) have no real power, and the other predictable responses of the feminist in this piece, but we must give props to ABC Fusion for doing what reporters are supposed to do: report and give contrasting points of view from independent sources.

Just plain straight up reporting. We thought that was a dying art!

Conference reflections: A young woman becomes an MRA

Elaine Finklestein · 23 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Deleting me because I disagreed with you?" I typed on Facebook. I had politely disagreed with her post that men reading and talking about the Elliot Rodger shooting should just "Shut Up." She had then deleted both my comments and her friendship with me, writing, "Deleting you because you are part of the problem and have a skewed vision of feminism. Knowing a woman who could be so horrifyingly altered in the head is not something I want to be a part of." She then continued, "People like you are the reason we need feminism."

People who disagree with feminist censorship are the reason we need feminism? That doesn't seem logical, I thought.

Before that day, I hadn't thought of myself as an "anti-feminist," mostly because I didn't really care about gender issues. But this encounter, along with others like it, changed me. After feeling the heat of hatred and censorship from college classmates and female colleagues, I drove to Detroit to find refuge.

I didn't know what to expect, so (as I often do) I had a knife in my boot.

I walked into the center for Veterans of Foreign Wars, handed my ID to security, and was smilingly directed to a buffet of A Voice for Men–branded buttons, bookmarks, chapsticks, T-shirts, and event programs.

I was surprised to see that the first three speakers were women, but that wasn't the biggest surprise for me. Having learned about the men's rights movement only through online sources—MRA YouTube channels, blogs, and forums as well as media coverage of the movement—I was expecting some solid, reasoned arguments, but I was also expecting a lot of complaining, immaturity, and anger. What I found instead decisively converted me into a Men's Rights Activist.

1. That VFW center was the ultimate "safe space."

Even as a new person and a woman, I didn't come close to feeling out of place or uncomfortable. Instead, I enjoyed lively, free dialogue with people of all ages about all topics: gender, politics, philosophy, work, and movies. There were times when I disagreed fundamentally with people (e.g., about the feasibility of anarchy), but never did I or anyone else raise a voice. I didn't hear a single ad hominem remark the entire weekend. This wasn't the MRM I'd read about—this was a joining of ideas that made me, a graduate student, salivate.

2. The conference was about compassion.

Contrary to the image of bitter ex-husbands portrayed in the media, the men at the conference were not "out to get" their ex-wives. Again and again, the story I heard was, "I don't resent her. I want to keep paying child support. I just want to see my kids." When these forbidden fathers said their children's names, their faces lit up with happiness but also contracted with strain.

I listened to a story about going to jail to avoid Vietnam—and how that was almost as bad. I listened to the stories of sons who had lost their fathers or been unjustly separated from them by cruel mothers.

I don't have any kids, I've never gone to war, and my parents are happily married. But I have never felt more empathy than I did during those two days.

3. The MRM loves women.

I've never been a feminist because I've always felt in my gut that feminism doesn't like men. My suspicion was confirmed by Karen Straughan's thoughtful analysis of the topic, but even if I didn't believe that feminism hates men, I realized that the MRM loves women more than feminism loves men.

This was the realization that sealed the deal—it would be impossible for a rational person who attended the AVfM conference to believe that the MRM is a woman-hating movement. To the contrary, when Warren Farrell was asked what he thought was most important to the future of men's rights activism, he said, especially for the men in the movement, “to partner with a woman who has compassion for you and for men.”

As media commenters have noted, an anti-Hillary Clinton comment gained thunderous applause from the crowd. But what they failed to note is that perhaps the loudest applause of the conference came after Canadian Senator Anne Cools said, “Men have been the protectors of women for centuries.”

The audience cheered, “Yes!” and “That’s right!”

The man beside me said softly, “And we won’t stop.”

Feminist misogyny on viral parade in backlash to #WomenAgainstFeminism

August Løvenskiolds · 23 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Die mother fucker! I fucking hate this #idontneedfeminism bullshit" —sierra_misty

Men's Human Rights Advocates (MHRAs), like me, and Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), also like me, are used to being called, erroneously, "misogynists"—haters of women—because in our quest to secure our human rights, we challenge the gynocentric focus of society that underpins ideologies on both the left and the right. If you want to see actual deep, passionate hatred of women—24-karat misogyny written large and clear—you need look no further than the feminist response to the women of the Tumblr site "Women Against Feminism" (WAF, and they also have a Facebook site). While the waifs of WAF resist feminism for the damage feminism has done to both their lives and the men and boys in their lives, feminism hates WAF simply for being women who dare to disagree with them.

And Twitter is in flames about it.

This new focus of feminist hate—in addition to their hating of men, their free-bleeding, and their sporting unshaven limbs—seems to illuminate the fact that the supposed "marketing problem" of the femmies is really a problem with logic, truth, personal responsibility, relational aggression, naked misandry, and, now, even naked misogyny: the delightful, adorable posts of the women against feminism are laying bare these faults one selfie at a time.

Her card reads: "I don't need feminism, because real feminism is about equal opportunity & respect for women, NOT abortions, free birth control & the ability to walk around like a shameless slut while damning the male population!"

Oops! So, so, sorry to all you male feminist allies out there who just saw that picture—I should've put up a trigger warning: a well-kempt woman who actually likes men. Perhaps you're not charmed by smart, religious (likely Catholic: note the crucifix she's wearing and her compliance with Catholic teaching on responsible sexuality) women who can differentiate between real equality and feminist lies—that is okay. Totally okay. Not all men like women like that. Some men, like some women, react to attractive women with an explosion of jealousy.

You can perhaps begin to see why feminists might feel just a tad jealous of women like this—I mean, she is rocking a very soft, warm manifesto too, which reads:

> I do not need feminism bc [because]:
> 1. I respect men
> 2. Being a woman is not a disadvantage
> 3. I've got my own opinion
> 4. I take responsibility for myself and my decisions
> 5. I don't feel like a victim
> 6. The feminist movement is full of shit.

One more, just for the sake of completeness:

Disdaining a numbered list, this anti-feminist posits a more sultry bulleted declaration of independence that reads:

> I don't need feminism because:
> - I am an adult who is capable of taking responsibility for myself and my actions.
> - I define myself and derive my value by my own standards. I don't need to be "empowered."
> - I am not a target for violence and there is no war against me.
> - I respect men. I refuse to demonize them and blame them for my problems.

The disgruntled and disingenuous ingénues of feminism have a lot of objections to responsible adult women who speak out like this, and those objecting feminists come off as women without consciences, the sort who could file a false rape claim in the morning and then go out shoe shopping for "come-fuck-me" pumps in the afternoon.

Let's take a peek at some of the responses packed full of feminist love:

An anonymous writer at Huffpo Canada starts things off with a passive-aggressive assault, saying, "But before anyone starts judging and shaming the women in this Facebook group who may not define themselves as feminists, it's important to look at the misleading definitions associated with the word—and do the work to educate people as to what feminism really stands for."

But things get nasty in a hurry. "Asha"—who is editor-in-chief Asha Dahya of The "F" Word—was so enraged that she made a video wherein, after using the phrase "I feel" at least three times and just after the 4:10 mark, she accidentally admits that feminism is a "theology":

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=AvkawfaeNTE#t=250

Asha claims that WAF engage in victim-blaming of rape survivors, a dubious proposition at best—taking personal responsibility is not victim-blaming, and if you look you can find rape survivors on the WAF Tumblr itself who refuse to hate or demonize men.

Asha further claims that WAF are speaking irrationally and stupidly: "it is filled with all sorts of wrong, misguided and confusing information," or they are "on their periods," a slur I like to call cunt-shaming. Asha says she "hates" to link to WAF (such hate is called "misogyny," Asha) and that WAF is a slap in the face (twice!) against feminists—a false accusation of violence but an accusation that might be metaphorically true if any of those feminists were to actually wake up to grasp their own lies. But don't worry, Asha—if they are like you, they won't.

But compounding the feminist nightmare, some feminists ARE seemingly waking up a bit—feminist Caitlin Elam (no relation to Paul Elam, as far as I know) wrote:

> The modern feminist movement has gone from women supporting each other, fighting against real injustices, and having a common goal of equality with men to the other end of the spectrum where women viciously attack each other and compete against each other for who can be the 'most feminist' (but God forbid there be a pageant for that title because that would be gasp sexist).
> I do fundamentally consider myself a feminist, though, but I always have to have to add a disclaimer so I'm not lumped in with the radicals that have the loudest voices in the media. I strive for female equality with men rather than superiority over men; there, that's about as concise as I can get it.

But while Caitlin gets it and is now rejecting feminism, a lot of other feminists are getting mega-pissed.

Lynsi Freitag of the Huffington Post uses all of her Teutonic resolve—"[p]ardon me while I take another antacid, breathe slowly, channel my inner strength and proceed"—to demand "Women Against Feminism, Please Read." Girl Freitag goes on to call WAF stupid again ("inaccurate and ignorant") and defaults back to the dictionary definition of feminism that WAF explicitly reject because dictionaries do not reflect the actual actions of feminists, levels of damage they cause, and the inequalities that feminism seeks to perpetuate (like unequal custody, male circumcision, female-only birth control pills, and mandatory child support decoupled from visitation).

Elizabeth Ballou of Bustle continues the stupid-women-who-disagree-with-me meme with "it's fueled by serious misinformation and ignorance"—and, of course, she also reaches for the dictionary as if a heavy book is all it takes to squash the dragons of misandry hatched in the fires of the popular and near-universal understanding of feminism.

WAF respond to "appeals to dictionary" like this:

> Because contrary to the "dictionary definition" recited by a bunch of idiots, "feminism" is focused on two negative points:
> 1. Women are weak damsels in distress.
> 2. Men are evil predators.
> No positive direction. No positive solutions. Just a bunch of whiny brats looking for attention by competing to see who can tell the biggest "weak woman" story.
> And so, feminism like this is poison. Poison for women. It encourages women to be eternal victims. The glass is half empty. And if you say it is half full, they will attack you as if you just smashed their sacred idol.

More like you've smashed their entire "theology," but yeah. I would add that the dictionary definition of "nuclear" does not mention nuclear explosions, nuclear fallout, nuclear war, or nuclear winter. Dictionaries are the beginning of understanding, but relying on them exclusively is horribly short-sighted. WAF know this; their feminist detractors do not.

Short-sightedness is the hallmark of Sara Newman at NeonTommy, who doubles down on the stupid-chick meme, saying, "The 'I don't need feminism' movement has become a breading ground for ignorance and self absorption—not to mention flagrant spelling and grammatical errors." [emphasis added]

Bad move, Sara.

First off, leave it to a feminist to not know the difference between "breading" and "breeding," and be lousy—or perhaps, yeasty—at both.

Later in the same article, Sara likens dictionaries to memos, and then she writes, "Today women in the United States and other Western treatment have the luxuries of choosing to purse their own careers" [emphasis added]. Sara, perhaps you should pursue some other line of work in some Asian treatment, maybe?

To conclude …

Women Against Feminism are a potent if not nuclear response to feminism and one that is long overdue. In a gynocentric culture, men's voices can only do so much, but women can do THIS:

Farewell to the most important blog ever for the wrongly accused

Pierce Harlan · 24 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Durham-in-Wonderland, Professor KC Johnson's hugely influential blog that chronicled the Duke lacrosse false rape case starting more than eight years ago, has completed its mission, and Professor Johnson has posted his "closing comments." At its height, the blog had in excess of 100,000 readers per day. For me, KC Johnson is the greatest blogger ever.

How influential was this blog in helping to draw attention to the injustices in Durham? After the three young lacrosse players were declared "innocent" by the state's attorney general amid a media circus usually reserved for the rich and the famous, one of the young men, Reade Seligmann, issued a statement in which, among other things, he thanked Professor Johnson for his efforts.

It was Durham-in-Wonderland that inspired me to start my blog, COTWA.

Ground zero in the Duke cesspool that Johnson chronicled were, of course, ex-district attorney Mike Nifong and Duke's infamous "Group of 88," the Duke faculty activists who exploited the young men's distress to advance their extremist ideologies. For those not familiar with the Group of 88, Johnson gives us a summary in his closing post:

> … for dozens of Duke faculty, [the] evidence appeared irrelevant. Eighty-eight of them rushed to judgment, signing a statement (whose production violated Duke regulations in multiple ways) affirming that something had "happened" to false accuser Crystal Mangum, and thanking protesters ("for not waiting") who had, among other things, urged the castration of the lacrosse captains and blanketed the campus with "wanted" posters. As the case to which they attached their public reputations imploded, Group members doubled down, with most issuing a second statement promising they would never apologize for their actions. (Only three Group members ever said they were sorry for signing the statement, and two of that number subsequently retracted those apologies.) For months, the Duke administration was either in agreement with the faculty extremists or cowed by them—or some combination of both.

Johnson's blog was as distressing as it was illuminating. It ripped off a scab to reveal an ugly, progressive pus that animates policy-making on campus, especially on issues of gender and race. It also exposed the news media's fealty to political correctness in its largely biased reporting of the incident.

Professor Johnson is a frequent contributor to Minding the Campus, and readers are urged to follow him there.

We must pause to add a chilling footnote. Despite the atrocity of the Duke lacrosse and many, many other cases in the years since, the academy has grown ever more hostile to due process and fairness when it comes to presumptively innocent young men accused of sexual assault. Professor Dan Subotnik, for one, openly wondered if the Duke players would "have had any chance of justice" after the Department of Education's "Dear Colleague" letter? The persons who drafted that letter should have been required to read Durham-in-Wonderland.

On behalf of the community of the wrongly accused, we salute KC Johnson for his unstinting work to advance the cause of justice.

The Art of Being Bold

> There comes a time in every person's life when he has to choose the course his life will take.—Muhammad Ali

[image]
A Facebook friend recently asked me for details about my four interviews with Muhammad Ali among many interviews with others of lesser or equal rank. Since I probably will never get around to writing my memoirs … here goes:

It was 1978. I was working weekends doing radio news while finishing up my degree in Journalism at the University of Oregon in Eugene, Oregon. The sports guy was going on vacation for two weeks and I had to take over. I really knew nothing about sports. The news director said to do something spectacular with it. I said, "What? Should I interview Muhammad Ali?" He said, "Sure!" (This guy was unique, and I learned a lot from him. His own career was bizarre, but he was fearless, which later became his undoing—but that's another story.) Anyway, by playing "big man" and "little man," in less than a week I had worked my way through and got the right phone number for the Ali training camp. When someone answered, I said, "I know Muhammad talks to the big guys in the sports reporting world, Howard Cosell and so on, but would he give a chance to the little guy and talk to a small-town radio reporter in little Eugene, Oregon?" The next voice on the phone was: "This is the greatest fighter of all time!"

No, I didn't save the tapes. I've got a small segment on a highlight reel, and somewhere there is a UPI broadcast wire piece with a few details of the first interview.

One thing he revealed, which I think was the part UPI took, is that when the press was in attendance at a recent sparring match with Floyd Patterson, he staged a knockdown: "I just told him to hit me and I'd fall down." He wanted to look like he could be beat before he scheduled his next fight in order to "sell more tickets."

But it was the last interview, at another radio station in Eugene that I had switched to, that was the most revealing. I'm not sure whether or not this story has been told in books about him, though I kind of think it has (the Gorgeous George part), but the Leon Spinks part and my part in it have not been revealed until now.

I was running out of questions. I figured I had one more possible interview. I called up my brother Terry, who was a big Ali fan as he did some amateur boxing himself, and asked for suggestions.

To Ali, I was always the reporter from that "one-horse town." (I had intentionally played down the size of Eugene, and although it was a medium-size market, it was still a town Ali had never heard of.) I relayed the Gorgeous George story to him and asked if it was really true. There was a huge long pause, and then his voice changed—entirely.

(If you listen to interviews with Ali when he was Cassius Clay, you can hear that voice: soft, articulate—he was always articulate but a different kind of articulation—and, most of all, not bombastic.)

> Well, since you are in that one-horse town and not well-known, I'll tell you the truth. Yes, I was riding in a limo in New York City and I heard this guy on the radio—Gorgeous George the wrestler. He was outrageous! A huge braggart, but he had made a name for himself—put himself on top among the wrestling game, so I went to see him at Madison Square Garden.

(One has to remember who George was and how he alone transformed the wrestling game: from sweaty men in tights in semi-real fights to a "show" in which he had long—very long for the time, well before hippie days—blond hair and may have been the first wrestler to wear a cape.)

> And he said to me, 'Here's the deal, kid, be a braggart. Everyone hates a braggart. Tell them how good you are. Put on a show—they'll come to see you get beat and you'll be a millionaire. There's one catch: Don't get beat.' Well, I can tell you, since it's not going anywhere, yeah, that story is true.

We talked for a bit more, and since we were no longer in "Muhammad Ali the act" mode, I got even bolder.

Since 1975, Ali had fought a number of people, Englishman Joe Bugner among them. They weren't pushovers, even though the roster had included an aging Ken Norton. Anyway, Ali had beat them all. On the other hand, Ali was getting older, and in the latest fights, who was left? So I asked the leading and pointed questions: "Isn't it true that the latest fights have been with bums? Isn't it time to take on a real challenge with maybe someone younger?"

He went back into "act" mode for a bit—defending himself—"The People's Champion" fought the greatest fighters there were, etc.

But I said, "That was then, this is now, if you're going to continue fighting … and that's up to you … how about Leon Spinks? He's young and, in the scheme of things, not ranked high enough for you yet, but he did win in the Olympics, just like you did. What about giving him a chance?"

(Another big pause … non-"act" mode voice.) "Spinks, huh? Well, you think so?"

"Yeah, I think so. A real challenge."

(Big pause again.) "Well, I might give him a shot."

Less than six months later, Ali announced that his next fight for the title would be with Leon Spinks. Spinks was definitely a lower-ranked contender. It was only his eighth fight. I think Ali thought that if a "one-horse town" sports guy like me thought this way, maybe the big-town sports guys thought this way too. So Spinks got a shot at the champion at least a year or two earlier than he normally would have in the general scheme of the fighting game rankings. Spinks beat Ali to win the world heavyweight title in the shortest time in history on February 15, 1978. It was one of the few occasions when Ali left the ring with a bruised and puffy face.

For me personally, I wish Ali had quit the game earlier than he did. But that was his choice.

In Ali's second match with Spinks, in September 1978, an in-shape Ali won back his title in a 15-round decision. He became the first three-time heavyweight champion. Ali was knocked out by Larry Holmes in 1980. In 1981, Ali fought his last bout, losing his heavyweight title to Trevor Berbick. He announced his retirement from boxing the next day.

I admire Ali not just for coming back after being unfairly kicked out of the game during his prime due to his anti–Vietnam War stance—though that was maybe his greatest triumph: coming back and still winning.

There is another more important reason for my admiration. Ali is like Andy Warhol, Jimi Hendrix, Gorgeous George, Madonna, Lady Gaga, Buffalo Bill, P.T. Barnum, The Beatles, Pussy Riot, and the many others who not only have talent but are also not afraid—as most of us are—of taking huge chances, being outrageous, being incredibly bold, and putting oneself before the public in a new kind of way and saying, in effect: "I can back up what I'm showing. Sure, it's entertainment [or ideas] and good enough just for that reason, but there's something more here—something special—take a look."

Pugilism today has fallen by the wayside since Ali. We now have mixed martial arts in a cage as the most popular form. I believe we should just go all the way—send in the lions! More blood for the amusement of the crowd in a gladiator spectacle.

I do not know how long Ali will be with us, and I wanted to write this paean to his boldness before he left us rather than after.

He is a special person, not only for his talent, not only for the art of his craft, but also for demonstrating to us all that it takes only one person to make a difference. One person to stand, as William F. Buckley said, “athwart history, yelling Stop!”

One person who refuses to go to the back of the bus or who, with a small number of friends, demands to sit at the lunch counter and be served.

My friend Staley Green recently wrote to me, remarking on the recent death of former National Organization for Women (NOW) President Karen DeCrow:

> Around 1987, Karen DeCrow provided me with free and very helpful advice in my effort to get fathers’ access to diaper-changing facilities in San Diego Airport and the then-new Nordstrom store in downtown San Diego. She represented a fathers’ rights group on the same issue with the Syracuse, NY, airport. The group which is now the National Organization of Men Against Sexism (NOMAS) decried these efforts towards equality of access to diaper-changing facilities as ‘taking something away from women.’ As it turns out, Nordstrom required no additional persuasion following my initially carrying my baby to their customer service desk and asking: ‘Where can I change my son’s diaper?’ Within months, Nordstrom had a policy of providing a diaper-changing table in at least one men’s restroom in each of their stores. The Port of San Diego was initially recalcitrant, but eventually changed their policy.

Today, of course, there are diaper-changing stations in as many men’s restrooms as there are in women’s restrooms.

Paul Simon says, “Every generation throws a hero up the pop charts.” Every generation is starving for the same. What we lack is boldness. The ability to confront what is not popular. To confront, as Walter Cronkite said, “Our friends and colleagues at the 19th hole. To tell the story that needs to be told if that community, that state, that nation, is to prosper and survive.”

One person, for example, who asks of the domestic violence shelters: Where are the services for men and their children as well as women? (Even the National Violence Against Women Survey—note the title—found that nearly 40% of the victims are men.) How can one practice and support such discrimination? How can corporations and government support organizations such as the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence, which supports and condones such discrimination?

It is a long road to Montgomery or elsewhere, but it is a road that always needs more people on it.

Every generation is faced with challenges. Surely, this generation’s greatest challenge is confronting the Marxist-oriented sexists currently in control of family courts, the legislatures, congress, and campus policies. After all, there are no men’s centers, plenty of women’s centers and even graduate studies “women’s studies” but no men’s studies. Every man is now labeled a potential rapist, and federal government policies insist on the presumption of guilt rather than the presumption of innocence on college campuses throughout the nation. Add to this the new definition of rape from the U.S. Justice Department (provably formulated and orchestrated by the “Feminist Majority,” which removes the word “forcible” from the very definition itself so that more men can be classified as rapist), and we have a long road to travel indeed. Other issues of blatant discrimination also exist, of course, such as the draft, health care, and roadblocks to shared parenting.

What is needed most is simply to show up. Testify, write to representatives, get out from posting just on the net and calling it good enough. We all need to take a cue from Ali and Cronkite and even Lady Gaga and not be afraid to be bold. To put it another way, as Davy Crockett said, “Be sure you are right”—get your facts straight and listen most of all to views opposed to your own—“then go ahead!”

NCFM Vice President responds to criticism about MRAs and the AVfM conference in Detroit

NCFM · 25 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On June 26-28, 2014, I had the pleasure of attending the first International Conference on Men's Issues, sponsored by A Voice for Men (AVfM), in Detroit. Hundreds of people came from around the world, including many women and minorities, to peacefully discuss fathers' custody rights, male victims of domestic violence, false accusations, paternity fraud, and other issues affecting men and boys. The first three speakers were women, including the first black woman on the Canadian Parliament, Senator Anne Cools. The conference was a tremendous success.

But as we expected, following the conference we saw a barrage of yellow journalism in the media that glossed over the issues and focused mostly on stereotyping men's rights activists (MRAs) who organized the event. Monica Hess of The Washington Post distorted everything and called attendees "misfits." Similar yellow journalism came from Jessica Roy of TIME Magazine, Adam Serwer of MSNBC, and others.

A Voice for Men did an excellent job of responding to each of the reactionary writers. But I'd like to add my own response to their argument, commonly directed at MRAs, that feminism is not responsible for any discrimination against men.

To begin with, MRAs made it clear at the conference that they do not blame feminism for all forms of anti-male discrimination. The male-only military draft, and the exclusion of men from the ban on slavery in the Forced Labour Convention of 1930 (Article 11), are examples of anti-male discrimination based on traditional concepts of male disposability, not feminism (although feminists rarely included this in their discussions).

On the other hand, it is indisputable that feminist groups play a major role in discrimination against fathers and male victims of domestic violence. The National Organization for Women (NOW) and other feminist groups have long opposed joint custody laws that would give fathers equal rights. While the Socialist Party in Belgium introduced joint custody laws that were very successful and have reduced conflict between parents in divorce, fathers in the United States are still discriminated against, as professor Cynthia McNeely documents in her law review article, "Lagging Behind the Times; Parenthood, Custody, and Gender Bias in the Family Court." Even as late as the 1970s, bar associations were advising judges not to give custody to fathers.

But discrimination against battered men and their kids especially hits home for me.

I became an MRA back in 1998 while a law student at UCLA. By that time, I had co-founded the Disability Law Society and the Environmental Affairs Committee, both of which are still active today, and was involved in so much public interest work that the Southern Poverty Law Center made me an Honoree on their Wall of Tolerance, co-sponsored by Rosa Parks and Morris Dees.

But something happened during law school that radically changed my life. My best friend, whom I knew since kindergarten, was repeatedly assaulted by his drunk wife in front of their kids, who call me "Uncle Marc," and when I tried to find a shelter for him to go with his kids before someone got hurt or arrested, none of the 25 or so state-funded shelters in the county would help male victims, with the exception of the Valley Oasis shelter, far away in the remote desert city of Lancaster.

I wondered how many other children were being exposed to violence because their dads were being abused and not getting help. So I did my research. I learned that 20% of domestic violence police calls were from men, and I found that Cal State University Professor Martin Fiebert posted an online bibliography of about 300 studies showing women initiate domestic violence about as often as men. In fact, the Centers for Disease Control found more than 1 in 3 women and more than 1 in 4 men are domestic violence victims, and "About 1 in 4 women and 1 in 7 men have experienced severe physical violence by an intimate partner (e.g., hit with a fist or something hard, beaten, slammed against something) at some point in their lifetime."

Clearly, this was a much bigger problem than my friend and his kids.

Then my girlfriend bought me The Myth of Male Power by Warren Farrell, which helped me understand more about this issue. I learned about male disposability and discrimination against men in other areas, as well as how media, academia, and government ignore these issues. I began noticing how feminist professors ignored discrimination against men, such as by discussing criminal sentencing disparities against minorities but ignoring the even larger disparities against men, and talking about racial profiling but not gender profiling. And their lectures on domestic violence and rape were totally biased, with gender-specific language and downplaying male victims.

I started publishing articles in the Daily Bruin and the UCLA law newspaper on these issues. That was not well received by feminists. When I tried speaking with a feminist professor about battered men, she became annoyed and dismissed it as "misogyny."

After graduating, I founded the Los Angeles chapter of the National Coalition For Men (NCFM), a non-profit group that has addressed men's issues since 1976. Our first meeting was at the home of Glenn Sacks, who had been a UCLA student with me and was the only other person publishing articles on men's issues on campus. For the next ten years we offered support to men and fathers, spoke before public bodies, held rallies, drafted legislation to prevent paternity fraud, published hundreds of letters to editors and op eds, filed lawsuits, and did so much activism I cannot possibly list it all.

But it was our work on domestic violence that I'm most passionate about. One of the first things we did was track down the former director of the Valley Oasis, Patricia Overberg, to find out what we can do about discrimination against battered men. She told us that in the 1980s male victims kept coming to her with no place to go, so she designated one of her shelters for men, and as a result she was ostracized by certain shelter directors at the Domestic Violence Council, who would ignore her and omit her comments from the minutes. She advised me to file a lawsuit. And that we did.

But first we tried to change things amicably by attending Los Angeles County Domestic Violence Council meetings and talking about battered men. We even gave men rides to Valley Oasis. While we made a few allies at the council, we mostly faced hostility from feminists who did not want to hear about battered men. Some even told us to build our own shelters, even though men pay at least half the taxes that funded their programs.

We followed the money. And we learned that a state law—written by feminist groups—provided over $20M in funds for domestic violence shelters but explicitly excluded male victims of domestic violence from state-funded services.

So in 2005 we filed a lawsuit against the State of California and a Sacramento shelter that received $4 million a year in state and private funds. The lawsuit challenged the statutory discrimination as a violation of equal protection.

About a year later, a Sacramento judge dismissed the case on the ground that more women than men needed services. So we filed an appeal.

While the appeal was pending, a gay rights group introduced a bill that would make the law gender-neutral. As the bill's analysis says, "Gay men have difficulties finding DV service and shelters which have traditionally been available only to battered women."

But shelter directors made them change it back to being only for women. As the analysis states: "The severe deficiency in funding of domestic violence shelters that provide services to battered women and their children caused an outcry among the existing domestic violence shelter providers."

Imagine the outrage if MRAs introduced a law that excluded female veterans from mental health counseling because the vast majority of combat veterans are men and there is not enough funding for veterans as it is?

Thankfully, in 2008 the Court of Appeal unanimously reversed the order and held that the exclusion of male victims violates men's rights to equal protection and "carries with it the baggage of sexual stereotypes," because "men experience significant levels of domestic violence as victims" (Woods v. Horton). The decision held that if a program cannot mix men and women in the same shelter, they can at least provide a hotel arrangement as well as legal and psychological aid that they already provide to women.

While this was a big victory, many state-funded programs in California still refuse to help men and their children. So, like before, we are first trying to resolve things amicably before filing another lawsuit. Recently we have successfully worked with groups like the Men's Health Network to establish the first official Task Force on Male Victims in the County Domestic Violence Council. That is just a start.

And I will say that, without certain feminists who joined or voted in our favor, the Task Force would not exist. And they are not the only ones who have supported men's rights. There have been many others. Former NOW president and attorney Karen DeCrow openly supported men's rights in child custody and domestic violence services until her death on June 6, 2014. Feminist Robyn Blumner, former director of the ACLU in Florida, has written about how it is men who need the Equal Rights Amendment due to the anti-male discrimination in child custody and domestic violence services.

These feminists certainly deserve credit.

But it was also feminist groups who drafted the discriminatory domestic violence laws to begin with and opposed efforts to make them gender neutral. This is not unique to California. It happens all over the world. A judge in West Virginia, whose ruling was reversed only on jurisdictional grounds,found men were being routinely discriminated against in domestic violence programs. In England, shelter directors resisted helping men even when threatened with the loss of their funding. The federal Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) has portions that explicitly discriminate against men, and its very title is discriminatory.

Imagine if we had a Men's Occupational Safety and Health Act because 92% of job deaths are male.

And these are not the only area where feminists promote sex discrimination. They have downplayed the boy crisis in education, eroded due process rights of college men accused of rape, and spread all kinds of stereotypes about men and boys. In Sweden, feminists tried to create a "man tax" because, they said, men are so violent that they should pay higher taxes. Feminists tried to shut down the conference in Detroit by organizing a rally and making threats against the hotel staff. Thankfully, the Veterans of Foreign Wars in Saint Clair Shores welcomed the conference at its venue and did not fold when feminists called and claimed the conference was a meeting of "misogynists."

If feminists cared about equality, they would join MRAs, or at least engage in sincere dialogue with them, rather than stereotyping and trying to shut down our venues. They would demand equal rights for dads in family court and equal treatment of male victims of domestic violence. They would support commissions on the status of men to address men's well-being and inequalities in suicide deaths, homelessness, job deaths, and discrimination in criminal sentencing and family court. They would stop eroding due process for students accused of rape. And they would stop lying about MRAs.

Maybe when feminist groups woman up on their hypocrisy, MRAs will man up on their occasional anger and rhetoric, which pales in comparison to the systematic discrimination feminists have promulgated

Meanwhile, we are seeing the MRA movement grow all over the globe. One of the most prominent MRA movements in the world is in India, where they face abuse of dowry laws and where apparently only men can be prosecuted for adultery. In Germany, MRAs got the European Union to challenge Germany's law denying unmarried dads' custody rights absent moms' consent. MRAs in the Philippines got a local government to stop ignoring battered men. And MRAs in Austria and nearby nations have successfully lobbied for official government commissions on men's issues.

It took MRAs to make these changes. Nobody else seems to care. And we have a long way to go. But we will never stop, no matter how much name-calling is spewed at us by those who do not want a balanced dialogue on gender. I am forever grateful to NCFM and all other MRAs for their dedicated work in the face of such reactionary hate.

And I give special thanks to A Voice for Men for working so hard to make the conference a success. I hope to see many more of those in the future.

#WomenAgainstFeminism rocks

Paul Elam · 25 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Hear ye, hear ye, feminists — one and all. Welcome to the world of being fucked. And by fucked I mean figuratively, of course, but nonetheless fucked, good and proper, publicly and most definitely without your enthusiastic consent.

In fact, the process of your being ideologically sodomized is about to take place as the whole world watches, the majority of which will be laughing hysterically.

To some it may seem like this is happening overnight. That is not the case. People, the non-bigoted, non-hateful, non-sexist, non-ideological kind — who have an honest interest in the area of equal rights — have been chipping away at every lie, distortion, research corruption, biased law, hate speech, cheap attempts at damseling and outright fraud that have been the hallmarks of modern feminism for quite some time now.

A Voice for Men has gone from a one man blog to a mounting social force in six years, and shows no sign of slowing down. In fact, quite the opposite seems to be the case.

More recent events, however, might add to the misperception that feminism as we know it is "suddenly" transitioning from 'the toast of the town' to just 'toast.'

Women Against Feminism is a Facebook Page that started January 3 of this year. A few days ago it had about 2,000 likes. Then something happened on Twitter. The #womenagainstfeminism hashtag started trending in a big way. There are now over 14,000 likes to the Facebook page, and I am betting that increases exponentially in the very near future.

Simply put, feminists, a whole lot of women are getting sick of your shit and they are through being silent about it.

Uh-oh.

[image]For fifty years, lying hacks from Gloria Steinem to Andrea Dworkin to Jessica Valenti to Amanda Marcotte (and thousands of lying hacks in between) have been claiming to speak for all women, on all matters while generally implying that any woman who disagrees with them must be mentally deficient or brainwashed.

The mainstay of their rhetoric is that women as a class are oppressed and that men are the oppressors (patriarchy); that women are good and men are bad, and of course the Grand Canard: Masculinity is the root of all social evils.

Since a discussion on projection isn't really needed here I will skip it. I will say instead that the future reputation of these women is now certain to be markedly different than they ever imagined it. The house of cards is falling. The sandcastle kingdom is about to be swept away by a growing wave of women who are, more than anything else, just plain weary of being cast as victims and of watching the men and boys they love being cast as demons.

They are just plan sick of the "empowerment through victim identity" meme, and they have had enough of it.

Equally important, they appear to the weathering the expected backlash against them without a care in the world.

Like I said, uh-oh. When your message has become so shopworn and transparently false that it triggers the gag instinct in your intended consumers, then, well, then you are fucked.

This short article, believe it or not, is intended as an invitation to feminists to start doing some damage control, if it is not too late.

I just read an email that was forwarded to me. It originated with someone who called herself an "equity" feminist. The note wavered between sounding quite defensive and sounding like a plea for mercy.

As Women Against Feminism increases its reach, and as other women's and dual sex groups form and grow (which is now literally assured), you will see more backlash on blogs and in the media, as we have already seen of late.

It won't last.

The tone will change from haughty indignation to a more consistent plea for understanding from the masses that feminists are not the evil bigots that so many people are saying they are. (gee, that sounds familiar, eh?)

They will not get that mercy without earning it. That is not some edict that I am issuing from my position at AVFM. I have neither the power nor influence to control how anyone reacts to this. I am simply predicting the social physics of what is about to come.

Feminists, if you desire to not have the public at large see you as bête noire, you have to quit enabling crazy-ass, dangerously hateful feminists with your complicit silence.

Are you one of those "equity" feminists that have never uttered a word about Adele Mercier, Elizabeth Sheehy or Mary Koss? Then be prepared to be tossed into the chamber pot with these basilisks and the numbers of other feminists who simultaneously top out the hate and stupid meters.

Do you think the MHRM hates women? Is that what you write, tweet, Facebook, Instagram, etc.? Then buy some ideological Vaseline, because you are going to need it.

In short, if you are an "equity" feminist, then start advocating some fucking equity. And start taking on your sisters who are getting in the way.

Otherwise expect nothing else than legions more women holding up signs expressing in crystal clear terms why they don't need you or your ideas. And when you start hearing the word feminist uttered publicly in the same derisive tone usually reserved for words like "bigot" and "scumbag," often by women, you will know they are talking about you.

Modern feminism is going to die. It is at least partly up to you whether that death is swift and merciful or slow and infinitely more painful. Either way, it is doomed.

The good news is that once the toxic slime pit of modern feminism is cleared and decontaminated, we will then have a shot at joining men and women everywhere for a movement that makes the word equity actually mean something.

Cassie Watter: Child abuser, child abductor, fugitive, feminist

Greg Canning · 25 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist Cassie Watter came to the attention of AVfM in October 2013 via her male-hating, gender-profiling, and association with the violence-promoting ideologues at the James Cook University School of Social Work. Unknown to us at that time was Watter's history of involvement in family court proceedings.

In April this year, non-identical seven-year-old twin girls Isabella and Bronte Watter went missing after being dropped of at school by their father. It is presumed that they were abducted by their mother, Catherine "Cassie" Watter (nee Doubleday), whose car containing the girls' school bags and uniforms was found abandoned a short distance from the school.

According to family court orders consented to by both parents, the twins resided full-time with their father (that is, the father had sole physical custody), the mother being allowed only supervised contact. Anyone familiar with the gynocentric and gender-biased workings of Australian family law will recognise that such an arrangement is rare and orders of that nature would only be made when the evidence before the court clearly indicated it to be in the best interests of the children.

Details of the family court proceedings are secret and can only be published with the court's authority. It remains open to conjecture why the court would limit Cassie Watter to supervised contact only, but one must assume the court believed non-supervised contact represented a threat to the children's physical and/or emotional well-being. Such a decision is likely to be based on a history of physical or emotional abuse, or the potential for it. Recent events confirm such a presumption to be correct, as Watter's current illegal actions equate to emotional, social, and spiritual abuse of the twins by alienating them from their father, family, and friends, and condemning them to a life in hiding or on the run.

On April 7, the Queensland Police Service appealed to the public for information about the disappearance of the trio and expressed concern for their welfare.

On April 10, the family court made a publication order, under section 121 of the Family Law Act, which included the following statements:

> Fugitive mother of two, Cassie Watter, remains on the run more than a week after she is believed to have abducted her twin daughters from their Townsville primary school. By now, she could quite literally be anywhere in Australia.
>
> The suspected abduction is unlawful and in breach of Family Court orders which Ms Watter consented to and asked the Court to make less than a year ago.
> It is inevitable that someone has seen the trio in their travels, and may even know their present whereabouts. Any assistance knowingly provided to a criminal to avoid punishment is itself a serious crime.

On the Help find Isabella and Bronte Watter Facebook page, the girl's father explained the situation this way:

> These girls have had their lives turned upside down by their mother, most likely with help from other people and organisations, who think what's best for 7 year-olds to live a life in hiding. (sic)
> The girls were living with me by the mother's consent, with the orders sealed by the Family Court, as a direct result of her own choices and harmful behaviours. She had been told to stop it, but she wouldn't or couldn't control herself, which places the children at risk of harm in her care.
> How can they see their friends or make new friends, go to school, or have their own home? Everyone they encounter will be a potential threat. It's no life for little girls to live – please help bring them home!

The twins and their mother remain missing after almost four months. The police believe that Watter had assistance in carrying out her illegal acts and that she is continuing to receive assistance to remain in hiding.

In contrast to other abductions of children in the context of divorce where the abductor is a man, this case seems to have received relatively little media exposure and limited effort by the authorities. It's as if there is a false underlying presumption that because the girls are thought to be with their mother, they are not suffering significant ongoing harm.

What is more bizarre and indicative of a culture of gynocentrism and female entitlement is the number of feminist academics and professionals who have publicly supported Watter. Although they stop short of overtly condoning her illegal behaviour, they imply it is "understandable" and give testimony to Watter's wonderful caring nature whilst failing to publicly call on her to stop her ongoing abuse of the children and turn herself into authorities.

An unidentified "maternal relative" speaking on behalf of the "family" of the twins was reported in the Brisbane Times on May 17 as "hoping the children and their mother Cassie Watter are not found"—a clear endorsement of her illegal behaviour and child abuse.

In the same article, feminist academic Professor Freda Briggs, a supposed expert in child protection, believed Watter's motives were "understandable." "People don't leave their family, home, car, job, possessions and support network for no reason," she said. No, they do not, Professor Briggs, they do it to breach legal orders and perpetrate abuse on children by prioritising their own interests above that of the children and other family members, something a person in your position should unequivocally denounce, not minimise. The rhetoric of "perpetrators must be held accountable for their abuse" is eerily missing when the abuser is a woman.

Similarly, rather than condemn her illegal actions, JCU academic social worker Beth Tinning was quoted as saying, "Mrs Watter appeared to be a capable and devoted mother"—what part of child abduction, emotional abuse, and family alienation is "devoted" escapes me, but yes, she has been proven "capable" of acting with criminal intent.

On July 21, a website in support of Watter, www.friendsofcassiewatter.net , was created, with various testimonials as to what a wonderful and caring person and mother she is. The group responsible for the site is FIN, the Family Inclusion Network Queensland (Townsville) Inc. FIN largely comprises JCU academics and social work students, and one of its aims is to promote family inclusion in the legal and administrative process of child protection. How exactly they equate support for an abuser and alienator of children with that stated aim remains a mystery.

Again, the obvious omission from their page is any suggestion of a plea for Watter to desist in her illegal behaviour. Ros Thorpe, the site contact person, responded to an email enquiry regarding this as follows:

> We support Cassie Watter as a good, sane person, as a loving, committed and protective mother, and as a caring friend. Nothing on the friendsofcassiewatter.net webpage should be interpreted as support for Cassie's disappearance with her daughters as, no matter how much we may empathise with her motivations, this is an illegal act.

The obvious disconnect is between the glowing descriptions of this criminal abuser and the reality of her documented actions. One wonders exactly how these people can "empathise with her motivations" or even know what her motivations are? What motivation justifies criminal abduction, abuse, and alienation of children? Clearly nothing does, and if indeed these are the actions of a "good and sane person," then all the more censure should be placed on Watter.

Whilst her supporters make it all about the mother, the father's supporters continue to speak on behalf of the children, highlighting the harm Watter's behaviour is causing them, harm the family court predicted and attempted to prevent.

Reports in mid-June led the police to conclude that Watter may be hiding out in the northern suburbs of Brisbane, but despite this, she and the twins are yet to be located. There appears to be significant inertia in attempts to do so, which would not exist if the gender of the abductor were reversed.

Meanwhile, the distraught father, extended family, and friends must face each new day wondering if and when the girls will be located and returned whilst the continuing ordeal wreaks its emotional toll on the twins' well-being.

Please visit and like the "Help find Isabella and Bronte" Watter Facebook page and share with all your contacts. If you reside in Brisbane or surrounds, consider printing out and putting up posters available on the page in high-traffic locations. This crime needs to be made more visible to the public in the hope that someone will identify the twins or their fugitive mother, bring the girls home, and allow justice to be served.

It remains to been seen what consequences face Cassie Watter when she is found. Whilst a substantive custodial sentence would be appropriate, one can predict a slap on the wrist is more likely, and this will be based more on her sex than the seriousness of her crimes.

Gynocentric etiquette for men (part 1)

Peter Wright · 25 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpts on the subject of male etiquette are from Etiquette for Gentlemen, Or Short Rules and Reflections for Conduct in Society, published in 1847. While the forms of etiquette may have changed, the underlying principle of service to women remains the order of the day. –PW

"If you see a lady whom you do not know, unattended, and wanting the assistance of a man, offer your services to her immediately. Do it with great courtesy, taking off your hat and begging the honour of assisting her.

"You should never ask a lady at the table to help you to anything, but always apply to the servants. Your first duty at the table is to attend to the wants of the lady who sits next to you; the second, to attend to your own. In performing the first, you should take care that the lady has all that she wishes, yet without appearing to direct your attention too much to her plate, for nothing is more ill-bred than to watch a person eating. If the lady be something of a gourmande, and in over-zealous pursuit of the aroma of the wing of a pigeon, should raise an unmanageable portion to her mouth, you should cease all conversation with her, and look steadfastly into the opposite part of the room.

"If you are walking with a woman in the country, — ascending a mountain or strolling by the bank of a river, — and your companion, being fatigued, should choose to sit upon the ground, on no account allow yourself to do the same, but remain rigorously standing. To do otherwise would be flagrantly indecorous and she would probably resent it as the greatest insult.

"If you speak for a short time to a woman of condition in the open air, intending to leave her immediately, you should remain uncovered unless she desires you twice to put on your hat. If you are walking with women, or standing with them for any length of time, in the air, keep your hat on.

"It is deemed a requisition of good breeding for a gentleman, when paying a visit, or when present at a small party, to stand up when ever the lady of the house rose to pass from one part of the room to another. When the lady rises near you, especially if she has been previously conversing with you, you should by all means rise.

The next sample of expected male etiquette is from 'The Gentlemen's Book of Etiquette and Manual of Politeness Being a Complete Guide for a Gentleman's Conduct in all his Relations Towards Society' published in 1873. – PW

"In the familiar intercourse of society, a well-bred man will be known by the delicacy and deference with which he behaves towards females. That man would deservedly be looked upon as very deficient in proper respect and feeling, who should take any physical advantage of one of the weaker sex, or offer any personal slight towards her. Woman looks, and properly looks, for protection to man. It is the province of the husband to shield the wife from injury; of the father to protect the daughter; the brother has the same duty to perform towards the sister; and, in general, every man should, in this sense, be the champion and the lover of every woman.

Not only should he be ready to protect, but desirous to please, and willing to sacrifice much of his own personal ease and comfort, if, by doing so, he can increase those of any female in whose company he may find himself. Putting these principles into practice, a well-bred man, in his own house, will be kind and respectful in his behaviour to every female of the family. He will not use towards them harsh language, even if called upon to express dissatisfaction with their conduct. In conversation, he will abstain from every allusion which would put modesty to the blush. He will, as much as in his power, lighten their labors by cheerful and voluntary assistance. He will yield to them every little advantage which may occur in the regular routine of domestic life:—the most comfortable seat, if there be a difference; the warmest position by the winter's fireside; the nicest slice from the family joint, and so on.

"In a public assembly of any kind, a well-bred man will pay regard to the feelings and wishes of the females by whom he is surrounded. He will not secure the best seat for himself, and leave the women folk to take care of themselves. He will not be seated at all, if the meeting be crowded, and a single female appear unaccommodated.

"A true gentleman never stops to consider what may be the position of any woman whom it is in his power to aid in the street. He will assist an Irish washerwoman with her large basket or bundle over a crossing, or carry over the little charges of a distressed negro nurse, with the same gentle courtesy which he would extend toward the lady who was stepping from her private carriage. The true spirit of chivalry makes the courtesy due to the sex, not to the position of the individual. When you are escorting a lady in the street, politeness does not absolutely require you to carry her bundle or parasol, but if you are gallant you will do so. You must regulate your walk by hers, and not force her to keep up with your ordinary pace. Watch that you do not lead her into any bad places, and assist her carefully over each crossing, or wet place on the pavement. If you are walking in the country, and pass any streamlet, offer your hand to assist your companion in crossing.

"If walking with a female relative or friend, a well-bred man will take the outer side of the pavement, not only because the wall-side is the most honorable side of a public walk, but also because it is generally the farthest point from danger in the street. If walking alone, he will be ready to offer assistance to any female whom he may see exposed to real peril from any source. Courtesy and manly courage will both incite him to this line of conduct. In general, this is a point of honor which almost all men are proud to achieve. It has frequently happened that even where the savage passions of men have been excited, and when mobs have been in actual conflict, women have been gallantly escorted through the sanguinary crowd unharmed, and their presence has even been a protection to their protectors. This is as it should be; and such incidents have shown in a striking manner, not only the excellency of good breeding, but have also brought it out when and where it was least to be expected.

“Civility is particularly due to all women; and, remember, that no provocation whatsoever can justify any man in not being civil to every woman; and the greatest man would justly be reckoned a brute if he were not civil to the meanest woman. It is due to their sex, and is the only protection they have against the superior strength of ours; nay, even a little is allowable with women: and a man may, without weakness, tell a women she is either handsomer or wiser than she is.

A journey into the ”oppressive” past of women

Kimski · 26 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A field study by a Member of the Royal Anthropology Society, (M.R.A.S.), Sir Kimski.

Over the past century and even long before that, one of the most persistent and enduring claims of the feminist movement has been “the historical oppression of women” perpetrated by men. Anyone capable of reading and comprehending basic English literature can walk into any library and find evidence to the contrary, or at least evidence substantiating the fact that both women and men suffered to an equal extent on our journey towards today’s civilization. Just like today, everyone was living under the iron fist of the ruling class, warlords, kings and queens alike, and just like today, both men and women were the pawns in their political schemes.

In order to prove this point, I decided to establish an expedition to find one of the last hunter/gatherer tribes on the planet, the Asmats of Papua New Guinea, to observe first-hand to what extent this claim of oppression was true. The Asmats were originally discovered by Captain James Cook in 1772 on his expeditions to map the southeastern part of Asia and Australia. They were originally both cannibals and headhunters and, back then, would defend their homesteads with loud noises and projecting bursts of white powder to scare off any unwelcome intruders in their territory. As a consequence of the cannibalism and headhunting, they were mostly left undisturbed, and it was not until the mid-20th century that they came into regular contact with outsiders. The term Asmat is used to refer to both the people and the region they inhabit to this day.

After enduring the mind-numbing preparations, plane travel, queues, misplaced luggage, and all the other discomforts that come with setting up such a task, I finally found myself at the outskirts of the Lorentz National Park, a World Heritage Site. It is the largest protected area in the Asia-Pacific region, home to around 70,000 Asmats, which constitutes their total global population.

What followed over the next one and a half weeks can best be described as a venture into a living, humid “Hell on Earth.” Constant attacks from billions of mosquitos, huge leeches in swamped areas I traversed, and always the threat of mistaking a vine with one of the death adders or taipans that live here. Not to mention poisonous spiders the size of a palm, or the possibility of being crushed under falling tree trunks whenever a soothing wind would blow. Everything there seemed intent on either sucking the lifeblood out of me or killing me if possible. On the third day I had blisters on top of blisters in my hands from the chopping of vines and undergrowth, and sleep became a state of unconsciousness after the fifth day.

Finally, I stumbled into a clearing and realized I had made it: primitive houses made of timberwood with palm leaves as roofs were placed one meter or more above the ground. All of them were placed in a semicircle around an open area in the middle, with a huge fireplace as the central point. It must have surprised them to see a sweaty, exhausted white man walk out of the jungle, which caused everybody, for what seemed the longest moment, to stop dead in their tracks and stare with wide and suspicious eyes on my person. Images of my dried and smoked head on a stick passed through my mind for a second or two. The moment passed as the natives decided I was a welcome presence, and I was blessed to receive a welcome like I have never experienced before.

From my eminently superior research I discovered that:

These tribes practice polygyny, something the missionaries have failed to erase from their culture, where each man is allowed to marry up to seven wives. Given the harsh conditions under which they live, the benefits may not seem obvious to those incapable of recognizing the implications for this male demographic. Of course, bigger families and more offspring provide an increased probability of survival for the individual gene pools, and through cultural taboos as our own, problems of inbreeding are prevented. The male heads of the families are also expected to marry deceased male relative’s wives; otherwise, the women and their children would be left without a source of protection or support. This obligation places an additional strain and amount of responsibility on males of the individual families, forcing them to provide and protect for more than the number of wives he has chosen.

Not too much “historical oppression of women” was found in the tribal customs and male obligations I observed. Quite the contrary. If you take into further consideration that these tribes are also known to wage wars against each other over major or minor disputes, such as the access to the crucial hunting grounds necessary for survival, or revenge wars, it doesn’t take too much imagination to envision a situation where a single male has to provide for what used to be two or three families, with the multitude of wives and children that scenario suggests.

Add to this the aforementioned threats from the jungle when the men go hunting, the likelihood of fights and arguments breaking out between merged families with their extended number of children and wives, and the responsibilities placed on the man by the constant need for resources, and it shouldn’t come as a surprise that the men of the Asmat tribe live significantly reduced lifespans compared with the women. If a man with no brothers should die a premature death, his social responsibilities are placed on his father, an uncle, or his eldest son, regardless of their age.

The sole purpose of the entire Asmat social structure is to ensure the survival of women and children, and as disposable utilities men are the primary means to that end. Nothing has changed over the 100,000 years that divide the two cultures (them and modern Westerners). Men are still the providers and protectors being held accountable by the responsibilities and obligations placed upon them, and the outcome is just as inevitable as it has been through the centuries—including the fact of earlier male deaths.

These hunter/gatherer tribes have lived in much the same way for thousands of years, and are not very far removed from our ancestors way of life in the north—up until some 8,000 years ago when agriculture expanded across the continents as a more productive method to ensure survival. The major differences would be the vastly colder climate and the radical increase in large beasts that could kill you.

There would have been no running around back then for our own ancestors naked and adorned with feathers and bodypaint like the Asmats—the huge difference in average temperatures would have made everyday survival almost intolerable in the northern parts. And we very likely also practiced polygyny to a certain extent. That custom disappeared in part because of religion up in the more northern regions of the planet. One can imagine the strain on the male demographic under those conditions, and with those social expectations and obligations.

Because of the social responsibilities it was and still is necessary for the Asmats to depend on tribal woodcarvings as an additional source of income. Their art is sought by collectors worldwide today, but in the not too distant past, trading cultural artifacts and resource surplus with other tribes would have assured a secondary source of income. The only difference here, compared with our ancestors, would be the trading materials.

So, let’s reiterate what we’ve learned: The average life of a grown male Asmat is a life on the run toward the grave. He lives the first five to six years as most children do, playing and roaming free in the outskirts of the tribal grounds. He then enters the men’s house, where he progressively has less to do with his mother and her consanguineal relatives, where he is then taught to carve woodwork, fish, and hunt. After the rite-of-passage ritual a couple of years later, he works hard on perfecting those skills. If he is not capable of sustaining a family, he won’t get married, and his bloodline will die with him. From sun up to sun down, he is constantly felling trees, carrying trunks of wood to the homestead for woodcarvings or canoes, hunting out in the jungle—sometimes for days away from his family—fishing, carving wood or producing canoes, or waging tribal wars.

Again, there is no significant difference between the male Asmat’s life in the deep jungle today and what the average northern ancestor of any of us had to face, besides the wildlife, the biotope, and the climate. Every archaeological find in the northern hemisphere points to that fact. We would have been more likely to starve, freeze to death, or suffer any number of violent deaths, but that’s just about it. That is when you don’t factor in the added strain of providing in the colder environment, and the more frequent resource wars, of course. You can go to any time period in the history of Homo sapiens, and the social expectations and obligations placed on males will likely be exactly the same.

Let’s have a look at the way the average Asmat woman lives her life:

The first couple of years they live parallel lives with the boys. There's no difference in the way children are raised within an Asmat family, initially. At age five or six, the girls start following a group of women around, from whom they learn skills like cooking, netfishing, botany, growing, harvesting, and processing of the sago palm (from which they get the stipe that remains the dietary staple), and the kind of "needlework" you'd expect in a hunter/gatherer society.

When an Asmat girl comes of age, it is socially expected of her to marry a suitable husband, to continue the bloodline. Their family structures are based on "Yews." [1] The yew is the nexus of Asmat kin and social/ritual organization. It is complemented by a complex yet flexible patri-ambilineal descent system (i.e., one wherein male lines predominate but female lines also are traced and actively recognized). Each yew is divided into named halves or moieties, termed aypim. These moieties are reflected in the positioning of fireplaces within the men's houses. In principle, marriage is yew-endogamous and aypim-exogamous.

At marriage, a woman becomes more closely affiliated with her husband's aypim and takes up residence there. Individual houses are built, occupied, and maintained by extended families in the vicinity of the men's house. The informal adoption of children, even those whose parents remain viable members of the same village, is relatively common. This is perceived to be a means of maintaining "yew balance," which overrides all else to the Asmats.

While not a common occurrence, divorce does take place. Occasionally it is precipitated (in polygamous households) by interwife tensions, but more often it is caused (in monogamous as well as polygamous households) by problems between husband and wife. Problems of the married couple may include physical abuse between partners, and some divorceed have cited inadequate cooking or hunting skills as the primary cause. A woman's return to her original yew and aypim signifies divorce; there is no formal ritual, and the woman is free to leave at any time she may please.

Conclusion:

Somewhere between the eon-old way of life of the Asmats and the beginning of the Industrial Revolution for us, ideologically driven Marxists and also feminists want us to insert "a historical oppression of women" into our interpretations—and that is meant to justify their present-day actions, as well as their hatred of males.

However, the similarities between the way the Asmats live today and how the vast majority of hunter/gatherer societies have lived in our part of the world, up until agriculture and civilization changed everything, makes the "historical oppression of women" blatantly impossible.

First of all: It can't be "historical" for this one reason alone, unless you completely dismiss the greatest part of our history as hunter/gatherers.

Second: If the Asmats way of life and our own archaeological findings are any indication of anything, there simply wouldn't have been the necessary surplus of energy or incentive to oppress anyone. Least of all someone who was free to leave at any given time while still being crucial for you and your children's survival. You simply couldn't remove the female input from the family equation, even if she had provided offspring already, and still expect to survive on equal terms with the rest of the tribe you were a part of.

The reversed scenario has been a historical norm for men, just like it is today.

An International Men's Conference

Dan Moore · 28 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This was something I had been hoping to see for over 15 years. There was almost nothing that could stand between myself and attending. I wanted to meet all the people I had spoken with for so long; that I had debated, commiserated with, had honed my rhetorical and cognitive skills with, both against each other and against our common opponents. It was gratifying to see so much brotherhood (and sisterhood, but more on that in a bit), and after recent events in my own life and the perspective that brings, this event renewed my resolve to make things better.

Better for men, and better for women. Better for humanity, for kindness, for simple human compassion. The women involved, attending, or reporting, served as stark contrast to the stories we so commonly hear of wounding, of cruelty, of sheer narcissism. No better example of NAWALT (Not All Women Are Like That) could serve, in my mind, to illustrate just how twisted our society has become, and the damage it has done to women as well.

The best way to describe the atmosphere was unpretentious and open communication. These women cared, deeply, about men, and boys, and the rift between men and women. They were open, friendly, intelligent, and determined. A better testament to the fact that this whole struggle is worth it escapes my imagination. I don't remember most of the names (I'm terrible at remembering names), but to a woman they were non-judgmental, considerate, and understanding. Not to mention just plain friendly.

In these women, we truly have sisters.

The men around me varied greatly in nearly every aspect. Carnell, while we were having lunch, schooled me on the value of well-framed rhetoric better than any university course ever could. If I could sum up in one sentence the most valuable aspect of the conversation, it would simply be: allow them to take credit for the rope they are using to hang themselves. The correlation being to take care of the rope at your own feet. Yes, he really is as smart and eloquent as a man could hope to be.

Senator Cools and Erin Pizzey sat across the table and down a bit. We spoke for a while about domestic violence, Canadian law, and the trap many men find themselves in when seeking escape, or even simply someone to just listen. We talked of the protective bias in favour of women built into the law, and the unintended consequences of well-meaning legislation. Both were gracious women, measured and almost regal in composure. I was truly in awe of the situation I was in, breaking bread with such people.

That they were in Detroit because they cared about men like me drove home the importance of what was happening.

The speakers and their presentations were important, absolutely. The entirety of them are available on YouTube, you've probably seen, and which I don't need to comment on. Like many others, I spoke with many of them, and my opinions will likely not diverge from those expressed by said others. On a visceral level, to me at least, this conference signified much more than speeches and media exposure.

The dialogue was evident everywhere: men telling their stories, reaching out to other men and openly, with their freaking name right on their chest, offering their support, their pain, their vulnerability, and showing incredible strength in doing so. The loneliness and fear and suffering and futility of it all melted away when we shook hands with the flesh and blood of another man that we knew, deep down inside, understood exactly what we ourselves felt.

This, by happenstance, brings me around to my own personal trepidation regarding the weekend. For two reasons, really. One, I was attending the conference with my girlfriend, who supports what I do but was unaware of many of the issues and sentiments of the MRM. The other was the recent past between myself and Paul, and how I would be received. To be blunt, I've "known" Paul a long time, and I did and said things that hurt that relationship.

Since I sat at a table with a reporter and recounted this, I may as well state things plainly. I spent a lot of years locked in a deep depression, and was rather publicly suicidal a while back. One night, I wrote Paul a quick email from work, stating my intention of killing myself after my shift, and saying goodbye. Paul called the local police, told them what he knew of how to find me, and I spent a couple weeks in the psych ward as a result.

Sure, I was pissed. But I was still around to be pissed off. And I wouldn't have been had Paul not taken my email seriously. Or if the cops had not.

In return, I spat (figuratively) in Paul's face. Needless to say, I wasn't sure my welcome would be warm.

I realize now what I did was essentially start a race to the death with him. A pretty shitty thing to do. Fortunately for me, he passed my unconscious shit test and PROVED he really did care about me that much. And I have no doubt it's not because I'm a snowflake. He would have done that for anyone. And please, don't send Paul suicide notes.

I asked Lauren, my aforementioned girlfriend, what she thought of everything, what stood out for her. What she had to say shocked me, mostly because it hadn't even occurred to me. She pointed out that senators, journalists, and other bigwig types were eating lunch with, and listening to – intently – the unemployed, blue collar, and otherwise "unremarkable" men, treating their opinions and input equally, and with respect. She also pointed out she has been to countless "functions" at least at that level, and she had never seen it before.

I have to admit, looking back, that was 100% true. Heck, the first person to talk to us upon arrival was a friendly gentleman by the name of Roger. We chatted amiably about small topics for a time, then he introduced Senator Cools, whom he has been friends with for many years. You never know who you'll run into at these things, I suppose …

Incidentally, Paul warmly welcomed me, and in fact we got to spend quite a bit of time together. I even almost collected my two beers; unfortunately, that will have to carry over to the next time. In fact, one of the best aspects of this conference for me happened while hanging out with my girlfriend, Paul, Dr. T, the reporter guy, and a guy by the name of Steve Rusch – who was incidentally a great help, and very interesting company. He drove us all over the area, obviously tired and elated, saving us ungodly cab troubles getting from place to place. He even drove home five hours after staying up all night, dropping us off at the hotel beforehand. As I implied, the camaraderie was almost palpable.

But I'll get into that in a bit.

I would be remiss in not mentioning that I got to meet Dannyboy, and Greg Canning, Karen Straughan, Alison Tieman, Victor Zen, Terrence Popp, Dean Esmay, Vladek Filler, Barbara Kay, Stefan Molyneux, Warren Farrell, Al Martin (TMOTS), Anil Kumar, and way too many other high caliber MRAs for my poor brain to account for just because I was in the freakin' room. So, excellent value for the money just for that alone.

And meeting relative newcomers was equally gratifying, I was continually struck by the intellectual depth of the people there. Not just the panelists, but the men and women attending, the level of the discourse was orders of magnitude above what is common to the mainstream. Basically, there were a bunch of smart people there, not all of which mounted the podium.

For example, Marc Angelucci, a man personally responsible for a couple of victories the MRM claims, was not a speaker, but attended. In truth, there were many like him in the audience, people who could easily have been giving a presentation. James Huff being another notable one.

That's the level of talent on display. If you take anything away from this article, let it be this: there could have been five times as many speakers at this event and all of them would have been interesting and engaging. That is the depth and breadth of the caliber of the people who see value in standing up for men's rights.

Sure, there's a lot of resistance to the concepts and demands we present. But we are getting through. The media presence, and the articles written, attest to this fact. The general tone is "look at these crazies," sure, but read the undertone and you'll see most of the objection is failure to "see the other side" and reaction to the alien concept of criticism of politically correct concepts. And sometimes there is the reluctant admission we may just have a point or two, and we may not be completely nuts about everything. And to the non-feminist reader, far from being an indictment, they read that as an advertisement, with their “outrage” at not believing obvious bullshit the prime accusation against MRAs, it’s a backhanded compliment in reverse.

The young reporter at TIME comes to mind here.

But people are curious. They are paying attention more and more. For instance, I met a young lady who attended the conference simply because she was curious enough about the whole controversy to buy a ticket and hop in her car. She said her friends told her she was likely to get raped or assaulted, that she should be afraid to come, that we were all misogynists and extreme.

I met her while sitting in Paul’s hotel room, with Dr. T, and reporter guy, and Lauren, after the conference was over. We were enjoying a drink or two, and here she was, in the belly of the beast and an alcohol-fueled one no less. Paul Elam, right over there.

She looked perfectly comfortable to me, chatting with Lauren, not 10 feet from Mr. Misogyny himself. And in a hotel room, “alone” no less. I could be mistaken, or she could be a clandestine reporter or something … point is, none of us cared. You’re civil? Friendly? Come on in, have a mudslide. She was also, by the way, thoroughly pleasant.

Paul said something that night that stuck with me, that the men’s movement is about building bridges between men and women that were not made of bullshit or balsa wood, and I couldn’t agree more. I do think its more than just the MRM, which is why I think other “manosphere” aspects need to be included, but this was a better “start” than I had any hope to ask for. Thankfully, the people attending confirmed for me it was possible, and worthwhile.

I suppose closing thoughts are in order for the next one, considering it’s an inevitability: I can see this expanding to encompass many more viewpoints, from within as well as without the manosphere, because the Red Pill is first and foremost about unvarnished truth. I can also see a whole lot more interest from high-profile people, simply because we showed we had principles, we were going to stand by them come Hell or high water, and we didn’t shrink from scrutiny or smear. We stood our ground.

And even famous people have to admire that.

The sweet nothings of feminism illuminated by #WomenAgainstFeminism

August Løvenskiolds · 28 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What do you give up when you become a feminist? What do you gain?

When I "came out" as an atheist I forswore certain behaviors – I eschewed prayer because it seemed pointless to pray to a god I didn't believe in. I don't celebrate holidays – I work Christmas, Easter, and in fact, all days. I'm not perfect at this – around Thanksgiving and Christmas I do find that I take on a bit of the holiday cheer of the good folks around me and I use my entertainment venue to have potluck dinners for those orphaned adults who otherwise would have to spend the day alone. On the whole, though, I try to live my life in ways that are consistent with a naturalistic worldview that discounts the idea of supernatural hokum.

Likewise, when one becomes a Christian one is also expected to change – for example, one is expected to forswear/avoid sinning (or maybe, one tries to avoid sinning, or at least one pretends to feel bad about it after sinning). One eschews those behaviors sanctioned by the ten commandments, or the other ten commandments, or maybe even the other-other ten commandments. In any case, voluntarily joining a group usually means that one takes on certain markers of that group, and avoids other contrary markers. If I were to become, say, a Catholic priest it would undercut my status as an Atheist, just as a Catholic priest who openly exults in whoring, illegal drugs and marriage would find his ass up for defrocking at some point, one would hope.

Lately, the posts by the delightful and insightful women of the Tumblr Women Against Feminism, (WAF), and the counterclaims by feminists that the WAF don't understand feminism, have led me to the question of just exactly what are the behaviors and markers of feminist women that set them apart from anti-feminist women? And indeed, do feminists actually practice the equality that they preach?

Her sign reads: "I don't need feminism because they reject femininity but try to feminize men, and demand equality but ask for special treatment."

1. Feminists value free stuff over "equality". Although the idea of men providing for women violates the fundamentals of gender equality, feminists will happily shit all over equality for a free meal.

In a recent article in Bustle, Maria Yagoda writes approvingly that "I have a friend who, like me, is currently contending with this issue. She put it quite eloquently. 'I think the reality is that I am totally a feminist — I just really, really like free stuff. And if culturally accepted double standards facilitate me receiving said free stuff, I'm probably just gonna roll with it.'"

So, this "friend", like Yagoda herself, will happily act "ignorant" about her own feminist ideals in order to get the "special treatment" that the WAF are bright enough to discern is the true core of feminism – a greed that feminists cloak with appeals to "equality" and dictionaries.

Yagoda rationalizes her greed by claiming that she is entitled to free food because of the (totally debunked) wage gap – and Yagoda doesn't carry the thought far enough to figure out that if feminists deserve free food, then the men providing that food deserve to be paid more than her so that they can afford to procure it. Duh.

To me, the only woman here ignorant of feminism is the feminist Maria Yagoda herself. Maybe that is too harsh, my calling her ignorant – she could just be a hypocrite or a liar,I guess.

Of course, the best-known recent feminist demander-of-free-stuff-&-equality-be-damned is the infamous slattern Sandra Fluke in her brazen quest for free birth control in lieu of personal vagina control. As with Yagoda, Fluke parrots the "equality" line but there is nothing equal about the special privilege of women getting free stuff from men.

Her sign reads: "Children are dying EVERY DAY because their parents can't afford treatment. Tell me again about your Birth Control "Crisis" #Priorities #IDontNeedFeminism".

2. Feminists value "choice" over equality, 3. Feminists value women making traditionally masculine choices over feminine choices, & 4. Feminists value deflecting blame onto men over just about everything.

I placed the discussion of these three markers together because feminists often confuse them and it is time that someone mansplained to feminists just how crazy it makes them look to everyone.

First, consider the question of personal grooming – while feminism hypothetically frowns on both the removal of body hair and the application of makeup as oppressive elements of a sexist, patriarchal society, these markers of liberation are not enforced systematically, or really, much at all.

A post on the blog The Belle Jar, entitled Shaving Your Legs Is Not Feminist (But You Can Still Be A Feminist And Shave), illustrates this conundrum nicely – shaving is a feminist sin but feminists still shave anyway. The excuses that relieve the feminist of any responsibility for following her own fucked up ideology might be the "sexist expectations of society" (who the fuck cares?) or maybe "internalized misogyny", but the result is the same: the laudable goal of "equality" is smothered in the womb by deflecting equality into "choice", and then, choice into "preferred choice" (a preferred choice is no choice at all), then preferred choices into actual choices, and then, the actual choices back into the blaming of society – a society controlled by the evil patriarchy of MEN.

This is a nuanced and convoluted trail that nevertheless the WAF grasp easily but the feminists are seemingly blinded to it by their own privileges. That's why the WAF hold signs like this:

"I don't need (modern) feminism because the world needs equality, not superiority. How would people react if 'masculism' became a thing? NOT WELL. Feminism isn't about women's rights anymore. It's about protecting women no matter what, and making men appear to victimize us, and that isn't right."

Right on, you are, waif, and thank you for having the courage to speak out about it.

The Big, Fat, Ugly, Sweet Nothing

Even as feminists try to debunk WAF the feminists are inadvertently exposing their own uselessness – the WAF thrive without feminism because they can do everything feminists do without hating or blaming men for those times when they fall short of their goals. Even better, WAF can celebrate and enjoy their own lives whereas feminists are always looking for their next complaint.

A little searching and you can find feminist weddings (although weddings are sexist in feminist thought), feminist makeup, feminist porn, feminist Christianity, even feminist cupcakes – all the trappings of the patriarchy that feminists say they want to smash have been incorporated into the lives of feminists themselves. A nominal shell of feminism exists in those spaces because feminism has become nothing more than a wretched excuse for inept women to deflect personal blame for their uselessness onto others.

Even the "bra-burning" of feminism is a myth because that would require feminists to have to figure out how to make the patriarchal construct of "fire", a difficult task that is also a threat to the safety of women.

Although, I admit, I am still looking for the WAF post that says something like “I don’t need feminism because I like my pretty bras too much to pretend to burn them.”

When the last mask is ripped off the last feminist, what will we find? A shaven, bloated tapeworm writhing in the sunlight and melting away into a gooey heap of nothingness.

At least nothing of worth will be wasted on that happy day.

Mourning the death of hate through #womenagainstfeminism

August Løvenskiolds · 28 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It didn't take a wooden stake, or a silver bullet, or a fire at the Designer Shoe Warehouse, but the hashtag proved mightier than the hags, and feminism is now mortally wounded and dying, one exposed lie at a time.

Shaken by their mauling in a Tumblr by thousands of attractive women who call themselves "Women Against Feminism" (WAF), feminists worldwide are gulping in fear and hanging their heads in disbelief and shame. Sometimes, it seems, the good guys and gals win after all. But some questions linger, and we've been mulling it here in the back-channel discussions at AVfM: what happens next, and where do we go from here?

The Stages of Grief

In 1969, Elisabeth Kübler-Ross, in her book On Death and Dying, posited that there were a series of stages to the process of grieving. The stage concept perhaps oversimplifies the grieving process—in reality, people may cycle through the stages in varying orders and reiterate the series of stages many times, but the stage concept can serve as a useful guide to understanding the reactions of feminists and where those reactions will inevitably lead them.

Despite their narcissism and boundary issues, feminists are still human enough that they can be expected to grieve in universal human patterns.

Stage 1. Denial/Disbelief

The first and most common response by feminists to WAF has been shock, surprise, disbelief, and denial that their beloved ideology is being savaged by the very same women it was supposedly designed to "liberate" (control).

xoJane's Emily McCombs, who is 31 and a bit plump (Not Safe For Bulimics), has a porcine denial style that is framed in terms of her own hot-young-women-are-stupid misogyny; she writes:

> For the past few weeks, the Internet has been collectively rolling its eyes at the "Women Against Feminism" Tumblr, in which (mostly young, mostly white) women hold up signs describing exactly how much they don't > understand what the word feminism means.

McCombs is so stunned by WAF and their death knell to feminism that she cannot rationally fathom that a feminist calling women stupid is not helping the feminist idea that women are NOT stupid—she is lashing out in denial, not reason—although it could be that her new diet just might be making her cranky.

Here is one of those supposedly ignorant WAF women—so dumb that she has THREE science degrees:

Charlotte Alter, writing in the formerly great TIME magazine, is also wrestling with her own feelings of surprise and denial:

> It's no surprise that the 89 year-old [Phyllis] Schlafly feels this way. But it is somewhat surprising that a small, yet vocal group of young women has started to echo her rallying cry, first on a Tumblr, then on Facebook (with over 11,000 likes) and now with the adorable #womenagainstfeminism hashtag. Most of the posts include some reiteration of the central misunderstanding about feminism, that a core belief of feminism involves hating men.

Of course, Alter's denial is such that she can't quite connect the dots that all feminism is based on the loopy Patriarchy Theory—that all men have oppressed women throughout history and that the inevitable conclusion is that feminists hate men—feminism's core beliefs inevitably lead to misandry. WAF are smart enough to see that clearly; Charlotte, hmmm, not so much.

Stage 2. Anger

Hot on the high heels of denial comes the open anger when the feminists see The End staring them right in their unshaven pits.

Madeleine Davies at Jezebel was particularly unhinged, and her petty attempt at satire was betrayed by her seething anger:

> When I'm dating someone, I'll sometimes make two sandwhiches and go to hand my dude one of them, but then, right as he's about to take it, I'll throw the sandwhich out the window and make him watch as a stray dog eats it instead. I don't even want to do it and both of us feel bad while it's happening because I have a sandwhich, the dog has a sandwhich and the man I'm with doesn't have a sandwhich. But I do it anyway. For feminism.
> (Also, am I spelling "sandwhich" right? I can't tell.)

Now, anger can be a good thing, particularly anger at an injustice, but Davies' rage is a blind assault on the universe for daring to disobey her.

Kaili Joy Gray at the formerly relevant Wonkette, went even more crazed:

> But actually, I support these ladies who are against ladies who support ladies. If they would like to opt out of all the equality handouts they don't need in the first place, good. Who even wants to share all of our awesome misandrist powers and privileges with them anyway? We are thiiiiiiis close to killing the patriarchy forever with our overabundance of "rights" and "equality," and once we do, I don't think any of the ladies who are for ladies will want to take governing advice from ladies against ladies who are ladies. Let them stay home and make sammiches. When we eradicate men forever, we ladies who are for ladies will probably be hungry.

Good luck with that, Kaili.

Stage 3. Bargaining

Emily McCombs uses her rationalization hamster to deflect her own bargaining and project it onto WAF. McCombs argues that maybe the stupid WAF women with multiple degrees will grow up to hate men like she does:

> Looking back, I can see that my subconscious strategy for coping in a sexist society was to align myself with men, to avail myself of their considerable powers of protection, to get what I could from them using the only weapons readily available to me — my body, my charm, my femininity and my compliance. By gaining the approval of those in charge, I hoped to gain access to the perks and opportunities of masculinity.

Unlike McCombs, who had no modesty nor intelligence to add to her body-charm-femininity-compliance, WAF are not bargaining for acceptance—they already have it; they do not find whatever sexism there might be in society to be onerous, and they do not blame men for their choices in life. They have chosen the pursuit of happiness over the lust for the perpetual outrage that is the only real and bitter fruit of feminism.

Charlotte Alter has a bargaining style that is somewhat different; she prays to the wealthy Goddess Beyoncé to save her:

> But there will always be some women who don't understand feminism, just like there will always be some people who deny global warming. There's no use getting all worked up over a few stragglers who haven't gotten on the bandwagon. So let's just try to nip this in the bud. Sorry, Phyllis Schlafly, but feminism is here to stay: [photo of Beyoncé mimicking the pose of "Rosie the Riveter"].

Alter, of course, neglects to mention that Rosie the Riveter gave up and quit being a riveter after just two weeks on the job because she was scared the machinery might nip her delicate lady hands in their buds.

This stage of feminist mourning, bargaining, as well as the stages of denial and anger, are the three stages that most of the mourners find themselves cycling through right now, bouncing through denial-anger-bargaining over and over again. Their efforts will become magnified—increasingly febrile, hostile, angry, violent, and weaselly until their worldviews shatter completely and they go from hysterics into depression.

Stages 4. Depression & 5. Acceptance

Once the feminists start burning out on their useless rage and bargaining, inevitably, they will progress through depression and on to acceptance of their new lives as former feminists. I cited a feminist named Caitlin Elam in my previous article who has already done just that—on July 17 she wrote that she was still a feminist, but by July 22 she was done with feminism, just as Rosie the Riveter jumped ship when she realized the damage she was risking by engaging with a violent partner assigned to her by feminism.

Stage 6. Revenge

Although Elisabeth Kübler-Ross didn't mention it in her book, there is a final stage of grief—revenge—the spreading of grief in reply to those who caused you grief. Once freed from the violence of feminism, the newly hatched anti-feminists will turn on their former tormentors with the glee that comes from real freedom—and most of all, revenge is a sammich best served icy cold.

Show or Tell: Why the Ray Rice video must be released or explained

Ty Henry · 28 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's hard to say which abhors a vacuum more: nature or sports media.

The latter has made a compelling statement during the saga of a certain NFL running back, and like a mob seeing a dead child, silence is not an option–especially when a partial visual has such power to inflame passions and percolate bloodlust.

This past week, Baltimore Ravens running back Ray Rice was penalized two games for an incident on Valentine's Day, which resulted in him carrying the limp body of his fiancée, Janay Palmer, from a casino. Broken by TMZ, the video clip of the exit went viral, joining Rodney King and the "nanny child abuser" in infamy. After both he and Palmer were arrested, Rice was charged with felony aggravated assault, which was later reduced, and ordered into a diversionary program. The announcement of the meager suspension sparked a fury of protest, nearly causing social media to melt from the heat.

Sports On Earth's Tomas Rios, The Nation's Dave Zirin, New York Times columnist LZ Granderson, and Yahoo!'s Dan Wetzel, just to name a few, went apoplectic. The consensus of the cacophonous chorus was "How callous of the NFL, not to send a message that Violence against Women will not be tolerated? They had a chance to send a message and failed."

However, according to sources of ESPN's Chris Mortenson, and even some known to Stephen A. Smith, Ray Rice did not knock out Palmer. Rather, with a defensive blow, he drove her backward and she hit her head on a wall or railing.

So who's right?

Baltimore Ravens' running back Ray Rice & NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell
Well, as ESPN's Jonathan Coachman and Jason Whitlock rightly point out, like the dead child, the only way to answer that question is to account for the block of time leading up to the infamous "Elevator Drag," a block of time only police, prosecutors, the principals, and NFL investigators are privy to.

Either the Atlantic County Prosecutor must release the entire video or NFL Commissioner Roger Goodell must come before the public and explain what was in that video. One should result in jail time, and no one should shed a tear if it leads to Rice's career going poof, exiled like Chad Johnson.

The other falls into the category of "assumed risk." You know, kind of like the end result of poking a ground nest of yellow jackets with a short stick, sans bee suit. No tears need be shed for anyone who suffers a bump on the head as a consequence of an attack on another adult human being.

Far too many women in this culture see a penis as peremptory forfeiture of self-defense rights. The "Grrrrl Power" train can become a Crazy Train, and crazy trains are subject to going off the rails. I don't know if that's the case here, and neither does sports media, but that's the point that brings us back to vacuums.

That's not to say sports media gets it right even without a vacuum. They have little moral authority in the realm of sexual and gender politics, as their selective indignence is far more pronounced and nauseating than the general media, as I pointed out last year.

Indeed, just this past year, Tennis Hall of Famer Martina Hingis's return to the winner's circle was celebrated, while her alleged coordinated beating of her previously cuckolded husband went unquestioned, not to mention unpunished, the allegations having vaporized inside some Swiss legal Bermuda Triangle, the journalistic trail spookily ending the day before Halloween. That's on top of "Baseball Wife" Anna Benson getting probation for busting into husband Kris's apartment to rob him and chasing him from it, armed like Duke Nukem or one of The Expendables, and stalker Jennifer Capriati getting her charges dropped by prosecutor Dave Aronberg after sitting with sick kids for two days. No word on whether Jennifer was required to change their bedpans. Nary a peep, let alone the invocation of the phrase "domestic violence."

Heck, in a year where there were multiple cases of them behaving badly, even molesting kids, and getting a pass, ESPN's "Outside The Lines" only exposé of NFL cheerleaders was about their admittedly exploitative compensation arrangements.

Indeed, there is ample evidence to suggest Ray Rice is more Rayon McIntosh than Tony Farmer. Exhibit A is Palmer's much lampooned "apology" for "her part" in the incident, flippantly (and thoughtlessly) dismissed by sports pundits, or blasted as a betrayal of victims everywhere, despite her arrest at the same time.

Exhibit B is the report by ESPN's Chris Mortensen, TV's most reliable and trusted NFL media source, breaking the news on how the blow came about.

Exhibit C is the date and venue; it's possible that Rice took his fiancée to the most surveilled of businesses on Valentine's Day with the sinister plan to begin his career as a wife-beater, in order to effectively end his more lucrative vocation, but it's doubtful.

Exhibit D is the "sentence" itself, from a man widely recognized as a "hangin' judge" in far more trivial matters, and who suspended an NFL quarterback on uncharged rape allegations.

However, asking the questions requires Socratic work. Mass I Am Legend-style hive-rage is so much easier, especially in a vacuum. That is indeed the purpose of investigations: to fill the vacuum by asking questions, making findings and disclosing them. A child could be dead in the hot car because Mommy had a seizure and passed out or because Mommy tried on multiple outfits from Victoria's Secret's clearance selection. A few camera shots and a medical finding is all that's necessary to figure out circumstance and, ergo, culpability.

NFL investigators missed the last step. Absent the visuals of what they saw, sports media, in its hubris, filled the vacuum, lighting the Patriarchy/VAWA kindling, with predictable results. The resultant brush-fire threatens to scorch the profit-verdant Eden that is the NFL Empire. Water cannot contain this fire. Only the retardants uttered by Commissioner Goodell or disclosed by the Atlantic County Prosecutor can. That is why it's imperative that the interior elevator video contents be revealed. Should the video show what some assume it will show, Ray Rice should be done for at least half the season, if not longer, and deserves to squirm. The Baltimore Ravens, remember, can still suspend or even cut him. On the other hand, should it show an act of self-defense, the squirming will be of those forced to confront head on the depth of their disregard for the basic human rights of adult human beings to neutralize attacks of other adult human beings on their person.

Fred Jones: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Dr. Fred Jones · 28 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: We will over the next few weeks continue to present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues. Fred Jones was our fifth speaker on Day 1, on June 27 2014. All speakers can be seen in their entirety here. Our thanks again to Rick Westlake for doing the hard work on making these transcriptions.

Please note that Adam Serwer of MSNBC misled a national audience about this presentation, as he did with some other presenters. We have yet to see a retraction or an apology from Serwer or from his bosses at NBC Universal, to Jones or to the attendees he so hatefully smeared, or to the readers he lied to. We won't hold our breath; dishonest spin rules the day in the corporate media world. Still, here's Jones' terrific speech. Our best wishes for his family, and our thanks to Dr. Jones for coming in as a last-minute replacement speaker for another who could not make it. Jones wowed us all with his message of enthusiasm and hope amidst pain and tragedy. –DE

(Carnell Smith, introducing Dr. Fred Jones.)

Dr. Fred Jones is a US Supreme Court attorney. In 2010, he was the personal attorney for his uncle, Otis McDonald, in a Second Amendment landmark case where there were more amicus briefs filed by US legislators in both parties—there had been more of them filed than in the history of the United States. Fred is the author of An Act of Bravery: Otis McDonald and the Second Amendment. However, Fred's proudest moment is that he got custody of his two sons in his divorce and raised them to adulthood.

His driving force was to pursue custody, to be like his dad, that stayed married to his mom for 67 years.

And he is the publisher of Father's Voice Publishing Company; the author of five books. The star book is About My Father's Business: The Wisdom of Mose Jones. He dedicated it to his dad. He's a speaker and a life-coach; he is the Professor of Law and Ethics for many years at Kennesaw State University; he is the Chair of the Division of Human Behavior; he's the Chair of Quality Enhancement for Sachs; he teaches Criminal Law, Civil Law, and he is an Intellectual Property junkie.

And if you will help me welcome to the stage my dear friend, who will speak about "The DNA of a Champion: How to Win as a Father"—Dr. Fred Jones.

(Applause. Dr. Fred Jones takes the podium.)

Wow. That's all I know to say is, Wow.

Paul, thank you for the opportunity to be here. Carnell, thank you. The way I got here is, my commitment was to Carnell. I was going to come and just carry his bags. That's the truth! I came to help Carnell, you know, after we heard about the opposition and everything; and so I said, Man, you don't need to go by yourself. I said, Let me go with you. So then, someone got hold of my résumé, and read my website, and decided that they wanted me to be here. I actually have notes somewhere…

Thank you … Men, I want you to do something for me. I want you to do it intentionally. I want you to take a moment and give yourselves a hand-clap—men and women, all together. Okay, let's just give ourselves …

(Leads a round of applause.)

This journey is not easy and — but we can win. Go with me for a moment:

It was May 8th, 1991. I got up that morning, got ready to go to law school to take my Family Law final exam. Came home, after taking the final exam, and my wife at that time had packed up her stuff, and she was gone for a trip to New Orleans. And I didn't know where she was, for the entire weekend. That was on a Friday. Sunday comes along, that's Mother's Day. We had two boys at the time, young boys, elementary and middle school, and the rest unfolds from there.

I want to talk to you about the DNA of a champion. The title is "How to Win as a Father," but it's how to win as men. When that thing unfolded, something just came to me; I knew about our system, in Louisiana and America; America leads the world for incarcerating — for incarceration, period. We lead the world for incarceration. And yeah—we're number 17 on education! 17—but number 1 on incarceration. So I knew that those two boys, if they were going to have any—let me put it like I really felt it: if they were going to have a snowball's chance in hell, I knew I needed to do something. And, sure enough, the wheels began moving.

How to win as a champ—how to win as a champion. I'm going to try to bring my "B" speech, today: I'm going to Be Sincere, Be Brief, and Be Seated. I'm going to try not to use all of this time that they've given me, okay? So, you all go ahead and loosen up a little bit, and then we'll get this done!

So, here's the problem: I knew the jail system—cultural bias, that's what you put me down for, cultural bias. Come on. I have to dress up to go through Mississippi! And that ain't no—that ain't—that's no joke—still! I mean, I wear a coat and tie, that's my uniform, just regularly, all the time, you know. I need to look some, you know, because if I just go casual, they just, you know, that's just—whatever, you know what I mean?

All right. Let me, let me—let me get going, all right, 'cause—We'll do this now. [hand clap]

The problem: Custody. Divorce. I'll make it real easy: I didn't know what I was doing when the mom left, and the boys—the family didn't make it. Now, I'm not blaming her, or none of that, okay? I'm done with all of that. She was a smart mother. She and I agreed, and she allowed me to rear the boys. From elementary and middle school, all the way to adulthood. And I had the privilege of raising my boys because I wanted to be like Daddy. And Dad—when, growing up as a boy … I remember one thing Daddy said; I remember a lot that Daddy said, but this is one: "I'll go through fire for my children."

Mose Jones classic. And he lived it! Fourteen of us, nine girls, five boys — all of us graduated from high school, eleven of us got a college education. Mom and Dad—Dad had an eighth-grade education, Mom had a third-grade education; so they completed high school all together. That's twelve years.

(Applause.)

But I was in Atlanta, sitting at 832 Powells Ferry Road, trying to decide if Rose's going to get the boys or if I'm going to get the boys. And she'd already said I could raise them. I was trying to make that decision. And I remember talking to a lawyer; and I was thinking, Do I follow my career now and let her have the boys, or do I get them? And I remember Jo Flemings, a lawyer; she said, "Fred, what are you going to do—just let your boys go? Or are you going to take them, or get them, or are you just going to let them go?" And sure enough, we agreed, and I got the boys.

There are three things I want you all to keep in mind—I'm just here to encourage everybody today:

Three things to keep in mind, for the DNA of a champion.

Number one: you've got to know your cause. Have a good cause. All the lawyers in here, you know, in order to bring a case you've got to have a cause of action. And every one of you are here because we've got a cause. And that cause is our family; that cause is our children. And that cause is what drives you. I'm reminded of a story: When the Israelites were fighting the Philistines, and David's family was out there at battle—you remember that little story? He said, "Is there not a"—what? A cause, okay? The cause is what wakes us up in the morning; the cause is what puts us to sleep at night.

So, when I write books, I write books just for a hobby; it's fun, I like to write them to tribute people—About My Father's Business: The Wisdom of Mose Jones, that's the first book I wrote. I wrote it so fast—actually, I wrote it about three years. It took a while to get it all together. But to get it printed—my whole family was coming to Atlanta, and the person I was working with hadn't done anything with the material that I'd given them. And two weeks before my fourteen siblings and Mom and Dad come to Atlanta, I had nothing to present! And I founded this online company, and I learned publishing in 2006.

Okay—I had a cause. You follow what I'm saying? I had something to drive me. Okay? The cause! The cause is key.

Number two: Courage. Now, I know we hear all about courage, be strong, have a good courage, courage, courage, okay? I'm going to turn to 2010 now, when I went to the United States Supreme Court. Otis McDonald, anybody heard that name? Really? Okay, a few, a few. Otis McDonald, any gun-rights—all your gun-rights people know Otis McDonald, okay? Chicago and the whole nine yards. Uncle Otis used to have a saying. I went just to help him, I'm a helper. Otis had a saying; his saying was, "If you haven't found something you would die for, you have not yet lived." (Enthusiastic applause.)

So—for me, my family's worth dying for. I heard one of the speakers say, You take away a man's family, and everything else about him is just—down. I want to encourage you, those of you who are in the trenches going through legal stuff: Keep the courage! You follow me? Just stay there, keep the courage. And that's what I did, in rearing the boys, okay? And then I made the comment about Dad saying if you hadn't found something—Dad saying he would go through fire for his children.

Now, me, my story of raising my two boys, it wasn't easy. I mean, when I went through my divorce in Louisiana, I moved to Atlanta, Georgia. Well, I didn't have any family in Atlanta. I had nobody to help me, nobody to support me. And I had never prayed and looked for resources so hard. And then one of my cousins came and stayed with me for a couple of months, in Atlanta, in Marietta, and that's when I kind of got my feet moving under me, and we and the boys—we survived. It was some tough years, but we survived.

But the thing I enjoy about it, right now, is, one of my favorite Twitter followers is who? One of my sons, you see? And one of my other ones, he's a creative, gifted type; he's still working on his story. You follow what I'm saying? Yeah, he's still working on it. He's still pulling it together. I've been with him—and, ah, you know, the thing about that one, and I'll just kind of keep my—I know we've got videos and cameras, so I'll just keep it like "that one" and talk about the two in general, because none of this is private … I'm a lawyer now, I realize that everything is pretty much public.

But I remember the darkest day in that one's life was when he went to jail down in New Orleans. And I'm like, Lord have mercy, New Orleans jail—anybody know anything about New Orleans jails? I mean, some of the worst in the world. You don't want to go to jail in New Orleans, okay? And then I'm up in Ohio someplace and I got a phone call from one of the other persons in the jail, telling me about my son, saying that he needed help and they're picking on him—you'd have to know this one, he's kind of small and kind of cute and good-looking, you know what I mean? You know what they do with—okay, hello.

(Nervous, uncomfortable laughs.)

I didn't sleep well that night. But finally I figured, You know, I'd have to kind of let him go … but I made my way to New Orleans, and they got him moved, to make a long story short.

But the thing about that son is, he … I found out at one point that he was … what do you call it, bipolar? And, man oh man, you know, that was the ride. That was the ride. I mean, just going through all of that with him, and hanging in there with him, and I'm glad to say I haven't heard any bad news here lately. You follow what I'm saying? He's still staying positive, and I'm very thankful for that.

(Loud applause)

So—an act of bravery. And that's courage, right here. Family, right here, was the cause. Courage, right there. Family is also a big cause for me, as I said earlier—family and friends united. I got all fourteen of my sisters and brothers to come together with me, and ride to Atlanta, Georgia, last year to produce a CD of songs and stories about our mom and dad. We sit around and tell jokes. And I did all of that without a contract, without a fight, and—of course, I had to pay for it all, but it's my product. But we all did it together. Isn't that phenomenal? Fourteen sisters and brothers came together to do that. Okay?

Now, I want to close by talking about my final point: it is commitment. Okay? Staying committed. This kind of movement here, we need to all stay committed, okay? I want to encourage you all to dig in deeper than ever—Matter of fact, I go to a lot of events and stuff, and I do stuff—I'm a pioneer, I do stuff by myself the first time; I don't wait for permission or nothing. And I have a lot of admiration in my heart for anybody that puts something together for the first time. Hello, somebody!

(Loud Applause.)

Come on, come on, do a little better than that! Come on!

(Louder applause)

Okay, my time is probably up.

Because people generally are negative, and they're critical, they all want to complain and whine—just be positive and be thankful! Amen!

(Applause)

And the woman who saved my life when I was a little boy, Mabel Thomas, she said, "Fred Jones, you're an embarrassment to the Jones family name." (Laughs) That's when I was in eighth grade. I wrote a book on her because it changed my life when she told me that. Okay?

So, the DNA of a champion is: you've got to have a good cause, you've got to keep the courage, and you've got to stay committed to your goal, to your passion. And to this day, I'm excited about my two boys—one of them, the one in Texas, has a "No Complain Campaign," you know, no-complain campaign. And he's all over Facebook and everything: "No Complain Campaign." He wants to keep it positive.

If any of you all want to stay in touch with me, I'm on Twitter at FredJonesSpeaks. You can find me on Facebook at Fred Jones Speaks as well. Feminist apologists should stop femsplaining

The presumption that women who have a problem with feminism are just stupid and can't use a dictionary is condescending, bigoted elitism, and if you need a woman to tell you that, Cora Newbold is here to help you.

They’re right, I DON’T understand feminism

Ron Collins · 29 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For anyone following the #womenagainstfeminism hashtag on Twitter, or the other online venues where this is trending, one will readily observe just how often the charge is made (or is it a defense?) that WAF and friends simply “don’t understand” feminism.

Actually, I think they’re right. After a lifetime of being told, going back to the 1960s, that my kind (the dreaded White Man) were responsible for pretty much everything bad that ever happened to anyone else not like us, I decided to check it out myself.

I read Brownmiller, Ehrenreich, Friedan, and Caldicott, to name but a few. I hung out with, worked with, listened to, and attended public events with self-identifying feminists for years. I saw women in the 1980s wearing running shoes to work, to “Take Back the Night,” and went on to wonder if they had, as heels got higher and higher until anatomically self-immolating footwear had become the new symbol of “empowerment.”

I married a feminist with a feminist mother. I watched my more intellectual, urbane male friends, one after another, go from being interesting, funny, and spontaneous young men to being diaper-bag-toting stepnfetchits who could barely begin a sentence without the words “Let me check with …”. I worked with redneck manly men whose wives actually (wait for it) MADE THEM SANDWICHES, and who also in absolute seriousness called the little lady The Boss and meant it.

And all this time, in college towns and tourist towns, as well as cow towns, I kept thinking that, sooner or later, I would run into this Patriarchy that had all these gals stirred up. Ol’ Pat must have done something REAL bad to these women, ’cause they just never seemed to stop looking for him behind every corner and in every action, thought, attitude, or perceived slight on the part of men.

And still, I guess I just didn’t “understand” feminism, hard as I’d tried. I remember the first time I got wind that things were changing between guys and gals when at about age nine or ten, still in the bygone era of “full-service” gas stations, I saw my first woman out pumping gas, checking oil, and wiping windshields. Soon after that I started hearing about new roles assigned to men, such as attending childbirths, being emotionally available, involving ourselves more with children, and being more understanding of women’s health. I added two and two and figured, Not such a bad trade: men do more stuff women do, and women do more stuff men do. I can work with that, I was thinking as I prepared for manhood.

In the early 1980s I worked with women and men both, on a fire crew and in livery stables where I spent some summers, and it seemed okay. I kinda overlooked how the men would do all the heavy lifting, and never thought once about the inequity of my spending three days picking swollen ticks off horses’ bellies to drown them in diesel while three girls would wander by and say, “Ey-ewww, that is SO gross …” or the all-day rides I would guide while the ladies took all the cushy one- and two-hour ones that had them home for lunch.

When I entered residential homebuilding I just assumed there would be women coming along. (Cue crickets.) I saw a grand total of ONE female electrician, which is a high-paying profession with almost endless employability requiring only on-the-job training, and ONE lady carpenter, who prided herself on her volunteer work at the women’s shelter and had no issues with my carrying her materials for her (but a lot of issues with being a real carpenter, sorry to say). And that’s it, in more than 35 years in the trades. Women were never discriminated against or excluded, they just never showed up at all.

Meanwhile, my son was abducted by his mother in a long-planned action scripted by her mother with the MSW and a new law called the “Violence Against Women Act” that she and her colleagues used to crucify me in court without evidence; I experienced repeated instances of police officers going on alert in courthouses when the tone of my (male) voice became suspect while one woman expert after another were scarlet-lettering me with their guesswork and their social theories; one male judge, lawyer, or police officer after another submissively awaiting a female diagnosis of my disturbing maleness before deciding what to do with me or whether I could be unsupervised with my son (all of this with no evidence whatever being presented at any point).

Then years after this kangaroo-court farce I began to look back into gender politics issues. I found women demanding seats on corporate boards that they had not earned, women accusing men of domestic violence without ever being troubled to prove anything had happened to them at all, women who were the electoral majority in one election after another castigating me and all men over why "they haven't elected a female president," women being astonishingly rude, dismissive, crass, and vulgar toward male coworkers in non-construction workplaces where I worked at various times, women dominating every aspect of what was supposed to be a dialogue about "gender" and openly guffawing at the idea that any man had anything to contribute to the discourse …

Women being shamelessly passive-aggressive toward their spouses and boyfriends, openly rude in public places, defiantly fraudulent toward programs and benefits they applied for, matronizingly dismissive of the very concept of male grievance, THIS is what I think of when I think about "feminism." And feminism has been such an apparent success that a woman now doesn't have to know half of what I know about feminist theory or history to get away with plain rude and hurtful behavior whenever she decides to indulge in them.

So, the bashers of #womenagainstfeminism are right on the mark: try as I have, flexible as I've been on the idea, hard as I've worked (I even enrolled in "Gender Studies 101" at a community college once in the late 1980s, which I and two other men were basically badgered by students and instructor alike into dropping after the first day) …

No, I don't understand feminism. Not at all. I understand what it might have been, what is was marketed as being, what some adherents believed it was supposed to be.

But what feminism's actions and results have shown, as a popular philosophy or as a policymaking doctrine?

Guilty as charged: I absolutely do not understand.

“Like a girl” and female dependency

Hopeland Cash · 29 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The phrase “like a girl” is often added to a verb, such as “run like a girl” or “hit like a girl,” to denote a feminine, ineffectual act, usually due to physical weakness. Recently, a video has been making the rounds (already past 40 million views on YouTube) that challenges these phrases as insulting and sexist.

In the video, a director instructs performers (male and female) to carry out actions “like a girl,” including running, throwing, and fighting. All emote in a stereotypically feminine manner, running with knees together, fighting with low-powered slaps, and throwing from the elbow.

The performers are then challenged on why girls do things this way, but there is no real answer. The “kicker” comes when a series of young (around ten years old) girls are given the same instructions and perform to their full ability, with no sissy wimpiness in sight.

The message? Girls’ self-esteem “plummets” during puberty, allegedly in part due to this kind of “like a girl” sexist language that undermines their sense of self-worth and ability.

However, gender roles are much more complex than that. Is saying “like a girl” sexist? By definition, yes, since the phrase distinguishes between boys and girls. Does it harm girls’ self-esteem? If they want to be an athlete or enter a similarly physical career, then it likely would. However, you could just as easily say “like a girl” is a form of hazing, a phrase thrown at a female athlete to push her to do better, to overcome the (scientifically factual) physical handicap she has compared with boys.

But that is still too simplistic. “Like a girl” isn’t just a recognition of females’ lesser physical ability, it is part of a cultural mythos surrounding women and girls, part of their ingrained mystique just as much as cultural obsession with female beauty, sexuality, and nurturing. All have some basis in biology and human mating practices, but they aren’t all sexist constructs of the patriarchy used to oppress women. In fact, most aspects of their “mystique” are a net-benefit to women, and as such have been cultivated for countless generations by women.

That includes “like a girl.” To illustrate, we’ll look at some common examples of the phrase and the cultural mindset it reflects.

Run Like a Girl

Running is a basic survival tactic, either to catch prey or to save yourself from becoming prey. As human society has advanced, roads, domesticated animals, and now vehicles have hugely reduced the need for individuals to self-propel through their lives. However, running is key to many sports and is used as a common metric for measuring a person’s fitness and stamina, and in extreme cases (marathons) pain tolerance and dedication.

Even today, running well is a sign of fitness for survival, if only symbolically. For the most part, however, now or in the past, running is an individual activity; unlike more complex skills, it is more an indicator of your own survival than your ability to enhance the survival of the community.

Throughout history, it has been women who relied most on the community for their needs, rather than on themselves. Mate, family, and neighbors have historically been much more inclined to lend aid to a woman than to a man, giving women a more robust safety net.

In light of that, why should a woman bother to become a good runner? Remember, running represents an individual’s overall physical prowess and hardiness/survivability. If there’s always someone to help, why do it yourself? It’s not that women are lazy, but they can afford to run like girls because boys do the hard running (work).

If girls internalize this “run like a girl” rhetoric in puberty (as the video suggests), it’s because they have realized they don’t need to perform at their best physically. If that hurts their self-esteem, then they are just struggling with gender roles, which are not inherently misandristic or misogynistic.

Hit, Fight, Throw Like a Girl

Similarly, hitting, fighting, and throwing are all physical activities that have their roots in hunting skills. Hunting skills gave way to farm field skills, then to factory skills, and now to office skills. All these physical labors are the purview of men, so women know they don't need to learn these skills. If they intentionally neglect these abilities, is it not fair to call them on that decision, just as men can be criticized for their life choices?

On a personal level, hitting, fighting, and throwing are also basics of self-defense, of repelling an attacker from your person. Going back to that communal safety net, we see that women have rarely in history been made responsible for their own defense. Husbands defending the home, predominantly male police officers, nearly totally male soldiers; men are bred and raised to defend women, even at the cost of their own lives.

Women know this, so not only have they historically not learned to fight, they have actively cultivated the image of a "girly fight." As seen in the video, "hitting like a girl" is not likely to repel anything much larger than a squirrel. That petite arm-waving is, however, like catnip to white knights, chivalrous men who will gladly come to the aid of a flailing damsel.

If women fought to the whole of their ability, they would lose much of the protection from men they now (and have always) enjoy. If a cunning woman is told by a man that she "hits like a girl," her mental response might be Yes, I do, so you'll have to fix the problem for me.

Scream Like a Girl

Lastly is the widely recognized "scream like a girl." Whether the horrifying wail of a 1930s starlet snatched by mobster or giant ape, or the comic, girlish squealing of a grown man in modern Hollywood, the distinctive way females scream is instantly recognizable and tends to invoke a strong response.

Let's look at that second example: a man screaming like a girl. Why is this funny? Because he is showing weakness, which goes against his culturally mandated role of invulnerable protector, so it is humiliating for him, so it is funny.

But why is a female scream "weak"? Not just because it has a higher pitch; a man reciting poetry after inhaling helium is always worth a laugh, but a man's feminine scream holds a special place in our collective funny bone.

The reason is due to the difference in gender expectations of fear. A man screaming like a girl isn't funny because he is screaming like a girl but because he is screaming at nothing. That's what a girlish scream is, an outcry of distress at an apparently minor threat. Women can and do of course scream more seriously; hence the use of female victims in horror movies to provoke a more visceral response from the audience. That is a real "oh my god I'm going to die" scream.

The difference is that that is the only way a man is supposed to scream. If a "man"—you know, a good, chivalrous, gentlemanly manly man—screams, we "know" (due to cultural indoctrination) that he is scared shitless by a real and tangible threat to himself or his loved ones.

Boys are taught from a young age to be tough and courageous. Girls, however, have much lower expectations on them and so tend to scream at more minor threats (bugs instead of snakes). A scream is basically a distress call, a cry for assistance from others because you know you can't handle the situation.

God helps those who help themselves, but women aren't relying on God. They have men. Girls are allowed to scream at every little thing because they will get the help they need. Boys are taught to not be sissies.

"Screaming like a girl" doesn't mean screaming like a girl, but screaming "like someone who isn't in control of their situation and is relying on others for protection"; not how men are expected to act. It's like letting women dial 911, but making men dial 911-345-7920-01945-0156 for the same service. And no speed-dial, punks. If a man then dials just plain old 911, we're going to think less of him for trying to collect female-reserved assistance, and when women dial 911 willy-nilly, it'll get the response wanted but won't be as "respected." Which is a silly complaint anyway, since women get more help faster from more people, all the way back to crying girl infants being comforted more quickly than crying boy infants.

Women scream like girls because they know someone will answer even their most minor distress (since we know they can't run or fight). Men have to deal with their own shit.

Conclusion

The myriad "like a girl" phrases aren't an attack on female ability but a reflection of social norms and gender roles. For thousands of years, women have worked on their own behalf to cultivate their place in society, and that has included constant reinforcement to their mystique of nurturing fragility.

It is self-infantilization, and over the millennia it seems to have proven both successful and profitable. Women have built a facade of victim damsel, preying on male goodwill. If they don't want to wear the mask they made any longer, they'll have to start actually fighting their own battles. Men are shamed with accusations of girlish behavior because girls are still held to lower (easier) standards than boys. Telling girls they can do as much as boys won't boost their self-esteem until they're also told they must do as much as boys.

Self-esteem means self-respect, and respect has to be earned. Girls will stop being considered weak when they stop feigning weakness and when we start accepting biological differences and just let people be people.

The death of love, marriage, & community, in Black America: Requiem for a heavyweight

Mumia Ali · 30 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> "Love's in need of love today."
> —Stevie Wonder

On July 11, I received the following email from my good friend Mr. Paul Carrick Brunson, as I'm a subscriber to his newsletter:

> Hi There,
>
> I wanted to share with you briefly my thoughts on a subject that has me impassioned.
>
> It's inspired by an interview I did earlier this week. I was asked to appear on Good Morning America to discuss my thoughts on the latest reality show, Married at First Sight. It's an extreme, so-called social experiment where total strangers meet and marry blindly. The couples must then live together for a month before deciding whether they'll stay married or get a divorce. The creators of the show claim it's an experiment to determine which people make the best romantic partners.
> Needless to say, it's a controversial project that has many people talking. But to me, the show is just as far-fetched as it sounds. I'd even dare to say it's dangerous.
>
> Now, I'm all for blind dates. I think they have the potential to expand one's network and social circle, allowing you to meet and interact with interesting people you may have never had the chance to before. If the date doesn't work out, there's nothing "lost." Only experience gained.
>
> But Married at First Sight toys with a union that I—and so many others—hold sacred. This reality show dilutes the gravity of marriage by combining two people unstrategically with no shared values or compatibility.
>
> And what if the blind marriage between the participants doesn't work out?
> Perhaps the worst part of this show is that it makes a mockery of marriage further by offering what appears to be a clear-cut solution to an unsuccessful union—divorce.
>
> Social experiments typically contribute to the greater good of society. But this one? I simply don't see how it will be beneficial to furthering our understanding of love and marriage. What I do see, though, is how it would benefit show creators, producers and the television network's bottom line financially. Nothing makes more money than reality television drama and disasters. This will be no different.
> It's yet another great example of TV (and the profit motive) attempting to destroy a sacred union.

One week later, I got the following local story in my daily news feed:

> PHILADELPHIA (CBS)—Authorities are investigating the cause of death of an elderly couple whose bodies were discovered inside their Strawberry Mansion home early Thursday morning.
> Police say the only daughter of the couple found them dead in the living room of their row home in the 2500 block of North Spangler Street shortly before 1 a.m. Neighbors who heard her screams called 9-1-1.
> Firefighters also responding to the call vented the home, suspecting carbon monoxide, but instruments detected no levels of the deadly gas.
>
> Investigators say they were no signs of forced entry into the home and no visible injuries to either the man or the woman.
> Family members identified the couple as Rufus and Algladys Perry.

What does Brunson's freely admitted rant of righteous indignation and the death of an elderly couple in one of Philly's historically Black neighborhoods have in common, you ask?

Well, I think that what they have in common is not just the degree to which marriage (and by extension, relationships) has been cheapened overall in American life but also the extent to which its cheapening, death even, has profoundly impacted Black American life—in ways that even now we are barely able to fully understand.

For those who may be other than Black (read: in the main, White), let me say this: Without question, the themes that I'll be writing about in this article have had a profound impact on the whole of American society, not just the Black part of it; hardly anyone reading this will be able to say, with a straight face, that they've been untouched by it, either directly or indirectly. But it can also be said that no part of the American family has been so directly hit as hard on these fronts as the African-American section—and it has also been proven that Black America is a kind of bellwether as to what is to come from the rest of the country as a whole. So, stick around—even though the article may not be talking about you directly, it is definitely something that concerns you.

While "PCB," as I refer to Brunson, may be in a position that precludes him from "cutting loose," I'm a bit more fortunate in that regard, so let's keep it 100: the major cultural, social, political, and economic changes that have come down the pike over roughly the past half a century, along the lines that are being discussed in this article, have done a job on Black America that several centuries of slavery, and another century of Jim Crow, couldn't do to Black America—which was not only to break it apart spatially, economically, and politically but also to break its spirit.

Let me repeat that: What PCB is talking about above is the culmination of a multi-decades assault on the very foundations of what makes a family, a community, a nation, who and what it is. And that when it comes to Black America in particular, that multi-decades assault has achieved something that slavery, Jim Crow, and the Ku Klux Klan combined—over the course of three and half centuries(!)—couldn't do—which was not only to break us apart physically but also to break our spirit.

By now, you don't even have to be an American to know the most basic of facts and history on this score, but for the record it's good to go over them for the sake of the argument being made in this piece. According to the excellent research of Harvard African American historian Professor Louis "Skip" Gates, Blacks, immediately coming out from under slavery, got married in droves and were eager to build families and communities. In fact, marriage was such a norm in Black America that by 1950 MORE Black Women were married than White Women—this at the height of the Jim Crow era.

By the year 2000, however—only a half-century later—marital rates in Black America not only plummeted but also were at all-time low levels. Blacks, even when controlling for education and incomes, divorce and break up at a rate much higher than Whites of the same education and income levels. To be sure, and some would point out, not without reason, that racism would play a role in that. After all, another fellow Harvard academic, Professor Alvin Poussaint, has rightly noted the ways in which merely being Black can and does have an impact on just living in the United States day to day.

Still, one has to wonder how it was possible for so many Black Americans to forge families—and by extension communities—against what must have seemed to be intractable odds.

In 1950, at a time when out-of-wedlock births and "baby mamas" was something to be scandalized, the Black rate was less than 30%—the current figure of the White OOW birthrate. By the time the 21st century rolled around, that number was tipping 70% nationally; today, it is creeping towards 80%.

Something else that one must point out is the rates of infidelity, STD infection, and domestic violence—all three of which are easily a magnitude higher in Black America circa 2014 than they ever were in 1950. Not only that, but there's enough blame to go around on both sides of the gender aisle: for example, Black women have a herpes infection rate to the tune of 50%, and Black women are just as likely to go upside their mate's head and/or cheat on their mate as the other way around. Indeed, the term "Jumpoff" has become part of the Black American lexicon—which translated simply means “mistress.” Jumpoffs have now, as a result of the aforementioned changes, been elevated to the same level as wives, be that de jure or de facto (since common law arrangements were always a strong part of Black American life). Mate poaching—stealing someone else’s mate—is not just something Black men engage in; it’s something that Black women too have had way more than their fair share of involvement with. Speaking of “reality” TV shows and the like, much of what is on offer to Black American audiences in this regard very much centers on these themes—easily seen in highly popular “reality” shows like Love & Hip Hop Atlanta, Real Housewives of Atlanta, and Basketball Wives. What perhaps makes matters even worse is that quite a few of the ladies featured in these shows are not always married or would even be recognized as steady, long-term mates in previous eras. They seem opportunistic in their outlook and mindset, always ready to pounce on a better chance or to vanquish a perceived “threat” in the form of another lady.

As you might guess, all of the above makes it pretty hard to build, to say nothing of sustain, communities. In the past, Jim Crow and the Klan used intimidation, violence, mob rule, and illegal measures to keep Black Americans from participating in all of the franchises of American life that made life worth living. Though they had some early victories and inflicted real damage on us, they never broke our spirit because we still had strong communities, which came from strong families. Today, however, we have very little of that—and of those who have managed to do these things, the sad truth is that there simply is not enough of them to carry the load.

The eminent scholar and public intellectual Thomas Sowell once famously said that there are no solutions—only tradeoffs—and he was referring to the idea that we, as a society, can craft quick-fix and often times feel-good “solutions” to supposedly dire conditions—not taking into account that there are inherent tradeoffs to anything we do. No-fault divorce, abortion on demand, cheap and effective birth control, big daddy government, and a “Imma do me, you do you” ethos have pervaded our society over the past half century and have created as many “problems” as they sought to solve. Even a passing-through perusal of Black America is a testament to this fact—“communities” that are such in name only and barely at that; atomized individuals, not connected to each other in any meaningful sense; feral children and young people running amok, in fatherless, manless environments where baby mamas are the norm; where recrimination and acrimony are the order of the day instead of love, support, and mutual understanding; where Black men are truly the walking wounded; and where Black spaces and places that were proud examples of the best we could be are little more than graveyards today— literal war zones where a Hobbesian all-against-all bloodletting occurs at a frighteningly frenzied pace.

So, is it really any wonder or surprise that “reality” TV shows now cash in on the mockery that marriage in our time has truly become? Indeed, if anything, one has to stand in awe of the fact that it has taken TV execs this long to capitalize on the trend in such an overt, direct fashion.

And as for the unfortunate passing of the Black elderly couple in Strawberry Mansion: the real mourning is for the fact that there are precious few couples like that of any age there. “Black love” in our time really means “Black sex,” in chaotic, random hit-and-miss fashion, where you’re here today, gone tomorrow, a seemingly never-ending carousel of “lovers” in and out of each other’s lives, and that of others, kids from the various unions in the undertow. Again, as I’ve noted above, the numbers—STDs, infidelity, plummeting marital rates, sky-high out-of-wedlock birthrates, you name it—bear it out.

I think the TV show PCB discusses actually can and has done some real good—because it has forced all of us to take a good, long, hard look at not just what marriage has become but also what we have become—and to ask ourselves if we’re okay with what we see. Because if we are, great, the band plays on. But if we’re not—as I suspect many more of us than we’re willing to admit aren’t—then it opens the door to a long-overdue conversation as to where we go next.

If there is going to be a (re)building of “community,” it has to start with a (re)building of the relationships between men and women, and to reaffirm the truth of our existence, as propounded by people much wiser than any of us, down through the ages.

And now if you’ll excuse me, I have a bit of work to do.

Preparing for the next conquest

Paul Elam · 30 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As you may have noticed, the tagline under the AVFM logo has changed. Gone is “Humanist Counter-Theory,” and up is “Changing the Cultural Narrative.”

The reason for the change is multi-faceted. One, in order to address disinformation spread in some corners of the internet, we are now making a clear statement about what AVfM’s mission is and has been since the start. There is a myth promoted at places like Return of Kings and some elements of the MGTOW community that the MHRM, specifically AVFM, is about lobbying the government for legitimacy and legal recognition. They are about as credible as the SPLC. What they say is simply not true.

AVFM’s mission focuses pretty much exclusively on changing the cultural dialogue. We have never lobbied politicians for laws, we don’t seek a “Violence Against Men Act,” or even changes in divorce and custody law. We admire, report on and support those undertaking such efforts but that is not the same thing as doing them. We are certain, though, that changing the cultural narrative — forcing a new dialogue — opens the door for laws to change in a positive way even if we are not interested in being an active part of that.

We do and have done quite well at what we are actually doing.

Today is a day of celebration about that very thing. The people at AVFM, both former and present, have worked hard over the past six years to tear through a part of the lace curtain in the insane cultural narrative about sex and power. We have clearly succeeded. While we cannot take direct credit for the recent and massive rise in anti-feminism, we can proudly say that we, and those who have supported us, have played a clear facilitating role in the fact that feminists no longer have an unchallenged platform in the world of sexual politics. They are, in fact, being more and more seen for what they really are; hateful, corrupt crackpots with no moral or intellectual legitimacy.

My hat is off to everyone in the MHRM, especially Team AVFM, for stellar work.

Moving past the misperceptions about the MHRM, there is another reason to clarify our mission. While there is light years ahead in actually addressing many men’s issues, our Phase One objective of kicking a hole in the door is done.

That is not a “Mission Accomplished” banner, dubiously strung across the deck of an aircraft carrier for the cameras. It is, however a turning point for AVFM strategically.

Now that we have established a business structure, a way to support AVfM Operations and Education, LLCs, which means the expense of running A Voice for Men, it is time for us to forge ahead with changing the narrative in more focused ways.

The tl;dr on that is that we are refitting the AVFM ship for furthering a narrative change deeper in the culture. This primarily involves pushing into the medical and mental health establishments with vocal and forceful challenges to the gynocentrism and ideology that permeates them.

That includes the sexual mutilation of children for religious, traditional or aesthetic reasons. It also includes the upcoming mental health network for men, which I assure you will be no wallflower in the discussion of men’s mental health issues. You can expect some fireworks there.

The rise of humanitarian (and quite strident) non-feminism has hit the ideological community hard. Now we move deeper into their enclaves and push harder with more precision.

The AVFM platform, as is, will be a huge component of this model. You will continue to see great content and old style FTSU where needed. Our focus though is to ultimately make sure that the corrupt gynocentrism in the mental health and medical establishments is fully exposed to the light of day. That means the amount of content may sometimes ebb and flow as needs dictate.

We will do this until the percentage of those “helping” professionals who openly support feminism matches the abysmal numbers they are now scratching their heads over in the general population.

The time to make popcorn and watch is not quite at hand but then again it is likely a lot sooner than you think.

If you want to support that more directly please find the button for subscribing members to the top right of this page. Thanks.

Please tell me more about my male privilege!

Jason J. Bailey · 30 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Let's talk about this idea of male privilege that feminists have told us exists. But I should be more specific: the cisgender, heterosexual, Caucasian, male privilege. Now, anyone who observes the treatment of men in our society can tell you that this group is far from privileged. But in order for feminists to be able to make us believe in "oppressed women and privileged men," they must protect this lie. On a good day, we can just ignore their little world known as the patriarchy, but they allow serious issues faced by men and boys to be ignored so as not to sacrifice the plausibility of "male privilege." Now, as a privileged man, let's take a look at some of my privileges:

1. Unfair divorce laws. Despite marriage's obvious red flags, some men (albeit fewer and fewer) are still willing to marry. At this point, the percentage of men who value marriage is approximately 29%. I find it hard to believe that this group does not know the risks so I assume they justify marriage by telling themselves, "Divorce won't happen to me" or "My wife-to-be is the exception to the rule" or "She's pregnant." Regardless, the more than likely impending divorce is where men lose most (if not all) of their rights. Pre-nups are thrown out of court on a routine basis, and the judge can even use a flimsy excuse for nullifying the document, such as "It is not fair to the other party," and your soon-to-be ex-wife is able to turn your assets portfolio into a buffet. You can be ordered to pay obscene amounts of alimony (almost 98% of which is collected by women), you can lose your house (and still be obligated to pay the mortgage), you can be held responsible to cover any of her debt (given that it was incurred before or during the marriage), and if you do not comply you will be found in contempt of court for breaking a court order and you get to go to prison.

2. Little to no parental rights. This applies whether or not you are married to the mother of said children. All the mother has to do is say that you are abusive, you molested the children, she is intimidated by you, or any other excuse that portrays her and the children as victims and the police will remove you from your home. In many cases, you can even have a restraining order taken out against you. This makes it easy for her not only to attain full custody of the children (just like 80% to 90% of custody dispute cases end, depending on the location), but also the more custody she receives, the more child support she receives. Oops, I mean, the more child support the children receive. We know that the money is going to the children, even though there is no auditing system in place to make her prove how that money is spent because there is no such thing as a selfish and materialistic woman. To add insult to injury, men can be ordered to pay child support to the point of becoming destitute, with no consideration for them or even an attempt at finding a balance. If that is not bad enough, men can be ordered to pay child support for children who are not biologically theirs. This could be that they were the child's stepfather, living with the mother of the child, the "father by default," or even if they were victims of paternity fraud. The epitome of male privilege is finding out that the mother of your child cheated and let you raise another man's child while your only choice was to either support them irrespective of your own financial stability or go to jail.

3. Sexually related crimes and false rape accusations. This is the biggest flaw on part of the feminists that I have seen to date. They have turned the idea of rape, sexual assault, sexual abuse, sexual harassment, and statutory rape into a complete joke. In short, they are trying to set up a system in which men are responsible not only for their own actions (as they should be) but also for the actions of the woman. First, the conditions used to be that if a woman is drunk, she is not able to consent (I guess feminists do not know the difference between ability and capacity); then it became if her consent was not enthusiastic, she was raped. Then they took it a step further, encapsulated by Catherine MacKinnon's famous quote: "In a patriarchal society, all heterosexual intercourse is rape because women, as a group, are not strong enough to give meaningful consent." Next, they decided to separate the crimes "rape" and "made to penetrate," thereby eliminating male victims of heterosexual rape from their statistics. Furthermore, in 2011, U.S. President Barack Obama ordered post-secondary institutions that received federal funding to lower the burden of proof required to expel someone accused of sexual assault. Since there are few (if any) men who falsely accuse women of sexually related crimes, this was yet another way to demonize men. Last but not least, to show how privileged men really are, some feminists take it so far as to say that being falsely accused of rape can be a good experience for men, something from which they can learn. Yeah, I would do nothing but gain from being thrown out of school, fired from my job, sent to prison, and humiliated with that stigma and a criminal record for the rest of my life. Who wouldn't want that?

4. Domestic violence. The feminists cannot stand the idea of men being victims of domestic violence, let alone women being perpetrators, because it chips away at their faux-argument of women being oppressed. But it is a lot more serious than we think. Feminists have led us to believe that domestic violence is a male issue and it is a reason that women should fear men. In reality, the domestic violence rates are about equal pertaining to men on women and women on men and even women on women. The fact is, men have more of a right to be afraid. In some cases, men are bigger and stronger, but there is marginal sympathy for them. In Canada to date, there are no battered men's shelters, and as a society, there is a collective acceptance of women abusing men. In fact, the man is looked at as the bad guy if he defends himself. When he is the victim, not only is it acceptable, but it is also apparently funny, as seen here. What a privilege it is to be a man.

5. Men in the media. This one really shows the true nature of how a female-run media sees men. We see many commercials in which men are treated like idiots or as yet another kid in the house who needs the strong, confident woman to step in and take care of him. A YouTube channel called Vinny Mac has a series of videos called "Misandry in the Media" (you can view parts 1 and 2 here), which to date includes a 20-video compilation. Some will argue that these types of commercials are targeted toward women so they need to be something to which women can relate. Unfortunately, that argument raises more questions than it answers. First, why is man-hating something that women can relate to? Second, if sexism becomes acceptable based on the target demographic, what was the issue with having women in bikinis in beer commercials? Oh that's right, it is only okay to be sexist when the victim is a man.

6. Miscellaneous male privileges. There are many more, so I will briefly list them here. Most are common knowledge, but I have posted sources for most.

a. Men make up the majority of the homeless (Figure 4 shows that as age increases, male homelessness increases while female homelessness decreases).

b. Men make up the minority of college graduates (women earn 62% of associates degrees, 57% of bachelors degrees, 60% of masters degrees and 52% of doctorates).

c. The education system is tailored to girls.

d. Men and boys make up the majority of school dropouts.

e. Men make up the majority of workplace fatalities and workplace injuries.

f. Men are hated on for choosing more lucrative careers, more dangerous jobs, and on average working longer hours than women (wage gap).

g. Men are more likely than women to go to prison for the same crime.

h. Men are more likely to get longer sentences than women for the same crime.

i. Men are the majority of those residing in prison.

j. Men make up the majority of suicide victims.

k. Men are the majority of victims of public sphere violence.

l. Men make up the majority of unemployed.

m. Men make up the majority of persons addicted to drugs.

n. Men are the majority of rape victims (if you count "made of penetrate" as rape, as you should).

o. Boys receive lower grades than girls from female teachers.

p. Men who choose careers over family are selfish; women who do the same are empowered.

q. If a man finds a woman attractive, he is objectifying her; if he does not, he is shallow.

r. If a man tries to be a gentleman, he is a chauvinist; if he does not, he is rude.

s. TALKING ABOUT ANY OF THE ABOVE IS CENSORED BY FEMINISTS AND DEEMED MISOGYNISTIC AND ANTI-WOMAN.

After all of that, feminists somehow still perpetuate the concept of “male privilege,” but back in reality “female privilege” seems more realistic. Maybe we are, in fact, even living in a matriarchal society in which women are privileged.

Barbara Kay: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Barbara Kay · 30 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: We will over the next few weeks continue to present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues. Barbara Kay was our sixth speaker on Day 1, June 27, 2014. This particular speech was one of the most frequently quoted by the press; now everyone has the opportunity to see her remarks in their full context. This speech and all others can be read in their entirety here. Our thanks again to Rick Westlake for doing the hard work to produce these transcriptions. —DE

(Attila Vinczer, introducing Barbara Kay.)

… Let me tell you, I am definitely inspired. That was one incredible speech—makes me think of my own father, who is here today.

I'm just going to take a couple of moments while Barbara Kay gets ready. I've traveled here from Canada; I'm here with my two boys, Steven and Ryan; they're only 11 and 13. I truly believe that much of this is really for them. They are the ones that are going to be most involved and affected by many of these things that we are addressing here today. And of course, my father—77 years old, he's standing right in the corner over there.

But our next presenter, Barbara Kay: she is someone that I first met in 2009, I believe, at the Parental Alienation Symposium in Toronto. She is one of the most dedicated journalists, women, and writers that I know. She is feverishly and tirelessly assisting the men and boys that are in crisis these days.

Barbara Kay has a bachelor's and master's in English language and literature, and began her career teaching literature and composition at Concordia University; spent many years as the editor of First Fruits, an anthology of creative writing by high-school students. She is a weekly columnist for the National Post, where she writes on media, social and cultural bias against men and boys; was given an award by the National Coalition of Men for promoting gender issues in the media. She co-wrote Unworthy Creature: A Punjabi Daughter's Memoir of Honor, Shame and Love. Her son, Jonathan Kay, is the National Post's comment pages editor, so she actually works for her son.

(Audience laughter.)

She has been deeply critical of anti-Semitism in Quebec, earning her an entire Wikipedia page called "Barbra Kay controversy" but also criticizes Hasidic Jews for not integrating.

She is critical of feminism and the concept of "rape culture," writing that "if we really live in rape-culture women would be walking around in burqas."

She has appeared on national television, discussing how modern feminism is detrimental to men and boys. She called for Stephen Harper to pass legislation making shared-parenting the legal default in Canada.

Please put your hands together for Barbara Kay.

(Applause. Barbara Kay takes the podium.)

Thanks, Attila, for that generous introduction. I'm elated to be here, and very grateful to Paul and Tom Golden, who I've been in touch with mostly, and others who have worked so hard to make this conference the great success that it is. And especially considering the row of distressful surprises that emerged during the countdown period. But this is a fine venue that you've found, and I am especially appreciative of the fact that there's no lineups for the ladies' room. (Laughter.) That's one of the few types of conferences where this can happen.

I'm also more honored than I can say to find myself welcomed as a peer in the ranks of many experts and activists in this field that I have for so many years admired, and whose work I have shamelessly cannibalized for journalistic fodder, that I'm meeting in person for the first time. So that's a great pleasure for me too.

So, I'm here to talk about misandry and the media. And unlike other groups that I talk to, I'm not here to persuade you that misandry in the media exists because you all know that it does. Rather, I want to assess some of the different types of media misandry that we routinely encounter. I'm not a social scientist or a specialist in this field; I'm just a journalist for whom misandry is one niche topic amongst others, and so I'm leaning heavily on empiricism in my analysis. Also, I'm a Canadian journalist, and not American or British, so I take many of my examples from the Canadian media, with which I am naturally most familiar. But perhaps I can bring you some items that you haven't seen before.

For the sake of coherency, and with no suggestion that my categorization here is definitive, or that there is no crossover or other ways to corral one's thoughts on the topic, I'm framing my remarks around three types of media misandry; sins—three different types of media-misandry sins: sins of commission, based in the intention to further an ideology-based cultural agenda; sins of omission, based on ignorance or fellow-traveling with good intentions; and thirdly, something I'd hardly call a "sin" but more of a simple capitalist reality—what I would call "pandering," bias that is based on opportunism rather than an ideology.

So, the sins of commission are very evident, and I hardly need to spell them out for you. These are the sins that spring from intellectuals, academics, and professional ideologues who head up activists, women's rights, or women's interests organizations. These are overtly man-blaming, and they use their authoritative-seeming status to promulgate false news which they know, or could know, or should know is false—but don't care. I'm thinking of those scare-mongering "public service" ads that we Canadians see on TV, that are put out, for example, by the Canadian Women's Federation.

One that particularly revolted me quite recently—I wrote about it in a column—shows a bunch of middle-class women in a happy circle at a baby shower; and you see the pregnant mother-to-be opening the gifts, and everything is jolly, and the balloons and everything else. And she—"Oh, isn't this cute, and isn't this and that cute," and finally she gets to a gift that she opens and she holds it up, and what is it? It's a rape whistle. Something every baby girl is going to need, right? And you see all the women in the circle going (gasp) "Ooooh," like that, as if all these middle-class women are exactly the type of women who are going to be, you know, raped in the street. Then you see this bogus statistic about a woman's chance of being raped appear in stark silence on the screen. It's a very effective ad, and it's false. It's false propaganda. But it's expensively made. There's a lot of money in these organizations. Highly emotive, and doubtless extremely effective in conveying the idea that the threat of male violence stalks women from the womb onward.

The commissioners of misandry are extremely powerful because they are organized and well-financed by government and institutional grants. They enjoy influence in political circles, and are effective in mobilizing their mass constituencies to intimidate institutions or businesses that, in any way, throw a bone to dissenting voices, which is very applicable to what we've seen happen here, before we got here. The "commission" ideologues are vigilant in monitoring the media for depictions of women that they do not favor, and they make their displeasure known to editors. Editors have internalized what is, and is not, permissible to say. For example, there was, and this was mentioned by Tara, there was tremendous coverage—oh, I'm sorry, that's Boko Haram, I'm getting to that.

But first of all, the coverage of the recent massacre of seven fellow students in Santa Barbara by the deeply disturbed Elliot Rodger. A Twitter feed instantly sprang up—#YesAllWomen—to brand the killing as a crime of misogyny that was indicative of a cultural pattern. But the killer was a psychologically twisted loner who viewed all of life through his own self-pitying lens. In Rodger's case, he hated women because they rejected him sexually, but he also hated men because they had access to women; they were his rivals. In his fantasies, he decimated the male population to rid himself of his rivals. But that was glossed over in the media reports and commentary.

The #YesAllWomen campaign used a newish social platform to express exactly the sentiments the media bruited after the 1989 Montreal massacre of 14 women by Marc Lepine, another disturbed loner. The Montreal Massacre got international attention precisely because it was virtually unique in the annals of mass murders, in conspicuously singling out women. If you Google “mass murders of only women,” you’ll get the Montreal Massacre; that’s all you’ll get because women aren’t massacred, as a rule, or ever, except for that.

In Canada, the Montreal Massacre became a sacred icon, the likes of which we have never seen with any other tragedy. Lepine was transmogrified by a hysterical media into a symbol of all men in their “inherent, though dormant, misogyny.” That tragedy spawned the White Ribbon campaign, which became a global phenomenon; and, in Canada, a gun registry of enormous scope that cost billions but did not save a single woman’s life and was finally scrapped a few years ago. Every year, on December 7, the anniversary, rituals are performed all over Canada, and the media solemnly reports on them while the punditocracy waxes lugubriously on the scourge of violence against women that the massacre supposedly represents. And every year I write my column saying this is nonsense because there’s never been a prequel, there’s never been a sequel, and Marc Lepine acted alone, and there’s no reason to attach this, blah-blah-blah-blah-blah. It sinks like a stone.

Two researchers looked at 172 Montreal Gazette stories about the massacre. They found that, quote, “The misogynous character of the offender tended strongly to be generalized to men as a group, and not particularized or restricted to one male or one type of male. In a word, what emerged was a fairly consistent image of the male gender as being inherently misogynist.” For a year after the event, the most-used term of analysis was summed up in the words of one feminist: “Men have to look at the rapist inside of them.”

I don’t know if you’ve noticed that the word “continuum” has edged its way into media discourse on a regular basis. Everything is on a continuum. So, you know, it’s not that we’re saying that you’re a rapist now; but you know … (Laughter.) You remember that rude remark you made to that woman yesterday? You know, if you take it on a continuum …

So I’m always on a lookout for this word “continuum,” and you should be too because it’s a bad word. It’s a wonderful way to stoke the moral panic that keeps so many people in the rape-crisis industry in business. As long as you fit on a “continuum,” you’re a danger, right? The rape-culture trope depends heavily on baseless moral panic to push the feminist claim that “one in four or five”—depends on your source—“campus women are raped every year.” If such a statistic were true, no parents would permit their daughters to attend co-ed universities! But, though the mainstream media fails to address the yawning disparity in actual statistics—even if you multiply them by 10, because “women don’t report rape; okay, let’s multiply the figure by 10”—it still doesn’t come anywhere close to the bogus figures that they’re telling us.

Ordinary people know in their hearts, this is not true, and that the vast majority of female students alleging “rape” on campus are actually voicing “buyer’s remorse” for alcohol-fueled promiscuous behavior involving murky lines of consent on both sides. It’s true! It’s their “get out of guilt free” card, you know, like in Monopoly. (Laughter.)

To say so, however, (repeated) involves blowback of a kind every editor dreads. So it is easier to remain shtum, or add one’s voice to the chorus of misandry.

At this point, I must give a little shout-out to my own newspaper, the National Post, because on this subject, as on many others that are “politically correct,” I have never been muzzled in any way, no matter how many feminists protest. My editors agree with me, in fact, on much of what I write, and a recent addition to the editorial board [has been] a very bright young woman who also writes on these topics from my perspective. Still, curiously, my editors have chosen never to be proactive on causes such as family law reform, or more equitable distribution of money supporting victims of intimate partner violence.

As you probably know, a Canadian private member’s bill to reform family court approaches to custody, an equal-parenting proposal, was shot down in our Parliament last month. I have written many columns in favor of such a reform, but the Post has never written an editorial backing me up, which I think would have made a difference, and perhaps a crucial one. I asked one of the editors why the equal-parenting issue didn’t resonate with him, or with the editorial board, who are mostly male. He candidly responded that in his opinion, women’s biological attachment to their children is stronger than men’s, and they have a more natural right to custody. But he also admitted that he—happily married, and no particular believer in affirmative action for women in other spheres—considers men who get battered in family court as basically losers who used poor judgment in their choice of mates; so his tendency is not to blame the system but the men who end up disenfranchised. And he's very educated. I could see, though, how he couldn't imagine such a fate for himself, and I think perhaps he's representative of a wide swath of even highly educated and otherwise enlightened men in our society. They think it can never happen to them, and therefore, the people that it happens to must be losers, right?

Moving on to the category of "Misandry by Omission"—I'm talking very fast because I'm now aware that we have this time limit, although we're ahead of time, Attila, so, you know, cut me some slack here. (Laughter.)

Okay, so now, Category 2, Omission—Well, we have an elegant sufficiency of examples to show, that when bad things happen to girls and women, it's news, and when bad things happen to boys and men, not so much; and now, I do refer to Tara's mention of the Boko Haram tragedy and the capture of hundreds of Christian schoolgirls in Nigeria who were subjected to forced marriages or sold into the sex trade. Of course, this produced a great indignation in the West, and the hashtag #BringBackOurGirls, with frowning Michelle Obama looking … very sad over it; which is an easy, satisfying way for people to feel like they've actually done something, but which of course is inconsequential because it means nothing whatsoever to the actual villains of Boko Haram. Forgotten in the kerfuffle was, of course, the fact that weeks earlier, Boko Haram had killed dozens of boarding-school boys, some being burned alive in their dormitories. When I pointed this out in a blog post, my deputy editor, a foreign-news junkie, confessed he had not even heard of the incident.

Now, I don't personally think that the capture of the schoolgirls was an act of misogyny. And I also don't think that the killing of the schoolboys was what you'd call an act of misandry. The Nigerian story is about religious hegemony, not gender. Both were acts of terrorism to intimidate Christians into accepting the triumphalist future of Islam in Nigeria. That the girls were subjected to sexual humiliation, and the boys to death, is commensurate with behavioral drivers in all warring situations; which is why 8,000 boys and men were killed in Srebrenica by Bosnian Serbs in 1995, and why vengeful Russian soldiers raped virtually every girl and woman on their path to Berlin at the end of World War II. But, of course, if you are brainwashed into seeing only acts of violence against women, you're bound to assign misogyny as the motivation for them.

Omission in the media can be quite subtle, involving a certain amount of editorial legerdemain … juggling around … in order to meet the criteria of beady-eyed feminist readers and viewers. What, for an example, is an editor to do with a story of shockingly sadistic intimate-partner violence that does not stack up against the politically correct paradigm of male-on-female? I'm not referring to female-on-male violence; that doesn't get reported. I'm speaking of a case of homosexual intimate-partner violence. In the media, you'll never go wrong by observing one simple rule about gays: For feminists, they are honorary women, since they are the natural victims of heterosexual men. And therefore, in the media, gays may as well be women, considering the editorial slant they are usually given.

A case in point: Canadian Dustin Paxton, who over the course of many months starved and tortured his "roommate," as his gay lover "D.L." was referred to in the press—who could have escaped at any time but chose to endure the punishment; and it was really quite harrowing punishment. Upon his arrival at a Saskatchewan hospital in April 2010, the victim weighed 87 pounds and showed signs of massive abuse. Most of his bottom lip and part of his tongue were missing, an eye-socket had been fractured … Paxton was judged a "dangerous offender" at trial, but not in a single one of the newspaper accounts I read of the case could I find the two words I was looking for: domestic violence. That was no oversight, in my opinion, but a deliberate editorial decision. If gays can be just as guilty of intimate-partner violence as heterosexual men, then the whole theoretical edifice underlying the Feminist Scapegoat School of Moral Panic collapses!

In fact, as we know, intimate-partner violence occurs at least as frequently as heterosexual violence; why wouldn't it? Gays are human beings with family histories, personal weaknesses, and psychological problems around intimacy, just like the many heterosexuals who translate their personal problems into intimate-partner violence.

Omission can be evident in something so apparently trivial as a commentary on a TV drama series. For example, how many of you watch the British series Downton Abbey? … Come on … What? You all don't? Oh, my God—you don't know what you're missing! It's fabulous! Okay—Fantastic series, and probably one of the most-loved series of all time, written with intelligence, humor, and fidelity to the cultural norms of the era, which is Edwardian times and then post-war, post-First World War times. Well—last year, the Montreal Gazette's resident Feminist Opinion columnist—her name is Janet Bagnall —used the series as proof of women's sad history of oppression, with which I took issue in a column. Bagnall made the point that in the World War I era, which is the setting for the series' second season, times were very tough for women of the lower classes. As indeed they were, so that's fair comment.

She adduced as a prime example one of the characters who has been impregnated and then abandoned by a man of the upper class. He refuses to acknowledge his child or pay any support. The young woman is in a terrible position, socially disgraced of course, and condemned to penury. Later in the series, one of the aristocratic protagonists is able to deal with her out-of-wedlock pregnancy with a timely month-long European tour and a well-placed adoption, leaving her socially unscathed.

Now what this columnist failed to note, however, was that in Edwardian times, life was very tough for men as well, and that the well-balanced series made this reality very clear. At the same time as "fallen women" could find themselves in dire economic and social straits, men—and not just of the lower classes, but all classes—were dying like flies in the Great War. In the very same series, in which the columnist only saw the travails of women, there are several male characters with heartbreaking stories. One is a valet, permanently disabled from a previous war, who cannot get a divorce from his shrew of a wife, who for spite deliberately implicates him as her murderer when she commits suicide, and whose chivalrous sense of honor will not permit him to declare his love for the fellow servant who he adores. Another is a young boy, mortally wounded at the front, gasping his love for the maid that he had wanted to marry, and through gasps loves before he expires. Third is an estate footman so terrified in the heat of battle he shoots himself in the hand to be released, and then endures months of shell-shock during which he must continue working, his body shaking uncontrollably, as best he can, with virtually no sympathy or comprehension by anyone of what he is going through.

So that columnist was blind, literally blind, to the suffering of men in any era. And the only reason I've gone on at length about her commentary is for two reasons: First, because her column is representative of the feminist view of men that has permeated our culture. Their eyes simply glaze over when they witness male suffering. They see it, but they don't see it. Unless of course they are gay; suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder incurred while serving in unpopular places like Vietnam and Iraq; or men of color who are victims of white men. So, it is misandry by default.

The other reason is that I was the only columnist in Canada to note, or to care, about her lapse. I don't say that to boast; only to say that if one is not actively looking for misandry, the omission of concern for men's sufferings will go completely unnoticed in the media. And as misandry is an orphaned topic, there simply aren't enough, or aren't any, media people who do notice or care enough to comment.

Finally we have in my arbitrary categorization list the type of misandry in the media that I call "pandering." These are reportage, ads, and an entire magazine and TV talk-show industry aimed at women, in which actual social truths are less important than the profit to be made from enhancing women's self-regard.

So here's what I consider a pretty egregious example of pandering. And once again, it's in Canada's Globe and Mail, which is supposedly Canada's "centrist" national newspaper, and supposedly objective. It was a puff feature article, spread all over two pages, like in the Saturday edition—huge, it got huge coverage—called "The Seven Habits of Highly Effective Lesbian Families." In this article, we are informed, quote: "Kids with two moms seem to be more confident and less aggressive than those raised by a mom and a dad. They are open-minded, affectionate, and less susceptible to anxiety and depression." Seem to be? Well, that's a subjective judgment, but … "They are … less susceptible to anxiety and depression"? Source? Source? Anyone? Bueller?

(Laughter.)

So, what are the "seven secrets of lesbian families?" Okay, here they are: An equal loving partner; Never hit your children—"fathers tend to be strict and authoritarian," says one professor of women's studies, without providing evidence that strictness is a deficit in complementary parenting; Tell them where they come from; Stand up for them and teach them to stand up for themselves; Build a village of support of family and friends; Let them make their own spaces too; and Trust that they love you, even when you stress them out. In other words, good lesbian parents practice the same parenting skills that good heterosexual parents do. Yet, based on no objective evidence whatsoever—indeed, information for the article was admittedly gleaned from selection via surveys—lesbian parenting outcomes are herein implied as superior.

I would stress that the motivation behind this article is not misandry. Rather, it is a reflexive act of ingratiation with the LGBT community, which is a branch office of feminism. In laymen's terms, it is sucking up, pure and simple.

I could have done a whole talk on women's magazines, which are the most widespread and influential form of pandering. In Canada, women's magazines reach—you can't imagine how many women. I mean, unbelievable numbers of women love women's magazines. In Canada, Chatelaine magazine, which is the oldest and most popular of our women's magazines, is subscribed to or at least reaches something like four million women a month. Now, Canada's population is about 35 million people. Do you have any idea of how unbelievable that is? The Wall Street Journal reaches about—is subscribed to by about 250,000 people. Our newspaper has about 225,000 subscriptions. Four million people? Every month? Women? All women. That's unbelievable.

So, like all the big American women's magazines, its mission is not to denigrate men but to entertain and flatter women. But it naturally skews feminism, since it draws its editors and regular writers from a pool of women steeped in feminist dogmas.

What do the magazines tell women? What are they primarily telling women? First of all—that women are highly stressed. They're very stressed. And you know why? Because they're trying to do it all. And you know, all this stress puts them in peril of stress-related disease. The health issues in magazines are huge; like, they're just constantly hinting … "Are you in menopause and you don't even know it yet?" I mean—"I don't know! I don't know! What are the symptoms? What are the symptoms?" Oh, and of course, they're very stressed because of the huge risk of abuse that they're at, by … men … amongst other scare-mongering trends. In other words, they're victims. They're victims, in other words, who at the same time owe it to themselves to be sexually satisfied, trim, youthful, well-groomed, and well-served by a loving husband and adoring children. If that is what they want. (Laughter.) If they don't, that's okay too … because there's no one way to be a woman.

We know that.

Motherhood … motherhood does feature large in these magazines, but it's usually in the context of the stress it involves.

For their socially conservative readers, the magazine always has wonderful recipes … and a story about the deep personal reflection that accompanied the decision to have an abortion. Not the right to have an abortion, that is never discussed. That is never discussed in a women's magazine, there are no arguments ever against having an abortion; but it's the stress. Emotional stress, of having an abortion. You can stress about that.

Health anxiety is, I said, stoked in these pages. At one point, American women magazines peddled the myth created by Gloria Steinem and Naomi Wolf that 150,000 women die of anorexia every year. Think about that … 150,000 die of anorexia, that's a lot … The actual figure is 100.

(Laughter.)

150,000 though, that sounds a lot better, doesn't it? Like if you're trying to —Oh! It's 150,000 girls and women suffer from anorexia—well, that's very different. But you know, well, suffer, die, what's the difference?

(Laughter.)

But some statistics often go unchallenged in an era of moral panic over women's alleged victimization. Again, this in not overt but covert misandry, since it is clearly understood by women that problems like anorexia are related to female self-image, and perceived lack of power, and we all know who has the power. Right.

For a rigorous analysis of many other such bogus statistics, I really recommend you re-read Christina Hoff Sommers' book, her 1994 book, Who Stole Feminism? It's as relevant today as it was 20 years ago.

Finally, we come to ads. Here is an area in which pandering blooms with abandon. After all, women make 85% of household purchases. And anyone who views consumer-product ads with a critical eye will soon realize that women, of course, are valorized, and men are usually either absent or ridiculed. Men aren't out-and-out … Ads do not make men out to be evil. But they do make them out to be incompetent, silly, foolish, you know, eye-rollingly dumb, you know all that sort of thing. But they're not actually hostile to men in these ads. But not always—every once in a while, marketing people surprise us because marketing people have no ideology. And occasionally, valorizing a Dad can sell a product.

I just want to gloss three ads and, you know, deconstruct them, in the parlance.

We start with Procter & Gamble, and their recent TV ad entitled, "Thanks, Mom!" Have you seen it? Anybody? The theme—which has nothing to do with the product; I forget what the product is, I just know it's by Procter & Gamble … it's probably Tampax or something, I don't know—the theme is the special bond between mothers and girls who grow up to be Olympic athletes. So we see touching scenes of moms at early morning training practices, cheering their daughters on at games, consoling them when they lose, high-fiving when they win. You see the anxiety on Mom's face when the stakes are high, the relief when a new technique pays off—and of course, the money shot of the athlete succeeding at the Olympics, and the big, teary, triumphant mother-daughter clinch.

… Where is Dad in this ad? He seems not to exist. Maybe he's just working so hard to pay the bills for the trainer and the coach, and renting the space on the ice or whatever. Don't dads support their (repeated) daughters' athletic dreams? Sure they do, in real life. But moms are the target demographic here. A dad in the picture would muddy the water. They don't—like it would—It has to be the mom.

But occasionally certain products do put out ads that validate fathers. There's a great one, you've got to see it. Just Google "Extra Gum, origami birds, dads daughters." You watch it—it's been seen by millions—and you'll cry. It starts off … it's just vignettes in the life of … first she's a little girl, with her father, and whatever they're doing, they're playing together, they're going to watch a baseball game, whatever they're doing, there's always a piece of gum involved. And each time they both put a piece of gum in their mouth, he takes the paper from the gum, he makes a kind of little origami bird for her. And then you see them … there's some bad times too, when she's a teenager, and you can see she's sobbing, somebody hurt her feelings or, you know, some social rejection or whatever it is, and again he gives her the little bird, he comforts her—it's nothing, like he's doing what dads do. Anyway, the last scene is, she's going off to university, she's a confident, happy young woman, her car is all packed, and Dad is just about to close the lid of her trunk when a box inside the trunk tips over. The top comes off, and out spills about 300 origami birds. She's kept … I'm a little verklempt, she's kept every single origami bird he ever made her. And he had no idea, of course … and she was taking them to college with her. Both of them recognize that these little birds are much more than the sum of their parts, and they share an emotional parting embrace. It's one of the most beautiful ads I've ever seen. Very touching. And what struck me about it was that the father was not doing anything extraordinary; he was just being a solid, loving, supportive presence in his daughter's life, which is what all good dads are.

Now contrast this with the "Thanks, Mom" ad. Why can't she just be a good mom of an ordinary girl? Why does she have to produce an Olympic athlete? Because Procter & Gamble was pandering to the inflated self-regard of women under the influence of feminism, which subliminally persuades them that mothering alone is not, in itself, a worthy project—unless it produces a "product." The biological correlative to becoming CEO of a Fortune 500 company, every feminist wants women to be, career-wise, so that that wins the entire world's admiration. Then it's worth being a mom. Right? If the payoff is your daughter becoming an Olympic athlete.

The ad featuring the dad didn't feel bound to puff up the egos of men. Paradoxically, the little story of the dad, being merely a dad, radiates a hundred times more authenticity, and a hundred times more the psychological scope for the average dad to identify his own situation with what he witnesses than the "Thanks, Mom" ad—What average mother can identify—"Oh, yeah, just when I, yeah, just when my daughter won the gold medal at the Olympics, I know, I know exactly how she feels, yes."

(Laughter.)

A third ad, made for Valspar Reserve paints—never buy Valspar Reserve paints—has both a mother and a father in it; but it ridicules and infantilizes fathers. It's called "Video Chat." It opens in a hotel room, with a woman executive in her "power suit" sitting on the bed, Skyping with, you know, Dad and the kids. She's obviously the major breadwinner in the family. She's checking in with her husband and children, at home, with Skype or FaceTime or whatever. So she asks, Is everything fine? and in a tight shot—or she says, How's everything going?—and a tight shot of Dad flanked by the kids, they grin and they assure her everything's totally under control. Everything is great. And so the call ends; then the shot pans wide, and you see that except for the little white square framing the computer screen, the kitchen is filthy beyond imagination. Ceiling, walls, floor, totally covered with dripping—I mean, it's disgusting. So it is clear that Dad is not managing well in Mom's absence, and that both he and the children have lied to cover this fact. Dad is therefore both incompetent and manipulative.

But again—it's not hostile. At first, when you see the ad, you actually laugh. You can't help it because the kitchen has this one little square of white, and the whole rest of the kitchen is, like, disgusting. So your first impulse is to laugh, and think, Okay, yeah, it makes Dad look simple. But the more you think about it, the more it's really very offensive.

Okay, I realize I've now come to the end of my time for this talk, and I have not come to a satisfactory conclusion; by which I mean I have not come up with any magic solutions to the problem of media misandry. The problem, of course, is only superficially the media, which only reflects social and cultural biases, after all. In our culture—media will never lead in a problem. They will only follow. So you can never expect … except, certain individuals in the media certainly can be courageous, but media itself, and large newspapers and stations, TV stations … you can't expect them to lead on this issue. They have to follow the grassroots.

So, if a culture is comfortable with the stereotyping of white heterosexual males, where it is uncomfortable stereotyping any other identifiable group, and allowing the negative behaviors of some men to color our attitudes to the vast majority of good men, if this is what our culture is telling us—the media is simply following the rules established by the culture. The only way to change that is institution by institution, or company by company. I think the best place to start is with the profit-motive people. If you can convince them—I think Mike's suggestion of political parties is great; I think that's one way to go—but when you have magazines, TV stations, companies that project these insulting ads, there has to be massive blowback to them. They get it from women. But they do not get it from men.

I think the worst ad I ever saw—it was a public-service announcement. I'm sorry I just need to take this extra minute. I wrote a column about it. I was so shocked and disgusted by it. Dallas Transit. Do you remember that ad? It's still not on? … No. Dallas Transit had, on the sides of their buses, huge pictures of children; and out of their mouths, bubbles saying … One was a little girl, saying, "When I grow up, my husband will kill me." Not "may"—"my husband will kill me." And coming out of a little boy's mouth, "When I grow up, I will beat my wife."

(Audience shock.)

Huge! On the sides of buses! Dallas Transit accepted these ads, paid for by women's groups. And … I thought, this can't be —well, they'll have to take them down because there will be such an outcry, right? Well, I called Dallas Transit, and I asked them about it, and they said, "No, we haven't had … you're the first journalist that's called; no, we have not had a lot of feedback on this, no…."

Well, anyways, that was more shocking to me than the ad itself.

And I know that if we can organize a conference like this, certainly you have to be able to organize campaigns of … pounding! The Dallas Transit Commission should be shamed in front of the nation. It should be like a national scandal. These ads—it doesn't take a hundred people to write in. You know, when you get a letter to the editor, I can tell you this: When newspapers get one letter to the editor, they know it represents a hundred people's point of view that didn't bother to write in. When they get ten letters on a subject—Wooo! There's a lot of interest out there! So don't think that only a few letters to the editor means nothing. It means—that's absolutely how they gauge public opinion. If, you know, I mean, if they got twenty-five or fifty letters? They'd think it was—"Omigod, we've got to have a feature article on this! We've got to really blow this up! This is huge!"

So, I just wanted to end by saying, the only way to change that is, we've got to remind institutions and influence-makers that it is morally wrong to do this; that in the case of products, offensive ads will earn them damaging criticism. And we have to do that in a respectful way. Terry Brannon, who couldn't be here today because he's with his kids, and it was bad timing—he's the director of a group that's one year old called "Leading Women for Shared Parenting." And I'm a member, and Terry's a member, and Suzanne is a member, and Diane is a member—we're all proud to be members of this group.

Anyways, Terry wrote the most wonderful letter to the CEO of Lowe's Paints, which is Valspar Reserve's parent company. And he just spelled it out, all the many ways the ad was infantilizing, and patronizing, and wrong … and it was just beautifully written. And I think if they got a lot of letters like that, they'd feel a little uncomfortable next time they made an ad that made dads look stupid!

Now, I also see changes in the media that may be subtle, but I think they are positive. For example, in my tenure at the Post—I'm now on my twelfth year there—I have seen at least four or five aggressively feminist, often cruelly misandrist, female columnists (none of—of course, my newspaper would never have anyone of such a description at, no)—the other newspapers, The Globe and Mail, the Toronto Star, which are the other two huge Canadian newspapers … there are at least four or five very cruelly misandrist female columnist who have left their jobs, and none of them willingly. One was retired; one was actually fired; one was, you know, they sort of, you know, struck a deal; and one in particular, one of the star writers of The Globe and Mail, she was producing misandrous writing of such viciousness that she was fired, not only for that; and subsequently, she was a columnist at Chatelaine magazine, this magazine I spoke of; and not by chance—I think, you know, sometimes you think you do a little bit of good—not by chance, I wrote an article about Chatelaine magazine, and I said "Chatelaine magazine has two regular columnists; both of them are ardent feminists, and that's one too many. Can't you find somebody else, that would, like, be a counterweight?" Shortly after that—I'm not saying it was me, just saying—shortly after that, she was let go, and now she's only writing online, which, I think, is a tremendous event, because she truly was a star.

Okay, I'll end by … many campus events, just to be positive there too, not to mention this conference, feature speakers that are disrupted, or they get death threats, or vandalism and all that. Some are foiled, but many do go forward, and thoughtful people are listening to what they have to say. So we should continue by doing exactly what we're doing, even if it seems like water dripping on a stone. And that we are gathered here for this conference is, in itself, a huge sign of progress, as others have said, and it's all true.

And on that congratulatory note, for those who put their shoulders to the wheel to make this happen, I will bring my remarks to a close.

Teach women not to hit men: Whoopi Goldberg defends Stephen A. Smith

Whoopi Goldberg is, once again, 100% right on this issue, and we thank her for it.

Being female does not give you an excuse to put your hands on anybody, nor does it give you a right to call names, belittle, mock, dare, and otherwise be verbally abusive.

Yes, all women, please, teach girls and women not to abuse men. Or as Erin Pizzey says, “People are not for hitting.”

Berlin Wall moments of history & #womenagainstfeminism

Dean Esmay · 31 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

History is often marked by moments that sometimes seem instantly recognizable as world-changing, while others only seem significant in retrospect, gradually rising in memory until we see how big they really were. Either way, in centuries past, these were often great battles, the coronation of certain kings, the signing of certain documents. In more recent centuries, great speeches and other events were sometimes recorded and remembered as pivotal moments. In the 20th century, these became prominent newspaper and television stories.

Today I think of a few such moments. And as always happens with such great moments, none mark the end of something so much as a turning point. Events leading up to them mattered, and events that followed mattered, but these moments stood out in such a way that no one can look at them and say they did not mark a seismic shift.

Long before the 21st century, one epochal moment was the signing of the Magna Carta, which at the time seemed little but a document that a defeated King signed in a moment of desperation to keep his crown, but which historians now generally recognize as the moment when certain fundamental rights were acknowledged to belong to people whether the governing powers liked it or not. The ideas expressed in that document sparked a change in how people thought of the very idea of "rights," first in England but slowly spreading across the world from there.

When Abraham Lincoln delivered his Gettysburg Address, it was almost 10 months after he had issued his Emancipation Proclamation, which had been an important but flawed document, for it did not free all slaves but merely slaves in rebel territories. And when he did give his speech at Gettysberg many months later, hardly anyone could hear him; people only noticed it after it was printed in newspapers. Furthermore, while he gave that speech a great and horrible civil war still raged around him. And slavery itself was not formally abolished universally in the United States until more than a year later, followed shortly thereafter by Lincoln's assassination.

Yet despite the strange circumstances of a speech few people even heard spoken, and the many significant related events that happened before and after, few historians today would question that the Gettysburg Address was a pivotal point in American politics, changing forever the history as we remember it; there was Before Gettysburg and After Gettysburg.

Another such event, a few years before my birth, was the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King's famous "I Have a Dream" speech in front of the Lincoln Memorial in August 1963. Casual students of history tend to unthinkingly behave as if somehow that speech was given and this was the end of the civil rights struggle for black Americans. But of course it was not; there had been nearly 100 years of civil rights activism for blacks after slavery was abolished, and King was only one of many who had come before him. Furthermore, by the end of 1963 King himself had already given many speeches in his career—in fact, had given variations on that very same speech before. Furthermore, after that speech, the world did not change overnight; it took another year or two for important civil rights legislation to seal the deal, and even then it was still not over, for within five years after there were race riots, the beginning of something called "white flight," and more. Some 50 year later, all racial divisions have not been healed in America.

Yet no one can hear that speech and not say, "This was a pivotal moment, a turning point where it became clear that change was not just desirable but inevitable, and on balance the world was better for it."

Of course, not all great events involve one single person. When the mostly-male (but some female) clientele of the Stonewall Inn began openly rebelling against the police in what eventually became known as the Stonewall Uprising in 1969, respect for the right of gay people to live their lives unharassed and unmolested did not break out across the world. Yet it marked the first time in modern history that gay people stood openly defiant against the establishment elite and said, "No, enough," refusing to back down. And it set in motion events that culminated in where we are in 2014; in the developed world most people now acknowledge that gay people do not require anyone's approval, and acknowledge that they should not be harassed, beaten, jailed, or killed, and should instead be free to live their lives as they choose, unmolested.

Still: if you were gay, there was Before Stonewall and there was After Stonewall.

In 1990, Nelson Mandela walked free after 27 years in South African prisons, surrounded by his controversial wife and a throng of admirers. The struggle to end apartheid did not end that day; it had raged for decades before that, and in the years after, there was still much to do, and a lot of dirty laundry had to be aired. A searingly difficult truth and reconciliation process lanced many boils, causing shame not only to those who had enforced apartheid but in many cases also exposing horrible excesses by some who had opposed it; Mandela's own family was not spared some embarrassment and discomfort. Mandela was a human being, not a god, and like King, like Lincoln, and like all of history's greats, he was not flawless.

But when Nelson Mandela walked from prison, the world changed, in the blink of an eye, and none can deny this:

As I've noted, not all great events involve one single person or group; often they are the result of a simple mass uprising. To this day, possibly the single most remarkable moment of joy for the world that I can remember is this one:

Was the fall of the Berlin Wall really one moment? Not exactly. Years of change within the Soviet Union and Warsaw Pact nations preceded it. But then a series of carelessly ambiguous statements by some East German bureaucrats and some confusion by some wall guards all came together in one startling set of events, and over a period of weeks people began walking through the gates, climbing over the wall, and finally, just plain tearing the damned thing down.

As a student of history, and a genuine hater of totalitarianism, I cannot watch film clips of the Berlin Wall falling without my eyes becoming wet. In a museum, I once got to touch a gigantic slab of that horrible wall that had been preserved for posterity; one side of it was solid gray with nothing but some large stenciled block numbers on it, and the other was colored with wild graffiti, letting you see immediately which side had been the free side and which the prison side. I put my palm flat to its cold suface, on the wildly colored side, and where I suppose others would have felt nothing but stone, I felt a shudder through my whole body, and I teared up.

Was the fall of that wall a "moment?" Yes, though it went on for weeks. Furthermore, did its fall make Russia and Eastern Europe sudden paradises on Earth? Certainly not. Reunifying Germany alone involved a lot of bitterness, recrimination, disappointment, and frustration. A quarter century later, events are unfolding in that part of the world that are not all positive. But no one can look at the fall of the Berlin Wall and deny that the world was one way before, and another way after, and that on the whole the world was better after.

And today I think I another such a great "moment" is upon us. Right here, right now.

Many decades of struggle led up to it. And there will be more struggles to come. But in 2014, a mainstream media feminist organ, the Huffington Post, commissioned a poll and found to its dismay that the overwhelming, crushing majority of women and men do not identify as feminists. And try as they might to hide their ideology behind the weak and inadequate dictionary definition, they could not avoid the fact that countless people who are not feminists believe in equality—and don't believe feminists when they say they do.

A conference was held amid protests and threats of boycott, vandalism, and death, while the most of the mainstream media laughed and mocked, with only a few taking it seriously—but it was held anyway, without apology and with women and men of different races, creeds, colors, and sexual orientations all agreeing that the rights and needs of men and boys matter, and that they are as deserving of compassion as anyone else, and that painting them as privileged oppressors is a hateful lie.

And to a person they agreed: no, feminism does not have all the answers.

Then, seemingly out of nowhere, another wall came tumbling down.

If written documents and speeches were what we tend to remember of the great moments before the 20th-century, and great televised moments in the late 20th century are what we most remember, I think the great moments of the 21st century will be those seen first on the Internet. And one such “Berlin Wall” moment, in 2014, is something we’re watching unfold as I write this. Like pictures of the Berlin Wall crumbling, it is not one event but a series of them, unfolding over time, in images that we can only catch glimpses of as more come in daily.

These pictures, these “selfies,” signal the end of something old and the beginning of something new. The ancien régime in the mainstream media and academia tremble, whipping between fear, confusion, condescension, and rage, none of which is going to make it stop. And it’s expanded beyond Facebook to Tumblr to Twitter.

Is the struggle over? Of course not. The establishment has known for a while now that the vast majority of women (and men) do not believe that feminism is about equality. But now the establishment has to face the fact that increasing number of people of all races, creeds, colors, orientations, and sexes are not afraid to say so. They won’t be hit over the head with a dictionary and told to shut up; they’re calling a lie a lie and they won’t be cowed into silence anymore. It’s the dictionary that needs to be updated to reflect reality, and the feminists and their apologists who need to be educated about it.

Will we see sexual equality and perfect relations between the sexes tomorrow? No. But this is an undeniable signal that a better world is on the way.

Feminists: you can stop the huffing and puffing and pouting and mocking and frenzied denials. None of that will work anymore. These women owe you nothing, and they know it. They owe you no deference. They owe you no particular respect. “No means no,” and they have said “no” to your ideology. We are the overwhelming majority, and we are not feminists.

So, what part of “no” do you not understand?

Women don’t owe you anything. Neither do men. We thank you for nothing, and we won’t let you use the dictionary to hide behind your lies and abuses anymore.

I have spent many years hoping that the world might change when it comes to these issues. And if anything, here’s your sign of the times:

Equality can pack quite a punch

Paul Elam · 31 July 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Some years ago I wrote a piece of satire, "If You See Jezebel in the Road, Run the Bitch Down." It was a response to an article at Jezebel.com wherein the women who write and frequent there bragged about physically abusing their male partners. It was an open glorification of intimate partner violence.

I took some very provocative Juvenalian shots in my article, reversing the gender roles on violence, with the intent of trying to make thoughtful people consider the double standards currently at play in our culture.

Not surprisingly, that piece has been (and still is) targeted regularly by everyone from low end Tumblr Feminists, to giants in the news media. It has been taken out of context every single time, and used to paint me as someone who endorses violence against women.

In fact, I cannot think of a single instance when anyone even bothered to acknowledge or point to the piece at Jezebel to which I was responding.

I was reminded of this recently in a video I watched of Whoopi Goldberg, who shocked her fellow cast members at The View by telling them that women who hit men should expect to get hit back. Whoopi was not only refreshing and entertaining because such plain-spokenness is rare these days in mainstream media, but because of the absolutely hysterical reaction of her co-hosts, who offered the predictable and shopworn, 'men should never, ever, ever, ever hit a woman no matter what. EVER.'

Well, slight correction, Jenny McCarthy allowed that men could defend themselves if and only if not doing so would result in their death.

Here, take a look at the video, and then I have a few things to say.

Correction. OMG, the Youtube account where this video was hosted has been terminated. Shocking. Sorry for the inconvenience. You will have to settle for a reprint of what Goldberg actually said:

> Let me just point out that the comment that he made is based on what the young lady said she did. She said, "I hit him," and I believe that was what Stephen was pointing out.
>
> If you hit somebody you cannot be sure you are not going to get hit back. You have to teach women – do not put your hands on anybody. Do not live with this idea that men have this chivalry thing still with them. Don't assume that that's still in play. Don't be surprised if you hit a man and he hits you back.
> If you make the choice as a woman who's 4-foot 3-inches and you decide to hit a guy who's 6-foot tall and you're the last thing he wants to deal with that day and he hits you back you cannot be surprised. Let's not kid anyone.

I want to offer a few words on this subject, and this time not in satire. I want to convey as honestly as possible, how I feel on the subject of violence between the sexes, from one man's point of view.

I am 6'8" tall and 285 pounds. If a woman five feet tall and 110 pounds soaking wet hits me, I am going to hit her back. I would do my best to return the violence proportionally, to just use enough force to stop the attack, but I can make no guarantees. Depending on the suddenness of the attack, the level of fear or threat I might feel, the impulse to self-defend in measured amounts is difficult, if not impossible to predict with any accuracy.

It is the same reaction I would have to a man. No more and no less. The only way to prevent this and the consequences that may result is for people to keep their hands off me.

That would not be sufficient for one of View's guest hosts, Asunción Cummings "Sunny" Hostin, a former assistant United States Attorney, who said:

> I've tried a lot of domestic violence cases. Men cannot hit women. Period. Ever.

And there's the rub, straight from a former prosecutor, who is saying, as though it is established law, that only violence by men against women is illegal; that men cannot even defend themselves when attacked by women, and strongly implying that women's unprovoked violence against men is acceptable.

If Hostin ever hit me, I would hit her back, too.

It is plainly obvious in the video that Goldberg was the only one at that table not verbalizing the idea that women had license to attack men physically, with legal and moral impunity. She was the only one there not living under the assumption that violence against men was a privilege women enjoyed, and that any retaliation by a man against physical aggression by a woman made her a victim.

That last ludicrous assumption was also provided by Hostin.

In the strange but real world of today, she is unfortunately correct.

ESPN Sportscaster Stephen A. Smith was suspended from his job for making the common sense observation related to the Ray Rice incident that women should not provoke violence with men. He was basing that on the knowledge that the woman Rice hit (and who later married him) had admitted to hitting him first.

Do I think the level of Rice's physical response to her was out of proportion? I do. But again, I am not in Ray Rice's shoes, and I have no idea what was running through his mind when he responded to being attacked.

Most people who frequent this site know that men who call for help from police when being assaulted by female intimate partners are likely to be arrested for their troubles. And as demonstrated perfectly well in this video, there are prosecutors that will happily give the victim a criminal record and make them pay dearly for having been attacked.

This idea is completely insane on its face. Not only that, it is the closest thing we have today to the mentality of slave owners who could flog their slaves because they were property.

There was one ray of sunshine in this whole sad affair, even aside from Goldberg, who stood her ground morally and cogently like a champion.

It was the audience, who being an audience of The View I suspect was largely female. Judging by their audible support for what Goldberg was saying, I imagine it was an audience of mostly women who don't run around slapping men, expecting a "you go girl," in return.

I am not getting giddy about it. It was an audience at a competitor show, The Talk, who also laughed hysterically when Sharon Osbourne made jokes about a man whose wife cut his penis off and put it in a garbage disposal because he wanted a divorce.

Still, the message (or at least the suspicion) that men are human beings seems to be settling into the minds of some people these days, including a growing number of women.

We can only hope that it will just take more reason and morality, not right hooks, to get the message across that no one should be hit.

And that is the point here. Men who still practice mindless chivalry will look at what I am saying with disgust and horror. So will most feminists, who share the proverbial bed with chivalrous men much more often than they would care to admit.

Neither of these camps can understand the simple assumptions that instigating violence is wrong, and that self-defense is a human right. Both camps view men as default punching bags and will go to the most insane and immoral extremes to prove it. That holds true whether carting a man with a black eye to jail, or punishing and publicly humiliating a sportscaster for cautioning women that attacking men might result in physical retribution.

Will we ever live in a society that shuns all violence; that does not glorify it from one sex and demonize it in the other, even when in self-defense?

I don’t know, and I don’t know anyone who does. But I do know that human rights are not something you maintain by asking for them or waiting on anyone or anything to bestow them.

Ten reasons false rape accusations are common

Jonathan Taylor · 1 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists and their ideological allies routinely dismiss and trivialize the experiences of men falsely accused of rape by claiming that "only 2% of rape accusations are false—the same as false reports of other crimes." They also invoke this claim as a rationalization to erode due process for the wrongly accused—especially in academia, where male students are often effectively guilty until proven innocent.

The 2% claim is more than just an erroneous figure. It is a lie. Substantial evidence exists that—when taken together—confirms that false rape accusations occur substantially more often than false reports of other crimes.

Given the inherent flaws in measuring criminological behavior, the rate of false rape accusations cannot be dictated by any individual criterion. Instead, it must be triangulated by multiple factors. When taken together, these factors confirm that false rape accusations occur substantially more often than false reports of other crimes. Ten of those factors are listed below.

This is a compilation-style AVFMS post with extensive source citations. Let it be a resource to anyone interested in raising awareness of the problem of false accusations and challenging those who dare repeat the lie that only 2% of rape claims are false.

The Reasons

1. Experts working in the trenches of the criminal justice system report that, in light of their experience, false rape accusations are much higher.

Criminal justice professionals have the power to investigate rape with far greater accuracy than academics. The latter regularly rely on survey research for criminological data, which often involves simply taking the respondent's answers to their questions (many of which are tailored to corral respondents into answering in a particular way) as gold.

At the same time, they abstain from conducting an independent investigation into the crime scene, evidence, eyewitness statements, cross-examining statements by the accuser, interviewing the accused, and so forth.

Criminal justice professionals do all these things. Thus, their experience is not to be taken lightly. This is especially true the more experienced they are. Consider the words of veteran sex-crimes prosecutor Craig Silverman:

> For 16 years, I was a kickass prosecutor who made most of my reputation vigorously prosecuting rapists. I am unaware of any Colorado prosecutor who put as many rapists away for as much prison time as I did during my prosecutorial career. Several dozen rapists are serving thousands of years as a result of my efforts.
> However, during my time as a prosecutor who made case filing decisions, I was amazed to see all the false rape allegations that were made to the Denver Police Department. It was remarkable and surprising to me. You would have to see it to believe it.
>
> Any honest veteran sex assault investigator will tell you that rape is one of the most falsely reported crimes that there is. A command officer in the Denver Police sex assaults unit recently told me he placed the false rape numbers at approximately 45 percent. Objective studies have confirmed this. See Purdue Professor Kanin's nine-year study published in 1994 concluding that over 40 percent of rape allegations were demonstrably false.
> The above statements are heresy to say publicly for many politically correct prosecutors. That is especially true if they want to maintain good relations with the victim advocacy community.[1]

Note that not only does Silverman say that false rape accusations happen with remarkable regularity, but also that there is a culture that stifles speech daring to voice this inconvenient truth.

Oftentimes, whenever police or prosecutors speak the truth about the rate of false rape accusations, feminist and related interest groups demand that they undergo "sensitivity training." What this really means is that they must be intimidated, browbeaten, threatened, and coerced into apologizing for stating an inconvenient truth.

These groups also tend to advocate definitions of rape that fly in the face of the legal (real) definitions and are simply out of touch with how crimes must be investigated.

Despite this, however, police will occasionally show off-the-cuff candor. After investigating a woman's claim that turned out to be false, Captain Randy Lewis of Rexburg PD told reporters that "we run into that all the time."[2] After a similar investigation, Captain Lynn Mitchell of the U Police said, "Rape is a very ugly, violent crime which law enforcement and the community take very seriously. However, there are many fraudulent reports of rape each year."[3]

After a woman falsely accused a man of rape in Orlando, FL, police told local news reporters that false reporting "has reached an epidemic level."[4] They then made a point to ask the community stop making so many false rape claims because it was draining precious resources from the criminal justice system.[5]

Sgt. Sandra Tomeo of Plano PD told reporters for the Plano Star Courier that false rape accusations were "a common occurrence," citing numbers indicating that ~47% of rape accusations made to Plano, TX, police were demonstrably false.[6]

Speaking to the Warrington Guardian, Detective Dougie Shaw said:

> We have anything up to four or five reports of rape every weekend but a large number of complaints turn out to be something else with some not thinking about the consequences of false allegations. But we always take allegations of rape seriously and do everything we can to gather evidence.

> Most weekends we also have a report from somebody saying their drink has been spiked with rohypnol—while we have had cases where women have been drugged these are extremely rare. We actually have significantly less genuine rape cases than those reported so it is important to consider the percentage of bona fide reports when looking at conviction statistics, which appear low because they encompass all reports.[7]

Barbara C. Johnson, a former attorney with ~20 years experience and an advisor to the Massachusetts Bar Association's Bicentennial Committee, also describes the rate of false rape accusations as being excessively high in her book Behind the Black Robes: Failed Justice.[10]

2. Rape claims are made for a much wider variety of reasons than false accusations of other crimes

The nature of false rape accusations is different from false reports of other crimes in ways that distinctively facilitate false rape claims. Accusing someone of rape claims requires virtually no physical evidence. For this reason, rape lies can be flung about for all sorts of reasons.

Rape lies are sometimes concocted as a form of revenge to land ex-boyfriends and ex-husbands in jail or as a means to get rid of a current partner. A woman may lie about rape to cover up the fact that she is cheating on her husband, which sometimes results in her husband killing her lover. Sometimes, if the husband is having an affair, the woman the man is having an affair with will falsely accuse him of rape if she is caught by his wife.

Some female students falsely accused their teacher of rape because they get poor final grades in class or as an excuse for failing their exams. Other women make up false claims simply to get attention or because they regret a consensual sexual encounter. In some cases, women lie about rape to get an abortion (see here and here). There is also a rash of feminists who make false rape claims (especially in academia) as a means to "raise awareness" of the problem of rape.

Sometimes entire groups of men are falsely accused, which happened at Duke[11] and Hostra universities. While both cases were highly publicized and accompanied by public outcry, neither false accuser was charged. One woman cried rape because a man forgot her name.

There is also virtually no limit to which some women will go to fabricate a false claim. Some women seek out S&M/bondage encounters and use the rough sex as "evidence" against the men they falsely accuse. Some women give themselves black eyes, or rip their clothes and scratch their faces, or cut themselves, or tie themselves up as "evidence" against the men they falsely accuse.

There are also some women who use false rape claims as a means of extorting money from men. In some places, women who claim rape can immediately apply for "victim's compensation," which has led some women to lie about rape just to be handed free money.

When was the last time you heard of someone being falsely accused of murder for such a wide range of reasons?

3. False rape accusations are rarely punished, removing the deterrent to falsely accuse.

Why do people do bad things? Often because they can. The absence of law and law enforcement tends to embolden the corrupt and corrupt the good.

Listen to this excerpt from my April 2012 interview with A&M-Commerce's Title IX Coordinator Michele Vieira on the systemic lack of punishments for false accusers in academia. Keep in mind that a Title IX Coordinator is the one who, along with the Dean of Students/Student Affairs personnel, investigates accusations of sexual misconduct on campus:

http://voices.avoiceformen.com/avfm/wp-content/uploads/sites/2/2014/07/michele-vieira-title-ix-coordinator-am-commerce-false-accusations-systemically-unpunished.mp3
Even in cases that receive a high degree of public outcry false accusers are not charged. The infamous false accuser Crystal Mangum in the 2006 Duke lacrosse false rape case was not charged either despite overwhelming evidence that she lied. This news outlet reports about a woman who was spared jail despite making not one, not two, but eight false rape claims.[8] Another woman finally was jailed for a false rape claim, but only because it was the third time.[9]

At Hofstra University, Danmell Ndonye falsely accused five young men of gang rape as an alibi to her boyfriend for having sex with several men in a restroom. Even though one of the young men recorded the incident with his phone and proved she lied, she was never charged with a crime.

Even when police acknowledge the high rate of false rape accusations (as I documented earlier in this post), the false accusers are not charged. And when they are charged, it is often on the grounds that they waste police resources or damage the credibility of rape victims, not that they put men through a living hell.

What does the absence of any public mention of the harm to the wrongly accused—on the rare occasion that false accusations are punished at all—say about how much society values their humanity?

4. Numerous studies have concluded that false rape accusations are significantly higher than false accusations of other crimes.

All research is flawed to a greater or lesser degree, and research on false rape claims is no exception. What research we do have is troubling, however.

Dr. Eugene Kanin is a retired sociologist at Purdue University. As an early feminist he pioneered awareness and study of the concept of date rape. In the 1990s he authored a study on the prevalence of false rape accusations that concluded that 41% of the accusers —which were in fact all of the accusations made to the police department of a small metropolitan area over a ten-year period—were false.

The primary reasons he cited for making false claims were "providing an alibi, seeking revenge, and obtaining sympathy and attention." This is consistent with news coverage of many false rape claims, as mentioned in section 3 above.

Those who critique his study often attempt to distract others from the implications of the data by pointing to irrelevant elements of the study. For example, they will point to the fact that polygraph tests were administered to the accusers as though this somehow seriously impacts the data, without mentioning that such tests were also administered to the accused.

Kanin's critics will also often ignore the most powerful evidence from his study: the police only considered an accusation false when the accusers themselves admitted it, regardless as to whatever they themselves thought about the case. Given that there were likely numerous false accusers who did not recant this means the 41% false rape figure is actually the floor, and the real percentage may be significantly higher.

Kanin's study is also cited by criminal justice professionals as consistent with their experiences, such as sex-crimes prosecutor Craig Silverman earlier in this article.

This isn't the only study, however; Dr. Charles McDowell investigated false claims in the military as well. The findings:

> A review of 556 rape accusations filed against Air Force personnel found that 27% of women later recanted. Then 25 criteria were developed based on the profile of those women, and then submitted to three independent reviewers to review the remaining cases. If all three reviewers deemed the allegation was false, it was categorized as false.
> As a result, 60% of all allegations were found to be false. Of those women who later recanted, many didn't admit the allegation was false until just before taking a polygraph test. Others admitted it was false only after having failed a polygraph test.[12]

While the most problematic element in these studies is determining how representative these sample sizes are of the general population of accusers, the implications of the data are troubling even when interpreted charitably in favor of accusers. If the average rate of false accusations for crimes in general is ~2%, what does it mean when it is generous to say that the rate of false rape accusations is at least ten times that amount, and likely much higher?

A 1996 Department of Justice report documented that "in about 25% of the sexual assault cases referred to the FBI … the primary suspect has been excluded by forensic DNA testing."[13] In other words, the DNA found on the accuser didn't match that of the accused.

It is possible (though unlikely in most such cases) that the DNA mismatches are the result of misidentifications and that a rape really did occur. However, as feminists themselves tell us, most rape does not involve strangers jumping out of the bushes. They are committed by a person the accuser knows.

It is important to remember that this figure only represents cases that were referred to the FBI, a limitation. However, it should also be noted that even a DNA match would not in itself prove that a rape occurred; all it would prove is that intercourse occurred. A significant number of accusations involving a DNA match are false as well, meaning that more than 25% of the cases referred to the FBI in the 1996 DoJ report were false accusations.

5. The "scholarship" that "proves" false rape accusations are around 2% is little more than intellectual fraud and not based on any real investigation.

As Edward Greer, J.D., states in the Loyola of Los Angeles Law Review, "no study has ever been published which sets forth an evidentiary basis for the 'two percent false rape complaint' thesis," and that "without exception every scholarly or semi-scholarly source that utilizes the two percent false claim proposition can ultimately be traced back to Against Our Will."

Against Our Will is a book on rape by feminist Susan Brownmiller that was published in the 1970s. Brownmiller claims that she was given the figure by a professional in the criminal justice system. We are given no evidence other than her word that this was ever the case.

Nonetheless, Brownmiller's claim was cited by one feminist professor after another. Since citing a professor instead of an unverifiable anecdote from a lone feminist gives the claim a greater appearance of merit, once one professor cites it, the next professor cites that professor, and so on. Eventually a labyrinthine web of citations is constructed. In the end, however, they all point to this one source, a source that is obviously biased and cannot be verified.

It also bears mention that as a group feminist professors behave very much like a cult rather than a scholarly community. Not only do they tend to favor obscurantism and rail against objectivity (see the famous atheist Richard Dawkins describing this phenomenon), but they also tend to cite only those within their narrow, insular circle and shun voices from the outside. Much like the charge of blasphemy among religious zealots, when their arguments fall through they often resort to making personal accusations against those who disagree with them ("Misogyny!").

This lack of quality control has led to a great amount of academic fraud among the feminist community—some of which is laughably bad. The 2% false rape figure is yet another example of this.

6. The higher the rate of rape underreporting, the higher the rate of false rape reports will be.

It is the nature of rape that the crime itself is underreported. When it comes to false rape complaints, the exact opposite is the case. Indeed, a false rape complaint derives most of its power from the very fact that it is reported.

When underreporting occurs, it narrows the pool of genuine rape complaints. This means that a greater percentage of rape complaints will turn out to be false, since those claims are not underreported. The video below explains this phenomenon more clearly:

7. It is harder to prove that a rape accusation is false than other false accusations; therefore, there is less disincentive to falsely accuse.

Simply put, it is harder to prove a negative ("prove you didn't do it!") in he said/she said cases. Accusers can also make false accusations of rapes that supposedly occurred years earlier and tarnish the reputations of those they accuse, all without evidence. The lack of evidence may make it difficult to move her case forward, but it will also make it difficult to bring a case against her as well.

8. Female students are systemically taught that sex is rape when it is not, essentially being taught to make false rape accusations.

Accusations of rape that fall outside the legal definition of the crime are false rape accusations. The administrations of many schools, however, think that they are a law unto themselves when they brand this-or-that student a rapist based upon their own "extralegal" definitions of rape, which they often adopt at the demand of feminists. They are mistaken.

They are also mistaken when they encourage female students to accuse male students of rape based upon these extralegal definitions. In short, what they are actually doing is encouraging female students to make false rape accusations.

Goshen College once famously declared a new form of rape called "psychological rape," saying that "psychological rape consists of verbal harassment, whistles, kissing noises, heavy breathing, sly comments or stares. These are all assaults on any woman's sense of well-being."[14]

And that's just the start. Below are a few examples of other school policies, warehoused at the key AVFMS post on "Rights and Protections for Men and Boys in Education." Some schools:

- Declare that, in regards to consent, "no always means no" but "yes does not always mean yes," and hold that body language, context, tone, etc.—even when they contradict words expressing consent—may be used to convict a male student but cannot be used to acquit him. Example: Occidental College.
- Declare that accusers who are drunk are not capable of agency, whereas those accused who are drunk are capable of agency (i.e., by punishing a male student when both the accuser and the accused are drunk and have sex). Example: Mississippi State University (see here and here).
- Adopt an "affirmative consent" policy, which declares that the accused must prove that the accuser verbalized her consent by explicitly stating "yes" at each degree of the sexual encounter. For example, if the woman said "yes" when a man kissed her but not "yes" when he touched her breast, it is an act of sexual assault. Nods, winks, and other gestures do not count toward consent. Examples: St. Louis University, Elon University, and Gettysburg College.
- Adopt a policy that a woman's consent is not valid if the person she accused of rape "is perceived as more powerful" than the accuser. Examples: Duke University, Vassar College, and Loyola Marymount University.
- Lastly, schools are continuously pushed to adopt broader and more draconian measures in addition to the ones they already have. Example: the "enthusiastic consent" standard advocated at Harvard, whereby sexual assault occurs if a woman's consent is not sufficiently "enthusiastic" (according to extreme feminist standards of "enthusiasm"). This policy was at least adopted at Vassar College and Loyola Marymount University.

9. The community opposed to acknowledging the problem of false rape accusations while supporting the 2% figure has an ideological agenda that is notoriously bigoted and anti-male.

The more vociferously an idea is opposed by a group of narrow-minded and bigoted dogmatists, the greater the likelihood that the idea they oppose is actually true. This is especially true when it comes to how feminists and their ideological allies treat men who are wrongly accused of rape.

Feminist and former ACLU board member Wendy Kaminer is famous for saying, "It is a primary article of faith among many feminists that women don't lie about rape, ever; they lack the dishonesty gene."[14] This is, of course, demonstrably false.

Not only do many feminists view false rape accusations as insignificant, but some also view them as a justifiable vengeance that should be inflicted upon men. Many feminists are notoriously hostile to due process, resembling more the nature of medieval witch-hunters than enlightened progressives.

Many prominent feminists also adopt radically broad definitions of rape. These "all sex is rape" feminists inevitably include many innocent men within the scope of those they falsely label as rapists. Here are a few quotes from feminists in academia, which are warehoused (among many others) on the key AVFMS page "The Language of Misandry in Academia":

"Feminism is built on believing women's accounts of sexual use and abuse by men."

—Feminist Professor Catharine MacKinnon, Feminism Unmodified, p. 5.

"They [victims of false rape accusations] have a lot of pain, but it is not a pain that I would necessarily have spared them. I think it ideally initiates a process of self-exploration. 'How do I see women?' 'If I didn't violate her, could I have?' 'Do I have the potential to do to her what they say I did?' Those are good questions."

—Dr. Catherine Comins, assistant dean of students at Vassar College. Source: TIME magazine.

"I'm really tired of people suggesting that you're somehow un-American if you don't respect the presumption of innocence, because you know what that sounds like to a victim? Presumption you're a liar."

—Wendy Murphy, adjunct professor of law and sex-assault victim advocate, commenting on the Duke lacrosse false rape case. Source: National Public Radio.

"If a woman did falsely accuse a man of rape, she may have had reasons to. Maybe she wasn't raped, but he clearly violated her in some way."

—Ginny, college senior interviewed by TIME magazine (source here).

"It's obviously one of the big side effects, if it could result in an innocent person being found guilty. But I think sexual assault is such a big issue that it's worth the risk."

—First-year student Steph Winters at the University of Maryland on the school lowering its standard of evidence to "convict" male students of sexual assault. Source: The Diamondback (school newspaper).

"So many women get their lives totally ruined by being assaulted and not saying anything. So if one guy gets his life ruined, maybe it balances out."

—Oberlin sophomore Emily Lloyd, after feminist students were criticized for placing posters around campus that bore the title "Rapist of the Month," and below that heading a name of a freshman male drawn randomly from the campus registry. Source: the Toledo Blade.

"There is no clear distinction between consensual sex and rape, but a continuum of pressure, threat, coercion and force. The concept of a continuum validates the sense of abuse women feel when they do not freely consent to sex."

—Dr. Liz Kelly, The Hidden Gender of Law, p. 350.

"Politically, I call it rape whenever a woman has sex and feels violated."

—Dr. Catharine MacKinnon, Feminism Unmodified, p. 82.

"Sexual violence includes any physical, visual, verbal or sexual act that is experienced by the woman or girl, at the time or later, as a threat, invasion or assault that has the effect of hurting her or degrading her and/or taken away her ability to control intimate contact.'"

—Dr. Liz Kelly, Surviving Sexual Violence, p. 41.

"In this book we will be using the term victim to refer to people who claim to have been sexually assaulted."

—Drs. Carol Bohmer and Andrea Parrot, Sexual Assault on Campus, p. 5.

10. False rape accusations are the dark side of female nature/socialization.

In his study on false rape accusations, Dr. Eugene Kanin said:

> [S]omething biological, legal, and cultural would seem to make false rape allegations inevitable. If rape were a commonplace victimization experience of men, if men could experience the anxiety of possible pregnancy from illicit affairs, if men had a cultural base that would support their confidence in using rape accusations punitively, and if men could feel secure that victimization could elicit attention and sympathy, then men also would be making false rape accusations.

> But they don't.

Writing for the Washington City Paper, feminist Amanda Hess argued that a woman who has consensual sex she later regrets once it becomes public "must defend her femininity by saying that she had been coerced into sex." Men, however, do not make false rape accusations because they regret consensual sexual encounters with unattractive women.

This is not to say that men are all angels. There are some forms of evil that are distinctive (though not unique) to men. But false rape accusations are not one of them; on the contrary, they are overwhelmingly (and almost exclusively) a female domain.

Some might say, "So you're saying women have a dark side to them. How does that make you different from the feminists you criticize?" That is quite simple. Feminists say men are bad and women are good. In their worldview, women are never capable of evil—or if they are, it is only because they are mirroring the evil of men (as Hess argues later in her article).

I say that both men and women are bad and good, although they sometimes demonstrate this in different ways. At the end of the day, everyone is accountable for the good and the bad they do. You won't find many feminists advocating ideas like that.

But even if the 2% figure were true ...

It is abundantly obvious by now that the claim of "only 2% of rape accusations are false" is a lie. But even if it were true, would it matter? Would it be a justifiable reason to brush aside the experiences of the wrongly accused, as Feminists & Friends so often do? Let's look at it a different way by examining another low statistic.

Medical studies report that of women who are raped, roughly 5% of them will become pregnant. In June 2013, Republican Trent Franks argued that women who become pregnant from a rape should not be allowed to seek abortions because the rate of pregnancy resulting from rape is extremely low.

Feminists did not challenge the 5% statistic but instead became livid that anyone would consider disregarding the experiences of such women, even if they were only 5% of the total.

So I must ask: What's the big difference between 2% and 5%? If 2% is so petty and trivial—indeed, next to nothing—what makes 5% worthy of a full-scale national uproar? If we behaved like feminists, wouldn't we treat those 5% of rape victims who become pregnant very similarly to how they treat the 2% of men who (they erroneously claim) are falsely accused?

Do you think feminists would accept such an arrangement? You know the answer.

Acid attacks in Italy – Manipulation of the public

Silvio Altarelli · 1 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Acid attacks were unknown in Italy until 2009, when feminist journalists started to attack all men by talking about female victims of acid attacks in East Asia and Africa, painting it as a gender issue. The reality is that men are 48% of the victims of acid attacks in Cambodia, 18% in Bangladesh, 43% in Uganda, 60% in Nigeria, and we could go on like this. The reality is that this issue is both rare and non-gendered.

But only in one case did the press write about a man attacked with acid, and the title was as egregious as it gets: Nabila, the courageous woman who launched an acid attack against her 21-year-old boyfriend.

As a consequence of this topic being brought up in the media, the Italian public learned as follows: after 2009, 16 persons have been attacked with acid in Italy: 9 women and 7 men.

At this point, the feminist press could select a single victim as the symbol of the struggle that their ideology promotes. Of course, all men and children who were victims of acid attacks were discarded. A few women were discarded as well: one was a politician attacked by a man, another one was attacked by a woman, and another one claimed that she was attacked by men, but the police discovered that she threw acid on herself in order to build a false allegation.

Lucia Annibali, a female lawyer attacked by her ex-lover, had the politically correct victim profile. So she was heavily promoted: in some days we could see her in the morning, at lunch, at dinner, in major TV programs. She got prizes: the president of Italy (an 89-year-old ex-communist) nominated her with the title of "Cavaliere" (Knight). The feminist president of parliament received her. Luckily, Lucia mostly recovered from the aesthetic damages she suffered. Her aggressors were charged with attempted homicide and sentenced to 20 + 14 + 14 years and ordered to pay her €1.8 million in reparations.

Amongst the other forgotten victims was William Pezzullo. When his girlfriend started lying to him, he broke up with her. When he became a victim of stalking, he did not react, not even when his car was damaged. At some point his ex-girlfriend contacted her previous boyfriend. They then conspired and attacked William by hitting him on the head, and then she threw acid on him. After 20 days of intensive care he survived, but he was left severely disabled following the ordeal: he was left both deaf and blind.

The prosecutor refused to charge her with attempted homicide, stating that "we do not wish to create a monster," despite evidence that she had searched the Internet for the most aggressive type of acid to use. They got sentenced to 10 years of jail each, which in Italy essentially means five years of real jail for the man and zero for the woman. Indeed, the woman who attacked William is a mother, and according to an Italian feminist law, mothers should and indeed can avoid going to jail, even in situations like these.

William got no compensation so far, so his family sold their commercial business in order to pay for the treatments he needs (recovery from an acid attack is considered an aesthetic and elective procedure and it is thus not covered by state insurance). He is assisted by his mother, Paola Tomarelli, who told the Italian press:

> William has not improved at all, [on the contrary,] he is getting worse [and] we are desperate. One eye was completely lost, but at least with the other he could see shadows, and some movements. Now he does not see anything … The plastic reconstruction surgery failed to achieve the results; we took him to several hospitals, where they tried to rebuild using muscles and tissues from the neck, but now he is worse than before. William suffered for three months before leaving the intensive care unit. [The doctors] were not sure whether they'd be able to save his life. For 16 months now he is closed in our house and we leave the house only to bring him to hospitals or specialists. We are desperate, he is not self-sufficient, he will never become self-sufficient [and] this is the most dramatic aspect.

In theory, the president of Italy should be the president of everybody: so Paola Tomarelli and others wrote him asking for help for William. They only got an answer written by some woman in his staff: a letter that claims that men should be represented not by a victim but by some actors who appeared in a feminist advertisement saying, ‘We do not hit women.” The president’s office essentially told them that William was the wrong sex. You can’t make this stuff up! Read the letter here (in Italian).

Did feminists have a good reason for this disgusting operation that ruined the life of 16 persons? Yes, they had 82 million good reasons. This is the amount of public funds (in euros) that they wanted to obtain for their women-only shelters. That’s over US$110 million.

Finally, today, feminists got their Istanbul Convention ratified in Italy. Women and men are no longer equal under the law, not even formally. Men are perpetrators, women are victims. William is a perpetrator, Lucia is a victim. By virtue of their sex.

It was the feminist ideology who used to declare this. Now it’s the law. Politicians and judges now have a legal justification to discriminate against William, and against all men.

In the meantime, William’s family has lost everything, and now William’s mother is asking for charity as William might be able to see again, via a black-and-white camera installed in an eye, provided that they will be able to raise the €100,000 (US$134,300) needed for the medical intervention.

Tom Golden: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Tom Golden · 2 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: We will over the next few weeks continue to present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. Tom Golden was our seventh speaker on Day 1, June 27, 2014. His "men are good" refrain was referred to by multiple media. Thanks as always to Rick Westlake for doing the hard work of putting these transcripts together. —DE

(Introduction by Attila Vinczer.)

Thank you, Barbara, for that stellar presentation. You are a breath of fresh air.

I should tell you, when we had the Dallas Transit—that horrific ad—it was at a time when I was working with Glenn Sacks (and Robert Franklin, who will be here tomorrow.) We did tremendous work to put incredible pressure on that transit system. I also called them; they eventually buckled and removed those signs.

Our next speaker is Tom Golden, named one of the Washington area's top trauma therapists by Washingtonian Magazine. He wrote three books on the topic of men and healing: Swallowed by a Snake, A Man You Know Is Grieving, and The Way Men Heal. He has been featured in The New York Times, The Washington Post, and has appeared on CNN, CBS Evening News, ESPN, and the NFL Channel. He also served as the Vice Chairman of the Maryland Commission for Men's Health.

He runs a private counseling practice working with men, women, and children in crisis and bereavement. He has presented workshops about men and boys' unique paths of healing in over 100 cities in the United States, Canada, Australia, and Europe. He created and maintains the Internet's first interactive grief-counseling website, webhealing.com. He is a certified expert at—excuse me. He is certified as an expert witness on the topic of grief—grieving. He worked as the only male counselor for 11 years at the St. Francis Center, which focuses on dying, on the dying and bereaved. He has been married for 30 years, and has a son and a daughter. Please put your hands together for Tom Golden.

(Applause. Tom Golden takes the podium.)

Ah, let's see what we've got here … The most important thing he said is I'm the father of a son and a daughter. And of that I'm very proud.

Okay, we're going to change gears a little bit because what I want to talk about is … can be summed up in one made-up word: "MenAreGood." I want to say that again—Men Are Good!

That's not the message we've been hearing for 40, 50 years. In fact, it's not the message that I got when I was in a counseling center. I'd just got out of grad school. I thought, I'm going to do some good work. I get to this counseling center, and what do I find? I find there were 17 therapists there; 16 were women, and one was a guy; that was me. So what did they do? They sent all the men to me! 'Cause, what were the women saying? Women were saying things like "Men don't grieve. Men aren't dealing with their feelings. They're stuck in all this stuff. Right?" Have you heard those lines before? How many men in this audience have heard that? "You're not dealing with your feelings."

Well, I'm here to tell you that we're going to talk about how you, in fact, probably are dealing with it. But you're dealing with it in ways that people don't know about yet because really it's all pushed underneath; you can't even see it. But it's out there; and it took me about 30 years to figure it out. And I'm going to summarize in about 30 seconds what it took me 30 years to figure out. And that is this: In general, men will tend to heal themselves through an action—or an inaction, pulling back and being quiet—that uses honoring, and pulls them into the future.

I'll say it again: Men will tend to use action or inaction, and honoring within those two things, to pull them into the future, and through that, what do they do? They heal.

Now, you can see why that—really, it was unseeable at the time, because our culture pretends that the only way to heal is to what? Talking about it, and crying. Right? Oh, my gosh—you know, when I first—I got out of grad school, right? I go to work, I sit down with these guys, and I make good eye contact, just like they taught me in grad school, right? You make good eye contact. Do men like eye contact? NO! Not in the same way as women like eye contact. With the women clients I have, it was great. I could tell they relaxed, they felt calm … With the men, I found I was making them nervous! Of course, now I know what's happening; men, when they're with other men—eye contact does not mean connection and intimacy. It means something else—what does it mean? Challenge! Put 'em up! Hockey has a face-off! Boxers face each other! Right? This is a challenge, this is not something that's going to make you safe, like, oh, now I can talk about the past … Nooooo! Hell, no!

You know, what I found out, of course, since then, was the honoring and action—Men do it shoulder to shoulder. They're much more likely to do something shoulder to shoulder with each other. Men will sit in a fishing boat all day, shoulder to shoulder. They'll leave that fishing boat after the day, they'll feel close to that guy. But they didn't say one word. Words are not that critical. It's something else that's critical; in fact, sometimes I'll think this masculine way of intimacy, of being close, which is being with, is really in some ways more developed than "just a lot of talk." But that's my bias. Maybe it's not yours.

Anyway … And it is? (Laughter.)

So I got the message that, you know, men were not such good things because they couldn't deal with their feelings so much. And it took me this 30 years to come and tell you what I just told you. We're going to talk about the different ways they do that, later on. But the first thing I want to talk about is … why could I not see it at the time? Why could I not see the way these men were healing? What was it that blinded me, and what was it that made it invisible, so we couldn't see the men's pain? And the very first thing is, a man's pain is taboo. A man's pain is taboo. You've heard speakers all day today, talking about that in certain ways, but a man's pain is taboo. No one wants to touch it, no one wants to hear it. And men are not dumb; they know that. So what are they going to do—go emote in public? Noooo! They know their pain is taboo.

Now—let's do an exercise. I want you to imagine that you're walking into your favorite restaurant. You walk in, you get seated, and you're thinking, "Mmmmmm"—and you look over in the corner, and at the corner table, there's a woman, and she's crying. What's the first thing you think about her? Anybody? … What's wrong? Poor dear, she's upset, right? I've asked this question of thousands of therapists in the workshops I give. I'm telling you, they all say the same thing. "Poor dear. She must have just broken up with someone. She needs support, how can I help?" Right? Does that make sense?

Okay. Erase that image. Go back, and you're walking in the same restaurant, you're walking by, and you notice over in that corner table there's a guy, and he's crying. What's your first reaction? … Get away! Wimp! What else? … Drunk! Exactly! This is what I hear over and over again—people immediately come up with that. I came up with that, and I was working with them! This is not something that is just a couple of people. Almost all of us have this bias that is built-in, that says, 'Man's pain—get away! There's something wrong with that guy. He's probably drunk, you know? So we're all built to not want to get close to men's pain. Men know this. They know it—they know no one wants to hear this crap. In fact, the guys that sit with—they look at me and they say, "Do you really want to hear this?" They couldn't believe that someone would want to listen to their pain. It's sad. The first thing that tipped me off was that men's pain is invisible because a man's pain is taboo.

Now, there's another one: the "provide and protect" role. Ohh, boy. So you provide and protect people, and guess what? Who is providing and protecting for you? Nobody. Nobody's providing and protecting—Think about, it's three o'clock in the morning. You and your wife wake up to a big noise down in the basement. "BOOM!" something goes. Who's going down to check it out? ("Not me!" and laughter.) That's a woman said that.

Who's going down to check it out? Guess what? In today's world, women may very well say, "I'll go down and check that out." And if she did that, she'd be a hero, right? But women's roles are very flexible these days. She'd not only be a hero, but if she said, "Honey, I really don't want to do that, can you go?" it'd be fine. Nobody would get upset, right? No problem.

Now … how about the guy? If he goes down and checks it out, he's doing his job. Right? That is what he's supposed to do. He's the guy. But if he says, "No, honey, I don't want to go," he's a jackass!

Can you see the double standard that's going on? Men are expected to never be dependent—never be dependent—and guess what? You can't emote and not be dependent. The two are linked; they're linked up. So men strive to not be dependent, for good reasons, because the culture whips them into that.

There's a guy named Peter Merritt; he wrote this beautiful piece on homelessness and men. But one of the things in that piece stuck with me, when he talked about men and dependency. Listen to what he says: "To put it simply, men are neither supposed or allowed to be dependent. They are expected to take care of others and themselves. And when they cannot, or will not, do it, then the assumption at the heart of the culture is that they are somehow less than men, and therefore unworthy of help." Get it? "An irony asserts itself: By being in need of help, men forfeit the right to it." Does that make sense?

A guy comes out, and he says, "I don't need that help. I'm fine. I'm a man." Right? Hey, no problem! He doesn't get the help! But if a guy comes out and says, "You know, I really need some help today," people automatically have a view of him—there's something wrong with that guy. Right? He doesn't deserve this help.

It's a very powerful double standard that goes on for men; that keeps them, again, from wanting to emote in public, wanting to bring it out so people can see it. Very different.

Now, the third reason is the dominance hierarchy. You guys know about the bighorn sheep, right? The males, once a year, get together and get 20 yards apart, and then, boogety-boogety-boogety-BOOM! Boogety-boogety-boogety-BOOM! Right, have you seen that, the YouTubes of that? What are they doing? They're setting up a hierarchy. They're setting it up so who's first, second, third, fourth, and they're going to be that dominant male at the top, and the dominant male at the top is what? He gets the best reproductive success! Right? This is what men strive for. And now we know, or we're thinking we know, that there is in fact a dominance hierarchy in human males.

There's a dominance hierarchy in human males, where we strive for status. Men strive for status. This is a little bit tricky, because it's not like … not simple … because if there's men who are peace-lovers, they may strive to be the best peace-lover. A guy on the football field, he's going to strive to make the NFL. An academe is going to strive for having as many journal articles in prestigious journals as he can. There's this striving, inherent in men, that we do in order to create status, and therefore increase our reproductive success. Does that make sense?

What happens if someone is striving for status, and they emote in public? Brzrzrzrzzz … your status drops like a rock! So you sure as heck do not want to go out in public and emote because that ruins all the status you've been working to build up!

Now, they are also thinking that women do not have the same kind of hierarchical requirements that men have; but they do have one hierarchy where they live. Do you know what it is? How do women compete with each other? There's one issue … attractiveness. Attractiveness. Look at the cosmetics industry, the billions of dollars that goes into that. Women will compete with each other based on who is more attractive than whom, and they strive to go to the top. Right?

Have you ever seen a woman say, "I'm not leaving home right now because I don't have my make up on," right? Have you seen that? What's she doing? She is saying, In my hierarchy, I'm not going to look lower until I can prop myself up and look better. She's doing the same thing that the men get crap for! You know, the men get crap for this not-emoting, so much; but they're just doing the same thing, they're trying to not let themselves be exposed in public, in the very same way that the woman is trying to look as good as they can. But we need to love them both. Love men and women. We're all in a hierarchy, one way or another.

Oh, and the last one is all of the physical differences, and I wish we had a lot of time to go to this because it's fairly complicated. But in my book Swallowed by a Snake, and in the latest one, the Kindle book, The Way Men Heal, I talk a lot about the physical differences, the biological differences, and there are some very, very important ones.

The first one, let's talk about it just a minute, and that is the work of Shelley Taylor. I don't know if people know Shelley Taylor, but she's a UCLA researcher, and in about 2002, I think, she found that all of the stress research prior to the year 2000 was done with male subjects. All of it! So everything you've ever heard about fight or flight? Probably goes for men. You know, men, the fight is moving into action; the flight is pulling back, being quiet. So Taylor said, Well, wait a minute. Do women fight-or-flight? She didn't think so.

She did research on women only, and what do you think she came up with? They're not the same. What she found was that women don't fight-or-flight; women tend-and-befriend. They tend-and-befriend. Women, when stressed, will move towards interaction; they'll move towards others, they'll move towards a place where they can be supported. Men, when they're stressed, will tend to move towards action.

Now, Taylor went a step further; she scratched her head and she said, Well, why is it? You know, we have basically the same physiology, afterwards. This oxytocin thing happens. Do you people know oxytocin? Oxytocin's this hormone; it's like they call it the "cuddle hormone" because when you get it, you really want to cuddle. You want to get close to each other, you want to hold and be held, right?

What Taylor found was, when women get this oxytocin burst, their estrogen amplifies the oxytocin. When they're stressed, they really want to interact, they really want to be held. But the man's testosterone negates the oxytocin. He does not have the same need to get close, and to hold … does that make sense? Think about this: After we have sex, we also get a burst of oxytocin. Can you see what happens now? She wants to cuddle! And he says, "Game's on!" Yes? Yeahhh! That's because he doesn't have the same need! He's literally biologically different. He does not have the same need that she has.

There's all kinds of biological stuff, and maybe the most important is the early … That's a very good point. This gentleman points out that he likes to cuddle after sex! And you know, we can't really generalize like this, with "all men" and "all women." In fact, especially the biological piece. What we've found now is that 17% of men will have a more feminine biology, and 17% of women will have a more masculine biology. It all happens at two months in utero, when the testosterone flood comes down. And in fact, if you want to really have some fun, you can tell by looking at your fingers, how much of a testosterone flood you got at two months in utero. And if you want to find out more about that, you can go to Google "2D4D," and it will tell you all kinds of things about this testosterone flood, and about our differences.

Anyway, where were we? … The testosterone flood comes in, and it changes the brain of young men into masculine brains, which is a systemizing brain. The masculine brain loves systems. Now remember, it's only 83% of men, or plus-or-minus, that do this. And the female brain is the default brain; it's what they call the "empathic brain." So we have a very different kind of way of looking at things: Man's brain – think Legos. You know, the Legos, you can put them together, you take them apart, you experiment, that's kind of a systemizing brain.

Okay … let's see where we go. We need to talk a little bit—How much time do we have, Attila? … I know, and I don't have my watch. Give me – we've got 10 minutes, you think? … Give me 10 minutes.

I wanted to talk a little bit about some examples of men and the way they process emotions because that little thing that I gave you at the beginning really doesn't say too much. You know, like, "Okay, he does action that honors, and ah, he goes into the future." Think about Eric Clapton. People know Eric Clapton? … Eric Clapton had the experience of his son dying, from falling out of a skyscraper window. Horrible experience. Clapton went into deep grief, and his autobiography talks about this whole experience, and he helps us understand exactly how he dealt with it. Clapton was two years sober at the time. He basically went into seclusion. He did two things: he went to AA meetings and he played his guitar. His friends were all saying, "Oh, you need to join a support group, you need to go talk with someone, you need to do this—" Clapton said, "No! What I need to do is play my guitar." He played it over, and over, and over again, and he said he didn't really do it to try to write songs. But after a while of doing this, after months of doing this … songs started to come. In fact, Clapton has this quote; he says, "My guitar has always been my salvation." So his guitar kind of pulled him out of things.

At any rate, he wrote these three songs—one we know, "Tears From Heaven," right? That's about, will he ever meet his son again. Another one is called, "My Father's Eyes," which came during this time for him, this deep grief. And the song was about thanking his son for giving him the opportunity to see his father's eyes … because Clapton had never met his father. Isn't that beautiful? But the third song is the most important one. It's called "The Circus Left Town." And in this song, Clapton tells the story of having taken his son to the circus, the night before his death; and how that one trip to the circus is going to have to last his son a lifetime. Whew … If you want a powerful experience, go watch Clapton play this song, on YouTube. It's really, really powerful, and you can tell, from watching him play, how much emotion poured through that man as he was writing this song. Can you imagine? He was doing the same kinds of processing that was going on in someone's support group where they're talking about it. He was doing it with himself, in a solitary place, through an activity: his playing, his guitar, and having the song come up. You see how it works? And it pulled him into the future, around a product that he was creating.

… Okay. Michael Jordan. People know Michael Jordan, right? Do you remember when Michael Jordan quit basketball? Do you remember what happened right before he quit basketball? His father died—his father was murdered, in a tragic accident. But, Jordan … I think it was about two months after his father was murdered, Jordan called a press conference and said, "I'm quitting basketball." People were going "Aaaaa—are you kidding? I love watching Jordan play!"—He's going to stop basketball. Everyone's scratching their heads! Two months after that, he has another press conference; he says, "I'm going to play baseball. I'm going to play minor-league baseball." And I scratched my head even harder! What is he doing?

Do you know what he was doing? His father had been a baseball player. His father had always asked him to please play baseball … and he stopped his basketball career to play baseball. Jordan was following his father's wishes; he was honoring his father by doing something in the future. Does that make sense? This whole baseball thing was about his dad. In his autobiography, Jordan talks about going to practices, and thinking—and talking to his father, in his head; you know, having conversations with him. The same kind of conversation that someone else might have with a support group—but he's doing it on his own, in his head.

Then, of course, Jordan found that maybe baseball was not his best suit. So he went back to the Bulls! Guess what he did there? …They won a championship. Yeah, but the one time … do you remember the one time after they played the Seattle SuperSonics? And … Jordan fell on the ball in mid-court. Do you remember that? At the tail—After they'd won the championship, Jordan falls on that ball at the end of the game. And unbeknownst to anyone else, Jordan had dedicated that season in memory of his father. Again, he's honoring his father through his action, through doing something, and as he's doing that—every time, you can see every time he practices, he's thinking of his dad. Every time he won a game, he's thinking of his dad. He's going to do this for his father! It's like Brett Favre, you know, when he played that Sunday-night game after his father died. What's he doing? He's doing it in honor of his father. Men use honoring as a means to move their emotions through.

Jordan was doing the same thing. So what happens is, Jordan collapses at mid-court, on the ball, and the camera zooms in, right? What do they find? Jordan's crying. He's in tears at mid-court. The camera pulls back—go to commercial, right? Yeah! They come back—he's in the locker room, he's still crying! People are thinking, What is going on here? And we really didn't know until Jordan told us exactly what was going on. He told people about his season being one where he wanted to dedicate it to his father. And he said, once he'd won the championship, that just opened his heart and floodgates happened. He said to one interviewer, "It wouldn't have happened except for one thing. We won that game on Fathers' Day." Can you imagine? He said, if we hadn't won it on Fathers' Day, it would have been different. But can you imagine, winning on Fathers' Day? Ka-whoosh—it just all pours out. That's a beautiful, masculine way to deal with emotions. Most people don't see it—it's invisible. You cannot see it. It's there, and it's a thing of beauty.

And if men get the chance—if people start to try to understand men, if people try to study men a little bit, so we can understand our differences, our uniqueness—there's only one conclusion you can come to; and that is, Men Are Good!

Thank you all very much.

Rape Aggression Defense program was never for men

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 2 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been auditing the Rape Aggression Defense (RAD) Systems implementation on Kennesaw State University (KSU) since January.

On July 1, 5:00 p.m. EST, I attended Resisting Aggression with Defense for Men (RFM). RFM is a men's self-defense program implemented at KSU in 2012, ten years after its women-only counterpart. RFM took place in the University Room of the James Carmichael Student Center, which is where the upcoming KSUM conference will be held. Three cops were in attendance, plus four men, including myself and the KSUM Secretary. The cops were not the best teachers, but they were professional and kind as individuals.

I cannot say much about the presentations because RFM was cancelled after the second class had met but before that same class had ended. RAD Systems requires at least four participants, so they pulled the plug when only two people attended the second meeting (including myself). Not even KSUM's Secretary returned due to his disgust with the content.

Trudi Vaughan, Georgia State Director of RAD, and a trainer at KSU (complete with a shady history), served as a contact for several unproductive months. I was prompted to investigate RFM after I read Vaughan's statements about RFM in The Sentinel (KSU's paper):

> [RFM] focuses a lot on what your responsibilities are as a man. […] When women say 'no,' it doesn't mean 'no until you talk me into it'; it means no. […] Typically males are raised to always stand up and fight. […] The whole educational aspect of this is letting them know that it's okay to make a better choice, a better decision.

Non-Normative Anti-Assimilationists pressured KSU to install RFM, but this does not mean RAD Systems was interested in helping men. The founder, Lawrence Nadeau, wrote the following introduction in the RFM manual:

> In all honesty, this program would not exist if it did not benefit the R.A.D. programs for Women. The Office of Civil Rights (OCR) has clearly stated that institutions offering R.A.D. programs for women must have a like offering for men. So to continue meeting the needs of women at educational institutions, we as an organization must address the safety needs of men attending those same institutions. This high quality program will in my opinion, never reach the lofty status that the R.A.D. programs for Women have, but it will, simply by existing, perpetuate the growth of our network and it's destiny driven programming for women.

The founder says to men that RAD for Men is for women, and that RFM's existence is obligatory, given a statement by the OCR.

To be fair, there are two positive aspects to the RFM manual.

One, it states that violence is not just a women's problem by making solid references to male victimization.

[image]

Two, it has a gender-neutral definition of rape, assuming you do not care about the order in which the words her and his appear (I personally don't).

[image]

This is great, but these positives do not redeem RAD Systems for several reasons.

First, the statistics were from dated sources such as the 2002 FBI Uniform Crime Reports (UCR) and a 1997 publication of The Commonwealth Fund Survey of the Health of Adolescent Girls. The cops said they "just teach what RAD gives them," which means KSU's 2012 introduction of RFM included content that went without updates for years. RFM was founded ten years after the women's course only after students pressured security, so would RFM ever have existed if KSU students had stayed silent? And given Nadeau's comments, were the facts reported because RAD cared or because RAD had to be pressured? I cannot answer these questions, but it is my opinion after six months of research and correspondence that RAD Systems is not compassionate enough to (re)invest in the well-being of men.

Second, the neutral rape definition is legally worthless. When I had my only chance to photograph other RAD manuals via an open records request (a state right granted to me that was later deemed to be in contention with federal copyright law), I could only take so many shots before my battery died. A page in the RAD instructor's manual also had a fair definition of rape, but that same page refers instructors to definitions of crimes in state codes.

[image]

In Georgia, rape is defined as follows (O.C.G.A. § 16-6-1):

> (a) A person commits the offense of rape when he has carnal knowledge of:
> (1) A female forcibly and against her will; or
> (2) A female who is less than ten years of age.
> Carnal knowledge in rape occurs when there is any penetration of the female sex organ by the male sex organ. The fact that the person allegedly raped is the wife of the defendant shall not be a defense to a charge of rape.
> (b) A person convicted of the offense of rape shall be punished by death, by imprisonment for life without parole, by imprisonment for life, or by a split sentence that is a term of imprisonment for not less than 25 years and not exceeding life imprisonment, followed by probation for life. Any person convicted under this Code section shall, in addition, be subject to the sentencing and punishment provisions of Code Sections 17-10-6.1 and 17-10-7.
> (c) When evidence relating to an allegation of rape is collected in the course of a medical examination of the person who is the victim of the alleged crime, the law enforcement agency investigating the alleged crime shall be responsible for the cost of the medical examination to the extent that expense is incurred for the limited purpose of collecting evidence.

Legally, only men rape, so sayeth the Patriarchy. Regardless of the definitions it presents, a RAD course follows the host state.

Finally, the propaganda throughout the manual dwarfs all aforementioned positive aspects. RAD Systems is protective of its copyright, so I cannot distribute the entire manual without having a gavel shoved sideways up my ass. Still, you deserve quotes in context. To appease the gods of fair use and journalism, let us close with commentary that addressed RAD's endorsement of the White Ribbon Campaign, RAD's citation of the 1-in-4 statistic, and RAD's take on rape culture.

I finally found the "responsibilities" mentioned in The Sentinel:

After a brief email discussion with the Board of Regents, KSU has autonomy in terms of program funding. For that reason, I have turned to research alternative self-defense companies with which universities can do business. The findings will be presented to KSU administration, alongside a long-overdue request for basic respect for both men and women, and nothing else.

This is not over.

KSUM is the first AVfM-sponsored men's rights student organization, and it works on missions like these to correct institutional corruption on campus. KSUM needs your help to fund a conference on educational equity issues affecting male students. If everyone reading this donated $1 every hour, KSUM will reach its goal today. Will you part with just one dollar to put men's rights on campus?

Gynocentric etiquette for men (part 2)

Peter Wright · 2 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following excerpts on the subject of male etiquette are from 'Manners for Men: by Mrs Humpry the Madge of Truth' published in 1897. While the forms of etiquette may have changed, the underlying principle of service to women remains the order of the day. –PW

Walking with a Lady

"The rule of the road is a simple one, "Keep to the right." Easy enough for women, it is complicated in the case of men by the necessity of always remaining on the kerb side of any lady they should be accompanying. Should the lady keep to the right in meeting or in passing other persons, her escort may either keep by her or go out into the road. He will be able to judge for himself which course will be advisable. His first duty is always to his companion, but that need not make him wanting in courtesy to other women. If remaining by the side of his companion should involve any inconvenience to the ladies of the other approaching party, then he must give up his position, and go out onto the roadway to let the latter pass. Should these be men, no consideration is necessary.

He keeps close by his lady's side, but in crowded streets he may often have to fall behind, but he should never allow any one to interpose between her and him. Should the pressure from the crowd become extreme, his duty is to protect her from it as much as possible, but never by putting his arm around her waist. A hand on either side of the lady's shoulders is usually sufficient.

Communicating with a Lady

"The well-mannered man never puts out his hand in greeting until a lady extends hers. This is a test of good breeding that is constantly applied. To those uninitiated in the ways of society, it would naturally appear the right thing to give as cordial a greeting as possible. Therefore the hand is held out, even on introduction to a perfect stranger. This is wrong. The first move in the direction of cordiality must come from the lady, the whole code of behaviour being based on the assumption that she is the social superior.

"It must always be borne in mind that the assumption of Woman's social superiority lies at the root of these rules of conduct. It is bad manners to introduce people without permission. Nor must this permission be asked within the hearing of the second party. If Mr. A wishes to know Miss B., the lady's leave must be obtained before he can be presented to her. The only exception to this rule is at a dance or ball, where introductions need not be regarded as leading to acquaintanceship. They are only for the dance, and may be ignored next day. Here, again, it is the lady's privilege to ignore her partner, if she choose. But if she should bow to him he must raise his hat, whether he desires to follow up the acquaintanceship or not.

The next sample of expected male etiquette is from 'Etiquette for men: A Book of Modern Manners and Customs' published in 1929. – PW

Everyday Etiquette
You may know that you are doing the right thing at all times when offering little courtesies to others, especially to ladies, whether you know them or not.

Raising your Hat
It is not necessary to raise your hat if you see a lady of your acquantance in a public vehicle in which you are also a passenger. A little nod or smile is sufficient. Otherwise, you should always raise your hat when meeting a lady whom you know. If the lady is a close friend, raise your hat immediately she gets near; but if you do not know her very well, you should wait until she acknowledges your presence before raising your hat.

Meeting a Lady
When you meet a lady whom you know, and you wish to speak to her, do not keep her standing still. You should walk with her in the direction in which she is going. You should not offer a lady your arm when walking with her, unless you are escorting her across a busy street. You should always take the outside of the pavement when walking with a lady. You should also take the outside when walking with two ladies, and should not walk between them.

Introductions
When you are introduced to a lady, it depends upon her whether you shake hands. In all circumstances the matter rests with the lady, and you should make no movement to shake hands before the lady offers hers. Men usually shake hands at the best of times.

You should raise your hat when introduced to a lady out of doors, and your right-hand glove should be removed, in case a hand is offered you. Indoors, you should never remain seated when a lady is introduced, though you need not stand to be introduced to another man.

When introduced to a lady at a dance, party or other function, you must remember, if you see her again, that recognition must come from her. You should not raise your hat, or make any sign, until she either nods or smiles at you. At a party you need not wait for an introduction before speaking to any other man present, but you should not enter into general conversation with any of the ladies until an introduction has been given.

Should lady guests arrive during your visit, rise from your seat when they enter the room, and remain standing until introduced. If the ladies leave before you, you should stand while they are maxing their departure.

How I went from Feminist to Honey Badger

Kristal D. Garcia · 3 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There were years in which, through my own unconscious actions, I co-created messed-up relationships with men, but I was not ready to own my part in it. It turned from pain to hatred. I worked for seven years with Greg Ehmka doing intention work and emotional clearing, which greatly helped me raise my levels of self-responsibility. I recognized that the higher my levels of self-responsibility climbed, the happier I was! Minimizing victim, maximizing happiness! I was able to see how my own plunge into chaos pulled people into my life to help me learn and be present with my own growth and how each relationship really was a gift. I was able to heal the hatred I had projected onto men, experience the pain that was present, and get to the real love I had for men. I had thought before that I loved men but realized I had put men on a broken pedestal. Damned if they did, damned if they didn't, and how dare they be human and not perfect.

After my healing experience, I started to think about writing a book to "empower" men. It was to be a book on men's bodies—and so the concept was born.

When I was in San Diego a couple of years back, I was researching some more and came across the NCFM-National Coalition For Men website. I called up and Harry answered, and I told him about my book. He graciously met up with me and was so very kind. He gave me reading material and the book Loving Men, Respecting Women by Tim Goldich (which I'm restarting to read now and it is amazing!!). I told him that my book was about empowering men. He questioned what exactly I meant by this, as the word "empowering" doesn't mean what it sounds like it means. I can't remember his exact wording, but I think the concept was that people use that word a lot to say they are "helping" men when they really aren't. The meeting was great and helped me think more about what my goal was for the book.

I started a survey and a website to enlist male volunteers to anonymously share photos of their bodies and cocks, which meant a photo from the neck down. The survey was a ridiculous 100-plus questions long. Destin Gerek (The Erotic Rockstar) was generously in conversation with me at the time. He suggested that about 10 questions maximum or less was best and then recommended reading as well. He also mentioned how he would do the photo but preferred not to have his head lopped off. This made me think some more too. Why just make it about men's bodies? It should be the full-expression face as well.

I took a few years away from the book, just at a total loss as to what its purpose was. I realized to "empower men" was just another way of telling men what to do, and I didn't want to do that. I was upset because I kept hearing of men's experiences and feeling so at a loss that if I could just get this damn book together, maybe I could help somewhat. But I couldn't figure it out.

I had issues with feminism in my early twenties (I'm 31) and was about to walk away from it after an online discussion that was just pure man-hating when another feminist said, "No, we're not all like that, don't give up." For over a decade I held on to that, hoping I would somehow change feminism by holding on to that mantra.

Still, with the book on my mind but feeling clueless as how to start, I joined some online groups and discussions. This included circles with other Life Coaches. Well, the world of life coaching and spirituality is soaked in the shaming of men. It's all "goddess this" and "goddess that" and "women who want to be treated like a goddess." (I'm very much aligned with goddess beliefs; HOWEVER, I am ALSO very much aligned with god beliefs.) These circles talk about the Divine Feminine but ignore the Divine Masculine. (I loved listening to the Honey Badger Brigade talk about this!) So, when I was in one of the groups listening to these women talking about men's penises and making shaming remarks, I couldn't take the stupidity anymore and realized I couldn't wait until I wrote the book to stand up and say something.

So I created a Facebook page now called 'Loving and Celebrating Men'. Now I just had to fill it … derp. I googled "loving men," but all the links were how men could love women! I searched "supporting men," and the results were all still about what men could do to support women. There was nothing geared towards what men needed. I kept digging. Not sure how, but I came across A Voice for Men. Now, mind you, I was still very much a feminist. I was wanting to step away from feminism but just wasn't sure where to put my energy—equalism? humanism? When I found AVfM, I was still very much entitled. I called myself a feminist, and oh boy, shit hit the fan. I shared my Facebook link. At AVfM, I met some commenters who wanted to give me the benefit of the doubt but were skeptical and others who were just not having it at all. I was confronted with "How can you say you love men and call yourself a feminist?" There was much lashing out between us. I joined a men's group but was shortly after kicked out—no surprise, again, still a feminist and had all the feminist armoring that came with it.

I took what these men said into account: Why was I still hanging on to feminism? Did I really think my own words would change the truth of what feminism actually was and what it had done to men and continues to do to men?

So I stopped calling myself a feminist and started calling myself a human rights activist. Meanwhile, this process was all terrifying as shit. I had finally denounced feminism and started to share some articles I had encountered online, and feminists were pretty pissed and lashed out. Meanwhile, I created a group online for men to share their voices uncensored. There, a feminist came in with sneaky hatred until she erupted, and I was told by a few feminists what a traitor I was and how I knew nothing of the goddess and how fucked up and delusional I was. The men in the group, so sweet, were concerned that I was too harsh with her. I assured them I wasn't and that she was being devious and sneaky.
