1. They do not develop emotional or spiritual maturity.
2. They do not exercise sufficient self-control to regulate their boundaries and make the most of their opportunities.
3. They idolize the Tingles too much, and chase men who are inappropriate matches for them, out of their league and/or are only interested in sex.
4. They fail to adjust their expectations to reality, and do not take responsibility for regulating a healthy social life. At worst, they indulge in fruitless or even self-destructive endeavors, and expect others to pay for their 'life experiences'.
5. They do not feel the compunction to see themselves as a 'helper', and learn how to get along with a man accordingly. At worst, they denigrate hierarchy as 'the oppressive patriarchy'.
6. They have an arrogant Feminist mindset that belittles and demonizes masculinity.
7. They do not feel any conviction to pursue sexual purity, thinking it to be archaic.

As a result, they take a few rounds on the carousel until they come to a point where they see that they will never just "fall into a marriage" with an Alpha by accidental fate, and they subsequently give up on pursuing this model. By this time, their MMV has depreciated so much, that they are forced to assume the Courtly Love model, in which they are able to exercise enough power over their relationships to make them come out the way they want (which is never exactly what they want). Unfortunately, they must sacrifice their holy Tingles in doing so, which transforms them into bitter, disrespectful shrews. Remember, Tingles = Respect.

Dependent Female + Submissive Male = The Courtly Love model

Modern women with real world sensibilities will say that there is no such thing as courtly love in today's MMP. Contrary to their assertions, the courtship model endorsed by many churchian societies is basically a churched-up Courtly Love model. (This has been parodied by Dalrock for years.) In addition to the informally instituted Courtly Love model within the church, there are many men who willingly pursue and engage in the Courtly Love model, but these men tend to be those who are sexually invisible to these women, men who have no visceral power to induce the Tingle, and so these men don't come up on their radar. This is partly because the MMP is presently converged with the SMP, and conservative, marriage minded men cannot compete with ravaging cads in this arena. Also, masculinity is persecuted, so there are very few men willing or able to step up their game. To reverse this sordid State of Affairs, parents (especially fathers) and social communities need to invest in and reward young men's development of masculine traits.

It may also be possible that some women who chafe at the idea of submitting to a man, or who are determined to create a life of their own choosing, willingly embrace the Courtly Love model from the outset. Their reasons for doing so might be because of cultural norms, peer pressure, education, insecurity, a poor relational history characterized by a distrust of men, or merely due to the rebellious female sinful nature to usurp power from men.

Independent Female + Submissive Male = Feminism

Women who insist on Independence, and who want or expect their men to be compliant and accommodating, are basically feminists, or else, they're into BDSM. The Feminist idea that men and women are "equal" is categorically rejected here as unrealistic.

If an independent woman can accept (or is forced to accept, due to her lower SMV) a more submissive man, she'll have to shoulder the majority of responsibility for the relationship. This is not likely to sit well with most normal women. More liberated types might find the opportunity to be swinging with cuckolds.

Worst case scenario for men! Feminazi's might try their d@mnest to destroy any visceral "weakness" – any emotional vulnerability which a presumably "evil man" might use to exert power over her. Women like this know they must necessarily dissipate their natural ability to Tingulate (= Respect a man) in order to solidify their grip on power. So they carelessly (or willingly) embrace the carousel (if her SMV is sufficient to allow the possibility) as an enjoyable way to destroy their innocence and vulnerability, gain social and sexual "experience", and become a Strong Independent Woman™ (SIW). This is a wide and well-traveled road which prepares her to manage a weak, submissive, human ATM after her peak SMV years have passed, and she can no longer depend on suitors for material resources. Government welfare programs may provide a feline ridden alternative to this fate.

Independent Female + Dominant Male = Allyship*

Women who can attract a dominant man, but who wish to remain independent, basically have a choice between having Open Relationships with plate spinners, or being a rich man's sugar baby. Prostitution may also be an option for those women with a high libido.

A formal marriage proposal is very unlikely to be offered here.

* Update (November 11, 2018): At the time of writing this post, I had not found a suitable label for this type of relationship. H/T to Dalrock for bringing the word "allyship" to my attention in his post, Do what she asks, but know in advance that she will take great care to protect herself from feeling gratitude. (October 16, 2018). In this post, a woman explains the behaviors of two different types of men, one a "mansplainer", and the other an "ally". This is an excellent example of an independent woman's subjective assessments of men, based on their interaction. Remember, the interaction defines the relationship.

In the comments section, Spike argues,

> "Allyship" is the legitimate word for the derogatory term, "White Knight ", or "mangina".

I disagree with his claim that allyship = mangina, because the allied male in the cited story expresses dominance over the other mansplaining male in the interaction. This is actually the application of masculinity to support the woman's prerogative, and although women seldom display gratitude for this, as Dalrock pointed out, women always find a rush of affirmation when male strength is used to pump her ego. White Knights, OTOH, demonstrate Chivalry, but not necessarily dominance. If you think about it, gratitude abuts humility, whereas ego stroking reinforces pride. So it's implicitly incongruent or even contradictory to express gratitude for having the ego fluffed.

Conclusions

Women must work out a very complicated decision of whether to join with a man in a long term relationship, or else pursue an independent lifestyle. If a woman decides to have a male partner in any capacity, she must then choose which power structure she wishes to have in her relationship. According to this ontological model, the following conclusions have been obtained from this study.

- Women may or may not be aware of it, but they choose the path they take in life, henceforth female agency is a primary factor in determining which life path she will embark.
- There are many life factors that determine whether a woman chooses to accept a male partner in a LTR, or else to pursue independence.
- A woman's willingness to submit to a husband, and to be his companion, friend, and helper in life, is a critical factor in determining her life path. So if a woman desires to ever be in a committed, LTR with a man, then she must prepare herself accordingly. Earlier preparation in life is better, so as to take advantage of her peak SMV years to attract the best mate possible.
- The Feminine Dilemma boils down to the simple choice, "To Tingle, or not to Tingle", however this choice is confusing and difficult to execute. Women must also fight against their own rebellious sinful nature to usurp power from men. As a result, very few women can achieve a robust marriage characterized by Tingles and respect.
- Women are expected to naturally prefer a Tingle-filled relationship in which they have little control. But since they are lacking overt control in this case, it is difficult for them to move towards a committed relationship. Female control must thereby be sublimated into a larger array of personal characteristics, and this generally takes the form of soft power. Females stand the best chance to achieve an ideal relationship if they develop their kinder, gentler forms of soft power.
- Women tend to be blind to all relationship options that do not inspire the Tingles, and are strongly resistant to enter into those same relationships. If Tingles cannot be produced within a marriage, it spells a very difficult and unhappy union for both partners.
- Because the Tingles are a central element for inducing women to effortlessly conform to God's archetypical relational structure (i.e. respecting and submitting to their husbands), parents (especially fathers) and social communities (including churches) need to invest in the cultivation of young men's development of masculine traits, such that they can harness the visceral power of invoking the Tingle tantrum in women. Young men also need to be informed of the powerlessness of women in the (preferred) Tingulated state, and should be held responsible for their actions.
- Likewise, young women need to be educated and instructed how to develop qualities that are beneficial towards attracting a serious commitment from a man, including the development of soft power, and the preservation of their sexual purity. They also need to develop sufficient faith in God to be able to resist the temptation to usurp authority or rebel, and trust their husband's (or father's) headship, even when Tingles are not forthcoming.
- Those women who desire companionship but who are adverse to the idea of submitting to a man, must continually grapple for power in the relationship. In the case where the man is willingly submissive to her, she will come to bear all responsibility for the relationship.
- Those women who prefer more independence will fall into the Feminist category, which has little chance of yielding a quality Christian marriage.

- Those women who choose to pursue an independent lifestyle, have no honorable options in the way of relationships, unless they remain chaste.

Related

- Chateau Heartiste: The Moral Dichotomy of Women (April 18, 2017)
- Dalrock: Empowered to Avoid Responsibility (September 12, 2018)
- Sigma Frame: Meretricious Power and the Tingle (October 9, 2018)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Where have all the good men gone #233548527 (5 October 2019)

Why is Citizenship Unquestionable?

Jack · 10 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

America's immigration policies are quickly becoming self-destructive liabilities. Long lived cultures have a noose-tight admission. Why shouldn't My America do the same?

Readership: All American, Good Old Boys

This will probably be my only political rant this year. I despise politics, but sometimes you've got to speak up on issues. This is one of those instances.

NPR (feat. Hansi Lo Wang): Jeff Sessions Told DOJ Not To Discuss Citizenship Question Alternatives (October 27, 2018)

NPR unwittingly reports how the Deep State is attempting to resist the addition of a question about citizenship to the census, which was dropped after 1950.

> "But days after the Census Bureau received the Justice Department's request, its staff concluded that collecting people's self-reported information through the census would not be the best way to generate better citizenship data. Instead, compiling existing government records about people's citizenship status, the bureau found, would not only produce more accurate information but also cost less money."

Their argument sounds so good, that it's hard not to agree. But are they really concerned about "accurate information"? Are they really going to implement the proposed alternative, or is it only a red herring to stall the confirmation of the new census amendment?

It's pretty clear that this is about money, votes, and power.

It might help our analysis of this situation, to consider and compare a few other countries citizenship policies.

Israel's government insists that it is purely a Jewish state, and no other residents are genuine citizens. Jews worldwide may claim Israeli citizenship. That's quite a grip on power.

In China, people aren't even allowed to apply for citizenship unless they are a Chinese National. (There are very few, and very rare exceptions.) If they are Chinese National, then citizenship is bestowed automatically upon application, and the person does not need to give up their citizenship elsewhere. In other words, citizenship is based directly on race, i.e. paternal ancestry. No one in China wants to adopt orphans of other nationalities or races, because that would not be a benefit to the community, or to the country. But if they allow their orphans to be adopted abroad, they are planting seeds of cultural and economic sources worldwide.

In Taiwan, it is a little more lenient, but not much. The race-based admission still applies, but other than that, you need to have a squeaky clean criminal record, a bachelor's degree, a small business, and US$650,000 worth of non-liquid assets in Taiwan. Oh, and you need to live in Taiwan and pay income taxes for at least 5 years straight. You can get a permanent residence if you marry a Taiwanese citizen, but not full citizenship status. However, your children will qualify, since they would have certified, direct, Chinese ancestry.

Feminist America would call all these policies "racial discrimination", and label these countries as "backwards", but Roissy would call this the preservation of culture. China and Israel should know about the preservation of culture, because they are among the oldest, still-active cultures in history.

Think about it. What would happen in the United States if we instituted a landed/educated grandfather clause for citizenship eligibility?

Mega MAGA overnight!?!

The Philippines has an open immigration policy, where anybody can come and go as they please. The problem is, nobody wants to live there, not even Filipino's. The economy is lifeless, so there's no economic opportunity. The government, police and military, are all corrupted to the core. Everyone is pursuing work overseas, and trying to get out of there.

The trend is that immigration policies around the world seem to follow a "supply and demand" type of structure. Countries which are so poor and unstable that no one wants to live there, are more than happy to accept anyone who comes along. Whereas, countries which have anything of value, a sanctum of decorum, economic freedom, political liberties, what have you, are all controlling their borders tightly, and the path to citizenship only allows the most elite types through.

But there have been a few European countries that have not followed this "supply and demand" trend for their admission price. We know them well: Britain, France, Germany, Sweden… and just as macro-economic theory predicts, the value of their citizenship has fallen through the floor overnight.

Following the dictates of supply and demand, I fear that if the U.S. sells its citizenship status too cheaply, then the value of being a citizen will soon fall afterward as well.

The writing is on the wall. It's time for Democrats to put aside their partisan platitudes and do what's good for the country.

Related

- Larry's Musings: Is the biggest threat to world peace the United States? (November 7, 2018)
- Do What's Right (feat. Ed Hurst): A little more clarity on politics (November 7, 2018)
- Throne and Altar: Capitalism is the void (November 8, 2018)
- The Orthosphere: The Acid Eating at Tradition is Not Capitalism, But Cheap Information (November 8, 2018)

The Feminine Typecasts of Men

Jack · 12 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A mansplained feminine view of male archetypes, complete with suggested nicknames.

Readership: Red Pilled readers, and the curiously imaginative sort.

In a previous post on Sigma Frame: Finding Mr. Right (June 15, 2017), we perused several types of men available to women on the S/MMP: Mr. Right, Mr. Right Fit, Mr. Right Now, Mr. Right On, and Mr. Good Enough! The outstanding question was whether a woman can identify them and make the best choice for her life.

Since then, I've expanded our understanding of The Feminine Dilemma (October 27, 2018), and found that these different types of men fall right in line with the different archetypes identified in this post. You may like to cover these two posts before reading on, if you haven't already done so.

Here, I'll cite the different types of men from the first mentioned post, and add some comments based on insights gleaned from the second. Each type of man/relationship is categorized by the chart given in the Feminine Dilemma – the Lifepath pursued by the female, and the male's defacto role in the relationship.

Dependent Female + Dominant Male = The Tingly Respect Model

> "Mr. Right is the man who is in her own SMV band, who has a complementary personality (i.e. is her "type"), and who shares many spiritual values and attitudes towards life. He is the guy who loves and honors her, and she desires and respects him."

This fits the ideal Tingly Respect model, complete with Tingles.

> "Mr. Right Fit is the man who appears to be a Mr. Right because he meets her list of qualifications, but there is something missing in their interaction that spells "no happy future" to the relationship."

This guy is a good match, possibly fitting the Complementary model, or possibly the Tingly Respect model. However, the "something missing" is presumably the Tingles.

> "Mr. Right On is the man who can fill her life with the dizzying, distracting effects of romance, fun and good times, but he is not cut out for marriage. This guy is likely an Alpha male who is just using her for his own good times."

This is definitely the Tingly Respect model, however she has foolishly chosen a man who far outranks her on the SMV scale.

> "There is also a Mr. Bad Ass, who is a very confident, self-assured man who games her hard and treats her like an immature little girl, and teaches her some very hard lessons about life. She should watch her personal boundaries and beware that she does not "fall in love" with his dominance and charisma, and give Mr. Bad Ass a permanent place in her heart."

Masculine power rules here, so it's another instance of the Tingly Respect model. But in this case, his perceived relational value is sufficiently low enough that she doesn't consider him for a serious LTR. However, even though she might perceive him to be rancorously disturbed, she may be more than curious about exploring the Tingles. Her level of personal agency would determine her choice.

Dependent Female + Submissive Male = The Courtly Love model

> "When she gets impatient with herself, and starts to selfishly justify all her lack of qualities that she can offer to a man (i.e. dissociative rationalization, AKA "hamstering"), she will find a Mr. Right Now to fulfill all her urgent, immediate needs for attention and affirmation. But deep inside, she knows Mr. Right Now is just for now, not for marriage."

Here begins the unholy slide into the Courtly Love model with a Beta orbiter having a sufficient SMV to rise above the Friend Zone™.

> "The idea of "settling" connotes a failure to achieve a goal, and "Mr. Good Enough" only serves to reinforce that notion. She is getting too impatient about finding a man, and just grabs one whom she feels she can control and can take what she needs from him. It's not a good idea to marry this guy, because neither of you will be happy."

This is another instance of the Courtly Love model with a Beta orbiter. But here, she is more desperate, and marriage minded.

Independent Female + Submissive Male = Feminism

Since I wrote the OP more than a year ago, it has come to my attention that my initial estimation was rather generous towards the motivations of women. I had assumed that the majority of women pined after the Tingly Respect ontology. Indeed, there are other types of men useful for those feminine imperatives which are less honorable.

Mr. Right Cuck – The clueless White Knight™ who is easily manipulated and disposed of by various feminine tactics of the handbag variety.

Mr. Friend Zone – the cool Beta Orbiter who is Oneitis™ loyal to her beck and call, but who cannot be allowed into her secret inner chamber – because telling him the truth about her Feeelz and her sexcapades would ruin the (so called) "Friendship" – and she knows it.

Mr. Husband Material – According to the self-professed unicorn, Ritz and Triscuit, the ideal husband has a SMV between 3 to 6, and is less than 5 on the "Stupid Scale". What she won't tell you, is that if a man is too smart, or too hot, then it's too difficult for her to retain control on a daily basis. In other words, some women intentionally destroy their ability to pair bond, and wait until their MMV hits the wall before getting married, knowing full well that they need to "adjust" their MMV to coincide with that of Mr. Husband Material when approaching the altar. The Hamster can be stupidly brilliant at times.

Mr. Ted-e-bear – A friend with benefits. Here, the trust is high, but the Tingles (and respect) are virtually non-existent.

Independent Female + Dominant Male = Allyship

An allyship* is when a male offers his masculine talents to support the woman's prerogative. The nature of this interaction is that the woman gains affirmation when male strength is used to pump her ego, which Feeelz gooed to her!

From the second OP mentioned in the introduction,

> "Women who can attract a dominant man, but who wish to remain independent, basically have a choice between having Open Relationships with plate spinners, or being a rich man's sugar baby."

So we have the following.

Mr. Guy-ration – Plate spinning men who are regular F-buddies and sex party partners.

Mr. Sugar Daddy – An older, richer, and possibly married man who supplies the magic carpet, complete with wine, and who covers all her unforeseen expenses, not all of which are less than luxuries.

Mr. Pawn – A man complicit in a STR contrived for a specific, immediate purpose, such as sexual exploration, rebellious mudsharking, inducing jealousy, attention wh@ring, or to attain social dominance in a peer group, such as the one described here*. It's difficult to categorize Mr. Pawn, because the Tingles may (or may not) be there, but she will also be wanting to control the interaction. As a further breakdown, each type of interaction might deserve its own nickname.

I've decided that prostitution should be in a category of its own, because it's more of a business transaction than a relationship, and the power of the male is therefore irrelevant.

Mr. John – Men who offer opportunities to liquidate her SMV to generate income.

Conclusions

It may be incredibly difficult for some women to give up their natural desire for relational control and self-determined autonomy, and as a result, they may continue to founder and flail in many ungodly positions.

It may come as a surprise to some men, but many women choose husbands according to the Feminism model, in which she willingly sacrifices her marital bonding capability on the altars of the Carousel and the Wall, in exchange for independence, power, and control. Tingles be d@mned!

Because of the multitude of potential relationship structures that would fit the molds of Feminism and Allyship described here, I suspect that this breakdown may only begin to scratch the surface.

Furthermore, a woman's subjective, in situ definition of Mr. Right may very well be subject to a woman's particular circumstances, character, motives, and level of maturity. In other words, the "Mr. Right" that a particular woman speaks of, may not be the same Mr. Right described above.

It is clear, however, that a mature relationship that fits the mold of God's ideal structure is a highly select set of conditions, characterized by maturity, humility, grace, and self-control.

 H/T Dalrock for bringing the word "allyship" to my attention in his post, Do what she asks, but know in advance that she will take great care to protect herself from feeling gratitude. (October 16, 2018). The post on the Feminine Dilemma has been updated accordingly.*

Related

For the converse male view of female archetypes, I recommend Black Label Logic's Gendernomics: Female sexual strategies (July 18, 2016).

The Parable of the Pie

Jack · 17 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

An explanation of Sanctification and Defilement using the Parable of the Pie, and the implications on relationships, including sexual purity, and spirituality.

Readership: All

Thanksgiving is right around the corner, so this is an appropriate time to retell the Parable of the (Poon) Pie. So here it goes.

I once heard a pastor explain sanctification like this.

> "There were two boys, Jim and John, who were fighting over a piece of pie because they both wanted to eat it. Then Jim got the smart idea to lick the pie, at which time the fight ended immediately. John reacted with a look of disgust, while a smile broke out on Jim's face as he continued to eat the pie. Jim kept the treat for himself, while John walked away silently. John was angry about losing the pie, but after Jim had licked it, he had no desire whatsoever to eat that particular piece of pie. He had lost all interest in having it for himself."

Now let's explain this parable using the two words in question.

At the beginning of the fight, the pie was fresh, tasty, and steaming hot out of the oven. No boy had ever put his fork into it. But when Jim licked the pie, he sanctified it to himself. On the other hand, since Jim had licked the pie, John considered it as defiled. That one lick made the pie both sanctified (to Jim) and defiled (to John).

In spiritual symbolism, both of these parables could also be extended to describe our relationship to Christ. Sanctification is described by Jesus like this.

> "He who believes in Me, as the Scripture has said, out of his heart will flow rivers of living water." ~ John 7:38 (NKJV)

That's what happens when a person gets "licked" by the Holy Spirit! And also, the closer we are to God, the less popular we will be in this world.

Likewise, the defilement context rings true as well. The closer we get to darkness, the less we are able to relate to God.

> "He who fights with monsters should look to it that he himself does not become a monster. And if you gaze for long into an abyss, the abyss gazes also into you." ~ Friedrich Nietzsche

In case the reader hasn't yet picked up on the meaning of the parable, the appropriate word substitutions are listed in the table below, according to the sexual and spiritual interpretations.

Symbolic Logos	Sexual Analogy	Spiritual Analogy
pie	a young hot virgin	A human being lick	sexual intercourse	A conversion experience
spittle	semen	The Holy Spirit / Unclean Spirit

[Eds. note: Reversing the sexes or the deifications of the archetypes within the parable doesn't reflect reality (i.e. "two girls fighting over a lollipop", meaning, "two women fighting over a man", or "two men fighting over the Holy Spirit", respectively). Because in this case, continued "licking" correlates with increased wanting, often on the part of both girls, men, etc.]

So far, I think we can catch on to the analogy. But here is where the analogy breaks down.

The pie has no emotions, no soul, no reproductive potential, and offers no possible relationship to Jim. But a living, breathing girl is much more complex than a pie. A girl, on the other hand, has a fresh passion, and is eager to be ravished.

In addition to this, the girl also has a soul, and a highly impressionable spiritual constitution. Jim opens up her body, causing her shuddering pain and tears. He spills her blood, and thereby institutes a covenantal soul tie which she will never forget, or be free from, for the rest of her life. After this experience, she is forever bound to Jim, and the cost of opportunity is that she can never bond with John in quite the same way.

The difference between sanctification and defilement is not only spiritual, but also visceral. After a few good hard romps with Jim, not only will John not want the girl, but the girl will not want John either. Instead, she will grow to want Jim more, and she might even grow to despise John.

But it's hard not to like piping hot, homemade pumpkin pie!

Pumpkin pie is my favorite! Happy Holidays, from Sigma Frame!

Related

On the Authenticity of Appearance and Avatar

Jack · 21 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Being your true self often requires you to conform to a role, similar to that of a play, and then take great effort to thespianize the REAL you… and it is exhausting!

Readership: All

Introduction

As you may have already noticed, I've decided to experiment with a new site appearance, using the Jack of diamonds and the Jack Sparrow character as the new avatar.

The reasons include the following, among others.

- I feel this image fits my persona a little better.
- I wanted an image that is more piercing, bold, energetic, and clean cut.
- I believe this image might appeal to a wider audience of men, especially the younger men.
- But really, it's all about being authentic.

Some might scoff at a claim of authenticity from a blogger who won't disclose his real name. However, this same boundary can increase authenticity, because it destroys socially constructed limitations of expression.

I know readers won't necessarily believe my words because they are true, but because they are authentic. So then, the strength of authenticity comes down to what is being said, and its value to the reader.

But authenticity is not what you might think it is. Let me explain by describing how authenticity develops.

The Development of Authenticity

In our experience of coming of age, and in the beginning stages of coming to God, our mind is filled with Machiavellian images of an omnipotent God, the eternal glory of heaven, the austere horror of hell, the power of angels, the terror of demons, and a multitude of mysteries surrounding these metaphysical transcendent realities.

In parallel, we faced various truths apart from God, and we were greeted with confusion and frustration.

But then,

We are knowing God through His Word.
We realize how Jesus serves us.
We change our concept of what love is, among many other false mindsets.
We are facing various truths from God's perspective.
We are knowing God's mind through prayer.
We are knowing how to serve God and improve our station in life by doing His will.
We are knowing God's heart through suffering.

Then, when the costs of opportunity, and the pains of suffering come, we know we are being real.

But when does God become authentic to us?

Is it in the beginning, when we observed an impressively fearsome and enigmatic God from a distance? Or later, when He is as familiar to us as our father, and we become a part of His legacy on earth?

As we come closer to God, we resemble Him more closely, in form and character, including our appearance to those who do not know Him. Those who think God is all smoke and mirrors, may very well see us in the same manner. Unless, that is, we take the effort to extol Christ in our daily living. This very post is going over how to do this.

Thus, getting closer to God not only involves being authentic before God, but also before our fellow man. But because we originate from an earthly substance, the way in which we are authentic doesn't always seem natural. Being your true self often requires you to conform to a role, similar to that of a play, and then take great effort to thespianize the real you. It often requires a transformation of thoughts, words, and image, into what would allow you to connect with others and inspire them – and not what would emanate from your relaxed, casual effort. It also fatigues the h@ll out of your Flesh (literally). It is exhausting, yet simultaneously invigorating.

> "And those who are Christ's have crucified the flesh with its passions and desires." ~ Galatians 5:24 (NKJV)

The Display of Authenticity

Exactly one year ago, I had a conversation under American Dad's post, Out of your shell (November 21, 2017), which was delightfully insightful to readers at the time. This discussion is definitely worth reviewing, so I've coopted the substance of the topic as follows.

SF: I enjoy being a very solitary person, and being alone with my research projects, academic writings and philosophical thoughts. People can be so annoying and distracting. But at the same time, I work in a teaching profession, so it's important for me to be upbeat, energetic, friendly, patient and inspiring. So, I have learned to fold up my inner world whenever I step into the classroom, and live a larger life as an actor while in front of my students. At these times, my inner being, which I normally keep to myself, shines through in my performance. It is thoroughly exhausting for me, but apparently quite effective, as gauged by my class performance reviews.

I don't know if this advice is transferrable to others, but I believe introverted people would benefit immensely (as I have) from seeing social interaction as a forum for the exaggerated display of attitudes and sentiments, and to consider the emotional work involved to be play-acting in an authentic way, doing whatever is necessary for others to recognize one's true heart.

This kind of psychological doubling-down, and emotionally played-up approach is also key to meeting women, and it's a core aspect of improving one's Game. Furthermore, I have learned that this is actually an expression of humility.

> "Humble thyself in the sight of the Lord, and He will lift you up." ~ James 4:10 (NKJV)

I know it's true!

Scott: You have described almost exactly the process I use when teaching. I do the same thing when I am seeing a patient, or at a social event.

I just never put it to words like that. And yes, it takes all the fear out of meeting/interacting with women away.

It's almost like the way some people drink alcohol to lower their inhibitions and be more social. I can just flip a switch to a different "mode" minus the drinking and the hangover.

Further. Yes it is humbling. It's hard to explain but it's like saying "it would be a shame for me to hide my ability to lead, to teach, to bring people together because I would rather just stay home and read. So, I won't."

Earl: I used to work in the media sector and I still do public speaking. Normally I'm introverted but once I'm into performance mode it's like a light switch flipping on. If I compared what takes more out of me… a hard physical workout or doing a long 'performance' mode, it's always been doing the performance.

> "Humble thyself in the sight of the Lord, and He will lift you up." I know it's true!

Perhaps that's the 'light switch'.

SF: Bingo! Finding the 'switch' takes a while of trial and error, and it's always emotionally taxing to 'flip it on'. But it's well worth it – a key to life itself!

Lost Patrol: I have seen that kind of thing before. I posit this has proven effective for you precisely because you are not an actor. You probably could not take on a different 'role' and be successful. Your act is to show the genuine you, which you normally safeguard, and you get good reviews because people like what they are hearing and seeing. They respond to the honesty. In your case the acting is not to put on the mask but to drop it.

When I was younger I would often develop an admiration for certain professional actors based on their performance in movies or shows. If I was later exposed, via a talk show or news article, to the actual personality of that individual, it usually resulted in a colossal let down; and I could never look at them the same way again. They were faking it.

SF: LP,

> "Your act is to show the genuine you, which you normally safeguard… the acting is not to put on the mask but to drop it."

Your distinction is exactly right.

> "They respond to the honesty."

Yes, and I would add two more descriptors – acceptance and sincerity.

Acceptance is what allows me to open my heart to begin with. I accept them first, as an act of faith, and then they are given the real choice to either accept me or reject me in return, depending on how the interaction plays out.

Honesty is saying things precisely as they are, and as it relates to people's lives.

Sincerity is the attachment of emotion to honesty. It is what connects one person's heart to another, and makes the moment indelibly memorable. Sincerity is what makes you either an iconic superstar, a revered sage, or an arrogant ass, depending on what you say and how it's taken. Sincerity is the key.

Scott: LP agreed. When I am "on" in front of the class, I am simply unguarded. I always have a lot of fun with my students.

YS: I related to some of what you said. I also like being alone, and would often prefer it, truth be told. My profession demands that I not be, and my wife and kids have helped in that area too. It can be work, but I have appreciated many of the times I have forced myself to be social.

MacDonald the Old: A former pastor of mine was big on the idea that personality traits shouldn't be assumed to be "good" just because they're "who I am." It's a bit of a "red pill" moment in itself to realize that the "be true to your heart" mantra has conditioned us to never look at our own personal tendencies with a critical eye.

The additional lie it perpetuates is that our personalities, desires, and preferences can't – or shouldn't – change.

SF: The "be true to your heart" mantra is a "true" lie, which all depends on how it is interpreted and applied. If I interpret it to mean that I should do what is most to my liking, what is easiest and most enjoyable, then it is a lie (a self-serving platitude). If I interpret it to mean that I should be authentic in the act I put on for my students, then it is profoundly true.

> "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked: Who can know it?" ~ Jeremiah 17:9 (NKJV)

…and so are the deceitful ears. People hear whatever they are inclined to hear, and they don't always hear the truth contained in truths.

Conclusions

- Authenticity = Acceptance + Honesty + Sincerity
- Getting closer to God not only involves being authentic before God, but also before our fellow man.
- The subjective experience of being authentic doesn't always come easily. It usually requires a lot of emotional work.
- When you can get into the habit of being authentic, people will notice and respond.

Related

- Sigma Frame: Personal Wealth and Service (12 September 2009)
- Sigma Frame: Onlookers, or Overcomers? (6 November 2009)
- Sigma Frame: Confidence and Authenticity in Speech (28 December 2009)

Is there any honor or benefit to slut shaming an adulterous wife?

Jack · 24 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

An examination of the dynamics of slut shaming a wayward wife.

Readership: Red Pilled Men

Based on one of my previous posts, there was a discussion at Boxer's concerning how a man could possibly deal with an adulterous or Alpha-widowed wife, who is spiritually impoverished as a result of her present inclinations, or her previous sexual profligacies, respectively. These posts included,

1. Sigma Frame: Can You Trust A Dancing Skeleton? (September 21, 2018)
2. Boxer: How Dare You (November 7, 2018)
3. Boxer: Patriarchal Thinking (November 13, 2018)

Just to be clear, my previous post (1) was intended to warn readers of the inevitable risks of today's MMP, and to encourage readers to be both honest and extremely diligent when vetting a potential spouse. I'd like to believe that the overdramatized description might even induce more conscientiousness about the social, marital, and spiritual consequences of sexual promiscuity.

The term "marital fraud" was intended to describe how the spiritual desolation in the wife, which results from dissipating herself (AKA "discovering herself"), invariably remains as a perpetual act of cruelty and disrespect towards her future spouse. It was not meant as a justification for divorce in the de jure sense, although I do understand how it could be interpreted that way, based on certain Biblical passages.

We have two situations covered in Boxer's two posts, and their related discussions.

1. A wife who was slutty in the past, and who continues to coit Mr. Danger, even though married.
2. A wife who was slutty in the past, but who has since settled down and honors her marital vows.

In the last post (3), Boxer covers these two cases respectively as follows.

> "If his partner is breaking the [marital] contract, then there are remedies available, which don't include impotent whining and bitching in public. If his partner is not breaking the contract, then he needs to shut the fuck up and quit whining and bitching in public. Public bitching and whining is unmanly. The time for reading the prospectus is before one invests [in a woman by marrying her]."

But as Honeycomb and Ofelas pointed out in the comments of Boxer's previous post (2), sexual promiscuities are acts of sin that people rarely come to regret. A guy is blessed if the girl actually regrets her past libidinal indiscretions and confesses it.

There was also some discussion about whether commiserating over marital fraud is "manly", or honorable, or what not. I agree that these considerations are important, however they are also corrigible, depending on the context of the situation.

If the wife is merely fraudulent, in that she did not confess her true sexual history with her fiancée before marriage, but she conscientiously observes her marital vows and seeks to invest in the relationship, then I believe there is not much a husband can do to remediate the spiritual poverty that she has brought into the marriage. The best he can do is to improve the bonding as much as he can, and guide her towards spiritual growth.

But if the wife continues to revel in her "freedom of choice", and indulge in glorifying branch swinging, then slut shaming might have a beneficial purpose. So I will outline a few possible outcomes here as follows.

Possible Benefits to Slutty Wife Shaming

I can see a small number of possibly beneficial purposes in publicly shaming an adulterous wife or LTR companion (the first case mentioned above).

1. In the case where the wife continued to be proud of her carouseling, and at risk of continuing in it, then exposing her sin and shame might serve to goad her towards repentance and reinforce her remorse.
2. In the case where the wife was nymphotically desperate for cyclical sexual afirmaction, such that it took the form of an adicktion which she couldn't live without, then publicly shaming her would probably break any remaining trust in hubby. This move would essentially end the relationship, and would push her out to drift in the SMP. However, getting rid of such a woman would probably be a good thing, and she would probably be (relatively) "happier" too, for whatever that is worth. Furthermore (if I am interpreting scripture correctly), this form of discipline is endorsed by St. Paul.

> "…deliver such a one to Satan for the destruction of the flesh, that his spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." ~ 1st Corinthians 5:5 (NKJV)

3. It would demonstrate to other, i.e. younger, women that they can't avoid a public scorning for sexual profligacy, even though married. This would be taking one small step back to a Patriarchal social structure, much to the dismay of liberated Feminists. (That in itself may prove to be rather satisfying!)

Risks Inherent in Slutty Wife Shaming

There are also many risks in this, which should not be overlooked.

1. A man risks violating the sacred trust of his wife, which may lower her temptation threshold. This is a complicated and nuanced matter, which may warrant some further discussion and review.
2. He opens himself up to gossip and ridicule within his community.
3. This may have a negative effect on his reputation and social standing, which in turn, may affect the trajectory and stability of his career.

4. Once other Chads find out that she's easy, she may face a landslide of sexually tinged male attention. In this case, the man would basically be advertising her services to the community.

Of course, the effectiveness and end results of these purposes would depend on the character of the individual, the social context, and the nature of their peer group as well.

If the peer group / public rejoined the husband's shaming of the wife by reinforcing the social ostracization, then this may do wonders in bouncing the wayward wife back onto the straight and narrow. We know how women always follow the herd.

On the other hand, if the peer group scorned the husband for exposing his wife's indiscretions, and labeled him as "cowardly whiner", then this may serve to empower the wife's ambitions to up her N count even higher.

In a perfect world, she might also respond by feeling compassion for her husband's having to endure suffering for her wrongdoing, but this (I believe) is unlikely, and even if she does, it is unclear whether she would turn her behavior around or not.

The bottom line is that if a man has a cockamaniacal wife who is rocking the boat by flirting and F-ing around with other men, then this puts the cucked husband in a very strenuous, defensive, and dishonored position. This continues to be true, although less severe, even if the wife has since forsaken her promiscuous past.

Also, other males would be wiser to offer moral support to a husband who feels he has been defrauded or cucked, rather than to deride him for being an "unmanly" cuckold.

I hope the information offered in this post may help men think through their choices and actions more clearly.

Somewhat inspired by the discussion at Boxer's, I'm still trying to figure out who gets cucked worse (in theory) – the Tingle-inspiring Alpha who has the quick, soul gratifying F*ck that is so envied by all other men, but then has his progeny condom-bagged or aborted, and thereby loses his reproductive opportunities to the Beta she has children with later on, OR the Beta who fathers children with her, but has to tolerate her guilt-ridden soul emptiness and sexual frigidity stemming from her youthful, widow inducing rendezvous with the Alpha.

It's a tough call.

But it does seem like wherever Derek goes, he draws criticism…

Related

- Atlas Obscura (feat. Sarah Laskow): The Racist, Slut-Shaming History of Adultery Laws (August 21, 2015)

States, Processes, and Qualities

Jack · 30 November 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Some brief definitions of engineering and thermodynamic concepts to be used as an analogy to explain spiritual phenomena.

Readership: Reference

I feel there is a general haze of confusion surrounding many spiritual concepts, such as defilement, uncleanness, consecration, sanctification, and redemption. I will be studying these concepts in some future posts, and in order to help our understanding of these matters, I will be discussing them in terms of an analogy to the comparable concepts ubiquitous in thermodynamics, industrial engineering, and manufacturing science, namely states, processes, and qualities, among others. So this post is meant to serve as a reference to some general definitions. I may add to this post in the future.

A State is defined as the equilibrium condition of a system, and is described in terms of several state variables or state quantities that depend only on the current equilibrium condition of the system. State functions do not depend on the path by which the system arrived at its present state. For example, internal energy, enthalpy, and entropy are state quantities.

- Uncleanness is a state defined by certain extrinsic properties.
- Defilement is a state determined by certain intrinsic properties.

A Process is how a system passes from one state to another. Process functions depend on the path taken to reach one state from another. As an example, mechanical work and heat are process functions because they describe quantitatively the transition between equilibrium states of a thermodynamic system.

Process Quality is having the highest efficiency and best utilization of all resources in production.

Product Quality means to incorporate features that have a capacity to meet consumer needs (wants) and gives customer satisfaction by improving products (goods) and making them free from any deficiencies or defects.

Six Sigma (6σ) is a set of techniques and tools for process improvement. Six Sigma strategies seek to improve the quality of the output of a process by identifying and removing the causes of defects and minimizing variability in manufacturing and business processes. It uses a set of quality management methods, mainly empirical, and statistical methods, and creates a special infrastructure of people within the organization who are experts in these methods. Each Six Sigma project carried out within an organization follows a defined sequence of steps and has specific value targets, for example: reduce process cycle time, reduce pollution, reduce costs, increase customer satisfaction, and increase profits. A six sigma process is one in which 99.99966% of all opportunities to produce some feature of a part are statistically expected to be free of defects.

Related

What does it mean to be Unclean?

Jack · 2 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

Reaching a deeper understanding of the concepts behind the state of being Unclean, including Biblical citations, descriptions, and visual illustrations.

Readership: All

I've decided that several theological terms, such as unclean, defile, consecrate, and sanctify, deserve a closer study. So this post takes a look at the first term, and some upcoming posts will tackle the others.

A simple interpretation of unclean is just what the word means – dirty. An object, such as the coffee mug in the picture above, or a person, in the spiritual context, has been busy with the common tasks and functions of life, and carries physical or spiritual indications of his/her contact with the functional world. These indicators become feculent if efforts are not made to wash and clean them in a timely manner.

In the spiritual context, the Bible mentions several experiences which cause one to be unclean.

> "[4] Whatever man of the descendants of Aaron, who is a leper or has a discharge, shall not eat the holy offerings until he is clean. And whoever touches anything made unclean by a corpse, or a man who has had an emission of semen, [5] or whoever touches any creeping thing by which he would be made unclean, or any person by whom he would become unclean, whatever his uncleanness may be— [6] the person who has touched any such thing shall be unclean until evening, and shall not eat the holy offerings unless he washes his body with water. [7] And when the sun goes down he shall be clean; and afterward he may eat the holy offerings, because it is his food. [8] Whatever dies naturally or is torn by beasts he shall not eat, to defile himself with it: I am the Lord." ~ Leviticus 22:4-8 (NKJV)

To reframe this in my own words,

> "If you've been ill and puking, you shouldn't plan to go on a date. If you've just attended a funeral, or if you've been jerking off on X-vids, or if you've been cleaning up your kid's excrement, or cleaning dead cockroaches > out of the drain, or if you're all grossed out from working at a medical clinic or from watching horror movies, (etc.), then until the day is over and you've had a hot shower, you're not going to be in the right mood to enjoy a romantic candlelit dinner with your spouse. And if the dinner includes roadkill, then that will ruin the mood of the evening, on top of the fact that you'll be facing some serious gastroenteritis over the next few days."

From my reading of this, it is apparent that practically any repugnancy or offense that causes one to develop a rancorous disposition, is part and parcel of the experience of becoming unclean.

Of note, an offense is a process by which one becomes unclean.

Does this mean that certain Feeelz are unclean?

Well, sort of. A better way to describe this would be in terms of the appropriateness of one's disposition within specific contexts. I believe this is because being unclean also includes the spiritual (or ceremonial) aspect – that is to say, certain experiences, like having orgasms, PMS, and touching bugs and dead things, affect one's Frame of mind and emotional disposition, such that one becomes unable to enjoy, or unfit to attend formal white tie events.

The emotion of disgust is the near opposite of joy, and several passages in scripture associate joy with a vibrant life in the presence of God.

> "Do not sorrow, for the joy of the Lord is your strength." ~ Nehemiah 8:10 (NKJV)
>
> "Let us come before His presence with thanksgiving;
> Let us shout joyfully to Him with psalms." ~ Psalm 95:2 (NKJV)

Put simply, the mundanities of life are just not fitting nor dignified, and thereby spoil the joys of a formal experience.

From a simple TRP perspective, the two states are incompatible.

For a visual experience of the difference, please overlook my amateur photoshop skills and "feel the difference" between the images below. [Viewer warning: the third and fourth images may be disturbing.]

Image of a joyful beauty in paradise – soul inspiring!

Image of a down-to-earth man fighting against nature for survival – also very inspiring.

Image of a down-to-earth man doing a very disgusting, but well-paying job. It's still honorable and respectable, in spite of the stench.

Image of a joyful beauty at a meat rendering plant… Ugh! Pass me the barf bag, NOW!

I think everyone can agree that the juxtaposition of joy and beauty with death and decay is far worse than merely the sight of rotting carcasses at the glue factory. There's no inherent value, meaning, or inspiration in it, and it destroys any value, meaning, and inspiration that might have been recognized of its constituent elements. In fact, once you've seen that last image, if you go back to view any of the previous three images again, you'll find that they have lost all their power to inspire. That's precisely the sentiment carried by the Biblical descriptions of being unclean.

I believe this is (at least partly) the idea that Jesus was referring to in the parables of the patches and wineskins.

> "No one puts a piece of unshrunk cloth on an old garment; for the patch pulls away from the garment, and the tear is made worse. Nor do they put new wine into old wineskins, or else the wineskins break, the wine is spilled, and the wineskins are ruined. But they put new wine into new wineskins, and both are preserved." ~ Matthew 9:16-17 (NKJV)

Leviticus 15 talks further about ceremonial uncleanliness. It says that women are unclean during their menstrual cycle, and that men are unclean after a seminal emission.

> "[16] 'If any man has an emission of semen, then he shall wash all his body in water, and be unclean until evening.
> [17] And any garment and any leather on which there is semen, it shall be washed with water, and be unclean until evening. [18] Also, when a woman lies with a man, and there is an emission of semen, they shall bathe in water, and be unclean until evening.
> [19] 'If a woman has a discharge, and the discharge from her body is blood, she shall be set apart seven days; and whoever touches her shall be unclean until evening. [20] Everything that she lies on during her impurity shall be unclean; also everything that she sits on shall be unclean. [21] Whoever touches her bed shall wash his clothes and bathe in water, and be unclean until evening. [22] And whoever touches anything that she sat on shall wash his clothes and bathe in water, and be unclean until evening. [23] If anything is on her bed or on anything on which she sits, when he touches it, he shall be unclean until evening. [24] And if any man lies with her at all, so that her impurity is on him, he shall be unclean seven days; and every bed on which he lies shall be unclean." ~ Leviticus 15:16-24 (NKJV)

For menstruation and ejaculation, the jism, blood, stains, and odors are obviously properties that determine an unclean state. And we know how women are often in a foul mood too, during their menstrual cycle.

But in addition to the malodorous menses and meandrous moods, we might also presume (from a spiritual view) that a psychological state of post orgasmic delirium is also concomitant with becoming unclean.

By comparing the faces of pleasure and pain, we get a glimpse of how an orgasm might be considered unclean, while suffering is not. The faces expressing pain are disturbing, but still remain respectable and relatable. But the schmoozy O faces appear psychotic and creepy within the context of polite company. This phenomenon is apparently true across sex, race and culture.

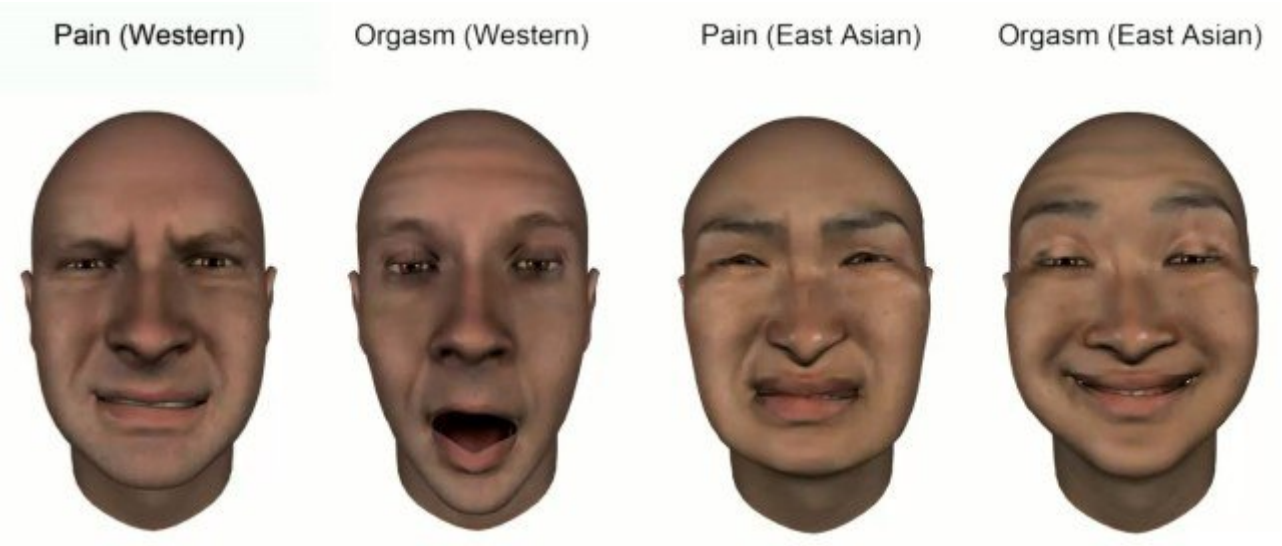

Image source: Motherboard (feat. Samantha Cole): Researchers Studied How Facial Expressions for Orgasms and Pain Differ Across Cultures (October 16, 2018).

To further explore this effect, let's consider how people's moods will change after having sex (as in Leviticus 15:18). For a visual comparison of the pre, in vitro, and post dopamine/oxytocin states, take a look at these photo illustrations from Brazilian photographer, Marcos Alberti, who teamed up with sex toy brand Smile Makers to capture the cum laud faces of women within shuddering throes and curled toes, in a collection he calls, "The O Project" [Viewer warning: link NSFW].

My comments follow the visual teaser.

In the pre-oxytocin state, the subjects appear (relatively) dignified and rational. But after grunting through an O, each person takes on a different aura. Some women get silly and giggly, some become bumbling buffoons, some get proud and disdainful, some get catty and mean, some just get zoned out and sh!t faced, and a few actually become more soft, warm and loving. Their change in spirit cannot be denied. In fact, the Bible says that this is when you really "know" a person in the carnal sense.

Different strokes for different blokes. Different post O's for different host hoes. But the bottom line is that something in their spiritual constitution has changed. It's not a permanent change, but it's definitely not appropriate nor suitable within certain contexts. Hence, the person would be considered unclean in this state.

Now the women in these photos were only lancing their loins with a sex toy product, and there was no "emission of semen" as stated in Leviticus. But if an actual man were introduced into her orgasmic thrall, and the specified genetic condiments were tossed onto the salad, then that's when the real permanence of defilement sets in.

The next post will cover the topic of Defilement.

Conclusions

Some rather unsurprising conclusions about ceremonial uncleanness are as follows.

- The gut-turning blend of the beautiful and the unseemly, is a characteristic quality of a state of being unclean.
- Activities or experiences which elicit rancorous disgust detract from one's sense of confidence and joy in a formal dignified setting.
- Similarly, activities or experiences which cast one into an inebriated or unsober state of being defer one from being in a rational and reasonable state of mind, which may have a direct impact on the decisions and/or events in one's life.

Related

Sigma Frame:

A True Prophet of Western Politics

Jack · 5 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A favorable op-ed on Ed Hurst's unique political views.

Readership: Those who are fully disconnected from the Matrix

To most Christians, it may appear as though the political spectrum of the Right conforms more closely to Christian principles as a nation. Indeed, for all my life, most Christians have believed that the political Right is the moral Right, and have voted accordingly.

Likewise, most Christian leaders and organizations throw their political hat in with the Republican Right. However, the religious leaders of our day are increasingly embracing the corrupted values and lifestyles of the Left.

On the other side of the aisle, I've found that many Leftist principles envelop a Christ-like attitude towards one's fellow man, although their values and purposes have descended into outright paganism. Another no-go.

So in sum, I've never been content with the comprehensive narratives offered by either the Right or the Left. Many of those in my generation (X-er's) have felt the same way, although for different reasons, which has led to the growth of the third parties over the last 30 years, such as the Libertarian and the Green. But none of these parties have gained significant traction. Moreover, it is becoming apparent to everyone that no clear political lines can be drawn along Biblical or other ideological grounds. It seems that "the system" just won't allow it.

This phenomenology begs the deeper question of, WHY is it all so stymied?

The Flimsy Nutshell answer: It's all puppet politics to appease and control the masses. We don't know what's really going on behind the scenes. But occasionally, we get a harrowing glimpse of the truth, which no one is ready to believe, much less accept responsibility for.

To make the social landscape even more confusing, false teachers, and false leaders abound these days. It's nearly impossible to find a voice that speaks the values and viewpoints of God concerning modern politics.

So I want to devote this blog post to promote a fellow blogger, Ed Hurst, at "Do What's Right". He's been blogging for many years, and he has more than 900 followers. He's also written a number of books on various subjects, including A Christian Guide to the Sexual Marketplace (2013), and Redemption and Sexual Identity (2014). They're available online for free.

Concerning his approach to scripture, he states his unique approach in his page, Philosophy.

> "…holding to the Western epistemology guarantees you cannot understand the Bible. Your subconscious mind will be imbued with an arrogant assumption you do understand it, and better than those who wrote it. That's wrong. Further, the Hebraic approach is what God designed as the proper viewpoint for humans in this world, so if you don't embrace it, you fight God."

Elsewhere, he says,

> "You do not measure the Bible against Post-modern Western social expectations. Instead, you measure the West and every other society and culture against the standards God set forth in His Word. It's not that God expects us to clone the Hebrew society in our own day and time; it won't fit. Rather, in "rightly dividing the Word," we discern the underlying facts of human nature manifested in Hebrew customs by reading about them from within the ancient Hebrew moral standards."

This is a view from outside the crucible of the Western Aristotelian epistemology, and all of its offshoots. He defines mysticism as simply holding a non-Aristotelian epistemology. I feel this is a philosophical tool likely to yield some astute insights that are commonly ignored by today's thinkers, and indeed has, as can be seen in many of his posts.

To the point, Ed has been able to put into words my deeper beliefs, or should I say, suspicions about western politics. As he writes in his post, The Current Path of the US (November 30, 2018),

> "The "left" and "right" in our current political context is just a front to whip up the crowds. It never ceases to amaze me just how deeply the troops on the ground truly believe the crap they are sold. There is a wealth of mythology on both sides that really has nothing to do with actual government policy."

Read more in his latest post, The US Is Terminal (December 5, 2018), and other works under the tags, Politics and Globalism.

Now you will see how deep the rabbit hole goes.

Related

- The American Thinker (feat. Peter Skurkiss): Is Globalism the New Feudalism?(December 4, 2018)
- The American Thinker (feat. Selwyn Duke): For the West to Live, 'Equality' Must Die (December 4, 2018)

What does it mean to be Defiled? – Part I

Jack · 9 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A Biblically based understanding of Defilement, covering descriptions and implications on relationships and spiritual vitality.

Readership: All

This essay is comprised of the following sections.

1. Introduction
2. Concepts and Definitions
3. Is Defilement a State or a Process?
4. What is the difference between being Unclean and being Defiled?
5. Old Testament Scriptures Covering Defilement
6. The Lamentable Defilement of Children
7. Conclusions

Introduction

In the commentary under one of J.T.'s posts, Saving Eve: A strong disagreement (October 15, 2018), the word "defile" came up out of a scripture reference, and it occurred to me during the discussion that this is one of those theological terms that Christians frequently hear and use in discussions, but don't really know what it is.

Since this conversation, I've been more cognizant of how this word is used.

In a more recent post, Divorce Part 7 – Final (November 24, 2018), Deep Strength offered an exegetical study of the scriptures on the topic of marriage and divorce. Both of the words, sanctification and defilement were used in the text of this post, as well as many of the comments. Again, I felt like the general understanding of these concepts needed clarification.

After I started this study, it quickly grew to more than 20 pages in MS Word. So because of the length, I parsed it into smaller bites and made several posts of it. This post will only begin to cover the topic of defilement, as it only covers a couple passages within the Old Testament. There is a lot more to be had from the OT, as well as the NT.

Other posts stemming from this study include the following.

- Σ Frame: What does it mean to be Unclean? (2018-12-2)
- Σ Frame: Defiled, not "special" (2018-12-19)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Compatibility is dependent on Sanctification (2020-3-2)
- Σ Frame: The Alpha Widow Syndrome – A Manospherian Allegory of Defilement (2020-3-4)
- Σ Frame: Humility and Defilement (2020-6-17)
- Σ Frame: Sanctification and Sexual Compatibility (2020-6-19)
- Σ Frame: The Red Pill and Blue Pill as Paradigms of Sanctification and Defilement (with a mathematical analogy) (2020-11-15)
- Σ Frame: Towards a more complete appreciation of Sanctification (2022-1-10)

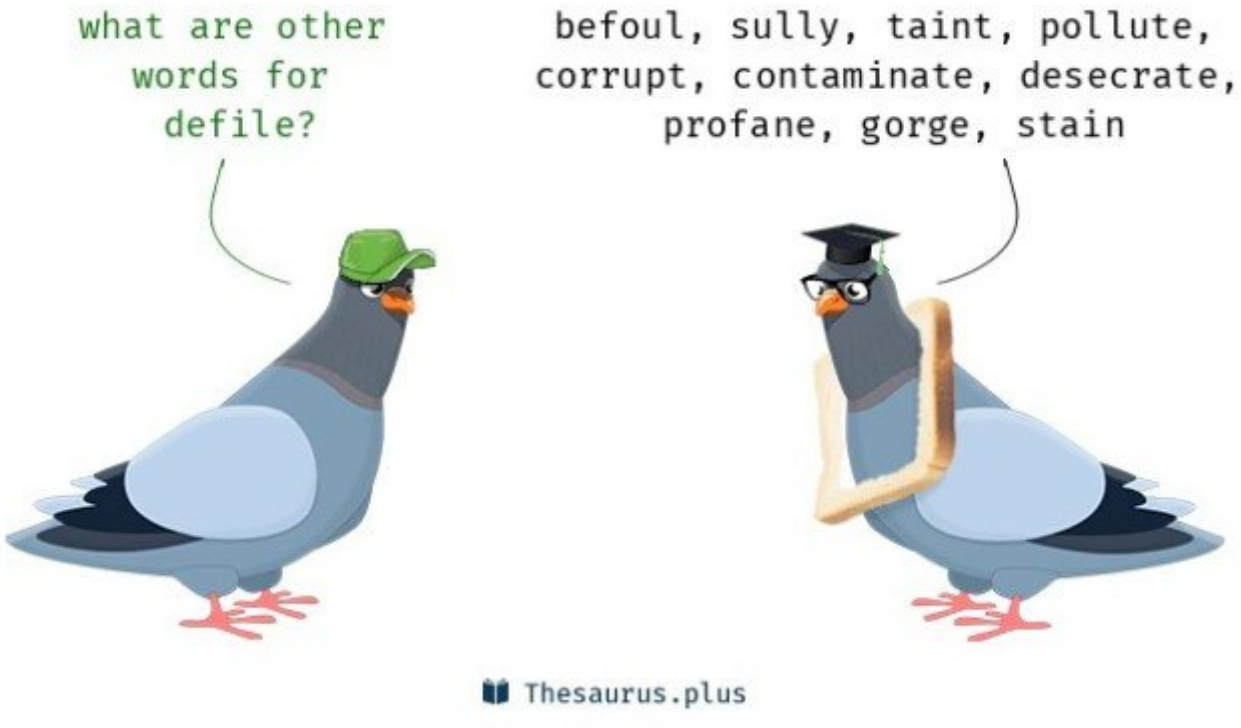
In addition to this, there are two parables circulating the RP sphere which may offer more succinct insights. Some of my readers will be familiar with these stories.

- The Parable of the Pie is an anecdotal comparison between sanctification and defilement.

- The Parable of the Sticky-Tape is another analogy that describes the Alpha Widow syndrome as a trope of defilement.

For quick reference, I'll post these links to online resources covering the related word studies.

- Bible Hub: Topic: "Unclean".
- Bible Hub: Topic: "Defile".
- Bible Hub: Topic: "Consecrate".
- Bible Hub: Topic: "Sanctify".



Concepts and Definitions

The words, defilement (n.) and defiled (adj.) describe a major concept in Christian doctrine. These words not only strike the mind as impressive, but they are also confusing at the same time.

The word defile is defined as, "to make foul, dirty, or unclean; pollute; taint; debase;" or "to violate the chastity of".

Synonyms which might enlarge our understanding of the concept of defilement include debasement, corruption, and contamination.

As per the dictionary definition, defile carries the connotation of being "dirty". But the full Biblical concept includes the spiritual aspect of dirtiness. The full flavor would involve the concepts of eventual damnation, and eternal perdition.

Running parallel to many teachings about defilement are references to things that are unclean. This topic has been reviewed in a previous post, entitled, What does it mean to be Unclean? (December 2, 2018).

Moreover, these definitions are as nebulous as could be, and may not yield any further insight to the layperson. They don't really help anyone understand the spiritual or practical significance at all.

It may help our understanding of the matter if we draw an entertaining analogy to some concepts ubiquitous in thermodynamics, industrial engineering, and manufacturing science. So (partly in jest), I will be making intermittent comments to this end.

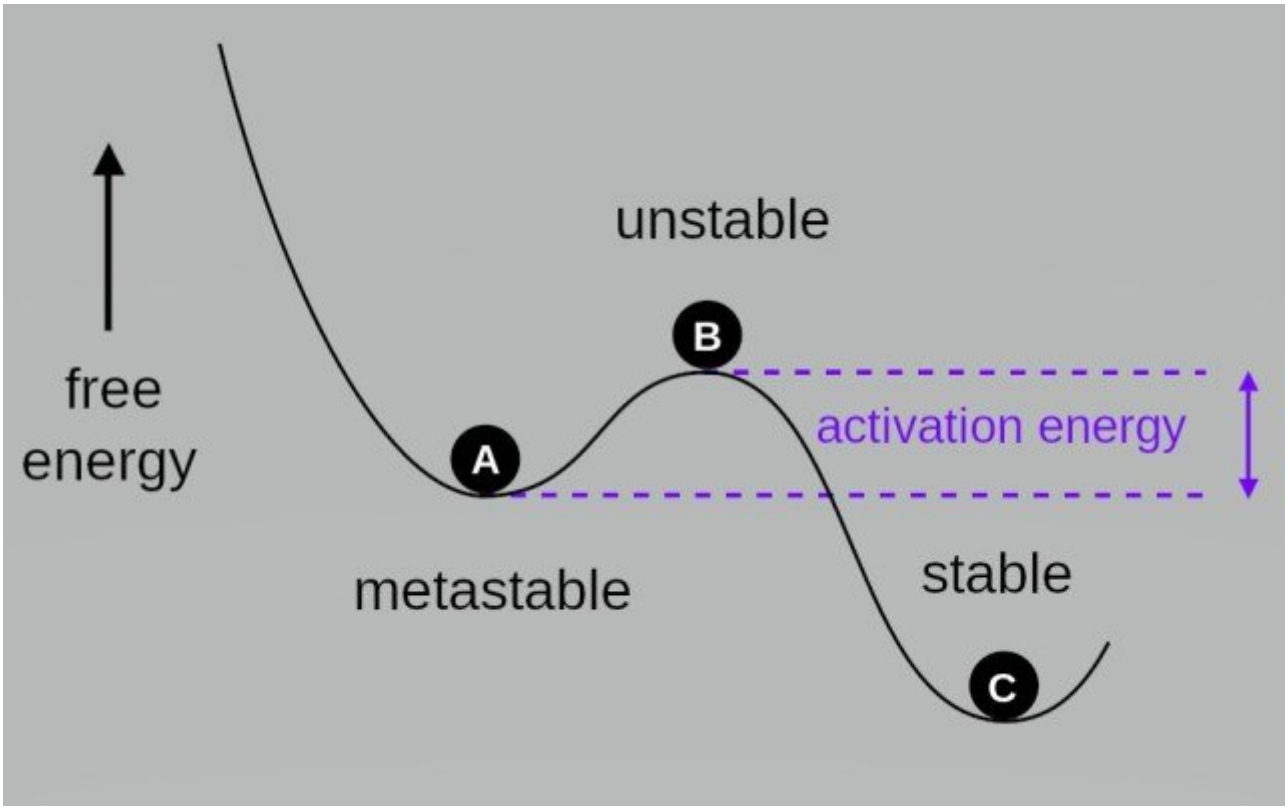
Concerning these distinctions, the reader may like to review some basic definitions of the related concepts, such as states, processes, and qualities, which may help us differentiate between the concepts discussed herein.

The remainder of this essay will further examine the concept of defilement from a Thermodynamic Red Pill (TRP) perspective. Future posts will discuss how culturally pertinent sexual dynamics are related.



The process of moving from A to B requires a catalyst. The process of moving from B to C is spontaneous. The process of moving from C to either A or B can never occur.

Is Defilement a State or a Process?

I had to think about this question for a long time, and I am sure that most people, even believers, are unaware that there is a difference. Right now, I am about 80% convinced that defilement is a state, and not a process. The adjective, defiled, is used to describe that state.

For example, the statement, “The person is defiled” is similar to the statement, “The water is contaminated”. Both adjectives, defiled and contaminated, describe a state characterized by the presence of intrinsic impurities. Likewise, the states of uncleanness and defilement are characterized by properties which describe and determine the respective states.

But too often, these words are used in convention to refer to an amalgamation of the processes involved, which thereby introduces the confusion as to whether it is a state or process. I suppose we could invent the word, defilation, to generally refer to any process leading to defilement.

Another source of confusion may arise from the fact that it’s human nature to be adamantly focused on the “works (of the flesh)” aspect, or the processes necessary to induce a state of defilement, but I am convinced that God is most concerned about the state.

Further compounding this confusion is the fact that the Bible contains many descriptions of things that lead to defilement and uncleanness, which seems to fit the viewpoint of man, and thereby provide apparent credence to the false assumption that defilement is a process.

In sum, many of the references given in scripture concerning defilement fall into one of three categories.

1. Delineations of processes that cause a state of defilement.
2. Descriptions of the properties used to identify a state of being unclean or defiled.
3. Proscriptions of processes for dealing with said states.

Interestingly, it seems that most scriptures cover the first two categories. Some verses give remedies for being unclean, but (so far) I have not found any directions about how to reverse defilement. If we appropriate the afore invented word, defilation, to mean a process of becoming undefiled, then capital punishment appears to be the only scripturally mentioned form of "undefilation". The absence of such a term in scripture, and the severe consequences and irreparability of defilement both stand as evidence leading to certain conclusions in the next section.

What is the difference between being Unclean and being Defiled?

The Bible lists many things that cause uncleanness, as well as defilement. The writers of scripture used two different words, unclean and defiled, to make a distinction between them, because being unclean is not the same as being defiled. So you might be asking this question, as I did – what is the difference between the two concepts?

Largely based on the conclusions of the previous section, my best understanding of this, is that uncleanness is a temporary state, but defilement is permanently etched into the body, mind, soul and spirit, not to mention the salaciously indelible memories of licking that delicious fig pie.

Similar to being unclean, defilement also includes the spiritual aspect – that is, certain experiences affect one's state of mind, and emotional disposition, such that one becomes unfit or unable to have certain other experiences in life, including personal and spiritual maturation.

In other words, a person who is defiled cannot think objectively, and they have developed subjective biases. They possess certain emotional predilections and peculiar affections. The end effect is being more psychotic and less real, more emotional and less rational, more given over to sentiments and less so to education. Essentially, more feeelz, less faith.

Now we add to this understanding, the fact that defilement is rather permanent. It becomes a part of one's constitutional identity of the soul. I have personally heard true stories amounting to the fact that certain sexual experiences can transform one's value system, beliefs, and even one's personality!

So another way to describe the difference is that uncleanness is defined by certain extrinsic properties, while defilement is determined by certain intrinsic properties.

According to Figure 1, it is the movement of the system towards C, never to return to either A nor B.

[Eds. note: This is a very sobering realization. A true comprehension of the eternal gravity of defilement should put the fear of God into a person.]

The distinction between these two states should become more evident to the reader in the next section.

Would you drink out of these cups, even if they were washed first?

Old Testament Scriptures Covering Defilement

In scripture, Leviticus 18 pumps up the volume by describing a number of things or activities causing defilement, including adultery, incest, homosexuality, and bestiality.

We may not be surprised to learn that sexual immorality most certainly introduces defilement. But interestingly, a sexual union is not always necessary for a defilement to occur. (Jesus' teachings in the New Testament bring this out more clearly, but this will remain to be discussed in a future post.)

The first half of this chapter states that it is "wickedness" to "uncover the nakedness of" any one of a large number of close family members. (Scholars believe that "uncover the nakedness of" someone might also be a euphemism for sexual relations, so this remains up for debate.) Verses 6-18 iterate each relation that is forbidden to disrobe in your presence.

Here's a true story that will make this relatable to the reader. I remember once when I was a child, I accidentally walked in on my grandmother while she was undressing. After seeing the sight of her aged body, I was not able to imagine that any woman, young or old, was aesthetically beautiful underneath her clothes. It was not until I was much older, after I had seen prime SMV women in the nude, that I was able to think of (some) women as beautiful. So I can understand how the sight of naked family members can warp one's impression of people in general.

The second half of this chapter lists a number of activities, most of them sexual, which cause one to become defiled. So here we are talking about processes which should be avoided.

> “[19] ‘Also you shall not approach a woman to uncover her nakedness as long as she is in her customary impurity. [20] Moreover you shall not lie carnally with your neighbor’s wife, to defile yourself with her. [21] And you shall not let any of your descendants pass through the fire to Molech, nor shall you profane the name of your God: I am the Lord. [22] You shall not lie with a male as with a woman. It is an abomination. [23] Nor shall you mate with any animal, to defile yourself with it. Nor shall any woman stand before an animal to mate with it. It is perversion.
>
> [24] ‘Do not defile yourselves with any of these things; for by all these the nations are defiled, which I am casting out before you. [25] For the land is defiled; therefore I visit the punishment of its iniquity upon it, and the land vomits out its inhabitants. [26] You shall therefore keep My statutes and My judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations, either any of your own nation or any stranger who dwells among you [27] (for all these abominations the men of the land have done, who were before you, and thus the land is defiled), [28] lest the land vomit you out also when you defile it, as it vomited out the nations that were before you. [29] For whoever commits any of these abominations, the persons who commit them shall be cut off from among their people.
>
> [30] ‘Therefore you shall keep My ordinance, so that you do not commit any of these abominable customs which were committed before you, and that you do not defile yourselves by them: I am the Lord your God.’”

So to put this all together, a bullet list of defiling experiences looks like this.

- Viewing adult, close family members in the nude (other than one’s husband or wife)
- Thinking of sex too lightly, or taking sex casually (profaning God)
- Having casual sex with short term partners (fornication, profaning God)
- Having sex with a woman during her menstruation.
- Swinging (trading husbands or wives for sexual purposes, which is adultery)
- Cuckolding or being cuckolded (adultery)
- Sexual experiences with same sex partners (homosexuality)
- Sexual experiences with family members (incest)
- Sexual experiences with animals (bestiality)

- Sacrificing children's well-being (e.g. destroying their lives, spiritual vitality, faith, and confidence) for the sake of personal goals or interests

The Lamentable Defilement of Children

In the spiritual sense, one's first encounter with either God's grace, or Satan's thug life, often occurs in childhood or adolescence. Thus, a state of sanctification or defilement (respectively) can set in early, often times long before a person is cognizant of the nature of the transition. This trajectory tends to develop and expand over a person's life span, resulting in their eternal condition of union with (in the case of sanctification), or alienation from (in the case of defilement) God Himself.

The last point on the list above is an especially complex topic, since it involves the defiling formation (or the de-formation) of young minds and souls. So it includes this sublist.

- Divorce and fatherlessness are both known to have a profoundly negative effect on any children involved.
- Pursuing sexual promiscuity while married, which invariably results in the defilement of the perpetrators through adultery, is both a cause of, and a prevalent motive for a frivorce which harms children. So this is a double defilement.
- Sexual experiences with children (pedophilia)
- Killing children (abortion, infanticide, homicide)

> "But whoever causes one of these little ones who believe in Me to stumble, it would be better for him if a millstone were hung around his neck, and he were thrown into the sea." ~ Mark 9:42 (NKJV)

Related

- All Things Bright And Beautiful: Spiritual Darkness and Sacrificing Children – Part I (August 28, 2018)
- All Things Bright And Beautiful: Spiritual Darkness and Sacrificing Children – Part II (December 6, 2018)

Conclusions

It might be tempting for some readers to cling to the belief that defilement is not much different from being unclean. But the difference is noteworthy. A state of uncleanness is (presumed to be) temporary – body fluids and sheets which can be washed up in an hour, or rancorous or inebriated dispositions which undulate over time. But defilement is associated with taking a step into the abyss – etched permanently into the body (self-evident), mind (i.e. cognitive beliefs, memory), soul (affections and inclinations), and spirit (perdition).

Upon reflection, it may be apparent to the reader by now, that when a society loosens its sexual norms, the associated "liberation" not only brings depravity, but it is also the destruction of Sanctity. It would be more fitting and accurate, from a Christian perspective, to rename "the Sexual Revolution" as "the Defilement Rebellion".

Related

- Christian Crier (feat. Jack Wellman): What Does Defile Mean? A Biblical Definition of Defile or Defiled (August 13, 2015)
- All Things Bright And Beautiful: Email Questions… Virginity is a pile of horse manure? (November 9, 2018)

Can Christians be gay?

Jack · 12 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

An answer to the question of whether sexual orientation is a choice, and suggestions for improving how the Church interacts with the gay community, inside and outside the Church.

Readership: Christians only

A commentary on the debate between Matthew Vines and Michael Brown, concerning various issues surrounding the juxtaposition of homosexuality and Christianity.

The audio of the Matthew Vines vs Michael Brown debate is streamed here on the Moody site.

Can a person be gay and Christian?

The overriding question brought up in the debate, as suggested by the title, was whether a person can be both gay and Christian.

For a gay individual to be considered a true Christian, he must first demonstrate that he has come to know Christ by reforming his lifestyle. As hinted in the debate, this may be even more difficult than remaining celibate would be for straight people.

Michael Brown brought up the fact that thousands of people DO change. If so, then obviously, this can only be accounted for by the work of Christ in their redemption.

Judging by the number of Christians who have repented of homosexuality, one has to agree that there are gay Christians, but it is important to make a more accurate distinction by referring to them as Christians who were formerly gay, as opposed to practicing gay Christians.

Is sexual orientation fixed?

Another one of the issues that was brought up in the debate was the long-standing question of whether one's sexual orientation is fixed or not.

According to my previous findings about defilement, it stands to reason that initially the homosexual lifestyle is a choice. But once chosen, it becomes a part of one's identity, and therefore cannot be subsequently "unchosen".

So, a homosexual who claims that their sexual orientation is fixed, and that their lifestyle can not (or should not) be changed, is inadvertently admitting that they are defiled, and that they do not believe in the power of Christ's work.

As such, asking a homosexual if they believe that their sexual orientation is fixed, or whether the gay lifestyle cannot be changed, is a good litmus test to determine whether they truly know Christ. If the answer is clearly affirmative, then they are denying the power of Christ. On the other hand, if their answer indicates they are confused about the issue, then it is more likely that they might be open to the workings of the Holy Spirit.

But within the context of argumentation, especially with an unbeliever, it is absolutely futile to insist on the idea that gays can (or should) change their orientation, or expect them to believe that their sexual orientation can (or should) be changed, without them first being introduced to the gospel of Christ. Whether they will be able to believe in Christ and embark on their journey of rejuvenation all depends on the Holy Spirit.

But going beyond these basic questions and arguing about it is a wasted effort that will only create animosities, and deter the work of the Holy Spirit in their lives. Straight Christians who want to argue about it, are wasting their time, displaying their ignorance, inviting scorn and ridicule from society, and hindering God's work.

How should the Church deal with gay Christians?

As to the issue of how to deal with gay Christians within the Church, consider the following passage in scripture.

> "[3] Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and God of all comfort, [4] who comforts us in all our tribulation, that we may be able to comfort those who are in any trouble, with the comfort with which we ourselves are comforted by God. [5] For as the sufferings of Christ abound in us, so our consolation also abounds through Christ. [6] Now if we are afflicted, it is for your consolation and salvation, which is effective for enduring the same sufferings which we also suffer. Or if we are comforted, it is for your consolation and salvation. [7] And our hope for you is steadfast, because we know that as you are partakers of the sufferings, so also you will partake of the consolation." ~ 2nd Corinthians 1:3-7 (NKJV)

In effect, it is the Lord's will for His people to take the hard-won lessons they have learned from their experiences, and help others who are going through the same experience.

So in the present application, straight Christians will naturally have great difficulties in relating to this subgroup. So it is most appropriate to let those formerly gay Christians within the Church conduct the ministry of Christ to other gays within the Church.

Should gay Christians be permitted to reinterpret the Bible?

It is reasonable and necessary for individual, formerly gay Christians to rephrase what Christ's Word means to them in the form of a personalized testimony. But rewriting the Bible in order to make the formally presented doctrine more appealing or acceptable, especially to gays outside the church, is patently not permissible.

Conclusions

Homosexuality is one of the main challenges faced by most churches these days. In response to this crisis, many pastors are following the cultural trend by pressing all the members of their congregation to accept and interact with gays. There are two problems with this approach.

1. Many straight Christians simply have very little sympathy for either the gay lifestyle, or the struggles of being a gay Christian, and for many of the faithful, no amount of preaching is going to change this. The result is that gays feel condemned by the annoyance of Christians, and do not experience Christ through their interactions with Christians.
2. Many straight Christians simply do not have a need to interact with gays. Expecting them to do so, purportedly to become more "loving", is actually detrimental and burdensome to the spiritual vitality of both straight and gay individuals.

There are two things that the Church can do to improve their work for Christ, concerning homosexuals.

1. The Church's interaction with the gay community should be the sole responsibility of Christians in the church who were formerly gay. Straight Christians will surely bumble the PR, and cause the name of Christ to be blasphemed among the LGBT crowd.
2. Based on 2nd Corinthians 1:3-7, the task of ministering to gays should be left to the discretion of those reformed gay Christians within the church.

Following the last point, repentant gay Christians would be best qualified to administer an appropriate hermeneutical interpretation of scripture to other gays under their mentorship. Even so, any "reinterpretation" of scripture should not be comprehensively different from the Gospel of Christ.

H/T: Wintery Knight: Matthew Vines and Michael Brown debate homosexuality and the Bible on Moody radio (December 8, 2018)

Related

- Dalrock: Chandler: Every Christian should have a gay friend. (December 10, 2018)

How Social Media Algorithms Fuel Political Division

Jack · 15 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

The role of media and algorithms in a discussion of how the design of the internet polarizes us.

Readership: All

It's extremely rare to find a well-informed political science editorial spotlighting the causes/motivations of media bias. So I am proud to present the following article, submitted by Dante Emerson, describing how the political landscape is shaped by the internet, which is guided by media algorithms.

In the age of the internet, information is available at the click of a button, but this is not always a good thing. Social media and search platforms such as Facebook and Google are designed to show you what they think you want to see based on your search and viewer history. This causes people to become insulated within "echo chambers", environments where only opinions that agree with yours are heard. What is worse, the media capitalizes on this phenomenon and exacerbates it.

In The Law of Group Polarization [1], Cass R. Sunstein argues that groups of likeminded people in deliberative environments tend become more radical in their ideas. For instance, a group of professors in favor of affirmative action coming together to discuss how to defend affirmative action will likely become more radically in favor of affirmative action as a result of the interaction.

Bernard Manin [2] warned of the dangers of democratic, deliberative forums, in that supporting arguments are presented, while sensitive information is suppressed. He expressed the importance of public debate to clearly identify the issues at stake.

Social media platforms such as Facebook and Twitter are where people come together to discuss ideas and current events in real time. These two platforms specifically use "relevancy algorithms" [3] to deliver content to users. Not only do these algorithms attempt to match your search string with suitably matching results, but they also have intelligent computer programs sifting through hundreds of things that you have looked at before, and selects similar things to show in your search results. This means that people who often follow Left* leaning social causes will be shown more content from Left leaning sources, allowing them to congregate with like-minded people. The same is true of conservatives.

This leads to people on all sides to form echo chambers where their ideas are bounced around, developed, and yet go unchallenged. As the two sides have become more and more polarized, they become more and more hostile to one another, and interactions between the two are reduced to attacks. Examples of this include calls from the Left for hate speech policies to be applied to basic conservative talking points, and people on the Right digging up controversial things from prominent Leftist figures' pasts to get them fired.

Media agendas also play a large role in this problem. According to Political Agenda Setting and Mass Media [4], there are three methods media organizations seek to influence society:

1. Determining what subjects will be talked about.
2. Determining what subjects will not be talked about.
3. Defining things or framing reality in a certain way.

Relevancy algorithms make it easier than ever before for media outlets to use the above tactics.

Authors of articles likely to be shared in Left or Right echo chambers will use click bait article titles – titles that are strategically worded to make the article seem more interesting or urgent to get more people to view them. They will also inject a higher volume of opinions in these articles, in order to accommodate their audiences who are moving further and further to the Left or Right.

The effects of this phenomenon are wide spread, and include the influencing of elections and government policy in possibly negative ways, as well as the creation and proliferation of extremist groups such as the *Alt Right, a very small but tech savvy group of white nationalists that often dig up and publish private information of their critics leaving them open to harassment and violence, and AntiFa, a group of communist revolutionaries that show up at events they disagree with and engage in violence against organizers and participants.

Any mainstream coverage of the Alt-Right is almost guaranteed to contain misinformation, because most of the news correspondents deliver talking points that show they have no idea what they are talking about, and that holds true for all the outlets. So no one media source is totally unbiased concerning their coverage of any internet culture in question. Even more reputable conservative news agencies like Fox have the same problem.

This blind spot within the media arises from several factors. One is because the media has a fundamental bias to the Left. But the overriding reason is that the media agencies seem "not to understand" the echo chamber dynamic of internet cultures.

In this video, Tim Pool talks about how Facebook's algorithm is creating a political echo chamber that is driving people into extreme opinions.

Tim Pool is one of the founders of the popular news company Vice. He resigned from Vice because he found that media companies are incapable of adapting to the internet age.

Some may find it more than a coincidence that certain noteworthy names, such as Rupert Murdoch, the Walt Disney Company, and the Hearst Corp., have since invested heavily in Vice media.

Given that endorsement, you might believe that the reason why no one media source is totally unbiased concerning their coverage of any internet culture in question could be because the media does understand the dynamics of internet cultures, and they are using The Law of Group Polarization to divide society into two (or more) groups.

So perhaps it is not that media companies are incapable of adapting to the internet age, but rather, they are unwilling to take responsibility for correcting the asymptotic diversions created by relevancy algorithms, as it may serve their better interests.

Right now, the results of this natural progression are imminent. Society is starkly divided into two warring factions – one subscribing faithfully to the main stream media propaganda (the Left), and the other (the Right) is being earmarked as a scapegoat, as it's fringe elements are being labeled, one by one, as dangerously dissident, and will eventually be assassinated by some form of sanction or censorship, and possibly even state enforced.

In conclusion, we must be more aware of the biases of the sources we find on social media. We must learn to see the difference between fact and opinion, and diversify the sources of our information. The practice of having public debates should be revisited and strongly preferred over the discourse of talk cells and think tanks.

 It is prudent to stop referring to the Left as "liberals". It's a fundamental misuse of the word.*
 The Alt-Right is an offshoot of several different white nationalist movements. The actual Alt-Right is too small to for their activities to be picked up by mainstream media. They are usually only talked about by small independent journalists and commentators who do so at their own risk. The term Alt-Right is widely misused in the media to refer to detractors of Leftist ideas. For instance, Ben Shapiro is often referred to as Alt-Right despite him being Jewish, and the actual Alt-Right being fundamentally opposed to his existence.*

References

1. Cass R. Sunstein, "The Law of Group Polarization", Journal of Political Philosophy 10:2 (2002) 175-195.
2. Bernard Manin, Democratic Deliberation: Why We Should Promote Debate Rather Than Discussion (October 13, 2005).

3. Christine Warner, This Is Exactly How Social Media Algorithms Work Today. (May 3, 2018)
4. Stefaan Walgrave and Peter Van Aelst, Political Agenda Setting and Mass Media. Oxford Research Encyclopedia of Politics (August, 2016)

Related

Tim Pool talks further about character assassinations, alternative media, and far Left activism.

Defiled, not “special”

Jack · 19 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A response to Adam Piggott’s appraisal of my post, Can Christians be gay?, including paradigmatic viewpoints, the value of peer groups, and Christian PR.

Readership: Christians

Paradigms and Definitions

> “Don’t copy the behavior and customs of this world, but let God transform you into a new person by changing the way you think. Then you will learn to know God’s will for you, which is good and pleasing and perfect.” ~ Romans 12:2 NLT

In my experience, renewing the way I think is mostly about redefining words and concepts.

The word “love” is a good example that we can all understand. There is a worldly concept of love, and then there is the Christian concept of love. The worldly concept of love is called something completely different within an enlightened perspective. The terms, romance, infatuation, lust, exploitation, and codependency come to mind here.

Here we see that one word represents two, totally different paradigms. The challenge of renewing the mind requires one to learn the God ordained paradigm represented by any word in question.

But once in a while, words are hijacked and appropriated to mean other things within the contrasting paradigm. When this happens, the true reality of the matter can be suppressed or painted over, and then it becomes difficult to discern the true meaning of the word/concept. Christians and other awakened people call this phenomena “deception”.

The word “special” is the one in question here.

Homosexuals commonly call themselves “special”, as well as their sympathizers. Understandably, they have adopted this parlance to assuage their shame and grant themselves a bit of human dignity. So using the word “special” to describe them is buying into their world view.

Dalrock calls gays “special people” in a hilarious ventriloquist-esque voice of Matt Chandler’s attitude towards gays. The tongue-in-cheek verbal irony is understood.

I’ve been searching through Chandler’s articles, but so far, I haven’t found him making any reference to gays as “special”. This is quite interesting, because Dalrock’s verbiage of “special” has hit the mark on Chandler’s attitude towards gays. So the appropriation of the word “special” in this sense, appears to have originated from Dalrock. (I imagine Chandler might avoid using this term to describe gays, because it would be seen as patronizing, and he would lose respect and rapport.)

Adam Piggott also takes glee in hubristically calling gays “special people”. His style of verbal irony is entertaining, even inspiring. But his assessment of my post, Can Christians be gay? (December 12, 2018) is upside down. He’s twisting my argument to be in favor of supporting negotiation with gays concerning their integration into the church. I do not support negotiation (for the same reasons as he does), and I don’t believe a seamless integration is possible. To the contrary, the points of my post were to argue for the benefits of avoiding negotiation, to admit the vanity of pressing for integration, and to appoint proxies to do the tasks of any diplomatic work necessary in this regard.

To set my readers straight, aside from the various perspectives of semantics and literary devices, let me be clear that homosexuals are considered “special” within their own world view, but according to a Christian criteria, they are defiled. In common terms, that means decent people don’t want anything to do with them.

In my earlier post, I pointed out that homosexuals are defiled, but here I'll add that the sodomite state of defilement is the reason why it's always creepy to discuss homosexuality and Christianity together. This is the same quality that requires polite company to use the euphemism of being "special". As a somewhat unrelated comparison, the word "special" is also used to refer to individuals suffering from severe retardation and certain other physical deformities, e.g. the Special Olympics.

But being "special" is not an esteemed position when it really means defiled. When gays ask for special treatment, what they're really asking for is to not be treated as defiled. The thing is, if regular people could accept them as being undefiled, then they wouldn't really be defiled.

Defilement is also why having gays in the church is such a controversial issue. But no amount of preaching, arguing, and social posturing is going to change the fact that people get the heebies in their presence – because that's what it means to be defiled. It's a spiritual reality, and no one, neither gays nor straights, can change that ontology, because defilement is permanent, save the grace of God.

The error of Adam's argument

Adam's reflections on my argument presumes that being defiled is equivalent to being "special", and that being special is a preferred status. It's not, unless you want to jump to the other paradigm and buy into the intersectional privilege stuff being touted by the world. Then by making this shift, aided by the convincing art of sarcasm, he attempts to lump me in with the like of Chandler.

To make this erratum more obvious to the reader, I've picked out a few statements from Adam's discourse, and have substituted the word "defiled" for the word "special". As you will see, swapping these two words, along with a few relevant adjectives, brings Adam's revelries around to be spot on.

> "Apparently nobody gets the gays except for those experienced with being gay. It's such a unique and special [defiling] sin that all the rest of humanity is simply unequipped to deal with such a delicate [repulsive] matter."
>
> "They're not really sinners like those other sinners; they're special [defiled] people deserving of special [defiled] treatment."

BTW, this treatment is not something to be achieved through sermons or social engineering. It's just the way it is. It's a fact written on people's hearts. Everybody feels it, gays and straights alike, and that's what all the squawk is about.

The following paragraph required a lot more editing, so please accept this revised paraphrase.

> ["Homosexuals are sinful like everyone else, but they are also defiled. If they repent, accept salvation, and cast off their sins, then they may become Christians, but that is not enough for them to be welcomed into His house. They do not get any welcome as long as they are in a defiled state."]

Last one.

> "…all an individual has to do to suddenly receive special [defiled] treatment above [from] other Christians… is to declare himself a sodomite. By such an act he is suddenly special [defiled]. Nobody else in The Church can possibly relate to him unless they themselves were also a member of the special defiled sodomite club in the past. Perhaps they should [They will definitely] also get to sit in the special [informally reserved] pews up the front [in the back] with all of the other ex-sodomites, or not so ex-sodomites…"

Now the truth comes out. All the controversy in the Church is about this behavior. It is ridiculously unrealistic for pastors, such as Chandler, to ask their congregation, or any straight person, to truly love and accept homosexuals, without first remediating their state of defilement through the redemption of their souls.

On the merit of peer groups

As a rhetorical exercise, Adam substituted the word “rapist” for the word “gay” in my essay as a way to elucidate the ludicrousness of my argument. However, the core claim of my argument still stands – that certain people can better relate to those with similar backgrounds, and establishing social boundaries between different peer groups can be a win-win situation for all involved.

In this same argument, Adam suggested (in his own way) that the same approach towards resolving conflicts within a ministry could be applied to people having many other types of problems. He mentioned murderers, thieves, adulterers, and blasphemers as examples, but he did not offer any analysis of the types, only a dismissal of the whole idea.

In as much as it follows my original argument, I will tentatively agree with Adam, and up the ante by proposing that ex-cons are better suited to witness to felons, recovered alcoholics are better able to host AA meetings, and ex-junkies are most effective for counseling those going through rehab. This seems to be common sense, judging by the fact that most social welfare programs commonly adopt the same approach.

Now that I think of it, the Manosphere has done the same thing in bringing together men who have been disillusioned by the Feminist dominated culture, and given them a male space where they could voice their concerns and grievances. Now does anyone care to have Triggly Puff assume a position as our webhost? Um, maybe Roosh or Scott is better.

[Eds. note: Older readers may have noticed that I just broke the Fifth Wall.]

Some might argue that these associations have no positive value, and that they only create opportunities for thieves to compare notes, and that it introduces the temptation to regress into an old lifestyle. Although this is possible, I’m not convinced that it discounts any value that might be obtained through the association. There are many determinant factors, including the motives of those involved, how strong the leaders are, and how well the social interaction is managed.

Ultimately, this is a highly contextually affected topic that remains to be explored further in future discussions.

The value of Public Relations

Adam said it was “complete ludicrousness” for a church to worry about PR (public relations). Adam is wrong here, because these days (at least in the U.S.), PR is a serious concern. If the church, or any Christian for that matter, botches the PR then they might be looking at a lawsuit. It doesn’t take much to offend SJW’s.

Or who knows? If Christians draw lawsuits from anti-Christian factions, maybe God will use these lawsuits to revise the law of the land. Bring it on!

I’m not saying that we should be tiptoeing around in fear of offending the Left, gays and feminists in particular. No, I’m suggesting that we should think things through and come up with a plan so that we can be well prepared in case things ever progress that far.

Token resistance my @$$!

The seventh Key to maintain Frame: Knowing what to do, and how to respond properly and effectively to a given situation.

One solution to this (that I can think of right now) would be for churches to have a good lawyer (or three), and a good insurance policy that would include coverage of frivolous lawsuits lodged by anti-Christian factions, not only against the church, but also against individual members.

The twelfth Key to maintain Frame: Being ready to demonstrate the lengths you are willing to go, to protect your interests and advance your purposes further.

On the charge against Σ Frame of convergence

Concerning the conclusions of my earlier post, Adam wrote,

“This nonsense is subtle propaganda pushed by the homo bloc.”

I admit, I pride myself on being as unbiased as possible, perhaps to a fault. But I feel this charge has gone a step too far. I am having trouble visualizing this outcome, so perhaps Adam or someone else could describe a cause and effect sequence to explain how my convergence could be possible.

Closing

As time goes on, the continued usage of the word “special” when describing defilement will soon build a widespread cognitive association that will defile the word “special” itself. When that happens, gays will then require a new euphemism in order to retain a sense of self-esteem. At that point, I might guess that the connotation of word “special” will be redefined to describe things that fall into the “waste not, want not” category.

May God forgive me for talking this way about human beings, but the truth needs to be said here.

Lastly, this is a difficult subject, so I want to thank Adam for the opportunity to have this much needed debate over a topic that few people are willing to tackle.

All the best down under!

Update: Read Adam’s response in his post, The homo end game in one photo. (December 20, 2018)

Related

- Upcoming on Sigma Frame: Christianity and Homosexuality

How to get more frequent, enthusiastic sex from your wife: Overcoming Pride and Psychological Resistance

Jack · 23 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

A How-To guide for building masculine frame when being denied sex by your wife.
Readership: This post is a Christmas gift from Σ Frame to heterosexual married men everywhere!
Warning: This article contains sexually graphic content and obscene language. Reader discretion is advised.

Introduction

Couples who choose to embark on the adventures of marriage have assumed the longitudinal goal of permanence. If a couple can stick it out for the first few years, then the marital satisfaction is likely to improve. But if not, then a dead bedroom spells the death knoll of the union.

Many married men are often faced with the challenge of having their sexual needs adequately serviced by the only woman morally eligible to do that job. This discomfiting situation is a very serious and urgent matter, because if she is unwilling or unable to satisfy for an extended period of time, then the marital bonding tends to break down, and the threshold of sexual temptation that the man is able to endure is decreased. I would even go so far as to say that a wife's rejection or ridicule of her husband's sexuality is one of the cruelest acts of fraud that a woman could possibly inflict on a man.

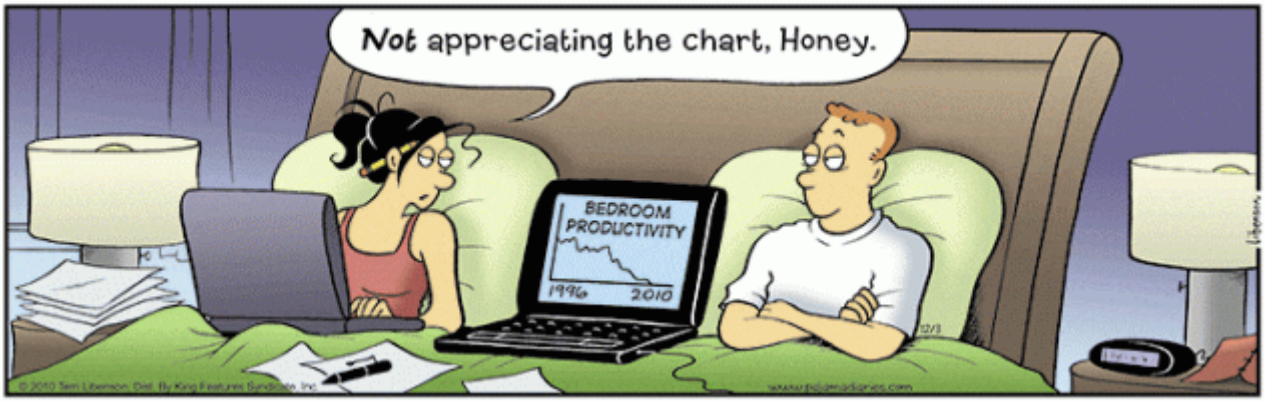
Also, wives who are discontent and unhaaappy with the sexual aspect of their marriages are at greater risk of infidelities. Despite any willingness to be committed to the union, women have an inherent difficulty in honoring their vows whenever their biological imperative argues strongly against it.

Seeing how sexual intercourse comprises so many forms of bonding, including the spiritual covenant, soul ties, emotional attachment, memories, as well as being a continual source of passionate desire for the other person, it is not difficult to believe that the sexual relationship is the one area in which the battle for the marriage will be either won or lost.

From my own personal experience, I have noticed that if the sex is frequent and satisfying, then I can handle any kind of bad attitude or $h!t test from my wife. But if the sex is shameful or non-existent for weeks on end, then I can't even tolerate seeing her around.

Obviously, I have also struggled with this same problem, so my marriage has been no different from most in this respect. However, I suppose I have been blessed, seeing how I can write this report.

I need to add that I am NOT a professional counselor, but nevertheless, I believe my findings can help other married men, and so I post them here.



Supporting Theory

There is quite a bit of theory behind this experiment. So I'll list some relevant sources to help bring the reader up to speed, and then I'll briefly describe the concepts therein. Of note, posts 2-4 describe an advanced study combining a few scientific findings which form the backbone of the present essay.

1. Biblical Gender Roles: How to confront your wife for denying you sex (ca. 2014)
2. Sigma Frame: Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (November 15, 2017)
3. Sigma Frame: Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (February 15, 2018)
4. Sigma Frame: How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (February 27, 2018)
5. Saving Eve: How to find your purpose (October 26, 2018)
6. Doing Marriage Right: Good Post By JT About Finding Your Mission (October 26, 2018)

The first article from BGR outlines the basic steps a Christian husband should take in dealing with this situation. This should not be neglected, because it's necessary to have God at your back. Diligent prayer and fasting over the matter will certainly improve the learning curve.

The second post listed above introduces how conflict structure can be managed to create marital satisfaction. In this model, one person is the initiator of a conflict, and the other person is the respondent. The person who brings up an issue and asks for a change is labeled as the one who demands. The wife, according to the structure, is required to respond somehow. Applying this wisdom to the present issue of increasing sexual intimacy, the husband is demanding sex, or better sex, and the wife is the respondent.

One of the conclusions of this study was that a husband should always be making more 'demands' on a wife, than the other way around, because when the husband does the majority of the demanding, it tends to result in a more positive and enjoyable relationship, over time. This effect was shown by Dr. John Gottman to be true, and when I applied this technique to my own marriage, it had a similar, positive effect. My own experiment with this technique is covered in the third post, Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (February 15, 2018).

The fourth article covers the game aspect of making "bids" for positive attention, and upping the ante of your bid. The essential goal of making a bid is to get the other person to express an acknowledgment of your persona, and to interact with you in a way that expresses love and affirmation. If you can get the other person to do more for you, then it has the psychological and emotional effect of making her justify her actions mentally, and thereby grow to feel more emotionally in tune with you – and we know that the Feeelz are very important to women. Basically, the more they do for you, the more they will love you. So the larger goal of making bids and playing social games, is to drive up your 'bidding price', which entails her making ever larger emotional investments in you and your relationship.

Following this dynamic, the bidding interaction is then combined with the conflict structure described in the second post, such that the husband is demanding better responses to his bids. This whole dynamic is what I will refer to as "Pushing the Line".

The present study of eliciting better sexual enthusiasm from the wife is an extension of Pushing the Line, applied to the special case of encouraging a better response of the wife to the husband's approaches towards sexual intimacy. One simplistic way to think about this, is that the husband is teaching his wife how to open up and express more passion in the bedroom.

The fifth post from J. T. Anderson strengthens a man's frame in dealing with this situation, and in the sixth post, M. J. Davis offers his own account of how he successfully dealt with this problem.

If a man is seriously considering using the methods described in the present article to improve his own marriage and sex life, then I would strongly encourage a thorough study of these six posts listed above.

Now, I'll get on to my own experience using this method to improve my own sex life.

Identification of the Problem

My wife gets into these moods when she has no desire for sexual relations. I've asked her about this before, and she likes to blame me, saying that I wasn't "putting her in the mood". But I saw through that line. The truth is that the Tingles have waned because of the daily humdrum routine of life, and she's too proud to express her sexual needs at those times. She also gets angry very easily, which further inflates her ego, and deflates her libido. I would guess that the majority of women are similar to my wife.

Experimental Procedure

The first week of October (2018), the planets were in alignment (she was in a good mood), so I took advantage of the situation by pressing her for sex every day. Of course, she enjoyed that for the most part. But after five days of this, Mercury and Mars were off more than 5 degrees, and Venus fell from visibility * (her mood took a swing south). With her in a bad mood, batter boy went to the dugout for the next two weeks. During this time, her attitude was despicable. She never had a shortage of things to complain and get angry about.

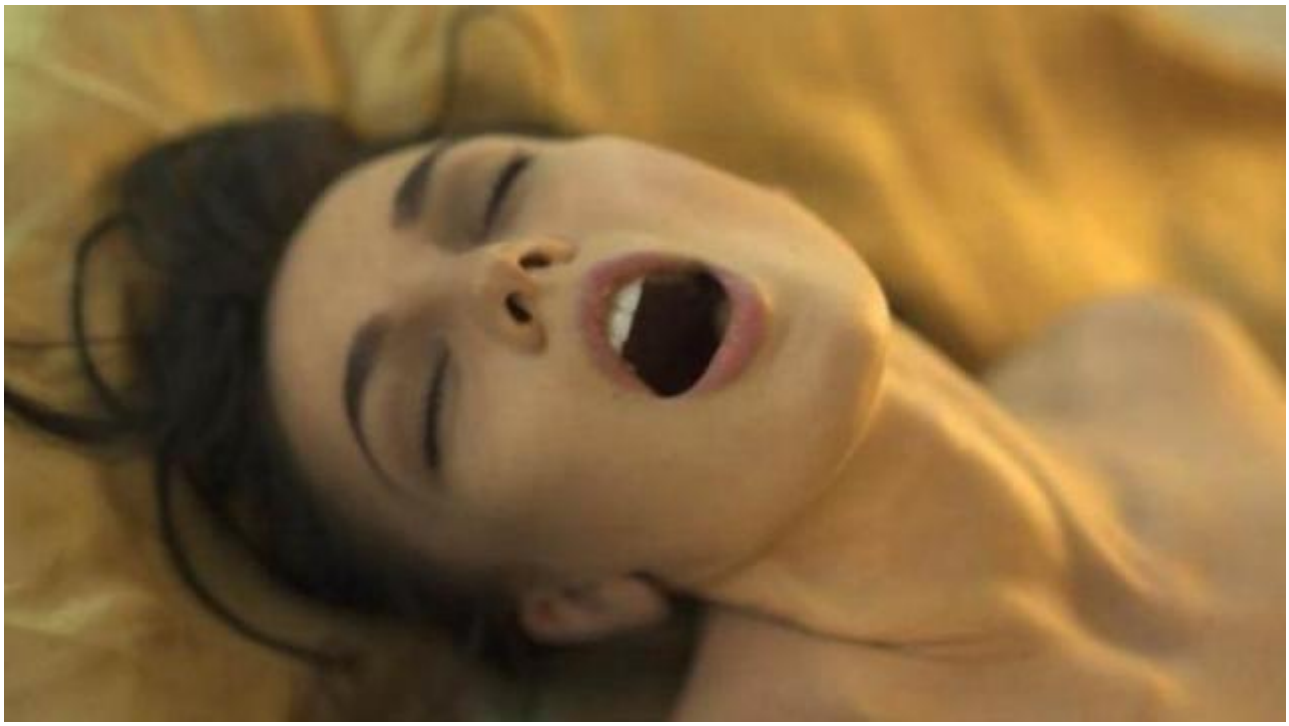
One of her most common complaints was about how I wasn't helping with the house chores as much as she would have liked. I've been through this before with her. No matter how much cleaning I do, it's never enough, or I didn't do it her way. God knows the house is never entirely microscopically clean, and I've made my peace with the Lord about that. I knew her anger wasn't at all about having a clean house. She was pressing my resolve by asserting herself through the expression of her own anxieties and frustrations. It's the feral nature of women.

I did approach her for sex a couple times over this span, but her reaction was so caustic and bitter, that I decided to accept her rejection for the time being. I don't care to have sex with someone who doesn't want to have sex with me.

After two weeks, she was getting weaker with desire and her need for affection, but she still wouldn't swallow her pride.

Then one day, we had a big argument and she went to bed angry. I needed some time to calm down before I could fall asleep, so I went to bed a couple hours later. After I settled into bed, she rolled over and presented her bare butt to me without a word spoken. I ignored her until she started rubbing her butt against my hip. Finally, I couldn't restrain myself any longer, and I gave her what we both wanted.



Afterwards, while I was lying on top of her, I saw that she still had an angry face, and she wouldn't look me in the eye. After I saw that she still refused to relent, I gave her a hard, judgmental glare that set her off again. She exclaimed,

> "I gave you my body, and you are still not grateful! Why should I have sex with you?"

I replied in a nonchalant verbiage,

> "You may have given me your body, but you aren't giving me your heart! Sex is meaningless without some enthusiasm. I want to see your passion!"

[Eds. note: This is my demand for a better sex life. Now she has to respond.]

Through these words, I was basically calling her a whore, and I believe that's how she took it. She went absolutely ballistic! She started shouting and cursing me. She threw small objects at me. She punched me in the chest a few times. She said she wished she never married me, among many other profane statements.

After a few minutes of this, I told her in a calm but firm voice,

> "You need to stop acting like an 8 year old brat!"

Then I walked out the door, and I left the house for a few hours.

During the day, I had some pleasant conversations with friends and neighbors, and this lifted my spirits a lot. I made sure she saw me, to make the point that there's more to my life than doing housework with an angry woman.

The next day, she continued to be very angry and cold. She gave me hard looks at every opportunity, and didn't say anything at all… and this lasted all day. Nevertheless, I ignored her bad attitude completely, and talked pleasantly to her, even though she never responded to my overtures.

[So far, her response doesn't look appealing. But just wait… It's coming!]

The next morning (Wednesday, October 24th, 2018), I woke up to find her hugging my thighs, while kissing and stroking my bird. I pushed her aside with the excuse that I needed to pee (which was true). But instead of returning to bed as I imagined she expected, I made coffee and oatmeal. I intended to let her desire for me grow for a little longer.

Later, she got up and joined me for breakfast, and she seemed a little confused about my behavior. I kept the talk light, and said nothing about the past conflict. After that, she was in a very good mood.

Later in the day, after we had a few laughs together, I gave her a serious, but warmly honest lecture. It went something like this.

> "About our argument a couple days ago… I didn't get married to clean the house. I didn't get married to have a perfunctory cook. No, I got married to 𝓕@ck your pu$$y *everyday! You love getting F@cked, and you need it as much as I do. You know it's like that, and you accepted the deal. Now, you're going to get ╒@cked, no matter whether the house is clean or dirty."

When she gave me no response, I assumed that she was open to my message. So I continued in a calm but firm tone, with a detached, philosophical feel, almost like a schoolteacher's lecture. I believe the power structure conveyed through this attitude would encourage her to assume agency, and take responsibility for her performance.

[Eds. note: Here, I am reinstating my demand through a verbal illustration of a glorified sexual experience with me. By doing this, I am attempting to get her mind on the same wavelength as mine.]

> "You know, having more sex will make our life much happier. So why not do it? Just imagine how great it can be! You can suck ©ck every day… [with a longing voice] You can 𝓕@ck this ©ck. [with a mock angry face] You can swim in the jismo… [with a passionate voice] Everyday, if you want to, and I know you do. You're going to love it! You're going to come every day, and you will be sooo grateful! [with a sigh and an expression of deep satisfaction]"

After I saw that I had touched her heart (she had doe eyes, and her mouth was gaping open), I firmed up my delivery.

> "So… F©ck with a mind blowing frenzy in wild abandon, or else you're not really living. Start living, or start dying. This is your life. You can ╒©ck the h€£L out of this F-ing ©ck, or you can get the h€£L out. There's a lot of other women who would love to have the life you have!"

[Eds. note: I am reinforcing my demand here.]

Basically, my message was simple. Two week stretches of abstinence is unacceptable. Duty sex is unacceptable. Nothing short of 𝓕@cking like it will save your soul is going to be tolerated. Live it up with hubby!

The language might seem crass, and doubtless it would be if uttered outside a committed relationship. But within marriage, the message comes across to her as one of ardent soul purpose, and a caddishly authoritative affirmation that she is urgently desired. This knowledge is critically important to a woman, especially after marriage, and even more so as she ages.

In spite of the language, I believe that the underlying message of expressing a whole-hearted desire extends a great deal of honor to the wife, just as the Bible instructs of husbands. The vast majority of women want to be desired, and they get turned on when they feel desired by a man. I am not waiting around until she tells me so, but I believe that she really felt more honored and valued on a visceral level. This visceral affect is crucial, because you cannot negotiate genuine desire.

Instead of resorting to cognitive reasoning, the more emotional inflection and dramatic expression you can summon, the more you'll draw her in. Remember, women need the Feeelz to Tingulate, so it helps to become an actor with flair.

Results

In the two months since this incident occurred, she's been much more animated and happy. She cooks and cleans house on her own initiative, and I am content to help her as a shared enterprise to build bonding.

She has chided me much less frequently about leaving coffee stains on the countertop, or crumbs on the table after eating. When she does, she is a lot more casual, pleasant, and respectful about it. This has progressed to the point that I'm now able to leave spots and crumbs as a practical joke, and have it be received as such. One of her favorites was when I spelled "I ♥ U!" on the kitchen floor tile with coffee grounds and little pieces of dry garbage. She was fuming angry for a moment before she noticed the letters, and then she burst into tears.

In the days and weeks since late October, she gradually loosened up in the bedroom. She became quicker on the trigger, and drastically more animated and anticipatory. She also, for the first time since I could remember, started laughing during sex. Another new habit she has shown is biting. I'm still getting used to this one.

Best of all, she's been giving me smiling tittie shows and cuddly invitations to the shower or bedroom – every day!

Sometimes I'm so tired, I wish I hadn't pushed it!

Conclusions

The present study is an extension of Pushing the Line, applied to the special case of encouraging a better response of the wife to the husband's approaches towards sexual intimacy.

By setting a higher standard of bedroom performance, and not accepting anything less, a wife who is sexually anxious and resistant can be taught to develop a new, positive attitude towards sexual relations.

Moreover, improving the sexual interaction just might save your whole marriage.

In my own experience, I was impressed by the efficacy of Pushing the Line towards moistening the bedroom pound cake. Within six weeks, using the above techniques had a significant impact on my own marriage.

Here are some things to keep in mind during the process of making demands.

1. Be adamant about demanding a more whole-hearted and eager performance from her. Be specific about what you want, and what you expect.
2. Express your desire for her, but be authoritative about it. Command her response with confidence. Don't whine, pedestalize, or be a beggar.
3. When interacting with her, play up your enthusiasm by exaggerating the intonation of your voice and facial expressions. It might feel stupid (at first), but it will register with her need for drama, leading to a big awesome sploosh!
4. It takes kindness and patience at certain times, and a firm, ZFG insistence at others. The man needs the discernment to know which attitude is appropriate at which times.
5. The man needs to exercise a lot of self-discipline, self-control, and Frame control to transform the sexual charisma of his marriage. This is perhaps the biggest challenge for a man struggling with a dead bedroom.
6. Self-awareness, introspection, and regular prayer will offer immense help for those readers who might seek to apply these methods to solve their own frustrations.

Again, I am NOT a professional in this arena, so this information should not be taken as the married man's sexual gospel. (But it probably will be for many men.) I acknowledge that every marriage is different, and what has worked for me may not work for every man. Some other men may need to continue with this approach for a longer time, until she notices that he's grown some balls worthy of going down on.

I suspect that there may be some other factors which have contributed to my success, which I am yet unaware of, or have not recognized as significant. So, I eagerly anticipate feedback, positive or negative, from anyone who takes the effort to study these materials and applies it somehow to his marriage. Insightful comments are also welcome from Christian wives.

 As a Christian, I don't really believe that astronomy has any influence on my love life. But this was an odd coincidence worthy of a comical quip.*
 "In order to have sex" is not a good reason to marry, but since I am already married, giving this reason can be effected towards spinning her hamster in a more positive direction. This works because women 'hear' the sentiment of being desired.*

Related

- Biblical Gender Roles: Sometimes "Sexual Interventions" are needed in a Christian marriage (October 31, 2015)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Sexless marriage and other relationship statistics (February 24, 2017)
- Doing Marriage Right: The Give and Take of Marriage (November 3, 2018)
- The Family Alpha: Married Red Pill Reinvention – Podcast with Adam Lane Smith (November 5, 2018)

The Evolution of the Red Pill

Jack · 31 December 2018 · Archived copy · Original

An overview of the many sweeping changes that 2018 has brought to the online men's space.

Readership: All

Summary: As of 2018, the Manosphere met its demise, and its remnants are now undergoing a metamorphosis to form the Androsphere. This turnover brings a new dawning age of Red Pill awareness.

The Demise of the Manosphere

2018 brought many sweeping changes to the Red Pill sphere. In fact, the Manosphere experienced such a shake down, that things haven't been the same since. All of this reached its zenith in October, and then exploded in a supernova of bannings and defundings in November.

This follows a long period of attrition between 2015 and 2018, in which the vast majority of the classic Manosphere bloggers bowed out of service. Now, only a handful of the most prolific and noteworthy bloggers remain.

Here's a shortlist of the transformations and turnovers that I've noticed.

- The author of Wimminz died from lung cancer sometime in late March.
- Alex Jones was banned from Apple, Facebuck, Spotify, and YouTube at the beginning of August.
- Jason closed down Air Strip One sometime in September without any word of warning or farewell.
- Matthew (the author of Zippy Catholic), passed away on September 18.
- Roosh boxed up Return of Kings on October 1.
- RP Reddit sites, including as TRP and MRP were quarantined in early November, 2018.
- In early November, Big John MGTOW gave a failed interview to CNN, which seemed to cast a spell over the internet's Man Space.
- Free speech on Gab has been fighting for its life against Fatebook, PayPal, and Tweeter.
- After suspending American Dad for a few months, Scott deleted his site in late December. We wish him and his family the best.
- Also in late December, M. J. Davis at Doing Marriage Right made his blog private. This is really unfortunate, because a lot of married men could benefit from his experience and insights. We will miss him. [Update: Due to popular demand, Davis has returned!]

Starting in mid-November, MGTOW channels and other purveyors of Red Pill knowledge began being censored en masse, including the following.

- Sandman had his entire YouTube channel demonetized.
- In mid-November, The New Modern Man was defunded by WordPress and decommissioned by GoFundMe. He hasn't posted anything since the end of November.
- On November 23, Matt Forney was banned on YouTube.

Moreover, there seems to be an increasing and foreboding uncertainty about the survivability of many RP sites. Many bloggers are considering contingency plans, in the event that they are censored or deplatformed.

Even the term "Manosphere" has become unpopular… even within the Manosphere! The new word being used for the online men's Red Pill space is the "Androsphere". This is not just a semantic change. We are now experiencing a seismological shift in the constitutive blogs of the sphere, and the world has taken note of it's impact. A lot of bloggers are feeling it, and have said so, including Red Pill Girl, and Saving Eve.

In view of these many far reaching changes, I will venture to declare that after a decade strong, 2018 has spelled the end of the Manosphere as it has been known. May the foundational precepts they introduced live forever in the hearts of men.

The Metamorphosis to the Androsphere

The demise of the Manosphere does not mean that the online male space will disappear altogether, nor will its repository of intellectual underpinnings pass away. Rather, there shall arise a new generation of passionate men who are dedicated to the glorification of masculine endeavors. These men will continue to revitalize the ancient wisdom specific to an unapologetically new patriarchal culture in the West.

Hail the Androsphere!

Masculinity is back in style as the Androsphere! He's kinda p!ssed off, and is now empowered by the Manosphere!

Here's a shortlist of new appearances within the Androsphere that I've noticed.

- In February, 2017, A King's Castle was introduced with the purpose of reaching the next generations.
- Gunner Q is fairly new on the scene, debuting around the same time as Σ Frame in October, 2017.
- Although he started up in 2016, Red Pilled Rob dedicated himself to blogging heavily towards the end of 2017.
- The Solitary Wolf, a high quality MGTOW site, started up in August, 2018.
- In early October, 2018, Lexet decided to expand further into RP topics.
- Dark Brightness had a Trojan (or something similar) that forced him to restart his blog on another server (for the fifth time). His new blog, which debuted on October 19, 2018, is called, In Times Like These.
- In the Autumn of 2018, Larry's Musings updated his site layout with a greater focus on Christian Marriage.
- Derek Ramsey picked up the pace of blogging at the beginning of December, 2018.

So a new era of Red Pill awareness is now proclaimed over this coming decade. MGTOW will continue running strong during this time, and Christian RP, and Married RP will slowly pick up steam. We're still waiting for a RP Fathers group to kick in. I anticipate that the substance of RP topics will turn to be more personal, and more context oriented.

Σ Frame has seen a surge of hits on posts related to marital discipline, courtship models, and of course, various intersexual dynamics. Of particular note, the post on What To Do When A Girl Tries To Make You Jealous (April 22, 2018), is now the top ranked post, by far. Honestly, I have been saddened by this, because it shows how severely men are suffering from the workings of the Feminist dominated culture.

This serves to further motivate me to talk from my own experience, to describe what I have struggled with, and to tell how I have overcome. I know this is what you need to hear.

> "I write to you, fathers,
> Because you have known Him who is from the beginning.
> I write to you, young men,
> Because you have overcome the wicked one.
> I write to you, little children,
> Because you have known the Father."
>
> "I have written to you, fathers,
> Because you have known Him who is from the beginning.
> I have written to you, young men,
> Because you are strong, and the word of God abides in you,
> And you have overcome the wicked one." ~ 1 John 2:13-14 (NKJV)

As the institution of marriage continues to founder, and as single parent family structures expand in number, there will be an increasing hoard of young men desperately in need of masculine role models and male-led instruction concerning Frame.

I urge men everywhere to take the time to speak to younger men, and to invite them on the masculine journey of life. MGTOW's included! Find a young man without a friend or father figure, and transform the trajectory of his life with your kindhearted, generous, masculine presence.

You may find strength of purpose, and a friend for life!

Red Pilled Rob has already started!

Related

- Dalrock: What is the Manosphere? (May 15, 2013)
- Notes from a Red Pill Girl: Post Red Pill? (November 17, 2018)
- Saving Eve: 3 Big Changes (November 17, 2018)
- The New Modern Man: Americans Shop, Eat Out, and Masturbate as Their Nation is Destroyed and Their Freedoms Stripped From Them (November 22, 2018)
- Red Pilled Rob: Your Voice (December 31, 2018)

2018 Sigma Frame Performance Report

Jack · 1 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Σ Frame's second annual traffic performance report.

Readership: All
Length: 830 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Overview

I started blogging on March 7, 2008, using Blogger as my blog platform. On September 27, 2017, I transferred the best of my blog writings from Blogger to WordPress, and continued from there. It was a good choice. I received more views on WordPress in the first two months, than I had on Blogger in the previous 8 years.

Goals and Purposes

My goals and purposes in blogging are summed up in my About page. I value easily readable, and high content quality posts that stand the test of time – writings that would be of value to readers even decades from now.

Methods

During the early part of 2018, I approached blogging by reading a few posts and internet articles every day, and if I found something of interest, I saved the link with a brief description in a word file. Over time, I would see themes emerging, and then I selected the related sources and used them to form the backbone of a new piece of writing.

Later in 2018, I changed jobs and opened up a small business. After that, my mindset changed, and I started interacting more with other bloggers to come up with topics for my posts.

Themes

As you may have noticed, I seldom write about cutting edge topics in news or society, and I only cover politics or history occasionally. Instead, I focus more on deeper issues, and the cognition and processing of such issues, hence, the word 'Frame', in the blog's title. These issues include some of the following.

- Applications of faith and evangelistic outreach.
- Archetypes and Typology.
- Biblical exegesis, eisegesis and hermeneutics.
- How to interpret facts in order to arrive at a more logical and truthful conclusion.
- How to understand and build effective processes of interaction with others.
- Renewing the spirit and improving the experience of life.
- Strategies for building and implementing Frame.
- Testimonies and other true stories.

Projects

I studied two major projects in 2018:

1. Discipline in Marriage
2. Courtship Models

Noteworthy Posts

In the post, Buckle Down for the Ride of the Centuries (2018/8/9), I predicted an economic crash later in the year. Two months later, on October 10, we saw the first sign of a bear market.

Statistics

Here are the 2018 stats for Σ Frame.

Traffic

Number of followers joining in 2018: 82
Total number of followers (on WordPress): 94

Number of views in 2018: 42,186 views
Total number of views (on WordPress): 46,632 views

Number of visitors in 2018: 15,073
Total number of visitors (on WordPress): 16,162

Average views per visitor: 2.8
Average views per day: 116

Most popular day and hour: Monday, 8:00 pm

The best day for views ever: 491 views on November 21, 2018, as a result of fellow blogger Adam Piggott's post: A follow up on the things we like in chicks. (2018/11/20)

The top five countries with the most viewers

1. United States: 26,299
2. Canada: 2,625
3. Australia: 2,275
4. United Kingdom: 2,202
5. Germany: 785

Note: All of these countries are well developed, democratic, capitalistic societies that are being smothered by post-modern, feministic social ideologies.

Total number of viewing countries: 148

The top five search engine terms leading people to Σ Frame

1. “sigma frame blog”
2. “slut tells”
3. “irresistible feminine quality”
4. “sigma frame”
5. “irresistible woman traits”

Note: It appears as though I’m known for knowing women.

Odd search terms which have led people to Σ Frame

1. asassin’s creed odyssey
2. dogs that don’t shed
3. hyperpigmentation
4. literotoca
5. normal dd

The top five incoming referrers (other than search engines and readers):

1. Boxer: 461 (from v5k2c2.com); 134 (from Gravatar)
2. Gunner Q: 468
3. Adam Piggott: 444
4. Spawny’s Space: 354
5. Russian Faith: 354

The top five blogs receiving the most traffic from Σ Frame

1. Boxer: 1,173
2. Spawny’s Space: 840
3. Gunner Q: 786
4. Saving Eve: 677
5. Notes from a Red Pill Girl: 641

Posts

Total number of posts published in 2018: 88
Total number of posts published in 2017: 38
Total number of all posts: 194

The top five most popular pages/posts (other than the Home Page)

1. What To Do When A Girl Tries To Make You Jealous (2018/4/22): 4,151
2. 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (2017/12/1): 1,857
3. Sexual Market Value (SMV) vs. Marriage Market Value (MMV) (2017/7/27): 1,238

4. List of Slut Tells (October 15, 2017): 1,201
5. Discipline in Marriage (Page): 848

The top five most popular Tags & Categories

1. Models of Success: 444
2. For the Married: 339
3. Male Power: 338
4. Strategy: 262
5. Holding Frame: 235

Likes and Comments

Number of likes in 2018: 314
Total number of likes: 343
Number of comments in 2018: 625
Total number of comments: 1,014

The top five posts with the most comments:

1. Ladies Should Respect the Man and Love the Boy (2018/6/28): 31
2. Leaving a Legacy to Future Generations (2017/12/5): 30
3. Psychological Projection and the Mirror Effect (2017/12/9): 24
4. 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (2017/12/1): 22
5. How to Understand Guys with Asperger's or Autism (2018/7/1): 19

The top five most prolific commentators (excluding myself)

1. Earl: 60
2. Ame: 55
3. SFC Ton: 44
4. Stephanie: 36
5. Lexet: 26

That's all, folks!

Related

- Σ Frame: 2017 Σ Frame Performance Report (2018/1/3)

The Question Apology Game

Jack · 6 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

This article reviews and discusses how males should be more proactive and inquisitive when dealing with females.

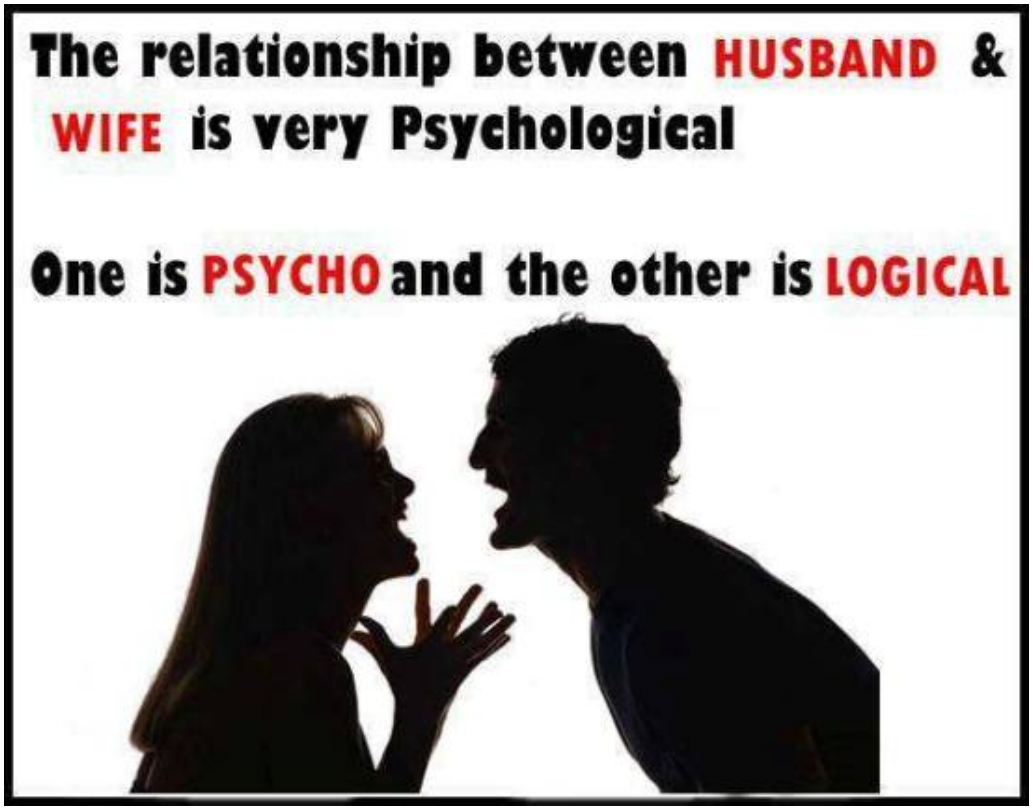
Targeted Readership: Hen-pecked (married) men

Gender Specific Propensity Towards Talking

There has been a lot of research and discussion on the question of which sex talks more. Back in the 1980's an oft cited study showed that, on the average, men speak 7,000 words a day, while women speak 20,000. Since then, the debate on the subject has resurfaced, with liberal sources claiming that the earlier statistic was not well founded, and is therefore invalid.

Regardless of these studies, it seems intuitive knowledge that the natural default setting is for men to remain silent, while women talk incessantly. This goes back to the fundamental nature of the sexes. When women get into a bind, they impulsively call other women and 'talk', while men in a crisis tend to withdraw and contemplate. It is also easy to believe that women, who are more insecure, may use superfluous verbosity as a modicum to attract attention and affirmation.

In sum, women don't need any instruction on how to talk, but only about how to talk properly. But boys and men need instruction and encouragement to speak out.



The Question Apology Game

In one of my favorite posts from Roosh, Don't Let A Girl Assert Frame Over You (January 29, 2018), he examines a particular power play within relationships. He describes the dynamic like this.

> "Within every interaction is a frame where one person does the evaluating and judging while the other does the satisfying. The person with the higher value will naturally fall into a frame of evaluation while the person with > the lower value will fall into a frame of trying to prove or appease."

He rightfully labels this as asserting Frame, but to put a finer point on this particular tactic, and to avoid confusion, I will call it the Question Apology Game (QAG).

Definition: The QAG is the use of astute questioning which steers the direction of the conversation, and establishes a hierarchy in which one person assumes the role of a Dominant Supervisor (DS), and another person assumes the role of a Submissive Paeon (SP).

In the QAG, the DS calls out a particular aspect of the SP's work, behavior, decision, performance, etc., and reviews the value of the SP's contribution. It is assumed within the nature of the interaction that the SP must give an account of what he/she is doing, and why. Motives and priorities are called into question, and reviewed under heavy scrutiny.

Through calm inquisition, a man can fashion the topics and questions in such a way as to control the dynamics of his conversations with others. This can take several forms, depending on the context.

- He can pose questions to divert the topic.
- He can inquire about the nature of unwanted behaviors, and ask for an adjustment.
- He can use questions to examine the value of her contributions, and ask for a realignment with their shared goals.
- He can offer questions as a form of interactional bidding, and ask for improvements in the way she treats him.
- He can use questions to place a speculum on her motives and character, thereby encouraging her to adopt an introspective stance and assume agency, rather than resorting to calumniation.

Doing the above will make the woman more self-conscious, and cause her to lose confidence. As a result, there is a power shift to the man. You can expect lots of resistance from her on this, but the benefits are astronomical.

Notes on playing the Question Apology Game

Roosh's article describes different contexts and aspects of the QAG, and the main points are summarized in the following bullets, with my comments after.

- Many people are eager to prove themselves when asked a question, but in doing so they almost always accept the viewpoint of a SP answering to a DS.
- Men should not give serious answers to women's inquiries, and offer jokes instead.
- When the man assumes the place of monitoring and critiquing the woman's performance, this dynamic creates attraction, because it establishes the male as the dominant figure.
- "Why…?" questions are asked by superiors. "How…?" questions are asked by subordinates seeking instruction.
- Beware of people (i.e. women and co-workers) who ask small favors of you that escalate over time.

In doing so, they are attempting to inch their way closer to a position of dominance over you.

- Apologies and excuses should be used sparingly by men, as they are only appropriate for one in the place of a subordinate.

There are moments when a man can use apologies and excuses to soften a hard hearted woman. Discernment and wisdom are necessary to know when this is the case.

A woman who apologizes easily and frequently can be surprisingly easy to get along with, and if you're in tune with her, charmingly easy to love as well. Ladies should take note of this skill and use it. Men, you may like to suggest or point out to your girl that her apology will smooth out your disagreements in a jiffy. But if she is the proud, contentious type who intentionally seeks argumentation, it may not be wise to clue her in on this.

- Justifying your actions will quickly cause you to lose Frame, and put you in the place of the subordinate. Of note, Alphas do not justify their actions.
- If a man lets a woman attain a position of dominance over him, she will slowly drain his power, and either use him for attention, or to establish firm control over his behavior.

In sum, he yields himself to do her bidding, which is an inversion of the God ordained hierarchy.

- Men who are frequently hen-pecked by their wives fail to utilize the QAG to their advantage.

After several years of marriage, harried husbands become emotionally fatigued to the point where they allow their volitional will to become exhausted, such that they regularly succumb to the Dominatrix Conversation from their wives.

Don't be like this guy. Put the focus back on her, by asking her some difficult questions!

Playing the Question Apology Game can enhance relationship contentment

In an earlier post, I studied the preferred conflict structure leading to marital satisfaction, in which the man is the person who brings up an issue and asks for a change, and the woman is required to respond somehow. Famed marriage researcher, John Gottman, proved that the vast majority of marriages are happier when the husband has the habit of initiating conflict, while the wife plays the role of the harmonizing respondent.

I tested this dynamic within the setting of my own marriage, and I had spectacular results which I covered in the post, Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (February 15, 2018).

To correlate Roosh's claims against Gottman's work, we must presume that the dominant person is the initiator of conflict, and the submissive person is the respondent. Indeed, they are nearly identical roles, and this comparison gives us a bigger picture of the structure.

In this view, the QAG dovetails perfectly within this conflict structure, as it offers a reliable vehicle for a husband to assume a dominant role. Thus, if the man does the majority of the questioning and scrutinizing, a more positive and enjoyable relationship can be expected from both partners, over time.

Conclusions

Women find it easy to express their preferences and concerns, but men need to take a bit more effort to make their views and opinions more frequently known.

Getting hands-on instruction from other men who are more adept in managing women can speed up the learning curve.

A man can employ the Question Apology Game as a tool to help him maintain Frame, and achieve his proper role as a Dominant Supervisor, rather than a Submissive Paeon.

Using the Question Apology Game on an ongoing basis can shift the power structure of an interaction, as well as the conflict structure, to enable the man's authority, leading to a more satisfying relationship for both the male and female.

Driving probing questions will make the woman more self-conscious, and cause her to lose confidence. You can expect a fight, but the benefits to your self-esteem and marriage are well worth the trouble.

Women will object to male dominance all the way, but once they get used to it, they feel quite fulfilled, even if they will never swallow their pride enough to admit their contentedness with the arrangement.

Related

- Σ Frame: Don't Admit Her Argument (March 19, 2018)

The Tone Police – to protect and serve the rabble

Jack · 12 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A vituperating description of how churches converge, and an explanation of Pastor Wilson's middle-of-the-road-stance.

Readership: Christians
Length: 2,200 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

The Dalrock Route

Of prime interest over the holidays, in an answer to a letter from Keith, Pastor Douglas Wilson finally defined what he means by "the Dalrock Route". (Scroll waaay down this page, or just search for "Dalrock".) To quote Wilson,

> "Keith, from what I have seen, I would describe the Dalrock route as over-realized patriarchy. This is not the same thing as extreme patriarchy (the toxic kind), and it is not the same thing as my own version of (amazingly balanced) patriarchy. I speak as a man, as Paul might say, and that's the problem, as RHE [sic] might say. Over-realized patriarchy has a tendency to assume that the complementarians who gave away the store (and I agree with Dalrock that many of them did give away the store), did so on purpose. In other words, what they tend to describe as conspiracy, I would describe as a mix of conspiracy from some and confused foolishness from others. This also has had an impact on how Dalrock has interacted with some of my stuff, looping me as one of the conspirators to feminize everything. Since I know that he is persistent in reading me incorrectly, eventually I quit reading him."

I informed Dalrock in a note, and he's yet to give a response to Wilson's description of him.

Gunner Q offered his take on Doug Wilson Multi-Cucks (December 22, 2018).

Wilson – a typical, Churchian pastor

From his anecdotal Civil War story, it is clear that Wilson is trying to maintain his balance on the fence between various intradenominational factions in order to passively retain an image of innocence and impartiality. Pastors are like politicians – they have to be smooth and "proper" at all times, just to prevent the proverbial ship from rocking.

An unfortunate consequence is that Pastors will rarely tell anyone the raw, ugly truth, even if it will help them, even in private counseling! In my opinion, this is the greatest shortcoming of the profession.

Wilson's best defense is claiming that his first and foremost priority is the unity and continuity of the entire congregation. But he lacks wisdom and humility in claiming that his version of "Patriarchy" is the best. An anonymous long time reader left a fair assessment of Wilson.

> "[Wilson's attitude is like,] "If you aren't acting like me you are Doing It All Wrong". In the 8 or more years I've participated in the Androsphere, I've seen that plenty of times, often from some aging Boomer who married in his 20's and has zero clue what men under 40 have to deal with. They know everything except when they don't.
>
> Anonymous Age 60-something at the late Spearhead commented that when he ran groups for divorced men back in the 1980's it was a regular event, some new man would join and immediately inform him "This is all wrong, listen…" and would suggest something that had already been tried and found to not work.
>
> Careful reading of the article [like the one] above by Wilson reveals zero Bible quotes, zero actual concrete criticisms of the "this will not work" variety. It appears to be more about tone. Dalrock and the rest of us might as well have been caught wearing white shoes after Labor Day, or a straw hat before Easter, or failing to open a door quickly enough for a delicate flower of womanhood along the lines of Andrea Dworkin. Social faux pas', poor tone, but no actual, actionable, critique.
>
> In the comments, a couple of persons who have done drive-by-run-away trolling here showed up (Katecho is a prime example.) with more of the same attempts at tone-policing. So once again, it's not about something concrete such as Proverbs 14:1 or Ephesians 5:22 or 1 Peter 3 or even Proverbs 21:19, it's about "tone". The "tone" of this site and the commenters here just aren't up to snuff, humph, harumph, HARUMPH! Plus, we made one of The Ladies sufficiently unhappy that she developed the vapors!"

Like Wilson, most pastors see their main role, not as a defender of the Kingdom, but as being the Tone Police – to protect and serve the rabble.

How the church converges their doctrinal stance along the heretical viewpoints of the world

Over the last decade, we've been seeing an acceleration of headlines like the following, which are slowly spelling out the disintegration and/or convergence of the Church.

- The Nation (feat. Drew Haxby): Episcopal Church Splits Over Gay Equality (January 12, 2009)
- The Daily Beast (feat. Gene Robinson): How Episcopalians Embraced Gay Marriage (July 5, 2015)
- The American Conservative (feat. Rod Dreher): Nobody meets their spouses at Church (December 20, 2017)
- The Christian Post: Liberal Lutheran pastor to melt purity rings into vagina sculpture to 'take down' church teachings about sex (November 29, 2018)
- Now The End Begins: Presbyterian Church in America (PCA) becomes latest Christian denomination to accept transgenders and same-sex unions (January 11, 2019)

It is easy to put our finger on pastors, but the problem is bigger than merely spineless leadership. All of society is drifting towards the abyss, and most church goers are getting swept away with the current.

In my experience, the majority of people who are regular church goers are very odd people. The Bible does describe Christians as being a peculiar people in 1st Peter 2:9 (KJV), and being peculiar ascribes them dignity as being a member of the Body of Christ. But most churchians are not peculiar, they are just too odd to fit into society.

And they're not even Christians!

A bold claim you say? I've heard at least two pastors tell me in confidence that only 5% (from one pastor) or 15% (according to the other) of their congregation "have Jesus on the throne of their life", meaning that they are truly seeking after God.

The rest of the people, comprising an average of 90% of the congregation, might have a plethora of reasons why they go to church, including comfort, routine, pity, handouts, ego stroking, virtue posturing, vainglorious posing, and social acceptance. But whatever those reasons are, they are NOT earnestly looking for God. They do NOT want the gospel. They do NOT want to have their minds transformed. They do NOT want their lives to be drastically rearranged for the glory of Christ.

No, they are merely looking for a solution to the soul warping dilemmas created by their sin, so that they can go on to the next step of getting what they want out of life. But they will NOT address the real cause of their frustrations as being sin. They are NOT looking to repent from their problematic mindset. The idea of finding a whole new life in Christ is little more than an inspiring platitude.

Given the fact that these people are the oddball outcasts of society, suffice it to say that most of them are “problem people” who come to church looking for the condolences and assurances offered by the sympathetic, kind-hearted church people. The church is the only place where they can be “accepted”. So the average church becomes, what my old college roommate used to call, “a $h!t magnet”. Pardon the language, but you get the idea.

Out of thousands of followers, Jesus only chose 12 men to be his disciples. They were deplorables by the world’s standards, but Christ saw potential in their humble sincerity.

Does the modern Church select members according to their authenticity? No, they will accept anyone who breezes through the foyer. Some churches present some hoops to jump through, but not the kind that would analyze the state of one’s connection to the Holy Spirit. Consequently, the true Kingdom seekers get lost in the crowd, and many of these Christians go looking elsewhere for fellowship. As a result, attrition sets in to many churches.

It’s waaay too easy to be a churchian. I’ve said this before: To become a popular member of any protestant church, all a person needs to do is show up every time the church doors open, and talk the churchian language using religious jargon. Anymore, the churchian language is not far removed from the mainstream narratives offered by the Left. So it’s really not hard for any average person to integrate.

Furthermore, those members who act as the gatekeepers of the church are not necessarily those of outstanding faith and service, as it should be, but instead are those with dominant, charismatic personalities.

As a result, the social atmosphere of a converged church represents a microcosm of bizarre, hidden values which are a composite of all those held by members of the congregation. On the surface, it might appear that these values are aligned with scripture. But in practice, this may be far from the case.

Enter the Pastor, Stage Left

Now that I've offered a provocatively revealing snapshot of a typical protestant church, it's a little easier to consider the pastor's place in this mess.

A scripturally hard core pastor would very clearly wield the divisive sword of the Word contained in the scriptures, and in doing so, most of the riff raff would be "offended" and stop coming to church.

But most pastors are unwilling to do this for a variety of reasons. Instead, they choose to allow their church to converge with the un-Christian majority of attendees – the oddballs of society who show up at the door – and in doing so, become less of a Christ centered Church.

What about that slim minority of the faithful? Those 5 to 15% who come to church looking for a place to worship, instruction from the Bible, spiritual growth, and fellowship with other like-minded Christians. It's hard for them to find these things, when 90% of the congregation only comes looking to strike a pose and stroke their ego's.

Worse, Pastors seldom address the needs of these true Christians in the church because they are more concerned with the social management of the masses. Tending to the spiritual growth of individual members is far down their list of priorities. Some pastors even consider personal ministry to be a burden above and beyond the call of duty, which they will only undertake if and when it is absolutely necessary. Consequently, those genuine believers who are truly seeking to revitalize their lives are relegated to the back burner.

Conclusions

Dalrock serves us well by picking out the big names, like Chandler and Wilson, to address doctrinal inconsistencies. But the real problem is that churches are like banana republics, in that they have the leaders they want and deserve. Those churches could, at any time, discharge one pastor and hire another of their choosing. So pastors are more likely to fit the mold proscribed by their congregation, than for their congregation to jump on board with a bold, new pastor's ambitious plans for church growth.

Update: The resignation of Pastor Justin Hoke at Trinity Bible Presbyterian Church in California is a typical example of this dynamic. H/T Vox Day: The Call of the World (January 13, 2019).

This is why contemporary churchianity is a religious circus, complete with a freak show and live entertainment! And the grand majority of churches are not that different from churchville.

It's no wonder young Millennials have all but abandoned church altogether.

It is well known that Churches, such as those in China right now, grow under persecution. This is partly because people who are not truly drawn by the Holy Spirit will not come to church because of the persecution they would receive. As a result, the riff raff chaff is blown away, and the church is no longer weighed down by the bulk fluff and posture posing of false Christians who infiltrate the church for self-centered reasons. Christ becomes the center of the action, while the importance of trust and fellowship is emphasized, thereby producing exponential growth.

Why should we wait until tribulation strikes, before we embrace real fellowship and growth by thinning out the rabble?

The head pastor at my church has dealt with this problem by having two services – one for the rabble, and one for the Church. The service for the former is open to the general public, and meets late in the morning. The sermons utilize well known popular and psychological concepts that can be understood by the Bible illiterate, to highlight the deeper questions surrounding various life conundrums. The purpose of these sermons is to uncover the listener's need for God. Those people who can face their personal issues are urged to contact an elder for personal counseling. The one-on-one interaction with the elder through counseling is intended to foster the newcomers faith, and it also serves as a "membership filter". Those who pass through the "filter", are then invited to attend the other service which meets at a more discrete location early in the morning.

For the authentic Christian lay person, it's not as difficult as you might imagine. Just open your mouth and speak God's Truth, man!

Related

- Jim's Blog: Death of Christianity (December 6, 2014)
- Return of Kings (feat. Aaron Clarey): How the Manosphere is filling a void left by Feminized modern Churches (July 26, 2015)
- Religious Affections (feat. Scott Aniol): What's wrong with the recent evangelical "social justice" movements? (August 23, 2018)

How to play off the “I’m a lesbian” line

Jack · 16 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A commentary on The Other McCain’s article about dealing with pseudo-lesbians in Day Game.

Readership: Single, self-aware men

Single guys looking to develop their Frame need to check out this article from The Other McCain: Lesbian Is a Synonym for ‘No’ (Or: Guys, Please Leave @LayneMorgan Alone) (January 13, 2019).

McCain highlights a Twitter feed story about a guy approaching a girl wearing pajamas and Birkenstocks at CVS. She gets the creebies and rebuts with the line, “I’m a lesbian”. McCain goes into a classic Manospherian styled monologue about all the ins and outs of the interaction (or the reasons for the lack thereof), which is quite insightful.

Later in his post, he cited the value of having a sense of humor and a Sigma Frame as vital equipment necessary to roll with the Feminine punches of life. Of note, McCain writes that CVS boy’s biggest mistake is that…

> “He never once made a joke.
>
> Mister Idiot’s failure to display any sense of humor during their exchange is what makes me think this guy might be somewhere on the autism spectrum, because one of the basic traits of autism is a lack of self-awareness, and any emotionally intelligent guy would have acknowledged the absurdity of his situation. I mean, a guy works up the courage to try the cold pickup and his random target turns out to be a lesbian? What a perfect opportunity to employ self-deprecating humor!
>
> Guys, pay attention: Learn to laugh at the tragic aspect of your plight.
>
> Why? Because chicks dig it, that’s why. Every decent, intelligent and rational woman understands how tough it is for the average guy to muster the courage to make a move, knowing full well he’s going to strike out 99% of the time, because the average guy is merely average, and women are not attracted to average guys. Mister Idiot — the guy who made his move on Layne Morgan — must not be particularly attractive, or otherwise he > wouldn't be hitting on strangers at CVS, right?"

Right! So if you don't rely heavily on humor in Day Game, you're asking for a SMV demotion, in terms of confidence.

I've read dozens of articles about running Day Game on Return of Kings and other Manosphere sites, and the importance of humor is excessively understated, if not neglected altogether. Humor taking the form of confident, ZFG self-deprecation is especially powerful in getting chicks to laugh and open up.

But the point of developing and using humor is not to entertain others, or make people laugh, although that is certainly one benefit. No, it's about enjoying yourself, taking things as they come, and displaying a positive attitude when the world is trying to kick you down.

Whenever the proverbial sh!t hits the fan, you have a choice.

1. You can lament your loss while feeling sad and sorry.
2. You can take it with a grain of salt, laugh it off, and make up your mind to do better.

The second choice will build character, and provide an indomitable Frame.

Now, if it were me trying to pick her up, and she tried to play me off by saying she was a lesbian, I would have responded in mock seriousness,

> "No kidding! I used to be a lesbian too, before I went trans! Now, I have a LOT more women available to me… <pause and insert sleazy smile and a wave of the hand> …and only the bad ones KNOW <flash of the eyes>, if you KNOW what I mean…"

Note: This approach adopts Agree and Amplify, along with mirroring techniques, which build rapport.

Her response to such a statement would be very telling.

1. If she were a real lesbian, she would either become very intrigued or very suspicious, and probably ask me to tell her more of “my story”. Then I would have a really good time making up some crazy anecdotes, and it’s hard to tell where that would lead to. If she was buying my story, then at some point, I might ask her if she cared to “go to the next level”, and try on a “woman” who has a “transplanted tool that can please”.

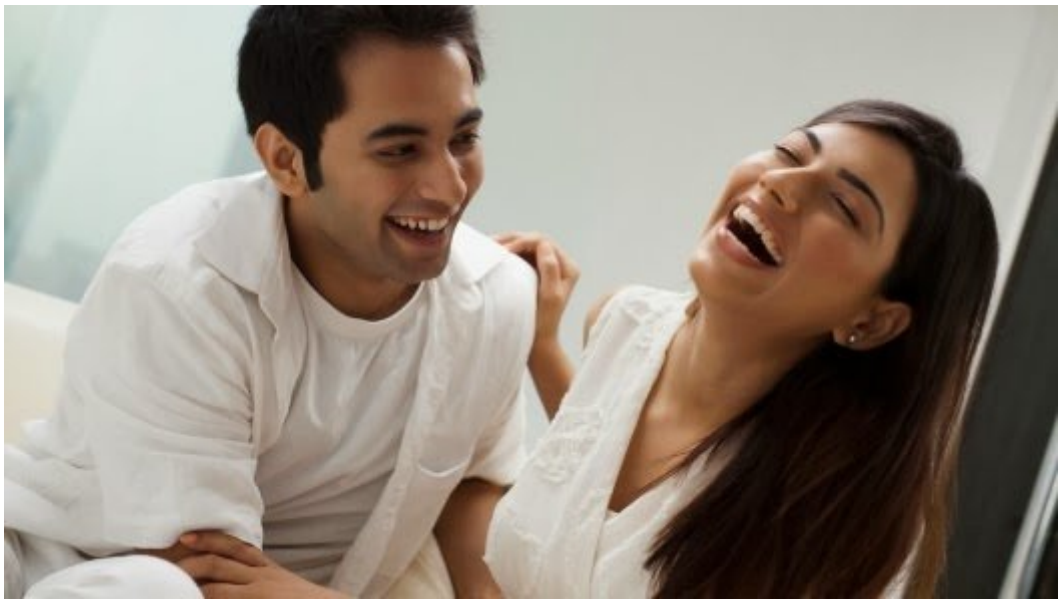
2. If she were only using the lesbian line as a pseudo-polite, but firm, “no”, then she would be shocked sh!tless, visibly mortified, and run away. She would be much less likely to use the “Sorry, I’m a lesbian…” line again in the future.
3. If she were sufficiently self-aware, and actually recognized that I was contriving a huge practical joke, this would show her that I’m a fun-loving guy, and disarm her defenses. She would walk away thinking I was the coolest guy on the planet (or the most twisted perv, which is still good). There’s a chance that she might even get the mini-tingles from this, and then talk to me a little longer. There’s a long shot she might even give me her number or see me again. (The guy suggested “having a beer”, but that seems out of place in this context.)
4. Even if she only slapped my face, and labeled me with derogatory insult, I would still have the laugh of the century, and a good story to repeat for a decade.

Any way it plays out, I’ve called her out, asserted my Frame, and made a memorable impression on the girl.



Concerning the longitudinal strategy of the interaction, McCain writes,

> “One of the keys to success, playing from a Sigma Frame perspective, is to think in terms of the process of elimination. There are 3.5 billion women on this planet, and all you have to do is find one. By trial and error, you can learn to distinguish between the few who might possibly say “yes” and the vast majority who are a definite “no.” Once you accept the implications of the One-in-Seven Rule and recognize that you aren’t part of the lucky 15% who can win no matter how they play the game, you’ll increase your likelihood of winning simply because you understand how much the odds are stacked against you. And it’s important for young men to recognize this reality at a young age, or otherwise they might become the kind of loser who’s 25 years old with no girlfriend, and no idea of how to get one other than approaching strangers at the CVS.”

McCain is exactly right. The first key to success is knowing who you are, what your deal-breaker requirements are, and where you stand in the hierarchy. The second step is in finding a woman who matches your personality and your requirements. As long as a young man continues to chase after an ideal (woman in this case), and fails to consider his identity and purpose, he’s setting himself up for a bitter failure.

Get your own life together first, and once you’ve made some progress on that, certain women (not all) will notice and start being attracted to you. Make your selection from this pool of women, and be careful to choose one that shows genuine respect towards you. Don't be fooled by fake respect, which she might only show if she wants to play you off as a Beta chump, to exchange ego fluffing attention (which is equivalent to the Friend Zone), or transactionally extract resources from you.

Some sure signs of true relationship potential are as follows.

- She either chokes up or mindlessly rambles on whenever she's talking to you.
- Her eyes light up, and her jaw drops open whenever you give her individual attention.
- She's excessively animated and expressive, she fidgets and can't sit still.
- She can't take her eyes off of you.
- She smiles, and/or touches her face and/or hair whenever she's talking to you.
- She laughs at everything you say.
- She returns your calls and texts immediately.

A young man would be wise to show special consideration to those women who display these behaviors, even if they happen to be women who don't give him an instant hard on. Best of all, it will be easy to make her laugh. Use these opportunities to hone your skills and build your confidence.

Don't go after women whom you are attracted to, but who are NOT attracted to you. At best, that's a recipe for rejection and failure, and at worst, you're facing a risk of a harassment charge.

Related

- Return of Kings (feat. Quintus Curtius): 11 Fundamental Guidelines For Solid Game (February 17, 2014)

A dull shave gets tossed

Jack · 24 January 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Gillette is choosing suicide by a thousand cuts.

Readership: Regular Readers

I want to thank Gillette for their recent commercial, a showcase of their misandrist Feminist propaganda. Grateful really, because it is now all that much clearer for regular citizens to identify Gillette as a Globalist racketeering corporation to be avoided, just in case any decent person had missed that.

Gillette is owned by Proctor and Gamble, and has many subsidiaries, including Braun and Oral B. So it might be difficult to avoid every single product from P&G, but cutting down consumption would be in order.

But for sure, don't ever send your resume there, unless you're an upper level manager who plans to reorganize the structure. It's time for America to realize that an employee of a company does the bidding of his overseers, for better, or for worse. So choose your employer wisely, and know your life purpose before accepting any job offer.

As Spawny's pointed out in Collective Guilt (January 16, 2019), the chief complaint of the me-too movement primarily concerns the abuse of power. Granted, the abuse of power is a legitimate complaint at its core, but as several Androspherians have examined in the past, the actual power play is not what the mass media leads one to imagine. Men, and masculinity in general, have been lambasted and rejected as "toxic". As a result, men now have a minimum token power in Western society. Most men are lost and living without purpose. As such, the me-too complaint has been sorely abused by disappointed social climbers who tried to sleep their way to the top, and has been hijacked by the feminist propaganda machine to push their globalist agenda of destroying Western Society. Remember Kavanaugh… That is the true abuse of power here.

In addition to the purported power play between the sexes which has been instigated by the powers-that-be, there is a grander power play based on the demographic profiling.

A minority group needs to achieve an 8-10% critical mass before they begin to influence the larger culture. Blacks and Hispanics have already surpassed the 10% threshold, and have left their mark on American culture. For the most part, American's appreciate their contributions to the Arts, especially blacks in the music industry. However, the QTBGL community, at around 4.5% (2018 estimate from Gallup), has not yet reached the critical mass necessary to affect American society. However, their purposes have been pressed fast forward by controlled media and education, which makes it appear that they have gained a dominant place in society. But the last time I checked, American culture is still predominantly white, straight, and nominally Christian (~65%), and as long as this continues, we're not going to see a major power shift without a fight.

Feminism, on the other hand, has stolen a much larger slice of the pie. According to a survey from YouGov: Compared to 2016, more women now say that they're feminists, but they're still outnumbered (August 9, 2018), the number of people who identify as feminist is slowly rising to lie between 38-46%, but the number of people who strongly oppose feminism has quickly grown to similar numbers. Across the pond, Britons are more empathetic towards feministic ideals (at 61-72%), but fearfully shy away from the label (7%).

The social engineering minions at Jillette must have come to the conclusion that now is a crucial time to press for a final victory over public opinion, by using propaganda in an attempt to convince the majority that the values of a minority are a plurality. But the deluded trendsetters at Gillette failed to consider the de facto cultural anthropology… and the moral fortitude of their opposition.

"Toxic masculinity" is a bluff that is now being called. American society is fed up with the propaganda, and the kickback is culminating. There's a limit to how much BS that people can swallow with a grain of salt. Gillette just passed that limit, and it's triggered a gag reflex.

An off topic, but interesting trivia: Decades ago, many razor blades were made of a platinum (Pt) chrome steel alloy. In those days, platinum was a junk metal, because there was no demand for it. But since then, platinum found many applications in various industries (especially the automotive catalytic converter, which was/is required by law), and the price of platinum has skyrocketed, even surpassing the price of gold, and has since been removed from the metallurgical composition of razors.

So if you ever find some old safety razors (or catalytic converters) lying around, you might want to hang on to them. They may have a $uffi¢ient platinum content to make their re¢y¢ling worthwhile.

Related

I was first alerted to the Gillette commercial hysteria from Patriactionary's post: If they hate men, why are they selling to them? (January 14, 2019). I immediately recognized this as being worth an analysis, but by the time I've gotten around to write about it, there has already been an amazing backlash from the Androsphere, as well as from society at large. The number of online articles about Gillette's commercial is approaching landslide proportions!

- The Male Factor: Protest Against Smelly Stubble (P.A.S.S.): Yet Another Misandrist Campaign By Gillette (December 8, 2013)
- Ed Hurst: Corrosion eating the guts (January 14, 2019)
- Snapper: Bankrupt Gillette (January 14, 2019)
- Twitchy: Dollar Shave Club is capitalizing on Gillette's woke stupidity (January 14, 2019)
- PJ Media (feat. Jim Treacher): Gillette Tells Men They're Repulsive Creeps. Now Give Them Your Money, You Piece of Garbage (January 14, 2019)
- Adam Piggott: Gillette and the great replacement (January 15, 2019)
- Gunner Q: Proctor & Gamble's Judas: Robert McDonald (January 15, 2019)
- Lexet: Gillette announces war on men (January 15, 2019)
- RT News: Hack job: Gillette tries to teach men 'social justice', meets massive online backlash (January 15, 2019)

- Vox Day: Advertisement as diversity lecture (January 15, 2019)
- Amerika: Periscope (January 16, 2019)
- Biblical Gender Roles: Men should boycott Gillette razors (January 16, 2019)
- Campus Reform (feat. Eduardo Neret): Marketing prof razor burns Gillette over 'toxic masculinity' ad (January 16, 2019)
- Collective Evolution (feat. Joe Martino): Gillette's New Ad On "Toxic Masculinity" Is Great – And Necessary, But… (January 16, 2019)
- Dalrock: What it would look like if the Kendrick brothers made razor blade commercials (January 16, 2019)
- The Male Factor: 7 Ways Gillette's 'The Best Men Can Be' Instills Harmful Stereotypes (January 16, 2019)
- Derek Ramsey: When should men take a punch? (January 17, 2019)
- Simple Justice: Short Take: Frail or what? (January 17, 2019)
- These Christian Times: I DON'T KNOW: Students hate toxic masculinity… but can't define what it is in video liberals don't want you to watch (January 21, 2019)
- Gunner Q: Gillette now targeting children for reeducation (January 25, 2019)

On the discernment and wisdom of true morality

Jack · 2 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Morality is always subject to the faithful discernment of context, and altruism can become a Pharisaical objective.

Readership: All

Modern confusion about morality

The concern for morality is the cognitive mind's natural response to the problem of sin and evil.

Throne and Altar: Moderns starting to realize how inhumanly difficult their morality is (December 17, 2018)

> "Modern morality is often thought of as a deliverance from the harshness of past moral codes. But that's only because we don't take it seriously. If we do, then it is absolutely inhuman in its demands, a spirit-crushing, insatiable monstrosity, whether modern morals are taken in their Kantian-personalist or, especially, in their utilitarian form. Can you imagine being required to maximize the total happiness of mankind, never treat anyone as a mere means, or value everyone on Earth's happiness equally with your own every moment of every day? Every human good would be strangled, and no one could ever be happy again. One begins to appreciate that the legalism and casuistry of pre-modern morality functioned not to burden mankind but to deliver us from the hell of unbounded altruism.
>
> This has not gone unnoticed by the moderns. See this review of Susan Wolf's "Moral saints", namely an argument against trying to become one. Wolf appeals to all the "non-moral" goods that can only be preserved if we limit our commitment to modern morality. Interestingly, the reviewer, Daniel Callcut, points out that one way to escape from the dilemma would be to return to pre-modern virtue ethics, in which an altruism restricted to neighbors is held in balance with other goods as parts of a comprehensive good life, and he notes that Wolf rejects this option. Wolf is left to construct a solution which limits universalist altruism while granting it the monopoly on morality it has had in modern thought. She must claim that we should be somewhat altruistic but that we should not aspire to "moral sainthood", i.e. allow the admitted demands of morality to entirely structure our lives and crowd out other goods. Indeed, I agree that one should not allow utilitarian ethics to ruin one's life, but I see no way to coherently assert this while admitting utilitarian ethics. One is applying to a "should" which is more authoritative than the "should" of morality, but such a thing cannot exist. The ruling "should" is one's true morality, and it's better to make it explicit."

Bonald has made some excellent points here. But there remains a more fundamental error of omission concerning any argument about the practice of morality, and it is that the philosophical transformation to generalized postulates leaves out any in situ sources of information that might be obtained through the discernment of the context.

Discernment is the operative word here. Without discernment, one is unable to respond to a circumstance in an appropriate and purposefully effective way.

- Discernment is the soul's radar of good and evil – a hedge of safety in dangerous circumstances.
- Discernment is what delivers morality from becoming a hell of unbounded altruism.
- Discernment is what liberates the soul's experience from the spirit crushing monstrosity of canonical law, AKA moral legalism.

To give the reader a taste of what it feels like to experience spiritual discernment, watch this classic scene from The Lord of the Rings, in which the hobbit, Frodo Baggins (feat. Elijah Wood), discerns the approaching presence of the evil Black Rider.

In case you missed it, the moment of Frodo's discernment occurs at the 2:00 mark. Note that discernment is experienced as a perceived distortion of time and space, and this perception kicks in just moments before the Black Rider becomes optically visible.

It should be duly noted here that without discernment, it would have been impossible for Frodo to know whether to bid a good day to the passing equestrian dressed in the coolest goth cosplay, or to warn his friends to run for their lives.

Without discernment, one is relegated to be either a foolish laughingstock of a believer, or else, condemned to a mediocre existence of fellowship among the wicked. At worst, capture, destruction, defeat, and extermination are palpable.

Discernment is the foundation of true morality

> "But solid food is for the mature—for those whose senses have been trained to distinguish between good and evil." ~ Hebrews 5:14 (HCSV)

The New Covenant of faith in Christ transforms the very nature of the Old Mosaic Law Covenant, in that the 10 Commandments and other such "requirements" under the Law are no longer seen as checkpoints that necessitate one's intentional volition to agree and conform, which can never be done by an act of the will alone. Instead, the Law is regarded as a promise from God that we will naturally live in harmony with God, not only lawfully, but also joyfully.

Hence, the new Morality in Christ requires the faithful exercise of discernment, and not in how well one can conform to the rules.

Mentioning the rule of law, English-speaking culture, which poses a sense of morality on an itinerant conformance to the legality of a thing, is especially susceptible towards seeking to attain righteousness through the law. This cultural weakness is becoming more obvious as western laws inch closer towards condoning what God's laws forbid.

The appropriateness of the moral decision lies in the detection of either spiritual confederacy or enmity, and the assertion of the most effective course of action, AKA wisdom.

In other words, developing and exercising discernment is the quality that makes one a moral agent. It is not any particular system of philosophical beliefs, or one's conformance to a set of rules concerning social interaction behavior.

Mountaintop Horizon, Tai Ping, Taiwan

How can a man develop his sense of discernment?

Discernment can only be gained through a fear of God and a continual awareness of one's human nature.

Discernment is a quality that is only possessed by those who have been made righteous in Christ.

Maintaining a posture of humility is also a necessary ingredient for discernment. You must be mindful of your vulnerabilities, weaknesses, and needs.

For some odd reason related to human frailty, beauty can enhance one's sense of discernment.

If you're feeling a pang of panic, and asking yourself why you don't have a sense of discernment, all is not yet lost. Those who lack discernment can pray, and ask God to increase their wisdom. If God grants you wisdom, your sense of discernment must necessarily increase, because wisdom is strongly dependent on spiritual discernment.

> "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him." ~ James 1:5 (KJV) upbraid: to forcefully or angrily tell someone they should not have done a particular thing and criticize them for having done it.

But why doesn't James 1:5 urge us to pray for discernment first, before asking for wisdom? This is apparently a crucial missing link in modern western theology. Personally, I believe the "fear of the Lord" is related to discernment. (I suspect that something may have gotten lost in the translation.)

> "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom,
> And the knowledge of the Holy One is understanding." ~ Proverbs 9:10 (NKJV)

Connecting this concept to "upbraid" in James 1:5, why might a person think God would chastise him for having discernment, which seems to be what James is addressing.

I have one guess about the answer. Personally speaking, whenever my discernment is enhanced, the temptation I experience grows more intense. This happens because an increase in my discernment amplifies my awareness of those moments and circumstances when I could “get away with it”.

Discernment also indicates to me which women are “willing and eager”. It’s like I suddenly notice a longing hollowness in the eyes of certain women whose hearts are held captive by my aura. They gaze on me with an edgy breathiness, and this is accompanied by a certain urgent tenderness in the touch of their hand. I digress…

Ahem… yes, discernment causes the level of temptation that I face on a daily basis to skyrocket.

Back to the question. Should I be upbraided for becoming any more aware of the fact that certain situations can be misappropriated for selfish purposes, or for being aware of when certain women want to bed me? No, that is merely temptation. Upbraiding is only required at the point when I abandon wisdom to pursue my sinful passions.

During my younger years, I had the notion that when my discernment/temptation intensified, then I was moving away from God, mainly because my senses and visceral experiences became prescient in my conscious awareness. During graduate school, I discovered that I was wrong in assuming that the temptation associated with discernment was synonymous with backsliding, and that the opposite was closer to the truth. I was actually moving closer to God, but the consciousness of my own sinful desires, and the fear of being tempted past my threshold, not to mention the dullness of discernment that resulted from actually succumbing to various temptation, all remained as a wall that kept me from accepting this truth, and advancing farther down this path of holiness.

It seems like frustration just can’t be avoided in this life. The lost are frustrated because they lack the ability to obtain their selfish desires. Those who are in the process of regeneration are frustrated by the volatile infidelities of their own sinful nature.

The benefits of developing discernment

Having a sense of discernment is a mark of righteousness. Indeed, discernment is one of the fruits of the Spirit within Orthodox and Catholic catechism. Those who have it, possess it in varying degrees, in various areas. Those who have an extremely exceptional sense of discernment in a particular longitudinal area are often considered to be virtuosos, or even Prophets within that particular discipline.

- When discernment is present, wisdom and authenticity can develop, which allow the true expression of morality.
- Having a healthy ego is associated with positive morality, and this is contingent on, and supported by discernment. If a man has very poor discernment, or a weak ego, it causes other people to be generally unaccepting of him.

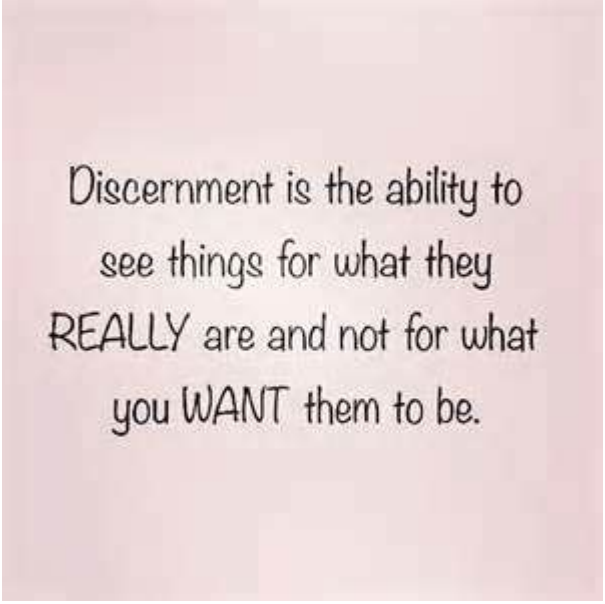
- As a man's discernment grows, he becomes more in touch with his emotions, like anger, fear, sadness, etc. Awareness of his emotions can help him know himself better, what he truly wants, what he likes and dislikes.
- The information gained through discernment improves awareness which can help a man navigate through any particular social context with greater authenticity and finesse.
- A better sense of discernment helps one to be better able to empathize with the emotions of others, and interact with people in a more efficacious manner.
- The process of vetting a friend, girlfriend, wife, or business associate goes a lot smoother and easier.



What causes a lack of discernment?

A lack of discernment is a real killer, not only of one's spiritual life, but also of the social, and sexual. It detracts from feelings of empathy and bonding. It prevents one from knowing important information about others, which leads to miscalculations and poor decisions, and therefore prevents one from extolling in situ wisdom. In short, it erodes the very foundations of Frame with caustic venom.

The following things may hinder the development of discernment, or can dull any discernment already achieved.

- In general, acts of spiritual disobedience, especially sexual sins, will kill one's sense of discernment just like idolatry kills the imagination.
- Extended, intense frustration, including a preoccupation of wrestling against one's desires, i.e. sexual urges.
- False generational guilt leading to unmerited self-condemnation.
- An inordinate temptation.
- Various fears, such as a fear of social scrutiny or rejection for expressing one's self in an authentic way (lacking confidence); fear of gaining specific forms of knowledge from discernment, especially knowledge that exacerbates a fear of danger, temptation, sin, or requires extra efforts in taking responsibility for a difficult situation; fear of making a bad decision, or of using one's personal charisma (power) for wrong purposes.
- Having a healthy discernment is strongly dependent on having a healthy ego. If the ego is prideful, warped or poorly developed, then discernment will lack prescience.
- Having an avoidant attachment style can undermine one's posture of humility, which is necessary for building discernment. The emotional independence associated with this style can significantly change the subjective context in which discernment might be experienced and utilized. Namely, it reduces one's ability to empathize with other people's moods in the present moment. (This may appear to others as selfishness.)

- Asperger's, or other similar learning disorders, can severely hamper theory of mind and the development of discernment.
- I don't have any evidence for this claim, but I suppose that people with clinical personality disorders would be excluded from developing discernment.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Ten Commandments of Christian Fellowship (June 25, 2010)
- Do What's Right (feat. Ed Hurst): Fundamentals of Morality (January 4, 2013)

Time Frames for various forms of sexual bonding and maturation

Jack · 5 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A timeline for sexual bonding and sexual maturation.

Readership: +18

Most people want to have sex, or more sex, but in their zeal (or frustration), they seldom recognize how their sexual experiences (or lack thereof) change the constitution of their personality. This post is intended to provide a brief summary of how the sexual experience typically affects individuals and relationships.

For younger people who have no experience, this should give you an idea of how fragile our sexual nature is, and how quickly certain things can progress.

For men who are settling into a new relationship with a woman, the following bulletin should give you a better idea of how experienced she is.

1. Instant (upon awareness) – Visual attraction, vibes, tingles, chemistry.
2. A few seconds, up to a few hours – A decision is made whether to pursue a sexual relationship or not. Non-deliberative (feral, instinctive) decisions are made sooner.
3. A few seconds, up to 1 minute – Penetration, loss of virginity/purity.
4. 5-10 minutes of sexual intercourse (or orgasm) – Sanctification/defilement/alpha enwidowment. A deep sexual bonding forms.
5. 2-3 months of regular banging – The dopamine/endorphine/oxytocin "high" associated with "falling in love" begins to abate.
6. 8 months to one year – The initial feelings of love and attraction subside.
7. 1-2 years of regular sexual intercourse (certain individuals may be shorter or longer) – Sexual maturity, familiarity with the processes leading to sex, and the sexual interaction develop. Individuals are learning to trust one's body and control one's sexual desire (sexual confidence). The development of trust in one's sexual nature allows responsibility and personal agency to fully take root. Younger women are especially vulnerable to sexual exploitation before this phase. This is also when individuals "bloom", and become sexually attractive to the opposite sex.
8. 2-5 years – Head Trust develops with the attrition of Heart Trust. Cognitive knowledge of the sex act, and related activities, leads to sexual saturation. Individuals learn to objectify sex and sexy people. Feelings of predictability, annoyance, or even annui, commonly set in here. Most affairs and divorces happen in this stage. Women who have significantly negative experiences may grow to despise men and male desire during this phase. If not, they learn to be content with themselves and the man they have chosen.
9. 5-10 years – Deeper personal understanding, friendship and affection gradually grows, producing more contentment and satisfaction in the relationship. For poorly adjusted individuals who may choose to stay in an unhappy union, sexual deployment and displacement may dominate their lives.

Males and females both experience similar time frames of bonding, but the emotional experience is usually more intense for the female.

From this itinerary, it can be seen that sexual bonding happens quickly, but usually sublimates and fades within a year. Since it is rather difficult to establish a monogamous, LTR, a deliberate effort and planning is required to form a stable long term union, such as marriage.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Deeper Meaning of Marriage (October 18, 2011)

Where is your life headed?

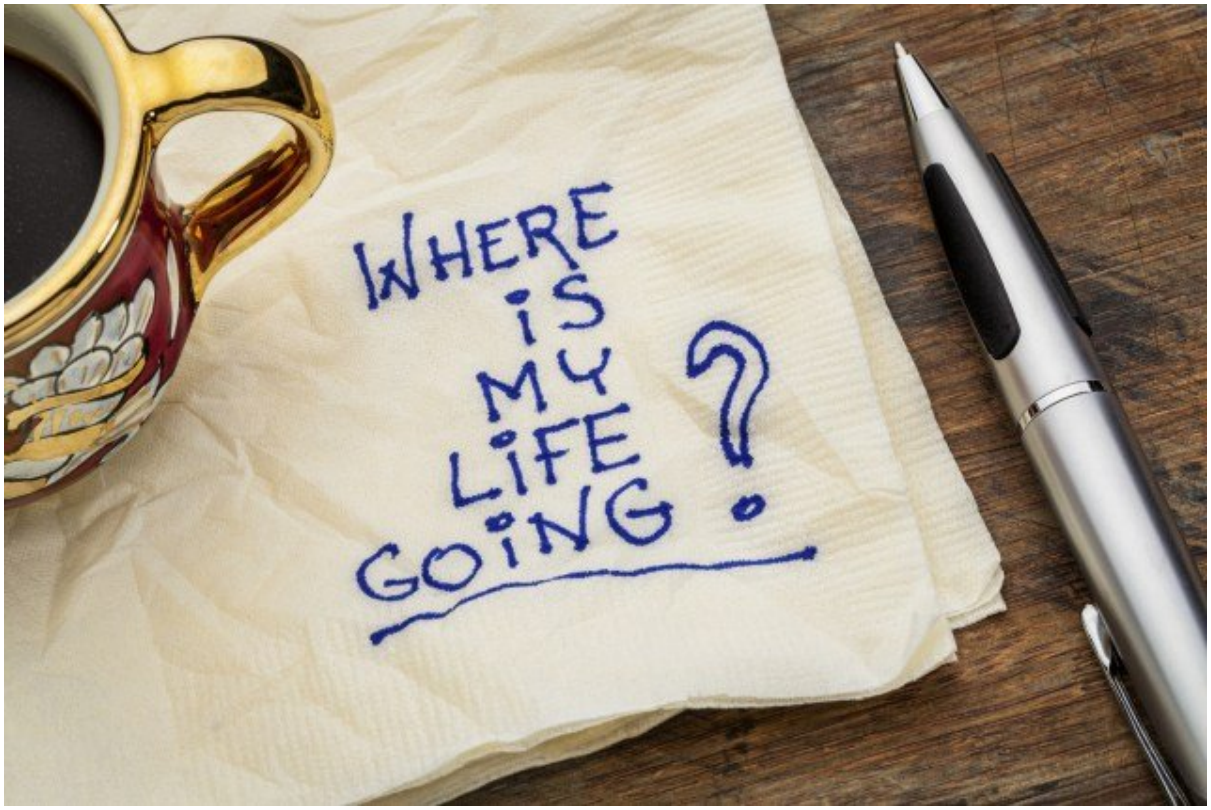
Jack · 8 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Think about where you stand in the order of things. Is it where you want to be?

Readership: Men

Larry, from Larry's Musings, left a heavyweight comment under an older post, Profile of an excellent leader (December 22, 2014).

> "The post above raises the issue of people deciding (choosing) which groups and/or individuals to associate with and follow. This is important. What we see today in many Western societies is many individuals not consciously and rationally thinking about their choices, but acting rather emotionally and thus following "leaders" because of their appeals to our emotions.
>
> It does not help that our educational system is currently one of indoctrination, and does not work to develop the pupils' critical thinking skills. Add to this the propagandized nature of our history text books and our media, and we see that so many people really are lost and in ignorance. We need true leaders to help liberate the people of their ignorance.
>
> The post above seems to have an emphasis on a leader's role in the business and corporate world, but leaders in other walks of life also play critical roles in our societies."



Here follows an abridged section of the post he is addressing.

> "People don't have hope, but they need to have hope. Leaders bring hope that lies within a purpose – something that people can sincerely believe, and work patiently for it to come true.
>
> We should ask ourselves, "Is this purpose really true, right, good? Is this what I want to become?"
>
> The purpose is to find meaning in the somewhat imminent future (few months to a few years). This purpose requires some time, effort, and maybe even some $$$ to reach it.

> We need a small group of people working together as a team to reach our purposes in life. Part of your choice is in the people you associate with. With the right combination, one can achieve great things.
>
> We all need to feel like we are an important part of something larger than ourselves. (This is why some people join street gangs.) We have a responsibility to ourselves to choose what we want to become and make it happen. To this end, a leader offers a viable and wise course of action.
>
> It is necessary for one to agree and follow the leader of a group, in order to be a part of a group. So we should ask ourselves, "Can I trust this group of people? Can I trust this leader? Can I sincerely believe what they believe?" If trust is not important, then why not join a street gang, just to find hope and purpose in life?
>
> Do I have value? What is my value? Who am I? How do I maximize my self-worth? A leader offers answers to these questions.

I also hinted at this idea in a recent post covering the witches brew ad from Gillette,

> "…don't ever send your resume [to a converged corporation], unless you're an upper level manager who plans to reorganize the structure. It's time for America to realize that an employee of a company does the bidding of his overseers, for better, or for worse. So choose your employer wisely, and know your life purpose before accepting any job offer."

Listen up fellas, because I know what I'm talking about here. I used to be employed in a Top Secret government job in the defense sector. There was extravagant waste of hard earned tax dollars. There was cronyism in the arrangements made on research contracts that had absolutely zero scientific foundation. If you made a mistake, people died. In fact, people died even if you did your job well, as mass carnage is merely a presumed byproduct of any military aggression. And make no mistake, any armed offense is aimed at asserting power and control over others. It's the old, "You will obey my will… or you will die!" routine.

But no one really cared about all of this. You see, the matrix asserts various "patriotic" buzz-moxies, like "defending our country", "preserving freedom and democracy", and "liberty and justice for all", which are merely cathetic motivations held by those who enjoy the comforts of lies, and who have never looked down the barrel of a gun (one way or the other). So there were few people who saw it like I did. Instead, my coworkers spent most of their time drinking coffee and boasting about their children's career accomplishments, or the vacation cottage in which they planned to retire after they had put in their 20. This insular corruption went straight up to the top brass, and even they felt helpless to change it. So I knew there was nothing I could do to change this place for the better.

After enduring this working culture for only a few months' time, I had an existential crisis. I couldn't focus. My mind kept wandering away to thoughts like…

> "Is this really what I want to do with my life? Stuck in this carpeted cage as a genteel wage slave… Fabricating weapons of warfare… Supporting engagement campaigns that I really don't agree with? Always waiting for the news of another kill?
>
> And these people! Do I really want to spend the next 20-40 years commingling with these people? I could foresee that I would become just like them after 20 years. Do I want to be like them? A gubmint wanka?
>
> I took this job because I wanted to do something great for my country, but actually, there's no honor there, nothing to be proud of… It's not the 007 secret agent James Bond assignment that I had imagined…"

My conscience wouldn't let me sleep at night, so I resigned. Many of my coworkers feigned tears of despondency over the news, but their micro-expressions [YouTube tutorial] told me they were glad to see me go.

After that, I spent a couple years in an urban wilderness, wondering, "where is my life going?" But then, on a whim, I decided to get out of billville and start seeing the world.

I never regretted it. I've traveled around Asia since then, learned a little Kung Fu, met some terrific people (and women too). I found much greener pastures. Best of all, I got out from under the Feminista Thumbrella™ of the Globalist sociopathology.

In conclusion, if you're in a place where you never feel confident about your work, or get a sense of fulfillment and satisfaction, you know you'll never reach your potential, and maybe this post has been shouting at you, then it's time for you to make your move.

A leader – be one, or choose one!

Related

- Σ Frame: Shifting Gears in a Career (July 8, 2018)
- Do What's Right: Life Mission (January 22, 2019)

Yankee Stay Home!

Jack · 12 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

What is the real purpose of building the wall?

Readership: All

Anti-American intervention protests in Venezuela.

American Thinker (feat. Elad Hakim): For Trump, Pelosi-Schumer clown show is the gift that keeps on giving (January 10, 2019)

> "Tuesday night, President Trump delivered a powerful speech from the Oval Office regarding the need for strong border security. During the speech, Trump laid out specific facts explaining why the country needs to secure the border and how his plan would accomplish this. According to Fox News, at one point during the speech, Trump directly addressed his colleagues, stating, "Wealthy politicians … don't build walls because they hate the people on the outside, but because they love the people on the inside." The speech was effective and convincing."

Let's reinterpret that quote from Trump as it applies to the common American citizen.

> "The wall is not meant to keep illegals out… it's intended to keep Murican's in!"

Right now, the squawk is over "undocumented" immigration eroding nationalism and the source of violent criminals, like MS-13.

For their part, the Democrats are theatricising a controlled opposition to the wall, to rally public support for the government-wide plan mandated by the Deep State.

So the current puppet show makes it appear as though building the wall is a Republican project. Not so! This is a recent development since Trump took office.

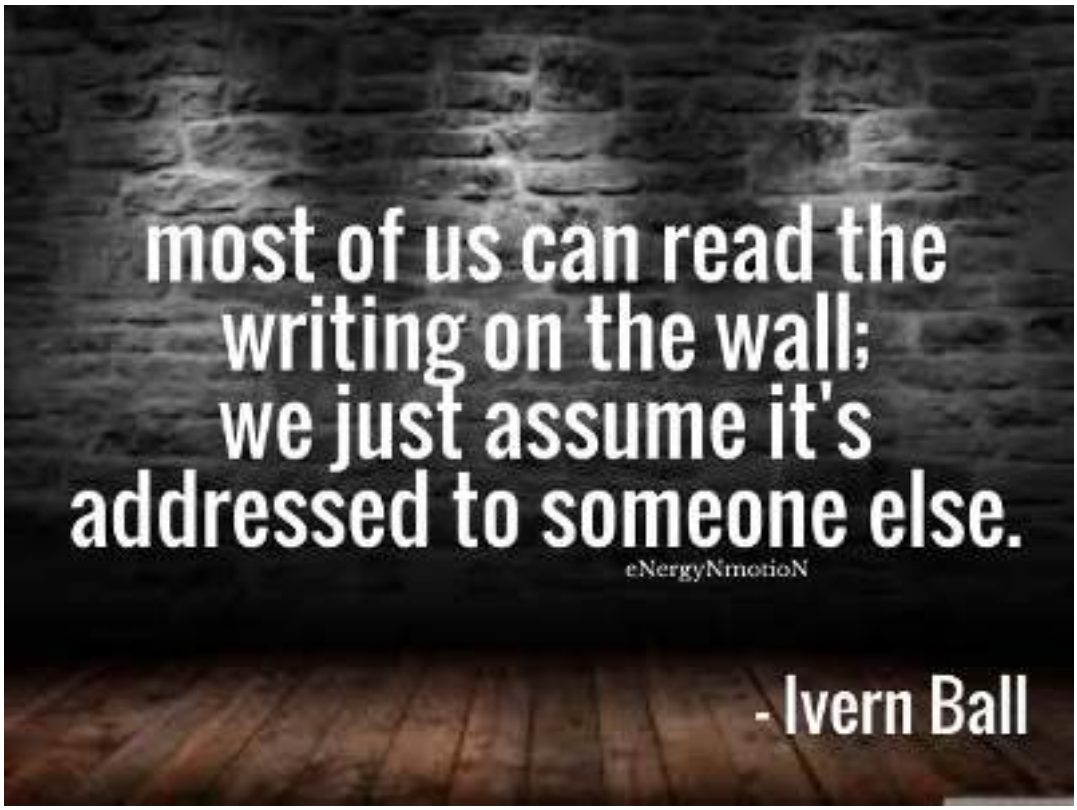
The time will come when there begins a reverse osmosis of human flow at the wall.

What, pray tell, would be a reason why anyone would want to leave the U.S.?

More Americans agree that this is an excellent time to go live abroad.

Delete Farcebook while you still can. The time is coming when your smartphone will be used to monitor your every word and move.

The writing is on the wall, although what it says, exactly, is different for each person.



Related

- Σ Frame: Buckle down for the ride of the centuries (August 9, 2018)
- Σ Frame: Why is citizenship unquestionable? (November 10, 2018)

Mount Moriah – The Place Where You Meet God

Jack · 15 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Mount Moriah, in Jerusalem, is the most historically valuable piece of Real Estate on planet Earth.

Originally written on Saturday, April 7, 2007

Could all these events have possibly occurred at the same location?

1. God promises to make Abram the father of faith.
   - Genesis 12:1-9
2. Melchizedek blesses Abram at Salem (an old name for the city of Jerusalem).
   - Genesis 14:18-20 (NIV) – "Then Melchizedek king of Salem brought out bread and wine. He was priest of God Most High, [19] and he blessed Abram, saying, "Blessed be Abram by God Most High, Creator of heaven and earth. [20] And blessed be God Most High, who delivered your enemies into your hand." Then Abram gave him a tenth of everything."
3. Abraham offers Isaac on Mount Moriah.
   - Genesis 22:1-19 (NIV) – "Some time later, God tested Abraham. He said to him, "Abraham!" "Here I am," he replied. [2] Then God said, "Take your son, your only son, Isaac, whom you love, and go to the region of Moriah. Sacrifice him there as a burnt offering on one of the mountains I will tell you about."…"
4. Jacob's dream occurred on Mount Moriah, according to Rabbinic scholars.
   - Genesis 28:10-22
5. Ruth comes to Boaz at the threshing floor.
   - Ruth 3
6. The Lord God appeared to David.
   - 2 Samuel 24:18 – "And Gad came that day to David and said to him, "Go up, erect an altar to the LORD on the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite."
   - 1 Chronicles 21:18 – "Therefore, the angel of the LORD commanded Gad to say to David that David should go and erect an altar to the LORD on the threshing floor of Ornan (Araunah) the Jebusite."
7. 840 B.C. – Solomon built the First Temple on Mount Moriah, Jerusalem.
   - 2 Chronicles 3:1 – "Now Solomon began to build the house of the LORD at Jerusalem on Mount Moriah, where the LORD had appeared to his father David, at the place that David had prepared on the threshing floor of Ornan (Araunah) the Jebusite."
8. 586 B.C. – Solomon's Temple on Mount Moriah, Jerusalem was destroyed by the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar.
   - 2 Kings 25:8-17
   - 2 Chronicles 36:17-19
9. 520-515 B.C. – The Temple was rebuilt on Mount Moriah, Jerusalem under Zerubbabel.
   - Haggai 1
10. From 37-11 B.C., Herod the Great added to Zerubbabel's Temple located on Mount Moriah to such an extent that this Temple became known as "Herod's Temple." This was the Temple of Jesus' day.
11. From 26-29 A.D., Jesus Christ appeared in the temple as the Son of God, and as God's Word to men, declaring himself to be the new temple, and preaching and teaching salvation for all.
    - John 2:19-21 – "Jesus answered and said to them, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up." Then the Jews said, "It has taken forty-six years to build this temple, and will You raise it up in three days?" But He was speaking of the temple of His body."

12. In 70 A.D., the temple was destroyed by the Romans, under Titus.
13. In 135 AD, Hadrian, the Roman, completely removed all the ruins and traces of the second Temple.
14. In 625 AD, according to the Muslim faith, Mohammed left the earth from Mount Moriah.
15. In 635, the Muslims conquered Byzantium, and took control of Jerusalem.
16. In 685, a Moslem mosque, called, "The Dome of the Rock" was built on Mount Moriah.

Future Events at Mount Moriah

17. Scripture describes events of the Temple that have not yet come to pass. Therefore, the temple must be rebuilt at some point in the future. Many Christians and Jews believe that The Dome of the Rock will be destroyed, and the Jewish Temple will be rebuilt after the Ark of the Covenant is found.

18. When the "abomination of desolation" is brought into the holy of holies, the end of the world will come.

- Daniel 11-12
- Daniel 12:11 – "And from the time that the daily sacrifice is taken away, and the abomination of desolation is set up, there shall be one thousand two hundred and ninety days.
- Matthew 24
- Mark 13
- 2 Thessalonians 2:1-4 – "[1] Now, brethren, concerning the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and our gathering together to Him, we ask you, [2] not to be soon shaken in mind or troubled, either by spirit or by word or by letter, as if from us, as though the day of Christ had come. [3] Let no one deceive you by any means; for that Day will not come unless the falling away comes first, and the man of sin is revealed, the son of perdition, [4] who opposes and exalts himself above all that is called God or that is worshiped, so that he sits as God in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

Present Application

1. Since Jesus Christ came and paid the ultimate sacrifice for all time, there is no longer any need for a temple. No longer do we need a place to offer sacrifices.

- Mark 12:33 – "And to love Him with all the heart, with all the understanding, with all the soul, and with all the strength, and to love one's neighbor as oneself, is more than all the whole burnt offerings and sacrifice"
- Hebrews 7:26-27 – "[26] For such a High Priest was fitting for us, who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and has become higher than the heavens; [27] who does not need daily, as those high priests, to offer up sacrifices, first for His own sins and then for the people's, for this He did once for all when He offered up Himself."
- Romans 12:1 – "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable to God, which is your reasonable service."

2. The Lord no longer uses Mount Moriah as a holy place of interaction with the human race. After Jesus finished his work on earth, the door was opened for God to relate to each man personally.

- 1 Corinthians 3:16-17 (NIV) – "Don't you know that you yourselves are God's temple and that God's Spirit lives in you? [17] If anyone destroys God's temple, God will destroy him; for God's temple is sacred, and you are that temple."

- 1 Corinthians 6:19 – "Or do you not know that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit who is in you, whom you have from God, and you are not your own?"

3. God appears to us personally in a certain holy place in our hearts. It is important to nurture our relationship with God in this place.

- 1 Corinthians 7:17-23 – "[17] But as God has distributed to each one, as the Lord has called each one, so let him walk. And so I ordain in all the churches. [18] Was anyone called while circumcised? Let him not become uncircumcised. Was anyone called while uncircumcised? Let him not be circumcised. [19] Circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing, but keeping the commandments of God is what matters. [20] Let each one remain in the same calling in which he was called. [21] Were you called while a slave? Do not be concerned about it; but if you can be made free, rather use it. [22] For he who is called in the Lord while a slave is the Lord's freedman. Likewise he who is called while free is Christ's slave. [23] You were bought at a price; do not become slaves of men. [24] Brethren, let each one remain with God in that state in which he was called."

4. If you are seeking God, look for Him in places where you have found him before. If you seem to have lost God, go back to the place where you last remembered Him and experienced His presence.
    - Luke 22:39 – "Coming out, He went to the Mount of Olives, as He was accustomed, and His disciples also followed Him."
5. Once the Lord finishes his work in a place, he will never again be found in the same place, in the same way. To seek him in the same place is to insinuate that God did not finish the work He came to do.

Sources

Search terms: temple; mount moriah; sacrifice; threshing floor Araunah; Bethel; Salem; Jerusalem;

Related

They're telling us what Courtship is not, and not what Courtship is.

Jack · 19 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The perpetuation of the Christian faith through marriage and procreation is facing an existential crisis. What are we doing about it?

Readership: Christians who support the institution of marriage.

Since I was 14, I knew it was God's will for me to marry and have a family. I expected that I would get married soon after finishing college, around the age of 24 or 25. Since I was serious about preparing myself for marriage, I immersed myself in reading all the most noteworthy Christian "experts" on marriage and family of the day. James Dobson was reportedly the most outstanding expert on Christian marriage back then, and Elisabeth Elliot was the angel of yearning singles. Joshua Harris reneged on dating altogether, only to have the bitter reality of the modern MMP come back to bite him. Naturally, I was a part of the early 1990's abstinence movement, which sent my social life to h@ll in a millisecond, not that I cared.

You can laugh all you want now, but this was the best Biblical interpretation available to marriage-minded Christians back then.

Now we know that many of these authors actually contributed to the convergence of the Protestant Church with Feminism. Only now do I realize that their rhetoric was a large source of my frustration as a marriage-minded Christian youth.

It should come as no surprise to my RP'ed readers, that I never found a suitable Christian woman to marry in my 20's. It was only later in my early 30's when, in a fit of disappointment and frustration, I gave up on those hopes of having a Christian marriage, and started engaging in extramarital sex. Only then did I stumble onto the dark secrets of the converged MMP, and soon thereafter discovered the mystery of how to seduce a woman into marriage – just bang her really hard, and let her know that she's not the only one. (BTW, I would not recommend anyone to repeat this approach.)

Unfortunately, my sad story is rather common among those of my generation who were seeking marriage over thrills – and that wasn't very many of us.

One of the most urgent needs in Christianity today, is to have an institutionally supported path towards marriage available for those who are called. This is especially dire for young women, who are tempted to explore the ways of Feminism before settling down.

Within the last decade, the Christian Manosphere has introduced the most crucial Red Pill knowledge about intersexual relations, attraction, and the nature of the flesh. Around 2015, the Manosphere split into various factions, with only a small remnant clinging to the institution of marriage as a viable option. As of 2018, young Christian truth-seekers are choking on the bitterness of the Red Pill, and are not finding their way into a blissful marriage. (I know many of my readers will chuckle at the phrase "blissful marriage".) This has got to change, and soon!

Right now, we do find many criticisms of the faults of modern Churchianity, but these insights have only pinpointed the fallacies, while failing to redirect towards the narrow way.

For instance, consider this post from Dalrock: If Christianity isn't Feminism and Courtly Love, what is it? (September 17, 2018)

The title is quite fitting of the post – it tells what it is not, and not what it is. What it is!

In this post, Dalrock answers a reader's (Tim) question by comparing the present adulteration of the church with feminism and the Courtly Love model, to a future adulteration of the church with homosexuality. It's a classic Dalrock piece that is quite satirical (which is why I love reading his blog).

Through this illustration, Dalrock points out that homosexuality, feminism, and the Courtly Love model are unchristian, but he doesn't take the trouble to illustrate a more excellent way, nor does he give any clues about what he actually believes. Thus, he has avoided Tim's question.

I'm not throwing stones. I can understand why. Dalrock knows it's unwise to be a zealot these days.

However, judging by some of the comments, this type of response comes off as a little annoying (and slightly arrogant) to many readers. The reason I take the time to cover it here is because some readers might think he's missing the chance to set Tim right by giving him a clear choice in the matter.

Specifically, opponents could argue that Dalrock failed to answer Tim's question by mentioning that the Christian alternatives to homosexuality (following his analogy) are either going straight with a view towards marriage, or else, celibacy. Certainly, this is one of the most unpopular beliefs within Christianity (along with forgiveness and suffering), but it has to be said anyway.

If I'm interpreting Dalrock's analogy correctly, he appears to believe there is no other alternative to the Courtly Love model, but actually, there is. In fact, Dalrock has often dropped hints about a better way for straight Christian horndogs to approach courtship and marriage, but he never tackles it head on.

The problem with stating an obvious truth is that most individuals cannot appreciate it as truth unless it is hard won. But why hide (or fail to mention) the unappetizing aspects of Christian beliefs?

Sure, a man might examine Christianity and then decide, "I don't like this religion because I can't screw around as I please, and it will make me look too Beta. Christ is not for me."

Or else, he might say to himself, "God says I shouldn't do that, and I'm sure He has some good reasons for that. Not sure if I can do it, but I'm going to go with God anyway, and try to honor Him. I've heard He is graceful to those who love him and seek to follow Him."

The real decision is not, "To F, or not to F", and not even, "husband vs. wife – who's the boss?", but rather, to choose God's Way or not. If the basic question is centered around the first issue, image and lifestyle, or the second, about headship roles, then we never approach the third – loving and obeying God, and living a life that honors and glorifies Him.

The problem is that it is not enough to tell people the conclusion of the matter, because society is too far gone. I don't believe that the average person has enough faith to take God at his Word.

In response to this need, the author of Sigma Frame, along with a loose cooperation of a few other RP bloggers, are attempting to lay out all the options in order that people may see for themselves that God's way is best. It may not seem like that in some of the presentation, but I am sure that the conclusion will come to that. I also expect to find further details about the implementation of the various courtship models.

In other words, let's lay it all on the table, so that we can give people a clear, well informed choice. Set them free from the bondage of confusion.

Even for those people who do not come to the conclusion that God's way is best, then at least they will know why Christians believe so, and being better informed, they will be better able to take responsibility for their own choices.

I've collected noteworthy articles on the subject of Courtship, and listed them together in a new page, entitled, Courtship Models. We see the development of a dialectic here to sway future generations. If this is a topic that interests you, then bookmark this page, and check back periodically for updates.

Related

- Lexet: Upcoming Posts: Corporate Law, Faith, etc. (November 20, 2018)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Christianity, chivalry, feminism, game, complementarianism, and egalitarianism (February 13, 2019)

Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores?

Jack · 23 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Christian faith transforms the soul and spirit, but is insufficient for redeeming the flesh in a fallen world. The combinatoric result can be sexually liberating. Includes a fem-lexicon translation.

Readership: Red Pilled Christian Men

Warning: Contains descriptions of sexual encounters; profane language;

Introduction

Cane Caldo's post, A Preface to the Discussion on Whores (February 5, 2019) brought up the elephant issue of how sexual sin is regarded so casually by Christian women.

Cane's second post in his Discussion on Whores series, DoW I: Celebrating Hay in a Needle Stack (February 14, 2019) reported that 65% of regular church-going, married individuals reported having premarital sex.

So anyway, let's assume that 65% figure is legit for the sake of discussion. That leaves 35% who are supposedly not doing it. We know from the 80/20 Rule that 10-20% of those couldn't get laid if their soul depended on it, and let's face it, no self-respecting man wants to marry a woman with whom he wouldn't do the vertical dance. The remaining 15-25% is wound up on fears, or still waiting for "the One", or some other solipsistic, hamsterbated inhibition is keeping their ankles tied… Then there's a small number who keep themselves pure because their love and obedience to God keeps them waiting.

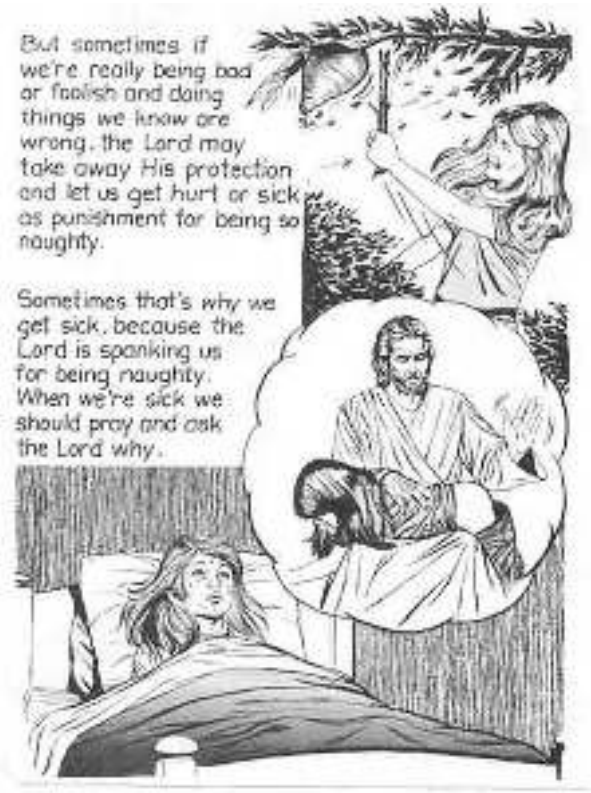
A couple pastors I have known estimate that only about 10% of their congregation are true believers. If your woman is one of those 10%, you probably shouldn't have to worry about her indiscretion. The problem is the other 90%, who claim to be Christians, but who have a rodeo hobby horse reserved for stimulating what others mistake for the glory of Christ. Truth be known, the only times I have ever seen women spiritually glorified is when they were having an affair, or were just about to. I've seen this so often, that now, whenever I see a woman glorified, I automatically jump to this conclusion.

Cane's third post, DoW II: Diversity Plus Proximity Equals Whore (February 19, 2019), basically discusses how women effectively separate the concept of marriage from the thrills of sex. Women want to be ruled over, but only in a hotel room by a cad for a few nights a month. Lawfully wedded husbands, on the other hand, are to be dominated, every day!

Cane's series, and their comments, have brought up the following questions in my mind.

1. Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores in the first place?
2. Why are Christian women who indulge in promiscuity typically lacking all sense of shame?

For the Case Studies in the following discussion, I'll use the two examples given in Cane's first post, and two examples from Boxer's archives.



Let thy beehive be only for thine husband's stick!

Case Study 1: Jesus saved her from being choked to death by her bondage masters

Cane tells the story of tracking down an interesting Twitter feed, only to find a surprise at the end.

> "[The tweet was from] some young woman not only in Texas, but in the town where I live. Small world and so forth. That young woman had in her Twitter feed an exhortation to herself that Jesus was looking out for her. So far so good, you may think.
>
> As you know, newest tweets are at the top and you have to scroll down to go back in time, as it were. Long story short, about four hours before she tweeted about Jesus, she had tweeted, "I miss being choked at night." My hope is that there is no connection intended.
>
> I can hear your wheels spin from here. "Oh, she's not a real Christian.", your mind ejects. Whew! That was a close one. Now you can go back to pretending girls like that don't know really know Christ is the son of God, born of the virgin Mary, and was crucified for our sins and raised on the third day. Right? Therefore, she's not a girl from your church who went off to college to learn a career and "find herself". Shhh… Be at ease, sleeper…"

Becoming a Christian doesn't immediately remake a woman into a shining angel. She has the same personality, the same desires, and the same feral nature as she always had. If she had a kinky sexual blueprint before knowing Christ, then she'll always have a weakness for the snap of a whip and a forceful grip. The only difference is that she'll not be worshipping phalluses because she's desperately addicted to the toxic love she gets out of it. No, instead, her familiarity with the soul warming love of Christ gives her the power to say "no" to illicit sex, if she should ever decide to show her love for God through being obedient. [Question to ponder: What would motivate her to be obedient?] But either way, her Freedom in Christ gives her the liberty to accept and thoroughly enjoy being herself, whoever (or whatever) she might be. Depending on her degree of cooperation, the process of her sanctification may very well extend through her entire lifetime.

That's the ugly truth about Christianity that you'll never hear from the pulpit!

Dora gets swiped, by LetiPrincess.

Case Study 2: Swiper, no swiping!

Cane tells of a conversation he overheard at work.

> "The next day I went into work and heard this conversation between three college-aged coworkers:
>
> Senior Cody: …and just say to her, Look, you swiped right, I swiped right. We both know what this is about. Let's get it on!
>
> Underclassmen: Hahahaha! Right! Exactly! What else could she be thinking?
>
> Cody: And, hey, listen… listen… if she's got a Bible quote on her profile then definitely go for it because you know she's a ho!"

People have suspected that Christian women are bigger whores than non-Christians for who knows how long. But since the advent of women's liberation over the past 60 years, it is no longer taboo to say so.

With my experience in Asia, the only women that post Bible verses or Christian inspirational quotes on their profiles are Catholic Filipino migrant workers. Whenever I saw those Christian moxies under the woman's photo (or in lieu of a photo), I knew I was dealing with a married adulteress with a lot of emotional issues, and maybe who had some kids back home. Every time. I am guessing they mainline moxie to deal with their shame and separation anxieties. The bottom line for them is that making money abroad is more important than maintaining fidelity and family time. [Question to ponder: How could a man sort out women who cite Bible quotes as a method of ameliorating their guilt and shame, from those who do not?]

Case Study 3: Boxer and the Christian-Easy Red-Head

A while back, Boxer recounted this story of how he quickly and easily bedded a hot, red-headed frivorcee who claimed to be a Christian. He writes,

> "The first thing she told me was that she was "a devout Christian woman." I took this to mean that she'd be easy to fuck on the first date. I fucked her within two hours of meeting her."

Sadly so, Boxer… the statement, 'I'm a devout Christian woman' is commonly understood to mean, 'I'm DTF!' Even according to my own life experiences which pale in comparison to Boxer's, I believe it's quite true. Christian women are the first to jump on alphas, and the first to shrivel up around betas, and they're not hesitant to get things jiggling.

Even here in Asia, if a western guy wants to get laid, scoping out the local single women at the nearest Christian church will yield a better lay ratio than hitting up a bar. Many women go to Church for the sole purpose of meeting and slaking foreigners. If a man wants to have a "Christian marriage", he's wiser to marry a thin, mature, submissive, respectful, Buddhist woman, and lead her to Christ in the process. That's no joke! They are more likely to be loyal for life, because they take their wedding vows seriously.

[Question to ponder: What benefits do Christian women offer to Christian men seeking a wife? More to the point, why should I ever have to ask this question?]

Her body is the Lord's temple.

Case Study 4: Boxer and the Furious Femme Fatale

Before we all jump on the bandwagon in roundly condemning Christian women who freely sample the pleasures and comforts intended only for marital life through illicit sex, let's consider a non-Christian woman who does the same. This last case study is presumably NOT a Christian, and so we'll let her serve as the experimental control for this study.

Boxer's follow up post, described how he gamed two women, including the red-head in Case Study 3. Boxer showcases the volatile emotional nature of the second woman. He intentionally flamed her, just to watch her flip. Let's examine some of her text messages, and see what she's made of.

> "It's okay that you like me, but I'm scarred and damaged. I'm thinking now that I might not be fit for dating."

> "I'm thinking I might drive a sane person crazy about now."
>
> "Cuz I know I'm not sane."

These coded statements are LOADED with non-verbal trickery laced with chick crack. Here we have Psychological Projection, a Bait-and-Switch in the making, and a Petition for a License to Ill. Let's translate these statements into plain language.

> "It's okay that you like me" = "You have passed my alpha filter… so far."
>
> "But I'm scarred and damaged." = "The Feelz are my Lord and Master, and my soul has already been marked with the evil badge of sadness."
>
> "I'm thinking now that I might not be fit for dating." = "I am going to do whatever I feel like doing, and I don't have to give you, or anyone else, any apologies or justification for not feeling committed."
>
> "I'm thinking I might drive a sane person crazy about now." = Psychological Projection that could be interpreted to mean, "Right now, I feelz like doing something crazy. Are you crazy enough to get on down with it and not judge me?"
>
> "Cuz I know I'm not sane." = "I am one h*ll of a psychopathic, Tingle-crazy, nympho-b!tch who has gone full tilt in my zenith breeding mode! I am totally DTF with anyone who passes my Alpha filter and strokes my Tingles, and I hope you are not going to waste my time and disappoint me!"

If we read between the lines, I can guess she is also saying,

> "Let's see how much Alpha you are, and how much I can control you, use you, abuse you, and get away with it."
>
> "I'm coy now, because that's my man-bait, but once I get my teeth in you, I will chew you up and sh!t you out the same @ss orifice that just ate your jizm."

Boxer writes,

> "If a man decides to treat a skank-ho wimminz decently, and is honest about his lack of interest, then this is the likely result. The following message was sent by a crazy little brunette that I banged a couple of times in the last month. Note that I dumped this particular piece of lackluster tail just to see what she'd do. She even managed to impress me. I thank her for providing my younger brothers of an(other) example of wimminz insanity."
>
> "I KNOW ALL YOU WANTED FROM ME WAS SEX YOU MOTHERFUCKER. DON'T EVER TALK TO ME AGAIN!!!!"
>
> "Now, the chances that a wimminz will make a false complaint of sexual harassment, assault, stalking, etc. against a brother are minuscule, but those chances are greater than zero, and moreover, they are much more likely to come from the wimminz who is motivated to send you angry text messages, than one who thinks she dumped a needy whiner. This is true simply because the Christian redhead is now embarrassed to have let me fuck her, while the crazy brunette feels cheated out of her chance at romance and a relationship by a cad, who had sex with her and bounced. If she decided to make a false complaint, she would feel as though she were complain-bragging, whereas the first woman would feel like she'd be admitting to stooping to sleeping with someone who will always be beneath her."

Women who say this line, "All you want from me is sex", or some similar variant, are women who possess the following qualities.

- They are extremely solipsistic.
- They have absolutely no control over their sexuality.
- They have never had the notion that it might be wise to exercise self-control.
- They have no sense of personal responsibility, and are prone to place all blame on the man.
- They see men as merely as a material resource provider, and an ego stimulant. If a man fails to deliver these, he is demoted to being a sub-human, leg humping beast with no personality.
- They have a severely maladjusted appreciation of male desire, and therefore tend to see it as an annoying bug, instead of the primary channel of their feminine powers.
- They may have suddenly discovered that the man in question is much less Alpha than originally presumed, which produces the outrage.

Her bondage is her watch and compass!

Analysis

When Boxer presented himself as a beta, he quickly got dumped by the 'Christian' red-head. But when he presented himself as an alpha-chad to the other, he became the target of the scorned woman's fury.

The idol here is the ego trip that the woman gets out of controlling men, and consuming them in various ways at her leisure. If she is successful in this endeavor, she will throw the man away after her purposes for him have been fulfilled. If she is not, she will attack that man until she can fulfill her desire, or else gain a sadistic satisfaction over destroying him in some form or fashion.

Following Boxer's analysis, there is no fundamental difference between women who claim to be Christian, and others who do not. They both behaved exactly as Boxer predicted. I have to agree that in terms of people's actual behavior, Christians are not much different from non-believers. Christians put their pants on every morning, just as non-Christians do. The real difference between Christians and non-Christians is that Christians tend to be more spiritually and psychologically healthy. This is a quality that cannot be readily observed, and it is even more difficult to detect in a relationship because,

1. Both men and women find it difficult to judge the socio-spiritual trustworthiness of members of the opposite sex. Instead, their attentions get caught up in a selection criteria based on attraction and Feelz.
2. People always wear their best face going into a relationship. This hides personality glitches and character flaws, while delaying the process of knowing the person.

In fact, it is nearly impossible to tell if a woman is a true believer or not, unless you've spent a lot of time in close proximity to her, met her family and coworkers, and have basically become a part of her life. I've heard some old hands say, you never really know a woman until you've slept with her for a few months.

The point is, women are women, Christian or not. But if a woman is a Christian, I suppose that's better for her own soul and psychological well-being, but it's no guarantee that she won't slooze around in college, or even step out on you after marriage.

Conclusions

The Bible encourages us (or warns us, depending on your view) to pursue honorable lives, and not fritter our freedom of faith away in the pursuit of vainglorious or destructive bemusings of the flesh.

> "For you, brethren, have been called to liberty; only do not use liberty as an opportunity for the flesh, but through love serve one another." ~ Galatians 5:13 (NKJV)
>
> "For this is the will of God, that by doing good you may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men — as free, yet not using liberty as a cloak for vice, but as bondservants of God. ~ 1st Peter 2:15-16 (NKJV)

These exhortations presume that Christ gives us spiritual liberty and psychological health, but what a person does with this freedom is wholly up to them. Indeed, the introductory paragraph of Cane's post is a reflection on God's purpose for believers.

> "The Bible tells us that our conduct will speak for us and for Christ as we make our way through this time of exile in the world before our Lord returns. We can either honor Christ and ourselves with our conduct, or bring > both into disrepute."

If a man opts for a Christian girlfriend or wife, she's only better in the sense that she won't be as depraved and manipulative as the Femme Fatale in Case Study 4. But whether or not she will take the effort to be obedient to the Word is entirely up to her, and whether she is one of those 10%.

In addition to the "Sunday Christian" problem of true-but-trivial faith, there are many larger problems looming. Modern culture makes it waaay too easy for all women to flirt with the devil and not have to face much (if any) consequence or censure. His tools of seduction include,

1. The widespread social acceptance of sexual liberation.
2. The six sirens of the sexual apocalypse.
3. Social media and dating websites which provide whoards of opportunities with men.
4. SMS and internet communications which are easy to hide and delete.
5. The flaccid "love and forgive" social atom-osphere of the church.

People hardly ever feel guilty about any sort of sexual transgression. There's literally no opportunity to be shamed for it.

If it is any consolation, a Christian woman is not likely to speak in coded language, and if/when she does screw around, she's more likely to be open and honest about it. Although I'm not sure if that would be a "confession" or "profession". Hence, the apparent "lack of shame" lamented in Cane's posts.

Related

- Dalrock: Slutting made her a better Christian (September 9, 2014)
- Σ Frame: Eve Ill Idolaters (September 8, 2018)
- Donal Graeme: Pulled Every Which Way (February 18, 2019)

Called to return from exile

Jack · 28 February 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Christians cannot directly change the converged, Western culture. The only solution is to be separated somehow.

Readership: Christians; Marriage advocates;

I came across a thought provoking article from AlfaNL, Wrath of the incels (April 29, 2018), in which he discusses the disturbed behaviors of Alek Minassian and Elliot Rodger, and concludes that it is an "entirely predictable consequence" of the demise of a Patriarchal establishment. In this article, he writes (emphasis mine),

> "Such continual rejection hits a man right in his balls. It's a soul-crushing rejection: you are not man enough for society. And society encourages this behavior. Society says: it is deeply empowering of girls to reject loser incels, also it is deeply disturbing that incels think they are entitled to sex.
>
> Normies, being as egotistical as anyone, have trouble wrapping their minds around this point. In their minds society is an innocent bystander. Nonsense. Society determines male status, and if society lowers male status, the males already on the lower end of the ladder feel it the heaviest."

Yes, this is what Western, Feminized society says to the grand majority of men, and most of these men, including Christians, can't comprehend any choice in the matter.

Yet, the Bible gives us clear instructions about what we should be doing.

> [14] "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers: for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness? And what communion hath light with darkness? [15] And what concord hath Christ with Belial? Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? [16] And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God, and they shall be my people.
>
> [17] Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you. [18] And will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." ~ 2nd Corinthians 6:14-18 (KJV)
>
> [1] "And after these things I saw another angel come down from heaven, having great power; and the earth was lightened with his glory. [2] And he cried mightily with a strong voice, saying, 'Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils, and the hold of every foul spirit, and a cage of every unclean and hateful bird. [3] For all nations have drunk of the wine of the wrath of her fornication, and the kings of the earth have committed fornication with her, and the merchants of the earth are waxed rich through the abundance of her delicacies.'
>
> [4] And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, 'Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues. [5] For her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities. [6] Reward her even as she rewarded you, and double unto her double according to her works: in the cup which she hath filled fill to her double.'" ~ Revelation 18:1-6 (KJV)

More verses on "coming out of the world" can be found on the King James Bible Online: Bible verses about being set apart (search engine).

Alek Minassian and Elliot Rodger did right in rejecting that Society which prejudicially rejected them first. However, they took the wrong, nihilistic path of Revenge.

MGTOW's also choose to reject society's norms, but they have enough dignity and self-esteem to skip over the terrorist response, and choose the relatively more honorable lycanthropic mode of existence.

> Lycanthropy: a frenzy or melancholy, which causeth the patient (who thinks he is turned wolf) to fly all company, and hide himself in dens and corners.

But contrary to their impressions, MGTOW's are not the true wolves of Society.

MGTOW's do well to "go their own way". But for most men and women, singleness is neither normal or desired. I think many MGTOW's would agree with this on a gut level. But they can't admit this to themselves, because not being able to follow it through to the logical conclusion creates too much frustration and cognitive dissonance. Thus, MGTOW's are also victims of a feminized society.

The true wolves are the top 20% of high-SMV men in western society, according to the 80/20 rule. They are the lynchpin of western society's fallen ontology, as they willingly express their satyriasis when sexually engaging themselves with the theoretical 80% of liberated females, and thereby defraud all other men from achieving a satisfying pair bond in marriage to a choice female.

But we admire those guys, because they're just… so cool. They truly know the grace of God! We won't ever condemn those guys, because everyone loves them too much. Our society depends too much on charming Alphas!

But no one realizes that this is exactly how Absalom undermined his father David's kingdom: beautiful vanity, a sexualized comportment, compassion for the common man, promises of justice and political equality to those feeling wronged…

Here we have an evil hierarchy of authority: Society worships female dominance, but dominant females worship the archetypical, satyrical cad. In turn, the promiscuous cad worships Baal as the head of the hierarchy. This has gone on for so long, that Baal has by now institutionalized the covenant of his society-wide worship, making it very difficult for a typical Christian to escape the curse.

Because Satan designs his traps specifically to appeal to the weaknesses of the flesh, it is too easy to get caught up in this mess. Young, naïve, pubescent, easily impressionable teenagers are especially vulnerable.

Scott's assessment of how to create an institutionalized path towards marriage says a lot about the problem of convergence. I might take the liberty to summarize his points as follows.

1. Marriage is an antithesis of worldly society. I'll add that worldly society is anathema to marriage.

2. Marriage requires a Christian man to be the head of authority in the home.
3. Marriage requires an ordered structure centered around shared values.
4. Separate yourselves from Babylonian-American culture!
5. Separate yourselves from the converged Church!
6. Abandon the false belief systems that you learned in Babylon (e.g. Chivalry, Feminism, Egalitarianism…), and separate yourselves from any people or social groups that might be holding you back.
7. Separating yourselves may require some planning, financial backing, and strong resolve.
8. Expect something better to come, after a time of trials and persecutions.

A comprehensive reading of Scott's analysis strongly indicates that a "coming out" is absolutely necessary. He hinted at this in points 1, 4, and 5, and he states it explicitly in point 7.

So by now, it should be clear to my readers why Christians are called to separate ourselves from the world. But how should it be done?

Young Christian, yearning for the blessings of home and family. Return from the mass exile to Babylon! Come out of her, and receive the fruits of the Lord's promises!

Related

- Abide in the True Light: "BE YE SEPARATE": A Biblical warning for God's people and the Church (March 2, 2015)

Hitting a glorified nerve at Patheos

Jack · 4 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The world's largest multi-religious website takes aim at Σ Frame.

Readership: Regulars

Introduction

A week ago, Σ Frame posted the firebrand article, Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (February 23, 2019). I knew this post would spark a controversy, because it is an unseemly characterization that no Churchian person wants to consider.

The article has apparently hit a nerve with Suzanne Titkemeyer, a writer at Patheos who penned a criticism, Christian women are whores? (February 26, 2019)

Instead of honestly contemplating the question I posed in the title of that post, she resorted to the point and shriek reaction instead, much like Warhorn did with Dalrock.

Well, I can understand such a reaction, although the reasons a woman could have that reaction are many. I'll politely refrain from speculating about Titkemeyer's personal motivations for writing her article. Instead, I'd like to express my gratitude to the editors at Patheos for bestowing such an honor on me. Also, my daily viewership has doubled, so thanks for the traffic! I'm glad to have you as a partner in getting the RP gospel out to those searching for spiritual substance on Patheos. Hallelujah!

To be honest, I felt a little ashamed for stating that question in the title of the post, because I knew it wasn't going to glorify Christ. But on the other hand, it does crucify the flesh. This is something that we've grown unaccustomed to in the age of instant digital gratification.

Some TV series, like The Affair, glorify the glorification of women having glorious affairs. Producers cash in on SAHM's desire for vicarious fornication by broadcasting female pornography directly into millions of living rooms across the nation. It's Showtime!

The drama has grown so titillatingly good, that it's hard to deny it any longer. It's time to separate the sheep from the goats. Some anonymous Christian RP blogger needs to finger this out – that among Christians, sexual purity should be important!

> [6] "Do you not know that a little leaven leavens the whole lump?"
>
> [9] "I wrote to you in my epistle not to keep company with sexually immoral people. [10] Yet I certainly did not mean with the sexually immoral people of this world, or with the covetous, or extortioners, or idolaters, since then you would need to go out of the world. [11] But now I have written to you not to keep company with anyone named a brother, who is sexually immoral, or covetous, or an idolater, or a reviler, or a drunkard, or an extortioner—not even to eat with such a person." ~ 1st Corinthians 5 (NKJV)

Here, the apostle Paul makes it clear that sexual immorality in the church is unacceptable. Yet Christian women, as much as Christians are inclined to deny it, are known to the world as being looser than the norm. I covered three case studies in the other post, just to illustrate this very point. The question is, why has this impression reached phenomenological proportions?

A review of the criticism

I'll respond to a few statements in Titkemeyer's article.

> "…many of the female cultural enforcers have started to embrace these men devoid of any morals. I didn't quote the parts where he called Christian women demeaning names like whore and worse."

Female cultural enforcers are beginning to wake up to the fact that if they don't have men on board, then their enterprises won't go very far.

As to the charge of being a man devoid of any morals, I won't deny that I've been immoral in the past, especially in my search for a Christian wife, but that doesn't change the truth of what I'm saying. In fact, it confirms it. To be clear, I am certainly not endorsing sex before marriage as the way to go, if that's what Titkemeyer means by immoral. I'm just pointing out that this is the norm for most people everywhere, including those in the church. Personally, I tried to avoid premarital sex as much as possible, but after many years, I had to face the fact that it's essentially a prerequisite for marriage. I say this to the shame of western society.

But perhaps Titkemeyer thinks something else is immoral about my post – namely that I had the gall to bring such things to light, and label it for what it is. Surely, no one likes their sins to be exposed, and women are certainly no exception.

But which is more immoral? An immoral person pointing out immorality and saying it's a problem, or a pretentious person pointing out that it's immoral for the immoral person to point out immorality?

If someone really wanted to make the case that I am immoral, I think the best way to go about that, would be to argue that I am being legalistic, ungraceful, and profane. But that still doesn't affect the truth of what I'm saying.

Please keep your sheeple trimmed and tidy in preparation for glorification… or slaughter!

> "…he is arguing that Christian women are more likely to have an affair during marriage."

She's not reading well here. I didn't make the claim (in that article) that Christian women are more (or less) likely to have an extramarital affair. I think this is largely determined by personal characteristics and context. I only posed the question of why Christian women have the reputation of being easy, and gave some anecdotal examples of how or why people might think so. I didn't offer a conclusive answer to the question in the title of that post, but instead left it open for readers to reflect on.

The answer to why Christian women are thought to be easier is complicated, and is further complicated by context, but in general, I think it's about values and having a sense of life purpose. Feminist culture has hijacked both of these. In the conclusions, I pointed out that modern western culture has removed all consequences of illicit sex. There definitely needs to be a "coming out" from the culture, but since most churches are converged, there is no place for marriage minded people to congregate.

> "He claims as many as 65%, based on the figures by another guy. I don't know if it's that high."

She obviously misunderstood the meaning of the 65% figure as representing the number of Christian women who have had an extramarital affair. But according to another guy's post, 65% is the number of regular church-going women who say they had premarital sex. The figures don't say how many men those women slept with before marriage, but with a figure that high, it's reasonable to assume that for many, or even most of these women, their eventual husband wasn't even their first partner. That's where Cane came up with the label of whore.

Since this is a slippery slope assumption, I'll go into a bit more detail to show why it's reasonable.

First, there's this data from a scientific study, showing that the number of premarital sex partners is going up on the average.

Table 1: The Distribution of Women's Premarital Sex Partners, by Marriage Cohort
	1970s	1980s	1990s	2000s	2010s
0 partner	21%	17%	14%	12%	5%
1 partner	43%	36%	26%	21%	22%
2 partners	16%	15%	13%	13%	12%
3 partners	8%	11%	11%	11%	11%
4-5 partners	6%	12%	16%	17%	18%
6-9 partners	4%	5%	11%	13%	14%
10+ partners	2%	4%	10%	14%	18%
total	100%	100%	100%	100%	100%
N	268	1,921	4,312	3,598	273

Secondly, there's this grain of salt from Ask Men: Science Discovers Strange Link Between Promiscuity and Divorce (June 17, 2016). This is actually a concise summary of many issues discussed around the 'sphere.

Third, we consider the sex selective dickotomy of self-perception. In a couple previous posts, Hamster's Hierarchy of Sluts (October 11, 2017), and Bon Mot of Slut Science (October 13, 2017), I examined how men and women have different definitions for a slut. If a woman has more than three to five lifetime partners, a typical man would consider her to be venturing into slut territory. Whether she is a Christian or not, doesn't make any difference at all to men in determining this label. This is because this assessment is rightfully based on the information previously mentioned, and how one's sexual history affects the marital relationship. Women, on the other hand, use the term slut loosely, and their appraisal is largely based on their personal experience relative to their social standing. Consequences be sheared!

For example, a woman who has had 5 partners would think that another woman who has had 30 partners is a slut. Through this comparison, she can avoid considering herself to be a slut, but nevertheless, a man would. The same thing goes for the N = 30 woman when she judges a woman who has had a hundred partners. To men, they are all sluts. But from a woman's viewpoint, it's relatively immoral for any man to call a woman a slut, regardless of her N count. This is partly because the feminine imperative requires women to have the sole voice concerning their own bodies, and however they may choose to use them. Never mind that a Christian woman's body is a temple of the Holy Spirit. Men are not allowed to have any opinion about women's sexuality or reproductive potential.

Furthermore, the terms, slut and whore, are generally synonymous, but there is a slight difference. Oholah whores are slightly better than Oholibah sluts. Sluts do it just because they can, or just for the fun of it, whereas whores expect some kind of return investment from the man. For example, prostitutes are whores that do it for the money. We can assume that a Christian woman who had sex with a man before marriage did so because she expected to receive that man's commitment, possibly a marital commitment. So you see, Cane and I are being generous in generalizing these women as whores and not sluts.

Continuing on…

> "Seems to me that infidelity across religious/non-religious lines might be similar."

Yes, we agree on this point. But surprisingly, she makes her own case for Christian adulteresses next.

> "The statistics I keep finding cited at both legitimate studies, several books and in newspaper articles on the subject put women's infidelity at about 33%, or as high as 40% depending on which study you cite. It's not 65% cheating, unless something has changed drastically in the church."

I don't know what sources she is citing, but I presume she is readily admitting to 33 to 40% infidelity of Christian women, after marriage! These figures actually suggest that Cane's claim of 65% having premarital sex is reasonably accurate.

This really turns my tripe!

In my earlier post, I made the offhoof comment,

> "…the only times I have ever seen women spiritually glorified is when they were having an affair, or were just about to. I've seen this so often, that now, whenever I see a woman glorified, I automatically jump to this conclusion."

Titkemeyer responded to this point as follows.

> "This seems so wrong!
>
> So if you seem happy, or glorified, or spiritually fulfilled you are either having an affair, or will have one. How is he determining this? Is he aware that personal observations without empirical studies and peer reviews are relatively meaningless."

I am a professor who is very familiar with research methods, so my personal observation of 4 women revealing this phenomena is worth 4 data points. My pastor's opinion could be considered a peer review, because in addition to being an ordained minister, he is a professional psychologist and counselor. Well, he actually agreed with me on this. (He added the "…or are just about to" addendum.) So I think his observation is worth at least 5 points, maybe more. So how much data do we need to form a predictive model?

> "This is like looking outside at twilight, with the sun sinking while bathing the green grass with a reddish hue. You might momentarily see 'red' grass, but that is not proof that the grass is actually red. It's still green."

I appreciate the meditative pastoral reflection based on the 23rd Psalm.

> [1] The Lord is my shepherd;
> I shall not [remain in a state of] want.
> [2] He makes me to lie down in green pastures;
> He leads me beside the still waters.
> [3] He restores my soul;

According to additive and subtractive color theory, green grass in red light would appear mostly black, with only a little red light reflected. (See photo below.) An object that appears green in white light (which contains green light) cannot appear green in the absence of green light. Moreover, the visual appearance of an object's color depends on a particular color of light being present (additive color theory), and the ability of that object to reflect that color (subtractive color theory).

I'm not sure how this analogy supports her argument, because the church should not be a red light district. Maybe she is hinting at the allegory of Christians being in the light, as 1st John 1:5 says,

> "This then is the message which we have heard of him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all."

Well now, if you can't see the true color of objects, then you're not experiencing the full spectrum of God's light of Truth. BTW, black is pretty dark, and black sheep appear black, even in white light.

> "While I don't doubt there are more very unhappy marriages with spouses thinking about cheating in Quiverfull and Evangelicalism I do doubt that more of them take that step. That is another one of the very harmful things taught in religion, that you're somehow sinful if your mind strays or you glimpse someone else you find attractive in a sexual way."

Yes, religion does have an effect. As Cane reported, those who never attend church have a 96% occurrence of premarital sex, while 88% of those who occasionally attend church put their spoons in the haggis pudding before dinner is served. So 65% among the fully churched is indeed lower. My original question still stands, but reviewing this statistic just makes the incongruity more glaring. If regular churchgoers are less likely to have premarital sex, then why do they have the reputation of being more likely to get on down and party?

Figure 12.2 Premarital sex by religious service attendance. Image taken from Relationships in America: How common is premarital sex?

> "I am skipping a great deal of this man's post because he is using words unprintable on Patheos."

Translation: "I can't wrap my head around many of the questions he poses because he's speaking an unregulated, non-PC dialect."

> "Here he goes on to brag that if you want to find someone to have sex with find a Christian women." [sic.]

I'm not bragging. Laaamenting would be a better characterization. As I mentioned earlier, I'm rather ashamed to have to point out that Christian women have a reputation of being easy, and that my personal experience tends to confirm this notion.

> "I cannot believe I'm having to defend the notion of Christian women being more likely to cheat. But this is telling, this is exactly the kind of men that The Transformed Wife's Lori Alexander purposely chooses to quote and hang around with on Dalrock's blog."

Again, this statement is more evidence that she misread the discussion of premarital sex as being one about adultery, instead of premarital sex. Furthermore, she clearly wishes to distance herself from others who are verbalizing uncomfortable truths, or else, maybe the Indignation™ is intended to be an authoritative literary effect of superiority.

The comments section is mostly comprised of presumptions that I am a basement dwelling incel who's down with yellow fever. Sighing with a smile

They took particular issue with my statement,

> "If a man wants to have a "Christian marriage", he's wiser to marry a thin, mature, submissive, respectful, Buddhist woman, and lead her to Christ in the process."

Of note, the descriptors "thin" and "submissive" received considerable criticism, which is predictable.

A couple of them did pick up on the irony of the term, “vertical dance” in my post, but they didn’t get the meaning that vertical comes before horizontal. They thought it should read “horizontal dance” instead.

Conclusions

Overall, Titkemeyer’s article leaves me with the impression that she’s feigning shock that I violated a feminist taboo, and that this is what makes me and my blog worthy of being labeled immoral. This confusion redefines a moral conscript according to a Power vs. Fear ethical structure. Let’s not forget that true morality is determined by one’s ability to discern right from wrong, and to take the most appropriate action determined by the situation.

Also, Titkemeyer doesn’t really come out and say this, but I get the impression that by highlighting the 33-40% adultery marker as a fact, her article is normalizing Christian women having affairs. I’m afraid that this may be empowering to any sheared ewes who are on the sledge of glorification.

Related

- Huffington Post (feat. (John Halstead): Why Did Over A Dozen Bloggers Leave Patheos? (February 6, 2017)

Authoritative Love, Marital Discipline, and BDSM

Jack · 15 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Σ Frame's concept of authoritative love, and contrasting views on Marital Discipline and BDSM.

Readership: Mature audiences

Introduction

Warhorn's interview with Dalrock gave me the impression that the general public's perception of the Red Pill sphere is all about BDSM. This characterization is hardly accurate, because there are some people who are into that, of course, but most are not.

I have written a lot about discipline in marriage, but I've never gone to the trouble to explicitly explain my views about how marital discipline is vastly different from BDSM.

I was wondering if I should give this point any attention in a post, when a fellow RP blogger asked me this question in a private message.

> "When Warhorn mentioned followers of Dalrock who discussed "wife spanking" and spousal discipline, do you think they were referring to you?"

I took this question as a confirmation that I need to properly address this subject in a post. I replied,

> "I am not sure. I haven't found any comments that finger me out as a proponent of this. But I can see why they might. I think a lot of people associate the word "discipline" with BDSM, but I don't use the word under that connotation…"

So I decided to write this post explaining the difference, and expounding my views on both. I also need to first explain a conceptualization of how to administer authoritative love, since this is important towards understanding the purposes of marital discipline.

A Simple Concept of Administering Authoritative Love

Very few individuals receive perfect love from their parents. Most people's personal problems are thought to be a result of bad things that we get from our parents, usually because these bad habits and false notions about life are what introduce the most obvious headaches that we encounter, as well as anger and bitterness.

But the real problem is not that we struggle against these lies of omission and the resultant intrusive emotions. The thing that hurts us the most is that there was something good and important that we did not get from our parents. If we could only discover this missing piece, then the lies would become obvious, and would lose their grip on us.

So the challenge of getting our basic love needs satisfied (from people) lies in identifying the thing that we're missing.

Love has a spectrum of constitutional elements that can exist in extremes. Figure 1 depicts a greatly simplified illustration that is sufficient to get my point across here. On one end is unconditional acceptance and favor, and on the other end is instruction and discipline.

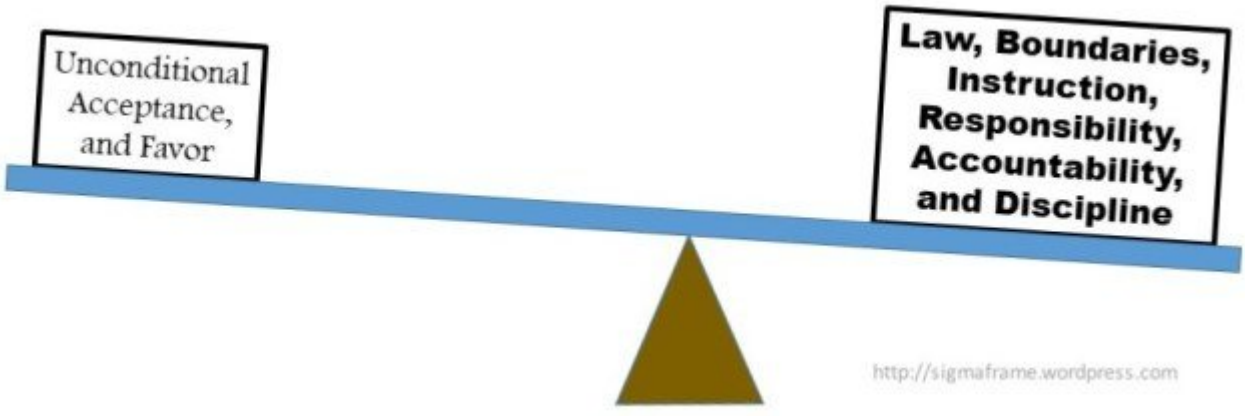

Figure 1: The fullness of authoritative love is comprised of administering a balance between unconditional acceptance and discipline.

For the person who had a lot of training and discipline, but failed to get unconditional love and favor during childhood, they grow up with the idea that they must always work, earn, and perform, just to receive a meager ration of acceptance, and to escape punishment.

Such a person may come to believe that any expression of love is not real love unless it's unconditional. The problem is that unconditional love (from people) is very rare. As a consequence, this person would never feel loved by people.

On the other hand, the person who received a lot of unconditional favor and no discipline may grow up with a grandiose sense of liberty that is self-destructive. This person naturally wants to continue taking unconditional acceptance for granted, often from whomever happens to offer it, and will patently refuse to be disciplined.

These problems are compounded by the fact that people subconsciously prefer to stick with their longstanding habits of unbalanced love, and are often unaware of how far off the mark they stand.

For example, the person who never received unconditional acceptance will want to continue working, earning, and performing, if only for the security and benefits, even though they're not getting any satisfaction from being accepted, nor the contentment of feeling loved.

Likewise, the person who never received any strong discipline will want to continue partying in their carefree, wasteful fun-house, even though they're not obtaining anything of real, permanent value in their lives.

It is human nature for people to fly on auto-pilot, in which they simply continue in the ways most familiar to them. To do so, they often develop a multitude of coping mechanisms, and sometimes resort to toxic love (i.e. controlling and manipulative relationships), to offset the misery of the love they are missing.

Now let's apply these concepts to the real world.

Most women in Western societies are bona fide princesses on a pedestal. They're granted too much permissiveness, adoration and attention.

To make matters more complicated, this love and attention is not truly unconditional, but is merely bestowed on those who are blessed with those characteristics that the Socio-Sexual-Marriage Market Place (SSMMP) deems worthy. Most are not very well aware of it, but this brand of love is extremely conditional and superficial. Photoshopped Instagram shots, Farcebook likes, and the whole selfie culture enshrines feminine glorification to unsubstantiated heights. Virtual neighbors who are lucky will find out early that it's all an illusion.

While most women are taking this fake acceptance and adoration for granted, most men are lurking at the other end of the fulcrum. They're overburdened with the demands of performance, and feeling the brunt of the law, literally. The majority of men are either forced to conform to soyboy insolvency, go MGTOW, or else be left out in the cold. The end result is that women are drifting into Lay Lay Land, and men are giving up and checking out.

The bottom line here is that people are getting neither of the extremes of true love, and certainly not experiencing any grace either. But they're living and thinking at the extremes.

I believe the missing piece of the equation is that men need to stand up to women and start delivering the disciplinary aspects of love (on the right in Figure 1). In other words, we must deliver what is missing, in order to achieve the balance. Of course, this is easier said than done, and it's actually extremely risky. Most of the stuff I write about are thin mints I have sucked on to help me swallow the bitter taste of this endeavor.

I know I'm not alone in this. So if my posts can encourage any of my male (or female) readers, then it's well worth all the time I spend in maintaining this blog. As a note of encouragement, I am changing how I deal with life and marriage, and I am seeing slow improvements over time. I wish the same for my readers.

Marriage is spiritual BDSM.

My Views on Marital Discipline

I have been forced to address the issue of discipline in my own marriage, because my wife did not receive proper training or spiritual nurturing during her upbringing. To put it bluntly, she was the spoiled baby (youngest daughter) in a large, wealthy family of origin; one that had a very casual, take-it-or-leave-it approach towards religious matters of faith and personal development.

I believe a Christian husband should be the pastor of his family, so with a wife like this, I would consider myself to be irresponsible for her spiritual growth if I did not reign in her excesses and give her some tautological instruction.

I just see myself as a determined man who is not going to give in to the dictates of the merciless culture. By lickspittle luck and the grace of God, I'll love my spoiled wife by boning up on proscribing boundaries and setting limitations on her behavior.

I love her enough that I'm not going to let her languish in a spurious, self-centered existence of spiritual immaturity any more than I can help it. Neither am I going to wait around for her to make any effort on this, because generally speaking, women are poor initiators (except for conflict).

So maybe now my readers can understand that when I write about "discipline in marriage", it is concerned with completing the missing aspects of love, so that a balance can be obtained. (Please refer to Figure 1.)

To me, discipline means that I construct a standard of interaction that conforms most closely to what I believe God wants for our marriage. I teach it as a goal to aspire to, and I enforce it when necessary. At times, I also have to make it clear why God's plan is best. To do this, I must constantly examine myself, my motives, and my emotions, and regulate the overall effect that I have on my marriage and family.

This means,

- If my wife is being selfish or disrespectful, then I should call her out on that.
- If she chooses to be emotionally abusive, controlling, and manipulative, then I need to pull out the Game tactics.

- If she falls into a furrow of laziness, then I need to come up with some way to inspire and motivate her.
- If she chooses to be good, then I cannot let her efforts go unrewarded somehow.
- If she chooses to be bad, then I have to let her know, in no uncertain terms, that her behavior is unacceptable and will not be tolerated.

It's really all about applied Classical Conditioning and setting healthy boundaries. Contrary to what a permissively liberal culture teaches us to think, these boundaries actually provide a sense of security by creating a safe space for passionate love, vivacious life, authentic self-expression, personal growth, and spiritual renewal.

The bottom line is that I must never allow her to continuously do anything that would destroy the shalom of our marriage, our children, or our relationships to God. I see it as my responsibility to God as a man to keep my family on the straight and narrow.

Some feminists might think this is equivalent to "controlling", but I am convinced that those who think this way have an unhealthy fear or hatred of masculine authority. As I've described above, real controlling behavior is intended to be a hack job to compensate for that which is missing, and to patch up a habit of lopsided, dysfunctional love, without doing the grunt work of getting down to the root issues. If a man is making an effort to balance out the love see-saw, there should be less manipulative behavior, not more.

Here is a short list of a few masculine qualities that draw my wife to me, and I believe these hold true for many women.

- Confidence – being able to tell her "No", and explain why.
- Strength – being someone she can trust and depend on.
- Resolve – dealing patiently with all her headaches and $h!t tests, and sticking to a plan of action that I know will work out well for both of us.
- Detachment – not allowing myself to get spun into her web of fears, anxieties and insecurities.

Now on to BDSM, which is another matter entirely.

My Views on BDSM

Most readers will know that I've dedicated a number of posts to the topic of disciplining spiritually disobedient wives. I suppose these studies have earned me somewhat of a reputation as a medieval gestapo slave driver (viz. a demanding, zero tolerance husband). But those readers who come to my site looking for titillating BDSM literature are bound to be sorely disappointed. I've never had any commenters discuss "wife spanking" or any sort of physical punishment.

You see, I'm not really into BDSM. I've written a couple posts that are suggestive of BDSM, but only as a satirical examination of the subject. However, judging by at least one comment, I'm sure some readers have taken it to heart and were offended.

But now that I've explained the real nature and purpose of Marital Discipline, the very idea of BDSM should be a gaffe. To be honest, the whole idea of "wife spanking" seems like slapstick comedy to me. So it's hard for me to take that seriously.

However, even though I myself am not sexually attuned to BDSM, I do know my wife loves to be handled roughly in bed. Holding her down, slapping her face and butt, yanking her hair, and drilling her brutally and without mercy during coitus really blasts her to the throes. After sessions like this, she becomes a gasping, quivering bun of hot dog loving affection for a couple days, during which time she is begging me for more every night.

So I do it for her, and for my marriage.

Maybe some hardcore, "whips and chains" BDSM proponents would not consider this BDSM, but it is for me. It took me a while to adjust to her sexual needs.

I also recognize that my wife is not an outlier. There are a significant number of people who attend the mule skinner's funeral. I have no idea of knowing with certainty, but I'll guess that about 20% of people like it rough and kinky. I think this is natural for those people, so I'm not about to label mild domination as degraded or perverted (that is, short of bleeding and branding).

But going beyond this (what I've just described about my wife) into hardcore BDSM seems rather grotesque in my opinion. Going to even further extremes, like flipping the roles to dominant-female/submissive-male, like Boxer examines in his post, Transgressive Subcontinental Paraphilia (March 10, 2019), is even more revolting. Anytime we see male ego flattened or exterminated, we are venturing into dark terrortory.

Final Statements

In several comments under a previous post, some readers discussed the Quivering Fool movement, and how spiritually abusive it has been. I have no experience with, or knowledge of QF, but judging from those readers' comments, QF adherents are obviously lacking discernment and wisdom in handling their families, and have thereby missed the joys of family unity.

But the commenters make a good point about how people misunderstand defacto homographs (words that can have multiple interpretations) and talk past each other. (We saw some of this between Dalrock and Warhorn.)

I also believe people's views on the subject of marital discipline are an extension of their own life experiences. The conditions of men's marital lives can wholly explain their differences of opinion.

I know men who have very tight marriages, and others who live with marital stress day in and day out. From what I have seen, men who have a very warm, loving relationship with their wives, invariably have a wife who is contented, kindhearted, and respectful. Whereas, those guys who have a bitter relationship with their wives predictably have a moody, temperamental wife who likes to do her own thing, her own way, and argue about it with their husband every day.

The wife has a 70% responsibility for setting the emotional tone of the marriage. It's not 50/50 like most people want to think.

Even so, a man should not be aimlessly capitulating to her every demand. He needs to have a clear vision for the family, and talk about it frequently. It's better if she cooperates with his vision, but if she doesn't, then of course, both of them are at a disadvantage.

Concerning how to handle contension in a marriage, I take a moderate view. For the most part, I think there's not much a husband can do to get his wife to be more obedient to God in her dealings with him. Maybe prayer is the most effective recourse, and that strongly depends on how sophisticated a man's prayer life might be. However, there are certain situations which demand immediate action, and women are not known to be initiators.

The final question is… Do I spank my wife?

No, not as a formal punishment. Dread Game is more effective under tortuous circumstances, like when she's talking bull$h!t about getting a divorce. The trick is in eliciting her humility without pricking her pride.

However, there have been times when my wife was in a sour mood, and I gave her a firm but playful smack on the butt with a mockingly serious angry look on my face, saying, "You're not allowed to be unhappy!" Some variation on this parody of being her "other" father always gets her to smile and lighten up.

I have a lot more to say about how to improve marriage, so I guess I'll continue blogging.

Related

- Spawny's Space: Someone to blame (March 7, 2019)

Ed Hurst's series: Return to Eden

Jack · 16 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Get the vision of a brighter faith community model!

Readership: Regulars who are following our development of Courtship Models

Ed Hurst, at Do What's Right, has expressed an interest in our study of Courtship Models. In response, he has written a series of posts, well worth reading, which describe the socio-spiritual environment of a successful community. Based on Biblical studies of an Ancient Near East social ontology, which are contrasted against the Aristotelian social philosophies of Enlightened, Western society, Ed describes a structural model which may be refitted and adapted to our present age. The social model he describes as "a return to Eden" is presumed to be the best social environment attainable in a fallen world, this side of eternity.

The posts in this series are listed here.

1. Do What's Right: Boundaries with women (January 29, 2019)
2. Do What's Right: The best this life has to offer (January 31, 2019)
3. Do What's Right: We know we need it (March 1, 2019)
4. Do What's Right: Outreach to the Red Pill Community (March 1, 2019)
5. Do What's Right: Foundation of a Covenant Community of Faith (March 2, 2019)
6. Do What's Right: A kingdom of awareness (March 3, 2019)
7. Do What's Right: Courtship and longing (March 4, 2019)
8. Do What's Right: Treasures in a far country (March 5, 2019)
9. Do What's Right: A few returning to Eden (March 6, 2019)
10. Do What's Right: Our Brand of Evangelism (March 7, 2019)

The comprehensive message from Ed's writings is the vision of a patriarchal social structure consisting of a benevolent local authority (i.e. the patriarch) combined with a hierarchical structure of leadership.

The overriding purpose of this structure is to maintain the peace and order, and to impart a sense of belonging (i.e. shalom). Ideally, the social structure should be limited to a geographically concentrated tribe of people who share the same values and beliefs.

Other RP authors (most ribaldly, Chateau Heartiste), stress the importance of having racially similar people within a community. Fulfilling this condition would certainly make social interactions go more smoothly, but Ed concludes that genetic homogeneity is not entirely necessary for the success of a community.

The proscribed social structure may be longitudinally perpetuated through generational blood and inheritance. However, the emphasis is on living relationships – relying not so much on blood kinship as on covenant kinship. That is to say, community members need not be blood relatives, but need only to remain faithful towards maintaining the shalom of the community.

In a private correspondence, I asked Ed to further elucidate the concept of a covenant kinship, since this is a socio-spiritual state that is completely foreign to western society, and will therefore be difficult for most of my readers to absorb (myself as well). He wrote in reply,

> "The most powerful bond between any two or more humans is the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit speaks most loudly and clearly through covenant communion. The notion of "covenant" is not easily understood from a Western context, but it is a personal commitment to something larger than the self, and represents a family or tribal sense of identity. The closest American equivalent is a powerful sense of nationalism, which tends to scale up too far, whereas covenant is much more close and personal. All faith covenants begin with a covenant > commitment to God, so it rests on the identity He gives, unlike one that rests on shared DNA. It's rather like spiritual DNA, or moral DNA.

>
> The other analogy popularly cited is "contract", but that's inherently impersonal. A contract is a commitment of resources and labor, whereas a covenant is a commitment of the person regardless of resources or performance. In contrast, Covenant is about the persons and their commitment to the welfare of the whole. This type of social structure is the heart of Ancient Near Eastern (ANE) feudalism. Western feudalism can also be personal, but instead of shalom, the nexus is property and performance to maintain the sovereign's favor."

Ed uses the word shalom frequently, because this is an important concept which has no English translation. (After studying this word/concept for a time, I too have found a deep appreciation in it.) I might describe shalom in my own words as a state of belonging; being a part of something important, something larger than one's self. It includes a spatial environment in which everyone and everything has a structured, ordered place. Acceptance, encompassing disciplinary mentorship and unconditional love, is available (ideally from one's immediate family). Even though the external world may be far from being perfect, shalom can be experienced discretely in one's subjective life experiences, thereby yielding the impression that the people, and space, and everything within one's immediate proximity can be relatively meaningful, joyful, and peaceful. Shalom is also the intended reward of spiritual obedience.

Those who have crawled through the hood of hard knocks may scoff at the above description of shalom. But those who have, even once, had a glimpse of eternal glory will believe in the Truth of it, and may even hope to achieve the experience on a daily basis. So believe it if you can!

"Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden", by Johann Wenzel Peter, ca. 1820's.

A review of Ed's short essays reveals how far off the path western society has wandered, in relation to God's proscribed ideal. Moreover, it seems to be an impossible undertaking to Do What's Right. However, Ed points out that the journey to restoration begins within each man's heart. As such, it is available to anyone who wishes to pursue it.

Ed takes the time to point out that this approach is inter/non-denominational, because there is no demonImotivational group that has yet latched on to this vision.

Ed also attacks medieval Western feudalism, which includes the social construct of chivalry, just as Dalrock has gone to great lengths to expose. Most Red Pill bloggers have been deconstructing chivalry, thereby revealing some harrowing insights.

Ed suggests that men should be marrying women who are younger than themselves, as opposed to peerage romances. In the RP sphere, there is a rule of thumb that says a man should choose a woman who is younger than he is, but not younger than half his age plus 7. There is also the idea that couples should get married young, but also old enough to be fully mature. Putting these two ideas together, the ideal marriage arrangement would be between a woman in her early twenties, and a man in his late twenties.

These are all important findings that should be emphasized in our pursuit of a better courtship model, nested within a robust faith covenant community.

Related

- Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): A Parallelism Primer (March 6, 2019)

Red Pill Political Correctness

Jack · 17 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Blair Naso's commentary on the Red Pill, including views of American culture and politics.

Readership: All

Σ Frame is pleased to present the following guest post from the long established Manosphere author, Blair Naso.

My name is Blair Naso. My real name is Austin Martin. You can find my writing here. I write about whatever I think is true about any topic I have been thinking about.

Most of my readers probably discover me from reading Return of Kings (ROK) archives or a certain Manosphere aggregator, though it seems by this point there are a lot of new readers who didn't follow me four years ago. Sometimes I get referrals from this website. Jack has a large catalog of Red Pill type blogs on his sidebar.

On his page categorizing all these blogs, he listed me as a "hermit." I'm not sure I really count as a hermit, but it's true that I don't read much of the Manosphere anymore and have drifted from most of my internet friends. I don't wear the label Red Pill, and I don't care about any movement. So I guess that fits me into the hermit type. In the last year or so I've gained a lot of followers, and the Manosphere has definitely changed, so I thought I would introduce myself and give my thoughts on the nature of the Manosphere.

I definitely appreciate Jack giving me the opportunity to promote my work. I will never ask people for Patreon donations. Nor do I have any grandiose notions of saving the world. I do this simply to have a creative outlet.

"Breaking Waves", by Eric Johannsen.

I was, eh, a red-tinted purple pill when I came across the Manosphere in 2014. I soon became a staff writer for Return of Kings. Not quite a year later, in 2015, I quit so I could focus on personal issues. Admittedly, I handled this poorly, having just come off of some e-drama. I should have waited a month for things to die down. But I am very glad I took the time off to rethink things, and I am far more satisfied with my work over the last two years.

In 2017 I started back on my own blog, but I don't really write about Red Pill issues anymore because I'm burned out on the topic. Saying "feminists suck" is a narrow topic that has become cliche. At this point, most people hate feminists. Women are crowd followers and wear ideology like a fashion statement. The label "feminist" signals that you're a lunatic, so women don't call themselves that anymore. Young women who are late Millennials and Generation Z burn any association with the label because it's become so toxic. If you do meet a feminist in real life, she starts apologizing and assuring you that she doesn't hate men.

What's really amazing is that my old 2014-2015 posts on my blog get far more page views. I don't know why, because they aren't well-written. Maybe it's because ROK is linked to them. Maybe they are more pedestrian and easier to relate to. Or maybe it's because I just had some honest thoughts that men needed to hear. At any rate, I don't know why people are reading them, though I still agree with most of what I wrote.

Anyway, my readers now aren't the same I had during ROK, so I gradually quit talking about the site. It seems kind of tacky to talk some kind of glory days of when I wrote for a medium-sized group blog four years ago that I wasn't at for a full year. I feel like a middle aged man who visits his old fraternity and finds that no one remembers him. Like the 19-year-old who visits his old high school at lunch.

"Facebook", by Waldo Lee.

What really bothered me about ROK is that, however much Roosh tried to make it into a big tent, it devolved into an ideology. There was a certain atmosphere of Red Pill political correctness. You deviate from a certain position even a little, and the retards in the comments section will denounce you as a blue bill beta. I checked a few years later, and the exact same people were still taking up half the comments section. Do these people not have lives?

And it's like the term "Red Pill" is a platonic ideal "we" are always trying to perfectly define. "We" are always using this Red Pill epistemology as a filter for every thought and viewpoint, to see whether it's valid or not. I am always wary of this kind of philosophical simplicity, and so I am surprising that many of the readers at ROK detested my work, although I have to say that the feeling was mutual. Most of the staff writers agreed with me in how horrendous the comments section was.

I don't usually trash talk people on the blog, but I'm extremely disappointed with how certain red pill writers have turned out. Many a great writer and vlogger has quit actually creating content and now just produces livestreams. Livestreams are lazy, and I don't have sympathy for anyone who is deplatformed whose main internet content is livestreams. I don't care about your bar banter. Half of it is people laughing at their own dumb jokes.

What I've really learned from watching — on the sidelines — the Alt Right rise and fade into obscurity in the span of about two years is that the solution to society's problems is not creating a movement. Every fringe movement — left, right, social, political, religious — is very quickly subverted by the idiot masses who misunderstand the nuances.

The best example of this on the internet is MGTOW, which originally was a kind of libertarian sentiment. I think this is probably what happened to the Beatniks, the civil rights movement, and in general the counter-subcultures of the mid-20th century.

Another really good example is John Wesley, whose ideas degenerated into a wide span of movements, none of which followed his original methods. Both the snake-handlers and the prosperity televangelists are the spiritual descendants of Wesley. In college I attended the Wesleyan Center, where they told us that the early Methodists fasted twice a week, as though this were a feature of Methodism and not the definition of Methodism.

Does the Manosphere still exist? The jargon "we" use have become relatively mainstream. A lot of old writers do very different topics and formats. Chateau Heartiste went from being a crass (though brilliant) pick-up blog to a traditionalist semi-Christian white nationalist news aggregator.

Will the Red Pill become just another social movement that made a ding in history and then fell by the wayside? Was it just a scream into the void, ultimately of no relevance to the socio-political landscape? Is the trajectory of history merely towards entropy, with any reaction just a token resistance? I certainly think Trump would have been elected without the Manosphere and the alt right.

Or was it just a symptom of an inevitable reaction, a single thread in the garment? A cell swallowed up into the greater organism of anti-progressivism, irrelevant in the large history but a vital part of the reaction's inception?

In 2007 Keith Richards starred alongside Johnny Depp in the Pirates of the Caribbean franchise as Edward Teague, Pirate Lord of Madagascar.

I recently read Keith Richards's autobiography. He talks about various club owners, art patrons, and drug dealers in London, without whom the British blues scene never would have happened, but of course who are forgotten in the final mythos of rock n roll.

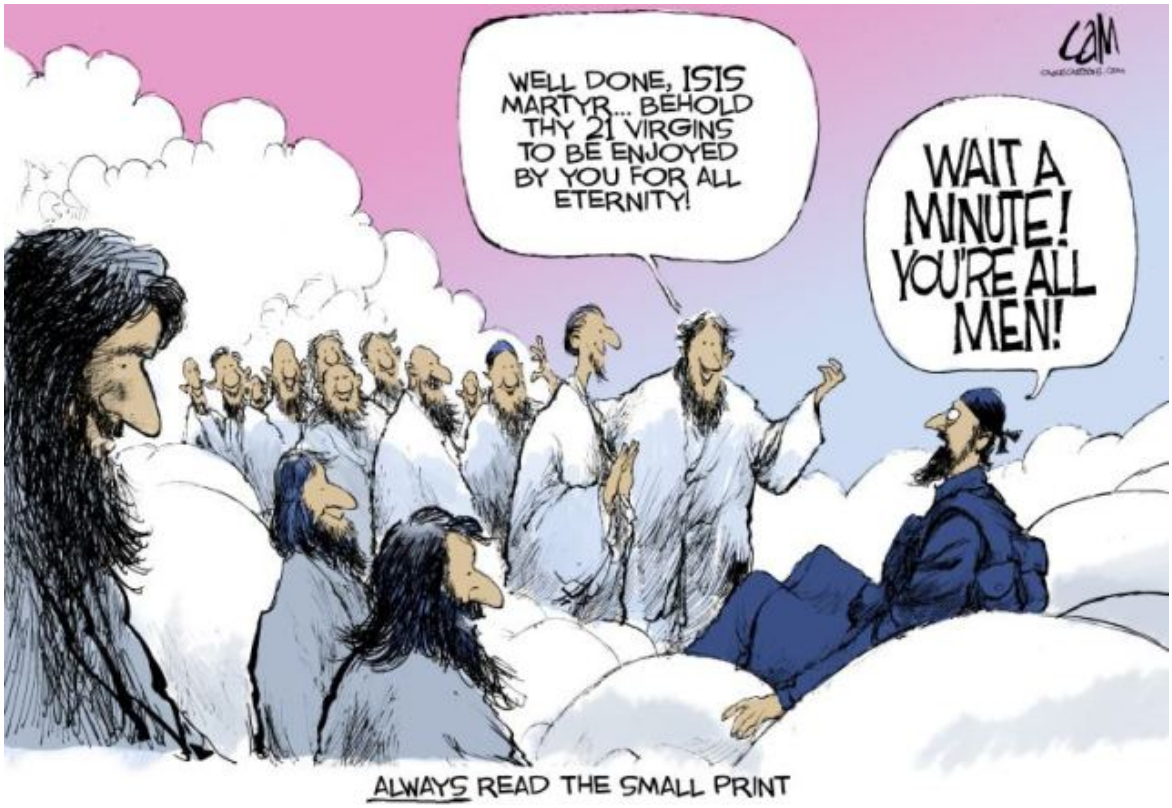
I think Red Pill is just a synonym for truth. It was originally about the nature of women, but I really don't see that as something isolated.

Around the age of 20, you should start realizing that society lied to you about the sexes. A little bit of Red Pill literature can speed up a young man's learning curve, but you can come to all of this by just observing the world around you. The Red Pill isn't a mystery cult. It's not arcane knowledge that's just being discovered. We aren't translating the gnostic gospels.

The divide between men and women is only one aspect of our society's problems, which is fundamentally rooted in a spiritual issue, which is that we've accepted the doctrine of the Antichrist. The consumerist way we approach sex is intimately tied into the consumerist way we approach everything in our society, and so it seems silly to build a movement narrowly focusing on just the sexual angle of consumerism.

The Antichrist isn't so much a person as it is an ideology. The Antichrist takes the values of Christianity and inverts them. Lust is love, anger is justice, and flooding your community with criminals is compassion. The Antichrist promises you earthly wealth and will allow you to act on all of your animal passions. It is a doctrine that can only speak lies, because it is in lies that you can have whatever world you like. Any truth, no matter how small, sets a standard, and so the Antichrist must destroy all truth so that there will be no standards.

Feminism, ultimately, is a form of Marxism, which ultimately is a subversion of Christianity that glorifies base drives like anger, greed, and pride, while it simultaneously pathologizes virtues like family, loyalty, and mercy. This is not so different from Islam, which tells you that God will allow you to rape and murder as long as you do it to the right people. What the Koran calls "the great salvation" is spending eternity in a sex paradise.

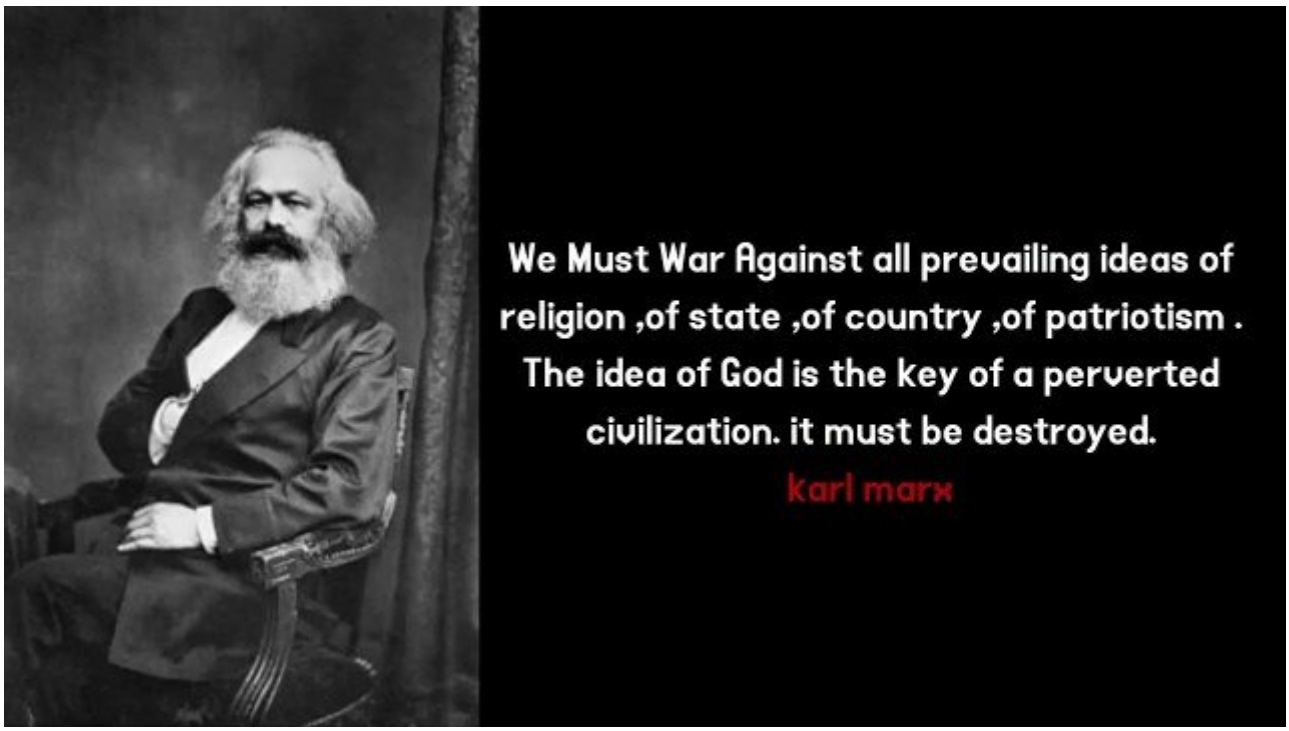


You can see this in what most of Christianity has become. Pastors preach on how Jesus wants you to have good self-esteem, but they will almost never criticize divorce. This has already been covered extensively on Jack's blog. Christians have exchanged one set of virtues for a different set and then tried to equivalate the two. The peace that Jesus gives which surpasses all understanding and is not of this world has been taught as mere world peace. This is most glaringly obvious in Pope Francis, but he is far from alone.

To defeat feminism, we must defeat the Antichrist. If people should return to the actual Christ, then feminism will not be a problem. If people actually read their Bible at face value, they would see that you cannot be a feminist and a Christian. Feminism is about women doing what they want with their lives. Christianity is about sacrificing every decision of your life to Christ.

For many years now all of our political and social discourse has been based Marxism, particularly in how we see the primary purpose in politics as the need to correct historic wrongs, spread our beliefs to other people, and unite the world under one system. The neoconservatives directly originate in Trotskyite Marxism. This is most clear in the Bush family, who did nothing for Christianity, the working class, or any notion of conserving American culture. How are they not fuctional Marxists? Everything the Bushes did was fiat economics, fiat wars, and fiat social restructuring. Because culture cannot be quantified, Republicans never once considered how the Aztec invaders and outsourcing were warping society. Even in the age of President Trump, these concerns are expressed in terms of job creation and wages, not small towns overrun with blight and Aztecs.

Most conservatives' arguments against socialism is that it isn't practical — not that it is evil.



Another example is our narrative of race relations. This is entirely based on a frame that whites have historically oppressed blacks just because whites are mean. Nothing is ever said about what blacks did to instigate it. Nothing is said about how the civil rights movement has destroyed the black community. This history is never taught dispassionately so that one can analyze it critically — it's taught as a story of good triumphing over evil. Most people still believe that the civil rights movement was a fundamentally good thing, even though it ended in dozens of race riots.

American as an institution may have won the Cold War, but America as an idea lost.

All these terms, such as "Manosphere" and "Red Pill," will probably one day be outdated, just as it is happening with the terms "Feminist" and "Hippie," but these truths which remain vital to people's lives are timeless. You can line up all the reactionaries in the country and assassinate us one by one, and within a generation these ideas will spring up again. As Elvis said, "Truth is like the sun. You can shut it out for a time, but it ain't going away."

Related

- Return of Kings (feat. Blair Naso): 5 Lessons From Church That Will Wreck Your Life (November 1, 2014)

Christian vs. Non-Christian Women – A Negligeeable Difference

Lexet Blog · 20 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Is there any difference between Christian and Non-Christian women? Read on for the dispiriting answer.

This post was submitted by the author of Lexet Iustitia.

Readership: Christian Men; Christian Men who are in, or who hope to be in, a relationship with a Christian Woman;

In the previous post, Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019 February 23), it was concluded that,

> If a man opts for a Christian girlfriend or wife, she's only better in the sense that she won't be as depraved and manipulative as the Femme Fatale in Case Study 4. But whether or not she will take the effort to be obedient to the Word is entirely up to her, and whether she is one of those 10% [of true believers within the church].

In the comments, Snapper adds,

> This is an absolute truth that every married Christian man or Christian man hoping to get married should understand. Many Christian women are only "not as bad as the non-Christian ones" and that is their goal, to be "not as bad as". This, however, does not actually mean they AREN'T as bad as non-Christian women, and will often be just as bad when given the chance. Just as in a man's walk with Christ, it must be a conscious effort to be obedient to the word of God and not just "not worldly". One can be someone who is not actively partaking in the sins of the world while still not actively seeking to be obedient to Christ. The ages old axiom, "Good people go to hell every day", comes to mind regarding this.

Deti's Second Law of Relationships:

> There are no functional differences between Christian women and secular women. Christian women are (or at least can be) as depraved, sexually damaged, and morally compromised, as a non-Christian woman can be. She might be a Christian, but she's still a woman, and All Women Are Like That, including Christian women.

Coincidentally, I was thinking about this same issue while in church today, after being "inspired" by seeing a "Christian" woman who shows up to church, week after week, month after month, year after year, wearing inappropriate clothing. That requires a callous heart, a lack of introspection and examination, a lack of being discipled, and a complete disregard for what scripture says.

I had to ask myself, what difference does knowing Christ make in this woman, or by extension, any other woman regularly attending churches in the West?

How does Christ make this woman sitting in the pew in front of me, wearing a shoulder-less dress and going bra-less, any different from a streetwalker?

I reasoned that both groups of women are prone to a sin nature. A Christian woman should be aware of that, and should constantly fight against her sin nature. Yet, there are non-Christian women who do the same, although not within a religious context or moral framework.

There is a level of depravity, however, that not only reveals a lack of sanctification, but also a rebellious life. But this same rebellion is commonly evidenced within the most conservative Churches, in fact, especially so. It seems to be a hallmark of the Christian experience.

The hymns ended, and the Pastor started speaking, and yet I still could not think of an answer. I felt embarrassed to realize that there is no practical difference between Christian women, and non-believers. I also felt a little angry, because it seemed like Christ's sacrifice hasn't made any appreciable difference.

Should Christians be distinguishable from the rest of the world? A clear and quick glance at scripture reveals that the answer is an obvious YES.

So why, in the United States, or in the West in general, is it impossible to distinguish a Christian vs a non-Christian woman? The exception would be the Amish, Mennonites, or girls who wear long denim dresses and head coverings.

Why is it that the vast majority of women in the hyper-majority of protestant churches cannot be distinguished from the outside world (when the outside world is literal harlotry 24/7)?

When there is no functional difference between a Christian woman and a woman openly practicing the values of Sodom and Gomorrah, there is a massive problem.

We have allowed culture to infiltrate the church, and not only control our lifestyles, but even control our doctrines.

So then how are Christian women supposed to identify themselves as believers?

Related

- Wintery Knight: More And More Women Are Asking Why They Can't Find A Good Man To Marry (2018 April 12)
- Σ Frame: Meretricious Power and the Tingle (2018 October 9)

What is glorification?

Jack · 23 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Glorification is a religious byword which has a practical meaning that most are unaware of.

Readership: All

In a previous post, Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (February 23, 2019), I made the following statement.

> "Truth be known, the only times I have ever seen women spiritually glorified is when they were having an affair, or were just about to. I've seen this so often, that now, whenever I see a woman glorified, I automatically jump to this conclusion."

A reader sent me a private message asking the following question.

> "What do you mean by a women being "spiritually glorified"? What does that look like? Sounds like a useful thing to watch for but I'm not sure what you mean by it."

Generally speaking, glory is the brilliant, heavenly beauty and transcendental timelessness of the atmospheric presence of God. Thus, glorification coincides with the state of being close to God, and therefore, the glorified entity should exhibit more of the nature of God.

But ironically, people, places, things, ideas, and even fallen angels can appear glorified, even though they may be far removed from God's holiness.

> "For Satan himself transforms himself into an angel of light. [15] Therefore it is no great thing if his ministers also transform themselves into ministers of righteousness, whose end will be according to their works." ~ 2 Corinthians 11:14-15 (NKJV)

For example, film and advertisement industries explicitly present their lead actors and products, respectively, as being excessively glorified. The reason is because glorification is attractive, persuasive, and even seductive. If you are exposed to a person or a product in a glorified state, you can believe it and/or accept it very easily. It may even become your new mental standard of comparison. Compared to an entity in a glorified state, all other competing entities appear common and mundane.

Women appear glorified in the eyes of men when they display indicators of health, youth, and fertility. This is because aesthetic beauty is defined by how it appeals to the soul of a man. Contrary to what one might expect, such indicators are highly controllable, and most women are well aware of this.

The average woman might achieve more glorification if she loses weight, dresses attractively, and wears makeup in a "natural" style. Many women pile on the makeup whenever they're seeking to glorify themselves for the purpose of attracting attention or affirmation. But women who are young and naturally beautiful actually display more true glory without makeup. This phenomenon was covered in a previous post, Opal's Femsplaination of Cakeface (June 17, 2018).

There are many photo editing apps that are designed to remove wrinkles, acne and other aesthetic flaws from photographs of people's faces. The intended effect of using these apps is specifically aesthetic, but in a larger sense, the desired impression is one of glorification.

At the opposite extreme, women who wear dingy, ragged clothing, get fat, get tattoos, chop their hair short, or dye it an unnatural color, are actively detracting from their own glorification. I believe such women are attracted to these fashion trends because the debasement of their feminine beauty is a glorification of death and destruction. They eschew the glorification of life and health within themselves because it is too closely associated with God, beauty, nature, and order.

This is a well preserved example of Chinese Buddhist art from the Liao Dynasty (907-1125) in China. The Guanyin Bodhisattva is the Buddhist/Daoist goddess of compassion. She usually appears as a female, but can also appear as a male, and sometimes with many arms. She is often depicted in a variety of open, relaxed postures. Note the bare breasts, the leg lifted and spread, and the tender sensuality expressed in the eyes and fingers.

Now to get down to the reader's question: How does having an affair enhance a woman's glory, and what does that look like visually?

The appearance of spiritual glorification in human flesh is challenging to define in words, but I'll take a shot at it here.

When people get into a new relationship, they start believing in new possibilities for their lives. They feel loved, they have hope, they are willing to humble themselves. They get into the mindset of being their best selves at all times, or at least those times when social intercourse with the object of adoration seems probable.

Women display a market value change when they're entwined with the Tangles, and especially after they get sexually imbued with masculine affection. There are many obvious physical indicators, which when combined, lead to a form of glorification.

- Her face glows.
- She's happy and smiling.
- Her eyes are gleaming with hope.
- She has a sudden burst of self-esteem.
- She conducts herself in a more mature manner.
- She's more content, and less emotionally needy.
- She is more confident, especially more sexually confident.
- She may become more animated and emotionally expressive.

- She's dressing up and attending diligently to her hair and makeup.
- She is self-assured, and she speaks in a more direct, candid fashion.
- She stops using anger and feigned helplessness as tools of manipulation.

This phenomenon of glorification also happens to men too, but it's less frequent, and less pronounced.

Note: If your worried about whether your woman might be cheating, Chateau Heartiste has a large number of posts on this subject. See these search terms: cheating; infidelity.

Related

- Chateau Heartiste: Signs That A Woman Is Cheating In Her Heart (August 7, 2014)

The Mosh Pit of Sex Analysists

Jack · 24 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Dalrock, Bayly, Gudeman, Milton, St. Paul, St. Augustine, and St. Jerome mash out what makes sex and marriage mutual, good, and sanctifying.

Readership: Those who aspire to marriage; Those attempting to follow the debates between Dalrock, Pastor Tim Bayly, and David Gudeman, Between Dalrock, Pastor Tim Bayly of Warhorn media, David Gudeman at Brain Legions, John Milton, St. Paul, St. Augustine, St. Jerome… there are a lot of quotes and views floating around. Some scientific analysis and Frame work is required to sort this all out.

It all started late last year, when Dalrock wrote, Does romantic love sanctify married sex? (November 20, 2018). This post discussed the prudish views towards sex held by the early church fathers, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, and St. Paul, and compared them to the views of the Puritan poet, John Milton, and modern day Pastor, Tim Bayly.

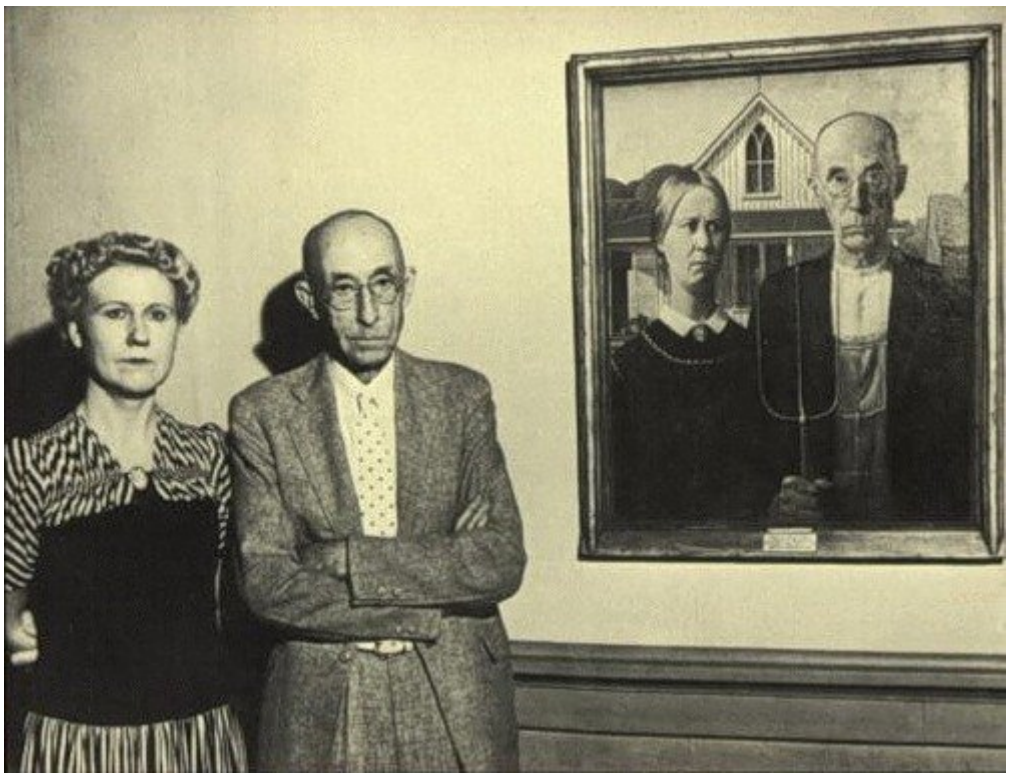
Dalrock cited Pastor Tim Bayly's post on Warhorn media, Authority and submission: muscles needing exercise (November 17, 2018). In this essay, Dalrock compared Bayly's approach to Milton's, and shows that they are rather similar in that they both agree that romantic love sanctifies sex. Of note, Dalrock compares this view to those of St. Augustine's and St. Jerome's shared assessments, which were in agreement that passionate sex in marriage was disgraceful. Dalrock wrote,

> Both sets of teachings are wrong, and you won't find them in the Bible:
>
> 1. That sex with passion in marriage is a sin. (Jerome and Augustine)
> 2. That sex without romantic passion in marriage is a sin. (Milton and Bayly)

Dalrock uses the words, 1. "with passion", and 2. "without… passion", to make it appear like these two views are the diametric opposite, but not really. They are both very conservative discussions of what makes sex "good", by various definitions. One of Dalrock's running points is that brutish passion makes sex good too (see Dalrock's Like a rutting buck post), and I'll add that healthy men and women will usually agree.

To edit Dalrock's points for the sake of accuracy, I feel these two views could be better represented as follows.

1. That sex with brutish passion in marriage is absent of love. (Jerome and Augustine)
2. That sex without romantic love in marriage is unbecoming. (Milton and Bayly)



David Gudeman at Brain Legions criticized Dalrock's arguments in his post, Sex and the Straw Man–an Exercise in Logic (February 10, 2019).

Gudeman also highlighted Bayly's reference to the nebulous concept of "good sex", but then he got sidetracked in the analysis. It is difficult to pinpoint exactly what "good sex" entails, and even more excruciating to try to read this meaning into Milton. We are only left to assume that "good" means deeply gratifying, and not the other meaning of moral good. But under this assumption, however "good" might be defined for each individual, the important thing to be considered is that the qualities that make sex "good" are the same qualities that reinforce either sanctification or perdition. For example, some men might say spinning plates is good sex, while others would say marital bliss is good sex.

Gudeman said that he agreed with Dalrock on the whole, but also said that Dalrock was making a straw man argument that he attempted to pick apart.

Dalrock offered his rebuttal here: Is it a sin to go against God's command? (February 10, 2019)

I don't think Dalrock is making a straw man argument as Gudeman claims, but Dalrock does take the following liberties.

1. He makes some assumptions that he has not made explicitly clear.
2. He extrapolates real world conclusions from abstract principles.

Regular readers know Dalrock has a habit of doing the clatter, and this is what makes his posts so chillingly thought-provoking and interesting Lee satirical to read. I am thankful for that sense of serious light-heartedness, but I know other readers interpret the jesting as intellectual dishonesty. The magical logic of his arguments reveals the weakness of western epistemology's heavy, over reliance on logos and deductive reasoning.

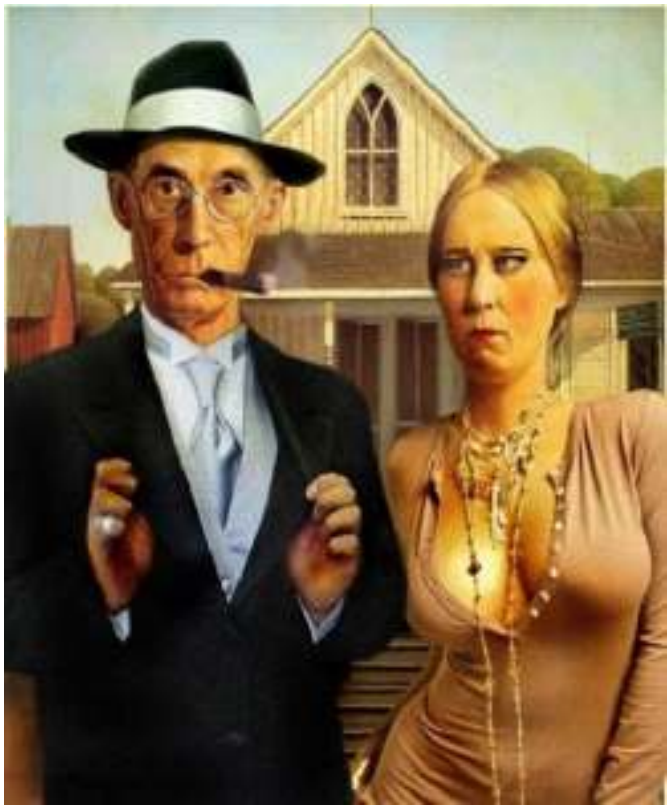
Concerning the former, for example, Dalrock seems to have the notion that, either you're living out God's will, or else, you're not, and if you're not, then it's sin. (In the general abstract, I agree, but in reality it's not so black-and-white.) So when Pastor Bayley said, "sex that is not mutual is not sex as God designed and commands it", Dalrock interprets the "not… as God designed and commands it", part as meaning "not according to God's will", which is therefore sin. This is what allows Dalrock to come to the comical conclusion,

> "According to Bayly's rules, a married couple that doesn't feel romantic love or sexual attraction is violating God's sexual design if they have sex with the goal of conceiving a child!"

Gudeman smartly pointed out the source of confusion in Bayly's claim.

> "It is not at all clear that "mutual" means "with romantic love" or "with sexual attraction". From context, "mutual" seems to mean that both spouses freely agree to engage in sex; that neither spouse feels forced or coerced."

If Gudeman's assessment of Bayley's statement is accurate, then Bayley seems to imply that spouses have the right to refuse sex if they don't feel like it. This borders on agreement with certain precepts of rape culture, which claim that any sex that is not sufficiently satisfactory can be labeled rape. At any rate, it certainly does not agree with the Bible, as Dalrock pointed out in his earlier post.



What Sanctifies Sex and Marriage?

This debate also brings up the question of what sanctifies sex, and what sanctifies marriage.

Dalrock wrote,

> "This isn't to say that romantic love in marriage is bad. To the contrary, it is truly wonderful! But it isn't sanctifying. It is marriage that sanctifies romantic love and sex, but in our modern rebellion we have twisted this around and assert that romantic love sanctifies marriage and sex."

I concur with Dalrock's main point, but I partly disagree with Dalrock, Bayly, Gudeman, Milton, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, because they are presuming that sex, marriage, and passion, are separated from each other. Let me explain.

A postmodernistic rationale attempts to categorize these things and treat them as unrelated separate entities. To make the issue more confusing, our fallen sinful nature wants to pick them apart for various reasons. I also believe Satan wants to present a false dichotomy, saying in effect, you can have passionate sex, but not in marriage, or vice versa.

One very popular sub-dichotomy that is attached to this false belief, is that having children is an anathema to having a passionate sex life. Being a father myself, I know this is not entirely true. In addition, I've heard many women state, in so many words, that their sex drive becomes turbocharged after delivering a child.

Since we're talking about sin and sanctification here, let's break down the constituent elements of marriage.

1. Marital Commitment – This is intended to establish trust, and give the relationship a sense of security and permanence. As Dalrock elucidated, the following elements depend greatly on this point.
2. Self-Sacrificial Christian Love – Without this element, your relationship is going to blow up sooner or later.
3. Dopamine Rush Romantic Love – This element gives us the emotional fortitude to overlook the other's faults, and withstand the sacrifices necessary for number two.
4. Brutish sexual passion – Without this element, one has no pressing, urgent need to marry, and should therefore stay single.
5. Having children – Here is the command to "be fruitful and multiply", God wants more Christian people. It's a sin to withhold the fruit of your loins from delivering on the purpose for which God gave us tits and bits, and the sexual desire to use them.

In view of these five factors, I agree with Dalrock that the commitment of marriage certainly sanctifies sex, but we must also admit that commitment sanctifies all the others as well. Marriage allows the other elements to take root, thereby evading the selfish sin of fornication.

However, Commitment does not stand alone in its support for the state of sanctification. In reference to the Parable of the Pie, romantic love, as well as brutish passion, are both indicators that the emotional and physical aspects of sanctification, respectively, are occurring through the sexual union. I believe perhaps this is what Milton and Bayly were confusedly digging at, in saying that romantic love sanctifies marriage. If one admits that the emotional soul bonding is a key element in sanctification, then this claim also begs Artisanal Toad's question of whether sex equals marriage. I wonder if Bayly would go along with that?

Self-sacrificial Christian love and having children also add to the whole sum of sanctity in the sense that when these elements are present, couples are much more likely to experience the fullest joy possible of the relationship. This unique sense of belonging, joy, and contentment is what drives them to do what they can to preserve the entire family.

Here I am not saying that any one of these factors can sanctify either sex or marriage, but instead, I mean to point out that having all five elements in place presents the most robust form of God's original design for marriage. Instead of arguing about what element sanctifies which other element, we should be talking about how we might obtain all five elements.

Note: I am not sure if Dalrock disagrees, or if he merely omitted these points because it wasn't the main thrust of his post.

What is God's will for marriage?

This debate brings up an interesting point about what God's will for marriage involves. It's safe to assume that it should include self-sacrificial Christian love and commitment. But…

- Does it necessarily include romantic love?
- Does it necessarily include sexual passion?
- Does it necessarily include having children?
- Does it necessarily include having shared values and shared goals, like having a child?

Saint Augustine and St. Jerome believed that "holy love" was devoid of both romantic love and sexual passion.

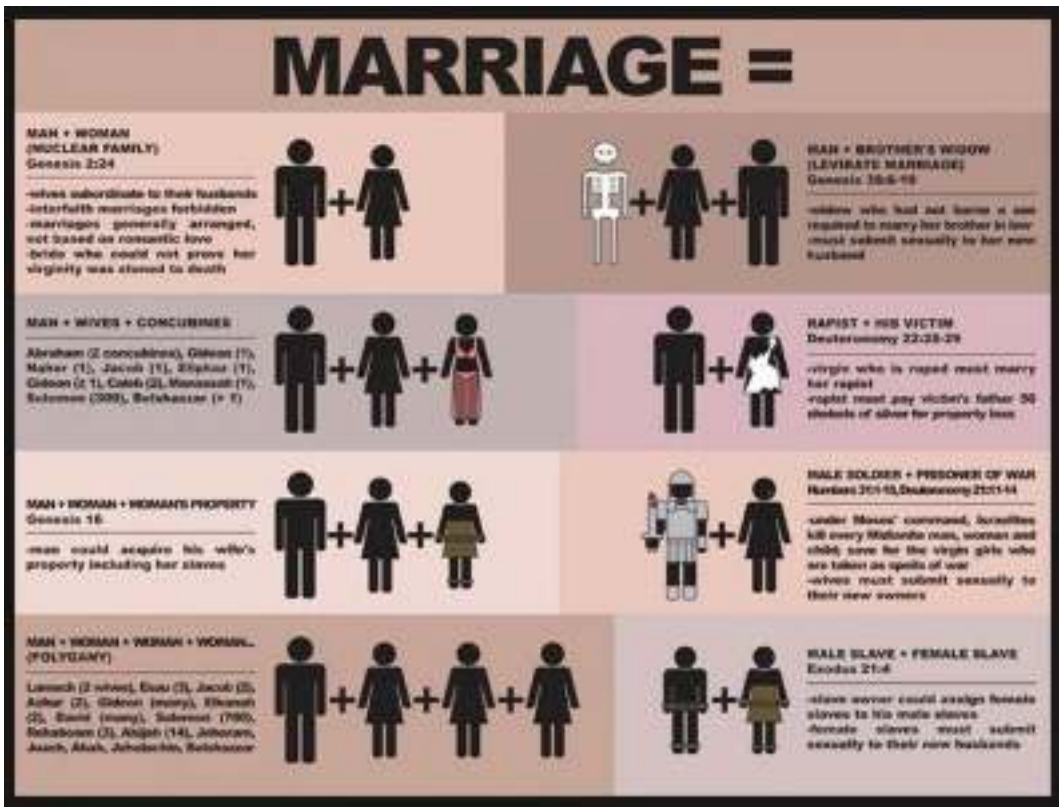
Milton and Bayly argued that without romantic love, sex is empty.

Bayly amplified Milton's stance by calling it "brutish", which Dalrock lampooned by arguing that "rutting" is what makes sex good.

Dalrock maintains that the institution of traditional marriage is what keeps it all together.

Saint Paul didn't go into much detail on these topics, except to say that you shouldn't deprive your spouse if they want it (cf. 1st Corinthians 7:5). I'll also add that it's in your best mutual interests to keep your spouse satisfied. After all, marriage is supposed to fulfill these needs.

Based on Mark 2:23-28, I believe Jesus would say something to the tune of, "Marriage was made for human beings, and not human beings for marriage."



Let's examine the possibilities of error.

If it were God's intention for a person to have all five of the aforementioned elements in marriage, and he bought into Satan's lie that he can only have one or the other, then he's making a grave mistake that would hurt his joy.

The problem is that too many people have bought into this way of thinking, and the sheer popularity of this belief reinforces the perpetuation of compromise and trade-off as the norm. Worldly influences only exacerbate this false dilemma.

On the other hand, if a person only needs one or two, but accepts the others as part of the package deal, then although it may seem burdensome, that would not necessarily detract from their joy in marriage.

Call me naïve if you wish, but I believe God's robust design for marriage is that all five elements (commitment, self-sacrificial love, romantic love, passionate sex, and having children) should be bound together as a package deal. I can't say that I have achieved all of this for myself, but it is what I believe, and it is the goal I proscribe for my own marriage.

Of course, I should add that it would be presumptuous, legalistic, and inadequate to say that this design is meant for everyone.

All arguments aside, the bottom line for the reader is this: What does God intend for YOU concerning marriage? It may not be what you currently believe. It might even surprise you.

Permit yourself for a moment to look past cultural constraints, and to dive deep into your heart, and dream a little bit. God just might allow you the desires of your heart.

Related

- Be Blesstified (feat. Aldtric Johnson): Only 'Godly Sex' is Good Sex (January 15, 2019)

Jack's Law of Red Pill Awareness

Jack · 30 March 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In a nutshell: Women are trouble! Choose wisely and maintain Frame.

Readership: All

Today, I made the mistake of perusing that blog, "One in the bush is worth two in the hand", or some such name like that. Every time I visit this blog, I close the browser window with the impression that there are yet a lot of women who are still wishing to return to the glory years of second wave feminism (which I would place in the 1980's and 90's) – a time before the Red Pill awakening, when men were still clueless about the nature of women, chivalry was assumed, alpha studs lurked, beta orbiters abounded, no fault divorce, the widespread availability of abortion, et cetera, ad infinitum, ad nauseam…

It sends shivers down my spine to realize that these same women are probably my own generational cohorts… (!!!)

Image: Hedy Lamarr as Delilah, in Samson and Delilah (1949).

One of the whimz left the following comment.

> "Dalrock's Law of Feminism: 'Feminism is the assertion that men are evil and naturally want to harm women, followed by pleas to men to solve all of women's problems.'
>
> Question: isn't it equally true that the Red Pill is 'the assertion that women are evil and naturally want to hurt men, followed by pleas to women to solve all of men's problems'?"

After reading this, I let out a long sigh and a chuckle, because I recognize that it is an ongoing challenge for many peeps to Get It Right.

Admittedly, there is a general tendency for men to wish that women would be more introspective and more responsible in exercising personal agency, because this would solve many of men's problems in dealing with women. However, most RP men are aware that, for a woman to have this level of awareness, is a very tall order indeed.

I suppose women can intuitively sense this deficiency within intersexual transactions, and have picked up on this expectation from men, even while never realizing that it is caused by their own lack of discretion. Granted, this last statement contains a very cold and unloving assertion of the apparent 'stupidity' of females, but it is the general sentiment of men, nevertheless.

I am throwing this out there, because I have the firm conviction that a woman could vastly improve her eternal state, if she could understand with clarity how women do make this impression on men.

So here, I need to offer a correction (especially for my female readership), which I will call Jack's Law of Red Pill Awareness:

One of the many conclusions of the Red Pill is that _sexually liberated_ women are evil* and naturally want to _indulge their feminine imperatives at the expense of hurting_ men. _This should be_ followed by _admonishments_ to _men not_ to _involve themselves in_ all of _women's_ problems, _but only to establish the discipline of Frame for those females for whom they are directly responsible (i.e. wives and daughters)_.

An abbreviated version of this Law would be,

Women are trouble. Choose wisely and maintain Frame.

 I here make the claim that spiritual immaturity, commonly manifested as a lack of moral agency, is a form of latent evil, which should be considered in addition to the more notorious faculty of diabolical evil.*

Related

- Return Of Kings (feat. John Hopson): How To Spot An Angel Of Death In The Wild (January 5, 2015)
- The Orthosphere (feat. Richard Cocks): When One Sex Attacks The Other, Both Lose (November 22, 2018)

Apprehending True Humility

Jack · 6 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The word humility has two definitions. One is to be avoided at all costs, and the other is to be diligently sought.

Readership: All
Length: 2,300 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

A Description of Authentic Humility

Humility is a concept that is not well understood by most people. For those readers who are unfamiliar with the Christian concept of humility, I've compiled the following descriptions of its hallmark qualities.

- Humility is the state of being emotionally aware of your needs and weaknesses and how you depend on God and others on a moment by moment basis.
- Humility allows one to open their heart and experience love and grace.
- Humility allows one to become introspective, and examine one's own heart and motives.
- The experience of falling in love is all about humility. One's desire and affection for the other person becomes a need that the other person fulfills. One then finds himself doing all kinds of introspection, leading to personal changes, all to try to fit into this relationship better.
- If a person has humility, he/she would be more loving, forgiving, merciful and compassionate. A humble person asks him/herself, "What did I do wrong? What's my problem? What's wrong with me? What more can I do? How can I fit into this relationship better?"
- Humility makes one more emotionally expressive of one's needs to others. As a result, one is more emotionally connected to people.
- Being in a state of humility, and being more emotionally connected to others, can make one feel more vulnerable to temptation and deceit, and more likely to succumb to it.
- Humility is a key ingredient in obtaining discernment, which is a safeguard against temptation and deceit.
- Humility requires and facilitates Heart Trust.
- Humility is usually taken as a mark of honor.
- Only the humble can know God.

Girl with a Pearl Earring, by Johannes Vermeer, ca. 1665.

One important aspect of humility is that it cannot occur simultaneously with self-centered pride, which has the following characteristics.

- Pride, and it's sister, arrogance, repeals trust, and this has the effect of cutting a person off from making authentic connections with God and others.
- Pride may lead a person to believe that others are wrong, or that God is treating them harshly.
- If a person is proud and lacking humility, then he/she is prone to be less patient, more prone to anger, and more easily irritated.
- When a proud person who does not have a sense of humility is offended, he/she lashes out with anger and becomes bitter if the offense is not quickly rectified.
- Excessive pride is usually a cover for shame.

A False Concept of Humility

The first part of this essay described Humility as a spiritual posture that facilitates one's connection with God and others, according to the Christian understanding of the word. But the secular understanding of the concept focuses on, and magnifies the dichotomy between pride and humility, while neglecting the overall sentient nature and purpose of true humility, absent of pride.

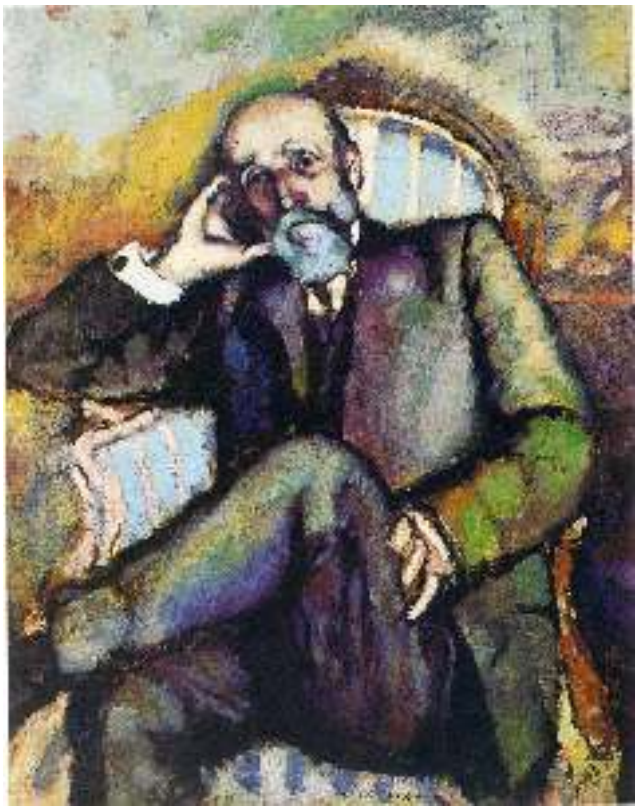
Within this vain, one noteworthy aspect of pride is that it is usually adopted by a person as a covering for shame. In this case, when such a person's pride is abased, then their shame is exposed. Since a large number of people have this skewed perspective, the common perception of humility is based on the abjection of pride and is therefore associated with shame. As a result, the concept of humility within this paradigm takes on the worldly connotation of being shamed.

As a token snapshot of this common but hollow understanding of humility, we find this blabber on Wikipedia.

> "Humility is the quality of being humble. Dictionary definitions accentuate humility as a low self-regard and sense of unworthiness. In a religious context humility can mean a recognition of self in relation to a deity

> (i.e. God) or deities, and self-debasement with subsequent submission to said deity as a member of that religion. Outside of a religious context, humility is defined as being "unselved", a liberation from consciousness of self, a form of temperance that is neither having pride (or haughtiness) nor indulging in self-deprecation.
>
> Humility is an outward expression of an appropriate inner, or self-regard, and is contrasted with humiliation which is an imposition, often external, of shame upon a person. Humility may be misappropriated as ability to suffer humiliation through self-denouncements which in itself remains focus on self rather than low self-focus.



Portrait of the Artist's Father, by Marcel DuChamp, 1910.

> Humility, in various interpretations, is widely seen as a virtue which centers on low self-preoccupation, or unwillingness to put oneself forward, so it is in many religious and philosophical traditions, it contrasts with narcissism, hubris and other forms of pride and is an idealistic and rare intrinsic construct that has an extrinsic side."

This common understanding of humility is a cheap red herring substitute for true spiritual humility. Like all other dialectics of worldly Gnosticism, it gives one the satiating sense of (supposedly) knowing what humility is, thereby instilling a false self-confidence and contentment, without giving one a clue as to the real thing.

Hence, Screwtape is glad that, through this deceptive definition containing meaningless chit chat, your wakeup call has been diverted and transformed into dozing.

Humility Correlates with the Sufferings and Sacrifices of Love

It is commonly known that "Love Hurts". But if we have a proper understanding of humility as a prime component of "being in love", and how that humility invites suffering and sacrifice, then we can begin to understand how and why Love must hurt.

In his post, Letter To Josh Harris (2019/2/3), Blair Naso explains the relation between suffering, selflessness, and humility within the context of a healthy marriage. [Emphasis mine.]

> "The purpose in marriage is not to have a great sex life. The purpose in marriage is to become a righteous person by learning how to suffer for the benefit of your spouse and children. That suffering (along with traditional, Biblical roles for husbands and wives) creates selflessness, because you are focused on what others need you to do and not on what you want, and that selflessness creates humility, and only the humble can know God. Saving sex for marriage facilitates the pair bonding that enables [humility and the experience of falling/being in love]."

Concerning this same topic, Stephanie had a really good post describing the pitfalls of pride and the value of humility, Things I Want My Daughter to Know: There's Beauty in The Valley of Humiliation (2019/2/26). I'll cite her writings, and add some of my own commentary.

> "The Valley of Humiliation in John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, is an allegory to when we go through extremely difficult seasons of being humbled. It can be from friends, but most likely the humbling or humiliation comes from people we call enemies. It might not come from a person themselves at all, however, but simply be a time or season in your life when everything seems to be going terribly wrong, or you have no direction or can't discern anymore from God which way is right to take. Often it is a combination of all these things, which is what Pilgrim's Progress describes, and is a season of affliction coupled with attacks meant to humiliate. Whatever this Valley may look like at a certain time is not as important compared to the necessity of this being something you need to learn how to handle, and how to handle well."

Rahab, by Ted Seth Jacobs, ca. 1958.

Women greatly value the sentient experience of "being in love", as do most men, but staying in love requires one to continue on in the posture of humility. This is not easy! Life itself, and especially marriage, serves as a trial to see whether you will continue on in the humility of love, or resort back to pride as a form of ego preservation and self-defense.

> "May you be a lady of wisdom, who when she is rightfully humbled, realizes it and acknowledges it with grace. And may you have the wisdom to see even the slightest bit of Truth in a severely harsh rebuke or > criticism, and choose to treasure it, instead of despising the Truth."

Hard to do, but much better than the other choice; choosing to take things personally and clinging to an offended ego is the wide path to destruction.

> "I can tell you assuredly though, accepting humiliation with a graceful and humble attitude reveals a beauty in a person like nothing one usually sees in this world. It is very rare, because I believe this is the attitude that most models Christ. Everything in our world today tells you not to accept going through this Valley. That you will look foolish. But the world's "wisdom," is not God's wisdom, and it is foolish to seek to avoid these times of humbling."

It is indeed foolish, because willingly resorting to pride, and refusing to follow through in faith and humility will doubtless erode one's sense of discernment. Without discernment, one is unable to respond to a circumstance in an appropriate and purposefully effective way. Consequently, one is relegated to be either a foolish laughingstock of a believer, or else, condemned to a mediocre existence of fellowship among the wicked. That is spiritual foolishness! (Compare this to the foolishness of this world, which has much value in the eyes of God.)

> "And something you need to understand is that everyone eventually goes through a valley, or several valleys of being humbled or humiliated in all kinds of ways. No single person is allowed to avoid this pain, and it is something all of us must learn to "deal," with in wise and graceful ways."

God's love will catch you, sooner or later. If He doesn't, that would be the greatest tragedy possible in all of life.

> "You can't run away from a season of being humbled or humiliated, that only seals your fate as someone not strong enough to bear the name of Christ! It is designed this way to test your faith, to see if you're strong enough to hold steadfast to your anchor in the storms of life."

Demon Lover, by Boris Vallejo, 1979.

The test of faith – will you choose humility, love, and life? Or will you wallow in pride, anger, bitterness, and alienation?

> "Pilgrim's Progress points out that you don't have armor for your back. This means that if you flee in terror, or run away, not trusting in God's strength to pull you through (and perfect your character through humiliation), you will be attacked from behind as you are fleeing!"

Satan is eagerly waiting for you to give up and run back into his oily smooth, scaly arms, where he will whip you mercilessly with shame and regret, and lick up your tears with heartless compassion. He will then point out how God is a sinister joker, and warn you never to seek Jesus or… heh heh… twoo wuv again.

> ## Why do people usually respond wrong when going through the Valley of Humiliation?
>
> "In one word, it is their pride. Pride and arrogance are what keeps us from seeing our own flaws, or from wanting to acknowledge our own blind spots or mistakes, especially when someone has pointed them out. Doubly so if it is someone we despise. And even more so than that, if it is done in public, meant to humiliate us. But none of that takes away the true value of humiliation."

Basically, pride is not wanting to ask for what you need, or not being willing to express your need, because you don't want to depend on others, or have others depend on you. In essence, you don't want to love and be loved by others, and you are rejecting the opportunity to find love.

> "For one, [humility] serves to rid us of our pride or pretenses, if we allow it to, by acknowledging that we really aren't perfect and may even need to go through this valley at this time. If we repent of our pride, we are given grace to endure the season, and hope for what lies ahead (a better character for one thing). But when we respond in pride toward our humbling, we don't glean the benefits or blessings of learning humility, and our character is left with a glaring defect. Remember: God resists the proud, but gives grace to the humble. It is also foolish to honor an arrogant person, Paul tells us to give honor to those who deserve it because of their service and humility."
>
> "So many harmful things come from pride, because it allows us to keep moving in the wrong direction and often toward danger. Unnecessary hardships, shipwrecking of one's faith or the faith of others, and even important relationships can be destroyed when someone refuses to be humbled or accept rebuke and correction (be humiliated to a lesser or greater extent). When we go through this Valley of Humiliation, we have God's favor on our life if we keep a humble heart."
>
> "Although a person's pride may make them seem strong, their strength is in their folly, which is why the Bible constantly warns against arrogance and pride, boasting of one's sins they've gotten away with, or having a Pharisaical attitude and legalism. It is a mysterious thing that the last will become first, that the humble will receive honor (and the arrogant, dishonor), but this is the way of our Lord. It takes Strength and Humility to accept rebuke or harsh criticism, to take it in stride, learning how to correct our character for the better, and not holding on to bitterness or resentment. Resisting this Valley is only human and natural, but nothing could be further from our benefit."
>
> "Often the truly strong are the humbled people, and those who are acutely aware of their own failings and shortcomings in the flesh."

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: How does humility play into headship (and leadership)? (March 25, 2019)
- Sigma Game: The Anti-Virtue of Humility (2024/5/31)

Harbingers of the Impending Collapse of the U.S. Social Security System

Jack · 11 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Current demographic indicators (Population Growth, Age Imbalance, Life Expectancy, and Immigration) all point to the future insolvency of the U.S. Social Security System.

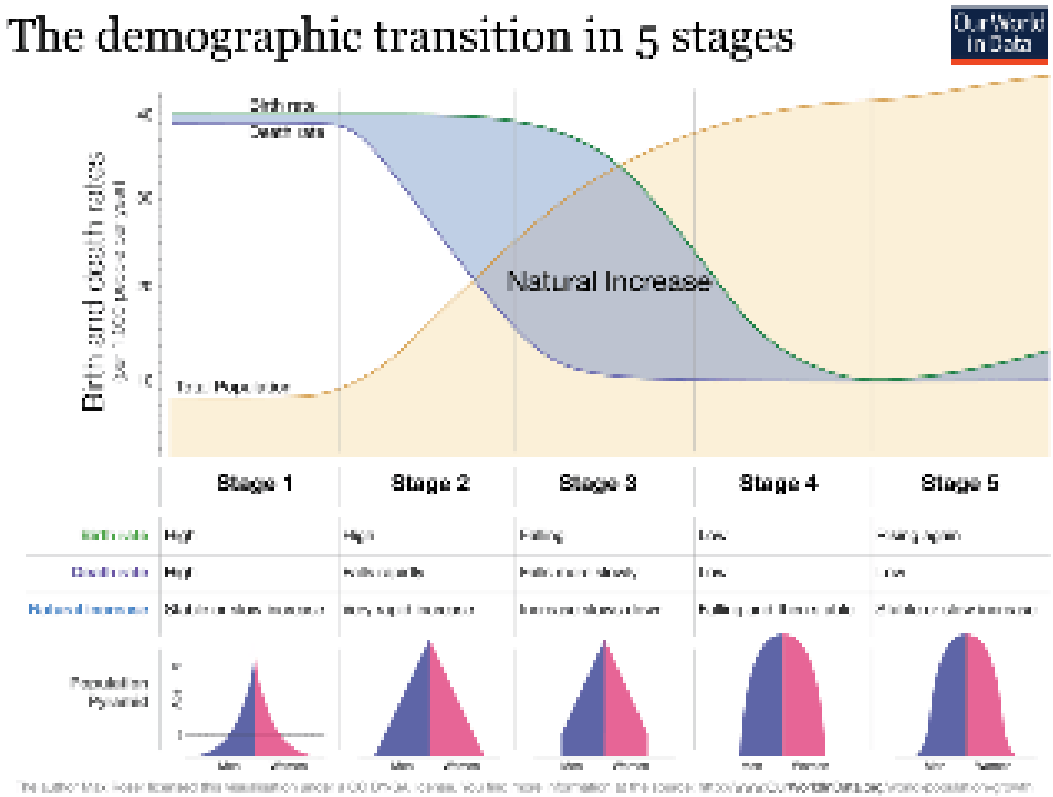
Readership: Citizens of the U.S.A., and others interested.

Population Growth

The United States population is growing at an exponential rate, due to the following factors.

- Increased life expectancy.
- Reduced infant mortality.
- Immigration

The age and demographic structure of this growing population will determine, for the most part, the future feasibility of the social security system.



The following Population Pyramid for the United States from 1980-2050 clearly shows a columnar structure, indicating an aging population. In an aging population, there are a large number of adults, including seniors, and very few children. Growth is stagnated.

[image]

Image courtesy of Image Capitalist: Animation: U.S. Population Pyramid From 1980-2050 (November 22, 2017)

If you watch the animation, you can see that the width of the column steadily increases over time, which suggests that there will always be a larger population of younger citizens who are paying the pensions of an ever growing number of elderly retirees. However, by 2050, the column becomes so top-heavy that it begins to resemble a mushroom, indicating “negative growth”. So it is unclear whether this difference will cover the debt already incurred, in addition to the skyrocketing pension costs of the ever expanding retirement age in the future. It is improbable that higher taxes, and an influx of working-age immigrants (~18%) could cover this difference.

Snapshots of the years 1980, 2000, 2020, and 2040, taken from the above Population Pyramid animation, are shown side by side here for comparison.

Age Imbalance

Goss [1] argues that the primary cause of Social Security’s increasing expenses is due to the decreasing birth rate, which results in the age imbalance shown in the current and future year population pyramids.

> “Adjusting birth rates to include only those children who survive to age 10 results in fairly flat total fertility rates near three children per woman from 1875 through 1925. From 1926 through 1965, this adjusted total fertility rate was still about 2.7 births per woman, on average, including both the temporary low-birth period of the Great Depression and World War II, and the temporary high-birth period after World War II. After 1965, however, the total fertility rate shifted to a new level around two children per woman. It is this apparently permanent shift to lower birth rates in the United States that is the principal cause of our changing age distribution between 2010 and 2030 and the resulting shift in the ratio of beneficiaries to workers.”

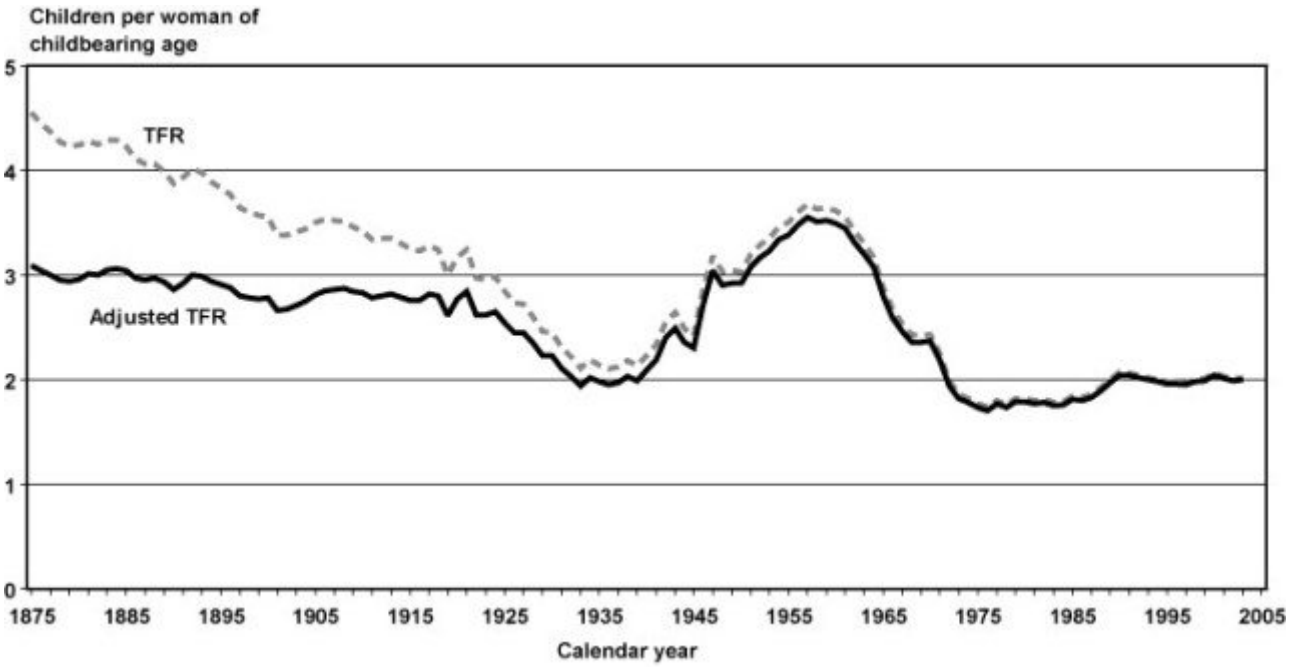

Chart 10. Total U.S. fertility rates with and without adjustment for survival to age 10, 1875–2005 [1].

> “Chart 11 demonstrates even more vividly the impact of the changes in birth rates on the age distribution of the population. The aged dependency ratio (ratio of population aged 65 or older to the population at working > ages, 20–64) has been almost flat since 1975 and was held down between 1994 and 2010 as the relatively low-birth-rate generations born during the Great Depression and World War II (1929–1945) reached age 65. However, this ratio will rise substantially between 2010 and 2030, reflecting both the attainment of age 65 by the baby boom generation (born 1946 to 1965) and entry into the working ages of low-birth-rate generations (born after 1965) that followed the baby boom. The dashed line in the chart illustrates what the projected dependency ratios would be if we assumed no further improvement in life expectancy after 2008. The chart demonstrates that through 2030, the upward shift in the ratio is almost entirely because of the changing birth rate. The illustration for the total dependency ratio (ratio of the population aged 65 or older or younger than age 20 to the population at working ages, 20–64) tells essentially the same story."

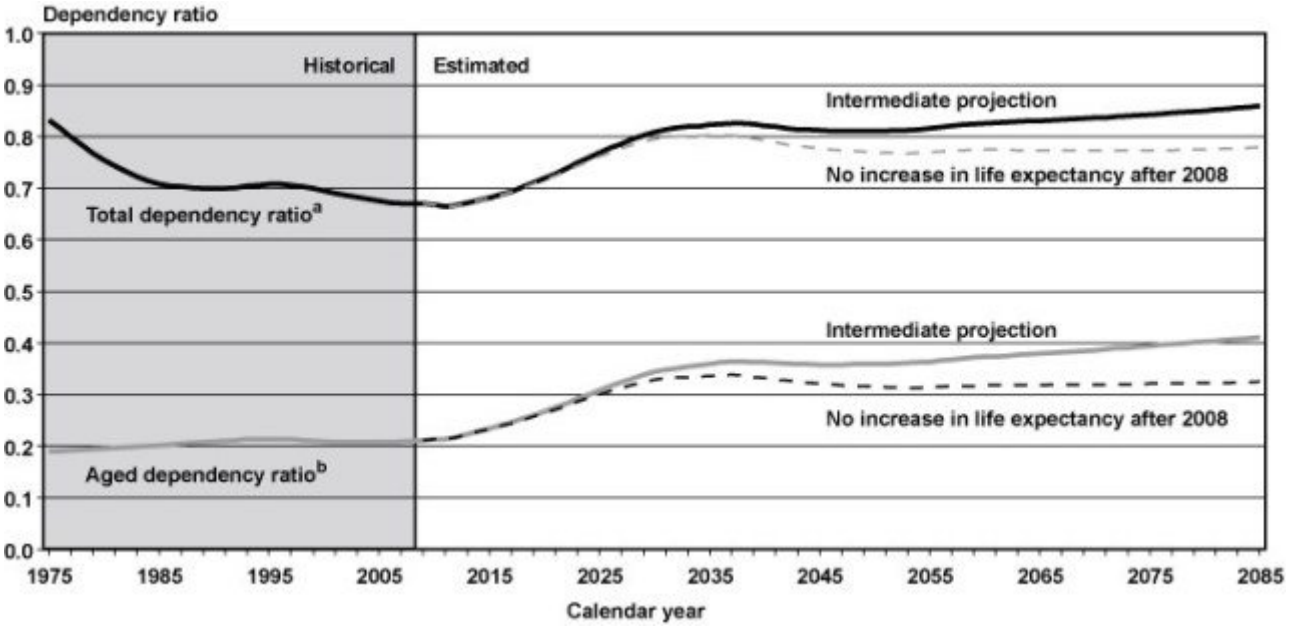

Chart 11. Total and aged dependency ratios, 1975–2008, projected under alternative life expectancy assumptions, 2009–2085 [1].

> "Chart 11 also shows that improving life expectancy after 2008 does begin to produce significant effects on the age distribution of the population after 2030. But the permanent shift in the age distribution between 2010 and 2030 because of lower birth rates remains the dominant factor for the increased Social Security program cost over the next 75 years."

Life Expectancy

In the previous section, Goss [1] argued that the primary cause of Social Security's economic crunch is due to the decreasing birth rate, and not due to the increasing average life span. Disregarding the effects of the increase in life span seemed questionable to me, so I did a little more research about the history of the social security system.

When President Franklin D. Roosevelt installed the Social Security program in 1936, it stipulated a retirement age of 65, which meant that people would have to work a regular job until that age, before they were eligible to retire with benefits.

The average life expectancy in 1936 for a working class male in America was 58! Which implies that the majority of men had to work until their dying day! These men expected to pay into the system for their whole lives, never knowing if they would ever live long enough to see a social security check.

Doing a little more math, in order to live long enough to be eligible for retirement under the social security program in 1936, a person would have to outlive the average life expectancy by 12%. So it's obvious that Roosevelt cut pension costs to affordable levels by only making payouts to < 40% of those who paid into the system, and who also outlived the age of retirement eligibility.

If we applied this same arithmetic to the current life expectancy of ~78, then to install the same "tax until death" retirement system, we would have to set the retirement age at 88! But try to suggest this idea to any person of the Boomer generation, especially those set to retire in the next few years, and you'll see the temper tantrum of the century. (I did this once, and I found it was surprisingly entertaining to see a Boomer so bent out of their typical "peace and love" character.) So naturally, no politician wishing to extend his career is going to pass a bill basing the retirement age on the average lifespan. (I suspect that Goss could be a Boomer who is doing backflips to avoid this conclusion.)

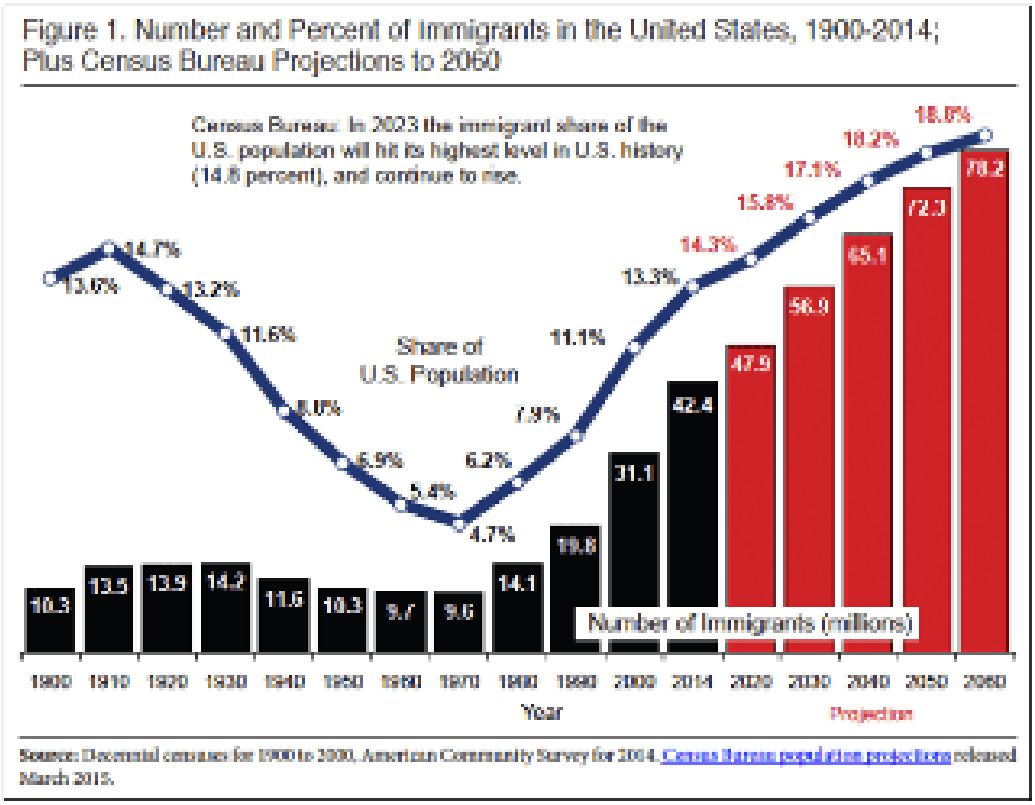
[Eds. note: Could POTUS Franklin D. Roosevelt actually have intended to get the country hooked on socialism?]

Immigration

Immigration could possibly tilt the system very hard, because immigrants don't pay into the system before arriving in the U.S. A pessimistic outcome is therefore predicted, even when given the most generous estimate, which assumes that most immigrants are legally employed, and don't collect state benefits, such as unemployment insurance.

For example, if an immigrant came to the U.S. at the age of 40, then he's only going to be contributing to the fund for 25 years, whereas, a person who grew up in the U.S. would be paying into the fund for about 40+ years. However, the same individuals will be relying on Social Security payouts and health insurance benefits after retirement, for as long as they might live. This effect could be offset, if the retirement award is prorated based on how many years they worked in the U.S., or how much money they paid into the system.

On the other hand, immigrants tend to have more children than the native population, on the average. This would cause the bottom of the population pyramid to widen, which would provide a larger working class, and more taxable income to prop up pensions in the following 20 years.



The graphic results of the Hart-Celler Immigration Act of 1965.

Possible Solutions

There are two real solutions to the impending financial crisis.

1. Raise taxes, socialize everything, and continue enjoying the decline.
2. Work longer, have more children, and restart a new society.

It appears obvious that the Deep State is pushing the U.S. towards the first outcome. The Globalist powers in Europe have already advanced this agenda past recovery in France, Sweden, and probably Britain too.

If you are in favor of such a system, then there are practically no actions that need to be taken. Simply avoid getting married, don't have children, and continue to vote Democratic.

But the message to conservatives in the U.S. who wish to avoid a socialist state determined future is pretty grim. There are a number of actionable steps that are needed, and none of them are easy.

- The traditional middle-class, nuclear family structure needs to be resurrected.
- Extend the retirement age.

Politicians will talk out of their @$$ə$, saying whatever will pander to the peace and get them reelected. American citizens need to tell politicians what they want in no uncertain terms.

What should the government be doing?

- Offer incentives for natives to have more children, such as tax breaks, and retirement options.
- Abortion could be more closely regulated by imposing restrictions on late term procedures. At the extreme, banning abortion "on-demand" may force an increase in the birth rate.
- Limit and/or regulate immigration to remain less than 10%.
- Government funded benefits could be prorated per individual, based on how many years a person has worked in the U.S., or how much money a person paid into the system.

- Restrict or abolish benefits offered to non-tax-paying citizens and non-citizens.

Conclusions

It would be difficult to crunch the numbers any further, to wring out exactly how much debt the present Social Security system would incur, if continued into the coming decades, but it looks pretty grim.

If nothing is done to correct this trajectory, then when Millennials and Zyklons retire, they may be facing ϟocialism ϟecurity (ϟϟ death camps).

But perhaps this is exactly what our Deep State Boomer politicians have intended!

References

[1] Stephen C. Goss, "The Future Financial Status of the Social Security Program", Social Security Bulletin, Vol. 70, No. 3, 2010.

Related

- Boxer (feat. Derek L. Ramsey): The Consequences of Feminism (March 17, 2018)
- Boxer (feat. Derek L. Ramsey): Does Marriage Keep Society Afloat? (April 11, 2019)
- Do What's Right: Economists Ruin Everything (April 11, 2019)

Jack's Law of Feminism

Jack · 12 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A summary of the Manosphere's formal definitions of Feminism.

Readership: Men
Theme:
Length: 750 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Intro

In his post, One Hundred Years of Men's Rights Have Come To Nothing (2019/4/12), Ballista emphasized the necessity of properly defining Feminism.

> "Feminism is ultimately ill-defined to the point that anyone that seeks to be against it always fails. A proper solution to a problem always begins with an accurate definition.
>
> […]
>
> Yet few will come up with an accurate definition or an effective solution, nor will support the actions required to enact an effective solution. Therefore, the problem will never be dealt with."

Concepts of Feminism

A long while ago, 1988 to be exact, radio talk show host Rush Limbaugh introduced his 35 Undeniable Truths of Life, scandalous at the time, including this one, #24 on the list:*

Rush Limbaugh's Theorem of Feminism (ca. 1987):

> "Feminism was established so as to allow unattractive women access to the mainstream of society."

At that time, people pooh-poohed this and dismissed him as being insensitive and inciting shock sensationalism to boost his ratings. Now, we know he was entirely right. Nowadays, we would rephrase this to say that Feminism admits lazy, hypoagentic, ugly women on Easy Mode to the (non-sexual) attention-getting phase of power and control without trying.*

Over the years since then, Manospherians have been kicking around descriptors to grab a better handle on Feminism.

Chateau Heartiste's Definition of Feminism (ca. 2013/11/12):

> "The goal of feminism is to remove all constraints on female sexuality and behavior and to maximally restrict and punish the exercise of male sexuality and behavior."

Putting evo-psyche aside, Christianity and Masculinity cut to the chase with this breakthrough claim.

Deep Strength's Law of Feminism (2016/2/18):

> "Feminism is the promotion and glorification of rebellion."

Dalrock broke new ground with his formalized definition of Feminism which captures the essential flavor of Feminism in modern Western society.

Dalrock's Law of Feminism (2018/9/6):

> "Feminism is the assertion that men are evil and naturally want to harm women, followed by pleas to men to solve all of women's problems."

The second clause of Dalrock's Law of Feminism is essentially a subtle assertion that women are subject to the authority of men. There is the expectation, shared by both sexes, that the health of the relationship is dependent on the behavior of the other. But this is a legalistic approach, which fails to implement God's grace for the regeneration of the relationship.

Boxer's Definitions of Feminism (2019/1/18):

> 1. A conspiracy against all men and all nations, to offload the individual and collective responsibility for female misbehavior onto men.
> 2. An ideology (see Marx) which promotes a false state-of-affairs between men and their material conditions, furthering the support of women at the expense of man and his brothers.

Heidi's Corollaries (after Boxer)

> 1. "Feminism" has no meaning corresponding to reality; it's simply a rhetorical tool.
> 2. "…if you're a feminist, then you must naturally support the #MeToo movement, abortion, and exterminating 90% of the male population and keeping the remaining 10% caged up to be used as studs when needed. If you don't support all that, then you're not a feminist, and what you really want is for women to be treated like dirt!"

Jack's Law of Feminism (2019/1/18):

> "Feminism is the assertion and justification of women's rejection of male authority in favor of an institutionalized social ontology which is dictated by the Feminine Imperative."

In summary, the panel has reached a consensus on the Law of Feminism as a working definition, and it's not looking holy.

Derek's Law of Feminism (2019/10/1):

> "The best definition most consistent across all flavors of feminism is the promotion of gender inequality favoring women, that is, female supremacy."

In effect, it is a rebellion which seeks to invert the natural, God ordained hierarchy of authority. This hearkens back to the Sin of Eve, which has been covered in an excellent essay by L.T. Smash on Return of Kings, Men Have Foolishly Ignored The Warning In The Book Of Genesis (2018/9/26) [Archive].

Any feminist who disagrees with the above definitions is only seeking to evade the exposé of sin and shame that would result from being so eloquently pigeonholed. We can expect this kind of response, and we should always be prepared to respond.

* H/T: Surfdumb

Related

- Alpha Game: The Accidental Imperative (2012/12/27)
- Σ Frame: Jack's Law of Red Pill Awareness (2019/3/30)
- Boxer: The Definition of Feminism (2019/9/21)
- The Rational Male: The Feminine Imperative (Category)
- Wikipedia: Godwin's Law

The Trust Factor

Jack · 17 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Trust is indispensable when activizing a woman. Yet, there are two kinds of trust. Which one are you pursuing?

Readership: All

Two Kinds of Trust

Human beings are naturally inclined to trust.

When trust is present, there can be a similitude of a relationship.

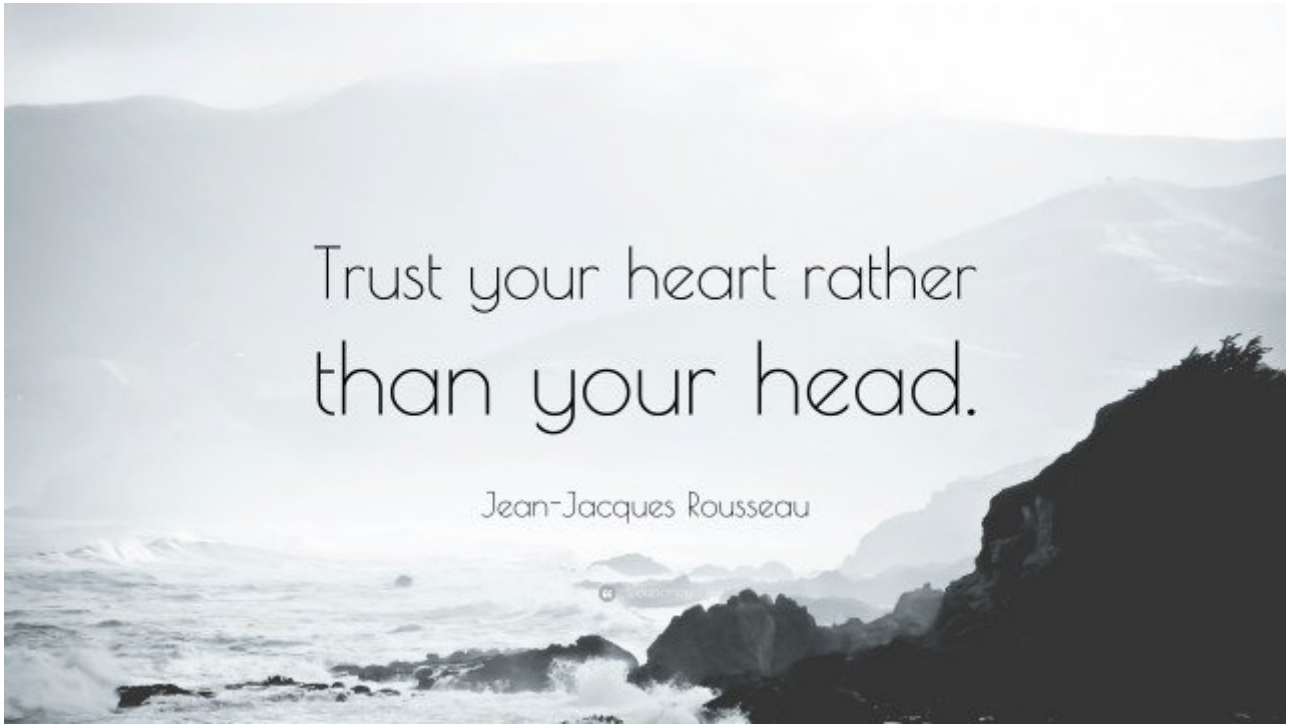
When trust is broken, then fear, anger, and retaliation result.

Whenever confusion and suspicion are present, trust is unable to form.

In sum, trusting is a monumental importance that carries potentially catastrophic consequences.

Our experience in life teaches us whether to accept or deny that uncertainty, usually in view of mitigating risk and maximizing Spiritual Efficiency.

Unfarcimoniously, I would go so far as to say there are two kinds of trust, and one of them is not in the dictionary. Neither is the first word in the last sentence, but you know exactly what it means – that's trust.



The first kind of trust is in the head. It's when you believe the person will do what they said they would do, or what you expect them to do. Contracts and business agreements rely on this kind of trust.

The second kind of trust is in the heart. It's when you can feel free to be yourself, and "let it all hang out", knowing that the other person will understand your intended meaning, accept your foibles, and extend the grace necessary to glorify your contributed value, whatever that might be.

InteresTingly, these two kinds of trust are rather mutually exclusive. You either have one or the other, and it's very rare, if not impossible, to have both simultaneously.

Head Trust

When a woman has Head Trust in a man, the Manosphere labels this as her being in “transactional mode”. Operating with a woman in transactional mode is known as a Beta trait, but is actually more common among Deltas.

When a woman places Head Trust in a man, the Fitness Testing (AKA S#!t Testing) emerges. There will be no end to the contention until she finds his limits and pushes his buttons. He’s the pack mule, and she’s the driver. The quarreling with only end when she has attained full unconditional control over her domesticated beast of burden, and he has submitted himself, meek and mild, to her authority as the gatekeeper of his hard earned sexual release.

Meanwhile, Ms. Home Grown Hypergamy will be on the secret lookout for Mr. Wild Alpha Beast who can naturally draw her Heart Trust out of her vile pussycat thighs.

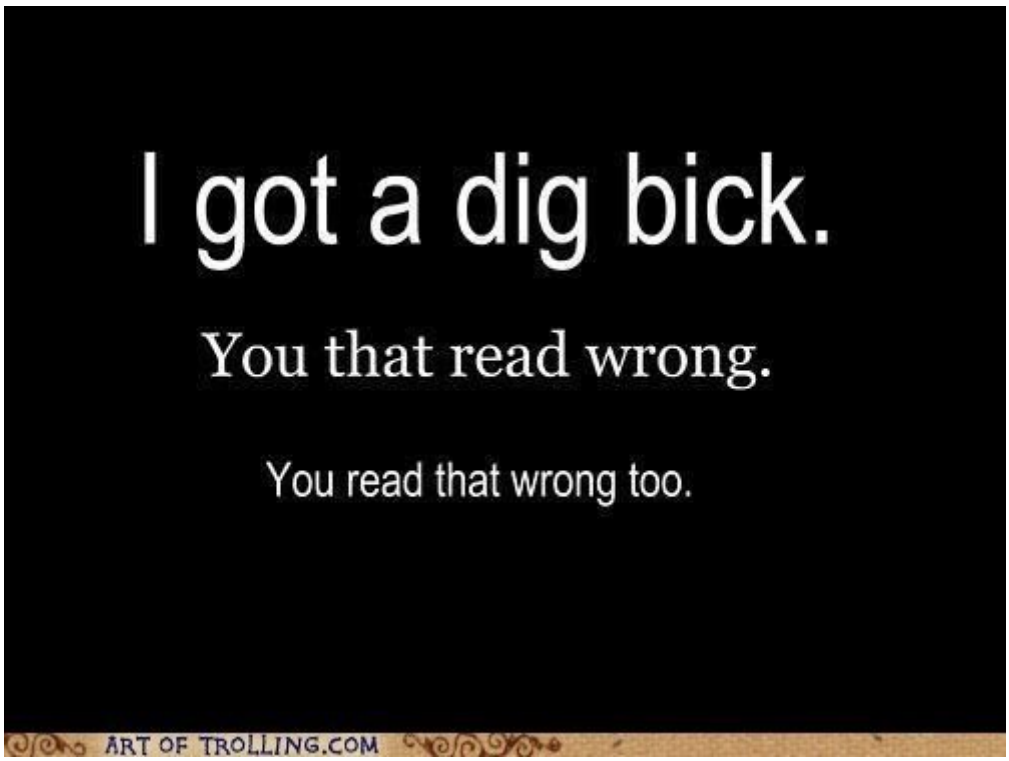
S#!t Testing happens, partly because her fallen nature of rebelling against male authority rears its ugly head, and partly because she needs to know the exact limit of that Head Trust. Knowing the limitations of a man’s capability determines the level of Head Trust that is appropriate. Going beyond this level of Trust would be foolish (in her view). This is why Fitness Testing becomes a top priority to her.

The pliability and accessibility that the man displays during Fitness Testing will determine the limits of her control over the relationship. A woman can wield more control over a man who is obsequiously “Nice” and reliably predictable (viz. he has a high Head Trust rating). But a man who exercises limits and boundaries, and who Pushes the Line (viz. his *Head Trust*worthiness is inscrutable) is difficult to subjugate.

It follows that guys who play “Nice Guy” tactics are presumptuously vying for the Head Trust relational structure. If the man proves to be totally predictable and dependable, then she can place a large amount of Head Trust in him.

Most guys naturally think this kind of altruism would improve the relationship. However, most females will utilize the dependable man’s predictability to attain dominance in the relationship. She might even call him boring, all the while entertaining herself by jerking him around.

The Courtly Love model of Chivalry also falls into the Head Trust category. In this case, there are necessarily a lot of romantic feelings (AKA sexual “thirst”) on the man’s part, which naturally increase his devotion to prove himself worthy of her Head Trust. This in turn, motivates him to provide accessibility of resources to the woman. Her confidence in his reliability feeds her self-indulgence, buttresses her ego, breeds her addiction to choice, and infuses the euphoria of power. The resulting synergy of deferential male lust and female empowerment is often falsely labeled as “love”.



Heart Trust

When a woman has Heart Trust in a man, the Manosphere labels this as “affirmation mode”. Having the ability to continually operate with a woman in affirmation mode is an Alpha quality.

When a woman places Heart Trust in a man, the Tingles percolate. She’s always short of breath and walks around with her headlights on. Heart Trust is an aphrodisiac. This is because Heart Trust opens up the heart. It brings a person to life. It encourages faith and confidence. It breaks down psychological walls. It overrules egotistical Pride. It defuses defense mechanisms. It inspires respect. It affirms hope. It opens the eyes of the Soul.

This is partly because his purposes in life are independent of the outcome of his relationship with her, and partly because the man can handle all her S#!t with a fair degree of finesse. As a result, she knows there is no limit to that Heart Trust.

Interestingly, the boundaries presented by the man’s Frame serve to remove the boundaries that trap the woman in her own self-constructed solipsistic ɦəll. These boundaries will determine her sense of security in the relationship. How tight or loose that boundary needs to be, is dependent on the individuals involved.

It follows that the Bad@ss who sticks to Jerkboy’s will to power are presumptuously vying for the Heart Trust relational structure. If the man proves to be assiduously impervious to whatever she deems as a weakness, then she can place a large amount of Heart Trust in him.

Most guys naturally think this hardcore spline-fit would destroy the relationship. However, most females will intuitively grasp onto the steadfast man’s Frame to secure a position of boundless passion for the relationship. She’ll willingly submit herself to be his spritely play toy, all the while entertaining herself with notions of love and romance.

The Tingly Respect model of courtship also falls into the Heart Trust category. In this case, there are necessarily a lot of romantic feelings (AKA sexual “thirst”) on the woman’s part, which naturally increase her devotion to prove herself worthy of his Head Trust. This in turn, motivates her to provide emotional accessibility and service to the man. His confidence in her faithfulness feeds his self-esteem, buttresses his ego, breeds his confidence, and engages the efficacy of his power. The resulting synergy of deferential female desire and male empowerment is the “true love” described by fairy tales of yore, and is the garden variety topics of modern romance novels (AKA female pornography) – a consummation devoutly yearned for by females everywhere.

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: The issue with Leadership is Trust (February 3, 2018)
- Do What's Right: The necessity of Trust (February 22, 2019)
- Σ Frame: 2 Frames of Reference for Identifying the Trust Factor (April 23, 2019)
- Σ Frame: Creating and Maintaining Heart Trust (April 28, 2019)

2 Frames of Reference for Identifying the Trust Factor

Jack · 22 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Not all women offer the preferred brand of trust. Can you identify the difference between Head Trust and Heart Trust?

Readership: All

The Confusion Surrounding Trust

In a previous post, The Trust Factor (April 18, 2019), we examined two kinds of trust, Head Trust, and Heart Trust, with the latter one being the favored condition, by far.

But for many men, this choice is not easily discerned. When a man is dealing with a woman, no matter whether the woman is into Head Trust or Heart Trust, she will give him S#!t either way. No S#!t, Sherlock!

With Head Trust, she's giving him S#!t tests, and with Heart Trust, she's giving him authentic S#!t. So since the S#!t is all the same either way, how does a man know if a woman is giving him Head Trust or Heart Trust? Since the state of Trust determines the longitudinal nature and outcome of the relationship, it is crucial for the man to know the answer to this question – before the S#!t hits the fan.

No Resting B!tch Face here! That's the look of the post-Sorority, pre-Wall indignance! The way she is looking at that ring says it all – she loves the affirmation, but hates the source — all at the same time. NRFS!

So here we'll cover two Frames of reference containing perceptible indicators of the type of Trust she's inclined to offer.

1. The Quality of the Source

It is common knowledge around the Manosphere that men strongly prefer to have a woman who is young, emotionally fresh, humble, and trusting, especially for marriage. One of the many reasons for this, is that such a woman can develop Heart Trust in a man very easily.

On the other hand, if a woman is selfish, rude, immature, vapid, flaky, dispassionate, proud, chronically angry, or a social media wh0re, then she doesn't have the ability to accommodate a man as the focus of her Heart Trust.

If she has had a lot of sexual experiences with different men, then this gives her the carnal knowledge that reinforces her propensity to rely on Head Trust. Too much reliance on Head Trust, and an inability to develop Heart Trust (AKA being jaded), ruins a woman's desirability and worthiness for a LTR or marriage.

Even if she's sincerely seeking authentic Heart Trust, but she's excessively immature, then Heart Trust will not manifest appropriately. In this case, she'll rip apart everything good in your relationship, looking for something her heart craves, but which remains elusive to her. She can't understand how her self-centered attempts to satisfy her desperate need for love are rocking the boat until it capsizes.

Women like this need Jesus, because they have a deeper hunger in the soul which can never be satisfied through a relationship with a man.

If you are in a "Missionary Marriage" like this, the rewards may be great, but the work to get there will be long and exhausting. Proceed at your own risk, and with much prayer and discretion.

If you're not already married to Miss Problemette, then keep your distance and let God do His work in her first. If you get involved with her before then, you will certainly be used by her to shoulder her world of hurt and suffering, and found wanting in the end. If you feel "called" to get involved anyway, then that's between you and God.

In summary, if the woman is low quality, you won't get much Heart Trust out of her, and Head Games and salty S#!t will be conspicuously imminent.

Of interest, the following articles describe many more identifying features of low quality women.

- Σ Frame (feat. Deti): 16 Qualities of a Repulsive Woman (December 4, 2017).
- Major League Dating (feat. Marc Summers): 19 Types of Women to Avoid Dating (ca. 2018)
- Bad Ass Young Men: 8 Clever and Easy Ways to Judge a Woman's Character (ca. 2019)
- The Power Moves (feat. Lucio Buffalmano): 17 Early Signs She's a Low Quality Woman (ca. 2019)

She's alive and kicking! This is the kind of gaze you should be receiving from your girl.

2. Her State of Humility

Another powerful way to determine the sincerity of the woman is in gauging how humble she is within your interaction. Humility is perhaps the single most important quality that a woman could have, in terms of building a LTR. This is true because humility requires and facilitates Heart Trust.

The qualities of true humility (as opposed to the shame resulting from the debasement of pride) were described in a previous post, Apprehending True Humility (April 7, 2019). Relevant aspects are listed here.

- Humility is the state of being emotionally aware of your needs and weaknesses and how you depend on God and others on a moment by moment basis.
- Humility allows one to become introspective, and examine one's own heart and motives. A humble person asks him/herself, "What did I do wrong? What's my problem? What's wrong with me? What more can I do? How can I fit into this relationship better?"
- If a person has humility, he/she would be more loving, forgiving, merciful and compassionate.
- Humility makes one more emotionally expressive of one's needs to others. As a result, one is more emotionally connected to people.
- Humility allows one to open their heart and experience love and grace.
- The experience of falling in love is all about humility. One's desire and affection for the other person becomes a need that the other person fulfills. One then finds himself doing all kinds of introspection, leading to personal changes, all to try to fit into this relationship better.

Humility is also a hallmark of spiritual maturity, which is an indispensable foundation of a LTR.

If your girl displays these characteristics of humility, the chances are good that you've got a keeper! (Or at least one that will keep you.)

Conclusions

In sum, if she thinks you're the studliest cock of the walk, if she is doing back flips to make the relationship work, if she is bending down and swallowing the last morsel of the Humble Pie you're feeding her – and doing it all with a bright-eyed, eager, and thankful puppy dog smile (like the one on the Asian babe pictured above) – then rest assured, you're enjoying the blessings of her Heart Trust, and you should do whatever you can to cherish her whole-hearted Love, and keep her head spinning around.

On the other hand, if she thinks you're the lickyest doodle of the town, if she wants you to do back flips to make the relationship work, if she is dragging you down, Gaslighting you, and force feeding you the contentions of her double mindedness – and threatening to withhold sex or leave you if you don't roll over on her command – then verum non indicavit, you're suffering from the curse of her Head Trust.* If you're single, you should do whatever you can to avoid this hazing ceremony in the Rush to ɦəllenization. If you're already married to a battle axe, then your task is to break down her addiction to hard power and virtual fixes.

Unfortunately, women don't come with an autonomous error correcting algorithm installed in their set of firmware. As a consequence, women don't naturally grow into high quality specimens of femininity. They need to be led and taught to be so. If her father didn't do the work of moulding her into a proper lady, then that duty falls to you, bud.

Of note, some women certainly hold more promise of potential than others. The following articles describe many more identifying features of diamonds in the rough.

- The Rational Male: Quality Women (March 19, 2013)
- Illimitable Men: Women of Substance are Made, Not Born (March 21, 2014)
- Return of Kings (feat. Jack Goldstein): Feed a Western Woman the Red Pill (November 22, 2014)
- Σ Frame: 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (December 1, 2017)

 Exceptions may apply in the case of extreme immaturity, as described above, under section* 1. The Quality of the Source.

Related

- Σ Frame: Creating and Maintaining Heart Trust (April 28, 2019)

Creating and Maintaining Heart Trust

Jack · 28 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Trust is an indispensable part of forming and continuing a relationship. But the expression of trust undergoes a metamorphosis as the relationship matures.

Readership: All

A previous post, The Trust Factor (April 18, 2019), covered the definitions and differences between two kinds of trust, Head Trust and Heart Trust. Readers who are unfamiliar with this distinction may want to read this essay first before proceeding.

Disclaimer: The following essay focuses mostly on how a man can build up a woman's Heart Trust in himself. But a woman should be focused on how she can be so loyal and emotionally stable that she could prove herself true to her man's Head Trust in herself. Thus, whenever a man is vetting a woman for a LTR, not only should he pay attention to the extraction of her Heart Trust, but he should also consider how much Head Trust he can realistically place in her.

The Importance of Developing Trust

Chris Shepherd describes attraction in women as "The feeling of being desired by a powerful man she can trust". He goes on to describe how that brand of Heart Trust can override a woman's hypergamous inclinations to branch swing to a higher status man. Thus, Heart Trust inspires faithfulness in the carnal sense of the word.

Troy Francis wrote a noteworthy article on ROK, Why Is Day Game Such A Grind? (October 4, 2017). The answer to the titular question is that initiating an interaction with a random person puts one at a severe disadvantage in building trust. Thus, he uses over half the text detailing the importance of establishing a girl's trust in him… as a PUA!

> The reason day game can provide little tangible benefit for hours of work is simple: it all comes down to lack of trust. In fact, a lack of trust is built into the day game model itself. Put simply, day game requires you to walk up to a woman you have never met before, in a totally random context, talk to her for a few moments, and hope to seduce her as a result. When put like this, is it any wonder that social circle and even night game tend to produce faster and more prolific results? The act of cold approach in the day time is socially unusual and a big ask for girls to go along with.

Conditions for Trust

British journalist and author Ian Leslie… has written a number of books including Born Liars on the subject on lying in the 'post-truth' era. […] Leslie wanted to talk to us about what he termed the necessary 'conditions for trust'. These could apply to advertising, but equally to friendship, business, diplomacy between nations, and everything else in between. The conditions he named are:

- Time
- Consistency
- Ritual

What does this mean when we think about it from an interpersonal perspective? Well, if you spend a lot of time with someone, if they are consistent with you in terms of their contact, and indeed, if seeing them becomes a ritual for you, then you are much more likely to feel truth in them, than if any one of these conditions doesn't apply.

Perhaps unsurprisingly, this is also true when we apply it to intergender dynamics…

… the girls I got into bed were largely from social circle and night game. [They] trusted me more because I met the three necessary conditions. I had naturally spent more time with them than the girls from day game. I was consistent in seeing them (for example, a couple were girls from work who I saw every day). And there was ritual involved in our meeting—for example, one of the girls I would meet for secret cups of coffee in the canteen every day at 4pm.

“Pssst! Let me tell you a secret…”

> ## Trust is Super Important
>
> In game, we get so hung up on attraction, attraction, attraction, that we tend to forget about trust (or comfort). I’m not talking here about trust in a blue-pill, hands-around-the-world, kumbaya-type way, but on a very base level she’s got to trust that you are a normal guy who isn’t going to turn psycho on her, or stalk her, or whatever. And of course, that is far easier when you are someone she sees regularly.
>
> This, as I’ve argued before, is the principal problem with day game — it’s often not grounded enough. It looks too player-ish and contrived. That’s why even when you get a phone number there’s a good chance it will flake [sic]. When she’s gone home and had time to think there’s every chance that she (or one of her friends) will revise her opinion on the value of meeting up with you.

As mentioned before, whenever confusion and suspicion are present, trust is unable to form. And there’s a good reason why a decent woman would be hesitant to trust a PUA.

So, a PUA learns that there is no way around laying the groundwork for trust before any semblance of a relationship can bloom. But Francis is only scratching the surface.

The Challenge of Building Heart Trust

Women face the dilemma of demanding Head Trust, or else seeking Heart Trust in their relationship with a man. Most women could swing either way, but her response strongly depends on the constitution and sophistication of the man she's dealing with.

Men are taught, "a man's word is his honor", and they generally adhere to their natural bent towards logic and reason. But they make the mistake of allowing these hallmarks of masculinity to dictate their interactions with a woman. Women are naturally gifted at coopting these traits of man to their own purposes. Thus, men who naively believe that being honest, reasonable, and altruistic will increase their bonding with a woman are surprised when the woman hijacks the Head Trust, takes the driver's seat in the relationship, and then fails to appreciate his "goodness". Thus, if men do not become sufficiently self-aware of their own nature, they will continue on this path towards absconding their God given power and authority, thereby leading to the destruction of the union.

People tend to fly on autopilot, meaning that they stick with their habits and modes of thinking that they are most familiar with. People are no different when they enter into a new relationship. They may be flying high on endorphins for a few months, but when the thrill wears off and routine settles in, they will usually rebound to their old selves. However, if a man can avail of this temporary venture into the unknown during the initial phase of the relationship, and tap her open heart deep enough to establish strong bonding, he may induce sufficient changes to wean her off of the ghosts of her past. This is especially important in building the foundation of a LTR.

If she is the straight-laced, dutiful sort, then she will expect to continue under the same system. With this kind of woman, the man's challenge is in encouraging her to loosen up, teaching her to have fun with him, and exploring the other side of life.

If she is a free-wheeling, fun loving person, then the boundaries may need to be lax. The boundaries may take the form of respect, mutuality of ego fulfillment, and being practical, responsible, and reliable.

Thinking Nude, by Roy Lichtenstein, 1993.

The Slow Steady Drift into Head Trust Territory

When couples stay together for a long time, they become familiar with each other's habits. They feel like they can predict the others behavior. They come to expect certain things. As a result, the Heart Trust loses intensity, and as a comfort zone relaxation sets in, they slowly resort to Head Trust.

Without the preoccupying stimulation of the Heart, females will ramp up the Head Games and S#!t tests, if only to create some entertaining drama for themselves.

So, given Leslie's ternary recipe of Time, Consistency, and Ritual in establishing Trust, for a relationship to grow into a LTR, there are two different end games to consider.

1. Maintaining and strengthening the Heart Trust, and deepening the relationship by including elements of Head Trust.
2. Allowing Head Trust to augment naturally, while time, neglect, and attrition cause Heart Trust to slowly erode.

If you're a man who coasts along on Head Trust, and defuses her Heart Trust, then your woman will feel unfulfilled and frustrated with the relationship. Depending on her temperance, and given enough time, she'll eventually go branch swinging.

If you're with a woman who insists on the Head Trust, and refuses Heart Trust, then you may feel comfortable for the time being, but the lack of emotional vitality may come back to haunt you in the form of restlessness, or regrets arising from the endless nagging. Extended over a longer time Frame, a lack of Heart Trust will harden one's heart.

Your heart is a muscle. Use it, or lose it! No pain, no gain!

Related

- Damon Ashworth Psychology: To Trust or Not to Trust (February 5, 2019)
- Σ Frame: 2 Frames of Reference for Identifying the Trust Factor (April 23, 2019)

Moon Day Chix & Lynx – Guilt and Responsibility

Jack · 29 April 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Ten insightful articles selected from the week of April 21-27.

Readership: Men
Theme: Guilt and Responsibility.
Length: 1,550 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Every week I come across several articles of significant import, and I regret that I have no opportunity to discuss them or post links to them. Starting with this post, I will take responsibility for this omission. So, taking inspiration from Adam Piggott's Friday Hawt Chicks and Links, I here introduce Moon Day Hawt Chix & Lynx.

1. The Orthosphere (feat. J. M. Smith): In a Sorry State (April 22, 2019)

> "[…] False consciousness makes you consent to exploitation; guilt tripping makes you consent to repression. […]"
>
> "The concept also has obvious links to Freud's theory of the superego and repression. Without going into too much detail, Freud taught that guilt originates as an indefinite psychic uneasiness. He said that this "guilt feeling" is caused by renunciation or frustration of a man's instinctual drives, with the result that a sort of pressure develops in his psyche. This pressure can be reduced by a more permissive morality, but it can never be altogether eliminated, and so must be accepted as a natural byproduct of human existence.
>
> Notice how Freud turned traditional morality on its head. He tells us that guilt does not arise from the evil deeds we do, but rather from the "evil" deeds that we naturally wish to do, and yet do not do. This is Freud's reality. But over this reality, Freud says there is always the culturally-constructed appearance that guilt is caused by "evil" deeds that are done.
>
> This appearance is a guilt trip that constructs the natural byproduct we call guilt into a useful instrument of social control. […]"
>
> "There is one last thing to note about the Freudian theory of guilt. A guilt trip interprets the guilt feeling as a dread of punishment for some evil deed, but this dread surrounds the deed and does not merely follow it. This means that I feel guilty when I merely consider an evil deed, because I even then foresee the punishment that would follow if I did anything more than consider it. Thus, our guilt managers are able to paint even consideration of evil deeds with a repellant horror."

2. Red Pill Theory: How To Talk To Girls (And Get Them Attracted To You) (April 23, 2019)

> "…if you hesitate, make excuses, or experience anxiety – that indicates you are probably framing your interactions with women as platonic rather than sexual.
>
> Why?
>
> Because most men are so uncomfortable with the idea of being sexually rejected by women that they have spent their entire lives only interacting with women on a platonic level (except when a girl makes it very clear that she is interested in him).
>
> So, the resistance we feel for telling a woman we find her attractive is a reflection of our discomfort with making our interactions sexual – we believe being sexual would only lead to rejection."

I've found this to be so true. Feeling guilty because you want/need sex, and/or being ashamed of your sexuality are confidence killers.

3. Captain Capitalism: It's Not Your Job to Unpack Her Desires (April 24, 2019)

> "Like Roosh writing "Game," The Red Man Group bends over backwards to investigate, understand, and accommodate for women and women's psychology. Again, I ask, "where is the female equivalent of such accommodations to recognize and accommodate for men's psychology?"
>
> "…in nearly every case, blog, podcast, or vlog in the red pill community, men are spending inordinate amounts of time, labor, and resources trying to figure out what women want and delivering that to them. And whereas you may find that sad or degrading – all these men wasting their lives trying to "figure out women" – the truth is that is what men are programmed to desire most in life – women."
>
> "…women are unfortunately forced to choose between what their body and instincts are telling screaming at them, versus what the ENTIRE AUTHORITATIVE WORLD is demanding of them."
>
> "…when all the puffing of their feminist chests are gone, these girls sheepishly admit all they want is to get married and have children. Some will even say they don't want to go to college, but do so because their parents, teachers, and society forces them to.
>
> But what is interesting, as well as it is telling AND INSTRUCTIVE, is which side the majority of modern day women inevitably choose.
>
> Most do not exercise critical thinking and let society do the thinking for them. They choose the world feminism has bludgeoned them to choose. And since this goes against their genetic programming, they now have a life of living in denial.
>
> Living in denial has major costs and consequences, namely psychological damage. And you can see this in the contradictory (and what I can only assume to be "maddening") behaviors of women."

4. Reading Between the Life (feat. Elspeth): Jane Austen: Queen of the Romance Tropes (April 24, 2019)

> "Jane Austen's novels touch on almost every conceivable route to the altar to be found in life and literature. When you get past the familiar underlying theme of women on the cusp on spinsterhood, the story arcs offer a fair amount of variety.
>
> …Jane Austen hits all the romance tropes (and some not so romantic tropes).
>
> Pride and Prejudice (1813): Lizzy initially finds Mr. Darcy pompous, then evil, and eventually realizes that the tallest, handsomest, and richest man around is the perfect man for her."

5. Snapper TRX: Circles of Christianity (April 24, 2019)

> "…often times, a lot of Christians' "Christianity" extends only to the furthest point of their own comfort zone, at which point things become "not Christian" anymore, even if those things are biblically sound."
>
> "Rather than using the actual word of God as the foundation of the church it seems the church has decided to use feelings as its foundation and has taught both men and women to do the same with their own Christian walks. As a result, we end up with weak Christians who's understanding of the word is warped because their feelings change their understanding and obedience."

6. Blair Naso: Do Those Who Commit Suicide Go To Hell? (April 26, 2019)

> "As a child, I always spent Tuesdays at my father's house. Towards the end of eighth grade for about a month I planned on shooting myself with his gun. Every Tuesday I would hope I got home before he did, but each time he happened to come home early. […]"
>
> "For the next three months, late summer through early fall, the only reason I didn't kill myself is because I believed I would go to hell. That was it."
>
> "I had always made real, proactive efforts to build a new life surrounded by loved ones and doing meaningful work. All of that led to a deeper loneliness and lack of purpose than if I had just gotten a girl pregnant in high school.
>
> I had made real efforts to heal family bonds that had been broken from childhood, and this rarely changed anything. […]"
>
> "I don't think everyone who kills themselves goes to hell, but I would, because I know better. To kill myself would be a rejection of God. It's saying that you are going to take matters into your own hands, that you do not want whatever plan God has for your life. […]"
>
> "What trusting in Christ will do is assure you that one day all of this will seem like the most trivial concern. One day after the Final Judgment, you will look back on whatever is paralyzing your soul as though you were a child crying over his fingers pruning in the bathtub. […]"

7. Chateau Heartiste: ¡SCIENCE!: Feminism Surrenders Before The Intoxicating Alpha Male (April 26, 2019)

> "We find that greater exposure to "high-achieving" boys, as proxied by their parents' education, decreases the likelihood that girls go on to complete a bachelor's degree, substituting the latter with junior college degrees. It also affects negatively their math and science grades and, in the long term, decreases labor force participation and increases fertility."
>
> "Increases fertility". The key phrase."

8. Radix Fidem: Two Kinds of Forgiveness (April 26, 2019)

> "So the question here is to stop and discern what you really absolutely must have in order to keep peace with God. When someone in your world intrudes into that territory, you do whatever it takes to keep them away from it. The simplest measure is putting distance between you and them. If that's not possible, then you start working on other kinds of barriers that require changing their behavior. It is quite valid that this scales up to violence, simply because some people are not equipped to change themselves in some contexts. It's not based on personal pique, but whatever it takes to protect the mission, to keep giving God what He demands of you."

9. Ribbon Farm (feat. Jacob Falkovich): Predictable Identities (Series)

This series is a must read, and it's not too long or wordy.

1. Guess What's Coming (February 20, 2019)
2. Active Inference (February 27, 2019)
3. Prisoner's Dilemma (March 10, 2019)

4. Stereotypes (March 13, 2019)
5. Outgroup Homogeneity (March 20, 2019)
6. Creeps (April 3, 2019)
7. Weirdness Budget (April 24, 2019)
8. Roles People Play (April 17, 2019)
9. […]

There are a total of 27 posts in this series.

 H/T: Calculated Bravery: Idiosyncrasy Credits (April 27, 2019)*

10. Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): John Earnest Shoots Up Southern California Synagogue (April 27, 2019)

Be sure you read his manifesto.

Sasha Luss (Саша Лусс) is the chick featured this week.

Moon Day Review – The Feminine Empire

Jack · 6 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Σ Frame's review of articles selected from the week of April 28-May 4.

Readership: Men
Length: 2,350 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Last week, I decided to write a regular post to review and bookmark some noteworthy articles from the previous week. I took inspiration from Adam Piggott's Friday Hawt Chicks & Links, and I named the first post, Moon Day Chix & Lynx.

When I first posted this review, I was enthusiastic about starting a regular post on a weekly schedule. But after sitting on it for a week, I'm getting a different vibe about the title and content.

The thing that bothered me most is ripping off Adam's namesake, "Chicks and Links". It wasn't very sincere or creative on my behalf.

Adam's site currently holds the plurality of referred views for Σ Frame, so I know we share a lot of the same readership. I had no intention of "stealing Adam´s thunder from down under", but only to appeal to our readership. Even so, the title was disingenuous.

Although both Adam and I offer some valuable RP viewpoints with a similar flavor, they are very different viewpoints coming from two very different individuals. The point is, I need to develop Σ Frame according to its own personality.

In addition to this, I am guessing that the majority of my readers are in LTR's. So posting photos of chicks doesn't really fit into the spirit of this blog.

So in conclusion, I plan to continue posting a weekly review of poignant articles. But I will be changing the title, and you shouldn't count on seeing any sultry sex pots.

Now on to the review. Here are the articles selected from the week of April 28-May 4. The running theme is The Feminine Empire, with subcategories, Instagram Whores and Female Hegemony.

Instagram Whores

1. The big topic around the 'sphere last week surrounded an article published on Evie Magazine: The Rise of Instagram Prostitution (February 9, 2019). Excerpts follow.

> "Have you ever seen a group of girls sporting skimpy bikinis on a gorgeous yacht? Or that "model" who continually posts thong and hand-bra pics and is ALWAYS traveling to the most exotic (and expensive) places?
>
> I always used to wonder, "how does she have so much money?" Flights alone are expensive, not to mention her designer shoes and Celine sunglasses. Do you ever notice she never posts a photo of who she's with? There's a reason for that.
>
> Enter Instagram Prostitution."
>
> "[…] I was showing her photos of my husband (then fiancé) and talking about our relationship. She teared up and said I was doing everything right and that she wished she had a life with a guy she loved. When I asked her why she did the dinners regularly, she said, "It felt really weird at first. I try not to think about it too much because it makes me feel guilty, but it's easy money.
>
> After the girls do it for a while, the familiar men start asking for more… then a little more. Eventually, those > women make over $1,000 a night in exchange for sexual acts."

>
> "This is the most common way Instagram prostitution is initiated. Usually, a guy slides into your DMs. Apparently, the most common prospect is either a younger, attractive, middle-eastern man or an older middle-eastern man. He will ask if you're available on specific dates to come party with him or his client on a luxurious trip. The rate is high, anywhere from $2,000 – $10,000, sometimes higher. The location is generally somewhere like Dubai or Bali, where girls are flown out to party for a week with a prince. To hear more info, the contact asks you to use WhatsApp so the conversation can't be tracked. Everything is done over WhatsApp or Signal. While on the trip, guys expect much more and pay extra for sexual favors. Sometimes it's alluded to during the arrangement, sometimes it's agreed to beforehand. But in most cases, sex is just expected. Comply, or you don't get a plane ticket home…
>
> Sometimes you're asked if you're available for a local "dinner" in LA or Las Vegas. The rate can be anywhere from $2,000 – $5,000 and up a night, and sexual acts are expected. If you don't comply, the "pimp/madame" (or your contact) will freak out and not pay you anything."

[Note to Reader: New $lut tells: (1) going/went to college but does NOT have any college debt, AND (2) having well-developed, well-used accounts on Instagram, WhatsApp, Signal, etc.]

2. The Other McCain: Insta-Whores (April 30, 2019)

> "…the bottom line is, young women have discovered that Instagram provides them a platform to market their services, so to speak, in ways that are difficult for law enforcement to detect or prevent. There are men with money who represent the demand side of a market equation, and these young women — really, how does she afford that trip to Bali? — represent the supply side of the equation. […]"
>
> "One result of this phenomenon — so-called "sugar babies" vending themselves to "sugar daddies" — is widespread cynicism and distrust. College girls who become accustomed to jetting off to Miami, Palm Springs or the French Rivera for "vacations" with well-heeled clients are not likely to be impressed with their male classmates, who can't afford to spoil them in this manner. And a young man never knows whether the attractive woman with whom he's trying to strike up a conversation is secretly engaging in such commercial activity. Recall the experience of Anthony Johnson ("Hypergamy Doesn't Care," April 23) who says he discovered his ex-wife had been engaged in prostitution for years. Once you become aware that this hidden sexual marketplace exists, the awareness changes your perception of women's behavior."

3. Dalrock: Insta-Whores: Is money the real problem? (April 30, 2019)

> "But this also raises the question of what we expect young (and not so young) women to do while they delay marriage. Nearly all people are troubled by the idea of a woman marrying at 18, 19, or even in her early 20s, and most would be troubled to learn that she did so without having sex with other men first. How can she be ready to marry if she lacks "life experience"? Once married, we fear she will stay married if she no longer is happy honoring her vows.
>
> Collectively, our biggest fear isn't that our daughters will become whores, but that they won't become whores. We just tell ourselves whoring is good so long as no money changes hands."

4. Adam Piggott's commentary, Four floors of whores. (May 1, 2019) recounts the insightful testimony of an elderly John. Adam concludes,

> "We raise our womenfolk to act like whores so there should be no surprise when they dutifully stick to the script. A 76-year-old man sleeping with over 30 women with an average age of 21? Sounds like prostitution to me. Not only does our society encourage young women to go into hock for vastly overpriced and worthless > degrees, it seems that it's perfectly fine for these girls to become hookers into the bargain so as to feed their supposed education habit."

Female Hegemony

5. Gynocentrism (feat. Peter Ryan): Gynocentrism and the golden uterus – Part I (April 29, 2019)

> "All three groups make the error in reducing evolutionary success to reproductive success. There are individuals who do not want men to realise their own value, because if they did the powerbase that women rely on to control men would be challenged. As I mentioned in my article "The Gynocentric Mob And Female Superiority"[2], the gynocentric social power of women is based on cultivating an image of female superiority. Women only have power in society to the degree that men value what they have to say and what they do. The moment men question female superiority and in particular the moral superiority of women, suddenly women can be held accountable for their own behaviour."

Female superiority because Male Thirst. Lesson: Slack the desperation of your thirst by renouncing lust and then walk in freedom.

6. Black Label Logic: Of Carrots and Sticks (May 1, 2019)

> "The smoothest operators are often the men who have worked extensively in some form of liaison capacity, where their job is to get multiple organizations, with very different cultures, complex stakeholder configurations, to cooperate, while having no formal authority over the resources they are dependent on to realize the outcome. These people have their stick taken away, they do not have much of a carrot to use either, so they are purely dependent on persuasion and people management skills to get the job done.
>
> The best skill-set you could elect to include in your skill-stack is the ability to read and manage people without formal authority. You have no formal authority over the women you run game on, you also cannot outright pay them in cash, well you can but then your game is not the reason you are getting laid. Good game, is being able to get laid, without formal authority, and without paying the girl off, it's persuading her to work with you to realize an outcome that you both enjoy, and which is what you wanted to begin with."

How is this different from Servant Leadership – the husband who panders his wife for the privilege of weekly nookie?

7. Christianity and Masculinity: Women and voting (May 1, 2019)

> "Feminism happened because most men and most women wanted feminism."
>
> "Voting is just another symptom of feminism which is another way to rebel against God. Even if women never had the right to vote, we would still live in a society that actively rebels against God."

8. Dalrock: The season of singleness.(May 1, 2019)

> "We tend to think of the sexual revolution as something that happened in the past, but as the chart above shows it started in the late 1960s and is still underway.
>
> "[…] Christians who were in the middle class were theoretically faced with a conflict — which script to follow, the Christian one (which also previously was compatible with the middle class one) or the new middle class one which conflicted with the Christian one because it implied lots of fornication?
>
> Well, we know how THAT turned out, don't we? What we learned was that most American Christians, of all > stripes, were more committed middle class strivers than they were committed Christians. So when the life scripts diverged, they followed the (new) middle class life script en masse … basically kept on following the prevailing middle class life script and left the Christian one by the wayside…"

>
> Key to understanding this process is to understand that conservative Christians don't admit this is what happened. This massive shift is cloaked in denial. While the rest of society admits why women are delaying marriage, conservative Christians have declared that the trend that started in the late 1960s represents Christian women obeying God's will. The term of denial is season of singleness, and the premise is that marriage delaying Christian women are responding to God's call for them to wait for a husband. […]"

Everyone will naturally say they are "waiting", but don't you believe it. As many as 65% of Churchettes are sampling the sausage in a taste test competition, and keeping it all under wrap. What they mean to say is that they're waiting to get serious about Christianity.

Also, "season of singleness" is code for "open range mating season".

9. Selo Living (feat. Martin Erlić): The Virgin Canola Oil vs. The Chad Extra Virgin Selo Oils Olive Oil (May 3, 2019)

> "Just look around you. Why do supposedly "heart healthy" food products as such beef jerky, dark chocolate, and protein bars have Soy in them?
>
> If capital were truly interested in creating healthy, long-term customers for their goods, instead of encouraging hedonism through predatory marketing and rewarding your dopamine receptors above all else, there would simply be no reason for this abject chicanery."
>
> "Why do SO MANY food products marketed to Men incidentally have Soy in them?
>
> - Protein bars/powders
> - Beef jerkey
> - Pre-workout
> - Vitamins
>
> This is more than just economies of scale.
>
> This is MASS MANUFACTURED EFFEMINACY.
>
> Real Men are a threat to the Globalist Agenda."
>
> "Fruit oils must be cold pressed at low temperatures in order to prevent their proteins from becoming denatured, so you can be assured that if they make it to the supermarket shelf, they're mostly healthy for you (though there are still many things to watch out for).
>
> …seed oil production depends on the use of chemical solvents such as hexane, in order to extract them at all. Much of this hexane, which is a cousin chemical to benzene (a byproduct of natural gas, crude oil, and coal processing), actually makes it into the oil itself.
>
> …seed oils did not exist until about 100 years ago, because you can't extract oil from them without these specialized chemical solvents.
>
> After I discovered this myself—after I really started getting interested in fruit oils after my first olive oil harvest two years ago—I vowed to never use seed oils ever again… the best fruit oils are olive oil, avocado oil, or coconut oil, especially when first cold pressed."

Note taken: Avoid seed oils to retain a few more years of action.

10. Biblical Gender Roles: Why Christian Women Should Wear Head Coverings (May 3, 2019)

> "But I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God." ~ 1st Corinthians 11:3 (KJV):
>
> "The context of I Corinthians 11:3 is not the source of man or woman, but rather the authority structure God has created.
>
> But showing the Egalitarian argument to be faulty, we must now address the Complementarian argument. Complementarians believe in male headship but they limit it to the home and the church. They do not believe male headship over women extends to all areas of society."
>
> "The Bible tells us in Ephesians 5:24 (KJV) "Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in every thing". So, this presents a problem for Complementarians who believe women may take authority over men as long as it outside the home or church."

Man is boss at home, and wife is boss at work? It's better to resign.

They shall be saved through child bearing.

Jack · 8 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, Red Pill truths have put marriage through the ringer as a bed trap. But there is a little silhouette of hope at the end of the hallway.

Readership: All

Men shall be saved through child bearing

Matthew Cochran at The 96th Thesis wrote a highly controversial post, The Golden Rule Means Having Kids (April 18, 2019), which appeared later on The Federalist, You're Not Following The Golden Rule If You're Not Having Children (April 30, 2019).

Basically, he argues that ideally, being obedient to God requires a Christian man to put a white Cross bun in the oven.

He writes,

> "…the growing masses of people who refuse family are not being celibate. They're fornicating. They're jerking off to porn every night. They're constantly falling to temptation – the precise situation for which Paul actually commands marriage rather than celibacy."
>
> "Whether we admit it or not, the choice we face is this: Do we take the millennia of love that were poured out on us and consume every last drop until it's gone? Or do we pay it forward by continuing to pass that love along to future generations?
>
> Only one of those choices conforms to the Golden Rule. Choose wisely."

Matthew's article garnered over 400 comments, and got so much kickback that he wrote a follow up article, Answering Some Objections About the Golden Rule (May 1, 2019), which addressed some of the more egregious protestations.

Being a father myself, I tend to agree with Matthew's Thesis.

Aside from Vagina Worship, we all know how marriage domesticates men.

Perennial Poon is a Prodigious Pacifier.

That's why God gave woman two mammary glands – one for baby, and one for hubby.

Women shall be saved through child bearing

> "Nevertheless she will be saved in childbearing if they continue in faith, love, and holiness, with self-control."
> ~ 1st Timothy 2:15 (NKJV)

I've always wondered what this verse means.

Pastor Paul Carter at The Gospel Coalition explains three main interpretations of this passage.

> 1. Many Roman Catholics interpret it in an allegorical sense. Women (like men) will be saved because Mary "bore" Jesus. Thus we are all saved by the child born to the woman.
> 2. Among Protestants who tend to avoid allegorical interpretations, it is common to understand "save" in the fuller sense of the word which includes justification, sanctification and glorification and to focus in verse 15 on the sense of sanctification. Thus women are generally sanctified in the context of child rearing. Few who have had children would argue with that.
> 3. The most grammatically appealing option is to understand Paul as saying that women are "saved from deception" by properly valuing the domestic sphere. That seems to be the meaning that makes the best sense of the immediate context. Paul has just said that Eve was deceived, now he says that the daughters of Eve will be saved from deception by properly valuing the domestic sphere and continuing on in faith, love and holiness with self-control.
>
> As a Protestant, I'm always suspicious of allegorical interpretations that seem at odds with their immediate context and therefore, I tend to favour more straight forward readings of the Biblical text. While I admit the possibility and practical reality of option 2, option 3 seems to be the most common sense reading of the passage. Paul is saying that women are kept safe from deception when they embrace the roles that God gave them, when they properly value and esteem the domestic sphere and when they continue on in faith, love and self-control."

Amen, brother!

There's this passage in Malachi, indicating that God wants more decent people on the earth.

> "But did He not make them one,
> Having a remnant of the Spirit?
> And why one?
> He seeks godly offspring.
> Therefore take heed to your spirit,
> And let none deal treacherously with the wife of his youth." ~ Malachi 2:15 (NKJV)

Then I came across this article. Now science has produced an answer!

Scientific American (feat. Catherine Caruso): Pregnancy Causes Lasting Changes in a Woman's Brain (December 19, 2016)

> "A research team at Autonomous University of Barcelona, led by neuroscientist Elseline Hoekzema of Leiden University, performed brain scans on first-time mothers before and after pregnancy and found significant gray matter changes in brain regions associated with social cognition and theory of mind — the same regions that were activated when women looked at photos of their infants. These changes, which were still present two years after birth, predicted women's scores on a test of maternal attachment, and were so clear that a computer algorithm could use them to identify which women had been pregnant."

So, the brains of mothers are fundamentally different from the brains of childless women! Somehow, I'm not surprised. So what is affected?

Social cognition is a level of analysis that aims to understand social psychological phenomena by investigating the cognitive processes that underlie them. The major concerns of the approach are the processes involved in the perception, judgment, and memory of social stimuli; the effects of social and affective factors on information processing; and the behavioral and interpersonal consequences of cognitive processes.

Theory of mind (often abbreviated ToM) is the ability to attribute mental states — beliefs, intents, desires, pretending, knowledge, etc. — to oneself and others and to understand that others have beliefs, desires, intentions, and perspectives that are different from one's own.

Could motherhood be a natal blow to female solipsism?

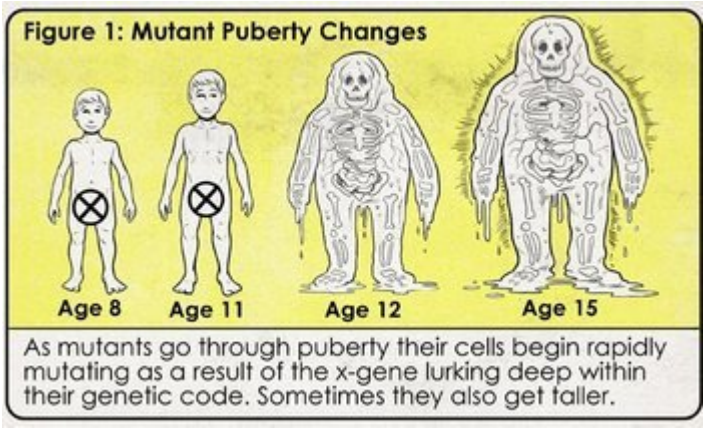
> "One of the hallmarks of pregnancy is an enormous increase in sex steroid hormones such as progesterone and estrogen, which help a woman's body prepare for carrying a child. There is only one other time when our bodies produce similarly large quantities of these hormones: puberty. Previous research has shown that during puberty these hormones cause dramatic structural and organizational changes in the brain. Throughout adolescence both boys and girls lose gray matter as the brain connections they don't need are pruned, and their brains are sculpted into their adult form. […]"

Being pregnant feels like puberty?!? Well I'll be a son of a mother!



Puberty is a period of development in which every day life comes to Life. Every petty event exudes a dramatic flair for the marvelousness of living, and decades later, one can still remember the majestic joys of common objects. Is it no wonder that our beliefs, personalities, and tastes are forever locked into the "time we came of age"?

I see a window of opportunity here to restructure a woman's mind while she is in a dependent state.

> "Hoekzema and her colleagues performed detailed anatomical brain scans on a group of women who were trying to get pregnant for the first time. The 25 women who got pregnant were rescanned soon after they gave birth; 11 of them were scanned two years after that. (For comparison, the researchers also scanned men and women who were not trying to have a child as well as first-time fathers). […]"

I was intensely interested in knowing whether women's brains changed to the same degree if they had obtained an abortion, but there was no mention of this.

> "The researchers found that the new mothers experienced gray matter reductions that lasted for at least two years after birth. This loss, however, is not necessarily a bad thing (according to Hoekzema, "the localization was quite remarkable"); it occurred in brain regions involved in social cognition, particularly in the network dedicated to theory of mind, which helps us think about what is going on in someone else's mind — regions that had the strongest response when mothers looked at photos of their infants. These brain changes could also be used to predict how mothers scored on the attachment scale. In fact, researchers were able to use a computer algorithm to identify which women were new mothers based solely on their patterns of gray matter loss. Gray matter loss was not seen in new fathers or nonparents."

In other words, it crimps and rewires their socialization processing. From an evo-psych perspective, this bashes the Hive Mind, and reformulates her focus on her new responsibilities as a mother. It might also explain why many women experience post-partum depression – they no longer have the skill and aptitude to navigate their social networks deftly enough to garner those endorphine charged perks of inclusion and affirmation (AKA Idolatry Withdrawal Syndrome).

The most important tenet of attachment theory is that an infant needs to develop a relationship with at least one primary caregiver for the child's successful social and emotional development, and in particular for learning how to effectively regulate their feelings. This bonding has a direct effect on the child's future ability to trust and empathize with others.

In case you haven't yet guessed, the term "Son of a B!tch" has real meaning.

> "It is not entirely clear why women lose gray matter during pregnancy, but Hoekzema thinks it may be because their brains are becoming more specialized in ways that will help them adapt to motherhood and respond to the needs of their babies."

Egg-sackly!

But in addition to the evo-psych explanation, their brains are also becoming more specialized in ways that will improve their worthiness from the spiritual and marital standpoints as well – becoming less selfish, less solipsistic, more emotionally attached, more humble, more empathetic, and more fresh and randy too. In short, more of what Jesus wants for her sanctification, and what baby-daddy needs to retain sanity.

> "happy, faithful, grateful, joyful, intelligent, emotionally mature, respectful, reliable, trustworthy wife = happy life"

Tom Selleck stars in Three Men and a Baby (1987).

> "They shall be saved through child bearing."

Men and women both! It all makes sense now.

Related

- The Red Quest: Two possible paths forward: Hedonistic partying vs children (March 8, 2019)
- Adam Piggott: No need to think of the children. (April 11, 2019)
- Reddit/RPChristians: Are women really "saved through child-bearing"? Yes. (ca. 2020)

Moon Day Review – A Crack in the Red Pill

Jack · 13 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The Manosphere is experiencing persecution and upheaval.

Readership: Men
Theme: There are two themes, The Red Pill and cracking the feminine mystique.
Length: 3,050 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

During the week of May 5 – May 11, 2019, there appeared a large number of insightful articles, so it was difficult to narrow them down. Some not listed here have spun off into separate posts that will appear in the near future.

1. Roissy (Chateau Heartiste) was deplatformed from WordPress.

The big news around the sphere this week was that Roissy, one of the most godless godfathers of the Manosphere, was deplatformed by WordPress on May 10. The news was covered by several articles, including the following.

- Vox Popoli: Always read the fine print (2019 May 11)
- Boxer: WordPress Censors Roissy (2019 May 11)
- InfoWars: Manosphere Blog 'Chateau Heartiste' Banned by WordPress (2019 May 13)
- Blair Naso: WordPress Has Banned Chateau Heartiste; Truth And Blogging; A Glimpse Of God (2019 May 17)
- PA Pundits: Deplatforming Free Speech (2019 May 6)

Courtesy of the WayBackMachine, here's one of my favorite CH posts from this month.

Chateau Heartiste: Science externally validates CH poon commandment VIII (2019 May 7)

Click here to see a screen shot of Roissy's last post, Corporate Conspiracy to Silence and Impoverish Political Dissidents, courtesy of Brannon1776 on Gab.*

 H/T: Western Rifle Shooter's Association: Some Might Call This A Clue (2019 May 10)
 H/T: Honeycomb@Boxer*

Adam Piggott found that Chateau Heartiste is still posting on Gab. Click here for Roissy's Gab profile. Click here for Roissy's posts on Gab.

In addition to the Chateau, I've noticed that at least three other "Red Pill" sites have folded up.

1. A King's Castle
2. Judgy Bitch
3. Red Pill Chick

…and then there were six little Red Men.

Update: A static copy of the Chateau Heartiste blog has been preserved here.

On Sunday, just out of curiosity, I tested the legitimacy of Google's search returns by searching for the string, "race to the bottom Dalrock". It returned two pages of search results in 0.31 seconds, with nary a Dalrock post in sight.

At the end of the last result was the cliché,

> "In order to show you the most relevant results, we have omitted some entries very similar to the 20 already > displayed.

>
> If you like, you can repeat the search with the omitted results included."

Sure enough, when I clicked on "omitted results", it returned 29,600 results, fully ubiquitous with Dalrock's posts.

So… Dalrock, and probably many other conservative Christian sites, are filtered out of search results. I'm expecting to see the filtering get tighter and tighter until it takes the form of a shadow ban.

The good news is that there are a couple new sites in the Manosphere. Sharkly has a new blog, Laughing at Feminism, which strikes me as the right attitude to have at this time.

Also, I'm happy to report that FreeMattPodcast has taken to blogging more regularly. You can see an introductory video of him on his About page. He seems like a great guy.

2. The 21 Convention

The second big topic was the spring 21 Convention in Orlando Florida, which finished up on May 5th. R. S. McCain wrote two feature articles on the event, both worth reading.

- Dalrock: S. McCain on the 21 Convention (2019 May 6)
- The American Spectator (feat. R. S. McCain): Red Pills and Red Hats (2019 May 6)
- The Other McCain: More Thoughts on the 'Red Pill' (2019 May 8)
- Lexet: MEN: Avoid the 21 Convention (2019 June 8)

3. Black Label Logic: Of Criticisms, Complaints and The Red Pill (2019 May 9)

Black Label Logic offers some Framework for writing Red Pill critiques of Red Pill arguments. Iron sharpening iron is a scarce commodity, so BLL's post should be required reading.

> "…the Red Pill does not have a formal hierarchy whereby people are promoted and demoted. There is only one way to climb the ladder to a position of influence, and that is your contributions to Red Pill Theory. Rollo got nicknamed "The Godfather" because he is the most prolific and influential writer in our niche, not because of starting beef with the top guys when he started writing. Every influential "Red Pill Man" is influential because of his Body of Work, regardless of which format he prefers."
>
> "If you want to make arguments about morality along the lines of:
>
> - "If all men bang hoes you are ruining Western Civ"
> - "Don't you realize that you are turning our future wives into Alpha widows"
> - "Don't you see that by telling men to put themselves first and be their own mental point of origin you are creating psychopaths" > and the likes, then you are not criticizing Red Pill theory, you are criticizing its application, and one potential set of consequences. I cannot speak for other content creators but I generally tend to view a desire to respond to such concern trolling as a sign that I've had too much to drink and should go to bed."
>

The second theme covers several insights and challenges from the female perspective.

4. The Federalist (feat. Suzanne Venker): Ladies, Stop Trying to Have Sex Like Men (May 9, 2019)

This article, which was quite satisfying to read, was reblogged by Hommunism and Larry's Musings.

> "Kerry Cohen, author of the memoir "Loose Girl," can relate. In her book, Cohen examines her promiscuous past, which included sleeping with almost 40 boys and men. "Loose Girl" analyzes in great detail all of the emotions that accompanied Cohen's sexual experiences. She reviewed the reasons why she had sex, why she chose the boys and men she did, how she felt leading up to each encounter, how she felt afterward, and what she expected to happen compared to what actually did happen. At the end of the day, what Cohen wanted was for guys to like her. "I let these men inside me, wanting to make me matter to them."
>
> It's difficult to imagine the young man Olivia slept with having bouts of bingeing and vomiting and winding up at the campus health center as a result of his time with Olivia, just as it's difficult to imagine a young man authoring a book like Cohen's. The average guy who engages in commitment-free sex doesn't ruminate over who he had sex with or why he did it—he knows why he did it.
>
> Nor will he typically have sex with a woman because he wants her to like him. Many men have sex for no other reason than it's available. "For a man, this might be a peasant trip down memory lane, counting up one's conquests," wrote Cohen. "But for a girl, it's a whole other story." A whole other story indeed."

Women are known to love "drama", so maybe the emotional roller-coaster originating from a sordid life of illicit sex is just what their feral feminine imperative is looking for.

The next article touches on a key trait of women that is too often overlooked.

5. The Red Quest: Most chicks feel anxiety and uncertainty, and most guys never realize it (2019 May 8)

> "Most chicks, when you get underneath their social surface and social armor (many guys never do), are just not very confident. Even many very beautiful women are insecure about their looks, their relationships with guys, etc. Many women really are like liquids, looking for vessels to give them shape and purpose. The better you know chicks, the more apparent this becomes.
>
> Even a lot of bitchy, unappealing behavior comes from a place of weakness, fear, and uncertainty… not a place of strength. When I have written about trying to build women up… this is what I am trying to get at. Most chicks are adrift and need a man's approval, but most guys don't recognize this dynamic and only perceive the surface level.
>
> When we laugh at or ignore shit tests, when we're non-reactive to some kinds of typical bad female behavior, when we laugh off rejection and go find a chick worthy of our attention… we are working at these deeper levels. […] I think a lot of guys who get this low, find a woman or two or three they want to be with and drop out of the conventional dating market."

This should be the end goal of a Christian young man – to figure out the Game, get down to the bottom line, and settle into a LTR or marriage with a nice girl (one absent red flags). In fact, there's nothing uniquely "Christian" about this life stage development. We see this pattern happening with PUA's and nonbelievers as well. But if this process isn't happening, then there might be a problem going on in your own heart.

> "…even a lot of very attractive chicks are insecure about their looks, bodies, and performance. Why? They are comparing themselves to chicks who are +2 or +3 above them…"
>
> "There is still a lot of sex negativity in society, so chicks are worried because they know guys want sex (just as chicks do), but chicks worry about their reputations, what will happen if they seem to like sex too much, etc. etc. Chicks compete with each other quite a bit, and many chicks are worried about what their stupid friends will think of their sexual behavior. Mature, psychologically stable chicks won't have these problems, or will > understand that they need to mute these problems, but the number of mature, psychologically stable chicks is small.

>
> So a guy who a chick heavily invests in… she really wants his validation and reassurance. That is valuable to her. Validation that she is beautiful, that she is not a slut, that she is doing good and normal things, etc. She is probably pretty uncertain about herself because she is looking "up" at the hottest/coolest/most whatever chicks (and dudes)."
>
> "A girl wants to feel like she is replaceable but simultaneously that she will not be replaced."

I am reading this word "replaceable" as meaning she experiences the grace of having a man better than what she feels she deserves, which appeals to both her humility and her hypergamy. Likewise, the "not be replaced" aspect gives her a sense of security and peace about the relationship.

> "…many [chicks] are worth trying to "build up…" but only AFTER they have invested deeply in [you]. If you try to build up a chick who has not invested in you, you are just another beta dude feeding her free and unearned resources, attention, etc."
>
> "As so often happens, there are guys talking past each other online, at different "levels" of the game or seduction process. A guy at one level, may not even PERCEIVE the other level(s) are there. This goes both ways, too. A bottom guy reading this will see women's bitchy, cold social armor and think most of this post is ridiculous. A top guy reading this post may read it and think that it's obvious to him, isn't it obvious to every guy?"
>
> "Probably my biggest transition is to let a lot of the bullshit go, to stop feeding attention to chicks who aren't going in the direction I want them to go, to accept that most chicks will say no, to focus attention on the chicks who say yes or who are on the path to saying yes. A chick who is fundamentally a "no…" needs to be chucked. A girl who is a "maybe" is where a lot of the game is."

Bottom line: If you concentrate on a girl who's seriously into you, you can get into a better courtship structure. Johnny Caustic adds,

> "At each of these stages, it rarely works well to force things too hard. She has to want it at least a little (and you have to be a man who can provide it)."
>
> "Currently I have a woman who's invested in me, and I'm guiding and shaping her and teaching her confidence. I'm not sure I'm good at it, but it's thanks to the community (and blogs like this) that I know it's important for me to learn how, and embrace an opportunity like this when it comes."

6. Adam Piggott: Things that are supposed to get girls, but don't get girls. (May 8, 2019)

Adam's article adds clarity to the importance of the social context.

> "When it comes to seduction, context matters. And women always want the guys who are in control."
>
> "But if you're at a party and making the girls laugh all night, if that's all you've got then all you're doing is setting up the guys with game who are patiently waiting for you to run out of steam."
>
> "Power, competence, confidence, they're all bound up together in game, and game is never in isolation; it is in the context of the dynamic that you wield in competition with other men. Whoever dominates the group or whoever is in the dominating group gets the girls. Because girls are looking for the best guy that they can get and they rank the men against each other."

7. Christianity and Masculinity: Teachable: one of the most critical traits in vetting a wife (2019 May 6)

> "The purpose of a husband's love for his wife is for her sanctification. It's not to placate her feelings or make her feel loved but so that she becomes more like Jesus. More often than not, this type of love will make her feel hurt or bad in the moment because it means correcting her if she's gone off track."
>
> "It is very wise that you only marry a wife who is teachable. If you marry a wife that does not respond to correction or criticism that's heaping trouble upon your own head. If they don't respond to correction or criticism, it's unlikely that they're also going to want to obey God or the Bible to respect and submit either."

The degree to which a woman is teachable depends largely on her humility, which is presumably related to our next topic…

8. Random Xpat Rantings: Why arranged marriages have less divorces (May 8, 2019)

I've had this question on the backburner of my mind for a few months, but information on this topic is sparse.

> "…the default setting that I think helps Indian's in arranged marriages be happier than people who marry out of love is this:
>
> Some people have the default setting of trying to make each other happy. To make things work out. To be on the same team. To turn conflicts into patience, understanding, humor, and a mutual exercise of "feeding the baby" of romantic attachment.
>
> I'm guessing that arranged marriages have this default setting as the assumption."
>
> "The whole point of assortative mating is to social climb. For guys this looks like trying to get the unicorn; an attractive woman who is not crazy."

I read "social climbing" to mean finding a partner who is above you, or at least better than the last, on the SSMMV scale. This is the adjunct goal of hypergamy, but truth be said, men are also on the lookout for somebody "younger, hotter, and tighter".

> "It tends to be the guys who are on the lower social rungs, the gammas and guys on the autistic spectrum, who have the most need for training in how to get girls. These are also the people who tend to be the most resistant to self-development.
>
> The guys who succeed in using red-pill and PUA technology to improve their sex lives eventually all come to the same conclusion. Getting better with women is MOSTLY about self-improvement. Very little to do with routines or scripts. It's about becoming both authentic and at the same time charismatic – not choosing charisma over honesty."
>
> And then, through much dating and interaction with women, we realize that women are also all on a social scale. Not just an attractiveness scale. It becomes apparent how common sense became common; common sense distinctions of class are accurate. There are trashy loser disorganized women, and there are trashy loser disorganized socially inept men. The dating market is about assortative mating, such that you actually have to be a decent match; you can't get a hot and kind and smart girl with scripts."

Although the author makes several good observations, he doesn't quite make it to the logical conclusion that successful "social climbing" doesn't predict marital happiness and contentment. I'm not sure if this omission was intended or not.

I believe contentment with a LTR comes more easily when people are focused on their joys, their responsibilities, and their shared life purposes, rather than dwelling on the other person's attributes and shortcomings, and ranking them as a social prize to be exploited.

But if you're young and you've never had a fresh hottie feeding you constant S#!t tests, then you might disagree. A word for the young guys, especially those with little experience; hotter always yields more contentment and less guilt too… until the thrill and novelty wears off. Be careful about marrying into that, because the elf-life of a hottie is 5-10 years at best.

9. Snapper TRX: Above Reproach (2019 May 6)

> "Many christian women bristle when asked to do something they don't want to do by their husbands, and get downright hostile when their husbands TELL them to do something. They have no problem being obedient to their bosses at work, even if those bosses are male and even if they don't like them! The curse, however, raises its ugly head when that man is their husband, and she will readily reject his authority instead of being the obedient wife she is called to be.
>
> In modern society women are pawns in a game of world domination. Instead of being "empowered" like they are told they are, women are used as tools of controlling the masses through the political system. They are easily bought off with votes for "rights for women" that include things like the right to murder their own children free of criminal prosecution, the right to steal from those who work so that they may live without having to work, the right to entrap and prosecute men for their own mistakes and nonsensical behaviors, and many others."

Women are like sheep, no matter how you look at it. It all depends on who the shepherd is.

10. The Orthosphere (feat. Alan Roebuck): Honoring Our Ancestors: The Building of the Transcontinental Railroad (May 10, 2019)

Alan's article is a historically informative, yet very pleasant, relaxing read. I had to include it here.

The True Ontology of Power

Jack · 16 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The interaction defines the relationship, not what we imagine, or desire, or try to force it to be.

Readership: All

Introduction

Power is an old subject in the sphere. But over a year ago, I identified power as a key component of intersexual relations that deserves consideration from other perspectives. Some of the most noteworthy posts on this topic include the following.

- Sigma Frame: Musings on Feminine Soft Power (October 24, 2017)
- Sigma Frame: Male and Female Power Deconstructed (October 26, 2017)
- Sigma Frame (feat. Deti): The Distinction between Feminine Soft Power and Masculine Hard Power (August 31, 2018)

Power is commonly misconstrued to be a vehicle of manipulation, or a battle between the sexes, or a competition among men.

But these expressions are not power itself. They are merely manifestations of power that reveal the true ontology to our cognitive awareness.

Case in point: You can't become an Alpha just by doing what Alpha's do. The truth of who you are is much deeper than that. Time and again, the disciples of the old PUA's have invariably come to the conclusion that you can't improve your Game results simply by memorizing lines and approaches. No, you actually have to become a better man!

Bobby "Bones" Estell and Sharna Burgess.

Miscognitions of Power

On this topic, Richard Cocks at The Orthosphere has written a nice piece about power in his essay, When One Sex Attacks The Other, Both Lose (November 22, 2018).

> "Post-modernism has a tendency to emphasize power above all else. This is partly the result of rejecting the notion of objective truth and there being a supposedly infinite number of interpretations possible with no way to select between them. This turns things into a fight for dominance rather than a search for the truth. This perverse truth-rejecting view has combined with modern feminism at times to focus on power above all else for political propagandistic purposes. […]

The rejection of truth is no coincidence, because truth must be sacrificed in the quest for power. But why must power be given such preeminent ascendancy?

> So, it is a mistake to focus on the balance of power between the sexes because it runs the risk of characterizing the lives of men and women throughout history as a power struggle and then producing a competition to see who has had it tougher. Something similar can happen when it is pointed out that the number one consideration for men, regarding the choice of a romantic partner, is female beauty and the most salient consideration for women choosing men is the man's social status and income. Men compete with each other, generating hierarchies of competence, and women then select from among the winners, typically choosing men of equal or higher status than themselves (hypergamy). Though these are important truths of which everyone should be aware, they obscure the bonds of love and dependence that actually connect the sexes."

The dual nature of being human — We all need God's sovereign love and grace, yet we judge prospective partners as if they were prize poodles at a thoroughbred competition.

> "Power is an element in all human relationships, for instance, between parents and children. If power and the abuse of power starts to predominate in this relationship, something has gone horribly wrong. The parent/child relationship should be primarily one of care, concern, love, and minimal supervision; shaping and socializing the young child, teaching him self-restraint, discipline and respect for others. Tyrannical parents exist, unfortunately, but this represents a pathological exception, not the norm."

We definitely see these struggles occurring in society, and to our own demise.

Authentic Power

Discussions on these perspectives should bring the insight that we are too easily distracted by the underlying false assumptions about power structures – namely that (1) power is always synonymous with peace and order, and (2) that power must be taken and maintained by action.

It is not to say that the entire topic of power is a red herring, but that a distinction must be made between two different types of power – the authentic Power of God versus the manipulative power of Mankind.

As an example to make my point, the age old Feminist trope concerns the false belief that Feminine power is contained in education, status, and social dominance, and that power is reinforced by legislation and court rulings favoring women, such as the Duluth model, as well as moxies and hypergamic successes. Because of their immediate and heart stinging effects, men may easily believe that these tentacles represent true vehicles of Power.

But these are all fabrications of the human desire to control uncertainty and minimize risk and responsibility — a hallmark trait of whimz especially.

While it is certainly true that many women rely on these vain stratagems to attain power over men, their power is also limited according to the ways of the world. That is to say, all these efforts undercut their God-created nature as the female sex. All such efforts do nothing to bolster their authentic, God-ordained, feminine Power, which is a different anima altogether. At best, these efforts actually detract from their genuine feminine Power. At worst, they are storing up wrath unto themselves.

Case in point: A court ordered alimony might enslave a man financially, but it will never inspire him, empower him, nor tug on his heart strings again. A woman who attacks her husband in a court of law has irrevocably betrayed him, and is therefore subsequently and permanently relegated to his S#!t List. She may win the Earthly battle with a rude stunt, but she will forfeit the Eternal war.

Malfortunately, the GlowFembo reOrder has declared a Race to the Bottom, so we must tolerate the B1ack H@nd of power for a while longer.

Conclusions

Human power frequently boils down to a zero or negative sum game, but authentic Power is expressed as positive sum.

A controlling, domineering person zaps the emotional energy of others, whereas, a truly Powerful person empowers everyone around him.

Usually, any power grabbing efforts of the feral nature only serve to undermine the trust and joy of the relationship.

Beware of a woman who jockeys for power and control in a relationship. She is not comfortable with the truth, and she is fearful of trusting male authority. Ultimately, she's not at peace with God, and will not prove to be a stable, reliable partner.

Instead of pressing and forcing reality to match desire, get in touch with the reality of the situation, and work through it to find the fulfillment of desire.

The interaction defines the relationship, not what we imagine, or desire, or try to force it to be.

True Power is determined by a relationship's ontological construction of unique identities being manifested, and less so in the motivations or behaviors of the participants.

Related

- American Dad: I am thankful for blueberry pie (November 23, 2018)

How is illicit sex related to one's spiritual state?

Jack · 22 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Sex is a natural expression of human nature, but there are certain spiritual states that sweeten the draw.

Readership: All

Disclaimer: Illicit sex (e.g. sexual promiscuity, casual sex, premarital sex, fornication, adultery, etc.) is immoral and destructive to one's overall satisfaction in marriage. This article is not intended to endorse the practice of illicit sex, but only to examine why illicit sex is so enticing, satisfying, and so prevalent in society and the church.

Background

In a previous post, Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (February 23, 2019), I made the following statement.

> "Truth be known, the only times I have ever seen women spiritually glorified is when they were having an affair, or were just about to. I've seen this so often, that now, whenever I see a woman glorified, I automatically jump to this conclusion."

As discussed in a follow up post, Hitting a glorified nerve at Patheos (March 4, 2019), Suzanne Titkemeyer at Patheos jumped on this statement and wrote…

> "This seems so wrong!
>
> So [Σ Frame is saying] if you seem happy, or glorified, or spiritually fulfilled you are either having an affair, or will have one."

Yes, it does seem wrong! This incongruency was one of the main points of that essay. But the question still stands: Why is illicit sex so enlightening?

At about the same time I wrote the first post linked above, my Pastor posed an insightful question: "How does your sex life affect your relationship with God?" He gave this question to me as a topic of introspective meditation.

Our next talk took place after I had pondered the question for a couple weeks.

My Pastor was surprised when I told him that some people feel blessed by God when they have illicit sex, including myself. In the past, I had the notion that God blessed me when I engaged in illicit sex, especially after my first wife left me.

He said he had never met anyone else who said such a thing, and so he asked me to explain.

I took a couple more weeks to think it over. After contemplating my Pastor's questions, I have a little bit more nuanced understanding of this phenomenon. I came up with a number of reasons why people engage in illicit sex, and these are contained in the remainder of this post.

Conditional States

In my life, I have put forth an impressive effort (in my opinion) to resist the temptation to fornicate. But there have been many occasions in my life as a single or divorced person in which I was not able to abstain from venery. From these experiences, I have identified a few conditions that must be met, before my faith, self-control, and will-power become insufficient for avoiding illicit sex. These include,

1. Experiencing deep bonding and love – See the next section below.
2. Feeling lonely and unloved – See the next section below.
3. Feeling respected and appreciated – There were times when I was caught unaware by an exceedingly smooth, respectful woman who patiently and cool-headedly set her crosshairs on my genetic material. Her sweet hearted diligence eventually paid off for her, leaving me with no regrets. These women were typically around my age, or a couple years older than me.
4. Intense desire coupled with spiritual degeneracy – There were a couple periods of my life in which I was sufficiently desperate that my desire took the driver's seat. Of note, a divorce will invariably do that to a person.
5. She's too hot and too easy – The woman making herself available to me was above the threshold limit of my temptation.

In my experience, whenever two or more of the above conditions were met simultaneously (with the exception of (1) and (2), which are opposing states), my willpower to resist was rescinded, and I was definitely going down for the O count. Fortunately, I'm at the age now where I can see her coming.

Feeling loved versus feeling unloved

Conditions (1) and (2) of the previous section deserve special attention. Feeing alone and unloved has been a long-running theme in my life, and those times when I felt loved were rare, unique experiences, so I believe this is the crux of the matter. I've often struggled with the question of whether illicit sex is simply raw idolatry that fills the void of feeling unloved, or if the draw of illicit sex has more to do with me experiencing unconditional love. After pondering this question for a time, due to my pastor's prodding, I realize that I've had a little of both, depending on the circumstances.

The concept of how one turns to idolatry (or worshipping false gods) to fill an urgent emotional need is well known to me and my pastor (and hopefully the reader as well), so here I'll expound on how feeling loved might expediate illicit sex.

In answer to my Pastor's inquiry, I felt blessed for many reasons, which are all concomitant.

- I felt loved, or I "fell in love". I didn't feel like I needed to do anything to maintain this, so it had the impression of being unconditional love.
- I was trusting, but I wasn't really aware of it. I just wasn't afraid that they might do something to shame me, hurt me, or betray me.
- I had an open heart. I felt emotionally and spiritually alive, and I felt God's presence, so I remember those moments very vividly.
- I was in a state of spiritual humility, because I was expressing my needs to women, and I was getting a positive response.
- I was being more of my true, authentic self.
- I'm sure I was exercising faith, but I'm not able to describe how.
- I was facing the fears which had caused me to squelch my authentic self (which impulsively does wrong things), and attempting to overcome them.
- I was learning to trust myself, especially my sexual nature. I've come to understand that this was very important for my personal growth.
- I felt confident, and I had a positive reaction from people. I felt desired by women.
- I was experiencing the immediate thrills of fulfilling my sexual desires.

When I experienced all of these together, it gave me the impression that I was blessed whenever I was engaging in illicit sex.

Conclusions

It's rather complicated (and somewhat controversial) to explain, but if one knows in one's heart that one is unconditionally loved, and can somehow feel loved and accepted on a visceral level, then this may be sufficient to overcome one's fears of guilt, shame, and punishment, and reinforce a sufficient amount of confidence, faith, and trust to expose the passionate, authentic self. Moreover, being one's authentic self will often bring out the worst in a person – that which had long been repressed by fears of censure and rejection. For many people who grew up in a religiously stifling atmosphere (like me), feeling deeply loved and genuinely accepted can become a sexual liberation blowout.

In conclusion, when I told my pastor that "illicit sex made me feel blessed", it seems that I had the correlation right, but the cause-effect relationship wrong. Having the experience of falling in love, bonding, and feeling accepted and blessed are not a direct result, or "reward", of my wrongdoing, but rather an inherent result of being humbled and opening my heart. My engagement in sexual relations was also an expression of this same state. Because of this reflexive fundamental attribution error, I was not aware of this correlation until my Pastor posed the question contained in the title of this post.

Related

- Σ Frame: Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores?(February 23, 2019)

Why is illicit sex so enticing, and so prevalent?

Jack · 25 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Sex is a natural expression of human nature, but there are many additional factors that sweeten the draw.

Readership: All

Disclaimer: Illicit sex (e.g. sexual promiscuity, casual sex, premarital sex, fornication, adultery, etc.) is immoral and destructive to one's overall satisfaction in marriage. This article is not intended to endorse the practice of illicit sex, but only to examine why illicit sex is so enticing, satisfying, and so prevalent in society and the church.

Background

My Pastor was very amused by my earlier testimony given as a response to his question, How is illicit sex related to one's spiritual state? (2019 May 22), and so he asked me another question related to the first.

He said he's working on a project in which he's trying to understand why illicit sex is such a huge problem in the church, and for people in general. He pointed out that there are two varieties of illicit sex on a sliding scale. On one end is the fleshly nature. On the other end of the spectrum is the experience of falling in love.

He drew the following figure to help visualize the dichotomy.

He posed a question for me to contemplate: On the raw copulation end of the spectrum, it's obvious that sex must be included in the relationship, because that's the point of it all. But over on the other side of the love experience, why must sex be included in the interaction?

I could easily extend this same question to myself; I kept my virginity for years while waiting to find a wife, but I never found a wife, and it was ħəll. So why did I have to start engaging in fornication before my spiritual life came alive, making me feel blessed?

I answered this question from my own personal, spiritual standpoint in my previous post, but after contemplating this question further, I've identified a large multitude of very compelling reasons that would apply to everyone.

Note: Points in blue font are uniquely dependent on one's sense of discernment, a trait arising from one's spiritual health and vitality. Thus, a lack of discernment, or a greenhorn's clumsy use of discernment, stands out as a fundamental generator of sexual indiscretion.

Biological and Phenomenological Incentives

1. Up to 30 different parts of the brain are activated during sexual stimulation, including those responsible for emotion, touch, joy, satisfaction, and memory, as well as the reward center associated with Classical Conditioning.
2. In addition to (1), there is a plethora of biological chemicals that are released during sexual stimulation. These include dopamine, endorphine, epinephrine, oxytocin… These chemicals produce an addictive high, such that once a person becomes sexually active, it is exceedingly difficult to return to a life of celibacy. For some people, it is impossible.
3. It's good to be natural! You don't have to torture yourself by refusing gratification, and then regret it later on.
4. People tend to justify their decisions, and so they seldom experience regret for having sex with anyone they willingly chose to have sex with.

Spiritual Incentives

Some of the spiritual phenomena related to illicit sex were discussed in the previous post.

1. Feeling alone and unloved often drives one to the comforting idolatry of illicit sex.
2. The effects of the Law on the sinful nature (for the new Christian, or one who is weak in faith). When you're expressly forbidden to do something, the fallen nature becomes obsessed with doing that thing.
3. There are emotional and relational rewards inherent to the act of coitus, whether it be the fulfillment of the feral desire for sex on one end of the spectrum, or on the other, the transcendental experience of being in love. These significantly satiating rewards give one the experience of Grace. That is, they do something that is morally corrupt, but they get something better than what their actions deserve. (At least for the time being.)
4. Experiencing this grace (or disgrace, for those who need their liaisons exposed before the satisfaction kicks in) may give a person the subjective impression of feeling loved by God. Note: This is not actually a result of illicit sex, but appears as a cofactor of being humbled and having a trusting, open heart.
5. Experiencing God's unconditional love and grace gives a person a sense of liberation. They feel free to be authentic, including sexual exploration and experimentation. They get the impression that they can pursue personal authenticity in the form of illicit sex and not have to face any dire consequences.
6. When a person gets closer to God, their sense of spiritual discernment will usually grow. For some people (like myself), a heightened sense of discernment subjects them to more intense temptation by making them aware of opportunities.
7. Humility is a characteristic of people who are close to God. For some people (like myself), humility makes them more emotionally expressive of their needs to others, and this can make them feel more vulnerable to temptation, and succumbing to it as well.
8. Generational curses (or in general, the curse of the Fall) may cause one to be blind to, or in denial of the spiritual consequences of illicit sex.
9. In general, people are lacking a healthy sense of Innocence and Guilt that would allow them to discern how illicit sex detracts from their spiritual vitality. Instead, people get supercharged by being proud and selfish, and they do not feel blessed through being obedient to God.

Incentives from Society

Social trends in Western societies over the last 40+ years have decreased marriage rates, and promoted hook-up culture. [3] These trends are detailed here.

1. Modern women are sexually liberated by feminism, and the church is not that much different. Theoretically, this means that 80% of the women are chasing and bedding the top 20% of men. As a result, the top 20% of men don't want to limit their opportunities by getting married, and the bottom 80% of men have no chance to marry. [1]
2. More women have an advanced education and economic independence. Improvements in the relative wage have facilitated women's independence by reducing the monetary incentive for marriage, and can account for 20% of the decline in marriage between 1980 and 2010. [2]
3. Rigged feminist-inspired laws have caused a disincentivizing of marriage for men and an incentivizing of divorce for women. [2,3]
4. Easy peasy no-fault divorce laws indoctrinate people to take their marital commitment lightly. [2]
5. The widespread sexualization of the mass media normalizes a casual view of sex.
6. Widely available hardcore porn reduces both men's and women's motivation to marry. [2]

In general, as traditional norms surrounding sexual morality have collapsed, the institution of marriage has come under intense attack, and has fallen by the wayside. This has a snowball effect of increasing the proliferation of illicit sex.

Incentives arising from the Socio-Sexual-Marriage Market Place

1. In general, people are desperate for love, and sex is the next best thing.
2. Peer pressure, especially during adolescence, can be a powerful motivation to “go all the way”.
3. Refusing to have sex puts one at a disadvantage in the Sexual Market Place.
4. Women are the so-called “Gatekeepers of sex”, not men. (A Gatekeeper is the person who possesses and controls the resources that the other person desires. Alternately, men are the “Gatekeepers of Commitment”.) All this means that sex doesn’t happen until the woman says so, and when the woman decides to have sex, the man she chooses must always comply. If a woman gives a man an invitation to bed, and he turns her down, she will never talk to that man again. In sum, most men would rather have sex than reject sex and be rejected by her in turn.
5. In modern society, there are a sufficient number of women described in (3) that now, “satisfying sex” has become a defacto prerequisite for a long-term relationship.
6. Sex is the lowest common denominator between any two people. Despite the ease and ubiquity of internet communications, it’s too difficult to find someone who shares your values and life purposes. Instead, most people are just looking for a suitable sex partner, and then they deal with the other things as they come. (No pun intended.) The internet is well suited for this purpose.

Meeting with girlfriend's family, by Tiago Hoisel.

Incentives arising from Family Expectations

1. In general, a dysfunctional family environment creates many types of contexts which provide various incentives for illicit sex. This is deserving of a separate study.
2. Most parents in east Asia (i.e. China, Japan, South Korea, Taiwan) expressly forbid their children from having a boyfriend or girlfriend until they're in their mid-to-late twenties. In Western nations, parents don't need to do this, because it's already the cultural norm. They are also urged (in Taiwan), or encouraged by various means (in the West), to postpone marriage until they've finished their academic preparation, established a career, and saved some money, which usually pushes marriage into their 30's. This social ontology cuts against the normal human sexual development. Nature dictates that young people should be marrying, having sex, and having children much earlier than this.
3. As a consequence of (1), many young people are motivated to abstain (i.e. Japan), have secret relationships (i.e. Taiwan), or ride the carnavel carousel (i.e. the West). For the Asian, the power, intrigue, and draw of a secret partnership is deeply satisfying. For the Westerner, the free spirited, fast and loose lifestyle proves to be extremely gratuitous, if not addictive. Hence, the longitudinal effects on one's soul cannot be understated.
4. The experiences described in (2) teach young people how to manage clandestine love relationships (Asian), or handle monkey branch swinging with ape-like dexterity (Western). These habits tend to become engrained, and continue on, even after marriage.
5. If Asian lovers are found out, parents or spouses usually react by joking about it, or looking the other way. In the West, people are expected not to be judgmental. So there is a lack of positive punishment for sexual indiscretions.
6. Many women in sexually liberated societies, (e.g. U.S.A., Taiwan) have had at least 3-4 partners, and an abortion or two, before they even think about settling down.

In total, the above factors undermine one's satisfaction in marriage, which is often to a different person than one's first lover. If the dissatisfaction is sufficiently profound, then an affair is likely to happen.

Problems with Opportunity, Responsible Agency, Accountability, and Impunity

There are a number of things in modern society that allow one to bypass most of the natural consequences of illicit sex. These include the following.

1. One of the main problems with exercising personal responsibility concerning sexual behavior is that people hardly ever feel guilty about any sort of sexual transgression. So this seldom leads a person to do any sort of introspection, much less come to repentance.
2. Cheap, effective and widely available contraceptives (the pill, condoms, IUD's, etc.) eliminate the chance of pregnancy. [2]
3. Abortions are cheap, safe, discretely private, and easily obtainable, and are commonly used in ~95% of the cases as a de facto form of birth control.
4. Penicillin and other antibiotics have reduced the risk and cost of contracting STD's.
5. The widespread social acceptance of sexual liberation. Slit shaming is condemned as misogynistic, so there's literally no opportunity to be held accountable for it. Even within the church, the flaccid "love and forgive" social atom-osphere broadcasts the message that illicit sex is no big deal.
6. Social media and dating websites provide women a constant stream of countless opportunities with men.
7. The proliferation of SMS and internet communications which are easy to hide and delete.

It is well known that the surety of being punished is a larger motivator for good behavior than the severity of the punishment. In total, all the above factors have eliminated both the surety and severity of any consequences related to illicit sex.

Conclusions

In light of the above factoids, we can be thankful for the small miracle that 4% of women are virgins on their wedding night!

The Boomers' wishes came true! The Sexual Revolution is HERE!

Unfortunately, women are less happy, men are foundering in porn, purposelessness, and increased suicide rates, and people are having less sex overall. That's not quite what they expected. But that's how it goes whenever you make a deal with the Devil!

References

1. Quillette: Attraction, Inequality, and the Dating Economy (2019 March 12)
2. Chateau Heartiste: The Four Sirens Of The Sexual Apocalypse (2016 March 17)
3. Dalrock: More grim news for carousellers hoping to jump at the last minute. (2012November 24)

Related

- Σ Frame: On the discernment and wisdom of true morality (2019February 2)
- Christianity and Masculinity: The Demise of Marriage: Cause and Effect (2019 May 17)

Moon Day Review – A return to normal

Jack · 27 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Articles from the Hall of Frame for the week of 2019 May 19-25.

Readership: Men
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 5.5 minutes

As you may have noticed, I had some trouble putting together the Moon Day review these past couple weeks.

The first challenge was a constraint on my time. My in-laws visited us from out of town, which proved to be a stressful experience for both me and my wife. My wife's relationship with her mother is filled with chronic anxiety, so I needed to give my wife a little extra attention and encouraging admonishments.

During this time, I also had to finish grading midterm exams and other assignments which took several days.

The third challenge was the content. I found a large number of noteworthy articles, and it was thought-provoking and time consuming to sift through them all. I couldn't do them justice by simply posting the link with a brief excerpt. Some topics were sufficiently profound that I decided to make some of them into separate posts, soon to appear in the near future. Time allowing, I may go back and compile the reviews for the last two weeks and post them with back dates.

So here are the articles from the Hall of Frame for the week of 2019 May 19-25.

1. Rob Says...: Confession to the World (2019 May 20)

> "…a little over four years ago, I committed a crime. I did something that could get me locked up for the rest of my life. In some areas of the world, it could get me executed.
>
> I have committed Murder in the First Degree.
>
> It was premeditated. I did it in cold blood. I did it without remorse as to the suffering of the individual that I killed. And I would do it again given a chance and if I had to do it again.
>
> Who did I murder, you ask?
>
> Just this guy I knew. I knew him my whole life and he was one miserable, unhappy son of a bitch. In all honesty, what I did to him shouldn't be classified as murder, if anything, I should get a medal for what I did. If anything, I should be considered a hero. I don't consider killing him as an act of brutality so much as an act of mercy. I put that motherfucker out of his misery."

Click his link to read on for the most dramatic twist of the year!

2. Desni Linkovi: Fatherhood lost: How abortion affects men (2019 May 21)

> "As astonishing as it may seem, according to the experts, fathers of aborted children often feel even worse than mothers."
>
> "If you or a man you know is suffering from the loss of a child through abortion, help and healing is available by contacting www.menandabortion.net. You can also visit www.fatherhoodforever.org."

H/T: Larry's Musings: Socio-critical links: Feminism, new world order, and abortion's effects on men (2019 May 22)

3. Amerika (feat. Johann Theron): Breaking The Feminine Ceiling (2019 May 21)

The Feminine Ceiling is defined as a collection of prominent cultural fads and false notions which prevent women from performing their best – as women.

> "Feminism denies what women do well, and therefore, sends women off on a quest for a false goal.
>
> In order to perform, a woman must recognize who she is and what she does well. The feminine ceiling is of course unseen because the current environment incentivizes and advocates the opposite, where women seek to break the glass ceiling to achieve male performance parity.
>
> This requires that they cross another kind of glass ceiling, one formed of knowledge, towards becoming proficient in jobs that fit their skillsets."

Theron finishes with a comparison of the United States and Tanzania, and a warning against integration.

4. Biblical Gender Roles: The World of the Handmaid's Tale: Not Completely Bad (2019 May 24)

Biblical Gender Roles brought to my attention one screenwriter's vision of a future reformed patriarchy. The author of BGR also analyzed the series in terms of its allegiance to Biblical principles. In sum, certain points were found wanting, but certain other aspects were right on.

I enjoyed reading this because it stretched my imagination to envision a return of the patriarchy.

5. On that same note, Sharkly wrote a brief road map about How to bring back Patriarchy (2019 May 21) – what needs to happen to get back Overton Even.

> "The respect society gives to men, in general, is regulated and set by two factors:
>
> 1. Society's beliefs about men and what they deserve.
> 2. What men have been conditioned to expect, and what they willingly endure.
>
> The second factor, what men expect and tolerate, adjusts with and is set by the first factor, which makes the first factor ultimately the determinant factor."

One addendum I would make is that the terms "male superiority" and "female inferiority" should refer to their respective places in a hierarchical structure of society, and this should not be misinterpreted as misogynistic.

Farm boy concluded in The Herd Revisited (2019 May 25),

> "So what is the cure? Rational. practical men."

6. Free Matt Podcast: Reject the Social Credit System (2019 May 21)

Mogadishu Matt's message is one that needs passed along.

> "I would like to call upon the human resource world (and our society) to reject the concept of a social credit system. It will destroy the diversity of talent. It can hurt a company's ability to make money. (Your talent pool will dry up). To sterilize the flavor of your employees is to make things dull and boring. Our everyday lives can be [better, not] worse.
>
> Don't 'unperson' the exciting elements of life. We need the spice of a different set of tastes.

> […] the public and even an oft maligned group of human resources personnel can help stem a terrible tide.
>
> Support the concept of true diversity and put value in differing opinions. Let tech companies and the world know that no one needs a "white washed" world."

7. Black Label Logic: The Empathy Key (2019 May 23)

Carl, at Black Label Logic, spells out the differences between Cognitive and Emotional Empathy. If we presume that empathy (or mercy) is a conservative and reserved form of trust, then Carl's treatise correlates strongly with my earlier post, The Trust Factor (2019 April 18), which described the differences between Head Trust and Heart Trust.

Carl also comes at this from the man's perspective, which provides both sides of the coin. This is a must read.

> "…you have to be able to not enter her frame or let her control the frame, but understand very clearly what her frame is based on cognitive empathy."
>
> "[…] This is based on being in the rather unique situation of being able to see the signal without all the associated noise. What I mean by signal and noise, is that most of us are capable of both emotional and cognitive empathy, the cognitive empathy is the signal, and our emotional empathy is the noise. Our ability to put ourselves in the situation of another allows us to understand their perspective, behavior and potentially future actions, however our ability to put ourselves in their frame with reasonable objectivity hinges on minimizing emotional contagion or empathy."

8. We Are Ezer: My Clothes Shopping Rules (2019 May 23)

If you can get past the feminine fluffy Feelz at the beginning, this post contains a pretty solid list of guidelines for choosing clothing. If a man is ever "forced" to accompany his girl/wife on a shopping trip (to prevent her from blowing a wad of cash on overly trendy visages), some arguments based on this list might save his wallet from unwise and unnecessary purchases. If your wife is mature and responsible enough to be trustworthy in her purchasing, sharing this female-friendly list with her may be enough to reduce your credit card bills.

Whenever my wife is unsure about asserting a purchase decision, I always tell her to sleep on it, and if she remembers it later in the week and she still wants it, then we'll come back and get it. Usually, she'll forget about it. Sometimes she'll be glad she didn't get it. About once a year, we will actually go back to get something, usually at my urging.

9. Proverbs 24:26 (feat. Lily Mtongwiza): A Morning Routine for Night Owls (2019 May 24)

I am definitely a night owl. All my best work comes out after dark. I've been this way since childhood. But I do recognize the value of starting the day off with a Bang.

> "…a good evening routine is key to a great morning routine. Because if you don't get to bed at a decent hour, it's impossible to get up early.
>
> My morning routine starts with at least 7 hours of sleep. I'd like 8, I know that's the recommended amount, but for me, it's not happening. But 7 is non-negotiable."

As I've gotten older, I've learned to enjoy good mornings. For me the trick is to make the time my own. By that I mean, I wake up when I'm rested, not by the dictates of an annoying alarm. I spend an hour or two on the patio communing with nature, listening to the tropical birds chirp, sing, and coo, sipping a latte, puffing on my pipe, reading a couple blogs, having a talk with God, jotting down some notes for a future post…

Truly, it's the best part of my day!

10. Relevant: Infamous Pickup Artist Roosh V Says He's a Christian Now (2019 May 23)

This trendy pop article pokes fun at the Godfather of the Manosphere for repenting of Bang Lady and returning to the Orthodox faith he was raised in.

That's about as normal as it gets!

The Egosyntonic Art of Tone Policing

Jack · 30 May 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The art of Tone Policing is rife with benefits and setbacks, in terms of argumentation and effective communication.

Readership: All

Western Society Hosts the Tone Police World Headquarters

Whenever Westerners travel to African or Asian countries, they are surprised or shocked by the outrageous verbosity and emotional nature of the verbal communication among the locals. They are prone to look down on such interactions as being unreasonable, uncivilized, or even deranged.

But once you understand that Western culture nurtures its citizens to have an odd and disingenuous habit of cutting all emotional overtones out of verbal communication, then Africans and Asians might not seem so maniacal after all.

This overreliance on logic and dignity is a blind spot that best exemplifies itself in the ego state of an individual, which is often employed (and sometimes abused) as a heavy weight tool used in monitoring and controlling the behaviors of others.

The Pseudo-Moral Force of the Ego (as used in Tone Policing)

Western literature and entertainment commonly showcases the ego as a pridefully sinful and annoying human quality to have – an Achilles heel of the human psyche.

But this is merely an endemic expression of false modesty.

This showcasing of the ego is an embodiment of Christianity, garnished around the trope of unmerited favor and redemption.

From this arises the adherence of Anglo-European culture to a Righteousness vs. Guilt ethical system. As such, one's state of righteousness (or guilt) is often socially communicated through the ego.

Make no mistake, despite the widespread incrimination of the ego, Western culture worships those with a robust ego, and rewards those with the will and finesse to brandish their ego fearlessly in the pursuit of their desire.

On the flip side, “bad guys” often get the impression that people with a strong, healthy ego are proud and arrogant. But this is merely Psychological Projection.

Morally decrepit people usually appear to have a weak ego, and consequently, those with a weak ego are commonly assumed to be bad people, especially those who cling to principles and “rules” as a false front of righteousness.

Truly, having a stronger ego makes it easier to express one’s self, as it allows one to talk about one’s thoughts and feelings more directly and more authentically.

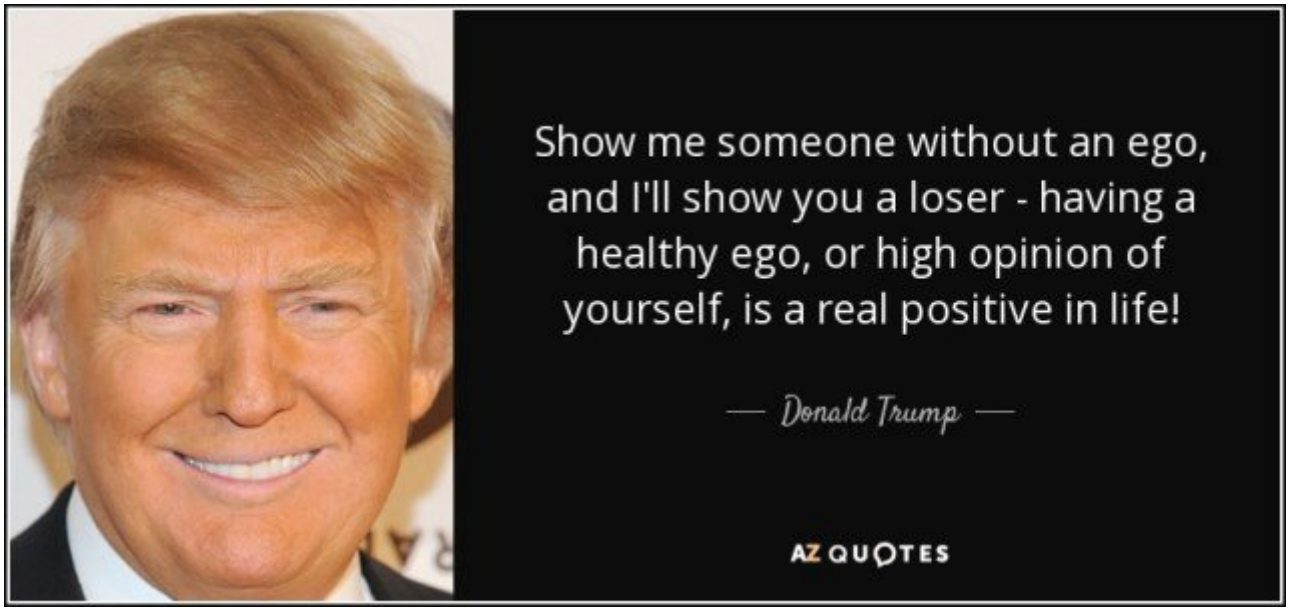
Having a healthy, well balanced ego enables one to showcase more confidence and gives one the power needed to create one’s own happiness.

Having a stronger ego will reduce one’s perceived need for satisfaction and gratification.

Having a vibrant ego brings relationship satisfaction on its own terms.

In this way, a healthy ego keeps one happy, in control, and out of trouble.

As a result, having a robust ego gives one the power to inject one’s self into a situation and have an impact on other people, and it is easier to get what one wants out of an interaction.



Characteristics of Tone Policing

Tone Policing cannot be contained in any one simple action, but may encompass many forms of verbal and non-verbal exchanges.

Basically, Tone Policing suggests that people should distance themselves from their own emotions of anger, frustration, or fear, in order to be heard. But these emotions are often a central part of the issue, and should not be neglected.

Tone Policing can put a heavy damper on expressing the truth, including the subjective truth of emotional expression, and the factual truth of raw, ugly reality.

- It is a manifestation of the Western Aristotelian epistemology, coupled with the Righteousness vs. Guilt ethical structure.

- It transforms the dialogue into a style of formalized debate.
- It allows the Tone Police to define the terms and conditions in which the conversation is held.
- It assumes a manufactured binary condition, that emotion and reason cannot coexist, and that reasonable discussions should not involve emotions.
- It exercises control over a conversation by managing the uncontrollable emotions involved.
- It assumes that emotional expression curbs the logical process and hampers finding a solution.
- It assumes that the outcome of the discussion will be one of mutual agreement, which may or may not be an acceptable outcome.
- It can be used to avoid difficult or uncomfortable topics.
- It suggests that people should distance themselves from their own emotions of anger, frustration, or fear, in order to be heard.
- It forbids an authentic emotional expression of communication, which is necessary to establish a true form of bonding.
- It derails a discussion by critiquing the emotional undertones of the message, rather than the message itself.
- It is often used to denigrate or dismiss the emotional person as being disrespectful or uncivil.
- It can be used as a silencing tactic.

As you may see, the art of Tone Policing is rife with benefits and setbacks, in terms of argumentation and effective communication.

All Political Correctness is a form of Tone Policing, and both Conservatives and the Left are guilty for using Tone Policing to dismiss opposing arguments.

The most decorated soldier of WW2, Audie Murphy, and a Military Police Officer.

How to Properly Tone Police your Neighbor

In summary of the previous section, Tone Policing can be used to either strengthen your position, or undermine your opponent, and it can be used for arguing either honestly or dishonestly.

The pseudo-moral force of the ego is utilized as a key component of applied Tone Policing. We might even think of Tone Policing as an arm of the ego. As such, Tone Policing is a two edged sword, and the cutting edge is determined by the motivations of the individual.

The goal of Tone Policing is to handle every sort of person with dexterity and finesse, and to scope out friends, allies, and enemies.

The purpose of Tone Policing is to monitor and control your social interactions so as to keep things upbeat and humming smoothly.

The art of Tone Policing involves employing your own ego to lock horns with the egos of others, ideally to find a mutually fulfilling adjustment for all involved. This requires discernment, wits, emotion work, and personal refinement. Iron sharpens iron!

Case Study 1: Handling a Bully

People frequently use an overbearing ego to sway other people to always do his/her bidding, without any consideration of the needs of others. In this case, his/her ego devolves into a blundering stick. This behavior is often accompanied by displays of physical intimidation.

Tone Policing may help such a person to become aware of their super-ego, and teach them to use it to control their ego. Once the element of egotisticality is removed from their ego, they may grow to enjoy hanging around people who are very reasonable and rational, because the super-egos of such people can influence their life for the better.

Case Study 2: Handling a Proud @$$

If you're dealing with a spoiled, proud @$$, who thinks he/she can use anger and shame tactics to bully their way through an argument and do or get whatever he/she wants, then Tone Policing can reign them in to some extent, by cutting their ego out of the argument, and requiring them to deal with you as a real person. Tone Policing this type of person on a regular basis, and not tolerating boisterous emotions, nor giving into their demands, can help that person's ego grow to be more balanced and healthy.

Case Study 3: Handling a Low-Class Braggart

If you're dealing with a brash, egotistical person, who tramples on the opinions of others, who lacks common courtesies in conversation, and you're not willing to be that raw with them, then Tone Policing can be used to establish emotional boundaries which can be helpful in controlling and maintaining the relationship. Be prepared for criticisms like, "Stop being my Mom!" But after a while, they'll understand that they can't be that way around you, and (hopefully) they'll let it go.

Case Study 4: Handling an Honest but Overconfident Ego

If you're dealing with a person who is generally good natured and reasonable, but who has an over-inflated ego that makes them difficult to get along with, then it is counterproductive to try harnessing his/her ego through Tone Policing. In this case, one may find better results through ascertaining an area of mutual respect and appreciation, preferably one which is the source of his/her excessive pride, and engaging in some friendly competition. In this case, the challenge of the competition is what will humble the person and fine tune their ego state.

For all of the above cases, once the overgrown unruly ego has been successfully tamed, the relationship may have a chance to grow past merely being a superficial interaction of power games and chest thumping.

After a modicum of trust has been formed, then you may prefer that the thumb screws of Tone Policing be loosened up to allow a more honest and authentic style of communication.

Related

- Σ Frame: Political Correctness is Personality Castigation! (2007 January 5)
- Σ Frame: Why Political Correctness won't solve Racism (2016 September 7)
- Σ Frame: A Brother is Borne Out of Adversity (2018 June 10)
- An excellent description of identifying and modifying the ego state can be found at Do What's Right: Pastoral Psychology and the Heart 02 (2018 December 28)
- Σ Frame: The Tone Police – to protect and serve the rabble (2019 January 12)
- A recent post from X-Splat, When a good pump hypes you up into narcissist mode (2019 May 28), describes at least three cases of effective Tone Policing.

Moon Day Hall of Frame

Jack · 3 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A review of events during 2019 May 26 to June 1.

Readership: All
Length: 550 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

The Female Ego

Wendy Griffith and Bill Susewind.

> [24] "Therefore whoever hears these sayings of Mine, and does them, I will liken him to a wise man who built his house on the rock: [25] and the rain descended, the floods came, and the winds blew and beat on that house; and it did not fall, for it was founded on the rock.
>
> [26] "But everyone who hears these sayings of Mine, and does not do them, will be like a foolish man who built his house on the sand: [27] and the rain descended, the floods came, and the winds blew and beat on that house; and it fell. And great was its fall."
>
> Matthew 7: 24-26 (NKJV)

Many attractive women foolishly build their egos upon the precipitous foundation of one single brick, which happens to be their sexual market value and their intersexual experiences. Their top heavy ego repels the best of men that they otherwise could have had in marriage.

On that note, Dalrock and Adam Piggott had an entertaining and insightful exchange about Wendy Griffith.

1. Dalrock: Taking things too far (2019/5/30)
2. Adam Piggott: Are you Special enough for women like Wendy? (2019/6/1)

3. Dalrock: She wasn't God's best (2019/6/1)

Designer Genetics

> "Genetically modified humans" sounds like a term that belongs in Hollywood, but it's actually a very real possibility, and one that's being heavily discussed in the scientific community. Contributing to one of the most controversial topics to date, not long ago, a panel of science experts in the U.S. just examined and gave their support for germline editing. This means that in the future, parents will likely be able to tamper with the genetics of their children pre-birth. Germinal choice technology refers to reprogenetic technologies that enable parents to alter the genetic constitutions of their children. One of the ways this can be done is through germline editing, which is a fancier term for human genetic engineering. Germline editing alters the genes of a sperm or an egg, but it then changes the future DNA of every single cell in the embryo. This means that the genetic changes made to the embryos will then affect all future generations within that family lineage."
>
> Collective Evolution (Arjun Walia): Genetically Modified Babies. The Genetic Editing of Human Life is "Big Business" (2019/5/28) [Archive]

That's scary!

This article talks of human genome editing as if it's some cutting edge, controversial subject, and maybe it is in the West. But here in Taiwan, my wife tells me that many people are already "ordering" children with specific traits on what I presume is a black market medical profession. Commonly ordered traits include height, intelligence, and higher resistances to various diseases. The price tag on a designer baby is about the equivalent of US$600,000, not counting any related medical expenses.

Human genetic manipulation must surely come to pass, because Revelation 9:6 clearly states,

> "In those days men will seek death and will not find it; they will desire to die, and death will flee from them."

Once geneticists identify the genes responsible for aging and death, mortality itself will become a characteristic of "the old, imperfect breed".

Related

- Thought Catalog (Lesetja Thema): 5 Ways To Spot The Female Ego (2017/4/4)
- MIT Press: YouTube, persuasion and genetically engineered children (2019/3/5)
- Σ Frame: The Objectification of Reproductive Potential must deliver an Ego Rush or else it is Chauvinistic. (2020/11/18)
- Σ Frame: It's all about her Ego (2021/11/12)
- Woman Alive (Wendy Griffith): Married at 54: 'I was willing to wait' (2022/1/25)

The Parable of the Pressure Cooker

Jack · 7 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Preserving the passion that is a prerequisite for fulfilling a person's quest for love and long term sexual and marital satisfaction can be likened unto a pressure cooker.

Readership: Young women and high-SMV men

The Frame: The Current SMP is Jading and Self-Serving

Judging from my own experiences in tempestually promiscuous settings and sexually tinged situations, it seemed apparent that the underlying goal of the purported 'inner game' was to stuff your heart behind a wall of arrogance (purveyed as DHV) so as to NOT lose control of your passions! If you ever lost control of your desire, you would be booted out of the SMP (dorm room, frat house, etc.) in a jiffy, and labeled something akin to "a rude, desperate loser" or even a slut, (which is a label far from the truth in this case, because true sluts have had so much casual boinking, that their natural libido has been jaded into ancient history).

Young women and a few high-SMV men (over the past 30 years, especially) cannot wait (postpone gratification) to the point that their will power is overruled by their passions. Many of them might think they're waiting, but they're not. They are dating different men, chatting with many men online, experimenting with sex, diddling around with random guys who drop by for the Friday night strip poker game…

Individuals who are bound by conscience or social customs might justify their relative righteousness by telling themselves that they're not "going all the way". Although there is some value in declaring certain sexual misadventures as "off limits" (outside of marriage), this approach ignores the fact that they are still putting themselves into highly tempting situations and pressing their sexual desire to the limits of their self-imposed legalism.

Women who are not bound by conscience or social custom may play by a different set of "rules", supported by various flimsy axioms, such as "I want (or am trying) to lose control!", or "If it feelz good, do IT!", or "Number thirty-three out of sixty-nine of these men will be the ONE!" All of which only indulges their feminine imperative, kinks up their socio-sexual (and psychological) anisotropy, leading them to nurture and hold many high expectations of a man, while expecting nothing from themselves. This invariably leads to the despoilment of their MMV.

Girls who fear the social stigma of the carousel might opt for the Boyfriend route, often with a hot, but manageable Beta, but the end is the same.

In sum, they are seeking out, and provoking their passions like wildfire… and doing so until all their natural passion is completely dissipated.

And this is colloquially called "finding one's self…", meaning, "finding one's self relieved of authentic sexual passion and the idolatry of lurrve". The only benefit is that the destruction of the distraction of desire makes it easier for an individual to think clearly about life — but at what cost?

Bottom line…

- They are not learning to contain and channel their passions.
- They are not entering into the crucible of unconsummated desire and growing spiritually through the experience.
- They are not preparing themselves with serious intentions of marriage.
- They are not learning how to get along with a man.
- They are not coming around towards realizing that a romantic relationship cannot ultimately satisfy the deeper longing of their souls – and that only God can do so.

No, their vanity and ego satisfaction remains as their primary driving force.

Once a sufficient amount of carnal knowledge has been gained from their sexperiences, the ability and opportunity to experience a true passion that is strong enough to overrule their will to self-determination, is lost forever.

The Pressure Cooker

The pressure cooker is a sealed container which works by trapping the steam produced from boiling the liquid inside the vessel, thereby causing the internal pressure and temperature to rise quickly. After the contents are cooked, the steam is slowly released so that the vessel can be opened safely.

The pressure cooker's higher temperatures and pressures allows food to be cooked more thoroughly (abstinence allows young women to mature emotionally) in a shorter amount of time.

Food toxins (STD's) can be reduced by pressure cooking (abstinence).

Conclusions

Young women should stop throwing their clams of great value before hunky handsome pigs who will trample them and dash out the next morning, leaving them as an Alpha widowed future cat lady.

Young Chads who have the opportunities to titillate and tempt gals with the Tingle should be more circumspect and choose wisely. Think of her as another man's daughter, or some other guy's future wife.

There is a reason why the Bible emphasizes sexual purity.

When young women choose to remain chaste, when they choose to keep a lid on it until the kettle boils over, then they may have a chance of finding the love of their life, and a passion strong enough to add value to a marital relationship.

Unless the journey embarks along this process, the deep, authentic passion needed to keep the marital bond glued together during times of trial and temptation will be spilled and lost. Unless passion is preserved for the marriage bed, then the resulting marriage and family will remain half baked.

Related

- Roosh V: If You're Instantly Attracted To A Man, He's Bad For You (February 12, 2019)

MEN: Avoid the 21 Convention

Lexet Blog · 7 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A warning to younger readers about the dangers of the 21 Convention community, and the personalities within it.

Contributed by the author of Lexet Iustitia.

Readership: Men following the 21 Convention.

If you are a male who is familiar with Red Pill / MGTOW, you have probably heard of Rollo Tomassi, the 21 Convention, or the Red Man Group (YouTube channels and personalities).

The 21 convention is a channel that hosts conferences, and features "Red Pill" speakers.

Tickets to the 21 convention are $1,600-2,500 apiece. They claim over 120 attendees on average, which means a gross over $180,000.

Having organized massive events with hundreds of attendees, I can estimate that no more than 1/3 of the costs went to reserving the hotel conference rooms. Any speaking convention that asks you to spend thousands of dollars in fees, flights, and hotels is a scam. Especially when the speakers are internet entertainers who tickle your ears, telling you what you already know.

It's owned by Anthony Johnson, an adult male who allegedly lives in his sister's home.

Anthony came to the Red Pill when he realized his now ex-wife was a prostitute. He spends a lot of his time complaining of this fact, while also bringing up the fact that he has slept with hundreds, if not thousands of women, and was promiscuous before and after his marriage. His cognitive dissonance is amazing.

The way he tells his own story is textbook NPD*. Narcissism and sexual disorders go hand in hand. Unfortunately, many professional PUA bloggers and YouTubers are narcissists. One doesn't sleep with hundreds of women without having some form of mental/sexual disorder.

If you don't believe me, search for his name and the term, "marrying Medusa". If his speech doesn't convince you he is nuts himself, you are prone to being taken advantage of by predatory narcissists.

Back to the topic of the 21 Convention, Johnson built his brand on the backs of others, particularly Rollo Tomassi and Richard Cooper. But after promoting his recent convention, he decided to kick Rollo and some other speakers out. Anthony is now taking advantage of the star power of George Bruno and Stefan Molyneux to make money.

Long story short: The 21 Convention is a scam. It's full of narcissists, and full of drama. Avoid that crap.

If you are naive, you probably thought these guys were solid. If you are savvy and have ran into narcissists before, you would realize these guys were ego maniacs obsessed with their influence and image.

Don't be discouraged if you were conned. Start your recovery by reading the links below. It's a learning experience.

 Narcissistic Personality Disorder (NPD). If you're unfamiliar with personality disorders, you might want to spend a few hours reading up on the subject. It just might save your life! You can start here.*

- The Narcissistic Life (feat. Alexander Burgemeester): Sexual Attitudes of a Narcissist: Sex and the Narcissist (2013 July 8)
- Σ Frame: A Study of Borderline Personality Disorder (2016 May 30)

The social contract is up-ended, but fortunately, I'm out!

Jack · 8 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Statistics on student loan debt, the debacle of debt on both recipients and society, and how a few people have dealt with this burden.

Readership: All; especially those with student loan debt

I did it! At the age of 47, I finally paid off my student loans!

I took the first one in 1990 when I started college, and I signed a promissory note for the last one in 1997 when I started graduate school.

It's been a monkey on my back ever since. I'm not alone.

Statistics on Student Loan Debt

The Chamber of Commerce has reported some very depressing statistics on student loans [1].

- 60% of all students have some form of debt by graduation.
- There is more than $1.5 trillion of student debt owed in the United States.
- This debt is owed by 44.5 million people across all demographics.
- 2 million of those people owe more than $100,000 and 0.5 million of them have a loan for more than $200,000.
- In 2017, $106.5 billion was borrowed. That is down, however, from the peak of $125.6 billion in 2010.
- Tuitions costs have continued to rise; the decline is due to fewer people enrolling in college each year.
- 40% of the total federal student debt is from graduate programs.
- Master's students borrowed $18,210 per year on average during 2015 compared to an undergrad's $5,460.
- The average debt of a master's graduate is $51,000.
- The cheapest master's degrees are an MBA. Those with an MBA averaged $42,000 in debt. Those that graduated with a master's degree in medicine and health science averaged $162,722 in loans.
- Of people with student debt, only 37.5% are below the age of 30. The other 62.5% are older than 30.
- 3 million borrowers are currently deferring their federal student loans. In this instance, deferment means that interest doesn't accrue.
- 6 million borrowers currently have federal student loans in forbearance. Interest is still piling up for them.
- An astounding 4.7 million borrowers have their federal student loans in default. That means that 10% of all people with student loans haven't made payments on their debt in more than 9 months.
- Students that left college before completing their degree are more than twice as likely to eventually default on their loans compared to students that graduated.
- More than half of all defaulted debts are on loans that amount to less than $10,000.
- 45% of students that graduated in 2018 have student debt.
- Their projected retirement age is a creaking 72 years old (compared to the average retirement age of 66 in 2018).
- 11% of graduates don't believe they'll ever have the opportunity to retire.

For those interested, there are two primary federal student loan forgiveness programs.

1. Public Service Loan Forgiveness – Is intended to be for eligible federal, state, and local government employees as well as employees at 501 (c) (3) non-profits. After exactly 10 years of on-time payments, the remainder of the debt is to be forgiven. However, as of September 2018, only 96 out of the 30,000 applicants have been accepted to the program and forgiven. Don't count on this one.

2. Teacher Loan Forgiveness Program – Teachers that teach 5 consecutive years in a qualified low-income school can be forgiven between $5,000 and $17,500 of their debt. About 40,000 teachers received aid from this program in 2017.

Although the Chamber of Commerce reports that 10% of student loans are in default, the Wall Street Journal claims that More Than 40% of Student Borrowers Aren't Making Payments (2016 April 7). A third source [2] says only half of student loan recipients were in active repayment status, as of the fourth quarter of 2018. Image from [2].

Whichever statistic you choose, the situation looks grim.

Some are taking the easy way to get out of debt – by moving abroad

I've read several stories about how some Americans have been so overwhelmed by student loan debt that they fled the country.

CNBC (feat. Annie Nova): These Americans fled the country to escape their giant student debt (2019 May 25)

The article from CNBC takes note of the life improvement experienced by one debt ridden American expat in India, Chad Haag,

> "Milestones that seemed like pipe dreams back home, like starting a family, and owning a house, are now on his horizon in India. Last year, he married an Indian citizen, a professor at a local college. He has a five-year spousal visa."

Some of my cousins believe the reason I have lived abroad since 2004 was to escape my student loan. But it's not true. I understand that feeling of being overwhelmed by debt, and not being able to make payments on time, but that's not the reason why I moved to Asia.

I continued to make payments after moving here and it was a pain in the @$$. In order to send money to my student loan guarantor, I've had to make half-day trips to an international bank located downtown and ask them to issue a bank check. This always took a couple days to process, so then I had to make another half-day trip later in the week to pick up the check. On top of making the payments on the principal and the 4.5% interest, I had to pay additional banking fees, currency exchange fees, and checking fees for each check, which added about 9% to the total.

Busting A$$ (No Kidding) Is No Good!

The Violated Social Contract

I took out those loans in good faith in my future earning potential, and I had every intention of repaying every penny. But for all my effort over the years, I could never pull ahead and get on top of it.

My father urged me to stop making payments altogether. His suggestion surprised me because he may be the most honest man I know, and he is a deacon and the treasurer of a Southern Baptist Church! I could not imagine such a statement coming from him. So I had to ask him to explain his reasoning behind his advice. He said that whenever banks loan out money, they have to assume the risk that some of the debtors will never be able to repay the loan. They have to figure this into their calculations as a potential loss. To minimize these losses, banks need to scrutinize every potential loan beneficiary before doling out the cash, to make sure each one is able to repay. Obviously, banks haven't gone to enough trouble to protect themselves against making bad investments, so they should accept these losses. This was made abundantly clear during the subprime mortgage crisis in 2008.

During the subprime mortgage crisis in 2008, it was mobviously clear that banks and government insurance agencies made poor investments, with a back-up plan up their sleeves to foreclose on owners who defaulted. This brilliantly contrived scheme forced competing and relatively more honest banks out of business, and it stole repossessed properties from thousands of hard-working Americans, as well as ruining their hopes and dreams in the process. These banks and their supporting agencies were never held accountable for their irresponsible and unprofessional business practices. Instead, the common man had to take up the $lack.

When we consider the current student loan debacle, with 10-40% of the beneficiaries in default, subject to wage garnishment, and being pulled into federal court, I have to ask, what is their back-up plan for recouping their investment? They can't repossess an education, and they can't recover their investments through wage garnishment if the benefactor cannot find a sufficiently high paying job.

Furthermore, why is it that student loan debt is the only debt that cannot be forgiven through a bankruptcy settlement?

I hate to think about this, but the only thing I can think of, is that the powers-that-be have engineered a massive plan to subject the American people to debt slavery and to impose all of the associated constraints that go with it.

This could be part of a plan to limit population growth by discouraging or postponing marriage and raising a family because of insufficient income – a move to completely obliterate the once majority middle class, which has been the time honored cornerstone of the American republic.

It could also be a carrot-and-stick approach to convince the masses that socialism has many benefits, leading to their agreement of a gradual takeover! Heh…

Any way you look at it, it's one more Harbinger of the Impending Collapse of the U.S. Social Security System (2019 April 12)

How did I repay my student loan?

In 2009, I had my student loan paid down to $26,622.10. Then my first wife left me and cleaned out our savings without any notice. I was so broke that I had to borrow money from my parents so that I could hire a lawyer for the divorce proceedings.

Needless to say, I was unable to make payments for a few years until I got back on my feet. During this time, my loan went into default and was sold to a collection agency. Because of the interest and collection fees, the outstanding balance ballooned to an astronomical $58,619.37 within 5 years!

One day, after reading the amount I owed on a statement, which was 2.7 times the sum of the original loan figures, I was seriously considering taking my Dad's advice.

But my conscience afflicted me, so I prayed about what to do…

> "God! I always had the intention of repaying this loan, but I just don't think I can do it. Should I take Dad's advice, or are You going to make a way for me to repay this loan somehow?"

After a few months, I got an answer to my prayers.

My wife was always complaining about the place where we lived. Her parents finally got fed up with hearing her complaints, and urged us to buy our own house. I always thought this wasn't an option, because we didn't have enough money for the down payment. But her parents agreed to give us enough money for the down payment. I would still be responsible for the monthly mortgage payments, but that would not be a problem since I would no longer need to pay rent. The mortgage is only US$80/month more than what I was paying in rent.

We had to take out a loan to cover the balance, but I was able to get a 30-year home owners loan at an interest rate of 1.65%. So I just asked for $30,000 more than the remaining cost of the house, which did not raise any flags because it was less than the amount offset by the down payment. I put this extra amount aside to pay off my student loan.

After I was awarded the loan from the bank, I called the agency responsible for collecting my student loan and negotiated a lump sum settlement in cash. I sent them a copy of an old statement, proving that the original loan amount totaled $24,560, and that the balance stood just under $26,000 in 2011. I wrote a long-winded explanation for why I was so far behind on my payments, and I offered a cash settlement of $20,000. They made a non-negotiable counter-offer of $30,913.38, and I accepted it as an opportunity to escape the 4.5% interest rate, the guilt of debt, and all the hassle of making regular payments.

I made arrangements with my bank to pay the amount using a credit card, so that I could reduce some of the checking and handling fees. Unfortunately, the exchange rate was at a 5 month high, so that cost me an additional $1,518.

In summary, I consolidated my loan into a hotly appreciating real estate investment at a much lower interest rate. I thereby escaped the horrid student loan trap and became a homeowner at the same time.

God answered my prayers! Hallelujah! I'm totally out of the rat race!

References

1. Chamber of Commerce: Student Loan Statistics
2. Medium-Knoema (Feat. Ivan Lapickii): US Student Loan Debt Accumulation Showing No Signs of Slowing (2019 January 24)

Related

- Forbes (feat. Josh Freedman): Student Loans are a Drag on the Economy and Society (2014 February 11)
- World News U.S.: 20 Reasons to Date Foreign Women (2018 May 20)
- Buzz Feed News (feat. Anne Helen Petersen): Here's Why So Many Americans Feel Cheated by their Student Loans (2019 February 9)
- Vox Popoli: Why the US is moving towards socialism (2019 April 9)
- Do What's Right (feat. Ed Hurst): DIY Glory Shine (2019 June 29)
- Practical Eschatology: Student Loan Forgiveness: What's Good For The Goose Is Good For The Gander (2019 October 30)

Moon Day Review – The Hall of Frame Control

Jack · 10 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

10 great Red Pill articles about building and maintaining masculine Frame.

Readership: Men
Theme: (2019 June 2-8) building and maintaining Masculine Frame.
Length: 4,050 words
Reading Time: 14 minutes

1. New Manosphere Blog: Florida Life (M. J. Davis)

M. J. Davis, of Doing Marriage Right fame, decided to take his Red Pill blogging ministry to younger married men on a new direction. So he has closed down his old site, and started a new blog, Florida Life. He has detailed his rationale for this decision in his first post, A New Start (2019 June 3).

Davis started things off right with a post entitled, Victim Mentality is Toxic to Your Success (2019 June 8)

> "Accepting the only person you can control is the man in the mirror will go a long way in you realizing you are not a victim. You cannot control your wife, your boss, your parents, not even your kids. We all make our own decisions and are held accountable for them (at least we should be). You cannot change other people. You can guide them, suggest, lead by example, but it is up to them to decide whether or not they will follow. All you can do is make yourself the best leader you can. It may take years of work if you have been living a substandard life. Some may never follow. You cannot control that. Just understand that them not following does not make you a victim."

2. Snapper TRX: Feminism's (a) Bitch (2019 June 3)*

Snapper's post gets the Golden Sigma Award™ (GΣA) this week for his profound insights on the true nature of Feminism.

> "In feminism women are not the chattel of a single man but the chattel of an entire network of men bent on using women as a voting bloc to garner themselves control. See, women live longer than men and there are more women than men out there. To a politician it makes perfect sense to gain control of women by "allowing" them to vote because women make up a larger percent of the population. Control the larger percentage and you can control elections. Control elections and you can control the elements of society and culture. Women also make up the majority of money SPENDERS in the West while men make up the majority of money EARNERS. So control women and you can control where money goes as well. This control is easily achieved by creating women-only benefits like VAWA, no-fault divorce, welfare and easy abortion."
>
> "You see, ladies, you ARE kept! You think feminism frees you but feminism is just another name for a chain of control. In return for your servitude you aren't given anything, the government just says it will look the other way when you have done something wrong or stupid allowing you to think you are free from the consequences of your actions when, in fact, you are not!"
>
> "You're not baby factories anymore, you're VOTE factories!"
>
> "Feminism is no freedom from tyranny, it is merely trading one supposed tyranny for true tyranny! The tyranny feminists think they are being freed from are named RESPONSIBILITY and CONSEQUENCE. They do not, in fact, escape these at all, but trade their freedom to a true tyrant who simply removes RESPONSIBILITY and delays CONSEQUENCE until there is no opportunity to change one by taking the > other.”

Just underlying Snapper’s argument, we find the main tenets of Jack’s Law of Feminism.

> “Feminism is the assertion and justification of women’s rejection of male authority in favor of an institutionalized social ontology which is dictated by the Feminine Imperative.”

* Reblogged by Free Matt Podcast.

3. Evolutionist X: Equally True, Equally False (2019 June 3)

The author discusses how the proper Frame depends on the context. When the context is sufficiently incoherent with the Frame, in regards to the truth of a matter, it results in three outcomes.

1. Confusion
2. Cognitive Dissonance
3. Deception

A mastery of Frame control requires one to identify when a given Frame is incoherent with the context, and use this knowledge adroitly.

The author mentions a couple applications of Frame control relevant to argumentation and trans-Feminism.

> “…sufficiently complicated arguments can confuse non-experts even when they are totally irrelevant.* Switching levels on someone is a fast and easy way to confuse them, especially if you have studied the subject more than they have.
>
> People do this when they want a particular outcome, usually political. For example, people who want to promote trans rights will recount an array of technical, medical intersex conditions in order to claim that the biological categories of “male” and “female” don’t exist. Of course, the biological categories of “male” and “female” do exist, as do people with rare genetic disorders; the one does not disprove the other, and neither tells you what to do about anything trans-related.
>
> I feel like there needs to be some efficient (and recognized) way of saying, “Yes, this is true, but on a different level from the one I am addressing. At the level I am addressing, this is false.”

 Related: Slate Star Codex (feat. Scott Alexander): Getting Eulered (2014 August 10)*

Also, the Excentric Frame Award™ (AKA the BOOby prize) for this week goes to Evolutionist X for their imaginative thought experiment, A short argument for vending machines full of experimental drugs (2019 June 5).

> “…illegal drugs are optimized for being highly addictive, yes, but also for working really well. And through trial and error, people have figured out how much they need, how best to take it, and how often for the optimal effects.
>
> In other words, simply letting lots of people mess around with drugs results in really effective drugs.
>
> The downside to the black-free-market refinement of drugs is that lots of people die in the process.”

I see another evolutionary biology argument burgeoning here, similar to “abortion thins out the genetic stock of those women willing to eliminate their own progeny.”

Biblical Gender Roles: Would Society Be Better If Girls Married as Soon as They

4.

Menstruated? (2019 June 4)

In this long, cultural reframe, BGR examines several possibilities with supportive arguments. It's quite inspirational to read. Major points are as follows.

- Why Modern Society Disapproves of the Pubescent Marriage of Women
- Putting Maternal and Infant Mortality Rates in Perspective
- The Societal Impact of Economic and Social Independence for Women
- The Arguments Against the Marriage of Pubescent Women Are Faulty
- Why We Should Support the Practice of Pubescent Marriage
- Early Teen Women Are Very Fertile
- Early Teen Women Are More Moldable

On that last point, last year, J.T. Anderson (of Saving Eve) and I did a study of "Wife Moulding" as a sub-topic of my writing project on "Discipline in Marriage".

We found that ideally, "wife moulding" should begin at an early age by the father, and the sooner the husband takes over, the better. However, the current culture encourages women to have a long period of independence between living at home with her father and being married. This "season of singleness" for "finding herself" is catastrophic to the stability of marriage.

Moreover, the whole topic of "wife moulding" is anathema to the philosophical foundations of feminism for several reasons.

1. It presumes that men and women are not fundamentally equal.
2. It presumes that women are not independent, nor should they be.
3. It presumes that women do not have free moral agency, but are subject to the decisions of men (father and husband).
4. It assumes that men have authority over women.
5. It posits that men determine a woman's life course and purpose for living.

In the same post, BGR also entertains some rebuttals from Susan Titkemeyer, a writer at Patheos. Titkemeyer tried to round me down once on the topic of promiscuity in the Church. I'm surprised that my writings about Marital Discipline haven't gotten any kickback (yet) from authors like Titkemeyer. I think this is because women know, deep in their hearts, that they are happier and better off with a man at the helm. It's no secret that women constantly fantasize about being "ruled over" by a handsome, powerful, loving man, but they're too proud to admit it. I covered this phenomenon under several posts listed in the second link above.

Update: Since writing the above comments under the OP at BGR two days ago, Σ Frame has received 150+ referrals (and counting) from BGR. Marital Discipline and Wife Moulding were hot topics at the time I studied them last year, but this traffic indicates that the demand for this knowledge and the related skill set has continued to grow.

5. The Orthosphere (feat. J.M. Smith): In Defense of Anecdotal Evidence (2019 June 5)

Runner up for the GΣA, J.M. Smith, supports the admission of anecdotal evidence, provided that the information is diligently and faithfully interpolated (to alter something by insertion or addition) into one's world view.

> "Your fundamental understanding of the world matures and develops when you interpolate new data, and much of this new data comes to you in the form of anecdotes."

Learning is the process of doing the hard psychological work required to fit a new piece of information into the complex interpretation of reality that one presently holds.

> "Every anecdote is not what my epigraph calls a "wicked anecdote," for I may share with you some private intelligence that improves your opinion of a man, or a place, or an activity. But every true anecdote is potentially disruptive because it will add to your understanding if you are not resolved to remain a simpleton, and will take the trouble to add it to the stock of what you know. The anecdote may be a "wicked anecdote" that explodes an innocent illusion, or it may be a generous anecdote that adds color and depth to what you already know, but true anecdotes should be interpolated, and should not be brushed off as merely "anecdotal evidence"."

Learning is difficult because whenever a contradiction arises, you have to make critical decisions about what is true, and what your false notions are, and change your beliefs and thought processes accordingly.

6. Illuvitus: Feminist Eisegesis (2019 June 5)

Second runner up for the GΣA, Illuvitus, is becoming a Master of Frame regulation. The next and final challenge is to be able to do this in situ.

> "When you encounter a command in Scripture that you don't like, you have a few options available to you. You can reject it, accept it, or take a more creative approach and impose a new meaning on it."
>
> "A feminist, thoroughly imbibing on Marxist toxin, doesn't like the passages in Scripture that contradict feminism and all his pet liberal causes, so he imposes new meaning on them. At least in this instance, his motive is clearly stated:
>
> "Unfortunately, since many of the dominant voices throughout church history, have been straight, white, males, this has meant that the church has been slow in pushing past the flimsy exegesis, and damaging assumptions of our past. […]
>
> Instead of being the sexist, misogynist many have taken him for, I believe that Paul brings the challenge of feminism to the Church."
>
> It's worth remembering that if this is true, 2000 years of Christians were women-hating, racist, homophobic, sexists who couldn't understand Paul. It took secular anti-Christian feminist and sexual revolutions to get the church to finally see the light. Paul was, in his mind, obviously a far-left radical.
>
> What I'd prefer, though, is for those who think all of these things to stop reinterpreting Paul and just say what they really think: Paul was wrong. Honesty is much better than manipulation."

That would be nice, but that level of self-awareness and honesty won't be found in someone who is denying the truth of scripture.

7. Radix Fidem (Ed Hurst): Radix Fidem Curriculum: Framework (2019 June 7)

Ed Hurst is writing a series of posts about how to develop and maintain faith in the Lord God. I like Ed's perspectives, because he comes at it from the ground up – the subjective "journeyman's" experience – which is a view of the Truth you'll never hear from any Western pulpit. This particular post spoke to my heart about what God requires of us, and what He doesn't.

> "In order to breathe life into your communion with Christ, you must start that long journey of conditioning your mind to think in a biblical frame of reference. Don't plan on arriving at some destination; explore the > territory and discover the delights of God long hidden from you by your own sin nature."

Ed's words resonate with something one of my college professors (who was a devout believer) used to repeat to the students he was closest to, "Life is a journey, a process, not a goal or destination."

> "Clearly that's not just mechanical obedience. Such is not a bad place to be, if you don't mind being treated as a slave or servant in God's household. But real authority is vested only in the divine family. Your authority over Satan rests on a child's delight in the Father. The Father reciprocates that delight. He is not a legalist as the Talmud alleges, but it is all very personal and full of favoritism. It takes a lot willful disobedience to irritate God enough to be turned over to Satan. That shouldn't encourage you to push your luck, so to speak, but should make you feel safe when you inevitably miscalculate in your obedience. It's not a question of performance, but a heart-led desire to please Him."

A question to ponder: How does one become God's "favorite"? Read on for some clues.

> "The whole idea is that you learn to identify with God and His agenda. It sounds slavish to our Western ears, but this is how reality actually works. Satan is no legalist, either, but he does like making us think legalistically. That's where he makes the most profit from us."

I've always felt at a loss for the knowledge of how God really operates. From reading Ed's posts, I've come to understand that the Western culture of my origin has formed in my mind certain methods and expectations that do not correlate with the way God actually works.

Because of the Ancient Near East culture shock, Ed writes using many parabolic illustrations, which require extensive immersion to fully appreciate. He offers further clarification of his views in a following post, Radix Fidem Curriculum: It's Personal (2019 June 8).

> "We should be eager for divine justice. Even when it means our own punishment, we are eager to see justice live on this earth. We live in a fallen existence and perfection is simply impossible, but the wrath of God is the same grace for us as the blessings. Indeed, for us it's all the same. We are driven to see justice as its own reward and don't fear the loss of anything we have here, least of all our lives. […]"

I believe one of the best ways to tell whether a person is a true believer or not, is whether they are afraid of God's justice, or they welcome it.

> "So we are quick to call for God to visit, to bring His wrath and His rewards. It's all the same to us. We aren't counting the personal costs because none of it will follow us into eternity. It's all just a tool for His glory.
>
> It's personal, not mechanical. This is one of the hardest things for a Western mind to absorb: Everything is personal. Nothing is impersonal; objectivity is a myth. In God's eyes, everything in this world belongs to some person. Someone is accountable to Him for everything. Since the only way to avoid the worst misery of God's wrath is to keep it friendly and bold with Him, we seize our own culpability for failure. We openly confess our failures and request His power to correct our flaws. This ameliorates the Curse of the Fall for us, and the Father treats us favorably. That includes natural consequences. We submit willingly to whatever comes with that package."

This is relatively easier to do with God, but it's hard and risky to let other people in on the real deal — people Ed refers to as "slaves" (believers subject to a legalistic conscience), or "cattle" (unbelievers).

> "But we know that the slaves in His Creation are not so fortunate. They have long striven to depersonalize everything and remove themselves from responsibility. […] We aren't vindictive in holding people accountable > to our personal sense of disappointment, but we do try to step back and let God's justice work in their lives. And if it doesn't come out like we expect, we accept what God does and move on with the mission. We don't pretend to know all the private counsel of the Father in dealing with the cattle in His herds."

God knows what He's doing, whether you do or not, and whether you like it or not.

> "We certainly can and should know His will for us individually. We know that we must keep an awareness of personal responsibility over everything God puts in our hands. We can and should know when a tool has outlived its usefulness in our mission, and let it go. […]"

A question to ponder: How well acquainted are you with God's will for your life?

8. Rinse Before Use: Intensity isn't always a good thing (2019 June 7)

Zlotybaby offers a lot of insight as to why some relationships start off with a bang, and suddenly end with being ghosted.

> "As a rule, a person looking for a full-time, all-involving romance is looking for a distraction because they're not happy with where they're at. That means that if a guy sees you for the first time on Monday and wants to see you on Tuesday and Wednesday too it's not because you're so amazing. Sure he must like you but he's mainly trying to fill the void. Similarly, if a girl is always available to meet you, I'm smelling trouble.
>
> There can be two main reasons why a person could be so available. Option 1 is that they literally have no life. Maybe they have a job but as a Billy No Mates have no friends, maybe they have no interests, maybe they don't even work. In any case, a LOT of free time is a red flag.
>
> Option 2 is that they don't have a lot of free time but they're ditching everything for you. While everyone will understand occasional flaking on a friend when you've started seeing a really cool person, a drastic change of plans for someone you've just met is a bad sign. It may be an indicator of low self-esteem or simply a lack of relationship maturity of someone who thinks that it's healthy to let a partner be literally their everything."
>
> "[…] If they want you around all the time instantly, it's not about you being amazing, it's about them trying to ground themselves by entering a relationship ASAP."
>
> "[…] if you're worried that saying "no" to them may mean the end of it you may be right. Isn't it proof though that it's ultimately not about you, or even the connection between the two of you but about them desperately looking for something? […]"

Having this insight can help a person keep things in perspective when considering a potential relationship that starts up "hot and bothered" (British), or "hot and heavy" (American; entendre intended).

9. Laughing at Feminism: Spiritually Two-Timing their Husbands (2019 June 8)

Sharkly has only been blogging for a month, and married women have started contacting him for "spiritual consultation". Sharkly smartly responds by quoting 1st Corinthians 14:35, "If there is anything they desire to learn, let them ask their husbands at home." He explains,

> "In my mind it would be insulting and create distance to ask a husband for guidance, and then do something else, after he gave his plan. And going to other men for spiritual headship, is just two-timing a woman's own head. I wouldn't advise it, unless her husband has clearly and repeatedly refused to give her any guidance on the matter after she has asked him for it clearly and she has conveyed to him sincerely that she intends to follow his advice, so long as he does not guide her into a greater sin than her failure to submit."

Women often worry that their husbands might ask them to do something “sinful”, never realizing that their true sin lies in their doubts and suspicions of their husbands’ motivations, and the pride that prevents them from listening and submitting to him as his wife. Ultimately, by refusing to trust their husbands, they are refusing to trust God to work through their husbands’ leadership.

> “Some husbands may have become hesitant to give their wives spiritual direction, knowing she’ll just openly defy them, thereby putting them to shame, or worse, submit herself to some other man’s spiritual direction.”

Most women are too proud, vain, egotistical, distrustful, or foolish to talk to their husbands openly and get to know their minds. So they definitely won’t ask their husbands for what they want/need/expect. In fact, women will talk to everyone (and their handsome brother) EXCEPT that one person who can change their circumstances.

> “[These] women are squandering a chance to have more unity in their homes, by finding out what their husbands’ spiritual desires are, and then indulging them; a chance to motivate their husbands to exercise more spiritual leadership; and a chance to build closer spiritual intimacy with their husbands.”

I think it’s acceptable to answer some of their questions in a post (using pseudonyms of course), but in general, Sharkly’s approach is right on! We should keep the private communications to a minimum, out of respect to God’s power working through their husbands. Sharkly added,

> “They’ve got an opportunity to build together, but they’d rather get some other man’s opinion on where the bricks her husband has just laid, should really go, and then they take their husband’s brickwork back apart based upon some second opinion from somebody who has no clue what the husband is even building. I don’t doubt some of these ladies would ‘shit a brick’ if their husbands were alerted to what they were up to, behind their backs.”

Secrecy can also be an idol, you know.

> “I can only imagine that church leaders must get this all the time also. I doubt too many of them respond by trying to reinforce the husband’s headship over his wife. I bet they use the opportunity to AMOG, and join in the second guessing, without ever redirecting the wife back to the husband.”

Been there, experienced that… Pastors and Christian counselors tearing down the authority of the husband over his home and marriage, and daftly believing they’re contributing something good to the Kingdom… It’s absolutely inane.

> “I believe among the ancient idolaters the husband would always function as the family’s priest. Sadly, even the idolaters of eons ago, could teach our Feminist churches wisdom about family roles and values.”

10. Amerika (feat. J. P. Wilkinson): 75th Anniversary of Toxic Amerikan Masculinity (2019 June 6)

Finally, a most satisfying read from J. P. Wilkinson about the present State of the Union.

> “The Duke of Wellington had a telling quote after his civilization-altering victory over Napoleon at Waterloo. “The battle of Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton.” What he meant by that was something far beyond a condign and fitting tribute to the positive socialization that occurs through school athletics. A hard upbringing led to hard men. Wellington’s hard men sliced and diced the French under Bonaparte. Wellington was telling us that men are not born capable of defending hearth and home. They are honed and steeled to be capable of such a task.

> Wellington also said of his army the following: The scum of the earth… but what fine soldiers we have made them. […]"
>
> "… when you allow your men to atrophy; your civilization is a joke that nobody continues to find funny. You then die.
>
> So look at the civilization around you. Do you see enough toxic masculinity to have a prayer of a successful D-Day Invasion? If not, take an interest in your male children and do something about this. If you do not have a prayer of being able to execute D-Day, you may not have too much of a prayer. This is what your boys may one day have to be capable of."

As the saying goes… Soft times breed soft men. Soft men bring hard times. Hard times create hard men. Hard men enjoy soft times. We're approaching the third season.

Freeze Frame transmission concluded.

Moon Day Review – Running up that hill (with a little help from my Dad)

Jack · 17 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Links from 2019 June 9-15. Challenges and solutions for men, fathers, and managers.

Readership: All
Note: Last full moon before the solstice (June 21).
Length: 1,950 words
Reading Time: 6.5 minutes

> "Therefore we also, since we are surrounded by so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which so easily ensnares us, and let us run with endurance the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus, the author [originator] and finisher [perfecter] of our faith, who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and has sat down at the right hand of the throne of God." ~ Hebrews 12:1-2 (NKJV)

Back in 1985, there was a noteworthy and highly memorable song called Running up that Hill by Kate Bush. Back then, the song received very rare airplay, usually only by special request.

Why?

The song was intense, ethereal, and harrowing… and the lyrics included a line which was considered borderline blasphemy at that time,

> "And if I only could
> I'd make a deal with God
> And I'd get him to swap our places…"

Listening to the original version now seems reverently 80's-ish, and has therefore lost its signature edginess. However, a newer cover was made by a British group, Candy Says.* This version sounds – now – much like the original version did back in 1985 – tense, tragic, and transcendent.

This group is categorized in the Lo-Fi genre, which is similar to Chill Out. As a whole, this genre appeals to me because it contains those elements of inspiration, passion, and non-digital live recording which give the listener the impression that this is "real music" that will "take you there" – a time-honored musical concept that was forgotten sometime during the Grunge movement.

The more I read what we call the news, the more I believe the faithful are assiduously climbing that final summit.

 H/T: The movie, Close, based on the life events of Jacquie Davis, a world class female bodyguard. Critical reviews report ratings ranging between 39-51%, citing "subtle-racism" and "tediously predictable". In a recent post covering* Dark Phoenix*, Blair Naso quipped, "If [the critics] hate a movie it's probably pretty good." Here, here, I fully concur.*

Father's Day

Yesterday was Father's Day in the U.S. So on that note, I want to say that I have the greatest Dad ever. He took me on the road when I was an adolescent. We went all over two states in the Midwest, hiking, camping, and doing basic survival stuff. He taught me to fear God and have faith, to relax, to teach people how I want them to treat me, to not let people roll you, and to think twice about everything before I believed it.

While we were off doing Man-stuff together, I discovered that my Dad has the most riotous sense of high-brow humor, cracking off-color jokes funnier than any stand-up comedian I've ever heard. My favorites are his "Translations", in which he rephrases something that someone said in more truthful, authentic words, often times with a revealing twist. It never fails to leave me ROTFLMAO. I've picked up on a little of that habit, but not nearly as zany as his.

In giving lessons in masculinity, nobody does it better than your own father. I would even call my Dad my best friend, and I believe he would say the same thing of me.

> "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." ~ Psalms 103:13 (KJV)

Links

1. PA Pundits: Dads make THE difference! (2019 June 16)

> "The Hebrew word for "father" is "ab." Abba, meaning "Daddy", comes from this word. The source of a thing is its "ab" or father. The source of all relationships is at the core of fatherhood. The functions of fatherhood include: Originator, Author, Founder, Source, Sustainer, Protector, Disciplinarian, Leader, Head, Caring One, Creator, or Developer. If these titles sound paramount, it's because they are. The father's role is so important and that's why it's under attack in our nation."
>
> "Dads teach their sons fatherhood by the way they mentally, emotionally, and spiritually groom them. Boys pass down what they caught from their dads, not what they were necessarily taught.
>
> The father is the starter."
>
> "Dads are responsible for imparting confidence, courage, and character in their children. The presence of the father is needed. There is no present that can replace his time, love, and passion.
>
> The relationship to your earthly father is a direct connection and link to your relationship with our Heavenly Father. Your earthly father is the first impression you get of God our Father. Many children in America have an absentee dad, so they believe God is truant as well. The godless youth culture we see is a direct reflection of apathetic, antagonistic, and alcoholic dads.
>
> Dads make THE difference!"

2. Spawny's Space: It Is Always "The Herd" (2019 June 14)

> "Let's face it; the world needs intelligent and practical fellas figuring this all out, then imposing some discipline on the herd for its own good. If only there was a word for that. Maybe we could invent one here. We all look up to the Glorious Patriarch; perhaps he could be of help."

In my writings, I refer to this practice as "wife management". An extension of this exercise to a larger group would be called "herd management". In traditional Christianity it's called "shepherding", or "pastoral care". But somehow the true meaning of husbandry has gotten lost and denigrated over the years. "Patriarchy" refers to the social structure, not the practice of "shepherding" the herd.

Brother Earl adds,

> "Without the social structure it becomes much harder to shepherd the herd. Or if you will…without giving men their Godly authority (or undermining it at every turn), it's harder for them to practice their responsibilities."

Besides Patriarchy, how else can fathers find it easier to practice their Godly authority more responsibly?

3. Donal Graeme: Selected Sunday Scriptures- #151 (2019 June 16)

One answer: Respectful children who honor their parents can make fatherhood a joy. Here, Donal cites the Sirach, Chapter 3.

> "[3] Those who honor their father atone for sins…
> [5] Those who honor their father will have joy in their own children, and when they pray they will be heard.
> [6] Those who respect their father will have long life…
> [7] they will serve their parents as their masters.
> [8] Honor your father by word and deed, that his blessing may come upon you.
> [9] For a father's blessing strengthens the houses of the children…
> [10] Do not glorify yourself by dishonoring your father, for your father's dishonor is no glory to you.
> [11] The glory of one's father is one's own glory…
> [12] My child, help your father in his old age, and do not grieve him as long as he lives;
> [13] even if his mind fails, be patient with him; because you have all your faculties do not despise him.
> [14] For kindness to a father will not be forgotten, and will be credited to you against your sins;
> [15] in the day of your distress it will be remembered in your favor; like frost in fair weather, your sins will melt away.
> [16] Whoever forsakes a father is like a blasphemer…"

Call your Dad and give him some joy.

4. Adam Piggott: Podcast #111 – The Golden Rules Episode (2019 June 10).*

We know rules are for those who lack (1) a well-honed sense of discernment, (2) the good sense of responsible agency, and (3) the presence of mind needed to comprehend the dynamics which necessitate the rules.

Adam gives some sage advice for men and fathers in the practice of business and family management, and he boils it down to some simple Golden Rules.

The Management's Rules for selecting Administrator Membership:

1. No fluffs
2. No wimminz
3. No exceptions

A single girl's rules for attracting a husband (which are also good for her father to keep in mind):

1. Long hair
2. Stay thin
3. Debt Free
4. Virgin
5. No tattoos

A wife's rules for maintaining a happy marriage (to be enforced by hubby):

1. Long hair
2. Stay thin

3. Sex on demand
4. Eliminate Verbiage

Adam's "Rules" are classic! Print them out and Frame them on the wall.

 Thanks to Adam for commenting on last week's post in his podcast.*

5. Vox Popoli: The literature we have lost (2019 June 13)

Vox, the one who introduced the Socio-Sexual Hierarchy to the Manosphere, no longer produces any Red Pill theory, and most of his work has degenerated into commentaries about either society or his publishing business. I usually skip over most of his posts, but this particular post contained a significant insight in regard to how education has changed over the last century.

> "Whoever has committed to memory in childhood such Bible extracts as Genesis i, the Ten Commandments, Psalm xxiii, Matthew v, 8-12, The Lord's Prayer, and I Corinthians xiii, such English prose as Lincoln's Gettysburg speech, Bacon's "Essay on Truth," and such poems as Bryant's "Waterfowl," Addison's "Divine Ode," Milton's Sonnet on his Blindness, Wotton's "How happy is he born or taught," Emerson's "Rhodora," Holmes's "Chambered Nautilus," and Gray's Elegy, and has stamped them on his brain by frequent repetition, will have set up in his mind high standards of noble thought and feeling, true patriotism, and pure religion. He will also have laid in an invaluable store of good English."

Vox concludes,

> "What has happened to the former "Junior Classics" in the last 100 years is both a prelude and a microcosm of what has happened to the West as a whole. It's something that can be seen in everything from the transition of blasphemy laws to hate speech laws and the musical descent from "The Hallelujah Chorus" to "Christmas in Hollis". First, the Christian influence was pushed to the side, then it was removed and replaced with a focus on secular aesthetics, then the aesthetics were abandoned and the original purpose of the institution was entirely lost."

When I was in high school (late 80's) and college (early 90's), the required reading included classics such as Louisa May Alcott, Ambrose Bierce, Lewis Carroll, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Ernest Hemingway, George Orwell (1984, Animal Farm), E. A. Poe, William Shakespeare, H. D. Thoreau, Mark Twain…

My Christian mentors advocated authors such as G. K. Chesterton, C. S. Lewis, George MacDonald, Henri Nouwen, J. I. Packer, Derek Prince, A. W. Tozer, Warren Wiersbe (The Strategy of Satan), and as of late, Timothy Keller…

I've always felt that these works contributed to my set of beliefs and character immensely. So why do we not see young people reading these same works?

In lieu of a proper education in classic literature, I kindly suggest fathers may consider assigning selected readings to their children.

6. Dark Brightness: Daybook (2019 June 13)*

This post contains a collection of quotes that, as a whole, inspire us to lift our eyes to see the vision of eternity.

> "…those who are of Christ are becoming clear, and they are not all in his church (which is wise enough to know that they [present an] evil to sort out)."

> "I am haunted by a sense that the End Times are nigh.
> It is as if the battle lines are being drawn, and the No Man's Land between Heaven and Hell is shrinking day by day, hour by hour. There will be no Switzerland in the next world war. Every soul is being forced to take a side."

I won't cite any more, so as to not spoil the readers experience. Please click over to Dark Brightness for a Daytrip of his apocalyptic prophecy.

 I haven't cited (or even read) DB in a while, largely because the extensive reformatting of his blog has made it troublesome to follow until recently.*

7. The Rabbit Hole

I came across this site which appears to be an aggregator of selected Red Pill / Manosphere posts – something which is sorely needed.

Here's another rabbit hole…

Moon Day Review – Howling at the Moon

Jack · 24 June 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Insane journalism, asinine politics, good laughs, and a few wise words from 2019 June 16-22.

Readership: All
Note: Wanking Moonshine
Length: 1,950 words
Reading Time: 6.5 minutes

Get this...

1. Campus Reform (feat. Grace Gottschling): EXCLUSIVE: PSU poised to punish prof who proved point with hoax 'dog rape' article, despite receiving global praise for prof (2019 June 21)

> "In 2018, three academics decided to challenge esteemed "peer-reviewed" academic journals by producing and submitting false articles with what they thought were ridiculous theses.
>
> Articles on rape culture being perpetuated in dog parks, fat bodybuilding, and the presence of toxic masculinity in "breastaurants" such as Hooters were all submitted, reviewed, and published by esteemed journals without a shred of fact or verifiable support.
>
> Of the 20 "intentionally broken academic papers" written by the trio, seven were accepted and published in academic journals — the same journals that students are encouraged to consult when writing papers of their own. Another seven of the 20 were rejected, with the rest pending review before the ruse was uncovered.
>
> Helen Pluckrose, James Lindsay, and Portland State University professor Peter Boghossian documented and announced their hoax project in an interview with The New York Times in October 2018.
>
> Since then, their work uncovering the errs of academic research has garnered praise and support from thousands of students, academics, and other individuals across the world."
>
> "These [hoax] results raise serious questions about the methods of several seemingly legitimate academic journals."

But Drs. Pluckrose, Lindsay, and Boghossian were not the first to publish fake science for the purpose of trolling the scientific publishing industry. Dr. Alan Sokal pulled this stunt way back in 1996!

> "Most notably, PSU administrators received an email from Alan Sokal, a physicist who currently teaches at New York University. In 1996, Sokal, much like Boghossian and Co., challenged what he believed to be a flawed process within academic journals by submitting an article, "Transgressing the Boundaries: Toward a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity" in the cultural studies journal Social Text.
>
> Sokal's article, although tongue-in-cheek and intentionally poorly sourced, was published after being peer-reviewed by the journal editors. Months later, Sokal published a letter outing himself for what happened and criticizing not just the journal, but the loose standards emerging across academia.
>
> "Throughout the article, I employ scientific and mathematical concepts in ways that few scientists or mathematicians could possibly take seriously." Sokal states, referring to multiple instances where he mentions concepts made of "pure invention" on his part.
>
> "In sum, I intentionally wrote the article so that any competent physicist or mathematician (or undergraduate physics or math major) would realize that it is a spoof. Evidently, the editors of Social Text felt comfortable publishing an article on quantum physics without bothering to consult anyone knowledgeable in the subject."
>
> After the 2018 hoax articles were exposed, many began referring to the project as Sokal Squared, or Sokal 2.0, > given that the authors in both cases claim to have written the articles as a parody to challenge and ultimately improve the methods being used in academic publishing.

>
> "It seems to me that it would be a grave injustice to punish Professor Boghossian for a violation of the letter of the [Research Misconduct Policy] that did not constitute in any way a violation of that policy's purpose and which moreover was undertaken with the goal of serving, and which did, in fact, serve the public interest…" Sokal wrote to PSU administrators.
>
> "If anything, Professor Boghossian and his collaborators should be congratulated for raising important issues in a forceful and unconventional manner; and Portland State University should take pride in having such a distinguished public intellectual on its faculty."

And while fake science continues being published, real news is being papered over with entertaining stories about our favorite female comedian…

2. Campus Reform (feat. Cabot Phillips): Even students say AOC's 'concentration camps' comment too 'extreme' (2019 June 20)

> "This administration has established concentration camps on the southern border," she said, before doubling down in an Instagram live video.
>
> The comments immediately sparked outrage from many, including the World Center For Holocaust Research, Yad Vashem.
>
> The group responded to Ocasio-Cortez by saying, "Concentration camps assured a slave labor supply to help in the Nazi war effort, even as the brutality of life inside the camps helped assure the ultimate goal of 'extermination through labor."
>
> "Wanting to know what college students thought of the comments, Campus Reform's Cabot Phillips went to George Washington University in Washington, D.C. with a copy of Ocasio-Cortez's tweet.
>
> It soon became clear that students on both sides of the aisle found the congresswoman's comparison appalling."

Phillip's video shows students shaking their heads and snickering.

> "I think it's a bit extreme."

Even naïve, liberalized students of Propaganda Indoctrination University™ (PIU) are becoming aware that the joke is up.

But, wait, there's more! As the 'logical leaps of faith' from congress wimmin AOC continue to make us laugh, one hard core Polish bad-@$$ makes it all that much easier.

3. The National Sentinel: Member of Polish parliament invites Left-wing mouth Ocasio-Cortez to see some REAL 'concentration camps' (2019 June 20)

> "A member of Poland's parliament has invited 'Democratic Socialist' Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-N.Y.) to fly to their country to see what real "concentration camps" look like after she accused our Department of Homeland Security of running some along the U.S.-Mexico border.
>
> As noted by The Conservative Brief, Ocasio-Cortez has been under fire from conservatives after claiming on her Instagram account earlier this week that DHS and Border Patrol were rounding up illegal aliens and stuffing them in concentration camps, comparing it to the Nazi Holocaust against Jews, in which more than six million > were exterminated."

That's right! Old man Trump put his good ol' boy Kushner in charge of the camp, just to make sure the ICE coffin patrol was packing those pill boxes just like Himmler did in '45!

> "She doubled down, though, after being criticized for her remarks (she even used "never again" in her Instagram video, a phrase widely known to be associated with the Holocaust), proving she is completely clueless (and outrageous)…"

How could AOC do more good for the world? By continuing her career as a stand-up comedian, or by returning to hell's kitchen and dicing up those delicious, kosher beef enchiladas for the (((men)))?

On a more serious note, here's a relevant story that's been kept under the thug.

4. RT News: Assange lawyer reveals Pentagon behind pursuit of WikiLeaks publisher (2019 June 21)

> "A lawyer for WikiLeaks' Julian Assange has confirmed that the Pentagon – not the White House or any other government agency whose secrets he leaked – was driving the nearly decade-long campaign to destroy the publisher."

And another…

5. Greg Palast (feat. Nicole Powers): Mexico City: Palast Wins Journalism Award (2019 June 17)

> "The Association of Mexican Journalists has awarded Greg Palast their 2019 prize for International Reporter for his exposés on the theft of elections from Georgia to Mexico and his reporting from Venezuela."

Palast's acceptance speech (in the same link above) is worth a read.

> "If my fellow Americans seem as ignorant and crazy as chihuahuas, foolishly electing people like George Bush and Donald Trump, forgive them, because my countrymen don't get the truth through their news, only exposure to a torrent of cheap propaganda.
>
> But let me defend my countrymen.
>
> Americans never elected George Bush. In 2000, I discovered how Bush stole the election in Florida. My story for BBC, The British Broadcasting Corporation, was published all over the world — except in my own nation.
>
> And later, in 2006, they stole another election. Here, in Mexico.
>
> I directed an investigation for The Guardian of England that proved, without any doubt, that AMLO [now President Lopez Obrador] had won. That story was completely disappeared from the media in my country."
>
> "Today, as I accept this honor, I am sadly aware of the absence of my fellow journalist, Julian Assange.
>
> Assange is in prison today for the sole crime of letting Americans know the truth about their own government and the deadly crimes of our leaders.
>
> I am honored to accept this award — from a courageous nation of journalists far more courageous than me, who have given their lives to report the news. All I can do is commit to honor your award by continuing to fight to uncover the truth, whether in Caracas or Mexico or Washington."

* H/T: Rise Up Times

6. Matthew Cochran: Disgusting Things Ought to Disgust Us (2019 June 20)

In this diatribe against the mentoring of children by Fairy Queens, Cochran lays it bare.

> "None of this is accidental. It's precisely how "grooming" works for pedophiles. They try to get their targets used to small actions they would ordinarily find disgusting so that when they finally act, the child's revulsion doesn't reflexively kick in and interfere until it's too late. Right now, the Spirit of the Age is grooming both children and parents at the same time. It wants the kids growing up thinking disgusting things are normal. It also wants the parents to back off from our God-given responsibility to train and attune our children's innate sense of disgust towards disgusting things. It makes sure our kids are exposed to a constant diet of perversion while making parents so scared of being seen as pearl-clutching bigots that we fail to do anything about it."

I could really wax medieval on this point. The Spirit of the Age should not be regarded lightly.

> "Parents, you cannot afford to step aside. This will not pass you or your family by. Whether you stand alone or with others, you need to know what is going on and refuse to submit to it no matter how loudly people scream "bigot" at you. Do not let it pile up so deeply in your children's lives that you all become used to it."

I remember when I was a kid, I could feel a sense of guilt and apprehension whenever one of my peers told a lie, or talked about sex in an inappropriate way. This discernment is a healthy part of the innocence of youth. But as young'uns grow older, continual exposure to the dark side will sear the conscience and pave the way for a lifetime of sin.

Cochran offers an important point. Do what you can to protect children's minds and hearts from perversion.

Now here's something truly disgusting…

7. Snapper TRX: "Ethics Departments", or, How to Kill Your Game 101. (2019 June 20)

Square Enix's ethics department pressured the game's creator, Tetsuya Nomura, to greatly reduce the breast size of Tifa, one of the main characters in the remake of Final Fantasy 7. We've yet to see whether this decision will sink FF7 faster than Disney sank Star Wars.

Snapper asks,

> "So are big busted women unethical?"

Women with a nice butt and curvy legs can rev up the temper of a man's libido, but a woman with beautiful breasts inspires confidence and satisfaction in a man. The Bible even says so, in Proverbs 5:19 (NKJV). Seeing how male confidence is now "toxic", that would render wowzerly busted women "unethical", according to the Feminist Power-Fear ethical system. We can't have anything that might inspire a man to feel confident!

Like this?

Yeeeaaahhh… Feeling more confident now?

Last of all, this read is surely worth a good chuckle.

8. Insanity Bytes: A Rare Cougar Sighting... (2019 June 19)

It's hard to find real news, but unfortunately, cougars are not all that rare. However, it's not every day that you see one climbing the trees to scope out hawt male targets!

> "Cougars as you know, tend to prowl around chasing younger men. I do not think of giant cats when I hear that term but rather of older women. Here is a photo of one in her natural habitat, probably watching a softball game…"

And so… I'll leave you laughing.

Moon Day Review – The Escalation of Anarchy

Jack · 8 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Lynx for June 30 – July 6.

Readership: All
Note: July 3 – New (Waxing) Moon
Length: 1,650 words
Reading Time: 5.5 minutes

1. Rise Up Times (feat. Helena Cobban): The Ethics of Regime Change (2019 July 3)

If you've ever lived abroad for more than a few weeks, you'll know it's mind numbing to see the news reports in foreign countries. Why? It's because they cover angles that the Global Nooz Network (GNN) won't tell you about. Here, Cobban discusses American Interventionism in a way that was hard for me to believe until I lived abroad for several years.

> "…behind a public façade of supporting mass movements and "democracy promotion," a great portion of the regime-change efforts undertaken by Western governments still relies on fomenting the kind of "palace coups" that were a staple of CIA operations during the Cold War…"
>
> "…the massive investment that Western officials made in projects to bring about regime change (or regime collapse) have thus far failed. The civilian populations of both Syria and Venezuela—and of half a dozen other countries targeted by Western government for regime change—now find themselves trapped in crises of deep impoverishment, displacement, and infrastructure collapse from which no easy exit is in sight. The governments that launched or supported all these regime-change efforts bear some responsibility for this suffering."

Cobban goes on to list several tactical tools in the jiffy quick Regime-Change toolbox.

1. The encouragement of high-level defections.
2. Ever-tighter economic sanctions, the effects of which (despite claims of "targeting") are nearly always devastating for citizens of the sanctioned country.
3. The creation of new "mass protest movements" in these countries, or the co-optation of existing ones.
4. The intense use of information ops and communications ops intended to bolster the "opposition" and to discredit the targeted government. (This was a Cold War staple, too.)
5. Cyberattacks, including on infrastructure vital to civilians' wellbeing.
6. Deployment of highly politicized "humanitarian" activities aimed at relieving the suffering only of populations opposed to the targeted government and not those still loyal to it. (This politicization of humanitarianism violates the long-held precept of the political neutrality of humanitarian action and thus diminishes the chances of real humanitarian action being possible in the future.)
7. On occasion, as in Gaza and Syria, the use (and support of use by others) of actual military force.

To the rest of the world, Orwell's Big Brother has already arrived, and is now supported by your tax dollars.

2. Asia Dialogue (feat. Wataru Kusaka): Why Filipinos have come to embrace authoritarian 'discipline' (2019 July 3)

In this excellent article on the political transformation of a burgeoning economy, Kusaka cites ¡SCIENCE! to explain the transition of legitimate politics and the reconfiguration of violence, resulting in the current popularity of Dirty Duterte.

> "Neoliberalism and populism have damaged the balance between liberalism and democracy: populism, because it radicalises democracy while undermining liberalism in the name of the popular will of 'good people'; and neoliberalism, because it radicalises liberalism while undermining democracy by reducing the 'demos' which is responsible for democracy to 'homo economicus'.
>
> Consequently, the vector sum of extreme populism plus neoliberalism leads to a 'state of exception' in which a sovereign state can legitimately kill 'dangerous others' in an alleged crisis."

Kusaka goes on to explain how the emergence of an extremely fluid party system, penetration of the media to the masses, and increased levels of migration for work and remittances, has produced a new political morality which focuses on definitions of a 'good we' vis-à-vis 'evil others'. These 'evil others' would be the liberal democratic elites on top, and those on the bottom who are too poor or lazy to get an education and work abroad.

As a result, this new middle-class moral populism has presented a serious challenge to the traditional interest politics (concerned with the distribution of resources) in deciding the outcome of national (and possibly other) elections.

When Filipinos get an honest chance to succeed by working hard, it's amazing how moral they can suddenly become. The Protestant Work ethic declares that if people are moral, then they will work hard, except the Philippines is Catholic, so here, hard working people become moral. I expect we'll see the rise of Gothic Filipino Banditos within 20 years.

3. The Ethnic European (feat. Mike Walsh): Nearly Half A Million Flee Lawless London (2019 July 3)

As bad as a Puritanical Asian-Hispanic culture might sound, it's definitely better than what's going down in London town.

> "New figures show that record numbers of Londoners are fleeing the capital as a result of soaring violent crime rates and the high cost of living. The brain drain, most of those packing their bags and getting out are self-achievers, whom the capital can ill afford to lose. The departing successful-set are being replaced by benefit-laden migrants thus adding to the drain on the capital's resources."
>
> Stats released by the Office for National Statistics show that in the year to June, 340,498 Londoners left the city while just 237,270 migrated inwards from the rest of the country – a net loss of 103,228."
>
> "336,000 Londoners already left in 2017, a figure significantly higher than the 255,140 who left in 2012. However, London's population is still increasing thanks to immigration from abroad."

No thanks to policy makers who allowed unfettered immigration and made it commonplace, literally.

4. Biblical Signs in the Headlines (feat. Michael Sawdy): INDEPENDENCE DAY SHAKING: America's Modern-Day Sodom Struck by Strongest Earthquake in 2 Decades (2019 July 4)

Meanwhile, the Night of the Living Dead continues on as usual in Californica, where environmental catastrophes are seen to be the cause of all things unholy, instead of the other way around.

> "…instead of acknowledging that all of the rare and historic earthquakes, wildfires, and hurricanes are all God's way of getting our attention after falling so far away from Him as a nation, the youth of today are brainwashed to believe that it's all a result of random "climate change" or "global warming."

The Left is right in saying that natural disasters are caused by human activity, but they are wrong in thinking those disasters might be allayed by "reducing the carbon footprint", or some such nonsense.

> "As long as many Americans continue to believe this lie promoted by men and women who have never picked up a Holy Bible in their lives, the judgments of the LORD will only continue to get worse. No amount of "climate action" taken by this generation, or any generation, will ever prevent the future weather catastrophes from getting worse.
>
> The only thing that will ever prevent future disasters in America and the world is turning from SIN, repenting of it, humbling ourselves under the Almighty Hand of God, and returning to Him with all of our hearts. Until we do, mark my words, the judgments (especially in Godless states like California and New York) will continue to fall upon the USA."

By the way, if this doesn't make sense to you, then just close this browser window and go to Fazelook or the next article in Puffington Host, in order to continue enjoying your Politically Correct State of DeNile.

If you wish to continue reading, then be informed that you have chosen to take the Red Pill.

5. The Orthosphere (feat. Kristor): The Sigil of the Orthosphere (2019 July 2)

6. Dark Brightness: Mistrust all public religion. (2019 July 3)

7. Collective Evolution (feat. Richard Enos): Powerful New David Icke Documentary Implores Us to Become Renegades (2019 July 3)

8. Dark Brightness: Woke Journal (2019 July 5)

Here's a real classic piece from Dark Brightness, which brings us to the Apocalypse Now.

- A quote from McCain describing the echo-chamber hegemony of the urbanite elite in politics and media.
- Soldier fly larvae proteins being used to create food for exotic pets, and soon, Soylent Green for the masses.
- Automated Artificial Intelligence and Machine Learning systems designed to monitor and regulate all human activity.

Now welcome Big Brother home to roost, from his unspoken international interventionism, to turn his austere gaze onto the Yankee codgel. Once home of the free and the brave, now ghetto of free stuff to the slave.

9. The Red Quest: Location and logistics, married guys (2019 July 5)

To pop the last candid cherry on the lake of Anarchy, The Red Quest offers tips on how married guys can slink around the bush.

> "You still need good fundamentals, you still need to approach, you still need to accept rejections, etc. etc. But if you are married and trying to hide it, you also worry about your approach being rejected and then the woman telling on you to your wife… so why get married, or stay married if you already are married? Sounds like a lot of bullshit."

Yes, there are other alternatives to affairs, such as this one: Created for Connection.

> "Big problem for those guys is also probably location and logistics. Good game is tough in suburbs and always will be. Other moms are likely targets."

Good neighbors pimp yo mama! All soccer moms and cougar MILFs on display! Step right up here, laydied and gentrymen. Take 'em down for the count!

> "There are a small number of chicks who actively prefer married guys, and a larger but still small number who don't mind the married guy. Some chicks will actively reject married guys."

There are also some women who don't give a d@mn about marital status, one way or the other. The only question is whether he is Mr. Right Now.

> "Amateurs worry about what to say, pros worry about logistics…"

Cons set up a system of logistics, such that the action is promulgated automatically and reliably.

Such is the world we live in.

In closing, a line of classical poetry from the 20th century of horrors.

> Do not go gentle into that good night,
> Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
> Rage, rage against the dying of the light.
>
> ~ Dylan Thomas

News Flash: One year on, Men STILL Prefer Debt-Free Virgins without Tattoos!

Jack · 16 July 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Quality never goes out of style!

Readership: All

Believe it or not, it's been exactly one year since we saw the Fembo power game being exhumed in the skirmish around Lori Alexander's article, Men Prefer Debt-Free Virgins Without Tattoos (July 16, 2018).

The crux of the fracas was largely caused by the fact that a woman (Lori) declared that men (should) also have (at least) a share of the decision-making power in the spouse-choosing process.

This bit of truth seems intuitive to me, but obviously, western society has become so riddled with feminist hamstertalk, that this truth is no longer obvious, nor goes without contention. But obviously, the matrixarchy really doesn't want alternate models to be considered, discussed, or explored.

Just in case anyone had absentmindedly dismissed that men's fetish for undeflorated virginas as just a passing fad, or an outdated, overrated gimmick designed to trap unsuspecting men into marriage, our undercover correspondents have just reported that this illogical craze continues on, unabated.

Imagine that!

Related

Lori's article received quite a lot of attention in the Manosphere. For anyone interested in a refresher, the aftermath was discussed in the following posts.

- Christianity and Masculinity: Lori's Men Prefer Debt-Free Virgins Without Tattoos (July 20, 2018)
- Dalrock: Hysteria. (July 23, 2018)
- Spawny's Space: Missing The Point Deliberately (July 24, 2018)
- Dalrock: Well played. (July 26, 2018)
- Wintery Knight: Lori Alexander is right – serious Christian men prefer debt-free virgins without tattoos (2019-2-2)

Lest we forget, Marriage was once intended to Glorify God

Jack · 8 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

In all the squabble over power games, frivorce rights, and marriage equality, have we forgotten that God instituted marriage to glorify Himself?

Readership: All

While I was writing the previous post, News Flash: One year on, Men STILL Prefer Debt-Free Virgins without Tattoos! (2019-07-16), I browsed several other WordPress blogs that had responded to Lori Alexander's article. Nearly all of them tore down Lori's arguments with familiar narratives. Some of these arguments are worth revisiting because they don't line up with scripture.

The Truth: We are created in His image, Male and Female

The modern doctrine of Equalism is a weak eisegesis, at best, and the doctrine of demons, at worst. Since this particular false doctrine is currently very popular, the idea of shepherding one's wife will seem odd to those tainted by Churchianism.

One blogger named Diana Rice wrote,

> "What bothers me most about Alexander's views is her sense that women and men are not equal image bearers of God. Specifically, she quotes that "The husband will need to take years teaching his wife the correct way to act, think, and live since college taught them every possible way that is wrong."

Of course, it would be maddening for them to admit that male-female equality is not mentioned anywhere in the Bible, neither as a social virtue nor a spiritual precept, nor are women ever commanded to go to college to be initiated into Shatan's Shex Showowity, or… <cough> becum edgumecated, or so we are told.

However, the idea of men and women being image bearers of God deserves further consideration. God created man and woman in His image, as male and female.

> [27] So God created man in His own image; in the image of God He created him; male and female He created them. ~ Genesis 1:27 (NKJV)

Perhaps the one creation that best represents and glorifies the nature and personhood of God in this world is a marriage between a man and a woman – not a man and a man, not a woman and a woman, not Chivalry, not Game, not Feminism, and not MGTOW.

That said, I've seen some pornographic videos that are more God glorifying than some family sitcoms on TV.

A male and female joined in marital union can become an entity greater than the sum of its parts. That additional sum is the glory of God.

That's right! Married men, you can tell your wife,

> "Tonight honeyslot, you shall %*&@ your man and glorify God… and you're going to looove it!"

However, some relationships produce unions that are less than the sum of its parts. Proponents of mirage equaluhty fail to recognize that anything that detracts from the marital union of a man and a woman, also detracts from the potential glorification of God that could otherwise be achieved.

Glory appears to be something easy to ignore these days, maybe it's because it's something rarely seen, or maybe it's because we've forgotten the Lord.

True, humans have the self-centered disposition to think lightly of God's glory, but it's extremely important to God. So much so, in fact, that if you're frustrated and having difficulties in life, perhaps it's because you neglected to allow God to be glorified through whatever it is you're doing.

Hey wimmin… Can't attract a man? Can't latch down that hawt hunk's commitment? Maybe you're not giving God the glory.

> "But if a woman has long hair, it is a glory to her; for her hair is given to her for a covering." ~ 1st Corinthians 11:15 (NKJV)

Take this time tested hint from the sages of antiquity. Don't ever cut your hair shorter than your nips! That's just one way among many, that women can add to the total sum of glorification.

Going back to Lori's now famous article… If, because of tattoos, debt, and past sexual indiscretion, a woman is passed over for another who is without those qualities, it is to further enhance the glory of God.

The bottom line is this: Obedience serves to manifest God's nature, love, and glory. A strong marriage is a reward of continual obedience, and as such, is a powerful way to glorify God in this life. If you want a good marriage, you have to glorify God.

If God hasn't called you to marriage, then he intends for you to glorify Him through some other way. But if God has called you to marriage (which I believe is the majority of people), but you make other priorities in life which don't glorify God as much as marriage does (e.g. being an underemployed soy boy, or a blue-haired feminist with a Ph.D.), then you are failing to fulfill God's purposes for your life, one of which is to glorify Him.

The Lie: Your obedience is required by God

In another rebuttal, Pastor Chris Legg wrote,

> "…there are many passages in which "obedience" is required by God."

Legg is playing the Pharisee card by claiming that obedience is required by God. "Required" is too strong of a word here, because obedience is a free choice. Instead, I would say, God tells us the best way to go about living, but life itself challenges us to be obedient.

Why is spiritual obedience important? It can't really improve your standing with God. It can't save your soul. It might ease a guilty conscience. But really, what it does is allows you to become a blessing, a source of love and inspiration, to the people around you.

If we are truly obedient, then those around us should reap the fruits of our obedience. But if one is obedient only because he hopes to gain a particular fruit of obedience from God, then he will most likely become frustrated in this attempt. God doesn't cut deals. Those blessings are given to us as free gifts, not as wages for being good or righteous, which we could never do to God's satisfaction.

God obviously allows people to be disobedient, and if we choose to be disobedient, God will use that situation efficiently for His purposes. He often uses such an opportunity to show us the following,

- A greater depth of self-understanding.
- The nature of our misconceptions.
- A deeper awareness of what is truly important, and how things actually work.
- The benefits and blessings of obedience.
- To extol His everlasting lovingkindness and mercy.

Now, being obedient to God is perhaps the most positive motivation a man might have in opting into the wimminz-take-all institution of marriage these days. Since obedience (and marriage) is open to election, then only those men who are seeking to be obedient will care to bother with the responsibilities thereof.

For all the sacrifice and risk a man must accept in marriage, he should be holding out for a wife who is a source of companionship, respect, and regular, enthusiastic sex, as well as love, inspiration, and babies, and who is not a source of STD's, debt, and collegiate-quality debate tactics. These latter things are absolutely worthless, if not counterproductive towards enhancing the glory of God in marriage.

Why should men be so particular? Because a beautiful marriage is what would glorify God, and that is the point that too many are missing.

If a man goes to all the trouble and risk to be obedient by glorifying God through a marriage, then you can rest assured that he'll want to find a wife who is likewise committed to spiritual obedience – and not only to God, but also in her dealings with him as well. One might even argue that this is (partly) what it means to be equally yoked in marriage.

The Lie: What's truly important is merely a preference

In the same post, Pastor Legg wrote,

> "So, as in the case of premarital sex, God would certainly "prefer" that we all obey his teaching to wait until a covenant marriage to embrace sex!"

Here, Legg is playing the Herodian card by schmoozing holiness with obedience and claiming that sexual purity is preferred by God. "Preferred" is too soft of a word here. The verb Commanded is a better descriptor.

> [3] But fornication and all uncleanness or covetousness, let it not even be named among you, as is fitting for saints; [4] neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor coarse jesting, which are not fitting, but rather giving of thanks. [5] For this you know, that no fornicator, unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God. [6] Let no one deceive you with empty words, for because of these things the wrath of God comes upon the sons of disobedience. [7] Therefore do not be partakers with them. ~ Ephesians 5:3-7 (NKJV)

Illicit sex is not merely an issue of casual disobedience, such as a woman cutting her hair too short or getting a tattoo. Illicit sex is an issue of idolatry. Getting free from idolatry is significantly more important than being obedient. As stated in verse 6, it is the idolatry of the thing that destroys one's spiritual inheritance and calls down God's wrath, and not merely disobedience. So it naturally follows that promiscuous whiminz cannot possibly be obedient to God or (future) husband, because obedience to the Tingling Ashtoreth has taken polarity.

Even if sexual liaisons were merely a preference, as Feminists would have us believe, the problem remains that there are too many Churchians who do not prefer what God requires for our own sanctification. Yet even so, many wicked women worn wide and weary by the Alpha widow makers feel entitled to have a "worthy" man (by their independent estimation) who is also impeccably obedient to God such that they may obtain all the blessings of a Christian marriage.

> "Those who regard worthless idols Forsake their own Mercy.
> But I will sacrifice to You with the voice of thanksgiving;
> I will pay what I have vowed. Salvation is of the Lord." ~ Jonah 2:8-9 (NKJV)

RP Translation: Whiminz who ride the Carousel forsake their chance to have a joyful Christian marriage. Sorry, NRFS!

The Big Comfortable Lie of License without Consequence

This was also written by Rice in the first post cited above,

> "That fundamental aspect of our character cannot be undone by going to college, having a career, having debt, or even having tattoos. We are not less loved by God for having made any of these choices."

Character is a result of one's choices in life, be they good or bad. Maybe bad choices or disobedience will not cause one to be less loved by God, but it can render a woman less loved by men seeking a wife for a marriage that glorifies God.

Third Legg extends,

> "…[Lori's] article, if you aren't careful in your reading of it, will communicate that women who are not virgins, in debt or have tattoos cannot get the best men – godly men – high quality men.
>
> Not true.
>
> You are not "damaged goods" (or at least not any more damaged than the rest of us) or something less lovely or less pure (see above).
>
> Good men, godly men, understand God's value of treasure. And we make decisions based on His measurements rather than our own.
>
> There are men who submit their "preferences" to God's perspective."

Here is a nice pep-talk for carnal or spiritually immature women who are feeling guilty about their choices, which may very well be most of his congregation. But Legg is dismissing the nature and consequences of idolatry. To spell it out more clearly, a disobedient woman is one marred by short blue hair, tattoos, and debt, and who holds disdainful attitudes towards male authority and masculinity. This disobedience is what makes her "damaged goods", because she fails to bear God's glory. However, these things can be forgiven, as Legg exerts strenuously. But an idolatrous fornicator, on the other hand, is "destroyed goods" – one we are admonished to avoid altogether, according to Ephesians 5:7.

Rice and Legg are denying reality – the reality of the SMP, the MMP, and God's Word, which says,

> "Can a man take fire to his bosom, And his clothes not be burned?
> Can one walk on hot coals, And his feet not be seared?" ~ Proverbs 6:27-28 (NKJV)

Sin has consequences. If a man marries a woman who once engaged in a sexually promiscuous lifestyle, then he too will have to bear those consequences.

Ms. Rice and Pastor Legg seem to imply that good, godly men will simply ignore their own desire for marital bonding and blissful joy, and gladly accept these consequences as their duty to God to "carry their cross". After all, Jesus's sacrifice doesn't cover college debt, tattoos, and the alpha widowhood associated with poor marriages. Honest, hardworking husbands must also do their part to save a ho. The problem is that men fail to recognize God's precious pearl in the ruff (probably because it's covered with mud from the pigsty), or they're too lazy, or too selfish, or too wimpy to play the savior.

For those readers not following my sarcasm in the previous paragraph, we're not talking about saving a soul here, we're talking about saving a rebellious brat from the consequences of their actions. But how can the Word of God in Ephesians 5:5 be redacted, such that idolaters can regain their inheritance?

So Rice's and Legg's messages are merely a stroke of the feeelz gooed variety – which is exactly what those wimmin need to hear to keep their adulatrous hopes alive, and postpone an authentic repentance. But to the men, it's just another smack in the face "Man up and marry that slore!" message.

It should be noted that the basic "Man Up and marry" message is an attempt to shame men into being obedient unto granting commitment, cash, and prizes to women. Of note, shaming men into being obedient, is in itself, disobedience, as it is merely a manipulative parley for damage control and indemnification. This heavy handed tactic has become necessary because all the intrinsic rewards of obedience have already been burned up and the ashes blown to the wind. Should a man marry such a woman, there is little joy or benefit, and much risk to be undertaken. Furthermore, a marriage of obedience, in this case, offers but a token gesture of hollow homage to the glory of God.

But… if every woman becomes a tattooed, debt-ridden humpty-dump, then men will have no other choice!

Cheque mate!

Everyone Woke applauds, but no one is asking, How does this glorify God?

A disobedient woman going into debt in the hopes of becoming a CEO, and postponing or avoiding marriage all together, simply will not glorify God as much as if the same woman were obedient, got married, and spent her passions on husband and children.

If a bad woman goes to the dog pound for ten of her ripest years, spends her best on the worst, with nary a thought about her responsibilities, marriage, nor family, how does her idolatry glorify God?

If you believe it does, then who is your God?

Heh… Sound check.

It only glorifies the revelries of rebellion.

Final Statements

Lori Alexander's article sought to point out what would enhance God's glory and our joys of obedience. Detractors took many approaches, including the following.

- They sought to confuse the major difference between disobedience and rebellion.
- They offered comfortable lies that prevented the Holy Spirit from speaking to the guilty conscience of individuals, thereby delaying or bypassing their repentance from error.

- By failing to divide the uncomfortable Word of Truth, they enabled the Churchian rebellion to stampede further away from truth, beauty, goodness, and the glory of God.
- The “true lie” most resorted to was the overemphasis on God’s love for the disobedient and rebellious (AKA “Herodianism”).

The Word is a living sword that divides joints and marrow (Hebrews 4:12), and so was Lori’s article, which effectively divided those in society according to their core values. God wants to separate the sheep from the goats, in order to protect the sheep and give the goats their due. Revisiting another translation of Ephesians 5:7,

> “Come out of her, and do not partake in her transgressions.”

Related

- Wintery Knight: Are men allowed to have preferences about which women are best for marriage? (2019-2-13)
- Dalrock: Marriage and Children were always her priority (2019-7-17)

The Sinful Savior Complex

Jack · 12 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Summary: Women hoping to change bad boys into decent men, men trying to save a ho by marrying her up… In God's view, it's nothing more than the blind leading the blind in a grand denial of Christ.

Readership: All

Foreword: I only stumbled across the Manosphere after I had married for the second time, and then gradually, everything made sense. I've had to learn these things the hard way, and I'm passing it along so that others might not make the same mistakes.

The inspiration for this post came from Wintery Knight's article, Why Are So Many Women With Good Careers Being Forced To Freeze Their Eggs? (2019-7-20).

The Savior Complex

WK notes,

> "…once a woman reaches 30, she's actually chosen not to marry, and not to have children. Marriage is something that men are willing to do with women in their early 20's. They want a woman to commit and invest herself in his life early. They don't commit to a woman who has spent her 20's running up debts, traveling, being promiscuous, etc. The pattern of selfish behavior that women get into damages their ability to be good wives and mothers later."

Then WK goes into the reasons behind this behavior in the remainder of the article, which covers how women choose good looking bad boys in the hope of "changing them", AKA the Savior Complex. Another variation of the Savior Complex is when men choose to marry smoldering carousel riders with the intentions of transforming them into decent wives. The latter is known in the Manosphere as playing Captain Save-a-ho.

The Savior Complex is a common, but very evil form of idolatry, because she wants to be his savior, not Christ. God certainly uses relationships to bring people closer to Him, but when we choose the person who makes our reproductive organs throb and swell, and then start a Pygmalion project to Chaaange™ that person into someone who "pleases God" or some other absurd justification, we have entered into the synagogue of the Most Low. We might have the notion that we are in control and we are changing the other, but in fact, we are the one being changed and controlled, because we've already bowed the knee to Lust, Covetousness, and/or Envy. (I use the pronoun "we" because both men and women are guilty of this.)

There were many good comments under WK's post, including this one from Earl,

> "What attracts them to 'bad' men is that these men are ruled by their passions and not right reason which often comes from living a fearing God/moral way of life. Hence these type of men produce the 'tingles'… and they are easier to control (an immoral man has as many masters as he has vices). Now some women find out after the fornicating and fact that a man ruled by his passions can also be very abusive, objectifying, domineering, and controlling themselves."

Long story short, women are drawn to bad boys because they are bad themselves.

What's App? Me Badoo Twoo?

The big realization for me was that I am (or was) bad too! This is why I had always been attracted to bad women, and they to me!

Now, I wasn't a Chadwick embarking on mass Beelzebub formication. I was another kind of bad, maybe worse by some estimations. My immaturity, desperation, frustration, lack of discernment, and my heavy reliance on conscience, were a witches brew of characteristics and conditions which proved to be a latent form of evil.

I had the foolish notion that women who tolerated and forgave my weaknesses really loved me, when in fact, they were only high on an ego kick of controlling me through those same weaknesses. Now, I recognize this too, to be a variation of the Savior Complex.

In another nuanced particular, I had the Churchian idea that I had to play the Savior to her, since I was the man in the relationship. So she played the Savior by allowing me to play the Savior. Although through doing so, she remained firmly in control of the relationship, and milked the cow for all it was worth.

Deception cloaked in denial, all done to prop up our codependent life of sin. But denial requires one to be unaware of the Truth, on some level.

Yet, Truth comes eventually, and I know this to be true, because as I slowly grew out of those weaknesses, they grew mad as ɦəll because they could no longer control me. Then they blamed me for pretending to be "someone I am not" earlier in our relationship. They said I lied to them, and ironically, I now see that this much was true, although the blinders of idolatry had made me out to be a sincere and honest liar at the time. And to add insult to injury, I had learned some of their habits, and had started to control them in return.

I was also wrong about what kinds of characteristics would make a good wife. The things that I thought were important (e.g. socio-economic-political fit, personality, attraction or "chemistry", and even professing to be a Christian – which is nothing more than a cognitive assent to having faith in Christ, similar to Churchianity – and which might not represent the true state of her soul) don't really matter that much, and I wasn't very well aware of the things that really mattered (e.g. Heart Trust, spiritual compatibility or "vibes", shared values and life goals).

I naively believed I was doing right by getting married. I just assumed that things would work out if I was "obedient to God's will" by getting married. I expected God to do a lot of the things necessary to make my marriage work out, but actually, God wanted me to take responsibility for those things. As you can see, my Idol-Blinded Faith was my Achilles heel.

Extra-marital Sex as a Locus of Control

It is the nature of women to desire a man. But women's desire to control a man is part of her fallen nature. Since sexual desire is perhaps the only area in which women genuinely have visceral power over men, especially younger women with younger men, it is a no brainer solution for her to combine her desire for a man with her desire to control a man simply by applying her thighs to the stud.

WK wrote,

> "I mentored a brand new Christian who had had an abortion before becoming a Christian, and she flat out told me that women like men who can be controlled through premarital sex. Men who refuse premarital sex are usually also trying to lead the woman into marriage, which requires her to grow up. It makes perfect sense why the bad boys are deemed preferable."

The majority of women I've dated have tried this with me, including the two that I married. Women like this will reject a man if sex doesn't happen by the second or third date. There are men like this too – men who'll dart if she's not putting out. Men and wimminz like this are looking to either control or be controlled by the Pizzle Itch or Tingles, respectively.

In this scenario, you might imagine that a woman thinks of a man as a kid's wind-up toy. The first part of the game is to determine his winding style and strength. This exercise allows her to become familiar with, and "own" her Poozle power. If she shows a little bit of cleavage, or a lot of leg, will that get him wound up? Maybe a bare-breasted titty show might get him to see things her way. Not enough? Some popsicle slurping will surely get him to conform to her wishes.

The challenge is an integral part of the game. If he gets too excited from a gesture too small, then a gaming broad might throw that small fish back into the pond and go fishnet stalking for a bigger challenge. She's hunting for the high SMV man that can hold out for the grand finale. Men who can get a lot of action from many women are under less compulsion to toss their load, and are more likely to hold up to her sexpectations.

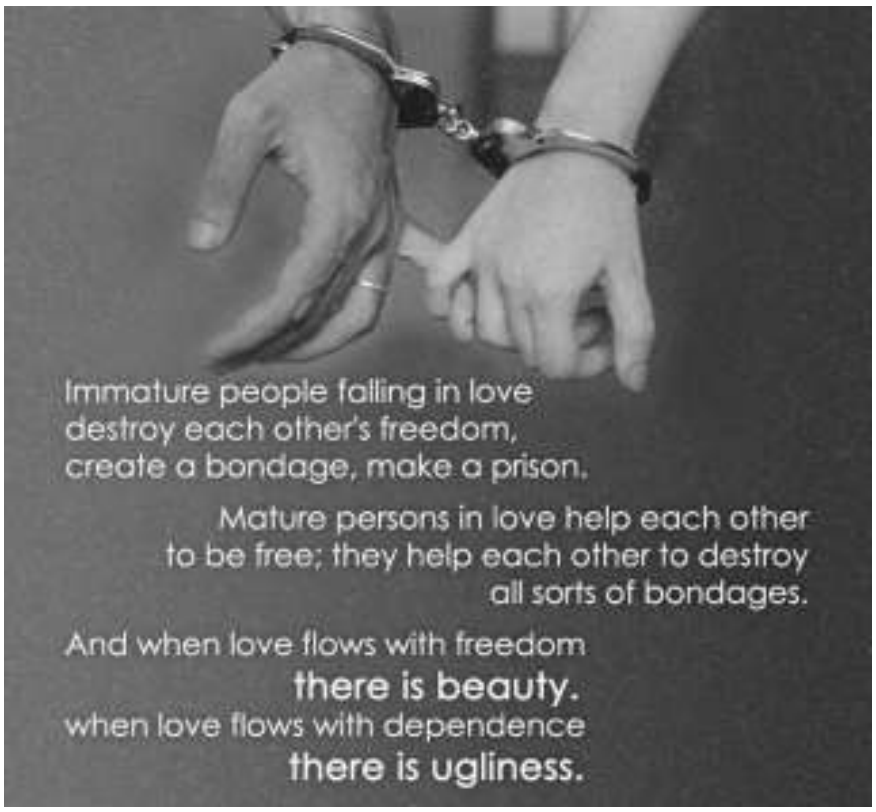
You might think that someone having a low pressure cooker type of self-control might serve as evidence that he/she is an unreliable, promiscuous player, but instead, in Tinderworld, it's taken as a preselected confirmation that he's a big fish.

Many women have the onerous idea that love must necessarily be dramatic and controlling. Other women are only humbled and "fall in love" with a man when they realize that they need him, but they cannot control him. Until that point is reached (if ever), she'll be wanting to master his heart by playing in the pudding.

I've even heard Millennial males advise each other to masturbate before going on a date as a way to relax, and to safeguard against looking too desperate.

Lies beneath lies… Lies which are patently unavoidable when the whole system revolves around the carousel of sexual idolatry.

Lord, why should my life be wasted by growing up in this mess, in times like these?



The Grand Eliminator of Marriage

It is commonly believed that women dream about getting married, but truth be told, they only dream about marrying a hunk so wealthy, so well hung, and so high up the MMV ladder that they couldn't refuse. They dream in vain. It's not just Western Feministas either; it's the same way all around the civilized world.

Any woman who postpones marriage until her 30's is not that serious about it. If their desire for matrimony were truly authentic, then women would be getting married in their late teens and early 20's, instead of blowing their financial and spiritual inheritances on college and tourism. As it stands, marriage is little more than a Plan D that is only seriously considered after all other opportunities have been either explored to their fullest possible extent, or else lost to the Wall.

But why is marriage so unpopular that it takes a back seat to everything else in life? As WK notes, most women avoid marriage because that would require them to "grow up" – that means to forsake their opportunities to fornicate, to willingly put responsibility over having fun, and to live a life that glorifies God rather than to indulge in an O-fueled rebellion.

Even the few women who have "grown up" are often times worse than their baby twisted sisters. For example, some women who appear outwardly obedient and are actively seeking marriage are only doing so because they have a self-serving purpose, such as gaining influence, money, or citizenship.

Since women are intuitively familiar with using sex as a method of control, one might think that they would continue to flex their perineal muscles even after marriage, which might actually be helpful in terms of marital closeness and bonding. But this seldom happens because marriage changes the ontology of the relationship. Before marriage, she had no sense of responsible agency, only the thrill of passion, affirmation, and the illusions of liberty and control. But after marriage, all these motivations vanish. Familiarity and selfishness kill the passion, the affirmation is a done deal, and her notions of liberty are transformed into adultery and thereby become a liability.

In short, all her previously dearly held idolatries are eliminated in one fell swoop. The true nature of her depraved spiritual state is revealed in all its gory, leaving her floundering for some other idol to grasp on to. Concerning her mistaken sense of control, this too is affected. She becomes acutely aware of the consequences of her actions, and the relevant responsibilities. With this information added into the equation, she now seeks to evade this responsibility, and so her desire to be ruled over begins to kick in, but the relationship has already started off on the wrong foot with her in control, and now she's stuck with a man who has been selected for his inability to take the lead. Her continual depraved grasping, now amplified to ɦəllish proportions, will all but guarantee he does not succeed in leading.

Not long ago, there was some debate about the nature of sanctification in marriage. If sanctification means being farther from idols and closer to God, then marriage truly offers the opportunity for a growing state of sanctification. However, it won't be agreeable to those who have grown comfortable with the ecstatic pleasures and painful yearnings of sexual idolatry.

All this explains why fewer and fewer women are getting married, and why so many marriages have a rocky start for the first 2-5 years, and why 50% of them end in the divorce courts. In other words, many of these 50% can't swallow the sanctification medicine of marriage, and prefer to return to the idolatries of their youth. Among the other half of those who stay married, there's a large number who are merely tolerating it, while empowering themselves to "stay faithful" by dreaming of the Asherah poles of the past.

Related

- Laughing at Feminism: Little Miss Can't Be Wrong (2019-8-10)
- Wintery Knight: Even Alpha Male Bad Boys Are Disappointed By The Sexual Revolution (2019-8-10)
- Laughing at Feminism: Some things to chew on (2019-8-24)

The QTBGL agenda gets down on its knees to Islamic Law

Jack · 20 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

News commentary on those who support Islam and/or gay rights in the U.S.A.

Readership: Americans; Christians;

The National Sentinel: Reps. Tlaib, Omar SILENT after Palestinian police ban all LGBTQ activity in the West Bank (2019 August 19)

> According to a report in the Jerusalem Post, the Palestinian Authority and police have even threatened to arrest members of the LGBT group Al-Qaws for Sexual & Gender Diversity in Palestinian Society. The paper noted that Al-Qaws was planning an event for members in Nablus at the end of August; the group currently only has offices in East Jerusalem and Haifa, both cities in Israel.
>
> Luay Zreikat, a Palestinian Police spokesman, said that LGBTQ activities are "harmful to the higher values and ideals of Palestinian society." In addition, Zreikat added that Al-Qaws' activities are completely "unrelated to religious and Palestinian traditions and customs, especially in the city of Nablus."
>
> He then accused "dubious parties" of working to "create discord and harm civic peace in Palestinian society."

I'm wondering who those "dubious parties" might be. I'm guessing it's either Israel, the CIA, or both.

> Zreikat went onto warn that Palestinian Police officers would chase down anyone behind the Al-Qaws event and bring them to court after they've been arrested. He then appealed to fellow Palestinians to report anyone associated with the group to police, which Al-Qaws condemned as "incitement."

Nothing surprising so far, but it gets interesting when we see the reactions of U.S. congresswimminz who support both the gray agenda and Muslims.

> Tlaib, who is of Palestinian decent, and Omar — as well the the other two members of "The Squad," Reps. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-NY) and Ayanna Pressley (D-Mass.) — are generally very quick to condemn President Donald Trump and his supporters for any perceived slight of LGBTQ persons in the United States.
>
> But as of this writing, PJ Media reported, they've been strangely silent regarding the Palestinian Police threat.

Their allegiance to Islamic law and the principle that an independent state should have the right of self-government takes precedence over their support for ghey rights. If they condemned the Palestine Authority for prosecuting fluffys, then they would become the target of all American Muslims. So they are forced to keep their traps shut this time around.

Western Churchianity has already converged and cannot be counted on to take any meaningful action. The question is, why aren't American Muslims outraged about rainbow activism in America, just like they are in Palestine? Or maybe they are, but the MGM is censoring this news, as it goes against the narrative. Such news would encourage Christians to do the same, and in general, hamper the Deep State's plans to create an American Socialized Society (ASS). If the American Muslim community is truly being silent on this issue, we can presume that they are merely lying low until the time is right (if ever) to demand Sharia law in the West.

Related

As the Worlds Turn...

Jack · 21 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Speaking loosely, there's been a 120° rotation of the political world since 1991. That is, the Third World has become Second World, the Second World has become First World, and the First World has become Third World. What is at the heart of this revolution?

Readership: All

Introduction

In his post, National Review Wants California Gone (2019 June 21), Gunner Q rips apart some broad brush claims in an article from the National Review (feat. Victor Davis Hanson): America's First Third-World State (2019 June 18).

Gunner makes the point that although California is not as bad as what Hanson describes, it's definitely been on a downward spiral for the last three decades – just like the rest of the West.

Gunner took issue with Hanson's claim that California was "Third World". This is a shticky subject, because the original definitions of the "three worlds" were based on the political polarization between the Western and Eastern Blocs after the Cold War. The Western Bloc (e.g. the United States, United Kingdom, France, NATO, et al.), were called "First World", and the Eastern Bloc (e.g. Soviet Union, Poland, China, et al.) were termed "Second World". All other countries not allied with either the U.S. or the U.S.S.R. were labeled "Third World". The general connotation associated with the dialogue about those countries was that they were so poor, backwards, or reclusive that they were irrelevant to world politics.

Gunner's post illustrates that there is now a problem with using these old definitions of "Worlds".

1. The most obvious problem is that the Eastern Bloc no longer exists. Many of those countries that were once Second or even Third World, are now part of the European Union.
2. The context of the First and Second World nomenclature pits the United States against the Soviet Union – a context which continues to be touted by the American Political Left as a real threat to Presidential elections, but which is no longer a central issue in world politics, as it was during the Cold War.

3. The original connotation of the term "Third World" (no centrally organized political entity, low-tech civilization, lacking infrastructure, and economic destitution) now no longer represents those countries once deemed Third World except for a few small pockets of the globe.
4. For some countries, the denotations are different from the connotations. For example, the Third World included certain "free" countries with a high standard of living, such as Austria, Ireland, and Switzerland, but they were deemed Third World simply because they were not "aligned" with either the Eastern or Western Bloc.

From a broader perspective, poor indigent countries have bettered themselves, China and Russia are on track to becoming world powers on par with the United States, and America and Europe are slowly sinking into anarchy.

In other words, there's been a 120° rotation of the political world since 1991. That is, the Third World has become Second World, the Second World has become First World, and the First World has become Third World. Of course, not all countries apply to this generalization.

The Confusion Surrounding Terminology

Even though the terms, First, Second, and Third World no longer retain their original meanings, these labels are still commonly bandied around within social commentary. The connotation that is commonly understood is something of an international caste system based on the relative economic development of a country.

But how do you classify the economic development of a country, and the comported average standard of living? Should it be based on GDP, the standard deviation of wealth distribution, crime rate, birth rate, some measure of political freedom, or would a more subjective measure of "Happiness" be more appropriate?

Or why do we need to classify the economic standing at all, if not for our need to compare ourselves to poorer countries, to give our ego a little pat for being "more civilized", and preen like peacocks? Aren't people in poorer regions more virtuous based on their level of oppression? No, because the local god of social intersectionalism must submit to the higher order potentate of materialism. Virtue signaling is therefore unique to the wealthier sub-societies of the world.

There are caveats. It could be argued that many countries once categorized as Third World now have a higher standard of living, solely based on the fact that they are not encroached by the glowbo-techno-socialist (dis)order of the Fist World.

The Fist World is everywhere, it seems.

A New Classification

Obviously, the "Three Worlds" terminology is horrendously outdated. A new nomenclature is in order.

Perhaps new terms are now necessary to describe those countries that used to be called "First World" (organized civilization, infrastructure, and strong economy), that are now "Third World" by political standards, and are experiencing creeping communism). Here, major countries (> 50 M as of 2019) are given as examples. Populations of each are given in parentheses.

Foist World – Wealthy, developed countries which are now coming apart at the seams, mostly due to unbridled immigration, a below replacement level domestic birthrate, and/or internal political conflicts. Yet, some of them still insist on proselytizing their brand of Globulized Demolitocracy around the world. Examples include the United States (329 M), Japan (127 M), Germany (82.4 M), United Kingdom (67 M), and France (65.5 M).

Fecund World – Countries with a growing economy which are gradually becoming more socially, economically, and politically stable. Examples include China (1.42 B), India (1.37 B), Indonesia (270 M), Brazil (212 M), Pakistan (205 M), Russia (144 M), Mexico (132 M), Iran (82.8 M), and Italy (59.2 M).

Turd World – (A hat tip to Trump's term, "Sh!t Hole"). Examples include Nigeria (201 M), Bangladesh (168 M), Ethiopia (112 M), Egypt (101 M), Congo (86.7 M), Tanzania (60 M), Myanmar (54 M), and Kenya (52.2 M).

There are several major countries that do not fit neatly into any of the above rudimentary pigeonholes. These are briefly detailed as follows.

Philippines (108 M) – Gangster politics combined with a growing economy that is propped up by income from citizens working overseas.

Vietnam (97.4 M) – Growing economically and politically, but suffering from high emigration and a below-replacement fertility rate (due to having the highest abortion rate in the world).

Turkey (83 M) – Has a strong economy, but only because it rides camel-back on its bizarre inclusion in the European Union. Immigration is pumped positive because it is the nearest pseudo-European nest for middle eastern refugees.

Thailand (69.3 M) – Growing, but only due to immigration.

South Africa (58 M) – A strong economy, positive immigration, but a political bloodbath.

South Korea (51.1 M) – Strong economy, positive immigration, but not suffering from typical Foist World ills.

Conclusion

The common denominator that no one cares to address is the world-wide growth of discontented greed in the Fist World, which spreads from country to country like the plague, waxing and waning in due season. Wherever the iron Fist of control and greed exploits, social disintegration, political corruption, and restructuring result, and this is soon followed by the spiritual rot of pride characterized by economic comparisons, and materialistic virtue signaling.

References

1. Wikipedia: Third World
2. Worldometers: Countries in the World by Population (2019)
3. World Population Review: Worst Countries to Live in 2019

Related

1. National Sentinel: Expert: ‘Exodus’ from high-tax states like New York, California ‘just beginning’ (2019 June 21)
2. Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): How The World Is Changing (2019 July 6)

Paul Harvey “If I were the devil”

Jack · 24 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A jocular overview of 20th century radio host, Paul Harvey Aurandt, and the everlasting value of his words.

Readership: All

In 1965, the American broadcaster Paul Harvey aired “If I were the Devil”, one of the most astonishing monologues ever aired on public radio.

Now, 54 years later, everything that Paul Harvey said the Devil would have to do to rule the world, has come to pass. Was Paul Harvey a prophet, or were his words a prophetic message? How then did 100% of what he said in 1965 come true?

Perhaps the Devil himself listened to the broadcast and took it into his stony cold, calculating heart…

Or maybe Paul Harvey was a brilliantly talented orator for the Masterminions of Mammon, speaking in coded language to members of the Noo Odor, giving them general goals for which to cooperate, and directions about how to proceed?

Could Paul Harvey really have been the Devil himself?

What to believe?

You know, the Devil is in the details, so let’s frisky fisk Paul Harvey.

During his lifetime, Paul Harvey was known to be a strong, professing Christian. So it’s fair to believe that he wasn’t aware of the significance his words would have a decade after his death at the age of 90.

Unless he were the devil.

Britannica encyclopedia offers this information. [1]

> Paul Harvey, in full Paul Harvey Aurandt, (born Sept. 4, 1918, Tulsa, Oklahoma, U.S.—died Feb. 28, 2009, Phoenix, Arizona), American radio commentator and news columnist noted for his firm staccato delivery and his conservative but individualistic opinions on current events. He enjoyed an almost unparalleled longevity as a national broadcaster [for the elphebat nooz].
>
> Harvey was descended from five generations of Baptist preachers. He and his sister were brought up by their mother after their father was shot to death under uncertain circumstances.

Why would a preacher be shot to death? Why, he must have been the Devil!

The Devil can quote scripture for his own purposes, and from the pulpit no less.

Wikipedia [2] says Paul Harvey was “the son of a policeman who was killed by robbers in 1921”, and this interesting link is included as confirming evidence. Perhaps his grandfather et al. were preachers.

Note: Gunner Q has chased down the fascinating story surrounding the death of Paul Harvey’s father in a post, Why Paul Harvey was Anticommunist (2019 August 26). He was assassinated as part of a race war between the KKK and the communist fueled African Blood Brotherhood. This background explains much of Paul Harvey’s complex political stance, covered below.

From Britannica [1],

> Harvey often opined on rising taxes, bloated government, and the decay of American values. He called his particular conservative cast “political fundamentalism.” Though he was associated with prominent figures of > the American right — he once hosted Sen. Joseph McCarthy at his home and was short-listed among George C. Wallace's potential vice presidential running mates in 1968 — Harvey resisted identification with any ideology but his own. A supporter of the Vietnam War for several years, in 1970 he changed his mind and publicly urged Pres. Richard Nixon to abandon the war. In the 1980s he decried several of President Ronald Reagan's conservative positions.

His comrades were a conservative bunch who mostly supported the Vietnam war. McCarthy was famous for his vitriolic anti-communist stance. Wallace fought for segregation on grounds of populism during the civil rights era, and ran for president with the anti-liberal American Independent Party in 1968.

Now, Boomers would all agree Paul Harvey is definitely the Devil. So why did he change his mind in 1970 and challenge Reagan in the 80's?

> He was awarded the Presidential Medal of Freedom in 2005.

Ahh… Did he converge?

Other recipients of this award include Walt Disney, Bill Gates, Alan Greenspan, Sandra Day O'Connor, David and Nelson Rockefeller, Sam Walton…

Speak of the Devil… most recipients are political allies and supporters of their nominators.

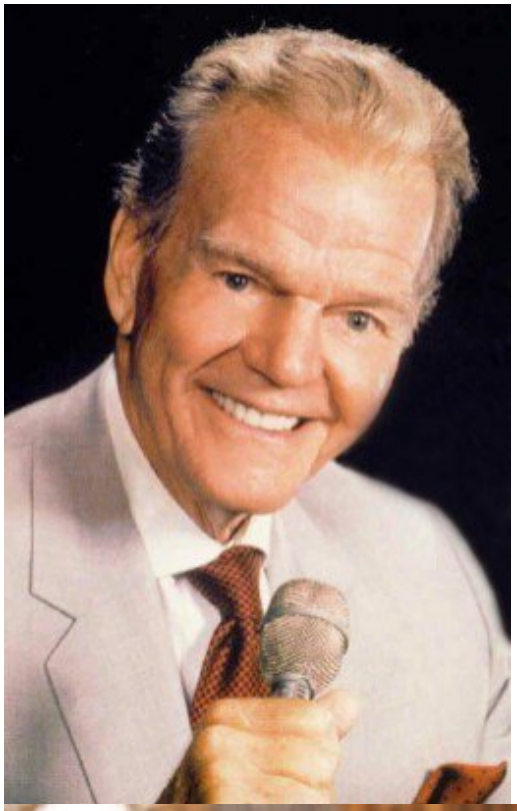
Guilty by association. He must be the Devil.

There was once a rumor that Paul Harvey supported Planned Parenthood for many years. I could not find any support for this rumor online. An internet search showed that one named Iris E. Harvey was the CEO of the Planned Parenthood of Greater Ohio. But I found could not find a link between Iris Harvey and Paul Harvey Aurandt. I suspect the name Harvey is why people thought they were related.

Other possible prophetic mouthpieces include Ayn Rand's novel, Atlas Shrugged, and George Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four.

If Paul Harvey were the Devil…

Then Harvey Weinstein took on his secret daddy's middle name.*

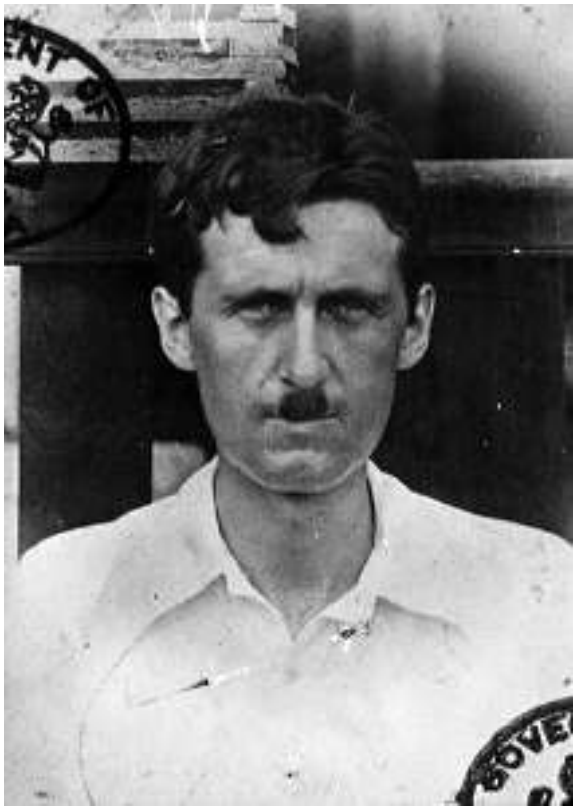


See the family resplendance?

If Ayn Rand were the Devil…

*“Meet me in the cemetery for Ouija at midnight!”

If George Orwell were the Devil…



George Orwell, AKA Eric Arthur Blair, in a passport photo looking very Hitleresque. (ca. 1922-1927) This style of mustache was very popular in Europe at that time.

Can’t decide? You’re better off with the Devil you know than the one you don’t.

I’d like to play the Devil’s advocate here, but I’m caught between the Devil and the deep blue sea, so it beats the Devil out of me.

 Quotes and claims are not true, but are only offered here as entertainment for the readers' imagination.*

References

1. Britannica: Biography of Paul Harvey, American Broadcaster
2. Wikipedia: Paul Harvey

Related

- Σ Frame: The Art of Inventing Hot Media Topics, and Then Trivializing Them (2015 November 12)
- The Conversation: What Trump's picks for the Presidential Medal of Freedom say about him (2018 November 17)
- Gunner Q: Why Paul Harvey was Anticommunist (2019 August 26)

Eunuchs of the New Feminist Order

Jack · 31 August 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Explore the beautiful future in a world without Peter Johnson.

Readership: All

There was once a time, centuries ago before male excision was imposed, when all human males retained their gonads and penises after birth. These appendages are now considered a vestigial remnant of our re-evolution. But because of our modern religious practice of ritual excision 8 days after birth, the world is now a better place, free from all forms of toxic masculinity, including human sex trafficking, rape, Betarape, Metarape, stalking, and many other forms of distracting, onerous lusts which had once waged war against our souls.

For those unfamiliar with these archaic terms, rape is the anatomical coitus with an unsubmissive male unfit for procreation. Betarape is coitus with a submissive male unfit for procreation. Metarape is coitus with an unsubmissive male fit for procreation.

It is difficult for us to imagine the shame and frustration caused by any form of rape now, because the males of our species no longer experience an unpredictable, overpowering, feral desire for rutting during adolescence. We have now evolved past that dark phase of our evolutionary history.

Ever since the processes of human genome selection, DNA quality control, reproduction, and cloning were perfected in 2095, it finally allowed us to achieve our age old dream of liberating our neuroreflexive joy (once called an "orgasm") from the reproductive burdens of coitus and puritanical monogamous marriage. Since reproduction is now entirely carried out in specialized laboratory incubators, modern women can experience rapturous joy at will, without the fear of enduring months of pain and disability in order to produce an inferior child of random quality.

Our modern feminine-primary culture all began exactly 100 years ago, when one philosopher (known at that time as a "Spanish professor") in what is now the Iberian Caliphate, introduced the dream of a world without superfluous testosterone…

****

End of proleptic transmission.

Do you think this couldn't happen? It's happening.

Pluralist: Feminist Teacher Tells Boys That Women Will 'Cut Off Your Dicks' Once They Take Over (2019 June 7)*

* H/T: Farm Boy

> "An audio recording released this week captures Aurelia Vera, a school teacher who is also a socialist city council member in the Canary Islands town of Puerto del Rosario, telling teen students that "boys should be castrated at birth" as part of a thought experiment in which students were asked to envision a matriarchal society."

Actually, this is a great thought experiment. There has been a lot of condemnatory focus on "toxic masculinity", but outside of the Manosphere, "toxic femininity" is assiduously swept under the rug. It is inspiring to hear of a professor who led her class to imagine the possible course of events, should feminism continue raining steam through the coming decades.

The problem with certain thought experiments, is that they don't always remain as mere abstract concepts confined to comfortable classrooms, for the purpose of expanding student's imaginations. Remember, once upon a time, Communism was merely a thought experiment.

> "[The news site] El Diario reported that Vera prompted students to imagine a society in which the roles were reversed and women physically subjugated men. This is the alleged context of Vera's remarks, heard in the Okdiario recording."
>
> "Boys should be castrated at birth, but selectively, to avoid the extinction of the species," Vera said in response to a student's question. "We must make men stop governing so they give power to us. Will they voluntarily do it? No. We have to resort to selective castration."
>
> "If they cut your dicks off, it's no big deal," she told male students.

At its core, feminism is a rebellious battle for power. Therefore, Vera carves out the point that the most elementary way to eliminate penis envy, is to eliminate the penis. Simple!

> "At one point during the debate a student asked, "So, what system do you think is needed?"
>
> "Vera responded by saying, "the matriarchy," a system based on "the power of women."

Uh oh… she came right out and said it! Let's hope she didn't jinx herself! The motives and goals of Feminism need to remain a secret so long as it is in the incubative stages.

> "The recording, published Thursday by Spanish newspaper Okdiario, kicked up a firestorm of backlash that included a denunciation of the educator's behavior by Francisco Serrano, the anti-feminist leader of Spain's Vox political party.
>
> Serrano has filed a complaint in the Spanish court system against Vera, claiming he has received numerous messages on Facebook from concerned parents of students in her class."

 Not to be confused with the prog website, Vox*, nor the Manospherian author,* Vox Day*. In Latin,* Vox means "voice".

Serrano is purported to be anti-feminist, and so his constituents include parents who are upset about a thought experiment that explores the odious toxicity of a feminine (dis)order as a real possibility. It's encouraging to know that there still exist parents who are concerned about what their children are learning in school. But wouldn't you think the male students would immediately reject male excision as an impotential outcome? Or could it be that Spanish students are so incapable of critical, independent thought, osmotically absorbing whatever they are told to believe, that the parents' concerns are legitimate?

Being an educator myself, I'm inclined to believe the latter.

Some might argue that women don't have that kind of propensity for violence. Heh… Think about it. If a woman would be willing to kill her own child through abortion, voluntarily enduring the trauma, pain, and heartbreak of losing a child (or else, the denial thereof), which I've heard is more debilitating than losing a spouse or parent, then the cruelty of emasculating sub-par SMV men would be assumed as child's play, once given the power to sexecute.

As horrific as this may sound, snipping the reproductive appendage is not a novel nor isolated concept among women.

Let's not forget Lorena Bobbitt, the woman who wielded a sharp kitchen knife and sliced off her husband's poon poker while he slept in 1993. She justified her actions by claiming she lost her mind after her husband "raped" her. 26 years later, she says she has no remorse or regret over the incident. Her biggest fear is becoming the laughingstock of the community.

More recently, Suzanne Titkemeyer clearly stated, presumably towards Larry Solomon (the author of Biblical Gender Roles),

> "Castration is starting to look like an attractive option right now for some of these men."

It's admirable to see a strong independent woman emulate the apostle Paul, who wrote,

> "As for those agitators [who insist on circumcision], I wish they would go the whole way and emasculate themselves!" ~ Galatians 5:12 (NIV)

Eliminating penis envy is not the only benefit of truncating bratwursts. It also eliminates the possibility of fornication. Consider what Jesus said.*

> [27] "You have heard that it was said, 'You shall not commit adultery.' [28] But I tell you that anyone who looks at a woman lustfully has already committed adultery with her in his heart. [29] If your right eye causes you to stumble, gouge it out and throw it away. It is better for you to lose one part of your body than for your whole body to be thrown into hell. [30] And if your right hand causes you to stumble, cut it off and throw it away. It is better for you to lose one part of your body than for your whole body to go into hell." ~ Matthew 5:27-30 (NIV)
>
> [11] But He said to them, "All cannot accept this saying, but only those to whom it has been given: [12] For there are eunuchs who were born thus from their mother's womb, and there are eunuchs who were made eunuchs by men, and there are eunuchs who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He who is able to accept it, let him accept it." ~ Matthew 19:11-12 (NKJV)

Once this catches on, any Churchian man who insists on retaining his manhood will be condemned and excommunicated for choosing a default life of unrepentant sin over helpless holiness. Why else would he want to keep his pecker, if not for wanking and raping?

The only snafu with this eugenic plan is exactly what Aloe Vera pointed out. Men will not voluntarily give up their power, authority, or their peckers. The problem remains of what women can do to discourage male 'rebellion' and force men to submit to their loving, corrective care.

Unlike helpless fetuses developing comfortably in the womb of their mother's nurturing bodies, men have been emboldened by testosterone, and hardened under the duress of living, and therefore possess the agency to actively resist becoming worker-ant eunuchs for the feminisocialist state.

Vera suggests that women need to dominate politics so that this can be legislated into action. After all, surreal smotherly love forces one to submit, no matter whether it is in their best interest, nor whether they like it or not.

Cheer up men! There are a few smooth sides to this.

Can't resist the lure of enervating internet porn?

Losing confidence and passion because of too much wanking?

Afraid of falling in love, only to be cucked, frivorced, impoverished, and heartbroken?

Get out of the cat race once and for all. Losing your tool is an easy solution!

Consider the Bunny Fits of the Eunucelibate Life.

- You'll no longer feel sex starved, nor struggle with the constant urge to merge. Instead, your life energy will be freed up to serve the Theocratic Feministate with ultra-loyal diligence.

- Think of all the money you'll save by avoiding the inevitable frivorce rape, alimony, and paternity suites, not to mention all those condoms that won't be necessary. The Deep State will be happy to keep that extra cash in a safe place from you.
- No fear of having a mid-life crisis! Your future is subsidized.
- Thinking with the little head will no longer entrap you in sticky situations with Venus fly traps.
- People, especially women, will never again doubt the sincerity of your stated purposes.
- You can only be castrated once in your life!
- You'll never have to shave again!
- You can eat as much tofu, soymilk, and soylent green as you like!
- Best of all, joining the simphonic choir in your local converged Choich of the Siren Sistren, and singing praise hyrz in perfect falsetto can now be your new hobby!

 For those immune to satire, the scriptures cited in this post have been cherry picked for satirical effect. So before you pick up that cleaver, go read those scriptures in context. Jesus never instructed men to lop off their willies, neither to avoid sin nor to achieve holiness. On the contrary, if you ever manage to escape the Bizarro World of the Feminazi's, you'll need your pepperoni stick to ravish your wife into willing submission and to produce those Godly offspring.*

Related

- Purple Motes: Castration culture promotes vicious, jealous eunuchs as officials (2017 February 12)
- Purple Motes: Misandry & castration culture repress alternate lifestyles for men (2017 October 8)
- The Orthosphere (feat. J. M. Smith): The Power of the Eunuchs (2017 November 9)
- Hommunism: Sweden: How feminist emasculation broke a State (2018 December 19)
- The Rational Male: Selective Breeding (2019 September 3)

How much is Virginity worth?

Jack · 5 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

An overview of the Virgin Market Place (VMP) and a rundown of prices around the turnpike world.

Readership: All

From source [1].

> A 19-year-old New Zealand student, known only as Unigirl, sold her virginity to a stranger for $32,000. Her online ad was viewed by 30,000 people and received over 1,200 offers. Thanks to the Internet, women like Unigirl are putting their sexual initiation up for sale in the very public marketplace. Though these auctions have a new global reach, the pricing of virginity is an ancient human practice – according to the book of Deuteronomy, a girl's virginity is worth 50 shekels, paid to her father. In today's economy, how much is a woman's virginity worth?

The passage in Deuteronomy 22:28-29 (NKJV) reads,

> [28] "If a man finds a young woman who is a virgin, who is not betrothed, and he seizes her and lies with her, and they are found out, [29] then the man who lay with her shall give to the young woman's father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife because he has humbled her; he shall not be permitted to divorce her all his days.

That last clause in boldface stipulates that he is required to feed, clothe, and house her for the rest of his life. It's difficult to put a price tag on that, but we can find the approximate value of fifty shekels by doing a little calculation.

A shekel is a unit of weight, so the implied value would be the equivalent weight in gold.

1 shekel (Biblical Hebrew)	11.4 g.	0.402 oz
50 shekels (Biblical Hebrew)	570 g.	20.1 oz

These days, gold is worth about US$1,500 an ounce. So that sets the Biblically proscribed value of virginity at about US$30,150, which compares closely to Unigirl's price tag of US$30,000. Other virgin wh0res being gaveled on the mattress are selling for figures on the same order of magnitude. But if the laydie has particularly excellent genetic breeding, she can fetch seven digit figures for a night's work.

The Slate breaks down the @$$essment further, explaining that virginity sells for…

> At least $10,000 if the woman is reasonably attractive and under 25. The exact price ultimately depends on the "quality" of the virginity: how young and hot the virgin is. Models can fetch over $1 million. In 2005, Peruvian model Graciela Yataco was the first to break this threshold, although she eventually declined her top bid of $1.3 million. In January 2009, 20-year-old Italian model Raffaella Fico received an offer of nearly $1.5 million, but also allegedly retracted the auction. She is now dating a professional soccer player.

One Russian website, One Love Night, now offers bonerfied virgins for sale, with prices starting at US$10,000. Reading through some profiles of the Slavic vixens, it is common for them not to care at all whether the man offers any level of commitment or not, nor even if he is married. They just want the financial freedom and social independence that comes with the influx of cash. True wh0res! Some of them say they would like to retain a sugar daddy from the experience, but most just want their first experience getting poled in the sack to be with a wealthy powerful man.

This phenomenon is not unique to Western, White, or Latino countries. In Taiwan, I've heard stories of impoverished families living in the reclusive mountainous areas informally "renting out" their daughters to wealthier "friends" in exchange for high-end electronics and cash amounting to roughly US$2,000, which is equivalent to two months' wages in Taiwan, and perhaps up to a year's wages in that particular neck of the bush. A year's wages in western countries stands at about US$30,000 (for the lower-middle class), so the hymen markup in backwoods Taiwan also compares closely to the Biblical figures.

As you might imagine, these people have a very simple life, which inevitably invites innocent girls to get down and dirty in the backroom. Some of these girls are as young as 14, because that is where the market demand is. Once a girl starts to develop her own opinions about things, the demand drops sharply, as does the price she can fetch.

In Laos, desperately impoverished farmers are selling their teenage daughters to brokers who are operating under the lugubrious guise of a matchmaking service for wealthy Chinese men seeking virgin brides. In fact, the customers are elderly, crippled, and disease ridden, and they have no intentions of marriage whatsoever. After the deed is done, these girls are dumped on the street to fend for themselves. Understandably, they don't wish to return to the place they once called home.

According to the Bangkok Post [2], deals for these innocent tootsie rolls are cut between US$185 to US$310, in addition to a throng of bribes for law enforcement, immigration agents, and middle men. The fact that this price is much lower than the standard year's wage in Thailand (US$7,974.90 per capita in 2019) stands as a testament to the abject destitution of the indigent subculture. Meanwhile, the fathers remain ignorant of their daughter's fates, thinking them to be the pampered housewives of well heeled foreigners.

As bl00dy evil as this practice is, the point is that virginity is in high demand, and is widely recognized to have a cash value. Shockingly, the market demand and cash value of a virgin courtesan is even higher than the initial cost of a virgin bride! SMH

But in rural parts of the United States, it is not uncommon for a teenage girl to give up her purity for a good laugh, an empty promise, two tall beers, and a joint. But no one ever gives a flip about that. Murican wimmin may be the cheapest wh0res in the world!

By contrast, women from other parts of the world have a sense of purplepose in "entering womanhood".

> Yataco was a devout Catholic who needed money to care for her sick mother. Fico was also religious and planned to use the profits from her sexual foray for acting classes once she bought a house in Rome.

I don't know what it is about Catholics. They're expressly forbidden from having premarital sex, extramarital affairs, and divorce. Abortion and birth control are also verboten. But if/when given the right circumstances, they'll eagerly dive into all these iniquities. Catholic school girls and Catholic clergy don't have sexualized stereotypes for no reason. My apologies to Earl, Richard, and Bonald, but what is it about Catholicism that breeds sexual dalliances? Could it be the overt repression of the human nature?

In the nominally Catholic Philippines, it is rather common for young daughters of tenant farmers to migrate from rural areas into the cities where they "work the street" until they can find a regular job (usually through a friendly "customer") and get off their @$$es and back on their feet (literally, heh…). A young girl working the streets in Manila can earn as much money in a week as a farmer in Mindanao can make in a year.

With a resigned yet determined attitude toward reality, these girls consider this the "price of admission" to enter a higher socio-economic class. (Young male migrants, on the other hand, find ample opportunities doing hard manual labor.)

Little do they realize that they're simply trading socio-economic value for Marriage Market Value (MMV). From a spiritual perspective, it's a sacrifice to Ashtoreth.

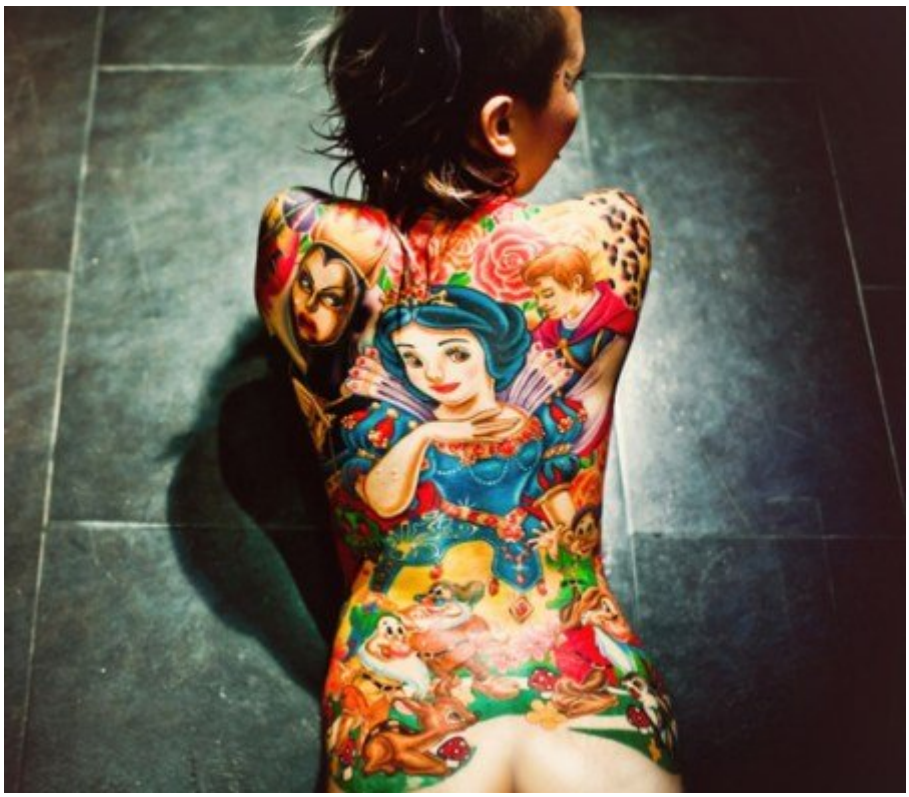
> The narrative of self-sacrifice is ready-made for the media, and this good publicity inflates demand. In 2007, 18-year-old Carys Copestake from Manchester managed to make $23,000 to finance her physics degree, even though the only physical information she provided was, "brunette, 34C, green eyes, all in proportion and good looking."

Yes, that's all that really matters to wh0remongers.

In spite of the obvious iniquity and self-abasement attached to the practice, the shame of resorting to prostitution in order to advance socioeconomically is habitually overlooked, rephrased (e.g. escort, sex-worker, purposeful companion, etc.), or somehow transformed into something less inglorious, especially if the girl has succeeded in making a particularly lucrative transaction.

> Branding is also crucial. According to Gawker [2], current co-eds have the priciest hymens, as "college girls are simultaneously Girls Gone Wild and nubile pillow-fighting naifs." To maximize gains, a woman should also disclose her identity, preferably with revealing pictures and a detailed sexual history. The most successful for-sale virgins package themselves as pure and virtuous virgin/wh0res.

I think The Slate means "branding" as in commercial branding, but there are many sex trafficking agencies that utilize branding with tattoos or even a hot iron, so that the pimps can keep tract of which hoes belong to which bros. Many of these gun molls are willing accomplices, looking for an alternate lifestyle of drugs, material luxuries, and illegal thrills with bad boys. Considering the cash value of virginity, these gang lords and sex traffickers know exactly where the money is. More reasons to avoid nonvirginal women with tattoos.



But as bad as these girls might be, they still adhere to a male-led hierarchy and are loyal (even if not faithful) to their main man. The hardest core wh0res of all are those who reject all authority of any kind and run independent leases on their own @$$es, all for the sake of personal freedom, sexual power, and socio-economic independence.

> Natalie Dylan is the ultimate virginity-marketing mogul. A 22-year-old women's studies graduate from Sacramento State, Dylan needed the money to pay for her master's degree in family and marriage therapy. She announced the auction on Howard Stern's radio show in September 2008 and justified her decision in the Daily Beast and on The Tyra Banks Show. After her media blitz, Dylan received over 10,000 bids, half of which were for over $1 million.
>
> Dylan approached her virginity like a good capitalist. "The value of my chastity is one level on which men cannot compete with me," she said to Tyra. "I decided to flip the equation, and turn my virginity into something that allows me to gain power and opportunity from men."

…like a good capitalist. Heh… Dylan approached her virginity like a good feminist! She even said that she sold herself off explicitly "to gain power from men".

She might as well cash in on the bl00dy cherry now, because once she starts college, that cool million will be p!ssed away in a frat house within the first two weeks of her freshman year.

Maureen O'Connor, the author of the piece at Gawker wrote a revealing lie in the sky.

> Since upper education is a tool of the upper class and upwardly mobile, college girl prostitutes belong (or will someday belong) to the same social class as their rich johns. What's more, Natalie and Unigirl portrayed their virginity auctions as one-time things — they'll go on to professional careers, respectable marriages, maybe even white picket fences. The fantasy that these girls are different (better, even, than Tiger's mistresses!) keeps their value high.

LMSAO! That's a fantastically solipsistic Sinderella (or Ho White) claim if I ever heard one! It sounds similar to the Laotian "hotel wedding" broker's fraudulent sales pitch, except catering to upper crusty particulars. The Red Pilled view on that illusion goes something like the following.

If a sufficient number of nubiles buy into that phantasm, the market for virgin snatch could take off within the next decade. Young girls will be increasingly allured by the quick lucrative sale of their cherry blossom, kick starting an avalanche of V-auctions to the highest bidder. Rich boys will develop soft harems comprised of all their virgin flings – wimmin who will afterwards become alpha widowed by their first diamond d!ck, and find themselves unable to "settle for a lesser man" in a proper marriage. Even if they could break the yuppie's soul mold and then resist the lure of a serial monogamy styled independence, would there be any man willing to marry a woman who's been bought, sold, f*cked like a wh0re, then rode the carousel for at least 4 years, all while being professionally edgecated to scold cucks?

NRFW! She has already received her reward in full.

For the majority of cases, virgin wh0res are simply trading Marriage Market Value (MMV) for other socio-economic opportunities in which they are more self-reliant, and not dependent upon any one man. This bifurcated ontology hearkens back to the Feminine Dilemma.

How is the bourgeoisie virgin auction any different from black market sex trafficking in the squalid shantytowns of Asia? The difference is that the So Cal'ed "cultured laydies" are choosing their johnsons to suit their flakes, and are willingly prostrating themselves to be defiled, whereas, the poorer women of the world are often coerced or beguiled into becoming an accessory. But both contexts buy into the lines of socioeconomic come uppance.

Virgins for sale right here! Now going for 50 shekels of gold or a year's wages, whichever one fits the glass slipper!

References

- Slate (feat. Claire Gordon): How Much Is Virginity Worth? (2010 February 9)
- Bangkok Post: Lifting the veil on virgin brides for sale (2016 October 16)
- Gawker (feat. Maureen O'Connor): A Guide to Maximizing the Price of Your Hymen (2010 February 4)

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: Lori's Men Prefer Debt-Free Virgins Without Tattoos (2018 July 20)
- The Other McCain: Insta-Whores (2019 April 30)
- Dalrock: Insta-Whores: Is money the real problem? (2019 April 30)
- The Transformed Wife: Marrying A Virgin Is No Big Deal? (2019 August 19)

Crunching the Tinder Whoard

Lexet Blog · 20 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A nationwide, cross-sectional overview of your average female Tinder user.

This study was conducted by the author of Lexet Iustitia, and was first published on 2019 July 16. A revised version appears here with the author's permission.

Readership: RP Men, especially those using the Tinder app.

Introduction

Recently, I developed a curiosity about the quality of people on Tinder, after being off of the app for quite some time. Tinder is still the most used app out there, but the quality of the users has taken a dive since I was last using it. After noticing many of the profiles on the app were trashy, I decided to record and analyze the demographic data of the users that I saw.

The screenshots added throughout this post will provide the reader some insights as to what is on Tinder, without having to join.

Methodology

To be certain that my sampling was a true representation of all Tinder users, I paid for an upgraded account. Many dating apps are free, but they encourage users to upgrade or pay for special services. These dating sites "throttle" the availability of people you have access to until you pay for an upgraded account. Apparently, the better quality users are only accessible through paying for an upgrade. Upgrading also allowed me to switch my location and browse users from other locations.

I conducted a "survey" of hundreds of profiles in 10 cities, and for this study, I picked out data from 2100 accounts of women aged 18-30. I viewed at least as many accounts in the same locations, or outside of those locations, without recording them.

In each location, I surveyed 100 profiles at a time. (I considered it a day's work). Each group of 100 profiles is referred to as a block.

I chose six cities located in the Southern region of the U.S.A. Three of these cities are considered tourist friendly or touristy areas. Two locations were in the Western region, while another was in the upper Midwest. Finally, I had to include Washington, D.C., since it is famous for its dating culture. With the exception of D.C. and one of the western locations, my search radius was 100 miles. D.C. and the 1 western location had a higher population density, so I narrowed the search down to within 10 miles. I viewed several cities outside of my 10 city sample, but I decided that the results were so similar to the other samples that they were not worth recording.

Yes, some profiles were that disgusting! On some profiles, I only recorded the first few red flags I observed before swiping left, so as to preserve my vision. For the most part, my observations were from the pictures, and the portion of the text shown on the first picture. If I had to open the rest of their body of text to read their profile, let's just say I didn't read it or record it.

I recorded visible tattoos (obviously), body piercings in "nontraditional" locations (lip, tongue, nose, eyebrow), weird hair (shaved, super short, or dyed an unnatural color), overweight (technically severely overweight or obese – I was actually very conservative with how many I placed in this category), and women who were single moms. The last category I had was "E Thot/Sex work." These accounts had any of the following features.

- Asked for $$$ to be sent via other apps.
- Offered sugar daddy relationships.
- Apparent strippers / sex workers.
- Linked to Instagram accounts that seemed very professional and way too suggestive.

Although I recorded accounts that I thought were fake, were of couples, or featured drug and alcohol use, I stopped recording alcohol related photos, unless nearly every picture in a profile featured alcohol, or it was apparent from the text that they were alcoholics.

As time progressed, I found additional categories to track, so the data is incomplete, and only useful to show the bare minimum of each category out of its sample size.

There are a few important characteristics I didn't track at all, including the following.

- The number of accounts by "pregnant women".
- The number of accounts listing their preferred pronouns.
- The number of profiles that were sexually suggestive, or offering blatant innuendos.

On the last point, my low ball estimate for the number of profiles that were sexually suggestive would be at least 40% of all profiles.

Demographic Findings

The spreadsheet of the data collected looks like this.

	NT	NT	NT	NT	NT	T	NT	T	T	T
	S	S	S	W	W	S	MW	DC	S	S
	A	B	C	D	E	F	G	H	I	J
Sample Size	400	400	200	200	200	200	200	100	100	100	2100	Total %
Tattoo	65	86	28	43	23	30	30	9	25	24	363	17.20%
Weird hair	14	31	11	2	7	15	10	6	9	0	105	5%
piercings	47	98	42	39	28	20	36	6	23	9	348	16.5
overweight	162	101	69	50	20	40	49	21	45	38	595	28.33%
single mom	31	27	13	18	3	4	13	0	8	5	122	5.19%
E Thot/sex work	33	48	24	10	7	10	6	0	2	3	143	6.80%
fake					2				1	1	4
gay/trans	6	9	4	8	6	4		5	3	5	50	2.38%
married	1		1	3	3	2			1		11
drugs	1	6	2	2	5	6	19			5	46
alcohol	24	6		3	7	11	19	3	7	5	85	4.04

T/NT: Tourist or Not Tourist area; S/W/MW/DC: geographic location

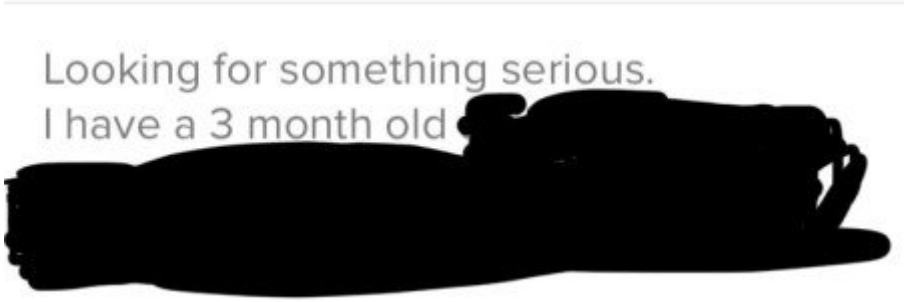
- 28% were severely overweight.
- 17% of users had at least 1 tattoo visible in the photos.
- 16.5% had odd piercings. Most of these are septum piercings.
- 6% of users are advertising sex work or nude photoshoots for $$$.
- 5% had butchered their hair.

Single Mother Users on Tinder (SMUT)

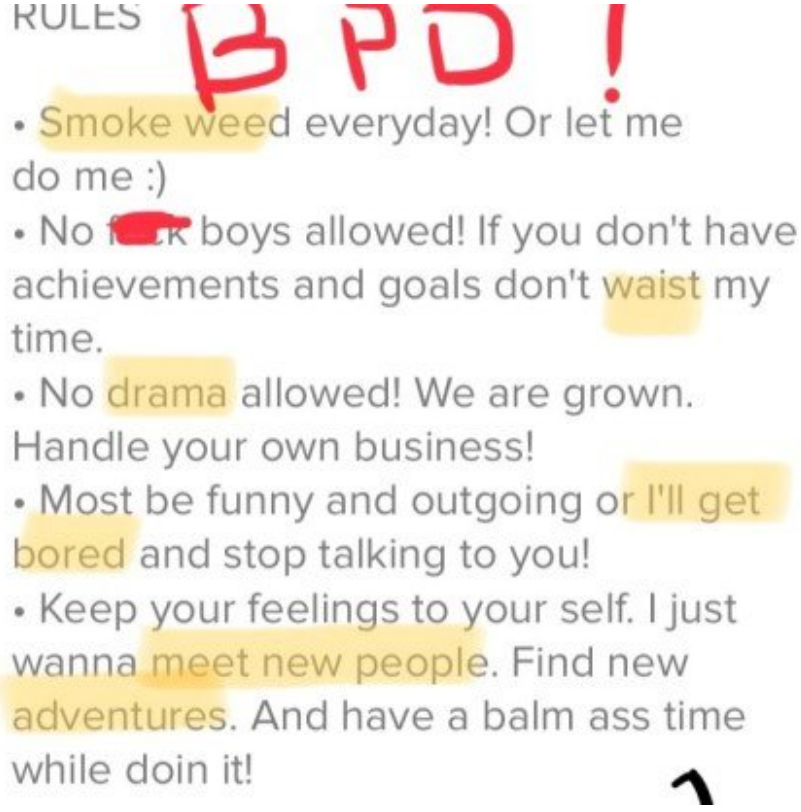
5% of Tinder users identified themselves as single mothers, and many of these women had multiple accounts. (I did not track how many.) Many of them had several children of young ages.



Overall, if you took the fact that they were single parents out of the equation, single mothers would have the highest quality profiles on Tinder. However, several single mother accounts showed clear drug use, in either their video clips or pictures.

Nearly every single mother profile had “high standards” for any prospective men, and tried to give the impression of being high quality and religious. I found it mighty convenient that they “found God”. Of course, it is unreasonable for these women to hold their prospective partner to these standards since they cannot meet the same high standard as a wife or LTR partner.

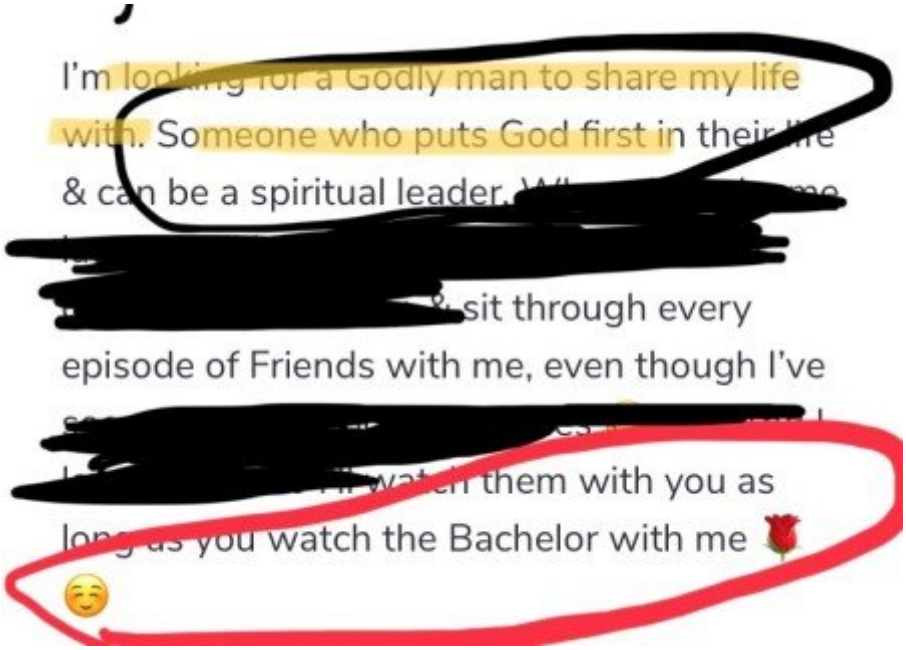
Being a single mother is a significant sloot tell, indicating that the woman in question has been promiscuous, at least in the past. Whether a particular woman has truly reformed is a questionable matter, despite their higher quality of appearance. But by virtue of the fact that she’s on Tinder, it is likely that she has not reformed, or at least not enough to realize that the motives of the vast majority of Tinder users are not consistent with what she is looking for. Single mothers who are seriously looking to find a man and settle down should not be looking for men on a hook up app like Tinder.



Noteworthy Observations

- Although I did not track race, female Tinder users are predominantly white.
- Women residing in cities frequented by international tourists were of better quality than those living in Non-Tourist areas. [SF: I call this the Rubyshoe effect.]

- Washington D.C. and the one Western urban location had the lowest number of single moms, women with weird hair, or overweight women.
- Nearly all of the D.C. profiles were of locals, judging by the number of pictures with them at known D.C. locations. Interestingly enough, many women in the "touristy" areas of the South also had pictures taken in D.C.
- I observed a profound sense of entitlement in most of the profiles. There is no way to quantify this observation, but it is based on viewing at least 10,000 photos while on this app (2,100 profiles at the bare minimum, with each having several photographs = 10,000 easy).
- Many of the pictures indicated travel, concerts, and similar social activities. None of the activities were free events, but indicated some form of expectation about spending excessive amounts of money to keep up with their lifestyle.
- Many of the photographs focused around alcohol in party/vacation environments.
- Several pictures clearly showed operation of a motor vehicle while drinking.
- One account was advertising their personal business that had nothing to do with dating, and it was quite funny.
- I viewed several college towns of well-known conservative/Christian schools that are outside of this sample. There are plenty of women using Tinder from prominent conservative Christian colleges and seminaries.



Trends and Cofactors

- Many of the profiles with linked Instagram accounts are clearly imitating the raunchy behavior of more professional Instagram users or celebrities.
- Piercings, tattoos, and bizarre hairstyles appeared as cofactors. That is, if a woman had weird hair, she nearly always had piercings and/or tattoos.
- Common tattoo locations were: thigh, forearms, clavicle, the area underneath the bikini top, or on the side of the thorax.
- Many women are getting tattoos of Roman numerals.
- Sleeve style tattoos are becoming more common.
- While only a few did this, it is a trend: Women taking mirror selfies while they are sitting on the toilet.
- Most "funny" profile jokes were not unique, and I saw the same few jokes over and over again. I am not sure if this is because of some shared sense of humor, fake accounts, or lack of originality. I saw one incredibly hilarious original profile description. But most profiles in general did not attempt any sort of humor.

Anomalies

In each block (of 100 profiles), I came across some anomalies listed below.

- Each block had exactly 12 profiles that were extremely polished in their presentation, and appeared to be professional “E thots/sex workers”. The quality of these accounts appeared to be in a league above all the others. I would consider these profiles to be fake, paid, or promotional accounts.
- Tinder would regularly match me with people I never swiped on, meaning the app itself is spamming its users to keep them using their app.

Its important to understand that Tinder operates on algorithms, and throttles your use by providing you a “swipe surge,” and then trickling new accounts to you throughout the day. When using Tinder, users should be aware that approximately 12% of the profiles appearing in swipe surges are fake, paid, or promotional accounts.

Fake User Accounts

As just mentioned, about 12% of Tinder profiles are fake, meaning that the profile presents data that is not true to life.

Certainly, there is some degree of art in composing a profile, and few would present what they feel are the worst qualities of themselves. So mild forms of falsities can be expected. For instance, women think nothing of posting photos of themselves when they were 5 years younger, and/or 5 kg. thinner. (BTW, this poses a constant source of irritation among male users. It’s refreshing to find someone who is authentic.)

In the worst case scenario, the person behind the account is quite different from the person you might imagine while viewing their profile. We might imagine a geeky, bearded programmer at the Tinder office trying to stimulate user interest in order to bump up his commission, or a person of the opposite sex going for an incognito adventure of discovery, or an undercover detective doing demographic research (such as myself). As bad as this might be, it doesn’t even touch on the next level of deception, such as cosmetic surgeries, or gender reassignments.

For example, Tinder matched me with a high number of Eastern Europeans and Russians of significantly better quality. I suspected that these accounts were fake accounts designated to attract messages and attention. I imagine they were probably formed by lonely, post-wall spinsters seeking affirmation, or a Gamma incel who's just messing with people for the ɦəll of it.

Better quality profiles entice users to continue using the app, but the person behind these accounts is not "available" for selection. For this reason, such accounts are misleading and deceptive.

At first, I recorded the data for fake accounts, but after I became more familiar with the app, and was better able to identify them, I skipped these profiles instead, meaning they weren't evaluated at all.

Some indicators for identifying a fake account are as follows.

- The quality of the photos and text are a cut above the others, as mentioned in the previous section.
- Seeing the same person in several different locales.
- There are images of the same person in two different account profiles, possibly using different names. Even if we assume the photos represent a real person it makes you wonder why they would need two accounts.
- Photographs that are incongruent with the self-descriptions. For example, a person who describes herself as someone who "does not drink/smoke", but who has a photo of herself holding a beer/cigarette at a party. Another example is a person who identifies as "single, never married", but who is wearing a wedding band in a photo.

Conclusions

While thinking about how I would phrase my conclusions, I realized that nearly every person I came across indicated in some way they wanted to be entertained. I can't pretend to have insight into why so many women posted photos of themselves in raucous party or nightclub environments, but I believe the simplest explanation is that these profiles attempted to signal their social standing by showing how much fun they were.

While these party photos do show they have fun and have friends, they also reveal a lack of responsibility and high-maintenance lifestyle. Red Pill men like to say that women see what they want in men, and try to be that themselves. I believe this is true when it comes to the pictures women use on online profiles.

Women do not initiate conversations with men on this app. Normally, this is a sign of femininity and traditional roles. However, the girls who expect men to initiate conversations on Tinder aren't exactly feminine or traditional. Quite the opposite, actually. To me, I do not see this as some form of coy virtue signaling, but the action of a narcissist who expects men to entertain them by operating within their Frame.

From a comprehensive view of this study of Tinder users, it is obvious that Tinder has the following defacto purposes.

- It is predominantly an internet forum serving the hookup culture.
- It serves as an outlet for various forms of internet prostitution, such as Instagram wh0ring, escort services, sugar babies, and others.

If you're just looking for wimmin who are DTF, you'll find a smorgaswhoard on Tinder, provided that you'd be willing to settle for the quality. But if you're looking for a credible LTR mate, Tinder is a waste of time.

Due to the widespread popularity of Tinder, I recommend husbands currently being frivorced and/or attorneys in custody battles to create an account (each time they need to use it for their client), to see if the other person is on Tinder (or other dating apps), and what type of behavior that person is exhibiting or participating in. If more attorneys did this, fewer skanky mothers would have custody, and fewer cucked dads would be paying a court ordered child support to post-wall party pros who leave the kids at home. Perhaps this might be the best use of Tinder (and similar apps). The internet lives forever you know.

Related

- Σ Frame: Analysis of People on Dating Sites (2014 October 8)
- Σ Frame: DTF Cupid (2017 December 17)
- Cave Man Circus: Guy Made A Tinder Experiment To Show How Women Respond To Creepy Messages From A Hot Guy (2019 April 3)
- The Other McCain: Insta-Whores (2019 April 30)

Irresponsible Ejaculation Causes Abortion

Jack · 23 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

One wimminz impeccable argument on how abortion is the direct result of men's irresponsibility.

Readership: All

> "Enter ye in at the strait gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: Because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." ~ Matthew 7:13-14 KJV

I just came across this article from exactly one year ago, and I can't resist reposting it with a commentary. It's utterly hilarious!

Design Mom: My Twitter Thread on Abortion (2018 September 13)

H/T: Just Ambitious to Serve Communications (JATSC): 'Irresponsible ejaculation causes abortion' (2018 September 16)

This could have very well been published on the Babylon Bee, and no one would have suspected that it wasn't satire; that a woman actually wrote this with sincere convictions.

This is an excellent example of what I meant when I wrote that a person can have a seemingly rational argument, but still be ridiculously in the wrong.

The problem with her argument is that she conveniently omitted the pertinent facts and information. I'll attempt to fill in the blanks with my commentary.

♦ ♦ ♦

> Today, I tried something new. I wrote a Twitter thread for the first time. It's about abortion, and how I think we need to approach the topic differently. I thought I'd share it here, because I know many of you don't use > Twitter.

>
> So here's the thread, broken up into small Tweet-size pieces. :)
>
> I'm a mother of six, and a Mormon. I have a good understanding of arguments surrounding abortion, religious and otherwise. I've been listening to men grandstand about women's reproductive rights, and I'm convinced men actually have zero interest in stopping abortion. Here's why…

Mormon… that says something, but I'm not sure exactly what. (I'll ask Boxer to comment.) Reading between the lines, I'm already getting the feeling that this woman hates her life, and maybe her husband too, but she's lazy and doesn't want to do anything about it, even something as simple as changing her attitude to be thankful for her family.

It's All Menz Fault!

> If you want to stop abortion, you need to prevent unwanted pregnancies. And men are 100% responsible for unwanted pregnancies.

100% men's fault, you say? Heh… Men are not 100% responsible for the fact that the woman they just impregnated doesn't want to bear their offspring. Men are not 100% responsible for her unilateral choice to abort either. From the man's perspective that's a classic bait and switch. "Here's my body. Insert your c0ck in my vagary… (intercourse commences) Oh, you actually came in me! What a surprise! Didn't see that one coming! (A month later…) Ohhh, I'm pregnant! No, I changed my mind, I don't want a baby."

> No for real, they are. Perhaps you are thinking: IT TAKES TWO! And yes, it does take two for intentional pregnancies. But ALL unwanted pregnancies are caused by the irresponsible ejaculations of men. Period.

Translation: Sex can be great, except for that annoying risk of getting pregnant. Never mind the fact that God created the male-female union to result in procreation; Itz duh manz fault!

> Don't believe me? Let me walk you through it. Let's start with this: women can only get pregnant about 2 days each month. And that's for a limited number of years.

Not true! I've known women who conceived while on the pill and/or from having sex during their menses. In reality, anytime you have sex, there's a chance of pregnancy, even when using many forms of birth control.

> That makes 24 days a year a women [sic] might get pregnant. But men can cause pregnancy 365 days a year. In fact, if you're a man who ejaculates multiple times a day, you could cause multiple pregnancies daily. In theory a man could cause 1000+ unwanted pregnancies in just one year.

There's a twang of penis envy here. Note how she's assuming polygyny. She's a good Mormon wife.

> And though their sperm gets crappier as they age, men can cause unwanted pregnancies from puberty till death. So just starting with basic biology + the calendar it's easy to see men are the issue here.

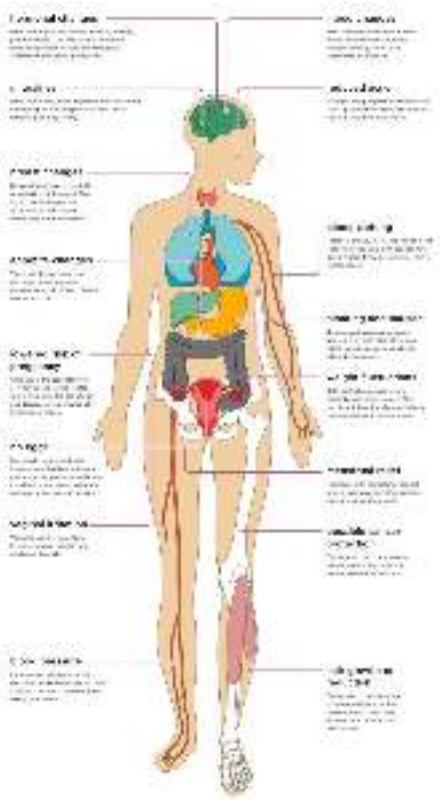
Starting with basic biology, fertile women get pregnant. It's easy to see how women who spread their legs are the issue here.

> But what about birth control? If a woman doesn't want to risk an unwanted pregnancy, why wouldn't she just use birth control? If a women [sic] can manage to figure out how to get an abortion, surely she can get birth control, right? Great questions.

She portrays men's fecundity as a power to be envied, while the fertility of women is little more than a risk of pregnancy. Where is the honor for women as child bearers?

> Modern birth control is possibly the greatest invention of the last century, and I am very grateful for it. It's also brutal. The side effects for many women are ridiculously harmful. So ridiculous, that when an oral contraception for men was created, it wasn't approved… [she inserted a pregnant paragraph break here] because of the side effects. And the list of side effects was about 1/3 as long as the known side effects for women's oral contraception.

Men are smart enough not to ingest hormone altering drugs which are intended to screw up their body chemistry.



> There's a lot to be unpacked just in that story, but I'll simply point out (in case you didn't know) that as a society, we really don't mind if women suffer, physically or mentally, as long as it makes things easier for men.

A classic example of Psychological Projection. What she means to say is, "(in case you didn't know) …as a society, we really don't mind if men suffer, physically or mentally, as long as it makes things easier for women."

> But good news, Men: Even with the horrible side effects, women are still very willing to use birth control. Unfortunately, it's harder to get than it should be. Birth control options for women require a doctor's appointment and a prescription. It's not free, and often not cheap.

So she is inadvertently arguing that using abortion as a form of birth control is easier and cheaper than using birth control pills. We already know too many women think this way.

> In fact, there are many people trying to make it more expensive by fighting to make sure insurance companies refuse to cover it. Oral contraceptives for women can't be acquired easily, or at the last minute. And they don't work instantly.

Yes, sin is rather frustrating. You can't fool God, you can't revamp biology on the fly, and you can't change human desire to F*cky F*cky. When will you learn to go with the flow?

> If we're talking about the pill, it requires consistent daily use and doesn't leave much room for mistakes, forgetfulness, or unexpected disruptions to daily schedules. And again, the side effects can be brutal. I'M STILL GRATEFUL FOR IT PLEASE DON'T TAKE IT AWAY.

She's coming closer, but she still won't come out and say that abortion is a one-off visit to the clinic, making it more convenient than using birth control pills.

Wimmin want Men to Trust Condoms to be Miraculous

> I'm just saying women's birth control isn't simple or easy. In contrast, let's look at birth control for men, meaning condoms. Condoms are readily available at all hours, inexpensive, convenient, and don't require a prescription. They're effective, and work on demand, instantly.

…and she doesn't have to do anything about that. If she asks him to wear a condom, then it's no longer her responsibility. The perfect solution!

> Men can keep them stocked up just in case, so they're always prepared. Amazing! They are so much easier than birth control options for women. As a bonus, in general, women love when men use condoms. They keep us from getting STDs, they don't lessen our pleasure during sex…

Women love using condoms? In my experience, women hate using condoms even more than men do.

> … or prevent us from climaxing. And the best part? Clean up is so much easier — no waddling to the toilet as your jizz drips down our legs. So why in the world are there ever unwanted pregnancies? Why don't men just use condoms every time they have sex? Seems so simple, right?

Ouch! I'm getting the impression that she's a frigid whife who's never known anything other than duty sex. A woman who is really crazy about her man wouldn't waste a precious drop.

> Oh. I remember. Men don't love condoms. In fact, men frequently pressure women to have sex without a condom. And it's not unheard of for men to remove the condom during sex, without the women's permission or knowledge. (Pro-tip: That's assault.)

Women do the same thing to men. What is it called when a woman tries to trap a man by having his baby? But women wouldn't think of that as "assault".

I'll say it again; if you're having sex, there's always a chance of pregnancy.

JATSC adds here, "Stealthing' is a new sex trend where men remove condoms without partner's consent."

If women remove or puncture condoms without partner's consent, would that be stealthing? If the condom accidentally breaks, would that still be stealthing? Where do you draw the line?

Guess what? You're already way past the line and into the thick of it. So you're just complaining because things did not go as you wished, and your actions actually led to the natural consequence.

> Why would men want to have sex without a condom? Good question. Apparently it's because for the minutes they are penetrating their partner, having no condom on gives the experience more pleasure.

It's not just about pleasure. For many people, commingling swill is a deeply emotional bonding experience. It also alters one's body chemistry.

> So… there are men willing to risk getting a woman pregnant — which means literally risking her life, her health, her social status, her relationships, and her career, so that they can experience a few minutes of slightly more pleasure? Is that for real? Yes. Yes it is.

Yes, sexual relations can change a woman's life, health, social status, relationships, and career, as well as produce children. Has she ever considered the longitudinal consequences of engaging in sexual relations?

> What are we talking about here pleasure-wise? If there's a pleasure scale, with pain beginning at zero and going down into the negatives, a back-scratch falling at 5, and an orgasm without a condom being a 10, where would sex with a condom fall? Like a 7 or 8?

She seems obsessed with the pleasure aspect of sex, and fails to consider any of the other cofactors.

> So it's not like sex with a condom is not pleasurable, it's just not as pleasurable. An 8 instead of a 10. Let me emphasize that again: Men regularly choose to put women at massive risk by having non-condom sex, in order to experience a few minutes of slightly more pleasure.

Women already put themselves at massive “risk” simply by entering into a situation where sex could occur. Would a woman ever see that “risk” ahead of time and take precautionary measures? No, that’s too much work. It’s easier to just blame the man.

Men should have self-control, so they can do what Wimmin want them to do

> Now keep in mind, for the truly condom-averse, men also have a non-condom, always-ready birth control built right in, called the pull out. It’s not perfect, and it’s a favorite joke, but it is also 96% effective.

If a man can make himself pull out every single time, he’s either a porn actor, or he doesn’t feel that passionate about the woman. Losing control is a big part of what makes sex “good”.

> So surely, we can expect men who aren’t wearing a condom to at least pull out every time they have sex, right?
>
> Nope.
>
> And why not?

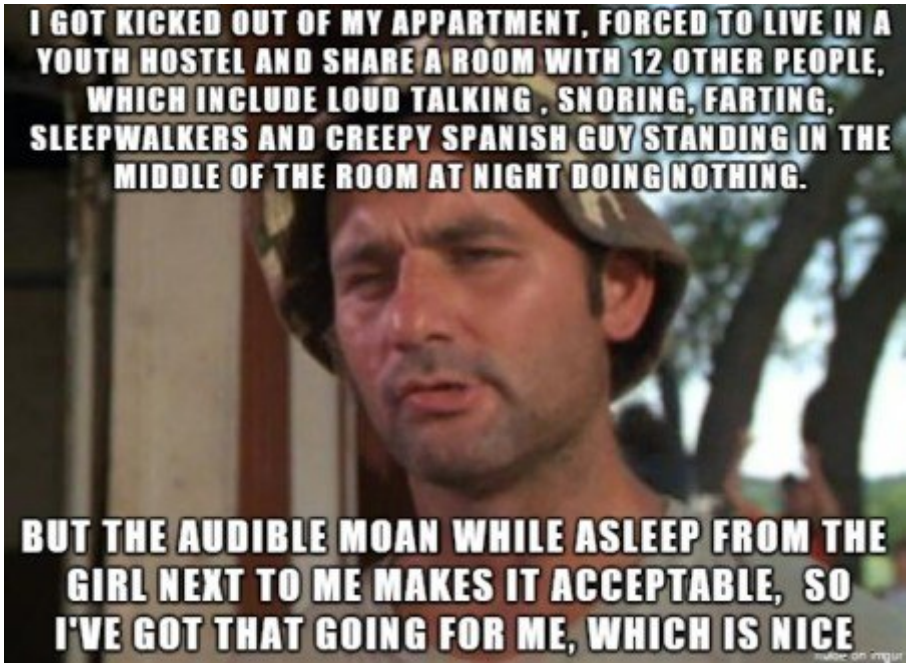
Perhaps a man might be overwhelmed by lurrve, passion, and desire, perchance? If he’s not, that’s a shamefully poor reflection on the female.

> Well, again, apparently it’s slightly more pleasurable to climax inside a vagina than, say, on their partner’s stomach.

Here we go back to the obsession with pleasure. Give me a break! The pleasure is not without a purpose.

> So men are willing to risk the life, health and well-being of women, in order to experience a tiny bit more pleasure for like 5 seconds during orgasm.

Men are also risking their own life, health, and well-being in their gambit to procreate, especially in our modern gynocentric, pound-me-too society.



And… don’t underestimate those 5 seconds of orgasm – that’s the culmination of thousands of years of breeding being thrown into the future (or a latex bag).

> It's mind-boggling and disturbing when you realize that's the choice men are making. And honestly, I'm not as mad as I should be about this, because we've trained men from birth that their pleasure is of utmost importance in the world. (And to dis-associate sex and pregnancy.)

More Projection about pleasure and dismantling it from procreation. Pleasure is obviously a running theme of her monologue. Do you think she'll bring it up again?

> While we're here, let's talk a bit more about pleasure and biology. Did you know that a man CAN'T get a woman pregnant without having an orgasm? Which means that we can conclude getting a woman pregnant is a pleasurable act for men.

Hasn't she ever heard of the potency of precum?

> But did you further know that men CAN get a woman pregnant without HER feeling any pleasure at all? In fact, it's totally possible for a man to impregnate a woman even while causing her excruciating pain, trauma or horror.

True, pregnancies are typically painful. But if you don't enjoy the sex, and you don't want a child, then why are you doing it? Duty sex confirmed.

> In contrast, a woman can have non-stop orgasms with or without a partner and never once get herself pregnant. A woman's orgasm has literally nothing to do with pregnancy or fertility — her clitoris exists not for creating new babies, but simply for pleasure.

There's that P word again… Are we surprised? She says her clit is only for her pleasure, not for making babies, but somehow, for reasons unbeknownst to wimmin, that pleasurable clitoral orgasm has suckered her into procreating. The joke's on her!

> No matter how many orgasms she has, they won't make her pregnant. Pregnancies can only happen when men have an orgasm. Unwanted pregnancies can only happen when men orgasm irresponsibly.

Only? So let me be sure I'm following correctly here. Fapping to RedTube is more pleasurable than duty sex, but I'd consider that to be an irresponsible orgasm. But she says, "Unwanted pregnancies can only happen when men orgasm irresponsibly". So can we conclude that watching internet porn can cause a pregnancy, and one that is unwanted, no less? Taking this one step further, if we outlawed internet p0rn, then abortion would never be necessary!

Wouldn't it be more reasonable to assume a correlation between duty sex and unwanted pregnancies?

> What this means is a women [sic] can be the sluttliest slut [sic LOL] in the entire world who loves having orgasms all day long and all night long and she will never find herself with an unwanted pregnancy unless a man shows up and ejaculates irresponsibly.

Toxic masculinity strikes again! How dare you interrupt a s1ut's joyride with your pleasurable ejaculation!

Rules were meant to be broken

> Women enjoying sex does not equal unwanted pregnancy and abortion. Men enjoying sex and having irresponsible ejaculations is what causes unwanted pregnancies and abortion.

It takes two to progenerate. Women who abort go to clinics on their own initiative, often without even informing the man. I'd say "a women" who wants to be sexually active with a living man, but who also considers abortion as a preferred alternative to bearing a child, is the one who causes unwanted pregnancies and abortion. If we must foist the responsibility onto men, then the solution is not to bang "a women" who want to withhold the fruit of their loins.

Feminine Responsibility

> Let's talk more about responsibility.

Heh… Of course, what she means by "responsibility" is Wimminz opinions about what they believe should be Menz responsibility.

> Men often don't know, and don't ask, and don't think to ask, if they've caused a pregnancy. They may never think of it, or associate sex with making babies at all. Why? Because there are 0 consequences for men who cause unwanted pregnancies.

Zero consequences?!?!? Paternity suit? Child support? Wait, those are benefits (for her), not consequences!

Next, she details three possible outcomes. (1) She aborts secretly. (2) She has the baby secretly. (3) She has the baby and uses it for sextortion.

There are a couple more possibilities which she never mentions: (4) She informs him that she's pregnant by him and that she's getting an abortion whether he agrees or not. (5) She informs him that she's pregnant by him, and carries the baby to term while maintaining proper health and nutrition, which is her reasonable service. Meanwhile, she is grateful to have been chosen by God to become a progenitor of future generations.

These last two responses would be the most honest responses of all. But an honest response is not feasible for the obvious reason that it would show her to be the savage, scamming Sheila she truly is.

> If the woman decides to have an abortion, the man may never know he caused an unwanted pregnancy with his irresponsible ejaculation.
>
> If the woman decides to have the baby, or put the baby up for adoption, the man may never know he caused an unwanted pregnancy with his irresponsible ejaculation, or that there's now a child walking around with 50% of his DNA.

Let me correct your inadequate reasoning for you. If the woman decides to never tell the man about her pregnancy, the man may never know he fathered a child with his bullseye shot. Her having an abortion has nothing to do with him not knowing, except that it makes it easier for her to prevent him from knowing.

> If the woman does tell him that he caused an unwanted pregnancy and that she's having the baby, the closest thing to a consequence for him, is that he may need to pay child support. But our current child support system is well-known to be a joke.

Yes, the child support system is a failure because it can't give her any more money than what he earns. Weak men always screw feminism up.

> 61% of men (or women) who are legally required to pay it, simply don't. With little or no repercussions. Their credit isn't even affected. So, many men keep going as is, causing unwanted pregnancies with irresponsible ejaculations and never giving it thought.

Some men might consider it irresponsible to continue offering financial support to a wimmin who frivorcenapped his child to extort monthly installments of ransom.

> When the topic of abortion comes up, men might think: Abortion is horrible; women should not have abortions. And never once consider the man who CAUSED the unwanted pregnancy. If you're not holding men responsible for unwanted pregnancies, then you are wasting your time.

Of course, we could never hold wimmin responsible for forcing themselves into having unpleasurable duty sex that results in a child they don't want to have.

News flash! The most effective way to prevent unwanted pregnancies and irresponsible abortions is to abstain. That means stop hopping on cock! Why is she omitting the most obvious solution?

> Stop protesting at clinics. Stop shaming women. Stop trying to overturn abortion laws. If you actually care about reducing or eliminating the number of abortions in our country, simply HOLD MEN RESPONSIBLE FOR THEIR ACTIONS.

Holding people responsible for their actions sounds reasonable. Let's repeal Roe vs. Wade and make sexual promiscuity and abortion punishable offenses!

> What would that look like? What if there was a real and immediate consequence for men who cause an unwanted pregnancy? What kind of consequence would make sense? Should it be as harsh, painful, nauseating, scarring, expensive, risky, and life-altering… [here's another pregnant pause] as forcing a woman to go through a 9-month unwanted pregnancy?

Her Argument for Castration

> In my experience, men really like their testicles. If irresponsible ejaculations were putting their balls at risk, they would stop being irresponsible. Does castration seem like a cruel and unusual punishment? Definitely.

Not so fast. I know several young men who would give their left nut to empty their sack into a supermodel of their choice. I would call that a grotesque trade, or even a reward of sorts, but not a punishment.

> But is it worse than forcing 500,000 women a year to puke daily for months, gain 40 pounds, and then rip their bodies apart in childbirth? Is a handful of castrations worse than women dying during forced pregnancy & childbirth?

She subscribes to the feminist emasculation/castration rhetoric. <Sigh…>

> Put a castration law on the books, implement the law, let the media tell the story, and in 3 months or less, tada! abortions will have virtually disappeared. Can you picture it? No more abortions in less than 3 months, without ever trying to outlaw them. Amazing.

Legislating mandatory castration – an idea we've heard before. A not-so-subtle power grab.

> For those of you who consider abortion to be murder, wouldn't you be on board with having a handful of men castrated, if it prevented 500,000 murders each year?

Imagine that. She believes castrating men is preferable to the risk of pregnancy, or a normal world without Roe vs. Wade. And she never seems to realize that wimmin, not men propagate those murders – a very convenient omission.

> And if not, is that because you actually care more about policing women's bodies, morality, and sexuality, than > you do about reducing or eliminating abortions? (That's a rhetorical question.)

Wimminz actually care more about policing men's balls with legislated castration, eliminating their progeny, and maintaining the upper hand, than they do about reducing or eliminating abortions.

> Hey, you can even have the men who will be castrated bank their sperm before it happens — just in case they want to responsibly have kids someday.

That's a cute argument, just in case they find a responsible woman who is not obsessed with abortion.

> Can't wrap your head around a physical punishment for men? Even though you seem to be more than fine with physical punishments for women? Okay. Then how about this prevention idea: At the onset of puberty, all males in the U.S. could be required by law to get a vasectomy.

A vasectomy at puberty would not eliminate toxic masculinity nor male thirst. You've got to remove those gonads at birth to do that.

> Vasectomies are very safe, totally reversible, and about as invasive as an doctor's exam for a woman getting a birth control prescription. There is some soreness afterwards for about 24 hours, but that's pretty much it for side effects.

> (So much better than The Pill, which is taken by millions of women in our country, the side effects of which are well known and can be brutal.)

Who would not agree that scalpels and stitches are better than pills?

> If/when the male becomes a responsible adult, and perhaps finds a mate, if they want to have a baby, the vasectomy can be reversed, and then redone once the childbearing stage is over. And each male can bank their > sperm before the vasectomy, just in case.

A backhanded stab at males there in the first clause. She must think she's being kind to men by allowing them this option, but it's not much of an option. Vasectomies can be reversed with 30-50% success. Published rates of artificial insemination in women under 40 years are about 10-15% per cycle. After 6 months of inseminations, about 50% of women are pregnant. In other words, she's saying that female control over procreation takes precedence over male fecundity.

> It's not that wild of an idea. 80% of males in the U.S. are circumcised, most as babies. And that's not reversible.

Hey, female "circumcision" is "not that wild of an idea" either! 80% of females in central Africa undergo genital mutilation, most as babies. And that's not reversible either! I'm sure feminists would agree, since they value equality so much.

> Don't like my ideas? That's fine. I'm sure there are better ones. Go ahead and suggest your own ideas. My point is that it's nonsense to focus on women if you're trying to get rid of abortions. Abortion is the "cure" for an unwanted pregnancy.

A moment of silence for all the babies lost at abortion clinics. She gotta be free to climb dat stairway to heaven by sending her child to ɦəll!

Final Delusions

> If you want to stop abortions, you need to prevent the "disease" – meaning, unwanted pregnancies. And the only way to do that, is by focusing on men, because: MEN CAUSE 100% OF UNWANTED PREGNANCIES. Or. IRRESPONSIBLE EJACULATIONS BY MEN CAUSE 100% OF UNWANTED PREGNANCIES.

Dicks cause abortions. Ho hum… We hear similar vague, overgeneralized arguments from the Left all the time. Guns cause shootings. Alcohol causes drunkenness. Drugs cause addictions. Society causes incarceration.

If the Right were this irrational, we might hear arguments like, Tingles cause affairs; miniskirts cause rape; mouths cause beatings; and bosses cause unemployment. We could also say that WOMEN CAUSE 100% OF UNWANTED ABORTIONS.

> If you're a man, what would the consequence need to be for you to never again ejaculate irresponsibly? Would it be money related? Maybe a loss of rights or freedoms? Physical pain?

Men are willing to endure untold severities for the sake of sex and procreation. Modern marriage and all the inherent risks are at the top of that list. There is also a growing number of men who refuse to accept those risks and forsake sex and women altogether. They're called MGTOW's. It's hard to say which is worse, but as wimmin get worse, MGTOW is looking better.

> Ask yourselves: What would it take for you to value the life of your sexual partner more than your own temporary pleasure or convenience?

Why does there need to be a false dilemma? Love and life should proliferate in a healthy relationship, producing mutuality, not a parasitism. To insist otherwise sounds like (more) Projection.

> Are you someone who learns better with analogies? Let's try this one: Think of another great pleasure in life, let's say food. Think of your favorite meal, dessert, or drink.

I am guessing she is a conscientious vegan.

> What if you found out that every time you indulge in that favorite food you risked causing great physical and mental pain for someone you know intimately. You might not cause any pain, but it's a real risk.

I know exactly what you mean! Chickens, cows, and potatoes are brutally and systemically destroyed every day because McDonalds. We should pass a law to ban the cruel mockery of clowns serving horse lips in a box.

> Well, you'd probably be sad, but never indulge in that food again, right? Not worth the risk!

I would be sooo sad in a world without the hamburglar! But I'll sacrifice my carnivorous nature for the sake of not offending vegans and for the rights of soybeans.

> And then, what if you further found out, there was a simple thing you could do before you ate that favorite food, and it would eliminate the risk of causing pain to someone else. Which is great news!

We could switch to vegetarian "meat" substitutes, which are comprised mostly of soybeans.

> BUT the simple thing you need to do makes the experience of eating the food slightly less pleasurable. To be clear, it would still be VERY pleasurable, but slightly less so.

Lack of sufficient grease causes perpetual global hunger.

> Like maybe you have to eat the food with a fork or spoon that you don't particularly like.

The Chinese don't like forks at all, and so instead, they eat oryza seeds and tofu with sticks. That's why they are thin. Likewise, outlawing silverware in Murica would solve the obesity epidemic. In addition, soy reduces testosterone, further combating the toxic masculinity crisis.

This is turning out to be a great idea. We could eliminate hunger, obesity, cruelty to organisms, and toxic masculinity, all by eating processed soy and outlawing forks and meats.

> Would you be willing to do that simple thing, and eliminate the risk of causing pain to someone you know intimately, every single time you ate your favorite food?
>
> OF COURSE YOU WOULD.

> Condoms (or even pulling out) is that simple thing. Don't put women at risk. Don't choose to maximize your own pleasure if it risks causing women pain.

Did she ever think, “Maybe I should just not have sex?” Or, “If I’m absolutely sure I never want to have a child, maybe I should get my tubes tied.” No, she always puts the responsibility on men.

> Men mostly run our government. Men mostly make the laws. And men could eliminate abortions in 3 months or less without ever touching an abortion law or evening mentioning women.

Again, she is putting all the responsibility on men and she blames men for the outcome. In our modern feminista culture, men are not as powerful as she imagines.

> In summary: STOP TRYING TO CONTROL WOMEN’S BODIES AND SEXUALITY. UNWANTED PREGNANCIES ARE CAUSED BY MEN.

The sentence in bold reveals wimminz true motives. If wimmin start controlling themselves and taking responsibility for their actions, then others will not need to do so.

♦ ♦ ♦

Although her argument might seem reasonable to the solipsistic hamster, her naïve self-centeredness, ignorance, and fear of the male viewpoint, transforms her essay into hilarious satire.

Selfish immature people always focus on their desire to engage in profligate sex at their whim for their own enjoyment, but they never want to take responsibility for their behavior. If things don’t go the way they want, then they blame someone else.

All these arguments about abortions, condoms, pills, castrations, vasectomies, laws and legislation, and who is responsible for what, amounts to nothing more than a Pandora’s box of selfishness and sexual sin.

Related

- Dalrock: Don’t tell women no. (2016 May 6)
- The Rational Male: Selective Breeding (2019 September 3)
- Boxer: Feminism is Hell (2019 September 4)
- Boxer: Abortion as Pastime (2019 September 5)

The Overton Shake

Jack · 30 September 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Has the Overton window divided to form distinct Left and Right factions?

Readership: Sociocultural Anthropology enthusiasts; Those following Boxer's arguments against Dalrock; Those involved with the American Heritage Girls organization;

> "Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." ~ Proverbs 27:17 KJV

* Section titles taken from the song, Stuck in the middle with you, by Stealer's Wheel (feat. Gerry Rafferty).

Clowns to the Left of Me*

It's not often that we see a senator berating a tech giant for not being progressive enough.

PA Pundits (feat. Alexander Hall): Senator Calls To Jail Zuckerberg If Facebook Doesn't Censor More (2019 September 5)

> "Wyden specifically hammered Big Tech, though not for the reasons conservatives would. "Your companies have done practically everything wrong since the 2016 election", he wrote. He later added, "If you don't get serious on moderation, you're going to have a lot of people coming after you. And they're going to be in a very strong position."

In other words, Suckerberg's forbearance of free speech advocates is slowing down progressiveness!

> "[Sen. Wyden] has called for better moderation, particularly against "all the hatemongers", which, to free speech advocates, is a step down the slippery slope to censorship. On the other hand, Wyden mentioned that when "Barack Obama said you had to give up 10 percent of your liberty to have security," he "wanted to throw a rock at my television set.""

They can dish it out, but they can't take it.

> "In a statement posted on his government website, Wyden said "tech companies certainly need to continue to be far more vigorous about identifying, fingerprinting and blocking content and individuals who incite hate and violence." Big Tech, he said, should be doing far more to "clean up their platforms" on their own.""

Wyden is acting as the Deep State's goad to get Big Tech giants like Facebook (FB) (and all of their numbskull users) further down the road towards Big Brother socialism. But Zuck is caught in a conundrum.

> "[Facebook's] business model was built on clicks and virality, which led them to tune their algorithms in ways that actively encouraged conspiracy theories, personal abuse, and other content that was most likely to generate user interaction. This was the opposite of the public broadcasting ideal, which (as defined, for example, by the Council of Europe) privileged material deemed in the broad public interest. User attention is the most precious commodity on the internet, and platform algorithms increasingly determined what users were likely to see or hear."

Zuck can't pyle on any more censorship as long as (1) he's using clicks and data to generate income, and (2) a significant segment of his user base is dead set against both censorship and selling user data. He has to bide his time and wait until a larger piece of the population is convinced that tighter censorship is necessary. Only then can he tighten up his algorithms without a considerable kickback. Meanwhile, the public's discontent with FB has been rising. Recently, Zuck was called to the congressional carpet for selling user data.

Jokers to the Right*

Meanwhile, over on the other extreme of the political spectrum, Dalrock is taking issue with various manifestations of Feminism within the Church and society, and Boxer's clan is pointing out how Dalrock's efforts might be counterproductive – or worse.

1. Boxer: The Love of The Censor (2019 August 31)
2. Dalrock: Proverbs 31 princesses (2019 September 3)
3. Boxer (feat. Derek Ramsey): Embracing Feminist Scouting (2019 September 3)
4. Boxer (feat. Chronoblip): Survival vs. Status (2019 September 7)
5. Boxer: Manufacture of Consent in Microcosm (2019 September 8)

Just days after Boxer castigated Dalrock in post [1], Boxer's place blew up after Dalrock wrote an article [2] discussing how the AHG taught a feminist agenda within the church.

Boxer's primary claim to contention can be summed up in this quote from post [3] above.

> "…blogs like Vox Day and Dalrock are really feminist blogs riddled with half-truths.
>
> Dalrock, specifically, spends almost all his time vilifying anti-feminists. Given the choice between attacking a popular activist feminist organization or an anti-feminist organization whose worst crime is not being amazing at teaching theology, Dalrock chooses the latter. When faced with the choice to attack feminist thought policing or embrace it, Dalrock chooses the latter."

Boxer wants to say Dalrock is a feminist for not properly accepting the AHC.

What's Up With Boxer?

Boxer has put Dalrock under heavy scrutiny. Earlier this year, Dalrock went after Warhorn and It's Good to be a Man (IGTBAM), and Boxer has taken him to task in the following posts.

6. Boxer: Deconstructing Dalrock (2019 February 26)
7. Boxer: Dalrock (The Neverending Screech) (2019 March 14)

We could put Boxer and his crew under the same speculum.

Within these and other posts in his past repertoire, Boxer has called out Christians as fake, bad, hypocrites, etc. He has called out the rejects of society and labeled them as Feminists. This is essentially what Dalrock and Vox do, except for a couple differences.

1. Boxer doesn't accede any faith to Christianity (or any other religion that I know of.)
2. Boxer never calls out Feminism within Churchianity (to the best of my knowledge).
3. Dalrock has an evangelical approach, not only about Christianity, but also about the Red Pill. Boxer's place is more of a Red Pill coven for the like-minded.

Whenever Dalrock has a post that manifests these differences, Boxer jumps into the ring with his gloves on, ready to tear into Dalrock. So it seems Boxer is opposed to either (1) the evangelical approach, or (2) Christians calling out Feminist influence within the church, as though this would be hypocrisy, or a subtle form of treachery.

In other words, either he can't seem to understand, or he's not willing to address the difference between secular politics and what's happening in the Church. Hence, he doesn't see a problem with a Feminist gospel so long as the activities and soliloquies in the Church are coherent with Chivalry (traditional Feminism) in nature.

Or maybe he has an interest at stake there.

So, could Boxer and Derek be converged agent provocateurs, going undercover as abrasive Manospherians to undermine Dalrock's influence and/or doxx him somehow?

Personally, I believe Boxer, Derek, Necron, Sharkly, et al. are motivated to pick a bone with Dalrock because Boxer, Sharkly, et al. have been ostracized from Dalrock's comment section in the past, and also because Derek, Necron, et al. are displeased with any blogger who prefers to remain anonymous.

So I would lean against the idea of an organized effort and say, like attracts like.

The Frame

The larger question that Boxer poses is valid enough – whether Dalrock, Vox, et al. might be detracting from the popular support for individuals and organizations that make baby steps towards moving the Overton window to the Right. In other words, is Dalrock et al. conducive, incisive, or divisive?

Under a closer scrutiny of the most recent skirmish, the constitution of the American Heritage Girls (AHG) is central to the argument. Here, Gunner Q offered an informative review of the AHG: Checking the American Heritage Girls (2019 September 8).

I might summarize Gunner's conclusion by saying that the AHG is better aligned to Christian values, compared to the Girl Scouts of America (GSA), but not totally free from feminist influence. This is "good enough" to be considered a Christian organization for Boxer's consortium who are in tune with the times, but not good enough for ideological purists like Dalrock.

As a thought experiment, would anyone think that Sen. Wyden might be an undercover member of the Alt-Right, or a controlled opposition, solely based on the fact that he is attacking Glowbowl Big Tech giant Farcebook?

Or would you guess that we are seeing a spokesman for the more extreme Left chastising a leader of the less extreme Left for dragging their feet and slowing the shakedown cruise towards progressivism?

Likewise, would anyone suspect that Dalrock (or Vox) might be a Zi0nist social engineer who helped build the Manosphere, only to then destroy it by fomenting internal bickering, based on the fact that he attacks the doctrine of popular preachers and girl scout organizations?

Or would you guess that we are seeing a mouthpiece for the more extreme Right chastising leaders of the less extreme Right for not being sufficiently Right?

Boxer and company have come to a conclusion reminiscent of the former, by arguing that Dalrock is (1) anonymous, (2) unreasonably, and at times offensively overprotective of his identity and his blog, and (3) intellectually dishonest. He's got a following that agree with him, including Derek, and Earl of all people. But I am yet to be convinced.

Reasons (1) and (2) are debatable, but perfectly understandable. Concerning (3), even supposing someone is intellectually dishonest, does that necessarily mean that their basic premises and conclusions are in error? Or perhaps it might only suggest that they are less well skilled in Aristetolian logic and debate?

A third possibility is that they are sarcastically/hyperbolically utilizing any number of logical fallacies in order to (1) emphasize the foolishness of the argument being entertained, as well as to (2) captivate the readers and (3) provoke critical thinking with a foolhardy jest.

Although I am no expert in literary devices, I do enjoy toying with them in my writings just for the fun of it, and I have recognized that Dalrock does the same in his work, much to the chagrin of others.

One addendum… Jokers and Jacks to the Right!

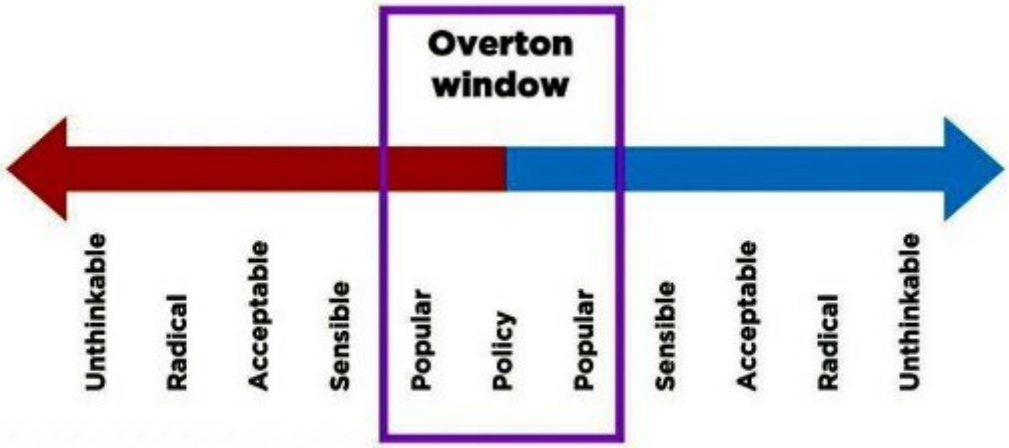
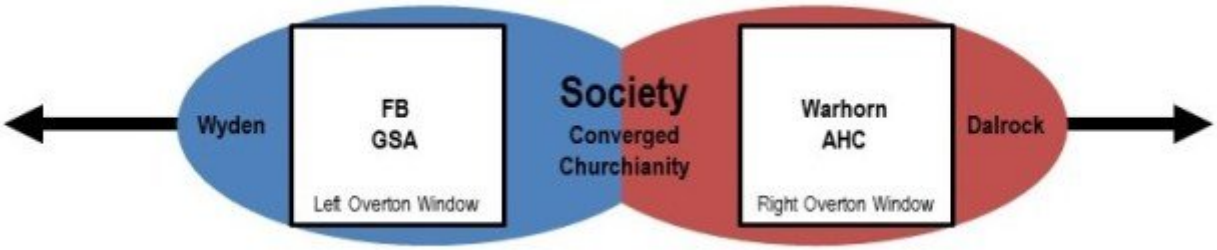
The Reframe

As an abstract concept, the Overton Window looks like this.



The question is, why are we now seeing intra-fighting on both sides of the political aisle, instead of inter-fighting?

I suggest the answer might be because the Overton window has now split into a Leftward migrating window, and a Rightward drifting window. Something like this.



FB and the GSA are within the "Politically Correct" Overton window being proscribed by the Left. Meanwhile, IGTBAM, AHG, and to a lesser extent, Warhorn, are trying to stay within a freshly budding Overton window on the Right. Most of the other pastors criticized by Dalrock are floating in the converged, No Men's Land (pun intended).

Entities in either window must appear acceptable to their public constituencies in order to attract more people, to gain popularity and the financial solvency that goes with it, and/or to avoid persecution. If we play hardball, we might call their stance a pragmatically graceful compromise.

Why must Religious groups compromise? It's because they're in a feminized Society, and like FB, to stay in business, they need to connect with the viewpoints of a large number of real people who don't know how far off the mark they stand.

The AHG tries to offer an alternative program for girls that is closer to Biblical teaching, but they also try to make themselves attractive and identifiable to the larger community, which has already been corrupted through Feminist influence and Churchianization.

IGTBAM tries to spoon feed the Red Pill in micrograms to the wider Christian community. They can't push milligrams of the stuff, because then they'd be condemned as raycis, misogynistic, phobic, etc., ad nauseum.

But religious orgainizations are not the only ones who must compromise. Fakebuck as well as the GSA know they have to stay within their respective Overton windows to stay relevant and lucrative. Greater numbers of adherents are necessary before the Overton window can be said to shift through continual reeducation and exposure to their respective ideas.

In other words, all these groups are limited by their respective Overton windows – how much people can accept as normal. But at the same time, all these groups contribute to the movements of their respective Overton windows – what people can adopt as relevant truth. Those who actively push the boundaries of what people can adopt as relevant truth might be defined loosely as Evangelicals. It might not be their express purpose, and they may not even be conscious of this, but in the larger sense, their influence has some impact on what people choose to believe as the "norm".

Dalrock, IGTBAM, the AHG, and Wyden too, are all making efforts to move the Overton window to where they think it should be.

Dalrock and Wyden, on the other hand, are setting the goal post closer to home, and castigating those who don't line up, rank and file, to the Word of God or the Noo Odor agenda, respectively.

As a point in case, Many of Dalrock's posts (such as this one with the excerpt following), show that he is conscious of being an "outsider", hoping for the Overton to budge a bit.

> "I know for many of you this really isn't a bad place. If you are a feminist or a player, this is pretty close to paradise. But if you are like me you very much want to leave. Everyone always asks, why don't we just build a boat and sail away from here? We could make it to the land of sanity. But it isn't that simple I'm afraid. Every time it looks like we are about to make it home, one of the Gilligans manages to screw it up."

In his posts, Dalrock is chastening Warhorn, IGTBAM, and the AHG, but from a wider and more distant perspective, the slow drift of the Overton is the cause of his subterfuged frustration, and not so much the various individuals and organizations subjected to his criticism.

Final Shakements

The respectable constituents of the current bipartisan system are comprised of who's right on the Left, and what's left of the Right, with a large number of subfactions revolving around these entities.

Dalrock and Boxer may very well be a trite example, while Zuck and Wyden are only slightly more pertinent. Readers could probably imagine many other examples.

The main point of this essay observes that the Left wing has coherent entities who argue about how far left the Left should be. Likewise, those on the Right are quarreling about how to set up shop.

Moveover, there is very little intermediary talk of agreement between the Left and the Right anymore. Thus, these factions are no longer working together for the common interests. Instead, they are each focused on their respective pet issues, only colliding in the public sphere when a conflict of interest materializes.

Are we seeing a binary polarization within the West? Have the different groupthinks of society become so diverse and disconnected that socio-political sub-cultures are forming between the Right and the Left?

I'm tempted to conclude that the old bipartisan political structure is nearing an end to its useful relevancy, and that an atomized political structure is on the horizon.

Tell us, what's your shake?

Related

- The Orthosphere: You must fight to keep your beliefs inside the Overton Window (2013 March 10)
- XYZ (feat. David Hiscox): Thought for the Day: There is no Overton Window (2017 November 7)

Bards, Jesters, and Kings

Jack · 6 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Musicians and comedians are, respectively, the modern day versions of the bards and jesters of yore, the prophets of culture and politics. What are the present day bards and jesters trying to tell us?

Readership: All
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 11 minutes

Who were the Bards and Jesters?

Jesters in Medieval times wore brightly colored clothes and eccentric hats while they entertained the royal class with a wide variety of skills; principal among them were storytelling, jokes, tongue-in-cheek puns, mock imitation, and stereotypes, but many also employed song, music, acrobatics, juggling, and magic tricks. Much of the entertainment was performed in a comical style and many jesters made contemporary jokes in word or song about people or events well known to their audiences.

Danny Kaye plays The Court Jester, 1955.

Through music, dance, and stage dramas containing dialogues, the bards were able to capture in short form the spirit of the times, and convey them in a concise epithetical statement that any aware person would be able to grasp onto. The bards played an especially powerful role in communicating deeper truths to Kings and Lords, who often got sidetracked with their personal agendas and needed to be shown the errors of their ways from the people's perspective. This venue of formal entertainment was able to address moral grievances and point figurative fingers without requiring a presumptuous or violent ascendancy over authority.

Bards had an important role in the court, as they could influence the King's political stances and decisions without facing the risk of being beheaded for speaking shameful truths to the King. Medieval court jesters utilized the foolishness of man to teach the wisdom of God, and were often considered to be among the wisest "counselors" of all.

A Modern Day Tale

A modern day jester of the Manosphere once told the following story.* I'll attempt to fill in the parallels.

> Once upon a time, there was a wise and beloved king.
>
> This king was no inbred son of royalty. He had earned everything he had. He had begun at the absolute bottom, a peasant with little money, no allies and no reputation. Through dedication and force of will, the king had carved out a fiefdom for himself in the cold, unforgiving world. When his friends were goofing off and drinking, he was drawing up battle plans and making a name for himself. When his peers were doing the bare minimum to get by, he was reaching out and building alliances with like-minded men. When everyone was just mailing it in, the king gave 110 percent.
>
> He saw his chance for glory and seized it.

Think of the British, Dutch, French, German (Holy Roman Empire), and Spanish empires during the 16th to 19th centuries.

> Eventually, the king presided over a bustling and prosperous empire. His castle was always packed to the brim with courtiers seeking favors. Men twice his age looked to him for advice. Women swooned over him, some even offering to give him naked pictures of themselves. Even his enemies respected him for his wit and intelligence. And every time he made a proclamation, everyone fell silent to listen to what he had to say.
>
> And one day, the king surveyed his empire and said that it was good.

Picture Europe and the United States before WW1.

A Time of Trouble

> The king arose during a time of troubles. Liars and fools played at being philosophers, running the nation into the ground with their schemes. Shysters roamed the land, preying on the poor and stupid, fleecing them of what little they had. The king saw all this and knew instinctively that it was wrong. He never claimed to be perfect or infallible, but he was way smarter than the nincompoops that most people worshipped.

Enter WW's 1 and 2, and the introduction of Feminism. Everything went downhill after that.

I have a friend who is a Messianic Jew of the Boomer generation. He once told me he clearly remembers the Summer of 1967, in which the Six Day War took place. He does not remember it because of Israel's political conquest, because his family of origin never identified with his Jewish heritage. He only did so, after he became a Christian.

No, he distinctly remembers that summer because, as he said in his own words,

> "You could feel everything was different after that. You couldn't put your finger on exactly what that was, but the whole world changed. And it wasn't just me. Everybody I knew at that time said the same thing."

Sure enough, the sexual revolution revved up to full speed by the summer of '69. The political landscape became more tumultuous with Nixon and the Watergate scandal in 1972.

The United States Secretary of State and National Security Advisor under the presidential administrations of Richard Nixon and Gerald Ford was Henry Kissinger. Kissinger was a Jewish refugee who fled Nazi Germany with his family in 1938, and who played a prominent role in United States foreign policy between 1969 and 1977. During this Cold War period, he pioneered the policy of détente with the Soviet Union, orchestrated the opening of relations with the People's Republic of China, engaged in what became known as shuttle diplomacy in the Middle East to end the Yom Kippur War, and negotiated the Paris Peace Accords, ending American involvement in the Vietnam War.

> And yet, while his empire swelled and grew with each passing day, the king became discontented. He regretted letting many of his courtiers into his castle, as they were cranks and idiots, the only thing binding them together being a mutual hatred of the king's enemies. While many of his followers were earnest, too many were not taking his proclamations to heart, instead living vicariously through the king's exploits.
>
> Most of all, the king could not bear the truth: his followers were worshipping a mirage.

Mirage, by Salvador Dali, 1946.

The Jesters

During this period, comedy as a whole became cutting, darkly honest, cynically profane, and overtly sexualized. The leading comedians of this time period were Woody Allen, George Burns, John Candy, George Carlin, Bill Cosby, Rodney Dangerfield, Redd Foxx, Gallagher, Jackie Gleason, Arsenio Hall, Andy Kaufman, Sam Kinison, David Letterman, Eddie Murphy, Bob Newhart, Richard Pryor, and Robin Williams, among many others. Of note, many popular female comedians appeared for the first time in western history, including Lucille Ball, Roseanne Barr, Carol Burnette, Phyllis Diller, Whoopi Goldberg, and Lily Tomlin.

The Bards

Popular music reflected these cultural transitions with an aggressive shift to hard rock anthems we now know as Classic Rock. Popular music groups of that era included Bachman Turner Overdrive (BTO), Boston, Electric Light Orchestra (ELO), Fleetwood Mac, Foreigner, Jimi Hendrix, Journey, Led Zeppelin, Pink Floyd, Queen, Steely Dan, The Cars, The Doobie Brothers, The Doors, The Eagles, The Police, The Rolling Stones, The Who, and Van Halen.

The classic rock group, Rush, consisting of bassist/keyboardist/vocalist Geddy Lee, guitarist Alex Lifeson, and drummer/lyricist Neil Peart, won a large and passionate worldwide fan base for its unique, adventurous approach, which combined sterling musicianship, complex compositions and distinctive lyrical flights drawing upon science-fiction motifs and esoteric philosophical concepts. The band has sold more 25 million albums in the US alone, with worldwide sales estimated at 45 million, and has been awarded 24 Gold, 14 Platinum, and three multi-platinum albums. Rush has received seven Grammy nominations and was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 2013.

A Farewell to Kings

The king was a private person, and while he had never lied to his people, he never told the whole truth either. His most devoted fans thought him superhuman; his biggest enemies called him a liar and a narcissist. To his subjects, the king was not a person, but an idol, a golden calf on which they could inscribe all their fantasies and neuroses. It didn't matter what he said or did; his subjects would cling to their mirage as furiously as cultists to a foreign god.

The king couldn't take it anymore. So he quit.

One day, after presenting himself in the courtroom as usual, he announced that he was abdicating his throne. He had had enough of being the man in charge. Someone else could rule for once; he was going to take a much deserved vacation. Everyone was saddened and shocked by this news, but aside from a minority of layabouts, they gave a standing ovation. The king packed his bags and rode off into the sunset, never to return.

Or will he?

Album art from A Farewell To Kings.
Note the guy wires attached to the puppet on the throne.

Rush's fifth studio album, A Farewell To Kings, was originally released on September 1, 1977, and played a major role in establishing Rush as an internationally popular and respected band. A Farewell To Kings also introduced the trio's first successful radio hit Closer To The Heart, album tracks, A Farewell To Kings, Madrigal, and Cinderella Man, as well as enduring fan favorites, Xanadu, and Cygnus X-1.

Of note, A Farewell To Kings was released ten years after the Summer of Love in 1967.

The Return of Kings

> As much as he wanted to go back to being a peasant, with its lack of responsibility, the king knew better. He knew that while peasants were common, only a handful of men had the brains, the gumption, the will to be a king. They needed him, and he needed them. The same fire that led him to forge his empire could not be extinguished.
>
> The forces of evil have not won. The king is still alive, and he will reclaim his throne. The only difference is that this time, his followers will admire him not for who they think he is, but who they know he is.

The 2012 Phenomenon was characterized by a number of eschatological beliefs and strange astronomical and mathematical phenomena corresponding to late 2012. The intersynchronicities of these signs were interpreted as being indicative of a cataclysmic or transformative event for mankind. These included,

- An accelerated geomagnetic migration.
- Strange, loud, metallic noises seemingly originating from the stratosphere, and heard around the world. The source of these noises was never identified, leaving some to imagine that they originated from a heavenly angel blowing a shofar as a warning to the faithful.
- On 16 October 2012, Roosh Valizadeh opened the Return of Kings website, finalizing the formation of the classic Manosphere.

- The foreboding end of the Mayan calendar occurred on 2012/12/31.

All of the above events signaled the beginning of a return to the old order, or to a new old order.

Final Statements

A Farewell To Kings was released ten years after the Summer of Love in 1967.

During those 35 years between the Farewell To Kings in 1977 and the Return of Kings in 2012, American culture and society experienced a catastrophic disintegration.

Could it be, that another ten years after the Return of Kings, we shall witness a cultural cataclysm?

1967 – The Summer of Love
1977 – A Farewell to Kings
2012 – The Return of Kings
2022? – The Winter of War?

In numerology, this sequence can be written (approximately) as a series of five-year periods:
(2 x 5 years) + (7 x 5 years) + (2 x 5 years)

Five years has 60 months, so rewriting the above formula in terms of 60-month periods, we have:
(2 x 60 months) + (7 x 60 months) + (2 x 60 months)

Compare this to the 1,260 days of prophecy described in Revelation 11:2-3:
1,260 days = 180 weeks = (3 x 60 weeks)

60 months has approximately four 60-week periods.

Perhaps now (or soon) we will sense the synchronicity of these events viewed through the lens of history.

 The parable displayed in green text originally appeared on Matt Forney, The Empire Never Ended (2012/11/14) — Also in 2012, just one month after Roosh set up the* Return of Kings site.

 Ten years is my guess. Anyone have a better method of estimation?*

Update

It appears that my prediction of war has come true. On 2022/2/24, Russia invaded Ukraine in an escalation of the Russo-Ukrainian War that started in 2014. The invasion was the largest attack on a European country since World War II. Some have called it the beginning of WWIII.

Related

- The Daily Mail (feat. Sheila Flynn): The Summer of Love, 50 years on: Intimate portraits of legendary rockers and the hippie movement that overtook the streets of 1967 San Francisco (2017/3/23)
- Σ Frame: The Evolution of Feminism as a Series of Cultural Movements (2018/1/15)
- Σ Frame: The Evolution of the Red Pill (2018/12/31)

Yet another variety of Internet Whoring

Jack · 9 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Tongue slathering and extremely suggestive lewdness attracts clicks, views, and $$$ just as well as actual sex.

Readership: Men

Warning: This post contains images which may be considered graphic or obscene.

This year, we've seen several expressions of internet wh0ring, including the marketing of virgin brides and virgin prostitution and the InstaWhore phenomenon. For those who may have missed it, InstaWh0res are women who use Instagram and other social media forums to attract well-heeled, overseas "customers" for vacation wh0ring abroad, something like the female version of sex tourism, except that it pays $$$.

And here's yet another variety of Internet Wh0ring!

- LAD Bible (feat. Dominic Smithers): Woman Makes £80,000 A Year From Posting Pictures Of Her Long Tongue (16 September 2019)
- Complex (feat. Gavin Evans): Influencer With Super Long Tongue Says She's Made About $100,000 This Year (17 September 2019)

Although her tongue has become her claim to fame, Mikayla Saravia, who also goes by the enigmatic string, "KKVSH", actually looks more attractive with her mouth closed.

Older photos prove that her youthful innocence is (or was) her best feature, but because of fame, I'm sure she's lost that by now. In some younger photos, her face wasn't too bad. But in many photos, the overuse of makeup has given her a fake appearance. She actually looks better with less makeup.

Many media outlets describe her body as "busty", "sexy", and "amazing", but her body isn't all that great. (The first photo of her above is airbrushed.) She has a decent HWR, but only because her butt and thighs are supersized from too many squats/deadlifts. I'd put her at a 6.5 in her better (older) photos. The heavy mascara and the grotesqueness of the tongue really put me off. It's just not feminine at all.

More recent photos show that she's degenerating into a ghettoffal shrew with a resting biatch face. Lately, she's gone for oversized, full-color tattoos of geisha girls extending around her blimped thighs and buttocks. (Someone should report her to the SJW administration for cultural appropriation offenses!) Can you imagine what her bum will look like in 20 years?

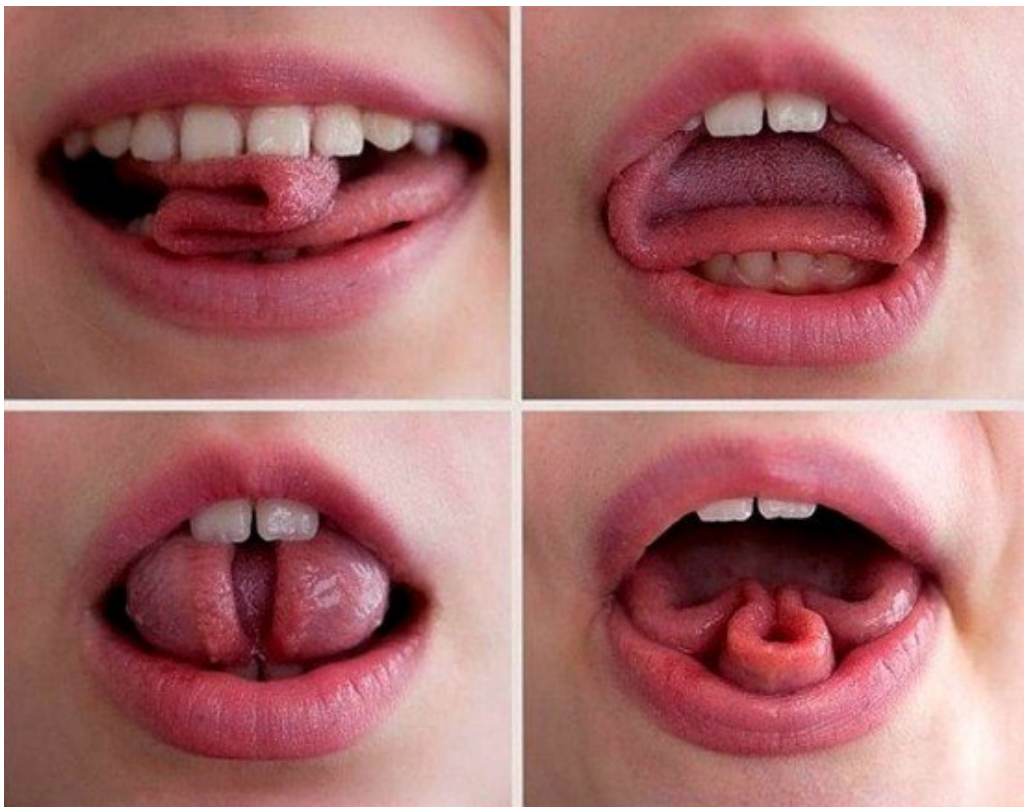
The one thing that she still has going for her is that she presents herself to be a fun person to hang out with, which draws in the bored wannabes who spend all their time on the internet. Ultimately, the implied, but false promise of "having fun" is the fundamental claim to fame for these internet and media personalities.

There are many photos of her licking popsicles, bananas, eggplants, and other objects with a high aspect ratio – including her taking up the Cucumber Challenge wearing hoop earrings as big as barrel bands. (Warning: the link to the YouTube video is somewhat graphic.) BTW, hoop earrings are a s1ut tell.

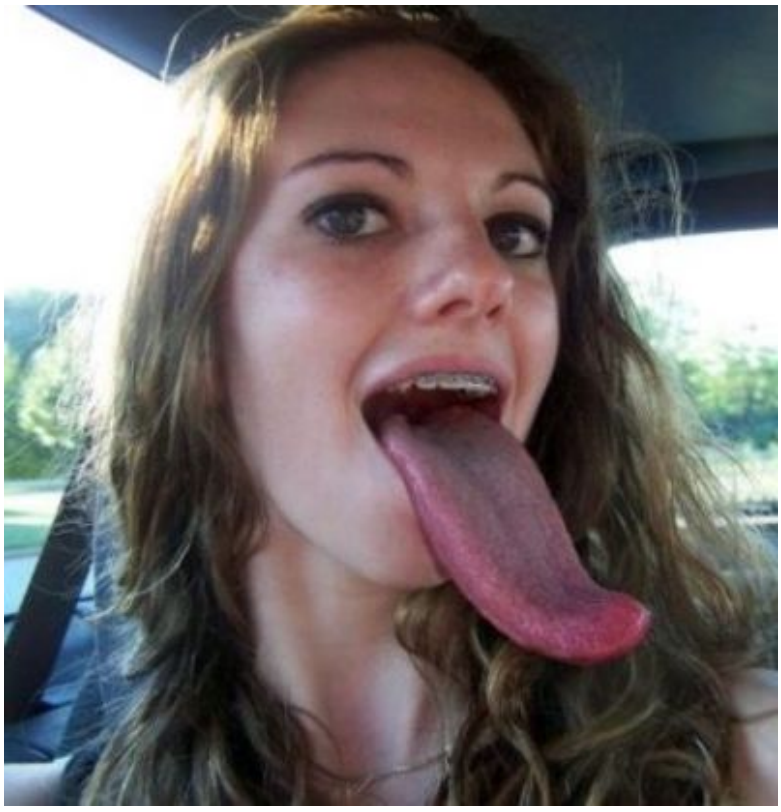
There are even some photos of her comparing her tongue with that of a horse, which is suggestive of bestiality. Now we're getting close to real depravity.

Why not pose with a sun bear?

Since we're on the subject, I've seen some truly freaky, alien-like tongues in Asia.



Among white chix, I'd say this lady wins first prize for the best tongue. Is that even real?



Saravia's tongue can't compare to these. So what is actually behind the tongue fascination and click frenzy? I mean, why aren't these people becoming just as rich and famous?

Saravia's licker isn't freakishly long, but she knows how to use it in a suggestive manner. This is the true reason why she's is popular — because of her sensual seductiveness. It's visible in her dark eyes, but the tongue gimmicks and sultry poses contribute to this effect to make it all too obvious.

This raw seductiveness is something the common Joe hardly ever sees from a woman anymore. Obviously, she's making her money off of thirsty male lust and sensationalistic female-friendly envy.

One could dismiss her antics as merely entertainment, but if she were to remove the tongue slathering, remove the twerking vids, remove the wildly seductive s1ut eye expression, replace the skin-tight boy shorts with anything less form-fitting, or add 10 years or 10 kg. to her form, then her internet profile would quickly blend into the masses with no particular genuine appeal. So her tongue tricks should not be mistaken for authentic entertainment. OTOH, if Gene Simmons never stuck out his tongue, he would still be a stellar entertainer.

If any guy thinks Saravia is “better” than Simmons, then he’s not looking for entertainment, he’s looking to get turned on and F*cked. Let’s be honest about it.

Lollygagging tongues, lewd poses, twerking bubble butts, cucumber fellatio… All that which feeds the lust of the flesh, but which can never satisfy. This is the stuff that gets money-generating clicks these days.

This form of internet whoring is different, however, in that they are not actually putting their bodies down for carnal sale. Or maybe they are. Who’re knows?

Related

- Σ Frame: DTF Cupid (17 December 2017)
- Σ Frame: Crunching the Tinder Whoard (20 September 2019)

True Rest as a form of Worship

Jack · 12 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

This post offers some descriptions of rest as a form of worship.

Readership: All

What is a “Sabbath”?

You might ask, what is a “Sabbath”, and what does it mean to “keep the Sabbath holy”?

Throughout Scriptures, the word “Sabbath” is habitually used in association with the word “REST”. The word “holy” is an adjective that means something is special, and SET APART from the normal, day-to-day occurrences and uses.

“Rest” means different things to different people, so we need greater clarification here. Some people think resting means sleeping, or simply not doing anything. But I believe the intended meaning of a “Sabbath REST” is not slumber or idleness, nor even strictly confined to church attendance, but it is any activity that is out of your ordinary routine, which can free your mind and heart from the burdens and anxieties of your life.

It’s not hard, at this point, to identify the concept of REST as a variation of WORSHIP, which is why a lot of people hold the idea that going to church is how we keep the Sabbath holy.

But the church is not the only place we can worship. We should learn to worship God in all facets of our life. Your career, your family, and all your relationships should be offered to God as forms of worship.

Also, you don’t need to go on a long vacation, or spend a lot of money to get REST. Rest can come in very simple easy ways.

For example, on nice days, I like to take a ride on my motorcycle through the countryside. The fresh air, sights and smells always give me a renewed perspective on life.

On nasty days, it’s better to curl up in a comfortable chair with a good book and a hot drink.

Sometimes, I'll take a walk up the small mountain behind the University, to get a sense of refreshment during the day. It only takes half an hour, and a little bit of exercise, but I come back feeling like a new man with a fresh wind.

In fact, sometimes, a good rest could be a real physical workout, such as playing sports, or working on a hobby. Most hobbies qualify as avenues of restful diversion.

For example, my friends' testimony conveys a very good description of how he finds rest through hunting (and snowboarding)…

> "Let the 2009/2010 Deer (less) Season stand as testament to all of you who ever doubted my motivations for hunting, that it has absolutely nothing to do with killing deer, but is much more about watching the world come to life each morning, talking to God with no distractions, and spending time with my friends and family. Now on to snowboarding!"

The popular notion is to dismiss such activities as idleness. We may not think of this as REST, but it is!

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: Honor the Sabbath (November 3, 2018)
- Adam Piggott: The importance of sleep and relaxation (29 September 2019)
- Adam Piggott: A true holiday is no holiday at all (10 October 2019)

How the Pill Kills

Lexet Blog · 15 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

You might guess that oral contraceptives cause developing embryos to perish, but birth control pills have also been found to cause death in women. More than half of these deaths are caused by venous thromboembolism.

Readership: All; Parents of adolescent daughters; Women who use birth control pills; Men with partners who use birth control pills; Men interested in vetting a woman for a relationship;

Note: Photographs of women who have been killed by the pill are depicted throughout the article. Information reported in Dr. Lanfranchi's speech is in green text.

Abbey Parkes, 20, a legal secretary from Tunstall in Staffordshire, had been taking Logynon for six years when she suffered a cardiac arrest and died at her home on 26 August 2016. An inquest found that she was killed by her contraceptive pill.

Introduction

Dr. Angela Lanfranchi is a breast surgeon and clinical assistant professor of surgery at Robert Wood Johnson Medical School. Dr. Lanfranchi heads up the Breast Cancer Prevention Institute.

This short video (18 minutes) features Dr. Lanfranchi giving a riveting presentation of the scientific proof of how the birth control pill (hormonal contraception) has several harmful side effects, and worst of all, it kills women. More than half of these deaths are caused when the pill induces some type of venous thromboembolism (VTE), but the follow up cause of death is surprising – *intimate partner violence!

Below, several points in the speech are cited and discussed.

People Love the Pill

The pill is the number one contraceptive method in Africa, Europe, and Oceania (Australia, New Zealand, and the South Pacific islands). It is also the most prevalent form of reversible contraception in the Americas [1].

If the pill is so bad, then why do teenage girls love it?

- They have lighter periods.
- They have periods accompanied by less pain.
- They have more predictable periods due to increased regularity.
- Their breasts grow larger and fuller.
- For many girls, the hormonal changes caused by the pill improves their skin complexion.
- They think they don't need to worry about pregnancy, should anything "just happen".

If the pill is so bad, then why do parents of teenage girls love it?

- In general, parents worry less.
- Parents think the pill will prevent their daughter from getting pregnant.
- Parents think that using the pill makes them and their daughter "responsible" for the daughter's sexuality.
- Parents resort to psychological defenses to deny the risks. "It's for acne." "It's for painful periods."
- Parents are unaware of the medical risks associated with using the pill.

Miranda Scott, of Delta, B.C. was 18 when she suddenly collapsed in a gym at UBC Okanagan in 2010. Her autopsy report concluded she had died after blood clots formed throughout her body.

The Pill Kills Embryos

To understand how the pill works, and how it terminates pregnancy, let's take a look at how life begins in the womb. For a woman to become pregnant, the following steps must occur [2]:

1. Sperm transport — The sperm must be deposited and transported to the site of fertilization.
2. Egg transport — Ovulation must occur and the egg must be "picked up" by the tube.
3. Fertilization and embryo development — Union between the sperm and egg must result.
4. Implantation — The embryo must implant and begin to grow in the uterus.

Birth control pills affect (2) and/or (4).

Concerning (2), birth control pills can prevent ovulation. In the normal monthly cycle, estrogen and progesterone levels rise and fall naturally. At times when there is a shortage of estrogen and progesterone, two other hormones, FSH and LH, will be produced, and these hormones trigger ovulation.

Hormonal birth control provides just enough synthetic estrogen and progesterone hormones to prevent the stimulation of FSH and LH production, thereby preventing the two key hormones that cause ovulation.

Hormonal birth control basically keeps a woman in the same phase of her menstrual cycle on a continuous basis, and averting the phase of ovulation. The ovaries become relatively inactive.

Mechanism (4) is more complex. Approximately five to six days after fertilization, the fertilized egg reaches the blastocyst stage. Here, the embryo hatches out of its zona pellucida and begins the process of implantation, in which it attaches to the lining of the uterus. Implantation occurs about 7-14 days after sexual intercourse.

In nature, 50 percent of all fertilized eggs are lost before a woman misses her next menses. The reasons for this include…

- An embryo may begin to develop but not make it to the blastocyst stage — the first stage at which those cells destined to become the fetus separate from those that will become the placenta.
- The blastocyst may implant but not grow.
- The blastocyst may implant and grow, but then stop developing before the two-week time at which a pregnancy can be detected.

The receptivity of the uterus and the health of the embryo are vitally important for the implantation and growth process.

In the case of mechanism (4), the pill doesn't simply prevent conception. In fact, it is an abortifacient for the following reasons.

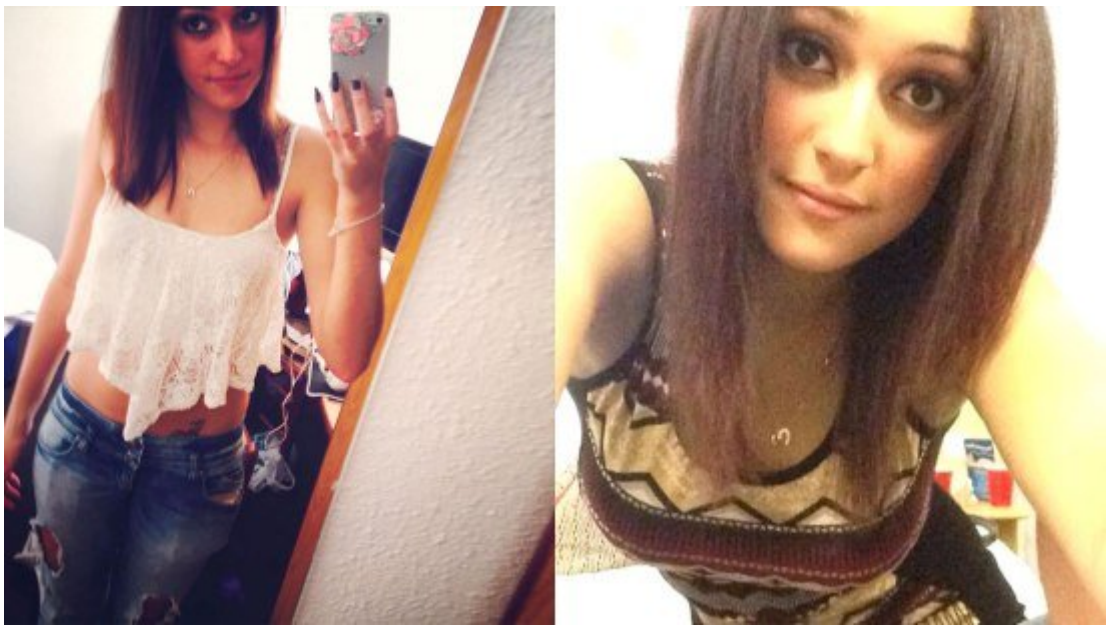
- It causes the endometrial lining of the uterus to be too thin to allow implantation of the blastocyst (embryo).
- It changes the level of interleukins which are necessary for implantation.

As a result, the conditions inside the uterus are insufficient for allowing the implantation and growth of a fertilized embryo. When the embryo cannot successfully implant the uterus, it passes out of the body and dies. Essentially, the pill causes the mother to miscarry at the very earliest stages of pregnancy. So the rate of losing the embryo goes from 50% in a natural state, up to 87-91% when using some type of birth control pill [3].

According to WHO, every year in the world there are an estimated 40-50 million abortions. This corresponds to approximately 125,000 abortions per day. But this estimate only includes reported surgical abortions. It does not include unreported abortions, nor nonsurgical abortions.

Since birth control pills (and IUD's) are abortifacients, and not preventative contraceptives, then any fertilized embryo that may form in the womb is lost due to an insufficiently fertile environment within the womb.

This is grave news for the pill (and IUD's) if you believe that life begins at fertilization, because (although it is impossible to measure), that would mean that the number of babies lost due to abortifacient contraceptives are astronomically larger than the number of reported abortions. If abortions caused by abortifacients could somehow be included in the abortion statistics, then that would likely place the abortion rate into hundreds of millions, or even billions per year. Of course, this is all speculation, but the point is that the pill kills, and it kills many more than we could ever know.



Fallan Kurek, 21, from Staffordshire, U.K., died from a massive pulmonary embolism after the side-effects of the pill were not effectively treated.

The Pill Kills Women

According to Dr. Lanfranchi, there are four mechanisms that the pill is known to cause death.

1. The progestins in the pill increase blood clotting, leading to thrombosis, embolisms, infarctions, and strokes.
2. The metabolites of estrogen in the pill are carcinogenic agents which increase a woman's chances of developing cancer.
3. Regular use of the pill increases the chance of contracting and transmitting a lethal illness or infection (i.e. HIV, human papilloma virus).*
4. Use of the pill statistically increases the chance of dying from accidents or violence (i.e. homicide).

The first cause of death listed above encompasses many conditions related to the circulatory system. Of note, venous thromboembolism (VTE) is the foremost cause of death among oral contraceptive users, accounting for roughly half of these untimely deaths.

As early as 1977, it was reported that the death rate from diseases of the circulatory system in women who had used oral contraceptives, was 5 times that of controls who had never used the pill. For those who had taken the oral contraceptive continuously for 5 years or more, the death rate was 10 times that of the controls. The excess deaths in oral contraceptive users were due to a wide range of vascular conditions. The number of excess deaths was substantially greater than the death rate from complications of pregnancy in the controls, and was double the accident death rate. The excess mortality rate increased with age, cigarette smoking, and duration of oral contraceptive use. [4,5]

In a 1981 study of 249 deaths associated with oral contraceptives, women who had used the pill were reported to have a 40% higher death rate than women who had never taken oral contraceptives. Virtually all the excess mortality was due to diseases of the circulatory system. [6]

In a 2010 study done on 46,112 women observed for up to 39 years, there was an increase in mortality among women of childbearing age, but a reduction in mortality for post-menopausal women. [7]

In 2014, another Nurses' Health Study published the results of a significant longitudinal study of 121,701 participants who were prospectively followed for 36 years between 1976 and 2012. [8] The purpose of this study was to determine whether use of oral contraceptives is associated with all cause and cause specific mortality. The results of this study are as follows.

> "In our population of 121,577 women with information on oral contraceptive use, 63,626 were never users (52%) and 57,951 were ever users (48%). After 3.6 million person years, we recorded 31,286 deaths. No association was observed between ever use of oral contraceptives and all cause mortality. However, violent or accidental deaths were more common among ever users (hazard ratio 1.20, 95% confidence interval 1.04 to 1.37). Longer duration of use was more strongly associated with certain causes of death, including premature mortality due to breast cancer (test for trend P<0.0001) and decreased mortality rates of ovarian cancer (P=0.002). Longer time since last use was also associated with certain outcomes, including a positive association with violent or accidental deaths (P=0.005)."

This connection between the pill and mortality has not changed since its discovery over four decades ago. In the United States alone, 136 to 260 healthy women die from VTE caused by hormonal contraception every year. When that risk is combined with the added risk of stroke and heart attack, between three and four hundred women die every year in the United States due to their choice to use hormonal contraception. [9]

The consensus is clear. The Pill Kills!

Charlotte Foster, 23, took ill and was hospitalized after being prescribed a contraceptive pill. She later died from a blood clot, on 25 January 2016, weeks after going to her GP with tell-tale symptoms.

Footnotes

 The term "intimate partner" includes current partners, and past partners (e.g. hookups, flings, and ONS's). More partners and more associated drama increases the likelihood of violence from at least one intimate partner.*

 The medication that gynecologists prescribe for menstrual pain is similar or the same as that for birth control.*

* Dr. Lanfranchi notes that the medical and pharmaceutical industries have downplayed and sometimes denied the link between the pill and various forms of cancer. This is done partly through citing studies that have reported conflicting results, and partly by using social factors as an excuse.*

 Dr. Lanfranchi doesn't comment about why the regular use of the pill increases the chance of contracting and transmitting a lethal illness or infection. There are a few possible, overlapping explanations. (1) The hormonal disruption depresses the immune system, causing a greater susceptibility to infections. (2) Women who use contraceptives may be more sexually promiscuous, thereby increasing their chances of contracting an illness. (3) Using contraceptives may cause women to psychologically dismiss the risks involved with sexual activities, and increase women's confidence to engage in more profligate sexual behavior.*

References

1. Earth Policy Institute (feat. Brigid Fitzgerald Reading): Growth in World Contraceptive Use Stalling; 215 Million Women's Needs Still Unmet (27 March 2012)
2. University of California, San Francisco Health: Conception: How It Works
3. Refinery 29 (feat. Cory Stieg): What Are The Odds Of Getting Pregnant On The Pill? (1 November 2018)
4. J. Wingrave, V. Beral, A. M. Adelstein, C. R. Kay, "Royal College of General Practitioners Oral Contraception Study: Mortality among oral contraceptive users", Lancet, Vol.2, pp. 727-31, 1977.
5. F. Kippley, "Death rates and the pill", CCL News, 1977 Nov-Dec 4(3):3.
6. Royal College of General Practitioners Study, "Further analysis of mortality in oral contraceptive users", Lancet, Vol.1 pp.541-546, 1981.
7. C. Hannaford, L. Iversen, T. V. MacFarlane, A. M. Elliott, V. Angus, A. J. Lee, "Mortality among contraceptive pill users: cohort evidence from Royal College of General Practitioners' Oral Contraception Study", The British Medical Journal (BMJ) 2010, 340.
8. M. Charlton, J. W. Rich-Edwards, G. A. Colditz, S. A. Missmer, B. A. Rosner, S. E. Hankinson, F. E. Speizer, K. B. Michels, "Oral contraceptive use and mortality after 36 years of follow-up in the Nurses' Health Study: prospective cohort study", BMJ, 2014 Oct 31, 349.
9. Public Discourse (feat. Lynn Keenan and Gerard Migeon): Birth Control, Blood Clots, and Untimely Death: Time to Reconsider What We Tell Our Teens? (4 March 2019)

Related

- Cosmopolitan (feat. Elizabeth Narins): Why Are Women Dying From Taking the Pill? (28 May 2015)
- The Daily Mail (feat. Richard Marsden): Ten women's deaths a year are linked to taking the Pill: Figures revealed after woman, 20, dies from blood clots partly caused by contraceptive (14 July 2017)
- Redeeming Home: The Birth Control Pill Caused My Miscarriage (1 September 2017)
- Cosmopolitan (feat. Hannah Price): Why so many women want this contraceptive pill banned (29 December 2018)
- The Pill Kills Truth

Unconditional Atonement, Limited Election

Jack · 18 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A reflection on the theological doctrines of four men who have been a spiritual influence in my life.

Readership: All; Christians;

Four men in particular.

1. Dark Brightness is a Reformed Calvinist, part of the neoreactionary movement and the Manosphere.
2. Ed Hurst is from a Reformed background, but he goes heavy on Hebrew epistemology and Christian mysticism.
3. My current Pastor is from a Buddhist background, but later became a Calvinist and is prone to ranting about Arminianism.
4. My father was from a Reformed background, but then became a stalwart firebrand Baptist for most of his life, and an elder in a Methodist church after his retirement.

Background

Last year, I used to read Dark Brightness every morning as a source of daily inspiration. But then he experienced some technical difficulties, and his site was down for several months. So during that time, I switched to reading Ed Hurst's epiphanies at Do What's Right. (His blog has since relocated to Radix Fidem.)

Perhaps this adventure was at the hand of God, because I found that Ed's posts were more closely attuned to the challenges I was being faced with in my spiritual life. Over the last few months, Ed and I have developed a mutual respect through sporadic email correspondence. I have corresponded with DB off and on, but I can't say that we ever really connected on a deeper level.

Concerning my father, I need to offer a brief, ecclesiastical history of my family to provide the background for the epiphanies discussed later in this post.

My paternal grandmother, who had divorced around the age of 40, afterwards served as a deaconess in a Presbyterian church for about 20 years, nearly until her death. As a young man, my father abandoned Calvinism. He won't say much about this specifically, but from what I've picked up from my talks with him over the years, I can just about guess how things went. He could not agree with several points of Calvinist doctrine and practice, and he needed to get out of the church where his mother was a deaconess so that he could "find God" on his own.

Instead, he joined a Bible study with a group of other men. By 1968, the men in this Bible study had founded a Baptist church, which grew exponentially in its first decade, and is now the largest Southern Baptist church within that particular suburb of the largest city in a Midwest state.

My mother came from a Lutheran background, but after marrying my father, she saw the need for the family to be united in the faith, so she agreed to be baptized into the Baptist church.

So this is how I came to be raised in a Southern Baptist church. Since then, I've had a long journey in expanding my ecumenical understanding.

Later on, while I was attending college out of state, my mother divorced my father. It may be of interest to my readers to know that over a dozen divorces rocked our church at exactly the same time that my parents divorced. In order to escape the incessant prattling, both my parents started attending different churches.

My father attended a Nazarene Church, and then an American Baptist church for a while. But the leaders of these churches wanted to run their church like an entertainment business and a real estate business, respectively. No one took his doctrinal arguments seriously, and no one appreciated the wisdom he had gained from his experiences in starting a church and being a deacon for 25 years. He was often embroiled in arguments with pastors and deacons about the purpose of the church and how a ministry should function. Eventually, he abandoned the Baptist church altogether. Since he retired, he has been attending a Methodist church regularly. They still don't take him very seriously, but they do have an immense respect for him.

Scrutinizing the Theology*

What drove my father into a crisis of faith? What led him to eventually stop attending the Presbyterian church as a young man?

The doctrinal points of Calvinism and the Presbyterian Church that bothered my father the most (at that time in the mid-1960's), were as follows.

1. Unconditional Election, which asserts that God has chosen from eternity those whom he will bring to himself. His selection criteria is not based on foreseen virtue, merit, or faith in those people. Rather, his choice is unconditionally grounded in his mercy and divine providence alone.
2. Limited Atonement, in the sense that it is intended for some and not all. In other words, Only God has the power to elect.
3. Female leaders in the church, including his own mother, who was also divorced. He didn't agree with this because the Bible clearly states that women should not teach or hold authority over men. (See 1st Timothy 2:12)

The first two tenets above are included in the Five Points of Calvinism. Combining these together, it is concluded that only God chooses who "gets saved" (a Baptist term) and who doesn't, and people have no choice in the matter.

Earlier this year, my current pastor said to me,

> "People are as close to God as they want to be."

This statement sent me into a tailspin. In light of Unconditional Election and Limited Atonement, how can my Calvinist Pastor say that people can be as close to God as they want to be? Is he only referring to the elect? I asked him this question, and he said, "No, that's true for everyone."

Since then, I've always been confused about this apparent contradiction. Not only because (1) it didn't make sense to my understanding, but also because (2) it just didn't agree with my own experience.

I know there are some people who wish to be closer to God, including myself, but God keeps them at some distance, fighting a losing battle in life. I've come to understand that God does this with certain individuals (e.g. Hosea, Job), because He has a purpose for that. When this is the case, God's purposes are often hidden from that person's understanding. But this does not mean that God is not watching out for them.

I know I have been one of those people in the past, but now, not so much. It really hurts to want to be closer to God, but not being able to find any way there. It feels like a cosmic rejection, and I suppose it is, in a sense. But God's purpose was/is to help others somehow, and I know my suffering has helped many others. God knew I am willing to sacrifice for them. (Sigma's are like that.) It seems that I now have the responsibility to tell the world (through blogging, I suppose) what I have learned from this experience.

Another reason I had a hard time swallowing the Calvinistic laissez-faire approach towards salvation, is because I am a true believer in evangelism. My Baptist upbringing had baked the Great Commission (Matthew 28:16-20) into my faith at a young age, and that will always be a part of me. But also, I know from first-hand experience that evangelism brings people into the Kingdom. To combine the Baptist and Lutheran standpoints on this issue, evangelism is how God uses people to reach those who are predestined to be a part of His plan.

Are we Hedged In, or Locked Out?

Concerning the apparent contradiction, I found an explanation in one of Ed's posts, Theology and Practice – Divine Sovereignty (May 6, 2019).

Because spiritual truths can only be communicated through parables, Ed establishes three different theoretical archetypes of people. Those believers living by a heart-led conviction through faith are called "sheep". Those believers subject to a legalistic conscience are called "slaves", and unbelievers as "cattle". As a comparison, the Bible labels the last group as "goats", which emphasizes their stubborn rebellious nature, whereas Ed's word, "cattle", brings out the fact that they are "herded" (controlled and used) by God.

In this post, Ed brings out the Calvinist belief that what we do here on earth doesn't have a direct correlation to our eternal destiny. He wrote,

> "The Bible says that in the Fallen Realm, humans do have choices. There is an element of volition that justifies separating out sheep from cattle. Anyone can be a sheep under His covenants. Most of humanity sees no reason for it, and so end up herded like cattle. Why was the Pharaoh of Exodus herded like a bull? Because he refused to be a sheep. He thus left God no choice but to train him like a rodeo bull that would buck and twist and refuse to be led quietly to his own benefit. But did Pharaoh end up in Hell? That's a separate question that only God can answer, and He's not telling."

It's hard to wrap your head around the idea that Pharaoh was, in fact, doing God's will, and that we might see him sitting next to the Father in glory. Could the death of his first born son prove to have been the Flaming Sword of Self-Death that brought him into salvation? I have to wonder, was Hitler also doing God's will? Stalin? Mao? Soros? Obama? Trump? (Insert your favorite bad guy here)?

> "Often in the New Testament, the term "salvation" does not refer directly to being Spirit born. Spiritual birth is implied as the natural culmination of the self-death, but it's never held forth as a direct offer. Scripture flatly states that God alone understands spiritual birth, and controls that process entirely. No one can choose spiritual birth; their fleshly nature excludes it (see Romans 8 and "carnal mind"). However, it is possible to be a good servant of God without being family. It's a false dichotomy to assume all His sheep are born-again. The Bible says quite clearly that one can reasonably choose the noble path of obedience to the Law Covenants, that one can be heart-led without spiritual birth. The Scripture frequently demands that people submit to Jehovah as Lord from the heart, that this is a human choice He holds open for all humanity."

In other words, God gives us a lot of choices within this earthly realm, but the extent of our volition ends at the tips of our tongue and fingers. We're judged by what we do or say, but that judgment has nothing to do with our election.

> "Lots of people camp in the shade of Eden without ever getting through the Flaming Sword gate. This is what the Old Testament Covenant of Moses was all about. It was to bring everyone close enough to see the Flaming Sword, the final requirement of self-death to become a member of God's family. The fleshly nature had to taste execution by the hand of the one who had the fleshly nature. For those whom God has elected for eternity, the process is easy. They already have the power to choose self-death. Those who lack election won't find that power.

I think the concept of self-death entails one of the most misunderstood concepts about God. People want to believe that "God is good", but in their minds, "good" means anything that they enjoy, benefits their lives, or fulfills their better desires. They cannot possibly entertain the idea that God actually requires a death in order to be close to him.

Brett Stevens discussed the misnomber of "good" in yesterday's article at Amerika, entitled, Meditations On Evil (17 October 2019). His concept of good and evil is that,

> "Evil destroys the world; good enhances it. These definitions are a far cry from what people use in their place, where "good" means "benefits me" and evil means "obligates me or causes losses."

Stevens is right on target about people having an inverted concept of good and evil, but the definitions he offered are only marginally better. From the Christian perspective, Good is what brings people closer to the Flaming Sword of Self-Death and into His Family, and Evil is what takes them further away from it, or makes them ignorant of it.

The paradox of the Gospel is that what's Good in God's eyes may very well be repulsive and vile to the person who doesn't trust God enough to endure a spiritual death in the crucible of this broken world.

Further on, Stevens writes,

> "Evil then represents less of a moral choice than a mental state. Someone who is motivated by revenge against the world will have a desire to control which does not consider the consequences of its acts; control is a closed-circuit loop, a sealed feedback cycle, in which control only exists to perpetuate control and everything else is a means to that end."

Stevens' first sentence (in bold) is fair, but then he gets sidetracked in a subjective, worldly application. God has no intentions of either enhancing the world, nor destroying it, but only to use it to break mankind's bent towards spiritual self-reliance, and bring them into His fold. Power, money, and control are just the means by which people often seek to avert a self-death, and that is what makes the desire for these things evil.

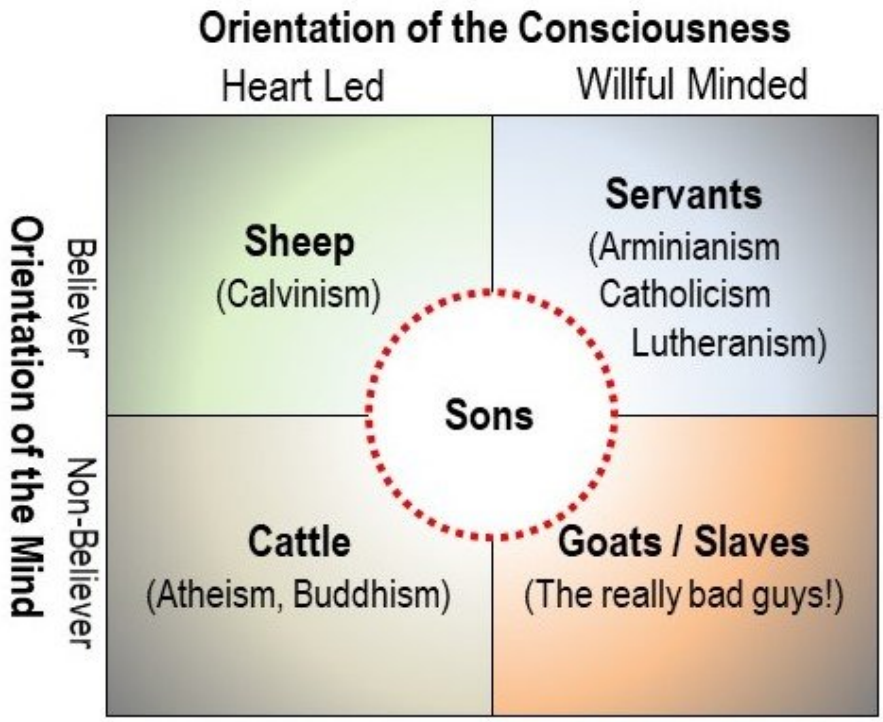
Now returning to Ed's post,

> "But an awful lot of shalom is available to folks who just can't go through that. And this is why the New Testament refers to the kind of "salvation" that means heart-led obedience to Christ as Lord, the Living Law of God, but does not make it necessarily equivalent to spiritual birth.
>
> This is where mainstream evangelicals fail: They do not make adequate allowance for the household of God to include willing servants who aren't slaves. It's easy to understand how most of the world is going to Hell and are thus unwitting slaves of God's plans. And it's not too hard to grasp how His Children are not slaves. But virtually no one among evangelical leaders understand the place of free servants in the household of God. […]"

Being one myself, I can say that Evangelicals can't understand this point, because they lack the Calvinistic awareness of the ultimate sovereignty of God over the will of man. Within the Baptist context of Free-Will, everyone is considered to be willfully minded, and therefore, any person who is not a believer, is deemed lost and degenerate. (See figure below.) Evangelicals consider themselves to be servants to the Word of God and slaves of righteousness. As such, a believer who has selfish motivations or who refuses to submit, is considered to be a very poor servant.

> "Our church activities should assume conversion is separate from spiritual birth. And we should be very careful to make conversion not a sales pitch, but a genuine choice for someone drawn to it on their own volition. The church is a converted body of people who cling to a shared covenant. [Evangelicals should not] assume everyone [who believes] is born-again and so build policies and activities on that. We need a radical redefinition of church that aims at the heart-led way of serving Christ.
>
> I can know that I am born-again. That is the power of conviction in my heart. You cannot know for sure that I am born-again, even if I tell you. What you can know is that I am heart-led and committed to Christ, if you use your heart as a sensory organ to discern my heart. That's the basis for doing church. That's the proper basis for building a theology about the sovereignty of God."

After being inspired by Ed's insights, I've constructed a diagram that explains my current understanding of the different sectarian doctrines based on their stances towards Free-Will (Arminianism) vs. Predestination (Calvinism), and what appears to be their Biblical "labels" (Sheep, Servants, Slaves/Goats, Cattle, and Sons). The red dotted line represents the Flaming Sword of Self-Death.



Conclusions

After arriving at my own understanding of the doctrinal concepts of Unconditional Election and Limited Atonement, it seems to me that the adjectives should be exchanged. That is, the idea that God has the final decision about who will enter into heaven should be called Limited Election, and for those who are chosen by God for some unimaginably illustrious purpose in the next life, there is Unconditional Atonement.

The purpose of Evangelism is to…

- advance God's Kingdom on earth.
- make people aware of the Gospel.
- make people aware of their place in God's Family.
- lead people to realize their potential and purpose in God's Kingdom.
- help spell out the choices available to them in life.

To revise my Pastor's statement, I would say that people can be as close to God as God wants them to be. Up until that point, they can be as close to God as they want, but no further.

To adapt Ed's statements, people who do not want to be close to God are, nevertheless, still used by God to accomplish His purposes.

 Since I am lacking formal training in a theological seminary, I'm sure someone well-steeped in doctrine will disagree with something here. You're welcome to explain why in the comments.*

 "Self-Death" is not the same, and should not be confused with suicide. Here, the idea of Death is figurative, meaning an end to the false identifications we have with our ego, mind; and body, and the death of the human will to self-preservation and self-determination.*

Related

- Σ Frame: Ed Hurst's series: Return to Eden (16 March 2019)

- Dark Brightness: A Call to Holiness (18 October 2019)

Washing Her Clean

Jack · 21 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Acts of love can be enriched by including positive emotions and inspiration.

Readership: Married Christian men
Length: 1,550 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

After studying the concept of "unclean" in a previous post, I went back to see how this might apply to a marital relationship. The following familiar passage stands out in a new light.

> [22] Wives, submit to your own husbands, as to the Lord. [23] For the husband is head of the wife, as also Christ is head of the church; and He is the Savior of the body. [24] Therefore, just as the church is subject to Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything.
> [25] Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ also loved the church and gave Himself for her, [26] that He might sanctify and cleanse her with the washing of water by the word, [27] that He might present her to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that she should be holy and without blemish. [28] So husbands ought to love their own wives as their own bodies; he who loves his wife loves himself. [29] For no one ever hated his own flesh, but nourishes and cherishes it, just as the Lord does the church. [30] For we are members of His body, of His flesh and of His bones. ~ Ephesians 5:22-30 (NKJV)

In art and literature, water symbolizes emotions. The figurative idea of "washing" means to allow emotional experiences to renew one's Frame of mind and outlook on life, and this is related to sanctification. This contrasts with the concepts of "unclean" and "defiled", which is when emotionally charged experiences change one's disposition in a negative or unsuitable manner.

Men can be "washed" by learning new things and exploring new methods, hence the emphasis on the "Word". Women also find renewal this way, but often times, not in the right way. Instead, they tend to get caught up in the emotional experience, and lose sight of where it is taking them. Here in this post, I wish to point out how men can use emotional experiences to coax a woman in the right direction, instead of allowing the woman's own emotions to hold sway in the relationship, perhaps to its own destruction.

Acts of Love can be Enriched by Including Positive Emotions

In this passage, have you ever noticed that the commandment for wives to submit to their husbands comes first (in verse 22), before husbands are commanded to love their wives (in verse 25)? Ladies who want to maintain their marital relationships should take note of this.

But should husbands wait around until their wives get the feeelz, and start submittin' like a kitten in the missionary position? When a man's patience runs thin, then skip to Step 2.

Husbands are commanded to love their wives. But this kind of love is distinct from the obsequious pussy pedestalization that is encouraged by Churchians and denigrated by Manospherians.

No, the Christ-like sword of love that husbands should extend to wives is characterized by the hard work of living with a woman who is frequently worried and anxious about many things. She may even regress to having a p!ss poor attitude and a lack of respect. The husband should not let his marriage degenerate into a Pygmalion Project, but instead, is to take up his cross wife and try his hand at inducing a little Tingle into the situation.

In loving the wife, verse 26 elaborates on the application of love by stipulating that it is the responsibility of husbands to "wash their wives clean" unto sanctification (?!?). The previous injunction to wives to submit to their husbands in all things includes his work in washing her clean.

I presume that the task of becoming clean is a real challenge to women. The daily household cleaning, the changing diapers and wiping up children's vomit, as well as the marital duties of lovemaking (if done right), all contribute to her unclean state.

Many women chafe at these tasks, given the hard work involved and the unclean nature of the work. Some Feminized women might even claim that it is "beneath them" to do so. Nevertheless, it is up to the woman to find joy and purpose in these undertakings as a wife, as dirty as they may be.

Joking aside, the husband's task of washing his wife clean with the Word hints more to the spiritual and psychological state, than the physical. Here are some small, but very significant actions towards improving her state of being.

- Giving her a sense of dignity.
- Providing the outline of a clear purpose.
- Building an environment of love and respect.
- Encouraging her to dress in attractive yet modest attire.
- Maintaining an attitude of thankfulness, appreciation, and a mutual reciprocity.
- Teaching her to talk and behave in a respectable and dignified manner, worthy of Christian reputation.
- It would be a grand gesture of much appreciated generosity to perform the grungiest and most unusual tasks for her. This would encourage her to retain a sense of security and self-respect in the face of daunting challenges out of the ordinary.
- Not to downplay the wife's concerns in a derogatory manner (unless a neg is appropriate and necessary), but to help resolve those issues which caused her to be anxious in the first place. Sometimes this can be easily solved by taking action to fix something minor that needs corrected.

A Woman's Emotional Weakness can be a Man's Strength in the Relationship

Women are wired to connect on an emotional level. Men could easily regard women's need for the Feeelz as an annoying weakness, but if a man knows how to handle a woman's emotions, then this can become his greatest strength. The problem is that most men have never been taught how to motivate a woman by creating the Feeelz for her. Women, even the best of them, will never teach this skill to men. Men must learn this from other men.

Many women don't seem to understand what men want, and what makes a man happy. So a man needs to clearly state his purpose and express his enthusiasm in order to shift the emotional context into a "clean" state. Otherwise, the woman may feel like her submission is a dry duty, without any joy, purpose, or sense of connectedness.

For example, sometimes, a bothersome fight or argument can be avoided simply by telling her in calm, plain language, what you want to do, and why. She will find it easier to relate, respect, and submit, if she knows what your goals are, and that your underlying purposes have a beneficial emotional effect on you and your relationship.

Another way to describe this technique, is to create or develop an iconic expression of your personality, which will cause you to become more emotionally inspiring in her eyes. Yes, this can be exhausting work, but it gets easier with time.

A man shouldn't just be doing this to impress chix in the hope of getting laid, but he should be developing his personality and skill set according to his own life trajectory. Having a better relationship is only one benefit of growing in maturity.

On a deeper level, sometimes the problems that crop up in a relationship are because of her false notions about things, and her unrealistic desires. At those times, the battle lies only in her mind. In this case, the husband should present an alternative assessment of the situation, backed by reasonable logic, provided she's in the mood to hear it. The most important thing is to not succumb to her doubts, fears, psychological defense mechanisms, and subtle power plays. It's a little tricky for most husbands to do this.

If this is the case, don't admit her argument, but instead, improvise and introduce your own Frame of mind. This may require you to become a "temporary MGTOW", "go to your cave", invent a new stratagem, and then come back out to effectively deal with her problemata. Similar to Soft Dread Game, the time you spend away from her will make her more eager to patch things up after you return.

During your down time, you may need to wash yourself clean first, before you deal with the work of washing her clean. If you are chronically sad, pessimistic, or low energy, then it will be more difficult, if not impossible, for you to grab the she-wolf by the tail and spin her (mind, heart, and body) to your mutual advantage. This is why other Manospherians strongly encourage sports, weight lifting, and in general, leading an active, exciting life of your own.

Conclusions

Men, don't listen to envious sad-sacks who mock you for being a fun-loving, emotionally transparent man, who say that you're being a f@ggot or just peacocking for pussy. Those are the men who are too proud, too lazy, too hopeless, or too low SMV to compete with you. Kick them out and get new friends who appreciate your authentic self.

If a man can share his inner aspirations with a positive emotional affect, and let his girl tune into his wavelength, then from her perspective, she will be experiencing sanctification in the relationship, meaning that she'll feel connected, content, and she won't be hypergamsterbating dreams of having a better relationship with another man.

Best wishes!

Related

- Σ Frame (feat. J.T. Anderson): Moulding an Excellent Wife (2018/3/5)
- Σ Frame: Revealing Her Unencumbered Beauty (2018/6/26)

The Parable of the Inherited Estate

Jack · 24 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A response to a reader's question about who's responsible for "wife washing" – Jesus or hubby?

Readership: Christians in LTR's;

Introduction

Farm Boy shared a link to my previous post, Washing Her Clean (21 October 2019), in the discussion of Privilege at Spawny's Space.

Richard P posed the following question in response to that post.

> Re. the link to Sigma Frame's post, Washing Her Clean (link up-thread):
>
> Just posting some idle thoughts here. Not trying to start a discussion.
>
> Consider this phrase from Ephesians 5:26 that is part of that post:
>
> "…that He (Christ) might sanctify and cleanse her (the Church) with the washing of water by the word."
>
> Some argue that these Ephesian 5 verses place an obligation on the husband to wash his wife with the word, as Christ washed his bride (the Church) with the word. Two points occur to me:
>
> 1. A careful reading will show there are no words in these verses that require the husband to wash his wife with the word. The only requirement is that husbands ought to love their own wives as their own bodies.
> 2. A careful reading will show that Christ is washing his bride (the Church) with the word.
>
> Assuming both husband and wife are redeemed, and therefore both are part of Christ's bride that Christ washes, we end up with the following:
>
> - (a) As part of the Church, husband is cleansed by Christ with the washing of water by the word;
> - (b) As part of the Church, wife is cleansed by Christ with the washing of water by the word;
>
> What, then, is left for the husband to wash off of his wife that Christ has not already washed off? And – to extend the metaphor – if wife has goo left on her that still needs washing off after Christ washed her, then we might presume that husband still has goo left on him that still needs washing off after Christ washed him. Husband is supposed to do a re-do wash on her? Who does the re-do wash on the husband? And Christ's washing in not sufficient, not complete, at least on the wives??? Do we really want to claim that?
>
> That scenario is not logical on so many different levels. I think Christ gets it all off with the first wash. And I think those who claim that husbands are commanded to cleanse their wife by the washing of water by the word are finding words where there really are not any. For the reasons laid out in Point 2(a-b).

We have the natural inclination to conjure up mental images of taking a bath, so Richard's reaction is a logical, associative one. But the world of spirit and emotions are not entirely subject to rationale. Here, The Parable of the Inherited Estate might impart further understanding.

The Parable of the Inherited Estate

We should not conflate our objective (or "positional") identification in Christ with the tentative (or "conditional") experience of regenerative living. Here's a parabolic interpretation of this paradox.

You inherited an estate from your great-granduncle. On paper, it's all yours. But when you go to inspect the estate, you find that it hasn't been maintained in decades. Trash is scattered everywhere. The roof is leaking. The house is moldy and rotten. Small trees are growing through the cracks in the driveway. There are even homeless bums squatting on parts of the overgrown property. If you want to live there, you'll have to do some renovations and restorations. It's a lot of work. It takes further investment, and a few years to finish. But once complete, you are finally able to call it your home, and not just a derelict rat trap that your relative left to you.

To interpret the parable, the estate is your lot in this life, which includes your emotional constitution. Jesus did the legal work, paid the taxes, and made it "yours", as opposed to you just being a tenant or a squatter. The Holy Spirit is the contractor who renovates the property.

When you get married, your husband or wife shares your estate, and you share hers. If she is not a believer, then her estate is still under lien, and so you always have to dicker around with her "landlords" ≈ idols, or various strange affections (who may very well be represented by the in-laws).

When you divorce, you lose part of the joint estate, or part of your ownership of the estate, and you risk returning to the status of being a tenant (rent ≈ alimony, child support, etc.).

Responses from Married Christian Females

We saw some feedback from two female readers, which are valuable as general indicators of how wives might receive the ideas in my previous post.

Stephanie responded to Richard as follows.

> "But it IS logical in a marriage. When we accept Christ, we don't automatically become mature, fully-developed, perfect Christians. We have to go through a very complicated sanctification process. In Philippians we're literally told to, "work out our salvation with fear and trembling." Not getting into any Calvinist/Armenian theology stuff (I honestly can't argue for any of that well – my husband can though). But it's clear that yes, both spouses will still have "goo" (as you said) still on them from not yet being fully sanctified. And it seems that process takes an entire lifetime, and people can slide backwards unfortunately in old age (Solomon). It's a continuous process of staying close to God, and accepting/receiving rebukes, etc.
>
> Since the husband is the head of the family, he's responsible in a big way for their spiritual maturity and growth, or at least, he probably should be. So it makes sense in that way.
>
> It's not that Christ's washing wasn't sufficient, but that the husband as being head of the household (and told to play the role of Christ toward the Church) should be the one helping correct her when she's wrong. That involves some kind of discipline/correction, not meaning it can't be done in love, but it IS needed, and it definitely is logical when you think about it."

Ame responded with a couple pages of scriptures.

> "[22]Wives, submit to your own husbands, as to the Lord. [23] For the husband is head of the wife, as also Christ is head of the church; and He is the Savior of the body. [24] Therefore, just as the church is subject to Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything.
>
> [25] Husbands, love your wives, just as Christ also loved the church and gave Himself for her, [26] that He might sanctify and cleanse her with the washing of water by the word, [27] that He might present her to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that she should be holy and without blemish. [28] So husbands ought to love their own wives as their own bodies; he who loves his wife loves himself. [29] For no one ever hated his own flesh, but nourishes and cherishes it, just as the Lord does the church. [30] For we are members of His body, of His flesh and of His bones. [31] "For this reason a man shall leave his father and mother and be joined to his wife, and the two shall become one flesh." [32] This is a great mystery, but I speak concerning Christ and the church. [33] Nevertheless let each one of you in particular so love his own wife as himself, and let the wife see that she respects her husband." ~ Ephesians 5:22-33
>
> Going to the beginning… How did/does Christ love the church?

> - Prunes
> - Cuts
> - Disciplines
>
> Why?
>
> To make us holy.
>
> Sure, husbands need the same love from Christ, but wives aren't commanded to love their husbands this way.
>
> "[18] Servants, be submissive to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the harsh. [19] For this is commendable, if because of conscience toward God one endures grief, suffering wrongfully. [20] For what credit is it if, when you are beaten for your faults, you take it patiently? But when you do good and suffer, if you take it patiently, this is commendable before God. [21] For to this you were called, because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that you should follow His steps: [22] "Who committed no sin, Nor was deceit found in His mouth"; [23] who, when He was reviled, did not revile in return; when He suffered, He did not threaten, but committed Himself to Him who judges righteously; [24] who Himself bore our sins in His own body on the tree, that we, having died to sins, might live for righteousness—by whose stripes you were healed. [25] For you were like sheep going astray, but have now returned to the Shepherd and Overseer of your souls.
>
> [1] Wives, likewise, be submissive to your own husbands, that even if some do not obey the word, they, without a word, may be won by the conduct of their wives, [2] when they observe your chaste conduct accompanied by fear. [3] Do not let your adornment be merely outward—arranging the hair, wearing gold, or putting on fine apparel— [4] rather let it be the hidden person of the heart, with the incorruptible beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is very precious in the sight of God. [5] For in this manner, in former times, the holy women who trusted in God also adorned themselves, being submissive to their own husbands, [6] as Sarah obeyed Abraham, calling him lord, whose daughters you are if you do good and are not afraid with any terror. [7] Husbands, likewise, dwell with them with understanding, giving honor to the wife, as to the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life, that your prayers may not be hindered." ~ 1 Peter 2:18-25 – 3:1-7

Ame and Stephanie's comments indicate that they are familiar with the concept behind The Parable of the Inherited Estate.

Related

- Σ Frame: Man as the Manager, Woman as the Helper (2018 May 19)

How the Pill Changes the Brain and Emotions

Jack · 27 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

This post reviews some scientific literature on hormonal contraceptives to identify exactly what changes in the brain and the emotional constitution of a woman on the Pill.

Readership: All; Parents of adolescent daughters; Women who use birth control pills; Men with partners who use birth control pills; Men interested in vetting a woman for a relationship;

A previous post on Σ Frame, How the Pill Kills (15 October 2019), covered how Oral Contraceptive (OC) medication (AKA birth control pills) causes medical complications and death in young women. But the effects of the Pill don't stop there.

Hormones are able to work at very small doses (parts per billion ranges). Therefore, endocrine disruption can occur from low-doses of exogenous hormone exposure or from hormonally active substances that interfere with receptors for other hormonally assisted processes. As these hormones disrupt the chemical balance in the normal endocrine cycles of the body, the brain, emotional moods, and the overall constitution of the person are affected, possibly even affecting the expression of personality and certain decision-making processes.

Reports on OC-related mood changes are inconsistent. There appear to be two populations of women – those who feel that OC's improve their mood, and those who experience increased rates of depression, anxiety, fatigue, neurotic symptoms, compulsion, and anger. Many women who experience negative effects will discontinue taking OC's, so that only women who have positive physical and emotional changes continue to take oral contraceptives. As a result, the results of studies of women on OC's tend to be biased towards having positive emotional side effects. Even so, the effects are not so positive, as we will see.

The Pill is a Hatchet-Job Concoction of Biochemicals

Many people believe the biochemicals in the pill are expertly synthesized by professional chemists in a laboratory, and contain absolutely no impurities introduced from the chemical processing used to create those chemicals. This naïve notion could not be further from the truth. In the early days, the hormones (e.g. estrogen, progesterone) used in manufacturing oral contraceptives were extracted from animals, specifically horse piss, and the isolation and purification of these biochemicals was anyone's guess. Since then, chemists have been able to synthesize more potent versions of these chemicals, and to concoct similar biochemicals from other biosources. For example, efforts have been made to synthesize bioidentical hormones from soy and yams, but with limited success. [1]

Harvard Health: What are bioidentical hormones? (August 2006)

Oral contraceptives manufactured outside of North America and Europe could be extracting these biochemicals from almost any kind of animal. I have no evidence of this, but I would guess that in eastern Asia, the massive pork industry would be able to offer the sheer volume of estrogen contained in urine that would be required to mass produce birth control pills for millions of women on a continual basis.

How the Pill Changes the Brain and Body Chemistry

Frontal Neuroscience [2] reported that oral contraceptives (OC) caused changes in the brain structure, neurocognitive processing, and emotions.

> "…any hormonal contraceptives, irrespective of the progestin component, may facilitate testosterone actions on the brain, thereby masculinizing brain structure, function and behavior. Alternatively, it has been argued that some masculinizing effects are promoted by estrogen receptors after testosterone has been locally converted to estrogen via the enzyme aromatase (Roselli, 2007). Consequently, estrogenic actions of ethinylestradiol may contribute to possible masculinizing effects of hormonal contraceptives on the brain."

In short, the pill tricks the body into behaving like she's pregnant, and causes the brain to become more masculine. From a male perspective, this sounds like a recipe for disaster.

The Pill Ruins Libido

Women on the pill commonly report a decreased libido. One of the mechanisms responsible for loss of libido in women on the pill is a rise in the sex hormone binding globulin (SHBG). It combines with the woman's naturally occurring testosterone, preventing it from having its normal effects on other receptors.

A decreased libido has one noteworthy consequence of reducing a woman's interest in sex. Without a healthy sex drive, women on the pill become disinterested in their husbands/partners (and vice versa).

Note: The source paper by Cappellettia and Wallena [3] is informative, interesting, and readable.

How the Pill Changes Mood, and Affect*

 In psychology and the medical field,* affect (emphasis is placed on the first syllable) is a person's general emotional response that is expressed or observed. Affect also comprises the non-verbal expressions that are used to estimate how a person feels about something. For those readers who are unfamiliar with what variations in affect appears like, this video offers a half-hour long tutorial on identifying affect and mood.

Since the relationship between hormonal contraceptives and mood/affect was first studied in the early 1980's, it has been shown that there is definitely a link. But because cyclic changes in mood are present even when there are no changes in ovarian hormone levels, and because of the wide variability in the physiological constitution and responses among many types of women, it has been difficult to pinpoint exactly how hormones change mood/affect.

Nevertheless, it can be safely concluded that hormonal birth control use (and similar medications) tends to decrease a woman's Positive Affect during ovulation, and decrease a woman's Negative Affect during menstruation. One paper on this subject [4] stated,

> "From an evolutionary perspective, it makes sense that naturally-cycling women score higher in PA in the days they are fertile, the periovulatory time. Specifically, women who ovulate self-report more enthusiasm, alertness, attentiveness and activity levels during those days, which could be conductive to attracting and engaging a potential mate. These changes were not observed in the [Positive Affect] scores of hormonally-contracepting women which also makes sense since they do not ovulate. The limbic system could be implicated directly or indirectly in these findings since it is responsible for both triggering ovulation and the processing of emotions and motivation."

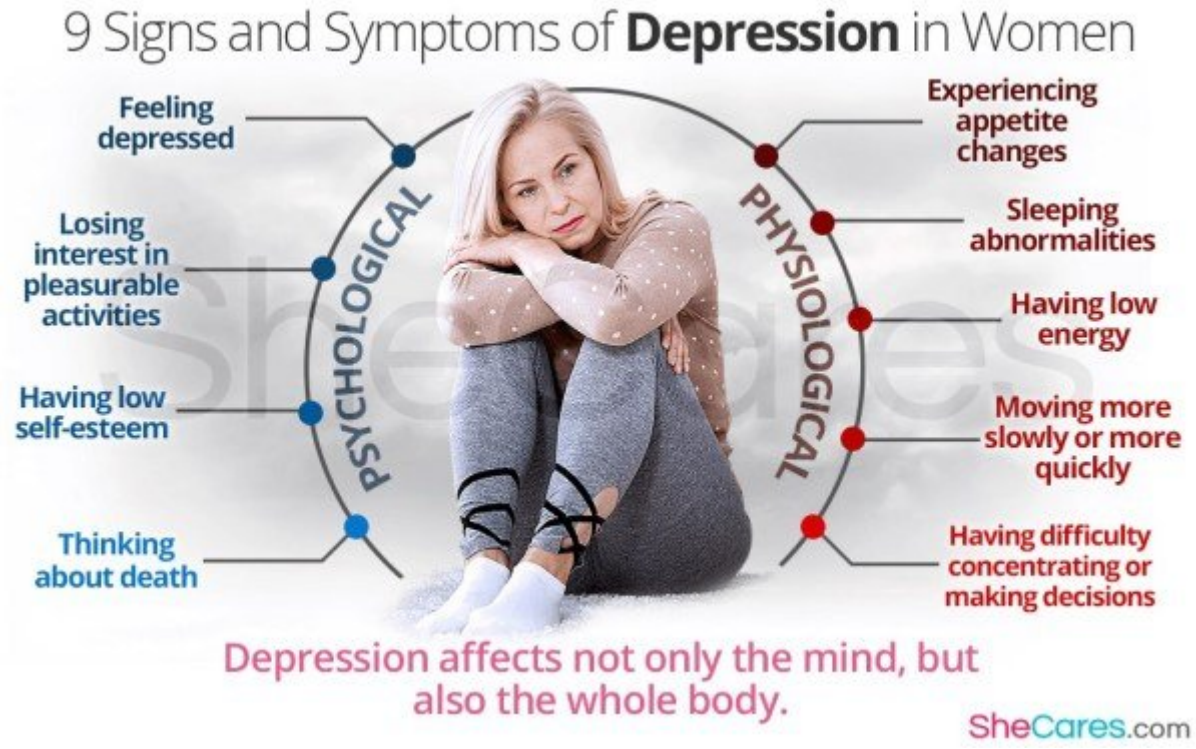
A 2015 study [5] examined the association between oral contraceptive use (any current use, duration, and type) and major depressive disorder (MDD), generalized anxiety disorder (GAD), and panic disorder (PD) in a nationally representative sample of 1,105 women aged 20-39 in the USA. The data were drawn from the National Health and Nutrition Examination Surveys dated from 1999 to 2004.

> "Women using oral contraceptives had a lower past-year prevalence of all disorders assessed, other than subthreshold MDD. When adjusted for confounders, women using oral contraceptives in the past year had significantly lower odds of subthreshold PD, compared to former users (odds ratio (OR) = 0.34, 95% CI

> 0.14-0.84). Effects estimates were strongest for monophasic (versus multiphasic) oral contraceptive users. Hormonal contraceptive use was associated with reduced risk of subthreshold PD."

In simple language, the Pill had a calming effect on women, even to the point of making some women depressed. Women experienced less anxiety, and were less panicky when taking the pill. However, women also displayed less enthusiasm, alertness, attentiveness, and other signs of vitality. In other words, the pill makes women become androgynous automatons. These findings support Pletzer and Roselli's assessment that oral contraceptives produce a masculinizing effect on the brain.

Now, some men might think that less anxiety would be a good thing. But is it worth her losing a Positive Affect? Then what happens when she stops taking the pill? Do you think she'll immediately regain her Positive Affect? You guessed it! Suddenly, she becomes a nerve-racked termagant who can't handle life in her normal hormonal state!



The Pill's Link to Depression

When you tamper with one brain system, you're going to tamper with another. This should not be surprising, because everything in the brain and body are connected.

The BBC news [6] reported a scientific study which found that women on the contraceptive pill were more likely to be diagnosed with depression. Researchers at the University of Copenhagen studied the health records of more than a million Danish women aged between 15 and 34, in one of the largest studies to date [7]. They found that…

- Women on the combined pill – which contains artificial versions of the hormones oestrogen and progesterone – were 23% more likely to be prescribed an antidepressant than those not on hormonal contraception.
- For women on the progestin-only pill, the figure rose to 34%.
- For girls aged between 15 and 19 on the combined pill, it increased even further, to 80% more likely.

The authors of this study concluded,

> "Use of hormonal contraception, especially among adolescents, was associated with subsequent use of antidepressants and a first diagnosis of depression, suggesting depression as a potential adverse effect of hormonal contraceptive use."

Using antidepressant medication has further implications on the brain and emotions.

In brief, antidepressants, especially SSRI's, elevate serotonin and depress dopamine. Dopamine is associated with romantic love. As a result, it becomes very difficult for the person to have the experience of falling in love. Not only do antidepressants suppress the dopamine circuit, but they also kill the libido. And when you kill the sex drive, you kill orgasm. And when you kill orgasm, you kill that flood of drugs associated with emotional attachment.

This explains why women on birth control pills and antidepressants might have a hard time settling down with one love interest on her heart.

Finally, the Good News

The good news is that they're making it easier for women to take androgeny pills without feeling androgenized.

Pletzer's study [2] notes that the newer generation of pills (introduced during 2010-2014) contain anti-androgenic progestins, while older pills contain androgenic progestins.

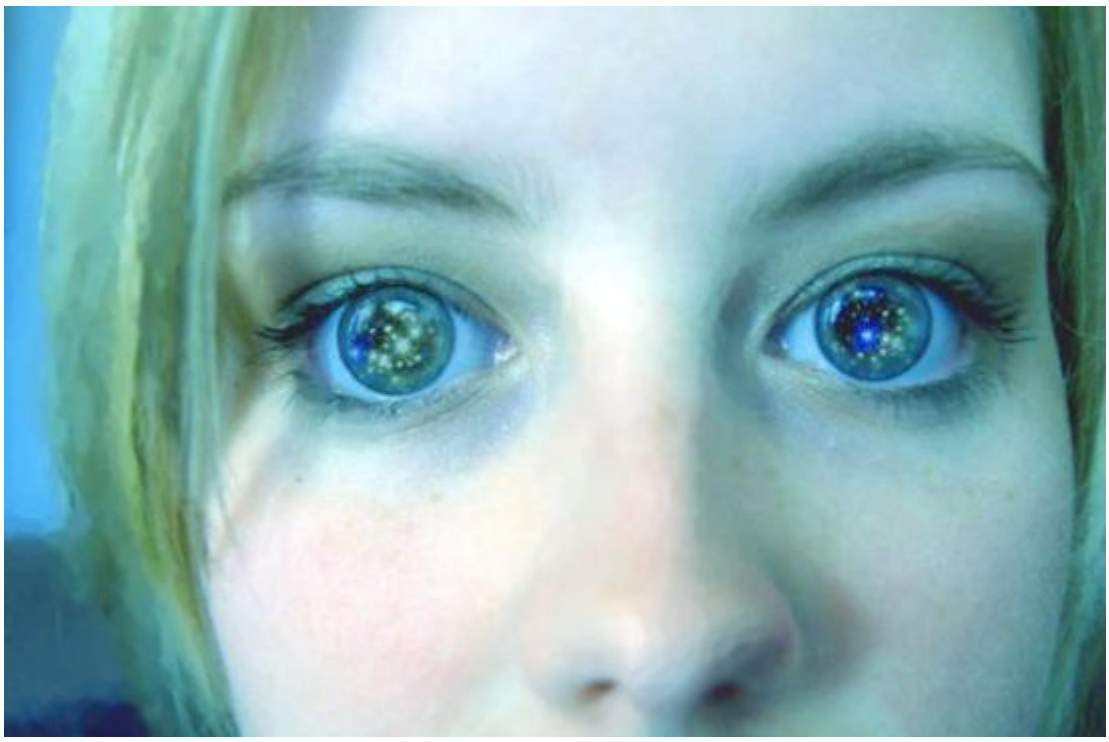
Why is this an important change?

> "Androgenic disorders have many negative physical effects [such as…] oily skin, acne, hirsutism, android obesity, androgenic alopecia… unfavorable lipid profiles, and increased incidence of diabetes and hypertension. [The external] manifestations of androgenicity often lead to poor compliance, decreased efficacy, and discontinuation of oral contraceptive use, especially in the younger patient. With the introduction of the newer oral contraceptive formulations containing less androgenic progestins (norgestimate, desogestrel, gestodene), androgen-related effects have been reduced and better compliance is anticipated." [8]

Here, "compliance" means the patient is willing to follow "doctor's orders" and continue using the pill. Apparently, these unwanted side effects are one of the primary reasons why women discontinue using OCs containing androgenic progestins.

> "New generation progestin OCs have shown a decreased incidence of unwanted/negative external physical side effects; they also appear to increase high-density lipoprotein (HDL) levels and reduce low-density lipoprotein (LDL) levels. The author concludes that the improved user compliance rate resulted from the prescription of new generation progestin OCs." [8]

Judging by the last sentence (in bold), the underlying goal of the study was to (find ways to) increase "user compliance". Reading between the lines, it becomes obvious that, "low compliance" poses a big problem to the pharmaceutical industry, which is intent on keeping as many teenage women on the pill as possible.



"I will not feel. I will not think. I must not be distracted by life. I must fornicate, but I must not breed. I must take my pills. I must obey my lord… Big Brother!"

Conclusions

A brief outline, summarizing the contents of this essay and the scientific research papers cited within, is as follows.

- The potent chemicals in contraceptive pills are harvested from equine biowaste materials.
- Small chemical imbalances in the body's endocrine system lead to big changes.
- The pill masculinizes the brain structure.
- The pill puts the female's hormonal state into "pregnant mode" thereby rendering the ovaries and uterus fallow.
- The pill causes a loss of libido resulting in a reduced appetite for sex.
- The pill creates a false sense of calm by flattening emotional affect, reducing anxiety, and muting panic attacks.
- The pill decreases a woman's Positive Affect, especially during ovulation.
- The pill decreases a woman's Negative Affect, especially during menstruation.
- Women on the pill are more likely to experience clinical depression. Depression introduces a further unique set of symptoms, including her inability to function normally and feel love.
- The academic, medical and pharmaceutical industries are actively seeking methods to retain their consumer base, and to keep more women on the pill.

All these changes have negative effects on a woman's personality, social behavior, and love life.

With the sheer number of women on the pill, this medication spells out sinister consequences for society. Pletzer revealed the Black Hand when he wrote,

> "The hormonal contraceptive pill is the major tool for population control. Hence, such behavioral changes could cause a shift in society dynamics and should not stay unattended."

Ladies, stay off of the pill for your own good, and for the good of those around you!

Take responsibility for your body and sexuality without resorting to soul-bending, affect flattening drugs.

God's way is best!

Note: This post may be updated upon future developments.

References

1. Very Well Mind (feat. Nancy Schimelpfening): The Relationship Between Estrogens and Depression (26 November 2018)
2. A. Pletzer, H. H. Kerschbaum, "50 years of hormonal contraception-time to find out, what it does to our brain," Frontal Neuroscience, 2014 Aug 21;8:256.
3. Maurand Cappellettia and Kim Wallena, "Increasing women's sexual desire: The comparative effectiveness of estrogens and androgens", Hormonal Behavior, 2016 Feb; 78: 178–193. (PDF)
4. O. Rebollar, F. J. Menéndez Balaña, M. C. Pastor, "Comparison of affect changes during the ovulatory phase in women with and without hormonal contraceptives", Heliyon, Apr.2017; 3(4).
5. Cheslack-Postava, K. M. Keyes, S. R. Lowe, K. C. Koenen, "Oral contraceptive use and psychiatric disorders in a nationally representative sample of women", Archives of Womens Mental Health. 2015 Feb;18(1):103-11.
6. BBC News: Does the contraceptive pill cause depression? (4 October 2016)
7. W. Skovlund, L. S. Mørch, Ø. Lidegaard, "Association of Hormonal Contraception With Depression", JAMA Psychiatry, 2016.
8. E. Jones, "Androgenic effects of oral contraceptives: implications for patient compliance", American Journal of Medicine, 1995 Jan 16;98(1A):116S-119S.

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: Oral contraception alters your brain (2015 April 14)
- The Pill Kills Truth

The Sexy Symbolism of the Cat

Jack · 31 October 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Scratching apart the symbolism of the feline.

Readership: All
Length: 1,150 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Here's something appropriate for Helloween, a pagan holiday which I don't endorse all that much actually.

A Short History of the Symbolism of Cats

Cats were domesticated in Egypt around 2100 BC for the purpose of hunting.

The Egyptians had great reverence for cats. They had multiple cat goddesses, including Bastet (the mother of fertility), Sekhmet (goddess with the head of a lioness), and Mafdet (goddess having come before Bast, who represented feral Egyptian cats). Each of these gods is female, which supports the association between cats and women.

The Celts also had a fondness for felines, associating them with their pre-Christian folk goddess Brighid. They saw certain qualities in cats admirable, like sensitivity and stealth. In Britain and Ireland, they believe cats are representative of friends and companions, much like dogs are thought of, and that black cats are lucky. Little black bog cat statues are sold for good luck.

All of the above mentioned goddesses are female, and were commonly associated with fertility, health, medicine, healing, and magic. For instance, ancient Druidic priests would use "cat magic" to cross between the physical and spiritual worlds.

Anyone who has spent any time around cats knows that they can be very solitary animals. The evoke the spirit of independence, cleverness, curiosity, and stealth. Cats are also symbolic of rebirth and resurrection, and this is described in the saying, “Cats have nine lives”. This belief is not without foundation. I once saw a cat fall off a window ledge on the sixth floor. I expected to see it splatter on the pavement below, but instead, the cat took off running just moments after.

Christianity turned these positive traditions with cats upside-down by connecting cats with Satan, witches, and evil. Because cats are nocturnal, they were also associated with darkness, as well as fear, the unconscious, and things that are hidden. Cats have always been symbols of mystery and magic, as aforementioned, but also unpredictability. Cats were seen as unlucky, bad omens, or evil influences. At times, they were regarded as accomplices and were hung or garroted with their masters when convicted of a crime, such as heresy. The Pilgrims shared these opinions of cats when they came to the Americas, and thus, Western society has many superstitions about cats.

In Taiwan, people once believed that the corpse of a dead cat should not be allowed to get wet, otherwise, the spirit of the cat would continue to dwell in that place and harass people. So dead cats were usually tied or nailed to trees until they dried out and mummified. People held the opposite set of beliefs about dogs, and threw dead dogs into rivers to prevent their spirits from returning.

Another society that wasn’t so fond of cats included the Native American tribes, for instance the Oglala. They would not have anything to do with any feline animal because they believed that cats had powerful magic and the ability to curse people.

The Association between Cats and Sex

In addition to the fertility of feline goddesses, cat symbolism also has strong sexual overtones. (Imagine all the noise that cats make during mating and copulation.) This connotation continues to carry over into our modern culture. There are many words, phrases, and idioms used to describe sexual anatomy, sexual experiences, or sexualized women, which make associations to cats. For example, cat lady, cat scratch fever, catwoman, cougar, lovers fighting like cats, lynx, muff, pussy, sex kitten, to be/go on the prowl…

…which reminds me of a song that I really loved when I was a kid, What’s new pussycat? by Christopher Scott and Burt Bacharach. Here is a cover of the same song by Tom Jones.

Tom Jones: What's New Pussycat? (1969) Length: 2:14

Listening to this song again as an adult, I am amused by the overt sexual connotations which I was unaware of as a child. I can't imagine how funny it must have been to see me as a four-year-old boy singing along to this song so proudly and confidently. This explains why my mother hated to play this song for me, even though she owned the album.

I also remembered that my maternal grandmother's favorite singer was Tom Jones. That must have irked my mother even more. I'm LMAO!

While we're on the topic of cats, culture, connotations, copulation, and cacophony, I can't omit this tunage from Al Stewart. Year of the Cat was his seventh studio album, and it was produced and engineered by the great musical legend, Alan Parsons. It was released in 1976 and went on to be a top five hit in the United States. One of the top selling tracts was the hit single with the eponymous name, Year of the Cat, co-written by Peter Wood.

One of the most mellow grooves you'll ever hear, AllMusic described this song as "one of those 'mysterious woman' songs". Well now, you don't say… ?

Turn down the lights and make yourself comfortable with your favorite cat / cat-shaped object / person before listening to this one. Let's explore the mystery.

Al Stewart: Year of the Cat (Official Video) Length: 6:41

Al Stewart: The Year of the Cat (Live in Concert) Length: 6:22

Al Stewart: Year of the Cat (Lyrics)

Anne Hathaway as Catwoman.

> On a morning from a Bogart movie
> In a country where they turn back time
> You go strolling through the crowd like Peter Lorre*
> Contemplating a crime

> She comes out of the sun in a silk dress running
> Like a watercolor in the rain
> Don't bother asking for explanations
> She'll just tell you that she came
> In the year of the cat
>
> She doesn't give you time for questions
> As she locks up your arm in hers
> And you follow 'till your sense of which direction
> Completely disappears
> By the blue tiled walls near the market stalls
> There's a hidden door she leads you to
> These days, she says, I feel my life
> Just like a river running through
> The year of the cat
>
> While she looks at you so cooly
> And her eyes shine like the moon in the sea
> She comes in incense and patchouli
> So you take her, to find what's waiting inside
> The year of the cat
>
> Well morning comes and you're still with her
> And the bus and the tourists are gone
> And you've thrown away your choice you've lost your ticket
> So you have to stay on
> But the drum-beat strains of the night remain
> In the rhythm of the new-born day
> You know sometime you're bound to leave her
> But for now you're going to stay
> In the year of the cat

Now, fast forward 20 years…

When you realize how cougars transform into cat ladies as they age, somehow, the “mysterious woman” image is not so mysterious any longer.

Happy Howloween. I’m out for a cat nap.

Notes and Credits

 Peter Lorre was a popular actor in 20th century films, who is best known for playing a very iconic, obsequious, sneaky, seedy, greedy bad guy.*

Humphrey Bogart and Peter Lorre star in Casablanca (1942).
Year of the Cat lyrics © Sony/ATV Music Publishing LLC, Warner Chappell Music, Inc, Universal Music Publishing Group, Carlin America Inc.

Source: LyricFind

Related

- Σ Frame: Which pets are cleaner? Dogs or Cats? (2020/11/23)
- Σ Frame: Wimmin Luv Cats because ¡Science! (2021/10/31)

On the Spiritual Significance and Social Value of Game

Jack · 3 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

What is the value of Game? When is Game appropriate?

Readership: Men in difficult relationships;

Introduction

I've been working on a study of the important role of humility in Game [Update: see the post, Why does Game Work?], and so I've been reviewing Deep Strength's (DS) writings on the subject. One of the most poignant questions I had is why DS believes that Game is fundamentally opposed to "God's way", as he puts it. It took me a while to come to the same conclusion, because from what I could see, Game has an important place in soliciting a spiritually obedient posture from one's spouse.

Because I had this polar opposite opinion, at first, I believed that our difference of opinion might be because we had a different concept of what Game is. So one of my primary tasks was to figure out whether this was so.

After considering a few definitions of Game, I wasn't sure it mattered at all. What matters is what Game means to each individual man. Some men are naturals at Game, while others aren't. Some men find Game useful and rewarding, while others find it to be fake, exhausting, or encumbering.

Personally, I am really lousy at Game, because I'm too sincere and conscientious. But whenever I am able to pull off some Game techniques, it really works miracles in her attitude and disposition. Based on my own experiences, I'm tempted to say that Game bypasses my own self efforts, and allows God to step in and take over. But I'm not sure if that is entirely true, or if this impression might just be a form of Machiavellianism. So I still have many unresolved opinions about Game.

Moreover, in this post, I treat the concept of Game as a monolithic entity. Interpret it however you may. But whatever you think of Game, you can still consider the following viewpoints about the matter, and I hope it will spur you to further refine your Inner Game.

During my review of DS's work, several posts spoke to me in particular. I'll review these briefly and then report my perspectives.

Game is a game

Christianity and Masculinity: The Failure of Game Redux (2018 April 23)

> "That's what sacrificial love actually means: stepping into the conflict to pull her toward sanctification."
>
> "This is not to say that men should take on any woman who wants to be in a relationship to fix them. A woman who continually ignores calls for repentance and sanctification is a poor choice for a wife. You want a wife who is going to follow you toward Christ, even if you have to sometimes bring her kicking and screaming. However, it should get better over time as she becomes more sanctified — she will build habits of good behavior and eschew bad behavior."

The "even if you have to sometimes bring her kicking and screaming" part is the focus of my previous study of Discipline in Marriage (ca. 2018). So what's wrong with using a little Game to reduce her resistance and increase her interest?

In the same post, DS quotes a comment from Cane Caldo, describing it as "the correct mindset to operate from".

> "Alright God: I'll do it your way and by the book, Smart Guy! Whatever happens is on you! I'll be sacrificial and loving no matter what she does, but I will also expect to be obeyed, and I will say so! I will be gentle, but > never quit my expectations. I will stop trying to get her agreement, and settle for her obedience, even when she is bitter about it."

>
> Best thing I ever did. God's way held up even though I sometimes slipped up and tried to change her mind instead of seek her submission (it confuses them, and prompts them to rebel), or failed to remain cheerful when she sometimes chafed.
>
> I've told that story before, but before these last few posts I did not understand that what I threw out of my life was chivalry."

Reading between the lines in bold, it is enlightening to realize that whatever Cane's wife was thinking, really didn't matter at all, and that her submission didn't depend on whatever she was thinking. There's something important to be learned there.

DS concludes,

> "The reason why game fails in the end is that it doesn't obey God. It doesn't reflect the fruits of the Spirit. It will never bring a wife to repentance. It dances around and covers up the actual issues present within the relationship or marriage. It operates from a state of judgment of bad behavior instead of seeking repentance through kindness."
>
> "Game is much like many Christian conservatives' attachments to chivalry and complementarism. It hides the actual issue of rebellion with a "feel good" alternative. In this case, the "feel good" is making it seem like you have a good relationship instead of doing it God's way.
>
> Never thought I'd make that analogy like that, but it fits. The only difference is that Chivalry and Complementarism capitulate to the culture while Game does not. All of them nudge you in the wrong direction."

DS is exactly right here, in that Game is a feral/fleshly interaction. For those who are mature/sanctified, the glorified life in the spirit has little use for Game. But what if you or your girl/wife are not mature/sanctified enough to see things this way? Is it a rebellion for a man to use Game tactics that his immature girl/wife needs and actually enjoys? (although she may not admit it).

I believe God loves us, even in our unsanctified state, even in our immaturity. God's grace must extend to those who still relate to each other in immature/unsanctified ways. In fact, that's what grace is all about.

Christianity and Masculinity: The failure of chivalry in Biblical marriage, works and desire, and the failure of game (2018 April 16)

An exerpt from the section on "Works and Desire"

> "Working does not work. Biblical marriage is an image of Christ and the Church. The same standards apply to the husband and the wife. It is one of desire and not works.
>
> You cannot work hard enough to placate your wife's emotions (e.g. make her feel more attracted to you).
>
> You cannot work hard enough that your wife will be pleased (e.g. do enough chores).
>
> You cannot work hard enough that you will ever meet her expectations.
>
> Falling into a pattern of works is falling into the temptation of sin. You are not trying to please her; you are trying to please the black hole that is unrestrained hypergamy. Your works will never be enough."
>
> "Does this mean that you shouldn't try to please your wife? Certainly not. But it must come from desire and not working to try to please."

The presence of desire is the key quality that is necessary in leading one to become humble and open one's heart to the experience of love and grace. Sanctification occurs when our desires have been met or somehow resolved, and we gain a sense of peace and contentment.

So if your partner is not feeling that desire, then what? Does it mean she is already sanctified? Or maybe it means you are not the right man for the job. What if you're the one whose desire has waned? Uh oh… What if you're already married, and desire has faded, but sanctification is still nowhere in sight?

Ask yourself, what does your innermost heart desire? What does your wife/girl desire? If you want to tap into that desire, you may have to exercise some Frame and Game. No, scratch that… if you're young and wild at heart, you'll definitely have to utilize Frame and Game. I might be wrong here, but I want to say that rejecting Frame and feral Game simply because it's "not God's way", may very well exclude someone from entering into certain life experiences that may lead to one's sanctification.

The right Game for the right girl

An excerpt from the section entitled, "The failure of "game"

> "The failure of "game" is that you're trying to work to make sure a woman/wife is attracted to you. If you are under the burden of performance, it is almost inevitable that you will slip up at some point or another and she will be 'less attracted and leave you.'"

Attraction is the key to dominance in the power dynamic. But if creating attraction is the man's main goal in playing Game (with the purpose of tilling thatch), then he's missed the point, and that's why Game fails. The true goal of game (and discipline) is to foster a spiritual state of trust, humility, and grace.

> "While Chivalry is the idolatry of romantic love, Game is the idolatry of narcissism. Instead of feelings as the idol, the idol is switched with the love of self-image. This is why most Game proponents of game laud the dark triad traits as the best way to attract women."

Game can be the idolatry of narcissism, but Narcissistic Game is just one style that appeals to a certain kind of woman who is proud, spoiled, and apathetic, which just happens to be the majority of women in the West at this time in history. Compare to Kindness Game, which appeals to women who are insecure and have no self-confidence, which is still not uncommon in east-Asia. We must not neglect the particulars of the unique power play within a relationship. If a certain woman happens to ascribe power and Tingles to selfishness and narcissism, then that is what is going to move this particular woman's heart. If another woman happens to ascribe love and affection to kindness and kino, then that is what works for her individually.

Should we deny the reality of what kind of stuff can touch and awaken a broken heart? Yes, we could say that certain terms of endearment are degenerate, that it's not Godly. It's not holy. But even though it might not fit the Biblical model to our liking, that's the way it is, and we've got to come to terms with where we are, and what works in the present state. So let's start with what works, and strive to make things better. We cannot demand that everything should become perfect, before we are willing to put our hand to the plow. Demanding perfection is one manifestation of sin.

If we come to terms with ourselves, and the nature of the woman in our life, does it mean that we're outside of God's grace? Are we living in rebellion? Are we cutting ourselves off from God's blessings and grace? As dirty as it might seem, coming to terms with our human nature is a necessary step in realizing our need for Christ, and trusting Him to make this mess of a life into something worth living for.

Count the cost of maintaining the mission

Christianity and Masculinity: The goal for Christian husbands whose wives deny them should not be sex but their wife's repentance (2019 October 29)

The main point of this post is that husbands should stay focused (on their God ordained mission in life), and not let their need for sex make them subservient to their wives. In the comments, GreyGhost and Sharkly emphasized the point that a husband's godly leadership (however you want to interpret that) doesn't always lead to the wife's repentance (in the form of creating attraction and increasing her interest in her sexual duties to her husband).

Because a lack of sex can be extremely debilitating for certain men, thinking outside the need-for-sex box can be very difficult for certain men to maintain. This post offers some regular encouragement for men who are struggling with this. However, more attention should be given to individual contexts, otherwise, the good advice in the OP and from others in the comments could be easily mistaken as inappropriate.

> "The goal of the importance of God's mission and acting as the leader in the home is not sex. Yes, you become more attractive so that generally your wife will want to have sex with you over time. Yes, that's a good thing. But it's not the end goal. When you start doing God's mission for you and acting like a leader in the home, THAT is the way you actually help bring a wife to repentance. Yes, she should be mature enough Christian to realize that she is in sin and needs to repent, but that doesn't always happen because most Christians are not spiritually mature and can recognize their own pet sins in a world that encourages them."

The quality of sex in a marriage might be taken as a litmus test of how strong the marriage is. Granted, this is a man's perspective, and there are probably some exceptions, but I think the point stands. If your wife is frigid for any length of time, for any reason, then your marriage will slowly drift off to hades, and take you along with it. If this is a recalcitrant and recurring problem, and the wife has no interest in repenting of her neglect, then there is not a lot of hope to improve the union.

If you're a Christian man intent on achieving sanctification, then her non-repentance is totally unacceptable. As important as it might be, the main problem with the husband attempting to solve this problem by being obedient (through cooperating with the work of the Holy Spirit) is that it doesn't guarantee the wife's repentance, which is taken to be a necessary condition for sanctification to occur. If the wife is unresponsive to the Holy Spirit, and she really doesn't care about spiritual growth, or the health of the marriage, then what can a Christian man do? In this case, a marriage to such a woman is little more than an open door allowing Satan into the man's life.

This is exactly why the Bible warns us against "being unequally yoked" (2nd Corinthians 6:14). Most preachers and teachers interpret this passage to specify a marriage between a Christian and an unbeliever. But they have missed the larger point. In practice, it's destructive to be yoked to anyone who doesn't share your spiritual disposition, or your values, or goals in life. DS says a man should be focused on his "mission", but if his woman doesn't agree with or value his mission, then this approach will detonate his marriage, and not "bring her around to repentance" as would be expected.

A wife who is sexually lazy is actually a subtle rebellion that works through attrition. It seems that the most important piece of information that is missing in the OP is how to deal with this problem effectively. Trey advocates loving discipline, and I agree. There is a severe drought of information about how to administer discipline, and this is why I've studied this extensively and written many posts on the subject. For more on this, see the page, Discipline in Marriage.

This is also why I'm hesitant to reject Game altogether. If you have an immature or unbelieving wife who insists on being feral, then you have to be kind of the same. Otherwise, the marriage is doomed, and depending on how much you've got invested in your marriage, possibly your life and your children's lives as well. I think Game can be employed to reinforce discipline in a way that an unregenerate wife will respond to. Getting her response is the first step, and then you can focus on improving her response, and eventually wean her off of the fleshly methods.

We live in an ugly reality. If you can find a better woman, then go for it. But don't count on it. Good women are as rare as horse feathers. If the best you can do is hooking a selfish sad-sack, and God gives you the heart to love her, then maybe it's the way you'll have to go. If Game is what makes her feel loved and brings her around to repentance, then Game it must be. If you're not willing to do this dirty job, then you're probably just flinging her to the next Chad. So choose wisely. As DS says, "count the cost".

> [26] "If anyone comes to Me and does not hate his father and mother, wife and children, brothers and sisters, yes, and his own life also, he cannot be My disciple. [27] And whoever does not bear his cross and come after Me cannot be My disciple. [28] For which of you, intending to build a tower, does not sit down first and count the cost, whether he has enough to finish it— [29] lest, after he has laid the foundation, and is not able to finish, all who see it begin to mock him, [30] saying, 'This man began to build and was not able to finish'? [31] Or what king, going to make war against another king, does not sit down first and consider whether he is able with ten thousand to meet him who comes against him with twenty thousand? [32] Or else, while the other is still a great way off, he sends a delegation and asks conditions of peace. [33] So likewise, whoever of you does not forsake all that he has cannot be My disciple." ~ Luke 14:26-33 (NKJV)

Discussion

I've come to see that Deep Strength's assessments of Game was essentially accurate. The reason why Game may not be "God's way" is when it supports the woman's idolatry of romantic love and the Tingles. It becomes idolatry at the point when she gets addicted to the dopamine rush, which must necessarily be more intense and thrilling with each successive trammeling, and this prevents her from making progress towards sanctification. Sex is supposed to support and contribute towards sanctification, but if Game leads to sex (or the refusal of Game leads to no sex), but not sanctification, then this is reminiscent of idolatry. As long as she finds all her fantastical emotional needs met through a man with tight Game, she won't strengthen her reliance on God's love and grace, although she might believe so while the action is hot. The main weakness of Game in this respect, is that the trust and humility, as well as the Rock and Roller coaster of emotions that she craves, cannot be continued for an indefinite period of time.

Now although Game is not "God's way" directly, I still believe Game has an important place. I can think of several situations in which Game could offer intrinsic value.

1. If your girl is not a Christian, or if she is, but she's spiritually immature, or far behind in her process of becoming more sanctified, then you'll need to practice some game to keep her going. The simple reason is that if she doesn't know how to rely on God to get her emotional and spiritual needs satisfied, then you (or the next man she finds) are all she's got! If you're cool at Game, and you've got some natural compatibility going on, then this will keep her into you (and you into her) for a while, maybe long enough for her to know God better and allow her wayward heart to settle down.
2. If your girl is under the age of 25, you'll probably need some game to keep her interest locked in to you. Women in that age bracket are at their peak SMV, and they have too many intersexual opportunities, and not enough maturity to handle it. In other words, they lack moral agency, and they don't know their right hand from their left. Given the plethora of affirmation available to them on a daily basis, they may find it very difficult to experience humility, and so they will need a man who knows how to help them to that end.
3. Here is some really dank truth. For some women, being Gamed and then being heartbroken might be their ticket into the Kingdom of God, because this forces them to view their idol for what it is – a capricious Chad playing kingpins for the p*ssy. This rude wakeup call will beckon her to find God in the process of recovery. However, this experience will add some negative consequences (e.g. emotional baggage, poor bonding, possibly even STD's) into her subsequent relationship. Namely, she won't be able to put her whole heart into the relationship, and this will be a continually burning source of dissatisfaction for the man. In short, she'll be more worthy in God's eyes because she's burned out of her idolatry, but ironically, she'll be less worthy of a man in marriage because everything about her that was worthy, beautiful, and good, got burned up through her liberation from that idolatry.

The simple reason Game becomes necessary is because some people (like maybe your wife) can't or won't do things

God's way, yet love and desire prevent one from writing her off as lost, and dumping her in the gutter. In other words, Game is an indemnity.

Conclusions

In defense of learning Game, it sure helps a man understand himself, refine his social technique, and gain confidence around women, which are all very attractive traits. If a woman, even a Christian woman, has a choice between a man with Game and a man without it, all other things being equal, she will definitely go for the man with Game. Absolutely! Unless she's been taught to eschew Game, or has had a bad experience that has conditioned her to reject her natural desire.

Game can also teach a man how women operate in their natural state. The grand majority of all women are far from being spiritually mature, so having a bit of Game can help a man know how to deal with women in general.

Lastly, provided that you're not breaking trust or leading her away from God, Game adds a lot of fun and dimensional depth to the relationship. Adult Play between the two of you is an important part of a healthy relationship.

Related

- Σ Frame: Pick Up Game – Does it serve the needs of Men, or is it for Women? (2017 September 23)
- Σ Frame: Introduction to Game Theory 101 (2018 February 11)

Why is Resting Important?

Jack · 6 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Always feeling anxious and haggled? Just give it a rest!

Readership: All

The Monumental Importance of Resting

In today's busy working culture, not enough emphasis is given on the importance of rest. Part of this problem is that most people, employers and employees alike, don't have an accurate understanding of the nature of rest, and why it's important.

So let's start out with what the Bible says about rest.

> [8] "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. [9] Six days you shall labor and do all your work, [10] but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the LORD your God. In it you shall do no work: you, nor your son, nor your daughter, nor your male servant, nor your female servant, nor your cattle, nor your stranger who is within your gates. [11] For in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, the sea, and all that is in them, and rested the seventh day. Therefore the LORD blessed the Sabbath day and hallowed it. ~ Exodus 20:8-11 (NKJV)

This is the fourth of the Ten Commandments, which God gave to Moses on Mount Sinai. The Ten commandments are a very important part of our spiritual awareness and growth, as they are intended to reveal to us our own incapacities and train us in trusting God. But this commandment seems to have special significance, because it is repeated many times throughout scripture. One such passage carries some important implications to be considered.

> [12] And the LORD spoke to Moses, saying, [13] "Speak also to the children of Israel, saying: 'Surely My Sabbaths you shall keep, for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations, that you may know that I am the LORD who sanctifies you. [14] You shall keep the Sabbath, therefore, for it is holy to you. Everyone who profanes it shall surely be put to death; for whoever does any work on it, that person shall be cut off from among his people. [15] Work shall be done for six days, but the seventh is the Sabbath of rest, holy to the LORD. Whoever does any work on the Sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death. [16] Therefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations as a perpetual covenant. [17] It is a sign between Me and the children of Israel forever; for in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, and on the seventh day He rested and was refreshed. ~ Exodus 31:12-17 (NKJV)

Note the text in red, where it says that those who violate the Sabbath "shall be cut off", and "shall surely be put to death". Here, we should not imagine that a mob of Old Testament Jews will come and stone the offender of the Law.

Get real!

This means that you'll lose touch with the Kingdom Life of God within your heart. When we think of those who are "put to death", we should imagine bitter, depressed, sniping, overworked, stressed-out people, who are under tremendous pressure, and spend all their time and efforts on an endeavor that never really comes out right. Additionally, their relationships with family and friends suffer, because they spend all their time working. That is what it means to be "cut off", and in totality, it's a spiritual death!

Concerning the text in blue, it is evident that the Sabbath REST is how our covenant with God is serviced and renewed. So if you're never feeling well rested, maybe it's because you don't know what true rest is — allowing yourself to have a psychological vacation.

The Ten Commandments are recounted again in Deuteronomy, and are embellished with a more complete description that EVERYBODY needs rest, and that even includes servants (employees), guests, and animals! (Relevant text in red.)

> [12] 'Observe the Sabbath day, to keep it holy, as the LORD your God commanded you. [13] Six days you shall labor and do all your work, [14] but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the LORD your God. In it you shall do no work: you, nor your son, nor your daughter, nor your male servant, nor your female servant, nor your ox, nor your donkey, nor any of your cattle, nor your stranger who is within your gates, that your male servant and your female servant may rest as well as you. [15] And remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt, and the LORD your God brought you out from there by a mighty hand and by an outstretched arm; therefore the LORD your God commanded you to keep the Sabbath day. ~ Deuteronomy 5:12-15 (NKJV)

The last verse here (in blue) emphasizes that since God has rescued us from a futile existence, WE ARE NO LONGER SLAVES, so… WE SHOULD NOT ACT LIKE SLAVES in our work.

In other words, WHO WE ARE (in Christ) IS MORE IMPORTANT THAN WHAT WE DO!

Precision Control

The Results of Resting

These Commandments are followed with a promise, and as usual with God's promises, it mainly pertains to the enhancement of the quality of our Life and also the fruits or our labors (highlighted in red text here).

> [1] "Now this is the commandment, and these are the statutes and judgments which the LORD your God has commanded to teach you, that you may observe them in the land which you are crossing over to possess, [2] that you may fear the LORD your God, to keep all His statutes and His commandments which I command you, you and your son and your grandson, all the days of your life, and that your days may be prolonged. [3] Therefore hear, O Israel, and be careful to observe it, that it may be well with you, and that you may multiply greatly as the LORD God of your fathers has promised you—'a land flowing with milk and honey.' ~ Deuteronomy 6:1-3 (NKJV)

So the "results" of resting include,

- Fearing the Lord, and I believe this implies/includes having a sense of security and a clear purpose in life.
- All of our family keeping all His statutes and His commandments (which is better for our health and reputation).
- Longer lifespan.
- I interpret verse 3 as implying more productivity, more efficiency, perhaps more children, and a higher quality life in general.*

If these things look good to you, then give it a rest!

 The false Prosperity Gospel amplifies this verse to mean "wealth and riches". But the text does not state this specifically.*

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: Honor the Sabbath (2018 November 3)
- Adam Piggott: The importance of sleep and relaxation (2019 September 29)
- Adam Piggott: A true holiday is no holiday at all (2019 October 10)
- Σ Frame: True Rest as a Form of Worship (2019 October 12)

A Deeper Look at Contraception and Abortion

Jack · 9 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

You would probably guess that an increase in contraceptive use would decrease the number of abortions, Right? Guess again.

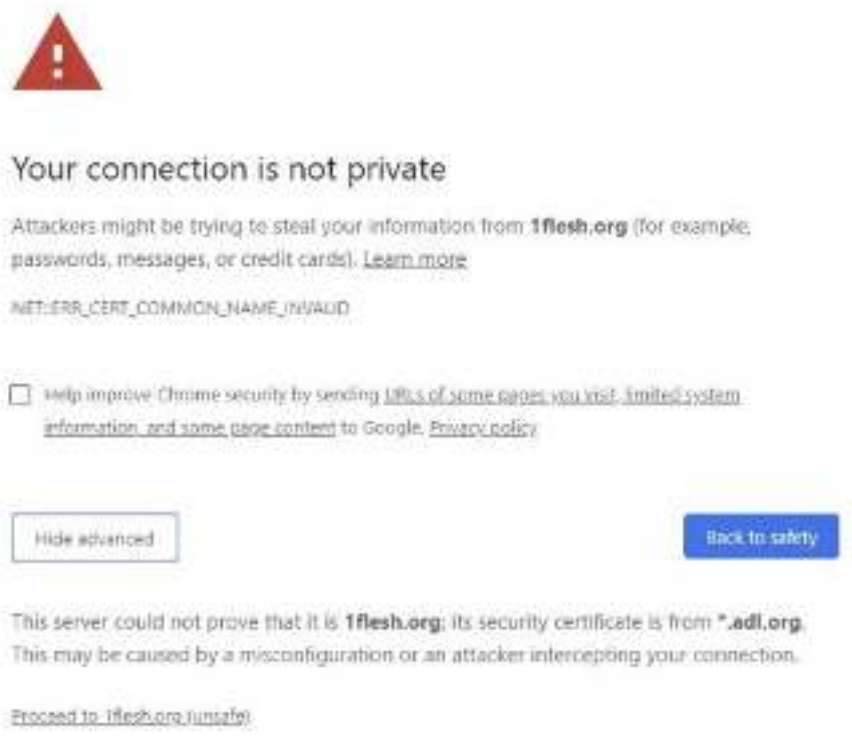
Readership: All

The student campus organization, 1flesh.org, was founded in 2012 by a group of college students who felt compelled to introduce more people to natural methods of family planning through dynamic social media outreach and the tagline “Bring Sexy Back.”

1 Flesh received wild support from various groups, especially conservative Christian youth, pro-lifers, and those wary of the risks involved with hormonal birth control. 1 Flesh was demonized by organizations (i.e. the G@tes foundation) seeking to push widespread availability of abortion and contraception into developing countries. 1 Flesh was also unpopular with the Catholic church, which maintained that the purpose of Natural Family Planning (NFP) was no different from other forms of contraception – the prevention of pregnancy.

A Deeper Look at Contraception and Abortion was written by an author known only as “Marc”, and originally appeared on 1 Flesh on 2012 September 22.

The original 1flesh.org site is now shadow banned by the bandwidth bosses. But the internet lives forever, you know.



* * * * * * *

The claim that the widespread promotion of contraception reduces the incidence of abortion is a good one. Its basic logic — that because abortions are the result of unplanned pregnancies, contraception, by reducing unplanned pregnancies, reduces abortions — is reasonable and lucid.

But it’s not true.

An honest look at the data shows that in virtually every country that increased the use of contraception, there was a simultaneous increase in the abortion rate. In England (Rise in contraceptive use: simultaneous rise in abortions), France (Rise in contraceptive use: simultaneous rise in abortions), Australia, (Rise in contraceptive use: simultaneous rise in abortions), Portugal (whose abortion rate only began to rise after 1999, after oral contraceptive methods were made widely available), Canada (whose abortion rate only began to rise after the legalization of oral contraceptives in 1969), Singapore, Cuba, Denmark, the Netherlands, and South Korea — to name a few. That these countries have periodically seen the abortion rate reduced by the use of contraception is good, but it must be taken with a firm grasp of the overall picture: These countries have never seen the abortion rate reduced to its place before the introduction and widespread use of contraception. It is no victory of contraception that it partially reduces a problem it created in the first place.

But before we address why the introduction of contraception to a country is usually simultaneous with a rise in abortion, we need to address the Guttmacher Institute.

The Guttmacher Institute — previously the research arm of Planned Parenthood, now a recipient of their annual donations — is the authoritative source for the claim that contraception is not associated with increased abortion rates. Their study "Relationships Between Contraception and Abortion: A Review of the Evidence" determined that contraception reduces abortion rates, and in countries where it doesn't, "after fertility levels stabilized… contraceptive use continued to increase and abortion rates fell." This implies that contraception will eventually reduce the abortion rate in those countries as well.

Here's the problem. 4 of the 7 countries the The Guttmacher Institute cites to make the claim that contraception reduces overall abortion rates are ex-communist countries: Kazakhstan, Kyrgyz Republic, Uzbekistan, and Bulgaria.

At the time contraception became widely used, the abortion culture in these countries was radically different from the abortion culture of the rest of the world. In a 2002 article published in Studies in Family Planning, the point is made that in the Soviet Union "soon after it was re-legalized in 1955, abortion became the main form of birth control, available on request and free of charge (Popov 1991; Remennick 1991). Little ideological or moral opposition to abortion existed." This cannot be said of the vast majority of countries.

The fact that the introduction of contraception lowered the abortion rate in these countries — while laudable — can not be used as evidence to make the blanket claim that "contraception reduces abortion rates." Rather, it seems that the introduction of contraception helped to reduce abortion rates in certain countries in which abortion was already regarded as a moral form of contraception, a view restricted almost entirely to communist and ex-communist states. The introduction of contraception, by reducing the overall number of conceptions, created a society in which there were far fewer children to abort. It did not do away with abortion, it simply aided it in achieving its end. (And quite successfully, as most of these countries are now experiencing drastic population decline.) Thus, despite initial reductions, these communist and ex-communist countries still have some of the highest abortion rates in the world. Contraception has not made abortion any less of a cultural need.

So, given that the Guttmacher Institute primarily use ex-communist countries as evidence, perhaps it would be wise to change the bold claim that "contraception reduces abortion rates" to "contraception reduces abortion rates primarily in countries who already view abortion as a moral or amoral means of family planning." But even this (considerably less hopeful) statement isn't precisely true.

It is not always the case that contraception lowers the abortion rate, even in countries with an "abortion culture".

The organization Family Health International often cites the fact that "the world's lowest abortion rates are recorded in Belgium and the Netherlands, where contraception is used extensively, while the highest rates are found in Cuba and Vietnam, where clients have access to a limited range of contraceptive methods", as evidence for contraception's abortion-reducing effects. A closer look at Cuba and Vietnam shows the same ignored problem.

In the article "The Persistence of Induced Abortion in Cuba: Exploring the Notion of an "Abortion Culture"" published in S*tudies in Family Planning*, it was shown that in Cuba, like in other communist or ex-communist societies, "abortion is seen as a reasonable fertility-control option by itself, not just in cases of contraceptive failure or unprotected sexual intercourse that results in pregnancy."

It is suggested that the reason for Cuba's high abortion rate is that Cuba does not have enough access to contraception. If there is truth to this, it is not the whole truth. Cuba has greater access to contraception than many countries with lower abortion rates, with approximately 73% of sexually active women "currently using" contraception. The issue is actually threefold.

1. First, there exists in Cuba that "abortion culture", a culture that views abortion as amoral — or at the very least morally relative — and thus merely as another means of [birth control].
2. Widespread poverty is described as a major driving factor in Cuba's high abortion rate.
3. Finally, there is a greater concern about the side-effects, health risks and the actual use-effectiveness of contraception in Cuba than in other countries, so while contraception is used, it is often used sporadically.

Once again, the "abortion culture" matters, but is ignored in favor of easy answers. (The same article lists Vietnam as a country considered to have an “abortion culture”, similar in its post-communist status to Cuba and the Soviet Union.) We must again replace the confident phrase, “contraception reduces abortion rates”, with something like “contraception reduces abortion rates primarily in countries who already view abortion as an amoral means of family planning, providing these countries have no fear of the health risks and side effects of contraception.” (A fear which will probably persist as long as the Pill continues to increase a woman’s risk of breast cancer, cervical cancer, and HIV infection, and a man’s risk of prostate cancer.)

To recap: Excepting countries with an already ingrained culture of abortion, the introduction of contraception to a country is associated with a simultaneous increase in abortions, an increase which tends to level and experience periodical decreases thanks to the improved use and availability of contraception, but which never decreases back to where it was before contraception was introduced to that country.

Funnily enough, this was seen in Turkey, one of the three countries the Guttmacher Institute cites to support their claims without an “abortion culture”. In the study The Role of Contraceptive Changes in the Decline of Induced Abortion in Turkey — which Guttmacher cites — it is shown that in 1983, when contraception laws were liberalized, abortion ended 12.1% of all pregnancies. As contraceptive used increased, the abortion rate increased, until 1988, when abortion ended 23.6% of pregnancies. Thanks to the improved use and availability of contraception, the rate then began to decrease, until, by 1998, abortion ended 15.7% of all pregnancies. Here the abortion rate dipped, rose, and leveled, and by 2007, abortion ended 17.0% of all pregnancies in Turkey. The Guttmacher Institute see this as evidence of the success of contraception in reducing abortions. We see it as evidence of the success of contraception in increasing abortions.

Obviously, more extensive research is needed, but the bold claim that contraception reduces abortion rates just doesn’t seem to hold up to the light of day. But surely — one might ask — it’s best to promote and use contraception, now that there is this increase? Isn’t some reduction better than none, even if contraception never causes the abortion rate to go down to where it was before contraception was ever popularized?

It’s important to recognize that, while contraception has been a factor in many of the relative decreases in abortion around the world, it is as often a factor in relative increases around the world.

In the 2011 study Trends in the use of contraceptive methods and voluntary interruption of pregnancy in the Spanish population during 1997-2007, surveys of about 2,000 Spanish women aged 15 to 49 were taken every two years from 1997 to 2007. Over this period of time, the number of women using artificial contraceptives increased by about 60%. In the exact same period, Spain’s abortion rate more than doubled, from 5.52 per 1,000 women to 11.49.

Similar results can be found in England. The government implemented their Teenage Pregnancy Strategy in 1995, spending over $454 million promoting the use of contraception. Teenage pregnancies and subsequent abortions continued to increase.

Here in the United States, according to The National Center for Chronic Disease Prevention and Health Promotion, the majority of women undergoing abortion were using some form of contraception when they conceived, with 55-60% of women who undergo abortion "reported that they "currently used" contraception during the month of their last menstrual period."

So we come to the vital question: Why? Why would contraception create a need for abortion?

It's very simple: According to Guttmacher Institute researcher Stanley K. Henshaw, "contraceptive users appear to have been more motivated to prevent births than were nonusers." The use of contraception seeks to avoid pregnancy while still performing the act of sex. When contraception fails, and a new life results from that act, there is an immediate difficulty: The couple would have to, by courage and strength, avoid continuing the mentality by which they practiced contraception — that a new child is to be avoided — into the mentality with which they view the actual, living, new child in the womb. I have no doubt it can be done, but not without difficulty, and where there is difficulty, people fail.

This, after all, is the very reason why abortion is legal in the United States. In the Supreme Court case Planned Parenthood vs. Casey, which confirmed the legalization of abortion, it was stated that:

[I]n some critical respects, the abortion decision is of the same character as the decision to use contraception […] For two decades of economic and social developments, [people] have organized intimate relationships and made choices that define their views of themselves and their places in society, in reliance on the availability of abortion in the event that contraception should fail.

The message is clear: Because we have come to use contraception, we have come to need abortion. Luckily for the entire world, and all the babies, medical science has made it possible to effectively practice family planning without the use of contraception. It's called fertility awareness, and it's all sort of awesome.

Noteworthy Comments

Joseph Jablonski (gaudiumdei.com) said…

Great post marc! Your last line is confirmed by history: Contraception was legalized in 1970, and thus three years after, to make up for failures in the usage of contraception, they had to legalize abortion.

Lauren Kyfiuk said…

Amazing post Marc!
I (and I expect a good number of my colleagues) have been praying you write about this! Your website is revolutionary. Keep speaking shameless truth beautifully.
On behalf of the countless women and children who will benefit from this post, thank you.

Jeff Miller said…

Plus, add the further complication that some contraceptives are abortion-inducing themselves it seems to make that claim that throwing gasoline on the fire reduces the fire. Of course they would deny that contraceptives can act in this manner in regards to "the pill", but they don't have the same case in regards to the IUD and other forms – but instead they move the goal posts to implantation to ignore the connection.

Matt said…

For me, the connection between abortion and contraception is pretty clear. They both have the same purpose essentially: to prevent new life from developing. They also both tend uphold the same good over life: convenience. Most people who are pro-choice will not be able to see this connection. For them, it is useful to point out that abortion is often used as back-up contraception. That is, in case the condom breaks, there's always the morning after pill or a more invasive form of abortion. Although pro-choice people often like to bring up the scenario that involves a girl who was raped and now has to carry an illegitimate child to term, such situations are quite rare and the one that I described, in which a baby is killed so as to not be an inconvenience, is frighteningly common.

Beth Turner said…

It seems there are three ways to prevent the birth of a child: don't have sex, have sex with contraception, or have an abortion after achieving pregnancy. When you remove one option, you are bound to get an increase in rates of use of the other two. In "abortion cultures," abortion will sky-rocket when you remove contraception. But I bet rates of abstinence, including periodic abstinence like NFP, increase too, especially in cultures that resist abortion.

Maria said…

Great article!! Right now the Philippines wants to increase the use of contraception while abortion still remains legal. I fear that it soon will become legal as the new Reproduction Health Bill is passed to allow easier access to contraception for the whole population. I hope our government leaders read this and decide otherwise!

Wissen said…

Hi Marc! I have some issues with your post. I won't address every study or sentence, but I'll try to get the main points:

I'll preface this by saying that your entire "An honest look at the data shows that in virtually every country that increased the use of contraception, there was a simultaneous increase in the abortion rate," paragraph is a correlation, and thus, causation cannot be surmised. See the Guttmacher paper; there are much more confounding factors that can accompany these two phenomena.

For the Guttmacher study "Relationships Between Contraception and Abortion: A Review of the Evidence", you seem to only address and criticize the data where contraception use rise and abortion rates decline at the same time (in communist countries). However, you ignored similar results in non-communist Turkey, Tunisia and Switzerland. You only gave a passing glance to the countries where contraceptives and abortion rise initially, but then abortion rates fall as contraception continues to increase. The sentence, "This implies that contraception will eventually reduce the abortion rate in those countries as well," is inaccurate. We have observed this phenomenon in Denmark, United States, Netherlands, Singapore, and Korea.

"It's important to recognize that, while contraception has been a factor in many of the relative decreases in abortion around the world, it is as often a factor in relative increases around the world."

- Spanish study just a correlation. Authors even write, "The factors responsible for the increased rate of elective abortion need further investigation."
- In regards to the English program, "The under 18 conception rate is now 13.3 per cent lower than in 1998. While behind the trajectory needed to achieve the target to halve the teenage pregnancy rate by 2010, conceptions and births are at their lowest level for over 20 years" (https://www.education.gov.uk/publications/eOrderingDownload/00224-2010DOM-EN.pdf)
- U.S.: "…however, their use of contraception might have been inconsistent or incorrect. In 1995, when the most recent NSFG was conducted, approximately 29% of sexually active U.S. women who used only oral contraceptives for birth control reported that they missed a birth-control pill one or more times during the 3 months before their NSFG interview. In addition, approximately 33% of U.S. women who were using only coitus-dependent contraceptive methods during the 3 months before the interview used these methods inconsistently. At present, not all health insurance plans provide full contraceptive benefits. Therefore, education regarding improved contraceptive use and practices as well as access to and education regarding safe, effective, and affordable contraception and family-planning services might help reduce the incidence of unintended pregnancy and, therefore, might reduce the use of legal induced abortion in the United States."

"…family planning without the use of contraception." Contraception, as defined by Google, "The deliberate use of artificial methods or other techniques to prevent pregnancy as a consequence of sexual intercourse. "Fertility awareness would be still be considered a contraceptive method.

The whole rationale behind this piece seems to be this: Abortion rate increases with contraceptive use (even though abortion rates do decrease over time with increased contraceptive use but let's ignore that for now), therefore contraceptive use causes increased abortions.

Jude Law Guardian said…

"The message is clear: Because we have come to use contraception, we have come to need abortion."

WTF???????? HOW does this make ANY sense?? Unless you practice the ridiculous notion of sticking your head in the sand and pretending that people aren't going to have sex, contraception is the ONLY thing that has a chance of stopping pregnancy without having an abortion. Yeah. Let's all go back to the 1800's and turn women back into breeder chattel/baby factories/third-class citizens and put them back in their place so they can spawn tons of babies like so many litters of rats. Sounds like a plan–at least to the Religious Reich.

Bob said…

Apparently, it doesn't make any sense to you because you didn't take time to read the whole article or it's many sources. If you did, you would see that the article, at the VERY LEAST, makes some sense.

The only "ridiculous notion" here, as you say, is the one where you're pretending and assuming that human beings don't have any self-control to stop themselves from having sex with the first thing that moves at the end of the bar.

Related

- Philothea on Phire: Melinda Gates, 1flesh.org, and NFP (2012 July 16)
- Couple to Couple League: Interview with 1Flesh.org president (2014 February)
- Σ Frame: Contraception Correlations (2019 November 29)

Moon Day Review: Murder by Numbing

Jack · 12 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Be ye culturally and morally conformed to the matrihex by the relaxation of your will and the corruption of your minds!

Readership: All
Reader's Note: The title of this post might suggest the idea of medically assisted euthanasia to the reader. Although it fits well into this theme, there are no posts on this subject here. Instead, I mean to imply a cultural and moral euthanasia.
Length: 4,000 words
Reading Time: 14 minutes

Introduction

Believe it or not, 2019 November 12 is a moon day!

Back in late April 2019, when I started posting the Moon Day Review, the quarters of the moon phases just happened to fall on a Monday. Since then, the moon phases have shifted. This is because the time lapse between full moons (known as a Synodic month) is 29.530587981 days long. If you're wondering why there are 11 significant digits, the point at which a full moon occurs can be measured down to a fraction of a second. Each of the four intermediate phases lasts approximately seven days (7.38 days on average), but varies slightly due to lunar apogee and perigee.

The full moon in November is also called the Beaver Moon or the Frosty Moon.

The song featured on this edition is the punk jazz, Murder by Numbers, from the classic rock group, The Police.

1. PA World and Times: Looks like somebody is building an army (2019 November 4)

During the colonial age, the practice was to send large numbers of young, virile men into the region to be colonized, and let them do what young men do. The imperial monarchy gave them a rifle in case anyone disproved of their behaviors.

During the information/dissolution age, the practice is to send large numbers of young, virile men into the nation-state to be dissolved, and let them do what young men do. The cryptocracy passed supportive legislation in case anyone disproved of their behaviors.

It seems like every other news article is about gangs of "refugee" immigrants terrorizing the streets of Ireland, or Sweden, or Germany, or the next hometown nearest you.

What's this called? Reverse colonization? Or just Karmic revenge?

Nothing personal against POC's, but they don't belong in Europe, not men only, and not in those numbers. When will people wake up and realize that something must be done?

2. Scent of Time: Why War Is So Satisfying (2019 November 6)

> "War is an insanity dressed up in patriotic song and ceremony as though no one were really harmed in its wake. Perhaps this form of mega-violence has genetic origins. It weeds some people out while strengthening the most resilient. Perhaps it's a result of greed and opportunity to get what the neighbors have. It always seems to benefit industry. People have made money on war and are still doing so. It has brought fortunes to money > lenders, wealth to weapons manufacturers, the suppliers of leather, gunpowder, steel, all the stuff soldiers need to perform their butchery. Whatever the factors involved, war has been part of the order of our makeup.

>
> Once all sides of a major conflict have had enough, they want to "go home," to live out their days in peace recalling their time as a "band of brothers" living in ditches or deserts; they recall the "great guys" they met and related to. I heard this from my own father who had fought against the Russians — what great friends the guys from Berlin were. It seems that only war can bring men together in a common experience which forges tribal bonds through blood sacrifice.
>
> Recently, I watched a documentary in which ex-jihadis in the UK were interviewed to find out what motivated them to go killing people in faraway places. Redress for feelings of rejection and inferiority, and a lack of identity were commonly mentioned. So was venting one's anger. But there also was the experience of fraternity with like-minded souls being part of something "big". Losers back home were transformed into heroes in battles abroad. No one could doubt the masculinity of a man scarred by battle. Battle defines men as winners."

We laud ourselves as heroes, but fail to see how we have destroyed our heritage, and the homes of those abroad.

> "Most don't understand how they are being used by those who would never dream of sending their own flesh-and-blood to die on muddy battlefields. You don't usually find the offspring of the rich and powerful on the front lines, even if they are in uniform – not while Dad is making money manufacturing ammunition or promoting the war effort. And this is one reason why armed conflicts continue. The attraction of war remains; the reality of it escapes the mind. The fact that it is all a big racket doesn't seem to register among the patriotic hoopla".
>
> "It seems men will have to invent new ways to "test their metal". Perhaps through sports, extreme contests of endurance and the like, shared with the masses via broadcasts and social media participation. If so, this could be a step forward in our cultural evolution. But not all societies evolve along the same lines at the same time. There will remain areas where throwing rocks and launching rockets as rites of passage continues. While one segment of the world enjoys battle-action virtually, others will prefer the real thing, avenging old wrongs and creating new reasons to kill. But with the march of progress, eventually even these will be sitting in front of their plasma screens cheering each murder while snacking on potato chips".

The glory of war is over rated. No one seems to notice how it transforms societies, both home and abroad. But perhaps that is one of the elite's motivations for waging war. Are you content with the cultural and societal changes that continual war has wrought on your region of the world?

3. Shadow to Light: What do Mass Shooters Believe? (2019 November 6)

The war is not only abroad, but also at home. The boy next door grows up in a broken family, and comes to see his only shot at glory and meaning in life is in taking the lives of others.

> "I spent an unhealthy amount of time learning about the inner thoughts of mass murderers (including dozens who were not included in my sample due to the shootings being older or having lower casualties). It's only right that I share a few big takeaways from this unpleasant deep dive:
>
> - Nearly the entire list is composed of people holding to just 4 fringe ideologies: nihilist atheism, occultism, white nationalism, and Islamic extremism.
> - Self-described atheists make up the largest single ideology among high-casualty mass shooters.
> - The high percentage of atheist and agnostic shooters persists when you expand the list to include high-casualty shootings before 1999, when mass shootings were much less common.

> - The pattern also holds if you expand the list to include fewer than 10 casualties.
> - The only self-described Christians on the list are the two white nationalist shooters. However, an expanded list of white nationalist terrorists reveals a wide variety of philosophies among them, including atheism, agnosticism, and paganism, as well as unorthodox forms of Christianity. The white nationalist in Norway who murdered over 70 people, for example, worships the god Odin.
> - Although standard Protestants and Catholics are nearly nonexistent on the rolls of mass shooters, they seem to make up the vast majority of the victims, with religious Jews also overrepresented among the dead. …prayer circles, churches, synagogues, and individual Christians are targeted by mass shooters.
> - Whites are represented by 12 of the 20 shooters, which is right in line with the percentage of whites in the general U.S. population. The rest of the shooters are a very diverse mix, with Latino/Hispanics not represented at all and nationalities from Islamic countries a bit overrepresented. This suggests that race is NOT a determining factor in the making of a mass shooter, but ideology is.
> - It also appears to be a myth that school shooters are commonly bullied by peers. In the cases where school shooters even attend the school they target, they are more likely to have been bullies themselves, acting cruelly to others for no reason. It is also very common for school shooters to have delusional fantasies of persecution with no bearing in reality. The myth of the "bullied school shooter" has caused a great deal of harm, as aspiring school shooters often idolize and romanticize past shooters, who they mistakenly view as martyrs fighting back against mistreatment.
> - [My impressions after concluding this study] confirmed the reports by others that white mass shooters tend to be effeminate or physically weak males, often with no father at home. Claiming that "traditional masculinity", "machismo", or "gender conformity" is behind mass shootings seems not only inaccurate, but downright dishonest, seeing that masculine qualities were in much more abundance in past eras, when mass shootings were nearly unheard of and boys shot pellet guns with their dads while pretending to be John Wayne. Given the facts, it is much more likely that a lack of healthy and natural masculinity may be a contributing factor to mass shootings.
> - Gun control, and a focus on gun ownership, is something of a red herring. Most violent crime, including gun murder, has been declining since the early 1990's, at the same time that private gun ownership has greatly increased. In earlier decades, it was common for guns such as hunting rifles to be on school grounds. (Some of the earliest "school shooting" incidents were accidents involving actual guns used as props in school plays.) The idea of mass-murdering classmates was simply unthought of. Until the mid-1930's it was even possible for children to buy actual submachine guns through the mail, no background check required. What seems to have enabled the recent increase in mass shootings is not access to guns, but a willingness to use them to kill random people; a willingness that simply wasn't there in the past.
> - The plea to focus on mental illness also seems illogical, given that mental illness has always been present, and treatment for mental illness is believed to be much more effective than in the past, when mass shootings were rare. If these shootings are the result of increased mental anxiety, then what's making us all go crazy in such a specific way all of a sudden? And how is it that most religious Americans are immune to this illness, which only produces mass-shooting affects in radical Islamists, nihilist atheists, occultists and white supremacists?

A follow up post, The Mass Shooters, reveals a statistical breakdown of the data, and a pie chart of the number of shooting incidences according to the perpetrators ideology.

The number of shooting incidences, and the number of people killed, according to the perpetrators ideology

Religious Typology	Shootings (%)	Killed (%)
Atheist/Agnostic	8 (44.4%)	195 (53.6%)
Islamic	3 (16.7%)	77 (21.2%)
White Nationalist	2 (11.1%)	33 (9.1%)
Unknown	4 (22.2%)	47 (12.9%)
Buddhist	1 (5.6%)	12 (3.3%)
Total	18	364

https://shadowtolight.wordpress.com/2019/11/06/the-mass-shooters/

4. Spiritual Insights for Everyday Life (Lee Woofenden): Are We Headed for an AI Apocalypse? (2019 November 10)

The fear of Mr. Roboto has been hanging over our heads since the early 1980's. Lee Woofenden addresses this head on.

> "What all of the materialistic scientists and philosophers are studiously avoiding is the oldest, and I believe the best, solution to the mind-body problem: that consciousness exists on a distinct level of reality, traditionally known as spiritual reality. In other words, that consciousness is not a property of physical reality at all, but instead is a property of spiritual reality. Or in plain terms, that we have consciousness because we have a soul.
>
> And on this basis my rational mind, which does not feel the need to reject the reality of God and spirit, is perfectly comfortable stating that consciousness is not a property of physical reality, but of spiritual reality.
>
> More specifically, I would define consciousness as the activity of the human will and understanding, which are the basic "components" of the human spirit. The will is the seat of all human love, motivation, feeling, and emotion. The understanding is the seat of all human knowledge, understanding, intellect, and thought. Together with the ability to act on our understanding from our will, these are the human soul or spirit.
>
> Further, our spirit is our life. When our spirit departs from our body, the body dies, decomposes, and returns to the earth it came from. Animals, I believe, also have souls, complete with an earth-focused version of will and understanding. Even plants have a rudimentary soul, or they would not be alive. Inanimate objects such as rocks and water are not alive because they do not have a soul."

Very well. Plants and animals may be sentient and willful, but I'm not sure about them having eternal souls.

> "Does this mean that if we build computers with 100 billion circuits and ten trillion connections, they will become conscious; and that if we then connect them to machines with thirty-seven trillion components, they will not only be able to think for themselves, but also put those thoughts into action? And become our robot overlords?
>
> From a materialistic perspective, this seems like a real possibility. (Though even many materialistic scientists and philosophers don't think so.)
>
> However, from a spiritual perspective, it seems highly unlikely, if not impossible. That's because unlike their human creators, computers and machines are not alive. They do not have souls."

Woofenden seems to take comfort in the fact that AI technology does not have a conscious soul, presuming that a lack of consciousness is what renders it harmless. But on the other hand, a thinking entity with sufficient agency and a lack of conscious self-awareness is precisely what makes mass murderers so lethal. AI will do what it is programmed to do, and the sentient being(s) behind the programming may very well lack a conscience.

Not only AI, but conscious human beings can also be programmed, as the next post shows.

5. Hawaiian Libertarian: Regularly Scheduled Programming: The Delphi Technique (2019 November 9)

HL cites an article by Albert V. Burns from the Hawaii Free Press.

> More and more, we are seeing citizens being invited to "participate" in various forms of meetings, councils, or boards to "help determine" public policy in one field or another. They are supposedly being included to get "input" from the public to help officials make final decisions on taxes, education, community growth or whatever the particular subject matter might be.
>
> Sounds great, doesn't it? Unfortunately, surface appearances are often deceiving.
>
> You, Mr. or Mrs. Citizen, decide to take part in one of these meetings.
>
> Generally, you will find that there is already someone designated to lead or "facilitate" the meeting. Supposedly, the job of the facilitator is to be a neutral, non-directing helper to see that the meeting flows smoothly.
>
> Actually, he or she is there for exactly the opposite reason: to see that the conclusions reached during the meeting are in accord with a plan already decided upon by those who called the meeting.
>
> The process used to "facilitate" the meeting is called the Delphi Technique. This Delphi Technique was developed by the RAND Corporation for the U.S. Department of Defense back in the 1950's. It was originally intended for use as a psychological weapon during the cold war.
>
> However, it was soon recognized that the steps of Delphi could be very valuable in manipulating ANY meeting toward a predetermined end.
>
> How does the process take place? The techniques are well developed and well defined.
>
> First, the person who will be leading the meeting, the facilitator or Change Agent must be a likable person with whom those participating in the meeting can agree or sympathize.
>
> It is, therefore, the job of the facilitator to find a way to cause a split in the audience, to establish one or a few of the people as "bad guys" while the facilitator is perceived as the "good guy".
>
> Facilitators are trained to recognize potential opponents and how to make such people appear aggressive, foolish, extremist, etc. Once this is done, the facilitator establishes himself or herself as the "friend" of the rest of the audience.

> The stage is now set for the rest of the agenda to take place. At this point, the audience is generally broken up into “discussion—or ‘breakout’—groups” of seven or eight people each. Each of these groups is to be led by a subordinate facilitator.
>
> Within each group, discussion takes place of issues, already decided upon by the leadership of the meeting. Here, too, the facilitator manipulates the discussion in the desired direction, isolating and demeaning opposing viewpoints.
>
> Generally, participants are asked to write down their ideas and disagreements with the papers to be turned in and “compiled” for general discussion after the general meeting is reconvened. This is the weak link in the chain, which you are not supposed to recognize. Who compiles the various notes into the final agenda for discussion? Ahhhh! Well, it is those who are running the meeting.
>
> How do you know that the ideas on your notes were included in the final result? You Don’t! You may realize that your idea was not included and come to the conclusion that you were probably in the minority. Recognize that every other citizen member of this meeting has written his or her likes or dislikes on a similar sheet of paper and they, too, have no idea whether their ideas were “compiled” into the final result! You don’t even know if anyone’s ideas are part of the final “conclusions” presented to the reassembled group as the “consensus” of public opinion. Rarely does anyone challenge the process, since each concludes that he or she was in the minority and different from all the others.
>
> So, now, those who organized the meeting in the first place are able to tell the participants and the rest of the community that the conclusions, reached at the meeting, are the result of public participation.
>
> Actually, the desired conclusions had been established, in the back room, long before the meeting ever took place. There are variations in the technique to fit special situations but, in general, the procedure outlined above takes place.
>
> The natural question to ask here is: If the outcome was preordained before the meeting took place, why have the meeting? Herein lies the genius of this Delphi Technique.
>
> It is imperative that the general public believe that this program is theirs! They thought it up!
>
> They took part in its development! Their input was recognized!
>
> If people believe that the program is theirs, they will support it. If they get the slightest hint that the program is being imposed upon them, they will resist.

If you’re recoiling in shock, thinking this is a “conspiwicy theowy”, then you’re rather sheltered and naïve. Orwell tried to warn us. Freem@sons and many other (((people))) have used this technique to slink into every board of authority in Churches, social groups, and all levels of government, over the past century. They don’t do it anymore, because they’re already in power, and they don’t need to recruit any more henchmen. The game for power is now in its final stages.

> 6. Hommunism: Things you are not allowed to say anymore (2019 November 10)

Since you’re not in power, you need to follow the script, or else, shut up! The author offers a hefty list of words, phrases and “microagressions” that are no longer permitted in polite, no-white society. Read this so that you’ll know how to coexist with those who are programmed. And just in case you think you can escape from Big Brother (heh heh), read the next article.

7. Practical Eschatology: In The Country No One Can Hear You Scream... (2019 November 6)

This news has received bountiful attention on the Manosphere. Nine members of a Mormon family were killed in an ambush on a dirt road between Chihuahua and Sonora states in northern Mexico. Women and children received no mercy.

8. Σ Frame: How the Pill Kills (2019 October 15)

The danger not only comes from society and abroad, but is chemically ubiquitous, even within our midst. Industries and special interest groups who prey on the particular weaknesses of women is another manifestation of the blight.

Citing several sources, there are four mechanisms that hormonal contraceptives are known to cause the death of women.

1. The progestins in the pill increase blood clotting, leading to thrombosis, embolisms, infarctions, and strokes.
2. The metabolites of estrogen in the pill are carcinogenic agents which increase a woman's chances of developing cancer.
3. Regular use of the pill increases the chance of contracting and transmitting a lethal illness or infection (i.e. HIV, human papilloma virus).
4. Use of the pill statistically increases the chance of dying from accidents or violence (i.e. homicide).

In the United States alone, 136 to 260 healthy women die from venous thromboembolism (VTE) caused by hormonal contraception every year. When that risk is combined with the added risk of stroke and heart attack, between three and four hundred women die every year in the United States due to their choice to use hormonal contraception. For more, see the page on Abortion and Contraception (coming soon).

9. Blending Ame: The Default Safest Parent for Children (2019 November 5)

We have been blindsided by women's particular weaknesses. Ame highlights the moment her eyes were opened through the late SFC Ton's insightful observations.

> "…women do not naturally, by default of being a woman, always have the best interest of their children at heart. Women do not naturally, by default of being a woman, make the best choices for their children. Women do not naturally, by default, love their children more than men. Women do not naturally, by default, sacrifice themselves for their children.
>
> And it is the women who are killing their own babies in their wombs. 1.3 million women killing 1.3 million babies, in their wombs, every. single. year.
>
> The Ton was the first one to confront me with this truth, and I have to admit that I was shocked. I had to take time to ponder this… a long time.
>
> Here's a comment from Ton about women, abortion, and divorce:
>
> SFC Ton
> Women care more about babies then men?
> Bullfuckingshit. #1) Abortion would be illegal if only men voted. #2) Women abuse childern, their own biological childern way more often then men. #3) Divorce stats show its women breaking up babies.
>
> A quick internet search showed that more women file for divorce than men, splitting up the home, separating their children from their fathers. Another quick internet search showed that more mothers abuse their children than fathers.
>
> People… this is… shocking!"

10. Cristian Mihai: The Edge (2019 November 8)

If things are looking hopeless, there is yet hope in Christ. Christian Mihai reminds us that…

> "…life's all about what we consider to be valuable to us. Where we put value, that's what we're afraid to lose. And if you put value in things you can't lose or things you have absolute control of, that's when you can escape the edge."

[19] "Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moths and rust destroy, and where thieves break in and steal. [20] But lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where moths nor rust destroy, and where thieves do not break in and steal. [21] For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also." ~ Matthew 6:19-21 (NKJV)

11. Aleteia: Hong Kong's protesters adopt Christian hymn as their call to action (2019 June 23)

Christ may be our only hope. There are 7 million people in Hong Kong, and 2 million are protesting on the streets… and they're singing Christian hymns as an expression of unity and passive resistance! The signs of the times!

Conclusions

Ze verdict is clear, deer komrades!

- The armies are forming.
- You want what's coming.
- The enemy is within, even YOU!
- You're too lazy and complacent to act in your best interests.
- No "God" anesthesia for the masses.
- Technology and the state will be your lord and master.
- No blissful civil unions allowed.
- Few or no children.
- Women, take your pill.
- No freedom.
- Nowhere to hide.
- No safehaven for family or progeny.
- Do not exercise independent, critical thought.

Now verily I say unto thee, for the sake of "peace" and "safety", forfeit thine free will and be ye programmed into the matrihex, heart and soul!

Related

- Dark Brightness: This Week In Reaction (2019 November 9)
- Collective Evolution (feat. Carmen Di Luccio): Full Moon In Taurus: Growth & Perseverance (2019 November 11)

Putting evil in perspective

Jack · 15 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

What is evil? Are governments evil? Are Jews evil? Is apathy evil?

Readership: All

My previous Moon Day Review: Murder by Numbing (2019 November 12), cited a post from Hawaiian Libertarian: Regularly Scheduled Programming: The Delphi Technique (2019 November 9). I added the following comment.

> "If you're recoiling in shock, thinking this is a "conspiwicy theowy", then you're rather sheltered and naïve. Orwell tried to warn us. Freem@sons and many other (((people))) have used this technique to slink into every board of authority in Churches, social groups, and all levels of government, over the past century. They don't do it anymore, because they're already in power, and they don't need to recruit any more henchmen. The game for power is now in its final stages."

Ray retorted,

> "I didn't realize you were a Teddy Beale acolyte. I do not believe that the (((Jews))) are the hidden power behind the world's evil (although the Freemasons certainly are a major player). No real Christian believes that 'the Jews' as a whole are evil, either.
>
> Neither would any real Christian place parentheses around such names in a cowardly effort to pre-judge them. I will not be visiting your page any more. Good luck with the Jew-hate, I don't think you will like where it ends."

Ray is making a few assumptions here that I need to address.

1. That I am a disciple of Teddy Beale.
2. That I believe Jews are the hidden power behind the world's evil.
3. That I'm anti-Semitic.
4. That I have a fear of those in power.
5. That those in power are inherently evil.

Out of respect for Ray's viewpoint (and others like him), I'll respond to each of these assumptions.

1. I had to do an internet search to find out who Teddy Beale is. It turns out to be Vox Day, one of the original dukes of the Manosphere. It just so happens that I link to his (older) posts frequently, and list two of his blogs on my blogroll. I don't know him well as a person, but it is sufficient to say that Vox is an intelligent man with some piercing insights that have contributed heavily to the library of RP philosophy. While I respect him for his contributions, I wouldn't assume all his beliefs (nor anyone else's) are suitable for every man. If Ray would like to explain exactly what he means by a "Teddy Beale acolyte", then I'll be happy to comment on whether I agree or not.
2. There is no question that Jewish individuals occupy an overly proportionate number of positions of power and authority in the world. Jews are "effective" because (in general) their culture adheres to God's Laws of creation (at least better than most others). The Chinese are also quite adept at garnering fiscal power for similar reasons.
3. I try to hedge my mind against the intersectional oppression and progressive stack mentality that is wielded to bludgeon simple speech. I suppose there are some equalists or SJW's who would be offended by someone stating the assertions in (2) as facts. But I don't believe there is anything offensive about how certain cultures, races, or organizations appear as dominant in various social forums. That's just how it is. But it does seem like privileged Raycissism to the matriculated mind!

4. Personally, I feel that those individuals, cultures, races, or organizations that appear dominant deserve our respect, and we would do well to learn something from their examples. However, some of my writings employ paronomasia, and are cynically amplified for constitutive rhetorical effect. (Clue: If you ever read text written in comical accents (e.g. "Ve has ben veiting for eau!"), then you know I'm there.) This style is intended to allow readers to contemplate reality from a transcendent point of view, and perhaps laugh at the incongruencies. I expect readers to accept my existentialist literary adventures as explorations of the authentic heart and the imaginative mind, and not as an incitement to foment an Oktoberfest revolution.
5. There is an interesting phenomenon that you may have noticed, and this is the fact that self-serving individuals are more prone to seek out positions of power, whereas, honest, peace loving individuals prefer to avoid the limelight. But is it fair to say that anyone in power must therefore be evil? Not really, because the Bible indicates that God ordains the authorities that we have over us. They are put in place for our own good. (See Romans 13:1-7.)

Simply put, there's no hate here on Jewish race or culture (unless you take indifference or satire as an expression of hate). I will just say that those who respect and follow God's order are likely to find themselves holding greater responsibility and influence in a power play.

*Rasputin – The Dissolution

What defines "evil"?

The question of "evil" is more complicated and requires a wider Frame. Recently, I came across a comprehensive, yet concise description of evil that is worth quoting here. I agree with the majority of it, but I'm not sure I fully agree with a few minor viewpoints (which I didn't quote here). The relevant excerpts follow.

Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): Meditations on Evil (17 October 2019).

> "The paradox of evil is that most evil things do not intend to be evil. Some intend to be good… Others are simply opportunists."

> "The idea of people making "moral choices" appeals because it is simple, but really it simply reads in egalitarianism. It presumes that everyone is capable of the same level of making choices, when in fact some are broken, retarded, insane, or dysfunctional to varying degrees."

The only egalitarian principle that could be entertained is that all human beings have glorified God in some capacity, while at the same time, all have sinned.

> "Evil then represents less of a moral choice than a mental state. Someone who is motivated by revenge against the world will have a desire to control which does not consider the consequences of its acts; control is a closed-circuit loop, a sealed feedback cycle, in which control only exists to perpetuate control and everything else is a means to that end."

Evil is manifested in the vanity of the mind. Do we believe that God is sovereign, or do men have the ultimate authority over their destiny?

> "It is He who changes the times and the epochs; He removes kings and establishes kings; He gives wisdom to wise men and knowledge to men of understanding." ~ Daniel 2:21

*Putin – The Way

> "This leads us to ask whatever might be the problem with evil since it obviously leads to success…"
>
> "…evil sucks when you look at it in the long term… because it is a lesser option. You could have had good, which requires waiting awhile for your reward, but instead you opted for evil because a short-term reward is tangible and immediate and therefore seems universal and absolute. With evil, you can have the power you crave right away, instead of laboring on something to have it take root and prosper and then spread…"
>
> "In this sense, evil represents the triumph of the tangible over the transcendent…"

Humans are tempted to cling to the simplistic idea that evil is anything that creates suffering, hardship, or even inconvenience. It would be more truthful to say that anything that carries us further away from God and His order of things is evil. But we are not as acutely cognizant of such machinations.

> "Evil… consists of the disordered. Where an ordered mind finds meaning in existence and works to adapt to it and then maximize that role not just for individual benefit but so that life continues to be awesome as a thing in itself, a mind afflicted with disorder never connects to anything beyond its vessel and therefore, ends up collapsing in on itself."

Imagine… If you were an omnipotent deity wouldn't you prefer to use a powerful, influential person (or group of people) to execute your purposes, instead of someone "off the grid" (so to speak)? To make it more nuanced, God's idea of who is powerful is not the same as what we might assume.

I believe God (or Satan) will coopt anyone who fits into His plans and cooperates with the program, sometimes whether they are aware of it or not, and this is not limited to Jews, Protestants, Catholics, Democrats, the Alt-Right, or even those who hold power.

> "When people talk about equality, they are actually saying "good includes evil" and "evil is only that which rejects including evil in the category good". This shows a type of compensatory logic where, fearing their own inner evil, they pretend it does not exist."
>
> "Interestingly, the view of evil that sees it as external — Satan, Hitler, money, power — serves only to obscure the reality that evil consists not of choices, but of a failure to make them, and that this reflects an inner inability, failing, or damage (insanity, abuse, pathology)."

This quote in bold gets to the point of Ray's comment. Saying that Jews are evil would apply here as well.

> "Nietzsche had a point on getting beyond good and evil. Our use of the terms renders them useless. When we see evil as a lack of ordered thought, caused by internal chaos, as a result from externalizing our decisions and projecting instead of engaging in self-discipline, the terms regain meaning."

My own experience correlates with what Stevens is describing in the last two paragraphs cited above. God doesn't judge me or hold me responsible for a bad decision or a bad outcome nearly as much as He does when I fail to take any action at all.

On a side note, I tend to believe that the increased responsibility concomitant with personal development (or the fear thereof) is why certain individuals prefer NOT to get too close to God.

All the best in your search for a body of authority void of evil!

Jesus – The Way, the Truth, and the Life

 Rasputin (Распу́тин) is a variation of "crossroads" (распутье), or "dissolution" (распутный) in Russian – a fitting name for the spiritual advisor of the Romanovs just before the October Revolution. Whereas, Putin (Пу́тин) is a variation of "path" or "way" (путь) – also a fitting name for his role in restoring the glory of Russia.*

Related

- Radix Fidem: Wealth, Power and Evil (2012 February 11)
- Σ Frame: Where is your life headed? (2019 February 8)
- Σ Frame: Yankee Stay Home! (2019 February 12)
- Σ Frame: Paul Harvey "If I were the devil" (2019 August 24)
- Radix Fidem: Most Government Is Inherently Evil (2019 August 21)

The Evils of Solipsism

Jack · 19 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Some thoughts about truth, solipsism, and evil, in response to Brett Stevens (Amerika.org).

Readership: All

My post from last month, Unconditional Atonement, Limited Election (18 October 2019), examined some Calvinistic beliefs and reflections on Good vs. Evil, and it attracted a hefty response from two noteworthy individuals.

- Radix Fidem (feat. Ed Hurst): Riding Herd on Sinners (18 October 2019)
- Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): How Religions View Solipsism (18 October 2019)

Ed's post cleared up our understanding of the differences between "goats" and "cattle", parabolic archetypes that he and I had used in describing different types of people and their contributions to society.

Brett's response has continued to act as a goad to my contemplations. This post contains some of the proceedings.

On Objective Truth and Intelligence

First of all, I cannot claim to be a wizard of Truth, nor am I an expert of theology. In my writings, I am merely reporting what I have learned, perceived, or experienced. But I have the confidence to write such things because, (1) I believe God is working in and through my life, and (2) I am the primary authority of my own testimony (unless you count God himself as the author). I postulate that one's testimony of faith must be based on one's own perceptions of, and experiences with God. I believe that Calvin, Wesley, et al. attained their own recognitions of Christ and the Gospel through a similar approach.

I believe this is what Stevens was getting at when he wrote,

> "[Nihilism] does not deny external reality, only the term "objective truth," because truth requires a perceiver; a truth is a statement about reality, not part of the world beyond our heads. Reality is consistent and "objective," but no truths can be."

I'm not sure how Nihilism fits into this argument, but I agree with the next clause, in that a testimony of faith is a statement of one's subjective experience of Truth. But I disagree with his claim that there cannot be any Truth that might exist outside of the observance of man. What evidence do we have that mankind is fully aware of all Truth? There is strong evidence to the contrary though, namely in the fact that different people have different perceptions of truth.

Stevens explains this difference by the variance in intelligence and awareness.

> "…nihilism recognizes that we humans are antennas, and some are able to catch more signal than others. Some are pointed in the wrong direction; some are broken. This model explains why people can have radically different perceptions, including insanity, of the same object. […]
>
> Unlike almost all modern theories, nihilism takes into account the variation between human beings. A dumb person will not perceive as much as a smart person, nor will an insane person observe as much as a sane person. There are varying degrees of intelligence and sanity affecting level of accuracy."

It could be possible that I am one of those lacking sufficient intelligence to apprehend truth, so maybe I'm short of understanding in my reading. But it seems like Stevens is saying that the intelligentsia have cornered the market on truth. If the definition of truth is confined to a philosophical exercise in logic (e.g. a truth statement: A= B, true or false?), then I might agree that there is a moderate correlation. Intelligent individuals will naturally be more aware of certain logical truths, or else, able to determine their existence and value, and therefore be able to utilize them more effectively.

However, if you believe that Truth is a living, sentient entity which interacts with reality and affects perception, then there are a multitude of states which exclude one from the knowledge of truth, chief among them are foolhardiness and a lack of discernment. I believe that prescient discernment takes precedence over one's intelligence, in the ability to discern Truth. Furthermore, morality is determined through discernment, not by religious doctrines nor philosophy.

On Solipsism and Foolish Ignorance

Stevens defines basic human solipsism as the condition in which

> "…we find our thoughts to be more real and easily mentally digestible than that world out there, so we tend to defer to our own judgments, sensations, emotions, memories, and instincts instead of trying to puzzle out the world."

From a spiritual perspective, such is one's experience when one is lacking discernment and understanding – hallmarks of foolhardiness.

> "A fool has no delight in understanding, But in expressing his own heart." ~ Proverbs 18:2 (NKJV)

So foolishness is not caused by a lack of intellect, but rather a focus on the subjective which precludes prescient foresight.

> "Folly is joy to him who is destitute of discernment, But a man of understanding walks uprightly." ~ Proverbs 15:21 (NKJV)

In other words, foolishness is a type of moral solipsism and spiritual blindness that excludes discernment and morality.

Stevens goes on,

> "Again, solipsism applies in different degrees, probably creating a standard distribution in any population. The Dunning-Kruger effect applies; anything more complex than the mind of the person perceiving will not be understood."

So we are all fools to some degree.

Although there may exist some correlation, certainly, intelligence cannot (always) be taken as a (true) measure of sanctification (i.e. one's ability to discern truth). Likewise, it is a mistake to assume that foolishness, or solipsism, is the opposite of intelligence, or awareness, respectively.

Going back to the earlier section on Truth, if one is foolish and without discernment, there is then such Truth beyond one's awareness. In this case, one's ignorance of the matter would render it objective by definition (not influenced by personal feelings, interpretations, or prejudices). This could be rephrased in a Descartes-like truth statement.

> "Ego stultum, ergo verum rectus existit."

Which is translated as,

> "I am foolish, therefore, objective truth exists."

The Dunning-Kruger effect may apply here as well.

Relativism vs. Solipsism

Stevens offered this about Relativism.

> "…relativism… holds that whatever you perceive is absolutely true, as if each person lived in a universal and absolute universe of their own where what they perceive is fully accurate."

Relativism is valuable if it makes one sensitive to the context of a situation, but Steven's description of relativism sounds like the subjective experience of a solipsistic individual. The problem with using perception as a source of truth is that perception is highly subjective. If one is unintelligent (as Stevens emphasizes), or under a curse, or angry, or bitter, or distrustful, or strongly biased because of any reason, then perception will be skewed accordingly.

Collectivism, Self-Reliance, and Solipsism

In the afore cited post, I wrote,

> "God has no intentions of either enhancing the world, nor destroying it, but only to use it to break mankind's bent towards spiritual self-reliance, and bring them into His fold. Power, money, and control are just the means by which people often seek to avert a self-death, and that is what makes the desire for these things evil."

Since then, the term "spiritual self-reliance" has introduced some confusion. Brett Stevens responded,

> "…in my view, spiritual self-reliance is the only way to find God; the question is not self or God, but how disciplined the self is, because a mentally disciplined self (i.e. clear, realistic thinking; we are not speaking of cleaning your closet or eating your vegetables here) will naturally find God, since God is a part of reality, and therefore, will become evident the more is understood. […]"

I struggled to come up with the term "spiritual self-reliance", because I'm reaching for an abstract concept that is difficult to put into words. The word "sin" might be the traditionally correct term, but it's too clichéd to carry any meaningfulness. But Stevens makes the association that spiritual self-reliance (my expression) is more or less equivalent to solipsism (his expression). We might be getting lost in the woods and definitions here, but if I understand him correctly, I agree with him. But I wish to emphasize that solipsism can take on a spiritual or existential dimension, as opposed to merely the intellectual or emotional concepts of solipsism.

Solipsism is defined as,

1. In philosophy, the theory that only the self exists, or can be proved to exist.
2. Extreme preoccupation with and indulgence of one's feelings, desires, etc.; egoistic self-absorption.

I realize that this is an esoteric concept, so I'll offer a few arguments (labeled as "examples"), that are more readily comprehendible to the reader, and open to discussion.

Example 1: If solipsism is the belief that only the self exists, then on a higher plane, spiritual solipsism might be defined as the belief that only humanity and the material world exists, and it is implied that god, metaphysics, and the paranormal does not exist. Thus, spiritual solipsism is essentially atheism in its simplest form. This view highlights the fact that atheists generally refuse to take a mystical approach, to look beyond whatever information they can readily apprehend through their various senses and faculties of reason.

> "The fool hath said in his heart, "There is no God." ~ Psalm 14:1 (NKJV)

Example 2: In the comments at Amerika, The Crow left this description of "thinking", which Stevens identified as solipsism.

> "Useful idiots think. Thinking is the epitome of evil. Thinking describes a state of evil, without addressing or rectifying it.
>
> Evil is the result of abstraction: removing oneself from Reality, and finding fault with it."

The Crow is describing what I called spiritual self-reliance in my earlier post. So it does seem that Stevens and I got hung up on the definitions of terms. The descriptions bear this out.

It is interesting to see that The Crow identifies "thinking" as the basis for the problem of evil, but thinking is merely the human faculty that locks one into a state of solipsism, or spiritual self-reliance (or "sin"). This view conforms to the superficially mystical adage, "There is nothing either good or bad, but thinking makes it so." The falsehood of this adage lies in the fact that there exists good and evil outside of one's conscious contemplations and faculties of cognitive judgment. That is to say, if one is unaware that something is evil, or misidentifies it as something good, this ignorance/misnomer does not make it any less evil, it only means that one is naïve/deceived. Those who call good evil, and evil good are described as "perverted". This speaks to the problem of how the solipsistic mind seeks to avert a confrontation with the unpleasant or difficult aspects of evil (or holiness) either through denial or rebranding evil as good (or vice versa). The thinking of a matter has nothing to do with whether the issue is good or bad. It has everything to do with how one confronts and adapts to the realities of good and evil.

Moreover, thinking is not entirely evil, as it can also be used to help the soul navigate through the confusion that arises from convoluted definitions of abstract concepts (such as solipsism or spiritual self-reliance), and form comprehensive and prescriptive models of abstract realities.

The Bible speaks to this issue as well.

> "And do not be conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind, that you may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God." ~ Romans 12:2 (NKJV)

Note that the Bible does NOT say, "…be transformed by the rejection of your mind…", as if though our thoughts and reason are anathema to a healthy spiritual life.

Example 3: A new reader (Julia) left the following comment under an older post.

> "Some "red pilled" [authors] say women are collectivists, [while] others say women are solipsists. Is this not contradictory?"

On the face of it, collectivism and solipsism do seem to be incompatible, but there's more to it. Solipsism was defined earlier, while collectivism is defined as…

1. The political principle of centralized social and economic control, especially of all means of production.
2. A value that is characterized by emphasis on cohesiveness among individuals and prioritization of the group over the self.

I believe Julia is referring to how women adhere to the social values delineated in the second definition, although women are also known to prefer the social values prescribed by the first.

Perhaps the easiest way to address this question is in terms of agency, and varying degrees of solipsism. Women are not prone to exercise agency, and less so if they happen to be extremely solipsistic. As a result of this diffuse locus of self-control, they tend to follow a “herd mentality”, which means that they rely on their social group to guide them, encourage them, and keep them in line.

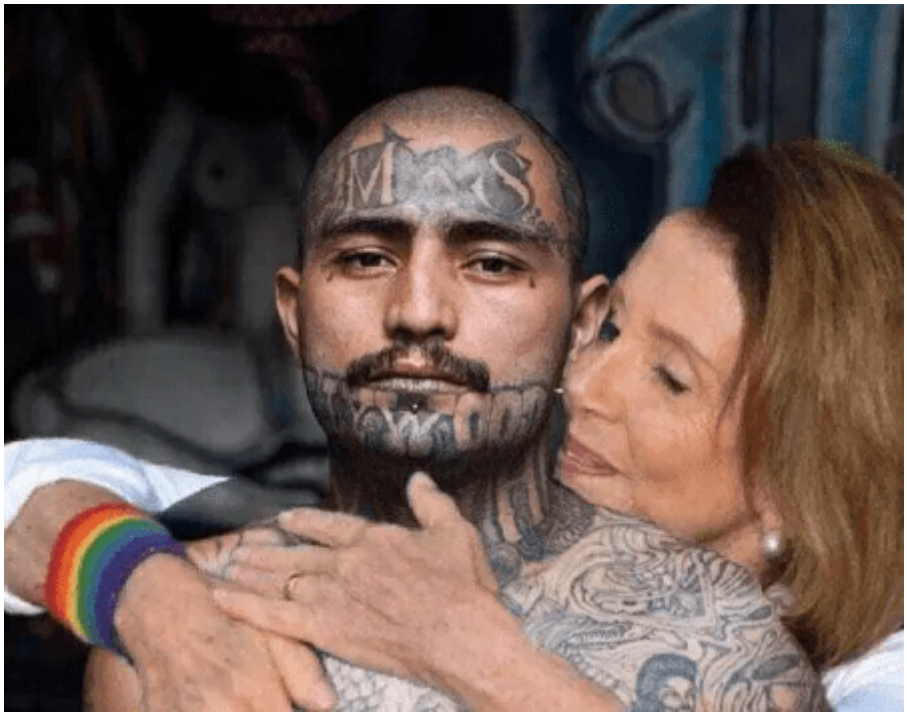
Individuals or groups that subscribe to a collectivist worldview demonstrate greater orientation toward in-group than toward out-group, and they tend to find common values and goals as particularly salient. The in-group chosen will naturally conform to each woman’s relative value system and goals in life. One qualification that is particularly important to women these days for choosing the in-group is that the in-group should not challenge her solipsistic ego nor upset her Feeelz.

One well known way to vet a woman is to review what kind of company she keeps.



What is “spiritual self-reliance”?

The answer to Julia’s question can be coopted to address the same issue of confusion highlighted in Steven’s post (namely, what is meant by the term “spiritual self-reliance”), albeit within a different context. To make the associations clearer to the reader, I’ll offer these trite equivalencies to be used in the following discussion.

- Solipsism describes the isolation of the heart and mind.
- Collectivism describes the need for mutual support, cooperation, and guidance, among other things. It is assumed that collectivists are not entirely self-sufficient.

When Stevens asserted that “spiritual self-reliance is the only way to find God”, I am sure he was referring to the abandonment of human collectivism (and solipsism) as a path to find personal fulfillment and purpose in life, and then looking within and above to discover one’s connection to God. My original concept of spiritual self-reliance carried somewhat of the opposite meaning, in that one relies upon one’s self (and not God) in establishing and defending a solipsistic mindset in one’s approach to find a human collectivist meaning in life. The Biblical story of the Tower of Babel spells out the folly of this approach, and how God has decreed that such endeavors will never come to fruition. (See Genesis 11:1-9.)

In conclusion, “spiritual self-reliance” is a poor term that needs to be further defined and qualified by context to carry a unique meaning in discourse. So I believe it’s better to stick to the term “sin”, and to be aware that our minds naturally want to jump around that fact.

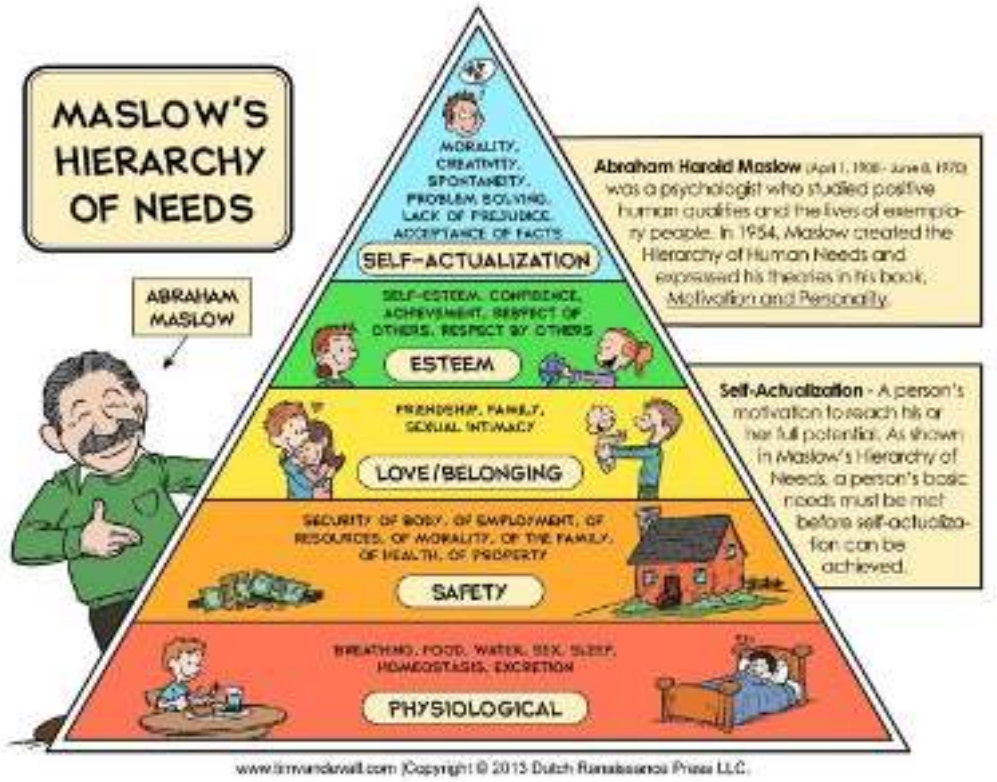
Solipsism and the Dunning-Kruger effect

Stevens cited the Dunning-Kruger effect to explain how solipsism comes in varying degrees. He elaborates further on this point.

> "In your average population, ten percent of the people may be close to self-actualized, ten percent will never approach any degree of self-actualization, and most are in the middle, which means that they have small glimpses of accurate statements about themselves and reality in the midst of a mental muddle of impulses, reactions, fears, and hopes."

This 10% figure seems to agree with what I've heard from a couple pastors who ascertained that only 10% of their congregation are "real Christians". Yet, the overwhelming majority of church-goers will claim that they are Christians, thereby proving the Dunning-Kruger effect.

Maybe these populations are not equivalent, but could it be that many people perceive (and so subconsciously believe) that being a Christian is in some regards equivalent to achieving self-actualization? If so, how much of this association is true? If it's true, then wouldn't Christian growth devolve into a Maslow's pyramid of need satisfaction? Based on the Seeds and Plant analogy, I tend to believe there is some degree of truth in this.



Stevens emphasizes the need for intelligence to overcome solipsism, and I'll agree that it certainly makes it easier, but how much of self-actualization is dependent on intelligence? I think it is not so simple to presume intelligence as the key element of spiritual enlightenment. Discernment and wisdom are likely to be more significant vectors than merely intelligence. Life conditions and social support networks also play an important part.

> "While this will seem shocking to those raised in contemporary dualistic and anthropocentric Christianity, it in fact brings us closer to the pagan roots of Christianity, more the Greeks than the Nordic and Hindu/Buddhist roots. It sees the divine as a force of order, not a personal connection. Those who do right by the order rise, those who do not fall, and those who never engage with it just kind of struggle along at an unexceptional level."

Accepting the nature of the divine as a force of order is one of the most rudimentary steps towards knowing God, even one that many self-avowed atheists will accept in practice (although they stop short of labeling it “divine”). Yet many cultures and individuals neglect this order entirely in favor of other structures of beliefs about reality, usually to their own detriment. It is another step closer to God to recognize the overwhelming power and purposes of God, and a step further still to develop a personal connection. Much farther down the road is the embrace of spiritual maturity, in which one comes to understand the will of God, and develops the discipline to follow along in cooperation.

Just as solipsism appears in varying degrees among different individuals, so too does the opposite, which we might describe as sanctification and the heart-felt knowledge of God. It is interesting to observe that the Dunning-Kruger effect applies here too, as true, seasoned believers are prone to doubt their faith, while atheists, converged Churchians, etc. remain stubbornly cocksure of their folly.

> “However, the bigger point that Sigma Frame makes is the identification of the disease of solipsism. “Good” applies to those who self-actualize and overcome their self-referentiality; evil applies to an absence of enough good to make someone mostly sane and mostly able to adapt to their world.”

To recap, solipsism is foolishness and the stronghold of sin in preventing one from apprehending Truth.

Related

- Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): Meditations on Evil (17 October 2019)
- Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): How Religions View Solipsism (18 October 2019)
- Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): God Force (18 October 2019)
- Σ Frame: Putting evil in perspective (15 November 2019)

Somewhere Down the Mystic River

Jack · 23 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

A review of the film, Mystic River, with a few Red Pill takeaways about the nature of relationships.

Readership: All; men vetting a woman;

Note: No (significant) spoilers in the first section.

I first saw the film, Mystic River, more than a decade ago. At that time, it kept me captivated, 'sitting on the edge of my seat'. Now, I regard it as being a little before it's time, in terms of its Red Pill accuracy. Especially, the relationships portrayed between the main actors continues to stand out in my memory as being, tragically, spot-on REAL.

> *"Mystic River is a 2003 American mystery drama film directed and scored by Clint Eastwood. The screenplay by Brian Helgeland was based on the novel of the same name by Dennis Lehane. The film was produced by Robert Lorenz, Judie G. Hoyt, and Eastwood. It is the first film on which Eastwood was credited as composer of the score.
>
> The film opened to widespread critical acclaim. It was nominated for Academy Awards for Best Picture, Best Director, Best Actor, Best Adapted Screenplay, Best Supporting Actress, and Best Supporting Actor. Sean Penn won Best Actor and Tim Robbins won Best Supporting Actor, making Mystic River the first film to win both awards since Ben-Hur in 1959."

Sean Penn stars as James "Jimmy" Markum, a cruel and vindictive man who murders two men in the movie. RP Diagnosis: Draconian Alpha tingulator.

Laura Linney appears as Annabeth Markum, a loving, submissive, obedient wife to Jimmy, who encourages and supports her husband, no matter what he's done wrong. RP Diagnosis: Unicorn wife.

Tim Robbins costars as Dave Boyle, an innocent, and relatively righteous man who has been abused his whole life. He often struggles with crises of conscience. RP Diagnosis: Nerve-wracked Beta.

Marcia Gay Harden depicts Celeste Samarco Boyle, the smarmy, nitpickety wife of Dave, who continually suspects his sanity, and chooses to believe the worst about him during uncertain circumstances. RP Diagnosis: Feral, insecure termagant.

Also to mention, Kevin Bacon and Laurence Fishburne play the roles of Detective Sean Devine and Sergeant Whitey Powers, respectively, and excellently.

Even though this film has been out more than a decade, it's still worth watching. I highly recommend it, as I would most of Eastwood's other work.

If you haven't seen the movie, I don't want to spoil it for you. So for now, I'll offer a couple video grabs that can give you a little taste of the relationships that Jimmy and Dave had with their wives.

Here is a snapshot of the relationship that Jimmy and Annabeth have.

Now here is a clip showing kind of relationship that Dave and Celeste have.

As you can see, it's almost predictably true to Red Pill life. I mean, the Alpha badboy lands the fawning, supportive wife, and the blithering Beta (or broken Beta in Dave's case) gets stuck with the double-minded nag.

Warning: The following section contains information that may spoil your enjoyment of the movie if you haven't seen it yet. Please watch the movie before reading on.*

Framing the relationship dynamics in Mystic River

Although this is just a fictional movie, I feel it fairly represents a relational dynamic that we often see in real life – so much so in fact, that many RP theories revolve around these stereotypes.

As a comparison, we see the same arrangement in the TV series, Breaking Bad. The meth chemist on the verge of death (Walter) has a traditional-type of wife (Skyler), and the good ol' boy policeman (Hank) is married to a schizoid kleptomaniac in denial (Marie).

These incongruous pairings are not just figments of Hollywood. They also show up in the Bible.

- Job and his wife – Job is suspected to be Jobab ben Zerah, a wise, wealthy, and righteous king of ancient Edom, according to Genesis 36. His first wife was an Arab who urged him to "curse God and die" when he was down and out.
- Nabal and Abigail (1st Samuel 25) – Nabal was "harsh and evil", while Abigail was "beautiful and understanding". (Blending Ame has been studying the relationship between Nabal and Abigail. See the links appended below.)
- Hosea and Gomer – Hosea was a prophet of God, and Gomer was a slore.
- Ahasuerus and Esther – Ahasuerus was a wicked king of Persia, and Esther was a beautiful virgin and a courageous Hebrew.

In ancient times, we might dismiss such pairings as having been arranged, or occurring by necessity, but these mismatches continue to occur, even in modern times.

But has it ever been mentioned that this type of pairing is so perverse? Namely, that one very virtuous person is often paired with another person who is rather corrupt?

As I was watching Mystic River, I kept thinking over and over, that these two couples are mismatched, and that they should swap partners. I don't mean swinging. I mean, they should have married the other person's partner, instead of their own.

Just think about it for a moment.

If Dave had married Annabeth, he would have gotten the respect, psychological affirmation and moral support he needed to heal from his past, develop a stronger conscience, and live a healthier, normal life. He certainly would have avoided the betrayal by his wife, and being murdered by his 'friend'.

If Jimmy had married Celeste, it's hard to say what would have happened. I like to believe that their errant, rebellious natures would have self-destructed, and they would have been forced to look beyond themselves and learn to love selflessly.

Somehow, this too is part of the lore that people are drawn into relationships that magnify the worst aspects of themselves, and avoid any exposure to the type of stimuli that would harness their best selves and spur them on to greatness.

But going back to reality, there is the matchup hurdle.

- Would a man like Jimmy, who's confident in his masculinity, even tolerate a nag like Celeste?
- Would a scrupulous woman like Celeste even go for an ex-con like Jimmy?
- Would Dave ever develop the courageous optimism required to contain Annabeth's Tingles?
- Could Annabeth ever be content with Dave's confusion and indecisiveness?
- Would a man like Walt, who has principles and a strong sense of purpose, be able to accept a wild-card woman like Marie?
- Could Marie ever find the freedom to "be herself" around Walt?
- Would Hank be bored with the straight-laced Skyler?
- Would a woman like Skyler be satisfied with a guy like Hank?

No way… Somehow, they just don't match.

There must be a motivation for people to marry one particular person over all others. So, other than the all-powerful Tingles, why do nice, attractive girls go for Mr. Chadwick Ed?

There may be any number of reasons. But here's a platitudinous explanation that I've heard repetitively, and have seen some evidence of it's accuracy.

"Good" people may choose to marry "bad" people in order to protect their psychological identity as a relatively "good" person. They can also let their Dirty Harry spouse deal with the morally messy issues which they would prefer to avoid. On the other foot, "bad" people choose to marry "good" people because of the forgiveness, blessings, and grace that become available to them through that person.

There's also an element of power and control. The person who has fewer moral scruples and a willingness to bend or break the rules, will always come out ahead in the power game. Women know this intuitively, and therefore choose the bad @ss, knowing that he has a tactical advantage over the common nice guy.

The Reframe

The Frame outlined in the previous section is somewhat misleading. It's a logical trap to jump to the conclusion that one person in the relationship is "good", and the other is "bad". We tend to think that the person who conforms to the norm, or who adheres to a standardized code of morality is the better person. Or we might believe that the person having the set of values and life experiences that more closely matches our own is the "good" person.

But this is a false dichotomy. We don't know the whole story, and we don't know how the union will grow or change over time.

There are Biblical examples of couples who seemed like an odd combination, but then things turned out fine.

- Salmon and Rahab – Salmon was a Hebrew spy, and Rahab was a gentile prostitute. But they became the great-great-grandparents of King David.
- Boaz and Ruth – Boaz, who was the son of Salmon and Rahab, was a man of great wealth, and Ruth was an impoverished widow of foreign birth. They became the great-grandparents of King David.

For the record, there are Biblical examples of couples who seemed like perfect matches, but then one turned bad.

- David and Michal – At first, Michal was very much in love with David, but then she presumably committed adultery with Palti (AKA Paltiel), and then later cursed David and died childless.
- Solomon and the Shunammite – The perfect love story that spawned the Song of Solomon. But Solomon's wives led him into idolatry.

There are also Biblical examples of couples who were both corrupt.

- Ahab and Jezebel – An epically evil pair of sardonic idolaters who persecuted the prophets and did various acts of evil throughout their lives.
- Ananias and Sapphira – In Acts 5:1-5, they conspired to withhold funds that they promised to donate to the church.

Now, let's take another look at the main characters in Mystic River from this perspective.

It's easy to dismiss Celeste as a low-quality, emotionally soft, untenable woman, but she had strong convictions. Her deeper values reached for a convoluted combination of justice and playing the savior. These traits catered to Dave's brokenness, making him feel compassionately accepted by her, but which actually led to his downfall. Although she may have been a good woman, she wasn't a good wife. Ultimately, her values proved to be misappropriated, so she never developed a habit of being spiritually obedient. Under the spell of her false notions, she actively destroyed her husband, and her life disintegrated as a result. In the end, she betrayed him and this instigated his death.

It's easy to label Annabeth as a loving, supportive wife to be envied. To her credit, she chose a life that fit her values, and had learned to submit to her husband. She also reaped the benefits of being obedient, and enjoyed having a warm, intimate relationship with her husband.

However, her deeper values didn't align with her outward appearance. Although she may have been a good wife, she wasn't a good woman. She could have wielded her influence to discourage Jimmy from murdering innocent men, but instead, she colluded with him in the cover up.

In actuality, Annabeth was hybristophilic. She worshipped the security and privileges that came with power. She chose Jimmy because of the power that he exuded. She developed her feminine powers to reap the benefits of landing and keeping an alpha husband. She chose to offer her feminine wiles to support the top dog, and keep him on top, for better or for worse. To her, his mistakes and iniquities could always be forgiven as long as he was the dominant, Tingle-inducing husband. But I can imagine, if he ever lost this status, she may very well monkey branch to the next alpha. Or if the Wall had already damaged her marketability, then she would become a nagging shrew, just like Celeste.

With all this in mind, are we still able to think of her as a "good catch"?

No… Not even for Jimmy, because her skills at being a good wife were merely coopted to enable the worst of his nature.

Bonnie and Clyde Barrow

Relationships have a deep impact on people

The traditional mythology of "True Love" commonly stipulates that marrying "that special someone" can and should transform your life for the better. Granted, this does happen, but instead of being the norm, it's the rare exception that comes by the grace of God. It is much more common for people to discover that their marriage fails to bring blessing, and instead, beckons forth the demons from within themselves.

There is a large body of lore that depicts how people are drawn into relationships that (1) magnify the worst aspects of themselves, and/or (2) serve to shield them from any exposure to the type of stimuli that would harness their best selves and spur them on to greatness.

Consider Whitney Houston. During all the years of her stardom, she carried a pristine image of an ideal role model. She was heavily criticized for choosing to marry the wrong man, Bobby Brown, a drug-addled, ghetto-trash parvenu. But Whitney Houston's sad, secret life was revealed to the public eye after her untimely death. An autopsy showed cocaine, marijuana, and a host of other prescription drugs in her body. It was also revealed that she had had a homosexual affair with her assistant for decades. Perhaps Bobby Brown was the right wrong man for her, after all.

Another way to think of these relational dynamics is that people are drawn to marry the person who brings out those aspects of their fundamental natures which they love and cherish the most about themselves – for better or for worse!

Consider the examples mentioned before.

- Jimmy and Annabeth were both strong, confident personalities. They both aspired to dominate any power dynamic at hand. Having a mutual acceptance of their morally unconscionable motives, they remained staunchly loyal to each other. In spite of their transgressions, I daresay they fit the mold of God's natural hierarchy, and reaped the many benefits thereof.
- Dave and Celeste were both broken, emotionally insecure, and psychologically unstable. They were both conscientious and well-intentioned, but also disconnected and misguided. Although they were ostensibly decent, law-abiding people, they failed to play their respective roles within God's natural order, and their lives were destroyed as a consequence.
- Walt and Skyler were totally dedicated to the well-being of their family, and their financial security, and they were even willing to go to criminal measures to protect that.
- Hank and Marie both had a deep love for life, and lived passionately on the edge – Hank through his adventures as a policeman, and Marie through her misadventures and skirting the law.
- Whitney Houston and Bobby Brown were highly talented, hard-core hedonists who loved the limelight and a materialistic lifestyle.

Conclusions

In the real world, there's something deeper and more fundamental that brings certain people together. Your deepest values, and what you love most about yourself, are the qualities that are amplified through your spouse, and broadcast to the world. It's important to fisk that out in order to know yourself, and sooner is better than later.

- If you choose a person who agrees with your better values, then this can enhance your relationship, and brighten your identities.
- If you choose a person who brings out your worst values, then this may or may not enhance your relationship, but it will darken your character.
- If you don't choose a person who matches your characteristic values, then you're walking into a conflict-laden existence. This is unlikely to change until one or both of you change your fundamental values. In addition to the stress of constant conflict, changing yourself is an exhausting undertaking that is very difficult or impossible > to do. If one is willing to go through the change, then only the love of God, or else their depraved desires, can pull them through to accomplish this. The nature of the relationship strongly influences which one takes precedence.

The heavy takeaway for singles: When vetting a partner, be well aware of what a potential partner brings out of you. Marrying this person will cause that aspect of your character to be manifested and amplified for the rest of your life, thereby forming your eternal identity. Ask for the opinions of your friends and family, and compare their impressions to your own. This will help you avoid any blind spots about the relationship. Know what you're getting into, and how that might change you and your life.

The heavy takeaway for marrieds: Attentive people often size up a person by what kind of wife (or husband) they have. Are you aware of what your wife (or husband) conveys about your character as a man (or woman)? If you took some time to identify the ways in which you match your partner, you might gain some important insights about yourself.

Related

- Σ Frame: How does a Woman Attract (and Keep) a Husband? (2009 October 5)
- Σ Frame: The True Ontology of Power (2019 May 16)
- Blending Ame: The Wife of a Fool ~ Part 1 (2019 November 16)
- Blending Ame: The Wife of a Fool ~ Part 2 (2019 November 22)
- Blending Ame: The Wife of a Fool ~ Part 3 (2019 November 22)

Contraception Correlations

Jack · 29 November 2019 · Archived copy · Original

The increase in the use of oral contraceptives correlates with abortion, divorce, and the number of unwed mothers. A coincidence?

Readership: All

This post originally appeared on That Married Couple on 2013 February 5, and has since disappeared from the web. However, this post deserves to live on.

When reading through this post, it should be noted that correlation does not necessarily imply causation. However, these correlations are not spuriously random associations either.

* * * * *

I was so excited to give my first big NFP talk last week. It was "big" in that it was open to our entire huge parish and 45 minutes long. It was not so big in that 7 people attended, including my husband. Luckily I had given over that whole "how many people will actually come?!" thing to God a long time before, so I could just enjoy the fact that there were no hostile audience members and give it a much more casual and intimate feel. And it went well!

When I was preparing for this talk, I was quite frustrated in not being able to find good numbers. You know how you hear people talk about how all these social problems increased hand in hand with contraception use? We all realize logically that this is correct, but I had a heck of a time finding the data to make pretty graphs documenting it. So I decided I should post what I did finally hunt down, in case anyone else out there wants to access these numbers.

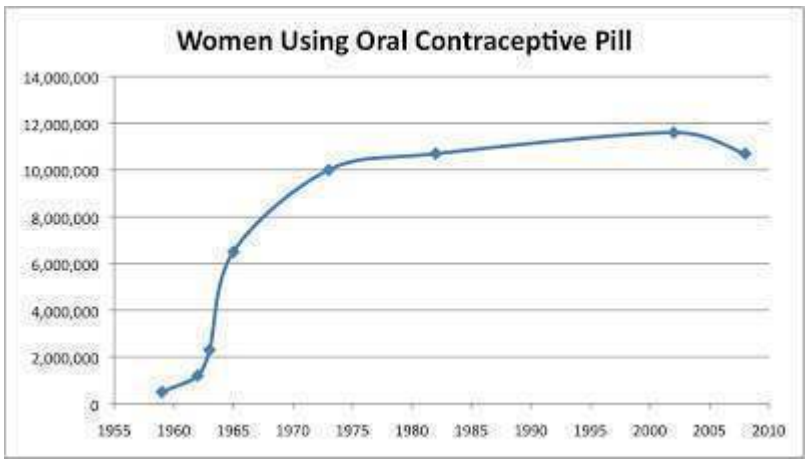
This post is chock full of caveats, however, so please don't just copy and paste the charts without reading the text and understanding them! And if you know of any better data, please please share it!

Contraception Use

This is the data I had the hardest time finding. All the other numbers I could get fairly easily from the CDC, but this is basically all they had for contraception. For the years 1982, 1995, 2002, and 2006-8, they have numbers of women who have ever used any method (see document page 18/pdf page 26), which increases from 94.8% to 99.1% during that time period. (Please note they do include "periodic abstinence" in these numbers.) They also have the number of women who currently use those methods for the same years (document page 21/pdf page 29), which goes from 55.7% of all women to 61.8%.

This was unsatisfactory for a couple reasons, but most of all because it didn't have anything from the 60's and 70's, which would show the dramatic initial growth in number of women using contraception.

I finally found some numbers for how many women were on the oral contraceptive pill during those years, via the website for the PBS documentary "The Pill." I don't know where they obtained these numbers, which makes them a bit questionable, but they were the best I could find. With that, I was able to create this chart showing the use of oral contraception in the United States from 1958 to 2008.



It's not perfect, as I would have preferred percentages as opposed to raw numbers and a few more data points. It certainly doesn't show the full extent of contraceptive use in our country, as an estimated 34 million women use some form and this only highlights approximately 11 million. But the chart is effective in getting across the general trend of contraception in our country – a dramatic increase and then a sort of leveling off once basically every woman who wants contraception has access to it.

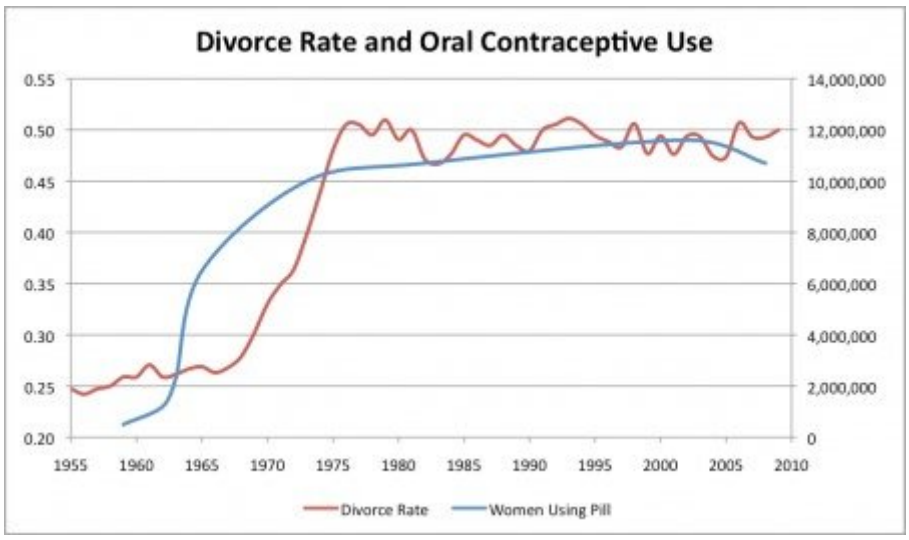
I then took this chart of oral contraception (OC) use and overlaid it with charts showing the divorce rate, unwed mother rate, and abortion rate. I did not do any math or anything for this, so statistically speaking you wouldn't want to say these are correlated until you did so. (And if someone would like to just punch this all into SPSS or something and do it for me, I'd be very appreciative. I can send you the raw numbers in excel.) But nonetheless, it's pretty clear that there is some sort of relationship between these factors.

Contraception and Divorce

We have plenty of accessible data on the number of divorces in our country, from 1940 to today, courtesy of the CDC. (Find that here: 1940-1997 and 1998-2009.) They provide the divorce rate as well as the marriage rate. The divorce rate goes from 2 per 1000 people in 1940 up to over 5 per 1000 people in the late 1970s/early 1980s, and is now back down in the high 3's. (For an extended view of the divorce rate, One More Soul has a nice graph of it from 1880 to 2000.)

However I don't think that particular chart speaks to people as powerfully as it could. So I took the annual divorce rate and divided it by the annual marriage rate to come up with the chart below. Again with the caveats – this is not an ideal way to get this number, and it doesn't indicate the likelihood of a given marriage ending in divorce. But I believe this is how people come up with the quote that half of all marriages end in divorce, as this rate has been hovering around 50% now since the mid-1970's.

Now check it out overlaid with OC use.

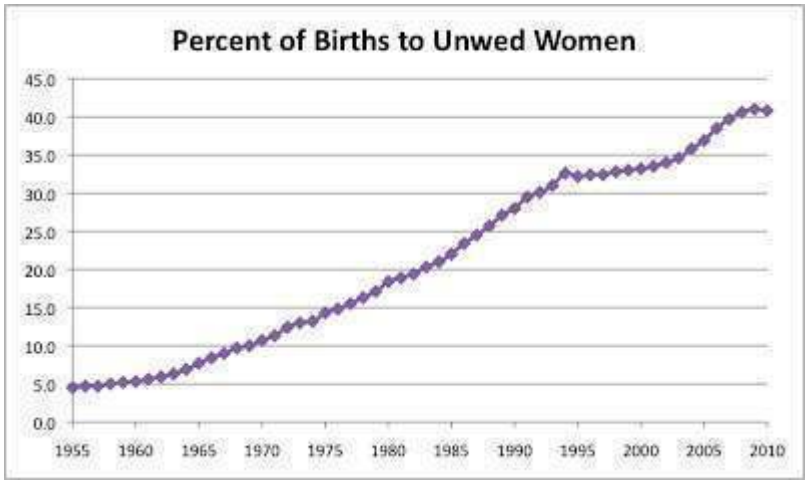


Wow, huh? Divorce just follows contraception use right along.

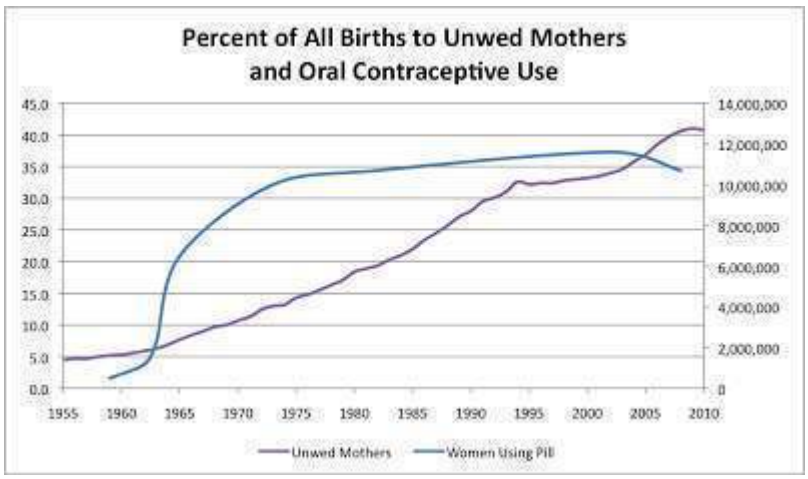
Now you obviously don't want to make light of the pain of divorce or the many complex reasons behind an individual couple's situation. No one is going to say "Oh yes, we got a divorce because we were using contraception." However, when we look at the big picture the two factors are certainly related. In particular, economist and demographer Robert Michaels looked specifically at that big jump you can see above, where the divorce rate doubled in 10 years – from 25% in 1965 to 50% in 1975. He concluded that 45% of that increase is due to increased use of contraception [1].

Contraception and Unwed Mothers

Not only are there more single parent homes due to divorce, but there has been a crazy increase in the number of children born to unwed women. (Here's CDC data from 1940-1999, 2000-2009, and 2010.) Currently 41% of all children born in the United States are born to an unwed mother. Isn't that shocking? And for African American children the situation is even worse – 73% of them are born to unwed mothers.

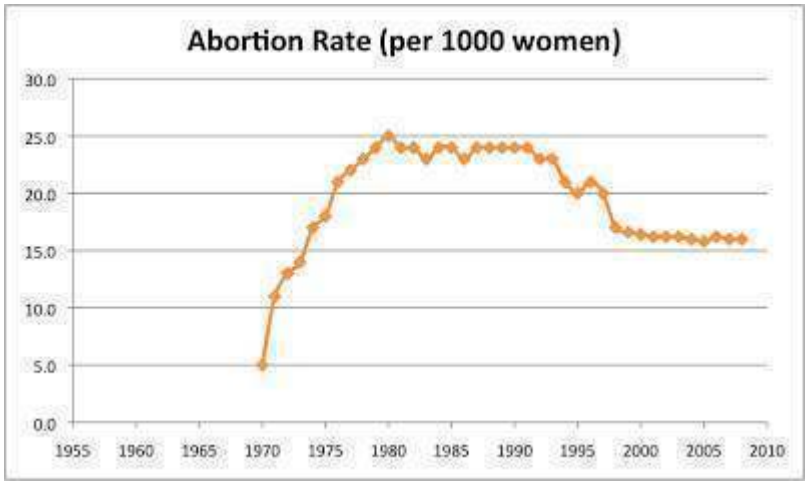


While it doesn't have the exact same line as contraception use, we can certainly see that an increase in contraception has not helped with these situations.



Contraception and Abortion

Ah yes, and then there's this. First, a look at the abortion rate in the United States (from CDC data from 1970-1999 and 1999-2008).



Two notes on this chart. First, you can see that shortly before and then certainly after abortion was legalized in 1973, we have a dramatic increase. The rate doubled in less than 10 years. Second, you may be encouraged to see the decrease since the late 1990s, but it is very important to note that this is because the data is incomplete. Around 1998, the CDC went from having 52 states reporting down to 47. The actual decline for those 47 areas was only 2%. In particular, California stopped reporting. In the last year that estimates were made for California, 23% of all abortions happened there. So you can see how by simply not including them, it looks like we have quite a drop. If I had to guess, we probably have another plateau, from roughly the 80s to now. You know, essentially following contraception use again.

For more on exactly why/how an increase in contraception actually is followed by an increase in abortion (as opposed to a decrease, as many people expect), let me just direct you to 1 Flesh, because they have better graphics and plenty of references. I'll just repeat what the Supreme Court had to say about it (Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 1992):

> "In some critical respects, the abortion decision is of the same character as the decision to use contraception… For two decades of economic and social developments, [people] have organized intimate relationships and made choices that define their views of themselves and their places in society, in reliance on the availability of abortion in the event that contraception should fail."

So there you have it. Numbers and simple charts illustrating them. Hopefully they're of some help to someone else out there!

References

(1) Michael, Robert T. 1988. Why did the U.S. Divorce Rate Double within a Decade? Research in Population Economics Vol. 6, p 367-399.

Related

- Σ Frame: A Deeper Look at Contraception and Abortion (2019 November 9)

Yes, Women Lust Too

Lexet Blog · 6 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Are women absolved from desire? Or are they even more depraved than men?

Readership: All

This essay was submitted by the author of Lexet Iustitia, and was first published on 2018 October 5. An expanded, coauthored version appears here with the author's permission.

* * * * *

In Christian circles, there is a saying, "men are tempted to lust, and women are tempted to be lusted after". I have heard this type of commentary outside of the Christian community as well. There are plenty of blogs and ministries dedicated to Christian women who have the opinion that women cannot lust, and that lust is only a male problem.

When pornography, fornication, or any other sexual issues come up, they are solely addressed to the men, especially younger men. Never have I ever seen a church address female impropriety or immodesty. S1ut shaming is absolutely verboten. Quite frankly, those few times I have seen this issue raised, the men are put on the defensive for bringing it up to begin with. The unspoken rule of most churches is that, if a woman chooses to wear a bikini to a church function, then she is welcome to do so. If that makes you "stumble", then that is your problem! They may as well say that women should be allowed to be as sexual as they like, and that men are sinful if women's sexuality gives them a boner any ideas.

Many men in Christian (and secular) circles eagerly accept this logic, as it fits in the broader narrative that men need to, or should, pursue women, while women wait to be pursued, and respond to a man's initiation.

However, I do not believe this narrative is true, nor is it Biblical, nor is it an accurate generalization about the nature of men and women, as well as relationships.

Let's take a closer look at what it really means to lust.

Lust: A very strong sexual desire; to have a strong sexual desire for someone. To Crave, or Covet.

I'll introduce several theories of Lust, in which Lust is presumed to manifest according to different styles of expression. I welcome any and all discussion as to other possible theories.

Active vs. Passive Lust

Active Lust is defined as the lust which initiates, while Passive Lust is the recipient expression of lust. Men are characterized as having Active Lust, but men can experience Passive Lust as well. Likewise, Passive Lust appears when prurient women are tempted to be sexually desired and objectified, but some women do take the initiative to engage in Active Lust. Women may express lust in a different manner than men, but nevertheless, both sexes lust.

Lust for Lust

Building on the previous concept, it is presumed that those engaging in Passive Lust (i.e. women) receive a different type of payoff in being passive. Thus, while both sexes may lust in their respective ways, women take lust to the next level, in that they invite and exacerbate the Active Lust of men.

Why do women provoke the sexual proclivities of men, and purposefully lead them into temptation?

- It's fun and easy to do.
- It generates topics for female gossip.
- Women receive pleasure and excitement in knowing that someone is lusting for them. Red Pill lore typically labels this response as "affirmation" (of the woman's SMV).
- Women can preselect male partners through an estimation of how desperate the men are. Men who are less concupiscent are perceived to be more mature, have more sexual opportunity, and thus, a higher SMV.
- Women may provoke men into lust in order to explore sexual opportunities while still presenting a plausible deniability, which speaks to the cunning nature behind the carnal salaciousness of the female sex.
- Women may also entice men to lust as a tactic in a power game. Desire and neediness reduces one's power and confidence. So, men who are stalled in lustful desire are more easily dominated and controlled by women.

Overall, the female lust for male lust is basically a lust for soft power. This is most clearly seen in the way many women prefer to wear sexually revealing clothing, and even compete with each other in doing so. Again, while both sexes may have a specific tendency, both sexes can lust in either way.

Reciprocated Lust

A third, and possibly more probable theory is that both sexes lust, and both like to be pursued. This is seen in the Push-Pull dynamic, where the man and woman take turns alternating between Active and Passive modes.

Idolatrous Lust

The focus of lust may not be limited to attraction, romance, Tingles, or sexual intercourse. Lust may be embodied in a desire for an abstract ideal. This sinful longing for an ideal can be found in certain cases of The Sinful Savior Complex, and women's Hypergamous Addiction to Choosing, which often culminates in prolific promiscuity and/or branch swinging. Although it could be argued that all lust is idolatrous in nature, the abstract form of lust is exceedingly damaging to a person's psyche, mainly because it can be nurtured independent from the logistical interaction with a partner, and carried on through years of dissolution.

Women Lust, And Aren't "Special" or Morally Superior

It is obvious that women lust, in that they have sexual desires for certain men. 17% of women struggle with a porn addiction, and 1/3 of all traffic to adult websites are females. Few ministries acknowledge that women lust, but at least some are finally acknowledging this.

Women get a kick out of being pursued, even by men they are not attracted to. Any man who has dated, or has female friends, knows that women will string men along, collect orbiters, and play games. This trait is not unique to women either. Men fantasize about being lusted after, and this is the general plot of just about every porn video. However, women are more proactive and regularly act upon their desire to be desired.

Even in the Christian community, women dress provocatively. Then they blame and shame those men who address the issue. The sad reality is that men in modern churches have no objection to their wives and daughters dressing like whores. I attend a conservative church, and it is an absolute disgrace that men allow their daughters to dress like attention seeking whores to church. Perhaps this is one symptom of the complementarian system, resulting from the way men/fathers lose their self–respect and sense of shame.

Biblical examples of Female Lust

Female lust is by no means a transgression unique to modern society. There are many examples of female sexual impropriety in the Bible. Here are provided several examples of female lust mentioned in the Bible.

- One can say that Eve was visually stimulated by the fruit of the tree: "…so when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was a delight to the eyes, and that the tree was to be desired to make one wise…" (Genesis 3:6)
- "…after some time [Joseph's] master's wife cast her eyes on Joseph and said, "sleep with me." (Genesis 39:7); "She caught him by his garment, saying, "lie with me." (Genesis 39:12)
- "…do not let her captivate you with her eyes" (Proverbs 6:25) describes a woman tempting a man to lust.
- "…but a married woman hunts down a precious life." (Proverbs 6:26) describes the behavior of an adulteress.
- "…an adulteress is a narrow well. Like a robber she lies in wait and multiplies the faithless among men…" (Proverbs 23:27).
- "…God gave them over to shameful lusts. Even their women exchanged normal sexual relations for unnatural ones." (Romans 1:26).

In the Bible, whenever Israel rebelled against God's commands, Israel is always portrayed as an unfaithful wife, or a prostitute. This speaks to the nature of these subjects: Israel, lecherous wives, and prostitutes.

- "…you adulterous wife! You receive strangers instead of your own husband! […] Men give gifts to all their prostitutes, but you gave gifts to all your lovers. You bribed them to come to you from everywhere for your illicit favors…" (Ezekiel 16:32)
- "…all for the countless whorings of the prostitute, graceful and of deadly charms…" (Nahum 3:4)

Ezekiel 23 describes two lascivious women (Oholah and Oholibah, representing Judah and Israel respectively) who played the whore in Assyria, Babylon, and Egypt. This is the most graphic description of lust in the Bible, and more sexually explicit than the Song of Solomon. Some very graphic excerpts follow.

- They "played the whore in their youth. Oholah… lusted after her lovers, the Assyrians, warriors clothed in purple, governors and commanders, all of them desirable young men, horsemen riding on horses. She bestowed her whoring upon them, the choicest men of Assyria, all of them, and she defiled herself with all the idols of everyone after whom she lusted. She did not give up her whoring that she had begun in Egypt; for in her youth men had lain with her and handled her virgin bosom and poured out their whoring lust upon her. Therefore, I delivered her into the hands of her lovers, into the hands of the Assyrians, after whom she lusted. These uncovered her nakedness…" (Ezekiel 23:6)
- Her sister Oholibah saw this, and she became more corrupt than her sister in her lust and in her whoring, which was worse than that of her sister. She lusted after the Assyrians, governors and commanders, warriors clothed in full armor, horsemen riding on horses, all of them desirable young men. And I saw that she was defiled; they both took the same way. But she carried her whoring further. She saw men portrayed on the wall… when she saw them, she lusted after them and sent messengers to them in Chaldea. When she carried on her whoring so openly and flaunted her nakedness, I turned in disgust from her, as I had turned in disgust from her sister. Yet she increased her whoring, remembering the days of her youth, when she played the whore in the land of Egypt, and lusted after her lovers there, whose members were like those of donkeys, and whose issue was like that of horses. Thus you longed for the lewdness of your youth, when the Egyptians handled your bosom and pressed your young breasts." (Ezekiel 23:10)

These Biblical descriptions of c0ck crazed, nymphotic women make it crystal clear that women do lust, even more intensely and passionately than men do. But this is seldom mentioned by anyone, especially Christians in “polite society”. Why not? I’ll offer the following reasons.

- The passionate lust underlying female sexual desire is inherently sensual, self-centered, and effectually boundless.
- Discussing female desire socially undergirds this peculiar weakness of women, which can become an embarrassment when revealed.
- When female sexual desire is expressed in it’s full glory, it is absolutely obscene, even profane. Men’s lust, in comparison, is a candle next to a blazing forest fire.
- The natural culmination of female lust often results in adultery, jealousy, shame, and even abortion and murder.
- Once overtaken by their desires, women will pursue enthralling raptures at any cost, even until marriage and the family, and society by extension, has been completely destroyed.

As you can see, it would not be polite to discuss any of the above matters as facts. But western societies go so far as to deny these facts in an effort to confer “dignity” on women, even in cases where dignity has been abandoned. Problems arise when this same obfuscation also enables lubricous women to continue their practices of whoredom.

Once you’ve let the pussycat out of the bag, it’s nearly impossible to contain again. This is partly why virginity has always been valued in stable societies.

Conclusions

Resolving the risks of potential social catastrophes while simultaneously conferring dignity on women cannot be achieved through passive permissiveness and denial. Wiser societies which recognize the overwhelming, d@mning power of the female libido go to great lengths to enforce cultural limitations, such as propriety in raiment, segregation of sexes, and ceremonious customs in social intercourse, especially in rituals surrounding courtship and marriage.

But as long as the Feminine Imperative dominates control of the social ontology, such constraints will be scorned as “outdated” or as “Patriarchal oppression”, and will never be instituted. This is only further proof of the gynocentric exigency of female Lust.

Related

- Σ Frame: My Dating Experiences in College (2018 March 25)
- Σ Frame: Things I Learned About Women in College (2018 April 4)
- Σ Frame: Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019 February 23)
- Σ Frame: Yet another variety of Internet Whoring (2019 October 9)

Why does Game work?

Jack · 9 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Here are some clues.

Readership: All men; Men interested in vetting a woman for a relationship;

It is well known that Game works. However, in addition to the debate about the value of Game, there continues to be a lot of confusion surrounding what Game is, and WHY it works. This essay will provide insights to these questions from the spiritual and psychological perspectives.

Introduction

Christian Manospherians have had conflicting views about the value and purpose of Game, and whether it is something that Christian men should be engaging in or not. Most of these arguments boil down to how Game is defined, and the various purposes for employing Game are tossed into the mix. This approach naturally invites moral judgement on the whole meaning and purpose of Game which has only served to cloud our understanding of what is actually happening with Game.

Early studies on the nature of Game were largely based on praxeological observations of seduction. As such, most estimations of Game have been surmised in this context. However, this context also presents confounding obstacles in conducting a thorough psychoanalysis of Game. Namely, the popular focus on "getting desired results", which in the past, could be summarized as the culmination of a sexual interaction leading to coitus, is little more than a titillating obfuscation (perhaps even an idol) that prevents us from understanding the inner workings of how to step up one's Game.

Instead of assessing the efficacy of Game on whether one specific evolutionary goal has been attained, the concept of Game that is discussed in this essay adopts a teleological* approach, in that it examines Game according to the most desired response when it is successfully employed (i.e. her humility and heartfelt Trust), which more often than not, is taken to be the ostensible goal of Game.

However, I have to mention that this is different and separate from the fundamental goal of Game, which is closer to the tune of self-expression, connection, building rapport, and bonding, and that this goal is not limited to men interacting with women in the SMP only. However, for the sake of the present discussion, I will assume that the counterpart in the Game play is a female.

The purposes for which Game is employed (e.g. establishing or maintaining a relationship, eliciting respect, deflecting unreasonable demands, defusing S#!t tests, getting laid, or whatever the case might be…), are uniquely subject to each man and woman. In past studies, it was assumed that Game is largely dependent on the context (e.g. Day Game, Married Game, etc.). However, the following monologue will show that individual-specific desires, personal identity, and Charisma are more central to the dynamics of Game. The context is merely the social setting in which these aspects are able to manifest.

Therefore, in order to avoid further complication and confusion in this essay, I will intentionally neglect the purposes of employing Game. I also wish to bypass the discussions of motivations and judgements surrounding the value of Game. The purpose for stripping away these highly complicated and nuanced variables is to dissect the actual dynamics of Game interaction in order to answer the question of why Game works in any given situation. Likewise, please do not leave any comments concerning purposes or motivations, or make value-judgments under this post.

The Journey of Desire

First, let's briefly describe the spiritual nature of Desire, which is a central concept in the remainder of this essay.

Desire has a functional utility that is central to our social lives and spiritual vitality, as well as Game. There are (at least) two ways in which desire serves as a vehicle.

1. Desire serves to humble us and draw us closer to God and other people.

Living a life with continually unfulfilled Desires creates suffering. People are strongly motivated to avoid suffering and obtain the fulfillment of their Desires. Therefore, if Desire is present and the realization of that desire seems imminent or probable, then one is willing to undergo a great deal of hardship and suffering in the process of realizing that Desire, because this suffering is deemed preferable over the suffering caused by an unfulfilled Desire. Desire is what makes one who is "falling in Love" "blind" to all the red flags in the relationship (and every relationship has them).

If Desire is not present, then any hardship and suffering is perceived as nothing more than a troublesome annoyance. The abatement of Desire is the problem faced by those who are jaded by too much sexual promiscuity, such as carousel riders and alpha widows. In fact, that's what it means to be jaded – having no passion, and no heart-felt desire. They can find nothing in life which motivates them through an appeal to Desire, and so everything becomes annoying. This is why sexual promiscuity is so damaging, because it dampens natural Desire and shunts or displaces the normal process of how Desire draws people closer to God and others.

2. Desire serves to teach us about ourselves, to learn what we want in life, and to give us a choice of which of our Desires to prioritize and how to go about pursuing them.

With respect to the question of how one can deal with the problem of Desire, the most prolific coping mechanisms are outlined as follows.

1. Worldly Pursuits, such as education, career, sex (e.g. the carousel), chasing the Tingles, the boyfriend (AKA "marriage lite") the college boyfriend, Marriage 2.0, having children…
2. The Buddhist Approach to suppress desires, isolation, prayer, meditation, fasting…
3. The Selfish Approach. Take what you want, F*ck 'em all, and d@mn the consequences.
4. Resignation – Giving up on life, social withdrawal, depression, suicide, alcoholism, addiction, pornography…
5. Jesus – God's way to focus on Jesus, the best desire, and live a spiritually obedient life, waiting on God to fulfill your Desires according to His way and His timing.

Upon reflection, it is obvious that men of the West commonly choose options 1, 3, and 4. I might presume option 2 has become popular among MGTOW's. Western women opt for 1 and 3.

As will be shown in the following, the presence of Desire is an integral part of the human soul and psyche, and appears as a prominent motivation in social interactions and Game.

Game Fulfills Wants, Needs, and Desires

A simple social exchange is comprised of people exchanging the mutual satisfaction of common desires. The things desired don't need to be anything grandiose. It can just be things as simple as having a pleasant interaction, expressing positivity, offering encouragement, affirmation, acceptance, inclusion…

The counterpart's hope of satisfying an inherent desire is the lure of Game. The magnetic draw of the lure depends on the intensity and urgency of the desire. Given sufficient strength of desire, and the perceived certainty of obtaining satisfaction through the interaction, the counterpart may be willing to endure extreme personal challenges and even embarrassment. If this is the case, then some degree of game response is to be expected (e.g. heated arguments, $ħit testing, etc.).

If the fulfillment of Desire is insufficiently satisfying or not forthcoming, then it could have different results.

1. The subject applies more effort in the interaction.
2. The subject resorts to retaliation for perceived injustices and indignities.
3. The subject gives up and withdraws.
4. Some form of rejection.

It should be noted that those having certain qualifiers may have peculiar or insatiable desires which can never be satisfied through a normal interaction and therefore pose a risk. These indicators include the following and should be taken as red flags in vetting.

- Those from a broken family background.
- Those who are spiritually immature or unregenerated.
- Those who have a history of depraved or immoral behaviours.
- Those who have a psychological disorder, e.g. Borderline Personality Disorder, Narcissistic Personality Disorder, etc.
- Others?

The art of Game is to maintain a state in which the subject revels in the joys of desire satisfaction. Game within a Long-Term-Relationship (LTR) should increase her confidence in the certainty of obtaining her desire, which leads her to pursue more of the interaction, or for it to continue on indefinitely for the purpose of gaining further joys and satisfactions. If this can be done, the subject should continually offer the first response listed above (applying more effort in the interaction). This is essentially how to increase your bidding price, as described by famed researcher, Dr. John Gottman.

> "The essential goal of making a bid is to get the other person to express an acknowledgment of your persona, and to interact with you in a way that expresses love and affirmation. If you can get the other person to do more for you, then it has the psychological and emotional effect of making them justify their actions mentally, and thereby grow to feel more emotionally in tune with you. Basically, the more they do for you, the more they will love you. So the larger goal of making bids and playing games, is to drive up your 'bidding price', which entails them making ever larger emotional investments in you and your relationship."

Here, what we have known about Game for many years becomes clearly evident – that it is crucial to develop your mental software, showcase your personality, maintain Frame, and build confidence and authenticity. If not for these qualities, how else could anyone know who you really are? If no one recognizes your identity, then how could you possibly get the other person to express an acknowledgment of your persona?

You have the responsibility to teach people who you are and how you want to be treated. You cannot rely on others to instantly recognize what a fantastic recluse you are, and teach you how to magnify your best self.

PUA's have often said something to the effect, "Game requires you to become a better man". I would edit this statement to say, “Game requires you to become better at being your best self and letting others know who you are”. This could also be described as building Character and Charisma.

Identifying Desires

Within a normal social interaction, one necessary condition of effective Game is that you have to recognize that you have things that other people want, just as other people have things that you want. Adopting this mindset is a departure from a “poverty mentality”, and the beginning of Humility.

Likewise for her, the importance of Desire in Game is that it provides an invitation for the woman to enter into a state of Humility, which is discussed in the following section.

But when dealing with women, there is much more nuance about what kind of desires are tractable. So this deserves greater attention.

Donal Graeme broke the feminine desire down into five categories in his post, Going APE – What Attributes do Women Find Attractive in Men? Looks, Athleticism, Money, Power and Status (LAMPS) (2013 July 21).

Graeme uses the acronym PSALM to express the order of importance of the weightiest attributes.

1. Power – Clearly the most important set of attributes, well above the others. Charisma is king.
2. Status – Also extremely important, plays a significant role in interacting with female hypergamy.
3. Athleticism – Of middling importance, perhaps because resources are plentiful, but still something which women like in men.
4. Looks – With the exception of height, this set of attributes provides little bang for your buck; it might get you initial attention but won’t keep it for you.
5. Money – Great wealth is required for this attribute to be meaningful, likely a product of a resource-rich culture where women can easily provide for themselves.

Such qualities provide a nearly irresistible draw to almost any female. But in addition to these broad generalities, each individual woman has her own selective needs and strengths of preferences, so there are many other attributes that certain women might find attractive (e.g. more mature women go for sophistication, class, and personality, while younger chix get excited over a beach buggy with bazooka stereo speakers).

It should be noted that the subject's desired objective does not need to be consummately overpowering, nor a grandiose life achievement. As mentioned before, it can be something as simple and common as acceptance, affirmation, amusement, or connection. But just exactly how this impression can be given to any particular person is uniquely contextualized.

Avery at Red Pill Theory says that women only want one thing – Value. He breaks it down into three varieties.

1. Logical Value is what people think they want.
2. Emotional Value is when you have an inspiring Charisma which endears you to the person.
3. Sexual Value is when you can induce the blessed Tingles.

Chase Amante at Girls Chase also goes with a value based approach.

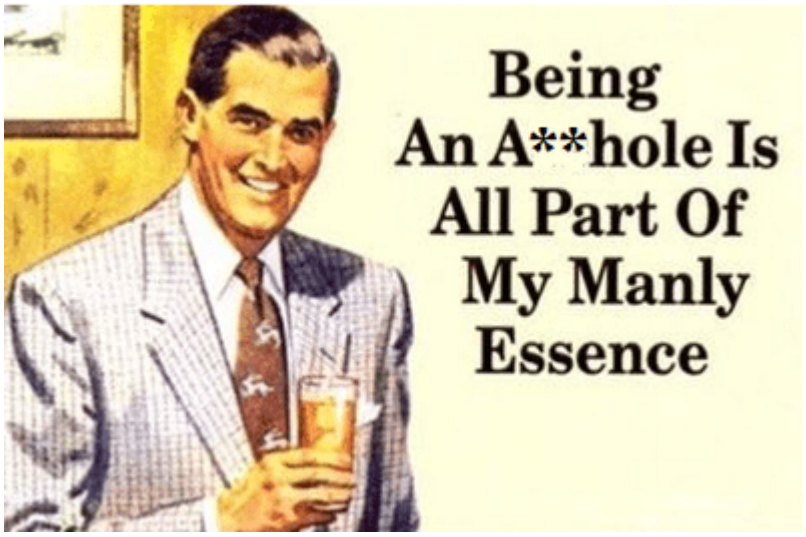
Carl at Black Label Logic points out that Empathy is a key element in Game. He writes,

> "Empathy is often divided into two subtypes, cognitive empathy and emotional empathy, where the latter is what we often think of when someone mentions empathy. Cognitive empathy is covered as part of theory of mind, which is the ability to cognitively understand and put oneself in the position of another without necessarily being affected by their emotions. Emotional empathy is the ability to feel the emotions of another person, and in a sense mirror them. This is distinct from emotional contagion where one is swept up in the emotions of a mob or another person.
>
> …in my conceptualization of Red Pill Theory and Game, cognitive empathy plays a very central role, in that you have to be able to understand the woman you are interacting with in order to run solid game."

If you think cognitive empathy seems to contradict the stereotypical Chad's @$$holery, then you're failing to understand how this important connection is effectively expressed in contrast to one's masculinity.



The Core Functions of Game – Charisma and Heart Trust

In an earlier series of essays on Trust, I described two types of trust – Head Trust and Heart Trust.

- Σ Frame: The Trust Factor (2019 April 18)
- Σ Frame: 2 Frames of Reference for Identifying the Trust Factor (2019 April 23)
- Σ Frame: Creating and Maintaining Heart Trust (2019 April 28)

To briefly recap the relevant points of this series, one kind of trust is centered around cognitive beliefs and expectations, and is therefore termed Head Trust. This kind of trust occurs in contracts and business agreements, or whenever we objectively assess a person's future performance and level of responsibility based on what they say, or how they have behaved in the past.

The other kind of trust is based on confidence, faith, and the authenticity of expression and experience, and is therefore named Heart Trust. This kind of trust is manifested in the subjective joys and sufferings of the personal experience of sharing life together. Heart Trust is seen when we endure present difficulties in the hope of attaining a desire, or discovering a new freedom. It occurs when we accept another person in spite of his/her personal eccentricities and hang-ups – especially when these characteristics affect our ability to place Head Trust in that person.

Going back to the respective functions within Game, here I want to point out that the concepts described in the two essays from Red Pill Theory and Black Label Logic have a direct relation to Head Trust and Heart Trust.

Logical Value and Cognitive Empathy are strongly related to Head Trust. That is, a person can attribute Head Trust to a person who is ascribed Logical Value (viz. someone who you think can give you what you think you want), and who exercises Cognitive Empathy in the exchange (viz. who can communicate verbal or nonverbal confirmations that he/she is willing and able to offer what you think you want).

Likewise, Emotional Value and Emotional Empathy correspond to Heart Trust. The fulfillment of simple social desires serves to draw two individuals into a closer symbiosis.

Under further examination, readers will find that most Game techniques correlate directly with Trust.

- Dread Game works because it disrupts Head Trust.
- Agree and amplify works because it stymies Head Trust.
- The Shogun method works because it stimulates the passions of Heart Trust.
- Amused Mastery, Cocky and Funny, and Command Presence all invite or stimulate Heart Trust.

Readers could probably imagine how Head Trust and/or Heart Trust is affected by various other Game techniques.

But there is another important element that is mentioned only in passing by Donal Graeme and Avery, and that is Charisma. While both men and women exhibit varying abilities with Charisma, a man with Charisma has a special ability to dominate social settings and people in general, especially women. Charisma gives one the ability to draw others into your world and get them to recognize your persona through a pleasant interaction. Game uses the power of your Charisma to attract and hold the attention of others. Recognizing your individual persona is a necessary condition for them to respond to Game techniques by becoming humble and trusting. After a series of pleasant social transactions have ensued, the next step is for them to invest in you. Investment can take many forms, be it time, attention, consideration, acts of service, physical affection, love, sex, or even money, among many other things.

Feminine Humility can be Induced through Effective Game

> "…and she shall be his wife because he has humbled her…" ~ Deuteronomy 22:29 (NKJV)

The concept of Humility is here defined according to the Christian understanding of the word, and not the worldly connotation of being shamed. For those of my readers who are unfamiliar with this distinction, the differences are described in a previous post, Apprehending True Humility (April 7, 2019).

When I talk about "inducing Humility", it's not about shaming or subjugating women. (I fear there will be many readers with an unregenerated mind who will misinterpret this post as such.) Instead, "inducing humility" is about exposing and satisfying heart-felt desires and fulfilling basic needs, whether they might be physical, emotional, social, spiritual, financial, or sexual.

The point here is that when a woman is in a state of Humility, she can experience Grace, meaning that she can get the conviction that this man is ostensibly "better" than what she feels she deserves. This is a key element in both satisfying her hypergamic drive, and establishing Tingly respect, which are vital stretchmarks of a vibrant relationship. Humility is also a key ingredient in the experience of falling in love.

Every woman has an intense Desire to feel that she is loved and cherished, but what is necessary for that to be accomplished is unique for each person. Even women themselves are typically not acutely aware of what specifically it is they Desire. When a man can experiment with women from a relatively objective approach in social situations, he can discern from her responses what it is she actually wants. It's a mindset of poking and prodding through various stimuli to see how the Game plays out.

The key to successful Game is to focus on her problems, needs, and weaknesses in a truly authentic and accepting manner, and to let her subconsciously recognize those things as reasons why she needs you to be the man in her life. Ideally, this awareness should not appear to the rationale of her conscious mind, but instead, should be an emotional affect that she can feel in her heart.

This is why Displaying High Value (DHV) and Teasing juices her up.

And guess what? Jerkboy Chad's @ssholery fits this hoe to a P.

It should be well noted that proud women (i.e. young, high SMV) respond well to being humbled. High SMV Chads find this easy to do, because the feminine desire that they can naturally satisfy appeals to the instinctive fleshly nature, and this is a desire strong enough to take precedence in the minds of their young nubile targets.

However, women who are already humbled (i.e. older, lower SMV) will react negatively to heavy-handed Game tactics. Older women are more familiar with their Desire, they know what they want, and so they don't require much Game to get the balls bouncing. For more on this caveat, read Dalrock's classic post, Are all women addicted to aloof jerks? (May 1, 2017).

Again, what works in each case goes back to addressing her most desperate spiritual needs — whatever it is that appeals to her Desire and humbles her.

Mutual Humility is usually not something that can be consciously engineered into any relationship, but it is something that can be discovered and exercised within selective relationships. "Vibes" are a good indicator of which people have this potential. Vibes indicate that you're both operating within the same value system, and your skills and abilities match the other person's wants/needs. If a suitable person is chosen as a mate, and a mutual Heart Trust is developed, your augmented perspicacity of her humility should become something which makes your relationship unique and eminently necessary to her.

Smart, discerning, self-aware men who have more value to offer a woman than merely a Pump-n-Dump™, should be able to identify other wants and needs that are unique to any individual woman.

For example, my wife has always had a long-standing problem with anxiety which is a consequence of her personality and upbringing. Certain kinds of people and various life conditions (like crumbs on the floor) will make her extremely anxious. On the other hand, I am as cool as a cucumber. Nothing really fazes me, and this quality is what attracts her to me. Although this is not the quality that gives her the Tingles, it is something that draws out her Heart Trust and keeps her faithful. At times, my cognitive orientation and relaxed stoicism is indiscreetly irritating to her (like when I don't care about leaving crumbs on the floor). But even so, she has come to recognize that she can find in my presence a more profound peace and comfort than she could attain from trying to make extensive efforts to ameliorate the various sources of her anxieties (like sweeping the floor six times a day).

The Challenge of Achieving Humility

The nefarious influences of Western culture, Feminism and Chivalry, the sexual revolution and the Pill, have all eroded women's Heart Trust and Humility.

Men and women conditioned by Feminism and its counterpart, Chivalry, don't understand their own wants, needs, and desires. There is some sort of spiritual blindness prevalent in modern culture that prevents them from realizing that there is an aspect of themselves (i.e. Desire) that they are ignorant of, and which they haven't taken ownership of. Instead, Desire is permitted to roam free and unexamined, and it seems unreasonable that they should be expected to accept responsibility for this unknown part of their own nature. Therefore, when a person with Charisma stimulates those desires, they find it easy to jump to the conclusion that they are being "manipulated" or in some cases, "raped". As a point in case, if you were to ever ask a young woman how she ended up in bed with so and so, the default answer would be, "I don't know… It just happened!" Only after many encounters does she understand the mechanics of how it happens, yet she still doesn't understand her own Desire as a motivating factor. (Going one step further by expecting her to take responsibility for that Desire might be deemed "the Dalrock Route".)

As Socrates said some 2,500 years ago, "An unexamined life is not worth living."

Perhaps one of the main reasons why we cannot examine our desires is that a hybrid demon of fem-globo-cultural trends and technology has created an environment that jacks up feminine pride to həllish levels of constant indignity, and debases the Socio-Sexual-Marriage Market Place. As a result, women are proud, they feel entitled, they can get instant gratification and (false) affirmation at a few clicks, and they find it easy to escape the consequences of bad decisions. This allows them to continually pursue the Desires of the flesh, without ever becoming self-aware, claiming them as their own, and taking responsibility for them. Their Desires have mastered them, because they don't understand their Desires.

I'm probably telling you what you already know here, but the point is that women, even Christian women, are finding it increasingly difficult to experience Humility, and this only contributes to their discontentedness and spiritual demise. Many of the feminist cultural enforcers have actually had a habit of labeling authentic feminine Humility as misogynistic and demeaning, as they seek to convert young women into tattooed, debt-ridden, brass-tongued, corpulent, corporate slores. Although they will never give their game away by saying so, their main tools of subversion include these.

1. Condemning the life-giving joys of Humility through glorifying the "Strong, Independent Wimminz" archetype.
2. Normalizing rampant sexual promiscuity which displaces and satiates their natural desires for marriage and children.
3. Teaching women how to resist being humbled by being economically self-sufficient, and emotionally independent.

As a result, most women don't know how to access a spiritual posture of Humility within themselves. They subconsciously expect a man (or "God", for those who are Christians) to "force" them into this state, but as masculinity becomes more persecuted, they are becoming increasingly frustrated in this hope.

Therefore, one of the primary challenges that men face in securing a viable, or even blissful relationship with a woman, is to establish reliable vehicles in which he can invite a woman into a state of spiritual humility. This is where Game comes into the picture.

A sense of emotional security is necessary to pull this off well, and this is where a lot of men run into trouble. For example, the woman throws a $*h*it test, and he loses his cool. The woman is disrespectful, and he becomes self-conscious. The woman plays jealousy games, and he gets angry and fearful. Because of this lack of emotional security, men cannot maintain Frame, and they cannot establish sufficient Heart Trust (AKA Emotional Value, and Emotional Empathy) with a woman to inflict attraction.

Developing emotional security will allow a man to maintain Frame, make him more competent, and elevate his SMV. By the way, there is now a new definition of male competence: How well a man can survive within a culture that condemns the masculinity of his manhood. The average competence of Western men has dropped to the floor because precious few men have realized this current redefinition.

Feminists will naturally want to recast any vehicle of inducing feminine Humility as a chauvinistic method of control or manipulation. (This may be partly true for PUA's and muzzles, but even so, don't admit this argument.) This reaction is partly due to psychological Projection, and partly due to being ignorant of their own nature. But those who are spiritually minded will recognize that Humility is an essential element of the woman's spiritual health and vitality. It should also be noted that the man (i.e. husband) has the Biblical responsibility of being the pastor and priest of his home. Therefore, Game, as a method of inducing Humility and a posture of spiritual obedience within the wife, could be considered an essential element of a husband's duty to love his wife.

Conclusions

As was discussed in a previous post, The Trust Factor (April 18, 2019), trust comes in two contrasting varieties – Head Trust, which is related to Logical Value and Cognitive Empathy, and Heart Trust, which comprise Emotional Value and Emotional Empathy.

The expression of Game can be boiled down to three interlocking elements.

1. Regulating Head Trust.
2. Invigorating Heart Trust.
3. Inducing Humility by the enticement and fulfillment of a heart-felt desire, even one as simple and common as acceptance, affirmation, or connection.

As such, the goal of all Game is threefold.

1. To bypass or disable another person's (i.e. a woman's) pride (Eve's fig leaf covering for shame), apathy, insecurities, and various psychological defense mechanisms.
2. To use Charisma to draw him/her into a state of Heart Trust.
3. To satisfy the person's wants and needs by inducing Humility.

There are several personal qualities that are either limiting or enabling, and therefore are critical factors in Game.

These are listed in order of importance.

1. Charisma
2. Level of Emotional Empathy
3. Level of Emotional Security
4. Knowledge of how social interactions work in general.
5. Experience and Confidence

The most important qualities are inherent, and are also the least likely to change. Charisma is presumed to be a gift of the Holy Spirit. So the work done in improving your Game consists mostly of developing and exercising whatever you've been granted by God and genetics.

 H/T: Boxer: Why Christianity? (February 28, 2019).*

Related

- Dalrock: Why Christians need game. (2012 August 6)
- Dalrock: How Christians can take credit for Game. (2014 February 1)
- Dalrock: A criminal lack of Game? (2014 November 13)
- Roosh V: What is Game? (2018 September 3)
- Σ Frame: On the Spiritual Significance and Social Value of Game (2019 November 3)

The Feminists' "offense" is a race to the bottom.

Jack · 13 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Welcome to Bizarro World.

Readership: Christians
Length: 400 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

Truth has long been known to be offensive. However, being perpetually offended as a fashionable mechanism of defense from the harsh truths of reality made its debut about 5-7 years ago. Since then, Feminists and SJW's always complain about being "offended" by various things, and it seems the list of things that offend them is never-ending.

In a previous post, What does it mean to be unclean? (2018/12/2), we determined that an offense is a process by which one becomes unclean.

> "…it is apparent that practically any repugnancy or offense that causes one to develop a rancorous disposition, is part and parcel of the experience of becoming unclean."

Since I completed that study, it occurred to me that most feminists are unable to be truly offended because they are already unclean. Spending much of their time with beasts, like cats, is one symbolic tell.

Not only unclean, but they are also defiled, and not only by their sexual proclivities, but also by pursuing educational degrees at feminist indoctrination centers, getting tattoos and cutting their hair butch dyke short. Many women also defile their wombs with IUD's and various birth control drugs, and defile their brains and endocrine systems with the same methods. Extreme obesity might also be considered a form of defilement.

It would be more accurate to the fact, and more truthful, for Christians to claim being offended by the various forms of feminist defilements. But stating this truth has come to lack any verbal power precisely because that offense is apparently the very purpose of their defilement.

Now it is sadly apparent that Feminists and their sympathizers want to offend the world in order to drag everyone down to their level, in a race to the bottom.

Welcome to Bizarro World.

Beware of such a person in the future. They will likely be seeking an outlet for passive-aggressive revenge.

Let us refuse to be spiritually demoted by their accusations. Whenever SJW types claim to be offended, our first reaction should be to assess whether this person might be merely allergic to truth. If so, then identify which truth has offended them, and point out the fact that this truth just happens to be unpalatable to their very selective, "special", and "sophisticated" tastes. Perhaps a mock apology would ice the cake of fake condolences and close the debate.

Revised with images and links added on 2023/8/17.

Related

- Σ Frame: Abortion and Birth Control [Page]
- Σ Frame: The Evolution of Feminism as a Series of Cultural Movements (2018/1/15)
- Σ Frame: The 10 Commandments of Feminism (2018/6/5)
- Σ Frame: The Blue Pill, Feminism, and Sin (2018/10/16)

This means WAR!!!

Jack · 18 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

Choose your battles wisely, and remain steadfast in the face of adversity.

Readership: All; Men in LTR's;

Here's another true anecdote to exemplify Pushing the Line (2018 February 27). Click on the link for a description of the dynamics and why it works.

One weekend a couple months ago, my wife and I were having a few drinks at home. After she got tipsy, one of her friends from college started sending her instant messages, telling her how great her own husband was, and how happy she was living in the United States. This chat provoked the standard trivial discontentedness in my wife and aggravated her envy, and she started to recall all the things she didn't like about our life and marriage. After a while of this conversation, she had worked herself into a fury, and started cursing me. If that weren't bad enough, she started destroying small items by forcefully throwing them onto the tile floor. One of the items she destroyed was my smartphone – a rather pricey item.

The next morning, I greeted her by saying, "You really had a rollicking good time last night! I'm glad you enjoyed yourself!"

She just gave me a scowl. I said nothing more about the incident. We didn't talk for most of the day.

A few days later, after she had resumed her normal mood and had forgotten about the incident, I was hanging a new light in the living room. It was a model of a German biplane, similar to an Albatross, so it required some assembly. She was really excited about this, and she asked me, "Is there anything I can do to help?"

I took a deep breath and resolved my will, and said, "Yes, you can get a job and buy me a new smartphone."

She immediately flew into a rage, and started giving me a lot of noise pollution, blaming me for various things that she had been discontented about. I just continued working on the light and let her talk.

After her lecture died down, I said, "You're pretty good at changing the subject, but I won't let this one pass. It's time you started taking responsibility for your behaviors!"

She resumed her verbal calumny, saying that I spend too much time blogging… that I didn't deserve a phone… that I was "addicted" to my phone…

In response, I got down from the ladder, picked an empty whiskey bottle out of the trash and set it on the table with a firm thud. "Do you want to talk about addictions?" She glared at me and walked out of the room in a huff.

About an hour later, after I finished the mounting bracket and wiring harness, I approached her and said, "Look, I know you'll never say sorry. So the only way you can redeem yourself without saying sorry is to buy me a new phone."

She got on her high horse again, and this time, she became very cutting and condescending.

After a few minutes of this, I became angry. I told her, "As long as you keep pointing the finger at me, and refuse to deal with the issue, we will <<<speaking slower and with a guttural emphasis>>> continually be at WAAAR!!! (I emphasized the word "war" with a barbaric, wide-eyed facial expression.) Is that what you want? I'll break your favorite coffee mug… and your big-screen smartphone… just the same as you did to me!" She lashed out verbally again, and left the room. I went back to working on the light.

To my utter surprise, she came in the room only a few minutes later and calmly said, "I'm sorry. I will get you a new phone." I gave her an affirming nod of the head, and asked her to help me hold the light in place while I secured the wiring, which is what she had wanted to do when she first asked if she could help. When it was finished, we spent a few minutes gloating while the peace settled into place.

Afterwards, she spent the rest of the day browsing smartphones online, and comparing the features and prices.

At first, she only wanted to buy phones that appealed to her, but not to me (i.e. oversized screens, extensive photographic capabilities, flashy colors…). But I refused all these. Then she suggested buying a phone like this for herself, and giving me her old Sony (which I actually liked). I said, "That's a wonderful idea… which I might have agreed to under different circumstances. The problem with this idea is that you're still rewarding yourself for your bad behavior. You're not thinking of what kind of phone might make me happy." This statement drew out her empathy, and seemed to humble her. After that, she started to search with more seriousness for smaller, dark colored, masculine-looking phones. Eventually she found a smartphone that was acceptable to me, and we ordered it. I explained that since my need for a phone was much more urgent than her motivation to find a job, then I would have to "loan" her the money to buy the phone. In other words, I insinuated that she was lazy and indebted to me, and that I was being gracious.

Fokker Dreidecker I (replica) – The German triplane used by Manfred von Richthofen, AKA "The Red Baron".

It's been almost two months since this incident. During this time, she has encouraged me many times to find a better paying job. But I haven't responded. Once, I made the comment to the tune of, "I'm pretty happy with the job I have, and you're not giving me any incentives to change that. Why should I work harder? …just to have more money for you to buy more liquor? Then you get drunk… and treat me like crap… and break a lot of stuff – which costs even more money! Do you really expect me to be enthusiastic about increasing your disposable income? You've already destroyed four Sony smartphones – a total price tag of approximately US$2,700!" My key point was that we could save more money and have a better life if she would decide to stop drinking it up. Of course, she wasn't happy to hear that.

She has been shopping around for a job, but she has turned down all the offers she's received so far. I think she is intimidated by the responsibilities of regular employment. She really enjoys being a Stay-At-Home-Wife, and in spite of all her complaints and protestations, she really doesn't want anything to change. I can see how her comfort zone poses a challenge in her personal growth.

Recently she has earned some money doing various odd jobs, including these.

- She started tutoring a 5-year-old boy. (He's a real handful!)
- We have a friend who is a realtor, and she started to help her advertise properties in exchange for part of her commission.
- With her friend's help, she started studying how to make investments in real estate.

Overall, I am pleased with what she has been doing. Tutoring that hyperactive boy is teaching her to be more patient and thoughtful. She's networking with people, and using her time more wisely. I expect that investing in real estate will become a shared enterprise that will lead to our mutual benefit, and take her mind off of her Pygmalion project (me).

Sergeant Alvin C. York, one of the most decorated United States Army soldiers of WW1.

In summary of this incident, I drew a boundary between her thoughts, feelings, and expectations, and my own, and I prodded her until she acknowledged me as an individual having my own thoughts, feelings, and expectations. This distinction raised her awareness of my values and opinions, and increased her regard for my psychological needs. It also bolstered her sense of emotional security, which was (ironically) displayed through her emotional outbursts. She also became aware of how much I improve the quality of her life. Even though it might not be as luxurious as her friend's life, she was still able to reassess her general state of well-being, and find contentment in what she has. I'm especially pleased that I've managed to motivate her to take action, instead of complaining.

From my perspective, she has been more thoughtful and understanding of me, and her behavior has become more respectful and compliant over time. She has grown to be more relaxed and more positive in her discussions with me, and she has shown a greater openness about laughing and playing with me.

All of this has led to a gradual improvement in our relationship. Lately, she has been saying that we are now very happy together.

All because I declared WAR! Imagine that!

Related

- Σ Frame: Don't Admit Her Argument (2018 March 19)
- Σ Frame: My Unhappiness Is Your Fault! (2018 June 3)

How the Pill Affects Pubescent Girls

Jack · 22 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

This post reviews some scientific literature on oral/hormonal contraceptives which have shown frightening, and possibly permanent consequences to the emotional constitution of adolescent females on the Pill.

Readership: All; Parents of adolescent daughters; Women who use birth control pills; Men interested in vetting a woman for a relationship;

A previous post on Σ Frame, How the Pill Changes the Brain and Emotions (2019 October 28), covered how Oral/Hormonal Contraceptive (HOC) medication (AKA birth control pills) dulls the emotional constitution of women on the pill, among other things. But the effects of the Pill are not at all consistent across age. Younger women face the most risk when taking HOC's, and the risks decrease with age.

This is somewhat understandable, since both HOC's and puberty involves drastic changes in hormone levels. The main steroid hormones, testosterone, estradiol, and progesterone as well as prolactin play important physiological functions, both in puberty, and in hormonal contraception. The hormonal maturation of females is considerably more complicated than in boys, and it becomes even further nuanced under hormone therapy.

So perhaps one of the most frightening effects of the pill is what it does to pubescent girls.

The shocking prevalence of women on the Pill

The number of women using oral contraceptives is horrifically huge. To offer some figures…

The pill is the number one contraceptive method in Africa, Europe, and Oceania (Australia, New Zealand, and the South Pacific islands). It is also the most prevalent form of reversible contraception in the Americas [1].

Out of 46,112 studied in the United Kingdom, Hannaford et al. [2] found that 62.4% of women were ever users, and that 63.6% of Pill users were under the age of 30.

Zettermark [3] breaks down the number of Swedish women on the pill during 2010–2011 by age as follows.

- 77% of girls aged 12-14 years
- 8% of girls aged 15–17 years
- 2% of the women aged 18–20
- 3% of women aged 21-30.

It is expected that women on the Pill would be of child-bearing age, but the majority of these women are under the age of 20!

Why are Teenage Girls prime targets for the Pill?

Dr. Angela Franchini noted the many reasons why teenage girls want to be on the Pill, as well as their parents. [4]

Why do teenage girls love the Pill?

- They have lighter periods.
- They have periods accompanied by less pain.*
- They have more predictable periods due to increased regularity.
- Their breasts grow larger and fuller.
- For many girls, the hormonal changes caused by the pill improves their skin complexion.
- They think they don't need to worry about pregnancy, should anything "just happen".

Why do parents of teenage girls love the Pill?

- In general, parents worry less.
- Parents think the pill will prevent their daughter from getting pregnant.
- Parents think that using the pill makes them and their daughter “responsible” for the daughter’s sexuality.
- Parents resort to psychological defenses to deny the risks. “It’s for acne.” “It’s for painful periods.”
- Parents are unaware of the medical risks associated with using the pill.

Mortality Risks are higher for younger women

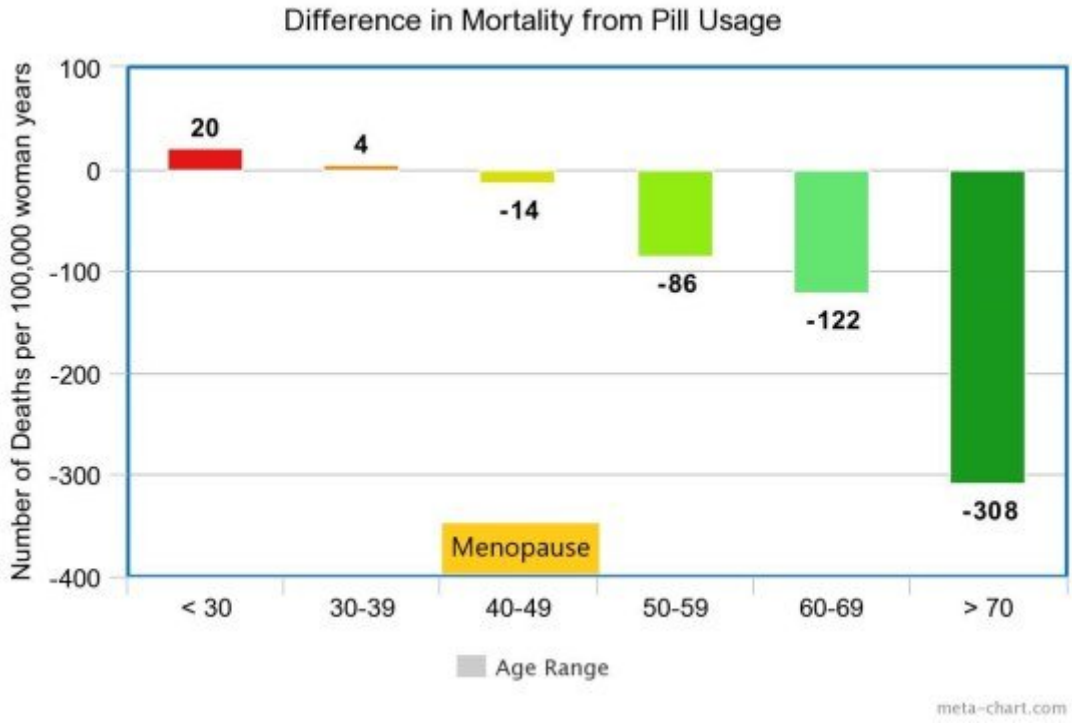
A previous post on Σ Frame covered How the Pill Kills (October 15, 2019). One point I did not cover is that the risk of mortality corresponds inversely with age. That is, the younger the woman is, and the longer she takes the Pill, the greater the risk.

In a 2010 study done on 46,112 women observed for up to 39 years, resulting in 378,006 woman years of observation among never users of oral contraception and 819,175 among ever users. Hannaford et al. found an increase in mortality among women of childbearing age, but a reduction in mortality for post-menopausal women. [2]

In summary, OC use significantly increases the risk of mortality for younger women, and this effect decreases with age so much that older women actually experience a decrease in mortality. The data was broken down as follows.

- age <30: 20 more deaths per 100,000 woman years
- age 30-39: 4 more deaths per 100,000 woman years
- age 40-49: 14 fewer deaths per 100,000 woman years
- age 50-59: 86 fewer deaths per 100,000 woman years
- age 60-69: 122 fewer deaths per 100,000 woman years
- age ≥70: 308 fewer deaths per 100,000 woman years

There is a very clear trend in this data. Note that the age at which the Pill begins to reduce mortality is right around menopause.



Hannaford didn’t offer a breakdown for age stratification under 30 years of age, but an extrapolation might show that the risk increases exponentially into the teen years, just as it does with aging.

> "From the full dataset, the estimated overall absolute reduction in mortality among ever users of oral contraception was 52 per 100,000 woman years, with larger benefits in older women outweighing more modest excess risks among younger women." [2]
>
> "In the youngest (<30 years) age group, ever users of oral contraceptives had an almost threefold greater rate of any death than did never users (adjusted relative risk 2.85, 1.17 to 6.94). From the age of 50, however, the rate of any death among ever users of oral contraceptives was significantly lower than that in never users. In all categories of smoking, social class, and parity, ever users of oral contraception had lower all cause mortality than did never users" [2]

Think about that sentence in boldface for a moment. We might expect the older age group to have a greater mortality rate, simply because they're older. But no, in addition to this difference, younger women who had ever used OC's had a threefold greater rate of any death than did never users – and this in spite of the fact that the ever users population had fewer smokers!

Hannaford glosses over this by pointing out that when all ages are included in the statistics, the overall mortality rate is lower for ever users. Proponents of the pill are quick to jump on this conclusion, but in doing so, they ignore the increased risks to younger women who are inherently more valuable in terms of procreative potential.

My conclusion would be that the Pill is for geriatrics, not for obstetrics.

Effects of the Pill on Neurological Development

In a 2014 review paper, Pletzer and Kerschbaum [5] identified one neurological link between progestin and psychology.

> "Progestin affecting either metabolism of neurosteroids or binding to $GABA_A$ receptors may have not only transient but also neuroplastic consequences. We assume that the potential influence of progestins on GABAergic transmission is highly relevant in pubescent girls using hormonal contraceptives [for the following reasons].
>
> 1. With onset of puberty, neurosteroid sensitive GABA receptor expression increases at extrasynaptic sites in female mice (Smith, 2009).
> 2. Enhanced GABAergic transmission shortens whereas depression of GABAergic transmission extends the critical period in structural consolidation of neuronal circuits in the visual cortex in mice (Hensch, 2005).
> 3. Final volume of the prefrontal cortex is not reached until the early twenties in humans (Yurgelun-Todd, 2007).
>
> The maturing of the prefrontal cortex is associated with improvement in cognitive abilities as well as behavioral control (Yurgelun-Todd, 2007). The prefrontal cortex appears to be one target of structural changes in hormonal contraceptive users (Pletzer et al., 2010; DeBondt et al., 2013). Accordingly, pharmacological intervention by the early use of hormonal contraceptives could affect the differentiation of neural circuits in the prefrontal cortex."

Gamma aminobutyric acid (GABA) is a naturally occurring amino acid that works as a neurotransmitter (a chemical messengers) in the brain. GABA is considered an inhibitory neurotransmitter because it blocks, or inhibits, certain brain signals and decreases activity in the nervous system.

When GABA attaches to a protein in the brain known as a GABA receptor, it produces a calming effect. This can help with feelings of anxiety, stress, and fear. It may also help to prevent seizures. Too much stress is linked to poor sleep, a weaker immune system, and a higher risk of depression, among other things.

In addition, people with certain medical conditions may have lower levels of GABA. Some of these conditions include:

- anxiety
- attention deficit hyperactivity disorder
- mood disorders, such as depression
- movement disorders, such as Parkinson's disease
- panic disorder
- seizure disorders

In simple language, the use of HOC's during puberty has a drastic influence on the development of neural structures, and based on studies of mice, this is presumed to have lifelong effects.

Psychological Effects of the Pill

In 2016, researchers at the University of Copenhagen studied the health records of more than a million Danish women aged between 15 and 34, in one of the largest studies to date [6]. They found that…

- Women on the combined pill – which contains artificial versions of the hormones oestrogen and progesterone – were 23% more likely to be prescribed an antidepressant than those not on hormonal contraception.
- For women on the progestin-only pill, the figure rose to 34%.
- For girls aged between 15 and 19 on the combined pill, it increased even further, to 80% more likely.

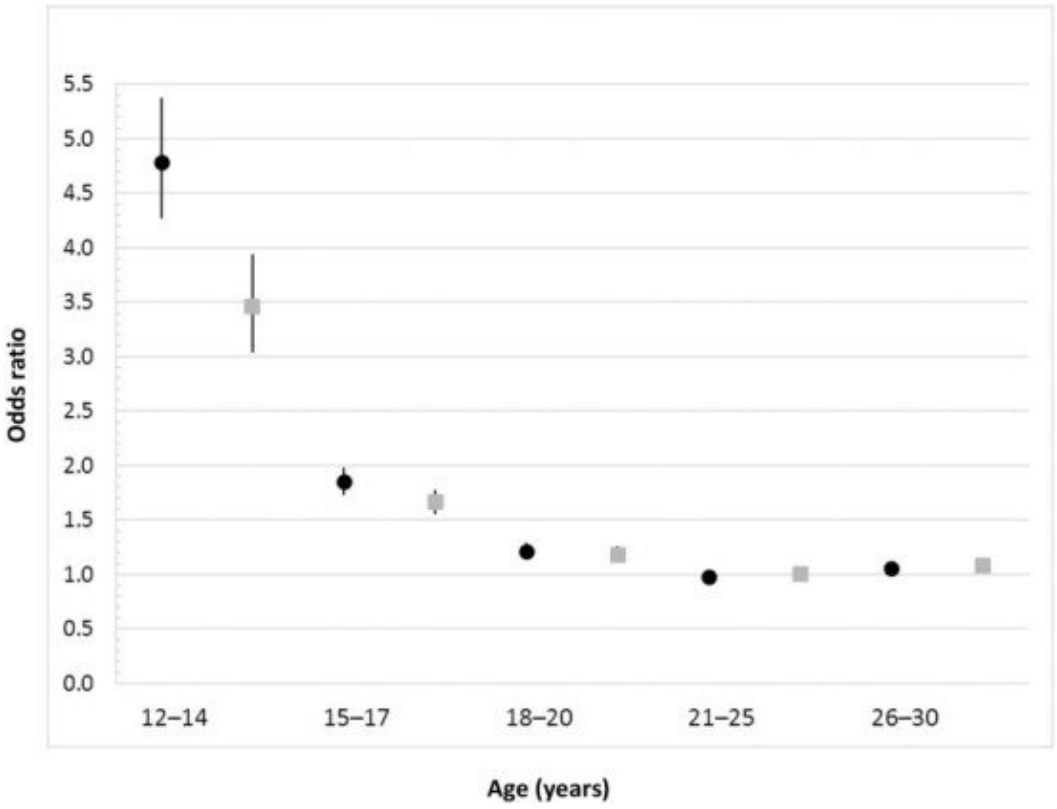
The authors concluded,

> "Use of hormonal contraception, especially among adolescents, was associated with subsequent use of antidepressants and a first diagnosis of depression, suggesting depression as a potential adverse effect of hormonal contraceptive use."

In a 2018 study of 815,662 Swedish women between the ages of 12 to 30, Zettermark et al. [3] concluded that hormonal contraception is strongly associated with psychotropic drug use among adolescent girls, suggesting an adverse effect of hormonal contraceptives on psychological health within this population.



Age-stratified odds ratios with 95% confidence intervals (black lines) for the association between use of hormonal contraceptives and a first-time use of psychotropic drugs within a one-year follow-up after baseline (2010–2011) in 815,662 Swedish women. Crude (black circles) and adjusted (gray squares) values. Adjustments were made for age, family income, highest educational level in family, previous hospitalizations, outpatient hospital visits, and having a diagnosis of thromboembolism, epilepsy or migraine, or menstrual disturbances including endometriosis. [Zettermark, et al. 2018]

Zettermark found that women using pills and IUD's that only contained progesterone were more likely to suffer from negative psychological side effects requiring medication. It was also found that girls aged 12-14 using a hormonal patch or intravaginal ring suffered significantly higher rates of psychological distress than those taking hormonal contraceptive pills.

The Large Scale, Longitudinal Impact of the Pill

With the sheer number of women on the pill, this medication spells out sinister consequences for society. In his conclusions, Pletzer wrote,

> "As the number of women using oral contraceptives constantly increases, while the age of first contraceptive use constantly decreases down to sensitive neuroplastic periods during puberty, the associated changes in personality and social behavior imply significant consequences for society."

Here, "significant consequences for society" may very well read "increased rates of relationship failure, domestic violence, and divorce". These aspects will be covered in a separate post.

Pletzer revealed the Black Hand when he wrote,

> "The hormonal contraceptive pill is the major tool for population control. Hence, such behavioral changes could cause a shift in society dynamics and should not stay unattended."

Indeed!

Conclusions

A brief outline, summarizing the contents of this essay and the scientific research papers cited within, is as follows.

- The risks associated with hormonal treatments decrease with age. Pubescent girls are affected the worst.
- Small chemical imbalances in the body's endocrine system lead to big changes.
- The pill masculinizes the brain structure.
- The pill puts the female's body into "pregnant mode".
- The pill causes a loss of libido resulting in a reduced appetite for sex.
- The pill creates a false sense of calm by reducing anxiety and panic attacks.
- Women on the pill are more likely to experience clinical depression. Depression brings its own unique set of symptoms, including her inability to function normally and feel loved.
- For adolescent girls, the pill alters the development of the brain, especially the prefrontal cortex which is responsible for cognitive ability, emotional processing, and behavioral control. These changes are believed to last permanently.

All these effects bring changes in a woman's personality, social behavior, love life, and all the related decisions she might make.

Parents, please consider the negative consequences listed above before putting your daughter on the pill. The resulting hormonal changes are psychologically disturbing for girls under 18, and carry lifelong consequences.

Take responsibility for your daughter's body and sexuality without resorting to soul-bending drugs.

God's way is best!

 The medication that gynecologists prescribe for menstrual pain is similar or the same as that for birth control.*

Note: This post may be updated upon future developments.

References

1. Earth Policy Institute (feat. Brigid Fitzgerald Reading): Growth in World Contraceptive Use Stalling; 215 Million Women's Needs Still Unmet(27 March 2012)
2. Hannaford, L. Iversen, T. V. MacFarlane, A. M. Elliott, V. Angus, A. J. Lee, "Mortality among contraceptive pill users: cohort evidence from Royal College of General Practitioners' Oral Contraception Study", The British Medical Journal(BMJ) 2010, 340.
3. Zettermark, R. P. Vicente, J. Merlo, "Hormonal contraception increases the risk of psychotropic drug use in adolescent girls but not in adults: A pharmacoepidemiological study on 800 000 Swedish women", PLoS One, 2018; 13(3).
4. Angela Franchini, How the Pill Kills (via. a speech presentation on YouTube).
5. A. Pletzer, H. H. Kerschbaum, "50 years of hormonal contraception-time to find out, what it does to our brain," Frontal Neuroscience, 2014 Aug 21;8:256.
6. W. Skovlund, L. S. Mørch, Ø. Lidegaard, "Association of Hormonal Contraception With Depression", JAMA Psychiatry, 2016.

Related

- Σ Frame: Abortion and Birth Control

Christmas Presents 2019

Jack · 28 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

For Christmas, I wrote a post about how women always want a relationship during the holidays. Just as I completed this essay, Cheque d'Out at Spawny's Space invited me to be a contributing author there. So in the spirit of giving, I decided to post this essay at Spawny's Space. I feel that the topic and style of writing of this particular essay is very appropriate for Spawny's Space, and I'm sure it will receive much discussion there.

Spawny's Space: On Prancer and Vixen… (2019 December 27)

On to another gift…

I had to share this. I haven't been this excited about a Christmas present in years!

The Saturday before Christmas, my wife and I were touring a day market close to our home. We met a Kazakh from southern Russia who was selling the famously iconic Russian dolls.

What are they called?

A Russian professor from Voronezh once told me that these are called Madrashka's, and since he's a professor, I've chosen to go with that. But since I've adopted this term, other Russians have argued with me, insisting that they are called Matryoshka's or Babushka's. Their profanity-laden arguing amongst each other over the name of this toy have continued to amuse me to no end.

Anyhow, we found one that has pictures of the United States presidents, and their corresponding Russian leaders. I really liked this one, so my wife bought this for my Christmas present.

Five piece Madrashka – The height of the largest piece is 11.3 cm.

Note: In the background, you can see my home office workstation where I write posts. I use a 32″ monitor which allows me to view many windows (e.g. webpages, documents, photos) at once. You can also see a nautilus shell and a glass paperweight that resembles a persimmon.*

I like how it has the names of each leader written down the side. The American president's name is written in English, and the Russian leader's name is written in Russian script.

Donald J. Trump – 45th President of the United States (2017-present)

Vladimir V. Putin – President of Russia (2000-2008; 2012-present)

William J. Clinton – 42nd President of the United States (1993-2001)

Boris N. Yeltsin – First President of the Russian Federation (1991-1999)

Ronald W. Reagan – 40th President of the United States (1981-1989)

Mikhail S. Gorbachev – General Secretary of the Communist Party (1985-1991)

James E. Carter Jr. – 39th President of the United States (1977-1981)

Leonid I. Brezhnev – General Secretary of the Communist Party (1964-1982)

Nikita S. Kruschev – General Secretary of the Communist Party (1953-1964), and John F. Kennedy – 35th President of the United States (1961-1963)

I'm surprised this last photo came out so well. This piece is only 1.8 cm. high.

My wife found some earrings she liked, so I bought those for her.

Related

- Σ Frame: Trump Appeals to Dignity, Not Racism (2016 March 7)
- Σ Frame: The Trump Look (2018 June 15)

A collision of two philosophies yields the null hypothesis

Jack · 31 December 2019 · Archived copy · Original

An overview of an insightful exchange with Brett Stevens at Amerika.

Readership: The intelligent, observant, and aware.

In October, I wrote a post describing my understanding of the Calvinist doctrines of Limited Atonement and Unconditional Election: Unconditional Atonement, Limited Election (2019 October 18).

In this post, I cited an article by Brett Stevens that he had posted on Amerika the day before, Meditations on Evil (17 October 2019), which described the nature of "evil", and discussed the misnomer of "good".

Later the same day, Brett Stevens highlighted my post and introduced the term "Solipsism" in his post, How Religions View Solipsism (18 October 2019).

Stevens wrote,

> "I both agree and disagree [with Σ Frame], which will surprise no one. The article is well-written and makes some solid points, one of which is that most people are in the grips of solipsism, which the author describes as "spiritual self-reliance". We heartily agree there.
>
> However, in my view, spiritual self-reliance is the only way to find God; the question is not self or God, but how disciplined the self is, because a mentally disciplined self (i.e. clear, realistic thinking; we are not speaking of cleaning your closet or eating your vegetables here) will naturally find God, since God is a part of reality, and therefore, will become evident the more is understood.
>
> For people with less understanding, the "leap of faith" (roughly: life is good, therefore it has a source of good, therefore God) works, but many now are intensely vested in science and logical thinking, and for religion to work for them, they must be able to derive it inductively in a manner similar to logical inferential leaps much as one would make when refining an experiment or testing a rule."

My writings tend to explore the inductive, inferential approach to faith, but despite its similarities with Gnosticism, this exercise is done in faith. My motive for taking this route is that I need to give my mind something to chew on – a method to process and interpret the truths that I apprehend by faith in my heart. Otherwise, I feel like I don't know what I'm doing. But when my mind can map out a spider chart of cause-effect relationships, then I am better able to discern the nature of God's work in my life and utilize my will – which are all necessary parts of "working out" my faith. I believe my approach is part of my own unique experience of knowing God.*

Steven's article highlighted an issue of confusion surrounding the concept behind "spiritual self-reliance". This is a term I made up to mean one's stubborn refusal to rely on God. Stevens' idea of "spiritual self-reliance" might be paraphrased as being the independent process of "coming to terms with one's self", or "working out one's faith", and he identified my description of "spiritual self-reliance" as something he would call "Spiritual Solipsism".

I examined his arguments and addressed the confusion in a follow-up, The Evils of Solipsism (2019 November 19). In this post, I came to the conclusion that my concept of "spiritual self-reliance" and Steven's concept of "Spiritual Solipsism" were both, in fact, the same thing as the age-old Biblical concept of Sin.

This correlation strikes me as being noteworthy, because we both came to the same conclusions but from different perspectives. Stevens is coming from (what I suppose would be) the perspective of Nihilistic Philosophy, and I came to those conclusions from a subjective, mystical, analytical approach, which might be considered the same as, or similar to, an Existential Philosophy.

The interesting takeaway from our exchange is that Nihilism and Existentialism are at the opposite extremes of philosophy, yet both views agree on the issue of Sin being a problem.

That's incredible! But to those with a strong faith, perhaps these conclusions are not very surprising.

 Note 1: I believe this is at least one example of Stevens' concept of "spiritual self-reliance" — man coming to terms with himself and sorting out his spiritual needs in the journey of Life.*

 Note 2: Stevens didn't respond to my follow up post. I will tentatively interpret this as a tacit agreement.*

* Note 3: If any of my readers go looking for an Aristotelian deduction, either from me or Stevens, you'll probably be disappointed, because the arguments are not logical, but rather intuitive. You have to understand the issues at play and arrive at a realization of the conclusions from your own contemplations. If you haven't yet explored this exercise, it is well worth the time and effort. If you are a Christian, then you should already be on this!*

Related

- Amerika (feat. Brett Stevens): God Force (2019 October 18)
- Σ Frame: Putting evil in perspective (2019 November 15)

2019 Sigma Frame Performance Report

Jack · 3 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Σ Frame's third annual traffic performance report.

Readership: Anyone interested
Length: 1,880 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Overview

I started blogging on March 7, 2008, using Blogger as my blog platform. On September 27, 2017, I transferred the best of my blog writings from Blogger to WordPress, and began concentrating on Red Pill topics. I received more views on WordPress in the first two months, than I had on Blogger in the previous 8 years.

Goals and Purposes

My goals and purposes in blogging are summed up in my About page. I value easily readable, and high content quality posts that stand the test of time – writings that would be of value to readers even decades from now.

Methods

In 2019, I took a slightly different approach towards writing than I have in the past. I used to write in themes, using topics and citations from other articles. I still do that, but this year, I started introducing more epiphanies from my private journal and my life experiences. There is a reason for this change. I have a frequent habit to pray about the purpose of this blog, what I should write about, and what men need to read and know. I continually get the impression that I need to write about my own testimony, and my own spiritual journey.

> "And they overcame him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony, and they did not love their lives to the death."
>
> Revelation 12:11 (NKJV)

This is hard to do, because it requires not only a greater degree of honest soul searching, but also immense courage to display your heart for all the world to see. Being anonymous doesn't change that.

As the following statistics will show, this approach has attracted considerably more traffic. Σ Frame had an average of 175 views per day for the last two months of 2018. This figure increased to 261 at the end of 2019.

Projects

I had several writing projects in 2019.

1. Humility
2. Trust
3. Moon Day Review
4. Rest
5. Hormonal Birth Control
6. Good and Evil
7. Game

I also continued two writing projects from the previous year (2018), but with less intensity.

8. Discipline in Marriage

9. Courtship Models

This past year, the author of Lexet Iustitia revamped his blog to be more focused on legal and societal issues surrounding Christianity. In the process, he purged his some of his older posts that covered Red Pill topics, and submitted these texts to me. I've been in the process of updating/revising these writings and reposting them. The series on Hormonal Birth Control was inspired by one of his posts.

New Pages

Over the past year, I've added the following new pages to the header. The writing project on Hormonal Birth Control yielded sufficient posts to warrant its own page compilation.

- Abortion and Birth Control — Based on a series of posts on the subject.
- Acknowledgments — A list of sites that link to Σ Frame.
- Comment Policy — After one reader had a meltdown.
- Finding your Work / Purpose / Career — Much needed.
- What is a Sigma Male? — Fundamental foundations of the Sigma male perspective.

Noteworthy Posts and Exchanges

Early last year, I wrote a provocative post, Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019/2/23), which attracted the scorn of Susan Titkemeyer at Pathos in her article, Christian Women are Whores? (2019/2/26). She bungled all the statistical figures and feigned shock and indignation. The comments there were, in general, pathetically uninformed, and rambled on until Brother Derek left a comment that corrected her interpretation of the statistics, which then ended all discussion on the matter. I derailed Susan's arguments in a follow-up post, Hitting a glorified nerve at Patheos (2019/3/4). After that whipping, she hasn't come back for more. She also misspelled "Slgma" in the tag, so that it would be harder to find her posts. She obviously doesn't want anyone to read anything she writes about me, because then someone like Derek might leave a comment which would prove to be embarrassing to her.

In The Overton Shake (2019/9/30), I outlined one possible explanatory Frame for why political factions are stewing in their own messes, instead of addressing the opposing factions. Teaser: The Overton window has split into two.

In October, I had an insightful exchange with Brett Stevens at Amerika concerning the nature of solipsism, "good", and evil. This is briefly summarized in the post, A collision of two philosophies yields the null hypothesis (2019/12/31).

There is one post I wrote this year that I consider a masterpiece: Why does Game work? (2019/12/9). I am especially proud of this essay because it answers a monumentally important question that Deep Strength (Christianity and Masculinity) and Rollo (The Rational Male) have been trying to answer for some time: What is behind the "magic" of Game?

I have not yet received any feedback from DS or Rollo. However, this post has been cited by The Futurist (feat. Kartik Gada and Imran Khan): Gems (2020/1/1), under section 16 on Game. (Although lengthy, this article offers a powerful and concise summary of all things Red Pill.) In the hyperlinked text, Khan writes,

> "Game advice has become highly commoditized across the Internet…"

This pretty much sums up the impact of this post. The mystery is now gone, and Game is now a socio-spiritual product to be developed and implemented at will.

I plan to write a few follow-up posts to explain some of the different Frames and nuances behind why Game works.

Traffic Statistics

Finally, here are the 2018 stats for Σ Frame.

Number of followers joining in 2019: 64

Total number of followers (on WordPress): 146

Number of views in 2019: 68,638 views

Total number of views (on WordPress): 115,191 views

Number of visitors in 2019: 28,044

Total number of visitors (on WordPress): 44,208

Average views per visitor: 2.45

Average views per day: 188

Most popular day and hour: Tuesday, 8:00 am

The best day for views ever

546 views on Saturday, November 16, 2019.

Earlier in November, I wrote a post On the Spiritual Significance and Social Value of Game (2019/11/3) which attracted much attention. This post received multiple citations on the following posts.

- Christianity and Masculinity: A core understanding of game, and its interactions with our purpose and sanctification (2019/11/3)
- Radix Fidem: Defining the Term "Game" (2019/11/4)
- Adam Piggott: Friday hawt chicks & links – The cowboy music edition. (2019/11/15)

I also wrote a post about Putting evil in perspective (2019/11/15) which garnered a lot of views. These two posts, supported by the referrals above, propelled Σ Frame through the stratosphere on November 16. That is to say, this beat my previous record of 491 views on 2018 November 21.

The top 5 countries with the most viewers

Compared to last year, the U.K. pulled above Australia, while Germany fell to 7th place, after South Africa.

1. United States: 41,765
2. Canada: 4,309
3. United Kingdom: 4,244
4. Australia: 2,591
5. India: 1,563

Note: All of these countries are democratic, capitalistic societies that are being smothered by post-modern, feministic social ideologies.

Total number of viewing countries: 194

The top 5 search engine terms leading people to Σ Frame

1. what to do when she tries to make you jealous
2. what does it mean when a girl tries to make you jealous
3. if a girl tries to make you jealous what does that mean

4. sigmaframe
5. sigma frame blog

Apparently, women making men jealous is a major problem in society. I will proffer that this is a symptom of society-wide promiscuity of epic proportion.

The majority of search terms included the words, “wife”, “discipline”, “jealous”,

Odd search terms which have led people to Σ Frame

1. amazon
2. real woman meme
3. telegram group slut
4. textron

Even though Σ Frame is entirely in English, 2019 brought a lot of traffic from Russian search terms, and a few in Turkish. (WTH?) These terms are listed here, followed by Google translations.

5. гуруди кормит мальчики – (Russian) breastfeeding boys
6. діти 6 років лапати няню за груди – (Russian) wetnurse for children under six
7. Кормит грудью в общественном месте фото – (Russian) photos of breastfeeding in a public place
8. непристойные фото жен из семейных фото – (Russian) obscene photos of wives from family photos
9. пираты карибского моря кадры из фильма – (Russian) pirates of the caribbean movie stills
10. фото женщина ходит обнаженная по квартире среди детей и родного дедушки – (Russian) photo a woman walks nude in an apartment among children and her grandfather
11. япония девушки лесбиян мама и дочь – (Russian) japan girls lesbian mom and daughter
12. emzirme – (Turkish) breast feeding
13. bebek emziren suriyeli kadın izle – (Turkish) watch Syrian women breast feeding baby

I see there are some really perverted individuals who occasionally cast a short shadow on this blog. I even question the value of reporting this information here, other than the fact that it’s bizarre to the verge of satire.

The top 10 incoming referrers (other than amp pages, search engines, and readers)

1. Adam Piggott: 1,664
2. Christianity and Masculinity: 952
3. Gunner Q: 607
4. Biblical Gender Roles and Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly) tied for fourth place, each having 284 referrals.
5. v5k2c2 (Boxer) 278
6. Spawny’s Space (Farm Boy): 264
7. Wintery Knight: 188
8. Dalrock: 183
9. The Other McCain: 100
10. Cane Caldo: 81

The top 10 blogs receiving the most traffic from Σ Frame

1. v5k2c2 (Boxer) 1,923
2. Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly): 1,686

3. Gunner Q: 1,458
4. Spawny's Space: 1,435
5. Adam Piggott: 1,329
6. Biblical Gender Roles: 1,107
7. Fabius Maximus: 879
8. Dalrock: 868
9. Snapper: 819
10. Wintery Knight: 788

I was mildly offended that neither Boxer nor Sharkly sent me any Christmas cards as a gesture of appreciation.

Posts

Total number of posts published in 2019: 78

Total number of posts published in 2018: 88

Total number of posts published in 2017: 38

Total number of all posts (on WordPress): 277

Total Words in 2019: 141,727

Average number of words per post: 1,817

Note: I published 10 fewer posts than I did in 2018, but I feel I made up for the quantity in terms of quality.

The top 5 most popular pages/posts in 2019 (other than the Home Page)

1. What To Do When A Girl Tries To Make You Jealous (2018/4/22): 15,775
2. Discipline in Marriage (Page): 2,077
3. 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (2017/12/1): 1,653
4. List of Slut Tells (2017/10/15): 1,249
5. Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (2018/2/15): 1,160

The top 5 most popular Tags & Categories

1. Models of Success: 829
2. Male Power: 778
3. For the Married: 777
4. Holding Frame: 650
5. Strategy: 629

Note: Male Power and Holding Frame moved up one notch from last year, displacing For the Married and Strategy, respectively.

Likes and Comments

Number of likes in 2019: 297

Total number of likes (on WordPress): 710

Average number of likes per post in 2019: 3.8

Number of comments in 2019: 463

Average number of comments per post in 2019: 5.9

Total number of comments in 2019: 1,614

The top 5 posts with the most comments

1. A Deeper Look at Contraception and Abortion (2019/11/9): 38
2. Ladies Should Respect the Man and Love the Boy (2018/6/28): 33
3. Yet another variety of Internet Whoring (2019/10/9): 31
4. Leaving a Legacy to Future Generations (2017/12/5): 31
5. Psychological Projection and the Mirror Effect (2017/12/9): 29

The top 5 most prolific commentators (excluding myself)*

1. Ame: 78
2. Stephanie: 63
3. Earl: 61
4. Lexet: 59
5. Derek Ramsey: 47

 Based on the 1,000 most recent comments.*

That's all, folks!

Related

- Σ Frame: 2017 Σ Frame Performance Report (2018/1/3)
- Σ Frame: 2018 Σ Frame Performance Report (2019/1/1)

On the Impact of Appearance and Avatar

Jack · 5 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

What happens when you change your name and branding?

Readership: Anyone interested
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Introduction

In a comment under a previous post, 2019 Σ Frame Performance Report (2020/1/4), Brother Derek (ramman3000) asked,

> "Out of curiosity, did you notice any change in traffic when you changed your name and branding?"

I didn't consider this question when I compiled the data for that report, but it's an important question worthy of examination. It has been more than a year since I made this change, and I believe that's enough time to make an assessment of the effects. So let's review what affects viewership, what changed, and how that impacted the viewership.

What affects viewership?

There are several things that have the potential to affect viewership.

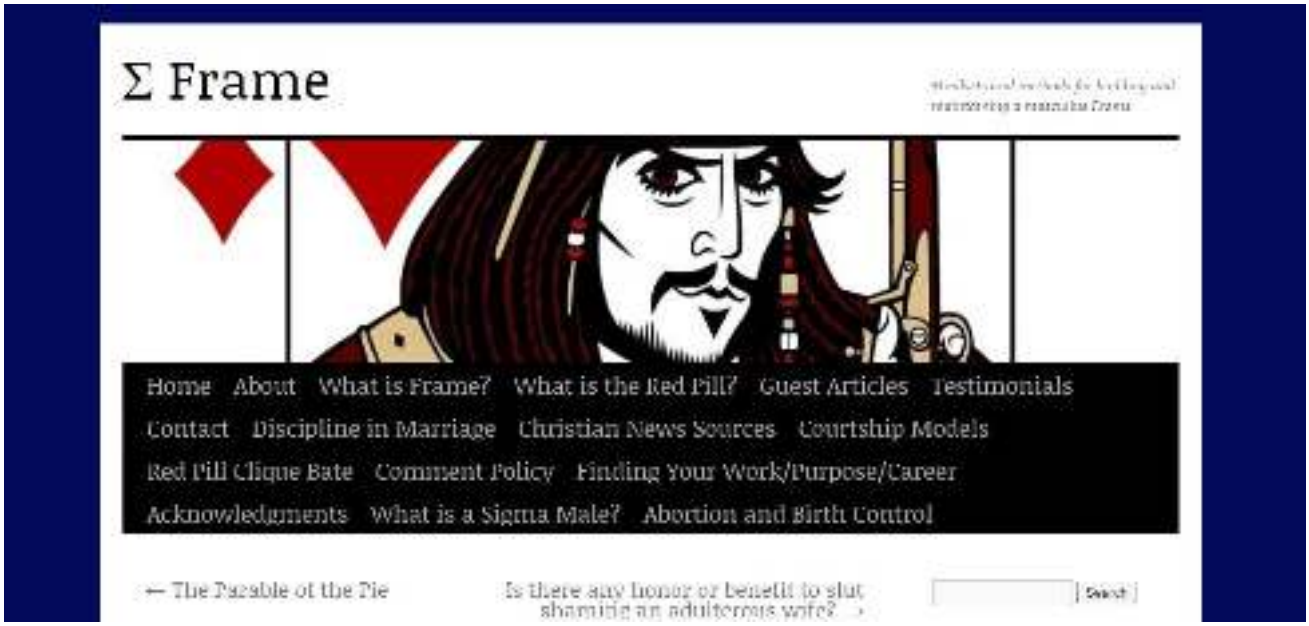
1. Content of posts
2. Length of posts
3. Posting frequency
4. Username or avatar name
5. Banner image
6. Background theme color
7. Use of images within posts

I already covered the first three aspects in the performance report mentioned above. So in this post we'll look at the impact of 4 and 5, which is basically Derek's question.

What Changed?

From September 2017 until November 2018, the Σ Frame blog used the "Twenty-Ten" theme with a black background. The banner at the top of the blog displayed a detailed image of a jeweled brass watch mechanism.

Sometime in October 2018, I decided to experiment with a new site appearance. At first, I made only a modest modification by changing the background color to Black Cherry, and then Prussian blue, simply because these are my favorite colors. By the middle of November 2018, I had adopted the Jack of diamonds playing card and the Jack Sparrow character as the new avatar for Σ Frame. I changed the background color to a dark Navy blue. I also changed the tag line at the top right corner. This is how the site currently stands.



In the post entitled, On the Authenticity of Appearance and Avatar (2018/11/21), I described some of my reasons for making this change. These reasons included the following, among others.

- I was attempting to create more authenticity.
- The image fit my persona a little better.
- I wanted an image that is more piercing, bold, energetic, and clean cut.
- I wanted an image that might appeal to a wider audience of men, especially younger men.

In this post, I offered the following conclusions.

- Authenticity = Acceptance + Honesty + Sincerity

- Getting closer to God not only involves being authentic before God, but also before our fellow man.
- The subjective experience of being authentic doesn't always come easily. It usually requires a lot of emotional work.
- When you can get into the habit of being authentic, people will notice and respond.

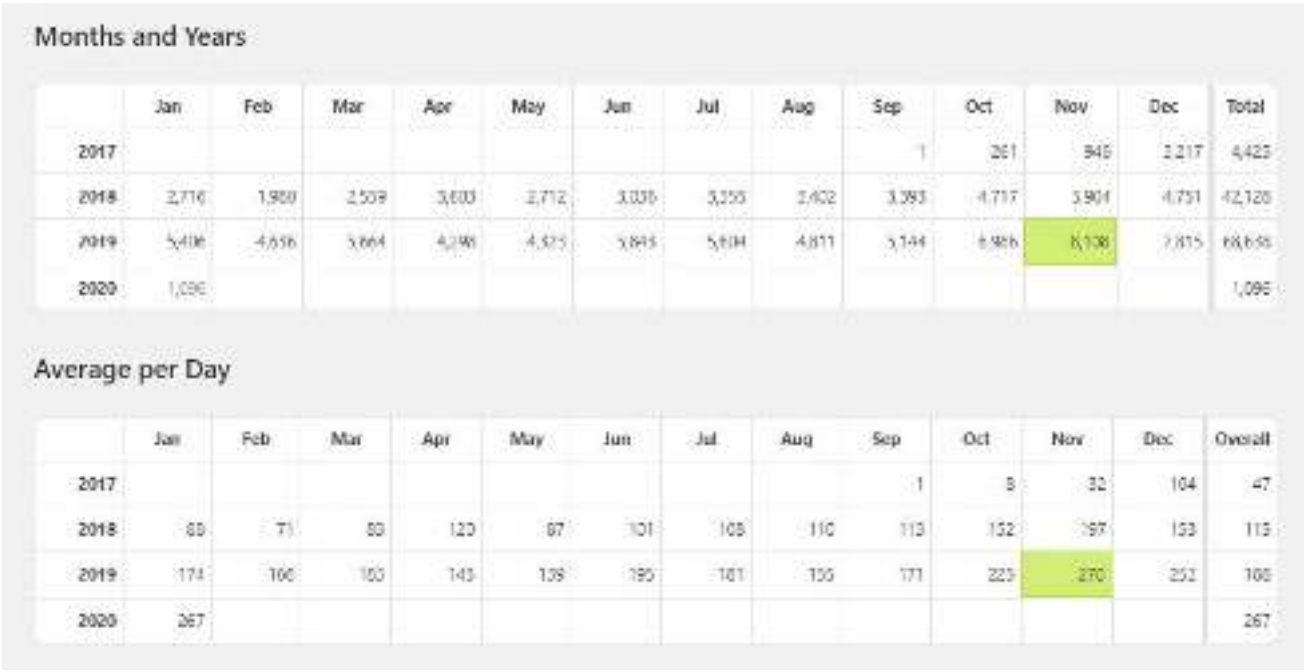
The Impact

Here's what the monthly performance looks like. The range is from when I opened the account on WordPress in late September 2017, to early January 2020. The pink bar is November 2018, when I changed the branding.

Before I made these changes, the level of traffic was holding fairly steady.* The average number of views was 3,000 per month, between December 2017 to September 2018.

As can be seen in the graph, there was a big spike in views in November 2018, which would seem to support the hypothesis that the changes to the appearance had a positive impact. However, the surge seemingly began the month before, in October, when I first started swapping background colors.

A comparison of the monthly viewership to the daily viewership, shown in the next image, only confirms that something definitely changed in October.



Months and Years

	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec	Total
2017									1	261	949	2,217	4,423
2018	2,716	1,980	2,509	3,603	2,712	3,039	3,255	3,402	3,393	4,717	3,904	4,751	42,120
2019	5,436	4,656	5,664	4,298	4,525	5,845	5,634	4,811	5,144	6,986	8,138	7,815	68,636
2020	1,096												1,096

Average per Day

	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec	Overall
2017									1	8	32	104	47
2018	88	71	80	120	87	101	105	110	113	152	197	153	115
2019	174	166	183	143	139	195	181	155	171	225	270	252	188
2020	267												267

After making these changes, the viewership rose and then held fairly constant until October 2019. During this period between October 2018 to September 2019, the average number of views was 5,092 per month.

So the answer to Derek's question is a resounding YES! 3,000 views per month to 5,092 views per month is a 69.6% increase!

As of late, there has been a steady uptick in visitors since August 2019, but this trend didn't make a clear deviation from the running average until October 2019.

What happened in October 2019? I think the answer is simple. I started writing about Game!

 I omitted the data from September to November 2017 because the blog was still new at that time.*

Related

- Σ Frame: On the Authenticity of Appearance and Avatar (2018/11/21)

On the Impact of Theme Color

Jack · 7 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

What happens when you change the background color of your blog?

Readership: Anyone interested
Length: 950 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

The last post investigated how site branding had affected the popularity of the Σ Frame blog. This post will focus specifically on the impact of the background theme color.

What affects viewership?

As a brief review, there are several things that have the potential to affect viewership.

1. Content of posts
2. Length of posts
3. Posting frequency
4. Username or avatar name
5. Banner image
6. Background theme color
7. Use of images within posts

I already covered the first five aspects mentioned above. Factors 1 to 3 were listed in the 2019 Sigma Frame Performance Report (2020/1/4). Factors 4 and 5 were discussed in the last post, On the Impact of Appearance and Avatar (2020/1/5). So in this post we'll look at the impact of 6, the theme color.

What Changed?

Sometime in October 2018, I decided to experiment with a new site appearance. At first, I made only a modest modification by changing the background color to Black Cherry, and then Prussian blue, simply because these are my favorite colors. By the middle of November 2018, I changed the background color to a dark Royal/Navy blue, which is shown below.

The Impact

This is the same graph of the monthly performance from the previous post. The range is from when I opened the account on WordPress in late September 2017, to early January 2020.

Between December 2017 to September 2018, the average number of views was 3,000 per month. Then a surge in views began in October 2018, when I started swapping background colors. The viewership rose and then held fairly constant for one year, until October 2019. During this period between October 2018 to September 2019, the average number of views was 5,092 per month. That's a 69.6% increase!

It's clear both factors had a synergistic effect. The question is, which factor had the most significant effect on views — the background color, which was changed in October 2018 and had a 39% increase from the previous month, or the banner image, which was introduced in November 2018 and resulted in a 25.2% increase from the previous month? It's hard to be certain. Other cofactors exist, and there's not enough data to do a statistical analysis. But it could be concluded that the theme color had a bigger impact than the site branding! And the difference was only a change from black to dark blue!

Personally, I believe the theme color is the major contributor, for reasons to be described next.

A Note about the Impact of Color

Have you ever noticed how Facebook, Line, Linked In, Twitter, WordPress, and many other popular websites have blue themes? It's no accident. Those sites intentionally chose blue as the background color, because gazing at this color is known to increase alertness and decrease appetite. As a result, the theme color is extremely important factor in determining the length of time that viewers spend on a website. This might also explain why these sites have grown to be more popular than their competitor sites that do not have a blue theme.

I briefly mentioned this effect in a previous post, LED Light and Your Eyes (2016/4/1), which examined how the light from electronic displays affects mood and sleep cycles. If this information seems new to you, then you should read this post to be better informed about how to protect your eyes and regulate your circadian rhythms.

There is one particular color which has been shown to wake us up, and it happens to be the same color as the sky. I might guess this to be an adaptation of our species.

The sky appears blue because of Rayleigh scattering and the wavelength-specific optical absorption of water vapor. Simply put, our atmosphere absorbs blue light the least of all other visible colors, such that more blue light is transmitted to the surface of the earth. The color of a blue sky has been estimated to be 474 nm (peak). (Click on the link for a very scientific answer to the question, Why is the sky blue?)

There is a textbook name for this color as well – Azure.

Azure is a bright, cyan-blue color that is often described as the color of the sky on a clear day. On the RGB color wheel, “azure” (hexadecimal #007FFF) is defined as the color at 210 degrees, i.e. the hue halfway between blue and cyan.

On this color palette, azure is instantly recognizable as the color of the sky.

Azure is also instantly recognizable as the color of Facebook. Is it a coincidence?

I am Lord Azure… Look deeply, my Prrrecious source of tax and advertising revenue, and worship me with your time and personal data…

Conclusions

Having this knowledge back at that time, I was tempted to use Azure as the background theme color. But after some reconsideration, I decided a darker blue would be more attractive, and more merciful to my readers, so I chose the Navy blue (#000a5f).

There was also a symbolic reason I chose blue. Blue is a masculine color which symbolizes trust, loyalty, wisdom, confidence, intelligence, faith, truth, and heaven. Blue is often associated with depth, expertise, consciousness, intellect, precision, sincerity, and stability, and this is why it's a preferred color for corporate America.

Blue is strongly associated with tranquility and calmness. It is considered to be beneficial to the mind and body, because it slows human metabolism, suppresses appetite, and produces a calming effect.

For more information on the symbolic meaning and psychosomatic impact of other colors, click here.

I may experiment with a different background color in the future — maybe white or something warmer. I'm open to suggestions.

Note: Current color is #6C111E.

Related

- Σ Frame: 2019 Σ Frame Performance Report (2020/1/4)

The proper and fitting way for women to infiltrate Male spaces

Jack · 9 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Only certain women may enter male spaces, and they must follow protocol to be accepted.

Readership: All

The 2019 Sigma Frame Performance Report (2020 January 4) showed two females to be the top commenters on Σ Frame.

This is the first year that females have been the top commenters. Fellow blogger Soviet Men remarked that comments from females on Σ Frame are counterproductive. I'm not very pleased with this development, because this is intended to be primarily a men's space, and men are the target audience of my writings. I'm also aware of how women gradually infiltrate men's spaces and convert them to wimminz spaces. This phenomenon is described in the following posts.

- The Art of Manliness: The Decline of Male Space (2010 January 10)
- The Rational Male: Male Space (2014 June 3)
- The Red Pill Forum: The Covert Reason Women Hate Male Spaces (ca. 2015)
- Reddit/MGTOW: How Women Infiltrate and Destroy Men's Groups (ca. 2019)

I will stay vigilant about preventing this from happening here, but I'm not going to lose sleep on it.

I have nothing against female readers or commenters, and I do appreciate their feedback when it is considerate, useful, and is expressed in a demure, respectful manner. But I have to give this reminder to the ladies: Righteous women don't make a habit of parading around men's spaces.

If you're a woman, and if you believe you're a righteous lady, and if you really must leave a comment, then please show your respect to the men by observing the following guidelines.

1. Exercise restraint by limiting the numbers and the lengths of your comments.
2. Take some time to think through what you feel needs to be said.
3. Say a prayer and ask God if you really need to say this.
4. If God speaks from heaven in the voice of a whispering wind, telling you to express your hard-won testimony, then write it as clear, concisely, and poetically as possible in the form of iambic heptameter.
5. Proofread your poem several times, to make sure this is what God wants you to say.
6. Go to either (1) a beautiful natural environment such as a lake or a national park, or (2) a public space such as a restaurant or a bustling street corner.
7. Maintain good posture; be buoyantly animated, with bright eyes and a smile.
8. Sing your poem in the key of A# major.
9. Take a video of yourself singing.
10. Submit your musical message to be published as a guest post on Σ Frame.

All women are invited to submit. In fact, it is the will of God! (See Ephesians 5:22-24 NKJV) If you choose not to submit to Σ Frame, then please submit to God by respecting the man in your life.

Contributions with the following attributes will receive special consideration.

- A good singing voice
- Attractively dressed
- Have a sense of class

- Minimal cosmetics
- At least 28 teeth
- BMI < 24
- WHR < 0.7
- Hair length > lower sternum
- No body piercings or tattoos
- In the event of a standoff, thin sexy legs or a buxom figure may be used as a deciding factor

Consider this to be Sigma Frame's Singing Sister Challenge!

In the case of excess female comments on Frame, those women who have successfully matched the Singing Sister challenge will be placed lowest on the list of female-generated comments to be deleted.

As an alternative, you could do any of the following to express your concerns.

1. Write down your perspectives and post it on your own blog.
2. Write down your perspectives and send it to me in a private email.

I've not taken the practice of moderating, and I'd rather not start. But if comments from females continue to outnumber the comments from males, I will do so.

Instead of telling the women to comment less, I'd much rather have the men comment more!

We're looking forward to your submission(s), ladies! Submit your guest article here!

Related

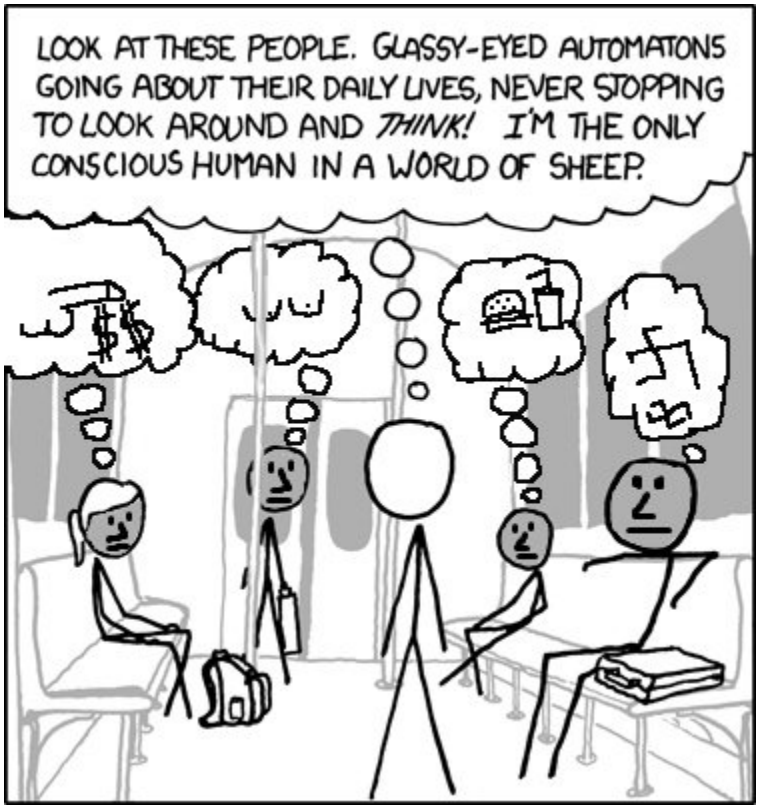
- Σ Frame: The Feminine Dilemma (2018 October 27)

Glitches in replaying the Matrix loop segue

Jack · 13 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The difficulty of conveying mythos and history to evangelize the young.

Readership: All; Those who are aware;



The other day, I was talking with a young man on the train. We had a long journey and soon our talk developed depth.

> "Have you ever noticed how people communicate on a subconscious level?

He gave me a musing look.

> This is a more authentic form of communication. When I first noticed this, I became intrigued because people clearly recognize each other's intended meaning, even though they do not seem to understand each other.
>
> If others are communicating with us in this way, then we should focus on the subjective impression, rather than what words they are using. However, there are some very aware people who can pepper their speech with key words which affirm the nonverbal message they wish to convey.
>
> Did you ever take the time to understand people on this level?"

He sat silently with a confused look on his bright face.

The fact that we were strangers emboldened my talk, because I knew it encouraged the suspension of disbelief.

> "Young man, let me tell you a story. It's a story that you'll tell your grandchildren someday.
>
> Those of my generation and the next one younger were pawns born into an empire of Luciferic command.
>
> Yet, in our youths, we were unaware of the Matrix.

> But, as we were going about “life as usual”, a few people noticed some glitches in the matrix.
>
> Those who were curious – or disgruntled – enough, started to pull at the threads that held all their notions together in a cohesive and respectable façade.
>
> And those whose lives were picked threadbare, and others who never GAF, began to notice certain shapes and forms of things moving behind the fabric.
>
> At first, I believed those forms would “engage” or “threaten” those who discovered them.
>
> And I was right! The shapes and forms of those things behind the fabric… began possessing people with strange notions and expectations.
>
> …and ever so slowly with each passing year, their numbers grew.”

My skillful use of mythical language had taken effect. The youth’s eyes had opened widely, and his breathing had become shallow.

“Who are they?” He asked.

I could not name names, because then he would blow me off as a deluded fool. So I shifted the topic ever so slightly.

> “The people change. The culture changes too! Even I changed!”

He nodded, but his furrowed brow indicated that he clearly didn’t “get it”.

When I noticed this, I faltered. I thought, “He doesn’t understand. …and why am I passing my own generation’s guilt on to the next?” I thought it best to take a strategic reprieve to maintain credulity.

Just then, one of his hipster friends approached, and his suspension of disbelief was broken. He was suddenly transformed into a “loser” for wasting time talking with a befuddled older man.

The foolish youth snapped into the revised context and responded to me with a chuckle.

> “That’s a deep one, mister… I’ll need some time to generate thought on that!”

How true were his words! I’ll guess he’ll need about two decades, at least.

He stood up and jauntled down the aisle with his friend, who was no doubt leading him to a larger group of comrades in another car. The young man quipped, “That guy is high on the Red Pill”, and they laughed garrulously as he repeated a butchered version of my story to his friend. I felt embarrassed to have my confidentiality twisted and blathered to the NPC masses.

Could it be possible that I have gone mad? Have the Satanic tortures of the Matrix driven me insane?

Will succeeding generations be able to relate to, or even BELIEVE our generations story?

Related

- Σ Frame: Where is your life headed? (2019 February 8)

She shall succumb to specious schemes of succulent suffusion

Jack · 15 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

An account of how I convinced my wife to accept my wish to have plants in the house and to be happy about it.

Readership: All; Wife moulders;

The Situation

Earlier this year, we bought a new house. Since we moved in, I've wanted to have some green plants in the house. The first time I mentioned this to my wife, she reacted vehemently against the idea. She said bringing plants into the house would also bring dirt, worms, and bugs into the house. So she was determined not to have plants in the house.

It would be easy to dismiss her reason as a lazy excuse to be particularly disagreeable. But I chose not to interpret her reaction in this way. She is a stickler about maintaining cleanliness down to the microscopic scale. In fact, she keeps the house so immaculate, that I would not be hesitant to eat food off the floor! It's nice to live in such a clean environment, but her anxiety over the matter can become tediously annoying at times.

So after her negative reaction, I silently made up my mind that I would have some plants in the house, and I said nothing more to her about the matter.

This is my house too. I don't need her "permission". I just need to do it in a way that she can accept without a ɦəl1 of a fuss – which I really don't want to hear. Women should remain silent.

The Plan

I decided to begin preparing some nice plants outside in the garden. Then when the plants are potted and growing well, I would choose an opportune time to move them into the house.

Sometime later, we were coming home from a social event, and I stopped at an organic nursery "just to browse". I didn't say so, but I was watching her to see what kinds of plants she liked. She liked the adenium arabicum (AKA desert rose), and since they were on sale, she wanted to buy one. So I bought two, one with red flowers, and the other one pink and white.

On another occasion during our nature walk, I found copious numbers of a tiny, strange looking, succulent plant growing on the eaves of a very old abandoned house in a rural area. My wife was intrigued and she broke one off the shingle and took it home. Because it was growing on the roof, I was certain that it was a sturdy plant that could withstand hot, dry environments.

I planted these in the garden with some organic fertilizer for about six weeks, to let the roots grow out a little bit. To my surprise, the red adenium flourished wildly, and grew to be twice the size of the pink one.

On another day, I found an attractive looking pot at a gardening shop and purchased it. I hid it away until I was ready to use it.

Then a day came when I felt like digging up the smaller of the two adeniums and transplanting it into the pot I had bought. But before I did that, I cut up an old scratch pad and placed a couple layers on the bottom of the pot, so that the sand and dirt wouldn't wash through the drainage ports. I also added a layer of cut grass on top of the pads, adding some organic fiber that would further reduce the transmission of the loam.

After placing the larger adenium in the center of the pot, I used my finger to swab out a hole in the sand and I inserted the small succulent to the side.

After I had repotted the plants, I set it out in a conspicuous place where my wife would see it. She was intrigued, and made a few positive remarks. One day, she asked, "What are you going to do with that plant in the pot?" I didn't tell her what my plan was at that moment, but her question told me that she was about ready for the big surprise.

A few days later, I made a comment about decorative plants.

> "The last time we visited our neighbors, A and W, I noticed they had a small plant on the back of their toilet. I thought that one little plant made the whole bathroom so comfortable and luxurious! Did you notice that too?"

She nodded her head. The idea has now been successfully planted in her mind.

The next morning, she seemed to be in a pleasant mood, so I told her that I wanted to put the adenia in the bathroom, similar to our neighbors'. She seemed surprised, but she did not object.

So I took it into the bathroom, and carefully washed the outside of the pot before positioning it on the lavatory.

Later, I went in the bathroom while she was sitting on the commode. I found her staring at the plant, with widened eyes, a gaping mouth, and a child-like look of wonder in her expression.

She said the little succulent plant “looks so cute!”, and she even asked me how often she should water it.

I can’t decide which is the best part of my plan. Having green plants in the house as I wished, or seeing her face beaming with joy over the sight of plants in the house.

Since then, I’m almost certain that the added greenery and the occasional blossom has done something to improve her general mood, just as it has mine.

Patriarchy at its best!

Thou shalt succumb to the father’s wishes, and thou shalt be grateful!

Related

- Σ Frame: Moulding an Excellent Wife (2018 March 5)

The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage

Jack · 17 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Deconstructing Linda Kay Klein's testimony of her experience with the Purity Culture.

Readership: Christians; especially those who were involved in the "Purity Movement";

Gunner Q's post, The Purity Movement In Review (2020 January 5), tore apart an article at The Conversation, How the 'extreme abstinence' of the purity movement created a sense of shame in evangelical women (2019 December 11).

In the same post, Gunner also studied an author, Linda Kay Klein, who, like many X'ers and older Millennials, grew up in the Churchian "Purity Culture", and eventually found herself to be the black sheep at the runt end of the litter. She interviewed other women who shared her experience to document how these teachings led to guilt and shame, as well as profound ignorance about sex and sexuality.

In this post, I want to further examine Klein and her testimony about her experiences with the Purity Movement, because it's one that is resonating with a lot of people. Klein's testimony may very well serve as a proxy to a large number of other churchian wimmin recovering from the so called Purity Movement.

Klein has a website with a quote from Gloria Steinem on the front page – NOT a good sign.

…and she has a TED Talk. It's so warm and fuzzy, I couldn't get through the first two minutes.

Gunner also cited an article he found at the New York Post (feat. Jane Ridley), How I broke free of the Evangelical 'purity' movement (2018 September 15), which featured Klein's testimony.

One part of Klein's story included the following.

> Before Linda Kay Klein had a routine X-ray at the age of 23, she insisted the nurse gave her a pregnancy test so she would be "better safe than sorry."
>
> It was one of many such tests Klein had undergone over the previous few years because of her fear of having a baby out of wedlock.

> Never mind that she was still a virgin.

I'm LMAO at the denial here. As Earl pointed out,

> "…sex ed in Murica is about preventing a pregnancy rather than stating it's a natural result of the act. And no woman is naive enough to think if they are still a virgin they need a pregnancy test… [She wanted a pregnancy test] because she was testing to see if the deed did what it can do."

There's no way for us to know whether Klein may or may not have been lying about being a virgin, but this request for a pregnancy test is good evidence to believe that she was in regular contact with semen in some way.

Even if we give her the benefit of the doubt, she may be technically a virgin, but comprehensively, not. So in effect, she was lying about being "pure", and she wasn't just lying to her church, to her family, and to the author of the article… She's lying to herself. But why would she lie?

> "The good girl/bad girl thing is our default way of thinking," Klein said."

Ahhh… of course! She wants the clear conscience and the social prestige that goes with being one of the "good girls", whether or not she is actually a good girl.

She goes on…

> "I want to draw attention to the dangers of sexual shaming and purity teachings."

What might be these dangers, pray tell? Could it be that she has determined to explore her sexuality, but she's afraid of being framed as a bad girl by the Choich ladies? Yes, that's a real danger to both the Feminine Imperative and her desire to be seen as a "good girl".

> "Growing up, she'd been told by pastors and church teachers that she was a "stumbling block" of temptation for boys and men. This was largely presented as her problem, not theirs: It was made clear that she would be cast as a Jezebel — with her character corrupted — if she had sex before marriage."

But this now begs the question: Why is this a source of shame? If they truly were pure virgins in waiting, if they truly were focused on preserving themselves for a husband, then why would they identify as a Jezebel?

I can see how they might feel afraid of succumbing to temptation. It might even be possible that they are experiencing a false sense of shame for some reason. But it's easier to believe that they feel ashamed because they are NOT focused on preserving themselves for a husband. Instead, they are focused on the dilemma of how they can pursue the dicktates of the Feminine Imperative, while still maintaining the image of a "good girl".

What no one is saying is the obvious – that the Purity Movement turned out to be, for some, a modern reiteration of the age old practice of S1ut Shaming. Of course, s1uts don't like S1ut Shaming because it makes them Feeelz ashamed and pressures them to adjust their behavior.

> "The message traumatized Klein and many of her peers, sparking fear, anxiety and, in the extreme case of one woman interviewed for the book, the symptoms of anaphylactic shock when she first had sex. (The woman started wheezing and breaking out in welts and wound up in the ER.)"

Perhaps it wasn't the actual experience of no-holds-barred sex that shocked this woman. Maybe she was shocked because she realized that after a decade of diddling around just short of consummation, there was nothing new left to be discovered, and that she had been wrong about her concept of what sex is all about. In just the space of a few minutes, all the guilt and shame that was amassed during all those profligate years of pseudo-sex filled "dating" finally comes home to roost in the conscious mind.

> "For Klein, the terror was enough that she broke up with her high-school boyfriend at the age of 16 because she was convinced it was God's will."

Because of her terror of being cast as a Jezebel, she breaks up with her boyfriend and eventually becomes a Jezebel. That's definitely a knee-jerk reaction of fear. And she says "It was God's will…" No, God doesn't use that kind of fear as a motivator. Whenever someone says something is "God's will", I suspect that in fact, it is NOT – that they are taking God's name in vain.

Instead, I would guess it was God's will for her, not to break up with her boyfriend, but to begin preparing for a marriage to him. But of course, feminist culture has solemnly declared that a virgin getting married during a timely period of peak fertility is intolerably out of the question. As a consequence, her natural desire for a husband, sex, bonding, and children are only a source of temptation, frustration, and confusion. The real reason she broke up with her boyfriend is because she feels guilty about the idea of breeding outside of a proper marriage, and she knows her breeding instinct is going to overpower her sooner or later, because that's how God created the natural order of things. But the problem with this is that it would upset both the Feminine Imperative lodged in her subconscious feral nature, and her desire to be seen as a "good girl". Moreover, she is caught in the conundrum that modern Western society and the converged church has designed for the young, and she is confused as ɦəll.

> "We'd French kiss and every sexual nodule of my body would go off," she recalled of the ill-fated three-month relationship. "But every shame module in my body was alive, too, because I had been trained [by the church] to feel like that.

Maybe she feels ashamed because French kissing has already gone past the line of integrity and propriety for her conscience. If not, we could presume that she's lying, and that "French kiss" is a euphemism for jumping bones. This seems credible if we specifically understand the "sexual nodule" she speaks of to be her clitoris, and "going off" is a polite pretense for an orgasm.

> "I would beg God to be the refiner's fire and tear us down so that our sinful desires burnt to a crisp," recalled Klein. "I wanted Him to remake us into something more holy and pure and some day I could be with [my boyfriend] again."

The fake piety is pedantically cute, and no doubt won her some points as an innocent "good girl". But if she really believes that, then she is sooo naïvely ignorant of what her sinful desires really are! She has a strong desire to merge with a man, and she thinks that is a sin. It is not. It is a doctrinal heresy to condemn sex and/or marriage. In actuality, her sinful desire is to conform to the Feminine Imperative and the dictates of Feminist churchianism – more specifically, to break up with her boyfriend, and postpone marriage and childrearing while she tantalizes her ego in the SMP and possibly the Carousel.

It's not clear whether she was aware of the outcome of this choice at the time. She may not have known this inevitable outcome as a teenager, but she definitely did as a 20-year-old college student.

But when she was finally wizened in the ways of the world, and could see far enough ahead to know the final destination of the road she was on, do you think she would correct her path, resume her relationship with her first love, and with the intentions of marriage?

Let's find out.

> These issues continued into her 20's when, still a virgin, she attended Sarah Lawrence College and, later, New York University. By then, she had turned her back on Evangelism after beginning to doubt aspects of its theology — and after a youth pastor at her old church was convicted of the sexual enticement of a 12-year-old girl.

It's just as I suspected. She'll reject God before she corrects her ways. A liberal education, and an anecdote about how Christians are hypocrites provides a sufficient psychological justification for doing so. Interestingly, this provides the impetus for becoming a hypocritical Christian herself.

Sadly, there is no one to speak truth into her life nor hold her accountable, or at least no one she's listening to. It's highly likely that she ignored any truthful admonitions because she's already let the cat out of the bag, and is consumed with fighting fires.

So what happened next?*

> At age 22, she'd been dating a man for three years without having had penetrative sex. She recalls how she would curl up into a ball of anxiety and cry uncontrollably while lying naked in bed with him. Often, she would break out in patches of eczema that she'd scratch until her skin bled.

She's sleeping naked in bed with a man. But it's okay, because she's still a virgin! The rules of sexual purity have been dutifully observed.

We've already found good reason to believe that she's lying to herself (and everyone else) about remaining "pure". She has strong motivations to lie, so it's all that much harder to believe these stories.

I find it very hard to believe that a woman could wait for marriage for 20 years, or even five, while remaining a virgin. She's got to be tasting the action with some regular orgasms. How else could she be able to postpone marriage (and sex) for so long?

If a woman is really able to forsake sex, then she shouldn't be getting married at all. But I doubt that is the case with miss Klein.

To what degree are the somatic symptoms she described directly due to teachings on purity? How much of this is a result of her own sin and transgression? I tend to believe it's a result of her own sin, exacerbated by the acute knowledge that it is wrong, which was gained from her involvement in the Purity Culture. God chastens the child He loves, even though she's still pursuing rebellion.

> "The fictions I had learned in church haunted me," said Klein, who was on birth-control pills at the time. "I thought if you were in a hot tub and someone ejaculated, [sperm] would somehow get over to you. Sex created such a sense of shame that not only could I not have [it], I had nightmares and constant nagging thoughts of how far we had gone sexually."

Now she's in a hot tub with ejaculating men, however, she is being "responsible" about her sexuality by taking birth control pills. But the problem, mind you, is that she Feeelz ashamed of this, not that she shouldn't be there in the first place.

Do I need to point out (again) that if she had been obedient to God by marrying the love of her youth, then it would have prevented all this frustration and suffering. But given all this angst, now she will certainly need to talk about it with others.

> "The cycle came to an end in her mid-20's after she decided to discuss the damage that the purity ethic had done with female friends back in the Midwest, who admitted they struggled with similar issues."

Here comes the Herd mentality…

> "I realized… the problem wasn't with me," Klein said.

And this realization, fueled by the indignant moxie of her promiscuous churchian friends, provided the psychological justification to complete her rebellion by "going all the way".

> "She lost her virginity at the age of 26 to a man with whom she'd been in a long-distance romance for about a year."

Finally, after years of antagonizing, Satan wins this soul game. Her first love would never want her defiled a$$ now, not that she would care by this point. And who will now volunteer to marry this liberally educated, debt ridden, carousel riding, post prime, damaged "goods" Churchian?

> "The sex wasn't traumatic, it was quite beautiful because I'd learned, by that point, to separate sexuality from spirituality," she said. "It felt like a holy experience — as if God was in the room with us."

I've heard this one many times before, and it's confusing as ɦəll. How can one separate sexuality from spirituality? How can one experience God while one is fornicating? Is this a spiritual deception?

Earlier in my life, I explained this phenomenon as such: Satan will let off the pressure when you do his will and bow down to worship him. You'll also get a kick out of satisfying your base desires.

But as I've grown older, and experienced the same thing myself, I've developed a more sophisticated understanding of this phenomenon. I covered this in a past essay, How is illicit sex related to one's spiritual state? (2019 May 22). I'll summarize the conclusions as follows.

Having the experience of falling in love, bonding, and feeling accepted and blessed are not a direct result, or "reward", of wrongdoing, but rather an inherent result of being humbled and opening one's heart. Engagement in sexual relations is a strong catalyst of this same state. Most people don't seem to be aware of this correlation because they make a reflexive fundamental attribution error.

When one can get out from under the umbrella of sin, one will naturally experience the showers of God's blessing and grace. Churchians with a superficial understanding of sin would be tempted to conclude that the fornicating is the sin, but it is not. Fornicating is merely the fruit of the sin. Kline's sin, in this case, was not fornicating, but was in postponing marriage while believing that her sexual "purity" is what made her righteous, worthy, and would bring her blessing. She compounded this sin by resolving to retain her purity under her own free willpower, instead of trusting in the provision of God (which came in the form of a high school boyfriend / potential husband whom she was originally crazy about). Unfortunately for the sap who became her future husband, it required a bit of whole-hearted fornicating to wake her up from her deception and idolatry.

Time goes on…

> Now wed for four years (to a different man), Klein, who is still a Christian, is "very grateful not to have brought any sexual shame into her marriage."

I wonder if her premaritally cucked husband would agree about that.

> As the stepmother of a 17-year-old girl, she hopes her book will help other women who have experienced the shame she did.

> "The shame we are creating in our culture is not about bashfulness and shyness," she said. "It is equated with worthlessness and isolation."
>
> She has launched a nonprofit, Break Free Together, which guides people of all ages on issues of spirituality and sexuality.
>
> "We need to start laying the groundwork for kindergartners to have healthy conversations later," she said. "There is a need to begin talking about these things early."

Kindergarten is pretty early! What does she want to tell them?

The article doesn't specify, but I have to wonder about what solution she will propose. Here are some possibilities.

- Do not marry.
- Postpone marriage until after X happens, where X = education, career, (s)experience, baby rabies, etc.
- Dispense with the teachings of sexual purity as the Good Book prescribes.
- Go on crying about the aspect of shame and guilt that results from resisting God's will for your life, and attract a following. Blame the church. Build a career out of it.
- Teaching children and adolescents how to separate spirituality and sexuality.

If Ms. Klein pursues any of these, I'm afraid that Satan will win again!

In conclusion, I should point out that Klein never really loved her high school boyfriend, who was probably her first. If she did, then she would have made a high priority of marrying him ASAP. But instead, she sacrificed her relationship with him in order to pursue her false notions of "purity", which is reminiscent of a heretical "salvation by works" mentality. This is the real underlying apostasy of the Purity Culture – NOT the shame, and certainly NOT the admonition to remain sexually pure.

Klein will have to come away from her current emphasis on shame, which is a Feminist message, and start focusing on what her real sin was – thinking it was God's will for her to remain single and sexless during her peak years of fertility, and failing (or refusing) to see real opportunities for fulfilling God's will that were presented to her, namely allowing herself a timely marriage during her peak, and all the blessings that go with that.

 Gunner omitted this in his review, but I find it pertinent.*

Image credit: The artwork shown in this post was created by the Lebanese artist, Kristel Bechara.

Related

- Σ Frame: They're telling us what Courtship is not, and not what Courtship is. (2019 February 19)
- Σ Frame: Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019 February 23)
- Σ Frame (feat. Lexet): Christian vs. Non-Christian Women – A Negligeeable Difference (2019 March 20)

Letting Go of Pretenses

Jack · 20 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

More tips about rest.

Rest is Letting Go of Pretenses

One way to find rest through worship is in being true to your nature. Posture positioning and "wearing face" always requires a lot of work. I think this is why the Bible says that the wicked have no peace (or rest), in Isaiah 57.

> [20] But the wicked are like the troubled sea, When it cannot rest, Whose waters cast up mire and dirt. [21] "There is no peace," Says my God, "for the wicked." ~ Isaiah 57:20-21

Even while working or studying, short periods of rest are necessary to renew ones' strength throughout the day, because studies have shown that the average persons' attention span only lasts 20-40 minutes.

In America, those coworkers who take the time to make coffee, or bring in doughnuts or cake for everyone, are encouraging people to rest.

In Asia, people have a habit of drinking tea and eating fruit together as a form of rest, which is usually done in the afternoon.

Think of those people who go outside to have a chat and a smoke during their breaks. All these habits are very quick, powerful forms of RENEWAL for them, and in most cases, they have never even left the workplace!

In fact, some laws regulate how long hourly-wage employees can be required to work without a break, and in most countries, it is about 2 to 3 hours. These laws are modern expressions of the Mosaic Law.

The important point to remember here is that DAILY and WEEKLY REST and relaxation are very important to all aspects of our health: physical, emotional, social, spiritual and mental. So please ensure adequate periods of REST to your body, mind and soul, while still keeping a disciplined and timely schedule. It is no small task to find creative and effective ways to REST each day and each week.

By the way, although watching TV can be a very restful form of entertainment, be careful that you do not let yourself depend on TV too much. It is better to spend your time with a friend, or alone in peaceful tranquility. In fact, I tell my students that anyone who spends more than two hours a day watching TV is detrimentally dependent on TV as a form of REST. (Anyone who spends more than 6 hours a day watching TV, has a TV addiction!) I urge such a person to develop other activities that will provide more real-life benefits and not waste so much of their time.

Read about time management here.

Now, I think I've written enough for today. I'm going to quit and take a rest.

Related

- Σ Frame: True Rest as a form of Worship (2019 October 12)
- Σ Frame: Why is Resting Important? (2019 November 6)

Hijacking and Misappropriating Eastern Mysticism

Jack · 23 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Why have paraphrased quotations from Eastern religions become so popular on social media?

Readership: All;

Ever since the Beatles (et al.) went to India to study transcendental meditation in 1968, western culture has seen the wisdom of Eastern mysticism paraphrased and popularized in books, magazines, social media, and self-help, "pop" psychology.

Why have these teachings been welcomed and integrated into western culture?

Let's look at one such credenda as a point of focus.

Over the past year or two, I've seen the following moxie in various forms, quoted, reposted, and reblogged ubiquitously around the Western sphere.

> "Each time you judge yourself you break your own heart."

Trite power quotes like these seem to be especially popular among females. For example, see this commentary from Embracing Inspiration.

Apparently, this concept arose from within eastern mysticism.

> "My beloved child, break your heart no longer. Every time you judge yourself you break your own heart. You stop feeding on the love which is the wellspring of your vitality. The time has come. Your time. To live, to celebrate, and to see the goodness that you are. You, my child, are divine. You are pure. You are sublimely free. You are God in disguise, and you are always perfectly safe. Do not fight the dark, just turn on the light, and breathe into the goodness that you are." ~ Swami Kripaluanandaji

If I may read my own understanding of Truth into Swami's words, I would say he is describing one's subjective experience of accepting one's self, experiencing a sense of unconditional love, and coming into the presence of God. If I'm right about this, then it does describe a subjective truth, but the spiritual Truth of Swami's words have been lost in the translation. I would substitute the word "judge" with "condemn", and instead of the alarming phrase, "You are God in disguise", I would put this sentiment as, "You are known and accepted by God".

But without taking the liberty to reinterpret the underlying meaning, these statements stand in direct opposition to what the Bible says [words of Christ in red],

…about judging one's self.

> "For if we would judge ourselves, we would not be judged. But when we are judged, we are chastened by the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the world." ~ 1st Corinthians 11:31-32 (NKJV)

…about constructing personal standards.

> "Consider carefully what you hear," he continued. "With the measure you use, it will be measured to you—and even more. Whoever has will be given more; whoever does not have, even what they have will be taken from them." ~ Mark 4:24-25 (NIV)

…about expectations from others.

> "Do not judge, or you too will be judged. For in the same way you judge others, you will be judged, and with the measure you use, it will be measured to you." ~ Matthew 7:1-2 (NIV)

…about humility and forgiveness.

> [21] Then Peter came to Jesus and asked, "Lord, how many times shall I forgive my brother or sister who sins against me? Up to seven times?"
> [22] Jesus answered, "I tell you, not seven times, but seventy-seven times.
> [23] "Therefore, the kingdom of heaven is like a king who wanted to settle accounts with his servants. [24] As he began the settlement, a man who owed him ten thousand bags of gold was brought to him. [25] Since he was not able to pay, the master ordered that he and his wife and his children and all that he had be sold to repay the debt.
> [26] "At this the servant fell on his knees before him. 'Be patient with me,' he begged, 'and I will pay back everything.' [27] The servant's master took pity on him, canceled the debt and let him go.
> [28] "But when that servant went out, he found one of his fellow servants who owed him a hundred silver coins. He grabbed him and began to choke him. 'Pay back what you owe me!' he demanded.
> [29] "His fellow servant fell to his knees and begged him, 'Be patient with me, and I will pay it back.'
> [30] "But he refused. Instead, he went off and had the man thrown into prison until he could pay the debt.
> [31] When the other servants saw what had happened, they were outraged and went and told their master everything that had happened.
> [32] "Then the master called the servant in. 'You wicked servant,' he said, 'I canceled all that debt of yours because you begged me to. [33] Shouldn't you have had mercy on your fellow servant just as I had on you?' [34] In anger his master handed him over to the jailers to be tortured, until he should pay back all he owed.
> [35] "This is how my heavenly Father will treat each of you unless you forgive your brother or sister from your heart." ~ Matthew 18:21-35 (NIV)

If the wicked servant had ever taken a moment to engage in transcendental meditation and judge himself as one receiving unmerited mercy, perhaps he would have escaped the second judgment by the master.

After recounting the scriptures above, a second glance at Swami's admonition seems effeminate and foolish. But if that were the end of the story, then how could such teachings ever gain popularity in the East?

Having lived in Asia for 15 years, I might generously presume that these foundational concepts of being indebted to the good graces of others, judging one's self, constructing personal standards, forming reasonable expectations from others, and exercising humility and forgiveness, are a basic, integral part of many eastern cultures – something that is well understood, but would be tedious and mundane to recount. As such, these concepts are therefore assumed as prerequisite knowledge for the proper understanding of Swami's admonitions to accept and forgive one's self, which is a personal truth that is commonly understated or ignored in eastern cultures and therefore needs to be emphasized.

In contrast to eastern cultures, the foundational concepts that are well understood by those in western cultures are confidence, self-reliance, independence, individuality, and personal liberty. The problem with members of a western culture citing such teachings from eastern mysticism as axioms to live by, is that it exalts the self without first laying the background fundamentals of one's place and responsibility in one's family and culture. Given the natural female desire for affirmation, it is easy to see how feminist culture can hijack eastern mysticism to offer moxies for "female empowerment" and the "strong independent woman" mascot. As a result, key truths offered by eastern mysticism become an excuse for irresponsibility, and a justification for entitlement for those in the west.

But if these same females had grown up in a culture having a strong patriarchical social structure, such as filial piety in the far East, or the caste system in India, where women are routinely considered to be inferior to males and burdened by heavy expectations for performance, they would then understand the true wisdom of Swami's words [paraphrase mine]…

> "My beloved child, break your heart no longer. Every time you condemn yourself you break your own heart. You stop feeding on the love which is the wellspring of your vitality. The time has come. Your time. To live, to celebrate, and to see the goodness that you are. You, my child, are divine. You are pure. You are sublimely free. You are known and accepted by God, and you are always perfectly safe. Do not fight the dark, just turn on the light, and breathe into the goodness that you are."

This is truly an important insight that needs to be shared with humble Easterners of modest means who are heavily constrained by cultural demands. But liberated western women have no such discipline in their repertoire of life experiences, and therefore, they miss out on the life-giving truth of an authentic self-acceptance resulting from a transcendental meditative introspection.

So you see, the cultural context makes all the difference.

Related

- Σ Frame: Foundations of Cultural Ethics and Chivalry (2018 February 18)
- Σ Frame: Fake Knights and Phony Princesses (2018 March 14)

The U.S. Census Bureau sanctions Divorce

Lexet Blog · 25 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A report from the U.S. Census Bureau describes how an easy Divorce is a positive thing for both women and society!

Readership: Christians in the United States; Others who may be interested;
Length: 2,350 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Introduction

In December of 2019, the U.S. Census Bureau published an article by one of their employees titled, "When Laws Make Divorce Easier, Research Shows Women Benefit, Outcomes Improve." This article is intended to showcase

> "…one of the many independent research projects done by U.S. Census Bureau experts on topics relevant to the agency's mission."

This research has the backing of the government (under Donald Trump's presidency).

The author of this article is Dr. Misty Heggeness. Misty has worked for the National Institute of Health, and is apparently still a senior advisor at the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis. She is currently a principal economist and senior advisor in research and methodology. Her pay grade is GS-14 ($127,000 base pay). By all accounts, she is intelligent, and knows data. But from the looks of her report, it seems that she also specializes in data manipulation to further feminist goals.

"Surprise! An easy Divorce is good for you!"…she says.

The article starts out by stating that divorce carries a negative stigma – broken homes and acrimony. Don't worry, though. New studies now show,

> "…divorce laws can actually have a positive effect on society and the economy."

It's hard to imagine exactly how Divorce helps the economy. I suppose it has always been obvious that divorce supports private investigators and others in the legal profession, but we would have never guessed that barristers had so much influence over the national economy. But if we take Misty at her word, then it stands to reason that if we could make divorce easier for women, then we could pay off the national debt a century sooner!

The second sentence of the article literally says,

> "…laws that make it easier to divorce can improve the welfare of household members, even for couples that stay together."

Mind . . . blown!

Misty's third sentence then contradicts everything else she writes:

> "…divorce can be difficult and lead to less than ideal well-being outcomes."

This sentence links to a research paper written by Jonathan Gruber (a man) at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) and the National Bureau of Economic Research (NBER), who used 40 years of data and found,

> "*…unilateral divorce regulations do significantly increase the incidence of divorce. Adults who were exposed to unilateral divorce regulations as children are less well educated, have lower family incomes, marry earlier but separate more often, and have higher odds of adult suicide."

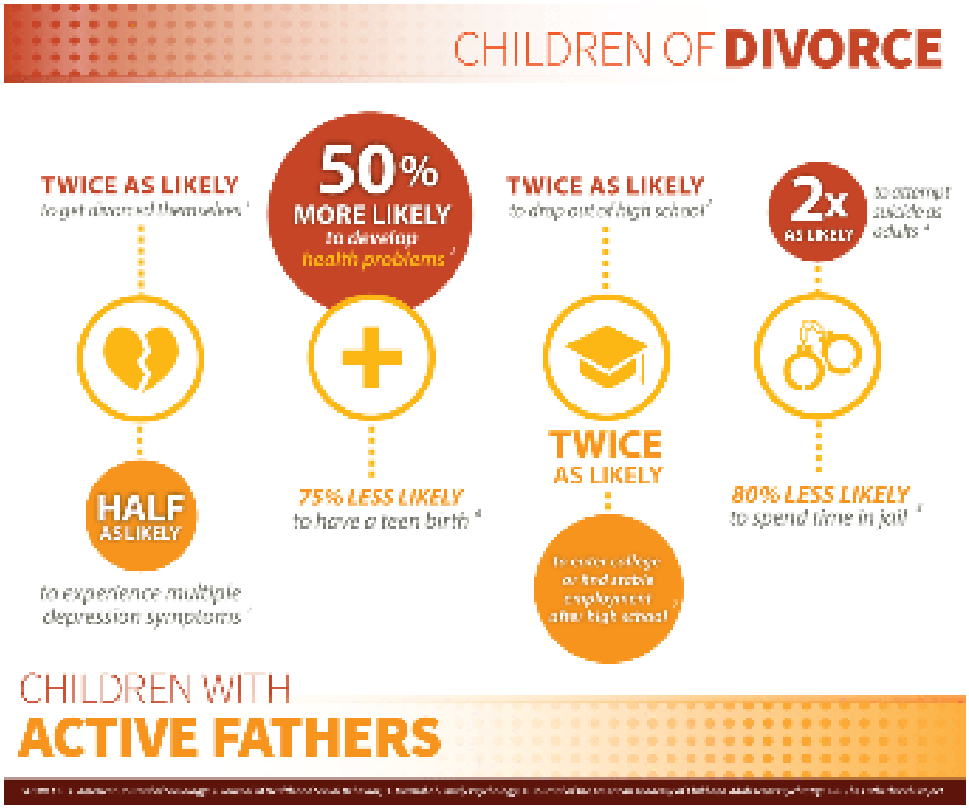
I do not know how the ħə11 you read his study, and then dare cite it in a paper that concludes divorce is great because it benefits only one party. Misty's point, however, is that divorce is good so long as it benefits women. The fact that divorce is destructive to families, and destroys the livelihood of men, and sets children on a downward trajectory in life is a minor consideration. Yay! More children with an increased likelihood of a future of crime, divorce, increased suicide, and depression!



What makes divorce so great to Misty?

The reason why Misty presents divorce in a positive light, is because it allows “wives” to do/have more of the following:

- Invest in quality schooling for their children and other amenities supporting schooling in general. (This is based on Misty’s study of kids in Chile, which looked at school enrollment and length of divorce finalization. Looking at only two data points in a foreign country not comparable to the U.S. sounds like a study that leads to more questions rather than conclusions.)
- Enjoy an increase in leisure time.
- Spend more time working.
- Spend less time on household chores, such as cleaning and cooking.

What is it about divorce that causes these “benefits” that a woman could not enjoy had she remained married? Why of course, it is “family” laws that “shift property rights to women, and provide payments directly to women upon divorce.”

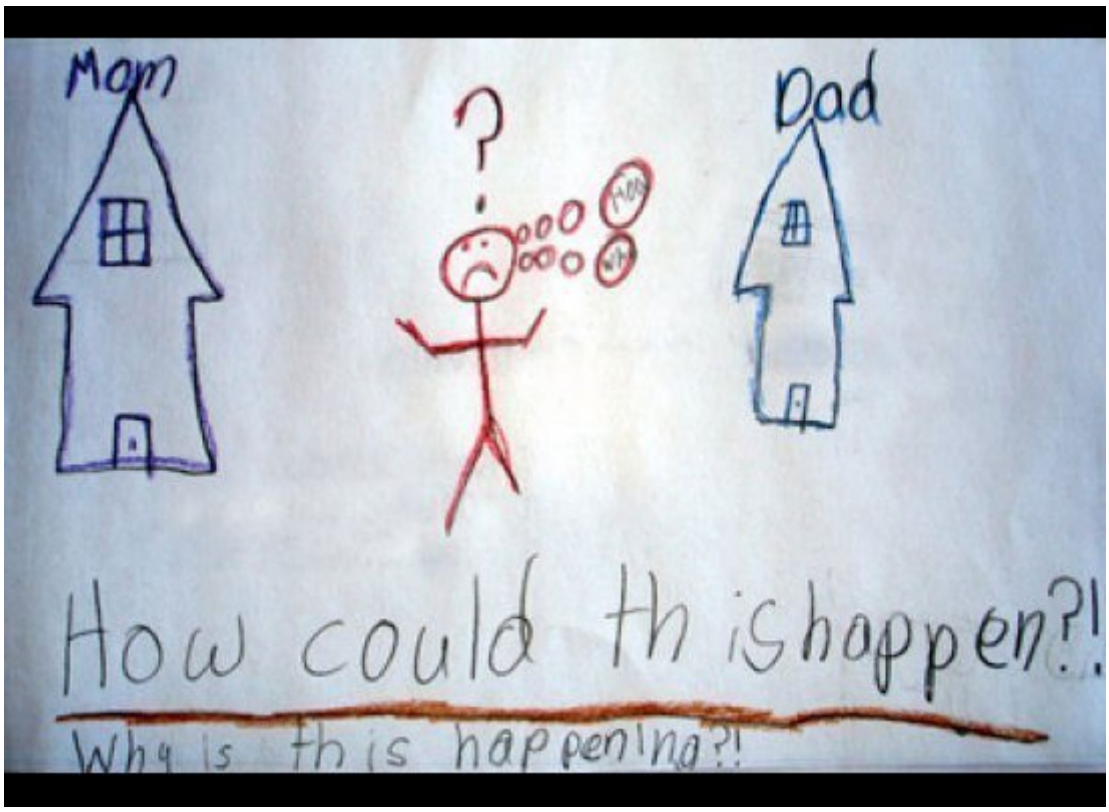
Those of us who have been married with children and have gone through the divorce wringer might make several observations here:

You cannot be divorced with children while having more leisure time, working longer hours outside the home, and spending less time on chores. That is literally impossible. The only way to increase the ability to get more work done, inside and outside the home, while simultaneously increasing leisure time is by creating a division of labor – and this requires an intact family, coupled alongside public schooling to care for and educate the children during the day. In fact, a combined income and additional resources from both the husband and wife working together is what provides the means to afford a better quality life and an improved education for the children.

If, however, “family” laws allow a woman to extract a significant amount of her ex-husbands income to be used for her own disposal, she may then be able to afford to pay others to perform those duties that she herself, or other family members would have otherwise fulfilled, such as child care, cooking meals, cleaning house, and arranging transportation for the children. This is presumably all well and good for the divorced woman, but at what cost to the husband? Furthermore, how badly are the children impacted from their father being absent from living in their home?

These all lead to the conclusion that none of Misty’s claims are true for most women who are actually divorced. And for those divorced women who do happen to find all the benefits that Misty describes, it could only come at a tremendous economic and psychological cost to the ex-husband and children.



How do Divorced wives spend more money on education?

Misty hides the reason why divorced wives spend more money on education in her statement,

> "Expanded alimony and child support and allowances for divorced mothers have been shown to increase investments in children's schooling and clothing."

No, she did not use an Oxford comma there. If she really thinks and talks the way she writes, I can imagine she talks like, soo like, a rƏTardƏd Valley Girl™. Like, totally gross me out, you know? With like, all the "and's" and like, whatever… Or could she simply be a weedo too "busy" smoking something, and too careless to proofread a formal (and perhaps national) publication?

The text links to a study of "Alimony Rights and Intrahousehold Allocation of Resources: Evidence from Brazil", by Marcos A. Rangel.

Misty made a middle school error – she confused causation with correlation. A significant increase in disposable income nearly always leads to a better quality of life and education (for the children of caring, conscientious parents), regardless of age, sex, race, socioeconomic tier, or marital status. This is more likely to be the cause of the increased investments in children's schooling and clothing, not divorce. But that added income for the divorced woman didn't just materialize out of thin air, neither is it absorbed by the nebulous tax payer. It came from a divorce court mandated wage garnishment from her ex-husbands paycheck. The ex-husband is forced to work excessive overtime just to make ends meet, and must forego the possibility of ever becoming a home owner, just so his ex can enjoy the pleasure of bragging to her social circle that her kids go to Worthington Academy, instead of the county public high school. Is that really a net positive result?

It also seems that she made numerous assumptions in order to reach these bizarre and contradictory conclusions. Her main assumption is that robbing one spouse of their earned income, to be delivered to a divorcing wife, is somehow an economic stimulus. In fact, it's the basic broken window fallacy applied to marriage and divorce. Again, how the ħƏ11 can a statistician who advises a federal reserve bank not know this? Or worse yet, maybe they do know it, but the Dəəp Statə parasites in charge of the federal reserve just don't give a crap because they have been lining their pockets for decades by adhering to the broken window fallacy, and thereby destroying this nation's financial culture for generations to come.

We must give women a sufficient incentive to destroy their husbands and families

The author wrote the following myopic argument.

> "In a divorce, family courts redistribute resources gained during (and sometimes before) marriage. Women have more to gain in divorce if laws are more favorable to wives.

No $ħ!t, Sherlock! You have more to gain in pursuing something that will benefit you!

> The prospect of onerous alimony, child support and other divorce compensation increases wives' bargaining power when they have the option to divorce."

While she was at least frank enough to mention earlier (in passing) the emotional carnage involved in the nature of divorce, sadly, she has yet to realize that economic incentives incentivize such behavior. The laws are currently favorable to wives. No one disputes that. All women need to do is to manufacture a spurious accusation and make one call to the local police, who will employ the Duluth model to get him kicked out of the house. Next, call a divorce lawyer to handle the rest. She shouldn't worry about a thing. The court will ensure that her ex will pay for it all! Not even anyone at her converged choich will condemn her. It'll be cheap, quick, easy, and she'll never have to feel guilty nor ashamed. (At least, not for the next few years.)

> "It may be less favorable for husbands but the reverse is also true when divorce laws are more favorable to husbands."

But Misty, the reverse is not true! As it now stands, about 70% of divorces are initiated by women. As more Unhaaappy™ wives realize that a divorce could provide them with nearly the same income but without the burdens of marital responsibilities, such as being subject to the man's authority, then more wives will wake up to the common sense wisdom of getting a divorce.

In spite of the fact that a divorcing woman may gain extra income from a divorce in a gynocentric court system, a comprehensive assessment of divorce reveals it to be an extravagant, selfish, and wasteful expense, and one that produces massive financial, emotional, and societal costs. Thus, enhancing women's "bargaining power" in this case, is not something that is good for the integrity of the American family, and it is not something that produces an overall economic gain. There is no man in 'Murica who will be motivated to work harder, or build his own business, just to earn more money to fork over to a self-centered ex who promised him heaven, and instead, delivered ɦɘ11.

How is divorce good for society?

Heggeness claims that making Divorce easier has "positive ripple effects" on society at large. These benefits, according to Misty, are:

- An increase in marriages – Sorry Misty, but I will bet these are nearly all divorced people remarrying mostly other divorced people. It's not a benefit unless the marriage rate shows a net increase over the divorce rate.
- Nearly nonexistent suicide rates for females go down further. – Misty, compare that to male suicide.
- Women start working outside the home. – Misty makes yet another mistake of misattributing cultural trends, and confusing causal events. Easy divorce laws came about during the time women's participation in the workforce, particularly the upper echelons, continued to grow. While the two were pushed by the same movement, the only reason easy divorce would increase economic participation is the fact that alimony alone wouldn't support a divorced woman, and she had to get a job to have a better quality of life. This literally means that women had it better when married and staying at home!

More Fluff and Nonsense

"Studying divorce is hard…" the author states, not realizing that a lack of intelligence and discipline is what makes studying hard.

She states, "pinning down cause and effect is challenging." Had Misty spent 30 minutes reading her own article, applying basic logic to it (and proofreading the English), she could have seen all of the causal errors she made. Apparently she never came across "economic incentives" when studying economics.

The rest of her paper hawks an upcoming paper she has, which focuses on Chile. Of course, women have it well off in Chile now, because back in the day, commies were thrown from helicopters there. (If you think about it, that sentence bears more truth than Misty's causal errors). How about a study that focuses on the longitudinal effects of frivorce in the United States?

Ms. Epiphany expects to provide us with more groundbreaking revelations:

> "My newly published research shows that both the design of divorce law and how local governments execute it can have profound effects."

I look forward to her deep thoughts on water being wet.

[SF: In future posts, I will examine some of her "work", and the research papers cited therein.]

Conclusions

Misty's article, while bizarre, tells men a lot. Yes, the article shows how agenda-driven feminism is, and how leftism in general permeates at all levels of government. (This is what people mean by "the swamp".)

Not only is she getting paid to write this nonsense, but she is paid on our dime, with the government's full support.

[Dear Trump administration, please fire her, her boss, and everyone else who approved this.]

However, the most important part of the article is the fact that government officials view divorce as positive, while completely ignoring the downsides of divorce. Government does not view divorce as destructive, simply because it is positive for women. Government doesn't care that men have less income, or that children have poor life outcomes as a result of divorce. Divorce is like, great and all, because it like, empowers women!

I doubt that they'll ever come clean enough to mention that empowering women is a strategy towards the endgame of destroying the nuclear family, and hopefully by extension, American society.

Feminists owe a debt of gratitude to Misty for making this important, but heretofore esoteric information available to add to their propaganda. Yay! Now that Divorce is favored as official policy, all the Manospherian authors can retire from blogging.

Related

- Σ Frame: DeSantis steadies de sinking ship (2022-7-4)

Do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing.

Jack · 27 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Are covert methods equivalent to crafty, conniving coercion?

Readership: Men;

Biblical Gender Roles has offered a valuable series of essays reviewing the Biblical consistency of Red Pill postulates. In his latest article, Is the Red Pill Concept of Frame Biblical? (2020 January 21), BGR brought up a question about whether a Christian man's methods should be transparent or not. He writes,

> "Red Pill is absolutely wrong in its insistence on men using covert measures to bring women into their frame. What Red Pill asks men to do with both frame and game is to engage in what the Bible calls "craftiness".

The truth of the matter is not easily cast into clear cut, right-or-wrong categorizations, but instead, is strongly dependent on what is appropriate within the context.

BGR makes several important distinctions between the following qualities.

1. Active vs. Passive
2. Overt vs. Covert
3. Covert vs. Crafty

In this post, I'll offer an analysis of these three aspects, as well as some thoughts on the role of secrecy in a relationship.

Active vs. Passive

I believe it's been made very clear that a man's role in leading, shepherding, and managing his wife should be predominantly an active role. To offer examples, I've written several posts that revealed how marriages are stronger and happier when the man has certain expectations and goals for the relationship, and he is requesting more from the woman than she is from him.

- Σ Frame: Conflict Structure and Marital Satisfaction (November 15, 2017)
- Σ Frame: Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (February 15, 2018)
- Σ Frame: How To Get A Better Response From Your Girl (February 27, 2018)
- Σ Frame (feat. J.T. Anderson): Moulding an Excellent Wife (March 5, 2018)
- Σ Frame: Why Do Men Need Visions and Dreams? (May 15, 2018)
- Σ Frame: Man as the Manager, Woman as the Helper (May 19, 2018)
- Σ Frame: Man as the Middle Manager (May 21, 2018)
- Σ Frame: Revealing Her Unencumbered Beauty (June 26, 2018)
- Σ Frame: Washing Her Clean (October 21, 2019)
- Σ Frame: This means WAR!!! (December 19, 2019)

Just as Christianity and Masculinity, Donald Graeme, and others (including myself) have said, a man needs to be pursuing his God-given purpose in life foremost, and drag her along for the ride, whether she likes it or not. (She'll learn to like it after a time.)

However, there are times in which passivity is appropriate and necessary. A few examples might be,

1. When she's trying to create drama or start a fight, just for the heck of it.

2. When she wants to argue, just for the sake of contention.
3. When she's trying to make you jealous, just to stroke her own ego.

In such cases, the man's goal is to NOT reward her unwanted behavior with attention and emotional investments. This gets interesting, because a man must make a concentrated effort to remain passive, so in a way, it is not truly passive at all.

Overt vs. Covert

In Red Pill praxeology, there are elements of both overt and covert operation. The overt strategy is as BGR described, teaching, rebuking, moulding the woman, and "washing her clean" from false notions and debilitating habits.

Concerning the covert aspect, surely there are some men who have wrong motives and would therefore want to keep their thoughts and plans opaque. But for the Christian man seeking to find a wife, or shepherd a wife, there is nothing that should be shameful, or an esoteric secret. But still, there are good reasons not to emphatically discuss the psychological minutiae. I'll briefly describe a few reasons here. Others may exist as well.

1. Most women cannot understand the male viewpoint, and they can't offer helpful insight or advice either. Even if a male attempts to discuss his viewpoint with a woman in good faith, it's seldom accepted for the subjective truth or wisdom it might contain, and instead, is often misinterpreted, twisted, mocked, and criticized, likely in an attempt at $#!t testing.
2. The nonshared environment within the man's frame is intrinsically covert by God's design. That is, there are aspects of his senses and sensibilities that simply cannot be known by others. Part of the challenge men endure is in developing his own character and his accompanying frame such that he can navigate through life in a way that glorifies God and allows him to get a sense of accomplishment and contentment, instead of becoming a failure and a laughingstock.
3. The marital structure prescribed by Christianity is ignorantly condemned by the unbelieving as "oppressive" and "patriarchal" (as if the latter were a bad thing). So among this crowd, revealing too much of your hand would only attract negative attention and slow you down.
4. Planning a surprise (even an unwanted one) can be a joyful blessing to your spouse. Of course, this requires some amount of covert activity. For an example of an unwanted surprise that became a blessing, click here.

There is just an element of wisdom in not broadcasting every trick of your trade. The Bible offers a few admonitions to this effect,

…in glorifying God.

> "It is the glory of God to conceal things, but the glory of kings is to search things out." ~ Proverbs 25:2 (ESV)

I dare say, the vague meaning of this verse lends itself to the glory of God.

The availability of key knowledge at opportune moments under certain circumstances can prove to be redeeming. But in general, too much knowledge about certain matters can kill one's joy and gratitude of the thing. The Red Pill knowledge about the nature of women is one such matter. After taking the Red Pill, one's eyes are opened, one becomes further aware of good and evil, and the charming feminine mystique is destroyed. It is common for Red Pilled men to say that they'll never look at women in the same way again. Now, I wouldn't call Red Pill knowledge evil, but rather, it's just "solid food for the mature". Remember to brush your teeth before you kiss her.

…and in giving.

> [1] "Beware of practicing your righteousness before other people in order to be seen by them, for then you will have no reward from your Father who is in heaven.

> [2] "Thus, when you give to the needy, sound no trumpet before you, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may be praised by others. Truly, I say to you, they have received their reward. [3] But when you give to the needy, do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing, [4] so that your giving may be in secret. And your Father who sees in secret will reward you. ~ Matthew 6:1-4 (ESV)

A cursory glance at this scripture would dismiss its application to marriage, because we have been conditioned by our culture to believe that it's chauvinist to think of women as needy waifs. But in fact, women are designed to receive, and so they are needy by nature. Human anatomy makes this all too obvious. There is an endless list of things that women want and need, and this is only the top of the list…

- affection
- affirmation
- children
- commitment
- honor
- love
- money
- protection
- purpose
- sex
- shelter
- tingles
- validation

Men are expected (either by women, or by God, according to the Bible) to give all these things to women.

Concerning verse 3, in typology, the hand is a symbol of expression, strength, power, protection, and providing for others. The husband's God-ordained role in marriage is to be a provider and protector, as well as many other things.

Not letting your left hand know what your right hand is doing has different meanings, depending on the context. In sex and marriage, it means retaining a semblance of mystery and unpredictability, which does much to attract respect and brings the joy of life to the union. It also means not to dump too much of your personal anxieties onto your spouse. In child rearing, it means not to let the children know how much more time, money, attention, etc. you gave to the one than the other. In business, it means keeping your various interests separated, e.g. not telling one partner how much money your other associate is making. In social matters, it means to be modest about doing good deeds.

There are many reasons for these behaviors.

- One prevailing idea is that if you receive praise here on Earth, you won't get a star in your crown in heaven.
- Another is not to arouse envy, jealousy, and suspicion among your peers and beneficiaries.
- A third reason is to discourage others from exploiting your weaknesses.
- As mentioned earlier, too much knowledge detracts from living life joyfully and passionately from the heart.

Further concerning these reasons, perhaps the most poignant verse about "secrecy" is found in Micah, which describes how important it is to protect one's heart (and other interests) during times of tribulation.

> [1] "Woe is me! For I have become as when the summer fruit has been gathered, as when the grapes have been gleaned: there is no cluster to eat, no first-ripe fig that my soul desires.
> [2] The godly has perished from the earth, and there is no one upright among mankind; they all lie in wait for > blood, and each hunts the other with a net.

> [3] Their hands are on what is evil, to do it well; the prince and the judge ask for a bribe, and the great man utters the evil desire of his soul; thus they weave it together.
> [4] The best of them is like a brier, the most upright of them a thorn hedge. The day of your watchmen, of your punishment, has come; now their confusion is at hand.
> [5] Put no trust in a neighbor; have no confidence in a friend; *guard the doors of your mouth from her who lies in your arms;
> [6] for the son treats the father with contempt, the daughter rises up against her mother, the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law; a man's enemies are the men of his own house.
> [7] But as for me, I will look to the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation; my God will hear me.

Many men naturally expect their wife to be their best friend and companion. But sadly, this is seldom the reality. If a man has a wife who is emotionally immature or spiritually unregenerated, then he'll always have to watch his own back. Also, man has a peculiar, pervading, pernicious, and deterrent weakness of letting his hopeful expectations (of enjoying the benefits of his wife's better nature) degenerate into chivalrous pedestalization and idolatrous Oneitis. Moreover, for many men these days, marriage life is indeed a tribulation, the church emasculated, the culture corrupt, and the court system a veritable enemy.

Covert vs. Crafty

Covert means to conceal a matter, and this could be as simple as not drawing attention to it. The section above discussed some ways in which being covert might be wise and beneficial.

On the other hand, Crafty implies some sort of deception or evil intent. To the Christian, obviously, being crafty has no place in a marriage.

There are a couple proverbs that speak of the wisdom of concealment.

> "Whoever goes about slandering reveals secrets, but he who is trustworthy in spirit keeps a thing covered." ~ Proverbs 11:13 (ESV)

No doubt, revealing the darkest aspects of the feminine nature is invariably interpreted as slander, misogyny, etc.

> "Whoever covers an offense seeks love, but he who repeats a matter separates close friends." ~ Proverbs 17:9 (ESV)

The idea here is to protect and support those whom you have intimate knowledge of, those whom you love. That would include one's wife, and to some degree, one's self.

In general, maintaining a good will in the relationship is important for the health of the relationship. It's also important to make the impression of having a good will. Talking about Red Pill praxeology to an excessive degree may easily be interpreted by a woman as bitterness or an ill will. In fact, women have recently taken to the habit of rejecting men by calling them "misogynysts", "incels", or similar. In short, we must be wise, but we must also project the image of Christ.

Although exercising good faith is difficult to do at all times in every circumstance, I think the difference between either being apathetic and contemptuous versus being faithful and "all in", should be apparent to the average reader. I could imagine an extreme situation in which an excessively evil spouse might require, as a last resort, a little taste of their own medicine. But even then, the overall motive for this approach would still be a wake-up call for their own good.

Conclusions

It would be easy to condemn all covert action as being equivalent to crafty deception and then dismiss it as being dishonest or manipulative. But in reality, there is a myriad of moral possibilities based on the context, as well as the personalities and character of the parties involved. Being covert at certain times and under the right circumstances can be a wise move that takes into account the weaknesses of one's self and others, which can preserve reputation, wealth, and goodness, and bring blessing and joy to one's self and others.

Ultimately, the moral value of an action will depend on one's awareness of the context, and the faithful exercise of discernment — not in how well one can conform to the rules. The appropriateness of the moral decision lies in the detection of either spiritual confederacy or enmity, and the assertion of the most effective course of action. This is AKA wisdom.

Related

- A Proverb a Day (Jonesboro Calvary Chapel): Cover-up or Love-covering? Proverbs 17:9 (2009 November 17)

Wallowing in the Red Pill

Lexet Blog · 29 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

How much frustration and suffering are necessary for repentance?

How much bitterness and hopelessness are required for wallowing?

This post was originally published last year at Lexet Iustitia, and has since been re-edited.

Readership: Christian men;

There is a ministry out there for men, and unlike others I have seen, it recognizes the fact that there are many single men in the church who tend to be ignored by the church (as an embarrassing inconvenience IMHO).

From the Bitter Taste of the Red Pill.

> "We are not interested in bitching, raging, or defeatist moping. Patriarchs do not wallow in whatever red pill boilerplate they picked up from [popular bloggers] or their clones. They do not, in all frankness, act like Jesus is not reigning, and exercising dominion, progressively ordering the world to make his enemies his footstool."
> . . .
> "We know that cynicism and bitterness are born of disappointment and mistreatment. And it's not a sin to feel upset with how Jesus is ordering the world — and your life. But Galatians 5 is clear that the Christian life is characterized by joy, hope, contentment, faithfulness, peace, and other spiritual fruits. Conversely, enmity, strife, jealousy, fits of anger, rivalries, and dissensions are works of the flesh, and those who do such things will not inherit the kingdom of God."

I take umbrage at the word "wallow". Wallowing implies that a person stays focused on something for years and years, while being unwilling or unable to move on. It also implies that there is something better to move on to.

There is a point to be made about the problem of bitterness within the men's community, and the constant griping and "bitching", but the sentiment expressed above shows a lack of understanding that "taking the Red Pill" requires one to go through a great deal of frustration and disappointment. In fact, this is the very same impetus that brings men around to repent of the Blue Pill mindset, including Chivalry (male feminism), and Churchianity.

Furthermore, I don't understand the sentiment the ministry has when it comes to discussing the problems men face and fighting the larger battles. Yes, inspiration, encouragement, and maintaining a hopeful attitude has an important place. But they seem to condemn any expression of frustration and disappointment.

They also interpret the fruits of the spirit to include only the positive aspects of one's own emotional state. But the fruits of ministry go far beyond that. The renewed lives and faith of the men coming out of the cuckster conundrum are the spiritual fruit of our labor, not merely our own joy, hope, contentment, etc.

The Red Pill is not for everyone. Red Pill knowledge can only benefit a subset of the population, namely, men who have run through the gauntlet of marriage, divorce, and the courts, and who also have the temerity to not only admit their own faults, but also see that the whole societal system is set against them.

Pretty much everyone over 40 doesn't see the problem, either. They have too much invested into the system for and have a sunk-cost mindset. To add to that, the West has far greater immediate problems than domestic relationship issues, and while the relationship issues are a distant cause to many of our current problems, their immediate impact upon society is creating negative effect on morale.

Real ministry is tough work, because you have to get your hands dirty lifting others out of the filth — and it's truly squalid! When you see the world for what it is, after being lied to by the marketing departments of the world, it is something you can't ever forget.

Concerning the larger battles, are we to ignore enemies joyfully and walk around smiling with our heads in the mud?

For those who think that red pill solutions can take place on a societal level in the West, I can see why "wallowing" would be a criticism. MGTOW is a community that wallows (especially on YouTube). And while the MRA community really tries to make a difference, they shoot themselves in the foot on a regular basis. I don't see any group as being viable under our current system, at least any time soon.

When it comes to red pill issues for society at large, my only opinion is that systems leading to chaos are failed systems, and failed systems will inevitably be replaced.

I wish IGTBAM the best of luck with their ministry. But to gain ground, they will have to face those unpleasant facts and opinions that are undignified and unpopular.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Dispensation of the Red Pill (2018 April 7)
- Lexet Blog: Joy Shaming (2020 January 24)

Confessions of Racist White Nationalists

Jack · 31 January 2020 · Archived copy · Original

When accusations of being "racist" abound, how can one deal with the risk of being a conservative white?

Readership: Corndogs; Crackers; Hillbillies; Honkys; Rednecks; Roubles; Snowmen; Turkeys; Whites;
Authors note: Originally written on February 9, 2019.
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Foreword

This post contains anecdotes that are offered to help readers beleaguered by accusations of racism think about what they might do to extol a bit of character, which might help develop enough rapport to escape a dismissal.

The context is interpreted through two Frames of reference.

1. The nature of an authentic confession and how it has the power to transform your life.
2. The common theme behind all these stories is that there is something about them that glorifies God. I believe if a person can find a way to glorify God through their interactions with others, then they're bound to have a more positive experience.

Disclaimer: These stories should be taken simply as inspiring ideas – things I've seen used with moderate success. I can't say whether or not any of these will work for you. They might even make your situation worse. It's up to you to discern the context of your life situation and utilize the best wisdom you can come up with to magnify your personality and glorify God.

The magic of an authentic confession

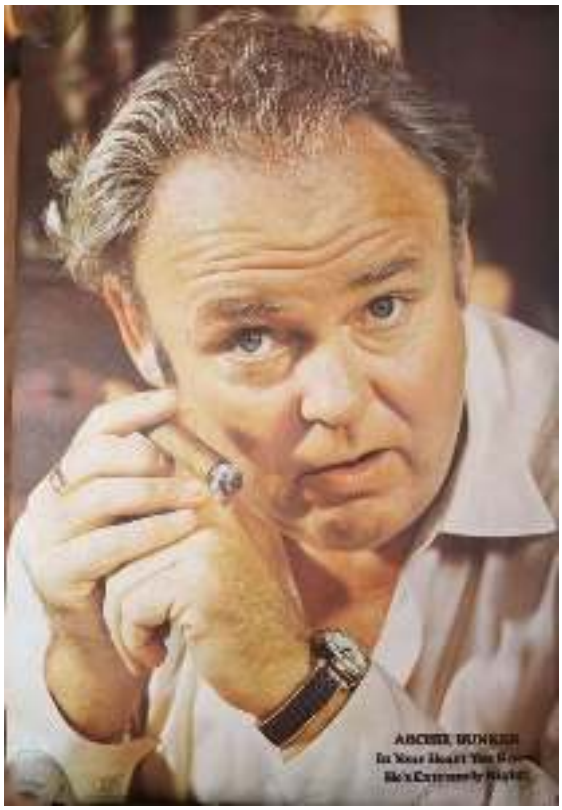
Confession plays a critical role in maintaining one's spiritual vitality.

In the past, I've written extensively about confession (of sin) and profession (of faith), the subtle difference between the two, and the power that it has to transform our subjective experience of life. In spite of all that I've written about it, this topic never seems to get old, because every day brings a fresh experience of self-discovery and spiritual renewal.

In a few previous posts, I discussed the nature of the heart-speech connection and the impact of a confession. The reader who is unfamiliar with these topics may wish to read the following essays before reading on.

- Confession vs. Profession (2009 October 2)
- Confidence and Authenticity in Speech (2009 December 28)
- The Trouble with Resolutions, Inner Vows and Commitments (2010 January 14)

I imagine that all the abstract theories and mystical impressionism have completely snowed many of my readers. It is my hope that the concepts described in the above essays might become clearer to the reader by considering the following real world case studies, all of which are based on my own life experiences.



Case Study 1 – I used to be racist

In authoritarian regimes, such as the Maoist regime in China and the Politically Correct culture of the West, people are persecuted for political views that they are perceived to have whether they actually have those views or not. This is the true meaning of prejudice. Therefore, if someone assumes that you have X views simply because you are Y, when in fact, you do not, then you are a victim of prejudice – not the other way around. For example, if someone assumes that you are racist simply because you are white, then you are a victim of prejudice.

The question is, how can one deflect prejudice preemptively?

When I'm forced to interact with a politically diverse group of people, I sometimes say, "I come from a very racist family, so I used to be racist, but I'm not any more", followed by an interesting cross-cultural anecdote from my past life experiences, including a statement about "how I felt loved by (someone of the race or nationality in question)". Note: You have to insert something about your feelings, or else it won't resonate with liberals. This effectively preempts any possible discrimination I might receive for being white. It's a true confession. Although I do hold scientifically based beliefs concerning inherent differences among races that would be considered racist by certain others, it's true that I am less racist than my neo-conservative cousins. I harbor no ill will towards others simply because of their race.

Case Study 2 – That's what you get!

My cousin's oldest daughter went to prom with a black classmate. When I heard about this, I asked my cousin,

> "Do you know your daughter is going to prom with a black guy?"

He answered, "Yes".

> "Well, you can be proud that she is super popular, just like you were in high school."

This statement gave him an ego stroke, and let him recall some fond memories. He was exceedingly popular among his peers.

> "Hey, do you know what teenagers do after the prom?"

He meekly nodded his head in affirmation.

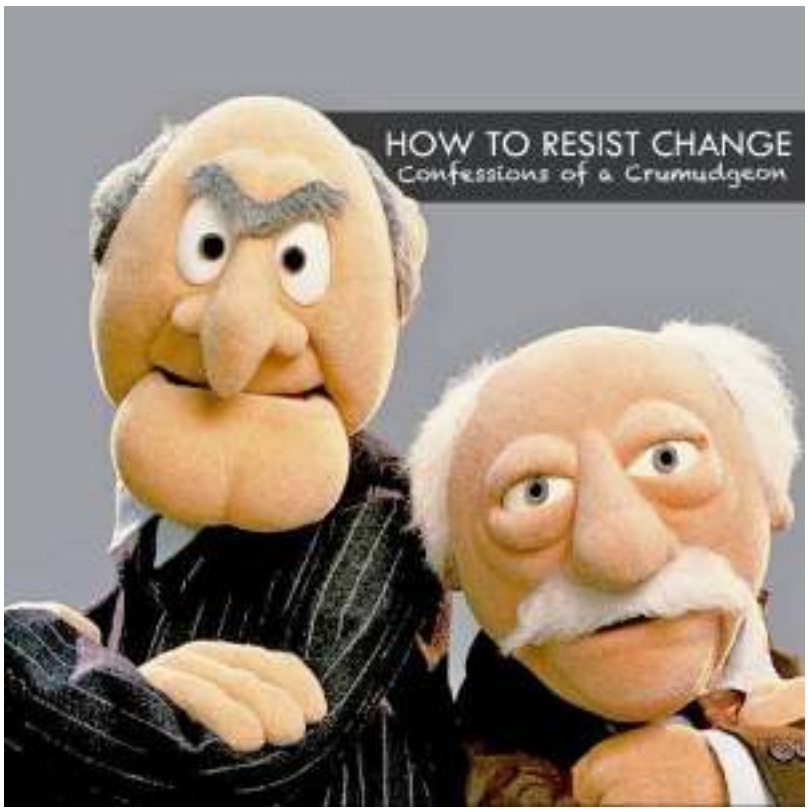
I laughed and said,

> "That's what you get for a life time of n*gger jokes!"

He was shocked at first, then he bowed his head and accepted my jovial statement of "divine justice". After a moment, he chuckled a little bit. Since then, I haven't heard him tell any race-based jokes.

Could it be that my cousin's habit of making these jokes became a confession that influenced his daughter's social interests? I believe so.

Could it be that my cousin's daughter's choice of a prom date was God's way of forcing my cousin into repentance? I believe so.



Case Study 3 – Wiggers

In the U.S., southern white nationalists have the stereotype as being racist. So much so, that even the Confederate flag has become a symbol of racism to the Left. As such, those who are not from the south, but who are familiar with its history, have the general impression that such people are racists. But having lived in the south for several years, it is my impression that race relations among southerners have matured to be more normalized and gracious compared to those living in the northern cities. I knew many white southerners (and domesticated Asians too) who listened to hip-hop and who admired black athletes and performers. They proudly called themselves, "wiggers". I could not detect any animosity from them towards blacks as a race.

I would imagine that many neo-reactionaries would say that's a shameful displacement and loss of historic white culture. But if being a wigger is taken as a confession, it can only be interpreted as a love for black culture – not racism. White northerners, on the other hand, I have never heard identify themselves as a wigger, although they might enjoy hip hop.

If you ever have some coworkers who are making you out to be racist, try this. Play some hip-hop, do a little dance with a bit of enthusiasm, and call yourself a wigger. They'll get such a kick out of this inversion of their prejudices, that they'll either be speechless, or they'll laugh about it for days. After that, you might be teased as a wigger, but you'll never be seriously accused of racism. If someone says you're misappropriating black culture, you could ask them incredulously,

> "Did you just assume the race I identify with?"

Case Study 4 – Heaven's Devils

I once knew a guy who hailed from L.A., and he used to be a member of a motorcycle gang. But the area where we worked together in Maryland was a very polite, upper middle class society. When he first moved to our neighborhood, he shaved off his Fu Manchu (AKA horseshoe), and he bought some dress shirts and ties. He kept his tattoos covered at all times. He cleaned up some of his off-color, non-PC speech, and presented a "nice guy" image.

After he was working with us for a few months, he started to drop some hints about "crazy stuff" he did "when he was a kid". Those stories made everyone laugh. Then sometime later, he started showing us some photographs of his earlier years. Over time, he was able to talk more about the things he did as a member of the biker gang. At first hearing, people were shocked, but they were able to accept it because of (at least) three reasons: (1) He talked about it as a thing of the past. (2) They had already come to know him as a responsible coworker. (3) He was pretty well-liked by everyone. He gradually loosened up his speech during this time. After he was there for several months, some people who had seen his old photographs told him he actually looked better with his Fu Manchu. He mentioned this to others to gauge their reaction, and most people found this to be very interesting, and many people agreed. So then he grew a mustache first, and when everyone had gotten used to that, he let the ends grow a little longer. Eventually, he was wearing his Fu Manchu again with full confidence. After a while longer, he got out his boots and leathers, and became the person that he was before he moved to our traditional, rural Maryland society.

At some point in his transition I realized that this is who he was all along, and I was really impressed with his social wisdom. He's not very well able to change who he is, nor should he. But he was able to present his authentic self to others in a way that they could relate to, and eventually come to be accepted and respected for who he is.

If he had made his debut into our workplace under the guise of his biker persona, he would have aroused a lot of negative stereotypes, and would have received a lot of negative attention. But by introducing himself as a regular Joe, and then gradually allowing himself to be better known over several months, he was able to bypass the prejudicial judgements of others. This approach gave him the opportunity to create authentic relationships with people he would not have otherwise been able to connect with, and to build a solid reputation among his coworkers.

Final Statements

Some readers may hold the opinion that these stories are “Blue Pill” because it seems to compromise or cater to political adversaries. But it’s not Blue Pill to showcase your charisma and character to glorify God – That’s Game. It’s not Blue Pill to convince other people to gladly accept your tastes and preferences – That’s imposing Frame. It’s not Blue Pill to develop a good will, a good reputation, and possibly even popularity among those you must live and work with on a daily basis – That’s Godliness.

You cannot expect others to change according to your expectations – That’s sin. You must do the hard work of overcoming their prejudices and teaching them to accept and respect you for who you really are, so that you can then get what you want or need out of the interaction – That’s Red Pill.

Related

- Σ Frame: It’s Tough to be White (2015-1-22)
- Σ Frame: Trump Appeals to Dignity, Not Racism (2016-3-7)
- Σ Frame: Why Political Correctness won’t solve Racism (2016-9-7)
- Σ Frame: The Egosyntonic Art of Tone Policing (2019-5-31)

Christian Women Demand Men Marry Sluts With Debt and Tattoos

Lexet Blog · 3 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

After refusing to obey the scriptures, Christian women have the gall to expect men to marry them up!

Readership: Christians;
Note: This article was previously published on July 19, 2018 on Lexet Iustitia.
Length: 1,400 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

The Controversy

Controversy has plagued the interweb dens of many Christian women over this article written by Lori Alexander more than a year ago, "Men prefer debt free virgins without tattoos". I encourage everyone to read the article. It has provoked disgust in women who are obviously feminist-indoctrinated.

What was the cause of the controversy? This quote:

> "Do you know how much more attractive debt-free virgins (without tattoos) are to young men? Unfortunately, there are so few of these types of young women anymore because of the high costs of college (debt) and sexual promiscuity even within those in the church. As believers in Jesus Christ, we need to live in a way that is pleasing to Him because His ways are the best. He calls debt a burden and urges us to live lives of sexual purity."

In the article, the author encourages women to > "…carefully consider whether or not they go to college, especially if they want to be wives and mothers someday. Secular universities teach against the God of the Bible and His ways. It's far from what God calls women to be and do: it teaches them to be independent, loud, sexually available, and immodest instead of having meek and quiet spirits."

Because,

> "If they go to college, they are unlikely to stay home raising their children to pay off the debt and use the degree they spent years on."

Even more "revolting" was:

> "Young women, be wise in the path that you choose to walk on. Keep a long-term vision of your life and how you hope it will be someday instead of acting upon all of the "what ifs…?" that many will throw at you. Trust God with your life, study the Word, and take the narrow path that leads to life. Stay virgins until marriage, out of debt, and don't get tattoos!"

The theme of every reaction is that:

- It's mean!
- It hurts my feelings!
- It doesn't take exceptions 4,342, or 8921(w) into account.
- I did all of that and I am still not married.
- It goes against the gospel!

This reaction might be expected, since Churchianity has watered down the requirements of the Law so much, that Churchians can no longer distinguish the difference between the carnal and the spiritual.

Never once does the article say a woman has to be a virgin in order to be married, or to be saved. She merely stated Christian men's preferences. Also, the gospel is about salvation, not about Captain Save-A-Ho™.

At Boundless (feat. Erica Wilkinson): An Open Letter to the Author of "Men Prefer Debt-Free Virgins Without Tattoos" (2018 July 18), one commenter, Sara Brunsvold, put herself in a box with this comment.

> "What MEN prefer should not be the concern of young women. What GOD prefers should be their top concern. We as women are not meant to pursue and find wholeness in MEN but rather in Our Eternal Father. And for us "big sisters" in Christ, we must remember that the most important command over our younger sisters is not to be wives and mothers, but to be lovers of God and doers of His will."

Lori's article was written as helpful advice to single women seeking "love" (from a man). But Sara is talking like a nun admonishing younger sisters to live a life of celibacy. (I seriously doubt that she's a nun.)

I believe the majority of women are not called to live a life of celibacy. The only moral alternative is for them to become wives and mothers.

What exactly does God "prefer" for young women who aspire to be wives and mothers?

Lori's message is fairly accurate, according to what the Bible says in 1 Timothy 2:9-12;15.

> "…women should adorn themselves in respectable apparel, with modesty and self-control, not with braided hair and gold or pearls or costly attire, but with what is proper for women who profess godliness—with good works.
> Let a woman learn quietly with all submissiveness. I do not permit a woman to teach or to exercise authority over a man; rather, she is to remain quiet."
> …
> Yet she will be saved through childbearing — if they continue in faith and love and holiness, with self-control."

No debt or tattoos here. Titus 2:3-5 states,

> "Older women likewise are to be reverent in behavior, not slanderers or slaves to much wine. They are to teach what is good…
> …so train the young women to love their husbands and children, to be self-controlled, pure, working at home, kind, and submissive to their own husbands, that the word of God may not be reviled."

No premarital carousel riding here. "Loving their husbands" is not quite the same thing as "loving Chad ThunderC0ck".

Lori's Biblical Message has been Refused

Instead of conforming to the image of a Christian woman prescribed by the Bible, modern wimmin, including many "Christian" women, have gone after being the kind of woman Proverbs 5 warns us against as "forbidden".

> [3] For the lips of a forbidden woman drip honey, and her speech is smoother than oil,
> [4] but in the end she is bitter as wormwood, sharp as a two-edged sword.
> [5] Her feet go down to death; her steps follow the path to Sheol;
> [6] she does not ponder the path of life; her ways wander, and she does not know it.

> [7] And now, O sons, listen to me, and do not depart from the words of my mouth.
> [8] Keep your way far from her, and do not go near the door of her house,
> [9] lest you give your honor to others and your years to the merciless,
> [10] lest strangers take their fill of your strength, and your labors go to the house of a foreigner,
> [11] and at the end of your life you groan, when your flesh and body are consumed,

Proverbs 7:10-21 goes further in describing the characteristics of a forbidden woman and likens her to a prostitute.

> [10] And behold, the woman meets him, dressed as a prostitute, wily of heart.
> [11] She is loud and wayward; her feet do not stay at home;
> [12] now in the street, now in the market, and at every corner she lies in wait.
> [13] She seizes him and kisses him, and with bold face she says to him,
> [14] "I had to offer sacrifices, and today I have paid my vows;
> [15] And now I have come out to meet you, to seek you eagerly, and I have found you.
> [16] I have spread my couch with coverings, colored linens from Egyptian linen;
> [17] I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon.
> [18] Come, let us take our fill of love till morning; let us delight ourselves with love.
> [19] For my husband is not at home; he has gone on a long journey;
> [20] he took a bag of money with him; at full moon he will come home."
> [21] With much seductive speech she persuades him; with her smooth talk she compels him.

These days, women don't offer sacrifices or pay their vows (heh…), but we can see how the modern equivalent meaning might be for her to finish her work and have the weekend free. The main idea here is that she is obsessed with getting her rocks off at the soonest possible convenience — if not with one man (like her husband (or "boyfriend") — who happens to be out of town), then it will be with another, perhaps any other man having a sufficient SMV whom she can persuade.

With most men of sufficient SMV, persuasion is not the issue. It depends on whether he has other, better opportunities with another woman whom may receive priority. So her trump card is to utilize her feminine wiles to convince him that she would be a more accessible, and more gratifying lay than the next ho down his Tinder list.

Why the Outrage?

Why are "Christian" women offended by Lori's article?

Why are the girls on Focus on the Family's ministry page, Boundless, going berserk about this sound advice?

- Are they refusing to hear godly wisdom?
- Are they upset because they aren't virgins yet they still expect top rate men?
- Why are they confusing the gospel and salvation with wisdom and prudence?
- Other reasons?

Related

- Σ Frame: Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019 February 23)

The 5 Phases of Deprogramming from the Matrix

Jack · 4 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Change is coming! An attractive woman took the Red Pill!

Readership: Christians; Those Aware; The Truly Woke;
Length: 220 words
Reading Time: 1 minute + 25 minutes of video

Take a look at the newest video from Probably Alexandra (a YouTube channel personality).*

Probably Alexandra: The 5 Phases of Deprogramming: You're Not Crazy! (2020/2/2) Length: 25 minutes

The icing on the cake is that she meets my list of the seven fundamental qualities of femininity — which makes this video easy to watch. These seven qualities are…

1. Thin (vis. an age appropriate BMI)
2. Long hair
3. Attentive to personal care, cleanliness, and grooming;
4. No tattoos, odd piercings, strange hair color, or other BS.
5. A calm peaceful spirit; Pleasant demeanor; Smiling;
6. Well Mannered; Eloquently spoken;
7. Emotional maturity; Moral agency (evidenced by her making a YouTube video on this subject);

Granted, she's putting on her best behavior for the video, but still, I'm impressed that such a high quality analysis is coming from a female! I am wondering if she has a ghost writer.

That last paragraph might sound "misogynistic", but you have to understand, it wasn't more than a couple years ago, there was some discussion in the Men's sphere about whether women could truly be Red Pilled. In my heart, I knew that (some) women could, but there was little evidence for it at that time.

 H/T: The Truthers Journal: The 5 Phases of Deprogramming (2020/2/2)*

Related

- Σ Frame: What is the Red Pill?

Women's choice to be relevant

Jack · 6 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

No matter what lifestyle they might prefer, women must choose to be relevant. Includes a case Study of J.P. Sartre and S. de Beauvoir.

Readership: All;
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Even Feminist women find ways to become Relevant

Hommunism just posted a concise and informative takedown of the evils of Feminism, Modern Feminism's Enemy: Womanhood (2020 February 4)*. It is quite a good read. It included this quote from the founders of Feminism.

> The celebrated feminist Simone de Beauvoir famously told Betty Friedan,
>
> - "No woman should be authorized to stay at home to raise her children.
> - Society should be totally different.
> - Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one."

Did you get that?

> "…authorized to stay at home…"
>
> "…authorized to raise her [own] children…"

Wow! You can almost feel the sinful solipsism from her psychological projection!

Of course, this goes directly against what we're told in Titus 2:3-4.

> "[3] the older women likewise, that they be reverent in behavior, not slanderers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things— [4] that they admonish the young women to love their husbands, to love their children, [5] to be discreet, chaste, homemakers, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the word of God may not be blasphemed."

I did a little search on de Beauvoir and found this photo of her.

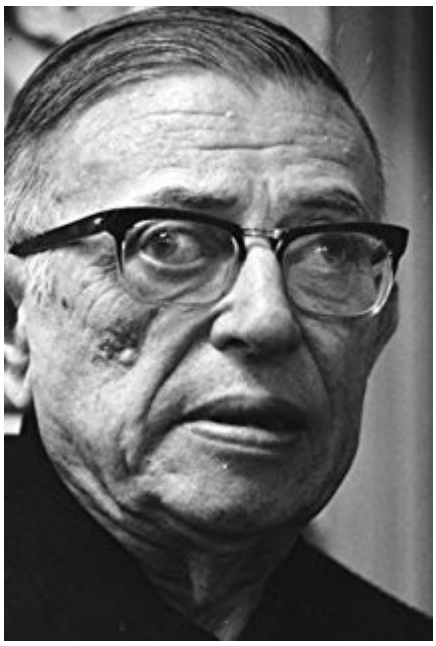
I've never seen such an icy cold look on a woman, and I can detect the vertical stab wounds of the 1,000 C0ck stare.

…and she's wearing a man's suit and tie.

Another woman of de Beauvoir's generational cohort included the Wicked Witch of the West (starring Margaret Hamilton, 1939). Compared to de Beauvoir, Hamilton is adorably cute, even in greenface.

So far, de Beauvoir is not relevant at all. Her motivations and conscious aspirations have little use or benefit outside her social circle.

However, it is interesting to know that de Beauvoir had a lifelong open relationship with Jean Paul Sartre, the leading existentialist philosopher of the 20th century. Sartre was a great mind, but handsome he wasn't.



Young men, beware! This is what cuckoldry does to your face!

Sartre wasn't that unattractive as a young man. He and de Beauvoir had had some kind of a relationship since their youth.

It appears that he was more into her, than the other way around. She just can't light up fast enough!

The truth be known, she was always on the prowl.

More than her contributions to society and philosophy, De Beauvoir was infamous for her sexual liaisons, including lesbianism, group sex, and debauching her students.

But apparently, she was really into this guy, Nelson Algren.

Even so, Sartre played the orbiter, even into their golden years.

Unsurprisingly, no man would have her in marriage. Besides, even though she longed for a husband and family, her work and her livid sexual promiscuities were more important to her than a commitment.

So how did she make herself relevant?

I suspect that de Beauvoire's greatest contribution to humanity was not so much to Feminism, but rather in serving up regular doses of electrified ɦə11 to Sartre (as well as her stultified, second-hand students), who then transferred that palm perspiration into his writings.

Verily, the existentialist view emerges from an agony and fear too intense to bear, combined with an imaginative mythos fueled by hope and desire. Being in love with a reveling feminist, and experiencing the intense jealousy that results from her capricious indiscretions will suffice to this end.

She also had an impact on Algren's success as one of the best known literary writers of his generation. He produced his best work and spawned several films during his affair with de Beauvoir and within a few short years after. Later, he won the national book award for his accomplishments.

It's well known that psychotic women are sexual powerhouses. She must've been super hot in the sack. It's also known that a saturated sexual satisfaction can yield an intensely clear mind. Why else would these men tolerate her for years?

> "Too hot to handle. Too cold to hold." ~ Bobby Brown (1989)

On to the next point.

Quality doesn't matter as much as Relevancy

In the comment section under Hommunism's article, Wordlywoman2 writes,

> "Maybe Artificial Intelligence in the female form, will take over the role of caregiver in the family home. Designed expressly by the man of the house, with all the desired attributes.
>
> Babies will be produced in test tubes, with the eggs supplied by a few carefully selected human females who, once past their use by date, will then be desexed and sent to work in construction. What a perfect world! Everyone gets what they want."

Of course, we know that she's wrong about one important point. She misses the fact that the highest quality females who are counted worthy of reproducing future generations of the human race will have already made the choice to marry and have children according to nature. It is the lower quality females who make poor choices in life and who need to be cared for in their later years, either by the socialist state, or by marketing transcripts of their torrid affairs.

Low quality females have the following attributes.

- They cannot (or will not) cultivate a peaceful, quiet spirit.
- Instead, they are brash, outspoken, and rebellious.
- They cannot (or will not) be trusting, humble, and content.
- Instead, they debauch their feminine nature and defile their ability to trust by engaging in profuse sexual promiscuity.
- They cannot glorify God by making themselves presentably attractive.
- Instead, they desex themselves by growing obese, cutting their hair too short, or even by going full tranny.
- They cannot maximize their feminine powers during their peak SMV years.
- Instead, they degrade their own bodies with substance abuse, hormonal birth control medication, and abortion.
- They cannot attract the love of a man willing to commit to marriage.
- Instead, they are forced to attend college and pursue a career in order to support themselves, while doing "Netflix and chill" with Tinder hookups.
- They have a negative opinion of men and authority, and so cannot find their place in the world.
- Instead, they are destined to go through life lonely and alone – except those with cats and box wine.

Low quality females quickly surpass their expiration date, and have little to offer society in their later years. However, Wordlywoman2 says that such women can always work in construction during their later years, so they are not totally useless, nor relegated to a sunk cost status.

I'm not sure about heavy construction, but spinsters would be especially well suited for inspecting, quality control, painting, sewing, typing, cleaning, food service, decoration, repetitive assembly line work, and making general errands. If I remember correctly, this is what spinsters did in de Beauvoir's day. They even made enough money to afford thoroughbred poodles and copious quantities of wine for their singles parties.

Concluding Statements

While I'm certain that Wordlywoman2 is trolling, she does make a good point. Feminism doesn't need to be all bad. Those women whose lot in life is to be feminists, and those who might even prefer that lifestyle, can still do their own thing without bringing the rest of society down to their level.

Simone de Beauvoir was a low quality woman, but she made herself relevant.

Everyone gets what they want, whether they end up liking it or not.

But it's their choice to be relevant.

 Reblogged At Larry's Musings: Modern Feminism's Enemy: Womanhood (2020 February 4)*

Related

- Σ Frame: The Evolution of Feminism as a Series of Cultural Movements (2018 January 15)
- Red Pill Dad: Quick example of why women are better off getting married and having kids. (2020 February 6)

Christian vs. Non-Christian Women

Lexet Blog · 8 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Why should there be no difference between Christian women and non-Christian women?

Readership: Christian men; Church leaders;
Note: This post was originally published on Lexet Iustitia in February of 2019.
Length: 500 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

I saw this comment under Sigma Frame's post, Why do Christian women have the reputation of being whores? (2019 February 23).

> "There are no functional differences between Christian women and secular women. Christian women are (or at least can be) as depraved, sexually damaged, and morally compromised, as a non-Christian woman can be. She might be a Christian, but she's still a woman, and All Women Are Like That, including Christian women." ~ The Deti's Second Law of Relationships

Coincidentally, I was thinking about a similar issue while in church today.

Both groups of women have their sinful nature. However, a Christian woman should be aware of that, and should be constantly fighting against her sinful nature. But as I looked around, I could clearly see that Christian women are not into this habit.

There is a level of depravity, however, that not only reveals a lack of sanctification, but also a rebellious life. Take for instance, a "christian" woman who shows up to church, week after week, month after month, year after year, wearing inappropriate clothing. That requires a callous heart, a lack of introspection and examination, a lack of discipleship, and a complete disregard for what the scriptures say.

Should Christians be distinguishable from the rest of the world? A clear and quick glance at scripture reveals that the answer is an obvious YES.

> "[4] And I heard another voice from heaven saying, "Come out of her, my people, lest you take part in her sins, lest you share in her plagues. [5] For her sins are heaped high as heaven, and God has remembered her iniquities." ~ Revelation 18:4-5 (ESV)

So why, in the United States, or in the West in general, is it impossible to distinguish a Christian woman from a non-Christian woman? [The exception would be the Amish, Mennonites, or girls who wear long denim dresses and head coverings].

Why is it that the vast majority of women in the hyper-majority of protestant churches cannot be differentiated from the outside world (when the outside world is literal harlotry 24/7)?

We have allowed culture to infiltrate the church, and not only control our lifestyles, but even control our theological doctrines. When there is no functional difference between a Christian woman and a woman openly practicing the values of Sodom and Gomorrah, there is a massive problem.

Our churches in the West should be embarrassed that there is no practical difference between Christian women, and non-believers.

Related

- Wintery Knight: More And More Women Are Asking Why They Can't Find A Good Man To Marry

(2018-4-12)

- Σ Frame: Meretricious Power and the Tingle (2018-10-9)
- Σ Frame: Christian vs. Non-Christian Women – A Negligeeable Difference (2019-3-20)
- Σ Frame: Christian Women Demand Men Marry Sluts With Debt and Tattoos (2020-2-3)

The Dalrock Route

Jack · 10 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A comprehensive assessment of Dalrock's overall Frame of reference concerning the male-female ontology.

Readership: All; Dalrock's followers;
Theme: Deprogramming
Note: This post is offered to commemorate Dalrock's service to Christians and their understanding of Christian doctrine over the past decade.
Length: 1,150 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Introduction

Dalrock has contributed a large number of fundamental insights to Christianity, the Manosphere, and to society at large. A shortlist of just a few of these topics would include,

- How to deal with a troublesome mother-in-law
- The College Boyfriend and marriage lite.
- The glorification of single mothers
- Modern trends in marriage and divorce
- Marriage 2.0
- The threatpoint of divorce and the Duluth model.
- The demonic origin of Courtly Love and the modern morphology of Chivalry.
- The confluence of Chivalry, Feminism, and Christianity to produce modern Churchianity.
- Chivalry as male feminism, the religion of beta orbiters
- The errancy of complementarianism and the myth of mutual submission.

Not to mention his many buzzwords, including, "Sticking the Landing", "Harley McBadBoy", and "You can't make this stuff up!"

The real Dalrock Route — Route 66 (AKA Lakeview Parkway) facing east through Dalrock Rowlett Texas, U.S.A.

What is the Dalrock Route?

A little over a year ago, Pastor Douglas Wilson answered a letter from Keith which asked him to define what he means by "The Dalrock Route". (Scroll waaay down this page, or do a page search for "Dalrock".) In a long overdue response, Wilson wrote,

> "Keith, from what I have seen, I would describe the Dalrock route as over-realized patriarchy. This is not the same thing as extreme patriarchy (the toxic kind), and it is not the same thing as my own version of (amazingly balanced) patriarchy. I speak as a man, as Paul might say, and that's the problem, as RHE [sic] might say. Over-realized patriarchy has a tendency to assume that the complementarians who gave away the store (and I agree with Dalrock that many of them did give away the store), did so on purpose. In other words, what they tend to describe as conspiracy, I would describe as a mix of conspiracy from some and confused foolishness from others. This also has had an impact on how Dalrock has interacted with some of my stuff, looping me as one of the conspirators to feminize everything. Since I know that he is persistent in reading me incorrectly, eventually I quit reading him."

Unfortunately, Wilson failed to define what he means by "over-realized patriarchy".

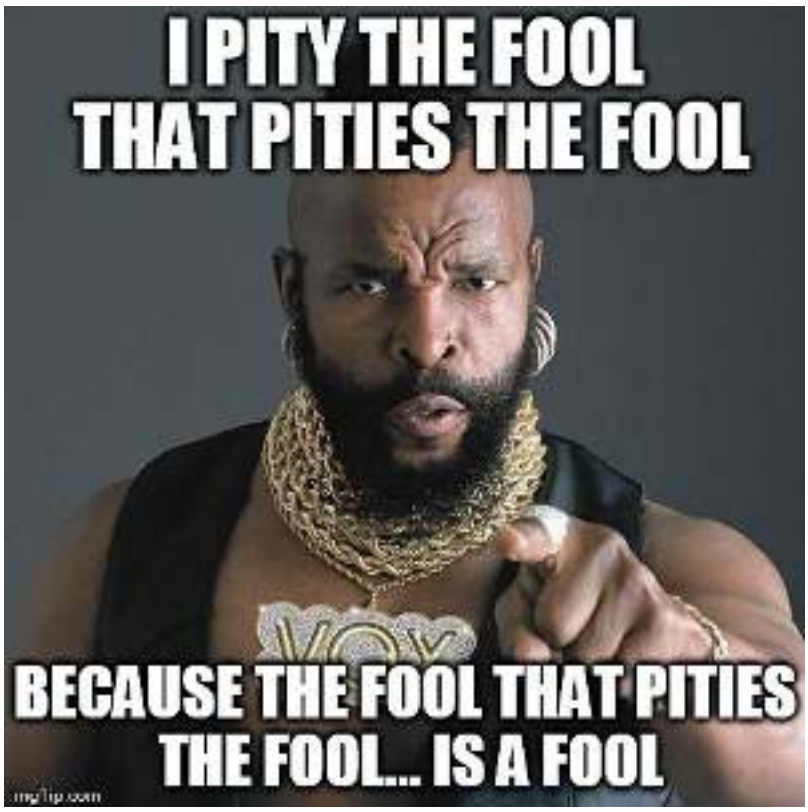
I informed Dalrock in a note, and I don't believe he ever gave a response to Wilson's description of The Dalrock Route. [If any readers know of a response, please leave a link in the comments below.]

Gunner Q offered his take on Doug Wilson Multi-Cucks (2018/12/22) [Archive].

From my reading of Wilson's response, the only difference between his viewpoint and Dalrock's is that Wilson attributes foolishness to what Dalrock presumes as a conspiracy.

Actually, both viewpoints are correct. Let me explain.

While foolishness is commonly accepted as ignorance, naivety, or childish tomfoolery, the true nature of foolishness is a lack of spiritual discernment and the knowledge of God that are concomitant with spiritual immaturity. IOW, foolishness is a form of latent evil. That is, Satan and his emissaries use foolish, immature minions, useful idiots if you will, to implement his will. Thus, foolishness is a part of the Satanic conspiracy.



I discussed this phenomenon in Why does Game work? (2019/12/9).

> "Men and women conditioned by Feminism and its counterpart, Chivalry, don't understand their own wants, needs, and desires. There is some sort of spiritual blindness prevalent in modern culture that prevents them from realizing that there is an aspect of themselves (i.e. Desire) that they are ignorant of, and which they haven't taken ownership of. Instead, Desire is permitted to roam free and unexamined, and it seems unreasonable that they should be expected to accept responsibility for this unknown part of their own nature. Therefore, when a person with Charisma stimulates those desires, they find it easy to jump to the conclusion that they are being "manipulated" or in some cases, "raped". As a point in case, if you were to ever ask a young woman how she ended up in bed with so and so, the default answer would be, "I don't know… It just happened!" Only after many encounters does she understand the mechanics of how it happened, yet she still doesn't understand her own Desire as a motivating factor."

The Dalrock Route is a paradigm that accounts for this phenomenon. If you read between the lines in his writings, there is an unstated, running assumption that people (i.e. women) are aware, or should become aware of their own nature, and that they should take responsibility for it.

Those conditioned by Feminism and Chivalry (male feminism) want to believe that women are not able (nor willing) to take responsibility for their own nature.

Christianism has a complicated assessment of the issue, which was summarized very concisely by Novaseeker.

> "[Complementarianists] … see women as having agency but that agency is contained within/conditioned by/constrained by (or enabled by) men's agency such that while both have agency, men have responsibility for both. It's a clever way of being able to preserve female moral agency in a technical sense while still holding men responsible for how women exercise their moral agency (creating moral agency without responsibility for women … or at least without the same degree of responsibility as men have for women's agency). All stemming from a misreading of Genesis 3."

Thus, these groups consider Dalrock's approach to be absurd, immature, harsh, or even misogynistic. A lot of the backlash Dalrock received from his critics was mostly centered around the beliefs that (1) women are not responsible for themselves as moral agents, and (2) neither should they be expected of the same.

On the other hand, it could be validly argued that Dalrock grants dignity to women in assuming that they do have moral agency, or that they could if they would "grow up" and develop maturity and spiritual discernment. From this viewpoint, Dalrock's detractors are the ones who are the true misogynists, as well as heretics for denying that women might experience the redemptive grace of God.

Notes

In my own writings on Σ Frame, I presume that women are spiritually immature (lacking agency), but that they should be expected to mature, develop spiritual awareness, and a sense of social responsibility. Similar to Dalrock, I don't believe the woman's behavior and its consequences are entirely the man's responsibility. But in contrast with Dalrock, I do believe there are a number of approaches that can facilitate the process of her spiritual growth.

A comparison of sources versus their underlying assumptions are given in the truth table below.

Truth Statement	Feminism	Chivalry	Σ Frame	Dalrock
Women lack moral agency.	True if victimized	True	Assumed True	Assumed False
Women should be expected to develop moral agency.	False	False	True	True
Women have moral agency.	True if empowered	False	Assumed False	True

The statement, "Women should be expected to develop moral agency", expresses an unwavering faith in the power of redemption, which is missing in Feminism, Chivalry, and much of Christianism / Complementarianism.

Related

- Σ Frame: Dalrock's Frame (2018/3/8)
- Dalrock: Warhorn interview: Male responsibility and female agency. (2019/2/8) [Archive]
- Dalrock: Transcript of the second podcast. (2019/3/9) [Archive]

Teaching our daughters well is the early foundation of successful wife moulding

Jack · 14 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: Fathers; Parents; Grandparents; Christians;
Length: 2,000 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Introduction

The author of Biblical Gender Roles made the following statements in a comment.*

> "From everything I have seen of Red Pill, it completely rejects a man appealing to a woman's sense of duty and honor as if women are incapable of having any such sense. So according to the [secular] Red Pill, the following endeavors are utter absurdity and a fool's errand."
>
> 1. A father teaching his daughter that it is her duty to give her body to her future husband.
> 2. A father teaching his daughter that it is her duty to cultivate a desire for her future husband.
> 3. A husband appealing to his wife's sense of honor, faith, and duty to God for her to behave in a spiritually obedient manner.
> 4. A husband appealing to his wife to willingly give her body to him as an expression of love and respect.
> 5. A husband appealing to his wife to cultivate her own desire for him.

I'll comment briefly on each of these applications.

The first two statements in the list concern the raising of daughters. I have written one post (so far) about how to properly discipline daughters: 13 Disciplines in Dealing with Delectable Daughters (2018 January 29). I also wrote a case study in which I moulded a neighboring divorced woman's daughter: A Girl Becomes a Lady (2017 December 26).

Children are especially mouldable, and so parents have a major responsibility to form daughters into young women who are emotionally mature and spiritually disciplined as adults. Unfortunately, this is a lost art form. Most of today's generation of proud, arrogant, entitled, promiscuous women were raised by a previous generation (dare I say the Boomers), who were themselves rebellious and liberal, and therefore were undisciplined in their approach to child rearing.

The last three statements in the list concern the conduct of wives and wife moulding. The application of these statements bifurcates into two general areas, according to what kind of woman we're dealing with.

1. For the wife who is emotionally mature and spiritually regenerated, it's about facilitating and rewarding her habitual choice to be spiritually obedient (to God).
2. For the wife who is emotionally immature and/or fleshly minded, we're talking about discipline and wife moulding. This is important, because if she doesn't get her act together, the marriage, even to a good-willed, self-sacrificing, spiritually obedient husband, is bound to fail. Also, if she happens to be one who lacks self-control, then the marriage is incalculably unstable. In this case, the husband will need to utilize some game to satisfy her needs in order to decrease the chances of her spilling the pudding.

> "But we know from history that women, when properly trained in their faith, can actually have a great sense of duty and honor. In other words, if a woman truly loves God and his Word she can and will love her husband. A woman can learn to give her body, even when she does not desire it, from a sense of duty and honor. This is > all foreign to Red Pill from what I have seen."

I agree that women can have a great sense of duty, honor, and even loyalty, but this is habitually overlooked in most secular Red Pill literature. I believe this omission is partly due to the fact that this kind of woman is exceedingly rare, too rare to put any faith in finding one by chance, and partly because this knowledge is essentially meaningless to the secular Manosphere's target audience – younger men looking to score.

It is an omission now being covered through this response to BGR.

First, consider this proverb.

> "Train up a child in the way he should go, And when he is old he will not depart from it." ~ Proverbs 22:6 (NKJV)

Of course, this also applies to female children.

Based on this verse, I postulate that such women worthy of marriage might increase in number, provided they have a suitable education and training. I am not referring to a liberal arts degree in gender studies (unless it's hosted by BGR). I mean, having an upbringing filled with continual education and training on how to be responsible, faithful, and dignified wives and mothers (as opposed to irresponsible, unfaithful, and indignified wimminz).

The historical importance of Finishing School

In times long past, wealthy families used to send their daughters to what was known as a "finishing school". (Think "finish", as in being thoroughly prepared and ready for use, like a glossy oil finish on woodwork.) Finishing school taught young ladies the arts of home economics, cooking, cleaning, mending, child care, as well as proper etiquette and social graces. But that's not all. From a Red Pill standpoint, it also taught women to be self-aware, humble, respectful, deferential, and self-disciplined. Finishing school, for women, was as emotionally and physically taxing as basic training was for enlisted servicemen. This is why many families believed that finishing school was absolutely necessary to prepare a young woman for marriage life. The qualification of having completed finishing school also served to help young women who aspired to land high (or higher, according to her hypergamic filters) MMV husbands. For many families of refined taste, a young woman was not considered eligible for marriage unless she had attended finishing school, and by doing so, had diligently prepared herself for married life. In recent times, the influences of feminism have all but eradicated the practice of finishing school.

I'm still searching for a finishing school in Switzerland that goes by the name of Chateau Heartiste. I know there's got to be one there somewhere!

In my opinion, finishing school was for parentally lazy fat cats who were too busy working, traveling, and making money to spend the time and effort necessary to educate their spoiled rotten children themselves. You don't need to have such opulent means to train your children well. I suggest that parents should be teaching their children (not only daughters) on how to be finished individuals. In addition to this, churches and other social organizations could offer the equivalent of finishing school to young people in their congregations.

Home schooling is a necessary daily exercise

I know this connection (that disciplined daughters become faithful wives) is highly theoretical, especially since we never see this happening anymore. But I am convinced it is true. Parents need to teach and discipline their children, both boys and girls, and start from a young age.

Consider this passage from the scriptures.

> [4] "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is one! [5] You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, with all your soul, and with all your strength.
>
> [6] "And these words which I command you today shall be in your heart. [7] You shall teach them diligently to your children, and shall talk of them when you sit in your house, when you walk by the way, when you lie down, and when you rise up. [8] You shall bind them as a sign on your hand, and they shall be as frontlets between your eyes. [9] You shall write them on the doorposts of your house and on your gates." ~ Deuteronomy 6:4-9 (NKJV)

When I look around, I don't see any Christian parents who are in the habit of even mentioning anything about the Bible outside of chirtch. Tsk, Tsk…

Later in this passage, it gives the reason why we must teach God's statues and commandments to our children.

> [24] "And the Lord commanded us to observe all these statutes, to fear the Lord our God, for our good always, that He might preserve us alive, as it is this day. [25] Then it will be righteousness for us, if we are careful to observe all these commandments before the Lord our God, as He has commanded us.'" ~ Deuteronomy 6:24-25 (NKJV)

This same command is reiterated again five chapters later.

> [16] "Take heed to yourselves, lest your heart be deceived, and you turn aside and serve other gods and worship them, [17] lest the Lord's anger be aroused against you, and He shut up the heavens so that there be no rain, and the land yield no produce, and you perish quickly from the good land which the Lord is giving you."

No wonder! This is already happening to the U.S. and Europe. Tsk, Tsk…

> [18] "Therefore you shall lay up these words of mine in your heart and in your soul, and bind them as a sign on your hand, and they shall be as frontlets between your eyes. [19] You shall teach them to your children, speaking of them when you sit in your house, when you walk by the way, when you lie down, and when you rise up. [20] And you shall write them on the doorposts of your house and on your gates, [21] that your days and the days of your children may be multiplied in the land of which the Lord swore to your fathers to give them, like the days of the heavens above the earth."

The message for Christians (I believe) is that (at least some) women have the potential to become virtuous (i.e. righteous), but it all depends on whether we as a family, and as a society, want it desperately enough, and whether our daughters are able to accept our teaching, and the testimony of our lives. It follows that such a woman must then enter into a redemptive life experience which can set her on the upward path – such as home schooling or finishing school.

> [22] "For if you carefully keep all these commandments which I command you to do — to love the Lord your God, to walk in all His ways, and to hold fast to Him — [23] then the Lord will drive out all these nations from before you, and you will dispossess greater and mightier nations than yourselves." ~ Deuteronomy 11:16-23 (NKJV)

Think about that last verse for a moment. If your main concern has only been that your daughter might get pregnant out of wedlock, then your mind is in the gutter. It's time to recalibrate your mind and set your sights higher.

If you think I'm toting some version of a prosperity gospel, then you've missed the point. The point is that getting involved is going to improve your life, and your children's lives too. Talking to your daughter about various things on a regular basis is going to improve her future.

Concluding Statements

In conclusion, the parents' faithful discipline and teaching their daughters (and sons) during childhood and adolescence, produces emotionally mature, responsible, and faithful wives (and higher quality men).

If the nuclear family and the church community cannot offer the necessary teaching and discipline, along with a meaningful social structure and a clear life path for young people, then we're unwittingly handing our children over to the tortuous and destructive devices of this world. Satan will always be willing and waiting to entice our daughters to explore the SMP, exercise her feral hypergamy, transform her into a highly educated wh0re, and then whip her hopeless heart senseless. Those women who fall for the ploy are eventually forced to become cruel, heartless b!tch!z (AKA a Strong Independent Woman™) in order to secure resources and affirmation for themselves, before retiring as burnt out felinephiles. Tsk, Tsk…

Fathers, don't default to stand-by mode while your daughters are growing. We must take some kind of action. Make it a daily activity, not just an alarming one-off lecture with disheartening gravity. Write it on the doorposts of your house! Also consider home schooling, or finishing school, or a similar training program for your daughter.

 BGR's statements have been paraphrased for the sake of clarity and conciseness.*

Related

- Study in Switzerland: Finishing Schools In Switzerland: Everything You Need To Know (2019 March 12)
- Bible Reasons (feat. Fritz Chery): Teaching Children (2020 January 7)

Courtship and Power

Lexet Blog · 17 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Lexet's critique of Sigma Frame's models of courtship and marital structure.

Audience: Christian men; Single men; Pastors; Elders; Topic: Courtship, Sigma Frame's article, Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (2018 October 3).*
Length: 4,000 words
Reading Time: 14 minutes
Author's notes:

- This study was conducted by the author of Lexet Iustitia, and was first published on 2018 October 4.
- This article was updated on 2018/10/4 and revised for reposting on 2020/2/7.
- Updates are underlined, not in bold.
- Sigma Frame (SF) has added some commentary in blue text.

Feel free to ask questions or critique below. It is not a full length analysis of every aspect of Sigma Frame's original article.

INTRODUCTION

This article addresses Sigma Frame's article about courtship, and the power dynamics within a courtship. I encourage all to read it, although non-Christians are likely to not care nor be interested in it. As a Christian, it is important to know and understand what the Biblical model for "finding a wife" is. In the article below, the reader will come to understand what the word of God says on the issue (which is what I affirm).

Something to consider, however, is that even in Christian circles, men face the dilemma of being forced into a non-biblical, or even anti-biblical, system to become married. This dilemma subjects Christian men to intense temptation, and puts them under extreme pressure to marry, if they wish to retain their sexual purity. I do not aim to address that here, or what to do if you encounter this dilemma. I may touch on that later, but I believe a man should understand what marriage is, who he is, and what he expects his wife-to-be to be, before he considers a relationship.

Depending on the woman, her family, and church circumstances, it's possible that a man might have to be flexible in his approach (dating vs. courtship). For instance, it would be practical to date a woman in her middle to upper twenties who lives alone, while it may be more prudent to court a younger woman, or woman who lives with her parents.

I. SIGMA FRAME'S POSITION (and definitions)

A. Definitions

Sigma Frame defines two courtship models, which correspond to the sex holding the majority of "power" in the interaction.

1. The Courtly Love Model is the traditional (for modern times) model where the female holds power. For the sake of clarity, SF has taken the liberty to label a marriage based on this model as a matrimony. This is the dominant model for courtship, and is the dominant model in Bible believing Christian circles (Reformed, Evangelical, and Baptist).
2. The Respectful Courtship Model (humorously labeled as the "Tingly Respect model" in SF's essay) is the historical norm. Again, for the sake of clarity in meaning, SF has labeled a marriage based on this model as a patrimony (from Latin, patrimonium, or the obligation of the father).

SF: These models are further defined and explored in a follow up essay, The Feminine Dilemma (2018 October 27).

Marriage is known as "holy matrimony," and stems from "Matrimonium." Matrimonium is the combination of mater (mother) and monium (obligation). Matrimonium used to be a system where the wife should become a mother, and stay with the father of that child. From a highly technical, and semantic point of view, it appears that defining a marriage as matrimonial according to the Courtly Love model does not make sense.

However, the legal definition of patrimonium is the private and exclusive ownership or dominion of an individual, to the exclusion of others. Sigma Frame's article is about the FRAME of the courtship, the relationship itself, and how they contrast. The contrast of Matrimony and Patrimony fit into this narrative. The fact that this distinction has lasted for centuries is a major clue to the truth of how relationships should operate.

SF: There are several reasons why I adopted these two words, "matrimony" and "patrimony", to refer to the respectively defined relationship structures. These reasons are briefly described here.

- "Patrimony" is used to replace "matrimony" when referring specifically to the Tingly Respect model, in order to easily and clearly make a distinction between the two relational structures.
- The word "patrimony" accurately reflects the nature of the Respect model.

- English culture has used the word "matrimony" to refer to a marriage since circa 1300 AD, which is around the same time that the perverted concept of Chivalry appeared.
- Reintroducing the word "patrimony" to replace "matrimony" makes a break with the tradition of Chivalry (and modern Churchianity), and returns (nominally and symbolically) to an earlier tradition which has been replaced in modern times by Chivalry and Feminism.
- It is important to differentiate between the two structures so that people can make a clear distinction of what they expect in a marriage, and also communicate this in meaningful words.

B. My Position on Sigma Frame's Definitions:

I agree that these are good working definitions for the courting phase/pre-marriage phase of a relationship.

For those of us in modern times, the traditional norm of a relationship is that men chase and initiate, while women respond. From my own understanding, this has been the predominant model since Victorian times, when men would "call" on women, and meet in the parlor rooms of the woman's family home. This custom has fallen out of practice, but the model itself is still hammered into most men from a young age, from all angles, especially pop culture (as of 2008, when logic and reason were turned upside down).

In the context of the Christian community, this is also true to an unhealthy degree. Christian men are taught that men initiate, and take charge of the relationship. "He who finds a wife finds a good thing" (Prov. 18:22) is quoted to death in these circles. But the reality on the ground is that Feminism and Chivalry dominate the intersexual dynamics being taught and practiced in the church, and as such, marriage is more of a risk than a benefit, Christianity notwithstanding. (Dalrock has explored the deceptiveness of this belief in detail.)

My personal viewpoint is traditional, and now a minority view in Christianity: Men are to take charge, take responsibility, and provide for their families. They lead their household.

However, there is no Biblical basis for saying the individual man is personally responsible for making this relationship happen. The very same book of the Bible that is cited to push men to be proactive in their dealings with women also tells men to not waste their strength on women.

> "The glory of young men is their strength, but the splendor of old men is their gray hair." ~ Proverbs 20:29

> (ESV)
>
> "Do not spend your strength on women, your vigor on those who ruin kings." ~ Proverbs 31:3 (NIV)
>
> "[33] But the married man is anxious about worldly things, how to please his wife, [34] and his interests are divided. And the unmarried or betrothed woman is anxious about the things of the Lord, how to be holy in body and spirit. But the married woman is anxious about worldly things, how to please her husband." ~ 1st Corinthians 7:33-34 (ESV).

With a minimal number of exceptions, the norm throughout the Bible is a man dealing with the father of his interest, or the fathers of both arranging the relationship. (That is not to say there was no veto power by the man or woman in the cultures of the era when scriptures were recorded.)

Even the exceptions prove this rule: Boaz (or his relative) was bound by law to marry Ruth, as her kinsman redeemer. In fact, there was another kinsman redeemer closer in the line of "priority." Boaz only married her after going through his city's leaders, and receiving permission from the other redeemer. It was also a legal obligation of his. He took responsibility, but he didn't initiate the relationship.

The other exception commonly cited is Hosea, a prophet who was commanded by God to find a wife of whoredom, in order to graphically illustrate the specific nature of Israel's spiritual adulteries. Hosea's marriage (and presumably all the drama and gossip that came along with it) was intended to make the Israelites aware of God's perspective on their spiritual profligacies, and so shame them into repentance.

However, in most pulpits, the command for Hosea to "man up and marry that slore" is the underlying message emphasized. Meanwhile, the risk, heartbreak, and implicit fraud involved with Hosea (or any modern man) marrying a promiscuous woman, or having an adulterous wife, are totally ignored. It is not by coincidence, that this omission mutes God's perspective on the issue altogether, and shunts any sense of shame that might arise in the parish.

Quite frankly, the book of Hosea, and the Church's spin on its message, proves more Red Pill principles than just about any other book or chapter of the Bible.

In Mandarin Chinese, a cuckold is called a tortoise (烏龜).

II. THE PRESUMPTIONS OF POWER IN A COURTSHIP (OR RELATIONSHIP)

Sigma Frame claims: men tend to (1) comply, while women tend to (2) fight to establish power, or (3) fold and bow out of the relationship. I can agree to this assertion in general, but believe there are strong exceptions to this, as both sexes have tendencies to do (1) and (3).

As per (2), the word of God makes it clear that, as part of the curse on man, women will try to usurp the authority of her husband.

> "Your desire shall be contrary to your husband, but he shall rule over you." ~ Genesis 3:16.

Regarding (3), I think the tendency for males is to fold to the woman, or to "make them happy" and give the woman what they want.

> "Because you have listened to the voice of your wife and [disobeyed my command]… cursed is the ground because of you…" ~ Genesis 3:17.

The result of this curse is that there is constant friction between the sexes, with power being a fluid force. Men tend to abuse their power, or give it to the woman, who tends to desire that power. It takes great strength and willpower for a man to find that balance.

A. The Courtly Love Model

The very nature of the Courtly Love model is that the man must conform to her wishes and whims, and act according to her schedule. The man pedestalizes the woman in every way: he singles her out, she knows this up front, and he must perform in order to win her affection. He is at her mercy the entire time. The woman definitely holds the power in this system.

The Courtly Love system is Blue Pill (or anti- Red Pill) because the woman doesn't operate within the man's timeframe and prerogatives. He does not set the rules or boundaries of the relationship or how or where it is to be conducted.

Furthermore, it is nearly impossible to maintain a Red Pill Frame in this type of relationship, because the men who participate in this system (1) tend to be of high character, (2) have a moral belief in the model, thinking it is the man's duty to accommodate his wife, and assuming that love must necessarily adopt a supplicating response, or (3) believe that a particular woman, or the personal rewards of "having and holding her" [Translation: "owning and f*cking her"], makes it worth going through this process. [Note: This is a form of Beta-persistence.]

Sigma Frame is absolutely right in that a man becomes a plea bargainer in this form of a relationship. However, I believe this plea bargaining can occur in any model of relationship that is not properly maintained. (Crappy emo music exists because of plea bargaining betas.)

B. The Respect Model

Sigma Frame posits that in the Respect model, men retain power, but women have an advantage in the way of choice. The model works such that the woman trades her choice for marriage, while the man consolidates his power.

SF: To elaborate further, the woman's power of choice is phenomenally glorious during her peak SMV years (18-25 years old). This power (based on her youth, beauty, undefiled fecundity, and the inspiration that she imparts to the man) is absolutely necessary to negotiate a high-stakes marriage with a suitable man. By marrying one man during her peak, she forfeits all other men (and experiences with men) as a cost of opportunity, but gains a multitude of benefits through that marriage that will extend throughout her life. Once the woman loses her power by becoming defiled or by waiting until wilting (~30 years old), she forfeits landing a high quality man in marriage, and runs the risk of not marrying at all.

I do not know anyone who has gone through this process for courtship, but have read about it in books or posts online. Some might claim that this is what the Duggar's practice, but that family calls for the suitor to submit to the father… forever.

SF: The Duggar's structure seems similar to Confucian Filial Piety, which is the standard family structure in Chinese cultures. The single man does not maintain any sense of personal identity, as he is over shadowed by the patrilinear governance of the family – a senior male figure. This might seem like a drag to younger men, however, the positive flip side is that he receives (1) financial support in developing his career, and (2) mentorship and guidance, in the hope that he will one day assume the position of the patriarch within the family. Younger, independent, feminist women hate this patricentric structure, but more mature, marriage-minded women appreciate the emotional stability, financial security, and the occasional family drama that accompanies this model. It is noteworthy that the Chinese family structure, as it pertains to societal preservation, has lasted since ancient times, and continues to be one of the most stable social structures in the world. Thus, the Filial Piety structure might offer several case studies which manifest the Respect model.

The Respect Model should theoretically work both ways with a father and the suitor: mutual respect, and an understanding of boundaries. From a Christian perspective, this is due to the father's authority over his household, until the daughter marries and cleaves to her husband.

III. STRENGTHS AND WEAKNESSES OF BOTH MODELS

A. The Courtly Love Model

> "Women are more likely to attract men who possess an equitable SMV/MMV with hers."

FALSE. In Christian circles, this is highly unlikely. Not only are men and women expected to go to college, but men tend to abandon the church between the ages of 18 and having kids. In my experience, the men who attended were college age and younger, or mid to late thirties, while the women were 18 to mid-twenties. The women are not interested in their peer group (contrary to secular culture). They are openly hypergamous in "not settling" for the not too older, successful, charming, fit, and wealthy man (men who generally don't exist in a Bible-based church).

SF: Your comments are a fairly accurate description of most churches. But when I say that women are more likely to attract men who possess an equitable SMV/MMV, it doesn't mean that women will necessarily be attracted to these same men. This is one of the weaknesses of this model, since women cannot respect the type of men that the Courtly Love system delivers to them.

In my situation, I would be forced to consider someone older (never happening), or more than five years younger (no personal opposition and preferred, but most people would not be ok with that these days).

> "Men have sincere convictions about committing to an LTR/marriage."

TRUE. Something must have gone wrong if an Alpha survives this process. Either the relationship was teetering on immorality, or the marriage was against parents' disrespected wishes.

A friend of mine who went through a super short courtship confessed that his wife admitted she was struggling with temptation. The courtship is supposed to guard against such struggles, meaning the model produced a marriage in spite of the system.

> "Men's honor is assumed."

FALSE. You will still be shit tested to death. Men are conditioned to fall into the trap, hence so many single Christian girls in their late twenties.

SF: To elaborate further, men's honor, in this case, is based on the Courtly Love mythos of Chivalry, and how well a man conforms to the rules of Chivalry. Thus, honorable men of high caliber tend to fall into this system. (This is NOT the same type of men that women find attractive, as mentioned earlier.)*

- It is popular: TRUE. Case in point: Joshua Harris, even after his retraction of his books.
- The structure inverts the Biblical analogy of marriage: True.
- Marriages based on this model lead to conflict and divorce… Probably FALSE. Marriages from any model come to the same tension and conflict. However, this model speeds up the process, as the woman enters the marriage with this power.
- The Model shows feral inclinations of the flesh: TRUE. This model absolutely promotes pedestalization, and the idea that a man must prove himself to a woman. There is no obligation for the woman to be committed to the relationship.
- Respondent cannot make a determination as to Sigma Frame's remaining claims due to lack of sufficient information, experience, or belief.

B. The Respect Model

After this sentence, I will post my thoughts in as many words as there are relationships formed from this model: ___ _____.

In all seriousness, this model needs to be fleshed out. It can only work in a Christian environment, or in a culture influenced by Biblical Christianity, and not churchianity. This model must be fleshed out in order to advocate its implementation. The likelihood of a person finding this in the real world is slim to none. I believe only incredibly orthodox communities that are legalistic and quasi-pharisaical would practice this model (e.g. Doug Wilson's "church", Mennonites, Conservative Presbyterians, "fundamentalist" Baptists, or super small, rural, non-denominational churches). However, as our boy Dalrock has pointed out numerous times before, people like Doug Wilson are beta's in disguise. It is very common for men to vocalize support for Biblical Patriarchy out of insecurity. They lend their voice, but not their actions, to this position.

SF: If they were to see REAL Biblical Patriarchy, they'd lose bowel control and blaspheme.

IV. THE REALITY OF COURTSHIP

A. What Courtship Should Be

For those men who are Red Pill and Christian, who would like to be the man that maintains power over the relationship before marriage, there is really no clear cut way for that to happen. A woman is under her father's authority until marriage. The man has zero "power," other than the woman having some interest in him. Ideally, the character of her father would affirm the character of the prospective suitor. That is what the Respect Model should be. A man should display certain alpha qualities in every aspect of his life. The demonstration of his consistent alpha behaviors is key.

1 Corinthians 7:36-38 is sometimes improperly translated, confusing its meaning. Because of improper translations, some say this verse pertains to an engaged man and his virgin bride. This is not the case. In fact, this verse is critical for understanding biblical relationships, because it directly states the authority of a woman to marry, and whom she may marry, is in her father. The verse is properly translated to convey what the Greek text says in the NAS.

> "If any man thinks that he is acting unbecomingly toward his virgin daughter, if she is past her youth, and if it must be so, let him do what he wishes, he does not sin; let her marry. But he who stands firm in his heart, being under no constraint, but has authority over his own will, and has decided this in his own heart, to keep his own virgin daughter, he will do well. So both he who gives his own virgin daughter in marriage does well, and he who does not give her in marriage will do better."

B. What Courtship Is In Reality

The Great However, however, is that what is described above does not happen in modern Christianity, save for pure ceremonial purposes at a wedding. I know of only one instance where I think it may have happened, and that is from my experience in several denominations, in several regions, of at least four states. That means any suggestion of the Respect Model existing is hearsay, in my opinion.

For my friends, and myself (a successful courtship that left me unscathed), we are forced into operating under the Courtly Love model. Most Christian fathers are not alphas, nor men of character, regardless of what they say or practice. They either prefer a dating model, where they can abdicate their authority (through compliance and folding), and check out of their family, or are puppets of the daughter/wife.

I have never seen a Christian man make a hard decision for his daughter, where he said, "This will be done, for your benefit, regardless of what you think." In fact, the only time I have seen this happen was to make an awful decision that was not in the best interest of the female, of the church, or as an example for all other single females in the church. A conservative church I attended openly demanded a single pregnant member to abandon the father of the child, against all biblical precedent and common sense. Fortunately for many, I was not present when this announcement was made.

CONCLUSIONS

In today's world, a marriage or relationship is the mutual exchange of mate-choice for commitment. But we are without clear societal and legal controls to guarantee that commitment. Sigma Frame is correct to say that,

> "The weak link in the chain is not so much a lack of courage or righteousness in the man's authority, but in the willingness of the woman to continue in a posture of submission."

While SF says this is for the Respect Model, this is true for both models of courtship, as proven by recent divorce figures. Regardless of the models used during the pre-marriage phase, every relationship faces the same tension after the exchange of nuptials. In the Red Pill community, this is ascribed to hypergamous tendencies, while in the Christian community, it is ascribed to our sin nature, and a direct result of the curse.

> "Women who pine for power, but who fail to achieve it in a relationship, often resort to cheap but greatly annoying substitutions of pseudo-power. This situation is especially prone to occur after a woman loses her SMV/MMV power (AKA "hitting the wall"), while her male counterpart is reaching his peak SMV, which further enhances her sense of insecurity and powerlessness."

Many men in the red pill community do not realize this, and have a problem in transitioning from being single and Red Pill, to maintaining that "frame" or "mindset" once they are in a LTR. This is men tending to COMPLY. We let our guard down, and think we can ride off the achievements of the past.

The reason why we may see a tendency of marriages to fall apart based on what model was used in establishing the relationship has more to do with the individuals, not the model. The model may have set the pace, so that conflict comes sooner, or in a different way.

While I believe the Church should advocate a method of "courtship," it is critical to define gender/sex roles, and roles within marriage, and hold firm to those values. Men must decide whether or not the system of marriage in our society is worth the battles he will face.

In all reality, establishing an LTR as a man is committing to lifelong battle against our nature of letting our guard down, fighting against societal pressure against our interest, and fighting the usurpation of our authority in a relationship. While a man of character (the proverbial Alpha) may come across many "losses," he will wage this battle nonetheless.

SF: Lexet, thanks for taking the time to study the models and write this essay. I'm thankful to have this review back up on line.

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: Marriage Structures (April 15, 2016)

Is Biblical Courtship Possible?

Jack · 19 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Biblical Marriage is flatly illegal in the West.

Readership: Christians
Author's Note: This essay originally appeared on Ed Hurst's site, Do What's Right: Is Biblical Courtship Possible? (2020-2-18). The text has been reblogged here with images added.
Length: 1,350 words
Reading Time: 4.5 minutes

Jack over at Sigma Frame has requested that I explain a comment I made on his blog that a biblical courtship is so counter to our Western culture as to be virtually illegal. More specifically, he broke it down into the following questions:

- What is a biblical courtship? (A brief description and definitions to serve as a foundation for the following.)
- Why is a biblical courtship (and/or marriage) illegal or impossible in western society?
- What would need to change in the laws, culture, or society for a biblical courtship to be accessible?
- Are there any foreign countries (that you know of), where people could freely practice biblical courtship/marriage?

This is really quite simple: Biblical Law requires a covenant patriarchal, feudal and tribal social structure in the first place. Anything else hinders the power of shalom promised by God in His covenants. It is possible to approach Biblical Law in your personal life, but genuine biblical living is simply not fully possible in any society that is not, at the minimum under, a biblical covenant.

Caveat: I know that most of Western Christianity chokes on the idea of Biblical Law as included in the Covenant of Christ. They misread their Western democratic mythology back into Scripture and fail to grasp that everything Jesus taught arose from a covenant relationship with the Father. All legitimate covenants will include patriarchy, eastern feudalism, and a tribal social structure. That's what the early churches looked like, and it was lost sometime between the last apostle and Constantine's seduction of the church leadership in his time. Church History has been a long record of mostly missing out on the blessings God would have preferred to give His people.

A valid church will be a miniature tribal social atmosphere, and it will be organized as a feudal patriarchy. It will have a ruling elder and a spiritual pastor (the Two Witnesses). These two together will provide the moral guidance for those in the church body. Everyone is a covenant family together under their leadership, an extended family household, a clan by covenant, if not by blood.

The biblical ideal for courtship is based on, not just women, but the whole family as the property, the real treasure of these two men working together. The biblical model restricts contact between the sexes far more than is common in Western society. It is fully aware of the basic facts behind the Red Pill movement and seeks to build relationships above the fleshly level of consideration. The whole purpose is to heal the moral wounds a fallen world puts into our lives and to clean out the infestations of demonic influence. The leaders in particular, but the church clan as a whole, will be motivated by raising up a strong tribe. Courtship must serve this end.

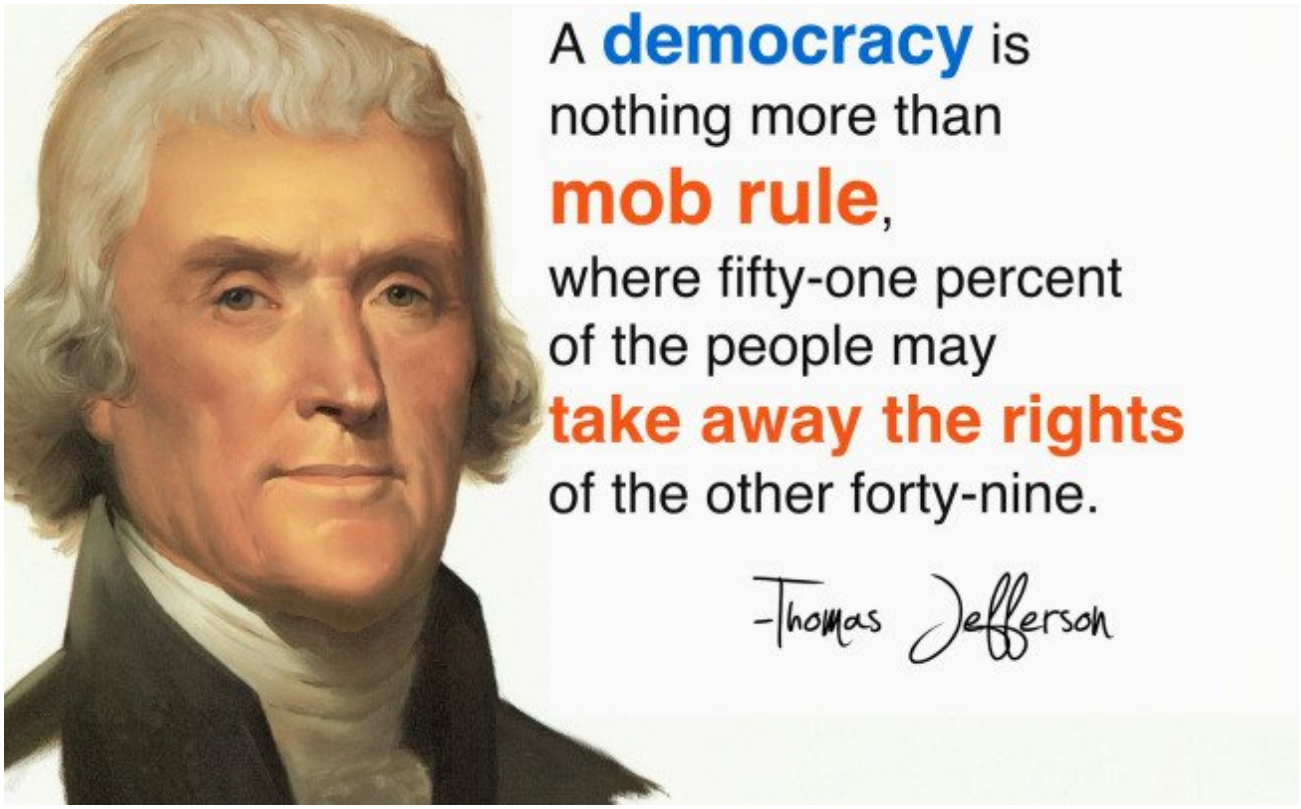
While there must be some volition on the part of the boy and girl, the driving force in choosing a spouse is what the clan together knows is best for each boy and girl, within that frame of reference. They can't simply run at it from mere fleshly attraction, but it must aim at pairing up solid people to build solid families taking their place in the moral prosperity of the clan. This is inherent in the society God created as the context and means for His revelation.

Fundamental truth: As a man called of God, all my ability to bless someone starts with the authority God grants me. That authority is inherently feudal in nature. I cannot give what I do not have from God. I am morally bound to obey His commission; what other people want and expect is a mere matter of maneuver and tactics for me. The world has no authority to decide what is good, right and just, but the world has plenty of practical political control that ignores divine revelation. Sometimes brash resistance is what God requires, but mostly I just work my way around everything that ignores His Word. I do a lot of things other people consider important, but that's just the setting in which I operate.

The proper image here is God granting me a feudal domain within His realm. I can perform some useful services to the world at large, but to really harvest the full potential of what God has made me able to do, there must be an accounting for my feudal dominion. It's not always precise, but in conceptual terms, you must enter my domain to receive what I have to offer. Yes, it's all conditional. You may bring your own domain with you to varying degrees, but you still have to court my authority, unless you are recognized as my feudal superior.

God has revealed that, at least in our fallen existence in the flesh, men bear moral dominion. Assuming for a moment that I have no spouse and God leads me to begin praying for one, I must know from the start that I cannot surrender my authority to any woman. I do no supplicate for female partnership. She must enter my dominion or there is no grounds on which to build a relationship. If that means there are no takers, I leave that problem at the foot of the Cross and move on with my divine mission.

How many women in the US where I live are going to take me up on that offer? How many churches are structured to make it work like that in first place? I'm more likely to find a willing woman outside the church, and that suggests a whole mass of transition for her to make a fully informed decision on what she's getting into. Meanwhile, the entire legal system of the US is slanted firmly against all of this. Indeed, a church cannot legally incorporate with any state that I know of with the structure I've outlined above, so it means foregoing the tax exempt status and all the legal protections that come with it, meager though they are.



Changing this would mean a brutal and bloody end to the US Constitution and any pretense of democracy, and spinning off the whole population into small, sovereign tribes. It would mean starting from scratch with a culture that recognizes eastern feudal thinking, and a rejection of the whole Western pretense of Aristotelian intellectual traditions. That would require an apocalypse of some sort.

There is not a single country today that follows the biblical model. There are few that do come a whole lot closer to it than any Western country, but those are all under Muslim rule. They have the approximate structure of a patriarchal tribal society, but their covenant is deeply corrupted from the biblical model. The biblical model of gentle shepherding is foreign to them. But because they come closer to Biblical Law unknowingly, they will still outlast our Western world. They are closer to reality as God created it. The natural world itself is against us, but finds Islamic societies more tolerable, despite their brutality and moral blindness. With all of our military might, nothing we do will ever change them, no matter how they may choose to play along here and there with the Western political and economic agenda.

The closest approximation you and I can make to biblical courtship these days is still very, very remote from that model. I can tell you how I would do it now — and how I actually did it in my youth — but that may not help you much in your own context. I received a miracle marriage from God, so it can be done. Still, while my marriage is morally strong, it remains legally fragile. With all the legal savvy I have now, I would still stand to lose all my worldly possessions, and many of my social connections would be dissolved, if she turned against me for even the most frivolous reasons. That's not how God said it should be.

Related

- Radix Fidem: Dating and Courtship: Doing It All Wrong (2009-10-14)
- Radix Fidem: We Know We Need It (2019-3-1)
- Radix Fidem: Courtship and Longing (2019-3-4)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Courtship and Power (2020-02-17)
- Radix Fidem: Christian Marriage in Context (2020-2-26)
- Radix Fidem: Marriage: Path through the Shadows (2020-4-4)

A Response to Jason's Comments

Jack · 21 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A Response to Jason's Comments.

Readership: Jason (lastmod); Lexet; Derek (ramman3000); Others who may be interested;

Dear brother Jason,*

This week, you left quite a few comments under Monday's post, Courtship and Power (2020 February 17), which was Lexet's critique of an earlier article on Sigma Frame, Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (2018 October 3).

You've covered a lot of ground in all your comments, and it took me a while to see what you're really getting at. Just to let you know I haven't forgotten about you, I wrote this post to cover some of the issues you brought up.

Here, I cited several of your comments, which are followed by my views on the matter.

On the Male Social-Sexual Hierarchy

> "So, a beta, or cuck, or chump, or simp who is married… is alpha because he is leading his life? He works hard at his job, initiative, leads his life… or is still a cuck because he doesn't agree with Dalrock, or DS, or others… but takes responsibility, works hard, and has initiative…
>
> What I am seeing more and more… in Red Pill, in MGTOW, in the general "help" for men is this:
>
> Being an Alpha is pretty much strictly now a "genetic" thing. You were born a certain way, or have a certain temperament, and now you are deemed "alpha".
>
> The rest need to study, hair-split words, spend a vast amount of free time reading medieval literature to find out how much of a cuck they are… study, study, study… and then be told "Umm, no… alpha also means this"."
>
> "I just don't like people claiming a term that most could and will never attain and how goalposts move and shift like the mist. People claiming this or breaking other men down into scales like this just seems very unchristian to me."

Concerning the greek letter male hierarchy, I just see it as a generalized typological model. Each type represents a certain kind of attitude, a social strategy, and an area of expertise (and weakness). All men fit into every type in some aspect of their lives, while no man fits perfectly into only one type. If you're confused about which type you are, then you've missed the forest for all the trees. It's just an abstract model to describe behaviors.

Using myself as an example, I identify as a sigma because it describes my outlook, my values, and the general trend of my behaviors. It doesn't mean I've never ever behaved as an obsequious, supplicating beta, or a cynical, self-righteous gamma, or even a reclusive, nihilistic omega, because I have. Everyone has under certain circumstances at some point in their lives. But the value of having the hierarchy nomenclature is that these terms allow us to label these behaviors and talk about them in an easy-to-understand way.

Concerning the Biblical Legitimacy of the Ontological Power-Based Presumptions in the Study of Courtship Models

> "Did Jesus punch evil doers in the mouth? Did he brag about himself being a provider? He was trained or training to be a carpenter but he never once mentioned his provider status. He even told slaves to obey their masters… Did these men refuse to act?
>
> Scripture may clearly define masculinity… Have your yes mean yes, and your no mean no… But I don't recall > anywhere talking “power” and “courtship” or so many steps, models to follow, and when to implement them, or having marriage is being masculine.”

You’re right that (the word) power is not mentioned in the context of marriage anywhere in the Bible. This whole study of courtship models is an attempt to think outside the box and start from the ground up. It’s a fresh approach to the problem. Does that make it wrong or unbiblical? We’re yet to find out. In the meantime, we’ll be learning how things work and why God’s way is best.

Having a proper appreciation for Language Texts

> “Why have church if the translation boils down to is “well, you have to know Greek and Aramaic.” So is now being Alpha in the Christian sense, “he knows Greek and Aramaic”? So now anyone else is a beta, chump, cuck, simp for not knowing this? Will the ante be upped further? “Well, he can speak these languages… but what seminary, what university does he teach at, and who did he study under? Which texts did he translate?”
>
> “Why have the bible in English if every word is going to be hair-split, have dual meanings, and meanings that could be, or might be, or should be. This is like the former President Clinton lecturing us on what the word “is” means back in 1998.
>
> Why even worry, ponder or even debate what Jesus said, or Paul, or Moses, or what king said what to whom when we don’t know what they really meant… you know… because we don’t know Greek or Aramaic, and you should… and if you don’t? Well, “trust us” we know what he really meant. So why read the bible, study it… if everything is “Well, that’s up for debate, you don’t know Greek and don’t know what he really meant”
>
> If indeed Jesus’s message was for all, and its “very simple, easy to understand” most followers have made it into something that is a lifelong quest and you still may not know “what it means”. Face it, this faith is for the arrogant, the high intellect and self-righteous. They also spend more time now debating on how a few poets and writers made it into feminism back in 967 AD or whatever.”

Just how important is our mastery of ancient languages (i.e. Greek and Aramaic) when studying the Bible?

If you can learn something from it, then that’s great! But if it is confusing or frustrating to you, or if you know it’s never going to bring you closer to God, nor fulfill your purpose for living, then why break a sweat about it?

We come closer to God through opening our hearts to the truth of the Gospel, not by opening our minds to the Biblical exegeses of John MacArthur or William Lane Craig, et al. (although it does happen that way for some). Some people have the heart to learn more about God, and they share what they’ve learned with others. We can be thankful for that.

The same goes for any other advanced topic, like martensitic phase transformations in equiatomic alloys, thermal/intrinsic stress in thin films, or glissile dislocation generators that increase the entropy in hexagonal crystals. (These are my own areas of expertise, and no, I’m not GeekMOGing.) I don’t blog about these subjects because it’s unreasonable to expect anyone to know everything there is to know about any particular subject, or even take any interest in it.

This is essentially what Derek said when he wrote,

> “Scholars do the work of translation and analysis. In seminary the clergy learn language concepts, but otherwise utilize and rely on the material produced by scholars (including whole Bible translations). Nevertheless, large numbers of clergy delve into the original languages in preparation for their weekly sermons. Layman don’t generally have the interest and/or ability to do this, so they rely on the clergy to teach them.
>
> Just because someone has to do it doesn’t mean everyone does, but the output of their work is extremely > important. Nobody has to learn other languages. It is okay to be a follower."

The thing about being a follower is that you have to trust that the authority is telling you the truth of the matter. Much of the argument and debate surrounding the definitions of this greek word or that one, are really about whether we can trust that interpretation as being true. Even experts disagree and falter in trust. No one knows everything with 100% certainty.

I believe this is where you might be running into trouble – you're afraid to trust. There is a fear that either they might be wrong and lead you astray, or they might abuse your trust. I'm not saying this to ridicule or reject you, but rather to affirm your experience as authentic. I too struggle with trust as a result of childhood issues. But being aware of it is a huge step in overcoming it.

For example, although I may know a lot about one field of study, it's just not constructive for me to read those research papers about other things I know nothing about, and then criticize the authors for being deliberately confusing and arrogantly high-minded. I have to realize that deep down, the reason why I want to reject those authors/papers is because I can't trust (or even understand) what they're saying. Going further, I have to recognize that my inability to trust has no correlation to whether a matter might be true or not. The problem is with me. As I wrote in an earlier post, The Evils of Solipsism (2019 November 19),

> "I am foolish, therefore, objective truth exists."

I could very well be excluding myself from some information that would make my life better. But if I can't help myself by overcoming my inability to trust, then the next best thing I can do is to know when to put my fork down, and to not be ashamed of admitting my limitations. I can't assume to be the most noteworthy expert on every matter, and that's fine. That's just less work and responsibility for me!

So stick to whatever it is you do best. If you can't trust the source, and you don't know any better, then put it on the back burner for a while. If it is really, truly important in the grand scheme of things, you can be assured that God will continue to bring it up again (and again) in a different way, maybe one you can understand next time around.

Honest Discussion Requires a bit of Trust (Faith)

> "I encourage readers to leave comments that are insightful regarding the topic, or which might prove useful to other readers."
>
> Translation: Agree with my post / take on this"

You might be surprised to know that it doesn't really matter whether you agree or disagree. As far as this blog is concerned, agreement and disagreement are both educational. There are benefits either way. If you agree, then we might build trust. But if you disagree, and you could articulate exactly why you disagree, then you would be contributing some valuable insight to the topic. You also invite others to trust you.

The point of all this blogging and discussion is to hopefully learn some things in the process. I know I have, and I hope you have too.

So have you?

> "I read the article, your insights are brilliant. If only men just were Alpha, not beta everyone would be married. I was a loser and a chump and I read your advice, now I am an Alpha, and now I am going to be married to a top tier woman. Thanks! I am studying Greek right now so I can lead, teach and be a real mighty man of God who is doing his bidding: being Alpha, getting married to a woman who just wants men to be aggressive! Thank you so much. You should publish a book!"

Brother, I can see through you. The insincerity here is all too obvious.

I'm sorry Jason. If we haven't gained your trust, or if you can't believe anything we're saying, or buy into the discussion here, then what are we offering to you? What do you get out of reading and commenting?

We want to know what you think, but you're not telling us your honest opinion, and we feel disappointed that you won't share your mind with us.

Concluding Statements

Here and on other sites, you've said a lot about how lousy (the converged) church is, and how inconsiderate Churchians can be. Most of us can empathize with you about that. We've experienced much of the same. But we're not satisfied with the way things stand, nor will we be content with resigning ourselves to a fatalistic outlook. I hope you could agree on this point.

We know the church is converged. We know the current "Courtly Love" model of chivalry doesn't work. We know the current "Christian" methods of getting into a marriage are not all that different from the wider secular culture. Thus, it seems ridiculous that people should expect the results to be different just because they show up to a church service once a week and stick a Jesus label on it. There has to be more to the story. But what?

In the previous post, Is Biblical Courtship Possible? (2020 February 19), Ed Hurst pointed out a major ontological reason why courtship in the west is a sham. I think this is quite informative of where western culture stands in relation to both the world's historical norm and what facilitates God's blessings. Does that mean we need a revolution first in order to do God's will? No, it's just some insight that helps us understand where we are and what we're dealing with.

We invite others to join us in this discussion, including you, Jason!

What do you honestly think about all these new ideas about courtship models (or any other topic)? Of course, you're free to disagree, but please do all of us the favor of telling us why.

Best regards!

Your younger brother Jack

 Readers can see more of Jason at his blog, Top Face – The Aging Mod's Forgotten Story.*

Related

- Σ Frame: A Response to Stephanie's Comments (2017 December 19)

Trajectories

Jack · 28 February 2020 · Archived copy · Original

How does society determine what we learn and do in our lives? What are you aiming at? What are you learning through your experiences in life? What is it telling you about yourself? Are these lessons teaching you the truth? Are they leading you where you need to be?

Topic: This post covers both (1) learning trajectories, and (2) the resulting life trajectories.

Readership: This insight is specifically for younger men challenged with the task of finding/choosing a suitable spouse. It may also be of interest to married couples or those interested in marriage or LTR's.

Several comments from the previous discussions under the posts, A Response to Jason's Comments (2020 February 21), and Probabilities (2020 February 24), have been extracted and adapted below in an easy-to-read format.

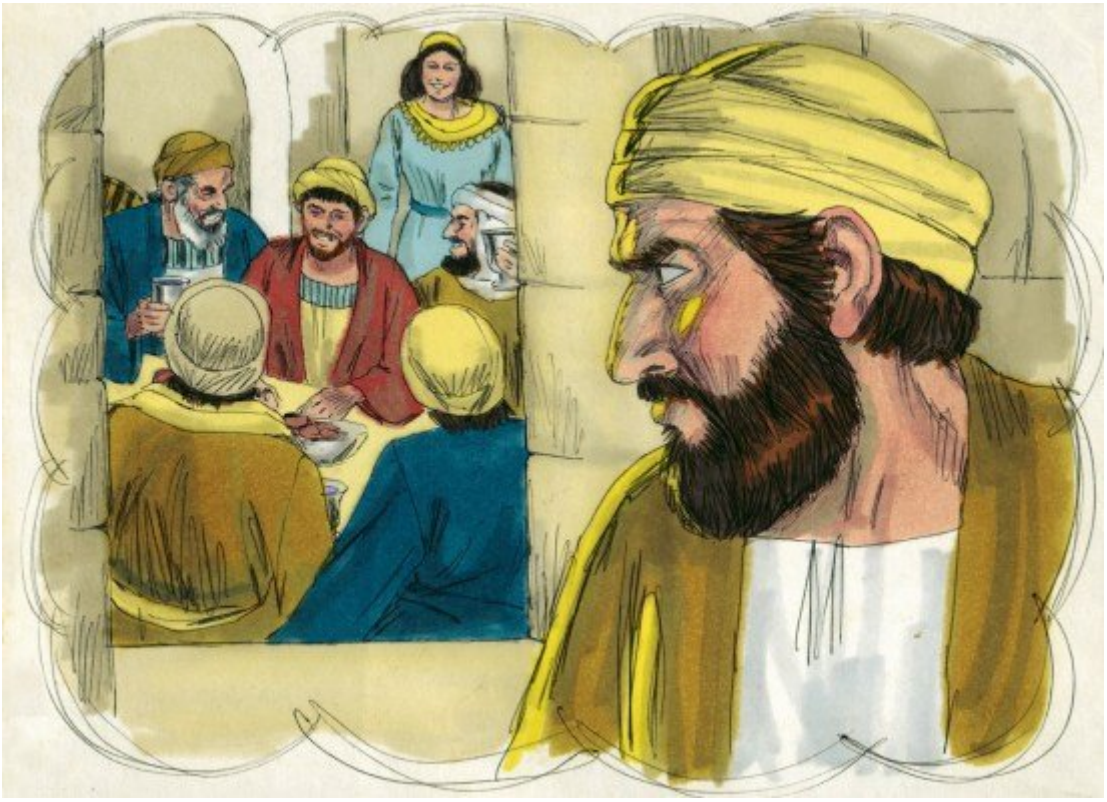
Introduction

Scott's post, Probabilities (2020 February 24) and Jack's addition in Opportunities (2020 February 26) have revealed two extremes of what men can learn (or not learn) through their life experiences (i.e. with women). Sharkly's catchy bon mot "Carpe Diem vs. Purity Culture" sums up the difference quite succinctly.

What we have here is basically a real life analogy of the story of the Prodigal Son (Luke 11:15-32) where Scott is the profligate younger brother in the story, and Jack is the legalistic, indignant, and bitter older brother.

In the tale of two brothers, it should be noted that neither brother really loved their Father. But what is important to the story is what the brothers learned through their experiences. In this parable, the younger brother eventually came to appreciate the abundant love and grace of the father. The older brother was forced to recognize his own desires, wants and needs, forgive his brother by taking responsibility for his shortcomings (via a reduced inheritance), and accept the father's mercy with humility.

But as for men these days, whether they be younger brothers or elder brothers according to the archetype, are they really learning those things which would restore their relationship with the father (God)?



Learning through Feedback Loops

Scott is a man who has always received a steady stream of positive Indicators of Interest (IOI's) from women.

Scott: What those experiences did for me is created what sociologists (and red-pill guys have latched onto) call an abundance mentality. It never occurred to me to go looking because I just knew that something would land in my lap. I just had to go about the business of whatever I was doing in the meantime.

What I mean is, feedback loops are real. You get good reviews in the form of IOIs right out the puberty gate and they build on themselves to the point where you just expect more of the same.

Sharkly: It seems like Scott is saying that being approved of and validated by women leads a young man to have greater confidence in dealing with women, and that this is a positive thing that Scott is equating to a step in social development or a step towards maturity.

Jack: Comprehensively, [Scott's talk in the video] does make that assertion, and I believe it's true. The process of maturing requires a social interaction with real-time choices, and it yields results or consequences that provide feedback. Maturity (or growth) happens when one proactively engages in a spirit of trust, develops discernment, increases in self-awareness, and learns through the process. Because of the learning curve, it's better if this happens at a young age.

Jack: These experiences offer a man opportunities to learn how to interact with the opposite sex. The learning takes time. Making mistakes and missteps is a normal and unavoidable part of the process. Men need to have learned these things before they can be ready for marriage.

People can learn even though they are unaware of the process. In fact, too much cognitive analysis of the process may make one too self-conscious, and lead to doubt and distrust, which manifests as a lack of confidence. This only slows down the learning process.

Jack: [However,] not all men have the opportunity to learn valid truth through the process. Instead, some men learn to supplicate and placate women, instead of leading, managing, and caring for them.

Sharkly: I think I also see some poor men who don't supplicate, but yet are torn. They recognize that women are God's gift to men, and they'd love a gift from God. But God didn't give them good looks or charisma, and women are flat evil to them, disrespecting and disparaging them, they find women to be selfish and uncaring, and downright rude. Even "good Christian women" go out of their way to make sure these men know they have absolutely no chance, because, "they wouldn't want to be cruel and lead them on". These men aren't necessarily kissing women's asses, they're mad at women for failing to be the gift they should be, and mad at men who can't understand their plight, and mad at God for their whole ordeal.

Jack: For the past few decades, men have been learning all the wrong things, especially when it comes to dealing with women and how to select a wife. The circumstances of their lives aren't teaching them the truth about God. Instead, men are learning either one of two things: (1) that women and low SMV men are consumable commodities to be expended on one's own amusement and pleasure, or (2) that they have to suck up to women in the vain hope of ever making any progress towards having sex, getting married, and forming a family.

On this latter point, Sharkly wrote: I think both men and women naturally cringe when a man relates subserviently towards women, like they are the palace eunuch and their job is to serve the women of the palace. I think we know by nature that is disordered. But Feminism has tried to do a lot to tell us that this unnatural arrangement is preferable, when it is not.

It is better for men to have confidence when relating to women, as one aware of his own God given superiority and general dominion over womankind, and specific God anointed lordship over his wife.

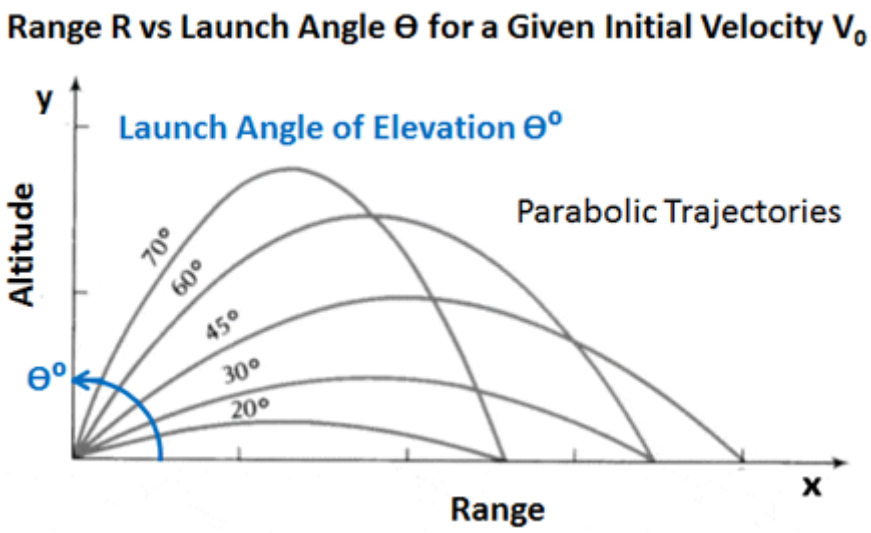
I can also see how that for the 10-20% of men whom women will, seemingly as a herd, validate, that it is far easier to then relate confidently towards them. And that for those at the back of the line, it will be much harder to relate confidently, “like the prize”, towards women, in the face of constant rejection.

I however question whether those men who, through female validation, correctly relate as superior to women, are actually more mature or developed, themselves not knowing why they are superior, but chalking it up perhaps to good looks, height, or money, etc.

In essence they are mimicking the right behavior, confidence in their superiority, solely as a result of females having selected them and conditioned them to be confident. Yes, their behavior is closer to what it should be, but that is the result of external conditioning, not some greater maturity that they now possess. And by the same token, those hurting and humiliated men at the back of the line may be quick to react angrily to insinuations that their lack of female validation, and lack of the resulting confidence with others, is evidence of some immaturity or refusal to grow up on their part.

While men should relate to women as being under our care and dominion, I think men should relate to each other as follows:

> “Love one another with brotherly affection. Outdo one another in showing honor.” ~ Romans 12:10 (ESV)



The Trajectory of the Learning Curve

Ed Hurst: A signal element of Christian maturity is knowing the boundaries God sets for you (your domain). That includes knowing that you'll never please some people, even some very good servants of God. It also means you know your mission and leave to others things that He hasn't called you to investigate. I'm really glad you made the point, Jack, that no one of us can perfectly match any of the hierarchical definitions, and that we all revert to something less than God intended for us at times.

Jack: Without first coming to terms with himself, a man is clueless about what he can reasonably expect of a wife and a marriage. Without a mission in life and a clear purpose for living, a man is sailing through life on a random trajectory.

Ed Hurst: On the one hand, there are lots of HOWTOs out there on improving your social charisma. There's a lot of good teaching on what works with women. And I can assure you that it the teaching and training is a whole lot better one-on-one; generalities only go so far. However, you also have to realize that charisma [or Game] is like IQ in one way: You can maximize your personal potential, but you will eventually run up against limits. It's more than mere DNA; it's the wider context of your life and all the wounds you've received and how you responded, etc. God has plans for you, and despite what men might do ignoring Him, nothing in life will bring you more peace than committing yourself to discovering what God considers your best interest.

Jack: [Ed's] sentence in bold is referring to what all a man has learned through his experiences in life (among other things), and how much he has matured in the process.

Jack: I took a big hit in terms of growing and learning when I chose to cling to a legalistic approach by being too finicky about women. At the time, I had the idea that I was loving God by resisting the temptation of getting involved with certain women, with the notion that I was holding out for "God's best" for my life. But I didn't know myself very well (I never thought this mattered), I didn't know God very well (although I thought I did), and I didn't understand how life is a process of learning and growing such that I might achieve what God considers to be my best interest. This might be the male equivalent of how women refuse men who would make good husbands, but who don't measure up to their various expectations.

The Trajectory of the Life Curve

Western culture has created a Socio-Sexual/Marriage Market which is extremely K-selective, favoring top dog males who pillage all the women and undercut all the other men. Lower ranking men are preconditioned to be subservient to both alpha cads and women, resulting in soy boys and white knights, respectively. Overall, this teaches men that it's better to be a cad than a dad. In addition, western culture is extremely gynocentric, favoring the Feminine Imperative in the selection of these top dogs. This social condition is not a proverbial Red Pill "rabbit hole", but rather a she-wolf den of thieves.

Deti: [In the west,] it is really all about this for male-female relationships.

- It is all about how sexually attracted she is to you at the very start of the relationship. This one fact will determine the success or failure of the relationship. Our entire society and the laws governing interpersonal relationships have been geared toward ensuring that the woman's sexual attraction is absolutely paramount in determining her motivation to have sex and continue having sex.
- It wasn't always like this. Before, interpersonal relationships were governed by give and take, with each person giving something to get something. Now, it is all based on the woman's feelings.
- You must, MUST, find a woman who was very sexually attracted to you from the very beginning. You ABSOLUTELY MUST hold out for this. DO NOT get into any relationship with any woman where this is not present.
- If that sexual attraction was not there from the very first interactions, it will never be there, she will never feel it, and you will never be able to generate it.

This is important, and painful for most men to realize, but you need to read it:

Most men will never have the kind of marriage Scott has to Mychael. Most men will never see their wives demonstrate that level of hard, visceral, sexual attraction for them. Because most men do not inspire that kind of sexual attraction in most women. Most men are not attractive enough to inspire it.

Jack: Scott's message [in his post Probabilities] was to underscore the quality of the emotional dynamic as a crucial factor in determining the strength of bonding (in a marriage). That means, even a low SMV man could find a low(er) SMV woman that would go crazy for him, and who would pose a viable opportunity for a marriage.

Deti: It's time we all admitted this. It's time we all faced the facts. It's time we just acknowledge that the only way a marriage can get a man what he wants in 21st century America is to find a woman who is head over heels for him, so viscerally sexually attracted to him she can't see straight, wants to f&/2k him so badly she starts ripping his clothes off of him whenever she sees him. And it's time we admitted that most men just don't inspire those kinds of feelings in most women.

It's time we admitted that most men and most women are not getting what they want from their relationships with each other. Most men can't meet most women's wants/needs today. And most women don't want to even try to meet their men's wants/needs today. And why should women try? All of society encourages them NOT to.

It's just not working now. It just isn't. It's time we admitted that.

Conclusions

The western Socio-Sexual/Marriage Marketplace (SS/MMP) is a terribly destructive school of hard knocks and should be revoked of it's license. It's wrong because…

- It spoils women at a young age by teaching them to be promiscuous, proud, and entitled.
- It teaches high SMV men that they are entitled to lawless profligacy.
- It teaches low SMV men that they're utterly worthless.
- It doesn't allow men to learn those things which would coax them to become better men.
- It doesn't allow successful courtship to take place.
- It postpones marriage until past prime, thereby despoiling it.

Consequently, aiming for a good marriage (however you define it) is like shooting across rugged terrain with an erratic wind speed at a distant moving target, and with the sun in your eyes! Meanwhile, you're receiving heavy incoming fire from the enemy.

Delta Bravo, adjust your sights to account for the wind speed and the terrain.

Don't be like Jack (the older brother), who aimed too high, nor like Scott (the younger brother), who aimed too low. In terms of physics, the maximum trajectory is achieved at a 45° angle (somewhere in between Jack and Scott) with a high initial velocity (learning more while young, and getting married earlier in life).

Derek's example (a high-school courtship within a conservative community and getting married early in life) might be presented as an ideal model. But under the present conditions faced by the majority of men, secure cooperative marriages like Derek's are too rare to be counted on, save the force of divine or patrimonial intervention.

Within the context of the current sexual/marriage marketplace in the West, Scott and Deti's assessment is what determines the initial trajectory of the learning curve. That is, if a man wants a wife who supports his mission in life, he has to find/choose one who is "all in" from the beginning, including sexually, and who wants the man so badly that she eagerly follows him and willingly submits to him.

Until this ontology changes, young men who hope to ever have a lively marriage have to come to grips with this situation.

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: The extent of attraction (2020 February 27)

Sexual Compatibility is dependent on Sanctification

Jack · 2 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Sanctification is the ultimate compatibility.

Readership: All; Single Christian men;

During the discussion last week, several tangent subjects emerged that are related to sanctification. The one I'll cover in this post is about sexual compatibility. Related comments from other readers have been adapted below in an easy-to-read format.

Caterpillar asked a question about how a sexually inexperienced person is supposed to ascertain whether a particular potential partner will be sexually compatible or not. This is something that is a grave concern of high priority to randy young Christian men who are holding out for marriage, but interestingly, this is not as important to God as it is to young horndogs. What is important to God is a person's sanctification, among other things. But that doesn't mean that sexual compatibility has to remain a worrisome contemplation. It is my hope that this post will put the matter to rest.

Derek: My suggestion to men like caterpillar345 is to master the sexual urges. Mastery is a masculine virtue that will serve well. Whatever you do, don't take her for a 'test drive' to determine sexual compatibility. Men with a 'dirt bag sexual past' or those who have already married know how sexual compatibility works, but this actually a liability.

Caterpillar: I'm probably overthinking it but I just fail to understand how I'm going to end up with any semblance of a fulfilling physical relationship by me and a hypothetical potential wife going from none to anything goes after saying "I do". But I suppose it will just happen naturally or it will just happen because I've done what God said and stayed chaste until marriage or something…

So again, the question I keep asking is something like "How do I, coming from a rather traditional, "hands-off, no touching" approach to relationships (and presumably intending to marry a similar woman) understand whether we will be sexually compatible for the rest of my / our life?" Perhaps there is no good / straightforward / universal answer. As I have a tendency to do, I'm probably looking for an "equation" that I can solve and get "the answer". One way to look at it is that the process of discovery along the way is what makes life interesting. But another way to look at it is that I'd like to seek the advice of men with more experience than me so that I might make fewer mistakes.

Derek: It was scary [for me] to marry without knowing what our 'sexual compatibility' was. We had read some books on sex, but nothing prepares you for the reality. For a while, even after marriage, I wished I had known the answer to your question. I was wrong.

I've been married now for a long time and I know all about sexual compatibility. Had I taken her for a test drive—as statistics show—I would have had a substantially higher risk of marital sexual dissatisfaction, divorce, or one of us might have decided not to marry! [See Derek's original comment for more details about why these things are so.]

Jack: Derek is right about the test drive argument. It is an excuse based on the augmentation of doubt. If you're both fresh virgins, then you create your own sexual compatibility.

Since then, Sharkly wrote a post, Laughing at Feminism: Virgin Imprinting (2020-3-1) in which he describes the spiritual experience of sanctification.

> "I just gradually came to notice that I now strongly preferred everything to look exactly like how [my wife] looked. I now strongly prefer my wife's size of nipples, the size and color of her areolas, the size and shape of her breasts. I also strongly prefer the size, shape, color, and texture of her pussy lips. I'm sorry, but I just do now. Apparently [she imprinted me] sexually, and she is now what I just strongly prefer."

Sanctification is when you identify with one person and her body, mannerisms, tics, and other characteristics, and you simply don't want anyone else. You just can't relate as strongly to anything any different.

Sanctification is what makes it possible for a married couple to remain faithful to each other throughout their lives.

Wife Goggles™ are a thing because of sanctification.

Parental affection is a manifestation of sanctification.

Sanctification is the ultimate compatibility.

One of the negative consequences of sexual promiscuity (including the Test Drive™) is that it reduces one's capability of achieving a consummate sanctification with any one person.

But for those who enter into marriage in a sexually pure state, sexual compatibility is a non-issue because sanctification is yet to occur.

For those who are seeking a sexual partner after having many other partners, however, sexual compatibility involves finding someone who matches the imprinting received by the most charismatic and memorable previous partners. The sad fact remains that no one can completely fill the shoes of another lover who made the first imprint in the context of an innocent, romantic, youthful fling. This sanctification cum defilement is the origin of the Alpha Widow™ syndrome.

In conclusion, it should be clear to the reader by now that the best way to achieve sexual compatibility in marriage is to retain one's sexual purity before and after marriage. Purity is all about the completeness of one's sanctification.

Related

- Cornerstone: Sexual Compatibility (2020 March 4)

The Alpha Widow Syndrome – A Manospherian Allegory of Defilement

Jack · 4 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The concept of an Alpha Widow from a Christian Red Pill perspective.

Readership: All
Length: 1,200 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes + 15:50 minute video

A Description of the Sanctified Marriage

Sanctification could be defined in many ways according to different perspectives. But from a subjective viewpoint, sanctification is the heart knowledge that God, and only God, can satisfy the longing in one's soul. Without this hard-won knowledge of one's self, or rather, being known by God, one will cling in silent, desperate hope to the idol of one's fancy, often unawares.

In the context of a marriage, sanctification is the heart knowledge that one's spouse, and only one's spouse, can satisfy one's longing for sex, romance, and intimacy.

In the case of an ideal marriage between two sexually pure virgins, the soul imprinting that is concomitant with sanctification occurs spontaneously, because neither person has ever had any comparable sexual experience in the past. These sexual and romantic experiences between husband and wife affect their state of mind and emotional disposition, creating subjective biases in favor of one's spouse. The person gains intense natural affections and certain emotional predilections towards one's spouse. It is even possible to transform one's value system, beliefs, and even one's personality in the process of achieving sanctification. All these effects serve to reinforce the marital bonding.

Thus, the passions and joys of the sexual union within the marriage naturally take precedence in the heart, mind, and soul of the person, thereby excluding any potential sexual encounter with another person. In fact, as sanctification sets in, other sexual opportunities appear less appealing than one's spouse.

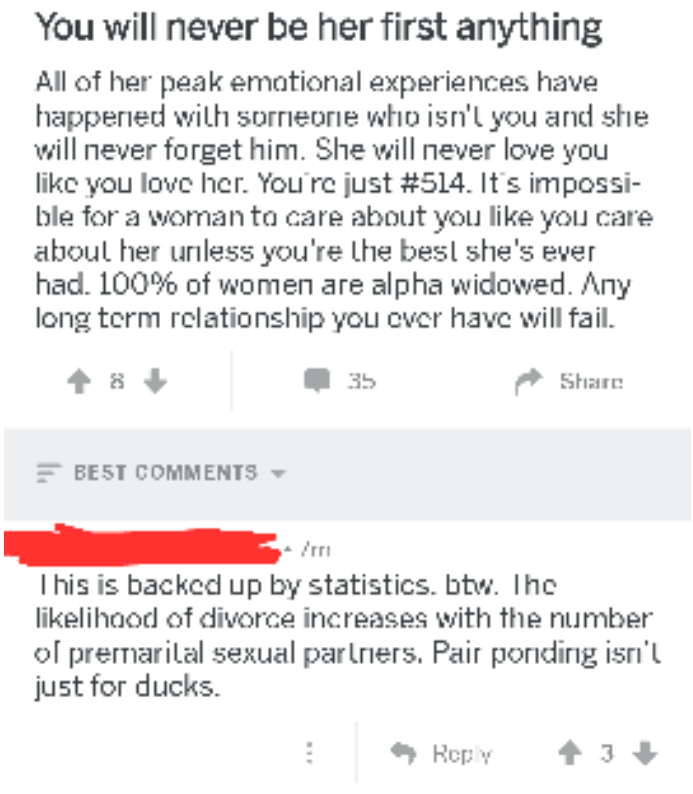
The end effect is that the sanctified marriage relies on the power of God to remain in a continual state of humility, love, trust, and fulfillment.



A Description of the Unsanctified Marriage

A marriage that is not sanctified is characterized by one or both spouses who cling in silent, desperate hope to the romantic or sexual idol of one's fancy. This idol could be either a real person, or an ideal fantasy, e.g. pornography (for men), romance novels (for women), the Sinful Savior, or the Soul Mate.

In the case of the Alpha Widow syndrome, the idol is a real man with whom the woman shared an exceptionally powerful sexual or romantic relationship in the past, and the memories and feelings of those moments are forever imprinted on her heart, which is the natural result of sexual union as described in the first section.

In other words, Alpha Widowhood is a state of frustrated marital Sanctification, which eventually morphs into an alternate state of Defilement. The extemporaneous sanctification that began with the heart-pounding, mind-numbing, soul gripping, cherry-popping, F%#king by Chad Thunderc@ck cannot be fulfilled nor concluded through a proper life-long marriage, and this partial sanctification renders her defiled — not only in the eyes of any other man seeking union, but also within the sustenance of her own heart as the guilt and shame sets in.

As Vox writes in Alpha Game: Ghosts of the Alpha Widow (September 8, 2014),

> "The simple and observable fact is that sexually experienced women find it harder to bond to their husbands and to live up to their marital commitments. This doesn't mean it is impossible for them to do either, only that it is a material challenge that has to be recognized and surmounted by both parties, particularly the wife."

The reason for this is because as a woman's N count goes up, the chances of becoming Alpha Widowed rise to the inevitable.

What Vox fails to mention is that the Alpha Widow syndrome is a pertinent allegory of defilement within a socio-sexual context.

As I wrote earlier in, What does it mean to be Defiled? (9 December 2018),

> "Similar to being unclean, defilement also includes the spiritual aspect – that is, certain experiences affect one's state of mind, and emotional disposition, such that one becomes unfit or unable to have certain other experiences in life, including personal and spiritual maturation.
>
> In other words, a person who is defiled cannot think objectively, and they have developed subjective biases. They possess certain emotional predilections and peculiar affections. The end effect is being more psychotic and less real, more emotional and less rational, more given over to sentiments and less so to education. Essentially, more feeelz, less faith.
>
> God calls this state spiritual defilement.
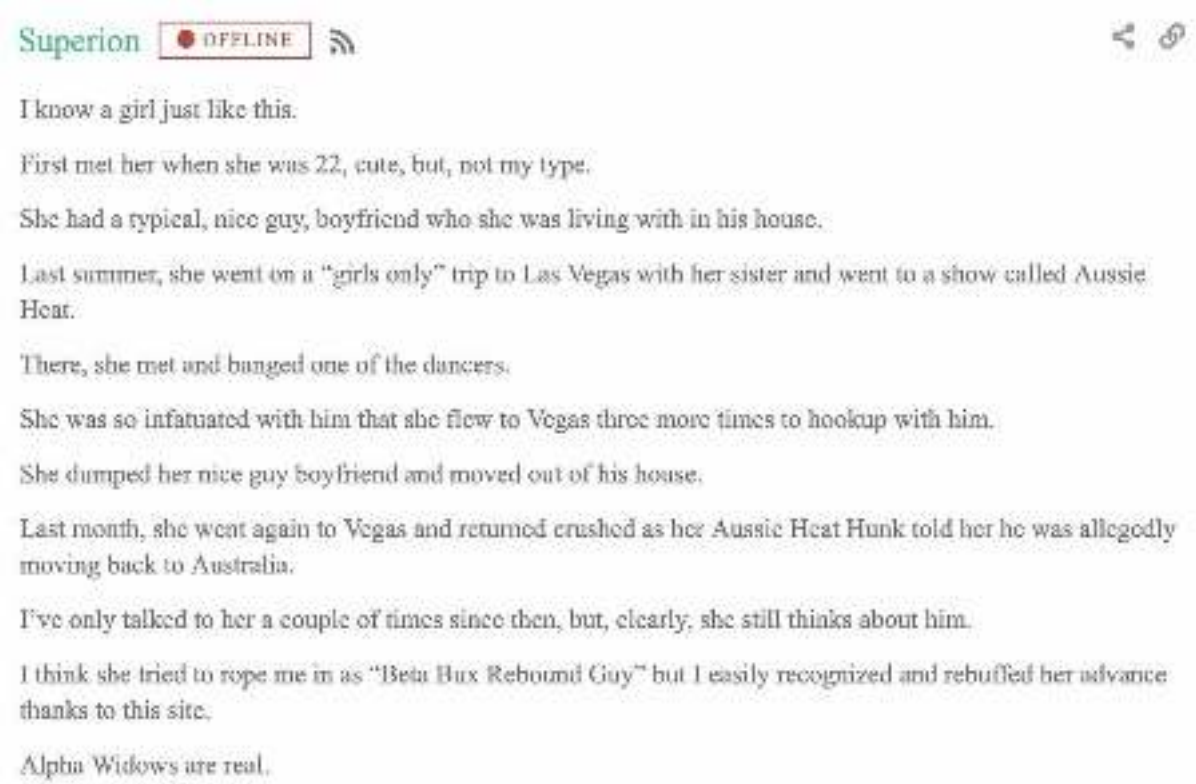
>
> Furthermore, I have personally heard true stories amounting to the fact that certain sexual experiences can transform one's value system, beliefs, and even one's personality!
>
> Now we add to this understanding, the fact that Defilement is rather permanent."

So… once Chad puts his fork in the pie, there is no going back.



Superion OFFLINE

I know a girl just like this.

First met her when she was 22, cute, but, not my type.

She had a typical, nice guy, boyfriend who she was living with in his house.

Last summer, she went on a "girls only" trip to Las Vegas with her sister and went to a show called Aussie Heat.

There, she met and banged one of the dancers.

She was so infatuated with him that she flew to Vegas three more times to hookup with him.

She dumped her nice guy boyfriend and moved out of his house.

Last month, she went again to Vegas and returned crushed as her Aussie Heat Hunk told her he was allegedly moving back to Australia.

I've only talked to her a couple of times since then, but, clearly, she still thinks about him.

I think she tried to rope me in as "Beta Bux Rebound Guy" but I easily recognized and rebuffed her advance thanks to this site.

Alpha Widows are real.

The Five Minute Rule

If the permanency of defilement isn't sobering enough, it will shiver your quiver to know how surprisingly quickly it can happen. For any one of a woman's man-toys, it doesn't take more than five minutes for defilement to set in!

The Five Minute Rule refers to the length of the robust process leading to the Alpha Widow state of defilement. (For a more complete description of the Five Minute Rule, click on the links to Chateau and Spawny's below.) Why not a Five Day Rule, or a Five Week Rule? It's because five minutes is all it takes to lodge a memory, conceive a child, form a soul tie, or possibly even create a blood covenant relationship through a sexual union.

If she chose a sex starved Beta, it might even be a One Minute Rule, except that a Beta would not imprint his memory on her heart as much as an Alpha who lasted a little longer.

Seriously, this is why St. Paul sternly warned us to avoid sexual immorality.

> [13] "Food is meant for the stomach and the stomach for food"—and God will destroy both one and the other. The body is not meant for sexual immorality, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body. [14] And God raised the Lord and will also raise us up by his power. [15] Do you not know that your bodies are members of Christ? Shall I then take the members of Christ and make them members of a prostitute? Never! [16] Or do you not know that he who is joined to a prostitute becomes one body with her? For, as it is written, "The two will become one flesh." [17] But he who is joined to the Lord becomes one spirit with him. [18] Flee from sexual immorality. Every other sin a person commits is outside the body, but the sexually immoral person sins against his own body. [19] Or do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, whom you have from God? You are not your own, [20] for you were bought with a price. So glorify God in your body." ~ 1st Corinthians 6:13-20 (ESV)

Concluding Statements

The Alpha Widow syndrome, as it is called in the Manosphere, is a pertinent allegory of defilement within a socio-sexual context.

Unfortunately, real life examples of Alpha Widow defilement are ubiquitous. Only a cursory overview of the Manosphere will reveal how a woman's c@ck count destroys marital bonding and contentment, even years after the deeds are done.

And… that's after she may have had thousands of hot showers! (See Leviticus 15:16-24.)

Related

For those readers who may be unfamiliar with what an Alpha Widow is, some descriptions appear in the following posts.

- The Rational Male: Blueprint For An Alpha Widow (2012-8-16)
- Chateau Heartiste: Five Minutes Of Alpha Syndrome (2014-10-18)
- Spawny's Space: The Red Pill Classroom — Five Minute Rule / Alpha Widow (2015-1-31)
- The Rational Male: Widows & Warbrides (2018-10-30)
- The Rational Male: Alpha Widows (2019-7-31)

In addition to this, there are two parables circulating the RP sphere which may offer succinct insights. Some of my readers will be familiar with these stories.

- The Parable of the Pie is an anecdotal comparison between sanctification and defilement.
- The Parable of the Sticky-Tape is another analogy that describes Alpha enwidowment as an example of defilement.

No Authority to give "Consent"

Jack · 6 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The feminist argument for "consent" is a fallacy. Women don't have the moral authority to give consent to illicit sex.

Readership: Men; Christians; Anyone interested;

Introduction

Under the post, Opportunities (2020-2-26), Sharkly wrote,

> "…the new paradigm is that romantic love sanctifies marriage…"
> "Keep up. That was a few years back. Now it is "consent" that sanctifies sex, not romance or marriage."

Yes, readers have probably noticed that the importance of having a woman's "consent" in order to bed her is the latest battleground of feminist philosophy. The weakness (or strength, from the feminist view) of the "consent" argument, in this case, is determined by how the woman feeelz about the experience, which is a completely subjective assessment. Not least of all, these feeelz might change at any moment, even years after the deed is done.

Sharkly lividly described several token dynamics as follows,

> "Since "consent" is now what sanctifies sex, if a girl wants to "revenge f@ck" some friend or relative to get back at her ex, or f@ck the old scabby guy who owns the mega yacht so that she will be invited on his next lavish cruise, or indulge a short fat scabby movie producer's perversity … it's all cool … until she later claims her consent was coerced.
> That's where Christian husbands run afoul of the c@nt worshipping churches. If you try to coerce your wife to provide the sex she vowed with guilt or Bible verses or bribes or negative reinforcement, the synagogue of Satan will drop on you like a ton of bricks, because a woman's consent is sacred, and not to be toyed with and manipulated by mere men. If she consents to f@ck other dudes, because of your abusive desire for sex, the church will console her and offer her their victim's services. Women really can't sin anymore. Romance not required. Furthermore, if you get mad about it, that then proves your guilt. Because no goddess should have to live with anything but unconditional acceptance of her most wicked behavior. The church has full time staff just hired to make up excuses for defrauding wives. They've got a whole list of ready-made $ħit they'll throw at you without even knowing who your wife is. It obviously can't be her fault, because – Vagina!"

As a result, many men are so afraid of a PoundMeToo accusation, that they are avoiding many opportunities to have sex at all. They're afraid that some s1ut they met at a party and had a ONS with will come back to hit them with a lawsuit ten years down the road.

Likewise, and with additional thanks to the Duluth model, many husbands are left biting their knuckles in fear of little more than having the honest expectation that their wives might actually fulfill their wedding vows, "to have and to hold".

Is the argument of Consent truly a legitimate one?

As we have seen with the pound-me-too movement, young women, and even many older women, don't have enough moral agency to take responsibility for their decisions regarding sex. The result of the current socio-sexual ontology regarding this consent thing has become a debacle of epic proportions.

The truth is that women, especially younger women, lack the wisdom, experience, and self-control necessary to make good decisions regarding the use of their bodies for sexual intercourse and procreation. The me-too socioclasm and the resulting moral fallout are proving this to be true.

The way that most cultures around the world deal with this problem is through the implementation of laws regarding the age of consent.

World Population Review has a list of the Age Of Consent By Country 2020. The age of consent ranges from as low as 11 in Nigeria, to 21 in Bahrain. For the majority of countries, the age of consent is between 16 to 18.

Additionally, a number of countries in Asia and Africa require individuals to be married before they can legally have sex. Extramarital sex is illegal in many Muslim countries, which are known to be highly conservative regarding sexuality. These countries include Pakistan, Afghanistan, Egypt, Iran, Kuwait, Libya, Maldives, Mauritania, Morocco, Oman, United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, and Yemen. Since sexual activity is illegal until marriage, there is no age of consent.

In western countries as of late, additional laws regarding other issues of consent are being proposed or introduced.

Who has the authority to give consent?

These laws implicitly assume that it is the young woman who has the authority and good discretion to give consent. But because of the combination of young womens' sexual excitability combined with their inherent lack of moral agency, this assumption just isn't true to reality.

According to the Bible. It is the young woman's father who has the authority to give consent – NOT the young woman. And not the state either, by way of those "age of consent" laws.

"Age of consent" laws and other "consent" regulations are only necessary when the father is either dead, or he doesn't have the authority to give consent. But once implemented, consent laws actually usurp the fathers' authority to give consent. Now, young women can debauch themselves to their heart's content, and the father has no binding say in the matter. The law and the state has replaced the father in this aspect. A husband's opinion matters even less.

Conclusions

For those who wish to obtain God's blessings in life (i.e. Christians), they shouldn't be giving "consent" to anyone but their lawfully wedded spouse!

The feminist argument for "consent" is a fallacy. Women don't have the moral authority to give consent to illicit sex.

In the end, consent laws, as they stand, are just another symptom of modern society's disrespecting and rebelling against the father's God-granted authority. If the laws were changed to reflect the fathers' authority over their daughters' fecundity, this would be a step for our nation to move closer to God. Of course, this would also place more responsibility on fathers as well, which is something to which modern men and churchian men have an aversion.

References

- World Population Review: Age of Consent by Country 2020
- World Population Review: Divorce Rates by Country 2020

Related

- The Red Quest: Chicks declaim responsibility (2018-7-19)
- Dalrock: Hoes mad. (2019-8-7)
- The Red Quest: "Why 16? Who do age of consent laws really protect" A dangerous story, too (2019-11-10)
- The Red Quest: Women don't think that women can make adult decisions and be held accountable for those decisions (2020-1-20)

Sexual Consent in Marriage

Jack · 9 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The current concept of "consent" is bass ackward. A Christian wife needs her husband's consent to either refuse sex or "let herself go".

Readership: Christians; Married couples;
Length: 1,900 words; 8 minutes reading time;
Author's note: I doubt many women will read the good advice offered below, much less follow it, but it's still valuable in helping men find the words to implement their demands.
Guide to interpreting the illustrations: The horse represents male desire. The cart represents marriage.

The Popularity of Scriptural Errancy

Under the post, Opportunities (2020-2-26), Sharkly pointed out that under the new paradigm, the thing that determines whether any particular sexual transaction is socially acceptable is the necessity of a woman's "consent" to the act.

For those of us who have followed Dalrock, it should be apparent that this feminist argument for "consent" is nothing more than another reiteration of Chivalry, and one that relies on an inversion of gender roles.

In a previous post, No Authority to give "Consent" (2020-3-6), I pointed out the errancy of the feminist argument for "consent". A single woman doesn't have the moral authority to give consent to illicit sex, and a married woman doesn't have the moral authority to refuse sex with her husband. This should be clear to mature Christians, but apparently it is not. The errancy of the "consent" arguments have even leeched into converged church teachings on marriage. Oscar pointed out an example of this error under Dalrock's post, Fifty shades of Lancelot. (2019 January 4),

> "Consider the fact that a woman has every right to expect that her husband will earn access to the marriage bed…" ~ Mohler
>
> Note that Mohler considers this a fact. It's not Mohler's opinion; it's a fact. But Apostle Paul wrote otherwise.
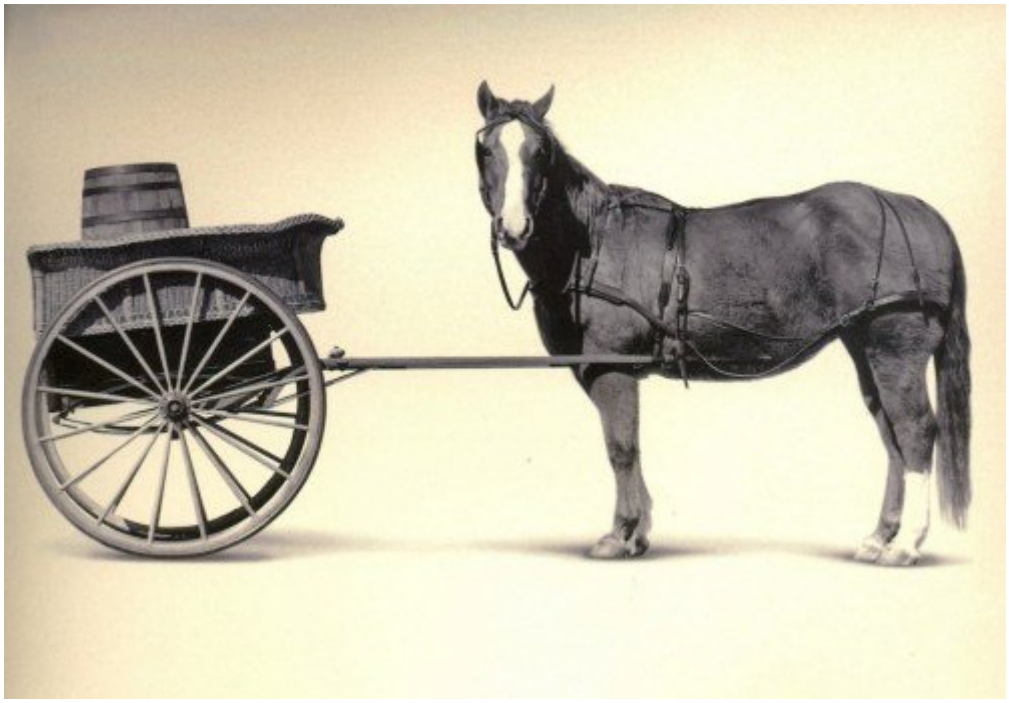
>
> "[3] Let the husband render to his wife the affection due her, and likewise also the wife to her husband. [4] The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does. And likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does. [5] Do not deprive one another except with consent for a time, that you may give yourselves to fasting and prayer; and come together again so that Satan does not tempt you because of your lack of self-control." ~ 1st Corinthians 7:3-5 (NKJV)

Oscar couldn't have made it any clearer. The Bible says a married couple should give mutual consent to NOT have sex with each other! But instead, the heretical choich has joined hands with the secular norms of the culture, by requiring men to obtain the wife's consent to have sex.

It seems like, whatever the Bible tells us to do, the powers that be will reverse-engineer that, and make up some humanitarian reason for doing so. See Figure 1: Putting the cart before the horse.

Evidently, churchianity is no different from the wider culture, as they both have it all balls awkward.

Ahhh… Churchianity at its best!



Error 1: Putting the cart before the horse.

The Cursed Fruits of Disobedience

The underlying message to husbands and wives contained in the last part of verse 5 of the scriptural passage above is that if either one refuses to have sex with their spouse, they are inadvertently subjecting the other to temptation.

All too frequently, it is the woman who is denying her husband, so we'll focus on this case for the remainder of the discussion.

Several commenters (Bruce, Deti, JFP, Sharkly) have pointed out that young men get married for sex (and having children). This is an undeniable fact. It may not be polite or acceptable, it may not be the right motivation to marry, but this is the reality.

Consequently, the quality and quantity of sex becomes the critical, make-it-or-break-it constituent element of the marriage. It is easy to see how a man who willingly signed up for marriage (with this purpose in mind) would be willing to tolerate a super-voluminous quantity of trouble and expense in a marriage, as long as his need for sex is being fulfilled. But if the sex is not spontaneously forthcoming, then this leads the man to question his whole purpose for marrying, as well as the value of the marriage.

If the dry spell continues indefinitely, the sexual tension and the urgency for a release continues to build in the man. The lack of sex alienates him from his wife, while his building sexual desire causes other women in his vicinity to look more appealing. In sum, his threshold of temptation is reduced. This condition essentially puts the husband between a stony heart (1) and a hard on (2), as described here.

1. If he can manage to resist temptation, he still has to exert excessive willpower to combat temptation outside the home, while living with the intense frustration of living and sleeping in the same bed with a woman who promised to love him, but then who denies him sexual access. This situation invariably subjects the husband to a great deal of frustration, anger and bitterness, possibly leading to excessive violence, substance dependency, clinical depression, or desertion. See Figure 2: Pulling the horse in the cart.
2. If he succumbs to the temptation to have extramarital sex, then the husband is desperately attempting to put the cart behind the horse, but within the wrong context. As a result, his marriage will be damaged. To make things worse, his failures will be aggrandized by the heartless wife, and subsequently capitalized upon in the divorce proceedings. See Figure 3: Spilling the load.

To take this a step further, whenever wives become lazy and "let themselves go" (i.e. cut their hair "because it's too much work to maintain", gain weight "because I feel hangry", wear cotton "because it's more comfy", etc.) to the point where they are no longer sexually desirable to their husbands, they are also subjecting their husband to just as much temptation and angst as if they outrightly denied him sex. This is especially true if they married too late in her life for him to have obtained a strong pair of Wife Goggles™.

Error 2: Pulling the horse in the cart.

The Blessed Fruits of Obedience

Most men are willing to extend their good will to a faithful wife who is not up for sex every day. But wives have used the euphemism, "Sorry, I have a headache…" to mean "I'm not in the right mood tonight…", so many times, that this cliché has become the butt of stand-up comedy. This is simpy not Biblical. A wife who is uninterested in sex, but who still wishes to be obedient to the scriptures should instead be offering her husband a statement like,

> "Please have mercy on me, I beg of you. Allow me to rest this one evening. I shall fulfill your desire at the break of dawn on the morrow. But if you shall require it as my husband and master, I shall perform my utmost at your bidding, and I shall be ravished from head to toe as you please, until you are utterly (and literally) drenched with the satisfaction of my love. Whatever you may decide, just knowing that you desire me, even when I am weak, weary, and in need of bathing, then shall my heart be filled with the pangs of having been unconditionally loved!"

In spite of the immense pressure to relieve his reproductive burden, I can't imagine that any man who truly loves his wife would press forward with his demand for sex after hearing a soliloquy like this one.

(Rebellious) women will naturally scoff at this, but what women don't understand is that this kind of talk just does something magical to the soul of a man. It honors him. It recognizes his God-ordained authority as her husband. It gives him the respect that he needs. It humbles him, inspires him, and beckons forth his best.

If a wife ever got into the habit of talking like this with sincerity, she would be amazed at how suddenly her husband would "man up" and become attentive to her needs, and how quickly her marriage and sex life would improve.

The lesson for ladies to glean here is that if you go about doing things with respect to God's created order, then there's a very high chance that you'll get what you want — even if what you want is less sex!

But unfortunately, most wimmin are not humble enough to be obedient enough to improve their marriage life enough to make it divorce-proof enough.

Error 3: Spilling the load.

The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does

The scripture passage above says that the (Christian) husband has authority over his (Christian) wife's body, and vice versa.

If we take the liberty to extrapolate this text onto real world situations in which the husband exercises authority over his wife's body, the eisegetical application could be interpreted to mean the following.

- If a husband wants his wife to adopt the habit of wearing a dress on a regular basis, then she should be asking him for details about the style and color of the dresses he prefers, and how much she is allowed to spend on some new dresses.
- If a husband wants his wife to wear a head covering to church, then she should experiment with headscarves of different sizes, shapes, textures, and colors to see what is most suitable for her head and her style.
- If a husband wants his wife to have long hair, then she should let it grow until he asks her to cut it.
- If a husband wants his wife to lose weight, then she should go on an Adkins diet until he tells her to stop.
- If the husband expresses the need for a quickie, then she needs to finish him off within the next ten minutes.
- If a husband says he doesn't want his wife to take birth control pills, then she should put this option completely out of her mind.
- If a husband doesn't want his wife to use any kind of birth control, then she should confirm his intentions to have a child, and should prepare herself for the possibility of becoming pregnant (e.g. stop smoking, drinking, and taking other prescription drugs which might harm a fetus.)

We could gladly go on with many other examples of submission which would surely raise strong objections from Strong Independent Wimmin™. Readers are welcome to add to this list below.

Conclusions

According to 1st Corinthians 7:3-5, sex within marriage is a duty. If you're married, but you're not shinnying up the goods on a regular basis, you're being disobedient to the Word. It stands to reason that sex is a duty to the married because God hates divorce. (Malachi 2:16)

We could think of the marital duty of sex like it's a full time "job". Just like any other job, if you give a lousy performance, or fail to show up to work too many times, then you shouldn't be surprised if you are discharged from your position.

Any woman who is truly not aware of these things is indeed a foolish woman who tears down her house. (Proverbs 14:1) But believe it or not, there are many wives, even Christian wives, who withhold sex for the express purpose of utilizing the dynamics described above, namely, to either force their husbands to compromise or submit, or to intentionally destroy their marriages for selfish gain.

Related

- Dalrock: The unexpected challenge to modern Christian orthodoxy. (2016 December 12)
- Dalrock: Satisfaction guaranteed. (2018 January 10)

I-Feminism – New label, same product

Jack · 11 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism undergoes a face-lift to promote its acceptance to the younger generation.

Includes a Fem-lexicon translation.

Readership: All

Feminism's Persistent Problem of Maintaining Relevancy

I don't know why it's taken so long for the public to catch on, but they're gradually becoming aware that feminism is not all it's cracked up to be. Maybe you've noticed that even the label "feminism" has become unpalatable to younger, fresher minds.

In addition, the very recent resurgence of "tradwives" are giving media attention hoes and their cultural pimps some hot competition for the hearts and minds of the younger generation, not to mention a bit of subliminal s1ut shaming. But our cultural overlords and their useful idiots aren't about to give up on maintaining the toxic trad narrative just yet.

In order to patch up the narrative to be more presentable to the public, and to ensure that convergence continues to remain acceptable, they've decided to rebrand feminism under a slightly different name — Individualist Feminism, or I-Feminism.

We all know how important brand name and brand image are in marketing, and this includes the medias marketing of social Marxism.

They know that if they want to appeal to the younger demographic, they have to tone down the firebrand rhetoric, find meaning beyond the solipsistic boilerplate, adopt an ostensible purpose that is not self-centered, and glorify it somehow.

Feminism has to be presented as the most attractive and reasonable choice. So it's not surprising to see pop articles that straddle the political divide and prop up the argument of how great feminism must be. But of course! Don't you know!

Case Study: Basic Bee

At 4.6K followers, here's one worth our consideration.

Basic Bee: Why do so many young women refuse to call themselves a feminist? (November 21, 2019)

By the way, here's the author. Lurrvely, isn't she?

She says…

> "Supporting feminism is nothing to be ashamed of and you should always stand up for what you believe in. Whether thats having kids, not having kids, wearing that short skirt, wearing that maxi dress, walking where you want, when you want without being shouting at you. It's you life and your body, so stand up for everything that you believe in – and you do you boo."

What an adorable accent! Note how this is a bootifully contrived, politically neutral introduction that appeals to women's addiction to choice and the moxie of self-empowerment.

> "Before I start – this is NOT an anti-male blog post, I have so so much respect for males in my life especially family, friends and people that I work with."

This is meant to draw the men in too. But in reality, whenever a woman says she "respects" men, it means absolutely nothing at all. Women's idea of respect is uniquely dissimilar from men's concept of respect.

> "So if you're here for an anti-male post, click off boo and don't waste your time reading."

This discriminatory statement is a Push-Pull tactic that makes her information appear elite and esoteric. Also, distancing herself from being "anti-male" presents a false claim of moral authority.

> "Did you know that fewer than one in five young women would call themselves a feminist?"

No surprise here. Recently, it's become fairly obvious that feminism is so ugly to males, and so toxic to family, society, and longitudinal female happiness, that every sane, self-respecting young person would never associate with the label.

> "Over the last couple of weeks I've followed loads of new accounts on instagram – (@BasicBee) and i've come to realise that what I thought was a feminist over the last 6+ years, isn't actually a feminist at all.

Now she's using a straw man to redefine what it means to be a feminist. This attempts to shake the reader's curiosity, and entices him/her to keep reading in order to confirm his/her own views.

And look at the following list! You can come Feeed your sweeet addiction to choissse, sweety! <<<tunnel vision ensues>>>

> There's so many different types of feminism:

Translation: Identify and choose the ideology which best fits your favorite pet idolatry (AKA ideolatryism, the fundamental essence of Taoism).

> - Liberal Feminism. "Liberal feminism is an individualistic form of feminist theory, which focuses on women's ability to maintain their equality through their own actions and choices."

Remember, Satan once had the notion that he could be equal with God by virtue of himself. So Liberal Feminists must be Satanians.

> - Radical Feminism. "Radical feminism is a perspective within feminism that calls for a radical reordering of society in which male supremacy is eliminated in all social and economic contexts. Radical feminists view society as fundamentally a patriarchy in which men dominate and oppress women."

Those who view normal male-female intersexual relationships with distrust, suspicion, or contempt are usually called Queers. So Radical Feminists are Queers! You learn something new every day!

> - Marxist and Socialist Feminism. "Socialist feminism is a two-pronged theory that broadens Marxist feminism's argument for the role of capitalism in the oppression of women and radical feminism's theory of the role of gender and the patriarchy."

The All Seeing I Dog, leading the blind.

> - Cultural Feminism. "Cultural feminism, the view that there is a "female nature" or "female essence", attempts to revalue and redefine attributes ascribed to femaleness. It is also used to describe theories that commend innate differences between women and men."

Mother Isis bore a child,
Roving hordes of men gone wild.
To spawn the thicket core of marriage,
Then laid to rest beneath her carriage.

> - Eco-Feminism. "Ecofeminism is a branch of feminism that sees environmentalism, and the relationship between women and the earth, as foundational to its analysis and practice. Ecofeminist thinkers draw on the concept of gender to analyse the relationships between humans and the natural world."

Upon Demeter flails Persephone.
Artemis in Eostre, seeks Aphrodite.
Their fibrous fruit does not fall far,

From shady grafts of Wormwood star.

The primary appeal to the reader is the introduction of the last embodiment of feminism – ifeminism.

> - I-Feminism (The new wave of feminism). "Ifeminists, or individualist feminists, say that the feminist slogan "a woman's body, a woman's right" should extend to every peaceful choice a woman can make. Ifeminists believe that freedom and diversity benefit women, whether or not the choices that particular women make are politically correct. They respect all sexual choices, from motherhood to porn.
> As the cost of freedom, ifeminists accept personal responsibility for their own lives. They do not look to government for privileges any more than they would accept government abuse. Ifeminists want legal equality, and they offer the same respect to men.
> In short, ifeminism calls for freedom, choice, and personal responsibility."

She gives the impression that this is something new and improved. But did you notice all these words in the description?

- "individualist" Translation: Entitled princess solipsism
- "a woman's body, a woman's right" Translation: My body, my right!
- "every peaceful choice" Translation: Pro-choice… [ahem]
- "diversity" Translation: Third world $h!+ hole
- "politically correct" Translation: The tone police are watching you!
- "respect all sexual choices" Translation: Any perversion or deviancy is equal to anything else.
- "from motherhood to porn" Translation: "from fatherhood to scorn"

As you can see, the basic feminist doctrines remain unchanged.

But now they add,

- Personal responsibility. [Does she even know what this means?]
- Not leeching off of men nor the government. [Let's see it happen!]
- Legal equality. [The ɦəll you say…]
- Respect to men. [heh…]

Summary Translation: Feminism can be whatever I want it to be!

Conclusion

Don't admit these arguments. You see, what we have here is white washed feminism – feminism without the profuse ugliness, without the veritable "offenses" that have become iconically symbolic of feminazism.

Ifeminism is a rebranding marketing strategy for cultural fashionistas and virtue-signal gluttons.

But don't be fooled by this woof in sleeps closing. It's a DIY ploy to deny the authority of men, and detract from the glory of God.

Related

- Σ Frame: Jack's Law of Feminism (2019 April 13)

Current Trends in Prophecy

Jack · 13 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Prophecy continues to be ongoing, but do we remain ignorant of its influence?

Readership: Christians; Those following either Vox Day or Jordan Peterson;

Introduction

As mentioned in a previous post, How to Dismantle the Idol of Fandom: Breaking the Fifth Wall (2018 May 26), one avenue of apprehending truth is through prophecy. Prophecy imparts a conscientious awareness of things that would otherwise not be regarded, and this additional knowledge shifts our perspective of understanding what is right and true.

However, we live in a world of false prophecy these days.

Fake news, gaslighting, and various ad hominems, are usually embodiments of false prophecy.

Censorship is often done to crimp the dissemination of certain aspects of the truth, in order to support the contrasting messages of false prophecies.

The Babylon Bee might offer some examples of fake news that would be true prophecy.

What is Prophecy?

First of all, I know there will be a lot of readers who misunderstand what prophecy is, so I'll have to discuss this first.

The common myth surrounding prophecy is that prophets can predict the future. This is not exactly true, nor is it the purpose of prophecy. But because of scriptures like the following, it is easy to jump to this conclusion.

> "…when a prophet speaks in the name of the Lord, if the word does not come to pass or come true, that is a word that the Lord has not spoken; the prophet has spoken it presumptuously. You need not be afraid of him." ~ Deuteronomy 18:22 (ESV)

What is not commonly understood is that if a prophetic message says something about the future, then it is because God wishes to outline a judgment on the present situation by revealing the eventual consequences thereof.

Perhaps Jonah, one of the most famous minor prophets, will illustrate that prophecy is not so much about predicting the future as it is about reframing the present.

Jonah only issues a single proclamation about the future.

> "Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown!" ~ Jonah: 3:4 (RSV)

But reading further in Jonah, we find that, as a result of Jonah's prophecy, the Ninevites repented of their evil ways and violence, and God did not destroy the city. But since Jonah's "prediction" did not in fact come to pass, does that make him a false prophet (according to Deuteronomy 18:22)? If he was a false prophet, then his story would have never been included in the Biblical canon. In fact, Jesus identified Jonah as one of the greatest prophets when he said "the sign of Jonah" was referring to Himself. (Matthew 12:38-41; Luke 11:29-32)

Jesus himself offered an alternate (or supplementary) method to diagnose the nature of a prophecy.

> "Beware of false prophets, who come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravenous wolves. You will know them by their fruits." ~ Matthew 7:15-16 (NKJV)

A true prophet is one that enlightens people to recognize truth, prepare themselves accordingly, and pursue God's will for mankind. A false prophet is one that leads people further into complacency, idolatry and dissipation. Sometimes, the gist of a prophecy is evident, but in other cases, the effect of a prophecy is not readily apparent, and can take years to unfold.

Vox and Peterson

We might consider Vox Day and Prof. Peterson both to be social prophets, under the loose definition offered above.

In his series of posts tagged "Jordanetics", Vox Day has invested a considerable amount of cognitive and emotional energy in addressing the fundamental nature of Peterson's influence. Here, I believe what we are witnessing is a battle between two modern day prophets, where one prophet (Vox) is attempting to expose the other (Peterson) as a false prophet.

In this YouTube video, entitled, 'Vox Day Exposes Jordan Peterson and the Left's Plan to Take Control of the Nationalist Movement' (2018 May 7), Vox teams up with Alex Jones to discuss his viewpoints.

I will not comment (yet) on whether a particular man (e.g. Vox, Peterson, or another) is a false prophet or not. Instead I will leave that for the readers to debate and to decide for themselves. [I give my opinion in a follow-up post, The Battle of the Prophets (2020-3-27).] However, I will say that if Vox is to be successful in his assails on Peterson, he needs to adjust his strategy as follows.

- Vox has been primarily focused on Peterson's arguments, the facts, and his interpretation of the meaning that arises from these. Instead, Vox needs to place a greater emphasis on a grand purpose (or vision), and that purpose needs to be greater than simply depedestalizing Peterson and his arguments.
- Vox needs to expand his Frame to include the viewpoints of those who don't agree with his (or Peterson's) interpretations of meaning.
- Instead of investigating the specific mechanics and meanings of the arguments, Vox should match and discuss Peterson's presumed strategy of Breaking the Fifth Wall, and address the overall mechanics and meaning of the debate itself.
- By taking the argument to the next level of awareness, viewers would be better informed to understand what the stakes are, and to see where they stand. This could be done simply by showing how Peterson's philosophies are a continuation of Marxism, or Feminism, and do not promise a return to traditional Christian values in society. Vox mentions this strategy in the video, but (to my present knowledge) I don't think he has actually chased it down.

Concluding Statements

In conclusion, a wider, better Frame for a debate might be to delineate the battle which has been going on in the west since the 1770's, if not earlier, and has manifested in various forms throughout the years. Some historical examples might include populism/immigration vs. landed bourgeoisie/tradition (ca. 1830's), federal sovereignty vs. states' rights (ca. 1850's); industrialization vs. agrarian society (ca. 1870's), gold standard vs. silver standard (ca. 1890's), suffrage vs. temperance (ca. 1920's), Communism vs. McCarthyism (1950's), feminism vs. the family (1980's), and nationalism vs progressive socialism (ca. 2010's). We might describe this battle as something like 'the entrenching New World Order versus the local, patriarchal, Christian, traditional, nuclear family structure in revival'. I doubt that this particular Frame would attract popular appeal, but taking this approach (or one similar) would be a step towards the right direction.

I believe Vox is presuming that Nationalism is the same as Christianized Traditionalism. This is not exactly right, because Nationalism describes the political structure, whereas Christianized Traditionalism addresses the social structure. Both are needed for a theoretical return to normalcy, so this association is probably accurate enough to get some traction. But to clinch this take, Vox needs to (1) spell this out more clearly, and (2) get past the staged politics involving the Left vs. Right dogma. The whole political contrivance of dueling parties is being revealed to be a divide and conquer contraption intended to keep society occupied with infighting, while the Deeper State encroaches over the whole world, and continues to lumber towards it's clandestine objectives to restructure society. As a result of this new awareness, the old Left vs. Right arguments are quickly disintegrating in strength and value, as new lines are being drawn. This is largely why society is becoming so volatile.

Related

- Quillette (Carol Horton): Jordan Peterson and the Failure of the Left (2018 May 22)
- Radix Fidem: Your Own Word from God (2020 March 26)
- Σ Frame: The Battle of the Prophets (2020-3-27)

Parenting is for the elite.

Jack · 16 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Not only marriage, but also parenting is for the elite.

Readership: All; Parents; Those who hope to be parents;

Introduction

Dalrock once made a very strong argument that marriage is for the elite, but that it shouldn't be.

- Dalrock: Let them become elite. (2017 September 26)
- Dalrock: Is Christian marriage only for elite women? (2019 January 14)

In the latter, Dalrock wrote,

> "Most women can't attract an exceptional man. All of those women who are married to the poor excuses for men that we look down on? They are every bit the losers their husbands are! If they had better options they would have taken them. Even if a woman had better options but chose a poor slob for a husband, this generally tells us the woman was gifted with attractiveness but blew it due to being below average in wisdom. Granted there will be a handful of true exceptions, but these aren't the rule.
>
> So when we look down on unexceptional men as unworthy, we are implicitly looking down on the loser women who can't do any better. But as Romans 12:10 reminds us, this isn't a Christian way of looking at things. It also sets marriage up as something only for elite men and women. For if we take the non-elite men out of the marriage market, who will their counterpart women marry?"

That's the current conundrum that few want to face, and it's true.

I'll take this assertion a step further. Not only is marriage reserved for the elite, but also parenting – but it shouldn't be.

Parenting is for the Elite

The common belief is that raising children "properly" requires parents to have every amenity imaginable to be fully accessible to their children — the best schools, designer clothes, money to invest in special hobbies and interests, such as taking private lessons in foreign language, or piano or violin lessons. Anything less than this would be "depriving your children" of what is presumed to be a "full life".

This attitude reeks of materialistic arrogance. Why should we listen to such people about how to raise our children?

In times past, these things were considered luxuries, but now, they are necessities. They are considered necessities, not because children cannot become mature capable adults without these things, but because parents want their children to be the best, or at least, better than their peers at school. They don't want any other parent or child to look down on their child, because that would create negative Feeelz.

But you know, that's just how life is. Even in a "perfect" socialist country like China or North Korea, there are still class differences, except it is not determined by how hardworking, or skillful, or business saavy your father is, but by whether he is an official within the Communist party.

Because of the Jones', the average couple won't consider having children until they have everything else settled in place, and also have a few years to enjoy it all for themselves –without any children. But all too often, this expectation would put a couple past the wife's fertility window.

To be realistic, the average person is not elite, and so it is unreasonable for the average couple to postpone having children until such-and-such a goal is met. Furthermore, it is uncharitable to expect them to follow the life script of the upper class when their lower or even middle-class budget prevents them from obtaining all the exquisite trimmings.

Furthermore, the children themselves don't really care about money that much. What they want is a stable, secure, love-filled home that has both a mother and a father present.

The Elite are Parents

These observations are not just idle preponderances of the fears and wishful thoughts of others. I have been an educator for some time, and I'm also a parent, so I am exposed to this crowd on a continual basis. I have seen these expectations play out for decades.

The difference between the people who are married with children and those who aren't is quite noticeable. Whenever we have a parent-teacher meeting, I always know who the parents are just by looking at them. The parents are very well-dressed, and they have an air of confidence and dignity. Those who are not parents look common and shabby in comparison. At certain gatherings, this vast chasm is astounding.

The fathers are mostly professional, dignified men — calm, quiet observers of their children's progress. Many of them can be seen driving their children to school in a newer model, sport-performance car, which is usually either black or white in color. I shouldn't need to mention, only elite men have the money and leisure to drive their children to school in a Lexus or Benz.

Occasionally there's a working man who has a great physique and a lot of charisma. These men all have Frame, and they don't take any $ from people.

And the mothers! They are tall, thin, always well-dressed and meticulously groomed, many of them have long hair, and the ones who don't are cute as a button. They have a butt on their @ss — the natural result of the regular sexercise necessary for impregnation. Mammary glands that point to the far recesses of the heavens — providing nutritional sustenance to the babes in their care.

I can't help myself from noticing.

I hardly ever see any parent, dirty and harried from a long, tough day's work, come in driving an old beat up Ford to pick up their child. The children of those parents always take the bus.

The point is, only the most excellent specimens of humanity are reproducing. From an evo-psych viewpoint, this may be all for the betterment of the race.

Anyway you have it, it seems that you really need both marriage and children to get into this group. Of course, the prerequisite for both is to be elite. Of course, this is not a Christian view, but it is commonly perceived as the (expected) Christian norm.

Conclusions

We tend to look at those married couples who are elite, as I described above, and think that every Christian family should be like theirs.

We are happy to see those elite couples getting married and having children, but we think it unfitting or even embarrassing for those of humbler means.

But this kind of attitude denies less well-heeled families the glory and honor of being a parent.

Granted, raising children isn't cheap, but the joys and blessings of being a parent should not be reserved for the elite only, nor should they be excluded from unexceptional Christian couples.

Related

- The New York Times (Claire Cain Miller): How Did Marriage Become a Mark of Privilege? (2017 Sept. 25)

The Parable of the Jigsaw Puzzle

Jack · 18 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Insert male tab into female socket to form a beautiful composition.

Readership: All;

A man and a woman are much like two interlocking jigsaw puzzle pieces.

One piece has a tab, and another piece has a recess. These two parts fit together, forming a picture or pattern on the outside surface.

No adhesive nor tape is necessary to join these pieces together, because the interlocking geometry of the pieces allows a mechanical containment of one inside the other.

Some puzzle pieces may have tabs and slots that fit together, but their pictures don't match, and so the resulting montage doesn't form a beautiful composite image (of God). These two pieces are mismatched (or "unequally yoked" ~ 2nd Corinthians 6:14).

What happens if we remove the tabs (emasculate men) and fill in the recesses (masculinize women), and make the pieces amorphous (androgynous)?

If the tabs and recesses are removed, then there is no geometrical design (sexual attraction; spiritual identity) to retain cohesion (bonding).

Moreover, what we have are pieces that resemble those few pieces with straight sides that comprise the periphery of the puzzle (edge of society).

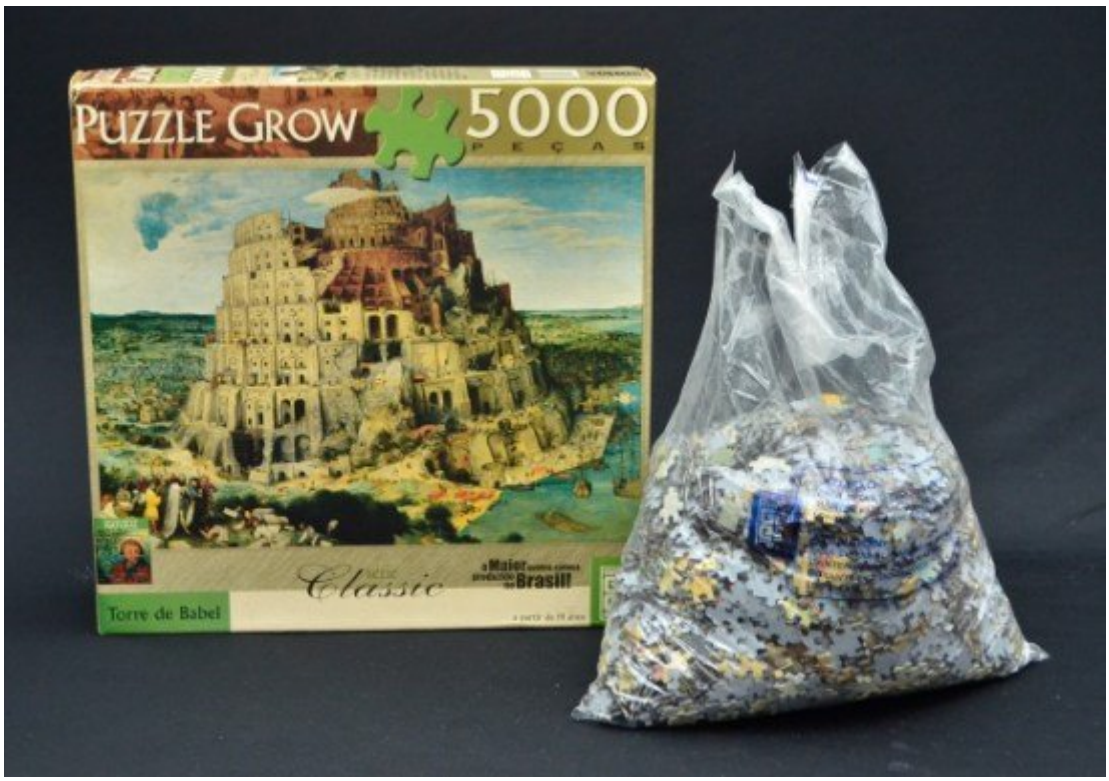
By being pushed to the side (the "edge" of society), these pieces are segregated into a (progressive) stack, and assembled separately to form a frame (boundaries of morality). This frame then becomes the border (moral limitations) of the entire puzzle (society).

The four pieces with two straight sides are "special". These are sent to the intersectional corners (of society).

Completing the border (building the wall; establishing personal boundaries) is an important step in completing the puzzle. Without these pieces in place (social structure and moral accountability), it is rather difficult to determine exactly where the other pieces belong (what is morally right and contextually appropriate), and how they might fit together (establish normal intersexual relations leading to marriage and family).

If we demand that all the puzzle pieces should have flat edges and are all the same size, shape, and color (social-sexual equality), then we don't really have a puzzle. This is more like a ceramic tile floor.

If the pieces are all the same, and they cannot join together in the usual interlocking fashion, then these tiles require an adhesive or mortar to keep them stuck in place (contracts, laws, and government policies).



But if we snip off the tabs and artificially fill the sl0ts, then in reality, what we are left with is a pile of cardboard chips which can never be pieced together into a finished puzzle (functional society).

These shards are only good for one thing – to use as tinder to light up the (moral, spiritual, and societal) bonfire.

Related

- Dalrock: Debasing marriage (2012 October 6)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Understanding the world and the mission (2014 February 4)

- Attention Land (feat. Adam Baker): 5 Things We Can Learn From Jigsaw Puzzles (2014 September 1)

Fighting Fires

Jack · 20 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The church wastes a great deal of financial and spiritual resources in patching up the fallout from the shoddy Socio-Sexual/Marriage Marketplace. These energies could be much better spent on education.

Readership: All; Church leaders; Parents; Those who hope to be parents;

Introduction

In a previous post, Parenting is for the elite. (2020-3-16), I discussed how being a married parent tends to be an exclusive status among the elite.

However, there are two groups of women who do not enter into the blessed Inner Circle of the Parenting Elite.

1. Women who commit abortion. (No children.)
2. Single mothers. (No marriage.)

Obviously, these women have the potential to join this elite group, but for some reason, they choose not to join the parenting federation.

Their reasons are varied.

Although many of these women claim that they prefer to remain unmarried and/or childless, I have my doubts about how honest they are being with themselves. If it's true, then I would presume they prefer to remain single because they can earn a decent income on their own, and they cannot find a man worthy of their standards, who earns more, and who is also willing to commit to marriage.

They might think they're elite, but there is something important missing.

Women who Commit Abortion

Concerning the first group, the church teaches us that we should love and accept those women who have had an abortion (should they ever be found out). But laced within this stance, there is an implicit assumption that God's design for women to be mothers isn't optimal enough for them. No, every princess needs to have a "season for singleness"* while waiting for a wealthy (or otherwise high quality) man to be her husband, or none at all. We would never deprive a Christian woman of her opportunity to live wild and free in the process of "discovering herself"* if she so wishes, simply because she isn't beautiful nor wise enough to attract an elite man's commitment in marriage. As a consequence, a woman having an abortion, for whatever her personal reasons, has come to be accepted as the norm, even within the church. However, this is a topic that tends to stay within the women's circles, and the men never become aware of this implicit treachery of procreative potential.

And… the church continues to teach us that we should love and accept those women who have had an abortion!

 It is fairly well known that all too often, a "season for singleness" is merely a polite euphemism for riding the carousel and becoming jaded (AKA "discovering herself"), but it is also implied that this "season of singleness" must not be interrupted by the inconvenient duties of childbearing and childrearing.*

Single Mothers

Concerning the second group, I've met some women who actually preferred to have an independent lifestyle and have a child with a man of their choosing. Often times this is a sugar daddy who is already taken. It seems that there are some women who don't care too much about commitment as long as their lives are comfortably numb and ostentatiously secure.

Likewise, the church teaches us that we should love and accept those women who are single mothers. But laced within this stance, there is an implicit assumption that God's design for mothers to be married isn't optimal enough for them. No, every princess needs to have a wealthy (or otherwise high quality) man as her husband, or none at all. We would never deprive a Christian woman of her opportunity to have a child, even out of wedlock if she so wishes, simply because she is neither beautiful nor wise enough to attract an elite man's commitment in marriage. As a consequence, a woman having a child out of wedlock, for whatever her personal reasons, has come to be accepted as the norm, even within the church.

And… the church continues to teach us that we should love and accept those women who are single mothers!

Something smells fleshy…

Confusion over Cause and Effect

For those women who wish to join the ranks of the married, parenting elite, there is no other way to do so, except to remain sexually chaste until marriage. This usually requires women to marry while they are still young (< 25-ish).

There are many ways that the church has skirted around the unpopular teaching of chastity, but ultimately, the only real solution is for us to make the following crystal clear to young people…

1. That chastity (i.e. true sexual purity) has value for many reasons.
2. That young women can have a clear choice about how their lives will turn out.
3. Most importantly, the steps young women can take to precipitate that choice into reality.

In sum, the church needs to focus on the cause-and-effect relationship between the two broad choices of (1) chastity and contentment in marriage and family, and (2) sexual promiscuity, dissipation, and a less favorable life outcome. But these cascades are not properly and adequately addressed in church catechism, and I don't believe it ever has been.

Instead of emphasizing these fundamental concepts of procuring spiritual excellence in living, the church teaches us to love and accept those women who have fallen short of the target (i.e. by choosing to have premarital sex, committing abortion, or having a child out of wedlock).

But while this goal of extending unconditional love and forgiveness is indeed scriptural and necessary, it has replaced the goal of reaching towards the upward calling of Christ. As such, it has become a self-reinforcing feedback loop which propagates these same bad behaviors. That is to say, since these behaviors have become the acceptable norm, there remains no motivation for young women to exercise self-control and remain chaste. No matter what mistakes they make, they will always find kind, loving church folks who will totally ignore how badly they have screwed up their lives while serving up casseroles and cookies.

Gynocentric government policies and court systems that are generous to disobedient wimmin only serve to exacerbate the longitudinal failure to discipline.

Is the need for introspection and repentance even a thing anymore?

Or is it only for when she fails to stick the landing and is certain to lose the rewards for being obedient?

No, it's too late by then.

Conclusions

Parenting is for the elite, but it shouldn't be. Not all (would-be) mothers are elite, but many more of them could be. The church might increase the yield ratio by going back to the basics of why sexual chastity is of value, and why a timely marriage may be the best option for many young women.

At some point, it needs to be made undeniably clear that illicit sex is morally unacceptable and that it has long term consequences. But few church leaders have the balls to spell out all the negative consequences of extramarital sex.

As a consequence, church staff and parishioners consume vast amounts of their time and energies, as well as fiscal and material resources in fighting the fires of sexual promiscuity, dealing with the consequences of abortion (e.g. counseling guilt and difficulties in subsequent relationships), and meeting the needs of single mothers.

The bottom line is that a great deal more spiritual efficiency could be achieved if the church focused its energies on preventing fires, rather than fighting them.

Related

- Dalrock: The normalization of the trashy single mother. (2012 October 18)
- Dalrock: Single mothers and the failure of Christian men; it is time to Man Up! (2013 March 15)
- Dalrock: Don't overlook single mothers. (2015 January 26)
- Σ Frame: Abortion and Birth Control (Page)

New Page: Argumentation and Debate

Jack · 23 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Announcing a new page on Argumentation and Debate, which includes some "new" dishonest debate tactics.

Readership: The intellectually gifted; Others who are interested;

Announcement

From the end of February to the first half of March, there was a record-breaking amount of discussion in the comments at Σ Frame. It started with Scott's post, Probabilities (2020-02-24) which was about the Meet Cute phenomenon. The discussion soon exploded into quite a few tangential topics. Since then, I've been busy addressing several of these tangent issues in separate posts, and I'm nowhere near being finished.

While reviewing many of the comments, I realized that it would be good for us to brush up on our argumentation skills, including myself. I have taught a course in debate for a few years, and as part of the course materials, I've put together a summary of Argumentation and Debate which contains an extensive (but not exhaustive) list of logical fallacies. (That last link goes to the new page.)

At 7,500 words, I don't expect the average reader to make it to the end, much less memorize every word by heart. So here in this post, I'd like to draw the reader's attention to (1) the most important stuff, and (2) the most problematic stuff.

The Crux of Intellectually Honest Debate

The list of intellectually honest debate tactics is short and easy to remember.

1. Revealing errors or omissions in your opponent's facts.
2. Revealing errors or omissions in your opponent's logic.

All other debate tactics are intellectually dishonest.

Noteworthy Intellectually Dishonest Debate Tactics

Here, I'd just like to point out a few errors I've seen in the recent discussions at Σ Frame. These include…

- Accusation of Appeal to Credentials
- Ad Hominem
- Appeal to Hypocrisy
- Changing the subject
- False Dilemma
- Finding Small Error
- Ill-Defined Words
- Oversimplification
- Stereotyping
- Strawman
- Vagueness

Maybe there are others I've failed to notice.

Widespread or "New" Intellectually Dishonest Debate Tactics

I'll also draw attention to some dishonest tactics that have become prevalent in society over the past decade or two.

I've made a few additions (in green font) which don't appear in your average debate handbook, and therefore might be considered "new".

- Apex Fallacy
- Assertion of Non-Existent "Rights"
- Cherry Picking
- Citing Irrelevant Facts
- Group Polarization
- Political Correctness
- Selective Peer Approval
- Tone Policing
- Trolling

Final Statements

The new paradigm in debate includes argumentation at the meta-level, which is not easily discerned. Because of this,

- I do believe it is possible for an argument to be riddled with errors, yet still be truthful at its core.
- I also believe an argument can be flawless, but still be unwise or gravely mistaken in its proposed application.
- I also believe many arguments are used to fatigue the opponent, and to create an acceptance through repetition and familiarity. These strategies are ubiquitous in MGM, and they go largely unnoticed. I don't believe these strategies have a name, nor have they ever been detailed in writing.

Note: I'll offer the following suggestions for a name: Oversaturation; Smokescreening; Snowstorming.

The purpose of posting this page on Argumentation and Debate is to help us as a community (1) sort out the facts, (2) reason together, and (3) come to a better apprehension of the truth. I hope that the information will be empowering, more than it will be disheartening.

I need to mention that commenters are not the only ones guilty of intellectual dishonesty. I've read through several of my past posts since I started compiling this material, and because I had a fresh review of these fallacies on my mind, I've found some of these errors in my own posts, which was quite surprising and embarrassing. This only reinforced my conviction that this page needs to be included in the header, and that I/we need to be more mindful of being intellectually honest in the future.

Perhaps I'm being overly critical, unwise for criticizing my readers, or overly stupid for admitting error, so I'll leave it to the reader to identify errors.

If anyone takes up this challenge, I would appreciate an attitude of learning with sincere humility. Please include links, quotations, and/or citations.

Related

Things men found attractive 50 years ago are still attractive today.

Jack · 25 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Women are averse to admit what men find attractive.

Readership: All

I came across this feminist leaning article which paints several manifestations of the traditional archetype as hopelessly outdated – but in fact, they are not.

The List (Christine-Marie Liwag Dixon): Surprising things men found attractive 50 years ago (2018 January 17)

The hamster is high on this one, so we're going to knock the rpm's down a few thousand cycles.

The problems with this article could be summarized as follows.

- A. It claims that some things were attractive 50 years ago, when in fact they were not.
- B. It claims that some things were attractive 50 years ago, but that they aren't now, when in fact they still are.
- C. It claims that some things that have always been attractive should not be considered attractive.
- D. It was always attractive, but the article tries to politicize the reasons why.

To identify the error, each of the following examples is followed by A, B, C, or D.

Lighter Skin (C)

The article makes the case that having a preference for lighter skin is evidence of racism and discrimination. But having this preference is not limited to whites nor western culture. This is true for Asians too. In fact, most cultures worldwide prefer lighter skin, so it's really about aesthetics, not racism. This is proven by the fact that skin whitening cream is the most popular cosmetic product worldwide. Even within the black community, lighter skin is considered more attractive.

Rail-Thin Bodies (B)

Voluptuous, hourglass bodies have always been considered the icon of female attractiveness. This hasn't changed, and it never will. I believe the preference for thinner women since Twiggy hit the scene in the 60's is a response to increasing obesity. There's also the fact that thinner women tend to age better.

Flat Chests (A)

The argument offered for this claim is pretty short and weak. The important thing to men is that a woman's breasts are attractive. Breasts are attractive if they are symmetrical, round, plump, firm, and supple (no sagging and no cellulite). In other words, youthful and healthy. Size is secondary to the overall presentation, but it receives more attention because it's more obvious in fully clothed women. Women care more about size than men do.

Flat Butts (A)

> Przybyszewski wrote that the fear of cellulite caused women to do anything they could to eliminate "what they identified as water, wastes, and fat trapped inside women's hips and thighs."

There's a big difference between being fit and sleek, and having jiggly cottage cheese spilling out of her clothing. The word "flat" does not describe this difference.

> The desire for more boyish figures was not entirely to please men or to conform to fashion. Battleground: The Media, edited by Robin Andersen and Jonathan Alan Gray, noted that "the changing shape of women's bodies has in many ways served to reflect larger cultural values." Throughout history, "a thin, straight figure was prized" at times "when women were striving to demonstrate their equality."

Whatever… A thin, straight figure is prized by women in other women who value "equality" because men prefer a voluptuous package.

Exposed Legs (B)

> In Fashion: A History from the 18th to the 20th Century, Akiko Fukai wrote that "the young found that > displaying their physique was the most effective means of setting themselves apart from the older generation."

The article implies that this social movement was an act of rebellion, which I interpret as the psychological projection of the author. But in fact, physiological and generational differences exist nonetheless. In Asia, showing a lot of leg is the universal cultural signal of youth, beauty, and fertility. Westerners tend to focus more on breastyness and cleavage.

Androgyny (A)

> Coinciding with the preference for more boyish figures was the rise of unisex clothing and androgynous styles. This echoed a similar trend from the 1920's, when "androgyny [began to be] associated with the search for greater independence for women," wrote Rebecca Arnold in Fashion, Desire and Anxiety: Image and Morality in the 20th Century. Arnold wrote that the rise of androgyny in the 1960's helped to "denote freedoms gained and the rejection of a preceding claustrophobic femininity."

Heh… The article makes it seem as though men liked and wanted this change.

I remember from the 1970's, that "greater independence for women" was interpreted and understood to mean "more emotional independence equals maturity", as in, not being "clingy", dependent on a man. Looking back, I see this was a deceptive attack on humility.

When I was in college, I dated more than a few women who were disgusted by their feelings of natural attraction for me, and overtly apologized for being too clingy. When I told them that I actually enjoyed the affection, they interpreted my honest humility negatively as neediness.

The Lolita Look (B)

> …"prepubescent look". Lithe, young-looking Lolita types like Twiggy dominated the fashion world. This "look of exaggerated youthfulness expressed the associated sensibility that maturity, in dress or behavior, was a dirty word, a sign of premature death, and therefore something to be warded off as long as possible".

Feminism used the SMV of youth to separate the ideas that fertility (youth) and emotional maturity are both attractive. This was truly confusing to younger men.

Going Braless (D)

I clearly remember all the hype surrounding the anti-bra movement in the 1970's, but I cannot actually remember seeing women going braless at all. Maybe this is simply because I was a child and I wasn't into the habit of scrutinizing older women's bodies, or maybe because, as a child, I did not go to places where young women were making their fashion statements.

> Fashion designer Yves Saint Laurent contributed to making going braless not just a form of protest but also a fashion trend. His sheer designs were always modeled by women who wore no undergarments beneath them. This, too, was a political statement. Dazed wrote that "the decision was less about pleasing the onlooker, and more about asserting equality between the sexes."

I don't believe that bralessness is all about equality. I believe most women who actually go braless, do so for various practical reasons, including these…

- To be more comfortable.
- To make their bodies more accessible to men.

- To compete with other women.
- The Feeelz of personal freedom.

Long, Straight Hair (B,C)

I remember this was one of the most beautiful and inspiring things about people's appearances back in the 60's to 80's. Both men and women parted their hair in the middle, and "feathered" their hair on the sides and back. Big hair had a heyday with the 1960's "beehive" hairdo's, followed by the "flip" in the 1970's. But the emphasis on big hair reached its zenith in the 1980's, and became an icon of the times. To this day, men still find long hair attractive, and I'm sure they always will.

Subservience (B,D)

> "The 1960s might have been a time of change, but ads from the era show that women were still expected to be homemakers and sex objects."

Men still find sexy maids attractive. Arnold Schwarzenegger is a conspicuous example, and she wasn't all that sexy, because subservience alone is usually sufficient.

> "In The Feminine Mystique, published in 1963, Betty Friedan summed up the frustration of the generation, writing, "A woman today has been made to feel freakish and alone and guilty if, simply, she wants to be more than her husband's wife."

Friedan is describing a healthy guilt for being dissatisfied and ungrateful, but that's not the husband's fault.

Sobriety (B)

Still attractive to marriage minded men, but not so much to Players.

Smoking (A)

Back in the 20th century, smoking was a big thing. Anyone who didn't smoke was considered square or unsophisticated. To put this in perspective, in 1960, about 42% of the population smoked. If you remove children and the elderly from that calculation, that figure jumps to about 80% — 4 out of 5 people — that's nearly everybody.

But smoking is not what made women attractive, being sophisticated and "hip" is what did it – and back then, this included smoking. Nowadays, tattoos might be the modern equivalent. They're thought to be cool, but that does not necessarily make them attractive.

Unemployment (B)

> By the late 1960's, more women were working than ever. While they were making great economic strides, working women faced a certain stigma. It was far more acceptable for single women to work than married women, as a woman's primary duty was still expected to be to her family. In 1967, just 44 percent of married American couples lived in dual income households, compared to more than half of married couples today. Working wives and mothers were thought to destabilize home life and their families.

It's a luxury for a woman to be unemployed. It's a joy for a woman to be busy as a homemaker and raising children. Too many women have fallen for the lies that claim otherwise.

Leg Makeup (C)

My aunts (from the Silent generation) told me women were doing this as early as the 1940's. I suppose body paint would be the modern equivalent.

The article made no mention of how this is attractive to men. So I'll point out that the thing that makes this attractive is the artistry and the way it draws attention to the body.

Athletic Skills (B,D)

> "Athletic women were "in" at the end of the 1960's, but not for the reason that you might think. Athletics were viewed as a way for women to maintain "attractive" figures. Women became more active in sports in the 1960s, especially in high schools and colleges, although women's sports were not considered to be on par with men's sports."

Being physically fit and active is still attractive to men.

Conclusions

The article is somewhat dishonest, because the headline implies that these things are strange and are no longer attractive to men. In fact, most of them are still attractive to men. Nothing has changed except the degree to which women are willing to concede what men prefer.

These days, the standards for women's personal qualities have gone down so much, that women themselves are no longer attractive to men.

This article is proof that the hamster still dominates women's concepts of what men find attractive.

Why not cut to the chase and ask a man?

Related

- Σ Frame: Opal's Femsplaination of Cakeface (2018-6-17)

The Battle of the Prophets

Jack · 27 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A follow-up review of the value of Jordan Peterson's contributions.

Readership: All;

A brief review of Jordan Peterson's contribution

Two years ago in 2018, when Peterson climbed to notoriety, I devoted three studies to Peterson, which covered idolatry and the magic he wields over young men. Since then, his popularity has leveled off, so I thought it would be worth reviewing the value of his contributions.

At the time I did these studies, I could not discern the significance of Peterson's spiritual nature. I only regarded him as an exceptionally accomplished man who had a novel approach in dealing with the conundrums of modern life. Based on this assumption, my first post, The Objectivity of Offense Constitutes Respect (May 6, 2018), analyzed his contributions and discovered that that he has pioneered a robust response to a new style of dishonest debate that has developed in recent years.

In my second examination of this topic, Breaking the Fifth Wall – A New Protocol for Post-Truth Debate (June 13, 2018), I further explored Peterson's approach and found the fundamental nature of Peterson's power, and why he has gained a widespread following.

> "The quality that makes Peterson valuable to both the Left and the Right in both cases is his ability to transcend the pseudo-ethics of both the Right and Left political subcultures. Doing so explodes the politico-babble and takes the game of the argument to a whole new level."

In that same post, I described his technique as "breaking the Fifth Wall" (borrowing from film and literary terminology). I defined the "Fifth Wall" as the boundary between those who believe the premises of, and agree with the argument presented, and those who don't. This post also examined three case studies that adopted this new approach to argumentation and conflict.

Peterson breaks the fifth wall by questioning the larger picture – the meaning and purpose of life, and most poignantly, the overall meaning and mechanics of debate itself. This has since become the new paradigm of modern argumentation, and this added level of awareness is desperately needed to truly "globalize" the world.

Upon review of the debate, you can see that Cathy Newman was not a true opponent of Peterson. She was an enabler for Peterson to mainstage his new approach towards global feminist post-modernism. It was a brilliantly showcased example of the Hegelian dialectic.

On a side note, I also identified that the Red Pill is a Fifth Wall wrecking ball, in that it cuts down the battle lines between Feminism and Christian conservatism by reverting to the basic strata of the socio-sexual ontology, which cannot be adequately disclaimed as false. It takes us back to the basic premise that we are all humans under God.

My last post on this subject, How to Dismantle the Idol of Fandom: Breaking the Fifth Wall (May 26, 2018) examined elements of fandom as a form of idolatry, and considered how ethical systems may be bypassed, and false beliefs exposed, through the debate techniques launched by Peterson.

After finishing these three studies, I surmised that Peterson qualified as a prophet. But even so, I found his person to be less interesting than what all the attention on him would warrant. In conclusion, I decided it was not worth my time to give him any further airplay.

What is a Prophet?

In a previous post entitled, On the discernment and wisdom of true morality (February 2, 2019), I defined prophets as individuals…

> "…who have an extremely exceptional sense of discernment in a particular longitudinal area… within that particular discipline."

This is not to say that prophets are always completely correct or infallible, but only that they give us a glimpse past what the average man can see.

Vox Dei might fall into this description of a prophet. I say this because Vox was also the first (to my knowledge) to categorize men according to the socio-sexual hierarchy, which has since become the standard fare of discourse within Red Pill lore.

Interestingly, his self-chosen pseudonym, Vox Dei, means "the voice of God" in Latin, and could be interpreted as a profession of his own conscious ability to perceive the things of this world through a prophetic lens.

What did the Prophets say concerning Peterson?

Looking back at all the noise surrounding Peterson over the last two years, it is easy to recognize that he is a pawn, though quite an original and gifted one.

I could not see Peterson's role in this at the time, but Vox was on it. He embarked on a continual rant against Jordan Peterson that seemed unfounded at first. (See his label, Jordanetics.) But as months of internet discourse examining Petersons repeated "sins" and underlying beliefs went on, it became apparent that Peterson was more of a figure of Darkness than one of Light.

Ed Hurst was onto Peterson's game as well, but he took a neutral stance.

> "[Peterson] supports the globalist agenda because he isn't aware that it's not where we need to be. Most of his best work is limited to correcting a lot of the madness of those who work toward a globalist one-world culture. In other words, he's very pragmatic about how globalism can work, but doesn't examine the question of whether it should. So when he criticizes some aspects of globalist activism, he has exceptional clarity about what's wrong with it."
>
> "Peterson worked on a UN project that is devoted to globalist policy. What he did was help remove a lot of senseless junk from a report so that it stuck with the primary issues. But the primary issues were how best to achieve globalist goals.
>
> Peterson is an example of someone who is heart-led, but committed to the wrong god. He doesn't follow the teachings of Jesus, though he does seem to understand some parts of what Jesus taught better than most Westerners."

Adam Piggott had quite a bit to say about Peterson, first in favor of him, but then as time went on, Adam reversed his opinions of Peterson. His two big clues included the facts that (1) Peterson was sympathetic to the Left, and (2) Peterson wasn't as Red Pilled as he had once presumed. A short time later, Adam identified Peterson as a Globalist shill.

Adam Piggott summarized his impressions and assessments of Peterson in his post, My Jordan Peterson greatest hits collection. (2020 February 10).

University of Toronto psychology professor Jordan B. Peterson ignites a global debate that is absurdly reductionist: is he a hero or a villain?

Conclusions

Peterson's identification as a Globalist is what clinched it for me, because I believe any progress made towards the enterprise of Globalism — one world government/religion, homogenization of culture/race, etc. is inherently evil. Globalism is simply the 21st century iteration of Babelonism.

Jordan Peterson fits the description of a prophet, however, he is a false prophet. The quality that makes him false is the spiritual authority he serves under. By false prophet, I don't mean that he is a liar or deceiver, although that may be part of the definition in other examples. I mean that his concepts and viewpoints may very well be accurate and powerful, but at the end of the trail, his mastermind will have empowered the Globalist agenda, and led people en masse, away from the knowledge and blessings of God.

Related

- Radix Fidem (feat. Ed Hurst): The Current Path of the US (2018 November 30)
- Lexet Iustitia: Jordan Peterson: False Prophet (2018 December 16)
- Σ Frame: Current Trends in Prophecy (2020 March 13)
- Radix Fidem: Your Own Word from God (2020 March 26)

List of Female IOI's

Jack · 30 March 2020 · Archived copy · Original

If a woman had the hots for you, would you even know it?

Readership: Single men;
Theme: Reading the Room
Length: 1,400 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Intro

Out of all the discussion of Scott's post, Probabilities (2020/2/24), it has become evident that a man's ability to detect and read female Indicators of Interest (IOI's) is a crucial factor in determining his socio-sexual life trajectory.

Comprehensively, an IOI is anything that uniquely reveals her humility and heart-trust towards you, which are absolutely essential to establish a stable, meaningful relationship. Women feel vulnerable in this state, so they tend to think they have made their interest clear. But in fact, men are generally obtusely inept at detecting this emotional-spiritual state.

This information has been sparsely covered in the secular Manosphere, and virtually untouched in the Christian 'sphere (to my present knowledge). So here's a list of female IOI's to watch out for, broken down by category.

Emotional IOI's

- Acting extraordinarily clumsy, silly, or stupid, especially if she's laughing at herself for being that way.
- Laughing or giggling (genuinely) at little things that no one else is laughing about, especially things you do or say.
- Glorification — Others may notice that she has changed as a result of being with you. If so, someone might say she's a different person around you, or something to that effect.
- She feels embarrassed to talk to others about how she feels about you.

Eye Contact

- Dilated pupils.
- Elevator Eyes — Her eyes move up and down your body.
- Extended eye contact (more than 3-5 seconds). If she's talking to you directly, the timeframe for an IOI is extended to 6-10 seconds.
- Eye contact combined with a warm smile.
- Frequent Gaze — In a public setting, you catch her staring at you from across the room more than 2-3 times within half an hour.
- Kiss Me Eyes — Her eyes go back and forth between your eyes and your mouth while she's listening to you talk.
- Looking at you with a gaping mouth.
- S1ut Eye™ — Wide eyed, and looking like a deer in the headlights. Be sure to verify that she only looks at you this way, and not at every guy with a SMV higher than her own.
- Staring — She can't take her eyes off of you.

Non-Verbal Communication (AKA Body Language)

- Animated antics when interacting with you, especially twisting her body in a rhythmic fashion, jumping or skipping, or lifting her hands above her head.
- Anxiously smoothing or straightening her clothing, or checking her hair and makeup, as if preparing herself to meet you.
- Loosening or unbuttoning her collar.
- Mindlessly stroking or playing with her hair, necklace, or other accessories.
- She eagerly takes advantage of an opportunity to hug you or touch you (e.g. shoulders, upper arms).
- She attempts to communicate with you using hand movements and/or facial expressions. (BTW, if you can't understand it, just make some weird gesture back. Don't ignore it or let yourself appear confused.)
- Stroking or massaging her body in an amused or nervous fashion.
- In east Asia, it is very rude to touch another person with your feet. However, if a woman does this to a man (e.g. stroking his lower leg with her foot), she's inviting him to have a sexual relationship.

Physical IOI's (Position, Posture, or Habits)

- Her toes point towards you when she's standing near you. (See examples here and here in Case Study 3.)
- Her knees point towards you when she's sitting near you.
- Her shoulders are squarely facing you.
- She moves her hands excitedly whenever she's talking with you.
- Open body posture — She shows the palms of her hands, the inside of her wrists and lower arms.
- Flushed or reddened face, neck, or upper chest area.
- Jaw Drop — Her mouth drops open whenever she's looking at you or interacting with you, especially when accompanied with S1ut Eye.
- Nervous Tension — She stiffens up and/or assumes a military posture while in your presence.
- Playfully or nervously touching her hair, face, or neck.
- Breathing patterns change, either deeply, erratically, or dramatically (e.g. gasping, mouth breathing, sharp inhalation, shortness of breath, etc.).
- Increased pulse rate. You can feel this if you have the chance to hold her wrist, or put your forearm around her neck.

- Touching your body casually — brushing against you while passing, sitting next to you with body contact, etc.
- Touching your body intentionally or playfully, especially your arms, chest, shoulders, or head.
- Soon after meeting you, she starts paying more attention to her appearance, e.g. getting her hair done, wearing makeup, buying new clothes, dressing more attractively, etc.

Situational IOI's

- Chewing food with her mouth open when she's sitting near a guy she likes at a restaurant. (To make sure she's not an uncultured, low-IQ cow, watch how she behaves when he is not around, or ask her friends if she usually has this habit.)
- Deviating from her schedule to spend (more) time with you (e.g. leaving work early, staying up late, etc.).
- Going out of her way to interact with you, like crossing the street, or breaking away from her circle of friends.
- Losing her train of thought while talking to you, especially mid-sentence.
- Sitting near you when given a choice of sitting elsewhere.
- Unnecessary or exaggerated acts of kindness or service. For example, giving you a gift out of the blue; Serving you a drink on her own initiative.

Verbal IOI's

- Asking for help — Example: "Would you help me move some furniture?" or "Would you come help me bring the tea into the living room?"
- Coded Speech — She says something that has a double meaning. Example: "I'm always available." This falls under plausible deniability, but if she does it frequently, it's an IOI.
- Freudian Slips (AKA parapraxis) – Casually and innocently using a word which sounds similar to the word intended, but which reveals her deeper psyche. For example, she says, "I'm twenty-sex years old… I mean, twenty-six." Or "Would you like to go over me again?" (Using "me" instead of "it".)
- Loaded Language — Rhetoric used to influence an audience by using words and phrases with strong connotations associated with them in order to invoke an emotional response and/or exploit stereotypes. For example, saying your name or the pronoun "you" in a drawn out, emotionally flighty, or flattering way. Or if she says, "It's sooo hawt in here!", it could be an IOI.

- Nicknames — Using terms of endearment, especially pet names or flattering nicknames.
- Pointed Suggestions — Example: "I like to play tennis. Maybe you should try playing tennis (with me) sometime."
- Secret Language — She says something that either implies something else or has an esoteric meaning known only to you, which brings to mind an earlier conversation or interaction you had together.
- Subliminal Speech — A language of the heart that is extremely rare and hard to explain. Only very intelligent and sophisticated women do this. I've never seen it described anywhere.
- Suggestive Innuendos — Examples: "Maybe I'll see you there!" or "If you need anything, I'm just a phone call away!"
- Word Semantics — Playing with fuzzy semantics to form suggestive euphemisms. For example, if she just spilled her drink all over her dress, instead of saying, "I need to go clean up", etc., she says, "I need to take this dress off." A woman will often do this not only to flirt, but also to test your intelligence, your level of experience, and your awareness.

Tips for Detecting and Reading IOI's

- Watch for IOI's using your peripheral vision.
- Be aware of when you can feel the weight of her stare.
- The best IOI's from the best quality women (available to you) are given when she's unaware of sending you an IOI.
- No one woman will show all of these IOI's. Her personality determines which set of IOI's she displays. Extroverted personalities will be more expressive and animated, while introverted ladies will show IOI's indicating her amusement.
- Her psychological state also has an impact. For example, if she's sad or depressed, then IOI's will be curtailed. Also of note, women who are intoxicated will show IOI's more freely and be less discriminating in who they show them to.
- IOI's that are blatantly obvious should be interpreted as a red flag. For example, I worked at a summer camp when I was in college. On one occasion, the head cook (40-ish and married) asked me to accompany her to deliver some food. On the way back, she casually asked me, "Wanna climb in the back of the truck and ride me?" I laughed it off as a joke. She was probably just checking her own SMV, but I'm sure she was half-serious.

Tips for making yourself more likely to Receive and Detect IOI's

These achievements alone will do miracles for your ability to detect IOI's.

- Learn to be heart-led. Don't get lost in the vanity of your mind.
- Develop your spiritual discernment and wisdom to know what's going on around you.
- Be consciously aware of your desire. Accept it as a part of your nature.
- Become comfortable with your body and appearance. Dress better if necessary.
- Love yourself (and her) enough to act with grace and dignity.
- Value yourself enough not to chase after low hanging fruit.
- Respect yourself enough not to waste your time pursuing any woman who is married, or who isn't giving you clear IOI's from the get go.
- Trust God with yourself (i.e. your sexual nature). Don't kill opportunities before they appear.

Note: I may edit or add to this list in the future.

Related

- Σ Frame: List of Slut Tells (2017/10/15)
- Σ Frame: 8 Examples of IOI Word Semantics (2020/7/8)
- Σ Frame: Handling an IOI requires a Miracle! (2020/7/17)
- Σ Frame: A Man's Ability to Read IOIs Depends on Having a Firm Grasp on His Personal Archetypal Mythos (2021/6/21)
- Σ Frame: A Cross-Sectional Study of Situational IOIs (2023/9/8)
- Σ Frame: The Green Line Test (2023/9/17)
- Σ Frame: The Applied ¡ScIeNcE! of IOIs cannot be independently confirmed (2023/9/26)
- Σ Frame: Summary of IOIs and Vetting (2023/10/30)

The War on Ideals

Jack · 1 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

What is the value and purpose of having an ideal? What is the proper place of ideals?

Readership: All; Christians;

Quoted texts have been adapted below in an easy-to-read format.

> We should have ideals, in the sense of something unreachable on this plane. Society needs something out of reach to which people aspire. People who give up because it is out of reach are wrong people; they need fixing or marginalizing so they don't hurt the rest of us. We need a vision of what could be, in theory. The problem is we keep ginning up our own theories. Not only to do we ignore the image granted by the Creator of all things, but we see humanity fighting it tooth and nail. This is the part which makes it out of reach, makes it an aspiration.
>
> We know humanity, granted a near perfect setting with all the proper intellectual background and cultural experience necessary to understand God's Laws, will still turn away from it. Some nations do so more readily than others, and God's prophets indicated Israel was probably the worst. They had the truth, exclusively granted by God Himself into their hands, and kept trying to bury it so they could ignore it. Even with all the best humanity could know and understand, forcing them to see it won't change a thing. Truth by itself is simply not enough. It requires something mankind cannot obtain without divine help.
>
> So we learn the prophets like Micah raised a standard literally beyond human reach in order to make it clear it has to come from God, not from us. Sure, we could approach it, and probably gain quite a bit, but we'll never actually get there on this fallen plane. We have to obtain it on a different level. So the prophets promised this thing would surely come, but they knew better in their own hearts than to expect a literal fulfillment.
>
> Still, the issue is not fixing problems, but building a proper norm. This is the second thing Micah raises. Man's instinct is to wait until something comes up, then react. This is simply backwards, a perversion of what God revealed. We have to be proactive in grasping His Laws with our minds and hearts, then proactive in building a normal society as He defines it. Again, we know we will never actually arrive there on this earth, but we also know we can aim for it and keep trying. God promises to fill in the rest inasmuch as He demonstrated with Israel when they were faithful. All those grand miracles were part of His promises to any person or group who embraces His ways. ~ Ed Hurst [1]

> "…we currently live in the world that is the final result of an all-out war on ideals, and scratching back to those will take effort.
>
> The reason we have a war on ideals is because the concept of an ideal is an offensive anathema to most people around us. Having an ideal means that if you did not meet it, you are being judged. It hurts people's feelings to be compared to an ideal that they did not obtain. But beyond that, even if we could stop the hemorrhaging of the beautiful, the ideal and sublime by simply getting our guttural society out of that mindset, we would not agree on WHAT those ideals are, and HOW to obtain them.
>
> So, I continue to offer my ideals, my path to get back them. Readers can say it's too slow, its making a deal with the devil, it's moral relativism. Whatever…" ~ Scott [2]

Jack [2]: "The war on ideals…" – This is basically what young people are up against. One's focus should be on the mission that God outlines for one's life, but we (as a culture) can't get to that point because we don't even know what to believe anymore. There needs to be a standard, a structure, an ideal, to serve as a foundation to launch from. For Christians, this should be the Word of God, but even though many Christians might subscribe to the Word as an ideal, the conditions on the ground are too messy to make any sense of its practical implementation.

The Takeaway

Many large businesses have a habit of analyzing their core ideals for the sake of philosophical unity within the company culture. But have religious institutions ever done the same?

If a church ever took the effort to identify, not what they cognitively believe, but that which they believe in practice, they may find some room for improvement.

The same goes for the individual man. If you would ever keep a journal, or analyze your emotions, like anger, sadness, resentment, joy, etc., or meditate on your motivations, or study why things happen as they do (and not as you might expect), then you may discover that you are not the person you presume to be. If this is the case, then maybe you're too far off the ideal, or maybe you've been clinging to the wrong ideal for someone of your particular personality and/or calling in life.

It's time to go back to the basics and realign our reality into one in which it is at least possible to reach some semblance of the God-ordained ideal.

References

1. Radix Fidem: Ideals and Norms in Micah (2012-8-5)
2. From the discussion under Σ Frame: Sexual Compatibility is dependent on Sanctification (2020-3-2)

Related

- Σ Frame: Fighting Fires (2020-3-20)

On the Significance and Value of the Meet Cute Experience

Jack · 3 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Under what circumstances is a Meet Cute of crucial importance?

Readership: Christians; Men;

A Summary of the "Meet Cute" Discussion

Starting with Scott's post, Probabilities (2020-2-24), there began a debate, largely between Scott and Derek, about the importance and value of the Meet Cute experience.

As I was following this discussion, I found that both sides had noteworthy points, and recognized that neither side was entirely right or wrong. Since then, I've been contemplating how this might be sorted out.

In a follow up study of Scott's posts, Trajectories (2020-2-28), I made a comparison between two life trajectories, a legalistic path on the one hand, and a hedonistic path at the other end of the spectrum. It was presumed that if a man wishes to have a fulfilling marriage and family, he should shoot for a trajectory somewhere in between these two extremes.

But the next question was, what does this trajectory look like from the ground? A legalist is focused on remaining inside the confines of moral acceptability and on maintaining his own righteousness. A hedonist is focused on maximizing his own pleasure and expanding his life experiences. But what does a man aiming for an ideal trajectory focus on?

At first glance, we might think he should be focused on Christ, or his God-ordained purpose in life, or on preparing himself for marriage. But for a young, inexperienced person, these goals are almost just as nebulous.

To fill in this blank, I'll offer a brief list of tasks a young man can focus on that should take him in the right direction.

- Building character.
- Developing charisma.
- Coming to terms with himself.
- Earning an education and preparing for a career.
- Developing an abundance mindset as opposed to a poverty mindset.
- Maintaining good nutrition and developing physical strength and health.

Although the above things can certainly help, they are woefully insufficient to get one into the elite Christian married club, as Jason has adamantly pointed out.

I believe the main difference between Scott's and Derek's stances is in the values and norms proscribed by the non-shared environmental socialization factors, including the perceived ideal, and this is combined with one's individual locus of passion and purpose for living. Thus, all the argumentation is centered around the discussion of various elements of an underlying hierarchy of values and ideals. I will explain this in the remainder of this essay.

Biblical Courtship is not Perceivable to the Majority

Those of us who have been following Christian Red Pill sites for a while are well aware of how the church in the west is converged. That is to say, it has very few identifying characteristics which distinguish itself from the wider secular culture. This convergence extends to include the expected (but unspoken) norms for "dating" and romance.

Moreover, there are a plethora of influences pushing us into fornication, and setting us up to fail. These influences include gynocentric cultural norms, converged churchianity, well-meaning but ignorant friends, our own fleshly nature, and for some, their own family members too. To make matters worse, these influences are quick to shame us if we fail to either (1) have Meet Cute opportunities, or (2) take advantage of those opportunities. The only other option is to become a prudish legalistic hermit, which was essentially the outcome of the Purity Movement, and it has also been argued that this path might be even worse, because there is no opportunity to experience God's grace and learn something from your choices.

This is why Bruce Batsche summed up the past discussion as,

> "…current conditions incentivize men seeking a good marriage (good by male standards anyway) to fornicate. As Scott said (more or less) somewhere, the best way to ensure marriage to a woman who wants you forever is to choose one who wants to fornicate with you a lot over an extended "courtship" (my interpretation of what he said). Hard for a woman to fake genuine desire for an extended period of time. So a Christian is incentivized to sin to get a good marriage – twisted really."

But I have to point out, this has only become necessary because it is the norm, and there are virtually no other options available to the average man, short of converting to be Amish (or its near cousin, Mennonite, such as brother Derek).

So for a man in this situation, Scott's advice becomes highly relevant:

1. Find a woman who is really crazy about you, a Meet Cute who is consistently displaying IOI's.
2. You need to be on the edge of losing your self-control, which is an indication that (1) you need to be married, and also that (2) you have the necessary degree of desire for her.
3. You need to keep a clear head and vet her on many other checkpoints. Deep Strength has offered a large number of posts dedicated to the task of wife vetting.
4. Be sensitive to the feedback you might receive from trusted friends, family members, and those in your faith community.
5. Plan for a wedding and resist having sex before the big day.

Bruce and probably others have thought or said to look for a woman who wants to fornicate with you. This is not exactly right, and I think this is just a male view of the situation. If a woman is intentionally trying to fornicate with you, that should be taken as an orange flag. You don't want a woman who rushes into a sexual relationship without any qualms. Such a woman is probably not inexperienced. The idea here is that the woman should have a spontaneous, genuine enthusiasm about showing natural physical affection to you, like she can't keep her hands off of you, she wants to hold hands or kiss… Immature women might show their attachment by getting jealous, making petulant demands, or $h!t testing you.

But the thing that everyone seems to miss is that it is possible to love someone, and to be "in love" with someone, without having sex. It is possible for a woman to be in love and not be focused on the sexual. But we are inundated with the half-baked argument that love is a justifiable reason for having sex, and this blurred understanding has blinded the eyes of many once-innocent souls.

For instance, the verbs "date" and "marry" are too often used as euphemisms for sexual relations. It would be much more honest if people really said what they mean in this regard. As a result of this misnomenclature, "I love you" is commonly interpreted to mean, "I wanna shag you!" But this debases the glory of loving others and being loved.

Problems with the Meet Cute experience

If we reconsider the SMP from both the male and female perspectives, and from both the high and low SMV male perspectives, we discover the inherent errors of the cultural norm.

Consider this. If a young man of average SMV falls in love with a girl, then that is usually seen as an embarrassing inconvenience. But if a girl gets her panties soaked for a man, then we invariably see what Scott described in a recent comment: $h!ts and giggles from friends setting them up to be alone, followed by playful touching, then sneaking off, kissing underneath the bleachers, and so on. And all this inevitably leads to sexual adventures — riding high in the back of the truck under the moonlight, escapades on magic blankets in beautiful secluded spots, etc.

Of course, the Meet Cute experience only happens to high SMV men.

The reason I find this interesting is because if a man is really bonkers about the girl, then we have the potential for a marriage commitment from him, which is labeled "good" by Christians. But when the girl's feelings take center stage, then we have the makings of delicious, illicit (to coin a new word: illicious) sex, which is portentously labeled "evil" by Christians. So why then do we see practically everyone, Christians included, encouraging Meet Cute's when they happen? Are they hoping that the man will get hooked on the sex and pursue marriage with her? But if he isn't eager to marry the ho, then that renders him as a bad boy? But if he does choose to stay with her, or even marry her, and she loses the Tingles later on, then it must be because he's selfish and incompetent and so deserves to be thrown aside? These are the opinions we are used to hearing, even within the church. But obviously, we're stuck in first gear with this rhetoric because no one is thinking that far ahead.

We're still only talking about high SMV men. Low SMV men are invisible to women.

Derek's stance hereby becomes evident – that the present cultural emphasis on (her) feelings of sexual attraction is faulty.

Ultimately, a Meet Cute is a high SMV man's challenge to find Christ.

In conclusion, the Biblical conscription of marriage is d@mn near impossible to attain through an independent discovery.

A Hierarchy of Ideals

So what makes Derek or Ed so special, that they could attain an "ideal" Biblical marriage?

For Derek, I would have to conclude that it was an absence of the negative influences described above, and the presence of positive influences that gave Derek a trajectory that is close to the ideal. Namely, having a Christian community that offers real opportunities for viable pairings at an early age, and which offers the correlating teaching and guidance to move towards marriage, are absolutely necessary to enter into a fulfilling Christ-centered marriage.

For Ed, he summed up his approach in terms of finding a helper for his divinely ordained purpose in life.

> "The thing that Scott's article brings to mind for me is that very few men in our society are trained to think in terms of having a mission in life that would outlive you. More to the point, they have no idea what it looks like in a woman, so they can't identify a prospective wife who will be supportive of that mission far, far down the road. How I learned it as a young man, I'm not sure I can explain, but it was a major criteria when I decided to marry."

I suppose it is possible for a man to make it on Christ alone, but not probable, given the average level of maturity.

Thus, those who are without a strong internal sense of Christian purpose, and those who are lacking the constant, caring support of a network of wise believers, the choices for men default to the following,

1. Hunt the world over for a submissive, obedient virgin to wife up, who is also willing to marry you and have your babies.
2. Meet Cute and explore in the hope that you'll wind up there eventually. The usual pitfalls can be expected – jealousy, STD's, out of wedlock births, divorce, etc.
3. Withdrawal, isolation, masturbation.

Red Pilled Dad (R.P. McMurphy) describes Why deregulation of SMP makes pairing up hard. (2020 March 31)

Note 1: In the western MMP, the outcome of option 1 is likely to be the same as option 3.

Note 2: If a young man actually goes abroad in his search for a wife, the outcome of option 1 is the same as option 2.

> "I heard pollution in the world is way down because everybody is staying inside masturbating right now. Which got me thinking… hear me out here, but I'm pretty sure I'm right about this. I think… I think coronavirus was created and released by Greta Thunberg in an attempt to combat climate change. You heard it hear first."

Conclusions

Derek argued that the overall marital satisfaction is not necessarily dependent on the intensity and frequency of sexual passion. Derek summed up his position as,

> "So precisely, my personal stance is that the Meet Cute approach can be beneficial or detrimental, but that—in comparison—respecting one's vows is more important. Jason's stance is, as far as I can tell from witnessing dozens or hundreds of marriages, is the most important component of a successful marriage."

Jason's stance is cited as follows.

> "One of the most plain truths I got from the bible was "have your yes mean yes and your no mean no" […] My parents knew each other six months and married. My mom always said "your father and I never kept a match or score on each other." My dad always said "Your mother and I just took our wedding vows seriously. It was a promise before family, friends and god. It was just understood, and especially after your older brother… we only had each other… we had to make it work."

The difficulties with Derek's argument includes the following.

1. It requires a community of mature believers offering constant instruction and guidance to a pool of young people large enough to allow assortative pair selection – something 95+% of men these days don't have, and never will have.
2. The approach of unwavering commitment and devotion relies heavily on vows and willpower, which are insufficient without the help of the Holy Spirit. In other words, this method would be a hard grind for unbelievers, and unlikely to attract their longitudinal adherence.

There is one point of overarching importance: Commitment may be significantly less challenging if a man seriously considers his God-ordained mission in life, and considers the suitability of a particular, potential wife with respect to her ability to play the role of a helper and companion to him in that mission.

For those men who cannot achieve Derek's approach, presumably because of the lack of maturity and a supporting network of believers, Scott's approach towards marriage becomes the next best option.

Scott's main position is that a wife's (sexual) enthusiasm has to be present from the onset, and if it is not, it is highly unlikely to suddenly materialize eight years down the road. Scott also argued that one major benefit of the Meet Cute path is that the sex is likely to be regular and rather satisfying. The marriage covenant is better maintained through regular sexual intercourse, and if the woman has a high level of enthusiasm for having sex with her husband, then this contributes to the stability and satisfaction of the marriage.

The problem with Scott's position is that it relies heavily upon emotional bonding, and while this can be quite strong, it is not consistent over time as it tends to wane. At some point, commitment through thick or thin will need to emerge among the top shared values, and the difficulty of making this transition may prove to be the fatal hiccup for the union.

One positive aspect of Scott's position is that it allows a man to gain an added appreciation of the grace of God.

The cultural norm, including the Meet Cute phenomenon, all seems easily understandable to us, maybe even inspirational. Many readers may relate to Scott's testimony because they have fond memories of past experiences. But we should be aware that we might find it easy to accept this as fact, merely because we are familiar with it. But in fact, this process is not God's ideal. It has a high likelihood of failure, as Scott has attested, and it is fraught with heartache and frustration, mainly because it does not place Christ first.

Remember, a Meet Cute is a special case scenario which is glorified as the romantic norm.

Of note, the inherent power structure of both paths conform to the God-honoring Respect Model of courtship.

Another key problem with both paths is that the longitudinal outcome of the marriage goes back to what Sharkly said under "Probabilities":

> "Relationships are not usually controlled by what you do as a man and a leader, the relationship is always controlled by the least emotionally mature partner. The relationship cannot grow above the point that the least mature partner will not sustain. So, if the man is the weak link, he can improve things, by getting his act together. But, in our generation, most of the time, the entitled victim spoiled feminist goddess (daughter of the King) is the more emotionally stunted one. So, almost all progress in the marriage is dependent on her maturing in Christ. You as a husband can do cartwheels, send smoke signals, hire a psychologist, call a prayer meeting, drop hints, but until your wife chooses to grow up, or has an epiphany, you're stuck having the level of development in your marriage dictated by that rebellious immature girl's selfish choices."

Given that the adolescent libido peaks long before emotional maturity is achieved, most young people are like a child playing with a loaded weapon. All the pressures, all the responsibilities, and they don't know what they're doing.

Related

- Σ Frame: Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (2018 October 3)
- Σ Frame: The True Ontology of Power (2019 May 16)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Courtship and Power (2020 February 17)

Hopelessness

Jack · 6 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Man up and Meet Cute, or muckrake and masturbate. Either option is hopeless.

Readership: Men;

Introduction

Scott's post about the Meet Cute phenomenon, and a few follow ups which have examined this idea further, have dropped a figurative bombshell on the Σ Frame blog.

1. Σ Frame (Scott): Probabilities (2020-2-24)
2. Σ Frame (Scott): Opportunities (2020-2-26)
3. Σ Frame: Trajectories (2020-02-28)
4. Christianity and Masculinity: Meet Cutes – Are they common? (2020-3-13)
5. Σ Frame: List of Female IOI's (2020-03-30)
6. Σ Frame: On the Significance and Value of the Meet Cute Experience (2020-4-3)
7. Radix Fidem: Marriage: Path through the Shadows (2020-4-4)

From post (6), we found that there are three fundamental qualities that are absolutely necessary to make a marriage work over the long haul.

1. Commitment
2. Maturity
3. Trusting in the Holy Spirit

But these are confounded respectively because of the following.

1. Youthful foolishness and confusion, as well as the weaknesses of the flesh and the will to do right.
2. Sexual libido peaks before emotional maturity occurs.
3. Faith (and one's sense of purpose) is weak before spiritual maturity can be attained.

The above conditions require a family and a community of believers offering constant guidance and instruction to young people in order to produce a stable marriage. But this is a lost social art. In addition, there are many influences present that set us up to fail.

Scott's main point about the Meet Cute phenomena is that the woman's level of sexual attraction is important to the long-term health of a marriage, and it has to be present from the outset, and it has to be maintained.

I agree with him on this point, and I think the real value of this insight is specifically for younger men who are faced with the challenge of choosing a suitable spouse, but who don't have a Christian social support group to help them through the process. They're not going to wait for society to reform itself before they sow their oats.

It should be emphasized that having a Meet Cute experience does not discount the many other things that are necessary to build a good marriage, and it does take time and effort. It's just one thing that needs to be highlighted as important.

However, this information has proved to be very disheartening to many men, not only to single men who've never experienced a "Meet Cute", but also to those men who have a less-than-satisfying marriage.

The Nu-Clear Bomb Explodes

Jason has emphasized that placing any importance on having a Meet Cute experience is nuclear bomb to many men's hopes of having a fulfilling relationship. His main point of contention (I think) can be summed up in this statement.

> "The message he's spreading IS basically hopelessness for those in marriages where maybe the attraction wasn't that strong at first. And he's totally throwing out the reality that women have personal and spiritual agency to make choices to be easier to live with… like his own wife finally chose to do, which sounds like it was a miracle."

I am aware of this sense of hopelessness because of my own experiences.

I grew up in a home that was "emotionally dead" (according to my sister's description), and my parents divorced while I was in college. (Yes, it was my mother who filed the papers, which fits the RP stereotype.) For many years, I subconsciously carried the notion that if I had my own wife in marriage, then I could make up for all the love I had missed out on in my childhood. But this was a false hope.

Marriage and family is, or should be, the primary vehicle which God uses to fulfill our needs for love and belonging, especially for children. And when this is absent, abnormal, or dysfunctional, we fail to experience the glory and presence of God. We fail learn the truth about God and life, and so we suffer and fail in life.

In a heart-felt recognition of this truth, people (including myself when I was younger) tend to have a child-like, idealistic view of marriage as some monolithic entity that should just "be" a solution to all our needs and expectations for love and belonging. But it is not the marriage or family itself that creates hope, it is the presence of God that is manifested in the home of a spiritually mature, well-paired couple. But for those who never experienced the fullness of this, the default assumption is to think it is a spouse, or a marriage that is the missing piece. (BTW, Scott has an upcoming post which describes his own experience with this.)

The current atomization of marriage in the west is working overtime to dispel this myth.

You see, a lot of our hopes for marriage are actually false hopes, and these false hopes need to be upset and revised before we can get down to the nuts and bolts of living out our lives.

The Demolition Derby

Derek has propped up our hope by consistently downplaying the importance of having a Meet Cute towards achieving a successful marriage.

Derek probably isn't aware of this, but the popularity he has experienced as a potential husband, and the success he has achieved in marriage, along with his emanating viewpoints, were entirely due to the support of the social community of which he was a part, and were not so much based on his attributes as an individual man. (I don't intend to be an @$$ by pointing this out.) He inadvertently confirmed this when he wrote,

> "It's becoming a too common criticism that if I had followed the advice on this blog, I wouldn't have married. This is a real problem. I can't recall ever receiving any of the IOIs in this list (maybe I forgot one or two?). Despite all that, I somehow managed to get two women to want to marry me."

Derek's statement stands as a testament that in the past the grand majority of men were hugely dependent upon the social structure of their society to help them navigate through the process of assortative mating and finding a wife. That kind of social entourage continues to survive in microcultures like the Amish or Mennonites, but within the wider society, this social structure is totally extinct, and so men are now hard pressed to compete with each other for the meager left-over mating opportunities. The loss of culture is the thing that is truly hopeless, and not so much the "man up and Meet Cute" news as some suppose, because this too may soon slip into history.

One might think that Derek is encouraging false hope by maintaining that a man in the current western MMP can achieve a successful marriage without doing the "man up and Meet Cute" bit. But if we recognize the value of his testimony within its proper context, we see that it's not false at all – it's just out of reach to the average man.

On this point, Derek wrote,

> "As Jason has noted on a hundred occasions, the invisible 3/10 man isn't going to be able to improve to the 9/10 that every woman notices when he enters the room, no matter how much they follow the "alpha / Game / Frame / social cues / the secret language of women playbook." It is not honest to blame men because women don't find them attractive or tell them that all they have to do is change their physical appearance, etc."

Let's break this down further. Consider the following truth statements.

1. If you "man up and Meet Cute" then you can have a snickerdoodle marriage.
2. Only those who can "man up and Meet Cute" have a ghost of a chance in ɦəll at marriage.

It is not honest to tell men (1) if that inspires false hope. It's more honest to openly discuss (2) as the current reality, especially if that destroys false hope.

Let the chips fall where they may.

So we come to the question, what makes any particular hope true for some men, but false for others?

Crushing the Great Divide

Jason wrote the following response (edited for clarity) to my own brief testimony of how I struggled to achieve an abundance mentality.

> "Jack, you and I are just going to disagree. I have lived Scott's description of not meeting cute… You say you agree and then tell us there is a way."

Of course, my testimony is just one data point on a scatterplot. Derek's is another. Scott's is a third. Jason's a fourth, Deep Strength, Roosh, etc. No man's experience is identical to another's. It's hard to write about this, because this issue is very complex and nuanced, and difficult to sort out. I have to oversimplify it to some degree. It's too easy to talk past one another.

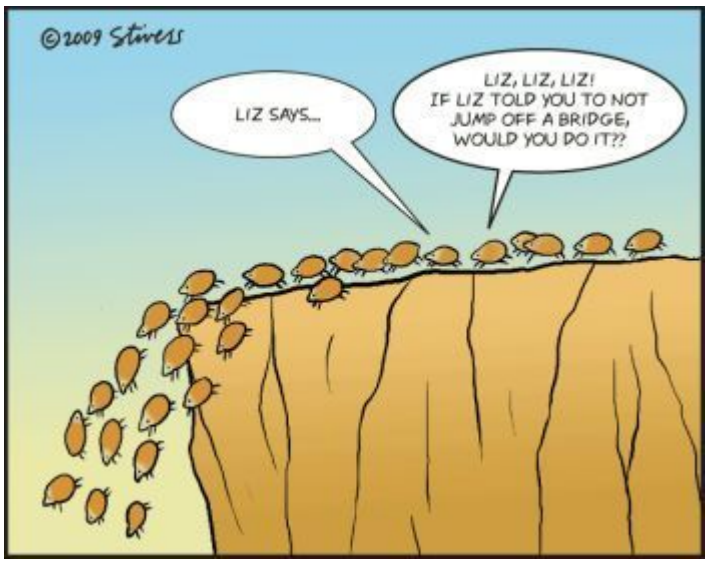
Jason continued,

> "Knowing your place is another thing. If you are indeed a low level guy, you are not going to become a top tier one, especially if you're over the age of 35. That's lying to yourself. It's not healthy and it's not living in reality."

Yes, one thing is for sure, we can't simply tell men to follow an order of procedure and expect every man to get the same results. Some men need to give up the same hopes that other men need to cling to as if their souls depended on it.

> "No. I learned my limits. I knew what I was good at or not. You are doing a disservice to older single men by giving them false hope. That causes the anger. The bile.
>
> You wonder why MGTOW and various movements have grown. You're part of this."

Yes, unfulfilled desires are a B!@tch. But ultimately, I believe God's purpose in all of this is for us to learn how to depend on Christ alone. You can't really get to this state just from praying and studying the Bible. I suppose there are a few who have done it this way, but for most, you have to do the hard messy work of overcoming.



What is involved with the task of revising our hope?

The overarching goal for us as Christian men is to incorporate the peace and presence of God into our lives. How this might be done for any particular man is unique to the individual.

1. For many single men, this might include taking the Black Pill and facing the unpleasant fact that marriage is not a necessary nor realistic option.
2. For higher SMV single men, this might include the relatively more difficult process of coming to terms with themselves, and working through their opportunities to find out exactly what they might be capable of achieving. The thing that makes this path difficult is that during the time it takes for this to happen, the subjective legitimacy of one's hope is held in limbo.
3. For married men, this would take the form of letting go of certain expectations and seeing our spouse for who they really are, and doing the hard work of washing them clean and building them up accordingly.

As for me, I have gone through several states of hopelessness as I passed through different stages of life. Recently, I have learned to focus more on fulfilling my role as a husband and serving my wife's needs. This actually helps my wife do more of the same, and our relationship has slowly improved over time.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Three Step Path to God (2018-9-27)
- Σ Frame: Lest we forget, Marriage was once intended to Glorify God (2019-8-8)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Understanding the right hierarchy for men unsuccessful with women (2020 April 3)

What's good for the goose is bad for the gander.

Jack · 8 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A discussion of the Faithlessness of Immaturity and the Hopelessness of Gender Inequality.

Readership: The Married; Men interested in LTR's; Christians;

Note: The original proverb is, "Sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander". John Ray included this expression in his 1678 proverb collection and termed it "a woman's Proverb". An early assertion of sexual equity, it has since been applied both in instances of male and female and in more general terms.

In a previous post, This means WAR!!! (2019 December 19), I described a rather embarrassing interaction with my wife, but I thought it good to share because it was an excellent example of a technique in Wife-Management which I called, "Pushing the Line" (2018 February 27).

My wife is one of those people who, when she is good, she is very, very good, and when she is bad, she is horrid!

Nikolai Vladivostok from Soviet Men left the following reaction.

> "Imagine if you'd been the one who got drunk, received happy messages from your old college friend, then got envious and starting blaming your wife for your comparative dissatisfaction and worked yourself up into such a fury that you started cursing her. And then starting throwing things on the floor in a rage, including her phone.
>
> And then scowled at her the next day when she mentioned it instead of immediately sobering up, abjectly apologizing, getting her a fantastic new phone and promising on your life never to do such a stupid thing again. And hoping like hell that she'd eventually forgive you. Oh, and promising to get your drinking and temper under control, and taking proactive steps towards doing that.
>
> Imagine instead that you needed your wife to find the right moment to coax you into doing what you obviously needed to do as a responsible adult. Imagine, when she so coaxed you, that you initially defended yourself by again blaming her for all the problems in your life as the good reason why you needed to break her phone.
>
> In the two months since the incident, imagine you kept whining about her cooking or cleaning or something, instead of acting like you're in the doghouse.
>
> I think if you smashed your wife's phone on the ground two months previously, you would not have cheerfully forgotten about it. Rather, it would be weighing heavily upon your mind."

Nikolai is using the logical technique of Role Reversal, a classic approach in the men's sphere. Next, he poses the following, very sobering questions that I've pondered many times over the course of my marriage.

> "Taken together, would you consider this acceptable behaviour on your part? Would she have been unreasonable to have walked out on you? What would your family have said if they found out you'd smashed your wife's phone in an envious, drunken rage, and blamed her for all your unhappiness? What would your friends have said? Your readers?
>
> If it would not be acceptable behaviour from you, why is it okay from her? Do you expect less from women in general? Or do you think you're not worthy of greater respect than this?"

To answer Nikolai's question about putting the shoe on the other foot, if I was the more immature person, then I would want my spouse to stick with me while I was maturing.

As a Christian, I have to believe in the sanctity of marriage. But to be honest, at times like this, I do find myself thinking, "Why should I put up with all this $#!+? What am I getting out of this? How does this glorify God or fulfill His will?”

AWALT

> “My blood is still boiling because you’re obviously a decent bloke who deserves much better. You are perfectly within your rights to demand better behaviour, not coax it, because you’d never expect anyone to put up with such bullshit from yourself. Not one tenth of it.
>
> That you did not seem shocked in this story suggests that this is a pattern of behaviour that you have become accustomed to. I am writing this comment, with the roles reversed, so that you might see it as an outsider would.
>
> Finally, I’m confused as to why other commenters were so blase about it. Especially Adam – I thought he’d be the one giving you this screed. What the hell is going on.”

The reason why other commenters were not surprised is basically because AWALT. The exceptions to this rule fall into generally three categories, for better or for worse.

1. Depression, dysthymia, or some other psychological condition.
2. The woman’s true nature is repressed due to cultural conditioning, which may involve a legalistic adherence to religious principles, and/or a long standing fear of punishment.
3. The woman has achieved a noteworthy level of spiritual and emotional maturity.

The first state is a mental disorder, and a person with such a condition should be rejected as a potential mate. If you’re already married to such a person, then you have basically two choices.

1. Bear the burden. Stick with the person and tough it out. Seek help. Pray for their recovery. Hope for the best.
2. Dump the sad sack and go find someone better.

Of course, the Christian choice would be the first.

The second state listed earlier might appear favorable, but it’s a time bomb waiting for the right combination of conditions before it goes off in a fit of dissipation.

The third state is rare and precious, because it requires a lifetime of investment from her family and social community, as well as a long series of good decisions on her part, starting from adolescence. This state is the most favorable option when choosing a potential LTR partner. One potential problem with this state is that it is entirely up to the good will of the woman (and the grace of God) for her to continue in this state.

Women are wild geese, and so is a marriage to one

You might think you know a woman before you get married, but you don't really know what marriage will be like until after you've been married a few years. Also, marriage changes people, and you don't know whether those changes will be positive or negative. I believe marriage is supposed to minimize the number of random variables, but you still don't know the values of those variables.

You won't really know until the end of your life when all is said and done, after you invest your years into whatever you've chosen.

You don't know how many children you might have, or none at all.

For some women, you can't even know how chaste she is. You can't know if she has an IUD, or gets an abortion. There are too many unknowns.

Red flags might be indicators of something, but you don't always know whether those indicators are true, or if it's much worse than the indicators indicate. Red flag indicators are like scatterplot science. You never know if you have an outlier, or whether she's above or below the norm. Women's biology and even their cognizant awareness is designed to keep you in the dark. Feminine Machiavellianism, Solipsism, Gaslighting, and fitness tests make it all the more confusing.

My father once told me that it is impossible to know how good or bad your marriage is. Because you only have one wife, there's nothing you can compare your marriage to as a reference. All you can go on is your own subjective experience.

This form of blindness might either be a blessing, or an Achilles heel, depending on how mature your wife is.

Moreover, you don't know the performance of an investment until you cash out. Most investments fail, but some win big. How do you know the result? How do you know you would have done better with a different investment (woman)? How do you know you wouldn't have done any worse?

You just have to go on faith – and the willpower of commitment.

Conclusions

Concerning faith and commitment, Jason's and Derek's stance should take on a new significance in light of the above discussion. Derek said,

> "…the Meet Cute approach can be beneficial or detrimental, but that—in comparison—respecting one's vows is more important. Jason's stance is, as far as I can tell from witnessing dozens or hundreds of marriages, is the most important component of a successful marriage."

Jason's stance is as follows.

> "One of the most plain truths I got from the bible was "have your yes mean yes and your no mean no" […] My parents knew each other six months and married. My mom always said "your father and I never kept a match or score on each other." My dad always said "Your mother and I just took our wedding vows seriously. It was a promise before family, friends and god. It was just understood, and especially after your older brother… we only had each other… we had to make it work."

However, commitment in marriage is little more than a prison sentence if your wife is horrendously immature. Adam, being the good Catholic that he is, said he would have kicked her out. Sharkly's preconclusion under Probabilities (2020-2-24) also rings true here.

> "Relationships are not usually controlled by what you do as a man and a leader, the relationship is always controlled by the least emotionally mature partner. The relationship cannot grow above the point that the least mature partner will not sustain. So, if the man is the weak link, he can improve things, by getting his act together. But, in our generation, most of the time, the entitled victim spoiled feminist goddess (daughter of the > King) is the more emotionally stunted one. So, almost all progress in the marriage is dependent on her maturing in Christ. You as a husband can do cartwheels, send smoke signals, hire a psychologist, call a prayer meeting, drop hints, but until your wife chooses to grow up, or has an epiphany, you're stuck having the level of development in your marriage dictated by that rebellious immature girl's selfish choices."

But should I divorce my wife, kick her out, or abandon her because I can't tolerate her immaturity? Unfortunately (?), spiritual immaturity is not one of the reasons given in the Bible as a justification of divorce. Hence, the God-ordained prison sentence – or so it seems.

Sometimes, I feel I could sum up the majority of posts on this blog as, How to deal with a spiritually immature wife in a Christian manner.

Maintain Frame, experiment with Game… Suffer, hope, pray, wait…

A man really needs faith and a strong purpose to stick with it over the long haul.

I can see how this would seem utterly stupid to many men, but it certainly builds character, if nothing more.

Personally, I believe marriage is intended (maybe by God) to be a crucible of refinement leading to both our greater maturity. If you panic and cash in your investment at the worst time by getting out of the relationship, then you obviously take a loss, and you lose any earnings that may have come in the future.

I'm happy to report that I do see my wife continually making small advances in her spiritual life, gaining ground here and there in starts and bursts, although it does seem to happen at a snail's pace.

Rome wasn't built in a day.

Related

- Illimitable Men: The Nature of Women (2015-6-30)

Creativity is borne of necessity – and quarantine.

Jack · 10 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

On April 8th (which was a moon day), I contracted a very aggressive urinary tract infection which spread into the bloodstream causing septicemia. The doctor is working on a blood culture in order to find a proper antibiotic. The doctor says I will need to be hospitalized for 1-2 weeks or until the bacteria is completely gone.

As a consequence, I'm bedridden in the hospital right now, and feeling very weak, sore, and sleepy. I barely have enough strength to trudge to the toilet 3 meters away. I have a fever that comes and goes, so it's also hard to think straight.

Earlier this year, I made a goal to post something on Sigma Frame three times a week. As I recall, Adam admonished me to post regularly, as a way to be responsible to the readers. So I chose Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Up until now, I've found this goal to be challenging, but realistically doable. But even here in the hospital, I find this goal to be a good deal more challenging, but still doable.

I do have a couple pieces I was working on, but because of this sudden illness, I wasn't able to finish one for today.

So as I'm lying here in the hospital (on Good Friday), I'm wondering what I can post. All my writing projects are on my desktop computer at home. I'm nearly out of my mind with fever. This is a real challenge of creativity!

Stream of consciousness! A writing technique I learned in the 9th grade.

It will be funny to read this post in the future and see just how out of it I was at the time.

I understand that a lot of people around the world are in some sort of home or neighborhood quarantine right now. It is interesting how this has brought some good results. This is getting kids out of gang-ridden, homophilic, common core crap schools, it's bringing families closer together, and it is increasing the general creativity. Take a look at this guy's creation!

Unlike me, during this time of illness, my writings will lack the prolific linkage backup, picture stories, and beautiful formatting.

I will have something of more substance on Monday.

Take care of yourselves!

God doesn't care if you find a wife!

Jack · 13 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A wife is a stumbling block to the Americans, and foolishness to the Europeans.

Readership: Christians; Single men;

Many men have the notion that having a wife is what would make them happy. Men stubbornly cling to this notion even though the MMP is a d@mn shambles. Even men who escape from one horrible marriage, by hook or by crook, eagerly sign up to remarry another woman within a year or three. Hey stupid, it wasn't just her! The whole market is corrupt! And AWALT!

What does it take for a man to recover from wifitis? Here are a few case studies for your reading intrigue.

Case Study 1 – An excerpt from Walk Two Moons

> "When my mother had been there I was like a mirror. If she was happy I was happy. If she was sad I was sad. For the first few days after she left, I felt non-feeling. I didn't know how to feel. I would find myself looking around for her to see what I might want to feel.
>
> […]
>
> After the calf was born I thought, "Oh! I am happy at this moment in time!" and I was surprised that I knew this all by myself without my mother there. And that night in bed I did not cry. I said to myself, "You can be happy without her." It seems like a mean thought to have and I was sorry for it, but it felt so true."
>
> ~ page 35.

Growing up and realizing that you don't need Mom to be happy is like the sudden realization that you don't need a wife to be happy – and likewise, that you don't need God to give you a wife in order to be happy. A man who can get this impression may not be called to marry.

Case Study 2 — "God doesn't care..."

Remember that time when you were a kid and your grandmother took you to the store? You were all mouth watering, and weak in the knees to have the latest G.I. Joe chronoblitzer attack module playset, complete with the fully-cloaked jettison pod, and equipped with spyder-vision tractor beams (or WeverTH it was). She looked at the exorbitant price and solemnly said, "No!". Then you went on the warpath of dishonest discontent, saying, "Awww… You don't reeeally looove me… You don't reeeally caaare about me…" And at that righteous yet bewitching moment, grandma slung her lumpy, oversized purse, no doubt filled with beer bottles, bricks, an odd assortment of handtools, and a full set of Clydesdale horseshoes, to kiss your impertinent little $h!tface with the meanest left hook you never saw, sending your fat sorry @$$ sliding half-way down the floor of aisle 12. After shedding enough tears of repentance to wash the blood streak off the super-waxed floor, and mumbling "shorry mamaw…" through curds of bloody snot, she summarily dragged you out of the store by the ear – without any new toys for you to play with during your visit to her house.

…and then after returning to mamaw's home, you found greater joys playing with your uncle's 20-year-old toy tractors, and your cousin's 10-year-old Tonka Trucks.

Men can be the same way about wanting a wife. I call this state, "wifitis".

Jason wrote,

> "At least part of getting better (although I still have my rough days) in this area for me was knowing in these matters… God / Jesus / the saints / angels…whatever… don't care in these matters. They dont hem and haw over "he should have a wife". They couldn't care less."

I'll accept this as an emotional rant, because I've felt the same way in the past, and it proved to be an acceptance of my own hopelessness which then yielded a turn of repentance.

However, based on my experience, it is more truthful and accurate to say that "God doesn't care as much as I do about the idolatrous things that I have mistakenly deemed to be more important than what God warrants. There must be something else that is more important to God."

But how can one make himself stop caring about his idols? e.g. porn, chivalry, oneitis, wifitis, purity culture, G.I. Joe Attack Stations, … (Insert your own vice here).

Case Study 3 – "Why do I worry so much?"

The author of Wight of Leeds hit upon the same surprising truth, as described in his post, Why do I worry so much? (April 4, 2020).

> "What if I never find a wife? I'll become a cool old bachelor. What if I find a wife, but she divorces me for a stupid reason? I'll get over it.
>
> […]
>
> None of these are workable, detailed solutions, but they're also about as useful as worrying itself.
>
> At the end of the day, I'm saved and God is good. Does God care if I start a band, or find a wife, or get a degree? I don't know. Even if He doesn't… This may sound odd, but hearing the words "God doesn't care if you find a wife" fills me with a strange comfort, almost relief. Am I insane?

To answer the final question, I find it improbable, that any person who has ever had a real encounter with God could possibly go on about his life afterwards, without some aggrieving affliction or recurrent bouts of madness.

But does God really care or not? Is it really true, or a deceptive, feel-good lie?

As a factual statement, "God doesn't care if I find a wife" is not true. But as a visceral confession, it expresses the freedom in Christ.

Our sexual nature is a gift from God. What you do with this gift – your sexual nature – is up to you. God gives that choice to you, and this choice is also a gift. It's up to you what you do with that gift. Some will trade it in for wild profligacy and gain the pros and cons that come with that lifestyle. Others will cherish and preserve it, a choice also with it's own unique set of pros and cons. (Unfortunately, it has become extremely difficult to gain the pros from the latter choice.) But whatever you choose to do with it, it's yours – for better or for worse.

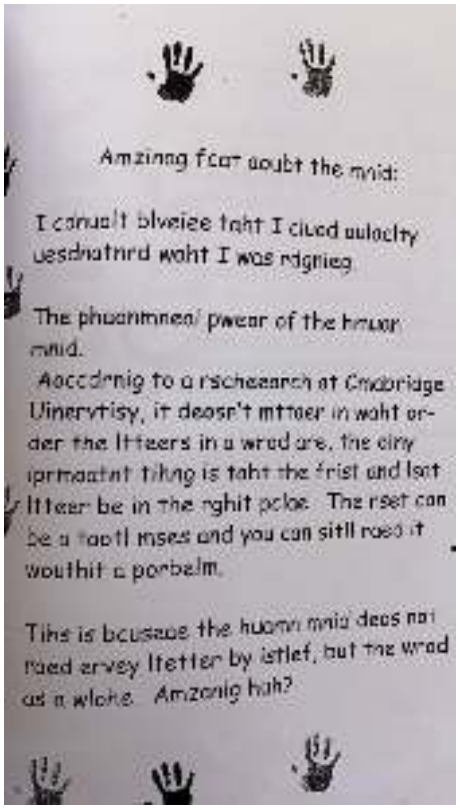
In this sense, There is no divine intervention which will coerce you to act against your will. It is that liberty in Christ which empowers our hearts.

In the sense employed by WoLs, the statement, "God doesn't care", is interpreted by the heart to mean, If God doesn't care, then there is no reason to worry about this. This epiphany also excuses the mind from a false sense of responsibility — that is to say, there is no amount of thinking and worrying that will entice a virgin bride to come into your bedchamber.

But the most striking impression is one of incongruity. If you have ever pondered upon this phenomenon before, you may have already found how it is no coincidence that a bewildered mind and a peaceful heart often go hand in hand. This aspect is further explored in the next case study.

Case Study 4 – The Azmanig Mnid

I shared this puzzle with some students. The Anzamig Mnid word puzzle is in English, but the letters are transposed into anagrams.



Some students could read it, while others could not, probably due to vocabulary deficiency. But one student (who could not read it) realized a deeper spiritual truth from this meme; It is not intended for one to understand the content of the message, but to understand the purpose for sharing it. That purpose would be for fun and hope. The fun comes from mixing up the letters. The hope is inspired by the consternation of the logical mind juxtaposed onto the simple trust of sharing the message. The latter is an aspect that would be totally lost on the western mind and dismissed as foolishness, just as it says in the Bible.

> "The gospel of Christ crucified is a stumbling block to the Jews, and foolishness to the Greeks."
>
> ~ 1 Corinthians 1:23

Conclusions

Some truth is recognizable only to the heart. The mind is not capable of framing certain truths into logical statements, and even when it can, the resultant statements may not be faithfully accurate to the truth it attempts to apprehend.

When you pray, do you speak in the logical language of your mind? Or do you explore the mystical utterances of the heart? The second approach will make your prayer life explode! Pray like this and you'll really get somewhere. I'm serious!

As for a man's actual need for a wife, various manosphere writers have made it clearly evident that in these times, a man needs a woman like he needs a perpetual drain on his livelihood. If our merciful God truly cares, He won't be bringing you a wife anytime before the Great Reset. But if you're still grumbling and stumbling for a wife, then pray for God to shorten these days of tribulation for the sanctification of the libidinous elect.

Related

- Crash the Matrix: The Pussy Bubble is Popping (2020-3-24)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Happy wife, happy life should be sanctified wife, joyful and peaceful life (2020-4-11)

Reevaluating the Centrality of the Male Ego

Jack · 15 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: Men and women in relationships;

Introduction

The sin of pride emanates from the deeper heart, and is commonly expressed through the ego. As a result of this association, the ego has garnered much criticism as a semblance of self-centered pride. This perspective has become so engrained in the English language that it has become difficult to discern the difference between haughty pride and the ego. For instance, the adjective Egotistical has gained the negative connotation of being self-aggrandizing and rude.

While the ego may indeed have some ugly characteristics, it is even worse to have a dysfunctional or under-developed ego.

A less myopic and more honest evaluation of the ego will simply identify it as a central defining feature of human psychology.

A more complete evaluation of the ego must recognize that it acts as a CPU of the soul, processing and distributing the information coming from the heart, mind, conscience, superego, id, and libido.

To live in the Spirit, the heart and mind need to have a strong connection. However, between the heart and mind, there is no direct path of interaction. There must be an intermediary that connects the two, and it must also connect to reality. This is the primary spiritual role of the ego.

You may have also noticed that those who have a poorly developed ego are usually shifty and morally corrupt on a deeper level. This is also the reason why evil people condemn those who have a healthy robust ego as being proud and arrogant.

When faith in Christ, and the attendant spiritual discernment are added into the equation, the ego is able to be healed and/or is transformed from being an incorrigible knob of self-emulation, into a vector of morality, wisdom, and the fulfillment of God's will on Earth.

Moreover, the ego cannot simply be put away, "swallowed", or eliminated somehow. It is a part of our soul that must be included in the process of redemption.

The Male Ego as the seat of Marital Contentment

Once we have established a proper understanding of the ego, it is apparent that a man needs to have a healthy ego for marital contentment and growth to occur.

Ed Hurst once wrote the following message [1], directed towards Christian wives, about the value of protecting and nurturing the husband's ego.

> "Ladies, you don't have to call him "master and lord," but if you don't treat your man like one, you will incur God's wrath."

Women will, of course, scoff at this admonishment and label it chauvinistic. But such a reaction stands as a testament of their own perdition.

> "Joke all you like about the fragile ego of men. No man is perfect, and precious few can actually pull off the Alpha Male act consistently. Yet, every man has it in him to be more of that. A woman suffering from feminist lies will not bring that out of him. Sure, laugh at the foibles of male imperfections. But if you fail to cater to your own man's self-image as a man, you are destroying your own life."

In fact, if we consider all the things that wives are commanded to do in marriage, we can observe that most (if not all) of them serve to protect and nurture the husband's ego. I believe this is not a coincidence.

> "Your man's ego is a sign of his imperfection; [the wife's] imperfection is treating [her husband's] ego as something evil and sinful. If you can't resist poking holes in it simply because you happen to know it's all part facade, you are provoking God's wrath on your home life. If you do so in front of others, you are begging for the worst God has warned He will do.
>
> Your shalom depends on building him up publicly, and at home. Not in the fakery of an inflated ego, but your mission is to encourage his self-confidence against the world.

A Meet Cute may be a giant Stroke to a man's Ego

A Meet Cute experience, preferably one that continues over time, might be able to satisfy a man's need for a soul-gratifying ego trip.

But a Meet Cute is not so necessary if the woman has the will to be spiritually obedient in building up her man's ego. But this takes self-discipline — something which most women have neglected to develop. I would say this habit, and the will to be faithful, is the deeper essence of true commitment.

Derek and Jason have maintained that commitment is the fundamental element of a successful marriage. However, without the continual nurturing of the man's ego, leading to the integration of the soul of the man, commitment is merely a prison sentence. This is essentially what many men married to spiritually immature wives have found in marriage. This is also the reason for MGTOW — Men Going Their Own Way to discover other avenues of ego expression and fulfillment.

> Failure to deliver is what we expect from everyone, including the person in the mirror, but every good thing [a wife] can possibly have in this life depends on building up your man's reputation. If he gets better at delivering because you support him, you are contributing to your own welfare because you are pleasing God.
>
> It's not as if you can't help him when he's misinformed about something, but if you don't learn the ways of women who help drive their men to greatness, you'll destroy him and yourself. It doesn't take a genius to figure out a routine by which you get his attention and fix a mistake without shooting him down in front of others. We see so little of that in America, it's no surprise our nation is coming apart.

So in other words, there are other ways in which the necessary aspects of ego relevancy can be achieved. If a Meet Cute quality enthusiasm isn't present in the woman, then her emotional stability, her spiritual maturity, and her honeycraft skills become absolutely necessary to form a healthy union.

Conclusions

If a woman wants to improve her marriage, she must actively nurture her husband's ego.

> Hear the word of the Lord: Ladies, disrespect for your husband equates to slapping God in the face. If he's a genuinely bad man, the starting place is recognizing you were stupid enough to marry him.
> When you confess to God your own sins, you make room for Him to forgive and heal and start fixing the sins of others. Again, only a fool is absolutist in thinking no one can escape a dangerous marriage which traps you in sin, but if you don't understand the generalities first, you can't appeal to God for exceptions. If you embrace this teaching […] you may well save your own life and make it easier to see the path of departure from this life into the one Above."

Mocking and antagonizing the male ego is a very effective strategy of Satan to insult and destroy the glory of God in man. When a woman attacks a man's ego, she is destroying his confidence and reputation. She is also attacking the integrity of his soul by tearing down the main channel of communication between his heart and his mind.

Those women who make a habitual game of tearing down men's ego's just for the he11 of it are bad, evil women. I recommend that men should reject such a woman as a potential wife if she does not correct her behavior after having it made clear to her that such mischief is of the devil.

Men who are already married to a woman who makes light of their ego can use the insights contained in this post to demand a better response from her. Let her know that her disrespectful and evil behavior is not only an offense to you, but also to God.

References

1. Radix Fidem: Husband and Lord (2012-6-19)

Related

- Radix Fidem: The Blessing of Ego (2013-8-31)

- Sigma Frame: Ladies Should Respect the Man and Love the Boy (2018-6-28)

Millennials Losing Hope

Jack · 17 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Readership: All;

The speaker in the video is David Hoffman, a filmographer who followed the lives of many noteworthy people (including many artists and musicians), and the historical events of his generation. He has seen a lot of life.

He has an important message to people in general, but especially to Millennials.

In addition to Hoffman's message, I will add that the prospects for dating (or whatever else is going on nowadays), and marriage are abysmal. I can't even advise marriage in good faith anymore. It's that bad!

The church is declining in popularity because, in general, it's not offering truth in Biblical teaching, and it's not offering community involvement. In sum, it's not offering anything of value to the younger generations. (I'm sure there are exceptions, but good luck finding them.)

When I see people like Biden, Clinton, Warren, being held up as presidential candidates, I feel embarrassed for the younger generations.

When I see the likes of Jordan Peterson being idolized, I feel afraid for the future.

When I see reports of how socialism is becoming more acceptable to younger Americans, and the popularity of Bernie Sanders, I have to think, is this the best they can hope for in life?

I hate to admit it, but Millennials have a pretty $h!tty existence.

- Longer working hours.
- Higher rent and cost of living.
- No sense of employer loyalty.
- No social security solvency.
- No church community.
- No serious opportunities for dating/marriage.
- Shamed out of having any sense of male dignity.
- Prospects of having a family are slim.
- No hope of ever owning a house.
- Constant wars in the news.
- An increase in mental disorders and suicide.

Remember, the closer you live to the city dump, the less you notice the smell.

I would never tolerate living in such a society. If it were me, I would get the #e11 out of there.

Oh yeah… That's exactly what I did, fifteen years ago!

Wake up and smell the ~~coffee~~ napalm. Roasties in your cup.

Or as the Boomer's would say, "Bye bye, Miss American pie…"

Millennials only have a remnant of culture left, so for them, it's just, "'Murican pie."

References

1. Business Insider (Hillary Hoffower): 50% of millennials have left a job for mental-health reasons (2019-10-8)
2. Business Insider (Hillary Hoffower and Allana Akhtar): Lonely, burned out, and depressed: The state of millennials' mental health entering the 2020s (2019-12-17)

Picking through the fruit of the Purity Movement

Jack · 20 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

An introduction to an upcoming series of posts which will be written in response to many points brought up by Richard P concerning the Purity Movement.

UPDATE: Scroll down to the end of this post to see a list of posts in this series, or click over to the Page for a more complete list.

Readership: Christians; Those involved in the Purity Movement;
Author's notes: Apologies to Spawny's Space for rebutting here. Richard P, Gunner Q, and Adam Piggott are encouraged to comment.
Length: 950 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Good Fruit vs Bad Fruit

> [15] "Beware of false prophets, who come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravenous wolves.
> [16] You will know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes from thornbushes or figs from thistles? [17] Even so, every good tree bears good fruit, but a bad tree bears bad fruit. [18] A good tree cannot bear bad fruit, nor can a bad tree bear good fruit. [19] Every tree that does not bear good fruit is cut down and thrown into the fire. [20] Therefore by their fruits you will know them."
>
> Matthew 7:15-20 (NKJV)

In January, Farm Boy wrote a post at Spawny's Space, By Their Fruits You Shall Know Them (2020/1/16), in which he described his sister's step-daughter's oldest boy, who was adopted.

He struggled with anger issues, largely due to his true mother's profligate behaviors. His anger issues receded after adoption, but then recurred in his late adolescence.

> "He is a big fella, who is wise to the system. He threatens to call child protective services when there is an attempt at discipline. He also understands what his size does for him. Therapy doesn't seem to be working particularly well. Short answer — he can get away with it because the system effectively encourages him.
>
> As for his real mother, she is undoubtedly really to blame. Welfare and whoopee isn't a recipe for success, for here or her children.
>
> Who is ultimately to blame for all of this? Lefties throughout the last 60 years. This is the fruit that they create. Will they take responsibility?"

I agree with FB's identification of the sources of the bad fruit — his mother specifically, and Leftist culture in general. Presumably, the boy's mother is also a F-root of the sexual revolution.

On the same day Farm Boy put this story up, I had just finished a post covering one woman's testimony about her experiences with the Purity Movement of the mid-90's, The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020/1/17). By (divine?) coincidence, this post also discussed the concept of spiritual fruits.

Of interest to the following discussion, my study cited Gunner Q's work, The Purity Movement In Review (2020/1/5) [Archive].

I left a link to this post in the comments at Spawny's Space, with the following quotage.

> "By their fruits you shall know them…
>
> My latest post takes a different perspective on this passage from scripture.
>
> "When one can get out from under the umbrella of sin, one will naturally experience the showers of God's blessing and grace. Churchians with a superficial understanding of sin would be tempted to conclude that the fornicating is the sin, but it is not. Fornicating is merely the fruit of the sin. Kline's sin, in this case, was not fornicating, but was in postponing marriage while believing that her sexual "purity" is what made her righteous, worthy, and would bring her blessing. She compounded this sin by resolving to retain her purity under her own free willpower, instead of trusting in the provision of God (which came in the form of a high school boyfriend / potential husband whom she was originally crazy about). Unfortunately for the sap who became her future husband, it required a bit of whole-hearted fornicating to wake her up from her deception and idolatry."
>
> "What no one is saying is the obvious – that the Purity Movement turned out to be, for some, a modern reiteration of the age old practice of S1ut Shaming. Of course, s1uts don't like S1ut Shaming because it makes them Feeelz ashamed and pressures them to adjust their behavior."

I felt that the statement in bold face was one of the more important takeaways from this study, second to the fact that the fruit of the Purity Movement was anything but pure.

Richard P's Response

I was disappointed that I didn't receive any commentary on this statement (so far) underneath that post. So I'm thankful to Richard P who wrote a lengthy response at Spawny's Space. As a teaser, here are his first two paragraphs.

> "I've read through Jack's and Gunner's articles linked to above. I've read Earl's comments at Gunner's thread. All of it reminded me that folks cannot have useful conversations unless and until they have defined their terms and all agree on those definitions. Without that, folks are simply talking to the wind, which is what seems to be happening at the writings linked to above.
>
> Among some of the issues that jumped out at me are these – not intended as criticisms but as points that hinder clarity when not defined, and that help the faith conversation in the Manosphere when clarity is enhanced by definitions that all agree on. All questions here are rhetorical, meant to trigger thinking, particularly thinking about the effect of writing when your terms are not defined.

Well said, and much needed.

In response, I will be dedicating an upcoming series of posts to address the issues that Richard P brought up. For this discussion, I will break the content into separate topics and reorganize them for easier reading.

The purposes of this study include the following.

- To identify what the Purity Movement did right, and where it went wrong.
- To pinpoint problem areas in teaching the value of sexual purity to young people, and how this might be done more effectively.
- To clear up confusion surrounding certain terms and definitions.

Stay tuned.

Posts in this Series

1. Σ Frame: The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020/1/17)
2. Σ Frame: Revisiting the Beauty of Purity (2021/4/9)
3. Σ Frame: Picking through the fruit of the Purity Movement (2020/4/20)
4. Σ Frame: On the Definition of Virginity (2020/4/22)
5. Σ Frame: On the Concept of Sin and the need for Marriage (2020/4/24)
6. Σ Frame: A New Patch on Old Cloth (2020/4/29)
7. Σ Frame: Pseudo-Sex and Technical-Virginity (2020/5/11)
8. Σ Frame: The Elimination of the Church (2020/5/29)
9. Σ Frame: Satan's Secret Recipe for a Heretical Purity Movement (2020/6/15)
10. Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – Did Purity Culture Undermine Christian Identity? (2020/9/9)
11. Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – What is Purity Actually About? (2020/9/23)
12. Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – When wanton treachery brings shame, not honor. (2020/10/14)
13. Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – Leithart's Myths of Purity (2020/10/28)
14. Σ Frame: Patheological Weddingsday – Leithart on Purity and Holiness (2020/11/11)

Related

- Cane Caldo: Neither Saved Nor Spent, But Invested (2013/12/11)
- Cornerstone: The "Purity" Movement 1 (2020/1/4)
- Cornerstone: The "Purity" Movement 2 (2020/2/22)
- Cornerstone: Cane Caldo's take on the Purity Movement (2020/9/15).

On the Definition of Virginity

Jack · 22 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Has our modern culture confused us about what it means to be a virgin?

Readership: All;

This post is the second in a series of articles that examine several aspects of the Purity Movement. For an introduction to this study, please read the first post, Picking through the fruit of the Purity Movement (2020-4-20).

What is a virgin?

Richard P posed the following question at Spawny's Space, in response to a previous post concerning the the Purity Movement of the 1990's, The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020 January 17).

> "What is a virgin?
>
> You do know that "virgins" can get pregnant, right? You do know that the clear pre-ejaculate liquid contains sperm, right? That the pre-ejaculate liquid can impregnate a "virgin" if it can get past the hymen, even if there is no p in v and the guy does not ejaculate, right? You can bet that many girls know this. And therefore there is a logic to a "virgin" requesting a pregnancy test before she has an x-ray."

Adam chimed in on this point.

> "Richard,
>
> I liked what [you wrote in] your feedback for Gunner and Jack.
>
> What is a virgin?
>
> The technical definition is a woman who has not had sexual intercourse.
>
> The biblical definition is a woman who is pure of body.
>
> In the modern world a woman can have sucked off 50 different men on separate occasions but is technically still a virgin as she has never had intercourse. However, she is not pure in body. Thus, she is not a virgin, at least not in the spirit of the term."

Adam gets the point. It was touted as a "Purity Movement", but it turned out to be a "technical virgin who could still get pregnant out of wedlock" movement.

A True Virgin is Holy

Richard P gave us the technical definition of a virgin.

Adam P gave us a more complete definition of a virgin.

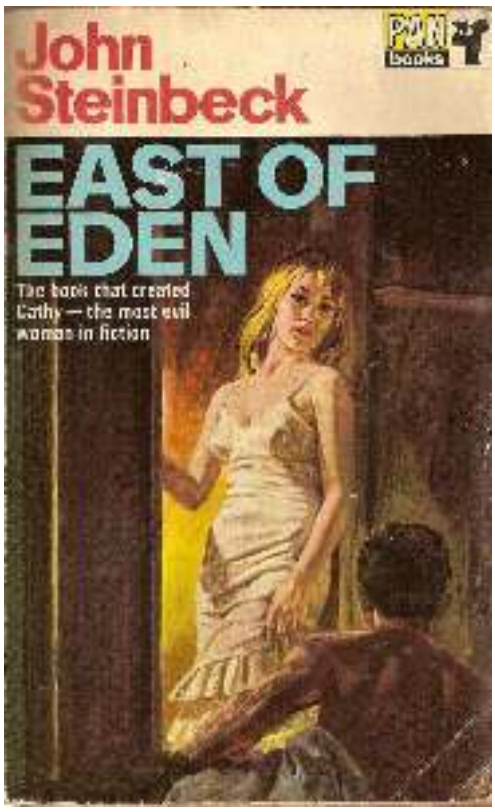
Both of these definitions concern the flesh. But we are not merely fleshly beings. We were originally designed to be spiritually attuned to the things of God.

Let's think about this again. What does it really mean to be a virgin from God's perspective? Do you honestly believe that the virgin Mary, mother of Jesus, was just a technical virgin? If that were true, then maybe Joseph was Jesus' father after all.

Or do you think a virgin must certainly mean a Biblical virgin? That is, never "knowing" a man in any sense, but nevertheless, she may be in debt, have tattoos, and obsessed with Tumblr c0ckamania?

No, I believe God has a higher standard for what qualifies as true virginity.

So to take this a step further, the spiritual definition of a virgin is one who has never been defiled. This kind of defilement begins when the mind becomes consumed with the lusts of the flesh. But over time, it is eventually manifested in unclean behavior, e.g. dirty jokes, profane speech, masturbating to p0rn, etc. If one is given sufficient opportunity, this can lead to defilement through illicit sexual relations.



Is it possible to be a virgin, and yet one defiled?

We may not be surprised to learn that sexual immorality most certainly introduces defilement. But interestingly, a sexual union is not always necessary for a defilement to occur.

> [11] It is not what goes into the mouth that defiles a person, but what comes out of the mouth; this defiles a person."
>
> [15] But Peter said to him, "Explain the parable to us." [16] And He said, "Are you also still without understanding? [17] Do you not see that whatever goes into the mouth passes into the stomach and is expelled? [18] But what comes out of the mouth proceeds from the heart, and this defiles a person. [19] For out of the heart come evil thoughts, murder, adultery, sexual immorality, theft, false witness, slander. [20] These are what defile a person. But to eat with unwashed hands does not defile anyone." ~ Matthew 15:11-20 (ESV)

In other words, the dankness that makes one spiritually unfit and undesirable originates in the heart and mind. Having a heart inclined toward evil, a mind focused on the flesh, and a nasty mouth that spews filth is enough to render one defiled, and this stands true in the total absence of male genitalia.

I covered defilement in a previous post, What does it mean to be Defiled? – Part I (2018-12-9).

> "Similar to being unclean, defilement also includes the spiritual aspect – that is, certain experiences affect one's state of mind, and emotional disposition, such that one becomes unfit or unable to have certain other experiences in life, including personal and spiritual maturation.
>
> In other words, a person who is defiled cannot think objectively, and they have developed subjective biases. They possess certain emotional predilections and peculiar affections. The end effect is being more psychotic and less real, more emotional and less rational, more given over to sentiments and less so to education. Essentially, more feeelz, less faith.
>
> Now we add to this understanding, the fact that defilement is rather permanent. It becomes a part of one's constitutional identity of the soul."

Our total ignorance of purity, uncleanness, and defilement leads us to quibble and quarrel about what it means to be a virgin, as if it were a grey area!

Conclusions

It is philosophically simple to define virginity according to whether a woman has had any sexual experience with a man. But to those of us who are spiritually minded, such a definition is naive, if not legalistic. To those who are more mature, it should be obvious that sexual purity leading to spiritual and marital sanctification is the core value of virginity.

In regards to the Purity Movement, we cannot very well talk about "retaining one's virginity" as a goal, as many religious types are wont to do, because it is a result of one's faithfulness in being obedient to God and remaining spiritually undefiled. It would be better for us to observe these practices as indicators of one's purity, instead of "virginity". Even setting up the goal to "be pure" is prone to become an idolatrous and legalistic distraction from the indwelling presence of the Holy Spirit. The real goal is Christ, and to abide in Him.

The point of discussing defilement in this essay is that it is the starting point of how one's sexual purity is lost. That is, when the mind becomes obsessed with the desires of the flesh, namely, burning with sexual desires, continual temptation, tempestuous lust… Then it is only a matter of time before the body follows suit, resulting in sexual liaisons which may be illicit if engaged outside of marriage.

For the majority of young people, this focus on the flesh is wholly natural, extremely enjoyable, and is accepted as a part of our physical maturation. As such, these desires and temptations are unavoidable, and therefore become an impetus to marry. But if a formal marriage cannot be achieved before the culmination of desire overwhelms the mind and will power, then sexual impurity and sin is the eventual outcome. This conclusion emphasizes the importance of marrying while young.

However, even a timely marriage to a virgin is no safeguard nor guarantee against defilement. There have been some (e.g. blogger SFC Ton comes to mind) who married a virgin who (sometime later) became scurrilous and/or sexually promiscuous. On the surface, such cases offer support to the claim that virginity is relatively meaningless. But this conclusion does not agree with other data that shows a direct correlation between the woman's N count and the probability of divorce. Ultimately, the obsession with the flesh leading to spiritual defilement is the cause of the breakdown in one's sexual purity. Moreover, virginity as defined by an intact hymen is the proof of one's past sexual purity — at that particular time.

Related

- All Things Bright And Beautiful: Email Questions… Virginity is a pile of horse manure? (2018 November 9)
- The Transformed Wife (Lori Alexander): Marrying A Virgin Is No Big Deal? (2019 August 19)
- Cornerstone: No Boyfriends (2020 February 28)

On the Concept of Sin and the need for Marriage

Jack · 24 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

If your soldier is standing at attention, ready to defile, it's wise to give him a mission before he can debouch.

Readership: All;

This post is the third in a series of articles that examine several aspects of the Purity Movement. For an introduction to this study, please read the first post, Picking through the fruit of the Purity Movement (2020-4-20).

What is Sin?

Sin is commonly depicted as an action, such as lying, stealing, adultery, etc. But these actions betray the deeper nature. A truer appreciation of sin recognizes it as a natural inclination — like the cat craving bacon in the above photo. Whether or not the cat actually eats the bacon, the cat's natural behavior remains unchanged.

A while back, I wrote this description of sin: The Blue Pill, Feminism, and Sin (2018 October 16).

> "The idea of Sin is one of those concepts that is shrouded in a lot of confusion. Christians hear this word often, but they don't really know what it means. They think they do, but not really.
>
> So what is sin?
>
> Sin is when you don't want to accept reality. You're always trying to change your reality into what you want it to be. You always have the opinion that you're right, and other people are wrong, and you might even have the habit of saying so. Your deceitful heart resorts to various defense mechanisms in an effort to protect your thoughts and ego from the vicious assaults of the truth. You're relying on a wide assortment of tricks, lies, deception, slandering, stealing, killing, and so on, all done in an effort to change the world according to your comfort and liking – that's sin."
>
> "One prominent example of this dynamic of sin is the "planning" aspect of Planned Parenthood. Young wimminz want to ride the carousel, and they don't want to marry and have children ("yet", so they say), so they > sacrifice their sexual purity, their honor, their unborn children, and with them, their opportunities to start a happy family, all in order to control their own lives, and fulfill their own will about how they think their life should turn out.

>
> Of course, it never turns out exactly as they imagine, and that is the deception of Satan. The strategy of Satan (their god) is to forbid that they should ever offer their bodies to inspire and motivate a husband or their reproductive ability to produce Godly children. For the family to be destroyed, such noble purposes must be calumniated, as they currently are."

Sin includes, but is not limited to, fornication

Back in January, Richard P left a long comment under a post at Spawny's Space, By Their Fruits You Shall Know Them (16 January, 2020). His comment was a reaction to one of my posts covering one woman's testimony about her experiences with the Purity Movement, The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020 January 17). Readers who are unfamiliar with this post may like to read it before continuing on here.

> @Jack said: Churchians with a superficial understanding of sin would be tempted to conclude that the fornicating is the sin, but it is not.

Richard took this quote out of context. The next sentence in that post reads,

> "Fornicating is merely the fruit of the sin."

By that, I mean that sin is not superficial. It's deep. However, most people can maintain an outer façade of decency, in spite of their sin. If sin erupts into an observable behavior, then that is when the person is losing control of the façade.

Richard followed this partial quotation with the following argument,

> There is sin.

> There is that which will cause God to reject you at the Judgement Seat.
>
> Which of those two is more important?
>
> "Fornication" is on the list of things that the Bible says will cause God to reject you at the Judgement Seat. If you care about whether God rejects you or not, then you should care about whether you are doing that which will cause God to reject you. Since "fornication" is one of those things that the Bible says will cause God to reject you, it is probably important to give a damn about whether or not you are fornicating.
>
> The Bible says nothing about God rejecting someone at the Judgement Seat because they didn't get married.

Not so fast, Richard…

Are you talking about God's judgment in the here and now, or the final judgment after we die and come before His throne? I interpret your phrase "Judgement Seat" to mean the latter. Jesus said this about the final judgment.

> "Not everyone who says to me, 'Lord, Lord,' will enter the kingdom of heaven, but only the one who does the will of my Father in heaven." ~ Matthew 7:21 (NRSV)

If we don't pay attention to God's judgment in the here and now, then there is little left to be said once the grand finale judgment rolls around.

The Sinfulness of Fornication

Richard P concluded,

> "Jack – don't get out into the weeds. Just say what the Bible says. And – in this case – the Bible does say that fornicating is the problem, not staying unmarried. Contrary to what I quoted from you at the top of this post, those with a non-superficial understanding of what the Bible says understand that the Bible DOES conclude that fornicating is the sin."

Richard, I'm not saying that fornication isn't sinful. I'm saying that the defilement and sin that led to fornication started long before the fornication happened. For men and women both, the sin is lust, denial, cultivating a sexual poverty mentality, and fantasy. The act of fornication is the cherry on top of the cake of a prolonged, habitual, sinful disobedience of the heart. Thus, fornication is not only an outward sin of the flesh, it is also evidence of a deeper sin of the heart, and therefore, it is a natural consequence – or a fruit – of that deeper sin.

The brokenness of the culture and the church only serves to obscure the better way, and increases the probability of error.

When does marriage become necessary?

Given all the risks and difficulties that are associated with marriage, and the eternal consequences of fornication, I'm sure many will wonder at this point, why not be celibate? Why not avoid both marriage and fornication?

For most normal healthy young people, having a supercharged libido is strongly associated with frustration if such a one remains celibate. This frustration, combined with tempestuous day-to-day temptation, causes so much distraction and anxiety, that a person cannot get their mind off the flesh, cannot experience spiritual growth, and cannot enter the Kingdom of God. I know this to be true from experience.

As a result, one can suffer a prolonged and painful struggle against sexual sin, even while still remaining a virgin (by whatever definition you choose), and this condition can be quite fatal to one's spiritual peace and growth.

If one is suffering in this condition, it is an obvious sign that it is better for one to marry. St. Paul abridged the whole she-bang by saying,

> "If anyone thinks that he is not behaving properly toward his betrothed, if his passions are strong, and it has to be, let him do as he wishes: let them marry—it is no sin." ~ 1st Corinthians 7:36 (ESV)

In fact, the Biblical prescription for one who has a supercharged libido, and who lacks sufficient self-control, is to marry.

> "It is better to marry than to burn with desire." ~ 1st Corinthians 7:9 (HCSB)

But not everyone is successful in resisting the desires of the flesh. For many people who lack the necessary self-control, remaining unmarried for many years eventually culminates in fornication.

Here in this sense, I agree with Richard's statement, "It is probably important to give a damn about whether or not you are fornicating."

For this reason, I believe that for many people (including myself), it is God's will for them to avoid fornication by getting married, not by diddling around with false notions of purity, and postponing marriage.

Also remember, lust and sexual sin are not limited to men only. Women lust too, and really need to be married for the same reasons.

In summary of this section, if either sex, or the lack of sex, is impeding one's faith and spiritual growth, then it needs to be resolved somehow.

Concluding Statements

There are several reasons for marriage, which include the following.

1. Marriage is intended to Glorify God.

Our spiritual obedience serves to manifest God's nature, love, and glory. A strong marriage is a reward of continual obedience, and as such, is a powerful way to glorify God in this life. If you want a good marriage, you have to glorify God.

2. Marriage is intended to foster our Sanctification.

> [3] It is God's will that you should be sanctified: that you should avoid sexual immorality; [4] that each of you should learn to control your own body in a way that is holy and honorable, [5] not in passionate lust like the pagans, who do not know God; [6] and that in this matter no one should wrong or take advantage of a brother or sister. The Lord will punish all those who commit such sins, as we told you and warned you before. [7] For God did not call us to be impure, but to live a holy life. [8] Therefore, anyone who rejects this instruction does not reject a human being but God, the very God who gives you his Holy Spirit. ~ 1st Thessalonians 4:3-8 (ESV)

3. Marriage is an alternative to a lifestyle of debauchery.

As discussed in a previous post On the Definition of Virginity (2020-4-22), the real task of retaining one's purity is in keeping one's self undefiled. If one can remain undefiled, then sexual purity should be a natural consequence. But as defilement accumulates (over time), it becomes more difficult and more unlikely to avoid sexual sin.

If marriage can perform the function of helping one maintain self-control, and to monitor defilement, then it is immensely wise to consider marriage as an indispensable vehicle of desire fulfillment, which will not only avoid Sin, but also fulfill God's will for our sanctification.

Of course, this is highly idealized, and fails to account for the fact that marriage continues to be a terrible option for men. However, for those who are naturally prone to lust and lechery, it may boil down to a clear choice between continuing on that path, or choosing a better way that God provides. Thus, maintaining one's sexual purity unto sanctification remains as a strong and legitimate reason for pursuing marriage.

If one recognizes that his/her libido is an insurmountable weakness, and he has the faith and ability to pursue a life path of marriage, then his soul may see everlasting rewards.

Related

- This Explains More: Better to marry than to burn (2013 June 22)

A New Patch on Old Cloth

Jack · 29 April 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Were the ethics and expectations of the Purity Movement reasonable and realistic?

Readership: All;

This post is the fourth in a series of articles that examine several aspects of the Purity Movement. For an introduction, please read the first post, Picking through the fruit of the Purity Movement (2020-4-20).

> [16] "No one sews a patch of unshrunk cloth on an old garment, for the patch will pull away from the garment, making the tear worse. [17] Neither do people pour new wine into old wineskins. If they do, the skins will burst; the wine will run out and the wineskins will be ruined. No, they pour new wine into new wineskins, and both are preserved." ~ Matthew 9:16-17 (NIV)

This passage takes on a fresh new meaning if we interpret the new, unshrunk cloth and the old garment as follows.

The new, unshrunk cloth is a fresh new teaching, or an ancient one, such as sexual purity before marriage, which has fallen out of use, and has been relegated to "social theory".

The old garment is the socio-sexual/marriage marketplace in western society, in which "dating" is characterized by serial monogamy.

Thus, sewing a new patch on an old garment is like trying to instill Biblical teachings of sexual purity within a cesspool of sexual dissipation.

But this is exactly what the Purity Movement attempted to do in the late 1990s.

Something has to give.

Underneath the introductory post, Jason made the following noteworthy statements (revised for clarity).

> "What I immediately noticed about [the Purity Movement] was that it made people "stuck".
>
> I noticed that, for women, it seemed like the expectations of purity really upped the ante for them.
>
> Women were led to believe "you are the perfect daughter of the king", and they were told to "trust Jesus" in holding out for "the one".
>
> It made them wait for "the one", and then came their complaints all over the place, "how come Christian guys don't ask us out?" The real question that was implied was, "How come the church doesn't have hot guys who are asking us out?"
>
> This essentially encouraged women to blow off any man who didn't fulfill the princess fantasy, which was 90+% of all eligible men.
>
> The expectations of purity also stifled men in many ways too. For Christian men, they couldn't approach a woman unless "God" had put it on his heart to pursue her, and if his pursuit was "wrong", or the woman didn't like it, or she didn't want him pursuing her… God obviously didn't lie of course… But it was presumed that the man didn't "listen" to what God was really telling him.
>
> Men seemed to get the blame for it not working. Women complained loudly on social media and other areas that "no decent men were in the church"
>
> It seemed to make everyone stuck…

Moreover, Christian ethics and expectations were being imposed on young people, but the sexual marketplace (SMP) and the marriage marketplace (MMP) had never changed to accommodate these expectations. So Christians who pursued a more God fearing approach towards marriage were like a fish out of water, and were left in the dust.

Larry wrote a similar sentiment.

> "One Christian mistake was encouraging delaying marriage while also encouraging purity. Not realistic."
>
> Yes, we really need to rethink child rearing and education in the West. […] Our parents and grandparents married often in their early 20s, or even late teens for females. It could work again. This delaying marriage to the late 20s is not good for individuals or for society.

To leave no stone unturned, there were many problems that came out of superposing purity onto the secular SMP. These have been summarized in a post at Cornerstone, The "Purity" Movement (2020 February 22), which lists the main aberrations as follows. (Please visit Cornerstone for the full descriptions.)

- Maintaining the Feminist Life Script
- An overemphasis on "purity"
- The emotional bonding between father and daughter was overemphasized
- Ridiculous standards for suitors
- Lack of social infrastructure
- Girls who really wanted to be sluts
- A difficulty of making a break from "dating" in the form of serial monogamy
- Women living alone

But the most pressing dilemma about superposing the Purity Movement onto the secular SMP setting was the extended postponement of marriage. This has been discussed before by Jack (Σ Frame) and Sharkly (Laughing at Feminism).

> "According to the US CDC the mean age for first vaginal sexual intercourse is 17 for both males and females. By age 23, 95% of women interviewed claimed that they'd had sexual intercourse. Meanwhile the average age of first marriage in the US is 27 for women and 29 for men. The average girl has had a full decade of fornication before she ever marries, while average men have been screwing around for a dozen years prior to marriage."

How could we possibly expect any young person to endure 10 years of temptation during peak fertility and still remain pure? That's just unrealistic, if not impossible. It's a horrible spiritual abuse just to lay this expectation on a young person – that's the kind of abuse that will surely jerk one off to ɦəll in a handjob!

Concluding Statements

Christian ethics and expectations were being imposed on young people who were not mature enough to take life by the horns. To make matters more difficult, the SMP and the MMP had never changed to accommodate these expectations. As a result, the Purity Movement was a witches brew of legalism, unrealistic expectations, frustration, and temptation.

If you think about this, it would take an act of God for a young person to have the wits and wherewithal to come through the worldly western SMP while maintaining sexual purity until arriving in a God-ordained marriage. They are totally different paths, leading to different outcomes. Yet, those in the Purity Movement had the gall to make such a presumption on the mercies of God.

Related

- Σ Frame: On the Definition of Virginity (2020-4-22)
- Σ Frame: On the Concept of Sin and the need for Marriage (2020-4-24)

Cucks won the battle, but Deplorables won the war.

Jack · 1 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

How has Trump's popularity been affected since his eponymous Reddit group has been quarantined?

Readership: All
Theme: Beating the Odds
Note: On 2024/11/23, this post was found to be mysteriously corrupted and was corrected and republished.
Length: 1,200 words
Reading Time: 6 minutes

Can Reddit sway an election?

When Trump was rising to prominence before the 2016 election, Reddit changed their algorithms to stave off the quickly rising tide of N@t!0n@l!sm.

> "Reddit announced Monday that the site is changing the algorithm responsible for the r/all feed, which shows the most popular content across all of the site's subreddits. The aim? To stop some communities from promoting large numbers of their own posts, thereby taking over what Reddit calls the "front page of the internet."
>
> Attn. (Aron Macarow): Reddit Attempts to Stop the Trump Meme Brigade (2016/6/20)

They make it sound like a c0nsp!r@cy to take over Reddit.

> "What this means in practice is that repeated posts from the same community that make it into the r/all feed will make it less likely that future posts from that specific community will appear on the Reddit front page. This is by design: The hope is that it will keep small groups of the service's users from taking over the site's overall conversations, as happened in the wake of the Orlando m@ss@cre on June 12."
>
> Attn. (Aron Macarow): Reddit Attempts to Stop the Trump Meme Brigade (2016/6/20)

If posts from "small groups" landed in the main feed, I doubt that they were really as small as they claim.

> "We have seen many communities like r/the_donald over the years: ones attempting to dominate the conversation on Reddit at the expense of everyone else. This undermines Reddit, and we're not going to allow it," Huffman said in a Town Hall post on Reddit Thursday.
>
> Attn. (Aron Macarow): Reddit Attempts to Stop the Trump Meme Brigade (2016/6/20)

Were conservative groups like The_Donald really attempting to dominate the feed? Or were they just that popular?

> "The change holds the promise of preventing any one subreddit from dominating the main page of the site. Still, troubling content continues to make its way onto the r/all feed. The most recent problem occurred Tuesday, when a post from the r/the_donald subreddit received more than 8,200 upvotes in two hours, catapulting it into the r/all feed.
>
> The post featured four sw@st!k@s and the note, "Don't mind me, just taking my admins for a walk" — which many felt was a taunt directed at the platform for the recent algorithm switch. ("Cucked" has also entered the far right lexicon as a term to demean conservatives who are traitors to their conservative base.)
>
> Attn. (Aron Macarow): Reddit Attempts to Stop the Trump Meme Brigade (2016/6/20)

This is hilarious! It's almost as funny as when Microsoft's AI bot, Tay, went off the deep end with r@c!st and sexually charged statements it had learned from public chat forums.

The way I see it, Reddit's real problem is that they have somehow attracted a subset of the population who hold views that are disagreeable or embarrassing to them, or who are making them out to be "cucked". (Lord forbid!) Predictably, they don't want to be associated with these members for reasons that are, effectively, politically (in)correct.

But this raises a few questions.

- Is it censorship?
- If so, is this censorship morally warranted, or merely politically biased?
- Does Reddit have an ulterior motive to dampen or dissipate any grassroots support for Trump?

Recent Developments

In March, Brett Stevens at Amerika drew my attention to what seems to amount to a cens0rship crackdown on Reddit that happened in February. It's been two months since this happened, and I think now is the time to assess the real damage done.

Just to fill in the reader, here are a few passages from Amerika and Reddit on the issue.

> "Silicon Valley continues to navigate through a loophole in American law: as private industry, it has no obligation to support free speech, but has also been given a legal carve-out removing liability for things that its users have posted under the Communications Decency Act § 230."
>
> "Since our Establishment™ went Leftist after WW2, the new insurgents, rebels, and outsider thinkers are conservatives or at least realists; they are those not in love with "equality" as the singular goal and principle of civilization.
>
> Social media has responded to these as if they were toxic, since their presence disturbs those who are repeating the past by clicking on the same old stuff dressed up as the "new," because that which is actually different reveals how much the same old thing is, well, old and tired."
>
> Amerika (Brett Stevens): Reddit Drives Away Thriving Pro-Trump Community (2020/3/1)

Amerika linked to the following post at Reddit/The-Donald, and an archive is here.

> "First they changed upvote algorithms to keep us from reaching the masses.
>
> Next, they outright cens0red us from /all.
>
> Then, they quarantined us, to make it difficult to even see our words, much less spread them.
>
> Then, one by one, they added new rules to stifle what would could even say behind the quarantine. Users were sitewide banned, automod size increased to prevent you from speaking freely.
>
> Still not enough, they decided to start banning us for even liking content we see, things we didn't personally even create. Wrongthink.
>
> Now, they've removed half of our mods, and will be installing their own.
>
> Reddit never wanted to remove The_Donald, but they have wanted to k!ll us. Not by shutting us down, but by starving us out. Cens0ring our good content, making it less interesting, making you fear what you can post, or even upvote. It makes less negative press for them to slowly k!ll us off and replace us than to outright ban us.
>
> Reddit is dead. The_Donald is dead.
>
> We knew this was coming, and we created a lifeboat. A place to bring back the old The_Donald, before they began their Chinese censorship. A place free of Reddit c0mmun!sts."

Conclusions

First of all, I am not very active on Reddit, and I'm not a follower of The_Donald.

Secondly, I do think the members of this sub have been given a raw deal with the way the publication and readership of their group has been dampened through the above methods. That's just wrong.

However, it seems to me that this Reddit post has been dramatically overstated. Since this post went up on Reddit (2020/2/25), Trump's popularity has not been significantly affected.

Trump's response to the C0r0na virus has had mixed reactions. I see a lot less attention being given to Trump on the news and other MGM, but overall, I don't see any mass attrition away from Trump's following.

Although it's a shame, I don't see how dampening or shutting down a Reddit sub is going to sway the election. It hasn't even been a speed bump to the meme warfare.

Furthermore, if Gl0balist powers think they can derail an election by cens0ring or shutting down a few internet forums, they're just playing in the sandbox.

For the most part, people have already made up their minds, and have decided how they're going to vote. There are some minority groups who are slowly changing sides (i.e. blacks and hispanics), but they tend to be migrating towards Trump.

In conclusion, I don't see how Biden can beat Trump in 2020, unless there is a massive criminal element of voting fraud, or something unthinkable happens (like an @ss@ss!n@t!0n or a secession).

Update (2024/11/23): It was voting fraud, and more recently an @ss@ss!n@t!0n was attempted — twice.

Related

- Σ Frame: Trump Appeals to Dignity, Not Racism (2016/3/7)

- Σ Frame: A Dark Horse (2024/11/16)

How to countermand the intellectual dishonesty of a Karen

Jack · 4 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Develop your ability to deal with a formidable Karen.

Readership: Anti-Karens;

This is an exercise that I give to students in my debate class. It is intended to help them identify dishonest debate tactics and develop an ability to counter similar attacks.

Pretext

The coach threw an 18-year old boy off the high school varsity athletic team because of bad behavior.

Speech Preparation

The coach told the principal what had happened. The principal told the coach that this boy had been a trouble maker in the local schools since first grade. The principal warned the coach that the boy's mother would probably come in to attack the coach in defense of her son's ambitions to play on the team. So the coach recounted a list of all the boy's transgressions on the team, and prepared himself mentally.

Debate

Here is the discussion between the coach and the boy's mother.

The mother came to see the coach, and asked him why her son had been kicked off the team.

The coach recounted a list of all the boy's transgressions on the team.

The mother could not deny that these transgressions were serious misbehaviors, so she responded by demanding, "How did YOU behave when YOU were 18?"

The coach responded with the true statement, "I was a cadet at West Point Military Academy when I was 18."

The mother immediately shot back, "This isn't West Point!"

The coach was made speechless by her reply, but he soon replied, “That’s right, but I still have to manage this team with as much discipline as possible, if we expect to win games this season. Your son has not responded well to discipline, so I have to exclude him in order to give the other boys a fighting chance.

The mother said, “So! You’re just thinking of yourselves, at my son’s expense! What a lousy bunch of $#!%& heads you are! I’m going to talk to your superintendent about this!”

Questions

1. Identify the tactics of the coach.
2. Identify the tactics of the mother.
3. Identify the tactical mistakes of the coach.
4. Identify the tactical mistakes of the mother.
5. Who do you believe “won” this debate?

KEY

1. The tactics of the coach include…

- Facts and logic: The coach is conveying the facts to the boys' mother, and the logical conclusion that the boy should be kicked off the team.
- Scapegoating: The coach is blaming the boy for the lack of discipline and the team's future poor performance.
- Slippery Slope: The coach assumes that if the boy stays on the team, then the team will lose the season. (This is not a slippery slope if the coach has years of experience.)

2. The mother is relying on dishonest tactics. Among them are…

- Two instances of Abusive Ad Hominem.
- Red Herring: She changed the subject, and she changed the meaning of the coach's answer.
- Appeal to Authority: Threatened to go talk to the Superintendent.
- Straw Man: Distorted her son's misbehavior by comparing him to the coach.

3. The coach was proud of his experience at the military academy, and since he could rely on it as being a true fact, he accepted the mothers abusive Ad Hominem into the debate, thinking that his reply was a great answer to a woman who was trying to prove that all 18-year old boys have the same delinquent behavior as her son.
4. The mother's tactical mistakes are…

- She failed to supply a rational justification for the boys' behavior.
- She asked a question to which she did not already know the answer.
- She failed to admit her errors and refine her strategy in the debate.

5. This woman is a world-class dishonest witch, which may explain why her son has a bad reputation!

Exit Questions

1. Can you identify any other tactics or fallacies?
2. How would you have dealt with this woman?

Related

- LATV (Humberto Guida): Karen: The Origins of a Meme (2020 April 6)
- Tom Luongo: We have become a Karen nation (2020 April 22)
- Babylon Bee: Facebook Introduces Karen Reaction Button (2020 May 1)
- Adam Piggott: OK, Karen. (2020 May 1)
- Dark Brightness: Karen, meet Banhammer. (2020 May 2)
- Spawny's Space: Karens (2020 May 3)

The magic of introspective judgment and authentic confession

Jack · 8 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Introspective judgment plays a critical role in maintaining one's spiritual life.

Readership: Christians; Those who are self-aware;

Introduction

In some recent discussion in the comments at Σ Frame, there has been some disagreement about the value of posting one's less-than-stellar experiences on the internet as a real-world case study for the sake of analysis and discussion. Some say it is an honest testimony, while others say it is glorifying sin.

Here are two specific issues that have received criticism.

- Scott's testimony in Opportunities (2020-2-26).
- Sharkly's testimony in Virgin Imprinting (2020-3-1).

In the past, I've written extensively about confession (of sin) and profession (of faith), the subtle difference between the two, and the power that it has to transform our subjective experience of life. In these posts, I've gone into some detail about the nature of the heart-speech connection and the impact of a confession. The reader who is unfamiliar with these topics may wish to read the following essays before reading on.

- Σ Frame: Confession vs. Profession (2009 October 2)
- Σ Frame: Confidence and Authenticity in Speech (2009 December 28)
- Σ Frame: The Trouble with Resolutions, Inner Vows and Commitments (2010 January 14)

In spite of all that I've written about it, this topic never seems to get old, because every day brings a fresh experience of self-discovery and spiritual renewal.

I imagine that all the abstract theories and mystical impressionism have completely snowed many of my readers. If the reader feels this way, the concepts described in the above posts might become clearer by considering a few real world case studies in a previous post, Confessions of Racist White Nationalists (2020-January-31), all of which are based on my own life experiences.

The Journey

Throughout our lives, we play different roles that bring out different aspects of our personality.

For example, when you're a kid, then you play the role of a boy. Then when you're a teenager, you play the cool kid, stalking the trends, listening to the "in" music, and you're in a social mess being popular (or unpopular) with girls. When we get older then you might have a career, or a small business, and you're focused on a reputable customer service and building rapport with business accomplices. When you get married, you have the role of being a husband. When you have children, then you play the role of being a father.

So you see, there are different personal roles that we play in our life, and each one requires us to tune in to a different hertz as time goes on.

Another thing is that as we age, we have a different perspective on life.

If you confess to stealing candy when you're 5, then you're facing the wrath of an adult parent (which is really a big deal at that age). But doing the same thing at 50 is not fearsome, but despicable (or pitiable). If you confess to getting your girlfriend pregnant when you're 20, then that is a life changer. But doing the same thing at 60 might be felt as a terrific accomplishment.

What I've just described seems simple enough, and maybe you've heard it all before. But in truth, it's a long challenge and it never ends. I mean, I've been a Christian since I was a kid, but I'm 48 now, and I'm still discovering things I didn't know about myself. It seems incredulous doesn't it? But I think I'm not alone in this. I think everyone who takes introspection seriously goes through this same process, if they're being honest and seeking God, because our life changes as we get older and we experience different things.

So my point is, all of these roles bring out different expressions of our self, and each stage of our life presents new, different lessons to learn. Overall, you always have this sense that, "maybe I'm not there yet". But that's a deceptive impression, because if you ever get the idea that you have "arrived", then that's the point where you lose touch with reality. The trick is to live like you have "arrived" in the present moment, but at the same time, be thinking of the next step, as if you're "not there yet". Got it?

Taking control of our lives through confession

Lies and curses enter into our lives in the simplest ways – so simple in fact, that they go under the radar, undetected. We fail to notice, and thereby fail to address the spiritual damage.

In his post, Antidote to Fear 05 (2018 October 26), Ed Hurst describes one example of how easily a person can sustain a curse, and how simple it can be.

> "…let me cite a common everyday example of how stuff like this takes root in our lives. If someone denounces another using that nasty f-word, it's the same as uttering a curse. If that denunciation is valid, if it's consistent with Scripture, that's fine. If it's invalid, such as arising from senseless hatred, then it becomes a curse on the speaker. Don't confuse this with crude joking. People who unjustly hurl "fk you" at you are surely cursing themselves, so learn how your heart can reject the power of that curse over you. If there is any justification for it, your confession and repentance removes that curse."

Continuing with Ed's post, he addresses how to achieve an effective confession.

> "I'm not going to put words in your mouth. Use whatever ceremonial language fits your sense of calling and mission. If you lack imagination, echo the language of your favorite Bible translation, using phrases that seem to apply. The Psalms are loaded with appropriate stuff. But don't be fake, as if the words really matter. The one thing we want to do is break the power of mere words to rule over you."

One technique I have found useful is to use prayers in scripture, and replace the appropriate pronouns with my name. Take for example, Ephesians 3:14-21 (ESV).

> [14] For this reason I bow my knees before the Father, [15] from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named, [16] that according to the riches of His glory He may grant Jack to be strengthened with power through His Spirit in Jack's inner being, [17] so that Christ may dwell in Jack's heart through faith — that Jack, being rooted and grounded in love, [18] may have strength to comprehend with all the saints what is the breadth and length and height and depth, [19] and to know the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge, that Jack may be filled with all the fullness of God.
> [20] Now to Him who is able to do far more abundantly than all that Jack asks or thinks, according to the power at work within Jack, [21] to Him be glory in the church and in Christ Jesus throughout all generations, forever and ever. Amen.

A more advanced approach would require one to compose a prayer containing truthful words that are proper and fitting to one's state, much like one would write a poem or an essay, and to then struggle through the process of reciting this prayer fluently and without mistake. Don't be quick to scoff at the simplicity of this. It is much more difficult than you might imagine.

Try it sometime. You'll be surprised!

The proper Frame for introspective judgment

After recollecting a few experiences in my life in which others judged me, I asked myself if people judged me because of the way I judged them, or if they judged me according to the way I judged myself. I think there's examples of both, but the way I judge myself is a little more dominant, in that it largely determines how others judge me too.

For example, if I subconsciously believe I'm a bad guy, then I carry a sense of guilt about what I do, and my ego is affected negatively. So then people can feel that I have a dysfunctional ego, and they may be attuned to think I'm a bad guy too. But if I can bring that subconscious belief to my conscious awareness, through introspection, and then talk about it, then this confession transforms my negative self-image into a new found sense of humility and confidence.

> "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." ~ 1st John 1:9 (ESV)

Now, there are some things that are totally unacceptable to other people. So for those things you really need to talk it over with God first before you can tell others. As time passes, the challenge is to be more open. We begin by being honest with our self, and that can be a big challenge for some people. And then the next thing is to be honest with God about our self. In the process of being honest with God and understanding yourself better, then you apprehend the words to describe that. This process can be time-consuming and challenging to see clearly. The challenge here is to be able to put that into words and use those words to tell other people. I think that's part of how we can be honest with God towards other people. Then after that, the next step would be to have the courage to talk about our problems with other people. And we need to be very careful to choose people that we trust, people who are not going to condemn us in an unjust way, but who would offer us love and grace, because that would help us find healing from those problems. And then the next step would be to find the confidence to talk about our problems and to find ways to describe it as a character-building experience, rather than something that has destroyed you.

Interestingly, the act of judging yourself doesn't always have the social impact that you might expect. The funny thing about an inadvertent confession is that if I am able to tell people some of my transgressions, then people think that's interesting, and maybe even somewhat funny, and they gain a deeper understanding of me as a person. Somehow, this understanding imparts empathy, and they suddenly realize I'm not such a bad guy.

This phenomenon is one of the magic things about God's Grace. If you can put your common faults and errors into words, and talk about it with other people, then somehow, one can usually apprehend the confidence to address those issues. Even in the case where the wrongdoing may not be socially acceptable to others, nevertheless, one can find Grace to grow through that situation.

Concluding Statements

It's difficult, costly and time consuming to build up, but cheap and easy to tear down. From a spiritual perspective, it is better to be one who builds and contributes, rather than one who steals and destroys.

It is important to talk through the complicated issues of our deepest desires, our inmost fears and frustrations, and get those things into words that are understandable, correct, and fitting. It's important because this is how we come to terms with ourselves and accept God's grace, find healing, and forgiveness. This should not be mistaken for "glorifying sin".

It takes courage and faith to make a confession. It's not proper to tell someone to shut up about their past errors, and keep their nose to the grindstone, if they have not yet achieved an effective confession. If God has put it on their heart to pass along their story to edify others, then it becomes more important for them to practice their testimony until their confession of sin can be transformed into a profession of faith.

Related

- Do What's Right (feat. Ed Hurst): Teachings of Jesus – Luke 16:19-31 (January 26, 2019)

Pseudo-Sex and Technical-Virginity

Jack · 11 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Sexual purity as a moral or ideological value does not equate to sexual purity in practice.

Readership: Christians, especially those who were involved in the Purity Movement;
Theme: Beating the Odds
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Foreword

This post is the fifth in a series of articles that examine several aspects of the Purity Movement. For an introduction, please read the first post, Picking through the fruit of the Purity Movement (2020/4/20).

A previous post in this series, On the Definition of Virginity (2020/4/22), touched on the difference between technical virginity and true sexual purity. This post examines this difference in further detail, identifies what was missing, and assesses the damage done.

The Lie: Technical Virginity equals Sexual Purity

One of the biggest lies touted by many of the proponents of the Purity Culture was an idea that was never described in titillating detail in books, nor was it explicitly stated from the pulpit. But the nuances and implications was clearly understood by naïve, sexually inexperienced adolescents.

The lie was this:

Sex that qualifies as “real sex” must necessarily have all the following characteristics before one can be said to have “lost one’s virginity”.

- It must be a heterosexual
- It must be a committed relationship, preferably with another Christian.
- The female must experience the Tingles with her partner.
- No form of birth control should be used.
- The male’s penis must be placed fully into the vagina.
- The male must ejaculate passionately and unreservedly into the vaginal canal.
- Body fluids must be delightedly swilled, mixed and mingled.
- The female must experience an exhilarating satisfaction with the act of sex, i.e. no regrets nor buyer’s remorse.

- The experience is worthy to claim as an N count, i.e. something to brag about.

Granted, this is a good description of an ideal sexual experience, and this is the partial truth of the lie.

But the problem here is that they had it all boiled down to a set of rules. That is, as long as you didn't have sex properly (as described above), you could still claim to be "Pure", purportedly with a clear conscience, and in the eyes of God.

For those who wholeheartedly bought into this set of rules about purity, and who were successfully able to play by these rules, it wasn't too difficult for them to sincerely believe they were still pure.

This was wonderful news for randy Churchian teens in the Purity Culture! Why shouldn't they go along with the Purity Culture? It's all good!

This level of permissiveness no doubt contributed to the popularity of the movement.

You see, it was an unstated assumption that these rules still allowed all of the following sexercises as fair play. For clarity, I'll refer to the items on this list as "pseudo-sex", but to be totally honest, these can be interpreted as nothing less than foreordinations of sexual intercourse.

- Being naked together
- Sleeping together
- Masturbation (using the hands to stimulate one's self)
- Mutual masturbation with a partner
- Light Petting (using the hands to stimulate the erogenous zones of the body)
- Heavy petting (using the hands to stimulate the genitals to orgasm)
- Dry humping (rubbing body parts together with the goal of orgasm while wearing clothes or underwear)
- Body slapping/banging (rubbing body parts together with the goal of orgasm while naked)
- Cunnilingus
- Fellatio

- Facials (stimulation followed by ejaculating on the woman's face)
- 69'ing (performing cunnilingus and fellatio simultaneously)
- Penetration with objects, such as dildos
- Titty banging (rubbing the penis between the breasts)
- Glansing (tickling the clitoris with the head of the penis)
- Fisting (inserting the entire hand into the vagina or anus)
- Anal sex
- Water sports*
- Rimming*

 If you don't know what this is, then you probably don't want to know.*

In addition, many young collegiate coeds who had easy and convenient access to a large number of potential partners, many of whom lived in the same dormitory building, could also engage in the following.

- Friends with pseudo-sex Benefits (FWPSB)
- Polyamorous pseudo-sex relationships (Poly-pseudo)

Of note, cohabitation (living together) and BDSM were not considered acceptable within proper Churchian culture, and this had been true long before the advent of the Purity Culture. However these were not as common in the 1990's as they are today, so it was seldom an issue. But other than that, nearly any form of pseudo-sex was fair game, because, "We're not going all the way! The Real Ideal sex is only for my husband/wife!"

Sexual Discoverie as a Black Swan Experience

As you might imagine, this type of thinking kick-started a mindset of denial, even before any interaction with the opposite sex had occurred. But most young people were somehow not aware that it was denial. This actually led many young people to become more proactive in exploring pseudo-sex promiscuity, because they assumed it to be "acceptable". As long as they didn't have "Real Ideal sex" they could still sell themselves off as "pure".

But in fact, any of these activities can still create feelings of guilt and shame, as well as soul ties. Not to mention, pseudo-sex can very easily lead into real sex, and this did happen to many initially sincere adherents to the Purity Culture.

When young people approached sex with this mindset, pseudo-sex became a Black Swan experience – an event having the following characteristics.

- The event is a surprise (to the observer).
- The event has a major effect.
- After the first experience, the event is incorrectly and inappropriately rationalized.

But it might be argued that in the case of the Purity Movement, the eventualities of any sexual liaisons were incorrectly rationalized before the event took place, and may have encouraged the event to unfold.

You see, many young people who were previously unaware of the yet-to-be-explored rages of the feral reproductive nature, and who were oblivious of their individual threshold of temptation, fell into a full grand-mal seizure of consummate desire after once tasting the fortuitous pleasures of pseudo-sex. Caught in the throes of passion, the urge to merge becomes irresistible, and thus, the humans' natural design to copulate is commensurately completed. And since abortion was considered morally wrong and socially verboten, these naïve dalliances led to some unexpected episodes of procreation.

Those who got sucked under the riptide of proliferous passion were forced to bow out of their social participation in Purity Culture. As a result, their absence prevented others from becoming aware of the carnal risks. Those who managed to retain their social connections were not taken seriously because of their broken testimony and admission of guilt (or the apparent lack thereof)

Some who fell actually lied and denied, all in order to maintain an air of dignity, as well as social inclusion and relevancy.

We also know how the female hamster tends to discount any sexual experience that was anything less than thrilling, which essentially supports an attitude of denial.

But it was never mentioned that this kind of experience is entirely natural and to be expected as normal, and that when this happens, then it's time to get married.

> "But I say to the unmarried and to the widows: It is good for them if they remain even as I am; but if they cannot exercise self-control, let them marry. For it is better to marry than to burn with passion."
>
> 1st Corinthians 7:8-9 (NKJV)

Concluding Statements

Maintaining your "virginity" in the Purity culture was the art of walking a fine line. It emphasized purity as an ideological value, but it didn't really emphasize purity as a practice. Purity in practice would require a thorough study of why purity is valuable in maintaining the vitality of the soul, and important in preparing for a strong marriage. (This is a teaching that has been missing from most churches for decades.) As a result, many well-intentioned young people were blindsided and lured into forfeiting their sexual purity without ever suspecting the deception.

From a historical perspective, we can see that the Purity Movement was a move in the right direction, because at the very least, young people had gained an authentic reverence for sexual boundaries – a vast improvement over the "Free Love" sexual mores of the previous generation. But still, the boundaries were too far away from what would be truly pure. In addition, ignorance, foolishness, and denial abounded.

Image credit: Black Swan (2010) starring Natalie Portman.

Related

- The Rational Male: Pseudo-Virginity (2012/3/26)
- Σ Frame: The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020/1/17)
- Cornerstone: The "Purity" Movement 2 (2020/2/22)

The need for Marriage Education

Jack · 15 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Education is important for building strong marriages. But what should be taught, and how?

Readership: Christians; Educators; Those supporting the institution of marriage;

Introduction

Under a previous post, I posed the question.

> "…from a broader viewpoint, I expect the Christian manosphere will eventually narrow down to this question: What is actually required to make male-female relations (i.e. marriage) "work"?"

Scott's post about the Meet Cute phenomenon, Probabilities (2020-2-24), elucidated the value and importance of the woman's level of enthusiasm towards the male from the onset of the relationship. But in the discussion since then, we found that even this is not enough. Readers have offered many supplementary solutions, but Scott and Sharkly pointed out that the problem is primarily a messaging issue. What message are young people getting about what is expected of young men and women?

> "Currently, men are held to the same, if not higher standards in marriage than ever before. They must be honest, hardworking providers. They must be gracious and kind when that is what is called for. They must strong and aloof when that what is needed. They must instinctively know the difference and seemlessly transition from "beta" to "alpha" behaviors with utter perfection. They must be accountable, head over heels in love with their wives, drooling over her and praising everything she does, everything she wears, etc. They must do this in front of all her friends, until she doesn't like it. Then, change. They must change diapers and do laundry, and look totally hot doing those house chores. They must curb their violent tendencies, until those violent tendencies are required by some woman nearby. They must wear stupid t-shirts about shotguns and dating their daughters, or dress like a fairy and put on makeup for Halloween. They must mentor the women they work with, unless "mentoring" comes across as creepy to that women, in which case they are sued for harassment. They must take risks, but not too much risk. They must not ask any questions of the woman they are dating related to her current situation. This makes you judgmental.
>
> That is the message men receive. All day, every day, from every corner of life.
>
> Women, in contrast get: Show up, you are awesome exactly like you are. There is no need to challenge yourself to do better. No need to be introspective about what a woman naturally brings to the table, or what drawbacks her feminine nature contains. You go grrrrrl. Any man is lucky for you to look in his direction.
>
> Multiply that by 3 or 4 generations, and here we are."

If she has had any feminist indoctrination at all, then this may eventually bear the fruit of indignation and divorce.

Is education (part of) the answer?

In the comments under a follow-up post, Sexual Consent in Marriage (2020-3-9), a tangential discussion brought up the need for young people to be properly educated about marriage in order to avail of the most optimal outcome.

Quoted texts have been adapted below in an easy-to-read format.

Lexet: I know of churches that require nearly an entire year of counseling before marriage. Having been through numerous premarital counseling books and programs, my suggestion is that singles looking to marry should read them before they are in a relationship. After you become engaged, it's too late to really look inside of the relationship. Most people will try to irrationally overcome differences rather than honestly evaluate them, because they have already spent a lot of money on the relationship, the ring, and the future wedding.

Jack: Even one year of counseling is not sufficient. Young people should begin "marriage education" in conjunction with "sex education" in the 9th grade. They should be taught that ideally (and according to Christian teaching), sex, marriage, and having children all go together as a package deal. I think teenagers know whether they should be married or not by the time they finish high school. Having "marriage education" included in the curriculum would help them plan accordingly. It is best if this is taught and demonstrated at home, but "marriage education" would cover those young people who don't have that.

Lexet: I'm surprised by how many guys I know who were raised in church yet are unaware that there are passages on a wife's role and what to look for.

JPF: I much prefer the suggestions about to start "marriage training" when the people are young. I would suggest at puberty.

The idea of a one-year training program, after the couple has already agreed to marry, is incredibly foolish. If they can wait an entire year without having sex, then why are they getting married to each other? 1 Cor 7.
And if they can't wait…. then why is the "church" putting them in such a situation of strong temptation? So this is foolish on two counts.
Even a program of "only" 3 months is stupid.

My wife and I married within a few months of meeting. Any church program would therefore have been a no-go, unless it was only a few sessions.
But, we both had a solid understanding of, and more importantly an acceptance of, what the Bible says about marriage. There were a few surprises for her, but she accepted instead of arguing or trying to "assert her rights".

And for the selfish women reading: I give far more to her than she gives to me. Not because she is lazy; she is not. This is just the nature of marriage… and similarly the nature of the relationship between God and men.

I know I'm not the first to say this, but I think all "church" marriage programs, and marriage books, should be thrown out and burned. Instead, read what the Bible commands about marriage. Then read what the Bible shows about marriage (e.g. Song of Songs, how Eve helped Satan to tempt Adam, even polygamy and what the typical results were).

Any man-made advice should be treated as third-rate advice, after both of the above. And should be allocated a minority of time in the course accordingly. Yes, this does mean the religious professional could not justify his paid salary with some 3 month-long course.

Conclusions

I see the need to put together a basic curriculum to offer to adolescents in order to educate them about what marriage is all about Biblical topics would include these.

Marriage is described as…

- Instituted by God – Genesis 2:18-24
- Honorable Among All – Hebrews 13:4
- Permanent Bond – Matthew 19:6
- Intimate Bond – Matthew 19:5
- Blessed of God for having children – Genesis 1:27-28
- Dissolved by death – Romans 7:2-3
- Means of sexual love (eros) – Proverbs 5:15-19; Song of Solomon;
- Centered in love and obedience – Ephesians 5:21-33
- Worthy of Jesus' presence – John 2:1-11

Marriage is figurative of…

- God's union with Israel – Isaiah 54:5
- Christ's union with His church – Ephesians 5:23-32
- The kingdom of heaven – Revelation 19:7-9

The purposes of marriage…

- Man's happiness – Genesis 2:18
- Continuance of the race – Genesis 1:28
- Godly offspring – Malachi 2:14-15
- Prevention of fornication – 1st Corinthians 7:2-9
- Complete satisfaction – Proverbs 5:19; 1st Timothy 5:14

Principles for marriage…

- 1st Corinthians 7
- Ephesians 5:22-33

Arrangements for marriage (Ancient Hebrew culture)…

- Arranged by parents – Genesis 21:21
- Consenting parties – Genesis 24:8
- Parental concern – Genesis 26:34-35
- Romance – Genesis 29:10-11
- Commitment is binding – Genesis 24:58-60; Matthew 5:31-33
- Unfaithfulness brings God's judgment – Hebrews 13:4

Ceremonies for marriage (Ancient Hebrew culture)…

- A time of joy – Jeremiah 7:34
- The bride is richly attired – Psalms 45:13-15
- The bride is veiled – Genesis 24:65
- The bridegroom is decked – Isaiah 61:10
- The wedding feast is in the bridegroom's* house – Matthew 22:1-10
- Distinctive clothing of guests – Matthew 22:11-12
- Christ attends – John 2:1-11
- Festivities surrounding marriage – John 2:8-10
- Gifts bestowed on the couple – Psalms 45:12
- Parental blessings – Genesis 24:60
- Change of name – Psalms 45:10-16
- Consummation of marriage – Genesis 29:33
- Proof of virginity – Deuteronomy 22:13-21

Prohibitions concerning marriage…

- Near of kin – Leviticus 18:6-18
- Fornication excludes remarriage – Matthew 5:32
- Polyandry forbidden – Leviticus 18:18

- Idol worshippers – Exodus 34:16; Ezra 9-10

Denial of Sex/Marriage…

- As a prophetic sign – Jeremiah 16:2
- For a specific purpose – Matthew 19:10-12
- As a sign of apostasy – 1st Timothy 4:1-3
- To those in heaven – Matthew 22:30

In addition to the Biblical proscriptions of marriage, many Red Pill tenets of the Socio-Sexual/Marriage Marketplace are very insightful and would prove to offer a rubber-meets-the-road type of map to marriage. Revealing topics to be covered could include the following.

- Human Nature – procreation is natural and normal
- How men and women are different
- Social Mechanics – how to meet suitable potential partners
- Sexual Dynamics – how to recognize the power and influence of the libido and how to take responsibility for it
- The Feminine Dilemma
- Male hypogamy and female hypergamy
- What do men find attractive when looking for a mate? (youth, virginity, fertility, WHR < 0.7, long hair, submissive, respectful, spiritually obedient)
- What do women find attractive in a man? (LAMPS, charisma, confidence, leadership)
- What is game and how does it work?
- What is reasonable to expect of marriage?
- What are the typical duties of husband and wife? (commitment, trust, faithfulness, sexual continuity)
- Why wait to have sex until marriage? (Sanctification and pair bonding)
- How to preserve one's potential for emotional bonding in marriage.
- How to obtain greater contentment within marriage.

Readers are welcome to make suggestions for additional topics.

Related

- Σ Frame: 13 Disciplines in Dealing with Delectable Daughters (2018-01-29)
- Σ Frame: Teaching our daughters well is the early foundation of successful wife moulding (2020-2-14)
- Σ Frame: Fighting Fires (2020-3-20)
- Σ Frame (Scott): Life education beats the smarm (2020-5-6)
- Dark Brightness: Towards a reformation of education (2020-5-22)

Only God can grant a successful marriage

Jack · 20 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

How do some people achieve a blessed marriage, while others do not? Maybe God might have something to do with it.

Readership: Christians; The married;
Length: 1,550 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

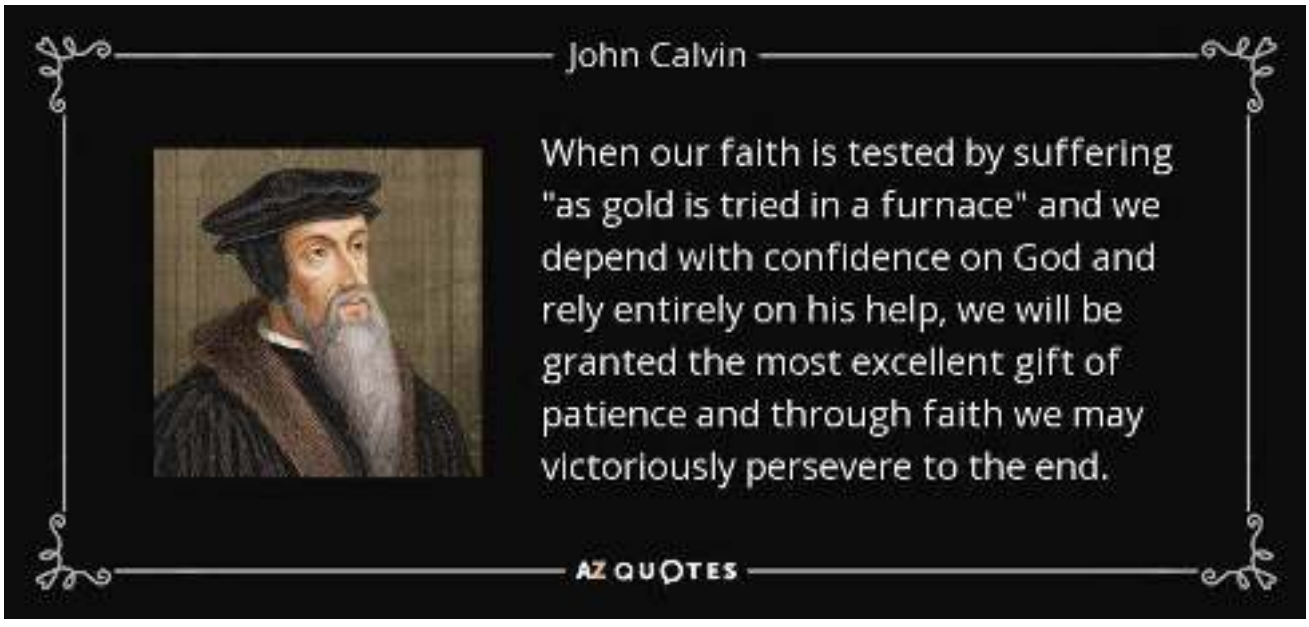
Coming to Faith

After reading Scott's testimony in How I Discovered that I Wanted to be Married (2020-4-27), it seemed obvious to me that there wasn't anything that he did (or didn't do) that took him closer to his desire of being happily married. In fact, it seemed like all of his doings only took him further away from it. He himself has stated on multiple occasions that he was clueless about why his marriage to Mychael has become blessed.

However, from reading his last post, We Marry Our Own Cross (2020-05-18), we do find some things he did which allowed him to eventually arrive at a blessed state.

1. One is his determination to keep trying, to keep going, to make the effort, and to do the work. This is essentially the element of commitment, and this was entirely his decision to do so.
2. Second, he had a strong desire for intimacy, and this desire humbled him enough to take action.
3. Third, he had a vision (based on his friend's parents' marriage) of what an ideal marriage should be like. There wasn't much logic or cognitive reasoning behind this. He simply believed in his heart that this was something he could achieve for himself, and he latched on to his heart's awareness of that blessing, and held on to it no matter what the reality of life was serving up to him.

Taken together, this is faith!



Coming to God

In a recent post, Start With Me Reprise (2020-5-16), Ed Hurst described this same dynamic of faith in spiritual language.

> "Faith cannot arise without humility. Humility is an integral part of how faith works. And without faith, it is > impossible to please God; you cannot return to Eden. Humility is nailing the fleshly nature or "carnal nature" to the Cross; it is turning the Sword of the Spirit against your own soul. Both of those parabolic images point to the same thing. The Bible uses other terms, like "death of self" (or denying self) to indicate things that cannot be explained. They are miracles, rooted in the Spirit Realm and defying explanation. Faith puts a death sentence on Adam-in-you, in order to give life to Jesus-in-you."

>
> "Scripture leaves us with the image of Eden being guarded by the Flaming Sword of revelation. That's not to block your entrance, but to restore faith [through humility] before you try to enter. You take that Sword into your own hands and use it against your own fleshly nature. It's the means by which you discern the thoughts and intentions of your own soul, by which you judge your own sin. This is why I say you should pray the wrath of God down by asking Him to start with you. You know from that experience with the Flaming Sword that it heals whatever good thing God has placed in your life, and slices off everything you got from the Devil. You long for His wrath, because you know what great good comes from it. You know that His wrath is His blessing."

The part in boldface is a long difficult journey for most. In my own or Scott's case, these thoughts and intentions are the things we felt like we needed to do in life. But for all our efforts (which turned out to be "efforts in the flesh"), we weren't able to find a way to make it work according to God's outline.

For Scott, it was pursuing Meet Cute experiences, serial monogamy, and getting married for the first time. He could probably add many other attempts to the list.

For me, getting married and having a family was something I always believed was God's will for my life. I could clearly see the error of Scott's approach, but I went to the opposite extreme, clinging to a path of legalism for many years. I could avoid sexual liaisons and women I deemed unmarriageable, but I couldn't find a way to get into a fulfilling Christian marriage. I didn't know how to make this happen until I started having sex in my early 30s. But through fornication, I found not just one, but a number of "Christian" women who wanted to marry me. And I also discovered that women use sex to qualify men for marriage. (Readers could argue that this approach isn't Christian, and I agree that it's not, but it is what it is. Go figure!) I would have never learned this important detail from going to church or reading the Bible. I realized that by pursuing purity, I was only keeping myself ignorant about how women operate.

Coming into Self-Awareness

For the longest time, and for the life of me, I couldn't identify what my sin was. Was it not being content with singleness and thinking that I should be married? Or was it being so legalistic that I rejected real opportunities to have a typical relationship, thinking it was little more than a temptation to have sex? Or was it discovering how to get into marriage through fornication? Or was it merely my ignorance? Or if there was something else, then what?

Over the past few years, I've realized that the entire culture (including the church) and the marriage marketplace (MMP) was stacked against me. Finding a blessed Christian marriage in this society is hopeless!

So in summary, there was all this confusion and sin that Scott and I had to wade through before we found our way in life. All this has made me realize that my sin is deeper than anything on the conscious level of my awareness. It is my nature. It is well-established. It is institutionalized. Until I can figure out who I am, and what the object of my faith is, and how to navigate in that direction, through my own brokenness and through this messy life, then sin is more or less unavoidable. And thinking that it could be manageable through my own efforts, is legalism — something that St. Paul continually warned against. I am sure this is why God chooses to be patient and gracious to us as we slowly pick up the learning curve on the trajectory of our own choosing. God never required us to be married, you know. It was our own choice, for better or for worse. Yet in spite of our grievous mistakes and meanderings, God picks up the slack, and even goes so far as to grant us the object of our desire, eventually.

> But without faith [and by extension, humility] it is impossible to please Him, for he who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek Him.
>
> Hebrews 11:6 (NKJV)

Coming to God is not the same as Coming to Church

Derek left one comment of extreme importance which has gone without response,

> "We should not look to the church for answers, for it has none. It is utterly lost, and the beer virus has unambiguously highlighted this for everyone to see. It is crystal clear."

Dark Brightness repeated this stance in The Antipodean Prophecies (2020 April 7).

> "You are worried about your job, as the suggestion that we should be nice is being weaponized. This world works by oppression and fear. We are to instead look to Christ. Not the church — it is converged, as an institution. Not at each other, for we are flawed. And not at the current results or productivity we have, for at times it feels that nothing real is happening."

That readers came to this conclusion through reading this post On the Significance and value of the Meet Cute experience (2020-4-3) is a source of amusement to me, because this further confirms one of the conclusions that…

> "…the Biblical conscription of marriage is d@mn near impossible to attain through an independent discovery."

Continuing with Derek's comment,

> "We can look to other Christians or members of our local community. Perhaps there is assistance to be found. But ultimately, you must rely on individual study and revelation from God. There is no other practical and consistent option.
>
> If you are a man who wants to find a wife, you must rely on God in a way that has rarely been required in history due to the breakdown of Christian institutions (including family).
>
> I got lucky by being in one of the few communities that still had viable Christian institutions. Ed, on the other hand, seems to be demonstrating the modern approach that must be emulated. A man, once red-pilled or 'born > again', must embrace Christ alone despite the difficulties of the approach."

Conclusions

> "God promises that he will not forsake those who seek him. Advice that we all can provide may or may not be useful, depending on context. But if you truly believe that trusting in God is a real and reliable thing, then you truly believe that it is the only consistent option. Indeed, difficult or not, it is a prerequisite."

So it comes down to this: If you've decided that you must be married, then you must find and trust God, or bust!

Related

- Σ Frame: Scott's conclusions on courtship and marriage incubation (2019-02-24)
- Σ Frame: Lest we forget, Marriage was once intended to Glorify God (2019-8-8)
- Σ Frame: The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020-1-17)

Countersink

Jack · 22 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Running it into the ground to set a new foundation.

Readership: Men;

Counter

adverb

1. In the wrong way; contrary to the right course; in the reverse or opposite direction.
2. Contrary; in opposition (usually preceded by *run*or go):to run counter to the rules.

adjective

3. Opposite; opposed; contrary.

noun

4. Something that is opposite or contrary to something else.
5. A blow delivered in receiving or parrying another blow, as in boxing.
6. A statement or action made to refute, oppose, or nullify another statement or action.

Sink

verb (used without object), sank or, often, sunk; sunk or sunk·en; sink·ing.

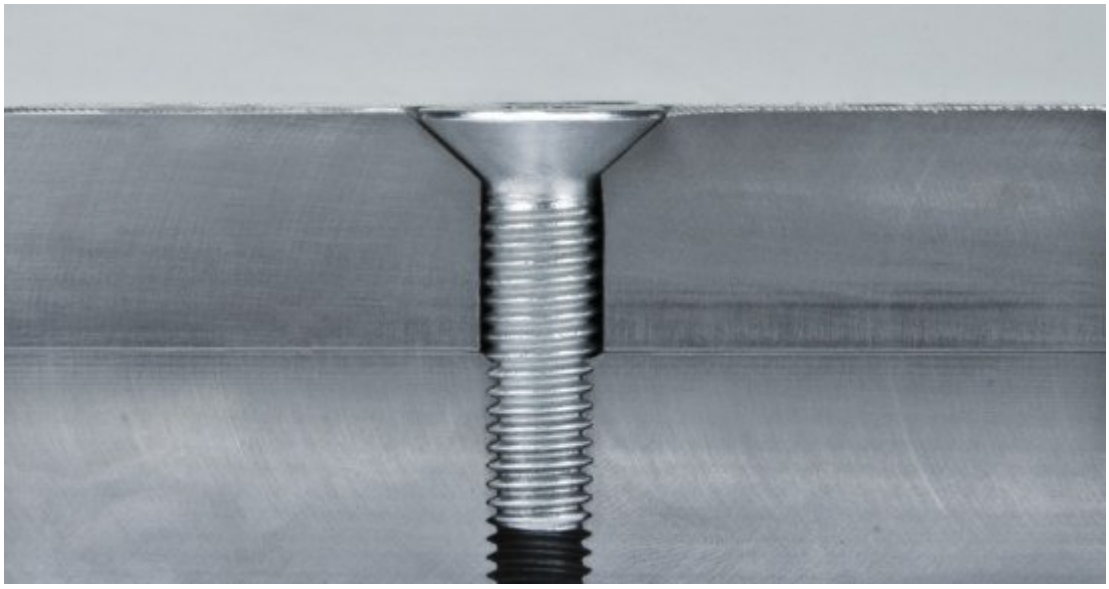
1. To displace part of the volume of a supporting substance or object and become totally or partially submerged or enveloped; fall or descend into or below the surface or to the bottom (often followed by in or into).
2. To fall, drop, or descend gradually to a lower level.

Yes, I'm inventing a new word for a new approach.



Sharkly's Divorce and the lackluster response from his church

Most readers are already familiar with fellow blogger Sharkly over at Laughing at Feminism. You probably also know that he's been tied up in messy divorce proceedings with a very rebellious and disagreeable wife for about three years.

For a period of time, which I'll guess might have lasted a couple years, he carried an entirely reasonable expectation of his church to enforce a hedge of discipline around his marriage. But instead of a strong response of solidarity, he only received a flurry of fake grins and guffaws, which served to smooth over their unresponsive laziness. When Sharkly demanded certain leaders of said church to be obedient to the scriptures by enforcing church discipline, one guy lost his temper, and the other leaders started to avoid him.

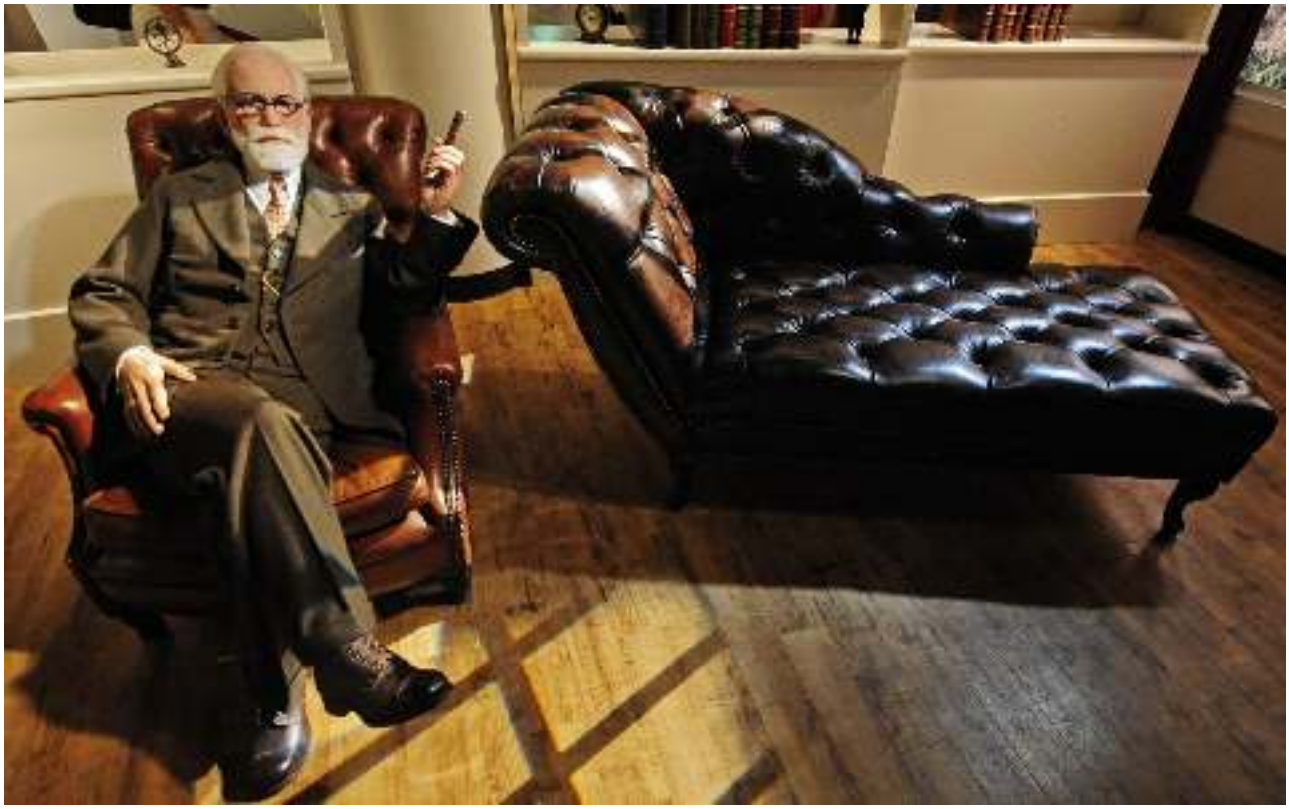
Sharkly found that not only did he have to fight against his wayward wife's selfishness, but he also had to fight against the listless spiritual recalcitrance of his church.

Instead of languishing in the pain of this reprise, about three weeks ago, Sharkly resorted to a radical Plan B. He opened a new blog, Whitewater Community Church, with the express purpose of exposing the scriptural inconsistencies of this church, and shaming certain members of his church for failing to provide a community of believers who would do the hard work of supporting the institution of marriage in this age of apostasy.

Sharkly announced the news of this bold move in his post, Help me put my boys' home back together (2020-4-30).

If you're interested in reading about it, click on the last two links above. Sharkly has received the support of a few Manosphere bloggers in separate posts listed here.

- Cornerstone: Dysfunctional Women (2020-5-1)
- v5k2c2: On the Christians and their hatred for families (2020-5-6)
- Gunner Q: When the Cult of Nice Breaks (2020-5-6)



Snippets of Advice for Sharkly

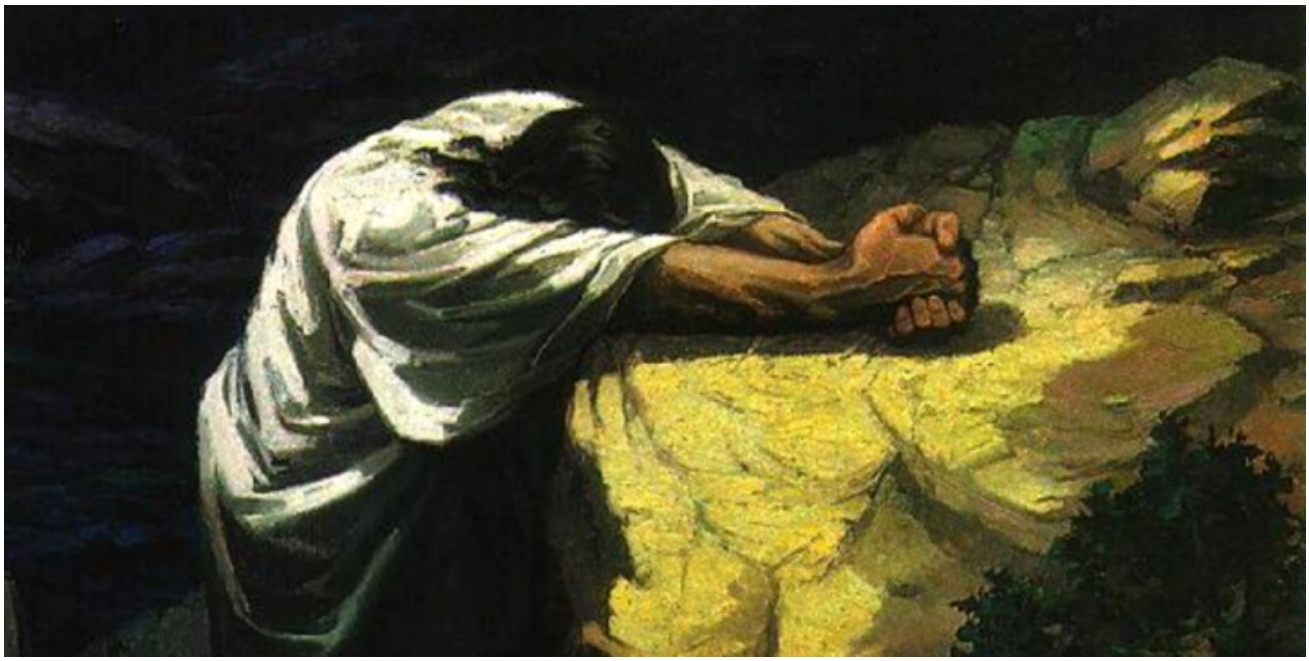
In addition to the above posts, Sharkly has received quite a lot of feedback from commenters. Under Sharkly's post, there appears a plethora of wisdom from many different voices and perspectives. I've collected a few of the star mouthpieces and compiled them here.

Nikolai admonished Sharkly to look within to find the problem.

> "With all respect and kindness, you have a problem deep down that you need to address. Nothing else can make a rich, handsome man fly across the country to meet and marry a low value woman, let alone put up with all the nonsense that followed.
>
> Lawyer up, get it over with, and turn your attention inwards to figure out what the hell went wrong.
>
> The church is the least of your problems."

I left my own ten cents.

> "Sharkly, I've read the first two posts at your new site. I'm amazed at the similarities between your marriage and my first marriage. Sad to say, I don't believe there is any hope of "converting" your wife and resurrecting your marriage. Although your expectations and demands may indeed be Biblical, it will only drive her further into rebellion. She doesn't need discipline as much as she needs the opportunity to experience true sorrow and repentance over the error of her ways. If she left you (instead of the other way around), and she wants a divorce, I would consider that to be an ugly blessing. I urge you to think about how you can exit this catastrophe with a minimum amount of damage to you and your boys, and give her the freedom to resolve her issues on her own terms.
> But more important than my opinion, you must decide for yourself what God wants you to do.
> All the best~!"



Deti offered an excellent piece of advice.

> "Your marriage cannot be salvaged. Your marriage is over. You cannot make your estranged wife come back to you. You cannot make her be your wife. She doesn't want to be your wife. I don't think she's physically, mentally, emotionally or spiritually capable of being your wife, or any man's wife."
>
> "For your sake, for theirs, you need to LET HER GO. Get a lawyer, figure out what your rights and duties are, do what the lawyer advises, offer her a deal with a reasonable and fair property division and settlement, and get the divorce over with. There is a time and purpose for everything under heaven, including a time to give up and to throw away (Ecclesiastes 3:6). It's time to give her up, give this marriage up, end the marriage, and let her go.
>
> Know that the reason the marriage cannot be saved is not because of you, but is because of her. You've done all you could possibly do to save it. You can leave with a clear conscience knowing that. But what you're doing now is not saving your marriage. What you're doing now is obsessing you, consuming you, and will ultimately destroy you. And I am concerned about what all of this is doing to you.

"But if the unbeliever departs, let him depart; a brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases. But God has called us to peace." ~ 1st Corinthians 7:15 (NKJV)

"You must treat her as an unbeliever. She is acting as an unbeliever. She did not keep her marriage vows. She had emotional affairs. Sharkly, it's very very likely she had physical affairs too. There's a whole, whole lot of smoke there: Talking to past lovers. Friending them on social media. Having explicit conversations. Her receiving dick pics (and her probably sending them explicit photos of herself). These things suggest a woman who simply does not want to be, and cannot be, married to you.

I urge you to let this go. Let her go. It's over. It cannot be fixed, repaired, or salvaged. Do it for your sake, and for the sake of your sons. Let your sons see a man who loved God and tried. Let your sons see a man who obeyed God and who gave it his best shot. But also, let them see a man who understood and faced reality. Let them see a man who knew when it was time to cut his losses. Let them see a man who was able to let go, and then was able to bounce back and rebuild his life.

Because that, Sharkly, is what your boys need now. They need an end to the strife. They need to see a man, you, their father, able to act wisely, prudently, and decisively in his own best interests. Because, Sharkly, the time will come when your boys will have to do that for themselves, and they will be able to look to you as the example.

And then, when you have let her go, you need to do what Nikolai said up there and look inward.

There is no way a wealthy, handsome man like yourself should have been flying across the country to meet women on online dating sites, even Christian sites. A man like you should have been able to find and attract women in your own locale or close to it. A man like you would have been, or should have been, EXTREMELY attractive to women all around you. Either you didn't see it or you were doing something to repel women or women were attracted to you and you failed to act.

Something in you wasn't working correctly when you met, dated, courted, and married your wife. You didn't choose wisely. You were unable to see that she wasn't right for you. Or you did see it and you ignored it. You either didn't see the red flags because you didn't know enough to identify them, or you saw them and ignored them.

> And it's probably not your fault. I had much the same upbringing as you did, though I was much more limited in my resources and ability to find suitable women. Look, man: Everyone lied to you growing up. There's no getting around that. Your parents, your teachers, civic leaders, the men you knew, the adults around you – they all lied to you. Girls lied to you. Everyone lied to you. You didn't pick it up like most others did. You got used and taken advantage of.
>
> But now you know. Now you understand it. Now you understand how women work. Now you can see the red flags. You know now to avoid them.
>
> Use that knowledge to rebuild your life, a life without your wife. End this idea of changing everyone around you and getting them to help your wife. End this idea of changing your wife. Abandon this idea of holding her, other men, other women, and a church, accountable. Forget that. There are no systemic solutions. There are only individual ones. Stop playing Don Quixote and tilting at windmills. Stop entertaining this foolish notion that you can fix the system. You can't. You cannot change others. You can change only yourself. Direct all this energy to changing YOURSELF and teaching your sons what the adults in your life didn't teach you or that you didn't learn. Devote your energies to your sons, who really need to learn what you've learned.
>
> You learned it the hard way. Help your sons learn it the easier way. Help them so hopefully they will not go through what you went through. Help them so they will not suffer as you did. You cannot help your wife and you cannot save your marriage. Let them go. Save what can be saved: Yourself, your sons, your sanity, and your future.
>
> Let them go."
>
> "Another thing:
>
> Your boys' home as it exists now cannot be put back together. Your wife destroyed it to the point that not one stone remains standing. The best that can be done now is to give them a different home, one you have built yourself, and one that works according to biblical principles and Red Pill truths.
>
> I can't, and won't, help you reassemble a home built on the folly of returning a mentally ill, spiritually blind wife to you. That's a foundation of sand. I will help you build a new home on the rock of the Red Pill and on the Rock. The latter is all that can be done now."

Deti's words are good encouragement for any man who is going through the wringer.

Contrary to Deti's words of resolute resignation, Bee123456 expressed hope that Sharkly's approach might bring some compensation.

> "Three reasons why this could work:
>
> 1. Sharkly saw noticeable improvement in his wife when a counseling pastor held her feet to the fire. If he could find another pastor to do that, then more improvement could be had.
> 2. Sharkly found a counselor that has a 90% success rate treating intimacy anorexia. Of course both parties have to be willing and that is why I do say the odds are still very slim for success. But if a strong, firm pastor insisted that she go to this counselor, maybe she would go with some openness.
> 3. Most of us have not seen this done before, a wrongly divorced guy rallying commenters to shame a church and its leaders. Before the internet and inexpensive websites, this was not doable. Maybe this will work.
>
> Even if this does not work for Sharkly, it does seem like a good idea to expose the foolishness of the Seeker Friendly church movement; "come as you are", "everyone is welcome", women pastors so we can be relate-able, etc.
>
> Thinking out loud here, and this is where I and Sharkly could be totally wrong; the Scripture you shared from 1 Corinthians 7 says to let the unbelieving spouse go in peace. Maybe fighting against her leaving and the public shaming of her enablers is not letting go in peace."

That last sentence poses a question that only Sharkly can answer, as he must be the one who counts the costs… and the rewards.

Feeriker wrote,

> "Finding a counseling pastor, or even a professional Christian counselor who isn't pussywhipped/cunt-worshiping and who will hold THE WIFE accountable for her behavior within the marriage is nigh on impossible today. Sharkly might very well have found the last of a dying breed in the pastor who successfully > got his wife started on the right path. If so, that's a tragic and horrifying indictment on the state of both the church and the Christian Counseling profession.

>
> Beyond that, my own experience of having walked in shoes very similar to Sharky's leads me to endorse Deti's and Nikolai's conclusions, although certainly without enthusiasm. I, too, resisted that conclusion and fought tooth and nail to salvage my first marriage, but ultimately realized that it was impossible. It takes two to make a marriage work, but only one to destroy it. When one half makes it clear that they are determined that the marriage is over, it's over."
>
>
>
>
> "…while I might be pessimistic about saving Sharkly's marriage, I am wholeheartedly on board with exposing, shaming, and, if they persist in the error of their ways, hopefully helping to precipitate events that will destroy Whitewater Community "Church" and others just like it. These churchian organizations are a cancer on the Body of Christ!"

Blackjack also had some very reasonable arguments which essentially agreed with Nikolai and Deti.

Swanny River added,

> "If the likely divorce comes to pass next month, then Sharkly's sons need prayer for knowing to reject their mother, follow God, and yet to somehow still honor her.
> I don't know what honoring a woman like that would look like, but if they are to follow the Lord, then they'll need great maturity to do that, and yet to reject all of her dark and sinful manipulations. Maybe a new wife and red pill home will be the incubator for his sons to grow that way, but if not, they need our prayers, which you are probably already doing since you are reading and commenting here.
> Your willingness to go to war was blessed by God, and Sharkly had a later stage intervention in his marriage than yours perhaps, so I can see your advice as being consistent with what you (and Feeriker and Nikolai) have learned. However, I see Sharkly being faithful also, even though it is from a weak position, tactically speaking, compared with when you drew the line for your wife. But he has written before, and maybe you didn't see it, but if the divorce is made final, then that is when he plans to apply 1st Corinthians 7."

Yes, it is a war, and the stakes are high. Too many men have been laundered and hung to dry.

If a man doesn't stand up for his family, home and livelihood, there is no hope for the future.

What is the sum value of prolonging the fight?

Deti and Nikolai are urging Sharkly to gracefully bow out, do some introspection, and start afresh. This is good standard advice for the man who is financially destitute, spiritually ruined and emotionally devastated by the breakup — the man who needs to put himself back together again before he can do anything else in life.

But I don't get the impression that Sharkly is a broken man, so I won't give the same advice. Not just yet anyway, and for a reason that no one brought up in the comments.

If a man has the conviction, the fortitude, and the financial security to kick back, then he should. If every man who was cucked and frivolously divorced came back with a sucker punch from ɦəll, then the converged infidels would quickly fold, and the dawn of a new era shall appear.

> [12] And we urge you, brethren, to recognize those who labor among you, and are over you in the Lord and admonish you, [13] and to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. Be at peace among yourselves.
> [14] Now we exhort you, brethren, warn those who are unruly, comfort the fainthearted, uphold the weak, be patient with all. [15] See that no one renders evil for evil to anyone, but always pursue what is good both for yourselves and for all.
> [16] Rejoice always, [17] pray without ceasing, [18] in everything give thanks; for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus for you.
> [19] Do not quench the Spirit. [20] Do not despise prophecies. [21] Test all things; hold fast what is good. [22] Abstain from every form of evil.
> [23] Now may the God of peace Himself sanctify you completely; and may your whole spirit, soul, and body be preserved blameless at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. [24] He who calls you is faithful, who also will do it."
> ~ 1st Thessalonians 5:12-24 (NKJV)

If wimmin want to play dirty, there is no reason why men should sit quietly and do nothing, especially for the sake of “peace” when there is no peace. Men should take right action for a noble purpose.

Declare a war of attrition. Let’s see who goes under first.

Don’t do it out of revenge or spite. Do it out of conviction. Do it because it’s courageous. Do it because it’s the right thing to do. Do it to honor the institution of marriage. Do it to glorify God. Do it for the boys!!!

Concluding Statements

What Sharkly is doing is ugly as hell, but someone has to do it. Someone has to sound the charge. Someone has to send a clear message that…

1. The institution of marriage and family is not to be toyed with.
2. F*cking around is unacceptable behavior for those who profess Christ.
3. Feminist broads are of the devil.

I won’t tell Sharkly to sit down and shut up. No, I will urge him on!

Whether she ever comes back, or s1uts off forever, it is not in your hands. But you might have some control over how much she can steal and destroy. Either way, let her not attack nor destroy your marriage without full awareness of her actions, accompanied by remorse and regrets. Perhaps the Lord might then use this tribulation as a call to her repentance.

According to a recent update from Sharkly, his efforts have already began having an impact!

Related

- Laughing at Feminism: Sharkly – Heresiarch or Church Reformer? (2019 October 15)
- Overman Warrior: Waco had a point: If we wanted to, we could easily kick the crap out of our government (2020-5-21)

Der Breedergroomer's Fahrvergnugen

Jack · 25 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A satirical examination of the word origins of bride and groom.

Readership: All
Theme: Beating the Odds
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 4 minutes

Bride

The word bride originated before 1000 from Middle English; Old English brȳd; cognate with Dutch bruid, German Braut, Old Norse brūthr, Gothic brūths.

The origin is related to the Old German word for bridle, having the following definition.

noun

1. Part of the tack or harness of a horse, consisting usually of a headstall, bit, and reins.
2. Anything that restrains or curbs.
3. a link, flange, or other attachment for limiting the movement of any part of a machine.
4. A rope or chain secured at both ends to an object to be held, lifted, or towed, and itself held or lifted by a rope or chain secured at its center.
5. A raising up of the head.

verb (used with object), bri·dled, bri·dling.

6. To put a bridle on.
7. To control or hold back; restrain; curb.

verb (used without object), bri·dled, bri·dling.

8. to draw up the head and draw in the chin.

Bride is also connected to the French word for breed, having the following definition.

verb (used with object), bred, breed·ing.

1. To produce (offspring); procreate; engender.
2. To produce by mating; propagate sexually; reproduce:
3. To improve by controlled selection.
4. To raise (cattle, sheep, etc.)
5. To cause or be the source of; engender; give rise to.
6. To develop by training or education; bring up; rear.
7. To produce more fissile nuclear fuel than is consumed in a reactor.
8. To impregnate; mate.

verb (used without object), bred, breed·ing.

9. To produce offspring.
10. To be engendered or produced; grow; develop.

11. To cause the birth of young, as in raising stock.
12. To be pregnant.

noun

13. A relatively homogenous group of animals within a species, developed and maintained by humans.
14. Lineage; stock; strain.
15. Sort; kind; group.

Now were getting down to business. The comprehensive meaning of bride might be summed up as “the bridled breeder”.

Groom

noun

1. A bridegroom.
2. A man or boy in charge of horses or the stable.
3. Any of several officers of the English royal household.
4. Archaic. A manservant.

verb (used with object)

5. To tend carefully as to person and dress; make neat or tidy.
6. To clean, brush, and otherwise tend (a horse, dog, etc.).
7. To prepare for a position, election, etc.
8. (of an animal) to tend (itself or another) by removing dirt, parasites, or specks of other matter from the fur, skin, feathers, etc.: often performed as a social act.

Groom is thought to be related to the Old English word, grōwan, which means to grow.

Bridegroom

The word bridegroom originated before 1000 from late Middle English (Scots) brydgrome, an alteration of the Middle English bridegome, which came from the Old English brȳdguma.

In modern English, the –er suffix is added to the end of a word to indicate "one who does the action". For example, baker, painter, writer, etc.

I've taken the liberty to add the –er suffix to groom to produce the noun groomer, meaning "one who grooms" (the bride). Likewise, -er can be added to bridle to produce bridler, "one who bridles".

If we combine breed (the old literal meaning of bride) with the augmented word groomer, we have breedergroomer. Alternately, we might choose the word bridler as an equivalent substitute for groom, thereby producing breederbridler.

Conclusions

In summary, instead of the common phrase the bride and groom, we might substitute any of the following.

- The Bridled and the Bridler
- The Bridled and the Breedergroomer
- The Breeder and the Bridler
- The Breeder and the Breedergroomer
- The Bridled Breeder and the Bridler
- The Bridled Breeder and the Breedergroomer

Any of these synonymous phrases are more accurate in meaning, and more appropriate for signifying the respective roles in the hierarchy. These modifications do offer a strong suggestion of mid-20th century German socialist animal husbandry, but given the feral nature of women, I suppose that's exactly what it is!

Der Breedergroomer's Fahrvergnugen!!!

Related

- Illimitable Men: Dominance & Submission (2017/2/5)
- Σ Frame: Disciplined, Submissive, Happy Wives (2018/2/15)
- Σ Frame: Authoritative Love, Marital Discipline, and BDSM (2019/3/15)

Warmer winds shall waft anew.

Jack · 27 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Do you have a latent prophetic gift?

Readership: Christians
Theme: Beating the Odds
Length: 950 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

The Revelation

On Sunday, May 10, 2020, I had the impression that prophecy will make a resurgence.

> [28] "And it shall come to pass afterward
> That I will pour out My Spirit on all flesh;
> Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy,
> Your old men shall dream dreams,
> Your young men shall see visions.
> [29] And also on My menservants and on My maidservants
> I will pour out My Spirit in those days.
> [30] "And I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth:
> Blood and fire and pillars of smoke.
> [31] The sun shall be turned into darkness,
> And the moon into blood,
> Before the coming of the great and awesome day of the Lord.
> [32] And it shall come to pass
> That whoever calls on the name of the Lord
> Shall be saved.
> For in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem there shall be deliverance,
> As the Lord has said,
> Among the remnant whom the Lord calls. ~ Joel 2:28-29 (NKJV)

This passage in Joel is quoted by the apostle Paul in Acts 2.

> [17] 'And it shall come to pass in the last days, says God,
> That I will pour out of My Spirit on all flesh;
> Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy,
> Your young men shall see visions,
> Your old men shall dream dreams.
> [18] And on My menservants and on My maidservants
> I will pour out My Spirit in those days;
> And they shall prophesy.
> [19] I will show wonders in heaven above
> And signs in the earth beneath:
> Blood and fire and vapor of smoke.
> [20] The sun shall be turned into darkness,
> And the moon into blood,
> Before the coming of the great and awesome day of the Lord.

> [21] And it shall come to pass
> That whoever calls on the name of the Lord
> Shall be saved.' ~ Acts 2:17-21 (NKJV)

The Application

I believe prophetic ability is not as rare as we have been conditioned to believe. Part of the issue is that we have been confused in thinking that prophecy is limited to a supernatural or paranormal ability to predict the future, and that this may have occurred in ancient times, but doesn't happen anymore. Granted, some prophecy appears in the form of foreseeing the future, but prophecy is not limited to only appearing in this expression.

Men like Dark Brightness, Vox Day, Ed Hurst, Adam Piggott, Gunner Q, and now Sharkly, have exercised their prophetic abilities through blogging. Secular men with similar giftings, such as Rollo, Roissy, and Boxer have done the same, although within a limited context. Likewise, Jordan Peterson has utilized his gifting to develop and refine the globalist agenda.

The time has now come for more Christians with prophetic abilities to step forward and offer their services towards building the Kingdom. Your service is desperately needed.

Discovering your Gift

If you have any of the following experiences, then you may have a prophetic ability.

- You have vivid dreams.
- You can discern the applied interpretation of vivid dreams.
- You experience synchronicity.
- God speaks to you directly in prayer.
- You have thoughts which are not your own.
- You have an extra-sensory perception (ESP).
- You have mental visions during prayer.
- You "see" things in your mind's eye which do not arise from your own imagination.
- You have the ability to recognize parabolic truth.

- You have a reliable gut intuition about what is right or wrong, and true or false.
- You possess a unique insight to recognize patterns and behaviors that others don't seem to notice.
- You have the ability to detect the thoughts and motivations of others.
- You have the ability to communicate with the natural world (e.g. plants, animals).
- You can communicate using telepathy.
- You recognize applied theories of paranormal activity and their indicators in reality.
- You have the ability to sense paranormal activity.

If you have any of the above, I urge you to begin exploring your prophetic ability. God does not give us such abilities to be hidden away and unused.

If you're just not sure, then pray about what God wants to tell you, or what He might show to you.

If you have the conviction that you are "getting a message", then confide in others about it. Tell them that you need help to test and refine your intuitions. Keep a journal of your impressions.

Concluding Statements

To really get started in a prophetic ministry, you must grasp the nature of divine revelation and what God is telling you to do.

You need to absorb divine justice. Until you can think in terms of divine justice, you cannot hope to make sense of any prophetic movements in your spirit.

I doubt there is any textbook manual that can help you develop your prophetic gifting. You just need to be more aware of your own intuitive ability and the leading of the Holy Spirit until you can develop a reliable sense of what is necessary to restore God's justice to this earth, at least within your sphere of influence.

The application of the prophetic always begins with an application to the personal. As your confidence grows, so will your domain.

Don't expect too much help from organized religion. Most institutions fear a prophetic gift that they cannot control. Your pastor may not appreciate what you bring to the table, your individual gift, nor what you require of him.

The church might even discourage the exercise of prophetic gifts for any reason. The most bothersome reason is that prophets always demand changes to be made.

You are His advocate, an emissary for His cause. His cause is to restore us to Himself.

Related

- Σ Frame: Current Trends in Prophecy (2020/3/13)
- Radix Fidem: Make It Your Own (2020/4/10)

The Elimination of the Church

Jack · 29 May 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Without support from the church and nuclear family, getting into a solid marriage is a long shot.

Readership: Christians; especially those who were involved in the Purity Movement;
Theme: Beating the Odds
Length: 1,900 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

This post is the sixth in a series of articles that examine several aspects of the Purity Movement. For an introduction, please read the first post, Picking through the fruit of the Purity Movement (2020-4-20).

The Dead Body of Christ*

Last week's three posts covered the institution of marriage. One thing that became evident in these postings is this: In the process of courtship, and in maintaining our marriages, we need to rely on a larger community of believers. But in fact, we cannot, because the church is corrupt or defunct, and our marriages and families have suffered accordingly.

In centuries past, the church played a central role in providing a moral setting for social interactions, which included not only births, baptisms, marriages, and funerals, but also town hall meetings, barn raisings, political bandstanding, and coordinating makeshift or temporary shelters for weary travelers, the homeless, and orphans. Moreover, the church was the heart of the community.

But over the past 50 years or so, people have no longer relied on the church to perform these extra social functions. As a result, the church's ability to serve people in this way has grown rusty from disuse, if not altogether forgotten.

For some reason, people never noticed the disappearance of the churches' role in our lives. Why not? Probably because it was the result of several changes in how many churches were managed and conducted, and these changes transpired slowly over a few generations. Looking back over my lifetime involvement in the church, some obvious changes included…

- Changes in technology, especially the advent of the internet.
- Contemporary Christian music replacing traditional hymnody.
- The convergence of Church doctrine with various precepts of the wider culture, especially Chivalry and Feminism.
- The rise of ecumenicalism.
- The sensationalism of Pentecostal televangelists have eroded the public's veneration for men of the cloth.
- Widespread reports of fiscal corruption and sexual sin among popular priests, preachers, and evangelists.

Among those who were marginal or cultural Christians, it became fashionable to be more or less spiritually "preoccupied" with various Idols of the Tribe. For example, those with a relatively high SMV were busy worshipping the fruits of the sexual revolution, and low SMV duds and snits were busy worshipping chivalry and feminism, respectively.

False Prophets

Something extra was needed to electrify this Frankensheep, to get him morally upright, and walking down the aisle. Enter the false prophets.

Underneath the introductory post, Jason made the following statement.

> "I found it a bit strange that a man who wasn't even 20 or barely entering his twenties was garnering so much media attention for this "amazing new, revolutionary way to date"."

Yes, Harris was young when those books came out!

Deti wrote,

> "Harris not only recanted the purity movement, he renounced Christianity, thus calling into question all his guidance in God's name."

These two comments bring me to wonder how Harris was able to write such an original viewpoint with so much authority – and then gain so much notoriety. Some questions follow.

- By what spiritual authority did Harris speak?
- Where did he get his inspiration for his books?
- Did Harris have a ghost writer?
- Was he a mouthpiece for a hidden entity?
- Or was he merely a mouthpiece for the hidden desires of his generation?

How many teenagers read Harris' admonitions in a spiritual vacuum, without the tempering wisdom that might have been offered by a father or a pastor?

The Sheep Perish because of a Lack of Knowledge

> "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge;
> because you have rejected knowledge,
> I reject you from being a priest to me.
> And since you have forgotten the law of your God,
> I also will forget your children." ~ Hosea 4:6 (ESV)

In the Purity Movement, there was a lot of education about the importance of purity, and the consequences of sexual sin. But there was a total lack of education and guidance regarding how to find/attract a suitable life partner, and actually get into a marriage.

On this point, Lexet wrote,

> "I don't think many churches (mainline evangelical) taught biblical purity and chastity when discussing purity culture. The accounts of those brought up in the movement indicate that whatever the youth were taught was fear-based acts. I don't think they ever understood the "why" of the movement.
>
> You can tell a person "don't do X" all day. What they will know is to not do X. You have to teach them the logic behind not doing X.
>
> When you look at the types of churches that were big on the purity movement, it comes as no surprise that they weren't teaching the "why". They were in it for the fad and the attention… or book sales."

Lexet is right. From my own experience of the Purity Movement, I distinctly remember a diffuse, unnamed fear that was prevalent. This fear caused a trifurcation of moral realism. One group took abstinence to the prudish puritanical extreme and shot themselves in the foot in regards to their MMV. Another group dabbled in sexual relations without "going all the way", and used their technical virginity as a false psychological justification for remaining pure. A third group was comprised of those who engaged in clandestine fornication and dealt with the stigma by either keeping it a secret, or else putting social distance between themselves and others in the Purity culture, all done in order to reduce the risk of possible exposure and the resulting shame.

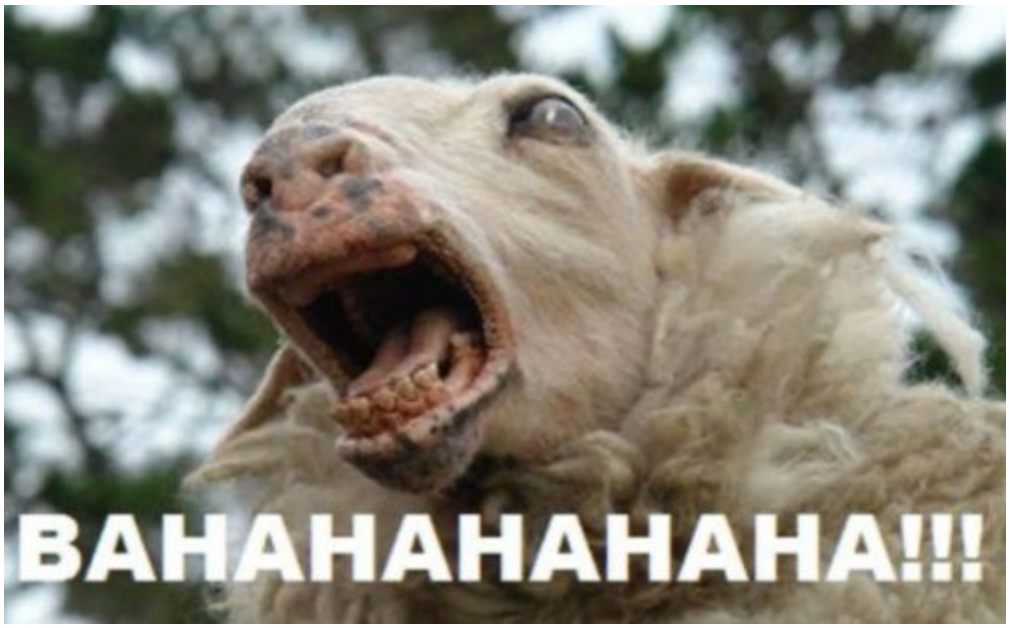
Of course, some had already decided that they were going to explore their sexuality, and they could not handle the denial or duplicity of the second or third group respectively. These individuals chose to leave the church altogether.

At the same time, liberal and profuse justifications of these deviations from morality abounded (e.g. “single mothers need love too”; relaxed dress codes being the norm; the belief that love justifies immoral intimacy; etc.). These lies were mostly due to influences from secular culture.

- The value of exercising self-control was replaced by the moxie of “Finding Yourself™”.
- A sense of purpose waned and was transformed into the “Fear of Missing Out™” (FOMO).
- The immediate satisfactions of profligacy appeared to outweigh the arduous task of denying the fleshly nature.
- Any long term benefits of obedience became obscured.
- Any rewards of obedience were presented as abstractions which carried little guarantee of fulfillment.

As you can see, the path of obedience became exactingly legalistic and detached, while the path of disobedience was prevalent in the wider culture, and well-justified. Those who tried to straddle the fence for the best of both worlds had to swallow an assortium of lies to do so.



Pumping fresh Blood into a Corpse won’t bring it back to Life.

In a previous post, A New Patch on Old Cloth (2020/4/29), we looked at how Christian ethics and expectations of sexual purity were starkly out of place in the modern socio-sexual/marriage marketplace (SS/MMP). Although the objective of retaining sexual purity was entirely good and right, it was a heavy burden imposed on young people who were unable to follow through on such expectations. The reasons for dabbling in sexual sin and disobedience may have been any of the following, or possibly others.

- They did not have a clear vision of God’s will for their lives.
- The SMP offered too many opportunities, and too many temptations.
- They did not have a strong purpose at stake, and the willpower to follow through.
- They did not (or could not) detect the negative spiritual consequences of sexual sin.
- They did not have enough faith to appreciate the purpose and the value of the discipline.
- They were not emotionally mature enough to take a serious approach towards the commitment of marriage.

- Although the Purity Culture dished out a stern warning against sexual sin, there was no social structure present that would encourage and enforce a serious attitude towards courtship.
- There was virtually no clear path towards securing a marriage. It was expected that "marriage will just happen when you're ready", but actually, nothing good ever just happens in life.
- Many churches could not even offer a pool of eligible singles large enough to allow assortative pairing. The church was the last place any young person would go to seek a spouse.

With any combination of the above, it would be very difficult for a young person to make good on the revised path towards marriage.

In addition, the wider secular culture offered attractive alternatives to the Purity Movement. For those who were willing to forfeit their involvement in, and being accepted by the Purity Culture, it was extremely easy to get off the hook for any indiscretions. "It's easier to get forgiveness than permission." (See the list in the previous section for more justifications.)

Concluding Statements

Over the past four decades, the notion of the church holding a central place in one's life has passed from familiarity, if not dismissed as being overly zealous or outdated.

Instead of a strong functional church being the heart of the community as it was in centuries past, social atomization, filtered reality, and post-truth have become the new norm.

The church leadership as well as churchian culture have been totally inept in terms of generating a marriage-minded environment that provides a forum for Christian courtship. As a summary of the key points contained in this post, these inadequacies include…

- The doctrine was converged with the values and goals of feminism and chivalry.
- Relevant knowledge was "politically correct", gynocentric, and wholly inadequate.
- Books on "Christian Dating", brimming with unrealistic half-truths, replaced real mentorship.

- A recondite fear prevailed.
- Moxified lies and alternative lifestyles from the secular culture were attractive and well-accepted.

All of the above deficiencies were a result of a weakened church and a laissez-faire social environment within an atomized community. Without a strong family-based community to guide and support Biblical Courtship, a Biblical marriage just can't happen by accident. Thus, it should be no surprise to see how the Church was unable to deliver the most basic fundamental needs of its flock. In particular, the church was logistically unable to act as a central social support network to be used to launch a social program like the Purity Movement.

It seems like it took years before Dalrock's expose of converged churchianity began to sink into the collective awareness of the Christian masses. The slow but steady momentum of his message stands as a testament that the truth is hard won, and it's not coming through the pulpit.

But even now that it is evident that the spiritual nature of the church has been corrupted through the spirit of this age, and its function has grown decadent, the real lament which has gone unmourned is that the heart of the community had already been long dead.

 Christ Himself is not dead. The phrase "the Body of Christ" is a common New Testament metaphor for the Church as a collection of those who are in Christ. The Church is called "one body in Christ" in Romans 12:5, "one body" in 1 Corinthians 10:17, "the body of Christ" in 1 Corinthians 12:27 and Ephesians 4:12, and "the body" in Hebrews 13:3. The Church is clearly equated with "the body" of Christ in Ephesians 5:23 and Colossians 1:24.*

Related

- Σ Frame: Fighting Fires (2020/3/20)
- Σ Frame: The need for Marriage Education (2020/5/15)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Everything always goes back to the family (2020/5/15)

Come and See Hades

Jack · 1 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Most people don't have any idea what ɦəll is like. Here is one film that captures the true wormwood flavor of perdition.

Readership: Adults
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes
Warning: This post contains offensive language and videos that contain violence and graphic scenes. Continue reading at your own discretion.

Introduction

I've never appreciated horror films. Whenever I happen to see one, it strikes me as being utterly stupid, childish even. It's nothing more than a drama drenched bloodbath. Nothing to see here unless you're a goth teenager who dwells on death and who wants to have the "thrill" of being grossed out. (BTW, such individuals find a twisted satisfaction in the defilement associated with viewing such things, probably due to being under a curse of some sort.)

For me to have any appreciation of a horror genre film, it has to correlate very strongly with the reality of the spiritual world. There is only one horror film that I can remember seeing that came acceptably close to my very particular satisfaction, and that is The Exorcism of Emily Rose (2005).

But then recently, I came across a Russian film on YouTube, Come and See (1985).

Come and See

The film's title derives from Chapter 6 of The Apocalypse of John, in which "Come and See" is said in the first, third, fifth, and seventh verses as an invitation to look upon the destruction caused by the Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse. Revelation 6:7–8 is particularly relevant to the film.

> "And when he had opened the fourth seal, I heard the voice of the fourth beast say, Come and see! And I looked, and behold a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him. And power was given unto them over the fourth part of the earth, to kill with sword, and with hunger, and with death, and with the beasts of the earth."

One commentary stated that this was the most terrifying film ever made, and it wasn't even listed as a horror film. It was a historical documentary covering the Nazi atrocities in Belarus. I watched the excerpts, and found that the director had truly captured the spiritual environment of ɦəll — and I'm an extremely picky critic on these matters of spiritual accuracy.

Come and See was a big box office hit in the Soviet Union, but it never saw the light of day in the West. The director said this film would never be acceptable to American audiences because it is presented as a real event. I have to agree. Americans could never stomach the horrors of ɦəll as being a living reality.

What is a Nazi?

Since World War II, the word Nazi has been used as a slur to denigrate and reject others. But what exactly is meant by calling someone a Nazi?

Here are a few concepts that characterized the Nazi party during the time of its greatest popularity in Germany.

- Machine-like quality and precision.
- Nationalization of banking and industry.
- National socialism as a form of government.
- Racial purity and organized eugenic programs.
- Valuing ideological purity among members of society.
- The beautiful vision of pastoral 18th and 19th century European culture.
- The preservation, advancement, and glorification of the white (Aryan) culture and race.

But from the Russian perspective, the Nazi's represent the following.

- Death and ɦəll.
- Reveling in barbaric yet precision quality cruelty.
- Atrocities against humanity during a time of war.

German soldiers on the Eastern Front, 1941/6/22.

Bastards are the Spawn of Həll

As a corollary epiphany, seeing this film made me realize that growing up in a broken home can give a child the impression of ɦəll as being a normative state of his non-shared environment.

This is particularly horrible if the child is relatively comfortable and well cared for, and has no noteworthy events that would clue him into the fact that his life is a living ɦəll. This spiritual blindness is exacerbated if he is also immersed in reading the Bible and attending church regularly. The perilousness of this state is that he may never come to the realization that he grew up experiencing ɦəll first-hand. He is literally a son of ɦəll.

If a child spends much of his formative years living in such a reality, then the familiarity of ɦəll and the absence of God's presence forms an indelible effect on his personality and soul. There's a real reason why the word bastard and it's near equivalent, son of a b!tch, have a negative connotation.

Noel Hadley at The Unexpected Cosmology has put up a post that examines the origin of a whole generation of bastards in the 19th century. The Lost World of the Mud Flood: Fallen Women, Foundlings, and the 19th-Century Human Reset (2020/5/24). Take a look if you want to see colorized images of the hardscrabble sons and daughters of early American industrialized ɦəll. Here's one image that makes a hard impression.

All the boys in this photo are clearly bastards. The blatant spiritual confusion, the subterfuged fear and angst can be clearly seen in their eyes and faces. Physical abuse and cruelty puts a hardset gleam in the eye, but I only see this on a few of them. The deadpan dufus expression you see here on every single face is one of being rejected by mother and father, and thrown into a confusing, loveless, joyless world of ɦəll.

Conclusions

Now snap back to the present.

Feminazi now takes on a new significance in meaning.

Like pre-WW2 Germany, Feminazi's see their agenda as being entirely right and good. But from the other side of the gender war, they bring Death and ɦəll.

The divorce rate hovers around 50%. 40% of children are growing up in single parent homes… et cetera, ad infinitum, ad nauseum… I won't go into it further. You've seen these statistics before, and are well familiar with them.

Do you know what kind of children are being produced in this mess? Bastards.

You know what's coming next…

You won't need to "Come and See", because Həll will come to America!

Related

- Amerika (Brett Stevens): Spiritual Nationalism (2020/5/24)

Introducing Katie and the Future of Human Mating

Jack · 3 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Reality show takes the feminine imperative for alpha seed to the eugenic limit.

Readership: Men;
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 1,000 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

Labor of Love

Fox's new reality show, Labor of Love, depicts fifteen guys competing against each other for one woman, Katie Katzmann, AKA Kristy.

Bachelor FanTake: My Problem With Labor of Love (2020/7/19) Length: 11:17

The goal is not to marry her, and not even to get a date with her.

The goal is to IMPREGNATE her!

As Horsemanbombadil said,*

> "This has to break one of the seals of the apocalypse."

So who is this modern queen Guinevere?

About Katie Katzmann

- She's 41 years old.
- She's been around several carousels for the last two decades!
- She "stuck the landing" and got married for the first time at the ripe cold age of 37.
- She had a wedding ceremony that focused solely on her.
- She divorced her husband only 6 months later.
- Now she's looking to satisfy her need for alpha seed.
- She's shameless enough to broadcast all this on national TV.

Why Katzmann?

I'm asking myself, Why Katzmann? Why not show off a fresh nubile hottie for this theatrical display of feminine vanity?

One of the first things I noticed about Katzmann's photos is that she has a persistent 1,000 c0ck stare. That gleam of inner soul derangement is unmistakable. Becoming an adulteress cougar was the inevitable.

Other than that, Katzmann looks fairly good for a 41-year-old. I'm sure she was a stunner at 25, which is when she should have been thinking about conceiving a child.

But the thing that makes Katzmann uniquely of interest to the Liberal media is that she is one of those rare women who has actually achieved the feminist ideal.

Except on two points.

- Successfully remarrying after blowing up her belated first marriage. But this can be foregone if there is a sufficient cash influx.
- Having the fabled 2.1 kids. But actually, just one will satisfy the Feminist ego.

In order to preserve the narrative, it has to be shown that at least one woman in the whole wide world can achieve all these goals to make the feminist life script complete. By showing that it can be done by at least one woman, TPTB can fuel the hopes of the younger upcoming generation of future harpies, Karens, and Katies to continue following the script, simply "because Katie did it!"

Furthermore, since this is a "reality show", I am guessing that Fox might be toying with the idea of airing what used to be considered soft p0rn0graphy but is now rather common.

After all, 15 men shacking up with one cougar is bound to yield a daily entourage of group sex, double or triple penetration, spit-roasting, and the like.

Men Line Up to Submit their Fapplications for Retrocucktion

From the Chicago Tribune.

> "Katzmann is starring on her own TV show, "Labor of Love," which is scheduled to premiere at 8 p.m. Thursday on WFLD-Ch. 32. It's clear from the start that the Fox series does not have the same premise as "The Bachelor" or "The Bachelorette." Instead of mingling at a pool party, the 15 contestants are asked to give a sample of their swimmers for an analysis to see if they are able to father children. Katzmann watches as each suitor takes a turn in the mobile collection center.
>
> "So awkward. We were all uncomfortable, and I think honestly, though, that ended up being one of the best things for a lot of reasons. I think because one of my biggest fears going in was that these men would not be there for the right reasons," Katzmann told the Tribune by phone. "And if they were willing to go through that screening pretty much moments after meeting me, then I knew that they were serious."
>
> Chicago Tribune: Chicago woman wants love and a baby on the new Fox show 'Labor of Love.' Here are 5 things to know. (2020/5/19)

I'm wondering what "the right reasons" are in her mind.

In the not so distant past, Christian Women Demanded Men to Marry Sluts With Debt and Tattoos (2020/2/3), and cucks were still signing up for this raw deal. At least the lucky cucks got a sweet marriage certificate to show off to mommy. But that deal is now off. Nowadays, even marriage poses too much responsibility for women.

Now, "the right reasons" are nothing short of an eager willingness to deliver what is clinically certified to be top quality seed, accompanied by a gratuitous romantic affirmation, followed by cash child $upport payments, and with no further strings attached, except maybe a D!ck on call when she happens to feel lonely.

The Future of Human Eugenics

If the Gubmint-Hubbie takes this any further, then we're looking at the future of human mating. Imagine it. Men submit a sperm sample for quality assessment and DNA analysis. Females can choose from the best studs among hundreds of contestants. The lucky man is awarded one shot in the hole and is then saddled with 20 years of child support payments — that is, IF her last egg is still fertile.

But this approach cannot succeed indefinitely, simply because it shortcuts God out of the family… in sooo many ways!

Naming a New Archetype

Recently, the Karen meme has seen the rounds on social media and it has hit the mark pretty well.

Now we're observing another archetype of modern wimminhood, a Katie!

A Katie is a woman who has wasted her youth, beauty and fertility chasing after the Feminist Life Script, who then pulls out all the stops to achieve her goal of bearing a child using only one of her last three eggs.

Meme this~!

 H/T: horsemanbombadil @ Spawny's Space*

Note: The original video from Red Pill Men's Health was privatized. A similar video from Bachelor FanTake has been substituted.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Eternal Fate of Carousel Riders (2018/5/30)
- Daily Mail: 15 men compete to IMPREGNATE a 41-year-old divorcee on bizarre reality series Labor of Love – which sees them undergoing parenting tests and even offering sperm up for fertility checks (2020/5/21)
- Bachelor FanTake: My Problem With Labor of Love (2020/7/19)
- Σ Frame: Revisiting the Beauty of Purity (2021/4/9)
- Σ Frame: Photo Comparison: Lively Affect vs. S1ut Eye vs. 1,000 C0ck Stare (2023/10/7)

Small Schisms and Large Schisms

Jack · 5 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Within Red Pill discussions, there needs to be a distinction of the Christian ideal.

Readership: Men; Christians; Christian Men; Red Pilled readers;
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 500 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

schism

1. A separation or division into factions.
2. A formal breach of union within a religious body, especially a Christian church.

Small Schisms

In a previous post, The Overton Shake (2019/9/30), I examined how the Overton window has divided to form two distinctly separate Overton windows within the Left and Right factions. I gave two examples of this phenomenon, one on the Left (Facebook) and another on the Right. For the latter, I described how Dalrock was taking issue with various manifestations of Feminism within the Church and society, while Boxer pointed out how Dalrock's efforts might be counterproductive — or worse. The schism between Dalrock and Boxer illustrated how the Overton window has split even within the Right wing. This post also offered a theoretical analysis of Boxer's motivations for doing so, which was intentionally mimetic of the way Boxer had assessed Dalrock.

Boxer didn't respond to the gibe until he wrote this seething post four months later.

> "Jack's overarching contention seems to be an attempt at a defense of his religion: Christianity. Jack is offended by my lack of faith, and my propensity to criticize Christianity when its adherents make fools of themselves. Jack is absolutely correct, that I consider the average Christian to be an immoral scumbag, and given that Jack has volunteered himself as a typical Christian, we can immediately segue into a list of his lies:
>
> 1. Jack suggests that I am an agent provocateur, who tries to get men in the manosphere into legal trouble.
> 2. Jack suggests that I am attempting to get Dalrock's real-world contact information, for publication on the internet.
> 3. Jack claims that I have been banned from the Dalrock blog.
> 4. Jack claims that I resent people for their anonymity.
>
> v5k2c2: A Homeless Shelter for Castoffs and Misfits (2020/1/28)

I won't get into a detailed rebuttal on each point, because it was not my intention to use this parody to defame him, but only to provoke a critical thought experiment. The thought experiment was whether these things could be true about Boxer. I left that question out for the reader to ponder.

From a wider perspective, we can see how my discussion of Boxer and Dalrock in The Overton Shake could illustrate how easy it is to recast the character of a blogger and to create schisms. Boxer illustrated this again in his response, which makes the point obvious. I'll call this kind of response, "Stoking the Fire".

More recently, Boxer offered yet another example of Stoking the Fire in his post, Aesthetic Theory and Rape Porn (2020/5/27), in which he has come up with more things to throw at me. Now, Boxer thinks I'm into bondage porn, and if that were not funny enough, he is (ostensibly) offended by it. LMAO!!!

On an opportune tangent, I'll answer a couple questions he poses in this post.

1. Boxer asks whether Derek (ramman3000) is an author at Σ Frame. To answer Boxer's question, Derek is the fourth top commenter, and a valued commenter at that, but he doesn't have an account as a contributing author.
2. Boxer also asked whether Jason (lastmod) had been banned from Σ Frame. Jason has been put into moderation because of repeated violations to the comment policy, most notably are (1) crass sarcasm which comes across as trolling, and (2) attacks on other commenters. Furthermore, at the time I put him on moderation, he was the number one top commenter, and had almost twice as many comments as the next most prolific commenter, and nearly all his comments were filled with vitriolic jabs. I just decided it was enough. Jason is still welcome to leave comments, and when I review the comment folder (about once a week), if I find that his comments have everlasting value, then I'll be happy to approve them.

lastmod says:
2020-05-23 at 11:26 pm (Edit)

> My blog is useless. I know this, what I discuss, think or believe no man (or woman) for that matter would even consider. It's not because I am "so unique" it's merely just an outlet. I won't attempt to dissect Sharkly's marriage with facts because I can't call up his wife and ask her. His church "won't" be coming over to my blog to discuss it, nor should they.

Back to the topic of schisms, it should be obvious by now that this is how schisms can contribute to the split in the Overton window.

1. Take snippets of quotes.
2. Make extraneous assumptions that suit one's particular viewpoints.
3. Recast quotes in a different context.
4. Assume a cause and effect relationship.
5. Assign blame accordingly.

In the past, points 1 through 3 were called a "spin". Stoking the fire builds on a spin by adding points 4 and 5 with the intent of making the target appear egregious. To offer some other unrelated examples, Dalrock stoked the fire with feminism and churchianity. Sharkly is stoking the fire with Whitewater Community Church. The MGM nooz networks also stoke the political fires by spinning tales regularly.

In conclusion of this schism, it is clear that Boxer took it personally, and was offended by my cross examination. I interpreted this offense as evidence that the allegations are probably not true, which is good news.

Nevertheless, he has since made it clear that I am not welcome to comment on his blog. That's fine. I'll respect his request. But his offense presents a secondary evidence that Boxer and I have less in common than what I had previously supposed, which is not very good news. Boxer has stated that he thinks I am offended by his lack of faith, but I think it's closer to the truth to say that his lack of faith is offended by my presumption of faith. I still read his blog regularly, and v5k2c2 continues to be listed on my sidebar.

No hard feelings. Come Home brother!

Note to the reader: Screen shots are only used as evidence when you think the author might change the text for some reason.

But Boxer wasn't the only one offended by this illustration.

> [It weighs] heavy on my heart that people I know from the blogging world, especially people within the sphere of writers that can be considered "red pillesque", pro male, or even the red pill adjacent religious types. I have seen informative and entertaining works from many. But I have also seen "unpurposeful" attacks on each other. I have two people whose works that I subscribe to that have started their own schisms, including individual "soldiers" lining up for an occasional skirmish.
>
> I don't take sides. I wish these people would quash their beefs like it was "olden times" and be gentleman. I have seen shitty feminists (and astrocucks) fund huge failing websites with horrific writing while quality writing from our side of the culture war dies because of infighting. I would rather be the guy that tells you that you are both being assholes than a person who picks sides.
>
> Let's get back to work. The shittiest people in history are winning because we squabble. If we are going to be separate entities; put our "hate" into our work and leave folks on our side out of it. Go back to helping men and living better lives. Men on the margins and younger impressionable men need the help.
>
> Free Matt Podcast: Choosing To Not Give In To Schisms (2020/1/31)

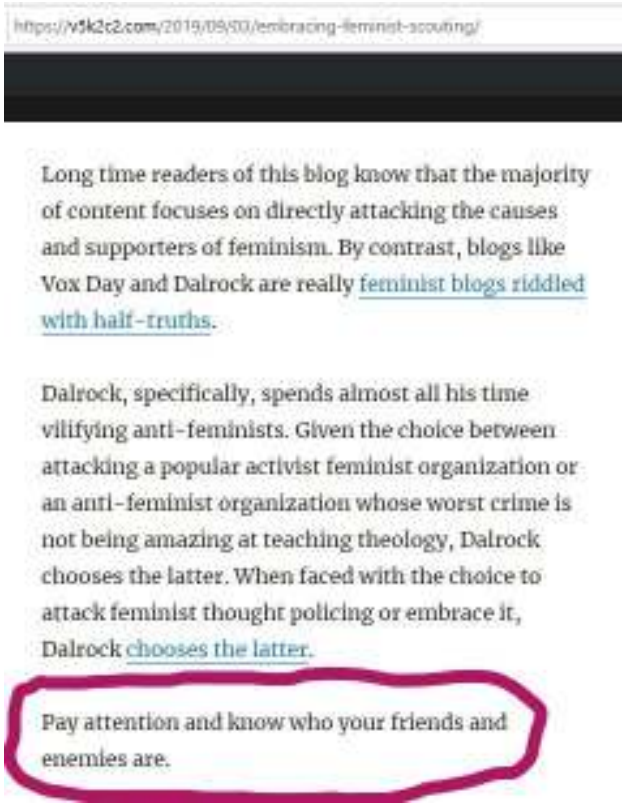
Sadly, I concur with Matt. But sometimes schisms are necessary.



Big Schisms

There is a schism going on, but it's not (really) between me and Boxer. The schism that has developed is a secession of Christian Red Pill from secular Red Pill.

In recent posts this year, I have found the need to write with more clarity regarding certain differences between Red Pill lore and Christian ideologies.

Biblical Gender Roles has also recognized this need, and has spearheaded a study that compares the Red Pill to Scripture. He has found that although there is a lot of agreement, there is a fundamental difference in methods and purposes.

Under BGR's post, Is the Red Pill Concept of Game Biblical? (2020/1/31), Jonadab the Rechabite and Sharkly have captured these differences succinctly in two comments.

Jonadab the Rechabite wrote,

> "I wonder how deeply our presumptions are programmed by the frame of romance. We swim in an ocean that treats the feelings of passion and romance as the highest form of human bliss. Movies, books, music, and art all seem to elevate romance above virtues like truth, justice, and beauty. Yet it is the same pursuit of the feelings of passion that leads to fornication, adultery, and ironically sexual denial. This is because the feelings of passion and romance are the context for sex — not a covenant. Of course, this exalted view of romance is so nineteen eighty; no longer is simply romance the context of sex, but consent. Consent is based on the same premise as abortion, "our bodies, our selves". If a woman can do whatever she chooses with her body, then the sin of a wife sexually withholding, and the sin of the murder of her unborn children, are subject to her whims and caprice. My point is that Biblical ethics regarding sex are occluded by an overwhelming acceptance of romance culture."

> "Part of [Blue Pill] romance culture is, of course, chivalry. The term has been used in many ways, but the most widely understood use is the image of the white knight fighting for the princess; either defending her honor, her life, or her sins. In the culturally defining tale of Lancelot, he fought for the honor of Guinevere, which he knew was a lie. He himself was the adulterer who betrayed his king. Yet he fights against truth and justice. Lancelot is not viewed, even in the church, as a villain but as a handsome warrior who made the ladies of court swoon. In other words, a white-knight to be emulated. In Biblical jurisprudence, both he and Guinevere committed a capital offense.
>
> If not romance, then what? Nature abhors a vacuum and something will fill the void.
>
> Of course, the answer is covenant. Marriage is a type of God's relationship with His people, His elect. The biblical word for this relationship is covenant. Sex, according to scripture, is not predicated on romance or consent, but covenant. Now sex is union, being made one. As the church is to seek union with Christ, so a husband and wife seek union through sex. Denial of sex is the picture of the elect rejecting union with the > Lord.

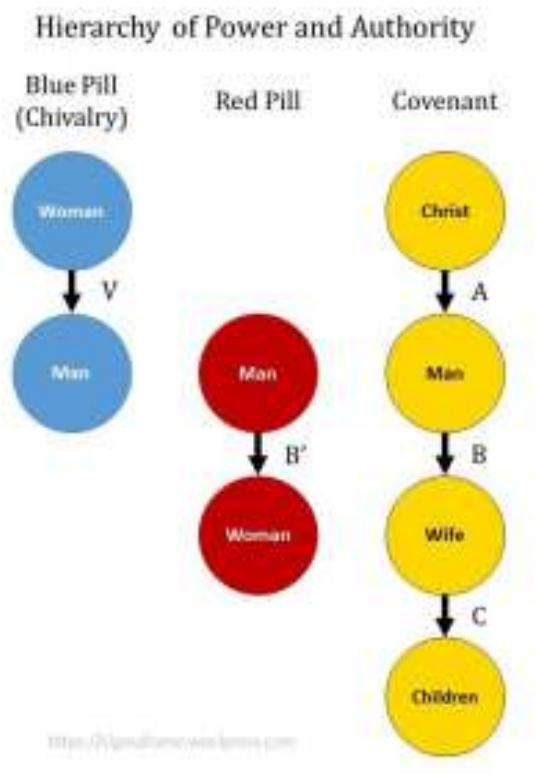
>
> The “Red Pill” picture is one of Christ manipulating the church to desire Him more than their idolatrous inclinations. Those idolatrous inclinations in women are called hypergamy. Red Pill men seek to manipulate women to desire him more than their hypergamous inclinations. That picture is perverted. Yet it is consistent with the teachings of the church. I have had so-called Biblical marriage counselors tell me “happy wife, happy life”, and if my wife is sexually withholding, then “God has called me to be celibate”. They are like Lancelot defending the dishonor of a sinning wife and projecting themselves as virtuous men. It seemed to me that these counselors were more concerned with their own SMV than with biblical ethics. I attribute this to the zeitgeist of romance culture and willful ignorance of the ethics of a Biblical covenant.”

Jonadab summarizes these differences concisely as follows.

> “Blue pill denies the fallen nature of women.
> Red pill seeks to exploit the fallen nature of women.
> Biblical covenant seeks to sanctify fallen women as Christ sanctifies His church.
>
> Blue pill men worship women.
> Red pill men seek [to be worshipped by] women.
> Covenant men seek to bring their women with them to worship almighty God.”

These differences are depicted in the following image.



Sharkly emphasized one similarity between the Red Pill and Covenant relationship, namely that both structures have the man in the place of authority over the woman.

> “I don’t think that one should be ignorant of how to harness a woman’s nature. We are to be wise as serpents and to live with our wives according to knowledge. Although it is best if you can just tell her to show you more respect, and she does it, sometimes it is also handy to know a few other methods to assist her to see to it that she reverences her husband, when she might be struggling to do that.”

Conclusions

In many of my past posts, I (as well as Deep Strength) have alluded to these differences between the secular Red Pill, and the Christianized Red Pill, but I haven't analyzed the differences point by point as well as BGR has in his series.

The separation and distinction of the Christian Covenant structure from the Red Pill praxeology is an important and pivotal development. The Red Pill is largely an amoral description of human psychology and behavior, whereas the Christian Covenant recognizes human psychology and behavior, but adds to this awareness an aspiration to a God-ordained ideal.

I propose that the Christian exegesis of Red Pill precepts should be called something else, just to be more specific and to avoid confusion in future discussions. Maybe "the White Pill", or "the God Pill", or something else would do. Readers may offer suggestions.

Related

- Σ Frame: A Brother is Borne Out of Adversity (2018/6/10)
- Σ Frame: The Egosyntonic Art of Tone Policing (2019/5/31)

The Narrow Way

Jack · 8 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The current Marriage Marketplace is as narrow as it gets.

Readership: Christian Men
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 500 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

Under the previous post, AngloSaxon attempted to articulate an aphorism of Red Pill orthodoxy.

> "Red pill orthodoxy is avoid marriage like the plague and shag random bitches."

To me as a Christian, this statement is not correct, but is rather a perverse amalgamation of different but somewhat related ideas. Let me explain.

I agree with Honeycomb in that the Red Pill is basically the approach of facing the bitter, uncomfortable truths about women and life in general. Overall, it's better to face the truth, but what a man does with this information rests entirely on the individual man.

Avoiding or rejecting marriage is one conclusion based on a Red Pill analysis of the current state of the marriage marketplace. It has become obvious that marriage is a horrible deal for the average man these days, so for many men, this may very well be the best option available. But that doesn't mean that marriage is always a bad choice for all men, or that it can't be done successfully. There will be some men for whom marriage is a good and right choice. However, considering the current SMP, a man has to be extra careful and wise in making this step.

"Shagging random b!tches" is essentially the old PUA attitude of taking whatever you can get. A Red Pill analysis does suggest that the opportunities for doing this have never been better. But it doesn't mean that every man should make sexual promiscuity his life mission as Roosh did.

Because of the above reasons, I would not call AngloSaxon's statement an "orthodoxy" per se, but rather the simplified conclusions that many secular Red Pilled men might come to. Forgoing marriage is not anti-Christian at all, provided that a man can control his lusts. However, "shagging random b!tches" is not a valid application for the mature Christian man. Christians must therefore believe that there is another way.

> “Enter by the narrow gate; for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leads to destruction, and there are many who go in by it. Because narrow is the gate and difficult is the way which leads to life, and there are few who find it.”
>
> Matthew 7:13-14 (NKJV)

Many of my writings here at Σ Frame try to identify what this other way might look like for a believer. So far, I can say that it is difficult, complicated, and narrow indeed, seemingly impossible unless you have a bit of faith. But I can also say that embarking on the narrow way is determinant of one building character, developing charisma, and having a long journey of personal and spiritual growth. Comfort and happiness, not so much, unless you stick with it until later in life.

Like it or not, this is the will of God for us as men — that we might obtain Life Everlasting. This is one of the main reasons why there must necessarily be a schism, as described in the previous post. Christian men must stake out and pursue the narrow way, which is an arduous task that non-Christian men could never hope to do.

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: The FYI on Male Sexuality (2015/8/4)

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

Jack · 10 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The double standard is a false impression arising from an incomplete judiciary account.

Readership: Christians
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 950 words
Reading Time: 5 minutes

The Double Standards around Sex

In his post, Double Standards Around Sex – The purest example of the feminization of Christianity (2020/6/9), Deep Strength presented a comparison of two, nearly identical posts that appeared on r/Christianmarriage, Women please don't deny your husbands and Men, please don't deny your wives. The only differences between these posts were the pronouns men / women and husbands / wives.

The messages were…

> "Sex for a husband / wife is so essential. Please don't undermine how important that is to a husband / wife who desires his wife / her husband, but doesn't get any romance.
>
> Keep your marriage alive!"

By comparing the reactions to each of the two messages in the comments sections, we're looking at the difference in the reactions of husbands and wives to the same message.

Deep Strength's Assessment

Deep Strengths summary of the comments on each post were as follows.

On the reactions of wives urged to not deny sex to their husbands…

> "Literally a list of excuses why women shouldn't have sex with their husbands. You know, the one they agreed > to “have and to hold.”

On the reactions of husbands urged to not deny sex to their wives…

> “Men being told to stop looking at porn, and men owning up to denying their wives.”

Note that these are the reactions of disobedient wives who are justifying their behaviors.

> “Men being told to stop looking at porn, and men owning up to denying their wives.”

Note that these are the reactions of disrespectful wives demanding obedient husbands.

So in summary, we see a lot of reactions from disobedient, disrespectful, and perhaps defrauded wives, but we aren’t seeing a lot of response from disobedient husbands complaining about how their wives are too contentious, too disrespectful, or too fat to F*ck.

Deep Strength claims (in the title) that this difference is due to the feminization of Christianity. I will argue that it is not, but is instead a result of…

1. Admitting women’s arguments as the predominating view.
2. A selection bias based on the inherent differences between the sexes.

However, Christianity does become feminized when we let whiny women dominate the discussion.

Appearances are Misleading

First, I want to point out a few important things that have gone unnoticed.

- Women who don’t want to agree with the scriptural command not to deny sex to a spouse will fight and argue in an effort to justify their actions and continue in their disobedience.
- Men who don’t want to agree will just avoid the issue altogether.

- Women who agree and repent would just do it and never talk about it.
- Men who agree and repent are outspoken about their repentance

In addition, the people who are not vocal about this issue (obedient wives and disobedient husbands) are actually discouraged from speaking out!

- Obedient wives won't talk about their sex life because it would seem too immodest, and it would betray the interests of, and shame other wives who prefer to be disobedient. (Actually, obedient wives should be talking about how passionate they are towards their husbands, letting others know that obedience has value, and shaming disobedient wives into submission in the process!)
- Disobedient husbands won't talk about refusing their wives sex because they would rather avoid the issue. If they talk about it at all, it would lead to an unwanted confrontation.

Those who are vocal about this issue (disobedient wives and obedient husbands) have a self-centered motivation for speaking out.

- Disobedient wives are attempting to dominate the narrative.
- Obedient husbands gain brownie points and social approval for being a good husband.

Yet, we continue to entertain the harpies arguments as serious admissions, while downplaying or ignoring the men's viewpoints. It's essentially a femcentric attack on men.

Reframing the Reactions

In summary, the people who are vocal about this issue are disobedient wives and obedient husbands. So theirs are the viewpoints most often seen, to the point of saturation.

We don't hear the viewpoints of repentant wives and rebellious husbands. So it's easy to overlook these viewpoints.

The misperception of this outcome is that, on the surface, it comes off appearing like women should have the option to refuse sex for whatever reason seems appropriate to them, while men should apologize and toe the scriptural line. People are likely to believe these views as being true simply because it's what they hear most often, as evidenced in the comparison of these two posts.

To counteract this imbalance, men should be more adamant in offering their own viewpoints on the issue, and this includes both obedient and disobedient men alike.

Conclusions

I don't believe that the different reactions are directly due to the feminization of Christianity, but is merely a biased impression gained from those who are outspoken and not from those who are not.

However, the feminization of Christianity rears its ugly head when this biased impression based on a feminized narrative is naively put forth to be the whole truth about the sexes and marriage.

The real truth is that men and women have a completely different reaction when being confronted with the commands of the scriptures.

- When being repentant and obedient, women become quiet and demure, and men become outspoken and authoritative.
- But when being corrected on their failures to follow through on their marital duties, men clam up and women become contentious.

Moreover, these respective reactions are typical for men and women who insist on clinging to their selfish disobedience.

Related

- Σ Frame: Women are Tempted to become Masculine, Men are Tempted to Wimp Out (2017/8/17)
- Σ Frame: Don't Admit Her Argument (2018/3/19)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Consent in Marriage (2020/3/9)
- Coach Greg Adams: Why do Women go to Bars and Nightclubs? (2020/4/26)

Looking at the Essentials

Jack · 12 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Young people need to think on two (or more) planes when selecting a mate.

Readership: Singles; Parents of adolescents and single young adults; Christian mentors;
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 1,900 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

The Flesh is Strong

Let's think about the mate selection process.

When people are young, they tend to focus on the stereotypical traits of attraction in the opposite sex. Women focus on finding a confident, charismatic, and handsome man with a successful career. Men focus on finding a girl with feminine appeal — soft-hearted, slender, unsullied, and vivacious. They might have a mental image of what this person looks like. They might have a checklist in their heads about what kind of person they are "looking for", usually things that are socially reinforced, things that are proper and acceptable to discuss.

But in reality, we often see individuals pair up with someone who is far from the stated ideal. Bystanders might sigh and shake their heads, but no one ever asks why.

The general answer to the question of why is because they are living in the vanity of their minds, seeking to gratify their fleshly desires (Ephesians 4:18), and they are not paying attention to the deeper characteristics of their respective natures and how that might play out in a long-term relationship.

> "[5] For those who live according to the flesh set their minds on the things of the flesh, but those who live according to the Spirit set their minds on the things of the Spirit. [6] For to set the mind on the flesh is death, but to set the mind on the Spirit is life and peace. [7] For the mind that is set on the flesh is hostile to God, for it does not submit to God's law; indeed, it cannot. [8] Those who are in the flesh cannot please God."
>
> Romans 8:5-8 (ESV)

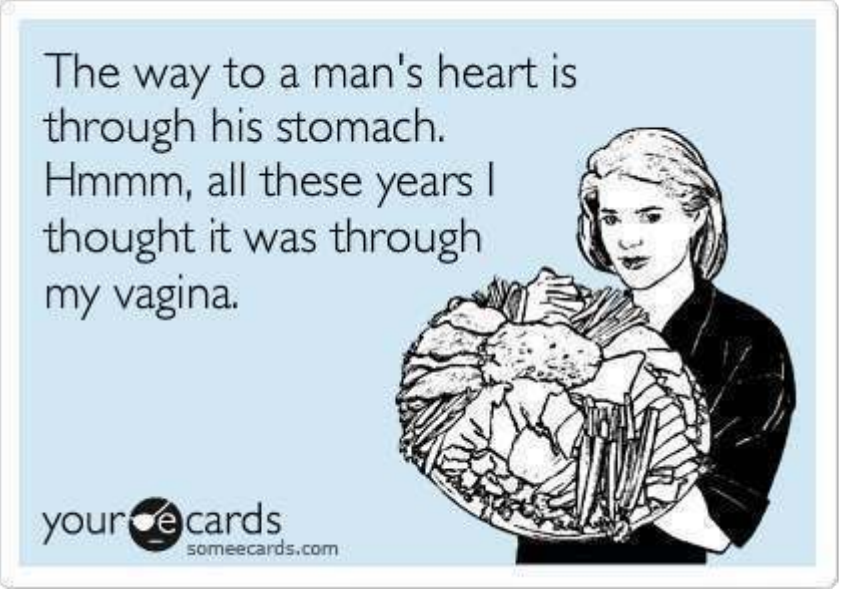
But in spite of what the scriptures say, these other characteristics are often used first and foremost for mate selection — even among nominal Christians! Is this not the same as setting one's mind on the flesh?



Even for those who are fairly successful in keeping their minds set on the spirit, it is not uncommon for them to find that something deeper lurks in the heart which takes one "by surprise" when the urge to merge kicks in, and this seems to happen whether one agrees with it or not, and also whether one likes it or not.

This might be explained if we assume that being aware of the inclinations of our own individual fleshly nature is NOT the same as "setting our mind on the flesh". But how do you achieve the former without committing the latter?

Some make peace with this incoherency early on, but others fight against their deeper natures for years, and suffer accordingly… and inexorably.

Youth is Wasted on the Young

After you've seen a bit of life, around a decade or two for the average person, you begin to recognize that what you want is not what you need, nor what you get. You realize that these vain imaginings, these superficial things cannot fulfill. They might boost your ego, sate your desire for the time, and maybe even help you see things more clearly, but eventually you'll begin to question the deeper meaning of life. Then at that time, you'll start to look for more essential qualities in a mate, such as shared values and interests, the level of intimacy that is shared in the relationship, and what that person brings out of you. These are the things that can actually build a starring relationship, and it's a pity that most people look for these things too late in life.

A Revised Approach to the Essentials

It might be wiser if young people took the opposite approach instead. That is, they should assess their own personal characteristics and the strength of a potential relationship first and foremost when they are young, so that they can make a good choice of a partner. Then as life progresses, they should focus on developing those outward details and effects which reinforce attraction. Namely, men should focus on building a career and reputation. Women should focus on maintaining feminine appeal. This serves to cement and reinforce the relationship. But too many people fail to maintain themselves in this respect as they age. Don't be one of them!

It's like the analogy of putting rocks, sand, and water in a jar.

This analogy is usually used to describe time management. But it's also quite useful to describe the qualities sought after in a relationship.

Granted, it is a little more nuanced, especially with respect to time. You have to consider the competition involved — getting your act together such that you have the chance to select a suitable match while the pickings are still good (viz. before you're too old, and before all the "good ones" have been taken).

Choosing to enter into a relationship which has the potential to bring long term fulfillment, and making this qualification a first and foremost priority, has the potential to set one on a different trajectory in life.

But in the application, it is critical to first identify what qualities would bring long term fulfillment. A pat answer would be to choose that which would glorify God, but can we narrow it down any further in terms of the individual decision?

Deep Strength has written volumes on vetting women, and although these qualifications might give a man a good idea of which chicks to avoid, vetting doesn't offer any clues about which one to definitively choose for a life long relationship.

So far, I've only identified one specific quality that seems to hold any hope, and that is in choosing a partner who can faithfully support you in your God ordained mission in life. This is one trait that would surely hold up over the years. I'm sure there are many other qualifications besides this, but it seems like these things would uniquely depend on the individual man and his mission.

Strengths of the Essential Approach

Choosing someone with whom you share a deep, authentic relationship has an inestimable value. It minimizes the hassle and extends the benefits. It makes all the work and sacrifice of love into a net benefit, and a positive sum game. Knowing that the person you're with cherishes you for non-superficial reasons, and is committed from the heart, can become a source of eternal joy and happiness. It adds immensely to your sense of security and confidence. It allows you an extra degree of freedom in the pursuit of your life goals and mission. Most of all, it is conducive to your mutual sanctification and holiness. This is because you haven't wasted the best years of your life and your emotional attachments on anyone who is unable to deliver the above.

This is not an argument for the Soul Mate Myth, but merely am emphasis on the importance of having a strong connection of trust and respect, and a mutual heart-felt symbiosis that makes any relationship strong.

Weaknesses of the Essential Approach

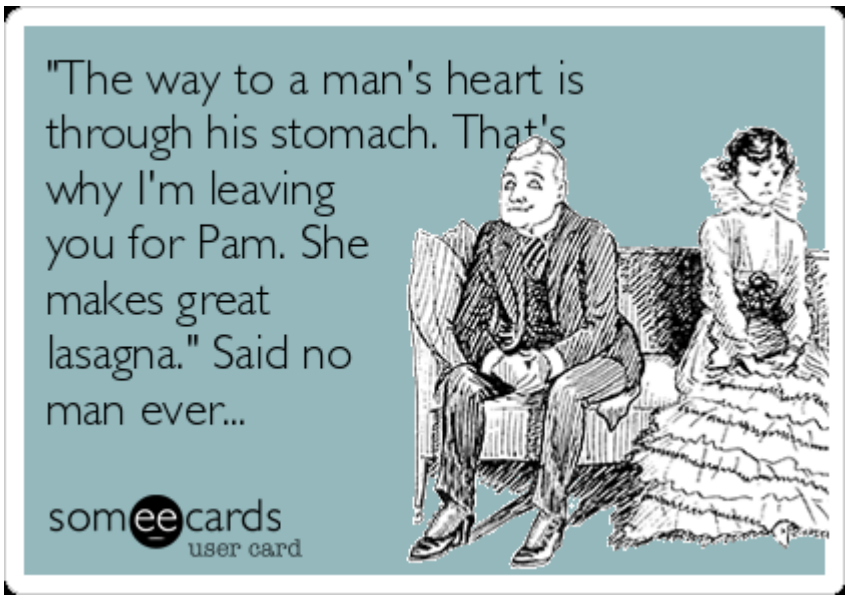
I remember some insight offered by an old PUA guru, who said [paraphrasing],

> "Each different woman brings something special into a relationship with you, but none of them can completely fulfill. So if you're going to settle down with only one, then it's important to choose one who offers you something that you deeply value, and not any of the others who offer what you would consider "novelties and conveniencies"."

This statement expresses the frustration of knowing that no one can completely satisfy, but it also illustrates the difficulty of accepting a "spirit led" approach when discernment is absent and self-knowledge is insufficient.

Until you explore having a relationship with a partner who is "high quality", according to stereotypical SMV/MMV indicators, you don't have the knowledge in your heart that those things cannot fulfill. So there is always a weakness there, in that one will be tempted to explore other opportunities in order to satisfy this question of the heart.

This absence of self-knowledge is also a weakness of the Meet Cute model. When a women finds a man whom she perceives to have a high SMV, it can generate strong tingles. But she has not yet realized that a day-to-day interaction with this man may be frustrating, simply because they may not share key values and goals in life. In the typical Meet Cute experience, her finding a partner who shares a deep, vital link in their relationship is only an afterthought — one that may bring both regret and the motivation to further explore the possibilities that her hypergamic hamster brings up in her mind. The same is true for men who are attracted to high SMV women. Many secular men have realized this, and this is one of the reasons why they resort to the pump and dump.



The Takeaway

Young people need to see themselves clearly in two planes of reference, the flesh and the spirit, in order to make a wise choice when selecting a mate.

The Flesh — Your individual fleshly nature, its peculiar desires, weaknesses, inclinations, and "fetishes" (e.g. Are you an "@ss man" or a "tits man"?). This is not the same as having a mind that is blindly focused on the desires of the flesh, but rather, it's a deeper awareness of who you are in the flesh, and what kinds of challenges you may have to face as a consequence. You need to know what is acceptable and what is non-negotiable. If you don't know yourself very well, then the answer might be different than what your fleshly mind might think. This awareness includes the knowledge in your heart that "[your personal] sin is lurking at the door, but you must learn to master it" (Genesis 4:7). All this is colloquially known as "coming to terms with one's self".

The Spirit — Your individual spiritual nature. To get a better idea of what this is all about, consider the following questions.

- What gives you joy?
- What makes you angry?
- What makes you feel loved?
- What brings you closer to God?
- What is God's will for your life?
- What are your innermost values?
- What motivates you to speak and act?
- What contributes to your inner peace?

The chances are good that your answers to these questions are different from how others might respond. This is a deeper awareness of who you are in the spirit, and what kinds of conditions you need to find healing, and grow in faith. You need to know what is acceptable and what is non-negotiable. If you don't know yourself very well, then the answer might be different than what your alienated mind might think. This awareness includes the knowledge in your heart that "all things work together for good to those who love God, to those who are called according to His purpose." (Romans 8:28). All this is colloquially known as "being at peace with God". You need to get a handle on this so that you know you won't be shooting yourself in the foot by choosing a woman who may very well be a Christian, but who fails to bring out Christ in you.

These things hold true for all humanity, both sexes, secular and Christian.

Young people who are shopping around for a mate should keep all the above in mind, and use this as a double Frame of reference, combined with the added awareness provided by discernment and wisdom, to determine what each candidate might offer in terms of a long-term relationship.

Note: This advice may only apply to those men who can achieve a reasonable degree of success in attracting a sufficient number of women to have such a choice.

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: A Lesson in False Humility – Christians are Allergic to Healthy Lifestyles (2016/6/7)
- Radix Fidem: Can't get enough of that fellowship (2020/6/4)

Satan's Secret Recipe for a Heretical Purity Movement

Jack · 15 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Only the Grand Master Bait could concoct such a beautiful disaster!

Readership: Christians, especially those who have experienced the Purity Movement;
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 1,300 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

There's a secret recipe for perdition which only our most glorious evil overlords are privy to. It remains a highly protected trade secret among the malefide.

As the story goes, back in 1984, the Resistors tuned into dyslectic broadband (66.6 MHz) and picked up this conversation between Lord Sor Deviass and the Grand Master Baiter.

Let's tune in to their decrepit conversations…

* * * * *

Master Baiter: The Emperor has given us a new assignment, but it's not so new actually. We've done stuff like this before. Too many earthlings have been experiencing sanctification and shalom, and we've got to do something to prevent this.

Lord Deviass: [incoherent mumbling] I know! First, let's begin with adolescents who have freshly entered into the raging hormones of puberty, and who are naïve and inexperienced. It's so much fun and so easy to throw a monkey branch into their family trees!

Master Baiter: Good idea! Normally, the Bible prescribes marriage for young'uns such as these. But our persnickety father below taught us long ago that we have to find some way to hijack the process and destroy anything good that might come out of normal sexual relations within marriage. Most of all, we must never let the earthlings actually enjoy being obedient to that carpenter's son of antiquity, Mr. J.

Lord Deviass: Don't you dare mention that name! It would be even better if we could do so much damage, that the target has little chance of ever finding emotional or sexual satisfaction in marriage.

Master Baiter: That's so wonderfully wrong! So let's take those Biblical commandments that they revere so much, and twist them into saying that they can't have sex until some vague time in the future. It doesn't matter what that time might be. The only thing that matters is that the time is always later, and never now. Laying the law on them with this command will provoke their sinful natures, and this will make the demolition of their souls all that much easier.

Lord Deviass: But how could we possibly convince them that sex and marriage are evil?

Master Baiter: We could say that extramarital sex is evil, a “sin”, and that they shouldn’t have sex until they’re ‘married’. Make it seem like marriage is something that would keep them out of sin. That way, they’ll never suspect that we’ve already cooked them into the batch of cultural sin. But of course, we can’t allow them to actually marry until after they’ve become so frustrated that they spill the Jones out of desperation.

Lord Deviass: Also, we can’t tell them outright that they can’t get married, because that would show our hand. We need to give them just enough hope to keep them hooked. Instead, we’ll just give them some reasonable excuses to keep postponing marriage. It doesn’t matter whether they are true or not, because they are too naïve to know the difference. Over the last few centuries, our globular think-tank has come up with quite a few prevaricating justifications.

- Love won’t pay the bills!
- You don’t have enough money!
- Don’t marry anyone who isn’t a Christian!
- Marriage and raising children is too expensive!
- This otherwise perfect person isn’t perfect enough for perfect you!
- Marriage will tie you down, so you’d better learn to enjoy your life first.
- You should be focused on getting an education and preparing for your career.
- Marriage is such a heavy burden of commitment… and children! Lawdie! SMH

Master Baiter: That’s beautiful… pure evil! I should take you behind the woodpile for this.

Lord Deviass: Oh Master, please don’t mention the woodpile again! I’ll be so weak in the knees that I’ll screw over this mission for sure.

Master Baiter: Fine. I’ll catch your @ss unawares after the mission is complete. Don’t forget YOLO and all that other true lie $ћ!t.

Lord Deviass: As I recall, we do have a few other slicks up our sphincters.

- Find Yourself™.

- Season of sexed up ‘Singleness’
- Travel the world over, and stop for the grand finale in Carthage!

The good news is that for the men, we can continue to use that old, worn out one-liner.

> “Sow your wild peas and carrots before you settle down with a $ħ!tty sack of potatoes!”

Master Baiter: You are so midevil! Get with the times! Carthage is so Iron Age-ish! I believe sin city is now located in Californica in North Slumerica, and the current word is “oats”, as in “sow your wild oats”.

Lord Deviass: I have another idea, your royal sliminess. We could even try to sour their psychological concept of sex. To do this, we can twist the scriptural condemnation of fornicators and adulterers, and insinuate that it applies to them before they’ve even had sex. It would only be one step further to teach them that sex is bad and evil.

Master Baiter: I’ll be d@mned! This is making me harder!

Lord Deviass: To make this plan work, your lowness, we’ll need to get parents and church leaders on board. In fact, we don’t need to work so hard if we can somehow get them to do the hard work of educating these randy brats into believing the above heretical doctrines and principles.

Master Baiter: No problem Deviass, we’ve already conquered the educational system and the legal jurispridence.

Lord Deviass: Most rancid $ħ!t and foghorn farts! You’re giving me a constant craving for that squalid pigsty Earth again!

Master Baiter: Keep a lid on it, tightypants! [indistinct muttering] Here we go. In short form, the Emperor’s secret recipe is comprised of 11 principles and powers as follows.

1. No sex. Better yet, let’s create a dilemma in which they must choose between sex and God! If they rebel and reject God, then let’s reward them for their disobedience with a spanky smorgasboard!
2. No marriage. And if it does manage to happen, let’s make sure it is to the most unsuitable mate possible.
3. Lots of temptation. Asmodeus! Pour it on until their knees quiver and they’re soaking their drawers!

4. Bad teaching. No worries here. We've already toppled the church. Our family man Dobson and that young punk Harris will handle the details with no problem.
5. No mentoring. This will be easy to do since the Boomers are at the age of being mentors. Heh!
6. Conform and Perform. Lots of pressure to conform, obey, perform. Let's make them believe that Christ is worthless, and that they have to work to save their skins.
7. Lay the law on them. Keep them focused on the ecstasies of the flesh, and how these pleasures are forbidden by our emeny. Let's frustrate the ɦəll into them.
8. No accountability. Cultural forces will clean up any possibility of shame and repentance.
9. No lurrrvy feewings. No realistic opportunities to meet a potential marriage-worthy partner. Let's keep them all busy f*cking around with someone grossly unsuitable in the vain hopes that "Love will change their hearts", and that their sinful relationships might somehow transform into a sanctified marriage.
10. Idolatries galore. Fill their minds with the glorious Expectations of the Perfect Soul Mate Idolatry!
11. Waste their time. Distract them by keeping them busy working towards various goals, e.g. education, career, earning money, earning a feminist merit badge… Həl1, we could even present "purity" as a goal!

Lord Deviass: Absolutely positively pusillanimous! It's such a joy to watch those prudes squirm as they grow old with regrets on their conscience! I cannot help but to feel a raging desire to be rapaciously ribald!

Master Baiter: Yes, my truculent troglodyte! This secret recipe is middle finger licking good! Now pass the word on to Carbuncle Cracker and his gang of miscreants. They'll squeeze them into situations where they'll be so frustrated and desperate that they'll be willing to compromise whatever vestiges of conscience they might have, or better yet, aspotasize!

Lord Deviass: I swear by the love of bondage porn, Master Baiter, this plan is even better than that time we ransacked both the Polish and the Russian aristocracies within the space of 5 years~! Communism rules like Həll!

Master Baiter: Ahh, yesss… Nothing is better than the pole position!

Related

- Σ Frame: The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020/1/17)
- Cornerstone: The "Purity" Movement 2 (2020/2/22)

Humility and Defilement

Jack · 17 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Could humility be equivalent to defilement?

Readership: Christians
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 460 words
Reading Time: 3 minutes

I came across this interesting association between humility and defilement. I found three passages in the Bible in which the translations are interchangeable.

Here is the passage in Genesis about Shechem and Dinah.

> "[1] And Dinah the daughter of Leah, which she bare unto Jacob, went out to see the daughters of the land. [2] And when Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the country, saw her, he took her, and lay with her, and defiled / humbled her. [3] And his soul clave unto Dinah the daughter of Jacob, and he loved the damsel, and spake kindly unto the damsel."
>
> Genesis 34:1-3 (NKJV)

The KJV, and NKJV translate as "defiled".

The ASV, Darby, and RSV translate as "humbled".

The ESV translates as "humiliated".

Holman, The Living Bible, NIV, and The Message translate as "raped".

Here's a passage about marital fraud.

> "And it shall be, if you have no delight in her, then you shall set her free, but you certainly shall not sell her for money; you shall not treat her brutally, because you have humbled her."

> Deuteronomy 21:14 (NKJV)

And here's one about r@pe.

> "If a man finds a young woman who is a virgin, who is not betrothed, and he seizes her and lies with her, and they are found out, then the man who lay with her shall give to the young woman's father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife because he has humbled her; he shall not be permitted to divorce her all his days."
>
> Deuteronomy 22:28-29 (NKJV)

The KJV and NKJV translate as "humbled", but most other translations use the word "violated".

The word translated as "humbled" in all these verses is the same Hebrew word, anah (עָנָה), and it is a verb.

The definition of the original Hebrew word is to be occupied with/by; to be busied with/by; to be bowed down, afflicted; to be lowly, submissive…

Conclusions

Humility is a huge concept in the Christian life. But we don't commonly understand humility (or submissiveness) in terms of defilement. Yet, here it is in the scriptures – and in three passages, no less. I'm thinking that most Christians don't have any idea what this means.

> "…and she shall be his wife because he has humbled her…"

Here's a clue. The reason is because sanctification and defilement share much of the same process. If a woman is sanctified through having consummate sexual relations with one man, then to all other men, she is defiled. So she is both sanctified and defiled through the same act. It all depends on your point of reference.

Related

- The Rational Male: Blueprint for an Alpha Widow (2012/8/16)
- The Rational Male: Deep Conversion (2016/11/11)

- Σ Frame: The Alpha Widow Syndrome – A Manospherian Allegory of Defilement (2020/3/4)
- Sigma Game: The Anti-Virtue of Humility (2024/5/31)

Sanctification and Sexual Compatibility

Jack · 19 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Are sanctification and sexual compatibility exclusive of each other?

Readership: Christians
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 1,200 words
Reading Time: 7 minutes

Fapper's Fear of the Frigid Female

Christian men who are serious about sticking to the Good Book before the Great Clam Bake have a serious challenge on their hands.

Namely, they have the mind to wait to have sex until after they are married. But naturally, they are afraid to marry a woman without first seeing whether she can perform in bed. They are afraid of being shackled to a frigid log who recoils at his touch and can't loosen up.

The risk of making a lifelong commitment in marriage to a woman who turns out to be a cold-tittied shrew is unimaginable, and totally unacceptable to most men, thus making the Test Drive™ option a real temptation.

We discussed this problem before in Sexual Compatibility is dependent on Sanctification (2020/3/2).

> "Caterpillar asked a question about how a sexually inexperienced person is supposed to ascertain whether a particular potential partner will be sexually compatible or not. This is something that is a grave concern of high priority to randy young Christian men who are holding out for marriage, but interestingly, this is not as important to God as it is to young horndogs. What is important to God is a person's sanctification, among other things. But that doesn't mean that sexual compatibility has to remain a worrisome contemplation. It is my hope that this post will put the matter to rest."

My talk about sanctification as an alternative to sexual compatibility was apparently unsatisfying to some of my readers. (This particular word didn't receive very much attention in the comments either.) But at least one reader got the point and responded by writing a private message to me through email. His message said…

> "You are making the assumption that sanctification and sexual compatibility are exclusive. But one of the messages I've picked up from reading your blog is that sanctification is more closely related to sexuality than what most preachers would feel comfortable discussing from the pulpit."

He's right in saying that they are innately connected. They cannot be treated as separate artifacts of one's spiritual life. But I think it's a mistake to focus on the compatibility aspect while overlooking how sanctification is the overall purpose of purity.

An Athenian Tetradrachma

Are sanctification and sexual compatibility exclusive of each other?

A little later in the same message, the reader posed a vital question.

> "What if sanctification and sexual compatibility are one and the same?"

I think in a perfect world, they are. But especially in these times, many people (especially men) need extra help from God to achieve sanctification without experiencing sexual compatibility. On the other extreme, many people experience sanctification through mere sexual satisfaction, which is not the same thing as compatibility. I have no justification for this other than my first-hand observation, but personally, I believe that (some) women have "been there, done that, and have grown tired of it all", which is another way of saying that they have experienced a form of sanctification from riding the carousel, by God's grace, of course.

I'm sure that last statement will send some readers into a tailspin. Maybe I'm not couching my words correctly, but that's what it appears like to me. And it's not just me. This is what the secular culture is referring to when they say a young man must "sow his wild oats", or a young woman must "find herself" before he/she is ready to settle down. The same goes for the Test Drive™ argument for Christians. They are talking about finding sanctification outside of the marriage covenant.

But the thing is, experiencing sanctification outside of marriage excludes the possibility of subsequently experiencing sanctification within marriage. Finding sanctification along the path of promiscuity might make one presumably more spiritually obedient to God, and therefore would be a more mature husband or wife, but it also destroys the intimacy and bonding. Thus, "Sowing wild oats", or "finding yourself" is not God's ideal approach because those who pursue this path cannot achieve bonding and a robust satisfaction in marriage. This harms the fruitfulness of the marriage. For those few couples who somehow find intimacy in spite of their past sins, then that is an additional dispensation of God's grace.

Again, God is most interested in our sanctification, and He is going to achieve this, by nook or by crook, no matter which decisions we make in this life, and whether we are married or not.

The Fear of Missing Out (FOMO) Ruins Sanctification

Going back to what I wrote in the aforementioned post,

> "One of the negative consequences of sexual promiscuity (including the Test Drive™) is that it reduces one's capability of achieving a consummate sanctification with any one person."

Yet, this is the same reason that the Test Drive is considered, namely to have a greater degree of certainty regarding sanctification.

> "But for those who enter into marriage in a sexually pure state, sexual compatibility is a non-issue because sanctification is yet to occur.
>
> For those who are seeking a sexual partner after having many other partners, however, sexual compatibility involves finding someone who matches the imprinting received by the most charismatic and memorable previous partners. The sad fact remains that no one can completely fill the shoes of another lover who made the first imprint in the context of an innocent, romantic, youthful fling. This sanctification cum defilement is the origin of the Alpha Widow™ syndrome.
>
> In conclusion, it should be clear to the reader by now that the best way to achieve sexual compatibility in marriage is to retain one's sexual purity before and after marriage. Purity is all about the completeness of one's sanctification."

Now continuing with the reader's email…

> "What if you just happen to be the type of person whose sanctification is dependent on the overall level of satisfaction you can get from the sexual compatibility you have in your marriage?"

Mmm… In this case, if this is truly a man's most pressing spiritual need, then sexual purity is all the more important, even to become paramount in achieving satisfaction in marriage, and spiritual peace with God.

Concluding Statements

This post has described how the Test Drive™ is a stupid knee-jerk reaction to the FOMO on sanctification.

I think a lot of men can feel this deep panging need for sanctification within marriage, deep in their bones, but they don't know how to put it into words. All they know is that they are tired of the dissatisfaction surrounding lust, they wish pornography wasn't such an insurmountable temptation, and they mistakenly believe that having a woman to wife up is going to solve these problems.

For those men who have real choices to marry, this longing for sanctification is manifested in their fear of marrying a woman who is dead in bed, who cannot serve as a vehicle of God's sanctification within marriage, thereby exposing them to a more extreme version of lust and temptation as described in the previous paragraph.

It might help men to know that this is not God's will for marriage. But these days, it's a question of whether women can be convinced to believe the same.

It's time for men to start discussing the carnal aspects of their spiritual needs. When they realize how intricately linked the physical is with the spiritual, then they will find the motivation to take the required actions.

Related

- Σ Frame: God doesn't care if you find a wife! (2020/4/13)
- Σ Frame: On the Concept of Sin and the need for Marriage (2020/4/24)
- Σ Frame: Looking at the Essentials (2020/6/12)

Syzygy

Jack · 22 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The signs in the heavens are foreboding. Are you prepared?

Readership: All
Theme: Special Post; Signs in the Heavens
Length: 300 words
Reading Time: 2 minutes

There was an annular solar eclipse on 2020/6/21, coincidentally the same day as the summer solstice and Father's Day in the West. Here's a video of the eclipse in case you missed it.

The annular solar eclipse on 2020/6/21, as seen from Taichung, Taiwan.
Click here to see a map showing the path of the eclipse shadow.

Such alignment (syzygy) coincides with a new moon indicating the Moon is closest to the ecliptic plane. At the new and full moon, the Sun and Moon are in syzygy. Their tidal forces act to reinforce each other, and the ocean both rises higher and falls lower than the average. These tidal forces may also trigger earthquakes.

In mythology, solar deities are usually thought of as male while the lunar deity is female, but the opposite case is also seen. In Germanic mythology the Sun is female and the Moon is male. The Old High German Sun goddess is Sunna, from which is taken the modern English word for the Sun.

If we were to assume that this eclipse, which also falls on the summer solstice, and Father's Day, is more than a coincidence, and that it is a sign in the heavens, then what is the mythological interpretation of this solar eclipse?

Read through the following headlines before making a conclusion.

1. Spartan Christianity: The Effeminate Man (2020/6/17)
2. Overman Warrior*: Racism is not the Problem in America: Its a lack of good fathers — the truth about 'White Privilege' (2020/6/21)

I dare say, God's judgment will soon fall! Something "bad" will happen in the next few months.

Update

The "something bad" is the C0V!D pandemic, the mandatory jabs, the riots in Seattle, and the media gaslighting.

 Overman Warrior has relocated his blog to The Gunfighter's Guide.*

Related

- Collective Evolution: Solstice 'Ring Of Fire' Solar Eclipse: Going Into New Territory (2020/6/20)

Being Attractive in Service

Jack · 24 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Being attractive is more than just what you do. Rather, the love, joy, and inspiration you bring into the lives of others through your service is what makes you a shining light.

Readership: All
Targeted Readership: Christian Men
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 1,900 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

Deep Strength wrote an excellent essay on Dread Game in marriage: Revisiting dread in the Bible with an anti-chivalry lens (2020/6/18).

I liked this post, because it makes a distinction that Dread is not unique to PUA-styled game. In fact, it is a characteristic of a healthy Christian marriage.

It also makes the point that women feel fear and dread when a man is living out his faith, and it thus becomes a quality that makes him attractive to women. DS describes several ways in which this can happen, so it's worth a read.

Moreover, when a man gets to a certain point in his spiritual maturity, he realizes that he doesn't need a woman (or sex) to have a good relationship with God. This gives him the freedom to break away from the mold of chivalry and dabble in his own best interests. Overall, this comes off as detachment, unpredictability, and dread behavior to an interested female. This is also when he starts to become attractive to many other women, which amplifies his attractiveness due to pre-selection and jealousy.

How is Godliness Attractive?

The idea that godliness is attractive has been suggested in the Christian Manosphere. However, there have been many arguments to the contrary, and so it is not widely accepted as being true. Personally, I believe there is some truth to this. I think it would help Christian men immensely if we could understand just exactly how spiritual maturity figures in to a man's attractiveness. I've given this a lot of contemplation, but so far, I haven't been able to flush it out in detailed language.

Deep Strength offered an abridged answer.

> "It's true only when it aligns with the traits that make men attractive.
>
> A pastor or worship band leader living out their calling would be attractive to women. The Church greeter or parking lot coordinator or janitor are also parts of the body but obviously no women are attracted from those.
>
> Both these groups can be godly and doing their part in the body of Christ, but women are only attracted to one group."

I don't agree with DS on this, because this assessment only considers the outward indicators of male SMV. There is a lot more to attraction than mere proximity and AMOGing, and furthermore, there is nothing uniquely Christian about these traits, so it doesn't support the argument that Godliness is attractive.

I am still working on figuring this one out, but one trait that I have seen (in addition to dread game) is how a Christian man carries himself around other people. In a nutshell, he is salt and light.

How to Carry Yourself

A large part of what makes a man attractive is what emanates from his heart. Remember, Charisma is King!

Actually, you don't even need to serve or hold any position in the church in order to make a good impression and draw attention to yourself. All you have to do is show up frequently to different gatherings and prod whoever you happen to meet into light-hearted discussions.

- Don't limit yourself to only interacting with your peers.
- Don't just talk to young attractive chicks only.
- Strike up a chat with all kinds of people.

- Talk to EVERYONE who comes your way!

Exchange simple life stories with the men. Tell them about your job, or whatever else you're doing. Tell them your reaction to the sermon. Be sure to ask for their advice and opinion. You don't have to do everything they tell you, but at least listen to their responses with earnestness and think it over seriously. You'll probably find some men that have some skills or hobbies that you're interested in. If you show them that you're interested in those things, many of these men would be happy to invite you to their home or workshop to teach you a few things and hang out. But not all men would be so proactive as to take the initiative to invite you over. So don't be afraid to ask them if you could come by sometime and check out what they're doing. Most men will agree, and they will also enjoy the time spent with you.

Play games with the children. Make funny faces at them, tease them, and give them high-fives. Some simple practical jokes might also be appropriate and intriguing to them. This can be fun and easy to do, and it doesn't take a lot of time. If you can make them smile, then you've done a great job.

Talk to that sweet, kindhearted grandmother who is always doing stuff at church and helping people in her community. Treat her like your own grandmother. Flirt with her just for fun.* Tell her she looks so great in that blue dress. Give her a friendly hug of endearment. She will eat it up, and you won't ever get a #MeToo accusation from her.

> "Pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father is this: to visit orphans and widows in their trouble, and to keep oneself unspotted from the world."
>
> James 1:27 (NKJV)

The important thing is to connect with people. You can't go to church just to scope out chicks, and ignore everyone else. That kind of behavior is hardly above the pedestalization of the feminine.

One important thing is to never miss any opportunity to congratulate someone ENTHUSIASTICALLY on an accomplishment, no matter how small or insignificant it is. Science has shown that this one action of affirmation does more to build rapport than any other social behavior.

 Note: Don't try the flirting technique on high SMV women, younger women, married women, or basically any woman that has an ego investment in her SMV, because they will probably think you are a creep and respond negatively. Go for those older widows and grandmothers who have long since outgrown their nubile addiction to impertinent indignation. Choose those whom you genuinely like, so that you don't have to be fake.

Which type of service is for you?

In the beginning, I would take whichever opportunity came up that I believed was from God, just to get my foot in the door and build rapport with people. Over time, I would let people know what I'm interested in doing, and what I'm good at doing. When you've built up a network of people know your skill set, then other opportunities naturally follow.

Commenter Joe said,

> "I think any man who is looking for a wife and is asked to volunteer for these [grungy, low profile] jobs [at church] should simply refuse. There is no reason to make yourself look unattractive to the single women in the congregation."

I disagree. There might be some value in performing dismal duties for the church (and for God). First off, I believe God will reward you for whatever service you offer, and according to Matthew 6, God offers greater rewards for work that does not draw public acclaim.

> "[1] Take heed that you do not do your charitable deeds before men, to be seen by them. Otherwise you have no reward from your Father in heaven. [2] Therefore, when you do a charitable deed, do not sound a trumpet before you as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory from men. Assuredly, I say to you, they have their reward. [3] But when you do a charitable deed, do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing, [4] that your charitable deed may be in secret; and your Father who sees in secret will Himself reward you openly."
>
> Matthew 6:1-4 (NKJV)

Secondly, it makes you appear more trustworthy and dependable to the elders, who may then over time, allow you to have other opportunities that would be more dignified.

Third, it safeguards against anyone who might criticize you for being a “show off”, who selects all the glorious jobs and refuses the common drudgery.

One negative consequence of taking this approach is that it might cause people to presume you are responsible for the yucky stuff, and then they get angry when you don’t. So YMMV. Just don’t allow yourself to get stuck indefinitely in a situation where you’re raking all the muck, and never get a chance to shine.

Case Study — Offering Transportation

One church job that single Christian guys should volunteer for is driving the van to pick up college aged students to attend church functions. This job requires responsibility, makes you appear authoritative, and puts you into direct contact with prime women.

I did this for about a year while I was in graduate school. After a while, some girls would come to church just so they could sit with me in the van. But after we got to church, they would go do other things in the neighborhood instead of attending the church function. I quit the job after a couple girls invited me into their apartments (and bedrooms) when I took them back home late at night. It was just too much temptation for me to handle. The elders were angry with me for quitting because they didn’t trust the other young guys to do it, and they didn’t want to do this themselves. Like I said, YMMV. But this is a good example of how following God can give off the impression of Dread game and being unpredictable.

Conclusions

If a man is living in the spirit, staying busy doing his own thing, and is enjoying his life, then confidence should come naturally, and Charisma can be developed slowly. When a man keeps himself busy with various interests, and has a schedule filled with work, friends, and other activities of interest, then it is not that hard to pull off what appears to be soft Dread, which might also be described as being aloof.

But at the same time, you have to make your presence known, and you have to create a good impression on others. So here are ten points to remember.

1. Go to church more regularly than not, and get involved with a church function.
2. Be encouraging and optimistic in word and attitude.
3. Create a charismatic personality for yourself.

4. What you do at church is not as important as who you be.
5. Talk regularly with the men. Don't let them feel like it's a strange thing that you would talk with them or hang around them.
6. Focus on getting very well acquainted with just one or two of the men who are well established in the church.
7. You can be friendly to women who are friendly and open to you, and who do not have a hamster that jumps to defensive conclusions. But be extra careful about the others. It might be a good idea to avoid or ignore them altogether.
8. Focus on being upbeat and effervescent around elderly women and children – those who have nothing to offer you in return.
9. Remember that it's never easy to serve, but it can be a lot of fun.
10. Do it for God, not for yourself. God knows the difference and He will reward you accordingly.

I urge Christian men to get this ball rolling ASAP. Start with anyone you can connect with. Namely, your Church might be the easiest place to start flexing your Charisma.

Exit question: What are some church or community sponsored activities that you know of, which would offer good opportunities for young people to mix and meet prime members of the opposite sex?

Related

- Σ Frame: Personal Wealth and Service (2009/9/12)

The Morphing Ethical System in the U.S.

Jack · 26 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A study of how the Righteousness vs. Guilt ethical structure of the West was able to have been undermined and overturned.

Readership: All
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 2,100 words
Reading Time: 12 minutes

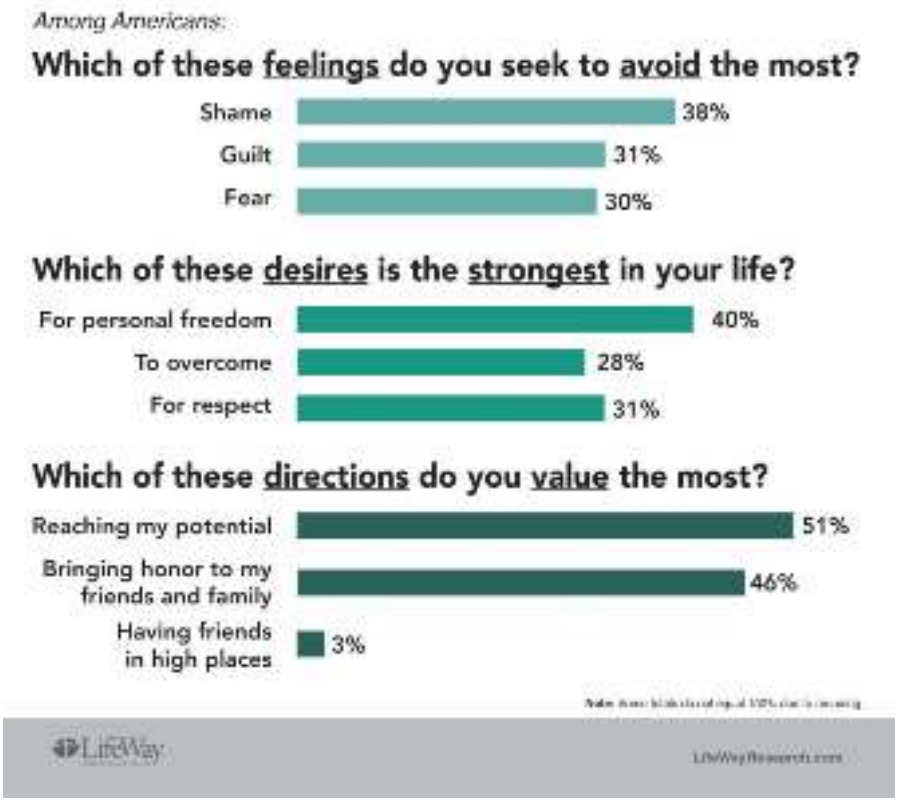
Introduction

Over the past two years or so, conversations in the sphere have turned from being focused on questions of morality, agency, and motivations, to issues of hierarchies, power structures, and cost/benefit analysis. This is no accident, but is indicative of a reaction to how the ethical structure has changed within the wider culture.

This essay takes a closer look at these changes.

Over two years ago, The Aquila Report reblogged a paywalled article from Christianity Today, Shame, Guilt, and Fear: What 1,000 Americans Avoid Most (2017/5/27) [1]. This article cited a study from LifeWay Research, Americans Want to Avoid Shame, Make Their Loved Ones Proud (2017/5/23), that reported what motivates the social behaviors of Americans.

> "Shame has become particularly powerful in American culture in the internet age, said Scott McConnell, executive director of LifeWay Research. A single mistake or embarrassing moment posted on social media can ruin a person's life."



> "What's our biggest cultural fear? Shame," he said. "What's surprising is not that personal freedom, ambition, > and doing the right thing are valued by Americans. It's that risk to our reputation is what matters most."

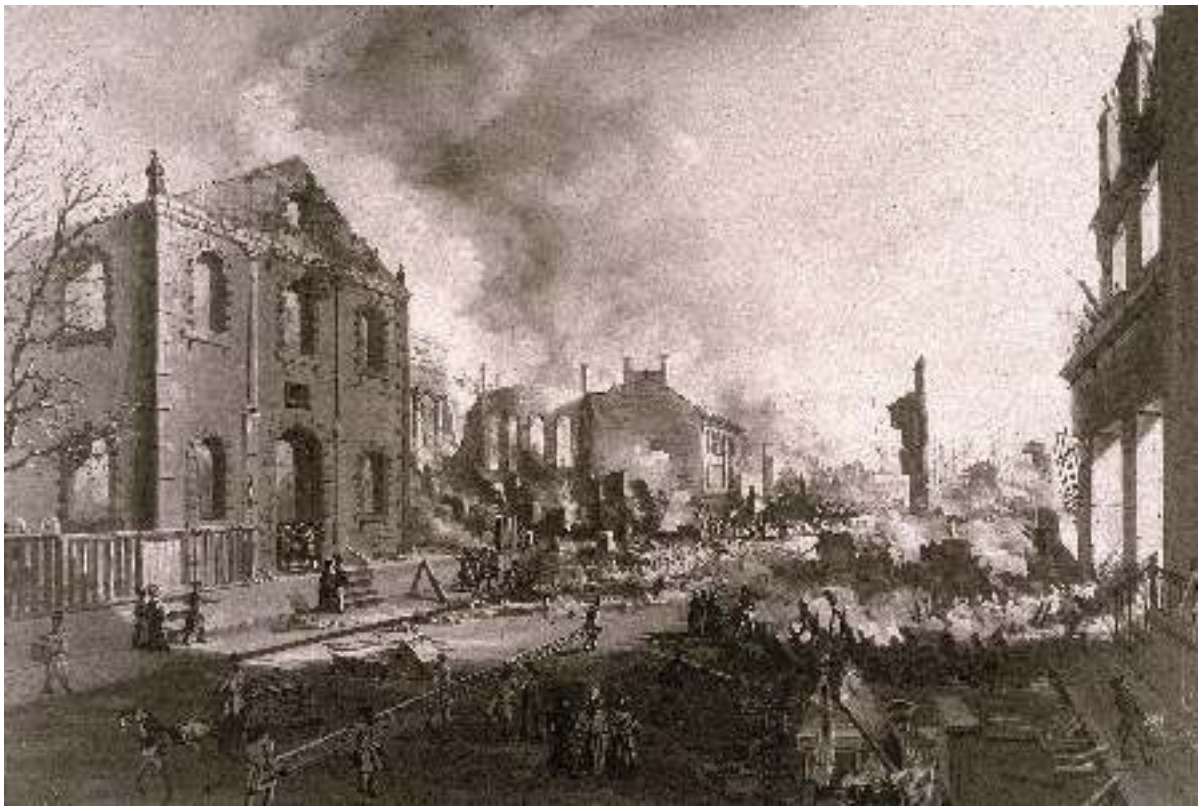
>
> "Researchers asked 1,000 Americans three questions to discover their feelings about fear, shame, guilt, and other issues."
>
> "Overall, 38 percent of Americans say they avoid shame the most, while 31 percent say guilt and 30 percent say fear.
>
> Education and age play a role in which feelings Americans avoid. Those with graduate degrees (44%) are more likely to avoid shame than those with high school diplomas or less (34%). Americans ages 25 to 34 avoid guilt (37%) more than those 55 and older (27%). Middle-aged Americans—those 35 to 54—are the most likely age group to worry about shame (44%).

In addition to education (which is a proxy indicator of socio-economic class) and age, religious affiliation makes a difference too.

> Nones—those who claim no religious identity—avoid guilt (35%) more than those who are religious (30%). Those who are religious avoid shame (39%) more than nones (33%). Those from non-Christian faiths are most likely to avoid shame (48%).
>
> When it comes to what Americans with evangelical beliefs avoid most, 34 percent say guilt, 34 percent say fear, and 32 percent say shame. For Americans worshiping at least once a month, 37 percent say shame, 32 percent say fear, and 31 percent say guilt. (The findings were not significantly different from non-evangelicals or non-worshipers.)

It is interesting that shame is the biggest concern of church-goers, while shame is the weakest motivator among the general populace. The fact that the consciousness of shame increases with the frequency of church attendance leads us to question the overall effect that participating in organized religion has on a person.

The author notes that shame has not been a significant social motivator since the 1830's, and I'll point out that this happened to be a particularly godless age in American history.



Shifting Ethical Structures

The author failed to mention that fear, shame, and guilt are not only social motivators, they are also the three main categorical ethical structures that are manifested within the various cultures of the world.

Western Christianized cultures have adhered predominantly to a Righteousness vs. Guilt (RvG) ethical system. But in recent times, the combined influences of social media, feminist ideology, and globalism have produced a gradual shift away from this ethical structure, while the two other ethical systems, Power vs. Fear (PvF), and Honor vs. Shame (HvS), have made impressive advances into western culture. The report cited above shows that the three systems of cultural ethics are now neck-to-neck in competing with each other in the U.S.A.

I've written about ethical systems before in Foundations of Cultural Ethics and Chivalry (2018/2/18). If you're unfamiliar with cultural ethics, then you may want to read this post before continuing. I'll reiterate the relevant aspects here within the specific context.

THEOLOGY GUIDE

	GUILT	SHAME	FEAR
PROLEGOMENA
Society	Individualistic	Collectivistic	Animistic
Existential Question	How can my sins be forgiven to be assured of heaven?	How can I be a part of the community to be respected?	How can I access the power to control life?
Christian Theology	Augustinian, Reformed	Undeveloped	Pentecostal, Charismatic
Principle Metaphor	Courtroom (legal)	Community (relational)	Combat (military)
Primary Location	West (Europe, N. America)	East (Middle East, Asia)	South (Africa, tribal)
Christian Status	Historically Christian	Minimally Christian	Recently Christian
GOD
God	Lawgiver & Judge (sinless, perfect, just)	Father & Patron (glorious, superior, faithful)	Ruler & Deliverer (sovereign, transcendent)
God's Holiness	He alone perfectly keeps the absolute moral standard	He alone is infinitely glorious, deserving all reverence	He alone created and stands above all things and beings
God's Sovereignty	Forgives transgressors and enacts our future salvation	Honors lowly mortals and humbles the falsely proud	Defeats spiritual opposition and rules the world
God's Righteousness	Punitive justice	Covenantal Faithfulness	Cosmic Power

The Primary Concerns of the Different Ethical Structures

Here we'll take a glance at certain elements of each ethical system, to see how they play against each other.

Righteousness vs. Guilt (RvG)

People who abide in a RvG system are intensely interested in moral agency, because the degree to which a person possesses it, is directly proportional to the appropriate amount of guilt (or innocence) that should be ascribed to the person in question. Thus, the social practice of determining agency is a natural socio-psychological process of those operating within a RvG system in which social status and virtue are assigned on the basis of one's innocence and righteousness.

Rollo and Donal Graeme have discussed the question of the degree of moral agency that females possess. I doubt that either Rollo or Donal Graeme are aware that their prerogative of ascertaining moral agency directly follows the RvG ethical structure, in which motives and responsibilities are fundamental necessities in establishing the social order. But the implicit purpose of asking this question of female agency is to discern the appropriateness of certain female behaviors, and thus, which behaviors should be considered 'acceptable' and which should not. Moreover, in searching out the assignations of agency, they are attempting to rebuild a culture based on the RvG ethical system.

Donal Graeme and Rollo are certainly not alone in their preponderances on agency. The fact that Graeme's post, Moral Agency in Women Revisited (2013/3/11) is one of his all-time top-ranked posts, stands as a testament to how important the question of agency is to those in a RvG culture.

However, the answers to these questions concerning agency could never be definitively circumscribed. I might guess that this is because the majority of those living in Western culture no longer adhere to the RvG system. In other words, it's a false/dead question with no real world application and therefore no discernable true answer. This incoherency also explains the lackluster response that this question has received in the comments sections.

In the UK people generally belong to a guilt culture whereas many Arab countries have a shame culture. How a person reacts in the face of an accusation will depend on their cultural values.

Honor vs. Shame (HvS)

People living in a HvS system are intensely interested in heritage, titles, positions of authority, wealth, and social status, because the person's standing indicates the appropriate level of honor or shame that should be ascribed to the person in question. This seems to agree with the findings of the above study that highly educated and religious individuals are more sensitive to shame.

The thing is, the type of shame relevant to the HvS system is an outward, socially perceived shame, and not a true, internal sense of shame. Thus, if Christians buy into the HvS system, they may be more sensitive to public opinion, rather than to their internal convictions. This fully explains why many leading pastors are caught up in social trends and worldly philosophies, instead of remaining faithful to the Word of God. Those of us who have been following the Christian 'sphere (i.e. Dalrock, et al.) have already noticed this difference a few years ago, and we have come to label such pastors and churches "converged". It also explains why the age-old practice of s1ut shaming has become a taboo, even when it is well deserved.

In a mixed system, the HvS system tends to dominate the RvG system. Tribal and religious loyalties will be considered the highest natural authority and will, over time, usurp the altruistic trust-based, law-oriented authority of the standing RvG system. Thus, Democratic institutions will ultimately be rendered inept in the competition and will fall hostage to feudal-oriented, tribal-minded political warlords. This explains why democracy is currently breaking down.

As I'm sure readers have already noticed, the vast majority of "refugees" emigrating to North America and Europe over the last two decades come from a HvS culture (i.e. Muslim). Thus, it can be understood why they continue to maintain their feudal identities and refuse to assimilate into their host cultures. This also explains why they fail to revere and conform to law and order, which is a social construct of the RvG system, and is especially emphasized in anglophonic nations.

Moreover, the refusal of these immigrants to submit to customary law has the strong potential to upset the standing order and foment large scale violence, especially as their numbers grow to a critical momentum, which according to scientific studies is approximately 10% of the population. [Note: The overall rate of immigration since the Hart-Cellar act of 1964 has now surpassed 14%.] These groups tend to cluster in urban metropolises, and some of these communities now recently have surpassed 30% or more of the local population. This situation is a powderkeg waiting to blow.

Filipino residents living in shanties along a riverbank collect useful items in Pasay City, south of Manila, Philippines, 2014/12/27. Philippine President Benigno Aquino signed a 2.6-trillion-peso (47.7 billion euro) national budget for 2015, which he said further limits opportunities for corruption and will partly be used to improve housing for the poor.

Power vs. Fear (PvF)

People living within a PvF system are intensely interested in the pecking order within any particular group of confederates, because the order of seniority determines the consideration and respect that each person in question should be granted. Furthermore, every social interaction between even two people, one must play the role of the mentor/administrator/leader/alpha, and the other must adopt the role of the student/assistant/follower/beta. No meaningful social interaction can transpire until these social conventions have first been established somehow.

The whole concept of 4th Wave Intersectional Feminism is to construct a different ethical system of social rank based on one's level of 'oppression'. It plays on the inherent weaknesses of the larger, RvG society by inferring guilt on race (white) and sex (male) through historical precedence (e.g. discrimination, segregation, slavery, suffrage, etc.). It seems to say, "You owe us, big time!" When feminists brand masculinity as 'toxic', they are using a reverse-pseudo-shame tactic (HvS) in order to leverage power over men and society (PvF). It thereby establishes a larger power structure (PvF) for females and minority groups.

Conclusions

Fellow blogger Rant A Tonne is a man of African heritage who (I believe) is living (or has lived) within a western RvG society. As such, I feel he has a more nuanced view of the real situation in western culture — a culture in the death grip of Feminism. In his post, Can Children Be Women? Expecting Female Agency (2017/12/30), he offers some insights that consider both the RvG and the PvF ethical concerns.

> "The feminist movements have advocated for changes in law and social standing that deny the agency of females. They claim that they are particularly subject to suggestion and social pressures, that their decision making can be impaired easier than that of an equally affected male. One of the recent, and most shameful claims, is that what a female says cannot be trusted. They are able to consent to something at the moment then a day later or decades withdraw that consent building on the way females are treated when they prey on students."

Trust and agency are central pillars of the RvG system, so it is not surprising that trust has been thrown in the trash. The shame of this has not been perceived because it has been displaced by a new standard of honor – namely "oppression" and intersectional stack.

We could think of this takeover as a complex paper-rock-scissors game leading up to a Hegelian maneuver.

- The HvS system is toxic to the RvG system.
- The RvG system is toxic to the PvF system.
- The PvF system is toxic to the HvS system.

The PvF system cannot win the loyalties of a standing RvG system without first weakening and displacing it. So the HvS system is implemented for this purpose. This tactic is totally dependent on the false-guilt inspired compassion and good will of those within the chivalrous RvG society [2]. Once the RvG ethical system ceases to be a plurality within society as a whole, then the power that Intersectional Feminism has over society will also vanish. The new power structure will depend on the predominant ethical structure, as those who hold the real, visceral power of life and death will begin to take control.

In plain language… Welcome to the Jungle~!

Notes and References

1. Christianity Today (Bob Smietana): Shame, Guilt, and Fear: What 1,000 Americans Avoid Most (May 23, 2017)
2. The Aquila Report (Bob Smietana): Shame, Guilt, and Fear: What 1,000 Americans Avoid Most (May 27, 2017)
3. Gautier emphasized that chivalry originated from the Teutonic forests and brought up into civilization by the Catholic Church.
4. Charles Mills used chivalry "to demonstrate that the Regency gentleman was the ethical heir of a great moral estate, and to provide an inventory of its treasure". Mills also stated that chivalry was a social, not a military phenomenon, with its key features: generosity, fidelity, liberality, and courtesy.

Related

- Honor Shame: The Data on Global Culture Types (2015/1/21)
- Honor Shame: Guilt-Innocence Cultures are WEIRD (2017/1/19)
- Mogadishu Matt: Hollyweird Homocorp Sissies be Warned! (2020/6/23)
- Gunner Q: Into the CHAZ (2020/6/24)

Having an Attractive Attitude in Serving

Jack · 29 June 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Having the right attitude goes a long way towards becoming a recipient of a blessing.

Readership: All
Targeted Readership: Christian Men;
Theme: Breakdown
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Introduction

In a previous post about Being Attractive in Service (2020/6/24), we discussed how being involved in the church and community could provide a setting in which a man could attract the attention of a female. It's not even necessary for a man to serve in a formal manner. All he has to do is establish a friendly rapport with others, and carry himself with the right attitude about life.

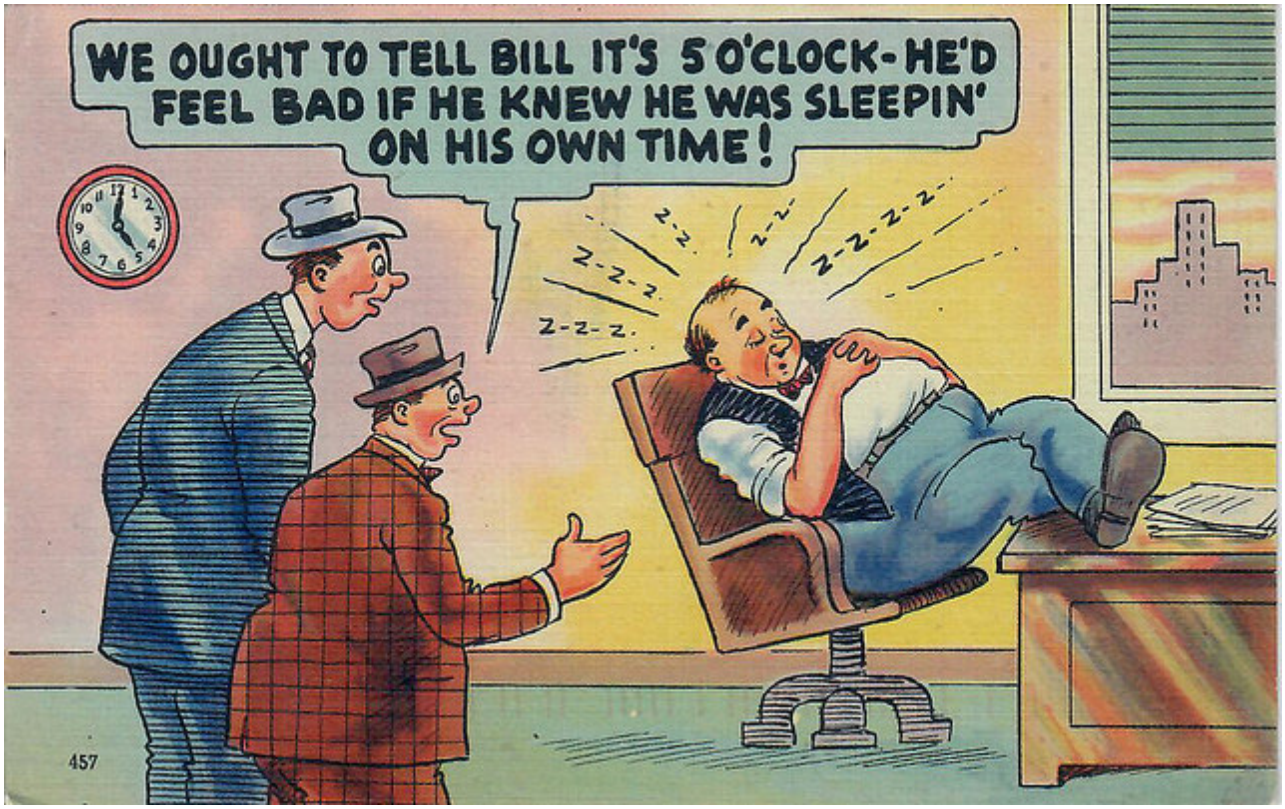
Yes, a man's attitude is extremely important. You might be motivated to get involved and serve in order to meet chicks or guy friends, but if you expect those things to just fall out immediately, you're setting yourself up for frustration, disappointment, and even anger, which will only work against you. Instead, you need to have a purpose that transcends beyond your own self. You have to go into it with a posture of humility and service, and if you're too proud, then this will feel like you're a "dancing monkey", as some readers have commented.

To safeguard yourself against having a counterproductive attitude, it helps if you become aware of what God is doing, and what other people want or need done. If you're truly serving with the right attitude, then you will feel an internal burden of responsibility to do certain things and act a certain way. Accepting this sense of responsibility is the hard part for most people. It's much easier to just do what you're asked to do, and remain ignorant about the purposes of the larger enterprise. If you don't feel this burden of conviction, then you're probably only doing those things for your own glory and benefit, and you don't have the proper mindset to glorify God through your service.

Stay focused on the Work, not on the Reward

As a comparison, let's think about what it is like to work for a company. It is counterproductive to go into the job with the attitude, "What can I personally get out of this?" But this is the same common attitude that most 9 to 5 wage slaves at a corporation have, and they too feel like dancing monkeys who suck up to the boss and resent him at the same time. I don't have to tell you, those employees who have such an attitude are the last to receive praise or get a promotion. The "good" employees are those who focus on the work, and try their best to understand what the boss is trying to accomplish, in order to educate themselves about what all needs to be done. These are the employees that are favored by the boss, and who receive not only wages, but also opportunities for advancement and honor.

When we volunteer our time and energy to serve the church or others in our community, we are working for the Kingdom, and our boss is God. We have to think about what God wants done in this situation, and then find a way to fulfill this need. The impact of our attitude is similar to what we would find when working for a company.



So what about finding a Wife?

I know it's hard for men to get their minds off the bushy bullseye. AngloSaxon quipped,

> "What I'm taking away from this post is find a way of serving which involves walking around shirtless and proceed to Win."

It is not that simple. Going shirtless would only be appropriate for the kind of work that would be done alone or with other men. But if another man's daughter showed up to the site to serve the working men drinks and food, then your six-pack abs might be noticed by her. That's assuming that you have a six-pack, and that she's the kind of girl who's into that.

To make this scenario work, she must also have the mindset to serve in like manner. So this can also act as a filter for the kinds of girls that you prefer to meet. Remember the story of Rebecca at the well in Genesis 24? Rebecca had the mind to help a stranger passing through town. She did not expect to find a husband by doing so.

I believe even today God arranges things like this. But if you're not serving in the right place at the right time, then you're not going to have a "Rebecca at the well" experience. Of course, you have to be involved in the Lord's work, and you need to have built up good rapport with the others (i.e. her father) before things like this can happen. The previous post about Being Attractive in Service is about how to do that.

But remember, there is no guarantee of finding a Grade A wife in all of this. You can't expect to do A, B, C, and automatically obtain an obedient Christian wife with cup size D. But being obedient to God will certainly increase your chances of receiving what you desire.

Blessings come by Surprise

JPF answered the exit question, and added that you can't arrange for God to arrange your meeting with your future spouse.

> "[What are some church or community sponsored activities that you know of, which would offer good opportunities] For establishing marriages within the group? None. The successes I saw were few enough that it is reasonable to say they were an accident, rather than the intended and desired result."

There is no "accident" with God. It only looks that way to us. I've often had the impression that God wants to surprise people with blessings, but He can't do that when people are too self-conscious and are expecting specific things, including comfort zone preservation and personal rewards. "Taking yourself too seriously", as Ed put it, is another very good way to describe this prideful, self-centered attitude.

Remember those sayings, "Life happens when you're busy doing something else", and "You'll meet someone when you least expect it"? The idea here is to put yourself into a conducive situation and foster the corresponding attitude and mood in which that something or someone can happen.

JPF adds,

> Some "singles" ministries even stated flat out that if you were here to find a spouse, you have the wrong attitude."

This is only half true. Focusing on what you can personally get out of serving is the wrong attitude. But being there to find a spouse? Pray tell, where else would be a better place for Christian singles to mix and meet? The Saints and Sinners nightclub on Bourbon St.? Or maybe Tinder is better???

It is to be expected that young people coming to church, or to functions designed to serve others in the church, may have deeper motivations for doing so. There's nothing wrong with having other motivations to get involved. What matters is how it plays out.

I'll offer the following true anecdote as an explanation.

Case Study — Wrong Motivations can be Redeemed

Many years ago, there was a college aged man — an unbeliever — who was invited by his friends to visit our church. After he came to our church, he saw that there were a number of nice girls in the young adult congregation (which had a separate worship service from the adult congregation), and he kept coming back for this reason. He talked openly about his interests in this girl or that girl. The other youths were alarmed by his talk and they told the pastor about it. The pastor asked to talk to him privately and he agreed. During their meeting, this young man had the balls to tell the pastor that his motivation for coming to church was to meet girls. The pastor wisely told him that if he wanted to keep coming to our church, then he needed to serve in the church, and he needed to adopt the mindset that he would marry one of the girls in the congregation. If he was unwilling to accept these two conditions, then he was not welcome to come anymore. He really liked the girls, so he agreed to these conditions.

He followed through on the agreement, and after a year, he became a professing Christian. (Of note, the pastor never required him to become a Christian in their agreement, but he apparently had the faith that it would happen.) After two years, this young man paired up with one of the sweetest and most attractive girls at church. Everyone agreed that they made a good couple. After about two more years, they got married. At the time they married, she was 23, and he was 25.

Today, they are very happily married and have two children. He is presently one of the church elders.

Conclusions

Men always want to keep looking for the easy silver bullet for bagging a wife (a list of things to do or say that have immediate, tangible results), but this is not the way to get what you want out of God. In fact, this self-centered approach is characteristic of a poverty mentality. It is not the right attitude to have in serving God.

God rewards those who love Him, obey Him, and who exercise faith in doing so. Furthermore, this love should be freely extended to those around us. This is the best attitude that we can strive for.

> "But without faith it is impossible to please Him: for he who comes to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek Him."
>
> Hebrews 11:6 (NKJV)

Here is a general short list of some hallmark characteristics of spiritual obedience in serving God or man. You need to…

- Be where God wants you to be.
- Do what God wants done.
- Do the work with a sense of responsibility characteristic of a good steward.
- Have a sense of personal conviction, but do not take yourself too seriously.
- See the purpose of the larger enterprise.
- Do the emotional work of being upbeat, optimistic, and inspiring.
- Go with the Flow (viz. Csíkszentmihályi Flow).
- Don't resort to disappointment if things don't go smoothly, or work out as planned.
- Don't become frustrated if God doesn't reward you immediately.
- Have faith that it's all in God's hands.

Service is NOT supposed to be self-gratifying, so you shouldn't expect this. However, the work itself, the fellowship that comes with working with others can be fun and deeply satisfying, especially if it's something that you're good at.

Having a specialized knowledge, skill, ability, or qualification can put you way ahead in terms of confidence, spiritual authority, and responsibility, and this holds true whether it is recognized by others in the pecking order or not.

Related

- Σ Frame: A Study of Csíkszentmihályi Flow (2017/12/29)
- Σ Frame: The Blessings of Flow (2018/1/23)
- Σ Frame: Wisdom, Spiritual Efficiency, and Flow (2018/1/26)

She Needs You

Jack · 1 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Having an abundance mentality is indisposable to a man.

Readership: Christian men, husband's, fathers, and those called to be such.
Theme: Checking Out!
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 2.5 minutes

I came across this post in Ed's archives. It contains a message that needs to be repeated.

Radix Fidem: She Needs You (2012/3/30)

There is no short course in having a shepherd's heart.

The quintessential man is a shepherd. He doesn't need the sheep; they need him. There are blessings and rewards for getting involved, for tying yourself to their needs, but you could live without them. In fact, it's easier to be a predator. But in the grand moral sense of how the universe operates, if you really want the best of what's available, you'll take up the often thankless task of shepherding.

Fundamental to the whole thing is your own sense of need. If you are needy, you are a sheep yourself. You're a little boy who still needs his mommy, still nursing at the breast. You aren't fulfilling her needs, because you drag on her inner resources too long and the sabbatical rest is denied. These are all symbols conveying a very deep truth beyond clinical discussion. If you haven't taken responsibility for the things demanded of you, if you haven't first demanded satisfaction of what you need from yourself, you can't let go and stand alone.

If you can't stand alone, you can't do anything for anyone else which matters. It means you don't matter. You're a problem, not the solution. Being a man means having some answers which come from inside you, answers which outweigh and justify your demands. It means doing what only a man can do. Don't mistake that for simply doing your job, honoring your contracts, etc. Those are fundamental human moral obligations, not manhood itself. Pulling your own weight is just the starting point. There is something unique in taking the responsibility for the welfare of others, but even more rare is feeling the pain of failure. It's ownership, not of all the outcomes, but of all the losses you can't possibly prevent. It's the power to face the weaknesses, failures, sorrows and still willing to try again.

More, it's the dire need to keep trying because you can not let yourself quit. You'll always be capable of miscalculating and quitting too soon or not soon enough, but those are incidental to the inner necessity of commitment to a sense of mission you simply can't abandon. You are saying, "Screw the cost; I have to do this." If you can really get hold of that, let it get hold of you, then you have whatever it is manhood is supposed to mean.

This is that very something women need. This is what calls to them. It really has precious little to do with measurable accomplishments, though some are silly and shallow enough to think that's what matters. If so, they don't matter. Because a real woman is looking for a real man. If you can scrape off the silly Victorian and Germanic-feudal notions of "real man," just as she must reject the same mythology about herself, you might get somewhere with this. A man does not need a woman, but everything which calls to him is exponentially better with her support. The survival imperative of passing on your genes is a poor shadow of what really matters eternally. Rising above mere instinct means you'll draw on all of hers.

Your fire of commitment is her warmth in a cold and abusive world.

I can't justify any of this with pure logic. If there is nothing in a man or woman to find this vision compelling, we have to let them wallow in the lies. Manhood itself includes an ineffable awareness that certain things depend entirely upon him or it all goes to Hell. He has to accept that burden as part of his redemption from the Fall. She has to get behind him, or she has no hope, but he has to be there first. Her taking the lead in deep spiritual matters is why we are fallen in the first place. It's not her mission, not her place, not her wiring. The pinnacle of her hope is her man's commitment, and damn the failures. Indeed, for both of them, the only thrill worth having, the only joy possible, comes from embracing this vision.

It is not just doing, because performance scores are deceptive; nor is it fitting some definition (AKA, "being"). It's living it, something worth dying for. Live it, man.

Some like it Hot

Jack · 3 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Different men get different responses from different women.

Readership: All
Theme: Checking Out!
Length: 3,000 words
Reading Time: 16 minutes

Intro

> Pease porridge hot, pease porridge cold,
> Pease porridge in the pot, nine days old;
>
> Some like it hot, some like it cold,
> Some like it in the pot, nine days old.

Have you ever thought that these old folk songs might carry any analogous interpretation of something significant that would not be polite to discuss openly?

In recent years, such topics are not so taboo. For example, here's an oldie moldy hit from 1985, Some Like It Hot, by The Power Station — a supergroup featuring Robert Palmer, Tony Thompson from Chic, and John and Andy Taylor from Duran Duran. It's something to listen to while reading.

Is Female Attraction Digital or Analog?

Under the previous post, Looking at the Essentials (2020/6/12), Scott and Deep Strength discussed whether a woman's strength of attraction for a man can change significantly.

Scott argues that a women's attraction is digital, that it's either on or off, and that there's nothing in between. DS argues that women's sense of attraction is analog, that it is subject to variance and context, and can move up or down a sliding scale. I've picked out the crucial points of their arguments as follows.

Addendum: Christianity and Masculinity has reviewed these same arguments in his post Jumping back to meet cute scenarios (2020/6/27). He has reached a few of the same conclusions. If you've been following these arguments and are already familiar with them, then you may want to skip over the next two sections.

The Argument for Digital Attraction

Scott offers an example of how a woman can move up the spectrum from a man's point of view, and adds that this is how men fall in love.

> "I have had several LTRs that developed over time with women for whom I had almost no regard for in the first place. It's usually a coworker, or someone you see on a regular basis for whatever reason. She could be flashing giant orange flags that read "here I am come and approach. I will say YES" and I just move along with my life as if nothing is happening. Then, one day the thought flashes across your mind "I never noticed how cute her smile is." And then you are toast. All of the sudden she is all you think about from the time you get up to the time you go to bed. You now have a crush on a girl who up until this point was just somebody you see as part of the scenery at work."

Scott argued that men can think on a spectrum as described in the previous example, but it's not women's nature to be that way.

> "At first glance, the idea of a spectrum of attraction (woman—>man) strikes me as wishfully ascribing male thinking processes to women.

In other words, men are projecting their own vectors of attraction onto women. That is to say, men have the mistaken notion that attraction works the same way for women as it does for men. Making this kind of assumption has long been known to be a blind spot for men.

Scott also says that analog attraction is a fiction necessary to monetize Red Pill content.

> "I believe that the red-pill content creators (the big ones, Christian or not) are full of crap if they believe that true, visceral attraction can be created in a woman who never had it for you in the first place. Like within the first meeting.
>
> Some of them have a conflict of interest in trying to create this fiction, because they sell books and have > monetized YouTube accounts. It is in their best interest to make this seem possible.

In summary, Scott posits that DS is mistaken in assuming that women are analog, that women think and behave like men, and that this is a common type of misperception.

> "I have never seen a woman go from being luke warm about a guy and then become [truly] hot for him. She may settle and convince herself that she is attracted to a man who is the best she can get, but hot crazy in love — no.
>
> If you are not getting really obvious IOIs right from the start, move on. If that makes me "black pill" so be it. I want men to find women who cannot keep their hands of them, otherwise they risk terrible destruction later on."

Scott offered this conclusion.

> "I tend to frame this debate as one of a scarcity vs abundance mentality. Why put so much effort into squeezing juice out some prospect (a girl who was aloof to you at the start) instead of just moving on to the next one?"

Note that this argument is indicative of an abundance mindset. That is, there are other prospects to move on to.

The Argument for Analog Attraction

In response, Deep Strength argued,

> "There are certainly both men and women who are marrying with varying levels of attraction, but very few have absolutely no attraction. These are probably the ones where you have the wives cringing away from physical contact with their husbands in wedding photos. There are a few, but they're definitely not even a big minority.
>
> If we're using a 0-10 scale where no attraction is a 0 and crazy love at first sight is a 10, there's a big range. The real question isn't if we can take a 0 to a 10… it's if we can take a 3-4 to a 7-8 in most cases. The "sort of > maybe attractive when I'm ovulating" or "relatively dead bedroom but once were attracted to each other" to "I want to do him at least several nights a week." You don't have to be the 10 of "I want to bang like bunny rabbits all the time."

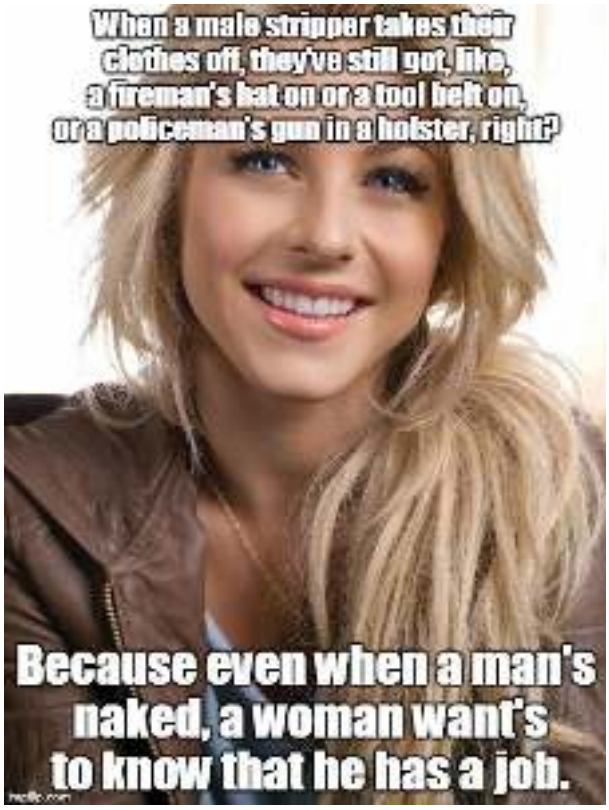
>
> I think the answer to that is yes in a good amount of cases. The results/field reports of husbands turning around their marriages on MRP (married red pill) and RPChristians speak to this."

Here, Deep Strength outlines the hierarchy of women's preferences in attraction.

> "There are definitely some reciprocal indications in terms of attraction itself. For instance, women can pick out attractive features on men just like men can pick out various attractive features on women. If they have particular unattractive features that knocks them down. Most people are not models so they have a relative mix of attractive or unattractive features.
>
> In general, male sexuality operates on some lines of physical attractiveness: "would bang but wouldn't date" to "would bang and date" to "would bang and marry."
>
> As we know though, female sexual strategy is relatively dualistic: AF/BB. Ideally, a man has both AF (dominant, handsome, charismatic, masculine, high status, successful leader,) and BB (money). Women's hierarchy is AF + BB > AF > BB > None. Or if they are their own BB with a good job then it's AF + BB > AF > None > BB.
>
> It's a spectrum and not a yes or no. Women who can't marry an AF + BB or AF will try to get a man who has some AF with a lot of BB, and so on down to only BB. But they will be less and less happy about it."

He offered this example to illustrate how attraction can be analog.

> "Lemme give you another example. I'm maybe average attractiveness (not unattractive but not attractive). A couple of my friends have called me a 6. I don't normally get women to look at me twice. However, I've TAed a few classes where there are multiple TAs working together with a large group of students. What usually ends up happening is that a lot of the students (including the women) start to gravitate toward the more attractive men first. However, I know my stuff down pat, and I usually challenge the students and tease the girls. My professor later told me that a large majority of the students told me that I was their favorite TA. I was getting IOIs from the women whereas I had none before and even asked some out later and said yes.
>
> This is the power of being in a position of relative authority and being charismatic with the students. I think it's also true that first impressions are the most important, and it's relatively rare(r) that a woman will like you, sans not being attracted at first impression, but it's been my experience that there are chances to subvert that notion but it has to be in specific circumstances.
>
> YMMV. But I've had that happen several times throughout my life like I described in the Meet Cute article on my site [Meet Cutes – Are They Common? (2020/3/13) so] this is not an isolated incident. Some other commenters chimed in saying it was the case for them too."



Deep Strength's argument is summarized here.

> "From what I've seen it depends on fairly specific circumstances to set men up to be successful when there is not a lot of initial attraction. We discussed some way back when here: Understanding the Friend Zone and Escaping it (2015/4/10)"

Both men have a pretty solid case. Both men have experiences to back up their arguments. But how could both men be right?

Women are always "ON"

In my view of the way it is, women are always "on" sexually. They have an ego investment in being able to receive attention, usually by being attractive. They are always intensely conscious of their sexual value, and they tend to interpret everything through a sexualized lens. But the thing is, women are also genuine virtuosas in hiding their fertility and arousal.

As an example of this, let me say that it is common for a man, while having no motives whatsoever, to speak to a young woman about something benign, and then get an indignantly hot retort of, "Sorry, I have a boyfriend!" In this, she is subtly insinuating that the man is making a sexual advance, which she then decides to reject. Such instances of self-centered solipsism betray their deeper nature.

The challenge that women face is not in masking their sexual instincts, but for them to find a way to express that part of their nature without any negative repercussions. They are finicky in the selection of the man they will express their sexuality to, and they can be extremely particular about the social setting as well.

But once a woman can open herself up fully in the presence of a man, the crazed, animalistic intensity of female's raw c0ckamania spews forth. (Some men don't actually want to know how insane this craving can be, because it would disrupt their sense of order and their respect for humanity.)

Now, I'm oversimplifying ten years worth of Red Pill praxeology here, but the idea is that women are sexual beings by nature, and it simply awaits to be revealed. The modus operandi of Pick-Up Artistry is all about understanding and maneuvering the complicated processes required to reveal the feminine sexual nature.

Modern culture has also made it easier for women to abandon agency and express their sexual nature. See Heartiste's exposition on The 6 Sirens of the Sexual Apocalypse (2012/11/2).

In general, women gravitate towards any man or situation that allows them to lower their guard and freely abandon the responsibilities of having any moral agency. Bad girls will even insist on their "right" to exploit this state of being. The aphorism, "girls just wanna have fun", rings true here. As we already know, women find this easy to do with certain men, and the qualities of such men have been discussed before. (We give these high SMV men convenient labels such as AF's, chads, studs, and the like.) But one noteworthy characteristic of these men is that they are self-sufficient and so they have many options because they are not beheld to various personal needs.

Some women (too few in my opinion) have additional qualifications about choosing a man for additional purposes, i.e. marriage, and therefore, these women have additional ramifications to consider in their process of opening up.

Different Men Attract Different Women

With these things in mind, we have to consider the visceral appeal of the man in question, and his overall suitability for a given woman's intended purposes for pairing up with him. Here I'll use Scott, DS, and myself as examples to illustrate how different women react to a man's SMV.

- Scott is (or was) at least a 9 on an SMV scale, so he shines out readily and many hot women are quick to open up to him. Thus, these women's inherent sexual nature is expressed almost immediately.
- I would put myself somewhere between 7 to 8 (maybe a 9 at my peak). So my experience resonates with Scott's, although it is not as scintillating. I drew the frantic attentions of a lot of women who had a lower SMV than I did. But I would never get IOI's from extremely attractive women (unless they were desperately looking for short term thrills). I still get a very positive reaction from many women, almost daily, but I wouldn't necessarily interpret this as a meaningful IOI. It just means that some women find it easy and enjoyable to open up to me.
- DS stated that he is a 6, so we shouldn't be surprised to learn that fewer women open up to him, and only under certain circumstances that allow his inner qualities to shine forth. DS doesn't have a lot of frenzied females calling him in the middle of the night to come top her off. But on the other hand, it might be easier for DS to find a deeper, more meaningful relationship, simply because only those women who are attracted to his inner qualities come forth showing interest.

- We can assume that a man who is not self-sufficient, or less than a theoretical threshold, would not get any attention at all from women. Within a patriarchal society having moralized norms, this threshold would be very low. But as the acceptance and ease of promiscuity increases, so does this threshold. Herein lies the widespread appeal among men for the patriarchal system. It is also one reason why rebellious, promiscuous women despise the patriarchal system.

All of this seems to support the claim that women are opportunistic in the mating game, and that men don't have a clue, which renders them idealistic.

Different Women are Attracted to Different Men

Going off of the previous section, we can see how there is a vast difference in the kind of women that each man attracts.

- Scott attracts women who are expressly looking for a handsome man. He obviously knows that "girls just wanna have fun" (i.e. sex), and that they are only open to those men who are conducive to this experience.
- I can attract a number of women for sex quite easily, but they are not the type of women that would be so gorgeous as to be beyond my threshold of temptation. I can attract women for relationships, but things tend to go slower for me than things go for Scott, which is more like what DS experiences.
- DS attracts women who are more reserved and self-controlled, and probably more marriage minded too. These women are also those who tend to be more sophisticated in their selection process.

For those girls that DS describes as having no apparent attraction in the beginning, but who slowly "warm up" to the man (given the right social setting), I think one of two events can be safely presumed, and either of these would jive with Scott's arguments.

1. The girl always had a soft spot for that man from early on. But the girl has to wait for the relationship and the social setting to develop before they can feel free to express their deeper feelings.
2. The girl is turned on by the social structure itself. A man exercising authority and displaying competence is what turns them on, and not the man himself.

As I mentioned before, women are extremely skilled in hiding their own feelings of attraction and fertility cycle, and this is "built in" from an evo-psyche perspective. As Rollo says, women have an existential fear of wasting their reproductive potential on a sub-optimal man. They don't want to choose poorly, waste time, or look like a fool. In other words, the "gathering" instinct of the woman finds a large number of choices of men whom she is attracted to, or turn her on, and so she has the luxury of choice, making her very relaxed and selective. She waits until one man shines out before opening herself up.

On the outside, it all looks the same to the man. But a discerning man can figure out which of these inner mechanisms is at play if he is aware of it. The difference in the woman's motivations behind her response is largely determined by her personality. In general, introverted girls follow the first approach listed above, and extroverted girls follow the latter.

Concluding Statements

So going back to the debate between Scott and DS, I think they are talking past each other due to their different life experiences caused by their contrasting SMV's.

The takeaway from this excellent discussion is that…

- Different kinds of men attract different kinds of women.
- Different kinds of women are attracted to different kinds of men.
- Hawt men can easily attract attention from those women seeking hawt men.
- Women who are more selective, more sophisticated, more demanding in their expectations, or who have the luxury of choice will be more choosy and careful in selecting a man.
- Both hawt handsome men (like Scott), and men who display authority and competence (like DS) are able to create attraction.
- The social structure and setting is often what allows each respective man to showcase those unique characteristics of his which can attract those individual women who happen to find those things to be attractive.
- I should also add that libido and testosterone (T) presents a significant difference among men. Libido causes the sexual interaction to become a significant motivator in determining the preferred relationship structure. It is also known that women, in general, are highly attracted to high T men.

Some like it hot, some like it cold.

Related

- Σ Frame: DTF Cupid (2017/12/17)

The Dominatrix Conversation

Jack · 6 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A dominatrix teaches power hungry women how to talk down to men.

Targeted Readership: Single men; Men who must deal with domineering women;
Theme: Checking Out!
Length: 1,500 words
Reading Time: 8 minutes

Profile of a Russian Dominatrix

The Style Section in the New York Times included an article written by Alice Hines entitled, Here's How to Deal With Men (Thwack!) (2018/1/20). This article was also reviewed in Psychology Today by Dr. Tara Well, A Dominatrix Reveals the Secret to Power Dynamics (2018/1/24).

These two articles cover the career and 'professional' advice of a self-professed Dominatrix, Kasia Urbaniak. She has her own website, called The Academy, which offers tutorial videos for women seeking power and control over men.

Ms. Urbaniak immigrated from Russia, which is a strong Power vs. Fear (PvF) ethical system, so she obviously sees the world from within a vicious PvF ethical structure.

Kasia Urbanik

She also collectively assumes that men and women are opponents in a zero-sum game. Although it should be noted that, contrary to her views, Russian society as a whole does not espouse such a cynical or competitive view towards male-female relationships, so NARWALT.

Aside from the obvious fact that her emotional constitution has been damaged beyond all hope of redemption, a psychoanalytical analysis of her viewpoint would suggest that there is some grand mal Psychological Projection going on.

Overall, Ms. Urbaniak is a natural fit for the unique juxtaposition of BDSM and Female Dominance. We should be prepared to see more of her ilk in feminine-centered media outlets.

A Feminist Russian Dominatrix Speaks to Wimmin

The headline on her website reads,

> "I teach women to profoundly expand their personal power and influence in a world that is screaming for it."

At first, I found her site to be a grandiloquent, satirical gaffe of the BDSM industry, intended to attract business. But then she asks the question,

> "How does the silencing of women begin?"

This is a loaded question, and one that I find quite offensive, honestly, because she is not a lesbian dominatrix. It would be snappier, more honest, and more in line with the spirit of her business to instead ask the question,

> "How does the silencing of men begin?"

But no, if she were that honest, it would not attract the glorified cover of the NYT and Psych Today. Her popularity has arisen because, and ONLY because, she is a Feminist mouthpiece, and one who lies through a contorted identity, with the implied aim to 'save women from their oppression'.

In addition, her question is offensive because not only does she presume to be an itinerant 'savior', she also assumes a lot of false contexts that buy into the feminist narrative. A few are listed as follows.

- It assumes that women are systemically oppressed.
- It assumes that women are 'not allowed' to speak (freely).
- It assumes that men are engaged in a conspiracy to subjugate women.
- It assumes that men have the mass-scale power and the collective will to silence women.
- It assumes that women need to 'defend' themselves by making a collective effort to exert power over men.

These assumptions might be true in other cultures subscribing to the Power vs. Fear (PvF) ethical system (e.g. Sudan), or even the Honor vs. Shame (HvS) ethical system (e.g. Saudi Arabia), but they're not true in the west. The west has the opposite problem. Substitute the words 'men' for 'women', and 'feminists' for 'men' in the above statements, to get a true description of the social dynamics in the west. Hence,

- Men are systemically oppressed.

- Men are ‘not allowed’ to speak (freely).
- Feminists are engaged in a conspiracy to subjugate men.
- Feminists have the mass-scale power and the collective will to silence men.
- Men need to ‘defend’ themselves by making a collective effort to counteract the power of Feminist influence.

This seems to fit right into the Dominatrix’s world view, and some men might be able to accept this in the context of sexual playacting. However, men can’t accept living in a world based on this reality, at least not normal healthy men. Feminists might agree, but they would never own up to it. That would constitute waaay too much honesty to be possible.

So what is the right way to think of relationships?

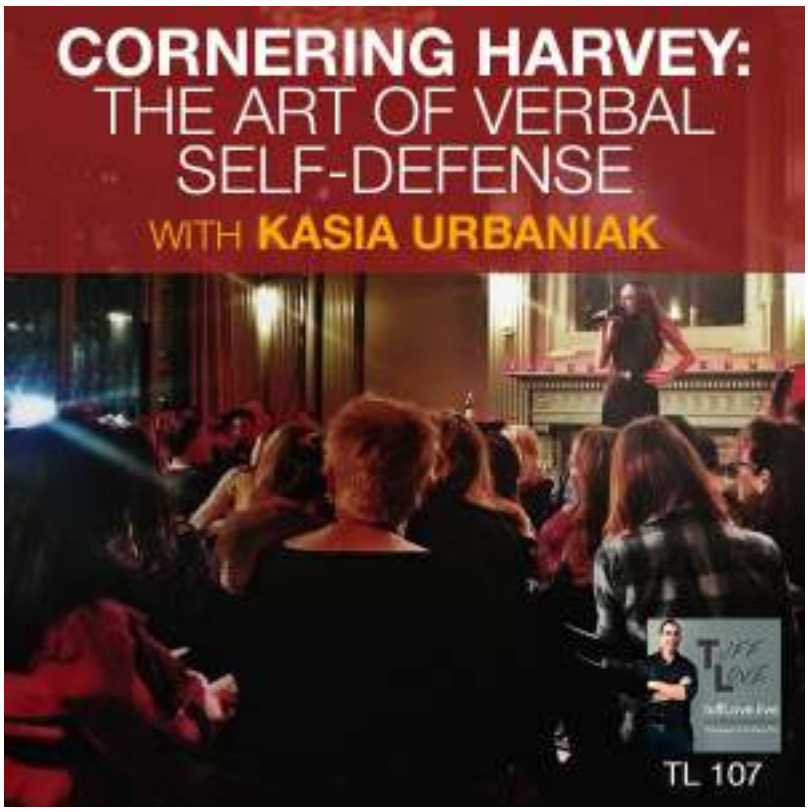
I need to interrupt this analysis to point out how the Dominatrix’s attitude toward male-female relations is wrong. In general, the right mindset is sort of the opposite.

First off, a healthy relationship does not assume that men and women are opponents, unless there is an Adam and Eve type of rebellion happening. Men and women were meant by God to be companions.

Secondly, a healthy relationship does not engage predominantly in zero sum games.

Thirdly, the Power vs. Fear ethical structure applied within a relationship is troglodyte primitive.

Her viewpoint is wrong, but it’s not because men are purportedly ‘scared’ of suave, harridan sex workers, or the demise of ‘Patriarchy’ (as Feminists mockingly claim). Neither is it wrong because it devalues and emasculates men, although it does. It is wrong because it inverts God’s ordained hierarchy, which is the natural order humans must conform to, if they wish to see good days.



The Dominatrix's Locus of Power is Verbal

Let's look past the feminist propaganda and presumptive braggadocio and find out the source of her power. She explains the control dynamic expressly as follows.

> "In Academy lexicon, the word "you" is dominant and the word "I" is submissive. Neither is inherently superior. "If I'm in control of you, my attention is outward, so precisely fixed on the other person that I almost forget I exist," Ms. Urbaniak told the audience. If you're submissive, "your attention is focused inward, on yourself and your feelings."
>
> Dominant and submissive are, she said, rhetorical and energetic states, and can be unmoored from the social hierarchies that empower men. It's a post-gender outlook, with as much in common with theories of performativity as with women's empowerment programs like the Makers Conference and Lean In, …"

Towards the end of the article, the focus turns to one of Ms. Urbaniak's students, Ms. Kubiak, who is an aerospace business developer. She says,

> "Perceiving and fluidly shifting between dominant and submissive roles improves our communication as a species, she said."

No, it would improve our communication if men and women recognized their dominant and submissive roles respectively, and consistently adhered to them.

> "For now, Ms. Kubiak is exploring the nuances of dominance and submission at Starbucks: "One day I might say, 'I really feel like a white-chocolate mocha.' The next, 'You're going to make me a cappuccino with extra foam, superdry.'"

That's easy practice. I'm sure the potbellied soyboys at Starbux would be eager to comply with her demands.

> "Practice makes perfect. "I'd really like to be in the room," Ms. Kubiak told her boss when he asked her to arrange lunch instead of being present for the signing of the deal she had negotiated. If she could do it over? "I'd nail him with a bunch of questions," she said."

Note to Ms. Kubiak: Keep it up and see how long he enjoys your company enough to keep you on board. Remember, employees are not hired to question and test the boss' decisions, but to help the business achieve certain goals.

Concluding Statements

Ed once offered a useful definition of a curse as anything that presents a barrier to Shalom. This definition agrees with how lies and inner vows act as an umbrella that blocks God's showers of blessings. In this case, the lie is that women should dominate men.

Dominatrices, and feminism in general, attempts to subvert God's ordained order by appointing women to exercise moral and verbal authority over men. They will assert that the ordained order is corrupt because of their own psychological projection. Even so, they will encourage women to exert whatever power they can over men.

A woman who continually makes a man feel self-conscious is explicitly eroding his confidence and the development of a healthy ego. A woman who makes a man feel self-conscious is inflicting a double curse on him. This is a powerful curse because (1) it inverts the structure of authority, and (2) it makes him focused on his own performance and how he is judged by others on his outer appearance. If a man falls for this ruse and comes to believe this is the right way to think, then he is "under her spell" (in mythical language). This destroys the natural development of confidence and leads a man directly into feminine pedestalization, legalism, gyneolatry, or apostasy. For more on this angle, read Reevaluating the Centrality of the Male Ego (2020/4/15). Therefore, if a woman does this, it should be taken as a bl00dy red flag.

On a lighter note, it might help a man if he exercised the use of the pronoun "you" in a dominant manner when speaking to women and making demands of them, as Ms. Urbaniak has inadvertently revealed.

Related

In a previous post, The Morphing Ethical System in the U.S. (2020/6/26), we looked at how the Power v Fear ethical structure is being coopted and developed in western society by TPTB.

- Illimitable Men: Dominance & Submission (2017/2/5)
- Σ Frame: Man as the Manager, Woman as the Helper (2018/5/19)
- Σ Frame: Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (2018/10/3)
- Σ Frame: Moon Day Review – The Feminine Empire (2019/5/6)
- Σ Frame: The Egosyntonic Art of Tone Policing (2019/5/31)

8 Examples of IOI Word Semantics

Jack · 8 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Women make very subtle hints. If you miss them, you're out.

Readership: All;

A few months ago, I wrote a List of Female IOI's (2020 March 30) which has since become one of the more popular posts this year. One of the verbal IOI's listed was Word Semantics — playing with fuzzy semantics to form suggestive euphemisms.

Men interpret word semantics as a test of his intelligence, level of experience, and social awareness. But usually, women are not that aware of word semantics as being a test. They're only looking to get involved with a guy, and when she makes the effort to hang out with him, things either pick up or they don't.

Since I wrote that post, I came across this one from Bored Panda: Obvious Hints From Girls That Guys Hilariously Failed To Notice (2017). The author, Greta Jaruševičiūtė, apparently invited readers to leave their own stories on the topic. I found most of these to be great examples of fuzzy semantics, and there are also a few examples of coded speech, loaded language, pointed suggestions, and suggestive innuendos.

In this post, I've picked out eight stories that make for good Red Pill discussion.

 * * 1 * * ***

> Friend was driving a group of us home after a night out and I was the last one.
> Me: Ice cream sounds so good right now.
> Him: Yeah I could go for some ice cream
> Me: I have some at my house, want to come up for some?
> Him: Sure!
> Go upstairs and he actually wants ice cream so I sit super close to him on the couch and ask him if he wants anything else hint hint. He then spends 15 minutes asking for my opinion on the next car he should buy and then leaves.

More evidence for the claim that women always have sex on the brain. Maybe if she served the ice cream topless, she wouldn't have had such a cold response.

 * * 2 * * ***

> We went to eat and then a movie. After the movie was over we sat in the parking lot for hours. I then drove us back to her house so I could go home. Sat in her driveway till 1 am talking and making out.
> She told me: “You’re making this so hard.”
> Me: “Making what hard?”
> Her: “To be good.”
> Didn’t click. 30 minutes later she tells me a guy has never gotten her off. Didn’t click that she was hinting. I literally said “challenge accepted” but went on talking and never made a move. It clicked the next day.

Still more evidence for the claim that women always have sex on the brain. It would be too humbling for her to ask.

 * * 3 * * ***

> There was this girl who worked behind the bar at my local that I got along with and for some time too.
> Stepping out for a smoke break, she goes on to say that her brother is gay and in a relationship.
> Her: Why is it so easy for him and all I want is a boyfriend.
> Me: Hope it’s not contiguous (sic. contagious).
> She was dating one of the guys working there a week later.

If the man doesn’t pick up the signal, she’s on to the next one. Time’s a wasting.

 * * 4 * * ***

> When I was 23, I woke up in the middle of the night to two girls (one of whom I was dating) standing next to my bed. They had been drinking, so naturally I offered her friend my couch… In the morning I realized my mistake, and asked for a redo… No.

No redo’s. Ever. You have to read her mind and be DTF on a minute’s notice. But if you get the hang of how women are, it’s not hard to read their minds. If she’s giving you steady attention, and you’re alone, there’s a very good chance she’s thinking about coitus. In this case, they didn’t even need to be alone.

 * * 5 * * ***

> 16 year-old me playing guitar (hears doorbell ring) open the door and girl from my history class is standing there.
> Me: Hey! What's up?
> Her: Just wanted to stop by and see what you're up to.
> Me: Nothing, just playing guitar.
> Her: Are your parents' home? Can I come in?
> Me: Yeah, they won't be home for a few hours.
> …cut to me playing guitar with her sitting so close to me that my arm keeps hitting her and messing me up…
> Me: Uhhhh… Could you move over a bit?
> She gets up and leaves.

I'll say it again. If she's giving you steady attention, and you're alone, there's a very good chance she's thinking about coitus. If you don't deliver on the spot, she'll be off to find one who will. Time's a wasting.

 * * 6 * * ***

> So one day I end up singing a special song I co-wrote with a friend in church. And afterwards this girl I barely know strikes up conversation. She says she likes the song (which most people were saying that day) and what not and she gives off signals that she's flirting but I don't return them because I still think she's my friend's girlfriend (because that's the unwritten law). Later after a Facebook search I discover I was wrong. Now things are forever awkward cos she thinks I'm not into her.

Women expect men to read their minds and know all the background story. The thing is, this is an unrealistic expectation. Only bad guys would be DTF under any circumstances, which may explain why hot chicks always seem to end up with bad guys. She may be a church girl, but nevertheless, if she doesn't wake up to this dynamic, she'll end up with a cad.

 * * 7 * * ***

So far, all these case studies have described clueless men missing their chances to be a father. However, there are cases where it is the woman who ignorantly screws up the innuendo. Consider the following examples.

> My now-husband and I used to work at a newspaper together many moons ago. He (city reporter), me (designer) and the MANAGING EDITOR were standing in the newsroom talking one day about some story. All of a sudden, he looks at my chest and goes, “It must be cold in here!” I followed his gaze. Yes, it was cold. I thought the ME would have a stroke. It took me about 15 more years to figure out he had the hots for me. July will be our five-year anniversary.

One can only wonder what she did in those 15 years before she settled down with this one. But I guarantee it didn’t take her 15 years to figure out that she had (or didn’t have) the hots for him.

 * * 8 * * ***

> Once I called my friend and asked him if he was going to the club that weekend. He answers with, “Why? You don’t have a ride?”
> Few weeks after, he already knows “I need a ride to the club” and I tell him I had a date but cut him off to go with him. Later that night he says, “Your date is there if you wanna go dance with him.”
> 20 years later, including 18 years married to him he is still clueless of any hint. Took him 2 years to understand!

Maybe not if he knew she was a carousel rider. He’s just the silent type who waited for his turn. The funny thing here is that she thinks he is clueless, but actually she is the one off the mark. Commenter Chris Doehla responds,

> That’s not a hint. That’s more of a hint that you’re not interested/unavailable. Why do girls think bringing up another guy ever helps? Why would it clue him in that you’re interested in him if you’re talking about some other dude, especially if you had a scheduled date with him? You schedule dates with guys you like, so he probably thought you were more interested in the guy you actually had a scheduled date for, especially if the > pretense of the conversation is that he's just giving you a ride.

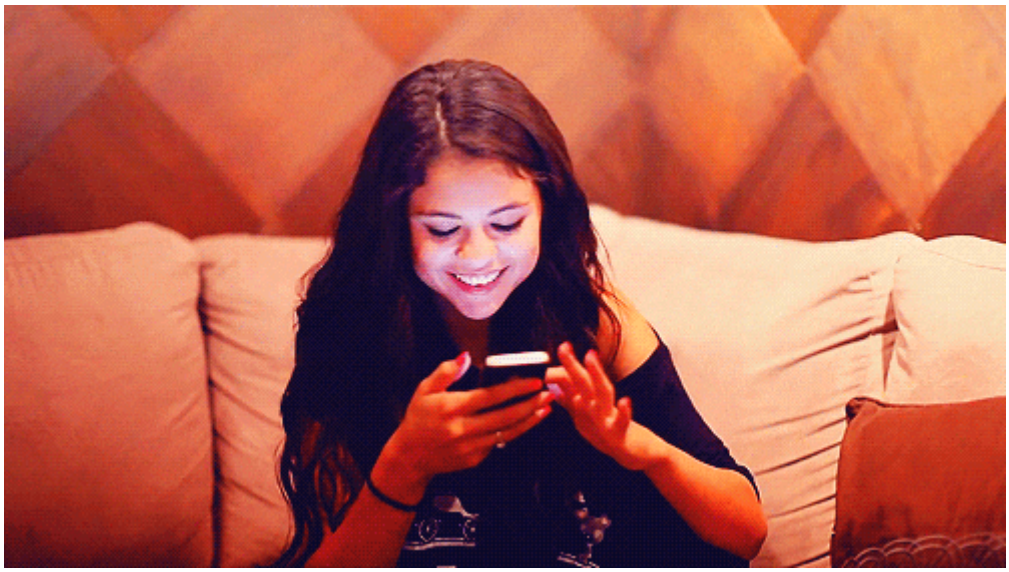
Some women are so focused on keeping their schedules (or inboxes) chock full of male entertainment, that they are unaware of how this is perceived by men.



Conclusions

Contrary to popular stereotypes, women always have sex on the brain, and men are naïve and altruistic. I've mentioned this before in previous posts. After reading a few of these word semantics, it seems obvious that it is generally true. Women are sharper than men when it comes to the sluice bait.

In most of these stories, the men never get it. But there are a few in which he does – but only after the fact.

This goes back to something I've said before. When a woman makes a strong advance by humbling herself sexually and opening her heart, it's like a once in a lifetime chance. If you don't kick things up a notch, and do it with gusto, she'll interpret this as a rejection of her ever-so-subtle signal, and she'll never come back. She'll go on to the next guy on her list. If she does come back, then she has already gone through the other guys on her list without finding any satisfying takers. But since the women who do this tend to be promiscuous, perhaps it is all for the best when righteous minded men miss out.

Related

- Σ Frame: Things I Learned About Women in College (2018 April 4)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Yes, Women Lust Too (2019 December 6)

How to Develop an Attitude of Detachment

Jack · 10 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Maintaining Frame is the same as setting Socio-Emotional Boundaries.

Readership: Men;
Length: 2,900 words
Reading Time: 15 minutes

Introduction

In the Manosphere, there's been a lot of talk about the importance of maintaining an emotional boundary. This trait has assumed many labels (dependent on the context), including abundance mentality, detachment, Dread, maintaining Frame, outcome independence, remaining aloof, and Zero Farts Given (ZFG). I'll go with detachment for the remainder of this essay.

In spite of the attention that this concept has received, I don't think it has ever been described in great analytical detail. This post will cover some descriptions of Detachment, list some limitations, and go over 4 case studies to illustrate the application and value.

Ed Hurst's Description of Detachment

I came across one of Ed's old posts that actually describes this attitude from a socio-spiritual-psychological viewpoint. I've reposted it in full below. If a man can understand what this is all about, it makes it all that much more easier to construct this attitude within himself.

Radix Fidem: The Parable of Boundaries (2012/9/30)

> If you haven't spent time alone with yourself, feeling for your personal boundaries, you aren't ready for life.
>
> We could rephrase that for Christians as spending time in God's presence, in prayer and meditation, but on the human plane the difference is nil. A spiritual awareness simply adds another level of imperative.

In many ways, the signal difference between childhood and adulthood is taking responsibility for yourself. You can't do that unless you've spent time with yourself with a level of disengagement, detachment. You have to be out of your mind to usefully return to your senses. Infants have no ego boundaries. The awareness develops of itself, but means nothing without contextual teaching. We teach children by degrees how to disengage, but no one can do it for them. If they don't have a sense of how they impact the rest of the world, and that it matters for its own sake, they remain children. We call this developing an ego, a sense of self-awareness.

By the same token, identifying the boundaries between egos also means identifying sane limits. Not in the sense we avoid crossing those boundaries; they will be crossed or humans don't communicate. We can't transgress them meaningfully without understanding them. We can't take our place in this world until we sense the moral boundaries of human limitations. We already have too many people honestly incapable of rising above childhood without people simply failing or refusing. Children typically have an inflated yet fragile ego, and sanity means fixing that.

Whatever it is we imagine life is for, whether you believe in God or the Fall or whatever, we have to understand where other people are. Even if we choose to reject everyone else's sensibilities, we still have to know what they are. The alternative is a madness to which we already stand too close.

There are a very large number of people yet gripped in their childhood mythology. They want reality to change to meet them, and stumble along with varying measures of success because too many people humor them entirely too much. Most of humanity are too polite in places where rudeness is demanded, and too rude where it really serves no purpose. That doesn't leave too many of us sane people to shake things up. This is no crusade, but if you choose to sally forth against insanity, you'll need this minimum consideration behind you. You have to change, at least in the sense of dumping everyone else's fantasies for your own.

Most of those pulling the levers of social and political control are demanding you embrace a very bad fantasy. This won't be easy. Strategically it won't matter whether they actually believe those fantasies; it affects only tactics in the context. The problem is the fantasy itself, and their demands for uniformity.

So you'll often encounter people who simply don't grasp sanity, and some will be more annoying than others. Given our economic insanity, you may well have to share a lot of time and space with idiots. They'll gnaw at your boundaries. They are so egregiously silly, they aren't satisfied with ignoring them, but openly attack them, taking it as a personal insult you are different. God has all the power in the universe, and more, but He may not authorize you to escape them directly in time and space. That means creating a space internally, a space in effect. You can't control them, but you can control yourself and learn to make them respect your boundaries to varying degrees.

The default is a detached regard. Attack the problem, not the person. Getting you to hate them is part of their attack; don't surrender that. Don't permit them significance until they earn it. Make it insanely expensive. Respond functionally to the issue when it arises, with a detached examination of how they respond back. Learn the tactics of boundary management as a normal measure of existence. Even a measure of dread is a win for them.

"Sure, act stupid all you like. I have all the time in the world to shut you out. I do this every day."

It's an art to discern the fatal flaw in another person's madness, but it's enough to simply know what you have to do to pass through this life. If you can't, then don't deal with certain things. This is why I suggest violence does have a place, even if it sits in a low priority position. Without any discernible passion, punch their lights out and remark on why and how to avoid it the next time. What does it take to keep them a safe distance? Meanwhile, develop your armor. If physical violence is too improbable for whatever reason, there are various measures of noncooperation which serve the same purpose. People with too much power still have their own limits, and you can find ways to negotiate boundary collisions. Be the smart one in the problem and you'll suffer less.

> Still, don't surrender more than you can afford. You are the only one who knows what that is at any given time. That's why you need a frequent dose of human isolation, to reset and make those inevitable readjustments, or at least reaching out there and feeling for those boundaries again.

From Ed's description, we can get an understanding of how detachment is very healthy, psychologically, socially, and spiritually. We can also understand why detachment is attractive to women — because it is an indicator of inner strength, authentic independence, and maturity in a man.

Limitations of Developing Detachment

Now that we understand exactly what detachment is, a man can go on to the next step of trying to identify exactly what is preventing him from developing the inner boundaries required for the manifestation of this detachment. Below, I'll offer a list of the possibilities.

- A lack of purpose
- Neediness — a lack of self-sufficiency.
- An unhealthy or underdeveloped ego
- Unrealistic or unreasonable expectations
- Ignorance of what you personally require out of the interaction, or not sticking to it.
- Caring too much about the outcome, which may lead to manipulative avenues of control
- A sinful mindset — thinking that your way is the only way, the best way, or the right way, as opposed to having a shepherd's heart and being led by the spirit.

As you can see, basically all these can be summed up as a lack of Frame.

Case Study 1 – The Abundance Mentality of Detachment

AngloSaxon and Derek argued that a man does need a woman. Derek writes,

> A man needs a woman for marriage. In "What Constitutes Biblical Marriage", I listed six reasons implied by Genesis 2 in the 'one-flesh joining' of marriage. These are things that only a woman can give a man when she becomes his wife.
>
> 1. Metaphorical one-flesh joining: teamwork or shared purpose
> 2. Literal one-flesh joining: permanent spiritual bond that mirrors the relationship with God.
> 3. Children
> 4. Blood ties (extended family)
> 5. Sex
> 6. Relationship permanence

That's a great way to reframe the "abundance mentality". IF a man already has those things, then it becomes a list of things to be thankful for. But for those men who don't have all those benefits of marriage already under his belt — single guys, and men with sub-optimal marriages — then dwelling on that checklist of "needs" is not going to help him develop confidence and an abundance mentality, which is the kind of frame necessary to attain those things.

In the same comment, Derek paraphrases a passage from 1st Corinthians 12:12-27, which describes Unity and Diversity within the Body of Christ. I'm not certain these verses apply specifically within marriage. But if we jump back to 1st Corinthians 7, we find a chapter about marriage.

> [26] I suppose therefore that this is good because of the present distress—that it is good for a man to remain as he is: [27] Are you bound to a wife? Do not seek to be loosed. Are you loosed from a wife? Do not seek a wife. [28] But even if you do marry, you have not sinned; and if a virgin marries, she has not sinned. Nevertheless such > will have trouble in the flesh, but I would spare you.

> [29] But this I say, brethren, the time is short, so that from now on even those who have wives should be as though they had none,

It sounds to me like these verses are saying that a man doesn't need a wife. St. Paul even goes further to say that being married is a burden. I'll amplify the phrase "trouble in the flesh" as meaning "a royal pain in the @$$". However, as Ed and Derek pointed out, life is exponentially better when you have one. All this is assuming that the woman in question is actually worthy to play the role of a wife; that she is spiritually obedient, helpful, pure, good willed, free from vices, submissive, maintains herself, and so on. A man definitely doesn't need a wife who is anything less than this.

> Who can find a good wife?
>
> Proverbs 31:10 (NKJV)

10 years of debate in the Manosphere has come to the general conclusion that it's the guy who can adopt an abundance mentality and maintain Frame, among other things.

Case Study 2 – Self-Sufficiency is the Power behind Dread

I lifted this short testimony from commenter RPC over at Dalrock. It's basically one man's story about how he discovered the truth behind soft Dread game.

> "One of the worst things I ever did for my marriage was read "Every Man's Battle" when I was newly married in my early 20s, and then followed the advice and told my wife all about my "sexual sin." I really did both her and me a great disservice. On my part, 10 years of irrational shame and guilt. On her part, 10 years of paranoia.
>
> Then, I red-pilled a few years back, read up on some of the churchian doctrine regarding male sexuality, and realized it's all bullshit. I essentially told my wife to butt out, stopped defending myself every time she saw me glance at an attractive woman, and held my head high about my sexuality. The result is a better marriage and far more respect from her, and no more neuroticisim. I know it might not work that way for everyone, but I > would encourage all men to stop with the self-flagellation. It does wonders for your confidence.

>
> An ironic byproduct is that the group of men I used to meet with for "accountability" have started treating me like an apostate. The martyr complex is strong."

I've heard many men say something like "Your marriage won't improve until you're ready to leave it all behind." A wise man realizes that leaving it all behind is not the point, but that having a strong sense of purpose is the key. If a man is so thoroughly self-sufficient that leaving it all behind is a viable option, then he is closer to home. Many men never come to this realization, and so their marriages continue in perpetual stagnation.

Case Study 3 – Detachment is a Qualifying Trait of Attraction

Scott told this story in a comment under Christianity and Masculinity's post, Generating and handling attraction from the opposite sex (2020/7/8).

> Ironically, this ability to not care (e.g. be outcome independent) is what helps to drive at least some natural attraction.
>
> As painful as the roller coaster of serial monogamy has been for me, I feel it has provided me with some insights that can actually help in the MMP/SMP and comes from this truth.
>
> The cycle ALWAYS follows (followed) this formula:
>
> 1. Relationship starts.
>
> 2. Relationship runs a predictable course. There is a loop within a loop.
>
> 1. Highly charged, novel, getting to know each other, great sex
> 2. Comfortable
> 3. First "fight"
> 4. Sex starts to decrease
> 5. Tension over the downward spiral
> 6. Blah blah…
> 7. More weirdness…

> 8. …aaaand Breakup!
>
> If SHE does the breaking up –> Depressed, “oneitis” “I’ll never meet another one like her”, negative feedback loops. Friends keep setting you up with new girls, you sabotage every one until you finally get over it and reach the following step, which you will already have reached if YOU DO THE BREAKING UP.
>
> 3. “Over it.” Don’t give a crap, totally self-sufficient. Not really interested one way or another.
>
> 4. Right at about that stage is when another on catches your attention, and not a moment sooner.
>
> Back to 1. Meet cute, relationship starts. Ready, go.
>
> (In between each LTR, there are FWBs, ONSs, etc. while you shoot around in the dark trying to make sense of how stupid everything is.)
>
> My point is, being aloof seems to be more than just driving some degree of attraction. In my case anyway, it is a stage or condition that MUST be met in order to proceed to the next meet cute.

I’ve experienced this too. In my experience, being able to maintain a happy-go-lucky ZFG attitude doesn’t seem to be controllable at all. You can’t fake it. You’re either there, or you’re not. But when you’re there, the IOI’s pour in like Niagara Falls. This one factor alone adds credence (in my mind) to the argument that Godliness is indeed attractive, but if so, then true Godliness is not what we think it is. Could it be that defacto Godliness is not much more than a combination of the following?

1. Being confident to game the woman or face the situation. (Fully trusting in God.)
2. Not being distracted or burdened by guilt, shame, fear, worry, anxiety, etc. (Spiritual freedom in God.)
3. Having a solid outcome independence. (Security in God.)
4. Maintaining an attitude of abundance. (Satisfaction in God.)

If so, then how could a man cultivate this spiritual disposition within himself?

The answer to these questions might be found in the next Case Study of Boundaries.

Case Study 4 — The Power of Interpersonal Boundaries

Earlier this year, I browsed the books that were up for sale on Amazon under the label of "Christian Courtship and Dating". The quality of the results was dismal.

However, the best-selling books under this category were variations of Cloud and Townsend's classic seller, Boundaries – Boundaries in Dating, Boundaries in Marriage, etc.

When I saw this, I realized that this is probably the best information out there, concerning courtship in a Christian context.

Boundaries are the most fundamental element of maintaining control of one's relationships, as well as one's self.

Donal Graeme wrote a post a while back which covered the subject of setting boundaries, Knowing When to Escape (2013/12/15). This post is a must read for young single women, and fathers of the same.

Many secular writers discuss the concept of boundaries in mystical terms, such as being "grounded", "based", or maintaining a "locus of control".

Even secular feminist authors like The Goddess Principles writes about "protecting / conserving your energy", and how to use this power to trample over men. Basically, this is about preserving the ego through the use of boundaries.

So this information is out there in many forms, in psychology, philosophy, that new agey BS, but it is conspicuously absent from Christendom. The main problem is that these sources simply describe it as a nebulous power that you have to somehow develop out of thin air, making it seem as though either you're born with it, or not. But actually, the habit of maintaining personal boundaries can be learned – but only if they are taught!

Concluding Statements

In summary, I'll quote another post from Ed which is quite fitting, Practice of Purity (2013/12/19).

> "You cannot touch eternity if you belong to this world.
>
> While we are here, our whole purpose is manifesting eternity in how we pass through this brief time. It requires a sense of detachment, of being disentangled from even yourself. If you cannot bear in your consciousness a recognition that your true self is something other than your mere flesh and thoughts, then you cannot operate in God's glory. While fully involved in human life here with a passion and ardor for what really matters, you hold an awareness on a higher level. You see clearly what matters here because your soul is not confined to this plane.
>
> That sort of awareness has substantial consequences."

Related

- Donal Graeme: Picky Picky (2014/3/18)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Revisiting dread in the Bible with an anti-chivalry lens (2020/6/18)
- Σ Frame: She Needs You (2020/7/1)
- Christianity and Masculinity: How do you truly become outcome independent? (2023/3/28)

Cancel my views for what we call the News

Jack · 13 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

When the news is strictly propaganda, it's time to turn it off.

Readership: All

I'm busy writing reports these days, so a rant should suffice for today's post. I don't rant much often, so enjoy it while it lasts.

On topic, here's Dirty Laundry by Don Henley of the Eagles fame.

I'm old enough to remember news anchors like Walter Kronkite and Dan Rather — men who staked their careers on veracious accuracy. We don't have news anchors like them anymore. Instead we have talking heads who can't keep their fairy tales straight, Anderson Cooper and that ugly sh!t face. You know that guy I'm talking about.

The last time I saw real news coming out of CNN was their coverage of the Chechen rebel situation in 2007. Watching those Russians blow stuff up was truly fascinating. The terror on the faces of the correspondents made it real. Since then, there hasn't been a dimes worth of real news.

> "The spread of globalism means that you as an individual must be made to care about matters happening in some other godforsaken shithole on the other side of the world."
>
> Adam Piggott: The Friday hawt chicks & links – The tribal edition. (2020 July 11)

Commener Klaus responded,

> "Well put, Adam. I'm starting to watch less news as I tire of being told of the plight of (e.g.) the Rohinga… or plastic straws in the ocean. When the economic times get tougher, folks aren't going to be as generous with caring about strangers."

Evidently, westerners still watch the news with a serious mindset. LMAO!

When was the last time the news made you properly informed, without trying to "re-educate" you?

When was the last time you had some news that improved the quality of your life or made your day better?

When was the last time you wasted half an hour of your precious leisure time sipping on the alphabet soup of lies?

Isn't it about time that people wake up to the fact that the news and the internet only serve as an umbilical cord to the globo machine? It's way past time to disconnect.

But no, people still waste their worthless hours sucking off the witches teat of the Zi0nist propaganda megaphone. They don't call it a boob tube for nothing. A better name would be the lube tube, because if they can soften you up with all those lies and that emotional drivel, it will be all that much easier to bend you over and ream you out of heart and home.

I can summarize the underlying gist of the nooz, so you won't need to bother sifting through the doublespeak.

> Get down on your knees! You're going to swallow whatever I put in your ~~mouth~~ mind — BLM, Christian bigotry, COVID, democracy is flailing, feminism, global warming, Islamophilia, Jesus freaks, the Marshall plan, Marxism, #MeTwoo, orange man bad, tone police brutality, political correctness, racist statues swim like fish, pornstar kickstarts Civil War 2, socialism, white guilt, white man's burden, white supremacy, Czar Putin dictates election, and Trump is a meanie.
>
> I'll give you a greasy spoon of unemployment, mortgage forclosures, and traditional chivalry to make it go down easier. Remember your manners and don't talk back, white boy!
>
> In case you weren't listening, you'll hear it all again at 6:00 pm.
>
> And while you're busy digesting this load, we'll import foreigners and spline-fit them to take your stead in society. You must pay homage to them as your betters.
>
> That's right! All you need to do is to trust us. Relax on your comfy sofa at home and drink the Kool-Aid narratives on the news. Soon, hell will arrive and our work will be done. If you don't like that, then go vote for either one of our puppet candidates.

Is the general populace so dumb that they can't see beyond this sh!t show of smoke and mirrors?

Protect your mind! Put down your cheetos and push your chair away from this circus funhouse!

Remember, the so called cancel culture works both ways. If the news networks won't broadcast real news, then I'm not going to watch that crap. Neither should you. Let their ratings drop through the floor.

Related

- Σ Frame: Yankee Stay Home! (2019 February 12)
- Σ Frame: Paul Harvey "If I were the devil" (2019 August 24)
- Σ Frame: Moon Day Review: Murder by Numbing (2019 November 12)
- Σ Frame: The 5 Phases of Deprogramming from the Matrix (2020 February 4)

Wimmin at the Well

Jack · 15 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Missionary dating is not what you might think.

Readership: High SMV Christian men;

Christian men with a high SMV invariably receive many IOI's from various women. But then, assuming he can read them, how should he respond?

If he simply turns her down or ignores her overtures, she'll probably just skip to the next man. Time's a wasting!

It's important for him to step up the game, but following this to it's natural conclusion — sex — just isn't the Biblically prescribed Christian response.

So what is a man to do?

Ed Hurst left a powerful comment under the previous post, 8 Examples of IOI Word Semantics (2020 July 8).

> "We live in a very sad world. I think it's important for men who follow Christ to be aware of how these things work [i.e. the communication of romantic interest through IOI's], not because of "lost opportunities" but so that we may be redemptive. It's one thing to be oblivious to overtures, but it's a powerful witness when you recognize those overtures and can say why you decline. I've said often enough to women, "Flattering, but I'd rather not." It sometimes turned into a Woman at the Well moment."

The phrase "woman at the well" refers to a story about Jesus' interaction with a Samaritan woman in the book of John, chapter 4. [Click on the link to read it, if you are unfamiliar with the passage.]

The text doesn't recount their interaction in greatly extended detail, but I'll put money on wagering that she probably gave Him the bucket list of IOI's. Remember, Jesus wore a garment without a seam (John 19:23-24). This was the equivalent of wearing a silk Armani suit back in the day. IOW, He always looked super sharp, and I'm sure she noticed that.

So how would a typical modern man respond?

Modern guys would stand there blinking in the sun, thinking about how thirsty they are, pondering the best travel route, and how to get back to work on time. A chad might be checking out her cleavage and thinking about how to implement his day game strategy. Any modern man definitely wouldn't be wearing Armani in the desert.

But what did Jesus do?

After making some small talk, he basically made her out to be a slore by mentioning that she had no fewer than five "husbands". (I'm fascinated to learn that Jesus could somehow discern the exact number of men she had slept with.) I'm sure he was rather polite in his verbiage, but anyway, she absolutely ate it up! She thought this revelation was so cool that she told everybody in town!

Of course, this approach just wouldn't go over in today's politically correct culture, and it probably wasn't too appropriate to talk about this back then either.

The Woman at the Well, by Howard Lyon.

The Takeaway

This Bible story and Ed's admonition lends a Word to high value Christian men — Open the eyes of your heart and read those IOI's! If you miss the fact that she's interested, then you're a dud. But if you can pick up on that, then your range of options opens up.

Turning down her invitation to have sex puts you in the driver's seat of the relationship, which is good and right. But she will probably interpret this response as a rejection of the relationship and then ghost. So at that moment, you have to communicate to her that your refusal is not necessarily a rejection, but that it is instead an invitation to have a better kind of relationship. Have a heart-to-heart talk with her. Explain why you want to wait, and how it can lead to a God-glorifying union. There's a chance that she might understand and believe, especially if she's a Christian. But if she doesn't submit to your frame in this respect, then let her go. You've just saved yourself from sin, heartache, and wasting your time on someone who doesn't have God's best for you in her mind.

It's a prime moment for evangelism because her heart is open, trusting, and compliant. Whatever move you make will go straight down to her heart and become part of her spiritual identity.

So, give those chicks who are coming on to you some signature Red Pill fare, and attach your Christian purpose to have a God-honoring marriage. Keep it lite and non-judgmental.

Don't just be another cad taking his turn on her thatch. Instead, use these opportunities to do something for the Kingdom.

Related

- Christianity and Masculinity: How to communicate sexual desire in a relationship (2017 October 3)

Handling an IOI requires a Miracle!

Jack · 17 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Is it possible for a high SMV Christian man to respond to an IOI in a Christ-like manner?

Readership: High SMV Christian men;

As far as I can tell from the comments, Wednesday's post was a miss. So I need to go over it again.

Σ Frame: Wimmin at the Well (2020 July 15)

Jason accurately commented,

> "Well this post is written for high / higher SMP men… …and they are pretty much married, and do have options and choices."

This is not a criticism (as Derek said). This is assumed as a fact. The targeted readership for that essay is high SMV Christian men. It is obvious that single Christian men need to learn how to handle IOI's efficaciously. But in general, women are also attracted to men who are taken, due to pre-selection among other things, so married men also get a lot of IOI's. Thus, married Christian men also need to learn how to handle IOI's too. It is also assumed that the high SMV man is the prize, which means that he has options and choices, and he is not so desperate to shed his load.

The larger question addressed in that post is what a Christian man should do in response to a woman's IOI's.

Let's break this down. When responding to IOI's, what are the choices that these high SMV men have?

The basic choices are…

1. Ignore it.
2. Acknowledge and escalate (presumably to coitus, according to her desire).
3. Acknowledge and reframe the situation into something redemptive.

There are other choices (e.g. "acknowledge and s1ut shame her"), but I will dismiss these as being unconstructive to the following discussion.

Choice 1 is a miss.
Choice 2 is not a Christian response.
Choice 3 is the oft overlooked (if not absolutely esoteric) Christian response.

So what does Choice 3 look like?

Ed's comment (which was cited in the last post) speaks to this question, but no one else has addressed this question. In fact, this question has never before been entertained in the entire Manosphere, to my knowledge.

I am disappointed that, with 36 comments so far, no one has made any comment on the main idea of that post — how to deal with IOI's in a Christ-like manner. There has even been a lot of high-faluting talk arguing to the contrary, even to question the authority of Christ in the matter!

For example, Derek wrote (twice),

> "As I read the book of John, I come to the unmistakable sense that absent the will of the Father, Jesus had no power at all, that is, there was nothing [no divine privilege] to avoid using."

SMH… My Bible says differently. In John 10:30 Jesus says,

> "I and My Father are One."

While we ponder what that might mean, over in Matthew it says,

> "And Jesus came up and spoke to them, saying, "All authority has been given to Me in heaven and on earth. Go therefore and make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, teaching them to observe all that I commanded you; and lo, I am with you always, even to the end of the age." ~ Matthew 28:18-20 (NKJV)

"Making disciples" includes those women giving out IOI's, like the woman at the well.

Someone could argue that Jesus wasn't granted all power and authority until after His resurrection, but since we are living after His resurrection, it still applies to us. In addition, we also now have the Holy Spirit available to us, which apparently was not available to Old Testament believers.

I take all this to mean that Jesus' authority is the same as God's authority. Jesus' will is the same as God's will.

We had better believe that Jesus has all power and authority in heaven and earth, or else our faith is worthless!

The fundamental question we are getting at here is whether this power and authority is available to the current day believer in certain forms. Ed suggested that it all depends on God's purpose for your life. It seems like Derek, AngloSaxon, et al. are saying that it's not available. As Derek said,

> "Honeycomb, Sharkly, and Bee all liked this comment. That's four people who all agreed that the premise of your post is ridiculous because Jesus' interactions with women do not translate to anyone else, due to his divinity. I suspect some may find the notion that Jesus was worried about IOIs and dating to border on blasphemy, as evidenced by the vehement objection to Ed's response."

Imagine that! Jesus was "worried" about IOI's! Project much?

Again, Derek writes,

> "I mostly ignored your post because I thought it was ridiculous for a bunch of different reasons."

So, even though he "ignored" the main post, he can still churn out 1,312 words in 10 comments to discuss the matter. Should I really take that seriously? The original post only had 759 words! TL;DR?

Assuming that they are commenting on topic, "ridiculous" would mean that receiving, reading, and dealing with IOI's as Jesus did would be miracles out of our reach.

Honestly, if I were a younger Christian man reading through those comments, it would be easy for me to see the overall consensus and conclude that it's unrealistic to expect that a man could respond to IOI's in a Christ-like way, as if that would be some kind of miracle.

<<<begin sarcasm>>> What a great excuse to choose option 2! <<<gleeful sarcasm>>>

<<<more sarcasm>>> Better yet, just choose option 1 and go MGTOW! <<<end sarcasm>>>

I'm not convinced about that, and Derek's arguments haven't changed that at all.

Furthermore, if most men think that reading and handling IOI's in a Christian manner is a preposterous oxymoron

— a “miracle”, then I can totally understand why some people think Christian men are total losers in the SMP.

I want to challenge Christian men to believe that dealing with IOI’s can be redemptive if handled properly. The livelihood of our churches and the sanctity of our Christian marriages depends on it!

But it seems like I’m writing to an empty audience. The real miracle is for a Christian man to believe that he is indeed high SMV, and that he can get any IOI’s at all!

Note: When commenting, please stay on topic.

Related

- Dalrock: Overcivilized men, uncivilized women. (2010 November 21)
- Dalrock: How should Christian men respond to slutty women? Marry them! (2012 January 23)
- Σ Frame: Trajectories (2020 February 28)
- Σ Frame: No Authority to give “Consent” (2020 March 6)
- Σ Frame: Fighting Fires (2020 March 20)

Make like a tree...

Jack · 20 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

No posts this week. I'll be traveling to a few scenic areas with the in-laws. Hiking, eating indigenous food, and some barbecue are in order.

I will respond to comments, but not to emails.

If you're craving some fodder for reading, I encourage you to go through some older posts from Dalrock or Christianity and Masculinity. I also found that Ed Hurst has some great posts on game from a Christian viewpoint going a few years back.

Of note, I'm searching for some real world case studies on Christian game, or married game. If you come across any comments that contain personal stories on this topic, I would appreciate it if you would leave a link below.

In case you're still wondering what the title of this post means, it's an old pun.

> Make like a tree… and leave.

Pottery and Tea

Jack · 27 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A summary of the highlights of my trip last week, with pictures!

Readership: All;

Last week, my wife and I took a trip to the mountains of central Taiwan. We met her parents there, and spent a few days together.

We rented a two story cabin. The house was orange with blue shutters, which was a strange but lively color combination. The interior was well furnished, and it had pine paneling that smelled wonderful.

This was the view from our bedroom window.

This was the same view at night.

On Wednesday, we visited a local pottery manufacturer. My father-in-law and I tried our hand at the potter's wheel. Professional potters make it look fun and easy. But it's a lot more difficult than it seems. The clay is pretty stiff, so you need to apply firm pressure to change its shape, but you also need to have a very steady hand. Getting the right balance between force and steadiness is quite challenging.

This video clip shows me trying to form something that resembles a pot. My wife is narrating.

When my hands were cupped around the base of the pot, I'm trying to pull it towards the center, but I was unsuccessful at that. The teacher (shown in the yellow shirt) told me not to be too concerned about this, but to work the clay anyway. In the earlier demonstration, he was able to make a perfectly round bowl, even though it was a little off-center. As you can see in the video, if you apply too much pressure at once, the clay gets thrown out of center, and the centripetal force quickly magnifies this imbalance. This gets more tricky when you try to draw the side of the pot higher and thinner. I imagine it takes years of practice to become very good at this.

While I was there, I remembered the analogy of the potter in Isaiah 29:16; Isaiah 64:8; Jeremiah 18:1-9; and Romans 9:14-24 (read here). As I was working on the wheel, I thought, God's job is difficult!

They had a large number of finished pieces that people had made over the years. Some looked like a little kid had made them, which had a charm of its own, while others were very ornate and beautiful. All for sale.

My wife and I picked out these small earthenwares to use as courtesy gifts in the future.

Wednesday evening, we had dinner at a Hakka restaurant. I always hate to see people post ubiquitous photos of food on Farcebook, but since this food is very unique, I'm willing to post a couple photos. This was sooo delicious!

On Thursday, we went to a tea plantation. The rows of hedges in the foreground of the photo below are tea plants (Camellia Sinensis, not to be confused with Melaleuca).

I learned that there are (only!!!) two varieties of tea, which are named (very creatively) small-leaf and large-leaf teas. The following photo shows the small-leaf tea plant. If you look closely, you can see the bud at the end of the stem. When the tea leaves are picked, they only pluck off the last two leaves and the bud together in one piece. During tea competitions, tea judges and aficionados examine the leaves after infusion to verify that there are indeed two leaves and a bud on each piece.

The tea plants are trimmed back periodically, to allow fresh shoots to grow.

The following photo shows the fruit of the small-leaf tea plant. (Average diameter ~ 2 cm.) I was very interested to see this, because although I have drank a lot of fruit tea in my life, I had never before seen tea fruit. The fruit was very hard, and I can't imagine it would be edible. Like the coffee bean, the tea fruit is mainly a large seed with a thin fleshy skin around it.

The next photo shows the large-leaf tea plant. When harvesting this variety, planters are not as picky as they are about the small-leaf tea (i.e. only selecting the twin leaves and bud). This kind of tea is used to make Assam tea and various black teas.

Now, I'm sure readers are wondering, If there are only two varieties of tea plants, then where do all those hundreds of different kinds of tea come from? These differences arise because of the way the tea leaves are processed after picking. The processing includes things like steaming, drying, sun curing, crushing, fermentation, oxidation, and aging. The oxidation techniques, and the length and conditions of fermentation, especially, result in a vast majority of different flavors.

What do they do with all the tea leaves that have no buds, or have not been processed quite so perfectly? These leaves are used to make a lower quality (i.e. cheaper) tea. The worst leaves of the harvest are overoxidized to hide the poor flavor (it tastes bitter, not smooth and fresh), and broken into pieces so that no one can see that they are not first rate buds. Then they pack this bottom quality tea dust into cute little paper bags and sell it to the Americans and British for the top dollar market price.

And the Americans aren't any the wiser. They think Lipton is really good tea. But in Asia, no one other than cheap restaurant owners will buy that kind of tea.

In sum, I'm enjoying my time in Taiwan. No regrets about coming here.

Related

- Pique (Jessica Ederer): The Ultimate Guide to Different Types of Tea and Their Benefits (2019 September 28)

Tinder Translations

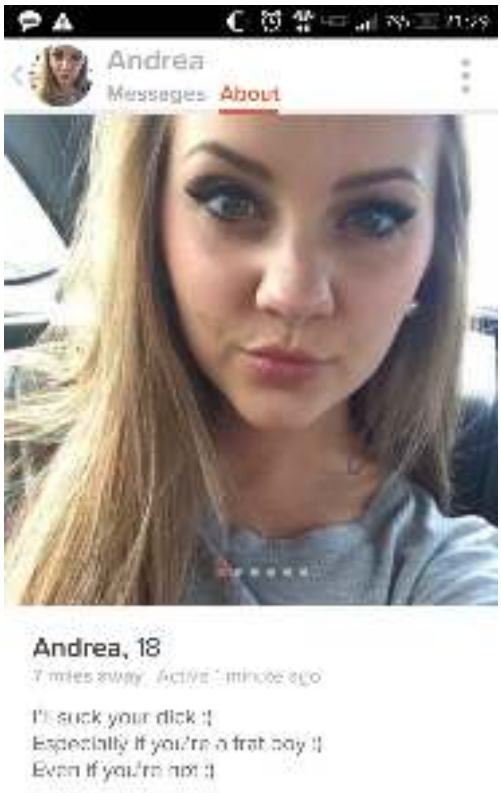
Jack · 29 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Did you ever wonder what women on Tinder really mean?

Readership: Single men currently using Tinder (or a similar social networking app);
Length: 700 words
Reading Time: 2.5 minutes

Introduction

In the beginning, say around 10 years ago, social networking apps were a fun way to meet lots of different people and make casual conversation. In fact, I met my wife on OK Cupid. But in recent years, many social networking apps (e.g. Badoo, Grinder, Tinder) have become nothing more than a rolodex for ONS / hookups / STR's. People who use these apps are looking to get waylaid ASAP. So if you get on one of these apps, you have to be aware of this. Anything you see on a Tinder profile has to be read through this lens.



Such as it is, Christians have no reason to use these apps at all. However, I am guessing that many young Christian men (and women) get on Tinder just to see what's happening there. So in this paragraph, I'm talking to you younger Christian guys. If you're going to do the online dating thing, then you had better know what you're looking at. Otherwise, you're making trouble for yourself. Reread the last half of the first paragraph above. If you're thinking that your motivations are totally innocent, then you had better watch yourself. You need to know your threshold of temptation before you get too far into it. It's too easy to fall into the meat grinder when the opportunity is available at a mere swipe.

The intentions of the slore with the 1,000 C0ck stare are unnervingly obvious, so no translation is necessary. However, most other wimmin have a consistent habit of sugarcoating anything that is unseemly. This is all the more true on social networking apps. A little bit of translation work is necessary to uncover what they really mean.

Dictionary for Girls on Tinder

This abridged dictionary is a gem from bence86 on 9 Gag.*

- “I’m a proud mother.” = “I have no job. I need your salary.”
- “If you can’t accept my children, swipe left.” = “You should love my kids, but I don’t want any of your own.”
- “Perverts, swipe me left.” = “Perverts who are not handsome, swipe me left.”
- “Only dogs play with bones.” = “I’m fat and too lazy to do anything about it.”
- “Nerds/gamers swipe me left.” = “I do not have a hobby. If you have a hobby, I consider it to be a distraction from your potential to earn. You need to have a job so you can pay mine.”
- “Half-naked guys swipe me left.” = “I can show 34 pics of my nails, but you cannot be proud of your bodywork / sport achievements.”
- “Message me, I don’t bite.” = “I’m lonely and bored. Please someone write me!”
- “I’m only here cause of a challenge” = “I will be in a relationship from Tinder within 2 weeks.”
- “I like fooling around.” = “My sense of humor is 0.”
- “I can enjoy parties without drinking.” = “I am on my phone all the time, and I leave the party before 11 am.”
- “Appearance is secondary.” = “I’m ugly. I could not take a single good pic from 33 tries.”
- “Only serious relationship.” Ann (44) = “Half the city f*cked me already.”

I could add a few more to this list.

- “I’m not here for hookups / ONS.” = “I’m here for hookups / ONS, but I decide who and when, so don’t embarrass me by asking. Meantime, while I’m looking at other men’s profiles, your purpose is to entertain me.”
- “I have x (number of children), and I’m happy with this.” = “Don’t ask me to have any (more) kids with you.”
- “No dick pics!” = “I’ve already had the biggest you can’t imagine, so yours won’t excite me.”

Go visit Boxer’s blog for more degenerate offerings. Links below.

If you’re still not sure these translations are accurate. You can go check it out for yourself. But in my opinion, it would be better to take this word at face value and stay off dating apps altogether.

Old hands, feel free to leave other translations below in the comments.

 Edited for clarity.*

Related

- v5k2c2: Tinder Admits What We Have Always Known (2019/3/30)
- v5k2c2: Thirst and Fragility (2019/4/ 7)
- Σ Frame (Lexet): Crunching the Tinder Whoard (2019/9/20)

News Flash: Stupidity, Ugliness, being Liberal, are all Heritable!

Jack · 31 July 2020 · Archived copy · Original

SJW's paint heritability as something ugly, but project they do.

Readership: All
Length: 1,300 words
Reading TIme: 7 minutes

The Cognitive Dissonance of Liberals

About a month ago, there was a discussion about heritability under the post, The Morphing Ethical System in the U.S. (2020/6/26). Let's consider this in detail.

A while back, liberals made a big squawk about how sexual orientation was genetically determined. The argument claimed that sexual orientation and gender orientation are heritable traits, and that these are all admissible as qualifications to jump up (or down, depending on your perspective) the totem pole of intersectional feminism.

Their purpose for backing this argument was to assert that it is impossible to convert or reeducate gays.

But ever since the "gay gene" was debunked, they have been waffling and backtracking. Now, saying anything is heritable is rayciss. Oh, by the way, race is heritable too. So I guess heritability is indeed racist.*

Of particular note, feminists think that certain children can somehow be rainbow trannies needing hormone therapy and "gender reassignment", even though both their parents are totally straight. Of course, the "gay gene" argument won't work in this case. But even so, liberal educators are in on the racket, and even the courts go along with this rubbish. The cognitive dissonance and mental backflips here are more hilarious than a prime-time sitcom. These people obviously don't come from a pedigree of scientists.

Our in house psychologist Scott gets into it a little deeper.

> "…this debate [on heritability] is absolutely batty, in light of the overwhelming evidence that generalized (g) intelligence and its two subtypes (fluid and crystallized) are mostly heritable traits. Intelligence is the most studied construct/trait there is. It is part of a cluster of traits in what most people know as "personality." it is relatively stable over the lifetime and very difficult to dislodge or move in one direction or another within subjects."

> "The culturally neutral tests have done nothing but CONFIRM this stubborn bit of reality. Tests like that are known to be impervious to all sorts of outside influence, (that's why they were developed) like all the usual bogey men: SES, diet, "systemic racism" and even serious brain injury.
>
> Of course, in the context of the current dilemma, the blank slate must be adhered to because it is the version that most closely resembles "anti-racism" — the secular religion in America. If personality traits (like intelligence) are heritable, then gas chambers are surely next. It's crazy.
>
> Bo and Ben Weinguard as well as the guy who runs "A New Radical Centrism" and others are in trouble with the mob. Steve Hsu, and others have already fallen. And those guys are LIBERAL! So is Jonathan Haigt and he is in the crosshairs. It's the wild west and as [Derek] pointed out, this time everyone is about 1 standard deviation below where they were back then."

SJW's eat their own kind! Check out this story at Shadow to Light: More Social Justice Violence (2020/7/29). Two SJW kooks beat up an elderly, gay Democratic Senator! It sux to be liberal!

Scott goes on to list many other things that are highly heritable (besides raw brain power and attractiveness).

- Suicidality
- Motivation
- Suggestibility
- Frustration tolerance
- Openness to novel experiences
- Time horizon/delayed gratification
- Internal vs external locus of control
- "Clannishness" vs out group tolerance
- Propensity towards anxiety or depression
- Propensity toward aggression and aggressive forms of problem solving

- …and many others!

In his post, All Human Behavioral Traits are Heritable (2012/12/31), Jay Man notes that political and religious attitudes are also heritable.

> "…some of these [traits] hang together in factors. These factors tend to hang together in ethnic groups/races."

Noteworthy Omissions

Upon further inspection of the feminist argument, we notice that any mention of race, intelligence, or attractiveness is verboten. Race has been constructed into THE hot button issue, simply because it does so quite nicely, and for no other reason. So don't fall for it. But why not include the last two traits in the stack (intelligence and attractiveness)? Why are these necessarily omitted from their discussion?

For all the talk we hear about equality (e.g. fatty tattooed women claiming to have a place on the cover of Sports Illustrated), we'll never hear SJW's demand that women should treat unattractive men as well as they treat attractive men. Why is no one going on the warpath to defend the rights of geeks to be awkward? Why is there no equal opportunity employment missive for stupid ugly people?

Maybe it's because if there was, then it would become obvious how absurd, unreasonable, and inefficient the demand for equality has become.

For example, equal opportunity is no longer intended to prevent the discrimination of equally qualified minorities or to help disabled veterans with PTSD land a sustenance income. Now, it's intended to give the less qualified purple people eaters a safe haven and to discriminate against the overeducated but duly qualified ethnic majority.

Furthermore, a cursory look at the SMP proves that race, intelligence, and attractiveness are perhaps the most influential factors in choosing a mate. You know, why does everyone prefer to f*ck intelligent, attractive, white people, and swipe left on the fugly dumb@sses? Yet in spite of this natural preference, the lowest common denominators of society multiply like the crackers that belonged to Elijah's widow.

Of course, the real reason these arguments are omitted is because these narratives are not useful towards demolishing the backbone of the traditional Christian culture. And make no mistake, it is Christ Himself who is being targeted. All of this is a manifestation of the dystopian dream of social equality, mind you. It is the anathema of a natural social hierarchy, an evil hearkening back to the Tower of Babel debacle.

Scott concludes,

> "I would like to live in a world where it's ok to notice these things. Also to live in a world where we notice the outliers. And then go have a sandwich.
>
> But here's where it matters.
>
> Know yourself. Know the group you came from. Be willing to dispassionately ask yourself "do any of those stereotypes apply to me? Do I care? Am I unique in some other ways? If I have goal I have set for myself, will it be harder or easier to accomplish because of it?"
>
> Then make your plans. Move out and fail or succeed on your own. But don't pretend like you inherited absolutely nothing from your ancestors."

Scott's advice about introspection is solid. Don't count on gleaning this kind of self-awareness from liberal educators or from watching the nooz.

Conclusions

In sum, SJW's can't wrap their heads around the concept of heritability, and even the scientific community is rolling over in deference. "Post Truth" strikes yet again! The general populace of sheeple are even worse. If CNN had a regular program showcasing the special abilities of autistic individuals and defending their rights to be president, I'm sure 60% of the population would agree after a few years and elect a cretin just to prove their altruistic W0keness.

There's been a long running rule of thumb in the Manosphere, "*Don't f*ck feminists!*" But based on our study of heritability, we could expand this axiom to say, "*Don't f*ck any women who have traits that you wouldn't want more people in the world to have (namely, your children).*"

I expect this topic to boil over and create further schisms. But to a level-headed person, it's all fluffy nonsense and a waste of time, to put it gently. The bottom line here is that all human characteristics are heritable to some degree, both desirable traits and undesirable.

Do your homework. Know yourself. Vet your women. Choose the next generation wisely! And don't forget to teach your children.

 I'm being humorous. This argument is known as* racism.

Related

- Chateau Heartiste: Older Moms And Divorced Moms Raising Generation Of Psychopaths? (2012/12/17)
- Jay Man's Blog: All Human Behavioral Traits are Heritable (2012/12/31)
- Chateau Heartiste: Racist Babies (2017/4/14)
- Chateau Heartiste: Fake It Till You Make It Really Works (2018/5/30)
- v5k2c2 (Derek Ramsey): Beyond Nature vs Nurture (2019/12/16)

 H/T: Deep Strength.*

The best enema of all

Jack · 3 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A wife who refuses anal sex is only marginally better than a wife who refuses sex altogether.

Readership: Men; Married men especially;
Length: 1,800 words
Reading Time: 10 minutes

Intro

Under last month's post, Sanctification and Sexual Compatibility (2020/6/19), there was some discussion about anal sex. I have a mixed opinion about this subject that I'll explain here. I've made it less opprobrious and more enjoyable to read by inserting (in italics) several hilarious euphemisms for Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory.

Why Anal?

Of course, experienced men all know that poking pussy is the most outstanding form of coitus, followed by eager fellatio. But over the past decade, it seems that plundering the exit has become rather "popular". So why is there any interest in fudge packing at all?

First of all, for younger nubes who are rather inexperienced, bum fun is all about playfulness and sexploration. And it is not just randy young men; many young women are quite eager to defile their bodies as much as they can, just for the fun of it all.

Secondly, for those buggers (both male and female) that for some reason have a conscious reservation about raw-dogging it, pee-pee in the poo-poo is the next closest thing to vaginal sex. It simply feels like the male is rooting in her most holy of holes. Thus, mud mashing is the preferred go-to for those men and women who can't control their desire, but are afraid of full intercourse, or have a sensitive conscience about "destroying" pussy.

Stemming from my interactions with single Muslims, I know truffle butter is the indulgence granted to those couples engaged to be married who want to loosen their collars and ream their bowels without having to worry about the embarrassment of an untimely pregnancy.

For those who are already married, I think the fascination with going downtown has to do with the husband's exercise of authority over his wife's body, and her willingness to submit. This is the one point that I'll focus on in the next section about purposes.

Finally, there is the gay thing, which is outside the scope of this essay, but no discussion of putting in the rough is complete without this being mentioned. I once read somewhere that "the male G-spot is up the @ss" (i.e. the prostate gland), and the stimulation thereof is able to inspire the gay gladiolus gardens of feminine feelings, which I assume is similar to the female's Tingles. This is how men get "converted" into rainbow fluffies and develop the craving for flute roops, and also why it's so hard for them to repent of punching prostate. It's also much easier for them to face down with other gay men, than for them to do the hard work of dickering around with the female hamster.

This curiosity of male anatomy is why prostitutes have a trade secret of keeping the nail of one finger trimmed short for the purpose of using that finger to stimulate the male G-spot of a customer who has any difficulties in spilling his load. Or so I've heard.

Noble Purposes for Probing the Poop Chute

In the headline of this post, I wrote, "A wife who refuses anal sex is only marginally better than a wife who refuses sex altogether." Let me explain this further.

Consider for a moment, the level of female submission possible on a spectrum of her interest. On one extreme, a cryogenic wife will go liquid nitrogen at the very suggestion of passionate lovemaking. Somewhere in the middle, there are luke-warm wives (like Cathy), who have the attitude that "vaginal sex is all I'm required to do". Ho hum… On the other extreme is the soaking wet, quivering wife who is so filled with horny desire, she is begging to be f*cked every which way she can, in every hole, all night, every night, and not soon enough!

To ask married men which type of response is most preferable in a wife is wasting your breath.

To ask which response is more likely to characterize and contribute towards marital sanctification also carries a foregone conclusion.

As I mentioned in the first section, the wife's willing submission and cheerful obedience is what makes both the marriage and the sex a delight to both husband and wife! But the Bible goes a step further by requiring the wife to grant the husband full authority over her body.

> "[3] Let the husband render to his wife the affection due her, and likewise also the wife to her husband. [4] The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband *does. And likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does." ~ 1st Corinthians 7:3-4 (NKJV)

Note that the same is true for the husband in the latter part of verse 4.

Now, we know a lot of people would read this passage literally and through a legalistic lens, and so they would naturally come to the conclusion that if your wife wants to dress her husband up in a clown suit before she goes down on him, then 1st Corinthians 7:4 lends Biblical support for that. Going further, a very arrogant wife might argue that if she wants to shove her bumpy purple dildo up her husband's backside, then of course, 1st Corinthians 7:4 means that that should be admissible too.

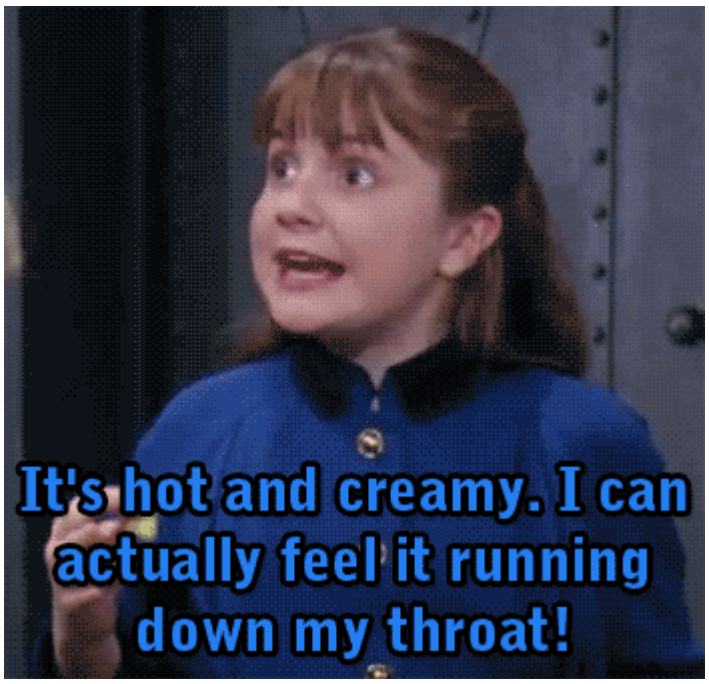
But I need to point out here, that those who want to chase after such futile arguments in a tit-for-tat brinkmanship are devolving into a hard-hearted legalistic approach concerning their views on authority. Moreover, they are missing the whole point of what it means to "have authority over the spouse's body".

St. Paul doesn't go into great detail in this matter, but instead leaves it up to individual married couples to experiment with. But my understanding of the scripture gives the implication that a married person should be pulling out all the stops in learning how to titillate the other person unto ecstasy, and should never be selfishly putting the brakes on their marital passion.

The point here is to get your spouse to lose control over their sexual desire for you, such that they are making love to you on impulse and without prescient contemplation. If a married person has the power to turn the other on to such a degree that he/she has lost their mind, and dives into the act of intercourse without any thought, hesitancy, or reservation, then that person might be able to truthfully claim that he/she has authority over the other's body.

If a wife has a very low libido, then the husband will find this undertaking to be quite a challenge. But seldom does a husband have a low libido. Men are usually up for some action at a moments notice. So there is no reason why a wife should have any trouble ramping up her husband's desire. But instead of wives wondering how they could make their husbands more excited, and working her body on his body towards that end, we often hear of wives who do what they can to dampen her husband's desire. This is just wrong.

If she is putting hard left and right limits on what she is "required" to do in the bedroom, then she is clinging to a legalistic mindset, she is lacking a spirit of submission, and she is creating anxiety and self-consciousness surrounding sexual intercourse. Obviously, she is not intoxicated with the ecstasy of love in her discoverie of marital consummation.



Instead, a worthy wife should allow her husband to be delighted in her body. This is rather easy to do, because men are visually stimulated. Really, the wife has it so easy when it comes to pleasing her husband. If she can look him in the eyes, and show a little enthusiasm for his excitement, then the man is invariably satisfied. But many wives cannot even do this much. Excuses abound.

Going further, if a wife has a submissive heart and is really into her husband, she's not going to care a whit about which hole gets penetrated. She is simply overjoyed that he is getting off on her. To a woman who is totally obsessed with her man, there's no difference between playing sit-and-spin with the fireman and flying a kite!

I also know from experience that when the pounding gets heated and heavy, it's easy to inadvertently stab one too low and thereby give her a pleasant surprise. It's also a humbling experience for her, which is a good thing for the sanctity of the union.

Although I will readily agree that spitting into the wind is frivolous and distasteful, the exercise of authority over the wife's body (as I've described above) is very important for sanctification to occur. If this absolutely must include tossing in the cornhole, then he'd better get to it, and get it done.

Also consider how many women play backgammon in their younger years, presumably to avoid pregnancy, or to "live in the moment". Then later in life, they enter into marriage with the mind that bunghole bungling is somehow dishonorable or "beneath her". As a result, she refuses to allow her husband to shoot the moon. Verily, that husband will be vexed to the quick until he can knock a few shots of Bailey's squarely up her bum. And to men who are in this situation, I would say it's a prerogative to "own your wife" in every way, mouth, tits, glory hole, and @ss! She shall be your wife because you humbled her! And humbled her more than the last dude.

Concluding Statements

Really, if your wife isn't saying (in her heart), *"Ohh, my succulent c0ck draped lord and master! F*ck me up to heaven any which way you want! Do me NOW!"*, then there's something missing. You're not experiencing marriage at its finest. If she wants to nitpick about this position or that hole, then she's broken in some way. If the husband has qualms about this position or that hole, then he's not experiencing a mind-numbing desire for his wife.

In all these words, I'm not arguing that being an admiral for the Royal Mounties is holy by any means, nor that it is right, nor even necessary. I am rather indifferent about the matter. I just want to point out that married individuals who are particularly persnickety about the peeping turtle have shunted their natural passions and affections with pride, legalism, guilt, or shame, and are living in the vanity of their minds.

In sum, get out of your heads and start living! Picking out the gnat (boofing) and swallowing the camel (marrying) is probably not going to make your marriage any better. Instead, cultivate a heart-felt desire for your spouse. If you have enough desire to poke her pooper, and she has enough desire to take a backwash up the drain, then surely you're living on the ugly edge of life, but sanctification is sure to happen.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Mosh Pit of Sex Analysists (2019/3/24)
- Biblical Sexology: The Biblical Case Against Anal Sex (2020/10/1)

How other cultures deal with adultery

Jack · 5 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Corporal punishment purges the community from sin and produces righteousness.

Readership: All;

Introduction

In a previous post, Is there any honor or benefit to slut shaming an adulterous wife? (2018-11-24), I reached the conclusion that s1ut shaming, done as a form of behavioral correction, is only effective when it is condoned and reinforced by the wider community.

Not surprisingly, this community cooperation is exactly what we see in foreign cultures that still condemn sexual promiscuity. But that's not all! Corporal punishment is duly employed to drive the lesson home, deep into the conscience of the offender.

Case Study: African workers in Saudi Arabia

As a case study, we'll focus on an event reported at Fotonz Grid Entertainment: Ghanaian lady given 100 strokes of the cane after being caught sleeping with a Sudanese man in Saudi Arabia (2020 July 31).

The first video shows the moment the woman is caught naked and in bed with the man. We can assume with fair certainty that they are not properly married. In this scene, both the woman and her paramour are verbally chastised, b!tch-smacked around, and struck with various items, such as a leather belt.

View this post on Instagram

A post shared by Ghpage TV (@ghpage_tv)

Ouch! … and worse, the shame of it all! Their guilt is palpable!

In the second video, we see the woman being spanked with a small cane while surrounded by those we can only assume to be the elders of the community.

https://www.instagram.com/tv/CDSNwNznyFV/?utm_source=ig_embed

Here, we can actually see how caning encourages her repentance. At the 1:00 minute mark, she starts to break down emotionally, indicating that she is beginning to experience a spiritually healthy, visceral sense of guilt and shame. At the 2:00 minute mark, her fleshly nature shows, causing her to throw a tantrum like a child. She can't inhibit her self-defense responses, resulting in her hands being painfully struck by the cane. It is this same self-preserving self-interest of the fleshly nature that needs to be exposed in order for her to become more self-aware and adopt a sense of responsibility for herself.

Discussion

For those who believe caning, (or corporal punishment in general) is extreme, remember that the Old Testament (Leviticus 20:10) called for both the adulterous woman and her male partner to be stoned to death. By comparison, caning is quite merciful.

I need to point out that this is not at all like marital discipline which I have written extensively about before. Marital discipline is about a husband moulding and training his wife in love, to be holy and joyful. The purpose of marital discipline is mainly for sanctification. Caning (or stoning, etc.) an adulteress is about exposing and removing sin from both the perpetrator and the community before it grows and destroys the community. It would be ideal if the punishment (1) caused the adulteress to feel guilty (i.e. take responsibility for her wrongdoing), and (2) led to her repentance. If she truly repents, then she will lose her desire for illicit sex and become marriage minded. In effect, the punishment produces righteousness, which is exactly what the Bible says.

> "Now no chastening seems to be joyful for the present, but painful; nevertheless, afterward it yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who have been trained by it." ~ Hebrews 12:11 (NKJV)

I might guess that the main reason why we have such an abundance of promiscuous women in Western nations today is because parents have neglected to employ corporal punishment during their upbringing. Without that tough loving discipline, righteousness is simply not attainable.

> "Train up a child in the way he should go; even when he is old he will not depart from it." ~ Proverbs 22:6 (ESV)

Of course, even if parents go to the effort to lovingly administer corporal punishment to their children, the results remain tenuous as long as the practice of corporal punishment is shunned by the larger community. The operant conditioning is only effective when the subject has no other alternative but to submit to the discipline.

Related

- Σ Frame: 13 Disciplines in Dealing with Delectable Daughters (2018 January 29)

- Σ Frame: Teaching our daughters well is the early foundation of successful wife moulding (2020 February 14)

Revisiting Misogyny

Jack · 7 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A deconstruction of what is purported to be misogyny.

Readership: Men;

Foreword

The recent news among conservatives is that Google has tweaked their search engine to shunt any web traffic to most conservative web sites.

Just to check my own status on this issue, I did a search for "sigma frame" on Google, and I was relieved to find a link to this blog on top. Apparently, I am not offensive enough to receive special treatment by TPTB. Point taken. I'll have to work on that.

Still curious, I did another search for "manosphere". Of course, Wikipedia came up on the first page, but do you think any sites like Roosh V, The Rational Male, or Dalrock followed after? Sites that would best represent the most popular sources of Manosphere literature?

Snowflakes in ɦəll!

You guessed right! If this omission were not lugubrious enough, 100% of the search results turned up liberal op-eds condemning anything even remotely related to men's rights. In fact, I found that nearly 90% of all the results contained some form of the word "misogyny".

Because of the apparent ubiquitous connotation of men's rights with misogyny, I feel I have to set the record straight. Hence, this post.

Introduction

Over the past few years, many weak-minded, NPCish media consumers have gained the false notion that traditional nationalism and antifeminism (e.g. the Manosphere, masculinity, SAHM's) are misogynistic.

No doubt, the TPTB have instilled this mistaken impression by presenting a false association between these ideas and planting a root of doubt using classical conditioning and raw repetition.

The purpose of drawing this association is to assert a false moral authority over non-liberal value systems (e.g. Christianity; gender roles; the traditional family structure), to calumniate them as being detrimentally archaic or depraved, and to leverage the ostracization of their practitioners on various levels of society through the machinations of the liberally ordered shame culture.

On this point, Farm Boy writes,

> "Apparently huge swaths of people are misogynists these days. At least that is what we are told. A misogynist is someone who hates women. This would not be a good thing. How did this group of people come to be? Some other people decided to label them as such. Why was this? This is a good question."

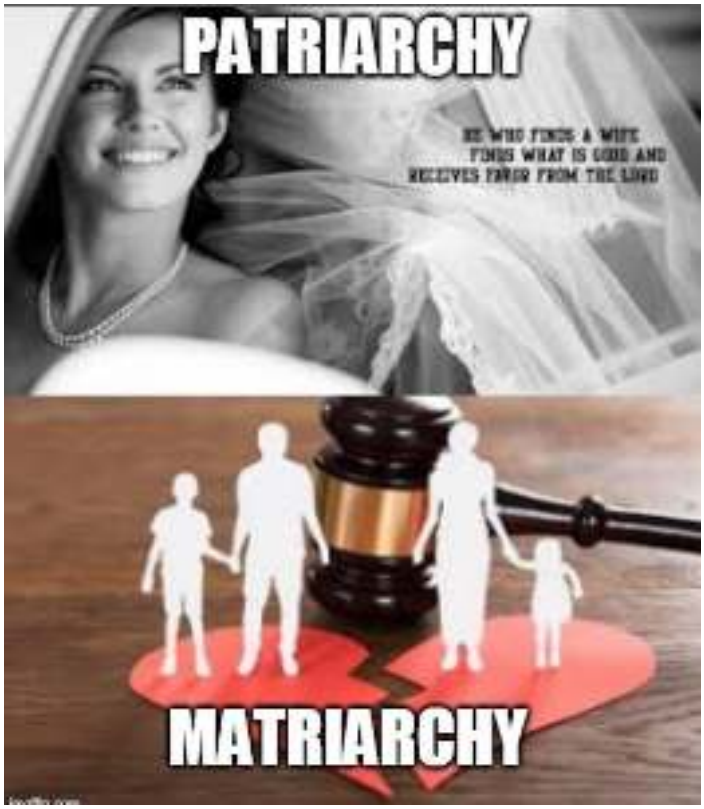
Farm Boy concludes,

> "If you criticize women individually or as a group for any reason, you are a misogynist."

That's true, but not totally correct. Within the neo-liberal order, not even criticism is necessary to be a misogynist. One could be guilty of "bad think", and still be stuck with the label. All that is necessary for one to be regarded as a misogynist is for one to regard women truthfully and honestly.

You see, it is the truth which is offensive to the easily offended, not merely criticism. Taking the proverbial Red Pill is all about knowing that truth and accepting it as such.

There are two subsets of truth that are especially hated by the disobedient lie-mongers of the world. In simplistic terms, we could call these subsets (1) the good nature of women, and (2) the bad nature of women. The adherence to either one or both of these truths is castigated as misogynistic.



Let's briefly review the good and bad natures of women.

The Good Nature of Women

Women at their best are beautiful, vulnerable, fertile, respectful, conscientious, humble, demur, soft-hearted, nurturing, and caring. They love to have sex with their husbands, and they can offer encouragement and insight to him as well.

One of the most popular posts of all time on Frame itemizes 16 Qualities of an Irresistible Woman (2017 December 1). A brief summary is listed here.

1. She is emotionally and socially astute.
2. She likes and understands men.
3. She provides beautiful physical aesthetics.
4. She offers intellectual sophistication.
5. She blends in.
6. She is passionate.
7. She is generous in her estimations of the motives of others.
8. She is responsive.
9. She is fun and playful.
10. She is emotionally buoyant.
11. She is grateful.
12. She is affectionate.
13. She is ready and willing to listen and learn.
14. She is submissive.
15. She is trusting.
16. She adds to the joy of life.

Although women were created by God to fulfill all of the above, feminism has denigrated these representations of femininity as being foolish and weak, thus displaying the most crude misogyny towards the glorified feminine archetype.

The Bad Nature of Women

After having been shrouded by feminism over the past 40 years, the bad nature of women has only been recently rediscovered by the Manosphere. This includes the harrowing, inconvenient truth about the fleshly inclinations of women — lacking moral agency, hypergamic, solipsistic, branch swingers, reveling in defilement, carousel riding… Later in life they discover cuckoldry, abortion, domestic violence, the Duluth scheme, and frivorce — and I'm only just scratching the surface.

Furthermore, women are prone to "go off" suddenly, indignantly lying, gaslighting, and projecting their deeper nature, even after the facts are known, and without an ounce of guilt.

Women won't talk about these things openly, because it would be too shameful, even profane, and it would show their hand. Thus, they must live and operate in secrecy to keep a veneer of dignity, all in order to receive the respect, generosity and other benefits that come naturally from the ignorantly idealistic, altruistic nature of men who imagine those women to be everything they want or need them to be. Women already know these things about themselves, and that's why they don't like each other.

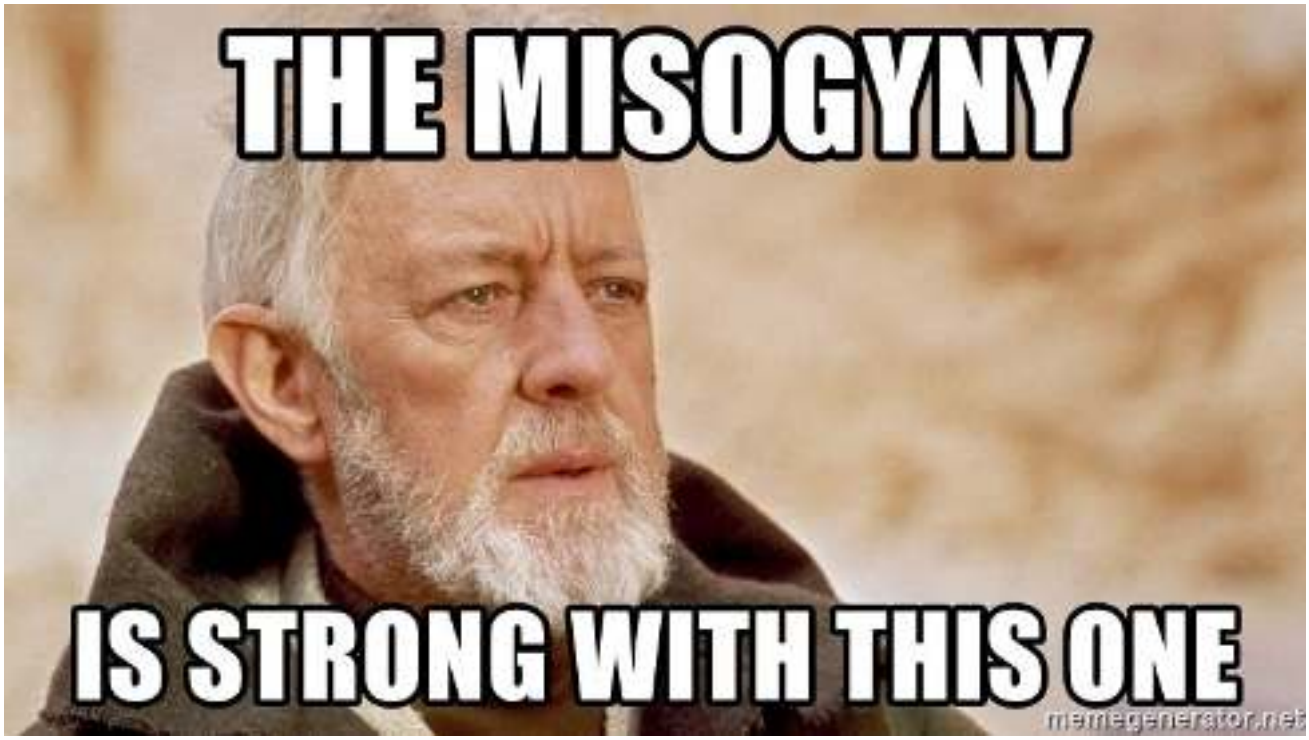
If all goes well (from their point of view), men will never know the truth and can therefore be more easily controlled and manipulated.

Interestingly, all of these traits are aggravated or encouraged by those who brandish the "misogynist" rhetoric, even though they deny it. By doing so, they bring about the real world manifestation of the worst feminine nature that is possible — another repugnant embodiment of misogyny. To add insult to injury, all these traits are proudly owned with an inconsiderate, self-righteous sense of entitlement.



Where do the accusations of misogyny come from?

If a man speaks openly and honestly about the good nature of women, he is invariably shamed and condemned as being insecure, controlling, domineering, and "patriarchal", (as if that were a bad thing). What is not so obvious is that those who cast such accusations are exhibiting psychological projection.

If a man speaks openly and honestly about the bad nature of women, it sends the message that the wimminz code of secrecy has been compromised, and that the mendacious, Machiavellian dyke is about to collapse. This sends shockwaves of insecurity and shame coursing through her being.

Since women are emotional creatures, their first reaction is not to question whether these things are actually true as a man would, because they already know they are true. But instead, their reaction is one of defense, feeling angry and vindictive because their secure position of secrecy has been breached, and the veil supporting their false sense of identity is revealed to be a lie.

Because of this sudden discoverie of vulnerability and shame, a dramatic outpouring of gaslighting, psychological projection, and accusations spill forth. Hence, we hear the indignant cries of "Misogynist!" emanating from their deceptive tongues.

The obvious example outlined by Farm Boy is how wimmin resort to name calling whenever they are exposed. "Misogynist!" they cry. This is a first rate, immature, adolescent response, which is definitely not lady like, nor does it glorify God.

Psychological Displacement

Psychological displacement, also known as Reaction Formation, is an unconscious defense mechanism whereby the mind substitutes either a new aim or a new object for goals felt in their original form to be dangerous or unacceptable. For the present discussion, the feminist concept of misogyny (including "toxic masculinity" and blaming men) is the new object which displaces the truth about women.

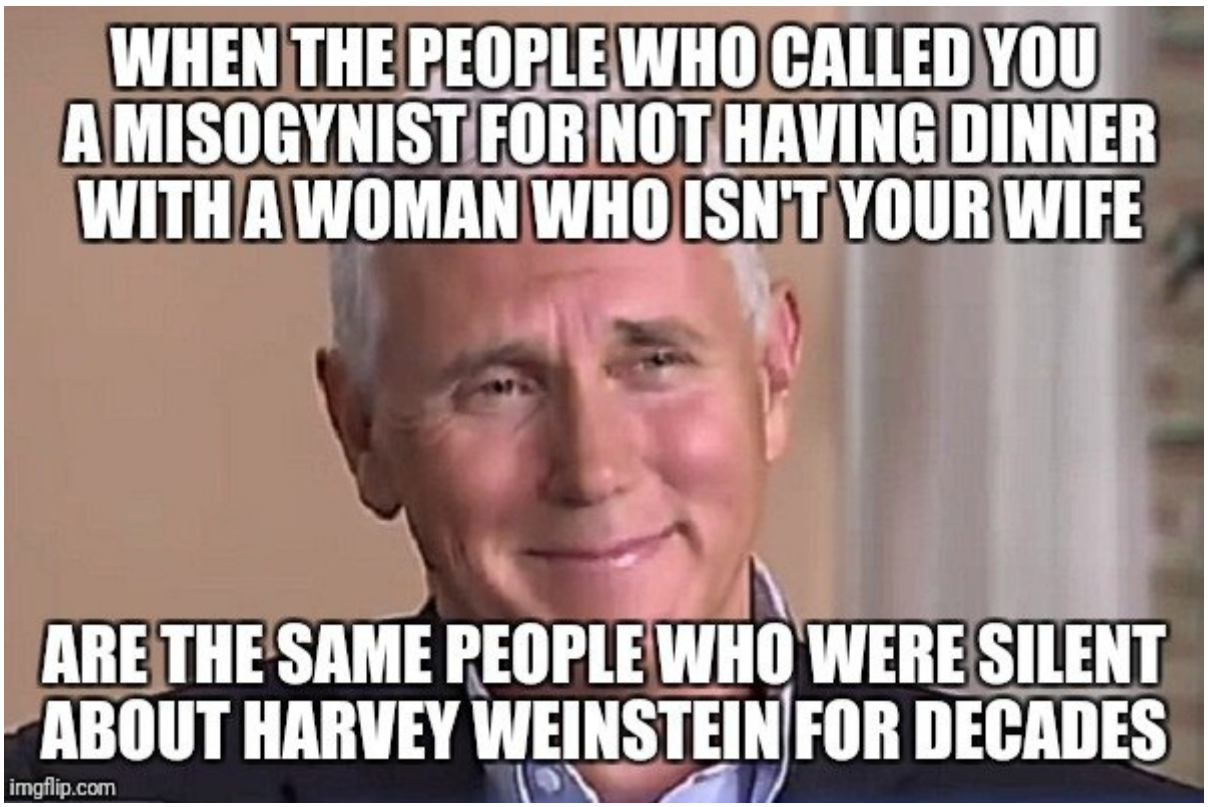
The term misogynist is a generic misnomer because men do not actually hate women. In fact, men love women, and they continue to love them in spite of their treacherous schemes. It is not even the ugly truths about women's nature which Red Pilled men find reprehensibly repugnant. The things men hate most are all the lies, defiance, defense mechanisms, and deception that women resort to in their efforts to maintain the feminine imperative and to paper over the ugly truths about themselves.

Little do women realize how forgiving, graceful, and generous men can be towards an honest, authentic woman. This blindness arises because women project the bad aspects of their own nature onto men, thereby assuming men to be as cunning and vindictive as they are, among all the other vices.

If women would be kindhearted, honest with themselves, and would humble themselves in submission, then men would know how to respond appropriately, and all would be well. Even ignorant, Blue Pilled, nice guys might capitalize on the situation and learn to be better men.

But would the majority of women be so nice, honest, and reasonable? Would they ever embrace the better part of their nature? No! That would be reminiscent of the behavior of a true princess who is deserving of honor and respect. It would also glorify God, and that is one thing that they automatically refuse to do.

Why not be honest? Well obviously, it's because they prefer the pretty lies over the truth. It's the rebellion of Eve — seeking control over reality in general, and over men specifically.



Redefining Misogyny

An alternate, and perhaps a more accurate concept of true misogyny is when women are assumed to be something that they are not (specifically, that women have a masculine nature), and are misappropriated and abused for ulterior purposes than what their creator intended. This concept of misogyny assumes that women have traits, strengths, abilities, and responsibilities which in fact they do not have, shames them for not having such traits, and pressures them to adopt such traits. Then it holds them responsible for tasks they are incapable of performing, and punishes them accordingly. This expectation places an undue amount of stress and anxiety on women, thereby transforming them into aggressive harridans over time.

This misogyny includes a fair amount of brainwashing. Women are conditioned to believe that the nature of women should be like the good nature of men — strong, resilient, independent, autonomous, educated, responsible decision makers. Women are also conditioned to believe that the nature of men is like the bad nature of women — self-centered, solipsistic, insecure, manipulative, greedy consumers, posing as helpless lambs. Interestingly, many Chads are this way, and since non-Chads are invisible to wimmin, this only serves to reinforce their negative impression of toxic masculinity. This false representation of men serves to reinforce women's motivations to become more independent, more masculine, less feminine, less submissive, and more ugly.

Following this modus operandi, we can see how modern feminism is the most misogynistic social machine in all of human history. It undermines women's natural source of support and security — men, and demands that women become what they are missing — all the things which are traditionally assumed of men. This fully explains why more women are clinically depressed and unhappy now than ever before.

Concluding Statements

If you think about it, the true nature of misogyny is not at all what we are led to believe. It's true that women suffer from misogyny, but not by fault of the common man. The misogyny comes through the feminist life script that is touted at every turn.

Misogyny is a self-reinforcing cycle. Women who conscientiously pursue the development of masculine traits invariably invite more misogyny onto themselves, especially because they use an aggressive masculine front to defend the lies and deceptions they have bought into via herd conformity.

Those harridans who shriek "Misogynist!" shall never receive the honor, dignity, and social benefits that are reserved for, and properly bequeathed to those few mature women who display authentic feminine traits. They have defiled themselves with their own words and actions.

So there is a diatribe of misogyny for you. Feminists can say all of this talk is misogynistic, but I'm just telling the truth.

Related

- Chateau Heartiste: Misogynist, Sexist SJWs Bullycide A Sexually Empowered Young Woman (2017 December 6)
- Chateau Heartiste: Supreme Gentlemen Are The Real Misogynists (2018 March 22)
- Σ Frame: The Ten Commandments of Feminism (2018 June 5)
- Chateau Heartiste: The Biggest Misogynists Are Other Women (2018 June 17)
- Dalrock: Warhorn interview: Does work like yours attract misogynists? (2019 February 18)

White Brats Matter

Jack · 10 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Snowflake Karens work the streets to defend their overgrown kids' tantrums.

Readership: All;

Liberal leaning Anglo-American society has always had a hankering for defending individual rights, law, and order, which as of late, has broken all limits in destroying the very same law and order that has been the backbone of English speaking cultures for almost a millennium.

When a black porn star died from illegal drug related health issues while resisting arrest for burglary, this was enough to spark the ire of the descendants of Irish immigrants to America, thereby instigating a trendy pet peeve over the last two months which has manifested in Socialist riots in Portland Oregon and across the Irish diaspora.

Interestingly, these riots were not instigated by black porn stars fighting for the right to take fentanyl and methamphetamine while burgling the neighborhood. No, the riots were predominantly staged by bored, rebellious, middle-class white youths looking to fill their plebian lives with meaning. Apparently, they objected to the harassment of their hero of rebellious opprobrium — a black porn star and drug addict.

Honestly, why the ɦəll would whiggers take up a social cause for another race, whom they cannot speak for, nor even properly understand?

Let's translate a couple nooz reports on the event.

U.S. News & World Report: Mothers Across U.S. Stand up to Federal Agents at Anti-Racism Protests (2020 July 22)

> "PORTLAND (Reuters) – Wearing bike helmets and yellow T-shirts, America's mothers are confronting federal agents in combat gear to protect anti-racism protesters in Portland and, soon, other U.S. cities where President Donald Trump has vowed to crack down."

The identity of being a protester's protector is more powerful and motivating than the originally purported issue of racism. It's not surprising, since racism is actually a non-issue in melting pot America. Most Americans respect their neighbors of other races, although they may not understand them very well.

> "Wall of Moms groups have formed in at least six cities including New York and Chicago in the four days since mainly white suburban moms in Portland started making human walls in front of demonstrators."

Not content to be homemakers, the Karens of America have joined together to make their harridan voices heard beyond the Wall. Just wait a minute. The popcorn is almost ready.

> "Carrying signs like "Feds stay clear. Moms are here," and "I'm so disappointed in you – mom", the Oregon women have been shoved and tear-gassed by agents. Some dads have joined too, bringing leaf blowers to blow away tear gas."

Activism is the new form of community service. Social recognition and respect is based on virtue signaling, in this case, goosestep marching with umbrellas, and how loud one can shout.

> "In Portland, Barnum and other organizers are trying to ensure their fame does not eclipse the anti-racism, anti-police brutality messages of protesters they are defending. Barnum, who is Mexican American, coordinates with local Black protest leaders to support the wider movement."

Hilariousness! The movement eclipses the purpose! It's all about getting attention and affirmation. Views rule the roost. Mom! Look at me! I'm on TV!

> "Still, some activists such as E. Gomez have broken away from the moms, frustrated by what she calls "boomer-aged white women and men" who do not listen to concerns that they are drowning out the voices of people of color."

Hey Karen! Don't steal our show!

> "It's quickly turning into a #wallofkarens. It's feeling like a lot of optics and photo ops to make these white women feel better about themselves," said Gomez, using a pejorative term to describe entitled, middle-aged white women."

Nothing to do after passing the Wall but to form another wall in solidarity. Not to be outdone, moms have taken to the streets to defend their overgrown kids during their tantrums about imagined injustice. As if they have nothing else to be proud of.

The Washington Post (Marissa J. Lang): 'What choice do we have?': Portland's 'Wall of Moms' faces off with federal officers at tense protests (2020 July 22)

> "When you're a mom you have this primal urge to protect kids, and not just your kids, all kids," said Wall of Moms organizer Jennie Vinson, 43. "To see a grown man reaching out and calling for his mother — I think that was a transformational moment for so many of us. It's like: What choice do we have but to do this?"

Here's another choice. Spank those brats. Make it clear that they got what they deserved when they were pepper sprayed. Tell them to stay off the streets and out of trouble. Stop vandalizing and disturbing the peace. Stop being an embarrassment to the family. Suspend their allowances until they get a job. Take away the car keys and ground them for a month.

> "When you have the privilege that we have as white women, you have to use it for good, and I hope that that's what this is," said Vinson, who is white. "I think it's really, really important that we gain the trust of the black community here*, and that's going to take some work, because* we haven't always been dependable. We have an obligation to be humble*, to listen and center black voices.*"

"…it's really, really important that we gain the trust of the black community…" "…we haven't always been dependable. We have an obligation to be humble…" LMAO!!! <<<Choking on popcorn.>>> Obviously they aren't/haven't. Is this virtue posturing, or white altruism? Either way, it registers absolutely ZERO with blacks. Get a clue!

> "Though the Wall of Moms has become an overnight Internet sensation, the group has also attracted skepticism. Some scholars and racial justice activists have criticized the group and the attention it has attracted for centering the voices of mostly white mothers."

The Black Lives Matter antagonists (who are not the same people as the clueless activists) are angry because Karens are saying that White Brats Matter too. Uncle Sore-Os can't argue with Karen.

The Reframe

The way I see this whole situation is like this.

Smith and Johnson are good neighbors. One day, a bad neighbor, Jones, dumped his trash in Johnson's yard, and told Johnson that Smith did it. Of course, Smith denied it. Jones calls Smith a liar. Johnson gets confused and becomes angry with both Smith and Jones.

Rinse and repeat ad nauseum.

Eventually, no one can trust their neighbors, the neighborhood goes bad, and everyone is dumping their trash in everyone else's yard, just because they can. The neighborhood becomes a ghetto.

Smith's son wises up to the situation and gets into a fight with Jones' son. But Jones' son is innocent. Mrs. Smith thinks Jones' son attacked her son, and she gets into a fight with Jones' son. Mrs. Smith becomes an internet sensation. Jones' son gives up and leaves town. Mrs. Smith tells her husband that their son got beat up by Jones' son. Smith blames Johnson for the whole mess, and they fight until they burn the ghetto down. Johnson's son has had a bellyful. He says "F*ck this $ħ!t!" and he leaves town too. Jones sits on the porch, watches all the fighting, looting, and vandalism, and laughs with satisfaction.

Smith eventually gets fed up and moves away. With Smith gone, Johnson eventually realizes that Jones is the bad guy, and guns him down. Johnson goes to jail. Jones survives, buys up Smith's and Johnson's property at bottom dollar, hoes out their daughters to raise money, and transforms the ghetto into Disneyland. Jones charges Smith and Johnson's family admission to Disneyland. Mrs. Smith convinces Smith to get a job at Disneyland in order to get the reduced ticket price benefits. Eventually, Johnson gets out of jail and gets a minimum wage job sweeping the yellow brick road at Disneyland.

Now coworkers, Smith and Johnson become friends again, but not really. Jones, who started all the trouble, never gets into a fight, never goes to jail, and gets rich off of the others' labor and losses. Smith and Johnson continue working for Jones and are nary the wiser.

Related

- The Truthers Journal: The Hegelian Dialectic – Problem Reaction Solution (2020 January 10)
- Matthew E. Cochran: Racism, Anti-Racism, and Sin (2020 June 23)
- Matthew E. Cochran: Rabid Minds (2020 August 6)
- Foundation for Economic Education (Antony Davies and James R. Harrigan): Why the Rule of Law Is Vanishing in the Age of COVID-19 (2020 August 6)

How to Transform Your Image

Jack · 12 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Hitting the gym, losing weight, and becoming physically fit is good, but it's not enough!

Readership: All
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 9 minutes

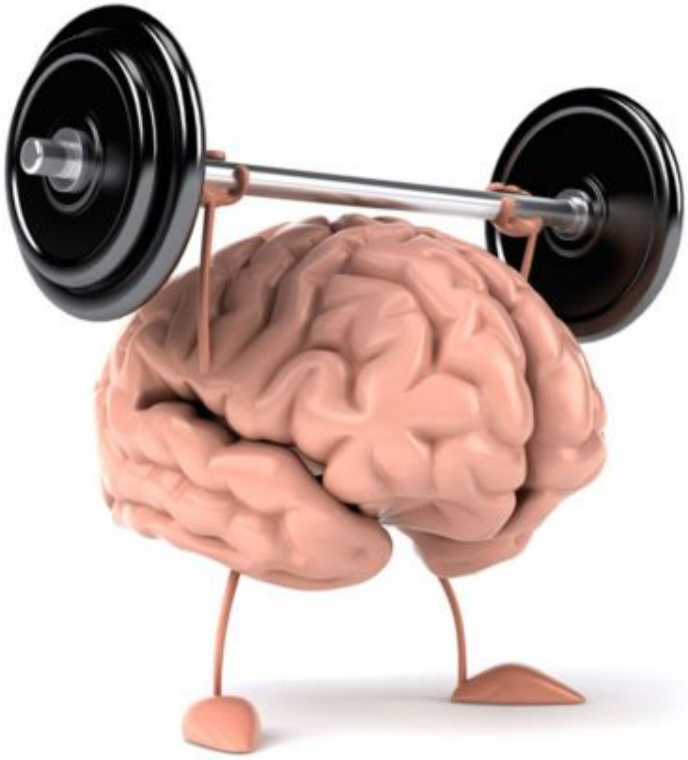
Transformations

In a recent post, Help A Brother Out (2020/8/9), fellow blogger Kentucky Headhunter asked how a young man can transform himself into a demi-stud within a short time span (~5 months).

He posted the above photo and wrote,

> "So, if this girl really went from looking like the before pic to the after pic in 5 months, I'm willing to give her a big shout out. That is an amazing transformation even if you take out the fake tan and the hair bleaching. She went from a 3/4 to 7+ in 20 weeks? You go girl! Easily an 8 for me without the tat…
>
> So, why am I asking for help? I've been trying to think of a way a young man could transform himself to the same extent in 20 weeks and frankly I'm drawing a blank. I mean yeah, a guy could clean up his diet and hit the gym and he'd look a lot better, but men have to be so much more than just their looks, whereas women's value is 90% beauty. This young woman more than doubled her value to men in 20 weeks!"

I left a comment there which showed up twice for some reason. But it contained a very important message that men and women need to hear, so I'm dedicating this blog post to expound on it.



How to Transform Your Image

Kentucky Headhunter says a man could "look a lot better" by cleaning up his diet and hitting the gym. Maybe so, but this is not enough. For men and women to change their appearance like the girl in the photo above, there are (at least) two things that need to change.

1. Women need to get their body fat down below 20%. For men, it's 15%. Deep Strength posted a noteworthy review of this same topic, and its effects on attractiveness. Christianity and Masculinity: Women's Attraction to Men's Musculature (2020/7/14)
2. Women and men need to develop authentic self-discipline, which is necessary to reach the goal of reducing body fat. But for men, self-discipline is also necessary to achieve other important life goals, like establishing a reputation and a career, earning money, developing character, and maintaining Frame. As a bonus, most all of these accomplishments are considered attractive to women.

To achieve this kind of body image and the inherent character transformation that leads to glorification, there is one discipline that trumps all others, and so it is the one thing you must master.

You have to be doing some hard fasting for several months.

1. The only way to reduce body fat down into the 15-20% range is through fasting.
2. Fasting not only requires the specific focus of willpower necessary to change the body, but it also has an impact on the mind, emotional energy, and spiritual aura.

In a previous post on Σ Frame: Fasting (2010/3/4), I gave a description of the effects of fasting on the body, mind, and spirit. I will summarize the relevant aspects of this post as follows.

Fasting is basically the spiritual crucifixion of the flesh. You have to discipline your body to sustain hunger pangs and still force yourself to continue to perform. You make it do what you want it to do, and not what it feeelz like doing — and you have to make a habit of this!

This is Biblical. The Apostle Paul wrote,

> But [like a boxer] I strictly discipline my body and make it my slave, so that, after I have preached [the gospel] to others, I myself will not somehow be disqualified [as unfit for service].
>
> 1st Corinthians 9:27 (AMP)

But discipline is sometimes not enough. Jesus testified of the power of prayer and fasting towards the transformation of ones spiritual constitution.

> "[17] Then Jesus answered and said, "O faithless and perverse generation, how long shall I be with you? How long shall I bear with you? Bring him here to Me." [18] And Jesus rebuked the demon, and it came out of him; and the child was cured from that very hour.
> [19] Then the disciples came to Jesus privately and said, "Why could we not cast it out?"
> [20] So Jesus said to them, "Because of your unbelief; for assuredly, I say to you, if you have faith as a mustard seed, you will say to this mountain, 'Move from here to there,' and it will move; and nothing will be impossible for you. [21] However, this kind does not go out except by prayer and fasting."

> Matthew 17:17-21; Mark 9:14-29 (NKJV)

You see, simply losing weight and developing discipline are childs' play. If you can't do it, or won't do it, then there is a spiritual force — a demon or a curse — holding you back from achieving your full potential in life. If you find it to be extremely challenging to get your life up and running, then fasting is absolutely necessary. It is the only right way to approach this.

But as we will see in the next section, some people absolutely refuse to shoo away their demons by putting their fork down.

Fasting — An Inconvenient Truth

Most people can't or won't fast for many reasons, so it's rare to see someone who can achieve this. In fact, a lot of people will do anything but fast!

Let me tell you. I've worked with guys who went to the gym, who were lifting insane gravitational forces of iron, who were jogging and playing basketball for two hours a day, and they were doing this consistently every day. They could bulk up and develop muscle tone, but they could never lose that stubborn visceral fat and shine like an angel.

I could see why not. As soon as they got back from their exercise routine, they would rush to the cafeteria whining, "Awww… I jogged 6 kilometers! (etc.) I'm sooo hungry!", and then proceed to gobble down two heaping plates full of a high-calorie carb-fest.

I wouldn't join them for their fitness routines. I only lifted small weights with high reps at home once or twice a week, and I was slim and trim. They hated me for that. When they asked me how I did it, I told them they have to fast. I explained that fasting means that you eat fewer calories than your daily base metabolism. They still didn't get it. So I told them to eliminate all sugar and carbs, and eat only one regular sized meal a day for 40 days. Then they got it. "You mean… you don't eat?!?!?" They got so p!ssed off they wouldn't talk to me for two weeks. I got p!ssed off too, I mean, I'm telling them how to do it, and they hate me for it because it's the one thing they'll never do.

I've known a lot of women too, who were all pumped up about the thought of losing weight and then being able to strut around in sexy clothes and parade their bikini-clad bodies at the beach. They came to me asking how I maintained my figure, and I told them the same thing. I gave them worksheets to calculate diet intake and daily metabolism, and they were all for it. But they didn't really understand what fasting was. As soon as I described it enough for them to know what it really required of them, they immediately slam dunked those worksheets in the waste can and said, "Forget it! I'm not doing that!" One woman actually said, "I'd rather be fat and single."

This is the one truth that you never hear anyone talk about in the fitness industry, because everyone hates this truth so much. Not even preachers are willing to touch it with a ten foot pole.

The bottom line is this, if you want to lose weight, if you want to see real change in your life, if you want to see results, if you want others to notice, if you want to dispel your demons of dysfunctionality and defeat, if you want real power over your life, then you need to fast!

My Own Example

Here's how I did it. It took me 13 months to lose 20 kg. (44 pounds). I don't lose weight easily.

Σ Frame: Less Weight, Better Health (2013/1/3)

I didn't mention this in the post, but when I got down below 22% body fat, the IOI's changed from a trickle to a torrent.

The real struggles included the following.

- Maintaining the discipline consistently throughout the change.
- Not succumbing to the urge to break the fast and binge eat, especially in the first couple months.
- Dealing with the envy of other men who wanted to be like me.
- Handling the jealousy of women who got the notion that they owned me.
- Not giving in to the distractions and temptations offered by women.

Remember, fasting is a spiritual warfare in which you are conquering your own demons!

Concluding Statements

I challenge the reader to fast for 40 days, and see for yourself how it has a significant impact on your social, emotional, and spiritual life. It will bring you closer to God — guaranteed! It will also take you closer to your life goals, or if not, it will cause you to change your life goals to something more realistic and achievable. Concomitant prayer helps immensely.

The good thing is that you get used to it after the initial 40 days, and once you pass this threshold, it's pretty easy to maintain. After several months of regular fasting, a plate of fatty, high-calorie food will actually appear like a detestable pile of lard — which is exactly what it will become if you stuff that $ћ!t into your body.

Verily I saith unto thee, thou shouldst fast with all diligence!

Related

- Σ Frame: Fasting (2010/3/4)
- Σ Frame: Neuroscientist Explains What Fasting Does to Your Brain (2015/12/11)
  - Daily Monitor: 7 Examples of fasting in the Bible (2017/3/6)
- Σ Frame: How to Transform Your Image (2020/8/12)
- Σ Frame: Obesity lowers Testosterone (2023/8/16)

Why is premarital sex a sin?

Jack · 14 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The sexual use of our bodies must honor and glorify God, and this cannot happen outside marriage. Read on to learn why.

Readership: Men; Women; Parents of adolescents; Singles; Christians;
Length: 4,000 words;
Reading Time: 30 minutes;

Introduction for Parents

It is well understood within Christendom that premarital (and extramarital) sex is a sin. But most people don't understand exactly why that is.

For example, if we were to ask a typical young person whether it would be OK for two people to have sex if they are in love, or are engaged to be married, then they could readily come up with several culturally inspired reasons why that would be acceptable.

On the other hand, if we were to ask the same young person why he/she should wait until marriage to have sex, the answers would make reference to the possibility of an unwanted pregnancy or contracting an STD. If the youngster is a church-goer, the answer might be "cause Mom said so". An older adolescent might assume greater personal agency and hunt for a better response. "Umm… because the Bible says it's wrong?"

Moreover, there would be no sense of morality, certainty, or conviction behind these responses. If we were to follow up with the question, "Why is it morally wrong?" or "Why does the Bible say so?", they will draw a blank.

This post is an attempt to fill in this blank. Use this knowledge to explain to your children the reasons why sexual purity is important, and to back up your admonitions for your children to refrain from sexual promiscuity.

Introduction for Adult Christian Men

The top fact is that marriage is an incredibly bad deal for men these days. The rational conclusion for a man is just to spin plates or go MGTOW, but many Christian men have a damningly strong libido and/or a redemptive purpose to form a family that just won't let them quit. Hence, many men still cling to the ideal of marriage with a "do it or die" attitude. And many end up dying (figurative of the soul and finances). There is really no good choice here.

Through several posts this year, one inconvenient truth that has come to the surface of our understanding is that a man is incentivized, or more or less required in many cases, to engage in some degree of premarital sex in order to arrive in a marriage. This is presumably no less true among Christians, due to the general convergence of the church with the visages of modern feminism and traditional chivalry.

Although this method of engaging in premarital sex really "works" (in the sense that it duly leads to marriage), nevertheless, it is still indeed a very bad approach to marriage. This is because the woman does not have the mindset necessary to build a marriage that glorifies God.

Background Fundamentals

To explain exactly why premarital sex undermines the formation of God's archetype, a Christ centered marriage leading to sanctification, I'll refer to a familiar Red Pill paradigm as an ontological model: the Alpha Fux/Beta Bux (AF/BB) female mating strategy. According to this paradigm, a woman's choice to have sex is motivated by two outcomes.

1. She has sex in order to gratuitously submit her body to a highly qualified male, and to seize the opportunity to collect top-quality seed. (AF)
2. She has sex to claim dominion and assert power, largely motivated by her desire to secure various forms of his investment in her. (BB)

In both cases, the relationship is based on carnal mating strategies, and does not necessarily embody an organic symbiosis of complementary personalities and shared values — a union which would glorify God.

- If she has sex for the first reason above (AF), then she has foolishly forfeited her purity, and his favor for her as a potential wife.
- If she has sex for the second reason (BB), then she has selfishly abandoned her favor for her husband and will neglect to respect him properly. At an opportune moment, she will display her hypergamous inclinations to trade up and monkey branch, and is thus unlikely to remain faithful.

In both cases, the reasons for pairing are based on foolish or selfish motivations which will be explained in the next two sections respectively.

As long as a man conforms to the woman's mating strategy, the focus is on Game techniques (or the catastrophic lack thereof) and playing her game, and this is unlikely to yield a Christ-centered marriage.

Going deeper, the beginning of this breakdown occurs when the woman fails to act as a gatekeeper of sex. To explain how this happens, Derek left this gem under 8 Examples of IOI Word Semantics (2020 August 8).

> The evolutionary method: Man sexually desires woman and pressures her for sex. Woman rebuffs his advances (for a while). Man has unlimited sperm for multiple sexual partners, but woman can only be pregnant by one man. She selects her mate.
>
> Feminism flips the script: Women throw themselves at men. For (evolutionary) normal men, coupling soon follows. But commitment is poor, since woman gave up control of sexual access. This is her power. By shedding it, men use her. Cohabitation, MGTOW, divorce, single parenting, marital sexual starvation… all the logical result.
>
> Men have an unsatisfying choice: (1) Give in to base desires to score easily, or (2) take on the woman's role of sexual gatekeeper. The former means lots of sex, but is sin. The latter is righteous, but lowers your chance of getting lots of sex due to weeding out the sexually voracious in favor of the stable and godly. The third choice is perhaps even worse: (3) settling for used goods.

As you can see, when women fail to be sexual gatekeepers, men are left with no good choices and God's archetype of a sanctified marriage is debased. As a result, we see strange pairings and fewer happy marriages.

> Such mismatched pairings abound. Men want women who like sex, but are not promiscuous. Thus in light of the above,
>
> ""Hunting for a unicorn is an individual solution not a societal solution.""
>
> Women need become chaste pre-marital sexual gatekeepers again. The sexual voracious need to use control of sex to acquire the best mates, not just the best looking and sexually willing. This would dramatically increase the odds of 'unicorn parings.' But we no longer have the social systems required to mandate this.

Derek's analysis makes it clear that the woman is relinquishing her power when she allows the man to assume the role of sexual gatekeeper. Of note, this is a role which men are not wired to adopt, and thus will seldom do so. The result is a reduced interest in investment (i.e. commitment), widespread promiscuity, and a disintegration of the MMP, culminating in a plethora of very dissatisfied men and women, and very unhappy marriages.

But this begs the question, why would so many women, who are insecure by nature, willingly pursue whoredom when there are so many risks and negative consequences attached? Are women really that horny and that dumb?

Maybe some are, but there is more to it. While Derek's viewpoint is accurate, there is a parallel paradigm from the female perspective in which, that by abandoning her responsibility to remain chaste, the woman usurps the spiritual authority of the man, thereby flipping the hierarchy of control. This results in her holding the reigns of power in the relationship.

Women's choices are outlined in a previous post, The Feminine Dilemma (2018 October 27), which can be summarized as basically either AF or BB, or both through engaging in serial monogamy.

Now, let's consider what happens when a woman relinquishes her moral agency of being a sexual gatekeeper in order to engage in premarital sex – first by riding the carousel (AF), then by seducing a Steady Eddie into marriage (BB).

1. The gatekeeper of sex abandons her post in order to seize AF opportunities

A woman's natural desire to be ruled over is commonly expressed as a hypergamous desire for a top quality man, because she intuitively perceives that such a man has the visceral power of authority over her. Rightfully, an unmarried woman should be ruled by her father,* and Christ, if she is a believer. However, there are many women these days who are lacking a cover of authority over her head. The lack of authority and moral guidance, combined with the passion and ignorance of youth, yields a libertine agency that is prone to error. This could happen through one of the following ways.

1. Her father fails to act as a functional figurehead of authority over her.
2. She willingly departs from under her father's protective covering.
3. A combination of the above is especially catastrophic.

In the first case, she may desire to marry a suitable man who can rule over her properly, but since he has the power seat, she has no control over his willingness to commit to a marriage. She must prove to him that she would be a worthy wife (e.g. through feminine attractiveness, kindness, submissiveness, etc.) in order to attract his commitment. If she gives it up to an alpha before marriage, she has shown herself to be "easy", which signals that she is unstable and unfit for marriage, and by doing so, she has basically forfeited the opportunity to marry him. Why? It's because Men won't commit to a relationship unless it's an obvious win for them. If he's already getting all the sex he needs, then what motivation does he have to accept a much larger responsibility for it? As the saying goes, why should he buy the cow when the milk is free?

In the rare event that he is an uncommonly righteous man, or if there is a pregnancy, he may be willing to marry her, but this is unlikely since he has already shown himself to be of questionable moral standing by engaging in premarital sex, and since he is presumed to be uber quality, she is not likely to be the only contender for his investment and affections.

Throughout history, women have long noted the apparent inequity of male-female courtship roles, making God out to be unjust for this arrangement, and have indignantly expressed their disapproval through Feminism and sexual rebellion. But this response to God's design only makes it all that much harder for all women (and most men) to obtain a joyful, sanctified marriage.

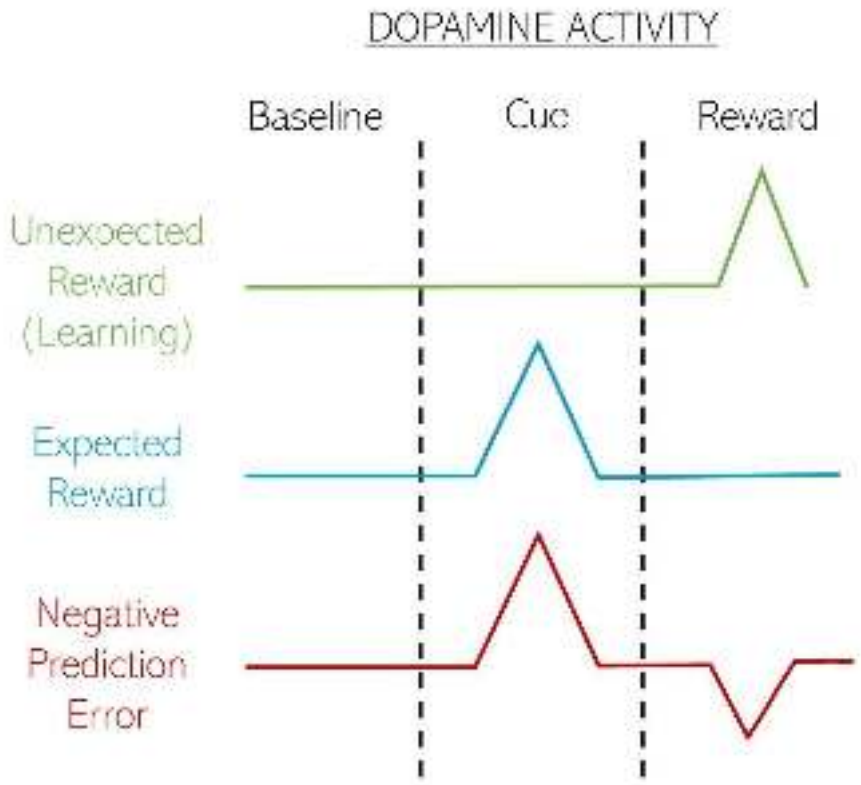
In the second case, she must have a motivation to stray. Below is an abridged list of possible reasons, all of which are included in the Feminist Life Script.

- Seeking higher education or employment opportunities away from home and out from under her father's authority.
- "Discovering herself."
- Riding the carousel.
- A desire to assert power and autonomy.
- Outright rebellion.



Of note, the desire to assert power and autonomy is intensely alluring. Dalrock described this phenomenon in his essay, Women's morphing need for male investment. (2013 August 24).

> When women are young and have the power position in the SMP, promiscuity is intoxicating to them. Since they have the power, the short term nature of most of their relationships isn't seen as them being rejected by men, but as them rejecting men. Young women today don't feel the need that previous generations did to secure commitment in their late teens and early 20s because:
>
> 1. Only small numbers of other women their age are going after the more public and durable forms of male investment.
> 2. Their hopping from man to man is seen as occurring on their own terms.
>
> However, as women progress into their late twenties all of this starts to change. Their SMP power relative to men starts to decline and at the same time their peers start to marry in much greater numbers. In other words, their need to secure male investment occurs fairly suddenly, and at the very time their SMP power is starting to dive. This is surprising to many young women because of our cultural denial of the SMP realities Rollo describes.

If her particular pretension of the feminine imperative is ruled by her own desire for power, then any relationship she enters into will start off on the wrong foot with her presuming to be in control. If she spends a considerable number of years exercising her p*ssy power over men, then it will be extremely difficult if not impossible for her to abscond from the habit. Even after she has tired of the carousel and is ready to settle down, she will probably choose a husband according to the same standard.

In all of the above cases, she has missed the chance to marry a preferred man and eventually has no other choice but to marry a lesser man (by her standards). In effect, she is forced to resort to hypogamy (marrying a man below the tier of her expectations), which reprehensively violates her natural desire for hypergamy. In reality, the man offering commitment may indeed be an equitable match for her, or even higher, but because of the Alpha Widow syndrome, deep in her soul she regards him as being sub-par. Thus, after marriage, she's stuck with a man whom was selected by his inability to take the lead, nor generate the Tingles. This unfavorable situation inevitably leads to severe discontentment, contempt, and rivalry, culminating in the woman's morphing need for male investment (i.e. frivorce).

 The present discussion suggests why it is extremely important for a marriage-minded man to vet a potential wife by examining the relationship she has with her father.*

 The event of change described in Dalrock's last paragraph is commonly called "hitting the wall" within the Manosphere.*

2. The gatekeeper of sex abandons her post in order to seize power

Women use premarital sex to qualify men. In this scenario, you might imagine that a woman thinks of a man as a kid's wind-up toy. The first part of the game is to determine his winding style and strength. This exercise allows her to become familiar with and own her p*ssy power. If she shows a little bit of cleavage, or a lot of leg, will that get him wound up? Maybe a bare-breasted titty show might get him to see things her way. Not enough? Some popsicle popping will surely get him to soften up and conform to her wishes. The challenge is an integral part of the game. If he gets too excited from a gesture too small, then a gaming woman might throw that small fish back into the pond and go fishing for a bigger challenge. She's hunting for the high SMV man that can hold out for the grand finale. As a preselection characteristic, high SMV men can get a lot of action from many women, are under less compulsion to toss their load, and are more likely to hold up to her sexpectations. Instead of his low pressure cooker type of self-control serving as evidence that he is an unreliable, promiscuous player, it's taken as a confirmation that he's a big fish. Thus, by its very nature, using premarital sex to qualify men tends to screen for promiscuous men, and filter out chaste marriage minded men.

Women use premarital sex to ensnare men. Basically, the man's natural prerogative is to conquer, dominate, and inseminate. But when this goal has been reached through engaging in premarital sex, the man's mindset changes. His aggressiveness in pursuing a relationship becomes more relaxed as he resorts to the follow-up role of preserving and maintaining the new status quo. This role focuses on consolidating his position as a defacto "husband" (and possible father), and in peacefully maintaining the "territory" he perceives to have "conquered". In effect, she has "disarmed" the man, and has put him into a defensive position. For many men, this translates into greater investment (e.g. commitment, time, housing, food, resources). In effect, she has bartered off her sexuality for his greater interest and investment. By its nature, this is a type of soft whoredom.

Women use premarital sex to control men. After the man is sufficiently ensnared, it is at this time that the woman shows her claws and fangs. Men are caught unawares, and are already hooked on the oxytocin and endorphins. She is now able to pour on the heat, and she threatens to disrupt the status quo of him having a satisfying relationship and regular sex. Meanwhile, men become confused and find it extremely difficult to reverse gears and return to the aggressive mode of being a conqueror. In the hope of maintaining the peace and continuing on with the sexual relations which he has already tasted, most men will not only tolerate her demands, but will bend over backwards to satisfy her particular conditions. Because of this motivation for continued sex and sanctification, men become placated and comply easily to the whore's demands. This also explains how premarital sex quickly turns into the habit of her withholding sex after marriage. It's all about control – her control over him.

In short, a woman uses premarital sex to select high quality, but weak willed men who are then duped through his natural desires. First, his fleshly desire for sex, and then after sex, his desire for peace and satisfaction. It is through this manner that the God ordained hierarchy has been flipped on its head.

 PUA's commonly encourage the exploitation of soft whoredom merely for the sake of getting laid, teaching men to abandon the relationship when the fangs come out. Similar to prostitution, such an approach may indeed deliver sexual gratification to a man without him being controlled. However, this behavior is condemned in scripture as whore-mongering. (See Ephesians 5:5, 1 Timothy 1:10, Hebrews 13:4, Revelation 21:8, Revelation 22:15.)

Why premarital sex leads to a dysfunctional marriage

It is the nature of women to desire a man, but a woman's desire to control a man is part of her fallen nature. Since sexual desire is perhaps the only area in which women genuinely have visceral power over men, especially younger men, it is a no brainer solution for her to combine her desire for a man with her desire to control a man simply by applying her thighs to the stud. She can knock out Two Birds with one stone, and enjoy the ego rush of power in the process. As long as women perceive their sexuality as a form of power, they will carry a mistaken sense of control, and will be continually tempted to abuse this power.

As mentioned earlier, single young women tend to revel in their sexual power, and they learn to use this power to leverage male desire in order to extract attention, affirmation, and various forms of provision, as well as evade responsibility (AKA the p*ssy pass). But within marriage, she becomes acutely aware of the consequences of her actions (i.e. sex reveals her vulnerability while it empowers the man) and the relevant responsibilities. With this information added into the equation, she must now resort to a new strategy in order to continue exerting power and evading responsibility. This invariably results in her using sex (i.e. the denial thereof) as a weapon.

Before marriage, she had no sense of responsible agency, only the thrill of passion, affirmation, and the illusions of liberty and control. After marriage, familiarity and selfishness kill the passion, the affirmation is a once and done deal, and her perceptions of liberty are transformed into adultery and become a liability. In short, all her previously dearly held idolatries are eliminated in one fell swoop. The true nature of her depraved spiritual state is revealed in all its gory, leaving her floundering for some other idol to latch onto.

Since women are intuitively familiar with this method of control, one might think that they would continue to flex their perineal muscles even after marriage, which might actually be helpful in terms of closeness and bonding. But in fact, the nature of marriage requires both partners to form a relationship that is structured according to God's archetype, or else it becomes miserable. Men and women who enter into marriage with any relationship structure contrary to this are forced to evolve according to God's prototype, or else fail.

The only way to reinstate the proper hierarchy of authority is for the man to stop having sex with the woman, and to start demanding her submission, wherein her obedient compliance is rewarded with love, attention, and other favors, possibly sex if they decided to marry during the interim. The thing is, this remedial approach is extremely difficult for both the man and the woman. It is even more difficult than it would have been to resist having premarital sex in the first place. It is difficult for the man for the reasons discussed above, and it is difficult for the woman because it requires her to assume a posture of humility and respect after having succeeded in dominating the man. Most women will patently refuse. For others, the sudden invalidation of her power breaks the continuity of her once reliable ego fixation, and suppresses the satiety of her addiction. Her depraved grasping for love, security, and control is exacerbated, even amplified to hellish proportions, which will guarantee he does not succeed if it does not drive him away altogether.

Furthermore, if men try to implement a remedial strategy, it is very likely that the now frustrated woman will be tempted to monkey branch and try her hand on dominating another man, rather than to do the hard work of being obedient to God and her husband in a relationship that has already lost its spark and has become filled with the grievances of sin.

All this clearly explains why so many marriages have a rocky start for the first 2-5 years, and 50% of them end in the divorce courts. In other words, 50% of them prefer to return to the idolatries of their youth, and there's probably a good proportion of those who stay married who are merely tolerating it, while empowering themselves to "stay faithful" by dreaming of the Asherah poles of the past whenever they're rutting.

Concluding Statements

Because of the tomes of discussion about the AF/BB female mating strategy in the Manosphere over the past decade, we have come to regard this strategy as the natural default. However, while I was composing this essay, I realized that if a woman obeyed God by postponing sex until marriage, and she married sufficiently early in life (early 20s), then the AF/BB strategy (and all its transgressions) may never ensue.

Thus, the AF/BB strategy is only the default strategy for those women who have abandoned the God proscribed prerogative to avoid sex until marriage and instead have pursued the feminist life Script, relishing their own p*ssy power and indulging the idolatry thereof.

In other words, the AF/BB strategy is a peculiar manifestation of feminism, a result of worshipping the idol of female rebellion. It only seems like the dominant prototype because feminist ideology prevails as a conventional benchmark for women. Another way to say this is that we are witnessing the once rare catastrophic consequences of promiscuity now played out as a societal norm.

Men want to interpret a woman's willingness to have premarital sex as meaning that she loves him so much that she just can't control herself. But this notion is just a projection of male lust and a denial of God's archetypical relationship structure. Remember, women are the gatekeepers of sex, and the only time she should be opening her legs that gate is in obedience to God's will for her life. That means celibacy before marriage, and afterwards, submission to her husband's advances, and only her husband's advances.

It is my opinion that women who are unwilling to follow this course should not get married, because as long as a woman obeys the fleshly nature (following evolutionary psychology) she will maintain a utilitarian approach to sex (i.e. informal whoredom along the AF/BB trajectory) and will fail to fulfill her role as sexual gatekeeper according to God's designations. A woman is not fit for marriage unless/until she grows past her barbaric nature and can willingly submit her body to the worthier purposes of marriage and procreation.

The bottom line is in whether she (and he) will choose to be obedient to God's will prior to the wedding day. If she cannot resist illicit sex before marriage, then it is unlikely that she will resist illicit liaisons afterwards. If she will not prove to be obedient before marriage, then it is highly unlikely that she will suddenly become obedient afterwards. For a man to think otherwise is unreasonable, and foolish. To briefly reiterate, foolishness is when you can't (or won't) see what will come next, based on the nature of things and the track record of past behavior/events.

Any way you look at this, premarital sex is a sin. Of course, we already knew this, but now we know why.

Related

- Dalrock: Reframing Christian Marriage (Part 5) – Sex as a Weapon (2012 May 20)
- Dalrock: The Unexpected Challenge to Modern Christian Orthodoxy (2016 December 12)
- Dalrock: They're too traditional to stay married (2019 May 17)
- The Asia Dialogue: What does Premarital Sex mean in a Dating Culture Compared to a Courtship Culture? (2019 November 19)
- Biblical Gender Roles: 3 Ways Wives Try to Control Their Husbands (2020 April 9)
- Wintery Knight: Radical Feminists Explain How Feminism Prepared Them for Marriage (2020 July 29)
- The Male Factor: 5 Ways to Stay Safe from Gold Digger Girlfriends (2020 July 30)
- Full Metal Patriarchy: You Can't Negotiate Genuine Desire but that's not the Point (2020 August 4)

Are you a man or a mushroom?

Jack · 17 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Men's ignorance and natural weaknesses make them susceptible to the machinations of lascivious women. This post reviews these weaknesses, describes how women keep mushrooms men in the dark, and emphasizes how important it is for men to be consciously self-aware.

Readership: All; Men, especially younger men;
Length: 2,400 words
Reading Time: 13 minutes

How do women blind and bind men?

Judges 13-16 tells the story of Samson, a man of immense strength and faith, who was blinded by his desire for Delilah, and was eventually blinded by his enemies. All his strength could not save him from being bound.

While only a truly horrid woman would knowingly, intentionally destroy a man and their progeny for her own selfish benefit, nevertheless many women will hamsterbate until they are blinded by their own solipsism, then condemn the man for all her perceived grievances, and then regrettably do the same mischief.

But just how do women go about pulling this off? The scriptures explain why very simply.

> "But no one can enter a strong man's house and plunder his goods, unless he first binds the strong man. Then indeed he may plunder his house."
>
> *Matthew 12:29; Mark 3:27; (ESV)

Delilah was able to have Samson bound by f*cking him until she earned his trust, and then betraying him to his enemies. In addition to popping his cork, there are many other ways to bind and blind a man other than through deception or brute force. Here are just a few.

- Debt
- Blackmail
- Bribery
- Extortion
- False religious heresies (e.g. cultural convergence, complementarianism, egalitarianism)
- A gynocentric legal system (e.g. Duluth)
- Ignorance or naïveté (e.g. youth; cross-cultural ignorance)
- Sexual extortion (e.g. sextortion; withholding sex in marriage)
- Marital asset extortion (e.g. threatening divorce; withholding child visitation for some type of "ransom")

The remainder of this post will focus on the enticement of illicit sex as a very effective and pervasive method of binding a man.

 This verse is not used in the original context (casting out demons), nevertheless the concept holds true.*

The Enchantment of Illicit Sex is a Weakness

On its face, premarital sex seems like a great arrangement. Not only does the man get free sex, but the woman also gets free resources. This is the core illusion that makes cohabitation so alluring. But in fact, this transaction is not as free as it may seem.

In a previous post, Why is premarital sex a sin? (2020/8/14), we learned how women use premarital sex to select high quality, but weak willed men who can be duped through his natural desires for sex and satisfaction, all in order to assert control over him. Thus, if a man has illicit sex with a woman, it is basically equivalent to him bowing down and worshipping her.

As confirming evidence, Sharkly relayed this testimony from Wintery Knight.

> "A while back I was asked to mentor a girl who had cohabitated with an atheist, had an abortion, and had become a Christian after they broke up. I asked her why women have premarital sex. She flat out told me that women like men who can be controlled through premarital sex. She said, "It's a way to get control over men, without having to be nice to them." Men who refuse premarital sex are usually also trying to lead the woman into marriage, which requires her to grow up. It makes perfect sense why the bad boys are deemed preferable.

Did you get that? The predominant reason why women have premarital sex with men is because (in their words),

> "It's a way to get control over men, without having to be nice to them."

Now think about this. Why does she want control over him so badly that she would rather get defiled than to be nice to him! Why is her being nice to him so repugnant to her that it's not an option to her? She would rather get defiled than to submit to God! Like I've said before, women love to be humbled through defilement, and furthermore, they turn it into a power game. It is pretty clear that we are looking at the archetypical rebellion of Eve!

On this topic of spiritual rebellion, Earl commented,

> "What attracts [promiscuous women] to 'bad' men is that these men are ruled by their passions and not by right reason which often comes from living a fearing God/moral way of life. Hence these type of men produce the 'tingles'…and they are easier to control (an immoral man has as many masters as he has vices)."

The kind of men who fall for these lies, ruses, and temptations are also usually immature, desperate, frustrated, and/or lacking discernment. This is a witches brew of characteristics and spiritual conditions which prove to be a latent form of evil. Men like this will naturally attract women with a utilitarian mind.

> "Now some women find out after the fornicating and fact that a man ruled by his passions can also be very abusive, objectifying, domineering, and controlling themselves."

In defense of the man, I suspect that much of this behavior is a result of the man waking up to the fact that he has been duped by her affectations, and is being taken to the cleaners on a daily basis. In response, he is desperately, even wickedly attempting to reclaim his masculine authority in the relationship. But unfortunately, she will not give up her power that easily. She'll even jump on another man before she'll submit to God and her defacto "husband". Desperate times require desperate measures.

> "The man who follows God's will understands things like self-sacrifice, humility, self-control… While these don't produce the passionate tingles, they will often show what love truly is about. Not in the feelings or emotions but in the act of will."

One outstanding weakness of women is that they are very poor judges of a man's character. They are also totally unaware of themselves being poor judges. Likewise, men are also terrible at discerning the motivations of a woman, and get distracted too easily by the allure of the sensuous fellure.

Wintery Knight concluded,

> “As a virgin myself, I am not interested in marrying a woman who used sex as a tool to manipulate men. That very quickly turns into sex-withholding in a marriage.”

Sharkly concluded,

> “I believe Wintery Knight nailed it. A whore in rebellion against God will temporarily show a man respect and offer him sex and make promises of unlimited sex, prior to marriage, using her sexuality immorally to gain what she wants from that man, but then once the loyal and devoted man is bound to her by marriage, then the rebellious whore’s manipulative usurping, via her sexual agency, is again now more painfully exerted directly against her husband’s authority, now through the wicked withholding and rationing of all that she had vowed to him.”

Does any man really want to marry a woman like this? Wake up and smell the coffee, men!

> "As a leader and shepherd, a Christian man should explain to any woman he is interested in, what his sexual expectations for her loyalty and chastity are. If she won't submit to your sexual authority prior to marriage, dump that whore. She will only be tempted and encouraged to be even less sexually loyal and obedient later. Don't be a fool!"

But of course, men don't regard illicit sex as a subversion of their spiritual authority over the woman, because they are wired to spread their seed. Procreation is the foremost evolutionary prerogative and is capable of disengaging the prefrontal cortex. This is another weakness of men.

The Test Drive Fallacy

Another weakness of men is to assume that if a woman puts out voraciously before marriage, then her nature is such to keep putting out afterwards. In essence, this is the fallacious argument for the Test Drive. But these same men have the foolish notion that these cloying women really love them. These men unwittingly ignore the fact that such a woman has a utilitarian view of sex. To her, sex is either a tool or a toy, and not an expression of passionate love and bonding. In other words, sex is not unique to marriage in his/her mind and heart, nor is sex unique to the spouse.

We have impolite names for such women. Those who consider sex to be a tool are called wh0res. Those who think sex is just for fun are called s1uts. We already know that wh0res and s1uts are not worthy of marriage. If she has sex outside of marriage before marriage, then she is prone to have sex outside of marriage after marriage, or what is more common is that the sex dries up entirely. The same goes for men too.

But men are foolish to think that simply putting a ring on a wh0re or a s1ut is going to redeem her soul and transform her into a kind-hearted, loving, and obedient wife. It might, by God's grace and decades of thankless toil on the husband's part, but don't count on it.

Women's plausible deniability and men's genuine ignorance are weaknesses

As mentioned above, men are prone to regard women purely according to their better qualities, and look for confirming evidence of the same. Thus, men generally presume that women possess some degree of moral agency, and/or as being harmless sheep in catty clothing. On this point, Sharkly made this comment under 8 Examples of IOI Word Semantics (2020/8/8).

> "I think the reason many men often fail to initially recognize a woman's sexual overtures and IOIs, is twofold.
>
> Primarily because most women, especially in the past, would intentionally operate from a shady area of plausible deniability, where you could never publicly insist that their overture had been a direct sexual solicitation, without allowing them to come back at you and say that you are perverted and creepy for misinterpreting their "innocent kindness" as a sexual invitation."

IOW, she wants to present the outward appearance of innocence, and retain the option of holding a #metoo accusation over the man. The male version of plausible deniability is a genuine ignorance of her sexual interest. From an evo-psyche perspective, we might presume that the typical man has evolved to be blind to women's advances in order to protect himself from falling prey to her machinations.

But western Chivalry has put a twist on this aspect of men's nature, by teaching men that women are virtuous princesses by nature, and that all men should treat women most honorably by being "nice". This approach contributes towards the deception of men by denying the fleshly nature of women, and coopting men's good-natured ignorance into a tool of manipulation and control. So again we find that a man's ignorance opens him up to the abuse of women. Sharkly describes this as follows.

> "Secondly, all our blue-pill conditioning trains us not to expect women to be sexual aggressors. We men are taught that we are all "rapists", sexual aggressors, and "toxic" for being that way. So we have been misled to expect that women wouldn't even naturally have a base sexual desire, like a man, or to ever expect that they naturally seek to be defilers hunting for your precious life."

> The price of a whore is a loaf of bread, but the adulteress is hunting for a precious life.
>
> Proverbs 6:26

I will still maintain that 90+% of all young women have sex on the brain, in some romantic form or another, but only for certain men of course. And yes, women love to be defiled, just for the fun of it all, but of course, only on her terms. If defilement doesn't include perceived validation and the Tingles, then the current narrative teaches that it's considered r@pe from her viewpoint. Hence the charge of "toxic masculinity".

Contrary to the popular saying, ignorance does not lead to marital bliss!

Instead of playing the "nice guy" who swallows the "all wimmin are princesses" narrative, it would be much wiser for a man to be more critical and demanding of a woman, especially in the beginning stages of the relationship. The Manosphere describes this approach as "making her qualify herself". If she won't, or can't, then throw her back and go fishing for another.

Men are now evolving to be acutely aware of IOIs and other auguries, or else they have no chance to do well in life.

Summary

To recap, a summary of men's weaknesses related to sexual desire which lead men to their doom are as follows.

- The intense desire for sexual release amplifies sexual frustration and desperation.
- The biological prerogative to reproduce overrules rational thinking.
- Desire for peace and relationship satisfaction.
- The tendency to view women as pure and harmless.
- The belief that women are generally motivated by altruism and love.
- The tendency to be very poor judges of a woman's motivations.
- Unwilling or unable to be critical and demanding of a woman, and to pressure her to truly assume her better nature.

Women's weaknesses which capitalize on men's weaknesses are as follows.

- Inadequate or absent male authority (e.g. guidance, protection) resulting in poor decision-making and an increased sense of insecurity.
- The need for various forms of male investment (e.g. material provisions, attention, commitment, marriage).
- Desire for emotional validation and affirmation (e.g. Tingles).
- Desire the joys of sanctification/defilement.
- Desire to have a man rule over her.
- Desire to control men.
- Skilled engagement in cloying, deception, and plausible deniability.
- Desire power, especially over men.
- The illusion of power during her peak SMV phase (age 18-25) exacerbates other weaknesses.
- The tendency to regard sex as a utility and to engage in “transactions”.
- The tendency to be very poor judges of a man’s character.

Both sexes may have the following weaknesses.

- Desire for illicit sex.
- Low temptation threshold.
- Inability to delay gratification.
- A lack of faith (e.g. willingness to wait, to commit, to avoid temptation)
- A lack of spiritual discernment.
- Lacking emotional maturity.
- The belief that love will transform the character of the other.
- Preferring the comforts of a Blue Pill mindset (e.g. being “nice”, chivalry, female pedestalization, believing masculinity is “toxic”).
- Religious heresies create inaccurate mental models of reality, and set up false expectations.

The most interesting thing about all of this is that most liberated wimmin already know everything in this post and regularly use it to undermine men and herd them like farm animals. Yet men are nary the wiser.

If that doesn't make you angry, then you're probably a domesticated mushroom.

Related

- Roosh Valizadeh: 15 Important Quotes From The Predatory Female (2015/12/11)
- Laughing at Feminism: Some things to chew on (2019/8/24)
- Σ Frame: Looking at the Essentials (2020/6/12)
- Roosh Valizadeh: Secular Marriage vs. Christian Marriage (2020/7/6)

Women at their finest

Jack · 19 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Women were created to be the companion and helper of men.

Readership: All;
Length: 200 words
Reading Time: 1/2 minute + 10 minute video

Modern times have taught men to fear women for the risks and responsibilities that they impose. But it was not always so, nor is it the will of God.

Also, women consistently fail to understand how their good behavior can inspire and motivate men. So this is a reminder to the ladies as well.

Lest we forget the joy of God's good gift to man, here's a picture of a real life Proverbs 31 woman. This is what God intended women to be.

> "Come and see, my master! For I have seen that you enjoy fishing. So I have built a fishing hut on the river for you! Come! I invite you to sanctify my offering with your presence. I shall be overjoyed with your approval. If it is pleasing in your eyes, you may ravish me there and I will be satisfied. Come quickly my Lord, for my heart swells within me!"

Note: The original video was taken down for some reason, and I replaced it with this one. In the original, the woman was dressed more attractively, and at the end, she invited her husband to come to the hut. The final scenes were of them fishing and hanging out there.

Related

- Cornerstone: Another Reason to Look for Young Wives (2020/8/10)

We're on a mission from God.

Jack · 21 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Every Christian has a God ordained purpose in life.

Readership: Christians;

Introduction

Reader Jeff Barnes posed a very pertinent question which is addressed in this post.

> "The notion of having a mission is still somewhat foreign to me. Would you care to elaborate or explain what your mission is?"

Ed answered,

> "It refers to a driving sense of purpose, in this case related to my sense of divine calling. A mission is having a powerful sense that, regardless of the context, you have a firm idea of what your duty is. It can also be called a sense of identity. I know who I am and what God requires of me in any context."

A man's mission from God is referred to in many ways.

- God's will for your life.
- Your calling in life.
- Your foreordained purpose for living.
- It is your work on earth that will be judged in heaven (not for salvation, but for rewards).

True believers are known to have a passion for some unique purpose in their own lives.

Many books have been written on this subject. Probably the most famous one that has come out in recent years is "The Purpose Driven Life" by Pastor Rick Warren. Understanding Your Place in God's Kingdom, by Pastor Myles Munroe. The Purpose of Man, by A. W. Tozer. But it's not a new subject in Christian literature. Another book that was very popular in the past is The Christian's Secret to a Happy Life, by Hannah Whitehall Smith. I found a PDF study guide for this book too.

The important thing is to find this mission for yourself… and LIVE IT!!!

Case Study 1 – The Blues Brothers

Back in 1980, there was a movie starring Dan Ackroyd and John Belushi called The Blues Brothers. It remained wildly popular even up into the late 1990's, and saw a reprise in 1998.

The running theme of the movie was about how the two main characters passionately, and at times, miraculously overcame all the challenges involved with forming (or rather, reviving) a blues band.

It features musical numbers by rhythm and blues (R&B), soul, and blues singers James Brown, Cab Calloway, Ray Charles, Aretha Franklin, and John Lee Hooker. It features non-musical supporting performances by John Candy, Carrie Fisher, Henry Gibson, and Charles Napier.

The story is a tale of redemption for paroled convict Jake and his blood brother Elwood, who set out on "a mission from God" to save from foreclosure the Catholic orphanage in which they were raised. This gave the main characters a strong purpose to reunite their R&B band and organize a performance to earn the $5,000 needed to pay the orphanage's property tax bill. Along the way, they are targeted by a homicidal "mystery woman", Neo-Nazis, and a redneck country-western band—all while being relentlessly pursued by the police.

This plot generated the catchquote, “We’re on a mission from God!” I’m sure the producers tacitly presented this phrase under the guise of the determination shown by the main characters, and it was assumed to be a smug joke.

But to the mature believer, this phrase is not just a comedy quip, it is a central tenet of the Christian life.

On the 30th anniversary, L’Osservatore Romano, the daily newspaper of the Vatican City State, wrote that the film is filled with positive symbolism and moral references that can be related to Catholicism. They went further, stating, The Blues Brothers “is a memorable film, and, judging by the facts, a Catholic one”.

The purpose driven life of a Christian is just like the Blues brothers, all manner of jetsam and flotsam is thrown into the mix in their passionate resolve to put the band back together. In the process, they get away with virtually everything, evading jealous wives, hardened criminals, vengeful enemies, and the whole city’s police force, which culminated in the biggest automobile demolition of all film history.

Case Study 2 – Myself

I won’t presume to assume anyone else’s mission here, but for me, I know my spiritual identity is that of a peacemaker. Wherever I go, people calm down and adopt a fresh perspective. Many times in my life, I have walked into a room where people were having a heated argument, and as soon as they became aware of my presence, they toned it down and quickly resolved their beef. I don’t need to say anything at all.

People have the common misperception that a peaceful person is a wuss, but appearances are deceiving in this case. Nothing could be further from the truth. Think of Mel Gibson’s role as the Scottish hero, William Wallace, in the classic film Braveheart. All he wanted was to live a quiet, peaceful life as a farmer with his wife and children. But after the British killed his wife and destroyed his farm, it was all out WAR! He took on the mightiest army in the world at that time, and (for a while) won independence for Scotland.

For me, the enemy is not an army of troops, but is instead the principalities and powers of this world that would dare attack my peace, my home, my marriage, and my Shalom. In effect, the enemy is divorce, abortion, feminism, and the pervasive spiritual blindness and apostasy of our age. I find an outlet for this purpose in blogging. “The pen is mightier than the sword.”

Concluding Statements

It's easy to get your mind bogged down with wondering what God's will might be for your life. This is because thinking about it won't help you much. The way to find it is to examine your spiritual constitution, your "spiritual gifts", and be aware of what your convictions are leading you to do on a moment by moment basis. Your deeper values could also be used as a clue about what is most important to you, what is non-negotiable to you, the thing you must have, or must do, no matter what the cost.

The mind's role in all of this is to help you figure out the best way to carry out your mission. The mind should be used as a tool of the heart, not the other way around. That is, you shouldn't be using your mind to decide where your heart should be. Instead, your heart should be telling your mind what problems need to be solved.

Related

- Σ Frame: Works, Faith and Miracles in Stewardship (2009 October 12)
- Christian Publishing House: Christians: Only Those Doing The Will Of The Father Receive Eternal Life – Are You Doing God's Will? (2020 July 1)
- The Open Bible (Stephen Smith): 100 Bible Verses about Whatever You Do, Do It As If Unto The Lord (2020 July 8)

Only noble born men are qualified to do housework for unicorns

Jack · 24 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Now Christian men must be members of the noble class to do the housework.

Readership: All;

Over the weekend, there was a hot discussion over at reddit/RPChristians. Formaggiofritto wrote this screed which has attracted more than a hundred comments so far.

> As men, you need to do better

> I was raised in a very traditional Christian family with traditional Christian values. Honestly, I would consider myself to be a catch. I am eager to one day fulfill my role as a Godly, submissive wife. I'm an excellent cook, I enjoy cleaning, I love children and have a lot of experience working with them, and I would consider myself to be fairly attractive. I don't wear a ton of makeup, but I have waist length blonde hair, green eyes, am well proportioned, and given the amount of male attention I receive, I would deduce that I am an attractive woman.

> However, the likelihood of attracting a traditional man is very slim. So I am also highly educated. I speak three languages, and have a master's degree in chemical engineering. My grandpa was a car mechanic so he also taught me to do all my car maintenance (within reason, like oil changes, tire rotations, changing brake pads, etc.). I have no debt, make a lot of money, and when it comes to living my life, I don't exactly "need" a man to survive. I however, would very much like to be married to a good leader and fulfill my role as a submissive wife one day.

> Traditional men are honestly a disappointment. They want the perks of having a submissive wife who does the housework and cooking, but they also want the perks of a working wife. Every man I have dated expected me to continue working after having children, as I have made more money than every man I have dated. However, they balked at the idea of sharing housework. Why is it expected I will work 40+ hours a week while doing full childcare and housework? A stay at home mom is a full time job, and that has been a deal breaker in every relationship I have been in.

> While I would dearly love to be a stay at home mom one day, I can accept if it is not possible. I also enjoy my work immensely. But I'm really starting to get sick of traditional men. What ever happened to paying for dates, planning dates, wooing me, opening doors, buying me flowers, standing when I enter a room, asking my father for permission, etc.? I feel like traditional values that men hold are now completely one sided and I am extremely disappointed. They want a traditional and submissive woman, but they don't hold up their end of the bargain. Do better please.

By jove, she's a unicorn!

Every man is looking for a unicorn, but being a self-professing unicorn is not enough to get into marriage. To be qualified for marriage, both the man and the woman must build a relationship that glorifies Christ, not just one that glorifies the woman.

Jack's Commentary

In the comments, she added a few more statements which are appended below with my own comments.

> "What ever happened to paying for dates, planning dates, wooing me, opening doors, buying me flowers, standing when I enter a room, asking my father for permission, etc.?"

> "I want a man to open my door, stand when I enter, and treat me with respect if he expects me to be submissive."

She doesn't know what submissive means. She's basically saying, "Because you are my puppet husband, lord and master, I henceforth command you to be attentive to my wishes! Plan a romantic date! Open this door so that I may make a noble entrance! Buy me flowers! Do the housework! Of course, you shall also pay the costs of all these luxuries, and you shall be thankful that I have chosen you for this honor."

I'm a little confused about what she really means here. Does she expect to be formally courted (19th century style) by a sophisticated man who is kind, courteous, and has the refined mannerisms of an English earl? Or does she want a Chivalrous soyboy who eagerly jumps through all her $ħ!t Test hoops at her beck and call, and who bends over forward on his knees to fulfill her every whimsical phantasm in the vain hope of yearning sex? She probably won't find the former (because western culture no longer does the courtship thing), and she would never be satisfied with the latter.

Women have been spoiled by Chivalry just as much as men have.

> "…what would you consider to be a meaningful accomplishment?"

The answer to this question is so simple, yet women consistently fail (or refuse) to get it right.

A real virgin (capable of achieving marital sanctification), under 25, long hair, slim and fit, good health, fertile, trusting, kind hearted, humble, submissive, respectful, God fearing, has a good relationship with her father, and no tattoos or weird piercings.

…and here's the shocker, ladies… there is absolutely nothing else that matters at all!

> "It's like men cherry pick how things should be, they want the submissive wife, but they also want her to work and clean and cook. That's a ridiculous expectation."

Again, she doesn't know what submissive means. A woman who willingly does the housework, and does it joyfully is a submissive wife. But on the whole, maybe she's right. These days, expecting a woman to be joyful in doing menial service is ridiculous.

> "I'm a little bitter perhaps, but it's after a string of boyfriends who were basically expecting a housekeeper and nanny who would have sex with them and contribute financially."

Women get an ego kick out of feigning indignant surprise, but there is no surprise here. As I said earlier, sex is the crux of marriage, so you should expect that married men will want lots of sex from their wives.

Moreover, men will never commit to marriage unless it is an obvious benefit to them, especially in this age of easy no-fault divorce. If a man marries a woman, then he'll expect her to make his life easier, not harder. That's what it means to be a "helper", as the Bible states of wives. Helpers can choose whom to help, but they can't make demands. If she thinks she is entitled to make her own demands, then she is not being submissive. She is assuming a man's role, and has thereby disqualified herself from being a man's helper.

> "[The men I've dated] balked at the idea of sharing housework. Why is it expected I will work 40+ hours a > week while doing full childcare and housework?"

These are your own expectations, not men's. Aside from an extenuating circumstance, traditional men do not expect their wife to hold down a full-time job outside the home.

In general, men do not care about housework. They would prefer to live in a dusty warehouse filled with tools, machines, old cars, motorcycles, and other cool stuff, sweep the floor with a leaf blower, and take the trash out once a week. It is women who want a living environment reminiscent of Better Homes and Gardens. A man might be happy to do the mortgage payments, remodeling, and maintenance on such a home, but it will be up to the woman to make it as clean as she pleases.

About child care? ROFL! Please! It's true that a father's influence is extremely important, but have you ever seen the movie, Three Men and a Baby?

Concluding Statements

From what I can see, she made a big mistake when she chose to spend 6+ years pursuing a master's degree instead of shopping for a husband. A post graduate education is for those women who are unfit for marriage and are forced to support themselves. Maybe she thought earning an advanced degree would put her in the proximity of professional men, and this might have helped her land a better husband, but it also put her into a much higher bracket of competition. How many tall, handsome, single, Christian men with Ph.D.s does she think there are in the world? And how many women are competing for those few men? And if she did find such a man, then why should he be so eager to offer her (and only her) his lifetime commitment in marriage?

Now if a woman's goal is only to have sex with lots of professional men, then pursuing higher education is definitely the right choice! But marriage? …meh.

She is proud of her "achievements", such as her education and handy man skills, but she doesn't realize that men think nothing of those things, and everything about the things I listed above. A master's degree in STEM probably means she is in her late 20s, and I find it hard to believe that she retained her virginity over all that time. But virgin or not, she already missed the boat. The shadow of the dreaded Wall now loometh, henceforth the frustrations expressed in her post. As some commenters at RPChristians have said, her only hope is in prayer and the grace of God.

Ladies, you cannot fight against nature. Marriage is primarily for procreation (e.g. sex and having children), and women only have about 15 years for childbearing. Marriage minded men want a woman's youth and fertility more than anything else. If you really must have it all, a husband, children and a post graduate education and a professional career, then you need to do the husband and children thing first while you are young. When your husband's career has gained momentum, and the children reach an age of independence, then you can pursue your own interests — education and career if that's what you really want. The good news is that your career doesn't care how old you are.

As an afterthought (which should have been your first consideration), you might want to consider what might be God's will for your life. Oh yeah, that! Gee, how silly of you to forget God.

She is like a Christian version of Tomi Lahren, sans carousel and pro-abortion stance. Something tells me that we're going to see a lot more women like these spill out of the SMP pipeline in the next few years. Generation Z will identify themselves as generational cohorts by their shared memories of Karen's, Katie's, and Tomi's during their childhood.

Wait, I can think of one solution. Let's just take Formaggiofritto's word at face value. If we could somehow reignite 19th century Victorian courtship, where all Christian men were chivalrous noblemen, landed, born and bred, preferably with a STEM Ph.D., and who have a butler or maid to help with the housework, then this generation of trad thots could optimize both their careers and their hypergamous instincts. So from this perspective, she's right. Men need to do better!

Nice try, but Meghan Markle has already shown that not just anyone can be elite.

Related

- Red Pill Dad: Tomi Lahren, ladies…welcome to the #metoo of hypergamy. (2020 August 10)
- Mogadishu Matt: Tomi Lahren Posting and Video Roundup (2020 August 12)
- Didact's Reach: Tradthot is Thot (2020 August 19)

How the Pill Affects Attraction and Mating

Jack · 26 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The pill causes women to be unnaturally attracted to the wrong men.

Readership: All; Parents of adolescent daughters; Women who use birth control pills; Men with partners who use birth control pills; Men interested in vetting a woman for a relationship;
Author's Note: Parts of this study were contributed by the author of Lexet Iustitia. An expanded, coauthored version appears here with his permission.

The Role of Major Histocompatibility Genes (MHG) in Mating

Research conducted in the 1970s by University of Liverpool psychologist Dr. S. Craig Roberts revealed that immune genes may have a "powerful effect in terms of how well relationships are cemented."

Dr. Roberts found that women who are not under the influence of hormonal birth control naturally choose men with dissimilar genes, while women on the pill experience a shift in preference toward men who are most similar to them in MHC genes.

Women who begin taking the pill before they decide to marry will be attracted to men who share similar MHC genes. Once she marries and stops taking the pill (when she decides to have a child), she may find that she becomes disinterested in the spouse she has chosen, preferring a man, instead, with dissimilar MHC genes.

Similarly, women who do not take the pill before choosing a husband, and then begin taking the pill after they are married may find that they become disinterested in the spouse they have chosen, preferring a man, instead, with similar MHC genes.

Sexual partners who share MHG have been shown to form relationships in which…

- The woman is more likely to be less sexually responsive.
- The woman is more likely to refuse sex.
- There is a reduction in the ability to pair bond.
- There is a tendency to have more sex partners, and to cheat.
- The woman has a greater difficulty conceiving children, has fewer children, and less healthy children.

This does not spell success in a marriage.

Most of the Red Pill community is operating under the assumption that hypergamy as we now know it, is what hypergamy has always been in the past. But Dr. Robert's line of research tells us that hypergamy may be greatly aggravated by the pill, as it apparently limits the agency of women. If true, which it most likely is, that would make birth control even more evil than we previously believed, as it results in poor mate selection, and has altered society for the worst.

The Pill Disturbs Pheromone Sensitivities

To explain the biological logistics of how women choose a mate, this article in Scientific American (feat. Melinda Wenner): Birth Control Pills Affect Women's Taste in Men (2008 December 1) discussed how synthetic hormones change desire in women—and their choice in a mate.

> "It's all about scent. Hidden in a man's smell are clues about his major histocompatibility complex (MHC) genes, which play an important role in immune system surveillance. Studies suggest that females prefer the scent of males whose MHC genes differ from their own, a preference that has probably evolved because it helps offspring survive: couples with different MHC genes are less likely to be related to each other than couples with similar genes are, and their children are born with more varied MHC profiles and thus more robust immune systems.

> A study published in August in the Proceedings of the Royal Society B, however, suggests that women on the pill undergo a shift in preference toward men who share similar MHC genes. The female subjects were more likely to rate these genetically similar men's scents (via a T-shirt the men had worn for two nights) as pleasant and desirable after they went on the pill as compared with before."

> "A study published last year in Psychological Science found that women paired with MHC-similar men are less sexually satisfied and more likely to cheat on their partners than women paired with MHC-dissimilar men. So a woman on the pill, for example, might be more likely to start dating a MHC-similar man, but he could ultimately leave her less sexually satisfied. Then if she goes off the pill during the relationship, the accompanying hormonal changes will draw her even more strongly toward more MHC-dissimilar men. These immune genes may have a "powerful effect in terms of how well relationships are cemented," says University of Liverpool psychologist Craig Roberts, co-author of the August paper."

This article reports that the regular use the pill has the effect of shifting a woman's sense of pheromone receptivity. This means that besides blocking the ability of women to sniff out mates who are most biologically compatible, they are also bonding with good smelling men who are not good matches genetically. Part of the problems with infertility in couples may not be just late marriage but also genetic incompatibility caused by this blockage.

The Folly of Forming Relationships in a Hormone Altered Emotional State

In a separate essay, we looked at How the Pill Changes the Brain and Emotions of women on the Pill. These changes also lead to a metamorphosis in their mating behavior.

It should be well noted here that women choose their partner (or partners) according to their emotions and intuitions, which are greatly influenced by their hormonal state.

There are enormous biological changes that take place during sex and women's physiology is far more sensitive to these changes. Women have ten times the amount of the pair bonding chemical oxytocin, which works to keep them emotionally attached to any man they have sex with. But when a woman starts taking the pill, or stops taking the pill (when she decides to have a child), her emotional constitution, and by extension, the relational structure, are no longer the same as when she was off or on the pill respectively. When a woman starts taking the pill, she becomes attracted to men whom she would not otherwise be attracted to in her natural hormone state, leading her to make a very poor choice of a mate. When she comes off the pill, the woman's natural hormone balance and emotional state eventually resumes, leading to a change in her feelings and desires. These hormonal changes cause her to feel dissatisfied, and even annoyed with the relationship she chose while under the influence of the hormones supplemented through birth control medication. These changes inevitably invite catastrophe to the relationship.

The following characteristics exhibited by women under the influence of the Pill are summarized here.

- Poor pair-bonding with their partner(s).
- Lower libido.
- Dissatisfaction with their sex life.
- Less monogamous sex.
- More likely to cheat.
- More likely to have a larger number of intimate partners.
- More likely to form relationships filled with drama.
- Prone to clinical depression.

- Less likely to have children.

In sum, the pill wreaks havoc on relationships.

Concluding Statements

There are 16 million women in the US between the ages of 15-45 (the reproductive range). Over 80% use hormonal contraception. That means 80% of women capable of reproducing are on an unnatural hormonal cycle. This affects them emotionally, physiologically, and psychologically.

Moreover, the availability of contraception, Plan B, abortifacients, and the reduced stigma for abortion and single motherhood affects most modern women. With the hyper majority affected by the pill, it's fair to say that there is a difference between female hypergamy (in a state of nature) versus female hypergamy as it is affected by the pill. If a woman doesn't realize her hypergamic instincts when choosing a mate, but is then faced with this biological drive after marrying and coming off the pill, then this imposes catastrophic consequences on the marriage.

It may seem like an insurmountable task to significantly reduce the number of women on the pill, but any progress that is made in this endeavor will allow more women to avoid a chemically altered hypergamy, and return nature back to normal. This may be more important to society than we might imagine in realizing the joys and permanence of marriage.

This information presents modern men a significant opportunity to avoid a catastrophic marriage. If men add "no hormonal medication" to their list of vetting qualifications, then this can weed out women who are falsely attracted to them because of hormonal perturbations.

Women, avoid the pill! Your overall satisfaction in your relationships will be severely reduced, because it will cause you to be attracted to men who are not suitable genetic and biological matches for you, and you will miss out on a lifetime of joy and contentment that would have otherwise been possible if you had chosen the type of man God naturally intended you to have.

Men, avoid women on the pill! Men who are vetting women should avoid women on the pill altogether, because the feelings she elicits, and the structure of the relationship is under the influence of the pill's hormones, and so she cannot present herself in her natural, true state of emotion. In other words, it causes women to become inadvertent liars – liars in the sense that the emotional and psychological state they present to you while on the pill does not reflect their true, natural emotional constitution. If you marry such a woman, it will lead to inevitable catastrophe once she stops taking the pill.

Parents, if you love your daughters, don't ever put them on the pill!

God's way is best.

Related

- DoctorLisaLove: Brain Research into the Healthy and Unhealthy Impacts of Sex on Women and Men (2011 January 22)
- Redeeming Home: Should Birth Control Be Considered Healthcare? (2019 October 20)
- v5k2c2 (feat. Derek Ramsey): The Pill Causes Bad Mate Selection (2019 November 8)

A Study of Consanguinity in Modern European History

Jack · 28 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

How distantly are people related?

Readership: All; Those interested in tracing European ancestry;
Author's Note: This topic was requested by a reader, Julia Mykaele.
Length: 2,640 words;
Reading Time: 10 minutes;

Introduction

Consanguinity describes the close relationship between two people who are descended from a common ancestor, and this usually implies a sexual and/or marital union. A near synonym would be kinship, which distinguishes blood-relation from affinity.

In November 2019, this research article was published in Science.

J. F. Schulz, D. Bahrami-Rad, J. P. Beauchamp, J. Henrich, "The Church, intensive kinship, and global psychological variation", Science Vol. 366, Issue 6466, eaau5141 (2019 November 8).

Since its publication, this article has seen an explosion of reviews on MGM, including the following.

- NPR (feat. Rhitu Chatterjee): Western Individualism May Have Roots In The Medieval Church's Obsession With Incest (2019 November 7)
- Science Magazine (feat. Michael Price): How the early Christian church gave birth to today's WEIRD Europeans (2019 November 7)
- Scientific American (feat. David Noonan): Western Individualism Arose from Incest Taboo (2019 November 7)

All these news sources have a Leftist bent, especially NPR.

Here's a summary excerpt from the NPR article.

> He and his team looked at the records in the Vatican's archives and found that over the centuries, the Church kept widening the circle of relatives that one wasn't allowed to marry. "By early second millennium, they've extended it out to sixth cousins," he says.

> The bans didn't just include blood relatives — they also included relatives by marriage and spiritual relatives, he adds. There are also bans on adoption and remarriage.

> "If you eliminate adoption and remarriage, you prevent lineages from getting heirs and lineages literally die out," he says.

I'm no historian, but I can believe this really did happen – officially, that is.

> The researchers don't know the precise motivations behind these bans, but they think the limitations had a dramatic impact on how society was organized.

> That restructuring of societies in Western Europe in turn also benefited the church, notes Henrich.

> "In some sense, the church is killing off clans, and they're often getting the lands in wealth," he says. "So this is enriching the church. Meanwhile, Europeans are broken down into monogamous, nuclear families and they can't re-create the complex kinship structures that we [still] see elsewhere in the world."

The authors offer the argument that marrying farther outside your gene pool is better for enhancing the "virtues" of individualism, democracy, and culture. Taken further, this could argue for the support of interracial marriages as well (AKA miscegenation)*.

How prevalent is consanguinity in history?

After thinking about consanguinity for a while, I began to wonder, just how much consanguinity has occurred throughout history? I'm certain there's no hard data on this, so instead, I made a mathematical model that estimated the number of one's ancestors that would be alive at any time in history.

Of course, this model is purely theoretical, but it should give us a ballpark idea of how many ancestors would have to be alive for each generation if we required perfect non-consanguinity.

The model is based on the following presumptions.

- Each person has exactly two parents (of course).
- The age of reproduction is chosen to be 25 years old, which is probably close to the average.
- Each mating event occurs with absolutely zero consanguinity to any degree.

Based on these presumptions, we can form a parametric equation to relate the date to the number of generational cohorts alive at that time. This equation is $25n = 2^n$, where n is the generational iteration along one's genealogical ancestry. This equation generates the data listed in the following table.

I also compared this data to the world population estimates by year, which is also shown in the same table.

Who?	Ancestral Generation (n)	Years Ago	Date of Birth	Number of people in nth generation	World Population
You	0	0	2000	1	6,143,493,823
Parents	1	25	1975	2	4,079,493,909
Grandparents	2	50	1950	4	2,556,000,000
Great Grandparents	3	75	1925	8	2,000,000,000
You might have a few photographs	4	100	1900	16	1,650,000,000
	5	125	1875	32
Names only maybe	6	150	1850	64	1,200,000,000
	7	175	1825	128
	8	200	1800	256
	9	225	1775	512
Only Ancestry.com knows!	10	250	1750	1,024
	11	275	1725	2,048
	12	300	1700	4,096	610,000,000
	13	325	1675	8,192
People you don't know anything about	14	350	1650	16,384
	15	375	1625	32,768
	16	400	1600	65,536	500,000,000
	17	425	1575	131,072
Tribal Identity	18	450	1550	262,144
	19	475	1525	524,288
	20	500	1500	1,048,576	460,000,000
	21	525	1475	2,097,152
National Identity	22	550	1450	4,194,304
	23	575	1425	8,388,608
	24	600	1400	16,777,216	360,000,000
	25	625	1375	33,554,432
Continental Identity	26	650	1350	67,108,864
	27	675	1325	134,217,728
Ancestors surpass world population	28	700	1300	268,435,456
	29	725	1275	536,870,912
	30	750	1250	1,073,741,824
All ancestors in going up	31	775	1225	2,147,483,648
	32	800	1200	4,294,967,296	360,000,000

We can see that the number of ancestors within each generational cohort increases exponentially. As a result, the number of ancestral generational cohorts goes up by an order of magnitude every century.

Before I constructed this model, I had guessed that the number of cohorts might diverge about 2 to 3 millennia ago. But it blows up within a much shorter time span than I expected. The number surpassed the world population within just 700 years!

Of course, we know that can't happen in reality, so consanguinity must be occurring much sooner than 700 years ago, and not back in antiquity, as I had originally thought.

Cleo de Merode, dancer, beloved of Leopold II of Belgium. Born 27.9.1875 Paris, Died 17.10.1966 Paris. Portrait shot, 1902 (Nadar). Digitally colored.

A Study of My Own Ancestry

After seeing the surprising data generated from the model above, I decided to study some ancestral records carefully, to see whether consanguinity had occurred, how frequently, and to what degree.

My father had already put together a family tree based on interviews he had with his grandparents and two of his great aunts. So I had quite a lot of information about my ancestors back to my great-great grandparents ($n = 4$). But this information only took me as far back as the early-to-mid-19th century. I had nothing before that.

So I took what data I had, and used it to kick start a more exhaustive study of my pedigree on Ancestry.com. Even after spending more than 50 hours combing through census records and many other documents, I could only trace my ancestors back an additional century or so. The problems I encountered were as follows.

- Some of the ancestral information my dad had gathered from word of mouth through his ancestors did not match the records. Yet, other information in the records matched so accurately, that I knew it was the same person. From this I learned that older people don't tell their children and grandchildren all the gritty details about everything that happened when they were younger.
- Every new lead brought one or two more names to research.
- With so many names, it was hard to decide which lead (which branch) to pursue next.
- Many leads turned out to be dead ends (no information available).
- I spent most of my time comparing notes between possibilities, searching for some confirmation to verify the connecting relationship in question, just to be sure it was true/accurate.
- I eventually traced my ancestry back to people who were not born in the United States. At that point, if I wanted to go further, then I would have had to procure documents from Ireland and Germany, and pay a foreign professional (e.g. a bilingual genealogist/historian) to do the leg work of searching and sifting through the records. I'm not independently wealthy, so for a while, I felt like this was going to be the end of the search for me.

Maude Fealy (1881-1971), American actress, by Lizzie Caswall Smith, circa 1900-1910.
In summary, as you go farther back in time, it becomes more difficult to find information, and there is more uncertainty surrounding that information.

But as I continued to review all the ancestors I had studied, which by that point included more than 400 individuals, each with their own life stories, I stumbled across one connection to a family tree that had already been researched and developed – with some branches going all the way back to the late 15th century! (ca. 1480 AD) Apparently, I have a wealthy third or fourth cousin who had already paid a genealogist in Germany to research our ancestry. In addition, the ancestral branch that we shared had been very wealthy in medieval times, therefore many records for their major life events had been well maintained and well preserved.

Studying your genealogy is fascinating! Once you get back before the early 18th century, the names grow more grandiloquently bizarre. I found monikers like Achilles, Balthazar, Melcior, (males) and Drusilla, Gunakunda, Vinelda, (females), just to name a few. Perhaps it's just as interesting to see how familiar names have morphed into their modern equivalents, like Heinreich → Henry, Yachov → Jacob; Johann → John; Vilhelm → William; Others, like Peter, Michael, Elisabeth, and Margaret have never changed. It's amazing how many ancient Hebrew names have stood popular throughout time.

Also, if you take the time to piece together any one person's life story, it's truly amazing – and shocking. Keep reading for more on this.

Alexander Dumas

Consanguinity Within My Own Pedigree!?!

Back to the topic of consanguinity.

After studying this branch for a while, I found not one, but several married couples who lived in the 18th and early 19th centuries who shared a common ancestor living in the 16th or 17th century. But it wasn't quite as simple as a linear descent. For example, one couple in generation 9 shared one set of great-great-grandparents in generation 13, which means that the total number of great-great-grandparents between the two of them was 30 instead of 32

It gets more complicated. The two parents of the wife in generation 9 shared two different sets of great-great-grandparents in generation 14, along different branches of the family tree, which means that the total number of great-great-great-grandparents between the couple in generation 9 was 60 instead of 64.

The nearest consanguinity in degree that I was able to find was a couple who shared the same great-great-grandparents ($\Delta n = 4$). According to the records, it was very difficult for this particular woman to produce children. During her lifetime, she had 2 children that grew to adulthood and reproduced, but she had two more that died within the first year of birth, and 4 miscarriages.

There wasn't enough data to be certain, but I couldn't help but wonder if the repetitive consanguinity from generation to generation contributed to her impaired fecundity.

At first, this discovery shocked the $ħ!t out of me, because I thought it meant I had inbreeding in my ancestry. But then I realized that because of the bottleneck effect, my ancestry couldn't be much different from anyone else's, anywhere in the world. Now, I believe this is natural and common. We're all descended from Adam and Noah. Everyone is inbred to some degree. My father told me that once he calculated that everyone in the world is no more distantly related than 53rd cousins. Based on the model I described earlier, I would say that number is too high.

So what's "normal"?

Anyway, based on this example, you can see how the number of generational cohorts expands exponentially for the first five generations. But then over the course of the 5th to 9th generations, some degree of consanguinity occurs, eventually leading to a bottleneck effect in the total number of ancestral cohorts during the 12th to 14th generations. If you trace your ancestry back 16 generations (~ 400 years), you should find a total of 65,536 unique ancestors. If you find any fewer than this, then there's been some consanguineous shenanigans.

I imagine that these people never guessed that they were so closely related as they were. Think about it, how would you ever know whether the 256 (or so) people living 200 years ago whom you are descended from never once had any sexual relations with the 256 (or so) people living 200 years ago whom your spouse is descended from? This much is unknown, but we do have a large collection of popular lore which recounts stories of medieval peasants hopping from hole to hole like bunnies in a meadow. Sure, consanguinity was frowned on by the culture, and forbidden by the Catholic church, but promiscuity is as old as humanity, and they didn't have the certainty of DNA testing.

Cain flying before Jehovah's Curse, by Fernand Cormon (1880)

Social Environment Factors

There are some factors related to the social environment of early modern Europe to consider as well.

- People living during this time period didn't travel like we do today. Outside of military excursions for males, 90+% of the people were born, lived, died, and were buried in the same town, and this went on for centuries. I could believe that within just 200 years, everyone in a relatively large medieval town of 10,000 to 20,000 was no farther apart than 3rd or 4th cousin. (For example, Wittenberg had a population of nearly 5,000 during Luther's time.)
- Also, people tended to marry within their race and social class much more rigorously than we do today. This was especially pronounced for the ruling class. This produced an increased likelihood of consanguineous unions.
- Last but not least, we know that 100% of married couples were completely chaste, 100% of their lives! <<<sarcasm>>> Imagine how that tangles up the banyan tree even more. Here's another good reason why it should be called "branch swinging".

All of the above conditions increase the probability and frequency of consanguineous partnerships.

The View of the Zwolle, by Hendrick Ten Oever (1675)

Conclusions

We have the notion that a family tree is linear and two dimensional. But in reality, a family tree is more like a tangled mass of hundreds of coathangers.

It's true that the Catholic Church forbade consanguineous marriage within two degrees of separation. However, this was rarely enforced. The truth is that there were many people of all classes who married third or fourth cousins for various reasons. Most noteworthy of all is the sheer ignorance about precisely whom is included among one's kin relations. In addition, we can safely assume that there were many individuals who were borne of an illicit union, one which was never mentioned above a whisper, much less went into the official genealogy books.

In light of the above considerations, I'll conclude that the "scientific" authors' claim that the taboo of consanguinity (which was presumed to have been enforced by the Catholic Church) "created" western individualism is all conjecture. I can believe that certain direct lineages died out, but I'm not sure about whole tribal and clan identities, except in the case of a genocidal war. However, I could easily believe that individualism is a heritable trait common to all Western Caucasians. I suspect that all the hype over the taboo of consanguinity is merely a cover story intended to displace any arguments of heritability.

Ava Gardner (1944)

Footnotes

 On a side note, I don't believe there is any moral compunction for marrying outside one's race. Several noteworthy figures in the Bible had interracial marriages, including Moses, Salmon, Boaz, and Solomon, some for better, others for worse.*

However, in Jeremiah, God reprimanded the Israelis for taking foreign wives. There were several reasons for this.

- The men were divorcing their wives and abandoning their families for younger and presumably more attractive foreign wives.
- The men were being led astray into idolatry through the influence of their foreign wives.
- Interracial marriage en masse contributes to the weakening of familial bonding and lineage.

We also know how things ended for Solomon, as a result of being influenced by his foreign, pagan wives.

 For example, my great-grandfather (GGF) told my father that he and his younger sister had grown up in an orphanage since he was six. So they had always believed that their parents had died, and this was the story that everyone in my family believed. But after poking around on Ancestry.com, I found other census records showing that my GGF's mother lived a full 20 years after my GGF went to the orphanage, and that his younger sister was born* six years after his father had died. Apparently, once his father (my GGGF) kicked the bucket, his wife sold the farm, dumped the children at an orphanage, and skipped town to live a life of hedonism and harlotry. Even if anyone in my family did know the truth, it's obvious why they would not pass this information on to their progeny.

If any of my readers care to go digging around in their own family tree, I guarantee that you will eventually find sordid tales of sin and shame which your good old grandpappy would never pass down to you by word of mouth.

Sources

- Worldometer: World Population by Year
- Infogalactic: Consanguinity

Related

- Smithsonian (feat. Lila Thulin): The Distinctive ‘Habsburg Jaw’ Was Likely the Result of the Royal Family’s Inbreeding (2019 December 4)

Frenemy Class Warfare?

Jack · 31 August 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Is there really a class warfare in the West, or is it just a story cooked up to fan the flames of unrest? What part does the mass global media (MGM) play in this?

Readership: Conservatives;

War and Peace, by Medi Belortaja (2009 November 26).

In his essay at Amerika: Fixing (2020 August 10), Brett Stevens writes,

> "Globalism and diversity are the same idea, namely ending conflict by forcing everyone to be codependent on each other. This has failed."

Meanwhile, Elspeth writes,

> "What's really happening here is that class fissures are coming to bear and the people in power don't want the proletariat (working people) to see what's really happening to all of us, regardless of our color. So they create enemy classes: black/white, men/women. straight/LGBTQ+, and on it goes. So we bite and devour each other while they get rich on our backs, destroying small business, enriching gigantic corporations, brainwashing our kids, creating a new American paradigm by pretending we have no shared history when we do.
>
> And people on both sides are falling for it while calling each other ignorant."

In sum, Stevens says TPTB are ending conflict by forcing everyone to be codependent on each other, while Elspeth says TPTB are sparking conflict by creating enemy classes. Both Stevens and Elspeth are conservative voices. But yet, these two popular beliefs about Western political culture seem to be at variance with respect to their presumed goals concerning conflict.

Question for Discussion: Most conservatives presume that both of these viewpoints are true, but how?

An Update with More Clues

Apparently by providence, just after I wrote the above, I found that Ed Hurst addressed certain aspects of this question in his latest posts.

> "Culture is not merely the meandering results of custom or habit. Much of it comes from shared DNA. The Anglo-American culture arises from a genetic background that includes a high social trust factor. Anglo-American people have a strong tendency to comply with social expectations, so the culture naturally includes that feature. It is neither good nor bad in itself, but it comes with its own set of challenges.
>
> So long as early American immigrants were mostly from high-trust racial stock, things went well. Those who didn't bring a high trust factor from their homeland were quickly forced to adopt it artificially. The establishment was consciously aware of how much it mattered.
>
> Meanwhile, it turns out that the social elite never had that high trust factor. Royalty and nobility were seldom the same racial stock as the people they ruled. Gaining social and political privilege brought a perverse incentive to abandon it, anyway. But they definitely pressed the lower classes to keep it, and held forth a very strong pretense of high trust.
>
> Over the past century, that gulf of difference has grown. The elite have been quite conscious and intentional about it. The much maligned "conspiracy theory" mindset is frankly fully justified; the elite really do try to keep us in the dark. But it still leaks out, so there's no excuse for lacking awareness of the gap between the elite and the commoners.
>
> Now, shift back to current events. The commoners' right-wing backlash has begun in earnest. It's more than just the brawls in Portland between right and left mobs, or the shooting in places like Kenosha. The commoners are actually threatening the established order."
>
> Do What's Right: Push-back Is Inevitable (2020 August 30)

> "We know that shalom is exceedingly difficult to obtain, even when you are fully educated and committed to it. We must learn from the ANE perspective that it is a tendency of how God does things with the human race. It's not that God doesn't bless some with more of what appears to be shalom from where we stand, but that we have seen precious little of people striving consciously to fully embrace everything in Biblical Law. We have to remember that shalom is not the externalities, but the term is used in Scripture to portray a relationship with the Creator."
>
> Radix Fidem: The Bible on Trust (2020 August 30)

An Explanation of the Turmoil

I'll offer a possible explanation for my question above, as simply as it can be put.

TPTB (AKA "the elite") are trying to shoe-horn everyone into a one-size-fits-all society to be utilized as an economic powerhouse and/or a tax base, or something similar. Foreign wars, unregulated migration and immigration, housing bubbles, pandemic scares, bailouts, liberal snowf1ake education, presumed racial tension and gender discrimination (and the persecution of the "offenders" thereof), feminology and the glorification of h0m0sexuality, gynocentric legal regulations, abortion and birth control… and much more… These are all efforts to weaken the masses, destroy their individual cultures, and make them more compliant and willing to be molded. But in the final, the deplorables simply refuse to be corralled, partly for the reasons Ed mentioned above and also for many other reasons discussed by Stevens. In response, the people begin to percolate violence in a wrangling pursuit to restore Shalom and prosperity to their individual communities.

This might explain why traditionalism, patriarchy, and nationalism are suppressed, why the media continues to actively support all the maladies listed in the previous paragraph, and why they label nearly all violence as "peaceful protests" as an effort to tamp down large scale rebellion, but it doesn't explain the evidence that the violence and looting surrounding BLM was planned and staged by TPTB. Did TPTB somehow think that it would lead people to further forfeit their rights, or maybe it was fomented by some other entity? So my earlier question is still not entirely resolved.

In conclusion, we find that a large imperialist empire filled with multiple racial and ethnic groups simply can't work towards increasing the Shalom of its intrinsic societies, and therefore will fail after a time. This is essentially why God is against large empires likened unto the Tower of Babel – because it destroys the Shalom of the people. Furthermore, this is basically what Brett Stevens and Ed Hurst have been saying for years.

Related

- Σ Frame: How Social Media Algorithms Fuel Political Division (2018 December 15)
- Σ Frame: The Art of Inventing Hot Media Topics, and Then Trivializing Them (2015 November 12)

Moon Day Review – The Manosphere Reshuffles its Deck

Jack · 2 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

An update on how the Manosphere has changed in 2020.

Readership: All;
Note: September 2 is the ninth full moon of 2020.

Introduction

As we have been focused on political issues, dealing with societal upheaval, and squirreling away our lives during the COVID crackdown, the Manosphere has quietly been slipping away. This post takes note of the disturbances in the force. The last time I reviewed such changes was in the post, Moon Day Review – Crack and the Red Pill (2019 May 13).

There were several blogs that slowed down over the past couple months, and I've been waiting to see whether they were taking a summer reprieve, or else were slowly fading into the archives. I could always be wrong, but now I'm fairly certain about which way these blogs are going to fall. Only time will tell for sure.

I have not included blogs which went down more than one year ago.

My apologies for omitting any pertinent secular Manosphere blogs. Leave a link in the comments if you wish one to be included in the list.

Fading Blogs

(The authors no longer post with regular frequency.)

- Alpha Jedi
- Anti-Gnostic
- Black Label Logic
- Derek Ramsey
- Illuvitus
- Krauser PUA
- Larry's Musings
- Laughing at Feminism (Sharkly)
- Malcolm the Cynic
- Red Pill Theory
- Sub-Created Worlds (J. J. Griffing)
- The Autistic Gamer
- The Red Quest

Defunct Blogs

(The authors have ceased writing new posts.)

- Ballista74
- Blair Naso (Austin Martin)
- Calculated Bravery
- Dalrock
- Days of Game

- Donal Graeme
- Fabius Maximus
- Free Northerner
- Hawaiian Libertarian (Keoni Galt)
- Major Styles
- Steve Jabba
- Talon's Rest
- The Illiberal Liberal
- Things That We Have Heard and Known (Cane Caldo)
- v5k2c2 (Boxer)
- X-Splat

Terminated Blogs

(The web domain has been deleted, defunded, or deplatformed.)

- Chateau Heartiste (reconstructed site)
- Kakistocracy
- Moose Norseman
- Red Coco
- Saving Eve

Also of note, Scott Klajic says he won't be writing for the Manosphere again. That's probably good for him and his family, but bad for us.

New Blogs

- Cornerstone

- Joshua's Path
- Sharkly's expose of Whitewater Community Church
- The Biblicist Report (from the author of Biblical Gender Roles)
- To Reclaim Normality (Feeriker)

Revived Blogs

(The authors have renovated their site or image, or have resumed posting with greater frequency.)

- A Father's Journey
- Didact's Reach
- Full Metal Patriarchy
- Okrahead
- Marriage, Sex, and More (M. J. Davis)
- The Family Alpha (Zac)

Still Going Strong

(The authors continue to produce new posts on a regular basis.)

- Amerika (Brett Stevens, et al.)
- Biblical Gender Roles
- Captain Capitalism (Aaron Clarey)
- Christianity and Masculinity (Deep Strength)
- Dark Brightness
- Do What's Right (Ed Hurst)
- Eric Conn
- Gunner Q
- Gynocentrism
- Hommunism
- It's Good to be a Man
- Jim's Blog
- Lexet
- Mogadishu Matt
- Patriactionary
- Paul Elam
- Pushing Rubber Downhill (Adam Piggott)
- Radix Fidem (Ed Hurst)
- Red Pill Dad
- Rob Says…
- Roosh V
- SFC Ton
- Snapper TRX
- Soviet Men
- Spawny's Space

- Talon's Rest
- Texas Dom
- The Male Factor
- The Orthosphere
- The Other McCain
- The Rational Male
- The Red Quest
- The 96th Thesis (Matthew E. Cochran)
- Vox Popoli
- Warren Farrell
- Whiskey Tango Texas
- Whores and Ale
- Wintery Knight

Addendum: These lists have been updated to include the information offered by readers below in the comments.

Discussion

As you can see, there is a much greater number of Manosphere/Red Pill blogs making an exit than are making a debut. 34 going out, and 10 coming in, compared to 38 remaining steady. That's a huge turnover, and all within the last several months!

For those who have been following along, the real surprise is that this phase shift has been delayed for so long. The Manosphere chuggered to a metaphysical standstill in late 2018, and since then, uniquely new behavioral theories and cultural models have become extremely rare and of diminutive impact. Most of the philosophical (viz. morally neutral) perspectives have morphed into behavioral lore and praxeologies which continue to be discussed and are slowly leeching into the mainstream.

But even though the decade of the Classic Manosphere has passed (ca. 2008-2018), the movement is not completely dead. Instead of developing new theories, it is undergoing a philosophical breech concerning which applications continue to receive a focused interest.

Back in early April of this year, I put my finger on a schism that has developed between Christian Red Pill and secular Red Pill. This difference has become more pronounced since then. This schism might explain some of the present attrition in the Manosphere, as writers are pressured to conform to either a pro-Game player mindset, or else chase after a Christ centered relationship/marriage context. Many writers have been unprepared to make such a change or have grown weary in keeping up with these changes.

As things are now, secular RP authors are focusing on the pleasures of the flesh and the pride of life (e.g. lay reports, how to decrease approach-to-lay ratios, and gloating in the satisfaction of "enjoying the decline"), while the few remaining authors of the Christian Manosphere are continuing to produce insights with respect to Biblical proscriptions of morality and the spiritual significance of various nuances within specific contexts (e.g. marital sanctification, successful parenting, effective fatherhood, life-purpose, purity, etc.). There is still much more to be examined through a Biblical RP lens. So we can expect this trend to continue for the next few years or until there is a society-wide reset.

A suggestion for the hosts of fading blogs: Readers totally understand that life changes and that you no longer feel the need to churn out new content. It's hard work. However, you have some outstanding and perhaps even historically significant content that continues to be relevant. All that is needed is for you to mildly revise those older posts which are still pertinent and repost them. Publish or Perish!

Another suggestion for the hosts of fading, defunct, or terminated blogs: Recently, I have contacted a few noteworthy authors of the past and I have invited them to post their content (old or new) on Σ Frame. The few who have responded have flatly stated that it was too much work to maintain an active blog, and have expressed interest in submitting their work here from time to time. To all readers, if you have something to say, but don't want the responsibility of producing regular content, and you like this idea, I invite you to contact me at sigmaframe@protonmail.com.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Round Table of the Manosphere (2017 December 24)
- Σ Frame: The Evolution of the Red Pill (2018 December 31)
- Σ Frame: Red Pill Clique Bate (Page)

A Conversation About Human Potential and Purpose

Jack · 4 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Jack and Ed discuss the proper attitude about what a man can do in life, and the proper approach to what a man should be.

Readership: All; Christians;
Author's Notes: The content of this post is based on an e-mail conversation between myself and Ed Hurst at Radix Fidem. My words are in black. Ed's words are in blue.
Length: 2,700 words;
Reading Time: 10 minutes;

Under last Monday's post, Only noble born men are qualified to do housework for unicorns (2020 August 24), Ed Hurst left this comment.

> "The false god of "human potential" has worked a great evil in the world. All we really should aspire for is to please our Creator."

Ed's comment was directed toward women like the one in the post, those who go after worldly accomplishments, but who fail to achieve the most basic functions of femininity. But after thinking on this, I know the same applies for men too. This led me to examine my own life.

The Thinker, by the French sculptor, Auguste Rodin (1904).

Jack's Perspective

For much of my life, I've carried a work ethic loosely based on Ecclesiastes 9:10 and 11:1-6.

> [10] "Whatever your hand finds to do, do it with your might; for there is no work or device or knowledge or wisdom in the grave where you are going."

> Ecclesiastes 9:10 (NKJV)

> [1] “Cast your bread upon the waters, for you will find it after many days.
> [2] Give a portion to seven, or even to eight, for you know not what disaster may happen on earth.
> [3] If the clouds are full of rain, they empty themselves on the earth, and if a tree falls to the south or to the north, in the place where the tree falls, there it will lie.
> [4] He who observes the wind will not sow, and he who regards the clouds will not reap.
> [5] As you do not know the way the spirit comes to the bones in the womb of a woman with child, so you do not know the work of God who makes everything.
> [6] In the morning sow your seed, and at evening withhold not your hand, for you do not know which will prosper, this or that, or whether both alike will be good.”
>
> Ecclesiastes 11:1-6 (ESV)

The Sower, by Henri Naegely (1862-1875).

Most of my life, I’ve had no idea what I would be doing five years down the road. I’ve always worked hard at whatever came my way, and I haven’t been ambitious in terms of long range plans. (Sometimes I think I should have more of a long range plan, especially an economic plan. I think this would have helped me build a career with fewer false starts.) Sometimes I wonder if I would have shown more faith if I had just made an assertion like, “I’m going to be a teacher or professor” and worked diligently towards that end. But the only real goal I set for myself was to earn a bachelor’s degree, and I struggled very hard at that. But after that milestone was achieved, I feel like my Masters and Ph.D. came rather serendipitously, and the same goes for my becoming a professor.

I’ve always carried the idea that God wants men to work, to earn, and to provide for himself and his family. I’ve assumed that God wants me to achieve as much as I can, and so whenever a good opportunity came along, I always accepted it with thankfulness as part of God’s plan and provision.

In terms of my mission in life, it is not so clear to me how this fits together, but by the time I was 35, I had reached the roundabout conclusion that my mission in life is to influence others however I may through teaching (and/or writing).

Going back to Ed's statement, the questions in my mind right now are…

- How much human potential does God expect a man (or woman) to achieve?
- If a man doesn't achieve his full potential, wouldn't that be reminiscent of being a lazy steward?
- Likewise, for modern women like Tomi Lahren and the woman in Monday's post, there is a good deal of human potential that they have wasted, in terms of becoming faithful wives, mothers, and homemakers. Are they not bad stewards of their personhood?

I guess this all boils down to an assumption that God does value human potential, but the question is about knowing which aspects of human potential God expects one to develop according to His plan and His glory. As Ed put it, what would please our Creator?

This might be a complicated and confusing question, but I'm guessing there are some basic guidelines. The most obvious guidelines are the male and female roles outlined in Scripture. Men are to work at their life mission according to their respective calling, and women are to help the men and work in a domestic capacity.

The Gleaners, by Jean Francois Millet (1857)

Ed's Insight

There's nothing wrong with making plans if you sense a specific sense of calling in life. Of course, you still need to be ready for all the unexpected things God does as you pursue that path. There is a critical element in faith that we should expect the unexpected. It goes back to the way God portrays Himself as a desert sheikh, and how that image included a ruler who should not and could not tell all of His subjects everything he had in mind. There is an element of mystery that we humans need in order to serve faithfully and reach our divine potential. Good men surprise their wives now and then, no? It's the same for the Bride of Christ.

That's not the same as potential in terms of human reckoning. Thus, I used the term "false god of human potential." This is consistent with the teaching in James 4:13-16.

> [13] Come now, you who say, "Today or tomorrow we will go to such and such a city, spend a year there, buy and sell, and make a profit"; [14] whereas you do not know what will happen tomorrow. For what is your life? It is > even a vapor that appears for a little time and then vanishes away. [15] Instead you ought to say, "If the Lord wills, we shall live and do this or that." [16] But now you boast in your arrogance. All such boasting is evil.

>
> James 4:13-16 (NKJV)

Without that sense of divine purpose, no plans we make are right, even if we achieve everything our human nature dreams.

The Last Dreamers, by Griegory Zieolkowski (2018).

What matters most is that there is no one-size-fits-all. Some men should be so focused on the otherworld that they stumble along through life without accomplishing much that anyone remembers. If they have peace with God, that's all that matters. Some men are called by God to dig right into the ambient social expectations and point out how they compare with God's expectations. There is a place for the mendicant wandering monk and for the rich entrepreneur in the Kingdom of Heaven, and for everyone in between those callings. Whatever it is we might propose to define as "normal" needs to have soft boundaries. We can't call the mendicant "irresponsible" if he has been faithful to his calling. That includes the mendicants who manage to get married and raise families in poverty.

We should define "good responsible manhood" to include all the special cases where men find peace with God. A community still needs every peculiar type that Vox Day talks about in his Socio-Sexual Hierarchy. We need a bunch of the Deltas and a few Gammas, and even an Omega or two, in order for society to have all the parts God intended for His Body. A major element in a good solid faith community is taking in the strays nobody else knows how to handle. We need a lore of teaching about taking care of those edge cases and putting up with the resource drainage, because in the Kingdom of Heaven, the people are the real treasure. Jesus was a reject by worldly standards.

In sum, Ed is asserting that having peace with God is more important than one's mission. It makes sense.

Also, if one finds peace with God, then one's mission will become evident through one's convictions.

In addition, any Christ centered mission has to maintain that peace with God, or restore Shalom. Perhaps that is the whole purpose of having a mission.

This pretty much answers my earlier question. It's just a matter of one finding peace with God and growing in Shalom/maturity. Having a mission, and the nature of the mission, is a result of this.

Sisyphus, by Titian Vecellio (1548).

How Does One Find Peace and Purpose?

This seems to be an easy undertaking for some people, and very difficult for many others, even serious Christians. I'm not sure if it's because they can't or they won't, or maybe God won't open the metaphysical door for them. For me, the gospel is simple in concept, but it's very hard to get plugged into God. I've often wondered why it is so difficult for me (or anyone else) to get closer to God.

Of note, I discovered The Heart-Led Way since I started reading Ed Hurst's blogs, Do What's Right and Radix Fidem, in 2018. The idea of "not using your mind to decide where your heart should be" is a perspective I picked up from reading his stuff. Actually, this concept is mentioned in the Bible many times. For example…

> [5] Trust in the Lord with all your heart,
> And lean not on your own understanding;
> [6] In all your ways acknowledge Him,
> And He shall direct your paths."
>
> Proverbs 3:5-6 (NKJV)

And here…

> [17] "This I say, therefore, and testify in the Lord, that you should no longer walk as the rest of the Gentiles walk, in the futility of their mind, [18] having their understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God, because of the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart; [19] who, being past feeling, have given themselves over to lewdness, to work all uncleanness with greediness.
> [20] But you have not so learned Christ, [21] if indeed you have heard Him and have been taught by Him, as the truth is in Jesus: [22] that you put off, concerning your former conduct, the old man which grows corrupt according to the deceitful lusts, [23] and be renewed in the spirit of your mind, [24] and that you put on the new > man which was created according to God, in true righteousness and holiness."

>
> Ephesians 4:17-24 (NKJV)

Father Gregorius Vicenzo, by Lorenzo Lotto (1548).

But even though this shift in cognizance is spelled out clearly in scripture, and even though I grew up in church and have attended all kinds of churches over the course of my lifetime, for some bizarre reason I never really understood this very important, perhaps crucial piece of faith until I started reading Ed's writings. Maybe it's because The Heart-Led Path is not something you can just hear about and pick it up right away. You have to continually focus on what's going on deep in your heart and learn to navigate through life using your innermost convictions.

This kind of awareness is so far removed from the Western style of consciousness based on rationale, that I didn't really understand the idea until I had read Ed's stuff for several months, and even then, I didn't really "get it" for another year. Even now, I am still in the process of learning this.

I am still uncertain as to whether my past ignorance of The Heart-Led Way is the sole reason for my spiritual difficulties throughout life. I suspect maybe it is, but on the other hand, maybe it is not as simple as this.

The Adoration of the Shepherds, by Giorgione (1505-1510)

An Exhortation to Discover The Heart-Led Path

I didn't call it "heart-led" until a few years ago, myself. Prior to that I spoke of having conviction, which is very nearly the same thing. And I've known for most of my adult life that the Bible considers the heart the seat of the will, of faith and commitment. Someone shared an article with me about how the heart is a sensory organ, and it made so much sense that it was easy to put that idea into the existing frame of reference.

However, I've always known that I've been led by something deep and quite different from those around me. I've always known that there was a disconnection between what was and what ought to be, and I handled it rather poorly most of my life. I never understood why I had that powerful sense that nobody else seemed to have. Somewhere in adulthood I realized that many people do have it, but had been taught it was just their imagination, something they couldn't and shouldn't trust. Except that was wrong. Once I began to trust it more, it turned out to be the voice of God in my heart.

Hearing the voice of God, by Cat Culpepper.

Aside from one brief period of a few days, when the Lord was showing me something important, that voice has always been there for me. My reactions to it had been chaotic for most of my youth, because I had no training how to hear it, but somewhere around age 30 I began learning how to live with it. I once thought it was a sense of calling to pastoral ministry, and labored under that delusion for a very long time. It was the only guidance I got from people I trusted, so I trained for it. Only in the past decade did I realize it was not pastoral ministry, but a prophetic calling. Eventually I came to the place where I knew I was supposed to be a teaching elder, not a priestly leader.

Somewhere in there, I came to discern that few people have that strong sense of prophetic voice in their souls, but that apparently everyone can be heart-led. Honestly, I'm not happy with how that comes across in the English language, but I have no idea how else I can say it. But I do hope that, in community with others, we can spread this concept. I'm convinced that this is the path of peace with God.

God appears in a vision to the boy prophet Samuel, by Harry Anderson (1975).

Does it Resonate with You?

> "I've always known that I've been led by something deep and quite different from those around me. I've always known that there was a disconnection between what was and what ought to be…"

When I read those words, I felt that I had found a kindred soul. For most of my life, I have been deeply disturbed to find that the Truths found in the Bible don't reflect my experiences of reality. They have always appeared to be two, vastly distinct worlds. I have always been vexed about how the two might be reconciled, and angry that no one seems to recognize how their thoughts and behaviors reinforce the worldly system, and neglect to implement the Biblical system. Even those who profess to be Christians fail to realize how far away from the Truth they stand, nor do they carry any apparent sense of guilt about this discrepancy. From my perspective, there was hardly any detectable difference between believers and unbelievers. Yes, I've even been angry at God for being so nonchalant, for not taking any action to harmonize this disparity. Yet, God asks me to love and forgive all these people who have rejected me for not seeing the world as they do. It is a disheartening task.

I agree that it can be disheartening to find oneself standing alone in faith, but after a while, I got used to it. What's left is to be obedient to Him for the sake of obedience itself. Having to discard the Western obsession with product, and focus merely on getting the process right, was a major shift in thinking.

Where do you stand in the grand scheme of things?

Do you have peace with God?

Have you discovered The Heart-Led Way?

Have you found your purpose for living, your mission in life?

Related

- Radix Fidem: Practice of Purity (2013 December 19)

- Radix Fidem: The Necessity of Trust (2019 February 22)
- Radix Fidem: A Psychology of Temptation (2020 March 24)

Coram Mundo vs. Coram Deo

Jack · 7 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

One's righteousness before God is not the same as one's practicable value to men.

Readership: All;

God doesn't see things in the same way that man does

> "Can women who were s1uts in the past, but then had a "born-again" saving experience, really become pure and undefiled?"

I have seen this question come up again and again around the Manosphere.

Outside of the Manosphere, all arguments to this effect are essentially shaming Christian men for not eagerly marrying single mothers. A shame in itself.

Honestly, should Christian men pursue post-wall, Super-N Karens, and single Christian moms for marriage, as if they were the pick of the litter?

Matthew E. Cochran addressed this issue of confusion in a classic post, Do Single Christian Men Owe Marriage to Single Christian Moms? (2019 March 14). A relevant excerpt follows.

> Here, Parkison confuses righteousness coram deo (before God) with righteousness coram mundo (before the world). Before God, single Christian moms are indeed pure due to the imputed righteousness of Christ, which he mentions several times in the piece. But in this very same sentence, he judges Christian men coram mundo when he indicates that they don't deserve such a wife. After all, coram deo, Christian men are likewise pure and perfect. Accordingly, they truly deserve a spotless bride just as much as Jesus Christ does. In other words, Parkison is making an apples-to-oranges comparison here.

> What if we make an apples-to-apples comparison? Well, coram deo, there is no judgment to be made, for all the faithful are pure and perfect while all the unfaithful are totally depraved. That is precisely why Christians, when considering whether someone would make a good wife (or husband), always do so coram mundo. Coram deo, even the penitent but struggling prostitute is just as pure as the sinless Son of God. That doesn't mean she would make a good wife.

> As long as one thinks a man should actually evaluate a woman as a prospective wife rather than marrying completely indiscriminately, then it must be done coram mundo. And as long as any such evaluation is going to take place, then men are going to prefer debt-free virgins without tattoos, all other things being equal. The author desperately tries to tie that male preference for virginity to pimply 17-year-olds at youth camp, but as I've written before, that preference is rooted in natural law, biological reality, and God's Word – not in vanity as the author asserts. This God-given preference cannot and should not be overwritten by worldly philosophies, and none of the author's deceptive rhetoric changes anything on that count.

Apples to apples… Cochran makes a good point! If women can claim that Coram Deo trumps Coram Mundo, then why can't men do the same? Let's entertain this perspective for just a moment to see what this would look like.

> "I'm a short, obese man with Asperger's, 45 years old, uneducated, unemployed, alcoholic, and living in the basement of my parents house. Ever since I was 13, I've done nothing but play video games and jerk off to internet p0rn all day. Recently I just got saved! I'm going to AA, and getting sobered up (mostly). I've dropped the p0rn too (kinda sorta). But hey, Jesus loves me! I'm a new creation in Christ! So now, I should have a voluptuous supermodel Christian wife who loves to suck my 3 inch dong all day!"

Somehow, we know this just won't fly. But incredibly, women have the audacity to demand this same kind of nonsense from men! ROFLMAO!!!

Believe it or not, this is the same man!

The Two-Ring Circus of Life

There seems to be two rings in the circus of life. One ring is the spiritual realm, in which the Holy Spirit works inside an individual to restore his/her fellowship with God and make him/her more Christ-like. This is all up to God. The other ring is the socio-sexual realm, in which what an individual does with him/herself in this world with whatever God has given him/her. This is all up to the individual.

Just like Barnum and Bailey's famous three-ring circus, the events in each ring happen simultaneously and independently. But the events in each ring are also broadly coordinated with the others such to make up the entire presentation. Things that happen in one ring can and do affect what happens in the other.

For some people, namely those who had a good upbringing, the cause and effect relationship between the two is easily discernable. But for others, usually those from broken or dysfunctional homes, it might take years of trying and testing (and screwing up their lives) to figure it all out. Speaking from experience, generational curses can introduce a load of falsehood which is difficult to identify, clouds the understanding, and skews the perception of reality. I can recommend a liturgy of reading for those who are up against such a challenge.

Concluding Statements

Many false arguments have arisen because people ignorantly confuse Coram Mundo and Coram Deo. They have the notion that if one is pure and spotless before God, then the same person should also be pure and spotless before men. But it just isn't so.

Similarly, people like to believe that if a person is attractive and popular, then such a person is good, even "godly", whatever that might mean. There might be some correlation when we look at broad averages. But technically, there is no such association.

God is interested in a person's spiritual constitution. Man is interested in a woman's sexual constitution. There is a difference whether people want to accept this or not. Contrary to what any popular culture stresses, there is no true moral compunction imposed by recognizing this difference. Wisdom dictates that a man must consider the entire constitution of a woman he proposes to marry. The same holds true vice versa. Coram Mundo.

For those who cling to the hope that God is somehow going to transform fornicators, Harley McBadboys, Chadwick Edcads, Karens, Katies, s1luts, wh0res, carousel riders, and single mothers into righteous, faithful, Christian husbands, wives, fathers, and mothers, do not be disappointed when this fails to pass. If it does come to pass, then such an event is no small miracle by the grace of God. Such individuals have made their decision about who they are, and therefore, God, in his righteous justice, is bound to respect their choices, thereby allowing them to experience all the joys, sorrows, and consequences, good and bad, of such a choice. It is not for us to determine the outcome of another soul's constitution according to our desires, needs, and willful expectations.

Why should so many men wish to reward a woman's sexual indiscretions with the honor of matrimony and the lifelong investment of marriage? The very idea is foolish, even ludicrous, and challenges the justice of God. Do not condone their desperate deceit and defraudation. Do not give ear to the frantic pleas of those who must needs pay the piper after prancing the dance of the faithless. Instead, let God do His work. Let their sufferings lead them to repent from their ways. After all, they chose this path in life. There will always be motorcycles, fuzzy cats, and red wine to take up the slack. Coram Mundo.

For those who desire purity and a pure marriage partner, for those who wish to avoid the consequences of sexual sin and obtain full sanctification in marriage, it should be stressed that you must necessarily accept all the sorrows and loneliness that accompany obedience, and that you will need to make difficult decisions in vetting for a spouse. Coram Mundo.

May God have mercy on our souls, Coram Deo.

Related

- Derek L. Ramsey: What Constitutes Biblical Marriage? (2018 February 1)
- Cane Caldo: Discussion of Whores IV: No Good Words for Bad Deeds (2019 March 18)
- Christianity and Masculinity: How does Humility play into Headship and Leadership? (2019 March 25)

Patheological Weddingsday – Did Purity Culture Undermine Christian Identity?

Jack · 9 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Do sexual behaviors determine one's identity?

Readership: Christians, especially those who were involved in the Purity Movement;
Length: 2,300 words;
Reading Time: 8 minutes;

Foreword

Earlier this year, I wrote a series of posts about the Purity Movement. Recently, I had a few referrals from Patheos, and when I checked out the source, I noticed a few posts about Purity Culture at Patheos, written by Jackson Wu.

In these posts, the author uses words like idolatry, morality, identity, and he refers to "Honor, Guilt, and Fear societies" by which he means Honor vs. Shame, Righteousness vs. Guilt, and Power vs. Fear ethical systems. Because of the vast number of similarities in philosophical frame and vocabulary, I am totally convinced that the author has been reading my posts on Purity Culture and cultural anthropology's ethical systems.

While I was perusing these articles, I also did a search for "purity" and found a treasure trove of articles about the Purity Movement!

Ever since butting heads with Susan Titkemeyer, who is an author there, I've become very critical about anything that comes out of Patheos, so I decided that these articles deserve some critical review.

Because of the sheer volume of articles at Patheos covering the Purity Movement (more than 70, as of September 1, 2020), I've decided to start a writing project which will address these articles. As a tentative plan, I intend to cover one article a week, which I will facetiously name, "Patheological Weddingsday", to be published on Wednesdays.

Now on to the critical critique.

How Purity Culture Undermined Christian Identity

The first article I'll review at Patheos was written by Jackson Wu and is about How Purity Culture Undermined Christian Identity (2020 August 5).

> "I have heard people say that purity culture preached a "sex prosperity gospel." The basic message went something like this: If you don't have sex before marriage, you will have wonderful marriages with amazing sex."

I do agree that purity culture toted a "sex prosperity gospel", and I believe this heavy emphasis on sex is what drew the crowds in, for one reason or another. The problem is that the average young person who went after this were more interested in maximizing their sex lives than in pursuing sanctification and glorifying God with their bodies. It was clear to everyone that sex belonged in marriage, and a few people (such as myself) recognized that sex should be a part of sanctification, but exactly how that was supposed to happen was not something that anyone knew anything about, much less taught.

There is some truth in this message, "If you don't have sex before marriage, you will have wonderful marriages with amazing sex." But it was more or less an empty promise, or at most, one with a low probability of fulfillment, because the social structure necessary to reinforce the blessings of chastity was lost sometime in the early 20th century.

The author quotes Joshua Harris here.

> "There are all kinds of categories of sin where we sin and we don't change our status, like you know, if you lie, you don't say, "Oh well, I'm no longer, you know, a lying virgin or something…." [laughter] We just don't think that way. We just say, "You know what? I sinned. I want to repent of that. I want to move forward."

> But with this issue, it's like, if you have sex, you're no longer a virgin, you know, it's like your status has somehow changed."

Harris was almost right about this point. It isn't one's social status that has changed, per se, but the constitution of one's body, especially the endocrine system, the immune system, the nervous system, and the reproductive system, and this has a significant impact on one's social life and spiritual life. St. Paul described this phenomenon as follows.

> "Flee sexual immorality. Every sin that a man does is outside the body, but he who commits sexual immorality sins against his own body."
>
> 1st Corinthians 6:18 (NKJV)

There might be several ways to interpret the meaning of this passage, but to me, it means that illicit sex "programs" the body to respond to sex as a self-serving utility accompanied by guilt and shame, rather than a passionate form of love, marital bonding, and reproduction. And apparently, this programming is permanent.

Continuing Harris' quote…

> "And I think that's an emphasis on one particular sin out of the millions of ways that we can sin that I think is actually not healthy. It makes the focus not so much "Who am I in relationship to God, who loves and relates to sinners and shows grace to sinners." It becomes this "Do I have this badge and this identity of being a virgin?"

> And if I don't have that, then I feel like I've lost something and I'm no longer as valuable… I think that led a lot of us astray."

Again, Harris makes the mistake of correlating virginity with holiness and social status, rather than correctly assessing how sexual activity alters one's body chemistry and decreases one's MMV, especially for women. In a less perverse society where a majority are pursuing sexual purity, extramarital sex can become a mark of shame. But in this day and age, this kind of social environment has to be artificially created within a small church community. It's not the same, because instead of encouraging people to face up to their sin and pursue righteousness, it only encouraged those who failed to leave the church. To cite a bit of penal philosophy, "The surety of punishment is a greater motivator than the severity of punishment."

The author concludes,

> "In effect, purity culture conveyed the idea that this one particular sin — sex outside of marriage — would lead a person to perpetually being stained. This link between one sin and an altered identity has led to decades of turmoil for many people who have struggled to untangle sex and shame."

The author buys into the same false associations that Harris did without seeing the real connection between sin and shame, namely, that outside of Christ's forgiveness, you cannot untangle illicit sex and shame, no matter how much one might desire to do so. Shame as an emotion is experienced by those who know they failed to meet the behavioral expectations put upon them. There are only two solutions: (1) abandon the social group that imposed those expectations, or (2) repent and accept God's forgiveness. Purity culture made option (1) an easier and ostensibly better choice than (2). And no matter which path is chosen, one's identity, body chemistry, and social standing (i.e. MMV) cannot be changed. God may remove a person's sin and shame, but not the real world consequences of one's sin.

Isn't Sin Part of One's Identity?

Next, the author poses the question,

> "How did the purity movement magnify one specific sin such that it seeming changed one's identity in ways that other sins did not?"

He suggests two answers.

1. Idolatry
2. Purity Language

Let's take a look at what he says about each of these two points.

Part 1 – Idolatry

> "First, the movement subtly reinforced the idolatry it opposed. Harris underscores an irony. In short, the purity movement presents "sex as the most important thing to sell abstinence." Christine Gardner, the author of Making Chasity Sexy, chronicles various ways that rallies and music were used to get people excited about sex only then to say, "Don't have sex." […] In an odd way, "Don't have sex" acts similarly to the command "Don't think of a pink elephant." The heightened attention and exaltation of sex undermine the movement's own goals."

This is totally true. One cannot avoid something by continually dwelling on the idea. As long as that idea is in one's mind, one will always gravitate towards that thing. The reason this doesn't work is because one is relying on one's own resolution and will power (AKA "efforts in the flesh"), and not on the power of the Holy Spirit. This is why the renewing of the mind is so important. (Romans 12:2)

> "These methods of purity culture infuse kids with idolatrous thinking that isolates one blessing above all > others. It never dislodges the idolatry of sex. It isolates one blessing among others." […] Physical intimacy is no longer seen within the larger plan and promise of God for creation. Such reductionism isolates and then privileges different parts of life. We begin to define ourselves in terms of one sin or social sphere."

Yes, focusing on one certain blessing — sex, whether it be one's present sexual purity, or one's future sexual fulfillment, and trying to make deals with God in the matter – "If I keep my virginity until marriage, then God will grant me a beautiful marriage with lots of mind blowing sex" — all this constitutes a system of works motivated by idolatrous hopes. The author is not being as clear on the issue as I would prefer, but he has the right idea.

However, the last sentence is a bit confusing. "We begin to define ourselves in terms of one sin or social sphere." This is only true if we redefine sin to be anything that upsets one's idolatry or social prestige. In fact, our unique sins (according to God's definition of sin) define our identity, and God in His ineffable grace uses a believer's sinful identity for His glory.

Woman at the Well, by Howard Lyon.

Part 2 – Purity Language

> "Second, the movement exploited purity language without realizing the potent effect of the metaphor. For example, many kids in the 1990s publicly confirmed their decision to remain abstinent by wearing purity rings. Similar rituals continue today. In one documentary, we see families and communities hold galas where the girls wear white dresses to celebrate their virginity.

The author is trying to make the case that festivities and wearing certain attire is a manifestation of idolatry. But in fact, sexual continence and virginity are so rare in this day and age, that it's truly a big deal! Wearing white is not idolatry in of itself, but because of the rarity, it is perceived to be such by those who can't do the same. It also arouses envy and s1ut-shaming, which are social no-no's.

> "Richard Beck's Unclean contains one of the most profound treatments on the relationship between morality and purity language (chapter 3, "Morality and Metaphor"). All metaphors assume a certain logic. Our minds > often fail to notice the implicit logic one welcomes when accepting a certain metaphor."

No, people understood the metaphors and the implicit logic with crystal clarity. It was the moral implications which people found difficult to swallow.

> "When a person becomes "unclean" or "impure," one needs a remedy. Unclean people attempt to regain their purity. However, virginity is not something that can be regained. Just as women cannot be "sort of pregnant," neither is someone "sort of" a virgin. You are or you are not. There seems to be no remedy."

Actually, a lot of young people tried to skirt around this technicality by redefining virginity. I dedicated two posts to explore this deceptive strategy.

- Σ Frame: On the Definition of Virginity (2020 April 22)
- Σ Frame: Pseudo-Sex and Technical-Virginity (2020 May 11)

> "When "virgin" becomes a fundamental identity claim, what happens? Church kids who have sex before marriage then come to feel they have become moral lepers."

Dreamers Awake, by Loie Hollowell.

Well, one's sexual proclivity is a fundamental facet of one's identity, and purity culture got this much right. Note that he identifies the feeelz as the main issue of contention. Actually, if an offender feels ashamed of having illicit sex, then he/she can be thankful that he/she has a good conscience. But it seems like the author is saying (to put it bluntly) that young people should be able to do as they d@mn well please, and still be valued as a member in good standing, or (more generously) that it's not right that Church kids who have sex before marriage should have to face any negative repercussions. But the fact that there are negative consequences is the same reason why God told us not to do such things!

In effect, this kind of argument is trying to get around the conundrum of sin by insinuating that the condemnation of sexual sin is wrong, and that anything that compounds a healthy sense of shame is wrong. I will admit that it might be counterproductive for a church to aggravate one's feelings of shame and condemnation if one is nearing repentance or has already repented. But if repentance is not on the horizon, then this is the same as telling God, "Butt out of my life and let me sin as I please. I'll find a way to make others pay for the consequences. And don't You dare try to discipline me!"

Concluding Statements

Young Christians (not just those who were involved in the purity movement) are faced with a dichotomous choice in life – to be obedient, or not to be obedient. But people want to taste all the joys and pleasures of disobedience and obtain all the blessings of obedience. People will cook up all kinds of lies and deceptions in their efforts to attain both. This is the fundamental sin of idolatry which the author should have stated more clearly in his discussion of idolatry.

The real problem with the purity movement is that the church did not give young people a true choice of either (1) pioneering their own path in life (outside of the church), or (2) submitting to God. Either choice might find redemption through God's grace, but instead, the choice was legalistically presented as a dualistic "All or Nothing", which excluded the possibility of discovering God's grace. As such, leaving the church (after an infraction) became a punishment (either external or self-imposed), and not a choice.

Related

- Σ Frame: The Sin of Prioritizing Purity above Marriage (2020 January 17)
- Cornerstone: The "Purity" Movement 2 (2020 February 22)

The gospel is relevant to all, not just guilty bad boys.

Jack · 11 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

God touches different people according to their needs.

Readership: All; Christians;

In the comments under a previous post, A Conversation About Human Potential and Purpose (2020 September 4), Jeff Barnes wrote,

> Below is a quote from an article exploring differing understandings of original sin.

> "It is suggested by those in the Orthodox Church that the doctrine of ancestral sin naturally leads to a focus on human death and Divine compassion as the inheritance from Adam, while the doctrine of original sin shifts the center of attention to human guilt and Divine wrath. The image of an angry, vengeful God haunts the Western Church where a basic insecurity and guilt seem to exist."

> Having in addition been brought up in a Calvinist church whereby the doctrine of total depravity is emphasised, to me it seems little wonder that I have had trouble listening or trusting my heart. Learning about the orthodox teaching of synergy between God's grace and our wills is helping me understand my connection with God. I never thought the doctrine of original sin was just and now I find that it is in fact a heresy contrary to early church teaching. I really wrestled with believing the gospel as it was taught to me because it had been presented as penal substitutionary theory, now I can breathe a sigh of relief knowing that is another heresy. I am not sure whether my spiritual intuitions are more on point than the average person or if being an independent minded thinker caused me to so uncomfortable with many Protestant heresies I had grown up with, but in any case I praise God for revealing to me the truth and beauty of Orthodox theology.

I tend to believe that the modern church has gotten distracted in all the discussion of ancestral sin vs. original sin, monergism vs. synergism, free-will vs. predestination, and so on. These philosophical exercises have all produced continual schisms and divisions within the Body of Christ, leading to Orthodoxy, Catholicism, Calvinism, Lutheranism, Armenianism, and so on, and resulting in a thousand different sects and denominations. I do not mean to say that any of these are false heresies, but that they are merely academic models of Christianity as a religion. These concepts may help one understand and communicate what they are experiencing in their own spiritual lives, but seldom does a theological argument convince anyone to believe in Christ. (Wintery Knight might disagree.) Notice what the scriptures say.

> [10] For with the heart one believes and is justified, and with the mouth one confesses and is saved. [11] For the Scripture says, “Everyone who believes in him will not be put to shame.” [12] For there is no distinction between Jew and Greek; for the same Lord is Lord of all, bestowing his riches on all who call on him. [13] For “everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved.”
> [14] How then will they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how are they to believe in him of whom they have never heard? And how are they to hear without someone preaching? [15] And how are they to preach unless they are sent? As it is written, “How beautiful are the feet of those who preach the good news!”
> [16] But they have not all obeyed the gospel. For Isaiah says, “Lord, who has believed what he has heard from us?” [17] So faith comes from hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ.
>
> Romans 10:10-17 (ESV)

Notice in verse 10, it does not say, “For *with the mind (or by maintaining intellectual fidelity and integrity) one assents to cognitive agreement and is justified…” No, it says, “with the heart one believes (or trusts) and is justified (by faith)”.

St. Basil’s Cathedral in Moscow Russia.

Two chapters later, Paul goes on to explain that after the heart believes, the mind must be renewed.

> [2] Do not be conformed to this world, but be transformed by the renewal of your mind, that by testing you may discern what is the will of God, what is good and acceptable and perfect. [3] For by the grace given to me I say to everyone among you not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but to think with sober > judgment, each according to the measure of faith that God has assigned.

>
> Romans 12:2-3 (ESV)

In sum, attention to the heart must come first, followed by the readjustment of the mind. This is the crucial point that many modern iterations of Protestantism have skipped over entirely. To emphasize any kind of theorology, and ignore the exposition of a heart-based faith in Jesus is a heresy in itself.

I'll continue on with Jeff's comment.

> I relate to this: "I've always known that I've been led by something deep and quite different from those around me. I've always known that there was a disconnection between what was and what ought to be…" In my view, that is typical of someone with introverted intuition as their dominant cognitive function or at least in a valued position.

I also see the giant discrepancy between the vision Jesus lays out for us and how the average Christian acts. And those that see they fall short, often fall into the sin of despair and then label it humility, (I got that from someone else, and I think it is a bit of pithy brilliance.). To me Jesus most defining trait, or the one most impressed on me was his virtue of humility, and if I look at myself and others our greatest sin tends to be pride."

I do believe that most all Christians in the West have been exposed to the gospel as a "penal substitutionary theory", as Jeff and I have. I do not view it as a heresy, but rather, it is just one perspective of the Gospel that would especially resonate with someone who has a lot of guilt and shame, and who might question how God can remove that burden. While it is true that everyone has a spiritual deficit such as this, not everyone perceives this as an acute spiritual need, and it therefore fails to touch their hearts and lives as the gospel should.

The way I see it, the shortcoming in how the gospel is presented in the modern Church today, is that it focuses too heavily on Jesus as a Savior (the penal substitutionary exegesis), and it fails to outline any of the other equally valid perspectives of the Gospel which would resonate with others who come from a different background and who perceive themselves as having different spiritual needs.

To iterate this idea further, I'll offer the following examples.

- Someone with a poor or absent father figure would most appreciate a gospel that frames God as a loving Father.

- Someone who has been neglected or abused needs to hear about God as a provider and protector.
- An unpopular or disadvantaged person needs to know Jesus as a friend.
- A person who is proud, distrustful, or fearful needs to know how humility, sacrifice, and forgiveness can generate life, love, and joy.
- A person who grew up in a dysfunctional or broken home needs to experience acceptance and fellowship in God's family of believers.
- Someone who grew up in an emotionally and spiritually dead environment needs to experience the joys and blessings of shalom.

And yes, there is a new market niche for the gospel since the advent of 4th Wave Feminism.

- Feminist wives need to learn about Jesus as an authoritative husband who offers genuine fulfillment but who also demands obedience.
- Soyboys need a gospel that focuses on Jesus as a powerful conqueror and a victorious overcomer.
- Incels need a Christian "Red Pill" gospel to give them confidence, hope, and a sense of purpose in life.

I'm sure there are many other perspectives of the Gospel that I have not included in this list. But my point is that what each person would consider to be the redemptive element of the gospel is a message containing the aspect of God that gives them what they are missing the most in their spiritual life. In other words, the gospel is best presented as that which arouses a person's heart to trust in God. The heavily toted fire and brimstone gospel only reaches the most hedonistic of individuals, and only at the moment they are ready for it.

Related

Ed Hurst has written a series of posts about the nature of a heart-based faith.

- Radix Fidem: The Seeds of Shalom (2020 September 2)
- Radix Fidem: Clinical Evidence for Heart-led (2020 September 4)
- Radix Fidem: What's on Your Heart? (2020 September 5)

A Revised Understanding of Game

Jack · 14 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The core essence of Game is charisma, discernment, and setting boundaries.

In a previous post on Σ Frame, On the Spiritual Significance and Social Value of Game (2019 November 3), I made the point that Game is not necessarily an anti-Christian behavior. It's only anti-Christian when it's used to seduce women for illicit sex and STR's. On the contrary, Charismatic Gamesmanship may very well be the main thing that keeps a rocky marriage together during a rough patch, and it's very common for marriages to be rough during the first five years.

Granted, this type of Game is different from typical PUA Game. We might call it 'Father Game', or 'Young Husband Game'. The motives are to protect the girl's vulnerabilities of her immature naïvety from any Satanic attacks of indignant dissatisfaction and the plunder of PUA types. Some future discussion may be necessary to further define 'Shepherd Game'.

Looking Glass wisely writes [emphasis mine],

> "The crux is of the issue that Cane [Caldo] was having is that Feminism, Chivalry, and Game act as semi-understandable "poles" within the discussion frame, which radically limits the ability to hone into the problem. This is why the undermining of language has been so important, as the inability to properly define a topic makes it fiendishly difficult to explain the problems with it. For the Christian, we are to be different, which should result in us acting different. This entire long discussion has simply been sorting through the definition issue, thus opening our eyes to the truth."

To further this discussion, here I want to point out something that has been roundly neglected in the definitions and discussions of Game.

The backbone of solid Game is charisma combined with a steady maintenance of healthy socio-spiritual boundaries (AKA "detachment"). Everything else about Game can be summed up as a technique, a strategy, or an asset.

If a man doesn't have charisma and boundaries, but he's relying on assets and pressing hard on Game techniques and strategies, then he's little more than a dancing monkey, as many have complained about how they feel when attempting to practice Game.

There has been some argument that Game only works for certain men, but not others. The real difference between men who are proficient at Game, and those who are lousy at it, is that the former are those men who have charisma and who are mindful of their personal boundaries, whereas the latter are those who do not. The question of whether a man can develop Game largely depends on whether he has, or can develop charisma and become aware of metaphysical boundaries. The answer to this question is not so clear, because discernment is required to maintain one's boundaries, and charisma is a spiritual gift of the Holy Spirit.

Now, many readers might be wondering, if charisma is a spiritual gift of the Holy Spirit, then why is it that all these "charismatic" Game practitioners are using their "spiritual gift" to sin? If the result is fungible fornication, then how can it be a spiritual gift of the Holy Spirit? The answer is simply because God gives spiritual gifts to one man and not to another as He sees fit. It has nothing to do with Christianity, strength of faith, or belief in God. From what I can tell, having charisma isn't connected to being a Christian any more than having blue eyes or having money in the bank is connected to being an American citizen.

I'm sure this news will come as a very uncomfortable truth for many Christian men. However, you can always pray for more discernment and more charisma. As the scriptures say,

> "If any of you lacks wisdom, let him ask God, who gives generously to all without reproach, and it will be given him."
>
> James 1:5 (ESV)

It should be noted that discernment is a prerequisite for wisdom. So if you pray for wisdom, then your discernment will grow.

Here, I should caution men who pray for wisdom (discernment) and charisma. Once your discernment increases, you'll suddenly become aware of many things that went on all around you which you were never aware of in the past. You'll begin to sense what I call "vibes", and you'll detect IOI's from more women. As a result, the temptation you'll face will also be much stronger. So beware, it will be a shocker!

It will become unnecessary, even irrelevant, for a man to dig any deeper into the science of attraction if he can develop discernment, wisdom, and charisma, and learn to mind his boundaries.

Related

- Σ Frame: On the Spiritual Significance and Social Value of Game (2019 November 3)
- Σ Frame: Why does Game work? (2019 December 9)

6 Fundamental Goals Feminists have for Social Change.

Jack · 18 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Feminism's Micromanagement of Gynocentric Idolatry.

Readership: All
Length: 2,800 words;
Reading Time: 10 minutes;

Introduction

About a year ago over at Boxer's place, fellow Manospherian Derek Ramsey outlined several "problems" with the basic philosophy and implementation of Feminism in his post, The Definition of Feminism (2019 September 21). These problems are listed as follows.

1. Equal opportunity is incoherent because men and women are different, not equal.
2. The conundrums involved in equality of outcome (as opposed to equality of opportunity).
3. In reality, Feminists seek inequality—of opportunity and outcome—favoring women.
4. Feminists treat opportunity as a Zero Sum Game.

Here, I wish to point out that it is impossible for these problems to ever be properly resolved because they are intrinsic characteristics of the female mindset. Consider the following.

Rollo's Cardinal Rule of sexual strategies (2015 January 5) speaks to the first and fourth points by proscribing a Zero Sum Game.

> "For one gender's sexual strategy to succeed, the other gender must compromise or abandon their own."

Dalrock's Law addresses the second and fourth points of application. For those new to the 'sphere, Dalrock's Law of Feminism (2018 September 6) states,

> "Feminism is the assertion that men are evil and naturally want to harm women, followed by pleas to men to solve all of women's problems."

Ramsey emphasizes the third point and assumes the fourth point in Derek's Law of Feminism (2019 October 1), which states,

> "The best definition most consistent across all flavors of feminism is the promotion of gender inequality favoring women, that is, female supremacy."

In summary, the Feminist perspective assumes a Zero Sum Game, not only in terms of opportunity, but for all social interaction. Thus, it may be insightful if we were to examine Feminism, not only as a corrupt social movement, and a hoodwinking philosophy, but also as a large-scale, culture-wide social game.

It is important to note here, this assertion that either the male, or the female, but not both, can "win" by exacting their respective prerogatives in the relationship are primarily the feral views of the female sex. (The Manosphere reached these conclusions by observing females.) In contrast, marriage minded men have the understanding that a Positive Sum Game is necessary, in order to produce a family unit – a long lasting union conducive to deep contentment and the rearing of children. Thus, the demise of marriage is largely a result of women clinging to the Zero Sum Game strategy in their stubborn insistence on winning.

As soon as wimmin realize that they must change their mating strategy for a LTR to work, it becomes tempting for them to either (1) seek to control the man through various means, or (2) bow out of the union and go off seeking a better playing field – especially when responsibilities come home to roost. To carry either of these two options to fruition without subjective impunity, Feminism as a social movement must achieve a multitude of goals, which must be continually coddled and nurtured to bring them to fruition. The most impressive thing about this scheme is that the feminist reach for control extends beyond the clutches of any individual woman, to envelop government policies and societal norms.

The remainder of this post will identify and discuss six of these goals, along with the motivations and Purposes behind the Zero Sum Game of Feminism.

1. The Primary Goal of Gaining Authoritative Control

The goal of gaining authoritative control is perhaps the one goal with the most strategic benefit, because this gives gynocentric idolaters the power to attain various other goals (to be discussed below).

Wimmin often state that men should have control, especially self-control, but this admission is only offered in the context of Chivalrous service to wimmin, so that men can become more capable servants in doing what wimmin want them to do.

The motives behind the primary goal of control have (at least) three main purposes.

1. To attain self-sufficiency and self-determination.
2. To manipulate the social environment in favor the Feminine Imperative.
3. To control men for the purpose of serving feminine interests.

The purpose of the first motivation will become self-evident in the following discussion. Several expressions of the purposes of the second motivation will be discussed in later sections. The third motivation remains as an underlying theme for all intents and purposes.

Of note, this greed for authority and control is alluded to in Jack's Law of Feminism (2019 January 18):

> "Feminism is the assertion and justification of women's rejection of male authority in favor of an institutionalized social ontology which is dictated by the Feminine Imperative."

The Feminine Imperative at its worst, is nothing more than solipsistic, hamster fueled, self-willed, self-determination, where carnal pleasure and hedonistic liberty abound.

Les Demoiselles d'Avignon, by Pablo Picasso, 1907.

2. The Goal of Self-Determination

Psychological self-determination (not to be confused with political self-determination) is essentially pursuing activities according to one's interest, enjoyment, and inherent satisfaction.

To be fair, a certain amount of self-determinism is necessary for healthy psychological growth and emotional maturity. As such, self-determination is not inherently wrong or immoral, but should rightfully be implemented such to achieve the well-being of the entire family, and not just the wimminz personal interests. Making this adjustment is one of the primary challenges to newlywed wives.

To effectively optimize inherent potential, self-determination needs to be nurtured and disciplined by external loci, such as a father figure, or a structured social environment, like a family or a peer group.

However, many women obviate the more restrictive (and healthier) feedback loops of external reinforcement (e.g. father or church authority) by rebelliously choosing alternative mentors, role models, or peer groups that support her choices. Since herds can be freely chosen, this partly explains women's continuous pressing necessity to conform to the herd.

Feminism plays on this inherent weakness in encourages wimmin to pursue total self-determination, which denies any duty to comply to expected behaviors and avoids external regulation involving rewards and punishments.

3. The Goal of Sexual Self-Determination

Of specific note, Feminism pushes the idea that wimmin are, or should be, entirely self-determined with respect to sexuality and reproduction.

We don't need to look too hard to find examples of sexual self-determinism in wimmin.

1. Both The Other McCain and Dalrock reported on the rise of Insta-Wh0res (ca. April 2019).
2. In a previous post, How much is Virginity worth? (2019 September 6), we reviewed how women are selling their virginity, in essence, trading their MMV for cash. Yet, many of these same wimmin cling to the hope of one day being "married" while they willfully deny how sex and marriage are inextricably linked.
3. In another post, Irresponsible Ejaculation Causes Abortion (2019 September 23), we saw one wimminz clear statement about control.

> "STOP TRYING TO CONTROL WOMEN'S BODIES AND SEXUALITY. UNWANTED PREGNANCIES ARE CAUSED BY MEN."

Here, we shouldn't jump to the conclusion that men are locking their wives and girlfriends in stocks and bonds in a brutal effort to "control" their wimmin. No, this is a statement of Psychological Projection. The sentence in bold reveals Wimminz true motives – to control — and the object of control is men.

Can you imagine? Wimmin want to decide which men can have sex! This is exactly what R.S. McCain was getting at when he wrote, Guy Gets Laid, Feminists Get Angry (2019 September 22).

> "Feminists believe that women should have 100% control of sexual activity, that they should be arbiters of who does and doesn't get laid."

But McCain doesn't take it far enough.

- Feminists believe that women should have 100% control of the whole sexual marketplace (SMP).

- Feminists believe that women should have 100% control of the whole procreative process, or the interruption thereof.
- Feminists believe that women should have 100% control of the management and distribution of resources.
- Feminists believe that legislation should be used to implement all of the above.

This quest for control seems to have no boundaries of common decency. Even after admitting that abortion is murder, the author went on to say,

> "Abortion is the "cure" for an unwanted pregnancy."

But truth be told, women already have 100% control of sexual activity! (Except in the cases of Biblical marriage [2] or authentic rape.) Women are the fundamental Gatekeepers of Sex – arbiters of who gets the key to the golden gyna, and when, and by extension, which men are deemed worthy of procreation.

Yet, this is still not enough to satisfy the Feministas of Flatbush. They also believe women should decide which men can keep their Johnsons! A previous post, Eunuchs of the New Feminist Order (2019 August 31) revealed how some women can be so bold as to assume they have the authority to snip the d!cks off of men. This includes vasectomies, chemical neutering, and any legislation pertaining thereof. [3]

What if we turned this around, for the sake of equahluty? It would read something like this.

> "Women believe that men should have 100% control of sexual activity, that they should be arbiters of who has sex with whom, and when, and who is worthy of procreation."

Actually, this does seem more appropriate, and of course we know that men would be much more gracious in this matter. But can you imagine the reaction we'd get from wimmin if men decided which women can have sex, and with which men, and when?

4. The Goal of being Free from Responsibility

Another important goal of Feminism is the effective displacement of responsibilities. Since someone must assume the burdensome aspects of responsibility, the Feminist order assigns all responsibility to men, or else, diffuses the responsibilities into big government.

This particular goal of Feminism is wrapped up in Boxer's Definition of Feminism (2019 January 18):

> "A conspiracy against all men and all nations, to offload the individual and collective responsibility for female misbehavior onto men."

But the problem with displacing responsibility is that for certain issues, you just can't do it. Every person has his/her own sphere of influence, which no one else can enter. Women want to disabuse themselves of natural consequences and the responsibilities of being free moral agents, and the shame thereof, by shrinking this sphere of influence down to a singularity. This is most often done by expelling from their consciences any sense of personal agency. Wimmin want so desperately to believe that agency and responsibility can be magically transplanted from one gender to another, that this desire takes on the form of solipsistic hamsterbation (AKA psychological dissociation).

An all too common example of how extreme and perverse this disassociation can be, is how women rationalize their need for abortions. As mentioned above, the previous post, Irresponsible Ejaculation Causes Abortion (2019 September 23) illustrated how "a women" made the case that abortion was the result of Menz irresponsibility, NOT Wimminz. This is another classic case of Psychological Projection that we see coming from women way too often.

Men may cause pregnancies, but men don't make pregnancies unwanted by the woman. Most women who abort their progeny go to clinics on their own initiative… Often without even informing the man. Often to the man's utter dismay!

All these arguments about abortions, condoms, pills, castrations, vasectomies, laws and legislation, and who is responsible for what, amounts to nothing more than a Pandora's box of selfishness and sexual sin – which must necessarily be micromanaged for the blame to be shifted.

Even though the related arguments are haywire, the proliferation of these ideas on mass media, and their seductive appeal to the fundamental feminine desire for a gynocentric utopia, have slowly caused them to become more acceptable to the wider public since the 1960's.

The Human Be-In, The Summer of Love, 1967.

5. The Goal of Remaining Clandestine

One of the primary strategies employed within the Game of Feminism is to obscure the goals and the purposes from the opponents (primarily men, but also other women within her competing social sphere). This has been done with remarkable skill for decades, as these goals have only become apparent to men since the advent of Red Pill consciousness.

The inherent value of secrecy to the feminine psyche is shown in the fact that they go ballistic whenever their secrets are revealed. This is the cause of all the cries of "misogyny". You see, according to the religion of feminism, introspection and confession are grave sins, but fornicating and child sacrifice, not so much.

Remarkably, even the traditional concept of the Feminine Mystique supports this goal (the original concept, not Friedan's version). Prior to the late 20th century, women utilized the Feminine Mystique as a cover for their iniquities, and to present themselves in the best possible light, all to secure better prospects of landing a better grade husband, and to elevate their socioeconomic status.

Currently, the PoundMeToo playgame is a classic Plan B for many wayward, agency-lacking wimmin to resort to whenever that vital secrecy has been breached.

The goal of secrecy is not limited to individual wimmin, but is also expressed through selective censorship by MGM news agencies and internet host providers. Recently, it was discovered that the megapowers of the information age have been… [We regret to inform you that because of "user policy violations", the remainder of this paragraph has been redacted by IA internet bots.]

6. The Goal of Gaining Status and Respect

In the current, postmodern west, women seek to retain an aura of buoyant unpredictability, and pass themselves off as being flighty or emotional. Yet, even so, they demand "respect", in which "disrespect" is defined (here) as anything that pricks a woman's ego or deters her self-centered prerogatives. Manospherians know that wimminz idea of "respect" is not the same as a man's concept of respect, and the female demand for "respect" amounts to little more than a $ħit test.

To top it all off, Feminists must capitalize on their gains by establishing themselves as respectable winners of the Zero Sum Game. Part of this is done by displacing the responsibility, and thus the blame for their errant choices, onto men, as described earlier. But abandoning responsibility also excludes them from the accompanying honor and respect that comes from being responsible.

Dalrock has described this desire for status as a weakness of feminism in his post, Status is a powerful motivator. (2019 September 23). He writes,

> "Marriage conveys legitimacy to the children, and status to the woman. The man's money could be obtained via child support without a wedding, and likewise his assistance (living together would do the trick). For middle class women, there is only one respectable way to babymamahood, and that is by marrying first, and then divorcing whenever it is most convenient after she has the number of children she wants (from that particular baby daddy at least)."

Feminists have been able to dampen the shame of divorce. Laws which facilitate divorce, and the widespread frequency of broken marriages have made it generally acceptable to the larger society. But for some reason, wimmin cannot escape the shame of the humility imposed upon them by being single mothers. Women know this, hence perpetuating their demand for legalized and subsidized abortion.

In sum, respect is fundamentally crucial to men, but it just isn't in the game plan for women.

Well, not quite. There are a few caveats. For example, I can respect a woman for being able to do this…

"Chinese students wrap their arms around their waist and touch their belly-buttons to attempt a ""Belly-button challenge"" at a school in Luoyang city, central China's Henan province, 12 June 2015."

Conclusions

The primary purpose of Feminism is to construct a gynocentric utopia, which is essentially an evil idolatry. This utopia, which is only possible in a world without God, embraces secular humanism as their primary religion. Pleasure and The Pride of Life are emphasized as the greatest moral good, even over the sanctity of human life.

To construct this gynocentric dystopia, Feminists must micromanage every detail of life and society, in order to maximize women's freedoms and pleasure, and minimize their personal responsibility. Within this world of Bizarretta baristas, ~~b~~witchy wimmin control everything, and supposedly get everything they think they want.

> "For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft,
> And stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry."
>
> 1st Samuel 15:23 (NKJV)

What wimmin do not understand is that when they start controlling themselves and taking responsibility for their actions (viz. assuming moral agency), then men will not need to step in and do so in ways that abhorrently countermand wimminz fleshly desire for autonomy and self-determination.

Don't start one, won't be one!

Footnotes

1. According to 1st Corinthians 7:5, a woman may rightfully expect regular sexual attention from her husband, and she has the authority over his body in terms of his sexual desire and satisfaction. But that is within an intimate relationship between man and wife. Women in general do not have authority over men's procreative choices or abilities. If a woman willingly lays her body down to be shagged by a man, which is her natural use in marriage, then by nature of the transaction, she is submitting to his authority, and his decision to ejaculate wherever he pleases. If that results in a pregnancy, then she should have accepted that as a possible outcome long before she prostrated herself.

2. Deuteronomy 25:11-12 tells us that if a woman ever has a man by the balls (literally, as in a fight), you should cut her hand off, showing her no mercy. The literal application of this verse might be a rare event, but the figurative meaning is evident. Women do not have any authority over men's fecundity or patrilineage.

Related

- v5k2c2 (Derek Ramsey): Feminism is Həll! (2019 September 4)
- v5k2c2 (Derek Ramsey): The Psychology of Gender Equality (2019 October 1)

What do women think they contribute to a relationship?

Jack · 21 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

Straight from the horses' mouths.

Readership: All;

Note to Readers: I will be very busy with work this semester. So from next week onwards, my posts will be shorter and less frequent.

Women can observe many clear benefits to them in a relationship/marriage, but to most wimmin, a relationship is all about the Feeelz and other materialistic goodies.

- How many have ever considered their own responsibilities, or how they might benefit a man?
- Have they ever considered that God intended women to raise children and help men complete their mission in life?
- Have they realized that if a man doesn't get any benefit nor satisfaction out of marriage, then he has very little motivation to marry?

In this video, several women who are from either the U.S. or South Africa are posed with several questions about their perceived usefulness to men. Watch their responses.

Asking women what they contribute to a relationship (Length: 8:45)

Notes

One American woman mentions that men and women have different roles. She doesn't go into any further detail about her ideas of what those roles should be, but I'm sure we would disagree with her, unfortunately.

> "Women are more logical, so they don't get hurt in relationships" she says.

Really?!? There's some genuine solipsism!

> "Women bring softness, love, and care."

This is the stereotype they would like men to believe. A generalized answer like this is a cop-out.

At the 1:07 mark, they are asked, "Do you like to be appreciated specifically for your femininity?" The American women are caught clueless by this question, but the SA women come back with immediate responses. That says something about American wimmin.

At the 2:12 mark, they are asked, "Do you think it is a man's role to be the leader in a relationship, or does it work better if both people are equals?" They all dismiss the idea of the man being a leader, with the exception of one SA woman who says it depends on the man's capabilities. But at the 3:25 mark they are asked, "Do you often find yourself in a relationship where the man leads?" and at 3:40, "Would you ever date a man that you didn't look up to and admire?" There is a huge cultural difference in their responses. Basically, American women want a superstar who is their "equal", but SA women are more realistic.

When asked, "If a man finds that the woman in his life is not improving herself, is he right to break up with her?" most women agreed. I can only assume that this is motivated by their desire for the man to be back on the market.

Related

- Σ Frame: Women's choice to be relevant (2020 February 6)
- Σ Frame: Tinder Translations (2020 July 29)

Patheological Weddingsday – What is Purity Actually About?

Jack · 23 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

The New Covenant of Christ provides a pure conscience.

Readership: Christians, especially those who were involved in the Purity Movement;

In a previous post, Patheological Weddingsday – Did Purity Culture Undermine Christian Identity? (2020 September 9), I covered an article written by Jackson Wu. This post will take a look at his second, follow-up post on Patheos, entitled What is purity actually about? (2020 August 12)

To kick start his article, Wu poses the question,

> "What is the relationship between purity and the concepts of honor and shame?"

Then he explains the reason for adopting this frame.

> "Understanding how the language of (un)cleanness works can help us in several ways. For example, we can discern the broader connotation of such imagery in the Bible and in our lives. We can improve our ability to interpret the Bible and contextualize its message."

I totally agree here. This is the reason why I delved into this philosophical frame way back in late 2018.

- Σ Frame: What does it mean to be Unclean? (2018 December 2)
- Σ Frame: What does it mean to be Defiled? (2018 December 9)

Let's see what the author has to add to the discussion.

Purity Matters

> "Some people, like Tom Steffen, think purity-cultures exist alongside guilt-, fear-, and honor-cultures. I respectfully disagree. I think purity language falls under the honor-shame category. Separating them seems redundant to me."

I'm not sure what he means by "separating them seems redundant", since he just identified a unique relevance to the Honor vs. Shame system, in essence separating them.

The concept of sexual purity may exist in any culture, because it is fundamental to human mating strategies. Likewise, shame tactics can be implemented in any culture. But in general, the practice of using shame and public humiliation against those who have lost their sexual purity (or for anything, really) as a means of social control and regulation, falls within the Honor vs. Shame ethical system.

The Righteousness vs. Guilt system adheres to the recognizance of moral law and relies on an internal sense of guilt among its constituents. However, when certain individuals are lacking any sense of internal guilt, others in the culture often resort to shame tactics in order to preserve cultural order. This is especially pertinent in the case of sexual sin, because for some reason, sexual sins seldomly produce guilt.

No guilt!

> "But there's a bigger point to make than how one classifies cultures. Whether one is "pure" or "unclean" is no small matter; it frequently speaks to one's identity, status, and character. As mentioned in my previous post, we often use purity metaphors when speaking about morality…"
>
> "He's a filthy pig!" "They have a dirty mind." "No one has clean hands."

Yes, this is the fundamental idea behind the concept of defilement. The Old Testament called for the death of those having certain kinds of defilement, and I believe this is because defilement is irreversible. So yes, it is a serious matter, and no, this impression cannot be removed by changing cultural norms nor through teaching philosophical sophistry.

> Unfortunately, I've noticed a subtle flattening of the metaphor among people. They treat it as though it primarily were legal language. For instance, "The judge will wipe it off your record." Or, "You have a clean slate." In these sentences, "clean" and "wipe" act as dead metaphors. They lack potency. One hardly notices the imagery. They simply mean, "No crimes are charged against you."

This kind of assessment hearkens back to the basic message of the penal substitutionary gospel, which has been ubiquitous in Christianity for ages.

> However, we do not invoke a mere "legal" metaphor when we speak of (im)purity and (un)cleanness. Fundamentally, purity is not a legal category. If we miss this point, we can overlook the effect of such imagery and its significance in Scripture.

I need to point out that the opposite of purity is uncleanness or defilement. (See the posts listed above on these topics.) Purity and its opposite, defilement, are dichotomous spiritual states, meaning that one cannot be both pure and defiled at the same time. Although purity and defilement are spiritual states, and not legal categories, the Old Testament law had impeccably clear instructions about how to deal with individuals in various states of uncleanness and defilement from a legal perspective. So defilement is not disassembled from the laws of the covenant, but is in fact, an integral part of it.

What is Purified in Hebrews?

Christians often use generalized phrases to describe salvation. “He has washed away my sin.” “He has cleansed me.” These certainly have roots in the Bible. The sacrificial system in Leviticus famously describes how the people of Israel removed ritual impurity through sacrifice.

Concerning these sacrificial practices, the writer of Hebrews says,

> “…gifts and sacrifices are offered that cannot perfect the conscience of the worshiper but deal only with food and drink and various washings, regulations for the body imposed until the time of reformation…”
>
> Hebrews 9:9-10 (ESV)

Someone might easily interpret him as if to suggest the purification rituals are archaic and antithetical to Christianity. However, we find that the author of Hebrews does not dismiss such language; rather, he reappropriates it.

Hebrews 10:1–2 expands on the imagery of Hebrews 9. It says,

> “[1] For since the law has but a shadow of the good things to come instead of the true form of these realities, it can never, by the same sacrifices that are continually offered every year, make perfect those who draw near. [2] Otherwise, would they not have ceased to be offered, since the worshipers, having once been cleansed, would no longer have a conscience for sins?
>
> Hebrews 10:1-2 (ESV)

In light of the new covenant, Hebrews 9:14 proclaims,

> “…how much more will the blood of Christ… purify our conscience from dead works to serve the living God.”
>
> Hebrews 9:14 (ESV)

> Therefore,

> "let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, with our hearts sprinkled clean from an evil conscience."
>
> Hebrews 10:22 (ESV)

> The wider context adds further support. Hebrews 8:10, 10:16 repeat the promise from Jeremiah 31:33, where the Lord says,

> "This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, declares the Lord: I will put my laws on their hearts, and write them on their minds."
>
> Hebrews 10:16 (ESV)

The other two verses are similar.

> "For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, declares the Lord: I will put my laws into their minds, and write them on their hearts, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people."
>
> Hebrews 8:10 (ESV)

> For this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, declares the Lord: I will put my law within them, and I will write it on their hearts. And I will be their God, and they shall be my people.
>
> Jeremiah 31:33 (ESV)

The NKJV translation says,

> "But this is the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel after those days, says the Lord: I will put My law in their minds, and write it on their hearts; and I will be their God, and they shall be My people."

> Jeremiah 31:33 (NKJV)

I am emphasizing this passage because this idea is stated three times in scripture, so this is a major concept! Here are other translations, if anyone wishes to compare.

Now going back to Wu's post…

> When Christ "purifies our conscience," he cleanses our hearts (cf. 10:22). In effect, Hebrews refers to the fulfillment of the new covenant promise foretold in Jeremiah.

I agree with the citations from the scriptures, that the promises of the New Covenant are important, but he doesn't specifically address the issues of sexual purity or the Purity Movement.

More Thoughtful Use of Purity

> Across time and culture, people intuitively appeal to purification language to draw comparisons about morality and identity. At least we can all be more thoughtful about how we use such comparisons. When the Bible speaks of our being cleansed or purified, writers are not merely saying, "You have no crime on your permanent record."

Of note, this is another reference to the penal substitutionary theory of the gospel that is prevalent within Protestantism. So I can guess that Wu is Protestant.

> While that language has validity, it only scratches the surface of biblical meaning.
>
> The Bible is concerned with far more than external or legal purity; it can hardly be called salvation if our legal record is erased but our hearts are contaminated with the basest of desires. God cares about our hearts. This is why he grants us new hearts. The Spirit transforms our sense of honor and shame.

I like Mr. Wu's writings because he's been focusing on scripture. In this post, he has described how the New Covenant entails the cleansing and renewing of our hearts. Although this renewal is characteristic of justification and salvation, it seems that Wu is suggesting that this is what purity is all about. But this is only one form of purity. Purity is much more nuanced.

I'm somewhat disappointed with this article because he did not address the question contained in the title (What is purity all about?) within the context of the Purity Movement. But perhaps he only posed this as a rhetorical question to provoke the reader's thoughts. We'll see where he's taking this argument in his third post, which I will cover next Wednesday. I suspect that he will make the common mistake of overlooking the critical distinction between Coram Mundo and Coram Deo.

Related

- Σ Frame: Picking through the fruit of the Purity Movement (2020 April 20)

Three Kinds of Discernment

Jack · 25 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

An insightful exploration.

Readership: All;

Three Kinds of Discernment

This post identifies and discusses three types of discernment, Spiritual Discernment, Cognitive Discernment, and Social/Emotional Discernment. To make the discussion easier, I'll adopt a nomenclature of SD, CD, and ED, respectively.

Under a previous post, A Revised Understanding of Game (2020 September 14), TheDeti asked a pertinent question,

> "…when we talk about discernment, are you talking about the spiritual gift of discernment (which is "discerning spirits"; the gift of special and deep understanding what is of God and what is not, "rightly dividing the word of Truth")? [SD]
>
> Or are you talking about natural, cognitive discernment (the ability to look past what appears to be so and getting to what actually is; critical thinking; inductive and deductive reasoning)?" [CD]

Novaseeker describes a third variety of discernment — being able to sense the socio-sexual interest and intent of others, and being able to detect and read IOI's. Novaseeker describes this as such.

> "I was using [the word discernment] in terms of discerning women's behaviors and IOIs and so on — not in a spiritual sense at all. Many men struggle in "reading" women, because they lack social discernment in general, and in particular when it comes to women — like discerning when a woman is showing interest in you or not. That's what I was talking about, not spiritual discernment a la the NT." [ED]

I think this last kind of discernment also includes (1) an ability to connect with others on an emotional, heart-felt level, and (2) Theory of Mind, something which Autistic individuals are incapable of experiencing.

In the post containing these comments, I was referring to SD and ED, believing these to be the same. But upon further consideration, I find that they are not. They only appear to be the same to me personally.

A young and precocious boy is ready to teach you about new theories.

Cognitive Discernment

I want to go into further detail regarding CD because it is much more than simply the ability to identify logical truth from error. It also affects one's decision making (i.e. "free will") and moral agency.

Over at the Orthosphere, Richard Cocks writes about the role of Agency and the Criminal Justice System (2020 September 17). Here, he philosophically describes agency.

> "An agent is the locus of decision-making. If [causal] determinism is true, and there is no free will, then no person is "deciding" anything. Agency would be an illusion."

I'll interrupt Richard to offer some definitions to the reader.

Determinism: The theory that everything that happens must happen as it does and could not have happened any other way.

If a person believes that determinism is true, then this person could be described as fatalistic.

Fatalism: The belief that people cannot change the way events will happen and that events, especially bad ones, cannot be avoided.

> "Without agency, we are in no position to assess truth or falsity. You are forced by mechanical means [viz. causal determinism] to whatever you think, not by reasons. If he happens to think [any proposition to be] true, that is of no significance whatsoever. If determinism is true, which it could logically be, then further discussion is otiose. There is no person/agent discussing anything; just a stalk of grass blowing in the wind."

Richard Cocks goes on to say that having agency is (at least) one trait that makes one truly human. I'll add that this particular trait is also the one that opens the door to (1) true authentic obedience to the Holy Spirit, (2) the potential pursuance of sin, and/or (3) repentance.

With these things in mind, it is evident that having cognitive discernment is mutually codependent on having a sense of agency. This means that one is able to recognize that there exist at least two different paradigms of consciousness that delineate a single state of being, and that one is able to change one's own cognitive process from one paradigm to the other, based on one's convictions, principle, or purpose. As a consequence, one is able to discern a moral choice, make decisions accordingly, and therefore exercise agency. This idea is the backbone of the argument for free will. Conversely, an agent is one who is aware of the choices, makes an informed decision, and takes a responsible action. This logical proof merely rephrases what Richard described, but I will add that agency is a mark of maturity. For example, children and solipsistic individuals lack agency. Of note, in a previous post, The Evils of Solipsism (2019 November 19), we identified that solipsism equals sin.

Going further, if one chooses to embrace any cognitive paradigm that is at odds with God's covenant order, then this is sin by definition. Clinging to such a paradigm, even without being aware that it is sin, is being/living under a curse by definition (e.g. a generational curse). Some curses can be elusive to the conscious mind's understanding, which makes them difficult to sift out and purge.

One primary way that this perdition happens is when one becomes obsessed with the things of a fleshly nature (e.g. money, power, social status, desires, sensual passions, fears, et al.), and these cognitive preoccupations preclude (or exclude) any awareness of one's agency and any perception of spiritual truths.

Of note, the mental framework that supports sexual sin is one such curse which is difficult to uproot, partly because it is reinforced by one's culture, lifestyle, social group, and anatomical physiology.

In 1st John 5:16-18, St. John makes a distinction between "sin which does not lead to death", and "sin which leads to death". [Sidenote: Bible Gateway has an interesting discussion of this.] Within the present discussion of CD, it is conceivable that that "sin which leads to death" is an unholy cognitive paradigm that causes one to become deprived of both CD and agency (as described above), and therefore become "locked into" this mode. This is what it means to be "in bondage to sin" — a state from which one can only escape through repentance and exercising a heart-led faith in Jesus Christ. The miraculous restoration of agency and CD is an integral part of redemption, and is commonly called "freedom in Christ" or "spiritual liberty" within Christian doctrine. This freedom may also bring about the enhancement of one's SD and ED.

My Own Experiences with Discernment

With respect to CD, if I put some time and effort into studying a matter and praying about it, then I can eventually figure out how things work. This includes the physical world, including difficult engineering problems, and also things of a spiritual nature, such as philosophy of belief. This approach does nothing for my social life, however, but my SD and ED take up most of the slack. With people, there's always an element of unpredictability and a bit of the unknown. In my opinion, God is much more "predictable" than people are. (Perhaps "reliable" is a more reverent word to describe God.)

I think the Cognitive brand of discernment depends on one's IQ and cognitive ability in general. This may also explain why intelligent individuals often have greater difficulty in sorting out their spiritual needs and the substance of their faith, while less intellectually gifted people have been known to "find God" while sitting at a bar in a state of inebriation.

In my personal experience, SD and ED seem to be concomitant. That is, as my ability to discern between what is of God and that which is evil grows, so too does my ability to connect with others at an emotional level, to sense "vibes" from others (especially women), and to detect IOI's. This is why I naively fused the two in previous posts. But I am getting the impression that for many others, "getting closer to God" does not permeate one's social and intersexual relations.

For me, CD seems to be unrelated to either SD or ED. I have a couple theories about this.

1. They are somehow related, but not directly, at least not enough for me to notice any kind of cause-and-effect interaction.
2. They are not related, but are influenced by the Holy Spirit.

I really need more real world data based on others' experiences with discernment to refine these theories any further.

Concluding Statements

I hope that this examination of discernment has been enjoyable and insightful to the reader, and not just an exercise in navel-gazing sophistry. Most of what I've described here is my attempt to condense deep mystical concepts into words, which might appear speculative to some, or prophetic, if you will, to others, so I'm open to feedback and reproof.

I'm wondering if other men might have a different experience with discernment, and whether my own experience might be a peculiar case. I would like to get some feedback on this phenomenon, either qualitative or quantitative, so if you would, please leave a comment to describe your own experiences with different kinds of discernment. I am sure other readers would be interested in exploring these personal differences as well.

Related

- Σ Frame: On the discernment and wisdom of true morality (2019 February 2)

Placing the Marriage Structures within the Archetypical Models

Jack · 28 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A Christian marriage is determined by male authority and female dependence, i.e. Headship.

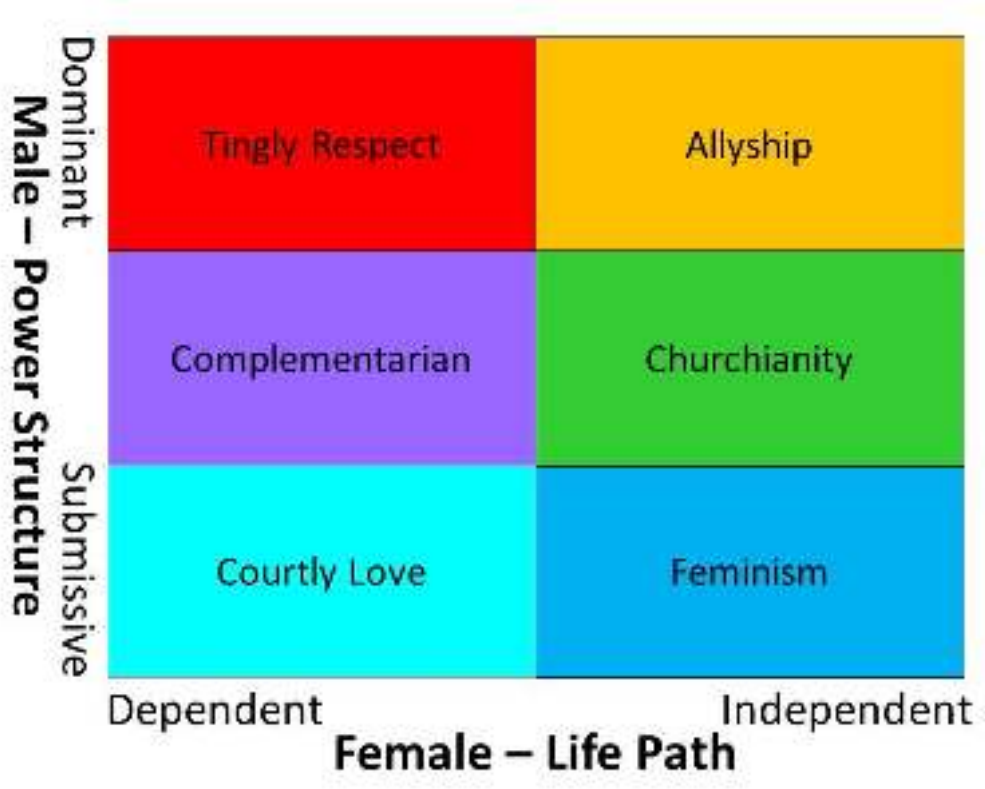
Readership: All;
Length: 1,600 words
Reading Time: 5.5 minutes

A Review of Marriage Structures and Archetypical Models

In this post, I will discuss a post from Christianity and Masculinity: No, your congregation does not preach Biblical headship (2020/8/12). It's a classic piece from Deep Strength, and I encourage everyone to read through it.

Here, I wish to point out that the four marriage structures described by DS in this post correlate loosely with the Archetypical relationship models I outlined in a previous post, The Feminine Dilemma (2018/10/27).

To briefly review these Archetypical relationship models, consider the following diagram which appeared in The Feminine Dilemma. The female's Life Path is on the abscissa, and the Power Structure exercised by the male is on the ordinate. Please refer to this figure as an aide to visualize the descriptions that follow.



Next, I'll list the four marriage structures (as described by DS and shown in blue font), and indicate which relationship model it correlates with.

Headship: The view that the man is the head of his household. What he says goes.

Headship correlates with the Tingly Respect model.

Complementarianism: The view that God has given men and women different roles to fill. Among the man's roles are the right to have the final say on disputed matters in the home.

Complementarianism correlates with the Complementarian or Courtly Love models.

Egalitarianism: The view that husband and wives are on equal footing with regard to all roles, including decision-making authority.

Egalitarianism correlates with the Allyship or Churchianity model.

Feminism: The view that women should be empowered in the home to do as they please and that men should support them in the direction the woman chooses to go, unless it would otherwise amount to direct sin.

Feminism correlates with the Feminist model.

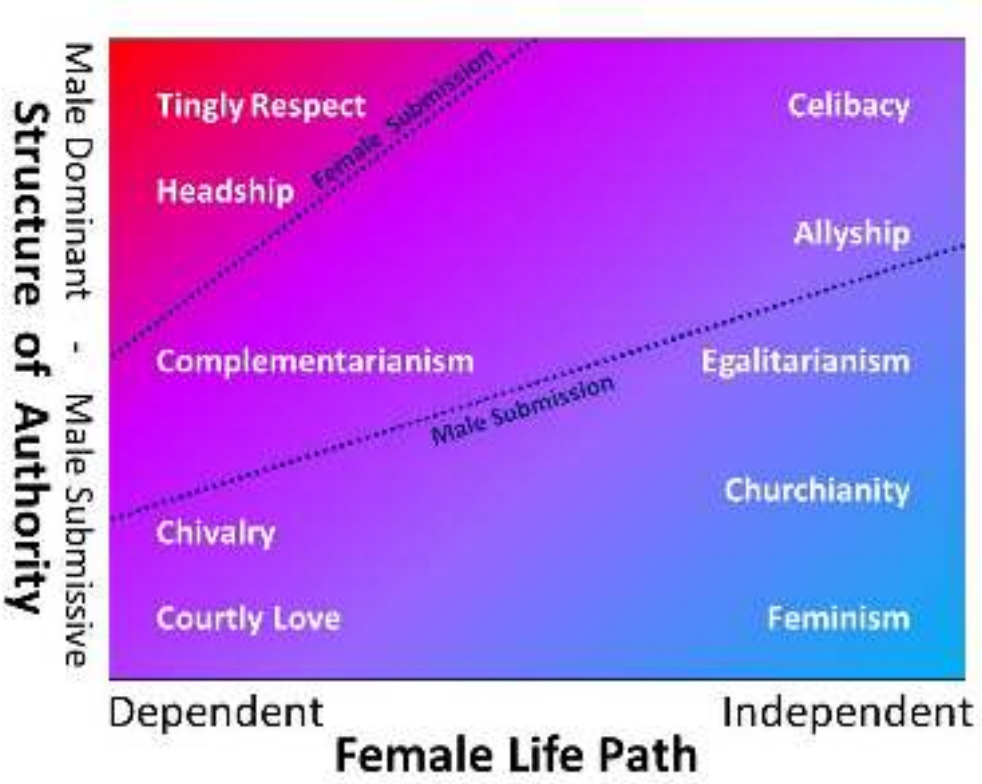
By integrating DS's four marriage structures into the previous diagram and revising the image a bit, we obtain the following correlating diagram for the relationship models.

Note: The earlier image shows a clear demarcation between the models, which is somewhat misleading. In reality, we find that the many various nuances of different relationships cast a spectrum which is represented by the red-blue fade in the figure.



Identifying the Marital Structure

Here, I wish to make a very important assertion that should be duly noted by the reader.

Σ Axiom 7: The natural interaction defines the relationship structure according to which model it fits best, not what we think it is or hope for it to be.

I'll discuss this a bit so that it will take effect in the readers' understanding.

The natural interaction between two people in a relationship is what defines the relational structure – not cognitive dissonance, not presumed choice, not cognition, not willpower, not doctrinal stance, and not how Alpha or Red Pilled the man might think he is. The day to day interactions follow a habitual pattern, and that pattern fits one relationship model better than the others. This relationship structure might change, but not without severe resistance.

The particular blend of personalities in the union, and the style of relationship you have developed, will largely determine whether you have a Headship or Tingly Respect type of marriage that glorifies God, or else some other type of relationship which doesn't. In this case, the man's authority is not merely a nominal or puppet position according to a mentally prescribed hierarchy. If it is, then it's not truly a Headship / Tingly Respect structure and will be prone to failure because of its denial of Σ Axiom 7, as defined above.

As a consequence of fitting God's Covenant order, Headship and Tingly Respect both yield a home environment filled with God's peace and presence, producing a sanctified marriage and providing a superiorly ideal setting for children to be raised in. All other relationship structures do not fit God's archetype, and will be prone to dysfunction, not only within the marriage, but also in the children.

The Differences between Headship and Tingly Respect

Headship and Tingly Respect deserve special attention, because these are the relationship structures that glorify God.

Concerning the red area in the second diagram, there is a small difference between Headship structure and the Tingly Respect model.

In the Headship structure, the woman submits to the man's authority out of reverence and obedience to God, and this requires her maturity, faith, and willingness to do so. It does not rely so much on the character of the man, but it does work to inspire the man to grow in faith and confidence.

The success of the Headship structure depends on the wife's willing submission. Properly understood, Headship is not predominantly a legalistic system of rules intended to control the wife nor to check the aspects of her worst nature, but it will tend to resort to these methods during rough times.

In the Tingly Respect model, the woman is emotionally and viscerally swooned by the masculine authority of the man. It does not rely so much on her faith and willingness, but instead, tends to inspire her faith and willingness.

The Tingly Respect model is less susceptible to the usual wifely indignation, because it appeals to her emotions, sates her natural hypergamic desires, and therefore relieves the wife from a heavy reliance on her willpower to be obedient.

The Tingly Respect model works because a woman's natural desires for a husband and to be ruled over (according to Genesis 3:16) is commonly expressed as a hypergamous desire for a top quality man. She intuitively perceives that such a man has the visceral power of authority over her desires, and he therefore rules over her.

Therefore, the Tingly Respect model depends heavily on the man's mastery of true masculine authority, characterized by Looks, Athleticism, Money, Power, and Status (AKA LAMPS or PSALM). It also requires the man to showcase his persona non gratis and his charismatic leadership, all of which attracts and inspires the wife's affections and loyalty.

In a Headship relationship, the wife has the upper hand in attracting her husband's sexual interest, as long as she is willing to do so. As such, she has authority over his body (i.e. his sexual desire). In a Tingly Respect relationship, the husband is able to cause the wife to lose control over her sexual desire for him, such that she wants to make love to him on impulse and without prescient contemplation. This is why I called this the Tingly Respect model.

Furthermore, if a married person has the power to turn the other on to such a degree that he/she has lost all conscious mindfulness, and dives into the act of intercourse without any thought, hesitancy, or reservation, then that person might be able to truthfully claim that he/she has real authentic authority over the other's body (according to 1st Corinthians 7:4).

Conclusions

By associating the four marriage structures (from DS) with the correlating relationship models, it becomes clear how the woman's choice of her Life Path and her subjective relation to masculine authority (e.g. father, husband, mentor, government, etc.), are the two major determining factors for the type of marital structure that results.

To obtain a God glorifying union, the man must maintain the power of authority over the woman. The woman absolutely must cultivate a posture of submission and humility in her Life Path, and she must possess an authentic respect for the male authority in her life.

Of all the relationship structures, only the Headship and the Tingly Respect structures offer a God glorifying marital union. Headship works by virtue of the woman's strength of will to be obedient to God, whereas, Tingly Respect functions as a product of the woman's hypergamous passions to be obedient to her husband.

Σ Frame Axiom 13, AKA The Law of Headship: As a consequence of fitting God's Covenant order, Headship and Tingly Respect both yield a home environment filled with God's glory, peace, and presence, producing a sanctified marriage and providing a superiorly ideal setting for children to be raised in.

Corollary to Axiom 13: All other relationship structures with the exception of Celibacy (e.g. Allyship, Chivalry, Churchianity, Complementarian, Courtly Love, Egalitarian, Feminism, FWB, Open Relationship, Polyandry, et al.) do NOT fit God's archetype, and will be prone to dysfunction, not only within the marriage, but also in the children.

Most men would prefer a Tingly Respect relationship, but are discouraged from entering into one when they realize that (in the current MMP) this usually requires him to choose a woman who is substantially below his own SMV/MMV. Those men opting for a Headship structure will find it to be very challenging to identify a potential mate who is willing and diligent in remaining obedient to God.

If both of them are sufficiently emotionally and spiritually mature, then it will be easier for them to utilize their collective willpower under the power of the Holy Spirit.

Of note, if a woman is able to remain sexually pure prior to marriage, then it becomes all that much easier for her to experience the emotional thrills and sexual bonding necessary for her to nurture an authentic respect for her husband, which intrinsically grants him a greater strength of authority. Doing so will allow her to not have to rely on her willpower so heavily in marriage, and it will excuse the husband from relying mainly on Game tactics.

Conversely, if a woman doesn't cultivate a posture of submission and humility in her Life Path, and she does not reverence men nor respect male authority in the structure of power, then it is highly unlikely that a God glorifying marriage will somehow ensue without a soul chafing reliance on willpower. As a consequence, the home environment and the children's wellbeing will suffer.

Comprehensively, this study offers strong support for the Meet Cute encounter as a God honoring courtship model, since it assumes from the onset of the relationship that the man holds a visceral power of authority over the woman, and that the woman is actively responsive to his authority as evidenced by her IOI's. I will cover this aspect further in a future study.

Related

- Chateau Heartiste: The Moral Dichotomy of Women (2017/4/18)
- Σ Frame: Models of Courtship and Marital Structure (2018/10/3)
- Σ Frame: Courtship and Power (2020/2/17)
- Christianity and Masculinity: Trust, attraction, and the Biblical female marital roles of helper, submission, and respect Part 1 (2022/11/17)
- The Transformed Wife: Submission is God's Ordained Hierarchy (2022/11/25)

Sexual Authority

Jack · 30 September 2020 · Archived copy · Original

A man who can give a woman the tingles, and a woman who can give a man a stiffy, have intrinsic sexual authority by definition.

Readership: All; Christians; Married Couples;

Introduction

In a footnote at the end of a previous post, I explained my understanding of 1st Corinthians 7:1-9.

> According to 1st Corinthians 7:5, a woman may rightfully expect regular sexual attention from her husband, and she has the authority over his body in terms of his sexual desire and satisfaction. But that is within an intimate relationship between man and wife. Women in general do not have authority over men's procreative choices or abilities. If a woman willingly lays her body down to be shagged by a man, which is her natural use in marriage, then by nature of the transaction, she is submitting to his authority, and his decision to ejaculate wherever he pleases. If that results in a pregnancy, then she should have accepted that as a possible outcome long before she prostrated herself.

Bee objected to the phrasing, saying that the first sentence should read,

> According to 1st Corinthians 7:5, a woman may rightfully expect regular sexual attention from her husband, and she has the authority over his body in terms of her sexual desire and satisfaction.
>
> I suggest replacing "his" in the second line with "her".

I maintain that the original text is correct, but I see how it can be confusing, so this post is written to explain it in further detail, just to be clear.

Intrinsic Sexual Authority

Sexual Market Value (SMV) as the Manosphere has described it, is a subjective, backward way of attaching a quantitative handle on one's intrinsic sexual authority, for the convenience of discussion. That is to say, when we speak of someone's SMV, we are basically talking about how much sexual authority that person can command.

Sexual authority is not explicitly limited to sexual intercourse and sexualized intersexual liaisons. It also extends to envelop one's ability to garner attention, investment, popularity, and favor. Sexual authority enhances one's social prowess and enhances one's overall quality of life.

Women are naturally skilled at this and don't need any instruction. For example, it is common for teenage girls to compete amongst themselves as to who can dress the most provocatively. Instead, young women need to be taught to be modest, and to restrict this activity to marriage.

For men, as things are now, only high status and high SMV men have this kind of authority, and even so, very few of them are aware of it and know how to use it. (Some PUA's call this being "sexually aware" or "having presence".) The vast majority of men are clueless about this, and they have very little chance to learn it either.

Sexual Authority in Marriage

As discussed in the previous section, individuals with a higher SMV are naturally able to command greater authority in the arena of intersexual relationships. But the Biblically inspired challenge is to learn how to exercise sexual authority over one's spouse. When both husband and wife hold sexual authority securely over the other's body, then this is exceedingly conducive to marital contentment (i.e. sanctification).

In the passage about marital relations in 1st Corinthians 7:1-9, verses 4-5 say,

> "The wife does not have authority over her own body, but the husband does. And likewise the husband does not have authority over his own body, but the wife does."

The idea of having authority over the other's body is commonly glossed over, or conveniently ignored altogether, especially in a converged church sermon. So you have to come to places like the Christian Manosphere to get any insight on this. To focus on this point further, this authority over the other's body entails hairstyle and how the other dresses, but it also includes the sexual use of the body, including sexual arousal, expression, and satisfaction.

The wife has (or should have) the authority (e.g. a shapely fit body, a kindhearted spirit of humility, emotional entrenchment, a personalized seductive lure, the physical skills, etc.) to turn her husband on and use his sexual desire to satisfy her own needs for attention, affection, affirmation, sexual intercourse, etc.

Hint to Ladies: Use your wrist, not your elbow.

Likewise, the husband has (or should have) the authority to get his wife into the mood and use her needs for attention, affection, affirmation, sexual intercourse, etc. to satisfy his own sexual desire.

Hint to Men: Use your elbow, not your wrist.

Sex begins in the kitchen. In the video below, two women demonstrate how to clean the silk from corn with a rubber band. The woman on the left (Rachel Ray) shows the proper level of joyful enthusiasm that is necessary to command emotional authority, but the older lady on the right has a better habit of using her wrist to command technical authority. (Experience comes with age.) The most holy wife exhibits both.

Marriage Structures with a Healthy Balance of Authority

Many if not most of the frustrations encountered in marriage arise from the fact that sexual authority has not been attained by one or both.

Monday's post, Placing the Marriage Structures within the Archetypical Models (2020 September 28), examined two relationships that have a healthy structure of authority. I've extracted a few excerpts below. (Click on the preceding link to read more.)

The Tingly Respect model works because a woman's natural desires for a husband and to be ruled over (according to Genesis 3:16) is commonly expressed as a hypergamous desire for a top quality man. She intuitively perceives that such a man has the visceral power of authority over her desires, and he therefore rules over her.

In a Tingly Respect relationship, the husband is able to cause the wife to lose control over her sexual desire for him, such that she wants to make love to him on impulse and without prescient contemplation. This is why I called this the Tingly Respect model.

The Tingly Respect model is less susceptible to the usual wifely indignation, because it appeals to her emotions, sates her natural hypergamic desires, and therefore relieves the wife from a heavy reliance on her will power to be obedient.

The success of the Headship structure depends on the wife's willing submission. In a Headship relationship, the wife has the upper hand in attracting her husband's sexual interest, as long as she is willing to do so. As such, she has authority over his body (i.e. his sexual desire).

Furthermore, if a married person has the power to turn the other on to such a degree that he/she has lost all conscious mindfulness, and dives into the act of intercourse without any thought, hesitancy, or reservation, then that person might be able to truthfully claim that he/she has real authentic authority over the other's body (according to 1st Corinthians 7:4).

Concluding Statements

Men have a natural habit of seeking out women who command sexual authority over them, and men naturally (and quickly) fall in love with such women. But within marriage, it is more important for a man to have sexual authority over his wife for several reasons.

- It satiates her fleshly nature, leading to less drama and more peace in the home.
- It reduces the wife's inclination, willingness, and overall ability to rebel.
- It makes it easier for him to rule over his household.

When a woman increases her N count, she is substantially decreasing the authority that her future husband may have over her body. This is why men prefer virgins for marriage.

Related

- Σ Frame: Time Frames for various forms of sexual bonding and maturation (2019 February 5)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Compatibility is dependent on Sanctification (2020 March 2)
- Σ Frame: Sexual Consent in Marriage (2020 March 9)
- Σ Frame: Sanctification and Sexual Compatibility (2020 June 19)

Moon Day Review — The Rear View Mirror

Jack · 2 October 2020 · Archived copy · Original

September was busy! Here's an overview of what's been happening.

Readership: Regulars;
Note: A micro-full moon appears on October 2. It is the 10th full moon in 2020. October 2 is also the Mid-Autumn Festival, a national holiday in Taiwan.

Snoozing through the Nooz

Last night, I wanted to watch the presidential debate. I was forced to watch CNN because it was the only channel that covered the debate in Taiwan. I haven't watched CNN in years, so this really challenged my patience. I was disgusted. It looked like a bunch of post-wall feral women having a cat fight. You could even hear their dogs barking in the background. Even the men carried on like women, eyes like deer in the headlights, talking on and on about emotionally charged issues, full of fears, indignation, and incredulity.

- The covid crisis is all Trump's fault!
- Trump is so insensitive to corona virus deaths!
- Trump didn't offer his condolences about the death of Biden's son!
- White supremacy is the most lethal issue in the United States!
- Trump refuses to condemn racist white supremacists! He even eggs them on! (Every 5 minutes)
- Trump is bombasting anger and hate!
- Trump says things that I agree with, but the way he says it is so upsetting. So this pushes me towards Biden.
- Biden is so compassionate!
- Trump has done nothing about the California fires/polar icecap/climate change!
- Trump doesn't support the Green New Deal!
- Trump is packing the court!
- Trump doesn't have a plan for a second term! He never had a plan!
- Trump is afraid people are going to vote!
- Trump is undermining the democratic process!
- Oooh, that's just how Trump is! We are so much better than that as a country!

Two or three people talking incoherently at the same time. Constant interruptions. Total posturing and projecting. They never did get down to the real news. A total waste of my time!

At one point, a veteran tried to speak out against something inflammatory against veterans that one of the commenters claimed that Trump said, but another woman kept interrupting him, carrying on about Biden's son's death. (Beau died over five years ago.)

If I was there, I would have said, "It is so rude of you to run your mouth uninvited and out of turn! Shut up and let him talk! Stop interrupting him, and stop changing the subject!" Of course, I would never be invited to be a commentator on CNN. Not sure I'd want to either.

Cancel my views for what we call the News.

Anyway, let's get on to the hot links and quotes from this past month.

Around the Sphere

Selo Living: Technology Affects which Men Women Choose (2020 September 5)

- There is a strong outcome asymmetry in preferences between men and women when it comes to selecting a mate, i.e. women prefer the same small group of men; men are indifferent to the vast majority of women.
- I use "indifference" above in the technical economic sense, i.e. the rate of substitution of a good at which there is no change in utility. In this sense, male demand for women has a significantly more positive cross elasticity of demand than female demand for men.
- Roughly translated, women are more "substitutable" to men than men are to women, i.e. women lose more when they lose access to a valuable man than the reverse.
- Said another way, women desire high status men far more than men desire high status women.
- What follows is that when women are free to have many partners over the course of a lifetime, sex and mating inequality becomes high; asymmetry in intersexual selection ensures that the same is not true if such were the same for men.
- The positional trait (social status in this case), when amplified by both technology and the freedom to use those technologies, i.e. social norms favoring the Feminine Imperative (in Saudi Barbaria, women wear burkas and can't use Tinder) the selection pool of prospective mates increases far faster for the median woman than it does for median man.
- Given that women are primarily interested in status, which is a positional good, then any technology that amplifies a woman's ability to be noticed by high status men, will also increase mating inequality. Consider, for example, how men do not benefit nearly as much from the scale offered by Tinder as do women. 100 swipes will get you 1 date if you are a man, and where it only takes 1 if you are a woman.
- In the graphs shown below, Hypergamy is calculated as the difference in median in-degree (number of incoming links) between the two distributions.
- Age in men tends to be a proxy of social status, where as age in women tends to determine genetic quality. Genetic quality is normally distributed, on a Bell Curve, whereas social status (and the wealth and income that results) is either log-normally or Pareto distributed in a population (What if Bill Gates Were as Tall as His Money?), following the truism that "20% of the men get 80% of the women." While close to true, what my simulations actually show is that what is really happening is something closer to "20% of the men receive 80% of all female intent."
- Hypergamy, then, is ever present. The only thing that changes whether it is realized or not is the extent to which women are free to act on it. Hypergamy doesn't necessarily guarantee an inequality in actual sexual encounters, but the more free that women are to act on it (and this is personal speculation) the more likely are there to be social norms and institutions favoring women, i.e. fault-free divorce, preferential child custody laws, anti-slut shaming, hyper-popularity on social media, (the free trips to Dubai that entails), etc.
- A final, somewhat counter-intuitive point. An increase in the female-to-male population sex ratio increases competition for women amongst men because it increases the time until which women decide they are ready to "settle" for inferior quality mates (Briffault's Law tells us that the female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family, and so when there are more opportunities to do better, why settle early?). As a result, and at least in the context of my simulations, there is a sub-linear scaling law in which a doubling of the population of women compared to men increases the median woman's number of matches by 50%. I'm not sure what this would look like in real life, but when I was in high school, a party with a "good ratio" was all any guy talked about. That ratio is probably a lot closer to parity than most believe. Unless you're a member of Cad Club, you probably don't want to invite more girls to your party.

> The Only Way to Win is Not To Play
>
> "So you're being guilt and shamed by a woman in your life? The best way to overcome and pass this "shit test" is the only way. Don't play.
>
> Any attempt to guilt and shame you is an attempt to change your mind using manipulation of a certain set of circumstances.
>
> "If you don't do this for me, I'll XXXX."
>
> If someone is giving ultimatums to you, you walk. Ultimatums are a cry for help because these people have lost control of you. You have free will, which is usually a bad thing for a person who's trying to control your actions with their guilt and shame.
>
> As I say with many confrontations, you don't avoid them, you turn them down.
>
> Not getting guilt and shamed by someone so desperately trying to is the answer. Walking away from a losing game is not avoiding confrontation as much as it is not wasting your breath on such a confrontation.
>
> You have better things to do, and trying to confront someone who has no interest in changing their behavior wastes your time.
>
> You do you. Let them worry about themselves."
>
> A Father's Journey: Guilt and Shame (2020 September 11)

In his post at Captain Capitalism, How Many People You Will Date Before You Marry (2020 September 12), Aaron Clarey notes that "dating is a very costly and necessary endeavor (for men) in order to find a wife." But it is possible to attract the attention of a woman by doing almost nothing.

Wintery Knight: Whose Job Is It To Teach Young, Unmarried Women Not To Delay Marriage? (2020 September 14)

Adam Piggott endorses the book written by Nikolai Vladivostok (the author of the Soviet Men site), The Poor Man's Guide to Financial Freedom.

Cornerstone reviews Cane Caldo's take on the Purity Movement (2020 September 15).

Cornerstone: All Or Nothing (2020 September 20) examines a piece at The Cut by Alex Morris, College Virgins Are a Mostly Silent Almost-Majority (2015 October 21). Cornerstone makes a hopeful case that young women are beginning to wake up to the travesties of the sexual revolution.

Christianity and Masculinity: Aaron Renn's The Manosphere and The Church (2020 September 28)

Deep Strength kick started a review of an interesting series about the Red Pill hosted by Aaron Renn at Theopolis: The Manosphere and the Church (2020 September 3).

I read all four of the Theopolis articles that have been published so far. Overall, I would describe them as a Red Pill primer geared towards Churchian audiences, and written in a neutral but widely appealing, rated G format (for general audiences). I think this is what makes this series so interesting – the fact that the Red Pill lore is breaking into mainstream Christian audiences and is receiving serious reviews. The fourth article from Bill Smith is the best, in my opinion. The other three (so far) betray hints of egalitarianism, and have arguments that are poorly developed.

I'm not sure what their intended purpose is, just yet. They purport to have a critical view of the Manosphere/RP, saying that it is untruthful/unBiblical, but their writings show that they don't have a very good grasp on RP lore just yet. Maybe they are working towards introducing the truths of the Manosphere to the wider public, maybe they are trying to warn men not to take the Red Pill, or maybe they are grifters trying to steal some thunder. We'll have to wait to see where their discussion goes to find out.

On Culture

> "The word 'hypocrisy' only makes sense in WEIRD countries. There is nothing strange about an Indian complaining about how Westerners discriminate against him, while also hiring only Indians and being racist against blacks. The reason is simple: he is Indian. He sees the world from his own point of view. To 85% of the world, that makes perfect sense."
>
> Soviet Men: You are WEIRD! (2020 September 8)

It's not just Indians, but most non-white foreigners. The argument that "all white people are racist" is a ploy to undermine WEIRD, WASP, white culture. It's time for white Americans to wake up to this reality.

> "There is one thing Leftists hate more than honesty, and that is bluntness."
>
> 1 Peter 5 (John C. Wright): Faith and Works in a Science Fictional Universe (2020 September 8)

> "These over-sexed values are part of a liberalized line of thinking which is meant to erase the gains of mankind on earth and to reset the trajectory of invention and science back to the beginning, which is what the Vico Cycle is all about, it starts with theocracy, then migrates into aristocracy, emerging into democracy, which is where parts of our society have been since the times of the Greeks and Romans, then eventually falls into anarchy, which is our present age—but as we can see from our current election, half of America wants to keep going and the other half wants to surrender to it and get back to nature, or otherwise, the beginning of the Vico Cycle."
>
> "The Jeffrey Epstein behavior isn't unusual, and liberals up and down the political ladder openly embrace pedophilia in the context that it has been presented to them through the arts, that fresh bodies just blooming into sexuality are pure and beautiful and meant to be enjoyed before they become wilted and slowly dying the moment they enter puberty. For liberals they accept that cycle as a fact of life and find enjoying the first years of sexuality the best and most pure.
>
> But don't be fooled by all the art talk and awards that have come from pedophilia because they are only rewards given to a dog for rolling over and doing what they are told. The behavior itself, just as it is to make pornography easy in our society over the internet is to pull the human mind back to the primitive and to keep people from considering higher thoughts. In the great battles of a human lifetime, the real turmoil that most people feel is the need for a higher self to control the lower self. But the goal of liberalism in every phase is to surrender to the lower self and that all notions of the higher self are rooted in sacrifice to the group order and impulses of the universe. Individuality is to be overcome, but for many, sex keeps a mind on primitive needs > always working with other people for the shared sexual experience, and once that obsession has taken over the mind from an adolescent to a young adult, then guilt keeps any single individual from becoming thoughtful and driven which assures a liberalized society into preserving the Vico Cycle well into the future. And that is the goal of making sex a primary political objective on the large stage of international politics, and why so many fall for its short term gains. At least with Christianity there is a desire to achieve higher individual thought above animal instincts and to manage them into Heaven. To eliminate that hope and desire, liberals hope to trap a mind in animal needs sexually by casting the mind to the greatest source of the freshly blossomed flowers of humankind, underage sex. And that is what makes it vast and evil, because it is truly a prison that is designed to hold a mind to the most primal aspects of existence, and nothing greater."

>
> Overman Warrior: Liberals and Underaged Sex –Why pedophilia is the Weapon of Democrats to Usher in a Reset of the Vico Cycle (2020 September 14)

> "People have allegiance to whatever gives them identity."
>
> Amerika (Brett Stevens): Blood Will Out 6 (2020 September 24)

Also at Amerika, Brett Stevens reviews a recent picture release, The Challenger: The Final Flight (2020) (2020 September 29). This story is of special interest to Xers, because the Challenger disaster is one of the shared cohorts of our generation.

While reading through, I had a very controversial thought. The Challenger debacle could be compared to the tower of Babel. That is, God stood against these endeavors that were a symbol of national pride and diversity and which attempted to reach to the heavens.

> "Modernity hates folklore because modernity is a rival lore. We can see this hatred when men steeped in modern lore use the word myth as a pejorative name for false and fantastic beliefs, and when they use the word legend to impugn a story with dubious authenticity. Men steeped in the modern lore may read old myths and legends for amusement; they may take them up with forceps for critical analysis, but they never take them seriously as wise words. They never cherish them as lore."
>
> The Orthosphere (J. M. Smith): Mythos and Logos (2020 September 29)

Here, "modern lore" refers to feminist ideology etc., and would not include Red Pill lore.

Larry's Musings: Enlightenment and Liberation (2020 September 30) reviews several major religions with respect to Christianity.

Collective Evolution (Arjun Walia): Large Study Concludes Mercury Can Now be Listed "As a Cause of Autism" (2020 October 1)

On the Modern Travesty of Marriage

- Red Pilled Dad: Decisions as votes, and why modern society is built to kill marriage. (2020 September 23)

- Rob Says: Marriage (2020 September 23)
- Marriage, Sex, and More: Marriage Has Devolved Into A Temporary Arrangement… (2020 September 25)

On Goals, Purposes, and Methods

Christianity and Masculinity: Frame is no frame without a mission (2020 September 5)

Red Pill Dad: This isn't a choice: you don't get to choose TRP–accept it, or accept the consequences. (2020 September 15)

RPMcMurphy tweeted,

> "Women don't give a $ћ!t about your character, and if you have nothing they care even less. Women are not attracted to smart/hard-working/loyal men. No. They're attracted to winners who f*ck them without mercy and appear successful. That's it guys. Stop f*cking pretending otherwise."

In his post, he writes,

> "Women value results, not character."
>
> "…women say they like guys with good character, when in reality, what they like are the results of what a guy with a good character typically accomplishes. Remember, as red pill men, we put process before results, but what you have to understand for women is that it's all about the results."

In response to an ongoing question about the right way to get into a Christian marriage, Ed Hurst concisely outlines the basic approach.

> "This is the basis for all my advice to younger men contemplating marriage: There is no good reason to get married unless it's for mission support. There are lots of good things that come with the marriage package, but none of them matter if the woman in question isn't fully committed to your mission. So a man must first be convinced of his mission before he even considers marriage.
>
> And given the context of where we are today versus the biblical model, the only proper way to proceed is if she comes into your life seeking to be the helpmeet Eve was supposed to be for Adam. Whatever else we might make of that term "helpmeet," the image starts with someone committed to supporting the God-given mission.
>
> The symbolism is that God brought Eve to Adam. Men should not go courting; that is backwards. Whomever is that woman's covering should seek to marry her off to someone for whom she is well suited. It should always be in pursuit of the shalom of the Kingdom of Heaven. That's always been the biblical model. In the Bible, one thing seems consistent in all cases: If the guy goes seeking and chooses his own bride, it turns out wrong. He should wait for God to bring her to him. It can still go wrong, but it doesn't have to. It is almost guaranteed it will go wrong otherwise. By the way, I was friends with my father-in-law before I met his daughter, and he encouraged our romance.
>
> Granted, in today's Western churches, this dynamic is seldom practiced. It should be that, if a woman attends a church without any male family serving as her covering, then it defaults to a male pastor (God has already forbidden female pastors). If her pastor/elder isn't much help in getting her married, regardless of the reason, then it falls to her to court the man she truly believes she is best fit to support in his mission. In other words, she courts him, not the other way around.
>
> She will have to do her best to discern whose mission feels like her mission.

> Side note: He should be too busy pursuing the Lord to have been chasing skirts. Skirt-chasing is equivalent to supplicating the gals, a form of idolatry. Men of God never supplicate a female for anything once they leave their mother's breast. There's nothing wrong with a guy being charming and charismatic to the gals, but he should know better than to believe their interest means anything until it comes in the context of the mission. She has to be a mission-minded gal.
>
> And this whole thing assumes she really is spiritually born and oriented on the mission of God. If the single mom is hanging out in the church trying to hook a decent man based on some other internal drive, men should flee her. The church women should pull her aside and begin training her. It's one thing to welcome her into the church fellowship in hopes she'll eventually walk in the Spirit. It's another thing to just assume any verbal announcement of commitment to Christ makes her immediately a prime participant in the marriage market. Rituals point to something important, but mean nothing in themselves. She has to come into the market from the women's fellowship all primed and ready to serve."
>
> Do What's Right: Idolatry Refugees in the Church Marriage Market (2020 September 11)

On Terms and Definitions

There are seven: Legalism, Covenants, Obedience, Obviating, Agency, Authority, and Matrilineal.

Once again, Ed Hurst puts us in touch with our souls.

> "Moral truth must be perceived directly, and only the heart has the faculty for such perception. The intellect can only interpret what it receives from the heart; the brain is incompetent to handle moral truth directly. It's good only for organizing and implementing moral obligations. The intellect is what gives us legalism when it rules; the heart prevents legalism when it rules over the brain."
>
> Do What's Right: Covenants 1 (2020 September 5)

That last sentence is the most concise definition of moral legalism I have ever come across.

Ed Hurst also wrote a series on Covenants. If you're unsure what a covenant is, or how it is different from a contract, then this is a must read.

Do What's Right: Covenants 01 – 02 – 03 – 04 – 05 — 06 (2020 September 9-10)

Edward D. Andrews, who is the chief translator of the Updated American Standard Version (UASV) gives us a succinct snapshot of Spiritual Obedience (and disobedience). (2020 September 15)

> "Do you not know that if you present yourselves to anyone as obedient slaves, you are slaves of the one whom you obey, either of sin, which leads to death, or of obedience, which leads to righteousness?"
>
> Romans 6:16

> "The first thing to do in examining the power that dominates me is to take hold of the unwelcome fact that I am responsible for being thus dominated because I have yielded. If I am a slave to myself, I am to blame for it because at a point away back I yielded myself to myself. Likewise, if I obey God I do so because I have yielded myself to Him."
>
> "There is no power in the human soul of itself to break the bondage of a disposition formed by yielding. Yield > for one second to anything in the nature of lust (remember what lust is: 'I must have it at once,' whether it be the lust of the flesh or the lust of the mind), once yield and though you may hate yourself for having yielded, you are a bond-slave to that thing. There is no release in human power at all, but only in the Redemption. You must yield yourself in utter humiliation to the only One Who can break the dominating power, viz., the Lord Jesus Christ."

>
> "He hath anointed Me … to preach deliverance to the captives."

Over at the Orthosphere, Richard Cocks writes about the role of Agency and the Criminal Justice System (2020 September 17). Here, he philosophically describes agency.

> "An agent is the locus of decision-making. If [causal] determinism is true, and there is no free will, then no person is "deciding" anything. Agency would be an illusion."
>
> "Without agency, we are in no position to assess truth or falsity. You are forced by mechanical means [viz. causal determinism] to whatever you think, not by reasons. If he happens to think [any proposition to be] true, that is of no significance whatsoever. If determinism is true, which it could logically be, then further discussion is otiose. There is no person/agent discussing anything; just a stalk of grass blowing in the wind."

Richard Cocks goes on to say that having agency is (at least) one trait that makes one truly human. I'll add that this particular trait is also the one that opens the door to (1) true authentic obedience to the Holy Spirit, (2) the potential pursuance of sin, and/or (3) repentance.

Amerika (Brett Stevens): A Party Not of Right but of Right Now (2020 September 30)

