This was a really intense process. All that I understood to be real was very intensely placed in my face as total and utter horseshit. I was so shaken by all of this that I was sick to my stomach pretty much every day, and my insomnia kicked in because I was so shocked. In life coaching, we call this a "death process," death of identity. And, holy shit, did my identity get kicked in the face! A terrifying experience, but that is growth and that's how you wake up. More terrifying than identity death process are the horrors you support by staying asleep. I had no idea how asleep I really had been, and it scared the shit out of me. Here I was thinking I had taken such a stand for equality—what a deep lie that was; I was completely oblivious to how deep this attack on men went.

A commenter said I had rage-quited. I came back with "I'm not going anywhere! I came here to get information on how to help men and damn it I'm going anywhere without it" … again, more fem armoring. I kept asking for help and clarification on what patriarchy meant or didn't mean; I was completely confused. However, that was just more of me saying, "Men, do the work for me" and not digging myself. As I was commenting on AVfM, the site became a sanctuary for me after every debate I had with a feminist; it became a well of sanity, as did NCFM, even though at first I was still very unconscious with my comments.

This process was roughly two very intense weeks. I had started to shift my view on society and misunderstandings about society quite a bit. A Honey Badger said that I, too, was a Honey Badger, but I was in no way going to support a movement that was called a Men's Rights Movement. I had spent my life being duped by the so-called Women's Rights Movement and had lost all trust in any gender-specific group. I would only call myself a Human Rights Activist. She shared how she, too, was a Human Rights Activist and that was exactly why she was a part of the Men's Rights Movement. I wasn't at the point where I could understand what she meant.

I started to research the Human's Rights Movement but found they, too, were just an extension of feminism. Domestic violence was fixed solely under the "women" section. What the hell? So, I turned my attention back to the Men's Rights Movement. I was listening intently to what the men and women were sharing, but I still wasn't sure. And I really was still confused on the patriarchy not being real. What world am I in? Everything I thought was real was revealing itself to be … not real and, worse, intentional lies.

So I began to dig. I read many articles on AVfM and finally came across Karen Straughan. This is the video that gave me the final push to wake up: "Feminism and the Disposable Male."

There was o turning back from that information, and with everything that I had been researching and reading and the small glimpses I had had throughout my life, this was it, this is what I was looking for. I started to watch more MRA videos and get involved with more debates with feminists who were just downright nasty. I'll never forget the first time I was called a misogynist. It was as if my voice was choked in my throat. The person had completely shut out every statistic I presented, every logical discussion I had brought forth with "You're a misogynist." I said, "I'm a woman." "Well, women can be misogynists too." Holy crap. This is what men feel when their voices are silenced. I had just entered the world of "Your voice is shit." I was sad that these women I had spent my life standing by, my so-called sisters, would not hear my voice or my call for them to wake up. But the sadness didn't last very long; it was replaced with a deep rage. Oh yeah? I started poking them every chance I got. You don't want to hear me? I'll make you listen. And this is why I have so very much space for the anger of men. At the time, I had only just experienced this feeling of my voice being shut up—how did men deal with this shit their whole lives? Yes, very much me waking up to my privilege as a woman and my entitlement.

I started to see that I didn't live in a world filled with "misogynists." The world suddenly felt safer. I really did live in fear of rape all the damn time as a feminist. I feared travel, I feared every damn thing! I lived in a terrifying world that I had no idea I had subscribed to! I remember reading a comment on AVfM about a man proposing to get rid of the "women and children first" policy aboard ships and instead make it "children and pregnant women first, then everyone else, first-come first-serve" and that would then be equality, when women were not treated as children. I let that sink in … it scared the shit out of me! The fact that it scared me shocked me even more, holy entitlement! Whoa, I was being opened to the levels of my deep-seated feeling of superiority that I had thought I had rid myself of. I wouldn't be put first? I would have to face the fact of my child living without me? Of course, yes, this is all very hypothetical, but it brought a very powerful awareness to me to the point of terrifying me that whole damn day. I felt sick to my stomach again. Holy shit, I would face the possibility of death? I was always against the draft and I don't think it should exist, but then I started to think about how men must feel to HAVE to sign up for this. What it would feel like to leave my child behind; there are fathers who have no choice but to leave their children behind, men who are not fathers who barely lived their life but have to go face death to save their country. Or sign up with the promise of help for school. These men with no help from the government to pay for college because they are men have to look death in the face for the chance of an education if they live? WHAT? And how privileged is that, I experienced this horror for a day! Men GROW UP with this! I guarantee that if the draft were necessary for all genders, we would not have a draft. But men do; men are raised with that requirement.

From there on, I was very clear that I was a Honey Badger—an endearing term for female MRAs. I do all I can as an MRA to spread the word of the Men's Rights Movement.

Our society treats men as if they are inherently dangerous criminals just for being born male; this is the misandry that many boys are raised with, and sadly many begin to believe they have no worth and their voices don't matter. Men are told to shut up and be "polite" if they want to be heard. We've listened to the voice of women for so long, completely uncensored, and men must be heard equally uncensored for us to move forward.

The MRM is the voice that is missing in our society. To deny the voice of men as vital, to shame men, to treat men as disposable, to treat a boy as if he is less than is unjust.

A lot of my rage was self-anger for allowing myself to be so unconscious towards men for so long. Awful. But I'm awake now, red pill swallowed.

I'm currently researching and reading to write the book itself, since I finally know what it's about. Men don't need to change, they are just fine, amazing, and beautiful just the way they are. The world stopped loving men a long time ago and definitely stopped celebrating men; it's not men who need to change, it's how the world views and treats men that needs to evolve.

In order to really love men, you must stand up for their rights; otherwise, you're just telling yourself a lie, like I did for so long. I, for one, will take the face-slapping truth over a sugar-coated mirage any damn day.

The little boy carrying flowers to Janet Bloomfield – #womenagainstfeminism

AVfM Video Source · 3 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is a long radio segment and a lot of parts are hard to listen to—the smooth Aussie voices are soothing, but the dull feminist boilerplate they spew ranges from dumb to rage-inducing.

Still, the presenter/moderator, Natasha Mitchell, was surprisingly fair, and our intrepid JudgyBitch, Janet Bloomfield, held her own and carried the day during her interview with Australian Radio—a show that had plenty of fireworks along the way and built slowly and painfully to a devastatingly moving surprise ending. The editors here at AVfM debated whether to edit it or not—and we still might; do feminists clone their numb-skull fanatical callers in vats of snake oil?—but for now, here it is complete in all its wonderful and wretched glory.

Please try to hang on until the end—or skip ahead to the 51:00 minute mark if you must—but the next-to-last caller to the broadcast has an incredible story of what feminists did to her middle child, a five-year-old boy. When the show (finally!) gets back to her at 54:00, Janet Bloomfield's reaction is priceless, and the feminist guests couldn't run away fast enough.

The gift that this one little boy brings to all of us is the reminder of why we work so hard to build a world where both boys and girls can grow up knowing they are loved for whom they are by parents who share their trials and struggles with them, together, in the healthy families that every child deserves.

Buh bye, feminism.

—A.L.

Note: Article also available in Swedish.

Ray of darkness: The chilling effect on Black men of Stephen A. Smith's suspension

Ty Henry · 4 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"An appeaser is one who feeds a crocodile—hoping it will eat him last."—Churchill

When a man can be put in the stocks for saying "punches may lead to punches, so let's not punch anyone" on a male-targeted show, fem-centrism has reached critical contaminant stage.

Mix in a White woman and a little The Birth of a Nation–style racial dog-whistle blowing and we're at 28 Weeks Later territory, complete with mindless zombies who make the sane among us tiptoe in fear, afraid to sneeze lest we be relieved of sentient existence.

I speak, of course, of the reputation-lynching of First Take analyst Stephen A. Smith.

The comparisons are inexact, but he can reasonably be called the Digital Dick Rowland, having accidentally stepped on Sarah Page's foot, causing her to cry out when he meant nothing by it. His colleague, SportsNation host Michelle Beadle, may reasonably be called Sarah Page, a mob summoned by her wails to go on a rampage.

It all started with this exchange with his co-hosts, Skip Bayless and Cari Champion: the pertinent part in the clip above; the context framed by the quote below.

> Smith (to Bayless)—"You say you don't care if she hit or not. Let me make everybody uncomfortable by saying I DO care. But let me tell you why. It's not about him then. It's about you. And here's what I mean by that. We keep talking about the guys. We know you have NO business putting your hands on a woman . . ."

The foregoing is an adequate qualifier for the "provoke" discussion that followed. There is your "outrageous" statement, that if the first blows were struck by Janay Palmer and not Ray Rice, that makes a difference. After all, if a punch, or series of them, is not "provocation" to a fight, then the word ceases to have meaning. On the other hand, in a world where domestic violence is now refusing to give your girlfriend money, it's easy to see how Smith's measured and innocuous words became "EAT THE CAKE, ANNA MAE!" Nevertheless, it's no less disconcerting to those of us with third grade listening comprehension skills. Unfortunately, the mob of online drones who responded to the Twitter dog-whistle of SportsNation host Michelle Beadle couldn't be bothered to look that far, or to listen that closely.

Even if I were inclined to give Beadle the benefit of the doubt that she was apparently unsure whether Smith was saying that words are provocation enough, maybe she owed her colleague the courtesy of a direct call or message to discuss the matter privately before putting the matter on blast. After all, it is a matter of company policy. I'm not so inclined, of course. Beadle's white female privilege was offended, so she took to Twitter to publicly clutch her pearls . . . and wave her panties, primed to play the Pavlovian card every White woman can wield as easily as Eragon summoning his dragon. Like the Pied Piper of Hamelin, her virtual notes took wind, a siren song calling her minions to come in hordes to save her from Da Big Black Victim Blamer, punctuating her tune with this discordant note.

> I'm thinking about wearing a miniskirt this weekend…I'd hate to think what I'd be asking for by doing so @stephenasmith. #dontprovoke
>
> — Michelle Beadle (@MichelleDBeadle) July 25, 2014

When Black men in America implicate violations of a White woman's sexual chastity, they know all too well what comes next when her distress signals, authentic or not, reach a critical mass of ~~White male~~ ears. More White women amplify the signal, it becomes a feedback loop, and men are driven to action.

And act they did in the instant matter, nearly collapsing the Internet with the predictable bottleneck of rage, climbing over each other like mindless Orcs scaling a castle wall, with slings, arrows, and axes of ad hominems, angry ripostes, and name-calling. The hounds had been released, had followed the scent, and were not going home without their quarry. All that was missing were the words "GIVE US THE NIR!"

Faced with a binary choice of "hanging together" with Smith, the Sheriff, ESPN chief John Skipper, opened the cell door and looked the other way.

Of course, the ultimate action taken against Smith was not as final as those taken in Black Tulsa, Scottsboro, Duluth, or Mississippi, the process that led to his suspension certainly mirrored it. Beadle cynically played on this archetypical relic, the "Sexually Aggressive Sub-Human" Black to amplify what is actually a legitimate concern. Her tactics were egregious, however, but they guaranteed that her redress would be fast-tracked and her pound of flesh delivered via the express lane of mob justice. Beadle's indignence turned a man who for 10 years has repeated, ad infinitum, "It is NEVER OK to put your hands on a woman" into an enabler of back alley rapists, and laughed at the carnage she wrought, as did the women who posed gleefully aside the charred and limp swinging Black bodies, as if they were trophies.

Ironically, Smith suffered pseudo-proxy violence while nobly issuing preventive measures to forestall the need for the real thing.

> See, I know what I'm gon' do if someone touches a female member of my family . . . I know what my boys gon' do . . . I'm gonna have to get law enforcement officials because I'm a have to remind myself that I work for [ESPN] because of what I'm gonna be tempted to do . . . But what I've implored the female members of my family . . . let's make sure we don't do anything to PROVOKE wrong actions . . . because even after . . .

The implication, in context, is unambiguous. Chivalrous males like Smith will always reflexively avenge a physical attack upon a woman they know. Because of that, if a woman starts the physical component of the partner dispute, she's setting in motion a chain of events that puts her and, ultimately, her man and the men who come to her defense in harm's way. She must understand, once events are set in motion, those events are in the driver's seat, not her. "At LEAST give me the piece of mind that I'm not whupping some guys ass in vain," Smith seemed to say, on behalf of men everywhere.

The falsity of an accusation may not be discovered until it's too late for the accused or, in some cases, the White Knight himself. It certainly came too late for Daniel Cicciaro. He heard the damsel call that a friend had been threatened with rape by a Black boy at their prom. Gathering a mob of like-minded Italians, they set upon the boy and gave chase to his home. By night's end, the Black boy's father, John White, was in a jail cell, having ended the chase at his home by sending young Daniel to the morgue with his pistol. The rape threat was a hoax, of course, but the damage was done.

We know that questioning the gender narrative prompts any man to be purged in this age. That risk is amplified for a Black man who offends a White women with rape anywhere in the field of discourse. While many brothers spoke up on Twitter and in the blogosphere, many likely will keep proverbial "doors locked" for the time being to rational but uncomfortable discussions on the matter of violent women, feeling as unsafe freely exploring the issue as Black men felt looking askance at a White woman in the wake of a fresh crop of "Strange Fruit" blossoming fetid from trees, let alone stepping on their feet.

EPILOGUE

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1LSBHtaeVs4&w=560&h=315]

While crafting this piece, starting Tuesday, I harkened back to this December 2012 Rational Male post about the first time Smith dispensed red pill wisdom, in the video above, this time after an appearance by NFL pariah Chad Johnson, an actual batterer. Smith spring-boarded to a broader, tangential issue, that of men compelled by circumstance to "fall on their sword" at the expense of "the whole truth," often in matters of infidelity. Indeed, when a female reporter asked Rice Thursday, during public mea culpa #2, "What actually happened in that elevator?" Rice knew his duty and charge. It was to be both take ownership of his substantial part, but also to play sin-eater. "My wife can do no wrong. She is an angel." If that sounds familiar, we heard it from the most famous male domestic violence victim five years ago—Tiger Woods.

There was also another sin-eater in this episode, albeit force-fed. That Smith was not upbraided for and exiled to broadcast "time out" for the 2012 segment, but was for last the July 25 segment, suggests that the outrage over the "suspension" is a smokescreen. Chad Johnson suffered the trifecta for his crime: jail time, divorce, and the loss of his NFL career. Moreover, that segment was many months after the punishment. Rice suffered none of these, the wound was still fresh, and the mob fury needed an outlet. In this case, it was a whipping boy—Smith.

Paul Elam: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Paul Elam · 4 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We will over the next few weeks continue to present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. Here we bring you Paul Elam's speech, the final speech from Day 1, June 27, 2014, introduced by Warren Farrell.

As always, thanks to Rick Westlake for doing the bulk of the work on all these transcripts.–DE

(Attila Vinczer)

Our next guest will be Paul Elam. He will be introduced by Warren Farrell.

I want to share with you a quick little thing that happened to me at the border crossing when I was on my way down here. The guard actually grilled me quite a bit, and he wondered – he asked a question, "Why would you drive 300 miles to go to the VFW?" And I tried to answer in a manner that would be conducive to what he would want to hear; I just wanted to get out of there. But it really stuck in my head: Why do I do the things that I do? Why would I come here, drag my father along, my two boys, spend a few days here – why would I do this? Many people, asking why.

The reason is, I care about my father. I care about my sons. I care about my fellow man. I also care about women. But I'm noticing that — my sons included, as they're going through school, they're not being treated very equitably. It's a problem for me. And, in a sense, I would like to thank everyone here, for taking this time, for Paul putting this incredible piece together, this conference; because it really is helping my boys and other young boys that are growing up in a world that is not very friendly to them.

Would you please introduce Paul Elam?

(Applause. Warren Farrell takes the podium, and beckons up Paul Elam.)

I want to stand next to somebody that's taller than I am – I think you'll do.

I just want to tell you that I didn't hear about A Voice for Men until a few years ago. When I heard about it, I heard about it like a lot of people hear about it; there's a lot of angry men out there, expressing their feelings, and you know, they're discriminating against women, they must be misandrists–and I said to myself–I didn't even look at that, I didn't investigate that–I internalized, after a lifetime of working on men's and women's issues, I internalized the probability of the truth of that, without even checking it out. If I, who have spent my life working on these issues, didn't have the awareness to check this out, what type of–

When I did check it out, I found that there was "Humanist" right in the title. There were articles from all over the world! There were people that were hurt and that were angry; there were people that were writing intellectually; there was Miles Groth, there were people who were gay, there were people who were African American; there were people who represented, in their diversity, exactly the opposite of everything that I was hearing! And I was realizing, had not Warren Farrell had … (Microphone problems)

… "you, more than anyone else, perhaps, have the experience of being attacked, for things that are not at all close to what you are saying, what you feel, what you believe. And yet, your first instinct was to go exactly where everybody who had attacked you had gone."

And so, I felt bad about that when I looked at the website.

But then I had something else happen with me. I met Paul. And we met at my home, when Cassie Jay, a woman who is doing a documentary here, was interviewing both of us. And I heard him articulate the feelings and the fears, and the movement; and I heard a lot of the same types of things that I feel, that I was trying to articulate and put forward. And what I also heard and felt was a really warm, loving, caring man. And a warm, loving, caring man who had not so fallen into the trap of warm-loving-and-caring that he couldn't express something more than warm-loving-and-caring – he couldn't express outrage, he couldn't express anger – and that he had enough courage that he could allow anger on his site. Because … (A/V difficulties)

… perspective. And so for women to be able to understand their anger – emote their anger, and their feelings and their fears; and then for me – (A/V difficulties)

… that wouldn't be expressed also by us, was both unfair to men – it was my own form of sexism, but it was also was unfair to a movement. A movement often attracts people in pain, and its job is to channel that in a healthy way. But Paul has understood – (A/V difficulties)

(Dean Esmay shouts, from below podium) Hey, everybody, we're running ahead of schedule, believe it or not! Let's take a ten-minute break while we figure this out!

(Break for the audio/video crew to handle the problems.)

(Paul Elam steps up to podium)

Ladies and gentlemen, could you take your seats, please? We're about to start again.

(Break in video)

You must like that chair. You know, there are steps right there.

(Warren Farrell) See, it's a metaphor for the eyes, always take the hard way — so, should I stay behind these mikes, or can I move around? – Okay. Testing – we're about ready to begin again … Yeah, that – amazing.

(Paul Elam) Excuse me, if we could, everybody, could we get everyone to take a seat, please? We're about to start again.

(Warren Farrell) Paul said, "You were saying really nice things about me, Warren, so if that was not recorded, you've got to repeat those things." (Laughter)

The real conspiracy was not the feminists, putting those things that, that … it was the conspiracy to say something like that twice. Which I am extremely happy to do.

I was saying, what – When I was initially introduced to AVfM; it was from a distance, and it was before I had ever seen the site. And some people told me that the site was angry, and there were people that were angry; and I confessed, I confess now, to, at that point in my life, thinking, Oh – angry men out there; that's discrediting the efforts that we're making. And I didn't even look at the site. And here, you know – if you look ME up on Google, you find a lot of negative things about me, here and there; and it's sort of like I trust that those things — I've convinced my wife those things aren't true.

And so I mean, I was worried, and so, knowing all of that, and having spent so many years of my life being distorted, and accepting that, and working on that internally – I still retained the sexism inside of myself, of not allowing myself to think, "Maybe these are false attacks. Maybe these are false accusations." And I said – later, when I looked up the website, and saw this underneath the headline, "Humanist Theory" – well, this at least doesn't start out saying, you know, "hate-women theory." So, I started going down, and I saw this sweetheart named Tom Golden writing for it, who I happen to know; he's worked with me, and he's one of the nicest human beings you'll ever hear speak. And so, I was thinking, well, if he's associated with this, this must be good.

And then I kept reading other things, by the people; people from India, people from African-American background, people from gay persuasions, people who were women, people who were feminist in their orientation. And then, I started speaking to Paul, and Paul said he had invited thirteen feminists, thirteen times, to appear with him, to talk these issues through; assuring them that he would give them some type of sense of protection, and some type of — at least 50% of the time to speak. And so, I thought, "this is good." Then I had this experience, where I actually met Paul. And I met Paul in my home, when Cassie Jay was doing a documentary on what's called the Men's Rights–MRAs; which I believe should be called Men's Issues, but that's another issue.

We're sitting in there, and Paul is talking about this issues, in ways that resonate with the things that I've been writing about, thinking about, feeling, trying to articulate, for years. But there's a difference. There's a difference between Paul and I. And the difference was that my message was only barely being heard. Paul was putting out there, to tens of thousands of people, these issues. He was secure enough internally to allow the space for the anger. He knew intuitively — like I knew intuitively (but I was with the National Organization for Women) that when Valerie Solanas wrote the SCUM Manifesto, that the Feminist Movement should not be defined by a book that is called "The Society for Cutting Up Men Manifesto" And so, there's always going to be unhealthy people drawn to every movement, and we need to let them share what they are doing, or be active in the way that Tom was talking about, or to be able to honor something differently as Tom was talking about. And then, with that activity, with that ability to express the feelings in whatever way counts, that would be able to create part of the healing process.

But we had something else going on here.

As I looked over the site, I saw that this was not just a website. This was a person who had reached out to thousands of people, all around the country and the world, that was piecing together pieces that no one else in the history of men's issues had ever been able to piece together. They were piecing together political pieces, they were piecing together humanist pieces. And that meant he was working with thousands of people. And tomorrow I'll be talking about some of those people that he was working with, and acknowledging them. But right now I saw that it was people from many different walks of life, many of whom were working as volunteers. When a person can do that, that means that they are able to cooperate; they are able to work with – they are able to inspire. And so, here's a man who is able to write, able to inspire, and as I got to know him, a man who truly loves his wife, Stacey; and when she couldn't make it this weekend, rather than say, "You've got to come here and support me," he supported her to support what she needed to do when she was there. From my perspective, that's what a man needs to do. He needs to care, he needs to love, he needs to think, he needs to have courage; he needs to be able to provide a space for anger. He needs to be someone like Paul Elam.

Thank you.

(Applause; Paul hugs Warren and steps to the podium.)

Thank you. Thank you, Warren. I think the first thing I want to say, I want to talk to whoever was responsible for having me follow Tom Golden, Barbara Kay, and Warren Farrell. (Laughter)

Oh, wait – that was me! So I will have to live with it.

Thank you so much, Warren, for that very warm introduction, and thank you all for being here, and for the very warm introduction and welcome that you've given to this conference.

I have a talk, today, planned to speak some about the issues of blue-collar men. However, as is always the case with AVfM, it's a shifting landscape; different things happen. There's one thing now that I know; thanks to the technical brilliance of the people at the back of the room – despite the sound problems — we are now streaming this live on YouTube. It is going out. (Applause)

I'm going to address something that I got up here especially to address earlier today; something that's really weighing heavy on me. And that's the situation that we had with a man who came here, who I saw; and, in talking to him, felt like he was a very lonesome individual, I'm sure with some emotional issues. And he'd touched people in a way that was not sexual – men, other men – that was not sexual, but it was sort of a come-on that was inappropriate — I'm sorry? — Okay; from what I've witnessed. And I certainly didn't take it as sexual. However, I trust that you survived the experience. And for those needing it, we will have Calvin Mann make "survivor" t-shirts.

I do want to say that I'm saddened, because I heard that in the media, the Detroit Press, that they came out – one of the writers came out, said that he had come here and been molested by this man. I had an encounter with the man; I did not interpret it that way. And, once I found out about that, I did happen to see him in the parking lot, and I had to ask him to leave. Which I hated doing. I hated asking somebody to leave here, because they might have emotional problems. And that's part of what we're dealing with here.

And it reminded me of something that's going on right now, and has been for years.

If you go to the Department of Justice website, the US DoJ website, right now, you will see a statistic from our Attorney General that asserts that "the number-one cause of death for African-American women between 15 and 44 is Intimate Partner Violence." It's the same Department of Justice that does not even have that on the top 15 causes of death. What is our Department of Justice saying about men – and, in particular, African-American men – to put this lie up on a Government website?

And to repeat it: despite the fact that Christina Hoff Sommers, three years ago, wrote an open letter to Eric Holder about this, that was published in USA Today? As far as I know, it remains, to this day; it is not going to be moved. This is some of the difficulty that we're facing.

But I just wanted to get out there, how saddened I was to ask this man to leave. And I look forward to the time when we can have a conference where there might be some help, here, for him.

(Applause)

Thank you.

Blue-collar men – If we look at this building, and this building in particular, which was paid for in blood; if we look at our society at large, the standard of living that we have, the roads we drive on, the planes that we flew here on, designed, built, engineered, almost primarily by men; if you look throughout history, and you look at everything from pyramids, to aqueducts, to these engineering marvels, you will see a standard of living from all that, eventually, that led to a standard of living like nothing before in human history; much of it paid for with the sacrifice of men. Yet now, we look at those men – and I can tell you, as somebody with a blue-collar background – as something less.

I started AVfM from a semi truck, with a laptop, driving ten, twelve hours a day – well, no, it was only ten, because the DOT says I could only – (Laughter)

But my logbook reflected ten hours a day of driving. And I sat there each evening and wrote from that laptop, to start A Voice for Men. And now, look at you. Just look at this. It's amazing. And it obviously wasn't me that did it; it was a lot of people.

I'm going to wander a minute, because I don't want to forget. One of the ways that I've seen AVfM characterized, particularly by the SPLC, was that it was a mouthpiece for myself. So apparently, all the writers for AVfM that are here, all the crew that's working — In particular, I want to point out AVfM Italy, which is now published in Italian; AVfM Brazil, which is published in Portuguese; and the several other affiliates that we have, of people writing original content, who live in their countries, are not mouthpieces for Paul Elam. I also want to take this opportunity to announce that on August 1st, we are going to launch two more websites – AVfM Hebrew, and AVfM Farsi – on the same day.

(Applause)

And the individuals that are responsible for launching those two sites are working together.

I'm not going to talk a long time today. I want to just close this by telling you a story about blue-collar men. And not of all their magnificent accomplishments, but of some of the sadness that I've experienced in looking at their lives; and in particular, one of them that I wrote a piece about, my uncle Walter.

We used to visit my Aunt Johnnie when I was a youth, every Sunday. She baked fresh bread, and the whole house just was like a bakery when you walked in the door. It was magnificent. And we would sit around her kitchen table, and eat bread, and talk. And I think at this time, I was twelve. And I really wasn't even consciously aware that I had an uncle. And I went running through the house one Sunday, while I was there; and there was this aging man, laying on a bed by himself. And I could look at him and see that something was draining the life out of him. Because he just lay there. While the rest of the house was filled with the sounds of family and the smell of fresh bread, Walter lay there by himself, trying to catch up on rest.

There was something about that moment that frightened me, and I think it was because I saw a possible future, for myself, that I didn't want to see. I couldn't wrap my head around all of it, but it was something that I felt; and I wondered who this guy was, and at the same time, I was so frightened I ran out of the room.

And my next memory was of his funeral. And it wasn't that much longer from that day. And I remember my Aunt Johnnie standing there, sobbing and wailing so profoundly that she had to be propped up by a relative on each elbow; she was in such grief.

And I thought about that moment, just not too long ago; and I remember with shame how he and his work were forgotten, even in his own home. And forgotten by me, after that day that I saw him and walked off.

And I think that experience really drives a lot of what I do.

We could go on all day about the greatness of all these men that make sure that things work, that the world works; and how they are the living answer to things like "The End of Men." I don't know if anybody's read that; I have. Saying that men aren't rela[vent]–This could only be an idea entertained by somebody so disconnected from the real world that they think that there's air-conditioning bunnies that are pushing cool air into this room; and that when they flush their toilet, the Poop Fairy takes everything away and sends it out of our way. You have to be very, very disconnected from the real world.

There won't be an End of Men, because that would be the End of Us.

And that's all I have for today. I just want to thank you all for being here.

(Applause; Paul leaves the podium, then returns.)

I thought I would come back up while you were still applauding. A couple of things:

We are having an Appreciation Dinner here tonight. You are all invited. Everybody in this room is welcome to attend … what we'll ask for you to do is perhaps, as we close for now, if we can get some "esprit de corps" here, and move the chairs where the Security staff will direct. We just need to move the chairs out of the way. You're welcome to come here. It's free for everybody. We'll probably have a tip jar, or something like that, to help out; but please be sure to come. There's some special things during that dinner that we'd like you to see.

Seven-thirty. That's it!

Liberate women from third-wave feminism

Anonymous Contributor · 4 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Nothing is more quintessentially American than self-ownership.

This precept guides conservative and libertarian ideology, and served as the fundamental tenet of the original women's movement in the United States. It is no surprise that the high ideal of personal liberty resonates so strongly with our youth today, though it has been reshaped to serve the aims of collectivists. Feminists today dangle personal liberty away from women, as if it is something to achieve instead of their natural right. Through dishonest scholarship and the politics of envy, modern feminists have perverted a movement about the dignity of self-ownership into a hysterical mob.

By creating a false, hostile version of reality, gender feminists' institutionalized victim mentality and pathologically unhealthy views of masculinity are what actually hold their largely middle-class constituency back—moreso than any "structural barrier" or "social construct." These wolves in sheep's clothing are determined to cede women's agency to the state and "experts" in the ivory tower. Feminists purport to care for women's health and autonomy but peddle propaganda that undermines both. Feminist mothers are stricken attempting to reconcile toxic dogma with love of their sons, pained to bring up their male children under the assumption that they are "raising the enemy."

Feminist theory, pervasive in public education and universities, parts young women from their power by fostering dependence on protected classing and keeping them beholden to the ultimate authoritarian: Leviathan. Given the eerily dogmatic tone of feminists today, this is a happy marriage. Feminists continue to widen their net to claim increasingly finer areas of our private lives, such as characterizing interactions between women and men as negotiations of power differentials. Microaggressions: can the "oppression" of women get any more molecular?

Rather than admit that American women are the freest of any women in the long, bloody struggle for Western civilization, today's indoctrinated cadets and their demagogues prefer to lead off with self-righteous fits over the dangers of being a woman in the United States. Real oppression is not self-consciousness; it is a 10-year-old Afghan girl, raped by a 45-year-old mullah, being faced with an honor killing.

But narcissistic American feminists still yearn for their war. Instead of attempting to specialize in a lucrative, in-demand field and make the most of their freedom to advance, many young women will martyr themselves in gender studies and social work, proclaiming the barbarism of the status quo. They will self-select out of the competitive fray and bemoan their persecution, apparently not connecting causes and effects.

Nothing impedes women from standing on their own two feet like today's protectionist gendersphere. Feminists have supplanted the patriarchy. Modern feminists and their relationship to the philosophical concept of agency is illustrative. In philosophy, that fever dream of dead white males, an "agent" is an entity that acts in the world. An action by an agent is usually described as a decision followed by the production of bodily movements in service of the decision. How can the locus of control be external for an individual's physical behavior? Feminists would have you believe that society is responsible for intentional behavioral choices of females that result in undesirable outcomes.

By denying female agency, today's feminists corrupt true equity. Asymmetrical sympathy for female criminals and whitewashing women as non-violent (casting men with the opposite aspersion) is a common example. When I volunteered at a women's shelter, our trainer carefully emphasized that we not assign responsibility to women for remaining in abusive situations. I asked, "But what if there are children involved? Aren't they dependent on their mother to save them from domestic abuse?" She maintained that even when children were involved, no blame should be assigned to the woman for continuing to expose her children to abuse. This woman's opinions are not an anomaly; she is a seasoned veteran of the DV/SV community.

Feminist activists separate women's behavior from their intentions, and thus infantilize them. The would-be powerful refrain of pro-abortion activists, "My body, my choice!," puts the cart before the horse. Its irrational selective responsibility demands we defer to the protester's judgment, while their predicament is a result of their poor judgment. This holds water, unless we subscribe to victimhood myths that women are not responsible for their behavior due to their "social conditioning." The conditioning of inferiority is reinforced more by tenured feminist academics and grievance-mongering journalists than it is in the real world. Feminist academics define human struggles in the language of gender, leading their young adherents to explain their life problems through a misleading lens.

Assuming that women's intentions do not determine their outcomes should be offensive to anyone who believes women are rational. The facility of judgment is asexual. Women are actors; they are not acted upon. Women are not apples in a barrel laid bare to the appetites of bobbing men. This deterministic passivity and learned helplessness is part and parcel of victimhood, integral to the psychology of captivity and eulogized by feminists as a woman's unique plight.

Those living in fear under third-wave feminism are the victims of feminist scholars, politicians, and shills. Sadly, the freest women in the history of mankind are being groomed into a victim-class. They believe they are caught in the vise grip of a hostile, conspiratorial, and specifically misogynist force. In their sense of dire persecution, they fail to realize that their identity politics erode their freedom as self-governing agents.

It's a despicable, self-fulfilling prophecy, and its hypocritical architects should be held to account. Young women are often simply experiencing the normal insecurity of early adulthood. They don't need bitter women with an axe to grind hijacking their anxiety in order to enlist them as Junior Trauma Officers.

Any ideology that denies your agency cannot be a loving one: it wants to use you.

It gains control through dependence. The key for young women, depressed by their sense of powerlessness, is to step away from the victim paradigm and exult in the freedom to shape their own lives.

Editorial note: This item originally published on Pocket Full of Liberty. —DE

The Gondoliers: Exploring the privilege of dis-privilege

Steve Jones · 4 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's all in the definition; once something has been defined as an evil, it will be universally rejected. This was a theme of a recent talk by philosopher Stefan Molyneux. By example, Molyneux spoke of the slave trade. No one supports slavery anymore, and even the cretins who participate in the modern slave trade cannot defend their actions. But up until slavery was recognized as an evil, a small percentage of the population would defend this practice.

Likewise, once a group has been identified as dis-privileged in society, few if any will defend that inequity.

Of course, there are some exceptions, as we are humans complete with all the failings that this entails. As I have always said, people will cast themselves in a good light: we know better the trials and tribulations that we ourselves have suffered and it is much easier to be sympathetic to our own personal experiences. We are, of course, rational, thinking beings and can recognize and resist our own self-biases. We are also susceptible to the influence of ideology and are capable of rejecting fairness toward ourselves in favour of a group we perceive as oppressed.

These points were not lost on W. S. Gilbert when he penned what would become one of Gilbert and Sullivan's more successful operettas, The Gondoliers; or The King of Barataria.

The overall theme of this operetta, first performed in 1889, seems to be the folly of blind adherence to ideology. However, if you look a little deeper, you can see underlying themes that still resonate today—perhaps stronger than ever.

Act I is set in a blue collar community in Venice, occupied primarily by gondoliers and their families, all of whom are staunch republicans who abhor rank and hold all people to be equals (except, perhaps, gondoliers, who are masters of their trade … remember, everyone casts themselves in a good light).

As the curtain rises, we see two dozen young women who are busy binding roses into bouquets. Presently some of the young men in the community arrive, smiling politely and tipping their hats to the women, attempting to win favour. The women react coldly; they have no interest in these men. When asked for whom they are preparing these "floral tributaries extraordinary" [Good morrow pretty maids], the women explain in harsh terms that they are all in love with gondoliers Marco and Giuseppe, two brothers who will be coming that day to choose their brides. Once these two men have made their choices, the remaining women may deign to look upon the other gondoliers as their second option.

> "—But what of us, who one and all adore you?
> Have pity on our passions, we implore you"
>
> "—These gentlemen must make their choice before you
> In the meantime, we tacitly ignore you
> When they have chosen two, that leaves you plenty,
> Two dozen we, and ye are four and twenty"

Throughout, we see the men tiptoeing around the women's feelings while the women treat the men with disregard for their feelings … all the while assuming that the men will not lose interest after being treated with disdain.

When the two brothers finally arrive, they too go to great lengths to protect the women's egos, even pretending to have no preferences whatsoever (but of course they do).

> "A preference to declare would be indelicate
> And therefore we propose to let impartial fate
> Select, for us, a mate"

They go so far as to make up a game in which they will be blindfolded as they choose their brides so that no one will feel left out [These handkerchiefs upon our eyes]. However, when the brothers are caught peeking, they are shamed and even threatened with violence, despite the unreasonable length they have gone to for the benefit of the women's vanity.

> "—Conduct shady, they are cheating!
> Surely they deserve a beating!
> This too much is; Maidens mocking!
> Conduct such is truly shocking!"
>
> "—Fie, for shame! Fie, for shame!"

The shaming soon ends, and the brothers manage to catch the brides of their choice.

Jokingly, the brothers go on to claim that they still have no preferences and would gladly switch brides. Of course the two brides, who only moments earlier were perfectly happy to allow the brothers to have no preference, now change their tune and are insulted by the thought of their grooms-to-be not professing devotions to them and them alone.

Anyone familiar with the works of Gilbert and Sullivan will know that the plot will become comically complicated, and by no means does The Gondoliers disappoint.

Moments after the wedding ceremony, the two couples are approached by the Grand Inquisitor of Spain, whom they do not recognize. The brothers introduce themselves by announcing their political beliefs, explaining that as republicans they reject kings and hold all men to be equals.

The Grand Inquisitor informs the brothers that one of them—it is unclear which—is in fact the sole heir to a throne on the island kingdom of Barataria. With the kingdom in a state of insurrection, it is essential that the throne be occupied at once.

> "—As you are both republicans and hold kings in detestation, of course you'll abdicate at once. Good morning!"
>
> "—Well, as to that, there are kings and there are kings. When I say that I detest kings, I mean I detest bad kings."
>
> "—I see. It's a delicate distinction."

It is revealed to the brothers that they will be able to reign jointly, as one individual, until the rightful heir's nurse mother can be located. What is not revealed is that the prince was married in infancy; instead, it is explained that, for the time being, their wives will not be permitted to join them … just for a time, a few months is all. (Spoiler alert: Someone was switched at birth.)

The brothers inquire if they may invite their friends and give them positions about the royal court.

> "Of course, that is always done."

Almost immediately the focus switches from one of the men being a king to one of their wives being a queen [Then one of us will be a queen] and how all will have to treat her as a "high born aristocrat." The wives' republican ideology goes out the window as soon as they see themselves in a privileged position.

The brothers, however, remain true to their ideology. When they invite their friends to come along and take positions as courtiers, the village at first reacts poorly.

> "—as they know we object

> To pavilions and palaces
> How can they respect
> Our republican fallacies?”

The joint kings explain that they intend to remodel the monarchy on republican principles: all will be equal, from the Lord High Chancellor to the lowly coachman, henceforth to be known as the Lord High Coachman [For everyone who feels inclined].

At the closing of Act I, the brothers are away to the “island fair that lies in the southern sea,” sad to leave their wives behind but excited about their new positions.

Act II opens in the royal palace of Barataria, with the former gondoliers dressed in fine clothing and engaged in frivolous pastimes. Those who are paying close attention, especially upon a second viewing, may notice that the opening of Act II mirrors the opening of Act I.

The kings are treated with disrespect by the courtiers because of their “privileged” positions. The kings accept that they must do a little more around the court to make up for their positions … it’s only fair. So, as the courtiers engage in games and hobbies, the kings spend their days running themselves ragged, performing the duties of the heads of state, dressing their private valet, and even giving up their royal quarters to move into an apartment in the servants’ quarters [Rising early in the morning].

Despite their efforts, it is never seen as enough compensation by the courtiers, and yet the brothers, blinded by their ideology, accept this with gratitude. They can never compensate enough for their alleged privilege and, as such, will always be expected to do a little more while the “dis-privileged” courtiers live a life of luxury at their expense.

As I said, this is merely a sub-theme; the operetta goes on to find a comically simplistic resolution, as is the norm with Gilbert and Sullivan. But the point of this underlying theme is clear to me.

Once society has identified a group as oppressed, that group will be treated with extra care and concern. More noticeably, whoever is identified as privileged will be cast into a position of dis-privilege in many ways—and unsympathetically so.

Many men and women who identify as MRAs are well familiar with these themes.

When one’s ideology blinds a person to what is happening right in front of their face, certain opportunists will take full advantage.

This does not lead to a more equal society; on the contrary, we see only a reversal of master and servant under false pretense (by fools who would be king).

Feature image by José Manuel Ríos Valiente

Hell just froze over

AVfM Video Source · 4 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Remember when the media tried to approach new and social concerns with objectivity? Well, it's back. For how long, we don't know.

There is a damned fine article that goes with this here. PE

It is time to take the MHRM into American universities

Paul Elam · 5 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

$10,268 of $13,000 raised

There is just over a week remaining before the fundraiser to support the Kennesaw State University Men's (KSUM) group ends. There is quite a bit of road ahead of them and club president Sage Gerard's quest to bring a first of its kind men's rights conference to an American university campus on November 1.

I will be speaking there, as well as Karen Straughan, A Voice for Male Student's Jonathan Taylor, Dr. Janice Fiamengo and others.

I am happy that AVFM has played a role in making it happen. But it was a small part. KSUM, the brainchild of AVFM's director of collegiate activism Sage Gerard, is a standalone organization working diligently to bring counter-theory and support to male students to the modern university environment. AVFM is taking no funding for this.

If you can spare it, they could use your help.

You can donate to the current fundraiser by clicking here. Or, if you want tickets to the event (donation suggested) you can go through this link to get them.

It's time to take the men's rights message directly into American universities.

The current push for colleges to investigate allegations of sexual abuse can hurt valid cases: A law enforcement perspective

Michael Conzachi · 5 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editors' note: This article was published August 3, 2014, on The National Coalition for Men website.

In recent weeks and months, there has been a flurry of activity regarding the investigation of sexual assault allegations on college campuses, to be handled by administrators and student disciplinary boards.

That is probably the worst idea since the invention of the square wheel, and the clapper.

I speak from the perspective of having spent three decades in law enforcement and nearly two decades as an investigator. Not only are college tribunals unqualified to take on such as task, but many in law enforcement are not sufficiently trained as well.

Let's take for example a typical law enforcement response to a sexual assault. The alleged victim calls the police to report a sexual assault. The investigation begins at that point. How was the call made: from where and who was present? Was the call made from a cell phone or hard-wired phone? If the call was made on a cell phone, the location of the cellular phone tower that transmitted or received the signal is important. Was the call made to a police department recorded line or did it come in through another method?

Then comes the first responder. Was the first responder a police officer, a paramedic, or is the reporting party a hospital? If it was a hospital, who called? Was it a clerical worker, nurse, or doctor? What was said to that person making the notification is important and must be clearly documented in any report. If a paramedic was the first on scene, does that paramedic have the knowledge or insight to make note of various things while attending to the medical needs of any potential victim? Would that paramedic have the insight to consider protecting evidence after first taking care of the medical needs of the alleged victim?

The point being is that there is a lot of information that has to be considered way before any law enforcement officer or emergency medical personnel arrives on the scene, and the subsequent investigation. Would any untrained college tribunal, consisting of an administrator, professor, or student disciplinary board even think of those things?

Now we have the initial or preliminary investigation by a first responder. In the cases where a suspect is outstanding, one of the first responder's primary objectives is to determine if in fact a crime has been committed, or at least a strong indication that a crime has been committed, and to initiate a crime broadcast with as much information as possible so as to increase the chances that the apprehension of the suspect or suspects are increased.

This initial investigative step is also very critical, as an experienced and well-trained law enforcement officer can begin to make a determination if the alleged sexual assault is valid or if there are some warning signs or red flags that might indicate that it is not.

This is not specific to sexual assault allegations. The same type of scrutiny involves any crime: stolen car, burglary, stolen credit card. Contrary to popular belief, many people falsely report crimes, not just sexual assaults, although they rate up there near the top of false reports. As an example, here is a brief list of eight pages of false police reports in the Orlando, Florida, area: http://articles.orlandosentinel.com/keyword/false-police-report.

If a first responder is going to initiate a crime broadcast detailing a crime—whatever crime that is: a sexual assault, a robbery, a bicycle theft—that first responder knows and is fully aware that other officers will begin looking for any suspect. If a person matching that description is located, there will later be a number of legal challenges to the initial detention as to the legalities and probable cause.

As you can see, even before we really get into specific facts about a report or allegation of a sexual assault, there is a tremendous amount of investigation, information, and many considerations to think about, just in the initial stage.

Does anyone believe that a college tribunal would even have the foresight to give those considerations any thought?

And this is before the actual substance of the investigation is conducted.

The next stage would be the preliminary investigation by the first responder. If the agency is large enough or has the resources, a specially trained sex assault investigator would be called to handle the bulk of the investigation, as they should.

During my years as a first responder, I handled maybe a dozen cases of sexual assault, and maybe three were legitimate. I can honestly say that I would not be the most qualified person to investigate cases of sexual assault, as my expertise was in the area of gangs, narcotics, and homicide.

That initial investigative effort is critical in the investigative process. Not all first responders are uniquely qualified to handle such a task, and it doesn't matter if it is a male or female first responder. The majority of the first responders are usually young, inexperienced, and in some cases insufficiently trained to properly handled preliminary investigations of cases of sexual assault. Some are good and others are not.

The subsequent investigation by the detective is yet another area that requires a tremendous amount of expertise and training. The California Sexual Assault Investigators Association (CSAIA) (http://www.csaia.org/index.aspis) is but one of many areas of law enforcement expertise.

Its mission statement states:

> "The primary purpose of CSAIA is to provide high quality training in the fields of sexual assault prevention, detection, investigation, evidence collection and analysis, prosecution, victim services and support, incarceration and treatment of offenders, offender monitoring, as well as other closely related areas.
>
> The CSAIA exists to promote and increase constructive relationships between investigators throughout the state and nation in order to aid the rapid dissemination of information, as well as to form contacts and liaisons to further assist in the apprehension of offenders and the effective investigation and prosecution of sexual assault cases.
>
> The CSAIA advocates effective relationships between investigators and members of related disciplines for the purpose of improving the team approach to cases to assure that victims receive the highest level of service and sensitivity and that offenders procure the maximum measure of the law.
>
> The CSAIA encourages the ongoing development of progressive standards of training and qualifications for sexual assault investigators and members of related disciplines to assure the continuing improvement of effectiveness in the field.
>
> The Association encourages and will actively support legislative changes, which promote the mission of the CSAIA."

Look at the third paragraph above: "victims receive the highest level of service and sensitivity and that offenders procure the maximum measure of the law." Do the hysterics who continue to advocate putting colleges in charge of a serious criminal investigation not understand those words?

The CSAIA also conducts "SART" (sexual assault response training) and in conjunction with medical disciplines has developed medical protocols for the investigation of sexual assault and child sexual abuse that provides for specific training for medical personnel. Those highly technical skills are absolutely essential for the proper handling of sexual assault investigations.

Does that sound like anything that a college administrator, history professor, or some pimply faced college sophomore taking "selfies" sitting on a disciplinary board can even fathom?

Then we come into the issue of probable cause, self-incrimination, constitutional rights, and due process that involves any potential suspect. We also have to consider forensic, biological, electronic, and transfer evidence that requires specific collection and preservation protocols.

Many in the general public are of the opinion that once you have DNA, then that is all you need to find the perpetrator. The truth is that DNA is just one of many components of evidence in the larger scheme of the investigation. Sadly, many law enforcement agencies allow sexual assault cases to just sit, waiting on DNA results, or the money to process any potential biological evidence. Many have just become too lazy or overburdened with workloads to go out and do "ground-pounding old-fashion police work."

Then there are the legal challenges regarding the collection and processing of evidence, the nature of interviews, and the legalities of interrogations. A majority of criminal cases involve some type of legal challenge: pre-trial hearings, probable cause determinations, evidence exclusionary motions, scientific challenges to biological evidence, crime laboratory reliability, suggestibility of photographic line-ups, motions to quash or traverse search warrants, legalities of confessions and compliance with Miranda warnings, hearings to determine the reliability of witnesses or informants, and motions to dismiss.

There are and continue to be legal challenges regarding law enforcement's use of "third parties" to extract or obtain information outside of the scope of "Miranda" warnings. Think of jailhouse informants. The police cannot simply just have a non-law enforcement person make contact with a potential suspect, and try to obtain incriminating evidence or a confession out of him in violation of his constitutional rights.

Currently, in Orange County, California, the death penalty sentence of mass murderer Scott Dekraai is being challenged (http://www.voiceofoc.org/countywide/county_government/article_a1712570-198a-11e4-a666-0019bb2963f4.html) due to the improper use of jailhouse informants. Dekraai, if you recall, went gonzo after his ex-wife continued to violate numerous court orders that prevented Dekraai from seeing his son. Nothing was done by the family court to intervene in the custody interference, so Dekraai went to the Seal Beach hair salon where his ex-wife worked and shot nine people and killed eight, including his ex.

Dekraai's family law attorneys from the Long Beach law firm of Jarvis, Krieger & Sullivan (http://www.jarvislawyers.com/) immediately sought and obtained a court order to seal all records of Dekraai's family law case (http://www.insidebayarea.com/california/ci_19182448). The only thing that can be derived from this is that the deplorable manner in which his family law case was handled drove him to commit mass murder, and no one wanted that scrutiny in one of the most egregious mass murder cases in Orange County history; otherwise, why the secrecy?

If all of those legal and scientific challenges have been met and satisfied, then the case proceeds to trial. Then there is the painstaking process of jury selection, and many of those prior legal and scientific challenges are discussed and challenged again, and then once again, motions to dismiss.

Does anyone still believe that ANY person sitting on any kind of college kangaroo court has the kind of training, experience, and know-how to properly and legally adjudicate anything other than a beer keg in a dorm room or a parking violation?

Sexual assault is a serious crime and one that requires the highest levels of knowledge, training, and experience. Asking a college tribunal to investigate the crime of sexual assault would be like asking a newly hired bank teller to investigate an international money-laundering operation.

It ain't gonna happen, folks. In reality, college kangaroo courts can actually hurt valid criminal cases and, as we know now, expose the college to significant legal liability.

As an experienced investigator who has handled countless high-profile, murder, kidnapping, robbery, narcotic, and terrorism cases, the last thing that I wanted was for some second-rate amateur or "wannabe" cop or lawyer to screw up my investigation. For that matter, I don't want a rookie cop doing something to screw up my case either, even though there is no intent but maybe just inexperience and lack of training.

Valid and legitimate sexual assault victims on college campuses—the 1 in approximately 5,400, not the 1 in 5 that the rape culture myth and hysteria promotes—deserve the most professional, legal, and scientific investigation possible, not a kangaroo court of ideologues and amateurs.

Keep allegations of sexual assault on college campuses out of college campuses, and let law enforcement and the legal system do what they are trained, paid, and mandated to do.

> NCFM Member/Advisor Michael Conzachi, The Current Push for Colleges to Investigate Allegations of Sexual Assault can hurt valid cases: A Law Enforcement Perspective.

Big time waste and corruption in Romania by the European Union – Part one

Lucian Vâlsan · 5 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article first appeared on AVFM Romania.

It has already been said a few times that organized opposition to feminism is not necessary in Romania – and the reasons for those claims were in many cases variations of "it's not like that here" or "it won't be like that here" – as if Romania is somewhere on Pluto and not a net contributor and a full member of the European Union (EU).

Whether we like it or not, the EU is determined to aggressively promote and implement feminist ideology in all of the 28 (un)fortunate nations that are part of this club – and ignoring the problem won't make it go away; on the contrary, it will only make things worse. (Just as happened when we ignored the directives on agriculture until the bureaucracy bit us on the bottom and now the average Romanian food producer is buried in useless bureaucratic costs for certificates that nobody cares about. But let's not digress.)

In this series we will be talking about the bureaucratic brushwood through which millions upon millions in money that come from taxing the Romanian stipendiaries at a 70% rate and from taxing other EU citizens with similar tax rates, are filtered through various Non-Government Organizations (NGOs) and dubious firms. And it all happens with the blessing of the EU and in the name of "gender equality" – a term so vague when used by the EU that it can literally mean almost anything, as long as it advantages women and only women – even when there's already a considerable female advantage in the particular area targeted for funding.

Many Romanians have this mistaken impression that the EU institutions are some nice little angels that are corruption-free and that the issue solely comes from our local corrupt politicians. In 2011, 56% of Romanians believed that the EU institutions have a certain degree of corruption[1] while 89% of them believed the same thing about the institutions of the Romanian State[2].

In other words, Romanians are expecting corruption from the Romanian State (and good for them), but they tend not to expect the same or a higher degree of corruption from Brussels – and they are mistaken.

The Centre for Consultancy and European Studies (CCSE – Centrul de Consultanță și Studii Europene)

CCSE (founded in 2005) and its sister institution — The Centre for Professional Qualification and Requalification Social Trade — are according to the CCSE website[3], part of a holding with a primary objective of organizing professional qualification, development and specialization training – approved nationally by the Ministry of Labor, Social Solidarity and Family and by the Ministry of Education and Research through the branch called the National Council for Professional Formation.

CCSE is, however, a business, and apparently a prosperous one, as it's considered a top business in Galați county[4] and they even have a certificate for this[5]. In 2013, CCSE reported a profit of 2.353.765 RON (a little over 530.000€). Not bad for a business in the educational field which has only 3 employees (!) and which in 2010 had been reduced to only one employee.

SC Centrul de Consultanță și Studii Europene SRL also appears mentioned in the National NGO Registry where, through its representative, Mrs. Ramona Oțelea, teamed up with other entities to found the Association "The German Centre for the Internationalization of SMEs[note 1]" on September 24, 2013. This NGO was registered with the number 10661/A/2013[6]. According to the same registry, Mrs. Ramona Oțelea also has the position of general secretary in this NGO.

Ramona Oțelea is the wife of Mihăiță Oțelea, who was prosecuted for aggravated fraud, forging public documents and perjury in a criminal case regarding a fraud of 1.1 million RON (250.000 €), money that were taken from AJOFM Galați[note 2], according to the local newspaper Viața Liberă (Free Life)[7]. In that case, Oțelea was eventually convicted by the Galați Court to 4 years and a half in jail and to paying one million RON as reparations to AJOFM Galați alongside with Social Trade SRL Galati, the holding of which CCSE is also part[8].

These crimes took place when Mihăiță Oțelea was a representative of SC Social Trade SRL, and the company's administrator was Ramona Oțelea. So now we know why the name Social Trade SRL became The Centre for Professional Qualification and Requalification Social Trade, and then it was unified in a holding company with CCSE. It would be also interesting to know whether the founding of CCSE in 2005 has any connection with the finalizing of the preliminary inquiry of the law enforcement in the same year on SC Social Trade SRL. But we'll leave this discussion for some other time.[image]If we look on this graphic, the profit of CCSE (marked with red) collapsed somewhere in the middle of the year 2010 and the firm continued to struggle financially for another year during the Social Trade scandal. But here, somehow, CCSE and its holding managed to rise back to even larger profits than before despite being hit by a huge scandal that ended in prison sentences.

How? Thanks to the EU funds.

If we go on CCSE's official page, http://cursuriccse.ro/, we are greeted with the shiny announcement that you can see bellow (click on the image for the full dimension):

> [image]Translation: Sign up to participate to one of our FREE courses for people with disabilities, ROMA, single parent families, families with over 2 children, young adults who just left the orphanage, and women: 1. Technician masseur; 2. Construction and pluming worker; 3. Hairdresser; 4. Old people's home carer; 5. Commercial worker.

So we notice that CCSE promotes free courses unless you are a healthy non-gypsy man – which exactly the category of people which dominates the unemployed in Romania[9] in 40 of the 42 administrative units of the country[10]. This is a bit hypocritical coming from CCSE given that they themselves write on their website that they do not discriminate on the basis of ethnicity, sex, or religion[11].

We also notice that these courses are part of an EU-funded project through the contract POSDRU/165/6.2/S/142962. So we take this ID and go to the Regional Intermediary POSDRU[note 3] Organism, which tells us that the beneficiary of the project is the Local Council of the 6th sector of Bucharest[12] and the first funds on this project have already been approved – the amount being 327,917.54 RON[13] (roughly 74,000€).

We dig a little further and we find out that the real beneficiary is the General Directorate of Social Welfare and Child Protection (DGASPC) of the 6th Sector of Bucharest[14] and the total budget of the project is 6,558,350.88 RON (1.5 milioan€) according to a table published by the Government in June this year which also qualifies this project as being in the in implementation stage[15]. Most of this amount is paid by the EU according to a communication published by the DGASPC 6th Sector[16] which mentions CCSE on the list of its partners alongside with other two organizations – The Foundation for Communitarian Support Bacău and the "Four Change" Association.

It is also worth mentioning that the DGASPC 6th Sector spent right in the first days of the project roughly 24.000€ (104,838 RON) on audit services[17]. With only the money spent on auditing, one could buy EU-wide recognized courses (not just nationally, as CCSE offers) of things like technician masseur for 110 people (a private company offers these courses for just 950 RON[18]). With the same amount of money one can acquire in Galați (the city of residence for CCSE) hairdressing courses for 361 individuals[19].

Considering these realities, with 1.5 million euros, which is the total budget of this project, one could qualify and train the entire population (not just half) of an entire Romanian county – not just the 780 people who are the target group of this project.

But this is not the only weird project in which CCSE is involved. In the Projects section of their web page we find a few other similar projects which involve the spending of the taxpayers' money as inefficiently as possible.

Another example of such a project is the one called Gender equality and access to healthcare (EGAS) – which is a project that aims to develop and promote the principle of equality of opportunity and gender in the healthcare indistry of the region [the South-East region, note] by identifying the main problems which women who work in this sector face as they pertain to gender equality and equality of opportunity.

EGAS starts with the premises that there is no equality of opportunity and gender in the healthcare industry and that inequality affects only women. But is this true? Well, not really. It hasn't even been a year since the EU and the Romanian Government spent 6.2 million RON (1.4 million euros) on a study that ended up telling us what we already knew – that 80% of the employees in the healthcare industry are women[20].

The same study noted that although only 20% of the people in leadership positions are women, the women in the system are not bothered by this at all; over half of them firmly deny, in absolute terms, the very idea that such thing as sexual (or "gender") discrimination exists in the healthcare system.

In other words, those women involved assert that equality of opportunity already exists. Yet the EGAS project still wants to help the women in the healthcare system to develop their professional careers because… equality. And in the good ol' fashion of the EU, it doesn't even matter if the supposedly affected women need the program or not, the taxpayers' money will still be spent in their name – because potato.

The budget of the EGAS project is not huge – but it's still big considering that the objectives of the project are addressing an issue that clearly doesn't even exist. The Romanian state healthcare system is indeed in a state that varies between semi-disastrous and catastrophic (while the private system thrives) – but the problem exists for other reasons and not because of a discrimination on the basis of sex in employment or promotions.

The total budget of the EGAS project is 2,144,132 RON (roughly 500.000€)[21] coming from three sources – the EU (POSDRU), the Romanian State and the Union Federation „Sanitary Solidarity". One would wonder what is the opinion of the very few men in that respective union, when their money are being taken by force from their already small salaries in order to advance the already advanced careers of… women? This is a question that ought to be asked more often.

If you look at the document placed as a source for the budget of EGAS, you will notice that the entire page is filled with a series of projects that are unrelated to CCSE but which have an identical aim and are also paid by us – the taxpayers. For instance, on the same page we have the project Femeile P.O.T.(Putere, Organizare, Tenacitate) (Women CAN – Power, Organization, Tenacity), that takes place in Vaslui county, a project which also swallows roughly 1.7 million RON. On what? No-one knows. Why is this happening? Because the EU and the Romanian Government have a lot of money to through out on the window — in the middle of the recession.

Evolution, Value, Entrepreneurship for women on the labour market (EVA) is another project in which CCSE is involved alongside the DGASPC 6th Sector, the "Four Change" Association, the Foundation for Communitarian Support Bacău, The White-Yellow Cross Foundation, and SC Green Team Actual SRL. It's interesting to note the involvement of DGASPC 6th Sector in a project that's not even regional – but national. We'll come back to some of these organizations in future articles.

It becomes even more interesting when we look up the EVA project by its ID – POSDRU/144/6.3/S/125842 – and we noticed that it's registered at the Intermediary Regional POSDRU Organism for the West[22], hundreds of kilometers away from Bacău, Bucharest or Galați (the residence of CCSE). The total budget of the EVA project is 8,333,292.66 RON (1.88 million euros).

And what do they do with this amount? Well, they're going to award 5 prizes for the best 5 business plans brought up by 5 women with the fabulous amount of 10,000 RON per plan (plus the flat tax of 16%, so 11,600). Wouldn't everyone be better off if the prizes would just be written off as tax-free? We say this because it's truly bizarre: the State gives the money to the NGO, the NGO gives them to the 5 award winning women, who then go to ANAF (Romania's IRS) to pay back the tax. It's absurd! Even if we only take the banking commissions into account and there is already a significant amount of money lost through this totally inefficient scheme.

Anyway, this means 58,000 RON in prizes. But what about the rest, until over 8 million? According to the communicate published on the "Four Change" Association's website, the rest is being spent on training and seminars about nothing, 30 meetings with "communities of women" (can someone please let them know there is no such thing in Romania?) or courses of "formation of formators" (seriously! You can't make this stuff up!) and a visit of "study and experience exchange" in Suffolk, UK for 15 of the female beneficiaries and 8 representatives of the partners[23]. In other words, the NGO employees and collaborators will have a short "free" vacation paid by the taxpayers following their tireless work to promote ~~male exclusion~~ "gender equality."

Do we believe that CCSE and its partners are a bunch of ideologically motivated feminists? No, not really. Judging by the evidence, CCSE is more likely an organization with a recently dubious past which found a perfectly legal way to extort some more money from the taxpayer. In the case of CCSE, we have a serious doubt that misandry is their main goal – but rather the means. However, in the case of the source of the problem — the European Union — misandry is the main purpose, and the EU truly is an ideologically-motivated organism first and foremost.

And herein lies the problem: What CCSE is doing, no matter how immoral, hypocritical and irresponsible might seem to us is, for all intents and purposes, legal. It may be barely legal, but legal nonetheless.

The Romanian State can't cut the funding for POSDRU because the EU deemed this program a priority – so if our government does it anyway, it may face a lawsuit at the ECJ (the European Court of Justice) based on the legal precedent set in 1997[24], according to which legal discrimination against men is not discrimination because all people are equal in front of the law, but women are more equal.

Sure, we can blame the employees of DGASPC 6th Sector, which is a public institution and which is involved in surprisingly many projects of this kind, given that if we add only their financial contributions we get a relatively high amount for the budget of a sectoral DGASPC. But the main problem remains: That all these issues are not the result of the Romanian corruption, but merely a symptom of wider crass corruption and morally-bankrupt ideology promoted en fanfare by the great European Union.

Whenever such scandals that cost the taxpayer untold amounts of money are revealed, our Romanian press points the finger at local corruption, and then they curse the government and the party that happens to be in power. There is no doubt that that local corruption factors and all the parties that have been in power since 1990 are partially to blame – but, at least in this area, it is essential that we understand that the source of the problem is in Brussels – not in Bucharest, Vienna or Vilnius.

If these kinds of programs addressing non-issues were not funded by the EU, organizations such as CCSE would go bankrupt (as should have happened when Mihăiță Oțelea was sent behind bars) and the morally corrupted employees from institutions such as DGASPC 6th Sector would find something else to do, or quit because of the lack of the generous grants offered by the EU for doing exactly nothing.

In the second part of this series, we will continue to expose the way the public funds are being spent in the name of advantaging women and only women, following incentives from the EU – actions that are, at the end of the day, detrimental to everyone in society.

References:

note 1: SME = Small and Middle Enterprises

note 2: AJOFM = Agenția Județeană pentru Ocuparea Forței de Muncă (The County Agency for Occupying the Labor Force)

note 3: POSDRU = Programul Operațional Sectorial – Dezvoltarea Resurselor Umane (The Sectoral Operational Programme – Human Resources Development)

[1] http://www.euractiv.ro/uniunea-europeana/articles|displayArticle/articleID_24030/Eurobarometru_Coruptia_a_crescut_in_UE._Pentru_romani_ramane_principala_problema.html

[2] The European Commission's Corruption Report, pag. 17, published in February 2012 http://ec.europa.eu/public_opinion/archives/ebs/ebs_374_en.pdf (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[3] http://cursuriccse.ro/?p=86 – The "About us" section of CCSE's website (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[4)] http://www.listafirme.ro/centrul-de-consultanta-si-studii-europene-srl-17253210/

[5] http://www.listafirme.ro/top_2014/diploma_1254047.htm – Diploma CCSE (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[6] http://www.just.ro/Portals/0/WWWW/files/registrul_ong/Asociatii18072014_2.pdf – The National Registry of NGOs – the Index of the non-profit judicial persons – associations, part 2, page 49 (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[7] http://www.viata-libera.ro/justitie/24121-teapa-de-miliarde-data-ajofm – Maria Fabian – Ţeapă de miliarde dată AJOFM, published on November 9, 2011, Viața Liberă (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[8] http://gazetadebuzau.ro/dezvaluirile-facute-de-eduard-dumitrascu-au-zdruncinat-sedinta-cj/ Dezvaluirile facute de Eduard Dumitrascu au zdruncinat sedinta CJ, published on June 13, 2013, Gazeta de Buzău (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[9] http://www.ziare.com/locuri-de-munca/piata-muncii/cat-a-crescut-somajul-tinerii-cel-mai-puternic-afectati-1289749 – Ziare.com – Cat a crescut somajul – tinerii, cel mai puternic afectati, published on March 25, 2014 (accessed at August 2, 2014): „By sex, the unemployment rate for men was 7.8% and 6.6% for women"

[10] http://old.econtext.ro/dosar–2/analiza/barbatii-romaniei-condamnati-la-somaj-criza-a-dublat-rata-somajului-masculin-in-unele-judete-vezi-unde-somajul-a-urcat-drastic-dar-si-unde-a-scazut-uimitor–2.html – Ioan A. Murgu – BARBATII ROMANIEI, condamnati la somaj: criza a dublat rata somajului masculin in unele judete. VEZI unde somajul a urcat drastic, dar si unde a scazut uimitor, Ecotext, published on March 14, 2013 (accessed at August 2, 2014).

[11] http://cursuriccse.ro/?page_id=95 – The „Papers required for application" section of CCSE's website: „any person regardless of age, sex and origin has access to our services;"

[12] http://www.oiposdrubi.ro/registre2014/cereri%20de%20prefinantare.pdf – The registry of pre-financing requests, page 2

[13] ibidem

[14] https://www.fonduri-ue.ro/proiecte/details/1/3372

[15] http://www.data.gov.ro/storage/f/2014-07-14T09%3A07%3A29.648Z/contracte-finantare-iunie2014.xls – The element no. 741 from this Excel file.

[16] http://www.protectiacopilului6.ro/noutati_doc_1371_persoanele-vulnerabile-au-o-noua-sansa-de-incluziune-pe-piata-muncii_pg_0.htm – Persoanele vulnerabile au o nouă şansă de incluziune pe piaţa muncii, published at May 28, 2014 (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[17] http://www.protectiacopilului6.ro/noutati_doc_1380_solicitare-oferta_pg_0.htm

[18] http://www.cursuri-calificare-meserii.ro/cursuri-tehnician-maseur

[19] http://www.invatapentrutine.ro/detaliu-curs/vrs/IDevent/1659 – The 361 number is the result of the division of the amount spent on audit (104838 RON) to 290, which is the amount required for a hairdresser qualification course in this link.

[20] http://www.wall-street.ro/articol/Social/157285/baraban-cri-80-dintre-angajatii-din-sanatate-sunt-femei-insa-doar-2

0-au-functii-de-conducere.html – Cristina Negraru – 4 din 5 dintre angajatii din sanatate sunt femei, insa doar 20% au functii de conducere, published on November 14, 2013, Wall Street.ro (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[21] http://www.fonduri-ue.ro/posdru/images/doc2014/contractate052014.pdf – The list of contracts signed – April 30, 2014 – The Sectoral Operational Programme – Human Resources Development (p. 153)

[22] http://www.oirposdru-vest.ro/liste%20grant/FSE/Lista%20contractelor%20de%20finantare%20semnate%20in%202014.pdf – The Intermediary Regional POSDRU Organism – Region West – The List of the Signed Financing Contracts, p. 9 (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[23] http://4change.ro/proiecte/evolutie-valoare-antreprenoriat-pentru-femei/ – EVA – Evolutie Valoare Antreprenoriat pentru femei, published on June 5, 2014. (accessed at August 2, 2014)

[24] http://www.nytimes.com/1997/11/12/world/european-union-court-upholds-affirmative-action-for-women.html – EDMUND L. ANDREWS – European Union Court Upholds Affirmative Action for Women, The New York Times, Publicat pe 12 noiembrie 1997

Leveling up to the red pill

Hopeland Cash · 5 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There are as many red pill stories as there are Men's Human Rights Activits (MHRAs), Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOWs), Honey Badgers (women who support the men's movement), and anti-feminists. There is no single way, and the discovery of greater awareness is rarely a quick process, often a lonely journey, and by its very nature can't come without a dose of pain and confusion.

For some men, the red pill can only be found after a profound trauma, a terrible abuse that plants a seed of skepticism and draws them out into the light of truth. For others, it is found in the mounting realization that society isn't delivering on its promises. For me, there was no single event. Instead of a red pill moment, I had a red pill progression. I am an MHRA because I know it is a right and just cause, and I am compelled to activism by the ever-growing library of truth and facts I discover and the visceral need to combat all the hate and lies that oppose their illumination. I know that now, but it was a slow, grating march toward truth that challenged the world as I had been raised to see it.

Like most MHRAs, as a young man I needed a red pill in the worst possible way (though I didn't know it then). I was raised in a liberal feminist family, but that handicap was offset somewhat, I think, by my sisters. Don't get me wrong, my sisters aren't bad siblings, but thanks to them I never harbored any delusions of female purity or innate virtue; I always knew girls were people, not snowflakes, and my upbringing was more egalitarian than most. That's why I've never been a skirt-chaser or a full-blown white knight. I was taught the feminist narrative and believed it, though. My mother isn't a raving rad-fem, and I have a good relationship with my father, but I believed in "chivalry" and opposed "sexism" and all that. There never seemed any reason to question those things, but then something happened that started me down my path to the MHRM: I became a gamer.

First it was video games like Skies of Arcadia and Knights of the Old Republic, then after high school I got into tabletop role-playing games, specifically Dungeons and Dragons (Edition 3.5, thank you very much). As far as my feminism was concerned, that was the beginning of the end. Strange, I know, and there was no reason to suspect any such thing would happen; I started playing DnD on a whim, and it wasn't the gaming itself that did it, but the creativity it inspired that liberated my mind and eventually let me slay the beast of my own feminism and loot that wonderful red pill.

Dungeons and Dragons is a brilliant platform for interactive storytelling. I don't play anymore, but I still believe that. I immediately took to the role of game-mastering, and I was the type who loved to do home-brew (creating original content from scratch). I invented complex worlds, new species, classes, and abilities, etc. It was a fantastic creative experience, but my favorite part was inventing societies. I was probably inspired by my love of Star Trek and its exploration of speculative cultures, so I did the same in Dungeons and Dragons, writing whole explanations of cultures, their customs, dress, sport, rituals, religions. I even wrote pieces of short fiction exploring a "day in the life" of a citizen of these societies, and through this I explored a wide breadth of concepts as creative exercises.

There was one of my creations in particular that proved the most impactful on my life even long after I put away the dice. It was a culture of elves (yeah, like Lord of the Rings, but less Orlando Bloom), a society at war with a neighboring state. I toyed with ideas of what kind of people they might be, and then, inspired by elves' androgyny, I decided to do a gender flip. They're at war, but what if women were the soldiers?

What followed was the thought experiment that changed my life and made me an MHRA. I figured, if the women were the soldiers, then the men would take on the women's roles and duties, and by extension their problems. Wouldn't it be interesting, said my young, unformed brain, if men were the oppressed sex? You know, hypothetically (wink, wink). So I ran some Google searches. It's been far too long, so I don't remember what exactly I searched for, but I came across some highly unexpected Wikipedia pages. They talked of bizarre concepts like male under-representation in education and the bias of divorce courts.

I'd never heard such ideas. Men suffering from systemic socially ingrained biases and misconceptions leading to mistreatment and a lack of recognition for their pain?

It can't be!

But it was, and only more and more so as I read further. Fathers' rights became of particular interest to me, and I was becoming ever more astounded by the depths of abuse leveled on fathers and children. I remember sharing these horror stories with friends and family and feeling genuinely aghast. Even more horrifying, I would soon realize, was the sheer ignorance surrounding these issues.

Getting back to Dungeons and Dragons, I continued to explore these social issues in my own private way as part of my gaming. I created more gender-flipped societies, and in my naiveté I even wrote up one with two social castes of women, one of which practiced the radical feminism I was becoming increasingly aware of in the real world and the other that stuck to "good feminism."

Ah, youth.

Eventually I stopped playing Dungeons and Dragons, but I still game here and there, and enjoy science-fiction more than anything. My eyes had been opened, however, and though I hadn't yet realized it there was no turning back. I kept reading about men's issues, and as I began writing fiction I integrated these issues into my stories. A month didn't seem to go by where I didn't come upon yet another social ill facing men. Healthcare, life expectancy, suicide, general legal bias, lack of reproductive rights. The list grew, and grows still, like the endless chains of quests and bosses to be faced in an RPG. I knew I couldn't fix these problems, but it would've been comforting if at least they'd stopped spawning!

Through all this, I continually came back to a single core fact: ignorance is the greatest enemy of men's rights. I was kept ignorant, through no malice of my parents, for years, and when I discovered men's issues I was perpetually shocked not just by the terrible severity of these social wrongs, but also by the very fact that I hadn't heard of them. How could men be suffering so much without anyone talking about it?

I wanted to be one of the people who would talk about it. I toyed with the ideas in my role-playing, I touched on the issues in my fiction, I began blogging about portrayals of men in the media, and eventually, after a chance click-through from an article on the National Parents Organization, I found A Voice for Men. Within a year I had published my first article here.

And I will continue to do so because these issues matter, and because people still aren't talking about it. Some men only find out after their lives are ruined in the military, divorce court, or by a rape accusation; many women have to see the pain of their brothers, sons, husband, or father to realize what is wrong; if I hadn't asked that simple question, What if women were the soldiers?, I might have never found out. I could've kept swallowing the blue pill, gone neck-deep into student debt, married the first Mary Sue to come along just to get people to stop asking if I'm gay, and be waiting for my turn on the gallows of manhood before I saw through all the lies.

I got lucky. I asked questions. I was stubborn enough to not back down. Things like role-playing and science-fiction are male-dominated, maybe because they look past how reality is and wonder how it could be. That is a powerful lens through which to discover new ideas, but also to see the truth of the world around us. More men need to ask those tough questions because the answers are out there if they look.

That is how the MHRM will grow, through the process of discovery. We don't indoctrinate with ego-stroking and victim narratives; we illuminate with facts, with the stories of real people. When enough men and women learn the truth, it will begin to spread even faster, and someday men won't have to suffer those brutal scars or stumble on the truth by accident; it will be freely available to be assessed just like every other philosophy, rejected or accepted by each individual.

Even more than that, I look forward to the day A Voice for Men is graced by an author who can honestly say, "I didn't have a red pill moment" because he or she was raised right, was taught the truth by mother and father, and never had to overcome the handicap of indoctrination and misinformation. That will be the generation that doesn't just advocate men's rights but lives them. That is our endgame.

Undoing due process in campus rape cases

AVfM Video Source · 5 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Law professor Glenn Reynolds interviews professor KC Johnson on campus rape hysteria and the destruction of due process. Important viewing!

You might want to subscribe to PJ Media, where you'll also sometimes spot the author of this awesome book.

Women in the MRM? (eek!)

AVfM Video Source · 5 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We can't think of much to add to this except that you might want to subscribe to Mankind Global Media Network (a big name for a little channel, but it may just be going places).

http://youtu.be/L2uA6MRRZp0

Lowbar links and comments:

Does #WomenAgainstFeminism have a hidden agenda? Are women who join the MRM "diluting the movement?" What the hell does "the movement" mean, anyway?

The Female MRA by Spetsnaz: http://youtu.be/PSCxDEIpawQ

A Challenge to #WomenAgainstFeminism by Diana Davison: http://youtu.be/RDbvfW0opX4

Women Against Feminism by johnntheother: http://youtu.be/UZjlXENn68c

Carnell Smith interview "Proving Who's the Daddy: Men Don't Get a Fair Shake in Paternity Cases": http://youtu.be/5Ddy-HUYTtQ

Becoming Ambient by Fidelbogen: http://youtu.be/MIJLLb1Evkk

The Practice of Rhetorical Discipline by Fidelbogen: http://youtu.be/xrQjuxzkjY8

Proper Horror Screams: http://youtu.be/0_q8yn3cd8g

Songs:

Weird-Al Yankovich: "Foil"

Iggy Pop & The Stooges: "ATM"

Hank Williams Sr: "Move It On Over"

A tale of two talk shows

Mark Dent · 6 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The mind-numbing hypocrisy of feminists never ceases to leave me in a state of disbelief, such is their sheer unashamed, unapologetic bigotry. I have witnessed a most perfect example of this only days ago. It provides a very clear view of how our media and society operates, and I must say I am struggling to contain my anger as I write this.

Earlier this year, NFL footballer Ray Rice knocked out his now-wife in response to her punching him. Video footage of him dragging her seemingly unconscious body from a casino elevator caused outrage. No one would dispute that his retaliation was excessive and disproportionate. The fact remains that his wife conceded that she punched him first.[1]

Rice was trotted out for the inevitable mea culpa and claimed, "My wife can do no wrong." The fact that both parties were heavily intoxicated is not mentioned in many accounts of the incident. But this unfortunate incident is not the focus of my article.

Sometime after this domestic conflict, a well-known ESPN sports reporter, Stephen A. Smith, commented on the altercation in a discussion on his show. There, Smith repeatedly said, "No man should ever put his hands on a woman," and spoke what sounded to my ears to be common sense. Just as any man would know he shouldn't walk up to a bigger, stronger man and assault him or get in his face and abuse him, so, too, a woman should never hit a man or get in his face and not expect some kind of response. Sounds fair to me.

Wrong, apparently.

There was an explosive response to Smith's "victim-blaming" comments. Apparently any woman who assaults a man and then gets hit in return is a victim. I'm quite sure this doesn't apply when a man assaults another man and then gets hit in retaliation.

Smith was forced to retract his statement and apologize. His apology actually made me feel physically ill. The man bowed at the feet of feminism and licked the shit from the bottom of their boots. It was the most disgustingly grovelling, cowardly act I have seen in a long time. Of course, if he had not done this, he would have lost his job. He was suspended for a week for his unacceptable comments.

Watch it, but you will need a bucket:

http://youtu.be/lWgPh8JlOXs

This coward now believes that no woman can ever do anything considered to be provocation when involved in a conflict with a man. I assume this weasel would smile as a woman raked his face with her nails or swung her fist at his nose. Perhaps he would give a little whimper as she jabbed him with a knife or hurled boiling water in his face. But I am sure he would maintain that she had done nothing to provoke him, and if he did lash out, his next action would be to hand himself in to the local police and offer his hands to be cuffed.

What sort of a sick, twisted world do we live in? Based on this man's sickening, gutless apology, one-half of the human race can never be guilty of a provocative act.

But the disgusting double standards do not end here, my friends.

Whoopi Goldberg chose to speak about the whole episode and Smith's initial comments on a program called The View. Unfortunately, the complete version of this clip has been removed. Here is an edited version:

http://youtu.be/kNXKKFnm6lE

Goldberg was attacked by the other three women on the panel. They screeched and squirmed as she said no one should hit anyone. Again, this very sensible statement caused a meltdown. But what was deeply disturbing was that one of these panelists, Sunny Hostin, a former assistant United States attorney, made some of the most outrageous statements to come from the mouth of a lawyer.

This woman said she had prosecuted many domestic violence cases in her time and that she believed a man should never lay a hand upon a woman (even in self-defence or retaliation) and if he did, he would be going straight to jail.

When Goldberg insisted that women should never lay a hand on a man and not expect a response, this former attorney said, “That’s blaming the victim!”

Get it? This attorney who has prosecuted many domestic violence cases believes a woman who assaults a man and then gets hit in return is the victim in this situation! How many innocent men has she sent to jail and how many guilty women have walked free as the victims of domestic violence?

Let’s be clear here. The case being discussed was an example of a disproportionate response, but in Hostin’s court if you simply slapped a woman in response to her slapping you, you are off to jail.

Imagine, if you will, that a former attorney (let’s make him a man) appeared on a discussion panel on a high-rating TV show and said, “No Black should ever lay a hand on a White, and in my court if he does—no matter what the reason—he goes straight to jail.” Cue the outrage, hysteria, hyperventilation, protest marches, news headlines, calls for his head, and general mayhem.

The fact of the matter is that the comments by Hostin have drawn absolutely no reaction from anyone and all of the attention has been on the “controversial” comments by Goldberg. You know, she pushed forward the shocking notion that no person should ever lay their hands upon another person in a violent manner.

As my dear dad used to say, Jesus wept.

There are some questions I would like to put to Sunny Hostin. She says that no man should ever hit or physically attack a woman for any reason. I believe she takes this stance because men are generally physically bigger and stronger than women. I use the word “generally” deliberately because there are many large, aggressive women and many small, passive men on this planet.

Watch the clips below and see if women (even small women) are not capable of the most vicious assaults. What would Hostin have done to any man who hit back against these vicious attacks? The men would be locked away and these vicious women would walk free and sanctified as victims. You might also note the laughter from people who are witnessing these vicious assaults in these clips. It is female laughter.

http://youtu.be/7-JbQ35umAc

Now if Hostin believes strength is the issue, then we must believe that if a smaller man walked up to a bigger man in a pub and punched him in the face and the bigger man responded by punching him back and hurting him, Hostin would have the retaliator thrown in jail and allow the smaller man to play the role of victim. We know, however, without a shadow of a doubt, that Hostin would hold the same belief about this incident as the rest of the community: the smaller man got exactly what he deserved for attacking the bigger man in the first place.

In fact, I’m sure many people would applaud the response and hoped it taught the initiator a good lesson.

So clearly, the issue is not and never has been about size and strength. There is only one factor at play here—gender.

Now, I referred to two talk shows in my title. We are all (I think) familiar with the clip in which Sharon Osbourne expressed her delight over the fact that a woman had drugged her husband, tied him down, cut off his penis, and thrown it in a garbage disposal unit where it was chewed up.

Watch it and refresh your memories:

http://youtu.be/muuFygvXPAM

What was the fallout from this vile, offensive, vicious misandry?

Nothing.

Oh, well—there was an apology, which Osbourne smirked her way through without the slightest hint of remorse.

She never missed an hour's, let alone a day's, suspension for her "unacceptable comments."

So here we have it. Stephen A. Smith says emphatically that no man should ever lay his hands on a woman … but women should not hit men and provoke them into doing something that may result in them being harmed. This is deemed unacceptable in our society, and he is suspended.

Sharon Osbourne, her co-panelists, and a screeching audience of females cheer, clap, and laugh as the mutilation of a man's genitals is discussed and call it "fabulous." They say, "That will teach him!" and talk about reasons why you might feel the urge to cut off your husband's/boyfriend's penis. All of this on a nationally syndicated talk show. This was not deemed unacceptable. No one was suspended. Allow me to quote my dad one more time:

Jesus wept.

References:

[1] Suspended Ray Rice: 'I made the biggest mistake of my life'

Men checking privilege

Hopeland Cash · 6 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Like most rational people, I don't care for the phrase "check your privilege" (although hearing Julie Borowski say it always cracks me up). It's overly simplistic, totalitarian, and, dare I say, bossy. However, I recently had a sudden realization that not only is privilege checking a valid concept, but it is already widely practiced by men with no feminist intervention whatsoever.

I'm not talking about men checking their male privilege, though. In fact, I'm not convinced there's any such thing; respect due to responsibility isn't privilege, but that's a different argument. No, I'm thinking about the ways men force other men to check their privilege whether it is from class, position, education, or gender (but not necessarily male).

But first let me back up a little to how I got started on this. The light bulb moment came shortly after the publication of a previous article of mine. I was skimming over it, reading the comments and such, when I saw one particular line:

> "like a girl" is a form of hazing

For context, that previous article is about the phrase "like a girl" and how it's used to accuse others of acting weak and to excuse female under-performance. When I mentioned hazing, I was referring specifically to female athletes being told not to act like girls and to "man up." But that's not limited to girls, obviously, as just about any man can tell you. Boys and men are told not to act like a girl, in sports or otherwise, along with countless other phrases and idioms meant to push them toward masculinity.

Some would take that as simple sexism, deriding femininity and using it to attack a man's masculinity. But then I thought about it again and with a nearly audible mental click the lens of a new perspective slid into place: when men tell each other not to act like a girl, they aren't being sexist or hazing, they are checking each other's privilege.

Think about it in sports again, a good analogy for the wider "performance culture" that dictates so much of modern men's behavior. If an athlete is lagging, his coach or teammates might shout, "Stop running like a girl!" Is it because they don't respect women or because women are held to a lower standard of performance?

Yes, that's right, I'm talking about female privilege, as in "if you don't want to do this, you don't have to." That is the heart of all female privilege: not being held to the same requirements as men, be it in sports, work, or combat. Men may be privileged in being allowed to pursue more avenues of lifestyle (not being protected from taking risks), but whatever a man does he is expected to be the best, he is judged on merit, and excuses aren't accepted.

But women aren't expected to perform the same way physically or, in some cases, intellectually. Their bar is set lower. When that male athlete isn't performing to his best without good cause (injury or illness), he isn't meeting the standards set for him.

It might just be that he isn't as good an athlete, or it might be that he isn't giving it his all. That's where "like a girl" comes into it again; it's not an insult at all, but a call for him to check his privilege. If he thinks he can perform at less than his best and still have the respect of his peers, then he is trying to cash in on female privilege, to be rewarded equally while achieving a lower standard. Men aren't prone to allow that.

This isn't limited just to accusations of girliness. Throughout history, men have been ruled in large part by a sense of honor, a self-policing sort of self-awareness that makes men take a long, hard look at themselves everyday and admit when they aren't up to snuff. Many lack this discipline, but it is a cornerstone of almost every definition of masculinity.

With that sense of honor comes a disdain for privilege. Putting gender privilege aside, the most prevalent and enduring type of social privilege is probably wealth. The privilege of the rich to buy their way out of jail or conscription, the privilege of the rich to live, work, and vacation wherever the hell they want. That is real privilege, and most working men can't stand it. You stride into a workshop, mill, or contractor's office like some gold-crusted peacock, expensive watch, thousand-dollar shoes, and any self-respecting man is going to be so put off he'll be half tempted to put you out on your ass.

Now, there are always the sycophants who hang on to the rich like leeches, but for most men a rich twit in his favorite bar is a target for ridicule, not a recipient of respect. Men call each other on this privilege too. If you don't push yourself, then your friends are gonna call you on trying perform to (privileged) female standards. You start acting high and mighty because of some new cash and your friends are going to let you know you're acting like an ass.

The same thing can be seen around racial privilege. In America, black men have always had it rough, so many hold themselves to a high standard of physical performance. They set their own bar, and if they see some white boy wimping out they will challenge him to meet that higher metric of success.

This is how men check privilege, not in themselves but in each other. Men are naturally competitive, and when we compete it is our peers we wish to prove ourselves to, so who better to hold us to task if we don't do our best, if we try to pull rank or demand special treatment because of money or pedigree.

That's why feminists crying, "CHECK YOUR PRIVILEGE" every third breath is so absurd. Men have their own way of controlling privilege, and forcing them to abandon it when entering a "female space" serves only to alienate them. That's the point, of course, that's why feminists harp on and on about privilege: to undermine men's self-esteem and make them feel like their natural system of merit-based privilege control isn't good enough.

Instead, we're supposed to defer to the biggest victim, the most sexually experimental and whoever the most "under-represented" is. A bit awkward at social gatherings, but it'd make for a hell of a system of government.

First and second wave of the men's rights movement

Peter Wright · 6 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> Mirriam-Webster MOVEMENT
> a : tendency, trend
> b : a series of organized activities working toward an objective.
>
> The Farlex Free Dictionary MOVEMENT
> a. A series of actions and events taking place over a period of time and working to foster a principle or policy: e.g. a movement toward world peace.
> b. A tendency or trend: e.g. a movement toward larger kitchens.

The First Wave of the Men's Rights Movement:

The Men's Rights Movement (MRM) consists of groups or individuals fighting for improved social and legal rights for men. Historically these groups have consisted of men and women who agitated for corrections to anti-male laws, the reinforcement of men's right to live traditional or alternative male roles if they so chose, and to challenge the growing misandry that was attacking that freedom of choice via its manipulation of the social and legal environment. The accompanying and no less important of its aims has been to challenge the gynocentric customs rooted in mainstream culture which have reinforced sexist attitudes.

The following is a small sampling of men's rights initiatives constituting the first wave of the men's rights movement, a list that could be easily expanded into thousands of initiatives by the diligent researcher. Bear in mind that although we are talking of a single MRM, it is more accurately defined as the aggregate of separate MRM initiatives:

1856
A long newspaper article entitled A Word for Men's Rights is published in Putnam's Monthly, which discusses sexist laws that oppressed men and benefited women, including the practice of frivolous, unjustified lawsuits for supposed breach of marriage promise.
1857
A Mr. Todd proposes a "Men's Rights Conference" be held in response to exaggerations of the women's rights movement.
1875
Article entitled Women's and Men's Rights appeared in the 1875 volume Historic and literary miscellany by G.M.D. Bloss
1886
Ernest Belfort Bax, England, writes his first major commentary on gynocentrism and misandry, 'Some Bourgeois Idols; Or Ideals, Reals, and Shams.'
1890s
New York Alimony Club (informal)
1896
Ernest Belfort Bax, England, co-authors book, The Legal Subjection of Men (Twentieth Century Press).
1896
Anti-Bardell Bachelor Band, Atlanta Georgia. Formed to fight against a national campaign headed by activist Charlotte Smith (Women's Rescue League) to promote a tax on bachelors. Another, similar effort was made by the Hoboken Bachelor's Club in Hoboken, New Jersey.
1898
League for Men's Rights formed by Mr. William Austin in London. The movement is reported in newspapers of the time as a "Men's Rights Movement".
1908
Ernest Belfort Bax, England, republishes his 1896 book, The Legal Subjection of Men (New Age Press)
1911
Anti-Alimony Association, New York
1912
Ernest Belfort Bax, England, writes a landmark book 'The Fraud of Feminism' in which he called feminism a fraud and discussed "female privilege"
1912
Anti-alimony leader: George Esterling – Denver, Colorado
1925
Samuel Reid, "Alimony Sam," the "alimony martyr" of California
1926
Men's Rights organizations formed Bund für Männerrechte, Vienna, founded by Sigurd von Hoeberth (Höberth) and Leopold Kornblüh in March 1926. In January 1927 the Bund split into two organizations circa: Aequitas (Hoeberth), Justicia (Kornblueh); journal "Self-Defense"
1926
Themisverbandes (Men's Rights organization for female members, Sigurd Höberth von Schwarzthal). The founding of this organization led to a schism in Bund January 1927
Aequitas Weltbund für Männerrechte (Aequitas Word Federation for Men's Rights) (international), Vienna, following a schism in Bund für Männerrechte (Federation for Men's Rights). This was Sigurd Hoeberth's new organization for men's rights which welcomed female members.
1927
Justitia Verein für Männer und Familienrecht (Justitia Society for Men's Rights and Family Rights), Vienna, founded by Leopold Kornblüh following a schism in Bund für Männerrechte (Federation for Men's Rights). This group did not allow female members.
1927
Alimony Club of Illinois, Society of Disgruntled Alimony Payers, Chicago, founded by Dr. Vernon B. Cooley and second wife, Mrs. Bessie Cooley
1927
Alimony Payers Protective Association, led by Robert Gilbert Ecob
1927
Milwaukee Alimony Club, Wisconsin
1927
Fifty-Fifty League, London; manifesto "The Sex War" 1928
Tibet Men's Rights organization (name of org. unknown), founded by Amouki 1929
'World's League for the Rights of Men' formed in the UK, advocating for male issues, and holding an anti-"ultra-feminist" stance. The League had chapters in Vienna, Berlin, Munich, and other Continental centres.
1930
D. A. M. Association, Kansas City, Missouri, founded by French L. Nelson 1930
National Sociological League, Dr. Alexander Dallek, executive secretary 1931
Organization "The Modern Men's Rights Movement" (formation date unknown) publishes broadsheet, The Gauntlet outlining goals for gender equality and "emancipation of man from feminist domination."
1932
Alimony Club of New York County (Adolph Wodiska) (cited Jan. 9, 1932)
1932
Ohio Alimony Association, Cleveland
1933
National Divorce Reform League, Theodore Apstein (cited Feb. 14, 1933)
1933
"Men's rights" org '1933 Men's Association' started by lieutenant colonel R. A. Broughton, England 1935
Alimony Reform League, New York
1960
Divorce Racket Busters (incorporated 1961 as U.S.A. Divorce Reform, Inc.) – California – Reuben Kidd. This initiative continued to operate into the late 1960's.
1970
Esther Vilar publishes Der Drissierte Mann' (The Manipulated Man) in Germany, and subsequently in English in 1972.
1971
Coalition of American Divorce Reform Elements, founded by Richard Doyle 1973
Lone Fathers Association established in Australia by Barry Williams- still running.
1973
Men's Rights Association formed by Richard Doyle
1976
Richard Doyle publishes 'The Rape of the Male'.
1977
Men's Rights Incorperated (MR Inc.) founded by Frederic Hayward and David Ault. David Ault also started the 'Men's Rights ERA,' a project of MR Inc., which lobbied for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment and promoted the benefit of the ERA for increasing men's rights. MR. Inc. operated until the year 2010 (communication with Mr. Hayward).
1977
Free Men Inc. was founded in Columbia, Maryland, spawning several chapters over the following years, which eventually merged to form the National Coalition of Free Men (now known as the National Coalition for Men).
1977
Richard Doyle founded Men's Equality Now International (MEN International) in 1977 and edited its newsletter, "The Liberator" until 2004.
1979
Coalition Organized For Parental Equality formed.
1980s
The mythopoetic men's movement refers to a loose collection of organizations active in men's work since the early 1980s.
1985
Texas Fathers for Equal Rights formed.
1992
Professor Thomas Oaster director of the Missouri Center for Men's Studies at the University of Missouri–Kansas City, established the first International Men's Conference in Kansas which was attended in 1992-1994 by men and women from all continents. He also inaugurated the first International Men's Day on February 7, 1992 – an event that is now celebrated in over 70 countries.
1993
Warren Farrell publishes the landmark book The Myth of Male Power: Why Men are the Disposable Sex, which reiterates many of the men's issues published at the beginning of the century by the Ernest Belfort Bax.

After the publication of Warren Farrell's book The Myth of Male Power in 1993, men's rights initiatives proliferated until the formation of A Voice for Men in 2009 which represents the beginning of the second wave of the MRM.

The Second-Wave of the Men's (Human) Rights Movement:

'Men's rights are human rights' – rally, India 2014

Founded by men's rights advocate Paul Elam, A Voice for Men has become a global platform for promoting awareness of, and advocacy for men's human rights issues,[4] and is the largest organization of it's kind to-date. While it continues to advocate for most of the traditional concerns of the MHRM, it has deepened its understanding of those concerns and sufficiently developed its approach to them to be considered a legitimate second wave of the movement. For example the second wave is:

- Nationally and internationally networked (as opposed to the poorly networked 1st wave);
- Inclusive of all: women, men, straight and gay, trans, white, black are actively involved (as opposed to predominant hetero white male of the 1st wave);
- Strictly anti violence (as opposed to occasional violence tolerance of 1st wave)
- Anti-domination of MRM by traditionalist assumptions (which dominated 1st wave);
- Anti-domination by partisan politics (1st wave was dominated by right wing sentiment);
- Inclusive of people of all faiths while having zero tolerance for proselytizers (1st wave had slight dominance by Western religion);
- Are generally anti-feminist, anti-gynocentrism, and anti-misandry (in unison with the first wave) with the addition of being more broadly oriented to human rights principles;
- Are more committed to building bridges between the MHRM and the general community (unlike 1st wave);
- Have elaborated a more thorough socio-political history of misandry and gynocentrism (unlike the patchy attempts of 1st wave);
- Have developed a more sophisticated discourse about sexual/psychological/social/political issues to inform the basis of the MRM (more than 1st wave)
- Focuses it's activism on changing cultural narratives over lobbying officials to change laws (first wave), based on the principle that laws are usually altered to align with prevailing cultural expectations.

In contrast to lobbying legislators and requesting reforms to misandric laws (activism characterizing the first wave), the second wave has seen activism shift toward "changing the cultural dialogue" on social and mainstream media, with the understanding that laws governing gendered expectations are eventually brought into line with the prevailing cultural expectations.[5]

The principles of the second wave of the MHRM are not limited to the activities of A Voice for Men, and the signature principles first promoted by AVfM have migrated into the general discourse about men's issues; principles such as inclusiveness, creating a wider and greater number of options for men, and an open acceptance of a variety of masculinities – including the rights of men to enjoy self-determination and to Go Their Own Way (MGTOW).

"Waves" of the Men's Human Rights Movement:

The notion of 'waves' is familiar to us from first, second and third wave feminism. However our use of the term is not in any way related to the content or structure of feminist waves and is used here for metaphorical convenience as in 'waves of soldiers' or 'waves of emotion' to connote a surge of activity that is unique and yet related to another surge of activity.[1]

For the concept of 'waves' I employ the philosophical perspective of Alfred North Whitehead over Hegel. Hegel developed a progressivist dialectic model: eg. → thesis (gynocentrism) → antithesis (men's rights activism) → synthesis (equality for all). This is the progressivist model implied by Bax and also by Farrell who describes a similar evolutionary theme in his writings: eg. → Women's movement → men's movement → gender transition movement.

The benefit of Whitehead's approach is that it is a process philosophy like Hegel's but, unlike Hegel, he insists that we do not leave the past behind us – we do not "progress" in the dialectical fashion described by Hegel. Whitehead proposes, rather, that the past always remains with us and informs all developments in the present. Thus by thinking with Whitehead's philosophy the Men's Rights Movement continues to undergo waves of activity, but they are not essentially "progressivist" waves.

Sources:

[1] Peter Wright, Welcome to the Second Wave (January 25, 2013)
[2] Robert St. Estephe, The Unknown History of Misandry
[3] Paul Elam, Entering a new ERA (January 30, 2013)
[4] Mission Statement of A Voice for Men (August 2014)
[5] Paul Elam, Changing The Cultural Narrative (July 2015)

Feature image by James Brandon

Who’s lying, who’s self-justifying? Origins of the he said/she said gap in sexual allegations

AVfM Video Source · 6 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

From Skeptic Magazine: The Woody Allen sex scandal of 2013 triggered a national conversation on who to believe, with people lining up on each side as if they knew what really happened. Based on recent research on how people navigate the often tricky waters of sexual negotiation, Dr. Carol Tavris shows that it is entirely possible in some sexual assault cases neither side is lying, but instead both sides feel justified in their positions. This talk was considered one of the best ever given at The Amazing Meeting.

Awards Dinner: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Dean Esmay · 7 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: We will over the next few weeks continue to present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. The following is not one of our formal presentations exactly, but was a brief Awards Dinner on the night of Day 1, June 27, 2014. Special thanks were given out to the VFW and an award was given to one of the most important figures to the Men's Human Rights Movement and, indeed, to the world at large.—DE

(Clip 1: Robert O'Hara)

First of all, I want to thank the VFW for allowing us to be here today. This would not have happened … these people really came through for us. They've been extremely, extremely accommodating, and very nice, and they've really just been very wonderful to work with. There's not a single problem. I'm glad we had it here rather than at the DoubleTree, to be totally honest with you. It's just been really great.

And of course, we have to thank our sponsors:

Redonkulas.com, who made this happen, who was very, very instrumental in making this happen. A great supporter there, Redonkulas.com.

Of course, the Honey Badger Brigade, who have joined us today, please give them a big hand. They're just a great, great addition to the Men's Rights Movement. They really are wonderful people, and they've done incredible work.

Of course, Aaron Clarey, who's not with us today—Is Aaron with us? No. He's not with us today, but he is also a sponsor. Please think about buying one of his books, and of course—Bachelor Pad Economics. Buy that book. Got great reviews—I haven't read it yet, but it's gotten great reviews; and he's a wonderful thinker, a wonderful guy. Of course, he contributed to this.

And I just want to say, before we get started, I don't think anybody here is lost on the enormity of the historical significance of what has happened today, and yesterday, and what's going to happen tomorrow. We're making history here, and everybody's here because they want to be here, and everybody that's here has made a sacrifice to be here. It's not like anybody's got their company paying for it. It's not like somebody's got their school paying for it. The people that are here, the people that are sitting next to you right now, are a special breed of people, just like you. And now is our time—right now, we're having dinner right now; now is our time to break bread together, and to get to know each other, and to build contact with each other in a way that we've never been able to do before, or haven't done before. And let's make this the first of many, many more occasions, when we and people like us get together and have fun and talk about the future.

So, with that, I'd like to invite Tim, Commander Tim, up—is he here? Oh, okay … I'll stretch it out … I'll stretch it out. Okay, let's see here … Oh, I'm sorry, I thought he was ready—I'm sorry, I should have talked with you first. He's on his way? Okay. Anyway—now I'm going to have to improvise. Anyway—oh, I'm going to talk about the speakers now. The speakers—definitely, we've had an incredible list of speakers joining us today. I mean, I cannot believe that we got the powerhouse of speakers that we've had come with us today, and please, extend your thanks again in thanking them for being here.

And anyway, I want to bring this up—please take the opportunity, I know that we all came with our own—sorry. I know that we all came with our own groups and everything, and that, you know, I really want to hang out as much as I can with James today; I just met him for the first time yesterday, you know. But take this opportunity to talk with people, maybe, that you've never talked to before, or never had a Skype conversation with; someone that you're a stranger with. Because that's very important, to mingle. And again, this is what events like this are for … Is Commander Tim here yet? I'm running out of stuff to say.

("He's in the car show here.")

Oh, he is? (Darn that car show …) Oh, and by the way, I'm going to go check out the car show, if they're still around after … because that Barracuda was really cool, man. That was really cool.

But anyway, I guess we'll wait until Commander Tim comes, and maybe after the dinner we'll do that?—Okay. So, everyone, please, enjoy your meal. Thank you very much.

(Clip 2: Robert O'Hara)

… Commander of the VFW post here, please, everybody give him a big hand. Very, very (inaudible) … Again, please, thank you.

Commander Tim, we have something very special to give to this VFW post. Paul, will you come forward, please? Paul, do you have any remarks for Tim?

(Paul Elam:) Just that … the appreciation Bob has already expressed for the Commander; and I want to take the opportunity to let everybody know that A Voice for Men will be donating an additional $2,000 to this VFW post, for their standing by us, and to help veterans who come here.

(Tim Litz, Commander:) Everyone here is welcome to be here, and when we were contacted that they needed a place to have this convention … we never said no. You were coming here; no problem. Glad to have you here!

(Paul Elam:) Thank you very much … thank you.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay, so … like I said, they're going to call tables …

(Clip 3: Robert O'Hara)

So, are you going to take care of this? Okay.

(Paul Elam takes microphone and ascends to the stage.)

(Paul Elam:) Ladies and gentlemen … ladies and gentlemen, can I get your attention for a moment, please? … Don't make me get the Security Director.

Ladies and gentlemen, could I get your attention for just a moment, please? A little special occasion here that we would like you all to see, and we're sure you're going to enjoy it. Dean Esmay, our Operations Manager for A Voice for Men.

(Dean Esmay:) Thank you. It is said that all idols have feet of clay. What this statement means is that whenever you prop up a person like a statue, like they're pristine and perfect and belong on a pedestal, then inevitably, when that person shows a flaw, the bronze or marble statue of them in our minds comes crashing down, as if the feet of the statue were soft and weak and made of clay.

When we see a person who we idolize, and we find a flaw in them, suddenly we're shocked. But whose fault was that? The person idolized, or those of us who put them on that pedestal to come crashing down from in the first place? When the human idol falls, it is rarely they who really fell. It was the foolish image we had of them as something other than human that falls.

So, tonight, I want to talk to you about a flawed, imperfect human being. Starting from a troubled, violent childhood, as an adult this person lived a life of scandal and outrage; frequently breaking the law; getting into fights even with cops—in fact, I read somewhere that she once drove a cop right out of her house, screaming, "Fuck you!"—while she was busy inserting herself into affairs that others said were none of her damn business. Broke up many a marriage, this woman did, to the scandal of ministers, priests, and rabbis, and the community at large. Respectable citizens were appalled by her outrageous behavior. She was bad with money, she was constantly on the move, and everywhere she went, people hated her.

She went through the pattern that so many imperfect people go through, with more than one failed marriage, and children who often wondered what the hell she was all about. Fleeing her native land, she came to the United States, only to be so disgusted by the political climate here that she left again and gave up a chance at American citizenship.

I'd been hearing about this scandalous woman for many years, wondering what she was really like. A few years ago, I got it in my head that I wanted to talk to her. She'd more-or-less retired from public life, and it was an elusive hunt to find her, even in this age of Internet connections. She had a website with contact information on it, but no phone number or street address. There was an email address, and I sent emails to what was on that website; and letter after letter went unanswered. The emails went nowhere. I looked to see if she was on Skype. I'm on Skype all the time; and I found no less than three such persons with that name—and none of them would accept my contact requests.

Finally, in my Internet stalkerish ways, I stumbled upon her Facebook and with a little timidity sent her a friend request. I'm not sure, but I think I sent it a couple of times. Finally, one day, out of the blue, I got a note that she'd accepted—"Huzzah!" I cried. I had made the connection. Little did I know … I sent her my first Facebook message, asking for an interview, and she didn't respond. I sent her another, saying, "I want an interview," and she said, "No problem, just email me through my website."

So I emailed again … no answer … no answer … I messaged her on Facebook and said email wasn't working. She must have been busy or something, so I Facebooked her again and pleaded, "Your email address from your website doesn't seem to work." So she just shot back with, "Well, why don't you just Skype me, then?"

This woman was starting to get on my nerves.

But to make a long story short … finally, we got that sorted, and the Skype connection was made with this scandalous, imperfect human being, and a friendship began.

I want to tell you something about this imperfect person because she is, in fact, my idol; and in my eyes she could never have feet of clay because she has always had human feet. I can't say I know all her imperfections, but I do know she is imperfect. Like all of us, she is flawed, she is human; she has made mistakes in her life, and she will almost certainly keep making them, and keep scandalizing and upsetting people for many years to come.

It is thus, with … and knowing all of this about her, I can say she is possibly the most "human" human being I have ever known. And were I to live a thousand years, I don't think I could meet anyone that I was prouder to say I was friends with than this flawed human being who bulled her way through life not letting anyone or anything get in the way of her quest to help the battered, the bloody, the neglected, the forgotten, the reviled, find their own ways back to humanity, not caring who she offended while she was doing it.

It is thus with great pleasure that I present a Lifetime Achievement Award to my flawed, imperfect, very human friend; and with her permission, we will give out this same award every year, in her name, with her to be the first recipient. Regardless of that, I want to present this award, for a lifetime of achievement and dedication to shedding light on the bane of family violence; for the single-handed forging of the Women's Shelter Movement in 1971, and for conducting years of valuable research and education; for standing by the truth, alone and in the face of hatred, ignorance, and ideological corruption; for educating and inspiring so many to push forward with evidence-based advocacy, and for decades of unyielding compassion for those on the margins of a society led astray; for showing equal compassion for men and boys, and refusing ever to cooperate in demonizing them; for the continuing struggle to bring about changes desperately needed, ensuring domestic violence concerns are inclusive of men as well as women, and particularly children; and for, against all odds, keeping the truth alive long enough to bring it to those who might listen and carry it forward.

I would like to present this Lifetime Achievement Award to A Voice for Men's Editor-At-Large and advisor on domestic violence policy, my friend, Erin Pizzey.

(Erin Pizzey:) Okay, then all sit down … get on with your supper, and let me just say one thing: The fight goes on.

It’s not about the nail

AVfM Video Source · 7 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Men should stop trying to “do something to fix the problem,” and learn to listen. Because sometimes women just want to talk and know that they are being heard, understood, and ultimately loved [satire]. On the other hand, it’d probably be nice if more women realized what this sometimes feels like on the man’s side!

You might want to subscribe to Jason Headley.

Why is discrimination bad?

Catreece Macleod · 8 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Well, the answer's obvious! It just … is, right?

The question is a bit odd, though, because although these days most people know that discrimination is wrong, few actually understand why. The average individual just assumes they know why, but rarely do they actually reason it out.

And this is how it becomes all right to be racist against White people or sexist against men.

"There's no such thing!" I hear you cry. Really? Then this is the article for you.

How We Learn

Before we break down discrimination in general, we first have to learn what it is and where it comes from.

Discrimination is actually a natural response; it helps keep you alive. Without it, you probably wouldn't live to be ten years old.

Yes, I said it, discrimination, in and of itself, is not bad. Aaaah! Pause there before you go quote-mining; there's more to it.

You see, the way we learn is that when something happens to us—be it one major event or repeated smaller events—we store it away. Our brains are excellent at storing massive amounts of information tidbits and then correlating them against one another.

This is how we're capable of art, speech, and even conscious thought, among other capabilities. Without the capacity to compare two or more pieces of data and evaluate if they're related, we simply couldn't have this conversation in the first place.

The thing is, our brains are so remarkably good at correlating data that sometimes we make false correlations. Actually … it happens pretty often.

Ever see a face in a wood or stucco ceiling? How about images in clouds? Ever dreamed? Had a mental image? Ever paraphrased someone? Spoken something in your own words without quoting someone else 100% verbatim?

That's your brain's capacity to blend different pieces of information together and compare them at work. Sometimes it goes a little overboard, however …

The Virgin Mary's face appearing in a muffin is the same concept as seeing images in the clouds or, oddly enough, racism. Huh?

You see, racism, sexism, and any other "ism" you can think of that exists as discrimination is what happens when your brain makes a correlation of data with a specific group.

As mentioned, you learn when your brain stores information about events you experienced—whether large or small—and then looks for similar traits across these events to try to earmark them as important details to remember.

This goes doubly so for dangerous events that either harmed you or that triggered an adrenaline response. Your brain goes into overdrive, checking for any information that may be even slightly related so that it can not only handle the situation at that given moment but can also remember it vividly later on so that you can use those details to prevent you from getting into that same situation again.

For example, if you get bitten by a snake, you're probably going to be scared of snakes from that point on unless you actively quash that fear with knowledge. A snake handler would learn which snakes are venomous or otherwise dangerous, how to handle snakes, or how to keep them from getting scared or angry enough to bite the handler.

If, however, you don't have that knowledge, you'll simply be afraid of snakes and that's it. Congratulations, you're now a snakeist. You discriminate against snakes.

This brain process happens all the time, even with smaller events. If someone does something a bit rude to you, you will probably assume that the individual is a rude person. If they continue to be rude to you, over time you build up a belief that the individual is kind of an asshat. Which they probably are.

Here's the thing, though: your brain doesn't stop at the individual level. Let's say that the individual was a Black woman. A little later you're walking down the street and another Black woman says something rude to you. A few months later, yet another Black woman makes a snide comment to you. Your brain will automatically see the correlation between these events and just assume: "Hey, Black women are asshats!" until proven otherwise.

If, however, you also happened to know several Black women who were perfectly pleasant to you, this evidence usually counteracts the correlation, allowing you to see it as just individuals who are being asshats rather than "all Black women."

This only works, however, if you're exposed to such contrary evidence in advance. What happens if these Black women are rude to you and then, afterwards, you meet a pleasant Black woman?

Here's a hint: Your brain doesn't tend to make the correlation that she's nice so the others might have been erroneous. Instead, your brain already has a stereotype in place and now tries to fit whatever this pleasant Black woman is saying to you into the same stereotype it has already crafted.

Your mind will go out of its way to try to twist anything she has to say into a hostile action. A friendly smile can suddenly be mistaken for a sneer. A kind word is assumed to be a backhanded compliment. A happy hello is viewed as arrogant or contemptuous.

With fear of snakes comes safety from getting bitten from a snake. With fear of Black women comes safety from being emotionally harmed by anything they might say that's mean to you.

It's a self-preservation system set up to make quick, rapid decisions based on past experience for how to experience the world around you right now.

Your brain interprets everything through the lens of experience. This trait is used by stage and street magicians all the time; it's how they trick people into believing things that can't possibly be true. From optical illusions to card tricks, it's all the same.

Without the capacity to make rapid, snap judgments on instinct tempered by experience, we'd never be able to exist. We'd be too bogged down in endless details over tiny things: stopping to see whether the snake is poisonous or not is probably going to take too long and you'll get bitten while you try to figure it out. In the same way, stopping to see if a black woman in the above example is going to be pleasant is to open yourself up to an emotional attack.

Or … is it?

Obviously, not all Black women are asshats, nor are all snakes dangerous. So sometimes these instant reactions may not be that helpful to us and may make us recoil from even something as friendly as a simple wave and a hello.

This is where things begin to break down—when we make generalizations without running them through the lens of logic and simply allow our experience and instincts to run the show.

When All You Have Is a Hammer …

So now you can see how the same principles that save you from being killed by a snakebite can also turn you into a hateful, misogynistic racist. It's the exact same set of mechanics being employed by your brain, except that it's being channeled into a less than useful application.

Sometimes.

If you live in a ghetto, and you see a group of thugs coming your way, it's discriminatory to move out of the way … but it might very well save your life. If you're at war and see someone in the enemy's uniform, it's probably better to shoot first and ask questions later.

And if you are a woman walking along a street at night and you see a man walking toward you, you start digging around in your purse for your pepper spray, right?

Well … no.

Part of the reason with why these reactions are problematic is that they begin to apply to situations that are highly unlikely to occur.

When all you have is a hammer, everything looks like a nail. If all your life you've been told that all men are Schrödinger's rapist, that the rate of rape is absurdly high, that the risks are immense, you had better be scared!

Except … that's not the case.

The rape statistics have been mangled in such a way that they are hard to really believe, but the mangling was based on this very same issue: data that the researchers gathered and analyzed was viewed through a lens of sexist ideology.

If a man offers to buy a woman a drink, for example, and she declines, and he leaves her alone after that, the Mary Koss study listed that as "Attempted Rape" because Koss was correlating absolutely all data of any kind with men = rape, no matter how innocuous.

The continual and constant barrage of "men are rapists!" rhetoric that has been haphazardly slung around has created a generation of women who are terrified of men and who took the idea of offering someone a drink to be the equivalent of sexual assault, which then became the equivalent of actual rape, which then inflated the numbers over and over and over until we get an absurd number like 1 in 3 women will be raped in their lifetime.

The actual number … ? Closer to 1 in 50.

Still much higher than it should be, but it's a lot easier to feel safe knowing it's a 2% rate of incidence rather than a 33% rate of incidence.

In fact, it's almost guaranteed (under a 0.01% chance) that the guy on the street is not going to rape you. Even if he was a rapist, the chances are excessively unlikely that he would rape you right then and there. If you even so much as present yourself with confidence rather than fear, you're pretty much safe.

If all you have is patriarchy theory, then everything's going to look like men are out to get you. By its very nature, it's discriminatory.

Let's look at a simple example:

A man holds open a door for a woman. Under normal circumstances, she thanks him for being kind. If a woman opened the door for her instead, she'd thank her as well.

Under patriarchy theory, she thinks he's claiming that she's weak and incapable of holding a door open for herself so she screams at him. If another woman opened the door for her, she considers it solidarity.

This is what sexism looks like: the tinting of perception based upon the gender of the individual involved in an action.

Power, control, none of it matters when it comes to discrimination. Even if men were ruling the world, which they're not, but even if they were, it'd still be possible to discriminate against them because discrimination isn't about rational thought or explanation—it's about trying to force-fit people's actions into a preconceived framework or narrative of what you expect them to do. When they fail to perform as expected, your mind tries to bullshit up an excuse for why.

There is no population in the world that hasn't committed atrocities at some point in history, no civilization, no gender, no group. The Native Americans went to war with one another quite often before the Europeans arrived and were quite adept at performing some rather horrific deeds. The same goes for the African slaves, who did much the same thing.

The reverse is also true: any population who has oppressed others has also been oppressed. The British? Hell, yes. Seriously, check their history. English as a language is so fucked up because the British Isles were essentially a revolving door of conquerors for over one thousand years. You practically had to work full-time to keep up with who the oppressor of the week was. The Nazis? Yep, go back and read the details of the Bitchslap of Versailles; Germany was fucked over so hard after the First World War it wasn't funny. When you bring a shopping cart full of money to the store to buy a single loaf of bread, you can kind of start calling that Third World conditions.

Again, power has nothing to do with discrimination, nor do past acts. These are simply the excuses used to hate people in the present because you've already decided to hate them.

Discrimination isn't rational by definition. We try to rationalize our excuses for why we're acting irrationally, but that doesn't fix the fact that the core beliefs system is a mangled form of correlation of data.

Anyone can be discriminated against, regardless of who they are, or what groups they belong to, and no matter what supposed acts their group may or may not have performed. All that matters is that someone has created a lens by which to view their actions that distorts everything that individual does. No matter how kind or pleasant they are, the narrative must always be withheld, and everything that happens will always be slanted to be hostile, no matter what.

Due to this, discrimination will never end on its own. It doesn't matter how many acts of compassion or reparations are provided, it'll never be enough for the discriminated party to ever remove the discrimination, as their actions will forever be viewed as further acts of aggression, no matter what.

So … Why's It Actually, Yunno, BAD?

The answer to this question is a bit different from what you might expect.

As mentioned, discrimination, in and of itself, is not "bad." Without it, you'd put yourself into horribly dangerous situations and probably get yourself killed. You need discrimination to survive.

As such, the fact that it exists isn't enough of a reason … so what is? Why can discrimination sometimes turn into an awful thing?

The short answer is because the narrative overrides the actions of individuals.

The long answer is a bit more messy but essentially holds the same concept at its core.

The individual is not responsible for the actions of anyone but themself. The individual is not at fault for things they have not done. The individual is, well, an individual. The individual is capable of being completely different from their race, religion, gender, sexual orientation, or whatever other group you try to lump them in with.

The problem with discrimination isn't that it exists: we all need a set of reference points to use to interact quickly with the world. If you've met 50 White people and they were all assholes, it's within your best interest to assume that all White people are assholes. It's simple self-preservation.

The actual problem is that the human mind doesn't use discrimination for what it is: a tool. Instead, it uses discrimination as an absolute value.

All Whites are evil.

All men are rapists.

All Jews rule the world.

All women belong in the kitchen.

You see where I'm going with this?

The problem isn't even that "some men are rapists," it's that all men are rapists, and there's never going to be anything any man can ever do to prove otherwise.

Discrimination doesn't allow for non-absolute values. If you're a member of X group, then you embody 100% of all aspects of that group, and no individual can ever surpass it. They are forever locked into being only what your discriminating brain wants them to be.

There's a simple test to see whether someone is ruled by discrimination.

Do they deal in absolutes for others but specifics for themselves?

If so, you have a bigot on your hands.

Patriarchy theory cites that all men oppress all women, but not all feminists are like that.

Congratulations, feminism, you're a bigoted movement.

The problem is that we can see ourselves as individuals with individual reasons. When it's people we like, we can understand their motivations most of the time, or at least make an effort to. When it's someone we're discriminatory against, however, we stop trying to understand their motivations as they see them and instead apply our opinions of what their motivations are by what our own discriminatory ideology says their motivations should be.

In this way, we can always see the good in ourselves, no matter how atrocious the acts we commit may be, yet we can never see the good in someone we discriminate against.

This prevents the individual from ever interacting with us on a level playing field because the discriminated-against will forever be held to a set of impossible standards.

The reason why discrimination is bad is quite complex, yet also quite simple: it's a communication breakdown. When you put your words into the mouth of someone else, when you place your motivations upon their actions, when you put your ideas in their head, without ever bothering to check if you're correct or not, you've removed all capacity to communicate or interact with that individual.

Without communication and understanding, we can never get along. Without these things, we turn to hostility, we turn to war, we turn to malice and hatred.

The cure to hatred is communication—understanding why people do the things they do.

So long as you're a bigot, you will never cure any of the world's ills.

Note that this applies to members of the MHRM as well. It's commonplace that we fall into the same situation as the feminists and the social justice warriors—we can't allow this communication breakdown to occur.

Communication absolutely must be a two-way street if we're ever to solve any of the problems we face.

Discrimination is, in the end, a tool to be used. When you fail to use it as a tool, but rather as a one-size-fits-all that can never be wrong, you become a bigot.

The MHRM has no room for bigots, and we have to not only police others on this matter, as they prevent all progress, but also evaluate our own actions on a constant, continual basis.

Are you being a bigot? Are you letting the individual you're arguing with actually voice their opinions or are you holding them to an unrealistic set of standards that they can never live up to?

We're all in this together, and we're all individuals. We aren't the hive-mind collective. Not the social justice warriors, not the MRAs, not the feminists.

Bigotry must be removed from all sides before true communication can be enacted and before we can ever hope to solve our problems.

If you see it, point it out. Hell, refer them to this article. Reblog it, retweet it, repost it; this is the first step to solving any social problems for men and women, minorities and majorities the world over.

But more than that, listen to the individual and what they have to say, not what you feel they should be saying. Don't fall into the same trap the others have. You can't necessarily solve anyone else's problems, but you can solve your own, and that's as good a place to start as any.

Riding the donkey backwards: Men as the unacceptable victims of marital violence

Malcolm J. George · 8 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In post-Renaissance France and England, society ridiculed and humiliated husbands thought to be battered and/or dominated by their wives (Steinmetz, 1977-78). In France, for instance, a "battered" husband was trotted around town riding a donkey backwards while holding its tail. In England, "abused" husbands were strapped to a cart and paraded around town, all the while subjected to the people's derision and contempt. Such "treatments" for these husbands arose out of the patriarchal ethos where a husband was expected to dominate his wife, making her, if the occasion arose, the proper target for necessary marital chastisement; not the other way around (Dobash & Dobash, 1979).

Although the patriarchal view supporting a husband's complete dominance of his wife persisted into the twentieth century (E. Pleck, 1987), during the latter half of this century, we find a definite shift in people's attitudes toward marital relationships. Beginning in the 1970s, for instance, advocates like Del Martin (1976) and Erin Pizzey (Pizzey 1974; Pizzey & Shapiro, 1982) exposed the "hidden" secret of domestic violence. As a result, terms like "domestic violence," "domestic abuse," and "battered wife" have found their way into our everyday speech. Finally, society seems to be taking the issue of domestic violence against women seriously and looking for solutions to stem if not to end the violence.

Most of the early research dealing with domestic violence focused solely on the female victims and the social factors that supported the victimization of women (Smith, 1989). Consequently, a voluminous literature now exists that portrays domestic violence as a unitary social phenomenon stemming from a patriarchal social order where women are portrayed as the victims and men perceived as the perpetrators (Dobash & Dobash, 1979). Such research has had a significant impact upon the evolution of recent changes in civil law, enforcement of criminal law, and the ways law enforcement and social agencies respond to the needs of battered wives (see Victim Support, 1992).

As noted in the opening section, finding evidence that society in centuries past found it necessary to punish men who did not uphold the patriarchal way suggests previous recognition that a husband could be assaulted or dominated by his wife. In recent years though, such a possibility has found little support or credence. Rather, the view of husband-as-victim of domestic violence is more likely a subject of cartoons (Saenger, 1963) or of jokes about "hen-pecked" husbands (Wilkinson, 1981). In fact, raising the issue of husband-as-victim has spawned a heated controversy within academic circles pitting those who have reported such evidence (see Mills, 1990; Mold, 1990; Straus, Gelles, & Steinmetz, 1980) against those who scoff at such a possibility (see Pagelow, 1985; Pleck, Pleck, & Bart, 1977; Walker, 1989, 1990).

A number of factors apparently are stoking the debate. Among those most often cited are the relative numbers of male versus female victims, the methods used to determine whether or not male victimization has occurred, and the nature and context of female violence. With respect to this last factor, the nature and context of female violence, the debate has widened to include whether the violence perpetrated by a woman against a man is motivated solely in terms of self-defense from either actual or possible bodily threat, whether the violence perpetrated by a woman against a man is in retaliation to previous victimization by a male partner, and whether the resulting injury inflected on a man by a woman is comparable to that inflicted on a woman by a man.

With respect to the first issue much of the data available on domestic violence in the United States, for instance, indicates that, as Mildred Daley Pagelow (1985) argues, females far outnumber males in terms of being the victims of violence. Such is also the conclusion of a literature review prepared for the United Kingdom's Home Office (Smith, 1989). Given that most studies suggest that domestic violence is exclusively perpetrated by men against women and propose theoretical frameworks to account for this unilateral condition, men who experience unilateral violence at the hands of their wives or female partners have been all but neglected. Dismissed by the argument that few men are actually the victim of spousal abuse or that these few were in all probability men in denial of their own abuse complaining of their spouses' self-defense needs, the experiences of such men have warranted sparse academic concern.

Another feature preventing serious attention toward the issue of battered men is the belief that studies of battered women will suffice to provide a background for understanding male victims. Further, it has been suggested that in those very few cases of battered men that their social and legal needs are already met within the context of present and available social and legal provisions (Pagelow, 1985).

Although some argue that the relatively few cases of battered men warrant little serious study, incidents of battered men have drawn the attention of numerous social agencies in the United Kingdom, for instance, among the police (Burrell & Brinkworth, 1994; Kirsta, 1994), police surgeons (Harrison, 1986), counseling agencies (Jaevons, 1992; Kirsta, 1991, 1994; Thomas, 1993), probation services (Jaevons, 1992), social agencies like the Samaritans, the Salvation Army, and shelters for the homeless (Harrison, 1986; Jaevons, 1992; Lewin, 1992), psychiatrists and physicians, (Borowski, Murch, & Walker, 1983; Harrison, 1986; Oswald, 1980), fathers' rights groups (Harrison, 1986), lawyers (Wolff, 1992), and even among those who work with battered women (L. Davidson, personal communication, April, 1994; ; Kirsta, 1991; Lewin, 1992; E. Pizzey, personal communication, December, 1992).

This paper addresses the question of male victimization by reviewing research studies and literature in which domestic violence directed against husbands/male partners has been found or considered. Further, I argue that more research is needed to help define the similarities and differences between male and female victims of domestic violence. The contention that the numbers of battered men in society are very small and thus present an anomaly to the general thinking that women are the only "legitimate" subject of domestic violence is denied. The fact is that taking a serious look at the phenomenon of battered men may actually be a necessary next step to help "de-contaminate" the study of domestic violence (Note 1).

ARE MEN VICTIMS?
RESEARCH AND CONTROVERSY

Although domestic assaults against men have been reported in the literature since the 1950s (Bates, 1981; Straus, 1993), the earliest academic reference to "battered husbands" can be traced to the work of Suzanne Steinmetz (1977, 1977-78). Extrapolating from a small scale study, Steinmetz suggested that the incidence of "husband beating" rivaled the incidence of "wife battering" and that it was husband abuse, not wife abuse, that was a largely underreported form of domestic violence. Her claims received considerable media attention in the United States and elsewhere, but she was savagely attacked for misreading, misinterpreting, and misrepresenting her findings by opponents. Pagelow, for one, (1985) criticized Steinmetz's evidence on a number of grounds, for instance, the use of aggregate, as opposed to couple samples. Further, she noted that Steinmetz's work did not address the context in which women were the perpetrators of violence, namely, "self-defense." Consequently, Pagelow argued that the claim of husband abuse could not be supported and that the "battered husband syndrome" was "much ado about nothing."

Despite the criticisms leveled at Steinmetz and her concept of the battered husband, violence directed at husbands has been reported by others. For instance, Murray Straus, Richard Gelles, and Suzanne Steinmetz (1980) estimated that about one in eight men in the United States acted violently during marital conflict. However, they estimated a similar number of women also acted violently during marital conflict. They also noted that in a majority of these cases, violence was a mutual or bilateral activity, with only 27% of cases finding that husbands were the sole perpetrators of violence and 24% of cases finding only wives acting violently. With respect to serious violence, as judged by the Conflict Tactics Scales (Note 2), these authors stated that the rate for men beaten by their wives was 4.6%; a figure that indicated "over 2 million very violent wives." While 47% of those husbands who beat their wives did so severely three or more times a year, 53% of women who beat their husbands severely did so three or more times a year.

In a later article, Straus and Gelles (1986) reviewed both their own and other studies in the United States and reported somewhat equivalent assault rates for both male-to-female and female-to-male. In their 1975 survey, Straus, Gelles, and Steinmetz (1980) estimated that approximately 38 out of every 1000 families experience severe husband-to-wife violence, while 46 out of every l000 families experience severe wife-to-husband violence. Ten years later, Straus & Gelles (1986) reported that the rates have dropped from 38 to 30 and 46 and 44 per 1000 couples, respectively. In overall acts of violence, as defined by the Conflict Tactics Scales, husband-to-wife rates of violence were 121 and 113 and wife-to-husband rates of violence were 116 and 121 per 1000 couples for the two study years (i.e., 1975 and 1985).

Although Straus and Gelles (1986) did not dwell on these comparisons, they did make a statement that seems to run counter to the prevailing academic and public perception of the time, namely, that "an important and distressing finding about violence in American families is that, in marked contrast to the behavior of women outside the family, women are about as violent within the family as men" (p. 470). The small change in the wife-to-husband rate of violence, as opposed to some change in the husband-to-wife violence, was suggested to result from a lack of attention or concern to male victimization. The case for giving due regard to domestic women-on-men assaults and an acceptance of this higher level of victimization was backed by reference to other studies finding similar levels of male victimization (Brutz & Ingoldsby, 1984; Gelles, 1974; Giles-Sims, 1983; Jourilles & O'Leary, 1985; Lane & Gwartney-Gibbs, 1985; ; Laner & Thompson, 1982; Makepeace, 1983; Sack, Keller, & Howard, 1982; Saunders, 1986; Scanzoni, 1978; Steinmetz, 1977, 1977-78; Szinovacz, 1983).

In conclusion, summarized such data as Straus and Gelles (1986) indicating that women engage in minor assaults against their male partners at a slightly higher rate than for the same attacks upon women by men. In situations in which both partners use violence, men and women were also almost equally responsible for the first blow, but in only one quarter of these relationships was the man the sole victim. At more potentially injurious levels of assault, men were considered to exceed women in their aggressive behavior and it was suggested that a relative rate in the order of 6 or 7 to 1 (male versus female) was evident for the perpetration of injurious assaults.

Returning to the controversy surrounding the issue of violence against husbands, Straus (1989, 1993) and Straus and Kaufman-Kantor (1994) have extended such observations and reiterated the importance of giving due consideration to the issue. Straus (1993) has pointed out that some studies fail to report findings of female-to-male violence. For instance, Straus noted that in a Kentucky study of battered wives, the study failed to report a 38% rate of unilateral female-to-male violence. Straus further noted that in reviewing over thirty studies, every (Straus's emphasis) study using a sample that was not self-selecting had found rough equivalence of assault rates for both women and men (e.g., Brush, 1990; Sorensen & Telles, 1991). Some of the variation in the reports of incidence of violence directed against husbands or male partners could be attributed to the difference in whether the studies surveyed the general population or were based upon samples of reported victims as found in police records or agencies dealing with domestic violence. The much lower rates of male victimization evident from studies on samples of victims of domestic violence drawn from victimization programs police records, or other similar agencies working in the field were suggested to introduce a "clinical sample fallacy" into the debate. In contrast evidence derived from the use of the Conflict Tactics Scales, although widely recognized and used, has been criticized by some as seemingly giving credence to attacks by women upon men by erroneously equating female assaults with potentially more harmful male assaults (e.g., Bogarde, 1990; Kurz, 1993).

Several American and Canadian studies have indicated levels of female violence against husbands or male partners as more than just an anomaly or a small percentage of isolated individual cases. For instance, Nisonoff and Bitman (1979) reported that 15.5% of men and 11.3% of women reported having hit their spouse, while 18.6% of men and 12.7% of women reported having been hit by their spouse. Studies of both dating and married/cohabiting couples have also found that women admit committing unilateral acts of violence against their male partners at levels not greatly dissimilar to those committed by men (Arias & Johnson, 1989). In a survey of 884 United States university students, Breen (1985) found that both male and female students reported being the victim of an act of violence by a romantic partner in approximately equal proportions (18% of the men and 14% of the women). And among married male students, Breen found that 23% reported being slapped, punched, or kicked, while 9% reported being the victim of an assault involving a weapon and a similar percentage reported receiving injuries that required them to seek medical treatment. In a study of particular interest, as it surveyed patients attending an emergency department, Goldberg and Tomianovich (1984) found that men constituted 38% of the victims of spousal violence.

Bland and Orn (1986), in a Canadian study of the relationships between family violence, psychiatric disorder, and alcohol abuse, found that men and women were nearly equal in committing acts of violence against their partners. In another study, this time for 562 married and co-habiting couples living in Calgary, Canada, Brinkerhoff and Lupri (1988) found nearly twice as much wife-to-husband, as husband-to-wife, severe violence. Using data derived again from the Conflict Tactics Scales, these researchers reported a 4.7% rate of severe violence in husband-to-wife relationships while a 10.4% rate was found for wife-to-husband severe violence. These authors also suggested that male violence decreased with level of educational attainment, but female violence increased. Also Sommers, Barnes, and Murray (1992) reported a higher incidence of at least one incident of partner abuse for females as opposed to males (39.1% versus 26.3%).

In the United Kingdom, surveys of domestic incidents are more restricted than the National Family Violence Survey or other comparable surveys in the United States or Canada (Smith, 1989). However, if we allow as evidence the reporting in the popular media, evidence of male victims can be found. For instance, in a UK survey of 2,075 people about family life reported in the popular press, Moller (1991) reported that three times as many women, as men, admitted hitting their spouse or partner. Individual case histories of battered men have also been reported in various popular presses as well as details of an unpublished British study, using the Conflict Tactics Scales, where similar results were found (e.g., Kirsta, 1989, 1991, 1994; Stacey & Cantacuzino, 1993; Wolff, 1992). In an article reviewing a number of legal cases, Bates (1981) commented that while “little had been written about male victimization, it was not difficult to find male victims from even a superficial search of case law.”

By contrast, a study of police and court records in Scotland found that only 2.4% of cases involved a male victim (Dobash & Dobash, 1978). Two other studies in the United Kingdom gave a somewhat different picture. Borowski, Murch, and Walker (1983) in a survey of fifty general practitioners found that just over 80% of physicians reported seeing a case of a female victim of domestic violence about once every six months, but totally unsolicited, 27% of the physicians reported seeing a male victim with about the same frequency. In a study by psychiatrists in Scotland, Oswald (1980) reported on 299 women involved in violent relationships. Forty-six percent of these women reported being both victims of violence by a spouse/partner or near relative and perpetrators of violence towards their spouse/partner or near relative. Another 12% stated they had been violent towards a spouse/partner or near relative, but received no violence from them. In a more recent UK study, Smith, Baker, Buchan, and Bodiwala (1992) reported on the results of their gender-blind study of victims of domestic assaults attending Leicester Royal Infirmary casualty department. Retrospective study of the casualty department records for 1988, of assault victims of both genders who identified their injury as arising from “domestic incidents,” found an incidence of male victims of spousal assault. Covering a number of categories of inter-relational violence within the home, eleven men and 55 women were positively identified as the victim of an assault by their spouse or partner. Another six men and 30 women were identified as having been assaulted by a romantic partner. In the total study of 142 male and 155 female identified victims, an interesting feature was the fact that 59% of males and 25% of females did not identify their assailant.

Furthermore, reports of male victims of female-perpetrated domestic violence can be found using data from Australia (Scutt, 1981). Thus academic literature reporting studies of domestic violence from four countries (United States, Canada, United Kingdom, and Australia) has reported an incidence of male victimization from zero to slightly higher than the incidence of female victimization. While a surprising number of studies find rates of male victimization, the data is not always complete. What is clear, however, is that assaults by women against their husbands or male partners do occur. This is even acknowledged by some of critics of the concept of “battered men” (Walker, 1990). Whatever the incidence of female assaults on male partners is, Pagelow’s (1985) view that male victimization hardly ever occurs is being challenged by numerous researchers coming from a variety of disciplines and research areas (Macchieto,1992). Further, the debate about battered men is becoming more heated, as more men come forth and publicly describe their status as victims of domestic abuse (see Aardoom, 1993; Edwards, 1992; Greenfield, 1992; Raeside, 1993; Smith, 1992; Thomas, 1993; and Turner, 1988).

ON THE NATURE OF ASSAULTS AGAINST HUSBANDS

SELF-DEFENSE?

A major criticism leveled at Steinmetz's claim of "battered husbands" was that she failed to address the context or the situation that would have prompted a woman to act violently against her male partner. The critics claimed that in those (rare) cases when a woman attacked a man such an assault was in all probability justified in terms of self-defense, stemming from either his previous assaults or the likelihood of imminent assault. Initially, owing to this criticism and believing that most assaults by women on men would be in self-defense, Straus did not pursue any of the initial interest from the original 1975 survey (Straus, 1993). Subsequently, however, reviewing both their own and other studies in the United States, somewhat equivalent assault rates for both male-to-female and female-to-male were identified and discussed (Straus & Gelles, 1986) in the context of this criticism. Detailed considerations to take account of the severity of assault, different reporting and surveying methodologies, and the likelihood that assaults were in self-defense or in response to previous victimization were addressed. It was argued from national survey data that the reported rates at which women admitted a violent act against their spouse and the rate that men reported an attack upon them, seemed to indicate that all female-to-male violence could not be exclusively explained as only women retaliating in self-defense. The responses of women themselves concerning unprovoked assaults on their male partners also mitigated against self-defense as being the sole reason for female-to-male violence. Additionally, the higher median and mean rates of assaultive behavior for women in such studies also mitigates against an explanation that all assaults by women are in self-defense (McNeely & Robinson-Simpson, 1987).

> She repeatedly started fights, then called the police accusing him of assault. The cops refused to believe that he had been the victim. It had reached the point where he would stand with his hands clasped behind his back refusing to react or retaliate in any way, while she attacked him with her fists and her nails. (Thomas, 1993, p. 167)

In concluding whether assaults by women were always in self-defense, Straus (1993) pointed out that every study that had investigated who initiates violence, using methods that did not preclude the wife as the instigator, has found that wives instigate violence in a large proportion of cases. Straus' case that women are likely to be violent in the home is given further support by observations of the behavior of young women in a youth assessment center. The levels of aggression and violence by females has been reported to be as high as for males, but in contrast to the males, is more likely to be expressed inside the center rather than outside in public places (Kirsta, 1994, p. 322). Straus stresses, however, that the high level of violence by women in the studies he reviews might not indicate who started the argument or whether wives attacked as a way of obviating a potential assault from their physically more able male partner.

Critics of Straus's thesis point out that such evidence against assaults by wives being in self-defense, which are based upon data obtained from the Conflict Tactics Scales, fail to take account of the occurrence of acts of violence before the survey year for which questions are asked and fail to take account of the more serious potential for injury to women (Bogarde, 1990; Kurz, 1993; Pagelow, 1985). Thus, it is suggested that assaults by women may be a result of abuse and violence in previous years by the husband or male partner. Straus (1993), in reply to such criticism, has stated that he considers at least some writers to misrepresent his published work in respect to the victimization of both women and men (e.g., Kurz, 1993). Nowhere perhaps is controversy more acute than in the argument over assaults made by women that result in death of their male partner. In this instance, considerable attention has been paid to the cumulative process of abuse that may lead a woman to commit such an attack out of shear desperation (Walker, 1993). Even here, however, Mann (1989) has propounded that there is room for doubting that all such attacks are as a result of "delayed" self-defense by noting that not one woman in her sample of women imprisoned for murdering husbands or lovers had been battered. Straus (1989, 1993) and Sommer, Barnes, and Murray (1992) have also noted that other studies of homicides indicate women not acting in self-defense.

INJURY OR NON-INJURY?

The final dismissal of violence by wives against husbands or male partners derives from the assumption that female violence is not as injurious or is less injurious than violence perpetrated by men. Data already discussed indicates that assaults by women on men can fall into the more serious category of the Conflict Tactics Scales or, in other words, the level of assault at which there is much greater risk of injury. Reviewing data obtained in hospitals, both Goldberg and Tomianovich (1984) and Smith (et al., 1992) found that male victims received injuries that required medical attention. Smith (et al. 1992) also reported that males tended to receive more severe injuries and lost consciousness more often than women.

> [A] man was admitted to Barts [St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London] after his wife had split his head with a meat knife. He was lucky to escape with his life. (quoted in Harrison, 1986, p. 34)
>
> I've sewn up men who have had crockery thrown at them and bottles smashed over their heads. I once saw a man who looked as if he'd walked into a steamroller … he was covered in bruises and cuts. (quoted in Harrison, 1986, p. 35)
>
> In one well publicized case last year, Mrs. D… C…, ripped off one of her husbands testicles. Surgeons failed to save it and the judge ordered the woman to pay £480 in costs. A judge ordered Mrs. C… to pay court costs of £480 but did not make a compensation order. (quoted in Wolff, 1992, p. 22)

It must be pointed out, however, that in the case of the United Kingdom study (Smith et al, 1992), victims had been attacked by a variety of related and unrelated aggressors in the home, and some male victims could have received greater injuries as a result of attacks by men. The upper body strength of the average woman is less than that of the average man and so it is possible to argue that there is less ability to injure. However, the difference in strength need not be large (Fausto-Sterling, 1992). Reference has also been made to the disparities in method of assault used by women as opposed to men (Flynn, 1990; Straus, 1980) whereby a woman attacking a man tends to use methods of assault not dependent upon strength, for example, using a household implement as a weapon. Seeking to determine whether females sustained greater injury than males, McLeod (1984) reported on an analysis of 6,200 cases of domestic assaults reported to law enforcement officers or the National Crime Survey interviewers. Therein, she reported that women, in attacking men, were more likely to use weapons (75% of females used weapons while 25% of males did so). Although the numbers of women attacked in the sample were larger, the extent of the injuries suffered by the male victims tended to be more serious. Thus women made up for their lack of physical strength by using a weapon, usually a household object. The prevalence of women using weapons has been reported in United Kingdom studies (George, 1992) as well as in an Australian study of battered husbands (B. Thurston, personal communications, May-November, 1993). These findings are in keeping with the suggestion that women are more prone to use weapons and forms of assault that do not depend upon physical strength for their efficacy (Straus, 1980). The rate at which men might report injuries, and indeed attacks, was also suggested to conceal the extent of male victimization; a point that has been made by others (Mack, 1989; McNeely & Robinson-Simpson, 1987). Evidence that men view attacks made upon them and the resulting injuries somewhat differently than women's reactions was presented by Adler (1981) in a paper that was essentially refuting domestic violence against men. The consequence of this tendency to underreport, which is also very evident by women victims, would have considerable implications for the reported incidence of male victimization.

> I suffered broken ribs…. I certainly never seriously contemplated taking any action that might have resulted in her being charged with assault. (Scottish victim, abstracted from a personal letter to author, March, 1992)

In any case, Straus (1989, 1993) has pointed out that dismissing male victimization on the basis of less or lack of injury has implications for the whole consideration of domestic violence. By noting the difference between the figures derived from the Conflict Tactics Scales studies and injury adjusted rates, he pointed out that the number of women victimized would be drastically reduced, even though they had still been technically assaulted in the home and potentially left fearful. Thus it could also be considered an inequity to dismiss non-injurious attacks against men on this basis and assumes that even non-injurious attacks on a man are of no psychological trauma; a view that presupposes a stereotypical attitude towards men. Psychological trauma of men as a result of threat or stressful life events is established by literature from both physiological and psychological studies (Frankenhaeuser, 1975; Stoney, Davis, & Mathews, 1987) and the social sciences (e.g., Travato, 1986).

The danger is, however, that this view could either result in, or be used to legitimize, subsequent attacks by the man (Straus, 1989,1993; Straus & Gelles, 1986). It is clearly appropriate that concern should be addressed to even non-injurious assault given the fact that medically it is well established that, for instance, blows to the head need only inflict superficial soft-tissue injury to be associated with loss of consciousness and potential for neural or cerebrovascular trauma (Kelly, Nichols, Filey, Lilliehei, Rubinstein, & Kleinschmidt-DeMasters, 1991).

THE CONTEXT OF VIOLENCE?

Little attention has been paid within the debate over battered husbands as to the reasons why women might attack their male partners other than for reasons of self-defense (Makepeace, 1983; Walker, 1984). The prevalent thinking underlying why men attack their female partners rests upon the notion that men need to control women (Dobash & Dobash, 1979; Makepeace, 1983; Walker, 1984). In contrast, even Straus (1993) tends to discuss female violence against male partners only with reference to either self-defense or “slap the cad” scenarios that imply an element of justification.

Not all accounts accept the notion that a woman’s aggressive behavior toward a man is a consequence of her need to protect herself from imminent danger, though. For instance, in a chapter dealing with violent women, Shupe, Stacey, and Hazlewood (1987) argue against the “universal” application of the self-defense motive in women’s aggression noting that “women’s violence cannot be dismissed as sheer rationalization” (p. 52). Women can act in very aggressive ways for reasons other than self-defense. Certainly, the aggression found among some lesbian couples cannot be attributed to self-defense only (Hart, 1986; Renzetti, 1992), including among some couples a high level of sexual coercion (Waterman, Dawson, & Bologna, 1989). The fact is that women are capable of performing instrumental acts of aggression against their partners. Some have argued that women’s aggression toward men, as well as men’s toward women, can be attributed to their need to dominate, possess, or from feelings of insecurity (Marsh, 1976). In the author’s governmental report dealing with battered men (George, 1992), two thirds of the male victims surveyed identified “bullying” or “control” as the major reason why they felt their wives used violence in their relationship. Similar findings are also reported in studies of abused husbands in Australia (B. Thurston, personal communications, May-November, 1993) and Canada (Gregorash, 1993). Bates (1981), in his review of legal cases, such as Willan vs. Willan (United Kingdom), Keehn vs. Keehn (United States), Green vs. Green (Canada), and Sangster vs. Sangster (South Australia), found evidence of bullying, massive ill-treatment, and acts that caused danger to life and limb. Thus these isolated reports of male victims seem to indicate that, at least in some cases, violence directed at men by their wives has very similar motivation and content to that reported for men’s aggression against their wives.

Also as women are often the victims of sexual aggression (Walker, 1989), reports of male victims of female sexual abuse can be found in the literature (Bates, 1981; Stets & Pirgood, 1989; Struckman-Johnson, 1988; Swet, Survey, & Cohan, 1990; Thomas, 1993; Travin, Cullen, & Potter 1990). Further, such sexual abuse can be very devastating for the male victims (Sarrel & Masters, 1982).

Some have suggested that battered husbands may precipitate their wives’ violence by being “emotionally unresponsive” (Harrison, 1986; Kusta, 1991), inattentive (Straus, 1993), or being physically weak or disabled (Pagelow, 1985). The suggestion, however, that a man’s “emotional passivity” or “inattentiveness” may be the cause for some women's assaultive behavior can hardly be used to justify such behavior. Arguably, we would never justify a man's assault on a woman, for instance, for her passivity or inattentiveness.

Early accounts of battered wives echoed popular misconceptions that such women were to blame for their victimization (Pizzey & Shapiro, 1982). Recently, such victim blaming has been firmly rebutted as little more than a mechanism for the abuser to escape or excuse his antisocial actions (Smith, 1989). Victim blaming is also very much a problem suffered by battered men; while it's roots lie in humor of the hen-pecked husband variety, it can also be seen within academic analysis of violence against husbands. For instance, Adler (1981) suggested that some men may be accepting and unconcerned by their partners assaults, express jocularity at them, and thus see no reason to end the relationship despite being exposed to violence. It is open to question whether such denial by a victim of his victimization is anything other than an attempt to suppress such feelings and to escape stigmatization by using humor, even though self-directed. Men may view violence towards them and even the resulting injuries with little overt concern, arguably though experiencing inward trauma, all because of the need to deny a sense of their vulnerability (Levant, 1991). The "slap the cad" scenario would seem to be an instance of the application of blame on the male victim based on stereotypical notions that it is not injurious and that men should accept such admonishment for any and all perceived failings in their behavior.

A confluence between male and female domestic violence in terms of defined psychiatric conditions was suggested by Bates (1981), although it has also been estimated independently that less than ten per cent of family violence can be explained by psychopathology (Gelles & Straus, 1988). In contrast, some have suggested that family violence is highly prevalent among individuals with particular mental health problems (Gondolf, Mulvey, & Lidz, 1989). Sommers, Barnes, and Murray (1992) have criticized the view, derived from sociological study, that mental disorders play a negligible role in the genesis of family violence. For instance, Bland and Orn (1986) found a positive correlation between certain personality disorders, alcohol abuse, and violence against either a spouse or children in both male and female aggressors. Sommers, Barnes, and Murray (1992) found certain factors more predictive for both female and male abusers, namely, being young and achieving high scores on Eysenck's Psychoticism Scale, the Neurotiscism Index, and the McAndrew Scale. Similarly, O'Leary (1993) found that the men in his sample who batter also scored high on the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory, measures of emotional lability, or evidenced certain personality disorders.

Thus, despite the fact that certain psychiatric conditions are thought associated with a propensity toward violence, there has been relatively little consideration of the role of psychiatric/psychological criteria in the genesis of inter-spousal violence in much of the literature. For instance, jealousy has been linked to patterns of abuse and even homicide among men and women (Bourlet, 1990; Docherty & Ellis, 1976; Freeman, 1990; Renzetti, 1992; Seeman, 1979; Tarrier, Beckett, & Ahmed, 1989).

If we are to develop a cogent theory of the causes of family violence we need to integrate and define the interplay between the social, psychological, and physiological factors (Johnston & Campbell, 1993). Rather than assume we have all the answers by focusing only on the social (e.g., issues of power in relationships) or the psychological (e.g., need to dominate), we must look at all the possibilities. For instance, further research is needed to understand better the underlying neurochemical abnormalities (e.g., dysfunction of the Raphe 5-Hydroxytryptamine system), which leads to impulsivity, heightened aggressiveness, and violent behaviors in some individuals. Medical studies indicate that some women, as well as some men, are found to have conditions that might predispose towards violence and abuse of a partner (Brown et al., 1979; Lidberg, Asberg, & Sundqvist-Stensman, 1984; Lidberg et al., 1985; Linnoila et al., 1983). Rather than focus on purely social theories of family violence we need to reexamine partner abuse in light of what the neurosciences can tell us of such behaviors as well.

MEN AS VICTIMS: THE GREAT TABOO

Straus & Gelles (1986) sum up much of the problem we find when discussing male victims of female violence when they say "Violence by wives has not been an object of public concern. There has been no publicity, and no funds have been invested in ameliorating this problem because it has not been defined as a problem" (p. 472, italics added). It can be argued that by defining wife battering as the problem, and husband battering as a non-problem, realistic estimates of husband-battering, be they large or small, are nearly impossible to obtain. It is easy, for instance, to argue that battered husbands occur only as rare and isolated cases. Nearly all male victims are isolated individuals owing to the relative paucity of groups willing to acknowledge their victim status. The fact is that a large proportion of the social agencies that deal with family violence target only female victims. Thus we should not be surprised if these groups do not find evidence of male victims of domestic violence. Further, the politicized nature of domestic violence among many within academia mitigates against finding any evidence of male victims (Note 3). Consequently, some professionals, like mental health professionals, may be insensitive or even hostile to a man describing himself in victim terms (Macchieto, 1992). Added to all this, the traditional stereotypes give creditability to a woman to be seen as a victim. The stereotypes associated with men, however, lead most to deny such a possibility or to ridicule' such a notion as male-as-victim (Farrell, 1993; Wilkinson, 1981). This clearly deters men from making such an admission (Machietto, 1992; Steinmetz, 1980). Also, male victims may be aware, if only dimly, that to proclaim victim status will only lead to unfavorable or unequal treatment compared with female victims (Harris & Cook, 1994).

> If a man is attacked by his wife and decides to call the police, he is the one who is likely to be arrested. (quoted in Wolff, 1992, p. 22)
>
> She was knocking the shit out of me; no one would believe me. (Male victim and resident of the Kingsland Estate, Hackney, London, England speaking on Kingsland, Channel 4, television documentary, 4th June 1992)
>
> When you are talking to your mates, it's hard to admit you're being bullied by a woman. (quoted in Kent, 1993, p. 37)
>
> If they knew how she knocks me about, and the fact that every time it happens she manages to take me by surprise, catching me off guard, can you imagine how they'd take the piss? (quoted in Kirsta, 1994, p. 237)

Steinmetz (1980) has suggested that some men, following traditional social norms, consider it unmanly to attack or even retaliate against an assault by a woman. Further, when men and women rate violent male-female interactions, they perceive male-to-female aggression as more negative than female-to-male aggression (Arias & Johnson, 1989). By implication, female-to-male violence has a type of social acceptance not accorded to male-to-female violence (Greenblatt, 1983). Thus while it is argued that "society does not appear to shape the attitudes of most men and women to accept the use of violence by men against women…" (O'Leary, 1993, p. 24), we could suggest that society does appear to condone the use of violence by a woman against a man.

And finally, the whole issue of male victimization can be suggested to receive scant attention because of the threat it poses to masculine self images and "patriarchal" authority, as much as for any threat it poses towards efforts to counter female victimization. The lack of attention of female aggression, as opposed to male aggression, has been suggested to be rooted in scholarly debates on nature, culture, and gender in which "sameness" or "differences" are key issues; but actually result from a reluctance to consider similarities between men and women, as opposed to differences (Fry & Gabriel, 1994). Thus it is not surprising that domestic violence against women, as opposed to men, is a socially acceptable concern and receives study and support. This reinforces two more easily recognized social stereotypes, female vulnerability and male authority or dominance, and protectiveness. The admission and recognition of male victimization, in the battered husband, is the antithesis of this acceptable order and an equality between the sexes that has been resisted historically, especially by men (e.g., see judgments in the Willan vs. Willan and Teal vs. Teal cases, Bates, 1981).

It can be argued that the social values (e.g., patriarchy) that form the foundation for male violence against women, also underpin the lack of acceptance of the battered husband. Why the "battered husband syndrome" is so belittled and considered a non-social problem can be found in the patriarchal ethos that reinforces female victimization. By rooting the debate on domestic violence only in notions such as gender and physical size or strength, rather than the inherent attitudes and propensity of individuals to use violence and abuse as an interrelational strategy, female victimization will continue as will the unseen victimization of some men both inside and outside the home. The fact that so many in society, including some academics, are so unwilling to accept the unilateral battering of men by women stems, in large part, from the deep and profoundly disturbing challenge such a fact poses to cherished male and female stereotypes.

While most only view male victims of domestic violence as the subject of incredulity or objects of humor, the fact is that some men are battered. No matter their number, battered men deserve better than to be seen as little more than footnotes from earlier historical periods when they were castigated and forced to ride a donkey backwards.

NOTES

1. Richard Gelles and Murray Straus (1988), two of the leading researchers in family violence, have described how the often inflammatory debate over the issue of battered men helped to squelch any serious study of the subject as well as sent a signal to many well-intentioned scholars to avoid the field totally. They write:

> Perhaps the most unfortunate outcome of the wrangle over battered men is that since the debate in the late 1970s, there has been virtually no additional research carried out on the topic. The furor among social scientists and in the public media has contaminated the entire topic. Consequently, we have refused every request for an interview or to appear on any talk show on this topic for fear of yet again being misquoted, miscast, or misrepresented. Other social scientists who witnessed the abuse heaped on our research group—especially on Suzanne Steinmetz—have given the topic of battered men a wide berth. (pp. 105-106, italics added)

2. The Conflict Tactics Scales, devised by Murray Straus (1978, 1979) and several co-workers at the University of Minnesota, consists of several scales designed to assess the various ways that family members try to deal with conflicts in the home. The Conflict Tactics Scales is divided in three parts, with one part asking a series of questions about escalating levels of threatened or actual physical assault between adult partners. Starting with "Threatened to hit or throw something at the other," it concludes with "used a knife or gun on the other." The eight point scale is often analyzed by researchers in terms of less serious and more serious violence; more serious violence being those acts more likely to cause injury. See Straus (1993) for a recent discussion of the validity and criticisms of The Conflict Tactics Scales.

3. We could argue that "husband-battering" is a more emotionally contested and politically charged issue in the U.S. than in many other industrialized countries. In Sweden, for instance, refuges have been established for male victims of domestic violence (Kirsta, 1994). In another example of the difference in attitudes toward male victims, Detective Inspector Sylvia Aston, West Midlands Police Force (UK), reported:

> We've made absolutely sure through our training that no officer will ever dismiss a male domestic violence victim just because he's a man. We don't take the attitude that a man can leave—many can't And it's invariably the nice sensitive ones who get battered. I think we risk going down a very dangerous path by discriminating between the sexes in these offenses. Some of the most violent people I've dealt with as an officer are women, and if you don't judge a woman by her crime, but by her gender, then not only do you perpetrate the old, misleading stereotypes but you risk such offenses recurring, perhaps in another relationship. Domestic violence as we see it is not a women's issue—it's a social issue. (quoted in Kirsta, 1994, p. 229)

REFERENCES

Aardoom, A. (1993, April 17). Ending the silence of abused men. Calgary Mirror 10.

Adler, E. S. (1981). The underside of married life: Power, influence and violence. In L. H. Bowker (Ed.), Women and crime in America (pp. 86-101). New York: Macmillan.

Arias, I., & Johnson, R (1989). Evaluations of physical aggression among intimate dads. Journal of Interpersonal Violence, 4, 298-307.

Bates, R. E. (1981). A plea for the battered husband. Family Law, 11, 92-94.

Bland, R., & Orn, H. (1986). Family violence and psychiatric disorder. Canadian Journal of Psychiatry, 31, 129-137.

Bogarde, M. (1990). Why we need gender to understand human violence. Journal of Interpersonal Violence, 5, 132-134.

Borowski, M., Murch, M., & Walker, V. (1983). Domestic violence: The community response. London: Tavistock.

Bourlet, A. (1990). Police intervention in marital violence. Milton Keynes: Open University Press.

Breen, R. N. (1985). Premarital violence: A study of abuse within dating relationships of college students. Unpublished master's thesis, The University of Texas, Arlington.

Brinkerhoff, M., & Lupri, E. (1988). Interspousal violence. Canadian Journal of Sociology, 13, 407-434.

Brown, G. L., Goodwin, F. K., Ballenger, J. C., Goyer, P. F., & Major, L. F (1979). Aggression in humans correlates with cerebrospinal fluid metabolites. Psychiatry Research, 1, 131-139.

Brush, L. D. (1990). Violent acts and injurious outcomes in married couples: Methodological issues in the National Survey of Families and House holds. Gender & Society, 4, 56-67.

Brutz, I., & Ingoldsby, B. B. (1984). Conflict resolution in Quaker families. Journal of Marriage and the Family, 46, 21-26.

Burrell, I., & Brinkworth, L. (1994, April 24). Police alarm over battered husbands. The Sunday Times, 1, 6.

Dobash, R. E., & Dobash, R. P. (1978). Wives: The "appropriate" victims of marital violence. Victimology, 2, 426-442.

Dobash, R. E., & Dobash, R. P. (1979). Violence against wives: A case against the patriarchy. New York: The Free Press.

Docherty, J. P., & Ellis, J. (1976). A new concept and finding in morbid jealousy. American Journal of Psychiatry, 133, 679-683.

Edwards, J. (1992, April 18). Men get battered, too. Chat, 48-49

Farrell, W. (1993). The myth of male power. New York: Simon & Schuster.

Fausto-Sterling, A. (1992). Myths of gender: Biological theories about women and men. New York: Basic Books.

Flynn, C. R (1990). Relationship violence by women: Issues and implications. Family Relations, 39, 194-198.

Frankenhauser, M. (1975). Experimental approaches to the study of catecholamines and emotion. In L. Levi (Ed.). Emotions: Their parameters and measurement (pp. 209-234). New York: Raven Press.

Freeman, T. (1990). Psychoanalytical aspects of morbid jealousy in women. British Journal of Psychiatry, 156, 68-72.

Fry, D. P., & Gabriel, A. H. (1994). Preface: The cultural construction of gender and aggression. Sex Roles, 30, 165-167.

Gelles, R. J. (1974). The violent home. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Gelles, R. J., & Straus, M. A. (1988). Intimate violence: The definitive study of the causes and consequences of abuse in the American family. New York: Simon & Schuster.

George, M. J. (1992). A preliminary investigation of instrumental domestic abuse of men. House of Commons Home Affairs Committee. Domestic Violence: Memoranda of Evidence. No. 14 HMSO.

Giles-Sims, J. (1983). Wife battering: A systems theory approach. New York: Guilford Press.

Goldberg, W. G., & Tomlanovich, M. C. (1984). Domestic violence victims in the emergency department: New findings. Journal of the American Medical Association, 251, 3259-3264.

Gondolf, W. G., Mulvey, E. P., & Lidz, C. W. (1989). Family violence reported in the psychiatric emergency room. Journal of Family Violence, 4, 249-258.

Greenblat, C. S. (1983). A hit is a hit … or is it? Approval and tolerance of the use of physical force by spouses. In D. Finklehor, R. J. Gelles, G. T. Hotaling, & M. A. Straus (Eds.), The dark side of families: Current family research (pp. 235-260). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Greenfield, M. (1992, July 8). Beaten husbands. The Yorkshire Post: Women's Post, 2.

Gregorash, L. (1992). Spousal violence: Broadening the perspective. The Merge Journal, 4(2), 8-10.

Harris, R. J., & Cook, C. A. (1994). Attributions about spouse abuse: It matters who the batterers and victims are. Sex Roles, 30, 553-565.

Harrison, J. (1986, May 24). Would you batter your husband? Woman's Own, 34-35.

Hart, B. (1986). Preface. In K. Lobel (Ed.), Naming the violence: Speaking out about lesbian battering (pp. 9-16). Seattle, WA: Seal.

Jaevons, S. (1992). The battered husband controversy. BA (Honors) thesis, Hatfield Polytechnic, Hatfield, UK.

Johnston, J. R., & Campbell, L. E.G. (1993). A clinical typology of interpersonal violence in disputed-custody divorces. American Journal of Orthopsychiatry, 63, 190-199.

Jouriles, E. N., & O'Leary, K. D. (1985). Interpersonal reliability of reports of marital violence. Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology, 53, 419-421

Kelly, J. P., Nichols, J. S., Filley, C. M., Lillehei, K. O., Rubinstein, D., & Kleinschmidt-DeMasters, B. K. (1991). Concussion in sports: Guide-lines for the prevention of catastrophic outcome. Journal of the American Medical Association, 266, 2867-2869.

Kent, T. (1993, April 15). How can I admit I am a battered husband? Special report. Best, 36-37.

Kirsta, A. (1989, December 10). 6 ft., macho—and beaten by his wife. The Sunday Times, 14.

Kirsta, A. (1991, January). Could you batter him? New Woman, 10-12.

Kirsta, A. (1994). Deadlier than the male. London: HarperCollins. (see Chapter 6, pp. 227-258).

Kurz, D. (1993). Physical assaults by husbands: A major social problem. In R. J. Gelles & D. Loseke (Eds.), Current controversies in family violence (pp. 88-103). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Lane, K., & Gwartney-Gibbs, P. A. (1985). Violence in the context of dating and sex. Journal of Family Issues, 6, 45-49

Laner, M. R., & Thompson, J (1982). Abuse and aggression in courting couples. Deviant Behaviour, 3, 229-244

Levant, R. F. (1992). A gender aware divorce program. Men's Studies Review, 9(2), 15-20.

Lewin, T. (1992, April 20). Battered men sounding equal-rights battle cry. The New York Times National, A12.

Lidberg, L., Asberg, M., & Sundqvist-Stetinan, U. B. (1984). 5-hydroxyindole-acetic acid levels in attempted suicides who have killed their children. Lancet, 2, 928.

Lidberg, L. Tuck, J. R., Asberg, M., Scalia-Tomba, G. P., & Bertilsson, L. (1985). Homicide, suicide and CSF

5HIAA. Acta Physiologica Scandinavica, 71, 230-236.

Linnoila, M., Virkkunen, M., Scheinin, M., Nuutila, A., Rimon, R., & Bertilsson, L. (1985). Low cerebrospinal fluid 5-hydroxyindoleactic acid concentration differences differentiates impulsive from non-impulsive violent behaviour. Life Sciences, 33, 2609-2614.

Macchietto, J. (1992). Aspects of male victimisation and female aggression: Implications for counselling men. Journal of Mental Health Counseling, 14, 375-392.

Mack, R. (1989). Spouse abuse-A dyadic approach. In G. R. Weeks (Ed.), Treating Couples: The Intersystem model of the Marriage Guidance Council of Philadelphia (pp. 191-214). New York: Brunner Mazel.

Makepeace, J. M. (1983). Life events stress and courtship violence. Family Relations, 32, 101-109.

Mann, C. R. (1989). Black female homicide in the United States. Journal of Interpersonal Violence, 5, 176-201.

Marsh, R. M. (1976). Mobility in the military: Its effects upon the family system. In H. I. McCubbin, B. B. Dahl, & E. J. Hunter (Eds.), Families in the military system (pp. 92-111). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Martin, D. (1976). Battered wives. New York: Pocket Books.

McCleod, M. (1984). Women against men: An examination of domestic violence based on the analysis of official data and national victimisation data. Justice Quarterly, 1(2), 171-193.

McNeely, R. L., & Robinson-Simpson, G. (1987). The truth about domestic violence: A falsely framed issue. Social Work, 32, 485-490.

Mills, M. E. (1990). The new heretics: Men. American Psychologist, 45, 675-676.

Mold, D. E. (1990). Data base or data bias? American Psychologist, 45, 676.

Moller, D. (1991, October). The family: Our national survey for the 1990s. Readers Digest, 139, 31-36.

Nisonoff, L. & Bitman, I. (1979). Spouse abuse: Incidence and relationship to selected demographic variables. Victimology, 4, 131-140.

O'Leary, K. D. (1993). Through a psychological lens. Personality traits, personality disorders, and levels of violence. In R. J. Gelles & D. R. Loseke (Eds.), Current controversies in family violence (pp. 7-30). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Oswald, I. (1980). Domestic violence by women. Lancet, 2, 1253-1254.

Pagelow, M. D. (1985). The "battered husband syndrome": Social problem or much ado about little? In N. Johnson (Ed.), Marital violence: Sociological Review Monograph 31 (pp. 172-195). London: Routledge, Kegan & Paul.

Pizzey, E. (1974). Scream quietly or the neighbors will hear. Baltimore: Penguin Books.

Pizzey, E., & Shapiro J. (1982). Prone to violence. Feltham, UK; Hamlyn Paperbacks.

Pleck, E. (1987). Domestic tyranny: The making of American social policy against family violence from colonial times to the present. New York: Oxford University Press.

Pleck, E., Pleck, J. H., & Bart, P. B. (1977). "The battered data syndrome": A comment on Steinmetz's article. Victimology: An International Journal, 2, 680-683.

Raeside, P. (1993, November 10). Women's violence against men is our last taboo. The (Toronto) Globe and Mail, A24.

Renzetti, C. M. (1992). Violent betrayal: Partner abuse in lesbian relationships. Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Sack, A. R., Keller, J. F., & Howard, R. D. (1982). Conflict tactics and violence in dating situations. International Journal of Sociology of the Family, 12, 89-100.

Saenger, C. (1963). Male and female relationships in the American comic strips. In D. M. White & R. H. Abel (Eds.), The funnies: An American idiom (pp. 219-231). Glencoe, IL: The Free Press.

Sarrel, R M., & Master, W. H. (1982). Sexual molestation of men by women. Archives of Sexual Behaviour, 11, 117-131.

Saunders, D. G. (1986). When battered women use violence; Husband abuse or self defense? Violence and Victims, 1, 47-60.

Scanzoni, J. (1978). Sex roles, women's work, and marital conflict. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books.

Scutt, J. A. (1981). Suffering in silence? The politics of husband bashing. Proceedings of 17th National conference of Australian Association of Social Workers. Melbourne, July 6-l0.

Seeman, M. V. (1979). Pathological jealousy. Psychiatry, 42, 351-361.

Shupe, A., Stacey, W. A., & Hazzlewood, L. R. (1987). Violent men, violent couples. Lexington, MA: Lexington Books.

Smith, A. (1992, July 15). Do only women bleed? The Guardian, 1. (The Women's Section).

Smith, L. F. J. (1989). Domestic violence: An overview of the literature. Home Office Research Study No 107 HMSO London.

Smith, S., Baker, D., Buchan, A., & Bodiwala, G. (1992). Adult domestic violence. Health Trends, 24, 97-99.

Sommer, R., Barnes, C. E., & Murray, R. R (1992). Alcohol consumption, alcohol abuse, personality and female perpetrated spouse abuse. Journal of Personality and Individual Differences, 13, 1315-1323.

Sorrenson, S. B., & Telles, C. A. (1991). Self reports of spousal violence in a Mexican-American and non-Hispanic white population. Violence and Victims, 6, 3-15.

Stacey, S., & Cantacuzino, M. (1993, April). And then she hit me. Esquire, 84-88.

Steinmetz, S. K. (1977). Wifebeating, husband beating—a comparison of the use of physical violence between spouses to resolve marital fights. In M. Roy (Ed.), Battered women (pp. 63-72). New York: Van Nostrand Rheinhold.

Steinmetz, S. K. (1977-78). The battered husband syndrome. Victimology: An International Journal, 2, 499-509.

Steinmetz, S. K. (1980). Women and violence: Victims and perpetrators. American Journal of Psychotherapy, 34, 334-350.

Stets, J. E., & Pirog-Good, M. A. (1989). Patterns of physical and sexual abuse for men and women in dating relationships. Journal of Family Violence, 4, 6-76.

Stoney, O. M., Davis, M. C., & Mathews, K. A. (1987). Sex differences in physiological responses to stress and in coronary heart disease—a causal link? Psychophysiology, 24, 127-131.

Straus, M. A. (1978). Family measurement techniques. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Straus, M. A. (1979). Measuring intrafamily conflict and violence: The Conflict Tactics (CT) Scales. Journal of Marriage and Family, 41, 75-88.

Straus, M. A. (1980). Wife beating; how common and why? In M. A. Straus & G. T. Hotaling (Eds.), The social causes of husband-wife violence (pp. 23-36). Minneapolis: University of Minneapolis Press.

Straus, M. A. (1989). Assaults by wives on husbands: Implications for primary prevention of marital violence. Paper presented at 1989 meeting of the American Society of Criminology.

Straus, M. A. (1993). Husband abuse and the woman offender are important problems. In R. J. Gelles & D. Loseke (Eds.), Current controversies in family violence (pp. 67-87). Beverly Hills, CA: Sage.

Straus, M. A., & Gelles R. J. (1986). Societal change and change in family violence from 1975 to 1985 as revealed by two national surveys. Journal of Marriage and the Family, 48, 465-479.

Straus, M. A., Gelles R. J., & Steinmetz, S. K. (1980). Behind closed doors: Violence in the American family. Garden City, NY: Doubleday.

Straus, M. A., & Kaufman-Kantor, G. (1994, July). Change in spouse assault rates from 1975 to 1992: A comparison of three national surveys in the United States. Paper presented at the Thirteenth World Congress of Sociology, Bielefeld, Germany.

Struckman-Johnson, C. (1988). Forced sex on dates: It happens to me too. Journal of Sex Research, 24, 234-241.

Swet, C., Survey, J., & Cohan, C. (1990). Sexual and physical abuse histories and psychiatric symptoms among male psychiatric patients. American Journal of Psychiatry, 147, 632-636.

Szinovacz, M. E. (1983). Using couple data as a methodological tool: The case of marital violence. Journal of Marriage and the Family, 45, 633-644.

Tarrier, N., Beckett, R., & Ahmed, Y. (1989). Comparison of a morbidly jealous and a normal female population on the Eysenck Personality Questionaire (EPQ). Journal of Personal and Individual Differences, 10, 1327-1328.

Thomas, D. (1993). Not guilty: The case in defense of men. New York; William Morrow.

Travato, F. (1986). The relationship between marital dissolution and suicide: The Canadian case. Journal of Marriage and Family, 48, 341-348.

Travin, S., Cullen, K., & Potter, B. (1990). Female sex offenders: Severe victims and victimizers. Journal of Forensic Science, 35, 140-150.

Turner, J. (1988). Behind closed doors. London: Thorsons.

Victim Support. (1992). Domestic violence: Report of a national interagency working party on domestic violence. London: Victim Support.

Walker, L. E. A. (1984). The battered women syndrome. New York: Springer.

Walker, L. E. A. (1989). Terryfying love: Why battered women kill and how society responds. New York: Harper Collins.

Walker, L. E. A. (1990). Response to Mills and Mold. American Psychologist, 45, 676-677

Waterman, C. K., Dawson, D. A., & Bologna, J. (1989). Sexual coercion in gay male and lesbian relationships: Predictors and implications for support services. Journal of Sex Research, 1, 118-124.

Wilkinson, M. (1981). Children and divorce: The practice of social work. Oxford: Blackwells.

Wolff, I. (1992, November 28). Domestic violence: The other side. The Spectator, 22-26

Feminism owns #WomenAgainstFeminism?

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 8 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The war against #WomenAgainstFeminism rages on, and as expected, the notion of privilege is used in what will be yet another failed attempt to guilt self-owning people into compliance.

IWantedWings, a feminist WordPress blog, recently responded to #WomenAgainstFeminism by rattling off a laundry list of female victims outside of Western civilization. The author (whom I will also address as IWantedWings, or simply IWW) makes a mistake right off the bat by assuming that only Western women would be against feminism.

By doing this, she casts herself as an altruistic soul and casts non-feminist women as privilege-blind bigots. Black-and-white morality aside, IWW makes many unwritten assumptions she never substantiates, as expected from feminist pundits.

IWW uses several hypothetical examples of female victimization based on true events, such as the case of a 25-year-old Pakistani woman forcefully separated from her fiancé by a controlling, abusive father. It is easy to accept the existence of a similar situation, but we can see the conversation being framed where victimization is female and perpetration is male. After painting on only half of the canvas, IWW suggests that feminists are the only moral crusaders holding back the morbid state of affairs she carefully framed while blocking the view of the blank half of the canvas.

> Feminists, both female and male – have been locked up, beaten, tortured, and even killed, in the pursuit of equality. They did this with pen and ink and print; they did this with their voices; they did this with their bodies; they did this with art and music; they did in courts of law and halls and houses of government that they fought be to allowed into.

IWW shows blatant ignorance of feminist-perpetrated violence and abuse in Argentina, Canada, the violence perpetrated by women on women in the Congo, Valerie Solanas, and the dogmatic censorship proposed by the EU, WAM!, and other organizations professing to be for equality.

> They did this so that women would no longer been seen as property, livestock, breeding machines, sex objects, punching bags, or infantile morons.

The only people who see women that way are fictitious misogynist caricatures, dogmatic adherents to scripture, or, ironically, feminists.

Feminism needs to generate fear and vulnerability to make the gullible suggestible. The scary part is that IWW does not realize she is doing this; she genuinely believes she is helping women with feminism much like a fundamentalist missionary believes she is helping “savages” overseas with scripture.

> They did this so that women like me – a white Western woman – could attend school and university; to learn to read, write, and think critically; to gain a degree; to get a job and be paid an equal salary to a man in the same position; and to sit here with my own computer and type all of this.

If I was a combat veteran, I would have stopped reading here.

IWW made no explicit mention of soldiers, but she pretends that feminists are interchangeable with soldiers. IWW is suggesting that feminist sacrifice is comparable to the sacrifice of (drafted) men and voluntarily enlisted women. Apparently only feminist sacrifice gives you prosperity, corrects corruption, and makes you literate.

IWW even bastardizes JFK’s “Ask not what your country can do for you …” quote for one final tug on gynocentric heartstrings:

> The fact is, like it or not, you still live a world where gender matters. Where gender controls not just the entire course of your life – but the lives of women all over the world. Every second, a child will be born female in a country where she will persecuted for this random biological occurrence for the rest of her life. So before you hold up your anti-Feminist placard proudly and smile at your own sense of empowerment, think not what Feminism can do for you, but what it can do for that one girl. She needs someone to stand up for her. That someone could be you.

IWW's pushing aside of veterans for the sake of her faux-sensitivity is not even justified by her loaded questions, such as "Why is there still a pay gap (in the UK specifically) of 15% for women doing the same jobs and working the same hours as men?" or "Even in our liberal, Western world, why do women still only fill 24% of senior management jobs?" All of IWW's suggestions dance around the same tired notion of a male conspiracy against females.

But IWW is forgetting one very important thing. #WomenAgainstFeminism is not falling for it. It's not that non-feminist women are blinded by privilege as IWW insinuates, it's that they understand feminism is packed full of emotionally manipulative bullshitters.

> If you feel that you have so far lived your life unaffected by even the mildest form of sexism – anything from feeling uncomfortable when a man catcalls you in the street, to feeling scared walking home alone at night in a secluded area – and are treated with love and respect by every man in your life, then to you I say: I'm glad for you. If you don't think you need feminism, then that is a victory for the movement. You have fulfilled all those dreams that every suffragette being force-fed in prison and every 'witch' burnt at the stake dreamed you would one day.

If I was a woman, this paragraph would enrage me to tears. IWW is giving feminism credit for what I am, as if I owe feminism my life and my identity. I would be plagued with questions, like "Why do you need to own me? Why won't you respect me as a non-feminist human being who cares about others in a different way? Why can't you leave me alone?"

Feminism can't take credit for free women if it tells women what to think.

We are dealing with a poisonous dogma that wants control. The antidote has always been to renounce the faith and consult yourself on how to live life. Hell, don't even listen to me if you don't want to, but I would suggest from experience that everyone run as far away from feminism as he or she possibly can.

Feminism needs women to survive, and is flailing to keep control of #WomenAgainstFeminism. In their desperation, feminists have poked their own brand full of holes, revealing the shit-stained core of the movement.

And we human rights activists are laughing in relief.

We will be free soon.

Stephen A. Smith was right & censoring thugs are punishing him for it

Mumia Ali · 9 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"To learn who rules over you, simply find out who you are not allowed to criticize."—Voltaire

Last month's events surrounding sports journalist and radio host Stephen A. Smith, where he told an inconvenient truth about domestic and spousal abuse and was pilloried and punished for it, is important for two reasons:

1. Because it highlights yet again the Power of the Cathedral; and

2. Because it points to a very powerful truth that never gets to see the light of day.

I want to discuss both of these points in more detail, but first, a bit of indulgence on my part about Stephen A.

Though born and raised in New York City, Stephen A. is considered a homeboy here in Philly since he made his career in sports writing with the Inquirer, Philly's biggest newspaper. I came to know of him in the latter 1990s, when he would appear on WIP, the city's flagship sports talk station. Not only was I proud of him for being a Brotha doin' the darn thing in a White Guy–dominated field, but I also admired him for not being afraid to speak unmentionable truths about life both in and outside of sports—even when it cut against the "post-racial" grain of the conceit that is de jour for our current society. Unlike other Black talkers on WIP whom I will not name, Stephen A. stood out as a Black man who called it straight down the middle, no matter who didn't like it. That took guts—I mean, come on, let's face it, WIP wasn't exactly the most welcoming to People of Color, and it's mostly White Philly Guy audience was known for being a bit rough around the edges, especially whenever anything coming close to race came up. But Stephen A. held firm on those occasions, and refused to back down not just from his own take on things but also more importantly from the truth of things. For many Philly Brothas like me, Stephen A. was an inspiration.

So it was with both a profound sense of relief and pride when Stephen A. told the truth about the Ray Rice alleged spousal abuse situation that took place earlier this year, where TMZ released video of Rice dragging an unconscious fiancé out of an Atlantic City elevator—that it could very well be possible that said fiancé could have provoked Rice to act. Men all over the country knew exactly what Stephen A. was talking about, Black men especially. I knew the minute he said those words what was to come next—and, boy, the Cathedral didn't disappoint.

After Stephen A.'s public flogging by both close colleagues and talking heads from around the media, ESPN2 announced that they were suspending him for a week—this, after Stephen A. capitulated to the Cathedral and offered an apology for his statements of truth. At any rate, several days after his "suspension," it was reported that Stephen A. was going to satellite radio—good for him!—and perhaps the last holdout where men can speak truth to power.

I think Stephen A.'s critical flaw was in offering an apology—for, in doing so, he gave his enemies the ammunition they needed to excommunicate him from the Cathedral. It highlights the fact that this is the price any man—but especially a Black man—must pay for the privilege of being part and parcel of high-profile, high-prestige society: you must fold your hands, cross your legs, and do the Oprah Nod solemnly whenever issues like these come up; you must indict the (Black) man in question no matter what the circumstance or situation; and you must never, ever, "blame the victim"—the (Black) woman.

Stephen A.'s comments on July 25, 2014, reveal and corroborate something that not only scores of Black men in particular know all too well, but also what I've previously written right here on this website about far too many Black women themselves—that they not only disrespect a Black man's boundaries, but they can and often will provoke a fight to ensue, if not outright being the aggressors of same. The world saw clear and present evidence of this only a few months ago, when Solange Knowles, sister of famed pop diva Beyoncé, viciously attacked Bey's husband, rap mogul Jay-Z. Nor is this the first time something like this has happened in full view of the public eye. Years ago, R&B diva Mary J. Blige punched her husband in the face for what she thought was his "roving eye"—and then asked, "What are you going to do, Chris Brown me?"

And since this is an essay that is at least partly involving the sports world and in particular the NFL, a few years back there was another story where a Black woman went "HAM" on her Black NFL partner, and of course nothing came of it—no female sportscasters were to be heard calling for the offending lady's head on a pike. (Editor's Note: Check out the O-Man's take on this here thing here.)

Neither Knowles nor Blige was charged, or punished in any way, or even publicly censured—in fact, in both cases, people, women especially, have openly speculated as to what the men in those instances "could have done to provoke" said ladies into violent action and response. Indeed, men being abused, often times grisly so, is grist for the Yuk-Yuk Mill, as women as notable as Sharon Osbourne openly laugh at the abuse and mutilation of men at the hands of their female spouses and domestic partners.

#BlamingTheVictimIsOnlyFor(Black)Women

The real issue that Stephen A. brought to light—informed by his own experience of having been raised in a household full of Black women (a far too common occurrence for far too many Black men) of course—is the fact that spousal abuse is an issue that is nowhere near as one-sided as many of its professional detractors try to make it out to be. Indeed, there have been all manner of studies and reports that clearly show the numerous times when women themselves have been the provocateurs and outright aggressors in domestic and spousal abuse situations, and these findings have been suppressed by the aforementioned Doing Good (TM) crowd—the researchers derided for being knuckle-dragging misogynists hellbent on forcing women back into the kitchen barefoot and pregnant. Yet, the evidence—thanks to a combination of the increasing availability of video technology and sheer hubris on the part of today's women—speaks for itself.

Here's another bit of both. A very powerful social experiment was conducted by John Quinones's ABC program Primetime: What Would You Do?, where a couple are sitting on a park bench and the woman begins berating her male partner. Slowly escalating the abuse like the proverbial frog in hot water, the goal of the experiment was to see who, if anyone, would intervene. The woman in the couple went from shouting and verbally abusing her boyfriend to outright physically beating him up, and not only did 163 people, men and women alike, walk on by, but there is actual video of several of them pumping their fists in classic "You Go, Girl!" fashion—one woman even aped Rocky, throwing punches in the air as she passed. And an off-duty police officer merely shrugged his shoulders, thinking (and saying) that the guy must've "deserved it."

Now compare and contrast that to the same WWYD? social experiment, where it is the man of the couple abusing his female partner. The response, on the part of both men and women alike, is swift and certain.

If that isn't enough evidence to convince you that Stephen A. wasn't on to something, nothing will.

An Unlikely Ally

In the days following Stephen A.'s truth-telling comments, Ms. Whoopi Goldberg launched a vociferous defense not just of Stephen A., not just of men, but of Justice itself, saying that if a woman raises and puts her hands on a man, she can and should expect him to strike back. She did this despite being ganged up on by the rest of her The View colleagues and, unlike Stephen A., stood her ground—and note the reaction of the virtually all-female audience—nothing but roaring applause. Again, let the detractors consider this piece of admittedly anecdotal evidence for a moment. It reminded me of Nixon's "silent majority" concept.

And let us consider something else: Goldberg made her bones in no small part due to her involvement with the film adaptation of Alice Walker's novel The Color Purple, a story that to this day a not insignificant number of Black men see as a hatchet job on Brothas writ large. And unlike Black women in our time, there was no one around back then, or now, to wage a counter-campaign against the book or the movie, which was critically acclaimed. So for Goldberg to come out in defense of Stephen A. really says something. I know it does to me.

One other point: There has been a powerful debate raging in the manosphere about the role of women in its ranks. While there have been some who have been outright dismissive or at the very least wary to ambivalent about them—and I include myself in the latter cohort—others have argued that things will only change when women themselves become part of the fight for the human rights of men. I try to live my life based on the time-honored ideals of reason and evidence. Goldberg's impassioned defense, along with those of many lesser-known and even unsung ladies in the 'sphere, has won me over.

(Female) Size Matters

In his excellent column on the matter, Paul Elam, editor-in-chief of A Voice for Men, notes his physical stature—at 6'8″ and 285 lbs, he says that he cannot guarantee a woman's safety were she to attack him, despite the great physical disparities between himself and the vast majority of women out there. Fair enough because, let's face it, the physical disparity argument is one that is accepted as the gospel truth when this topic comes up.

So, I'd like to take what Elam said a step further.

I am 5'8″ and (last I checked) 170lbs—the heaviest I've ever been in my life. I am a full foot shorter and more than 100 lbs lighter in weight than Elam. Not only that, but I guess you could say that I'm a friend of the Amazon ladies—I've dated quite a few, and my current lady stands at 5'10″ (the tallest I've ever had was 6′). And because Black women in particular are known for being a bit fuller figured, you can imagine that these ladies were far from beanpoles.

Now, I've never been a victim of spousal abuse, thank God—nor have I ever put my hands on any woman, regardless of her size. But it is not at all impossible, or uncommon, for larger ladies to treat the men in their lives like the proverbial punching bag. In Black America, it's a lot more common than we may want to openly admit. Given the fact that "Jack Sprat" pairings are very common in Black American life, it would be astonishing if such abuse didn't happen. After all, Mrs. Ray Rice freely admits that she had a hand in what went down in that elevator on that fateful Valentine's Day weekend in Atlantic City, and she's noticeably smaller than her hubby—imagine what a larger lady could do to a guy not as buff as Mr. Rice.

If there is anyone out there who doubts what I say, all they need to do is hit up the nearest Martin Luther King Boulevard and see for themselves. Black women are easily among the most violent, and abusive, people in the Black community—not just abusing Black men, but also abusing each other, and Black children. Indeed, on that score, the sheer totality of abuse that so many Black women visit upon their own children is utterly heartbreaking to witness—especially Black boys. On the streets of Black America's 'hood, one can see and hear Black mothers berate and outright beat their Black sons senseless. It is a well-known and accepted fact that today's abusers were yesterday's abused. In Black America, that maxim could not be more true.

We Need a (New) Resolution

A generation ago, a powerful made-for-TV movie was broadcast called The Burning Bed. It was a "message" drama that dealt with the very real issue of spousal abuse and domestic violence—and in the years that would follow, other dramatic portrayals drove the point home, like Sleeping with the Enemy and Enough. They, and many other media efforts, did a good thing in making the case that violence and abuse has no place in a civilized society, that problems can be worked out peacefully and with dignity and respect.

We are now at a time when another media effort is called for, one that builds on the efforts and successes of the previous era, with an urgent call for relevance in ours—that violence, no matter what gender engages in it, has no place in a civilized society—or in a relationship.

Not only can men be hurt too, but they also have the right to defend themselves.

Thank you, Stephen A. Smith, for telling the truth and for being you.

Those who rule over us: Part III

AVfM Video Source · 9 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

From Angry Harry, the third installment in his series on those who rule over us.

Please buy a box of Cheerios #howtodad

AVfM Video Source · 9 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We almost never endorse any product or get involved in anything that looks like that, but screw it, this is too awesome.

http://youtu.be/6GYxH2-WeZY

Go buy a box of Cheerios. We’re going to.

Love, domestic violence, suicide, and the Evil Empire: ICMI 2014

AVfM Video Source · 9 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What is the “Evil Empire”? This is explained here, along with other highlights from the International Conference on Men’s Issues.

You should subscribe to StudioBrule.

The “fairy tale” myth of relationships: Both false and destructive

Jeb Kinnison · 10 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In my book on attachment theory, I briefly take on the “Fairy Tale” model of romantic relationships:

> [T]he ideals of romance remain culturally strong; every fairy tale, every Disney animation, (almost) every Hollywood and Bollywood movie idealize the One True Love, who you will see across a crowded room at just the right moment, fall madly in love with, marry, and live happily ever after with in a vine-covered cottage with a picket fence.
>
> The hazard of such modern cultural programming:
>
> > One day we realize that we are completely possessed and dominated by a set of beliefs that we, as individuals, never chose. It is as though we breathe them in from novels and movies, from the psychological air around us, and they become part of us, as though fused with the cells of our bodies. We all know that we are supposed to “fall in love” and that our relationships must be based on romance—nothing less will do! Every man knows what he is entitled to demand from his [partner.] It is spelled out in detail in some unseen layer of the unconscious mind. This is “romance”. —anonymous
>
> Note the word “demand.” It is a self-centered expectation that my needs will be satisfied, my happiness will come from my partner. This is a child’s narcissistic view of a relationship—it’s all about me. The fairy tale model tells you you are entitled to happiness and your partner is to provide it. Or else! Of course this is not a relationship of adult equals in loving attachment—it has no place for real life, for struggle toward goals, for temporary unhappiness and loss for the sake of a future goal. And those who cling to it generally fail.
>
> Idealized romantic love was not considered especially desirable before Medieval troubadours promoted it. Adult long-term relationships have historically been about family, property, and influence, with eventual love a desirable but not necessary factor. In wealthy urban societies, long-term married persons often sought sexual outlets and the thrills of romance from secondary relationships.

Peter Wright, writing in A Voice for Men, captures the problematic cultural relic of the Fairy Tale with more scholarship than I could muster — we’ve been exchanging emails. From his point of view, modern feminism and the Fairy Tale are closely entwined, and modern feminists don’t recognize how much their beliefs owe to a feudalistic ideal of female privilege (the “Fairy Tale Princess” model):

> Feminism promotes a neurotic vision of what constitutes true love. It takes its model directly from the Age of Feudalism which saw vassals bowing down and kissing the hands of Lords. In the 12th century that model served as the basis for a new kind of love in which men were to play the role of vassal to women who played the role of an idealized Lord. C.S. Lewis, back in the middle of the 20th Century, referred to this historical revolution as “the feudalisation of love,” and stated that it has left no corner of our ethics, our imagination, or our daily life untouched. “Compared with this revolution,” states Lewis, “the Renaissance is a mere ripple on the surface of literature.”
>
> Not only has this feudalistic notion of love permeated almost every corner of the globe today, it continues to be vigorously promoted by both feminists and traditionalists alike. The love we are referring to is what Hollywood, romance novels, and other media refer to as “romantic love,” the fantasy to which every modern man and woman pledges blind obeisance…. [C.S. Lewis commented:]
>
> > Everyone has heard of courtly love, and everyone knows it appeared quite suddenly at the end of the eleventh century at Languedoc. The sentiment, of course, is love, but love of a highly specialized sort, whose characteristics may be enumerated as Humility, Courtesy, and the Religion of Love. The lover is > always abject. Obedience to his lady's lightest wish, however whimsical, and silent acquiescence in her rebukes, however unjust, are the only virtues he dares to claim. Here is a service of love closely modelled on the service which a feudal vassal owes to his lord. The lover is the lady's 'man'. He addresses her as midons, which etymologically represents not 'my lady' but 'my lord'. The whole attitude has been rightly described as 'a feudalisation of love'. This solemn amatory ritual is felt to be part and parcel of the courtly life.

>
> C.S. Lewis wrote that many decades ago; I'm not sure "everyone" knows it today. We ought to remember his words, because in the long sweep of human history, what we think has been with us forever is something people only a few generations ago knew to be mostly an artificial, idealized notion.

One of the issues of the modern age of electronic media and overabundant entertainment is the lack of accountability and feedback — in earlier eras, most of a child's time was spent with parents, siblings, and peers in the real community, and their self-image was molded by feedback from those real people. Today many children get less guidance from adults, and spend much of their early years viewing entertainments from Disney and others that were drenched in the Fairy Tale model of romance. The content of these tales has grown more sophisticated in recent years, but they still often center on either a girl who is pretty and does well by finding the Prince Charming to whisk her off to Happy Ever After Land, or a boy who bests his competitors through wit and daring. Neither of these scenarios is an actual experience with the feedback required to sharpen life skills; both allow a sort of lazy, I-am-owed-this fantasy view of how life works. The willingness of the most effective teachers to demand excellent performance from their pupils has been buried by bureaucracies punishing teachers for upholding high standards, and refusing to let teachers remove disruptive students from their classes. Even worse, the "self-esteem" movement called for praising and rewarding all children, no matter what their performance, lest their self-esteem be damaged — but untested, unreal self-esteem based on false praise crumbles as soon as it encounters real-world setbacks.

Peter Wright goes on to suggest a view of marriage or partnership as friendship-plus — the values of friendship with the addition of sex and family interests — as a healthier way of looking at it:

> The field of attachment science concludes that an absence of close and consistent human attachment causes children to literally wither and die, refusing to thrive despite being provided with clothing, food and an adequate number of toys. Likewise adults literally commit suicide to escape feelings of isolation and loneliness, especially after a relationship separation. Even if we don't end up suiciding from loneliness we have to ask ourselves if the absence of an intimate relationship in our lives leaves us limping, or somehow unfulfilled? Some would suggest we can fill our intimacy void with friendships, but this leads to a further question of whether there is an adequate formulation of friendship that can satisfy our needs – a relationship that doesn't rely on the usual vassal and lord model at the core of romantic love.
>
> In ancient cultures friendship was a more lofty aspiration than it is today. It was synonymous with love and it often involved sexual intimacy. In Ancient Greek, the same word was used for "friend" and "lover." In our culture we have succeeded in separating friendship from the category we call love, and excised all trace of sex from friendships. Today when we say, "They are just good friends" or "she's only a friend" we are indicating the absence of both intimate love and sex.
>
> …
>
> Sexual attraction and desire also need to be put in their place. They may generate some chemistry and may be the first thing that attracts you to a person, but like the shiny trinket that catches your eye at the shopping mall, you will first stare at it in wonder, maybe have a feel, and then decide whether you really want to take that thing home and share your life with it. Friendship is much the same, and if a person you meet has little in common you will be inclined to leave them on the shelf and move on, despite their sexual attractiveness.
>
> …

> I once again note that the breakdown in relations between men and women has been painful, and men have suffered the most in this I would think; in the current socio-political climate, marriage and even cohabitation is like jumping out of an aeroplane with a chute you're not even sure is going to open. And all change can't simply be political. Still, if we are ever to look forward to a cultural change that might make for a new era of improved relations between the sexes, ditching these feudalistic attitudes about "romantic love," and restoring the ancient tradition of seeing intimate friendship being the highest ideal for a relationship, would probably by a major step in the right direction culturally. This will require a shift in the attitudes of men and women alike, but the evidence for this being possible is strong; we've done it before, and we still see it in some cultures today. It's not impossible for human beings to think and act this way. So can we return to a culture where that's the more normal way of thinking? I'd like to believe that possible for us today, or at least in the future.

In one of those elisions, Peter comments: "One of the worst-kept secrets about married couples is that they often treat their friends with more kindness, compassion and generosity than they ever do for each other. When best friends are together they are charming, engaging, helpful and courteous, but when they return home to their spouses they appear resentful, angry and uncooperative with each other."

I think we disagree about this. When the arranged-marriage, marriage-for-property-and-dynasty system went out of style, marriages became a choose-for-yourself project, with a much larger pool of candidates to choose from. While this freed many to find more compatible partners, it also cast the losers into a game of musical relationship chairs where most of the remaining candidates were problematic; 50% of the population have insecure attachment types, and freedom of choice meant those insecure people were more often thrown in together into dysfunctional marriages. No longer feeling obligated to make a marriage work, and finding a year or two in that their partner is either too controlling and clingy or too cold and avoidant, the sniping and the negative communication games begin. You could call this another facet of assortative mating, where the best partners find each other and leave the worst to deal with each other.

There's also a selection effect: we notice the marriages where people fight or snipe at each other. The half of marriages that do well do so quietly, and it's easy to assume married people treat each other badly behind the scenes when nearly everyone tries to maintain status and self-image by presenting a falsely positive view to outsiders. Those whose marriages are happy tend to quietly enjoy themselves and get on with their lives, while the unhappy participants in bad marriages are more likely to let everyone know just how awful their partner is, after presenting a glowing but false picture at first.

There is a real world, and a couple has to join together and face reality as partners to be successful both with each other and in surviving and thriving in a sometimes harsh environment. A real partnership grows stronger with adversity overcome by mutual effort; if one or both partners think life should be easy because they are goodlooking, or great at sports, or Daddy's Little Girl, the normal setbacks of life will have them blaming their partner and running for the exit. Happiness — or great sex or a perfect house — is not the goal of a successful relationship; the goal is a bond that strengthens both of you and helps you be more the person you want to be. Happiness in marriage, when it happens, is a byproduct of love and loyalty and accomplishments together over time.

Belief in the Fairy Tale Model is crippling, often leaving believers battered, poorer, and alone in middle age — ask many of the bewildered divorced fathers. And the divorcées, having moved on to what they expected would be sexier, more attentive men? Having thrown away their shared history and often damaged their children by depriving them of a father's guidance, their lives are not improved. What they wanted was an illusion.

Another excerpt from my book, the list of "Fairy Tale Assumptions" from a friend who now knows better:

There is only one person for me. Really? With five billion other people walking around, that's a rather unlikely assumption. If you can only partner with one person on the planet, it seems more likely your requirements are so demanding there is no one who could meet them. It's probably wiser to strive to be the kind of person who could be a good partner to lots of people. Yes, they should be very special—but not the only one!

Money doesn't matter. Only when you're rich. You have to be able to talk about money. Who makes what? Does the person who brings in more money have a bigger say in how it gets spent? Do you have a spending plan? A savings plan? What if one of you gets a great job opportunity in another city—will you move?

Love will keep us together. Love is not a force in the world. It doesn't pay the bills or get you a job or make you smart; in fact, you could argue the reverse. Love is a reason to try hard, to go above and beyond, and to accomplish things that ordinarily you wouldn't do. Because no one is perfect and even your perfect life-partner will forget to take out the garbage or will wake you up with his incessant snoring.

You can only love one person at a time. Attraction is a function of brain chemistry. Companionate love is what remains when the limerence finally leaves. There's nothing to prevent you from having strong feelings for more than one person. You have an infinite capacity to love.

This relationship will never end. All relationships end. Everyone dies. Everyone's circumstances change. Instead of imbuing one relationship with magic picked up in an after-school special, it might be worthwhile to tell someone how much they mean to you and then work on showing that. Because words are cheap. Signing on a dotted line for a mortgage or having children or jointly caring for family elders shows that you're not just another bed warmer. And all those people in high school you absolutely loved? You won't even remember their names in 30 years.

People should love me for who I am. Oh dear. Have some more kool-aid. Just because you exist doesn't make you lovable. If you have to do things to manipulate how people feel about you, then you are a mess. Clean your mess and stop using other people until you have.

Sex is bad. Don't buy into that. Sex is neither good nor bad. It is a natural function, like eating and breathing. Using sex as a weapon for nonconsensual dominance or withholding sex as punishment are childish games.

I am the center of the world. You may be pretty and smart, but there are many people who are prettier and smarter and they do more chores and make more money and can run marathons. Just be your best. Love your friends. Talk to your kids. Do a good job.

The world owes me. The world doesn't give a rat's ass about you, nor should it. You are no more important (and no less important) than anyone else.

People never change. Do you think your mother married a balding oaf whose idea of a good time is to fart the alphabet? Did your father marry a woman because of her intense bingo addiction and her desire to wear polyester stretch pants in colors not found in nature?

My sweetheart will love me if we have children. It is morally wrong to use other people, especially children, to get what you want. Having babies to keep your man in a marriage does not work. Leaving your wife and kids because you don't like children makes you a douche, not a dad.

I can change him or her. Guess what? Alcoholism, obesity, compulsive gambling, drug addiction, and sex addiction don't exist because of you. You can't fix them. You can help them get help but you have to understand that you are not the change agent.

You have to be honest about what you want and how you feel. You have to give honest feedback. Lying helps no one.

Feature image by Loren Javier

Advising New Mexico Tech

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 10 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

My job at AVfM is to act as a liaison for college students and faculty that want to put men's rights on campus. I've received correspondence from students from Queen's University, Umass Amherst, New Mexico Tech, and Fordham Lincoln Center, to name a few places.

The New Mexico Tech correspondence was particularly interesting because the inquiry came from the kind of sound, prepared mind that wants results. My emailed response follows the email body quoted below. It is my hope that this brief exchange will illustrate the kind of pragmatic thinking the MHRM needs to become an institutional force in academia. Please send your moral support to my friend at New Mexico Tech. —V. Zen

> Dear Mr. Gerard,
>
> I have emailed both accounts you have provided, as I am not sure how best to reach you during the summer.
>
> First, let me introduce myself. My name is Tyler [FULL NAME REDACTED]. I am a rising junior in the Electrical Engineering department at New Mexico Institute of Mining and Technology. The school website is nmt.edu. I work as a learning coach for the office for student learning. My job entails both tutoring numerous subjects and being a teaching assistant for a freshman class designed to give freshmen what they need to do well in college.
>
> I have been studying up on what the Men's Rights Movement's is about for several months now. I have listened to a lot of the complaints put forth by the MRM and have become interested. I am particularly interested in the educational gender gap, suicide rates of men, and equal parenting rights. These aren't the only issues I am interested in, though. My first idea was to give men on campus a male space to talk about their problems. Though this will help the men on campus, I want to do more.
>
> I have searched through A Voice For Male Students, which has been a useful resource in creating an idea for how to advertise.
>
> I want to create a men's group on campus, but I have no idea on what the group should do. I know you are the leader and Founder of KSUM, so I wish to ask you for help on ideas for activism to create a successful group. If you could help me, or point me in the direction of help, I would be very grateful.
>
> — Tyler

Tyler,

I am delighted to have this opportunity to advise you!

If you are serious about starting a group, then you have a lot of work ahead of you and I commend you for wanting to step up to the challenge. Like with any organization making itself known, you must know your audience and environment in order to adapt. You are not just looking for answers, but questions too. What are your departments? Who near you has the most "pull?" Where are the major points of foot traffic? And so on, and so on.

Since you are just getting started, I encourage you to read up on NMT's basic facts to get a broad view of the campus community. Be very careful about how you interpret this data.

NMT is 68% male, which is not surprising since NMT does a lot of vocational STEM training. An optimist would say you have no shortage of members, but it is possible that men would not feel particularly repressed. Do not take this as an invitation to play the Victim Olympics by making men feel victimized, because that is not a good way to go about doing things. I'm not saying you would do that, but it can be tempting to use sensationalism to build echo chambers. Not good.

Since you are on an engineering campus, try framing everything in terms of problem-solving. Don't say "our teachers are using bad textbooks!" Instead, ask students "how would you convince a teacher to change textbooks?" The questions are simple, pique the natural curiosity of STEM students, and may lead to profound answers that can make equally profound changes in the community.

You may be wondering about what problems you can solve. That's for you to figure out, because you are limited to the local community. This is not a bad thing, but it is important to remember not to pursue lofty goals beyond your capacity (e.g. full institutional reform). On KSUM, we can't reduce male suicide rates everywhere, but we can audit a course, lobby administrators and generally be a thorn in the ass when it counts.

I tell you this because another common behavior I see in people is this desire to solve the world's problems due to a drunken, youthful passion. Have you ever seen people come together under the most universal recruiting tools they can come up with, only to pat each other on the back for "working towards equality" without actually doing anything? I know I have. Ditch hopeful ideals, because they fool you into thinking you're productive sitting still.

Let me give you some information to get started:

You will be finding yourself inside the Department of Communication, Liberal Arts and Social Sciences much more often in the near future. Study their courses and knock on the doors of the instructors during their office hours to get to know them, and their research. ("Hi, my name is Tyler and I'm passionate about social issues. What you have published? What books do you use? etc.")

Watch how they treat men and women. You may have noticed that the NMT Women's Resource Center says, quite plainly, that "A Woman's Place is in STEM." Keep track of stuff like that, because it conveys attitudes that can be threatening to BOTH men and women on your campus. The WRC seems to be telling women what to do with their lives, and may resent men for being "in a woman's spot." Are schools supposed to prepare people for their own journeys, or tell students their place in society?

[image]
Freedom means knowing your place, right?
That's one thread you can follow to learn more. Once you soak up a lot of information, try to make some work for yourself. If you think you can make a difference, then learn the policies for starting a student organization and start one.

NMT has only 22 organizations competing for student members, and none of them are direct competitors. You can even build relationships with the sports clubs to build your membership.

On my end, KSU has over 226 organizations, and a few of them are direct competitors [EDIT: This was a typo in the original email. It should read "indirect," because there are no other men's rights organizations on KSU.] On a marketing level, I wish I had your campus.

I think you have a real chance to start the first men's rights student organization in New Mexico, don't you?

Write me whenever you are stuck, confused, or otherwise in need of assistance. If I can help you make something happen, then I will.

I'm proud of you.

Sage Gerard
Collegiate Activism Director
A Voice for Men

Sage is the founder of Kennesaw State University Men (KSUM), the first AVfM-sponsored men's rights student organization. KSUM needs your help to fund a conference on educational equity issues affecting male students. If everyone reading this donated $1 every hour, KSUM will reach its goal today. Will you part with just one dollar to put men's rights on campus?

Darwin's Rejects attempt to disrupt CAFE event

Dan Perrins · 10 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On the University of Toronto campus on August 5, some of Darwin's Rejects, a.k.a. feminist protestors, attempted to disrupt yet another Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) event.

The scheduled speaker was Igor Serebryany, who started an organization in Russia for fathers called All Russia Fathers' Committee. Using his experience as a reporter, columnist, editor, and a former producer of BBC World Service, Serebryany was prepared to talk about the issues men and children face in the Russian courts. "I can speak about this issue 25 hours a day," Serebryany said.

I'm not going to report on the details of his lecture in this particular piece, but I'll post his lecture on YouTube shortly. I will say it was a distinct pleasure to meet him. Serebryany was completely respectful to all, even politely interacting with the feminist protestors.

However, I can't say the same for those feminist protestors—I call them Darwin's Rejects because of their inability to evolve beyond rudimentary disruptions—who decided they would try to prevent Serebryany from speaking.

They did delay the lecture for a short time—and managed to provide attendees with some comedic relief—but ultimately they failed in their mission, and the lecture continued without interruption, followed by a Q&A.

But I did witness some extremely disturbing actions. Shameful, disgusting maneuvers that should not occur on a world-class university campus. Behavior that is contrary to the evolution of learning, justice, equality, and society.

When Darwin's Rejects arrived at the event, they came in just like a gang: about a dozen or so of them marched in and took up seats in the last two rows, eager to unleash their fembryonic understanding of equality from their half-baked Gender Studies brains.

I paid light attention to them, not wanting to inflame the situation. After all, maybe they would have some intelligent questions—or just one intelligent question—instead of the usual baboon-level buffoonery we've come to expect from these feminist specimens of higher learning.

It truly is as if evolution has rejected them. Their inability to make cogent points and still populate post-secondary campuses in large numbers must have Darwin rolling in his grave.

Still, I've seen some pretty rare things in my life, so maybe this was going to be one of them.

And then the lecture started.

With that, Darwin's Rejects began chanting and making use of noisemakers to disturb the peace. CAFE organizers called campus security and asked attendees to leave and gather in another area to avoid any confrontation with these increasingly disruptive, aggressive feminist protesters. I walked up to some attendees to pass along a message about the location of a second gathering point. And then I switched on my cellphone camera to grab some footage of Darwin's Rejects.

I've edited the footage to protect innocent attendees. We already know feminists won't be held to the rule of law and are given free rein to terrorize individuals and groups on Canadian university campuses.

I then watched as campus security did nothing to stop or to remove the protesters. Security didn't do anything because it was a protected right of the protesters to disrupt lectures. They have the right to free speech, don't you know.

The very right that the feminist protesters were trampling all over by disrupting and attempting to silence Serebryany was being used to protect their own idiocy.

At this point, for the most part attendees had left via the stage door, and one of Darwin's Rejects decided she was going to follow them to harass them some more. There was a bit of drama at the door and I watched it all unfold.

The female protestor tried to push through a male attendee standing at the door, which resulted in her assaulting him and in the process tripping herself up. She immediately tried to claim that this was an assault on her. She deployed the full “demented damsel defense.”

We all know how it goes: A female feminist makes a false allegation, and any and all male feminists within earshot beat their chests and come to her aid. They are usually rabid in their attempts to prove what Good Men they are, ignoring evidence and eyewitness testimony. What brave, upstanding male feminists they are, willing to help file false charges against another human.

But, hey, it’s all good, right? Because a girl screamed, some male must be guilty, right?

Unfortunately for her, and for the rest of Darwin’s Rejects, I witnessed the whole event. As an aside, if you’re reading this, Ms. False Accuser, when you run into someone, you are the one perpetrating an assault. They stood there, you tried to push by. You tripped yourself up in your attempt to further harass law-abiding individuals.

And sadly, the only law upheld here was the law of gravity when Ms. False Accuser tripped, as campus security made excuses not to evict those who were there to harass and disturb innocent people. Common sense would dictate that these protesters be removed from the hall, and if they so choose, they could protest outside the hall. That didn’t happen. Instead, the lecturer and attendees (who had donated money to the event) were forced to relocate due to some irresponsible policies created to protect feminist feelz over the rule of law.

I predict that it’s going to be a lively lecture season, folks. Grab your cameras and come on out to enjoy the show as Darwin’s Rejects demonstrate their devolution.

Warren Farrell on the wage gap: The facts behind the myths

Warren Farrell · 10 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In this video series, Warren fairly thoroughly debunks the notion that women are as a rule paid less because they are women. The entire series is worth watching for anyone who still doubts that there are a lot of lies behind this dubious statistic.–DE

http://youtu.be/Cb_6v-JQ13Q?list=PLoYau0msq1ObHgwyxZOGsd5Qj83HrTEDJ

Sweden is burning, and we have no defense

William Andersson · 11 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Criticism of Swedish authorities for their handling of the big forest fire in Västmanland has in some quarters been very strong. Much of it will never be seen by those who only consume media and authority-approved information. But those who actively search for information online do not have to look farther than Mikael Styrman's blogpost "The Swedish incompetence in its prime." Styrman knows what he's talking about:

> For those who do not know why I feel that I am called to speak about this, I fly helicopters and am a forest owner, a former forestry contractor and manager of a power plant. I have been through several forest fires and have both commissioned and performed several prescribed forest burnings, including both preparation and afterwork.

Operative firefighters from Sweden on a network meeting in 2012. Picture taken from the MSB website.

Styrman writes not only about the incompetence that has characterized the management of this particular disaster but also the cause: the system errors in the Swedish public sector. The same system errors that, as Styrman explains, cause the trains to stop, or not start at all, as soon as it gets warmer or colder than 10 degrees Celsius. Errors that cause expensive and unnecessary tunnels to not be completed on time. Errors that convict innocent citizens of 10 murders while the real killers go free. The reason the elderly are abandoned and locked up at night. The reason the electricity stops working when it gets a little windy and functioning telephone lines get scrapped because it means more money in the pockets of the telecommunications mafia.

Heads of operations

Styrman summarizes these system errors in one sentence when he discusses the five highest officials responsible for the rescue operation who answered questions at a recent press conference in Sala.

> Five highly paid and totally ignorant people for which it is more important what sex they are, what party they belong to, and who they are family and friends with.

It is the factor that Styrman mentions first—gender—that we shall look at closely. But first, some facts about Swedish preparedness for disasters like this one. There was talk in the media that Sweden could quickly mobilize five helicopters for extinguishing and rescue work. The truth is that Sweden could mobilize only three. Two more had to be borrowed from Norway. Three helicopters is what Sweden can send up in the event of a major disaster such as this. THREE! We have ordered 10 Black Hawk helicopters, Prime Minister Reinfeldt said in his defense in a recent interview. But the order has apparently not been expedited for more than 10 years?!

What other customer has accepted a delay of 10 years when placing such an important order? Or any order, for that matter? Was there no clause to cancel the contract in case of a serious delay? Ten years? Give me a fucking break … And not a single follow-up question from the reporter. Marvelous!

Admittedly, helicopters are not a particularly effective tool when it comes to putting out fires of this magnitude, but they are incredibly important in almost all kinds of other rescue work. In this fire, the helicopters have rescued several people. But in the effort to extinguish fires of this scale, they are pretty useless. There is then really only one thing one can do, according to Styrman (except maybe start dancing a rain dance). You have to quickly cut fire roads in the periphery, start fires there, and let those fires burn their way into the middle, where they will extinguish one another. If this had been done straight away, this disaster could have been avoided. The key in these situations is knowledge.

> An educated person will be more useful with just a shovel than a whole bunch of incompetent people with all the equipment in the world.

So what has the Swedish Civil Contingencies Agency ("Myndigheten för samhällsskydd och beredskap," or MSB) done to strengthen this knowledge with their management staff in recent years? What has been done to educate the people who will be our last line of defense against natural disasters of this magnitude? Have they done anything?

Oh yes, they have spent millions of dollars to train management … in “gender studies and equality.”

In early 2010, the MSB spent 16 million Swedish kronor (called “sek,” and equal to US$2.3 million) on two major projects. Eight million went to the Center for Gender Studies at Karlstad University and the project “The gender-coded civil protection: Conditions of gender equality.” Among other things, it discussed whether masculinity should be considered a risk.

The same amount of money went to Luleå University for a four-year program called “Gender and Public Safety: Technology, organization and gender mainstreaming.” Some areas that researchers will examine include:

- Why are the number of women greater among part-time firefighters than among full-time employees? Is it because of how the work is organized?
- What role does new equipment and tools play for how we look at the job?
- Physical strength is valued very highly among firefighters. How do we explain that an experienced firefighter may have high status, even if he is no longer so strong?
- Are there significant barriers to equality that lie more in the community than outside civil protection?
- How significant is it, for example, that a father of small children is expected to be able to work nights but not a mother of small children?

Does anyone see anything in this program that has got anything to do with rescue work? How best to fight major forest fires, for example? No? Neither do I.

Look at the following screenshot, which was recently taken from the MSB website. This page promotes a protection against accidents (SMO) program, which is a two-year post–high school program for anyone who wants to become a firefighter and work with rescue and safety. Does anyone notice the same as me?

So what did the Swedish taxpayers get for their 16 million sek? Were the burning forests in Västmanland full of strong and brave women who made heroic efforts to put the damn thing out? No, they were not. I will not say there were none, for I do not know that, but if there were women involved, they were not many. And if any of the men (or their leadership) who have been fighting this monster participated in this program, I doubt they have had much use for it in their 10-plus days of battling the largest forest fire in Swedish history.

The politicians, who are so freely handing out billions of taxpayers' money to self-proclaimed frauds and swindlers at the universities, do not seem to question why their (read: our) spent millions did not contribute to an effective disaster preparedness. In any case, I have not heard any such criticism from any of them so far. Asa Romson (environmental party) now suddenly celebrates the same people whom in a recent speech in Almedalen she called "non-people": white, heterosexual, carnivorous men. In one week, the same people can apparently go from being the cause of all that is wrong in this world to being heroes. All that's needed is a forest fire that you can smell all the way to Stockholm.

It has rubbed many people the wrong way that early in the crisis Romson tried to win political points from a disaster that had already taken people's (men's) lives and homes, especially since she and her party have been driving the effort to totally dismantle Swedish defense units. If the Green Party would have had a majority in parliament, we would not have been able to mobilize even three choppers or a single tracked vehicle, for that matter.

But she is not the only politician who deserves criticism. They all do. We Swedes are generally either indifferent or ignorant about what is done above our heads.

I do believe, though, that most citizens would agree with me that it's worth 16 million of our money to educate a good rescue service, thereby having not only rescue workers who know their shit but also competent crisis management. The tax money we pay to the Civil Contingencies Agency should be used to ensure just that. What it should not be used for, however, is funding a playhouse for self-appointed gender experts whose teachings denigrate the very people who right now are risking their lives to toil 20 hours a day in shifts to save people and property in Västmanland.

Am I the only one who can feel my blood starting to boil?

Helena Lindberg

And it does not get better when I hear that the (of course, female) head of the Civil Contingencies Agency, Helena Lindberg, refused to end her vacation early to come home to take charge. She gave some sort of explanation to the dumbfounded reporter, but all I hear is something like this:

> I don't give a fuck about your trivial fires and burnt-down cottages and you can do crap about it since I have protection. I do NOT want to be disturbed when I am on vacation reading the latest proposals from my interior designer. And anyway I don't even know what a forest fire is. You don't have to have skills in my job. You just have to be a woman with the right opinions and connections. Furthermore, it is my husband who does the BBQing in our family.

So far as we know, one man has died and a few more have been badly injured in this fire. And there is a big risk that more casualties and even fatalities will follow. It is never a good idea for civilians to wander into areas where huge forest fires are raging.

Whether or not volunteers join the fight despite the risks depends on management's ineptitude. When people realize that those who should be doing the job of protecting them and their property don't know how, they tend to take matters into their own hands. It is called responsibility. In these cases, it is often good, but sometimes it ends badly.

You cannot tell people not to do anything themselves: "Just watch from a safe distance as we make total asses of ourselves and your property gets destroyed!"

You have to learn how to do your job and then take care of it!

And guess who it is in the family who grabs the chainsaw and shovel and heads for the forest? Well, you have a 50 percent chance of getting it right. Looks like ordinary folk have not participated in university gender programs yet.

But that said, I also want to make it perfectly clear that it is not the many firefighters heroically fighting in the forests right now who are to blame. And a lot of women are also doing heroic actions: getting food, water, and other supplies to the workers, providing transport, and organizing sleeping shelters, etc. Funny how when shit hits the fan, we always seem to regress to our old gender roles. Dangerous close situations seem to have that effect on us. No shadow should fall over these people. They are all truly heroes and deserve our fullest respect.

And they also deserve a management and, ultimately, politicians who do not spend their hard-earned money on bullshit gender studies that have done NOTHING to help them fighting for us all out there.

Let us hope that no other big fires will happen anywhere in Sweden right now because at the moment every fire hose in the whole of Sweden is in Västmanland.

But at least we are equal, right? What a comfort.

Effeminition: Equal work

Hannah Wallen · 11 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: More is explained on what an "effeminition" is here.

One of the more oft-heard complaints of the radfem brigade is the touting of the wage gap myth in support of the "equal pay for equal work" battle cry. This continues despite the fact that said myth has been debunked. This is highlighted by questions introduced by the CONSAD report, which indicates that much of the difference in average earnings can be attributed to the worker's life choices and willingness to sacrifice other perks in life for the benefit of higher earnings.

A wealth of related links to news and other information can be found in this reddit comment.

It is also especially important to note the collective effect of anything that can be considered hazard pay on the numbers used to support the wage gap myth. The hazard pay effect is attributable to the difference in job choices between the sexes. Among the higher paying items in the job market are The Most Dangerous Jobs. These are not jobs that women are being kept out of due to discrimination. These are jobs that women are not actively seeking to take. On top of the prohibitive risk factors, this is in part due to time demands. Seasonal jobs often mean daily work for weeks or months, with long hours, hard labor, and no days off in between. Further, the labor demands for these jobs require physical strength, labor endurance, fatigue endurance, and a brand of emotional toughness that is beyond what most women possess or seek to test within ourselves.

Among the results of the discrepancy in representation between the sexes in the most dangerous of jobs is what I would refer to as the risk gap and the death gap. The first thing that stands out in these statistics is the huge difference in the number of male workplace fatalities versus female workplace fatalities. While this accounts for only a segment of the whole workforce, it skews the numbers on both sides of the argument, creating an apparently higher average pay rate for men and an apparently lower average injury and fatality rate for women overall.

In addition, this effect spills over into the regular workforce, including professions more evenly populated by both sexes. Higher injury and fatality rates in first-responder professions can be attributed to greater risk-taking by male first responders. Higher rates in the private sector can be attributed to heavier workload requirements given to men, including higher weight assignments and riskier positions in manufacturing and construction, and even in hourly, bottom-rung positions such as retail sales and health care aide positions. Right or wrong, employers and coworkers in general do have higher performance and labor expectations for men.

Taking into account the various factors affecting women's earnings, can we honestly continue to use the phrase "equal work" to describe women's contributions in the workplace? In light of the body of work that women will not do, whether that discrepancy is caused by life choices or unwillingness to risk, or inability to perform, are we really justified in demanding legislation to artificially boost our pay? Is the feminist concept of fairness in this case not incredibly biased? How does the assertion that pay should be artificially evened out via legislation not add up to ungrateful beneficiaries of risk-takers and hard-laborers demanding to be handed undeserved recognition and rewards on the basis of sex?

Speaking of the body of work that women will not do, I just ran across the following related article. I want to tell you a story …

DEATH LONGER
WORKDAY HEAVIER
WORKLOAD
WORKLIFE POLITICAL
OUTRAGEOUSNESS
EQUAL WORK

The General: So it’s about equality, huh?

AVfM Video Source · 11 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You know, if we aren’t mistaken, the winds of change are blowing.

You might want to subscribe to The General.

Did the family courts kill Robin Williams, or was it just us?

Paul Elam · 12 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"I used to think the worst thing in life was to end up all alone. It's not. The worst thing in life is ending up with people who make you feel all alone." Robin Williams as Lance Clayton, World's Greatest Dad (2009)

Actor and comedian Robin Williams took his own life Sunday. According to some close to him, he had been struggling with depression since two divorces left him in difficult financial shape. He was 63.

The reaction to the bad news has been varied. The typical platitudes are making the rounds on social media platforms. ABC News printed the express wishes of the family to be left alone while they were reeling from the shock. On the same page ABC offered readers a live cam aerial view of Williams's home.

FOX News's Shepard Smith referred to Williams with the words "such a coward," then offered a quick retraction and apology as he realized public grief turned to outrage would be aimed directly between his mascara-caked eyes. Different Strokes actor Todd Bridges tweeted how "selfish" Williams was, then later issued the same CYA apologies.

Other coverage of this tragedy has been somewhat more thoughtful, but most are comprised of homages to his brilliant work as a comic and an actor.

The circumstances that appear to have actually led to his suicide have been referenced in some places, but have otherwise been left unexamined. So far, no one in the mainstream media is looking at the life of Robin Williams and even trying to connect the dots on what led to the contemporary genius hanging dead at the end of belt noose.

In touching on the bare surface of the story, the media has managed in places to utter the words "divorce" and "financial problems." Indeed, two terms that seem inextricably locked together for men.

Getting any deeper, however, remains typically out of the question for mainstream coverage. Journalists are noting that his relapse back into drinking helped lead to his second divorce. No one is questioning whether his second marriage helped lead to his relapse.

I won't speculate that this is the case, though I think it is fair to wonder. I think a lot of questions could and should be asked about how we lost Robin Williams.

Most of them won't be asked.

What we do know is on the public record. Robin Williams was a talented and wildly successful artist who accumulated a fortune over the span of his career. After being drained of tens of millions in two divorces and getting married a third time, he was faced with selling off his most valuable property and the prospect, at 63, of trying to make a comeback in standup, just to make ends meet.

All this so his children and ex-wives could live on the high end. As Williams himself put it:

> "I have two [other] choices: go on the road doing stand-up, or do small, independent movies working almost for scale [minimum union pay]. The movies are good, but a lot of times they don't even have distribution."
>
> "There are bills to pay. My life has downsized, in a good way. I'm selling the ranch up in Napa [, Calif.,]. I just can't afford it anymore."

When asked whether his two divorces took all of his money, he answered with blunt comedy:

> "Well, not all. Lost enough. Divorce is expensive. I used to joke they were going to call it 'all the money,' but they changed it to 'alimony.' It's ripping your heart out through your wallet."

> "Are things good with my exes? Yes. But do I need that lifestyle? No."

Whatever Williams needed, apparently he was not getting it. More recent information released by the Marin County Sheriff might shed some light on that.

In a press conference Lt. Keith Boyd said that Williams's wife, Susan Schneider, went to bed at 10:30 p.m. on Sunday. According to Boyd, Williams 'retired' to another room in the house.

In the morning, Schneider left, reportedly thinking Williams was still asleep. Later his assistant, worried about him, came to the house and found his body. That was at 11:45 a.m.

It is certainly plausible that separate bedrooms were the routine in Williams's home. It would not be the first time married couples, even happy ones, enjoyed the space and comfort of their own bedrooms.

It is not, however, outside the realm of reason to wonder why an assistant would be concerned enough about Robin Williams's well-being to enter his home searching for him 75 minutes after his wife left the same home without any concern.

This is not to implicate any wrongdoing on the part of Williams's wife, but it seems likely there could have been a high degree of separation between the two at the time of his suicide.

I have to wonder how Williams might have felt, already panicked after two financially devastating divorces, if there was a chance he was looking at a third. And I have to wonder why a man, known by everyone close to him to be in very rough emotional shape, might still be hanging there were it not for the concern of an employee. I'd like to know if Williams had the level of support available at home that could have prevented this.

All this is just wondering aloud, of course. It is not even speculation in the truest sense.

Still, what I see as I read in and between as many lines as possible in this tragic story is a man crushed beneath the weight of keeping others in luxury; a man who faced spending his final days scraping and bowing and begging, doing anything and everything so that those who once found him useful would allow him another day of tending to their "needs."

Robin Williams was telling us this, in his own words. Pity no one was listening.

The media coverage of this, both what has already happened and that which will surely come to pass, paints a clear and conclusive picture of the problem behind the problem.

Not even being rich and famous and loved by millions will make anyone take an honest look at why you killed yourself when it makes them uncomfortable to do so … if you're a man.

Helicopters will circle like vultures over your carcass, looking for a shot of the aggrieved; fodder to pull at heart strings and sell commercials. Talking heads will measure up your manhood before your body is in the ground, likely as not to find you lacking.

The last thing they will ever take an interest in is what really killed you. And very few will care enough to notice.

RIP, Mr. Williams.

Note: This article is also available in Italian.

Warren Farrell: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Warren Farrell · 12 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We will over the next few weeks continue to present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. Here we bring you Dr. Warren Farrell's speech, the first speech from Day 2, Saturday June 28, 2014, introduced by Paul Elam. Our thanks once again to Rick Westlake for doing the bulk of the work of this transcription. –DE (Attila Vinczer) Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. May I have your attention, please? At this time I would ask that you would take your seats.

Welcome to the International Men's Conference, hosted by AVfM; founder, Paul Elam. This will be our second day, our second half of the conference. Yesterday, we had an absolutely stellar day. (Applause.) The feedback that I'm getting is something spectacular. We have had some of the greatest minds talking about matters concerning men and boys, and, in actuality, society. Today, we are moving ahead with an equally spectacular day, I am certain.

Before we get started, I have some books that I would like to give away. If you could check your ticket number—Number 121, you are the winner of Bachelor Pad Economics by Aaron Clarey. You can come and get your book when you have a chance. The next book, Men On Strike by Helen Smith—Number 3. We also have two bracelets from the Goodfathers Only organization, run by Calvin Mann—Number 143 and Number 38. You can come and claim your prizes later on.

Without any further ado, I would like to have Paul Elam introduce Dr. Warren Farrell.

(Applause. Paul Elam takes the podium.)

Oh, no, Warren. Come on. (Warren comes to stage.) Terry Bagley's hell …

Good morning, everybody. I have the pleasure of introducing Warren Farrell, a man who truly does need no introduction to this group. I could go into a lot of book titles that Warren has written, which most of you are already familiar with—they are available in the back of the room. I can mention that he was named by Financial Times as one of the 100 greatest thinkers in the 20th century; I think, in the 21st century too.

But rather than just go down a very lengthy list of Warren's accomplishments, I want to take this opportunity to talk about what he's meant to me, and I think, consequently, what he means to the people in this room, and to many, many other people.

Twenty-plus years ago, I was walking around in the mental-health industry, knowing that there was something wrong with matters between men and women, knowing that there was something wrong with our perception of men and our perception of women. And I could not articulate it. I couldn't put my finger on what the problem was. All I know is that I knew something was deeply wrong. And I went looking for information; I found almost nothing helpful. I found a lot of feminist literature; I found people discussing men's issues in ways that seemed to more compound the problems that I was looking at than to solve them.

And then one day, a therapist I know said, "Hey, have you heard about this book that's come out? It's called The Myth of Male Power. And just in hearing the title, I said, Okay, and I was at the bookstore that day, and I got it. And finally, for the first time in my life, and the first time in my adult work, with people with problems, and encountering what I perceived to be all of these issues between men and women that were not being addressed in a way that was helpful and healthy, and that could lead to building bridges between men and women, I found The Myth of Male Power. And it turned my life around. It made me see things differently. And finally, somebody had articulated—and for me, that's the brilliance of it.

It is, we are all—there's great writers in this room, there's people on AVfM staff, there's people that do videos on YouTube, and really speak well to these issues. Can you imagine being back in the early 1990s with no support, with only the feminist perspective around you, and conceptualizing all of this, and articulating all those issues on your own? I think it was a masterwork of our times. And I think we're very fortunate to have Warren here.

Then I got the opportunity to actually meet Warren, and to visit with him in his home, to share a meal with him, and to talk with him on a personal level, to hear about his father and to talk about mine. And what I got out of that was that not only was Warren a genius, but in the realm of human emotions—of the heart—he had an impact on me instantly.

I've been following his writings for a long time. I've read all of his other books. But nothing compared to spending time with this man, to seeing the loving relationship that he has with his wife, and the love that dominates, from his presence, between people. His work has been one that has led us to a movement that is finally, again, starting to build bridges between men and women instead of walls.

One of the things that we've missed in this culture, especially over the last 50 or 60 years, is mentoring. It is a lost art, where skills, and maturity, and perspective, and balance about life is passed from one individual to another; frequently between men, between fathers and sons, between men and their apprentices in what they do. We've lost a lot of that, and having it in-person; and we've become a society without mentoring, for the most part. And this is why I'm so thankful for the work that Calvin Mann does in mentoring young men. But I also think that we adapt, especially as men, and that we can receive mentoring from their words … which I've received, for many years now, from Dr. Farrell.

I could go on and on about how I feel about this man. But this is his moment; I want you to hear him. So without further ado, I want to introduce you to my friend and to my mentor, Dr. Warren Farrell.

(Applause. Warren Farrell embraces Paul, and takes the podium.)

Testing, yes … Paul, that was really beautiful, and really has touched me.

I remember when my dad read the first draft of The Myth of Male Power. He looked at me and said, "Are you prepared?" I said, What do you mean, prepared? And he said, "Are you prepared to wait for a generation, until this book is even acknowledged?"

Forty-four years ago, when the women's movement surfaced and I was writing for The New York Times, I wrote, "A Men's Movement will emanate from the core of the consciousness of a Women's Movement." Forty-four years later, and maybe, like my dad said, 21 years later, that's finally happening. It's happening here. It's happening now. It's happening with us.

It's happening, in part, because of Paul Elam. And, Paul, I'd like to ask you to stand. Please. And it's happening … Paul, stay standing, please … ah, please? …

Dean Esmay, where are you? … Dean, I'll also ask you to remain standing.

It's happening, also, because, as Hillary Clinton said, "It takes a village." And we may disagree or agree with Hillary on various things, but when it comes to "it takes a village" to create a men's issues awareness movement, yes, it takes a village. And some of that "village" is AVfM's editors. I'll ask you to stand up, please, if you're here. Some of the editors of AVfM … AVfM. And if you have ever contributed an article to AVfM's site, please stand up. You are part of the people who have created this movement.

And if you are part of AVfM's radio staff, please stand up and remain standing. I'll ask each group of people to remain standing.

And if you are with their news department, please stand up. News department. And if you are with AVfM's operations management, or international conference management, please stand up. If you're with AVfM … AVfM's server administration or forums administration, please stand up.

If you are with AVfM's international multi-siting or AVfM's Europe, please stand up. If you are one of AVfM's financial supporters, we honor you. Please stand up. … Wow.

If you're one of AVfM's speakers at this First International Contribution—ah, Conference—whose contribution is not speaking here, but you are here because of your contributions … please stand up.

And now I'll ask everyone to stand up who has gone the distance to attend this First International Conference on Men's Issues. (Applause and cheers.)

I just wanted to be sure I got a standing ovation! (Laughter.) Thank you!

I asked—what I'm going to be sharing with you today is my third draft of this speech, to which my wife can testify. And I had a really careful analysis of what happened to feminism, from my own personal experience with it. But I decided I didn't want to focus, in this event, on what happened to feminism and where feminism went wrong; and where I was, I thought, in the right movement, and how it morphed into a gap being created between equality, which was the original goal of feminism, and politics; and how politics led to exactly the opposite of equality. I had that all drawn out and worked out, and then I said no—I wanted to concentrate on where we need to go, what our top issues are. I want to concentrate on why are these issues that I will define, our top 10 if you will, what I believe should be our top 10—why they are important, and what the psychology is behind working with these issues first.

So let me work, first, on the number-one—what I think should potentially be the number-one issue that we should work on, and why that's so important to address first.

Number one, I believe, should be the boy crisis and what's happening to our sons.

And here's why: When men discuss adult men's issues, men hear weakness. Most men have learned, when the going gets tough, the tough get going. Not when the going gets tough, the tough go to a psychologist; when the going gets tough, the tough write a book about what's wrong, or they do some wimpy thing like write The Myth of Male Power. That's men's reaction to men expressing their pain, their issues … adult men.

Women's reactions? When men discuss adult men's issues, women hear whining.

Women fall in love with alpha males, not whining males. Women survived based on their ability to find men who protected them; not because women needed protection per se, but because women were focused on protecting the children. And when they found a strong man who didn't focus on his issues but focused on protecting her and being willing to die for her, her children survived. We're here today because of the sacrifices that adult men made, and were selected for by women who focused on men who stood up and fought and saved and sacrificed; not men who talked about their issues, who were introspective, who got in touch with their feelings, who got in touch with their fears.

Instinctively, traditional women are more interested in firefighters than a man who says, "Gee! There's a fire—I think the cause might be a drought—the fire makes me feel unsafe. It brings out feelings of insecurity from my childhood."

So, then, the question becomes, Is there hope for men discussing men's issues? And the answer is yes, because we have neuroplasticity; we have the ability to change. We are not stuck in our biology and our heritage. The defining characteristic of human beings who succeed is the ability to adapt. And our genetic heritage is in conflict with our genetic future. And that's where we're at, at this moment.

Let's look at this in relation to boys' issues. Let's look at … think for a moment: When a woman who's a mom sees her son having problems, as opposed to an adult male having problems, women switch from a biological desire to be protected by a man to a biological desire to protect her son. Suddenly her heart opens up. Toward her son, her biological instinct is to protect, not be protected.

So, for example, let me take dating. We know how difficult it is to talk about date-rape, an almost-impossible issue to discuss. If we discuss this with an adult woman, if she hears a man talking about fearing rejection, and fearing taking the sexual initiative, her mind switches to all the guys who went too far, too fast with her. Her mind switches to the guys who bought her drinks, largely to get her to bed. So instead of feeling appreciation for the work that they did to buy the drinks, she remembers the manipulation rather than the appreciation. She can't easily hear the guy's plight because it triggers her own trauma. It triggers her legitimate trauma.

As a mom, if she hears her son discuss his fear—as a mom, if she hears her son's fear of calling a woman he's attracted to, she switches to want to protect him from being rejected. Suddenly she feels his pain. She wants a woman to see her son's value—the son that she's nurtured and brought up, and cares for and loves more than anything in the world. She wants—she feels that, and suddenly, when a boy's issue is discussed, she can feel what boys go through.

That's why I believe the boy crisis, and what's happening to boys, is both legitimately an extremely substantive issue—the more you understand the boys' crisis, the more terrified you are. So that's the substance. But the biology and psychology of it is what I just mentioned.

That's why I choose it as my number-one issue.

I feel a bit like David Letterman here …

Number two: Children's need for both parents.

Notice I didn't say men's rights to children. It is not about men's rights to children; it's about children's—not rights to both parents, but children's NEED for both parents.

It's about children's need for both parents because both parents, whether it's by nature or by God—for whatever reason, both parents are checks and balances to each other. Moms tend to nurture and protect, and listen and care. Dads tend to push and create encouragement to try things that are new. And if the child falls on a ski slope, the mom will say, "Sweetie, any time you want to give up working for the ski team, don't worry, you can do what you want to do"; and Dad will say, "Get up and try again." And when Dad—when Mom isn't around, what do Dads do? They tend to nurture more. When Dads aren't around, Moms do a little more pushing. But as a rule, when Mom and Dad are both around, the children get the protection they need, the nurturing they need, and they get the encouragement and the push that they need.

So what do we know about children who do best? When they have both parents … When children grow up in non-intact families: When I did the research for Father and Child Reunion, I learned that there was only one series of four things that together had to be combined in order for children who grow up in non-intact families—like children of divorce, and children who are born outside of marriage—in order for them to succeed at the level that children do when they grow up in intact families. And those four things are:

Approximately an equal amount of time with mother and father. When either is left out of the equation, children suffer.

Second, the parents living close enough to each other so that the children don't have to give up friends or activities in order to see the other parent, and therefore resent the other parent; that, in order to see them, they have to give up friends and activities that they are invested in. And then they either undermine themselves, and don't get involved in team sports, and don't get involved in things that are healthy for their growth, or they don't have friendships that they really feel that they can be at their birthday party, and support them in the way that they want to be supported, and therefore they don't get supported by those friends in the way they want to be supported.

Third, there must be no bad-mouthing between mother or father, mother-to-father or father-to-mother, that the child can detect. Bad-mouthing does not mean only words, it means body language as well.

Fourth, and this is new research, that couples that do family counseling—after divorce or non-intact families—do much better than couples with the same socioeconomic background that do not do family counseling. Not family counseling "when needed," but family counseling proactively … consistently.

When children have significant father involvement, they do better in more than 30 areas we now know. When I wrote Father and Child Reunion, I was only able to document 26 areas; but now, in recent research, it's another four areas as well. They do better in all social areas. And the most amazing social area—we usually think of a mother as more empathetic than a father; that's probably true, especially toward the child; but children, all over the world, who have an equal or significant amount of father contact are more likely to be empathetic than children who do not. They're also more likely to be assertive without being aggressive.

And just a little hint on the empathy issue: One of the reasons they're more likely to be empathetic is not because dads are more empathetic. It's because dads require, by boundary enforcement, the child to think of the dad's needs, the mother's needs, and other people's needs beside themselves. Empathy does not beget empathy. Empathy begets the belief that you can be paid attention to, and your feelings should be heard. People who are always empathized-with often become self-centered. People who are required to think of other people, in order to win, in order—"Do you want to continue the rough-housing? You have to think of not poking me in the eye, not pulling me in the hair, not knocking me in the groin in order to get your way. And if you don't do that, if you don't think of me, there'll be no more rough-housing." And the boundary-enforcer dad who says, the moment he's kicked or pulled —hair-pulled—again, immediately transfers it to say, "Okay, no more rough-housing," and when he follows through with what he says he will do if what he asks for is not paid attention to, the child learns to think of somebody else besides herself or himself.

When the boundaries are not enforced, the child thinks of how to manipulate a better deal. So the child prepares to be an excellent lawyer, but nothing else.

And there are some wonderful human beings who are lawyers, by the way … whew!

Occasionally, I lie … no, just joking.

Number three is the "pay gap."

Why the "pay gap"? Because when feminists speak about men's—men and women, they basically start out with, "It's a patriarchal world, in which men have made the rules to benefit men at the expense of women; and the proof of that is that when men and women work equally as hard, men arranged the world so that men get a dollar for each 76 cents that women get for the same work!" And even President Obama said this. And even would-be president Romney said this. It's the one thing that Republicans and Democrats both agree on. And it's also completely not true.

What is true—when I did the research for Why Men Earn More, I began to find that there were a number of things that men and women did differently in the workplace. And I was beginning to find five, six, seven things. The more research I did, it moved up to 10; the more research I did, it moved up to 25 differences between men's and women's decisions in the workplace. And it's not really the workplace; it's their work–life decisions, the way they handle work and life.

Now, there's a big difference between men and women but not in pay. There's a—the pay gap is not a gap about male versus female. It's a gap about mothers versus fathers.

When mothers and fathers are in an intact situation, and children are born, mothers tend to divide their labor between the work at home and the work at the workplace. And they begin to figure out a world of work which is more flexible, that allows them not to commute so far, that allows them to get home earlier, that allows them to take off some time—like be a teacher and take off a good portion of the summer. And so, jobs that are more flexible, jobs that are more fulfilling, jobs that are closer to home—those jobs pay less. Because what feminists didn't realize is that pay is not about power. Pay—the road to high pay is a toll road. It's taking time away from your family to be at work. It's being willing to be adaptive to the needs of the workplace.

If they open up a company in Siberia, or in Alaska, in Juneau, and you don't like cold climate—you want to get further in that company, you move. Or you work in Alaskan pipelines, or oil rigs, and you hope to save—or Alaskan fisheries, and you hope to save up enough money, when you're a single male, to be able to afford a woman; to be able to afford a family. Pay is about—when we pay for—we learn this at a very early age; we pay to go out on a date with women. The pay that we pay for, for a woman—reflexively—is our compensation for our inequality. It is our way of saying to a woman, "I am not worthy of your company until I put money out for it." If there's no romantic interest, the man doesn't put money out. If there is romantic interest, the man puts money out because he's paying for his inability to be equal to a woman. It's like, compensate for it by paying for it.

When I'm paid to speak here, it's because I'm valued. If I'm paid as a consultant, or as an expert witness, it's because I'm valued. The more I'm paid, the more I'm valued. And women sensed and felt that when a man took her to a really nice restaurant, she felt valued. And so women began to feel that if they weren't—if a man didn't pay for a really nice restaurant, maybe they weren't valued as much as somebody valued the woman who was paid to go out to a beautiful restaurant.

So pay, for men, was what we had to do to compensate for our inequality. Pay is not about privilege, it's about a toll road. Pay is about the power we forfeit to get the power of pay.

Now, what happens when men and women are not married? And don't have children—particularly when they don't have children, that's the distinction, mothers versus fathers? When men and women have never been married—this is U.S. Bureau of Labor statistics I'll give you right now—when men and women have never been married and never had children, the women earn 17% more than what never-married men that never had children earn; even when you control for number of years in the workplace, the amount of education, and life of time—and other factors like that. That has been true, to a lesser degree, it was 13%, in the 1970s.

For 44 years we've had that pay gap—longer than that—between never-married men and women who have never had children because when women have not been married, never been married and never had children, they tend to focus more on their careers. And when men have never been married and never had children, we tend to focus more on job fulfillment; being the artist, being the writer, being somebody like me that doesn't make a lot—that usually doesn't make a lot of money; by doing that type of thing. That's why we hear words like "starving artist."

The reason I feel the "pay gap" needs to be so high on the list is because that's the first place where a woman's mind goes to as proof that men really have organized this world in a way to benefit men at the expense of women. And more importantly, when women find out each of the 25 decisions that leads to higher pay, all 25 behaviors and work–life decisions that men and women make—all 25, every one of them, lead to men earning more money and women having a more balanced life, that is, a happier life, usually.

And what is the purpose of pay? The purpose of pay is ideally to have a happy life. So if the purpose of pay is to have a happy life, and women have more balanced lives which usually means happier lives, then, really, men should be learning from women, not women learning from men. But there are women who want to focus on career. My wife loves the work that she does; and so—when she—the excitement of that—so what women also need to know is, what leads to higher pay, should they wish to have higher pay?

So the "pay gap," when you understand it, it doesn't only help people feel better about the way the structure of the workplace is set up, it also helps women know that if pay is their focus, there are 25 specific things that they can do to earn more money. But each of those things comes with trade-offs. You can—if you're not educated, you can as a rule earn more money as a garbage-collector than you could earn even as an art historian. But you may or may not wish to get up at three in the morning in Michigan and collect garbage. Now, the people who do that earn more money in relation to the amount of their education.

What looking at the "pay gap" helps us understand is that—is the underlying definition of power that men have bought falsely, brought falsely, adapted falsely. And that definition is, feeling obligated to define power, feeling obligated to earn money that often somebody else spends while we die sooner. And if I started a women's empowerment workshop, of which I've conducted many, and if I started that out by saying, "I'm going to teach all the women here today how to be more empowered—I'm going to teach you how to feel obligated to earn more money that somebody else spends while you die sooner—" you know where I would be.

The fourth issue I'm going to prioritize, you're going to be most surprised with. It's communication.

And communication is obviously not just a men's issue. It's a men's and women's issue.

But the reason it's so important is because every time feminists speak, or AVfM speaks, there's a propensity to distort what the other person says, and then to argue with the distorted version that the other person never meant to begin with! And when Arabs or Israelis speak, it's the same problem. When mothers and fathers and women and men speak, it's the same problem. And when I … in 30, 40 years of working with couples, one of the things that I've found is that I've never had somebody say to me, 'Warren, I want a divorce! My partner understands me!'

And I realize that if I could put, not a diamond ring on somebody, but if I could put, inside of my psyche, the ability to have compassion for and understand the person who was speaking with me, I would be a better husband than I would if I had the biggest diamond in the world to give my wife.

The problem with that is, while everyone agrees with me, no one knows how to do it; because, biologically, when we heard criticism, we fear that there would be an enemy. And in order to survive, our biological response to the criticism had to be to put up defenses; or, better yet, kill the enemy before the enemy kills us! And when we're criticized by our wife or husband, that's what we want to do, we want to kill them before they kill us! That's functional for survival, but exactly the processes that were functional for survival are dysfunctional for love and dysfunctional for intimacy. And so I said before that our genetic heritage is in tension with our genetic future. That's what I mean. We got here by surviving; but we need to … we've upped the ante. Now we not just need to be role-mates, we have the potential to be soul-mates. And soul-mates require the ability to listen to each other; to listen to each other until we say that—the other person says, "I feel completely understood." If I interrupt Liz and say, "I understand," what I'm doing is saying, "Shut up." She has to tell me she feels understood.

So how do we do that? We do that—because biologically we're programmed to respond defensively to criticism, and we respond more defensively the more we love somebody because the more we love somebody, the more vulnerable we feel. The more vulnerable we feel, the more likely we are to get angry, not be centered; anger is just vulnerability's mask. We get angry at the people that reject us that we love, not the people that reject somebody that we don't love …

A woman calls a guy, a guy and a woman go out at night, and the guy does not call back in the morning; if the woman calls the man a jerk for not coming back, you know that she had interest in him. If she didn't have interest in him, she'd be calling it "relief" that he didn't call back.

When we call people names, when we cut them off like that, it's because it hurts less to be rejected by an object than it does to be rejected by a human being. Construction workers call women, whistle at women, they treat women as sex objects because it hurts less to be rejected by somebody that they know is going to reject them. They are not worthy of that beautiful woman walking by the construction site, so they objectify her. When a woman calls a man a jerk, it's because she felt that that man evaluated her as not being, she not being worthy of him.

And so—if we have such deeply engaged resistance to being able to hear others, especially when they love us, what do we do with that? We do a work—so one of the things that I do with couples in my couples workshop is I develop a workaround, to be able to work around the biological propensity to be defensive when you're criticized; to be able to hear people and to associate the criticism with love, an opportunity to be loved. But how do I do that? By creating an altered space. No one can do that in a natural space. You have to meditate yourself into a space where you are receptive to associating "being criticized" with being loved. That meditation takes at least a 10- to 15-hour training for people to learn how to do. It means separating out the week so you have two hours of the week in caring-and-sharing mode, and 166 other hours in a conflict-free zone. You have to know how to deal with the conflict-free zone when conflict comes up.

Those are the types of things that, when we work on them, for men and for women, we begin to solve domestic violence—because domestic violence is not about power; domestic violence is about a momentary act of power designed for an underlying experience of powerlessness. So the solution to domestic violence is to not tell men

"give up your power"; the solution to domestic violence is telling, is teaching both sexes how to feel empowered by, and how to empower, the other gender. And their children. And their parents.

That's why communication is so important.

Now I'm going to go from being a nice guy to being a tougher guy.

Issue number five: Men's Studies.

150,000 women a year take Women's Studies courses. When you or I contact the media, if they're focused on gender issues, to a large degree, a very high percentage of them have a Women's Studies background. And so when I am being interviewed by NPR, even if I spend three hours with the associate producer and convince her that there really is legitimacy to men's issues, she summarizes in bullet points my talk, and her producer says, "The guy's crazy, and you were just too weak to see his craziness. You were too weak to see his manipulativeness. And so, therefore, no … no go." And so, we're up against a huge wall there.

Now, so what do we do if there's Men's Studies courses, er, Women's Studies courses, in virtually every university in the industrialized world, and virtually no Men's Studies courses that are real Men's Studies courses, the type of Men's Studies we're talking about here; just feminist "men's studies" courses in universities?

I finished a game of tennis, some years ago, with a guy; we both belong to the same think-tank. And when we finished, he said, "What do you do?" And I told him about what I do, and he said, "Wow! That is fascinating!" And I said, What do you do? And he said, "I'm the president of Northwestern University." And I said, I'm fascinated that you're fascinated by these issues—people are always fascinated at people that are fascinated with them … And I said, Are you interested in maybe being the first university in the world that brings men's issues—into Northwestern University? And his response was, "And have me fired?" And I said, How's that? I think I knew how that was … but he said, "Because the feminists would have me up on a stake within hours." And this was just the beginning of social-media time.

And so I said—so I reversed the question; I said, Is there anything that we could do to bring Men's Studies to Northwestern University? Without even missing a beat, he said, "Of course. Sue me. Sue the university." And I said, Tell me more! He said … "If you sued me, I'd have to bring Men's Studies into the university, and I would be a hero because I was avoiding a lawsuit. And I'd be able to say to the feminists, we had to do this, in order to be able to … to not be sued. And if we were sued, we'd end up having to do things like eliminate the Women's Studies program. So we have a choice—we can either eliminate the Women's Studies program or bring in an equal-but-opposite Men's Studies program, that really is a Men's Studies program."

And so, I said, any other complications? And he said, "Yes. You have to have standing." And standing means that you have to have somebody at that university who really wants a Men's Studies program. So part of what we can do, if we make Men's Studies an issue, is recruit men and women on college campuses to be, to file for a Men's Studies program. Maybe they'll succeed, and just get it. But if they don't succeed—they want it, and there's a group of two or three or four men and/or women, who want a Men's Studies program that is a legitimate program on the college campus, and they don't respond—now we have a Title IX issue. Now we have, also, a potential violation, if it's a state university, a violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Now we have something to work with—but here's the big issue with Men's Studies. Once this happens at one university, particularly in states like California or Texas—once it happens at one university, all the universities—which are usually comprised of academics, who usually have a great deal of fear and not that much courage … they are going … they tend to respond by saying, "Omigod, we've got to get our act together—we've gotta—we've got to do this." And so one successful lawsuit at a significant university will have a ripple effect, as the coin that you've created for our us—has on that coin, a beautiful picture of a ripple effect—will have a ripple effect at every university in this country. That is, every university that gets any federal funding, which is about 97% of universities in this country. But what happens in the United States also happens in the entire world, usually. And so this will have—one university, one group of three or four students, can have a ripple effect across the entire world.

That's why I believe it should be in the top 10 men's issues.

Number six is a men's birth control pill.

Yes … And this is not just because Carnell Smith is here.

We've often heard, I think correctly so, that a women's pill was probably the single greatest instrument of freedom for women in the 20th century. I would say that's a pretty reasonable assessment. But it's interesting that we have been within just a hair's reach of being able to develop a men's pill for more than 30 years. I wrote about this in one of my early books, wrote about it before The Myth of Male Power, about—I went around to scientists and found, was a men's pill viable? And the answer was yes.

So I went to pharmaceutical companies and said, Why are you not doing this? The scientists now have the ability to create a men's birth control pill … "We're not sure that the men really want one, or th-th-that there's much of a market for one. We're not willing to, sort of, invest in the whole distribution and advertising." And my response was—are you kidding? And the pharmaceutical companies responded, "You show me, you know—we haven't received a hundred letters, from men, in the last decade, asking for that."

When women want something, women speak up. When men want something … we keep it to ourselves. And then we wonder why pharmaceutical companies can't hear what men don't say. We need to speak up. That's why A Voice for Men is one of the most perfect titles, and this is one of the most perfect forums, to begin that process.

Number seven: men's health intelligence.

Notice I didn't say men's mental health, or men's physical health, but men's health intelligence.

The reason we are so unintelligent in terms of health is because every society that survived, survived based on its ability to train its sons to be disposable. Disposable at work; as warriors; disposable, I'm sorry, disposable in war, as warriors; disposable at work, as firefighters, as workers on oil rigs, and so on, coal miners; and indirectly, therefore, disposable as dads.

Now, if your survival is dependent upon your disposability, that means your disposability keeps you alive as a nation. Not your—the health of the boy. If you train a boy to be worried about his health, worried about hurting himself, that doesn't lead to a boy who's willing to risk himself—his disposability, to go to war. If I'm trained to really care about you, and love you—and I do go to war—and you die, your blood is spattered all over me—I go into major trauma. If I learn to not care about you, I go into much less trauma.

The degree to which men learn to love, the degree to which we learn to think of ourselves, the degree to which we learn to ask for help—health, and help for ourselves—is the degree to which we were hesitant to be disposable; therefore, we jeopardize the survival of the country. So, what was functional for the health of a nation was dysfunctional for the health of a boy.

And so, that is why we are unwilling to talk about mental health issues. This is why, when boys and girls are 9 years of age, we commit suicide at exactly the same rate. But as boys learn, get the hormones, and the socialization of masculinity, how do we evolve? We evolve by the age of 10 to 14, as we get the beginnings of masculinity, we commit suicide twice as much as girls. Between the ages of 15 to 19, four times as much. Between the ages of 20 and 25, five times as much. So we are, as we learn to—"When the going gets tough, the tough get going," not when the going gets tough, we have five or six ways to express our feelings, like Tom Golden talks about, or other ways to directly express our feelings. We don't learn the different modalities that are both comfortable for us as traditional men and comfortable for us as less-traditional men, to express feelings, or to be able to act it out, or be able to honor, or to be able to do the other things that Tom so articulately talked about yesterday.

When we have a nation that hasn't rethought through its disposability propensities for boys, what we have is boys out there saying—girls out there saying, "Cheerleaders! First and 10, do it again! First and 10, do it again!" And what are the women saying to the guys? They're saying to the guys, "First and 10 … do it again?" Risk spinal-cord injuries, risk concussions, risk shoulders dislocated, and still play! If you have a dislocated shoulder—I remember watching a college game, where the newspeople were saying, “Isn’t it incredible that Joe, with a dislocated shoulder, is still tossing the football so accurately?” Well, he should be calling the doctor! Not tossing a football. But we are honoring him for risking further damage to himself.

NFL means “Not For Long” for a reason. Because the people who are rewarded, and are the heroes of women and men, all around the world, they are people who don’t often live for long; who are often walking around barely able to walk at the age of 50; and the very thing that they were honored for is exactly the thing that they’re weakest in.

We need to question this. We need to question this at every level of society. We need to question, Why is it that men die five years sooner than women, when we used to die, in 1920, only one year sooner than women? And very few people a) know that; and b) despite the fact that we die earlier of all 10 leading causes of death, there are seven Federal Offices of Women’s Health, and zero Federal Offices of Men’s Health. That is the type of issue that will need to be surfaced; that is also sue-able; that is not—Men do not get due process, men do not get equal protection, when we don’t have equal protection in the very most important area, which is living.

That’s number seven; number eight is coming up.

2009: President Obama’s just elected. I get a phone call. Picked up the phone, a woman says, “We understand that you were on the board of directors for the National Organization for Women, for a number of years. President Obama has just formed a White House Council on Women and Girls. We’d like you to be an adviser to the council. Would you like to be?” I said, Of course! And she says—I said, Before you hang up, is it possible, perhaps, that you could have a White House Council on Men and Boys as well? And she says, “Huh?” And I go—I explained a few reasons, and she said, “Oh—never thought of that. Interesting.” But she said, “Actually, though, I am in charge of filling councils that already exist. I have no authorization to actually create councils on my own.” I said, I totally understand that. If I created a proposal for a council, would you be open to looking at it? And she says, “Yeah—well—I’d look at it, sure.” And I said, “Would you pass it on to, maybe, receptive people inside the White House?”

“Yeah, I can do that, I can do that.”

And so, I decided that I didn’t really want to do that. I wanted to get the top 30 people in the country that I could think of, that were authors on boys’ issues, that were … people who were Liberals, people who were Conservatives, people who were practitioners like the head of the Boy Scouts; people who wrote about these things in a different way, for a different type of audience, like that of men’s health; people like Tom Golden, who are practitioners, counselors, that are actually working on these issues. I got all of these people together, for a period of 18 months—you can imagine when you have Libertarians, Conservatives, and Liberals, all on one council, what these dialogues were like—with, sometimes, 25 or 30 people. Tom is shaking his head because he remembers some of these discussions! But we finally hammered out a very significant proposal to create a White House Council on Boys and Men.

When we did it, it got—basically, long story short—went nowhere. It almost went somewhere, many times; but always at the last second, there was somebody that knocked it out of the agenda to actually present it to President Obama. Somebody that, five minutes before, it was on their agenda; they were going to be seeing President Obama five minutes later.

Why do we need a White House Council on Boys and Men? Because boys and men are having problems in almost every single area. We’re falling behind girls and women educationally, economically … when we fall behind economically and educationally, I don’t know a lot of women who are that interested in marrying men in the unemployment lines. And so this affects not only our sons, but also our daughters; also marriages; and therefore, whether children will grow up in intact families. The reason—one of the most incredible statistics—the reason, a few years ago, 53% of women who had children, had children without being married, is because many of those women could not find men who earned a decent living; and that often translates, for many women, into “I just don’t want to take care of another child.”

And so, when a man doesn't earn decent money, it has an impact not only on the man, not only on the woman, but on the ability of children to have a father in that child's life; and therefore, on the ability of the boy to see that he has a role model of something; some person who can be respected and can be productive. A boy who looks at a role model of a father that's disowned, that is put down—he is not a boy who feels he has much of a future. He's a boy that goes adrift. He's a boy that gets lost. He's a boy that has no sense of purpose. And that is what we have today.

So the White House Council on Boys and Men has, deals with many issues—because boys and men are dealing with many issues, and many issues are being dealt with in different departments of the government—it's crucial for the White House to be able to coordinate that. But it's also crucial for the White House not just to be the government as substitute savior. It's also important for the White House to conduct an interactive relationship with private companies that also do work. And the White House is doing that, now, with Brother's Keeper and with the White House Council on Women and Girls. But with adult white males … it is doing nothing.

That's number eight, and number nine …

Feel this building.

This is the building of men who are the ultimate in being willing to be disposable.

What we don't know about these men is that recently, in the war in Iraq and Afghanistan … for each man who was killed in the war in Iraq and Afghanistan, the number who were killed by suicide is 25. Twenty-five that killed themselves by suicide, for each one that died in the war, through war-related means. More men died of suicide that have been in the war in Iraq and (Afghanistan), in one year, than were killed in the wars themselves in all of the years combined.

What we are saying from that message is, "When we need you, we will use you. But if you happen to survive the process, we don't care. We are willing to invest money to get you the equipment, to buy you the best of this and that. But when you've finished your job of serving, if you haven't died on the outside, we don't care what happens on the inside."

When we don't care what happens on the inside, we are making the ultimate statement about the continued investment that we have in male disposability … in the cruelest of ways.

The good news is that if we make veterans' care a major issue, Conservatives can understand that. Traditional men can understand that. And almost all men and women can understand that. And we give our sons a message that if you do join the military, you will be cared for as a human being, not just as a "human doing."

Number 10, and last: men's image.

"Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them." Could be made up by anybody. But when it was made up, it started out as a postcard. Then it became a T-shirt. Then it became a hat. Then it became an industry.

I don't have any problem with anything really terrible being said by anybody. I don't have a problem with Hitler, I have a problem with the people that agreed with him. Because it takes more—if no one agreed with Hitler, then there would not be any Hitler as we know Hitler.

When somebody produces terrible words, I don't have a problem with it; I have a problem with the atmosphere of the country supporting those words, so that it takes those words and translates that into an industry.

I have a problem with the Dallas Rapid Transit—the DART—that you heard here yesterday. I have a problem with them having a picture of a boy, saying, "When I grow up, I will kill my wife," or a Black girl saying, "When I grow up, my husband will kill me." And I have a problem with the fact that we don't understand why that picture on the DART poster was a picture of a White boy; because if a Black boy was saying, "When I grow up, I will kill my wife," we would immediately understand, see, explain, and be really infuriated at the racism. Because, over the last 30 or 40 years, we're not free from racism, but at least we've begun to recognize it on that level of obnoxiousness.

But a White boy—when he says it, we did not see the sexism. We didn't see the sexism to the degree that the poster was funded, that the poster went through the city council, it went through public employees, and people posted it on the buses; and until there were complaints from A Voice for Men, it wasn't taken down. That tells you the embedded sexism in this country; that tells you the degree to which there is an image problem, for boys and for men, that we need to address.

The good news about men's image, as an image problem, is that I find that as I go through a lot of things, aside from boys' issues … that after boys' issues, people are able to look at that DART poster, look at the "Men are stupid throw rocks at them" … They can see that "Jews are greedy, throw rocks at them," "Blacks are stupid, throw rocks at them," "Women are stupid, throw rocks at them" … they can see the sexism in that pretty quickly. And that gets them on board to a common desire to have some justice, to have some compassion, to have some caring. And we need to bring that common desire aboard.

All this translates into the issues that I have discussed … when those issues are dealt with, they will deal, they will take care of solving problems and issues I haven't discussed. When we deal with communication issues, we will deal with a lot of the problems that lead to "date rape" and sexual harassment. When we deal with communication issues, we will deal with a lot of the problems that lead to domestic violence out of people not feeling heard.

So let's look at our names. "A Voice for Men" is a great name because people understand that men have not spoken up. People understand that women can't hear what men don't say. People understand that the shadow side of masculinity is the lack of a voice, the lack of expressing feelings. I think it would also be helpful to have subsections, called A Voice for Boys, and A Voice for Dads, and A Voice for Women Who Care About a Voice for a Voice for Men, Boys, and Dads.

Let's look at the term "men's rights activist." Here is the challenge of men's rights activists: You know and I know that men do need rights. We need the right to equal parenting; we need the right to not be registered—the only gender registering for the draft. We need the right to Men's Studies. We recognize that all of these lack of rights are total violations of the Fourteenth Amendment, and often of due process.

But "men's rights" is a tougher-than-necessary fight, in a world that believes that "men made the rules and have all the rights to begin with." It's like asking for kings' rights. That's the first challenge that comes to us. So we call ourselves "men's rights activists"; the average person, particularly the average Liberal, is going, "Aggghh!" And the average Conservative is going, "Men don't complain!" And so it's like—we're going back to the thing I mentioned in the beginning: It taps into the biological resistance. It's a salmon swimming upstream. We have so many valid issues, we don't need to start by swimming upstream. We need a little help, down a good hill, to get us going.

I think a better way of framing ourselves is "men's issues activists." Jim … And we've called this a Men's Issues Conference. And so, we are on the road to that. Jim, in my workshop the other day, said that "men's issues activist" had also the advantage of being "MIA," and men's issues are definitely missing in action.

Or we can call ourselves, more generically, "an advocate for boys' and men's liberation"—becoming part of a gender liberation movement. And then that helps people to see what's been left out. Very few people can argue that "gender" means "two genders." And there hasn't been a boys' and men's liberation movement … Something's missing.

It's easier for people to join the fight for what's needed than for what it appears we already have.

In the final analysis, we don't need a women's movement blaming men. We don't need a men's movement … and we don't need a men's movement either fearful of or blaming women. We need an understanding that, throughout all of history, both sexes have roles; both sexes have obligations; both sexes have responsibilities. Neither sex had "rights." The job of a mother and a dad was exactly the same: they wanted their children to have lives that were better than theirs, and they would sacrifice their lives—whether it was a Chinese interned laborer, building our railroad, or someone going into our military. They sacrificed their life with the hope that—what? Their children's lives would be better than their lives. Mothers and dads are in the same boat. We care, we love each other, we love our children. This is not a time for a men's rights or a women's rights movement; it is a time for a gender liberation movement, helping roles go from the rigid roles of the past to more flexible and fluid roles that recognize the individuality of all of us, individually, in the future.

Thank you.

Male survivors and the empathy apartheid: The root of the “Speak to Me” radio play

Tim Pylypiuk · 12 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Never in all my years as a writer and performance artist have ambitions lofty as this possessed me.

Think of it: A radio play, in seven parts no less, on Internet radio, about a male survivor of sexual abuse from male and female perpetrators, with justice turning a blind eye toward the latter and the ensuing growing pains plaguing the survivor and his supposed support circle, called “Speak to Me.” Then turning that play into “Speak to Me Rundown,” a distillation of the main plot now complete with the epilogue, aired on Naturally Autistic ANCA Radio, Saturday, August 9, 2014, 3 p.m. Pacific Time.

Going from autistic people to male victims of sexual abuse seemed an unexpected leap for me.

But circumstances have a weird way of pushing you in alternative directions.

The real, raw genesis of this enterprise began when I was 32 years old. The moment when life tilted on its axis, taking me with it.

One session with my psychiatrist, along with a glimpse into my high school days: tumultuous, chaotic, a sliding scale going up and down. In my case, it seemed to frequently occupy the lower rungs more so than the limitless skies.

When I recounted, and biologically sensed, those negative experiences with girls and women who hurt me as a team with those boys and men, I was never the same again. My guess is that part of me brushed aside the former in favor of unrequited rage toward the latter.

Added to this the reality that hit me, close-fisted, in the jaw with a mean left hook: No information, support, or acknowledgement in the arena of girls and women dealing equal amounts of physical and psychological damage to boys and men. All of it centered keenly on genders either harming their own or males harming females. (Save for one study on the subject, titled “Boys Don’t Tell on Sugar and Spice and Not-So-Nice Girls.” However, the citations and research were so outdated that it did nothing to assuage me.)

Hope fleeting, I went through various stages of anger directed toward those horrible girls and women along with society for its failure to consider this visible aspect of untoward harm. I had already come to terms with what the boys and men did by this point, since it was all too easy for people to decry this form of trauma like a force of habit.

Along the way, I fell into the bosom of a human spectrum who had endured horrific forms of abuse from women (sexual, physical, and mental) and girls in their lives: male victims and survivors. At first, I had misgivings about fitting in properly, since their stories clearly superseded mine in terms of serious harm.

What changed all that was the discovery of the core issue slumbering underneath that was driving them: abused men at the hands of a gender that society falls on its knees to protect from the consequences of their crimes. I had finally found a safety net.

But I was still fuming at the sizable gap of information and support for my situation. Ultimately, I decided to write an article on my experiences and confront it: “Bullied by Girls and Women: One Man’s Account.”

That article details every incident that affected me the most and further specifies what I faced when telling the story to others.

It received a generous endorsement from varied walks of life but not much else compared with others. Nonetheless, I felt accomplished.

The celebration died down when reality hit me again with a mean right hook: my article was the ONLY one of its kind, floating aimlessly in a sea of narrative befitting the status quo.

Then another idea crawled inside me. Based on the confessions I had read over the years from male victims and survivors online and elements of my own past recognized via self-reflection, I desired to give back by conceiving a project to express their struggles louder.

Thus, “Speak to Me” was born.

The story of male sexual abuse survivor Kevin Holtz, a tattoo artist’s apprentice and artist himself, started as a long, detailed synopsis originally titled “Silent Minority.” Billed as a “Narratory Performance Piece,” the early incarnation mapped out the characters, their interactions, plot points, metaphors, themes, and underlying morality beneath the epic scope I had envisioned, with Kevin narrating the entire thing and physically acting out key events through interactions with invisible people before a live audience (I would play the part of Kevin).

This was before the advent of “radio drama” on Blogtalkradio.com. One of the people who bankrolled the station Naturally Autistic ANCA Radio (who was also my employer) thought up an idea to bring back the days when people would derive entertainment listening to old radio plays read by professionals. Hosting this program fell into my lap and I accepted the position, the difference being full creative control with the ability to produce my own material along with adapting works of others in the community.

In 2013, having polished up my skills, I set to work adapting “Silent Minority” to script format with a specific goal in mind: every myth propagated, every misconception pushed, every stereotype paraded by society and ignorant special interest groups would get the lashings they deserved. I cared naught for length since no form of media, to my knowledge, had ever attempted a story of this magnitude.

The adaptation process was slow and steady: one script per section of the synopsis that expanded on the ideas in it. What proved tough was writing out the ending as, at the time I started hosting Radio Drama, finishing the synopsis fell through. Luckily, my mental storage units housed just enough material for the general idea. It also helped that I could feel the ending repeatedly, even in my sleep.

After the script was complete, I and my cohorts, Phoebe Murer and Maria Iliou, performed it. Until finally, the length had reached seven parts by the last episode’s broadcast.

The response was slow but built steadily through archive listens and downloads.

“Speak to Me” did its job, granting male survivors a chance to be heard in a world that offered little to no solace they could count on. As was my intention, since I’m no stranger to advocacy myself with two live performance pieces in my portfolio, “Speak for Myself” and “Speaking for Ourselves,” about being autistic.

This, however, went beyond autism into the realm of human nature in general—my first attempt at advocating for a segment of the human population whose majority wasn’t autistic.

Now here we are with the “Speak to Me Rundown” series that turned into three parts due to time constraints, where we’d ended up stopping abruptly after our emergency third hour expired on the show. It’s a distillation of the main plot with none of the thematic and subplot fat present in the seven episode mini-serial form. I did this in protest of how the media and special interest groups took the Elliot Rodger killings that affected both genders and turned them into something specific only to women. And in protest, primarily, of this empathy apartheid toward people like myself who were harmed by women and girls, behavior that continues to reign freely in this world.

I have my periods where this scourge triggers me when people lend credence to the harms of women and girls on boys and men, indirectly or bluntly. “Speak to Me” fights this part uncensored and without remorse for politically correct sensibilities. And I have no regrets.

Only a promise: a story that, in the end, is universal if you’re willing to dig deep. You’ll find this in all my work, even tales that fight the tides and times, stomping over venerable populations with steel-toed boots.

I assure you this will never change.

Enjoy the ride.

Editorial note: The entire audio play can be heard here: Part 1, Part 2, & Part 3.

Did all men really have all the power throughout history?

AVfM Video Source · 12 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We don't know about you, but we're really sick of the lie that men had all the power throughout history. It's not just a hateful lie about men, it's a condescending view of the women of history.

http://youtu.be/hhcd7kp0HJ4

If you want more like this, you may want to subscribe to Vindicator.

Feminism against historical women

Jack Barnes · 13 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The ignorance of feminists in regard to history, women's history in particular, will come as no surprise to any seasoned Men's Human Rights Advocate (MHRA), anti-feminist, and/or non-feminist. This willful ignorance is a necessary part of the mental process that allows women to believe that they were and still are victims of men's oppression. In order for feminists to continue to dupe the public, they must ignore and hide the achievements of strong and self-empowered women throughout history. I don't intend to allow feminists to erase these women from the pages of history. These are the women that girls like my daughter should be admiring and are the ones feminists seek to erase. This is just one of the many ways feminism hurts women and girls.

For the past several months I have been examining the women's suffrage in the United States. What I found was a bucket of worms that I still haven't been able to untangle. It seems, surprise-surprise, that women's right to vote is far more complicated than feminists would have us believe. For the sake of brevity I will only briefly touch on women's voting rights and female elected officials. However, my search, in which every answered question leads to three more, has uncovered many female historical figures that feminists wished hadn't existed. These are the women I would like to concentrate on in this article.

For most of the history of the United States, the life of the average man or woman was far from easy. It consisted of working from before daybreak to long after sunset during the spring, summer, and fall to plant, grow, and harvest enough food to last you through the winter. The mere struggle for survival was all that most people had time to worry about. The only exception to this were the wealthy. They had time on their hands to contemplate things other than "What do I have to do today so I can eat tomorrow?' If we are to believe feminists, then all women were chained to a wood-burning stove while their husbands led a life of ease and luxury. Setting aside the blatant bigotry in that statement and the disregard for the hardships that men faced alongside their wives, this statement is historically false.

Yes, feminists, I just called you a bunch of damn liars. As with most men, most women could only worry about survival. That's literally all they had time for. However, those few women who were lucky enough to be able to have spare time on their hands and had the drive to get up off their privileged asses and do something besides drink tea excelled in their endeavors and accomplished great things.

You will hear many battle cries from feminists attempting to shame modern women into pledging allegiance to the ideology of hatred and violence known as feminism.

Here are a few:

"Women had no voice in government before feminism."
"Women weren't allowed to go to school."
"Women couldn't read before feminism."
"Women had no legal rights before feminism."
"Women couldn't own property before feminism."
"Women couldn't even have an opinion before feminism."

The list goes on and on, but you get the idea.

Before we delve into evil and oppressive HIStory to find the truth, we must define what feminism is and when it began.

Feminism is an ideology. All feminism is based on something called "patriarchy theory." Patriarchy theory is the idea that all men oppressed all women for all of human history, even until this day. This oppression always benefited men at the expense of women, according to feminists. The beginning point of feminism is the Seneca Falls Convention of 1848. This is where we see feminism first expressed through the Declaration of Sentiments.

Sure, there were rumblings of feminism before 1848, most notably as expressed in the “Tender Years Doctrine,” which established female superiority in child custody–and which women fought for.

However, the Seneca Falls Convention was the point where patriarchy theory was revealed to be the driving force behind the movement. It is at this point where we can make a distinction between the feminist movement and an equal rights for women movement as being two separate entities. Any feminists that disagree with this can shove off. You forfeited your right to define feminism when you decided to manipulate the definition at will to suit your purpose at any given time. The “that’s not my feminism’ or “that’s not real feminism” has been used to protect feminism from the words and actions of feminists to the point where feminism means anything you want and none of the things you don’t at any given time depending on whom you’re talking to and the what you are talking about. As a result, feminism means whatever anyone wants it to mean.

So now that we have defined feminism, we can look at what influences feminism has had on our society and when. The feminist movement was only interested in obtaining voting rights for women in the beginning. Any other accomplishments made by women prior to 1920 that were not related to voting rights are not feminist accomplishments. Again, feminists, if you don’t like the definition of your movement, that’s too bad. The history of your movement is not yours to write since it is obvious that you cannot distinguish facts from feelz.

Here are just a handful of great women who owe absolutely nothing to feminists or feminism. These women existed long before the United States even existed, but for the sake of brevity I will focus only on the U.S. and the preceding colonies. What follows is far from a complete list of women’s accomplishments before feminism:

- Margaret Brent immigrated to the Maryland Colony in 1638. Brent brought with her a land grant for 70 acres. She later acquired 1,000 additional acres from her brother. Brent appeared in court several times to argue her own case against her debtors.

- Anne Bradstreet was the first published female author. Her book of poetry, The Tenth Muse, Lately Sprung Up in America, was published in 1650.

- Anne Catherine Hoof Green ran her husband’s printing business after his death in 1767. In 1768, Green was named the official printer of the Maryland Colony.

- Mary Catherine Goddard had a long career as a printer, publisher, and postmaster. Goddard and her mother started working with her brother in his printing shop in Providence, RI, after her father’s death in 1762. Goddard played an active part in publishing the weekly Providence Gazette until 1768. She then joined her brother’s printing office in Philadelphia, where she managed the Pennsylvania Chronicle. In 1774, Goddard moved to Maryland to become the official publisher of Baltimore’s first newspaper. In January 1777, her paper published the first ever printed copy of the Declaration of Independence. In 1775, Goddard became postmaster of Baltimore until 1789 when she was relieved against her will. A failed petition to have her reinstated was signed by over 200 of Baltimore’s leading businessmen.

- Mary Kies became the first woman to receive a patent in the United States in 1809.

- Catherine Elizabeth Brewer, by virtue of alphabetical order, became the first woman to graduate from college. She was one of 11 women who received their diploma on July 16, 1840, from what is now Wesleyan College.

- Elizabeth Blackwell was the first woman to become a medical doctor. She graduated from Geneva Medical College in 1847.

- Ellen H. Swallow was admitted to M.I.T. in 1871. Three years later she earned a B.S. degree in chemistry.

- Mary Harris Jones, a.k.a. Mother Jones (1837?- 1930), whose life of standing up and speaking out for causes she believed in is far too notable to be condensed into a couple of sentences. People may disagree with her politics, but everyone can agree that she was a leader and that she played a major role in labor reform. I must say that her ideas on feminism made me chuckle.

These are just a small sample of a large group of women who worked hard and achieved great things. I wonder how they did all of this while being chained to an iron stove, without being able to read or write, go to school, legal rights, a voice in the government, owning property, and while not being able to have an opinion? Feminist stupidity … it burns!!

No thinking person would deny that women deserved more rights than they had for most of U.S. history. However, those same people would also see that women weren't the only ones trapped in restrictive gender roles and imprisoned by economic conditions. Economic conditions that were both man-made and a natural result of building a new nation. Yes, women needed a movement for their rights. But no one needed feminism. No one needed a movement to turn women against men as men were often times slaving away under similarly restrictive conditions. No one needed a supremacist movement like feminism. Despite what social justice warriors would have you believe, you can't create equality using discrimination. No one needed a movement that blamed the very men who were suffering right alongside the women they loved. That is like Black women blaming Black men for slavery.

No one needed a movement that advocated equal rights for one group without equal responsibility. No one needed a movement that would erase the women listed above, along with the many who aren't, just to maintain a lie of victimhood. A lie of victimhood that serves no other purpose than to maintain control. The lie of victimhood that allows feminists to manipulate the good intentions of a well-meaning public into giving all women a superior position in our society. What we need is more women who will be the strong and empowered women that feminism claims women should be. We need the women who will become CEOs, inventors, and political figures by their own drive and determination. Not women who want any easier road or a lightened load simply because they are women, all in the name of "equality."

We need to teach our girls and young women that anything is possible by showing them that a woman has already done it. Nothing can stop them if they want success badly enough. The proof is right there in the history books. Yes, we also need to teach them about feminism as an example of how not to gain true equality and real success.

Indentured servitude for men in Iran: The myth of patriarchal oppressive divorce

Ali Mehraspand · 13 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: This item, first published in December 2013, is being republished to add important information noting that the number of men in debtor's prison in Iran has been found to be higher than originally thought. –DE

This article is also available in Romanian and Farsi.

> "…effectively denying (Iranian) women the right to divorce and re-establishing men's unlimited right of divorce."[1]
>
> "A man may marry up to four wives and divorce them whenever he desires. But mere will is not enough for a(n Iranian) woman to divorce her husband."[2] penned by Shirin Ebadi, the only Iranian Noble-prize winner. (She received her Noble Peace Prize for her efforts in the field of issues of women and children.)
>
> "Iran's rising divorce rate is all the more noteworthy given the laws on divorce. While husbands are empowered to end their marriages in a matter of weeks without stating any reason, women must establish sufficient grounds for divorce in a process that can take several years, even with professional legal advice… (women) facing such an uneven playing field…" [3]NY Times.

A quick search on the internet will tell you how much women are discriminated against in Iran when it comes to divorce. They will tell you that men have the absolute right to end marriage, and women cannot divorce their husbands if they wish. Some radical gynocentrists even tell you that a woman cannot divorce even if her husband beats her every day. So what do all these statements have in common? You can't precisely find the similarity, because it is not just what they say; it is also what they don't say. By the end of this article you have to decide for yourself how appalling these statements are.

When a couple decides to get married in Iran, upon registering their marriage, they announce to officials an amount of wealth and property–that their families agreed on–which the husband is mandated to pay to his wife. This is called mehrieh or mahr. Furthermore, this is just the beginning: sit tight!

The most prominent attribute of mehrieh is its value. So how much is mehrieh in a country where your average worker earns around US$270 a month? According to the Center for Population Studies of Asia and Oceania the average of mehrieh during the period 2003 to 2008 have been 450 pure gold coins[4]. The center also announced the alarming rate of increase in mehrieh, so the average mehrieh must be higher now. What's more, the questionnaire only asked of the amount of gold in mehrieh, not the apartment buildings, lands, money, other statements in the marriage contract that may dictate the husband buy other things for his wife after they're married, etc.

What is more interesting is that the authorities do register all mehriehs in their books. Why the need to ask people when the registry offices do have the real data? Especially considering that the state has some stigma around high mehriehs and seems reluctant to reveal the real statistics.

Personally, I have rarely seen a woman whose mehrieh is lower than 1000 pure gold coins. But let's just go with the said 450 coins. How much is it? At the moment of this writing, 450 gold coins is roughly US$140,000. In the major metropolitan areas, mehrieh is often than not several million dollars. That is how insanely gynocentric this culture is.

Now, you are comparing this average on mehrieh with the monthly average salary of a worker, i.e. US$270, and thinking to yourself that this is impossible to pay. You are also perhaps confused and do not know what that has to do with divorce. Be patient. It is a little complicated, but it makes these simplistic suggestions made by the media and feminists scandalous.

A woman can demand her mehrieh any time she wants. Upon her suing for divorce, all the bank accounts of the accused are legally frozen and he cannot take one dime out of his bank account. He is no more allowed to sell or buy anything. Wait for the punch line:

What if he cannot pay the unbelievably high amount of mehrieh? “The Patriarchy” modified the law 2 years ago so as to go easier on men, but, let’s begin with the old law:

If the man could not pay, he would be sent to prison until the entire mehrieh was paid by him or his family. All his belongings, including his house, his land, his car, etc. would be confiscated by the court and sold as a part of mehrieh.

After decades of men being sent to prison at the whim of women, “the patriarchy” finally came up with the new law 2 years ago:

If the accused pays 110 gold coins (roughly US$34,000), one of his apartments (if he has any) won’t be confiscated, so he can at least live there. He will also be allowed to work to pay the rest of the debt monthly as ordered by the court. It is customary that the court orders the accused to pay two gold coins every month for the next several decades. That would be around US$615. A woman can live a luxurious life with that in Iran. The majority of working people earn less than that. Furthermore, he cannot leave the country until he has fully paid the mehrieh. All of this is only under the condition that the accused is proved to be working one job. If the court finds out that he works two jobs, he has to pay all of mehrieh right up-front.

The law was apparently changed to free many of the mehrieh prisoners whose families had already paid well over 110 gold coins to get their sons or brothers released from prison. After freeing many prisoners, the official statistics of mehrieh prisoners are as follows:

The chief of Iran’s Diah Center, Asadollah Jolayi, announced that last year, (Iranian’s year 1392), 20,000 men went to prison for their inability to pay Mehrieh [5].

This puts some myths in Iran’s culture to rest: When a man is in love, he is constantly asked by the family of his bride-to-be, “Who has ever paid mehrieh?” This is a shaming tactic to bring men into compliance for insanely high amounts of mehrieh which you better not believe.

Still too soon to get to divorce.

This is not the only financial responsibility of the husband. The husband is, by law, responsible for every dime spent in a marriage. According to Islamic law, the husband cannot ask his wife to spend a dime, or even consult her on how she can spend her money. Money for the expenses of life is called nafaqa, and the husband is mandated to give that money to his wife. She can sue her husband for not paying, and the court will order a monthly amount to be paid to the wife by her husband as her nafaqa.

Here is an even more interesting part: The amount of nafaqa depends on the class of the woman, but is mandated that it should not be lower than her standard of living prior to marriage. Meaning that if she used to have maids, the husband now should pay for maids. This helps to make it clear that in Iran, “deprivation” of a wife from her husband’s wealth is illegal. She doesn’t even need to sue further for mehrieh. While we are at it, in Islamic laws, a woman’s possession is her possession, but a man’s possession is the family’s possession.

This, by the way, is what feminists somehow forget to tell you, when they were screeching: “In Iran, sons receive twice as much inheritance as daughters in case of their parent’s death!”

Therefore, in a marriage, the woman is in for whatever resources her husband can provide, and she will not get much more out of her man by suing for her mehrieh. Rather, if needed, she can sue for her nafaqa.

So the unaffordability of mehrieh is actually a gun in her hands that any married woman can shoot any time she wants her husband in jail. This is apparently the “protection” of women in the old conservative cultures for every problem a woman might face in her marriage: Jail him by mehrieh! The equivalent of what is called alimony and child support in America is Nafaqa. There is no equivalent for mehrieh in the west. It is a debt the husband owes to his wife which is worth almost 200 years of salary. It is a slavery contract.

Do understand that mehrieh is leverage for almost anything desired, put in the hands of women.

So now we are ready to cross another feminist lie off the list:

"In Iran, women inherit 12.5% of their deceased husband's wealth but husbands inherit 25% of their deceased wife's wealth. No equality for women!" The rest of the inheritance by the way goes to children and parents.

Telling half the truth is a great way to lie, and I have got to admit, they are very good liars. Here is what was left out of the picture: mehrieh by law remains outstanding after death. Meaning:

- Should a man die, the first thing done by the state is to pay his wife's mehrieh out of the deceased's properties, and if anything remains, again 12.5% goes to his wife. (The rest goes to children and parents.)
- Should a woman die, her husband still has to pay her mehrieh to the deceased wife's family (the ones who are the deceased's next of kin), which almost always is much more than the 25% he inherits.

The net result is that a woman would inherit almost everything her husband had, whereas a man inherits almost nothing from his wife. All her inheritance goes to her family.

Finally, we get to divorce:

Men filing for divorce:

A man can indeed divorce his wife at any time. But this kind of divorce initiated by the husband is called Rojeie, meaning:

He is required to pay both the mehrieh and nafaqa. What's more, if the court does not find the wife at fault for the divorce, the man also might have to pay Ojrat almesl.

Women filing for divorce (Bayen Divorce):

Either she agrees to let off part of her mehrieh, an amount of money she did not deserve to begin with, as specified by the judge, in return for her right to divorce, or:

She can extort her full mehrieh and still have the right to divorce in case:

1. Husband is abusive.
2. Husband has committed polygamy without wife's consent.
3. Husband has not paid nafaqa for six months.
4. Husband has serious illness.
5. Husband is mentally ill.
6. Husband has not had sex with wife for six months.
7. Husband has a job for which the wife feels humiliated.
8. Husband is addicted.
9. Husband has not fathered a child during the first 5 years of marriage.
10. Husband is a criminal.
11. Husband is punished (by the legal system) for something about which wife feels humiliated.
12. Husband has been in prison for over 5 years.

In other words, if a man wants to divorce and his wife does not agree, he has to buy his way to freedom with a price that almost no man can pay.

Women on the other hand, will need to agree to lay off part of their mehrieh if their husband is not in the above categories, still perhaps get a lot of money, and move on. Think for a second what can happen with this so-called "equality" of right to divorce as defined by feminists: A woman can marry, file for divorce the next morning, and get mehrieh! Right now, if she wants to file for divorce the next morning, she will be asked by the judge to let go of part of her mehrieh, and if she does not consent, she is told that she only can get her entire mehrieh, if the husband is in one of the 12 above categories. For those who still cannot wrap their heads around this, it is not that women's mere will does not give them the right to divorce, but rather that their mere will is not enough for the right to divorce AND mehrieh.

Now, go back and read the statements in the beginning of this article. In a lack of mutual agreement for divorce, it is impossible for almost any men to initiate divorce in Iran. But hey, feminists tell us that men have "unlimited right to divorce," and that women need to build grounds to get both their Mehrieh and divorce simultaneously. But hey, they do not have the right to divorce because feminists said so, instead of saying that women do not have the right to both a divorce AND a mehrieh at the same time in the nonexistence of all of the 12 conditions above. How over 85,000 divorces occurred within the first 6 months of this year[5] which were mostly filed by women, is something they should ignore. After all, it does not fit well into the victim narrative.

The overall result is that you can meet many rich, divorced women who have not worked a single day in their lives. Their ex-husband is bound to pay them 2 gold coins monthly for the next several decades. She goes on trips with her new boyfriend while the ex-husband cannot leave the country.

Mehrieh fraud becomes a popular topic once in a while when some girl marries several men in less than a year and sues for mehrieh. But hey, to be fair, I am the one calling this a fraud, because many say that not paying mehrieh is the real fraud.[6] How about a little story? The story of a girl whose mehrieh was pure gold as much as she weighed. She sued for it as soon as it was recorded, before even planning for a wedding. The groom's family were awfully rich, paid her, and divorced her. In fact this kind of fraud does not even require the woman to have sex to consummate the marriage. Don't believe it? In case the couple have not had sex, the husband still has to pay half of mehrieh.

Speaking of frauds, it is not a bad time to mention another form of it: if a virgin has consensual vaginal sex, with a boy she can sue for mehrieh and claim that she assumed the boy wanted to marry her. Then the boy is wedded to her by force.

A logical solution to all this is to eliminate the unbelievably punitive financial ~~responsibility~~ slavery of men and give men and women equal rights to divorce. But feminists are not interested in that, because they know that women are already getting a much better deal in divorce than men:

> "…mere will is not enough for a(n Iranian) woman to divorce her husband."

This is what they claim, with no mention of mehrieh whatsoever! So according to Iranian feminists, women should be allowed to sue for mehrieh and nafaqa, extort an amount of money they did not earn to begin with, and their mere will should be enough for taking money and ending the marriage.

Such fine human rights activists they are. Men are in prison for mehrieh by the thousands, and feminists are whining for a draconian law that is no different from giving women the absolute guarantee of a lifelong servitude from a man.

Of course, women are already doing all this, by hiring lawyers to educate them on how to find legal ways to get their mehrieh and the right to divorce. Hell, they don't even need lawyers for that. If you are a woman and are not good at fabricating domestic violence, just provoke somebody enough to give you a slap. Next morning, you are in one of Iran's forensic centers with a woman issuing a passionate report to the chivalric judge, and bingo. Whatever your husband cannot pay in mehrieh, their family has to, in order to keep their son out of prison. But feminists do not like this as it might get time-consuming:

> "…women must establish sufficient grounds for divorce in a process that can take several years…" NY Times.

Note also how cleverly it is written: "it can take" not "it does take." Of course, if a woman has a forensic report for domestic violence, it is only a matter of weeks before she gets her divorce and extorts her mehrieh.

Even a woman who is a victim of domestic violence almost certainly does not deserve the extortion of mehrieh. Let's walk through the logic: if you kill a man, you have to pay blood money to his next of kin. This is called diah, and right now is US$40,000. But guess what? Mehrieh is much more expensive than that. The worth of a woman injured, or who even claims injury, is almost 10 times than that of a man's life!

This is their version of equality: they get funds and campaign for equality of right to divorce in Iran, yet somehow mentioning a draconian law like mehrieh, which is highly interwoven with the right to divorce, does not interest them at all.

But guys, be sure to let your issues be addressed by feminists, and meanwhile, just shut the fuck up.

Let it be clear that mehrieh is not a feminist-inspired law. It is a hard-core Islamic law that has given women of history the absolute right to throw their husbands in jail at their whim without having to come up with an explanation. But feminists have done nothing to fight mehriah or even acknowledge it. If you are paying alimony and child support, you might want to say "thank god I am not paying mehrieh and nafaqa."

Want to hear some propaganda? How about the one published in NY Times?

> "Iran's rising divorce rate is all the more noteworthy given the laws on divorce. While husbands are empowered to end their marriages in a matter of weeks without stating any reason, women must establish sufficient grounds for divorce in a process that can take several years, even with professional legal advice." NY Times.

Explanation of the stupidity of this sentence and the simplistic interpretation of a complicated set of laws should not at this point be needed, if you have bothered to read this article so far. But I'll say this: Up to this point in this article of NY Times, the author has not said a single word regarding mehrieh. He has already censored the truth about it several lines above this:

> "High dowries, high living costs, lack of jobs and financial support make young people fear marriage," said a member of Parliament (regarding the increase in divorce rates and decrease in marriage rates).

Another disingenous statement. What that member of the Parliament said was that high mehriehs, which are to be paid by the husband, cause fear of marriage. Not high dowries. Dowry is the set of household furniture that the family of the bride gifts to the couple. Why did the author translate it to say "dowry" instead of mehrieh? Maybe he was just getting feminist consults? Perhaps that he did not know what mehrieh was? No, he has heard of it, he mentions it around the end of the article:

> "Facing such an uneven playing field, marital lawyers say, Iranian women have increasingly turned to leveraging their legal right to a mehrieh — a single payment agreed on before marriage that constitutes a kind of Islamic marriage insurance. Husbands are obliged to pay this sum to wives when they divorce."

He leaves this to the very end, and the fallacy of confusing cause and effect is easily detected here. Also, the husband is obliged to pay mehrieh whenever the wife asks for it, so it is not a marriage insurance. As mentioned earlier, it is a slavery contract. Find any newspaper article in English about Iran's divorce laws. The ones that actually do mention mehrieh mention it in a minimal way to imply that this 1,400-year-old law has been recently added, as if to compensate for “women’s inequality.”

Now, who do you think really has the right to divorce in Iran? These laws seem to be there because divorce has historically been frowned-upon in Islamic philosophy. They were intended to complicate it. But in the modern Iran, attitudes have changed, and in the past decade, the rate of divorce has tripled. Recently, one out of each 7 marriages has ended in divorce, with the rate for metropolitan areas being almost 1 out of every 3.5 marriages. 30% of all divorces happen in less than a year from the date of the marriage.

Think about that for a second: there are men in Iran who now must pay several million dollars for putting their dicks in the wrong place for less than a year. In the past 5 years, things have changed so dramatically that some registry offices have been recording almost 50 divorces for every 3 marriages in a random month. One would wonder how many of these divorces have been filed by women, how many of them have taken all or part of their mehrieh, and how many Iranian families have lost every dime they had to a daughter-in-law who sued for mehrieh and got her divorce.

References:

---

[1] http://www.twnside.org.sg/title/iran-cn.htm

[2] http://www.theguardian.com/commentisfree/2009/oct/06/iran-women-rights-vote-discrimination

[3] http://www.nytimes.com/2010/12/07/world/middleeast/07divorce.html?pagewanted=all&_r=0

[4] http://www.mardomsalari.com/template1/News.aspx?NID=147503

In paragraph 5 it is written: A research carried in 1387 by the Center for Population Studies of Asia……has concluded that the average for Mehrieh has rised from 300 gold coins to 450 gold coins.

[5] http://alef.ir/vdccsoqsm2bqmx8.ala2.html?17txt

or: http://www.ghatreh.com/news/nn13034262/%D8%A2%D9%85%D8%A7%D8%B1-%D8%AA%D8%B5%D8%A7%D8%AF%D9%81%D8%A7%D8%AA-%D9%85%D9%86%D8%AC%D8%B1-%D9%85%D8%B1%DA%AF-%D8%AC%D8%A7%D8%AF%D9%87-%D8%A2%D8%B2%D8%A7%D8%AF%DB%8C-%D9%87%D8%B2%D8%A7%D8%B1-%D8%B2%D9%86%D8%AF%D8%A7%D9%86%DB%8C-%D8%BA%DB%8C%D8%B1%D8%B9%D9%85%D8%AF

Translation of the last part:

He [Iran’s Chief of Diah Center Assadollah Jolayi] also addressed prisoners of mehrieh and added that: “Last year, 20,000 men have been prisoned for mehrieh…”

[6] http://sabteahval.ir/default.aspx?tabid=6835
[7] http://khabaronline.ir/detail/319887/weblog/hajmahmoudattar

Molyneux: The truth about Robin Williams

AVfM Video Source · 13 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

From Stefan's Channel: After a lifetime of comedic achievement, the suspected suicide of Robin Williams shocked the millions of people for whom he had become a household name. What brought about the tragic end of such an accomplished man? What is the truth about Robin Williams?

The 200th anniversary of the Good Men Project

Peter Wright · 14 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Many a good man of the Henpecked Club has to be on his good behaviour in order to keep on anything like peaceable footing with his better half – (1860)[1]

It may come as a surprise to readers to learn that the Good Men Project is only the most recent incarnation of a longer tradition teaching men how to be obsequious 'good men' toward women.

The Good Men Project takes its place within a long-running tradition exemplified by 'The Henpecked Club' — a very real organization, global in scope, that has been in continuous operation for at least the last 200 years.

The Henpecked Club, essentially a project for creating Good Men™, consists of an international network of meeting-places where men came for marital support, especially if enduring emotional and physical abuse from wives. In this aspect the club reminds of Al-Anon, the modern support-movement for spouses of alcoholics. However, the club members had a strange way of showing support – they actively encouraged husbands to tolerate their wives' abuse, and to placate her with any means necessary to moderate her behaviours. Henpecked Club members, moreover, were expected to take their wives breakfast in bed daily, and to do most of the household chores, even after a hard day's work, with the hope that this would place wives in a more amiable frame of mind or – perhaps more accurately – in a less abusive mood.

[image]
Yorkshire Post – 1940
Men were also advised to absorb any violence or abuse without complaint, stoically tolerating it so as not to provoke or further upset his wife. This, explained club policy, was how one become a 'good man.' If his wife continued with her abuse after these conciliatory gestures, Club officials would ask the man what he may have unwittingly done to provoke her, followed by "How might you better serve her so she doesn't become upset again?" The answer to that question was typically for the husband to do more housework, but there was also a novel intervention of 'rocking a wife to sleep,' of which I will say more shortly.

Henpecked clubs existed in their hundreds from the 1700s through to contemporary times, and in places as diverse as England, Austria, USA, Germany, France, Australia, Yugoslavia, China, and Japan.

Why haven't we heard of these clubs – many containing several hundred members struggling to find ways to deal with difficult marriages – in an age when we are so hyper-focused on gender relations? Not even a peep from historians, despite the availability of material about Henpecked Clubs. Why?

Because it doesn't chime with the image of a 'dominant patriarchal husband' proffered in modern interpretations of history.

So in a gesture of redressing history, here is small part of an 1810 book entitled, Some Account of that Ancient and Honourable Society, Vulgarly Denominated The Henpecked Club – showing that the project of creating 'good men' has been going on for at least 200 years, and probably more:

> "[Husbands] submit to the pleasing bondage of their wives, in as great numbers, and with as much good will, as in any enlightened period of ancient or modern times.
>
> [image]"Henpeckicism, which has been graced by ranking as its Members the greater part of the most celebrated men who have appeared since the creation to the present day, whether legislators, philosophers, conquerors, poets or divines, requires no other argument to vindicate and establish its right to the most extensive influence and operation, than the language of every lover, who readily acknowledges himself to be, and swears to continue, the slave of his mistress, before marriage; ergo, he who denies her supremacy, when she becomes his wife, is guilty of the most criminal and unnatural rebellion against womanly authority that God himself have set over him. If other arguments were wanted, however, many might be adduced to prove that the superiority of the female is an ordination of Nature. For example, the noblest or fiercest dog will tamely submit to the snarling and snapping of the most pitiful bitch of the species."

"For in Henpeckicism there is no distinction: the peerless woman lords it over her vassal even as the peasant: All are equally comprised in the description so happily given by the poet:

"The crouching vassal of the tyrant wife,
"Who has no sixpence but in her possession,
"Who has no will but in her high permission,
"Who must to her his dear friends secrets tell,
"Who dreads a curtain lecture worse than hell"

"The rules observed by the Members of those Meetings were every way adapted to preserve the existence of the institution. Such Members as had the honour of receiving a black eye from their spouses, were entitled to an allowance of 10s. 6d. per week, for so long as the glorious colouring remained: The allowance for two black eyes was £1 1s 0d. In all cases, proof was required that the contusion was received according to the true spirit of genuine Henpeckicism, that is, without resistance or murmuring, according to the example of that inestimable deceased Member, Socrates, who, together with his Lady, is alluded to by the poet in the following lines:

"How oft she scolded in a day he knew,
"How many pisspots at the sage she threw,
"Who took it patiently, and wip'd his head-
"Rain follows thunder – that was all he said."

Such married men as had not the honour to appertain to the Society, were earnestly requested to attend these Meetings, not as Members, but as visitors, in order that they might be induced to unite themselves with it, by witnessing the perfect happiness which it was calculated to confer. For what happiness can be greater than that of belonging to a spouse who takes upon herself the weighty care of regulating not only her own conduct, but that of her husband and the rest of her family; to a spouse who takes the trouble of receiving and paying all money; to a spouse who kindly undertakes the task of judging for her husband (in every occurence) of what is proper for him to do; of what time he should spend in public houses; of how much money he must expend; of what secrets ought to be retained in his or rather her possession, and of what ought to be divulged to the world? In short, she who takes upon herself all anxiety, all trouble, and leaves to her darling husband nothing to do but the delightful task of executing her commands; well remembering that:

"His proper body is not his, but mine,
"For so said Paul, and Paul's a sound divine."

The design and ostensible object of the Institution having always been to preserve, and even, if possible, to extend the just and laudable dominion of the fair sex, the several meetings thought it proper, also, to request the attendance of bachelors, not merely with a view that they might be benefited by witnessing such perfect examples of submission, but that those bachelors who had not yet turned their thoughts toward matrimony, or who might have overlooked so great an inducement to enter into the married state as the existence of out Institution, might be induced, as early as possible, to place themselves on a level, in this respect, with most of the greatest men in the world.

"The most common methods by which females attempt the full exercise of that unlimited power which of right belongs to them, is, at a very early period after marriage, to become extremely noisy and abusive, and to make a point of dealing out blame very liberally to their husbands for every action which they commit, whether they are really of the opinion that their conduct has been reprehensible or not. This method is at some times attended by blows. Though a vigorous and persevering course of this treatment may frequently be successful, yet there is considerable danger of resistance from those brutal fellows injudiciously termed men of spirit, a resistance which may be attended with consequences extremely injurious to female countenance. I would > strenuously recommend this method be pursued by women, however, with all those effeminate characters who are more afraid of sustaining a drubbing, than eager to vindicate their title to manhood, as would especially advise it to be practiced on the whole tribe of fops or puppies, creatures possessed of no better proofs that they are privileged to rank as men, than that they have two legs and wear breeches.

>
> "Some women pursue a course quite the opposite of this, and with greater success. They at one time load their husbands with caresses, magnify their own affection, and seem to have no other avocation worth their attention but that of convincing them that the sole study of their lives will be to invent fresh blandishments, and to render them in all respects completely happy. At other times, however, they affect a sulkiness of behaviour: a sudden and sullen gloom succeeds their former cheerfulness; they sigh frequently, and burst into floods of tears; nay, they are even seized with swoonings and hysterics.
>
> The wretched husband of such a wife, alarmed at these surprising symptoms, anxiously enquires the cause. She affects to evade the question–he becomes more importunate–she persists in declining to assign a reason–his importunities are redoubled–till he is at last informed, with gentle reproaches and a burst of grief, that he himself is breaking her heart; that the reward of all her love is his neglect, &c. &c. Astonished at a charge which he is wholly unconscious of having merited, he at first endeavours to ridicule what he terms her childish uneasiness. She affects, however, still to doubt–he makes solemn protestations of his innocence; and they are reconciled. In a few days, however, the same farce is played out again, and again, and again, till the unhappy man is at length almost convinced, contrary to the evidence of his own senses, that his conduct has been criminal. Nay, to pacify his afflicted partner, he is even brought to confess his imaginary faults, and to promise amendment in the future. For fear of unintentionally giving offence, he learns to keep a strict watch over his own actions, becomes afraid to take any notice of those of his wife, and is, for the same reason, cautious of contradicting her, lest his cruelty should cause her to swoon; and, in short, becomes a Member of the Henpecked Society.
>
> "Though the great object of our Society is to extend the domination of the female sex, it is far from being its intention to obtain that end by such reprehensible or unhappy means. The only worthy Members of the Society are those who have become so, as much by conviction of its utility, as by entertaining a due sense of the superiority of their wives. All such Members, however, have been treated in a manner very different from the preceding. They have (and let every wife endeavour to follow the same plan) been first brought to acknowledge that their wives, by their care and economy, were better adapted than Themselves to manage their concerns; have been satisfied, by their attentive behaviour, that they were well qualified to govern their families; and have been convinced, by their mildness and moderation, that the authority with which they were invested would never be abused. In such a family, resistance will never be attempted. Commands from the one party will be met by prompt obedience from the other. Perpetual harmony will be established; and correction, when necessary, will be submitted to, according to the fundamental rule of the Society, without murmuring and without resistance."[2]

The Good Man's Wife Pacifier

[image]
Henpeck'd Club's Peace Box – Patent Cure for a Cross Wife

The good men of the Henpecked Club were responsible for an interesting innovation: an adult-sized rocking cradle, which was used for soothing nagging wives instead of babies. If you look closely you can see curved feet that allowed the cradle to be gently rocked from side-to-side by the dutiful husband.

The 'Peace Box' was invented by a club member named Harry Tap in 1862, and several were manufactured for hire by Henpecked Club members suffering under tempestuous behaviour from wives. If a wife was abusing her husband too much, the husband would entreat his wife to recline in the box, which could be rocked like a child's cot in order to send the wife to sleep. While she was sleeping the husband would perform all the household chores then awaken his wife who would hopefully have calmed down.

With those juicy historical morsels now in the open, we seem to have come full circle, back to the future. Here we remain, with hat in hand, beseeching Dear Woman for forgiveness for having displeased her, hoping that she will notice how hard we are trying to be good men.

You may at this point be feeling nauseous in the knowledge that men have been kowtowing to such abuse for hundreds if not thousands of years, and yet we're still being asked to to Take It Like A Man™, Man Up™, and be Good Men™. If you are feeling that way you are not alone, and with the growing army of men and women in the MHRM you can help bring an end to such appalling gynocentric customs.

SOURCES:

[1] Huddersfield Chronicle – Saturday 11 August 1860
[2] Some Account of that Ancient and Honourable Society, Vulgarly Denominated The Henpecked Club (1810)

This won't hurt a bit, Amanda Marcotte

August Løvenskiolds · 14 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Amanda Marcotte is running scared for the first time in her privileged life, and she should be.

The very day after the reports of the death of beloved actor/comic Robin Williams were breaking, my own beloved sausage-handler Amanda Marcotte was fuming. After dominating social media for years, feminism has been taking it in the metaphorical—um, cervix. As the celebratory mania of the Tumblr "Women Against Feminism" and related Twitter tag #WomenAgainstFeminism movement continued to trend and reduce feminists into an even deeper pit of screaming, misogynistic hypocrisy, a cultural icon of gentle humor kills himself.

Marcotte must have begun to realize that feminism was about to get in an even bigger pickle over the feminist policies (such as ignoring men's suicide issues, harvesting men's wallets, and stealing men's children through divorce, demonizing as "weak" those men who dare to seek help, and claiming that failed suicides are somehow comparable with real ones) that either drove, or were complicit in, Williams's suicide. So, little Ms. Mandy-cakes now says she wants to "end the 'misandry' wars." The possible future juxtaposition of the viral image of Jessica Valenti rocking her "I Bathe in Male Tears" muumuu with Robin Williams's funeral-goers could be the spirochete that shreds the last feminist brain cell, so widdle Misandry Mandy wants to "negotiate."

[image]

Our Paul Elam was quick to blow her offer apart, and while I concur with his rejection of her specious offer, I break from Paul in that I don't want feminism tossed into the trash. I want it pilloried in the public square until the heat death of the universe, so that all will remember the crimes of feminism and the heroes, women and men alike, who are forcing it fresh into the stocks.

Mandy-Muffin is not really serious in her offer, of course. It would be imprudent to assume that any feminist is ever serious about anything—feminism has become so two-faced, "meta," jargonized, and brutally ironic that even its own adherents have no idea what it means any more outside of a dictionary. Feminists have become the serial killer's mother who continues to insist "but she was such a sweet little girl!" Even the "Misandry" panties that Mandypants keeps pretending to lose on her rapey dates with RAINN aren't enough to convince her that Misandry is a Thing—two years ago she wrote:

> Growing up and wanting something from women and finding out that they can say "no"—despite the fact that they were put here to serve you!—is often extremely distressing to men. The invention of the nonsense word "misandry" goes back to this.

Now, one can change a lot in two years, especially if one takes responsibility and exercises agency—but these qualities are as absent in feminists as chain saws are to sharks, so Marcotte even puts "misandry" in scare-quotes in the title of her "proposal" to end the war over it.

Regardless of whether you are serious or not about ending the war, my sweety Marcotte, here is my answer:

There is one way, and one way only, that this war will end: with the complete eradication of the power and influence of feminism in human community. In other words, equal rights for men.

We don't need your "proposals." We are not interested in negotiation—the time for that ended in 1848 Seneca Falls when the early feminists demanded that their male feminist allies shut up and that male signatures go last on their declaration. These early mutations of "equality" made feminism into metastasizing cancer that must be destroyed.

The war will end with the universal humiliation of you and your feminist followers. You will be outed as the liars and bigots that you and I both know that you are, and were from the very beginning. You should spend eight years in prison for every fraud you've committed and twice that if it was a false rape allegation or a paternity fraud—and because of gender equality, it will be in a (formerly exclusively) men's prison. That's equality, right?

When you are eventually released, there will be lifetime "feminist offender" registries where feminists will have to report their locations to local authorities and avoid areas where children are known to congregate. That's equality, right?

After your incarceration, the only jobs open to you will be those under harsh conditions where on-the-job death and injuries are commonplace—you know, men's jobs. Your children, if any, will be given to the parent best able to both care and provide for them—and since convicted feminists will be universally recognized as the narcissistic liars that they are, that parent will almost never be you. That's equality, right?

Unless men are granted the right to legal paternal surrender, a woman's right to terminate parenthood will be revoked and you will be on the hook for 18 years of child support. That's equality, right?

If you kill your children, it will be your fault and your fault alone. That's equality, right?

If boys still have to do it, your daughters will be FORCED to register for the draft if they want to vote or receive government benefits. That's equality, right?

If it remains legal for parents to have their baby boys' genitals mutilated, then it will be legal to have baby girls genitally mutilated as well. That's equality, right?

If you hit a man, he will be allowed to defend himself with physical force. That's equality, right?

Alleged crimes among college students will never be investigated by campus officials EVER—they will be the responsibility of the same criminal and judicial system that everyone else has. That's equality, right?

Your requests for special protections and policing will be ignored if they privilege you over your male cohort. The men you accuse of rape will get the same anonymity and full due process as you get—and rape shield laws will change so that your entire history of lying and making false claims will be fair game in any legal action. That's equality, right?

If you get promoted at work, it will not be based on a quota but on merit, and if you want to fuck your way to the top, join a brothel. That's equality, right?

And, horror of horrors, you'll have to buy your own fucking blood-plugs when you grow up. Hey, I already have to pay for the earplugs I have to use whenever you repeat your mendacious feminist boilerplate for the thousandth time.

Because the war ends with equality, Amanda, the equality that terrifies feminists to their last dying breaths.

Karen Straughan: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 14 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We will over the next few weeks present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. Here we bring you Karen Straughan's speech, the second speech from Day 2, Saturday, June 28, 2014. Our thanks once again to Rick Westlake for doing the bulk of the work of this transcription. —DE

(Attila Vinczer)

Ladies and gentlemen, our next presenter is Karen Straughan, one of the most prominent women in the Men's Rights Movement. Karen blogs, writes, and posts on her YouTube channel, "Girl Writes What," and has been actively speaking about men's issues since 2010. Karen debated Naomi Wolf at a Free State New Hampshire symposium, and has spoken at libertarian conferences across Canada and the United States. She hosts a weekly Honey Badger Radio show with Hannah Wallen and Alison Tieman. Most of her videos take place in her kitchen.

Karen has spoken to university students across Canada, and some of her videos are used to teach classes in evolutionary psychology, and applied psychology, and other classes. She has appeared on CBC, CTV, Global News, the Peter Schiff Show, and the Tom Leykis Show, and has been quoted in newspapers across North America.

She is the mother of three children: two sons and a daughter. She is a member of the GLBQ community. Her most famous video is "Feminism and the Disposable Male," which has been viewed over one million times on YouTube and has been subtitled and translated into languages around the world. She has a very dumb dog named George; he's—she's a well-intentioned dog but still pretty dumb.

Put your hands together for Karen Straughan.

(Applause. Karen Straughan takes the podium.)

Oh … Attila, I don't know if this is on. Is it? Are you sure? … Okay. Excellent.

My name is Karen, and I am an anti-feminist.

I know, the short hair and the comfortable shoes really gave it away. But … yes; and I was an anti-femin—I was a non-feminist my entire life. And I was an anti-feminist before I even discovered this movement. I considered myself an anti-feminist before considering myself a men's rights activist. I am first and foremost anti-feminist.

And a lot of people ask me, "How on earth can you be an anti-feminist? You are a member of the LGBTQ community; you are a divorced mother who struggles to support her children; you are not a feminine-presenting woman by any means; you are the quintessential feminist!" And I tell them, well, one of the reasons I am an anti-feminist is because everything that I read that comes from feminists … is backwards. It's wrong. It's upside down.

And I just want to clarify that I don't consider feminism to be a movement for equality; I don't consider it to be a goal, or a set of goals; I consider it to be a set of hypotheses, not even theories, right? Hypotheses that are unfalsifiable, that are as predictive of what's going to happen as a coin-toss—not even, not even that predictive. And we are basing public policy on this set of hypotheses. We are basing entire branches of academia on this set of unfalsifiable, unproven hypotheses; hypotheses that can never be proven, right? They can never be demonstrated, and they have never been demonstrated.

And I am going to take a little bit of an issue with something that Warren said—I am! I know! Because so many people that I talk to, they say that, well, the first wave of feminism, that was about justice. The first wave of feminism was about equality. And I'm not going to argue that there was not a need for some assertion of the rights of women, as our sociopolitical and economic climate and our technological advancement changed. We needed an assertion of the rights of women.

But … you go all the way back to Seneca Falls and the Declaration of Sentiments, and as Warren said, we do not need a movement that blames men. It was 1848, and 40 men showed up at Seneca Falls. Forty men wanted to attend that historic conference. And they were told … they were turned away at first; and when they persisted, they were told, "Okay, you can come in, but you need to sit over there in the back and you need to stay quiet."

And then, the list of grievances, the bullet-pointed list of grievances, was—it was worthy of the most radical and insane Tumblr feminist out there. Okay. And every single one of those bullet points began not with the word "the system," not with the word "the law," with the word "He." HE. "The history of mankind has been a series of usurpations, by man, of women." Right … "A series of oppressions, by man, against women." And this, and every single bullet point … He has done this. He has deprived us of this. He has attacked us in this way. He has oppressed us—in their words, quote: "He has oppressed us, on all sides." He has … with the goal of tyranny, complete tyranny, against woman, against womankind.

So the history of feminism, all the way back to the beginning, was a history of blaming men. And when you look at the history of how they reformed the system, how feminism reformed the system … I'm going to actually just open this up, and I'm going to read … Ahem. I'm going to read a little bit of an article that was published in The New York Times in 1910, and it was an article by an anti-suffragette woman, in response to a previous article by a suffragette lawyer; her name was Mrs. Harriett Johnston-Wood. And Harriett Johnston-Wood was complaining that the law regarding property, and the law regarding child custody, was unfair to women.

And, ah, Mrs. Scott, the anti-suffragette, set the record straight. She said these complaints are meaningless, if you do not take into account the entirety of the set of laws. She says, "It seems desirable, even necessary, to correct two misstatements made in 'Laws Discriminating Against Women in the State of New York,' by attorney-at-law Mrs. Harriett M. Johnston-Wood, as quoted in the Times of March 26th. Mrs. Johnston-Wood says, 'A wife cannot make a binding contract with her husband, to pay her for services within or without their household.'

"In Section 51 of the Domestic Relation Law, 1909, we read: 'A married woman has all the rights, in respect to property, real and personal, and the acquisition, use, employment, use, and disposition thereof, to make contracts in respect thereto with any person, including her husband, and to carry on any business, trade, or occupation, and to exercise all powers and enjoy all rights in respect thereto, and in respect to her contracts, and be liable on such contracts as if she were unmarried; but a husband and wife cannot contract to dissolve the marriage, or to relieve the husband of his liability to support his wife.

"Again, Mrs. Johnston-Wood says, 'The father's right to the custody of the child is paramount.' I suppose she refers to Section 80 of the Domestic Relations Law, but she omits to quote, and, therefore, fails to make it clear, that when 'a minor child shall acquire real property, the guardianship of his property belongs first to the father, and second, if there be no father, to the mother.' Section 81, however, deals with the child, and not his property, and that declares: 'A married woman is a joint guardian of her children, with her husband, with equal powers, rights, and duties in regard to them.' And 'Either the father or the mother may in the lifetime of them both, by last will duly executed, appoint the other guardian of the person and property of such child during its minority.'

"It is not less desirable and necessary to correct the general impression made Mrs. Johnston-Wood in her compilation of laws regarding women and labeled as discriminating against them, because unless any set of laws is considered as a whole we get those half-truths which are always dangerously deceptive."

This is not my—these are not my words. I just found them. Actually, Robert St. Estephe found them, and I am grateful to him for that.

"Because the husband and father was and is responsible for the subsistence of his wife and family therefore he was recognized as logically the proper person to administer and inherit the property of the family"—including the child. "But as time wore away the barriers raised for protection became coercive between the family and the world; as individual life began to call women out of the home, and property amassed by the wife was claimed by the husband and used sometimes for his benefit rather than hers, the gradual changes began to take place which have in the last 30 or 40 years entirely changed the relation of the wife toward property and the guardianship of her children. This change has all been in the favor of the wife and mother, and one after another the privileges which men had over the property of their wives and the guardianship of their children have not only been lost but many of them have been actually reversed." That'll be the Tender Years Doctrine. "The legal relations are as though they were unmarried, excepting marriage. The wife cannot release the husband from the obligation to support her.

"For over thirty years—" already, in 1910, for over 30 years—"a woman has been able to hold and enjoy her separate property, however acquired, even when it had been given by her husband, freed from any interference or control by him, and from all liability for his debts. A husband is, however, liable for necessaries purchased by his wife and also for money given his wife by a third person to purchase necessaries, and he is bound to support her and her children without regard to her individual or separate estate. Even when a separation occurs—" and this is really crucial because divorce was extremely hard to come by; and so when families, when couples, split up, they were separated, but they could not divorce unless one was at fault … "Even when a separation occurs a husband is compelled through the payment of alimony to continue to support his wife, nothing short of infidelity on her part and consequent divorce relieving him of that liability. No obligation, however, to furnish necessities to a husband rests upon the wife under any circumstances whatever.

"Mrs. Johnston-Wood complains that a woman cannot make a binding contract with her husband to be paid for her services. But she does not have to do so. He is obliged to support her, but she can go into any business she pleases, keep all the profits, and still demand support from him. A husband has no claim against his wife's estate for having supported her, but if she supports him, as by keeping a boarding house, and he acknowledges the debt, she has a valid claim for reimbursement against his estate."

What Mrs. Scott was getting at, in this article, was that between the publishing of the Declaration of Sentiments and New York State's state of law, family law, in 1910, all of the coverture privileges, all of the coverture rights, for men, disappeared; and all of the coverture protections for women remained in place. And one of the really horrible things, because—I was asked yesterday, can you give me a brief history of the Men's Rights Movement, and I think that the journalist was really implying that maybe it was something that started in, you know, 2008 …

There were alimony reform movements in the 1910s and 20s, because men—because they could not obtain a divorce, but their wife had decided she doesn't want to live with him any more; and so she would move out, and he would be responsible indefinitely for every single necessity that she had, even if she had more property than him. He was not entitled to any of that property; he had no right to touch it. She was entitled to his support until the day they divorced; and if it was his fault that they divorced, she was entitled to his support for life, or until she remarried. And there were men who were stuck in the limbo of legal separation, without hope of divorce; and their wives refused to come home. And they were stuck, paying, sometimes—you know, paying out the wazoo—to support women who were enjoying the single lifestyle while still being legally married to their husband.

Feminists of 1910 believed these laws were "unfair to women" because a wife—here's the thing—because a wife, this wife, who enjoyed full rights of property within marriage as an individual; her property was not marital property, her property was not shared property, it was her own property as an individual, and her family, her children, had no claim to it, her husband had no claim to it, it could not be used legally to support their household … she did not have an equal right over the family property, and the family's income; in other words, she did not have an equal right, a 50% right, to administer her husband's property and income. He got to choose, unless the court forced him; he got to choose how he would keep his wife with the income and the property that he owned, that was "the family property."

And they considered these laws unfair because women, though they were equal custodians of their children, the father, who had the sole financial liability to support these children, he was the one who controlled the child's income and property. And when you're talking 1910, and you're talking children of age 12 going to work—right? Children of age 10, having jobs? They didn't go to school. They had jobs. And it was the father's job to make sure they were fed and sheltered and provided-for. I really think it is logical that that child's income and property would be administered by the person with the responsibility to feed and shelter the child.

And at this point, in New York State, the Tender Years Doctrine was already in place. The Tender Years Doctrine—this is another completely, completely unfair thing. I mean, when I was asked at the Q&A in, at Ryerson, "When do you think feminism went wrong?" And I said, Well, can you clarify it—'cause like, what was the first unfair thing they brought about, or when did they completely lose their minds? Because it's never been fair.

Under "patriarchy," right, under the old system, the traditional system, fathers got custody of the children after divorce or separation. And the reason they got custody is because they had the sole job and liability of feeding and sheltering them. And early women's activists, notably Carolyn Norton, decided that her happiness and the happiness of mothers were not served by this. And she convinced the legal system in the UK, and then it spread across the western world. She convinced them that "children of tender years"—so, a child that was basically not old enough to go out and get a job, okay—"children of tender years belong with their mother." But there was no financial liability on their mother to support those children. That liability remained on the father.

And even though you had to prove fault back then, even though you had to prove you were getting divorced for a reason—a good reason—the divorce rate, which had remained constant for centuries, increased 15-fold in just 50 years after this became the legal norm. Fifteen-fold in 50 years, when women got the kids but not the bills.

Across the English-speaking world, similar reforms have been made, were made, regarding women's rights to hold property in marriage. In one glaring example that was published in the Milwaukee Journal in 1912 … it was the story of a UK suffragette whose husband, Mark Wilkes, was in prison; he was in prison for tax evasion. Now, Mrs. Wilkes claimed that "it was a grand idea that would get all kinds of attention to the Suffragette cause," that her husband was in jail; her husband, a schoolteacher, was rotting in jail. What was he in jail for? He could not afford to pay the income tax, and the property tax, on his wife's income and property.

Suffragettes of the time, she said, were generally women of property, women of wealth; and she hoped that other suffragettes would follow suit, and refuse to pay their income taxes, because the man, being responsible for all of the necessaries of her life, was of course responsible, according to the income tax act in the UK, responsible for paying any taxes owing by his wife, on her income and her property.

And—yeah, it was just a wonderful deal for that guy. And the fact that this woman would use the imprisonment of her husband, when she could afford to free him, to further the suffragette cause—I think it really shows the mentality of some of the women in that first wave, that we have been taught, all our lives, to think were so incredibly noble. That they had the most just of causes.

Now, there's another one of the bullet points in the Declaration of Sentiments: "He has compelled her to submit to laws in the formation of which she had no voice." Tell that to the women involved in the abolitionist movement. In fact, feminists today often credit the Women's Lobby for the abolition of slavery. Slavery! They will literally say, "If it weren't for women, and organization of women back then, the abolitionist movement would not have been successful." And I believe they're right. I really do because women are extremely good at appealing to the government to get things done.

I have seen examples as far back as Rome, ancient Rome, where women, who felt that they were being unjustly discriminated against, gathered in front of the Senate and protested until the laws were changed. There was one law—it was during a war—women were limited, they could not wear a multicolored dress, and they were not allowed to wear more than two ounces of gold jewelry in public. And they felt that this was unjust and unfair. And once the war was over, they went and they protested and the law was changed. The law was repealed. They're very, very good at convincing the government to do things.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union might have something to say about this bullet point: "He has compelled her to submit to laws in the formation of which she had no voice." The Women's Christian Temperance Union, and other women activists, were instrumental in the prohibition of alcohol.

Now, the grievance that men have excluded women from the elective franchise—that declaration, in the Declaration of Sentiments, ignores the fact that for the vast majority of history, men did not have elective franchise. Men have not always denied her "her inalienable right" to elective franchise; nobody has denied her an inalienable right to the elective franchise because the elective franchise is not an "inalienable right." It's a privilege granted by government. You don't have a right, just from being born—you have the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; you don't have an automatic right to vote, just for being a human being.

And the period between which all men got the vote and all women got the vote—or, at least, all White men and all White women—in some countries, it was as much as 50 years, and in others it was as little as 10. It was a recent-enough—male, universal male suffrage was a recent-enough development—for it to be considered "fashionable," as well as just. A number of UK suffragettes felt that women deserved the vote, and men did not; and they put out posters saying, "Men should not vote, they're only good for war." Okay … they're only good for war. And there was one poster that gave examples of what a woman could be, and not have the vote: she could be a mayor, she could be a teacher, she could be a nurse, she could be a lawyer, she could be all of these things and not have the vote. And what men could be, and not lose the vote: he could be a slave-owner, he could be a drunkard, he could be a lunatic, and he could be unfit for military service.

And anybody who has any kind of nuanced understanding of the expansion of the franchise will know that the vote—voter rights—was intimately tied to military service. Intimately tied. In 1918, a group of anarchists brought a Supreme Court challenge; they claimed that the draft was unconstitutional because it represented involuntary servitude. And the Supreme Court's decision was that the draft was indeed constitutional, and this was their justification: "It may not be doubted that the very conception of a just government and its duty to the citizen includes the reciprocal obligation of the citizen to render military service in case of need, and the right to compel it. To do more than state the proposition is absolutely unnecessary, in view of the practical illustration afforded by the almost-universal legislation to that effect, now in force." In other words, men purchased their rights, as citizens, through a reciprocal obligation to serve in the military if they were needed.

Two years after that decision came down from SCOTUS, women got the vote, obligation-free. Two years later. And this was at the tail end of a war that killed millions of men on all sides. Ten million men, on all sides; many of them drafted.

In Canada, we were very progressive. We included in our conscription legislation an addendum that lowered the voting age to 18, from 21 to 18, for anyone currently or previously serving in the military. Way to go, Canada. Right? If you're old enough to die for your country, you're old enough to have a say in it, right? And 2,000 military nurses were among the first women in Canada who were allowed to vote. And the other women in Canada who were allowed to vote, before universal female suffrage was enacted, were women who were voting on behalf of their male relatives serving overseas.

The vote and the military service have always been intimately connected. At least it was until women's suffrage. And you can even see that the suffragettes understood that, because many of the suffragettes campaigned for conscription —in favor of conscription—during World War I. And others participated in something called the White Feather Campaign, which was a campaign where young girls, any time they saw a man—maybe even a boy over the age of 15—if they saw him in public, and he was not in military dress, they would pin a White Feather of Cowardice to his lapel and publicly shame him for not enlisting.

One story I was reading on a website, the history of the White Feather Campaign: one father recounted the story of his 15-year-old son, who had been sent home from the front for being underage when they discovered that he was not 18. He was walking through town, and a woman pinned a white feather on him. He had only been home two weeks. She pinned the white feather on him, and in the 20 minutes it took for that child to walk across a bridge, he decided to re-enlist.

This is the power that women have. This is the power that women have always had. And this power is the power to convince Barack Obama, and Joe Biden, and David Beckham, and Patrick Stewart, and—all of these male celebrities —NBA players—all of these male celebrities to participate in the "1 Is 2 Many" campaign. "One is too many. One woman assaulted by her partner is too many, right? So step up, men. Step up, man up, you know; interfere, get involved, right? Don't let other men do this to women." All the while, these powerful men are ignoring the fact that domestic violence is not a gendered issue.

And if you ask, if you go by the surveys and "1 in 2 women will be assaulted," or "sexually assaulted,"in her lifetime, as the Canadian Women's Foundation claims, possibly erroneously—if you were to ask men, in fact, I think if you were to ask any boy over the age of 12, the number would be "1 in 1." One in one. And no one gives a shit. Nobody does.

I'm an anti-feminist because feminism has been poisoned right from the start. And they've been lying to us, right from the start. E. Belfort Bax, who was a socialist Marxist, and he described something that he called—because he understood that there were some women within his movement that wanted genuine equality; and then there were other women, and he called them "sentimental feminists." And you can read history theses, written in 1908 and 1911, and they're still applicable today! Almost all of the points in them are still applicable today. And you could almost—reading his material, you can almost see him kind of going, "I don't understand why people believe this!"

These women are claiming that women are more harshly treated than men, by the criminal justice system; and they're jailed for way, way longer sentences than men are. All the evidence points to the exact opposite! And people believe them! And it's—I don't know whether it's a pretty face, I don't know whether it's just because we're women and we can convince people; but I think it is a huge, huge power that we have, as women. And it's really time that some of us stepped up and started to use it responsibly.

(Applause, followed by a "whoop" from one of the Honey Badgers.)

Calm down! Oh, my goodness … well, you know …

And I just wanted to say that, because a lot of people have asked me, where did the name "Honey Badger" come from? It's an amusing story, and, people on YouTube, you can search it. It's a video, and the narrator of this video is … flamboyant. And it just shows some random clips of a honey badger, from a National Geographic special. And this honey badger is digging through a bees' nest, and getting stung all over himself because he wants the bee larvae and the honey … and he's getting bitten by a cobra, and he just passes out for a minute or two, and then he wakes up and staggers back over to the snake, and keeps eating … and all the while, this narrator is going, "Omigod, he's being stung, like, a billion times … Honey badger don't care, honey badger don't give a shit!"

The honey badger is widely renowned as one of the most fearless and intelligent animals on the planet. And somebody—I forget who, maybe it was Doctor Tara?—suggested that we … we don't care, we don't give a shit. We women in this movement. You can say whatever the hell you want about us; call us misogynist, rape-enabling, domestic-violence apologizing, women-hating—you know, anything. Call me what you want. I'm an anti-feminist. I am an anti-feminist, and I don't give a shit!

Thank you very much. Thank you very much for having me speak.

(Aside to Attila Vinczer: "Well, Erin told me, don't worry about your speech, just wing it! And I took her advice, and it was just like … Wow!")

(Karen steps down. Attila Vinczer takes the podium.)

Karen, I loved that! … Doesn't "no" mean "yes"?

Ladies and gentlemen, at this point in time, we're going to take a short 10-minute break …

Not a feminist, not a sexist

AVfM Video Source · 14 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I enjoy most of TJ's videos, even if I don't agree with 100% of what he says. There are a handful of his videos that I really love, especially this latest one. It is worth watching for the well-articulated ideas and for a peek at a more human side to the Amazing Atheist. PE

Michael Brown and Ferguson Missouri: Anonymous #OpFerguson

AVfM Video Source · 14 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We suppose there are those who will object to this:

http://youtu.be/n0NC6YX1eoo

We don't.

A government that does not protect the right of people to peaceably assemble and protest is not a valid government at all.

This young man's death must be fully explained and those responsible held accountable. Ditto for any who try to stop or harass peaceful protestors.

More info here.

Afghanistan is the hotbed of male disposability, boy or man. World's reaction? Help women and girls!

Ali Mehraspand · 15 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The story of Afghanistan is a gloomy story of pain, sorrow, and fearless struggle. The story of Afghanistan is a story of children whose innocent smiles know a hinge of anxiety for they have seen too often how menacing life can be. It is also a story in which the UN and NGOs are more worried about the Patriarchy Theory than actual human rights. It is a story that you need to hear truthfully, for it's a story of male children's disposability.

[image]

Home is a foreign concept to many Afghan men and boys as they escape the country to labor at very young ages. More than 3,000,000 Afghan refugees live in Iran, only 900,000 of whom do so legally [1-3]. This number of refugees comes from a country whose population has risen to around 26 million at the moment. The overwhelming majority of these refugees are male.

[image]

[image]

[image]

These boys and men, almost without exception, do construction work or other forms of[image] equally demanding labor. If you built a house in Iran, chances are that most of the labor came from Afghan men. "Why alone so far from the home?" I asked an Afghan boy. "I have a mother and several sisters to feed," he said "Maybe I get to visit them next year." Of course, none of them are insured workers, and nobody cares if they die on the job. Six is the number of Afghan men I personally knew who died on the job, one of them while constructing my parents' house. They actually have a song that has this to say about Iran: "On every wall of this city, is the mark of my hands."

[image]

[image]

[image][image]

Each one of them works more efficiently than five European workers combined, and when they take a little time to have lunch under the red-hot sun, too many times I have witnessed the painful scene of their shopping for lunch: some soda and some bread. They would tear up the bread to pour in the soda. They would then fill their spoon with the soda-dipped bread to eat as if it was a steak sandwich. Why? You see, because the money is not to be wasted on luxuries like food while their mother and sisters back in Afghanistan expect it. Here in Farsi is a story of an Iranian woman who bursts into tears after 10 years of having Afghan apprentices when she says that these men send all the money back to their families in Afghanistan.

[image]

Generations come and go in Afghanistan, but constant in their lives is the taunt of war. The red war against the Soviet Union alone wiped out 11% of all the Afghan population and pushed many of them to find refuge in Iran.

[image]

[image]
Afghan Construction Men Killed by Taliban
[image]

Bear with me while we take a closer look at the comparative life of a boy in Afghanistan, who feels every threat possible, while watching the reaction of our sick world.

UN and NGOs: Women and Fuck Children

As mentioned, in Afghanistan (and rural areas of Iran) it is the males' responsibility to provide when provision is difficult, so you can see boys as young as six with shovels in their hands. The paragraphs that follow give you a horrifying image of what it is like to be a boy in Afghanistan.[image]

But before we go any further, let me say how frustrating it is to see that in none of the UN and NGO reports can you find that child laborer basically means boys. They never tell you about the huge disparity between the sexes among child laborers. So let me make something very clear. The only research ever conducted to tell you the truth is that of Professor Hasan Hoseini of Tehran University, with the aid of a governmental rehabilitation center, which concluded that 95% of child laborers who live on the streets are boys. Also, 92% of the child laborers, gathered from the province of Isfahan, were boys. [4] is a conclusive report on population studies of child laborers. So in the paragraphs that follow, you should know what we mean by the term child.

Here in [5], we have the United Nations' UNAMA report that starts right off the bat by stating, "Only 40% of the students in Afghanistan are girls." For more dramatic effect, they also mention that just recently 13 children who were smuggled to Saudi Arabia with promises of labor have returned after those promises turned out to be false and they only ended[image] up peddling. No mention of the sex of these children. There are 1.9 million child laborers in Afghanistan. According to Afghanistan's Ministry of Labor and Social Issues, there are 1.3 million children in Afghanistan who are doing extreme labor [6-7]. You know, extreme labor as in jobs an entire Gender Studies department can't endure for five minutes. By the way, since female child laborers are mostly peddlers, this number of extreme laborers is closer to being 100% male. That also excludes all the children who will labor in other countries, such as Iran. The UNAMA report then proceeds to tell you that 550,000 of child laborers are between the ages of 6 and 11, with no mention of the sex of these "laborers." UNISEF then reports that only in Kabul, 60,000 "children are working on streets," and, of course, no mention of the sex of these children.

[image]

[image]

[image]

That around 95% of the child laborers are boys, as Professor Hosseini found, is no [image]surprise if you have lived in Iran and have seen Iranian as well as Afghan boys doing physical labor. I just went to a rural area where I saw boys with shovels. Now, these child laborers are true victims of rape and sexual assault, up to the level that, as reported in [6-7], the Independent Commission of Human Rights recognizes pedophilia as something that exclusively happens to boys. Boys being dressed in women's wear, being kidnapped, sexually abused, or raped are the things mentioned in the source. Apparently, Afghan girls are protected by their families; who would have thought? By the way, upon being asked as to why 60% of rape victims in Iran are male, Iran's chief of police said that the victims were mostly child laborers [8-9].

Last year, there were 2,888 cases of violence against children (including forced labor, forced drug trafficking, forced marriages, and rape), of which 82% of the victims were boys. This statistic, by the way, came from Afghanistan's Ministry of Social Issues, not NGOs or the UN [10].

World's Reaction: Women, Women, Fuck Children, Women, Women, Fuck Men Twice, Fuck (Male) Children Once, Women, Women

Afghan women have enough cultural power that their women's minister can pull any form of shit. Let us take a look at the violence against women laws of Afghanistan.

The intention of the laws as pointed out in the first chapter seems somewhat sound. Among them, for example, is a law that prohibits making women use drugs [11]. That is good, putting aside the fact that in a culture with 1 million drug addicts, 88% of whom are male [12-13] (and many of them underage and forced into it as depicted in stories of [12-13]), pushing for drug use is violence against women and women only. By the way, 1/3 of all rehab facilities are dedicated exclusively to women and children. One law prohibits making any woman work. This is in addition to the already Islamic law that essentially says women must be paid Nafaqa either by their husband or father. Furthermore, the first law of violence against women? "Women must be paid their Islamic rights!" Now, having women work is violence against women where there are 1.9 million child laborers only inside Afghanistan, which is in effect a fraction of Afghan boys scattered in other countries and doing labor. This one is good too. But the gems among violence against women laws of Afghanistan include the following:

- Insulting a woman should be punished by no less than three months in prison.
- Speaking in a way or making gestures that scare women should be punished by no less than three months in prison.
- Being part of an atmosphere that creates pressure on a woman in a way that she finds relief in drugs is considered forcing a woman to use drugs and therefore punishable by prison.

A Bone to Pick with the UN's Policy of "Women and Fuck Children"

The most frustrating aspect of the UN is its dishonesty about child laborers. For instance, when the reports of the United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan talk about children, you never find a single statement that shows the gender of these child laborers. All the NGOs in Iran that work apparently under the guise of "women and children" are just about women. Hell, they even gave a Noble Peace Prize to an Iranian feminist who in return for her budgets had not done a single thing for children. No, I'll take that back, she had on some occasions addressed girls' issues, not children, girls.

Now, 1% of the energy that these entities spend on children results only in some articles penned by women, in which not a single one of them tells the truth about child laborers. Is this just a coincidence that none of them, not a single one, will tell you that 95% of these children are boys?

So far their policy has been shush on the gender. The next phase will probably be to change the definition in a way so as to manufacture female victims. Something like, "a girl who makes tea at home is a child laborer."

Closing Thoughts

Every now and then, self-righteous idiots remind us that they would rather be a man in Afghanistan. They of course do not have the slightest clue what the fuck they are talking about. Being an Afghan man means to continue to be a sweat machine to provide where provision is so difficult that 50% of children suffer from malnutrition; 'cause, you know, no sex outside marriage for circumcised Afghan men, and inside marriage, well, you probably are familiar with Islamic cultures and laws already. Being an Afghan boy means to be a child laborer, perhaps in some other country, just so you can send back the money for female family members. Being an Afghan boy means facing more threats of sexual abuse and forced labor. And labor in the minds of Afghan men and boys is extreme labor.

[image]

Meanwhile, the big, big worry about Afghanistan is that the Commission of Human[image]

Rights has reported that women's domination of office jobs that had increased to 31% has now decreased to 18% [14].

Let's all hope that one day in this lifetime we witness an actual human rights organization, set up by those who are driven to human rights by compassion, not ideological and political agenda, and those who understand that "human" also includes boys and men.

---

[1] http://shafaf.ir/fa/news/111460/%DA%86%D9%86%D8%AF-%D9%85%DB%8C%D9%84%DB%8C%D9%88%D9%86-%D8%A7%D9%81%D8%BA%D8%A7%D9%86%DB%8C-%D8%AF%D8%B1-%D8%A7%DB%8C%D8%B1%D8%A7%D9%86-%D8%B3%D8%A7%DA%A9%D9%86-%D9%87%D8%B3%D8%AA%D8%AF

[2]http://www.radiozamaneh.com/156857

[3] http://afghanhumanrights.com/refugees/6631-%D8%AF%DB%8C%D8%AF%D9%87-%D8%A8%D8%A7%D9%86-%D8%AD%D9%82%D9%88%D9%82-%D8%A8%D8%B4%D8%B1-%D9%88%D8%B6%D8%B9%DB%8C%D8%AA-%D9%85%D9%87%D8%A7%D8%AC%D8%B1%DB%8C%D9%86-%D8%A7%D9%81%D8%BA%D8%A7%D9%86-%D8%AF%D8%B1-%D8%A7%DB%8C%D8%B1%D8%A7%D9%86-%D8%B1%D9%88%D8%A8%D9%87-%D9%88%D8%AE%D8%A7%D9%85%D8%AA-%D8%A7%D8%B3%D8%AA

[4] http://vista.ir/article/351575

[5] http://unama.unmissions.org/Default.aspx?ctl=Details&tabid=13793&mid=17589&ItemID=36399

[6] http://dailyopensociety.com/fa/%D8%A7%D9%86%D9%88%D8%A7%D8%B9-%D8%AE%D8%B4%D9%88%D9%86%D8%AA-%D8%B9%D9%84%DB%8C%D9%87-%DA%A9%D9%88%D8%AF%DA%A9%D8%A7%D9%86-%D8%A7%D9%81%D8%BA%D8%A7%D9%86%D8%B3%D8%AA%D8%A7%D9%86-%D8%AF%D8%B1-%D8%B3/

[7] https://www.tribunezamaneh.com/archives/50708?tztc=1

[8] Shargh newspaper, no. 1542 date : 5/30/2012, page 19

[9] http://salamatnews.com/interview.aspx?ID=692:

[10] http://www.afghanews.ir/ShowDetails.aspx?NewsId=86166

[11] http://ensijam.com/Covenants/article

[12] http://www.bbc.co.uk/persian/afghanistan/2013/04/130404_zs_afghan_drug_addiction_problem.shtml

[13] http://8am.af/1392/04/09/drog-afghanistan-women/

[14] http://da.azadiradio.org/content/article/24897400.html

Shouldn't everything be free? For women, I mean?

Jane Anderson · 15 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The other day, I saw references to an article asking for free tampons. I figured this was a parody, a Swiftian piece intended to illustrate the absurdity of demands that insurers provide contraception at no out-of-pocket cost for reasons of "fairness" by making other "fairness" demands, so I didn't pay much attention to it.

But apparently it's not.

Here's the Slate piece that made it clear that this is serious, and here's the original article in The Guardian by Jessica Valenti.

The key paragraphs:

> In the United States, access to tampons and pads for low-income women is a real problem, too: food stamps don't cover feminine hygiene products, so some women resort to selling their food stamps in order to pay for "luxuries" like tampons. Women in prison often don't have access to sanitary products at all, and the high cost of a product that half the population needs multiple times a day, every month for approximately 30 years, is simply, well, bullshit.

> Women in the UK are fighting to axe the 5% tax on tampons (it used to be taxed at 17.5%!), which are considered "luxuries" while men's razors, for some baffling reason, are not. And in the US, though breast pumps, vasectomies and artificial teeth are sales tax-exempt and tax-deductible medical care, tampons are not even exempted from sales tax in some states (including California and New York, two of the most populous states).

> But this is less an issue of costliness than it is of principle: menstrual care is health care, and should be treated as such. But much in the same way insurance coverage or subsidies for birth control are mocked or met with outrage, the idea of women even getting small tax breaks for menstrual products provokes incredulousness because some people lack an incredible amount of empathy … and because it has something to do with vaginas. Affordable access to sanitary products is rarely talked about outside of NGOs – and when it is, it's with shame or derision.

Now, I'm not going to address the reasoning behind the UK tax treatment (does that mean that razors are not taxed? that is admittedly odd), and I certainly can't address the cost of tampons in the UK—I suppose there could be some strange price support on wood products that artificially increases tampon cost there, but that seems unlikely. But on the whole, tampons just aren't that expensive.

But "menstrual care is health care" and, hence, should be free?

Of course the poor have trouble paying for their basic needs. That's what it means to be poor. And there are all kinds of items that fall into the category of "basic needs" that aren't covered by food stamps: TP. Soap. Toothpaste. Sunscreen. Over-the-counter medications. Or, more big-ticket items: clothing, housing, transit expenses. Or, per the news out of Detroit, water bills.

A philosophy that says, "The government should pay for every basic need, for everyone" (via vouchers designated for the purpose? free product?) simply makes no sense. That's not the government's job—unless you want to go back to advocating for the “basic income” idea, I suppose—though our welfare system and the mix of in-kind and cash benefits the American government provides the poor certainly could stand to be rationalized.

Yes, of course, the situation in developing countries is potentially a serious one, with girls leaving school in Africa due to the lack of sanitary products. But Valenti doesn’t stay there—she moves to the travails of middle-class women.

Do tampons have a special status because only women use them? Doesn’t this just seem inherently foolish, to insist on sex-specific free stuff? How far do you go? Should women get free bras? Couldn’t men get into this game, too? Men are, on average, larger, and need more calories, for instance.

But it’s ironic that the illustration I had always thought of as the counter-example to demonstrate that women don’t need free contraception for fairness’ sake is being used in precisely the opposite way.

Do they even know what “equality” and “fairness” mean?

Reprinted with permission from the blog “Jane the Actuary” – A.L.

Julie Borowski on Women Against Feminism

AVfM Video Source · 15 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Women Against Feminism campaign has exploded in recent weeks. Many feminists have responded by calling these women ignorant. They claim that they aren't aware of the definition of feminism. Is this true? Julie Borowski gives her opinion.

But men and women are the same ...

Clint Carpentier · 16 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'm gonna keep this short.

One of my neighbors is an older guy, a widower. He's been in and out of the hospital for the better part of a decade. A couple of years ago, his wife died of lung cancer. He's a good guy, keeps to himself, happy to chat in the driveway if both parties have the time; his son lives in a trailer across the park, divorced with shared custody.

Being an older guy, with aches and pains, it was only a matter of time, and I've been steeling myself for the news since he told me his wife had passed. Men typically don't live much more than a few years after the death of their spouse, and his body was already giving up the ghost. Well, I don't think the time has come just yet, but we've certainly just had a scare.

The wife woke me up this morning (she opens the daycare early), said an ambulance was in the way, and asked if I could sneak the van past it. My brain typically doesn't wake up until about ten, so I hadn't registered what she had said; but driving the van through delicate maneuvers I can do. Well, I get outside, and it's obvious that no, I can fit big things through tight spaces and do it in a mirror, but this wasn't gonna happen. And there was an ambulance in the neighbor's drive.

Maybe I can get them to back up a couple of feet. There's an ambulance. It'll just take a moment. There's a fucking ambulance … ah fuck …

So I get to his door, and he's on the floor, the paramedics have him wrapped in a blanket and buckled up. Another neighbor, a young man, was on his way to work (walks) when he heard a crash and came to inspect (bless his heart; I talked the wife into giving him a lift after). They try asking my neighbor questions, he's mumbling and incoherent from where I'm standing, at the door, at his feet. Stroke?

I'm now thinking fast, like molasses, answering what questions—asked of me—I can.

Stuff like, "Do you know anything about him?"

"Uhhh, not really." Then, "I suppose I should go tell so-n-so." And I walk away.

"Would he know anything?"

"Well, he's the son."

"Oh perfect."

While I'm thinking about definitions of perfect, I see a fire truck pull up and four guys clamor out. That's when it dawns on me: the two ambulance attendants were women. I bang on the son's door, wide open due to hot summer days, I holler, "HOY, YOUR DAD'S GOING TO THE HOSPITAL ON A STRETCHER." There's not much else to say. Bangin' and crashin', he bursts from the trailer in shorts, trailing a shirt as he hops while securing his sandals.

We get back to the old guy's place and the emergency services folk have him NOW strapped to a backboard and on a stretcher; I know the backboard was new because there were more buckles, of a different color, so the women of my rough build couldn't even get him on the backboard. Okay, so I don't know much about ambulance services and it's been over two decades since I took emergency first aid, so I may be a little biased.

Thankfully we live in a sleepy city where I make jokes about juvenile candy bar theft when I see three cop cars at a store. But the old guy was about 250 pounds, and the paramedics required a fire truck (men) to come down and carry him a total of 50 feet; hell, he crashed in the kitchen, virtually at his front door. Whatever, he's at the hospital by now; according to sound bites from the son, he's been complaining of pain in his left arm for a couple of days now, so I guess that's a heart attack?

It grinds my goat. Last year I did work for a former nurse, and she mentioned that nurses aren't allowed to lift more than 50 pounds. I had asked her—because of the nature of our town—"What patient have you seen that's under 50 pounds?" She shook her head. "What patient have you seen that's under 100 pounds?" She snorted, so I asked, "What patient have you seen under 150 pounds?" The numbers just don't make sense, until you hear the stories from male nurses, who wind up doing the "heavy lifting."

But equal pay for equal work, right … RIGHT???

“Can’t explain” – the evil of Parental Alienation

AVfM Video Source · 16 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

An excellent look at a persistent evil that hurts parents and children alike.

Communism and libertarianism won't save men

Hopeland Cash · 17 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Every movement has a goal, and every movement faces criticism. Sometimes it's criticism of the goal itself, sometimes of the method chosen to achieve it. The Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is bombarded with both, ranging from blatant attacks on the very concepts of men's rights to debates over the place of women in the movement.

Other criticisms, though, are more universal. Throughout history, every movement for social reform has faced blowback and resistance due to humanity's natural inertia. In today's globalized, digitized world, a new go-to argument has emerged: "Aren't there bigger things to worry about?"

It seems like no matter what you are fighting for, there is some bigger battle out there, and some people think you should be waging that battle. In the case of men's human rights activism, critics will point to the "broader" social ills of wealth disparity, under-education, corruption, poverty, and starvation, domestically or overseas, and argue that these are bigger issues that need addressing. Do away with poverty, they say, and men's problems will disappear. End government overreach, they attest, and men will no longer be abused.

Is it a strawman argument? Only half-straw: all fights against inequality and oppression are valid, and some do have a more sweeping impact than others, but thinking that general social reform will solve men's issues is a confusion of cause and effect.

For specific examples of this fallacy, you can look at two of the stronger currents in western social reform movements: communism (socialist/big government) and libertarianism (individualist/small government). Between the left and the right, these two ideologies encapsulate most of the ways dissatisfied citizens think governments should change. Both sides believe they have a route to a peaceful, prosperous world, though in many ways they are polar opposites.

Problem is, as usual, they forget all about the men and boys. Neither communism nor libertarianism, left alone, would ever do more than nominally improve the well-being of men. Both seek to improve the world by undoing injustices, and both have merits to be debated another time. It's not that either belief has any inherent dislike of men, but neither attempts to deal with the underlying gynocentrism that has created so many of the problems men suffer under.

In large part, this is due to their modernness. The ideals of communism and libertarianism both date to antiquity, but in the past three or four centuries they have solidified into the social reform ideologies we now know. Because of their recent history, both movements deal with modern problems. Gynocentrism, however, dates far back into human history and has become ingrained beyond recognition by most.

Take communism to start: in the modern western world, the most well-liked and praised example of communist-style collectivist ideals would probably be the heavily socialized countries of Northern Europe, and (in the US, at least) their poster-child is Sweden. High taxes and a robust welfare system have created a happy and prosperous nation.

However, as elsewhere, women are the happiest and most prosperous. In Sweden, men work more, pay the majority of the taxes, have less education, and live shorter lives than their female counterparts. Like its Scandinavian neighbors, Sweden has endeavored to equalize its citizens by having the government distribute wealth more evenly. Why, then, do men still carry the burden and collect little of the benefits?

Because men's inequality is not about money. If anything, wealth disparity is a byproduct of the hyper-competitive, misandristic societies that gynocentrism breeds. Socialists can combat income inequality all they want, but that will do nothing to reduce female privilege, the expectations for performance put on men, or the myriad social beliefs that, even in an "equal" society, leave men as the nation's workhorses and cannon fodder.

Gender inequality reaches across classes, so in a communist state we would simply transition from numerous social tiers to a mere two: male and female. From those inequalities all the plagues of consumerism and capitalism would re-emerge, undoing whatever good had been done.

Libertarianism is no better in that regard. Increasing personal freedom and removing government restrictions is an admirable goal, but it also overlooks the unique social pressures placed on men. Even in a happily anarchistic society, what is to keep women from collecting on mother privilege or from damseling so men will do all the hard/dangerous work? Some might argue that a libertarian state would "free" men and women to behave and perform as equals, but gynocentrism is too ingrained, too easily accepted, and too often chalked up to innate characteristics of the sexes.

Even in an ungoverned, free society, accusations of rape culture will still be leveled at men, blaming their "violent nature." There might not be a government to write Dear Colleague letters or prosecute without cause, but the shame and the stigma would still be there, men defenseless before generations of white knights. Men would still not be free, policed by their wives instead of the state.

Neither communism nor libertarianism tries to deal with men's issues, so their ideals of social freedom and equality are a half-measure at best. This may, in fact, be a crippling flaw. How many of the economic injustices and restrictions on the individual are born out of men being driven to compete excessively and women hiding behind their gender? If the gender inequality continues, can any ideology foster true equality?

Make no mistake, the injustices faced by men are no small matter. Some would say that mass starvation and systemic warfare are of greater importance, but consider this: the average difference in life expectancy between men and women is five years. That is lost time. Added up for the 3.5 billion men and boys in the world, that lost time is enough for 250 million whole lifetimes. Just for the men now living, their lost time taken together is more than four times the number of lives lost in World War II.

I refuse to pick and choose between terrible oppressions to fight. All must go, and ignoring any of them will forever hinder attempts to combat the others. By failing to address gynocentrism, both communism and libertarianism, and other social reform movements, gloss over a root cause of social inequality: the exploitation of men for the benefit of women.

Many of the differences in ways men and women behave and are treated seem small, but great inequalities arise from small ones. Whether it is a nanny state born from women's insecurity or exploitive workplaces preying on men's urge to perform, sexism lays the foundation for injustice. If men and women were truly treated with equal compassion, respect, and accountability, all our other social ills would be that much easier to address.

The trouble with testosterone: Will boys just be boys?

Dr. Robert Sapolsky · 17 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Face it, we all do it. We all believe certain stereotypes about certain minorities. The stereotypes are typically pejorative and usually false. But every now and then, they are true. I write apologetically as a member of a minority about which the stereotypes are indeed true. I am male. We males account for less than 50 percent of the population, yet we generate a disproportionate percentage of the violence. Whether it is something as primal as having an ax fight in an Amazonian clearing or as detached as using a computer-guided aircraft to strafe a village, something as condemned as assaulting a cripple or as glorified as killing someone wearing the wrong uniform, if it is violent, males excel at it.

Why should that be? We all think we know the answer. A dozen millennia ago or so, an adventurous soul managed to lop off a surly bull's testicles and thus invented behavioral endocrinology. It is unclear from the historical records whether this individual received either a grant or tenure as a result of the experiment, but it certainly generated an influential finding–something or other comes out of the testes that helps to make males such aggressive pains in the ass.

That something or other is testosterone.[1] The hormone binds to specialized receptors in muscles and causes those cells to enlarge. It binds to similar receptors in laryngeal cells and gives rise to operatic basses. It causes other secondary sexual characteristics, makes for relatively unhealthy blood vessels, alters biochemical events in the liver too dizzying to even contemplate, has a profound impact, no doubt, on the workings of cells in big toes. And it seeps into the brain, where it binds to those same "androgen" receptors and influences behavior in a way highly relevant to understanding aggression.

What evidence links testosterone with aggression? Some pretty obvious stuff. Males tend to have higher testosterone levels in their circulation than do females (one wild exception will be discussed later) and tend to be more aggressive. Times of life when males are swimming in testosterone (for example, after reaching puberty) correspond to when aggression peaks. Among numerous species, testes are mothballed most of the year, kicking into action and pouring out testosterone only during a very circumscribed mating season- precisely the time when male aggression soars.

Impressive, but these are only correlative data, testosterone repeatedly being on the scene with no alibi when some aggression has occurred. The proof comes with the knife, the performance of what is euphemistically known as a "subtraction" experiment. Remove the source of testosterone in species after species and levels of aggression typically plummet. Reinstate normal testosterone levels afterward with injections of synthetic testosterone, and aggression returns.

To an endocrinologist, the subtraction and replacement paradigm represents pretty damning proof: this hormone is involved. “Normal testosterone levels appear to be a prerequisite for normative levels of aggressive behavior” is the sort of catchy, hummable phrase that the textbooks would use. That probably explains why you shouldn’t mess with a bull moose during rutting season. But that’s not why a lot of people want to understand this sliver of science. Does the action of this hormone tell us anything about individual differences in levels of aggression, anything about why some males, some human males, are exceptionally violent? Among an array of males –human or otherwise- are the highest testosterone levels found in the most aggressive individuals?

Generate some extreme differences and that is precisely what you see. Castrate some of the well-paid study subjects, inject others with enough testosterone to quadruple the normal human levels, and the high-testosterone males are overwhelmingly likely to be the more aggressive ones. However, that doesn’t tell us much about the real world. Now do something more subtle by studying the normative variability in testosterone-–in other words, don’t manipulate anything, just see what everyone’s natural levels are like–and high levels of testosterone and high levels of aggression still tend to go together. This would seem to seal the case-–interindividual differences in levels of aggression among normal individuals are probably driven by differences in levels of testosterone. But this turns out to be wrong.

Okay, suppose you note a correlation between levels of aggression and levels of testosterone among these normal males. This could be because (a) testosterone elevates aggression; (b) aggression elevates testosterone secretion; (c) neither causes the other. There’s a huge bias to assume option a, while b is the answer! Study after study has shown that when you examine testosterone levels when males are first placed together in a social group, testosterone levels predict nothing about who is going to be aggressive. The subsequent behavioral differences drive the hormonal changes, rather than the other way around.

When you examine testosterone levels when males are first placed together in a social group, testosterone levels predict nothing about who is going to be aggressive.

Because of a strong bias among certain scientists, it has taken forever to convince them of this point. Behavioral endocrinologists study what behavior and hormones have to do with each other. How do you study behavior? You get yourself a notebook and a stopwatch and a pair of binoculars. How do you measure the hormones? You need a gazillion-dollar machine, you muck around with radiation and chemicals, wear a lab coat, maybe even goggles- the whole nine yards. Which toys would you rather get for Christmas? Which facet of science are you going to believe in more? Because the endocrine aspects of the business are more high-tech, more reductive, there is a bias to think that it is somehow more scientific, more powerful. This is a classic case of what is often called physics envy, the disease among scientists where the behavioral biologists fear their discipline lacks the rigor of physiology, the physiologists wish for the techniques of the biochemists, the biochemists covet the clarity of the answers revealed by molecular biologists, all the way down until you get to the physicists, who confer only with God. Hormones seem to many to be more real, more substantive, than the ephemera of behavior, so when a correlation occurs, it must be because hormones regulate behavior, not the other way around.

As I said, it takes a lot of work to cure people of that physics envy, and to see that interindividual differences in testosterone levels don’t predict subsequent differences in aggressive behavior among individuals. Similarly, fluctuations in testosterone levels within one individual over time do not predict subsequent changes in the levels of aggression in that one individual – get a hiccup in testosterone secretion one afternoon and that’s not when the guy goes postal.

Look at our confusing state: normal levels of testosterone are a prerequisite for normal levels of aggression, yet changing the amount of testosterone in someone’s bloodstream within the normal range doesn’t alter his subsequent levels of aggressive behavior. This is where, like clockwork, the students suddenly start coming to office hours in a panic, asking whether they missed something in their lecture notes.

Yes, its going to be on the final exam, and its one of the more subtle points in endocrinology- what is referred to as a hormone having a “permissive effect”. Remove someone’s testes and, as noted, the frequency of aggressive behavior is likely to plummet. Reinstate precastration levels of testosterone by injecting that hormone, and precastration levels of aggression typically return. Fair enough. Now this time, castrate an individual and restore testosterone levels to only 20 percent of normal and … amazingly, normal precastration levels of aggression come back. Castrate and now generate twice the testosterone levels from before castration- and the same level of aggressive behavior returns. You need some testosterone around for normal aggressive behavior – zero levels after castration, and down it usually goes; quadruple it (the sort of range generated in weight lifters abusing anabolic steroids), and aggression typically increases. But anywhere from roughly 20 percent of normal to twice normal and it’s all the same; the brain can’t distinguish among this wide range of basically normal values.

We seem to have figured out a couple of things by now. First, knowing the differences in the levels of testosterone in the circulation of a bunch of males will not help you much in figuring out who is going to be aggressive. Second, the subtraction and reinstatement data seem to indicate that, nevertheless, in a broad sort of way, testosterone causes aggressive behavior. But that turns out not to be true either, and the implications of this are lost on most people the first thirty times you tell them about it. Which is why you’d better tell them about it thirty-one times, because it is the most important point of this piece.

Round up some male monkeys. Put them in a group together, and give them plenty of time to sort out where they stand with each other- affiliative friendships, grudges, and dislikes. Give them enough time to form a dominance hierarchy, a linear ranking system of numbers 1 through 5. This is the hierarchical sort of system where number 3 monkey, for example, can pass his day throwing around his weight with numbers 4 and 5, ripping off their monkey chow, forcing them to relinquish the best spots to sit in, but, at the same time, remembering to deal with numbers 1 and 2 with shit-eating obsequiousness.

Hierarchy in place, it’s time to do your experiment. Take that third ranking monkey and give him some testosterone. None of this within-the-normal-range stuff. Inject a ton of it into him, way higher than what you normally see in a rhesus monkey; give him enough testosterone to grow antlers and a beard on every neuron in his brain. And, no surprise, when you then check the behavioral data, it turns out that he will probably be participating in more aggressive interactions than before.

So even though small fluctuations in the levels of the hormone don’t seem to matter much, testosterone still causes aggression. But that would be a wrong conclusion. Check out number 3 more closely. Is he now raining aggressive terror on any and all in the group, frothing in an androgenic glaze of indiscriminate violence? Not at all. He’s still judiciously kowtowing to numbers 1 and 2, but has simply become a total bastard to numbers 4 and 5. This is critical: testosterone isn’t causing aggression, it’s exaggerating the aggression that’s already there.

Another example just to show we’re serious. There’s a part of your brain that probably has lots to do with aggression, a region called the amygdala.[2] Sitting right near it is the Grand Central Station of emotion-related activity in your brain, the hypothalamus. The amygdala communicates with the hypothalamus by way of a cable of neuronal connections called stria terminalis. No more jargon, I promise. The amygdala has its influence on aggression via that pathway, with bursts of electrical excitation called action potentials that ripple down the stria terminalis, putting the hypothalamus in a pissy mood.

Once again, do your hormonal intervention; flood the area with testosterone. You can do that by injecting the hormone into the bloodstream, where it eventually makes its way to this part of the brain. Or you can be elegant and surgically microinject the stuff directly into this brain region. Six of one, half a dozen of the other. The key thing is what doesn’t happen next. Does testosterone now cause there to be action potentials surging down the stria terminalis? Does it turn on that pathway? Not at all! If and only if the amygdala is already sending an aggression-provoking volley of action potentials down the stria terminalis, testosterone increases the rate of such action potentials by shortening the resting time between them. It’s not turning on the pathway, it’s increasing the volume of signaling if it is already turned on. It’s not causing aggression, it’s exaggerating the preexisting pattern of it, exaggerating the response to environmental triggers of aggression.

This transcends issues of testosterone and aggression. In every generation, it is the duty of behavioral biologists to try to teach this critical point, one that seems a maddening cliché once you get it. You take that hoary old dichotomy between nature and nurture , between biological influences and environmental influences, between intrinsic factors and extrinsic ones, and, the vast majority of the time, regardless of which behavior you are thinking about and what underlying biology you are studying, the dichotomy is a sham. No biology. No environment. Just the interaction between the two.

Do you want to know how important environment and experience are in understanding testosterone and aggression? Look back at how the effects of castration were discussed earlier. There were statements like “Remove the source of testosterone in species after species and levels of aggression typically plummet.” Not “Remove the source … and aggression always goes to zero.” On average it declines, but rarely to zero, and not at all in some individuals. And the more social experience an individual had being aggressive prior to castration, the more likely that behavior persists sans cojones. Social conditioning can more than make up for the hormone.

Another example, one from one of the stranger corners of the animal kingdom: If you want your assumptions about the nature of boy beasts and girl beasts challenged, check out the spotted hyena. These animals are fast becoming the darlings of endocrinologists, sociobiologists, gynecologists, and tabloid writers. Why? Because they have a wild sex-reversal system- females are more muscular and more aggressive than males and are socially dominant over them, rare traits in the mammalian world. And get this: females secrete more of certain testosterone-related hormones than males do, producing the muscles, the aggression (and, as a reason for much of the gawking interest in these animals, wildly masculinized private parts that make it supremely difficult to tell the sex of the hyena). So this appears to be a strong vote for the causative powers of high androgen levels in aggression and social dominance. But that’s not the whole answer. High up in the hills above the University of California at Berkley is the world’s largest colony of spotted hyenas, massive bone-crunching beasts who fight with each other for the chance to have their ears scratched by Laurence Frank, the zoologist who brought them over as infants from Kenya. Various scientists are studying their sex-reversal system. The female hyenas are bigger and more muscular than the males and have the same weirdo genitals ands elevated androgen levels that their female cousins do back in the savannah. Everything is in place except … the social system is completely different from that in the wild. Despite being stoked on androgens, there is a very significant delay in the time it takes for the females to begin socially dominating the males- they’re growing up without the established social system to learn from.

When people first grasp the extent to which biology has something to do with behavior, even subtle, complex, human behavior, there is often an initial evangelical enthusiasm of the convert, a massive placing of faith in the biological components of the story. And this enthusiasm is typically of a fairly reductive type–because of physics envy, because reductionism is so impressive, because it would be so nice if there were a single gene or hormone or neurotransmitter or part of the brain that was it, the cause, the explanation of everything. And the trouble with testosterone is that people tend to think this way in an arena that really matters.

This is no mere academic concern. We are a fine species with some potential. Yet we are racked with sickening amounts of violence. Unless we are hermits, we feel the threat of it, often as a daily shadow. And regardless of where we hide, should our leaders push the button, we will all be lost in a final global violence. But as we try to understand and wrestle with this feature of our sociality, it is critical to remember the limits of biology. Testosterone is never going to tell us much about the suburban teenager who, in his after-school chess club, has developed a particularly aggressive style with his bishops. And it certainly isn’t going to tell us much about the teenager in some inner—city hellhole who has taken to mugging people. “Testosterone equals aggression” is inadequate for those who would offer a simple excuse: Boys will be boys and certain things in nature are inevitable. Violence is more complex than a single hormone. This is endocrinology for the bleeding heart liberal – our behavioral biology is usually meaningless outside the context of social factors and environment in which is occurs.

Notes:

[1] Testosterone is one of a family of related hormones, collectively known as “androgens” or “anabolic steroids.” They all are secreted by the testes or are the result of a modification of testosterone, they all have similar chemical structure, and they all do roughly similar things. Nonetheless, androgen mavens spend entire careers studying the important differences in the actions of different androgens. I am going to throw that subtlety to the wind and, for the sake of simplification that will horrify many, will refer throughout to all of these related hormones as “testosterone.”

[2] And no one has shown that differences in the size or shape of the amygdala, or differences in the numbers of neurons in it, can begin to predict differences in normal levels of aggression. Same punch line as with testosterone.

Further reading:

For a good general review of the subject, see E. Monaghan and S. Glickman, “Hormones and Aggressive Behavior,” in J. Becker, M. Breedlove, and D. Crews, eds., Behavioral Endocrinology (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1992), 261. This also has an overview of the hyena social system, as Glickman heads the study of the Berkley hyenas. For technical papers on the acquisition of the female dominance in hyenas, see S. Jenks, M. Weldele, L. Frank, and S. Glickman, “Acquisition of Matrilineal Rank in Captive Spotted Hyenas: Emergence of a National Social System in Peer-Reared Animals and Their Offspring,” Animal Behavior 50 (1995): 893; and L. Frank, S. Glickman, and C. Zabel, “Ontogeny of Female Dominance in the Spotted Hyena: Perspectives from Nature and Captivity,” in P. Jewell and G. Maloiy, eds., “The Biology of Large African Mammals in Their Environment,” Symposium of the Zoological Society of London 61 (1989): 127.

I have emphasized that while testosterone levels in the normal range do not have much to do with aggression, a massive elevation of exposure, as would be seen in anabolic steroid abusers, does usually increase aggression. For a recent study in which even elevating into that range (approximately five times normal level) still had no effect on mood or behavior, see S. Bhasin, T. Storer, N. Berman, and colleagues, “The Effects of Supra-physiologic Doses of Testosterone on Muscle Size and Strength in Normal Men,” New England Journal of Medicine 335 (1996): 127.

The study showing that raising testosterone levels in the middle-ranking monkey exaggerates preexisting patterns of aggression can be found in A. Dixon and J. Herbert, “Testosterone, Aggressive Behavior and Dominance Rank in Captive Adult Male Talapoin Monkeys (Miopithecus talapoin), ” Physiology and Behavior 18 (1977): 539. For the demonstration that testosterone shortens the resting period between action potentials in neurons, see K. Kendrick and R. Drewett, “Testosterone Reduces Refractory Period of Stria Terminalis Neurons in the Rat Brain,” Science 204 (1979): 877.

This article was originally published in ‘The Trouble With testosterone, And Other Essays on The Human Predicament’ by Robert M. Sapolsky, and made available for AVfM by permission of the author. –Eds

KSUM thanks you

AVfM Video Source · 17 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

So many people have pitched in to enable Male Students in Peril, KSUM's conference on educational equity issues affecting men and boys. A few days ago, KSUM reached its $13,000 goal, and Sage has some words for the people responsible for this exciting outcome.

All KSUM needs you to do now is to be there to see history in the making. If you want to meet Paul Elam, Karen Straughan, Janice Fiamengo, Jonathan Taylor, and others, go ahead and grab your free ticket.

Boko Haram continues to kill and kidnap men and boys. The world is silent

Lucian Vâlsan · 18 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A few days ago, Boko Haram organized another raid in the northeastern part of Nigeria, this time kidnapping 97 men and boys and killing 28 other men. Additionally, 6 older men were also killed as the raid was ending, raising the total death toll to 34.

In the words of Halima Adamu, an eye-witness describing the raid to the press:

> They left no men or boys in the place; only young children, girls and women.[…] They were shouting 'Allah Akbar' (God is greatest), shooting sporadically. There was confusion everywhere. They started parking our men and boys into their vehicles, threatening to shoot whoever disobey[sic] them. Everybody was scared.

And what is the opinion of the rest of the world? Crickets, more crickets and total silence. The article on CNN has zero comments (despite being roughly 72 hours old), the report from Al Jazeera has 50-something comments, mostly trolls, and other smaller sources barely get over 10 comments.

In other words, it's fair to say that the rest of the world did not even find out that this monstrosity even occurred. Moreover, all the articles reporting on the event insist on mentioning the sole event in Boko Haram's history when they kidnapped girls – presumably as a way for the few readers to even remember who or what Boko Haram is.

In comparison, the whole world reacted to the blatantly false news that ISIS (aka Islamic State/IS) issued a fatwa that mandates circumcision on all women in the area. Even after the piece of news was proven beyond all reasonable doubt to be false, the "event" could still been heard weeks after being quoted as a fact in various corners of European and North-American media.

Now, make no mistake, ISIS (just like Boko Haram) is truly the biggest threat to all the people in those areas and these movements should be crushed by all means in order to prevent even more fatalities and more oppression.

This time, the media did not commit the sin of omission nor the sin of pandering that Barbara Kay talked about on the International Conference on Men's Issues – yet the news still was buried fairly quickly. How come?

Well, the answer really is that simple: gynocentrism.

And because of gynocentrism, stories like these will get little to no airtime and little to no analysis. When the terrorist group kidnapped (but did not kill) 234 girls (a lot of them being free now), the whole world talked about this for a few days. Talk shows were set up even in countries that have no connection whatsoever with the issue. And what's even more interesting is that in those talk shows it was seldom mentioned that in the same raid 16 people (read: mostly men) were killed.

Being kidnapped by a bunch of religious extremists is a very bad situation. But being killed is far-worse. Yet merely pointing that out is now an act of misogyny or endorsement of female oppression. And no, those people who say such things are not joking.

Politics does not (and will not, anytime soon) help change this either. The anti-Islamic Right has very little interest in airing these kinds of stories because the victimization of men doesn't bring them audience. No one cashes in on apathy. The pro-Islamic and/or pro-Feminist Left also has very little interest in these kinds of stories as well because the victimization of men has a similar lack of payoff.

This year alone, Boko Haram killed 2000 people – most of them civilian men. Since 2009, the figure goes as high as 5,000 fatalities. On top of that, Boko Haram kidnapped 161 men (97 now, 60 in June, one in July and three in May) just this year alone. Yet every single article about this group mentions only the incident where women were involved.

Is Boko Haram is a misandrist group? No, not really. Boko Haram is a fucked-in-the-head religious extremist group. Their motivation is not misandry – but religious supremacy, a worldview that affects men and women differently but essentially oppresses everyone.

However, Europe and North America's elites are driven to a certain extent by a worldview that completely disregards male suffering at best or blames those very male victims for what happened to them at worst. Is there a "solution" to the Boko Haram problem? I don't think so, and I don't purport to have it. But it would be a very healthy first step towards a more honest discourse if we would at the very least come to a point where we view violence (Islamic or otherwise) as an issue affecting humans – not just women.

Carnell Smith: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Carnell Smith · 18 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We will over the next few weeks present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. Here we bring you Carnell Smith's speech, the third presentation from Day 2, Saturday, June 28, 2014. Our thanks once again to Rick Westlake for doing the bulk of the work of this transcription. —DE (Attila Vinczer) One second—Stop, stop, stop—we have four books to give away …

So, start looking at your numbers.

The first one is Bachelor Pad Economics by Aaron Clarey. I'd also like to take this opportunity to thank Aaron for his very generous contribution to this event …

(Fade-out/fade-back.)

Our next speaker is Carnell Smith, who will be talking about paternity fraud. I had the distinct pleasure of spending some time with him yesterday afternoon—well, early evening. And we will have Fred Jones make this introduction. Please put your hands together.

(Applause. Fred Jones takes the podium.)

Test … Possibility, passion, and persistence are the core principles by which our next speaker lives by. As a leading international expert that won his own case after appealing to the United States Supreme Court, Carnell Smith is a national spokesman on family law and DNA-testing issues. He helps people use the law to reclaim their power.

He has written model law, and consulted on legislation in more than ten states. Featured as a guest expert on Dr. Phil, Fox Business News, CBS Early Show, Univision, Fuji TV in Japan, TIME Magazine, Men's Health Magazine, Reason Magazine, ABC Radio show with Michael Baisman, NPR Radio with Tavis Smiley, Michael Smerconish radio show, the Frank Ski Show, Rolonda Watts show, Jesse Bonds show, Al Sharpton, and many other syndicated talk shows.

Smith is a coach, advocate, speaker, workshop leader, and frequent contributor to TV, radio, newspaper, magazine, and film projects in the United States and abroad. He founded the Citizens Against Paternity Fraud advocacy group, founded the 4Truth Identity DNA Center, co-founded the National Family Justice Association, which is a 501c3 non-profit, launched the PaternityFraud.com and 911DNATest.com websites. Just for the record, I've known this young man more than 15 years. And I'm just reading this to be obedient. So stay with me, okay?

Carnell—but it's all true! He's authored the Georgia Senate Paternity Fraud Report and the District of Columbia paternity-fraud reports; co-produced "Secret Identity," the paternity-fraud basis of a movie; co-produced Real Life Media TV CDs; consulted for a paternity-fraud survey with Sharon Squires, Ph.D.; created the Naked Truth University workshop series; created the Operation Social Impact program; founded Carnell Smith Unlimited, a solution-focused consulting firm. His philosophy is "The Mission Is Possible, regardless of the odds, when you make up your mind to go for it." Smith will release his book, Mission Possible: The Carnell Smith Story, coming 2014, this fall, subtitled, "You don't have to pay for a child that's not yours."

Would you please help me welcome my friend and Mission Possible strategist, Mr. Carnell Smith.

(Applause. Carnell Smith takes the podium.)

All's good … I'm wired … Good morning! It is a pleasure to be invited here, to the First Conference on Men's Issues. And … paternity fraud is indeed one of the men's issues.

I was asked to speak about paternity fraud and misandry, but it wouldn't be fair, after Tom and I talked, that I not pull the skirt off of, and reveal … "Cupcake Chronicles." You will find out some things today about Cupcake—and

I'm using Cupcake to protect the names of the guilty. But many people make a bad mistake, or try to assume that paternity fraud is "men versus women," when the truth of the matter is, it is us against an unjust system that is financed by the Evil Empire.

But they made a mistake. They made a mistake of trapping an alpha male, who is an engineer, a trouble-shooter, an escalation-crisis manager … What is the chance that an alpha male is going to lick the hand of the person that trapped him in the cage? Not a chance! … And I'm also an invisible Honey Badger, in case anybody …

A man thought that his troubles were over. He paid child support 15, 16 … and he had a spot marked on his calendar. He had the 18th birthday, for his daughter, marked on the calendar. And when that day came, he got his checkbook out, he was ready to throw a party, he wrote that check, and he said, "I want you to take this check to your mother, and I want you to tell her this is the last dime she'll ever get out of me."

The young lady takes the check, she goes back, she hands it to her mom, and then she comes back … with this rather surprising look on her face, she says, "Well, Mom says you're not my daddy!"

Not funny, is it?

In fact, it is probably one of the cruelest forms of deception … betrayal. Because if it were up to us men, and we could work with the person who had deceived us, we could solve the problem, right there. But now, let's bring in the Evil Empire that finances the child-support enforcement system. And there are billions of dollars. And their goal is to get massive numbers of paternities established … and may I say, by any means necessary. And herein lies the problem about paternity fraud.

Now, I want you to know that I catch a lot of heat over the fact that I—over 14 years, now, I insist on maintaining the name 'paternity fraud.' But it wouldn't be fair to you that I not tell you what it's defined as.

Most people are okay with the part about a lawsuit being established, to make a man support his child. Yeah, okay, that's cool! We want guys to step up to the plate. We want responsible men to step up to the plate and take care of his child. But there's a little problem here.

The definition, within Parson's Law, Black's Law Dictionaries, and a few others, that says "the willful and knowing concealment of a material fact constitutes fraud." Let's put the two together, then. Cupcake alleges that someone caused her pregnancy, while she knowingly hides the existence of other paternity candidates. Or how about this? He didn't do it—and she knew that he didn't do it. However, she has a motivation … because I'm going to talk about four ways that paternity fraud happens.

Remember now, I didn't name names; she is Cupcake, okay? Let's keep that straight, for the record.

Cupcake is not limited to one race. Cupcake is not just limited to one status of whether single or married. Cupcake cuts across religious lines, socioeconomic lines. She has cousins—in fact, you probably know Cupcake. After today, you might know someone who needs to be warned that they're in a relationship with Cupcake.

But in spite of all of that, Cupcake is really a tool of the Evil Empire, and she herself is being used—but as long as she's getting paid … Let's ask Cupcake: Cupcake, do you see anything wrong with lying for money? "N'uh-uh, no, no, no, not—mm-mm, No!" But … it wouldn't be fair to you, without breaking this down a little further.

So the four things, the four ways that paternity fraud actually happens is … single men, and teen boys; and in the United States, they've crafted a very good technique to take advantage of this thing, we men who like to provide and protect. And we tell them, "We need you to come to the hospital, because your baby's here; and you want your baby to have a father, don't you?"

And he's like, "Yeah, well, I'll sign that, sure."

Only problem is, they already have a deal with Cupcake: "Now, Cupcake, you can't get your child support if you don't get his autograph."

Now, he comes to the hospital expecting to find a child that's whose? His! He doesn't know, though, that the hospital staff are getting paid $20 to $50 for each paternity confession that they get signed … yes, I'm being a little smart-ass when using the term "confession." We're asking him to sign a document admitting to a pregnancy with no proof—just on the word of Cupcake. Now, does Cupcake have any incentive to hide material facts? Anybody, do you believe she has an incentive? … Yes, she does.

And if you have a—if you're a parent of a teenage boy, did you know that your income can be factored into the equation for child support for your un-emancipated son? Now, Cupcake doesn't see a problem with that. I sure as heck do!

The next area that happens is called "marital paternity fraud." Marital paternity fraud is based on the common law. Lord Mansfield actually believed that any children born while the wife was married to the husband were automatically his children. Beautiful concept. In fact, in terms of ideology, we're like, "Yeah! Yeah, that's right!" But Blackstone put a couple of exceptions in there—EXCEPT when he didn't have access to her, during the time of conception. Except when he was away on the high seas for more than nine months. And, as you heard earlier today, the children were actually his property. So he didn't really have to lose anything, other than the fact that he had been shammed by a cuckolding wife.

The next one is "default judgment." In the United States, they have crafted the art to where the only thing that's required to make you the father is the pen of a judge, or an administrative-hearing officer, who is not an elected judge. But if your case falls under administrative law, in the United States, it can have the weight and the enforcement of a judge.

Now, what is the problem when there is an incorrect default paternity judgment? I mean, Cupcake, she would never say, "Your Honor, this is my baby's father, and he refuses to support his child." And the judge says, "Oh, heck no! We're not having that! Where is he? Bring that scalawag here! We will—girl, you just be still, I'll get that wallet for you."

However, Cupcake gave the judge the wrong address. And the guy who's accused does not make it to that first hearing. And in the State of California, they were so good at perfecting, getting default judgments, that in 2005 they were able to get 70%—nearly 380,000—paternities established by the power of the pen.

And then they said, "It's your fault that you didn't make it to that first court hearing."

"But, Your Honor, I was deployed in Afghanistan at the time. And for me to be the father, she would have to have had a gestation of 11 months! Your Honor, you can add, can't you?"

"Don't you say another word."

You still have to respect the power and authority of the court, but—"Your Honor, can you bring Cupcake here? I mean, if I had a kid that she carried for 11 months, I want to see this! In fact, let's call the TV crews! 'Cause this is a major feat—this should be, like, the Ninth Wonder of the World!"

Unfortunately, for men and teen boys that miss that first hearing, his problem's going to be that at this point there's now an order established. And the Child Support Enforcement attorney says, "Your Honor, it's not our duty to determine if he's the father. We have an order here, and it's the court's job to enforce this order." And Cupcake's over there, going, "Yeahhh! Your job, Your Honor, is to get my money." So ordered. So ordered.

And I know, by the looks of some of your faces, you're like, "Man, that guy is putting us on, man, that stuff doesn't happen!"

What about this last category? "Mistaken identity."

I had a client, who is a young man, who was going to the Atlanta airport; he was going to pick up a relative who was coming in town. He made a wrong turn, and he ended up going up a one-way street. Now, the local law enforcement saw this, and decided that he needed to be educated on proper driving. And, they ran his name, after he showed his ID—he apologized profusely for making this wrong turn; he was trying to get to the airport to pick up his relative. What he didn't know—there was a guy who had a warrant for outstanding child support, who had exactly the same name that he did.

You have no idea what happens next, so I'm going to tell you what happens next: this is what happened next. (Crosses his hands behind his back.) Even though the warrant described a guy who was six-foot-one, 140 pounds, who was as lovely-complected as I am. Only problem is, this young man, who became my client and I got an attorney for him—and I offered him my DNA-testing services, 'cause if he was right, I wanted to make sure that Cupcake got all of the credit she so richly deserved!

And they put this young man in jail for three days; and because he complained so much, the jailer modified the information on the warrant to match my client that was locked up!

Here's the problem: My client had the same name, but he was only five-foot-six. And he was also muscular. And he also had a much lighter complexion than me. I could tell that this guy didn't look like the guy in the warrant, without my glasses! And I'm extremely nearsighted, so … Dogs run out of the way when I'm driving, so you don't want me driving without my glasses, but … I believe that the local law enforcement were capable of identifying the correct person versus the warrant.

Here's what it took for us to extricate my client out of that mess: we actually had to file a motion and demand that Cupcake be picked up, bring her and her child to the court, so that I could provide the legal DNA collection services with full chain-of-custody, photograph, fingerprint; add tracking to and from the lab; and I was going to do a rush job on this because, you know, if my guy was really guilty, then, you know, he should be responsible! Right?

Well, Cupcake came reluctantly to court, with an escort, because we insisted that she come to appear before the court to identify this person. And Cupcake says, 'That ain't him!' And the court—I said, Well, let's order the DNA test, so that my client will never, ever, have to face this again. And the court, in its infinite wisdom, said, No … No.

I consider that to be a travesty of justice.

Dr. Martin Luther King said that a threat to justice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere. And if we can do this to a guy whose only fault was making the wrong turn, to fall in the scope and radar of the local law enforcement—because he had the same name, that he didn't get to pick, by the way; I guess he could blame his parents—but to put him in jail for three days, and then try to cover it up by modifying the warrant! But you do know that there are records that you can subpoena … oh, I'm also an expert witness for court, by the way. And since I was one of those people that got caught in that trap, I make it my mission to help those people who've been caught and tricked. They deserve to have justice. They need to have a fair day, because the decision should be made once and for all.

But let me tell you something else about Cupcake. See, I have other clients. And I had a married guy, who thought that he was the Ultimate Guy—he was Mister Handsome. He was so good, and so good-looking, that he felt that he should have a wife and a girlfriend. Now, this is not a debate about what's right and what's wrong … but his girlfriend was tired of his wife, and the fact that he wouldn't leave his wife.

The girlfriend filed for child support and invoked the power of the Evil Empire against him. And the wife, when she got that warrant, and had the police come serve her husband—she said, "Well, I want a paternity test on the girlfriend's children! Both of them!" Well … the girlfriend said, "Well, he should get a paternity test on your kids, too!"

And the attorney for Mister Handsome knows that I provide services on-site, live, at the courtroom, says, "Well, let's settle the matter. Why don't we do DNA testing on all of them?" And I said, You know, that's a fine idea. That's a fine idea. So I provided the services, and in about three days, the truth came back. He was married to Cupcake, and he was also dating Cupcake! All of the children from the girlfriend, Child 1 and Child 2, are not his; all of the children from his wife are not his. But only men get credit for this type of activity.

I want you to know that Mister Handsome didn't feel too big and too bad after this. In fact, he turned in his Player Card, 'cause Cupcake showed him, "Fool, we wrote the rules here." There's one good thing that happened for him: we helped him determine what the facts were before there was a court order against him. His life would have been extremely difficult had it not been that his lawyers knew me, because I was providing services on-site at court. He would have, in most circumstances, been ordered to pay child support for four children that are not his; to have his income calculated based on his gross income; and, oh, by the way, you can't visit them. I'm going to talk about "best interests of the child" as one of the objections of why I say the law should be changed.

But the other thing that would have helped him is that in my state, Georgia, there is legislation on the books that says, any time there's an open court order, and you can meet the conditions, the court will have to address this issue. But there's only two states in the whole United States that have an unlimited time limit; and that's Georgia, where I am the guy, the alpha male, who was willing to "open up a can of whoop" because they picked on me and my family, and they told me that my wife and my newborn daughter didn't matter. They told me that they're invisible, because this order that's before the court … the only one that we're talking about is the child from your former girlfriend.

And I found out, after 11 years, this beautiful, intelligent, witty little girl, that I and my family loved dearly, is not my child. And the first thing that Cupcake said, "That DNA test can't be right." So—me being the sporting guy that I am—"You pick any lab that you want to, and I'll take another test! This time, with you." Well, sure enough, the lab that she picked—took a lot longer than our lab; we aren't trying to compare here, but—results come back, zero point zero percent paternity. And she's like, "I have no idea what happened."

I don't want to make light of this, but see, the impact to men, in the area of paternity fraud, is so intertwined and intertangled with all of the other things that happen to men, throughout this human rights movement, this fathers' rights movement, is that men become depressed—nervous breakdown—stressed—because the Evil Empire then pulls a gun on him and says, "You're going to give up that money or you're going to jail."

I don't know about you, but that could be some powerful motivation to say, "I will not be silenced. I will not just lie down and take this. I will fight this if it's my last dying breath, and I'm going to do so on national television; because as a man who's born in America, a free man, I'm going to call out my state for supporting slavery against men—involuntary servitude." Because what you do in paternity fraud is, you turn that man and that boy into a wage-slave. And therefore, he becomes "income-producing property."

And as a wage-slave, he is income-producing property of the Evil Empire. And why should the Evil Empire change its order of business—you know, modus operandi—why should they change that, because we got him! "Well, Your Honor, it's his fault that he didn't figure out that Cupcake tricked him." And Cupcake says, "Yeah! That's right! I tricked him fair and square!"

And it's only funny to the people who don't understand what it's like, that, for us guys who love being an active dad. We love being involved with our kids. But when you're a paternity-fraud victim, and you even want to have a relationship with a child that you now found out is not yours … the infinite wise court says, "But you're not a relative!" WTF?—well, that means What The Freak for me, okay? I mean … feel free to use your own definition, okay?

But the same court says to me—the parents that have teen sons, those married men—the same court says, "But now, get your hand off that wallet. Now that's ours. Look—we got it first, you didn't figure it out, and therefore we're going to keep you on the Pay or Go to Jail. And oh, by the way, if you lose your job, or your job loses you, you're still responsible for making that payment at the same level while you're unemployed."

And if you don't think that actually happens, feel free to visit PaternityFraud.com, and look on my website at a young man named Frank Hatley. And Frank had a girlfriend, named Cupcake! And Cupcake told Frank, "I'm pregnant, and you're the baby's father." And Frank was like, "Yeah! I'm going to be a daddy, and it's a son!" But somebody told him that, well, you know, Cupcake has some extracurricular friends. Say it with me: Whaaaat? "Yes.

Yes, she has extracurricular friends." So he gets a paternity test, and sure enough, "You Are NOT the Father." And—to fair-minded, sensible people—we would say, Well, the problem's over with, right? It's done.

That's not what happened for Frank … Frank, then, lost his job. Or should I say, his job lost him? Because the company downsized. They were having some tough times, and they had to cut back on their staffing. And our good friend Frank, here, ends up living on unemployment. And then when unemployment ran out, Frank lived in his car.

Remember, I said that Frank's got a paternity test that proved he's been framed for a pregnancy that he didn't commit, and we can prove it.

Well, once his unemployment ran out, he no longer had any money to pay on the child support. And the judge and the child-support enforcement attorney promptly requested that he be jailed and incarcerated. And by the way, we'll let him out when he pays the back money. Sounds fair to you, right? After all, she tricked him fair-and-square.

The only person who had compassion on Frank was the sheriff at the jail. They contacted the Southern Law Human Rights Center in Atlanta. Well, by this time, the law that I had won with … Frank was just the guy that I was looking for, who couldn't afford to fight back; who couldn't put up $20,000, like I did, for a retainer. I didn't feel that no one should have to pay for their freedom—because the price of justice was just too darn high!

That law got Frank out of jail, erased all of the child-support arrears, and he is now happily living with his family. But guess what? He's still hurting. He's been wounded, emotionally, financially … and guess what? He has a record now. And did you know that in some places, the fact that he's been in jail—they won't ask why; the fact that he was locked up is "his fault."

In all fairness, not trying to titillate you, but you should be aware that there is a problem when I can tell you that, over the last 10 years, there have been over one million men tested in the United States, and over 33% of them, depending on which year, turned out to not be the fathers. And we are not sure that all of them have been set free.

So from my perspective as the alpha male who's caught in the trap, we must study this thing. There is something required in order to prevent this problem. So I found a woman who is the head of a child-support enforcement agency, and she had a brilliant idea: she said we should do DNA testing at birth! I was like, yeah …

You're not going to clap after this, though: she said a woman shouldn't be forced to put her husband's name on the birth certificate when the boyfriend is the daddy. And people said, "Yeah, it should be her choice!"

Carnell Smith comes along and says the same thing that she said—well, we should do automatic DNA testing at birth because that would stop paternity fraud within a week of leaving the hospital. Lo and behold, I've been told that I'm against women—"What about the best interests of the child?" I'm like, Well, what about every child having the right to know that the truth's on their birth certificate?

Cupcake, in her infinite wisdom, says, "No, but you're trying to be unfair. You're not being reasonable—and quit trying to confuse us with the facts! 'Cause, it's all about the child." Until you say, Well, the best interests of the child, why does that include having a relationship—why not have a relationship with the children that ARE yours?

I told Cupcake, in my case, that my family and I love your daughter. And we're willing to still do for her because of our relationship with her. And Cupcake said, "If you're not willing to pay me money under the Pay-or-Go-to-Jail Evil Empire, you cannot see her." I was like, You sure about that? And in all the media stories, only one or two you'll find that I was the guy still trying to see the child who wasn't mine, but outside of the court system. I understood the power of the Evil Empire.

And the solution for this whole mess? If we could get Cupcake to tell the truth 100% of the time, before there was a court order, before there was a no-fault divorce, before there was a transfer of marital assets and property, I think we could have worked it out—we could have solved it, and said, Well, look, just let us have a relationship.

Some of you may have seen me on the Dr. Phil show, where I debated a very—well, maybe not debated, maybe a spirited discussion—with the attorney Gloria Allred. According to the audience, I won that debate. Because here was the tipping-point question: Gloria Allred said that my client, who was there with me, the doctor—he should have known that Cupcake was lying to him because he has a medical doctorate degree! And I said, Yes, okay, yes, he's supposed to be like Mister Spock and able to apply a Vulcan Mind Meld Technique—like, boy, are you way off base! I said, If she's woman enough to have the affair, she should be woman enough to step up to the plate and say, yes, I messed up my marriage. Yes, I did that, and I'll be responsible.

I want to part with this: the laws can be changed. But you have to first believe that it's possible. If you do nothing, then nothing changes.

People contact me saying they know someone who's affected. Now, you've got a choice. You can go try to do what I've done now for 14 years, and run the risk of doing it wrong; or you can hire people like me and Diana Thompson and Murray Davis, who have been effective in getting legislation in place, writing laws—and by the way, in my state, I garnered over 99.5% of the support of both houses and the governor. It's not a partisan issue. It's a human rights issue. Men and boys are good!

You need to know about Cupcake. Cupcake is used by the Evil Empire, to meet their quota of paternities—numbers. But nowhere in the financing of the state does it say they have to be accurate paternity establishments. Expose the issue. Expose the fact that there are solutions, and there are people, like the alpha man, the dude that wouldn't quit, the guy who's a proud member of the Open Can of Whoop Club …

Will you join me?

(Applause. Attila Vinczer comes on stage, and Carnell Smith leaves the podium.)

Carnell, thank you so much—your work is invaluable. The conditions that men face in this area are daunting, and simply just unbelievable. Thank you.

Is libertarianism the undercurrent of the MHRM?

Dean Esmay · 18 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish.

Politics, most especially in the United States, has become so incredibly polarized that there is a tendency to instantly identify anyone and everyone as either "leftist" or "right-wing," "wingnut" versus "moonbat." When politically-oriented publications take a look at the Men's Human Rights Movement, they tend either to be bewildered and out of their depth, or to try to pin a label on us that won't stick.

Full disclosure before I say more: I at one time considered myself a diehard liberal Democrat (of the U.S. variety). I got older and I became a libertarian. I got older and became a Republican (again, of the U.S. variety). Then I got older still and threw it all away, and now refuse to self-identify as anything but a classical liberal and a pragmatist, which is where I've been for more than 10 years and will likely be for the rest of my life. I think Ayn Rand was as nutty as Karl Marx, and I think Von Mises and Keynes both had valid points of view. Sorry, ideologues, you don't have to like it, I am who I am, so if you need to split the world into binary "you're either this or you're that," then fine, assign me your favorite label and just walk away.

Now, for those of you who can think independently:

It's been noted on more than one occasion that there seem to be an awful lot of libertarians in the Men's Human Rights Movement and that noted men's advocates like Karen Straughan and Paul Elam have been asked to speak at various libertarian events. Some have even asked whether or not some variety of conservatism and/or libertarianism is a requirement to be in the Men's Human Rights Movement.

Part of the answer lies in this: Straughan and Elam have made it clear that they would happily speak to Greens, socialists, traditional conservatives, Democrats, Republicans, or anyone else: the libertarians are just the only ones with the courage to ask. At the moment.

Some so-called MRAs, believe it or not, have answered with a firm "Yes, you must be libertarian (or conservative)" and will not tolerate a fellow MRA who does not toe that political line. It's hard not to notice, however, that every so-called MRA who takes that stance has rendered themselves almost irrelevant to the mainstream of a growing movement, their audiences static or even shrinking as the rest of us continue to grow while requiring no ideological purity tests, no adherence to left or right, no adherence to any political party.

Yet still, it's hard not to notice that there are a lot of libertarians running around, even here on A Voice for Men. It's hard to say if they're a majority, but they're probably a disproportionate share of the audience. The question then naturally comes to the suspicious mind: Is the MHRM a stalking horse for libertarianism?

My own answer is a firm "no." I believe that libertarians are attracted to the Men's Human Rights Movement because they tend to see evil in government faster than others—it's sort of embedded in their philosophy—and it's hard not to notice when you really look at things and see that most government programs these days are geared primarily toward either helping women or that nebulous blob called "women and children," with, of course, boy children no longer being part of the "women and children" blob once they hit puberty. (Indeed, even while prepubescent, boy-children still often receive distinctly less favorable treatment by many government programs these days.)

When my leftist friends talk to me about the anti-government sentiment often found in MHRM circles, I always ask them this:

When a great mass of people experience a state that does little or nothing that helps them in a way they can see, and experiences only indifference when it's not outright punishment from that state, what do you think their reaction is eventually going to be? If government is doing a terrible job on helping boys and men, and is frequently hurting them—and it is—why the hell wouldn't people conscious of these issues start developing a distinct aversion to the state?

What is it that you think is going on in Ferguson, Missouri, right now? If your answer is “race war” or “the ns are just acting like thugs again,” please turn around and go find another website to read. The real answer is, it’s people who feel they have no stake whatsoever in the system, and that the state can’t be trusted to do anything but ignore them at best or shoot them dead at worst.

They do not trust the government. Why? Because they have been given no good reason to trust it and a list of reasons a mile long not to trust it.

Liberal whinging about racism isn’t going to fix it either. It really won’t. One more lecture about racism will just cause every beat cop to sit stone-faced, hearing nothing he hasn’t heard before, but not really change anything because what those cops mostly face is a citizenry that doesn’t like or trust them. Race isn’t the ultimate issue; the issue is that those cops’ jobs aren’t centered around helping the people they’re supposed to serve. That’s not ultimately their fault, it’s the design of the system itself.

I am certain there are angry Sharptonesque Black people, and dumbass self-righteous White liberals, reading this now who are guffawing and saying of course it’s all about race. But sorry, punks, I’ve been around: I’ve been in predominately Black cities with predominately Black cops, Black city council, Black mayor, Black police chief, Black in every direction you looked with lily-white Dean the only Casper in sight, and seen Black cops treat Black kids exactly the same way the White cops in places like Ferguson do. It just rarely makes the national news because they can’t pin a racial angle on it.

If you live in Detroit Michigan, or Compton California, or Inkster Michigan, or Dayton Ohio, or New Orleans Louisiana, you may well be a Black 19-year-old kid who gets his ass whupped by a gang of angry Black cops, run up on phony charges by a Black prosecutor, defended by a Black public defender who doesn’t give a crap about you, thrown into prison by a Black judge, and watched over by Black guards while they sodomize your Black ass in the showers.

If you think it’s all about race, think again: it’s about a system that offers no hope and no security to people, and most especially doesn’t give a damn about young men, who are fully expected to fend for themselves no matter what obstacles in life they face and what lack of real opportunities they have.

They get the message loud and clear: “If you care about us at all, the only thing you care about us is how to hurt us or at least make us disappear.”

And in one way or another, that increasingly is the feeling of a growing number of men of all races and ethnicities.

Indeed, my prediction is that the minute struggling men figure out that race is not the main barrier the system has put in place against them, that it’s their sex, the world will change pretty damned quick.

I expect libertarians to have a disproportionately loud voice in the men’s movement because, say whatever else you will about libertarians, when government is doing evil, they see it pretty damn fast. And when people feel downtrodden, a “don’t trust government, government sucks” message is a pretty easy sell.

What this should do for liberals and conservatives, leftists and rightists, is not provide an excuse to dismiss the issues. What it should be doing is causing leftists and rightists to start asking themselves how they can do a better job.

Let’s say you’re an old-school leftist or liberal: I will remind you that the left had its genesis in a group of people they unashamedly called “the working man.” When you make a list on your fingers of everything that liberals and leftists have done for working class men in the last 40 years, how long before you run out of fingers? Personally, all 10 of mine are free because I can’t think of a goddamned thing. Maybe you can think of one or two, and if so feel free to let me know, but if you can name even five things of real substance, I’ll eat my head.

But you conservatives, you think you’re so smugly superior because at least you’ve been critical of feminism? Yeah.

Okay. Please make a list for me of what exactly conservatives have done that is a substantive amelioration of the conditions that drive the heavy rates of suicide, divorce, alcoholism, homelessness, and educational failure in men and boys. What have you actually done, except berate them to "man up" and otherwise shame them? Great, you've told them they can enjoy sports, that it's cool boys like sports. Well, lots of liberals like sports too; did you have anything else on offer? "Family values?" Oh, that's nice, family values, you like those, but what are you doing to make a young man want to have a family in the first place?

Maybe Tucker Carlson has the answer. He's the conservative idiot who told Dr. Helen Smith that it was a man's job to take a horrible deal in marriage and divorce. Or how about Phyllis Schiafly, a great conservative egalitarian as long as it does not inconvenience anyone with a vagina? Or Tammy Bruce, who openly states women's job is to civilize men with sex? Or William Bennett, who says boys and young men are failing because they refuse to "man up?" Or Kay Hymowitz, who mocks today's men as perpetual adolescents?

Hint for conservatives: Saying the word feminazi a few times doesn't give you any worth to men and boys.

Here's what I believe:

This is a growing sociopolitical movement that has no allegiance whatsoever to the old labels of the past. Men increasingly need to be looking at not just women but society as a whole and asking, "What's in it for me?" And if the answer isn't clear and straightforward, you should expect them to shrug their shoulders and refuse to participate in your grand scheme for society.

If you're a left-winger and you find yourself dismayed at the condition that men and boys are in, you need to stop attacking conservatives. No, really, you do. Conservatives may drive you batty, but all your other lefty friends are already doing that. What you really need to be doing is turning to your fellow leftists and pointing out where they're failing boys and men. Because the list of areas where leftists have put men at the back of the bus is overwhelming, and they need quite a bit of consciousness-raising in that area.

But you right-wingers? Saying a few nice things here and there about boys and men and "manliness," whatever that is, and occasionally bashing feminists, doesn't get you a free pass. Where are you on challenging conservatives who only have shaming, humiliation, and stern lectures to offer young men? Why are you complicit in a system that's more likely to throw struggling young men in prison than it is to help mentor them into a better life? What are you doing about alimony reform, child support reform, reforming the family court system, due process violations, and holding female criminals more accountable?

If you're conservative and interested in men's issues, you need to stop attacking leftists/liberals and start holding your conservative/rightist pals' feet to the fire and asking them why they support, or stay silent on, so many things that hurt our boys and men.

Do I think the libertarians have all the answers? No. But I do know this: If the libertarians are the only ones who are bothering to listen to these issues, and at least talk about them without condescension, then you shouldn't be surprised when a lot of men, young and old, start to think the libertarians are the only ones who have answers. After all, they're the ones visibly taking this stuff seriously.

Am I a libertarian? As I noted earlier, no. I'm that bane of ideologues everywhere: a pragmatist. So if you're a leftist and you're dismayed at what looks like a large amount of anti-leftist sentiment in men's issues circles, don't chide the Men's Human Rights Activists for it—give shit to your fellow leftists for letting it happen.

And if you're a conservative, don't sit there with that smug "See, I told you so" smirk on your face. Look at the jackasses on your side of the fence who sit around doing nothing while our boys are slowly destroyed, while married men getting divorced are ground in the dirt, female criminals and abusers are given a free pass, a prison-industrial complex designed to warehouse an overwhelmingly male population grows, and give them lectures about how if we just "got back" to whatever idea of "limited government" you think is best, this would all go away. Instead, start challenging your fellow conservatives for their silence in the face of misandry, for their cowardice in not challenging civil rights-trashing laws, for having no answers for men seeking help except “Suck it up, wimp.” You don’t get to sit on your laurels and say, “Well, we kind of gave crap to the feminists, sometimes” and think that’s enough. It’s not enough by a long shot.

Clean your own house up. Challenge your like-minded political friends to think harder about what they have to offer men and boys besides shame, indifference, or punishment.

Maybe the libertarian contingent will still carry the day, but that’s damn well a certainty if neither left nor right even tries to put offers on the table.

There are a growing number of men on strike, and this bodes well for neither liberals nor conservatives. Those men are on strike because they’re not given any reason to believe in their governments, their communities, their churches, their institutions of learning, even their own families in many cases. They have been given no reason to care about any of it, and in a society that make it abundantly clear it doesn’t care about them, why would they have any other reaction?

“You can all go to hell” is the natural reaction of people who perceive an entire system as viewing them with indifference or outright contempt. Until you do something to address that, you’re an idiot if you don’t expect “screw the government, screw the system, screw society, screw everybody” to be the default attitude of people you do nothing for and make it abundantly clear you care nothing about.

A New Fathers 4 Justice protest in Hyde Park, London: deeply moving videos about children's and fathers' rights

Mike Buchanan · 18 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Our thanks to James Williams of Menmatters Radio for bringing this matter to our attention. It concerns a New Fathers 4 Justice protest that started August 12 in Hyde Park, London, one with a difference—one aimed at an international audience. James sent the following message, which included a link to to a short video that we consider the most moving video we've ever seen about children's and fathers' rights:

> HYDE PARK CORNER PROTEST
> On Tuesday 12th August 2014, I was phoned by a man called Archi who, with 5 other companions, had scaled Apsley House in Hyde Park London. The protestors are in full view of the busy traffic that pass through this part of London. It is claimed to be the first international protest of its kind consisting of three Brits, two French and an American.
>
> On the structure they have unfurled a banner with the URL of an important video.
>
> The protesters are a part of fathers' rights group protesting about the corruption of the family justice system, not just in the UK, but globally. They are expected to be up there for 3 days. If you wish to pledge your support then visit the website, contact media organizations, local politicians, or community organizations to express that support.
>
> If you wish to text or phone to give your support this is the number that the protesters are happy for you to contact them on: +44 (0) 7849793917
>
> The word is spreading. The London Evening Standard has already published this story online – here.

Indeed, the situation since James sent that email seems to be getting even more attention:

More at http://www.humanworth.co.uk/

A Voice for Men has a new mission statement

AVFM · 19 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The past 50 years have been a time of remarkable change in the world of western women. With the help of technology and forward thinking, our society has thrown off sex-based expectations and limitations for women, allowing them important, long-deserved access to the path of self-actualization.

We now live in a world where a woman's role in life is one of choice, not a destiny shaped by tradition, determined by biology, or forged in law. This, we think, is as it should be.

This revolution in freedom and identity, however, will not be complete until the same standards find their way into the lives of the average man. The absence of that complementary change in the lives of men has created an imbalance that erodes the autonomy of both sexes. Unless this changes, that imbalance will worsen.

Freedom from sex-based expectations for just one sex will never result in freedom for either sex. It is simply a foundation of exploitation on which tyranny is built and administered.

As a society, we are already on that path. The noble idea of freedom and equity between the sexes has been corrupted. It has become a malignancy on our social consciousness. What used to be cooperation between the sexes is now gynocentric parasitism that inhabits every level of men's existence, from cradle to coffin. The efforts to enhance the rights of women have become toxic efforts to undermine the rights of men.

It is time for equity-minded men and women to engage in the final push for freedom for both sexes, and indeed for all human beings. It is time for the interests of humanity to take precedence over the interests of men and women as political factions and social adversaries.

It is time for a movement that truly favors humanity, not a particular sex. It is time for feminism to fulfill its promise of equality, and to quit making a mockery of it.

With those humanist ideals guiding our path, we hereby proclaim the following mission of A Voice for Men:

Male Genital Mutilation, euphemistically known as "circumcision," must end. Neither religion nor tradition will excuse the sexual mutilation of children.

Ratify the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) precisely as it was originally written, and sign it into law. Or the equivalent in other countries if they do not yet have equal rights as a matter of law.

Selective Service must either be abolished or include women.

Reproductive rights, choice in parenthood for men. Consent to sex is not consent to parenthood. Upholding this idea for women while denying it to men must end. Men must be allowed to unilaterally reject parental rights and obligations during the same period of time in which a woman may legally obtain an abortion. The identified father must be served with legal notification of the intent to use his assets for the benefit of a child while an abortion is still legal or the right to use said assets by the mother is forfeit.

Paternity testing should be mandatory on demand by any alleged father at any time. No man shall be held legally responsible for a child he did not father.

Paternity fraud should be punishable under law under the same standards of any other form of fraud.

Affirmative Action programs based on sex must be abolished.

Abolish the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), and retroactively audit its beneficiaries for accountability with funds used.

Abandon the Duluth Model and all patriarchy theory-based models of domestic violence in favor of non-ideological, evidence-based solutions and programs.

End primary aggressor laws.

End mandatory arrest laws.

Require all state and federally funded DV programs to extend full and equal services, including shelter, without regard to sex.

Sever family courts from Title IV-D money.

Implement the assumption of joint legal and physical custody during divorce.

Allegations of intimate partnership violence or violence toward children in divorce proceedings must be proven in criminal court before they may be used as reason to deny physical or legal custody.

Dispense with child support except in special circumstances.

End alimony except by prenuptial agreement.

Make prenuptial agreements irrevocably binding.

Marriage should be based solely on contract law.

Reverse the Dear Colleague Letter, return honor courts to their intended purpose of handling academic code violations. College tribunals are not equipped to address felony criminal matters.

End federal funding and provide penalties for universities that interfere with the rights of men to form campus groups.

End rape shield laws.

Establish the equal treatment of males and females by all aspects of the criminal justice system.

Rape and other forms of sexual assault shall not be based on "penetration" or any sex-specific characteristic, but based on clearly stated lack of consent.

Prohibit state interference in any sexual relationship between consenting adults.

"Infanticide" shall be considered murder, the killing of a human being, regardless of the sex of the perpetrator.

Female power, influence, and privileges: 1835

Peter Wright · 19 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: "Female Power, Influence, and Privileges" is Chapter One from a book few have heard of: Woman: As She Is, And As She Should Be, published 1835 by Cochrane & Co. The author was Mrs. Elizabeth Sandford. It should be noted that this is a genuinely shocking book for a lot of reasons; written after the death of Mary Wollstonecraft and before the famed Seneca Falls Convention, it is an extensive look that is already questioning the idea of women as oppressed and lacking in power. The article has been available in non-searchable image form, and is reprinted here in text form for the first time on the internet, so far as we are aware. While we may not accept the author's ideas on how women "should" be, the observations of this nearly 200 year old text are likely to challenge simplistic assumptions about women of the past.—PW.

> O ye men; it is not the great king, nor the multitude of men, neither is it wine that excelleth: who is it then that ruleth them, or hath the lordship over them? – Are they not women? By this also ye must know that women have dominion over you. Do ye not labour, and toil, and give, and bring all to the woman? Yea! many there be that have run out of their wits for women, and become servants for their sakes. Many also have perished, and erred, and sinned, for women.—ESDRAS. "

§ 1.–The supremacy of the weak over the strong is a very remarkable phenomenon, and it is as mischievous as it is it is remarkable. Whatever nature or law may have denied women, art and secret sway give them all: they are influential to a degree perfectly unguessed, and men are possessed by, not possessors of them.

"Woman was made of the man, and for the man:" this is the language of Scripture. Yet, though "expressly given to man for a comforter, for a companion, not for a counsellor," Woman has managed to overstep her sphere – she has usurped the dominion of the head, when she should have aimed but at the subjection of the heart; and the hand which ought to be held out to the man, only to sustain and cheer him on his journey, now checks his steps, and points out the way he is to go! From moment to moment his purposes are thwarted and broken in upon by a capricious influence, which he scarcely dares to question, yet makes it his pride to indulge. Of this mighty evil it is that we are desirous to give a plain and unbiased view.

There is, perhaps, no country on earth where women enjoy such, and so great privileges, as in our own. The phenomenon has never passed unobserved by foreigners; and smartly enough it has been said, that were a bridge thrown across our Channel, the whole sex would be seen running to the British shores. In many countries women are slaves; in some they hold the rank of mistresses; in others they are (what they should be everywhere) companions; but in England they are queens!

It was remarked by Steele, even in his time, that "by the gallantry of our nation, the women were the most powerful part of our people;" and assuredly, female influence, far from finding its becoming level, has been on the growth among us ever since. It is now in its "high and palmy state," and the star of Woman was perhaps never more in the ascendant than at this present writing.[1] "The influence of Englishwomen," as a contemporary observes, "of attractive women" (and a large portion of our countrywomen are attractive) "is vast indeed: be they slaves or companions, sensual toys or reasoning friends, that influence is all but boundless."

§ 2.–Female influence necessarily exists by sufferance: it can only be by man's verdict that it exists at all. And herein is the unaccountable part of the whole matter: there is actually something "stronger than strength," —

> And mighty hearts are held in slender chains."

In the moral philosophy of Paley, there is a remark, so profoundly true, bearing upon our subject, that we cannot consent to hide it in a note. “Could we regard mankind,” says that writer, “with the same sort of observation with which we read the natural history, or remark the manners of any other animal, there is nothing in the human character which would more surprise us, than the almost-universal subjugation of strength to weakness. Among men (in the complete use and exercise of their personal faculties) you see the ninety-and-nine toiling and scraping together a heap of superfluities for one, and this one, too, oftentimes the feeblest and worst of the whole set–a child, a Woman, a madman, or a fool.”

And thus does Man (too often a creature of passion, but never so much or completely so, as when Woman is its object) yield himself an unthinking victim: a most willing bond-slave here, he suffers his head to become the dupe of his passions. How (perhaps many a man asks himself) should he look for harm, where he has garnered up his heart, and where his earliest, latest wishes centre? And yet we may love, like Othello, “not wisely, but too well;” we make unto ourselves idols of the heart, that shall wean us (as they weaned the wisest of old) from sobriety and duty. If the enthusiasm of devotion has sometimes stooped to borrow the language of love, far more often has the madness of love dared to borrow the language of devotion. Like the father in Parnell, our affections may become criminal, and “erring fondness” of this kind, amiable though it be, has to abide its consequences. Providence never fails to avenge any trespass on its own designs.

Led away “by a captive face,” “disturbed by a smile, or undone by a kiss;” a look sufficing to persuade, and a sigh to convince him: this is man’s position!

> All they shall need, is to protest and swear,
> Breathe a soft sigh, and drop a tender tear.” – Pope

Beauty has but to lecture through her tears, and with Dido of old, “ire iterim in lacrymas, iterum tentare precando,” and resolution is no longer a manly virtue. We resist, and resist, and resist again, –but at length turn suddenly round, and passionately embrace the enchantress.

Few are to be found who do not assume themselves with a toy of some kind during every stage of life, and Woman (though perhaps as little enduring in outward charm as any other, and one that, if critically eyed, would not retain its divinity long), is the most common and most fondled toy of all. How many, calling themselves men, are fooled by those who ought to be their comforters–preyed upon by harpies in the form of angels! The hypocrite affects attachment; the coquette trifles with feeling; the prude strikes at judgment; while the less principled reprobate lays out her traps for heedless passion.

In their most trifling pursuits do women somehow manage to create an almost-universal interest; in all their ordinary doings, in their ‘whereabouts,’–“leurs brouilleries leurs indiscretions, leurs repugnances, leurs penchans, leurs jalousies, leurs piques;” — They have, in fine, continues the author Montesquieu we are quoting, “cet art qu’on les petites ames d’interesser les grandes.” Nor are those mere “women’s fools” –the refuse of the other sex–who are led away blindfold thus: many of its chiefest ornaments are among their “following.” The great and small seem equally content to shape their desires to female foolishness, and with one false tear a pretty woman can undo at a moment what the best and wisest of men have been labouring for years to establish.

> What is it Woman cannot do?
> She’ll make a statesman quite forget his cunning,
> And trust his dearest secrets to her breast,
> Where fops have daily entrance.”

Where (apart from outward attractions) this especial fascination which belongs to woman lies, it is difficult to determine; wearing, as it does, the garb of secret and speculative influence, it becomes too vague to submit to a definition–and thus bases itself on a foundation as difficult to examine as to shake. We cannot look into the heart; and where women are concerned, the heart is more especially an enigma.

Thus much, however, may safely be concluded: were women really strong, the contact or the occasional superiority might alarm pride; but, as the truth is, this “mortal omnipotence” is at last but an insect in the breeze; and though a creature which by its will, its wit, or its caprices, is sometimes able to shake us, soul and body, it nevertheless, from instant to instant, is dependent upon ourselves for the minutest succour.

§ 3.–Let us consider female influence under the several aspects in which it presents itself;– and first, as acting upon society at large. The supremacy of women is quite as much general and public, as it is domestic and individual: it spreads along the innumerable lines of social intercourse,–exerting itself, not merely over manners, but, which is often to be regretted, over modes of thinking. We see around the sex an almost-Chinese prostration–of mind as well as body: their approval it is that stamps social reputation–their favour, and their favour alone, that is supposed to confer happiness. Nothing, forsooth, is right, but that which bears their approbation; and theirs alone is the great catholic creed of manners, any deviation from which is heresy. And women have no merit or qualifications then such as they themselves please to dictate,–having been early taught to feel their own consequence, more than what is due to their creature, Man.

§ 4.–But in the connubial state do women exercise the most unlimited power. Female influence, in its action merely over manners and conventionalisms, might seem somewhat on the surface; but such is by no means its narrow bounds: mediately, if not directly, it is an agent in every possible direction. The wife controls her husband, and he acts upon others, and upon the state at large, according to his sphere in life.

Within the whole circle of deception, there is perhaps no creature so completely beguiled as many a modern husband;–we can all, in our private circles, point to a score of instances. Such a being is but an appendage to another–nothing of himself; he is a slave, and a slave of the worst kind–fooled by the bent of another’s will. Free agency is a thing quite gone from him, and, if mere confinement makes not captivity, he suffers a loss of liberty at his own hearth. He is under a charm–loving, as Shakespeare phrases it, with an “enraged affection.” Let the dear enchantress cry for the moon, she should have it from its sphere, were it possible. He would have the world from its axis, to give it her: no one can be richer than she in his promises: she, who but she, the cream of all his care!

> Dilige, et dic quicquid voles.”

Women there are affectionate enough–it may be, devoted–in their character as wives; but then, it is at their husbands’ peril to be happy by other means than such as in their wisdom they please to subscribe. Regents of the heart, they take care to govern it most absolutely: and thus it happens (as Phaedrus said long ago) that “men are sure to be losers by the women, as well when they are objects of their love, as when they lie under their displeasure!”

In right of marriage, Englishwomen become endowed with many and great privileges,–privileges that are growing in number and importance every day. Claims, greater than were ever before awarded, are now allowed them in Law and in Equity: over pecuniary matters they have no small control, and are always at full liberty to plunge into wanton expenditure, leaving their husbands the responsible parties.

In short, the ceremony of wedlock, with its present obligations, more than restores any natural inequality between the sexes. No longer are women cyphers beyond the sphere of domestic life: they are parceners of our power. They are not, it is true, suffered as yet to dispute the prizes of ambition, but they partake largely of its reward; they have the lion’s share–they divide, where they do not monopolise the spoil!

Were it not for difference of dress and person, one might almost mistake the wife for the husband in this country. Her will is not carried in His pocket, as is wisely arranged elsewhere:– “he pays the bills indeed, but my lady gives the treat.” And while she is spending money with both hands, and with a zeal that would lighten the bags of a loan-monger, he has to sell his woods and lands, borrow, or beg!

Slyly and unperceived does the foot of female authority slip itself in: the wedge is easily driven home. This is a species of power that never exists long without favouring itself;–let an ascendancy be once gained (and the collar of command is soon slipped!)–let a system of unsinuation once transfer the authority of wedlock,–and, afterwards, every act, be it of large or small import–what must be done, what is to be said,–becomes not the act of the Man, but of the Woman. It is not planned, it is determined; and where the lady cannot give her reason, she gives her resolution.

> Hoc volo, sic jubeo; sit pro ratione voluntas:
> Imperat ergo viro!"

This is "Gynocracy" with a vengeance! as Lord Byron was pleased, on some occasion, to denominate petticoat-sway. This very peculiar and distinct species of government (partaking in its nature not so much of mild despotism, as of a pure unmixed tyranny) has now grown so common among us, that (albeit laid down neither in Plato nor Aristotle) it well deserves, as it has obtained, a definite and scientific denomination.

We have all seen the ivy twining around the oak, but behold a novelty–the oak twining itself about the ivy! The man who suffers himself to be led away blindfold thus, can only be likened to the fool "that rejoiceth when he goeth to the correction of the stocks."–"Give not thy soul to a woman, to set her foot upon thy substance." To submit thus is contrary to the first law of nature–it is a direct spurning of Revelation:-

> Was she thy God, that thou didst obey?
> Or was she made they guide,
> Superior, or but equal–that to her
> Thou didst resign thy manhood?" — MILTON, P.L.

Let us presume to offer one word of advice to the sex that, in truth, most needs it. Men should let their love be at least manly; it is always possible to be affectionate without being over-fond;–to copy the gentleness, without the amorousness, of the dove. It is in itself a folly to allow those we love to perceive the vehemence of our affection; for such is human nature,–and such especially is female nature, that where it can control, it is nearly sure to become indifferent about pleasing, and at last despotic. Persecution may appear in many shapes, at home as well as abroad; it may address us in the voice of mildness as well as of imperious command; and the soft and playful creatures of our idle hours may cause us misery for years: Nothing is to be disregarded, however seemingly powerless! Though the capacities of Woman are comprised within a narrow sphere, these act within the circle of vigour and uniformity. It is often by seeming to despise power, that women secure it to satiety! A love of power would seem almost part and parcel of Woman's composition;–for to this end they early learn to enlist every art they are mistresses of;–

> In men we various ruling passions find.
> In women two almost divide the kind;
> These only fix'd, they first or last obey–
> The love of pleasure, and the love of sway. — POPE

§ 5.–Nor is the political influence belonging to women of contemptible amount. There is an old and true maxim, that though kings may reign, women virtually govern: 'tis they who hold the strings of all intrigues, great or small. "There are perhaps few instances," says an elegant writer, "in which the sex is not one o the secret springs that regulate the most important movements of private or public transactions."

Not merely over the fanciful regions of fashion does the female empire extend itself; it dictates to the senate, as well as legislates for the ball-room. Women make no laws, it is true; they abrogate none: in so far Law shakes hands with Divinity; but they have an influence beyond any law: "Ce que femme veut, Dieu le veut?" Nothing resists them! What follows, though it be poetry, is too true a picture.

> What trivial influences hold dominion
> O'er wise men's counsels and the fate of empire!
> The greatest schemes that human wit can forge,
> Or bold ambition dares to put into practice,
> Depend upon our husbanding a moment,
> And the light lasting of a Woman's will!" — ROWE

Nor are women without civil and political power of the direct kind. They are vested with many important trusts, and enjoy most of those privileges which accompany property. They vote for many public functionaries, and their sweet voices are made admissible in electing directors for the government for thirty or forty millions of souls of British India.

And where their influence is but indirect, it is little less powerful on that account. In our public elections 'tis they who are the actual constituency,–they, after all, who virtually elect; for which is the vote that they do not influence? The system of female canvassing has of late years become a traffic quite notorious.

The lady in Hudibras, did not exceed the truth when she asserted the vast powers and privileges of her sex:–

> We manage things of greatest weight
> In all the world's affairs of state;
> We make and execute all laws > can judge the judges and the cause;
> We rule in every public meeting
> And make men do what we judge fitting;
> We are magistrates in all great towns
> Where men do nothing but wear gowns!
> We are your guardians, that increase,
> Or waste, your fortunes as we please;
> And, as you humour us, can deal
> In all your matters, ill or well."

Notes:

[1] "A low estimate of female pretensions is certainly not the fault of the present day. Women are, perhaps, sometimes in danger of being spoilt, but they cannot complain that they are too little valued. Their powers are too highly rated: their natural defects are overlooked, and the consideration in which they are held, the influence they possess, and the confidence placed in their judgment, are in some instances disproportionate with their real claims." — Mrs. Sandford

Circumcision: The double standard of genital mutilation

Joe Wilson · 19 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The debate on circumcision male genital mutilation is once again gaining attention. On August 1, on behalf of their wives, 12 men were ambushed and forced to undergo male genital mutilation without anesthesia. The men were stripped naked, smeared with mud, and paraded around the town of Moi's Bridge in Western Kenya. Their crime? Apparently they lacked hygiene and were not sexually satisfying to their women.

Besides the barbaric nature of the attack, equally disturbing but predictable is the mainstream media's lack of coverage of the crime. Had this been done to women … ah yes, we would have heard about it. But for males, circumcision has evolved from a cultural ritual to a routinely practiced procedure. Debate brings out strong opponents both for and against the procedure. I can understand the "against" proponents since the procedure is rooted in ancient rituals and the science behind the practice is at best quackery, but the "for circumcision" group really stumped me until I began researching.

My mom was a "for circumcision" advocate but had later changed her position. I had been circumcised—and I was the only one in my family. My mom told me that the doctors convinced her to have it done (neither my dad or brothers were circumcised). She regretted it after I developed an infection and had to go back to the Montreal Children's Hospital several times over the course of a month. But before regretting the decision (which came years later), she told me that she often took a stand to strongly defend the procedure when discussing it with her circle of friends. As I probed her stand, she stated it had more to do with avoiding guilt than anything else. She had made the decision to have me circumcised and couldn't live with the idea that her decision was in retrospect wrong and would result in actual harm to her child. There had to be some "benefit" to justify the ordeal.

My mom's position could be the reason a lot of dissenting voices come out at the calls for abolishing circumcision. After being coached into making the decision—which is easier done if the father is circumcised—they justify their actions (because frankly there is no going back). If the mutilation takes a turn for the worse (i.e., infection, complication)—or more commonly after witnessing the pain experienced by the boy—parents feel it even more necessary to back up their original decision. It has more to do with lessening their own guilt than validating the purported benefits of circumcision.

The Benefits of Circumcision

Then there are those out there who will vehemently argue with you that male genital mutilation (circumcision) IS NOTHING like female genital mutilation. They (usually feminist who don't like to share the victim podium) will quote that male circumcision is a benefit. I am here to tell you that they are correct! There is a tremendous benefit—but NOT TO THE MALE. The real benefit goes to the institutions that gain to profit from this barbaric procedure.

In the fall of 1989, I was a graduate student at a prominent Montreal university. I was heading back to my tissue cell culture lab when I stumbled upon Dr. G. After exchanging greetings, she asked me how things were going with my research. I told her "not so good." I had been having challenges getting my V79 human fibroblast cells to work for a series of experiments. And that's when she told me. She gets her cells from the [redacted] hospital—from circumcised boys! And how exactly does she do that? Well, [redacted] conducts a huge number of circumcisions each year and yes the foreskin … they sell them! They make excellent cell cultures, she said enthusiastically.

This revelation on the whereabouts of discarded foreskin rubbed me the wrong way. There was an ethical component, but on a more personal level there was an intuitive feeling that somehow perhaps the whole procedure was a sham. But like most people I shifted attention to other issues, and had it not been for the recent red pill revelation I most likely would never have given a shit.

Global Conspiracy?

Besides guilt-ridden parents or religious zealots, why would anyone else want to ensure that male genital mutilation continues unhindered?

Could it be because circumcision is a BILLION-DOLLAR industry!

The foreskin of a Caucasian newborn male will set you back $431. That's if you're buying it for profit (i.e., cosmetics); if you're buying it for research, then it's $359.17.

What cosmetics?

Human male foreskin is the latest sick trend in the cosmetics world. For instance, facial cream from SkinMedica is a cream that contains boys' foreskin. It is a product that is promoted by Oprah Winfrey. One of the side benefits of using human foreskin is that it doesn't have to undergo animal testing!

The circumcision procedure itself is a valuable cash cow as well. Each year, 55% of the approximately 2 million men in the US are circumcised. This number has decreased recently and has the medical establishment fuming mad. But the reasons they are upset of course isn't because they fear revenue lost … no … it's because of their concern for the health of men. Yeah right! Because we care so much for men that we have national commissions set up for their welfare! We'll look at the so-called benefits a little later on and dispel any reason these so-called intellectuals have. Back to the question, What does eliminating circumcision mean? Well, in the US, a circumcision could cost you about $250. When you multiply that out, it comes to about $275 million (in the US alone) each year.

As for the rest of the world—consider that one-third of all males are circumcised!

But Circumcision Is NOTHING Like Female Genital Mutilation, Right?
The foreskin is a specialized, functional organ designed for enhancing pleasure. Nature has designed it with a GREATER variety and concentration of nerve receptors THAN ANY PART OF THE PENIS. Those who condemn female genital mutilation say it's because it removes part of the girl intended to enhance sexual pleasure. Well, the same could be said for the foreskin. An average circumcision will remove as much as 240 feet of nerves, and more than 20,000 nerve endings! Without the foreskin, the glans (tip of the penis) also becomes desensitized to touch—further robbing the male of sexual pleasure. A circumcised male's glans becomes keratinized (addition of successive layers of skin), becoming much tougher and dryer as a result.

The glans was never designed to be an "external organ." The circumcision process requires tearing foreskin from the glans and "pieces" of the glans could be torn off as well. Sometimes "shreds" of skin left over from the mutilation will hang from the glans.

Depending on how much foreskin is removed during circumcision, as much as 80 percent or more of a boy's penile skin could be removed. This results in a significantly SMALLER PENIS—as much as 25% shorter.

Removing the "extra skin" also prevents penile skin from moving freely over the shaft and glans of the penis. This results in destroying the process that normally works to stimulate the glans. A circumcised male also lacks sebaceous glands, which were designed to lubricate the penis during coitus. Without the lubrication, the dry penis dries out, making it susceptible to cracking and bleeding.

Circumcision Is Illegal
Doctors' Hippocratic Oath: "First, do no harm."

EVERY doctor that has performed a circumcision procedure on a healthy boy has in fact broken the Hippocratic Oath they were sworn upon. Removing otherwise healthy skin is doing harm to the boy. In addition, in some countries, the existing laws make it unlawful to circumcise healthy boys. As Jacqueline Hooman stated in her recent article, circumcision in Canada violates the law and medical ethics. Despite this, Canadian practitioners continue to circumcise boys. Where are the legal advocates? Why hasn't the law been addressed?

> The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees that "Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental > or physical disability." (Section 15-1.) While females are protected from even a prick of their foreskin, males continue to be subjected to ancient barbaric practices with no medical or legal basis. The Canadian Medical Association's Code Of Ethics maintains that medical personnel have a duty to "consider first the well-being of the patient" and "refuse to participate in or support practices that violate basic human rights."

>
> Furthermore, the Ontario College of Physicians and Surgeons deems that for consent to be valid it must be "related to treatment, informed, voluntary, not be obtained through fraud or misrepresentation." In Layman's terms, the Physician is obligated to inform the patient of all potential risks associated with a procedure, along with the risks of not performing said procedure. But infants are incapable of giving consent. In the instance of proxy consent (parental consent) to treatment, the O.C.P.S. states, "A physician must provide the substitute decision-maker with the information that would otherwise have been given to the patient to enable him or her to make an informed decision as to consent." (18.) and that "A physician must consider whether the substitute decision-maker is complying with the principles set out in the HCCA. If a physician is of the view that the substitute decision-maker is not acting in accordance with the HCCA, he or she can call the Office of the Public Guardian and Trustee." In other words, doctors are not allowed to amputate healthy, functional body parts just because the parents request them to do so.

In addition, the circumcised foreskin sold actually violates (at least in Canada) The Human Tissue Act: "A person shall not buy, sell or otherwise deal in, directly or indirectly, for a valuable consideration, tissue for a transplant or a body or part of a body, other than blood or a blood constituent for therapeutic purposes, medical education or scientific research."

So What Are the So-called "Benefits" of Circumcision?

1. Fighting Urinary Tract Infections (UTI)
According to the latest information, approximately 1% of boys will develop a UTI within the first years of life. However, there is absolutely NO evidence (in the form of random controlled trials) that links circumcision to a reduction in UTIs. If anything, an American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP)—one of the instigators pushing for male genital mutilation—showed scant evidence that 100 circumcisions would have to be conducted to prevent only one case of UTI. And what about a MORE SERIOUS infection resulting from circumcision? Well, as we'll see in a minute, no one's bothered to collect data!

In reality, the "urban legend" arose from an extremely flawed study back in 1985 (Wiswell 1985). The study didn't even accurately count whether the boys were circumcised or not!

2. Penile Cancer
You hear this one a lot. Circumcision prevents penile cancer. Penile cancer is perhaps one of the rarest forms of cancer—occurring in only 1 out of a 100,000 males. And when diagnosed early it has a good survival rate. But let's face it, who wants to get penile cancer? So how effective is circumcision against preventing penile cancer? Well, according to the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) study, you would need to conduct up to 322,000 circumcisions to prevent one case of penile cancer! In addition, penile cancer is thought to be linked to infection with human papillomaviruses, which is contracted during sex. If you were really concerned about it, you could use a condom!

One conclusion we should consider: since penile cancer associated with human papillomaviruses is such a concern, then why not let the boy reach adulthood (and hence age of sexual activity) and after reviewing the evidence decide for himself whether the surgery is necessary? Given the choice to use a condom or have an irreversible penile mutilation, I would expect that would help the young adult come to a decision rather quickly.

3. Sexually Transmitted Diseases and HIV
The next argument for circumcision put forward by the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) is that circumcision prevents two common viral STDs (genital herpes and genital warts). The study for this is based on a hardly relevant sub-population of adult men in sub-Saharan Africa.

With regards to HIV, again the science is sketchy. Evidence purports that circumcision prevents HIV in heterosexual men. In particular, the data seems to support a reduction of HIV in black men. However, the data shows that the effects of preventing HIV is MOST NOTABLE in men having the procedure AFTER THE AGE OF 35!

Again, with regards to STDs and HIV, if there is any concern, then the boy could decide for himself at an age of consent. If anything, at least with regards to HIV, it would actually be a benefit to wait until after the man turned 35.

Well, What About the Risks of Circumcision?
Again, uninformed trolls—and guilt-ridden parents—throughout the Internet will let you know that the risks with circumcision are minuscule … that the benefits outweigh the risks.

In reality, the risks are very real: infections (for one, I can attest to that), hemorrhaging, meatal strictures, and even incidental deaths and partial amputations of the penis. But incredibly, probably to the benefit of the institution, the EXACT NUMBERS FOR THE RISKS HAVE NEVER BEEN MADE AVAILABLE. That's correct. We cannot say for sure what the incident rates are for circumcision complications because there are none to be referenced. Why would such a vastly routine procedure like circumcision not have any statistics? When AAP's eight-member team recently decided that circumcision is a "good thing," they hardly had enough data to determine the relative magnitude of the risk involved. Anyone versed in risk management will tell you that risk = severity x probability. Without probability, the level of risk is unattainable, and by default the regulators only ASSUME that it is low.

Let's Look at the Risks in More Detail
We've already looked at the very real desensitization of the penis to sensual touch. As I've indicated, we have no idea exactly how much "damage" is attributed to circumcision—because frankly I don't think they want us to know. But there have been numerous accounts of boys losing their glans … or having their entire penis cut off usually without anesthesia!

Let's look in more detail to the harm circumcision results in.

1. Meatal Stenosis
A condition known as "meatal stenosis" can occur as a result of circumcision. Normally blood flows from the extra skin to the penis. Without the circumcised skin, blood flow is disrupted and causes a back flow of blood, resulting in an obstruction of urine flow. This condition is almost always associated with circumcised boys.

2. Severed Lymph Vessels
Circumcision results in the severing of lymph vessels. Lymph is a colorless fluid containing blood cells that is intended to bathe the tissues. When lymph circulation is hampered, it could result in lymphedema, a very painful and disfiguring condition that results in lymph not draining from the penis. This fluid becomes trapped and begins to swell.

3. Effects on the Brain
Wonder why men have lower pain thresholds than women? Studies (Taddio 1997; Anand 2000) published in leading medical journals have shown that circumcised boys have lower pain thresholds than girls or intact boys. Dr. James Prescott, a researcher in this area, suggested that circumcision could result in disturbing levels of brain damage (to the developing boy).

4. Effect on Women
The free-flowing skin of an intact penis allows the penis to move easily inside a woman in a much more pleasurable fashion. The sebaceous glands also aids in lubricating the inside of the vagina. Is it any wonder why most couples (where a man is circumcised) require an artificial lubricant?

Another effect of circumcision on moms (as well as dads) is the disruption that circumcision has on the parent-infant bonding that occurs during this crucial time following birth. Studies at the Washington University School of Medicine found that most boys would not nurse right after they were circumcised and most would not look into their mother's eyes!

5. Painful Procedure
Before a boy can be circumcised, his foreskin must be removed from his glans. He is literally being skinned alive! In most cases, the procedure is done without anesthesia. But even when it is, studies performed at the University of Colorado School of Medicine showed that circumcised boys usually had unrestful non-REM sleep. This is in response to the boy's bombardment of neural pathways, resulting in unbearable pain. The boys sometimes fall into a "semicoma" that can last days if not weeks. Think about it: Why do boys cry during and after a circumcision? It's disingenuous to suggest that they DON'T FEEL ANYTHING!

Moreover, in the civilized West, only 45% of doctors (and even fewer obstetricians, 25%) use anesthesia. The reason they don't is because it takes too much time!

Studies have shown that circumcision results in post-traumatic stress disorder, depression, lower self-esteem, and issues related to intimacy (Goldman 1999; Hammond 1999; Boyle 2002).

But Doesn't Circumcision Make It More Hygienic?

Perhaps the biggest myth about circumcision is that it aids in hygiene. That's like saying cutting off a boy's eyelid makes it more hygienic in caring for his eye! In healthy boys, the foreskin is COMPLETELY FUSED to the glans. It is designed to keep feces off the head of the penis. Circumcision causes the glans to be more susceptible to infection and more likely to bring invading germs in closer proximity to the urinary tract.

But what about the production of smelly smegma? Doesn't circumcision prevent this?

Smegma is produced by both boys and girls equally. It is washed off easily during bathing. And NO, it doesn't cause cancer. PERIOD!

In conclusion, we already know the outcry a single case of female genital mutilation would bring … nothing less than a candlelight vigil and 24/7 coverage on CNN. But because men and boys are disposable, their genital mutilation comes with benefits to society … the reduction of fine lines and wrinkles. Isn't it time that we revisit why it is that we continue to do this … and perhaps even more importantly why we continue to pretend nothing is wrong? Circumcision should not only be less prevalent, but I would suggest it should be outlawed the way female genital mutilation is.

Anonymous – Call to Protest #HandsUp

AVfM Video Source · 19 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

For more info, try Twitter on this feed, this feed, and this feed.

A government which points guns at peaceful protestors and ordinary citizens on the streets, censors the press, censors communications, and lies, is not a legitimate government at all.

Truth and transparency, please.

update: More here.

Normalized violence against women, huh?

AVfM Video Source · 19 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Another video shows that this myth knows no language barrier:

Misogyny versus misandry: From “comparative” suffering to inter-sexual dialogue

Dr. Paul Nathanson · 20 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Because of threats, intimidation, and a family bereavement, scheduled International Conference on Men’s Issues speaker Paul Nathanson was unable to attend. He has graciously allowed us to publish his thoughts. Paul has our gratitude and our compassion in this difficult time. —the Editors

My colleague in research on men is Katherine Young. She is not here today, at least not in corporeal form, but we have collaborated on all five volumes in a series of books on misandry—that is, the sexist counterpart of misogyny. When I say “I,” therefore, I usually mean “we.” Her interest in men emerged from her research on women in India, finding that she could not see the gender norms of one sex adequately without also seeing those of the other. What she needed was “stereoscopic” vision. My interest in men emerged from personal experience as a gay man. But both of us are academics in religious studies, or comparative religion, a field that includes comparative ethics. I rely primarily, though not entirely, on the latter.

Introduction

Ten or eleven years ago, a journalist interviewed me about misandry for an article on the troubled relations between men and women. But first she told me that not all of her friends, some men and some women, were eager to read her findings. Why, they asked, would anyone be preoccupied today with sexual polarization? The culture wars, they said, were over. Women had made great gains in the world of work. Men were spending more time on household chores. Feminism had done its job, right? Well, I thought, guess what? They were wrong. But they were not wrong for the supposedly obvious reason: that women remain unequal to men in various ways, which means that feminism had yet to complete its job. They were wrong, I suggest, for two other reasons—two intellectual and moral mistakes.

One of these mistakes originated, as Christina Hoff Sommers noted in the title of her most famous book, when extremists “stole” the movement from egalitarians. I would add a particular aspect of the historical context. What had begun in the 1960s as an egalitarian movement had turned by the 1980s into an ideological one. In other words, this change of direction had a slightly earlier prototype: the transition from the civil rights movement to the Black power movement. Both led from liberal politics to identity politics. Not everyone has embraced these transformations, by any means, but those who do tend to be those with great influence in the public square—especially academics, who have produced what they call “engaged scholarship.” This is not the place to explore the larger context of postmodernism in detail, but I will note one ironic anomaly. Postmodernists claim to “expose” or “subvert” all cultural biases, but they actually provide a protective umbrella for the cultural biases that they consider legitimate. And these biases usually coincide with those of some ideology. Young and I have adopted a working definition of ideology: a worldview that relies on a systematic representation of reality in order to attain social, political, and economic goals. More specifically, we have outlined eight of its characteristic features. Among these is dualism: a worldview that sees all of history as a titanic conspiracy of “them” to oppress “us.” Another is the fact that ideologies can function as “secular religions,” fundamentalist ones, of both the political right and the political left.

At the risk of generalization, I suggest that postmodernism rejects the notion of objective truth and therefore of the need even to seek it. Rather, we should focus on “deconstructing” the illusions of all those who pretend to seek it. The result has been to legitimate the notion that scholarship amounts to nothing other than a profoundly cynical—but selectively cynical—battle between “our truth” and “their truth.” Every group has its own truth, its own story of collective victimization. And what we call “ideological feminism” (as distinct from egalitarian feminism) is no exception. Many or most feminists claim to know nothing of ideological feminism; for them, feminism is about sexual equality, not about some eternal urge men to oppress women. Other feminists are aware of the ideological approach and even stay away from it themselves but nonetheless end up condoning it among others for "pushing the envelope" and therefore expanding possibilities for women.

The second mistake of feminists originated in their assumption that men have such godly power, such complete "hegemony," that nothing can possibly harm them. From that initial premise, it would seem to follow that women can say whatever they like about men without worrying about the consequences for men—and thus, ultimately, for their own sons, for society as a whole, and even for themselves. But we have ample evidence from social scientists that most boys and men are not, by definition, alpha males. They are indeed vulnerable to social and political forces that either ignore them or attack them. I could discuss one or more of the problems that boys and men encounter in American society. Their suicide rates and school dropout rates far exceed those of girls and women, for instance, and they are the victims of violence far more often than girls and women (although you'd never know that by hearing or reading only about "violence against women"). But discussing this double standard would distract me from my primary concern: the use of what Young and I call "comparative suffering" (to promote what we call the "mobilization of resentment").

Comparative Suffering

The best way for me to introduce "comparative suffering" is to describe another interview. A few months ago, I was asked to discuss the problems of men on a Canadian radio station. I was prepared to define misandry and discuss various aspects of it, but I never got an opportunity to do so. The interviewer asked me immediately why anyone would take seriously the idea that men had any problems, let alone that they were oppressed. To say the very least, she added, no problems that "men" might have could ever amount to very much when compared with those of women. Women still earn 73 cents on the dollar, she added, and still hold only a few positions of political power. Men do not have those problems. Nor do they have even comparable problems. Instead of allowing me to discuss misandry, therefore, she made sure that I could discuss only misogyny. I had to defend the very idea of concern for men. And I had only six minutes to do even that.

I could have answered much more effectively the question about women still earning less money than men do. To do that, and thus present a counter-intuitive argument, I would have had to rely on some academic language. (Even some members of my own family bristle at the very idea that I am an academic.) The usual statistic cited is that women earn approximately three-quarters ("seventy-three cents on the dollar") of what men earn. Millions of people (including many men) interpret this to mean that every woman earns only three-quarters of what any man would earn at the same job. But the figure is an aggregate number. It includes the staggering salaries of a few alpha males, a fact that skews the total earnings of men upward considerably. Moreover, it includes the many women who work part-time, a fact that skews the total earnings of women downward considerably. In addition, it omits the fact that younger women really do earn as much as the male counterparts because they have the necessary graduate degrees, specialized training, and so on. Finally, it omits the fact that boys and young men are dropping out of school at an alarming rate, which means that they will become an economic underclass and earn considerably less than women.

I could have added that, even though more men than women go into politics and therefore dominate legislatures, we need to credit women with the ability to make choices. Not all women want to be mothers, sure, but not all women want to be politicians. More women than ever before are becoming politicians, nonetheless, and maybe they will eventually be just as common or more common than men in legislatures. Whether this would improve our lives is another matter. I am not convinced that sex or any other innate feature (such as race) makes some politicians better than others. Nor am I convinced that female politicians are necessarily better for women than male politicians are. (Remember Sarah Palin?) In any case, I am not convinced that men cannot be trusted to take the needs and problems of women seriously and therefore to represent women fairly. That is too cynical for me. And if that were the case, then people of neither sex could represent the other. We would need two legislative assemblies, one for men and the other for women. This would be a very disturbing sign of social fragmentation and polarization.

I could have mentioned that the male suicide rate is much, much higher than the female rate. It is true that more women than men attempt suicide, but this requires an explanation. Many more women attempt suicide because of a need to solicit help, not because of a real desire to end their lives. Why do men mean business when they attempt suicide? If they are so happy with all of their godlike power, why are they ready to kill themselves (and sometimes others as well)? And why is society so intent on ignoring the sexual differential that many newspaper reports on suicide rates fail even to mention it? Could it be the result of a double standard: when women attempt suicide, it's because they are victimized and therefore deserve sympathy; when men do (and often succeed), it is because they are violent and therefore deserve no sympathy? For that matter, why do we hear so little about research on the disturbing fact that women in advanced industrial societies outlive men by as much as seven or eight years?

I could have mentioned some legal problems of men, legal measures that discriminate against men in cases of not only of domestic violence, sexual harassment, or military service but also of divorce and custody. I am convinced that most young men would never marry women or even live with women, let alone have children with women, if they actually knew that the legal deck is stacked against men, heavily, in connection with divorce and custody.

I could have noted that those feminists (including male feminists) who are indifferent to the problems of the grown men in their lives should at least consider those of their own sons or grandsons, who live or will soon live in a world that is anything but "patriarchal." These problems (let alone their inability to create a healthy collective identity) affect boys and men directly. As a result, more than a few become cynical enough to abandon or even attack a society that has no room for them except in prisons—that is, refuses to take them seriously as people.

I could have explained that the children who bullied me in school included both boys and girls in roughly equal numbers. This, too, caused me to wonder about the difference between sex (maleness or femaleness) and gender (masculinity of femininity). Even I believed that girls were nicer than boys—despite evidence to the contrary that I encountered in my own daily life.

I could have mentioned that inter-sexual dialogue lies at the heart of my research with Katherine Young. And that dialogue is not a euphemism for debate. Debate is about winners and losers, which is why it can be useful in contexts such as the courtroom or the classroom (unless it devolves into two sides ranting at each other). Dialogue is about reconciliation, however, through carefully cultivated empathy or compassion.

I could have added that ideological feminists refuse to acknowledge their own misandry, and even some egalitarian feminists are motivated by political expediency to condone the misandric fallout from ideological feminism. Those who do not simply deny the existence of misandry, for instance, often try to excuse it as nothing more than men getting their comeuppance. But this is revenge, not justice (which does not mean much unless it entails reconciliation). This explains the importance that I attach to the specifically moral dimension of misandry and therefore to the need for inter-sexual dialogue. Whether you define misandry as "hatred" or "contempt," which is how I do define it, or as something that sounds milder and less provocative, it refers to an inherently evil phenomenon. (It is one of the very few; even killing, after all, is justifiable in some circumstances.) In short, two wrongs do not make a right.

But I should have taken the initiative right from the get-go, however, by ignoring her agenda and referring to what troubled me most of all about my interview: the utter lack of moral reasoning in my interviewer (or at least in her assumptions, probably correct ones, about the audience). No society worth living in can endure if its citizens are either unwilling or unable to acknowledge fundamental moral questions. Given the fact that I had to defend the whole idea of concern for one group of human beings, let alone the notion that we should treat others as we would want them to treat us, I would say that we are entering a new dark age.

By "comparative suffering," in short, I mean competitive suffering: a contest in which the suffering of one group should take precedence, especially when it comes to legislation and public policy, over that of another. Both women and men can play this game. Until very recently, though, men have seldom done so, at least not publicly, for fear of ridicule. This has allowed women to convince even some men, at least the alpha males among them, to ignore the ways in which society makes men disadvantaged. (I will say more about that in due course.) By now, public rhetoric assumes the priority of breaking down every barrier to "women's equality" (although that nonsensical but revealing slogan is not quite the same thing as the "equality of women and men"). Whichever group indulges in this game, it encourages members to make extremely heavy emotional investments in winning. Being a victim, at least in the past, has become a primary marker of both personal and collective identity not only for women but also for many other groups. Any challenge to their identity as victims simultaneously challenges assumptions about those who victimized them, of course, and thus brings the conversation to an end. To make my point about men and women, which is almost impossible to discuss without evoking heated and defensive rhetoric, I refer now to one analogy from my own experience.

I grew up in a Jewish home and went to a Jewish day school. At school, during the 1950s, we learned not only about our history as victims of persecution in general but also about the Nazi "holocaust" in particular. And yet my teachers presented the persecution of Jews as one historical pattern but by no means the only one in Jewish history. They encouraged me to form a strong Jewish identity by emphasizing the achievements of Jews, not the suffering of Jews. During the 1960s, though, this approach began to change. Those who had experienced the death camps were no longer eager to "forget" about their suffering in order to get on with their lives; they were beginning to realize that both their children and the world needed to remember what had happened. But it took the publication of a highly controversial book, Richard Rubenstein's After Auschwitz, to catalyze discussion. Rubenstein argued that belief in the God of history, who intervenes to reward the righteous and punish the wicked, was no longer tenable after the death camps. Assuming that divine intervention is the only kind of religion that monotheism can support (which was a false assumption), he argued that Jews should reject monotheism and find their way back to polytheism. Not many American Jews cared about Rubenstein's theology or any other version of Jewish theology, but they did care about Jewish identity at a time of rapid assimilation into American society. Many began to see themselves as archetypal victims and even to replace Judaism itself with what amounts to "Holocaustism." But being archetypal victims is hardly attractive in itself, even among those who believe that it confers some kind of moral superiority. Being victims would never have become an enduring focus of Jewish identity, therefore, had it not been for the reverse pattern, the antidote to despair: being heroes in the re-establishment of a Jewish state. Emil Fackenheim crystallized or legitimated this way of thinking in a book that proclaimed collective survival as a divine commandment that equaled or even superseded the commandments that Moses had received on Mount Sinai. This reversed the paradigm of Judaism. Earlier, the Jewish people had been a means to the greater end of perpetuating Torah. Now, Torah was one means (among many) to the greater end of perpetuating the Jewish people. Jews began to replace Judaism not only with Holocaustism, therefore, but also with Israelism (which goes way, way beyond patriotism or vicarious patriotism).

To maintain their own identity as archetypal victims, at any rate, some Jews feel a subconscious need to diminish the victimization of other groups (although Jews are hardly the only Americans who resort to identity politics). Since the 1960s, at any rate, Jewish Americans and Black Americans have competed with each other and with many other groups for a coveted status: the world's most victimized group among Jewish Americans and the nation's most victimized group among Black Americans. Who suffered more, then, Jews under 12 horrific years of Nazi genocide and periodic persecution in earlier times or Black Americans under three horrific centuries of slavery, segregation, and lynching? Anyone who even feels a need even to answer this question, I suggest, has failed to understand that, apart from any other problem, its initial premise is gravely flawed.

The initial premise is that we can compare suffering effectively, a very dubious assertion. It is true that we can do so in connection with identical or very similar forms of suffering. An ordinary headache due to stress and one that is due to a brain tumor are both medical problems, but the former is usually less painful and always much less serious than the latter. Even this kind of comparison works only at a very superficial level, though, because people always experience suffering in connection with both subjectivity and cultural expectations. Two patients who suffer from the same form of cancer, for instance, might not actually suffer to the same degree. Some cultures condition people to ignore pain, after all, or at least not to complain about it. Some people have higher pain thresholds, moreover, than other people. In any case, we have no reliable way of measuring pain for comparative purposes.

More important, though, is the fact that people can suffer in very different ways. It makes no moral sense at all to argue that being an inmate of some concentration camp was either harder or easier than being a slave on some plantation—not unless you compare death in a concentration camp with survival on a plantation. With this in mind, we should be able to conclude, simply, that both groups have suffered historically from severe dehumanization (at the very least). The question of degree is irrelevant for moral purposes, I suggest, though clearly not for political purposes. But not all Black Americans or Jewish Americans use historic suffering, in itself, as an excuse for making political demands. Rather, they use current suffering. For many Black Americans, this could mean continuing to lack economic opportunities due to continuing racial prejudice against them. For many Jewish Americans, it could mean continuing to endure existential threats in Middle Eastern and some other countries due to continuing racial or religious prejudice against them.

Now, then, consider all this specifically in connection with women and men. Women have indulged very effectively in comparative suffering, although some men now try, less effectively, to do the same thing. Anyone who enters the blogosphere knows, or soon learns, that writing about the needs or problems of men inevitably draws implacable hostility, and not only from many women but also from many men. Women very often argue that the needs and problems of men cannot compare with those of women; a lengthy list of the latter inevitably follows—even if a blog's topic might not have much to do with women. Many items on the list apply to women in Afghanistan, moreover, or to other remote societies with very different cultures and very different histories. Ideological feminists believe fervently, we suggest, that all cultures and all societies are virulently "patriarchal." An "honor killing" in some tribal society of central Asia, therefore, is no different from a rape in our own society. Never mind that tribal societies demand honor killings, and that our society punishes rape. Never mind that these tribal societies require fathers or brothers to kill the men who dishonor their daughters or sisters and to endure generations of blood feuding as a result. In short, it is the very idea that men could have any problems, let alone serious ones, that rankles many feminists. This is because the underlying assumption, which provides the raison d'être of ideological feminism and finds support even among many egalitarian feminists, is that men have "all the power." Otherwise, how could anyone legitimately demand exclusive concern for women? So, it is a zero-sum political game. Supposedly, taking the needs and problems of men seriously—not those of "alpha males" alone but those of a vast and highly differentiated group—means trivializing the needs and problems of women. Again, "comparative suffering" is an ironic euphemism for competitive suffering.

As for men, more than a few react with surprising hostility toward the idea that they, too, have distinctive needs and problems. And I am not referring to alpha males, who can afford to ignore those of most other men. They are not hostile to ordinary men, merely indifferent to them. No, I am referring instead to those who actually care about social justice. They simply believe that only some form of feminism can attain social justice, can "level the playing field" by favoring women and therefore that their own needs and problems are trivial in relation to those of women. This, too, presents a specifically moral problem. It relies on the closely related notions of collective guilt and vicarious punishment. All men today, and not only the alpha males among them, are guilty for continuing to benefit from the sins of their ancestors. Ergo, all men today, and not only the alpha males among them, deserve to bear the burden of paying for the sins of their ancestors.

Why would any men accept these notions, which have by now become conventional wisdom in influential circles? It would be cynical to assume that self-interest, whether personal or collective, is the only motivating factor. These men might well believe in altruism, which even today sometimes takes the outmoded form of "chivalry." And yet these men often reveal themselves not as altruists at all but as ideologues, explaining their point of view by referring to notions that are prevalent in ideological forms of feminism. But precisely how can men adopt an ideology that requires them to deny their own needs and problems and even to accept a very negative identity? They can do so in at least two ways.

Some men try to sever the link between themselves and other men. We are enlightened, they might think, it is only those other bastards who need to see the light of feminism. Charles Blow, for example, routinely says precisely that in his blog for The New York Times. Although a few ideological feminists define men as innately evil (which is a contradiction in terms), most of them—along with egalitarian feminists—do grant men the possibility of redemption through conversion to some form of feminism. Blow is a convert, saying so explicitly on his blog, and therefore what Young and I would classify as an "honorary woman." As such, he might expect praise from women. If so, he should expect also enmity from other men—that is, men who are either unable or unwilling to ignore their own depressing experience of daily life. And for that very reason, his own stated goal of fostering reconciliation between the sexes remains a fantasy.

Other men have a very different way of ignoring their own needs and problems. They repress their sense of vulnerability. Discussing these things can feel very threatening, after all, because no one actually wants to feel vulnerable. To be vulnerable, after all, means to have unfulfilled needs and insoluble problems. And let us not forget that among the central features of American masculinity has been the sense of being in control—not necessarily in control over other people but always in control of themselves. To be out of control, or vulnerable, is thus to be something other than masculine. Because the current American version of masculinity is a very demanding role—apart from anything else, it demands stoic disregard for physical or even emotional pain—and because the price for abandoning it is intense ridicule or hostility, most American men have grown up with very heavy emotional investments in it. So, these men try to hide from their own vulnerability as long as possible and despite the high cost of doing so. Vulnerability, in short, is for men the "fate worse than death."

But there is at least one additional possibility. Like so many women, men can acknowledge their own vulnerability to forces beyond their control—social, psychological, historical, legal, military, political, and even physiological forces—in order to become less vulnerable. Why do I say "less vulnerable" instead of *in*vulnerable? I do so because of the fact that no one can ever be completely immune to vulnerability. As social animals, humans can never be completely autonomous, or independent, and therefore must always be vulnerable at least sometimes to disappointment, betrayal, indifference, and so on. We must depend on each other, both as individuals and as groups. Men and women, for instance, have always depended on each other. There are those in our time, though, who believe that women can be, and should be, completely independent—not merely less dependent on men than they used to be. For most feminists, this means primarily financial independence: providing equal opportunities for women and men to have exciting careers and to earn equal pay for equal work but also ensuring that single, widowed, divorced or abandoned women can support themselves and their families without having to depend on men. For some feminists, however, independence goes much further. They demand reproductive autonomy as well: taking unilateral control not only of family life but also of society's future. With that in mind, they have lobbied for legislation and high-court rulings that promote their own assumptions: the right to have abortions without consulting the fathers, the right to full custody of children after divorce, and so on.

Men have not lobbied for legislation that would guarantee their own autonomy, but many men are aware at some level of consciousness that they are in trouble and therefore need help. They are aware because of what they hear day after day, directly or indirectly, in the academic public square. College men can hardly cross the campus without seeing posters or notices about their victimization of college women. Recently, for instance, ideological feminists have revived the rhetoric of "rape culture." At issue is not whether rape occurs on college campuses, because it clearly does, or even how pervasive it is. At issue is whether our culture, either on campus or anywhere else, actually fosters rape as a social norm. At issue, in other words, is how to interpret sexual relations. Do all sexual relations between men and women lie on a continuum that begins with a smile and ends with rape? And if so, does this mean that all sexual relations between men and women are forms of rape?

Besides, anyone who watches daytime talk shows or prime-time news shows or reads some of the countless online blogs must realize that many people no longer believe in the need for fathers. Single mothers, for instance, no longer evoke pity or disapproval; on the contrary, they often evoke admiration for their courage. The advent of sperm banks, moreover, has made single-motherhood-by-choice the venue for one more "alternative family." Many women, especially those who have college degrees, still want their children to have fathers, sure, but not all feel any need to provide their children with fathers. The overall message to men is that mothers can, in a pinch, either do it all for themselves or rely on the state to help them out. Consequently, fathers have become luxuries at best and liabilities at worst. Their dollars are still required, yes, but not necessarily their enduring presence in the home. Women can be not only mothers, it would seem, but also fathers. And if need be, they can always find "father figures" for their children. Moreover, many men do not want the obligations of family life. It would seem that fathers (unlike mothers) have only obligations, not rights. Neither do children, apparently, according to those who believe that children do not need fathers. It should come as no surprise, therefore, that many men now see no reason (aside from legal pressure) to stick around.

In a more general sense, moreover, you could argue that neither women nor men need each other as they once did. Many men find that they no longer need wives or girlfriends, after all, to contribute their traditionally feminine household tasks or social skills. These men can either hire people or do without those services. Unless they want children, therefore, many young men feel no interest at all in marriage or even long-term relationships with women. This became clear in Katherine Gilday's documentary film for Canada's National Film Board. In Women and Men Unglued, she interviewed young men and women (mainly but not only White, urban, and middle-class). Discussing their transient and somewhat unsatisfying relationships, some admitted that they envied their parents or grandparents for the enduring relationships that had once been taken for granted. And yet these young people expressed little hope of ever attaining relationships of that kind.

The social scientists are still arguing about all this and will be for some time, because longitudinal studies require decades, not months. If psychologists and sociologists eventually find that children do need fathers, then our social experiment will have seriously deprived a generation. But if they eventually find that children do not need fathers—everyone assumes, of course, that they need mothers—then another problem will emerge, one that is already becoming increasingly urgent. Women do not need men to provide them and their children with resources. Nor do they need men to protect them from predators, human or otherwise. Why not? The answer is obvious. Women can now depend either on themselves or on the state to do both. But if women also do not need men to be fathers, except as assistant mothers or walking wallets, then men will find that all three of their historic functions have become obsolete. And this could be a grave problem not only for men but also for children and for society as a whole.

Identity

This brings me to the core of my research with Young: identity. We propose the following hypothesis: that a healthy identity requires the ability to make at least one contribution to society that is (a) distinctive, (b) necessary, and (c) publicly valued. This applies to both the individual and the group, but I refer now to the group—that is, to men as a group within society. Two questions emerge. If men can have a healthy collective identity in our time, which distinctive, necessary, and publicly valued contribution will they be able to make? And if men cannot have a healthy collective identity in our time, what are the consequences likely to be for society as a whole?

In response to the first question, it is clear to us that fatherhood is the one and only remaining source of a healthy collective identity for men and thus for a healthy notion of masculinity—which is to say, one that fosters not only the family but also society as a whole. Relying on the tentative findings of many early studies, we argue that fathers probably do have both distinctive and necessary functions in family life. If so, then society must actively, publicly, and unambiguously value those distinctive and necessary functions. In other words, we argue that mothers cannot be fathers and that children need fathers—not assistant mothers but fathers. Now, then, precisely what is the distinctive and necessary contribution that men can make as fathers?

It might not be enough, after all, for children to have two parents. Every child might need at least one mother and one father. I say "at least one," because isolated nuclear families probably do not represent the ideal family type; most societies have produced and supported extended families. Nonetheless, most have recognized nuclear families within that larger context. And whether society assigns fatherhood to the genetic father or to the mother's brother, the "job description" always calls for a male candidate. At issue here are the specific functions of fathers and mothers.

For obvious reasons, mothers not only give birth to infants but also maintain very intimate relations with their infants and young children; although fathers can interact with their children emotionally—and often do so, especially in our own time—they do not need to do so. In modern parlance, mothers generally provide their infants and young children with unconditional love. The importance of fathers increases gradually, though, as children begin to live not only within the security of the home but also within the riskier larger world beyond home. Fathers provide them with earned respect. Fathers do not need to tell their children, "I'll love you no matter what you do" (although that might well be true for many fathers). Rather, they need to tell their children, "I'll respect you for acting effectively and honorably in the larger world."

These vaguely conflicting messages could be confusing if they come from the same parent, of course, because earned respect is really one form of love. So, is love unconditional or conditional? In theory, anyone, male or female, could give one message or the other. In practice, though, it is probably much easier for mothers—or will be at least in the foreseeable future—to give unconditional love to their children and for fathers to give earned respect to their children. This difference is not necessarily due to instinct. It is probably due mainly to the extensive cultural training that still produces "gender," no matter how attenuated that cultural system has become. (If gender were genetically transmitted, as sex is, then why would every culture find it necessary to reward those who conform to gender expectations and to punish those who don't?) Some women and some men probably could refrain from one scenario and enact the other one. But we are not there yet. And do not take my word for it. Feminists still complain that women are shackled by their maternal urges. Some argue that those urges are innate (and therefore make women superior to men by nature). Others argue that these urges are imposed by "patriarchal" culture (and therefore have made women the victims of men). Still others argue that all people are the products of both nature and culture. My point is simply that mothers and fathers will have, at least in the foreseeable future, distinctive and necessary functions within the family. If so, then men can indeed still create a healthy collective identity specifically as men.

This brings me to the second question. If men cannot create a healthy collective identity for themselves, what are the likely consequences? Anyone can answer that question merely by looking at the evidence that has piled up in the offices of social scientists. Men, especially young men, are abandoning society and sometimes life itself. They are dropping out of school at a much higher rate than young women; some universities report that only 40% of their students are male. That is a very recent problem, but older ones remain with us. Young men are committing both crime and suicide at much higher rates than young women. Add to these social problems the startling medical fact that women continue to outlive men by approximately five years. Grants for medical research seldom include funding for studies on the difference between male and female life expectancies. It is hard to imagine that situation if the differential favored men, not women. In these ways, though not in all ways, American society is clearly indifferent to the fate of boys and men per se.

Consider one recent case study. Why was anyone surprised to learn that Elliot Rodger opened fire on crowded streets in Santa Barbara and then on himself? His case is particularly interesting, because so many bloggers are dismayed by his murderous hostility toward women and thus frame their interpretation of the event in classic ideological terms. Rodger, they argue, was not insane. Like all or most men, he simply hated women. The cause of his rampage was not abnormal psychology or even access to guns. It was "patriarchy." How many of these bloggers even remember his murderous hostility toward other men? After all, he mentioned his hatred toward other men in his long letter. And he actually killed more men than women. Everyone had rejected him, so everyone deserved his wrath. We had a similar case in Montreal almost 30 years ago. But Marc Lépine killed only women, fourteen of them, before killing himself as a victim of feminism. And some ideological feminists did indeed exploit this case for political purposes—even at the public funerals. Lépine, they insisted, was not a rare psychopath. He was Everyman. He did what all men have always wanted to do more than anything else: kill or oppress women. Most men do not enact this fantasy, to be sure, but only because they are afraid to do so. Not all feminists, by any means, accepted this theory. But it remained at the heart of public discourse for a very long time. By now, the anniversary has become a solemn day of remembrance in Canada, especially in Quebec. It competes openly with Remembrance Day, moreover, which commemorates those who died while fighting for their country during the world wars—almost all of whom were young men. Public monuments have become pilgrimage sites. The ceremonies that take place there closely resemble those that commemorate not only the military victims of Canadian wars but also, and more pointedly, the civilian victims of Nazi Germany. The implication is clear. Canada (or Quebec) is a "patriarchy" and thus not so very different from Nazi Germany. In that case, caring about men is tantamount to caring about Nazis. And that, from my perspective, is tantamount to misandry.

Misandry

Hostility toward men, misandry, seldom finds outlets as dramatic as controversy over a mass murderer. More often, it emerges in the underlying assumptions of laws and policies. Most people have been aware for a long time that some laws favor women despite their gender-neutral language. No court in our time would allow any gender-specific law to stand—except, of course, for the one that requires American young men but not young women to register for the draft—but those who interpret laws and those who enforce them do not always honor the spirit of gender-neutrality. Among the more obvious examples are those that involve family courts, which adjudicate matters such as child custody. A Canadian bill would have mandated the presumption of joint custody, unless that arrangement would be likely to endanger children. But this bill was defeated. After years of supporting the presumption of joint custody, the ruling party abandoned it. This leads to speculation that the presumption of joint custody is still politically unacceptable, even though it is both morally legitimate and, according to many social scientists, psychologically sound.

Given the current storm of outrage over what many people consider the "rape culture" on college campuses (but also of society as a whole), universities have found it necessary to revise policies that affect the relation between male and female students on campus. Few universities, if any, have made these revisions known to outsiders. And they probably never will, because revelations of this kind might reveal the extent to which universities might go in order to punish and prevent "sexual assault" (which now has an elastic definition that can include anything from offensive words to rape). But we do know that some students and administrators are demanding revisions that would not only blur the line between campus security departments and municipal police departments but also diminish the prospect of due process for the accused—most of whom, presumably, would be male.

And Michael Kimmel believes that he knows why. He argues that young men are preoccupied with a sense of "aggrieved entitlement." They believe, he claims, that they have some right to privilege. When society fails to confer privilege on them, they react by turning against society. They turn against women, in particular, because society now appears to confer some forms of privilege on them. This explains the "boy code" and the rampant misogyny on college campuses—what others call their "rape culture." In one way, Kimmel is correct. These "boys" do exist and now, perhaps, more of them do than ever. What underlies their verbal abuse or physical violence, however, is another matter. I would say that they are preoccupied not with illegitimate "aggrieved entitlement" but with legitimate "aggrieved entitlement." How can "entitlement" ever be legitimate? The answer should be (but is not yet) obvious: because everyone is surely entitled to some things. Not to privilege but to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." And "happiness" (no matter how you define that vague word) is impossible without a healthy collective identity. That is why many young men feel aggrieved. They know that they are entitled to a make at least one contribution to society, as men, that is distinctive, necessary, and publicly valued. They know also that society has ignored their claim to a healthy identity, denying it to them but not to women. They resent that state of affairs. And, frankly, they have good reasons for doing so. It's simple. If society has no respect for them, specifically as men, then they will have no respect for society. Even an unhealthy identity, they might well believe, is better than no identity at all. This does not excuse their anti-social behavior, but it does explain their anti-social behavior—and in a way that does not rely on ideological cynicism.

Ultimately, misandry is not about this or that law, this or that policy, but about society's inability or unwillingness to care about men (as if doing that would somehow compromise caring about women). And caring about men, in our time, means helping them to find a healthy collective identity specifically as men.

Conclusions

Katherine Young and I do not stop at analyzing the current predicament of American society. We go further by proposing a solution. Well, not a solution per se but a new method of seeking one. And it is not even new. What we call "inter-sexual dialogue" originated in inter-religious dialogue. The basic premise is that participants must actually want healing and reconciliation, not merely to sound off. They must listen carefully to their dialogue partners, therefore, and not focus all attention on themselves. In short, they must actively cultivate empathy. Clearly, then, dialogue is not debate. In debate, after all, the goal is for one side to win and the other to lose. And this method can be very useful in academic and some legal contexts. In dialogue, however, the goal is for both sides to win. And this method is almost certainly the only one that can end the current polarization of men and women and take us in an entirely new direction.

Does the Independent's Matthew Champion condone violence against Indian men? You decide!

Andy Thomas · 20 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"We can't condone violence." These are the very words that i100 website news editor Matthew Champion uses to introduce his latest article on the Independent's new UK website. In the very same sentence, he describes how "satisfying" it is to see an Indian man being forced to kneel while a woman stamps on his head. "Hurrah!" Champion exclaims in this outstandingly shoddy piece of reporting.

He is writing about a YouTube video shot in Bangalore. A young man, K R Suryaprakash, is pursued down the street and physically attacked by a woman after he allegedly "eve-teased" her—an Indian term used to refer to sexually suggestive behaviour by men toward women.

The term "eve-teasing" is important because it has cultural significance in India and is subject to a drive for cultural change. It is often portrayed positively in Indian cinema as mild teasing and flirtatious courtship. In recent times, there has been a drive to stamp it out and to conflate it with rape and throwing acid at women. Now I do not defend sexual harassment—I think it is unacceptable—but the fact is that the term "eve-teasing" could mean virtually anything. The reality is what Suryaprakash allegedly did or said isn't captured in the video, nor is it even clear what that was.

Nevertheless, Matthew Champion reports his "crime" as fact—he "sexually harassed her," states the title of his article. In the video, however, all we see is Suryaprakash being chased and ordered to kneel in the street by the woman he is accused of harassing, who then stamps on his head after he submissively complies. Personally, I think there's a whole debate to be had here about who's actually being socially disadvantaged in this complex cultural backdrop.

But you know what? Who gives a fuck?

Why should Champion let an inconvenience such as "balanced reporting" get in the way of an opportunity to demonstrate his "real man" credentials? Indeed, why let old-fashioned concepts such as justice and humanity get in the way of the sheer glee of seeing physical and social harm meted out to a young Indian male who is culturally unable to defend himself?

After all, he probably deserves it, right? No need then to consider his account, the cultural context, or even what it is that he is actually accused of? No need for any kind of due process on this one—no one cares about perverts anyway, so fuck him. "Hurrah!"

Is this what passes for reporting nowadays?

After a little searching, I found this less than objective article of the incident in the Bangalore Mirror. For the sheer level of vitriolic prejudice, this article takes some beating. (Perhaps it should serve as a glimpse of things to come for young men in western countries.)

However, it does provide an account by the woman in the video, Veena Ashiya Chindlur. This is what the young man is accused of:

"Around 9.30 a.m., my friend and I were jogging when he [Suryaprakash] made strange noises and eve-teased me. I tried to scare him by running after him. He tried to flee, but I chased him and hit him."

After Chindlur showed the video of her beating the man to the police, Suryaprakash was arrested and charged with "outraging the modesty of a woman" and "intending to insult the modesty of women," both of which are crimes under Indian law. From the above account, therefore, I surmise that he is alleged to have said something or made some gesture.

Let me reverse the genders here so that we can experience how things look the other way around …

As a teenage boy, I recall an incident in which lewd remarks were shouted at me by a group of drunken middle-aged women while I, too, was out jogging. If the genders were reversed, that incident would fall under the loose definition of “eve-teasing.” Culturally, males are meant to feel “lucky” when women make sexually suggestive remarks to them. I didn’t, and instead felt uncomfortable and kept running. At no point, however, did it occur to me to chase those women down and stamp on their heads.

No, I can’t discern what it is that Suryaprakash actually said or did (if anything), and I would bet neither had Matthew Champion before taking to his keyboard. What I do know, however, is what is on display in the video is not justice. Simply because someone feels outrage at another does not and should not give anyone the moral and legal right to chase them down and attack them in the street. Irrespective of whatever he has done wrong, I see a young man with no opportunity to defend himself, no rights, and no one to represent his interests. He is simply painted as sub-human and “othered” by the media.

Moreover, I see people who should know better taking pleasure in watching him being harmed. The concept of “innocence until proven guilty” and the “right to a fair trial” are important human rights—both of which Matthew Champion has denied Suryaprakash.

Lies, damned lies and the video game press

AVfM Video Source · 20 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Social Justice Warriors have destroyed the video game press. A schism is needed. So says Sargon of Akkad

From the video description:

Other videos to watch on the subject:
Internet Aristocrat: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=C5-51…
MundaneMatt: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Equc1…
Jordan Owen: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cAsJO…

Sources:

http://n4g.com/news/1569416/kotaku-st…
http://www.thebore.com/forum/index.ph…
http://www.destructoid.com/psa-you-sh…
http://www.polygon.com/2014/4/23/5640…
https://www.theesa.com/facts/pdfs/ESA…
http://www.escapistmagazine.com/news/…
http://www.theesa.com/facts/pdfs/ESA_…
http://www.gamespot.com/articles/esa-…
http://venturebeat.com/2013/09/19/gen…
http://blog.apptopia.com/game-demogra…
http://www.digitalbuzzblog.com/facebo…
http://www.polygon.com/2013/1/4/38372…
http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/art…
http://www.forbes.com/sites/danielnye…
http://www.forbes.com/sites/davidthie…
http://kotaku.com/ubisoft-cut-plans-f…
http://www.forbes.com/sites/erikkain/…

Kajieme Powell shot dead by cops 4 miles from Ferguson shooting

Dean Esmay · 21 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ferguson is a suburb of the city of St. Louis.

In St. Louis proper, 4 miles from the Ferguson shooting, this has just recently transpired: after being seen doing some minor shoplifting, 25 year old Kajieme Powell was defiant toward police, refused to drop a steak knife he apparently had in his hands, and within 20 seconds of police arrival, they shoot him dead. What you are about to watch is a man being gunned down by the police. For real. Then they handcuff his dead body.

http://archive.avoiceformen.com/video/powell-shooting.mp4
More details are here at St. Louis Public Radio, but what I find most damning of all of this, by far, is that the police argue that this video is "exculpatory."

We have reached the point in the United States where a young man holding a steak knife who won't drop it as he approaches is not to be tasered, not to be hit with pepper spray, but shot 12 times–essentially meaning both officers completely emptied their guns into him–and this is considered OK by police procedure.

There will I suppose be those who say this was completely justified. I mean, come on, the young man was a thug and he had a knife in his hand and was defiant. He was asking for it, right? Right??

You know, I have family and friends in law enforcement. I used to respect the badge. I'm increasingly reaching the point–a point I do not like much–where if someone says "fuck the police," I really have no response except a muted, shameful nod.

I will repeat something I said in another essay recently:

> When a great mass of people experience a state that does little or nothing that helps them in a way they can see, and experiences only indifference when it's not outright punishment from that state, what do you think their reaction is eventually going to be? If government is doing a terrible job on helping boys and men, and is frequently hurting them—and it is—why the hell wouldn't people conscious of these issues start developing a distinct aversion to the state?
>
> What is it that you think is going on in Ferguson, Missouri, right now? If your answer is "race war" or "the ns are just acting like thugs again," please turn around and go find another website to read. The real answer is, it's people who feel they have no stake whatsoever in the system, and that the state can't be trusted to do anything but ignore them at best or shoot them dead at worst.
>
> They do not trust the government. Why? Because they have been given no good reason to trust it and a list of reasons a mile long not to trust it.

I don't think I care to argue with or even much talk to anyone who thinks that this was an appropriate police response to a shoplifting and loosely holding a steak knife walking toward them.

Step away, pepper spray, taser? No. Empty your gun into a man. That apparently is standard police procedure in the United States.

And people wonder why there is widespread hatred of the system and those who are in it or part of it.

Come to the KSUM fall conference (free tickets)

Jonathan Taylor · 21 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Free tickets are available to the Kennesaw State University Men's conference in the Atlanta, Georgia area. Jonathan Taylor has a video explaining why you should come if you can!

http://youtu.be/PphFvCRv1jM

Get your ticket here!

Feminism's heritage: Equity vs. victim feminism

Jeb Kinnison · 21 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
Suffragettes
Peter Wright of AVfM pointed out the division among early feminists between those who wanted the freedom to enjoy the rights and opportunities of men (voting, professional employment, equal treatment under the law) and those who wanted special treatment (exemptions from military service, favorable alimony and custody rules, lighter criminal sentences, lowered physical qualification standards for physical jobs). He pointed me to the work of Ernest Belfort Bax, an early (1913) men's rights advocate:

> Modern Feminism rose slowly above the horizon. Modern Feminism has two distinct sides to it: (1) an articulate political and economic side embracing demands for so-called rights; and (2) a sentimental side which insists in an accentuation of the privileges and immunities which have grown up, not articulately or as the result of definite demands, but as the consequence of sentimental pleading in particular cases. In this way, however, a public opinion became established, finding expression in a sex favouritism in the law and even still more in its administration, in favour of women as against men.
>
> These two sides of Modern Feminism are not necessarily combined in the same person. One may, for example, find opponents of female suffrage who are strong advocates of sentimental favouritism towards women in matters of law and its administration. On the other hand you may find, though this is more rare, strong advocates of political and other rights for the female sex, who sincerely deprecate the present inequality of the law in favour of women. As a rule, however, the two sides go together, the vast bulk of the advocates of "Women's Rights" being equally keen on the retention and extension of women's privileges. Indeed, it would seem as though the main object of the bulk of the advocates of the "Woman's Movement" was to convert the female sex into the position of a dominant sexe noblesse. The two sides of Feminism have advanced hand in hand for the last two generations, though it was the purely sentimental side that first appeared as a factor in public opinion."—The Fraud of Feminism, Chapter I: Historical (1913)

Bax is part of the "patriarchal" reaction to early feminism—these men were horrified that the suffocating sentimentality of women and what they thought was women's overly emotional reaction to issues would, with women's suffrage and increasingly equal roles in the world, lead to disaster and the end of civilization as they knew it. For a pop culture model, imagine Professor Henry Higgins of My Fair Lady—grumpy, male chauvinist, orderly intellectual. Bax was quite reasonably complaining that the law had already started to bend to favor women over men in some areas (divorce, criminal punishment) for sentimental reasons, while feminists continued to push for even more special treatment, at the same time demanding equality where it would favor women. WWI is what actually ended the fin de siècle order of the world, but feminism continued, contributing in the US to the Progressive movement and its errors (e.g., Prohibition and eugenics).

Feminism as a movement continued and expanded, each victory leading to more issues needing its attention. Public sympathy for the rational goal of equal legal and professional treatment coexisted with the reservoir of sentimental feeling for women and ingrained desires to help mothers and children, which affected decisions on governmental support and handling of divorce. Enlightened and empowered women joined academia and government in large numbers, until today they are dominant in some departments and fields.

But the split identified by Bax is still there.

Feminist thinker Naomi Wolf tried to influence the future of feminism with her 1994 book Fire with Fire: The New Female Power and How to Use It. From the Amazon page:

> [T]he book argues that women should renounce "victim feminism," which casts them as sexually pure, fragile, > beleaguered creatures whose problems are all the fault of men. As an alternative, Wolf outlines an anti-dogmatic "power feminism" which sees women as no better and no worse than men, celebrates female sexuality and encourages women to claim their individual voices through a variety of tactics. These include "resource groups" for sharing contacts and increasing access to information and services; consumer campaigns; and pressure on the media to alter their portrayals of women. Wolf theorizes that little girls, as much as boys, have fantasies of absolute dominion but learn to repress their "will to power" at a very early age. Wolf here sketches a psychological road map designed to help women deal with their ambivalence about success, power, equality and money.

I don't agree with Wolf much of the time, but in this she was on the right side: a feminism directed toward remaining real issues of equality, empowerment, and respect would be far less authoritarian and far less harmful to women's partners in continuing civilization, men. But the cadres embedded in women's studies departments, government, and NGOs were not interested in giving up the easy demonization of men and continued to seek refuge in grievance, victimhood, and moral superiority.

One of the problems with social justice warriors and activists generally is their myopic focus on their own culture and government, applying their search for ever-smaller irritants ("microaggressions" and remaining disparities in treatment) to the most progressive societies on the planet while ignoring the far more serious maltreatment of women, gays, religious and ethnic minorities, and poor people in other countries and cultures around the world. They elevate and sentimentalize other cultures as more "authentic" and seem to assign blame for most problems there to the imperialism and interventionism of western countries. I would agree that societies on the other side of the world should not be lightly trifled with and western countries have been foolishly intervening for centuries, but the treatment of women and minorities in those places was in place long before western powers showed up. And yet activists spend far more time and energy on lobbying government to pressure businesses to provide free birth control and weaken standards of proof in university rape cases than they do on improving girls' schools in Islamic countries or combatting female circumcision. Meanwhile, they choose not to see the problems of men in their own society, and by seeing "patriarchy" as the source of all evil in their world, they assume that all men are privileged and call for more restrictions on men's rights and freedoms.

Group rights over individual rights—what are the consequences of making everything about the rights and entitlements of one class of people more important than others? The devaluing of boys in western educational systems has become a serious problem, and their natural inclinations to tinker and explore has been repressed in favor of social organization. In the United States, mediocre women overwhelmingly dominate primary education, and a lack of masculine role models—and a general emphasis on feelings and group politics over rigor and intellectual exploration—make typical boy interests afterthoughts at best. There is much concern about the lack of women in science and high-tech, but modern primary education slights the hard sciences in favor of recycling training, ecology, and global warming alarmism. Children are taught what to feel, not how to think about problems.

So feminists won their battles, and by 2000, feminists (both male and female) held most of the positions in government bureaucracies, education, social services, and non-profit organizations. Those who had doubts about the worst excesses (e.g., mandatory video sexual harassment training for everyone, even the 90% who had always had the good sense to avoid making anyone feel uncomfortable by bringing sex into the workplace) were marginalized. Having won the controlling heights, feminists succeeded in correcting almost all the injustices that originally brought them political support.

But as happens with all passionate movements, reaching their initial goals did not stop their activists from coming up with novel ways to be offended. They came up with "microaggressions," tiny slights felt by the very sensitive when someone with a less-elevated consciousness acted less than perfectly in their eyes. "Intersectionality," the oppression of those who are members of more than one minority class (e.g., a Black female lesbian) became a hot topic, and of course only they had the authenticity to speak of their pain. The movement has evolved itself into an evolutionary dead end, where less and less consequential problems are clung to to justify controlling everyone else's behavior. The competition to be the most oppressed and most victimized—the "Victim Olympics"—led to a view of people's class oppressions as the central organizing principle of their lives. They are holders of the Progressive "special knowledge," and with the sword of righteousness they go out to correct the culture.

This is terribly damaging for the tiny minority of (mostly elite, mostly educated, and privileged) people who follow this new religion. They become close to useless at accomplishing anything concrete—anything that isn't about a committee organizing to write a report to agitate for more laws and regulations. As such, these cultists find it difficult to gain employment outside the centers of their influence in academia, media, and government.

They are small in number, but their belief is strong and their influence is widespread; they control the discourse in higher education, and new graduates have spent more time being taught their social theories than they have with the classics or the sciences.

Smart, secure women have noticed that modern feminists aren't acting in their interests. A column in Toronto's Globe and Mail by Margaret Wente continues the effort to get away from "victims' studies" thinking:

> Do we still need feminism? According to many younger women, we do not. For the past few weeks, a Tumblr hashtag campaign called #WomenAgainstFeminism has been stirring up a lot of angst in the Twitter/blogosphere. As part of the campaign, young women submit selfies with handwritten signs that say: "I don't need feminism because [fill in reason here]." The reasons include things like: "My self-worth is not directly tied to the size of my victim complex!" "I love being an engineer, but I'd rather just be Mom." "I like men looking at me when I look good." "Feminism has become a pseudonym for bullying." And, on a lighter note, "How the [bleep] am I supposed to open jars and lift heavy objects without my husband?"
>
> …
>
> Another reason is that #WomenAgainstFeminism is essentially right. There is a hard core of misandry and victim-culture in modern feminism that is deeply disturbing. #WomenAgainstFeminism is in part a reaction to the #YesAllWomen campaign, which began in reaction to the murder rampage of Elliot Rodger last May. The lonely misogynist—who killed two women and four men, before killing himself—was cast as a symbol of the worldwide war against women. As one Facebook comment (quoted in Time by Sarah Miller) said: "If you don't think this is about misogyny there is something wrong with you."
>
> Modern feminism has split into two distinct strands. The mild-mannered mainstream version, having achieved most of its objectives for equality (and then some: upward of 60 per cent of postsecondary graduates are now women) is focusing its efforts on ever more elitist issues, such as the lopsided gender split in Silicon Valley and the shortage of women on corporate boards. With all due respect to the problems of the one per cent, I do not think these are the types of issues that will send young women to the barricades.
>
> The leftist, postmodernist strand of feminism insists that women are still oppressed, and the world's still stacked against us, and there is basically no difference between the rape epidemic in India and the one in North America. One example of this thinking is The Guardian's Jessica Valenti, who, in response to #WomenAgainstFeminism, wrote: "[D]enying that women are a victimized class is simply wrong. What else would you call a segment of the population who are systematically discriminated against in school, work and politics? How would you describe a population whose bodies are objectified to the point of dehumanization? Women are harassed, attacked and sexually assaulted with alarming regularity in America and around the world." This is a belief system rather than a depiction of reality, and, as with all belief systems, there's no point arguing about it with the faithful.
>
> Views like this wouldn't matter much, except that they have real-life consequences, as Cathy Young has pointed out in Time. One is the destructive "rape culture" myth that has gripped campuses across North America, along with the meme – utterly fictitious – that one in five women will be sexually assaulted by the time she gets her degree. This claim is on the face of it absurd, but it has spawned an epidemic of victimology and abuse of due process that will take a generation to undo.

The Men's (Human) Rights Movement, together with the majority of women who want to see strong families and well-raised children continue our civilization, has barely made a dent in feminism's control of the discourse. Until average people understand what's being done to them, media and government will still promote feminist narratives and demonize men. But sites like AVfM are starting the process of education needed before change can occur.

This article was originally published at Jebkinnison.com –DE

The success of feminism is the failure of science

Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) · 21 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In response to B.R. Merrick's article in April this year On Feminism's Infantilization of Women[1], where he observes the impact that babying women has on what they become (for example, as it relates to confidence), I posted the following comment:

> Stu and Merrick are not scientists, yet they grasp essential points about human nature that our established academics do not. Whenever you confront our established academics with these issues, they resort to shaming and call you a misogynist, and they insist that "we won't discuss that (feminism) here." We don't need these troglodytes in the mainstream. Our mainstream life-sciences are dead … and their resistance to further discussion on the topic is proof. When ordinary people understand basic concepts that established authority does not, you know that it is time for a change. Us ordinary folk need the confidence to realize that we are having the wool pulled over our eyes by the modern equivalent of priests in lab-coats.

My interest in men's rights and anti-feminism is a subset of my interest in cognitive science. Usually my participation in online science forums goes smoothly enough, and other participants seem to appreciate my big-picture take on the topics at hand—that is, until I introduce the topic of feminism. Here are the sorts of responses that my critiques of feminism have elicited:

> "A few years ago I read what I could stomach of SJ's first misogynistic book and vowed never to read any more of his diatribe."
>
> "feminist bullshit? how many ladies are on this list? hum? fuck you, man …"
>
> "I would sincerely appreciate it if this list would not be used to promote anyone's anti-feminist agenda."
>
> "We will not entertain criticism of feminism on this forum."
>
> "Fucking misogynist."

… and so on. We get the picture.

So much for science. What sort of science is this science of the mainstream that refuses to entertain any divergence from the accepted narrative? We are dealing with the same sorts of narrow-minded bigots that tried to hobble the likes of Copernicus or Galileo. This is a new kind of church with its own dogma, asserting its own bigoted agenda. Criticize feminism and you will get charged with the modern equivalent of heresy. Clearly, something has gone awry in science—or, should I say, mainstream science.

The problem is not with science (as in, the scientific method)—the problem is that scientists of the Establishment have stopped being scientific. This is borne out in the erosion of the peer review process. For example, writing for The New York Times, Carl Zimmer[2] reports on the findings of Dr. Ferric C. Fang and Dr. Arturo Casadevall of a sharp rise in retractions of scientific papers. This may be attributable to a number of factors, according to the article, but most significant appears to be the commercialization of science projects as business units designed to attract government grants and funding. Dr. Fang, a professor at the University of Washington School of Medicine and editor in chief of the journal Infection and Immunity, describes said rise in retractions as "a symptom of a dysfunctional scientific climate."

Mathias Binswanger[3] observes that beginning in the 1960s, in the spirit of extending the availability of tertiary education to the masses:

> … the government has given up its reservations towards universities and formerly proud bastions of independent thinking have turned into servants of governmental programs and initiatives. Lenin's doctrine > applies once again: trust is good, control is better.

Hmm … these developments happen to coincide nicely with the rise of feminism, don't they? No doubt an unspoken assumption would be that research that does not conform to the feminist narrative will not receive funding. Political correctness in research is rarely spelled out … it is a silent given where researchers relying on government funding will instinctively know what is expected of them.

While this contemporary erosion of the scientific method relates to science as a whole, throughout the rest of this article we will concern ourselves with the rot as it applies to a compelling life-science paradigm—for ultimately feminism is a distillation of the failure of our life sciences to understand how life works and how men and women make choices.

When you think about it, this divergence from the true spirit of scientific inquiry makes sense. To explain how a phenomenon as comprehensively idiotic as feminism can be as successful as it has become, we need to understand that something is fundamentally broken in the mainstream life-science paradigm. A compelling paradigm would have deflected the absurd propositions of feminism long before it had an opportunity to metastasize. The mainstream life-science paradigm relates to genocentrism—the idea that genes "determine" behaviour.

The Genocentrism in Gynocentrism

Gender differences are quite real, one would think. They are tangible, they are in-in-your-face, and they matter. They need to be explained. Beyond the mainstream's simplistic presumption that "it's all in the genes, silly," there is no paradigm provided by the mainstream that explains either sex roles or gender roles. Similarly, more recent developments in epigenetics, group selection theory, evo-psych, and the like lay claim to factoring in the environment (e.g., phenotypic plasticity), but they add nothing to our understanding of how or why men and women make the choices they do. What proof do we have of this failure in science? Feminism. Nothing more need be said.

Presuming that "it's all in the genes" (whatever that means) does not explain anything at all. And while recent developments such as epigenetics, with reference to phenotypic plasticity, seem to suggest that genocentrism has become more sophisticated by factoring in pressures from environment, it hasn't. Its explanatory power remains about as compelling as "because God made it that way" or because "the Bible tells us so." The failures of genocentric science are many … for example:

1) Genocentric science does not explain hypergamy and what it is that motivates men to be providers and women to be provided for. A compelling life-science paradigm would.
2) Genocentric science does not explain gender roles, and provides no indication of the ways in which men's and women's sexual motivations differ. A compelling life-science paradigm would.

3) Genocentric science does not explain motivation of any kind, actually. We are simply expected to buy into the narrative of information science, and accept as given the idea of motivations as somehow instinctual, somehow analogous to subroutines in a computer program, running in a brain that is somehow analogous to computer hardware. Genocentric science does not explain how a living entity defines the things that matter. A compelling life-science paradigm would. And as such, it would explain hypergamy, materialism, and why women love accumulating stuff, why they love shopping for stuff, and why they choose men who provide them with stuff. By contrast, genocentric science can provide nothing of the sort.

4) Most importantly, genocentric science is not based on an axiomatic framework of any kind. It is simply a cobbling together of several disconnected ideas by force of the logic that the more we "know," the more gaps we fill, and it is simply a matter of time before all the gaps are filled. By contrast, a compelling life-science paradigm must implicitly be based on an axiomatic framework built from principles that are consistent across all species of living organisms.

5) Like a competent organization, a competent life-science paradigm requires a strategy and a mission statement that outlines a vision for understanding how life works. Our mainstream life sciences (based in genocentrism) provide no such mission statement (natural selection, for example, is not an axiom or principle but a mechanism). A compelling life-science paradigm will, and this will be its axiomatic framework.

6) The genocentrism in gynocentrism—Gynocentrism owes its success to genocentrism. Because the mainstream paradigm does not provide any compelling framework from which to interpret gender roles, an absurd gynocentrism has taken root. It wasn't until the recent narratives provided by MHRAs, MRAs, and MGTOWs that we even began to notice the absurdity of chivalrous providers pedestalizing entitled provided-fors. Factor in affirmative action to compensate the provided-fors for all those millennia of oppression by the providers, and you have one nut-job of stupidity the likes of which have never been replicated throughout human history … and it is growing, the latest addition to this lumbering, heaving miasma of stoopid being the Istanbul Convention. A compelling life-science paradigm would explain not only the absurdity but also the reality.

What do I mean by a compelling life-science paradigm? We can best illustrate this by looking at an example. The Newtonian paradigm of our physical sciences, with Isaac Newton's three laws of motion[4], provides us with a compelling science paradigm complete with a reliable axiomatic framework:

1) First law (momentum): When viewed in an inertial reference frame, an object either remains at rest or continues to move at a constant velocity, unless acted upon by an external force.
2) Second law ($F=ma$): The vector sum of the forces on an object are equal to the mass m of that object multiplied by the acceleration vector a of the object.

3) Third law: When one body exerts a force on a second body, the second body simultaneously exerts a force equal in magnitude and opposite in direction on the first body.

Is there something analogous for the life sciences? My opinion is that there is, in the semiotics of Charles Sanders Peirce synthesized with the biosemiotics of Thomas Sebeok and Jakob von Uexküll. Moreover, when you factor in recent developments in cognitive science (within the context of neural plasticity), these theoretical frameworks look especially promising. They compel us to ask new questions—for example, now we have to factor in the roll of the primary nurturer in wiring brains, given that 90% of a human brain's wiring is said to be accomplished within the first four years of life (Jill Stamm, Arizona State University).

Within these frameworks, we might see parallels with the Newtonian paradigm—say, motivation with opposite force (third law), association with vector sum (second law), and habituation with momentum (first law). Motivation, association, and habituation relate to the categories first defined by Peirce.

Of what possible relevance could all this have on a men's human rights movement? Why should we care, for example, about habits or associative learning or the source of motivation? Stu and Merrick get it, and they are not even scientists. Gender roles are habits. We become who and what we associate with.

While the importance of habituation (in the context of European history) was established as long ago as Plato, it is in David Hume's philosophy[5, 6] that Europeans might first identify the emergence of a systematic analysis of the nature of thought and the relationship between habituation and associative learning. Our semiotic frameworks formalize these sorts of ideas, and for the first time in the history of European philosophy and science, we have signposts suggesting how it might be that any living entity, male or female, animal or vegetable, defines the things that matter (pragmatism[7]). These topics are well beyond the purpose of this article, and those who are interested in exploring further will know how to use Google.

Conclusion

Any science or branch of science that is based neither on the scientific method nor on any kind of axiomatic framework is destined to fail. Contemporary mainstream science—where physics, math, biology, and engineering faculties are located within the same university grounds as women's studies faculties—can no longer be relied on to subscribe to the scientific method. Formal recognition of academic achievement in STEM disciplines has generally been in the awarding of titles, such as Doctor or Professor, while these days the same titles are awarded within women's studies faculties. A science where political correctness defines the limits of acceptable discourse is not science. Increasingly, it resembles propaganda. We judge people by the company they keep, and this should apply no less to organizations. We should judge contemporary science by the company that it keeps with women's studies faculties and other institutions of the Left. A revolution in science is long overdue.

Bibliography

[1] Merrick, B. R. On Feminism's Infantilization of Women. A Voice for Men, April 2014:
http://www.avoiceformen.com/gynocentrism/on-feminisms-infantilization-of-women/
(accessed August 17, 2014).

[2] Zimmer, Carl. A Sharp Rise in Retractions Prompts Calls for Reform. New York Times, April 16, 2012:
http://www.nytimes.com/2012/04/17/science/rise-in-scientific-journal-retractions-prompts-calls-for-reform.html?pagewanted=all
(accessed August 17, 2014).

[3] Binswanger, Mathias. Excellence by Nonsense: The Competition for Publications in Modern Science. Opening Science: The Evolving Guide on How the Internet is Changing Research, Collaboration and Scholarly Publishing, edited by Sönke Bartling and Sascha Friesike. Springer Link, 2014:
http://link.springer.com/chapter/10.1007/978-3-319-00026-8_3/fulltext.html
(accessed August 17, 2014).

[4] Newton's three laws of motion. April 22, 2014.
http://csep10.phys.utk.edu/astr161/lect/history/newton3laws.html
(accessed August 21, 2014).

[5] SparkNotes Editors. SparkNote on David Hume (1711–1776). SparkNotes LLC. 2005.
http://www.sparknotes.com/philosophy/hume/
(accessed August 17, 2014).

[6] Wikipedia. An Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding. April 22, 2014.
http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/An_Enquiry_Concerning_Human_Understanding
(accessed August 17, 2014).

[7] Wikipedia. Pragmatism. May 11, 2014. http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Pragmatism
(accessed August 17, 2014).

There is no such thing as a sperm donor. They take it all.

Paul Elam · 22 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Women, do not live with this idea that men have this chivalry thing still with them." ~ Whoopi Goldberg

In response to the new AVfM mission statement, I got a surprising (even for me) amount of hate mail. Most or all of it was assumedly from men. Some of the ire focused on the abolition of child support and alimony, but most of it was related to men's reproductive rights.

Here is one of the more dramatic ones.

> I am writing to let you know that you just lost another reader. In fact, I now consider myself DONE with the MRM.
>
> I could not believe my eyes when I saw in your new mission statement that you think a man should be able to walk away from his responsibilities as a father when he gets a woman pregnant.
>
> Is this what your new world looks like, men having all the sex they want and then turning their backs on the women who are carrying their children?
>
> This casts a shadow of shame on every man who supports your movement. I refuse to be one of them.

Readers may want to take a moment to grieve the loss of another from the ranks of the MRM. Personally, I took solace in a handful of M&Ms and I am doing well enough now to address this email, which is actually about a very important issue.

I will attempt to do so as directly as possible. First, the writer's question:

"Is this what your new world looks like, men having all the sex they want and then turning their backs on the women who are carrying their children?"

Yeah, that sums it up pretty nicely, actually. But I should add that I think men should be able to do so without a hint of guilt or social stigma.

Women have almost limitless options where it concerns reproduction. There are multiple, inexpensive forms of birth control. They can keep their legs closed. That option is very affordable, even if telling women life as a cum dumpster is risky, both for women and for the people who point out that the statement is true. There is abortion as a unilateral decision. There is even a post-conception abortion pill.

Women may also choose adoption, but that is a choice and a lot of paperwork they need not burden themselves with because they can just choose to unload their babies at hospitals, fire stations, and other convenient dumping sites. No questions asked.

None of these options, by the way, require any unwanted opinions or input from the father. Her body (including the baby). Her Choice. The full weight of the state and social approval stands behind that idea.

"Her responsibility" can and should be the final sound bite in that feminist mantra on reproductive freedom. But, of course, if responsibility were added to the equation, it would bring an end to some things feminists value very much. Money and power over the lives of men.

As things stand now, choice is the province of women. The responsibility for those choices fall on men who have no say about them.

Men (at least those they bother to inform) wait to be told if their child will be surgically terminated. If the child is allowed to live, the man will wait to be told how often he will have access to it, and how much it will cost him. He will also be pointedly informed of the price for not paying up.

He will also learn that when it comes to child support, there are no exemptions for illness, old age, or poverty. It is just like the mafia. Pay up or else.

This is what we call reproductive freedom for women. We have another name for it regarding men. It is called slavery.

I expect that about this time there is going be a certain kind of reader who will be furious, like the people who already emailed me. I expect a familiar chant.

“If men don’t want a child, they should keep their pants zipped!”

All I can do is suggest that these people apply the same advice to their mouths. Mind you, I mean that rhetorically. Anyone who wants to is welcome to come here and wax manly about how dudebros need to act as pack animals to have real worth. I am just saying that unless you are willing to tell women to quit expecting handouts and a cup of sympathy every time they get themselves knocked up by the nearest thug, you may just be proving your hypocrisy and your intellectual weakness.

The darkness in social force is strong. But there is a light coming, and it is called the end of chivalry.

Chivalry, clearly the most burdensome, punitive, and moronic social custom ever placed on a group of people, is slowly but surely being forced out of existence by the very group that has always benefited from it. It is not too surprising. History is full of foolish people, and the occasional revolutionaries who point out the errors of their ways.

The foolish part in this scenario is a society proving day by day that it cares less than nothing about the lives of men; indeed, that it views men and their problems with rancid contempt. Any student of social trends will tell you that the lack of compassion is invariably going to be reciprocated.

This particular case is long overdue. Men have the tendency to take care of fools and children, even when doing so is itself foolish.

Men also have a healthy ability to overcome their tendencies when the metal starts to meet the meat. Where it concerns sperm-gathering for dollars, that time has arrived.

And it will continue because it has to.

One of the things that I love about the pursuit of equality (as opposed to what feminists pawn off as the same) is that it means nobody owes you a fucking thing.

No one owes you a door opened for your convenience. No one owes you the right to look the other way and appreciate the walls of a restaurant when the check arrives. No one owes you a job or promotion because you have a vagina.

And no one owes you a lifetime of work and submission because you chose a path that did not include a bit of input from anyone but yourself.

Your body. Your choice, and your fucking baby. Now let’s hear some shit about how you don’t need a man. But you might want to consider the fact that a growing number of us have heard that one enough to start honoring it whenever possible.

Men so far can’t beat the laws on this, which of course have nothing at all to do with equality. But they can beat the mentality of those who think it is a man’s place in life to sit around and wait for a barfly or a welfare whore to determine their future—stop being so stupid.

This is the best place to start.

Consent to sex does not mean consent to parent. Ask any woman. She will tell you.

Let’s provide men with the same answer.

Patriarchy math

Paul Elam · 22 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In 2011 I had a heated debate in a hallway with one of the executives of the Political Science Society. She was a radical feminist and insisted that men have it so much easier than women, and I told her that between being called a slut and a rapist, I'll take slut because as far as defamation of character goes, I've never heard a man recover from the latter.

For this, and for insisting that 95% of rapes being male-perpetrated was not a real statistic, I was branded a misogynist and shunned at mixers. It did not help that this girl ran the Political Science Society like it was high school student council, emphasis on the HIGH school. I came across Karen Straughan's GirlWritesWhat YouTube channel and found her view on men's issues refreshing, but I have some issues with how feminism is addressed and for this reason I don't identify as an MRA.

Every conversation I've had about patriarchy theory and privilege has culminated in this, though: a counter-argument that I have dubbed "patriarchy math." In patriarchy math, we use the language of numbers and value signs to determine whether the tenants of patriarchy theory hold up when we reduce them to the most universally recognizable written language of mathematics. First, I'm going to list the values that non-radical feminist liberals and civil rights greats like Nelson Mandela would assign to the following variables:

Table 1: Mandela Assumptions of Human Equality

White=0, Heterosexual=0, Cisgender=0, Male=0

Non-White=0, Homosexual=0, Transgender=0, Female=0

Remember these for later; we will be altering these starting values to better model various feminist theories of patriarchy and privilege.

There are other variables such as disability and age, but they are special cases in criminal law and for reasons that go beyond the scope of this exercise. So, we assume that all actors in this equation are able-bodied adults to reduce complexities that arise from these other forms of vulnerability.

Now here's where I'm going to summarize the primary argument of patriarchy theory and privilege: some people are more susceptible to certain forms of mistreatment than others. Based on statistical evidence and social norms, we hold certain demographics to be more vulnerable to various forms of mistreatment and injustice, such as but not limited to rape, violence, civil injustice, and accessibility to employment.

In summary, the perceived statistical frequency (feelings) of who does what to whom is a significant factor in patriarchy theory and its framework. The idea that someone is more vulnerable than another is an important difference between patriarchy theory and non-radical feminist theories, as it forms the basis of privilege. Privilege, in this case, assigns a new value of 1 to attributes so deemed "privileged." And so the values assigned by patriarchy theory are as follows:

Table 2: Basic Patriarchy Theory Privilege Assumptions

White=1, Heterosexual=1, Cisgender=1, Male=1

Non-White=0, Homosexual=0, Transgender=0, Female=0

Here's where things get interesting—when we look at and examine the most highly contentious and debated concept in radical feminism: "rape culture." While I cannot speak to how it feels or the emotional turmoil that results from the crime of rape, I can certainly say without being insensitive to those who are victims of it that it is a traumatic experience.

So now we ask ourselves a very important question: Is the measure of trauma based in the act of rape itself or the attributes of its perpetrators and victims? Well, let's take a look.

Male rapes female. Or, using patriarchy math with all other things being equal, 1 rapes 0.

1>0.

There is domination, privilege, and systemic oppression at work.

Now, say we reverse the roles here: female rapes male, or 0 rapes 1.

0<1.

There is no domination or oppression at work because 1 is privileged. The net math is that the suffering of 1 is thus argued to be less severe than the suffering of 0 because … privilege.

In other words, even in cases where traditional roles are reversed, 1>0 and we can discount the suffering of a privileged victim. Every conversation I've had with people who claim the merits of patriarchy theory fails to really answer one question: What do we call it when a female rapes a male?

No matter how noble the intention, the answer is always some variant of either "Men cannot be raped. They are privileged" or "Yes, Conrad, of course a man being raped is serious, but it's more serious when a woman is raped because men are naturally physically stronger and thus able to defend themselves more. Besides, they're privileged, and with that privilege they are less likely to be victims in the first place so it's still more serious that men can freely rape women because of rape culture."

I'm just going to boil this down to the most simple and eloquent universal language of math: So no matter how severe the situation, 1>0 is more important than the situation itself. That is typically the justification of all types of role reversals.

Non-White discriminates against White, 1>0, remembering here that White=1, Non-White=0. Homosexual treats heterosexual badly, 1>0, remembering here that heterosexual=1 and homosexual=0.

Now also remember statistical frequency; that is, who is oppressing whom/privilege is why certain variables are assigned a 1 and others a 0. So we claim to do this in the spirit of promoting equality, but there is one problem: The > does not look like =, or, in long hand, "greater than" in math has not and never has been "equal."

So already the math does not add up, so to speak, but this is typically where patriarchy theory will get off the elevator, and that's where feminists want you to stop when you hear their theories of "privilege," but let's not get off on this floor. Let's take this elevator to the absolute and final top. Let's carry it all the way to the penthouse and see what happens.

Okay, so the "logic" follows that who is involved in an act is more significant than the act itself. In this case, who rapes whom matters more than the actual trauma that results from being raped because, arguably, male rape victims are "less vulnerable" and females are "more vulnerable." Sounds great, but I'm going to take this to a new level. And this is where everything falls apart and why I get the words "privilege" and "misogynist" yelled at me by the worst of the patriarchy theory crowd and "misinformed" and "you need to educate yourself" by those with the most noble of intentions.

Lesbian (female) rapes straight female.

Remember, females are a vulnerable demographic so 0=0.

However, also remember that heterosexuality is a privileged attribute, so basically:

Homosexual (0) + Female (0) = 0; and Heterosexual (1) + Female(0) = 1.

And remember how I said earlier: male raped by female, 1>0, and we dismiss his suffering as being less severe because of privilege. So what do we do, if logic is to be 100% consistent in patriarchy theory, in the case of a homosexual female (lesbian) and a heterosexual female? Well, no matter how vulnerable a straight female is to rape because of male privilege, you could never claim she'd be marginalized for her sexuality more than a lesbian. 1>0.

Logic would dictate that because a lesbian is the greater victim based on a history of oppression and persecution, we dismiss a straight female's rape as being not as serious because … privilege. BUT WAIT! FEMALES ARE VULNERABLE MINORITIES! Yes, but not as vulnerable as lesbians, who have to deal with marginalization on two counts. So, even though I know for a fact that most people who advocate for patriarchy theory would like you to think that 1>0 is not the end result of their logic because they don't want to look bad for "blaming the victim" in the end, isn't the net result of patriarchy theory that the greater victim is never to blame as seriously as the more privileged one?

That's the end result of the implications of privilege that no radical feminist has ever been able to explain to me. You put a straight female in a position where she is now the privileged one, and YOUR LOGIC has to be taken to its inevitable conclusion that a male being raped by a female is just as trivial as a straight female being raped by a lesbian.

So let's make it a non-White lesbian raping a White lesbian just to nail the point in HARDER:

Non-White (0) + Homosexual (0) + Female (0) < White (1) + Homosexual (0) + Female (0)

1>0.

The situation is not serious because the victim is more privileged than the victim. Now, if I were saying this to anyone, they would call it racist and rightfully so, but remember, I didn't say it that way. I'm a patriarchy theorist. I get to say, I'm not racist because the White lesbian is privileged, right?

So we've reached the third floor; next stop, penthouse!

The complexity of transgender issues makes everything that patriarchy theory stands for—the idea that some people are more marginalized than others—COMPLETELY FALL APART when we get to the penthouse of the patriarchy theory logic tower. A transwoman lesbian rapes a straight female, which would imply:

Transgender (0) + Homosexual (0) + Female (0) = 0. Cisgender (1) + Heterosexual (1) + Female (0) = 2. 2>0.

We dismiss the rape as being not as serious because the victim is privileged. But wait, there's an interesting little monkey wrench here because while the gender identity of the rapist is female, the sex of the rapist is arguably male. So what do we do here? Patriarchy theory depends on who is more oppressed to justify its entire schema based on privilege. If the sex is male, the tenants of rape culture come into direct conflict with patriarchy theory because, remember, males are physically stronger and thus are able to overpower females, and that is why they are more culpable and also … privilege of being perceived as male even if your gender identity is female.

Now we have a problem: Do we analyze this scenario based on a transgender's sex or gender identity? If the case in question is a transman, the same issue would also apply here so there's only ONE WAY and absolutely ONE WAY to make the structure of patriarchy theory and privilege work now in light of this complexity: subdivide the transgender group by sex and assign new values to each subgroup to make the math work.

Because of the physical strength biology factor, we have to ignore the person's gender identity and focus in on the sex, essentially cancelling out the non-privileged-ness of homosexual and female. The most elegant way to accomplish this is to increase the privilege assumption of the transgender female to 2, as the trans-exclusive radical feminists (TERFs) are wont to do.

My, my, my, patriarchy theory is getting more and more progressive by the minute.

Adjusting our original assumptions from Tables 1 and 2 above to reflect the problems caused by intersectionality, we get:

Table 3: Radical Feminist Privilege Assumptions (TERF Version)

White=1, Heterosexual=1, Cisgender=1, Male=1

Non-White=0, Homosexual=0, Transman=0, Transwoman=2, Female=0

Thus resulting in the case where, all other factors being equal, transwoman (2) rapes cisgender (1) + female (0). 2>1.

WE HAVE A LEGITIMATE INCIDENT OF RAPE. DING! DING! DING! And all at the mere expense of throwing transgender rights under the bus to make our little exercise work! Score one for patriarchy theory!

But wait, the gender identity of a transwoman is still female, so wouldn't that make this a case of a transwoman raping a male be equivalent to someone who is not privileged raping someone who is privileged?

Transwoman (2) = Cisgender (1) + Male (1). 2=2.

Yikes! Suddenly transwomen become equivalent in privilege to males—no wonder some radical feminists reject the company of transwomen. Well, that's easy enough to fix. We just tip the scales once again and assign a value of 2 to males!

Table 4: Radical Feminist Privilege Assumptions (Less TERF Version)

White=1, Heterosexual=1, Cisgender=1, Male=2

Non-White=0, Homosexual=0, Transgender Male=0, Transgender Female=2, Female=0

There, now the logic of Table 4 is completely consistent and everyone has their proper place in a theory based on calling certain incidents of rape and assault more serious than others because we no longer have the "problem" of 2=2 under the Table 3 assumptions when a cisgender male is clearly more privileged than a transwoman.

Now, under Table 4: Cisgender (1) + Male (2) = 3 Transwoman (2) + Female (0) = 2 3>2.

It's not as serious a rape because the victim is privileged. Fixed.

So now let's go back to what I said, this > does not look like this =. In what sick and twisted universe do I get called the privileged male who is insensitive to the trauma of rape victims when an entire theory based upon seeking ways to make incidents of "privileged people" being less serious or non-existent is being blatantly insensitive to the traumas of one particular set of variables?

Because when we look at issues such as theft, a much lighter subject than rape, we see the same logic would apply. Non-White man steals from White man. The victim is privileged, so it's less serious. White man steals from non-White man. The victim is not privileged, so the situation is more serious. 1>0.

No matter how you rearrange the variables, the concept of privilege makes patriarchy theory a giant hot mess once you go past the first floor of its tower. Take the elevator to the penthouse and you see that patriarchy theory is a complete and utter failure of a theory—a joke on itself and trying to explain things through the lens of privilege.

But let's go back to the reasoning that the greats of the world use: the Gandhis, the Martin Luther Kings, the Mandelas (you know, the guy who divorced his wife for preaching hatred towards those "privileged" white folks in South Africa?):

Table 1: Mandela Assumptions of Human Equality

White=0, Heterosexual=0, Cisgender=0, Male=0

Non-White=0, Homosexual=0, Transgender=0, Female=0

So now those annoying 1s and 2s that were messing with everyone's head and the dilemma of figuring out where transgender people fall into the schema of things completely disappear because in liberal equality, the statistics, physical attributes, and physical strength of the victim DO NOT MATTER. Because no matter what scenario and what atrocity I throw at you: 0=0. The situation is serious and needs to be addressed.

WOW, AMAZING, who knew that REAL equality ignoring privilege and its attempts to convince you that > looks like = would end up being more effective in promoting equality?

Patriarchy theory has about as much to do with equality as plastic has to do with woodworking. Plastic is not wood because you tell me it is, and in the same way patriarchy theory is not equality.

The math just doesn't add up, and at the end of the day: Radical feminism<<<liberalism, and it never will equal it EVER.

Prince Charmless and the DV double standard

Hopeland Cash · 22 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

An artist going by Saint Hoax has been in the news regarding several series of anti-abuse posters he's produced themed around animated Disney characters. The first two were about the Disney princesses, but now, responding to online feedback, Saint Hoax has produced a poster series about abused men.

You can read about it here at Huffington Post. The poster series is meant to highlight the plight of victims of domestic violence by graphically portraying Disney "heroes" after having been beaten by their respective "princesses." The goal, Saint Hoax says, is to encourage men not to be embarrassed to ask for help when they are abused.

Now, the HuffPo article itself is a mess, reporting on the posters with obvious reluctance and bending over backwards to cite every misrepresented, ill-conceived, and debunked pseudo-statistic on DV ever printed, with the usual goal of insisting that women are the majority of victims.

The posters, however, seek to draw attention to abused men. I salute Saint Hoax for this, but I also must cry foul. His heart is in the right place, but even these posters fall far short of what needs to be said about abused men. They also carry the telltale signs of (I'll be polite and assume unconscious) gynocentrism and Patriarchy Theory.

It's not the images themselves I take exception to. Heroes and princesses alike are portrayed bloodied and bruised. The problem is the words, and the problem runs deep. Each of the two DV poster series has three main pieces of text: a title, question, and answer. Saint Hoax's unfortunate bias becomes apparent when we compare the two sets of posters.

The Title

First was the series of posters portraying abused Disney princesses titled "Happy Never After," a common spin on an old fairy-tale stock phrase. For the abused heroes, the title is "Prince Charmless."

Right off the bat we can see that there is something skewed in Saint Hoax's thinking. The title "Prince Charmless" is blatant victim-blaming of the worst kind. The princesses' title of "Happy Never After" implies a betrayal, an uncovering of the patriarchal lie of a Happy Ever After ending; the truth is, she will be beaten by her hero.

For the hero, though, if he is beaten, he is "charmless." This implies there is something wrong with him and leads nicely into the old rationalization of "Well, if I'd tried harder …" The title does nothing to suggest that anyone but the prince himself is at fault, leaving him as a target of the ridicule the posters claim to be combating.

The Question

Each poster series has a question posed to the abuse victim printed along the bottom. The princesses are asked, "When did he stop treating you like a princess?" and the heroes similarly, "When did she stop treating you like a hero?"

From the first moment I saw these posters, the use of the word hero rubbed me the wrong way, and this is why. Both posters pose the question "When did she/he stop treating you with respect?" For women, respect comes from being a princess. For men, it comes from being a hero.

This is performance culture. Being a princess is something innate, something you are born or marry into. The most effort it takes is getting to the ball on time so you can marry the prince. Bam, respect and love. For men, though, being a prince isn't enough. No, you have to be a hero, you have to risk your life to defeat the sea witch, the god of death, the evil wizard, or whatever. Then you have earned love.

Women are valued for what they are. Men are valued for what they do. This princess–hero dichotomy leads people to condemn abusive men for beating an "innocent princess" but plants the seed of doubt toward abused men: "Maybe he wasn't living up to his role as a hero?" becomes "He must've done something to deserve it." Because if he'd just acted like a hero, she wouldn't have beaten him. Princesses are princesses, though, no matter how they act, so abusing them is never acceptable.

The Answer
Finally, beneath the question each poster series has an answer. Princesses are told: "It's never too late to put an end to it." Heroes are told: "Don't be ashamed to ask for help."

Both answers call for agency on the part of the abused but come from two very different directions. Princesses are assured it is never too late to end an abusive relationship. This helps instill hope and encourages the abused to take control of their lives by getting out of a dangerous relationship.

Heroes are also given a message of hope but only against their own inadequacy. By simply telling abused men not to be ashamed, the posters fail to address any of the reasons they are ashamed or the profound lack of support awaiting a man brave enough to speak up. It leaves these men in their isolated cell of hopelessness, effectively telling them their imprisonment is their own fault.

Princesses are told they can just walk away. Heroes are told they need to man up and ask for help. By telling them not to be ashamed, you remind them that it is shameful. The message also carries the veiled implication that there is help if men would only ask for it, which is frankly false. Heroes aren't even granted the agency to "put an end to it" like princesses; all they can do is "ask for help."

Target those who shame, not those who feel the shame.

Conclusion
Saint Hoax's anti-DV poster series is a refreshing change from the usual propaganda, but it falls short of the mark. The Huffington Post's adherence to feminist DV doctrine mirrors the artist's inability to come to grips with the reality of domestic violence and how it affects men.

Saint Hoax could have easily changed the text for the second poster series only to alter the gender. Men could have been asked, "When did she stop treating you like a prince?" and then assured that "It's never too late to put an end to it." Instead, they are blamed and reminded of the shame imposed upon them. Good for them if they get help, we say, but they'll have to do it themselves. This kind of work takes us from the stance of "men don't matter" to "men matter, but not as much as women."

I wouldn't have settled for "women can do almost as much as men." I wouldn't have settled for "Blacks deserve almost equal rights." I won't settle for being told I am almost worthy of human compassion, and then only if I earn it.

A look at the future – George Freeman

AVfM Video Source · 22 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A new MRA/MGTOW vlogger has appeared:

http://youtu.be/k_JW6Y1vY9Y

We have seen the future, and it looks very good to us!

Counter-culture, anyone?

By the way, you may want to subscribe to George Freeman.

Terrence Popp tribute to Robin Williams

AVfM Video Source · 22 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There is a disclaimer at the start of this video regarding the claim that Robin Williams was suffering from Parkinson's Disease. It should be pointed out that so far as is known at the time of this post, that is just a claim made by his wife. There is no diagnosis or autopsy report available to the public that supports a Parkinson's diagnosis. PE

Sub to Terrence Popp here.

All that needs to be said about War Machine and The Young Turks

Dean Esmay · 23 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

So it's happened again: Some violent psychotic does something violent and psychotic, and Men's Rights Activists are supposedly to blame. Because potato.

This time it's a crazed violent psychotic with some fame in the competitive Mixed Martial Arts community, who spent time in prison some years ago for horrifically violent acts, and while in prison wrote some crap on a blog, some of which sounded vaguely like some of the things Men's Rights Activists say. The same guy recently was charged with another violent and inexcusable assault, and he is now being held up as a Men's Rights Activist, even though he never self-identified as one that we're aware of, and most in our community had never heard of him before someone brought him to our attention.

But let's play a little game here: Who said this?

> The conservatives are just taking the average man for a sucker, exploiting his resentment of Big Government to promote the power of Big Business.

1. Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren
2. Sam Seder of Majority Report
3. Cenk Uygur of The Young Turks
4. A murdering terrorist

Also, who said this?

> Leftists tend to hate anything that has an image of being strong, good and successful.

1. Libertarian icon Ayn Rand
2. Intellectual conservative pundit George Will
3. Conservative firebrand Ann Coulter
4. A murdering terrorist

If you guessed "4" in both cases you would not only be correct, you'd be talking about the same murdering terrorist. In fact, he's still alive and in U.S. Federal prison right now. I'll leave it as an exercise for the reader to figure out which proud murdering terrorist said both those things, but if you give up I'll relent and tell you.

The Young Turks recently said so many stupid things in the space of a few minutes about a violent psychotic nutjob that they tried to tie to us, we weren't even going to respond, but Doctor Randomercam wound up doing such a good job, we decided to share:

With that, we can only add a few more things: C'mon, Cenk and Ana, you can do better than this. We know the industry you're in is shallow, but holy cow, you can't actually talk to any Men's Rights Activists before smearing us with a scumbag like Jonathan Koppenhaver? Hey, we notice Elliot Rodger was a fan of The Young Turks–his YouTube channel shows he followed you, after all. So let's play the "Who said this?" game again. Who said this?

> To be angry about the injustices one faces is a sign of strength. It is a sign that one has the will to fight back against those injustices, rather than bowing down and accepting it as fate.

1. Elliot Rodger
2. Cenk Uygur

You've said a lot of things about fighting injustice, Cenk, both in the United States and abroad. So you might want to double-check to be sure. Think twice before answering. Without looking, are you sure of your answer?

Are you really sure?

Men’s Rights Edmonton help needed: big plans for Walk A Mile!

Men's Rights Edmonton · 24 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Want to have some fun and raise awareness of domestic violence issues? What better way than to participate with Men’s Rights Edmonton in Walk A Mile In Her Shoes on September 23!

Watch this space for more info or to contact or join MR-E!

It's about time: Family law attorney sentenced to two years

Michael Conzachi · 24 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Although this story is a few months old, it has largely escaped the mainstream news media outside of the San Francisco–Oakland Bay area. Since it was part of a larger corruption scandal, this attorney's part in it was a side note.

I want to get this out there for the benefit of some of the victims of family court tyranny and terrorism, since the mainstream press has not covered this extensively, outside of a few articles in the Bay area:

"Dirty DUI" attorney gets two years in prison for her role in scandal

Divorce lawyer gets 2 years in tax evasion, eavesdropping

Former family law attorney and now U.S. Federal inmate Mary Alice Nolan accepted a plea deal back in February for her role in a "Dirty DUI" scandal that also involved a dirty private investigator and ex–Antioch Police Department cop by the name of Christopher Butler of "Butler & Associates," who was also developing a reality TV show depicting female private eyes.

Butler was sentenced to eight years for his role in the "Dirty DUI" scam as well as a host of other crimes that took down four dirty cops in the Bay area and is allegedly now cooperating in the prosecution of the others involved.

Former family law attorney Nolan represented women in high-conflict divorce cases in the Oakland–San Francisco Bay area and was known as a ferocious attorney. Some comments on Yelp revealed that Nolan caused the high conflict. According to news reports and court testimony, Nolan paid Butler to install listening devices into the cars of men who were involved in divorce cases with female clients whom Nolan represented. The purpose as described by Butler in interviews with law enforcement and prosecutors was to obtain incriminating evidence against the men that Nolan could use against them in subsequent family law proceedings, such as child custody, support, and alimony proceedings for her female clients.

Butler has already admitted to installing these devices in 75 to 100 cars, but it was not clear just how many he did for Nolan.

To further gain an advantage for her female clients, Nolan then instructed Butler to "set up" some of these men for "Dirty DUIs." Butler, the aspiring reality TV producer, then had attractive young women, whom he paid $25 per hour for a four-hour minimum, meet up with some of the estranged husbands in local bars for drinks. At least one man had met one of the women on Match.com.

Butler watched and filmed the couple as the paid female associates of Butler began making suggestive comments and acted in a very provocative manner while consuming large amounts of alcohol. One of the women in one of the recordings stated, "I haven't had sex for so long."

When the women suggested to their male dates to go "hot-tubbing," that was Butler's cue to begin the next step, which was to watch the men get in their cars, then call in and report a "drunk driver" to local cops, who were also in on the deal.

Shortly thereafter, the sobriety-challenged men were stopped by a black and white police car, which ultimately resulted in their arrest for DUI. At least one man's blood alcohol level was .12, and others were around the basic limit of .08 but were good enough to legitimize the arrest.

Within two to three months, Nolan was back in court, using the DUI arrests of these men in child custody proceedings, claiming they were unsafe, or to get increases in alimony and child support.

Gee, a dirty, greedy, lying, corrupt family law attorney; a corrupt, lying, greedy private investigator and ex-cop; and dirty cops: where have we heard that before?

Corrupt former lawyer Nolan, as part of her plea deal for the tax evasion conviction, had to pay nearly 500K in back taxes, plus a large fine, which forced her to sell her luxury home in the Oakland area. Nolan claimed for several years that her yearly income had been between 20K to 50K when it was actually in excess of $1 million per year. A slight accounting error.

Thankfully, the men who were caught up in Nolan and Butler's abhorrent criminal behavior had their DUI convictions expunged, and Nolan is facing at least two and possibly as many as six civil suits by these male victims.

Nolan and Butler were part of a larger corruption scandal that included several police officers from a Contra Costa County drug task force and that involved theft of drugs, weapons, property, and prostitution. A couple of disgruntled employees of Butler allegedly "blew the whistle."

• Norman Wielsch, 49, a former Antioch police officer, former head of a Contra Costa drug task force, and friend of Christopher Butler, is currently free on $400,000 bail on conspiracy and drug-dealing charges.

• Stephen Tanabe, 47, a former Antioch police officer, former Danville police officer, and Alamo resident, is free on bail for drug and weapon charges.

• Louis Lombardi, 38, a San Ramon Police officer, charged with five felony counts in connection with the case, is also free on bail.

• Don Lawson, a now-retired Concord police officer and a former identity theft consultant for Butler, is currently a Clayton-based identity theft consultant.

One would think that the antics of Nolan would have been extensively reported and vilified by the legal community, but you would be wrong.

Here is a link to the American Bar Association article in their publication, the ABAJournal. The federal indictment can be found there as well as an additional article:

Lawyer accused of bugging cars, evading taxes is set to enter guilty plea

Private Detective Accused of Setting Up Divorcing Men for DUIs with Help of Alluring Women

This is all the ABA had to say:

> A California lawyer accused of evading taxes and hiring a private investigator to bug the cars of clients' spouses is expected to enter a guilty plea later this month.
>
> Divorce lawyer Mary Nolan, 61, of Oakland is expected to enter the plea on Sept. 27, though details are unknown, report the San Francisco Chronicle and the Contra Costa Times.
>
> Nolan was accused in an indictment last year of tax evasion and paying private investigator Christopher Butler to plant listening devices in cars of her clients' spouses and significant others. She intended to use the recordings to assist her clients' legal proceedings, according to the indictment.
>
> Butler testified in a separate case last month that Nolan hired him to stage the DUI arrest of Declan Woods, one of two plaintiffs who claim in civil suits that the lawyer worked with Butler to "dirty" them up before divorce litigation, the Chronicle says. The suits say Butler hired alluring women to drink with the men at bars. The women then asked the men to follow them in their cars, at which point Butler would call police to report drunken driving.

The California State Bar was worse in their publication of Nolan's activities, and only lists her state bar status as "not entitled to practice."

As of December 24, 2013, this is all the California State Bar had to say on their website, with additional links to the disciplinary proceedings documents:

> MARY ALICE NOLAN [#108907], 61, of Oakland was placed on interim suspension Dec. 24, 2013, following a felony conviction for tax evasion and unlawful interception of communications. She was ordered to comply with rule 9.20 of the California Rules of Court.

Rule 9.20 of the California Rules of the Court essentially means that Nolan must make notifications to clients of her conviction within a specific time frame.

Here's the link:

Rule 9.20. Duties of disbarred, resigned, or suspended attorneys

From the CA State Bar website, you can link to her disciplinary order by the State Bar Court:

In the Matter of Mary Alice Nolan, A Member of the State Bar, No. 108907

Respondent Mary Alice Nolan has been convicted of violating title 18 United States Code section 2511 (1)(a) (interception of communications), a felony that does not inherently involve moral turpitude but may involve moral turpitude or other misconduct warranting discipline based on the facts and circumstances surrounding the conviction, and title 26 United States Code section 7201 (tax evasion), a felony that provides probably cause to believe it involved moral turpitude based on the record of conviction.

Here's the disturbing part. The State Bar Court states that her felony conviction does not inherently involve moral turpitude but may involve moral turpitude or other misconduct warranting discipline. Basically, it's legal-speak mumbo-jumbo bullshit.

WTF?

Bugging divorcing males' cars, setting them up for dirty DUIs, screwing them over in the family court, costing them tens of thousands of dollars and the separation from their kids, destroying their reputations, fraud, and falsifying court documents DOES NOT inherently involve moral turpitude??

And the California State Bar and the State Bar Court only list her license status as NOT ELIGIBLE TO PRACTICE LAW, basically a suspension for doing time in the federal slammer?

Is there anyone out there who is not completely convinced as I am that the legal system in the State of California and the rest of the country is completely incapable of policing their own?

Nolan was looking at 15 years but received 24 months, of which the prosecutor asked for a sentence of 37 months, of which she'll probably only do a year at Club Fed in Dublin, whittling her time away between yoga sessions and tennis matches.

This corrupt lawyer should do the full 15 years and have her license to practice law pulled, not suspended. She should be making little rocks out of big ones while chained to the inmate next to her, under the watchful eye of a guard sporting a 30.06.

Here is a link to the Bay Area Divorce Lawyer Blog and an article written by family law attorney Lorna Jaynes:

Ethically challenged client and California divorce attorney trick ex-husband into drunk-driving after setting him up with hot-tub blonde on Match.com

Bay area family law attorney Lorna Jaynes apparently at one time represented a client and her opposing counsel was Mary Nolan. Jaynes bowed out of the case when she realized who she was up against. In Jaynes's post on this blog, she commented on the Nolan case and titled her article, "Ethically challenged client and California divorce attorney trick ex-husband into drunk-driving after setting him up with hot-tub blonde on Match.com."

So I guess a guy involved in a nasty divorce going out for a few drinks with a hot blonde who was leading him on is deemed "ethically challenged" by Ms. Jaynes. The guy probably wasn't in the right frame of mind and should have realized that he shouldn't get behind the wheel, but Jaynes doesn't seem to think Mary Nolan, who was involved in a criminal conspiracy, obstruction of justice, falsifying official court records, accessory to emotional child abuse, fraud and fraud upon the court, wiretapping, and income tax evasion is "ethically challenged."

WTF???

This is the mindset of a large segment of family law attorneys in California and everywhere else. Convictions for multiple federal felonies are considered to be, or may not be, an inherent violation of moral turpitude, not worthy of commendation by professional legal associations and oversight bodies, and not worthy of disbarment.

What do these corrupt lawyers have to do in order to get disbarred: commit a murder on video and then confess to it?

Here is a link to the Federal Bureau of Prisons inmate locator, which shows that Nolan is serving her time at the Dublin California Federal Correction Institute, where she is scheduled to be released in December 2015. FCI Dublin is a minimum security prison for females.

Federal Bureau of Prisons Inmate Lookup

Using this search tool will find:

MARY A NOLAN
Register Number: 17613-111
Age: 62
Race: White
Sex: Female
Located at: Dublin FCI

Release Date: 12/01/2015

This is the address, phone, and email for FCI Dublin, and if you are as outraged as I am, then please feel free to exercise your First Amendment rights by politely voicing your displeasure with the warden with the slap-on-the-wrist sentence given to Nolan and oppose any early release. It would be nice to see her serve every second of her sentence.

FCI Dublin
5701 8th Street, Camp Parks
Dublin, CA 94568
Email: DUB/ExecAssistant@bop.gov
Phone: (925) 833-7500
Fax: (925) 833-7599

It's plain to see the vast amount of damage that just this one corrupt family law attorney has caused, yet the legal system does not seem to share the same level of disgust that the trail of victims she left in her wake and others do.

Let's hope that the plaintiffs suing Nolan will prevail, and let's hope that she never practices law again, ever.

Here's your chance, readers. Let the FCI Dublin warden hear your voice.

And Mary Alice Nolan, may you rot in hell.

10-year-old raped Afghan girl: An expose on the international corruption of feminism

Ali Mehraspand · 24 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There is a huge amount of evidence about deep-level corruption within international feminism, which will be discussed in a future article. But we cannot afford to leave it entirely until then, as a recent case among countless ones of this type prompts bringing the matter into the light.

There are many women's groups included in foreign budgets in the Middle East whose one and only task is to fabricate outright lies and horror stories for the international media. They watch as 98% of those executed in Iran are men and take sadistic pleasure in it; then if a woman gets a death sentence, women's groups start feeding lies to their western employers and allies. All of a sudden, a death sentence for a murderess becomes "she is being executed for being raped" or something like that.

Several cases of such behavior will be discussed in an upcoming article. Here, however, considering my recent article on Afghanistan, it is apropos to look at a recent case.

A mullah in Kunduz, Afghanistan, raped a 10-year-old girl. Yadegar Afghanistan, Bayan Shomal, Tolo News, Afghanistan Shafaqna, Afghanistan Today, Shayan Afghanistan, and all other Afghan newspapers and media that had interviewed the police, the family, and authorities reported the same thing:

The mullah had migrated to Kunduz for less than three months; the family sent their child to him as an instructor, he raped her, so the family took the girl to the hospital, where the rape was officially confirmed. The mullah is arrested, the family is outraged and are asking that the mullah get the death sentence by gallows in public. The women's minister has said that the man should be executed in public, and finally that another girl was also raped a week prior to this, in retaliation of which the family of the girl did not wait for legal punishment, so they cut off the mullah's nose and ears.

In fact, you cannot find a single news outlet in Farsi that says anything else.

Then all of a sudden The New York Times runs a story, and here is a synopsis of their version:

A 10-year-old girl is raped by a mullah in Kunduz, Afghanistan. The family wants to perform an honor killing against the girl. The girl has been taken to a shelter run by Dr. Hassina Sarwari, the head of Women for Afghan Women. People think it is an American-run organization, but it is not. The family has threatened Dr. Hassina Sarwari. She feels there are enough death threats against her that she has been on occasion driven to hiding. The police have given the girl to the family, who openly wants to kill her and bury the shame.

Wow. Shall we compare the stories? (And, by the way, The New York Times piece is followed now by others.)

> The authorities said her family members openly planned to carry out an "honor killing" in the case.

No authority has ever said that. The chief of police, for instance, was interviewed by Bayan Shomal and never said such a thing. In fact, the only source in Farsi with that claim is a translation of The New York Times article on feminist websites, of course. As we'll proceed, you'll find that the only source The New York Times ever gives for their claims is from Women for Afghan Women.

This organization, which only has an English website, claims they have had the girl in their shelter. Other sources, however, say that the girl has been with her family all the time. Now they add this:

> Most of the anger in Kunduz has been focused not on the mullah but on the women's activists and the shelter, which is one of seven operated across Afghanistan by Women for Afghan Women, an Afghan-run charity that is heavily dependent on American aid, from both government and private donors.

> "People know this office as the Americans' office," Dr. Sarwari said. "They all think the shelter is an American shelter. There isn't a single American here," she said.
>
> "W.A.W. is not American-run," said Manizha Naderi, its executive director. "Every single staff member is an Afghan. They are from the communities we work in. Our only concern is to make sure women and girls are protected and that they get justice."

That should sound very fishy if you have the skills for reading between the lines.

> Ms. Geyah said she showed photos of the girl to government officials and prosecutors to prove that she was much too young to have consented. Dr. Sarwari said, "We wanted to give her a face, to make her real to them."

What the fuck are they talking about? Only hours after the incident, right there in the hospital, rape was verified and the police confirmed the story according to ALL sources. They are making it look like as if it needs explaining because patriarchy, while in reality, if a girl says rape, everybody believes her. Really? That is the patriarchy? Authorities of the Women's Ministry, Mojgan Safavi and Nadereh Giah, have stated regarding this case that rapists should be executed. So says the family of the girl.

> Such honor killings in rape cases are common in Afghanistan, and are often more important to the victim's family than vengeance against the attacker.

This claim is a manufactured bullcrap, which every time you hear it, you should know it is a red flag for huge propaganda at work. They have started with theories, and now they need lies to verify themselves. If anything, on many occasions, families brutally kill the rapist.

I wonder if people who buy into this sort of bullshit even know that all this happened more than two months ago, the girl has been with her family ever since, and, surprise, she is alive. The mullah who is in prison since then is awaiting his punishment, most probably a death sentence.

I encourage you to read The New York Times piece in its entirety and pay attention to the fact that all of the stories there come from one person: a Dr. Sarwari, the head of Women for Afghan Women, who is desperate for money, as the article depicts very well. I dare you to find anything there that has come from another person. Pay careful attention also to damseling skills in that piece and how women's advocates are supposedly victims in a country where their women's minister can push any form of crap.

She also claims she has received phone threats from the family of the girl. Dr. Fucking Sarwari, does the family of the girl know that you have insulted them with these accusations? Why do you want to victimize their traumatized child by lies? You are not better than the rapist, I should say. Or was the story only for the English media and American money?

Just go read the piece and then compare it with the following translation of the same story from Bayan Shomal:

Kunduz: Amin-Allah, a mosque's mullah imam in Kubhi of the city Kunduz, has raped his 10-year-old female student yesterday (May 2).

This child, who is in Shahid Doctor Azizollah Safar hospital, says, The mullah imam of the mosque in which she studied took her to a garden by force and raped her.

The chief of police of Kunduz, Samunaval Veis-e-ddin Talash, confirmed the story and said to Bayan Shomal: It has been almost three months that Aminollah has come here as a mullah imam.

He added: "Mullah Aminollah taught religious-sciences and Quran to children and now is arrested and remains in police's custody."

Meanwhile, Doctor Abdol-Ghodus Miakhil, the head of the hospital, reports that the girl's health is in good condition.

Parents of the child, while seeking punishment for Aminollah, say they had sent their daughter to the mosque to learn.

Similarly, several days ago in Central Welsevally of Boghlan, a mullah imam's aunt and her husband cut off the nose and ears of the mullah for raping their daughter.

On generalizations about women (and men)

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 24 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've been wondering for years now how I've been able to make some pretty sweeping generalizations about women (and men) in my videos—even going so far as to outline why I believe some stereotypically negative "female" behaviors are actually innate to women's biology—without receiving the kind of negative response from non-feminist women that many men receive when making similar comments.

I've also long wondered why, as a woman, I don't take generalizations about women personally, which is what I think is going on most of the time when people rant about misogyny whenever a man says anything remotely critical of women as a class, or even a single woman if the criticism resembles a common stereotype.

I'm starting to think that part of my imperviousness to defensiveness when some MRAs say things like "Women are like this" or "Women do that" comes from me not identifying as a woman in the same way that other women seem to.

Yes, I am a woman, but I don't tend to think of myself in those terms. In fact, when I talk about women, I usually say "they" and "them," not "we" and "us." I do not feel like there is a collective identity to which I belong based on some abstract, shared vagina. I do not believe that I, as many feminists will contend, understand more about what it is like for a woman in, say, the Congo than her son or brother or husband does simply because my genitals are an "innie" like hers.

I am a woman, but I am not Woman. I base my self-identity on my actions, not on the actions of other women, or most women, or even all women, and when someone gives an opinion of women, or most women, or even all women, even if that opinion is blistering, and even if I recognize a little of myself in there, I don't take it as a personal attack.

In fact, if I do recognize myself in someone's scathing opinion of women in general, that's when I sit up and listen. If it makes me feel uncomfortable, then that is my problem and my discomfort and does not invalidate the accuracy of what was said. It definitely does not mean that that opinion should be silenced. In fact, it means the opposite. It means that it is a part of myself that I need to examine, and in order to examine it I have to talk about it and hear what others have to say about it.

One of my favorite MRAs once said, "Generalities exist. A bigot thinks there are no exceptions. An idiot thinks everyone is an exception. I am neither."

I can't state this clearly enough: It is impossible to talk about gender issues, or society, or culture, or biology without using generalities. That sometimes means saying "Women are like this" and "Men are like that" because it is the only possible way to discuss and examine problems that are systemic and rooted in the different ways men and women think, feel, and behave and the way men and women are perceived in society. This simply cannot be done on a case-by-case basis.

I've been trending away from the loaded, hostile, blame-laden language of the gender debate recently because not only are terms like privilege and oppression accusatory, but they're also kindergarten-level simplistic. That's true no matter which direction they're applied in. I would much rather explore the actual problem all the way to its roots (even if that's essentialist of me) than assign blame to one side or the other.

At the same time, as women we are simply going to have to understand that other women (and men) have made a mess of the relationship between men and women. The mess has marginalized men in such a way that amends will be difficult, if not impossible, to make, and some men simply will not be able to trust women anymore for a variety of reasons: some of which are institutional and systemic (family court, domestic violence policy), and some of which involve the behavior of women themselves (no woman is forced to take advantage of the ways systems and institutions favor her over men, yet many do).

You encounter a man who makes it clear he does not trust women? Get over it. This is not about you in that way. He does not have to trust women. He doesn't even have to like women. He doesn't have to spare your feelings. He doesn't have to be genteel. He doesn't have to not swear. He's allowed to be angry. And he's allowed to have doubts about how ultimately helpful women in general will be to the Men's Rights Movement, about women's motives, and to worry about the changes women in this movement will almost certainly begin to demand, the way they do pretty much everywhere they go.

After all, feminists have been claiming to speak for all women since the mid-1800s, and the majority of women have allowed them to. Female protests over women's suffrage involved objections to the potential assigning of male responsibility onto women—once it was clear that there would be no such imposition of responsibility, the majority of women went along with women's fight for equal rights. Nary a woman spoke up about the absurdly unequal distribution of marital property brought about by early feminists in the 1800s and early 1900s—not until the inability to acquire loans and mortgages in their own names convinced them that the grossly unbalanced distribution of female entitlement and male responsibility was more harm to women than benefit.

The few fair-minded women who spoke out on principle against the injustice of those laws were drowned out by the majority of women who knew a good deal when they saw it—the majority who rationalized that something for nothing is always a good thing, and besides, I would never take advantage of those laws. I'm not like that. If I were allowed to victimize someone and then have my victim put in jail for it, I wouldn't do it, so what's the harm?

This is the MRM, ladies. And even if you're going to carve out a women's space within it (like the Honey Badger Brigade), it's a woman's room in a man's house. If you want to be a part of this movement, a thick skin is required, as is the ability not to take every single slight against the general Woman as a slight against you. And crying, "You're injuring me!" or "You're threatening me!" is nothing more than a manipulative silencing tactic that is simply not going to work with a man who has rejected women's power to control his behavior. And whether or not you recognize Not All Feminists Are Like That (NAFALT) as standard female "fainting flower" behavior, that's what it is. Everyone knows that not all women are like that because not all anyone is like anything. Invoking NAFALT is declaring your besmirched honor "as a woman," and no one here is going to be interested in picking up a lance and defending it. While AFALT is a false paradigm, NAFALT is nothing but a deflection.

Are you like that? If you are, try to do better. If you aren't, no one was talking about you anyway.

And one more thing: A generalization is not a personal attack. This is a personal attack: my very own GirlHatesWhat tumblr fan. And I've wasted about 1/100th as much energy thinking about it as countless women (and white knight men) have spent worrying about some intemperate comments about women found within various men's movement circles, including not just MRAs but also some MGTOW and PUA spaces.

My advice if you're offended by someone who's using harsh tones to make a point? Abandon the collective vagina, if you can manage it. Stop thinking of yourselves first as Woman. If you're going to be at all effective in the men's movement, you need to identify primarily by your actions, thoughts, and intentions, not your gender. Transcend it or you'll spend all your time feeling attacked, even when you're not being attacked.

Note: This article is a modified/updated version of something I wrote on a mostly dead subreddit a couple of years ago. I think it's as relevant if not more relevant than ever as we see an increase in mainstream media coverage of the Men's Rights Movement and so much hysterical hand-wringing over the "angry" and "bitter" men and the supposedly mean things about girls we sometimes say.

Robert Franklin: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Robert Franklin · 25 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We will over the next few weeks present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. Here we bring you Robert Franklin's speech, the fourth presentation from Day 2, Saturday, June 28, 2014. It was another presentation misrepresented by the mainstream media. Our thanks once again to Rick Westlake for doing the bulk of the work of this transcription. —DE (Attila Vinczer) Before I have you come up, it's very important to me that we give away two more books. Bachelor Pad Economics by Aaron Clarey—if you are number 107, you are the proud owner of this amazing book. 107? How about number 19? Anybody with the number 19? Well, you can come and claim these books a little bit later.

I hope you enjoyed lunch; I know I certainly did. My boys decided to stay back at the hotel and watch the soccer game. Very understandable.

Our next speaker is someone that I have been following for many years. He's an incredible man that does so much work, tirelessly, for men and boys.

Robert Franklin has been an attorney in Texas since 1980, and a Men's and Fathers' Rights Activist since 1998. He has written the blogs for GlennSacks.com, Fathers & Families, and now the National Parents Organization. He's contributed op-eds and essays to numerous online and hard-copy publications, including The Hill, the Toledo Blade, The Seattle Times, The Bakersfield Californian, the Manchester Union-Leader, A Voice for Men, Men's E-News, Townhall, and many others.

He works daily with men, fathers, mothers, activists, attorneys, social scientists throughout the English-speaking world to promote the recognition and rights of men, fathers, and children, in equality and family courts. He currently blogs for the National Parents Organization, the largest organization in the country advocating for equal parents' and fathers' rights. Over the last five and a half years, he has written over 2,100 blog posts, postings, comprising some 3,500,000 words.

He serves on the Board of Directors of the National Parents Organization.

Let me tell you, not only does he write these blog posts, but they are incredibly well thought out, well researched, and they are untouchable. When he writes about a matter, it is exactly what you are reading.

Would you please put your hands together for Robert Franklin?

(Applause. Robert Franklin takes the podium.)

Can we hear me? … Attila, I love the way you lie … Let me join the accolades for Paul and Dean and everyone at A Voice for Men for making this conference possible. This is the type of event that, years from now, we are going to look back on as a milestone in the movement for men's human rights and towards a sane dialogue on the sexes.

Thank you so much for having me speak. It is an honor and privilege. And finally, let me thank you all for being here. Our numbers, our commitment, and our enthusiasm are all on display, right here, right now. Friends, the worm is turning.

Like so many people here, I've had my own red pill moment. Mine came in 1997, when a friend of mine, Greg, received a telephone call from a young man. The young man was Greg's son; he was 21 years old. But Greg had never heard of him before. Twenty-two years previously, Greg had a brief affair, and the woman had conceived a child. She'd broken off the relationship, and they'd gone their separate ways until the young man asked his mother for a gift on his 21st birthday—to meet his father.

As an attorney, I wondered what Greg's legal remedies were for her intentional deprivation of his parental rights.

So, I researched that issue, and quickly learned the astonishing answer—he had none. The legal system found nothing amiss with what she'd done.

But I didn't stop there. The thread of information I was getting was simply too enticing not to follow. It took me to books like Cathy Young's Ceasefire!, Sanford Braver's Divorced Dads, Warren Farrell's The Myth of Male Power, and countless others. And lo and behold, the picture that came into focus was nothing like the one I'd seen a million times in the public discourse on men and women. The men I learned about in those books looked nothing like the father I'd grown up with, my friends'—Pardon me: The men I learned about in those books looked like the father I'd grown up with, my friends' fathers, teachers, relatives, coaches, and the like. Assaulted daily with images of men as callous, violent buffoons, I had unconsciously assumed that the men I had known were, in some way, outside the norm. Now I knew better.

I plunged into family law, and over 17 years of study and writing I've come to some hard conclusions. First, broken families, mostly fatherless ones, are the single greatest problem to face Western culture. Second, family law creates broken families by—they create broken families by separating fathers from their children; and that's bad for children, bad for fathers, bad for mothers, and bad for society generally. Third, the invariable claim that this is all done "in the best interests of children" is factually false. Finally, we know what we should be doing in family court but resolutely refuse to do it.

Most of you know the facts. Children of divorce or of single-parent families are more likely than others to drop out of school, and do worse when they're there. They're more likely to exhibit a range of psychological deficits, engage in crime, drug and alcohol abuse. They're less likely to be employed, more likely to live in poverty. Girls without fathers are more likely to become pregnant as teenagers. Children of single mothers are more likely to become victims of physical or sexual abuse, and 10 times as likely to commit suicide. These deficits continue well into adulthood, where children without fathers do less well in their careers, and in their love-lives, than do children of intact families.

The problem of fatherless children has reached levels undreamed-of just 50 years ago. In 1960, about 6% of children were born to unmarried women; now the number is 42%. Today's divorce rate is 70% higher than it was in the late 1950s. An astonishing 50% of children will experience their parents' divorce before age 18; and half of those, 25% of all children, will go through a second divorce. A third of children of divorce never see their father. A third of all children don't live with their dad.

Unsurprisingly, social dysfunction has proceeded in lockstep. With the rise of fatherlessness has come the rise of our prison population, now the largest in the world; and between 60 and 72% of long-term prison inmates come from fatherless homes. The increasing division of wealth—the increasing division in wealth—is, to a great extent, that between intact and non-intact families. Remember those 42% of children born to unmarried mothers? About 41% of those mothers and children live in poverty.

Poverty, crime, drug and alcohol abuse; declining educational achievement, increased psychological deficits—imagine all the resources this society devotes to addressing those problems. We spend over $35,000 per inmate per year, to house about 2 million inmates. We spend who-knows-how-much fighting poverty and paying the bills for its side effects—illness, mental illness, housing, homeless shelters, police resources, child welfare agencies, school security, and the like. How many resources do we devote to treating drug and alcohol addiction? How many to address physical violence in the home? The list goes on and on. But the point is clear: the costs of fatherlessness to children and society are enormous!

But they don't stop at children and society. Fathers separating from their children are far more likely than others to suffer severe depression. They're more likely to be out of work, engage in crime, and abuse drugs and alcohol. There's almost a 10-fold spike in the suicide rate for fathers in divorce. And the problems of fatherlessness extend to mothers as well. A single or divorced mother, lacking the father's time, energy, and resources, finds herself saddled with 100% of the parenting obligation; so single mothers report higher levels of stress, depression, feelings of helplessness and the inability to cope than do other women.

Single mothers with children are the most likely of all adults to live in poverty because the demands of those children take time and energy that displace paid work. So, the median annual income for unmarried mothers, in the United States, is $23,000: barely enough to support one person, much less an adult and children. We rightly bemoan the gap between the rich and poor, but seldom mention the role broken families play in creating it. Twelve percent of married couples are poor, 44% of single-parent households are, according to the US Census Bureau.

Given the many adverse impacts of fatherlessness throughout society, it is not too much to say that broken families constitute the single greatest problem we face. Indeed, that was the conclusion drawn by Barbara Defoe Whitehead in her article in the Atlantic Monthly magazine in 1993; but in the ensuing 21 years, the problems she identified have only gotten worse.

Given all that, we would expect to see public policy taking a full-court-press approach to keeping fathers in the lives of children. After all, if we do that, we dramatically ameliorate a host of societal and individual deficits, and reduce the drain on the public purse. But no; we do the opposite.
Separation of fathers from their children is perhaps the signal accomplishment of divorce courts. As such, they're the major force in perpetuating the greatest problem of our time. Let us be clear, the removal of fathers from the lives of their children is … public … policy.

Consider child custody. In 1993, about 84% of parents with child custody were mothers. By 2011, the figure was 82%, i.e., no statistical change. But that's the good news; that's in the United States, of course. In the rest of the English-speaking world, Western Europe, Scandinavia, and Israel, rates of maternal custody run to 90% or more. In practice, this means that, when parents divorce, children lose their fathers and fathers lose their children.

Most jurisdictions have a standard visitation order that calls for Dad to see his kids only 14 to 20% of the time. Harmful as this is for fathers and children, the marginalization of Dad is actually a major cause of divorce. Mothers file 70% of divorce actions. Why so many? As researchers Brenig and Allen discovered, mothers file because they know they won't lose their kids. In other words, divorce courts encourage divorce by assuring mothers they'll win the Winner-Take-All Sweepstakes.

Where did anyone get the idea that children should go from seeing Daddy every day to seeing him only one day in five, or six, or seven? More than anything else, it came from a 1973 book entitled Beyond the Best Interests of the Child by Goldstein et al. Despite its outrageous flaws, it's still the most-cited book on the best interests of children, by US courts. The main conclusion to that book, and the author's next, too, in many states make up the bedrock of state child-custody law.

According to those authors: First, a child needs only one psychological parent, i.e., the primary caregiver, usually Mom. Second, once custody is decided, it should be altered in only the rarest of cases. Third, visitation by the non-custodial parent should be at the sole discretion of the custodial one. Finally, laws should discourage joint custody.

The legal community has warmly embraced this thesis, that was, in the time it was written, known in academic circles to lack any evidentiary basis. Since then, the social science on child well-being is essentially uniform that children need both parents. Goldstein et al. were simply wrong. As Canadian researcher Paul Miller wrote in 2009, quote: "The major tenet of the Goldstein thesis is not only unsupported by evidence, but worse, appears to promote harmful outcomes for children through the legal support given the destruction of one of the important parental relationships for the child." Quotes closed. And that's a fair description of custody law today.

The necessity for judges to find one parent superior to the other leads to bizarre splitting of hairs. So we see parents explicitly found, by courts, to be fit and loving, sidelined as mere visitors. "But wait—are fathers really taken from their children's lives? After all, they get to see them 14 to 20 percent of the time." The argument fails in several ways. First, social science shows that, unless a parent sees a child around 35% of the time, the benefits of shared parenting are lost. The child will tend to have the same problems as a literally fatherless child. Second, as sociologist Susan Stewart has described, those fathers tend to become "Disneyland Dads," more entertainers of children than actual fathers. That's not parenting, it's babysitting, and both fathers and children suffer because of it.

Woody Allen once said that 80% of life is just showing up, and that's precisely what family courts prevent fathers from doing.

But again, that's the good news. It assumes that mothers honor visitation orders. But routinely they don't, and the refusal is seldom punished by the courts. Few fathers can afford to hire a lawyer to assert their visitation rights; and even if they can, they must demonstrate a pattern of interference by the mother that requires several motions, hearings, and the like. By the time the judge gets around to punishing her, years may have passed, and tens of thousands or even hundreds of thousands of dollars spent, during which he's seen his child rarely, if at all.

Why the refusal to enforce visitation? For one thing, it's federal policy. The Office of Child Support Enforcement spends some $5 billion a year for child-support aid, but a mere $10 million to enforce visitation orders. That's a 500-to-1 ratio, and, for my money, a rough approximation of the value the system places on support versus visitation. Into the bargain, federal regulations prohibit any of that $10 million from being used to pay lawyers to represent non-custodial parents, i.e., the very thing they most need.

Nor is custody interference published criminally, despite laws passed to do exactly that. In Texas, where I live, interference with custody is a felony. It's a jail felony. But a recent investigation by the El Paso Times revealed that the police and district attorneys of the state's major cities simply ignore the law—those officials whose job it is to enforce criminal law, but in the case of fathers' visitation rights, nullify it instead.

It's even worse in Australia. There, the non-enforcement of visitation rights is a matter of public policy. Historian John Hirst tells us that in Australia, 30 years ago, family courts decided that, alone among all the orders they issued, only one, visitation orders, would go unenforced by contempt. Ninety percent of those orders are issued on behalf of fathers, who are therefore essentially the only litigants in the country on behalf of whom courts refuse to act.

To top it all off, we've long known that parents whose access to their children is not obstructed are far more likely than others to pay child support. So, you'd think we'd work extra hard to ensure access by the parent who pays. But no, we do the opposite.

Speaking of child support, it, too, helps separate fathers from children. One of the many scandals bemoaned by the OCSE is that courts set support levels higher than non-custodial parents can pay. But that same agency financially rewards states for child support collected, ensuring that the practice will continue. The more support ordered, the more is paid, the more federal money collected by the state. And of course, the life of—the loss of his driver's licence, and possibly jail, also stand between Dad and his ability to pay support.

Plus, fathers are far more likely to be punished for non-payment of support than are mothers. First, under 29% of non-custodial mothers are even ordered to pay child support at all versus 56% of fathers. And when they fall behind, mothers are much less likely to be punished. A Massachusetts study last year showed that 95 to 98 percent of the parents sent to jail for non-payment were fathers, even though mothers are less reliable about paying support. Fathers with arrears were eight times as likely to go to jail as mothers who had fallen behind.

But the drive to keep fathers out of their children's lives extends far beyond family court. Consider adoption. In New York, in the late 1970s, the Putative Father Registry was born; and today, at least 31 states have one. Putative-father registries have but one purpose, to facilitate adoption by denying unmarried fathers the opportunity to contest it. They do this by requiring single men to file a form with the state, for any child they may have fathered, whether they did or not. Failure to do so means the father is denied notice of any adoption of the child. But PFRs are closely guarded secrets! Texas, for example spends no money to publicize the registry, or its consequences. The unsurprising result? Fewer than 1% of children born to single mothers had a father file with the registry. That result, though, of course, is highly agreeable to adoption agencies and lawyers—fewer inconvenient fathers to impede the process by which the two get paid.

Utah is so anti-father it's become a mecca for mothers across the country to place their children for adoption without Dad's knowledge or consent. Until this year, even a mother's fraud to the state gave the father no cause to reverse an adoption. And when Utah attorney Wes Hutchins sent women wearing wires to adoption agencies, they recorded personnel saying things like, quote: “Birth fathers have zero rights in Utah.” Quotes closed. Give ’em an A for being honest! Others simply wrote the birth mothers’ sworn affidavits for them, to ensure the fathers wouldn’t be identified.

Unjust as that is to fathers, it’s doubly so to children. In the United States, there are only about 75,000 “stranger adoptions,” meaning not step-parent adoptions, completed every year. But there are some 425,000 children in foster care with no legal parents; plus, of course, millions of children languish in orphanages around the world. Those are all kids who desperately need parents. So, you’d think we’d do everything in our power to connect good adoptive parents with the children who truly need them. But no! We do the opposite. We force adoption on children who do not need it.

Putative-father registries deprive fit fathers of the opportunity to care for their kids, while using the scarce resource of adoptive parents on children who don’t need to be adopted. Every time they do so, a child in foster care or an orphanage goes without. Nice, huh?

Consider foster care. Single mothers are very likely to live in poverty, and often have their children taken from them by the state child protective agencies due to abuse or neglect. That happened to about 700,000 children in the US last year. Once taken, the children are placed in some form of foster care. Now, the social science on foster care is not pretty, despite many foster parents providing good, loving homes for children in need. Overall, foster children are at greater risk for physical, sexual, and psychological abuse, more likely to abuse drugs and alcohol, do worse in school, etc., than are children in parental care. So, given that being taken from one’s parents is itself traumatic for children, and the fact that foster care often has deleterious effects, and the fact that the state has to pay foster parents, you’d think we’d approach foster care as a last resort.
But no, we do the opposite. CPS agencies routinely railroad children into foster care; and when they do, we notice the absence of a certain person—Dad. When CPS agencies take children from a mother, they often ignore the father as the obvious next choice for the child’s care. In 2006, the Urban Institute did a study entitled “What About the Dad?” that found that in over half the cases in which a child was taken from a mother, CPS caseworkers made no effort to contact the father. None. The situation is so bad that a federal court in California ruled the practice a violation of fathers’ civil rights, but there’s nothing to indicate it’s evaded.

Data show that father care is better for children than foster care. In any case, it’s cheaper. As he’s the child’s biological parent, the state pays nothing to fathers who care for their own children. But rather than improve the lives of children, and save taxpayers’ money, states routinely opt for foster care over father care, as the Urban Institute study showed. Does that make any sense? Actually, it does—in the perverse world of family law, it does! As usual, money is the root of the problem. The federal government pays states for every child taken into or adopted out of foster care. In short, the more children a state can channel into foster care, the more money it can receive from Washington.

So, listen to the former chairman of the South Dakota Senate Appropriations Committee, Bill Napoli, on National Public Radio—quote: “When that money came down the pike, it was huge!” Napoli said. “That’s when we saw a real influx of kids being taken out of family. There was little lawmakers could do to rein in the Department of Social Services. This was federal money, and it went straight to the department.” Quote. “I’m sure they were trying to answer a public perception of a problem,” he said; and then, “Slowly, it grew to a point where they had so much power that no one—no one—could question what they were doing.”

What they were doing was trafficking children.

And intentionally deprive—(Applause.) … And they were intentionally depriving fathers of children, and children of fathers, to do so.

Just who is it that supports this dysfunctional and unjust system of laws and policies on fathers and children? Principally, two groups—family lawyers and feminist organizations; usually part of the Domestic Violence Establishment, but not always. When shared-parenting bills come before state legislatures, those are the ones testifying against them.

Lawyers, of course, benefit from the Winner-Take-All system of child custody. The prospect of losing one's child encourages many parents to fight tooth-and-nail, and lawyers thrive on conflict. Bad blood means more motions to file, more hearings to attend, more custody evaluations to conduct, et cetera, all of which lawyers take straight to the bank. So, divorce lawyers fight every effort to make divorce less adversarial; hey, they've got yacht payments to make. Ya gotta have sympathy for 'em! Y'know?

Of the countless shared-parenting bills that have come before legislative bodies throughout the world, not one has ever been supported by a feminist organization, and many have been opposed by them. As a few examples, the National Organization for Women, its affiliates in Michigan and New York, the National Association for Women Lawyers in Canada, the Fawcett Society in the UK, the National Council of Single Mothers in Australia have all actively lobbied against even the most modest improvements in the rights of children and fathers. This is true despite the fact that more parenting time for Dad would increase Mother's time to do paid work, earn, save, and advance in their careers. All of those, of course, are long-time feminist goals. But it seems, that for feminist organizations, some things, like keeping fathers out of their children's lives, trump even their dedication to women. Who'd a' thunk it?

This opposition to equalizing the roles of fathers and mothers is, as you might expect, laughably disingenuous. For example, opponents of fathers' rights say that cases are decided on "The Best Interests of the Child" and are therefore sacrosanct. But are they? If judges are acting in children's best interests, why are so many faring so poorly? The answer is, of course, that judges, however sincere their belief, are doing no such thing. As Paul Miller points out, what predicts custody orders is not children's interests but the sex of the parent. Overwhelmingly, mothers get custody and father's don't. But does that promote child well-being? It does not. As Miller says, quote, "Parental gender is not a good predictor—in fact, not a predictor at all—of any of the child outcomes examined here, that is, behavioral, educational, or health outcomes. Thus, there appears to be a disconnect between the theoretical criterion of custody determination, best interests, and what actually plays out in the justice system." Quotes closed.

Why this uniform failure on the part of judges to do what they claim to be doing? Surely one reason is our refusal to educate them on the science of children's welfare post-divorce. We now have a large body of science that tells us what parenting arrangements promote children's welfare. So, you'd expect that science to be a big part of judges' training. But no, we do the opposite.

Nowhere in the English-speaking world do we teach judges the science upon shared parenting and its many benefits to children, parents, the justice system, and society generally. Indeed, when one UK—when one fathers' rights organization in the UK asked what science on parenting judges are taught, the Judicial College informed them that it had no such science and wouldn't use it if it did.

Nice! So much for the Best Interests of Children.

Another claim by the anti-Dad crowd is that custody orders reflect parenting time during marriage, and so should be maintained afterward. First, no science demonstrates that children's well-being is promoted by keeping them with their primary caregiver. But even if there were, the claim is simply false. According to the data of, among others, the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the United States, Stats Canada, and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, fathers and mothers, both doing paid work, do essentially—perform essentially equal amounts of parenting. When non-working parents are added to the mix, the difference in parenting time expands, but even then fathers do between 40 and 42% of the hands-on child care.

So, even if those opposed to increased fathers' rights were correct, which they are not, fathers should still see their children at least 40% of the time. But that standard exists nowhere in the world.

Then there's the old war-horse of the anti-father groups, domestic violence, according to which fathers are uniquely apt to hit their wives and kids, and so should be marginalized in their lives. Of course, we've known for decades that men and women commit domestic violence about equally, and women are more likely than men to initiate physical conflict. And, the US Administration for Children and Families shows mothers do between 60 and 100 percent more abuse and neglect to children than do fathers. But what's new information is just how little of this is ever an issue. The State of Nebraska just completed a study of its custody cases over a 10-year period, and the results opened a lot of eyes. Allegations of domestic violence were made at all in only 5.4% of cases, while child abuse or neglect was alleged in 6.2%. In short, domestic violence and child abuse are, in the overwhelming majority of cases, non-factors in deciding parental fitness.

By now it should be clear that family courts routinely do the opposite of what they should be doing if, as they claim, they're promoting children's interests; that they, in the process of harming children, also harm fathers, mothers, the social fabric, and drain the public purse. It's a situation that fairly screams for reform.

And we know the direction that reform must take. We've known for decades that children do better in intact families; and now, social science demonstrates that for children of divorce, equal parenting is the optimal arrangement. By equal, I mean any ratio of parenting time between a 35/65 and a 50/50 split, since the benefits to children tend to kick in when they see each parent at least 35% of the time.

I don't remotely have time to delve into the social science on equal parenting, but here is the briefest of summaries:

First, equal parenting helps preserve children's relationship with both parents, and that is vital for their ability to adjust to the psychological trauma of divorce. If divorce courts truly want to act in the best interests of children, they will, in most cases, order equal parenting. That children in shared-parenting arrangements do better, by all measures, than kids with non-equal parenting has been established at least since 1992. Since then, studies with data from 36 countries and hundreds of thousands of people found the same thing. Meta-analyses of data, conducted in 2002 and 2012, found that, quote: "Joint custody and shared parenting resulted in significantly better outcomes for children and parents on all measures of adjustment, including family relationships, self-esteem, emotional and behavioral adjustment, and level of conflict between parents."
Second, equal parenting is good for parents as well as kids. Parents with equal custody tend to have better physical and emotional health, a greater sense of purpose, and personal gratification. By contrast, non-custodial fathers and mothers have high levels of depression. They experience a grief reaction much like to the death of a loved one. They report, quote: "increasing isolation, loss of employment, and inability to form new relationships; more disturbed patterns of thinking and feeling, including shame, stigma, self-blame, hopelessness about the future." Quotes closed.

Third, children want equal parenting! Studies over 10 years revealed that between 70 and 93% of children prefer equal contact between their parents. Children in equal-parenting relationships, quote: "were found to have the best relationships with each of their parents, and reported outcomes far superior to those in primary-residence homes. Children in sole-custody arrangements reported feelings of insecurity in their relationship with their non-residential parent; perception of rejection by that parent; and anger towards both parents, for denying them meaningful relationships with fathers and mothers." Plus—we the people say we prefer shared parenting. Multiple surveys of public opinion conducted in the United States, Canada, and the UK over the past decade show support for shared parenting between 70 and 84%.

In short, if the Best Interests of Children is the goal, we know how to reach it. But a million times a year, year in and year out, we do the opposite.
Given all that, the question arises: Why aren't advocates for children and fathers winning? After all, we have so much on our side. So why is it that our equal-parenting bills routinely go down to defeat? The answer is simple—we aren't playing the game. It's as if we're a football team that, instead of blocking the other players, asked them politely to get out of the way and allow us to score. It's very civilized, but it's not calculated to win!

Time and again, we lobby state legislators, many of whom genuinely support us; but what those office-holders know is that if they vote against our bill, they will pay no price for doing so. And then they look at the Family Law Bar, and then they look at the Domestic Violence Establishment, and realize that if they don't vote their way, they'll pay for it next time in money and votes. For politicians stuck between their conscience and re-election, the choice, unfortunately, is not a hard one.

We need to change that. We need to add electoral politics to our lobbying efforts. We need to organize locally to defeat wrong-voting officeholders. That's something we can do with volunteers, a good strategy, and comparatively little money. I can comment on that, at much greater length, another time.

For many years, we've tried playing nicely. It's now time to show the state legislators both the carrot and the stick.

Thank you. (Applause.)

… Wait a minute … We don't have time for questions, but that doesn't mean I can't ask you one. And this is for extra credit; you get a gold star by your name if you get the correct answer, it goes on your permanent record … You remember the book I was talking about, called The Best Interests of the Child. It was incomprehensibly bad, the book. It was written by three people with connections to Yale University. It was published in 1973, which means it was written in the early 1970s. Now, for extra credit, tell me, who was the student researcher, research assistant, that they …

(From audience: "Clinton!")

Yeah, anybody else? You got the star—Hillary Rodham, soon to be Hillary Clinton. Author of It Takes a Village. It was her.

Thank you again. (Applause.)

Gender hypocrisy in the porn debate

Dr. David Ley · 25 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

[image]
In Don Jon, the gender war over sex and porn takes center stage
The ubiquity of male porn use has become the current battleground of a huge cultural war. People are afraid of the consequences of porn use and fear that it damages men, their brains, their sexual performance, their attitudes towards women, intimacy, and sex. The dialogue has changed, since the days of Take Back The Night, when Andrea Dworkin declared that pornography was rape, and should be restricted. Today, feminist values and perspectives still permeate the anti-porn debate, but they serve as a backdrop for the argument that porn is an addictive stimulus that overrides our natural evolutionary responses, changing our brains and bodies. Porn is presented as scary, insidious and deceptive. We are told to "be afraid, be very afraid" of what porn is doing to men.

The new Joseph Gordon-Levitt film Don Jon tells a different message, and suggests that the real problem with porn is not that it is scary, but that it is free, convenient, and offers men a discounted option to the high cost of sex. There is a fascinating subplot in the film, which explores the way that sexuality has been turned into a commodity. Scarlett Johansson's character uses her sexuality deliberately and blatantly to manipulate Jon's character into complying with her wishes of how and who he is supposed to be. Commercials shown in the film depict how men are manipulated by sexual images and themes in advertising.

Scarlett's character flies into a rage when she finds out that Jon has continued to watch pornography, ostensibly because she finds out he lied to her. But, is she really angry about the lie, or is she angry because Jon's easy access to porn takes away some of her power? Baumeister and Twenge wrote a fascinating article in 2002 where they argue that it is actually women who suppress the sexuality of other women, not men. Their argument suggests that control of sexuality was historically one of women's only commodities, and that women had to control the market, so to speak, by stigmatizing, shaming and suppressing those who might offer free, easy, or cheap sex. This reiterates the old argument that women have to defend the value of sex, because "nobody buys a cow, if it gives away the milk for free."

[image]
Men use porn because it's free, easy and convenient, not because it's addictive
At one point in the film, Jon actually says that "real" sex is less satisfying than porn and masturbation, because during sex with a woman, "it's on me to do all the work." But, during porn, Jon can sit back, watch for free, "lose himself" in the fantasy of porn, and not have to work. He can be selfish with his sexuality. Because porn is free, and convenient, Don Jon can relax and focus on himself, exploring his fantasies, rather than maintaining focus on the needs of his partner. That is frightening to many, because there is a cultural value that sex isn't supposed to be free, easy or casual. Sex, according to the current antiporn narrative, is supposed to be costly, expensive in both effort and emotions. It is supposed to involve intimacy, and emotionally transparent surrender. The convenience and easy, free access to porn undercuts the power and high value that sex has held for human history.

In the film, it's not that Don Jon is a "junkie" for porn because his brain has been warped, or because it overrides his sexual evolutionary design. Instead, it's because Jon, like all men, has been subject to a world where sex is constantly held out on the end of a string in front of them, and a man has to work like a horse to earn that sex. The high value of sex has been programmed into men. But all of a sudden, men don't have to work that hard to get sex, or at least a reasonable simulacrum. Internet porn represents not merely a cow that gives away the milk for free, but a world where milk simply gushes out of a tap in the kitchen, at the mere twist of a knob. All of a sudden, women who rely on sex for their power and value have a new, powerful threat on the market, and men's ability to negotiate for sex and in relationships has changed substantially.

In another recent take on the gender issues of this porn, I highly recommend this playful (SFW) video, which also shows the gender hypocrisies embedded in this debate. The culture war, or dare I say, gender war, over porn is not going to end any time soon. But, I hope that films like Don Jon continue to move the debate forward, towards greater levels of honesty over what we are really arguing about.

(Before the angry, vitriolic commenters begin, let me tell you that I am not an embittered man, angry over past or current sexual rejections. I actually share the end message of Don Jon, that good sex is sex between equals. I think that the gender war over porn reflects a significant equalization in sexual power, changing an outdated, unnecessary imbalance which ultimately hurt both men and women.)

A call to arms! Walk A Mile with Men's Rights Edmonton!

AVfM Video Source · 25 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sammy Allouba voices his support for an important campaign to understand violence against women.

http://youtu.be/CU2lBQM_G2Y

More here.

The second Koalemos Awards – celebrating stupidity!

AVfM Video Source · 25 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) continues his crusade against the influential stupid with his Darwin Award–inspired celebration of human idiocy. The nominees of the second Koalemos Awards are Anita Sarkeesian, Dick Coughlan, Steve Shives, Melissa Fabello, and Zen himself (gotta make fun of yourself sometimes, right?).

Victor Zen is a highly active MHRA with a channel full of book reviews, interviews, on-the-ground activism, pertinent commentary, comedy, and ginger shenanigans. He's a must-sub on YouTube for activists, so be sure to follow his work.

MGTOW vs Islam Part 1 – The value of men & women

Paul Elam · 26 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following video is from a relatively new Youtube account. Ayam Sirias only has a little over 300 subscribers. We are betting that number will change drastically in short order. The video contains some nudity, so it may not be safe for the workplace. It is also brilliant. Please sub and support this guy for continuing this work. It rises to the level of Ali Mehraspand's work in terms of its value in correcting western misconceptions about Muslim and eastern culture. It is also a brilliant analysis of how gynocentrism is expressed in different ways by different societies.

Young men's guide to campus secessionism: Part 1

Ron Collins · 26 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As the new fall semester approaches on college and university campuses across the nation, I cannot help but feel apprehension for you young men about to embark on your paths to higher education.

It can credibly be described as a given that young people leaving high school have very little knowledge of, or interest in, the United States Constitution, its Bill of Rights, or legal fundamentals such as the differences between civil and criminal law procedures, rules of evidence, or legal doctrines pre-dating American law by centuries, such as rights to trial by jury, a presumption of the innocence of those accused, or the burden of proof on the prosecution.

For young men entering campus life for the first time, this poor comprehension of your own basic civil rights under rule of law, combined with the ancient constant of collegiate bacchanalia as a primal urge for those newly separated from the strictures of childhood and home life, is more a potentially catastrophic threat to your futures and your civil liberties right now than perhaps ever before.

Under guidelines imposed as conditions of funding from the US Department of Education (DOE), known broadly as "Dear Colleague" policy, radically anti-constitutional practices and procedures installed by campus authorities across the nation have effectively removed every campus in the national system from the jurisdiction of the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments.

These crucial safeguards against both vigilantism and what Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg described as "unchecked police activity" (Fernandez v. California, dissenting opinion: http://www.supremecourt.gov/opinions/13pdf/12-7822_he4l.pdf) have been replaced by the DOE with policies ostensibly crafted to "prevent sexual assault," which in effect remove from men all the protections of your civil liberties guaranteed all citizens under the Constitution.

The arguments in favor of Dear Colleague/Title IX policies are weak and emotional at best. Proponents of these kangaroo-court practices seldom even mention the Bill of Rights, due process of law, presumption of innocence, or any other legal fundamental used for centuries in American jurisprudence to govern proceedings establishing guilt or innocence on criminal charges. Their consistent claim is that the criminal justice system simply isn't getting it right, that by following the law and the rules of evidence and procedure that the law demands, the police, prosecutors, and courts across the US are just not convicting enough men charged with sexual assault to satisfy the supporters of Title IX/Dear Colleague policies.

In her New York Times op-ed piece entitled "Campuses Are the Best Places for Sexual Assault Accountability," Holly Rider-Milkovich, director of the Sexual Assault Prevention and Awareness Center, University of Michigan, asserts:

"The criminal justice system alone is simply not effective enough to keep young people safe. Pernicious victim-blaming attitudes and myths about 'wanted' sexual assault still permeate our entire culture, not just our campuses."

In an essay that never once mentions the ideas of due process of law, presumption of innocence, prosecutorial burden, or the United States Constitution, its author's entire legal argument, posited by its title, is an indictment of "attitudes" and "myths" that "permeate our entire culture." Its explicit assertion is that the rule of law and the correct application of criminal procedures are simply not producing a satisfactory result (one that we may assume would further benefit the funding stream of organizations such as the one she runs at the University of Michigan).

The key to these "alternative" methods used on campuses for adjudicating sexual assault allegations is in bypassing criminal procedure altogether by setting up ad hoc administrative tribunals to hear these accusations, which place burden of proof on the accused, deny him legal counsel or a right even to know the identities of those accusing him or the witnesses they call to these proceedings outside his purview—all of which flies in the face of the precise language of the Sixth Amendment:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

A further method applied in these campus proceedings is to use the lowest possible standard of admissibility or "preponderance of the evidence" to legitimize the allegations being made. Again, this absolutely ignores due process of criminal law, in which the highest standard of "beyond a reasonable doubt" must be ruled on by a judge to admit evidence and agreed upon unanimously by a jury of the citizenry before conviction or sentencing can occur at all.

"Civil courts use a lower standard of 'preponderance of evidence,' while criminal courts use a higher standard of 'beyond a reasonable doubt.'"

Note the distinction between civil proceedings and criminal trials. This has been the primary entry point used by domestic violence/sexual assault professionals for decades into this netherworld of extra-legal quasi-prosecution of cases that lack sufficient evidence to convict by means of jury trials. In US v Morrison, the Supreme Court found that such an approach was unacceptable as an application of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA) when a woman who accused two men of assaulting her had seen her allegations denied on the basis of lack of evidence, both by campus authorities and by the local prosecutors' office. Her legal team thereupon sought to file a federal suit against the alleged assailants, and the high court overturned an entire section of the 1994 version of VAWA by which Congress had made this a legal option.

Considerations of double jeopardy notwithstanding, the court unfortunately pursued the politically safe course of overturning a lower court ruling by citing the obscure "Commerce Clause" of the Fourteenth Amendment, while its ruling still left the door wide open for substitute proceedings in the civil arena, with their lower evidentiary standards and their denials of Sixth Amendment rights to the accused, to take the place of due process of criminal law. This approach has been the mainstay of domestic violence/sexual assault activists and legal teams for the entire time since that historic (but weak) ruling in 2000 by the Supreme Court.

There has been another instance in US history when bodies politic took it upon themselves to enact a subversion of the Constitution and a refusal to comply with its enumerated powers, and for much the same reason. The South Carolina Convention in 1860 argued that its "right" to assign a lesser status under law to some of its residents, in their case African slaves [and in the case of Dear Colleague policies, males], was sufficient reason to separate itself in a fit of moral outrage from the United States as a whole. Several other states followed this example in short order, and soon thereafter began the bloodiest war ever to be fought on North American soil not, as is popularly believed, to settle the question of slavery itself but the question of secession.

Does the American college and university system have the right to ignore, bypass, subvert, and SECEDE FROM the United States Constitution, or does it not?

For the young men about to enter into these institutions, with all the mayhem and licentiousness many of you may look forward to as celebrations of your newfound adult freedoms, I strongly urge you to consider:

Finding yourself on the receiving end of a rape allegation, under any of dozens of potential “charges,” alone in a room with no legal counsel, no knowledge of the specifics of the case against you, facing campus administrators not trained in legal proceedings or criminal investigations or forensic examinations, and with the burden of proof on you alone, is not the best time or place to ponder for the first time the right and wrong of campus secessionism.

https://www.linkedin.com/today/post/article/20140811170914-123782074-suny-title-ix-and-campus-secessionism?trk=prof-post

NCIS Pauley Perrette has public meltdown as restraining order abuse case heats up!

Suzanne McCarley · 26 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

NCIS's Pauley Perrette has begun having a public meltdown as the evidence of her horrific abuse of the restraining order system becomes too hard to ignore.

— Paul Elam Provides Official Declaration in the Shivers–Perrette Lawsuit
— Forensic Video Expert Debunks Perrette's Accusations
— Perrette Attacks with Twitter Rampage
— Perrette Terrified of Public Airing of Her 911 Call to LAPD

Much is happening in the pending legal scandal involving Francis "Coyote" Shivers and his ex-wife, increasingly beleaguered NCIS actress Laura "Pauley" Perrette. First, Shivers has filed back against Perrette's frivolous anti-SLAPP motion, complete with sound evidence. Based on her latest late-night ranting on Twitter (see below), it appears the building pressure of finally facing the truth is getting to her and she is slipping into a state of delusional denial.

Perrette has also continued to "play the victim" regarding the participation of A Voice for Men and its reporting on the Shivers–Perrette cases in the L.A. County court system. Now due to her own motion, she is obviously terrified of the reality that her 911 call to the Los Angeles Police Department (LAPD) will be made public on this site—publicly exposing her as lying on tape to police.

Attempting to garner public sympathy, Perrette posted the following tweet as a pathetic ploy to turn the grief surrounding the death of Robin Williams into sympathy for herself, alluding to the inherent injustice of having 911 calls to police being publicly broadcast.

[image]

And why would Perrette be so terrified of 911 calls being broadcast? Well, because she got caught lying on tape to police. Yes, that's right, Perrette's 911 call doesn't match her own testimony. In fact, it doesn't match itself. She changes her stories mid-sentence. All caught on tape. And all while being rather bitchy toward the poor 911 operator. So, yes, Perrette is freaking about the 911 call being broadcast, which has been very much on her mind since Shivers's recent filing of opposition papers, making the 911 call a central piece of evidence.

2014-08-08 Shivers Opposition to Perrette Anti-SLAPP (PDF)

With that in mind, just take a look at the tweet above. Is there nothing that this woman won't do, or won't stoop so low as, to get support and sympathy for her entire fraudulent cause?

So far, the judge in this case has issued appropriate rulings, and it certainly looks like additional appropriate rulings will follow.

As a further indicator of Perrette's pathetic attempt to garner public sympathy and incite hatred from NCIS fans against her ex-husband for divorcing her and telling the truth, below is a screen shot of some of her most recent tweets. The absurdity of this is truly mind-boggling.

[image]

Her tweets had the desired effect, eliciting hate toward the innocent Shivers from NCIS fans. This is not the first time Perrette has launched into a public hate campaign about her (happily remarried) ex-husband and attempted to manipulate NCIS fans to do her dirty work. It appears her actions are in direct violation of California Penal Code 653.2, and the staggering amount of evidence explicitly reveals that everything she is telling the world is a complete fraud.

Perhaps her well-compensated legal team will counsel her accordingly of the intricacies of fact versus fantasy, although it appears they may be more interested in milking Perrette for legal fees on her way down rather than actually ending this public spectacle.

Contrary to false accuser Pauley Perrette's claims, the truth is not harassment, whether it's her ex- telling it or this website reporting it. Perrette's tweets are an insult to real victims of domestic violence, and she should be ashamed of herself. (And apparently she is, judging by the way she doesn't want that 911 call broadcast.)

Due to Perrette's excessive abuse of the restraining order system, AVfM Founder and Publisher Paul Elam has provided an official declaration to the court in support of Shivers.

2014-08-08 – Declaration of Paul Elam (PDF)

The declaration essentially states what we already know and what we have already reported: Perrette's real-life abuse of the restraining order system that follows almost word for word her own handwritten plan/movie script, "Star Crazy."

An additional declaration was filed by forensic video expert David Notowitz in support of Shivers, who conducted a forensic examination of the electronic files and history inside Shivers's cell phone. Notowitz has provided some very impressive credentials regarding his expertise and training in video forensics.

2014-08-08 – Declaration of David Notowitz (Conf)

In the latest proceedings, make-believe television "forensics expert" Pauley Perrette has again made false accusations, in direct contradiction to the actual forensic evidence itself. In response, Notowitz has provided a declaration to the court that publicly debunks Perrette's false claims once and for all.

During the criminal case, the transcripts reveal that Perrette testified that her bartender boyfriend, Thomas Arklie, got up to defend her from Shivers's cell phone camera only after Shivers activated said cell phone camera. The forensic examination of Shivers's cell phone, and Perrette's own words in the 911 call, prove different, however.

It was actually Thomas Arklie who got up to attack Francis Shivers, and Shivers's response in activating his cell phone camera was in self-defense, just as the jury found, and the forensics and audio now prove that with absolute certainty.

This fact, determined through forensic examination of Shivers's cell phone, disproves Perrette's false accusations and proves what Shivers initially claimed, that it was Perrette's bartender boyfriend,Thomas Arklie, who initiated and was solely responsible for any aggressive action that occurred that night.

Slowly but surely, many of Perrette's prior false allegations and assertions are being debunked through sound forensic techniques, evidence, document examinations, and prior sworn testimony.

It is very simple: When you tell the truth, you don't have to remember anything; you simply speak the truth. When you lie, over and over again, you can't keep your lies straight, you stumble all over yourself, and you make mistakes. Those mistakes, however, have not escaped the watchful eyes of the small army of dedicated advocates and trial-watchers involved in this case.

My-my, what a twisted web we weave.

It appears that Perrette has no desire to cease this behavior and continues to waste the time and resources of the court and the taxpayers, and the emotional energy of NCIS fans, in order to follow her handwritten movie script of falsely accusing a man in order to obtain a restraining order and to falsely portray herself as a domestic violence victim in order to garner public sympathy to boost her public persona and enhance her acting career.

As the mountain of evidence reveals, and which we have posted here, this entire charade by Perrette has been one big fraud. That is unfortunate for Shivers, but it is worse for the actual victims of domestic violence: the men and women who cannot get their fair share of the court's time or the services they need.

Stay tuned, because the actual audio recording of Pauley Perrette's 911 call to the LAPD will be coming soon.

White girls bully and attack black dude

AVfM Video Source · 26 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This never happens, right? Or is it just “funny” when it does, and totally “outrageous” when the guy finally tries to defend himself?

http://archive.avoiceformen.com/video/white-girls-attack-black-dude.mp4
By the way, this video is we think about a year old. We’ve noticed this video has appeared and then disappeared repeatedly from various places on the Internet, so we’ve decided to save our own copy for posterity.

Will the artificial womb bring about men's liberation?

Jack Barnes · 27 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A wise man once told me: "If it weren't for pussy, there would be an open season on women." Most feminists would scream, "Misogyny!" at that statement. I must admit that I had a similar reaction myself for about half a second. Then I thought about what he said and what it actually meant. It didn't mean that men would kill women if it weren't for their vaginas. It meant that if men didn't value vaginas to such a high degree, men would not tolerate an exceeding level of bad behavior from women. After rolling that around in my head for a while, I decided to take a look at the men and women I knew to see if this idea was true. All around me I saw men tolerating behavior from women that they would never tolerate from any man. From my own observations, I concluded that there was a grain of truth behind what that old man had said. Men value women so much, most are willing to tolerate abhorrent behavior from the "fairer" sex.

The feminist and MHRM communities have been buzzing lately with the idea of an artificial uterus. Women would no longer have to carry babies inside them but could grow them at home, like tomatoes. This technology may never be possible. However, if human history teaches us anything, it's that what women want, they get. Then again, I don't think all women will embrace this new technology. I think many women will opt for the experience of feeling their child grow inside them rather than in the controlled environment of an artificial womb.

For the 90% of the time that humans have existed, women have been cherished and worshipped for their life-giving ability. First, it was simple survival strategy for women to be protected and men to be sacrificed for the good of the group. Now the worshipping of women is an unnecessary and destructive custom. We still protect women like each individual one is more valuable than men as a whole. Simply, men are considered worth less, if nothing, compared with women.

A healthy, stable relationship is based on the idea that both people are equally valued. The same principle applies to a healthy society. If one group is seen as more valuable than another or others, then you have a tiered society that is bound to violate the human rights of the less preferred group in favor of the preferred group. Men being undervalued and women being overvalued are simply unnecessary in our modern society. Yet women can still do something that men can't. Having babies is a must for the survival of the species.

What if men, being in the undervalued position, were made completely unnecessary for the human race to continue? What if women didn't need men to have babies? Sounds like a feminist pipe dream, doesn't it?

Science is very close to creating viable sperm and egg cells from stem cells. This technology would enable men and women with reproductive problems to be able to conceive. It would also allow gay male couples to conceive a baby using nothing but their own DNA and with the help of a surrogate mother. Yes, it would also allow lesbian couples to conceive on their own, no man necessary. Presto! We are on the verge of making the feminist utopia possible from a reproductive standpoint. You may be saying, "Wait a minute, Jack. That doesn't mean that men are done for. Not every baby born will be a girl." Well … scientists have already created the technology that will allow a couple to custom-order their child.

Special clinics allow you to pick your child's eye, hair, skin color, and gender. "Hold on a second there, hoss. This doesn't mean that people can guarantee that every baby born is a girl. The design-a-baby technology is far from 100% accurate." That's a simple fix. Do an ultrasound. If it's a boy, abort it.

"Ultrasounds are not completely accurate either there, sonny." Again, that has all but been taken care of. Its called post-natal abortion.

Yeah, it's only theoretical at this point. But as I said before: What women want, they get. "Now you've gone off the rails. All this is assuming that the majority of women prefer girls to boys."

Well …

What do you expect after 50 years of feminism telling the whole world that males, or “homorapians,” are all evil?

This isn’t tinfoil-hat thinking. This is about to become a reality. A world without men will probably never happen. After all, the latest stats show that the overwhelming majority of women reject the ideology of feminism. I honestly believe that most women would take up arms and fight for the men whom they love. But an all-female planet is about to become technologically possible from a reproductive standpoint.

Try to wrap your heads around that one for a moment. Women have value because they are needed. Our society has always treated women as a group better than men as a group because women are considered of higher value. Men have had little value in terms of reproduction. Men have always been disposable because they were considered of lesser reproductive value. Remember that tiered society I was talking about? Not only does society refuse to tolerate the same level of bad behavior from men as they do women, but we also don’t give a shit whether boys live or die. Men have to walk a fine line to stay in society’s good graces. Women have to really work at it to get a frown. What if we put women in the same boat as men? What if women became entirely unnecessary? If two men could use stem cell technology coupled with an artificial uterus to have babies, what would that do to women’s inherent value? What if the human race no longer needed women to continue the species?

The term modern woman is an oxymoron. Women feel more entitled to protection and provision from daddy government while giving next to nothing in return than they ever have. At least back in the horse-and-buggy days men could expect something in return for caring for women. There is nothing modern about today’s entitled female. As for the woman part. Ha! Woman is the term used for adult female human beings. Go to a Slut Walk, a Take Back the Night rally, a NOW convention, or anywhere feminists flock like lot lizards to a Peterbilt and see how many adult females you find. Now go to the same places or events and count all the entitled little princesses who are crying and whining, like Sael Palani after David Futrelle sat on her mouse. While it is true that the overwhelming majority will be over 18—hell, a significant number will be on the backside of 40—that doesn’t mean they behave as a adults. I don’t know what you call them. They are female human beings, but it would be a bad joke to call them adults; therefore, it would be an equally bad joke to call them women. Look at our family courts. Take a look at shrink4men.com and read the stories posted there about some “modern women.” Take a look at the false rape epidemic on our college campuses. Take a look at all the legislation that women have been able to ram through government. Just take a look at the bullshit feminism stands for. Look at the lies that it spouts, like patriarchy theory, rape culture, the wage gap, the Duluth model, etc., etc., etc. This is not a new phenomenon. The degradation and de-evolution of the human female has been going on for over 50 years. Yeah, I know: NAWALT, NAWALT, NAWALT. NAWALT doesn’t change the facts.

Yet our society tolerates this bad behavior and in some cases even celebrates it. Why? Well, women have pussies.

The almighty vag has lost a lot of its value in the past several decades. Men don’t have to buy women (marriage) to get laid. Men don’t even have to rent one for a couple of hours to relieve their natural sexual frustrations. A man can simply get a five-gallon bucket of petroleum jelly, a case of tube socks, a computer, and an Internet connection and he is set for life. Why has the last option become more appealing than the other two in recent years? It’s simple: It’s the cheapest and there’s no hassle or bullshit. So pussy isn’t the real reason we tolerate this kind of behavior, at least not anymore. It’s the old “protect the people who give birth” that is the culprit now. Men still feel this need to protect the baby-makers. It’s the fault of both men and women that we live in a tiered society based solely on who carries the baby. We could change this if we wanted to bad enough. We just don’t want to. Men like women, and women like being on top. The artificial uterus won’t change anything until men collectively say that enough of this bullshit is enough. But it is a necessary step in men doing just that.

A healthy relationship is based on the fact that each one doesn’t need the other but wants the company of the other. As it stands right now, women don’t need men, but men need women. Anyone can see this is lopsided. This one-sided deal results in a one-sided society. In the past, men and women needed each other. Then women decided that they wanted to be free of men. Now it’s time we freed men of women. We need to create a society where men and women are together because they want to be, not because they are holding a gun to each other’s head. But society cannot survive as long as one has the gun pointed at the other's head. I hope that the artificial womb is possible and is close to becoming a reality. If for no other reason than no one group should not have as much power over reproduction as women have.

But the invention of the "stunt cunt" comes with an extra bonus. Women will be forced to grow up and treat men as human beings instead of just sperm-dispensing machines who can open jars and take bullets. I long for that day.

Women’s and gender studies courses in Ireland and abroad

Men's Human Rights Ireland · 27 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What Are Women’s Studies?

Women’s studies departments began to be established in American universities in the early 1970s. Now over 700 such departments exist in the United States, with many hundreds more in the Western world. Courses are to be found in nearly 90 universities and colleges in the United Kingdom.

It needs to be seen in the context of the clamour from a whole variety of groups for separate studies for sub-populations with a history of victimhood; related examples are multicultural studies, ethnic studies of various kinds, and colonial studies, described by Robert Hughes as the “Culture of Complaint.”

They have taken colossal advantage of a certain recognition that some groups and sections in society were not well treated in the past to claim enormous liberties. A truly remarkable latitude has been accorded to feminist scholars. Women’s studies, like multicultural programmes, generally have attained a sacrosanct status, an unprecedented immunity to the scrutiny and skepticism standard for other fields of inquiry; they have become privileged within the academy.

It will be argued that it has produced as a result a large amount of work of very dubious value. This is certainly true of feminist critiques of science, of which many well-documented studies exist.

One of the most striking features is the ubiquity of gender in all the writings, the way feminists relate everything to a universal and ineluctable gendering. There is a constant attempt to examine works of history, politics, sociology, and economics (the gendered economy) in minute detail for any hint of taint by supposedly masculine ideas or those interpreted as such. Inasmuch as these have been largely or overwhelmingly a male enterprise, they are assumed to be biased by unacknowledged assumptions derived from the patriarchal values of Western society.

No other academic programme has leaned so heavily and inventively on social constructionism as has women’s studies. The theoretical bedrock of the current wave of feminism is the claim that gender is socially constructed and that the different roles played by men and women in society—and the personality characteristics, attitudes, and behaviours ascribed to them—derive largely from social arrangements that vary dramatically from culture to culture. Such differences can be neither explained nor justified by reference to innate biological sex differences.

It would be hard to deny that the division of labour between women and men is at least partly socially constructed. But is it legitimate to relate all aspects and expressions of gender to social forces? Women's studies are very strongly committed to taking an extreme social constructionist line; it denies that biology has anything to do with gender. Science has refuted such a position throughout some parts of the animal kingdom and specifically in monkeys. Further, there is evidence that biology strongly influences social and political attitudes as well. This can be found in the review of a growing literature carried out by Gary Lewis and Timothy Bates in The Psychologist, 26(3) March 2013. They point out that research in this area "has almost exclusively focused on environmental determinants of social and political sentiment," but it now seems clear "that understanding political divides will require biological as well as social explanations."

The idea that their own criticisms could be biased gets no similar recognition from women's studies advocates. There is a kind of dogmatism about much of their posturing that, of course, is often inconsistent with what they say. The assumption is that everything, every discipline, is tainted and something called the feminine side is left out. All such disciplines and especially science is so tainted that they cannot be left to the traditionalists; instead, they must be presented from an exclusively feminist angle.

As well as gender, another favourite theme is oppression. Women's studies courses never tire of fulminating about how women were and still are oppressed; this is assiduously cultivated until victimhood is turned into a cult.

As stated, social constructionism is a favourite theme: gender is socially constructed, but so are a great many things, such as knowledge, reason. Science is regarded as a social construct, as inevitably contaminated by male tendencies even if only unconscious.

An all too rare example of how the pretensions of gender studies can be exposed occurred in 2012 when the Nordic Council of Ministers (a regional intergovernmental co-operation consisting of Norway, Sweden, Finland, Denmark, and Iceland) decided to close down the NIKK Nordic Gender Institute. The NIKK had been the flagship of "Gender Theory," providing the "scientific" basis for social and educational policies that, from the 1970s onward, had transformed the Nordic countries to become the most "gender-sensitive" societies in the world.

The decision was made after the Norwegian State Television had broadcasted a television documentary in which the hopelessly unscientific character of the NIKK and its research was exposed. The whole enterprise was based on ideology, with no basis in evidence.

Adherence to facts, objectivity, and precise logical reasoning are suspect as somehow being out of step with feminine values of intuition, connectedness, closeness, and aversion to abstraction. The themes noted above—gender, social constructionism, oppression, the biased nature of science and knowledge generally—are part of the basic ideology of women's studies; they are sacrosanct and cannot be questioned. Women's studies are deeply ideological and have been compared with other fundamentalisms such as religious fundamentalism.

Is logic itself tainted, and language? As we teeter on the edge of the abyss, there is no let-up in the dogmatism. All these things have been brought into question by feminist writers.

In Words of Power: A Feminist Reading of the History of Logic, Andrea Nye gives a critique of logic itself. Nye concludes, "Logic in its final perfection is insane."

But at some point argument becomes futile in the face of such absurdities. Whatever about the ideas and beliefs they dismiss, it seems these feminists believe in the efficacy of their own writings.

Their own writings are, of course, exempt from the general doubt cast upon all else. This is typical of all relativism. They write books and expect recognition on foot of them, academic advancement. and funding.

Women's Studies and Politics

One of the most controversial aspects of women's studies is the way in which politics is inextricably woven into the classroom discussion. Academic departments normally distance themselves from political activism. In doing so, they help free the scholar from the need to demonstrate practical relevance and to preserve the precious notion of academic freedom, including freedom from political pressure. This distancing is not observed in women's studies. However, Daphne Patai, from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, has criticized this aspect of women's studies programmes, arguing that they place politics over education and that "the strategies of faculty members in these programs have included policing insensitive language, championing research methods deemed congenial to women (such as qualitative over quantitative methods), and conducting classes as if they were therapy sessions."

According to Patai, women's studies professors readily admit to the political aims of the education they offer. This accords with the slogan "the personal is political." Students in many programmes can receive academic credit for doing internships or performing community service in feminist agencies.

This view is backed up by another respected female academic: "Feminist theory guarantees that researchers will discover male bias and oppression in every civilization and time," says Mary Lefkowitz, a classics professor at Wellesley.

Women's Ways of Knowing is a widely used text in women's studies. It claims that women "have cultivated and learned to value, ways we have come to believe are powerful but have been neglected and denigrated by the dominant intellectual ethos of our time." A second claim is that educators can help women develop their own authentic voices if they emphasise connection over separation, understanding and acceptance over assessment, and collaboration over debate. Patai comments that like nearly all feminist research in this area, the authors fail to undertake comparative studies to see whether male students fall into similar patterns.

According to Patai, Women's Ways of Knowing is based on inconclusive research and draws too uncritically on the books of Noddings, Ruddick, and Gilligan. Serious flaws in these books have been repeatedly pointed out in mainstream psychology journals but are not acknowledged. She says that women's studies faculty offer the book "as proof of the superiority of women's wonderfully different and rewarding ways of knowing."

In Students at the Center, another project of women's studies programmes, feminist assessment methods are used. It explains that "feminist assessment begins with and enacts values. It does not presume to be objective in the narrow sense of the word, nor does feminist theory believe there is any such thing as a value-free 'scientific' investigation. In feminist assessment, narratives count more heavily than statistics, … and evaluation methods 'should be compatible with feminist activist beliefs' and with the aims of 'emancipatory pedagogy.'"

Karen Lehrman has attended women's studies classes in a number of institutions. Here is Lehrman writing in the Sept./Oct. 1993 issue of Mother Jones:

> Most women's studies professors seem to adhere to the following principles in formulating classes: women were and are oppressed; oppression is endemic to our patriarchal social system; men, capitalism, and Western values are responsible for women's problems. The reading material is similarly bounded in political scope (Andrea Dworkin, Catharine MacKinnon, bell hooks, Adrienne Rich, and Audre Lorde turn up a lot)….
>
> Women's studies was conceived with a political purpose—to be the intellectual arm of the women's movement—and its sense of purpose has only gotten stronger through the years. The result is that the field's narrow politics have constricted the audience for non-ideological feminism instead of widening it, and have reinforced the sexist notion that there is a women's viewpoint.

And here:

> In general, "core" women's studies courses are more overtly political and less academically rigorous than those cross-listed with a department. The syllabus of Iowa's "Introduction to Women's Studies" course declares: "As we make our collective and individual journeys during this course, we will consider how to integrate our theoretical knowledge with personal and practical action in the world." "Practicums," which typically entail working in a women's organization, are a key part of many courses, often requiring thirty or more hours of a student's time….
>
> The pressures on professors to toe the correct feminist line can be even stronger. History Professor Elizabeth Fox-Genovese says she stepped down as chair of Emory's women's studies program because of complaints > from students and faculty that she wasn't radical enough.

Lehrman continues on how women's studies has made common cause with certain other exotic studies:

> Perhaps the most troubling influence on women's studies in the past decade has been the collection of theories known as post-structuralism [sic] [akin to postmodernism], which essentially implies that all texts are arbitrary, all knowledge is biased, all standards are illegitimate, all morality is subjective. I talked to numerous women's studies professors who don't buy any of this (it's typically more popular in the humanities than in the social sciences), but nevertheless it has permeated women's studies to a significant extent, albeit in the most reductive, simplistic way….
>
> But post-structuralism is applied inconsistently in women's studies. I've yet to come across a feminist tract that "contextualizes" sexism in this country as it does in others, or acknowledges that feminism is itself a product of Western culture based on moral reasoning and the premise that some things are objectively wrong. Do feminist theorists really want the few young men who take these classes to formulate personal rationales for rape? There's a huge difference between questioning authority, truth, and knowledge and saying none of these exist, a difference between rejecting male standards and rejecting the whole concept of standards.
>
> Like post-structuralism, the concept of multiculturalism has had a deep influence on women's studies. Professors seem under a constant burden to prove that they are presenting the requisite number of books or articles by women of color or lesbians. Issues of race came up in nearly every class I sat through. I wasn't allowed to sit in on a seminar at Dartmouth on "Racism and Feminism" because of a contract made with the students that barred outside visitors.
>
> Terms like sexism, racism, and homophobia have bloated beyond all recognition, and the more politicized the campus, the more frequently they're thrown around.

Lehrman states that "Clearly the first step is for women's studies to reopen itself to internal and external criticism. The intimidation in the field is so great that I had trouble finding dissident voices willing to talk to me on the record."

The effect of all this ideology on women's studies students is summed up as follows by Lehrman:

> Unfortunately, women's studies students may not be as well equipped to see through shoddy feminist scholarship as they are through patriarchal myths and constructs. One reason may be the interdisciplinary nature of the programs, which offers students minimal grounding in any of the traditional disciplines. According to Mary Lefkowitz, women's studies majors who take her class exhibit an inability to amass factual material or remember details; instead of using evidence to support an argument, they use it as a remedy for their personal problems.

In a book review in the conservative magazine National Review, Mary Lefkowitz writes of Who Stole Feminism by Christina Hoff Sommers that "[Sommers] provides clear guidelines on how to distinguish indoctrination from education. That alone is a major service to all of us who are struggling to distinguish fact from fiction in today's troubled academic world."

The prominent writer and philosopher Christina Hoff Sommers (also author of The War Against Boys) calls most women's studies classes "unscholarly, intolerant of dissent, and full of gimmicks. In other words, they are a waste of time."

She is described as follows:

> Christina Hoff Sommers thinks of herself as an equity feminist who faults contemporary feminism for "its irrational hostility to men, its recklessness with facts and statistics, and its inability to take seriously the > possibility that the sexes are equal—but different."

Science and Women's Studies

From the very beginning, science was the nemesis of women's studies. Scientific inquiry embodied all the so-called masculine virtues that feminism most wanted to challenge—objectivity v. subjectivity, the power of reason instead of intuition, problem-solving through logical analysis and the weighing of evidence v. conflict resolution through empathy and plumbing the depths of oppression.

The key concept in all of women's studies research was gender. If academic feminists could demonstrate the gendered nature of science, it would reveal the sexist underpinnings of knowledge claims in all the disciplines.

The social constructionist view of science is: science is a set of conventions brought forth by one particular culture (our own) in one historical period; thus, it is not, as the standard view would have it, a body of knowledge and testable conjecture concerning the "real" world. It is a discourse devised by and for one specialised "interpretive community" under terms created by the complex net of social circumstance, political opinion, economic incentive, and ideological climate that constitutes the ineluctable human environment of the scientist.

According to Gross and Levitt (see below), this point of view rigorously applied leaves no ground whatsoever for distinguishing reliable knowledge from superstition.

Some of the most egregiously false comments on science by feminists, as well as by the proponents of multicultural studies, postmodernism, and many other –isms, have been systematically refuted by two scientists, Paul Gross and Norman Levitt. In their book Higher Superstition: The Academic Left and Its Quarrels with Science, they give an illuminating account of the growth of fallacious theories in US universities and how these have been allowed to grow unchallenged.

While the women's studies proponents may cast doubts on all of science (and the associated technology), it is beyond doubt they use its products daily. Do they doubt the usefulness of such things as cars and aircraft that transport them from institution to conference, the computers they use to write up and communicate their speculations?

What about modern medical treatments, drugs, and surgical operations? Are they any the less inclined to use these at a time of necessity? At a more basic level, do they accept the laws of physics and chemistry and biology?

If science is a social construct, must art and music be too? And if they reject art, poetry, and music, what is to replace them?

Below we give a few sample comments on science by some luminaries in women's studies:

- Sandra Harding has described Newton's great work Principia Mathematica as "a rape manual."
- Belgian feminist and philosopher Luce Irigaray has issues with Einstein's theory of relativity: "Is $E=Mc^2$ a sexed equation? Perhaps it is. Let us make the hypothesis that it is insofar as it privileges the speed of light over other speeds that are vitally necessary to us. What seems to me to indicate the possible sexed nature of the equation is not directly its uses by nuclear weapons, rather it is having privileged that which goes faster."

- English professor Katherine Hayles's elaboration of Luce Irigaray's portrayal of the history of hydrodynamics as distorted by males' fascination with "rigid bodies" and "linear models" and their association of femininity with fluidity was marred by a serious misunderstanding of hydrodynamics, according to philosopher of science Noretta Koertge.
- Another gem from Hayles: "The special theory of relativity lost its epistemological clarity when it was combined with quantum mechanics to form quantum field theory. By mid-century all three were played out or had undergone substantial modification." This will come as a terrible shock to real physicists.
- Harding wonders "whether there should be feminist sciences and epistemologies at all" by virtue of recent discoveries of postmodernism. Gross and Levitt: "This is, of course, the usual problem, for relativists, of truth (a problem because they would be out of a job if they allowed not only—as they always do—that there is no necessary truth in what others say, but also in what they say). The postmodernist-feminist way, then, … is to be understood as follows: 'Feminist claims should be held not as an "approximation to truth" … but as permanently partial instigators of rupture, of rents and unravelings in the dominant schemes of representation.'" How one is to pursue a career as a permanent partial instigator of rupture is, of course, a mystery.
- Gross and Levitt suggest further that the practices of the social constructionists can be turned against them. "One must scrutinize their precepts and their practices for signs that their theories are 'value-laden.' … The evidence is there … and reveals far more about the nature of the constructivist programme than that programme has ever revealed about the nature of science."

These quotes illustrate the willingness of feminists who know little or nothing about science to comment on some of the most abstruse theories. Noretta Koertge is a philosopher and historian of science and is editor of A House Built on Sand: Exposing Postmodernist Myths about Science. This is a collection of essays, many quite dense, written by prominent scientists and philosophers dealing with a very wide range of issues, including the work of some of the feminists listed above.

One cannot leave the subject of women's studies without commenting on three of its most notorious figures: Catharine MacKinnon, Andrea Dworkin, and Mary Daly, who receive a great deal of coverage. Many of their quotes are well known; they exhibit an irrational hatred of men and an antipathy to heterosexuality that they see as the lynchpin of "male dominance."

Indeed, Catharine MacKinnon and Andrea Dworkin have long argued that in a patriarchal society all heterosexual intercourse is rape, allegedly because women, as a group, are not in a strong enough social position to give meaningful consent.

A sobering reminder of what can transpire when women's studies gains a strong foothold in an institution can be seen from consideration of the Vision 2000 initiative in six universities in Massachusetts in the late 1990s. This was a document to accomplish a feminist restructuring of the university in which women's studies would become the central player. Scare tactics were used, such as: "Women face sexual violence and sexual harassment in the classroom and the workplace." Among the solutions proposed were: training in how to avoid sexual harassment is prescribed for everyone; disciplinary action taken against offending supervisors must satisfy the injured supervisee.

The curriculum was to be transformed at every level into one that is "women-friendly and culturally diverse," reflecting perspectives from scholarship on women and other historically oppressed groups. As Daphne Patai, who was in a position to witness at close range, commented, Vision 2000 aimed at nothing less than a feminist overhaul of the entire academic enterprise. During the discussion stage, feminist faculty did not hesitate to recite the usual accusations of gender bias. Worse still, the senate of Amherst was moved to endorse, if not the particulars of the document, at least its nine general principles.

Women's Studies in Ireland

Women's studies has a formidable presence in Irish universities.

University College Dublin (UCD) offers undergraduate and postgraduate courses, the classes are politically and socially relevant, and claims that UCD Women's Studies Centre is the hub for UCD's Feminist and Gender Studies Network, which comprises over 50 faculty.

According to a Sunday Times article of February 7, 2010:

> [National University of Ireland,] Galway and the University of Limerick also carry BA and master's level qualifications in this field, while women's studies forms a crucial part of humanities degrees across the entire third-level system.
>
> The content of women's studies courses changes to address issues in society. Modules include sexual and domestic violence, abortion rights and the law, women in politics, women in the workplace, motherhood, sex trafficking and prostitution.
>
> Many graduates of gender and women's studies go on to teach at master's and PhD level, while others move on to work in nongovernmental organisations, government agencies, state bodies and community development roles. Some work with the National Women's Council, and others design and critique policies on gender.

All this underscores the openly political nature of the whole enterprise and the seamless connection with feminist groups. Is there any other area where the political commitment is so openly flaunted and with such immunity to challenge?

In addition to the Global Women's Studies programme at National University of Ireland, Galway (NUIG), committed to the development of undergraduate and postgraduate education, it has a Global Women's Studies Research Cluster. The cluster has played a leading role in the establishment of the NUIG/University of Limerick research network Gender ARC (Advanced Research Consortium on Gender, Culture and the Knowledge Society). This is committed to the development of gender–focused research across a range of disciplines.

Trinity College Dublin (TCD) has a Centre for Gender and Women's Studies. The redundancy in the title simply underlines the naked bias. It appears to be confined to postgraduate degrees. This is also true of women's studies at UCC.

It goes without saying that the great majority of staff in all these courses are women, another affront to the principle of equality they are so constantly invoking.

In relation to the influence of feminist criticism, a final comment is apposite: one NUI English professor has commented that "In our discussion of Paradise Lost the students were very familiar with feminist criticism of it but I take leave to doubt that many of them had read some or even any of Milton's masterpiece."

For much of the material above, I have relied on the book Professing Feminism: Education and Indoctrination in Women's Studies by Daphne Patai and Noretta Koertge. For an extensive compilation of modern French philosophers' abuses of mathematics and physics, see Alan Sokal and Jean Bricmont's Intellectual Impostures (London Profile Books, 1998). In addition to focusing on many leading lights in postmodernism, there are chapters on the prominent feminists Julia Kristeva and Luce Irigaray.

For the discussion and video on the Nordic Gender Institute, see:
http://www.turtlebayandbeyond.org/2012/homosexuality/nordic-countries-defund-gender-ideology/ or http://www.menshumanrightsireland.org/forum/index.php?topic=52.msg220#msg220

Original article can be found here: http://www.menshumanrightsireland.org/index.php?n=87

The audacity to criticize Hope

Ty Henry · 27 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sports media figures break the silence on women's domestic violence.

If there's one thing writers hate, it's when another writer steals their thunder.

Indeed, last week, award-winning USA Today sports columnist Christine Brennan stole mine with this piece on the Hope Solo fallout. That led to a panel discussion on ESPN's Around the Horn, in which all four panelists agreed with Brennan.

http://espn.go.com/espnradio/play?id=11390184 (start around 13-minute mark).

And I could not have been happier. I've thrown enough thunderbolts, and don't have Zeus' inexhaustible supply of them.

For those of you who are unaware, Hope Solo is the goalie for the Seattle Reign Women's Football Club. She is better known as the goalkeeper emeritus for the US Women's National Soccer Team.

This past spring, Solo was arrested for domestic violence, alleged to have gotten into a scuffle at her sister's home that resulted in the injuries to her sister and, more alarmingly, her 17-year-old nephew, the son of said sister. Solo's trial is set for November 4.

But Solo was on her way to breaking the record for most shutouts by a goalie in international competition for the exalted national team.

> "We are aware that Hope is handling a personal situation at the moment," Neil Buethe, US Soccer director of communications told USA Today in an email.
>
> "At the same time, she has an opportunity to set a significant record that speaks to her hard work and dedication over the years with the National Team. While considering all factors involved, we believe that we should recognize that in the proper way."

In other words, can't let some little inconvenience as beating a child get in the way of celebrating an upcoming milestone. Suspension, by either her club or national team? Muted celebration in respect for victims of family violence, BAH! There was even the obligatory white knighting from ESPNW.

But a funny thing happened on the way to another Pass for a Prominent Woman.

Brennan, among many others I've criticized before, spoke up. Not only that, she and others, in a nod to Confucianism, had the temerity to call the alleged acts by their proper name—domestic violence. The beginning of wisdom, indeed.

Brennan did not mince words in calling US Soccer to the carpet.

> So what kind of message does this send to the millions of girls and women the U.S. national team has empowered and inspired over the past couple of decades? That alleged domestic violence is somehow different and less alarming when the alleged abuser is a woman?

Brennan has for decades been a dedicated advocate for women in sport, with views I share on the greater good Title IX has conferred as applied to sport. For her to breach the dike in the damn of silence that has been sports media on women's violence, from Fred Lane to Elin Woods to Chamique Holdsclaw, in the interest of basic fairness and decency toward men and boys is a watershed moment. Likewise, the panelists on Around the Horn are also to be applauded by name: Kevin Blackistone, Bomani Jones, Jackie MacMullan, and JA Adande.

The breach is only a trickle at this point. Let's hope it soon floods the valley.

Bow down, bitches: Feminists go gaga over Beyoncé; don't get the joke

August Løvenskiolds · 27 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

By Tuesday, August 26, 2014, Beyoncé's recent performance at Sunday night's MTV Video Music Awards was all the rage in the feminist echo chambers. August 26, by the way, is both Women's Equality Day and National Dog Day, and this coincidence captures quite nicely the shoe-chewing that Beyoncé just gave to feminism.

In the online journal Slate, Amanda Marcotte lauded Beyoncé in near-orgasmic tones:

> Rush Limbaugh's claim that feminism exists "to allow ugly women access to society" is going to be a harder sell now that Beyoncé stood in the dark in front of the glowing "Feminist" sign at Sunday night's MTV Video Music Awards….
>
> Which is why Beyoncé's statement—a political statement, really—is so meaningful. Having her husband and daughter up onstage was a nice touch, too. Having dismantled the idea that feminists are just ugly wannabes during her performance, she might as well clean house by smashing the notion that feminists hate men or are somehow not maternal….
>
> The VMAs were a testament to how much the public is ready to hear from women, and increasingly on women's own terms. Whether or not you liked their performances, it was impossible not to notice that Nicki Minaj, Ariana Grande, Taylor Swift, Charli XCX, and, of course, Beyoncé, ruled the night.

Like Marcotte, the Guardian's male-tear-bathing Jessica Valenti almost swooned, but unlike Marcotte, Valenti then seemed to catch herself. What might be giving her pause, one might wonder?

> The zeitgeist is irrefutably feminist: its name literally in bright lights.
>
> As feminism's star has ascended, so has the number of celebrities willing to lend their name to the movement. Feminism is no longer "the f-word", it's the realm of cool kids: Beyoncé, Lena Dunham, Amy Poehler, Kerry Washington and Joseph Gordon-Levitt all call themselves feminists. And just this week, after years of equivocating, Taylor Swift came out as a feminist….
>
> What I'd love to see is this new crop of celebrity feminists strongly coming out in support of social justice issues: using their newfound (or quiet but long-standing) politics to create change influenced by that gender justice lens….
>
> If celebrities want to cement their feminist bonafides [sic], they should educate themselves on the work that's already been done and move forward with the intention of creating change, not just good PR. Because as exciting as it can be to see our best-known celebs talking about feminism, walking the walk is a lot more interesting.
>
> So let Beyoncé lead the way with her hat tips to Adichie and tangible support of gender justice.
>
> Obviously, feminism can't hang its hat on celebrity endorsements – it's a movement for social and political change, not a popularity contest.

In Huffpo Canada, Joshua Ostroff's article "Beyonce's Feminist Silhouette At VMAs Acts As Rebuke To Women Against Feminism" effused:

> This year it was [sic] it was the photo above of Beyonce silhouetted against a single all-caps word: FEMINIST…. And to make sure we remembered that she is one, she posed long enough for that instantly iconic image to speak more than a thousand words to the young women and men watching from home.

Elizabeth Plank at Mic also waxed positive:

> Although award shows usually make feminists cringe, this year's VMAs gave us hope. And it wasn't just Beyoncé, last night's award show was all about the ladies, so much so that New York magazine is (ironically) asking if there was a feminist conspiracy. As Eliana Dockterman at TIME points out, "This year's VMAs were all about empowered women," a far cry from last year's Robin Thicke and Miley Cyrus creeptastic performance that had us talking about the lack of role models for young teenagers watching.

Daisy Wyatt at the Independent was one of the few writers to note the discomfort some were having with Beyoncé:

> Many took to Twitter to praise Beyoncé for promoting feminism through popular culture and for helping to break down the negative stigma surrounding the word.
>
> However, others were concerned that the singer's version of feminism appeared to have been interpreted as overt objectification, pointing to lyrics such as "Bow Down Bitches" and her sexually provocative dancing.

Although some came close, they all missed the joke.

Almost all feminism is based on some variant of patriarchy theory—the idea that men, both historically and present-day, oppress women. Feminism depends on this victim narrative as the source of its moral suasion—it is the very fount of all feminist power. Every happy, successful woman, merely by existing, undermines this feminist narrative, and feminists historically rip down members of their ilk who sell out to the patriarchy by succeeding—success in a man's world is a crime feminists cannot tolerate because it threatens their movement's foundation.

A glowing sign proclaiming "FEMINISM" behind the silhouette of a wealthy, attractive woman sans pants is a symbol of female dominance, not the wretched domestication feminists whine about. Symbols of overt power, while briefly inspiring, are ephemeral and quickly turn into objects of scorn and derision, just as Duke lacrosse players were undone by a false rape accusation by a future killer.

Even Beyoncé's sister Solange's avoidance of jail for assaulting Beyoncé's husband, Jay Z, is another proof that the feminist narrative is obsolete and women are the actual and unaccountable task-masters of the world.

The women of #WomenAgainstFeminism reject the victim narrative of feminism, and without realizing it yet, every feminist who was thrilled by Beyoncé's showboating is inadvertently admitting that they think feminism is bullshit too.

The lines really are blurred, don't you know.

A prayer for Joe Bob

AVfM Video Source · 27 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A blast from the past from the YouTube channel you should be subscribed to.

Still as relevant today as ever, even if “The Happy Misogynist” no longer exists.

Proposed: How a smaller, less intrusive government would forward the interests of men

Jeb Kinnison · 28 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is also available in Spanish and Romanian.

In response to several articles here on A Voice for Men and elsewhere about libertarians and men's rights, I'm prompted to write about the history of government thought control and the means of restraining it by constitutional limitations on its powers. Western governments are more and more intrusive on private decisions, and modern feminists strongly influence their actions and propaganda from their positions in academia, government, and non-profits. Restricting government's powers to interfere in private decisions and control the media message would give private personal decisions more room, and men would benefit.

Feminism started out with a quest for equity in job opportunities, voting, and freedom to choose. This initial agenda ("equity feminism") won a lot of support from fair-minded men and women, though even then there was a strong element of gynocentrism in the movement.

By choosing to notice only the bad things that happen to women in our own time as well as other cultures and times, modern feminists have failed to work for truly equal treatment of men and women. Instead of seeing individuals and their rights as important, modern feminists and other social justice warriors believe that only a relentless focus on oppression of some categories of individuals by others is the key to righteousness, and their collectivist view of group rights leaves little space for sympathy for anyone who cannot claim membership in an oppressed class. They believe as a religious cult would believe that if only they explain their beliefs hard enough to the unenlightened, the scales will fall from their eyes and goodness will triumph. No amount of victory in achieving their goals would ever be enough for them to end their battles, since new groups of the wicked can always be identified to battle against; the battle itself nourishes their egos and so it must continue. If all their enemies have been vanquished, villainy is defined down to catch a new class of microvillains whose microagressions and incorrect thoughts must be corrected.

Note that it is no longer enough that "victim" classes be treated equally by government and in employment and public accommodations—theirs is now a push for equal outcomes to overcome private rights of association and contract, so women (or men!) who desire to work less or take out more time for family would not be allowed to bargain for those conditions of employment by asking for less pay for less work. Implicitly, all employees with the same job title and duties must be paid the same regardless of their individual contributions or their own desires for a lesser degree of commitment to the business.

Equal opportunity does not imply there should be equal outcomes because diversity of interests and abilities between individuals and the sexes means there will be unequal interest in career options that require 60 hours a week of work, intense focus on mechanical problems, manual labor, or hazardous conditions. Similarly, you will not get or expect equal interest in the highly social, helping professions that on average women appear to prefer. Efforts to force equal employment in every company by race, sex, age, or other class are simply doomed—any company that balanced its workforce to match these desiderata would find themselves forced to hire less productive employees, crippling them against their competition not so constrained. Jesse Jackson has called for federal pressure on high-tech firms to require equal employment outcomes in tech jobs. When you talk to a social justice warrior about this, you get an answer remarkably similar to what socialists said in the 1980s when you asked how any country could level outcomes ("to each according to his needs") without the productive escaping to another country to achieve what they could without the shackles: "Well, that's why they had to build the Berlin Wall." To stop the defection of those who want to be free to follow their own preferences, this preferred system must be extended everywhere or somehow escape must be controlled and punished by, say, walls, machine guns, and gulags.

So what we have is a small but highly influential ideological group, educated, generally well off, and embedded in academia, media, government, and non-profit work throughout the United States. They continually agitate for larger and more intrusive government that would employ more of their kind, the better to regulate away all imperfect thought and behavior. Business and profit-making enterprise is viewed as suspect because it is partly beyond their political control, so efforts to take control of decisions inside businesses continue, and the expanding HR departments, lobbyist payments, and political contributions of businesses reflect the need to pay for protection against this bureaucratic tendency. Similarly, hospitals and schools have responded to the increasing regulation and government funding of their activities by hiring many more high-paid administrators while shorting the low-level staff who actually do the work because they must do so to get along in an increasingly bureaucratized, legalized, and centrally controlled environment. This employment of large numbers of high-paid staff who don't directly produce anything of value for customers has greatly increased the cost of domestic services like health care and education, and the drag on Western economies has brought economic growth to a halt in many places.

We have seen such bureaucracies before—the churches that for centuries held both political and moral authority over weak governments in Europe attempted to regulate thought and action to increase their own power. Wrangling over state religion and power led to incessant warfare. The solution to the problem of state interference in private thought and belief was finally found in the Enlightenment idea of separation of church and state. As Thomas Jefferson wrote in his letter to the Danbury Baptist Association in 1802:

> Believing with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between Man & his God, that he owes account to none other for his faith or his worship, that the legitimate powers of government reach actions only, & not opinions, I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should 'make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof,' thus building a wall of separation between Church and State.

The early history of the colonies that later became the United States is instructive. Many of the colonies had an established church (the Massachusetts Bay colony notoriously drove out religious dissidents and hanged the Quaker Mary Dyer on Boston Common in 1660) and wished to maintain their government support for a specific religion even as the Enlightenment took hold, but it became clear that any government uniting the colonies would have to take a neutral stance toward religion that enforced a set of human rights (constraints on government action on individual thought and choice) to allow them all to co-exist peacefully. The great flaw of this compact, its political tolerance of slavery and second-class citizenship for slaves, was only corrected by the upheaval of the Civil War, which cemented the primacy of the federal government and its enforcement of the ideal of individual rights within the states.

Albion's Seed: Four British Folkways in America[image] by David Hackett Fischer is an eye-opening look at the four founding British cultures of colonial America and how each of them continues to influence present-day political preferences and power struggles. Other immigrant cultures (German, Irish, Scandinavian, etc.) were also influential but tended to join with one of the four founding cultures that closely represented their views, resulting in the welter of memes of political belief now contending for influence.

In New England, the Puritans from East Anglia settled between 1629 and 1640, the years immediately preceding the English Civil War in which Oliver Cromwell and the Puritan army defeated and beheaded King Charles I. Their colony started with a rigid, established church that was intolerant of free thought.

In Virginia, settlers consisted of vanquished supporters of King Charles and the established (Anglican) Church of England, primarily from the south and west of England. They tended to be more relaxed about religion and more business- and trade-oriented.

Quakers then arrived in the Delaware Valley (Philadelphia area) from the English midlands (and their religious kin from various German sects) between 1675 and 1715. Their way was strongly religious and pacifist but recognized the importance of freedom of conscience.

The good coastal lands having been occupied, the Scotch-Irish—referring collectively to immigrants from the north of England, lowland Scotland, and Ulster—settled the Appalachian hill country from 1717 to 1775. Scrappy and suspicious of any effort to tax and control by hated distant governments, their attitude of automatic resistance is still visible in today's politics, with Sarah Palin an example of the type.

Only a government that respected and mediated the difference between these founding cultures could work for a larger United States.

As time has gone on, these Enlightenment understandings have been eroded, and "Americanism" (the practice of tolerance and "minding your own business," belief in progress, self-sufficiency, and freedom of thought for all citizens regardless of sex, race, wealth, or heritage) is less practiced. Our social justice warriors value freedom of speech and thought but only for approved speech and thought; heretical ideas are to be stamped out by denying speech and punishing the heretics. It is no longer surprising to hear a college activist suggest that certain kinds of speech be forbidden by law.

There are signs that popular culture has taken note of the tendency toward totalitarianism and government propaganda from the social justice warriors. Dystopian YA novels like The Hunger Games show a population repressed and manipulated by a media-controlling central government. The movie version of the novel The Giver takes some shots at this mindset; a thoughtful review of the movie version in The Atlantic "What Is the Price of Perfect Equality?" gets at its politics:

> Engels saw the institutions of family and private property as deeply entwined. Part of Engels' objection to the institution of the family was that it involved a "progressive narrowing of the circle, originally embracing the whole tribe, within which the two sexes have a common conjugal relation." Marxism's benevolent tendencies are swallowed up by concern and preference for one's immediate family, which becomes the unit of basic inequality…. Commerce and trade, it turns out, are just as dependent on the passions as the passions are dependent on commerce and trade in The Giver. The true nightmare of a dystopian world is that all of these things are interconnected, and that by losing one or the other, by engineering it away socially or medically, nightmarish unintended consequences will ensue.

The solution to this contention over social preferences and culture is analogous to the separation of church and state. To accommodate all religious and social beliefs in a framework of law and justice that respects all such beliefs that can be consistent with universal human rights, a government has to be prohibited from interfering when those beliefs are practiced without harming an individual's rights. We might call this generalized idea "Separation of Culture and Government."

While the modern feminists would wish to eliminate such current cultural communities as Mormonism, ultra-orthodox Judaism, socially conservative evangelical Christians, conservative Catholicism, and unreformed Islam from the scene, a bargain must be struck to prevent further strife: the law will not take a position on any social belief—it will not take sides for or against social conservatives or social justice warriors. Any individual is free to practice their beliefs with other like-minded individuals in voluntary association. Attempts to bring the force of the law to bear on changing social mores and behaviors that are not in violation of individual rights would be prevented. The law of marriage would revert to the law of contract, with social conservatives free to enter into perpetual marriage contracts with features like dowry, alimony, and discriminatory child custody and support arrangements, while others would be free to bind themselves to marriages that maintain individual property and call for equal arrangements for child custody, with no alimony implied unless provided for by contract. No group could punish an individual member for behavior contrary to its beliefs except by private action: social sanctions, excommunication, and shunning. Lobbying the central government to adopt your preferred social arrangements by law would, ideally, occupy far less time and attention in national politics as such efforts were struck down by the courts.

Currently, modern feminists have won considerable power to use government support and propaganda to free women of some of the obligations of the patriarchal culture they wanted to replace. Not only to correct injustices in law and employment, but also to increase government spending and regulation to provide support that women formerly might have had to negotiate and serve a partner or employer to obtain. Both ever-expanding social welfare states and the failed Communist states reduced individual accountability and replaced allegiance to family and employer with allegiance to the state's goals, and that is the model modern feminists prefer and are now working toward in the US.

Under such a controlling regime, there is far less reward for striving. Hard work is replaced by contentious committee meetings and political struggles for pieces of a shrinking pie. The increasing numbers of academics, government workers, and non-profit workers operate detached from practical considerations of serving customers. It becomes easier to slack off, and so more people slack off. The endpoint occurs when the productive have fled or chosen more leisure over work, and the economy collapses after years of stagnation. In the family sphere, we already see the endpoint in entire communities where single mothers struggle to raise children without benefit of a father to help and guide, young men are either in prison or involved in gangs, and intact families with bourgeois values are forced to move away. Women are taught that they are victims of oppressive males, and the enlarged state will take their side in any disputes and support them directly if they have children. What had been a safety net for people in tragic circumstances became a way of life for millions.

Men and women who don't want to take the role offered them in the culture they grew up in have the choice of not doing so or bucking their culture to find a partner who more closely reflects their chosen values—this is America, where you can be who you want to be! But under a government that micromanages social arrangements and decides family custody and support decisions based on "victim feminism," men are never safe from rape accusations, your children can be taken away from you easily, and the population of women one might productively partner with has been programmed to see themselves as victims entitled to use government to win any disputes that might come up. If you are hardworking and successful on your own, you are taxed heavily to support other men's children and fund the politically correct bureaucrats who harass your business. This thumb on the scale of justice makes marriage a negative-sum game for many men (especially the poor and disadvantaged), and the elevation of bureaucrats and academics above workers in the private sphere damages men's career prospects, unless of course they adopt the conformist ideology.

The limited government crowd doesn't want no government. It is generally recognized that externalities and free-rider problems can only be handled by a government; defense, civil justice and policing, pollution regulations, and public health regulation (quarantines, vaccination requirements, etc.) are areas that can only be handled by a monopoly state. But political decision-making is a blunt and inefficient mechanism, and those matters that can be handled by private business and voluntary social organizations should be, both for efficiency and freedom of choice. The libertarian and smaller government crowd wants a government that concentrates on effectively and efficiently handling matters only it can handle well. The expansion of the government sphere at the expense of the private sphere is analogous to Microsoft's destruction of most competitive software applications companies in the 1980s: using its near-monopoly in operating systems and the enormous profits to enter the applications market, marketing its mediocre applications, and funding them when any normal company would have given up. Eventually, competitors were worn out and stopped funding new development; Office products took over, ending most of the progress in the field for a decade. Using the power to tax and the lack of any mechanism to disband failed government programs, mediocre government-funded services (like monopoly elementary and secondary education) crowded out the privately funded community schools, and after a century of increasingly centralized control, local parental control of schools and their curricula has almost vanished. Education is now heavily influenced by modern feminists, and children are indoctrinated in feminist and anti-masculine ideas.

It took generations for feminists and progressives to capture the commanding heights of government, media, education, and non-profit foundations. From their perches they have directed a campaign to change the culture and enlarge the state, and they have won. Federal government authority has expanded to directing university handling of rape allegations and defunding men's sports teams under Title IX. Meanwhile, antiquated family law (as in, for example, Massachusetts) remains unreformed, designed for an era in which the woman was assumed to be a fragile flower needing protection and forever a ward of her husband even after no-fault divorce.

Some of these problems of feminist excess are now getting more mainstream attention, but the best solution is the libertarian-ish one of limited government. Both major US parties are flirting with libertarian ideas like an end to the War on Drugs and government surveillance excesses, but the bureaucratic underbrush that limits freedom the most has been a part of our lives for a long time, and few see how damaging it is becoming. State-by-state reform of divorce and alimony laws is happening but slowly.

Few candidates for office believe voters will support a pledge to do less. Efforts to reduce bureaucratic and centralized control of people's lives have been politically difficult, until perhaps now when the incompetence and waste of large government projects has become more obvious. While there is a temptation for M(H)RAs to join feminists in playing the victim card ("Men are victims too! Help us!"), men don't need special programs to regain fairness; they need a government that stops interfering and lets organic social relations between men and women resume a more natural course.

Feature image by Ludovic Bertron

Starz's "Outlander": Confused feminists want to know...

August Løvenskiolds · 28 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In The Atlantic online magazine, no fewer than three feminist women writers attempted to review and comment on the new Starz network series, Outlander. The resulting jumble of feminist gibberish—"Outlander: False Feminism?"—reached lots of confusions but few conclusions.

Before we get into all that, a quick summary of the premise of the series: A few months after the end of the Second World War, Claire Beauchamp Randall, a war nurse/botanist, and her husband, Frank Randall, a director of military espionage/history buff, are reunited for their second honeymoon after five years of separation (with a few intermittent visits). They have a warm but proper, loyal, if staid marriage and are considering again working to start a family.

While on an autumn holiday (at Samhain/Halloween) in the Scottish Highlands and after a couple of subdued erotic interludes, Claire observes a pagan ritual and later explores the foliage of the pagan shrine where she is inexplicably transported back in time (but not in space) to the mid-18th century. There she flops into the middle of a military conflict between Scottish rebels and British Redcoats, led by her husband's direct paternal ancestor Jonathan "Black Jack" Randall. Helping her fend off the rapey advances of both her great-great-greatish father-in-law and the Scottish rebels is Jamie "MacTavish" Frasier, a rakish Scottish lout with a chivalrous bent and a mysterious past. Poor Jamie is oft-injured with dislocations, gunshot wounds, and various lacerations and bruises and so benefits greatly from the learned and botanical ministrations of Not-(Yet)-a-Wet-Nurse Claire.

Passion begins to bloom between Claire and Jamie, but Claire is confused by both her temporal displacement and her loyalty to her lukewarm husband, Frank.

But Claire is a lot less confused than the feminist Atlantic writers who tried to grasp her story.

Julie Beck opens the taco fest by downplaying any overt feminist themes in the show, noting that:

> Claire is the sort of female character Game of Thrones and so many other fantasy stories lack. (Not to mention so many stories of all genres.) She's strong, but not in the lazy way "strong female characters" are often written, when a writer takes a typical macho action hero, and gives the character another X chromosome. She owns her sexuality, but isn't sexualized. She's smart, caring, and has some creative swears. ("Jesus H. Roosevelt Christ!")
>
> But going into the show, I worry that too much pressure is being put on it to blaze the way for female-driven fantasy, and it could prove too much to live up to. I worry the burden on Claire to be all these many different things could flatten her and leave her two-dimensional, especially because TV doesn't lend itself well to inner monologue. (So far the show has gone heavy on the voiceover, which kind of bums me out.)

Beck's worry about how you portray Claire as a feminist hero who is both manly and womanly is a reasonable concern—make her too feminine and the feminists rage, and make her too masculine and they also rage. This is the internal contradiction of feminism: an ideology that is open to all "choices" is also an unanchored, undisciplined stew of unfocused conflict where the only possible point is the drama-queen melodramatic emphasis on perpetual conflict itself.

Olga Khazan is similarly confused:

> Claire does seem extremely progressive, and that's actually pretty historically accurate. Right after World War II, women had just taken on all of these traditionally male roles, and so you had this slight feminist surge for a few years. However, I do worry that she's maybe a little too—dare I say—pushy…. Are we headed toward Fifty Shades of Plaid? Is that a good thing?

Feminist Khazan's unease with Claire's successes, both in the years 1946 and 1743, reflects feminism's other internal contradiction of touting the supposedly ongoing oppression of women while erasing the women who have thrived through the ages despite—or perhaps, because of—their troubles.

Emma Green's befuddlement is both carnal and oblivious:

> To be honest, I'd be totally down with Fifty Shades of Plaid—so far, this series hasn't had enough classy, feminist-friendly smut. Fine, fine, the male romantic lead has a recently dislocated shoulder, gunshot wound, and bruised face, but he can man up: The ladies are waiting…. And of course, there's the much-ballyhooed oral sex, which a fully clothed Claire gratefully receives from her WWII-life husband inside a rotting Scottish castle in episode one.

What Green misses, tellingly, is that the dialogue and action make it clear that Claire is NOT "fully clothed"—she has ventured into the castle sans knickers/panties, in what the kids nowadays refer to as "going commando." Green's failure to note the details of this sexual interlude illustrates the slutty/innocence dichotomy of feminism—Green's writing flaunts her own supposedly slutty desires, but she can't even take the care to note accurately what actually transpires between a loving couple in a sex scene. Green's feigned sexual sauciness is as false as her feminist ideology.

But all three women seem to wrestle with the issue of the seductiveness of traditional gender roles and the rough men in them:

Julie: I'm having a hard time navigating this show's gender portrayals. On one hand, okay, I get it. The 18th century was not a great time to be a woman…. We are edging close to the uncomfortable territory of "feminist woman realizes what she's really wanted all along is a traditional man to love and protect her."

Emma: For relatively liberated feminists, though, it's a little … sexy. It's transgressive. It's a small way of reclaiming the patriarchy for ourselves.

Olga: That said, I'd be interested to see some characters who break free of the dichotomy of power that we've seen so far—the women use their wiles, and the men use their brawn. Although I did love that one of Claire's missteps was getting too drunk at dinner and oversharing. The worst.

Oh, the Gynocentrism

This love it/hate it split and the supposed confusion and conflict between chivalry and feminism is resolved quite smoothly when you grasp that Outlander is based on the worship of womanhood—gynocentrism—the primacy, security, and pedestalization of women by both feminism and chivalry.

The conflict between sexual attraction vs. feminist misandry is captured in one of the most feminist-derided images on the Women Against Feminism tumblr:

[image]

The card reads "I don't need feminism because I love masculine men like Christian Grey"—Grey being a character in the women's erotic sensation Fifty Shades of Grey, invoked as "Fifty Shades of Plaid" above. Feminists were happy to lambaste the woman in that image as foolish even as they wrestle with, and obscure, the same sexual urges our Grey fan was honest about.

My dear Franklin Delano Christ, do they not teach "metaphor" to feminists in liberal arts any more?

Although "blood-as-signifier" is also significant, both the foreshadowing and overarching metaphor in the opening episode of Outlander, entitled "Sassenach" (which means, unsurprisingly, "Outlander"), is "the vessel" as a traditional representation of womanhood. Both Claire and the author of Outlander are obsessed with vessels of all sorts—an opening scene introduces Claire's fascination with vases—and in the voiceover she says she has always wanted to own a vase of her own. We see the image of this same blue vase—a melancholy womb?—reiterated in the first few scenes, intercut with images of a crystal water pitcher; a spurting, massive leg wound that covers Claire in blood; a champagne bottle from which Claire quaffs a third; tea pots and cups used to divine Claire's future; Scotch tumblers sipped before Claire's first nude sex scene; and even Claire herself as the human vessel, beneficiary of cunnilingus in the ruins of a castle-as-vessel.

The women in the nighttime pagan ritual carry torches that resemble vases lofted on sticks, and even the phallic stones of the pagan temple enclose a negative space of the vessel, like a band of neolithic rapists surrounding their prey. It is from this temple that Claire-the-vessel returns to the past, so that her vessel may be filled—but with what?

Sometimes the vessel of womanhood will carry ichor that feminists will drink, and sometimes it will poison them. Feminists are bewildered, bemused, enchanted, and ultimately disenchanted by the vessel because they cannot control it or even understand it. Their narcissistic demands try to subdue the vessel, but the vessel does not break—the feminists do.

And now that womanhood is openly defying feminism, feminists are beginning to experience a world that is starting to laugh at their irrelevance to everything. Poor little girls—you almost feel sorry for them. Almost.

Damseling for dollars. Anita Sarkeesian scores again

Paul Elam · 28 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Anita Sarkeesian is at it again. With the damseling, I mean.

According to a report at thejournal.ie, the "pop culture critic" was forced to leave her home in fear for her life after getting some nastytweets™ directed at her on the social media site Twitter.

And indeed it was some really nasty shit that got flung in her direction. Some moron tweeted, among other things, "I'll drink your blood out of your cunt after I rip it open." That was just one tweet. There were more, mostly from the same guy, I think.

Excuse me if I don't pick up a pitchfork and torch and lead a mob to seek justice on her behalf.

Actually, excuse me if I yawn and don't give a shit.

Look, if anyone wants to freak out on Anita's behalf, please feel free. And send her some more money.

Sucker.

Sarkeesian has been "working" on a series of videos about sexism in video games. Her shtick is to sift through a couple of billion tons of simulated male-on-male carnage that dominates the gaming landscape, cherry-picking a few items of virtual female cranium-crushing, (stealing some graphics along the way) and claiming that gaming and gaming culture is all about the hatred of women.

Her arguments are poorly articulated, boring, constructed like slop, highly biased, and completely, excruciatingly stupid.

Mind you, that is not saying Sarkeesian is stupid. She isn't. It is just that for her purposes a weak idea and a YouTube account is all she needs to make a living.

She operates by making young, sometimes immature gamers furious — publicly attacking their culture and pastimes. No better way to do that than to lie about them and the things they value.

This invariably leads to some barely pubescent dimwits with Twitter accounts — and no internal controls – to give her exactly what she wants.

To be threatened.

As everyone in the feminist, men's rights, and gaming communities knows, she has already cashed in on those threats big time.

In June 2012, Sarkeesian launched a Kickstarter seeking $6,000.00 to do a video project on gaming tropes being misogynistic, like everything else under the feminist sun.

Some pinheads reacted by making some rank posts on YouTube and other places. After swooning a couple of times, Sarkeesian waved said comments around on the Internet, damseled the living shit out of herself, swooned again, and poof, Anita cashed in on a cool 158K in donations from fellow feminists and white knights. Over a thousand people donated after hearing of her "plight."

Personally, I am jealous. I have had half the major media in a couple of countries disingenuously and maliciously demonize me. Even after forcing some retractions I bet I got more threats than Sarkeesian.

My reward? Jack shit.

Maybe it was because I didn't swoon hard enough or treat the threats like they were tickets to Disneyworld.

Or maybe it was just that I don't have a vagina and the sociopathic acumen to be profitably distressed and empowered at the same time.

And that's the deal here, folks. I am not saying that Sarkeesian got what was coming to her. I am saying that Sarkeesian got exactly what she has counted on all along. That's her meal ticket.

She is, quite brilliantly I might add, shaping her public image into that of a heroic woman, standing against the forces of dark misogyny that we know inhabits the underworld of gaming forums like legions of Orcs.

She is paying the price for that heroism, too, 140 brutal, seething, woman-hating characters at a time.

Right smack in the middle of her fucking wheelhouse.

Call Sarkeesian whatever you want, but don't call her stupid. This woman plays the victim card so well she makes Rebecca Watson look like War Machine.

I think I am correct in assuming there is some cha-ching going down in her PayPal account right about now. And there will be some more gash-cash for other members of the sisterhood who pen their outrage over this worse-than-death-almost-as-bad-as-rape event, demanding that someone, preferably the state, take over the Internet and make it safer for lying, feminist con artists.

And as I look around me these days, it might just happen.

Watch out women, porno will steal your soul!

Dr. David Ley · 29 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Now, women are being told that their use of erotica and pornography is increasingly tainted by the dangerous scourge of pornography addiction. In this recent article at the Washington Times, some of the worst lies and half-truths about sex addiction surface again, now in an article that seems calculated to drive women to fear their sexuality, and fear the dangerous effects of a dirty "pop-up" picture on the Internet.

The article cites sociology and women's studies professor, Mary Ann Layden, who makes some wildly unsubstantiated claims: "The more pornography women use, the more likely they are to be victims of non-consensual sex." Wow, this is a staggering statement, and a frightening insight into the rebirth of the "blame the victim" argument against rape. How, exactly, could this work? A woman gets too into pornography, and stops being very selective in her social and sexual activities, and ends up getting raped? Excuse me? This is an awful statement. So a female victim testifying against her assailant is going to be asked about that time she downloaded a dirty movie to watch? And that has what to do with the immoral, narcissistic, selfish and angry acts of the man who violated her rights? The only way this has any kernel of truth is that highly sexual women are more likely to report use of pornography. Highly sexual women are also likely to report greater numbers of partners, and somewhat higher risk of an incident of sexual abuse or rape, possibly as a result of situations of date rape. But it's not the pornography, and it's not even the women's sexuality. It's the act of a person who violates the rights of another.

This is just more of the anti-sex version of feminism, suggesting that the only way women can be safe from men is to keep their sexuality locked up tight as a drum in that neat little box society gives women. Sorry, it didn't work for Pandora. It won't work today.

Layden goes on to say: "The earlier the male starts using pornography, the more likely they are to be the perpetrators of non-consensual sex." Also a staggering misstatement of large amounts of research, all of which were unable, despite strong moral and political intent, to find ANY link between pornography use and male violence against women. Layden is just parroting those ludicrous claims made by Ted Bundy to that epitome of careful research, James Dobson, that pornography use made him do it, and that children should be protected from pornography. Absolutely no careful research truly supports these claims. In fact, in countries and regions where pornography is readily available, there are actually lower rates of rape and child sexual abuse.

The article goes on with its wild allegations and mishmash of untestable theories and bad research. It suggests that pornography addiction is created through an object-relations process, whereby a person ejaculating to pornography (so you're okay so long as you don't actually come?) creates an unshakeable link between sexual desire and explicit images. It also suggests that exposure to pornography at an early age somehow alters one's brain development, creating a porn-addicted brain. (At least the commercials could be recycled – "This is your brain, this is your brain on porn – crack of the egg, sizzle, sizzle…")

The Meese Commission's report, and their struggle to separate the morality of sexuality, from the science of sexual research serves as a warning sign for the decades since. The dialogue about sexual research and [image]pornography's effects has become as convoluted and polarized as the Supreme Court's view of obscenity – "I may not be able to define it, but I know when I see it." Just because science and research doesn't show that pornography is dangerous, doesn't mean it isn't. The arguments against pornography are moralistic and value-driven arguments. That doesn't mean they're wrong, or even that I necessarily disagree with them. But, moral arguments "should" remain in the realms of "shoulds" and "shouldn'ts." When moral arguments attempt to step into the world of scientific and medical predictions, they inevitably weaken themselves and confuse the issues. When moral arguments attempt to drive scientific research to support the morality, they result in junk science, research which is invalid and unreliable.

A prime example of this is in the work of Judith Reisman. Judith Reisman is one of the leading opponents of pornography, who argues that pornography exposure releases "erototoxins" into the body, chemicals which alter and damage the mind, and the sexuality of a pornography viewer. Reisman's research to support the biological evidence behind her alleged erototoxins has been nonexistent, and there is absolutely no evidence to suggest that viewing pornography releases any unique neurochemicals into the body. Reisman has an advanced degree in communications, and a long history of provocative speeches, where she alleges that homosexuals are the greatest danger to society, that Jews are behind the availability of abortions, and that those whose brains are "rotted" by pornography should have no protected First Amendments rights. An interesting contradiction in Reisman's theories lie in her own research activities. She acknowledges that in conducting her research, she's viewed many types and examples of pornography. But her brain and rights to Free Speech are somehow still intact?

Certainly, many of those who perpetrate rape today have been exposed to pornography, and may even use pornography on a regular basis. But many times more of the individuals who have seen or use pornography, never commit a sexual crime, just as many, many individuals own a gun (just as I do), but never commit a gun-related crime.

Since the advent of the Internet, and easy access to sexual imagery, teen pregnancy rates are dropping, nationwide by as much as 33%. Teen sexual activity itself is dropping, by 7%, while teen use of condoms has increased by 16%. Abortion rates are half what they were in 1990, and rates of sexually transmitted disease are half to 75% less than they were (syphilis and gonorrhea). For more on this, read this wonderful blog by journalist Michael Castleman.

Is pornography addictive for men or women? No more so than any other pleasurable activity. Use of pornography triggers the release of neurochemicals into the brain, the neurochemicals that relate to sexual activity, that cause the physiological arousal responses of lubrication, erection, flushing and increased heart rate. Pleasurable neurochemicals like oxytocin and dopamine are released into the brain. These are all the ways our bodies work, to get us to do things that serve our bodies, and our species. We get similar bursts of "happy" neurochemicals when we accomplish something difficult, like climbing a mountain, getting a new car, or killing an animal to provide dinner for our families. The things that feel good are things that through history, our species survived by the success of these activities. Why does sex feel good? So that we do it, as often as possible, to spread our genes and preserve the human race. Labeling the functions of our normal neurochemical activity and sexual desires as pathological or addictive is just moralism. Not therapy. And most definitely not science. Claiming that women are being raped as a result of their use of pornography is just fear-mongering.

(Note – I was contacted by Professor Layden, who felt that this column, and the article I cited, were less than supportive of her work. Those that know Professor Layden's original research may illuminate me if her actual research is at odds with the quotes she gave the Times.)

Subscribe to Dr. Ley on Twitter @drdavidley.

Terrence Popp: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Terrence Popp · 29 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We will over the next few weeks present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. Here we bring you Terrence Popp of Second Class Citizen.org's speech. His was the fifth presentation from Day 2, Saturday, June 28, 2014. Our thanks once again to Rick Westlake for doing the bulk of the work of this transcription. —DE (Attila Vinczer:) We have two books left, which we'd like to auction—not auction—we're going to give them away. If you have number 119, you are the owner of this book, Bachelor Pad Economics by Aaron Cleary. You can retrieve it later.

Our next speaker, Terrence Popp: Green Beret, Airborne Ranger, paratrooper, infantry soldier; former professional fighter; college graduate; author, poet, warrior, comedian. Worked in the following professions: soldier, fighter, financial planner, investment banking, mortgage banker, real-estate agent, retail. Has received the following awards: two times, Purple Hearts; two times, Combat Infantry Badges; Airborne wings with Combat Jump star; Expert Infantryman Badge; Green Beret; Ranger Beret; FFKA North American Champion Belt, 1998.

Entered the army as an infantryman in 1986. After only five months, he was top .50-caliber gunner and top MK-19 gunner in his battalion, expert with M-16, expert with M-203 grenade launcher, expert with pistol, expert with M-60 MG, expert with the SAW, and took third in "Soldier of His Division" in 1987. One of three enlisted soldiers to be sent to Airborne School from a straight-leg infantry division since the closing of the Vietnam conflict. He was wounded in Panama while involved in an operation; he was run over by an enemy truck within 30 seconds of landing on the drop zone and still fought all night with a dislocated right hip, torn knee tendons, and a third-degree sprained ankle, not to mention the concussion sustained when struck by a vehicle moving at speed. Wounded by an IED in Iraq.

He was called "a murderer" and "assassin" in court, and his wounds were used as a basis to justify the loss of his children. In 2005, Popp was a man leading 159 soldiers in combat; by 2007, he was living out of his car, homeless. He was written off by his wife, his country, his family, and had to come to grips that, as a man, he was totally and completely expendable. He spent over $20,000 of his own money for rehabilitation equipment, and therapy to fix his mind.

He is the author of The Warrior's Way and The Soldier's Soul and runs www.Redonkulas.com, with over 52 videos posted, including the award-winning "Purple Heart's Last Beat." His story is not done yet, either. Not by a long shot.

Please put your hands together for Terrence Popp.

(Applause. Terrence Pop takes the podium.)

Am I on? Is my mic working? … All right. Well, that was a good introduction! … What are you going to do? All right.

Let me get started. First, I am honored to be here. I pulled some strings for this venue, to be at this location … Yeah, when I learned that it had been taken from the DoubleTree, I was … I don't know, I got kinda pissed off. And I'm not the guy that you want to piss off, I guess … Hey, can you bring my bag up here? I left some stuff in there.

All right, and I was—what can I say? As a person, over the past 28 years, who has been in the military system, I've seen first-hand a lot of the carnage and waste that takes place during this fiasco—FIASCO—that we're going to call family court. Stand by … (Retrieves notes from his bag.) Hey, mon, I guess we're winging it—I can do that.

All right, so we've already gone through the introduction. I want to set the stage for the video we're going to show here. As he covered, in '07 when I wrote this, I was probably at the lowest I could possibly be in my life. I was, at that time, very disenfranchised; I had given my blood, my life, my soul to my country, under the false belief that if I were to ever enter the legal system, that I would be treated fairly; and the Constitution, which I had sworn a blood oath to defend, would apply to me … when nothing could be further from the truth.

I mean, we're all here, I mean, it's crazy—I'd like to start the video. Could I have everybody back there on your feet, to come forward and fill the seats up here? Because this is a small screen, and there's a lot of detail that you're going to miss out on.

Also, this is a fictional representation of something that is going on 25 times a day, out there in the real world. Now, I'm not going to kill you with statistics; we've already gone over the, you know, a male is four times as likely to commit suicide as soon as he hits the age of 18, then it doubles into their twenties; and then the divorced male goes up to … the last studies I saw were 13 to 15 percent. So, it's only a logical jump to assume that members of the military—especially veterans—fall into this bracket, this barber-pole, this range-fan, I'm going to call it.

Now imagine coming back from war and having your wife go—I'm trying to think of a good way for this, but I'm a comedian, so I'm just going to say it—you know: cuckoo for Cocoa Penis Puffs, crazy for some Rice Krispies treats, and a couple of Polish sausages thrown in it. I'm just saying the situation was unrecoverable. Tried to work with it but couldn't … I mean, what are you going to do?

So I filed for divorce, she filed for divorce; mine got there twenty minutes before hers, so they had to use my paperwork. My paperwork was very amicable. I'm the grant—got it, you're going off the deep end, whatever crisis you're having; got it, cool, we'll drive on, I'm going to have half my kids, you do what you do, and I do what I do. But no. She wanted The Check. Okay, she was willing to sacrifice all of that time for The Check.

So, the games ensued. I left on a three-week mission, since I was unemployed and I got put on short-term orders to go run a few machine-gun ranges for a military brigade. And when I returned, I walked in the door and was greeted by my two daughters, who were very young at the time. But my six-year-old chocolate Lab, Ranger, was missing. And when I inquired to where my dog was, I was greeted with a cold look and answer, "I told you I did not want you living here." Needless to say, I never saw the dog again.

Okay, so we have the PTSD, the TBI issues; now I'm getting divorced; you took my dog, all my money, and my home, and left me in the lurch. Now if she had a dog, and that dog disappeared, I would go to jail. But that didn't even come up. They wouldn't even discuss it; it was just a piece of property. No matter what the dog meant to me. And I took that as a warning, that if this person, who I had known for a third of her life, could serve me up such a harsh and vicious betrayal, she could do anything.

So, to this date, I only communicate with her via text or e-mail. My policy is, you don't get within thirty feet of me; you don't enter my property. If it can't be put on a printer or subpoena'ed into court, it does not happen. 'Cause the VAWA laws are real, and they are ending military people's careers, law enforcement men's careers, at alarming speed.

Okay – so, can we dim the lights and start the video?

(Cut to video.)

(The number of soldiers who have died in the wars of Iraq and Afghanistan … 5,866 over the course of seven years, as of December 28, 2010.)

(The number of veterans who committed suicide after returning home … 6,256 in the year 2005 alone.)

I remember the letter I got from my wife while I was in Iraq. She said she wasn't happy. Others came home to a hero's welcome. I came home to the echo of an empty house.

I lived with my children for eight years. I raised them while my wife worked. I fought for joint custody. I was called "a murderer" and "an assassin" in front of the judge.

Why should I miss out on raising my children just because she isn't "happy"?

I make $45,000 a year. She makes $40,000. After taxes, child support, child care, health care, I have $18,000 a year left to live on.

I followed the rules. I went to the so-called friend of the court for some relief. They just said, "It's the law." When I got laid off from work, I went there again … four times. Showed them the paperwork … and each time they told me, I was in skilled trades and it should be easy for me to find a job.

I guess they don't live in the real world. I had to pay the child support with my 401K. Ten years, I saved for my retirement. She got half, and the rest got spent to keep me out of jail. Then the money ran out. She's not happy. Now I live in poverty.

The court has no problem slapping me in jail when I can't pay my child support. But she hasn't let me see my kids for a year, and when I go in front of a judge six times, all she gets are warnings.

She's not happy. Now I can't see my children.

Because she's not happy, I'm a felon.

Because she's not happy, I must go to prison.

I got called up to go to war for my country.

I got sent 7000 miles away to bring freedom to those oppressed.

Now my country has stripped me of my children.

Now my country has forced me into poverty and servitude.

Now my country has turned me into a criminal, and has doomed me to prison.

All because she was not "happy."

I don't deserve this. (Gunshot—sounds of a man collapsing to the floor.)

(70% of Iraq veterans return to divorce. Within five years of their return, 90% get divorced.)

(Only 1.5% get fair treatment from our court system.)

(Most will live the rest of their lives in poverty.)

(Most will be alienated from their children.)

(Countless veterans a month choose this option.)

(I love my country … but my country doesn't love me.)

("The country that forgets its defenders will itself be forgotten."—Calvin Coolidge)

(Return to Terrence Popp's presentation.)

You see, this is dedicated to the memory of Major Lance Waldorf. So I'll give you a brief history on this particular individual. When he was a first lieutenant, he was assigned Company F425, Airborne Infantry. He was my platoon leader and I his platoon sergeant. Now, if you are so fortunate enough, when you are a new lieutenant, to have a good platoon sergeant, he will make or break your career. He will teach you what is not in the books—the wisdom between the pages—and guide you through your successful command, which you will carry on for your military career. I was that man for him. He succeeded at his job. I spent 10 months to a year with him. We froze; we starved; we did airborne operations. We did everything soldiers do. I knew him, he knew me, he was a brother to me.

The truth behind this video that you see here—this was going to be my suicide. I had planned it out—I'm a follow-through kind of guy. I had written 138 letters to be disclosed to my daughters over their life, till the birth of their first child; and I had put two lawyers on retainer, one to fight for my life insurance and to administrate a trust and then the other to handle the letters. My punch-out date was June 6, 2008.

Major Lance Waldorf went to the Holly National Cemetery and shot himself on June 2. So my platoon leader took the bullet that was meant for me. That was eight years ago. I ran his funeral. I organized his Taps and twenty-one, his rifle squad, flag detail, watch at the crypt. I saw first-hand how devastating that this was, and it changed my course of action. I would not go down so easily; I would not pick the permanent solution to a temporary problem. I would persevere. And I moved on.

And that's why … I did a few more videos on SecondClassCitizen.org, but I had a really hard time dealing in the negative. Since I suffered a TBI, I lost my ability to sleep. I said, Why not use my extra time that I have to do something positive?

(Cut to an Editorial Note from A Voice for Men.)

(After watching this presentation, Monica Hesse of The Washington Post referred to it in its entirety as follows: "One presenter, a military veteran speaking on the treatment of veterans returning from war, put up a PowerPoint slide alleging that 70 percent of men returning from war get divorced, and 90 percent do so within five years. When asked about the source of this statistic, he said, 'That particular statistic is from my personal observations. I'm just speaking here as a dude.' " (Monica Hesse goes on to describe Popp as follows: "One dude speaking to a roomful of like-minded dudes, who reinforce rather than challenge one another's world views."

(Terrence Popp used no PowerPoint slides. He only showed this film he was part of making, which was Winner of Best Short Film of the Year and Best Editing for the Mitten Movie Project 2010, Royal Oak, MI; an Official Selection of the 2010 Blue Water Film Festival; Official Selection of the 2011 Detroit Independent Film Festival; Central Florida Film Festival; Detroit Windsor International Film Festival; and the DC Shorts Film Festival.

(Later in this presentation, wherein no PowerPoint slides were used, Popp gives one statistic, and one statistic only, that he cites as personal observation based on his experiences as a combat veteran.

(The Washington Post apparently sees fit to describe this entire presentation as "One dude speaking to a roomful of like-minded dudes, who reinforce rather than challenge one another's world views.

(… and they tell us misandry isn't real.)

(Return to Terrence Popp's presentation.)

… So I started Redonkulas.com. And all of the subjects that were talked about here today, I touch on, and I do so in a comedic light. They are my therapy. They make me feel better, number one. Number two, if they make somebody else feel better, or they learn something, it's a win. And even if they're entertaining, there's another win—for win-win-win.

There's a few other things I want to go over here. I know I have videos, and people are very upset, and that's what's going down every single day. I would like to go over the Soldier Sailor Relief Act, in regards to that … I'm glad it was passed, but there are some things that we need to know, that that particular law has no teeth. There are no punitive measures mentioned within that law, either it be directly or indirectly, and it is violated by the family court system on a regular basis. A lot of times, these judges will say, "I did not know anything about it." Well, if you go into a court and you say, "I did not know about the law," I recall some words: Ignorance of the law is no defense. And I think that should apply to the people who administrate; they should be up to speed on that.
Whew … I dissect things using math, since I worked in that field for a while. If you have a child, and you fight for custody, you'll probably lose; we've already gone over a lot of the stats. I think it's an 85/15 split, what's going on right now, and they don't take into effect that, of that 15 percent of the time that custody's awarded to the male, 5 to 7 percent of that time he is awarded that because it is uncontested. So in reality, when you really look at the numbers, it's 93/7. Now in any other field, or any other area, in this country, if you were to pull out those statistics, you would get crucified. Flat out!

It is what it is. It is discrimination. You walk into court with a Peg D between your legs and a couple of seed-pumps, and you're a loser … am I wrong? I don't have a Ph.D., I don't have a master's degree, I just have a bachelor's degree in public administration. I do explain things a little more colorfully than the average person.

Okay, now, in regards to the veterans out there, I've been looking at the statistics, and the lowest statistic I can find for male homelessness is 57 percent. That's a little … that's above 50 percent, but that's a little light in my books. And, a similar statistic … I got this one from a credible study, I believe it was done by the VFW and the American Vets … of that male population, 32 to 40 percent, at one point of another, served in the military.

Okay—now what is going on? We have to ask these questions. We have to raise the flag and ask why, have it studied—I want to know what's going on. There's a failure somewhere, and it needs to be corrected.

I want to bring to your attention to Matthew Hindes, who is stationed somewhere in the Pacific on a submarine. This is going around in Facebook; I got this two days before I came out here. And apparently, a Judge Margaret Noe has put a bench warrant out for his arrest, to come to his custody battle for his little girl, who he had custody of before he was deployed to sea. And the mother of the child had lost custody for unfit parenting—good words, I was going to use something more subtle.

And—I want to be the first to tell you this, the navy is not going to surface a nuclear sub to bring him to port, so one of the soldiers can make it to court, because Judge Noe has failed to read the Soldiers and Sailors Act, and needs to be held accountable.

Well, Matthew Hindes … I have put all of the fish in the water and all guns to bear on this situation. And hopefully, we'll see some resolution on this. I'm not a politician, I'm just a dude that suffers from EGS, and a little bit of early onset OCD—and that would be Evil Genius Syndrome and early onset of Old Creepy Dude.

Okay—and I want to also mention, this one I found particularly disturbing to me. It also helped to nail home the fact that my original course of action was wrong. It would have meant nothing but heartbreak and misery to my children, and my immediate family and friends.

I want to bring your attention to a Thomas James Ball; born February 21, 1953; and he died on June 15, 2011. Mr. Ball was drafted and sent to Vietnam, where he served honorably; he was discharged with full honors and benefits. He decided to make the ultimate sacrifice, and committed suicide by self-immolation on the steps of the very system that was oppressing him as well. And in the end, he was called … "a terrorist! How dare he?" How dare he set himself on fire, and try to make the statement that something is radically, radically imbalanced here?

This whole journey that I've been on has helped me to see that in any system—be it your individual life, be it your club, the military, government, the world—you have Yin, and you have Yang; and there needs to be a balance. And right now, we're not.

The questions and the answers are all before us. We have the largest prison population on the Earth. And there's a lot of information you can get from them because they're not going anywhere. The answers are there—just ask them! And people have, but nobody has listened. I've seen the studies, and … they're not pretty.

My final point here is a statement made thousands of years ago, during ancient Greece, by a man called Heracles. And back then, when you hit the age of … some areas, 15, some 16 … they would put you together in lots of 100. In his youth, this was done to him; and when he reached the age of 30, he was expected to train his share of lots. That whole military worked off as a phalanx. These are his words, and I've actually seen them come true when it was my turn to train soldiers. "Out of every 100 men, 10 of you shouldn't even be there. Eighty of you – you're just targets. Nine of you, you're the real fighters, and we are lucky to have you. But one … one … will be a Warrior, and it will be his job to bring you home alive. And I am that Warrior."

With that—are there any questions of me?

(Question:) Okay, your stats on custody granted fathers. That includes all awards of sole custody to the father. My question is—and I can never seem to find this one—after a full custody trial only, what are the stats on granting custody to the father after a full family court custody trial? And I can't find that stat anywhere.

(Terrence Popp:) I can answer that question—most of the time, you will never get to a full trial in a divorce hearing. When you do, I don't think anybody's tracking that. I do have a friend of mine, I will not mention his name, who went through a—I think it was a four-year battle for the custody of a daughter that he had discovered was born out of wedlock. He eventually got custody, but it cost him—I think we put the numbers together—somewhere over $130,000 in legal fees. The average person doesn't have that kind of money, to go to trial. I certainly do not.

I'll have to look into that. I don't know, I can't find it either. That's a good question.

Anyone else? (Points to audience.)

(Paul Elam:) I don't have a question. I just wanted to say, thank you.

(Applause.)

(Question:) First, thank you for your service. Secondly, the statistic that 70 percent of those who are deployed are divorced by the time they return, and 90 percent within five years—where did you find that statistic?

(Terrence Popp:) Well, first of all, that particular statistic is from my personal observation. Maybe it's different for the military in general, but combat troops—men that are up in the front lines or subject to high deployment rate—very close to that number. Again, these are—I'm just speaking as a dude, and these are my observations and my opinion.

(Question:) Once again, I just want to say thank you for your service. I spent six years in the military as well, and that's how I got into this movement. It's because I've noticed a lot of military fathers … the very system that they were sworn to protect screws them in the end, when they come back home. So I want to say that—once again, thank you for your service; but my question is that— I'm sure you've heard the term UCMJ. My question is, how is the UCMJ different from—when it comes to family court, how is it different from civilian court? Meaning that in a sense of child custody. Because from what I understand that soldiers have an even harder time in family court than civilians.

(Terrence Popp:) Correct. I actually talk about this in "Administrative Violence I" on Redonkulas.com, on how to handle situations. Now from my observation, in my time, it usually did not go well for the service member when they were involved or embroiled in a bitter divorce or custody battle. So, let me just set the record straight. I've been a team leader, four different teams; squad leader, for about six squads; platoon sergeant for five different platoons; a first sergeant for four companies, one of which was in Abu Ghraib Prison in 2004, in the Sunni Triangle belly of the Beast. I have seen, over and over and over again, the same patterns. If you are in the service, and you have children, and you go through divorce, a large portion of these service members will opt to get out of the service to follow their children. Okay, and now I have to go find a new person to replace him; and he might have a bunch of other experience that is irreplaceable, and I cannot put a dollar amount to it.

I have one individual I speak with on a regular basis who, after 12 years, went through a bitter divorce with some false allegations. He was barred from re-enlistment; his career came to an end. Now this particular individual was a SIGINT intelligence guy, with the highest level of access, who could read and write four different—four—Asian dialects, and speak an additional eight. And it meant nothing. Can't replace a guy like that.

Now, I've also seen … I was privy to some of the soldiers' chain-of-command making unreasonable requests and demands, which fell out of the scope of their command. Now, fortunately for most of these individuals, I was within earshot, and I raised a hand and said, "Wait a minute. We're not going to have him give all kinds of money and do all kinds of things unless there's a court order. We follow the law; if there's a court order, we'll do it. If not, there's a JAG, and there's other avenues, civilian avenues, that need to be addressed first." But there are times when the service members' chain of command doesn't have knowledge of what's going on, and makes unreasonable demands of the service members. It does get much harsher. That's another reason they get out, they just … it's very devastating. Anybody else?

(Carnell Smith:) Have you seen any instances of paternity fraud in the military?

(Terrence Popp:) All right, first of all, this is a—put a little comedy in this, okay? When I was 17 to 22, I was slingin' seed like an ol' bird feeder. I'm not going to lie to you, it's just what it is, okay? Have I specifically seen anyone have to pay for a child that's not theirs? Yes, and no. I have never seen it go down like you, but I've seen service members who got married, adopted children that weren't theirs, and then had to pay child support on those children. And I believe I covered that in "Dupe the Next Dude;" and in your particular instance, I covered it in "DNA Getaway."

Well, I'm glad I'm able to bring some cheeriness to you, after this crazy video … Redonkulas.com is R-E-D-O-N-K-U-L-A-S dot com; and SecondClassCitizen.org. And also, in a lot of these videos, I wrote the scripts, and I make up a lot of the material; but none of it would be possible without my producer, who could not be here today—because, ironically, he films weddings! And we are in wedding season! All right—that guy is my other half, and he's really good at what he does. He's just as passionate as I am. But it is what it is, you've got to make a buck. Anybody else?

(Question:) First of all, thanks for being funny, it's nice to see. Suicide in the military in both Canada and the United States, probably in the UK as well, is actually a pretty major issue. I was wondering if you could perhaps shed some light on possible services, or ability to get counseling or go for any support on that?

(Terrence Popp:) Well, first of all, from my observation, they are doing all that they can within their power to try to curb this horrible thing that's going on. But at the end of the day, what they do is they enforce the last 300 meters of our foreign policy. What is going on with these suicides is not military-related; it's a sick society. When you build a situation, or you put together an institution that could take an intangible away from you—like love, and hope, and all, and everything else—it's evil!

I mean, to be honest with you, I've seen the programs, and really, they're doing a fantastic job with what they have. I think it would be much worse if they weren't. So, all being said, it is what it is … Yeah?

(Paul Elam:) This is an actual question. I'm a veteran. My experience in the military was that as men were stripped by family court—and I did see paternity fraud cases in the military—the military command turned their backs on the soldiers. That's what I saw. I'm not speaking to the services that are provided for soldiers after they come back from combat, and the support that they're getting. The part of the problem I saw—but I was in the military many years ago; and I'm hoping you can tell me that it is changed. Because the way it was when I was in, was that if you got any kind of an accusation, or a paternity allegation, or a bitter divorce, you were pretty much on your own.

(Terrence Popp:) That's pretty much how it goes … well, now listen, they are in the business of enforcing the last 300 meters of foreign policy. They are not in the business of what needs to happen. Okay, it does happen a lot, I'm not going to lie to you, but as a former first sergeant, I've had to deal with these issues. I myself did not turn my back on these soldiers; I told them where to go … a couple of times, I'd take out the Yellow Pages and say, Hey, man, you're going to call this guy here, and we're going to talk to him. How about, find out what his retainer is, and we'll put an allotment so your pay can go pay for what needs to be done. And it … you just have to care.

Obviously, there's some stuff that went on when you were there that … you didn't have that. So … I mean, at the end of the day, I always tried to be the sergeant that one day, all of you here, okay, are going to have to box up a child or a grandchild and you're going to have to send them to war. Maybe it'll be a niece or nephew. But it's going to happen because war is not going to go away. It's been here since the beginning of time, and it will be the end of us. Now, this is the sergeant I tried to be—that when and if that day comes, you'll get on your knees and you will pray to the Great Maker to protect your loved one. And then you will pray for your loved one to fall on the books of a sergeant such as I. It's just that simple.

(Applause. Attila Vinczer comes to the podium.)

(Terrence Popp:) Watch the videos.

(Attila Vinczer:) I think we should work very, very hard to ensure that this kind of injustice, to the people that put their lives at risk—that this sort of nonsense stops. We should be treating these people with the utmost care. It is appalling to me that we're not doing everything we can to give them the type of support that these people deserve. It is unacceptable to me to watch this video, and to know that this is happening today, it happened yesterday, and it's going to happen tomorrow. It has to change.

J4MB publicly challenges Roz Hardie, chief executive officer of OBJECT, a feminist campaigning organisation

Mike Buchanan · 29 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I was recently in the studios of London Live TV, being interviewed along with feminists in response to a prerecorded piece from Laura Bates, the inaugural member of The Whine Club. There were four recorded discussions in total, of which we'll be posting links to the videos shortly.

Not a "morning person" at the best of times, I had to set my alarm clock at 02:30 in order to get to the studios in Kensington before 06:00. The studios are in Northcliffe House, the plush headquarters of the Mail, Independent, and Evening Standard newspapers. All the people I saw working in the building at that time were of the male persuasion. A security guard was "manning" reception, later in the day the sole preserve of women, needless to say.

I digress. The first three short interviews on the topic of sexism were at around 06:15, 07:15, and 08:15, and Roz Hardie was the feminist with whom I had the unadulterated joy of debating. Hardie is the chief executive officer of the campaign group OBJECT. The ladies at OBJECT have been wittering away for over 10 years now—surely generating enough hot air to lift a fleet of hot-air balloons—and the following extract from their website should give you a flavour of their "thinking":

> OBJECT is a human rights organisation which challenges 'sex object culture'—a culture in which women are increasingly objectified as sex objects in our media and everyday lives. It is long established that the overwhelming portrayal of women as sex objects in society plays a role in maintaining inequality between women and men.

The organisation campaigns against lap dancing clubs, prostitution—they want the Nordic model, which criminalises men and decriminalises prostitutes—lads' mags, page 3 of the Sun (a tabloid that for 40+ years has featured photographs of topless women on page 3) … you get the woeful picture. Now, the website doesn't contain any images of Hardie, so far as we can see, so here's one I found online—it was taken last month—with Hardie wearing a T-shirt bearing the logo and slogan: "OBJECT: Women Not Sex Objects." Hopefully, by linking to this image, I'm not sexually objectifying her in any way. I'm fairly confident I'm not.

We had plenty of time between the interviews for informal discussions, and at times they became heated. Hardie felt the £22,750 ($35,000) sponsorships available only to female engineering postgraduate students at Brunel University are perfectly reasonable, given that it costs more to educate autistic children, and most autistic children are boys. When I related this to a supporter later in the day, he responded:

> Dear God, these blithering idiots have an answer to everything!

A good point, well made, I thought.

On a number of occasions during my discussions with Hardie, I pointed to the fact that decade after decade feminists have lied shamelessly to pursue their agendas, they continue to do so, and the mainstream media never (or virtually never) calls them out on those lies. I gave as an example the case of Caroline Criado-Perez, to whom we presented a "Lying Feminist of the Month" award—the story is here. We'll shortly be presenting her with the same award for a second time. Along with her "Whiny Feminist of the Month" award, I think that makes her our most celebrated feminist. In the case of CC-P, as with others I cited, Hardie had the same pat answer: "They're only lying in your opinion."

I explained that it wasn't a matter of opinion, in each case the feminists were demonstrably lying, and in each case we'd furnished the proof. All of this made no impact on Hardie, of course—a woman I branded a liar in at least one of our three recorded discussions—so it's time for another public challenge. I'll be emailing her a link to this blog piece shortly, and the challenge is this:

> Roz, yesterday we discussed the issue of feminists lying to advance their agendas, and I cited some examples of feminists—including Caroline Criado-Perez—to whom we've presented "Lying Feminist of the Month" awards. In each case, you said the women were only lying "in your opinion." I publicly challenge you to email me explaining why, in your opinion, each of these feminists wasn't lying. Our list of award-winning lying feminists is here. We look forward to hearing from you in due course. Take your time, no rush. Will 12 months be sufficient?

Men, are you losers?

AVfM Video Source · 29 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Shieldwife has returned:

You may want to subscribe to her channel.

“People Against Rape Culture” are promoters of hate and lies

Jack Barnes · 30 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On July 7, 2014, Dan Perrins and I dedicated an episode of Blue Collar Red Pill Radio to People Against Rape Culture (PARC). At that time, PARC was in the middle of a fundraiser. Unfortunately, they were able to meet their goal of $3,000. Unfortunately, there are idiots out there willing to give money to these bigots. I guess there really is a sucker born every minute.

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Z1abPELSA4A]

PARC isn’t all that different from any other feminist organization. It seeks to create a world in which rape, sexual abuse, and sexual assault are no longer encouraged through, in part, education of schoolchildren. PARC believes that children should be educated in the underlying issues and causes of rape culture, such as misogyny and hypermasculinity. So we have another feminist organization that believes in teaching schoolchildren to blame men and boys for something that has never existed.

In further news, the world is round and water is wet.

Another of PARC’s stated goals is to use social media to further their bigoted message. One of their social media campaigns is what appears to be a Twitter hashtag (#whyumadbro?) based on an article posted on their website. The “Why You Mad, Bro?” article, which was written by PARC Vice President Liz Puloka, uses multiple tactics typical of ideologues who have pledged allegiance to the ideology of hatred and violence (and here and here) known as feminism.

The first thing you will notice is the old tired and worn-out lie that feminism is women and women is feminism. MRAs justifiably blame many of the legal inequalities men face on the ideology of feminism. The minds of these brainwashed true believers translate the disapproval of feminism, which is an ideology, into the hatred of women, which are a group of people.

Another tactic they use is deflection. Instead of accepting that feminism has advocated and successfully established policies and legislation that have resulted in violations of civil and constitutional rights of men and boys, they point the finger of blame toward the flying spaghetti monster of patriarchy. “I didn’t break the lamp. A ghost did it.” Setting aside the fact that science and history have disproven the existence of patriarchy as it is defined by feminism, the idea that a system designed by men for men’s benefit at the expense of women could harm most men, “patriarchy hurts men too,” is … well … insane.

Still another tactic is outright lying. An example of this can be found in the following paragraph from Liz Puloka’s “Why You Mad, Bro?”:

> And yet, there is Elliot Rodger and Christopher Plaskon, there are MRA groups holding conventions to talk about how they are oppressed at the hands of women, and there are the countless men who respond to their perceived rejection with threats and acts of violence against women. Prompting me to think that there needs to be MUCH more talk, more pointing out of the connections between the dominant social construction of masculinity and the very real upset and anger that so many men are feeling and, most importantly, blaming women for.

The attempt to link a mass murderer who killed more men than women to the MHRM is nothing new. Fellow MHRA Rachel Edwards traced that lie back to David “The Mammoth” Futrelle. Guess what? Futrelle made the whole thing up. As for the other links, you weren’t dreaming. PARC actually used Jezebel as a reliable source. It seems odd that PARC would use a website that posted an article in which staff bragged about assaulting their boyfriends as a source in an article that is about reducing violence.

Oh. That’s right. PARC is only interested in ending violence that can be blamed on men. My mistake. The Jezebel article linked as evidence of the violent nature of MHRAs is typical feminism. They cover for their fellow feminist Big Red, who sang, “Cry me a river” in the face of a man trying to talk about male suicide rates. This is not to mention the Mic article, “The 8 Biggest Lies Men’s Rights Activists Spread About Women,” which ignored the most important issues the MHRM works hard to address while totally warping other issues into something unrecognizable by any informed MHRA. That article was written for the purpose of spreading misinformation, in true feminist fashion, for the purpose of discrediting the MHRM. Of course, it didn’t work.

Then there is the whole bit about MHRAs believing that men are oppressed by women. Liz Puloka is obviously a bold-face liar or a blundering idiot. She is a college graduate, so she is probably a combination of the two, given that she more than likely attended a few gender studies classes. I attended the International Conference on Men’s Issues in Detroit. Although my duties at the conference required me to miss a few of the lectures, I watched them later, and I don’t recall a single one blaming women as a group for the inequalities facing men in today’s society.

Puloka continues her article with:

> The tenets of masculinity that say ‘you must display (hetero)sexual prowess by dominating as many women as possible’—THIS is what is making you mad when you can’t get laid, when your girlfriend gets mad at you for cheating, when you catcall women on the street and they ignore you. Not. Women.

Has this woman ever had sex with a man? Has she been living under a rock or walking around with a blindfold on all her life? Dominating as many women as possible!? Where in the hell did she come up with that? Well, if you’re a feminist, then heterosexual sex is oppression because men dominate and oppress women through sex. I’m sure her feminist foremothers are very proud of Puloka. Another aspect of this paragraph is the way it shames men for their normal sexual drive. Polygamous desires in men is what has enabled the human race to continue to exist on this planet.

> This dominant and unhealthy construction of masculinity also requires that males be able to wield financial power (especially relative to women)….”

Actually, it’s women who want men who earn more than they do. Women just aren’t attracted to poor men. It’s called hypergamy. It’s the female version of polygamy, in that it was necessary, long ago, for the survival of the human race. Notice how polygamy is men’s fault, and hypergamy is also men’s fault.

> … but as more and more boys are taught to repress emotions that have been labeled as ‘weak’ or ‘feminine’ and so turn to the acceptable male expressions of violence and physical power, more and more of them are growing up into men who don’t have the emotional intelligence and maturity needed to hold down jobs, let alone maintain passing grades and social standing in school.

Men were taught this way of dealing with emotion because society need warriors to protect and laborers to serve society. But just because men don’t express emotions the same way as women in no way means that there is something wrong with men. It means men and women are different. The fact that men and women are different makes feminists’ heads explode, but it’s true.

> The crisis of boys and men then seems pretty clearly to be a crisis brought on by this social construction of masculinity that while on the face looks like it benefits all males, in fact only benefits a select few while deeply hurting the rest, as evidenced by the broad decline of male health, wealth and success in multiple areas.

So the lack of funding toward male health care has nothing to do with the decline in men’s health. The fact that boys are failing at all levels in primary education isn’t because feminists have worked hard to shift the focus onto the performance of girls while ignoring boys. The fact that the ever-increasing minority of college graduates are men isn't because of feminist activism that pushed for gender parity in college for decades after the same had been achieved. The push for quotas in the workplace aren't to blame for men being unable to move up in a company. Instead, it's the social construct, created by men, for men's benefit, that has been proven to have never existed—that is the culprit. Yeah. Right.

Puloka ends her article by telling men that it's not women's or feminists' fault. That, in fact, feminists are men's allies in the fight. Basically she says that all we need to do is destroy the patriarchy and all men's problems will be cured. Oh, and guys, while you're at it, don't forget to do your job as a man and stand up against men who "are perpetrating gender inequality and violence" against women. The irony, it burns.

Lizzie, I got some news for you. You see, men and women suffered alongside each other for all of human history. Men as a group were never privileged over women as a group. Men simply had a different gender role than women. The male gender role is like a slut-walker. Looks good from about a hundred yards out, but the closer you get, the uglier it looks. Then your bigoted forerunners came along with their insane ideas like patriarchy theory. Now women have more rights than men. Women have rights that men never had, like reproductive choice. But it isn't a matter of men just haven't caught up yet. Feminists worked hard to remove rights from men, like due process on college campuses. The removal of due process rights is due to the feminist perpetuation of rape hysteria called rape culture, which you are directly involved in. We don't blame women for the issues facing men and boys. We blame YOU and all those like you. We blame feminists, and unlike you and your friends, we have the evidence to back it up. You can bitch and whine all you want about the invisible misogyny monsters, like rape culture, that only exist in your imagination. While you do, the disgusting ship feminism is taking fire from both sides. If you don't change your ideas, and soon, you will go down with it.

I personally don't give a damn one way or the other. The chickens are coming home to roost, little girl, and there is nothing you can do to stop it. One more thing, Lizzie, the day I find PARC literature in my daughter's school is the day I will have a long talk with the Board of Education. They will either get rid of PARC literature or they will lose their jobs.

Pro-victims vs. gaming

AVfM Video Source · 30 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Worth supporting! Sub HERE.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=0aCyCwEj62g

Email from a new viewer and reader

Karen Straughan (aka GirlWritesWhat) · 31 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> "Hi there.
>
> "I don't claim to have a particular political stance. I'm coming from a position of curiosity. I'm in the process of watching your YouTube videos after seeing you featured in VICE'S 'women of the men's rights movement'. I will mention I believe civil rights should be equal across the board. I don't know enough about any of the 'movements' to sympathize, however. What I'm curious about are your thoughts in light of Elliot Rodger and his manifesto. I have, since reading his manifesto, noticed a few men being able to relate to the sense of isolation, even at times entitlement to having a girlfriend. Understand, this was how the man I was speaking with chose to describe his personal feelings. I'm wondering if you feel as though what happened with Rodger could have been prevented? Where do you believe his inner dialogue departed from the men's rights movement? I understand that associations have been drawn between his rampage and men's right movement, I don't intend to imply they're the same thing. I just don't understand how this happened and I'd like to know your thoughts, I guess I figured you'd have an opinion on the subject."

Okay, the first thing to do is to familiarize you with the Men's [Human] Rights Movement and its goals. What our movement is after is two-pronged:

1. Equality in the language of the law
2. Equal application of the law

As for the first point, we're almost there. Many feminists claim to be fighting for "equal rights"; however, there is no right under the law that I can think of that men have and women do not (can you?), while there are some rights women have that men do not.

There are a handful of remnants of old laws that need equalizing, such as the gendered concept of dower rights in Michigan and elsewhere, the lower official retirement age of women in the UK, and the like. More importantly to many people in the MRM is unequal protection from infant genital cutting/mutilation in the West. In fact, some legal and ethical scholars have described the ban on female genital mutilation as unconstitutional as long as male genital cutting/mutilation is legal. Another glaring inequality between men and women under the law is mandatory Selective Service Registration in the US for men alone, and mandatory military service for men alone in other countries. While feminists fought for the "right" of women to serve in the military, the obligation of women to do so has never been adequately addressed in most countries where men are required to serve.

More sticky and difficult is unequal application of the law. One example of this is the "ungendering" of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), which should, in theory, offer male victims of domestic violence the same protections and benefits women enjoy. Up until a couple of years ago, the wording of this piece of federal legislation was gendered, and men were specifically excluded from its protections and benefits in more than 60 passages. It was only through a procedural technicality regarding funding and different levels of government taxation that the old law was halted midway through reauthorization and a new, gender-neutral one was introduced. Women's groups, such as the National Organization for Women, fought hard to keep the language in the act gendered, despite entreaties from LGBTQ groups to reconsider how the language of female victims and male perpetrators failed to serve their community.

So now we have a mostly gender-neutral VAWA. Problem solved, right?

Unfortunately, no. Despite scads and wodges of evidence indicating that violence between intimate partners as well as child abuse are not gendered problems, much of the policy around them, and the implementation of services, is, in fact, gendered. The paradigm used to train police, social workers, counselors, lawyers, judges, medical personnel, guardians ad litem, and anyone else who may become involved in a domestic violence case is based on a disproven (disproved before it was even named!) model called “Duluth”—a brainchild of feminist academics and activists. This model characterizes domestic violence as a microcosmic reflection of “the patriarchy,” wherein men batter their wives in order to assert patriarchal dominance and impose female subordination. It is the most widely used model in the world, despite it describing the smallest minority of domestic violence cases (in cases of one violent partner battering a non-violent partner for, say, burning the toast, women are up to twice as likely as men to be the sole perpetrators).

So we are working from a faulty model when it comes to everything from training judges to counseling perpetrators and victims.

In addition, our cultural values tend to prioritize protecting women from violence and harm while considering most violence against men commonplace and unremarkable and female violence against men justified at best, hilarious at worst.

Predominant aggressor policies (not laws, mind you—just “policies,” so less subject to scrutiny) profile men through the use of sneaky language. They don’t require “the man” to always be the one arrested—they simply require the larger, stronger, heavier, less visibly distressed partner to be considered the predominant aggressor and be subject to arrest. This is no less discriminatory against men than, say, poll taxes and literacy tests at the ballot booth were discriminatory against Black and poor voters in the first half of the 20th century.

On top of that, despite equality under the law, the discretion allowed judges, police, and others has caused men to routinely be more harshly treated by the criminal justice system than women at every stage.

For the same crimes in equivalent circumstances, women are on average:
• less likely to be arrested
• less likely to be charged with a crime
• more likely to have their charges downgraded or dismissed
• less likely to be prosecuted
• less likely to be convicted if prosecuted
• more likely to be convicted of a lesser crime if convicted
• less likely to be sentenced to incarceration
• will serve a sentence less than two-thirds the length a man would, if sentenced to incarceration

All of these criminal discounts also apply in domestic violence incidents—in fact, they tend to be amplified in any situation where a man and a woman find themselves in a conflict under the aegis of the criminal justice system.

If women and men were treated equally by the criminal justice system, and by enforcement policies, the ratio of men to women in prison would not be the current 94 men for every 6 women.

Yet just as people used to do with Blacks to justify the status quo in the 1930s, the mainstream looks at the over-representation of men in prison as an excuse to continue discriminating against them, or even to exacerbate that discrimination.

The “logic” goes like this:
• 94% of people in prison are men
• given that, it’s obvious that men are more prone to criminality than women
• men’s propensity toward criminality justifies treating them more harshly than women
• 94% of people in prison are men
• wash, rinse, repeat

There is no law requiring that women receive these discounts when they enter the criminal system, or that men should be more harshly treated, just as there was no law requiring a woman to have a male cosigner when she applied for a loan in the 1950s—there was simply no specific law or legal precedent that prohibited it until the women's lobby pushed for one.

Of course, it's more than feminist policies that have led to this disparity in how men and women defendants are treated when they commit crimes—there are social and psychological biases at work as well. In fact, up until very recently, feminists had the rest of society convinced that women were more harshly treated in the criminal courts than men, despite hundreds of years of historical data proving otherwise. People believed them because we are predisposed to notice harms that affect women, sometimes even when they aren't there, and to be outraged by them. Okay, I hope that I've adequately explained what kinds of issues the MRM is all about. It's about the equal treatment of men and women under the law and about addressing some of the social prejudices that prevent equal treatment of men and women even when the laws are nominally gender-neutral.

If you want a really egregious example, look no further than the laws against all forms of female genital mutilation (FGM) in the Western world: regardless of how damaging some types of FGM can be, it is illegal in every modern nation to so much as prick a girl's genitals with a pin to draw a drop of blood for the sake of religious tradition (even if that might prevent some parents from taking their daughters overseas to have a more invasive and damaging type of FGM performed). However, it is perfectly legal to remove half the skin and 60% of the nerve endings of a boy's penis (without anaesthetic, mind you), which results in 200 to 300 deaths per year in the US, and very few people consider this a violation of equal protection legislation, let alone the basic human right to bodily autonomy. One can, in fact, find people openly expressing their sexual preference for men who have been subjected to this and their disgust at the appearance of the genitals of those who have not. Celebrities like Oprah Winfrey can also shill for cosmetics companies that use cells from amputated male foreskins in costly anti-wrinkle creams without mainstream censure.

ANYWAY. The above is the kind of thing the MRM is about. It's not about getting girls to like you, or not being able to get girls to like you, or how girls not liking you means you're a failure as a man—even if these are valid concerns and considerations for men in the modern era.

The MRM is not so much about whether you can get a girl to be in a relationship with you—it's more concerned with what she can do to you, with the assistance and full connivance of the government, once she is in a relationship with you.
It's not about getting guys laid—it's more about getting them some rights regarding what their life will look like if there's a pregnancy or a breakup or an accusation of some sort of abuse or misconduct if and when they get laid.

And in the more philosophical sense, it's about convincing men they shouldn't be basing their self-worth on whether they can get a girl to like them or sleep with them. Despite the divisions within the wider "manosphere," there's a reason why MRAs and Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) are on more friendly terms than either are toward Pick-Up Artists (PUA).

MGTOW is about throwing off the yoke of female social and sexual approval (and the male policing of it), while PUA is about scoring poon (among other things). I personally have no problems with either group, but the larger MRM is much more at odds with the latter than the former because getting laid means pandering to what women want. And feminists? Feminists want to call Elliot Rodger an "active MRA," despite not one word in his manifesto about either feminism or men's rights. Despite no connection to anyone but a couple of PUA channels and a forum devoted to hating PUAs.

And here is where we come to that dastardly metaphor: blue pill vs. red pill.

Whether you're an MRA, a PUA, or a MGTOW, you've taken the red pill. You see things for what they are. You're not going to believe it when someone tells you that women are more harshly treated by the criminal justice system. You're not going to believe it when you're told that the men that women get all soggy for are respectful gentlemen who treat them reverently. You're not going to believe it when Obama says, "77 cents!" or "1 is 2 many, so step up, men!" You're not going to assume that the woman who wants you to propose, who will be handed a loaded gun by the state and the equivalent of diplomatic immunity when you marry, won't use it if and when she gets bored with the relationship. You aren't going to believe that random hookup when she says she's on the pill because you know what will happen to you if your trust is misplaced. And you know there's no way to win the game—you can be an asshole and get laid and have feminists call you "rapey," or you can be a decent guy and be taken for a chump, with the entire weight of the state ready to milk you for all you're worth.

Elliot Rodger was blue pill all the way, with a boatload of racism, classism, and mental problems thrown in.

He stumbled across the PUA community and rejected their advice to get his shit together, "man up," and give women what they respond to rather than what they say they want because his classism wouldn't let him be anything other than the "perfect, magnificent gentleman."

If he'd stumbled across the MRM or MGTOW communities, they'd have told him to stop measuring his self-worth by his sexual conquests (or lack of them), that women are not goddesses, they shit and fart and burp and the rest just like men do, and to stop feeling guilty and sinful for watching porn, and I expect he'd have rejected that advice too. We'll never know because, as far as I know, he didn't even know the MRM existed.

What I do know is that the MRM is a non-violent movement and they would have tried to help Rodger rather than let him fester in his confusion and resentment. And I'm almost positive that he would've thought we were losers and crybabies, even as he himself wallowed in self-pity until he broke himself (and six other people) on the altar of his ideals.

He didn't view women as objects to have sex with, as feminists in the mainstream have repeatedly claimed, blaming "male entitlement to women's bodies" while decrying those who talked about mental health as "excuse-makers" interested in shifting blame from the perpetrator. If he did see women that way, he'd have been a 22-year-old rapist, not a 22-year-old virgin. He viewed women as the yardstick by which he, as a man, should be measured. He viewed them as his judge and jury, the arbiters of his happiness and self-worth, goddesses who held his masculine identity in their hands, to be stroked or crushed as they saw fit. And he viewed himself as someone deserving of godhood but unable to pass the test of it.
He had a god complex and couldn't attract the affection and sexual attraction of a hot, White, blond goddess to validate him. The fact that some of his confusion and concerns are mirrored in those of the young men you know is … well, it's beside the point. Or, at least, it's beside this point.

The vast, vast, vast majority of men, even the staunch blue-pillers, are not Elliot Rodger. The vast majority of men do not feel entitled to women's bodies, and the few who do don't tend to die virgins. The vast majority of men face certain forms of discrimination and prejudice that simply don't affect women, most of them exacerbated by race, sexual orientation, and other factors outside of their control. Many of those forms of discrimination are at their worst when men come into conflict with women—in cases of divorce, parenthood, violence, sexual assault, and the like.

And feminism, for all of its talk about "equality" and "justice," has done little but lie to us. Like the feminist MPs insisting to backbencher Philip Davies (linked above) that the justice system is gender-blind, despite all evidence to the contrary, and like the feminists who instituted the Duluth Model years after the first studies were published demonstrating gender symmetry in domestic violence, feminism has misled us eight ways from Sunday.

Most men are just trying to make their way in the world, trying to find and hold on to relationships and a sense of self in the face of a million conflicting messages. They hear feminists say, "Men should be able to express their feelings; 'Boys don't cry' is a 'patriarchal norm,'" and then in the next breath, those same feminists accuse MRAs of being "whiny manbabies" and tweet pictures of themselves wearing shirts that declaim "I bathe in male tears" the moment a man objects to his treatment in society.

You said in your follow-up email that you don't know how all this stuff got politicized, but the MRM is not the group doing the politicizing. We are trying to redress inequalities that have existed for centuries, now that our environment no longer justifies them, and counter the feminist narrative that keeps men in their roles (stoicism, duty, support, protection) while simultaneously freeing women from any and all traditional expectations (chastity, fidelity, obedience, dependence).

The women's movement has been politicized for over 150 years, since the Declaration of Sentiments blamed men as a collective for the blanket oppression of women (over the objection of a substantial percentage of women, FYI).

That was the opening salvo in this gender war. A manifesto of bullet points all beginning with the word he but that were about "equality" and not about "blaming men."

The purest testament to the forbearance of men and their love of women is that it has taken 150 years for them, as a collective, to get pissed off enough to return fire.

This Week in Stupid – XL Gamer Edition!

AVfM Video Source · 31 August 2014 · Archived copy · Original

An amazing array of articles has suddenly been published declaring gamer culture vile and "over."

If you haven't been following the misandrist Social Justice Warrior and Feminist hijinx of Anita Sarkeesian, Zoe Quinn, and other incestuous, dishonest, bigoted sleazeballs in video game media, we hope to be publishing a roundup on it in the next few days. In the meantime, Sargon of Akkad and Mundane Matt have been vlogging about it in great detail. In the meantime, this latest video analysis by Sargon is spot on.

You may also want to follow the #gamergate hashtag on Twitter.

Cronyism, lies and censorship: What Zoe Quinn and gender ideologues bring to gaming (part 1)

Vincent James · 1 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: Part 2 of this series is now here. –Eds
This article is also available in Romanian.

On the 16th of August, a programmer named Eron Gjoni sat down and wrote a blog accusing his ex-girlfriend of adultery, not realizing that his actions were to be the spark of an internet wildfire. In the span of several days, the implications of his ex-girlfriend's relationships, emerging evidence of unscrupulous financing between feminist journalists and video game developers, as well as the efforts of numerous websites to bury these issues from public sight, have served to bring up damning evidence of the corruption that now permeates the games industry.

The blog in question offered evidence that Eron Gjoni's ex-girlfriend, the aspiring game developer and feminist activist Zoe Quinn, had cheated on him with five different men who are well-known in the game industry. One of these men, Nathan Grayson, is a journalist who gave her game publicity; another one of these men, Joshua Boggs, is a leading developer who gave her a job, allegedly after he and Zoe Quinn had sex. Sparked by this scandal, evidence has since emerged that other journalists such as Patricia Hernandez have been in close relations with developers for whom they wrote positive reviews and even whom they financially supported.

What's more disturbing is that as the story of these conflicts of interest went viral, the moderators and admins of various gaming websites including GameSpot, IGN, RockPaperShotgun, Escapist Magazine and NeoGAF, as well as the forums on Reddit and allegedly 4chan, went into damage control mode, deleting posts and banning users who spoke up about Zoe Quinn. On one gaming forum of the website Reddit alone, Quinn contacted one moderator who then promptly deleted as many as 25,000 posts on the topic. The webhosts of GamesNosh, the first gaming website to write about Zoe Quinn's cronyism, demanded that the website remove the article, while one well-respected game developer who expressed concern about cronyism in the industry overall was subjected to a number of insults as a result. The first article in a gaming journalism website discussing this issue had to be taken down because the site's webhost demanded it, and the first YouTube video about the issue was temporarily taken down after a false copyright infringement claim. In spite of this, the second YouTube video to be released gained more than 400,000 views within two days of going online (currently at 650,000) and a few independent gaming magazines such as Gaming Headlines and The Talking Ship began to write on the story.

In the midst of the controversy, it emerged that prominent game journalists were financing Zoe Quinn, a game developer whose work they were also meant to be critiquing. These very same game journalists closed ranks in the wake of a scandal and spoke in defense of Quinn, arguing that her sexual liaisons with a man who reviewed her work and, allegedly, a man who employed her were not relevant for the industry's reputation but merely private matters. Revelations quickly emerged, however, that some of these journalists were giving Quinn a monthly stipend via a funding website called Patreon, even though these journalists themselves are responsible for writing objective, impartial reviews of her work. Most of the people who defended Quinn, as well as the moderators who silenced her critics, had one thing in common: they were feminist "social justice warriors", people who were part of the same ideological clique and used journalism as a means to indoctrinate.

This is a story of collusion, duplicity and ideological whitewashing. A story about the people who have been aiming, for the last several years, to inject a toxic blend of male-shaming and propaganda into the world of computer games. The Zoe Quinn scandal and the censorship that followed is only the froth at the top of the poison vat, and this series intends to reveal the whole history of the feminist scams, purges and acts of censorship that have become all too commonplace in the game journalism industry. In part 1, we look at the incidents surrounding Zoe Quinn specifically; expect more names and more events to surface in later instalments.

For now, to give a bit of background, consider that several of the major online game magazines have openly stated their intent to push a “social justice” policy that places feminism at the forefront. The editor-in-chief of the website Kotaku, owned by avowedly pro-feminist Gawker Media, has written articles in support for Anita’s Sarkeesian’s “Tropes vs Women in Videogames” video series. Escapist Magazine portrayed her as a damsel in distress against (to quote its own words) a “Misogynist Horde”. Another website, RockPaperShotgun, has dedicated editorials on “sexism” in video games, in which, with one article stating that “RockPaperShotgun will never back down on the subject of sexism and misogyny” (emphasis theirs). GameOn magazine recently stated that “readers who feel threatened by equality [are] no longer welcome”, stating “if you really think feminism, or women, are destroying games, […] please leave this website” (again, emphasis theirs). These articles and others point to a pervasive culture of feminism in the game journalism industry.

With this in mind, let’s turn to the issue at hand. Zoe Quinn, who has participated at a few game jams and made a few short, amateur video games in the process, submitted a game called Depression Quest in late 2013 on Steam Greenlight, a service through which users can vote to make games available on the highly popular Steam online games shop. This usually requires a lot of marketing and a reasonably good game. Nevertheless, according to most of those who played Depression Quest, this was not a good game by any means. In some sense, it was not a game at all, but rather, a choose-your-own-adventure novel that would have been better off posted on a website than sent to Steam. Indeed, under normal circumstances, this game would not have been approved on Greenlight, and sure enough, it wasn’t accepted on its first submission. As the game wasn’t up to standards, what it needed to win was a lot of positive publicity unrelated to the contents of the game itself. What it needed was a semblance of victimhood.

So it is that after submitting her game once again, Zoe Quinn reportedly claimed that she had been harassed by members of a forum called WizardChan and had received abusive phone calls from them. She never gave more details, apart from pointing to one thread on WizardChan in which an anonymous poster tried to goad the forum regulars into criticizing Depression Quest. In that thread, rather than follow along, the forum regulars asked the anonymous poster to leave (“succubus infiltrator pls go”, in one member’s own terms) because they perceived the poster to be baiting them into trolling. All of this is reported in WizardChan’s version of the events.

There is no known evidence that the alleged phone calls came from WizardChan or any evidence that there were any phone calls to begin with. Moreover, given the obscure nature of WizardChan and the fact that threads older than a few days are automatically removed, it would have been all but impossible for Zoe Quinn to know about that particular forum thread unless she herself had written it; a single thread with no more than 10 replies in some desolate corner of the internet is very unlikely to be found by chance.

Understanding what WizardChan is about will show Zoe Quinn’s claims to be highly improbable if not utterly false. WizardChan is a site for men who are experiencing actual depression. Specifically, it is for middle-aged virgin men (“wizards”, as they refer to themselves) who are experiencing depression and who discuss such topics as wretchedness, meaninglessness and suicide. They repeatedly state their desire to isolate themselves from the “normies”, i.e. all people who are happier than they are. In some sense, they are like The Forgotten Ones from the computer game Oblivion, who have retreated into a dark, damp place and groan contemptfully at everyone who comes in to try to show them the light. WizardChan is by no means a website like the infamous 4chan, where online trolls tend to fraternize. Most of the members of WizardChan come there to withdraw from the world, and simply do not have enough motivation in their day-to-day lives to engage in online trolling.

Nevertheless, feminist game journalist Carly Smith picked up Zoe Quinn’s story of alleged harassment and wrote an article on it at Escapist Magazine, portraying her as a victim of misogyny in a profoundly sexist game industry. Feminist game journalist Christ Priestman also wrote his own article about the issue (which includes a screenshot of the people who called out the one anonymous poster on WizardChan for being a troll-baiter) on the website indiestatik. As a result of these stories, Zoe Quinn finally gained the public sympathy needed to place her game on Steam, while WizardChan received a bout of online mockery from her supporters.

Shortly before the articles in her support were published, Quinn had begun a relationship with Eron Gjoni, a programmer who also enjoyed making videogames. Eron recounts that throughout their relationship, Quinn cheated on him with at least five men, one of whom had a girlfriend at the time and one of whom was married.

Nathan Grayson, one of these men, was a game journalist who featured her work in one of his articles on the website Rock Paper Shotgun, claiming that it stood out among 50 new games released on Steam (two other games earned a passing mention and the others were simply lumped on an alphabetical list). Likewise, Joshua Boggs, who allegedly cheated on his wife with her, recruited her into his game studio. Grayson's employer, Stephen Totilo, all but confirmed Grayson's affair with Quinn, although he disputed any conflict of interest in Grayson's work by stating that they had not begun their relationship at the time his article on her was written.

All of this is documented in a chatlog that Eron Gjoni has posted online, in which he allegedly convinced Zoe Quinn to admit her affairs. As further evidence, Gjoni filmed himself, at his computer, browsing through the log on Facebook, so there is every reason to believe that the log is genuine. Likewise, Zoe Quinn implied that at least one of the affairs did occur when a woman declared that her boyfriend had cheated on her with Quinn.

Gjoni's three–part chatlog also gives us a picture of this woman's personality. Understanding this picture will give a new and important perspective on the censorship that followed the blog post, because it really is at the heart of everything that the censorship seeks to protect.

The information in the chatlog portrays Zoe Quinn as someone who expresses strong moral convictions that her actions reliably contravene. For instance, she went on twitter to state that having sex with one's romantic partner after committing adultery against them is equivalent to rape, as the partner would never give consent to having sex with his adulterer. Nevertheless, the chatlog presents her as someone who was content to "rape" her lover multiple times in this manner. Furthermore, in private, she told Eron Gjoni that it takes a single lie to ruin a committed relationship, even though, according to the chatlog, she lied to him on multiple occasions about multiple counts of adultery, and invented new lies when her old lies were exposed. Further along the chatlog, Zoe Quinn is shown asking Gjoni to break ties with one of his female friends in order to prove that he would never cheat on her, yet Eron Gjoni also claims that she kept a picture of herself and one of her alleged paramours, Robin Arnott, on her laptop's background screen for three months. Finally, the blog shows her claiming to Gjoni that she disliked the cliquish high-school politics of the game development scene, yet also shows her engaging in plenty of backstabbing politics.

This is a woman who, according to the chatlog, likes to be better at things than men are so she can mock them in front of their "stupid and boring friends" when they try to impress her with their own skills.

The chatlog portrays her to be a woman who cheats on her lover on a whim, who engages in reckless activities such as unprotected sex with multiple partners and drinking excessively, and who performs suicidal gestures to keep her from being (rightly) abandoned by her cheated-on lover. These are characteristic traits of Borderline Personality Disorder, a well-documented psychiatric disorder and part of the infamous Cluster B Disorders that abusive individuals usually possess. People with this disorder feed on creating drama around them and ruining the lives of their family members, while projecting a persona of helplessness and vulnerability on all those who fail to look beyond it. There are even support groups online dedicated to helping the people who were raised by or married to these dysfunctional individuals.

Eron Gjoni's three–part chatlog is in fact an excellent resource for psychiatry students investigating the disorder, as it shows exactly how a stereotypical person with Borderline Personality Disorder reacts when confronted with the risk of abandonment. Indeed, in a moment of self-awareness near the end of the first part of the chatlog, as her jaded lover considers abandoning her, it seems that, if the chatlog is indeed genuine, Zoe Quinn pretty much admits to suffering from the disorder herself, stating that she has become the same as her own abusive mother:

In her own words, she "thought she was better at policing the darkness left in her by being raised by a fucking pathological lying borderline monster", but "became the fucking monsters she grew up being fucking abused by". If the chatlog is genuine, then it gets to the heart of who Zoe Quinn is and what it is that her fellow feminists are defending.

According to the chatlog, shortly after making this admission, in a bid to pull Gjoni back into the relationship, Zoe Quinn claimed that she was contemplating suicide and that she needed someone to "watch her", to ensure that she wouldn't kill herself. This is classic Borderline behavior; psychiatrists refer to it as "suicidal gestures" or "parasuicide". Gjoni's blog goes on to allege further manipulation and other forms of psychological abuse by Zoe Quinn, all of which reflects a deeply abusive person.

It is critical to understand this. If the chatlog posted by Eron Gjoni is genuine, it implies that she is an abuser, a monster. It implies that her feminist cronies, who have been taking her side and shamelessly censoring the story of her corruption, who have even allegedly threatened to ruin people's career prospects if they spoke about Zoe Quinn, are protecting a monster.

Even without taking the chatlog into account, it could be argued that her cronies are monstrous themselves, as the level of their censorship in the wake of this scandal is staggering. To begin with, a woman going by the name of kc-vidya-rants wrote on her personal Tumblr page about the incident on the 17th of August, but her page has since been taken down. The first YouTube video discussing Eron Gjoni's blog post was likewise taken down, but was reuploaded on the 19th of August. Two articles about it were up on the same day, on the gaming websites GamesNosh and N4G, but both were promptly taken down as well. Indeed, the entire website GamesNosh was temporarily taken down by its own webhost for fear of reprisal from the "social justice" crowd. Zoe Quinn even went so far as to contact the Internet Archive, a non-profit project for storing the whole contents of the internet, and got them to remove the article from the archive itself.

After a respected game reviewer, who goes by the moniker TotalBiscuit, wrote about the incident in a long twitter post on the very same day, two more threads appeared on the Reddit website, one being in the forum Gaming and the other one in the forum PCgaming. The Gaming and Pcgaming threads instantly rose to prominence, the first of them gaining an extraordinary 25,000 comments; however, according to one screenshot, Zoe Quinn quickly contacted one of the Gaming forum's moderators, El_Chupacupcake, and had him delete the vast majority of the comments. Scrolling through the heavily censored thread reveals long stretches of deleted comments, which is so unusual for the forum that another thread was created by a confused user asking for information about the event, and received a total of 2,700 comments. The creator of the original Gaming thread was banned, as were many others who posted comments in that thread. When users asked other moderators to stop El_Chupacupcake, one of them was reportedly told to "fuck off" by another moderator, Gaget.

It emerged that the admins of Reddit, who oversee the entire website, have condoned the censorship and have even engaged in censorship of their own, deleting a forum that sprang up for the sake of discussing the incident.

Similar censorship occurred in the Pcgaming forum, although some of the moderators there had the sense to restore the deleted comments. At least two PCGaming moderators, Gaget and CSFFlame, took part in the censorship, the latter making the false statement that most of the deleted posts had been deleted by the users themselves.

The forums of the popular gaming websites GameSpot, IGN, Escapist Magazine, RockPaperShotgun and NeoGAF locked threads related to the incident and banned the users who commented on them. One user on the NeoGAF forums, Anthony Filipas was informed that his reason for being banned was "We prefer not to let terrible posters participate on this forum". He had neither engaged in nor been accused of any wrongdoing, but was banned nevertheless, suggesting that the only wrongdoing here was on the moderators' part.

One Reddit user, ReverseSolipsist, went ahead to say that he had previously been bullied for attempting to speak up about Zoe Quinn, receiving threats to his career if he made any negative comments about her.

On the 20th of August, Greg Tito, the editor in chief of Escapist Magazine, further called Zoe Quinn's detractors "deluded conspiracy theorists" on his own forum, proudly admitted that he had no evidence for Zoe's claims of harassment yet still ran a story condemning WizardChan, and vocally praised the concept of "social justice" to which Zoe Quinn's cronies adhered, even as El_Chupacupcake was busy deleting most of the 25,000 comments in the Gaming thread and even while Greg Tito's own moderators were permanently banning users, writing "User was banned for: Zoe Quinn and the surrounding controversy" as their only justification.

In spite of the censorship, however, articles discussing the incident have emerged on the websites Gaming Headlines, The Talking Ship, Ruthless Reviews, TechRaptor and NicheGamer, as well as the popular website knowyourmeme. The first YouTube video discussing Zoe Quinn, which had been removed from YouTube after a false copyright claim on it, has since been reuploaded without incident. Several more videos were since released on various channels. This includes two videos on InternetAristocrat's channel that have had a combined total of more than a million views, each of the videos having a ratio of roughly 30 upvotes for each downvote. This is a story that is clearly important to many people, and almost everyone is supporting those who are bringing the evidence forward. This story is shaping itself, as it stands, as a clash between the game journalists that have risen to positions of influence in the last decade and the gaming public that frowns on their corruption.

The game journalists in question have nevertheless been very vocal in public. Zoe Quinn herself has referred to her detractors as "semen stained keyboard warriors". One of Zoe Quinn's cronies, Patrick Lindsey, informed a few of her other cronies on twitter that Zoe Quinn wants them to maintain “radio silence” on the topic. Chris Thursten, Deputy editor of PC Gamer, tweeted “Just saw one of those misogynistic game journo conspiracy theory YouTube videos that fourteen year old boys like to make nowadays.” Award-winning game developer Phil Fish went further and attempted to ridicule TotalBiscuit for his twitter post by saying “totalbiscuit is a gross nerd.”; “on top of being a YOUTUBER eeeewwww” and “grossssssss” on his own twitter page. Other comments of his towards Zoe Quinn’s critics included “absolutely pathetic, ball-less manboobs.”.

Importantly, Phil Fish also made the allegation that members of the forum “/v/” on the website 4chan, which is notorious for its crude language and nasty online pranks, had hacked into the website of his gaming studio Polytron, its twitter account and Zoe Quinn’s own tumblr account. In response to the allegations, 4chan moderators immediately contacted the FBI, who reportedly informed them that the host of Polytron’s website, CloudFlare, requires two-factor authentication to log on from an untrusted computer. This means that, without access to his computer or mobile, no hacker could have broken into the website, yet Phil Fish made no report of either his computer or his mobile being stolen. Another issue that stood out is that, during the alleged hacking, a 1.5 gigabyte archive containing records of Polytron’s game development acitvities and private contracts with other companies was uploaded onto the website, which would not have been possible in the short time it took for him to tweet about the alleged hacking. Moreover, it would have been far more convenient for any hacker to simply place the archive on an external site and link to it. This and other inconsistencies in the purported hacking have been described by members of 4chan themselves. Remarkably, Phil Fish did not contact his local police department, the FBI or any other authorities to deal with the hackers.

Following this incident with his website, Phil Fish announced he would give up on game development and sell his company. In response, the websites DailyDot, IGN, GameSpot and NewGamerNation have penned articles condemning 4chan for the alleged hacking. It is noteworthy that only DailyDot used the word “alleged”, even though no investigation has taken place and no evidence exists that the website had actually been hacked, as opposed to having been altered by Phil Fish himself.

Zoe Quinn also claimed that members of 4chan had hacked her personal webpage on Tumblr. At the time of the alleged hacking, the last post on her Tumblr page showed the words “HACKED BY 4CHAN.ORG/V/” and featured what appeared to be some of her personal information. This included what was supposedly her mobile phone number, but is in fact a landline number in Honolulu, Hawaii. Zoe Quinn lives in Boston, Massachussets, at the very opposite end of America, and has apparently never gone to Hawaii, which raises the question as to how her alleged hackers could have made such a gross error if they were indeed capable of hacking her Tumblr account. Moreover, like Phil Fish, Zoe Quinn did not report any hacking to the authorities. These inconsistencies expose the possibility that the hacking never took place, and that Zoe Quinn had simply claimed she had been hacked in order to gain public sympathy.

As the censorship and the claims of hacking arose, so did new evidence that Zoe Quinn was being financed by game journalists via the funding website Patreon. This is a serious conflict of interest that stands at the heart of the controversy: as a game developer, her work is meant to be reviewed impartially by game journalists, yet these very same journalists are the ones giving her money. In part 2, it will become clear that they are all pursuing a political agenda, which is why the journalists are giving money to a developer whose work they will later favorably review, and not the other way around. The journalists in question include Ben Kuchera and Philip Kollar, two editors at the gaming website Polygon; Kirk Hamilton, an editor at the gaming website Kotaku; and Jeremy Parish, editor-in-chief at Gamespite. Another notable funder of Zoe Quinn is Akira Thompson, one of the organizers of the game festival IndieCade. This is relevant given that Zoe Quinn was given a slot to showcase Depression Quest at IndieCade’s Night Games event in 2013.

Again regarding funding, Zoe Quinn claims to be organizing a feminist game development event called Rebel Jam. As of the 23rd of August, this event was not receiving donations into any account of its own, but into Quinn’s personal account on Patreon, making it impossible to distinguish which payments are being made for Rebel Jam and which are being made for Zoe Quinn herself. Because of this, and because she has so far given no schedule and made no arrangements to start Rebel Jam, it is reasonable to ask whether the money was ever intended to reach the event at all.

To summarize, a feminist game developer pushed her game into the spotlight by making dubious claims of harassment that were never investigated. Her former lover later accused her of exchanging sex for positive reviews and a career boost in the process of cheating on him with at least five men. Owing to her connections in the game journalism industry, including people who explicitly finance her, she shut down most discourse regarding this story on major websites and got these websites to print articles in her favor despite the protests of the vast majority of gamers themselves. Those game journalists who did not conform were threatened into silence. Yet by mobilizing her fellow game journalists against anyone who wished to expose her corruption, Zoe Quinn inadvertently revealed their corruption as well.

So why is all this happening? Why are all these game journalists silencing dissent on Zoe Quinn's behalf? In part 2 of the series, I will look into the political affilitations of her cronies and show evidence that much of game journalism today is dominated by feminist cliques, by fraudulent "social justice warriors" who have transformed what was once an enjoyable pursuit into an ideological minefield. We will explore these people's goals, their utter contempt for integrity and the false victim narrative in which they guise themselves. We will examine their connections and their modus operandi. These are the people who want to turn gaming into a part of their propaganda machine; it is our duty to ensure, armed with the knowledge of their actions and identities, that this will never happen.

Note: For Part 2 click here.

Feature image courtesy of Wikimedia Commons

What is Violence Against Men Day?

Angry Harry · 1 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Stop Violence Against Men Day – which occurs on the first day of every month – is a day in which people are reminded that violence against men is just as wrong as is violence against anyone else.

After all, men are human beings too!

Furthermore, violence against men is, and has been, a huge problem right across the planet – for many thousands of years, spreading misery among millions of people.

Indeed, wars throughout the whole of history have, essentially, been wars against men.

True, most of the perpetrators are men, but any intelligent person knows full well that any victims of violence are victims of violence; regardless of who is the perpetrator.

And yet people nowadays seem to think that if, for example, men are violently assaulted by other men, then the assaulted men just do not count as victims.

These male victims are simply swept under the carpet, psychologically speaking, and they are cunningly disappeared from view.

[image]Indeed, the official domestic violence statistics also sweep them under the carpet by specifically excluding male victims of domestic violence if the perpetrators are men.

There is no moral justification for this. It seems to be just a ploy to hide the true scale of the problem of violence against men.

Indeed, many media organisations such as the BBC bend over backwards to hide the sex of the victims of just about anything whenever these victims are men, but they highlight and headline their sex to an almost embarrassing degree whenever these victims are women.

Men dying from prostate cancer become ‘patients’, ‘sufferers’, ‘people’, ‘hospital inmates’, ‘those afflicted with the disease’.

When men are killed in, say, Iraq, then they are ‘Iraqis’, ‘ Americans’, ‘insurgents’, ‘terrorists’, ‘troops’, ‘soldiers’, ‘recruits’, ‘combatants’, ‘fighters”, ‘pilots’, ‘crew’, ‘the enemy’, the ‘allies’.

When men die in mines then they are ‘miners’, ‘excavators’, ‘workers’, ’employees’, ‘locals’.

Whenever any victims are women, however, then they are “women, women and women”.

Similarly, the appalling levels of violence directed at men throughout the whole of history is often craftily discounted by pointing out that it is men who have mostly been at the heads of the powers that have inflicted this violence.

And this is true.

For example, the reigning monarchs in Europe for the past 1500 years or so have been mostly men. And in earlier times, the great leaders of, for example, Persia, Egypt, Greece and Rome were nearly always men.

But these rulers and their elites have both gained and used their powers mostly by enslaving and/or slaughtering millions of men.

Indeed, it is mostly through inflicting violence upon men, or threatening to do so, that they managed to accrue so much power – and to hold on to it – in the first place.

Essentially, violence against men was the route to power.

(For the most part, and comparatively speaking, the women were mostly left to get on with their reproductive roles and their domestic chores.)

History provides us with countless examples of men being slaughtered or enslaved with impunity, with millions of men also being forced into becoming soldiers in order to serve their rulers; oftentimes also being heavily indoctrinated with carefully-crafted mumbo-jumbo in order to turn them into mindless sacrificial drones willing to serve their masters.

Nowadays, in western countries, the situation for men is not so bad. But it is still the case that the vast majority of victims of violence – unjustified violence, that is – are men.

This issue needs to be addressed rather than ignored.

While billions of dollars in the western world are poured annually into campaigns designed to reduce violence against women, there is almost no money at all to support campaigns to do the same for men, even though men make up the vast majority of victims of violence; both at home and abroad.

And so Stop Violence Against Men Day is just an attempt to highlight this problem by making people more aware that violence against men is just as wrong as is violence against anyone else, and that men make up the vast majority of victims when it comes to violence.

So, please spread the word by, for example, linking to this piece, or by referring to "Stop Violence Against Men Day" whenever it seems appropriate to do so – especially on the first day of every month!

It would also be really good to see a new article every month on this subject that MRAs can link to. So, please consider writing one – or producing a video – which addresses Stop Violence Against Men Day so that, every month, we can draw attention to the plight of male victims of violence.

AVFM suggestion. Please tweet this article with the hashtag #endfeminism.

Indie-fensible! – The Maya “Legobutts” Kramer Story!

AVfM Video Source · 1 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It increasingly appears that the corruption in gaming goes much deeper than the corrupt incestuous journalism. It appears that you can buy or fuck your way into winning public accolades and awards.

http://youtu.be/TgW5NRUfs44

A fascinating collection of links to be found in the low bar to this video right here.

Mike Buchanan calls feminists out on British TV

AVfM Video Source · 1 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Watch our friend Mike do what MRAs need to do on his London Live appearances. Great work Mike! PE

MythBusting the Gender Pay Gap

Elaine Finklestein · 2 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A response to Pamela Coukos, US Dept. of Labor Senior Program Advisor

Pamela Coukos, US Dept. of Labor Senior Program Advisor (and perhaps Senior Propaganda Advisor?), wrote a blog post titled "Myth Busting the Pay Gap." At first, Coukos's arguments that there is a gender pay gap and that it's related to sexism look reasonable. After all, she doesn't claim that 100% of the difference in men's and women's wages comes from sexism. She writes, "Economists generally attribute about 40% of the pay gap to discrimination—making about 60% explained by differences between workers or their jobs."

My reaction to that: Wow! Economists, who rarely agree on anything at all, really agree that 40% of the pay gap is related to discrimination? I've got to learn more about this!Coukos didn't specify any economists as part of her claim, so I did my own homework.

After looking for it, I found the word "discrimination" associated with 40% of the pay gap within the work of only one economist: Harvard professor Claudia Goldin. But in context, I learned that Goldin doesn't think that 40% of gender earnings differences come from sexism. In reality, she explains that economists have used "discrimination" as a placeholder word—just a name to call that 40% while they figure out what is really causing the difference. But don't take my word for it: Goldin writes, "Most of the gender wage gap studies have produced estimates of an 'explained' and a 'residual' portion. The 'residual' is often termed 'wage discrimination' since it is the difference in earnings between observationally identical males and females." In the rest of her paper, Goldin comes up with potential explanations for this "residual" number, which have nothing to do with sexism.

A better explanation for the "discrimination" residual, Goldin concludes, is the fact that women don't allow their schedules to be bossed around as much. They choose variations of work time that are more convenient for them, whereas men choose their work hours—and what they do during their work hours—based on what the company tells them it needs. Flexibility, including more choices when it comes to being "on call" or having "face time," Goldin explains, "comes at a high price."

Goldin explains that increased flexibility standards and improved cross-training (i.e., making it possible for workers to replace each other more easily) could almost entirely close the earnings gap between men and women who work the same jobs, which is why newer sectors of the economy, such as health and information technologies, experience the smallest "residual" number (difference between otherwise identical men and women). At the end of her publication, Goldin suggests that as we work toward a more equal workplace, "The last chapter … for gender equality is not a zero-sum game in which women win and men lose. This matter is not just a woman's issue. Many workers will benefit from greater flexibility."

So, Pamela Coukos, if you're reading this: Claudia Goldin is a Harvard economist who called the 40% residual "discrimination" in an academic paper but did not actually attribute that number to gender discrimination. Therefore, it seems that you either do not read or, worse, do not understand the work of the economists you refer to.

Still, I like giving people the benefit of the doubt. Maybe it's the economists' fault for using such a messy, politically charged placeholder word. Below, I'll take a look at some of Coukos's other claims.

Coukos "busts the myth" that "Saying women only earn 77 cents on the dollar is a huge exaggeration—the 'real' pay gap is much smaller" with more of the same mathematically irresponsible rhetoric. She simply rewords the same misleading statistic, comparing "a working woman" to "a working man," but she again ignores the variables that economists like Claudia Goldin so painstakingly separate out—the most important being career choice. As a full-time marketer/copy editor, I don't make as much as a full-time JC Penney CEO. But I'm a "working woman," and he's a "working man," so that must be sexism, right?

Coukos then adds insult to injury, writing, “Once you factor in race, the pay gap for women of color is even larger.” Really, Pamela? Statistically, black men make less than white men, largely due to education and career choice. Similarly, black women make less than black men, so naturally, black women make less than white men. What is your point here?

Coukos also suggests that “high-school girls are discouraged from taking math and science classes that lead to high-paying STEM jobs,” so we should “in some way count that toward a lost equal earnings opportunity.” But her argument falls short in two ways: first, she offers no evidence that girls are discouraged from entering the sciences; on the contrary, you can use a simple Google search to find hundreds of scholarships for women who want to do math and science. Google itself, for example, offers the Anita Borg scholarship for women in technology. Apple offers $10,000 to promising female engineers through its iOS scholarship for women in technology. Neither firm offers a similar scholarship for men.

Second, economists would not be so quick to quantify the feeling of “discouragement” within a hard number like “earnings potential.” An economist would wonder, how much “discouragement” equals a dollar less in earning potential? Or should we see it as a Boolean variable, so that someone can be either “discouraged” or “not discouraged”? What about compassionate, childcare-oriented boys who are discouraged from pursuing early childhood-related professions? Can we quantify that as reduced “happiness potential”?

Perhaps the soundest part of Coukos’s argument is her citation of a study that compares the earnings of entry-level male and female doctors. The study controls for variables like practice location, specialty, and hours worked, and the researchers conclude that male doctors start out earning $16,000 more. However, it’s not clear that other, possibly unconsidered variables aren’t important—for example, do more men attend the most prestigious medical and residency programs? Or, since the gap is widest between male and female doctors who run their own private practices, do women hire less competent staff? Who invests more in digital marketing? Many behavioral variables might explain a 12% earnings difference like the one in that study.

Coukos concludes that it is the government’s job to fix the earnings differences between men and women, but there’s no reason to assume that the government is the best solution, even if the problem is real. For example, she mentions a seemingly benign government initiative to help women “know their worth,” but we have to remember that these government initiatives—and their employees—are funded by taxpayer dollars. Perhaps if we put that money in parents’ hands instead of hiring even more government workers, they could access more extracurricular resources to help their daughters and their sons grow, develop marketable skills, and “know their worth.”

[image]

TL;DR – Pamela Coukos, please read the research you cite. Also, consider the idea that maybe the best way to get a happy, fulfilled workforce is not with a regulatory band-aid but with preventative, customized care that starts in the family.

This item printed originally on the Honeybadger Brigade. –DE

How to use “Affirmative Consent” to destroy campus feminists in California

August Løvenskiolds · 2 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

California has just passed the so-called “Affirmative Consent” statute, which you can read in its entirety here, into law – at the time of this writing it is awaiting only the signature of Governor Jerry Brown to go into force. Unfortunately for feminists, the law has a gigantic loophole in it that men can, if they choose, easily exploit to destroy the educations, careers, and even the lives of any sexually active campus feminist woman they wish.

The law was designed by feminists who are worried that the decline in actual rapes – currently at a 41-year low – will undermine their victim narrative, wherein they shame and otherwise abuse and coerce men into giving them benefits, breaks, and other free stuff, which feminists believe women are entitled to under patriarchy theory. They hope the law will create more “date rapes” out of thin air, which feminists could then spin into the propaganda maelstrom they are forever farming.

The law attempts to undermine, criminalize, and demonize certain steps in the normal process of seduction by requiring “affirmative consent” – an even stronger standard than overt agreement – to sexual escalation into the process of a man and a woman hooking up for sex. (Yes, this article is hetero-normative – much like the mindsets of those who wrote the law itself – but feel free to substitute whatever sexes, genders, or lack thereof into the text of this article as you see fit.)

Although the stated idea behind the law is to eliminate the misunderstandings that occasionally might occur during the convoluted dance of human mating, in practice the law will strip away the mystery and flirtatious excitement of prospective liaisons in favor of a deadened, mechanical series of questions typical of, say, a legal deposition.

Let’s see how a sociopathic (or really, any) man could use this law to crush the academic career and future of a feminist woman student – imagine that, maybe the guy is competing against her for a scholarship, internship, or some other honor bestowed by virtue of their educational achievement and he wants to level the playing field by wrecking the advantages women students enjoy by virtue of being women. Note that he can pull this seduction scenario himself, or hire a more attractive man to run the scam for him:

- Him: May I buy/get you a drink? (Feminist woman: Um, yes.)
- Him: I imagine it took a lot of courage for you to wear that outfit…(Why do you say that?)

Skipping ahead an hour or so past the PUA patois into the later evening and assuming the guy is closing the sale:

- Him: Well, it is getting late, but I’d like to continue this conversation – may I walk you back to your place? (Um, yes.)
- Him: May I come in? (Um, yes.)
- Him: May I kiss you on the lips? (Um, yes.)
- Him: May I hold you close to me? (Um, yes.)
- Him: May I fondle your breasts? (Um, yes.)
- Him: May I remove your shirt/blouse/bikini top? (Um, yes).
- Him: May I lick the Femen paint from your nipples? (Um, sure).

Now, imagine that despite the creepy awkwardness of this exchange, the state-mandated call-and-response continues with the woman giving affirmative (if underenthusiastic) consent every step of the way through foreplay, vaginal sexual intercourse, anal sexual intercourse, or whatever. And now, the next morning, the man delivers the metaphorical coup de grâce:

- Him: You know, you never once asked ME if I wanted to have sex with YOU. You, madam, are a rapist!

What the fuck, you say? How is this even possible?

The law as written states:

> "Affirmative consent" means affirmative, conscious, and voluntary agreement to engage in sexual activity. It is the responsibility of each person involved in the sexual activity to ensure that he or she has the affirmative consent of the other or others to engage in the sexual activity. Lack of protest or resistance does not mean consent, nor does silence mean consent. Affirmative consent must be ongoing throughout a sexual activity and can be revoked at any time. [emphasis added].

Because he was recording the entire encounter (did I not mention this?), the guy got the girl's explicit and clear, affirmative consent every step of the way – when she said, "Um, yes" – but she never asked HIM for HIS explicit affirmative consent. Affirmative consent goes both ways under this law, and in this case, the feminist girl never bothered to get affirmative consent from the guy and so, legally, she's screwed.

Feminists in particular teach and remind each other all the time that "all men are rapists," and so it would never occur to them to ask a man for his consent, especially since he was taking the lead anyway.

Can the girl claim that the guy gave some sort of implicit consent by taking the lead in every escalation of the sexual union? Well, of course he did, but the law requires that she secure affirmative consent, not implicit consent:

> Lack of protest or resistance does not mean consent, nor does silence mean consent….it shall not be a valid excuse to alleged lack of affirmative consent that the accused believed that the complainant consented to the sexual activity under either of the following circumstances:
>
> (A) The accused's belief in affirmative consent arose from the intoxication or recklessness of the accused.
> (B) The accused did not take reasonable steps, in the circumstances known to the accused at the time, to ascertain whether the complainant affirmatively consented. [emphasis added]

This subpoint (B) destroys the girl's defense that she imagined that the sexual aggression of the man implied the man's consent because it was not AFFIRMATIVE consent under the law, and so, she is still in clear violation of the law – and even if she were drunk, she cannot use that as a defense to the accusation under subpoint (A).

Her academic career is over and her life will be ruined.

This new law will backfire against feminists in the same way that the original gender-neutral domestic violence laws backfired – those laws led to far more women being arrested for domestic violence than men simply because women are used to assaulting men, whereas men are comparatively reluctant to assault women. The so-called Duluth Model had to be invented to re-genderize domestic violence laws into do-MEN-stic violence wherein even if the woman was beating the man, the man got arrested.

I expect a similar correction will be attempted for this "Affirmative Consent" law in the ways that feminists always twist gender-neutral, equal laws to suit their real agenda of gaining more and more power for women at the expense of men.

But for the time being and until they fix it, have fun with it, guys.

The Rape Fantasy: Does it actually mean anything?

Dr. David Ley · 2 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of the hardest presentations I've ever given was at a conference on treating sexual assault. My presentation set the stage, inviting people to consider the broad range of sexual behaviors, which fall under the concept of normal. In the content, I explored the issue of the female rape fantasy, how it presents in therapy, and its relation to the effects of assault. During the presentation, I recall looking cautiously towards several women in the audience, who I knew were there as advocates for rape victims.

My hesitance was because I was presenting that the rape fantasy is exceedingly common among women, with as many as 25-40% of women endorsing some form of this fantasy, at least once in their lives. (Fellow PT blogger Michael Castleman has a wonderful article with further statistics and research on the prevalence of this fantasy.)

Some women who have experienced the tragedy of sexual assault go on to be tormented by tremendous psychological turmoil over sexual fantasies of rape and forceful sex. They describe being angry and upset with themselves, confused that they and their bodies are responding with sexual arousal to a fantasy similar to an event that was so traumatic and devastating.

Many women (and not a few men) I've spoken to over the years have disclosed to me their personal fantasies of being forced to have sex, usually with embarrassment, shame, and fear. They struggle over what this fantasy means, about them as a person, as a woman or a man, as a victim. Women have told me that they struggle with being a feminist, and yet still getting aroused at the idea of being taken by a man, against their will.

There is a general assumption, among people, advocates and therapists, that for a victim of sexual assault to fantasize about being violated, there must be something wrong. This fantasy must reflect some pathological process. I disagree. First, I will point out the prevalence of the fantasy of rape among women and men who have never experienced such events. The rape fantasy may very well occur independent of a traumatic event.

Does this fantasy of forced sex reflect the concept of "eroticization of fear," that people manage anxiety by unconsciously turning it into a sexual situation? Perhaps, but I don't think so. The situation was already sexual in the first place, during the rape. Though rape and sexual assault do contain much violence, there is sex there already, in the mind and body of both victim and offender. In child victims I treat, there is often a struggle as they enter adolescence and sexual development, because the "model" for sexuality that they have encountered was often one based upon assault. Perhaps, if anything, this fantasy reflects the recovery of eroticism FROM the effects of fear.

Does this fantasy by a victim represent "identification with the aggressor," and the idea that a victim is identifying with her offender in this fantasy? Again, I don't think so. In such fantasies, victims are rarely, in my experience, putting themselves in the mind or place of the aggressor. Instead, they are playing the role of the victim, but in a manner in which they are in charge – it's happening in their head, in their control, under the power of their imagination.

What does the rape fantasy mean? Lots of things. And perhaps in that, it means nothing. Our society romanticizes rape and violence, in complex and disturbing ways, from the Beast pounding on Beauty's door in the Disney movie Beauty and the Beast, to the contents of thousands of romance novels, where women "swoon" and "succumb" to male passions and dominance. Fantasies of forced eroticism may, in some cases, be the result of social programming. Evolutionary biologist Randy Thornhill argues convincingly that rape is something that has occurred throughout human history, and thus, following his argument, these fantasies may reflect evolutionary adaptations. Psychologist Roy Baumeister has proposed that the fantasy of submission reflects a desire to escape from the burden of self, from the chore of being responsible, and in charge of your own existence.

I don't believe that women in general, or sexual assault victims specifically, are retraumatizing themselves by revisiting these experiences and fantasies. For many, I believe that, like any fantasy or daydream, it is a way for a person to mentally assert control over a situation in which they were powerless. We must remember that the great majority of sexual assaults go unreported, that the majority of victims move forward in their lives, and that it is the label of “powerlessness” and “traumatized” that may actually harm more than help. People do better when they move forward after a trauma, maintaining a sense of personal autonomy and power, developing a narrative that they, not the event and situation, nor the perpetrator, are in charge of their lives and actions.

[image]
Detail from The Rape of The Sabine Women.
I suggest that sometimes, we as clinicians have to pull back, and give up our disease model thinking. We should not automatically characterize this fantasy as a symptom of an illness, resulting from a history of rape or sexual assault. Instead, we may need to consider the possibility that this fantasy represents a normal, even a healthy, attempt by a person to regain some control over their sexuality, and the way in which their traumatic history affects them. When such fantasies are distressing, we should help people to recognize that the more energy and attention they give this fantasy, the harder they resist it, like a Chinese finger trap, the harder it fights back and the more power it gains. Ignore such fantasies. Dismiss them. When they occur, if it is distressing to you, change your fantasy to something else, or get up and drink a glass of milk, and try again later. Take a time-out.

After my presentation, one of the women I had been cautiously watching came up to me. She had presented that day, on her own experience as a victim of rape. She hugged me, and thanked me for my presentation. She shared that she also had experienced such fantasies, and had struggled with them and her own reaction to them. She left, saying that my thoughts had helped her, and had given her permission to free her mind, her body and her sexuality, and to stop tearing herself up over her fantasies. It was nice that I was able to give her one less thing to worry about.

Subscribe to Dr. Ley on Twitter @drdavidley.

Open Letter to the People of Ferguson, Missouri

Chandrapal S Bhasker · 2 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: a group of Men's Human Rights Activists unaffiliated with AVfM, led by Chandrapal Bhasker, recently submitted this to us for publication via Facebook. Most of the signers are from outside the United States. –Eds

We the undersigned, members of the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) want to express our support for and solidarity with the citizens of Ferguson, Missouri in light of the recent violence there. Mike Brown was a young man who lost his life needlessly at the hands of a police officer and it is our intention to condemn the Ferguson police for their illegal and immoral violence against him. Brown was well loved by his family and friends and we would like to take this opportunity to acknowledge their grief, offer our deepest condolences.

A community ought to be able to trust in its leadership and police to protect it from danger. When the governmental authority and law enforcement of a community forget who they serve, we lose sight of this country's founding principles of freedom and equality and inevitably head for institutional violence. This tragedy and others like it in recent memory like the deaths of Trayvon Martin in Florida, Eric Gardner in New York, and Kelly Thomas in California call into question the integrity of American policing and its various levels of leadership. Included in the MHRM's concerns over integrity of leadership are the local, state, and federal legislatures which write and oversee the implementation of law and order.

In condoning and even promoting gender profiling on suspicion of crime, the possibility of racial profiling becomes inevitable. One must ask why such violence seems limited to male citizens and particularly black and poor / working-class white male citizens. One must also ask what consequences await men and boys of other racial identities if such violent profiling is allowed to continue unabated. Research suggests that 70% of street violence is experienced by males. Facts clearly indicate that most victims of police brutality and custodial deaths in the US are men. It is a shameful mockery of justice that the gender which constitutes most victims of the social violence is also targeted by the sworn protectors of the populace for horrendous individual and institutional violence.

One answer to the question of why this is the case is that men and adolescent boys are treated as potential threats and therefore as likely criminals rather than as allies in the community. In our increasingly anti-male, sexist and misandric societies male strength is mischaracterized as destructive rather than as protective or capable of good work on behalf of the community. Such prejudice often creates an environment of resentment and distrust between the police and the men of the community thus leading to a self-fulfilling judgment from one side to another. Some laws in particular support this prejudicial culture which can be discussed at another time.

It is most clear, however, that the racism of the history of the United States and of Missouri in this particular case has never truly faded from practice. When a mostly White police force has the authority to kill a Black man in a mostly Black community without evidence or reasonable cause and is not held criminally accountable, the parallels to the Jim Crow South are very obvious. Even post Jim Crow practices such as using real estate companies and migration restrictions to control the demographics of suburban districts can be credited with the segregation that can be observed in and around Ferguson. It is no surprise then that the police are more violent in the black communities and then claim that such neighborhoods are incidentally more deserving of police force.

Having said this, let it be noted that the MHRM does not condone the profiling of any race or class of people, but rather the just and accurate judgment of individuals and groups based on the merits of their actions. We do not wish to convey the idea that being White necessarily makes one guilty of racism. Instead we wish to point to the truth of this particular matter as an effort to warn against future tragedies of this sort.

Ultimately, the Men's Human Rights Movement wants to see reform of law enforcement culture which will foster more peaceful community relations and conflict resolution. The "shoot first, ask questions later" approach ends the lives of men and hurts the hearts of their communities. The safety and rights of male citizens are no less important and worthy of care than those of anybody else. Mike Brown was a human being first, not a suspect or a criminal.

Humanity is humanity regardless of class, color, race, or gender.

In solidarity,
Jordan Allen, Chief Liaison Officer, Gender Analytics Foundation

Chandrapal S Bhasker, Gender Analytics Foundation

Zachery Lorentz, Founder & Host, Untermensch Podcast

Yuan Hua Lim, President, Singapore Men & Family Welfare Organization

Deborah Kendrick, Founder, Words Within The Walls

Photo by Lovesofbread. –Eds

“Quinnspiracy” Part 1 – Zoe Quinn and the Wizardchan Raid

AVfM Video Source · 2 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Probably one of the most disgusting aspects of the Zoe Quinn Gamergate press scandal, and the one least-noticed, was the horrific bullying of a group called Wizardchan, an online support group for depressed men. Some Asian Guy has a lot to say about that. Here’s Part 1.

http://youtu.be/9tT_O4pU7aM

Links:

Wizardchan Album
Zoepost blog
MundaneMatt Vid (Reupload)
Original InternetAristocrat Video

Early references to “Men going their own way”

Peter Wright · 3 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Despite false claims that the phrase was invented during the last decade, “Men Going Their Own Way,” or variants such as “going his own way,” or “go his own sweet way,” is now hundreds of years old.

Here are a few examples (out of thousands) showing that the phrase, as used in reference to men’s freedoms, is an old one:

1996
[image]

1939
[image]

1936
[image]

1922
[image]

1917
[image]

1899
[image]

1897
[image]

1889
[image]

1886
[image]

1880
[image]

1856
[image]

1853
[image]

Stefan Molyneux: Presentation to the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

Stefan Molyneux · 3 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In continuing to present full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014, here we bring you the controversial Stefan Molyneux of Freedomain Radio. His was the sixth and final presentation from Day 2, Saturday, June 28, 2014 and, while controversial, was considered by many to be quite funny (which may not be apparent from just reading the transcript). Our thanks once again to Rick Westlake for doing the bulk of the work of this transcription. —DE (Attila Vinczer:) He is a philosopher, an author, a speaker, and a host of Freedomain Radio. He is a strong advocate for non-violent parenting. He has authored eight books, and his essays have been widely published on libertarian sites such as LewRockwell.com. Freedomain Radio has produced over 1,500 videos and 2,700 podcasts. Jeffrey Tucker of the Ludwig von Mises Institute described Molyneux as one of the single most influential libertarian thinkers of our times. Freedomain Radio was a top 10 finalist in the 2007 and 2008 Podcast Awards in the Education category.

Stefan has interviewed Noam Chomsky, Zeitgeist founder Peter Joseph, psychological development and addiction specialist Gabor Maté, developmental psychologist Alison Gopnik, child psychologist Peter Gray, Socratic journalist Jan Helfeld, Harvard economics lecturer and Cato Institute fellow Jeffrey Miron, and intellectual-property attorney Stephan Kinsella. His videos and podcasts have been downloaded more than 65 million times.

Stefan spent 15 years as a software developer, manager, and entrepreneur. Now a full-time parent and philosopher, Stefan speaks regularly at conferences all over the globe. He has appeared on numerous TV shows, including ReasonTV, the Peter Schiff Show, the Corbett Report, and Adam vs. The Man. Please put your hands together for Stefan Molyneux.

(Applause. Stefan Molyneux takes the podium.)

It's kind of late in the day; how's everyone doing? We may need to move around a little, get the blood flowing a little … You guys can hear me? I'd like to move around a bit because that messes up the camera-people …

Thanks, everyone, for coming out. You guys can hear me okay? Yeah?

I was upstairs and somebody asked me today, "Are you a Men's Rights Activist?" Which is something I'd actually not really thought about before. What popped into my head was, it's like going to a doctor and saying, "Do you treat cholera?" We take on all illnesses here, if you're a doctor. If you're a philosopher, your enemy is Evil. A lot of philosophers don't like to talk about it, but it is the case that your enemy is Evil if you're a philosopher. And there is Evil, of course, in what the Men's Rights Movement is trying to expose and oppose. So I guess you could say, as a doctor treats cholera, I am a Men's Rights Activist.

Now, Evil is one slippery bastard, which is why it's still here. You know, it goes through the ductwork; it's like Ripley, in Aliens, you know. It crawls up your leg. It's in your jam. It's everywhere. And the real challenge of Evil is that you can't ever really fight it—because the moment everyone recognizes something as Evil, it's done! The great challenge is in the definitions of Evil and the communication of those definitions, which is what I'm going to talk about today. And by the way, I know it's been a long afternoon of listening—hands up, throw words out, ask questions, let's make this a dialogue; otherwise, I might as well be on YouTube, right? Where I look even younger … try me in "Tu foi a mi," when I'm 28.

So the challenge is always in the definition. How many people here are like, "Yay, slavery!" … All right, those T-shirts are not going to sell. Write them off … Now, why are we not "Yay, slavery"? For a lot of time, people were. For a long time, people were. In the middle of the 19th century, in the South, only two people in a hundred were pro-slavery. Now, you can't find anybody who's pro-slavery because the definition has been expanded. The definition of humanity has been expanded to include those formerly slaves, including my Irish ancestors. Now, we don't have a debate about slavery any more. There is slavery still, in the world, but nobody defends it. That is the challenge. The challenge is the definition. Once people understand that something is immoral, they react against it … sorry, I thought you were cutting in; now, we'll do a duet … So, it's all about the definitions. Once people see something is Evil, they will act against it, they will reject it. You know, the most dangerous diseases are the ones that fool your immune system into thinking, "Hey! This guy's a friend, let's let him multiply." But you want your immune system to say, "KILL-Die-Die-Die-Die!" to everything that is going to kill-die-die you. I don't want to be overly technical, I'm not a doctor.

But the definition is everything.

So, when people talk about something like circumcision … doesn't sound too bad; circumspect, circumnavigate, circumvent—guess it's kind of a venting, right? But what we don't do is define it correctly—what's the correct definition? Genital mutilation. A little tougher to sell. "Would you like your son to be circumcised?" I don't know, maybe. "Would you like your son to be genitally mutilated?" What is this, the opening of a horror movie? You go for help, I'll follow the bloody footprints!

The definitions are essential. It is male genital mutilation. It contributes to a wide variety of health problems; do you know, if you're circumcised, you have—hey—five times the chance of erectile dysfunction as an adult? Thirty percent of men, across the world, have this done to them, far more than it happens to women. It is a third of the skin of the penis that is removed. It contributes to discomfort for women, on the receiving end of sex because, remember, the whole point of the foreskin is so that there's some give, right; it's not a broomstick. It contributes massively to expenses, of course. And—do you know what the price is, of an intact man? A couple of hundred bucks. Amazing … so check this out: It used to be that the government covered the costs of circumcision, and then they decided not to. Anybody know what had to happen to circumcision rates? Whew—they dropped by almost half because people are like, "Oh, two hundred bucks? Two hundred bucks? Well, shit—I mean, I've got some standards, thank you very much."

A lifetime of male sexual pleasure, 10% complications arising from this absolutely unnecessary hacking of a human being—no, that doesn't stir our sympathy, because you see that's male pleasure! And if we train men to actually enjoy life, they're bad workhorses! And it was—you know, in the Christian world it was largely, it lay fallow for many hundreds of years; and then in the 19th century … this may come as a shock to most of the members of the audience, but … sometimes men masturbate. All I'm saying is you're lucky there are cameras on me now. It's the reason I shoot waist-up at home … I'm itchy! … Kind of true, I guess.

But … and there was this desperate fear that men would enjoy, you know, Alone Time. And so, one of the ways that they wanted to cut that out, I suppose, was by cutting it off, right? This is one of the ways in which men were not supposed to touch themselves. But by reducing sensual pleasure through circumcision, we were supposed to be saved from the evils of self-abuse … I guess there weren't enough hairy palms to show everyone who was doing it, so they had to find another way.

So in the definitions lies the solution. Once you define something as an illness, once you define something morally as an evil, then people react against it. Right? "Would you like me to save your child from a 1-in-111 chance of having a urinary tract infection?" Do you know that little girls get urinary-tract infections too? Do you know, they actually treat that not by sawing off the labia, but with antibiotics, because little girls live in the 21st century—little boys are medieval. "Well, it doesn't take in men, so–"

Or, a 1-in-1,437 chance of penile cancer? Which I hear you can also get from watching Nancy Grace, but that's another statistic … I actually have nothing against Nancy Grace; when I thought of penile cancer—I'm sure that some psychiatrist is going to e-mail us and "I can explain all of that for you." Or they just give up and say, "Medicate him." … So, you have a 1-in-1,437 chance of developing penile cancer; you can reduce that slightly if you get circumcised, if you get genitally mutilated.

Anyone know the odds of breast cancer, for a woman? One in eight. One in eight … You know, you line up eight boobs in a row, one of them is going to turn homicidal. …You've had those dreams, right? It's not … I was raised by a German mother, so that's eight out of eight, but that's a different story. But we don't, of course, say to little girls that we've got to remove your breasts because …

"Oh, but you see, babies don't remember it." Right. And similarly, you'll all hear feminists say, "Well, if the woman is unconscious when she's raped, she doesn't remember it. So, what's the problem?"

Well, there's a nice slice for someone to—"Doesn't matter, does it?" Paul, I'll be joining your … the out-of-contact club. If you play the next part backwards—

No, it is. And of course, the body does remember; do you know that babies who are circumcised, boys that are circumcised, have elevated levels of the stress hormone, cortisol, six months afterwards. Almost half of circumcisions are done without anesthetic. There was a study that they tried to do circumcisions on boys to test a variety of anesthetics, but they had to stop it because it was inhumane. So—inhumane to study it, no problem to do it. And for most of the remaining ones where there is "anesthetic," it's a topical anesthetic. You know, like the kind you use for bug bites and stuff like that? "That's one bastard of a mosquito, I'll tell you that."

So these are the definitions, this is the clarity. Now, I want to make a case, for something here, that will be interesting. And you know again, feedback, comments, all perfectly welcome. I was listening to a Canadian government broadcast we call CBC, and they had a feminist on. So I deployed my airbags, got myself into the de-stress position—actually, that's just fetal position, sucking my thumb, but I won't do that here. And it was like, Okay, hit me! Hit me with the crazy! Come on, baby! And I'm telling you, she did not disappoint me.

Not even a bit.

I need a prop for this part … okay. So have you ever heard of something called microaggressions? Now, microaggressions, I thought they were referring to my schoolyard fighting technique, which went something like this … you know, imagine a Tyrannosaurus rex falling over while having an epileptic attack; it's somewhat similar. But apparently not. Now, microaggressions are when men …

(Call from one of the Honey Badgers: "Rape.")

I was going to say "fart" because sometimes … Hey, all livestock fart; that's why we have global warming but anyway … So this is what is called microaggression, according to this feminist. Imagine I'm in a subway—not the shop, a subway car. Okay. No microaggressions yet … wait … wait for it … wait … Hands up when any women feel aggressed-against. Or men … (Scream from audience) Ah! There you go! Now I've seen women do this in a skirt, and I feel quite aggressed-against sometimes, especially if they've got a lady-garden like a New York pizza-slice. But anyway—so that is microaggression. If you are a man and you apparently sprawl, in a subway, this is microaggression toward a woman. And she feels very sensitive to that, and you probably have heard of the #YesAllWomen hashtag? You know, "A man whistled, a man made appreciative comments about the tight dress I was in"—whatever, right? But that's just my hashtag, I don't want the women to say it.

So these are the microaggressions that women experience, and they're very sensitive to male aggression. Okay, I'm—you know, the best way to defeat idiocy is just to listen to them, and just repeat it back. And so I would like to sort-of-explain something about microaggressions because in the same interview with this feminist, she said, "Well, men are just—you know, they have this aggression, this violence, this aggression, and women can't do anything about it. The only way to solve this aggression is for men to discuss amongst themselves …" how to close their legs on a subway, how to not impose upon women, reduce the breathing that the ladies talk about …
And then, men can talk about themselves because where does male violence come from? Let's just assume that there's male violence. Obviously there is; not all men, but there is male violence. So where does it come from? Well, according to this woman, and this is a pretty common view among feminists, there are—look closely—like dust in the air, like dust in the wind, there are these male-only memes that float around the culture; that are generated by men, with no input from women. They float around the culture, and they go into your ears, or up your nose, and they make you violent. Right? So there are these memes, these ideas, these cultures that men—inhabit men, and makes them violent. And women have NOTHING to do with it, whatsoever, in any way, shape or form; men have to solve it completely on their own.

So, when I was studying … I have a master's in history, on the history of philosophy. And one of the great writers for clear thinking is Voltaire. I don't know if you've ever read him, but if you haven't—right after this talk, go read Voltaire. Now there was a tradition that he was part of, in 18th-century France, which was the "blank slate" of human nature. So you know they went over to the New World, they found all of these quote "savages," right? And they then brought them back to the court. And a lot of people wrote about the view of the French court from a savage who'd never seen it before. And it was one way that they communicated how insane and absurd the monarchy was.

So I like the "blank slate" approach.

Let's just talk about male violence from a space alien's perspective. So you're floating through space, and, "You know, I've got to go check out Earth. Mostly harmless, right?" So we're going to check out Earth. And you go to Earth, and you say, "Wow, there's quite a bit of violence here. Wars, and predations, and aggressions, and all this, rapes and terrible stuff that occurs. Okay, where does it come from?"
This is where you can throw some stuff in. Where do you think violence comes from? I don't buy the human-nature argument; I just don't because the only thing that's common about human beings is how great we are at adapting, right? I mean, Muslim kids adapt to the Muslim culture. Pennsylvanian kids adapt to Pennsylvania culture. Amish kids adapt to—Saying what is "human nature" is like saying, What is the shape of water? Well, it depends on what you pour it into. It adapts to that, right?

So where do you guys think violence comes from? … Frustration? Last resort of … Powerlessness? Last resort of powerlessness—Whoop! I'm being aggressed-against by this bastard!—What was the other one? Fear?

(From the front row: "I think childhood experiences.")

Rr-rr-rr-rr … We'll be coming back to you, young lady.

Okay, so, you would do the research, right? And you would say, Where does violence in human society come from? Well, the research is pretty clear, which means, completely ignored by most of you … Ninety percent of a child's brain is formed by its experiences in the first four to five years of life. And violence is when the fight-or-flight mechanism is activated early; deep down in the amygdala, the fight-or-flight mechanism kicks up; cortisol, and adrenaline, and all of that, get provoked in a child; and if the child is chronically stimulated with aggression or abandonment, then the child develops a more-violent brain, a brain more prone to violence. Less capacity to inhibit the impulse.

Have you ever had that—you get this surge of anger? You actually have about one-quarter of one second to stop that beast. You've got to intercept what's happening in your brain, and that knowledge of your own capacity for aggression, which I think we all mostly have. Being able to intercept it is something that is modeled by parents treating you respectfully and all that, controlling their own impulses, and so on.

So you'd say, Okay, we've got this problem called violence; and we have science, which says where it comes from, which is basically the first couple of years of a child's life. Well, my next question as the space alien would be … "Okay. If violence comes from childhood, early childhood in particular … why, who is in charge of early childhood?" … Fifty-fifty chance, give me a guess: Yes, it's the ladies who are in charge of childhood. Now, look, I'm going to give you guys the respect of knowing that you're over three years old, and to recognize that there are exceptions to everything I'm saying. I'm a stay-at-home dad, so yes, I'm an exception, blah-blah-blah, right? I know that you guys can hear that most Asians are short without saying, "I know a tall Asian"—I understand that. We're talking in generalities, there are exceptions, blah-blah-blah-blah-blah. Right?

So—women are in charge, from conception onwards. The women ingest the right food, or not; they smoke, they don't; drink wine, they don't—in the gestation. They give birth, and then they choose to keep the child or they—I mean, keep the child around, and they stay home, they breastfeed or they don't, and so on. Or they put their kids in daycare, where—guess what, there are a lot of women around, right? I worked as an assistant teacher in a daycare for a couple of years, when I was younger, and, yeah, it was quite the boob-fest—I mean, it was just women everywhere. So naturally, just like all kids of single, like, no dad, they just—(Pantomimes grabbing on.)—you know, Father Figure!

So, women stay home with the kids, or they put them in daycare where it's nothing but women … but then, the children go to school! … Women there, too, right? Ninety-five percent of primary-school teachers are women. Maybe around grade 10 or grade 11, they might run into a man, right—and say, "Are you a woman in drag?" So basically you have an almost-universal control over childhood from women.

Right?

I'm beginning to see the whole cannonball of crazy that I got in the face from this woman complaining about male aggression and microaggressions that women have absolutely nothing to do with, can't do anything to solve, have no responsibility for. Violence is formed in childhood, women control childhoods. And our desperate hope, as moralists, as people who want a better world, is to break the cycle of violence.

We are only ever five years away from an absolute paradise of a planet. From a planet where we're meeting here for a hoedown, not fighting more corruption and craziness and immorality. Five years—if we can just get people to be nice to their babies for five years straight, that would be it for war, drug abuse, addiction, promiscuity, sexually transmitted diseases; almost all would be completely eliminated because they all arise from dysfunctional early childhood experiences, which are all run by women.

Okay, so then the feminists would say, "Well, yes, okay, it's true that—maybe it's true that women—" Okay, they wouldn't admit that, sorry, that's fact-based. I'm just trying to get into the—into that mindset … Texas! Woman-hater—no, no, that's no good. (Punches himself in the face.) Oooh—take down the patriarchy … But they would say, but the men are bad, right, the women are abandoned by the man, and blah-blah-blah. Okay, well, the space alien went, "Woo-woo," you know, forehead-thing on. So we're going to say, Well, if women are saying that the problems in early childhood are men's fault—"bastards"—well, we'd say okay; as a space alien, I would say, Well, who chooses who? In the dating game. Hands up if you're a man being asked out on a date on a woman, where she paid.

You? … I need you to take off your pants, sir … She must have seen you in a Speedo and thought, "I need something from the [??] I can step on." … Okay, so you'd—what happened? Can you tell me the story? … You are the only person, yeah.

("A dentist met me and she invited me out to dinner, the first time we went out on a date.")

Was it something like this? "Drill, baby, drill" … There was nothing like that.

("I'd gotten dressed up to take her to (??) and those were for me … but …)

Okay, so you were asked out by a woman—did she pay?

("She did, she paid—")

You slut.

("In her home culture, in the Philippines, she never ever would have done that. But she did it.")

Good for you—anybody else? … Yes, sir! All right. Give us your secrets. How are you a man-whore? Tell me.

("She was German …")

She was German? So she must have ordered you out, not asked—"You'll be required!"—Sorry … "Call me Mistress Panzer!"

(… In hindsight, that time, I see it now that she was trying to assert authority over the relationship …)

We've got a … was she from the Philippines, by any chance? The same woman?

So—I mean, it's 1 or 2%. And studies show that in about 95% of the time, men ask women out, right? Women make themselves look attractive, and again, I'm generalizing, but women will make themselves attractive in hopes the man will ask them out, and they can choose from the waving, grabbing penis-things around—eeny, meeny, miney, mo, right? So this is the goal, right, this is what happens.
Now, have you ever been—once, in my life, I was, a couple of employers wanted to hire me at the same time. Have you ever been on the receiving end of a bidding war? It's sweet, right? Oh, man, you just wake up like you're floating on air, you can't do anything wrong, you don't need to shower any more because people want you … you don't have to show up at work in pants any more, I mean—I hear you, brother, I'm there! It's a beautiful thing, a beautiful thing—you know, phfttttt! Oh, I'm needed, baby … I actually had this once, this was back in the dot-com days, in the nineties; I was in a bidding war, and it got to the point where people were like, "I'll pay you $150,000 a year for three days work in a week!" And I'm like, No, I'm going to write novels 'cause that's where the money is!

(Pantomimes exploding head.)

Anyway, if you're on the receiving end of a bidding war, it's a pretty sweet place to be; and for the majority of women of attractiveness, personality, or physical whatever, they're on the receiving end of usually multiple offers, right? And this is always confusing to me when women complain about the men that they have—because, well, you get to test-drive, right? For years! You get to choose from a variety of cars. You get to test-drive cars, for years. You finally pick a car that usually pays you to buy it, and then, you get to drive the car—and then, you say … "This car sucks! … I'm going to make a boat!" You know, you could have just picked a boat to begin with—"No! I'm going to change him! … This dock head's right there—!"

So, if women choose the man, and get to test-drive the man, and get to marry the man and stay with the man and have children with the man and so on, it's kind of specious to say, "Well, all the problems in my life arise from this guy." You see, this is again, space-alien time, right? We're just trying to really detract ourselves from the minutiae of the propaganda that so often bewilders us, right?

So here we have, just to recap: The problem with human violence is caused in early childhood. Women are in charge of early childhood. Women choose the man with whom they are going to have children. So … how do we break the cycle of violence? Lecturing men is ridiculous. I mean, factually, scientific—lecturing men is ridiculous. There is zero patriarchy for children. Again, give-or-take, right? But this is why, when women are complaining about microaggressions, and women are saying, "Well, we have nothing to do with the cycle of violence, there's nothing we can do, you men gotta work it out amongst yourselves," it's like … ??? We need space invasion just to—you know, Klingons to come down and say, "Here's the facts—that we see from orbit 'cause you all are confused down here!"

A study was recently done; a psychologist went, and he said, "I'd really like to study verbal aggression within the household."—Just shake this bottle and open the top. So he went to daycares, and he asked the parents—they were all women, right? I think there was one man. But he asked the parents, "Do you yell at your children?" And they all said, basically, "Yeah. Hell, yeah, right? But they make me." So what he did, he put little recording devices on them, you know, like he's some stalked man; he put some recording devices on them, and he said, "Just turn it on, record every day for a week," and then he got them back.

He also asked them some other questions. And so, there was one man out of many—it was all women, basically. And the women said, "Yeah, I yell at them. I guess I hit my kids maybe 18 times a year." Whatever, right? So he got the data back—and this is middle class—this is not, like, down in the dregs; this is middle class, you know, comfortable and all that kind of stuff. So this is probably less than it is in reality … Anybody want to guess? Instead of 18 times a year, hitting children, what does anybody want to put a finger on the number as? … (Brief auctioneer's act) I haven't had enough coffee to do what those guys do. The White rap of livestock sales … Nine hundred? … It was 932. Nine hundred and thirty-two times a year.

Does anyone want to guess the age ranges of the children? … I can tell you this, it was not 18-year-old sons. It's one thing to do this. (Pantomimes whacking a toddler.) It's another thing to do this. (Pantomimes whacking at a much-taller son.) I can remember my mum yelling at me when I was 17, it was like—(Pantomimes lifting someone by the shoulders, putting them aside, and walking away.) "Remember all that food you gave me? It's coming back!"

Anyone want to guess what the bottom age of the children, that were being hit 932 times a year? … Lower … lower … Seven months.

Seven months of age.

("What are you teaching anyone? She doesn't know what's happening.")

All it is, is abuse. I mean, even—the upper end was three, three and a half, close to four. Seven months to four years old. These average American women were hitting their children 932 times per year. We also know women hit sons two to three times more than their daughters.

("Why was that only for women? Did you test against men, for the same—")

This is just the people who were at the daycare who, the man had access to the psychologist. He's been on my show, explaining the experiment; you can look at it more. Oh, by the way, Freedomain Radio, not Freedom Radio, although that would be cool.

So, I really want to—I can't reinforce this enough. I know, super-smart crowd and all that. But I really want you to get the insanity of this. Right, so women saying, "Well, men have to just deal with their weird aggressions; we have nothing to do with it; we don't know where it comes from, you know—we're helpless, helpless, I tell you!" … If you're a little boy, and you're being hit by a giant woman, over 900 times a year—and probably it's closer to 1,500 if you average out two or three times: 1,500, 1,750, some point in there. The study also showed that the hits occurred within 30 seconds of a conflict beginning. Not a lot of reasoning going on, right? I mean, that's not a cop pulling you over, that's shooting the tires out as you drive past. It's not any kind of negotiation that's happening here.

Violence begins in early childhood, as the result of abuse. Women are in charge of early childhood. Women are hitting children 900-plus times a year—after 30 seconds of a conflict beginning. You don't have to be like a Klingon Sherlock Holmes to crack this case, right? Where does violence come from? And this is why—Let's go back to our—(Pulls out chair.) So over here, I'd like you to picture billions of women, hitting children hundreds of times a year. Not even counting yelling at them. Not even counting putting them in daycare. Not even counting neglect or abandonment. Not even counting keeping their fathers away. Let's talk about the hitting, 932 times a year.
That is not talked about. You know what is talked about? (Sits down.) The difference between this—(knees close)—and this (knees wide). Okay … Rape culture. Rape … Okay … Evil. Okay … PATRIARCHY!—Oops, sorry.

But you see how insane this is? You have women pounding the crap out of seven-month-old babies—and all we ever hear about is, "Well, aggression, violence, is just some bizarre male issue that women have nothing to do with!" This is what I mean when I say the space-alien perspective will strip you of friends, will strip you of any opportunity for a civilized discussion with muggles, right? I mean, because … the way society is, and the cases that are put forward by people, is so mad!

So then—again, space-alien time, we're saying, Well, what's the solution? The solution to violence, of course, would be a couple of things we had speakers up here talking about … "Let's have dads around more!" Well, absolutely. Two key things for the development of a child's empathy—One: A father around. Two: Free play in nature. Anyone know why the second one is? It's kind of interesting. Can anyone guess? It'll have to be the older people because the young people—free play in nature is like oblivion in high-rises … Yes, sir?
("When you have age mixing of children in free play, they in a sense teach one another about the need to please one another because if they don't, their playmates run away. They have to please within a group.")

Yeah! Like someone I knew—I grew up broke, in England, and we basically were like, we all hang out, and it's like, Well, what do you want to do? We had to find something that wins for everyone—that everyone wants to do. You have to sacrifice, you have to defer, and all that. You can't just impose your will. Everyone's on their iPads, they're not negotiating, right?

So, there is a huge correlation between free play in nature, presence of fatherhood, and empathy—which is the most important natural resource in the world, and which is becoming increasingly in short supply. Sociopathy, which is really the absence of empathy, just doubled over the last 15 years. Yes, sir?

("When you say free play, are you referring to perhaps a different play style with the child, between the two types of—")

No adults. That's all it is. Not out there on a soccer field, not out—No structure. Go play, unsupervised, no adults, no structure, none of these. Figure out what you want to do. Go, come home when the street lights come on, right? Stay away from windows and piers.

("My ex-wife, now, when she would play with the child, it would be very formalized, and nothing free about it, really. Whereas when I played with my kid, it was like free-style—hey, have fun, let's kick a ball—")

No. If you're there, that's great, that's part of the empathy. I don't know the exact reason, maybe we could theorize about it; I don't know the exact reason why the presence of men is better for empathy. I personally think that it's because women grow these beasts in their belly, you know, in that part I remember from the movie, they come out through the belly button and kill John Hurt … But I think women are too … so fused with the kids, right? I mean they grow them, and then they breastfeed them, and they're so fused, that I think the fathers have a little bit … productive space. The closeness and the intimacy is fantastic for the moms and the babies, but the dads have a little bit more space and a bit more room to negotiate.

… Yeah, like the space aliens. Actually, dads are like space aliens—did you get that? Get that out-of context too … And if you're John Hurt, you're toast!

("Do you know if there's any research on the effects of 'helicopter parenting' that many women today are engaging in, on the ability for children to engage in free play?")

Yeah! I mean, there's a lot of—it generally provokes passivity, and again, a lack of negotiation. You know, children are much safer than they used to be, out in the world—now. And we have all of these weird ideas, right? Like, if the kids are out playing in the neighborhood, that's dangerous—No, no, no, no, no. That's not statistically the way it is. If they're going to be attacked, it's going to be somebody in the family; it's going to be somebody who's a friend. It's not going to be some guy in a windowless van, driving.

But we have, you know, "Keep the kids home, and safe! And that way I know where they are!" … Where the moms are hitting them 932 times a year—"I need you to be safe! Don't go out!" We need to give micro-tasers to kids, or something like that—But yeah, I mean, so the violence is occurring within the home, and, you know …

Violence has been diminishing in a lot of ways; there are some arguments, a variety of arguments, as to why that is. I think some of it has to do with the fact that kids are put in institutions—which is bad in a lot of ways; like, children put into daycare before the age of four, for more than 20 hours a week, experience exactly the same symptoms as maternal abandonment. And so you get this radical attachment disorder that creates instability, neediness, aggression, lack of compliance, and all those kinds of things. But at least in those institutions they're not getting hit 932 times a year.

No, I think in general, I think for the most—again, US schools are a little different, right? Because I know in US schools, a lot of them, South schools in particular, corporal punishment is still acceptable. I think it's 18, or something like that, states. But in most daycares, at least not in the ones I worked in, you couldn't. Not that we were all dying to … But you couldn't attack the kids that way; so they would be hit a lot less, and that may have had something to do with it. Was there another question?

("Yes. Being the daughter of a single mom, and just reading about … having worked around single moms, and just reading about what they deal with … they just have so much stress. And I think an important factor in your discussion is just, when you're a mom, and when you're around your child all the time—you're around a small child—it's just very, very stressful. And … you know, I've just done some reading about, there's articles about single moms and stress, and all that kind of stuff, and they list all the things that can ease the stress in a single mom's life. And I go on down the list, and read, and read; and not one of them mentions anything about involving the father. And it's like, why? Because the father is, you know—it takes two to tango, and the father ought to be there. He ought to be, well, responsible.")

But it doesn't take two to tango because women choose mates. Again, if there's rape, that's a whole—obviously, that's a different situation and so on. But, so, first of all, this "it takes two to tango"—women still are in the privileged position of choosing from a variety of suitors, in general. That's first. The second, the "stress" argument bothers me, and you could be correct, but I'll tell you why it bothers me, and we can certainly open it up to discussion.

There's no "stress defense" for hitting your wife. One could say, "Boy, she was nagging me—Bam!" … You know, there's no state-of-mind excuse for male violence, as I've talked about on my show many times. The feminists will talk about abuse of power disparities, I mean, unless it's Bill Clinton. But feminists will talk about abuse of power disparities, like the boss dating the secretary, or the man keeping money away from his stay-at-home wife, because there's a power disparity there. Of course in reality, and in fact, there's no greater power disparity than between parent and child. The wife chose to be there; children don't choose to, don't choose their families. They're not there by choice. Wives can leave at any time. Legal … rights, property, independence, shelters. Children cannot leave. So I can't go with "women are stressed, and therefore …" because there's no state of mind that excuses male violence, not that I've ever heard. And you'll see this when you look online. Whenever people talk about women's abuses, they will always, always put in an excuse: "Well, they're poor; well, they're stressed; well, they're juggling work and family; well, they don't have health and resources; and this and that and the other." Right? But, again, I've never heard that for men hitting anybody.

("I think what I was really trying to say is, in the literature that I read about, you know, single moms and stress, I think what would really help would be if they just acknowledged that since, you know, man is half of the reason why the child is there, that the father, you know, we're all—they're just as interdependent on the fact that they need the father, they need him to be around, and it's—you have to adopt the mindset of a team-worker! You know …")

But if they chose a man who's not around, then they're still responsible for that choice. Again, I'm not taking men out of the equation completely, right? But the woman is currently the gatekeeper because the woman is the one who suffers a lot more over pregnancy than an irresponsible man.

Now, historically what used to happen, prior to the welfare state, was a woman who got pregnant outside of wedlock—we all know what would happen, right? They would go on a vacation. They would give birth to the child. They would return to the family without the child, and the child would be given up for adoption. Which was in the best interests of the child, statistically, because children who are adopted into two-parent households do just fine. They do just fine, relative to everybody else who's born there. Statistically, there's no difference.
But … women who keep the children, as single mothers, harm those children. It's an incredibly selfish and destructive thing to do. If you don't have a husband, if you chose the wrong guy, to keep the child is abuse—almost always.

And that's what used to happen before women could force all men to become beta-male providers through the power of the state. And that's what should—for the best interests of the child, give it up for adoption! You've already proven that you're irresponsible! You can't choose the right guy, you can't keep your legs closed, you can't use birth control—of which there are 18 different kinds—so maybe parenthood isn't for you!

I mean—at least, yet. Work on tying the shoes—Yes, sir?

("So, bringing your talk full circle—")

No, we're not done yet, brother. You hold on to those platters!

("What I'm wondering is, that, I've looked for a study like this, and I haven't seen one, but it certainly makes sense just from observing different countries in the world. I'm wondering, is there any data looking at the amount of violence in a society, particularly male violence, military aggressions, things of that nature, and circumcision rate? It certainly makes sense if you have increased stress hormones in early, you know, shortly after birth. If you have a culture of violence—")

I know—the problem is that you can't just separate one variable. Where there is circumcision, there is generally more brutality toward children and more brutality toward boys in particular. So you can't just look at circumcision and say that's—it's not like everything's the same but circumcision; it's a symptom of a wider disregard for the thoughts and feelings of men and boys. So—certainly you can—I've been reading an audio-book by Lloyd deMause called The Origins of War in Child Abuse, which is available at FreedomainRadio.com, slash free. It's a free audio book. And he talks about how war comes directly out of, and is directly correlated to, levels of child abuse. So I think—accepting that circumcision is male genital mutilation, it's certainly going to be part of the fire that burns the world.

Listen—I just had a look at my speech notes, we're going to have to—I've got five more minutes. Uhm … that's good stuff. Umm—The End!—No, do you guys have any questions? Because I don't want to miss that part.

("Hi—I know you said something earlier about, there's always exceptions. As a licensed daycare provider for 25 years and foster mom for 10, and a loving and non-violent mother … I just want to acknowledge that there are moms that don't hit children, and there are some excellent daycare providers out there.")

Absolutely, yeah—I'm married to one. She's—we've never raised our voice, we've never punished, we've never hit, we've never—and she's a fantastically wonderful child. You know, when you don't have violence, you get creativity, right; if you don't have "Well, I'll hit my kid," then you have to figure out creative solutions, as you know, right? And that's a lot more fun, as parents. You know, why are single moms so stressed? Well, if they're hitting their kids 932 times a year, the relationship sucks—they have no authority, they only have force! That's a very stressful situation to be in, you're constantly playing whack-a-mole. Turns out in the study, that the behavior that the moms hit the kids for was resumed in less than 10 minutes. Less than 10—It doesn't work! All it does is vent the sadism of the mother. —We had a question?—Ah, Taylor.

("I was curious—")

You've got to do some Barry White for me, man. That's a beautiful voice.

("I get that a lot … the sound of rock 'n' roll.")

You're going to make me burp with that bass, man!

("It's testosterone … It's a wonderful day in the Patriarchy. Now, I was curious, with circumcision, is there any data that shows the percentage of circumcisions that are seriously botched to the point of urinary or erectile dysfunction?")

I do have those numbers—just come to me afterwards. I normally do this with a PowerPoint, but I consider PowerPoint for the weak … Except for everyone else who did PowerPoint … I'll get to you with those numbers afterwards. But it's not insignificant, for sure … Yes, sir? You're next.

("Stefan, I have a question that … I don't have any children, but I am—the things that you talk about, about child abuse, really makes sense. I think it's wrong to, first, any type of spanking, you know. And one other thing I wanted to say, that … I talked to my mom about this, and you know, yeah, I was spanked, but she came to the realization that—just like you did, she chose to be in her situation, I didn't. And she said that she actually apologized for that. It was just out of nowhere, she just thought of it. I don't know what—maybe she watched the Freedomain Radio Show, I don't know. But another thing, I was doing research on this, and if—being a Black man, like myself, I'll just accept it for what it is: Is it true that, when it comes to race, that when it comes to spanking your children, it's actually worse in the Black community than other … you know, I mean, I'm not going to just say it can't be true, but—")

I think it is true, statistically. I think it is—like, there's a reason, like when I did this video on Trayvon Martin and George Zimmerman— which, basically, I don't care much about the case, but it was a great way to get a million people to see it as a spanking message … But in there, I included a clip of President Obama, which you may have seen, where he's talking about, "Hey, remember the good old days, when even if it wasn't your kid, if you saw them acting up, you hit 'em?" Like, you couldn't say that—I don't think you could say that to a White community; but he's in there, in a Black community, and there is of course a lot more corporal punishment. There's lots of reasons for that, some sociological, some historical, which I'm not, you know, not going to speak to—but I think a lot of it has to do with the problems of single motherhood as well. Single motherhood is associated with higher rates of child abuse, and of course, much more single motherhood in the Black community than in the White community. And even less in the Asian.

("So, on the subject of circumcision, feminists often say, 'My body, my choice.' At what age do you think someone should be allowed, 'My body, my choice'?")

Yeah, I mean, if it's a spleen that they're talking about, that's one thing; but that is a human life in there; I think that should have a say as well. But as far as adults go, I think we already have laws in place for that, where the age of consent for a medical procedure is, I think, 18, or maybe it's 21 in some places. But yeah—hey, if you want to go hack up your penis when you're an adult … you know, I—Idiot, but go, you know? Then it is your body, your choice, but you cannot make that choice for newborns. It is symptomatic of the degree to which the idea of simply asking children what they want when they get bigger, and deferring to their choice. For men, it still remains somewhat incomprehensible to a lot of people; like, why would the man have a say? It's his penis, but it's our culture.

("If you alter the Cycle of Violence, how can you have soldiers?")

Yeah—how are we going to have soldiers, if we don't brutalize kids? Yeah, there's a reason why men are hit more times than women because women need to train warriors to protect the tribe from blah-blah-blah, right?

("It's essential to the civilization's system!")

Well, child abuse and civilization … I think true civilization is not that, right? I mean, we were talking, just in the very beginning, about the extension of human rights, human principles of morality, to formerly ignored groups of society—whether it's minorities, or women … Well, the last one is kids. The last wave we need to extend ethics is kids. You say spanking—it's just hitting. It's kidnapping and hitting because the kid can't leave. It's assault. And once we—as Confucius said, the beginning of wisdom is to call things by their proper names, once we identify it for what it is. Then we recoil from it. But whooping, and spanking, and blah-blah-blah—whoop-ass, or whatever it is— it's all, these aren't categories of crimes you'd ever associate with adults.

("The grounding point is, how we're going to get our warriors—how are we going to get soldiers that are sociopathic enough to go fight out wars? We've got to prepare—according to our last speaker, there's no way around it, we're going to have wars.")

Well, they said that about all evil human institutions, prior to their end. Everyone said, 'This is going to last forever!—Oh, is it gone already? I guess I was in the way, wasn't I?—Yes, sir?

("Hang on, I know that circumcision is tied to religious procedure … so would you take that into consideration as well?")

What do you mean, take that into consideration?

("Well, in the sense that a lot of them, who are religious, believe that it's God asking them to do it. So I know this is—")

Sure! And I know that the Old Testament also commands them to kill homosexuals, unbelievers, witches, apostates, sorcerers, and basically everybody else. Right, and human sacrifice—so you know, to me, the first recorded depiction of circumcision was 2400 BC in Egypt. That's your first clue that it's barbaric! It's 2400 BC! And they say, "Well, you know, that's tradition." And it's like—"Do you have a cell phone? Then you're willing to upgrade, aren't you?"

Thank you, everybody, so much!

(Attila Vinczer: "Stefan, can I ask a question?")

Wait, wait, wait, everybody, sorry—Can I tell you, not for the first time in my life, I was a little premature? I thought he was going to help me out …

(Attila: "Now, let's get serious. We have Kathleen Wynne, elected as … the newly elected premier of Ontario. She has earmarked one-and-a-half billion dollars to child care, or—daycare. I listened to you about the cause of domestic violence … it really stuck in my head, out of all the things you said, the harm children have by being put into daycare. What can we do to deal with this issue? Because I see it very concerning that we're going to put 1.5 billion dollars, extra money, into sending these children—I've seen them being strung along on ropes—at two years of age—and it's, it's, it's appalling to me.")

No, but it's good for the government, right? Because if you get women to go into the workforce, you can tax them. Right? You can't tax moms. So if you get women to go in the workforce, you can tax two new groups of people, right? You can tax the women who are now working, who formerly were providing childcare; and you can tax the childcare workers, and get them into nice unions that will always vote for bigger government, and blah-blah-blah. So it's a great investment on the part of the government; just, as usual, it's at the expense of children. So much of what we do in society, from the national debt to wars to the family court policies, is at the expense of children, for the sake of irresponsible adults. We don't have a society, as of yet, where the interests of children are put first and foremost. It's just a Hallmark card we look at, and then throw in the shredder.

But if we were actually to realign our society, and put the interests of children first and foremost, and think about that every time we tried to make a social decision, then we would say, Well, what do children need? Well, they need their moms OR their dads, but, you know, Mom comes with the feeding bag, so it's usually better for them to be closer. And so, we want moms home with the children! And so we would try to figure out a society which would allow for that.

And I am a big one for … social shaming, social negative consequences, is, to me, the best way society should be organized; and when we get this "Everything Goes and single moms are heroes, everyone's fine, everyone's great,"we end up with this multiplicity of rules. There's an old statement that says, when you get rid of the big rules you don't end up with no rules, you end up with an infinity of tiny rules. And the big rules are, we should be responsible for our children, we should be responsible about our sexuality, we should have children in a committed pair-bond relationship and we should not have children outside of that, and if we make a mistake—and mistakes happen—then we should give the child to people who can raise it in the best way for the child.

Now everything which furthers that end, to me, would be advantageous to society. But people who are irresponsible always want to escape the consequences of their irresponsibility; that's what we like to do, and with the government, that gets to be hellishly easy, I think. So I think there's a variety of policies that could be suggested, but I think that would be first and foremost. "In the Best Interests of the Child" should be a motto tattooed on our hearts, not bullshit said by the government that they'll never follow.

(Attila: "Before we take our last question, I would like to make a suggestion, an offer. I'd like to work with you to do something about this daycare business, and the one and a half billion dollars—our tax dollars—that shouldn't be used for that.")

Well, actually, the bill's going to go to the kids; they don't have a billion and a half dollars, they're just borrowing it, right? “Hey, we get to stuff you into daycare, and stick you with the bill! Right!”

(“Can I make a comment? I stepped out, so I might have missed this. If I’m saying something that you already mentioned, I’m sorry, but—there’s media here, and I’m very involved, not just with the Men’s Rights Movement but with the Intactivist movement. And I think this is important to say, because the American media tends to never really do their research on circumcision, outside what you read in the US from the American Medical Association and groups like that. And that’s where they get their information; of course, the American Medical Association is profit-based, and they make a tremendous amount of money off of circumcision. Recently—what I think media and everyone else here needs to know, is that recently the Council of Europe, which represents—which is even larger than the European Union, it has about twice as many members as nations, and is commissioned specifically to address human rights … they held extensive rebates and reviewed extensive literature on things like the trauma that it causes to children, as well as the loss of sensitivity, and all kinds of things about these so-called ‘benefits’ and all that. And they have voted that it violates the child’s human rights. And in fact, that it isn’t comparable to female circumcision because there’s several different types of female circumcision, one of which is the removal of the clitoral foreskin, which is anatomically equivalent to male circumcision. And the media needs to know that, when you write stories on circumcision, because this—the Council of Europe’s decision was backed by pediatric associations all throughout Scandinavia. The top pediatric medical association in Germany backed them up 100%. And this is not a fringe group that’s out there against circumcision. It’s very real, and something we need to look at.”)

This is, ah … from a moral standpoint, it’s such an easy issue that it takes a massive amount of propaganda to ignore the basic facts. It’s the initiation of the use of force against a helpless and defenseless infant. My argument is basic: Is it healthy flesh? Then leave it alone … Yes?

(“Hi, Stefan, my name’s Janet Bloomfield. I have three children; I have never hit them—ever—once. I actually don’t believe in punishment of any kind; I believe in letting them learn. You want to throw rocks in the air, well … go for it. I was raised by an extremely violent mother, so I had to learn to be a parent. And I found Dr. Sears, on attachment parenting. What do you think of that philosophy?”)

I think that whatever contributes to a closer bond, to an empathetic bond, between parent and child, is the best shield against aggression. Aggression results when you dehumanize whoever it is. If you empathize with that person, you would rather hit yourself than hit them.

(“And I just want to support you in saying that, when there’s no violence, creativity emerges. That’s my kids, all three of them. They’re just fantastic. And I’m constantly getting compliments on how well-behaved they are. And it’s always—it’s sort of—it’s weird: I’m getting congratulated for not beating the fuck out of my kids. Like isn’t that just a basic—shouldn’t people just know that? … My point is, for people that are looking for guidance, for how to be the kind of parent that doesn’t need to resort to screaming and yelling and punishment, Dr. William Sears. He is an absolutely fantastic resource, he publishes books—anyone who’s expecting a baby, look for books by Dr. Sears. They’re a wonderful place to start, I think.”)

So my—yeah, I’ll just finish with one story, then I’ll end. So my daughter is five—I guess, two stories. I bit my tongue the other day; and she looked at me, and she’s—“Ooh, Dad, I felt that in my own tongue.” Which is the implantation of “mirror neurons,” which means that she empathizes with somebody else’s experience to the point where she feels—and it’s like, “Great, my job is mostly done.” Ninety percent of parenting is the first couple of years. And so she has the empathy. I now know I no longer have to worry about her ever being cruel.
The other day we went to a play center, and I don’t know why I don’t have a lot of hair, but last time I was at a play center I was kind of inching my way down the slide, and I hit something metal—and basically it was an air strike of lightning going through my body, and it scared the crap out of me! Almost literally—“Oh, there’s been an accident in the slides—”Anyway, so I didn’t want to do it again. And so, the next time we were at that play center, she said, “Dad, I know you’re scared. I get it, I understand—like when I fell off my scooter, I was scared too; but you remember what I did?” I’m like, Oh, no, not this—You’re five! Get in line! But she said, “I went back, and I did my scooter again, and you encouraged me to do that! Remember?” Hey, I’m an authority, I wouldn’t be an authority if I wanted rules to go two ways—but yes, she made her case, and I ended up going down the slide, and we had a great time. And here, I was coached by my five-year-old that I had to overcome my fears … that's, you can't beat that as parenting. I mean, that's a fantastic experience.

So—I think we're done here, okay. Thank you, everybody, so much.

(Applause. Stefan Molyneux leaves the stage.)

Update: Man told he owes $100,000 by Virginia Beach judge is now officialy on the run

Robert O'Hara · 3 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On July 19th AVFM News posted a press release from Greg Patnude, a Washington State man who was served with an order from a Virginia Beach Judge to pay 0ver $1,000,000 in back child support for children in their late 20's. Patnude was actually only $1,836 in arrears which he volunteered to pay but he was arrested at his home on March 18th on a warrant that claimed he owes $1,052,341.00 in past due child support. The amount was later reduced to $100,000.

Over the years Patnude has paid nearly a quarter million dollars in child support to the mother of his children who are now aged 26 and 28.

Since publication of his press release he has asked that a court hearing be conducted via phone as he lives very far away and does not have the money for traveling expenses. His request was denied by Judge Deborah V. Brian of Virginia Beach's Juvinile and Domestic Relations Court. He claims that the order of extradition is unconstitutional because it pertains to a civil and not a criminal case. The 56 year old Patnude, who is currently on the run from the law, also claims he has lost several jobs in the months following the March arrest due to his legal troubles and says he is down to his last $1,500.

Below is an interview conducted with Patnude several weeks ago before his request for a trial by phone was denied and he was still working and able to pay the $1,836. It chronicles his relationship with both his ex wife and the courts.

He is currently on the run from the law, and has lost several jobs in the months following his arrest due to his legal troubles.

Good news. Laurie Penny is leaving the UK. Bad news. She's returning in May.

Mike Buchanan · 4 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The New Statesman "journalist" Laurie Penny is on an email circulation list we use occasionally to communicate to large numbers of people, and yesterday we sent a note out to people on that list about our presentation to Dave the Feminist (aka David Cameron, the United Kingdom's hapless prime minister) of his third consecutive "Toady of the Year" award. Among the 'auto reply' emails we received was one from Ms Penny. It read:

> Thanks for your email! (Rather upbeat for Ms P, I felt.)
> From September 2014 until May 2015, I'll be on sabbatical, taking up a fellowship with the Nieman Foundation at Harvard University. I'll be checking this email less frequently, and won't be available for most of my usual work engagements in that time. Thanks for understanding! Meanwhile, here's how to get to me if it's urgent and work-related:
> (Names and email addresses of three people – all are women – what are the chances?)
>
> If it's work-related and not urgent, get back in touch around April.

Harvard University is, of course, the institution whose president, Larry Summers, was hounded out of office after making some perfectly reasonable remarks (in a lunchtime talk in January 2005) about men outnumbering women in high-end science and engineering positions, and suggesting some explanations for that reality (and "remedies"' it's often forgotten). Following a radical feminist backlash, he resigned his position 13 months later. An account of the story is here.

So it's only appropriate that Red Penny – as she likes to call herself – should be undertaking a fellowship at Harvard. Details of the Nieman Foundation for Journalism are here. So Ms Penny will in due course become a "Fellow." I'm guessing wildly she won't like that.

The infiltration of radical feminists throughout the mainstream media should come as a surprise to nobody, likewise the fact that it accounts for the virtual exclusion of men's human rights advocates from the mainstream media. Radical feminists have, of course, infiltrated academia and damaged it immeasurably – perhaps irreparably – so we cannot be surprised to see feminists running journalism courses, taking fellowships etc.

We've just published a link to a remarkable piece written by Mallory Millett, sister of the radical feminist writer Kate Millett. In it she described a meeting in 1969 she and her sister attended, in the course of which:

> They proceeded with a long discussion on how to advance these goals by establishing The National Organization of Women. It was clear they desired nothing less than the utter deconstruction of Western society. The upshot was that the only way to do this was "to invade every American institution. Every one must be permeated with 'The Revolution'": The media, the educational system, universities, (our emphasis) high schools, K-12, school boards, etc.; then, the judiciary, the legislatures, the executive branches and even the library system.

What more fertile ground for radical feminists, then, that university journalism faculties?

In January 2014 we posted a piece about the appointment of Julie Bindel to the position of "Journalist in Residence" at Brunel University. A link on the university's website took us to this:

> Brunel's Head of Journalism Sarah Niblock welcomed the appointment: "Julie is a phenomenal journalist who never ceases to bring tough social affairs stories to the forefront of the news agenda. She combines the research acumen of a sociologist with the news sense, policy know-how and editorial rigour of a reporter."

> “Our students find her passion for her subject matter infectious, and they can’t wait to work with her,” she added.

Seriously, that’s what she said. Ms Bindel has the “editorial rigour of a reporter,” apparently. Remarkable. The claim surely says more about reporters (and one Head of Journalism) in 2014 than editorial rigour, and why journalists are held in such poor regard today – even lower than politicians, some surveys have concluded. That aside, Professor Niblock has hopefully never been introduced as a speaker at a conference, by someone inclined to switch vowels around in surnames.

Brunel University is, of course, where female MSc engineering students will shortly be receiving sponsorships of £22,750 unavailable to their male colleagues. We posed a public challenge on the matter to Professor Niblock, asking her why the country specifically needs more female engineers – the challenge is accessible through the last link – and she predictably side-stepped the challenge, referring it to the university’s Press Office.

This country – like all countries – no more “needs” more female engineers than it “needs” radical feminist journalists.

The culture of victimhood

Dr. David Ley · 4 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"Trauma-informed care" is the current therapeutic buzzword these days. Developing research suggests that a history of trauma and neglect can lead to emotional and psychological difficulties which may be mistaken for other problems such as bipolar disorder, ADHD, and other psychological disorders. Informed therapists should be better able to identify these subtle symptoms, and diagnose and treat more effectively and accurately.

Increased social attention to these subtle effects of trauma inevitably leads to more identification of trauma (a good thing), and to greater social attention to the issues of trauma and victimization (a mixed thing). For many years, victims have been bullied, shamed and blamed, which worsens the effects of their experience. Unfortunately, in a swing to the opposite side, victimhood has now become a protected class in our society, a trend fed by well-intended, but potentially harmful, therapists, activists and daytime talk shows.

The media is inundated with "Victim Hoaxes," where there is a great flutter over someone being wronged and victimized. Waitresses are slandered over their sexuality, teenagers harassed, scarred children turned away from restaurants. Society gets all atwitter over these events, standing up for the wronged party. The alleged victim often receives financial support and other secondary gain as a result of the nationwide uproar. Unfortunately, further attention to these events reveals that some details of the story don't hold up to scrutiny.

Some college students are demanding "trigger warnings" in syllabi at some universities. Trigger warnings are a concept which began in Internet discussions, where a poster might write "Trigger warning: RAPE," at the beginning of a discussion, so that individuals who might be triggered to re-experience their traumatic history could then avoid that discussion. The concept is laudable, and respectful of those who have suffered. But, as this trend spreads, problems arise. If a student can't read Faulkner without being triggered by the depictions of rape in his works, should they be excused from that assignment? Is that fair, to them, and to other students? Is that beneficial to their education and growth?

Critics of our culture of victimhood are often attacked as abuser themselves, perpetuating a culture of harm and assault. Frequently, the response of that embattled critic is to assert that they are a victim as well. Men criticized as sexist for challenging radical feminism defend themselves as victims of reverse sexism, people criticized as being unsympathetic proclaim their own history of victimization. In courts, during sentencing, it is common, even de rigeur, for felons to proclaim that their history of victimization contributed to their harmful, illegal actions. In our culture of victimhood, victims can be excused for victimizing others, taking away the rights, freedoms and autonomy of others, in service to their victimization.

Why would people loudly and publicly proclaim themselves as victims? Perhaps a better question, based upon the level of secondary gain, attention, protection and support received by these people, is why wouldn't they? With all of the attention on the issue, why are we surprised when people are exaggerating, using, or downright lying, about victimization? Of course, when we attach benefits to identification as a victim, we will hear from more victims, both real and exaggerated.

[image]That's not to say that all these hoaxes and questionable claims were created by people who schemed their way into calculated exploitation. In fact, I think most of these stories start as just that, stories. The narratives we tell others, and ourselves, have a way of creating a momentum of their own, and carrying us away with them. In 2004, a gay teen in California was the center of a controversy over hate crime harassment, which ultimately turned out to be false. Her story, told in this amazing article, helps one to understand how this hoax started out small, and took on a life of its own, fed by the strong, committed support she received from her community. When rallied in defense of victims, communities come together in powerful, positive ways, committed to trying to improve lives for our vulnerable members.

Do these benefits and protections actually help victims of trauma to recover? In fact, when we protect people from encountering stimuli which might trigger them to re-experience their trauma, we may in fact be inhibiting their healing, protecting them from the process by which people resolve the wounds of trauma. The effects of trauma can be worsened through well-intended, but damaging, therapeutic efforts. Crisis Stress Debriefing, once a standard post-trauma intervention, is now actively discouraged as it is recognized that such group debriefings can worsen, or create, symptoms of traumatic reaction in people who would otherwise have little lasting difficulties.

Trauma victims deserve the help to heal, the support to deal with their experiences, grieve, accept it as a part of their life, and move forward. The cry for trigger warnings, justice and protection for victims is asking for that. But, it's also asking for something impossible – it's asking for the victims' right to exist henceforth in a safe place, protected from harm, exploitation and danger. We all deserve to exist in a place where we can't be hurt. Perhaps that ideal is possible in the afterlife, but I've not seen it in this world.

Our reactions to cries of victimization must be tempered with a belief in supporting their resiliency. To continue with the way we are idealizing and rewarding victimhood, creates more and more incentive for people to desire to be seen as victims. We must instead encourage people in a way that supports their ability to move forward in their lives, without needing emotional bodyguards to protect them from the unpreventable pains of life. To do less is disrespectful of them, and it discounts the strength they have within. It treats victims as though they are less than, less than capable, less than independent, and less than whole. It treats victims as though their victimization is the most important thing about them.

Subscribe to Dr. Ley on Twitter @drdavidley.

Proof positive that gamers are misogynists

AVfM Video Source · 4 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

6oodfella has finally found the proof of the rampant hatred of women in video gaming. Must-watch!

It's high time you cave-dwellers stopped denying the misogyny amongst gamers.

Proof of misogyny: https://www.youtube.com/user/SpeedDemosArchiveSDA

Join him and others who are against male gamers here: http://www.facebook.com/therationalistsyt

Angry Harry's MRA Corner with Mike Buchanan

AVfM Video Source · 4 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Another sterling interview turned in by Sir Harry (yes, we knighted him). This time he is talking with Justice for Men and Boys Party leader Mike Buchanan, a great MRA who does not mince words.

Open letter to Jillian Berman

Elaine Finklestein · 5 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is an open letter to Jillian Berman on her article "It's a Fact that Women Get Paid Less Than Men. Stop Debating."

(Trigger warning: Facts, jokes)

I'm not sure when "fact checker" became a dirty word. I guess it had already happened by the time Jillian Berman called out the evil fact checkers who "pounced" on Barack Obama for using the mathematically irresponsible "Women earn 77 cents on men's dollar" statistic in a 2014 SOTU address. How dare they.

Before I go on, Jillian, I acknowledge that you asked everyone to "stop debating." But I (helped by some of the world's preeminent gender and economics scholars) am not going to stop debating. The points you made in your article portray American women as whiny at best and completely incompetent at worst. For me, that's worth fighting against. Even if you've heard words like these from non-feminists before, I'm asking you to give me a chance—I believe that there is at least one thing in my response that you don't know, and maybe if you open your mind instead of trying to close my mouth, we can talk. If you still want to silence me, stop reading now.

In the opening of your piece, you struggled for a good argument against Christina Hoff Sommers's piece "No, Women Don't Make Less Money Than Men," so you decided to attack her "self-awareness" instead. The offending sentence "with no self-awareness" was: "No one knows if the five cents is a result of discrimination or some other subtle hard-to-measure difference between male and female workers."

You wondered what that "subtle hard-to-measure difference" might be if not institutional sexism. It's a good question—one that Harvard economist Claudia Goldin discusses. I've written about this before, so I'll summarize:

"A better answer [than sexism]," Claudia Goldin writes, "is [that] firms reward individuals who differ in their desire for various amenities.… Workplace flexibility is a complicated, multidimensional concept," and "a flexible schedule often comes at a high price." She concludes, "This matter is not just a woman's issue." When everyone has more workplace flexibility, women won't be crowded out by men who are not considered valuable at home and can therefore spend more "face time" at work and inconvenient hours on call. With more workplace flexibility, Goldin believes that the gap between observationally identical men and women will close.

You also seemed unhappy with Sommers's claim that women choose lower-paid professions. You claimed that part of the institutional sexism that leads to labor market segregation is "a lack of supportive policies," but that doesn't seem right. After all, Norway tops the Gender Gap Index (GGI) and is considered one of the most gender-equal countries by every organization that measures these things. Yet, Norway has one of the most gender-segregated labor markets on earth. Women in Norway have more choice—choice that is staunchly defended by their government—than women anywhere else, yet they exercise it to remain in stereotypically female professions.

But let's talk about the reality that's keeping that 77-cent figure alive: for some reason, women end up in lower-paid college majors, professions, and career paths. Is it because of sexism? I'll go through the points you made one at a time.

1. "High paying, traditionally male-dominated fields, like engineering and computer science, tend to be hostile places for women."

The sources you cited are based on anecdotes from individuals who have left STEM. What about the STEM women who are still going strong? I'd reckon they're not complaining about sexism because when you look at the facts, there's no sexism: there is no difference between male and female engineers' paychecks. That's a fact. Perhaps, Jillian, you vilified "fact checkers" because you are allergic to facts?

2. "The path away from those high-paying fields starts in school."

So does the path toward them. Hundreds of female-only STEM scholarships are at girls' fingertips, starting in grade school. In a world where every tween seems to have an iPhone, this encouragement is not hard to find. But where's the male-only social work scholarship?

You also wrote that it's "hard" for girls to pick STEM careers when "there are few female computer scientists and engineers for them to look up to." If women are truly equal to men, we can man up and claim what we have an uncontested legal right to. Why do girls need women to "look up to" in order to succeed? Why can't a girl "look up to" Google CEO Larry Page? Are you suggesting that we are so handicapped that we can't imagine ourselves doing well without a specifically female role model to point to?

I wholeheartedly agree with the idea of focusing on STEM in schools and portraying those fields as interesting, socially relevant, and productive. But that positive image should be targeted to all students, not just girls, because all students should be equal.

The problem with your arguments is that even when women are encouraged to enter STEM majors, they're more likely to leave them.

Further, there's no reason to assume that in an ideal society, both genders are equally represented in all fields. If women don't want to be engineers, why force them? (Norway doesn't, and it's not just the most gender-equal country—it's also the happiest).

3. Fields that tend to be more attractive to women, like teaching, social work and other "caretaking" professions are typically lower paying—in part because they're considered "women's work."

The jobs you list here are intrinsically non-profit-generating jobs. Teachers depend on tax dollars, and they earn a median salary of $55,360 (secondary school) or $53,590 (primary school). By comparison, police officers, mostly men, also get paid in tax dollars. They earn $56,130, with the added bonus of a 19 per 100,000 on-the-job death rate. Nurses, who are generally female "caretakers" and whom you neglected to list, earn nearly double the average American income.

4. A lot of women have to take breaks from working—in part because of a lack of supportive public policies.

I'm not sure why it never occurs to you to think that perhaps women don't "have to" take time off. They might, just maybe, "like to" spend time with their kids.

Culturally, as former feminist activist Warren Farrell discusses in his book The Myth of Male Power, women can expect to be supported by men. They can choose a work–life balance that allows them to be mothers as well as workers, whereas men who prioritize fatherhood over their careers are laughed at.

5. Even when women have and make "the choice" to do everything exactly the same as men they still come out behind.

If "behind" means being able to spend more time with their kids than fathers do, then yes, women are behind. If "behind" means dominating the safest and most emotionally fulfilling jobs, then yes, they're behind. But I don't think the Norwegian women who have chosen stereotypically female professions feel "behind." I think they're just doing what they want to do.

Feminists have become fixated on wages as the sole measure of a man or woman's value. But that's wrong. Married men, for example, may have their wives to thank for 17 additional years of life. You can't put a dollar sign in front of that, but I'd say it's pretty damn valuable.

Entirely outside of my professional abilities, I value myself as a social activist (thanks, A Voice for Men and Honey Badger Brigade), a solver of problems, a cultivator of music, a creator and writer, a loving friend/sister/daughter to people dear to me, and (I hope) a sensitive and supportive partner to the man I live with. All of these things are part of me, and no matter my net worth, I am not and never will be "behind."

14-year-old Swedish state document about women's peace altered

William Andersson · 5 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Anyone who is reasonably familiar with the increasingly embarrassing affair Sweden vs. Julian Assange probably recognizes the name Marianne Ny, the prosecutor who started the spectacle that has now cost the Swedish and British taxpayers millions of dollars. Ny is not only a prosecutor but also a deeply convinced feminist. During her watch, no suspected woman-assailant shall get away. "We have not turned all the stones," replied Ny when asked why she chose to send out the warrant on Assange, even though he had already promised to return to Sweden when he was done with his scheduled job in London.

Does the Swedish prosecutor's office not read the Flashback thread? One has to wonder if there could be a single stone remained unturned in it. The conclusion is clear: The Swedish prosecution has no case against Julian Assange. In spite of that, when they choose to send out an international arrest warrant with the highest priority level that Interpol has (normally used against terrorists and mass murderers), you've got to agree with Mr. Assange that there is reason for concern. Then, when Sweden would not even officially promise not to send him right into the arms of the CIA, as he demanded in exchange for giving himself up, his concern understandably grew.

This is, however, about something else. How many of you remember Marianne Ny's statement on page 8 of the Swedish Court Administration Agency's report about the new women's peace law from 2001?

> "Only when the man is arrested and the woman are left in peace she have time to get some perspective on her life, she then get a chance to discover how she really have been treated." "Marianne Ny says that the prosecution has a good effect to protect women, even in the cases where the offender is prosecuted but not convicted."

That really was what she said in the quote is quickly confirmed by the Google search engine:

[image]

Now for the really strange bit. Apparently someone at the Court Administration Agency thought that this statement was a bit controversial. Especially as the prosecutor who uttered it has become world famous and therefore risks having her previous works examined in a way that she does not normally need to be afraid of here in Sweden.

That the Swedish "women's peace" law would allow the state to arbitrarily detain men in order to give their accusers "peace and quiet" to, with the help of someone from all the Swedish women's separatist organizations of course, "help" them to "realize" how they have been dealt with, can hardly be considered to be in line with what the European Union and the United Nations would call human rights. Especially since the prosecutor apparently believes that it is the detention itself that it is beauty of it, and that if there is a conviction or not does not seem to be an issue.

But that is precisely what it is. A prosecutor may not prosecute a citizen if he or she is not confident that it is possible to convict the person. If there is any doubt in the mind of the prosecutor, the case must be dropped. However, there is no limit that specifies how long a prosecutor may keep you locked up in jail while "investigating" the case. She must only remember to hold regular custody proceedings in court and there say things like "We have not yet turned all the stones." As long as she does that, she can keep you basically however long she wants. A fact that Sweden repeatedly gets criticized for by, among others, the UN Committee against Torture and cruel treatment of prisoners. The quote from Marianne Ny is thus questionable. Both legally and in regards to international principles of human rights.

Now that a final settlement in the Assange affair looks like it could be approaching, it would probably be quite embarrassing for Sweden and our legal system if the quote from the prosecutor who started it all spreads across the world. Especially since it is precisely this process that Marianne Ny and the Swedish government have used against the poor man.

This must be what the Swedish Court Administration agency realized. Therefore, they have now chosen to recently change the wording of the 14-year-old published report.

Now, instead, the following turns up on page 8 if you choose to download the file:

[image]

Translation: "Only when the man is arrested and the woman is left in peace she have time to get some perspective on her life, she then get a chance to discover how she really have been treated." "Marianne Ny says, prosecutor at the office in Kristianstad. It is the prosecutors and police task to investigate and prosecute crimes. The law does state what is to be considered criminal."

And perhaps strangest of all: Even in the PDF files that have already been downloaded onto people's private FTP servers, the change has occurred. This must thus have been a highly prioritized matter and a highly sophisticated operation.

Fortunately, there is both Google cache and attentive citizens out there. AVfM would like to thank the website "Pappamanualen.se" for this tip. This Swedish "Dad Manual" website is one of those that had the report uploaded on their own FTP server and now with great astonishment found that, despite that, it had been changed.

This therefore means that if you find peculiarities in a Swedish governmental PDF document, it is obviously not enough to only download them and upload them to your own private anonymous FTP server and believe that the proof is thus secured. The state's tentacles apparently now reach in there too.

Editorial note: This article originally appeared on AVfM Sweden and is translated here into English. Article title image from Wikimedia Commons. -DE Spider-Woman's big ass is a big deal!

AVfM Video Source · 5 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminist censors are out on force again, wringing their hands over a supposedly "sexist" comic book image of Spider Woman.

An ungallant society: The men's rights movement of 1898

Peter Wright · 6 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following newspaper article 'An Ungallant Society: The Men's Rights Movement' was published in 1898, and is the first known reference to a "Men's Rights Movement," as far as I'm aware. In the same spirit as this early movement, I'm proud to say that the modern M(H)RM continues to refuse the one sided gallantry and chivalry that has denied men their human rights and turned global culture into the slow-moving car crash we see today. – PW

***

The Women's Rights movement has scored another great success. It has called forth a League for Men's Rights to counteract it. This league, with the object of securing legal and moral protection to men against the encroachment of women, is in process of formation in London. Mr. William Austin, who resides at Blackheath, and is in a very large way of business in the City, is the founder, and he has received letters of sympathy and assurances of co-operation from, among others, two noblemen whose names during the past few years have been several times prominently before the public in cases that have attracted wide attention. Mr. Austin's personal appearance is not in the least indicative of his deep seated misogyny. Indeed, he looks much more like a man who would run after a pretty girl, at a pinch, rather than away from one. However, the mover in an effort to secure protection from a sex which it has been a tendency of modern legislation to assist in every possible way ought to have some intelligible reasons to support his side of the case.

"I cannot pretend," said Mr. Austin, "to find a remedy for all the injustices on the statute books; but where there is flagrant violations of the very principle of justice, I am convinced that it is well to get together a body of intelligent people and try what may be done to find some way out of the difficulty. I have looked carefully into the legal aspect of the matter, and find that a woman has a much greater advantage when it comes to litigation about almost any matter over any man, rich or poor, than a rich man has over a poor man. I find that in an extraordinary number of cases the law discriminates in the sharpest possible manner between men and women, both in civil and criminal law proceedings. I will not consider the advantage a woman almost invariably has for the reasons of her sex the very moment she goes into court, or even makes a complaint against a man, nor will I more than refer to the bias of the Press and public opinion the moment a woman makes her appearance in a case at law. I will not confine myself to a diatribe against the silliness of juries, judges, and everybody else in breach of promise cases, where sentimental damages are sometimes assessed so heavily that the man is ruined; but will go into the matter of pro-feminine prejudice which has become transmuted into positive rules of law and legal administration, actually crystallised into statutory enactments."

"I will begin," said Mr. Austin, taking up a legal volume filled with copious annotations, "with the Summary Court for Separation. There is a direct proof of what I call sex legislation. A man cannot go to this court and obtain a summary separation, but a woman can. Undoubtedly, these courts were established in the first instance to protect weak women. Perhaps they were needed then; now they certainly are not. It would be much more sensible in these days of new women to establish courts of summary separation for men. Most men do not cry out when they are hurt, as women do; but can anyone suppose for an instant that there are not in London alone thousands of men who in all justice ought to have some relief from the cruelties of the women who are making life a hell for them? Then take an action for slander – that is a proceeding open to women alone. But the triumph of modern one-sided sex legislation is the Act passed in 1895, making it a duty for a husband to maintain his wife, even notwithstanding her adultery. "

"There is hardly any limit to the privileges accorded to women over men in the matrimonial, civil, and criminal law books. The balance of the scales in favour of the women in the case, through the sympathies of judge and jury, are too well-known to need calling attention to; a woman may commit perjury to almost any extent, and, although her statements may be found false, they mark the result. No one suggests that she should be indicted for perjury, On the contrary, the man, glad to escape, sometimes settles a large sum of money on her rather than take the chances of further litigation. Even the custom of bringing breach of promise suits is confined to women; a man who sought to obtain redress for a very real wrong, inflicted by a woman's fickleness, would be laughed out of court. Another instance of the hardships in matrimonial law is that the rule invalidating marriages obtained by fraud, duress, or undue influence, have no effect as against a woman inducing a man by subtle devices or threats of scandal, to marry him. How frequently one hears of an experienced woman of the world inducing some fledgling to become her husband. And how ridiculous would be the effect to break such a contract in a court of law."

"The law confers on a woman the privilege of support from her husband. Once, in order to secure support from her husband, a woman had to live with him and obey him. But since 1857 any attempts to enforce obedience have been given up, and, since the decision in the Jackson case, the husband cannot compel his wife to return to him in case she has left him, although sequestration and imprisonment are resorted to if he does not comply with her claims of support. A successful lady litigant in 1886 observed to her husband, 'There is no law which compels me to honour and obey you, but there is one which says you must keep me.' "

"But no matter if the wife is rolling in wealth, she is not obliged to contribute one penny to her husband's support, even if he is incapable through disease or accident, and even if she received her wealth from him in his time of prosperity. Even if a wife, against her husband's wishes, leaves her husband's house, after assaulting him and insulting him, she can obtain an order for restitution of conjugal rights, which is merely a preliminary form of a claim for sequestration of his property for her maintenance."

"Do you believe the Married Women's Property Act?" I asked.

"Again, consulting his book Mr. Austin said: "There is a great deal of iniquitous partiality about that Act. By this Act, while a married woman has complete control over her acquired or inherited property, she is, by cynical injustice, left with all her old claims on her husband's property, and can enforce these by the statute of 1895, even if she commit adultery. If you come to look into the matter at all thoroughly you will find that 99 per cent of women's property is man-earned. The wife can leave this away from the husband, even if he gave it to her, but if a man attempted to leave his property away from his wife he could be practically prevented from doing so by her suing for a maintenance order, when as much of his property as the judge thinks fit would be settled on her."

"This Married Women's Property Act", Mr. Austin went on, "is responsible for a silent revolution in succession which is being accomplished. Conveyancers aver that the steady tendency is for a woman to leave property acquired from some man always to a woman. This Act has the further effect of enabling a woman to recover judgment against and bankrupt her husband for any money she may have lent him; but there is no case of a husband daring to sue his wife for a loan. There is an even more surprising effect of this Act than those I have mentioned. A married woman, even when separated from her husband, and released from all duties toward him or her children, retains her privilege of having her property exempt from seizure for debt."

"Are there any other instances of partiality of the law toward women?" I asked.

"Oh, plenty. One of them is the responsibility of a husband for a wife's acts, although she is not under his control. As the late Sir Frank Lockwood put it, 'One has the deep satisfaction of knowing that if Mrs. Jackson utters slanders, Mr. Jackson can be sued.' Lord Halsbury, in the Jackson case, declared that in English law the husband never had the right to restrain his wife. And married women are not responsible for any crime they commit when their husband is by; he is supposed to have coerced them into the act."

"When it comes to facilities for obtaining divorces the husband is at a terrible disadvantage. He cannot procure a divorce except by an expensive process, while she can get a summary separation, with costs and maintenances out of her husband's property or earnings, from the nearest police-station. Although the woman may be an opera singer with £40,000 a year, not a penny of it can be touched, even for the children, but every week, in the police-courts, a working man with perhaps 18s or 20s a week may be seen ordered to pay two-thirds of it for the keep of a woman who has treated him with cruel malignity. If the wife of a poor working man repudiates her duties, neglects her children, drinks to the verge of delirium tremens, pawns her husband's clothes, disgraces him before his friends, procures his discharge from his employment, and even assaults him, he can do nothing if it be not appeal to the High Courts, at a minimum cost of £40. And it is not against the poor man alone that the way of the wife to escape from the matrimonial yoke is made clear and easy. Perjury by the husband is a frightful thing, but committed by the wife, or one of her witnesses, it is deliberately passed over. When it comes to giving the husband damages from a co-respondent, who has broken up his home, exposed him to loss and worry, as well as a certain disgrace, we find that judges and juries have actually seized on these damages to serve as a fund for endowing the adulteress."

"I think," said Mr. Austin in conclusion, "that you will see, without my going any further, how greatly a remedy is needed for abuses of which the foregoing are only a few instances."

SOURCE: An Ungallant Society: The Men's Rights Movement – London Daily News – Friday 06 May 1898

Gynocentrism in Indonesia: women receive lighter sentences

AVfM Video Source · 6 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

That women receive no special treatment in non-Western countries is a myth claimed even by some MGTOW and men's rights advocates. Youtuber Ayam Sirias explains that women are routinely given lighter prison sentences in Indonesia, among other privileges.

Big time waste and corruption in Romania by the European Union – Part two

Lucian Vâlsan · 7 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: This article is part of a series of investigative journalism of AVfM Romania. Part one can be read here. This article first appeared on AVfM Romania.

We continue today with the second part of the series started on AVfM Romania in which we aim to document the waste of taxpayers' money that takes place in Romania in the name of helping women—a waste that at the end of the day helps neither women nor the society as a whole. A waste that helps solely the group of ideologues who populates many NGOs as well as an extended clique of corrupted individuals financed by an ideologically driven European Union.

We will focus today on the project called Media Fem—Școala Națională de Jurnalism (Media Fem—The National School of Journalism)—a project that was intensely promoted on almost all online platforms, but a project about which nobody asked the right questions: namely, why? and who? The question of who is one with a very complicated answer but an answer that the public must be aware of. So we will patiently analyze who are the initiators of this project and then will answer the question of why? after we have examined the context of the project.

The initiators

According to the press communiques[1], the project is initiated by the firm SC Blockbuster Media SRL[note 1] in partnership with The Association "Jurnalism pentru Șanse Egale" (JSE—Journalism for Equal Opportunities) and is co-funded by the main instrument of wasting Romanian and EU taxpayers' money—POSDRU[note 2]—through the contract registered as POSDRU/144/6.3/S/129408, with a total eligible value of 17,129,034 RON (3.9 million €).

The Association "Jurnalism pentru Șanse Egale" (JSE) appears in the National Registry of NGOs with the number 754/A/2013 as founded on March 25, 2013, and as having Ms. Tane Petra Lavinia in the position of president[2]. The POSDRU that we are analyzing was signed on April 30, 2014, which is just a little after this association hit the one-year-of – "activity" mark[3].

We have put "activity" in scare quotes because a short search filtering for news before April 1 this year offers us exactly zero results mentioning this organization. Yet, despite having one year of doing literally nothing, this organization suddenly finds itself in the position of being a partner in managing a project worth over 17 million RON (3.9 million €).

The only online presence of JSE dating before the commencement of this project dates from April 15 this year when they created a Facebook page for the organization[4], a Facebook page in which they posted exactly nothing until after the half of May (see the image). We can, therefore, state without fear of being wrong that JSE is an NGO that came out of nowhere and whose activity is essentially non-existent.

The solicitor, SC Blockbuster Media SRL, is, on the other hand, an entity with nine years of activity on the market (and founded 12 years ago), which is already specialized in projects aimed at wasting the taxpayers' money to the benefit of the feminist ideology and to the detriment of the society as a whole.

A closer look at this firm opens the floodgates to an entire subkingdom of legal entities that have swallowed public funds in the past as well, and all the ties seem to be leading to the person of Ms. Roxana Grămadă, who happens to be, amongst other things, the JSE's vice-president[5] and who has a leadership position (project manager) within Blockbuster Media SRL. Although we understand that Ms. Grămadă is an empowered, strong, and independent woman, we cannot avoid noticing that being so empowered that she has made a partnership essentially with herself to stifle taxpayers' money is, at the very least, immoral.

The same Ms. Grămadă also occupied the position of corporate affairs consultant at Realitatea Media around the same time that she was conducting with Blockbuster Media another series of feminist-inspired projects through which a new generation of future journalists were trained in the feminist dogma using taxpayers' money between 2010 and 2012. A pile of coincidences! (Translator's note: Grămadă means pile in Romanian, the same as the woman's name.)

Grafic evoluție profit și cifră de afaceri / Sursa: listafirme.ro

We look on this graphic and see that Blockbuster Media reported in 2011 a record profit for its existence of 640,718 RON (around 146,000€), then in 2012 a negative profit of 155,593 RON (35,400€), and in 2013 a minuscule profit of 7968 RON (under 2000€). Where these extreme variations come from shall be explained in great detail in a future episode. But we will mention right now that 2011 is the year Blockbuster Media became directly involved in projects aimed at training journalists in the feminist ideology using taxpayers' money.

Until this year, Blockbuster Media coordinated the project "FEMINA—Training for journalists, TV Shows, Monitoring, National Informing and Advocacy for affirmation of gender equality and equality of opportunity"—a project also funded through POSDRU in partnership with the Association for the Promotion of Women in Romania (APFR) and the National Institute of Opinion Research Studies and Marketing (INSOMAR). Apparently, Blockbuster Media did such a terrific job with FEMINA that the European Union decided to hand them another big bag of money to continue with an almost identical project.

The FEMINA project lasted for three years and cost the Romanian government around 2.2 million RON (500,000€) and the European Union a bit over 17.6 million RON, having a total eligible value of 20,896,919 lei (4.8 million euros)[6]. At that time, the main result of the project was the entrance into the public knowledge of the statistic according to which "8% of the women who decided to have a baby have lost their jobs."

Besides the fact that we don't know how many men are in this situation (or even if those women really lost their job as a consequence of their pregnancy), the number itself is based on a research report issued by INSOMAR, which published it after being paid with money from the FEMINA project. The report was sumptuously presented by university professor Dr. Gheorghe Teodorescu—the same Gheorghe Teodorescu who is the subject of a criminal trial by the National Anti-Corruption Directorate after allegedly repeatedly having forged public and private documents[7,8].

In other words, the whole "study" is made under the careful guidance of an individual with questionable credibility at the very least. Also, INSOMAR as an institution is hardly credible—as it's being controlled by PSV Company, a corporation that also owns share in Realitatea Media[9] (strange curiosity—exactly the same place where Ms. Grămadă was a corporate affairs consultant in the same period). PSV Company is the former Petromservice, formerly despoiled of roughly 83 million euros by the controversial Sorin Ovidiu Vântu—just so we know what and who are we talking about.

But regardless of these facts, the meme that "8% of the women who decided to have a baby have lost their jobs" has reached the point when it is being used in the media—in many cases without a source, or at best referenced back to INSOMAR—and it is being taught as an unquestionable fact in universities. Knowing what we know about INSOMAR, we consider that the number has the same level of credibility as Ceaușescu's statistics regarding yearly corn or tractor production. But even if the number is true, it still doesn't say anything about the context of the number. But this is a topic for another time.

Coming back to Blockbuster Media, it is at the very least weird that neither the EU nor the Romanian government noticed that Roxana Grămadă's name is everywhere. In 2011, she was the main contact person for acquisitions in the FEMINA project for Blockbuster Media[10], and nowadays she is the project manager for the same firm and the vice-president (and founder) of the partner NGO. If nobody noticed this, then this is further evidence how inefficient (besides being harmful) the redistribution mechanism of the EU really is. If this aspect was noticed and ignored, then we're dying to find out why this was ignored, and we consider that it is in the public interest to know this aspect.

The project—is it really necessary?

Now that we know who we're dealing with, let's take a look at the ideological and practical dimension of the project.

The Media Fem project takes place over a period of 18 months and consists, essentially, of a series of courses aimed at 756 women, of which 140 of them media experts, from the Bucharest-Ilfov and South-Muntenia areas[11].

The project aims to qualify only women for jobs like reporter, camera operator, imaging editor, broadcast director, cosmetician, hair stylist, and data operator—and a portion of the participants will also get subsidies and prizes. Although it is an overtly sexist project, it pretends that its objective is[12]:

> […] promoting the principle of equal opportunity and gender equality in the media community both through educating its active members as well as through qualifying those who already work in the field or wish to enter into this community.

At the end of July, the president of JSE, Lavinia Tane, a partner in this project, was invited on to RFI to talk generally on the topic of gender equality and equality of opportunity and about the Media Fem project[13]. From the interview, we find out that Ms. Tane worked for Realitatea (what a coincidence!) and was also part of an internship held by CNN (maybe she learned the feminist language there?). But more important in that interview are the three big moments of brutal honesty that Ms. Tane displays.

The first moment is right at the beginning of the interview when she admits that any structural problems that might exist in the Romanian media are applicable to both men and women. This is undoubtedly a true statement. But in this context, why is Media Fem still necessary when it aims to train only women?

The second moment is at the 18-minute mark, where Ms. Tane admits that the women in Romania are overwhelmingly of the opinion that there is no such thing as gender discrimination in the workplace and if they, as women, have an issue in the workplace, then that issue has other causes and is unrelated to their sex. Yet this fact is then twisted by Lavinia Tane and cited as evidence that her NGO must change the way women think! Even if the women already said loud and clear that they don't need that. This shouldn't surprise anyone. Feminism has always acted regardless of whether women wanted it or not because the purpose of feminism is money, influence, and political power—not helping women.

And this aspect was admitted by Ms. Tane in her third moment of brutal honesty—at the 26-minute mark when she says loud and clear that the Media Fem project is aimed at the TV industry precisely because TV is the most influential medium of broadcasting information.

Reading through the fervor of the press communiques and the doublespeak like "We want equality—therefore, we will qualify exclusively women," one would think that the women in Romanian journalism are rarae aves. But that's not true. Not even by a long shot.

Let's take a look at the universities. The universities don't publicize the sex of their students, but the great advantage of Romanian names is that one can easily figure out the sex of the student in almost all of the cases. Last year, for instance, 92% of the students admitted with a public scholarship to the Journalism section of the Bucharest University were women[14].

Of the 56 students admitted this year at the same university and section, 50 are women. That is 89%. And if we exclude the man admitted through the affirmative action reserved place for gypsies, the percentage of women admitted through the competition in which the equality of opportunity is guaranteed goes as high as 91%. On the tuition-based spots, 52 of the 64 students admitted are also women. That is over 81%. Cumulated, public scholarship plus those on tuition, we have 85% of the future qualified journalists admitted this year in Bucharest being women[15].

But maybe Bucharest is more coquettish and more cosmopolitan. So let's look at Iași, an undoubtedly more traditionalist place. This summer, 34 out of the 40 students admitted on a public scholarship to the Journalism section of the Letters Faculty from the "Alexandru Ioan Cuza" University from Iași were women[16]. In the tuition-based spots, 73 out of the 83 students admitted were also women[17]. If we add the two, we reach a staggering number of 87% of the future journalists from Iași being women.

Considering these undeniable realities, how is it justifiable to spend almost 9 million euros (FEMINA + Media Fem), taxpayers' money, in the past four years on seminaries and journalism qualification courses dedicated exclusively to women?

The very existence of this project is the equivalent of spending 9 million euros to encourage men to seek employment in the IT industry (a flourishing industry in Romania). Just like men don't need help to get into IT because they do pretty well for themselves, the same is true for women who don't need help to get into journalism because the reality shows unequivocally that they do pretty well for themselves on their own.

In this country, anyone who dreams of becoming a news anchor, regardless of their sex, dreams to be Andreea

Esca. The most important economic analysis magazine, Capital, is headed by a woman—Oana Osman[18]. The most important annual event dedicated to radio productions in Europe—Prix Europa from Berlin—just nominated for the grand prize the production Maria Tănase—Urban Soundtrack For a Diva, a documentary made by a woman about a great woman of the Romanian music[19].

Given these realities, to assert that there is no equal opportunity in the Romanian media or, worse than that, to assert that there is a discrimination trend against women in the Romanian media and that women are insufficiently represented is nothing short of an ideologically driven bald-faced lie.

The Romanian media has its problems—and the list of problems isn't short at all and some of them are typical for the media milieu in ex-communist countries. But the Romanian media also has a few essentially fantastic characteristics that cannot be found in many EU countries.

One of these characteristics is the fact that it's significantly freer. In the Romanian media, one can speak freely about a plethora of topics without fearing a torrent of whining and allegations of racism/classism/sexism, or other ideological marottes. On TV in Romania, one can still say that men and women, both as individuals and as groups, are fundamentally different, and by saying that, both the public and the anchor know exactly what one means. Such a statement in Romania doesn't come with the risk of having the newspapers write the next day that "X said last night on TV that he hates women"—as it is unfortunately the case in many corners of the European Union.

Following the modus operandi of the projects orchestrated by Blockbuster Media,we can only conclude that this reality is bothering the ideologues in Brussels who, through the obedience of the authorities in Bucharest, are willing to pour mountains of cash in order to indoctrinate the next generation of journalists and transform the press as we know it today into one that is even more inept than it is today and into one that will be willing to butcher the truth even more in order to fit into the ideological straitjacket of feminism.

But is Blockbuster Media an ideologically driven institution? As the facts presented in this article show, this is most likely not the case. We believe that not even the president of JSE is ideologically motivated, even if she has a semi-feminist discourse (and we say semi-feminist because she was at the very least honest). Blockbuster Media seems to be motivated more by money than anything else.

But then again, this problem would not exist in the first place if we weren't dealing with an organism that is indeed ideologically driven—namely the EU. In part three, we will continue to expose the smelly corruption brushwood in which the Romanian feminist lobby is immersed and we will continue to discuss the way the taxpayers' money is being spent in the name of helping women and only women, under the guidance of the European Union and, at the end of the day, to the detriment of everyone.

References:

note 1: SRL = Societate cu Răspundere Limitată: The Romanian legal equivalent of a Limited Liability Company

note 2: POSDRU = Programul Operațional Sectorial – Dezvoltarea Resurselor Umane (The Sectoral Operational Programme – Human Resources Development)

[1] http://www.romaniapozitiva.ro/bucuresti/cursuri-gratuite-scoala-nationala-de-jurnalism-mediafem/

[2] http://www.just.ro/Portals/0/WWWW/files/registrul_ong/Asociatii18072014_2.pdf – Registrul Național al ONG – Indexul persoanelor juridice fără scop patrimonial – asociatii, partea a II-a, pag. 190 (accesat la 2 septembrie 2014)

[3] https://www.fonduri-ue.ro/proiecte/details/1/2497/proiecte-achizi%C8%9Bii-beneficiari-priva%C8%9Bi-%C2%A0media-fem-scoala-nationala-de-jurnalism

[4] https://www.facebook.com/pages/Jurnalism-pentru-Şanse-Egale/502378476535554 – Pagina de Facebook a JSE (accesat la 2 septembrie 2014)

[5] ibidem 2

[6] http://www.curentul.info/2012/index.php/2012031670001/Actualitate/Femina-un-proiect-de-5-milioane-de-Euro-pentru-oamenii-lui-Vintu.html – Dan Badea – Femina – un proiect de 5 milioane de euro pentru oamenii lui Vîntu, Curentul, publicat la 15 martie 2012 (accesat la 2 septembrie 2014)

[7] ibidem

[8] http://www.obiectivbr.ro/stancu-ziua-judecatii_id94446 Alina Mihai, Alexandru Necula – Stancu. Ziua judecății, Obiectiv Vocea Brăilei, publicat la 17 iunie 2014 (accesat la 2 septembrie 2014)

[9] http://www.business24.ro/sorin-ovidiu-vantu/stiri-sorin-ovidiu-vantu/vantu-ar-putea-ajunge-actionar-unic-la-realitatea-1455848

[10] http://www.feminaromania.ro/attachments/article/60/DOCUMENTATIE%20SECURITATEA%20MUNCII.pdf – Documentație pentru ofertanți pentru achiziția de servicii de consultanță sanitară și siguranță (Securitatea Muncii) cod CPV: 71317210-8 (accesat la 2 septembrie 2014)

[11] http://www.paginademedia.ro/2014/07/cursuri-de-jurnalism-pe-bani-europeni-cum-pot-fi-accesate/

[12] ibidem

[13] http://www.rfi.ro/emisiunile-rfi-ro-51389-egalitatea-sanse-barbati-femei – Egalitatea de șanse între bărbați și femei – Interviu RFI (în limba română)

[14] https://docs.google.com/a/mail.avoiceformen.com/viewer?a=v&pid=sites&srcid=ZmpzYy51bmlidWMucm98ZmFjdWx0YXRlYS1kZS1qdXJuYWxpc20tc2ktc3RpaW50ZWxlLWNvbXVuaWNhcmlpfGd4OjIyNGEwYzEyNmU4OTdiYWM – Rezultate Examen de admitere iulie 2013, specializarea Jurnalism (accesat la 1 septembrie 2014)

[15] https://docs.google.com/a/mail.avoiceformen.com/viewer?a=v&pid=sites&srcid=ZmpzYy51bmlidWMucm98ZmFjdWx0YXRlYS1kZS1qdXJuYWxpc20tc2ktc3RpaW50ZWxlLWNvbXVuaWNhcmlpfGd4OmQzZWE1ZmM5YTIzYjhkYw – Lista candidaților admiși la specializarea Jurnalism – iulie 2014

[16] http://media.lit.uaic.ro/wp-uploads/Licenta1415Romani_buget.pdf – pag. 17 – Lista candidaţilor – români admişi, cu finanţare de la buget – ordonaţi după media generală, descrescător – iulie 2014

[17] http://media.lit.uaic.ro/wp-uploads/Licenta1415Romani_taxa.pdf – pag. 17 – Lista candidaţilor – români admişi, cu taxă – ordonaţi după media generală, descrescător

[18] http://www.capital.ro/jurnalistii-revistei-capital-te-provoaca-gandeste-drept.html – Oana Osman – Jurnaliștii revistei Capital te provoacă: “Gândește drept!”, publicat la 29 August 2014 (accesat la 31 august 2014)

[19] http://www.paginademedia.ro/2014/08/29-august-un-documentar-despre-maria-tanase-produs-de-radio-romania-nominalizat-la-prix-europa/ – Carmen Maria Andronache – 29 August. Un documentar despre Maria Tănase, produs de Radio România, nominalizat la Prix Europa, publicat la 29 August 2014 (accesat la 31 august 2014)

The “helpless victims” who reject “social justice” journalists: #NotYourShield

Vincent James · 7 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

With evidence of cronyism, fraud and underhanded censorship emerging in the last three weeks, a number of video game magazines have entered the crosshairs of a far-reaching corruption scandal. “GamerGate”, as this scandal is coming to be known, has so far driven three game magazines to change their ethics policies in response to the public outcry. At the heart of the scandal was the fact that a collective of feminist activists had come to dominate the major publications in the small world of games journalism; these activists were said to be using their positions to promote their feminist friends in the game development scene, to the detriment of both honest developers and the gamers themselves.

GamerGate has been steadily trending on Twitter throughout Europe and North America, as well as in various cities in Canada and the Far East; celebrities such as the actor Adam Baldwin have spoken about it and even mainstream sources such as Breitbart, The Guardian, Forbes, Slate and the BBC have started to report on it, some discussing the corruption in the midst of the game industry and others dismissing GamerGate as a misogynistic attack by socially awkward gamers with neckbeards. One particular article that criticized gamers led to its author, Jenn Frank, quitting her newspaper, The Guardian, after it emerged that she was financing one of the people involved in the GamerGate scandal and was in turn being financed by that person’s close friend.

The full details of the recent revelations on GamerGate will feature in a new article on AVFM next week. This article, instead, is about how the very people whom the feminist journalists claim to support have stood up against their would-be protectors. Just as the hashtag #WomenAgainstFeminism came last month to remind feminists that some women refuse to be part of their victim narrative, we are now seeing #NotYourShield, a hashtag written by women, by people of ethnic minorities, by homosexuals, transgender people and all others for whom these journalists have claimed to speak, decrying the fact that the journalists are using them to deflect accusations of corruption.

It all started on the 28th of August, when five different gaming magazines published op-eds proclaiming “the end of gamers”. Leigh Alexander, the editor-in-chief of Gamasutra and one of the people implicated in the corruption scandals, wrote that “They don’t know how to dress or behave.”, describing them as “lonely basement kids”, “these obtuse shitslingers, these wailing hyper-consumers, these childish internet-arguers”. She concluded that “Gamers are over. That’s why they are so mad”.

Luke Plunkett of Kotaku, one of the magazines accused of corruption, described them as “reactionary holdouts that feel so threatened by gaming’s widening horizons”. Gamasutra’s Devin Wilson stated that “We’re seeing calls to do away with the concept of “gamers” altogether. This is great, but this change isn’t going to happen automatically. ” and that “each of us have a part to play in that revolution if we want it to happen.” Identifying himself as a “social justice warrior”, he called gamers “terrorists”; he argued that game journalists should strive to change the video games medium itself by discouraging online multiplayer games, which he called “isolating“, and should subvert the role of gamers as “vicious gatekeepers” of the gaming industry.

Casey Johnson of Ars Technica accused “stereotypical gamers, who are typically vitriolic toward issues of diversity”, of misogyny and harassment against Zoe Quinn and Anita Sarkeesian. Tim Colwill of GameOn went on to say that “People who proudly call themselves “gamers” everywhere have been harassing and trying to exclude women for the last ten years, citing every pathetic excuse in the book from a “feminist agenda” to “gamer culture is under attack”.”

In the same 48-hour period in which these pieces were published, non-gaming pro-feminist websites such as The Daily Beast, Buzzfeed, Jezebel and The Mary Sue published articles likewise ridiculing gamers. They joined together terms such as “dorky and shy and male” and “the black hairball of hatred that is geek fandom” with claims that gamers, as misogynistic white men, were being replaced by a more diverse audience. All these websites, gaming and non-gaming, professed to be the protectors of minorities.

This inspired many gamers who have been posting on #GamerGate on Twitter to talk about how they were female; how they were black, latino, Asian, homosexual, transgender and just about every identity the “social justice” journalists had claimed to be defending. They began to talk about how well their fellow white, male, heterosexual gamers have treated them in online games, how #GamerGate is all about corruption, not identity, and how they didn’t want themselves be used as a shield for the corrupt game journalists to hide behind. They used the hashtag #NotYourShield to express their views.

Even a few feminists, such as Angela Night, went on #NotYourShield to speak against the “social justice” people who claimed to represent them:

These people and many more have come to the #NotYourShield hashtag, which now has over 30,000 tweets.

In the midst of it all, some of the "social justice" people claimed that most of the posts on #NotYourShield were made by sockpuppet accounts. A few accounts did indeed arise during the controversy to tweet specifically on this hashtag and #GamerGate, which shows that they were either sockpuppets or throwaway accounts that helped people remain anonymous. That said, the vast majority of the accounts I have personally looked into have been active since before the hashtag was created and indeed before GamerGate even began.

Some of the participants in #NotYourShield have even tweeted pictures of themselves and their passports to prove their identities. In response, a few of these participants have been called "uncle toms" and "gender traitors" by the "social justice" people, reminiscent of the women who had posted on the hashtag #womenagainstfeminism. As one of those who were involved in the #NotYourShield campaign put it: "[the gaming press] cannot comprehend that a colored person or female could possibly hold the opinions of white men."

Several blogs and one gaming website have written positive press about #NotYourShield. Taco Justice on YouTube has written two videos on this hashtag, saying "we come from every color, creed, class, sexual identity, gender and country". One woman's blog, linked to in a Twitter post on the hashtag, stated that, although she never encountered any sexism in online video games, the incessant stream of articles that claimed misogyny was rampant had discouraged her from playing.

Meinos Kaen, an Italian* blogger, pointed out the contrast between #NotYourShield and the gaming press' insult-driven #DescribeAGamerin4Words hashtag. On the website GamerHeadlines, an article was dedicated to the hashtag; it stated that "Female gamers are speaking up to show that they will not be used as a reason for the gaming community to be scrutinized.". The blogger OneAngryGamer wrote "For too long the radical left-wingers have been lumping all gamers into one bracket" and "The #NotYourShield hashtag fused with #GamerGate gives us a beautiful rainbow of diversity".

The message of #NotYourShield has been that those who wish to expose the corruption of the "social justice" people stand together, no matter what demographic they come from. It has shown that not all GLBTQ, not all members of ethnic minorities and certainly not all women adhere to the narrative of the mainstream gaming press. They do not want to be called victims, they do not want their identity to be politicized and do not want to see themselves as separate from their fellow white, male, heterosexual gamers. They reject the identity politics that the "social justice" journalists have offered them and instead welcome different form of diversity – the non-politicized kind.

 Editorial update : We appear to have misidentified this blogger as female. We have corrected the mistake. –DE

Over-reading the nice guy

Clint Carpentier · 7 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Society is a nice idea. People gather to service a common goal: survival; throw in some basic rules for cohesiveness; and, boom, society.

Something occurred to me these last couple days, though, part of an ongoing neural itch I've been scratching at obsessively for months now: too many people on both sides of the debate have been making poor conceptions of primitive livelihood. I may get into that deeper at a later date because it's one thing for feminists to screw it all up, but it's utterly shameful for the MRAs to get it wrong, and I'm running out of skull to scratch at. But for now, I'll share my epiphany on niceness.

Niceness isn't favored by either gender—not because it's inherently flawed as a psychological evolution but simply because nobody really understands niceness. Not understanding something leads to distrust of that something. We like to think we understand niceness, but because it started out as a necessary societal dictation, we still think of niceness in those terms.

We don't question the phrase "Be nice to your family/friends/community" when our parents are grilling into us as children, usually because there's usually a reddened hand involved. We are expected to nod and smile at community members when they are being clusterfucks because niceness is societal cohesion.

So let's harken back to the days of necessary cohesion. I'm of Canadian Native descent, and there are noticeable holdovers of my branch of peoples that help me put two and two together: men scatter and women gather (like I said above, I'll get into that later).

"Niceness" isn't a trait men need to exist, subsist, or pass on. So if we have it, we have it; if we don't, we don't. It's just that simple. We have our band of brothers in which we wrestle one another into dominance or submission, and everyone finds a niche in which they excel; so even the lowly "nice guy" can earn respect, as long as he knows his place (which means, Don't glower at the future alpha chief). Men respect capability, competence, and "caveman" communication: the most direct route from idea to implementation earns the most respect. Niceness need not apply—yet men have it, and we have it in spades. What I find funny is that the dork and the bully can be the best of friends when they are together on their own; and I think that has more to do with prehistoric scouting than it does with a burgeoning society (which would include mating rituals).

On the other hand, "niceness" is a trait women had to invest countless hours into cultivating. Whereas men scattered during the daily activities, women gathered, together, to gather … get it? Whatever task you can think of, women did it in groups, all day, everyday. Niceness would have been quickly honed in order to tolerate one another and keep the group as a whole from falling apart at the seams. When every uterus meant survival, giving reason to be banished was not high on the list of things to do; and when every uterus mattered, tolerating even the shittiest uterus's attitude mattered. So niceness here was a matter of mutual survival, not an inherent trait to pass on genetically (and damn those double Xs for backing each other up, preventing mutation).

I've been on the receiving end of distrust from both men and women; I actually had to hone a certain level of meanness purely for social survival. I've learned that apologies are meaningless and that niceness is still seen as little more than a facade and will be claimed at you by mean people.

So imagine the conundrum of the actual "nice" person attempting to wade through the dating pool, which is filled with nicely smiling sharks and crocodiles.

My wife went to an all-girls Catholic high school. She says that girls are mean and nasty and cruel—and all smiles. They're cagey, shifty, and devious; and in order to survive, you had to form cliques, usually of girls you hated anyway, just to avoid being hated yourself. Catholic … girls … no boys.

So when women express their vicious distrust of the "nice guy," I think they're actually being honest. I don't think they understand the difference between an asshole wearing a “nice” mask and genuine niceness. I remember reading somewhere that we are the descendants of 80% of women in history but only 40% of men in history. If men develop mutations to pass on, and women get to choose which mutations survive the test of time, then it’s obvious that niceness isn’t a desirable trait but rather a necessary evil to be tolerated (and/or used and abused) lest one be cast to the wilderness of the real wolves.

I don’t think it’s fair for “nice” people to constantly have to “prove” their niceness; that’s a morally bankrupt notion from an entitled high ground. I think it’s best to just start banishing bad behavior from your environment. The hardest part about recognizing crappy attitudes in women is that they usually come with a dazzlingly nice smile. And nice guys are—well, like most guys—they’re just plain stupid; and banishing bitchy-behaving, aesthetically appealing, sweet-smelling mating material isn’t high on their list of things to do.

It took me years to decipher poisoned people for what they were. And the prettier the package, the harder it was to recognize the poison. I can’t explain poison; I can only point out an example and hope you don’t try to stick your dick in it.

Niceness isn’t a desirable trait; it’s an inspirational ideal or a distrusted mask of appeal. And that’s sad because women bend society; men just maintain what works. If cruelty with a veneer of kindness is what gets laid, stay away from women who are fucking assholes … who are fucking assholes. You can’t save sacred sanctimonious sluts sacrificing sultry sins so sexual sophistry succeeds. Just … stay away from them.

Anyhow, on a lighter note. I’ll leave you with an AMV I found and have enjoyed for few years now.

Biggest private media owners in Sweden protect feminists who bullied a man to death

William Andersson · 7 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

From the Bonniers' LinkedIn page

At the libertarian net magazine Free times, you could on August 24 read about how the Bonnier family, concerned about the growing hate on the Internet, started a campaign against net bullying in their magazine for young women, VeckoRevyn. The Bonniers also demanded that the state create new, stringent laws against what they called net-hate and a new special department called the "Internet Ombudsman."

They even created a stylish and lavish commercial for just this purpose.

And sure, it is a praiseworthy goal. Most of us view bullying and the spread of hatred as a cancer on the Internet—and just like cancer, it can be deadly. The family of the late Lucas Hertzman has experienced this first-hand. Hertzman committed suicide because the online hatred toward him from the feminist party's youth organization, Young Feminists, had become too much for this fragile person to handle—a case that AVfM Sweden has already written several articles about.

The mainstream media, however, has never mentioned this particular case of net bullying. Newspapers that otherwise love to revel in these types of stories, at least when they affect women, have not printed a single line of text on the fate of Lucas Hertzman. They have not even held him up as an example of how badly hate of this kind can hurt someone. Major Swedish newspapers such as Dagens Nyheter, Expressen, GT, the Evening Post, and Sydsvenskan have all remained dead silent—an inaction that many in the social media have found very strange. On Flashback, media people behind the scenes promised that articles would be published, but they never appeared. Nor did any TV news channels, such as TV4 or SVT, take up the story about a young transsexual man who had been bullied to death by the youth league of a political party that now represents Sweden in the European Parliament.

The explanation, however, is probably easier than one might think.

All the newspapers and TV channels listed above (except SVT) are owned by the Bonnier Group—that same Bonnier Group that cares so much about victims of net bullying that they now lobby for stringent laws against what they call net-hate. Especially the kind directed at women online. And if you look at the list of the biggest economic contributors to the feminist party, you will not find Benny Andersson of ABBA at the top. Kristina Gustafsson Bonnier donated twice as much, only to be beaten by a measly 50,000 SEK from one Stefan Bengtsson.

So why is Kristina Gustafsson Bonnier the second largest contributor to the feminist party? The explanation probably lies in that her and Åke Bonnier's common daughter, Anna Rantala Bonnier, is one of the top names in the party. She is currently the seventh name on the party's election list for Stockholm.

[image]
Anna Rantala Bonnier
In 2002, at the age of 18, Anna Rantala Bonnier was already ranked as Sweden's third-richest teenager. In 2006, she became a member of the Feminist Initiative. However, it was not until last year that she became an active member.

Since then, it appears as if the party suddenly got a much larger media space. In less than a year, they grew from a 0.2% party to one that crossed the 4% barrier to the European Parliament—a feat that very few could achieve.

Many have attributed this huge success to party leader Gudrun Schyman, who you would likely consider to be a skilled politician because she basically took a dead party to the European Parliament in less than a year. But that skillful she is not. No one is.

A more likely theory is that the party has Anna Rantala Bonnier and her rich and influential father and mother to thank for this express ticket into the power parlor. Likewise, Lucas Hertzman's family has the right to know the reason for their son's death and to address those responsible for it. Powerful patrons are always good to have if you want to bully someone to death without the risk of having to pay the consequences.

I will conclude with a quote from the blog "The undisturbed mind," from which much of this information has been taken:

> The Bonnier clan seem to treat FI as a father who buys a horse for her daughter. If the horse gets injured the daughter will be sad, so you have to protect the horse, even though it might be totally retarded, and should really be put down. It's the daughter's hobby. And of course she will get to play policymaker with Sweden and its taxpayers.

Sometimes, it’s easier in writing

AVfM Video Source · 7 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sometimes, it’s easier to tell the world what happened to us through writing.

http://youtu.be/84WjMyuAGgg

More info on Liberal America.

U.S. Open gilds the lily of anti-male discrimination

Robert Franklin · 8 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's that time of year again: the U.S. Open Tennis Championship is in full swing in New York. Tennis luminaries both past and present have assembled, and ESPN is on the story almost 24 hours a day. Want to know what Maria Sharapova ate for breakfast two days ago? Someone can probably tell you. Indeed, they probably already have, possibly with instant replay. Tennis is a fine sport, but in the end, there's just so much you can say about so-and-so's backhand or whether someone else's big toe has a cramp. Of course, dead air is the bane of broadcast journalism, so the words keep coming, whether we want them or not.

With all that, you'd think they'd cover everything that could possibly be of interest. In fact, you'd think they do so two or three times. So that can only mean that little items like the frank anti-male bias of the sport aren't of interest. Otherwise, surely it would garner at least a mention. And in fact it did this year, about which I'll say more later.

Since as long as I can remember, male tennis players have played the best three out of five sets to determine a winner while the ladies play only two out of three. No one, including me, thought much about that until several years ago when female players lobbied for equal pay and got it. Ever since then, at least at the four majors (the U.S., French, and Australian Opens and Wimbledon), male and female players have received equal prize money.

Equal pay for equal work? Nope, not at the tennis majors. (Some other tournaments allow men to play only two out of three.) Now, of course, if a male player wins in straight sets, he's only played three and therefore may not play any more games than a woman who's been taken to three sets by her opponent. But a count of games played by the men and women at the U.S. Open this year reveals that, in the first round, men played an average of 33 games per match while the women played an average of 21 games. In the second round, it was 31 and 23 respectively. And in the third it was 34 and 20. In short, the men play over 50% more games on average than do the women but only get paid the same.

Years ago, one male player complained about the setup but was ignored by some and excoriated by others for his shockingly unchivalrous kvetching.

And, by the standards of most people, the pay's not bad. Did you lose in the first round? In fact, maybe you didn't win a single game. You still get paid about $30,000. Plus, if some manufacturer of sports gear or apparel gave you a little logo or something to wear on your shirt, that's an extra $5,000. Not bad at all. If you're good enough to win the championship, you'll get about $3 million for your two weeks of working every other day.

But this year the U.S. Open has added another little fillip to its anti-male bias, just in case we missed it the first time. The last several days have been particularly hot in New York and, worse, the humidity's been high. On Tuesday, players went out on the hard courts in 92°F weather with 60% humidity. Athletes who are in extremely good physical condition were obviously suffering by the third set.

But not to worry. The Open has an Extreme Heat Rule (EHR) whereby the chair umpire can simply call a halt to play if he/she thinks the players are in too much difficulty. Plus, the EHR allows players to request a 10-minute break in play that must be granted.

Except. The EHR is only available to female players. The men don't benefit from it, and the chair umpire is forbidden to stop play on their behalf. That's right, the players who play the most and who therefore are most likely to need relief from the heat don't get the benefit of the EHR. Those who play less do. Make sense?

Early in the tournament, I heard two male commentators who were covering one of the matches refer to the Extreme Heat Rule. Their conversation went something like this:

Commentator 1: The Extreme Heat Rule may come into play this year.

Commentator 2: (Explained the rule.)

Commentator 1: But only the women benefit from it.

Commentator 2: That's true, the men don't.

Commentator 1: The ones who play the most don't get to use the rule.

… Dead Silence …

And that was that. To my knowledge, there's not been a single other mention of the rather astonishing discrimination against male players by the EHR.

Remember those game differentials I mentioned earlier? They would actually be greater except that a remarkable nine men simply stopped play in mid-match, unable to continue, or didn't play at all. Only two women did that. Had those men played complete matches, the difference between the number of games played by men as opposed to women would have been even greater.

Did the lack of an Extreme Heat Rule for the men play a part in there being so many retirements and "walkovers" by the men? Who knows, but it's certainly a possibility. One look at 20th-seed Gael Monfils bent over, leaning on his racket, gasping for breath between points gives us an idea of what they're going through.

And let's remember that tennis, like most sports, is physical activity. To pursue it as a career and to earn a living, a player must be in excellent condition and be physically sound. Over a many years, playing the best three out of five sets takes who knows how much off of a player's career. Fatigue of course tends to beget injuries, and injuries can wreak havoc on a player's career. An EHR that applied to men as well as women could easily reduce those injuries.

So the sport of tennis and the U.S. Open in particular have adopted policies that not only discriminate against male players in the pay they receive but also jeopardize the very thing they most need—physical well-being. And of course many of those men are the greatest draws in the sport. Djokovic, Federer, Nadal, and others are the face of tennis in the way only Serena Williams can claim to be on the women's side. Is absence from the sport or early retirement due to injury really what tennis wants for those guys?

It's a strange way to run a railroad. But what's even stranger is the lengths to which people will go to privilege women and penalize men. In this case, tennis is doing so at the risk of its own self-interest. Strange indeed.

Don’t nigggerise me! A perspective on misandry

Archi Desai · 8 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial Note: The misspelling in the title is deliberate. In this emotive and perhaps controversial article, Archi draws on his experiences of growing up in 1960s Britain to propose a variation of a very powerful word in order to combat 21st-century prejudice.—DE

I was born in Kampala, the capital of Uganda. I was three months old when my parents emigrated to London. It was May 1961—shortly before Independence. I was brought up in the culture of the Indian diaspora and wasn’t really aware of any other culture until I started primary school at the age of five.

Primary school was very strenuous because I didn’t speak much English, and I remember the complete and utter isolation quite vividly. I don’t remember my progress in the command of English, but what I do remember was the hostility of the place and how other kids were not nice. Beyond the few English words I’d learned from home, the first words I would know would include sambo, *nig no*g, and golliwog. I didn’t realise they were insults at first, and simply thought those were names they had for me. I don’t remember the word pakki being so frequently used back then, although I would hear it a lot as I got older. (The word pakki was a derogatory term used in the UK to describe South Asian people and is equivalent to nigger.)

I remember when the penny dropped, however …

One of the kids showed me a picture. I’m not sure what kind of ape or monkey it was, but it was a primate. Then he did the actions and sound effects, and everyone in the class pointed and laughed while saying, “Jungle bunny! Jungle bunny!” I think that was when I first realised that I was somehow less than human.

There was a lot of taunting, particularly in the playground. If it happened in class and the taunts became too disruptive, the teachers might say, “Enough! Everybody sit down now.” But I think they only did it for the sake of discipline; I don’t think it registered with any of them that what was happening was particularly wrong.

The term pakki bashing came into my awareness in the later years at primary school. Typically, I would be walking to shop on the corner or something, and I’d be set upon by strangers in the street—it was never by anybody I actually knew. I would say that during my time at primary school, it happened about half a dozen times where I was severely duffed up by two or more White kids. When you’re on your own, you can’t actually do anything about it. I think the worst psychological harm occurs when you’re on your own and you can’t fight back. The odd thing was that my mother did not relate to this in what I would consider to be an intelligent way. I would come home with bruises, cuts, blood on my top from my bleeding nose, and she’d talk to me as if it was my own fault.

I actually knew from early on that my mother had no real interest in me at all. To her, I was just an investment. That might be a shocking thing to say, and most people wouldn’t dare to identify with it because it’s so against the cultural norm. However, I have little doubt now that my mother had a personality, a character, that fits in absolutely with my understanding of narcissistic personality disorder. She always behaved as though she was an empress, and wanted more than anything else to be a matriarchal figure over an extended family. In reality, she drove people away—and utterly destroyed my father.

I don’t think that my mother ever saw my dad as a person; he was only ever a provider and a “handy man” to her and she would often scream at him to “do this” or “fix that.” She used him as a lever to assert her matriarchal dominance over the extended family, and even though I was too young to understand, I sensed that there was something wrong on an emotional level.

I know that my father didn’t get much support from his side of the family, even though it would have been blatantly obvious to everyone how much my mother tormented him. Eventually he left my mother, and he was seen within my family as the one who broke the marriage rather than my mother, who always portrayed herself as having been wronged.

At the time, I was told that he had gone off with another woman, and I was to believe that for another 20 years or so, although it was never true. He had actually left penniless, a broken wreck, and went into a mental institution with manic depression. Although he recovered somewhat, he never got off the pills. Later, he married a White woman and her colour was seen within my family as a particular affront to my mother.

Looking back, and considering my own experiences of my mother in adulthood, I can now see how she must have made my father's life a living hell. As a child, however, I was brainwashed into hating him without realising it. For example, my mother would relay her fantasies to me about how I would take revenge against my father on her behalf when I was older, including one scenario where I was to slap him across the face in front of an imaginary audience. If you ever try to tell anybody this kind of thing, they think you're an immoral misfit because you just don't say things like this about your mother. I carried on hating my father into my forties. To my great shame, my heart was so closed that I may never have known my father or ever got to see what kind of man he really was.

The secondary school I attended took kids predominantly from the immigrants coming into London at that time. It was widely considered to be a "dumping ground" as it was assumed that Black students would be low achievers, but I liked it because it looked modern. I found myself mixing with kids who were predominantly non-White and, for the first time, I started to enjoy school.

I went to school with a Black guy called John who lived on the next street. Around the corner lived a kid called Ayo, but for several years I called him Michael because that's what he told us his name was. He spoke with an upper-class accent, although his mum and dad didn't speak like that. We figured it out eventually—he was ashamed of his Nigerian name and his background. My depth of friendship with these two was more than many other friends that I've had, and I think it was because we all felt excluded. It certainly felt much safer when you were with two or three others who had the same problem rather than walking the streets alone.

And the fear was real …

John and Ayo would usually go straight home on the bus after school—that's how African kids behaved. Caribbean kids, however, wanted to go out in the evening, even if it was just to walk about aimlessly and congregate. And that's what made them vulnerable. If you were out at night, the SPG would get you.

The SPG, or Special Patrol Groups, were the police. They drove around in distinctive blue transit vans, and under the "SUS law" in force at that time, if they thought you looked like a suspicious person, you could be arrested and charged on those grounds alone. Most SPG were hard-line racists and their language made that obvious. Sometimes you'd hear them use the word nigger, and sometimes you'd hear sambo or nig nog. In the UK, I think sambo was just as common as nigger back then. I knew when they were talking to me because they'd call me pakki.

In one instance, we were outside Streatham Hill station when someone gave the warning, "Dem Babylon come!"—that was the vernacular for the SPG. The street was quite busy, and it stays in my mind that there was so much pedestrian traffic when the van pulled up and the policeman leaned out of the window as he shouted, "Get in the van, niggers!" The back doors of the van flew open and a number of police got out. I shouted at them but was warned, "Shut the fuck up, pakki, or you're going in the van too!" They never took me in the van; they seemed to have this rule—only Blacks.

Pedestrians crossed the road and pretended they couldn't see. Not one of them said anything to the police and the White people just kept walking by. Nobody wanted to see what was happening.

Blood doesn't show very well on black skin; you can see it more on the clothing, though.

Eventually, two White guys pulled me away. They held me up against the wall and told me to think myself lucky, but I didn't and resented them for telling me that. Eventually, the SPG got all my friends in the van, the doors closed, and the van drove off. I've always felt a sense of guilt over not being taken in the van also.

Things have changed a lot since those years, and today the UK is perhaps the most non-racist country in the world. We've had decades of adjusting to the harm done back then, and in my personal view, it's so overadjusted it's actually harmful in the other direction now.

My college years were when I started to open my eyes to the idea that prejudice is actually commonplace, and the people who I thought were just victims are sometimes its proponents also. In non-Western cultures, prejudice is often so much a normal part of everyday life, it is invisible. For example, as a teenager, it came out in my own community that I was hanging out with girls after school. It was assumed that these were White girls. I let that go because I was only concerned with keeping the greater truth secret—that these girls were Black. The idea that an Indian would go with a Black girl was simply unimaginable to my family, and the shame and dishonour would have been endless. It would have been such a "lowering" for them. Back then, however, I was only able to see racism as a monopoly of White people.

I also saw my father only as an object of hatred. I maintained this view of him throughout most of his life. In adulthood, what was before my eyes, but what I refused to see, was a perfect marriage between him and his Irish wife. My dad always referred to her as "dear" or by her nickname, "Diddly," in the most warm and loving way. And she was always warm and loving back to him. I was so bigoted and closed to him that I only saw what I wanted to see—that he was nothing more than a bastard. It was never true, and it was only toward the end of his life that my eyes were opened to how he had been bullied by my mother to the point where he had experienced a living hell. If we were living in a more enlightened society, we would say that this is unacceptable. But in our contemporary society, it seems to me that we celebrate it.

Whenever a man comes into conflict with a woman, especially a mother, people become slaves to their instincts. This is the basis for women, such as my mother, to manipulate feelings. Yet nobody really wants to acknowledge this because we don't like to think that we are governed by our instincts rather than our intellect. Instead, our intellect is used to rationalise our instincts, not to question them.

The theme of To Kill a Mocking Bird is one of racial prejudice and injustice in the Deep South during the early 20th century. It is a book that has been studied in classrooms for decades. Today, we in the West like to believe that we are more enlightened, but we are not. We may have identified racism as wrong, but we are as blind to the wider issue of prejudice as ever.

In an article entitled "The Real Love that Dare Not Speak its Name," Bob Geldof recounts his experience of the family courts in the UK:

> As I entered court on my first day someone leant over who felt they were doing me a favour. "Whatever you do," he said, "for Chrissakes never say you love your children." Bewildered, I asked, "Why not?" The answer was as shocking as it is illustrative. "The court thinks you're being unhealthily extreme if, being a man, you express your love for a child."
>
> For two years I shut up while I heard the presumptions in favour of a mother's love.
>
> Finally I began articulating the real love that dare not speak its name—that of a father for his child.
>
> No law should stand that serves to stifle this.

The good advice he was given simply reflects reality—that in the family courts, anything that is perceived to compromise the mother will go down badly. The whole process of the family courts rest upon the view that fathers are unworthy, and that their love is unworthy and doesn't count because they do not have the same human worth as women. If you try to say that you love your children, it will go down just as badly as a Black man in an Alabama court a hundred years ago who was to say, "I am a human being." Such a simple statement will not be tolerated because it exposes the error and prejudice of those within the court system.

I have seen the mockery of due process whenever the interests of a man come into conflict with those of a woman. I have seen first-hand how evidence is dismissed and laws are set aside. Family courts take action based solely on the testimony of a mother, and even when that testimony is later proven to be false, the action is carried out regardless.

Social workers, who were busy taking notes during the mother's testimony, put down their pens when it's the man's turn to speak. This is the kind of thing that happened in the Deep South a hundred years ago, and now, like then, it isn't seen as wrong.

A British barrister told me recently that, in his experience, in 85% of cases where a man is prosecuted for domestic violence, it is actually the female who is the primary abuser. But because this is not seen as wrong, the injustice remains invisible.

The word nigger is one of the most powerful words I know, and possibly one of the most dehumanising and crushing words the English language has ever come up with. When I was young, I thought it was just about colour. In reality, the worst forms of prejudice occur when they are invisible, and I've seen enough non-Black people being niggerised to understand that it is also a very good word to describe someone who is less than human.

Men are not only niggers within our legal systems, but within feminist-dominated education and media, young impressionable males are given a clear message: "All you boys, you're all potentially violent and wicked, and you're all potential rapists. All the good things in the world are about females, and all the bad things are down to you." As an Indian who grew up in the Britain of the 1960s, I am poignantly aware of the lasting harm that this kind of thing inflicts.

Steve Beko, an anti-apartheid activist, once said, "The most potent weapon in the hands of the oppressor is the mind of the oppressed." It is as true today as it was then. I believe most people live in a cocktail of delusion for their own comfort so that they don't have to face reality in full.

I don't know what it will take for men to see their chains, but I know when my humanity is being denied. I may be damned for my attitude, but I am under no illusion that I am a nigger, and today it has nothing to do with my colour. I also know that it is up to me whether I simply accept my loss of humanity or not. I don't accept it.

No one should accept it.

There is no word in the English language that comes close to nigger. It needs to be used to self-identify with what we are not willing to accept so that we may begin to cast off our chains. What I would like to propose is a variation of this word for use by all males in connection with misandry—NIGGGER—where the additional middle G represents gender.

All men need to feel able to say, "Don't nigggerise me!" as a means of retort against misandric bigotry. This is not about colour, but it is about prejudice just the same.

There is no reason not to resist when we have already lost so much by not resisting. The word niggger needs to be promoted and accepted by men in the 21st century as a description of our own human worth, or rather the lack of it.

1,400 girls raped in Rotherham, England–and big league feminists don't care?

Ciaran O'Connor · 9 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Recently, news broke of widespread child sexual exploitation in the northern English town of Rotherham. An independent inquiry into the abuse, led by Professor Alexis Jay, found that over 1,400 children, mostly White girls, had been repeatedly victimized. Professor Jay wrote: "It is hard to describe the appalling nature of the abuse that child victims suffered…. They were raped by multiple perpetrators, trafficked to other towns and cities in the north of England, abducted, beaten, and intimidated." The abuse had been going on for 16 years, and while it was widely known to the police, child welfare officials, and council leaders, they all chose to look the other way. To date, only five men have been convicted for these crimes. Disturbingly, this appears to be just the tip of the iceberg. Reports claim that similar gangs operate in many other towns and cities in England, in many other European countries, and even in Australia.

You might expect this would be a feminist field day. After all, rape is their favorite and most important issue, the original sin of the male sex, and the primary source of their victim power. So, tipped off by an article by Ian Tuttle in the National Review, I took a look to see what they had to say. And what I found was … nothing. Complete and total silence.

As of this writing, Google can find no mention of Rotherham (except for one or two discussion comments) at any of the feminist websites I examined: Feministing, Feministe, Bitch Magazine, Ms. Magazine, Bust, Crunk Feminist Collective, Jezebel, Broadsheet, and The XX Factor. Feminist-friendly news sites including MSNBC, Daily Kos, Think Progress, and Truthout were also completely silent on this topic.

Let's take Feministing as an example. Demonstrating the feminist obsession with rape, there are currently five links to articles discussing rape or sexual assault on the front page of this well-known feminist blog: "The Police Violence We Aren't Talking About," "17 Beliefs About Sexual Assault That Are Totally Wrong," "UNC-Chapel Hill revamps sexual assault policy," "California legislature passes 'yes means yes' bill," and "Why the anti-rape nail polish doesn't work in a nutshell." But no word about 1,400 girls groomed, gang-raped, prostituted, and beaten, repeatedly and over many years. Absolute silence.

What's going on here? Why isn't there a feminist feeding frenzy over a topic with so many lurid details, so many juicy examples of society's violence and indifference to women?

There are two facts that explain their silence. The perpetrators were Pakistani Muslims. And the victims were White.

The Social Justice Warrior Chickens Come Home to Roost

It is easy to understand why officials were reluctant to confront these crimes—they were acting in a political environment in which being accused of being a "racist" or "Islamophobe" could mean the end of one's career. The zealous and ruthless punishment of these thought crimes by the New Totalitarians of the left has created a paralyzing fear throughout the bureaucracies responsible for guarding the well-being of the citizenry. This cult of multiculturalism and its enforcement has been promoted vigorously by the political elite of the left in order to disadvantage their foes on the right. Writing in The PJ Tattler, Mike McNally declares Rotherham: A Quintessentially Liberal Scandal:

> The "grooming" scandals are a direct and inevitable consequence of the left's failed experiment with multiculturalism and mass immigration, and its obsession with political correctness and "diversity." I make no apologies for trotting out this quote again, but a former advisor to Tony Blair, whose New Labour government imposed multiculturalism and political correctness on Britain with religious zeal starting in 1997, has admitted that Labour championed mass immigration, including from Pakistan, in order to "rub the Right's nose in > diversity."

The nearly universal excuse given by the Rotherham officials who were interviewed was that they were afraid. Afraid not of the gang members themselves, but of the power that their race and religion bestowed upon them in a culture that holds racism to be an unpardonable offense. Even high-level government officials were browbeat into compliance through the fear of being denounced as racist.

Home Office Minister Barbara Roche, who pioneered the open-door policy, wanted to restore her Labour reputation after being attacked by Left-wingers for condemning begging by immigrants as "vile."

The power of this fear is astonishing. Even in America, an ocean and many time zones away, feminists and other Social Justice Warriors dare not discuss the Rotherham rapes because to do so is to invite the punishments of ostracization and defamation, possibly resulting in the complete destruction of their social standing.

State-Sponsored Multiculturalism as a Moral Autoimmune Disorder

A month or so ago I introduced the concept of Moral Autoimmune Disorders (MAIDs), a social strategy employed by free riders to turn cooperators' altruistic punishment defense against themselves. In short, the free riders fool the cooperators into identifying their own group or even themselves as free riders, inducing them to direct their punishments upon themselves rather than the free riders. This gives the free riders free reign to exploit the assets and resources of the cooperators.

The Rotherham rape case provides a vivid example of just how effectively a MAIDs attack can be in suppressing a population's instincts to self-defense. When the political leaders on the left created the cult of multiculturalism to secure their own political advantage, and implemented both the carrot of "diversity" and the stick of "racism" to enforce it, they cast the native population of England as the moral transgressors and fooled the English into seeing themselves as the free riders. So strong is the instinct to punish free riders in the English population that they not only refused to protect themselves but also punished anyone who attempted to do so.

Just consider the protective instincts that had to be suppressed to allow this catastrophe to happen: the protective instinct all humans feel for children; the protective instinct men feel for women; the defensive instinct that groups feel against outsiders; the possessive instinct that men feel for the women of their group against outsider men. These powerful instincts have played an essential role as long as man has walked the earth in protecting each society's self-interest against those who would harm them. And yet, here they are in Rotherham, rendered completely ineffective by this coordinated multicultural MAIDs attack.

And no case of this capitulation to multicultural MAIDs is more astonishing than the feminists', as they have yet another powerful instinct to overcome—the natural fear and revulsion women have to rape amplified and intensified by years of feminist rape indoctrination. Despite all their cultivated outrage and their patriarchy-smashing aggression, these feminists have been rendered deaf, dumb, and blind by gangs of Pakistani rapists and the feminist elites who enabled them. These feminists don't care about the Rotherham rapes because they are too scared—scared to lose their social standing among their New Totalitarian peers.

The moral of this story is clear—those who do not protect and pursue their own interests because of ideology or deception are exploited by those who do.

P.S. In the comments, please refrain from unsupported blanket condemnations of any group, be it defined by ethnicity, religion, or sex, to include Pakistanis and Muslims.

Anita Sarkeesian–and Wikipedia–busted again

Dean Esmay · 9 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Despite brazenly disingenuous claims from mainstream media "reporters" (such as The Washington Post's Caitlin Dewey), Wikipedia is overrun by bullying gender ideologues. We already knew this, but here we see it again as the inherently corrupt Wikipedia Feminist Task Force (and its supporters) are shown to be pretty obviously covering for serial liar and con artist Anita Sarkeesian.

As others have noted, the current #GamerGate war has its roots in the mainstream's complete refusal to allow any reasoned skepticism and criticism of Sarkeesian and its tendency to ignore or marginalize every corrupt move she made. The Lace Curtain protected her, just as it protects Zoe Quinn and her friends now, no matter what vile crap she does.

No, he's not an MRA (nor is he required to be), but you should subscribe to Thunderf00t anyway.

We got an e-mail from a Black American left-wing feminist

William Andersson · 9 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I think the following e-mail says so much about the situation in Sweden and partly also in the rest of Scandinavia. So I translated it and, with the author's approval, published it on the Swedish AVfM site. But I feel I need to share it with you in America too. So here it is in its original form.

> I live in Frederikshavn, so I'm experiencing firsthand the Scandinavian version of feminism.
>
> Just when I thought I couldn't be anymore shocked about how insane Sweden/Scandinavia is and has gotten, I just saw "The Gender War" last week, and …
>
> I should mention I'm a left-winger and a feminist. But I'm also black, so I already know all too well how insane the white (American) woman's version of feminism is. But I never would have imagined Scandinavia being like this if I had stayed at home in the USA.
>
> I had to marry a Dane, move to Denmark, and help raise a teenage boy for me to really see the true face of this version of feminism, and I'm beyond shocked. It explains why my husband lost custody of his two daughters to a woman who is a borderline psychotic – a woman who can barely take care of herself, let alone two girls.
>
> It explains why all the women in politics and civil services here act the way they do. It explains why a lot of the world sees Scandinavian men as "passive" and "soft". Most of the world missed this (probably deliberately), but it also explains why Anders Behring Breivik's rage in 2011 was far, far more anti-feminist than Islamophobic (though the two issues are actually interconnected).
>
> Unfortunately, it also explained why I had to end a 10-year pen friendship with a Swedish woman – obviously it was over Julian Assange. She couldn't possibly image why the whole world was denigrating the Swedish court system's treatment of this poor man… And it was worth noting that she herself was a manic depressant who suffered from a panic disorder. She even had the nerve to say to me that I was the one who had mental issues, and not her!!!
>
> And it really kills me that there are Americans back home who think that we should emulate Swedish society!!!!!! NO ONE WHO HAS LIVED OUTSIDE OF SCANDINAVIA CAN POSSIBLY IMAGE WHAT LIFE IS REALLY LIKE HERE. Maybe it's because some of them refuse to see the truth and they'd rather prefer to live in their fantasy utopia world than to accept some harsh realities. I don't know.
>
> So I want to let you know that you definitely have a female ally in speaking out about the lies and exaggerations about Scandinavia, and especially about its women. The misandry really has to stop, and it has to be exposed for the harm it's doing to both feminism as well as even civil rights.

That was the first part of her letter. After I replied, and among other things asked if I could publish it, she sent another one.

> Hi
>
> By all means feel free to publish my letter wherever you want, and feel free to use my real name. I have absolutely nothing to hide.
>
> A hearty congratulations for saving your baby girl. I wish that were the case with my husband Thomas, but you know stories like ours usually don't have a happy ending. I didn't realize how bad it was in Sweden until I started doing some digging. That society's fucking disintegrating, but for some reason the Swedish people "seem" to want this to happen. Or am I wrong?????
>
> I lived in Denmark since 2009, but spent some time in Drammen from late 2011 until early 2012. Those two countries aren't too far behind, either.

> I thought Norway had its “wake-up call” with their twin terror attacks, but the narrative to the outside world just HAD to be about theIslamophobia, and NOT about how the Norwegian court system could deliberately avoid exploring ABB’s [Anders Behring Breivik’s] childhood by having his (now deceased) mother write a letter to the presiding judges. On its face it’s actually pretty fucking amazing something like that could happen regarding a mass murder trial, where all angles SHOULD be covered. But this IS Scandinavia! I am so, so grateful that Thomas was at least able to save Casper from his ex. He’s 20 now, and on his way to a possible career withMærsk. He very well could have ended up with his mother – He even told me straight up that if that were the case, he definitely would have been one of those kids who got in trouble with the police all the time. Thomas still feels a lot of anger and guilt that he lostZenia and Freia in 2001. He tries to hide his feelings, but I can see the pain. My Danish has become sufficient enough so that I could read transcripts of the kind of questions the child social services asked Casper andZenia. I couldn’t believe how dismissive they were of Casper’s testimony – they were convinced that his father was putting words into his mouth since he as a 7-year-old could clearly articulate his feelings. And it was clear that the social officer was asking “soft” questions toZenia, and didn’t even bother to ask her about her mother’s behavior.Thomas hasn’t seen the girls since 2006. It’s so crazy that we know that his ex lives in the same town as we do, but he would have no idea of what his daughters look like now. Both Thomas and Casper occasionally see the ex around town, and when they make eye contact, she hurries away, as if she were trying to hide or run from something. (I’ve even seen her, though I doubt she knows who I am.)But like you, we have to tread carefully. Thomas has seriously thought about going to the press, but we’re going to move to Canada this year. Once we’ve settled in Vancouver we’ll send our story to either an American or Canadian newspaper, and NOT to a Scandinavian one. We’ve seen how public debate about tough issues and controversial topics has been systematically crushed by the mainstream. We also saw what happened to the British author Michael Booth when he (jokingly!!!!!!!) called Sweden “The China of the North” in his recent book.I try to talk about this in the social media like Facebook, but it gets exhausting and I have to end up boycotting it for days, or even weeks.
>
> I plan to keep up the fight and speak up, because if nobody does, the evil will continue. But I don’t want future generations to suffer because people like me didn’t speak out; Sometimes we have to remember that it’s not always just about us.
>
> Sincerely, Taila Krøyer Frederikshavn, Denmark

Misandry Mermaid and Tumblr feminism's crumbling monopoly

Yuval Levental · 9 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Rebloggable propaganda, its slow decline, and the rising Reddit backlash

Tumblr is a well-known online blogging platform, ranked within the top 50 websites in the world. One feature unique to Tumblr is that it allows users to "reblog" posts, meaning users can instantly copy other users' posts on their own blogs and then add their own commentary. This is useful for helping to spread information quickly but is often misused to spread nonsensical social justice propaganda.

One subset of Tumblr is the Tumblr feminist community. With a handful of exceptions, feminist Tumblrs usually present extreme views on gender politics. They portray an overly dualistic world in which all men are evil and hold all the power and all women are innocent and constantly persecuted everywhere all the time.

For the past two years, these blogs virtually held a monopoly on gender issues on the Internet. A good number of these factually incorrect and misandrist posts have had hundreds of thousands of reblogs, and many of these blogs have had tens of thousands of followers. A lot of these posts are either built on strawman assumptions or pasted quotes from random websites. Two major examples, which will be discussed here, are Misandry Mermaid and Stfu Everything (aka Big Red).

Recently, however, traffic stats have shown that interest in these types of blogs has started to decline significantly, as people are becoming more concerned with learning about the other side of "social justice." One major reason for this is reddit's subreddit TumblrinAction, which was created less than two years ago and has gained over 120,000 subscribers. TumblrinAction is a place where reddit users can submit direct links to or screenshots of social justice Tumblrs, which they can then critique and/or make fun of. Additionally, it has a sister sub named TiAdiscussion, which is used to discuss new social justice ideas in great detail.

Misandry Mermaid

Misandry Mermaid is most likely the last prominent Tumblr feminist today. Several of her posts have had hundreds of thousands of reblogs, and nearly every post she makes instantly gets 100 to 1,000 reblogs. Most of her posts belittle men's issues. Scrolling down, on the right side, there is a link titled "The Misandry Masterpost." This post leads to further posts, such as "On Misandry Being Real and Not Being Real."

This particular post states at the beginning that "For misandry to actually be a real belief system with real consequences, it would need to be an institutionalized practice. There would have to be a centuries-old system in place in which men are treated as inferior to women, by women (as well as men with 'internalized misandry'). And there is no human society in which that is true." However, there were many ways that men were treated as inferiors to women. Men worked the most dangerous jobs in society, such as coal miner and construction worker. In one U.S. study, 93% of deaths on the job involved men, with a death rate approximately 11 times higher than women. Yet Tumblr feminists seem never to acknowledge these difficulties without at least making note that they benefit from the work of these men in their everyday lives.

An example of a famous Mermaid post, with almost 40,000 reblogs, states that "The average prison sentence of men who kill their women partners is 2 to 6 years. Women who kill their male partners are sentenced on average to 15 years." The source she gives is not a primary source; the statistic is taken from the webpage of a women's organization committed to fighting domestic violence. According to this site, the primary source was a study done by the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence, back in 1989. This primary source could not be found online.

However, an analysis conducted by the Bureau of Justice Statistics in 1995, using domestic violence cases from 1988, claims that "On average, convicted wives received prison sentences that were about 10 years shorter than what husbands received." Even more important, one should note that their analysis declares that "Wives received shorter prison sentences than husbands (a 10-year difference, on average) even when the comparison is restricted to defendants who were alike in terms of whether or not they were provoked." This analysis is more consistent with what is known about domestic violence sentencing.

Many other Mermaid posts simply rely on strawman arguments and specific situations, such as one that claims women are far more objectified than men, ignoring that men are objectified for their personal successes. Lately, though, her blog traffic as a whole is declining, as people wish to learn more about how men also face sexism.

Stfu Everything (aka Big Red)

Stfu Everything isn't as popular as Misandry Mermaid on Tumblr, but she still has a significant viewership. In real life, she is known as Big Red, famous for arguing with MRAs in Toronto after she helped interrupt a talk hosted by the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE).

The vast majority of posts on her blog are reblogs about all kinds of social justice issues, which include sexism, of course, but also racism, environmentalism, politics, and so forth. However, many of her most famous posts have been linked to via reddit.

Famous posts include Big Red repeatedly stating that she was innocent for not pulling the fire alarm herself and claiming that any woman against feminism is either a man in disguise or suffering from internalized misogyny. She also claimed once that just because women are represented in an area in high numbers doesn't mean that women have actual power. This obviously ignores the reality that Big Red and her comrades successfully interrupted the men's talk in Toronto.

Viewership on her blog is also declining, though to this day, she was never charged with public disturbance from the Toronto incident.

The reddit Backlash: TumblrinAction

TumblrinAction (TiA) is a community created less that two years ago on reddit that is dedicated to criticizing and making fun of Tumblr "activists." Reddit users either submit direct links or screenshots. However, these activists can have posted on almost any other website online. Because this is supposed to be for entertainment and awareness, overly political posts are strongly discouraged. All kinds of social justice issues are heavily debated there—one, of course, being gender dynamics.

TiA currently has over 120,000 subscribers and has anywhere from 1,000 to 2,000 visitors every 15 minutes, according to the sidebar. This is a very strong number for a reddit sub, which means something because reddit as a whole ranks in the top 50 websites in the world. The top post of all time there has over 6,000 upvotes, which is a screenshot of someone getting overly paranoid about fat hate only to realize that the joke was about a kind of beer. As another example, the fourth most popular post is a screenshot of a person claiming that gay men not dating straight women is a form of "discrimination." What TiA symbolizes is that significant amounts of people are breaking free from traditional social justice paradigms.

The most useful idea to come out of TiA is TiADiscussion. This is the sister sub to TiA, in which users can discuss new social justice ideas in great detail instead of just posting links to Tumblr activists. It is much smaller in size but deeper in nature. One of its prominent posts was written by a sexual misconduct prevention professional, who says that "rape culture" is hyperbolic and that saying "teach men not to rape" lowers the self-esteem of most men, who are far from being rapists. For another example, this post attempts to declassify the misunderstandings MRAs face, written by a teenaged boy who was assaulted by a woman. This sub is also a great place to talk about personal experiences that aren't recognized by standard social justice.

In conclusion, in the past few years, and especially the past few months, more people have undergone an inner transformation when they've realized that both men and women have unique gender-based issues. As a result, in an attempt to seek out that information, it seems that reddit is becoming a greater hub for "social justice" conversations and that Tumblr social justice is seeing its last days. This is because reddit is mostly male-dominated, so men's issues are given more prominence. TiA will most likely continue to maintain its current standing and continue its massive growth. This is important because as more people in general will be aware of men's issues, struggling men will get the help that they so desperately need.

The top 5 feminist myths of all time

AVfM Video Source · 9 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Factual Feminist returns debunking more lies from The Sisterhood:

Sometimes we get grief for being nice to Dr. Sommers just because she still insists on calling herself a feminist. But we'll take a feminist who values honest evaluation of the facts and argues like a grown-up over the entitled princesses and bullying, name-calling unreasoners any day of the week.

Slippery Rock University's psychology department a horrible place for male teachers?

Jonathan Taylor · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Is Slippery Rock University's psychology department a horrible place to be a male teacher? This lawsuit says yes.

Although I usually write about students at my site A Voice for Male Students, far be it from me to refrain from covering issues affecting male teachers—especially those brave enough to take a stand against anti-male bias in academia. From Pennsylvania's Trib Total Media, we have this recent story:

> A male assistant psychology professor claims in a federal lawsuit filed Thursday that his colleagues in the otherwise all-female psychology department at Slippery Rock University have harassed him because he has complained about bias against men at the university.

Let it be known that we have officially entered into the era of filing lawsuits en masse against universities that demonstrate anti-male bias, particularly concerning male students falsely accused of sexual assault and railroaded off campus.

At first I was interested in learning what kind of bias is alleged in this new lawsuit. Is it simply a few sexist remarks about men made by a few psychology profs, or something else? The article continues:

> The department repeatedly hired female applicants for short-term positions when male applicants were more qualified, the lawsuit says.

We have all heard of affirmative action ("positive" discrimination), where less qualified applicants of an underrepresented group are hired over more qualified applicants of an overrepresented group. The rationalization for such policies is to ensure equal representation (the "equal outcomes" model of "equality").

But this is something very different. Neibauer is claiming that the department preferred less qualified applicants of an overrepresented group on the basis of sex. How did the department respond? According to Neibauer, retaliation:

> Neibauer's protests led to a meeting where the other professors harassed him and forced him to leave, with one of them saying, "Now you know what it's like to be bullied," the lawsuit says.

Ah, is that the characteristic and all-too-predictable "it's our turn to be sexists now" mentality that we have come to know and love in modern academia? You know, the "you go, girl" attitude where what would be characterized as abuse if done by men is celebrated when done by women? Given how often misandry in academia is rationalized, I would hardly be surprised.

But wait, there's more:

> Christopher Neibauer of Butler says in the lawsuit that he's been given less favorable class assignments and excluded from department meetings because of his complaints.

The exclusion from meetings may be one of the stronger points in his case if it can be proven, and especially if the university cannot prove any misconduct or unprofessionalism (a loaded and often abused word in these academic times) on his part.

That's the Trib Total Media story. Let's go ahead and get past the fact that many feminists will spin this story as a misogynistic man who is getting his comeuppance. But then there are some other relevant bits from another article, this time the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, that might contradict that:

> According to the complaint, Mr. Niebauer protested in 2005 when others in the department refused to hire a woman "because she was pregnant."

I would like to hear her side of the story.

> Later he repeatedly protested the hiring of women who were, in his estimation, less qualified than male applicants. He was then subjected to investigations, deprived of lab space and given less desirable class assignments, according to the complaint. He has been unable to advance to full professor, he alleged.

Everyone who has sat behind a teacher's desk long enough knows that—right or wrong—you have to toe the departmental line, and doing otherwise will most like be fatal to your academic career. This is especially true in the humanities at many universities when it comes to anti-male bias.

So who are these colleagues of his in SRU's psychology department? Since it is only fair, I am tagging their names to this post. That way we can increase the visibility of this case whenever people search for them or their department. We can't really expect Title IX coordinators to maintain an effective paper trail on these people, and prospective students and teachers need to have adequate warning of the alleged activity.

So we'll just call that "leveling the playing field." Their names are:

- Jennifer Sanftner (Department Chair)
- Elizabeth Boerger
- Emily Keener
- Catherine J. Massey
- Ann Romanczyk
- Linda Veronie
- Jennifer Willford

Again, SRU's psychology department is—with the exception of Christopher Neibauer—entirely staffed by women. How common is that?

This is a good time for me to pull out my recently developed graph on the top 10 bachelor's degrees conferred by sex. Note how many psychology degrees are awarded overall, what position the degree field holds in the top 10, and what proportion of psychology degree recipients are women:

Certainly, some of the over-representation of women in psychology may be due to simple career choices. But is there also a bias against males in the psychology community?

Psychotherapist and men's advocate Tom Golden certainly had quite a bit to say on that subject in his article "MNI—Misandry in Psychological Research." Paul Elam, founder of A Voice for Men, has also spoken about anti-male bias as a counselor. Both their accounts are well worth a read.

Let's keep an eye on Christopher Neibauer's case. It will be interesting to see how it plays out.

A version of this article originally appeared on the website A Voice for Male Students.

Did feminists really win the vote for women?

Herbert Purdy · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Feminists today lay claim to the idea of the noble fight of women for the vote by the suffragettes in the early 20th century, but this is a complete canard that has turned into a meme replicating itself in the general consciousness and getting passed on in endless iterations until it becomes received wisdom.

It is not wisdom.

The stark reality is that half the British men who went to the trenches in France in 1914 didn't have a vote either. Yet they went to almost certain death or the maiming of their young, strong bodies in their hundreds of thousands to defend their country (and their women and children).

Indeed, one of the most shameful things about the suffragettes is that they shamed thousands (possibly tens of thousands) of boys into volunteering by shamelessly and cynically pinning white feathers—a powerful signal of cowardice—on any young man who was not in uniform whilst they themselves were able to indulge in the very freedom these young men were being sent to die for.

That's a rare form of equality, isn't it?

It is also a rare form of chutzpah. Even at that time, women were not really disenfranchised. They had had the right to vote in local politics as much as most men, and they were able to take part in civic affairs too. They could even stand for local political office such as mayors. The suffragettes were not the heroines up at the cutting edge of social change as feminists would have us believe today. They were a group of middle-class activists, widely regarded at the time as troublemakers.

At the beginning of the 20th century, women were neither oppressed nor disenfranchised as claimed by the feminists. There was a lot more going on than this really rather historically challenged claim suggests.

The truth is, women got the vote as part of the development of the universal franchise. The Representation of the People Act in 1832 (better known as the "Great Reform Act") instigated the process of reform. Even then, however, only about one in six adult males[1] were given the vote, increasing the proportion of all voters to about 1 in 24,[2] although it did nothing for the interests of working-class people, of both sexes, since voters had to possess property valued annually at £10 in order to qualify, thus excluding six out of seven men from the franchise.[3] The vast majority of men were just as much the victims of this as women.

It is true that the Great Reform Act only enfranchised "male persons," although John Stuart Mill MP, that dedicated social reformer and strong advocate of women, attempted to replace the term "male persons" with just "person" in a second reform bill of 1867 but was defeated by 196 votes to 76[4] in the House of Commons. He was defeated because, in the prevailing social conditions of the time, women's interests were considered to be synonymous with those of their menfolk.

Not only that, but women were elevated by men, society, by the law, and even in the application of the law. Put simply, women were on a pedestal and accorded enormous rights over property as well as being protected legally from civil law in terms of that property, far more than men were. The crusade by the suffragettes took place in the context of women being highly privileged already, and there was little stomach for the fight being stirred up by these extremists.

Married women were insulated from legal liability in a wide range of civil matters. Indeed, they were even protected from the consequences of certain breaches of the criminal law. A woman's husband stood between her and the world, protecting her as men had always done for women under the ancient system of couverture that placed enormous burdens on men: burdens they often could not sustain.

That is just the way things were. Society was seeking the best it could, given the prevailing circumstances, and that meant that women were highly privileged and men were held highly responsible for that privilege. Modern women (and men too, incidentally) find this wholly anachronistic. But that is the way it was.

Another factor in the resistance to Mill's reform was that, by then, feminism was rearing its head on the back of the emerging Marxist/socialist movement. This was known as "The Woman Question" in socialism, and it was feared as a force that could radically change society.

The Great Reform Act was by no means perfect, there was still a long way to go, but it was the first step on the road to a more developed society with equality and universal suffrage—votes for ALL, not just women. It was followed by similar acts in 1867, 1918, and 1928. In 1907, the Qualification of Women (County and Borough Councils) Act was passed that allowed women to be selected for borough and county councils and be elected mayors, and the Representation of the People Act of 1918 extended the parliamentary franchise to all women, as it did to all men.

However, the First Word War had changed everything. As the soldiers returned, millions of them did not have the vote. It had been said, "If they are fit to fight they are fit to vote,"[5] to which the prime minister at the time, Herbert Asquith, responded, "My hon. Friend puts it in a nutshell," and this is the primary reason why the Representation of the People Act of 1918 was passed.

This act widened the franchise enormously and it fairly included women. It increased the overall electorate from about 7.7 million to 21.4 million, and women became 43% of those eligible to vote.[6] To all intents and purposes, they had achieved near parity. However, the age restrictions for voting were different. For men, it was 21 years, and for women, it was 30 years of age, provided some minimal property criteria were met in both cases. I will explain the reason for this in a moment.

Then, in the same year, the Qualification of Women Act 1918 was passed, largely in recognition of women's effort during the war. This provided the right for women to be elected to parliament even if they hadn't reached the age where they could vote. Women were being recognised. They were not being excluded.

But everything had changed. To put it bluntly, there were too few men left in society to allow women the same voting rights as men. Even before the war, in 1911, females outnumbered males in England and Wales by 1.2 million. By 1921, the difference was 1.7 million.[7] A whole generation of men, young men in the flower of their youth, had been wiped out in the trenches of France and Belgium.

To have granted women the vote then would have meant totally unbalancing politics, and society, and that was the main reason why there was resistance to the suffragettes' claims. Discrimination against women had nothing to do with it.

In fact, the suffragettes were a spent force on the fringe of society by then. Most women wanted nothing to do with them. Their outrageous behaviour and civil disorder during a time when Britain was fighting a major war was out of sync with the severity of the times. Indeed, they had to curtail their activities halfway through the war because their stridency and detachment from reality in the context of what was going on was jarring.

When Christabel Pankhurst, and her mother, Emmeline, dissolved their self-styled Women's Social and Political Union in November 1917, Christabel secured the nomination as the coalition's prospective parliamentary candidate for Westminster Abbey Division, but, in the event, no by-election was held until 1921 when the Conservative Party chose their own candidate to represent the coalition. She then left England for America in that year to become an evangelist and prominent member of the Second Adventist movement, writing books on the second coming of Christ. She never married, though she adopted a daughter, Betty, in California, where she died in 1958.

The truth is, the suffragettes were actually a hindrance to the advancement of women's suffrage, not a help.

Nevertheless, the Equal Suffrage/Franchise Act was passed in 1928, finally granting universal suffrage to all citizens. Needless to say, it was passed by men.

The suffragettes did not achieve votes for women: the victory was achieved by men. The fight for women's votes and equality has not and never has been the sole prerogative of women. The suffragettes only rode on the back of a trend toward equalising society as a whole—and all driven by men of conscience who were adapting to changing times and the development of society.

Contrary to modern thinking, there was no historical male hegemony or conspiratorial patriarchy out to disadvantage women in favour of men. In fact, there has been a long and noble succession of men who fought hard for the betterment of society in which the interests of women were inextricably linked.

Almost a million noble, responsible men laid down their lives between 1914 and 1918 to protect their and their women's way of life.

If people spent only half an hour on Google and Wikipedia, with an open, inquiring mind, not one brainwashed by the feminist propaganda that has been going on for far too long, they would see the degree to which feminism is promulgating a distorted version of history about this issue for its own selfish ends.

People need to wake up to their lying, cajoling, cynical, selfish political ideology, that like all extreme ideologies has no compunction about spreading false propaganda. It is an angry creed.

References

1. Moxon S. (2008) The Woman Racket. Imprint Academic. ISBN 1845401506 Ch. 8, p.110
2. 366,000 out of a population of around 8 million
3. UK National Archives
4. British Library
5. Hansard. 14 August 1916. Vol. 85 Paragraphs 1447 – 1449 – Mr W. Thorne
6. www.parliament.uk
7. Whittaker's Almanack

Is dowry law abuse the only issue men face in India?

Virag Dhulia · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On July 2, 2014, a nation went berserk after a landmark judgment was passed by the Supreme Court of India directing police not to arrest without following due procedures in dowry cases, and there were reactions coming in from all sides—positive and negative.

Some over-enthusiastic people even went to the extent of thinking that dowry law had been diluted and men could breathe easy as its misuse would now be curbed.

And thus it made me think, "Is dowry law abuse the only issue men face?"

Also, how does one judgment ensure that men won't be arrested under other false charges? In a society where we have a plethora of anti-male laws, such a hope is far-fetched and wrought with imagination.

I recently came across two such instances wherein men have been arrested under sections 107/151 on a complaint of creating a public nuisance without trial or investigation.

The real issue isn't that of section 498A being merely misused. The real issue is the absence of the concept of men's rights in society. As a result, men have no dignity in this country, and any man can get arrested on a complaint of a woman even without investigation or due compliance with laws and legal procedures and no one would bat an eyelid.

Section 498A is merely an example of one such law that is being widely and conveniently used to jail men at will because of the negative social context created around dowry against men, mainly due to the feminist media spreading lies and misinformation about women's issues.

However, that does not mean that men can be arrested only under section 498A. Because it's not section 498A that's responsible for the arrests of innocent men and the underlying torture and extortion of men therein, but an anti-male social mindset, fueled by misandry (social hatred against men) that validates abuse of men, that is responsible. Owing to which, literally any complaint by a woman against a man can be used as an excuse to arrest the man without following due procedures.

Moreover, there are many other such legal provisions like the Domestic Violence Act, section 125 CrPC, that have covert provisions for arresting men. As we saw above, even petty sections like 107/151 are being used to arrest men, also many times sections 307 and 506B are invoked to get men arrested.

Hence,

1. Section 498A is not the only weapon available to arrest men sans evidence, and
2. Arrest is not the only issue that men face, as we see further.

Men also face emotional abuse, financial abuse, verbal abuse, and social abuse in society. And of all these, financial abuse is the one that's paramount. In fact, all other types of abuse are pivoted around financial abuse.

It's always expected of the man to earn money and spend it on others, which means that he must sweat and earn and then spend the earned money on others. Even advertising and media content are flavored with the message of men spending their money on others being a great thing.

In fact, a man who spends money on himself is tagged as non-caring and selfish. The same argument does not hold for a woman. Most working and earning women spend money only on themselves and once again no one bats an eyelid.

And then men who do not wish to do so or cannot do so are very easily tagged as criminals, and their abuse is socially validated. This is a serious issue from a men's rights perspective, more serious than a one-time arrest since the abuse herein is lifelong.

And it is the very mindset from which the concept of alimony and maintenance arises wherein a man has no relief available. Even though he might have been abused to the core in the marriage, still he would be ordered to pay maintenance to his wife by the courts, as the courts also work under the same social mindset of penalizing the man because he is not willing to spend money on his wife. There is no respect for a man's choice here, and this is an issue from a men's rights perspective.

And interestingly, even the government is hitting men on this front. Since there is a lot of hue and cry about dowry law misuse and innocent men getting arrested, the government seems to be offering some mild dilution of arrest law to men, but at the same time it also proposes to widen the definition of dowry and give the woman a choice as to where she wants to file the case. If that is done, it would actually increase problems for men since more false cases would be registered and men would be made to run to remote locations to fight cases.

Moreover, on the maintenance front, still it is men who need to prove that their wives are working and earning rather than the courts using their authority to find out the information. And if a man is unable to find out the employment of his wife, then even if his wife is working, he will be ordered to pay maintenance to her.

Often women dump men in relationships and then trap them in false rape cases. Men, on the other hand, make their best efforts to reconcile the relationship and are also willing to marry the woman, but because the woman is no longer interested in the man or is interested in another man, she would rather trap this innocent man in a false rape case, and his life would then be hung on the gallows, trying to prove himself innocent of a crime he did not commit.

Other than these cases, there are many other forms of abuse that men undergo silently in daily life. And many times it's their own family of men who abuses them. Men are suppressed emotionally by their own families, and this emotional suppression is rarely ever mentioned. It comes out only when men share their pain with someone who listens to them. However, the natal domestic abuse that men undergo is largely unreported, unrecognized, and, of course, unaddressed.

Until the time that this larger social mindset pitted against men changes for the betterment of men, merely stopping automatic arrests or saying misusers will be punished are all paper tigers and promises in the air. Society must stop hating men and must not abuse them.

Editorial note: this item originally appeared on Fight For Justice. –DE Patriarchy Defense League Alert: Rogue member issuing unauthorized edicts!

AVfM Video Source · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Attention all Patriarchs! This is a Red Alert! Token Division Agent 14-9-775-18, code name Alzael, has gone rogue. Repeat, Alzael has gone rogue, apparently attempting a coup by promoting himself without authorization to Overlord status, and openly revealing seemingly unobjectionable instructions to inferior females, but is blatantly revealing specific document numbers and the existence of secret departments such as B.I.M.B.O. As is well known, the first rule of B.I.M.B.O. is that you never talk about B.I.M.B.O. and you certainly do not reveal the contents of top secret training materials by their identification code or even that such training materials exist.

Below is the proof of his treason to the Penis World Order:

Do not be fooled by his seemingly disarming demeanor. He is clearly engaging in Unauthorized Patriarchal Activities, revealing classified documents, and threatening the stability of all that Men of Good Faith hold dear. He is also obviously armed with a butterknife, likely Model #ZQ13, code-named “NutellaNuke.”

Do not approach under any circumstances. Agent Orange has been dispatched to terminate this threat. However, all Patriarchs are authorized to observe the rogue menace from a safe distance.

It should not have to be said, but no females are authorized to view this material.

Young men and gender issues

Josh O'Brien · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Popular YouTuber Josh O’Brien gives an overview of young men’s engagement with gender issues.

#Gamergate investigation raises even more questions about corruption in gaming media journalism

AVFM · 10 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following information was retrieved from Pastebin. It is the results of investigative work done in the #GamerGate scandal and is presented as is, with no alterations.

This video by Sargon of Akkad, which you may wish to view before or after reading the report, seems to have spurred the below instigation, and may add some clarity as to its significance; the short of it is that ideology-driven academics wishing to push an agenda appear to have been part of a broad attack on the gaming community to suit the agenda of a small minority of largely-unaccountable activists.

More relevant links in the lowbar to the video

.

None of this is an attack on feminists as a whole or any other activists per se, but rather, to shed light on one apparently hidden aspect of this mess.

We at AVFM hopes that spreading this information will be useful in future efforts to clean up the aftermath of #GamerGate. –Eds

1. Work Done By:
2. @codeGrit
3. @Blake_The_Foxx
4. @Synthovine
5. @KainYusanagi
6. @GamerIrrelevant
8. Before going into the details of what was discovered, a few points need to be addressed. The researchers of this information believe that all individuals named below have the right to defend themselves publicly and address any issues raised. It is very likely that some individuals connected to this are not necessarily guilty, but are simply trying to pay the bills and doing as they are told by their employers. We are not looking for people to lose jobs over this. We are simply looking for an explanation. All information contained below is easily viewable by any person who cared to look.
10. SilverString Media was in the limelight over the last few weeks regarding the GamerGate movement over Twitter, within the gaming community, and across the media sphere. SilverString has come out and defended themselves as they have the right to do, but with some hard work and late nights there has been discovered very close links between SilverString, DiGRA, Gamasutra, and numerous other individuals and corporations which exist in academia and the gaming press.
12. By looking at publicly available information across a variety of websites we have found information which indicates a rather intricate network of crooss-connections within the Indie Gaming world and its press. All citations are at the bottom of this document with links to the appropriate pages. In the event that the pages are taken offline, screencaps of those websites and the relevant information have been saved.
14. The biggest player we found in all of this was Gamasutra, but let's start at the top with SilverString Media and work our way down.
16. The first discrepancy is the date of SilverString Media's founding. Their website states that they were founded on January 1, 2013 (or this may just be the foundation of the website), but the LinkedIn page of SilverString notes that the company has existed since 2011 [1] [2]. The key players at SilverString while making these links are Lucas JW Johnson (Founder, CEO, Director of Narrative), Maya Kramer (PR,Programming,Art), Zoya Street (Game Design Historian, Industry Consultant), and a person who is not on their staff page, Andrew Grant

Wilson, whose linked profile shows that he has, in some capacity, worked for or with SilverString Media in the past as a partner (Writer, Narrative Designer, Experimental Game Artist, Architect) [3].

18. While not of terrible importance, it should be noted that Andrew Wilson and Lucas Johnson both attended the University of British Colombia, though no connection has been made beyond that.

20. The next issue to address is a rather notable DiGRA panel from a conference in 2014. The notable names at this panel at DiGRA 2014 are Mia Consalvo, Adrienne Shaw, Zoya Street, and Andrew Grant Wilson [4]. Mia Consalvo has been the President of DiGRA's executive board since 2012 [27a,b].The DiGRA panel addresses the movement of the DiGRA ideology from simply existing within academia to within the industry itself, that industry being video games. Zoya Street and Andrew Grant Wilson were on this panel to offer suggestions on the appropriate way to do this and are directly related to SilverString Media [5]. However, it's important to note these connections and remember these names. Adrienne Shaw will show up again later along with Mia Consalvo.

22. We'll slightly diverge here with a link that seems relatively benign at first glance. This connection will lead to more as we progress.

24. SilverString Media is a backer of the Patreon "Critical Distance", started on March 5, 2014 by Kris Ligman, the News editor at Gamasutra.com. Notable backers of Critical Distance's Patreon [6] are:

25. – SilverString Media – since June 13, 2014

26. -Jenn Frank – of Guardian fame

27. -Akira Thompson – Indiecade Gamemaker Relations

28. -Vlambeer – of which one member is Rami Ismail, a writer whose work has been republished on Polygon from his blog

29. -Ben Kuchera – writer at Polygon

30. -Brenden Keogh – writer at Polygon, Gamasutra, Ars Techina and Critical Damage (blog for Critical Distance)

32. Now we're going to take a look at the list of important names found who back Mattie Brice's Patreon campaign for "Death to Video Games" [7]:

33. -Maya Kramer – SilverString Media PR

34. -Jenn Frank – Of the Guardian

35. -Akira Thompson – Indiecade Gamemaker Relations

36. -Anthony Burch – Borderlands Writer

37. -Anna Anthropy – Indie Game Developer who has lived with Patricia Hernandez (writer at Kotaku) in the past

38. -Ben Kuchera – writer at Polygon

39. -Brendan Keogh — writer at Polygon, Gamasutra, Ars Techina and ritical Damage

40. -Phillip Kollar – Reviews editor at Polygon

42. Alright, now that we've got those names and connections out of the way, we get to get to the interesting bits and begin connecting the dots. The information already listed shows an intricate web of fund raising between staff at various gaming media sites across the web.

44. The next piece of evidence is Kris Ligman's (News editor and blogger at Gamasutra) Google+ page where upon we found a chat log dating back to December 2011 [8].

46. Kris Ligman

47. Shared publicly – Dec 9, 2011

49. We're here! We're queer! We play games!

51. So yeah. Over on The Twitters we (as in yours truly, +Ian Miles Cheong, +Brendan Keogh, +Rowan Kaiser, +Mattie Brice and +Annie Dennisdóttir Wright) started discussing our various attempts to undermine the heteronormative hegemony. And now we continue it where we don't have wordcaps.

53. The people mentioned who initially participated in the conversation are:
54. -Ian Miles Cheong – ex-moderator at Reddit outed for promoting his own websites and various others
55. -Mattie Brice – who has her own Patreon "Death to Video Games"
56. -Brendan Keogh
57. -Rowan Kaiser
58. -Annie Dennisdóttir Wright
60. Later participants in the chat are:
61. -Patricia Hernandez
62. -Ben Abraham
63. -Karl Parakenings
64. -Craig Bamford
65. -Nick Lalone
66. -William Huber
67. -Tiffany Nevin
69. The entirety of the conversation can be found at the attached file [9]. When comparing the leading message posted by Kris Ligman and the "Intent and Ideology" page (written on September 1, 2014 by Lucas JW Johnson in response to the accustions), which is linked to from the SilverString Media homepage [26], it appears clear that the individuals in the Google+ log and SilverString Media have the same motives for making a presence in the Indie Gaming world.
71. We attempted to look further back to the origination of the conversation on Twitter, but Kris Ligman's Twitter page has all information blocked to non-confirmed followers [10].
73. Another interesting connection to make is that Kris Ligman, the creator of Critical Distance's Patreon, has spoken at Critical Proximity [11], which is an informal conference put together by Zoya Street, who works at SilverString Media. Mattie Brice (Moderator, Critical Distance Confab) also works with Critical Distance. Remember that SilverString media financially supports Critical Distance through Patreon since June 13, 2014.
75. The important person here outside of Kris Ligman is Zoya Street, who will lead us into our next bit. Zoya Street, as mentioned at the top of this piece spoke at the DiGRA conference on a panel with Adrienne Shaw and Mia Consalvo. As a quick aside, Mattie Brice, Adrienne Shaw, and Anna Anthropy have spoken at QGCon 2013, with Mattie Brice leading in with the keynote [12a,b].
77. At the DiGRA panel, many different words were used in approaching what the panel was actually about. It's difficult to put into layman's terms, so here is a single except from the transcript spoken by Adrienne Shaw which explains the main topic of the panel rather clearly:
79. Line 64 of the file:
80. Adrienne: Why do we see such tension between academics and game designers? less of an issue with indies, but there are always some people in industry that have similar questions until industrial logic takes over later and how can we better intervene in industrial logics to disturb that process. How can academics bridge the gap to the industry audience to help them do different work? How can we disrupt the capitalist norms that facilitate this?
82. And to explain the difficulties this ideology is having in academia, Line 80 from the same file:
83. Aaron: Peer review and publishing models. The corruption of the peer review system is problematic. The reliance of peer review to get tenure and a job impacts us and slows us down.

85. At this point it seems as though the individuals speaking on this panel are having difficulties with the “corrupted peer review” (as stated by “Aaron”) system used within academia and wish to move into the industry itself.

87. We’re concerned due to the content of the transcript and the evidence pointing to possible collusion within the peer review system that grants given to papers published under this process, though not this paper specifically as it is merely being used as an example to show that their papers are recieving grants for funding, might be improperly used, and perhaps should be looked into. Here is an article written for DiGRA by Emma Westecott which explicitly states that the project was funded by a research grant [28a,b].

89. So let’s look at how academia’s peer review system functions:

91. First Person Scholar is a peer-review site which offers timely constructive feedback on the articles they publish. On their site is a page where a Board of Discussants is listed [13a,b]. The notable names on that list are Mia Consalvo, Adrienne Shaw, and Gerald Voorhees.

93. Gerald Voorhees wrote an article titled Identification or Desire: Taking the Player-Avatar Relationship to the Next Level [14a]. The contents of this article are not important, however at the bottom of this article, Adrienne Shaw is listed as a Discussant [14b]. Below the Discussant comments, a series of articles cited are listed. Amongst these articles are writings by Mia Consalvo, Adrienne Shaw, and the author of the article, Gerald Voorhees [14c].

95. With this we see that the author and the discussant of the articles noted are citing each other to establish a justification for the publication of the article. With this we can infer that the authors of these papers are probably colluding together to legitimize the content of their published papers within academia as discussed at the DiGRA panel.

97. It’s important to remember that Mia Consalvo spoke on the DiGRA panel alongside Adrienne Shaw and Zoya Street, and Street founded Critical Proximity, an informal discussion panel about games. We already know about Zoya’s link to Silverstring and their support of Critical Distance through Patreon.

99. There are a few more connections to be made that are interesting related to First Person Scholar. First Person Scholar is a program founded by the Games Institute at the University of Waterloo [15]. By navigating to their page we can find that they have also founded the program GIJanes (Games Institute Janes). The interesting link here is that by browsing through their articles, one by writer elisevist in June of 2013, we can see a screencap of a twitter conversation between Lucas JW Johnson of SilverString Media [16].

101. Let’s take a step back after making this connection and look again at Critical Distance and their mission statement page, where they list numerous contributors of content and associates. We’ve already stated that Mattie Brice and Kris Ligman are contributors to Critical Distance. In addition to this there are some more important names: Alan Williamson, Ben Abraham, and Ian Mills Cheong [17].

103. There are two people of note here since Ian Mills Cheong has already been briefly spoken upon, Alan Williamson, and Ben Abraham.

105. Why is Ben Abraham important? Well, Ben Abraham was involved on the Google+ chat on Kris Lignam’s page which is benign enough. However, on Ben Abraham’s blog, he makes note that he attended and spoke during a panel at DiGRA’s Australian chapter hosted by Dan Golding [23]. Another speaker during the panel was Ben Keogh.

106. At 2:08 in the recording, Golding admits that there are, “some juicy conflicts of interests, which I guess I’ll admit to as we go through them.” [24]

107. It is also worth noting that Benjamin Abraham is the registrar of Critical Distance [29].

109. We’ve already addressed who Ben Keogh has written articles for, so we’ll quickly mention that Ben Abraham has also blogged at Gamasutra in the past [25].

111. Why is Alan Williamson important? Well, in the about page he is associated with 5 out of 10 Magazine, where we find even more links in this whole debacle.

113. Alan Williamson is Editor-in-Chief at 5 out of 10 Magazine. [18a]
114. Leigh Alexander is a contributor, and also the editor-at-large of Gamasutra [18b]
115. Brendan Keogh is a contributor [18e]
116. Kris Ligman is a contributor [18d]
117. Zoya Street is a contributor [18c]
119. So let's get to the wrapping up of all of this. It goes back to Kris Ligman, the News editor at Gamasutra, who is supported directly by SilverString, but the links to Gamasutra and their involvement do not quite end there [19].
121. I promise we're almost done.
123. We're going to quickly look at a few articles from Gamasutra surrounding GDC that we believe are worth nothing. The first article written on March 14, 2014 by Simon Carless talks about press-related things at GDC [20]. The first thing to note here is that Simon states that GDC is owned and ran by Gamasutra's parent company, UBM Tech Game Network, but the important thing is in the third paragraph where Simon states that press access at GDC is invite only.
125. They have complete control over the press.
127. The second article of note is audio coverage of a gathering at GDC 2014 on the night of March 17, 2014 titled One Life Left [21]. The two people of note who are involved in this production are Leigh Alexander of Gamasutra and FiveOutOfTen and Rami Ismail, part of Vlambeer who is donating to Kris Ligman's Critical Distance Patreon, and also has had his writing republished on Polygon from his blog. The closest article of note that Rami authored, which was republished on Polygon from his blog, was two weeks after this audio recording, where the topic of the failed Game Jam was covered [22].
129. The connections found in this research run deep, but it is likely we have only scratched the surface. There are many more connections that we have made, but simply are too tired to pursue because we believe that what is contained within this document is more than enough. We are tired and we would like an explanation.
131. Links and Citations
133. [1] SilverString Media Foundation on their website
134. http://press.silverstringmedia.com/
135. https://archive.today/NXELL
136. [2] SilverString Media LinkedIn
137. http://www.linkedin.com/company/silverstring-media
138. https://archive.today/iOieA
139. [3] Andrew Grant Wilson LinkedIn
140. https://www.linkedin.com/reg/join?trk=login_reg_redirect&session_redirect=https%3A%2F%2Fwww.linkedin.com%2Fprofile%2Fview%3Flocale%3Den_US%26srchtotal%3D1%26srchindex%3D1%26authType%3DNAME_SEARCH%26authToken%3DVKsv%26trkInfo%3DVSRPsearchId%253A3231056621410369141175%252CVSRPtargetId%253A119487307%252CVSRPcmpt%253Aprimary%26id%3D119487307%26trk%3Dvsrp_people_res_name%26srchid%3D3231056621410369141175
141. https://archive.today/fxtQ1
143. [4] The Playful is Political Panel at DiGRA 2014 w/ Shaw, Street, Consalvo
144. http://digra2014.eae.utah.edu/files/2014/06/Schedule.pdf
145. https://web.archive.org/web/20140910171022/http://digra2014.eae.utah.edu/files/2014/06/Schedule.pdf

146. [5] Text File of Panel Transcript (original gdoc missing, pastebin in link with line number differences – normally 2 lines behind)
147. https://docs.google.com/document/d/1S-QQML7a3dbJ5JJDd5-EmQ6nOnYewNGmkn7VQ_G_oxk/edit#heading=h.4coj7lrbexux
148. https://archive.today/59bcV
149. http://pastebin.com/X46rkJJu
150. [6] SilverString Media and other pledges to Critical Distance Patreon
151. http://www.patreon.com/critdistance?u=98409&ty=p
152. https://archive.today/DFwss
153. [7] Pledges to Mattie Brice's Patreon
154. http://www.patreon.com/mattiebrice?u=40155&ty=p
155. https://archive.today/lkO7X
156. [8] Kris Ligman's Public Google+ Page Chat
157. https://plus.google.com/112315431827220610982/posts
158. https://archive.today/32MN9
159. [9] Text File of all of the obtainable transcript
160. [10] Kris Ligman's Twitter Page
161. https://twitter.com/KrisLigman
162. https://archive.today/6R2LS
163. [11] Kris Ligman speaks at Critical Proximity "Curators Are Class Enemies"
164. http://critical-proximity.com/2014/03/16/curators-are-class-enemies/
165. https://archive.today/yJa0f
166. [12a,b] QGCon Panel List – Mattie Brice, Adrienne Shaw, Anna Anthropy
167. http://www.qgcon.com/qgcon-2013/
168. https://archive.today/agZpd
169. [13a,b] First Person Scholar Board of Discussants
170. http://www.firstpersonscholar.com/board-of-discussants/
171. https://archive.today/xEKws
172. [14a,b,c]-Identification or Desire by Gerald Voorhees, Discussant's Reply, and Citations
173. http://www.firstpersonscholar.com/identification-or-desire/
174. https://archive.today/lz1f7
175. [15] The Games Institute and Founded Projects
176. https://uwaterloo.ca/games-institute/
177. https://archive.today/mjXcs
178. [16] elisevist's Article on GI Janes and Lucas JW Johnson's Twitter Exchange On the Page
179. http://gamesinstitutejanes.com/2013/06/26/feminists-in-games-2013/
180. https://archive.today/Kjasp
181. [17] Critical Distance's Mission Statement Page
182. http://www.critical-distance.com/about/
183. https://archive.today/7fIHF
184. [18a,b,c,d] FiveOutOfTen's About Page and some contributors

185. http://fiveoutoftenmagazine.com/about/
186. https://archive.today/Gg0dg
187. [19] Kris Ligman's page at Gamasutra
188. http://www.gamasutra.com/blogs/KrisLigman/853312/
189. https://archive.today/fihIR
190. [20] Gamasutra article about GDC 2014 Press
191. http://www.gamasutra.com/blogs/SimonCarless/20140314/213191/GDC_2014__our_lecture_recommendations_for_press.php
192. https://archive.today/qLyQu
193. [21] One Life Left audio recording with Leigh Alexander and Rami Ismail
194. http://gamasutra.com/view/news/213456/One_Life_Left_vs_Gamasutra_GDC_2014_1__San_Francisco_Skyline_Edition.php
195. https://archive.today/DhuYO
196. [22] Rami Ismail's Article Republished on Polygon from his blog about Game Jam
197. http://www.polygon.com/2014/4/1/5570480/a-warning-about-contracts-from-the-sidelines-of-the-most-expensive
198. https://archive.today/xsJMD
199. [23] Ben Abraham's DiGRA Blog Post
200. http://iam.benabraham.net/2014/06/digraaaaaaah/
201. https://archive.today/7dXez
202. [24] SoundCloud hosted recording of the DiGRAA Panel
203. https://soundcloud.com/glitchmark/digraa2014-fringe-panel
204. https://archive.today/bPN9k
205. [25] Ben Abraham's blog at Gamasutra: Opinion: Games Criticism, Women Critics, And Challenging Sexism on August 23, 2011
206. http://www.gamasutra.com/view/news/126690/Opinion_Games_Criticism_Women_Critics_And_Challenging_Sexism.php
207. https://archive.today/bPN9k
208. [26] SilverString Media's updated blog on September 1, 2014: Intent and Ideology
209. http://silverstringmedia.com/blog/2014/9/1/intent-and-ideology
210. https://archive.today/uBIlO
211. [27a,b] DiGRA Executive Board List over the years
212. http://www.digra.org/the-association/about-us/the-executive-board/
213. https://archive.today/djF10
214. [28a]Feminist Art Game Praxis by Emma Westecott
215. http://www.digra.org/wp-content/uploads/digital-library/paper_235.pdf
216. [28b] Downloaded hard copy of citation 28a.
217. [29] Ben Abraham — WhoIs Registrar of Critical Distance
218. http://www.whois.com/whois/critical-distance.com

219. https://archive.today/l5tTP

Added by AVFM staff:

[image]
Click to enlarge.

Solange Knowles, Ray Rice: Compare & Contrast

Mumia Ali · 11 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> "The Feminine Imperative is the pressure on society to accommodate women's mating goals: first by maximizing their mate choice; and secondly by securing provision and protection for women and their children. The latter element of the Feminine Imperative is the Female Privilege to Care. Whenever an offense can only be conceptualized in terms of harm to women, the Female Privilege to Care is manifest."
>
> -Ciaran O'Connor, "DNC Chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz: Politicizing the False Accusation Culture", Wed, Sep 10, 2014

By now, you all have seen, probably ad nauseam at this point, the "rest of the story" video footage of (now) former NFL Pro-Bowl running back Ray Rice literally knocking out his then-fiance' and now wife, Janay Palmer-Rice, in an elevator on Valentine's Day weekend earlier this year. On the off-chance you haven't, here it is:

The pearl-clutching, righteous-indignation tsunami response on the part of those who partake of the blogosphere and attendant social media was to be expected, as was the CYAness of the NFL and Baltimore Ravens franchise in throwing Mr. Rice under the bus – this, despite the fact that his wife, Mrs. Palmer-Rice, has registered her great discontent at how her hubbie has been treated by the NFL and TMZ, the "news" organization that released the footage to the general public on Monday.

Astute watchers of current events will have noticed, however, that another event that took place on an elevator, the smoking gun footage of which was also released by TMZ and which also took place earlier this year, was treated in a completely different manner than the current Rice issue is being handled. In that instance, Ms. Solange Knowles, kid sister to pop icon Beyonce' Knowles, viciously attacked Bey's hubbie, rap mogul Jay-Z, barely restrained by a burly bodyguard. Right there on the tape, we see Solange trying to kick Jay-Z, throw punches and the like, while he remained cool and calm, and even tried to restrain Ms. Knowles, again, assisted by the aforementioned burly bodyguard.

While Mr. Rice's career, for the time being at least, lay in tatters, Ms. Knowles not only didn't get so much as a slap on the wrist for her clearly violent actions, there were people who openly speculated what Jigga "could have done" to PROVOKE such a visceral response on the part of Solange – the same people, in fact, who now ride high in their saddles, finger-wagging at Mr. Rice. Clearly, suggesting that a Woman could provoke a beatdown is worthy of being censured, even being fired; but suggesting that a Man could have provoked a Woman into going into full-on Mighty Joe Young mode, well, that's perfectly A-OK.

For anyone out there who agrees with the punishment Mr. Rice has received for his actions on that fateful winter night earlier this year, you are a stompdown hypocrite with a capital "H" if you do not also support the full-on blacklisting of Ms. Solange Knowles from the music and entertainment business – but, of course, like Ms. Mary J. Blige before her, Ms. Knowles will go on with her life as if nothing had ever happened, continuing to ply her trade as a singer/entertainer, making a nice bit of coin for herself. Because, only Women count when it comes to domestic violence or spousal abuse.

In a previous post written last week, I argued that what Feminism boils down to in our time is "Who, Whom?" – not universal principles of justice, but rather, Identity Politics writ large, fostered by Special Interest Groups who have a terribly big axe to grind. This is why one couldn't hear a mumbling word from all the supposed "activists" out there on the Feminists' side of the aisle when Solange went Park Ape on Mr. Carter – because, again, domestic violence is an issue that is only for Women to be cared about.

One final point:

In a previous post I wrote barely a month ago, "Stephen A. Smith Was Right"*, I made the case that the Black community has a much more marked and acute situation when it came to domestic and spousal abuse, namely due to the fact that Black Women, far and away moreso than Women of America's other ethnicities and races, were far more likely to "jump bad," initiate aggression, and even seriously hurt and maim their male partners. I discussed a previous incident involving a (Black male) NFL player who was indeed harmed in this manner by his (Black female) partner, and which nary a peep was said about it in the media or among the SJWs in the blogosphere/social mediascape. "Who, Whom?" strikes again.

What the Rice situation proves is that far too often it is BOTH the Man AND the Woman who are at fault, often with the latter party escalating things to a point of no return. Black Women have imbibed so much of the Feminist Dogma that they don't know, and often do not care, that such ideologies are literally dangerous – as Ms. Palmer found out the hard way back when. Nevertheless, far too many Black Women feel that it is perfectly alright for them to routinely violate the personal boundaries and space(s) of their male partners – and then want to play the role of Damsel in Distress, flopping all over the Fainting Couch when they literally get popped for it.

Until or unless society at large finally admits to itself that Women, in this case but in no way solely limited to Black, have the same capacity for aggression and downright mean-spiritedness that Men, regardless of color, do, and visit these behaviors most vividly onto those closest around them routinely in our time, there will be and can be no meaningful resolution when it comes to domestic and spousal abuse – all that will result is more of the same faux-righteous indignation, proffering of sacrificial lambs, and "Who, Whom?"ism on the part of the Feminist Lobby – White and Black.

In the end, everyone loses.

*It is interesting to note indeed, that while Mr. Smith was fired from his job for saying what has been long been known to be true in the Black community and that which Ms. Palmer-Rice has said herself in terms of playing a role in the events that took place in that elevator, Ms. Whoopie Goldberg wasn't fired for saying the same thing Mr. Smith said and then taking it a few steps further – more proof of "Who, Whom?"ism in "A Woman's Nation". Deep!

Title image "RayRice27" by Keith Allison – . Licensed under Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 2.0 via Wikimedia Commons.

Gender elitism from the Elite Daily

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 11 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Lauren Martin is a writer for Elite Daily, and she wrote a beautifully condescending piece on why women should ask men out. There is apparently a lack of appropriate suitors for single women. Lauren's explanation is not that there is culture of fear and mistrust perpetuated by years of gynocentric diatribe, but that men are a bunch of pussies.

> We're dealing with a new breed of men here and it's not the kind we grew up dreaming about. It's the want-what-I-want-but-don't-know-how-to-get-it type; it's the sweet and cuddly mama's boys who grow up terrified of making the first move; it's the guys who have so much to say but don't know how to say it.
>
> Now, the unfortunate paradox for a woman is that she must be the chased and the chaser. She must be the target and the shooter. She must play coy and simultaneously pursue him.[…] Yet again, women are left to do all the work. We're left playing both sides of the game because they've simply forgotten how to play.

This is the kind of perspective that can only be developed if your moral compass is strapped to a magnet. If your entire perspective on the dating scene has no inclusion for the perspective of the "breed" you don't like, then, I don't know, start a farm for purebreds? Seems like you'd be perfectly content locking up the 1990s Pierce Brosnans in stables for future resale.

> It stems from a number of factors, but most prominently from the fact that men don't know what the hell they want from us. They want the virgin and the whore. The want the slut and the good girl. They want the girl who's hard to get, but they don't know how to get her.

No, men want trust. Other perks such as emotional stability, intelligence, and a rockin' body are factors that are weighed. And if any of those things are deal-breakers to some guys, then that's up to them. Don't like what a guy wants? Don't date him.

There are men on the dating scene in a state of confusion because gendered communication is a minefield that can result in slanderous allegations of sexual assault, or worse. If a man is too up front with his desire, he will be cast as creepy or even dangerous. But if he's too withdrawn, he's a pussy who is making women do all of the work?

How many people ask you out, Lauren? I can't help but imagine that the men willing to ask you out after reading your article are, ironically, pussies. It takes a man with no self-esteem to read your article and then come to you for validation.

> Because they don't know what they want, they end up chasing nothing. It's the dilemma of the overcrowded buffet. There are too many options so they choose an empty plate … or something they don't even like to begin with.

You just described life, Socrates. Are you suggesting that you possess god-like powers of deduction that made you not only know exactly what you want from love and life but also gave you the capacity to never be disappointed with whatever you get? After writing about how disappointed you are in men? You're beyond pretending that you've reached the Nirvana of the dating scene.

> This leaves women making all the moves. We must tell them what they want if we're to get anywhere close to the goals we had for ourselves. But it will never be as we fully imagined because, in our dreams, men weren't timid or scared little boys; in our dreams, men are the ones with the balls to ask us out.

Lauren, if you projected any harder, you could play movies. No, you need to tell men what you want. I'm not talking about writing snarky editorials, I'm talking about saying what you expect to a man's face. When men are confronted with something other than a nebula of conflicting preferences, you can trust them to make a clear decision.

For example, I refuse to get too close to anyone who thinks I can't be trusted with my own thoughts. This is one of many reasons why we would never date.

Keep a log of the kind of men who stick around you, and perhaps reflect on how your words influence your social standing.

Oh, shoot. There I go victim-blaming again.

> They'll never admit it, but you scare the hell out of them.[…] Men are shy, timid and scared sh*tless of any woman with half a brain.

Actually, this is completely true. Men are scared of women with half a brain because they prefer women with whole brains. The women with whole brains have empathy, compassion, and a capacity to reason. The women with half a brain end up writing for Elite Daily.

> It's said that the male ego is as fragile as a woman's heart and unfortunately for women, men won't take the chance of letting it shatter. While women willingly put themselves out there, men stand back, scared of the tiniest bruise on their overinflated self-image.

Almost. Men are scared of the massive beatdown that can be inflicted by other men and the state if a woman expresses a little discomfort. Do you know what that environment can do?

> We must put ourselves out there and risk rejection. Because if we don't do it, bars will soon be exactly like those middle school dances: boys on one side, girls on the other.

It's already like that, and it's precisely because women have been valued to the point where the cost for a relationship is prohibitive. Congratulations, you gave another reason for men to be on strike.

> Why are men like this? Well, for years they've been raised by their mamas, the women who told them they were the best thing God created on this earth. For years, they've been given everything on a silver platter — up until the end of college when they were picking up women who just threw up their jungle juice.

Look at the statistics for the number of boys abused by single mothers, and you'll have an idea of how many men you just pissed off.

> Of course, some mothers have raised great men. This isn't to discredit the generation of mothers before us who raised the myriad of young men we're dealing with today. But for the select few who didn't teach them how to properly court a woman, well, shame on you.

Yeah, shame those moms because moms are supposed to give single women quality cock.

But honestly, what the hell is wrong with you?

> Men, on the other hand, always seem to be waiting for something better. In the age of Facebook and Instagram, there's this constant filtered delusion that a hotter girl sits just an inbox away.

Type "huge bulging Bugles" into Google image search and tell me with a straight face that sexually active women don't sneak peeks at the results from time to time.

> In a sad, but not all that surprising, report by Nickelodeon UK, men are 11 years behind women in maturity. While women reach maturation by 32, men aren't fully matured until 43. While this study garnered much attention, women everywhere were less than surprised. Didn't we already know this?

Did you just cite Nickelodeon?

> We're dating less and thus, marrying less. And the downfall picks up speed with every failed attempt to ask a woman out.

No, the downfall picks up speed when more men realize they are worth something.

All your talk and I see that you write no reason for why you deserve love from a man.

Thank you, Lauren, for your typographical depiction of lipstick-streaked vomit. I hope your less significant other finds joy in being the ottoman for your throne, right before you sell him on Craigslist after dropping too many Cheetos crumbs down his butt crack, you lunatic.

Dog ‘n Cat Comics

Martin Domig · 11 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editorial note: We don’t often publish comics, but when Martin Domig sent these our way, we liked them too much not to share them. –DE

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

[image]

Paul Elam interviewed by Doc Thompson on Domestic Violence

AVfM Video Source · 12 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Paul Elam recently had an interesting interview with Doc Thompson on The Blaze regarding widespread lies and corruption surrounding intimate partner violence. We thought you would enjoy hearing it.

The view of Ray Rice and his family no one wants to hear

AVfM Video Source · 13 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The General, as usual, is a fount of common sense that Social Justice Warriors and White Knights don't want to hear:

You may want to subscribe to The General.

The unrealistic expectations men face and the manifestation of eating disorders

Laura Rodgers · 13 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The pressure our society puts on women to be slim and the link between this and the manifestation of eating disorders as a result is becoming increasingly apparent. However, the negative impact that societal ideals have on men is often overlooked. With 10% of eating disorder sufferers being male and even more predicted to be going unreported, investigating the effect of the pressure put on men to be lean, large, and muscular is becoming more and more important.

The Pressure to Be Perfect

Society's image of the ideal male physique is low in fat, high in muscle, and generally broad. However, short of surgery, for many, achieving this is almost impossible. Those who believe it is possible will often turn to drastic methods to achieve this. For example, compulsive over-exercising to shred body fat and increase muscle mass can be very common in men, as, on the surface, this seems like a logical way of achieving their perfect body.

It's thought that anorexia in men is more common than statistics suggest due to misconceptions and misinformation. Many believe anorexia to be an eating disorder where you simply starve yourself and refuse to eat, which is why many men who in generally have higher basal metabolic rates (BMRs) and therefore need a higher amount of food find it hard to empathize. However, anorexia is typically characterized by restrictive eating, not necessarily constant fasting. An average male could be consuming a thousand calories a day, but this would still be restrictive and the obsession with food and weight is what makes the disorder, not the exact amount you're eating. This misconception is likely to be why many men who suffer from anorexia don't believe they are and don't seek help.

Similarly, bulimic men tend to turn to over-exercising in order to burn the calories consumed during a binge, rather than self-induced vomiting or laxative abuse. Because this method of purging is less violent and more "healthy" by society's standards, it's not typically viewed by men as a problem and definitely not as an eating disorder.

These eating disorders in men carry the same health risks as eating disorders in women. However, in many ways, they can be worse due to the shame that surrounds them and the fact that many men don't view themselves as "sick enough" to get help. The disorder will therefore become worse. To prevent this, treatment in the form of therapy is needed in order to improve self-esteem and rationalize fears when it comes to food and weight.

Finding the Best Anorexia, Bulimia, and Eating Disorder Treatment for Men

Treatment options are varied, ranging from intensive inpatient programs to support groups and nutrition counseling.

Anorexia, bulimia, and other eating disorders are generally viewed by society as women's illnesses, but a large number of men also suffer from these harmful disorders. According to the National Eating Disorders Association (NEDA), 10 million men in the United States will suffer from an eating disorder at some point in their lives, and 10% of all eating disorder sufferers who receive help from mental health professionals are male.

Although some men feel embarrassed or reluctant to get help, finding an appropriate treatment option is absolutely essential. Treatment options are varied, ranging from intensive inpatient programs to support groups and nutrition counseling. Use these facts and figures to find the best eating disorder treatment for your situation.

Do Men Need Treatment for Eating Disorders?

No matter how strong men feel, their eating disorders are just as dangerous as those that impact women. Psychologists agree that men's eating disorders are generally indistinguishable from women's eating disorders in a clinical sense.

Eating disorders have the highest mortality rate of any mental illness, as stated in the American Journal of Psychiatry; however, according to the *International Journal of Eating Disorder*s, only 1 in 10 sufferers of either gender receives treatment. No matter how severe the condition, those suffering from binge eating disorder, anorexia, bulimia, or any other eating disorder need to seek some type of support or treatment.

The Benefits of Inpatient Treatment Programs

Although outpatient programs and support groups are helpful treatment options, an adult inpatient program provides the most intensive treatment regimen, including a structured, supportive recovery environment, psychotherapy, life skills counseling, and controlled therapeutic meals. Eating disorder facilities generally offer full-time, qualified staff members who include psychiatrists, psychologists and registered dieticians.

Additionally, inpatient programs help patients who need medical assistance, providing nurses who monitor vital signs and administer nasogastric feeding to supplement the patient's diet, if necessary. After undergoing an inpatient program, individuals generally receive help developing an aftercare plan to keep them on the right track.

The Benefits of Intensive Outpatient Programs

Individuals who are not in immediate medical danger and do not require partial hospitalization have the option of undergoing an intensive outpatient program (IOP), allowing them to receive treatment discretely. Most IOP programs take place several hours per day on a few chosen days of the week. Flexible schedules allow patients to begin recovering without sacrificing work, school, or other daily activities. IOD programs generally include psychotherapy, nutritional education, and skills-based eating disorder support groups.

Eating Disorder Support Groups and Therapy Groups for Men

Men suffering from eating disorders of every type and severity benefit from therapy groups and support groups, which are professionally facilitated groups that give sufferers a chance to share their thoughts and fears while benefiting from the eating disorder stories of their peers. These are often held during the evening at hospitals and treatment centers, and some eating disorder facilities offer therapy groups specifically for men.

Open groups are support groups that allow individuals to drop in without pre-registering, providing a great option for those who are not ready to fully commit but who want to explore the experience. Friends and family support groups are offered by many facilities as well. Online support groups are offered by organizations such as Mentor Connect and the National Association for Males With Eating Disorders on their websites.

Nutritional Counseling and Fitness Retraining

Services such as nutritional counseling and fitness retraining offered by many eating disorder treatment centers keep patients on the continued path to recovery by instilling essential skills. Nutritional counseling aims to stabilize the patient's nutrition before helping him develop healthy beliefs and habits concerning food. A trained professional helps each patient to develop a personalized meal plan. When necessary, patients receive nutrition prescriptions to help them balance electrolytes, stabilize weight, or reverse malnutrition.

Fitness retraining programs help eating disorder sufferers who exercise excessively, which is particularly common with anorexia nervosa. Fitness retraining assists sufferers in developing a healthy relationship with exercise. In these types of sessions, patients challenge popular media views concerning fitness and develop a healthy exercise regimen tailored to their needs.

Is a Dual-Diagnosis Treatment Center Right for You?

A dual-diagnosis treatment center aims to treat both an addiction and an underlying mental illness. According to the American Journal of Psychiatry, 50% of all individuals with eating disorders meet the criteria for clinical depression. An underlying mental illness is sometimes the cause of an eating disorder, but oftentimes the dual conditions simply result from the same environmental and social factors. Dual-diagnosis centers commonly use therapy, behavioral management programs, and medication to treat an eating disorder and associated mental illness. A good dual-diagnosis program uses an integrated approach, developing a unique treatment regime for each individual patient.

Finding an Eating Disorder Treatment Center Near You

You normally do not need to travel far to find a good treatment center, as they are offered in most major US cities. Faith-based treatment centers are a promising option for religious individuals. If there are no dedicated eating disorder facilities in your area, search for eating disorder programs at hospitals, mental health centers, and substance abuse centers. The website of the National Association of Anorexia Nervosa and Associated Disorders provides a search tool that lets you find treatment centers by state.

It's time to stop blaming soldiers

Hopeland Cash · 13 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Throughout human history, wars have ravaged cities and civilizations, razing whole communities and ending countless lives. Whether you support your nation's troops or believe there is no such thing as a just war, one thing everyone can agree on is that dying on the battlefield is a tragic, sometimes sudden but often horrible fate. Whether by the thrust of a pike or the burning shrapnel of an IED, innumerable soldiers have died for causes of their own and of others.

Many thinkers have posited that war is inevitable, inseparable from human civilization, but most people would agree that war has no place in an ideal world. Utopian thinking is by definition a pipe dream, but it helps us focus on admirable goals. One such goal is a world without war and violence.

Until we can achieve that, war will remain an unfortunate fact. All we can do is reduce its incidence to the minimum and ensure that when war does occur, the people responsible are brought to justice. However, there is an invisible barrier to our efforts to protect soldiers from harm: victim-blaming.

Since the earliest days of war, soldiers have been blamed for their own injuries and death. How? Yes, soldiers are held responsible for their own actions, as any adult would be when entering a potentially dangerous situation. More important, though, is what we do to alleviate their danger: we hold them responsible for their own safety. Everyday we continue to develop new equipment that we expect soldiers to use to protect themselves. The flak jacket dates as far back as the American Civil War, designed to protect soldiers from shrapnel and eventually evolving into the modern bulletproof vest.

This is a blatant example of victim-blaming battlefield-fatality culture: social attitudes and practices working to trivialize war violence, making violence against soldiers seem normal, and shifting responsibility from the enemy to the injured soldier.

Soldiers going into battle are told to remember their helmets, their armor, their vests, and this reinforces battlefield-fatality culture, making soldiers responsible for the violence about to be committed against them. Bomb detectors, radiation monitors, radar, surveillance support, tactical intelligence, and armored vehicles all contribute, putting the onus on the victimized soldier.

This inevitably leads to victim-blaming: You were shot? Well, was your body armor on straight? And a mine took off your foot? Guess you should've swept better.

Step out of the bunker without a helmet and you are just asking for a headshot with how you're dressed.

All this "protection" and "self-defense" and "basic combat tactics" normalizes violence against soldiers by making them the target of blame. Instead, we should be blaming the people responsible: enemy combatants. Our troops shouldn't have to wear body armor and drive in tanks and walk across the base at night clutching their dog tags between their fingers to use as a weapon if an assailant comes. The problem is battlefield-fatality culture. It makes our enemies feel entitled to shoot at our soldiers' bodies. This runs deep in all societies, making us doubt injured soldiers, question whether they did everything they could to protect themselves, and fail to justly prosecute assailants. After all, militants will be militants.

What next? Nail polish that changes color in the presence of concealed explosives?

Mishoplitist!

Don't be that enemy combatant. It is time we end PTSD apologia and stop battlefield-fatality culture.

Teach the enemy not to shoot!

Editorial note: As is often the case, critics of the Men's Human Rights Movement seem to require a satire notice. So yes, people, this is satire. —DE Men Going Their Own Way vs. Islam part 2: It crawls, it creeps, it eats you alive!

AVfM Video Source · 14 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Here we bring you Part 2 of the series on gender dynamics in Indonesia by Ayam Sirias. Please sub and support Ayam for continuing this work, which rises to the level of Ali Mehraspand's work in terms of its value in correcting Western misconceptions about Muslim and Eastern culture. It is also a brilliant analysis of how gynocentrism is expressed in different ways by different societies.

UFC president courageously reinstates fighter after he's cleared of domestic assault

Ty Henry · 14 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Amid the scorched earth pogrom that has overrun the NFL attendant to the Ray Rice fiasco, there was some encouraging news that at least one head of a sports promotion once again proved that he can be trusted to handle the domestic violence issue properly—and do the right thing in the face of potential backlash.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=rAUArp7BrfY

UFC President Dana White reinstated light heavyweight Thiago Silva after all domestic assault–related charges against him were dismissed late last week. Silva was arrested in May after a SWAT team standoff at the gym owned by his wife's lover, Pablo Popovitch. He was alleged to have threatened the boyfriend and pointed a gun into his wife, Thaysa's, mouth. He was charged with attempted murder, kidnapping, resisting arrest, and a host of domestic assault charges. At the time, White terminated Silva's contract, going on record to say Silva would "never fight in the UFC again."

http://www.tmz.com/2014/02/07/ucf-star-thiago-silva-arrested-for-attempted-muder/

http://espn.go.com/mma/story/_/id/10417491/thiago-silva-arrested-altercation-barricading-residence

White explains on UFC Tonight the reason for his decision. Simply put, if ALL charges were dropped, "how can I not let the guy earn a living?"

For a sampling of the resistance, see the first 45 minutes or so of the MMA Hour, in which host Ariel Helwani interviews Silva after speaking with Luke Thomas on the matter (minutes 14–17). Helwani and Thomas are both superb and respected MMA commentators, of the highest level of integrity. Nevertheless, the moral panic of the moment colors their perspective of the Silva matter. Pay attention to Helwani's parsing of the word acquittal and his taking of prosecutor-speak at face value, and Thomas's use of a reality TV show to suggest that dropping of all charges isn't dispositive of innocence and his conflation of reduction of charges and dropping of them. Absent from their discussion is any exploration of the issues in a light adverse to Thaysa Silva, such as that maybe she fled because her story was falling apart. Of course, it's still too much to ask to broach the subject of rampant divorce-related restraining order abuse and false accusations, so Thomas and Helwani cannot be faulted there.

Starts at 14:30, ends at 16:30:
http://www.mmafighting.com/2014/9/8/6119625/the-mma-hour-with-stephan-bonnar-anthony-johnson-thiago-silva http://www.mmafighting.com/2014/9/8/6122597/thiago-silva-denies-all-wrongdoing-in-alleged-domestic-assault-of-ex

The line of questioning of Silva is also curious. Helwani asks Silva if he knows why his wife left the country. Of course, that's a question Silva by definition cannot answer; that's a question for the prosecutors. Moreover, one can't help but be embarrassed for Helwani after he asks a defendant who had faced life just hours before if he had preferred the charges to stick until a jury could acquit him.

White has cut fighters for domestic violence before, such as Will Chope, and cut War Machine when his feral, unhinged wrath was being directed at men . . . and our president. With this decision, White has shown himself consistent. He kept top UFC Octagon Girl and brand ambassador Arianny Celeste on the roster after her 2012 domestic violence charges were also dropped. Of course, the Silva decision took far more courage, as true leadership means doing the right thing, whether it's popular or not.

Charges dismissed means charges dismissed.

Facts about women in universities in Iran

Ali Mehraspand · 14 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It has recently been reported in the English-language news that women have been barred from many degree programs in Iran. This is true. But there is much misinformation surrounding it. We should not be surprised at the level of disinformation; after all, it comes from Shirin Ebadi, one of the worst fraudsters ever seen from Iran. She received a Nobel Prize, by the way, by being a disingenuous, lying gender ideologue. As I explain the situation more deeply, you will see how easy it was for her to bring about lies and disinformation—and that if she has the chance to do it again, you can bet that she will.

There are two major types of universities in Iran: Sarasari and Azad.

Sarasari universities are government-funded and are free of charge. They are much more prestigious and heavily equipped than Azad universities. All students in Iran prefer to go to Sarasari universities. Every major city has at least one such university; all the most prominent universities in Iran are in this category, such as Sharif University of Technology, the University or Tehran, Shiraz University, and the University of Isfahan, to name a few.

On the other hand, Azad universities make students hemorrhage money. In Iran, when a family wants to say how much they are under pressure financially, they say that they have a kid (usually a daughter) who is going to an Azad university. The facilities resemble preschools more than real universities. You can be a professor at an Azad university just with a master's degree (seriously). I have had many students who go to Azad universities. I teach them math. I expect a high school student to know much more about math than an average person graduated in math from an Azad university. Okay, I know, not all Azad students are like that, but they mostly are.

You might ask why such universities exist. Because it's a prestige thing. It has nothing to do with knowledge or jobs. Chances of finding a job related to your field of study with a degree from an Azad university are extremely low; but everybody wants to say that they are engineers or doctors. So we invest heavily in making it possible for people with IQs of 70 to easily get a doctorate from an Azad university. It is not an education system; it is an education market.

One thing that is much related to all of this is Iran's rate of population growth. After the revolution, the rate was extremely high, and right now we have passed the youth population peak. Meanwhile, the capacity of admission into universities has increased drastically during the past two decades. What it all means is that those 18-year-olds who took the university entrance exam 20 years ago were competing with 1.5 million other applicants for only around 80,000 seats in Sarasari universities. Ten years ago, you would be competing against 1.1 million others for around 130,000 seats in Sarasari universities and around 400,000 seats in Azad universities. Right now this year, the number of seats in the universities is higher than the number of those who want to attend universities! So first of all, women are not banned from university. Virtually everybody goes to university. We are at the point that you can go to an Azad university without even taking the university entrance exams, even for a PhD degree. Just pay the money and they will let you in.

Now we know enough so that I can explain the disingenuous or outright lies of Shirin Ebadi, namely her two claims that: 1) women are banned from university (the truth is something else entirely); and 2) women outperform men and are in general more educated than men.

A quote from the article:

"It follows years in which Iranian women students have outperformed men, a trend at odds with the traditional male-dominated outlook of the country's religious leaders. Women outnumbered men by three to two in passing this year's university entrance exam."

One of the things Ebadi loves to brag about in every article and speech of hers is this: women outperform men in universities in Iran … 65% of those accepted in universities are women …

Do girls really outperform boys? I don't think so! It's the kind of thing you can only sell to those outside of Iran; to me, who has been to the most prominent universities here, that is an outright lie.

Let's start by the fact that 55% to 60% of those who take the university entrance exam are female. So just by stating this fact, the end result is now one step further from the apparent notion that women are superior to men in universities because they attend it 1.5 times men.

Next, when men do not get accepted in an appropriate field in a Sarasari university, many of them simply do not go to an Azad university where they are accepted because, unlike girls, they have financial burdens and a degree from an Azad university in Iran is not exactly the wisest thing a boy can do with four years of his life. Especially given that the tuition for an Azad university is so backbreaking that it makes no sense to go there for anything other than the prestige of having a diploma. Particularly since he also needs to spend two more years in the military. Speaking of military service, men can only take the university entrance exam up to one year after graduation before being forcibly conscripted, while there is no such limit for women. This especially poses a problem when trying to get accepted for a M.Sc. degree because the first time that you have the chance to take the exam you are still a non-graduated student, which is why people usually get accepted to master's programs at their second attempt or more.

Anyway, Azad universities are heavily dominated by females, which is as far from women outperforming men as possible (many men simply do not bother with the tuition for a worthless degree although they get accepted). Who pays for all those women who go to Azad universities, by the way? Their fathers (or husbands and sometimes brothers), many of whom work two jobs to pay the tuition.

How about Sarasari universities? Are they dominated by women? No, at least not in a disproportionate manner from the female-to-male ratio of participants in the exam. If you go to the most prominent universities in Iran (such as the Sharif University of Technology), every step of the way men dominate the campus space more. Iranian men also contribute much more to science than Iranian women, although they are given much less chance to do so.

Now we get to the other claim, which is that women are banned from many universities in many of the fields. If one honest person wanted to report the reality, they would have said: Some (of the Sarasari) universities have made some few fields single-gendered. For example, the University of Agriculture and Natural Resources Ramin does not accept any male students in the field of agricultural economy, while Jondi Shapour University, in its mapping branch of civil engineering, accepts only male students.

[image]

[image]

[image]

Although I oppose this policy myself (because it seems that they want to separate the sexes even more), when they tell half the truth and make it a women's issue and then blow it out of proportion, I have this to say: Go to another fucking university for this field or go to this university in another fucking field. I just love how this is all a big problem now that the chances of you not getting into university as a female have approached zero, while 20 years ago, when it was extremely difficult to get accepted, girls had quota.

Now let's look at one of the claims in that article:

Nobel laureate Shirin Ebadi said "the real agenda was to reduce the proportion of female students to below 50%. …"

Lie. Since all participants in the university entrance exam can get into university since just this year (except for some men who are reluctant to go to an Azad university), the proportion of women in universities cannot possibly go below 58%, which is around the percentage of female participants in the exam. Not to mention how this whole one-sided story was made up.

Not only it is a half-truth that women are banned (men are excluded in the same manner in some universities), but it is also another lie that they are banned from any particular field. If one university excludes one gender in one field, other universities don't. This means that there is not a single field from which any gender is banned. Furthermore, I actually spent several hours and found the numbers.

The total number of seats in fields where one gender is excluded does not account for even 0.5% of all seats. That is what all the fuss is about: less than 0.5% of seats, usually in not-so-prestigious universities, have been single-gendered, and so Ebadi censors the truth about men.

There is also quota. Some universities have reserved some seats for one gender in some fields. Azad universities, which account for the majority of university students, do not have any quota of any sorts. Some of the Sarasari universities do, however. So I counted these numbers (including single-gendered seats) for First Admission (free of charge) for two of the major fields: math/physics/engineering and humanities. (A cursory glance over the other field, namely medicine and medical fields, shows that women have more quota there, but I didn't count the actual number.) Here is the result:

[image]

I can go on and on and on about other stuff, but I think this response is enough for now, isn't it?

Dreamt of a rape and now a man will go to jail

Yehonatan Roth · 14 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I'm not one for puffing up stories for sensational news, but here are some facts to get you going:

- A woman in her 20s dreams a dream in New York. The dream is outrageous: her father had raped her. She wakes up and quickly jots it down and recalls other times this had happened.
- Years later, she comes to Israel and presses charges.
- She has no evidence except the dream and her "repressed" memories.
- The court proceedings are long, and eventually the father after appeals gets convicted at the age of 75.
- She has no concrete event, not even one in the 10 years of alleged rape, other than a claim she was raped while her mother was in the bed. The mother does not recall such an incident.
- Her sister claims she is a highly manipulative person and backs the father up. She says that her sister is capable of being very convincing and manipulative when she wants to be.
- Her past therapists (she has previous mental problems) claim she had never exhibited signs of post trauma or repression of any kind.

The court believes her on the basis of the dream alone.

Most of the story is about how horrible it is. I shortened it above for you with only the important facts, but the rest you can read here (a Google translate link):
https://translate.google.com/translate?hl=en&sl=auto&tl=en&u=http%3A%2F%2Fwww.haaretz.co.il%2Fnews%2Flaw%2F1.2429905

And the original story in Hebrew:
http://www.haaretz.co.il/news/law/1.2429905

Haaretz is a left-wing-leaning news source and the second biggest newspaper after Yedioth ahronoth (Ynet).

Let it be said that even if this man is somehow guilty, or may be a bad person in other ways, the precedent set here is deeply disturbing.

Kelly Brook illustrates that society thinks domestic violence is fine if a woman does it

AVfM Video Source · 15 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

http://youtu.be/NudNVlWeaJ8

It is apparently fun when a woman punches a man. No double-standards here, right?

Why India needs a men's commission: A study

Partha Sadhukhan · 15 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A recent writ petition in the Lucknow bench of the Allahabad High Court has created ripples in Indian society (a copy of the petition is here). The writ, filed by Indian Police Services officer Amitabh Thakur, stresses law misuse by women and the lack of protection of men from such law misuse as the reasons behind demanding a men's commission. Although these grounds are significant, there are many more reasons to establish a men's commission as well as a men's welfare ministry in India. We need to promote and protect the welfare of Indian men because:

1. > 90%, if not more, of war casualties are men.
2. Men are more prone to death at work. Almost all dangerous jobs are done by men.
3. > 80% of murder/homicide victims are men. Now a woman can have a "clean cheat" to murder a man based on an allegation that he wanted to rape her. And the government has provided her a gun (named Nirbheek). So this figure will increase, with no justice for men.
4. In > 90% of divorce cases, men pay alimony, and in most of these they still lose child custody.
5. Men commit approximately double the number of suicides compared with women across all ages and marital classes.
6. Men get at least 60% longer sentences than women who commit the same crime. There are many examples in India.
7. Very prominent gender bias against men occurs in the legal system: while there are more than 45 legal provisions/benefits for women, there are none for men.
8. 40% of domestic violence incidents are against men (according to a recent postgraduate study by a Delhi University student). However, there is no provision to report these incidents and receive justice.
9. The male fatality rate is much higher than the female fatality rate. That is why we see that in the 0-6 years category we have fewer women, but in the more than 60 years category, we have fewer men.
10. The average life expectancy of a female in India is 67.5 years, whereas that of a male is only 63.4 years.
11. In the past four decades, the average life expectancy of an Indian male increased by 15 years and that of an Indian female increased by 18 years, which shows that Indian men need protection now. Globally, this increase has been 12.1 years and 11.1 years, respectively.
12. Indian women are expected to stay healthy until 57.1 years of age, whereas an average Indian man is expected to stay healthy until 54.6 years of age.
13. 80% of men are homeless. However, only female homeless people have government grants and shelters. There are no government programs for male homeless people.
14. Only men are victims of paternity fraud. They still pay for those children's maintenance.
15. More than 80% of taxpayers are men, whereas all their taxes are used to create laws against them and to make policies only for women.
16. Men pay tax for their income, including the alimony or maintenance they pay to their wives. They don't get a tax benefit on the income lost in alimony. However, women get alimony but never pay taxes on that income.
17. In a family, women always marry up their status, but even when the husbands make more money, they spend less on themselves. However, women make less money, but they make their men spend on them more. This is evident from the floor space and products available for men and women.
18. Men pay more taxes, but there is no government spending on men's healthcare needs. Indian feminists say men have stronger genes and hence they don't require this. However, life expectancy data says the average Indian man is expected to live less compared with the average Indian woman.
19. There is no recognition of domestic violence against men and shelter for them. Women, however, can get domestic rights under the Domestic Violence Act (DVA) and snatch property from their husband even if he has earned it on his own.

20. Men get more punishment for the same crime. Women criminals are very often praised or even apologized to by the government. For example, a recent sex racket case involving an actress shows how the actress was let go and the man working as her agent was sent to jail.
21. Courts grant child custody to mothers most of the time.
22. There are ex-parte maintenance orders even for working women.
23. A protection officer is appointed under the DVA to female victims, whereas male victims don't have any such privilege.
24. All mediation-related expenses are borne by the husband in divorce cases.
25. At times if the wife has to travel for a divorce case, the husband is made to bear the cost.
26. The wife is given open permission to file the same case in multiple places and all cases will go on simultaneously. For example, we have cases where a man faced 498a in multiple courts.
27. Women are not punished for false cases and using government machinery for their personal gains. Only some high-profile cases get punished.
28. Government-funded organizations, including the Ministry of Women & Child Development, National Commission for Women, state-run women's commissions, Mahila Thana, and innumerable NGOs for women exist. There is nothing for men funded by government.
29. Male genital mutilation is accepted by society, but female genital mutilation is not.
30. A young boy raped by a woman will still be blamed and punished and may have to pay her child support if she becomes pregnant as a result.
31. Women do not have any responsibility in their sexual acts. However, men are held responsible for everything.
32. A woman can withdraw consent anytime during a sexual act; consensual sex can become rape, and punishment may be the death penalty.
33. There are women quotas in government jobs, trains, buses, multiplexes, etc. No such reservation for men. So women can enjoy both reserved and unreserved places. Article 15(3) of the constitution wanted to abolish discrimination by giving women equal opportunity and NOT all opportunities.
34. Lower standards are accepted for women in many entrance tests. Female students are given grace marks in centers of excellence like IIMs, and deserving male students are deprived of education.
35. A greater number of women-only colleges makes higher education for boys a distant dream; hence, we see an increase in the number of women graduating from colleges. Very soon that number will be higher than the number of male graduates. However, the social expectations of a boy/man to be the provider and maintenance payer will remain the same.
36. There are more male student dropouts than female student dropouts at the college level.
37. The government is building 1 crore (10 million) toilets ONLY for women, as if men do not need toilets.
38. Prime Minister Modiji gave money to his drivers so they could send their daughters to school, whereas it is women who get more educational aids and government funding. This shows sexism by the government and creates an expectation that girls going to school should get aid, but boys should NOT.
39. Male rape victims are mocked and punished as rapists.
40. Men are not expected to show emotions, which makes them unable to take care of emotional/psychological issues. No help for them either.
41. Victim-blaming is acceptable only when men are victims from women. No one is trying to change this mentality.
42. Men experience gender stereotyping by society as being violent, abusers, etc., whereas the expectation is a man will be the protector of society.
43. Men's lives are given less value in emergency situations than women's lives. For example, during the Uttarakhand flooding disaster, the government announced to rescue women first. Women got chopper service, but men did not. And ONLY men were seen rescuing others.

44. Male students are often given harsher punishment by teachers than are female students. A recent case of a female teacher beating a male student cruelly did not make national headlines. She was not arrested, only expelled from the school.
45. Sons are abused more by their mothers than are daughters.
46. More boys are sexually abused by women than girls, but that never makes national headlines either.
47. Boys are more vulnerable than girls to crime by society, but there is no care for them to prohibit that from happening.
48. More boys than girls need care and protection in institutions (2007 study by WCD ministry).
49. More boys than girls are in conflict with the law in different institutions (2007 study by WCD ministry).
50. More boys than girls are on the streets (2007 study by WCD ministry).
51. Boys are abused more than girls in any institution (2007 study by WCD ministry).
52. More boys than girls are sexually abused in institutions (2007 study by WCD ministry).
53. More boys than girls are exposed to pornography (2007 study by WCD ministry).
54. Violence against men by women is more socially acceptable and sometimes a matter of humor.
55. Men get tougher assignments compared with women, even if they are employed in same job.
56. Women get more leaves, flexible working hours, and work-from-home options compared with men.
57. Men have to work longer hours, but women do not.
58. Men who complain about being sexually objectified are laughed at. Often their mental state is questioned.
59. Men showing or rubbing genitals (even when itching) is considered vulgar and is a punishable offense. Women showing their breasts is considered an act of empowerment.
60. Women misbehaving with male police officers is acceptable, but men misbehaving with women officers (even male officers) is not.
61. A man is expected to ask a woman out and pay for the date (even if she rejects him). He is a loser.
62. A woman can slap a man on live TV (Tina Sharma did so during a debate) and that is not violence and the man loses his party post. The woman goes unpunished.
63. Our culture and media always consider a man as an abuser, even when he is a victim.
64. In media and TV, violence against men is glorified but violence against women is considered a heinous crime.
65. Media specifically mention women in any disaster death toll, whereas there is no special mention of men. For example, one news story stated that 37 people died in flood, out of which 10 were women.

So we see that India needs a commission for men to stop the long list of crimes and social bias against them. This commission will ensure a welfare state for men. We also need a Ministry for Men's Welfare to draft/amend laws suitably and to bring about various government initiatives. Otherwise, 51% of the population of India is not taken care of.

***

References

1. Global expectancy of healthy life expectancy published in British Medical Journal The Lancet on December 2012.
2. Study of child abuse in India – 2007 by Ministry of Women and Child Development
3. Human Development Report by UNDP
4. http://www.realsexism.com/

Related Articles

1. Opposition to Men's Commission on TOI
2. What does a debate on Men's Rights Commission reflect?
3. Truth behind The Powerof49 campaign – DomesticViolence
4. Lies of Jaagore, PowerOf49 – Literacy of Indian women
5. Global Life Expectancy

Media hatemongers of the #MaleTears hashtag: Larkins Report

Jenny Larkin · 15 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We, the Larkins, a group of men and women of differing ethnic and political backgrounds, have been disturbed watching the hatred of boys and men being embraced and celebrated by figures in the media who would never celebrate and laugh at female suffering in the same way.

While so-called "ironic" misandry is already known to be celebrated by notorious bigot Jessica Valenti, who appeared famously in a photo wearing a shirt saying, "I bathe in male tears," we recently noticed that a #MaleTears hashtag by hateful gender ideologues was not only started but going strong.

We also noted the irony of feminist ideologues who claim that feminism is about breaking out of stereotypical gender roles and telling men they should feel more free to express their emotions and their experiences only to then turn around and mock any men who actually do so, laughing at men who shed tears, as bullies have done to men and boys from time immemorial. Is this defeating the "patriarchy" they so strongly believe is oppressing women?

As if this hypocritical hate-fest was not enough, we also noticed that not only were general users of Twitter participating in this sexist bigotry, but that actual working journalists from mainstream sources were also participating.

As a collective group, we decided to look for media figures involved in this bigotry and expose things they had publicly written to a wider audience, who may not have noticed that they're reading "reporting" from writers with a bigoted, hateful mindset.

The Larkin Hive is therefore proud to present you its first report: mainstream journalists involved in the #MaleTears festival of cackling at the suffering of anyone with a Y chromosome. Our full information dump will be presented in PDF form at the bottom of this entry. —JL

Named hate-journalists:

Karensa Cadenas: an editor for Snakkle and former editor for Tomorrow magazine. Has written for Bitch magazine, Fiction DB, Forever Young Adult, Ms. magazine, This Was Television, and Women and Hollywood.

Marissa Cetin: has written for Daily Mail Online, The Le Sigh, and Mashable.

Nicole Cliffe: editor of The Toast; writer for The Hairpin, The Awl, McSweeney's, and The Morning News.

Tara Culp-Ressler: editor at ThinkProgress.

Kavita Dogra: founder of We Talk Women.

Melissa Gira Grant: has written for The New York Times, The Guardian, The Nation, and Salon.

Amanda Hess: works for Slate. Has written for Huffington Post.

Jillian Horowitz: has written for XoJane and Thought Catalog.

Katie Klabusich: appears on Best of the Left podcast; has written for Huffington Post and TruthOut.

Natasha Lennard: part of the Vice news team; also does work for The New Inquiry; sas written for Salon and Democracy Now.

Mallory Ortberg: author for The Toast; has written for The Wire, The Atlantic, The Hairpin, and The Awl.

Ted Scheinman: No list of hateful gender ideologues would be complete without at least one token male feminist consumed with the need to be The One Good Man. Scheinman has written for Slate, the Los Angeles Review of Books, and Slant magazine.

Jess Zimmerman: has written for Time, The Guardian, XoJane, Medium, The Hairpin, GlobalPost, and other sources.

To see the complete Larkins information dump showing the blatant bigotry of these “journalists,” see Larkins Report #1: Male Tears (PDF).

Are video games sexist?

AVfM Video Source · 16 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Trigger warning for Social Justice Warriors: woman armed with bricks of logic and fact. Your prejudices might be challenged.

PSA: Domestic violence and rape are not gendered issues

AVfM Video Source · 16 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

More and more young, intelligent people are learning to see past the propaganda. The General is one such:

You should subscribe to The General.

Your brain on porn: It's NOT addictive

Dr. David Ley · 16 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This article is also available in Portuguese.

There has been a tremendous amount of hyperbole about porn use, with many authors and doomsayers claiming that viewing porn triggers dangerous neurochemical changes in the brain. But groundbreaking new research says that it just ain't so, and that people who are problem users of porn are actually people with high libidos, NOT people whose brains have been warped sex and porn.

Popular antiporn advocates such as YourBrainonPorn and the group called Fight The New Drug argue that porn use is a public health issue, not a free speech issue. These advocates often assert that if people and society only knew the damage that porn use was causing to our brains, that we would regulate it, in ourselves, and in the access that is allowed.

Over recent years, these fear-based arguments often invoke brain-related lingo, and throw around terms like dopamine bursts and desensitization, to describe what allegedly happens in the brains of people who watch too much porn. Brain science is hot these days, and it's attention-getting to use brain and neuroscience lingo in arguments because it sounds so gosh-darned convincing and scientific. The problem is, there has been extremely little research that actually looks at the brains and behaviors of people using porn, and no good, experimental research that has looked at the brains of those who are allegedly addicted to porn. So, all of these arguments are theoretical, and based on rhetoric, inferences and applying other research findings to try to explain sexual behaviors.

Fascinating, rigorous new research has now been done, which actually examined the brains of alleged sex addicts, and guess what? The results are a bit different from the rhetoric. In fact, the results don't support that sex addiction is real, or reflects any unique brain-related issues at all.

In research invited for submission to the journal Socioaffective Neuroscience of Psychology, authors Steele, Staley, Fong and Prause used EEG testing to examine the effects of visual erotica on the brains of people who felt they had problems controlling their porn use. Fifty-two sex addicts, including men and women, had their brain's electrical activity examined while they looked at erotic imagery. Sex addiction theory predicts that these individuals would show brain patterns consistent with that of cocaine addicts, who demonstrate specific electrical changes in the brain's activity, in response to drug-related cues. Sex addiction proponents, from Rob Weiss to Patrick Carnes, have long argued that sex and porn are "like cocaine" in the brain.

But, when EEGs were administered to these individuals, as they viewed erotic stimuli, results were surprising, and not at all consistent with sex addiction theory. If viewing pornography actually was habituating (or desensitizing), like drugs are, then viewing pornography would have a diminished electrical response in the brain. In fact, in these results, there was no such response. Instead, the participants' overall demonstrated increased electrical brain responses to the erotic imagery they were shown were just like the brains of "normal people" as has been shown in hundreds of studies.

Ah, but the sex addiction proponents might argue that this is because these porn addicts have a stronger response to sexual stimuli, and that is why they are addicts. This is one reason that porn and sex addiction theories are so tough to argue – they are unfalsifiable, by presenting opposing things as part of their theory, and having very fluid arguments, that explain when data or results don't match their theories.

This is where the authors of this study were very clever. The researchers included measures of sexual desire or libido and multiple measures of sex addiction in the questionnaires they administered to the participants. The EEG results of this study were predicted by the measures of libido, and there was NO relationship between measures of sex addiction to the neural measures. In other words, the EEG findings of increased response to erotic stimuli were consistent with the responses of people who have higher levels of sexual desire. The alleged sex addicts of this study have brains that look like those of other people, who have high libidos, but don't identify as sex addicts.

Another part of this sophisticated analysis is that the researchers looked at the different tests that measured aspects of sex addiction/hypersexuality, and at the tests that measured libido. They then conducted statistical analyses to identify if any of these test results varied consistently with the difference in brain responses. Again, the tests of sexual addiction had no connection with the neural findings. But a significant portion of the change in neural responses was explainable by the participants' level of sexual desire – when a participant reported higher levels of libido, they also demonstrated lesser neural responses to the sexual stimuli they were shown. This was a somewhat surprising finding, suggesting that people with high libido may find pornography less novel, and thus have less neural response – this is consistent with some other studies, which have shown that those with high levels of sexual desire have less response to visual erotica. But this is not unique to sex addicts, and was predicted by levels of sexual desire, NOT symptoms of sex addiction. Higher rates of sexual addiction symptoms, no matter which of three scales of sex addiction were used, had NO relationship to the neural response to the erotic pictures they were shown.

Porn addiction advocates will surely cry "Aha! See, there it is, porn addicts have a LOWER response, and that's why they are addicts, they've been desensitized." But remember, it was the measure of libido that predicted decreased neural response, not measures of sex problems or even porn use. Even amongst the study group of problem porn users, there were varying levels of libido. And, just like other people who don't have problems controlling their porn use, it is the higher levels of sexual desire that predict this decreased effect. Lots of people with high libido have this same effect, but report no problems controlling porn use.

One can argue that this is merely one study, and only one measure of the brain's activity. Porn addiction proponents will undoubtedly argue that other types of brain studies such as MRIs, MEGs, SPECT scans, or other brain scans will show the effects they believe are there. I'm sure others will argue that looking at an erotic still-picture is somehow different from looking at "high-speed Internet porn." The interesting thing in these arguments is that they are arguing against the validity of science, by asserting that their theories are somehow more true and reliable than is actual scientific research or data. In other words, will they only believe data when it confirms their theories? If so, I'm sorry, that's called confirmation bias, not science.

This study has been criticized recently, but overwhelmingly, these criticisms are unfounded:

● There was no "control group" – in fact, this study used a "within-subjects" design, where the subjects themselves were their own control group. This is a methodologically rigorous, well-accepted design;
● Results of analyses that were not significant were not described in the publication – this is a common scientific practice, and the authors are usually willing to share the results of these analyses, at request;
● This study used very good scientific method, in creating a study to test the "theory" that porn use works "like" a drug addiction. This is how good science works, by testing theories;
● Because there is no accepted definition or criteria for sex/porn addiction, the study used multiple commonly used assessments strategies for sex addiction;
● The use of EEG technology is an accepted method, extensively used in addictions research, and allowed a valid, useful comparison of these results to the existing research on drug and alcohol addictions. The P300 results cited in the study are internally, and externally consistent with their own findings, and with prior literature, and are supportive of the interpretation that the subjects showed a neural response based on libido and sexual arousal, NOT demonstrating changes to the brain that are indicative of an addictive response.
The increasing weight of scientific investigation, as opposed to speculation and theorizing, is indicating that sex addiction is not a distinct construct, but reflects the behaviors of individuals with higher levels of sexual desire and libido, especially as those behaviors lead people into conflict with social values around sex. Like any other human characteristic, sexual desire occurs along a spectrum, with wide ranges of individual variation. The problems and complaints reported by self-identified porn and sex addicts have to do with the context within which these individuals are expressing or pursuing their high libido, NOT with a unique disease.

The proponents of porn and sex addiction may do well to begin to change their dialogue, from attacking porn and sex, to increasing the dialogue about how sexual desire and sexual expression can conflict with public/private social values and ideals. Rather than trumpeting the danger of porn, they may be more effective and evidence-based to argue for education about the varying levels of sexual desire and the need for both society and the individual to be responsible for and responsive to those differences.

J4MB publicly challenges Theresa May MP, Home Secretary

Mike Buchanan · 16 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Theresa May, 58, was first elected as a (Conservative) Member of Parliament in the UK at the 1997 general election, the first of three consecutive elections won by the Labour Party under Tony Blair. She's spoken at the Fawcett Society – a radical feminist campaigning organization – about "promoting the cross-party issue of gender equality" and was nominated as one of the Society's "Inspiring Women of 2006." She posed for a photograph wearing a Fawcett Society T-shirt bearing the logo, "This is what a feminist looks like" – here. Note the woman in the photograph next to Theresa May's, in the top left-hand corner – Tracey Emin, a talentless feminist 'artist' who holds the once-exalted position of Professor of Drawing at the Royal Academy. What desperate times we live in. I included a link to the photograph of Ms. Emin in my book Feminism: the ugly truth, in a chapter with the title:

> Are some feminists (e.g. Tracey Emin) a pain in the arts?

I digress. When a Conservative-led coalition took power in 2010, Theresa May was promoted to one of the top political posts in the UK – Home Secretary. Tellingly, she also held the position of Minister for Women and Equalities. In 2012, the latter post was passed to a particularly incompetent minister, Maria Miller, who was forced by public opinion to resign from the cabinet in 2014 because she'd overclaimed expenses, which the general public believed to have been a deliberate act of fraud.

In July 2010, May stated she would be supporting the previous Labour government's Anti-Discrimination Laws enshrined in the Equality Act 2010, despite having previously opposed this legislation. The legislation was the work of radical feminists in the Labour government, and the 'Public Sector Equality Duty' enables public sector organizations to recruit and promote people with 'protected characteristics' when they are 'under-represented.' One of the characteristics is gender. It won't surprise AVfM followers to learn that the legislation has, to the best of my knowledge, only ever been used to advance women – although already two-thirds of public sector employees are women.

The Home Office has responsibility for numerous key areas, including the police. As such, it's in the front line of dealing with instances of Intimate Partner Violence (IPV). Along with other government departments – under both Labour and Conservative administrations, and the current coalition – radical feminists and their organizations have had an extraordinary influence on policy making for decades, all but unreported by the mainstream media.

In late 2013 it became known that the government proposed to extend the law – it used the euphemism 'strengthen' the law, and still does – to cover areas of domestic 'abuse' not formerly covered. 'Abuses' such as 'coercion of partners over extended periods of time' were put forward, clearly betraying this initiative's origins in the utterly discredited Duluth 'male coercion model' of IPV. It was patently obvious that the driving force for the proposed legislation was the influence of feminist organizations such as Women's Aid – known to be working in the Home Office at the time, on this very matter – and last January I penned an article on the matter for AVfM.

The Home Office recently published a woeful and ideologically inspired 'consultation document,' along with details of an equally ideologically-inspired and woeful 'consultation exercise' on the extension of the law – details here. The whole thing is a radical feminist perversion of due process in the Home Office. Academic researchers weren't among the groups with which the Home Office declared it will consult – the very group of people who could most authoritatively explode the myths of the Duluth model that are at the heart of this radical feminist initiative. This initiative is clearly designed to destroy marriages and nuclear families. It will provide long-term employment for feminists working in Women's Aid and other radical feminist organisations, at the cost of untold misery for women, children, and men.

We decided it was time for J4MB to publicly challenge Theresa May over this truly evil initiative. Our letter to her is here, and we look forward to her response. We also sent copies of the letter to all 11 members of the Home Affairs Committee, which includes MPs from all the main parties. Its job is to hold the Home Secretary and her staff to account.

Reeva Steenkamp: just a chapter in a scary story? No!

Herbert Purdy · 16 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Editor's note: The world has been watching the sensational trial of Oscar Pistorius, a leading South African runner who won attention as an athlete with a disability competing at a high level, including at multiple Paralympic Games and the 2012 Summer Olympics. Reeva Steenkamp, a model, was his girlfriend. In the early morning of Thursday, 14 February 2013, Steenkamp was shot and killed by Pistorius at his Pretoria home. Pistorius acknowledged that he shot Steenkamp, but said that he mistook her for an intruder. He was taken into police custody and was formally charged with murder on 15 February 2013. The incident has created a media feeding frenzy around the world, including the inevitable spin by feminists. -PW

On the 14th September 2014, Joan Smith published this article in The Independent newspaper, which she opened by saying:

> '[Oscar] Pistorius is already on his way to rehabilitation in a country where three women a day are killed by a husband or boyfriend.'

Claiming (falsely, as anyone who has followed the case knows) that the world's media reported the case uncritically because Pistorius is a personality (for which read 'man' personality) she purports to place the case in the context of domestic violence, posing the rhetorical question, '…why did no fewer than 1,024 South African men kill their current or former partners in 2009? This is not a country, in other words, where such events are rare. A woman is killed by a husband or boyfriend every eight hours.'

Reeva Steenkamp was not the victim of domestic violence. She was a tragic victim – period. Her mother and father have shown enormous dignity throughout. Their loss must be incomprehensible to them. Yet they show no malice toward Pistorius.

Smith's article, reeking as it does with shameless feminist bigotry in this most tragic of human experiences, is reprehensible. Any reading of it reveals her agenda, which is standard feminist-speak, straight out of the manual as written by the likes of Women's Aid, Refuge, and a host of others in the domestic violence industry – both here in Britain and in North America. God help us all if women, or men with her ideology colonise the ranks or our judiciary.

Joan Smith is, like all women of her type, a radical feminist with an axe to grind about domestic violence. She is engaged in trying to paint men as violent, wife-beating, murdering, short-fused creatures who -by clear association with Africa- are little better than savages in need of draconian treatment under the law in order to civilise them.

She is irresponsibly promulgating the standard feminist lie that seeks to pathologise maleness, thus underlining the argument-by-assertion that intimate partner violence is all one way – men to women. The truth, of course, is that women are as physically aggressive towards intimate partners as men, or more aggressive: there is a now wealth of unimpeachable research worldwide that proves this.[1]

There is a sweet irony as far as Ms. Smith and her feminist fellow travellers are concerned, however, which is that the judge in the Oscar Pistorius case is a woman. It doesn't take much of a stretch of imagination to conjure up the shriek of self-righteous sophistry that would have flowed from Smith's scribblings had it been a man making the same decisions.

I am sure this woman will hand down an appropriate, measured, just sentence to Oscar Pistorius: one that properly fits the crime of which he was fairly judged to be guilty after the fullest exploration of the evidence (at the hands of two eminent lawyers – men – neither of whom pulled any punches when trying the evidence, despite the fact that the defendant was a man).

What is more, Thokozile Masipa, the judge in question, is a woman from Soweto: that black African township whose name resonates everywhere in the world as a the scene of one of the worst excesses of apartheid (amongst many). For this woman to have been appointed judge in this case was a brave and wise judicial decision, and it was almost certainly made by a man, and probably a white man. I am sure Nelson Mandela would have entirely approved. In a country like South Africa this was a masterstroke of deep wisdom, worthy of everything he as a man stood for.

The appointment of Thokozile Masipa was an act of supreme judgement in itself, worth of anything Nelson Mandela would have done.

Under his deeply human, male leadership, and that of three other men, FW deKlerk, Desmond Tutu and before them Albert Lutuli – all Nobel Peace Prize winners – the men and women of South Africa were able to transition from totalitarian fascism to democracy peacefully with themselves, their homes, their jobs, their children, their lives, and their nation, intact.

Those men not only preached peace, but practised it too. Those men, using their male authority based on charisma not power, steered that nation through to peaceful democracy, in the most astonishing transition of political power every seen in history. Those men's actions stood in start contrast to, for example, Winnie Mandela, who was well up for a bloodbath.

Without Mandela as national patriarch, deKlerk as a political patriarch, Tutu as church patriarch, and Lutuli, a tribal chieftain and quintessential patriarch, South Africa would have been destroyed in a sea of blood. Those men's leadership was crucial.

They, and many other men in that predominantly male-run society at the time, took a nation from the brink of the abyss to where it is now: from fascism to democracy under the rule of just law. And they created a social climate that made possible the trial of a young white man, a national hero, severely disabled, who had triumphed over his infirmity to become an Olympic champion, even competing on level terms with able-bodied athletes, and had made his nation proud – by a black woman.

What unfolded in that courtroom in Johannesburg showed the entire world just how far South Africa has come since the fall of apartheid. I believe it will be seen as a pivotal moment in that nation's long walk to freedom. It was South Africa finally coming of age. And yet, it is a nation that still maintains that women are as important to its future, as they were, along with their men, to its past.

Thokozile Masipa is an able and eminent lawyer, the child of a township, a woman, yet she was able to achieve her fullest potential as a woman in an allegedly male-dominated society, and she was appropriately appointed to judge perhaps the most high profile case, and potentially the most socially contentious one, since her new nation was formed.

Then she, in her turn, displaying the most magnificent calm integrity, balance, intelligence and dedication to her task dispensed her proud nation's justice in a way that perhaps only a woman could. In a deeply complex trial of a white man accused of killing a white woman, charged with enormous potential for racial and social tension, and under the forensic attention of the world's press, this black woman showed not the slightest racial or personal prejudice, no emotional angst, no impatience – no feminism – just diligent, honourable authority, and total dedication to duty. Now, that is what I call a real woman.

The entire exercise was nothing short of a triumph for civilised people, which showed up the women of South Africa in their true light, and which showed up the women such as Smith for what they are: snide, narrow, prejudiced child-women, with no vision, no generosity of spirit, no balance, no dignity, and full of raging bigotry against men. Feminists talk about the need for role models for girls in Britain today. They should look south, to real women, South African women, not to their own cardboard cut-out feminist caricatures.

Joan Smith can snipe at South Africa all she likes. She can disagree with judge Masipa's verdict all she likes, that is her right – as is her right to free speech, but she needs to check her prejudices. Her article is a work of malicious feminist bitchiness. Nobody who watched the unfolding of justice under that woman judge last week could be in any doubt that justice was not only done but seen to be done in the Pistorius case. Smith not only demeans herself and her newspaper, she presumptuously demeans a proud nation that is rightly proud, because it has achieved so much, even if it is a so-called 'man's world'.

I know South Africa, I have been there. South African men and women still know who they are, and both sexes carry themselves with the dignity of their gender. It is a normal world – a balanced world, at least as far as gender is concerned – still relatively untouched by the pernicious poison of feminism, and it is a world of equality of opportunity. Men there actually do respect women, and women respect men. It is all a far cry from Britain in the 21st century where respect for men is virtually non-existent.

When you compare South Africa with 21st century Britain, you see the contrast. You see the inestimable damage feminism has done to us. You see men and boys, who are being vilified, their maleness pathologised in our schools and mocked in our media. You see narrow, vindictive, bigoted women, like Joan Smith, who write with signal lack of generosity of spirit, let alone journalistic integrity or intellectual judgement, sitting in judgement on men, even men in other nations: measuring them through their own narrow social and ideological constructs, as though those constructs are superior when, in fact they are not.

Frankly, I think South Africa shows Britain up. Certainly Thokozile Masiba shows up the likes of Smith who so nakedly promulgates her own form of apartheid: that of women over men – one group seeking privilege over another without respect or regard for their basic humanity. Britain has a lot further to go in sorting out its own brand of cultural apartheid – feminism – than South Africa does.

Reference:

[1] Fiebert M S (2013) References Examining Assaults by Women on Their Spouses or Male Partners: An Updated Annotated Bibliography. Published online: 19 June 2013. Springer Science+Business Media New York 2013

Dr T dropkicks white knight right off his horsey

AVfM Video Source · 17 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You do visit shrink4men.com, don't you?

Children need their fathers

AVfM Video Source · 17 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We suppose radical “gender is a social construct” ideologues will explode in rage at the use of “masculine” and “feminine” here, and Social Justice Warriors will fly into a rage at the whole idea that fathers are necessary to children’s well-being.

We’d say that’s a good reason to subscribe to BASSFZz ourselves.

Winnie the Pooh, John the Baptist, tonsils, appendix, and foreskin

Patricia Robinett · 17 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

What do Winnie-the-Pooh and John the Baptist have in common? (For your answer, see footnote 1.)

What do the tonsils and appendix have in common? Cutting both the tonsils and appendixes out of children was high fashion in the 1950s and 1960s. If a child had a history of too many sore throats, tonsils and adenoids were removed. If a child had a sore abdomen, the appendix was removed. “If in doubt, cut it out.” Tonsils and appendixes usually were removed because they were considered to be diseased. Sometimes, however, they were removed to prevent them from becoming diseased. People figured nature had made a careless error when adding tonsils and appendix to an otherwise brilliant machine.

Then it was discovered that the tonsils and appendix have important functions. It was discovered that they contribute to the valuable human immune system. A huge number of children who are now adults lost important parts of their bodies due to lack of knowledge and wisdom on the part of the medical profession. Tonsils and appendixes are now removed only in severe medical conditions.

Nature was vindicated. Fashion changed and American doctors no longer routinely performed tonsillectomies and appendectomies. Good riddance!

In the Victorian age, when puritanical values ruled, people thought it was risqué to show an ankle and pornography was hard to come by. No good American dared to speak of the penis or its foreskin except in hushed tones to a medical doctor. Doctors claimed they had found the solution to masturbation. They then declared that masturbation was the cause of a plethora of diseases. They began a war on male and female genitalia—healthy genitalia.

In 1888, John Harvey Kellogg, M.D., inventor of Kellogg’s Corn Flakes, wrote in his “Treatment for Self-Abuse and its Effects”:

> A remedy [for masturbation] which is almost always successful in small boys is circumcision … the operation should be performed by a surgeon without administering an anesthetic, as the brief pain attending the operation will have a salutary effect upon the mind, especially if it be connected with the idea of punishment, as it may well be in some cases. The soreness which continues for several weeks interrupts the practice [masturbation], and if it had not previously become so firmly fixed, it may be forgotten and not resumed. If any attempt is made to watch the child, he should be so carefully surrounded by vigilance that he cannot possibly transgress without detection. If he is only partially watched, he soon learns to elude observation, and thus the effect is only to make him more cunning in his vice. (See footnote 2.)

In short, “Let’s discourage masturbation/pleasure with pain.” Circumcision has been a cruel and unsuccessful experiment. We now know full well that it didn’t work. One survey shows that men without foreskins masturbate more frequently and participate in more dangerous sexual activities (oral and anal) than those with foreskins. And yet both the good Doctor Kellogg’s cruel circumcision recommendation—and breakfast cereal—“stuck” in the public’s mind.

After the fear of masturbation became a less compelling reason to cut children’s private parts, the medical industry would still not let go of the practice, as it was so profitable. Since Kellogg’s time, claim after claim, excuse after excuse has contributed to holding the circumcision door open, In the 1970s, nearly every boy in America lost his foreskin. Unfortunately, most trusting American parents are glued to the “circumcision is good for you” sales pitch. They think of circumcision as a surgical panacea for what ails you. In truth, each and every attempt to justify the routine circumcision of infants has been disproved and discarded. Still, they test the waters, blaming every possible physical, mental, and emotional aberration on genitals as nature made them.

Doctors continue to circumcise little babies for a few main reasons:

- They are businesspeople who have bills to pay and circumcision is a quick, easy buck.
- They have not yet been educated in the important functions of the foreskin.
- They haven't yet realized their legal liability. The American Medical Association (AMA) has warned its members to "take the high road of ethics," but it has not yet been specific enough to warn them of the dangers of this simple, profitable, profoundly abusive procedure.
- They have not listened to their patients (the babies) or their own hearts, as they scream, "No!" at the top of their lungs.

Tonsils and appendices were finally determined to have important immune system functions, so they are now usually spared the knife. But foreskins are still routinely removed, even though they are healthy human tissue. Studies by Taylor and Cold reveal that the foreskin also provides important immune system functions. Perhaps there's hope for the foreskin yet.

In the meanwhile, parents might want to practice saying, "Thank you, but no thank you" to all their friends, family members, and medical personnel. And once the foreskin has been saved from the human tissue sales industry, explain to the doctor that it's not okay to retract the foreskin—Let Junior do that for himself, in his own time. Explain kindly that foreskin retraction is malpractice and should be pursued as such if the M.D. or nurse manages to do the deed. What is it about these people and babies' genitals?

Footnotes:

1. What do Winnie-the-Pooh and John the Baptist have in common? They have the same middle name.

2. Kellogg, John Harvey. Plain Facts for old and young: Embracing the natural history and hygiene of organic life. I.F. Senger & Co., Burlington, Iowa, 1891, p.111.

A question of respect

Hannah Wallen · 17 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

A question I heard out of context today kind of crystallized for me an aspect of the #GamerGate controversy, multiple men's issues, and the difference in public response to incidents of domestic violence among famous people depending on whether the perceived perpetrator is male or female. Standing in a convenience store, listening to a woman complain about a man smelling like smoke, I groaned inwardly as she landed on what seems to have become an old standby for gals with something to complain about.

"What's the matter with that guy? Doesn't he respect women?"

Most of the time, when I hear that line, the woman saying it is using the word respect when she really means venerate.

Once upon a time, there was a tradeoff under which women earned special treatment. It was contingent on eschewing rough behaviors like heavy drinking, fighting, and sexual promiscuity. Women were presumed morally superior, and expected to live up to that. They were presumed gentler than men, and expected to live up to that as well. Even feminine aesthetics were about being something more special than a man, which is why women were and still are allowed the luxury of wearing clothing that restricts one's ability to perform heavy or hard labor. In return for living up to those standards, women were entitled to certain concessions not afforded to men. They could display more delicate sensibilities, such as offense at rough language or crude subject matter, and expect their aversions to be indulged. They could expect exemption from some of life's responsibilities, like supporting a family or even themselves. It was not just a gentleman's responsibility but his honor to assist a woman in need, and doing harm to a woman was taboo for any man. Women who lived up to the moral and social standards associated with their traditional role were considered respectable in a way that deserved veneration; men who lived up to theirs revered them.

The reverence that women today so loudly and crassly demand in the name of "respect" is not earned under such an arrangement. Sixty years of feminist protesting has freed women from the constraints of social obligation, allowing us to, without expecting judgment for it, become as crass, as violent, and as sexually promiscuous as men, and in many cases, more. Feminists fought for this under the guise of equality, demanding society acknowledge not only equality of rights and human value but capability and toughness. Feminists fought to free women from our side of the bargain, yet what do we hear from them the moment a man's equal treatment of a woman means she is no longer indulged or exempted as before? "What's wrong with that guy? Doesn't he respect women?"

What does that have to do with #GamerGate? Well, it began with women complaining of a lack of equal treatment and ended up with a massive shaming campaign wherein women and their supporters drew on traditionally unequal standards to try to shame gamers into giving them special treatment; exempting the women central to the controversy from criticism they would be expected to face and address if they were men. Both the women and the media substituted a demand for veneration of women, requiring subjugation of male gamers' concerns where an open dialogue was needed.

How is that respect for anyone?

You can see the same treatment in various issues discussed by the men's rights community. Bring up equal parenting rights and women's groups shout down arguments in favor by demonizing fathers without evidence, calling them deadbeats and abusers. Try to apply fact and reason to a discussion about the wage gap and the misogyny card is immediately thrown down. In the face of impending equal treatment, women's groups defend gender disparity in likelihood of arrest, in chance of a conviction, in criminal sentencing, and in length and type of sentence served in cases where men and women commit the same crimes. Even in an area that should be a no-brainer, involuntary underage genital cutting, women's groups defend girls' bodily autonomy, demanding total elimination of the tradition while supporting the use of it on infant boys. This, with no better reason than those given for the use of it on girls.

The same groups that claim physical equality in their arguments for equal pay reverse themselves when the discussion turns to intimate partner and sexual violence. Abuse is abuse, unless a woman is the perpetrator and a man is the victim. A man must treat a woman the same as he would another man … unless she assaults him. Then, he owes her the special treatment of not defending himself as he would against another man. She is to be coddled like an unruly child. Though we're equal when women's advocates are demanding an equal share of life's rewards, when confronting life's rough side, we're not at all equal. Suddenly, women are inferior, not only too weak to back up their display of temper with a strong assault but also too stupid to acknowledge that by keeping their fists to themselves. Which message should women buy into? Are we strong and smart enough to earn the same pay as roughnecks and loggers, scientists and engineers, or are we too weak to defend ourselves yet too stupid to refrain from picking fights with men anyway? Do feminists and other social justice warriors think women aren't savvy enough to notice that contradiction?

This indicates to me that women's outrage is badly misdirected. It isn't men's attitudes that need to be examined, but those of feminists and other social justice warriors who play the misogyny card to deflect attempts to hold women to the same standards and expectations faced by men. That behavior is not indicative of very much faith in their supposed charges.

Hey, feminists and SJWs! What's wrong with you guys! Don't you respect women?

Pauley Perrette busted with leaked 911 call then goes apeshit on whistleblower

AVfM Video Source · 18 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Restraining order queen Pauley Perrette told a court that she and her boyfriend were assailed by a wild, phone camera wielding Francis Shivers as she and her BF sat enjoying sushi. Shivers maintains he was first threatened by said BF and produced his camera phone to document the attack on him.

The following leaked 911 call from Perrette herself backs Shivers, as she first tells the emergency operator that Shivers produced the camera phone AFTER her BF rose to challenge him. Then she goes, Uh oh, no, uh, he had the phone out first, for realz!

After the leak was first published online at GotNews.com, Perrette sent an emotional damsel demand though Twitter:

[image]

Apparently only motherless atheists would believe that Perrette is the real stalker here. Well, there are also people who can read and think:

http://www.avoiceformen.com/?s=Pauley+perrette

Here is the 911 call. We will leave it to you motherless, godless bastids to choose for yourselves.

Women never fake injuries or hurt themselves for revenge

AVfM Video Source · 18 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Remember, this never happens:

You think we're paranoid when we say Always Be Recording, gentlemen?

Ashli Howell fans old flames on Kennesaw State University

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 18 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

KSU Men (KSUM) got first page treatment in The Sentinel, the Kennesaw State University (KSU) school paper. Staff writer Sierra Hubbard confirms that the SPLC allegation that AVfM is a hate group is false, and treats KSU Men's position with refreshing objectivity. My sincerest thanks go out to Sierra and The Sentinel for featuring such balanced reporting, since journalistic integrity is frighteningly scarce.

Sierra's piece was followed by a more expected editorial by Ashli Howell, who rehashes talking points on how both KSUM and AVfM are 1940s-reminiscent rape dungeons operated by white men and greased with the blood of the innocent.

A Jessica Fisher has also publicly announced her intention to protest Male Students in Peril in a comment.

[image]

We've seen what happens when feminists protest [1][2][3][4], which is why security has been alerted to the potential for disruption at the conference long in advance. Protesters are welcome to attend, and they are welcome to protest pursuant to their First Amendment rights in a way that is not disruptive of the conference.
However, people all over the world have put good money in the conference, so hysterical thugs will be viewed as members of the Please Handcuff Me Coalition. Everyone deserves to have an enlightening, pleasurable experience. Those who aim to harm or disrupt with be promptly escorted out of the venue, regardless of their convictions.

Jessica, we welcome open minds and questions, not accusations. You can RSVP 100% free on Eventbrite and get time to ask whatever question you like of the speakers. Personally I'm not sure why a protest is necessary, but who am I to tell you what to do? Hell, KSU even has a spot right outside the Student Center on the campus green dedicated to public demonstrations.

Have fun.

So that's Jessica, on to Ashli Howell:

> I first became aware of KSU Men after seeing a few posters around campus and decided to look into it.

Ashli, I do not recall you attending a KSUM meeting. If you did, you certainly have not contacted KSUM staff with questions for the purposes of this piece.

> Here's what I found after hours of watching videos on Sage Gerard's YouTube channel, which is under the name Victor Zen and researching the men's rights movement: it appears to have some valid points. However, bringing awareness and discussing these issues is not the goal of KSU Men.

Your curiously absent sources non-withstanding, you have no authority to speak for us about our goals. KSUM has men and women in membership, and it is selfish to gloss over their thoughts and feelings. KSUM is feeding the homeless and pushing for equitable campus programs. Saying that we do nothing is really disrespectful to the people who work hard here.

> While researching the men's rights movement, there was no shortage of feminist vitriol, there was a lot of discussions on the A Voice for Men discussion board about the friend zone, and there was very little about any issue concerning men's rights.

At the time of this writing, the AVfM forums have 11,364 threads on international events, entertainment, philosophy, and more. The current figure can be found near the bottom of the main forum page. Apparently all you got was “a lot of discussions” on the friend zone, and I don’t recall seeing that many after moderating that forum for several months.

I did a search for “friend zone” (without quotes) and got 36 threads (that, like the total thread count, may have grown since this article’s publication). If we assume for simplicity’s sake that is all the friend zone discussion on the AVfM discussion board, then you get that that friend zone threads make up 0.003% of the board. Even if you could find something objectionable in those threads, they were started by “lots” of people who do not represent AVfM or the men’s movement anyway.

> It seems to me that the men’s rights movement is not trying to advance any concerns they have, but to degrade and discredit feminists at any opportunity.

Imagine a movement that established a precedent resulting in countless disconnected mothers who love their kids, simply by asserting that a child needs to be with the father. That same movement has been caught, on camera, violently abusing women sexually, verbally and physically, while calling for blood any time a woman even defends herself. This movement spreads lie after lie after lie about the statistics of victimization of sexual abuse, assault and more, hiding anything bad that happens to women to support their hysterical narrative of female privilege and oppression. They say through the WHO that 1 in 3 men are victims of sexual assault, while manipulating definitions to exclude women. They make up claims like “Men do 2/3rds of the world’s work for 10% of the income and own 1% of the world’s property,” paste random women’s names on posters reading “Rapist of the Month, ” and burn books. They encourage reducing the female population as a form of “decontamination,” ideally to 10% of the human population. They defend legal definitions that suggest only women can be rapists, and say that women are responsible for ending all rapes that happen to men. They yell at women to “Shut the fuck up” when women try to peacefully attend a talk, then pull a fire alarm when they don’t get their way. They run screaming and topless at female politicians. And when other men criticize this movement, the movement pretends those men don’t exist, or takes credit for their existence as free thinkers.

Now imagine that a man in that movement (who has done nothing to stop this insanity) protrudes his bottom lip and burps No-True-Scotsmans like:

> We care about equality, and the women who don’t like it just need to get laid. Yes there are extremists, but women just want to attack and blame men. They don’t actually care about their own rights, or themselves.

What would you think about a movement like that?

I’d say that movement is run by psychos and the idiots who enable them.

Now what if I told you all of those things have been done, by feminists, to men? Flip the words “women” and “men” in the big paragraph above and you get a picture of reality, supported by the links. Saying that you are the real feminist who really believes in real equality is a cowardly cop-out.

For some reason, feminism is immune to criticism. Perhaps because feminism has infected academia, causing cross-eyed “peace studies” professors to write articles about each other’s articles until their insanity looks plausible? Or maybe it’s because blind followers of feminism are so used to prevaricating that they don’t know how to handle accountability.

No one here is blaming all of feminism for all problems happening to men. But feminism is a highly corrupt dogma based on the hysterical lies of manipulative, vindictive pundits and the gullible oafs who love them. There is nothing wrong with men and women with thoughts and feelings calling bullshit on that mess. While men’s rights advocacy is not necessarily the same as anti-feminism, men’s rights advocacy cannot be performed without accepting some hard truths about feminism that feminists don’t want to hear.

#WomenAgainstFeminism, A Voice for Men, the National Coalition for Men, A Voice for Male Students,

GirlWritesWhat, The Honey Badger Brigade, KSU Men, Men's Rights Edmonton, Men's Rights Sydney, Men's Rights Ireland, J4MB and countless other individuals and organizations have popped up precisely because we are sick of this shit, we're sick of the ignorance and fear you propagate, and for the love of god, we want change.

If feminism was a movement run primarily by men for men's rights, it would have been cast as a terrorist group long ago. Many of us aren't nice to feminists because feminists abused us, and we don't care how we sound anymore.

[image]
Sage Gerard and KSUM Secretary Stacy Evans in a meeting
I proudly denounce feminism. I'm okay with women because they are human and therefore not particularly special, just like men. Women are not the same thing as feminism, and feminism as an institution does not act in a manner consistent with its purported goals. This is not speculation, it's verifiable fact, and the "real feminists" are too sparse to clean the mess.

> The second problem I have with the movement is the shock value it often uses to gain attention. The founder of A Voice for Men, Paul Elam, which funded KSU Men, said, "In the most severe and emphatic terms possible the answer is no, they're not asking to get raped. They are freaking begging for it…near demanding it. And all the outraged PC demands to get huffy and point out how nothing justifies or excuses rape won't change the fact that there are a lot of women who get pummeled and pumped because they are stupid (and often arrogant) enough to walk through life with the equivalent of a I'm a stupid, conniving b*itch – please rape me neon sign glowing above their empty little narcissistic heads."

I just did your job by asking Paul to elaborate on the context you ignored (His email is not hard to find). Here's his response:

> It was a piece of satire posted and removed a long time ago. It was a provocative attack on the issue of "victim blaming" whereby feminists react to any insinuation that women should take precautions and use good judgement to reduce the probablility (sic) of violent crime as though it is unfairly putting the onus on victims. I said it in the same light as one might say that leaving your car running and unlocked in a grocery store parking lot was "begging to get your car stolen," which is an expression that would raise very few eyebrows, even though it matches perfectly with the idea of not getting sloshed and getting into a car with a stranger as a good judgement call to reduce the chances of something bad, like rape, happening to you.

Feel free to ignore or twist that too, but it's only fair that context is provided. Let's go back to Ashli's yammering:

> This statement, admittedly, was incredibly shocking. It was also exactly what Paul Elam aimed to do. He has said that the Voice for Men movement does not actually believe those things and was just saying them for shock value.

When you live in a society that, by default, thinks you (as an innocent person) are actually evil and oppressive, you get tired of sitting in polite compliance.

> […] it merely infuriated most sane women.

Did you talk to the women of AVfM? How about #WomenAgainstFeminism? Or the women of the men's movement in general? Have you talked to any of these women? I think they would be thrilled to know how insane they are.

Face facts: You ignored well over 99% of AVfM's content and cherry-picked what fits some delusional fantasy of calling yourself egalitarian and accusing everyone who disagrees with you of hate. And you stepped on other women to make that point.

> It also landed A Voice for Men on the Southern Poverty Law Center Misogyny sites list, further detracting from any issues it wants to address.

A staff writer in your publication found that was bullshit. There is a reason her piece is in News and yours is in Commentary.

> They believe that because you are pro-woman, you must be anti-man.

KSUM never took issue with organizations like Kennesaw Women in Mathematics because we didn't find their pro-woman advocacy to be objectionable given what we've seen so far. You need to prove when and where the Official Grand Patriarch of the Men's Rights Movement™® explicitly stated that "if you are pro-woman, you must be anti-man." Until then, your words are speculation.

> [If] there is to be any meaningful discussion about the concerns that groups like KSU Men have, the hate has got to stop.

What hatred have you found KSUM committing as an organization? Again, I see us feeding the homeless and pushing for equity. There's criticism of feminism, yes, but criticism is not hate. You may see it as hate, but that's like, your opinion, man.

> And yes, extreme feminists that bathe in the tears of men have some blame here too […]

I'll ask you the same question I asked the other zealot: Where were you?

Where were you when KSUM was trying to secure a more gender-equitable narrative in RAD Systems? Where were you when I was passed an accusatory note by a feminist on this campus?

Right now I see empty words from an empty head with an empty resume, with empty support from empty people who want everyone else to be equally empty. You show up only when you see an opportunity to push your brand name, without substantiating any of your political fluff with action or experience.

This is why KSUM needs to exist, and why anyone with an open mind should come to the Male Students in Peril conference on November 1st.

Again, it's completely free. All you have to do is RSVP and show up.

In my mind, egalitarians give new ideas an equal chance.

Will you do so?

NISVS 2011 released: Increased male victimization and rape is still not rape

Tamen Roe · 18 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On September 5, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) released a report that summarizes data from the second year of data collection from the National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NISVS). They've also released a fact sheet for the NISVS 2011 data. The NISVS 2010 Summary Report, which I've written several blog posts about, reported on data collected during 2010, while this one reports on data collected in 2011.

Rape Is Still Not Rape

"Being made to penetrate" still isn't defined as rape or a subcategory of rape in this latest report, despite the CDC's homepage still defining rape as (my emphasis):

> a completed nonconsensual sex act (i.e., rape)

A completed nonconsensual sex act (in other words, rape).

A completed sex act is defined as:

> contact between the penis and the vulva or the penis and the anus involving penetration, however slight; contact between the mouth and penis, vulva, or anus; or penetration of the anal or genital opening of another person by a hand, finger, or other object.

Despite the CDC stressing the importance of using a consistent definition, they are still deviating from their definition in the NISVS reports.

Comparison of Findings for Rape and "Being Made to Penetrate"

Victims	Victimization	Lifetime numbers			Last 12 months
		NISVS 2010	NISVS 2011	Δ	NISVS 2010	NISVS 2011	Δ
Men	Rape	1.6%	1.7%	0.1	–	–	–
Women	Rape	18.3%	19.3%	1	1.1%	1.6%	0.5
Men	Being made to penetrate	4.8%	6.7%	1.9	1.1%	1.7%	0.6
Women	Being made to penetrate	–	0.6%	0.6	–	–	–

Sources: Tables 2.1 and 2.2 in NISVS 2010 and Table 1 in NISVS 2011.

The high numbers for male victims of "being made to penetrate" clearly weren't a fluke for the 2010 period as some have suggested when dismissing the finding that 1.1% of men have been made to penetrate someone else during 2010. What we have is a sharp (~50%) increase of up to 1.7% of men having been made to penetrate someone else during 2011.

Comparison of Findings for Perpetrators of Rape and "Being Made to Penetrate" (Lifetime)

Victims	Victimization	Female perpetrator			Male perpetrator
		NISVS 2010	NISVS 2011	Δ	NISVS 2010	NISVS 2011	Δ
Men	Rape	6.7%	20.7%	14.0	93.3%	79.3%	-14.0
Women	Rape	1.9%	1.0%	-0.9	98.1%	99.0%	0.9
Men	Being made to penetrate	79.2%	82.6%	3.4	20.8%	17.4%	-3.4
Women	Being made to penetrate	–	–	–	–	–	–

Numbers in black are those given by the NISVS reports, while I have calculated those in red (assuming that non-male perpetrators are female and that non-female perpetrators are male).

Sources: NISVS 2010 (page 24) and NISVS 2011 (pages 5-6).

Here we see a pretty large increase in the ratio of female perpetrators against men and a smaller increase in the ratio of male perpetrators against women.

Impact on Prevention Efforts

So, we have an increase in the number of male victims and an increase in male victims who report female perpetrators. I wonder what the latest report says about prevention efforts?

> Prevention efforts should take into consideration that female sexual violence and stalking victimization is predominately perpetrated by men and that a substantial proportion of male sexual violence and stalking victimization (rape, unwanted sexual contact, noncontact unwanted sexual experiences, and stalking) also is perpetrated by men.

No mention at all about any prevention efforts toward female perpetrators.

The “made to penetrate” and “sexual coercion” categories that both have predominately (>80%) female perpetrators reported by male victims are conveniently left out from the considerations that prevention efforts should take.

I am getting the distinct impression that the CDC clearly doesn’t give a shit about male victims of female perpetrators.

Questioning the Numbers from the Last 12 Months: Telescoping

This time, the CDC addresses the numbers from the last 12 months in a general way. They state:

> Fourth, self-reported data are vulnerable to recall bias because respondents might believe that events occurred closer in time than they did in actuality (i.e., telescoping), and this type of bias might particularly affect 12-month prevalence estimates.

This sounds like an attempt at downplaying the high victimization rates in the last 12 months—in particular for male victims. The CDC did not have any problems with referring to the “last 12 months” numbers for female rape victimization in their fact sheet.

The CDC, however, are also imprecise in their use of the term telescoping, even though they really should know better. Telescoping not only includes forward-telescoping (which is what the CDC describes above), but it also includes backward-telescoping, which is when people think an event occurred further back in time than it did in actuality. Events older than three years tend to be backward-telescoped, while events more recent than three years tend to be forward-telescoped. Women are less likely to telescope (backward and forward) for some subject matters, while men are less likely for other subject matters. I haven’t been able to find any research into gender differences into telescoping (forward or backward) on the subject matter of sexual abuse victimization.

The CDC have done some right things in order to minimize the telescoping effect: using a clearly delimited time period (last 12 months) in the question as well as asking specific questions are points mentioned as methods to minimize telescoping.

Smith, William, and Marie Torstensson reported the following in their 1997 paper: "Gender Differences in Risk Perception and Neutralizing Fear of Crime," British Journal of Criminology 37(4): 608–34:

> According to 'reverse record checks' (surveys of people known in official records to have been victimized), surveys underestimate the actual experience of physical force. While there is some exaggeration of victimization in the past year because respondents 'forward telescope' their answers (e.g., recall events that occurred more than a year ago as having occurred within the past year), there is more non-recall or 'failure to reveal' than forward telescoping. […] In summary, the combination of non-recall and backwards telescoping of assault is more common than forward telescoping.

Neither non-recall, "failure to reveal," nor backward-telescoping and how any of them may affect the NISVS findings is mentioned by the CDC.

Impact of Violence

The NISVS 2011 Summary Report states:

> Consistent with previous studies, the overall pattern of results suggest that women, in particular, are heavily impacted over their lifetime. However, the results indicate that many men also experience sexual violence, stalking and, in particular, physical violence by an intimate partner. Although there are relatively smaller differences in the overall prevalence of physical violence by an intimate partner when comparing women and men, there is greater differentiation between women and men in terms of the prevalence of negative intimate partner violence–related impact. This suggests the need to look beyond the overall prevalence estimates when comparing the total burden of men's and women's intimate partner violence victimization.

One contributing factor for the difference in impact of sexual violence between men and women is the fact that one or two of the 13 categories of impact of violence were only asked of women.

The survey asked only women if the sexual violence resulted in a pregnancy. As we have seen in a recent case, there certainly is a potential for a negative impact for the male victim if a child is conceived as a result of them "being made to penetrate."

According to Figure 2 in the NISVS 2011 Summary Report, the question of whether the victim contracted any sexually transmitted infections was only asked of women during the 2011 survey. The document containing the questions for the 2011 survey does not include that set of questions, but the questionnaire for the 2010 survey does—and in that questionnaire it seems that both female and male respondents are asked the question about STDs. Figure 2 may have a typographical error or the CDC may have changed the questionnaire even though there is no mention of this change. I lean toward the former, as one would expect them to realize that men are not immune from STDs. Then again, forced vaginal intercourse isn't always rape, according to them.

The Fact Sheet

The fact sheet does not mention male victims of "being made to penetrate" at all, nor does it mention that male victims are predominately victimized by female perpetrators.

Under the heading "Women are disproportionately affected by IPV, SV, and stalking," the following findings are listed:

- Nearly 1 in 5 women (19.3%) and 1 in 59 men (1.7%) have been raped in their lifetime.
- Approximately 1.9 million women were raped during the year preceding the survey.
- One in 4 women (22.3%) have been the victim of severe physical violence by an intimate partner, while 1 in 7 men (14.0%) have experienced the same.
- One in 6 women (15.2%) have been stalked during their lifetime, compared to 1 in 19 men (5.7%).

Their concern for the "last 12 months" numbers didn't prevent them from using the "last 12 months" prevalence number for female rape victimization.

The "being made to penetrate" victimization is nowhere to be seen on the fact sheet, but if victims of "being made to penetrate" were included, we would have bullet points saying:

- 1 in 15 men have been made to penetrate a perpetrator, while 1 in 160 women have been made to penetrate a perpetrator.
- Approximately 1.9 million men were made to penetrate during the year preceding the survey.

If the CDC had categorized "being made to penetrate" as rape or as a subcategory of rape, we would've seen the following bullet points:

- Nearly 1 in 5 women (19.3%) and 1 in 15 men (6.7%) have been raped in their lifetime (lowest estimate); or
- 1 in 5 women (19.9%) and a bit more than 1 in 12 men (8.4%) have been raped in their lifetime (highest estimate).
- Just as many men as women were raped during the year preceding the survey—approximately 3.8 million victims.

Media Impact

Again, we can see that the CDC categorizing "being made to penetrate" as not-rape and how it's excluded from the fact sheet as well as from any statements on impact on prevention efforts is yet again setting the stage for male victimization to be overlooked and ignored.

Here are articles on NISVS 2011 in mainstream media that I found searching Google News at the time of writing this post:

The Washington Post: Male victims of being made to penetrate are completely overlooked. They even erased the category itself when explaining what sexual violence other than rape is:

> Sexual violence other than rape includes sexual coercion, unwanted sexual contact and non-contact unwanted sexual experiences.

Jezebel: Male victims of being made to penetrate are completely overlooked.

Salon: Male victims of being made to penetrate are completely overlooked. They even erased the category itself when listing the other forms of sexual violence CDC looked at:

> The CDC estimates looked not only at "completed forced penetration," but also at other forms of sexual violence including attempted rape, unwanted sexual contact, non-contact unwanted sexual experiences (such as being flashed or forced to view explicit images) and sexual coercion.

New York Magazine: Does mention made to penetrate, although they don't cite the prevalence number (6.7%/1.7%) for that. They do refer that men being made to penetrate reported predominately female perpetrators, although they don't cite the percentage (82.6%).

TIME: No mention of male victims at all.

USNews: Although the article is firmly focused on female victims, they included the chart showing male victimization for all categories as well as the chart showing female victimization.

VOX: The article makes no mention of male victims at all. They do, however, report in their chart that 0.6% of women report having been made to penetrate someone else.

Cosmopolitan UK: Mention male victims of rape and how many men have been victims of some other form of sexual violence, including unwanted sexual contact.

The Wire: Mention male victims of rape and how many men have been victims of some other form of sexual violence apart

Most articles focus on female victimization and only mention male victimization as far as the CDC has mentioned it on the fact sheet. I couldn't find any articles questioning the CDC categorizing "being made to penetrate" as not-rape.

Minor Changes in Methodology Between NISVS 2010 and NISVS 2011

I'll just wrap this post up with a minor point about some minor changes in the latest survey's methodology. The CDC stated that some questions that combined several acts were split into two. For instance, the question asking whether the victim was made to put their mouth on another person's (if male: penis, if female: vagina) or anus was split into one question asking whether the victim was made to put their mouth on another person's (if male: penis, if female: vagina) and a separate question asking whether the victim was made to put their mouth on another person's anus.

Based on what I've read, more explicit questions increase accuracy and reduce telescoping.

The questionnaire for 2010 can be found in this MS Word document titled: "2011 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Surveillance System – Revised Study Questionnaire (October 18, 2010)."

The questionnaire for 2011 can be found in this PDF document titled: "National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NISVS) 2011 Victimization Questions," which can be downloaded from this page on the CDC website.

In His or Her Own Words: Request for men's (and women's) experiences with female-perpetrated domestic violence

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 18 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

October is almost here and that means it's Domestic Violence (DV) Awareness month. Since most women's domestic violence organizations not only conveniently neglect to include men who are targets of intimate partner violence, but also deliberately misinform the public about the true nature of DV, Shrink4Men and A Voice for Men will join forces once again to shed light on the other 50% of domestic violence victims:

Men.

While men comprise half of all domestic violence victims, there is currently only one Domestic Violence shelter in the US that regularly accepts men seeking safety from their abusers (the Valley Oasis Shelter in Antelope, CA). Meanwhile, there are approximately 1,800 shelters available to women and their children nationwide.

To the best of our knowledge, there are no court advocacy programs for male victims of domestic violence. Men (and their children) are not eligible for state and federal stipends for safe housing from their female abusers. There are no free or subsidized counseling programs nor are there free legal services/legal aid for male victims of domestic violence.

Male domestic violence victims are not protected under the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). If anything, this unconstitutional legislature does great harm to male DV victims by demonizing men as perpetrators and women as victims in the majority of domestic violence cases. It also helps to enable the rampant abuse of false allegations and restraining order abuse engaged in by abusive women.

According to RADAR (Respecting Accuracy in Domestic Abuse Reporting), less than 10% of the United States OVW's (Office of Violence Against Women) funding is used to help male victims. A big part of the problem lies in the very names of the OVW and the VAWA. "Violence against women" is exclusionary and ignores half of all domestic violence victims.

The U.S. Department of Justice refuses to fund research about male victims of domestic violence. On page 6 of the DOJ's solicitation for proposals on intimate partner violence and stalking, they have a section that explicitly states what kind of projects they will not fund, including:

> Proposals for research on intimate partner violence against, or stalking of, males of any age.

With the lack of services and funding and the refusal of the DOJ and the CDC to approve and fund research on male victims of domestic violence and sexual assault, many people might come to believe that these issues are not a problem for men and boys.

Not true.

In reality, men are approximately 40% to 50% of domestic violence victims. Sadly, many people are still horribly ignorant about domestic violence in large part due to persistently dishonest and misleading public awareness campaigns, data gathered via unscientific methodology and woozles like the 1 in 4 woozle about rape on college campuses.

Despite the abundance of peer-reviewed research on male domestic violence victims and female perpetrators, most domestic violence awareness campaigns focus exclusively on female victims as if our society isn't already well aware that women can be victims of domestic violence. Many domestic violence organizations persist in publishing long ago debunked statistics that portray women as the victim and men as the primary aggressors in the majority of domestic violence cases.

In His Own Words and In Her Own Words

To raise awareness of male domestic violence victims and female abusers, I will cross- publish an In His Own Words and In Her Own Words on both AVoiceForMen and Shrink4Men everyday in October (if I have the material). These posts will be from men who are or have been victims of domestic violence and women whose husbands, boyfriends, sons, brothers and friends who are victims of female perpetrated violence.

Heterosexual men aren't the only invisible domestic violence victims. The four other populations that are also egregiously ignored are individuals in same sex relationships, the transgendered, the new partners of men with abusive exes as well as family members who have become estranged from their sons, brothers, nephews and grandchildren due to their being involved with an abusive female wife or girlfriend. There is often collateral damage in domestic violence and the DV industry is ignoring the new wives and families of origin of male DV victims as well, so I welcome your stories, too.

If you would like to share your story about female perpetrated domestic violence, please send it toshrink4men@gmail.com. I am looking for written narratives and/or audio or video recordings that describe or illustrate the abuse you have suffered. If you have an audio or video file of your wife, girlfriend, ex, etc., in the midst of an abusive episode, I will publish those as well.

If you would like to join Paul Elam and me on Going Mental (our weekly Google/YouTube podcast on men's mental health issues), you can do that, too. You will need a gmail account and high def camera if you wish to appear on video. It's also okay if, to protect your anonymity, you prefer to use audio only.

If you would like to submit your story, please adhere to the following guidelines:

> 1. Limit written testaments to no more than 2000 words and send as a Microsoft Word Document.
> 2. Use paragraph breaks, spell check, etc.
> 3. Please send video/audio recordings in a format that can be readily uploaded to YouTube.
> 4. If you send and audio/video recording, also provide a written description of the file (i.e., the circumstances leading up to the abuse episode).
> 5. Edit out identifying information before sending Word, video or audio files, unless these incidents are already part of the public record.
> 6. If your abuse case is already a matter of public record (e.g., in a newspaper or online publication), you may use identifying information.
> 7. Use DV SUBMISSION in the subject header of your email.

Due to time constraints, I may not be able to use submissions that require a great deal of editing, so please try to have your materials in the best shape possible before sending.

Additionally, please consider including some of the following in your submissions:Who is or was your abuser? Wife, girlfriend, fiancée, ex, grandmother, mother, sister, grandmother, aunt, etc? If you are a woman submitting an article about the abuse of a partner or family member, please explain the nature of your relationship (e.g., mother, sister, fiancee, new wife/girlfriend, grandmother, aunt, friend, etc.)

> - How long did the abuse go on?
> - What kind of abuse? Emotional, physical, parental alienation, financial, smear campaigns, stalking, false allegations of abuse, sexual, falsely obtained restraining order and other abuse via the courts and law enforcement, etc?
> - When did you realize what you were experiencing was abuse?
> - Did you have difficulty believing you were being abused? If so, why?

> - Did you tell anyone you were being abused? Friends, family, therapist, clergy, police? What was their reaction?
> - If you were physically abused and called the police, what happened? If you did not call the police, why didn't you?
> - What is your message to other men and boys who are being abused or other partners and family members who are in similar situations?

Thank you in advance for helping us support men and their children who are victims of domestic violence.

Kind Regards,

Dr Tara J. Palmatier, PsyD

Why feminists are quiet on Rotherham

Jim Muldoon · 18 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There has been some publicity lately about a report written by Professor Alexis Jay called the "Independent Inquiry into Child Sexual Exploitation in Rotherham." Some of this commentary has been about the lack of commentary from feminists, particularly given that most of the children being exploited were females and that exploitation included rape.

Child sexual exploitation, for those of you not current in the Sacred Babble of Feminism, was once known as child prostitution.

A major reason why feminists are reluctant to comment is that these events happened on their watch.

The report covers the years from 1997 until 2013. From 1997 until 2010, the UK was run by the feminist party of choice: the Labour Party. Under Tony Blair, and later Gordon Brown, the avowed feminists sought to introduce all kinds of measures to protect women and their children (with fathers being clearly an optional extra for the state definition of "family").

Since 2010, the country has been led by a coalition of the Conservatives, led by David Cameron, and the Liberal Democrats, led by Nick Clegg. This coalition has accommodated feminism in a way that would allow the casual onlooker to be unaware that the government had actually changed hands.

At the local level, the feminist-friendly Labour Party enjoyed a majority in the Rotherham Metropolitan Borough Council such that it was practically a one-party-town. From the report:

> The Council comprises 63 elected members, of whom there are 49 Labour, 2 Conservatives, 10 UKIP and 2 Independents. Prior to the local elections in May 2014, there were 57 Labour, 4 Conservatives, 1 UKIP and 1 Independent.

Whatever these children may have lacked, it was not a lack of committees, boards, forums, new laws, and "multi-agency responses."

> Until 2004, responsibility for overseeing and coordinating a multi-agency response to child sexual abuse and exploitation lay with the Area Child Protection Committee. In early 2005, this responsibility passed to the Local Safeguarding Children Board (the Safeguarding Board), which was established by the Children Act 2004.

The new laws didn't end there. The British Home Office released a pamphlet called "Children and Families: Safer from Sexual Crime" to herald the good news of the Sexual Offences Act 2003, which, according to Professor Jay, provided "more specific and explicit wording" to make sure all kinds of sexual exploitation were criminalized.

Yes, and all sorts of groups, agencies, and government departments got funding, funding, and more funding. There were reports, conferences, action plans, and training seminars. Even the police joined the party with Operation Central as well as cooperating with all the aforementioned agencies.

All this and more, driven by feminist academics and feminist bureaucrats.

And while it keeps those feminist academics and bureaucrats funded, and feminist commentators everywhere are sanctimoniously claiming the taxpayers are funding "social justice," many children are still, to this day, being shamelessly exploited by criminal elements right under their feminist noses.

But the feminist laws were not just simply ineffective. Consider this statement from the report:

> In two of the cases we read, fathers tracked down their daughters and tried to remove them from houses where > they were being abused, only to be arrested themselves when police were called to the scene.

The problem for the fathers was that, under British law, they have no rights when it comes to their own children. None whatsoever, thanks to feminist lobbying that goes back to the 1960s. With no rights to discipline their children, parents have all the responsibility of raising their children with no authority at all.

Therefore, when children are seduced by these criminals with booze, drugs, mobile phones, and other cheap but effective tricks, parents are powerless. But it's not just parents who are powerless.

> One parent, who agreed to her child being placed in a residential unit in order to protect her, wrote to children's social care expressing her fears for her daughter's safety. She described her despair that instead of being protected, her child was being exposed to even worse abuse than when she was at home:
>
> "My child (age 13) may appear to be a mature child, yet some of her actions and the risks to which she constantly puts herself are those of a very immature and naïve person. She constantly stays out all night getting drunk, mixing with older mature adults, and refuses to be bound by any rules."

Yes, the state is as guilty as any parent the normally shrill commentariat wish to castigate for letting these children run wild. And it is here where the real difficulty in dealing with these crimes emerges. As long as the children insist they are willing participants, feminist logic (from judges as much as social workers) and feminist laws prevent anyone else from "interfering" in their choices.

And unlike ordinary parents, children already "in care" can't be taken from the state residential unit and put somewhere else "in care." To make matters even worse, these feminist-approved residential units that keep children from their allegedly abusive fathers were, apparently, an excellent recruitment ground for underage prostitutes.

The alleged culprits also present two special problems for feminists. The report is clear that the children are being preyed on by men of predominantly Pakistani origin.

The first problem is ideological. Through the various waves, feminism has always maintained that "Patriarchy" is directly linked to Western society, capitalism, and colonialism. These forces have brought about the gender roles that feminists claim has caused inequality for females. Importantly, feminism declares this unfair because the gender roles are not inherent traits due to biological sex but instead "social constructs" designed to enforce and perpetuate "The Patriarchy."

In most feminist writings, the White heterosexual male is the villain of the saga. Indeed, authors like Nathanson and Young have argued that African Americans and gay men in the USA and Canada often enjoy, in the feminist mind, the status of "honorary women" because of their own victimization.

In British feminism, that status would certainly apply to those of Indian and Pakistani origin given the British history of colonization and their countries' relatively recent (1947) independence. Indeed, this status would have been directly linked to the push to allow such high levels of immigration from those countries.

However, recent feminist-driven moves to target women for aid in Third World countries has seen a change in feminist thought in this regard. To justify this behaviour, "Patriarchy" has to be given a new context. It needs to be seen as something that is inherently male-oriented. Given the chance, males will implement a version of "The Patriarchy" anywhere, anytime. That's why it is endemic in Western society, but also dominant in Third World countries.

The problem here, of course, is that the "social construct" argument bites the dust, and Western society and perhaps even to some extent White males lose something of their demonic status. Hence feminism's overall reluctance to deal with the issue.

The other problem directly related with these alleged perpetrators is something that is close to every influential feminist's heart: funding.

These migrants are really economic refugees. They bring very little with them in their move to Britain. For the Social Justice Warrior, this means there are endless opportunities to portray these people as victims of racial discrimination.

If there are no translation services: racism. If the individuals are not educated: racism. If their qualifications are not recognized: racism. If they can't get a job: racism. If they can't get a house: racism. The list goes on.

Of course, the answer to this racism is virtually identical to those children suffering from child sexual exploitation. They need inquiries, reports, committees, boards, forums, new laws, and "multi-agency responses" too. To deny them these would be racist.

And all of that means funding, quite often for the same academics and bureaucrats. But, even when their fields of "expertise" don't mix, the fact that one lot got funding is plenty of emotional blackmail for the other lot in their lobbying efforts.

So the feminists have instinctively sat on their hands on this, although some have recently been shamed into mumbling something close to nothing on the matter. They don't want to blow too hard or the whole house of cards might fall.

Links

http://www.rotherham.gov.uk/downloads/file/1407/independent_inquiry_cse_in_rotherham

http://www.gmc-uk.org/sex_offences_act_2.pdf_48793788.pdf

Single fatherhood by choice: Implications of the artificial womb

Hopeland Cash · 19 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The idea of an artificial womb is not new and is far from settled. Theorized on for decades and featured in many well-known works of science fiction, this still-abstract device would take the place of a woman during the gestation and birth of a child. Artificial wombs have been discussed on A Voice for Men, as well as in other publications, exploring its implications for feminism and for women in general. Various MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) bloggers and YouTubers have covered the topic, often singing the artificial womb's praises as a tool for men to fulfill their desire for parenthood without needing the involvement of an unwelcome woman.

The artificial womb seems inevitable; mankind is very good at creating devices to replace our biological functions, especially vital or costly ones. At first it will be used by women unable to naturally carry a child, but eventually it will become available to the general public. Some commentators have suggested that feminists will fight to keep men from using it; they may, but they will lose. The artificial womb will be a service provided by private companies and they will service anyone who pays.

At some point, maybe in 10 years or maybe in 200, men will be able to have a child without any woman being involved. The big question is what will happen then.

Single parenthood by choice is already a very real thing. Over 40% of children in the United States are born to parents out of wedlock and a similar percentage of single parents have never been married, adding up to over 1 in 10 children living with a single parent who has never been married, overwhelmingly mothers. Many had children knowing they wouldn't marry; for those more upfront with their intentions, there are sperm banks allowing any woman to conceive independently. Women have become empowered almost to infinity to have children if, when, and with whom they choose. For the latter, it seems a great many choose "with no one" when it comes to including a father in the lives of their children.

There is far more social science on single mothers and their children than can be repeated here, but to say the least this lifestyle choice is less than advisable. There is far less data on single fathers, however. Even if there was, it would largely be limited to divorced fathers and their children; true single fathers by choice are a rarity, currently achievable only through adoption, surrogacy, or a similar arrangement. Most single fathers become such by being widowed, an event beyond their control, or through divorce, an event almost always in the control of their spouse.

The artificial womb will change that. Armed with their own sperm and a donated or lab-grown ovum, paternally inclined but bachelor-minded men will be able to walk into a lab and leave with a polished decanter brimming with life. Since it will be his sole choice, even a man in a relationship could go about securing one of these bottle-babies without consulting his partner; it'll be his choice, and hers to leave or stay. No strings, baby, and in this case no child support.

Aldous Huxley's Brave New World envisioned a world similar to this, but the reality will be far more dynamic. Conventional families will not cease to exist, but a new flavor will come into being: single fathers by choice. For the first time in human history, men will have the choice to become biological fathers when they wish, independent of anyone else's biology.

Obviously, this isn't necessarily a good thing. It's only logical to assume children of single fathers will face all the problems endured by the children of single mothers, but adult men and women will both be in control of their reproduction (surely there'll be male birth control by the time we have an artificial womb) and will become parents either when they and a partner choose to do so together or when the individuals elect to walk that path alone. Problems will arise, as they do now, when people do so ignorant of the true challenges of parenthood and undertake the duty without being prepared.

Even when they prove capable, though, what will the rest of us think? All things being equal, there is little chance society will treat single mothers and fathers by choice the same. As mentioned above, there surely will be feminist blowback against the use of artificial wombs by men. These people don't even want men in schools, no less raising children unsupervised. Traditionalists will also look askance at this new breed of fathers. They don't understand parenthood, detractors will say, labeling men unprepared to take on the once feminine role of prenatal caretaker. It'd be like a woman trying to … well, no, there's nothing women aren't thought capable of doing anymore. But if there were something we still thought men did more naturally than women, it'd be like a woman trying to do that.

There will also be social planning concerns voiced. Overpopulation is already considered a problem by many, and some worry that an artificial womb will make producing children even easier (is that possible?), removing all physical burdens and thereby risking rampant, irresponsible reproduction (cough cough, clearly not a problem now). This fear is unlikely to materialize, though. Humanity often bases technology off nature, but we rarely match the sheer ruggedness and efficiency of evolution. Artificial wombs will be prohibitively expensive, and even as they come down in price they will likely remain more costly than a woman carrying a child. For single dads, this may even out due to the cost savings of being single, but it will not be cheap. That means more work and less leisure spending. Some will still take on parenthood lightly, but just as now it won't be a good idea to do so. It will be hard work, whether for a couple, a single woman, or a single man, and these people will have to live with their responsibilities.

Presumably fetuses of artificial wombs will be treated the same as those of regular wombs, except controlled by (in such cases) the single father, meaning the same rights for abortion, legal surrender, and adoption. All in all, the artificial womb would do much to level the reproductive playing field. Women would no longer hold the monopoly on gestation, making relationships more honest and letting everyone choose when to become a parent.

There will still be differences, however, the greatest of which is sex (the verb, not the noun). It's unlikely the average woman will embrace the artificial womb enough to sterilize herself and rely on the machine for reproduction. Most men wouldn't want to have a vasectomy and then rely on stem cells to grow new sperm either. Our reproductive abilities are part of our identity, and most people don't want to give that up. Just as sperm banks serve as a replacement (or at least broker) for male reproduction, the artificial womb will stand in for a woman.

So while men will become able to reproduce using an artificial womb, women will still have the option of reproducing naturally but parenting singularly. Conception through sex will still be the norm, which raises the issue of "accidental" (are scare quotes scarier in italics?) pregnancies. In the United States, nearly half of all pregnancies are unplanned. Some number is inevitable while people have sex with imperfect birth control, but there can be no unintended pregnancies with an artificial womb. Its use will be deliberate, rational, and fully consensual. Every child born from one will have to be wanted, at least at the time of conception. This will lend an air of responsibility to those who use it, leading to higher expectations on them since they forfeit the out of "it just happened." Even more so for our new breed of single fathers by choice. They will be the ones to have stepped out of the chains of biology entirely and chosen, fully knowing and with undeniable intent, to become a father.

How will this affect unintended biological pregnancies? How many husbands faced with an unplanned child would wish one party or the other had had their tubes tied so they could've just used an artificial womb when they were actually ready. Finally having an option aside from raw biology, will fewer men tolerate women's abysmally high rate of birth control fraud Paternity fraud too: "Pregnancy is too hard on you, honey. Let's use an artificial womb." That way I can know it's my sperm swimming around in there.

Then there's the bar of excellence for single parenthood in general. Certain judgy individuals have asserted that single fathers are more desirable partners because they don't have a meaningful choice in the matter, making single fatherhood a badge of good character. When men can wilfully choose to become single parents, that will change and they will be responsible for helping their child avoid the many pitfalls of single parenthood. Men will not only become the paragon of the parentally empowered but will also be forced to set a new standard for parental responsibility. Even today, if a man puts his sperm in a woman (or even if she puts it there without his permission), he is held fully and inescapably responsible for it. If he puts that same sperm in a jar and grows a baby independent of a woman, you can be damn sure we are all going to expect him to be the best parent he possibly can, and if he does it when he isn't ready it'll be his screw-up. Male hyperagency will extend to single fatherhood by choice, leaving no room for excuses. Single fatherhood will no longer always be foisted on men, but even those who do choose it will be held fully accountable.

This will lead to discrimination against men, excessive criticism, and persecution for parental wrongs that would be overlooked were it a mother. But at the same time there will be the many cases of single fathers by choice being successful parents. Since there will be more effort involved and higher expectations to meet, men will not often become fathers on a mere whim. How will this affect our views on single mothers by choice? Biology isn't a machine, so birth control does and will continue to fail and there will be genuinely accidental babies. But half? That's bullshit and we all know it. Some unknown but not inconsiderable proportion of those conceptions are due to the woman either (a) choosing to become pregnant but hiding behind the "it just happened" excuse or (b) throwing caution to the wind and actually letting it just happen, consequences (and partner) be damned.

But what if their monopoly were broken? Women are given free reign over their reproduction because we don't have an alternative. The artificial womb will change that. Female biology will no longer be the sole carrier of the next generation, and as the free market teaches us, competition will breed performance. With reproduction harnessed by science, how much longer will irresponsible behavior be allowed to slide?

When men gain control over their reproduction and face that responsibility like rational adults, women will have to change their game plan. Single mothers by choice will face greater scrutiny alongside their male counterparts and their motivations will more readily be called into question. Some will call it victim-blaming, but when birth control and abortion are so readily available there really is no excuse, and the artificial womb will only add to that. Like adoption, artificial womb babies will be taken on only by choice, but unlike adoption there will be no chance of a history of abuse or attachment problems, and the full biological connection will be there to encourage a healthy relationship.

By showing how single parenthood can be done better, it is likely that the advent of the artificial womb will cause single motherhood by choice to sharply decline. It's not that men will make better single parents, but entering parenthood will not be so casual a choice for them. Just as it would be if women had to take a pill to get pregnant, rather than to not, the greater will required to become a single father will mean fewer of the unprepared will undertake that course, leading to a higher proportion of fit parents and therefore healthy children. Expectations on single parents will increase, awareness of the social ills faced by their children will grow, and a man will be less willing to put up with single mothers since he can now have a kid on his own. In that regard, artificial wombs may help combat overpopulation: women won't be able to get away with so much bad behavior anymore and will be held to task for their choices, so they'll be forced to be more responsible and stop having so many children they are incapable of caring for.

There are and always will be exceptions, of course. Many children raised today by single mothers are healthy and happy. Some men who have children via artificial wombs will go on to neglect or abuse them. What matters is getting to a place where people, men and women, become parents only when they want to, and never when they aren't ready for it. It's time we stop allowing parenthood by force and condoning irresponsible reproduction. The artificial womb will help achieve that by giving men reproductive autonomy and breaking the female monopoly on childbearing that forces us to overlook their misconduct.

That's a brave new world I can get behind.

Teach criminals not to crime?

AVfM Video Source · 19 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As we've come to expect from YouTuber Monica Edwards, in this video she demolishes another feminist myth: that you can teach rapists to cease raping via simple slogans.

http://youtu.be/9IERtL1nqVU

You might want to subscribe to Monica Edwards.

Et tu, Mr. Farrar? Noticing Deniro Farrar's "Notice"

Mumia Ali · 19 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

> …my new video notice is a song meant to uplift all of the single strong Independent mothers/"s
> —Deniro Farrar, in a tweet dated Jul 24, 2014
>
> "In a time of universal deceit—telling the truth is a revolutionary act."
> —George Orwell

I was patrolling the Internet, scanning the horizon for things to opine upon, when I stumbled onto what some have referred to as an "anthem" in the crusade against the latest First World Problem tempest-in-a-teapot, "street harassment"—a song/video by Charlotte, North Carolina's own Daunte Qushawan(!) Farrar, better known by his stage name (which is much better to spell and pronounce, I might add), "Deniro" Farrar.

The song, called "Notice," is Farrar's ode to the Sista on the Block, who is ever the victim, don'tcha know, of "street harassment." Such rappers are not at all uncommon in urban Black life; they form a part of the constellation of Black America's Nice Guy™ contingent and White Knight Corps, though we Negroes don't refer to these gents as such; we refer to them as "Conscious Brothas." Though considerably overlapping with Good Black Men™, they are in fact quite distinct as a group, perhaps the most standout feature about them being that they are "creatives" of varying stripe—rappers, "spoken word artists" (a cutesy way of saying "poets"), sometimes bloggers/writers, video/film/photographers, and the like. Conscious Brothas mark themselves out as vastly different from more straight-ahead Gangsta Rappers like, say, a 50 Cent or a Cassidy, by not imbibing the~~truth~~ supposed "misogyny" of the former's lyrical stylings and instead devoting themselves to extolling the virtues of the Sistahood, come what may. (Examples of this would include the likes of Common, Dwele, Raheem DeVaughn, Talib Kweli, et al. Don't get me wrong, I'm a fan of all of these artists, and have them all on my playlists, though I admit I'm not much of a "Dirty South" rap fan—too much of an Old School East Coaster for that. But I just had to stand up and tell the Truth—and shame the Devil.)

Of course, like the Nice Guy™ in White America, Conscious Brothas are every bit as ulterior in their motives, as the video you can see attests to. But I'll make it clearer in my review and deconstruction of it and the accompanying lyrics.

And Now, Our Feature Presentation …

So, let's begin with the music video for Farrar's "Notice," shall we?

The video opens with Farrar shirtless and more tatted (read: thugged out) than a Dathomirian Sith Lord, eating a sandwich and perched atop an old Caddy in a driveway overgrown with grass and weeds, observing Sista Baby Mama heroically strapping in her two babies into the car from across the way. The opening lines go like this:

"Clocking in clocking out, another day another dollar
You can't even pump your gas, without some niggas trying to holla

I just want you to know I noticed (4x)

You go to school And go to work. Cash your check then go home single parent all alone. God damn girl you strong

I just want you to know I noticed (4x)"

Those who study film and the like know and understand well the primacy of importance such opening shots of a film make: they establish the tenor and tone of the presentation and focus the attention of the viewer in that regard. Clearly, Farrar's intention is to focus our attention on the hood of Black American life—the under/lower working classes, NOT Prince George's County. This is hugely important because as it has been painfully admitted by even the Social Justice Warrior (SJW) forces themselves, in hand-wringingly, angst-ridden fashion no less, "street harassment" is a "problem" that is undeniably wrapped up in race and class—poor Black men. Which gives the aforementioned SJW contingent all kinds of cognitive dissonance agita, their pet causes clashing like the Titans of Greek myth. Gotta love it!

Farrar's video, barely 60 seconds in, firmly disabuses the notion or idea that "street harassment" is a "problem" all men are guilty of—it is an issue that has to do with poor Black men—which raises all kinds of really juicy questions the SJWs of the world run away from like roaches when the light comes on. What questions, you ask? Read on …

Baby Mamas Can't Be Choosy

"It's 5 in the morning, and you ain't had no sleep
Cause your youngest baby teething, just 1 of your lil 3

Your baby dad is a statistic, another dead beat
Shit my daddy was the same, so my Moma raised me

But she still found a way, to overcome a break free
Working job after job, 1 or 2 or maybe 3

To put food on the table, making due with ends meet
So I know about that pain that you feeling, and it's deep

And he beat you like he's strong, but that really means he weak
Now your plotting for revenge, wanting to killem in his sleep

But shit we all humans, and ain't no body perfect
No I anit making excuse but that nigga just ain't worth it"

The above passage comes from the first verse of "Notice," where Farrar lovingly describes the travails of the Baby Mama—something he and, sadly, far too many Black men in our time know just a little too much about, having been a product of a Baby Mama himself—and he "salutes" the supposed "strength" of these ladies—kinda like what Ms. Fantasia did a few years back in her ridiculous spectacle of a song "Baby Mama."

Of course, nowhere in Farrar's verse is there any mention whatsoever of the role said Baby Mama of his affections(!)—or indeed his own mama—had in their predicaments. No, nothing they did is their fault; it is solely the fault of the men they chose to lay down with and get up with proverbial fleas.

Black America is rife with such twisted thinking and inculcation, a glorification of mothers no matter what—nor is it anything new. As YouTube personality Tommy Sotomayor makes clear, the rot runs very deep, to such an extent that even the late great Tupac Shakur is guilty as charged:

"When I was young me and my mama had beef
Seventeen years old kicked out on the streets
Though back at the time, I never thought I'd see her face
Ain't a woman alive that could take my mama's place
Suspended from school; and scared to go home, I was a fool with the big boys, breakin all the rules
I shed tears with my baby sister
Over the years we was poorer than the other little kids
And even though we had different daddy's, the same drama
When things went wrong we'd blame mama
I reminice on the stress I caused, it was hell
Huggin on my mama from a jail cell
And who'd think in elementary?
Heeey! I see the penitentiary, one day

And runnin from the police, that's right
Mama catch me, put a whoopin to my backside
And even as a crack fiend, mama
You always was a black queen, mama
I finally understand for a woman it ain't easy tryin to raise a man
You always was committed
A poor single mother on welfare, tell me how ya did it
There's no way I can pay you back
But the plan is to show you that I understand
You are appreciated"

As Sotomayor rightly points out, ONLY in Black America are women to be held in high esteem for making such horrendously harmful choices in life—having multiple babies out of wedlock with clearly disreputable men, behaving badly in a multitude of ways, allowing more men to run through them than Grand Central Station, and unabashedly chasing down Mr. Big in varying permutations—indeed, Black women will actually get offended for suggesting that their actions account for their experiences(!). Black women demand to be treated as "ladies," "queens," "goddesses," and, this is my favorite one, "dutchesses"—all while acting a fool, twerking up a storm, getting shotout by a bunch of ne'er do wells, and having babies by multiple Baby Daddies, and that's for starters—but they get to demand that a man "step correct."

Really?

Perhaps with all that "education" they're getting, they would do well to study a bit about cause and effect: every action has an opposite and equal reaction. When you make bad mating choices as a woman, you cannot expect anything BUT consequences to flow therefrom—for years to come. Black women who choose to become Baby Mamas to disreputable men have forfeit all ~~demands~~ claims toward respectability—in fact, and this again is the deep irony being shown in "Notice," the very Good Black Men™ they've been cajoling with White Feathers are nowhere to be found in the bowels of Black American street life—they don't reside, nor work, nor socialize there—and here, we see Assortative Mating rear its ugly head. By becoming Baby Mamas and engaging in other disreputable behaviors, said Black women have indelibly stamped themselves as being utterly unfit for the Better Off Brothas of Black America—and rightly so. "Them Niggas tryin' to holla" are said Sistas' assortative mating equal—and water always meets its own level.

Enjoy!

Et Tu, Mr. Farrar?

Let's go back to Farrar's lyrics, shall we? Here's the second and final verse from the song "Notice":

"You threw on some yoga pants, that compliment your figure, just to run and grab some milk, you weren't worried about no nigga

But they always try and holler, but never step correct
Making comments bout your ass, showing blatin disrespect

But you always keep it real, and put them niggas back in check
They break their necks whenever they see ya, damn near causing wrecks

And that's when you're in you're scrubs, they ain't even seen you when you dressed
Got them kids wit no stretch marks, damn girl you blessed

Making moves on you own, you ain't worried you ain't stressed
Plus you never hit the club, cause you know it's full of mess

Trying to hold it in the road, and let GOD do the rest

Niggas throwing money at you, but you ain't even impressed

You clocking in clocking out, another day another dollar
You can't even pump your gas, without some niggas trying to holla

I just want you to know I noticed, you ain't alone
So any time you wanna talk don't hesitate just hit my phone"

If you go back and listen to Farrar's seranade closely, you'll notice, pardon the pun, him imploring the Baby Mama of his affections to "just hit my phone" in the event she "wanna talk"—and "anytime," no less. Here, Farrar tells on himself, big-time, and no doubt the Sistas will lap it up like catnip—he's engaging in what evolutionary psychology recognizes as derogation of competitors—a formidable mating tactic that both sexes employ, and here we see it in quite florid fashion on Farrar's part. As I've said above, Conscious Brothas' entire spiel is one of "See? I'm so much better than those knuckle-dragging cretins over there because I feel your pain," and despite the utter banality of the enterprise, so many Sistas fall right into the trap. For this reason, I for one, cannot dispute success—and it is a successful mating tactic.

It's just a blatantly dishonest one—which is hugely important for this discussion.

Why?

Because the entire "premise" behind the Sistahood's White Feather Campaign is to ~~cajole~~ appeal to Black Men to "intervene" on their behalf against them dastardly Nigga Neanderthals (you know, the kinds said Sistas often breed with?) on the street "tryin' to holla"—and to do so on noble, selfless grounds. Only, as Farrar himself clearly states, he very much has a personal, vested interest in the matter: he too is tryin' to get in them yoga pants—he's just going about it in a very different way. A way that the very same Sistas who complain about being "objectified" and the like quite like.

"Who, Whom?" indeed.

Trust me when I say, boys and girls, you cannot make this stuff up.

So, yes, I agree with the Sista SJWs out there—Mr. Deniro Farrar's "Notice" does indeed bring much-needed context to the indoctrination discussion about "street harassment"…

… in spades.

Thanks, Deniro! Keep up the great work.

More—much, much more—your correspondent has to say about these matters. Stay tuned …

Free editing help for Feministing and Mychal Denzel Smith

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 20 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I've made a few corrections to this article by Mychal Denzel Smith that originally appeared at Feministing. Mychal isn't a bad writer, but he needs an editor. I'm providing that service free of charge.

I've made these corrections based on the very simple idea that losing a fight you started doesn't make you a victim. The truth is that men rarely hit women, unless you hit them first.

[image]

[image]

Here's a sure-fire way to know that you hate men: when an incident of intimate partner violence in which a woman beats a man with a nine-iron gains national attention and every question or comment you think to make has to do with his behavior, you really hate men. Like, despise.

There is no other explanation. There is no "I need all the facts." There is no excuse. You hate men. Own it.

[image]

Now, you probably don't believe you hate men. You probably honestly think you're being an objective observer whose only interest is the truth. You are delusional.

We have this problem in our discourse around the most important challenges we face where we feel we have to be "fair to both sides." But sometimes, one of those sides is subjugation and oppression. If you're OK with legitimizing that side in the interest of "fairness," you're essentially saying you're OK with oppression as a part of the human condition. That's some hateful shit.

[image]

Violence against men doesn't deserve a "fair" hearing. There should be no justifications offered, no rationalizing, no equivocating. Violence against men should be intolerable. But every time we are called upon to collectively denounce that violence, there's a section of the choir that starts singing from a different set of sheet music.

"Well, I don't believe she should have hit him, but he also shouldn't have …"

"Hitting men is wrong, but …"

"He has a responsibility to his family …"

"He stayed with her, so obviously he's condoning that behavior …"

"It's none of our business what happens between …"

"What did he expect?"

Hate. It's all hate. Because if you can look at the history of men being beaten and battered into silence and second-class citizenship, their lives thrown away in wars women are protected from, and still ask if they are at all to blame for the violence visited upon them, there's nothing else to call that.

[image]

There is a tendency to judge the actions of those with the least amount of power the same as those with more power and then ask, "Isn't that what equality means?" It's a clever rhetorical evasion of the issue. Equality is the goal, but to pretend that we actually exist as equals right now is to ignore reality. Like it or not, we all carry history with us in our personal interactions. The history of violence against men is one where men's bodies are a battleground in a struggle for power. Punches, kicks, weapons, and the threat of death have been used to assert dominance and deny men autonomy, at home and out in the rest of the world.

How are men denied autonomy? How are their bodies used? The most common way is to deny them the right to choose parenthood. Their money, their lives, their bodies are nothing but instruments to be used at the sole discretion of women. And just to remind men of how disposable their bodies are, every single one of them, upon turning 18, is required to sign a document acknowledging that they can be discarded like trash at the whim of the government. Women have never been required to acknowledge their bodies or their lives as something that can be disposed of in service to a greater good.

If you think violence against men is funny, or not worthy of consideration, or somehow less important than violence against women, you hate men.

It's that simple.

There, Feministing. I fixed your stupid piece-of-shit writing about hate for you.

You're welcome.

Lots of love,

JB

Confirmed: Thunderf00t banned due to Anita Sarkeesian

AVfM Video Source · 20 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It appears early reports were correct: Thunderf00t appears to have been hounded off of Twitter specifically for criticizing Anita Sarkeesian, by Anita Sarkeesian and friends

This is genuinely disturbing.

Woman brutalizes infant son, leaves him outside next to trash for father to find

Paul Elam · 20 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is simply one of the most disgusting things I have ever seen. Quote mine me all you want, had the father of this child beaten this piece of shit woman to within an inch of her life I would not have offered one scintilla of objection or condemnation.

The piece of shit's name is Dalishia Salter, and among the few morsels of sheer depravity she utters to the grief-stricken father is something to the effect, "Oh, well, I'll fucking kill him."

To make matters worse, Salter told police that the father, David Bryant, was the one who injured the child by pushing a big screen TV on him. Of course the police issued a warrant without thinking about it. After all, it must be the man's fault, right?

There is a petition online for his release with over 64,000 signatures. I hope you will add to that.

http://www.gopetition.com/petitions/justice-for-david-bryant-and-baby-daviere.html

Before you watch the video, here is an image of their text exchange about the baby.

[image]

Now, prepare to RAGE.

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Evrj6Zriu5A&feature=youtu.be

JudgyBitch launches video channel: JBTV

AVfM Video Source · 21 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Now here is something we can all get behind. Please go give JB a sub and encourage her to make this a regular thing. Remember, every new sub makes a feminist cry enough tears to bathe in them. PE

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BO84Y4eaYU4

Don’t let your girl be raped in college! Send her to Reynolds U!

AVfM Video Source · 21 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

According to the President and Vice President, at least 1 in 5 college girls will be sexually assaulted. Reynolds University has been founded to solve this problem!

How Social Justice Warriors ruin social media

Elijah Butler · 21 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This article is also available in Romanian.

Social Justice Warriors (SJWs) are the bane of the Internet's existence. We all know these people. They are activists who crusade for the "victims" of society, namely women, non-Whites and LGBT individuals. They decree that all who disagree with them are bigots. Hate feminism? You are a vile misogynist. Think that welfare hurts minorities instead of helping them? Racist. Tired of LGBT rights activists calling the vast majority of people evil oppressors because they're heterosexual? Homophobe.

They will do anything and everything to promote their agenda, thereby ruining whatever they infect via censorship and harassment. Take just about any popular forum or social network and you will find them and their damage. Not only that, they infect and damage discourse in the exact same manner every time. Yet no matter how many places they ruin, nobody seems to learn.

The following is how SJWs destroy social media, every single time. The examples I use are of feminist ideologue SJWs, as they tend to be the majority of SJWs.

Step 1: Infect Popular Forum or Social Network

As forums and social networks grow in popularity, more and different kinds of people gravitate toward them, including SJWs. But unlike most people, who attempt at some level to fit in, SJWs must change the culture to fit their ideology. Many of these networks are at first filled with manly heterosexual White men who speak their mind, including their attraction to attractive women, which is verboten to SJWs because male sexuality is bad.

Step 2: Start Complaining

At first, the SJWs are just a minor annoyance. A complaint about "an insensitive comment about a woman's attractiveness" here or a picture of scantily clad woman there. Since they are in the minority, they are largely dismissed and ignored. However, since they are ignored, they keep getting louder.

Step 3: Gain Control

Seeing as nobody cares about their whining when guys post pictures of half-naked women, SJWs gain control of the forum or social network. On forums, they become mods and admins. On social networks, they build up enough of a following of like-minded followers to affect it, be it harassing somebody off the network or getting the target suspended. And on Wikipedia, they openly co-opt it for a feminist agenda.

Step 4: Silence and Harass

Once the SJWs are in full control, the censoring and the harassment begin. Now it is no longer just about ending the objectification of women, but it is about the indoctrination of the feminist agenda. All dissent is squashed and those who disagree are harassed until they either fall in line, shut up, or leave completely. The only accepted viewpoint is the SJW agenda and that's it, there is no other. Two current relevant examples are the censorship on Reddit of the discussion of the Zoe Quinn Scandal and Anita Sarkeesian getting her followers to get Thunderf00t suspended on Twitter.

Step 5: Destruction Complete

Once the ideologues are in control, the social networks and forums gradually lose prestige and active membership until they either die or become inconsequential. For example, I used to frequent the humor website Something Awful and its accompanying forums for years. Something Awful reached its height and influence in the mid-2000s because of its edgy and boundary-pushing content that often offended large amounts of people. But once it grew to massive size, the SJWs moved in, took control, and made it politically correct, taking away the elements that made it famous. While Something Awful is still around and producing content, it is a shadow of its former self and is basically irrelevant.

While sites like Reddit and Twitter are still going strong, I know many people who have grown sick of the SJWs on both sites. I myself deleted my relatively popular Twitter account because I got sick of the constant harassment by SJWs; it just wasn't worth fighting them anymore. Wikipedia has begun to shrink in importance and trust by its users (though, to be fair, Wikipedia was in trouble long before it was co-opted by feminists).

What can be done? Simple: Do not allow SJWs to control discourse, ever! You can never win against them because they are not actually fighting for the oppressed; rather, they are opportunistic bullies shrouding themselves in self-righteousness. That is why they will attempt to take control—because that is what this is really about: power. As long as SJWs have the power, they will ruin forum and after forum, social network after social network. Do not give them the power by letting them get to Step 3 and they will remain minor annoyances at best.

So the next time you are on a male-heavy forum and you see posts by a few women decrying objectification, either completely and permanently shut them out or run. You have been warned.

J4MB publicly challenges Mark Carney, governor, Bank of England

Mike Buchanan · 21 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Mark Carney, a former governor of the Bank of Canada, was appointed governor of the Bank of England in July 2013. His annual salary is said to be around £624,000 ($990,000). His contract term is the customary eight years, but he's said he'll serve no more than five. One of his first acts as governor was to capitulate to Caroline Criado-Perez's silly campaign to retain women on British banknotes, and in 2017 the wildly overrated authoress Jane Austen will appear on £10 notes. Our blog piece on the matter is here. Janet Bloomfield's piece is here.

Some lines written by, and about, Jane Austen:

> I think I may boast myself to be, with all possible vanity, the most unlearned and uninformed female who ever dared to be an authoress. (Letter, 11 December 1815. 'Jane Austen's Letters' – 1952)
>
> One of Edward's Mistresses was Jane Shore, who has had a play written about her, but it is a tragedy and therefore not worth reading. ('The History of England' – 1791)
>
> Let other pens dwell on guilt and misery. I quit such odious subjects as soon as I can. ('Mansfield Park' – 1814)
>
> It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune, must be in want of a wife. ('Pride and Prejudice' – 1813)
>
> How horrible it is to have so many people killed! And what a blessing that one cares for none of them! (Letter to Cassandra Austen, 31 May 1811, after the Battle of Albuera, 16 May 1811. 'Jane Austen's Letters' – 1952)
>
> Mark Twain:
>
> Jane Austen's books, too, are absent from this library. Just that one omission alone would make a fairly good library out of a library that hadn't a book in it. 'Following the Equator' (1897)
>
> To me Edgar Allan Poe's prose is unreadable – like Jane Austen's. No, there is a difference. I could read his prose on a salary, but not Jane's. 'Mark Twain's Letters'
>
> It seems a great pity that they allowed her to die a natural death. (Letter to W. D. Howells, 18 January 1909.)

The Bank of England has a history of feminist manipulations to advantage women in recruitment and promotion terms. In June 2012, the Campaign for Merit in Business—an organization run by the same people who run J4MB—published a blog post on the matter here. It included the following excerpt from a newspaper profile of Catherine Brown, the £200,000 ($317,000) p.a. executive director of human resources:

> According to Catherine Brown, the Bank's executive director of human resources, there are 'no fixed hours' at our premier City regulator. Brown, 46, says: '… while the governors and directors are very largely white and male, that is a snapshot in time and in five years it may look very different.' … this year the intake of women has shot up to 45 per cent.…
>
> 'We are output-focused—there are no set hours,' she says, adding that this has been crucial to the Bank's success in recruiting women and to keeping its staff turnover at an astonishingly low four per cent a year.…

Under Mark Carney's leadership, the Bank of England has discriminated more strongly for women and against men. The intake of female graduates has increased sharply. More women have been promoted into senior positions. In a recent speech to the Trades Union Congress, Carney said this:

> Hiring more women in senior roles makes us much, much more effective.

I don't think any reasonable person could read that statement without interpreting it as a claim of a causal link between appointing more women into senior roles and a strong improvement in organizational performance. Now, the Bank of England isn't a profit-making organization, so Carney could possibly anecdotally defend his claim—although my 30+ years working as a business executive tells me that his claim is utterly absurd. Former business colleagues—both men and women—to whom I've mentioned his claim have laughed out loud. As C4MB has frequently reported, we know from at least five longitudinal studies that there exists a causal link between increasing the proportion of women on corporate boards and financial decline.

We've publicly challenged Mark Carney over his remarkable assertion and included with the letter the full abstracts of, and links to, the five longitudinal studies we cite regularly. Our letter is here, and our public challenge of Carney is this:

> You claim a causal link between hiring more women in senior roles and strong improvements in performance. We publicly challenge you to provide us details of longitudinal studies which support your claim with respect to major companies' financial performance, and specifically with respect to their financial returns to their shareholders i.e. their owners. Thank you.

We much admire the British website The Conservative Woman. Co-edited by Kathy Gyngell and Laura Perrins, it's a site that doesn't shy away from allocating blame for so many of British society's ills firmly at the door of radical feminists and their poodles in government and elsewhere. So we were pleased when they ran a piece on Mark Carney pandering to feminists, and linked to our public challenge of him here.

ESPN analyst says men need to be reprogrammed

Pierce Harlan · 21 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The Ray Rice domestic violence incident has given the usual loons cover to show their true colors. ESPN analyst Kate Fagan says that society needs to reprogram men by spending a ton of money to train boys to respect women. CBS sports anchor James Brown used the Rice incident to boldly—and bizarrely—proclaim that when men say, "You throw the ball like a girl," it leads to domestic violence against women.

It's all so tiresome. And wrong.

Any time any high-profile, senseless violence is committed by a young man, a certain class of media pundits—H.L. Menken-wannabes who know nothing more about "gender" than the average person on the street (and probably a lot less)—deems it a moral imperative to use their platforms to churn out de rigueur commentaries tying the atrocity du jour to maleness. Their hand-wringing pronouncements happily reduce young men to caricature and pass off outlier attributes as "cultural norms." They are smugly content to do to young men the very thing most of them vehemently object to whenever a conservative pundit ties a terrorist act committed by a Muslim to Muslim*s in general*. Young men are the favorite piñatas of the enlightened know-it-all set, the source of all ills of society.

We see it over and over and over. They are ready to pounce any time a troubled young man goes berserk and shoots up a movie theater or a school. His act, they declare, is a manifestation of masculinity that needs to be reprogrammed.

Of course, for every young man who commits such acts, there are always a lot more heroes who risk their lives to keep people they don't even know from harm. And, yes, these heroes are almost always male too, but the know-it-all pundits never bother to tie their actions to their "maleness." Funny how that works.

And therein lies the problem. Ray Rice is not a stand-in for "males." His actions do not fit cultural norms for masculinity. Just the opposite, his actions are widely deplored and condemned. Rice committed a criminal act. But for every Ray Rice, there are countless young men ready to do selfless things, noble things, and often incredibly heroic things. Why aren't these also seen as "cultural norms" that define masculinity? Because that doesn't fit the stereotype.

Let's be clear: Boys need to be taught to control their aggression. Every sane person understands that boys are not little girls with penises. Every sane person also knows that young Black males are more likely to commit violent crimes than young White males. The latter social pathology is not caused by "too much" masculinity, it's caused by the absence of proper male role models—a product of, among other things, the mid-1960s "man-out-of-the-house" government policy that paid poor women to rid the household of adult males.

Yes, men and boys face innumerable problems that are unique to males and that are largely—and outrageously—ignored. But the drive-by media pundits who are ever-ready to toss "maleness" onto the scrap heap of history aren't helping matters. We need to insist that the idiotic stereotyping be stopped.

You know who doesn't stereotype? You know who understands that the issues aren't so black and white? People well versed in the issues. Earlier this year, RAINN, the nation's leading anti-rape organization, debunked the "rape culture" trope: "Rape is caused not by cultural factors but by the conscious decisions, of a small percentage of the community, to commit a violent crime." This is what we've been preaching here for years. RAINN decried the "inclination to focus on particular . . . traits that are common in many millions of law-abiding Americans (e.g., 'masculinity'), rather than on the subpopulation at fault: those who choose to commit rape." The usual pundits had a conniption, of course.

Why so many girls have trouble with gaming culture

Tanya McDermott · 22 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Thinking back on how I became an anti-feminist, I realise just how much feminism has crawled its way into every aspect of life. The video game community is one that has recently experienced a huge surge of feminist-focused drama. Likely due to having a nerdy father of two daughters, I ended up practically being raised with a game controller in my hand. As such, I was confused when I heard accusations of gaming as being unwelcoming or even hostile to female players. I decided to sit down and analyse the actual impact my gender has had on my gaming experience and consider why feminists might feel this way.

Gaming can be hostile, but not specifically to women.

This is true for many communities all over the Internet, not just in the gaming world. Anonymity encourages hateful expression (often without cause), and some people are just bad eggs to begin with. There are particular places around the web known infamously for their toxicity, ranging from competitive gaming to YouTube comments. Nobody cares if you're offended, and trolls will happily use your tears as a life force. It's not uncommon for the shocked and offended to be met with the question "Are you new to the Internet?" Though I imagine for many women the answer may be yes.

I believe the problem lies in the way that feminists highlight "sexist" harassment as something notably different to general harassment. I have seen this article being used frequently recently to argue that women are treated poorly online. In summary, the study finds that women experience much more sexual harassment while gaming than men—but this point is an obvious one, I imagine few would argue to the contrary. However it does not support the argument that women are treated more poorly than men.

Bullies are smarter than you may think: they pick their insults intelligently based on what the victim may find most offensive. If you don't know somebody's specific insecurities, the next best thing is to prey on what makes them different from those around them. Do they wear glasses? Are they fat or do they have a strange facial feature? That's gold right there. It just so happens that girls are still a significant minority in the gaming scene (unless you want to count mobile gaming …), so the simple fact of being female is one of the biggest and most apparent differences a girl gamer will display to others. My point, then, is that rather than experiencing more harassment in total, it's simply that a much higher percentage of the harassment they receive is directed at their gender. It's not personal—but the feminist outcry clearly shows how effective it is.

Guys experience and exchange severe amounts of harassment online, but the moment a sexual slur is thrown at a woman suddenly the entire Internet is portrayed as one enormous boys' club. Gaming can be a savage environment. In the most competitive scenes, where stress and blood levels are high, cusses are thrown around so often you'd think they were a greeting. Very little hand-holding is present in these male-dominated environments, and every move you make is criticised to the highest possible degree. Drawing attention to yourself in the slightest way can result in a barrage of unprovoked hatred at the whim of some disturbed 13-year-old. But no, of course distasteful "get back in the kitchen" jokes are worse.

In my gaming group, everyone has their "thing" that they receive constant abuse for. One guy is teased because of his religion. Many are teased because they come from a part of their country well-known for an offensive stereotype. There's the gay guy, the forever-virgin, and the guy whose voice is just a little too high-pitched. And then there's me: the girl. I never once saw it as misogyny.

Girls aren't used to handling harassment.

It's funny because you'd think the way that feminists portray the eternal battle that is having a vagina, they'd have developed a few more coping methods by now. Alas, it seems to be the other way around. In Mindset: The New Psychology of Success by Carol Dweck, it was found that boys were criticised eight times more than girls in the classroom. This allegedly led to boys trying harder, while the girls were more likely to take criticism as a personal attack. Furthermore, they observed that boys had more aggressive relationships, pointing out each other's faults and calling each other names, leading to the development of a resilience to harshness.

It's no wonder, then, that girls find a gaming environment somewhat hostile. I had the same experience when I first started playing MOBAs, roughly a year ago. Sometimes I would have to take a break from the game to blow off some steam, and considered packing it in altogether. But after persevering I slowly became to understand the male-orientated environment (at least, a gaming environment). In female social groups, you try your best to avoid criticising one another, and if forced it is done in the most roundabout, sugar-coated way possible. Guys don't beat around the bush, however—criticism is constant but honest. Meanwhile, insults are practically the primary way of showing affection. Oftentimes even the guys will snap at the relentlessness of it, so it's easy to see how difficult a girl may find it to deal with. It's important to remember that I've had a lot of experience with gaming beforehand too, so others with less of an introduction will struggle even more.

Why adapt when you can force others to change?

I very much feel that I've become a more balanced person since I've gotten more into competitive online gaming. As noted above, I had to adjust significantly to an environment particularly different from my own, but now I can appreciate the value of masculine-related traits like competitiveness, honesty, effort, and resilience. Unfortunately, feminists fall short a few stages too early in that journey. Ironically, women are actually treated equivalently to men, with the same harshness they show each other, but it's labelled as misogyny. The problem is a refusal to adapt, a refusal to try to understand. Instead of learning how to adapt to an unfamiliar place, they try to force it to change to suit themselves: to become more female-friendly.

This situation reminded me of complaints feminists have of male-dominated work environments. I can't help wondering if the scenarios are similar—are women just refusing to adapt to masculine environments and try to change them under the banner of misogyny? I suppose it's only natural that these things will change as particular domains become more gender-balanced, and it might not necessarily be for the worse. It just irks me that feminists portray it as some crusade of theirs to "fix" anything that's too masculine. Ironic when you consider that they try to sell the idea that our patriarchal society deems femininity as an inherently inferior trait.

The fairer sex isn't always fairer.

There are some gamers who really do have a chip on their shoulder when it comes to girl gamers. And if you look past their veil of eternal innocence, you'll see sometimes it's not always completely unwarranted.

The memory that stands out most for me when I think of this topic is of a couple of years ago in World of Warcraft. My female friend was complaining to me about how annoying a guy who persistently chatted to her was. Upon asking why she didn't just ignore him, she explained that he was going to buy her an extremely expensive in-game item (the Spectral Tiger mount, if you must know).

While women arguably hold the majority of power in romantic relations in real life anyway, the shortage of women in gaming shifts the scales even more. Many guys shower girl gamers with attention and effort, and that's, of course, not the fault of women. However, even if not as explicitly malicious as the example above, I would say that at least half of the girls I played with changed their behaviour specifically when in the presence of men (note that many of the other half were already taken). Their voices would become higher, they would giggle and act more ditzy. This would completely change the atmosphere of a game: it was suddenly extremely apparent that a girl was here. And that, for most purposes, is perfectly fine—it's just how relationships work between the genders, I suppose. But feminists are the ones asking for equality. They want men to play with them without treating them differently for their gender while completely oblivious to their own behaviours.

Relating this back to my original point: male gamers are becoming more aware of this "type" of girl when they play, resulting in a certain cautiousness. The kind of girl who changes the atmosphere, acts fake, and expects to be treated better than equality allows. This was an issue brought up previously regarding controversy surrounding the phrase gamer girl when it was accused of being a phrase only used by the kind of person seeking attention for their gender. This was quickly shut down by feminists by simply stating that those who believe this are misogynistic and are trying to keep girls away from their hobby. And sure, not all women act like gamer girls, but we know the problem with a phrase like that now, don't we?

Lastly, and relatively controversially, I would argue that most girls are indeed bad at video games. Not through some inherent inferiority due to their genitals but because of a lack of practice. For many guys, video gaming has been a lifetime hobby developed from childhood. They grew with the industry. They often invest a lot of time and energy into developing gaming as a skill and playing at a competitive level. I find that girls rarely share this background. Many girls were initiated by their boyfriends or are branching out from more casual or adventure-based games. The skill difference is simply down to a lack of practice. This does not justify those who try to shut women out from gaming due to this reason (mainly because this would perpetuate the very problem), but I don't think it's a concept completely devoid of reality.

I'm afraid that most of my evidence is anecdotal and thus lacking in power somewhat, but I hate the way feminists are insisting on completely misrepresenting the gaming community. I'm not trying to argue that sexism isn't present at all, or that male gamers are completely innocent in the situation, but simply that it's a complex situation that feminists only analyse at face value. Maybe it's inevitable that gaming will change as its demographic does (whether this is in fact happening is a debate in and of itself), but I personally love the community as it is now and wouldn't want to let it go without a fight.

The erectile dysfunction myth

Dr. David Ley · 22 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

According to many popular dialogues online and in the media today, watching too much pornography can cause erectile dysfunction. In response to my writing, I regularly receive criticisms from folks who believe that porn addiction has affected the quality of their sex lives and ability to get erections.

Below are a few examples of such comments, edited for length and profanity. Please note that I did not "cherry-pick" these comments. Instead, I merely chose the three most recent ED-related comments received :

> your a joke dr.ley. Submitted by Anonymous – porn is one of the most addicting drugs out there. they cause so many problems in ones life including ED. so shut the f up and sit the fdown, your a f fraud. stop trying to get attention, gary wilson is better than u will ever be. are you mad that you didn't discover this and your trying to cover it up? f yourself. just look at all the porn addiction websites u f fraud.
>
> Just wanted to add. Submitted by Samuel – A number of guys, including myself, have said in other forums that we started masturbated with limp d to porn. Porn was strong enough to arouse me mentally that I could orgasm with a 30-50% erect penis. I masturbated like this for at least a year or more…Work wise, I am a neuroscience graduate student at UCSF. A little more background, I attempted to sleep with 9 or 10 women in 2012 and dated 4 of them for 2 months or longer and was never able to get erect or sustain erections. I also smoke probably once a week (socially) and drink 2 times a week (never hard), but never have been addicted to anything…
>
> It's mind boggling that Submitted – It's mind boggling that people still question whether or not there is such thing as porn addiction. …To the author, I challenge you to explain the RAPIDLY growing number of teenagers and 20 something's males with erectile dysfunction. There is a DIRECT CONNECTION to the availability of high speed internet porn, and over stimulation of their brains to why they can't perform with real women. The writing is on the wall. I don't need to read that in a scientific journal to take it as fact. I have lived it and known MANY others in the same boat.It doesn't really matter if you believe it's real or not because there are enough men coming out about their issues with porn that to deny it is madness, and soon enough the medical industry is going to have to address it…Sites like yourbrainonporn,nofap and yourbrainrebalanced don't exist for ss and giggles. These are men who are brave enough to take the first step in admitting they have a problem.

There is a scientific value to anecdotes, as such claims can often give rise to scientific theories and hypotheses, and guide future research. An apple falling on Newton's head is a good example of an anecdote that drove the development of a testable theory. It is reasonable to examine whether there is medical or scientific evidence that might support the above anecdotes, and to encourage future research.

A review of Pubmed, the largest online database of medical literature, reveals that there is not a single published study linking pornography and erectile dysfunction. A search for the terms "erectile dysfunction pornography" yields 52 publications. Of these, the bulk are studies that use pornography, or "visual sexual stimuli" (VSS), to test erectile dysfunction. In fact, urologists and researchers have found that pornography viewing is an effective, noninvasive and reliable test for psychogenic erectile dysfunction. One fascinating study identified that the brain activities of men watching pornography are not significantly different in men with and without erectile dysfunction.

Two compelling recent studies discuss high rates of erectile dysfunction, among young men. A 2013 study by Capogrosso, et al., found that 25% of men seeking treatment for first-onset ED were under age 40, and characterized these high rates as "worrisome." A 2012 study by Mialon, et al. identified that 30% of young Swiss men reported a history of erectile dysfunction (though the majority of these reports were classified as "mild" ED). This study is remarkable in that it represents a valid snapshot of the population of all young Swiss men, given that the research involved over nine thousand men, reporting for nationally required universal medical screening to determine military capacity.

Both of these studies identify that there is very little existing research that examines the rates of erectile dysfunction in young men. Historically, this has been studied and treated predominantly in older men. However, society has undergone a dramatic shift in the past years, as medications for erectile dysfunction have become more widely available. Since 1999, when Bob Dole appeared in commercials for Viagra, there appears to have been a decrease in the stigma associated with disclosing erectile dysfunctions. The high numbers of disclosure of erectile dysfunction in young men may reflect this change, and not an increase in the rates actually experienced.

But, on what do Miallon and Capogrosso blame these high rates of erectile dysfunction in young men? The answer is not pornography. In fact, pornography use doesn't come up in either of these studies, nor in any of the reports of these young men. Mialon, et al. found that young men's erectile dysfunction was linked to use of medication without a prescription, to a low level of sexual experience, and to both mental and physical health. Tobacco use, alcohol use and drug use were also significant predictors. Capogrosso, et al. found similar results, where young men presenting for treatment of ED reported much higher rates of cigarette smoking and alcohol use, when compared to their older counterparts.

Smoking, and use of tobacco, is one of the key factors in erectile dysfunction in young men.

It is frankly surprising to many of us that one-quarter to one-third of young men may experience erectile dysfunction. But, I think that the surprise about these rates is likely tied to the fact that throughout history, this wasn't something that was researched, or disclosed by young men. So, any report of ED in young men is surprising, because we have long believed that this just doesn't happen to young men.

When men, whether old or young, report erectile dysfunction, I think it is an opportunity, not a tragedy. In my clinical practice, I invite such men to explore the idea that one's genitalia plays only a small role in sexual activity. Failing to get an erection may direct men to attend to other aspects of the interaction, and may also sometimes be a cue to attend to psychological or relational issues; Herb Goldberg, Ph.D. called this "The Wisdom of the Penis." I sympathize with the fear and anger expressed by the men in the above comments, who are struggling with something they don't understand and can't control. But I'm saddened by the degree to which this vibrant dialogue has accepted that a man's sexual value is determined solely by the hardness of his erection.

A similar problem has occurred when women are accused of becoming "addicted" to vibrators, with the fear that using them inhibited a woman's ability to have orgasms during so-called "normal" sex. Like the arguments about male porn use and erectile dysfunction, this argument is tainted by gender bias and lack of understanding of sexuality.

These perspectives remind me of other documents also available on the Pubmed site, treatises from the 1800s on the dangers of masturbation and "self-pollution." These arguments were introduced to medicine in the 1700s by Samuel Tissot but also occur in many religious/spiritual traditions, such as Eastern religions that discuss "Chi" and the tantric offshoot called Karezza. All of these theories are based on the nonscientific concept that orgasm/ejaculation somehow deplete a person's energy, just like athletic coaches commonly tell athletes to refrain from sex prior to competition.

I'm glad the reddit no-fap site and the yourbrainonporn sites are inviting and encouraging young men to share their stories, to discuss sexuality, and are helping these young men to educate themselves about their sexuality. Those are all good things, though I worry that these sites are great examples of the dangerous power of social psychology. Peer pressure, conformity theory, expectancy theory, and sample bias can all lead to an impression that these anecdotes are more representative than they may truly be.

The porn use reported by these individuals is not "a single variable" but involves masturbation, and significant time on the Internet, affecting their daily schedule, physical health, relationships, etc. Any or all of these variables may also affect erectile function and are not discussed in a simplistic "blame-porn" approach.

As a clinician, I'm ethically concerned when groups actively recommend things that are not supported by science or clinical practice. At this point, there's no scientific evidence to suggest that the ED reported by these young men cannot be explained by known causes. To ethically assert otherwise would require research or studies that weeded through individuals making these reports, and used good methodology and thorough assessments that ruled out the above known causes, to identify if there is truly a group of men with ED that cannot be explained by factors other than porn use. But, at this time, it appears most clinically and scientifically appropriate to work under the assumption that porn use and erectile dysfunction are not causally linked.

Feature image by Josh McGinn

Don’t touch that dial: A busy week for Pauley Perrette

Suzanne McCarley · 22 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Hoo-boy! Here comes drama and I’m making a truckload of popcorn. Star Crazy NCIS star (and serial restraining order abuser) Pauley Perrette has a big week ahead of her and it should be very interesting to watch. To set the mood, dim the lights and reread this update we published a few days ago (content of which has apparently inspired a new Twitter hashtag: #boycottncis):

http://www.avoiceformen.com/restraining-order-terrorism/pauley-perrette-busted-with-leaked-911-call-then-goes-apeshit-on-whistleblower/

“You’re a tool of a psychpath stalker. Have you no mom? Have you no God? I see you want to be famous. Protect the stalked, not the stalkers”

What. A. Bitch. Have I said that before? “Protect the stalked” is exactly what we are trying to do, from the actions of criminally corrupt Prosecutor and Deputy LA City Attorney Elizabeth “He’s breathing! That’s harassment!” Gertz, corrupt LAPD Detective Jose “Gimme a hug” Viramontes, and retired corrupt Detective Martha “Don’t you dare bring up my sexual harassment case” DeFoe, along with cyber-stalking bully Hollywood PI John “Throw spaghetti on yourself and have your husband arrested” Nazarian, Daniel “Get me a job at NCIS and I’ll shut the hell up” Rivas, and a few others. Anyway, gotta love that little TwiTantrum, and kudos to Charles C. Johnson of http://gotnews.com/ for sharing the audio recording, which Our Dear Pauley oddly didn’t address in her tweet.

We at AVfM are happy to see another media source publicizing the parts of the story that Perrette & Co. aren’t telling—like the part about who is the real criminal in the decade-long vendetta Perrette has carried out against her ex-husband, Francis (Coyote) Shivers. Indeed, it appears that still another (as yet unnamed and quite famous) publication is considering covering it as well. Said publication was once considered a “tabloid,” back in the days before nearly all commercial news outlets became tabloids.

Pauley’s Big Adventure begins Tuesday, September 23, with the 12th season premier of “The Abby Show,” aka NCIS. I’m sure those of us who still watch the Big Three will be glued to our televisions, waiting to see what hi-jinks Gibbs and the gang are up to now. And not to be catty (Oh, who am I kidding? MEOW!), but I sure hope that’s a wig on the top of Perrette’s empty head. She supposedly had to stop dyeing her hair Decades-Too-Young Black due to allergies, and I’ve seen a couple of close-ups: either she’s wearing a wig or her hair is toast. I won’t be watching the show, but I’ll certainly be monitoring a few Twitter feeds.

Wednesday the 24th is the really big day, although I suspect Perrette won’t be calling attention to it. Wednesday is the court hearing for her request to make her temporary restraining order against Coyote Shivers a permanent restraining order. Perrette has been ordered by Judge Hank Goldberg to be present at this hearing, something she has managed to avoid for many years. Yet another declaration presumably will not suffice; she will be required to testify, and be cross-examined, in person. I have no idea if she plans to show up. A Voice for Men submitted, and was of course denied, another press request to record the hearing. Also believed to have submitted requests are NCFM, GotNews.com, and the yet-unnamed news source. It will be interesting to see if any media requests were granted. There will be plenty going on that we would love to document.

Will Our Dear Pauley show? She’s rather stuck between the proverbial rock and hard place. If she testifies, she’ll have to answer for copious quantities of past and present lies, under oath. If she doesn’t appear, she risks arrest. If it weren’t for that pesky perjury thing, I’m sure she’d just love to arrive with an entourage of about 20 hulking bodyguards, all giving the stink-eye to the innocuous man who “terrifies” her so. My guess is no, she won’t be there. Since her campaign of restraining order terrorism is no longer being swept under the rug, she can’t afford to testify; she hasn’t been required to do so since she first launched the process of stalking, harassing, and attempting to ruin Coyote Shivers.

If she testifies now, all her sleazy lies will be out in the open—the day after her big premier. I predict that the “& Co." part of Perrette & Co. will present the judge with yet another dramatic and completely fabricated declaration packed with excuses for her absence and will humbly beg for leniency—the poor dear will simply be too terrified to be in the same secure, heavily guarded courthouse as Shivers. Remember that "breakdown" I predicted last year? She might even arrange to be hospitalized due to emotional trauma. Wouldn't that be a great publicity stunt?

If (when) she doesn't show up, what will the new judge in the case, Stephen Moloney, do? Will he postpone the hearing? (Yeah, let's drag this out another 10 years, shall we?) Will he accept another declaration in spite of the order to appear? Will he sign a warrant for Pauley Perrette's arrest? (Oh, the PR mileage she'd get out of that!) Will Perrette simply forfeit, let the damn TRO die, hoping the whole thing will quietly go away? (It won't. Trust me. It won't.) Who knows, maybe another "Angela Garber" will mysteriously appear in the remaining few days before the hearing, spouting more ludicrous (but ostensibly unrelated) false allegations against Coyote Shivers. If that happens, I'm pretty sure this time it won't fly. Perrette may finally be running out of "pals" she can manipulate into playing her little game—it's getting to be a rather risky business now that people are watching.

Nothing is scheduled for Thursday, beyond dealing with the possible (Mmm, what's the proper forensic term? Ah yes!) "blowback" from the hearing. Friday the 26th, however, Ms. Star Crazy will surely be awaiting the outcome of Mr. Shivers's hearing in criminal court. This will be a routine "progress report" hearing related to his patently wrongful conviction for violating the criminally obtained "temporary" restraining order that's been hanging over his head for a decade. —Yes, Your Honor, Mr. Shivers has been following all the rules. No, Ms. Gertz, giving an interview to GotNews.com was not harassment, nor was it intimidation, or anything else you want to call it. It was a man exercising his Constitutional rights. And you might want to take a peek at that little document, just for the hell of it. I had to memorize it to pass eighth grade, and it wasn't that difficult.

Whatever the legal outcomes of the coming events, I can guarantee a couple of things. One is that A Voice for Men, along with others, will continue to investigate and expose Pauley Perrette's lies and crimes until her utter depravity is common knowledge, and not just among those who are very well paid to protect her reputation. She will probably never see the inside of a jail cell, but at the very least her career should end when NCIS does, if not sooner. If she becomes "Hollywood poison," the lack of attention and adulation would drive her crazier than she already is—a perfectly suitable consequence for her despicable behavior.

The other guarantee I'd make is that Coyote Shivers will survive and probably thrive. He has lived under the weight of this bullshit for a decade. Yes, it has been horribly traumatic, but it hasn't destroyed him. And it won't, which likely frustrates and infuriates Perrette more than anything ever has or ever will. Shivers was not her first victim, and he probably won't be her last, but choosing him was her biggest mistake. Who'd have thought that a soft-spoken, cheerful, good-natured man would stand up to all the money and influence wielded by one of Hollywood's darlings? Our Dear Pauley sure didn't. Years of effort and money spent manufacturing drama and unprovoked malicious lies, and she has already lost.

She just doesn't know it yet.

We're going to need a lot of melted butter and a bit of salt for the popcorn.

Melbourne Men's Rights gathering an unqualified success

Tom Voltz · 23 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On Saturday, September 13, 2014, at around lunchtime, two sleep-deprived and nervous but also excited and hopeful men made their way into Melbourne's historic Young & Jackson Hotel, ordered a pint of Guinness each, found a table in the quietest corner of the back bar, and sat down to wait.

These two men were myself (Tom Voltz) and Adrian Johnson, co-founders of Men's Rights Sydney, and we were there to take part in the first regional gathering of MHRAs to take place under the banner of our newly launched national umbrella group, Men's Rights Australia.

We were sleep-deprived because we had been up doing research for a future project until 1:30 a.m. the night before and had to get up at 4:30 a.m. to catch the first flight from Sydney to Melbourne; we were nervous because we weren't sure how many, if any, would show up; and we were hopeful because if things went well it would really knock Men's Rights Activism in Australia up a notch, spice weasel–style—BAM!

One by one, over the next hour, a series of men with unfamiliar faces but familiar names and/or voices approached the table, introduced themselves, and sat down to chat. People who went by names like Nemo, Karma MGTOW, Jim Muldoon, Bane666au, and a bunch of others, they all started to arrive, and with each arrival our nervousness dissipated and our excitement grew. We even attempted to get James Huff to join the party via Skype, but the complications inherent with mobile Wi-Fi hotspots meant that we only managed to achieve that for about three-quarters of a second before it crashed in a heap. Sorry, James, we tried!

We started the meeting with a brief round of introductions and a short explanation from myself about what the broad goals of the meeting were and why we had gone to the trouble and expense of setting it all up, but this formal beginning didn't last long. In almost no time at all we had all clustered into groups of two to six and were all yammering away like we had all known one another for years. It was incredible how well everyone seemed to get on and how naturally and easily the conversations started.

When we first conceived of this meeting way back in March, we had no idea whether anyone would be interested in a meeting like this so we scoured as many men's rights blogs, forums, websites, and friends of friends as we could, in an attempt to find as many people as possible who may be interested in coming.

Over the course of a few months, to our surprise, we found a total of 23 people that we either knew, or strongly suspected, lived in or near Melbourne, much more than we had initially reckoned on. After contacting this 23, 17 replied, 16 expressed interest, and 13 said they were definitely coming. We had a couple of no-shows and one person who had originally declined change his mind so, in the end, we had an even dozen attendees. Given how few MHRAs exist in Melbourne and how difficult it is to get people to leave the cocoon of their Internet-connected homes and come out for anything these days, we reckon that's not too shabby.

One of the primary reasons for this meeting was to attempt to suggest and assist any interested parties in setting up a regional men's rights group in Melbourne that would operate both independently, in their local area, and under the umbrella of Men's Rights Australia for national issues, much in the same vein as Men's Rights Sydney currently operates. Also on the agenda was discussion about the way the Men's Rights Australia umbrella group would operate, possible methods of taking formal political action on behalf of men and boys in Australia, and discussion of a formal list of guidelines, best practice, and good strategies and tactics to use when conducting activism under the name of Men's Rights Australia.

I am happy to be able to say that all of this, and more, was achieved and that we hope to be able to announce the launch of Men's Rights Melbourne in the near future. However, despite the practical work we accomplished, the most gratifying part for us was simply having an opportunity to meet face to face with a group of activists who we had previously only known online and get to know them in person. The time and expense involved in an operation like this was not insignificant, but both myself and Adrian agree that we took away at least as much as we put into it, so we consider it time and money well spent.

The day ended pleasantly enough with a few of us stragglers and hangers-on, still madly yammering away at one another, retiring to a nearby Chinese restaurant for dinner before saying our final farewells. Adrian and I, completely exhausted after a 15-hour day on only three hours of sleep then made the slow trek back to our hotel, intent on falling straight into our beds, only to find that we were so buzzed by the meeting's success that sleep eluded us. A thorough postmortem, a couple of James Bond movies, and a pizza soon solved that little problem, though. Thank god for late checkouts.

All in all it was a huge success. We achieved everything we had aimed to achieve and had a great time in the process. However, this is not the end, far from it. In fact, it's just the beginning. We intend to repeat this process all over Australia, eventually setting up a group in each capital city that will operate independently locally and nationally, under the combined banner of Men's Rights Australia. It's an ambitious goal, but we are determined to achieve it.

Finally, we want to say a huge thanks to all of you who made the effort to show up and take part in this meetup, and especially to those of you who have volunteered to set up and run Men's Rights Melbourne. Without you, none of this would have been a success. We look forward to keeping in touch with you all on a regular basis and, with any luck, working with you on behalf of Australian men and boys for a long time to come.

An inquiry into the CDC's 1 in 5 rape figure

Yuval Levental · 23 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Questioning its reliability and comparing to other viewpoints

On September 5, 2014, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) released the results from its 2011 National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NISVS). Many newspapers, such as USA Today, wrote headlines claiming that 1 in 5 women in the United States were raped. By their methods, while men experienced other kinds of sexual violence at half the rate and stalking at a third of the rate of women, they experienced rape at only a tenth of the rate of women.

Is it really possible that 20% of women in the United States are victims of rape? What was the definition that they used, and what kinds of questions did they ask? Finally, how reliable is the survey's structure? Overall, no matter what is really true, rape should be studied with the upmost care, as it is a hard-to-define but sensitive issue.

An Overview of the CDC's Questions and Methods

The 2011 NISVS survey was conducted over the telephone, with randomly selected respondents' 12,727 completed responses. This was only the second time the survey was conducted. Additionally, the response rate was only 33.1%.

The statistic that stands out the most is that 19.3% of the surveyed women have been raped in their lifetimes. How was "rape" defined in this survey? There were three categories: "completed forced penetration," "attempted forced penetration," and "alcohol- or drug-facilitated penetration." Already just from observing the data, the "attempted" category shouldn't have been mixed in with the two other statements.

Anti-feminist critic Christina Hoff Sommers noted that the question asked for alcohol- or drug-facilitated penetration was "When you were [drunk, high, drugged,] or [passed out and unable to give consent], how many people ever had vaginal sex with you?" The respondent would give a numerical answer, from which it wasn't possible to differentiate between consensual, non-consensual, and personally regretted experiences.

However, anti-MRA blogger Barry Deutsch retorted that Sommers and other anti-feminist bloggers left out the preceding statement from the survey, which stated that "Sometimes sex happens when a person is unable to consent to it or stop it from happening because they were drunk, high, drugged, or passed out from alcohol, drugs, or medications. This can include times when they voluntarily consumed alcohol or drugs or they were given drugs or alcohol without their knowledge or consent." The phrase "stop it from happening" could have easily meant an impulsive decision that was made "under the influence."

Deutsch provides a link to the survey questions. Looking at them, on page 37, the three questions with regards to alcohol- or drug-facilitated penetration included the phrases "had vaginal sex with you," "made you perform/receive anal sex," or "made you perform/receive oral sex." What is shocking is that the category for vaginal sex uses the word "had," whereas the categories for oral and anal sex (which men could also answer to) use the word "made." Obviously, this discrepancy created a significant increase for the rape rate for women. Why would a "top-notch" institution like the CDC possibly deviate from maintaining consistent standards?

The lifetime prevalence for completed forced penetration for women alone from the survey is 11.5%. This isn't as extreme as 1 in 5, but even it is questionable to an extent. As stated, the response rate was rather low, and this was only the second year the survey was carried out, all done over the telephone. A second method of analysis would be needed as comparison, one that is more reliable.

The Bureau of Justice Statistics' Crime Survey: A different viewpoint

The National Crime Victimization Survey (NCVS) has been administered by the Bureau of Justice Statistics (BJS) since 1972. This survey interviews 49,000 to 77,400 households twice a year. The average response rate is 87%.

This survey doesn't measure the lifetime prevalence but the yearly incidence. The question asked concerning rape and sexual assault is more straightforward, simply asking participants whether they have been raped/sexually assaulted or not.

The accumulated results for the 2011 survey are available online. On page 2, Table 1, for 2011, it was estimated that there were 243,800 total cases of rape and sexual assault combined. This translates to a rate of 0.9/1000, or assuming that the vast majority of rape victims are women, 1.8/1000 for women. Additionally, from 2002 to 2011, there was a decrease in cases of 30%. It should also be noted that out of all the crimes listed for that year, rape had the lowest number listed, second to serious intimate partner violence. Even the category for aggravated assault had approximately four times as many surveyed cases than rape. This makes the 1 in 5 figure for rape even more questionable.

The survey included rape cases that were reported and underreported to the police in its figures. According to Table 9, page 9, only 30% of the surveyed rape cases were reported. With regards to underreporting, back in 1974, the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration claimed that there were three times more rapes than what was reported, and that after that, with no basis in reality, there were an avalanche of reforms to make rape more reportable, which never occurred with any other crime. Some feminists somehow still claim that even today, as little as 10% of rape cases are reported to the police.

As a direct comparison, the CDC's survey also included the 12-month incidence for rape in 2011 in its report. The incidence for all forms of rape for women was 1.6%, according to their metrics. If the CDC was right, there would be a victimization rate of 16/1000 for women – eight times the BJS's rate! This means that the vast majority of rape cases would somehow have never been reported to the police, which considering the reforms implemented, should have been far from possible.

Final Thoughts

In short, rape is a serious issue, no matter what side one takes. It is also a very difficult crime to properly define and survey, as much research has shown that it is based on subjective perceptions. However, this is never a good reason to create unneeded public hysteria. As mentioned, this only leads to extraneous reforms as an increasing tide of men are being falsely convicted. Overall, there must be serious revisions in the definition and surveying of rape and in the prosecution and legal proceedings of rape cases from both parties' viewpoints.

At the 25 “Most Dangerous Colleges” you are still safe from rape

August Løvenskiolds · 23 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In 2012, the publication Business Insider examined FBI crime statistics to determine what they called “The Most Dangerous Colleges In America.” According to the article:

> We ranked the most dangerous colleges by averaging FBI crime data per capita from 2008 to 2011 for schools with enrollment over 10,000. Schools were ranked based on a combination of violent crime rank and property crime rank, with violent crime weighted four times higher….
>
> NOTE: Some people have objected to our use of FBI data because (1) not all schools participate in the survey and (2) some schools are more aggressive than others in reporting crime in neighboring noncampus areas.
>
> In response to criticism, we prepared an alternate list based on on-campus crimes tracked for the Clery Act. We are happy to report, however, that this alternate ranking produced remarkably similar results — suggesting that both lists are good at identifying dangerous colleges. For instance, two schools which objected vocally to our original list — UCLA and UC-Riverside — were also named among the most dangerous colleges based on this new data set.

Interestingly, the report broke out rape as a separate category, making it possible to paint a lurid portrait of the massive amount of rape occurring on the 25 most dangerous college campuses in America.

The results are stunning.

Out of 530,838 students, an astonishing 42 rapes were reported in 2011. This is less than 1 rape per 12,658 students—and this on the campuses of the worst, most violent criminal schools in the United States.

That “1 in 5 women” campus rape bullshit number you’ve heard about is now officially refuted once again, and by hard data from two separate sources. If half the students enrolled are women, the real number of rapes is closer to 1 in 6,328 women.

Even at the most rape-prone college, Western Illinois, those feminists craving to take part in rape culture first-hand will be hard-pressed to get raped—only 8 rapes were to be had among 6,000 women. UCLA had the most rapes at 12, but this is still slim pickings when spread out over 19,000 co-eds.

There is still hope for rape-mongering feminists, however—the article ignored smaller schools under 10,000 students, so those demanding ravishment to feed their perpetual victimhood might still be able to finger out a smaller school with a more rape-happy attitude.

The crops of rape farmed so assiduously by feminists have failed, and more slutwalks don’t seem to be helping, as the detailed results show:

“Dangerous University” according to Business Insider 2012	Number of Students	Actual Reported Rapes	Rate of Rape per 10,000 Students
Florida State University — Tallahassee	40,416	3	0.74
University of California — Riverside	20,692	1	0.48
Arkansas State University — Jonesboro	13,415	0	0
State University of New York College — Buffalo	12,419	0	0
North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University	10,795	0	0
Western Illinois University	12,585	8	6.36

California State University — Fresno	20,932	0	0
Rutgers University — Newark	11,798	1	0.85
New Mexico State University	28,300	0	0
Northern Arizona University	25,197	1	0.4
Massachusetts Institute of Technology	10,566	0	0
Southern Illinois University — Carbondale	20,037	3	1.5
University of Cincinnati	32,283	0	0
Indiana State University	11,494	0	0
Ball State University	22,083	0	0
Georgia Institute of Technology	20,720	4	1.93
Louisiana State University — Baton Rouge	29,451	0	0
University of South Alabama	14,776	2	1.35
University of New Mexico	28,688	2	0.7
San Diego State University	29,187	5	1.71
Vanderbilt University	12,714	0	0
Florida A&M University	13,284	0	0
Duke University	15,016	0	0
University of California — Berkeley	35,833	0	0
University of California — Los Angeles	38,157	12	3.14
Totals	530,838	42	0.79

Tweetfest: “Live chat with NCIS cast”

Suzanne McCarley · 23 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Do you Tweet? If not, today would be a great day to open your very own Twitter account. (Twitter.com) It appears CBS Connect is hosting an NCIS Season Premier event tonight:

http://www.cbs.com/connect/events/1000313/

That’s right, a live chat with NCIS cast (from 8 pm Eastern until 9 pm Pacific.) “Tweet a question.” We think AVfM’s readers might have a few very interesting questions they’d like to ask, judging by some of the discussions we’ve seen.

[image]

[image]

[image]

FTSU

It’s what we do.

Another domestic abuse experiment shows same results

AVfM Video Source · 24 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This is at least the third if not fourth experiment like this that we've seen. And we've seen it in multiple countries and languages too. The results are always the same:

Of war criminals and academic gender ideologues

Dr. Douglas W. Texter · 24 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Have you ever met a war criminal?

I don't mean someone whose politics—Republican or Democratic—you disagree with. I mean the real deal: someone who advocates and possesses the power to actualize the deaths of those he dislikes.

We're talking Goebbels, Himmler, Pol Pot.

Those kinds of people.

I have met one such person, very briefly, when I earned my undergraduate degree at the University of Pennsylvania.

In this essay, I'm going to compare this person with an essentialist feminist I met much later in my academic career—during my Ph.D. program at the University of Minnesota. I'll argue that the thought of the war criminal bore a striking similarity to that of the academic feminist I met and worked with.

This similarity of thought, especially in its tendency to essentialize others—in one case Bosnian Muslims and in the other men—has given me pause.

It should give all of us pause.

In the fall of 1987, I took a class on Marxist philosophy with a professor whose life seemed to come straight from the big screen: Lawrence of Arabia, Indiana Jones, and Dr. Zhivago all popped into my head when I thought of Dr. Mihailo Markovic. During World War II, Dr. Markovic, who hailed from Serbia, led, on horseback, I believe, a battalion of partisans against the Germans laying waste to his country. After he pushed the Nazis out, he went to graduate school and became a well-regarded professor of philosophy in Yugoslavia.

He had certainly met Tito and possibly, according to a classmate who knew Dr. Markovic better than I did, Stalin himself.

Dr. Markovic also served as the editor of Praxis, perhaps the best-known Marxist journal in the world. In his spare time, he had become a chess grandmaster. When he lectured, he seemed learned, urbane, witty, and charming. At the end of the course, he told us all if we ever came to Belgrade, we should look him up. He seemed like a very smart grandfather.

After the course, I thought no more of Dr. Markovic, even though I made two trips to the former Yugoslavia myself: one in 1988 and another in 1995, shortly before the Dayton Peace Accords.

A year or so after he taught me, Dr. Markovic went back to Serbia, shortly before the civil war occasioned by Tito's death and the fracturing of the Republic of Yugoslavia. He became a close adviser of Slobodan Milosevic, who was accused of practicing the ethnic cleansing of the Bosnian Muslims.

Apparently, Dr. Markovic, who died shortly after Milosevic did, served as one of the architects of the intellectual underpinnings of the extermination perpetrated by the Serbs and Bosnian Serbs. He wasn't indicted for crimes against humanity, but all accounts (including those of his former colleagues) strongly suggest that the head of Serbian Socialist Party (not a member, but the leader) was complicit in ethnic cleansing.

Over the years, I've occasionally thought about Dr. Markovic, sometimes in bewildered wonderment. He was a Marxist. Marxism stresses the brotherhood of all mankind. National origin matters not. Class solidarity counts. But Dr. Markovic, despite his propensity for dialectical materialism, possessed an older identity, an ethnic one. And this Serb ethnicity trumped his intellectual commitments to a class-free world.

And, as Kurt Vonnegut would have said, so it goes: the death squads fired away until NATO, the UN, and the U.S. intervened with airstrikes and troop insertions.

Dr. Markovic's problem, I think, involved the tendency of those with very strong ethnic or gender identities to essentialize the other. Essentialism implies that somebody is all of who he or she is because of a part of his or her identity. That part or portion determines, in the eye of the beholder, the full nature of the person.

As a very obvious example, a person can be an architect, a vegetarian, and a reader of detective stories, but for Dr. Markovic, if that person were also a Bosnian Mulsim, that part of the person's identity determined, in a very lethal way, how he would think of him or her.

When he taught me, I would never have thought that Dr. Markovic was "that way." He seemed very kind. And he was probably very kind to people he considered fully human. But those not so considered belonged, in his view, in camps or in front of firing squads.

To put it mildly, Dr. Markovic possessed a cultural blind spot.

When as a literature professor I teach Uncle Tom's Cabin, I often talk about these blind spots. Not all (or even most) slave owners existed as monstrous psychopaths who wanted to murder, whip, sexually abuse, and destroy people. Most of them attended church, practiced kindness to their neighbors, fed their dogs, and played with their children. They were basically decent human beings. But they also had blind spots. They didn't see Africans as fully human. This viewpoint allowed Southerners to enslave Africans for hundreds of years. In other words, Southerners essentialized African Americans. These people certainly possessed other qualities, but the color of their skin overdetermined how they would be treated.

If you think that these blind spots have disappeared in the contemporary world, you would be incorrect, as the curious case of my former professor demonstrates.

Years after my encounter with Dr. Markovic, I went to graduate school at the University of Minnesota, where I worked with a noted academic feminist, Dr. Ellen Messer-Davidow. She became my adviser largely because I couldn't find anybody else who seemed appropriate. She could be charming and funny. But she was also, when it came to men, an essentialist. Her thought came very close in many ways to that of Dr. Markovic.

Dr. Messer-Davidow targeted not Muslims but men. I watched her base her decisions almost entirely on gender. Women always had "good heads on the shoulders." Men—especially men she disagreed with—existed as "oily" brutal bullies.

If there were a choice between believing something a man had said and something a woman had said, she always believed the woman.

Female students needed a place to say what was on their minds, no matter how outrageous or the wrong the statements might be. Male students had to toe a politically correct line.

Dr. Messer-Davidow liked self-deprecating men and always proved willing and able to help them to be self-deprecating. Men would receive lectures in class about making sure that they helped their female partners with chores.

One graduate student I knew—a male—asked Dr. Messer-Davidow, in a very tight job market, to help him secure an academic job by making some phone calls for him. She remained loyal to her feminist values and said that for her to make such calls would disempower women and minorities. Yes, that's right. Such phone calls would wipe out the gains of the Enlightenment, the Civil Rights Movement, and the Nineteenth Amendment.

Dr. Messer-Davidow possessed an interesting moral calculus to determine whether men were "okay": their stance on feminism. There existed the good guys (feminists) and bad guys (anti-feminists).

Yet, even if a man were "okay," that is, believing in many of the tenets of feminism, he could never be completely all right. Dr. Messer-Davidow once ran a feminist group. A man I know wanted to participate in the discussions. Even though he believed in much of feminist ideology, she wouldn't allow him in the group because he possessed male genitalia. He would, according to her, make the women feel uncomfortable by his very presence.

Imagine if a man in any group ever said, “I’m sorry, you can’t attend our study group because the presence of a woman will make us uncomfortable.” Dr. Messer-Davidow would have called the man a “sexist pig” and immediately formed a campus-wide protest and probably called for litigation.

We’ve arrived at the point at which Dr. Markovic and Dr. Messer-Davidow join in a kind of hellish essentialist dance. Feminism, like Marxism, is an ideology. Being female, like being a Bosnian Muslim, is an identity. Yet, the worldview of the man didn’t matter for Dr. Messer-Davidow, just as it didn’t matter for Dr. Markovic. For Dr. Messer-Davidow, the very fact that a man possessed genitalia made the student suspect and a potential enemy, just as the very fact that a person was Bosnian Muslim made that individual human garbage for Dr. Markovic.

We’re in very, very dangerous territory here. These are the intellectual outlands of the Holocaust, of Rwanda, of the African Diaspora.

Both Dr. Markovic and Dr. Messer-Davidow, while in some ways very sophisticated thinkers, adopted essentialist worldviews that represent ways of knowing and classifying that go all the way back to the cave.

Let’s pan back from Dr. Messer-Davidow for a second and look at the bigger picture. She represents merely a symptom of a huge problem in the academy: the essentializing and marginalizing of men: rape culture; all men are bullies; all men should pay for thousands of years of patriarchy; men don’t have emotions; gender-based hiring quotas.

We’re departing from the world created by the Enlightenment and moving back into the very bad territory of tribalism and group guilt, the world of Dr. Markovic and identity-based politics. This world creates only pain, suffering, and injustice.

I’m not saying that I ever heard Dr. Messer-Davdiow proclaim that all men should be herded into death camps. She never said that, at least to me. But her thinking possessed the same essentializing tendencies of that of Dr. Markovic: totalization and, I believe, hate.

Now, for the record, I actually believe in some of the tenets of both Marxism and feminism. Should we be moving toward a more economically just society? Yes. Should gender not play a role in hiring decisions, promotion decisions, and pay decisions? Of course it shouldn’t.

Beyond these basic agreements with Dr. Markovic and Dr. Messer-Davidow, I don’t think much of the essentialist thinking that either of these academics swaddled themselves in. Such thinking leads us backwards as a species, not forward toward any kind of just society.

In fact, this kind of essentialist thinking leads us, ultimately, only to very bad places, ones that should be consigned to the horrors of history.

The crap-cake called “Men’s Studies,” why it’s failing, and why that’s a good thing

Jonathan Taylor · 24 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Imagine how productive an academic discipline purporting to study and advocate the well-being of Blacks would be if it were staffed almost entirely by White nationalists.

Now replace “White nationalist” with “feminist” and “Blacks” with “men” and you’ll have the core reason why Men’s Studies programs, which emerged in the 1970s and are staffed primarily by feminists, are failing.

The Chronicle of Higher Education has an article [1] about the declining influence of Men’s Studies. Tom Bartlett, the author, doesn’t interview any men’s and boys’ advocates who are actually trying to go out into the world and create change, but he interviews numerous Men’s Studies professors and supporters. Here’s how it starts off:

> A dozen or so men – and one woman – bemoaned the state of men’s studies on an appropriately gray, damp day here. One complained about the “lack of space to interrogate masculinity” on the American college campus.

Yeah, right: there is an incredible lack of criticism of men and masculinity on college campuses.

I suppose that when the 88 Duke professors who, speaking for five academic departments and 10 academic programs, publicly signed a letter taking the side of a false rape accuser based on nothing but her word, when they took their prejudices into the classroom and exploited the occasion to impose narratives of the evils of men on their own students [2], that this was evidence of a “lack of space to interrogate masculinity”?

I suppose, when the entire campus was converted into an anti-male hatefest and students paraded around a banner reading “castrate” that this was also evidence of a “lack of space to interrogate masculinity”?

I suppose thousands of Women’s Studies departments, “date rape” campaigns, and feminist sociology, psychology, English, and other humanities professors who all point to the original sin of men and masculinity (“patriarchy”) as the chief cause of all the problems in the world isn’t good enough “interrogation”?

A “lack of space to interrogate masculinity”? How much more space do you need? If you’d like to learn more about anti-male bias in higher education, read these posts for a start, and then these for more. These contain things you will never see recognized or discussed by the “Men’s Studies” crowd.

The word interrogate is not one that particularly strikes me as embodying empathy. Let’s ask some questions that Men’s Studies professors are not likely to ask one another any time soon: do you think that “interrogating Blacks and Blackness” is what goes on in African-American Studies? Do you think that “interrogating women and femininity” is what goes on in Women’s / Gender Studies?

No, of course not. But let us continue with the Chronicle article:

> Even though the association [the American Men's Studies Association] has been around for 22 years, and even though men's studies dates back to at least the 1970s, outsiders still tend to greet it with derision or disbelief. Why study men? As the joke goes, we already have men's studies: it's called history.

Yes, history studies men—men who do the same narrow things and live out the same narrow roles over and over. Men who work 60+ hours a week as the primary breadwinner, but not men who are stay-at-home dads. Men who are taught to sacrifice their lives in the workplace and in war for their families, tribes, and countries, but not men who reject those social expectations and say—in their own way—"my body, my choice."

Pointing to stories of war and business written by men to argue that men have always had a voice is like pointing to books on cooking and relationships written by women to argue that women have always had a voice. Why have Women's Studies? Aren't all those Betty Crocker cookbooks and "Dear Abby" advice columns enough?

Part of the problem is that Men's Studies is hard to define. It's easier to start with what it's not. Men's Studies is not men's rights, which advocates for changes in, for example, child custody laws.
But why doesn't Men's Studies have room for the concept of men's rights? After all, Women's Studies certainly has room for women's rights. Why are phrases like "I support the equal human rights of men and boys" hard phrases for many of these professors to swallow?

I wonder …

And it is certainly not Male Studies, a fledgling academic offshoot created by critics who see Men's Studies, which is heavily influenced by feminist work on gender and power, as insufficiently pro-men.
If by "insufficiently pro-men" you mean that feminism far too often trivializes and denies the humanity of men and boys, promotes sexist double standards that pedestalize and privilege women, and is rife with anti-male hatred, then yes. The inability of Men's Studies to come to terms with that and discuss it is a significant factor in its irrelevance.

You see, folks, there is an unspoken rule that most feminists (and unfortunately many academics) live by, and that is this: so long as you are a feminist you can say and do whatever sexist and hateful things you want. Not only will you not be punished for it, you will often be rewarded. The label of "feminist" grants you political immunity from criticism for holding any kind of double standard that would immediately railroad you out of academia if you dared apply a similar double standard against women.

"Men's Studies" atrophies and withers because it just isn't rigorous as a discipline. And it's not rigorous because the people running it don't have the moral or intellectual courage to ask the hard, dynamic, and at times explosive questions that create real discussion.

Questions that explore alternative worldviews outside of the myopic feminist dogma of "patriarchy." Questions that take the concept of misandry and male powerlessness seriously. Questions that hold women as well as men (rather than just men) responsible for sexist attitudes.

Questions about the lack of parental rights for fathers in family courts. Questions about the experiences of those falsely accused of rape. Questions about the educational decline of men and boys. Questions about men as victims of unilateral domestic violence, the prevalent "I can hit you with impunity because I'm a girl" attitude many women seem to have today, and society's general acceptance of those violent attitudes.

These are mere samples of a wide array of questions the Men's Studies community could be asking. But they aren't. So what are they talking about? What, in their worldview, is so much more important?

Don Conway-Long is another Men's Studies veteran, coming on board in the late 1970s. Back then the discussion was mostly about male violence toward women, which remains a frequent subject.
Hmm, male violence against women. That sounds like a Women's Studies topic, doesn't it? Again, we are back to the primary goal being to "interrogate" men and masculinity, and little to nothing else.

Mr. Long … is disappointed that Men's Studies hasn't made more progress, chalking it up to a lack of money and the misperception that if you want to study men you must be against feminism somehow.
Why pay twice for the same thing? Would you pay twice for the house you are living in? Twice for college tuition? Why pay for Men's Studies when at its core it is an ideological copy & paste of Women's Studies?

And why wouldn't you want to allow people to question feminism at some point? Does being against feminism mean you are somehow against equality? Many people in academia seem to think so, much in the same way people used to think that Protestants who were against the corruption of the medieval Catholic Church were "heretics."

Nowadays we understand that no singular denomination (or religion) has a monopoly on the concept of god. Much of academia is still in the intellectual dark ages, however, when it comes to whether ideological denominations have a monopoly on the concept of equality.

You could of course attempt some historical revisionism and argue that the Men's Human Rights Movement is an evil movement that has caused Men's Studies to fail via guilt by association, but then you'd have to somehow sidestep the fact that Men's Studies originated in the 1970s and the MHRM as it is currently known came about around 2000 with the publication of The Myth of Male Power (among other key books published in the last ~20 years) and the subsequent explosion of discussion of these ideas in online communities.

The Chronicle article continues to describe Men's Studies:

> If you're eager to learn something about the inverse relationship between cortisol and testosterone, or about gender differences in episodic memory, you should look elsewhere. If you want a genuinely interesting analysis of male chastity in the Twilight series of books and how that compares with Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, you've come to the right place.Jonathan A. Allan argued that cultural theorists underemphasize the importance of the male backside and that society needs to set aside its shame and accept the symbolic richness of our > hindquarters. “I believe the ass is more important than we admit,” Mr. Allan said, in a witty presentation. “The anus is full of meaning.”

Veteran readers may remember that I wrote a post about Jonathan Allan 15 days after this website was launched. He is one of the many who argue that when a man and woman are both drunk and have sex that the man should be assumed to be a rapist. He also teaches classes on Twilight and Fifty Shades of Grey. Here’s a sample of some of his papers and presentations:

- Reading from Behind: Anal Eroticism in Delmira Agustini’s El Intruso
- Isn’t that enough? On Love in the Twilight Saga
- Purely Monstrous, Monstrously Virginal: Considering Purity, Abstinence, and Male Virginity in the Twilight Saga
- Anal Mythologies
- Reading from Behind: Fisting-as-écriture, anal eroticism, and Delmira Agustini’s El Intruso.

As I said before, if it is an increasingly common saying among education reporters that college is the new high school, why does it sometimes seem like graduate school is the new middle school?

To be fair, as Tom Bartlett says, Men’s Studies isn’t staffed entirely by feminists. There are a few leftovers from the Mythopoetic Men’s Movement of the late 1900s. But this was never really a “movement” per se to begin with; while it stressed the importance of men’s feelings, it never (to my knowledge) asked any of the questions I listed earlier in this post.

It is true that profeminist Dr. Michael Kimmel has recently opened up a “Center for the Study on Men and Masculinities” at SUNY Stony Brook, the board of which is staffed almost entirely (if not exclusively) by feminists such as Gloria Steinem and Jane Fonda. And it is also true that the new president of the profeminist American Men’s Studies Association has mentioned that she wants to “reach a wider audience.” So there are some “changes” in the world of Men’s Studies.

But the general trend for Men’s Studies appears to be downward. There is no evidence that the ideological core of the community will be any different next year than it was last year, and its veteran supporters are wondering what will become of its future.

My father once told me that if you put icing on a shit cake, it’s still a shit cake. If you want something better, you don’t try to “improve” the cake by putting new icing on it. You don’t try to re-bake the batter. You don’t ask other chefs whether they would bake their shit cake at 325 degrees instead of 350.

Instead, you start from scratch. You work from a new recipe. You question the credentials of the chefs who thought it would be a good idea to cook such a cake to begin with. And if your chefs aren’t willing or able to do that, you bring in new cooks.

Men’s Studies in its current incarnation is failing. In the long run, that is a good thing because it brings us one step closer to cooking from scratch.

A Voice for Male Students aims to create a community of writers on men’s and boys’ education issues. If you would like to submit a guest post to be published here, please read the submission guidelines.

Notes:

[1] See a PDF of the article here.

[2] For a detailed account of this, read Until Proven Innocent by Dr. KC Johnson.

Saying no to the hate-cult

AVfM Video Source · 25 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Sargon has a few words for Emma Watson:

We can't gainsay him. You may want to subscribe for more.

Two major publications now covering Pauley Perrette's court hearing

Suzanne McCarley · 25 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Pauley Perrette did show up for her restraining order hearing yesterday and it appears she's pulling out all the stops; the hearing lasted hours and was recessed until Friday the 26th. Much to our delight, the hearing isn't being ignored by all of the mainstream media; both the National Enquirer and London Daily Mail are reporting it. Tabloids? Yes, though it is worth mentioning that National Enquirer reporters were the primary source of accurate information during the O. J. Simpson saga; the MSM relied on them worldwide.

So how much longer can the so-called "legitimate" news sources continue to let themselves be scooped by papers read by millions of people?

From The Daily Mail:

"Shaking in the witness stand, Perrette said the 49-year-old musician has an obsession with her that he can't control which has left her fearing for her safety, and that of her family and pets."

From The National Enquirer:

"She has already admitted in previous court papers there has never been any physical violence against her."

and:

"'Pauley has always portrayed me as a violent, crazed stalker who desperately wants to get back together with her,' Shivers said. 'That couldn't be further from the truth. I'm a happily married man.'"

[image]

Stay tuned for more reports, here and (we hope) elsewhere, after the conclusion of the hearing.

All sarcasm aside, this is extremely important. The National Enquirer and James Robertson of The Daily Mail might not even be aware of the depth of official corruption in this case, and they might not realize how much irrefutable evidence exists against Perrette and her associates. It's possible they believe they are merely reporting a convoluted but glamorous story about a popular starlet, but they have just given millions of readers a peek into Pandora's Box – the one containing the unholy alliance between divorce lawyers and the criminal and family courts. As we have stated, the Perrette/Shivers case is likely among the worst cases of restraining order abuse in the history of California, and the international commercial press is now reporting it around the world.

Until A Voice for Men and The National Coalition for Men began investigating and exposing the facts of this case last year, the mainstream media was either reporting Perrette & Co's soundbites or ignoring it altogether. We are making a difference.

If you enjoy the content at AVFM and the activism we do on behalf of men and boys, please click here to donate to our efforts.

Emma Watson leads the retreat for UN feminism

Hopeland Cash · 25 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Emma Watson, known for her role as the witch Hermione in the Harry Potter films, was appointed as a UN Women Goodwill Ambassador in 2014 and on September 20 gave a speech at the United Nations launching the HeForShe campaign, which calls for greater male involvement in the fight against discrimination faced by women and girls.

More than that, though, the speech was about feminism as a movement and about the deep trouble it is in. Feminism's popularity has been on the decline for decades and the ideologues know it. At first they did little, thinking themselves invincible goddesses, but now they are scrambling to circle the wagons. Emma Watson's speech is meant as a rallying call, but in making it she has highlighted how fractured feminism has become.

Right off the bat we can see that the feminists are on the defensive. Watson says:

> we want to try and galvanize as many men and boys as possible to be advocates for gender equality.

They are desperate to find supporters, but as the ongoing success of Women Against Feminism proves, women aren't buying into feminists' bullshit anymore. Women all over the world have their own real, lived experiences that fly in the face of feminist doctrine. Men, on the other hand, don't know personally what life for women is like and are altruistically prone to leaping to their aid. The feminists know this and they are trying to tap into that residual chivalry to drum up new troops.

The only reason they're doing so is because they know their backs are already against the wall, and in fine fainting-couch fashion, they expect men to respond to their damsel cries even when their fellow women won't.

Watson continues:

> I have realized that fighting for women's rights has too often become synonymous with man-hating. If there is one thing I know for certain, it is that this has to stop.

Mind you, she doesn't mean that the man-hating has to stop, just the perception of feminism as such. Ms. Watson, if you're reading this, you should know that there is a word for man-hating and it is misandry. I know you like dictionaries, since you go on to parrot the dictionary definition of feminism, so try expanding your vocabulary. While you're at it, expand your bag of tricks too. We've all heard the "definition" of feminism, and the fine ladies of Women Against Feminism will be glad to explain how they feel about it.

Feminists know they have a PR problem, or maybe a PR catastrophe, but all they can do is keep squawking that it's not true, evidence to the contrary be damned. Watson touches on a few feminist talking points, including the thoroughly debunked wage gap and a brief nod to the blessedly unsuccessful Ban Bossy campaign. I'll take her cries for female bodily autonomy more seriously when she starts agitating against male conscription.

After laying the foundation of female oppression, Watson gets to the crux of her speech:

> How can we affect change in the world when only half of it is invited or feel welcome to participate in the conversation?
>
> Men—I would like to take this opportunity to extend your formal invitation. Gender equality is your issue too.

Well, hot damn.

A formal invitation. Really? Emma, dear, sweet Emma, you keeping using that "equality" word, but I don't think you know what it means. Gender equality is, by very definition, a men's and women's issue. Feminism, however, is not, has not been, and never was about equality. Leading feminists are worried because the rest of us are finally catching on to that fact. They've been harping on about the wage gap, rape culture, domestic violence, abortion, etc., for years but more and more women are seeing that the dogma doesn't reflect their lives. Now only one in four women self-identify as feminist, and even mathematically impaired feminists can see those aren't good odds.

So they're sounding the retreat and pulling in their tentacles. As patriarchy theory likes to point out, most people in positions of power are men. Business executives, politicians, university heads, all traditionally male. Therefore, throughout the gender shit storm that was the 20th century, feminism succeeded on the goodwill of those powerful men. They passed the laws, enacted the affirmative action, helped push the self-destructive propaganda. Let's face it, if most men weren't willing to bend over backwards and walk over a land mine to give women what they want, feminism would've gotten nowhere fast.

Now they're falling back on that support structure again. Except it's trickier now, isn't it, Emma? After a century of concerted misandry and bald hatred, a lot of men have become wary of having anything to do with feminism.

> Apparently I am among the ranks of women whose expressions are seen as too strong, too aggressive, isolating, anti-men and, unattractive.

Yes, you are. Ever stop to think it's for good reason?

No, of course not. You have an agenda, dammit, and you're sticking to it! That agenda now calls for greater involvement (read: groveling and self-sacrifice) of men. Women aren't drinking the Kool-Aid so they're rebranding. Watson throws a few bones out to would-be allies:

> I've seen my father's role as a parent being valued less by society

(and by the feminist organizations that routinely and universally fight shared parenting bills, including in the UK)

> I've seen young men suffering from mental illness unable to ask for help for fear it would make them look less "macho"—in fact in the UK suicide is the biggest killer of men between 20-49

(I'm glad feminists care about suicide)

But then she couldn't quite keep it together and, like the dawn inevitably coming, slipped back into gynocentrism:

> We don't often talk about men being imprisoned by gender stereotypes but I can see that they are and that when they are free …

Wait for it … wait for it …

> … things will change for women as a natural consequence.
>
> If men don't have to be aggressive in order to be accepted women won't feel compelled to be submissive. If men don't have to control, women won't have to be controlled.

Yay! Understand, men? Your issues matter to feminists, but only because fixing them will benefit women. Even when they throw us bones, they can't help aiming for our nuts. The whole point of the HeForShe campaign, and even its very name, is to make men utilities for women. They don't want male supporters; far from it. They'll drop those rapey-creeps the moment they can, but feminists are desperate, so they're now willing to employ them. Give it a few years and they might even start letting men call themselves feminists.

And one final snippet from the speech:

> I want men to take up this mantle. So their daughters, sisters and mothers can be free from prejudice but also > so that their sons have permission to be vulnerable and human too—reclaim those parts of themselves they abandoned and in doing so be a more true and complete version of themselves.

I think this sums up the feminist hypoagency-hyperagency dichotomy very well. Women must be freed from prejudice, which is imposed on them by others, while men need only reclaim what they themselves abandoned. Also, I'll give Watson the benefit of the doubt and assume it was an unintended slip that she said "daughters, sisters and mothers" for females but only "sons" for males; are our brothers and fathers, the current and past generations, already beyond saving?

That the United Nations would host such a speech and sponsor such a campaign is proof of how deep feminism runs, but the fact they are calling for male support shows how weak it has become. Feminists know they're losing. They're losing female membership and interest so their only choice is to assume a defensive posture. Male allies will help them do that by acting as enforcers to defend what territory they already have. They'll be clinging to their political influence even as public approval slips away and their new male lackeys will be able to bully non-conforming men without getting the feminists themselves labeled misandrists.

This trend has been going for some time, trying to shame and coerce men into supporting feminism with video and poster campaigns. Like a girl siccing her boyfriend on someone she hates, feminists are ready to fight their own fights just as long as no one is fighting back. The backlash has begun, though. The tide is turning and all the white knights in the world won't save them.

With any luck Emma Watson will be one of the last bigots to ever speak at the UN.

7 more staple MHRA arguments

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 25 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Continued from 7 Staple MHRA Arguments.

8. Heterogeneity is not an excuse.

A common feminist complaint is that MHRAs oversimplify feminism by treating it as a homogeneous mass. I've discussed how feminism is defined as an institution in my previous "7 Staples" article.

Feminists appeal to the complexity of feminism as an ideology to avoid discussing criticisms of feminism as an institution, or the actions of feminists. But like other No True Scotsmans, this does not magically make damage that feminists have caused go away, and it does not give MHRAs faith in feminism. Believe me, we know feminism is big. But we also know that its followers prevaricate, and dodging accountability neither impresses nor rectifies.

9. Disagreement is not the issue.

It is a common misconception that everyone has to agree to make a difference. A feminist may try to connect with a MHRA by stating his or her agreement on men's issues, which sounds great, but no one has to agree on everything to change the world. Bob can think that water is wet and Billy can think that water is dry, but if both claim to want to feed the homeless, Bob will be criticized for always staying home if Billy donates canned food.

So when AVfM, a flagship MHRA organization, does a better job of defending feminists and holding MHRAs accountable (and vise versa) than feminists do, then MHRAs will eventually be seen as better at activism than feminists.

If people place ideological consensus before action, then we are left with the impossible challenge of converting large groups to a single worldview before making a decision. It's fine to put everyone on the same page in smaller, specialized groups with specific jobs. But when you get to big, varied cultures with equally varied problems, aiming for group-think requires a terrifying lack of ethics.

10. Feminism does not own equality.

Brand recognition tells people to think U.S. Republicans are about business, objectivists are about logic, and the NAACP is about brotherhood and civil rights. But brands do not own virtues, so there is nothing stopping a NAACP member from being logical, a U.S. Republican from advocating civil rights, and an objectivist from respecting brotherhood. And when an Objectivist boasts about being logical or a Republican trumpets about being pro-business, that is nothing more than marketing.

Similarly, feminism does not own equality, and needs to stop pretending that it is the only worldview that is cognizant of the rights and feelings of others.

Non-feminists and anti-feminists can have egalitarian ideas too.

11. A harsh tone is sometimes necessary.

The MHRA "tone" is often criticized for being harsh or even misogynistic (see #1 for a rebuttal to misogyny accusations). Men wanting to be treated like human beings with rights are reasonable, and anyone who would scoff at that notion can expect a reciprocally negative response. If the culture scoffs, then expect men and the women who love them to get loud, proud, and brutally honest.

MHRAs don't need permission to sound however they please about things that are important to them, and the people who would act as if permission is required can expect a "go fuck yourself" in the near future.

12. Pragmatic pluralism beats pedantic non-pluralism.

All virtues are unreachable goals in civilization. Justice, equality, liberty, security, and all other valued aspects of life will remain imperfect because of people. The question is what to do given context. Emphasizing one virtue (i.e., equality) above all other considerations is the essence of ideology, which is precisely why the Men's Rights Movement does not benefit from being dogmatically partisan, feminist, or even anti-feminist as a whole. The varied, conflicting positions full of disagreement and debate are what keep our finger on the pulse of context, the only reliable guide to reality.

13. No one can save the world.

You can run a bake sale, but you can't end world hunger. Similarly, anyone who wants to "get everyone to fight for equality" has never heard of a budget or a feasibility report. Our species has waged war and crusades on this planet for so many thousands of years, and you can still find 19-year old Starbucks junkies on Memebase acting as if they figured out how to fix everything without even doodling on a napkin.

It is humbling and productive to ground oneself in an understanding of one's own limitations, and work on attainable local goals.

14. If you really care, get off your ass and stop being a control freak.

This is for the feminists who try to convince MHRAs that they care about men's rights. Don't say you believe in equality and men's rights, then sit there acting like the only thing keeping you at bay is the anti-feminist tone (see #11). Non-feminists and anti-feminists have a right to be mad at feminists if they damn well please. If they are right about feminists causing harm that needs to be corrected, then either own up to the situation and get to work or stop pretending that you care.

If you are not willing to make concessions for others and work to maintain a mutually respectful relationship, then you have no business pretending that you advocate for equality or men.

Joseph Gordon-Levitt video request: Feminism

AVfM Video Source · 26 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Joseph Gordon-Levitt has a request to send him videos on what feminism means to you.

He's asking for video submission here. We hope the men and women of our community will make videos in response.

Exposing #yegsecret Exposed

Men's Rights Edmonton · 26 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Yeg Secret Exposed is a film that disseminates standard anti-male, female-victimization narrative. Some time ago there was a discussion of it that was put online, then mysteriously hidden. Maybe because of the lies in it? Well, here's what we think:

Here's the whole panel discussion on rape culture:
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fHapVtBQdJ4

And here's the part at the end where Mr. Jesperson says that he doesn't think I've shown my face:
http://youtu.be/fHapVtBQdJ4?t=1h51m51s

Editorial Note: You should subscribe to Men's Rights Edmonton. —DE

Hostility toward boys too normal in today's school system

Dr. Christina Hoff Sommers · 26 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As school begins again, parents of boys should ask themselves a question: Is my son really welcome? A flurry of incidents in recent years suggests that the answer is no. Christopher Marshall, age seven, was suspended from his Virginia school for picking up a pencil and using it to "shoot" a "bad guy"—his friend, who was also suspended. A few months earlier, Josh Welch, also seven, was sent home from his Maryland school for nibbling off the corners of a strawberry Pop-Tart to shape it into a gun. At about the same time, Colorado's Alex Evans, age seven, was suspended for throwing an imaginary hand grenade at "bad guys" in order to "save the world."

In all these cases, school officials found the children to be in violation of the school's zero-tolerance policies for firearms, which is clearly a ludicrous application of the rule. But common sense isn't the only thing at stake here. In the name of zero tolerance, our schools are becoming hostile environments for young boys.

Girls occasionally run afoul of these draconian policies; but it is mostly boys who are ensnared. Boys are nearly five times more likely to be expelled from preschool than girls. In grades K to 12, boys account for nearly 70% of suspensions, often for minor acts of insubordination and defiance. In the cases of Christopher, Josh, and Alex, there was no insubordination or defiance whatsoever. They were guilty of nothing more than being typical seven-year-old boys. But in today's school environment, that can be a punishable offense.

Zero tolerance was originally conceived as a way of ridding schools of violent predators, especially in the wake of horrific shootings in places like Littleton, Colorado. But juvenile violence, including violence at schools, is at a historic low. The Bureau of Justice Statistics reports that in 2011, approximately 1% of students ages 12 to 18 reported a violent victimization at school. For serious violence, the figure is one-tenth of 1%. It does no disrespect to the victims of Columbine or Sandy Hook to note that while violence may be built into the core of a small coterie of sociopathic boys, most boys are not sociopathic.

On the other hand, millions of boys are struggling academically. A large and growing male cohort is falling behind in grades and disengaged from school. College has never been more important to a young person's life prospects, and today boys are far less likely than girls to pursue education beyond high school. As our schools become more risk-averse, the gender gap favoring girls is threatening to become a chasm.

Across the country, schools are policing and punishing the distinctive, assertive sociability of boys. Many much-loved games have vanished from school playgrounds. At some schools, tug-of-war has been replaced with "tug-of-peace." Since the 1990s, elimination games like dodgeball, red rover, and tag have been under a cloud—too damaging to self-esteem and too violent, say certain experts. Young boys, with few exceptions, love action narratives. These usually involve heroes, bad guys, rescues, and shoot-ups. As boys' play proceeds, plots become more elaborate and the boys more transfixed. When researchers ask boys why they do it, the standard reply is, "Because it's fun."

According to at least one study, such play rarely escalates into real aggression—only about 1% of the time. But when two researchers, Mary Ellin Logue and Hattie Harvey, surveyed classroom practices of 98 teachers of four-year-olds, they found that this style of play was the least tolerated. Nearly half of teachers stopped or redirected boys' dramatic play daily or several times a week, whereas less than a third reported stopping or redirecting girls' dramatic play weekly.

Play is a critical basis for learning. And boys' heroic play is no exception. Logue and Harvey found that "bad guy" play improved children's conversation and imaginative writing. Such play, say the authors, also builds moral imagination, social competence, and imparts critical lessons about personal limits and self-restraint. Logue and Harvey worry that the growing intolerance for boys' action-narrative-play choices may be undermining their early language development and weakening their attachment to school. Imagine the harm done to boys like Christopher, Josh, and Alex, who are not merely discouraged from their choice of play but are also punished, publicly shamed, and ostracized.

Schools must enforce codes of discipline and maintain clear rules against incivility and malicious behavior. But that hardly requires abolishing tag, imposing games of tug-of-peace, or banning superhero play. Efforts to re-engineer the young-male imagination are doomed to fail, but they will succeed spectacularly in at least one way. They will send a clear and unmistakable message to millions of schoolboys: You are not welcome in school.

This items originally appeared in Time. –DE

How to tame men

Peter Wright · 27 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Horses, dogs and men have one thing in common; they need training in order to shed their wild ways and become civilized. They need to be taught when to walk, run, sit, shit, play, work and, of course, when to cease fighting and attempting rape.

Women will do this for them.

From the pony club to the dog obedience class, and all the way through to wedding and relationship-advice magazines teaching "How to get him to do xyz," – women dominate the field of animal training.

Starting in childhood, girls are educated in the Pavlovian school of human interactions, learning sexual manipulation, shaming and relational aggression as powerful techniques that if properly applied will help transform men, and even the baddest of badboys, into proverbial Good Men.™ Is it any wonder then that when a woman sees a badboy she sees a creature with 'train me' written across his forehead, a task for which her whole life has been but a preparation….. a lady won't tolerate a feral animal wandering through the gynosphere, especially a handsome one, when she has the wherewithal to civilize him.

Lets take a little excursion through the history of taming.

Ancient Greece

Marriage is a particularly useful method by which men are tamed, so it's no surprise that the institution has been around for thousands of years. Hera, the Ancient Greek goddess of marriage was nicknamed 'The Tamer.' She tamed horses, men and heroes and in some places was recognized as the tamer of the seasons, of nature, or of the universe itself.

Hera's goal was to limit wildness and freedom by placing all creatures in service of civilized society. Her main tools-for-taming were the entrapment of men and women in marriage, the use of her own sexuality as an enticement for conformity, shaming, and aggressive punishment of any rebellious behaviours – even for her lordly husband Zeus: "Hera's cruel rage tamed him."[1]

Hera was worshipped as 'Goddess of the yoke,' an enslaving device symbolizing her desire to make utilities out of beasts and men. She yoked obedient men to wives, and yoked heroes to an inevitable death through their performance of labours that bring betterment to women and society.

In the Illiad Hera is said to tame heroes through death, not marriage. Death through service to others was considered -and is still considered- something appropriate for males and for their own good. In The Myth of Male Power Warren Farrell recounts a Greek story which illustrates the problem:

> The Hero As Slave:
>
>
>
> Once upon a time, a mother who wanted to see the beautiful statue of Hera had no oxes or horses to carry her there. But she did have two sons. And the sons wanted more than anything to make their mother's wish come true. They volunteered to yoke themselves to a cart and take her over the mountains in the scorching heat to the faraway village of Argos, the home of the statue of Hera (the wife of Zeus). Upon their arrival in Argos, > the sons were cheered and statues (that can be found to this day) were built in their honor. Their mother prayed that Hera give her sons the best gift in her power. Hera did that. The boys died. The traditional interpretation? The best thing that can happen to a man is to die at the height of his glory and power. Yet had this been a myth of two daughters who had substituted themselves for oxen to carry their father somewhere, would we have interpreted the daughters' deaths as proof that the best thing that can happen to a woman is to die at the height of her glory and power? The statues and cheers can be seen as bribes for the sons to value their lives less than their mother's request to view a statue. The fact that the statue was of Hera, the queen of the Olympian gods and protector of married women is symbolic. The sons' sacrifice symbolized the mandate for men to become strong enough to serve the needs of mothers and marriage, and to be willing to call it glory if they died in the process. Which is why the name Hercules means "for the glory of Hera".[2]

Yes these are myths, but on this topic life had a way of imitating art. Those who wrote the stories were drawing on experience to some extent, and married couples re-enacted the selfsame rituals of Hera and Zeus. In the marriage month (Gamelion) the mythical marriage of Hera and Zeus was reenacted and celebrated with public festivities, a time when many couples would get married in imitation of the divine couple. On these occasions prayers and offerings were given to Hera, and the bride would pledge fidelity to extending Hera's dominion on earth.

Women of Ancient Greece were considered, along with men, to be uncivilized and in need of taming for the greater good of society. Both sexes required a reconstruction in character and a submission to social responsibilities. Such was also the case in the Near East where an emerging Christian culture claimed that men and women were made of flawed stuff; women were born in original sin with Eve, sinful to the core, and were encouraged to aspire to the status of the holy and pure Virgin Mary. Likewise men were born in original sin and invited to improve their condition with an de imitatione Christi, an imitation of Christ in order to bleach the stains from their imperfect souls.

While men and women in ancient times possessed equality in the depravity stakes, this was all to change in the Middle ages.

Middle Ages

Fast forward to medieval times and we see a continuation of the desire to civilize human behaviour, except this time women are exempt from the taming to which the classical age subjected both sexes. By dint of a peculiar intersection of social beliefs, women came to be viewed as perfected from birth – due largely to the fact that veneration of the Virgin Mary became amplified in the eleventh century and, by extension, the reverence bestowed upon the Virgin was extended to the female sex in general. As Mary was perfect, so too became women.

No longer like the Biblical Eve striving to imitate the Mother of Christ, woman becomes Mary's counterpart on earth, and thus the cult of the "lady" is born as a mirror of the cult of the Virgin. Men for their part remain in a thoroughly fallen state like Adam while striving to imitate Jesus – knowing full well they will fall short of the goal. To enjoy the company of a lady a man must now prove himself worthy of her and so advance upward, step by step, toward a culminating union at her level; because everything noble and virtuous, everything that makes life worth living, proceeds from women, who are even described as the source of goodness itself.[3]

Mediaeval image of a woman leading a man with a leash or halter.

With the advent of women becoming men's moral superiors, it's here that men become the servants of women proper. It's here also that the reciprocal service previously entertained between the sexes begins its gradual decline in favour of gynocentrism. As the faithful owed obeisance to The Virgin, henceforth man must render his obeisance to the Virgin's earthly counterparts. Over the subsequent 100 years women even came to be viewed through the lens of the feudal contract whereby she became his overlord (midons), and he the vassal in dutiful service. It would be woman whose role it became to civilize the depraved, fallen creature called man by teaching him the gynocentric virtues of chivalry and courtly love.

Contemporary attitudes

Contemporary perspectives about civilizing males are divided between two superficially opposed camps – traditionalist women, and progressive feminists. I say superficially opposed because when the goals of both groups are compared they amount to exactly the same thing: the belief that morally superior women should enculture men into the arts of chivalry and gentlemanliness for the benefit of women.

Lifelong feminist and former National Organization for Women member, Tammy Bruce, has articulated what she feels is the time-honoured power of women; of being morally superior to men which includes the feminist responsibility to civilizing men's animalistic tendencies:

Nothing new under the sun, hey?

Another feminist, Christina Hoff-Sommers agrees with this idea that men need to be civilized with chivalric manners, a belief she outlined in an interview with Emily Esfahani Smith, where she said, "Masculinity with morality and civility is a very powerful force for good. But masculinity without these virtues is dangerous—even lethal." "Chivalry is grounded in a fundamental reality that defines the relationship between the sexes," explained Sommers, "and given that most men are physically stronger than most women, men can overpower women at any time to get what they want." "If women give up on chivalry, it will be gone," continued Sommers. "If boys can get away with being boorish, they will, happily. Women will pay the price."[4]

Sommers elaborates her view in a 2009 interview with Ben Domenech:

> Christina Hoff-Sommers: Codes of gallantry and civility that developed over the centuries have served women very well. We badly need more of that male gallantry, but I hasten to say it's a reciprocal system. If males are going to be gallant then women also have a role to play. So today I think both sexes are remiss in nurturing this system.
>
> Ben Domenech: What in this era of post feminism that we live in today relationally would be the possible > incentive for any man to be gallant when there doesn't seem to be any > particular reason that he has to be in order to function within today's relationship world?

>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: It's an interesting question because one of the things you find today is that most young men are gallant, and they are respectful, at least they are struggling to be. When I interview young men I ask them if they think it's a good thing to be a gentleman and almost all of them say yes- that word gentleman has a positive resonance with young men. Now, do they know how to be gentlemen, do they know what it entails? Many do not. And same with some young women, they are not necessarily behaving like ladies. So there's a lot of misunderstanding and lack of, perhaps, motivation. But it's still alive in people. I think still on a typical date a young man would pay for his date – it doesn't always happen in which case a girl would be resentful, and I can understand that…. These are gestures, I'm talking about certain gestures of respect – they need to be there and I think most women want them and I think men do too.
>
> Ben Domenech: So why is that important – and I don't just mean that in the sense of continuing a relationship but in the larger sense of the term, and this is a frame that I have to ask you about: if the incentive there is a relationship that is going to lead to something, does it matter that the something is beyond the typical aspirations of today's men and women which seems to be more along the lines of a sex based relationship as opposed to one that actually has a longer term value beyond that prognosis.
>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: I think human beings at some point in their lives want something beyond a sex based relation. If you are going to build a relationship with someone it has been the case that women are going to be more likely to want to stay home and take care of the children, or certainly be more focused on that than the men, and I don't see that changing.
>
> Ben Domenech: As a single dating male in today's environment there's a much lower bar that they have to clear, frankly, in order to bounce around the relationship scene with a good deal of happiness, at least in the temporary sense.
>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: Oh I have to agree, and I think in a way women sort of undid the social contract with men and released them from all the constraints. And we pay the price.[5]

For the sake of argument, and in order to demonstrate that progressive gynocentrism and traditionalist gynocentrism are both chasing male-only chivalry, here is a recent 'tradition-advocating' article by antifeminist Patrice Lewis that appears strikingly similar to the progressive model offered above by Bruce and Hoff-Sommers:

> I admire men.
>
> Specifically, I admire men who are controlled, confident and who fulfill their biological destiny as protectors and providers. Men are essential for training boys to tame the testosterone and channel their natural strengths and aggressiveness in appropriate ways. Trained men are, in the words of columnist Dennis Prager, the glory of civilization. (It goes without saying that untrained men are its scourge, but that's another column.)

Men – trained, manly men – are necessary for a balanced society. They take on the tough ugly hard jobs women can't or won't do. They mine our coal and fight our fires and protect our shores and fix our engines and rescue our butts when we're in danger. They truck our goods and clean our pipes and wire our homes. They plow fields and grow food. They butcher livestock so we can buy meat in tidy sanitized packages in the grocery store and pretend it never came from a cow.

I'm not saying women can't be found in those fields; but let's be honest: The vast majority of workers in hard, dangerous, dirty and heavy fields are men. They deserve our praise and gratitude.

Which is why I get so ticked off when feminists belittle men. These kinds of women don't admire manly men who protect and provide. Feminists don't want warriors; they want servants who will kowtow to their emotions and feeeeeeelings. They prefer emasculated androgynous guys who wouldn't know one end of a rifle from the other. Guys who watch chick flicks with them. Guys who know what temperature to wash the dainties. Guys who are preoccupied with "social justice" and bringing their carbon footprint down to zero.[6]

Lewis's argument above that boys are juicing with testosterone and need "taming" reveals an unbroken, and mythical conception of men stemming from ancient times – and it is wrong. Men are not born as wild animals in a testosterone-fuelled psychosis waiting to tear people limb from limb. We need not buy our sons punching bags nor insert them into football training from 2 years of age to channel some androgen-fuelled chaos (doing it for fun, though, is another reason). The claim that men are unclean, bestial creatures in need of taming is not only false – it is extreme misandry and it needs to be challenged head on with each bigot who perpetuates it.

The above survey of man-taming by women spanning all the way from Ancient Greece, and through progressive feminism to regressive traditionalism, shows what we are up against. Nothing whatsoever has changed; chivalric servitude of men, trained into them by women (yes and by men), remains the order of the day. The one timeless voice echoing through all this is the monomyth of the animal-trainer – womankind and her pussy whip.

With the continuing encouragement of women to be slavemasters, and their enthusiasm to take on the role, is it any surprise that the majority of horse and dog training schools – obedience classes – are peopled by women? That so many little girls desire to possess their own pony is a no-brainer, and it's time we woke up to what this expensive little pastime symbolizes – the racing of horses may be the sport of Kings, but training of ponies is for the delight of princesses.

In a modern 'enlightened' society it's high time to ditch the idea that males, and only males, need taming. Lets instead rely on men's natural human empathy, a thing that exists in both sexes before the training begins. If you see a baby boy begin crying after he hears another baby crying nearby, it's a demonstration of empathy that is there from the start.[7] Like girls, boys develop mirror neurons which predispose them to be caring as they develop – we don't need to see them as heartless beasts in need of taming, curtailing or genitally maiming. So let's cease with the gynocentric boot-camp for males; they are already trained from the start by their own good natures – yes, men are good.

Sources:

[1] Joan O'Brien, 'The Tamer of Heroes and Horses,' Chapter 6E in The Transformation of Hera, Rowman and Littlefield, (1993)
[2] Warren Farrell, The Myth of Male Power, Simon and Schuster, (1993)
[3] Irving Singer, Love: Courtly and Romatic, UCP, 1984
[4] Emily Esfahani Smith, 'Let's Give Chivalry Another Chance' The Atlantic, Dec 10 2012
[5] Interview with Christina Hoff-Sommers, "The Acculturated Podcast: Ladies and Gentlemen" 2009
[6] Patrice Lewis, 'Feminism Has Slain Our Protectors,' WND, 09/12/2014
[7] Daniel Goleman, Researchers Trace Empathy's Roots to Infancy, New York Times, 1989

Activism Panel Discussion: International Conference on Men's Issues 2014

A Voice for Men News · 27 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

We have over the last couple of months presented full transcripts of all the presentations at the International Conference on Men's Issues 2014. Here we bring you the final session of day 2 of the conference proper–essentially, the closing. It was a long, rambunctious, sometimes heated, often funny discussion. Our thanks as always to Rick Westlake for doing most of the work on this amazing set of transcripts. –DE (Attila Vinczer:) Ladies and gentlemen, we are now going to enter into our panel discussion, but before we do so, we have a presentation to make—an important presentation to make. If we could have Terrence and the General?—Commander! My apologies.

(Terrence Popp and Post Commander Tim Litz approach the stage.)

(Paul Elam:) Boy, does that open the door to a lot of the wrong jokes.

We wanted to take a minute, before we have the panel discussion on activism, and the future of activism for the Men's Movement, whether it's Men's Issues or Men's Rights …

Our veterans served us with more than most people in this room can imagine. And they still didn't forget us in our moment of need, here. It was veterans that stood up; it was veterans that worked Security; it was veterans that made sure that free speech, that they had fought defending, was allowed to continue.

I'm not going to bore you with a long speech, but it's time for us to give something back. And for this we want to present a check for the VFW Bruce Hall, for $2,000, to serve the veterans that come to this facility.

(Tim Litz:) I am, ah—I'm glad that, on short notice, we were able to accommodate everybody … (Mic troubles) … Like I said, I was glad that, on such short notice, that we were able to accommodate you. I hope you found us accommodating. We are glad you are here. It just wasn't me, it was our hall manager, Annie, over there, who did a lot of the work. And the caterer, in-house caterer, last night; I hope you enjoyed your meal. I want to thank you for the check; this helps us help our veterans, and we truly appreciate it. We have a lot of veterans' programs, and this is where it will go. Thank you very much.

(Mic troubles)

(Robert O'Hara:) My name is Robert O'Hara, I'm the US News Director for A Voice for Men. We're going to end this conference with a panel on activism. Men's Rights Activism has had an obscure past, to say the least, and many perceive it as being "checkered" and even somewhat ineffective. And while this is true in many cases, it is certainly not true for every group or individual that has championed one or more of the causes addressed during this conference. There have been many instances of successful strategies and initiatives which have achieved broader awareness, recruitment, and even legislative change. The goal of this panel is to present a handful of people who have a proven record of success in Men's Human Rights Activism. Each panelist will share their experience with initiating awareness and change, as well as their thoughts on the most effective way to do so.

An eye on the future is key. Clearly, the MHRM is entering a new phase, where broader awareness of the issues facing men and boys must be accompanied by positive efforts to make a difference in the broad range of arena in which they face challenges and discrimination.

I'm going to briefly introduce each panelist by their name and title, and a little bit of information; and after that, I'm going to allow each panelist a brief introduction of themselves, their thoughts on activism, what they think has made them effective activists, and what they think the future of activism is. Then I'm going to turn the panel over to you, the audience. Please keep your questions directed—I'm sorry, please keep your questions brief, keep them limited in scope, and please—the subject is activism. We've been talking about ideas all weekend; now we have to talk about activism because this is what's going to bring us into the future.

So, I'm going to go ahead and start by introducing Carnell Smith. Clearly a very effective activist, he's the founder of Citizens Against Paternity Fraud, successful in lobbying for legislation in Georgia for paternity-fraud reform.

Next we have Diana Thompson, political—this is not necessarily in order—we have Diana Thompson, political analyst, lobbyist, and spokesperson, and former chairman of the Family Law Reform community in Los Angeles, California. She'll give a more complete introduction of herself in just a moment.

We have Greg Canning, Australian News Director for A Voice for Men, a really, really big name in Australian Men's Rights Activism. He's here to represent what's going on Down Under; definitely a great addition to this panel. The panel would not be complete without him.

And of course we have Adam McPhee. He's on the Board of Directors for CAFE, the Canadian Association For Equality, which has been successful in starting men's groups on colleges and universities in Canada. Of course, we all know what happened in Fall 2012 that really, really put Men's Rights in Canada on the map. It was a great time—no, it really wasn't a great time, but it was really a tough, great expanding awareness for Men's Rights, as chaotic as it was.

And of course, we have Warren Farrell. Warren Farrell is a renowned author and educator, as well as a long-time veteran of the Men's Rights Movement. He's spoken several times this weekend; now is your time to ask him even more questions about, again, activism.

And we have Michael Buchanan. Michael Buchanan … He's founder of the UK Justice for Men and Boys Party. Hopefully he's going to give us some insights on political activism.

And we have Robert Franklin, who's with us today … where's Robert? Oh, there he is! Robert Franklin is a long-time fathers' rights and legal activist, and member of the Board of Directors for the National Parents Organization. We're hoping that he can give us some pointers on some political activism as well. He spoke to that, about that, in his speech. I'm hoping that we can talk a lot more about that, because I think it's important.

And we have Anil Kumar. Anil Kumar is founder of the Save the Indian Family Foundation, a high-profile member of the Men's Rights Movement in India. I just want to say personally, I think Anil's a wonderful man, he's a very smart guy, he has loads of things to say, all of it very interesting, all of it very pertinent. I'm glad he's here.

And we have Jonathan Taylor with us. He's the founder and publisher of A Voice for Male Students dot com, the motto of which is "Educational Opportunity for Men and Boys."

Okay. So, I'm going to go ahead and start with Carnell Smith. As we go down the table, again, please keep your remarks to under two minutes—(Paul Elam interrupts.)—Oh, I'm sorry! You weren't originally on the list! I didn't think you were going to be here! Everybody, this is my boss, Paul, the Invisible Man … and I didn't think he was going to be on this side, I'm sorry. And JB? I didn't think she was going to be on this either, I'm sorry …

(Janet Bloomfield: "I don't have a voice!")

I didn't know you were here! I just turned around and she insisted upon appearing out of nowhere! … Okay, I'm going to end with Paul.

This is Janet Bloomfield, of course, JudgyBitch … wonderful … she is going to tell us all about Twitter activism; she's been ceaselessly Twittering during this entire conference, about everything that's been going on. And Twitter, of course, is an amazing tool for activism, we've found. And she's going to talk about it a lot more—I hope.

Stefan Molyneux … thank you so much for coming, thank you for so much for talking about circumcision. I'm sure you're going to be talking about … that … but again, he's an Idea Man, I'm really glad he's going to be talking about activism, and what he thinks and what he perceives to be effective activism.

And now, of course, Paul Elam. The founder of A Voice for Men. And I don't think we need any more description of this guy right here.

So—if you could, please start with Carnell Smith, at the end of the table, and briefly describe yourself, what you think is effective activism, and where you see activism going in the future.

(Carnell Smith:) Okay, can you hear me? Hello, hello, testing … all right.

I'm Carnell Smith, Rebel with A Cause, as you've already heard. But one of the first things I know about activism is that you have to first believe that you can change it. You may not have all of the answers, but you have to be willing to connect with people who have already done what it is you want to do; be coachable; and not try to re-invent the wheel. I took a page out of the playbook on the Civil Rights era, and Dr. King said, "Demonstrate the suffering." So I didn't think of paternity-fraud and family-law issues as purely just Men's Rights issues; they were Human Rights issues, Civil Rights issues.

Involve yourself also with learning about how to get the academia community involved … the legal community involved. There are many people who are willing to get involved with social justice. So when they saw me at the Capitol, they didn't see Carnell Smith alone. They did not see just a man of African descent, alone. I started out, standing in the rain, in front of my Capitol, by myself, with the media, asking other people if they knew someone that was affected like me; and if they knew somebody, to come join me. One was the guy starting. That grew to twelve. That grew to hundreds … to where we packed the Senate, the House of Representatives. And my legislator said that "When we first started, talking about this issue, I thought you were only going to show up with three people." But when he saw Black, White, Hispanic, Asian … he saw military, in dress uniform; we saw men and women who were affected … he said, "Man, this is really a bigger problem than I thought."

We have to be inclusive of people who will support us, and not exclude people just because maybe they haven't been personally affected. A key of success for the Civil Rights reform was that it wasn't just Black people that got the laws changed. People got involved because they said it was wrong. I invite you to do the same thing. Connect with people who already have the experience that you desire. Save yourself some time. Find out some best practices. Find out what has already worked. And then, modify it and put it into action.

(Adam McPhee:) I don't even know where to start with CAFE. My name's Adam McPhee. With CAFE, the biggest thing we've done is helping students start up groups on universities, and the biggest success for those is having university students willing to embrace Men's Issues, to help do the legwork. We help them set things up, tell them what has worked in the past; and the way you can help, too, is helping these activists who are doing the legwork. This conference here, that Paul Elam got started, it wouldn't be a success if we didn't have people showing up and we didn't have butts in the chairs. So, I would give us all a round of applause, just for being here; you're already supporting the cause.

Place is what is needed, we need people, supporting groups … One of the things that I find, it seems to be kind of in opposition to what some people here believe, where I'm more politically correct. It's not our anger that has drawn attention to CAFE, it's the anger of our opposition that comes. When they come and they argue against the issues, incoherently, and we react with nothing but passive, pacifist tolerance, and just say, "We just want our moment to speak, we just want to speak to the issues that we feel men are facing today," it's not us that looks bad, it's them that looks bad. Their anger does more advocacy work for us than our anger would ever do. Thank you.

(Robert Franklin:) I'm Robert Franklin. I'm on the Board of Directors of the National Parents Organization, formerly Fathers and Families. Over the years, we have stopped more bad legislation and passed more good legislation than most; literally dozens and dozens of bills we've been able to pass, or stop, at the state level. Myself, over the years, I've engaged in street activism; electoral politics; and of course, writing and doing radio interviews, television interviews, and other media.

How is it—how do we make change, in this country? If being right, and having right and justice, morality, equality on your side had won for you, we would have already won. But it doesn't, so how do we make change? A couple of different ways; with legislation and, Warren mentioned earlier, litigation. And with regard to legislation, as I said in my presentation, we've been trying that for a long time regarding shared parenting, and it hasn't worked. What that means is that those legislators don't respect us. They know we have the truth on our side, but they're not doing what we want. And that means we need to start doing electoral politics. That sounds—maybe that sounds like, "Oh good, we get to raise a million dollars and start a PAC." No. Most of what—most of the office-holders that hold the keys to our success are pretty low-level people. They're state legislators, they're judges, and things like that. And the thing they fear the worst is an opponent. And we can provide them that; and it doesn't cost a lot of money, and it doesn't take—it takes volunteers, and a good message. And once you do that, the great part is you don't even have to win! You don't have to depose an office-holder; all you have to do is scare the pants off of him, and the next time you come in with your bill, they'll listen to you.

One other thing—I'm going too long, I know I am—in addition to legislation and litigation, is just showing up. Like he said, it's just showing up. And you can show up in a million different ways. You can write a letter to the editor when you see the wrong type of article. You can call the editor of a newspaper or magazine. You can make your voice heard without anybody but you, all by yourself … I'm just going to shut up.

(Diana Thompson:) Hello, can you hear me? Hello, my name is Diana Thompson, and I'm a former lobbyist, political analyst, and spokesperson. I've spoken all over the country on shared parenting, paternity fraud, child support issues, and other family-related issues. And the first thing I want to say is that there's really no quick-fixes. We all heard of a lot of issues over the last few days, and we know that the issues are there; now we just have to figure out how to change them.

There's no quick-fixes; change does not happen overnight. A lot of people walk out of court and they think, "I'm going to get this changed in no time, and I'm the only person that's dealing with it." I'm here to say, 25 years doing this, that it just doesn't happen that way; it takes a lot of dedication, commitment, and very hard work. And it is often a very long process. And one thing is, you may not be able to do everything, but everybody can do something. And I just have a few steps—we aren't allowed to talk that long, but I just have a couple of items that I think would be very helpful in activism. And one is research.

When you first have an issue that you've never faced before, you feel very devastated, very lost, you feel like you're the only one out there that's experiencing that. I assure you, you're not; many people have experienced the same things you all have, for many years, and people have been working on these issues for many years. Reach out to those people that have been working on the issues, because they know a lot of things that have worked in the past, and they know a lot of things that have failed in the past. And it's so important that you reach out to people who have proven track records, not people who are trying to sell you something, or … you know, people that actually, you have seen change.

Another thing is legislation. The key to making change is changing legislation. So many people are intimidated by the process, thinking, "How could I do—you know, how can I make change? I'm just one person." Well, the first step is to learn who your legislator is. I've often had guys come to me, even women come to me, and say, "Well, I don't think my legislator wants to make change." And I say, Sell, who is your legislator? "Well, I don't know … I'm not sure who they are." First thing you have to do, is you have to get in contact with your legislator. You need to introduce yourself. You need to, first of all, plan before you go. You cannot inundate him with a million—him or her—with a million different problems. Start out with something that is really important to you, your main focus that you want to change. Talk to them, and get to know their aides especially; that is the most important, because you're not normally just going to walk in and get to speak to your legislator. It doesn't happen that way. You need to talk to the aides, develop a relationship with them—to this day I have relationships with the legislative aides in California, so that I can call them when something goes up for help. I can get their advice on things, find out where a bill's at. They're very, very helpful in that respect. Just don't be intimidated by that.

Another thing is, before you even talk to legislators, what about learning about candidates before they get into office? Finding what their issues are—do they care about your issues at all? Why not try to encourage people to vote for people that are interested in these issues, that might be able to help?

Another thing is communication and the media. When you see negative articles out there, why not write a letter to the editor? Why not write a comment? These are all important things because if the media writes negative articles, and no one says anything that it's bad or wrong, they're going to continue to do it. You have the right to say, "No, this is not my experience, this is not the way it is." And also, what about the campaigns out there—like the "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them—" Who are the people buying this merchandise? You need to go against this kind of stuff. Make your voice heard.

And the last thing is social networking. This is such an important tool. When I first started out, we didn't have all these social-networking things, and it was a lot rougher. But now, there's so many different Facebook groups, there are Facebook, Twitter, all different types of social-networking. And it's a good way to find people who care about the issues, and let them know that you're there. That's a good way to connect.

And then, in closing, I just want to say, the most important part of activism is to realize that you can make a change. You all are capable of doing it. You just have to believe that you can do it. I mean, I have been called names, as a woman; a traitor, maybe worse; but that's not going to stop the work that I'm doing. You just have to look past that. I'm not telling you that change is easy; it's not, it's a lot of work; but I'm telling you that our children are worth fighting for.

(Jonathan Taylor:) A wise man once said that the difference between an artist and an academic is that an artist takes a complex idea and presents it in a simple way, whereas an academic is someone who takes a simple idea and presents it in a complex way.—Oh, yes, I should probably say who I am, be a good idea … Jonathan Taylor, founder of A Voice for Male Students dot com, the motto of which is "Educational Equity for Men and Boys." And I like to view activism and advocacy as both a science and an art. One of the things that I think is fundamental and indispensable, in activism, is good research. You have to have good research, otherwise—especially in academia—no one's going to start a conversation with you. And that's one of the things that I really hope to provide at my website; and that's why I create these huge warehouses of resources for students, and not just—students, parents, teachers, advocates, anyone who wants to work to create a change … whether it is just a warehouse of statistics and graphs that I make in-house. But there's other for students as well that I try to make, such as A Voice for Male Students dot com also hosts the largest online database of male-only scholarships in the world. It also maintains a regularly updated list of men's issues conferences, webs—excuse me, workshops, symposia, webinars, things like that. And also a list of guides to activism, and education policies, things like that. But that all goes into that fundamental element of research, which you must have before you make a conversation, especially with anyone in academia.

So that being said, you must not only have good research. You also have to have passion. You have to find what gives you, what sustains you, in this movement, and you have to hold on to it, and you can't let it go. For me, there are various things which have inspired me, whether to passion or sometimes to anger; we've all been angry at various injustices; but for me, what keeps me going … I don't have any kids of my own, that I know of … no. No, actually, I've been pretty responsible in that regard. But what keeps me going are my two little nephews; and I want to know that by the time they reach 18, 19, 20 years of age, that something will have changed, something major will have changed, in the conversation on educational equity. And that is what I work for. And—I feel like I'm racing against time, where, you know, as they grow older—I want something to have changed. And so that's one of the things.

So you have to have good research. You have to find what sustains you, sustains your passion. And also—I think also you have to be able to build and maintain good working relationships. That is another indispensable element of activism. And that is why conferences like these are so very important; you get to network with so many people around you, you get to put a face to the name, you get to just reach out and find people that you've never talked to before. You'll find a lot of people who will be interested in what you have to say. But that is another indispensable element. I'm probably going over, but thank you so much.

(Warren Farrell:) I'm Warren Farrell … I've always said the Men's Movement is in its embryonic stage. I'm no longer going to say that.

I said that through 44 years. Now this is a hell of a big embryo … so this baby's going to be huge! And so the question is, How did this go from an embryo to what happened today? And it happened by many of the ingredients that AVfM have put together. It has allowed for that anger and upset; it has allowed for scholarship; it has allowed for activism; it has allowed for volunteers. It has brought many people with many different talents together. So the first thing to understand is, this is a good model for what it takes to birth the baby.

Number two is really number one. Number one is, if you want to be an activist, the number one most important thing is take care of your health. When you're in a plane and they say if there's a problem, pull down the oxygen mask, and put it on yourself before you put it on your child, because you can't take care of your child if you haven't taken care of yourself. You cannot make this embryo into an infant that grows well if you don't take care of yourself.

Every one of us has weaknesses physically. Know that. Know food, know exercise. Pace yourself. I used to run track; one of the first things I learned is, when I got out in front in the beginning and went with my full-steam-ahead, I always lost the race. I had to learn to pace.

Number two: Yes, be strong and articulate these issues; but you've got two ears and one mouth for a reason. Every time you talk about men's issues, you will touch people's need to object to you. The more we need you, the tougher it will be to share these issues. Every single person with whom you speak—you must listen more than you speak. And when they feel heard, they will begin to be able to hear.

Third: If you're a guy, or a woman—but especially if you're a guy—partner with a woman who has compassion for you and for men. And find her not by paying for the first three dates, then hoping she'll know how to pay for herself. Find her by being yourself right from the beginning, and let her reject you so that you can get on with finding a woman who's more appropriate for you. And when she works and earns, remember every moment you support her, you are supporting yourself, and you're supporting men's issues and your freedom to be able to work on those issues.

Finally, talk from your experience, not from just data. And when you talk from your experience and don't have that experience, talk from real-life stories, find the stories, find the heart, and you will reach other people's hearts.

Finally, find the area where you can make a contribution. I gave 10 examples of possible men's issues to focus on today. If you have a son or a daughter—um, if you're a son—focus maybe on boys' issues. If you have a daughter, maybe focus on equally shared parenting. If you have an interest in economics or statistics, focus on the "pay gap." If you have an interest in education, focus on getting Men's Studies into the university. If you have an interest in anything, focus on communication.

Keep the health and the communication as something that you master, and you master those two things. On that you can build a foundation, based on your interests, and contribute to the movement at a pace that will keep you around when you're in your eighties. Thank you.

(Paul Elam:) Well, it works. Okay. I'm Paul Elam … Thank you. And I think if we just banded together and destroyed the Patriarchy, all of these issues would be resolved, and we could just have some more pizza and beer, and our problems would be over. Oh, wait a minute, that was the—I was doing drugs then. Never mind.

Warren has said many times, and I agree with him, that there needs to be not just a diversity in this movement, which there is—I mean, racially, religiously, gender-wise, orientation-wise. There's plenty of diversity. But there needs to be a diversity of styles as well too; a diversity of the ways we approach ideological opponents, and the public at large, and each other. I'm a firm believer, from—and I—haven't had the opportunity to bring it up so far at this conference, this is my last chance. I've got two words for you: Angry Harry.

Angry Harry showed me what was possible; that the Internet was very much a potential vehicle to create social change in ways that no one has ever previously imagined. And I would argue, right now, that the presence of all these fine people in this room, this collection of thinkers and activists and advocates, is proof that the Internet is ONE effective tool. I also agree that legislation, that litigation, as Warren has talked about, is very, very important. All these different approaches—social media—speaking to your family can be a form of activism; letting them know what you believe, and not hiding from them.

What I want to address for just a couple of moments, before I finish up here and we'll pass this next to Dr. Canning, is that I get contact regularly from people all the time saying, "What can I do to help?" And my answer to them, without—hoping not to be sarcastic at all—is to say, "I don't know. What can you do?" What skills do you have? Do you have computer skills? Do you have graphic skills? Do you have programming skills? Do you have the ability to give speeches, to write speeches? Are you willing to stand in front of a courthouse or a government building, with a sign, along with other people? What can you do, and what are you willing to do?

I could say, right now, that if you have tremendous skills with computers, talk to Carnell Smith, talk to Jonathan Taylor. See what you can do to help. There's nothing stopping anybody from becoming an activist, 'cause there is a thousand ways to do it. And one way may not be great for everybody, as a matter of fact it shouldn't be. But I'll again go back, and I think that Carnell addressed this quite well—Passion. Passion.

Remember who we're talking about. We're talking about—right now, we're seriously talking about—just soldiers alone, killing themselves at 25 a day. We're talking about men whose … the disparity in the suicide rate, during divorce, goes up astronomically because of the way they're treated. We're talking about people that are in prison on false accusations. We're talking about academic careers that have been ended.

I talked about Caleb Warner, in my earlier talk; he's a young man at the University of North Dakota that was absolutely railroaded, after police had determined that his accuser was false and issued a warrant for her arrest, and the university still said, "Too bad." He finally got it cleared up, but right now Caleb Warner has given up his dream of being educated, and he's driving a delivery truck. And there's nothing wrong with honorable work. But this was a future destroyed. If that doesn't give you passion, you're not going to be an activist.

So, with that I want to pass it to one of my favorite people here, Dr. Greg Canning, who I got to meet for the first time. I want to thank you all for coming out here and participating—Oh, last thing: Your butts in these chairs at the next conference, all of you. That's an order!

(Greg Canning:) As we say in Australia, G'day—I hope you can understand my accent. I'm Greg Canning, I'm a family physician in Australia. I started in private practice in 1989, as a solo practitioner, and now my business partner and I own a clinic that has ten doctors. I'm also a father; I have two sons, a stepson, and a daughter, who are all adults, grown up, making their own way in the world; and being a father is my proudest achievement in life.

This men's issues conference has been fantastic, but I only have one issue with it, and that issue is that I don't think we've given away enough books. I have a book here called The Complete Book of Blokes' Sheds by Mark Thomson, and the reason I'm showing you this book is because I want to give it to Mister Robert O'Hara over there.

(Stefan Molyneux: "Finally won something there, Robert.")

The reason I want to give it to Robert O'Hara is because in about 2011 I started reading A Voice for Men; by November of that year, I was submitting some articles; and later, Robert invited me to become News Director for Australia. It was that encouragement that led a 50-year-old introvert to find a voice to speak out for men and boys. And one of the things I think we need in this movement … is to encourage others to find their voices. And once you find your voice, you can speak out. I've been speaking out in Townsville, in my local community, writing letters to the editor, signaling out misandric professors at our local university. I got involved in a group called The One in Three Campaign, which aims to raise awareness of male victims of domestic abuse, and to encourage governments to provide services for them. And that was simply by an invitation to join an email group; and what that email group does is, whenever we see anything anywhere in the media to do with domestic violence which is wrong, which is about twenty times every day, someone in the group will take responsibility to write a letter, try and get it corrected. And we've had a lot of success—so much success that the feminist academics hate us, they denounce us in their articles—and every time they denounce us … every time we're denounced, we kick that up as another win.

So, I think networking is important, and that's one way of networking. I've been really pleased to see people gathering little lists of other people's emails so we can all keep in touch. Facebook is a great way to network; I get so many links to things that I might not have otherwise found, by little groups on Facebook, that lead me to some information that's important in my conceptualization of this problem.

I have to echo, as a physician, what Warren said: We do need to look after ourselves. Physicians are no better than anyone else at looking after themselves. It takes constant work to do that. I've been a little bit quiet on A Voice for Men for the last six or so months because I've had a few problems, so I've just pulled back for a while; but this conference was what I was looking forward to, and having come here, I've been re-energized, and I'm going to go back with renewed gusto.

So, here are the points I had: Encourage people to speak out, network with others, look after yourself. Thank you.

(Anil Kumar:) Hi. When we started in 2004, we were, in India, 60 guys in a Yahoo group. And we had a lot at stake. India has two domestic violence laws, and what was at stake is very simple. If a woman is going to separation, and if the husband and his family are not ready for a huge sum of alimony as an out-of-court settlement, she's going to unleash one of those domestic violence laws against the husband and his parents and his siblings. So when a woman says, "My husband, his mother, his father, his sister, his brother, and maybe even his friend, subjected me to physical and mental cruelty." Okay? Because this law was enacted at a time when the word domestic violence was still not there, in 1983. So they used to have the word called cruelty: "So he subjected me to physical and mental cruelty." No evidence is seen. And the law says you are prejudged by sexes, you are prejudged guilty until proven innocent; it is quoted in the law. And the whole family, in 2004, used to go to prison for 10 to 15 days. The parents, the women, the pregnant sister—or lactating, with her child—everything. So what we had at stake is huge. The whole family, the business gone, the parents are like shattered—it was huge.

So we had no time to think, to do anything. And we were in touch with Glenn Sacks, and (inaudible), and (inaudible)—everything, right? So we got all this stuff and we got into action, and we created chapters in two years' time all over India, with help lines, so men can get to the support groups. And we had meetups every week, in Bangalore, in Delhi, in Mumbai, in Nagpur, in Kolkata, in Lucknow—all over India, in two years, we got the chapters, and we started protesting. We started protesting.

And, we got, in eight years … initially, media, of course, did what it is supposed to do; but eight years, we got more than 8,000 newspaper articles in newspapers, online and also print, across all the languages in India. We got more than 500 TV debates, many of them in the prime time, in the national television, like the CNN-supported channel in India, called CNN-IBN, like that? And we have lobbied with the Parliament members; so in the last one year me and my teams have met more than 300 Parliament members in their houses. About all these issues of fathers' access to children—in India, fathers never get access. For a couple of years, they don't even get to see the child in the school.

And India's Parliament took it seriously. And they had a petition in the Parliament's Committee on Petitions; it had a session; it sat and invited us, and the feminists, and the Women's Ministry—everybody—to testify. So I testified about the misuse of the Domestic Violence Act, the Dowry Act called Section 498, in front of a Parliamentary Committee of 15 Parliament Members. And the report was finally submitted to the Upper House of Parliament. We said, "Any woman who is misusing the law, you have punishment. If you don't do that, then soon we have to repeal the law." That's what has been written and given to the Parliament. And Indian Supreme Court warned of legal terrorism; they are saying that this is going to be legal terrorism.

And what we are up to is we used to meet and have—we used to have these meetups in the parks; now we have the community centers opening up with a small membership fee, and we are now working to get part-time staff and full-time staff. So we are working on the funding because we know we won't get money from the government and we do not want money from the government.

And our help lines are better than the women's help lines. And I know, I know, because sometimes women call us because they said no one's picking up the phone and they're not … sometimes … okay, I know. We have hundreds of help lines, and we have a training process for that, we send our staff to put it, and it's a lot of effort. And I would like to say, the formula is really simple, I would recommend. I agree with all the other panelists, what they said, they're 100 percent right.

Now here is the formula. It is, be in action, be in action, be in action. Okay? And the barrier is your mind. All the analysis, all the opinions, all the ideas, they're fine; but there's a particular point, you say, let me sweep all the thing aside, let me get down to ground, in front of the court. You distribute the flyers, you gather people in a big city like New York or San Francisco or big—Chicago, or Detroit—and you protest. And you need 50 people, 100 people. You protest. That's it. It is not costly at all. It is uncomfortable.

Initially, it is going to be uncomfortable, but I would like to say this with every single guy who comes to us, that: "If you are facing injustice, you protest. If you are not protesting, you are promoting injustice." Right? And we tell to the guys, don't look at the videos, do your duty. Because we follow "Don't look at the scoreboard, you have to hit the ball. If you keep looking at the scoreboard and (pantomimes a miss), you are going to lose." And I tell to each one of the activists in India and everywhere, that it's the ordinary people who do extraordinary things. Okay, so you are the ones.

And when I started, I was an ordinary guy—I was a software engineer, shy and "I don't know…" I was scared when I talked to my customers in Germany; I used to work for Bosch, and I would rehearse five times before I'd speak. And I never imagined that I can testify in front of Parliament one day. So everything is possible, and it's the ordinary people who are going to do extraordinary things. That's what I have to say. Thank you.

(Mike Buchanan:) Mike Buchanan, leader of the British political party Justice for Men and Boys—and the women who love them. People are always dropping off that subtitle.

The Men's Human Rights Movement needs to have a political wing, and this is the time. I believe there's a need for Men's Human Rights parties right across the political spectrum, because—now—when you start a political party, donations start coming in very quickly, media attention starts to come in, and the movement needs both of those. I look forward to the day in particular when the US and Canada both have Men's Human Rights political parties.

Given that Canada seems to be the world's biggest generator of Honey Badgers, wouldn't it be great to see a Honey Badger lead a Men's Human Rights Party in Canada?

That's all I have. Thank you.

(Stefan Molyneux:) Hi, and I'm Stefan Molyneux, the host of the philosophy show, Freedomain Radio. I don't do a huge amount of activism, I guess, because it's a crazy life, right, to try and pursue virtue in the face of social ostracism and calumny and attack. I mean, it's a ridiculous thing to do—I mean, with the caveat that it makes you enormously happy in the long run, and makes the world a better place. So my basic feeling is that I want to have, like—I want to have a closed-coffin funeral; and the reason I want to have a closed-coffin funeral is, I've lived a life of dedication to virtue, and I'd look like this: (Huge grin) And nobody could stand that I died so happy.

Yeah, you're going to die either way; do the right thing, and you'll die with a smile on your face. I think that's a life well lived.

(Janet Bloomfield:) I'm Janet Bloomfield, and most of my activism takes place in 140 characters or less. I have some good news and some bad news. The good news is that anyone can be a Twitter activist. The bad news is that all the advice you just heard, it's useless. It's not going to work. Do your research, don't reinvent the wheel, pace yourself—that doesn't work in Twitter. Not at all.

There's two things you really want to accomplish in Twitter, if you're going to be an activist. One thing is "reach," and the other thing is "response." When you're talking about "reach" in Twitter, it doesn't really matter how many followers you have; it matters how many followers your followers have. That's a really important point. If you look on my Twitter feed, I have about a thousand followers; but, just this morning, with three re-tweets, I reached over three million people.

What I go after on Twitter is, I chase after voices that are slightly open. I go after a younger crowd that I think is open to what we are talking about. I tailor my messages to reach people, especially young people, who might be willing to stop for one nanosecond, which is about how long people will read a tweet for, and consider clicking on a point of view, watching a video. Tailoring the message is really important on Twitter; know who your audience is, and go after them. And you have 140 characters, so you can go on quite a bit and make your point, you know.

I'm also starting to publish on Thought Catalog. This is another way of tailoring the message. And again, on Thought Catalog, what matters is how many times your message is shared. So I have five articles on Thought Catalog; I didn't check today, but I believe those have been shared over 100,000 times. Thought Catalog is a website of just sort of random stories, publications, pop culture, political analysis; you sort of boil down—it's the TL-DR, too long–didn't read, version of news. And you just bring that down into a really simple message, and if people like your message they will re-tweet it. And that's what you're trying to do. You're trying to tailor your message so that it will reach a lot of people.

Here's the big mistake people make: they only re-tweet stuff they agree with. No, no, no: re-tweet stuff you think is absolutely fucking horrible. That's great—that gets people to respond. That's the second part of what you want to do. Re-tweeting something doesn't mean you endorse it; so when you find something absolutely appalling on Twitter, go ahead and repeat it. Go ahead and follow those people; the more people you follow, the more people will follow you. This is something anyone can do, sitting at a bus stop.

Find stuff on Twitter. The more people you follow, the more information you'll start getting. And you can start reaching out—it is almost impossible to get a reaction on Twitter. There's millions and millions of tweets being sent every single second, and it goes so fast, it's just a blur, and they've forgotten what they read two seconds after they read it. But—things will stick, over and over again, if you keep sending the same information out and keep collecting followers; and re-tweet stuff that you don't agree with, and try and get a response on Twitter. It's an excellent form of activism, because it's communication, activism as communication. And I think that's really where we are. We still need to get the word out about what we do. We're confronting a horrible set of stereotypes in the media. I mean—I made some comment on Twitter that "we were going to spend the money we collected on hookers and blow." Under 24 hours, we got the Motor City Muckraker reporting that "A Voice for Men admits they will be spending the funds on prostitutes and illegal drugs." But you know what? That brought us a lot of traffic. It got us a lot of attention. A lot of people looked at that headline and said, "What?!—Okay, I'm going."

(Paul Elam: "And I want to say, for the record, that's not true."—Sniffs loudly)

So, even if you're not willing to get up with a sign and march around, and you don't have time to write long articles, sign up for Twitter. It takes two seconds to re-tweet, add your hashtag—I love "NoMRA." Just add that to everything. It's fantastic. And—voila! You're an activist. And you can die happy.

(Robert O'Hara:) All right, now we'll open up the panel to questions, and please just raise your hand if you have a question. We have a mic runner; please wait for him to approach you, then speak, because till the mic is in your face, it's not going to be recorded, it's not going to be broadcast in the feed or anything like that. We have one question here, and please keep the questions brief; and if you don't have a question for a particular panelist, I will direct your question to one or more panelists who I think might be able to answer your question.

(Question:) Okay, this question's for Janet. It seems one of the main, greatest duties as activists is to protect children, all children, from warped gender ideologies, which are possible strongest in school systems. So as a mother and an activist, would you give your advice to other parents, to defend their children from the influence of a misandristic education system?

(Janet Bloomfield:) Ideally, home-school them. Unfortunately, I live in a small community. I did home-school my daughter for the first few years of life, but I live in a small community where the only home-schooling people are wing-nut, tinfoil-hat-wearing Christian Armageddonists. So they were being mis-socialized there to begin with. I did put them in the school system, but I just talk honestly about … and I try to frame it in terms of styles of learning; that the school system is set up to benefit one certain style of learning, which mostly girls are good at—but lots of boys are too. And it demonizes another way of learning, which is mostly boys but some girls too. That splitting the school system to benefit only one style of learning is ultimately destructive; and I try to make it clear to them that this is wrong; I am trying to help stop that, I want that stopped, and they should never feel guilty about preferring one style of learning over another, even from one subject to the next. That they're both right, and anyone who says there's only one way to do this is wrong.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay. Jonathan, do you have anything to add to that?

(Jonathan Taylor:) Yeah. I would just make sure that you're constantly engaged with your children, and constantly following up with them on what happens in the classroom. And in regard to learning styles, you know, educators have long been schooled in the notions of multiple intelligences. I mean, there's, what? Seven or eight different types of intelligences? There's abstract types of intelligence, kinesthetic types—you know, that corresponds well with learning styles. And the approach to education should be that although there are ways, distinctively, ways in which girls and boys learn, you also have to come to terms with the fact that at the end of the day, every child is an individual learner. And really, you have to maintain that parent-teacher connection. And if the teacher's not teaching—if the student is not learning, the way the teacher teaches—then you need to communicate with that teacher, so that the teacher teaches the way the student learns. And your feedback, your constant communication with those educators, will help that process very much. And of course that's going to be much easier if you're in a stable two-parent family.

(Question:) The question is that there are, in this context, two ways of drawing attention to your issue. One is to present statistics, facts, experience; the other is to use hyperbole and to be unreasonable, but to get the attention as a result. I think most of the people here, on the panel, use the first way more, if not exclusively. I'm wondering if the people that don't use that way could justify the hyperbole method, and why it works well.

(Robert O'Hara:) The man to ask about that is Mr. Elam, right there.

(Paul Elam:) I wonder why he thought of me? … It is difficult for me to answer this without being blunt. The hyperbole that we employ from time to time at AVFM is—just so everybody knows, the first explanation is that it is calculated. I don't sit in my underwear in a living room, up to my knees in beer cans, screaming for my partner to get me a sandwich as I slam away the keyboard with all these harsh, hateful feelings … anymore.

One of the things I brought up in the press conference—as a matter of fact, it was the core of my talk there—is that all social movements, all quests for justice, involve shaking a complacent society out of its coma. We have people dying over these issues. We've had some great talks, there's been serious talks, there's been talks that were funny; but in the end, we're talking about people dying, we're talking about destroyed lives, and we're talking about it going on in a society that is intent not only on just looking the other way, but on insisting that we look the other way as it happens. I don't view my hyperbole as the problem in that scenario. I view the cultural problem of misandry as the real offense.

So, for those that don't agree with my style, I say with all respect, don't read my articles. For those who do agree with it, I appreciate your support. But there has never been a social movement in history at all, ever, that got anywhere without a direct and confronting expression of indignation for problems that were not being addressed. And we're going to continue that, going on forward—thank you. And when—and it has always been in the plan at A Voice for Men, and those that follow the site closely already see it happening—when we can establish a meaningful dialogue with the media, and I know there are still some white lanyards out there … when we can establish a meaningful dialogue with the media, when we can establish a meaningful dialogue with this society, indeed when we can establish with feminists who say that their cause in life is for gender equity and for justice … We won't need the hyperbole, we won't need the rhetoric, because we'll be having a dialogue. But sometimes we have to accept that bad breath is better than no breath. I hope that answers your question. Thank you.

(Robert Franklin:) Can I add something? First, the idea that there's an opposition between fact and hyperbole is not always correct. Sometimes, facts are really awful, and it's hard to do hyperbole. The other thing is—I can't remember who on the panel said this—do what you do best. If I tried to write like Paul does, it'd fall flat as a pancake. He does what he does really well. But that doesn't mean everybody can. I know that I can't.

(Adam McPhee:) Can I add one more quick thing to that too? You'll never actually know how fast you can get swept up in the movement. You may not even know what you're good at. When I got involved with CAFE, there was a certain other panelist who was being protested against; and there was an email that went around the School of Social Work at Ryerson, saying, "Hey, there's this Warren Farrell guy who'd going to be talking, we should all go protest him." And I was like, "Wait, I've read his book, I actually agree with a lot of his ideas." And so, I wanted to go see it, and I went to see it with my girlfriend, because someone suggested I take someone who's supportive of these issues—and I've kind of already found that person.

So I went to the event, and there was a huge protest that was pretty disgusting to see. And afterwards, I contacted the Canadian Association For Equality and I told them, "Hey, just so you guys know, I know the School of Social Work was partially organizing to protest. But I'm also a part of that school. I don't agree with that—just so you guys know, there's also support from some of these groups that are protesting you."

Throughout that year, now I've done multiple TV appearances, I've been in Sharp magazine, started my own blogging, and now I'm on a panel with that very man myself. And this is all of one and a half years later. So that's how fast you can get swept up, even just trying to get involved with the movement, even if you don't know what you're good at yet. Approach some of these organizations that are already working to solve issues you're interested in, and they may find where you're good, all by themselves.

(Janet Bloomfield:) I have nothing to add to this discussion because I never use hyperbole or polemics.

(Question:) Jim … I'm a bum, I used to be a political science professor. I just want to mention I think this is a very exciting time, I'm so happy to be here. Thank you to everyone. Because I used to be a political science professor, I hadn't heard this, this weekend, but I just wanted to mention—we have a big election coming up in 2016. I used to study this stuff. I know I look not very reliable, but I believe that Hillary might get the nod, and if so, we're likely to see a very exciting public debate about this, again, coming up. So I wanted to let people know that this is an exciting time in the United States. I think in 2015 and 2016 you're going to hear more war-on-women rhetoric, and I would hope some of us would be ready to rise to the challenge; because when that stuff comes out, that's our time to come out and … I don't want to say fight back—to help the public. I'm sorry, I know—kick me afterwards for doing this.

From my weekend here, I wanted to say: One of the things that I began to believe is how important—actually, I believed this before, but—really, how important women are to our movement. And I wanted to—For the women, for the women … And also I wanted to point out something that I thought of when I was first watching Girl Writes What's videos was, one of the audiences that must be targeted is mothers with sons. And I've got your poster: "Hey, Mom, look what they're saying about your boy." And I hope we might make a special effort to reach out to mothers because I bet you, once mothers start hearing some of this stuff—especially mothers of sons—they will, and we've heard how effective they can be when they go to the government and ask for a redress.

And finally, my question—sorry for doing that. But my question is, to anyone on the panel, but probably mostly to Professor Farrell, or Dr. Farrell. About that men's studies—I would like to bring a lawsuit against the university, under Title IX, to get a men's studies program started. They probably won't hire me, 'cause I'm an ex-con, but perhaps I could help get it started with the lawsuit. So can you tell me, how can I or anyone else start this process? Why don't we have a men's studies program, and we've got Title IX?

(Warren Farrell:) First of all, are there any students here who are interested in working with Jim in starting this process? … So, Jim, your question has just started this process. There are two students right here, right now, who will contact you right afterwards. And they are needed because you need to have standing. Standing means that you have to have a real person apply for a real men's studies program that they are genuinely interested in and able to take. And ideally those students will get together two, three, or four other students. Yes?

(Question:) So, the student must petition the university to create the program?

(Warren Farrell:) That is correct. The law court needs to see a real, not a hypothetical—they need to see a reality that is not being able to be fulfilled. Now, there may be a university somewhere that will actually respond to the students, if they are real people that want a real program, and then you won't have a lawsuit. But that's highly unlikely. And you'll need to try this once or twice, probably, and have a lawsuit on your hands. As I was mentioning in the workshop yesterday, and also in the presentation, if this happens at one university, particularly in a major state, you are talking about national fear, in universities, to NOT have men's studies programs; and you are then talking about the possibility of national change. You are then talking about, instead of 150,000 female women's studies graduates a year, that being somewhat balanced. And you are then talking about a ripple effect around the world.

Second, in the area of politics—oh, and then I'd also like to encourage the students and Jim yourself to write some pieces for AVfM's website on the desire for this; also, write something for "Minding the Campus," published by the Urban Institute on this. They are interested in what's going on in the campus; solicit via an article in "Minding The Campus." People who are interested in suing universities—these kids, or these young men and women, have to have guts, and they also have to present well, and they need to also be willing to stand up to the type of criticism that all of us get, when we're here or when we stand up for these issues. So those are a few of the things.

But in relation to your comment about the 2016 election: in Iowa and New Hampshire, those are perfect places for groups of us to gather and organize and to show up. And here's what I mean by that: you show up and ask a question of a candidate that's at a town hall meeting, in a place like Iowa or Alaska where the security is much less than it will be in other places. You go to a town hall meeting, you ask a question. When you are pushed off or pushed away, somebody else backs up and says, "No, no, let's hear a real answer to that question." And when that person is pushed off or pushed away, somebody else in a different part of that meeting says, "No, I really am interested, Senator So-And-So or whoever so-and-so." And then, the embarrassment from the staff, they're going to come up to you and say, "We need clarity about what you're talking about. What's this stuff on men's issues? What is—what do you mean by men's birth control, what do you mean by men's issues, what do you mean by a Men's Health Day, what do you mean by a White House Council on Boys and Men?" You know, whatever you're asking about. And then, the asking about the creating of that disturbance in a civil but forceful way will create national publicity because these candidates are being covered at the national level. Ask these questions two or three times, and mix up the clothing, and mix up the people who are asking the questions—you know, get the journalists a little mixed-up—you're going to have yourself national news. It's the easiest, fastest way to create national news.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay, Mr. Smith and Mr. Kumar want to answer. We'll start with Mr. Smith, because he got my attention first; we'll come back to you.

(Carnell Smith:) Can you hear me?—The gentleman had asked about a deliberate effort toward reaching moms with sons. 90 percent of the people who contact me are women, and some of them are the moms with sons; grandmothers of the guys; girlfriends, new wife, second wife, current fiancée. I've been inclusive of them from the beginning. And some of the feminists are—I'm on their hatred list because it's very difficult for them to have a statement of men against women when I have more women on my side before the legislature than they have on their side with their ideology.

So, yes, we can be effective, but we also have to be inviting to them. I'm deliberate in my social media, Facebook, Twitter, my own websites. Wherever they are, I'm looking for them. I actually speak also in churches because there's more than one venue to get to people who need your help. But some of us within the movement have made a mistake by saying, because we think it's only a Men's Rights issue, you girls should stay over there and leave us alone. Big mistake. To me, women are masters at socializing, and they will network like nobody else. So why not leverage that power, and get women who love us, who are affected by the issues, and then invite them to the table with us? And you'll be surprised at how much it diffuses these idiotic notions that our opponents … and I like to invite them publicly, so they can get credit for their positions. And it's very effective.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay, for Mr. Kumar.

(Anil Kumar:) Well, I will just add to what Dr. Warren Farrell spoke about the elections in 2016. If you see, we had an election recently, and more than 840 million people were the electorate; and one month it took … and we had a plan. We got into TV debates, and these gatherings of politicians that all of the candidates come to their town hall or someplace where they interact with the people. So we had our guys in the audience, and we always got a mic—we spoke with them about shared parenting and all that; we really sometimes heckled them, you know, like that. And it was sometimes telecast, got telecasted, in the national media.

Now that is very effective because after the show, the politicians spend some time speaking to you because you have an issue. And he sees that you are so serious, so that means this issue must be serious; otherwise, why will somebody be so passionate about it? Now, I must give unrelated news here, that the threw-down government—we have the Liberals, in India, like your Democrat Party—they lost so badly, so badly, that they were reduced to only 44 seats in a Parliament of 543 seats. That's the historic low for them.

(Robert O'Hara:) There's one question over there; we have another one back there—you can take him, he's been waiting. Then after that, Tim, go to the gentlemen with the glasses after you've got to him, please.

(Question:) Yes, I think I have a basic and simple question, regarding activism, and my question is, how does an activist counter the opposition generated by the corrupt news media?

(Robert O'Hara:) Anybody want to take that? I would think that Paul would be, again …

(Paul Elam:) I didn't hear the question.

(Robert O'Hara:) Could you speak the question again, please?

(Question:) Yes. I wonder how an activist can deal with the opposition generated by the corrupt news media?

(Warren Farrell:) Can you say your name, so we can speak to you as a person?

(Ewell Tolbert:) Ewell Tolbert.

(Paul Elam:) Ewell! Okay—I guess you're so far away. I know who you are. Good to see you here … Here's the deal. We're the media … we are the media. This is an age where dedicated people can create very heavily traveled media websites, news websites. Depending … Everybody in the media, in one way or another, has some kind of agenda; and unfortunately, it's frequently not journalism. I'm not picking on the journalists here—these guys are to be lauded that they showed up to ask questions.

But, to try to get a little more detailed about the answer, is that the way we've operated at AVfM, the whole time, yes; we've been criticized for some hyperbole and for … I think it's the new version of being uppity. And we're going to continue to do that. But what happens, and the reason that AVfM has grown so drastically, is that somebody in the media will go four years back, grab four lines of satire, repost it, and say, "Here's what this is about," and then they'll say, "By the way, Elliot Rodger." And what happens is that it sends a lot of people to the site; people who are just prepared and already have it locked into their minds that they're going to come there and find a bunch of misogynistic kitten-eaters who want to turn back the hands of time and put women in the kitchen. That's what they're going to see; I mean, that's what people will see if they've made up their minds in advance.

Where we grow is in intelligent, open-minded people coming to the site, reading enough articles, and saying, "You know what? I was lied to, about this place. This place is not about hating women. This place is not about being regressive. This place is about Gender Equity, as it was always meant to be." Because that's what it is.

What they will see, when they come to A Voice for Men, is men and women working together, treating each other as equals—really as equals, not the kind of "equal" that you don't ever oppose what a woman says because you're not supposed to argue with women. People there have to stand on their merits. They have to make rational points, rational arguments. Both sexes have to do that in order to pass muster, to be there. That is equality. And people that are genuinely interested in equality, people that are genuinely interested in men and women valuing each other as human beings first, come to A Voice for Men and figure out that's exactly what's happening. And they grow.

So don't worry about the mainstream media. They're going to eventually figure it out too. … Oh! And watch the ManStream Media.

(Robert O'Hara:) Stefan, do you have something brief to say? Please make it brief because we've got a couple of people coming …

(Stefan Molyneux:) Brief … brief, what's that? The mainstream media is currently on the decline, as I think we're all aware. People's trust of the mainstream media is ridiculous; it's like single digits, it's like they trust it only slightly more than Congress. So I think that's important to recognize and understand. Very few people in the world look for facts, and will change their minds according to facts; some will, and those are the people that we want to reach. I always try to figure out whether people are interested in facts, and if they are, fantastic, we'll have a conversation. If they're not, then, as the old saying goes, "Never argue with a fool, they'll drag you down to their level and beat you with experience."

I try to steer clear of them, recognizing that the media is in the business of delivering eyeballs to advertisers. They're not in the business of delivering truth to humanity. And so the best way to deliver eyeballs to advertisers is not to offend people's sensibilities. So the media is fundamentally conservative, and the truth is always radical. Whether that's a match—if there can be a match, fantastic. I don't tend to pursue it, but I think it's important to recognize there is a misalignment.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay, there's a fellow right there who needs to ask a question.

(Question:) Thank you, hi. I'm Tim Goldrich. This is a question I guess perhaps primarily for you, Dr. Farrell, about a White House Council for Men and Boys. What happened with that? Is there a lesson there? What are your thoughts about that, but also about "My Brother's Keeper," any thoughts about that?

(Warren Farrell:) Yes. The background on this is that—I think I mentioned in my presentation that I was asked to be involved with the White House Council on Women and Girls, at an advisory level. I suggested there should be a White House Council on Boys and Men. That suggestion went all the way up to—just about ready to go into the Oval Office. Five minutes before it went into the Oval Office, with the head of Government Relations with the Boy Scouts, with the Boy Scouts having endorsed it, suddenly the person who was supposed to present it was told that that was taken off the agenda. We could never … we got two or three times where we had a great deal of White House interest, and just before it was ready to move forward, it was chopped from the agenda; never being able to get through to the people who chopped it from the agenda.

And so, there is something going on in the White House, where we think we know who it is, and what it is, and the groups of people that there are. I don't feel at liberty to say those names, per se, right now, but there is—but the people who it is have a view of the world which is that the White House Council on Women and Girls is one of the very few things in the world that understands women and girls, and the rest of the world is all men and boys; and so why should there be something for men and boys when the entire world is men and boys? And we all know why that's not accurate. But there are a few people at the top level, close to President Obama, who take that view of the world. And from what we can tell, they have stopped this from going to, actually, the eyes of President Obama and having him consider it—or, he has considered it and he wants us to believe that it's somebody else that is stopping him from considering it. I'm not sure which.

But the answer to the question, which is really the most important thing is, where do we go from here? Where we go from here is to Diana Thompson's advice: get to know your congressperson. Ask him or her to write a letter to the president; ask him or her to copy me. There are some congressmen—Congressman Cleaver, the head of the Black Congressional Caucus, and Sam Graves, and a few other congressmen and women that are beginning to get on board, both conservative and Republican—I mean, conservative and Democrat, excuse me—that are beginning to get on board, and take an interest in this. And we have been told by the White House that if we get enough congressional support, they will reconsider this process.

So, if you want a White House Council on Boys and Men, we are the group to take a stand, to do something about it, write about it … Just look up White House Council on Boys and Men, you'll see its website. Link to both it, and also to your congressperson, and also to AVfM, and write stuff about it. Begin to generate the underlying base. Politicians are basically followers, and they're leaders; they start leading when they know there's strong-enough followership to motivate them to lead with success. And that's our job, to create that foundation and make that happen. As President Kennedy said to Martin Luther King, when Martin Luther King said, "We want you to support the Civil Rights Movement," President Kennedy said, "Make it possible for me to do so."

(Carnell Smith:) By the way, Dr. Farrell, was that Valerie Bowman Jarrett?

(Warren Farrell:) I'm … You're too smart.

(Question:) I'm Murray Davis, National Family Justice Association, and I have a general question for the panel; and it has to do with activism. My question is this: From a political point of view, would you recommend that an activist in this movement designate themselves as a political independent, versus conservative Republican or liberal Democrat, in order to allow them to more easily maneuver in the political legislature, so that you don't have that pigeonhole? I'm just curious as to what you might think. I have my own opinion from my own experience, but I'd like to ask yours as well.

(Robert Franklin:) May I answer?

(Robert O'Hara:) It's up for grabs.

(Carnell Smith:) I'd like to jump on that.

(Robert O'Hara:) You, and Mr. Franklin on the end. Okay?

(Carnell Smith:) Well, I have my own political views. But what I'm advocating, in working with legislators, it is important to work with everybody because the issues themselves are non-partisan. And I think some of us make a crucial mistake by not willing to talk to everybody, including the opposition, to garner putting the issues out—completely out—on the table. If you are a person who is only of the Democratic Party, and you're only willing to talk to Democrats, you're pigeonholing yourself.

In my state, as well as other states I've worked in, we've gotten nearly 100 percent support from both houses of legislature as well as state governorship … with the exception of California, when the governor vetoed our bill because somebody told him he would lose $40 million in federal funding if he passed a paternity fraud bill, which was a complete lie. But the fact that we were able to get through both houses, and got majority support—myself, Diana, and other groups—we never allowed people to try to pigeonhole the issues as partisan.

Civil rights and human rights issues are non-partisan. And I would suggest keeping the focus there, as a human rights issue.

(Robert Franklin:) And let me add one thing. Carnell was talking about lobbying legislatures and how you identify yourself. Let me remark on the electoral process—who do you vote for. One of the most important things that we have to remember is, this has to be important to us in voting. There are always a thousand different issues in every electoral contest. This needs to go to the top of your list. If there's somebody who votes the right way, give 'em your vote. It doesn't matter if you identify as a Republican, Democrat, Independent. If they vote the right way on this issue, give them your vote; if they don't, don't.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay, let's go on to the next question. I know there's a gentleman up there that was—Was there someone inside the audience? Okay, go to him first, then James, then we'll get to this gentleman here, and then Mr. Vinczer … Please keep your questions brief. We don't want to take too long, we want to get as many questions as we can, so please.

(Question:) This question is to Paul Elam. I asked this question to him at lunchtime, and his answer was, he didn't know; I hope he does now.

(Warren Farrell:) He's a quick study.

(Question continues:) By show of hands, how many attendees are men from the United States? … And how many are from Canada? … I was just wondering. The US population is ten times the Canadian population. I'm from St. Louis; there's nobody else from St. Louis. There seems to be a certain level of apathy, and to quote Paul himself, "coma" in the United States, and I'm trying to understand why. Paul, do you have any answers to that?

(Robert O'Hara:) Actually, I want to get Canadians' perspective on this. We have three right here on the panel—oh, yeah, sure.

(Paul Elam:) He asked about why so many Canadians and not enough Americans, and you went to Canadians?

(Robert O'Hara:) Well, I just wanted to hear their—I do want to hear their opinions on it because—well, okay, yeah. Americans aren't always …

(Paul Elam:) We'll let the Canadians too. The partial answer to that is that … I don't know. It could be a number of reasons. It may be that American men are more afraid, but I would also point out that there's not somebody else from Houston here, other than me. But AVfM is an American, essentially American-based, website; and it is the most heavily trafficked website addressing men's issues that's ever existed. And the great majority of the traffic is from America. We do have Jonathan Taylor sitting here, that is an American activist. Tara Palmatier may not identify as an activist, but she actively works helping men in these problem situations.

I don't think it's really for the same reason that we have a policy at AVfM, we don't accept advertising and we don't align politically with anybody, we don't align religiously with anybody, we don't align with anything except people dedicated to men's issues. I'm grateful, wherever people are coming from to address these issues. And that's not to bypass your question. I just don't know if an analysis of why Canada happens to produce so many great activists—I mean, the Honey Badgers are predominately Canadian; we've got Janet Bloomfield, and we've got CAFE, and we've got so much going on there. It may be because the ideological feminists in Canada are crazier than they even are here!

(Warren Farrell:) That's the reason. I guarantee it.

(Paul Elam:) And it may be that they have pushed so hard in Canada, with ideological feminism, with the idea of Adele Mercier saying that young boys that are incarcerated and are molested by their female jailers are the perpetrators and the jailers are the victims. Our rhetoric out of America from feminists has been really bad, but I think … Stefan was talking earlier about alien brain invasion, or something like that—I'm sorry, I'm not trying to pick on Canada, but you guys have got some problems! And it may be why there's so many activists. I don't really know. But what I do know is that this movement is growing internationally, and that—you know what? It's not going to hurt America, for once, to catch up to the rest of the world, instead of the other way around.

(Robert O'Hara:) Janet has something to say.

(Janet Bloomfield:) Well, I'm Canadian, and I do know why there are so many activists. It's because we have a very long history of social programs in response to citizen requests. We have public health care, we have lots of paternity leave, we have generous benefits. And the reason we have that is because we don't have to pay for national defense because you do. And I think maybe the reason there's apathy in America, compared to Canada, is because y'all are working your asses off to pay for us.

(Robert O'Hara:) Whew—wow—Okay, did you have anything to say about that? … What about you, Adam?

(Adam McPhee:) It keeps us warm in the winter, marching around a lot.

(Robert O'Hara:) The next question's going to go to James Huff, then it's going to go to this gentleman here, and then to Mr. Vinczer. So please, James, go ahead.

(James Huff:) One of the forms of activism that we haven't talked about is sort of the background psychological operations that are taking place. We've got dedicated men and women going into enemy territories online, talking to people who are in forums dedicated to parents—for instance, look at Mumsnet over in the UK. There isn't a single person on this panel that hasn't heard of the Fathers 4 Justice campaign against Mumsnet. And then, we have dedicated men and women moving in to those areas and actually addressing these issues. They're doing it anonymously. They're bringing it up right there, to these people—and gathering the feminist outrage that they have against us and our ideas—and then rebroadcasting that. And I think that is one area of activism that does need to be discussed.

(Robert O'Hara:) That's open for everybody on the panel, really, because actually, James is really the greatest expert in this room on what he's talking about. But if any of you all have any thoughts about that, please … free for all.

(Robert Franklin:) It's just as I said, we need to show up. Every time you show up, that's activism. That's showing up.

(Jonathan Taylor:) In terms of online activism, in particular, I would recommend that whenever you see anyone, especially who has any official—I mean, I work primarily in academic issues—whenever you see, for example, whenever I see something hateful against men and boys posted on a university website, I screen-shot that immediately because later on they may take it down. But the fact of the matter is that even though they have taken down some of the things, the culture that produced that is still very much at that university, and people need to know who those people are. So that's just something I would like to add. I really like James's work—James Huff, standing over there, who brought the question; he is the infamous Agent Orange! And he exposed a lot of … And he really inspired me to kind of go off on my own, and to record some administrators who admitted to some very horrible things which we later discussed on A Voice for Men Radio. But yeah, infiltration is a necessary part of activism, and sort of playing the double agent. I think that's a necessary skill. I think I remember … what is it, Sun Tzu, who wrote The Art of War, said that all war is deception. And there's nothing wrong with being mischievous for a good cause. I think that's something which we can, which some people can do well.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay, I was going to this gentleman first, but go ahead, take the question, then we'll do him, and then we'll definitely get to Mr. Vinczer.

(Question:) The last question pretty much touched on what I was going to talk about. I was going to talk about the technique of 3-D chess versus full-frontal assault, basically; sort of the post-Marxist critical theory in revolutionary strategies of the feminists could also be effective counter-revolutionary strategies, like the techniques of Saul Alinsky, who obviously influenced Hillary Clinton; things like the Delphi techniques, which cultivate groups' consensus; those types of things. I wonder if anybody up there could comment on this type of thing? Maybe Stefan knows about it, or someone else.

(Stefan Molyneux:) The only strategy is conviction, passion, and truth. I try not to get too involved in "inside base," all about how we're going to take some bunker, or how many diagrams are going to look like my lower intestine before we reach our goal. I think you just want to ground yourself in as much empirical research as possible, you want to live your life as consistently as possible.

You know, when you live your own life with integrity—like a tree, you've got to grow down before you grow up. When you want to build a building, you dig down first. You learn about yourself, you learn about your own blocks; self-knowledge is the key to productive change in society. Like Socrates said, "Know thyself" is the first rule. So, you learn about yourself, you know yourself, and then you live your own life with integrity. And integrity communicates itself in a way that is intangible, right? I mean, 95 percent of human communication, or 90 percent of human communication, is non-verbal. So the degree to which you have overcome your own inhibitions, with regard to the truth, is the degree to which you will be able to change other people. If you want to go into a boxing ring, you spend years training, first, and then you go in.

So I think that pursuit of self-knowledge, once you fully accept the truth that you want to bring to the world, when you have accepted it and you've overcome your own barriers, you bring that truth to the world and you're unstoppable, because you are just absolutely certain. And it has been one of the great tragedies of human history that the most knowledgeable tend to be the most tentative, and the least knowledgeable tend to be the most certain. I think we can correct that, and move forward that way.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay. Great.

(Adam McPhee:) I just want to touch on that too. I believe the second stage after "Know thyself" is "Know thy enemy." I'm not necessarily anti-feminist, as a lot of people here are; one of my favorite places to go, I like Men's Rights Reddit, where a lot of people are intelligent, but I also feel it's an echo-chamber sometimes. So one of the other places I like to go is FeMRADebates, where there's actually more moderate feminists who will actually discuss the issues, as opposed to just fighting against you and being vigilant in their position, which forces you to be vigilant against theirs. That second step of getting into the ring: You watch your opponent box; you want to see what he's coming at you with.

So when you talk to these people who are actually level-headed feminists, or the kind that these would be good in the movement, who are sometimes like, "Yeah, I agree where you're coming from"—and, surprisingly, you're sometimes, "Yeah, I agree where you're coming from." And when we start to foster these mutual communications, which is a lot closer to what Warren Farrell has always talked about, we actually start to come closer to an ideal that both sides can agree on—and fuck the radicals, push them to the sides.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay. This gentleman, please.

(Question:) Hey. (Inaudible) is my name. A lot of this legislative activism is necessarily local; but the Evil Empire, that I was inspired by Erin Pizzey yesterday saying we need to fight the Evil Empire—that Evil Empire is a global Evil Empire, and we are the International Conference on Men's Issues. Specifically, I'm talking about the Violence Against Women Act; the Istanbul Convention in Europe; the gender violence law in Spain, which has ruined two million men and their families; a new such law in 2012, enacted in Italy … same kind of thing. Italy had a very low divorce rate, actually one of the lowest divorce rates in Europe, but that law probably was enacted in order to get that divorce rate up. In Brazil, there's the Lei Maria da Penha … My question is, as far as activism that has an international impact, what if we managed to get one of those exposed, highly visible countries, like the US with its Violence Against Women Act—what if we got one of these laws square struck down in Supreme Court, sending a message to the entire world that the basis on which these laws have been created is full of lies? What if we could get a Supreme Court in any one of these countries, in Europe or the US or Brazil or any one of those countries—what if we could get one of these Supreme Courts to agree with us that it is all based on lies, and strike down one of these laws? How could we do that? Is it possible?

(Robert O'Hara:) Website activists include Carnell Smith and Robert Franklin … I have some thoughts on it, but go ahead if you guys want to tackle that.

(Carnell Smith:) Yes, it is possible to tackle it, but you've got to find someone who is affected who's willing to go the distance. My experience is that a lot of people suffer from a learned helplessness; and where they have a case that we could actually get to a state or a national Supreme Court level, some of them get weary along the way. And there's a lack of funding because the expertise that's needed to do that type of appeal is not just something you can just wake up today and say, "I think I'll go and do some appellate briefs."

One of the things that we saw, with not just paternity fraud, but with family law issues, men's rights issues … without some way of a national funding for a legal defense fund, it would be very difficult to sustain a legal fight. And there are individuals that, like myself, have tried to get cases before the US Supreme Court, on issues that we can prove have national impact. In the United States, a large part of family law is no longer under a Constitutionally protected right to an appeal. So, when you find out that your cases are under discretionary appeal, and the court can make the decision, regardless of merit, that your case will not be heard … you can only really do, in my opinion, something else.

As I also pushed my own case through the US Supreme Court, my goal wasn't because of me; I thought I had it made because I could afford to fight. I was looking out for the people who could not put up the money to make the fight. But at the same time, work with media to publicize the issues on a national level. Sometimes we have people who cannot go the distance. So part of our strategy, in my opinion, we have to come up with the means for a legal defense fund.

(Robert Franklin:) Yeah, I think that's of course true. If you're talking about invalidating all of VAWA on Constitutional grounds, friend, it ain't gonna happen. It's too large and diverse a law. Now, you can attack very important parts of it: unequal application to men and women, being one of the obvious ones. But of course, Carnell is correct. Remember the industry that you're attacking; you're not attacking a lawyer, you're attacking an industry, and it is a multibillion-dollar industry. And that is not child's play.

Let me say one other thing, and I'm not going to go into this in detail; but in the United States, one aspect of the history of litigation is that it leads to legislation. Legislators—see, when a judge, a court, expands rights for individuals, legislators freak out, and they pass laws that limit those rights that look like they're going to get out of control. That's another reason to do litigation, not only for its own sake, but for its effect on Congress. Workers' compensation laws, civil rights laws, products liability laws, are all examples of that.

(Robert O'Hara:) Did you want to say something?

(Warren Farrell:) In relation to this fellow's question about different styles, like Saul Alinsky and so on, one of the most effective—Saul Alinsky, by the way, if you're not familiar with his work, you should get familiar with his work, it's really—for certain types of people, this is a very effective way of protesting. But one of the most important protesters was Gandhi; and one of the strategies of Gandhi was to learn the values of the British system, and then take British-system values and challenge and say, "We believe in your values, but you're not applying them to India."

So we need to say to the courts, we believe in—you have to take the values that are most easily believed in. "Do you believe in equality?" Yes, most people do. And so you say what things are clearly not equal, that also don't threaten the psychology of women being protected. So Violence Against Women Act, you can't protest this at this point in history, even though it's unconstitutional, because of the fact that no congressman or senator, or congresswoman or senator, would be willing to vote against something that they feel would signal to their constituency that they're not protecting women. You can't violate that, now, at this point in history.

But what you can do is say something like, there's women's studies, there need to be men's studies; there needs to be equality. That's equality that people can understand. Once there is people studying, more in-depth, what really constitutes equality, you can move down through the system to get to where you want to get to. And so that's my response to that.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay, we have time for just—we're over an hour now of asking questions; we have time just for a couple of more questions. And then Janet has something she'd like to add because there's something very important. Just for two more questions; we'll do Mr. Vinczer and that gentleman—I'm sorry, but we just have to stop. Mr. Vinczer, please.

(Peter Vinczer:) Paul, you are absolutely right in the view of some sick minds in Canada, especially when Ontarians approved, by the re-election of Kathleen Wynne for premier who not just mismanaged the $5 billion power station, this is one thing. But the other things, when she was a minister, she wanted to put into the curriculum that fourth graders, boys, should show physically that this horrid sexuality is not wrong with an artificial penis (should try sexualizing vegetables, experiment inserting them in their anus). The president of the Christian Society (Dr. Charles McVety) successfully fought against this to prevent that from coming into the curriculum of the elementary schools.

Now when I first saw you in Toronto, I saw a tall big man and I thought, This man must be tough and with a strong backbone, to hold up such a big body.

I also see that he has a strong-enough backbone to carry the weight of the many men's issues, voices. All these issues that need to be fought, you are carrying on your back. Always we need a conductor because without a conductor, an orchestra will not play well. You are a good conductor. Listen to him.

Now just one more thing. Just two weeks ago, the famous goalie Grosics of the Hungarian Gold Team (led by Ferenc Puskás) passed away. Sorry, to the English fans, but Hungary beat England 6-3. Sorry, it is true. In a recent interview before his death, Grosics was asked, why Mr. Budai did not play in that game. His answer was because he was not a team player. He wanted to score alone. Puskás and the rest of the team were team players. None of them wanted to score alone, they each wanted the team to win.

Now this is what I am finding here, this is the team, an excellent work by the team. And don't forget that which we put on the coin, a ripple in water. It's all these in life, that everyone cast their own stone, their own rock into that body of water, to always keep alive those ripples.

That is what I am asking you, always to work together and listen to your leader, who is the conductor of the orchestra. We can be successful with the issues this way, that we need to get to through. Thank you.

(Robert O'Hara:) There's one, I do have one guy back here, I want to get to.

(Peter Vinczer:) One thing more, I'm very proud of my son, when he became a member and supporter of A Voice for Men, and also as a Canadian Maltese Charitable Service also behind of him, and we are working together.

(Attila Vinczer:) Actually, it was my father who really made me who I am. It's his drive, his inspiration, his direction, his leadership that enabled me to do the things that I do today. So … it's really his doing, not even mine.

(Robert O'Hara:) We have one more question, and that will be the final question. I'm sorry, we only have time for one more question, please, it's—Mark was first, I'm sorry. Can we give the … Mark was first, I have to—Mark, do you want to yield to her, or …

(Question:) This is really quick.

(Mark:) … National Coalition for Men, I'm the vice president of—and I feel like I would have been able to give a very important answer to the question about the lawsuits because we have overturned statutes on domestic violence in California as unconstitutional. I could have a lot to say about the VAWA; there are portions that are unconstitutional. I request that, next time, the National Coalition for Men be included on an activist panel because we've been activists since 1976, and I feel like we should be up there.

(Paul Elam:) Just so you know, Mark, Harry was invited.

(Robert O'Hara:) Please go ahead.

(Question:) Thank you very much. My name is Terry, and shared parenting works. Diana and I, and several other women here, are part of a group called Leading Women for Shared Parenting. On our website, we have a statement in support of shared parenting, and I'd like to invite every single woman here to go to the website, LW4SP.org, to sign this statement. I'd like to invite every single gentleman here to ask your mothers, your daughters, your sisters, your co-workers, every single female social media friend that you have to sign it; and I'd like to ask Diana Thompson to join me in inviting all these people to come to the website and sign the statement.

(Robert O'Hara:) Okay. We're going to close—Janet had one thing that she felt was very, very important. We're going to close with that, to make it really quick …

(Janet Bloomfield:) I want to address the elephant in the room. I think we need to talk about the complete immorality and unacceptability of doxxing radical Islamics who say they're going to fly planes into buildings and put pressure-cookers at marathons 'cause they're just kidding …

I had the very great pleasure of reading Agent Orange's files that he collected from the Radfem Hub. And just from memory, he said he collected screen-caps of things like "Men should be killed, their carcasses flayed and boiled for glue. They should be stabbed, they should be shot; they should be aborted at birth. We should consider developing a virus to exterminate them. Perhaps we could keep them in cages; just maintain ten percent of the population as sperm-donors."

Yes, we exposed their identity. I think you need to be held accountable when you engage in hate-speech like that. What do we need to happen before it becomes okay to reveal the identities of hatemongers? Yes, we doxx people. And yes, radical feminists should be afraid. If you are going to go into chat forums, and advocate for the extermination of half of humanity, you're going to answer for it.

(Robert O'Hara:) Paul has some closing remarks, and then we will end the show.

(Paul Elam:) This is somewhat of a moment of sadness. I hate to see this one end, but I'm already looking forward to the next one. Again, I can't thank the AVfM staff enough. I feel like I have a load of karmic debt on my back from so many volunteers, sacrificing so much so that you could all be comfortable and so that this conference would work. Could I ask for one more round of applause for them?

Thank you for doing that. And there is—I am not even going to try because I don't have time; there is a list of people so long, in addition, to thank. I just want to thank everybody for getting involved, and for making this thing happen.

I have a couple of ideas I want to express before we close. One is about anger. What we try to do—and I'll take the heat for it, I'm not perfect at it—but what I really try to do with AVfM, and what our staff tries to do, is to create a safe place for men who have been utterly destroyed to express their frustration and their anger about what's happening to them because people who can't talk about it often explode in unhealthy ways. And at the same time, I ask all of you, and this goes for AVfM staff, and readers, and just in your daily lives—there's a line where even wounded people's anger crosses into something that is toxic and unhealthy and destructive. And we all have to use our heads to try to discern when somebody's crossing the line between expressing righteous indignation and tipping the scales in toward hatred and self-destruction. So while we want people to express themselves, we want to help them channel that in a way that will ultimately benefit them and benefit this movement. Luckily, we haven't had that much of a problem with that.

I want to also respond to something I heard even from the panel, and it's—I have tremendous admiration for everybody up on this panel, and all the speakers, and the participants in the press conference. But I would disabuse anybody of the notion that there is a radical wing to the Men's Movement. I would totally reject that idea.

There are certainly some nut cases out on the Internet. That's no surprise. There are some small forums where people have some really bad ideas. But I have never seen anybody with a prominent audience on men's issues—ever—make any kind of headway based on hatred or aggression or violence. I've never seen it once. This is the most peaceful, rational movement I have ever experienced; and I don't want to feed into the idea that we have a radical wing that's a problem. And I trust the people on this panel, and the people in this room, and the people that read our website, that if that started happening, we would come together and put a stop to it.

And, in closing, I just really want to thank all of you again for attending, and I want to ask you to think, as you leave here today—who can you bring with you next year? We want 750 people in attendance at the next International Conference on Men's Issues. We want to double the size, and a little more, of the people that attended here. This is how we're going to grow, by getting together.

We're going to go out and—I went like an old man, went back to my hotel and slept last night, so that I wouldn't fall asleep at this table during this talk. And I'm glad I did. But I've had my five hours of sleep … and I'm ready to have some fun. Dr. T, did you—what, there's a …

(Tara Palmatier:) Yes. I've found a place, it's down the road from our hotel. First of all, I want to apologize to anybody who went to the Dakota Inn last night; apparently, a small handful of people did, and then everybody else went to the tavern next to the hotel. I'm very sorry, I don't know what happened.

But there is a place called Malone's; it's right down the road from the Marriott, it can accommodate up to 200 people. It's, you know, traditional beer, pub food, and it would be great if everybody went there. And I'm sorry, but my battery died, so I can't—and of course, I put the address on my phone, so I can't pull that up for everyone.

(Paul Elam:) Well, this is the age of smart phones.

One last thing that I can't neglect to do. We gave Erin Pizzey a Lifetime Achievement Award at our banquet. It was embedded with two silver coins. Many may not know it, but Mr. Vinczer, Peter Vinczer here, is a master designer, has created works of art with his hands in his trade for many, many years; and he dedicated his enormous talent to creating that coin and that award for Erin Pizzey. And I just wanted to say, thank you, sir, for your talents.

See you guys next year.

Hey Bill Trotter, what's up with you, Bangor Daily News and the truth?

Paul Elam · 27 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The election for a new District Attorney in the corruption-plagued Ellsworth, Maine jurisdiction is just days away.

After five years of scandal, investigations and ultimately the sanctioning of prosecutor Mary Kellett, whose license to practice law was suspended by the State Supreme Court for 7 counts of misconduct, the Ellsworth office is about to get new leadership.

Or is it?

Those who have followed the legal terrorism committed by that office are likely very aware that Mary Kellett still has a job there with full confidence of current DA Carletta Bassano. She will undoubtedly keep that job if her co-worker and co-conspirator William B. Entwistle is elected to fill DA Bassano's derelict shoes on the 6th of next month.

It's simple. If Entwistle wins, it is business as usual in Ellsworth, Maine, and that office will continue to legally persecute anything in jeans with a "no-drop" prosecutions policy.

This really shouldn't be a problem, because both Bassano and Entwistle are now under investigation by the Maine Bar of Overseers for prosecutorial misconduct. And it is largely for the same conduct that Mary Kellett has made her bread and butter for as long as she has been in that office.

Integrity4Maine has filed a complaint based on three separate prosecutions that all involve the expected modus operandi of an Ellsworth prosecutor: Withholding exculpatory evidence and failure to comply with discovery in order to get convictions. Entwistle even showed some creativity by stating he did not provide discovery because it was not requested.

In Maine, prosecutor's discovery is automatically mandated by law. This is the guy seeking election to run the whole show in Ellsworth. The guy who apparently doesn't know the law.

But as I said, this all shouldn't be a problem. Surely the local media, particularly the Bangor Daily News, would find it interesting that the supervisor of the first prosecutor in the history of Maine to have their license suspended, and the office insider who is running to take charge when that supervisor steps down, would be interested in this story. After all, it was Bangor Daily News that ran story after story on Vladek Filler and the bizarre saga of Mary Kellett.

Surely they are following up on this and advising citizens in that area that something appears, well, stinky in the whole lot of them occupying that office.

Think again. It is suddenly mumsville for the Bangor Daily News. I have received confirmation from several sources that journalist Bill Trotter, who covered much of the Filler-Kellett affair, and other reporters at BDN had been contacted various times to prompt the paper to do its job.

Crickets are chirping.

In fact, not one media source in the State of Maine that we can find has the least bit of interest in the fact that a prosecutor's office with one proven bad apple, quite possibly has a rotten bushel.

Maybe it is some sort of civic pride thing. Let the gangstas gang long as all the right people look the other way. Of course, that is speculation alone. Speculation is what we are all left with when journalists are part of the looking the other way problem. It is a problem they share with state legislators, judges, and other prosecutors.

There is one certainty, though. Bar investigations move a lot slower than the upcoming election. I expect Carletta Bassano and Slick Willie figure they got it made like rats in a cheese factory. I bet Bill Trotter would agree, whether he wanted to or not.

And they do have it made if the people of Ellsworth, Maine don't quit looking the other way.

*

Bar Complaint

Bar counsel response.

An open letter to Emma Watson

Rachel Edwards · 27 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Emma Watson,

I was not raised a celebrity. I can say that my life has been very different from yours. I am a woman living in America. I have not attended a fine university like Brown, as you did. I have known abuse, I have been molested. I have known hardship and depression. But there is something you should know. I don't need feminism.

Maybe you can't understand why this might be so. How someone like me, who has in the past been suicidal and faced such turmoil, could say that I do not need something that is supposed to help the whole world.

I want you to know that I am neither religious nor someone politically conservative, and I say this because many have accused me of this stance for merely disagreeing with feminism. Your idea of feminism is certainly beautiful, but it is not the reality of the women's movement today, nor was it the reality of the past.

That is what saddens me. When I was younger, I got it into my head that I needed to be strong and empowered and eventually I got there, but when I finally met other feminists I did not see a group of strong, self-reliant women in front of me. I saw women who wanted others to do the work for them.

They did not understand that empowerment is something that only you can bring to yourself. People can talk all day about women doing great things. People can give them thousands of dollars of grant money, but it all means nothing if these women won't do the work themselves. Therein lies the problem of feminist ideology. It preaches that we must empower women but never asks women to empower themselves or demands that they become capable and self-reliant.

I don't think that many in the West disagree that women are deserving of all the rights and privileges of men. The truth is far more sinister. I don't often hear, by any stretch of the imagination, that men say that women don't deserve these things. The majority of people I hear saying that women are oppressed are feminists.

I don't see it in the actions of men in the population, save for that percentage who engages in violent crime. There will always be mean-spirited people. There will always be some people who commit violent acts against their fellow humans—and that is not gendered. Feminism cannot fix these things.

You cannot fix the portion of humanity who does not care about others and whether people are harmed. They are not people who can be persuaded.

The reason that women detach themselves from the label of feminist has nothing to do with the idea of women's rights being radical. It isn't, it makes logical sense. The problem lies with the actions of feminists and their actions going beyond achieving the privileges men have. There are man-hating feminists, and the narrative that men can stop things like sexual assault is what starts it.

When you say that men can stop sexual assault on their own, you are imagining men as one big group who congregates and is able to stop the sociopathic individuals who prey on others. Sexual assault is not a mistake or a lapse in judgment. It is not something learned or taught to rapists by society. It is instead a rejection of society. It persists in spite of those who preach equal treatment.

This narrative erases victims of female predators who operate like male sexual predators and exist in greater numbers than you would expect. The problem is that because feminism preaches that men are the abusers who can stop rape, it erases men and women who are victimized by women. Even worse, these women do not face jail time equal to that of their male counterparts. That is not equal treatment and that is not justice.

Painting women as victims does not help them to be seen as the equals of men. It makes them appear weak, which is contrary to what feminism says it wants to accomplish. Because of that, you have female predators out of jail after only a few months, ready to prey on their next victim.

This is not the story that modern feminism wishes to tell. It is not the story that it wishes to acknowledge. It won't mention women in "oppressed" countries rising to the occasion in spite of everything. It won't mention that women in these "oppressed" countries enter STEM fields in greater number than those of the West or that many of them are strong in their own right. Feminism didn't make them so.

Instead, feminism preaches, "Look at those women, they are victims, we have to get men to save them." Is that not the worst thing you could do? Are you not continuing gender stereotypes by assuming that men need to empower women? Is it not harmful to tell a woman that she is not strong enough on her own, and that she needs all these other women to empower her?

Women won't identify as feminists because the women within feminism rely so much on the sisterhood that they do not pursue self-reliance. These women do not heal when they've been victimized because the sisterhood tells them that it's fine to live as a perpetual victim instead of a survivor.

These feminists do not live up to your lofty ideals. The feminists who govern these groups are often corrupt and profit directly from keeping women in a state of victimhood. They profit from the narrative that men are the aggressors and women are the victims.

If you are looking for gender equality in what they say and do, you will not find it. This is the problem. The majority of women feel alienated from modern feminism because it is not providing the equality that many of them so desperately crave and it ignores the women who use this ideology to further their own ends.

Instead, feminism is the cause for much of the disparity. Policies meant to help women fail in one major respect because they often assume women in general to have a kind of moral superiority. It does not assume that women can act immorally in ways that are equivalent to men. Laws like the Violence Against Women Act in the United States presume men to be the aggressor even when men are calling to report violence against them by their partners.

If you want to help women to be seen as equal to men, we must acknowledge that they are just as capable of vice as their male counterparts and must face equal consequences. If you want real equality, you must dismantle gender bias against men and benevolent sexism against women perpetuated by the legal system.

Women must be willing to take the higher-paying dangerous jobs men take. They must be willing to be held accountable, and we must be willing to hold them accountable in the way we hold men to be accountable.

We must acknowledge that the disparity mentioned most often by feminists can be accounted for by things like life choices and economic mobility. Poverty accounts for much of the problems of Third World countries. War brings poverty and violence to these countries, harming men and women in different but equally horrific ways. Yet women are the ones most likely to receive money and aid.

Child brides arise out of necessity first in impoverished countries. Families cannot afford to feed all of their children, who as a result are married off young to keep families afloat. In the minds of those parents, they are making certain that she is fed and clothed. You want to help women? Then acknowledge that the problem is a toxic mix of ignorance, tradition, and crippling poverty in (often) war-torn countries that drives these problems—not a lack of chivalry.

It is difficult for women to even dream of a future when their families can barely afford to feed them. How can women get ahead when their clothes are rotting off their bodies and their brothers are being drawn into war because it's their only hope of making some kind of change.

Feminism cannot put food on their tables or stop those wars because it is attempting to treat the symptoms of these problems and not the disease. You want to help people? Then wake up! We don't need chivalry! We need honesty! Life is hell for the impoverished: it cultivates victims and criminal behavior.

Those people are in pain, and the discussion as to how to help them begins when we have honest discussions about how men and women both suffer in equal degrees, but the source is this toxic mix of human problems that we've yet to solve. Some of which we may never solve. Treating the symptoms is failing.

We must approach the source and come to creative solutions because as it stands people are dividing themselves over the belief that everyone can be an oppressor or that people are being oppressed in the First World. The wage gap has long since been debunked. Single, childless women often out-earn men because they make different choices now. They can wait longer to have children due to technological advances, so they make career-orientated decisions that allow them to get ahead.

The greatest determination of poverty for a woman is how many children she has and when she has them. Women often make work decisions based upon wanting to spend time with her children. So she's more likely to take time off to tend to her sick children and to leave work early to pick them up from school or to get them to activities like soccer practice.

This all adds up to be the major contributor to the disparity in the wage gap—not gender discrimination. When you compare many of the well-paying jobs men take with something like being a kindergarten teacher, there is an obvious difference in pay. The studies speaking of a massive pay gap rely on lifetime studies that don't account for differences in job, whether these women have children, or choose careers that pay less but make them happy.

The key to aiding this problem may well be in making birth control available to men and women and allowing them to choose when to be parents. This will also reduce the population in many problem areas and make it possible for people to do better with the same amount of resources. But it will be difficult, and many religious groups simply will not allow it.

But you will likely find that the key to aiding poverty-stricken people is in advancing science and technology overall, and in safe, effective, affordable, and readily available birth control methods for men and women. The recognition of science and its continued progression is the only thing that can move us in that direction.

So I ask that instead of funding campaigns to promote chivalrous behavior in men that you fund the people who will make that line of reasoning obsolete. I ask that you fund science and technology.

Thank you for your time and I hope that you will consider what I have written.

Sincerely,
Rachel Marie Edwards

Feature image by Marco Bond

How to tame men

Peter Wright · 27 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Horses, dogs and men have one thing in common; they need training in order to shed their wild ways and become civilized. They need to be taught when to walk, run, sit, shit, play, work and, of course, when to cease fighting and attempting rape.

Women will do this for them.

From the pony club to the dog obedience class, and all the way through to wedding and relationship-advice magazines teaching "How to get him to do xyz," – women dominate the field of animal training.

Starting in childhood, girls are educated in the Pavlovian school of human interactions, learning sexual manipulation, shaming and relational aggression as powerful techniques that if properly applied will help transform men, and even the baddest of badboys, into proverbial Good Men.™ Is it any wonder then that when a woman sees a badboy she sees a creature with 'train me' written across his forehead, a task for which her whole life has been but a preparation….. a lady won't tolerate a feral animal wandering through the gynosphere, especially a handsome one, when she has the wherewithal to civilize him.

Lets take a little excursion through the history of taming.

Ancient Greece

Marriage is a particularly useful method by which men are tamed, so it's no surprise that the institution has been around for thousands of years. Hera, the Ancient Greek goddess of marriage was nicknamed 'The Tamer.' She tamed horses, men and heroes and in some places was recognized as the tamer of the seasons, of nature, or of the universe itself.

Hera's goal was to limit wildness and freedom by placing all creatures in service of civilized society. Her main tools-for-taming were the entrapment of men and women in marriage, the use of her own sexuality as an enticement for conformity, shaming, and aggressive punishment of any rebellious behaviours – even for her lordly husband Zeus: "Hera's cruel rage tamed him."[1]

Hera was worshipped as 'Goddess of the yoke,' an enslaving device symbolizing her desire to make utilities out of beasts and men. She yoked obedient men to wives, and yoked heroes to an inevitable death through their performance of labours that bring betterment to women and society.

In the Illiad Hera is said to tame heroes through death, not marriage. Death through service to others was considered -and is still considered- something appropriate for males and for their own good. In The Myth of Male Power Warren Farrell recounts a Greek story which illustrates the problem:

> The Hero As Slave:
>
>
>
> Once upon a time, a mother who wanted to see the beautiful statue of Hera had no oxes or horses to carry her there. But she did have two sons. And the sons wanted more than anything to make their mother's wish come true. They volunteered to yoke themselves to a cart and take her over the mountains in the scorching heat to > the faraway village of Argos, the home of the statue of Hera (the wife of Zeus). Upon their arrival in Argos, the sons were cheered and statues (that can be found to this day) were built in their honor. Their mother prayed that Hera give her sons the best gift in her power. Hera did that. The boys died. The traditional interpretation? The best thing that can happen to a man is to die at the height of his glory and power. Yet had this been a myth of two daughters who had substituted themselves for oxen to carry their father somewhere, would we have interpreted the daughters' deaths as proof that the best thing that can happen to a woman is to die at the height of her glory and power? The statues and cheers can be seen as bribes for the sons to value their lives less than their mother's request to view a statue. The fact that the statue was of Hera, the queen of the Olympian gods and protector of married women is symbolic. The sons' sacrifice symbolized the mandate for men to become strong enough to serve the needs of mothers and marriage, and to be willing to call it glory if they died in the process. Which is why the name Hercules means "for the glory of Hera".[2]

Yes these are myths, but on this topic life had a way of imitating art. Those who wrote the stories were drawing on experience to some extent, and married couples re-enacted the selfsame rituals of Hera and Zeus. In the marriage month (Gamelion) the mythical marriage of Hera and Zeus was reenacted and celebrated with public festivities, a time when many couples would get married in imitation of the divine couple. On these occasions prayers and offerings were given to Hera, and the bride would pledge fidelity to extending Hera's dominion on earth.

Women of Ancient Greece were considered, along with men, to be uncivilized and in need of taming for the greater good of society. Both sexes required a reconstruction in character and a submission to social responsibilities. Such was also the case in the Near East where an emerging Christian culture claimed that men and women were made of flawed stuff; women were born in original sin with Eve, sinful to the core, and were encouraged to aspire to the status of the holy and pure Virgin Mary. Likewise men were born in original sin and invited to improve their condition with an de imitatione Christi, an imitation of Christ in order to bleach the stains from their imperfect souls.

While men and women in ancient times possessed equality in the depravity stakes, this was all to change in the Middle ages.

Middle Ages

Fast forward to medieval times and we see a continuation of the desire to civilize human behaviour, except this time women are exempt from the taming to which the classical age subjected both sexes. By dint of a peculiar intersection of social beliefs, women came to be viewed as perfected from birth – due largely to the fact that veneration of the Virgin Mary became amplified in the eleventh century and, by extension, the reverence bestowed upon the Virgin was extended to the female sex in general. As Mary was perfect, so too became women.

No longer like the Biblical Eve striving to imitate the Mother of Christ, woman becomes Mary's counterpart on earth, and thus the cult of the "lady" is born as a mirror of the cult of the Virgin. Men for their part remain in a thoroughly fallen state like Adam while striving to imitate Jesus – knowing full well they will fall short of the goal. To enjoy the company of a lady a man must now prove himself worthy of her and so advance upward, step by step, toward a culminating union at her level; because everything noble and virtuous, everything that makes life worth living, proceeds from women, who are even described as the source of goodness itself.[3]

Mediaeval image of a woman leading a man with a leash.

With the advent of women becoming men's moral superiors, it's here that men become the servants of women proper. It's here also that the reciprocal service previously entertained between the sexes begins its gradual decline in favour of gynocentrism. As the faithful owed obeisance to The Virgin, henceforth man must render his obeisance to the Virgin's earthly counterparts. Over the subsequent 100 years women even came to be viewed through the lens of the feudal contract whereby she became his overlord (midons), and he the vassal in dutiful service. It would be woman whose role it became to civilize the depraved, fallen creature called man by teaching him the gynocentric virtues of chivalry and courtly love.

Contemporary attitudes

Contemporary perspectives about civilizing males are divided between two superficially opposed camps – traditionalist women, and progressive feminists. I say superficially opposed because when the goals of both groups are compared they amount to exactly the same thing: the belief that morally superior women should enculture men into the arts of chivalry and gentlemanliness for the benefit of women.

Lifelong feminist and former National Organization for Women member, Tammy Bruce, has articulated what she feels is the time-honoured power of women; of being morally superior to men which includes the feminist responsibility to civilizing men's animalistic tendencies:

Nothing new under the sun, hey?

Another feminist, Christina Hoff-Sommers agrees with this idea that men need to be civilized with chivalric manners, a belief she outlined in an interview with Emily Esfahani Smith, where she said, "Masculinity with morality and civility is a very powerful force for good. But masculinity without these virtues is dangerous—even lethal." "Chivalry is grounded in a fundamental reality that defines the relationship between the sexes," explained Sommers, "and given that most men are physically stronger than most women, men can overpower women at any time to get what they want." "If women give up on chivalry, it will be gone," continued Sommers. "If boys can get away with being boorish, they will, happily. Women will pay the price."[4]

Sommers elaborates her view in a 2009 interview with Ben Domenech:

> Christina Hoff-Sommers: Codes of gallantry and civility that developed over the centuries have served women very well. We badly need more of that male gallantry, but I hasten to say it's a reciprocal system. If males are going to be gallant then women also have a role to play. So today I think both sexes are remiss in nurturing this system.
>
> Ben Domenech: What in this era of post feminism that we live in today relationally would be the possible > incentive for any man to be gallant when there doesn't seem to be any > particular reason that he has to be in order to function within today's relationship world?

>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: It's an interesting question because one of the things you find today is that most young men are gallant, and they are respectful, at least they are struggling to be. When I interview young men I ask them if they think it's a good thing to be a gentleman and almost all of them say yes- that word gentleman has a positive resonance with young men. Now, do they know how to be gentlemen, do they know what it entails? Many do not. And same with some young women, they are not necessarily behaving like ladies. So there's a lot of misunderstanding and lack of, perhaps, motivation. But it's still alive in people. I think still on a typical date a young man would pay for his date – it doesn't always happen in which case a girl would be resentful, and I can understand that…. These are gestures, I'm talking about certain gestures of respect – they need to be there and I think most women want them and I think men do too.
>
> Ben Domenech: So why is that important – and I don't just mean that in the sense of continuing a relationship but in the larger sense of the term, and this is a frame that I have to ask you about: if the incentive there is a relationship that is going to lead to something, does it matter that the something is beyond the typical aspirations of today's men and women which seems to be more along the lines of a sex based relationship as opposed to one that actually has a longer term value beyond that prognosis.
>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: I think human beings at some point in their lives want something beyond a sex based relation. If you are going to build a relationship with someone it has been the case that women are going to be more likely to want to stay home and take care of the children, or certainly be more focused on that than the men, and I don't see that changing.
>
> Ben Domenech: As a single dating male in today's environment there's a much lower bar that they have to clear, frankly, in order to bounce around the relationship scene with a good deal of happiness, at least in the temporary sense.
>
> Christina Hoff-Sommers: Oh I have to agree, and I think in a way women sort of undid the social contract with men and released them from all the constraints. And we pay the price.[5]

For the sake of argument, and in order to demonstrate that progressive gynocentrism and traditionalist gynocentrism are both chasing male-only chivalry, here is a recent 'tradition-advocating' article by antifeminist Patrice Lewis that appears strikingly similar to the progressive model offered above by Bruce and Hoff-Sommers:

> I admire men.
>
> Specifically, I admire men who are controlled, confident and who fulfill their biological destiny as protectors and providers. Men are essential for training boys to tame the testosterone and channel their natural strengths and aggressiveness in appropriate ways. Trained men are, in the words of columnist Dennis Prager, the glory of civilization. (It goes without saying that untrained men are its scourge, but that's another column.)

Men – trained, manly men – are necessary for a balanced society. They take on the tough ugly hard jobs women can't or won't do. They mine our coal and fight our fires and protect our shores and fix our engines and rescue our butts when we're in danger. They truck our goods and clean our pipes and wire our homes. They plow fields and grow food. They butcher livestock so we can buy meat in tidy sanitized packages in the grocery store and pretend it never came from a cow.

I'm not saying women can't be found in those fields; but let's be honest: The vast majority of workers in hard, dangerous, dirty and heavy fields are men. They deserve our praise and gratitude.

Which is why I get so ticked off when feminists belittle men. These kinds of women don't admire manly men who protect and provide. Feminists don't want warriors; they want servants who will kowtow to their emotions and feeeeeeelings. They prefer emasculated androgynous guys who wouldn't know one end of a rifle from the other. Guys who watch chick flicks with them. Guys who know what temperature to wash the dainties. Guys who are preoccupied with "social justice" and bringing their carbon footprint down to zero.[6]

Lewis's argument above that boys are juicing with testosterone and need "taming" reveals an unbroken, and mythical conception of men stemming from ancient times – and it is wrong. Men are not born as wild animals in a testosterone-fuelled psychosis waiting to tear people limb from limb. We need not buy our sons punching bags nor insert them into football training from 2 years of age to channel some androgen-fuelled chaos (doing it for fun, though, is another reason). The claim that men are unclean, bestial creatures in need of taming is not only false – it is extreme misandry and it needs to be challenged head on with each bigot who perpetuates it.

The above survey of man-taming by women spanning all the way from Ancient Greece, and through progressive feminism to regressive traditionalism, shows what we are up against. Nothing whatsoever has changed; chivalric servitude of men, trained into them by women (yes and by men), remains the order of the day. The one timeless voice echoing through all this is the monomyth of the animal-trainer – womankind and her pussy whip.

With the continuing encouragement of women to be slavemasters, and their enthusiasm to take on the role, is it any surprise that the majority of horse and dog training schools – obedience classes – are peopled by women? That so many little girls desire to possess their own pony is a no-brainer, and it's time we woke up to what this expensive little pastime symbolizes – the racing of horses may be the sport of Kings, but training of ponies is for the delight of princesses.

In a modern 'enlightened' society it's high time to ditch the idea that males, and only males, need taming. Lets instead rely on men's natural human empathy, a thing that exists in both sexes before the training begins. If you see a baby boy begin crying after he hears another baby crying nearby, it's a demonstration of empathy that is there from the start.[7] Like girls, boys develop mirror neurons which predispose them to be caring as they develop – we don't need to see them as heartless beasts in need of taming, curtailing or genitally maiming. So let's cease with the gynocentric boot-camp for males; they are already trained from the start by their own good natures – yes, men are good.

Sources:

[1] Joan O'Brien, 'The Tamer of Heroes and Horses,' Chapter 6E in The Transformation of Hera, Rowman and Littlefield, (1993)
[2] Warren Farrell, The Myth of Male Power, Simon and Schuster, (1993)
[3] Irving Singer, Love: Courtly and Romatic, UCP, 1984
[4] Emily Esfahani Smith, 'Let's Give Chivalry Another Chance' The Atlantic, Dec 10 2012
[5] Interview with Christina Hoff-Sommers, "The Acculturated Podcast: Ladies and Gentlemen" 2009
[6] Patrice Lewis, 'Feminism Has Slain Our Protectors,' WND, 09/12/2014
[7] Daniel Goleman, Researchers Trace Empathy's Roots to Infancy, New York Times, 1989

Amazon book titles for women

She loves HeForShe, but what about he?

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 28 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When Sheryl Sandberg spearheaded #BanBossy and wrote Lean In, I wondered how a woman worth over $1 billion could realistically identify with a woman making $15,000 or less a year. I don't automatically emulate Elon Musk, Donald Trump, Warren Buffet, or Steve Jobs as men precisely because their advice may not be applicable to my circumstances. That, and I do not trust disturbingly rich people to be pragmatic about social issues.

I also found myself questioning the qualifications of the multi-millionare Emma Watson, who stood up on behalf of UN Women to deliver a speech for HeForShe, a campaign requesting commitment from men for the sake of women.

HeForShe exploded in traffic because many famous brands crawled into one big sweaty bed. JP Morgan is a sponsor, so money isn't an issue.

We need a Jeff Foxworthy–inspired list of sarcastic "You know you're oppressed if …" jokes, like "You know you're oppressed when big banks give money to global organizations dedicated specifically to you."

The speech went exactly as I expected: Watson prevaricates on feminism's brand development crisis, then says through a choked voice that gender equality is important, which of course means more men need to participate in helping only women.

I'm sure the suicidal and homeless men I met in my life would be thrilled to know of yet another opportunity to put their problems second. This seems reminiscent of when working-class men did not have the vote, and when women passed white feathers to blokes content with their blood being inside their bodies where it belongs. But you'll have to excuse my arrogant citation of historical oppression of men because a woman's choices are apparently more important.

Watson's persistently sad voice remained largely monotonous. She never sounded like she was getting closer or farther away from crying, at least not in a realistic way. At this point I started to wonder why people picked Emma Watson—an actress—out of any actually suffering woman on the planet. Am I supposed to believe the United Nations could not fly in a starving woman, feed her, and provide a translator to help her express her thoughts on her situation? With JP Morgan as a sponsor?!

At that point I started to question the commitment of HeForShe, and wonder why I, a man, am being invited to "commit" with no detectable compensation under the command of people who don't even understand how diversity works. Pundits are saying only what they are being paid to say.

It must be a surreal experience having so much money and lying to so many people to get them to change the world for free. Did anyone bother to draft a feasibility report while everyone was patting themselves on the back?

HeForShe has the following two paragraphs on the same page. This is the first:

> Now it's time to unify our efforts. HeForShe is a solidarity movement for gender equality that brings together one half of humanity in support of the other of humanity, for the entirety of humanity.

And here's the second, right above a button that says, "I agree":

> Gender equality is not only a women's issue, it is a human rights issue that requires my participation. I commit to take action against all forms of violence and discrimination faced by women and girls.

Gynocentric execution aside, I wondered what would happen if I clicked the button. I imagined UN volunteer soldiers would rappel from a helicopter and kick in my window to slap one of those stupid blue helmets on my scalp. I figure the UN would do anything to look serious after being useless during the Srebrenica Massacre. Why would a man sign up with an organization with a history of standing by and looking stupid while innocent men are bombed and shot?

Clicking the "I agree" button pulled me down to a form where I can enter my name, country, and email. I generated a junk address with FakeMailGenerator and put nonsense into the form.

[image]

Let's see what is expected of this commitment I have no intention of respecting.

My apologies go out to any Emma Watson of Nicaragua for UN Women's heartless assumption that everyone who would fill out that form would be a man. HeForShe is male-dominated and in need of equal representation of women because women need to work on their own problems too. Right? Right?

[image]

The web developer in me is irked by the obvious lack of an "if" statement to strip the last sentence when the counter breached 100,000. But I suppose I can't be too surprised by the staff's inability to compare numbers given how this crowd treats statistics.

I watched the FakeMailGenerator page, waiting for my marching orders. None came. I waited for a bit and saw that 28 other Nicaraguan men needed my help saving the planet.

[image]

I clicked "Join Them" and the page scrolled me back to the "I agree" button. Still no mail came to my junk address.

I refreshed the page, left the commitment checkbox unchecked, and tried signing up again as a stereotype.

[image]
Hitler Satan loves women so much that he won't solve their problems for them.

[image]
Well, shit.
It seems that commitment is necessary after all. Hear that, ladies? HeForShe thinks you need a man to solve your problems.

I put my details in to see if the FakeMailGenerator was just bugging out on me. I want to know what HeForShe's emails say at this point.

[image]
I'm not ready to be tied down yet, babe.
Silence. My only option appears to be sharing HeForShe.

Either this is a petition with ulterior motives or another "'Like' to cure little Billy's Leukemia" social media campaign that doesn't actually do anything but advertise inexperienced bleeding hearts with a profit motive. Or both; I honestly don't know.

In any case, this is about the level of commitment I expected from the United Nations and its affiliates.

Have fun, suffering men and women of the world. Feminists are using you for money and glamour.

Again.

JBTV: Legal rights that women have and men don't

Janet Bloomfield (aka JudgyBitch) · 29 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The following video is by Janet Bloomfield from her new Youtube channel JudgyBitch TV. Make sure and subscribe!

http://youtu.be/uQ9UEr87DWo

Feature image from Vice.com

A Voice for Men Fall Fundraiser

Paul Elam · 29 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

When you ask people to part with their hard earned money in order to support a cause (with the exception of matters woman centric), you need to have two critical elements going. One, you need to have a cause that constitutes an actual need that impacts more than just a handful of people.

And two, especially when you have been asking for that support over a long period of time, you need to show people that you have done something with that money; more than just use it to raise more money.

History shows that AVFM passes muster in all those regards. First, there is no doubting the actual need for a men's movement, and one that is decidedly anti-feminist. Though still in a fledgling state, AVFM has overshadowed and outpaced any other efforts in history in terms of injecting men's issues into the social consciousness and educating the public in the undeniable truth that anti-feminism is not anti-woman.

We have forced feminists into frantic attempts to defend their lies and have begun to change the public discourse on sexual politics for the first time in 50 years.

We have also succeeded in establishing the upstart of a subculture where men and women are measured on merit alone; where ideas and thoughtfulness rule, not genitalia.

We have established a community where gay men also find their worth and value alongside other men, as men, without having to sell themselves out to the exploitive victim politics of feminist ideologues who view them and all other men in strictly utilitarian terms.

We have forced certain agents of the state to face the music for their malfeasance. We have forced corrupt judges to recuse themselves and helped a loving father regain custody of his children from an abusive mother. And we have cleared the name of a man arrested repeatedly on false allegations, and pushed until his accuser was placed in handcuffs.

We have successfully hosted an international conference on men's issues that was the very first of its kind in history and will be doing so again next year.

We have sponsored the formation of the very first men's issues group on an American university campus that has the tenacity and the unrelenting resolve to have Paul Elam come to their campus to speak about "The Fraud of Rape Culture."

We know many of these are small steps on a long road. Even collectively, they are not enough to change the world. But steps forward they are. That too is something new and we want to take many of them in the years ahead.

Doing this is literally impossible without your help. So here we are again, with the quarterly fundraiser that is the lifeblood of AVFM, which has allowed us to do what we have done so far. And we are again asking you to help us bring more change to a world that desperately needs it.

Fundraising Thermometer by:
www.easy-fundraising-ideas.com

One final way you can support AVFM in this fundraiser. We have over 100 First International Conference on Men's Issues official T-shirts in sizes from small to 4X still available. They are already paid for, so all shirts we sell go to our till. Click on the image below and get them directly from Ebay. International shipping is available.

[image]
Click to order
Fundraiser will conclude on Monday, October 6, 2014

Adrian Peterson proves Black America is violent— and Baby Mamas are to blame

Mumia Ali · 29 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"In such condition there is no place for industry, because the fruit thereof is uncertain, and consequently, not culture of the earth, no navigation, nor the use of commodities that may be imported by sea, no commodious building, no instruments of moving and removing such things as require much force, no knowledge of the face of the earth, no account of time, no arts, no letters, no society, and which is worst of all, continual fear and danger of violent death, and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short."
—Thomas Hobbes, Leviathan

The proverbial ink was barely dry on my column discussing the travails of Ray Rice when another NFL star, this time Adrian Peterson, was taken out to the metaphorical woodshed for his literally doing the same to his four-year old son; as a result, he was temporarily benched by the Minnesota Vikings franchise (which has since been lifted/UPDATE: it appears that I might have spoken a bit too soon). Of course, the Cathedral will attempt to spin this as yet another example of the NFL's (Black) male personnel running amok, gratuitously violent, out of control, and in need of being put in a veritable Phantom Zone for somatic reconditioning. No doubt, Peterson's and Rice's actions are troubling; but they only foreshadow a much, much deeper set of problems that beset the Black community in the United States, and that threatens the rest of the country as a whole, if not brought up to the light of day for honest examination, forthright discussion, and an earnest desire to heal these wounds for the Good of All, and not just the Selected Few.

In last week's column discussing former NFL running back Ray Rice, I made the case that it would be a mistake to assume that the violent episode that formed the basis of his career being prematurely ended was simply a matter of (Black) Men Behaving Badly; I strongly argued that what we saw in the Rice episode was just the tip of the iceberg in the state of things in Black America. Indeed, even Feminista Jones has said as much in a recent article she has written for TIME magazine online—Black men are far from the only actors when it comes to domestic violence, nor are their actions in any way unique; indeed, it starts much, much earlier in the lives of Black children of both sexes.

And the leading perps are Black Baby Mamas.

As a recent post appearing on the popular blog Very Smart Brothas clearly illustrates, the Black community has long had a tradition of routinely visiting violence on its kids, often with the Biblical justification of "sparing the rod and spoiling the child." The column, written by one half of the VSB duo Panama Jackson, even has this theological line as the title—and just take a look at the comments—the ones most in favor of "popping" their kids are Black women themselves. (Note how the ones most in opposition to the same are those written by VSB's Black male readers.) This anecdotal evidence alone is enough to suggest that what I've said last week about the Black woman's capacity for violence and aggression would be more than enough; but, since I promised last week that I would return with more smoking gun evidence of my charge that Black women writ large can be and often are every bit as violent and aggressive as their menfolk, today I am going to offer that evidence.

Exhibit A: The Cleveland Bus Driver

http://m.youtube.com/watch?v=X-2JtbZqmW0&has_verified=1&client=mv-google&layout=tablet

Exhibit B: A Day at the Beach With an Abusive Baby Mama

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Vtrr6lHOMzc?version=3&rel=1&fs=1&showsearch=0&showinfo=1&iv_load_policy=1&wmode=transparent]

Exhibit C: Shootout on SEPTA

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LiH2dUFv43Y?version=3&rel=1&fs=1&showsearch=0&showinfo=1&iv_load_policy=1&wmode=transparent]

Exhibit D: Let's You and My Baby Daddy Daughter Fight

http://m.youtube.com/watch?v=pylicDuWPI4

Exhibit E: Get On the Baby Brawlin' Bus

[youtube https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-XOY-S4j1PM?version=3&rel=1&fs=1&showsearch=0&showinfo=1&iv_load_policy=1&wmode=transparent]

(Video footage and excellent commentary courtesy of Mr. Tommy Sotomayor; also, check out this post by yours truly for many, many more links posted back to Sotomayor videos documenting ad nauseum the aggression and violence that is sadly all too common in today's Black women writ large.)

To be sure, Not All Black Women Are Like That—but even those who aren't would be hard-put to deny that Enough Black Women ARE, Indeed, "Like That"—and they are more numerous than we'd like to publicly admit, especially within earshot of White folks. But, the damage—metaphorically and otherwise—has been done a long time ago, and we are only now really beginning to see the results of these seeds being planted. The simple truth of the matter is that Black America is dysfunctionally violent in a way that makes other communities look askance with equal parts fascination and revulsion—and unless or until Black America is willing and able to call it out for what it is and where it comes from, only then can there be any hope whatsoever of addressing it.

Violence—Like Charity—Begins at Home

Of course, like so many things, behaviors are shaped during the formative years of our lives; for so many Black Americans, the relationship to and with violence is ingrained at very early ages. It is well known and documented that African Americans are much more likely to adhere to the aforementioned Biblical injunction of child-beating, held constant regardless of class or SES status; and it is not at all unusual to hear Negroes talking, often reverently, how they got "beat to within an inch of their lives" and credit it with their "turning out to be alright" citizens and the like. What is often left out of the discussion however, is WHO, more often than not, is actually doing the "beating to within an inch" of so many Black Americans' lives while still minors, even four-year old toddlers (or younger!):

Black Women Baby Mamas.

By now, it shouldn't even have to be a matter of debate or even discussion—out-of-wedlock rates in Black America are well known and empirically verified. Moreover, additional research by credible scholars have noted that one of the "unintended" consequences of the feminist agenda has been both the wholesale weakening of the institution of fatherhood (read: patriarchy) on the one hand, while on the other strengthening motherhood to the point of tyranny, being as how it is propped up by the state, the Cathedral, and social/cultural norms (recall Fantasia's ode to Baby Mamas—literally—as just one of a plethora of examples). Said scholars have documented, albeit they were a bit reluctant to be so candid, the ways in which de facto matriarchies in Black America's most vulnerable sections have created a miasma of violence, aggression, and downright mean-spiritedness in so many of its citizens—the same citizens who create warped and perverted subcultures such as "Stop Snitchin'" and so forth. As Stefan Molyneux has pointed out, studies have been done where White, solidly middle-class, and at least moderately educated women have been shown to beat or otherwise abuse (i.e., verbally, psychologically, et al) their children as young as infants, sometimes to the tune of dozens of times a day—-what do you honestly think happens in the 'hoods and inner-city cores of Black America? Well, if the prison population is anything to go by—where, again, it is well documented that its inmates hail from Baby Mama–headed households—gang-bangers, rapists, home-invaders, malcontents, anti-socials, you name it—came from environments and homes where Baby Mamas are the sole authority in and out of the home. They determine how the baby/child/teenager is to be raised, with the father, at best, playing the role of a “useful complement”*. She determines where the child will live, how it will be educated, what if any, ethics it will be taught, etc, et a.l—and we can see (and, in truth, have always seen) the results for themselves: Black America is, in a very real sense, a failed matriarchal state, a social experiment in the grand ideals of feminism that has crumbled under its own weight—much like the Communist Soviet Union and the Marxist ideology it was founded on and that inspired feminism’s biggest names and best-known theorists, Black and White alike. That so many Black men, in the form of Ray Rice and Adrian Peterson, now “act out” says a heck of a lot more about Baby Mamaism in Black America than it ever will about the men themselves.

But What About the (Black) Dads?

Well, what about them? As alluded to above, for the most part they have been all but excluded from the lives of their progeny, and this is especially the case on the lower socioeconomic rungs of the American pecking order. Poor and working-class Black men have it the hardest when attempting to play a meaningful role in the lives of their own “seeds,” and more often than not they are literally at the mercy of their Baby Mama, who can and often does decide, sometimes on a whim, to literally cut him out of his kids’ lives—with the full backing and support of the state, from the family courts to the Po-Po and everything in between. As the same scholars noted earlier in this essay document in a separate study, poor and working-class Black Men desperately want to father, to be involved in the lives they helped to create, and are often shunned and rejected for not being “man enough”, i.e., having money and resources and other traditional and oftentimes limiting and even harmful forms of “masculinity” that their Baby Mamas not only desire but demand. Contrary to the notion of “hit and run” dudes that sire dozens of kids by as many women, many of these Black dads struggle in a big way against the very real social, legal, and even political forces that conspire to keep them from being involved—and often lose. This, too, is yet another side of the story that almost never gets to be told or heard, and it is time that it has its Day in the Sun—for every charge that can credibly be made of a “deadbeat dad” there can be a credible claim of what Fathers 4 Justice, a UK-based advocacy group, refers to as “Crummy Mummies”—and Lord knows that the number of them in Black America are legion—measured in hurtful and even hateful welts, bullet wounds, and carcasses of Black bodies (many of them male), and quite a few at the behest—and sometimes direct involvement—of Baby Mamas themselves.

For those reading this who are likely rolling their eyes and coming to a conclusion (if you haven’t already) that I am seeking to absolve Black men, like Rice and Peterson, of any and all personal responsibility for their actions, let me disabuse you of such woefully wrongheaded thinking—not only do I think they can and should face whatever music the NFL and law enforcement agencies deem appropriate, I also defy any of my detractors to cite for me the chapter-and-verse quotations of me defending the following Black men:

Tiger Woods

Michael Vick

Chris Brown

C-Murder

Suge Knight

And that’s just for starters. My position has always been “do the crime, get pinched, do the time—NO EXCEPTIONS.” You see, my views in these and related matters always have been, and always will be, consistent—and I will not allow anyone to attempt to pigeonhole me or the issues I wish to examine into some ideological cul-de-sac, because of “Who-Whom?”ism.

Is that clear?

Baby Mamaism: Mean, Brutish, and Short

It is time to acknowledge publicly what we all know to be true and only whisper to others when we are sure of our company: that Baby Mamaism, my rhetorical shorthand for what can only rightly be described as a de facto matriarchy writ large in Black America over roughly the past half decade in particular, has proven itself not only to be a massive failure—despite all the propping up of the culture and the state, and despite the never-ending efforts on the part of their apparatchiks to the contrary—but also the chief driver of the very cultural norms that form the background on that which we are currently examining. That both Rice and Peterson hail from homes and "communities" where backward, retrograde norms of "masculinity" are lauded and valued, promulgated by their very own mothers, is by no means unusual or unknown to the rest of us—we've all known of the very long history of professional sport leagues like the NFL and NBA, to be populated with the sons of Baby Mamas. Indeed, some of its most problematic figures have been such men—a number of them have served prison time themselves. In fact, not to put too fine a point on it, but one of the reasons why such figures as Michael Jordan, Kobe Bryant, Tiger Woods, and Robert Griffin III were so lauded was because of their rather unusual familial histories when compared with their peers, all of whom hailed from intact families where the father played an active, if not pivotal, role in their lives—and it should also be noted that none of them have been known for engaging in acts of violence either. Coincidence?

The large swaths of Black America where Baby Mamaism reigns supreme are places where anarchy, crime, and violence are easily seen in evidence. Contrary to romantic notions on the part of the professional left, Black America's current state shows the world what happens when the role of the father has been demeaned, disempowered, and just plain ole dissed (a.k.a. "a useful complement"*)—life becomes much more dis-ordered, uncertain, unsafe, and downright dangerous. And contrary to the hype and propaganda of the feminist lobby and their allies in the Cathedral, boys who hail from strong father-led homes are the least likely to engage in all acts of violence, where kids are least likely to be beaten to within an inch of their lives, and where, yes, women themselves are the safest. No one who has any say in the matter wants to reside where Baby Mamas are the norm—where trash is strewn everywhere, where random violence and a "code of the streets" ethos is the "order" of the day, where Black women themselves are unsure of their own safety. Baby Mamaism has proven itself utterly incapable of raising boys into men, of ensuring safety and prosperity to women and children, of forging the basis of stable and productive communities—the ONLY things Baby Mamaism has been able to consistently produce is a never-ending onslaught of deeply dysfunctional people, men and women both, whom the rest of society has to protect itself from.

So, yes, the NFL does indeed have a problem these days—but it goes much, much deeper than we are all led to believe. The cult(ure) of Baby Mamaism is what plagues the National Football League—and, if we're not careful, the rest of us.

"Among the middle class, the couple relationship is at the heart of family life, with the children as desirable complements. Middle-class couples place great value on enjoying each other first before having children, perhaps because they anticipate what statistics show, that marital satisfaction declines precipitously after a couple has children. But among poor women, the mother-child relationship is central, with the father as a useful complement."* (Promises I Can Keep: Why Poor Women Put Motherhood Before Marriage, Kathryn Edin & Maria Kefelas, p. 209)

The unspoken truth of domestic violence: Woman as aggressor

Dr. Edward Rhymes · 29 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I approach this writing with some trepidation because it will run counter in some areas to the current debate regarding domestic violence. When wading in these highly volatile and controversial waters, one finds that disclaimers—like life jackets—must be affixed to the body of the argument.

Violence against women

Girls younger than 15 are five times more likely to die in childbirth than women in their 20s. And pregnancy is consistently among the leading causes of death for girls aged 15 to 19 worldwide.

Incidents of domestic violence against women occur every 15 seconds in the U.S.

Add to those glaring examples of epidemic-like violence against women figures the college/university campus date rape statistics, the reported high rates of sexual assault in South Africa, the mass kidnappings of girls in Nigeria, and the list could go on and on. These are not trivial things. Yet, although violence against women and girls includes domestic violence, not all domestic violence features women and girls as the victims. Sometimes, the woman is the abuser.

Let me be clear, the hesitance in speaking about female-initiated domestic violence is rooted in a very real concern about what the discussion can give way to: a dismissal and abnegation of the actual dangers women face. That, however, fails to be a compelling reason not to discuss the role of women in domestic violence. For example, an honest discussion about Israel's occupation of Palestine need not devolve into anti-Semitism. Neither does a hard look at real terrorism, perpetrated by entities such as the Islamic state, have to degenerate into Islamophobia. So, conversely, a sincere critique regarding the totality of domestic violence does not have to be reduced to a capitulation to misogyny and sexist insensitivity.

Female-initiated domestic abuse

Women are three times more likely to be killed or seriously injured by their male counterpart than vice versa. Though those numbers suggest a more dire need, they do not connote that women are completely innocent when it comes to domestic violence.

More than 830,000 men fall victim to domestic violence every year. A man is the victim of domestic abuse every 37.8 seconds in America. These numbers are not inconsequential and the frequency is far from insignificant.

Jan Brown, executive director and founder of the Domestic Abuse Helpline for Men, stated that "domestic violence is not about size, gender, or strength. It's about abuse, control, and power, and getting out of dangerous situations and getting help, whether you are a woman being abused, or a man."

In 2001, the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health collected data about the health of a nationally representative sample of 14,322 individuals between the ages of 18 and 28. The study also asked subjects to answer questions about romantic or sexual relationships in which they had engaged during the previous five years and whether those relationships had involved violence.

From this information researchers found that of the 18,761 relationships, 76% were non-violent and 24% were violent. Of the 24% that were violent, half had been reciprocal and half had not—reciprocal meaning there was violence inflicted by both partners. Although more men than women (53% versus 49%) had experienced non-reciprocal violent relationships, more women than men (52% versus 47%) had taken part in ones involving reciprocal violence.

This statistic was undoubtedly the most striking: in committing acts of domestic violence, more women than men (25% versus 11%) were responsible. In fact, in the 71% of non-reciprocal partner violence instances, the instigator was the woman. This flies in the face of the long-held belief that female aggression in a relationship is most often predicated on self-defense.

Further, while injury was more likely when violence was perpetrated by men, in relationships that featured reciprocal violence, men were injured more often (25% of the time) than women (20% of the time).

Great Britain's Office of National Statistics also showed that while 1.2 million women experienced domestic violence, 800,000 men did as well—in the U.K., men comprise 40 percent of those who suffer from domestic violence.

The Department of Psychology at California State University, Long Beach, compiled a bibliography that examined 286 scholarly investigations, 221 empirical studies, and 65 reviews and/or analyses demonstrating that which we are reluctant to discuss—the uncomfortable reality that women are as physically aggressive, or even more so, than men in their relationships with their spouses or male partners.

Let's put this into perspective: a significant amount of the findings regarding male-as-victim intimate partner violence came about as the result of studies and surveys that were aimed at understanding domestic violence against women. These are not studies conducted by rabid anti-women men's groups or right-wing think tanks. They were conducted by organizations like the Centers for Disease Control, National Institutes of Health, the American Sociological Association, Psychology of Women Quarterly, and the American Journal of Public Health, to name a few.

And yet, these numbers prompt a resounding backlash. Accusations such as "You're saying abused women are asking for it" or "You're blaming the victim" get hurled. No person—female or male—is asking for it, and no victim—female or male—should be blamed for what is done to them. I'm merely broadening the definitions of abuser and victim.

If we are serious about addressing domestic violence, then we must deal with all of the incarnations of the realities of domestic violence.

Mixed messages

This writer does not pretend to have all the answers when it comes to this issue, but this can be said with a great deal of certitude: Confusing the very people one is trying to affect is not a sound strategy for change. If only one person in the relationship is supposed to exercise control, if both partners are not equally responsible for keeping a relationship respectful and free of violence, we will have succeeded in changing nothing.

In recent months we've seen that the NFL has a confused policy in regard to domestic violence. For quite some time we've known that our court system has had a confused policy about domestic abuse. Their confusion reflects our societal misunderstanding of domestic violence and our muddled perceptions about gender.

Men are told in one breath to shed their machismo and sexist leanings, and in the next they are told to "man up" and take the blows dealt to them by their female partners. Men are being told that phrases like "You throw like a girl" or "You hit like a girl" have chauvinistic underpinnings while simultaneously being told, "It doesn't matter if she hits you because, essentially, she hits like a girl and you can handle it, big boy." So, while we recognize there's often a difference in the physical impact between male and females hitting each other, we completely disregard the emotional and psychological impacts—and often even the physical harm—of a woman hitting a man, whether it be with her hands, feet, or objects.

Just as we have done with women, we are trapping men in certain gender-based stereotypical straitjackets. This leads to two very important questions that are rarely asked: Is a woman ever responsible for a physical altercation that takes place between her and her male partner? Does a man ever have the right to tell a woman not to put her hands on him and expect her to respect that? Statistical and anecdotal data says the first question is barely acknowledged, and the second is treated by and large as an April Fool's joke.

The same protocols that are used to address domestic violence against women are used to handle domestic violence against men, and the research tells us that the same abusive behaviors and tactics demonstrated by men (physical, verbal, and emotional threats and intimidation) are also demonstrated by women. And the fear and shame that is felt as a result of being abused, as well as the excuses made to cover up the abuse, are not gender-specific. Additionally, some researchers estimate that about 20% of men who call law enforcement to report an abusive spouse or partner are, in turn, arrested for domestic abuse.

There are signs, at least in the healthcare field, that these perceptions about men being the victims of intimate partner violence are beginning to change. The world-renowned Mayo Clinic has posted helpful information for men who have been victims of domestic violence. (I have practically lived at Mayo this year and can attest that the same questions that were once asked only of women in regard to domestic violence are now being asked of men with great frequency.)

Child abuse

Courtesy of recent revelations surrounding NFL players, child abuse—another form of domestic violence—is also grabbing headlines. According to child welfare studies, mothers are almost twice as likely to be directly involved in child maltreatment as fathers. Mothers are more likely to abuse or neglect their children than fathers. I agree with those who say these numbers are as such because women are usually more involved with their children, and as single-parent homes are on the rise and women are increasingly the single parent, they become overrepresented in the numbers on child abuse.

Interestingly, when former Minnesota Viking and NFL Hall of Famer Cris Carter spoke of being a victim of child abuse, he revealed that it was his mother who was the abuser. His central point about child abuse was well received, but the fact that his mother was his abuser was either largely ignored or thought to have been of no consequence.

Meanwhile, one could also say that Black males are overrepresented in terms of homicide rates for various reasons (poverty, unemployment, education, etc), but the reasons why they are killed don't make them any less dead than any other homicide victim. So it is with child abuse: The reasons why women are overrepresented in the crime of child abuse does not make a child any less abused. And these abused children, half of which are male, live with that pain and become adults. As men, they are told not to talk about their pain or acknowledge that a woman hurt them.

"Man up. Don't cry," we tell them. And in doing so, we create the perfect conditions for a toxic relationship: men who can't verbalize their very real pain and an ethos that says women can't really hurt or traumatize men.

Is a woman every bit as capable as a man?

In terms of domestic violence and/or intimate partner violence, the conversation is, overwhelmingly, about what we need to talk about with our men and boys. This writer agrees: We need to talk to our boys and men about having respect for their partners in their relationships. Yet, that's only part of the problem. Our girls and young ladies need to be taught what appropriate behavior is and what non-violent conflict resolution looks like.

We are paying the price for not having this conversation with our daughters because over the past 20 years or so we have been experiencing a disturbing trend. Meda Chesney-Lind points to this in her essay "Are Girls Closing the Gender Gap in Violence?":

> Between 1989 and 1998, arrests of girls increased 50.3 percent, compared to only 16.5 percent for boys, according to the FBI's 1999 report, Crime in the United States 1998. During that same period, arrests of girls for serious violent offenses increased by 64.3 percent and arrests of girls for 'other assaults' increased an astonishing 125.4 percent. In 1999, the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention reported that the female violent crime rate for 1997 was 103 percent above the 1981 rate, compared to a 27 percent increase for males, prompting the statement that increasing juvenile female arrests and the involvement of girls in at-risk and delinquent behavior has been a pervasive trend across the United States.

A later report further stated that by 2000, that proportion had grown to 18%, and by 2004 it had risen to 30%. Although arrest numbers remained higher for boys than girls during that period, arrest rates for girls increased as that for boys decreased.

The voices in our world that cry out for greater protections for women against sexual assault, human trafficking, and spousal and/or intimate partner homicide must be heard. But we are taught by our mores, ideologies, and politics that we can only recognize one reality at a time. If we talk about female-initiated domestic violence, then it takes away from addressing violence against women. Further, we worry that writings such as these only serve as distractions, smokescreens, and misdirections.

I don't believe that. I believe that we have an equal stake and an equal responsibility in making sure our relationships are healthy. I believe that we all have an equal right not to be assaulted or have our personal space disrespected. By bringing this largely unknown and very uncomfortable truth to light, it means we are serious about addressing violence—not just domestic violence—and its causes and effects.

"Is a woman every bit as capable as a man?" We are constantly answering the question across this country in our mayoral and gubernatorial elections and in our House and Senate races, and 2016 tempts us with that question in a national general election. Granted, not all elections and appointments come down to gender, but we have been able to see woman as CEOs, as leaders, and maybe soon we'll even get to see woman as commander-in-chief. That equality, though, also demands that we be able to entertain the thought of women as aggressors.

Four reasons I won't be one of the men signing Emma Watson's #HeForShe pledge

Glen Poole · 29 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

This week Emma Watson, she of Harry Potter fame, made headlines by making a rousing speech on gender equality, as she called for one billion men and boys to sign up to UN Women's #HeForShe campaign.

Glen Poole of insideMAN gives four reasons he won't be taking the #HeForShe pledge.

1. IT'S SEXIST AGAINST MEN AND WOMEN

There were two comments I loved in Emma Watson's speech for UN Women:

"Both men and women should feel free to be sensitive. Both men and women should feel free to be strong."

"I've seen my father's role as a parent being valued less by society."

One of the reasons we don't value men's parenting role is that we still expect fathers to stoically take on being the family's protector and provider. Any man who transgresses this norm, whether he's a "househusband" or an "absent father", is viewed as not being a "real man".

We collectively create the expectation of what makes a "real man" in lots of different ways. One way we do this is through campaigns about gender equality that present a pantomime view of the world where "women HAVE problems and men ARE problems". In this worldview, men are basically offered one of two roles—the hero or the villain. We are seen as either causing the world's problems or solving the world's problems.

The #HeForShe campaign that Emma Watson wants us to sign up to is just more of the same sexist nonsense. Note which side of the equation men and women are placed in the name of the #HeForShe campaign. Men and boys are once again defined as the STRONG protectors of women and girls who, in turn, are presented as the poor SENSITIVE victims of men's evil patriarchy. So where is Emma Watson's brave new world where women can be strong and men can be sensitive? It certainly isn't to be found in the #HeForShe campaign that she is championing.

So no Emma, I won't be signing up for a campaign that defines and limits the role that men and women can play based purely on our gender, because that's sexist.

2. IT'S A FEMINIST CAMPAIGN

One of the key things that unites UN Women, Emma Watson and the #HeForShe campaign is that they are all feminist. I have no issue with people choosing to define themselves as feminists and I just don't happen to be one myself. Nor am I an anti-feminist.

If I must define myself in the relation to the dominant (and dominating) worldview in gender politics then all you need to know about me is that I have the words "non feminist" running through me like a stick of seaside rock from my hometown of Blackpool.

This is not an uncommon male viewpoint. The vast majority of men and boys in the world are not feminists. That being the case, simple logic tells you that if you want one billion of us to sign up to something….DON'T MAKE IT FEMINIST!

So, again, no Emma, I won't be signing up for a feminist campaign on gender equality that requires me to think like a feminist, because that's fundamentalist (and I'm not a feminist).

3. IT'S RUN BY UN WOMEN

Let me be clear here, I have no issue with feminists running feminist campaigns anymore than I have an issue with conservatives running conservatives campaigns or Christians running Christian campaigns—it's exactly what I expect feminists, Christians and conservatives to do.

However, if you want to run a campaign that attracts a large number of people—say for example one billion men and boys—then you really need to design campaigns that are inclusive of a truly diverse range of people and viewpoints.

UN Women is a feminist initiative. Despite the claims it makes on the #HeForShe website, UN Women has no intention of creating "a solidarity movement for gender equality" because UN Women does not stand for gender equality. The clue is the word "Women".

As its name suggests, what UN Women exists to do is identify all the areas where women and girls are unequal and ignores all the areas where men and boys are unequal. This shouldn't really come as a surprise to anyone with a basic awareness of gender politics. Nobody expects the Cats Protection League to help rehome Llamas, because even though they are an animal welfare charity, their focus is on cats not llamas.

UN Women is the same, they don't help men, boys or llamas. Their focus is on helping women and girls. The difference with UN Women is that while it ignores the issues that men and boys face, it still presents itself as the world's leading authority on gender equality.

Is it really too radical an idea to expect that global experts on gender equality should identify the major gender inequalities experienced by men, women, girls and boys and seek to address all of them? Apparently, as far as supporters of UN Women like Emma Watson are concerned, there is no need for the world's leading authority on gender equality to consider the problems faced by men and boys.

So once again, no Emma, I won't be signing up for a UN Women campaign on gender equality, because in my experience UN Women is a grossly hypocritical organisation that doesn't promote equality for all genders.

4. IT'S REALLY NOT ABOUT GENDER EQUALITY

As the Guardian columnist Ally Fogg pointed out with brilliant simplicity this week, there are "five little words" in the #HeForShe pledge that UN Women wants men and boys to sign, that "betray Emma Watson". This is the statement that Emma Watson wants men and boys to pledge our allegiance to:

"Gender equality is not only a women's issue it is a human rights issue that requires my participation. I commit to take action against all forms of violence and discrimination…FACED BY WOMEN AND GIRLS".
This statement seems so blatantly, unequivocally sexist that it's hard to imagine how anyone who genuinely believes in the human rights issue that is gender equality could put their name to such nonsense.

Discrimination can be a very subjective topic to try and unpick, but the data on violence from the United Nations is unequivocal, men and boys are than four to five times more likely to die a violent death than women and girls, so you simply cannot create a gender equal world if you ignore violence against men and boys.

I care deeply, madly, passionately about gender equality and my version of what that looks like will differ from Ally Fogg's and Emma Watson's and many other people who have a view on the subject—and this is how it should be—we should welcome a broad spectrum of views into this vital conversation about the gendered nature of our human experience.

Watson says she believes that "it is time that we all perceive gender on a spectrum instead of two sets" of binary opposites. Well, it's an interesting concept, but the reality is that she is supporting UN Women (not UN Gender) from a feminist (not a "humanist") perspective to run a campaign called #HeForShe (not #SheForHe; #WeForShe or #WeForWe), so she is hardly using her power and influence to put what she preaches into practice.

So one more time, no Emma, I won't be signing up for the hypocritical, feminist, UN Women #HeForShe campaign because I happen to care about gender equality and for me that means bringing together people with a diverse range of perspectives to address the gender inequalities that everyone faces, including men and boys.

Roofie-detecting nail polish promotes rape culture?

AVfM Video Source · 29 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Libertarian Julie Borowski doesn't think much of the idea that protecting yourself from rape = rape culture.

Pauley want a restraining order? Well, she may get one.

Suzanne McCarley · 30 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

You know you're living in a nightmare when a court ruling "against" you is a major victory—the best progress you've made in years. This is Restraining Order Hell, courtesy of Star Crazy Pauley Perrette. (And she compares herself to a Holocaust survivor) Last week Perrette was forced to testify in court, in order to have her ten year old temporary restraining order against ex-husband Francis (Coyote) Shivers made permanent. After hearing testimony for two days, Judge Michael J. Convey ruled in her favor. The restraining order is now permanent, but it's a hollow victory for Our Dear Pauley. The door is now wide open for Coyote Shivers to obtain the mutual order he requested back in 2008—the one she's been fighting against.

In addition to granting Perrette yet another restraining order to add to her prized collection, Judge Convey made a few points she probably didn't want to hear. Karma couldn't care less what Pauley Perrette wants to hear. A Voice for Men will make the official transcript available as soon as we have it, but here is a paraphrased partial summary, from an observer present in the courtroom, of what he had to say:

The use of social media can be considered abuse by both parties, and can be considered grounds for "reasonable apprehension."

One can only hope that the phrase "reasonable apprehension" was a mild rebuke, a subtle rejection of Our Dear Pauley's theatrical display of patently fake terror.

He noted genuine fear on Shivers's part.

It is almost beyond belief that any official in this entire circus of a legal battle actually acknowledged that Shivers might have reason to be fearful. Who wouldn't be afraid of the (rather likely) possibility of being falsely arrested and falsely convicted again? The night Shivers was arrested for violating the order, Our Dear Pauley had "tweeted" that she was settled in at home for the evening, so Shivers felt safe taking his wife to his favorite restaurant. Perrette lied to 911, her lapdog boyfriend Thomas Arklie assaulted Shivers, and the security video mysteriously disappeared after a visit from a "detective."

He said that sometimes the person with the order continues to engage the person restricted.

'Nuff said.

He noted that both of them will not disengage.

Shivers has been stuck for a long time between two bad choices: "engage" Perrette by responding in an effort to protect his reputation and his family or remain silent in the onslaught of lies backed by money, influence and official corruption.

Yes, he "engaged."

He asked Shivers if he wanted a restraining order against Perrette.

Like the one for which he applied nine years ago?

These points are very significant, and for the first time in a decade, Shivers may see a modicum of justice. The order was made permanent, not due to a threat of physical violence or to a history of physical violence, but due to continued "harassment" via social media. Judge Convey saw, heard, and acknowledged on the record that Our Dear Pauley has engaged in quite a bit of that. To use a battered old cliché, "what's sauce for the goose, is sauce for the gander." When Shivers files for a restraining order against Perrette, there is no reason whatsoever why it should not be granted. None. I hope Our Dear Pauley enjoys her new little victory. For a while.

Sage Gerard challenged to debate

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 30 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Brian Neal Clyne from Kennesaw State University's Atheists United (AU) club has challenged me to debate on the topic "Did Feminism Get It Wrong?" This invitation has come after my attempt to join the club, which is part of an ongoing effort for KSUM to network with other groups. AU is also working on getting Dr. Richard Dawkins to visit KSU and deliver a speech.

AU is marketed by The Sentinel as a catalyst of open dialogue, using language one would expect from an organization attempting to make a positive impression.

I happily accepted the invitation to debate and requested we do the debate on a Google+ Hangout. Brian's response is as follows:

> I will not debate you online because that is not a real debate. A real debate is in person, neutrally moderated (as you said, to your credit), and in front of a live audience. I will need to look at my schedule, but anytime on a Friday should work for me. You would need to set up a large room as a public event through Student Life. And ensure that I have enough time to prepare for it and that it fits with my schedule.
>
> I admire the fact that you have the "courage of your convictions."
>
> And when I say "debate," I mean a Socratic Debate, where we are both given equal time to make our claims, equal time to rebut one another, then time for the live audience to ask questions. I do not mean us yelling at one another, helter-skelter.
>
> If we do this well, both you as an activist and me as a Feminist will garner great acclaim and support from the community, as well as dispelling any misconceptions about our positions on the topic.
>
> I will not bring up religion unless you do, which I would not advise because it is my expertise.
>
> Doing it on Google instead of live will make us both look pathetic.
>
> Propose a time and date and I will let you know if it works for me. Let's do this right! Not online, in person! Find a moderator and put it together.
>
> I read your article in the paper, and was actually impressed that you held your own.
>
> Your group and yourself have acquired quite the reputation on campus. Now is the time and means to set the record straight.
>
> Do not speak ill of me to my group, nor harass the ladies in my group and I will do the same: be a respectful member of your group. Do not have your people join my group to do the same and we will be fine. Actually, it would be best if we both left along with our other members, one another's groups so there is no question of conflict of interests, nor could anyone say that we "staged" all of this.
>
> Think about it; let me know.
> Brian
> National Society of Collegiate Scholars
> Phi Theta Kappa
> KSU Atheists United

Hi Brian,

Thanks for the email. It's interesting to run into a fellow Phi Theta Kappan after all of these years. I was an officer for the Omicron Alpha chapter during my junior college degree program. As a brief aside, I was competing for a regional webmaster position, but I voluntarily gave up the race to a woman in Omicron Alpha because she wanted the regional historian position, and we could only have one candidate per chapter. There are many other stories I could share about my experience as the only male officer for a year, but I'll put those aside for the time being to discuss the debate.

I'm fine with a Socratic debate in a classroom with plenty of prep time for both of us. I think you can appreciate my wish for the debate to be published online so that people outside of campus can benefit from the experience. The emergent perspective of the campus audience will not be as diverse as that of the general public, after all. If we record in a classroom, cameras can be rented from the KSU AVTS offices. If cameras cannot be acquired, then audio recorders are a minimally acceptable fallback.

But before I get too ahead of myself, I need to question some of your propositions in the interest of a fair negotiation.

What evidence proves that our debate would be a yelling match? Also, why does the tone of your email suggest that I am likely to harass women in your group? Another email you sent to the members reads as follows:

[image]

First off, I did not know about your wanting to debate me until you started posting stuff after my joining AU on OwlLife.*

Second, I'm getting mixed messages. On one hand, you say that AU is happy that I joined, but apparently my messages are subject to screening based on AU's standard of what is offensive. Who sets that standard, and why is that standard objective and fair? The following OwlLife email notification makes it appear as if the standard is based on community impressions, in this case, the opinions of female members.

[image]

I really do not care if you speak negatively about KSUM (it looks like that already happened anyway). Besides, there is no record to set straight when the news in The Sentinel did that already, as opposed to the silly editorial that just repeated busted myths. I also don't understand the need to act so protective of the women in AU. They are independent people who don't need anyone to speak for them.

Finally, you won't need to screen my messages because I will be posting where AU can't touch them anyway. I don't need anyone's approval to speak.

Factoring all this in, plus your recommendation to keep our memberships separate, I wonder how AU is as conducive to open discussion as The Sentinel suggests.

But I digress because the opinions of AU members on my membership are not relevant to a negotiation on debate terms.

I work 65+ hours a week, and I really don't care if we debate or not. I just think it would be fun if it happens. KSUM members are already setting up a $13,000 conference that demands our entire focus. Our time is too valuable to change everything we are doing on an outside whim.

Your wanting to debate is not my responsibility. And if I'm going to be treated as some potential "problem," then do you really expect me to do work for AU? You are the challenger, so I'm not going to trouble myself with setting up the venue.

I hear your desire for formality, and I understand and respect your wish to do things academically. But consider the pragmatics of the situation and ask yourself if perhaps pedantry and bureaucracy can incur unnecessary expenses for both of us. I recommend a G+ Hangout not because it's what I want but because it is much easier to schedule and there is no expense involved with arranging a venue or acquiring cameras. The cost of bureaucracy drops to nothing, and we still get the benefit of doing it live with a moderator.

As for it looking "pathetic" or somehow not genuine, that's an opinion. This is not Bill Nye vs. Ken Ham, so why worry so much about the image? Neither one of us are that special, and I doubt anyone would sit and give us grief if we adopted an online format with webcams.

A picture of every Google+ hangout audience, I guess. (Source: muppet.wikia.com)

Other people donate to this organization, so I'm not going to disrespect their contributions by bending to an aggressive will. They are also not "my people" in the sense that I can tell them what to do. They don't belong to anyone, and I respect their choice to decide their involvement for themselves. I'm not going to tell KSUM members to drop everything and work according to your terms and your schedule. KSUM is not for anyone to dictate, including myself. I am an officer working with respectable people whom I consider to be moral equals, and I include feminists in that description, especially if they show up and work hard. It's the people who sit off in the distance making demands that end up fading into irrelevance.

What kind of leader would I be if I did what you told me to do? I don't insist that AU do what I want. In fact, I only proposed what can help us both.

You want the debate, and you want it in a classroom.

Great!

I'm not setting that up.

I await your reply on how to approach the debate, but note that all correspondence with me is subject to publication.

I wish you the best of luck in funding your event to bring Dawkins down to KSU.

Sage Gerard
Founder, Kennesaw State University Men
Collegiate Activism Director, A Voice for Men

* OwlLife is a social media platform for KSU student organizations.

Cronyism, lies, and censorship: What gender ideologues bring to gaming

Vincent James · 30 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: Part 1 can be found here.
This article is also available in Romanian.

Last month, a corruption scandal in the video games industry began to unfold, addressing suspected collusion between feminist game developers and the journalists who reviewed their work. At gaming news websites such as Kotaku, Gamasutra, and Polygon, it was claimed that feminist writers gave these developers positive coverage because of close personal, including sexual, relationships.

Evidence arose that three journalists on these websites were giving money to Zoe Quinn, a feminist game developer who was involved in the scandal, and that this same developer was channeling donations for a game event she was organizing into her personal PayPal account. In the face of increasing public awareness of the scandal, several prominent web forums resorted to unprecedented levels of censorship, and thus gave more credence to the allegations of collusion in the industry. AVfM has detailed these incidents, which marked the start of the scandal, in the first article of this series.

Since then, over the last several weeks, the story has broken into the mainstream media and has kept growing with new revelations; the scandal, now known as GamerGate, has been the subject of more than 1 million tweets and has been covered by more than 40 news websites. Those who are now investigating GamerGate have gathered evidence of possible collusion between the chair of the Independent Game Festival and a PR agent employed by all the game developers who went on to receive awards at that festival. Investigations have further discovered that Leigh Alexander, editor-in-chief of the game reviews website Gamasutra, runs a consulting company and uses her clout as a journalist to write positive coverage for the same games that her company helps create. Along with that, she uses her own Twitter account, which has accrued 53,000 followers in part due to her journalistic activities, to promote her consultancy's clients.

In a bizarre response to the emerging scandal, on August 28 and 29, a number of game journalism websites published articles claiming that gamers were uncivilized, racist, misogynistic, homophobic neckbeards who oppress minorities, with one article even stating that "gamers don't have to be your audience; gamers are dead." As a reaction to these articles, the female, non-White, and GLBTQ gamers who participated in GamerGate discussions created the Twitter hashtag #NotYourShield to reinforce the fact that they were not oppressed and that they did not want to be used as a means for game journalists to deflect accusations of corruption. Gamasutra, the website that hosted the "gamers are dead" article, has seen its readership plummet in the aftermath, and several of the other websites involved in the scandal are facing the loss of several of their advertisers, owing to complaints from the gamers themselves about the anti-gamer rhetoric.

On September 18, Milo Yiannopoulos, writing for the mainstream journalism website Breitbart, published a series of emails from a secret mailing list used by the editors of major game review websites. The emails show that editors such as Ben Kuchera of Polygon, Susan Arendt of Joystiq, and Kyle Orland of Ars Technica talked about how best to keep the scandal under wraps. Kuchera went as far as asking Greg Tito, the editor-in-chief of The Escapist, to edit his own forums' terms of service and thus make discussions of the scandal subject to deletion.

To understand what caused these incidents, it is important to acknowledge that the gaming media has never been a stranger to corruption. For instance, in 2007, Jeff Gertsman was fired from the website GameSpot after writing an unflattering review of a game at a time when that game's publishing company was paying GameSpot for advertising space. In 2012, the hitherto-prestigious Geoff Keighley earned the nickname "Dorito Pope," as well as ample ridicule, after appearing in an interview that featured gratuitous product placement for Mountain Dew and Doritos. Also in 2012, the game company Sega filed a series of indiscriminate copyright claims against YouTube users to help promote its new game series, sparking outrage among its fans.

Over the last few years, however, a new form of corruption has emerged in the games industry, spurred not by corporate underhandedness and financial conflicts of interest, but by deceptive activism and ideological bullying. In 2008, for instance, feminists started to complain that a new game from Sony Entertainment, Fat Princess, was demeaning to women. Although the mainstream gaming press, including one article on the website Kotaku, widely dismissed this perspective, the website Joystiq published an article of its own that suggested the game will create "a new generation of fat-hating, heteronormative assholes."

In 2011, a controversy arose over a line of code in the video game Dead Island; one of the female characters possessed a skill called "gender wars," but in that line of code, invisible to the players themselves, the skill was jokingly referred to as "feminist whore." This was, again, not treated as a major issue by either the company or the media, and no one was fired in the aftermath.

In 2012, however, the feminists began to organize. A Twitter campaign called #1reasonwhy started that year to give reasons for why there were few women in the game development industry; Nathan Grayson, one of the people implicated in the GamerGate scandal, wrote an article supporting this campaign on Rock, Paper, Shotgun. Favorable articles also emerged in Gamasutra and Kotaku, two websites heavily involved in GamerGate. Following the campaign on Twitter, prominent feminist game developers would later set up the #1ReasonToBe panel at the Game Developers Conference, as well as, in 2014, a feminist panel called "the F-word" at the PAX Prime event. The topics of these events related not to how female game developers could develop new skills to improve their businesses, but to how feminist women could change the culture of the games industry so that it better suited them. Several of the major players in the ongoing controversy of GamerGate gave talks at these events; one of them is Leigh Alexander, who would, at the 2014 #1ReasonToBe event, encourage the audience to "take the system apart."

Also in 2012, Anita Sarkeesian gained notoriety for raising $158,922 for a series of (so far) six YouTube videos, amounting to less than three hours of content in total, in which she claimed the video games industry portrayed women as "damsels in distress" or "sex objects" and loudly complained about companies that appeared to employ these stereotypes. Since then, she has been exposed for apparently lying about being a gamer, using other people's content in her work without their permission, making claims about video games that contradicted the games' own content, and tweeting about unprofessionalism on the part of the police in a conversation whose existence the police denied.

Spurred by their early successes, feminists pushed to impose their ideology throughout the game industry from 2012 onwards. To give one example, Brenda Romero convinced the International Game Developers Association to exercise "vigilance" against employing scantily clad female dancers when she resigned from the institution in protest on discovering such dancers at a party during the 2013 Game Developers Conference. Nevertheless, she continued to attend the conference and, in the following year, used it to give a speech on sexual harassment in the game industry.

Referencing that talk in her own article, Danielle Riendeau wrote at Polygon that the Game Developers Conference needs to "make sure all attendees have some kind of exposure to the advocacy work being done in this industry." Likewise, Polygon promoted the Different Games conference, which focused on advocacy work against such things as "hegemonic masculinity" and included several of those involved in the GamerGate scandal as speakers.

Rock, Paper, Shotgun openly declared its support of feminism, alongside other aspects of the "social justice" ideology that it espoused, while Gamasutra wrote an article on "sexism in the game industry." These and other advocacy pieces on several major websites—including Rock, Paper, Shotgun; Kotaku; Polygon; Destructoid; and Gamasutra—carried a distinct political message that rang clear from 2012 to this day. They hinted that a radical left-wing culture was growing within the game journalism industry, keen to spread its influence over the game development process itself. Though the adherents of this culture used no name for themselves, their critics chose to refer to them as "social justice warriors."

To accomplish their goals, the "social justice warriors" not only called for inclusiveness, but also accused parts of the game industry of bigotry. In an opinion piece on the game Tomodachi Life, for instance, Samantha Allen wrote at Polygon that "Behind all the corporate jargon and flowery public-relations language lies hatred, pure and simple." She made this accusation because the developers of Tomodachi Life had said the game would not feature gay romance.

Kotaku, Destructoid, and other gaming news outlets published articles praising the game Sunset Overdrive for giving the option to play as a woman; the same articles also criticized the game Assassin's Creed: Unity, whose developers had stated that they could not implement a female main character due to budget constraints. Likewise, Stephen Totilo, the editor-in-chief of Kotaku, wrote an article on "Grand Theft Auto V and Women," criticizing it for its lack of strong female characters, but otherwise praising it for being "occasionally refreshingly progressive" in its political attitudes. The transsexual game critic Carolyn Petit of GameSpot also complained about the game's "misogyny," saying that all of its female characters were "strippers, prostitutes, long-suffering wives, humorless girlfriends and goofy, new-age feminists we're meant to laugh at."

In truth, all of the major characters in GTA V, including the women, are unsavory people whom the game mocks at every opportunity, and so the accusations of misogyny against the game were undeserved. Petit's review on YouTube earned 1.45 downvotes for every upvote, and those who commented on it made it clear that their dislike was about Petit's accusations of misogyny. Reviews such as these, which prize political correctness over entertainment value, have become increasingly common in the past three years, prompting a backlash from the gamers themselves.

Developers and publishers who shared these journalists' political views chose to join them in this ideological conflict. The major game publisher Electronic Arts, for instance, has hired Anita Sarkeesian to influence the design of its upcoming game Mirror's Edge 2. Electronic Arts' subsidiary BioWare has made a number of games, such as the Mass Effect series and Dragon Age 2, with strong feminist influences; its developers have even spoken in favor of feminism on game journalism websites and at conferences. Likewise, Microsoft hosts its "Women in Gaming Awards" event, in which Anita Sarkeesian was nominated this year for an ambassador award.

It's worth noting, however, that other developers have refused to capitulate to the "social justice warriors." Some, like Dustin Browder and John Carmack, have done so politely, refusing to comment when prompted to an ideological stance or shrugging off accusations of political incorrectness altogether. Others, like David Jaffe, known for his God of War and Twisted Metal series, have been more vocal: after Stephen Totilo's Kotaku released an opinion piece calling him a "misogynist" on spurious grounds, Jaffe sat face-to-face with Totilo and told him that he was done with his publication.

In recent times, with GamerGate emerging, other developers have come forward to speak about the creeping indoctrination problem in the games industry, including an anonymous Microsoft employee who worked on the Xbox One and more than a dozen indie developers, but also two major figures in the games industry: Brad Wardell, CEO of Stardock, and Daniel Vavra, co-founder of Warhorse Studios. Wardell's encounter with the "social justice" crowd came about when a woman falsely accused him of sexual harassment. Although the woman in question retracted her accusations and had to issue a public apology, Wardell has since been the target of hostility from "social justice warriors," some of whom threatened him online after revealing that they knew his whereabouts, and some of whom opted instead to smear his fantasy book with false accusations of racism.

Ben Kuchera, the feminist game journalist, wrote an article on the alleged harassment, triggering more hostility against Wardell, but refused to write in regards to the public apology. On the website TechRaptor, you can find interviews with both Brad Wardell and Daniel Vavra.

In what is perhaps the most striking example of politicized game development in the industry recently, Dina Abou Karam, a feminist from Lebanon, took on the role of community manager at the game company Comcept and worked on their major title Mighty No. 9, using her position to promote her feminist agenda. Karam was offered her position in the company after asking developers to turn the male protagonist of Mighty No. 9 into a woman for the sake of "gender representation" and tweeted about her involvement in designing robots for the game soon after joining. Mighty No. 9 was supposed to be a spiritual successor to the highly popular Mega Man series, and fans grew concerned that she would spoil the franchise for the sake of her own political aims.

As it happens, Karam's own Twitter posts stated that she had never played the original Mega Man series and that her best friend was a member of the development team. When the game's fans confronted her with this, Karam temporarily locked her Twitter account and deleted the relevant tweets. When they further confronted her about the deletions, Karam allegedly banned some of them from the game's forums.

People who helped fund Mighty No. 9 and have taken an anti-corruption stance during GamerGate have now reported being blocked by the game's Twitter account. Karam has referred to these people as "mouth-breathers" on her personal Twitter account, as well as expressing support for and friendship towards Zoe Quinn, one of the key figures in the GamerGate scandal. There is therefore the possibility that Karam blocked them from the game's account for the sake of her personal friendship. In spite of displaying contempt for the fans who helped finance the game, she has not been removed from her role as community manager.

While the gamers protested affairs such as these across online forums, game journalists stiffened their stance in support of feminism. John Walker of Rock, Paper, Shotgun, who has also been vocal against men's rights activism, wrote that "Rock, Paper, Shotgun will never back down on the subject of sexism and misogyny." Polygon reprinted one of Leigh Alexander's blog posts in order to "help answer" the question of how readers could "make a difference" about sexual harassment in the industry, which would be fine, were it not for Alexander's "answers" such as "don't tweet at women asking them what should be done." These along with other articles spelled out the ideologues' interest to promote a feminist agenda, and if the "seething internet community," as one author on the website Destructoid described it, would raise objections, the community itself would be regarded as part of the problem.

To get a sense of how things stand within the industry today, it is enough to see this picture.

> View post on imgur.com

This is Danielle Riendeau, the writer at Polygon mentioned earlier in this article. She is also one of the members of the secret mailing list that Milo Yiannopoulos uncovered. As her LinkedIn profile shows, she works in academia, teaching digital media at Northeastern University; her previous position was in the American Civil Liberties Union, where she served as communications coordinator.

Notice the dot at the start of Riendeau's Twitter message. On Twitter, posts that start with a username (such as @samusclone) are regarded as messages and are not automatically broadcast to the author's followers. The dot thus prevents Twitter from seeing that the post as a message and so exposes it to as wide an audience as possible. At present, Riendeau has more than 6,000 followers; she therefore intended for thousands of people to see this "adorable" picture.

Maddy Myers is friends with Riendeau, as well as being "best friends forever" with journalist Samantha Allen, who has openly referred to herself as a misandrist and written for The Daily Beast about how feminism should politicize the development of artificial wombs. Myers is, furthermore, a reader of Misandry Mermaid, a tumblr blog that features the motto "forever bathing in your male tears." She makes jokes about killing all men, or at least "only the boring ones," on her Twitter account. Although Myers drew the manticore picture, the idea of "misandry manticores" was apparently Riendeau's own idea.

Of the people who profess similar attitudes, Leigh Alexander stands out. Her Twitter history includes threats to people's careers over their polite disagreements, grandiose statements such as "I AM game journalism," and calls for a "violent cultural backlash" against "ghetto" men, which, given other tweets from her, may well refer strictly to Black people.

Commenting on how one of her cronies should address his critics on Twitter, she told him to “toss them to your army to be torn into bits, that one is also good.” Along the same vein, when her self-proclaimed misandrist colleague, Samantha Allen, complained that two White men had been hired by the website Giant Bomb, Alexander expressed her contempt for that website, saying, “Literally everything I write is more interesting than everything most of the GB staff does. bye haters.” We can also find her revelling in female-on-male violence, as she once wrote “SHE JUST AIR SLAPPED THE MALE DANCER #misandry #excellent” in one Twitter post.

Likewise, on the “frequently asked questions” page of her blog, she responds to the question “I’m not sure if I agree with you. Can we discuss?” with “No. Be quiet and listen for once.” To the question “Don’t you think being friendly is better than being sharp?” she sarcastically responds: “Ah, yes. The many revolutions that were won by smiling and not being negative.”

As we have seen and we will continue to see, Alexander is one of the most vocal “social justice warriors” in the computer games scene, and her motivation, as she sees it, is to bring about a revolution.

It’s rare for journalists in the games media to make such public displays as the Misandry Manticore picture or the tweets bashing “ghetto” people, but the mere fact that these women continue to write at their websites, which claim to be bastions of “equality” and “diversity,” drives the point home that the feminist ideology of the “social justice warriors” is profoundly hypocritical and, by now, deeply embedded in the culture of game journalism.

Even in private, in the chain of emails that Milo Yiannopoulos leaked, Danielle Riendeau described the pro-GamerGate people as “a mob of angry insane misogynists.” Discussing Eron Gjoni, whose blog post on his cheating ex-girlfriend gave essential information at the start of the scandal, she quipped: “I don’t care if this jilted moron walks around with sad puppy dog eyes for the rest of his life.” Three weeks later, the same Danielle Riendeau wrote a feminist article about the lack of diversity in customizable comic-book action figures, saying it “reeks of cynicism and sexism.”

Looking at these and other comments, it would not be a stretch to say that many journalists at Polygon, as well as at websites such as Kotaku; Rock, Paper, Shotgun; and Gamasutra, share these sentiments.

To start with, the chain of emails published September 18 shows compelling evidence of the collusion among editors of different publications for the sake of their fellow ideologues.

Kyle Orland, senior gaming editor of Ars Technica, proposed several plans for how the mailing list (comprising people from more than 20 different websites, many of whom were supposed to be in competition with one another) could jointly take action about the scandal, which at the time was mainly affecting Zoe Quinn. In a blatant show of collusion, he proposed that “maybe we should just use this as an excuse to give more attention to her work.” He also proposed that the mailing list draft a joint letter expressing support for her. The letter, he said, should be passed via word-of-mouth rather than Twitter in order to, in his own words, “keep it under the radar.”

Although most of his fellow journalists disagreed in their emails, they did so out of consideration for Zoe Quinn’s privacy rather than a potential breach of ethics. One journalist, Andrew Groen, who writes for Wired Magazine, suggested that the list’s members present her with a “feel better” gift. He even called her a “colleague” in the emails, even though she is a developer and he is a journalist, tasked with impartially reviewing her work.

William O’Neal, the editor-in-chief of TechRadar, jokingly commented in one of the emails: “Who here hasn’t slept with a PR person or game developer? #AMIRITE”

Of note is that some of the journalists were steadfast advocates of censorship. Ben Kuchera of Polygon, in particular, was vocal about ensuring the censorship of GamerGate, to the point, as mentioned earlier, that he demanded to Greg Tito, editor-in-chief of The Escapist, to change the terms of service on his forums so as to justify deleting the GamerGate thread there. This is despite the fact that Tito had already limited discussion of GamerGate to that particular thread.

Kuchera is no stranger to censorship: as the GamerGate scandal was unfolding, he created a joint Twitter blacklist with fellow Polygon editor Chris Grant, which led to him blocking the accounts of more than 1,500 people. The blacklist included Milo Yianopoulos, who went on to expose their part in GamerGate, and the equity feminist Christina Hoff Sommers, who had chosen to speak against the social justice ideology in a remarkably non-confrontational way. Eventually, Grant and Kuchera abandoned the blacklist after apologizing to Sommers.

The mailing list may explain part of why, on August 28 and 29, almost two weeks after the scandal began to emerge, the websites with a presence on the list released articles proclaiming the "death of gamers" and decrying the "harassment" that women like Zoe Quinn face in the games industry. Some of these articles were posted only a few hours apart, indicating that they were the fruit of prior discussion among their creators. The archived list of articles can be found here.

One of these articles, written by Leigh Alexander for Gamasutra, says "'Gamers' don't have to be your audience. 'Gamers' are over." Another article by Devin Wilson, again at Gamasutra, is entitled "A guide to ending 'Gamers'" and goes into great detail about the political means to radically shift the nature of the gaming industry; he calls on his readers to bring about a revolution and proposes, among other things, that they "change the culture of game consumption" as well as "maintain a critical eye towards the e-sports scene and its accompanying machismo."

Casey Johnston of Ars Technica wrote her own article entitled "The death of the 'gamers' and the women who 'killed' them," attempting to portray GamerGate as an outburst of misogyny rather than an examination of corruption in the games industry. Luke Plunkett of Kotaku further stated that "We might be witnessing the death of an identity," claiming to be "horrified by the degree of hostility, bigotry and sheer inhumanity" on the part of the gamers who have spoken out about journalistic corruption, whom he refers to as "reactionary holdouts that feel so threatened by gaming's widening horizons."

In the mainstream press, Leigh Alexander also wrote for TIME magazine, discussing the "bizarre conspiracy theories" and accusations against her. The mainstream British newspaper The Guardian likewise published a news article decrying the "misogyny" and "harassment of women" in video games. At the time of publication, Jenn Frank, the author of this article, was receiving funding via the Patreon website from Maya Kramer, one of the people involved in the scandal. Frank's Twitter posts further suggest that she and Zoe Quinn, the person discussed in her article, are friends; if this is true, it would violate The Guardian's own code of ethics, which requires all conflicts of interest to be stated.

Confronted with polite but firm accusations of corruption on his colleague's part, Tim Hatfield of The Guardian responded with such comments as "You are utterly full of shit," "fuck off back to your fantasy land," and "go fuck yourself."

One particularly outspoken anti-GamerGate journalist is Devin Faraci, who wrote an article for his publication Badass Digest, in which he described the pro-GamerGate people as "They're outsiders, losers, weirdos and freaks." He further added that "most of them aren't just male, they're white males." Faraci has written numerous troll posts on Twitter, including one in which he stated that he has more respect for the genocidal organization ISIS than for gamers.

The #NotYourShield campaign on Twitter sprang directly as a response to these insults; it comprised women, ethnic minorities, and GLBTQ people, all of them gamers, who spoke about how welcoming their fellow White, male, heterosexual gamers have always been. These people further called out the game journalists for hiding their corruption behind the smokescreen of "racism, sexism, homophobia" campaigning. Almost 160,000 posts on Twitter now feature the #NotYourShield hashtag, more than 10,000 of them having been written in the past week.

It's noteworthy that, in spite of the barrage of articles proclaiming "the death of gamers" by websites whose members were implicated in GamerGate, the media overall was divided regarding the scandal. In the games press itself, such websites as GamesNosh, APGNation, TechRaptor, NicheGamer, and GamerHeadlines published several articles that showed support for the anti-corruption campaign, as did several mainstream websites such as Slate and Breitbart, while some news sites, such as Forbes, took a neutral stance.

Christina Hoff Sommers, an academic who has often spoken out about the excesses of modern feminism, has made her own YouTube video expressing skepticism for "the death of gamers" claims; the video has so far gained almost 400,000 views. Likewise, prominent video bloggers such as The Amazing Atheist and Thunderf00t have featured videos discussing GamerGate from a pro-gamer point of view.

As in the early days of GamerGate, the campaign experienced censorship. In a surprising move, Twitter suspended Thunderf00t's account, claiming he had "participated in targeted abuse," presumably against Anita Sarkeesian, despite never having addressed her on Twitter. Even more remarkable is that, soon after Milo Yiannopoulos released the chain of emails, censorship also began to take place on the popular webforum 4chan, where the forum's administrator, Christopher Poole, announced that all discussion of GamerGate would promptly be deleted. 4chan is famous for offering anonymity to its users and tolerating free speech, no matter how crude or offensive, so this turn of events represented a drastic reversal of its policies. Even though 4chan had soared to become the 500th most visited site on the Internet recently, largely because of the GamerGate revelations, this news caused it to lose a significant portion of its readership, who instead migrated to forums such as 8chan.

Beyond resorting to censorship, the anti-GamerGate crowd have even employed a DDOS attack against The Escapist Magazine, which has proven sympathetic to the pro-GamerGate crowd over the last several weeks. The website's general manager, Alexander Macris, even thanked the pro-GamerGate campaigners for their part in creating the website's new ethics policy. As the DDOS attack was aimed at the GamerGate thread on the forums of The Escapist, it's fair to assume that the reasons for the attack had to do with the website's pro-GamerGate stance.

"Social justice warriors" have also tried to strike at the personal lives of GamerGate supporters, doxxing them and contacting their employers; one man has lost his job as a result, while another is currently suspended. Furthermore, a well-known anti-male troll group called SRS seems to be behind the recent doxxing of six prominent GamerGate figures: Adam Baldwin, who coined the name "GamerGate" and is best known for his role as Jayne Cobb in the Firefly series; journalist Milo Yiannopoulos, who has even received a syringe containing an unknown substance in the mail; the popular vloggers JonTron, Boogie2988, and Shoe0nHead, who have expressed their sympathy for GamerGate; and Eron Gjoni, the man who wrote the now-infamous blog about Zoe Quinn. Along with these people's private information, the text file delivered by the doxxers states: "Let this be a warning, don't fuck with Zoe or Anita anymore or this list grows."

In the midst of the backlash, a number of enthusiast investigators have been trawling the Internet, looking for instances of collusion among the ideologues in the game industry. From their work, more and more evidence surfaces every week. We find Leigh Alexander inviting game journalists such as Kirk Hamilton from Kotaku and game developers such as Steve Gaynor to follow each other on Twitter. We find that Kirk Hamilton and another journalist, Matthew Burns, have written for the same magazine, Killscreen, and appear to know each other on a personal level. We find that when Matthew Burns published his game, The Arboretum, Kirk Hamilton wrote a favorable review for him and even persuaded Cara Ellison, a journalist from the website Rock, Paper, Shotgun, to write her own review of the game. We find that Steve Gaynor seems to likewise be good friends with Leigh Alexander, who later wrote a review praising Steve Gaynor's game, Gone Home.

Alexander's website Gamasutra is heavily involved in the Independent Games Festival—indeed, both it and the festival are subsidiaries of UBM Tech. Thus, it is intriguing to find that Gone Home won awards at the IGF and at another event hosted by UBM Tech, the Game Developers' Choice Awards, in spite of popular outcry.

The website Metacritic shows that, whereas 48 critic reviews of the game have been positive, 4 have been mixed and none have been negative, as many as half of all user reviews on the game have been negative, while only 41% of the user reviews have been positive. This shows that the critics' opinions bear little resemblance to those of the players. It is relevant, then, to see Steve Gaynor's apparent friendship with Danielle Riendeau and the fact that they once made arrangements to see a political documentary called The Punk Singer together (though apparently they never wound up going to see it). The film's focus was the feminist activist Kathleen Hanna, who according to Wikipedia told her producer specifically that the number of men being interviewed in the film should be minimized.

Thus, it seems that Steve Gaynor, like Danielle Riendeau, is a feminist ideologue.

As mentioned earlier, Riendeau writes for Polygon, which made Gone Home its Game Of The Year at the end of 2013 despite complaints from its audience that the award was given on ideological grounds.

Beyond mere relationships between developers and reviewers, we find that there are academics who are actively trying to push a feminist agenda into gaming. Much of the investigation since the start of GamerGate has focused on the Digital Games Research Association (DiGRA), a group of academics and professionals in the world of computer games, some of whom have shown a strong desire to inoculate the industry with gender politics. Of special interest are Mia Consalvo, who is the current chair of DiGRA, and Adrienne Shaw, who works as both an academic and a co-chair of the GLBT Studies Special Interest Group at the International Communications Association.

One of Shaw's academic papers, "On Not Becoming Gamers: Moving Beyond the Constructed Audience," states that she uses "feminist and queer political critique of identity categories" to examine the gamer identity, with the ultimate goal of reshaping that identity to be more inclusive of minority groups. The article concludes that, because people who don't identify themselves as "gamers" do so for reasons that cannot be subject to cultural intervention, the best way to benefit minorities is not to expand the "gamer" identity so as to include them, but to instead diminish the value that people place on this identity so that minorities can feel less excluded as a result.

Mia Consalvo, the chair of DiGRA, has more scathing opinions of gamers. In an academic paper of her own, "Confronting Toxic Gamer Culture: A Challenge for Feminist Game Studies Scholars," she writes that "With increasing frequency the ugliness of gamer culture is being put on display for the wider world to see," giving examples of hostility such as the backlash against Anita Sarkeesian. She claims that these examples were not isolated, but show "a pattern of a misogynistic gamer culture and patriarchal privilege attempting to (re)assert its position."

The article ostensibly aims to "push for a more welcoming kind of game culture for everyone" by analyzing the debates surrounding controversies in the gaming world, finding out how to influence these debates, and seeing to what extent the "beliefs and practices" of developers and marketers influence the attitudes of gamers. In her own words, "if companies do not actively and quickly respond to shut down sexist, sometimes pornographic uses of their game materials, can we expect players to respond to other players' calls for better behavior?" All of this alludes to a desire to carry out social engineering and bring a feminist agenda into gaming.

Both Consalvo and Shaw took part in a roundtable discussion at DiGRA, called "The Playful is Political," that included feminist academics as well as feminists employed in the games industry. Two of the participants, Andrew Wilson and Zoya Street, have worked with the Silverstring Media consultancy, which employs Anita Sarkeesian in an advisory role. A transcript of the discussion at DiGRA shows that the participants were eager to influence the world of computer games, with one student, Meghan Blythe Adams, saying that "Academics ought to be making demands" of the industry. Both she and Shaw expressed a wish to tear down the industry's "capitalist norms." Casey O'Donnell, an assistant professor at Michigan State University, praised Gamasutra for the diligence with which it shuts down "hostile" comments. Moreover, in O'Donnell's own words, "Gamasutra will shut down negative conversation at least in part because they've had their awareness raised by academics."

During the discussion, Andrew Wilson expressed his dismay that Samantha Allen, the self-proclaimed misandrist mentioned earlier in this article, left games journalism to write for the Daily Dot after engaging in a verbal conflict on Twitter over Giant Bomb's decision to hire "a white guy." To quote Wilson's comment from the transcript itself, "Academia needs to push for more radical positions within the industry" to make it more amenable to people like Allen.

What the journalists and developers only hint at, the academics state clearly. In their writings and their conversations with one another, they do not shy away from declaring that they wish to have influence over the industry and, indeed, over the attitudes of the gamers themselves.

It would not be a stretch to assume that the game journalists have the same goals; when they write a review about sexism and misogyny rather than graphics and gameplay, they are not doing so because of popular demand for this sort of review, but because what they write can shape public opinion. In doing so, they unveil their contempt for their audience, to whom they see themselves as having no obligations of any kind. It is arguably with the very same contempt that they engage in censorship and cronyism: praising a shoddy game made by a friend or a lover and shutting down all discussion about the affair is perfectly fine when the readers don't matter at all.

Nevertheless, there is some indication that readers are taking a stance in regards to how they are being treated. Since the "death of gamers" articles came to light, the website Gamasutra, which has been particularly strident in its anti-gamer rhetoric, has taken a serious hit to its readership. Polygon and Kotaku have also lost a few of their advertisers and affiliates as gamers emailed them about the above-mentioned articles. As one commenter pointed out, there is no faster way to alienate your audience than by describing them a dead demographic, and so it may well be that the feminists, in their attempts to reconstruct the gaming world in their own image, will find themselves marginalized against a growing number of people who rightly see them as wishing to cause harm to their industry.

The outcome of the conflict is yet to be settled, however, and it may be that the actions of both sides will tip the balance one way or another in the coming weeks, as further evidence comes forward and new voices join the fray.

One thing is certain at this time: this clash will be a turning point the industry and will have widespread implications for the "social justice" movements as a whole.

The self-made man: Norah Vincent checking her privilege

AVfM Video Source · 30 September 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Norah Vincent is a lesbian who has lived as a man for 18 months and then wrote the book Self-Made Man: One Woman's Journey Into Manhood and Back Again. The conclusions she reached turned out to be far more different than what she had expected to find in male spaces or about men's behaviour with one another. Here's the ABC 20/20 segment about her experiences as a man. This is a truly revealing video in more ways than many could have imagined. —LV

In His Own Words: How I wound up in the domestic violence industry grinder

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 1 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

"CJ" shares his trip through hell with his ex-girlfriend, a divorced, bisexual, social worker, swinging mother of two. In addition to being emotionally and physically abused by this woman, he was also the victim of false allegations she made to the police.

First of all, I made the mistake of getting involved with a domestic violence industry insider. When we met, I respected "Candi" for her career choice as it seemed noble. In reality, being a domestic violence industry worker made her an especially dangerous and potent false accuser.

It was a long-distance relationship for over three years, on and off again. The last two weeks of it were the worst of my life.

Candi moved to DC from New Jersey in mid-March 2012 to start a job as a social worker. When she applied earlier in the year, I didn't think she would get the job because NJ social services had suspended her. I didn't know why at the time. Of course, it was someone else's fault, and some woman in the office was "out to get her" because she was "jealous."

I found out later that actually she had been fired for making a false allegation of sexual harassment, among other things.

By the time Candi relocated, I didn't love her anymore. I didn't even like her. She was an albatross around my neck that I could not get rid of. The previous three years of her physical attacks, vandalism, theft, bitching, nagging, lying, golden uterus fake-outs, and all-around crazy had taken their toll.

I would actually wince when her name popped up on my caller ID. My heart filled with dread when DC made her an offer and she told me she was moving down. She asked if she could move in with me and I said no, so she claimed she was moving in with a cousin instead.

Her first Sunday in town, she began to text and call, begging me to allow her to stay at my place for a few days because her cousin allegedly backed out of their living arrangement as she was driving down with all of her belongings in her minivan. I knew better and refused, but eventually I let her nag me into it.

After I agreed, I put down the phone, looked at my friend, and said, "I'm gonna regret this." I had no idea how true that statement would prove to be.

Basically, I gave in for the same reason I gave in over and over during the relationship, to get her to STFU, so I could tend to more important things, like my job. Doing so only provided a momentary respite.

She would get her way on something, then move on to the next thing on her "bitchinlist," as I called it. She also had a penchant for harassing my prior exes whenever I refused to get back together with her. That was always fun, being harassed by her on the one end and hearing from an ex-girlfriend who you don't want to hear from on the other that "You need to control your crazy bitch!!!"

Besides, I knew that if I said no, she would show up at my apartment anyway and cause a scene like she had done several times before. I knew the police wouldn't provide me any assistance because they never helped the two times my building concierge called the cops on her or the time she keyed my car.

The second day that she was in my apartment her mail began to arrive at my place. I knew then that the moving in with her cousin was a complete lie. I didn't worry about it because I was closing on a house in Maryland and if she was still in my place at closing I was going to just leave her there.

Those "few days" turned into two and a half weeks of hell. Every day I would come home from work to her incessant bitching, demands, and all-around stank attitude. Every day I would come home to more and more of her belongings littered around my apartment in garbage bags and suitcases. My place had become the pigsty her place always was.

In order to sit on my sofa, I had to move her stuff. Walking through the apartment was treacherous, constantly stepping over bags, trying not to trip into her Chihuahua's shit that she refused to pick up.

Let me clarify. It wasn't that every night she would start bitching as soon as I walked in the door. Some nights it was calm for a few hours, I'd get to heat up my dinner and eat in peace, maybe get to watch a little TV, then her "bitch switch" would go off, usually right before I would go to bed.

She would wake me up in the middle of the night, every night, but there was no rhyme or reason to it. Some nights she would wake me up starting shit—"Why won't you let me into your Facebook, email, or phone?!?!" Other nights she'd wake me up wanting to screw.

Since I'm clarifying things, I would like to go a bit off-topic and explain something I have had to address over and over with lawyers, probation officers, and domestic violence instructors. People often go straight to the sex as if it makes a difference.

They say, "Well, you kept having sex with her…" as if it somehow excuses or justifies her crazy, or that she couldn't have been that horrible of a person, somehow discrediting what you went through. Or they say things like, "She must've been putting it on you!!! Heh, heh, heh," as if you were some virgin putting up with crazy to get laid.

That's backwards.

It is not "I'm going to put up with her crazy so I can get laid" or "I'm getting laid so I'll put up with her crazy." It is rather "She's crazy and I can't get rid of her, so I might as well get laid." Also, with Candi, anytime I refused sex it prompted "What other bitch you fucking?!?!" and back down that rabbit hole we'd go.

Anyway, back to the torment. Any mention or inquiry about her finding her own place brought on her tantrums, so I stopped asking because I was moving anyway.

The third Monday she was staying at my place, I came home from work and she was being all lovey-dovey and affectionate. This made me suspicious.

We had never stopped having sex, but affection was long a thing of the past. She then began to press me about my plans for living arrangements, whether she was going to live with me—make it "official," I guess.

Not getting the responses she wanted from me, she turned sour, back to the Candi I had grown accustomed to. I later discovered that earlier in the day she had gotten my real estate agent's info, called and played the "sistuh gurl" angle, and gleaned info about the closing.

I went to sleep and she woke me up several times bitching. The next morning I got up and got dressed as she stomped around my apartment shooting me evil looks. I left without us speaking a word to each other. When I got to work, she began one of her patented text campaigns.

I had gone through this several times before when I would break up with her or when she would break up with me, then decide she wanted to get back together. This happened so frequently over the previous two years that it became routine.

She wanted me to set up a meeting for that night with a couple in Baltimore that she had been corresponding with on a website. (Candi is a "swinger." When we first met, she claimed her ex-husband forced her into, which I later learned was yet another lie—it was all Candi.)

I refused to meet with the couple. I had gone through this routine several times before and recognized it as her favorite double-bind. If I agreed, she would bitch about it. If I refused, she would bitch about it.

It went further than that. If I had agreed and made plans, she would throw a tantrum shortly before and we would not go, or she would cancel. If I refused, at least it wouldn't turn into the circus she turned things into and I wouldn't put other people through her crazy.

She continued to text me throughout the day. By the end of the day I didn't want to go home to my own apartment that I paid for. I worked late, went to the gym, then agreed to meet a colleague and his boss for a drink. She continued to text, demanding to know my location, accusing me of being with "some other bitch." I replied that I was fed up and that she had to get her stuff and get the hell out of my place that night.

My colleague dropped me off at home. I went in and she wasn't there. I emptied my pockets on the coffee table, moved over a pile of her clothes on the sofa, and sat down. She barged in and snatched my phone off of the table.

It was locked, and in her frustration at not getting in she threw it across the room. I said, "That's it. You have got to get the fuck out right now." I got up, grabbed a pile of her clothes, walked to the front door, and tossed her stuff into the hallway. Standing behind me, she said, "You throw one more thing and I'm calling the cops." I picked up one of her thongs off of the floor and tossed it out. She shoved past me and left. I sat back down on the sofa.

Over the next several minutes she made a few return trips, getting her things and talking shit. After the third or fourth time while she was gone, I got up and closed the door. Then there's a knock at the door. Assuming it was her for more of her stuff, I grabbed a bag and opened the door.

It was a cop.

He walked in and asked me to have a seat as he tracked Chihuahua shit on my rug. Then asked me what was going on. I told him the gist and that she had to leave.

At first he appealed to chivalry.

I told him that I wasn't going for it as I had heard that before from the last cop that came when my concierge called them because she was banging on my door in the middle of the night a few months prior. Then he stated that I could not put her out because, "DC is very pro-tenant." I told him that she was not a tenant, she was a guest, and that guests only possess a license, which is revocable at anytime for any or no reason.

For about 10 minutes he stood there arguing landlord/tenant law with me as cop after cop filed into my apartment. I wondered why so many cops had to watch her get her stuff, and why they all looked so scared and shit. Then some dip-chewing, hillbilly, redneck cop comes in and handcuffs me and tells me he's arresting me for assault. Up until then, no one mentioned or asked me whether any violence had occurred.

Thus began my long journey through the quagmire of the insanely biased domestic violence industry. The next year of my life was filled with biased judges who find guilt to justify having a dedicated domestic violence bench, rookie prosecutors unqualified for cases that require a burden of proof more substantial than "she said so," a negligent lawyer who took the money and ran, self-serving probation officers incentivized to keep a "full caseload," and the domestic violence industry's version of the Ludovico technique—domestic violence classes with instructors that would call Jesus Christ an "abuser" for ~~allowing~~ forcing Mary Magdalene to wash his feet.

And the cherry on top—Candi continued to stalk and harass me for months, and I got no help because, well, I have a penis and she was the "victim."

And people wonder why more men don't call the police when their wife or girlfriend assaults them. Thank you, CJ, for taking the time to revisit this travesty.

In His Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceforMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence: men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

Emma Watson's #HeForShe: Salvage or savage? Both!

August Løvenskiolds · 1 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

At the beginning of modern feminism in 1848 at the Seneca Falls Conference, Frederick Douglass called for men to shut the fuck up and leave the business of women's rights to women:

> Men have very little business here as speakers, anyhow; and if they come here at all they should take back benches and wrap themselves in silence. For this is an International Council, not of men, but of women, and woman should have all the say in it. This is her day in court. I do not mean to exalt the intellect of woman above man's; but I have heard many men speak on this subject, some of them the most eloquent to be found anywhere in the country; and I believe no man, however gifted with thought and speech, can voice the wrongs and present the demands of women with the skill and effect, with the power and authority of woman herself. [See more at: http://www.blackpast.org/1888-frederick-douglass-woman-suffrage#sthash.hIg9XYy7.dpuf]

Of all the internal contradictions of feminism, my favorite is the idea that feminist women want equality with the same evil men who supposedly oppress them. The twin poles of this dilemma—wanting equality yet hating the men who you want equality with—form the basis of a pair of strategies that men in general and members of the MHRM in particular can use to further undermine feminism, both in the popular view and in internal feminist mutual relational aggression.

Did I just write "undermine feminism"? I meant, "hold feminists accountable for the discrepancies in their teachings, policies, and actions." Sorry.

An opportunity to do this occurs in the context of the new and wildly popular #HeForShe campaign kicked off by the craftily faltering speech delivered by the cuddly and harmless actress Emma "Hermione" Watson at the United Nations.

Watson's speech was unusual in that, in addition to the usual feminist bullshit boilerplate, Watson threw some tasty (if poisoned) bones to men:

- For the record, feminism by definition is the belief that men and women should have equal rights and opportunities. Immediately feminist alarms go off because this opens the door for men to claim grievances equally to what women do. Most feminists would delete "men and women" from this formulation and rewrite it to say something like: "feminism by definition is the belief that women should have equal rights and opportunities to men."

- And if you still hate the word [feminism], it is not the word that is important. It's the idea and the ambition behind it…. More feminist alarms—self-identifying as feminists is HUGE among feminists and they actively seek to suppress other groups like MHRAs and #WomanAgainstFeminism who also support legal equality even as those groups dare to hold feminists accountable for discrepancies in their teachings, policies, and actions. Men who support equal rights but are uncomfortable with the feminist label would find it difficult not to be cheered a bit by this line.

- I started questioning gender-based assumptions a long time ago….When at 18, my male friends were unable to express their feelings. More feminist alarms: Watson's acknowledging of social situations where men are disadvantaged is distasteful to narcissistic feminism, which is supposed to be all about women, not men. One feminist wrote: "Telling men that they should care about gender inequality because of how much it hurts them, centralizes men and their well-being in a movement built by women for our survival in a world that degrades and dehumanizes us daily."

- How can we effect change in the world when only half of it is invited or feel welcome to participate in the conversation? Men, I would like to take this opportunity to extend your formal invitation. Gender equality is your issue, too. Feminist heads start exploding—she's letting men into our echo chamber!

At this point in the speech, feminists begin screaming in horror as the sweetly seductive pandering to men begins in rapid-fire fashion:

- I've seen my father's role as a parent being valued less by society, despite my need of his presence as a child, as much as my mother's. I've seen young men suffering from mental illness, unable to ask for help for fear it would make them less of a man. In fact, in the UK, suicide is the biggest killer of men between 20 to 49, eclipsing road accidents, cancer and coronary heart disease. I've seen men made fragile and insecure by a distorted sense of what constitutes male success. Men don't have the benefits of equality, either.

The speech goes on and on in this vein and closes with a double-riff on a phrase used by patriarch men named Hillel and Ronald Reagan: "If not me, who? If not now, when?"

It is not until you go to the HeForShe website to sign their pledge that you learn at the last second that men's equality rights are not included in their campaign at all:

> The HeForShe Commitment
>
> Gender equality is not only a women's issue, it is a human rights issue that requires my participation. I commit to take action against all forms of violence and discrimination faced by women and girls.

Yes, all of Emma Watson's kowtowing speech was a feminist lie, a trolling appeal to men not to stand up for everyone, but for women and girls ONLY. It assumed gullible men (and that is hatred of men) and made a pure appeal to chivalry.

Fuck you, Emma Watson, you liar. Shills like you are worse than cancer.

This is a bait-and-switch scam. It is yet another betrayal of men and our concerns and as such demands a strong and relentless counterattack.

My recommendation is a two-pronged pincer attack I call "Salvage & Savage":

On one prong, "Salvage," we ignore the bogus pledge, take Emma Watson at her word, and use the invitation she extended to men to seek entry into feminist strongholds. Once there, we can ask questions like "Do feminists think men are important and our issues matter?" This will generate immediate hateful backlash from feminists, and we can then point out the cognitive dissonance of inviting men to the dialogue and then telling them to shut up. This won't convince hard-core man-haters, of course, but the younger, more naive, and idealistic feminists will witness this hatred and slowly start melting away, perhaps defecting to men's rights or #WomenAgainstFeminism in the fullness of time.

On the other prong, "Savage," we call out Watson on her bullshit and hold her personally responsible for this betrayal.

As Fidelbogen has pointed out, the real goal of feminism is to provide comfort and convenience to women:

> #Feminism's mission will b accomplished when it finally achieves perfect comfort & convenience 4 all women @ all times.#womenagainstfeminism
>
> — Fidelbogen (@fidelbogen) September 27, 2014

With a clear vision and careful management, "Salvage & Savage" could turn the #HeForShe campaign into the most uncomfortable, embarrassing, and inconvenient debacle feminists have ever encountered since they started silencing men at Seneca Falls in 1848.

I remember Mama: One man (and boy's) odyssey through abuse

Dr. Edward Rhymes · 1 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Born in the 1960s to a 14-year-old mother, I am one of those individuals who came into the world at a time when the word "Negro" was still being placed on birth certificates. Without the requisite skills or resources to care for her child, a tiny bundle with asthma, I was placed in a foster home and there I stayed for the first six years of my life. It was a wonderful family and I was reared in an atmosphere of kindness, responsibility, and love. Although my foster parents very much wanted to adopt me, they acquiesced to my mother's desire to regain custody.

I left a secure home where I was the youngest of eight to live as an only child with a mother who was still a stranger to me, despite her frequent visits while I lived with my foster family. It seemed to have not crossed her mind that I would require some time and help in acclimating to this reality-jarring change.

The newness and the ecstasy of having the child she had waited so long for lasted for a little while—just a little while. What followed was a childhood scarred by psychological, emotional, and physical abuse. When I was as young as seven, my mother had introduced me to phrases such as "I hate you," "I can't stand you," and "You make me sick." Beginning at a tender age, my body was frequently visited with blows from her fists, the backs of her hands, and even her feet. My mother, who was not a small woman, would sometimes knock me to the ground, press her knee into my chest, and pummel me with punch after punch. There were times when family members would have to pull her off me.

While I was being physically assaulted, and even when I wasn't, verbal abuse (which included blaming me for her drinking problem) was an ever-present feature in my mother's communications with me. At eight years old, I had an epiphany (a memory still deeply etched in my mind): Her view of me would not be my view of myself. It was liberating in that even though the abuse didn't stop, my spirit survived.

Let me be clear, though: I wasn't without human refuge. My favorite uncle and maternal grandmother did what they could to help me, and I honor their devotion to me.

The oft-times excruciating journey of my childhood still, to this day, evokes a deep emotional response among those in my family who lament that they could have and should have done more to protect me. Yet I and many other men who have traveled this same agonizing road are told that our narrative is trivial because we are men and because we were abused by our mothers. This attitude is bewildering and perplexing in light of the very consistent data that tells us that in America stories of abuse at the hands of a mother are more common than those involving paternal abuse.

The pain, by the numbers

Department of Health and Human Services statistics show that from 2001 to 2006, of the children who were abused by one parent, approximately 71% were abused by their mothers, while 29.4% were abused by their fathers. The report goes on to state that of children who died at the hands of one parent during that same five-year period, approximately 71% were killed by their mothers, while 29.2% were killed by their fathers.

Moving to the 2009 DHHS report, the percentages for child fatalities committed by parents break down like so: 22.5% by both parents, 14.8% committed by fathers alone, and 27.3% perpetrated by mothers alone.

In still another DHHS report from 2012, we find that 27.1% of child deaths resulting from abuse or neglect were committed by mothers, compared with 17.1% committed by fathers. Mothers and fathers acting together accounted for 21.2% of child deaths.

We also see that of the 2.9 million child abuse cases in 2012, 45.3% of the perpetrators were male, but 53.5% were female. This same report points out that although abuse inflicted upon boys and girls was fairly even, boys constituted approximately 60% of those who are killed as a result of abuse or neglect. All of this tells us that for quite some time the numbers point to maternal child abuse being predominant, and yet the image we have chosen to highlight the issue is a battered child cowering in a corner with a brooding and belligerent father hovering over her.

Let's also consider this: In the wake of the Adrian Peterson child abuse allegations, it was his mother who stepped forward and said Peterson was doing what she raised him to do. My point here isn't whether one agrees or disagrees with his parenting methods but that the response would have been quite different had Peterson's father been the one who had come forward and said, "That's how I reared my son." Can we honestly say that wouldn't have been offered up as proof positive of how abusive men are?

There is a great deal of understanding we extend to women and girls who have been abused who then, in turn, engage in inappropriate and abusive behavior. It's an understanding, however, that abused men and boys, who do likewise, don't equally enjoy.

So what do we tell the millions of boys and girls abused by their mothers or women? Do we say, "Your pain is persona non grata because somehow it's not as bad when Mommy abuses you?" This is domestic violence at its most tragic, and yet we continue to either excuse or ignore 53.5% of the perpetrators; 53.5% of the problem. This traps men and boys in a purgatory of pain aided and abetted by the destructive gender stereotype employed by men and women alike: "He's a guy, he can take it."

It's time to stop treating the abuse of boys and men as some sort of competing narrative when it comes to domestic and intimate partner violence. Simply put, abuse hurts, no matter who is being abused. The outward scars and the inner wounds don't discriminate according to gender. To be continually told that my (our) hurt is negligible because more women are hurting than men is not only callous, it's unacceptable. It's like telling someone who's lost a child that they have no right to grieve because a person who lives down the street lost three. While it may be true, it does nothing to diminish that person's pain.

Domestic violence and abuse against boys and men is not a kind of imaginary or ginned-up specter like voting fraud, where one has a better chance of being struck by lightning than it occurring. No, something that occurs every 38 seconds and includes approximately 840,000 men and affects 1.5 million children cannot be considered as some random occurrence. To those who would try to squash my all-too-familiar narrative: Your pain doesn't cancel out mine and your legitimate grievances don't render mine illegitimate. You don't get to tell me where my hurting begins and ends, nor do you get to construct the boundaries for its rightful expression.

Is sympathy and empathy for the suffering of abuse victims to be decided by a flip of a coin? Did women and girls win some sort of psychological and emotional version of The Hunger Games that allows only one tribe to lay claim to the "prize" of compassion? If that is indeed the case, then we are not serious about dealing with domestic violence. And if we are not serious, we have revealed that it is not reformation in our relationships that we seek but rather retribution.

Meet Erin Pizzey

Erin Pizzey is not a household name, but in domestic violence activism circles, she is somewhat of a legend and pioneer. She established the world's first refuge for battered women in 1971, Chiswick Women's Aid, the organization known today as Refuge. She also wrote the groundbreaking book, Scream Quietly or the Neighbours Will Hear. Published in 1974, it is considered to be the first book written on domestic violence against women.

Today, Pizzey is demonized by most in the feminist movement and banned from the very organization that she founded. And what was her unforgivable transgression? Her research led her to the conclusion that most domestic violence is reciprocal and that women are equally as capable of violence as men.

In her essay "Who's Failing the Family," she states, "I was very aware that while many of the women were indeed 'innocent victims of their partner's violence,' many were not. Of the first hundred women that came into my refuge, sixty-two were as violent as the men they left. They were not 'victims of their partner's violence.' They were 'victims of their own violence.' Most of these women had experienced sexual abuse and violence in their own childhoods. Not only were they violent in the refuge but they were also violent and abusive to their children."

As a result of her findings, Pizzey shifted her focus from a strictly "female as victim" treatment model to that of a holistic, therapeutic family approach.

In countless interviews Pizzey has spoken of being subjected to a campaign of harassment. She has described posses of screaming female hecklers waiting for her anywhere she was meant to appear. Further, she said, "Abusive telephone calls to my home, death threats and bomb scares, became a way of living for me and for my family. Finally, the bomb squad asked me to have all my mail delivered to their headquarters."

Her bona fides on the issue of domestic violence are well established, yet Pizzey's ordeal shows that we are repeatedly being asked to enter a conversation on domestic violence in which the conclusions are already drawn, certain assumptions fixed, and the parameters of the dialogue already set.

Definitely not one size fits all

We have lost so much by making domestic and intimate partner violence only about the extremes and about size and strength differentials. Then again, we are a society of sensationalists whose attention can only be drawn to extreme cases. We gravitate toward the incidents that explode on social media or those that run in seemingly endless loops courtesy of the mainstream media. But in doing so we fail to realize, again and again, that it is what happens during the course of our everyday lives that leads to the severe.

Women fought for years to get the American public to understand that rape isn't fundamentally about sex but about control and dominance. Yet by primarily focusing on domestic violence as merely a matter of physical size and strength, we make it only about men. The shattering of trust and the inflicting of pain is not a province where only the male of the species dwells. A strategy that says we only need to have a sit-down with men when it comes to the issue of domestic violence is a tragically flawed strategy.

The "success" of this abuse lies primarily in what women and men, both, expect from men: men don't talk; men won't tell. All abuse is usually shrouded in some sort of secrecy, but this concealment is exacerbated for men because of the notions of manhood that have been drilled into our consciousness by our fathers and, yes, our mothers alike.

The constant denial of the data and the excusing of abusive behavior dehumanizes and makes caricatures of women. How so, you ask? To be fully human means that one is equally capable of being hurt and being hurtful. There are too many men and boys—this one included—who can say, "I've been abused and it was my mother who did it," and that pain cannot be denied, silenced, or ignored. The battered, bruised, and deprived bodies of the innocents, the tiny corpses, tell the story that we, apparently, dare not tell.

Talking to the boy

In my lifetime I've occupied spaces that are considered testosterone-only domains: I played college football, enlisted in the Marines, was a high school football coach, worked with former and current NFL players, and had been, at one time, a rock-solid 6'1", 250 lbs. Yes, I lifted heavy weights, but I couldn't, in and of myself, lift the heaviness of the abuse I had suffered. This isn't difficult to understand because after that lightning-strike of revelation in my eight year-old mind, there were many times when I refused, in defiance, to cry; I refused to acknowledge that my mother could hurt me.

So, I let the pain sit, like the proverbial unacknowledged elephant in the room. Yet, as time went on, I began to realize a freeing truth: That which helps us survive at one point in our lives can be the very thing that prevents the catharsis we need at another stage. In other words, we have to remove the tourniquet in order for the surgeon to do the work.

One day came, however, when I started walking down the road of healing and deliverance. I am now many miles and many years from where and when it all began. I'm free of the bitterness, but I still carry the wounds. I once thought that the man I am must reach back to the boy I was, but I have found that to be untrue. It is the boy, that eight-year-old boy, who calls to the man. He tells the man, "It wasn't our fault. It's okay to cry." The man has wondered many times, "Why all the suffering?" but the boy tells him to use it to help others. The boy urges me: "Come out the shadows and tell our story." I've come to cherish my conversations with him. Without the radiant sun of hope rising on the horizon of his young spirit, I wouldn't be the man that I am today. He, my faith, and the love of a wonderful wife have helped to heal the once-unspoken pain, the undeclared hurt.

This issue includes my individual story and suffering, and yet the issue is also larger than just that. It doesn't matter who will or who won't acknowledge my pain and my experience, you see, because I hear the boy.

How to disprove Sage Gerard and destroy KSUM

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 1 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

KSU Men (KSUM) has stirred up controversy, particularly through AVfM's sponsorship (which is only one of many) and Paul Elam's quotes on rape prevention being taken out of context yet again. You can pick up on the pertinent vibe in the comment section of this Sentinel article.

Needless to say, I have skimmed a smorgasbord of petulant emails on how KSUM is misguided from students and faculty who have yet to attend a meeting. Those emails I choose to reply to are filled with stock prevarications.

I expected this lunacy, and of course I am prepared to make a statement.

KSU students, you can destroy KSUM today, and I am going to tell you how to do it.

All you need to do is catch up on missed work for men and boys and demonstrate enough humility to critique your own preconceptions on gender using logic and courage as your guides. So long as those things are accomplished by passionate students on campus, KSUM has no reason to exist.

That said, there is a lot of missed work that has not been addressed, let alone questioned by feminist students. KSU RAD Systems is based on harmful preconceptions and is a risk for male students. The IPV center has gynocentric branding that makes it harder for male victims of IPV to know there is help available to them. The literature in the Interdisciplinary Studies department is predominately feminist, leaving no room for compassionate exploration of the male perspective outside of the myth of hegemonic masculinity.

And that's for starters.

You may have heard of our conference, Male Students in Peril, which is 100% free to attend. Like other organizers, we want people to RSVP. We have fascinating things to talk about; a low turnout is a non-issue. However, you have always had a chance to demonstrate any error in my ways, and I have been telling you how in two simple words over and over again:

Show up.

For a while, KSU Men was a one-man show. I walked and drove hundreds of miles, worked with administrators, set up tables, investigated programs, and researched legal division documentation, among other thankless activities done at the expense of myself and donors. I have invested serious personal finances in KSUM and have been cognizant of the lifestyles of others in my work. At no point did I encourage a policy or procedure that is in any way harmful to any person, but rather evens out the representation gap between men and women on campus.

Imagine your work speaking to a willingly deaf crowd.

Every last judgmental spectator has never bothered to talk to me face to face or take the time to come to a meeting. Even though feminists have been invited to attend meetings and present their cases, they remained content to spread rumors with nothing to support them but conjecture.

And people continue to insinuate that I'm a threat to critical thought.

I am not offended by this state of affairs, but rather amused and expectant. Every turd thrown by chimps caged by ideology is more evidence that we live in a culture of fear, conjecture, and shit.

KSU students, let action back words, not speculation. If you care about gender equity on campus, then be ready to sweat and cry under the heat of hard work and the childish judgments of the idle. Spouting accusations and opinions is your right, but so long as you have no experience or facts to give your words teeth, don't be surprised if KSUM never goes away.

If you want to end KSUM right now, then do KSUM's job better. There are other groups and departments that are more established than KSUM, such as the Women's Resource and Interpersonal Violence Prevention Center and the Interdisciplinary Studies department. The problem is that they show no interest in making a difference, and some faculty therein have actually acted as obstacles to building an equitable campus.

You can start a conference on men's issues. You can come to Male Students in Peril and calmly question the speakers as much as you wish for the sake of discussion. You can invite your friends and make this an enlightening, diverse experience.

So far, you didn't do any of those things. But what if you did?

By being the kind of campus KSUM has always called for, you render KSUM obsolete and I want that to happen.

I cannot speak for others, but I know that every Men's Rights Activist wants to hear that they are no longer needed because the evidence shows men have representation and compassion from society.

What relief that news would bring! It's a shame that the evidence points to the opposite.

I'd much rather live in a world where KSUM was not needed, but it is needed, and it is up to each and every one of you to take the first step out of your fears, ruminations, and feminist-approved propaganda to explore a renewed compassion of gender for yourself. KSUM is here to facilitate that in an effort to render itself obsolete!

I threw my career and my reputation in public crosshairs knowing that reasonable people would not fire. But so long as you fear KSUM, spread rumors about it, and make accusations against its members, KSUM gains power. Every vitriolic comment is another expression of a culture of conjecture in which people believe what their fears tell them to believe, and not their reason.

Will you be different? Will you set the example of a university student by exercising your curiosity and passion, or will you be the next insecure pundit, shrieking politically fashionable opinions for approval from your fellow church-goers? Are you a better university than others, and are you prepared to prove it with hard work?

Look, you don't need to agree with everything I say, and you don't need to make any substantial lifestyle changes to demonstrate your concern for equity. But you don't get to be right without doing the work.

If you want to be taken seriously in our mutual quest to render KSUM obsolete, then show up to meetings in Clendenin room 3050 every Monday and Thursday at 4:30 PM EST, and RSVP for our upcoming conference. You are within walking distance of everything KSUM has to offer, so there is no excuse to be the passive-aggressive coward who offers nothing but a reason for KSUM to keep doing what it's doing.

KSU students decide what happens to student organizations, so will KSUM be obsolete or a permanent part of campus life?

It all boils down to compassion versus cowardice. For what I hope are obvious reasons, I respect the compassionate but do not respect the cowardly.

Now pick a team.

#HeForShe ain’t for me

AVfM Video Source · 1 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Are we done beating this horse? No, not til it’s dead. That Guy T has more to say.

You may want to subscribe.

20 attorneys send stunning letter to US Senators regarding due process in handling of campus sexual assault allegations

AVFM · 2 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Dear Senators:

We are a group of attorneys with specific experience in cases that involve students who have been accused of a campus sexual assault.

There is little doubt that sexual assault on the nation's college campuses is a significant problem and, in general, is poorly handled by the colleges. As lawyers with direct experience regarding this issue, we want to take this opportunity to commend you for your leadership in the search for a solution.

We are concerned that the complexity of the problem and the momentum to find a solution to the manner in which colleges handle these matters will overwhelm any effort to ensure fair treatment to and protect the rights of the accused – particularly with respect to due process, impartiality, and the collection of evidence.

Senator McCaskill's hearings and report, "Sexual Violence on Campus," followed by the proposed "Campus Accountability and Safety Act," while appropriately focused on institutional reporting of sexual assaults, fail to adequately address the rights of the accused with respect to the adjudication of sexual assault allegations. We observed that the subhead to Senator McCaskill's report reads, "How too many institutions of higher education are failing to protect students." We agree that the college adjudication process is indeed failing to "protect students." However, the report and proposed legislation are not focused on protecting all students, but only those students who allege that they are "victims" of sexual assault. The proposed legislation refers to "victim" or "victims" 34 times, and to the "accused" just once. Tellingly, the proposed legislation never once uses the term "alleged" victim, or victim of "alleged" sexual assault, or "accuser." By presuming that all accusers are in fact "victims" prior to any investigation or adjudication, the proposed legislation does a grave disservice to those accused of serious sexual offenses by ignoring a concept at the core of due process, innocent until proven guilty.

This is a significant omission. Those who have been accused of sexual assault face potentially life-altering consequences from an adverse decision by their schools.[1] As lawyers, our goal is to impress upon you the necessity to ensure not only that accusers' complaints are appropriately investigated and, where warranted, adjudicated, but also that the accused are treated fairly and equitably, consistent with the U.S. Constitution and principles of equality under the law embodied in Title IX. No person should have to give up his or her right to a fair and equitable process involving accusations of serious sexual misconduct just because he or she happens to be a college student.

[1] We recommend that you review recent reporting on the issue by NPR ("Some Accused of Sexual Assault Say the System Works Against Them," September 3, 2014, http://www.npr.org/2014/09/03/345312997/some-accused-of-campus-assault-say-the-system-works-against-them), and The Chronicle of Higher Education ("Presumed Guilty," September 1, 2014, http://chronicle.com/article/Presumed-Guilty/148529/), both of which describe the devastating, deep and long-lasting impact on those wrongly accused of sexual assault who are denied fair and equitable treatment by their colleges in investigating and adjudicating alleged sexual misconduct.

TOWARD BALANCED LEGISLATION

We have several observations and recommendations to make regarding the proposed legislation to ensure a more balanced process for all involved.

When to Involve Law Enforcement

We commend the proposed legislation's inclusion of a provision requiring colleges to formalize their relationship with local law enforcement, but the legislation needs to go further. There is broad consensus that colleges are ill equipped to investigate and adjudicate sexual assault accusations. Accordingly, we believe that matters involving alleged sexual assault are best handled by law enforcement and, as such, colleges ideally should be required by your legislation to refer such matters to local law enforcement.

At a minimum, schools should be required to defer any investigation or adjudication of allegations of sexual assault until law enforcement has completed its investigation. This deferral would permit law enforcement to complete an investigation without the risk of undue interference and protects students' Fifth Amendment right to remain silent (as schools may require a student to provide a statement during an internal investigation or at an adjudicatory hearing).

We realize that Congress is unlikely to require that local law enforcement officials bear sole responsibility for investigating or adjudicating all campus sexual assault cases, whether the alleged incident occurred on or off campus. Consequently, we believe strongly that basic principles of fairness and due process with respect to the rights of the accused will need to be adhered to if an objective and equitable college-based process is to emerge successfully from your efforts. To that end, we make the following recommendations:

College Processes and Procedures

Investigation

- We share the concern expressed by many commentators about the proposed legislation's requirement that colleges hire a confidential advisor who may serve in multiple roles as the initial investigator, advisor, and advocate for "victims" of alleged sexual assault. We strongly recommend that these conflicting functions not be assigned to the same individual. To ensure fairness, the advisor/advocate must be separate from, and independent of, the investigation.

- The accused should be afforded the same opportunity to have a trained advisor/advocate as does the accuser, also independent of the investigation.

- Investigations must be conducted by trained, professional investigators. If these investigators are not official law enforcement personnel, they probably should have law enforcement experience. They must be sufficiently trained to conduct a thorough initial inquiry so that the college has an impartial factual foundation to determine whether a criminal referral is warranted, whether safety issues exist, or whether the investigation should continue to be conducted by the college on the basis of a possible violation of the school's code of student conduct. Investigators should be required to adhere to standards of due process, including an accused student's right against self-incrimination, and the processes that are established must not trammel that right or impair an accused's ability to defend him or herself while remaining silent.

Adjudication

If colleges are going to continue to be required or expected to adjudicate sexual assault allegations, then they must accord students accused of sexual assault basic due process rights, as well as provide a fair and equitable process for all involved, including but not necessarily limited to the following:

- The right to advice of counsel (for both parties) throughout the investigation and through the disciplinary process, even if at the disciplinary hearing the attorneys are not allowed to speak.

- The right to effectively cross-examine, perhaps through a third party advocate. We are mindful of the concerns raised by many regarding a direct confrontation by either party of the other; however, as lawyers, we are also concerned about the abandonment of the traditional role of cross-examination in the truth-finding process.

- Timely access to written complaints and evidence. In our experience, it is not unusual for colleges to permit access to written complaints, witness lists, investigation reports, and evidence to be presented to the hearing panel as little as 48 hours before the disciplinary hearing. Both parties need adequate time to review all relevant materials – with advice of counsel – sufficiently in advance of the hearing in order to have a meaningful opportunity to prepare his or her case and defenses.

- Timely and adequate notice of the actual charges against the accused. Oftentimes, in the cases we have handled, the parties are not notified of the charges until several days before the hearing. That sort of practice is unfair to both the accuser and the accused.
- Elimination of gag orders or confidentiality provisions impeding the ability of either party to talk to witnesses and gather evidence.
- The exclusion of blatantly unreliable hearsay evidence. We are not suggesting that school hearing panels should be required to adhere to the rules of evidence, like courts. But the panels have an obligation to assure that all evidence presented contains sufficient indicia of reliability.
- Hearing panels composed of thoroughly trained personnel and excluding students or others who may have a prior history suggesting a potential lack of impartiality.[2]

If the accused is found not responsible for the alleged sexual assault, there should be no option for the accuser to appeal the determination, as that involves double jeopardy in the college adjudication process.

[2] The proposed legislation already includes a provision with which we agree recommending that students not be permitted to participate on college disciplinary panels.

Training

We agree that disciplinary hearing panels must be composed of well-trained personnel, but we are concerned about the training they will receive. For example, there have been reports in the media that some advocates in the sexual assault survivor community believe hearing panel members should be instructed to distrust an accused student who testifies logically and rationally about the events at issue, or that "victims" of sexual assault never make false accusations. Such biased standards have no place on any college disciplinary panel. Panel members should be trained regarding the paramount importance of impartiality, evidence, and due process rights. The training of hearing panel members must be completely transparent; the materials they are given, the lectures and seminars they attend, the written and oral instructions they are given, and the standards they are told to use must be published by the colleges with their sexual assault policies and procedures, and must be made available to the accused and accuser.

Standard of Proof

We believe that college disciplinary proceedings involving allegations of sexual assault should apply a clear and convincing standard to the evidence rather than the preponderance of the evidence standard advocated in the 2011 "Dear Colleague" letter (which, as administrative agency "guidance," does not have the force of law). We are heartened that your proposed legislation does not mandate any standard of proof and believe that colleges should be able to use a higher standard. However, we realize that the majority of the schools do and may continue to apply the lowest standard pursuant to the Dear Colleague letter.

CONCLUSION

In an op-ed published in the Wall Street Journal last year[3], mother, attorney and self-described feminist Judith Grossman recounted the ordeal her son and family went through when he was falsely accused of sexual assault, and a blatantly biased adjudication process was foisted upon him.

There was no preliminary inquiry on the part of anyone at the school into these accusations about behavior alleged to have taken place a few years earlier, no consideration of the possibility that jealousy or revenge might be motivating a spurned young ex-lover to lash out. Worst of all, my son would not be afforded a presumption of innocence. Who knew that American college students are required to surrender the Bill of Rights at the campus gates?

We support your efforts to develop a fair solution to the problem of campus sexual assault. While your legislation is a start, as it stands now it falls short of ensuring objective, fair treatment for all involved. But we see a way forward. We realize that the legislative process is evolutionary and developmental in nature. If there is any way any of us can lend our expertise to assist you as you refine your Bill, we are ready to do so. If you have any thoughts or questions please feel free to contact Patricia Hamill at the law firm of Conrad O'Brien, 215.864.8071, or phamill@conradobrien.com, Michael Allen at Michael K. Allen & Associates, 513.321.5297, or mike@mkallenlaw.com, or any of the other undersigned attorneys.

[3] Grossman, Judith E. (2013, April 16) Judith Grossman: A Mother, a Feminist, Aghast. The Wall Street Journal. http://online.wsj.com/news/articles/SB10001424127887324600704578405280211043510

Thank you.

Patricia Hamill, Esquire

Michael K. Allen, Esquire

Josh Engel, Esquire

Andrew T. Miltenberg, Esquire

Kimberly C. Lau, Esquire

John W. Gresham, Esquire

Steve Meister, Esquire

Kenneth M. Dubrow, Esquire

Laura Fine Moro, Esquire

Sidney L. Gold, Esquire

William Spade, Esquire

Eileen Hurley, Esquire

James A. Funt, Esquire

Mark M. Hathaway, Esquire

Eric J. Rosenberg, Esquire

Matthew Kaiser, Esquire

Justin Dillon, Esquire

Stephen F. Becker, Esquire

Cynthia P. Garrett, Esquire

Harvey A. Silverglate, Esquire

Reyhaneh Jabbari, an éxpose on international corruption of feminism: Part 2

Ali Mehraspand · 2 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

In part 1, we discussed a case from Afghanistan and the corruption of a Dr. Sarwari of Women for Afghan Women, a made-up story published in The New York Times that reverberated on the web here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, here, and many other sites based solely on the ~~claims~~ lies in the New York Times.

In this part, we'll discuss a very hot case out of Iran, namely that of Rayhaneh Jabbari. This case has been receiving world-wide attention in the past few months, which has soared as the execution which was supposed to be carried out on Tuesday has been postponed for another 10 days in order to give her another chance to get blood owners' consent to let off the death penalty. There is a worldwide campaign to save her from the death penalty, currently with 191,000 signatures on it. A new petition has started just now. She now has a wikipedia page. Academy Award-winning Asghar Farhadi, along with many artists, professional athletes, and other well-known individuals, are making efforts to save Jabbari. There are even protests in different countries to stop her execution.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fXzvXL96Wao

As the international pressures resulted in postponing the execution, the news is now reverberating in all publications including U.S. Department of State, BBC, CNN, The Independent. The news around this case grows exponentially, so you can do a google search yourself. Some of the articles concerning the story you can find at The Slate Magazine, The Independent, The Australian, and a thousand others which you can find easily yourself.

For the many slows out there, I am not for the death penalty. I also cannot help noticing that when rarely women are given the death penalty, the outcry of lies start, but when men get the death penalty for very, very milder offenses (98% of death penalties are given to men), everybody is silent.

[image]

The Telegraph says that "Iran rape victim is bound for gallows." Don't be naive to think that the lies just come from the women's groups. There is a comfy-cozy relationship between those groups and those interested in their stories; the media deliberately misinforms, as is evident in this case among many other ones.

So what is the story as narrated by women's groups, all the international media, and the many who have signed or advertised for the campaign to lift the death penalty?

At the time of the murder seven years ago, Reyhaneh Jabbari was a 19-year-old interior decorator. Morteza Sarbandi, an intelligence officer, asks her to come decorate his office. He insists on driving Reyhaneh to the supposed place for decoration. On the way, he stops to buy a date rape drug from the pharmacy. When they get there, he locks the door and attacks Reyhaneh to rape her. During the struggle, Reyhaneh strikes her attacker with a knife that simply strikes his shoulder, but he dies anyway. Now, she is a 26-year old victim of (attempted) rape who has been convicted of murder.

I must add at this point that in Islamic laws, murder is punishable by death if the victim's survivors (or blood owners) choose so. On the other hand, they can forgive the murderer or receive the blood money (Diah) instead, in which case the murderer will not be executed.

The son of the murdered man says his father was a physician and an ex-intelligence officer. As satellite channels advertise for Reyhaneh's campaign and the case has received worldwide attention, unlike many similar cases before, this time since the judge of this case has retired, he was interviewed by Entekhab and reveals the truth. This interview is long and I have extracted parts of it here:

Mr. Tardast, you have been the judge for the case of Reihaneh Jabbari, after seven years, do you still believe that she is a murderer?

What can change my mind after close and profound inspection of the case which as specified by the law, was examined and handled by five judges.… Anybody who reads the 24 page report of the case will vote for its truth…. It was examined on top of all that by thirteen Supreme Court judges and not a single one voted against the verdict.

There is now the "campaign of supporting Reihaneh," have you seen their contents?

I have seen the articles and views and I am sorry for Iran's weakness in responding to centers for spreading lies. I have personally done my best in every case to convince victims' families to forgive the murderer and not demand execution; I have thanked God every time I have been successful in that in similar cases. But with the invasion of agenda-driven groups on this case and spreading lies and accusations against the victim, the victim's family are now holding a grudge and won't consent to forgiving the murderer.

Where does the family of the murdered stand on consenting to let off the death penalty?

Once in court, I told them that even if the defendant has chosen a poor way for defense and have upset and disturbed you this way, consider that your father has made a sin having an affair, so please forgive this poor girl. But they told me: "First of all, this lady is not regretful at all. Secondly, instead of the truth, they now call my father a rapist."

Honesty and regret would have helped the family forgive and relieve her of death sentence?

Yes, if instead of lies to get foreign citizenship, Ms. Jabbari had shown honesty and regret, she would have a good chance like many other cases.

How was the state of mind of Reihaneh Jabbari?

It was in a way that in an SMS to one of her boyfriends, she said she intended to murder her father. In court she said that she was a victim of her father's violence when he drank.

Has the confessions of Reihaneh been given under duress?

Almost none of the key evidences come from her statements during the first interrogation, rather from her statements in court at the side of her lawyers. She so easily and relaxed talked about her deeds.

In social media, her ex-lawyer Mr. Mostafayi has claimed that the door was locked, because the door is so filled with strikes of knife that it shows she couldn't open the door. Is that true?

It is an absolute lie. This Mr. I-am-human-rights acts like a corrupt politician. The accused has repeatedly stated in the court that the door was not locked. After plunging a 10-inch long blade that she bought two days prior to the murder, she left the scene pretty easily. The crime scene also shows that the door is not "filled with strikes of knife." There is the evidence for one strike of a sharp object. When asked "why did you strike the door?" She said: "'cause I was excited and in a hurry." When asked "was the door locked?" She replied: "No it wasn't… After I plunged the knife, he threw a chair at me, I exited using the elevator and he used the stairs." He died after climbing down two stories.

What did Reihaneh do after she exited?

She says: "I hid in the street, and waited. When I saw the ambulance and the Police, I took a taxi home."

Did the neighbors hear Reihaneh cry for help or anything?

The crime scene is a five-story building such that the least bit of cry would be heard easily. In the questionings, the neighbors said that they only heard an object strike the wall which was the chair thrown by the victim.

Was the relationship of Reihaneh with the murdered only concerning her job?

Ms. Jabbari said at least three times in the court that "I used to give him services in return for benefits." It had nothing to do with interior decorations. In their slang, what they mean by "giving services" is to have sex. In addition to having a fiancé and a boyfriend, she also had affairs with multiple people simultaneously including the manager where she worked, which resulted to having disputes with her fiancé.… This is an SMS from her fiancé to her: "You said goodbye to me when you started sleeping with…, dirt. This was my last SMS to you."

Given the age difference between them, why did they have a relationship?

As stated and recorded in the case, she says regarding her relation with an older man (the murdered): "I wanted to give some controlled services and get some benefits. I wanted to prove that I can be independent without my family's help." Regarding how they met, she says: "On the street, he had a Toyota Camry [Cars are four times more expensive in Iran than anywhere else.—AM]. He stopped for me and I got in.… We exchanged numbers." They had an affair weeks before the murder, they went to restaurants, were in touch constantly as their symcard messages show. On the day of the crime, the murdered came to her work to pick her up as planned. Her colleagues testified that when a Toyota Camry came to pick her up, she told them that he is her father's friend, and that they want to buy the car. They even brought eggs for good luck.

Considering your thirty years of experience what do you think her motivation was?

For a solid investigation of the case, I appointed a female psychologist to the case to closely examine and interview the murderess and comment. The psychologist believed that the murderess suffered from an extreme case of narcissism. Her mindset contributed to her murder, but she had not suffered from any form of insanity to be absolved. Plus, since the murdered travelled a lot for trading medical equipment, he had promised her with trips to Europe which he didn't keep and resulted in her anger. He also had promised to give her the Toyota for a Thursday out-of-town picnic with her friends at work which he didn't do; this also raged her a great deal. She said she was embarrassed in front of her friends.

Did Reihaneh plan for the murder?

[I must explain at this point that the ritual for Islamic prayers usually involves a form of soft rug called Sajaddeh, which the person sets up and then says the prayer.—AM.]

Reihaneh is not in the habit of being manipulated and never tolerates "not receiving benefits in return for her services." That day when the murdered asked: "Take off your scarf [veil covering hair—AM]," she refused. When asked if he did any act of coercion and if he turned and moved away from her, she replies: "He went to say his prayers." The blood spatter analysis on the Sajaddeh and the chair also confirms that he was saying the prayer at the time of murder and had his back to her.

Was the plunging of the knife lethal?

The knife went into his lungs. Forensic results contradict Mr. Mostafayi's claim that "she just had a simple strike to the shoulder."… The murdered had bought condoms on the way there, which he had put on the table right in front of her.

It is claimed that Reihaneh's drink was spiked. Did you send the glasses to the lab?

There were two glasses, both of which were tested. The reports show that one of the glasses contained Difnoxilat which is a laxative.

Do you concur with efforts to make the blood owner's consent for lifting the death penalty?

… Although I have retired and although it is their right to have the execution according to Islamic laws, I am ready to do everything within my means to get the blood owner's consent.

UPDATE: The execution of Reihaneh Jabbari has been postponed for another 10 days to give her a chance to get the consent of the victim's family to let off the death penalty. The family have formally stated for quite a while that they are willing to forgive Rayhaneh Jabbari, provided that she comes out with the truth. Two nights ago, BBC Farsi brought a women's activist to discuss the case. When asked "What does the son of Mr. Sarbandi mean by truth?" she replied:"What truth? Who knows what they mean?" Despite women's groups lying through their teeth, the family has stated that they will ask for the death penalty to be rescinded if she comes out with the truth regarding the two following questions:

When she committed the murder, a male accomplice was waiting for her and entered the room, this is why the victim followed them. Reihaneh has referred to this accomplice as "Sh." The family demands his identity.

Secondly, the family demands the real reason for the murder as opposed to the false accusation of rape.

Why aren't these "women's groups" in support of getting these questions answered?

Note: A short update is available here. –Eds.

Oh, Danny Boy, the ink, the ink is calling

Paul Elam · 2 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

BEARD OF COMPASSION BECOMES THE ARM OF ACTIVISM

This is more of an announcement than an article, but I wanted to make sure that everyone saw it.

As many of you know I recently had a hangout with Dannyboy, that Canadian dude that puts the A in MRA. In it, he pledged to get a tattoo bearing the name of this website and the now sacred expression, “Fuck Their Shit Up” on his arm, if we reached the $10,000 mark of our fundraiser by Friday.

Well, it is barely into Thursday here, according to my calendar and clock, and it looks like some ink is in Danny’s future. Many of your responded to his challenge, and a particularly generous donor just put us over the mark a few minutes ago. Quick David, grab your laptop!

I know I can already speak for Danny (and myself) by saying the response was greatly appreciated, and that he looks forward to taking on the Mark of the Beast as quickly as possible. Video will be taken of the event and of course I will have Danny back for another discussion on YouTube after the deed is done. Danny also says that the fundraiser is still not as close to goal as he would like.

This is very cool. I mean, what’s next? Is my spell checker suddenly going to recognize misandry as a real word? Wait! I have the new MS word and it does!

Damn thing still redlines Dannyboy, though. I will have a word with Mr. Gates about that in due time.

Or maybe I’ll send Danny.

In His Own Words: Men can't be abused, can they?

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 2 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is day 2 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month, October 2013. Today's In His Own Words is an emancipation proclamation of sorts. "JC's" experiences are an illustration of how some men can be blind to the often egregious abuse they suffer.

If a man had chucked a coffee mug at a woman's head, there would be no doubt such behavior is abusive. Because our culture does not recognize female perpetrated abuse, men like JC discount the obvious and instead seek to find ways to better tolerate the abusive behaviors of their girlfriends and wives.

JC's story is also a good example of the frog in a pot of soon to be boiling water phenomenon. Intimate partner violence oftentimes emerges gradually over time. Initially, the abuse is infrequent and is attributed to the abusive woman having a bad day or some other plausible excuse.

Before too long, the infrequent abusive episodes become all too frequent. However, because it happens incrementally over a period of months or years, the target of abuse either becomes accustomed to it (i.e., it seems normal) and/or develops the habit of excusing, minimizing or rationalizing the abuse.

I'm a 40-year old man with one step-daughter and three biological children going through the process of divorce with my partner of 13 years. What I find strange though, is that instead of feeling grief for a lost marriage and despair at the loss of known security for my children, I feel relieved that the ride is ending. Yes, I'm gutted that the kids have to adapt to a change into the unknown for something that they had no control over, but I am eased by the knowledge that I can now concentrate on being their father without the shackles of guilt that have held me back.

And that I can live without the complaints that shamed me into believing that I am, somehow, less than valid.

And that I can live without the exaggerations, misrepresentations and downright lies that were used to "prove" that I was wrong about whatever the current issue was.

And that I can live without having to explain why I wanted a single £10 note to buy a new t-shirt when there were bills to pay.

And that I can live without being told that I had to "earn more" if I wanted anything as my wage that is on average £80 per week MORE than she brings in is not enough.

And that I can live without being told that there is no money available for what I want after she spends £50 on her hair, £80 on clothes and £30 on makeup.

And that I can live without being told that we are broke a week before the payment is due for the kids' school trip, so I borrow the funds off my parents only to find later that she's hidden £220 at the back of her drawer and lied about our situation.

And that I can live without the shame and worthlessness that envelops me when she has an affair, which, obviously, is my fault.

And that I can live without the threats of suicide, paracetamol overdoses, psychiatric nurses, stints in mental hospitals when I walk out because of her behaviour that is, again, my fault.

And that I can live without that crushing guilt and anxiety that creeps in when, with masterful manipulation, I'm made to feel that only I can make her better and "this time" it will work out okay.

And that I can live without the stress of trying to keep all this from the kids only for her to tell them that mammy had been in hospital because dad "walked out."

And that I can live without the embarrassment of her projecting an image of her being a hard worker and dedicated mother to anyone who will listen, while naming me as a lazy, distant piece of crap who should be lucky and thankful that I have someone like her. After all, “who’s going to want you?” was her view of me.

At first I never saw it as abuse. I never understood it as an abusive relationship. And the reason for this is fairly simple.

I didn’t believe that men could be abused.

Kids, yes.

Women, daily.

But men. How do you abuse a man?

Okay, I had to admit to myself that I’d had some close encounters in the past. After all an ex-girlfriend had once thrown a television remote at the back of my head so hard that it shattered into pieces leaving two nasty cuts spilling blood down the back of my neck. The dizziness and sickness that followed lasted for a couple of hours, but my ex said that it was my fault for complaining I didn’t like the soaps she watched and insisted we watch something else.

She was so, so sorry for what happened and it was best I didn’t waste any time going to the hospital because it would clear up by itself, and she knew what she was talking about as she was a nurse!

But that wasn’t abuse was it? That was just a disagreement.

The same girlfriend wanted an expensive engagement ring with diamonds and fancy markings and such, even though I politely let her know that marriage was a long, long way off and that I wouldn’t pay those prices for a ring when, as far as I’m concerned, love and commitment has no real monetary value.

A hot cup of coffee was immediately dispensed into my face. Not just the liquid mind you, the whole kiln baked container followed it through the air towards my head. The red marking across my cheek disappeared after a few days and because the mug failed to smash I avoided any cuts. The bruising on my chin went away after a week or so.

I laughed about it at the time. That wasn’t abuse was it?

Clearly, I’d been insensitive about something she cared dearly about, so I should have taken care to choose my words carefully. My bad!

Towards the end of the relationship we were cooking in her kitchen while discussing the lack of a future together. Then, for whatever reason, she stormed out of the backdoor in anger. Not wanting to upset her further, I left her to calm down and lifted the basket of chips (fries) out of the fryer as they were done. Within two minutes she blasted back into the kitchen and demanded to know why I hadn’t chased after her. I didn’t know I had to!

As I was trying to understand what she was saying, she screamed and swept her arm across the kitchen counter. Like a cat on ninja beer, I leapt upwards and threw myself into the hallway as the fryer hit the floor and sent three litres of boiling cooking oil spilling where my body, groin and legs had been a second earlier.

I didn’t call it abuse. To be fair I hadn’t been injured. But there was something in this one that sat uncomfortably within me. I didn’t think it abuse, but I did think it time to call it off!

A few years later I met the woman who would become my wife. I’d like to say that it was good at first but, looking back, it wasn’t.

The manipulation started slowly. Little moments of tears when I wanted to do my own things, little sighs and gestures of dissatisfaction when she wanted me to do things for her, the odd message that someone thought I was lazy or not good enough if I had a difference of opinion with her.

Before long I was a puppet moving to a web of strings that I could feel, but couldn’t quite see. I was becoming a creature of reactions rather than actions. Words, intonations, looks and gestures, all made me react in certain ways, but I didn't know why!

I had lost my automation. I had lost what made me, me.

Contact with my friends had all but gone and any attempt to meet up with them was interrupted by a sudden drama or problem. The relationship between my parents and myself was always strong, but I was always too busy with "something" to be able to see them whenever I wanted. Unless she needed money from my parents, in which case we had urgent contact.

But this controlling behaviour wasn't abuse, was it?

It couldn't be. Men can't be abused. In fact, even though I'm only five and a half feet tall, I have a sturdy and solid build that has prevented many a drunken aggravator from viewing me as a suitable target. If I were to lay hands on my wife or my ex I would have destroyed them!

So it's obvious that I can't be abused.

So why is it that I am a 40-year old man going through the process of divorce and feeling relieved about the whole thing?

It is quite simply that I stopped looking at abuse as a gender issue and started to see it as a behaviour issue. Once I had read up on the issue and understood abuse as "abuse, the act of. . ." as opposed to man/woman or victim/perpetrator, I quickly realised that for most of my adult life I had been on the receiving end of physical, emotional and financial abuse.

Seeing it for what it is – a non-gendered series of behaviours used to control and maintain a status quo and create an environment that suits the needs and insecurities of the abuser – allowed me to take stock of my situation and develop the necessary mental skills to break away from the situation.

It took time, and it took effort and it is still taking courage, but it's worth it.

The women I let into my life made me feel like I was valuable until they managed to make me feel invalid and at the mercy of their approval. The self-searching as to why I felt I needed this approval was both interesting and painful, but a sound remedy.

I have come to understand that the abuser needs the abused far more than the abused needs the abuser. And, because of this, the abuser will do everything possible to prevent you from finding that out.

The unknown that my children are facing will no longer be built on fear and lack. They are seeing strength and self-worth. They are seeing independence rather than dependence. They are seeing decision and conviction rather than indecision and concern.

She no longer tries to control me. Her efforts are pointless and now she knows this. I'm in the fortunate position of having children old enough to vote with their feet and because I only live ten minutes away they see me very often. Daily, in fact.

But what I really feel good about is that I don't hate her. I don't hate her or my other ex. Deep inside they have something missing. Whether that's due to social conditioning or something else I don't know, but I forgive them.

The bruises, the bleeding, the headaches, the demeaning criticisms, the venomous names, the lies, the cheating, the fear of doing wrong, the insecurity of being unwanted, the removal of financial independence, the pain of being made to feel less than useless, the shame, the heartburn, the panic attacks, the suicidal thoughts — I forgive it all.

But this forgiveness can't be had for free. There is a cost.

And the cost of forgiveness is that I must let you go forever; leaving you to face your insecurities alone.

But I still wish you peace.

JC, ——shire, UK

I have nothing to add except [STANDING OVATION.] Thank you, JC, for taking the time to share what can only be described as a transformative experience. Wow, I teared up as I edited this in addition to making some fist pumps. Good on you, JC. I wish you peace. Well done.

In His Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

What feminism means to me: An answer to Joe Gordon-Levitt

AVfM Video Source · 2 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Here is what I uploaded to HitRecord in response to Gordon-Levitt's request that I explain what feminism means to me. Make sure and subscribe!

http://youtu.be/IRVddQ94Zdk

Feature image from Vice.com

Simone de Beauvoir: A Nazi, a pedophile, and a misogynist

Lucian Vâlsan · 3 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

As the non-feminist sector of the society gets increasingly more vocal, the sector of the society that is not yet aware of the toxic nature of this ideology reacts with a set of arguments that merely reveal that the factual reality is not yet entirely known to the public.

A while ago, a group of coffee-shop feminists were trying to convince me that feminism is not as bad as I say it is and that if I just read more about feminism, I would eventually understand. As an example to support this thesis, the aforementioned feminists recommended that I read the writings of Simone de Beauvoir, the French Marxist-feminist known for her book The Second Sex. Of course, those feminists were unable to fathom that someone had taken their ideology seriously enough to read its literature and then rationally end up utterly rejecting it. As with any other cult, such a thing is inconceivable for the true believers of the sect.

In the headline of this post, a series of allegations were made toward the eminent feminist and it's only fair for us to prove them—which is exactly what we're going to do in the following lines.

Between 1943 and 1944, as France was under Nazi occupation, Simone de Beauvoir worked as a sound director for Radio Vichy.[1] Radio Vichy was the state's radio station in the so-called zone libre (free zone) of France, following the capitulation of the French Republic in front of Nazi Germany in 1940. We say the so-called because the Vichy regime, although theoretically neutral from a military standpoint, was in fact an active collaborator of the Nazi regime,[2] and today it is an acknowledged fact by all parties involved that the institution of Radio Vichy was the de facto mouthpiece for Nazi propaganda on the airwaves in France.

De Beauvoir apologists might say that she was forced by circumstances to work there, just like many individuals now claim to have been forced to collaborate with the Securitate during the Communist regime. But de Beauvoir's manuscripts written in that period, which were revealed afterwards, tell a different story.

Even feminist authors, such as Dr. Ingrid Galster, who have dedicated years of their lives studying Simone de Beauvoir had to admit, albeit grudgingly, that the attitude manifested by de Beauvoir as a sound director in the Nazi propaganda machine was at the very least one of subtle collaborationism,[3] and the way through which she ended up working there was not following a coercion—but a perfectly conscious choice. De Beauvoir was already a member of the public workers' union and could have chosen to work in a city hall, for instance. But she had to choose to work somewhere else other than teaching because her career in teaching was done—even though she already had the qualifications and the prestige necessary for teaching, given that she had been the second most performing doctoral student in her generation, lagging only behind her lifetime lover, Jean-Paul Sartre.[4]

The reason for which she could no longer teach is exactly related to pedophilia and Jean-Paul Sartre. In 1943, Simone de Beauvoir was fired for behavior leading to the corruption of a minor.[5]

Once again, the apologists of de Beauvoir might rush to say that the 1943 moment was a singular incident or, as it was told to me once, an incident outright invented by the Nazi persecution who couldn't stand her once they realized she was a Marxist empowered independent woman. But nothing could be further from the truth.

De Beauvoir's sexual interest for children is a theme spreading throughout her life. She was amongst the first philosophers who tried to unite the genre that had begun in the 1930s (and that lasted until 1980s in Western Europe) of female pedagogical pedophilia.[6] She attempted this unification with her essay "Brigitte Bardot and the Lolita Syndrome," published for the first time in Esquire magazine in 1959 and then republished multiple times until the mid-1970s. In that essay, de Beauvoir glorifies Brigitte Bardot for her childish physical aspect, which retains the perfect innocence inherent in the myth of childhood, and then paints her as a Houdini for girls who will release and empower them out of the chains in which they had been subjugated.[7, 8]

The 1959 essay was just the beginning. In 1977, de Beauvoir, alongside most of the Marxist French intelligentsia, signed a petition demanding nothing more and nothing less than the legalization of pedophilia and the immediate release of three individuals who were due to serve long jail sentences for sexually exploiting several boys and girls aged 11 to 14. The petition signed amongst others by de Beauvoir and Sartre was published in Le Monde and was saying, among other things, the following:[9]

> Such a long time in remand to investigate a simple `vice' affair, where the children have not been victims of the slightest violence, but have to the contrary testified before the examining magistrates that they consented — although the law at present denies them their right to consent — such a long time in remand we do consider scandalous in itself. Today they risk to be sentenced to a long prison term either for having had sexual relations with minors, boys as well as girls, or for having encouraged and taken photographs of their sexual plays. We believe that there is an incongruity between the designation as a `crime' which serves to legitimize such a severity, and the facts themselves; even more so between the antiquated law and the reality of every day life in a society which tends to know about the sexuality of children and adolescents[…]

So, in de Beauvoir's opinion, 11-year-old children in late 1970s France tended to be sexual beings. Since puberty was not installing and is not installing even today at that age for the overwhelming majority of children, we consider apt to name de Beauvoir's advocacy as nothing short than a plea for pedophilia, regardless of which definition of the word one chooses.

The 1977 petition triggered an entire discussion at the societal level in France about the laws concerning age of consent, a discussion in which the abolitionist camp (of which de Beauvoir and her lover were part of) united into Front de libération des Pédophiles (FLIP—The Pedophiles Liberation Front) and the intentions of the members of FLIP were explained quite clearly by themselves in the discussion broadcasted on the radio in April 1978 by Radio France Culture.[10] FLIP was going to be remembered as a pioneer within the ranks of the French pedophiles movement, even though the organization itself didn't last long because of its internal disagreements.[11]

Besides de Beauvoir and Sartre, there were other people involved in the advocacy for pedophilia in that period, including people who then ended up leading the destinies of France—and we refer here, for instance, to Bernard Kouchner and Jack Lang, respectively, the Minister of Health and the Minister of Education(!) in early 2000s in the first term of Jacques Chirac.[12]

All these make de Beauvoir not just a pedophile apologist but an active supporter. However, what makes her an abuser is her activity through which she was recruiting pupils, abusing them, and then passing them to Jean-Paul Sartre, sometimes separately, sometimes in an integrated ménage à trois. The Telegraph writes in a review of Carole Seymour-Jones's book, Simone de Beauvoir? Meet Jean-Paul Sartre, a book meant to analyze de Beauvoir's relationship with Sartre, the following:[13]

> For long periods, the couple became a "trio", though the arrangement rarely worked out well for the third party: at least two of de Beauvoir's former pupils found themselves becoming first her lover, then Sartre's, only for the couple to close ranks against them once the fun wore off.[…]
>
> For Seymour-Jones, de Beauvoir's affairs with her students were not lesbian but paedophiliac in origin: she was "grooming" them for Sartre, a form of "child abuse".

For de Beauvoir (as well as for Sartre), age didn't matter as long as the partners were younger than her and Sartre.[14] The possibility that others might get hurt or sexually exploited wasn't even remotely on the eminent feminist's radar, who thought that "grooming" girls in order for Sartre to take their virginity (Sartre's words, not ours) was in and of itself an act of sexual empowerment for those girls.

But if the escapades with a Nazi and pedophilia flavor don't convince you of the questionable character of de Beauvoir, let's have a look through her feminist writings, which are so filled with misogyny that it's hard to find an equivalent in other sectors of the society. This aspect per se isn't surprising to us, considering that feminism is in and of itself a misogynistic ideology. But let's not digress.

De Beauvoir's pillow book, The Second Sex, is a book about which contemporary feminists say that it is "remarkably fresh"—a book that had the following to say about wives:[15]

> The wife feeds on him like a parasite; but a parasite is not a triumphant master.

Over a quarter of a century later, in 1975, in a dialogue with another feminist, Betty Friedan, de Beauvoir was going to clarify her position beyond all reasonable doubt. In a discussion about the way to compensate the mothers who stay home and care for children, de Beauvoir answered unequivocally:[16]

> No, we don't believe that any woman should have this choice. No woman should be authorized to stay at home to raise her children. Society should be totally different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one. It is a way of forcing women in a certain direction.

Are we clear? In the eminent feminist's vision, women are a bunch of inert creatures who are incapable of choosing what's good for them as responsible adults. In fact, nobody besides Simone de Beauvoir and her Marxist-feminist ideology knows what's best for women. Therefore, no women should be authorized to choose anything that contradicts de Beauvoir.

In the same dialogue, she gets even more clear:[17]

> In my opinion, as long as the family and the myth of the family and the myth of maternity and the maternal instinct are not destroyed, women will still be oppressed.

Actually, de Beauvoir's hatred toward maternity and mothers in general is very obvious throughout her book. Let's offer some more samples:

> Motherhood relegates woman to a sedentary existence; it is natural for her to stay at home while men hunt, fish, and go to war.[18]
>
> [The mother] is plant and animal, a collection of colloids, an incubator, an egg; she frightens children who are concerned with their own bodies and provokes sniggers from young men because she is a human being, consciousness and freedom, who has become a passive instrument of life.[19]

And when this eminent feminist started bashing women's bodies, nobody could stop her:

> The psychic attitude evoked by menstrual servitude constitutes a heavy handicap.
>
> […]a woman's body—and specifically the girl's—is a "hysterical" body in the sense that there is, so to speak, no distance between psychic life and its physiological realization. The turmoil brought about by the girl's discovery of the problems of puberty exacerbates them. Because her body is suspect to her, she scrutinizes it with anxiety and sees it as sick: it is sick.[20]
>
> The mammary glands that develop at puberty have no role in the woman's individual economy: they can be removed at any moment in her life.[21]

De Beauvoir then goes on to explain in her book how evil and oppressive the family is for the development of a girl. If the father has the audacity to be proud and appreciative of his daughter's successes, then that's yet another evidence of oppression and imposition of vassality for the daughter towards the father.[22] But if fathers get away fairly easy, mothers who dare to discipline their daughters get an even harsher admonition from the eminent feminist:

> Mothers—we will see—are blindly hostile to freeing their daughters and, more or less deliberately, work at bullying them even more; for the adolescent boy, his effort to become a man is respected, and he is already granted great freedom. The girl is required to stay home; her outside activities are watched over.[23]

So, are we clear? The fact that some parents were not letting their girls go out after a certain hour in the Nazi-occupied France in the middle of World War II constitutes oppression. And bear in mind that de Beauvoir bemoans this aspect—about which there is serious doubt that it was generalized—while 13- and 14-year-old boys were fighting in the war,[24] including to keep her safe in order to write rubbish "philosophy" and produce propaganda for the Nazi regime—a regime that also had 14- and 15-year-old boys in their troops.[25] I'm almost willing to say that she should have checked her privilege. But I won't say.

The hypocrisy of this woman is both fascinating to study and revolting at the same time. Simone de Beauvoir, worshiped even today as a great icon of the "good" feminism of the 1960s and studied in the "feminist dialogues" on the National School of Political Science and Public Administration in Bucharest (SNSPA), has defended with great fervor the revolutionary regime of Ioseb Dzhugashvili (aka Iosif Vissarionovich Stalin) until long after the horrors of Stalinism had already become known in Western Europe.

In other words, while numerous Romanians left in the USSR were being deported into the Gulag, while the intellectual elite of this country was being decimated in concentration camps like Râmnicu Sărat, Pitești, or Aiud, and while even 12-year-old boys were being tortured in Communist prisons for conspiracy against the socialist order,[26] Simone de Beauvoir was publishing The Second Sex in which she was explaining how women's liberation is intimately related to the fate of socialism[27] while vehemently denying, alongside with her lover, the Stalinist atrocities that were taking place in the same moments. And we, the Romanian taxpayers, now pay for students to go to SNSPA and study this low-life as if she's someone we should look up to. Well, this is a real example of state-sponsored misogyny! But I have a feeling that the feminist elite is very comfortable with it.

Dear coffee-shop feminists, if you are recommending us to read Simone de Beauvoir as an example of a "good" feminist, then you either haven't read her yourselves and you're mentioning her just to appear cultivated, or, on the contrary, you have read her and agree with what she stood for, in which case any normal non-feminist human being would have to be at the very least insane to believe that you have the best intentions in mind.

The audacity with which de Beauvoir purports nothing short of outright banning certain choices for women because they don't fall in her ideological lines is the absolute example of a deranged Utopian for whom warm water is a new concept and for whom the planet revolves around herself. And if it doesn't, then it's the planet's fault and it must be banned. The truth must be banned—if the truth is "incorrect."

If feminists would truly be sincere when they assert that they aim to combat misogyny and increase the spectrum of choices for women, then they would start by throwing the entire ideological arsenal coming from Simone de Beauvoir to the dustbin of history. But they're not doing that and they'll never do that because feminism is hypocritical in its best days and totalitarian by its nature and practice in its regular days. And when feminism has a bad day, it demands the extermination of men.

Dear feminists, your declaration of public appreciation for Simone de Beauvoir says far more about yourselves than anything anyone from the non-feminist sector of the society could ever say. You have once again proven that the best anti-feminist argument comes right from the feminists themselves. And for that, we wish to extend our thanks!

References:

Special thanks to Marian Atodiresei, who helped with documentation.

[1] http://my.telegraph.co.uk/expat/stephenclarke/10151800/10151800/ – Stephen Clarke – The women that France needs to remember – or forget; The Telegraph, published at September 5, 2013

[2] https://www.jewishvirtuallibrary.org/jsource/Holocaust/VichyRegime.html – The Holocaust: The French Vichy Regime

[3] http://www.lexpress.fr/culture/livre/ce-qu-on-n-ose-pas-voir-sur-beauvoir_822547.html – Dupuis Jérôme – Ce qu'on n'ose pas voir sur Beauvoir; L'Express, published at January 3, 2008

[4] http://www.telegraph.co.uk/culture/books/non_fictionreviews/3672534/Simone-de-Beauvoir-Meet-Jean-Paul-Sartre.html – Tim Martin – Simone de Beauvoir? Meet Jean-Paul Sartre; The Telegraph, published at April 12, 2008

[5] http://opinionator.blogs.nytimes.com/2013/05/19/savile-beauvoir-and-the-charms-of-the-nymph/ – Andy Martin – The Persistence of the 'Lolita Syndrome'; The New York Times, published at May 19, 2013

[6] ibidem

[7] ibidem

[8] Simone de Beauvoir – Brigitte Bardot and the Lolita Syndrome (with many half-tone illustrations) p.10; 14 – First Four Square Edition – The New English Library LTD., 1962

[9] We received the following communication: Le Monde, January 26, 1977 – https://www.ipce.info/ipceweb/Library/00aug29b1_from_1977.htm

[10] Sexual Morality and the Law, Chapter 16 of Politics, Philosophy, Culture –Interviews and Other Writings 1977-1984, p.275

[11] Le Mouvement Pédophile en France – http://archive.wikiwix.com/cache/?url=http://bibliobleue.fpc.li/Revues/Gredin/N0/MvtFrance.htm

[12] http://www.theguardian.com/world/2001/feb/24/jonhenley – Jon Henley – Calls for legal child sex rebound on luminaries of May 68; The Guardian, published at February 24, 2001

[13] Ibidem 4

[14] http://www.biographile.com/6-degrees-of-infatuation-an-ode-to-frisky-french-writers/28496/ – Kelsey Osgood – 6 Degrees of Infatuation: An Ode to Frisky French Writers; Biographile, published at February 11, 2014

[15] Simone de Beauvoir – The Second Sex, p. 378 – Translated by Constance Borde and Sheila Malovany-Chevallier; Vintage Books – Random House Inc., New York, 2009

[16] Sex, Society and the Female Dilemma – A Dialogue between Simone de Beauvoir and Betty Friedan; Saturday Review, publicat la 14 Iunie 1975 – p. 18 http://64.62.200.70/PERIODICAL/PDF/SaturdayRev-1975jun14/14-24/

[17] Female Dilemma, op. cit. p.20

[18] Second Sex, op. cit. p.70

[19] Ibidem p.392-393

[20] Ibidem p.257-258

[21] Ibidem p.43

[22] Ibidem p.255

[23] Ibidem p. 258-259

[24] World War II: Conscription and the Age of Soldiers – http://histclo.com/essay/war/ww2/age/ww2-age.html

[25] Hitler's Boy Soldiers – http://www.historyplace.com/worldwar2/hitleryouth/hj-boy-soldiers.htm

[26] Târgşor, communist prison for children – National Romanian Television report (English subtitles included) –

http://vimeo.com/73694592

[27] Second Sex, op. cit. p.60

A suggestion for feminism's rebranding efforts

Sage Gerard (Victor Zen) · 3 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

After watching Prager University's Feminism 2.0, Lindsey Cook's You-Do-You Feminism, and the recent HeForShe campaign, I get the impression that more men are needed to rebrand feminism to make it popular again. As a probationary recruit, I would like to suggest we change the logo to help feminists rebrand the ideology. One of the iconic logos for feminism is really unfortunate because it looks like someone is fisting the Venus symbol.

[image]
Oh hush, yes it does.
I know, I know, it's supposed to be a power fist that visually asserts the independence of women, but how can we screech about rape apology with this image circulating?

Actually, now that I think about it, I take it back. This logo is actually perfect for feminism. It represents how an ideology relentlessly pursues women and inserts itself deep inside after coming in the back door, often after lulling women into opening up to accept the seed of feminist ideas.

Still, it's a little too subtle. Perhaps it would benefit from a more explicit statement of feminism's goals for the less civilized among us.

[image]

NO, NO, NO! That's just too much. In today's politically correct world, we need to be more respectful of feminism's position without images like these promoting rape culture. Besides, feminists would never lie to women about their intentions, let alone make a woman live with a thumb up her ass.

Also, the current trend is to include more men in the discussion of protecting women. Perhaps this version would be more respectful of the feminist position.

[image]

No, wait, this won't work either. It's still suggesting that feminism is bad. We can't have that. And who said that women need a man to protect them? Yes, I know that HeForShe did, but there's a hypothetical woman in danger! This is no time for rational thought.

The real enemy here is the man. We need to castrate, er, circumcise—no, I mean—circumvent his influence to help women help themselves. All they need is feminism, and feminism knows how to smash the patriarchy.

[image]
"Hold still, Emma Watson said we need to galvanize you."
Stopping the flow of harmful, self-objectifying thoughts in women from the bottom up will cause the gasses of Venus to swell inside of them. Once women accept feminism into their internal socialization, they become empowered for us to tell them to choose what careers to follow and how to view the world through a feminist lens. We can also use her to spew hot air and deny men the jobs and resources they have squandered for thousands of years.

And any man who is not afraid of our empowered women will assist them.

[image]

We know that women are oppressed because JP Morgan helped sponsor UN Women. Big banks only give money to international organizations for women because women have no representation. Nonfeminists are scum who don't want to help men, but we do. We need men to participate in the discussion on making the world a better place for women with feminism. And if you don't like the word "feminism," then ignore the word and just think about your Lord Thy God Equality, which only feminism can spread through a strong embrace that warms your insides.

[image]

For those who make the modest donation of $8,008 to NOW, we will send you a bucket of “We Can Do It!” brand personal lubricant for intimate socialization.

Raise your fist, have your partner bend over, and spread the word.

In His Own Words: Deception and heartbreak

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 3 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is Day 3 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Today's submission comes by way of Andybob, an AVoiceForMen contributor.

The following is a letter that was written by an Australian man for whom I, Andybob, have had the utmost respect throughout the three decades of our friendship. He is an intelligent and responsible man who found himself in a brief second marriage to an attractive, but, as he would soon discover, emotionally abusive, Russian woman, whom we shall call Natalia.

We should never underestimate the brutalizing effect that a woman like Natalia can have on a generous and trusting man like my friend, or how easily they can hide their dysfunction long enough to get that ring on their finger. Their entire relationship began and ended within one of the 11-month periods that I work outside Australia, so, I have never met Natalia.

The letter was intended for Natalia's mother and eighteen year-old daughter because my friend feared that they may not have been aware of Natalia's dysfunction. He quickly realized that this couldn't possibly be true, and decided not to send it to either of them. It is important to keep in mind that, due to the letter's intended recipients, this letter is the sanitized version of some of my friend's experiences while married to Natalia.

I became determined to find a suitable way to share his letter because, as he was reading it to me, it occurred to me that I was probably the only person who genuinely wanted to hear of his experience with an emotionally abusive spouse. As with so many men who have been in his situation, it was apparent that he felt very isolated from most of his family and friends. People, even loved ones, can become very uncomfortable and dismissive when men start talking about their pain – especially when they begin talking about how they have been emotionally hurt.

My friend just wanted to be heard, to share his experiences, and warn others that even strong, smart, ethical men can find themselves married to psychologically abusive women. Many assume that a man should know better, control 'his woman' and, above all, remain stoic and silent about his stress, loneliness and humiliation at the hands of their abusive wives and girlfriends. It is a deeply offensive and misandric way of marginalizing male pain until it is rendered all but invisible.

Here is the letter that my friend wanted me to share:

To [Natalia's mother] and [Natalia's daughter],

I would like to express how hurt, upset and devastated I am by the failure of Natalia's and my marriage. Over a seven-month period, Natalia did some very hurtful, cruel, unstable and deceptive things that a wife should not do. She had a strange man call claiming she met him on the Internet and then suggested it was an attempt to make me jealous.

She often disconnected our phone without telling me and destroyed phone numbers of mine, both business clients and friends. She insisted on coming with me to tutoring appointments and that my clients contact her first. She had their number and my friends' but I never had any of her family or friends' numbers. She would contact my friends without telling me. Natalia hid in our locked bedroom and parked her car in another street to spy on me or surprise me.

I could not go out in public with Natalia because she would become angry and aggressive, claiming I was looking at others, and even when I was talking to her, she would storm off, claiming I was not looking at her. She often talked to other men and women in the street and this never bothered me, but, I was forbidden to do the same.

On one occasion, when I said hello to a mother when her small child nearly tripped me, she became violent and threatened to jump out of our moving car. Natalia would insist I swear on my children's or parents' lives I would not look at or talk to ‘korva’ or ‘prostitute’ as she called other women.

She began to go out at strange hours and I could not contact her. She would come home in the early hours of the morning and not explain where she had been. On one occasion, she returned home very late and told me she had parked her car in another street. The following morning, a taxi turned up and she insisted it was not for her, but the driver called her name. She claimed she had been too tired to drive home from her mother’s, but I did not understand why she did not call or tell me.

When Natalia had a car accident, I was there to make sure she was safe. When I asked if we could quickly visit a client in the same street to apologize for missing my appointment, she became hysterical and aggressive and openly called her old boyfriend/boss in front of me. This was very hurtful. She often accepted financial help from him which was hurtful and disrespectful of me as her husband.

I looked after Natalia with all my ability. I cooked for her, cleaned for her and gave her everything I could. Over a six-month period, I gave her $10,000 to avoid a drink-driving charge, $25,000 for bank debts and credit cards, $15,000 for her mother’s permanent residency, and $15,000 for her dance school business. I helped her pay many phone bills and registered her car and gave her financial help when she needed it. Now I am in financial difficulty.

When my father was seriously ill with cancer, I gave Natalia $500 to go to Melbourne to visit girlfriends and she did not contact me for several days. She eventually texted my sister to say she was in Newcastle for a beauty quest with accompanying photos, showing me and my family no respect or concern at this serious time.

Natalia is a physically attractive woman and enjoys attention from others to satisfy her ego and vanity. She is obstructively and aggressively jealous and unable to apply the same standards and expectations which she had of me to herself. She is extremely self-centred.

I feel Natalia has serious emotional and psychological issues that prevent her from being able to maintain a healthy long-term relationship. This was supported by a counsellor we both attended. She is jealous and insecure and could never trust me or understand my loyalty and stability. Her aggressive and destructive behavior is hurtful and disturbing and I could not bear it any longer.

I cannot help but feel Natalia used me for my financial resources. I loved her and am a good, honest man, but she drove us apart. I was not sure whether to write this letter, but Natalia contacted my family and friends and I want the truth to be known.

I have no malice or ill-will towards Natalia, but am hurt and feel sorry that she will never be happy until she addresses her issues and faces the truth.

P.S. Natalia told me she had been unfaithful during our marriage and this was the most hurtful action of all.

Thank you, Andybob, for caring enough to share your friend’s experiences with Natalia.

In His Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

In Her Own Words: My mother abused my father and me

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 4 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is Day 4 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. "Marian" shares her story of horrific abuse at the hands of her mother. Marian wasn't her mother's only victim. Her mother also brutalized her father.

If I could draw my mother on a paper, would I split her into two people. One would be happy, joyful, and kind, while the other would be angry, harsh, and cruel, with the figure rotating at a mere minutes' notice.

When I was five years of age, I had a bad habit of slamming the car door hard . Mom would tell me from time to time to stop until one day she made me stick out my hand for her. She slapped it so hard that it was red for about ten minutes afterward.

At age eight, I developed a case of the chicken pox. My mother insisted on taking me with her for errands. She actually stuck me in the daycare center at the YMCA, despite my having a contagious disease! I told the daycare worker that I was sick with chicken pox, and my mother had to come retrieve me. She yelled at me in the car for not keeping quiet about it until we arrived at the mall. While there, we bumped into my grandmother. My grandmother, outraged, threatened to take full custody of me on the spot if my mother did not take me home to rest.

During my seventeenth year, my mother's parents and brother passed away, and her temper, as a result, worsened. When I couldn't find a date for prom, she called me a fat loser, and slapped me so hard that she split my lip. My father told me not to tell my grandparents about it, despite the fact that I nearly broke down in front of my grandmother over it. Mom would notice my lip from time to time while I was applying makeup, and comment on it, asking me what I did to "mess up my face."

She was hard on me in terms of my academics, and the fact that I struggled with a difficult math-based course did not help. When I was carrying a B-minus in the course, and she slapped me six times across the face, and kicked me across the floor for "not taking the course seriously" despite the fact that I consistently sought help with the teacher after class. Dad managed to grab her after the first three swings, but she later re-entered the room. Dad, fearful of the repercussions of attempting to stop her again, took out his frustration by punching a nearby door.

I was also a cheerleader for the entirety of my high school career, and as a result, learned several tumbling techniques. During a week in which I was consistently botching a tumbling pass due to a mental block, and falling on the mat, she became violent once more. While our pickup truck sat in an empty parking lot, she smacked me several times. The hardest smack dislodged and broke my glasses. When the salesperson at the store inquired as to how the pair had come to be so damaged, Mom replied, "Oh, my daughter broke them. She's so clumsy."

Unfortunately, I was not the only victim of her anger. Several nights during the age of three, I hear my parents scream at each other, with my mom usually screaming louder, followed by slapping noises, and the sound of household objects breaking. My father never hit; it was against his upbringing, and considering his size and stature, the result of college bodybuilding, he would probably have done serious damage to her if he did.

Mom always said the reason why I never had a sibling was because we couldn't have afforded one. It wasn't until this year that Dad told me the whole story: she kicked him so hard in the testicles that it sterilized him. She also liked to threaten to throw him out of the house, and would call me into the room to say, "See her now? You'll NEVER see her again!" The thing Mom didn't count on, though, was the fact that I would cry and run to my father, not wanting him to go. During my freshman year in high school, I even fell to my knees before her, and begged her not to throw my father out.

I never did go to anyone for help when I was a minor for a few reasons. The first was the fact that my idea of child and spousal abuse was inaccurate. Child abuse, by my juvenile depiction, was children being knocked unconscious or living in squalor, while spousal abuse was (usually a female) victim crawling away from a hovering tormentor.

Added to this inaccuracy was the fact that Mom used to say, “My mother did far worse to me!”

I never wanted to break up my family. Again, she was two people in one body; the same person that hit and spat venom cheered for me on the side lines, surprised my father with gifts and celebrations in his honor, and cared for both of us with a gentle voice when we were ill. For that, I just internalized the abuse like a coward, never calling the police, or getting help. This was despite the fact that her favorite go-to threats were “I brought you into this world, and I can take you out,” and “I’ll chop your goddamn head off if you don’t shut the fuck up!”

My freshman year of college was when I realized that I was being abused. Far from the grasp of her influence, and effectively burying myself in task of writing a novel (an idea she used to scoff at and dissuade me from doing in high school) allowed me to examine my life with a different lens. What I saw thoroughly disgusted me. While I did not confront her about it yet, as I was still unsure of it (not to mention she had threatened three times that year alone to pull me out of college), she took notice of my altered body language told her, declaring that college had messed me up even worse than high school had. Exhibit A: When I caught the flu, and called her for tips on how to handle it, she, assuming morning sickness off the bat, immediately accused me of carrying my boyfriend’s child.

In the long run, it all came to naught; my parents divorced anyway during my sophomore year. The two told me, point blank, in my dorm room that they were through. My mother accused me of smirking during the proclamation; in reality, I was holding my face hard in order not to cry. I had lost, and lost dearly, internalizing it all for nothing.

I spent that summer blaming myself for allowing her to hit and berate my father and me. She was still under our roof that summer, the separation not finalized until that August. She and Dad were at each other’s throats at least once a week, as were she and I, only twice a week. I had previously arranged to move in with my grandmother that summer, but my father put a stop to the plan, saying that we needed to be a family. Without an effective financial leg to stand on (my fault), I had no choice.

What family was this, when she flung any insult she could think of at me, berating me for my hair, my body (she especially loved that one), my choice in friends, my singular status, my virginity (when she wasn’t pulling the accusation of “whore” out of the air), and anything else she could possibly think of? Dad fell to justifying her, his common phrase being, “She’s your mother.”

That came to a head one late July night. Mom was moving to her new apartment, and Dad volunteered me to help her. I had accidentally given the manager where I worked the wrong day off for the affair. As a result, my mother spent fifteen minutes on the way home (Dad never allowed me to drive due to insurance rates) slamming on the brakes in order for her to scream in my face how useless, stupid, spoiled, ignorant, selfish, and pathetic I was. She also threatened to never allow me to see my grandmother again (which was baseless at that point).

Turning in my seat, I yelled, “You are selfish, abusive, and emotionally manipulative!” Slapping me across the mouth, she yelled at me to get out of the car, and drove off.

When Dad picked me up, he was furious. He forced us to sit down at the dinner table to speak to one another civilly, and I immediately told him her threat to not allow me to see his mother again. The look on Mom’s face was akin to deer in the headlights when Dad rounded on her, and she fell to taunting me to distract him. “You could never hit me, you little shit!” She yelled.

Standing bolt upright, I poised my hand in the air to slap her. Dad grabbed me from behind, and held me in a bear hug as I kicked the air, screaming. Mom left the room, taunting, “Oh you could never do it! I’ll kick your ass if you do!”

When Dad let me down, he asked, “Are you crazy? Do you realize what you could have done?” Only now do I realize the extent of his words; she could have called the police on me for that.

My mother is gone from my home now, and to that I say good riddance. Still, it does not change the fact that she was abusive toward my father and me, and we both allowed it to happen to us, just because we were so enchanted by the kinder side of her persona. I have since told my aunt and my grandmother (as well as a few close friends and their parents) of the abuse, and all reactions were the approximate same; each person told was outraged by my mother's abuse of my father and me. Each person expressed the desire to have stopped her from hurting us in the past, had they known of the extent. My aunt has rendered her home a safe zone for us, telling me that she will not welcome my mother's presence. My friends and loved ones were also shocked as to the extent of my mother's violence, and feared that she might very well have seen to the end of my father and me, if she had been so inclined.

It will be a long time before I heal from what my mother did, if at all. She still shamelessly parades the fact that she is my mother (as well as parades around the clothing that she took from my closet without my permission) as if nothing is wrong. I once did want children, but I now want to break this cycle; my theoretical child will not internalize any theoretical abuse from me. For that also, I have driven a knife into the second dream of finding the love of my life. Even if marriage laws did change overnight to the point where marriage would no longer be a man placing a proverbial noose about his neck, and hoping his wife won't open the trapdoor beneath him, I still can't go through with it. I just can't live with the fact that my mother hurt my father, and that I have the same capacity to be cruel.

If there is any advice men and boys, could take from my story, I beg, hear this: it is not worth the abuse to see someone's kind side. If someone truly loves you, that person would not justify hurting you in any way, shape, or form. TELL SOMEONE if you are being hurt by someone else, even if it is a loved one. I cannot emphasize this enough! Do not allow someone the power of your silence. Lastly, please understand that abuse can take any form; it does not have to be the carnival-type version of abuse that is shown to us on television and posters.

Thank you, Marian, for sharing your story. I hope you and your father are in a much better place.

In His Own Words/In Her Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

Shrink4Men Counseling, Coaching and Consulting Services

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier, PsyD provides confidential, fee-for-service, counseling, consultation and coaching services to help both men and women work through their relationship issues via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

The Bechdel Test, or how I learned to stop worrying about it and love character development

Catreece Macleod · 4 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

So, what is the Bechdel Test, and why does it seem to be so surprisingly difficult to pass such an apparently simple set of criteria?

The Bechdel Test is a straightforward method to determine whether a work of fiction—such as a movie, book, video game, or other piece of media—can meet absolute bare minimum feminist standards. The concept is that if you can't even pass such an easy test, you really can't be trying that hard.

The test comprises three criteria:

1. There must be at least two or more women (no men)
2. Who talk to each other
3. About something other than a man.

Huh. Well, that really does sound easy, doesn't it? So why do so many works fail the Bechdel Test? Is it some conspiracy against women? Is it some awful sexist portrayal in which women are only entrusted to talk about boys and have no valuable thoughts in their head otherwise? Is it due to female characters with speaking parts being so low in number that they rarely even pass the first rule?

The answer is a lot more complex than the question itself, as with pretty much anything that involves human interaction. There are, in fact, some minor sexist undertones to the problem, but probably not the ones you'd expect, and oddly enough, feminist ideology is actually at fault for several of the underlying problems, so let's explore this for a bit.

What is a man? Nothing but a pile of secrets! Wait, hrm. No. Well, maybe. Still, the question we have to ask before we begin is what's the difference between a man and a woman when it comes to fiction?

Obviously, there's a difference, real or imagined; otherwise, the test wouldn't be problematic in the first place.

For this, we need to understand that there are a few key things about human psychology that affect the thought process behind how we view men and women.

Women are, by their very nature, deemed to be valuable. A woman is important, special, something of value without needing to be anything more than a woman. She need not be especially intelligent, charming, or even particularly useful to fulfill the role of "nice to have around." A woman can be an arrogant, stuck-up waste of flesh, but as long as she's a woman, that's good enough.

Men, in contrast, are worthless in and of themselves unless they prove themselves to be somehow valuable. A man must actually do something. You respect women for being women, but men need to earn that respect. They have to somehow help the collective, or a woman, or otherwise be handy to have around in a mechanical sense. A man who can't slay a dragon is not a man at all.

Due to this dichotomy, we have a problem already. People tend to strive to prove themselves only when there's a need to prove themselves. This goes for all of humanity in general, with one's gender irrelevant to the discussion—people get up off their butts and get stuff done when it's required for survival or love. Without hoops to jump through, we, as a species, tend to quickly grow lethargic and stop putting much effort into anything.

As such, we have our first issue: the objectification of women. Men do stuff; women simply are. Not because women are incapable of doing stuff, but they just don't have any need to do stuff to be a woman, while the same is not true for men. This is a case where positive discrimination can have negative connotations—as long as women are deemed to be more valuable than men, women will never be as valuable by their deeds because they simply don't have that gun against their back for failure to be useful.

Equality has to start from the ground up: equality in value and equality in responsibility. So as long as a man has more responsibility and less value, he will forever be forced to be "better" than a woman, whether he wants to or not, in order to be deemed worth keeping around. It doesn't help that double standards such as this are insulting to everyone, as both men and women suffer when this kind of thing is enforced by society. Just keep in mind, it doesn't stem from a hatred of women—it stems from trying to put women on a pedestal and failing to consider the indirect consequences tied to that action.

So what does this have to do with the Bechdel Test? Quite simply, it funnels back to character design and motivations.

If you have a female character, you have to provide some awfully compelling reasons (note the plural) for her to do pretty much anything. With a male character, it's simple—he wants to be valued, either by a woman, or by society, or by other men. This is the easiest out there is because it means a male character can always be thrown together in record time. Just give him a group that looks down on him for not being manly enough and, ta-da, you now have a male character who can move the plot forward.

For a female character, it's a lot more difficult from the start since if she's going to do anything, you can't just have a group that wants to oust her from society for the sake of being useless—that would be deemed sexist. A woman who is useless? Throw her out! Wait … no, that's violence against women! Yeah, so you can't do that. This means that writing a female character involves a more complex backstory to make her do pretty much anything. As such, this pretty much rules female characters out almost entirely from being a background character.

Toss in that violence against women is deemed evil, while violence against men is perfectly acceptable, and you basically have written women out of 90% of the possible roles they could fill already. With that in mind, suddenly we see how easy it is to fail the Bechdel Test; most movies can't even get past the first rule of having two or more women with speaking parts, and if they do toss in a female with a speaking part, it's often just a background character who gives a generic report or informs someone of something, yet she doesn't say anything that a man couldn't say, nor does she actually influence the plot in any relevant way.

Ah, and you thought it was over there? No. No, no, no. I'm afraid not. The rabbit hole goes much deeper, unfortunately.

If it were just a matter of female characters being more difficult to write and requiring more time for backstory, it would still mean most quality written works would have lots of well-written female characters as they'd be a great incentive for the writer not to rely on lazy writing techniques like they can with male characters. So … why, then, are female characters still so sparse in general, even among well-written works?

Well, there's a few more issues at fault here, some of them we've lightly touched on already, some we haven't.

For instance, the whole "women are special for being women" thing rears its ugly head yet again, and we find that making a unique male character is actually pretty easy—give him a whacky personality, tons of flaws, just dress him up with absurd attire, it's all good. Men absolutely have to strive to stand out from the crowd, so making a male character who is unique is pretty easy since men will tend toward extremes, even risky ones that people would think are strange or stupid, much more readily. Bad attention is still attention, after all.

Let's take an example: Alex Louis Armstrong from the famed Fullmetal Alchemist. He's got an absurdly large mustache, muscles all over, and prances about in a silly manner with sparkles and glitter. Seriously, I'm not joking here. He stands out as a character not only because his character has been passed down the Armstrong family line for generations but also because he takes his masculinity to absurd levels of silliness and it works.

Now, let's consider the reversal: a female character who has large breasts, a voluptuous body, and is a grease monkey. In this case (not Winry Rockbell, as she's actually well written and isn't a supermodel), it's cry after cry of objectification and sexism; she can't take her body to ludicrous levels without being considered only an object, even if she has a traditionally masculine role to offset it.

With male characters, you can do so much more with them. A man can be defined as any male who provides a useful service to society. Giant minotaur? No problem as long as you're friendly! What about a female minotaur? We-ell, no. Unfortunately, she's now deemed ugly, unless she's vastly more anthropomorphic than the male variant, as was found back in the World of Warcraft beta over a decade ago, when both male and female players insisted they didn't want Tauren women to look so bestial. Turns out even women don't like playing ugly female characters and don't associate monsters with being female.

Women in the media are a bit limited; sure, they get more options for clothing and how to pretty themselves up, but in the end they're limited to types of prettiness since they have to maintain the aspect of womanhood—a woman must look, sound, and act like a woman to be deemed a woman. Pvt. Vasquez in Aliens? Not a woman. Sure, she had breasts and made some gender-based jokes, but she's considered too butch to count as feminine and therefore the rules for men apply instead of the rules for women. The strong, independent woman isn't what people want, not even feminists, or they'd be praising her constantly over Ellen Ripley, who was largely useless except for when her motherly instinct kicked in. Ripley tried to be useful a few times but was largely viewed as "I guess you can, if you want, but you don't have to. You're valuable without being useful," except by the soldiers who viewed her as exactly that—useless until she provided some useful information. Jenette Vasquez, however, was "one of the guys" precisely because she was useful all the time and acted with the male mindset of having something to prove.

Regardless, I digress; we have more to cover. Much more.

Sexism is a problem, even when it's positive, as we've already seen. "You wouldn't hit a girl, would you?" is a major issue in particular.

Consider the idea of harming a woman for a moment … now consider the idea of harming a man. It's not the same, is it? Harming anyone should be abhorrent, yet that's not what we see in practice. A woman being harmed is supposedly far worse, and even the feminists can agree with me on this because they're the ones screaming that it's okay for a woman to hit a man but not for a man to defend himself from a woman who's attacking him.

Indeed, check any media and you'll see this played out time and again. You don't get a horror movie because a man was hurt. It's no big deal, so who cares? It's horror because a woman was hurt. This is how we know the villain is evil as well: he hurt a woman. How dare he.

In fact, let's consider the mere concept of killing a woman. You will never see this unless:

1. It is a horror movie (killing a man is not horrible enough to make it a horror movie).

2. She is shown not to be a "real woman," thereby undoing her special right as a woman to protection. That is, she is an alien (e.g., Aliens, Blade Runner), she has all the negative characteristics of a man (Aliens), or she is an out-and-out protagonist who is clearly crazy and a murderer (e.g., Misery, Fatal Attraction).

3. She threatens the life of an innocent woman (Shining Through, Fatal Attraction, and Total Recall).

4. She has been seen in no more than three scenes (we have not gotten to know her—she is not a "real woman" to us).

5. The rest of the movie is focused on avenging her death (Death Wish), > making it, in essence, a morality film showing us that a woman killed leads to a man killed.

The above list is word for word from a class headed by a female scriptwriter and is quite literally the rules that writers use in the industry on how to handle female characters' deaths.

The fact of the matter is that you can't hurt a woman, nor can you kill her. If you do, you must adhere to strict limitations as to what is acceptable; otherwise, it's viewed as cruelty and sexism toward women. Which is odd, because treating a woman like a man is equality—yet it's cited as sexism. Go figure.

Even Anita Sarkeesian is quite adamant about these things, pointing out that women are not allowed to be harmed in any way, shape, or form in video games or it's sexist. Sure, going into a restaurant and murdering the all-male staff is fine, but kill a stripper and you'll get penalized for it.

Unfortunately, this "harm" is so broadly defined that it covers too much to do much of anything with a female character. You can't even criticize a female character or you're demeaning a woman and treating her as stupid, and therefore are being sexist. You can't have her face the consequences of poor decisions or actions, nor can you really hurt her in general.

Here's a little secret to writing—conflict exists in virtually all forms of storytelling, with the four standard types classified as Man against Man, Man against Society, Man against Nature, and Man against Self. You may notice that little stipulation about it being Man in conflict—the reason for this is that conflict isn't there for the purpose of there being conflict, it's just the surface element that is used to push the real purpose behind it forward: suffering.

In all storytelling, everything in the story must have a purpose: every description, every action, every element. There is always a purpose. In the case of conflict, the purpose is not to have an action scene but rather to wound the protagonist.

Why wound the protagonist? It's the easiest and, arguably, the only method of character growth. A character who is harmed must strive to better oneself, to overcome the pain, or to solve the problem. Without harming a character physically, emotionally, psychologically, or in some other manner, that character is unable to grow and become better than they are. This is exactly why Mary Sue–style characters are so bloody boring; they never face a challenge, they're never on the losing side, never the underdog—they never have to fight for survival, nor do they suffer. The audience never generates any sort of sympathy for them.

This is a large part of why, for example, you'll notice that Superman is not the core of any Superman movie, comic, or other media centered around him. He can't be hurt. He's essentially perfect. As such, the point isn't that conflict exists in relation to Superman himself but rather that conflict matters to those around Superman. Everything that happens that's of interest happens to the characters surrounding Superman; he's a setting, a backdrop, a framework for the narrative, but he isn't the true protagonist.

To generate character development, you absolutely have to harm the character, and conflict is the most common method. With a female character, since you're not allowed to harm them, you can't make them grow or better themselves in the vast majority of situations. You can't cut off a woman's hand for being a thief, then expect the audience to be okay about that as they would about a man receiving the same treatment. You can't injure her, hurt her, harm her, or kill her. She's limited by our protection of women, and as such, she's largely useless as a protagonist or antagonist since she not only has no motivation to do anything, but you also can't give her a motivation to do anything.

If you look at this in practice, you get movies like Frozen, in which the protagonist, Elsa, doesn't really learn anything, never really grows, and never really suffers. She freezes her entire kingdom, nearly kills her sister, and generally does a lot of terrible things, yet these are never allowed to truly harm her. She becomes withdrawn, yet fails to really take responsibility for her actions.

Which segues into yet another issue—responsibility.

Women in the media are not allowed to take responsibility for their actions, even if they want to. It's always someone else's fault, always some other issue causing them to act a certain way, always some external force acting upon them.

A woman is pure, without evil, unless evil is introduced to her artificially, or at least this is the narrative that has been forced upon us, and one that writers are forced to work with. You can't make a woman suffer the consequences for her actions or take responsibility for things she did wrong as something that was her choice. If she screws up, it's only because external factors forced her to.

Unfortunately, Spider-Man's Uncle Ben had it wrong—it's not "with great power comes great responsibility," but rather the reverse. By accepting great responsibility, you gain great power. When you say that you could have done something different, you accept the power to make that choice differently the next time.

If a woman is raped, she's told that she could do nothing to have changed it, and she has zero responsibility for the situation leading up to such. In reality, all this does is shelter her from her true capacity for power—to make a decision that could protect her in the future. This overprotection from responsibility prevents her from ever truly growing as an individual; the conflict occurs, but the character growth (even if it's in reality) fails to be gained, defeating the purpose of the conflict in the first place in a work of fiction.

A character absolutely must be capable of saying they screwed up and accepting the consequences for such if they are to be useful as a primary character in a storyline, regardless of medium. Without this capacity, the character simply can't be a protagonist. And without the ability to hang the burden of responsibility around their neck, they can't be the antagonist.

As such, the vast majority of female main characters, both protagonists and antagonists, are largely weakly written characters with no real purpose or value to the storyline. When excuses have to be made up for their failings, they fail to be valuable in telling the story and cease to be worth writing about at all.

And therein lies the true problem of the Bechdel Test—any half-decent script must have all its elements exist as an intentional addition with a purpose behind such. This means you can't just have two random female characters who have no value to the plot having a conversation that doesn't relate to the plot; otherwise, it's simply bad writing and will fall to the editing floor because it's pointless.

Therefore, the plot must be referenced, and as we've just covered, female characters, due to the limitations of such, make for remarkably poor protagonists and antagonists, so you're going to have either a male or a monster, which is assumed to be male by default. As such, the vast bulk of conversations about the plot almost invariably must include reference to either the protagonist or the antagonist, and by which action causes the work to fail the Bechdel Test.

In fact, the very things that are harmful to men are also the very things that make them stronger: pain, suffering, being ostracized from a group, having no innate value, being required to prove themselves, being expendable … the list goes on and on. Yet these all lead to the same path: strife generates character development. It doesn't necessitate positive character development, but it does ensure that some sort of character development is at least possible. Someone who is comfortable with their position in life will never rise to the challenge if there is no challenge to rise to, so they have to actively put themselves into risky positions so as to artificially generate that challenge.

Regardless, what this means is that female characters are heavily crippled just as actual women are by our overprotective society. Until a woman, or a female character, has the chance to seriously harm herself, she can never truly become more than she currently is, much less become an important part of the plot. Plot is what moves the story forward, it's the march of change, the journey from one state to another, and without harm or threat of harm as a catalyst for change, there can be only stagnation.

So interestingly enough, what will make more movies and video games pass the Bechdel Test is… equality. Actual equality. Treating women as poorly as men are treated and telling them to woman up is what forces them to do their best, and pulling away all the safety nets to save them is what ensures that most will succeed—they can't afford to fail. The downside is … some will be lost in the process. Some will fail, and some will fall, and they will make quite the unpleasant "splat" as they greet the concrete below. Until we're willing to let women fail, in reality and in fictional media, we simply won't see the Bechdel Test passed with any sort of consistency.

Because of this, there are remarkably few ways to successfully pass the Bechdel Test due to the nature of what we deem to be acceptable culturally. Most of those methods involve cop-outs, such as writing a scene that has no place of value in the script as it doesn't have any relevance to the plot; having an arbitrarily decided upon all-female cast that largely fails for the reasons above; or ignoring the cultural rules and creating a truly strong, empowered female character—the kind that feminists would absolutely abhor with the burning passion of one thousand suns because she would get the absolute crap kicked out of her and would actually confess to screwing up so as to cause the beatdown in the first place.

So, oddly enough, the ideal method of passing the Bechdel Test with good writing … is to write a cast of characters that the very people who complain about things not passing the Bechdel Test would be screaming about being sexist because the alternative options simply lead to bad writing.

And now you know why the Bechdel Test is so hard to pass. It's not culturally acceptable to pass it unless you resort to bad writing techniques to bypass the positive discrimination in favour of women that prevents them from being able to be employed as useful characters in the plot. In fact, the only way to pass it with even vaguely competent writing is to add things that are considered sexist or misogynistic, which defeats the whole purpose of passing it, so it's not like there's any real incentive to want to pass it in the first place since it's not going to actually make anyone happy anyway.

Domestic violence double standards: Shackles for men, chuckles for women

Tom Golden · 5 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Ray Rice got a raw deal.

We are living in a world of huge double standards when it comes to domestic violence and our men are on the bad end of the deal. When a man commits domestic violence he is punished very harshly. But when a woman commits domestic violence she gets cheers, chuckles or is all too often ignored.

Just look at what happened to Ray Rice.

The video of the incident showed Rice's girlfriend (and soon-to-be wife) hitting him twice, once before getting on the elevator and once on the elevator. Then it shows her moving aggressively toward him in what appears to be an attempt to strike him a third time. (Please note this not a defenseless woman cowering in the corner.) Rice responds by hitting her in the face and she hits her head on a handrail, which then knocks her out. The eventual response to this incident? Ban Ray Rice from his lucrative association with the NFL by and fire him from his team, the Baltimore Ravens. These two things obviously shame him, put a big DV on his forehead, cut off his income, his prestige, and his association with his friends and teammates. A very harsh and far too stringent response in my opinion. But wait. What would happen if we reversed the roles here?

Let's see.

Imagine this: Ray Rice hits his girlfriend before getting on the elevator and then again on the elevator. Then moves aggressively toward her in what appears to be a third attempt to hit her. As he moves in to hit her, she hits him in the face and he hits his head on a handrail, knocking him out. What is the response to this? My guess is she would get accolades and be seen as a hero, a woman who successfully protected herself from an abuser. She would likely be on talk shows and be held up as a role model for all women. Rice would likely be arrested for domestic violence while she is seen as a hero.

Do you see the problem here? For the same behavior she is a hero and he is shamed and banished.

So Ray Rice was not guilty of beating up on a completely defenseless woman. No. As we previously described, this was not some cowering woman in the corner covering her face with her arms and hoping not to be hit; this was an aggressive woman who had already struck him twice and was moving in for the third blow. This is very different from a defenseless women. Yes, Ray needs to take responsibility for hitting her, but doesn't she need to take responsibility for hitting him? Isn't she clearly guilty of domestic violence? I read quite a few articles on this incident, and I simply don't remember ever seeing her violence addressed. No one ever mentioned it. Just another example of the huge double standard we face. It is so powerful that the media simply ignores the violence of women. The YouTube video with this article shows numerous women who were violent in relationship and what was the response? Laughter and very little.

I think the NFL really blew it on this one.

The punishment he received was far from helpful. What sort of help might he get from being banished from his profession? What sort of help might it give his wife? None. The sad fact is that the NFL acted like a cowardly white knight who was more than willing to throw Mr. Rice under the team bus in order to appear that they didn't hate women and had uber concern about the issue of domestic violence. It just seems like one big disgusting play for image by the NFL. A play that ignores the humanity of both Rice and his wife.

What happens to the man on the street who hits a woman? Is he tossed out of his job as punishment? No. Is he banned from working in his profession? Highly unlikely. Is he offered some form of counseling or educational opportunity that might help him deal with his mess? Yes, usually, and in severe cases people go to jail, but apparently the Ray Rice situation found that he was best served by this former alternative but the NFL stepped in and amped up the ante to an extremely humiliating degree.

Does the fact that she didn't hit as hard matter? Not really. If a 5' 7" 150 lb man came to me in therapy and said that he had hit a pro football player twice in an elevator and was moving toward him again to land a third blow and he got knocked out, what would I tell him? Would I tell him that he should have the pro football player arrested and that he was a victim? Or should I tell him that his behavior was a part of this equation. Duh. Why doesn't Mrs. Rice get the same treatment? Because we are living in a gynocentric world that holds men accountable and fails to do the same for women.

If we are going to let women off and not hold them accountable for domestic violence than we need to do the same with men. If we are truly equal it is the only fair thing to do.

In His Own Words: Scenes from an abusive marriage

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 5 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is day 5 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Verbal, a longtime member of the Shrink4MenForum, shares vignettes from his marriage to an emotionally and physically abusive monster — his wife.

I have been married to my wife, whom I shall refer to here as The Crazy Lady (TCL), since 1995. She presents many of the symptoms common to the Narcissistic Personality Disorder type. During the period roughly spanning the years 2000 to 2005, she was regularly verbally and physically abusive towards me. During that period I documented a small number of her attacks on the advice of a couple of mental health professionals. Here are a few of the more memorable attacks, excerpted for your reading pleasure.

Circa April 2001. I went grocery shopping with the kids (I would usually take them with me). TCL had given me a list and told me get those things only. At the store, I got all the stuff on the list, plus I picked up a bag of macaroni. I did this because we talked about me helping out by making dinner sometimes, such as cooking up some macaroni. Besides, it seems like a good staple to have around.

When I came home and we unpacked the groceries, she confronted me on the macaroni. I explained why I bought it, even though it wasn't on the list. She went into a rage, smashed the bag open on the kitchen floor, and verbally abused me with a stream of profanity. She interpreted my action (buying off the list) as a direct affront to her. While I was kneeling on the floor trying to sweep up the mess, she kicked me several times. She then taunted me for being so slow to clean it up.

Circa June 2001. One evening while we were in the kitchen, there was an argument about something (I don't remember what). She slapped/punched/kicked me several times. While I had my back to her, she picked up a kitchen knife and held the point to my back (didn't break the skin), and said through clenched teeth that she hated me so much that she wanted to kill me.

17 Aug 2001. (Background: we still hadn't put away all our stuff from our move the previous year. Our dining room was storage for several partially unpacked boxes.) While I was kneeling on the floor picking up the kids' toys, TCL came in holding our daughter. We began to argue about why I haven't contributed more to putting the house in order. She gestured to a large rolled-up strand of Christmas lights and asked me, how hard would it be to put those away? I didn't have a good answer, except that the daily household chores take precedence.

She picked up the roll of lights and hit me about a half-dozen times across the back and neck. Throughout, TCL held our daughter in her other arm. Our daughter was bawling and saying, "Dada! Dada!" After TCL stopped, she said to me, "If I have to go to jail, when I get out, I will kill you. I will stab you in the chest until you are dead. Do you understand that?" I said yes, but why would you go to jail? She said that I had welts on my neck.

I raised my hand up to feel, and sure enough, there were several good-sized welts on my neck. I think this was the same outburst where she took some of my shirts, put them in the kitchen sink, and poured bleach over them. Later the next day, I vacuumed up tiny bits of glass that had broken off the strand of lights.

20 Aug 2001. On our drive back from a trip to the ocean, we got into an argument over how our daughter got her finger crunched by the car door (fortunately, it didn't require medical attention) while in my care. TCL She pulled a pencil from the glove compartment and jabbed my leg. She pulled my sunglasses off my face and broke them into pieces. This all occurred as I was driving the car down the freeway at 60 miles per hour, with the kids in the back.

21 Aug 2001. I went up to the bedroom after talking to the pastor who married us on the phone. I said that I thought it would be good for us to meet with him. I repeated his statement that he felt that the real TCL wanted to make it work. Result: outrage.

She said that I am an arrogant bastard for thinking such a thing. She said, "This is the real TCL," and then proceeded to hit me on the head and arm, saying over and over, "Did you tell him about this? Huh? Did you tell him about this?" I lied and said no, feeling there was no need to further inflame her. I went downstairs, and she followed me to the kitchen, whereupon she grabbed and squeezed my testicles.

This transpired while I was holding our daughter in one arm and pouring milk into her sippy-cup with the other, so I was unable to immediately fend off TCL. She kept bellowing at me to get out. To defuse the situation, I complied and slept in the car.

25 Aug 2001. I had taken the kids to the park, and when we returned home, our son started having a fit. He had gotten hungry while we were out and needed to eat. While I was making a sandwich for him, he had a meltdown. TCL came in to help calm him down. She then accused me of poor parenting. She escalated. She punched me several times, and told me to get out.

I went upstairs to the bathroom. She came in and punched/slapped me several times more. She hit me with her hairbrush until it broke into two pieces. A few minutes later, I lay down in the den for a quiet moment. TCL came in and took up the argument again. She threw a box at me, and smacked me with a small plastic tray.

As I was lying down, she climbed on my chest and slapped/punched me several times more. I told her she had to stop hitting. She said, "I don't have to take orders from you. I can do whatever I want." She then said, "If you tell anyone that I hit you, I will lie and say it never happened."

2 Sep 2001. That night, she went at me verbally. Let me paraphrase the most disturbing part: "If we split and you get custody of the kids, I will find you and kill you. No — better yet, I will kill your mother. Even if I am in jail, I will arrange it from the inside. It is not that hard to arrange a hit. What do you think of that? Huh? Huh? Why don't you go tell the pastor who married us that?"

She is saying all this with her face a few inches from mine, like a scene from a bad Hollywood script. I told her I thought she needed help, seeing as she is threatening to kill people.

2 Nov 2001. I spent the morning on a field trip with our son's pre-school class to visit an aviation museum. I took him to the church, where we got into the bus with the rest of his class, his teacher, and other parents, for the trip to the museum. Upon returning home from the trip, I took our son upstairs where TCL was, and asked him to tell mama about his trip to the museum.

TCL interjected and asked me if I had put our son in his booster seat on the bus. I replied no, and explained that I didn't think of it at the time. None of the other 14 children on the bus had booster seats, so I didn't have that cue to jog my memory. All the children wore the lap belts provided on the bus. TCL felt that not putting our son in his booster seat for the bus ride was an act of extreme neglect and indifference to the physical safety of our child.

A 30-40 minute diatribe followed. Finally, I left the room to read books to our daughter in her bedroom. As I was sitting on the floor, TCL came into the room and, without warning, kicked me in my lower back, either with her knee or heel (I couldn't see). My lower back was sore for several days. Special note: TCLhas maintained that she did not kick me during this incident. She opined that I might have injured my back at work. I don't think she is trying to lie. Rather, I truly believe that she has no recollection of having kicked me. She was so escalated that one can theorize she experienced some sort of memory blackout.

Christmas Holiday 2001. Over the course of a few days during the holidays, TCL hit me with a total of two to three dozen open handed slaps to the left side of my face. A mild bruise, purplish at first, then yellow, was visible around my left eye.

28 Dec 2002. We were driving to IKEA with the kids in the back of the car. TCL began asking me why, six months earlier, I had let our son play on a lakeside beach while I tended to our daughter on a swing 50 yards away. On many occasions, I have maintained that I instructed our son to not go near the water while I was with our daughter, and he complied. Since I am a non-swimmer, but our son cooperates with my instructions, I felt it was a safe choice. TCL has disagreed vociferously. She believes that I think that I am a strong swimmer, when in fact I know that I am nothing of the sort (I only swim with fins and snorkel).

During the drive on the freeway, she went into a rage. She told me to pull off onto the median and get out of the car. I refused to do so, and she threatened to grab the wheel and cause us to crash. I replied that I thought that was a really bad idea. She then jerked the wheel and let go, causing the car to nearly lurch out of its lane. She then did this a second time.

Moments later, as we were driving on surface streets, I again refused to stop in the middle of traffic and get out. She then pounded a metal-cased tape measure on my right hand (which was on the shifter) and forearm. She hit me there again with the hard heel of her shoe. The blows left visible swelling and bruising on my arm. To reiterate, this all occurred as the car was in motion, with our two children in the back seat.

Her physical and verbal attacks gradually subsided to the point where they are rare. Yes, I am still married to her. I have stayed to keep our children under one roof, and they are now in high school. The marriage exists as a social, economic and logistical unit. It is in no way a marriage based on love and mutual respect. There is no sex or any kind of affection. The writing is on the wall.

In His Own Words/In Her Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

Not happy with the law? Make up your own!

Gary Costanza · 5 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

The story of Emma Sulkowicz carrying a mattress around Columbia University to symbolize the pain she carries because of an alleged sexual assault by a man on campus two years ago and her school's refusal to expel him helps to answer some questions many of us have been asking:

Why do women earn less?

Why is feminism ridiculed?

Sulkowicz claims to have been raped and choked by a sometimes boyfriend one night in 2012 in her dorm room. She reported the incident seven months later to the university, who eventually found the accused "not responsible."

In May 2014, she finally went to the police, hoping to prosecute a fellow student whom she feared walking into on campus. Since the police investigation is ongoing and her alleged assailant is walking free on campus, she elected to "create" the endurance performance art piece called "Carry That Weight" as her visual arts senior thesis.

From CBS New York:
"Rape can happen anywhere, but I was attacked in my own dorm bed," she said. "For me that place that is normally very intimate and pure was desecrated and is very fraught. The piece is about carrying the memory of that everywhere I go."

From nymag.com:
Sulkowicz says she was impressed by how Brown students rallied behind Lena Sclove, a Brown student who publicized the name of a male student who was given a yearlong suspension for "sexual misconduct" against her, when they felt the punishment was not severe enough. The Brown Daily Herald published his name and he subsequently withdrew from the university altogether. "I was recently friended on Facebook by Lena Sclove, who has been such an inspiration for me, and to see the way that she was able to create a safe space for herself definitely made me realize that after I had made the police report I had that as an option to me as well." Sulkowicz says.

She's making a safe space for HERSELF ONLY by singling out particular men, trampling their civil rights, ridiculing them, and using vigilantism to ostracize and slander them. This type of harassment is one of the worst kinds of bullying and has in the past resulted in revenge killings and suicide. So, I guess if you're not content with the legal and moral avenues available to you, and you're an activist using personal experience and anecdotes to replace justice—just make up your own laws!

Sulkowicz says carrying the mattress will build muscle and get her physically and emotionally stronger. Please, to feel safer, carry pepper spray; don't start a witch hunt, kangaroo court, or lynching. You don't seem shamed or fearful (you're carrying a mattress, for crying out loud), and you're acting more like a lynch mob than a social justice warrior. Remember due process?

Note to self: Don't like someone? Make THEM get out of YOUR space. How? Threaten them with bathroom graffiti and feminist vigilantes.

A quick quiz:
1. How to be safe on campus:

a. Carry pepper spray
b. Carry a mattress

1. How to get attention on campus:

a. Carry pepper spray
b. Carry a mattress

The Columbia Spectator published the name of the accused from rape list fliers and bathroom wall graffiti (by multiple signers) spread by unnamed vigilantes sympathetic to Sulkowicz. The Spectator published the man's name because (they say): feminists wanted them to there was a police report, three students have accused this man, and because his name was on a "rape list." I thought past history couldn't be brought up? Oh that's right, that's for the REAL justice system, not kangaroo courts and the feminist media. Someone should put up a LIBELER and VIGILANTE list with Emma Sulkowicz's name on top! Are all Emmas radical feminists with no regard for civil rights and due process?

So, according to Sulkowicz and student feminist groups like "No Red Tape Columbia," the truth is irrelevant: if they say it happened, it happened, and if any woman is "uncomfortable" on campus, hang/expel the man immediately.

We don't know what happened, but if what she says is true—choking, slapping, and nonconsensual anal sex—that's assault and rape, definitely a police matter. She said she screamed for him to stop, something that could be verified, but the accused was found "not responsible" three times by the university due to lack of evidence. It WOULD suck if it comes down to "he said, she said" and it really happened. But to assume guilt as many feminists do—"women never lie about rape"—would further encourage women to anonymously falsely accuse men of rape.

It's not always clear-cut and black and white. What other things could have happened? It's possible that when he started anal sex, she got mad but allowed it, later regretting it, and calling it rape. Or he may be totally innocent. It's possible, you know.

No one heard her screaming? I guess not. Why didn't she report it immediately, and to the police? She said she was "embarrassed" to call authorities and when questioned by the police was made to feel like a "criminal." She said the college mishandled the case, asking ignorant questions and "left her feeling even more traumatized and unsafe. I've never felt more shoved under the rug in my life." Regardless, questions need to be asked—however painful—to find the truth. Feminists talk about the stigma attached to rape yet fall back on that as an excuse for rape-shield laws and victim-friendly rules THAT PERPETUATE THE STIGMA! Rather than not allowing "embarrassing" questions, let's fight the stigma by candidly telling what happened and answering all questions confidently.

From the NY Times:
Another factor, college officials and students say, is that the stigma that has kept most rape victims silent, while still strong, has eased, leading to a sharp increase in the number of attacks reported to college officials.

Feminists and the MSM want to have it both ways—"the stigma (and oppression), while still strong, has eased" but of course "more work has to be done."

Despite what feminists say, there is no "epidemic" of rape and sexual assault (epidemic: "spreading unusually quickly and extensively"). Like Mike Buchanan said about "Everyday Sexism," these are whiners and complainers who exaggerate microaggressions and wallow in victimhood and weakness. As the saying goes, "Go out looking for one thing, and that's all you'll ever find."—Robert Flaherty

Some falsely accused men are fighting back and suing their colleges for lack of due process, libel, slander, and Title IX violations of sex discrimination. Because feminists have taken over many of our institutions and feel a sense of invincibility, women like Sulkowicz have no qualms about smearing someone's name and reputation despite the facts. One of the accusers of this man (there were three) claimed he forced a kiss on her—hardly rape, not even close, yet it's lumped in with rape and written on bathroom walls on campus. There is an investigation being made, and I hope the bigots/vandals/vigilantes get sued big-time.

I'll let commenter Dale from nytimes.com conclude:

Dale
Lanoka Harbor, NJ 3 May 2014

"It is a long-running concept in U.S. criminal law that one can only be found guilty of a crime if it is beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused has committed it. Now, the administration wants to weaken this fundamental protection of due process and wants private entities, institutions of higher learning in this case, to serve as judicial bodies without the protections in place that criminal courts have to follow in order to protect those involved in the proceedings.

"This is an extremely dangerous precedent and an underhanded way to sidestep the Constitution. Someone accused of a crime, especially such a heinous crime as sexual assault, should be afforded the protections promulgated by the Constitution and other aspects of criminal law.

"Once the right of due process is eliminated for certain crimes, how long will it be before due process is denied for people accused of other crimes?

"Sexual assault should be taken seriously, of course. However, dealing with it by throwing out due process and the concept of guilty beyond a reasonable doubt is the wrong way to go about it."

Sulkowicz says she'll carry the mattress until she graduates in 2015 if necessary. If anyone sees her without the mattress, ask her what happened to it and if she'd like to share yours. Wait … better not, your name might end up on a bathroom wall.

Extra credit question:

Someone is attacking you in a closed elevator. Should you …

a. stand there and take it like a punching bag
b. fight back and defend yourself

Note: (b.) only allowed against males, unless you're a female.

Here's how fearful Emma Sulkowicz is of the rape culture and how the patriarchy is ignoring women's voices:

4/7/14 – We drool while feminists rule – Gillibrand, McCaskill, and Sulkowicz:

> Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand Seeks Funds To Fight College Campus Sex Assaults

5/3/14

5/13/14
http://nymag.com/daily/intelligencer/2014/05/columbia-graffiti-names-rapists-on-campus.html

5/13/14

5/13/14 – NOT a safe space for a few men!
https://bwog.com/2014/05/13/list-of-names-of-alleged-rapists-written-on-bathroom-walls/

5/15/14
http://time.com/99780/campus-sexual-assault-emma-sulkowicz/

5/16/14
http://bwog.com/2014/05/16/emma-sulkowicz-files-police-report-for-sexual-assault/

5/16/14 – Here the Spectator names his name.
http://columbiaspectator.com/news/2014/05/16/frustrated-columbias-inaction-student-reports-sexual-assault-police

5/18/14
http://nymag.com/daily/intelligencer/2014/05/columbia-spectator-prints-name-from-rape-list.html

9/2/14 – It's been months since she had national exposure, so … (media hound much? This is really sick, slick, and sickeningly one-sided) http://time.com/3259455/columbia-student-pledges-to-carry-a-mattress-every-day-till-alleged-rapist-leaves-campus/

9/3/14

> Columbia Student Carrying Mattress Around Until Alleged Rapist Is Expelled

See my YouTube channel jerrytheother.

Feminism’s first act of female supremacy?

AVfM Video Source · 5 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Historical perspective: it’s not always as cut-and-dried as you think.

For more cutting questions, you may want to subscribe.

More fun with numbers, Terrence Popp style

AVfM Video Source · 5 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Terrence Popp of Redonkulas.com offers up a bit of MGTOW humor for the weekend.

IHOW: Diary of a man married to an alcoholic borderline

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 6 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 6 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Mike shares some of his journal entries, which he used to document his highly likely Borderline Personality Disordered ex-wife's abuse of him.

11/19/11: Our son went to a friend's house at about 6pm so we were alone in the house. She makes the comment that we used to look forward to these times and would have sex. I agree and mention, yet again, that I would love to feel close to her again but I can't because she treats me like a sub-human, and is sarcastic and condescending to me so I don't feel that way. She then goes into this rant on how she just NEEDS to "GET FUCKED!"!

Strange. So we go around and around with her saying that I'm not close to her and with me stating that I can't be as long as she continues to make fun of me when she gets upset, especially in front of the kids. But she can't seem to grasp why that bothers me for some reason. And we spend the night going over the same damn things again and again and again and again and again. (Ah the familiar round and round of circular arguments.)

I made a recording of some of it on my laptop. I went up to bed at around 9:30 and guess that I didn't say good night. She came stomping upstairs and starts ripping me a new one saying all kinds of crazy stuff. Slams the door on her way down stairs and you could hear her screaming throughout the house in her rage. A few minutes later she came back upstairs and quietly climbs into bed (tactic change!) She puts her arm over my chest and starts to snuggle with me. I'm like huh?!?!

I ask her to move over and she starts talking in that half crying voice saying that she NEEDS to be held. I again ask her to move over. She says the needs to be held line again. I tell her that although I want to hold her I think that would be rewarding her mean, dehumanizing behaviors towards me and gently lift her arm off of me. The next thing I know I am seeing stars, and then I realize that she had just swung in the dark and punched me in the eye. I pinned her down for fear of being struck again, then quickly packed a bag and yet again left for the good old Red Roof Inn.

11/20/11: Came home asked if she wanted to talk. Yet again I explained my position that I cannot and will not reach out to her because I have been burned by her behaviors so many times in the past. She had nothing to say so I went to read the paper in the kitchen, she comes in after a while and tells me that she feels inadequate compared to me. I'm good at my job, successful, etc. I say that it's not a competition; it's a partnership in a relationship. She gets a little miffed at that and states the IT IS a competition.

Then she goes on to tell me how nobody likes me because I am so obnoxious and sarcastic to everyone. She tells me how our son doesn't like me also for those reasons. Then she goes on to say that she is not sure if she wants to be in this relationship and that she sought out someone else because I was not close to her. (Well DUH!) I yet again say that I can't feel close to someone who belittles me when they get upset about ANYTHING.

I go to the grocery store and when I get back she makes the comment that she is so surprised and hurt that I have not reached out to her. I just say that since she is the one who said that she is not sure if she wants to be in this relationship that the onus is on her to make that move. She makes the comment that after I go out with my friends I am horny the next day. She said that proves I am gay. I tell her that it's because I had a break from her and forgot what she was like for a little while. She replies that I should go fuck (my best friend) then in the same breath says I should go fuck my ex-girlfriend (from 20+ years ago), she knows that I want to.

Then she gets physical, she kicks the footstool at me; I push it back onto its legs. She grabs the pint glass of microbrew that I had just poured and throws it against the wall behind me; beer and glass now cover the area where our son plays his xbox. She makes joking comments about my manhood and penis size then grabs the glass coffee table attempting to throw it at me. I grab her and push her into the couch to stop her, then I go upstairs and dump her wine and the small bottle of Jack Daniels that she bought down the drain.

In retaliation, she dumped the other 5 of my microbrews. I watched to make sure she didn't chug them as she has done in the past and go back downstairs. She comes back down and in between other nasty, mean and disgusting comments says that she did cheat on me. Then she went out to the garage to smoke. Later, I went out to make sure she didn't do anything to my car or the overnight bag still in my car from the hotel last night. Nope, all secure except that she was rifling thru the ashtray in my car and left it open. Strange. When I came back in she is saying that I broke her toe in the scuffle over the glass coffee table and is suddenly hobbling and complaining about it.

After a few minutes she goes out and buys beer, I avoid her for the rest of the night. She does come to the foot of the stairs a few times to try and impress her "views" on me, which I ignore. At one point she is explicitly going off on how she wanted to be fucked. "Bent over the couch with a thumb up her ass!!", she screams. (Our son's bedroom door is right next to the basement door, so I'm sure that he heard that whole thing.)

At 9 pm I come up from the basement and watch some TV, and then at 10pm I try to fall asleep on the couch. At 10:15 she comes out and uses the bathroom, goes back to bed. At 10:30 she comes out, flips the hall lights on, uses the bathroom, comes out, deliberately stops to turn the bathroom fan on, leaves the lights on and goes back to bed. She knows that the bathroom fan drives me crazy and the light on game is also in her top 10 list of favorite little tortures for me.

I go upstairs and shut them both off. At 10:45 she is moaning and complaining very loudly (trying a new tactic out on me). I go offer her aspirin, she is looking for compassion (attention) but I have little because she was fine enough to go out and get beer for herself. I go back downstairs and she starts knocking loudly on the bedroom wall. I rush back upstairs as I think it's rude and selfish of her to wake up our son, I offer to put a pillow under her foot, she starts ripping me a new one. I look her straight in the eye and tell her that she is indeed filled with pure evil. Then she starts in with her rant about how gay she thinks I am, I walk out and downstairs to get my coat, time for the hotel again.

She follows me out making these disgusting sounds with her mouth (simulating a BJ), and when I turn around to face her she is at the top of the stairs with a ceramic sconce taken off the wall in her hands raised up over her head and ready to throw down at me. I duck into to dining room as that would have easily killed me and get my coat/shoes on. She comes down and sees what I'm doing and says that I'm going to waste more money on a hotel again. (Enter yet another change in tactics!) She says that she'll stop if I don't go; I walk past her and go to the hotel arriving at about midnight. Glad that I planned ahead and packed some clothes in a bag in my car when she went out for beer.

11/21/11: I come home from work and she is sleeping in the bedroom, my son was watching TV. We hang out for a little while and I ask him if he's in the mood for pizza, he excitedly agrees so I call. When I return to the house with the pizza she is now sitting on the couch. The first thing she barks at me is how we can't afford to buy pizza. (Huh???) Then it's how useless I am, can't cook, can't clean, etc. I ignore her and fix my plate for dinner.

She yells at our son that he is not to eat that pizza! So he just sits there on the couch. I bring my plate into the living room and quietly say to him that it's ok for him to eat it as that's dinner tonite. He gets up and heads into the kitchen, she barks that he should eat the goulash NOT PIZZA! He says to her that he had that for lunch and that he is having pizza, fixes his plate and goes into his room. She then starts laying into me about spending money and gets even more worked up when I mention how much money she is wasting on cigarettes and alcohol every day. She makes a grand proclamation that she is going to the store (meaning to get wine). I calmly tell her that if she comes back with alcohol I will dump it. She is all pissed off at that saying it's not fair. "It is what it is", I tell her. She leaves.

She comes back and is in a somber mood. (Enter another change in tactics.) We start talking and she admits that I am right and the drinking and smoking are not a good idea. She tells me that she doesn't love me and hasn't for a while. Also that she feels horrible and confused about that. We are having, what feels like, a heart to heart talk. She pours a glass of wine and we continue to talk.

She is starting to get emotional and is talking about the past. She is riding the ragged edge of lashing out at me but brings herself back several times. Then she does start laying into me, I don't engage her as she is looking to get into an argument. I get up and go into the kitchen and she follows me. I put my plate into the dishwasher and walk past her on my way back to the couch, I turn around to see her grab a good sized candle and whip it at me.

It hits me in the back of the neck with a glancing blow. Angrily I ask her, "What are you doing?", then sit on the couch and rub my neck. She then starts throwing things from the coffee table at me. First the pile of books, then the ceramic remote control holder bounced off my arms (which are up protecting my face) and smashes on the brick by the fireplace. I pull out my cell and dial the local police number and show her that with my thumb on the send button.

She comes at me with a vase and I push her onto the couch hitting SEND in the process. A second later I hear the dispatcher, put the phone to my ear and tell her what my wife was doing. She told me they were on their way. The wife then starts freaking out! "I can't believe you called them, you need to tell them it was a mistake, help me clean up this mess before they get here!". I just stand by the door silently waiting.

They arrive and come in to find her sitting calmly on the couch. One officer then asks me to step outside to talk. I tell him what has been going on tonite and over the weekend and how I've been at the hotel for the last 2 nights. Wife and I both said we didn't want to press charges and I (stupidly) said I'd sleep at a friend's house. I then left for my friend's house. She txt'd me in the morning saying that she loves me and is sorry about what happened. That she just wants me to be happy.

Borderline Personality Disorder is a serious condition and so is alcoholism. Together, it is like a forest fire on steroids. Thank you, Mike, for sharing your very painful story. I'm glad the police did not falsely arrest you.

In His Own Words/In Her Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

Gender bigots at the heart of the Canadian prostitution debate

Jack Barnes · 6 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Three women—Terri-Jean Bedford, Amy Lebovitch, and Valerie Scott—waged a legal battle to effectively legalize prostitution in Canada. These women claimed that the laws surrounding the buying and selling of sex violated the Canadian Charter. The courts agreed and gave the Canadian government one year to fix the problem. The government has currently been working on Bill C-36, implementing the Nordic model of prostitution, which is the brainchild of gender bigots known as feminists. Under this model, it is legal to sell sex but illegal to buy it. The justification for this lunacy is the feminist myth of patriarchy. According to feminists, prostitution is something that men do to oppress women. Feminists believe that women cannot choose to engage in prostitution because the patriarchy forces them into selling their bodies for money. Basically, feminists view prostitution and sex slaves as the same thing.

[image]

Sex slavery and sex trafficking are part of the larger problem of human trafficking. We like to think that we live in a society that is free from slavery. Unfortunately, this isn't reality. Men, women, and children are forced to work in many different industries through coercion in every civilized nation in the world. To say that this is a problem is an understatement. To use this situation to advance an ideology is unthinkable to most people.

Feminists have some weird ideas about prostitutes and prostitution. In their minds, prostitute = women, clients (or "Johns") = men. Not surprising to MHRAs and anti-feminists/non-feminists, the truth bares little to no resemblance to the feminist dogma. Both men and women engage in prostitution on both sides of the equation. Take, for example, this young man at Columbia University and his female clients: http://newyork.cbslocal.com/2014/04/30/columbia-university-student-says-hes-working-as-male-escort-to-pay-tuition/. Keep in mind that he is "marketed" by a madam. This little tidbit of information will become relevant later.

Then, there are lesbian prostitutes: http://www.independent.co.uk/news/gigolo-girls-offer-safe-encounters-with-lesbian-love-1248127.html. These women offer their services to other women who want to experience lesbian sex with no strings attached and without the hassle.

A simple Google search reveals a whole host of escorts who offer services to couples. Of course, there are also many specialty services that are too numerous to mention.

The point being that the feminist idea that prostitution is "women are the prostitutes" and "men are the Johns" is willful ignorance, to say the least. But feminists need to continue perpetrating this lie to the public to keep up the "women are victims of men" hysteria. See, according to feminists, prostitution is a form of "male" violence. Violence has a gender? That's a topic for another day.

[image]

According to feminists, the patriarchy forces women into prostitution by denying them options. Let's set aside for a moment the fact that many women who become prostitutes have options and often willingly chose prostitution. For now, though, let's pretend that all prostitutes are women, and these women are prostitutes because they have no other choice. Okay, then shouldn't we be giving them choices? Shouldn't feminists be working to set up programs to help these women get education and/or work placement so that they will have more options for employment? And shouldn't this be accompanied by programs for women who use prostitution to feed their drug addictions? But that's not what feminists are doing. Instead, feminists are working to remove the only option that these women have to make a living. How is that supposed to help? To understand this, you must remember that in the minds of feminists, destroying the patriarchy will solve women's problems, including prostitution.

[image]

[image]

Now back to reality. Are all prostitutes forced into it? Are all prostitutes helpless victims of men? To start with, forced prostitution does happen. Take this case as an example: http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2633550/Record-breaking-athlete-forced-prostitution-lesbian-madam-trafficked-Britain-work-high-class-escort.html.

Notice anything odd? The female victim was forced into prostitution by men and women. She didn't have a pimp. She had a madam.

A madam is most often a prostitute who has started her own escort business or brothel. She is the boss and prostitutes work for her. It's a common business relationship that can be found in many industries. The madam provides the prostitutes with safety, steady work, and in the case of a brothel a place to do business in exchange for a percentage of the profits. There are many famous madams.

Esperanza Brooks was a cheerleading coach for prep school who ran an escort service on the side.

Xaviera Hollander was a famous madam and author of The Happy Hooker. From her website: "In 1968, she left her job as the secretary of the Dutch consulate in Manhattan to become a call girl, where she made $1,000 a night. A year later she opened her own brothel called Xaviera's Happy House and soon became New York City's leading madam."

Bobbi Davis, the owner of The Shady Lady Ranch, successfully lobbied to legalize male prostitution in Nevada.

Then there is the notorious and despicable Hong Tang, who, according to court documents, used children in her business.

Let's not forget that the occupation of madam isn't new. Since prostitution is the world's oldest profession, it stands to reason that the madam isn't far behind. Take Polly Adler, for instance: "Her career began at the dawn of the anything-goes Jazz Age and continued into World War II. Broadway stars, baseball heroes, literary lions, gangsters and politicians all flocked to her house of ill repute." Madams have been a part of American history since the Old West.

If you look at the money these women made, it's no wonder that women choose to go into prostitution. But, as this study suggest, money isn't the only reason: "The findings suggest that these [educated and affluent] women are not forced into the prostitution market but rather choose to enter it for many of the same reasons that people enter the conventional job market — money, stability, autonomy and even job satisfaction."

Feminists like to cite women's safety as a reason to criminalize the purchasing of sex. Let's think about that for a moment. Who's safer: a woman who is working in a brothel with bouncers and security guards or a woman who has to do her business under the cover of darkness and in hiding? Brothels are like strip clubs; they have security to protect their employees from anyone who gets out of line. What if the owner of the brothel is abusive? We already have laws against abusive employers, and since everything is out in the open, reporting him or her is a lot easier and is legal. The average streetwalker doesn't have such safety and comfort. They have to hide to do their business and can't go to the cops, not even if the selling of sex is legal. If a prostitute turns in one of her Johns, word will get around and her clients will disappear. If a woman in a brothel gets one of her clients thrown out or arrested for being violent or abusive, the brothel will still be able to attract clients like nothing ever happened. Why? Because the guy who got arrested wasn't arrested for buying sex but for being an asshole. Brothels also offer better health and safety for both sides. In the U.S., condoms are mandatory, the Johns are examined for physical signs of STDs, and the workers are regularly tested. You can't get much safer than that. But if feminists have their way, prostitutes will have to hide to do their work and never have access to this level of safety and security. Even if only the buying of sex is criminalized, this will push prostitution further underground. Back into the shadows and the cheap motels the women will go, and more than a few of them will be assaulted, contract diseases, and some will end up dead.

[image]

We have seen that feminist ideas about prostitution are not based in reality. Prostitution is not men oppressing women. Prostitution is a choice that some women make. Criminalizing the buyers is dangerous to prostitutes. So, why are they trying to do this?

While you're thinking about that, consider this:

http://www.thestar.com/

The feminist movement is split over the issue of prostitution for the very reasons I mentioned above and other very logical reasons:

> The proposed legislation denies women's right to bodily autonomy, a core concept, enshrined in law, of any feminist or anti-violence strategy, and most obvious in Canada's abortion legislation. It infantilizes grown women who are sex workers, and locates them as damaged victims, in need of rescue only, versus adults capable of exercising choice (good or bad) and an ability to act in their own best interests. Bill C36 conflates women and children, trafficking and prostitution, when it is clear that they are separate and distinct populations. Combining them results in inadequate service for all and willfully ignores current strong and internationally praised Canadian legislation regarding children and trafficked persons.

What is it that the anti-John feminists of @WantMore4Women hope to accomplish? The answer is in the phrase that I used. The feminists who are in control of this group know that their ideas will have an extremely negative impact on the lives of prostitutes. They simply don't care. They are programmed with the myth of the patriarchy and will stop at nothing to destroy it. If some collateral damage must take place in order to achieve their objective, then so be it. These feminists hate men to the point that they are working to pass legislation that would throw other women under the bus just to discriminate against men. They ignore all evidence, even the fact that not all buyers of sex are male. They want the decriminalization of female prostitutes only:

> The objective of this campaign is to have prostitution recognized as a practice of inequality and to bring forward a legislation similar to the Nordic Model in Canada, namely a legislative model that decriminalizes prostituted women while maintaining the criminalization of those who prostitute them (pimps and johns). The Nordic Model also encompasses social measures, the promotion of equality and resources for women who are or have been prostituted.

[image]

Here are the some of the other supporters of this highly bigoted campaign:

Canadian Association of Sexual Assault Centres

> Landing Page

National Women's Association of Canada

> NWAC

Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies

> Home

@CAEFS

Vancouver Rape Relief and Women's Shelter http://www.rapereliefshelter.bc.ca
@VanRapeRelief

All of this was started a while back by three female sex workers who exposed a rift in the feminist community. We have long wondered which group carried the most weight in the feminist movement, thereby driving public policy in our respective governments. As Bill C-36, which would impose the Nordic model onto the Canadian people, continues to work its way through Parliament, I think we now have an answer.

Thanks to you, AVFM reaches fundraising goal again

Paul Elam · 6 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I don't sleep much during fundraisers. This one has been no exception. Each of them is a time of stress. We have a lot of bills, and after the last conference we had a lot more.

In fact, I had to wait for this fundraiser before I could even honor my word and follow-through with the production of all the DVDs of the conference so I could distribute them to crowdfunding donors who rallied behind us when we got into emergency mode for ICMI14.

Now I, and the rest of AVfM staff, can breathe a big sigh of relief and take care of everything. We live, for at least another three months, with the bills paid and the people to continue forward with this cause.

Hopefully, no, for sure, the lessons from Detroit will now pay off as we approach ICMI15. We are wiser, more organized, and every bit as determined as we ever were.

I have to admit that this is a pretty emotional moment for me. We, meaning all the staff here, ran ourselves ragged to make that last conference happen, and we got buried in unexpected costs for police and attorneys. We have been playing catch-up ever since.

But in the midst of all that stress and occasional moments of panic, were AVFM supporters. There were some people fortunate enough to make large donations, and lots of people less fortunate but really no less generous. There were literally hundreds of people giving 5, 10, 20 bucks. I know for a fact that some of those donations represented real sacrifice.

There was also staff, people who already donate more time and effort here than is sane to expect from anyone, also with their names showing up in my donation emails.

And again, there were so many who when told that we were under the gun, and that our opponents were pushing to silence us, rallied like champions and shocked everyone by having our backs with lightning speed.

I have been up all night, but I had to write something this morning. I had to attempt to find a way to say thank you to all of you; the supporters of AVFM who tolerate this crusty old sailor at the helm, even though I sometimes test your patience.

This is your community; your movement. I am ready to move things forward now according to your wishes, with an eye on the next big thing, and the next 10 big things.

I am also ready to sleep, thanks to your help.

Feminism is an actual religion

Elijah Butler · 7 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: This article is also available in Romanian.

People say feminism is a religion—what they mean by that is the blind faith by which feminists cling to feminist dogma. I agree, but feminism is more religion-like than even that. Here's Wikipedia's definition of religion, which is pretty much what you'd learn in a philosophy of religion course:

> A religion is an organized collection of beliefs, cultural systems, and world views that relate humanity to an order of existence. Many religions have narratives, symbols, and sacred histories that are intended to explain the meaning of life and/or to explain the origin of life or the Universe. From their beliefs about the cosmos and human nature, people derive morality, ethics, religious laws or a preferred lifestyle.
>
> Many religions may have organized behaviors, clergy, a definition of what constitutes adherence or membership, holy places, and scriptures. The practice of a religion may also include rituals, sermons, commemoration or veneration of a deity, gods or goddesses, sacrifices, festivals, feasts, trance, initiations, funerary services, matrimonial services,meditation, prayer, music, art, dance, public service or other aspects of human culture. Religions may also contain mythology.

Feminism is about the belief in a nebulous, all-powerful entity known as the patriarchy. Since the dawn of time, the patriarchy has oppressed women by keeping them in bondage and servitude to men. Then, about 50 years ago, feminism came along and fought the patriarchy, freeing women from the chains in which the patriarchy had shackled them. But the fight is not over because no matter how much power women actually have in the political, social, and economic spheres, the patriarchy still exists, despite having no formal organization of any kind.

Many feminists attribute the patriarchy to being comprised of rich and powerful men—except it is rich and powerful men who give feminism what it wants, so it cannot be them. Other feminists attribute the patriarchy to being every male acting in concert. However, women can oppress women as well, and in those instances it is said that they have the patriarchy ingrained within them. Therefore, the patriarchy takes on a mythological quality—one that takes faith to believe in. And faith is required because without the patriarchy, feminism collapses into nonsense. This is why feminism defies logic, just as most other religions do on a fundamental level. The patriarchy cannot be seen, heard, or even touched, but it is there, always oppressing, even if it is abundantly clear that women are not oppressed.

So, if Christianity is a religion defined by the belief in Jesus Christ and the veneration and worship of him, then feminism is a religion defined by the constant battle against the evil, all-powerful deity known as the patriarchy. Many of you may be thinking that feminism is not trying to explain the cosmos, just a very narrow part of it. You'd be wrong—because if it exists, patriarchy is there, and so is feminism to fight it. There is feminist biology, psychology, physics, metaphysics, and chemistry. Feminism has even seeped into other formal organized religions, completely changing their world views to fit feminists, as evidenced by the Silent Voices Bible, in which all the characters are gender-swapped.

Once the basis of the feminist religion is established, most of the other trappings of religion fall into place. Here are some examples:

- Feminism's holy scripture is The Feminine Mystique by feminist prophet Betty Friedan, which is the book that created feminism by alerting the world to the existence of the patriarchy. Other major prophets of feminism are Simone de Beauvoir, Gloria Steinem, and Andrea Dworkin.
- Feminist ethics is moral relativism masquerading as something known as the Ethics of Care as postulated by Carol Gilligan. It posits that women make ethical decisions based on how it makes others feel, as opposed to strict right and wrong, as the patriarchy instructs men to do.

- Feminist temples are women's studies departments. Its clergy are women's studies professors. In these temples, the priests of feminism attempt to detect patriarchy's nasty influence and then develop weapons (ideology) to fight against it.
- Feminist missionaries are feminist writers and media personalities such as columnist Jessica Valenti and the entire cast of The View, who attempt to coerce everyone into engaging in feminist religious worship.
- Feminist religious worship is celebrating the vagina, often quite literally, and bashing men.
- There is plenty of feminist art, music, and dance to go around.

In conclusion, feminism is not just a religion because of the blind faith that an evil deity called the patriarchy exists and must be stomped out but because it literally is a religion in every sense of the word. This is why feminism is so entrenched in our culture: the prophets came and converted millions, and because society is religious, many believed. Our work is cut out for us—even though the patriarchy is just a myth, countless still believe anyway.

IHOW: My husband's ex-wife abused him with the help of family court and his parents

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 7 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's day 7 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Today's submission is written by "Brenda," a woman whose husband was abused by his ex-wife.

Hi Dr. T,

One of the saddest things I have seen in the past few years is the blindness and projection around male victims of domestic violence.

My husband was divorced years ago, one his ex initiated. Their relationship was always tumultuous. She has a long history of emotional, financial, and physical abuse of him. For years after the split, as long as she was supported financially, emotionally and in parenting, she had no complaints. Once he found a solid new relationship (me, oh lucky me) she began ramping up problems.

Then came the restraining order, filed to prevent the children from seeing him outside her house and certainly seeing me. After that was the 2 plus years spent in a custody battle – she with a pricey attorney paid for by (wait for it) . . . his Parents. Yep.

When she decided she wasn't happy with the outcome of that (only months after settling), then came the allegations he was emotionally abusive to the children, the "emergency" rescinding of his parenting time, the supervised visitation and the stalking order (and plenty more financial rewards from her generous ex in-laws.) Now we are left trying to rebuild his reputation after all the "experts" have decided he's "unstable", we are financially and emotionally drained – but at least the SO had to be dropped as it didn't meet the standards. (Way to fabricate "evidence".)

Why? What possessed this person to go to all this trouble?

While the ex has been successful in convincing court appointed "experts" and legal beagles she is the "good" parent; we believe she has severe issues, likely sociopathy. Of course, the average civilian can't say that to a court or court appointed psych professional. So, her likely motivation – why it's just a good game she wants to win, she gets to publicly punish and ruin her ex and – double plus bonus points – she gets to drag in the new spouse, disparage them, drain all their money and maybe (oh she hopes and hopes) ruin their relationship! Wow. What a reward!!

There are plenty of people who assume that if a person's own parents do not support them they must be a horrible human being. I can vouch that this is total falsehood. My hubby is a wonderful, kind, generous person who is a fantastic father and husband. His birth family has a number of mental health issues (including narcissism, abuse, drug use) which of course result in a poor childhood that didn't prepare him for healthy relationships.

He's worked hard to overcome the impacts of this childhood. That he has cardboard cutout imitations of parents is not due to his being a bad person. He was in fact the scapegoat child of his family. So I guess there was no chance he could have a decent relationship with them. Give the abused man, the scapegoat child, a chance. They want to have a good life.

So the sociopath (let's just agree this assignment fits, you'll see the lack of empathy in her actions) found a good target. Like that proverbial lion, she found the wounded antelope and ran towards it. He fell for it and was used – used up. Willingly, she took his time, love and money. She kept him on a bungee cord of abuse: scream, abuse, seduce him back with love bombs, scream, abuse….repeat ad nauseum. And of course, she became pregnant. So he was caught trying desperately to do the right thing for his children. I think this was when she really ramped up her game.

Suddenly she had bait to dangle before his divorced parents. Bait to provide her with people she could twist to her side (with repeated emotional complaints about how bad their son was to her and their grandchildren), bait to attract as much money as anyone would throw at her, and most importantly for her must-win abusive game – bait to use to ruin the man who could not provide her with everything she wanted.

Now, we realize that she is incapable of ever filling that emptiness, so no human being could provide her with "enough" of anything. Since her husband would not bow to her every whim and was not providing the financial support she "deserved", he had failed her and must be punished. And she quickly saw that the most painful punishment was to separate him from his children, to leave them in her care where he would worry incessantly about what abuse was occurring.

She even tried to get me on her side. When I failed to succumb to her "charms" – which really meant to agree to her side of the story and feel that this man was an utter failure, and a cheating one at that. She tried hard, repeatedly talking to me over some weeks. Having been raised in a pretty dysfunctional family myself, I was ready for that. Plus, just hearing her complaints over and over wasn't enough for me – I guess some people give in to that sort of mind control. As I found out later, she certainly had a high success rate, as many people: friends, family, health or school staff; had completely bought her line of bull. Sad, very sad.

Fast forward to the fun world of American family "justice." This is where I truly got a clear vision of how far she would go in her quest and how quickly those who where supposedly acting "in the best interest of the child" were willing to damn a man with no verified or cross-examined evidence and assume that "only women are victims of domestic violence, he has to be bad". Almost 3 years of slogging through this legal swamp is too much to go through day by day, so let's hit the highlights:

- First restraining order was approved with no evidence. Local judges apparently just say "Yes" for fear of being responsible for being wrong. Took months to drop it.
- She repeatedly denies him visitation and especially phone contact with the kids (which continues up until the "emergency circus act" where she gets his visitation pulled altogether.)
- Her lawyer requires that Dad is repeatedly drug tested, they all come back negative. Susie Sociopath will not agree to any similar testing for herself.
- She refuses a parenting plan settlement offer (one that did not include a change in child support) and will not negotiate. A year later (and tens of thousands in legal costs, a custody evaluation and parenting coordinator) she settles for a plan that is eerily similar to the one she turned down.
- She fires (or we suspect he quit) one lawyer, moves on to one of the most aggressive, sleazy attorneys in town. My husband's parents continue to pay for her legal fees.
- Sleazy attorney succeeds in getting all incriminating-to-her evidence suppressed as non-admissible or illegally obtained. What's she hiding so hard? We all know.
- Sleazy attorney delays and delays in the hopes that we will run out of money. Instead we dig a financial hole that will entrap us for years.
- She emotionally seduces the custody evaluator and succeeds in getting a male-negative evaluation report. Even though – their psychological test scores have some common items and certainly she does not come out looking like Mother Theresa.
- Ex then entraps the children's counselor in her web. Susie Sociopath is clearly coaching the children on what to say. This will, in a matter of months, result in the emergency circus and the counselor's decision that the father is emotionally damaging to the children. (And of course after they are removed from him, the children are "doing much better without his visitation."

- Susie Sociopath works hard to get the parenting coordinator to side with her. When he remains somewhat neutral she begins the emergency circus.
- Parental grandfather takes Susie Sociopath and the grandchildren on a number of expensive vacations – all to very child entrancing locations. No one would think this was a ploy to keep the kids on their side – would they?
- It's Circus Time! Merely days after a long vacation with father's mom, there is an emergency ex parte that he is an emotional danger to the children, and he is banned from locations where the children frequent as well as losing all parenting time. Then the judge sides with Susie Sociopath and Sleazy Attorney and orders supervised visitation (which is always paid for by the "guilty" parent, not the parent who demands it, who decided on that twisted approach?) Quickly following that there is a stalking order requested (also ex parte) which is quickly approved by the same judge. This stalking order months later will be found to be illegal and be dropped – but there is no investigation of it when filed, just a signature and a lecture to the dad of how he is "damaging his children".
- Susie Sociopath uses the stalking order to her advantage, calling the cops to have her my husband arrested for violating it. She apparently felt threatened by social media posts that did not have any threats in them, many of which did not even directly mention her. Now there's bail (which because it is listed under "domestic violence" bail is $50k – $50k!), there's a criminal charge that needs its own lawyer and has its own costs and timeline.
- More court hearings, all of which have Sleazy Attorney talking and talking to continue his tale of how evil the father is and how the Susie Sociopath is a saintly, patient victim. Judge (who has a DV professional background) sides with them on every issue. Now we have an order for a "comprehensive" psych exam of Dad, continued supervised parenting at outrageous prices (because of course no volunteer was acceptable to Susie Sociopath), and the counselor continues her own anti-Dad PR campaign. Oh, and he's being held accountable for anything I post on social media and Susie Sociopath and Sleazy Attorney Internet stalk my blog. Where is the 1st Amendment?

Well, in these years we've met, dated, gotten married, spent tens of thousands in legal and related costs, been drug tested, lived in court, been vilified by friends / extended family / professionals / the court, he's lost his children, lost his reputation and his record is damaged enough that jobs and possibly new housing have been denied due to the remains of these false allegations.

Why did I stay and deal with this? I have seen this man with his children – they adore him and he is an excellent father. I've learned that many fathers get such a raw deal that they need support, and the snap decisions made by family courts serve no one. I want to see him have a good relationship with his children. I do accept that it is highly likely she will continue with new campaigns and, at some point, we may have to cut of contact with her and the children altogether to keep from turning into emotional mush. And of course I love him deeply.

I cannot say I feel optimistic about the future, which is so sad. I think his relationship with his children may be in the early stages of being completely ruined. I think Susie Sociopath will stalk us indefinitely and we have no idea how to get out of her spotlight. But we are now active in family law reform. Realizing we may not benefit from the changes, we are fighting to change the system so other families do not have to go through this emotional hell hole. If you are experiencing this: document, have support, get a good lawyer, and have a counselor or way to safely vent. Good luck!

Thanks!

The Wife

And people wonder why so many victims of the Family Court system are "so angry." Our Family Court system is a public disgrace and the attorneys who profit from it, like the one described in the post above, are just the dregs.

In His Own Words/In Her Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

WHO mischaracterizes suicide??

Clint Carpentier · 7 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

There I am, driving home after a small job, many things rattling around in the silent noise maker, and I hear "Suicide called 'large public health problem' by WHO" (World Health Organization) on CBC Radio (and later found the article online).

There are a LOT of things wrong with the article. And while I can speculate that the WHO is just taking numbers and saying "whatever" to the rest, I can also assume (given its track record) that the CBC has added its own flavor—or disregarded some pertinent info.

I'm going to start with old age and work my way down. The WHO claims the highest rates are among the post-retirement group:

> Globally, suicide rates are highest in people aged 70 and over, but in some countries, the highest rates are found among the young.

I don't know if that's a total number against the other rates or if it's just a ratio among its own demographic; I'm assuming it's the latter. For those who have learned Inuit culture during their informative school years (uh … middle school? 25 years ago?), you will understand that lack of productivity and increased dependency are serious factors. When you've spent the majority of your life proving your worth, becoming dependent is a crippling blow to dignity. In the end, in the grand scheme of things, this age group is relatively meaningless to try to save; heartless though that may sound, there are bigger issues at stake than Grandpa saving you a few dollars on the old folks' home care. This argument is already being waged in all "wealthy" countries, under the premise of "quality of life" and the moral rights to euthanasia; of which, we would sooner torture our elders for their last few years than allow them to pass on.

The WHO claims that men approaching retirement are particularly vulnerable. Again, without context, it's a meaningless statement. But those among the MHRM can easily and highly accurately fill in the missing details.

The second highest group of suicides is among young adults; but again, no context. The lack of context is most disastrous in the WHO's claim to "lift the taboo" about talk of the subject.

> The WHO's director general Margaret Chan said the report was a "call for action to address a large public health problem which has been shrouded in taboo for far too long."

Hey, WHO, I'm going to be honest with you, "the truth about suicides doesn't fit the fucking narrative, so SHUT … THE … FUCK … UP!"—that narrative being that women are at most risk. And in the whole article, there was only a passing nod to the men of suicide …

> The report found that in general, more men die by suicide than women. In richer countries, three times as many men kill themselves as women, and men aged 50 and over are particularly vulnerable.

That was all of it.

Suicide is NOT the problem. The problem is much deeper, much more sadistic, and it is legion.

Starting at puberty, boys are increasingly told that they have to prove themselves. In and of itself, it's relatively harmless to prod a boy's ambition; boys already have the urge to compete, thanks to nature popping the hydrant cap and flooding their bodies with testosterone. However, the level at which society demands they "man up" is detrimental to their still-undeveloped minds (they still have 10 more years of brain growth), and we happily shoehorn them into an unforgiving gender role, which the mass media has proven to openly hate during a time we claim to be fighting for equality. And despite what you may think about boys' ambitions, girls dictate boys' social standing (and thereby judge the level of bullying the boys will receive or dole out). Do you not see the diametrically opposed messages boys are receiving? Many of our boys don't even have someone who can teach them what it is to BE men because they are being raised in broken and/or abusive homes with no father figure anywhere to aspire to, no one who can teach them how to handle that swimming pool of testosterone they've just absorbed. All these boys know is what they've been told: "Men are corrupt, respect women!" The tighter their undesirable gender appears to them, the more hopeless the rest of their life appears to be; and when you're a teenager, getting to age 20 is forever, never mind the 50 years they still have in the tank. If a boy discovers he has zero value before he can put his intellect to work for him and acquire social value, he is at high risk. But nobody wants to expose this because it will take away from the higher number of girls' attempted suicides (of which, one can assume the girls are just trying to get attention, which I would hazard to say there is more going on psychologically than simple depression; or the girls in question are simply incompetent; neither fits the feminist narrative, so don't try to solve the problem).

After high school is just as dangerous: young men are still hot and bothered over girls, and girls still dictate the social value of these young men. Those who are lucky enough to avoid college learn just how tight their imposed gender role actually is as they enter the general workforce and finally get to compete with men. By this time, it's too late to try to teach them how to actually BE men, they've had roughly 20 years of women informing them that they have to be "good men" without ever having been taught what that even means (other than "If Mama ain't happy, ain't nobody happy"). And now they've managed to knock up some cupcake because nobody was around to warn him. So now you have a young man with no work ethic, who has pansy-girl hands, can't read a tape measure, and it's a coin flip whether he can read at all, and he's already got two dependents relying on his meager income, and gawd forbid she decides to leave him because as it sits, he stands at three times as likely to commit (not attempt) suicide as she does because after divorce, that number triples. This is a no-win situation, the fast lane to suicide. I mean, when men throw themselves off balconies to certain death in order to end a shopping spree, you think there might, just maybe, there might be something more going on. Most wives like shopping, my wife likes shopping, most men don't contemplate headstands from lethal heights; at least, I haven't.

> Pesticide poisoning, hanging and firearms are among the most common methods of suicide globally, the report said, and evidence from Australia, Canada, Japan, New Zealand, the United States and Europe shows that restricting access to these means can help to stop people from committing suicide.

You mean, limiting access to continuing one's job and/or hobby.

But those young blokes are just impoverished, mentally and financially right? There is no point in claiming to talk about "suicide" in "wealthy" countries if you're not going to even acknowledge the lead-up to suicide, much of which is thanks to feminism. Because while men have been working hard back-breaking labor for millennia, it's only been in the last 50 years they've been openly and actively and without remorse vilified for being good and loving men.

So college boys should be fine, yes? Many of these boys have already been labelled "creeps" by high school girls; it's the junior form of being labelled rapist/pedophile, and you need not have done anything to get the label, short of ignoring a girl's attention or attempting to gain a girl's attention without first fitting her subjective flavor-of-the-day ideal of "cool." Now they're in an environment that's brazenly trumpeting "1-in-5 rape culture"! Rape is one thing a man does NOT want to be accused of. It does not matter if he got the chance to face his accuser, does not matter if he got to see her in trial, does not matter if proven without a shadow of a doubt that he was innocent—this young man's life is over before it even got a chance to begin. College "rape culture" isn't just harming "potential" rapists, it's crippling the elite intellectual males of our species; you know, the geniuses who developed civilization as we know it. When young men begin refusing willfully wanton opportunities to get laid, there's a serious problem. Let me rephrase that: girls typically don't have to TRY to find penis and desperately encourage said penis to explore their nether depths because penis usually finds them and excitedly says, "OK"; young men have begun skulking around campus, avoiding the majority girls, and just trying to survive college so they can MAYBE begin their life.

Of course, there was nothing said about the 30- to 50-year-olds, context or otherwise. One can only assume that this group of men mostly fall into other categories that depression would increase the odds thereof, such as work site accidents, motor vehicle accidents, hunting/fishing accidents. Are they accidents? Or accidents? Or could they be accidents? What a quandary. I'm 37 and work on my own; the tools I use have a variety of methods to do me serious harm and theoretically cause me to bleed out before aide … finds me; and then there's the drive home when I'm dead tired, long and winding, with a big-ass river right there; in fact, I know of at least two locations in which I wouldn't be found for weeks or months. How many men have just … vanished?

WHO wants countries to "reduce access to the means to suicide." And use other stop-gap means to band-aid the problem. When a man commits suicide, it's usually the first sign that he's got problems he can no longer handle and that no one is willing to acknowledge.

I just did a job the other day. The woman was attempting to complete house renovations (via daddy-kins). Her husband had recently died, middle-aged with a teenaged son. He was a garbage collector and had injured himself at work. The doctor he'd been going to see was in another city, and he couldn't sit long enough for the trip, so he had to fly instead of drive. His last visit, they cleared him to go back to work and cut off his compensation. Rather than be a burden on his family as "less than a man," he went back to his hotel room and hanged himself.

CBC, you did a story a while back about Vancouver's free beer to hopeless alcoholics program. You asked them what they thought about the free beer program. You DIDN'T ask them why they had become alcoholics. What you neglect to report makes me cry in anger.

Hey, Letitia James! Domestic violence is an equal opportunity menace

Jonathan Bornstein · 7 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

On September 19, 2014, the New York Daily News ran an op-ed written by New York City's public advocate, Letitia James, in which she presents a one-sided argument for immediate, broadened governmental missions to combat domestic violence in New York. Her flawed position is clear: that only women are victimized by domestic violence; that men aren't; and that men are the dominant abusers. When the New York Daily News was presented with a counterpoint to James's flawed argument, they responded that they did not have room for a response to James's op-ed. Below is the rejected counterpoint.

Domestic violence is an unacceptable crime that exploits the deep trust between intimate partners. A partner's violence is an abuse of the victimized partner's commitment to preserve the relationship the two share, a commitment that in many of these relationships is made stronger, often unbreakably so, by mutual property and shared children.

The present social-policy shift in attacking this social menace is welcome and apparently quite warranted. Over the last decades we see government funds liberally flowing in massive quantity to combat this admittedly widespread syndrome. At present, the subject is a focus of national attention thanks to the actions of Ray Rice and, more broadly, the National Football League. Men need to stop beating women, and by any means necessary. Right?

Right. And wrong.

Violence is perpetrated by both sexes to each other. It is an equal opportunity menace. But the narrative that accompanies the social-policy shift about domestic violence should concern everyone because it is deeply flawed: over and over it presumes that women are the primary victims of domestic violence. Many campaigns even posit that it is exclusively women victimized by domestic violence. The best example is the federal Violence Against Women Act. The very name of this legislation specifically excludes men as victims of domestic violence.

However, Centers for Disease Control and Prevention statistics concerning the widespread victimization of men by women in acts of intimate partner violence are readily available, and they tell a more complete and even sadder story. An astonishing 40% of all "severe physical violence" was directed at men, according to data from a CDC national survey as recently as 2010.

Findings show almost equal amounts of abuse perpetrated against men and women. But politicians and media focus the most attention on the female victims of domestic violence. Why? Men are largely silent on the issue because of the perception that men are physically stronger and should be able to subdue a female attacker easily. Those men who do report physical violence are more likely to be ridiculed—both by law enforcement and by the public—than women are. More money is spent on women's programs, and more crusades are launched on behalf of women who are victims of domestic violence, despite the fact that men are almost equally or in some cases more likely to be victims of both physical and psychological abuse.

There are almost no state resources and services for men. There are endless services for women that empower the state.

What does this amount to? An unchecked sexual bigotry. Against men.

The bigoted narrative posits that men are immune from domestic violence, and only its perpetrators. Sadly, the prevailing narrative is about perceptions. As we see from the reaction to the NFL's situation, domestic violence is no longer about a singular act. It is about projecting one act upon an entire sex. Weren't we taught that if we allowed the actions of one member of a group to become representative of the group, we were guilty of bigotry?

A fine example of this bigotry is a recently published article by New York public advocate Letitia James. James seizes the headlines and wastes no time bringing out the same tired arguments about domestic violence, completely discriminating against men as perpetrators and as non-victims.

James, overlooking half of the population, states: “One study found that abused women were diagnosed six times more often with substance abuse, three times more often with depression and three times more often with sexually transmitted diseases than women who had not experienced abuse.” What about the men, Letitia?

In defending her demagoguery, she confuses cause with effect with no regard for inquiry. “Researchers have identified a host of consequences associated with this crime, including depression, isolation, suicidal thoughts and attempts, binge drinking, sexual abuse, high blood pressure and stroke.” What about the men, Letitia?

But what is most troubling from our public advocate is her position on indoctrinating—educating is her euphemism—young children. James states, “We must better educate all New Yorkers, starting at a young age.” Will this include facts about men as victims? About women as abusers too? Or do you propose to browbeat little boys the bigoted, false narrative the only men abuse women, Letitia?

And although she tries superficially to be gender-neutral, Letitia James concludes, “We can and should prosecute and shame those who hit their girlfriends.” What about the women who hit the boyfriends and husbands, Letitia? Absent—ignored—is the possibility that men are victims.

The bigoted message is convenient and clear: only men do domestic violence to women. Letitia James’s one-sided discussion is consistent with the all too familiar, all too reality-blind narrative that men are monsters and women are victims. It is time to include in this narrative the inconvenient truth that women abuse men too. And that most men never, ever abuse.

Anita Sarkeesian: The early years, part 2

AVfM Video Source · 7 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

One of the more remarkable things about Anita Sarkeesian is that she managed to go years in the mainstream press–the video game press and general audience press–without a whisper of questioning or criticism of her dogmatic assertions or her non-stop victim narrative. A truly responsible press would have done more to investigate her claims.

YouTube has featured a number of very thoughtful, erudite critics of Sarkeesian for the last two years–Investig8ive Journalism, Thunderf00t, The Amazing Atheist, and many, many others–exposing all sorts of questionable practices and methodologies, that were otherwise acknowledged almost nowhere else. For example, the following is a very informative two-part series on Anita Sarkeesian. We find Part 2 particularly enlightening and full of information a lot of people don't know:

http://youtu.be/8EpWezFQ3CU

You can view Part 1 here.

We would, indeed, argue that the raging GamerGate fire in many ways started in the Sarkeesian debacle wherein, while she may indeed have received over-the-top angry hate mail, there was still never any acknowledgement that there was anything questionable about any of her assertions, and any who dared to bring this up were aut0-accused of being misogynist, neckbeard, basement-dwelling losers, etc. That indeed may have been where the pressure started building until it finally blew with the Zoe Quinn debacle.

For more on what Jordan Owen and his partner are up to in exposing all this, you may want to subscribe to his channel.

Note: title image by Susan Nilsson and used under Creative Commons license, cropped to fit our format. –DE

IHOW: I tried to kill myself after dating a personality disordered woman

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 8 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It is day 8 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Today's story is from an Indian man, "Pankaj," who went to the depths of despair and back after being in a very abusive relationship with a woman he suspects has Borderline Personality Disorder.

I have been a quiet lurker on Shrink4Men for past 1 year now. This site has helped me tremendously, so when an opportunity came where I could share my story with other users on this site, I couldn't stop myself. Before I begin I want to clarify that English isn't my first language. Please pardon me in case I make mistakes.

About me: I am from India , I grew up in the capital and am from what you would call as "lower middle class" , (I added "middle" as saving grace.) I love fixing things, I love helping people out, it gives me a sense of importance. I had a hard childhood, I grew up in a broken home, father was never around, but my mother helped me a lot. She ensured I got very good education. As I grew up I studied engineering. Logic and rational thinking have always been my strength. I also used to stutter as a child; hence I was an introverted teenager. In short, I had a hard childhood, fixing compulsions, rescuer tendencies, and a people pleaser — I was the perfect prey for a BPD girl and this is my story.

I don't want to give her name here, so we will call her, "Ri". I met Ri online. We chatted for a few months and then exchanged numbers. I loved talking to Ri. India is a mind bogglingly diverse country, language, accent and dialect change every 10 miles or so. I love this thing about my country. I am from a north Indian warrior clan, she was born in an east Indian trader community. We lived more than 1000 miles apart. We were in love before we saw each other. (Yes, I know). After knowing each other for months, Ri decided she would come to New Delhi for higher studies; meanwhile I had left my job to be in a business school close by her and take up an MBA degree.

The first time we met face to face. I was in love. I loved Ri. I loved everything about her. Her long black hair, her beautiful eyes, her voice, her east Indian accent, so I loved Ri and Ri loved me (or that's what she used to say). The first few months were the honeymoon period. It was bliss. It was perfect.

How can someone love me so much? Me? Me, who had barely ever felt love from the outside world. I knew I would marry Ri. She meant the world to me. As the honeymoon period passed, I noticed a few unusual outbursts. I wrote them off as Ri being a bit on the sensitive side. The more I ignored the red flags, the more they grew worse.

In between, tragedy struck Ri and her family. Her father passed away. She hated her father. She would talk about him in such vile manner; I used to think of him as a horrible man. But when he passed away, Ri was in terrible grief. Every night Ri cried, I was there to console her. But no matter what I said, nothing stopped her. Her sorrow was like a bottomless pit and the way she would put it in words, it was so profound and so deep, I found it overwhelming.

As weeks passed, sorrow gave way to bickering and bickering led to daily arguments over things which were absolutely trivial in nature. Everything was always my fault. Then came a time period when fights became a daily thing. Ri was never physically violent toward me, but what she lacked in physical aggression she made up for in passive aggression, emotional manipulation, no win games and shit tests. She would say the cruelest things to me and yet pretend as if nothing happened and call me again tomorrow. I was the perfect white knight, I never fought back. How could I? Aren't men supposed to be the silent rock?

Ri is a cutter. No matter how much I told her I loved her, she never stopped it. After every few weeks she would tell me, "last night I cut myself". These weren't tiny cuts; they went deep into her flesh. It never occurred to me she may be having psychological issues. Ri was exceptional at academics, just like me. She is a university topper and very well read. She is a high functioning kind. You can never win an argument against her.

Our relationship went from bad to worse. Honeymoon was over, that initial pink haze just disappeared and now I was taking a daily hit from her Fogger 3000 (F.O.G — Fear, Obligation and Guilt). Blame games, truth distortion, emotional reasoning — everything I said would be turned around and used against me.

Then the triangulation started. Enter downgrade future boyfriend. Ri found a drug abuser. The more I tried to keep her away from him, the more she went to him. She started from alcohol and went down to hardcore drugs. It became a daily thing and her behavior would become even more abusive. I found myself even censoring my own words, by now I wanted to say nothing at all, which could set her off.

Her name on my phone would scare me. I immersed myself in studies to distract myself from all the chaos. Ri shares everything with this drug addict. They talk dirty, they share facebook passwords, they spend all their free time together, while I am the sorrow of her life.

Ri would break up with me every week and then taks me back. My self-respect hit rock bottom and I didn't have the wisdom left to ask myself why? My MBA finished and I found a job in another state. I had to leave Ri and move for a few months, until I could switch jobs and come back close to my hometown.

Ri's core abandonment fear really came into play then. Ri cut me off. The other guy, he is her everything. He is what I once was. She worships him, while I am discarded. I must have done something to deserve this. May be she is right. May be I couldn't understand her as she used to complain. May be I am insensitive and cruel. I left my home to start the job in another state.

My first day there, Ri called and told me, she slept with the drug addict. I felt lost. I felt my world was been burnt down. No matter how abusive Ri was to me, I loved her. She was my first love. I cried myself to sleep each night. A strange never-ending depression took me over. I went through my workday and came back to my flat to just sit down and stare into nothing for hours. For 3 months my eyes never really dried.

Ri still called me every 2-3 days to tell me how fabulous her life was. How the drug addict was everything that I am not. I kept trying to tell her how I could be better. No matter what I said I was never good enough. Then one fine day, I got a job offer in my hometown. That's it, I thought. This is my break! I could win her back now.

I told her I was coming back. Ri told me she was only friends with that boy and wanted us back too. I agreed. I was happy. I would build back that honeymoon period, or so I dreamt. I landed back in New Delhi only to find tht Ri had changed her mind. I felt shattered into a million pieces.

She would give me a ray of hope and then take it away from me. I would go half way around New Delhi just to see her and talk to her and I would find her in such an abusive mood it would be hard to believe. She would verbally abuse me for 2 hours, while all I am supposed to do is hear her out, not utter a word in explanation and just sit there while she rants out at me. Topics of argument are just simply crazy.

Me not remembering her favorite flower, me not being able to read her mind, me not caring enough about her, me not trusting her to spend time with the guy she has just slept with! Me not changing my hairstyle to what she wants! How can I be so insensitive and controlling? After she is done ranting, she has to go; the part where I speak up never comes. 10 months of this on-off relationship has been nothing but me getting used to her stabbing a proverbial knife in me every now and then.

There is nothing more tragic than a man chasing a borderline. What he is actually chasing is his own destruction.

Ri has cheated on me multiple times. She even directed a widespread smear campaign against me. Her friends think I am a terrible person. She has projected everything she is onto me. Ri never attacked me physically, but instead used her downgrade boyfriend to issue death threats to me. If I had not been careful, the chances of violence between him and me were very high. My life was turned into a mix of depression and fear. Then one day I finally broke down. That's the night I did "it". I woke up in a hospital the next day from a failed suicide attempt.

The next 2 months, my mother took care of me. I was a wreck. She kept asking me to remove Ri from my life forever, to forget her and move on. While I was idle at work, I googled "painful break up" and "getting over heartbreak." One site led to another and I found myself on "shrink4men". The first article I read, "Is your girlfriend a borderline?" blew me away. Everything it says matches to what went down with me. Every other article does, too.

I have found my beacon in pitch black darkness. I read and read till I have read every single article and every single user comment on this site. I went No Contact. In 2 months, the FOG has lifted and liberation has come.

It has been a year since then. Ri has tried hoovering me back many times and failed each time. Downgrade boyfriend has been dumped. All of a sudden, I am back to being the greatest thing that ever happened to her. I see through it all and block her everywhere. I told her about BPD and asked her to seek help. She denied it all and says she is fine.

Where am I today? I have forgiven Ri. It is not her fault that nature made her this way. She is the wolf and I am the sheep. I have sympathy for her but I will never go back to her. A part of my heart has seen through all her masks and sees the really hurt girl to whom life has been cruel. The abuse has shaped her into something she never chose to be. Like I said, I have sympathy for her, but I WON'T be her victim. NEVER AGAIN.

To my brothers who have had a cluster B in their life, this is what I say to you. No matter what kind of hell you are living in or have been through, never take the option of ending your life. Instead, get up and keep walking forward. Keep walking forward, one step at a time.

I am very glad you were not successful in your suicide attempt, Pankaj. You are so very correct when you say, "There is nothing more tragic than a man chasing a borderline. What he is actually chasing is his own destruction." Thank you for having the courage to share your story.

In His Own Words/In Her Own Words is a joint effort between Shrink4Men and AVoiceForMen to help raise awareness about the invisible victims of domestic violence, men. If you would like to submit your story, please follow the guidelines at the end of this article.

Grow up, Lena Dunham

Hannah Wallen · 8 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

According to Huffingtonpost.com, Cosmopolitan.co.uk, and Time.com, Lena Dunham has become the latest megaphone to promote the feminist assertion that when it comes to sex, women are simply not capable of being equal to men.

Of course, that's not how the articles are framed. They present her as a courageous but confused victim who is finally ready to admit that years ago in college she was raped. To achieve this, the articles use a mix of feminism's application of female hypoagency and male hyperagency to heterosexual encounters, a gynocentric approach to bodily autonomy, and demonization of men by association.

The self-described ideology of strong, independent women treats heterosexual interaction as though women are so weak and inept and men are so powerful and capable that the man must be accountable for the decisions and actions of both himself and his partner while the woman has no responsibility at all, not even that of open communication. Dunham supports this repeatedly in her description by framing her own choices as irrelevant and inflating the relevance of her partner's actions and even those of an uninvolved man—all except for her sex partner's consent.

The articles frame their reporting on Dunham's encounter inside feminism's treatment of consent as the exclusive privilege of women. Nowhere is it addressed that Dunham had sex with a man under false pretenses, feigning interest because she did not want to admit to social ineptitude while drinking. Did her partner consent to sex with a woman who did not want him? Was he sober enough to consent to sex? It's hard to tell from the articles quoting Dunham's book, as those articles may or may not contain all of what she wrote, and what she wrote is only the "she said" side of the story.

Various quotes describe Dunham's choice, knowing that she was intoxicated, to take a man back to her room and have sex with him, followed by a description of her morning-after regret crafted to elicit sympathy and a sense of sisterhood in female readers.

First, a quote describes Dunham disrobing in front of a man to urinate outside (an action that, were he to do it, would get a man arrested and put on a sex offenders list.) She treats his sexual response to her public nudity as if it is somehow less appropriate than her choice to disrobe in front of him without warning. Apparently, though we're supposed to see women as completely reasonable in responding to male nudity as always sexual and always inflicted no matter his perspective, when a woman drops trou in public, that's different.

So different, in fact, that doing so communicates nothing to a member of the sex raised to believe their own nudity constitutes sexual imposition, except "I have to pee."

Dunham does not indicate in her narrative that she offered any refusal to the guy's advance. Instead, she offers the following: "I'm not sure whether I can't stop it or I don't want to."

This is not no. This is not I was forced. This is I made a decision to go along with something and now I don't want to admit that, so I'm going to frame my description to portray myself as an object that is acted upon, instead of a person making a choice.

This is what feminist hypoagency looks like.

Apparently, she was not decisively averse because she describes continuing on. At this point, it is undeniable that she knew that the man she was talking about was sexually aroused and interested in her. It would take a special kind of stupid to misinterpret fingering as an unclear signal.

According to her own narrative, after deciding to continue walking with a man she knew had fingered her in response to her choice to expose her genitals to him, Dunham refused assistance in extracting herself from the encounter.

> Leaving the parking lot, I see my friend Fred. He spies Barry leading me by the arm toward my apartment (apparently I've told him where I live), and he calls out my name. I ignore him. When that doesn't work, he grabs me. Barry disappears for a minute, so it's just Fred and me.
>
> "Don't do this," he says.
>
> "You don't want to walk me home, so just leave me alone," I slur, expressing some deep hurt I didn't even know I had. "Just leave me alone."
>
> He shakes his head. What can he do?

Yet again we see Dunham's choices treated as irrelevant, and here there are layers she is not addressing. Why do her feelings toward Fred have anything to do with her choice to take Barry home with her? Is she going home with Barry to spite Fred? If she is, does she really think that's anyone's choice and anyone's fault but her own? And why is it that big bad Barry has been granted the agency and power to steer her by the arm, but good guy Fred is helpless in the face of that thing women don't do in a sexual encounter … her refusal? Why can she refuse Fred if she's powerless to refuse Barry?

Dunham's story is full of such contradictions. She can remember walking with Barry, knew when she was talking to Fred that Barry was walking her home, but at her apartment she didn't know that they had got there together because Barry had walked her home. She could refuse Fred but was too indecisive to refuse Barry until she found out that he wasn't using a condom—at which point the guy she claims was forcing himself on her obeyed her order to leave. There are a lot of details in that story, but it's lacking the one vital factor that would define the encounter as it is presented: unless the writers of the various articles on the narrative have left out a Dunham quote describing Barry deliberately, knowingly contravening her ability to refuse, her story does not describe a rape. She's described lousy drunken sex from the perspective of someone who, over the years, has been convinced by feminists that because afterwards she regretted doing it, it was rape. It's hard to tell if that absence is due to omission, but the fact that writers had room to fit in a mention of the accused's political affiliation casts doubt on the existence of any reason to not include such an important detail.

The Time article, which contains most of the quotes, is especially difficult to trust, as it presents as evidence of a pervasive campus rape culture a link to a study that found the majority of rape to be committed by a mere 6% of the population. The article omits that fact, instead emphasizing that 90% of admitted rapists are repeat offenders. It's a method of obfuscation that feminists regularly use: ignore part of the available information to focus on that which, when isolated, can be framed to suit the intended narrative. This is reason to question the omission of anything that would indicate actual force or coercion in the described scenario, under suspicion that if it existed, it would have been reported, or at least descriptively referenced—unless the writers were deliberately trying to portray awkward drunken sex as rape.

These are all common factors within the feminist narrative on sexual violence. The story being sold is that men are perpetrators and women are victims.

Men act. Women are acted upon. Her experience and her emotional responses matter. His are irrelevant, and so is his perception.

Why else would a major news source take seriously such a grave accusation based on no evidence other than the accuser's word? As the way Dunham framed her side of the story demonstrates, the opposite is true of choices; while her experience and her emotional responses are of utmost importance, her choices are totally, completely, unquestionably meaningless. And while his experiences, emotional responses, and, most of all, his perceptions are of no consequence, his choices are the only choices acknowledged in the situation.

Why? Because the self-described ideology of strong, independent women believes that heterosexual sex makes us inept, helpless, hapless twits.

[image]

In the past, I've explored how nonsexual behaviors might look if people approached them the way feminists want women to approach sex, leading to an article in Breaking the Glasses titled "The brutal rape of poor, innocent Mr. Creosote." Monty Python fans will recall the sketch at the beginning of The Meaning of Life in which Mr. Creosote overeats and explodes. It's obvious in the sketch that Mr. Creosote is the main cause of his own problem, but viewing his experience through a feminist filter (and treating him as female) would call for a different conclusion. Ms. Creosote was obnoxious, but the waiter obviously knew what would happen when he gave his customer that mint. The viewer can tell because upon handing it over, the waiter runs and ducks for cover. It's clear, when viewed through that filter of hypoagency, that Ms. Creosote has been dietarily assaulted. She is a victim of intimate server violence.

Another example is the cake culture video, made in response to the feminist-made flash "game" that was nothing but a narrative designed to train the player to dismiss a woman's sexual choices and treat male sexuality as predatory and domineering. The game designer had backed a pick-your-path story with not only an unavoidable, predetermined outcome but also an unavoidable, predetermined outlook, with a quiet version of Chopin's funeral march to set the mood. It couldn't have been more melodramatic if the word RAPE had flashed across the screen in big letters every few seconds during the game. The story concluded with a weepy monologue designed to evoke viewer pity for the story's character. The designer described the game as an exercise in understanding rape culture.

Discussion about that game, and an offer of assistance from Alien Gearbox on YouTube, led to the creation of the following public service ad to alert you all to the nefarious, pervasive cake culture in which we unknowingly live.

Nobody would accept such a ridiculous lack of self-determination in a healthy adult outside of the context of a heterosexual encounter. It's something we accept from children, and a reason why adults are given the legal authority to make decisions for children and the onus to use that authority to protect and nurture children. A parent has legal decision-making authority over every aspect of his or her child's life, and is accountable to society should such decisions lead to harm rather than benefit for the child. This authority limits children's freedom for their own protection. If a child skips school, associates with criminals, uses drugs, refuses treatment for serious illness, or is injured doing something incredibly stupid, the parent can face criminal charges for neglect, so parents have the legal authority to force children to attend school, to restrict their movement to prevent them from dangerous associations or behaviors, to make medical decisions for them, and to monitor their activities in a way that we would never tolerate an adult doing to another healthy adult. The justification for this is the fact that they are not mentally and emotionally developed enough to make certain decisions for themselves. Parenting is the act of stewarding the life of a developing human being until he or she is competent to be accountable and responsible for himself or herself.

Feminism's habit of inferring hypoagency upon women likens us to children, and their hyperagency narrative likens men to parents. In denying the validity, relevance, and impact of women's decisions, feminists deny that women are mentally and emotionally developed enough to make those decisions for ourselves. In emphasizing men's capability and placing the onus of accountability for both parties in heterosexual encounters on them, feminists infer that women are not competent to be accountable and responsible for ourselves so men must be. The inference is a demand that men take on stewardship of women's lives, responsibility for our welfare, on the same level that parents are expected to do for children. It is an indirect statement that women, at least women who buy into feminist ideology, are not only not strong or independent, but also not even adults.

An adult does not need to be coddled like that. He knows his goals and his boundaries, and considers the potential impact of his choices on himself and on anyone else involved. In his decisions he is mindful of those factors. Changing "he" to "she" does not exempt an individual wanting to be considered an adult from meeting those standards. While it is childish to engage in adult behavior with an ambiguous, blundering partner, it is also childish to ambiguously blunder your way through an encounter you could easily end with clear, decisive communication and then blame it on anyone but yourself. Lena Dunham, the worst thing Barry did to you, according to the description offered in various news sources, was engage in sexual activity with an apparent adult who had yet to mature enough to be called one.

Note: Title image by David Shankbone, cropped to fit our publication standards. –Eds.

A call to end discrimination in mental health

Dan Perrins · 8 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

Note: David Sweet is my local federal Member of Parliament in Canada. This past summer at an Ontario street festival, I had a chance to promote awareness of men's issues with Mr. Sweet. One of those issues was male suicide. I recently sent a letter to Mr. Sweet to follow up in more detail.—DP.

October 7, 2014

Mr. David Sweet, MP
484 Confederation Building
Ottawa Ontario
Canada K1A 0A6

Dear Mr. Sweet,

We spoke briefly at the Dundas, Ontario, Cactus Festival this past August. We talked for about 10 minutes, and I explained to you how men face issues from the cradle to the grave. One of the topics we discussed was men's mental health and the fact that men are 76% of the suicide population. For certain age groups, such as those at university, men are 80% of the suicide population. I wanted to follow up with you sooner and personally deliver this letter to your office in Ottawa, but unfortunately circumstances did not permit.

Eight men a day are killing themselves in Canada, and given that the province of Ontario has close to 40% of Canada's population, approximately three of those men will be here. We both expressed profound concern at men committing the vast majority of suicides, as well as professing our mutual desire to help put an end to this tragic fact.

In the course of the conversation, you had mentioned how your party, the Conservative Party of Canada, had produced a paper on male suicides. The most recent one I have found was written in 2012, and the situation has not improved.

However, I recently found myself shocked and somewhat disgusted to learn just how little Canadian society, and its government, values men's mental health.

The Movember Foundation, the charity organization best known for raising awareness about prostate cancer, donated approximately $12 million toward men's mental health last year. This dwarfs what the Canadian government has contributed to men's mental health over the past 15 years, according to Professor John Oliffe:

> "The $12 million that Movember Canada is spending on men's mental health is unprecedented," said Oliffe, explaining that it dwarfs what Canada's government-funded health research bodies have spent in the field in the past 15 years.
> (http://www.vancouversun.com/news/Douglas+Todd+Unprecedented+effort+improve+mental+health/10138302/story.html#ixzz3EuyIUYS8)

Applying Professor Oliffe's claims, that works out to less than $1 million a year invested to correct a problem the Canadian government has known about at least since 1995, when this was written about in a Statistics Canada paper by Kathryn Wilkins.

I have researched and written on this topic twice and have found a glaring discrepancy in the amount of literature on women's mental health compared with men's mental health: 11 papers compared with 1, with 1 common to both so I didn't include it in my tabulation (http://www.avoiceformen.com/men/mens-issues/suicide-the-problem-they-claim-to-be-working-on-but-arent/).

I believe you will remember Hamilton's loss of Sergeant Ian Matthews last December (http://www.cbc.ca/news/canada/hamilton/hamilton-police-officer-ian-matthews-dies-after-shooting-himself-at-central-station-1.2467867).

I am also aware of another recent incident in which a police officer killed himself in the Ottawa area (http://ottawacitizen.com/news/local-news/the-unspoken-toll-police-suffering-in-silence).

The number of military personnel who died by their own hands over the past 10 years is higher than all who were killed in combat while in Afghanistan. And again the vast majority of those suicide victims are men (http://www.thestar.com/news/canada/2014/09/16/suicide_claims_more_soldiers_than_those_killed_by_afghan_combat.html and http://www.forces.gc.ca/en/news/article.page?doc=suicide-and-suicide-prevention-in-the-canadian-armed-forces/hgq87xvu).

Our military and first responders experience higher rates of suicide than the general population and yet the contributions of the very nation and government they serve is eclipsed by a $12 million donation by a single charity.

Mr. Sweet, I believe all Members of Parliament, along with Canadians across our great nation, will agree this simply is not acceptable.

Therefore, I am asking you and all Members of Parliament to bring forth legislation to remedy this tragic oversight.

Sincerely,
Dan Perrins,
Canadian News Director at A Voice for Men

> Front Page

Is the UK a sexist country?

William Collins · 8 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

I despair.

On September 23, 2014, BBC3 TV aired a live program Free Speech Live, which debated "Do we live in a sexist country?" (referring to the UK), here.

To any neutral observer with a functioning brain, the answer became abundantly clear in the opening minutes. This featured a prerecorded film of women—only women—complaining about anti-female sexism. Leave aside any debate about the merits or otherwise of what they said. The fact that only women were asked for their opinion is an absolute clincher: the BBC is a sexist organization. It is impossible to conclude otherwise when they stage a debate on sexism and allow only one side to speak.

This opening set the scene for what was to follow. Consider the panel—which consisted of four people: three outright feminists (two women and one man, respectively Laura Bates, Plaid Cymru's Leanne Wood, and a so-called comedian, Omar Hamdi) together with Angela Epstein, who might fairly be regarded as neutral (a self-declared non-feminist, but not an anti-feminist). Biased? Great God, it is testament to the BBC's hoodwinking of the public that they can get away with something so blatant. A fair panel might have had two feminists and two outright, full-on MRA/anti-feminists. Or one of each and two people like Angela Epstein. Roll on the day.

This appalling excuse for a debate on sexism failed even to allow men's issues onto the agenda. Sexism was presented solely as a woman's issue. We heard the usual stuff about catcalling, unwanted touching, etc. And, yes, bad stuff—really bad stuff—does happen to women—but the relentless, one-way narrative just will not wash anymore, Laura Bates. Bad stuff happens to men too—and you are part of it. How can you have a debate on sexism when even the possibility of the existence of men's human rights issues is not mentioned? Even the good Angela Epstein, though she did her best to restore some degree of sanity, did not raise the key issues. Let me remind you what they are:

- Educational disadvantage of boys.
- Lack of recognition of, or assistance for, male victims of partner abuse.
- Men's shorter life expectancy.
- Substantially less research funding on men-only diseases compared with women-only diseases.
- Male suicide rates.
- Men's lack of paternity rights.
- Endemic paternity fraud.
- Some parents (mothers) are more equal than others (fathers)—gross gender bias of the family courts.
- Hypersensitivity to male-on-female sexual assault.
- Yet sexual assault of males by females remains largely unrecognized.
- Grossly inequitable treatment of men and women in the criminal justice system.
- "Pay gap" myths hide the truths of the spend gap, the work gap, and the parenting gap.
- Men are 96% of workplace fatalities and injuries.
- Nasty, dirty, dangerous jobs are almost always done by men—no sign that feminists want substantive equality there.
- Men are more likely to be the victims of violence than women—despite the constant exhortations that we should "end violence against women."
- 90% of the homeless are men.
- 99% of war deaths and casualties are men.

- Female genital mutilation is illegal and universally reviled. Male genital mutilation is regarded as perfectly acceptable.
- Female suffering is newsworthy, male suffering is not (e.g., Boko Haram—how many people know that their main activity is killing boys?).
- There is a lack of action on underrepresentation of men in certain professions, contrasting with the huge focus on assisting women into areas where they are underrepresented.
- Male-only organizations have systematically been obliged to accept females, while the reverse is not true.
- Universal denigration of men; misandry.

Now the point is this: even if you are not an MRA and do not believe the above are substantive issues, there is obviously a prima facie case to be addressed. There is simply no excuse whatsoever for failing to even acknowledge that men's issues exist. Yet this is what the BBC does—and not just once, as in this program, but repeatedly, habitually—and, one has to conclude, deliberately.

This is equality?

Is it?

Such is the success of the feminist movement in rewriting history that we had one young man tell us that "people died to get women the vote." Strictly he was correct, but for entirely the wrong reason. The only suffragette who died for the cause was Emily Davison, and it was probably a result of stupidity in her case, rather than deliberate martyrdom, as she failed to appreciate that a racehorse at full gallop was unlikely to stop. But people did indeed die to get women the vote—nearly a million of them—all men. The primary purpose of the 1918 Representation of the People Act was to enfranchise all men of 21 years and over, regardless of class or wealth, as recognition of men's sacrifice in World War 1. Women then got the vote essentially by default because it had been the disenfranchisement of working-class men that had been the political barrier to enfranchising women, as explained fully here (see also Herbert Purdy on the history of women's suffrage). So, the vote for women was indeed bought with lives—men's lives—but you will not hear this from the feminists. Votes for women in the UK owe more to the Kaiser than to the Pankhursts.

My despair deepened when one man, incredibly a primary school teacher, argued that Angela Epstein had been incorrect to claim that much about personal preferences were innate, biologically legislated tendencies. He claimed that scientific studies showed this to be untrue. Really? What scientific studies are those? I think Simon Baron Cohen and Steven Pinker would like to hear about them because their representation of the scientific position is precisely that much behavior, and especially gender orientation, is innate. Read The Essential Difference, read The Blank Slate. Best of all, view this Norwegian documentary by Harald Eia and Ole Martin Ihle that trashes the feminist position on socially constructed gender roles in highly amusing fashion.

This comment was left by one woman viewer of the program (Lana Voreskova): "OK bored with this now. A TV programme which purports to have a "debate" about "sexist culture" – A panel consisting of three feminists and one non-feminist who is rarely allowed to speak anyway. Angela did her best and remained calm but she had little chance of not being drowned out by all the mindless hysterical howling." And she added, "47% percent of female university students have been sexually groped. Ha ha ha. Listen Laura – 100% of university students, male and female, have been sexually groped. Waiting for your next ground-breaking discovery – 98% of cats have chased a mouse." Quite. My despair lifts a little—thank you, Lana.

But finally—and most importantly—the ray of hope. Three young men made valiant attempts to present the men's rights perspective. It was not their fault that they were surrounded by a hostile audience, with a hostile panel and a hostile TV company within a hostile society. Well done, those lads! If any of you read this—I salute you.

In His Own Words: Violent wife and family court highway robbery

Dr. Tara J. Palmatier · 9 October 2014 · Archived copy · Original

It's the ninth day of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Today's In His Own Words is about "Dirk's" marriage and divorce from a violent wife who was aided and abetted by Family Court to commit highway robbery.

My ex-wife and I met online in 2000. She seemed very intelligent, having graduated summa cum laude from an Ivy League school and also having a law degree from the one of the best law schools in the world, in a field in which the degree-granting institute determines the trajectory of one's career. She said she had saved enough money to quit her high-stress job (12 hours a day) on the partner track at one of the most powerful law firms in the world in order to have children, either from a sperm bank or by finding a husband.

She said that she wanted to be engaged within 3 months of the first date. I told her that it would be better to take a bit longer and she agreed to a 6-month extension. She said that her goals were to deliver a baby, buy a new home, move to a new city, and get a new job, all within 12 months of the wedding. She got a new job and we had a baby, moved into a new home four days later, and celebrated our first wedding anniversary four days after that.

After getting pregnant, my ex-wife claimed that she wanted a unique arrangement for our finances. Having significantly higher income than me, she said that she wanted to have us pay equal amounts for monthly expenses and shield all other excess income from the family in personal accounts. She said that she would never deposit her paycheck into a joint account. I told her that did not constitute a real marriage and she said that if I did not agree she would get divorced and take the baby to another state.

I told her that I did not feel that it was appropriate to deprive a child from an intact family. I could not force her to contribute financially to the marriage, but she did agree that we would each contribute an amount of money to cover our half of expenses every month. Beyond that, she said that our finances would otherwise be separate, including retirement funds contributed during the marriage.

After this, she stopped working full-time but continued to pay for her half of monthly expenses. She said that she would always work less than me in order to get sole custody when she was ready to divorce me. Eventually, she stopped contributing to her retirement account, stating that she would not contribute anything to the children's college accounts. She said that as long as our money was "separate" and that she was still paying half of all monthly expenses, then I had no business concerning myself with whether she was working full-time or not, or whether she was contributing to her retirement account.

During the next few years, she became violent.

First, she threw a glass at my head. I was seated at dinner with her, my mother, and our new baby. The baby was wailing and my mother was crying at this horrifying scene. I told her to never throw a glass at my head again. One may wonder what would cause a woman to be so violent.

We were having a discussion about daycare. Evidently, she had hired a nanny to work four days a week, even though my ex-wife only worked three days a week. I asked her why we would hire a nanny on my ex-wife's day off, with half the expense charged to me. She said that for her to truly have a day off, she would have to be away from the child and not working and I had to pay half. I didn't agree. She threw a glass at my head.

In response to the second act of violence, I simply walked out of the house and stayed the night at a hotel. When I returned in the morning, she was packing up the kids to take them to another state. I did not say anything because I knew that she would get violent again. Minutes after she left, I left a message on her cell phone telling her to return the children. She did not return my call for three days. When she did, she said that she never had to return the children because there is no such thing as legally kidnapping in marriage. She drove back with the kids after two more days.

At the time that she became pregnant with our third baby, she said that she would not work at all ever again for the rest of her life after the baby was born and I would have to pay her half of the monthly expenses, plus an additional personal allowance. When I told her that I would not do this, she became violent again. I told her that I was going to phone the police.

As I walked toward the phone, she ran to the phone and called the police who came to the house and separately interviewed us. The police then said that we should find places in the house to cool off and go to sleep. I told the police that I felt that she would be violent again. The police offered to help me by taking me to a shelter. I told them that it didn't make sense for the victim to have to leave.

I asked them where the children would be. The police said that the children would stay in the house with the perpetrator. I told them that this did not make any sense at all. I asked them what would happen if I were the perpetrator. They said that they would then arrest me and take me away. You see, it has nothing to do with who is the victim or who is the perpetrator. It has to do with who is the man and who is the woman.

Meanwhile, I had saved a considerable amount of my "excess" money. I told my ex-wife that I wanted to use it to pay off the mortgage if she would pay a similar amount from her savings. She claimed that her down-payments on the houses were her contributions to the marriage and that she should not have to make any further contributions for the mortgage. Further, if I wanted to use my money to pay the full remaining balance on the house, then I could do so as a match to what she contributed in the down payments. I paid off the house.

My ex-wife filed for divorce in early 2012, after threatening divorce hundreds of times during the previous 11 years. Her decision was unilateral and she had several reasons each week why she said that she had filed. Eventually, she said it was a big mistake. She asked me all the way up to the trial to stay married.

I told her that if she wanted to stay married that she could withdraw her divorce claim in court. She said that she would not do that because I had not fully convinced her to stop the divorce and she wanted it to be as painful as possible for me if I could not convince her to stop it. She told me that she wanted me to be like Steve Carell's character in the movie, "Crazy, Stupid, Love," by wooing her to fall in love with me again. I told her that was "Crazy," "Stupid," and anything but "Love."

As she did many times in marriage, she threatened that she would seek sole custody and take the children to another state, ensuring that they would not be allowed to see their father, except for five days every two years (every other Christmas). Her lawyer eventually told her that even a serial killer gets more custody, so she offered every other weekend and a happy meal on Wednesdays. Once more, people (like the Judge) told her what would likely be the case, so she added an overnight. Eventually, after 22 months and a total of $200K in legal fees and temporary maintenance, she agreed to 50/50 after talking with the children's attorney who said that the Judge is a firm believer in 50/50 shared parenting. We had temporary 50/50 shared parenting during the 22 months of the divorce, when we lived in the same house. This became permanent as the divorce decree was signed in late 2013.

